The land had known its share of troubles (e.g. 4:6–11), but worldly political wisdom saw nothing ahead but the prolongation of affluence and the banishment of serious difficulties into the remote future (5:18a; 6:3a). All these evidences agree well with a date somewhere in the middle of Jeroboam's reign.

THE TEACHING OF AMOS

God

The emphasis which Amos places on the unique privilege of Israel (2:9–11; 3:2) contrasts markedly with his failure to speak of the Lord as 'God of Israel'. In the same connection, while he clearly understands Israel to be the covenant people, he never uses the word 'covenant'. In his representation of God, in other words, everything which might foster Israelite complacency is omitted, and his favourite titles tend to be 'the Lord God' (i.e. 'the sovereign Yahweh', 1:8; 3:7, 8, 13; 4:2, 5; 5:3; 6:8; 7:1, 2, 4, 5, 6; 8:1, 3, 9, 11; 9:8), 'Lord' or 'God of hosts' (i.e. of omnipotent power, 4:13; 5:14, 15, 16, 27; 6:8, 14), 'the Lord' (i.e., when not printed in capitals, 'the Sovereign', 5:16; 7:7, 8; 9:1), and sometimes great compound designations (e.g. 5:16). We shall note later the significance of the majority occurrence of the divine name, Yahweh ('LORD' in RSV), the covenant name, and of the gracious closing description 'the Lord your God' (9:15), but it is undeniably the case that in portraying his God Amos stresses those features of His character which underly His universal rule and government.

Like the rest of the OT, Amos bases his monotheism on the facts that the Lord is the Creator (4:13; 5:8; 9:5, 6), that He is the Agent in all history (3:6; 4:6–11; 9:7), and that He alone is the moral Governor of all nations (1:3 – 2:16). At the same time it is possible for Israel to defect to other 'gods' (5:26, 27), for though there is but one God there are other objects of worship (cf. 1 Cor. 8:5, 6). Yet the monotheism of Amos is as unequivocal as that of Paul.

Judgment

The most obvious derivative from Amos's monotheism is that this great and only God is the Judge of the world. The features of his teaching which stand out are first, that crimes against humanity (see on 1:3 – 2:3), wherever, why ever and however committed, are abhorrent to God and under His judgment; second, that the privilege of being the people of God carries with it the consequence of weightier and more certain judgment (3:2), for the sins of God's people are not just against the light of nature but specifically against the light of revelation (see on 2:4ff.); and third, that there is no distinction ultimately between crimes and sins, i.e. between wrongs against our fellow-men and deliberate affronts to God's law (see on 3:9ff.).

Hope

Does Amos preach judgment to the exclusion of hope? It is quite commonly held that he does, and even that this explains why he was the first prophet whose utterances were committed to writing, because he was the first to proclaim the end of God's covenant with Israel (cf. R. E. Clements, Prophecy and Covenant, 1965). The view espoused in this commentary is that this is plainly not so. First, there is the clear evidence of the first two visions (7:1–6): Amos prays against total judgment, specifically on the ground that it is total, and his prayer is granted. This alone shows how mistaken it is to exclude hope from his teaching. If anything is excluded it is that God intends the final end of His people.

The commentary seeks to show that on this view chs. 7 to 9 form a coherent and persuasive whole, revealing how the sovereign justice which inevitably punishes is married to the sovereign mercy which guarantees the saving purposes of God.

Secondly, there is the fact that Amos is supremely a prophet of Yahweh, the Lord. He uses the divine name at least fifty-one times, excluding its occurrence in the compound 'the Lord God'. Even at the height of his warning, he proclaims a dire confrontation with 'your God' (4:12), and he ends with a word of promise from 'the Lord your God' (9:15). In the midst of judgment the relationship is somehow intact. And, of course, this is exactly the revelation of Yahweh which the OT enshrines, for He earned His title as 'the Lord your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt' by a single action (the Passover) which both judged His enemies and saved His people. Amos cannot prophesy in the name of this God unless he has a message of salvation to preach.

Prophecy

Amos subscribed to the classical doctrines concerning a prophet and his functions (see on 2:11; 3:8), and gave also a personal testimony concerning his own status. In 7:14, 15 the translation of his words 'I not a prophet' (for the Hebrew expresses no verb) has occasioned much enquiry. Some urge that we must understand 'I am not a prophet' (see J. Bright, A History of Israel, 1960, p. 246; Y. Kaufmann, The Religion of Israel, 1961, p. 343; cf. C. Kuhl, The Prophets of Israel, 1961, p. 60). They hold that Amos was repudiating membership of the guilds of professional prophets. It is hard to see that this can be the case since Amos goes on to say that by divine command he has been sent to 'prophesy', literally 'to function as a prophet'. Can he both deny and affirm the same thing? Bright's rejoinder that what he meant was 'yet I am a prophet in the true sense' requires us to understand too much which Amos left unexpressed. G. R. Driver takes the words as a question: 'Am I not a prophet, and son of a prophet because I am a herdsman . . . ? And the Lord took me . . .' But was Amaziah casting doubt on Amos's prophetic vocation because he also followed a secular calling? On the whole it seems best to adopt a past tense (see on 7:14; cf. S. R. Driver, Joel and Amos, 1915; R. M. Gwynn, Amos, 1927): Amos looks back to a time when he was a prophet neither in fact nor in prospect, until the crucial experience of the divine appointment gave him prophetic status.

Religion

The outward appearance of Israel in Amos's day was extremely religious, but it was a religion divorced from the law of God (see on 2:7b, 8), devoid of spiritual benefit (see on 4:4, 5), incapable of sheltering its adherents (see on 3:14; 5:5, 6) and unproductive of moral and social justice (see on 5:21–25). It was this last aspect in particular which drove Amos to ask his famous question: 'Did you bring to me sacrifices and offerings the forty years in the wilderness?' (5:25). There are still those who understand that by this question Amos was calling for a religion of ethical behaviour without any corporate cultic expression by means of sacrifices (cf. C. F. Whitley, The Prophetic Achievement, 1963, pp. 73ff.; J. Lindblom, Prophecy in Ancient Israel, 1963, pp. 352f.), but on the whole specialist opinion is moving rather to the view that Amos repudiated the abuse of the cult and did not question its ultimate divine authorization (cf. H. H. Rowley, The Unity of the Bible, 1953, p. 42; R. E. Clements, op. cit., pp. 94ff.; 'Prophecy and Prophets', NBD).

The vital matter is to note that Amos makes his point by means of a question. To convey a truth by means of a question means that Amos is here expressing not only his own opinions but also those of his hearers, and there can be no doubt that those to whom he was preaching would have replied in the affirmative: sacrifices and offerings were indeed part of the wilderness (and therefore normative) religion. Amos courted disaster for his argument if he expected the answer 'No'. This position does not depend on one's acceptance of the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch, for, as Kaufmann points out (op. cit., p. 365), if this verse repudiates the cult, 'it is not sufficient to say that Amos did not know of P's tabernacle and cult laws. One must also assume that he was ignorant of JE'—and, we may add, that his hearers were equally ignorant! The view proffered in the commentary is that v. 25 redresses any possibility of imbalance between vv. 21, 22 and vv. 23, 24: 'Was it sacrifices and offerings you brought me in the wilderness . . . ?' Was the cult the top priority of the religion stemming from Sinai? Thus Amos's rhetorical question raises the question not of the propriety of sacrifice but of its proper priority and place in Israel's religion.

THE BOOK OF AMOS

The book of Amos comes before us as a very carefully edited piece of literature, and there seems to be no good reason for doubting that Amos could have been and was his own editor. If, following 7:10–17, he was compelled to flee the north, or if, his prophetic task over, he simply returned to his home in Tekoa, this, as well as his southern origin, sufficiently explains both the Judahite element in the dating (1:1) and sporadic Judahite references throughout.

But are there parts of the book which ought to be assigned to other authors than Amos? The following are the main passages which have suggested this conclusion to some commentators: the prophecy against Judah (2:4, 5) has been suspected, first because it is against Judah and Amos was a prophet to Israel, second because it allegedly lacks the fervour characteristic of Amos, third because its wording (e.g. 'to walk after' meaning to worship idols; 'to reject the law of the Lord') shows the influence of Deuteronomy. In reply it may be urged that Amos's primary task towards Israel no more rules out an oracle against Judah than against the other nations listed in ch. 1; that even if the Judah oracle lacks fervour (which at best is a matter of opinion) it is not surprising in a prophet from Judah; and that if there are links with Deuteronomy (and the suggestions are both meagre and commonplace) it is more reasonable to use this as evidence for an early date for Deuteronomy than as requiring us to dismember the prophecy of Amos.

The three similar passages, 4:13; 5:8, 9; and 9:5, 6, have been questioned. The argument is partly exegetical, that the passages are abrupt in their context. This has been dealt with in the commentary, where it has been shown that in each case the disputed passage has a vital task to perform, in showing that the Lord is capable of bringing in exactly that form of judgment which the preceding verses have threatened. The second line of objection to the integrity of these verses has been doctrinaire in the extreme: that they reflect a later theology than was possible in Amos's day (see, e.g., J. P. Hyatt, 'Amos' in Peake's Commentary on the Bible, 1963, p. 617). The doctrine in question is that of God as Creator (cf. H. W. Robinson, Inspiration and Revelation in the Old Testament, 1946, p. 22). Apart from the fact that this theory assumes an exilic date for Is. 40–55, in which the doctrine of Yahweh the Creator is explicit, it is not now so readily accepted that one can be dogmatic about the development of doctrine in the Old Testament, and, as J. D. Smart remarks, this theology 'is not in any way inconsistent with the thought of Amos, and there seems to be no very convincing reason for denying them to him' (IDB, 1962, Vol. I, p. 119).

The main assault on the integrity of Amos has ever centred on 9:8b–15. It is probable that the excision of these verses stemmed from the belief that a doctrine of hope had no place in the teaching of Amos. We have shown above that this is not and cannot be the case. The argument was, however, strengthened by the allegation that the passage was too abrupt in context to be genuine: the reader must judge from the following commentary how much weight is to be attached to this. It would seem to have none at all. This leaves two other lines of attack. The first is that the language of this closing passage in the book of Amos has affinities with exilic and post-exilic writings. On examination this comes down to a mere matter of vocabulary, concerning which S. R. Driver (op. cit., p. 125) was of the opinion that 'the phrases used are not linguistically suggestive of lateness; and the question is whether, it being granted that Amos might have contemplated (like other prophets) not only the exile of his people, but also its restoration, they do more than give expression to that idea under forms which might naturally have presented themselves to him'.

The second line of attack centres on the nature of prophecy. The verses presuppose the fall of Judah, and the question (as, e.g., posed by R. S. Cripps, The Book of Amos, 1929, pp. 67ff.) is whether it is reasonable to ask men to look forward to the restoration of the house of David while that house is still standing. The principle lying behind this approach has been persuasively stated by G. E. Wright (Isaiah, 1964, p. 8): 'A prophecy is earlier than what it predicts, but contemporary with, or later than what it presupposes.' If this is indeed the case, then the present passage seems to presuppose the fall of Jerusalem and must therefore be either contemporary with or later than that event. The matter is not, however, so easily settled. Can a prophet never presuppose what he has himself earlier prophesied? Could Amos, who prophesied the fall of Jerusalem (2:4, 5) not presuppose it and look beyond it? It would be to a degree unnatural if he did not. Thus the argument falls to the ground. If, of course, the reference to the fallen Tabernacle of David looks back to the division of the kingdom (see commentary, in loc.), then this particular argument is doubly unnecessary and mistaken.

THE BOOK IN OUTLINE

Each section of the book of Amos presents a clear message, and the three sections form a developing pattern in which answers are provided to questions raised by what has gone before. As it stands, the book is complete and well ordered.

Section 1, The lion's roar: universal judgment and its ground (1:2 – 3:8), proclaims imminent divine judgment (1:2) against neighbouring heathen nations (1:3 – 2:3), against Judah (2:4, 5), and Israel (2:6–16). Amos concludes this startling message by insisting that what he says is the word of the Lord (3:1–8) and the section ends as it began (1:2) with the lion's roar (3:8).

Section 2, An enemy in the land (3:9–6:14), reveals how the Lord will accomplish this judgment, and probes more deeply into the causes of His anger. National social crimes (3:9–11) are sins against God (3:12–15) and provoke His holiness (4:1–3). Religious formalism (4:4, 5), devoid of spiritual response to God (4:6–11), provides no safeguard and confrontation is inevitable (4:12, 13). Consequently the prophet laments over the fallen nation (5:1–3) which refused calls to spiritual (5:4–13), moral (5:14–20), and religious (5:21–27) reformation. Their complacent self-confidence (6:1–7) will collapse before the inrushing foe (6:8–14).

Section 3, The Lord Yahweh (7:1 – 9:15), faces the crucial question whether this judgment marks the end of God's purposes for Israel. Has He finally cast off His people? Amos records two visions of complete destruction (7:1–6) against which he prayed and prevailed. This would not be the Lord's way. A third vision (7:7–9) of discriminating judgment evoked no prayer: God will search His people through and through. Once more this startling message stirs Amos to state his credentials as a prophet (7:10–17). Judgment, though imminent (8:1–14) and inescapable (9:1–6), is discriminating (9:7–10), and beyond it lies the glorious future of a prosperous and immovable people (9:11–15).

COMMENTARY

1:1 THE TITLE

The book which lies before us consists of the words of Amos. Elsewhere throughout its nine chapters a more daring description is used, 'thus says the Lord'. We are in the presence of the miracle of inspiration (cf. Ezk. 2:8 - 3:4), that man, without losing individuality or sacrificing personality should yet speak words which originated not with himself but with his God.

Tekoa was 12 miles south of Jerusalem. The word shepherds appears elsewhere only as 'sheep breeder' (2 Ki. 3:4). Some have tried to give it a technical meaning, that Amos was a Temple official, but there is no shadow of evidence for such a use of the word. The Lord took one who, to all appearance, bore no marks of being His mouthpiece and made him the vehicle of a message to his day and ours. The message was one which he saw. This is the same as our use of 'to see' when we mean 'to understand' or 'to perceive the meaning of'. It blends revelation and inspiration, for 'seeing' implies both an object or truth revealed and also the faculty to apprehend it. God gave the truth and also the power to grasp it. (See NBD, art. 'Prophecy, Prophets'.)

On the historical details, see Introduction.

1:2 - 3:8 THE LION'S ROAR: UNIVERSAL JUDGMENT AND ITS GROUND

This first group of prophecies is contained within the two bracketing verses, 1:2 and 3:8: 'The Lord roars . . . The lion has roared'. Thus the message of these chapters is pronounced to be God's word in origin and a word of judgment in content.

The first three nations under condemnation, named by their capital cities, were heathen nations unrelated to Israel; the next three were 'cousins' (cf. Gn. 25:30; 19:36–38). Judah, the seventh, was the brother-nation to the south. Thus judgment creeps nearer until at last it falls upon Israel itself. This may have been a rhetorical device used by Amos, the open-air preacher, to catch the ear of the passing crowds and to lead them imperceptibly into hearing the Lord's word of condemnation on themselves. It may have represented the course of his own thoughts, as he contemplated the vicious social habits of his near neighbours and gradually and logically came to ask the question: What of us? Are we not equally under the condemnation of the Holy One?

There are two distinct grounds of judgment. The heathen nations are charged with crimes against humanity: brutal methods of war (v. 3), slave-trading (v. 6), pitilessness (v. 11), etc. The assumption is that there are elements of moral behaviour which need no special revelation but belong to man by nature (cf. Rom. 2:14). On Judah and Israel, however, judgment falls for disobedience to revelation. They have 'rejected the law of the Lord' (2:4) and silenced His prophets (2:12). Amos found people sheltering under privilege (cf. on 5:18), and he spelled out to them the real meaning of privilege: not licence to do wrong but responsibility to do right, carrying with it the heavier judgment reserved for those to whom much is given (cf. Lk. 12:48).

Behind this universal condemnation of Gentile and Israelite alike there lies Amos's firm monotheism (see Introduction). It is Yahweh who declares wrath upon all alike. There is no other God in the field.

1:2 Warning

The warning is first of divine action. The name of God, 'Yahweh' (RSV, 'LORD') is emphasized, and the duplication, Zion . . . Jerusalem, the place of His abode, underlines the thought of the nature of the Agent: He will act in His revealed character as Israel's God. Secondly, we are warned of imminent action. Roars (cf. Jdg. 14:5) signifies that the lion is about to pounce. The more universal aspects of God's pronouncement of wrath are expressed by changing the picture to the thunderstorm, in which He utters his voice. The verbs could well be translated as repetitives: 'again and again He roars'. In the following series of condemnations we hear roar after roar of His voice, one thunderclap of judgment after another. Thus we are prepared for Amos's third assertion: the completeness of judgment. From the pastures of the shepherd in the lush valleys to the bare tops of the Carmel range there is no place unblighted. All lies under effective condemnation.

1:3 - 2:16 Application

The 'again and again' of the repeated roar is a continuous present tense reaching down to our own day. Wherever and whenever these crimes are committed the Lion roars again. But we learn now the immediate objects of the Lord's wrath.

1:3–5 Damascus. Syria is condemned for the expansionist military policy of Hazael (842–806 BC) who pushed the boundaries of his kingdom even across the Jordan into Israel with vicious cruelty (cf. 2 Ki. 8:12). Damascus fell to the Assyrians in 732 BC.

3 The numerical feature, for three . . . four, used throughout these oracles (cf. Ps. 62:11; Pr. 30:15, 18, 21, 29) probably signified that the measure of guiltiness is more than full, as if to say 'three would have been enough to warrant judgment; four makes it beyond question'. It also reveals the patience of God, who neither acts in haste or without cause, even delaying beyond the point where action was well justified (cf. Gn. 15:16; 18:20; 2 Pet. 3:8, 9). But when He does act His judgment is irrevocable: He says I will not revoke the punishment (cf. the same verb used in Nu. 23:20; Is. 14:27, 'turn it back'). Their crime was barbarity in war: threshing sledges of iron, ponderous sledges fitted underneath with points and edges, dragged back and forth over their victims.

4 Benhadad (cf. 2 Ki. 8:7–15; 13:3) signifies the dynasty of Hazael.

5 The bar of Damascus symbolizes all the defences of the city. The Valley of Aven and Beth-eden, identified from Assyrian sources as Bit-Adini, NE of Damascus, trace the spread of destruction through the land in a judgment of which the Lord Himself was the real Agent, whatever the instrument He used. He is the personal opponent of the barbarous and the inhuman. From Kir the Syrians originated (cf. 9:7) and to this unknown place, having blotted history with their inhumanities, they return, Tiglath-pileser of Assyria being God's instrument (cf. 2 Ki. 16:9).

1:6–8 Gaza. Gaza, representing God's judgment on the Philistines, fell to Tiglath-pileser of Assyria in 734 BC, Ashdod to Sargon of Assyria in 711, and Ashkelon and Ekron to Sennacherib of Assyria in 701 BC. Their crime is that they were involved in slave-trading on a grand scale with Edom as either the buyer or the middleman. Gaza was so obsessed with a simple profit motive that nothing else counted; no plea of age or sex, no appeal of parent for child or child for parent was entertained. The saleable were sold. This inhumanity is under the lash of God: indeed all the more emphatically so, for Amos significantly adds says the Lord God, the sovereign Yahweh, as if to say, 'Nothing calls forth the omnipotent power of the Lord more than when one person uses another simply for his own profit.'

1:9, 10 Tyre. The Tyrians were renowned for commerce (cf. Ezk. 27:12–25). Amos depicts them as simply handling the business side of the slave-trade. They considered themselves bound by no ties of honour. The covenant of brotherhood may refer to relations between Israel and Tyre in the time of David and Solomon (cf. 1 Ki. 5:1, 12; 9:13), but possibly it is more general. 'Covenant of brothers' (literally) would be a good equivalent to 'human rights', and would accord well with the universal standpoint of these oracles.

Tyre became tributary to Assyria, surrendered to Nebuchadrezzar after a thirteen-year siege (585–573 BC), and was eventually destroyed by Alexander the Great in 332 BC.

1:11, 12 Edom. Teman is Edom (cf. Ob. 9; Hab. 3:3). Bozrah was its chief city. We do not know of any warlike activities of Edom against Israel or Judah as described here until their part in the fall of Jerusalem (cf. Ob. 10–15; Ezk. 25:12–14). This has led some commentators to suggest that this oracle was inserted after that date, while others solve the supposed difficulty by altering 'Edom' to 'Aram', making the reference to Syria. Our knowledge is, however, far from complete, and neighbouring states have plenty of opportunity for venting ancestral spleen. The Lord notes even unrecorded incidents. Their actions were against nature and without mercy, and their spirit was one of ceaseless, remorseless animosity (v. 11b). These things the Lord answers with fire.

1:13–15 Ammon. The Ammonite war against Gilead is not otherwise known, but the record was kept in heaven. The motive was national aggrandizement, to enlarge their border, and in the interests of material increase they destroyed human increase. Cf. 2 Ki. 8:12; 15:16. They prized the material above the human, and dealt inhuman savagery to those who more than any others merit tenderness, the pregnant woman and the unborn child. Notice the elaborate detail in v. 14 as compared with the parallel vv. 5, 7, 8, 10, 12. The crackle of the fire is accompanied by the triumphant shouting of the assailant, and all is set against the background of a violent storm. The whirlwind often signifies destruction leaving nothing remaining (cf., e.g., Is. 40:24), and the intervention of the forces of nature is a metaphor for the Lord Himself (cf. Jos. 10:11; Jdg. 5:20, 21; Ps. 18:13–15). He who is the Father of the fatherless and the widow's Defender (cf., e.g., Ps. 68:5) will not stand idly by while the mothers and unborn children of Gilead are violated.

2:1–3 Moab. How varied are the concerns of the God of Israel. The oppressed (1:3), the exiled refugee and slave (1:6), failure of human brotherhood (1:9), remorseless anger (1:11), ill-used women and unborn children (1:13)—and now, outside the chosen people altogether, violence to the corpse of the king of Edom. Wherever crimes against humanity are committed, and on or by whomsoever they are practised, and for whatever reason, He is their implacable foe and judge. 2 Ki. 3:26 hints some special hostility between Moab and Edom (876 BC), and we must presume that the present particular crime was committed in the interests of the same national enmity.

2:4, 5 Judah. Amos's prophecy now takes its most significant turn; the searchlight is turned on the chosen people, and first Judah. The repetition of the formula for three transgressions . . . and for four shows that they were no less guilty than the heathen nations just reviewed; the precise accusation that they have rejected the law of the Lord shows how much deeper was their guilt. It had four aspects: first, law means 'teaching', such as is personally imparted to a pupil by a teacher. They have spurned God's personal instruction. Second, they have changed the unchangeable. His statutes are the precepts graven upon rock for permanence (cf. Ex. 31:18). Third, they have replaced them with lies (cf. 2 Tim. 4:4), and fourth, their sin is deeply ingrained in them by inheritance from their fathers, a truth which the OT uses, never to excuse the sinner, but always to indicate that he is in the place of mounting guilt (cf. Ps. 51:3–5; Mt. 23:31–36).

The fulfilment of this threat is recorded in 2 Ki. 24, 25 (586 BC).

2:6–16 Israel. Amos begins with the sins of Israel (vv. 6–8), particularizing them as, first, sins against society (vv. 6, 7a), whereby they act with lawlessness against the righteous, unfeelingness against the needy, and rapacity against the poor.

6 The righteous are here the 'innocent party' at law, a significance basic to the word. Judges are open to bribery, and verdicts are sold to the highest bidder. The needy suggests 'those who have no recourse but to submit', the helpless, defenceless. Often in the Psalms the word means those who gladly submit to the Lord. But here it is the socially helpless who have no means of redress. Either a bribe as small as a pair of shoes is enough to swing the verdict, or a debt as small as that for a pair of shoes is enough to bring a man into the dock: such is the covetousness of the community.

7a This oppression of the poor, or 'weak', could rather point to those 'that pant after the dust of the earth upon (or at the expense of) the head of the poor', referring to covetousness for real estate, so that they grudge the poor man even the dust which he daubs on his head as a sign of mourning (cf. Jos. 7:6), or even go the lengths of murder ('at the expense of') to acquire landed property. The afflicted are the downtrodden, those who can easily be pushed around by the well-to-do.

7b Sins against revelation now follow. God's holy name had been revealed to Israel. The Lord had let them into the intimate secret of His real nature as the holy One. But now there is open defiance of His prohibition of adultery (cf. Ex. 20:14) in general and of fornication in the name of religion in particular (cf. Dt. 23:17, 18). Canaanite religion thought that the performance of the human actions of procreation could be used to remind the god to fertilize the earth. It is this practice which Amos sees and denounces in Israel. The holy Yahweh is being worshipped as a Canaanite Baal. The basic truth here is that God must be worshipped as He requires and not simply as we might desire (cf. Mt. 15:9). The same maiden; literally, 'the girl'. The condemnation is not, so to say, of an aggravated immorality in which father and son use the 'same girl', but that the whole male community, 'father and son' (alike) are involved.

8 Third, Amos condemns sins against grace. The altar, the place of atonement for sin (cf. Lv. 17:11) is the place where sin is committed; the house of their God, the place of holy fellowship with Him, is a place of unholy revelry. They lay themselves down in the very act of fornication which the Lord hates. Garments taken in pledge, as surety against a loan, were always to be returned before nightfall (cf. Ex. 22:26, 27). In this, as well as in drinking wine of those who have been fined (paid for by fines exacted in a supposed legal trial) they show how behind their self-indulgence lie their flagrant illegalities.

We are now brought over the same ground in rather a different manner, in order to learn the sinfulness of Israel's sin (vv. 9–12). At every point at which they sinned they had been the recipients of some special assurance of His gracious favour. They possessed a society to corrupt (vv. 6, 7a) only because special grace had given them a land of their own (v. 9); they knew the holy Name which they defiled only because special grace had brought them out of Egypt (v. 10); they had a law for life and worship, which they contravened, only because God had provided special channels of revelation (vv. 11, 12). The order of the events in vv. 9–12 is therefore not chronological, but is designed to further Amos's description of a sinful people.

9 The Amorite; a general name for the pre-Israelite occupants of Canaan. Fruit . . . roots (cf. 'root and branch') denotes complete destruction. 10 The Exodus gave God His full style and title, 'Yahweh your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt' (Ex. 20:2). By this they knew the holy Name which they defiled (v. 7b). 11 The prophets prolonged in Israel the revelation given through Moses; the Nazirites (cf. Nu. 6:1ff.) typified that consecration to God which ought to flow from the revealed knowledge of Him. 12 But the chosen people neither wanted to see the example nor hear the truth (cf. Is. 30:9–11).

Lastly, Amos turns to the judgment to come (vv. 13–16): a divine action (v. 13) against which neither natural ability (v. 14), military equipment (v. 15) nor outstanding courage (v. 16) will avail.

13 Israel thought of itself as living in a prosperous harvest-time. Jeroboam had raised national prosperity to a pitch unknown since the time of Solomon (cf. 2 Ki. 14:25–28). But there are other aspects of a good harvest. If we follow RSV we see the home-bound laden harvest waggon, pressing the earth, helpless beneath its weight. So Israel is heaping up a weight of divine wrath which will press the nation into helpless destruction. Possibly however, the verse should be translated 'as the purposely-filled cart presses the sheaves'—a picture of the weighted threshing-sledge being dragged over the ripe grain, depicting the oppressive action of a holy God against a people ripe for judgment.

3:1–8 Authentication

Sensing the solemnity of proclaiming God's judgment against God's people, Amos felt he must immediately display his credentials, and give some evidence of the authenticity of such a message. Here he authenticates his prophetic message; similarly in 7:10ff. he authenticates his status as a prophet. He pleads that nothing short of divine compulsion made him preach thus. V. 1 calls upon us to 'hear this word that the Lord has spoken', and v. 8 reiterates the claim, 'the Lord God has spoken'.

1, 2 First he recapitulates the substance of his message. It is from the Lord (v. 1a). It bears a threefold address (v. 1b): to Israel, to the whole family, and finally to all whom I brought up out of the land of Egypt. Israel is defined, first comprehensively and then theologically: the whole family includes Judah, and the reference to the Exodus make the address include the whole company of the professedly redeemed people of God. None who claims to be redeemed is exempt from what Amos says. What does he say? V. 1 exalts the privilege of God's people as His redeemed; v. 2 continues the same theme. They are not only the redeemed, but uniquely so: You only have I known. (Cf. Ex. 33:12, 13, 17.) For Him, they were the unique people, His 'own possession among all peoples' (Ex. 19:5). But now comes the moment of truth: Therefore will I punish you for all your iniquities. Such punishment is something belonging to the fabric of the people of God, a therefore, something which follows in automatic sequence. This is the inner essence of Amos' prophetic message.

But it is this very thing that he must justify to a people who confused privilege with permission to sin. Vv. 3–8 make an appeal to the law of cause and effect, first in order to prove the assertion of v. 6 that no calamity befalls a city apart from divine agency; and second that no true prophet speaks apart from divine revelation (vv. 7, 8).

3 Two people are seen habitually together (the verb could express this) only if there is agreement, but let disagreement arise and the meetings cease. Yahweh and Israel are bound together by covenant, i.e. by a deliberate, conditional arrangement. If, then, Israel forsakes Yahweh's way, can they continue together? The law of cause and effect operates to separate them.

4 Two illustrations from the point of view of a predator: the lion does not roar to the attack (cf. Jdg. 14:5) unless the prey has been selected, nor does the young lion growl contentedly (cry out) if he has captured nothing. 5 Two illustrations from the point of view of the prey: a bird goes into a snare only if bait has been laid (the narrow meaning of the word trap; cf. Ex. 23:33; Dt. 7:16; 1 Sa. 18:21); nor does a snare snap shut unless the bait has been taken. 6 The application of the two sets of illustrations: the prey hear the warning of the predator's coming and are afraid; the divine Predator stands behind every terror-striking calamity. Evil is constantly used in this sense of historical disaster. Israel's history had contained many such (cf. 4:6ff.), and the thrust of Amos's argument is to ask how the people explain them. Do they accept the view of history (the only view the Bible espouses) that the Lord is the great Agent? Behind every event stands a cause; behind all history stands the Lord (cf. Is. 45:5–7). Maybe thus they will prepare themselves for His future acts of judgment.

7, 8 This they must do if they truly understand the nature and function of prophecy. This is the climax to which the series of questions has been leading. Revealing his secret means, firstly, 'opening his fellowship' (cf. Je. 23:18), and secondly, 'telling his plans'. Amos commits himself here to the view that the OT prophets were essentially predicters. The Lord forewarned them of what He proposed to do (cf. Elisha's surprise when it was not so, 2 Ki. 4:27). But if this is accepted as being the case, what of Amos's own message? In it the lion has roared, the Lord God, the sovereign Yahweh, has spoken.

3:9 – 6:14 AN ENEMY IN THE LAND: THE MORAL AND SPIRITUAL COLLAPSE OF ISRAEL AND ITS RESULTS

The theme provides the bracketing verses for the present series: 3:11, An adversary shall surround the land; 6:14, I will raise up against you a nation. In direct continuation of the concluding section of the first group of prophecies, we learn that the incoming foe is produced by a cause: it is Yahweh's 'therefore' (3:11) to Israel's oppressive and illegal ways (3:9, 10).

3:9 – 4:14 Diagnosis

3:9, 10 (keywords oppressions, violence, robbery), and 4:4, 5 (keywords sacrifices, tithes, freewill offerings) reveal that Amos first probes the social and secondly the religious state of the nation.

3:9 – 4:3 Society without justice. There are three distinct focal points in this diagnosis: first the emphasis on the crimes of the nation (vv. 9–11), social misdemeanours; second, a significant change of terminology brings in the idea of transgressions (v. 14), i.e. there is no crime against people which is not a sin against God (vv. 12–15); thirdly there is God's holiness (4:2), the explanation why all such crime and sin is serious: it has no place in His holy presence (4:1–3). On all three counts judgment will come.

3:9 The sins of Israel are so blatant that even the heathen would find them remarkable. Assyria. RSV follows LXX; Hebrew reads 'Ashdod'. Amos, however, nowhere else mentions Assyria by name. Also it is a more stinging implication that the Philistines (Ashdod) and the Egyptians, the two hated ancestral enemies, were morally superior to Israel! 10 Devotion to wrongdoing blunts moral perception so that they cease to know how to do right (cf. Is. 5:11–13), and to store ill-gotten gains is like heaping barrels of gun-powder and lighted matches together. They are storing up violence and havoc (robbery).

12 Cf. Ex. 22:10–13. When a shepherd brought back a few limbs of a sheep, he was in fact ridding himself of the charge of negligence: he had tried to save the sheep and had failed. The rescued parts were the evidence of a total loss. So for Samaria: what is left will only emphasize the completeness of the overthrow. The lion (cf. 1:2; 3:8) will have had the victory. Part (Heb. dᵉmeseq) is otherwise unknown; possibly it is a form of the name Damascus used for damask silk.

14 Significantly the 'oppressions' and 'violence' (vv. 9, 10) of society are now transgressions, i.e. wilful rebellion against God. The punishment of the altars of Bethel suggests that false religion is the root of social decadence. It also leaves its adherents defenceless in trouble. In pagan practice (though not in Israelite, cf. 1 Ki. 1:51; 2:28) the horns of the altar offered asylum, but now the victims will flee to the altar to find its horns gone! 15 The main blow will fall on the affluent society—the people with winter and summer residences, with over-ostentatious ivory inlay, or enormous mansions. Amos had no objection to wealth; throughout he attacks ill-gotten wealth, sharp practice, and oppression. False religion and false wealth not only invite divine judgment but are defenceless against it.

4:1 What is a life that is not rich toward God? The great ladies of Samaria, oppressive and intolerant towards their subordinates, dominating their husbands, intent on sensual gratification—what are they but so many prime beasts from Bashan (cf. Dt. 32:14; Ps. 22:12) sunk in a purely animal existence! 2 Why is sin sinful? Here the line of thought which equated social crimes with spiritual sins comes to a head (cf. 3:14). The oppressive and self-seeking society (v. 1) stands before a God of holiness. Crime is crime and sin is sin because God is God. His holy nature erupts in wrath against all that offends Him. Hooks . . . fishhooks. Captives were led away by cords attached to rings in their lips. The doublet, hooks and fishhooks, stresses the impossibility of escape. 3 Harmon; an unknown word, one of the unsolved problems of Amos.

4:4–13 Religion without spirituality. Behind their social disease, as its cause, lay false religion (see on 3:14). Amos follows the broad outline of his diagnosis of society. Corresponding to the exposure of the outward crimes (3:9–11), he exposes the outward state of false religion, formalism (4:4, 5); corresponding to its sins (3:12–15) he sees a religion which knows no repentance (4:6–11); finally, matching the clash between the sins of men and the holiness of God (4:1–3), he declares the coming confrontation in judgment (4:12, 13).

4 Bethel. Cf. 1 Ki. 12:29. Many places were named Gilgal (cf. Jos. 4:19; 15:7, etc.; see NBD). For this reason Amos uses the name—multiplying shrines was one of the signs of formalism. But for all their religion, the outcome is only to multiply transgression. Religion as such may only aggravate our disqualification for the presence of God. The evidence of formalism now heaps up. Normal practice required the main sacrifices once a year and tithes once in three years (1 Sa. 1:3; Dt. 14:28). Amos exaggerates in order to emphasize the beloved fallacy, that the religious act was the whole of religion, and therefore 'the more the merrier'! 5 Formalism has two henchmen: self-pleasing and self-advertisement. Contravening divine law (cf. Ex. 23:18; Lv. 2:11) they mixed leaven with their sacrifices; they also made a public performance out of private devotions like freewill offerings (Lv. 22:18), their guide being personal whim—for so you love to do.

6–11 The subject is new, the providence of God in recent history, but the aim is to expose the hollow heart of their formal show of religion. God sent His people seven warning chastisements —famine (v. 6), drought (vv. 7, 8), mildew (v. 9a), locusts (v. 9b), epidemic (v. 10a), war (v. 10b), earthquake (v. 11)—before the great threat of direct confrontation (vv. 12, 13). All these had one aim, to bring His people to repentance (vv. 6, 8, 9, 10, 11). Without repentance towards God there is no true religion. This great study of divine providence opens (v. 6) with (lit.): 'But, for my part, I . . .' The Lord contrasts Himself to their formal religiousness. While they were being religious, He was at work to bring them to repentance!

12 In the long run God will neither be fobbed off by a show of religion nor will He endlessly give warnings only. The moment of confrontation will come. No threat is made. The terror of the verse lies in its vagueness: the past, with its interim providential judgments, is as nothing to this future meeting with God Himself. 13 God is utterly inescapable because the whole universe is accessible to Him. He is sovereign over things visible, the mountains, things invisible, the wind, and things rational, man and his thought; He is in direct executive control of the world, as is evidenced when He makes the morning darkness, i.e. brings about the sequence of day and night; and no place is beyond His reach, even the heights of the earth being beneath His feet. He is the Lord, the God of hosts, i.e. possessing in Himself every conceivable power to do as He wills: Yahweh, God the Omnipotent.

5:1–27 The remedy, available but refused

For the most part this passage consists of calls to repentance joined to prophecies of judgment. Thus, v. 3 speaks of military overthrow, but v. 4, starting with the explanatory 'for' is a call to repent. How can a call to repent explain a defeat?

In the same way, the 'therefore' of v. 16, introducing a threat of judgment, appears to wish to explain the invitation to repent in vv. 14, 15. Then, for the third time, the call for religious reformation in vv. 24, 25 is followed at once by a forecast of deportation.

The explanation is that Amos is here recollecting the past opportunities to repent which they have rejected and therefore nothing but judgment awaits them. The chapter is a true counterpart to ch. 4. There the divine calls to the people to return to God were carried by inarticulate messengers, famine, drought, blight, war, and so on. But God did not leave His people in any doubt what He was saying. There had also been the living voice which cried: 'Seek me and live' (v. 4). . . . 'Seek the Lord and live' (v. 6) . . . 'Seek good, and not evil, that you may live' (v. 14). The message of circumstances had been interpreted in the common speech. Amos presents all this in the most dramatic way as a funeral oration in which the nation is called to attend its own obsequies and to hear the preacher not simply mourning the deceased but also explaining how he came to die.

5:1–3 The lament and its interpretation. The nation has already fallen in death (v. 2) and is doubly hopeless, being without internal power to rise, and without external aid to raise her up. The interpretative word follows (v. 3): what is the nature of this utterly forsaken and irretrievable collapse? It is a military defeat involving a 90 per cent loss in the armed forces. Thus the theme of the enemy in the land is brought before us again.

5:4–27 Three calls to reformation reviewed. The prostrate corpse of v. 2 is in stark contrast to the call to live in vv. 4, 6, 14. The rejection of the divine medicine of repentance has brought the patient to the grave.

The first call was to spiritual reformation (vv. 4–13), to make the Lord Himself the centre of Israel's life. We read: Seek me (v. 4). . . . Seek the Lord (v. 6). This involves an abandonment of religious (vv. 4, 5), and of moral error (vv. 6, 7). Within the call to return to Him there is the threat of exile (v. 5) and of fiery destruction (v. 6) for the unrepentant. This threat is substantiated by a description of God (vv. 8, 9) which stresses His ability to accomplish an overturning judgment. The preacher, however, has to report that the call went unheeded, the nation continued in defiance of the moral law. Their defiance was inward (v. 10, hate . . . abhor), manward (v. 11), and Godward (v. 12, transgressions . . . sins), but they carried the majority of society with them to such an extent that it was dangerous to espouse an opposite course (v. 13).

5, 6 The places mentioned were centres of the false religious cult of Israel, and we are warned of the ultimate insecurity of all false religion (v. 5b), the reality of the wrath of God against disobedience (v. 6b), and the specific inability of false religion to offer any defence in the day of the Lord's wrath, which Bethel can provide none to quench. 7 Just as in religion they had overturned the whole divine intention (cf. 4:4–13), so in morality they had also overturned God's law. Justice had become a sour joke—wormwood typically bitter and cruel (cf. 6:12; Je. 9:15; La. 3:15); righteousness, the standard of uprightness, had been flung prostrate to the earth.

8 The abruptness of vv. 8, 9 in their context is rightly and well preserved in RSV. With great oratorical skill Amos switches from the men who have wrought a bitter transformation on earth (v. 7) to the great Transformer Himself (vv. 8, 9). But he does it not so much for the sake of the comparison as to invite the conclusion that human perversion cannot win against God, and that the fire of judgment promised (v. 6) against the perverters will flash out in a destruction (v. 9) well within His competence. In three pictures, Amos depicts the transforming God at work. First, the seasonal changes: the constellation of the Pleiades in its rising and setting marked the beginning and ending of the season of navigation, and was also used by nomads for calendar purposes. Orion probably has a similar significance. HDB (see arts. 'Pleiades', 'Orion') conjectures that loosing the cords of Orion (Jb. 38:31) has reference to God's power to release the earth from the bonds of winter. Secondly, there is the regular transformation of day and night, which Amos specifies with particular reference to darkness and light, that feature which more than any other exemplifies the totality of the change which God accomplishes. The verb turns is the same as used in v. 7: do they turn one thing into another? So does He, but on how much grander a scale! Even deep darkness must yield to His will to give light. The third picture, the waters, refers to floods which overthrow all man's efforts to establish his way of life on earth. So the Lord whose transforming power is chiefly shown in the 'normal' changes of days and seasons, is not bound within His own prescribed regulations. No situation is so 'established' as to make it sacrosanct, so secure as to be inviolable. It is He who is Lord. 9 Amos turns to be his own interpreter. The rulers of his day have effected a great transformation (v. 7), and none can rebuke or halt them (v. 13)—none? There is One against whose flashing destruction neither the strong man nor the strong place (fortress) can offer the least resistance. What a vision for faith this is in a day when ungodliness is rampant and the godly man is chiefly aware of his own impotent silence (v. 13)!

Vv. 10–13 follow a strict pattern: the first accusation (v. 10) is of hatred of righteous opposition; the second (v. 11a) of lawless, oppressive practice. Next is the threatened judgment by dispossession (v. 11b). Now two further accusations follow, matching the first two: the third accusation (the partner of the second) deals with lawless and oppressive practice (v. 12), and the fourth (amplifying the first) with the silencing of righteous opposition (v. 13). 10 The just judge who reproves, and the honest witness who speaks the truth are equally detested. 11 Exactions properly means 'gifts' or 'compulsory gifts'. 'Because you take rent from the poor (farmer) and then continue to extract "gifts" from him . . .'—according to the strict letter of the law the landlord kept within the terms of the Rent Restrictions Act, but found other means of swelling his takings! But the fruits of unjust property-management are not long enjoyed. Cf. Is. 5:8–10; Je. 17:11. 12 Social wrong is again referred to the court of heaven as transgressions and sins (cf. 3:9–15). A merely moral reformation will not do; there must be a return to God. The specific sins are the use of wealth to evade justice, and the unequal administration of justice to the rich and the poor. 13 The reign of terror puts an end to freedom of speech, and people are governed by a prudent expediency rather than by truth. The uninfluential man, who knows that were he to take his case to court (v. 12b) he would get no satisfaction, is obliged to keep silent in the face of the unredressed wrongs of others.

The second call was to moral reformation (vv. 14–20). The call to repentance (vv. 14, 15) has as its consequence ('therefore', vv. 16–20) the forecast of judgment. We see therefore that the call went unheeded. The judgment predicted here takes the matter a stage further. V. 11 predicted the negative threat of dispossession which now gives way to the positive threat of 'the day of the Lord' (v. 20). Amos did not invent the idea of the day of the Lord (cf. 2:16; 9:11). The present reference indicates that it was an element in popular expectation, and part of a current religious optimism. The people felt sure of the presence of God with them (v. 14) and of His grace towards them (v. 15), and consequently they looked forward to the day with confident expectation and desire (v. 18).

Amos replies along four lines. Firstly, he uses the language of hope to preach a message of catastrophe. In v. 17 'pass through' is the terminology of the Passover (cf. Ex. 12:12), the language of redemption, but on Amos's lips it is the language of judgment. He thus reminds the people of a forgotten dimension in the character of their God. When He passed through Egypt it was to judge and smite, and what He revealed of Himself at the Exodus is eternally true (Ex. 3:15). Secondly, Amos insists on the moral conditions of spiritual blessing (vv. 14, 15). God's presence is a reality for those whose objectives ('seek'), and hearts ('hate', 'love') match His own, and who apply these principles to their corporate lives by establishing 'justice in the gate'. Thirdly, Amos opposes any sort of cock-sureness before God. He says, 'It may be' (v. 15). When we have done all, our proper course is to confess our unprofitability (cf. Lk. 17:10), not to sound our trumpets. The God who is described (v. 16) as 'Yahweh, God the Omnipotent, the Sovereign' is not to be presumed upon! Finally, Amos insists that for Israel as then constituted the day of the Lord would inevitably be one of inescapable judgment and unalleviated sorrow (vv. 16–20).

15 Joseph is used as a title for the tribes making up Israel because their most prominent members were his sons (cf. Gn. 48). 19 An illustration of inescapable judgment. Read 'and' not or: fleeing one way, his escape is cut off, but he thinks that safety has been secured in a providentially accessible house. However, as he leans on the wall to catch his breath the snake pounces!

The third call noted is to religious reformation (vv. 21–27). The abruptness of the introduction of the new subject shows how Amos has brought together material which did not originate at the same time, but he has imposed an impressive editorial unity on it. Vv. 4–13, recalling the nation to Yahweh showed that the symptoms of its spiritual malady were seen in its religious (vv. 4, 5) and moral (v. 7) state. Vv. 14–20 took up the matter of national morality, and now vv. 21–27 expose the sickness of the nation's religion and what is required to put it right. The threatened judgment reaches its climax also: dispossession (v. 11), and the vague threat of the day of the Lord (vv. 18, 20) now become the explicit forecast of exile (v. 27).

The section opens with the divine rejection of Israel's current religious practice (vv. 21, 22). Vv. 23, 24 seem to present an either/or, an exhortation to abandon the outward ritual of religion altogether as unacceptable to God, and to give themselves entirely to ethical obedience—a religion without services but full of service. The balance is redressed, however, by v. 25 (see Introduction): the wilderness religion was not only sacrifice and offering but also obedience and moral holiness. This is the demand which, throughout the present chapter, we have watched the doomed nation persistently refuse; now for the last time their refusal is implied, for immediately following on the plea comes the announcement of doom (vv. 26, 27). Still intent on the outward trappings of religion (v. 26), they are bound for exile (v. 27). 24 Justice and righteousness, thus associated together are respectively moral practice and moral principle.

25 Does Amos envisage a purely ethical state of affairs, without Temple, altar, priesthood, sacrifice, or congregation? The emphasis in the Hebrew suggests, 'Was it sacrifices and offerings (only) that you brought me . . . ?' The religion which had its origin in the Mosaic revelation at Sinai was one of moral response to a God who had saved His people by means of the Passover sacrifice. The offerings of the Mosaic system prolonged for Israel the benefits of that Passover sacrifice, and the moral response of nation and individual was crystallized in the Ten Commandments. It is this well-known truth which is subtly recalled by Amos's question. See further in Introduction, Amos's teaching on religion.

26 Reference is to a religious procession in which the emblems of the gods are carried.

Amos neatly touches off Israel's zest for religious parade, but underlines the sinister menace of all false religion: its end is destruction; the procession leads 'beyond Damascus' (v. 27) and into exile. There is a good deal of difficulty in the Hebrew text of v. 26; RSV makes excellent sense on the basis of minimal change. Sakkuth was the Assyrian god of war, sometimes called Adram-melech (cf. 2 Ki. 17:31). This god was identified with the planet Saturn, otherwise called Kaiwan. Amos does not leave the subject without exposing the false heart of false religion: it is blasphemous, because it replaces the true King and God with substitutes; it is man-based because these are gods which you made for yourselves (cf. Is. 2:8). 27 Processions ought always to return to base; Assyrian religion ends up in Assyria, which, according to his custom (see on 3:9), Amos does not mention but hides behind the vague beyond Damascus. The agency in history, however, never passes from the Lord, and it is He, God the Omnipotent, who brings upon His people the consequences of their own folly and obudracy.

6:1–14 Conclusion: the outcome of self-exaltation

Amos's diagnosis of the nation (3:9 – 4:13) stressed the social defect of the rich lording it over the poor, and the religious defect of total absence of turning to God. These two are now brought together under one common denominator: the lordly pride which can find no fault with itself.

6:1–7 Israel's estimate of itself. The link word in these verses is 'first'. They belonged to 'the first of the nations' (v. 1), they only used 'the finest (lit. first) oils' for anointing (v. 6), and just as they were 'first' in everything else, they would be 'the first of those to go into exile' (v. 7). Amos shows us pride in its complacency (vv. 1–3), luxuriousness (vv. 4–6a), moral indifference (v. 6b), and fall (v. 7).

1 The address to Zion is unexpected, and is expunged by those who think it impossible that a prophet to the north should address the southern capital. Others, more discerningly, note that some place-name is required here in parallel to Samaria, and recall that Isaiah (28:1–4) and Micah (1:5; 6:16), both southern prophets, addressed and rebuked the north also. It would clearly strengthen Amos's case if he showed that pride has the same result everywhere, that even Zion cannot escape, and that there is no partiality with God. The root of the false security which he exposes is pride—pride of person, pride of association, and pride of position. They rejoice in being notable, in belonging to the first of the nations, and in being those to whom the rest come deferentially for the settlement of cases. 2 The intention of this verse may be to invite a comparison so as to show how great in fact is Israel's prosperity, and therefore, by implication, what a condemnation will be theirs if they fail in gratitude to their God for such richness. But if Israel is so convinced of its superiority, what is the point of inviting a journey to prove what is not in dispute? Another interpretation takes Gath and the others as examples of fallen prosperity which would warn Israel not to trust in uncertain riches. It is, however, doubtful if these cities had in fact fallen in Amos's time, and those who press explanation wish to make the verses a later interpolation, though why an interpolator should defy recent chronology, and to whom he would address his words, they do not stop to explain. Amos is, however, ironically repeating the propaganda 'hand-out' of the rulers who keep up the morale of their people by drawing advantageous comparisons with reasonably distant and clearly inferior places. This interpretation leads well into v. 3, for by such deceptive and specious reasoning the rulers could hide the real dangers of the nation, and throw a sop to those who ventured to express hesitation over the injustices of Samaritan life. 3 By their own lawlessness they were hastening the enthronement (seat) of violence, the day when 'lawlessness will reign', 'the reign of terror'. So it must have been in the final years of the kingdom of Israel when, after Jeroboam, only one king passed the throne on to his son, and the rest ended their reigns by assassination.

5 Possibly the rulers tried to excuse their indolent and frivolous way of life by a specious comparison with David—after all was not he too a musician? Thus lesser men justify their faults by comparison with the foibles of greater men! 6 Bowls (cf. Ex. 38:3; Nu. 7:13), very large vessels indeed. As one might say, 'they drink wine by the bucket'. Are not grieved, literally 'have not made themselves sick': a side-long glance at the excesses of the feasts (cf. Is. 28:7, 8), but a straight denunciation of their failure in social and moral concern.

6:8–14 The Lord's estimate of Israel. Once again the fact of pride (v. 8), its moral indifference (v. 12) and its self-centredness (v. 13) are brought before us, but now we see the divine reaction to them. Vv. 1–7 tell us in so many words that pride goes before a fall; vv. 8–14 tell us why this is. The divine reactions are hatred (v. 8), alienation (vv. 9, 10), and enmity (vv. 11–14).

8 The dimensions of the divine reaction of hatred are immense: the whole divine nature is involved as He swears by himself, signifying 'by all that He is in Himself', 'with His whole heart and soul'; all the divine attributes are involved in this oath by 'the Sovereign Yahweh . . . Yahweh, God the Omnipotent'. The verb abhor which so suits the verse depends on a small emendation of the Hebrew, which here reads 'desire', hardly a suitable sense. 9, 10 The city is siege-bound and famine and plague are taking their toll. Finding someone hiding in the inner rooms, and asking if there is by chance anyone left, before the negative reply can bring some reaction of exasperation or of piteousness involving God's name, the mouth of the speaker is stopped, for the sense of alienation from God is too great. The day is long past when His name may be used either lightly or seriously. God has departed from His people. 11 How has such desolation come about? By command of the Lord. We are shown in turn what the Lord commands (v. 11), why He commands it (vv. 12, 13) and how He executes His command (v. 14). Great . . . little, a Hebrew idiom which, by specifying two opposite types, embraces everything belonging to that class. So here, 'every house of whatsoever sort'. The Lord has commanded a total destruction.

12 The first illustration, horses running up a cliff face (rocks), is of something contrary to the nature of things; the second of something useless and not worth the effort, for the sea is first of all barren for cultivation, and secondly the water would close behind the ploughshare as if nothing had happened: doubly useless and a waste of time. But these sum up the life of the nation. They have acted contrary to the whole moral nature of things in making justice the poison instead of the preservative of society, and making moral principle a sour cynicism (cf. 5:7).

13 Furthermore, they have wasted time on useless pursuits, and show their lack of discernment by glorying in them. Lo-debar and Karnaim were places in Transjordan (cf. Gn. 14:5; 2 Sa. 9:4), and may well have been, as this verse suggests, scenes of victories by Jeroboam II when he restored the boundaries of Israel (cf. 2 Ki. 14:25). As a word, however, Lo-debar means 'a nothing', and Karnaim means 'horns' the symbol of strength. The verse could well have an intentional double meaning, embracing both RSV and RV: 'Your greatest achievements are great nothings!' They perverted moral values and exalted military ones, abandoned strength of character and boasted of strength of arms. 14 But they glory in what is passing. Before the coming enemy every single thing, from the entrance of Hamath to the Brook of the Arabah, the whole proud achievement of Jeroboam, will vanish. For their boasting invites divine opposition. Yahweh, God the Omnipotent, is the enemy of hollow boasters and has a ready instrument of His wrath, the enemy in the land.

7:1 – 9:15 THE LORD YAHWEH: THE SOVEREIGNTY OF YAHWEH IN JUDGMENT AND MERCY

This third group of prophecies opens and closes on the same note. It begins with the intimation that the Lord does not contemplate any such judgment as excludes all hope of survival (7:1–6), and ends with a plain prediction of the same thing, a discriminating judgment (9:9, 10) which paves the way for a future glorious with Messianic hope (9:11–15). The whole passage, therefore, opens a gracious vista of the divine sovereignty where judgment and mercy are both dispensed but the purposes of God are preserved and secured. The title 'Sovereign Yahweh' is used 9 times in chs. 1–6, but 11 times in chs. 7–9. On this as a great keynote Amos concludes.

7:1–17 Controlled judgment verified

Two visions indicate forms of divine judgment rejected in answer to prayer (vv. 1–6); a third tells of the chosen form of divine judgment (vv. 7–9); and Amos adds the narrative of his call to be a prophet (vv. 10–17).

7:1–6 The faithfulness of God to His condemned people. Intercession was an established function of the prophets (cf. Gn. 20:7; Je. 7:16; 11:14; 14:11). Here Amos, who never recorded any prayer against the fact that his people were to be judged by God, prays against two proposed forms of judgment which they could never hope to survive. First there is the locust plague of such intensity that national survival would be out of the question (vv. 1–3), and secondly the devouring fire which would eat up even the very land itself (vv. 4–6). Amos prayed and his prayer was heard. The significance of this cannot be overemphasized. Amos pleaded against judgment of utter destruction and the Lord granted his request. The conclusion is irresistible: neither Amos nor the Lord desired, intended or contemplated the final end of the people. We thus embark on the final group of Amos's prophecies with at least part of the answer to the question arising out of the preceding group. Will there be utter destruction, a final end? Certainly not, for Amos twice (cf. Gn. 41:32) prayed against it and the Lord heard him. It is notable how the Lord God, the Sovereign Yahweh, is the divine style used 6 times in as many verses. This great sovereign God turns away from the thought of the extinction of His people. We do not yet know what their future will be, but even now there is at least hope.

1 The king's mowings, of which there is no other mention, was presumably a royal levy upon the farmer. We gather that after this levy there was a 'late sowing' (latter growth) upon which the farmer would be specially dependant for survival. This was now threatened by locusts. 3 The gracious purpose of the sovereign God not to destroy utterly His sinful people is very evident in this verse. But how can God be said to have repented? A key passage on this question is 1 Sa. 15:29–35. The first verse expresses the 'absolute' truth about God—His inflexible will; but the last verse shows that this unalterable will has taken into account the fluctuations and variableness of human experience and response. Consequently it necessarily appears to us that God changes course, and the Bible speaks of Him as 'repenting', meaning that the will of God, though inflexible, is not unfeeling, but takes loving regard of all our weakness and foolishness in His perfect, sovereign ordering of the world. 6 Neither Amos nor his God can bear to contemplate the full end of the chosen people. Utter destruction is dismissed from God's planning.

7:7–9 The moral discrimination which the people of God cannot escape. A third vision follows against which Amos makes no prayer, and Yahweh, on His part, confirms the meaning of the symbol in an interpretative oracle.

7 The Lord appears in the role of the master-builder coming to inspect the work done by His labour-force. His action is deliberate; He (lit.) 'was placing Himself'. Like a wise master-builder, He had given all that was necessary for the building of a true, perpendicular wall. It had been built with a plumb line, and He came to test it, not by some other standard, but by the same standard which the builders had been supposed to use. Was it as perpendicular as it ought to be, and even as it may have appeared to be to the naked eye? 8 The plumb line is the straight edge of God's law. By it God's people were to erect upright lives and an upright society; by it He will come and judge them. There can be no plea against this form of assessment, for to possess the law of God—the knowledge of His will—and to be under obligation to obey it is part of the essential nature of the people of God. Sinai was not an incidental event: it was the object in mind from before the Exodus (cf. Ex. 3:12). The phrase pass by, used again at 8:2, appears in Mi. 7:18 in the meaning 'to forgive'. It is reminiscent of the Passover (Ex. 12:23). At the Passover, the 'passing' signified that all was well between Yahweh and the people sheltering beneath the blood of the lamb (Ex. 12:13, 23). But Yahweh can no longer view Israel with pleasure. When He comes to judge, however, it will be as discriminating as on passover night (cf. Ex. 11:7; 12:27).

9 Consequently the Lord now singles out certain specific objects of His displeasure, in contrast to the carte blanche judgments of vv. 1–6. The high places were the man-made centres of false religion, devoted to the worship of Baal, or else used for a perverted worship of Yahweh as though He were a Baal. Only here is Isaac used as a synonym for Israel. Isaac was associated with Beer-sheba (Gn. 26:33; 28:10), a well-known centre of religion in the time of Amos (5:5; 8:14). Conceivably people sought to establish the legality of such a shrine and its services by urging that after all it was associated with the venerable name of a patriarch. Jeroboam; see 2 Ki. 14:23–29.

7:10–17 The verification of the Word of the Lord. For the second time Amos displays his credentials (cf. 3:1–8), and for the same reason: in order to verify the terms of his message of judgment upon the chosen people, and to vouch for his own right to proclaim such a message.

10 Amaziah, the priest of Bethel, was understandably stung by the prophet's strictures on contemporary religion, in which, indeed, Bethel had featured, and not to its advantage (cf. 4:4; 5:5), and by his prediction against the royal house itself (7:9). 12 O seer is not a sarcasm—the word is perfectly honourable (cf. Is. 29:10)—but the advice to go . . . to . . . Judah, and eat bread there certainly suggests that Amos is in the job for the money and that he will welcome news that oracles against Israel's royal house attract more custom in the south.

14 For a discussion of Amos's dignified and courteous reply, see Introduction, p. 727. RSV in using the present tense, am, makes Amos deny in v. 14 what he wishes to affirm in v. 15, namely that by the act of God he has become what once he was not, a genuine prophet. 'I was . . . was' (cf. RV) is the simplest and best understanding of it. Amos outlines the nature of the office of a prophet in three implied negatives, followed by three positives. First, it is not based on human capacity, I . . . no prophet. Second, it was not a matter of human choice and enrolment, nor a prophet's son. The 'schools' of the 'sons of the prophets' gathered round a great prophet to hear his instruction and to share his work (cf. 2 Ki. 2:3, 5; 6:1–7; 9:1–3). But Amos was not such a one. He had followed the secular vocation of a herdsman and fruit-farmer, tending sycamore trees which produced a type of fig. Consequently, the prophetic office was not, thirdly, based on any human pre-conditioning or preparation. 15 It rested in fact, fourthly, on divine choice: the Lord took me. Fifthly, the primary privilege of the prophet was to enjoy fellowship with God: the Lord said to me, and then, sixthly, to minister in the appointed place, which, for Amos, was my people Israel. These last three features appear in all the prophets who have left us testimonies of their call: the divine initiative (Is. 6:1; Je. 1:5; Ezk. 1); the divine fellowship (Is. 6:6–8; Je. 1:6–16; Ezk. 2:1, 2); the divine appointment (Is. 6:9; Je. 1:5b, 10, 17–19; Ezk. 2:3ff.).

17 The personal and national aspects of the exile. Within the family of Amaziah there will be degradation (harlot), bereavement (fall by the sword), and defilement (unclean land). Truly it is not enough to be religious! Amaziah was the prime example of that religion without repentance which Amos saw throughout the whole people. But in the day of the accounting it can only show an utter loss.

8:1–14 Imminent judgment justified

First (vv. 1–3) there is the vision with its explanation, stressing that the end has come upon the people, the judgment is imminent; secondly (vv. 4–14) the theme of crime and punishment justifies the foretold imminent divine action.

8:1–3 Vision and explanation. The harvest metaphor is well suited to this passage. The crop comes to harvest as the climax of its own inner development. So God's judgment coincides exactly with the moral fitness of the people to be judged in this way. The metaphor also suits the wider context of chs. 7–9, for the harvest is a time of discrimination (9:9, 10; cf. Mt. 13:24–30; Rev. 14:14–16).

8:4–14 Crime and punishment. The crime (vv. 4–6) is characteristically summed up as oppression of those who have no means of redress (v. 4).

Amos cannot be accused of mere opposition to wealth and the wealthy. Antagonism is reserved for unjust, rapacious and unscrupulous gain. He indicts a community in which everything was subordinated to money-making and covetousness (vv. 5, 6). Religion is resented when it hinders commerce (v. 5a); honesty is sacrificed to the profit-motive (v. 5b); other people become pawns in the commercial racket (v. 6a); and standards are disregarded as long as trade flourishes (v. 6b). Self-advantage and greed for gain mark the society ripe for judgment.

5 The ephah, a dry measure of 8 gallons, was used to measure out the corn for the purchaser, and the shekel was used to weigh the money he paid for it. They sold less than they promised for more than they stated. In smaller transactions they adjusted the scales to their own advantage. 6 The silver here is probably a loan made to a poor man; the pair of sandals a purchase which he has been allowed to make on credit. But in the mind of the creditor each aims at taking the poor man himself into slavery when he defaults in payment (cf. 2 Ki. 4:1).

The punishment is elaborated in vv. 7–14. Just as vv. 4–6 were full of the 'we' of human sharp practice, so these verses are full of the 'I' of divine reaction and judgment. The nation-wide scale of the coming judgment is figured by an earthquake (vv. 7, 8). Another natural illustration opens up the first facet of the day of the Lord, the reversal of worldly enjoyments (vv. 9,10). The end of the feasting forecasts the next aspect, the exposure of true needs in terms of unsatisfied hunger and thirst for God's Word (vv. 11, 12). The third facet of the day of the Lord is linked to the second by the idea of thirst: false religion will be seen in its inability to satisfy human need (vv. 13, 14).

7 The pride of Jacob must be understood sarcastically. Every oath requires some unalterable object by which to swear. Nothing seems more mountainously stable than the nation's pride in itself! 8 The earthquake, conveying the idea of an upset affecting the entire land, is compared to the annual rise and fall of the Nile. The reference to the Nile may also have been intended to remind Israel of God's acts of judgment against the whole of Egypt in the plagues. This same God must now set Himself on the same scale against the people He once laboured to redeem (cf. Is. 28:21). Furthermore a truth much emphasized in the Old Testament is that the relationship between God and His people, for good or ill, is reflected in the natural order. The very land mourns for the sin of its inhabitants (cf. Ho. 4:3), is defiled by their iniquities (Je. 3:9), and 'vomits them out' in disgust (Lv. 18:28; 20:22). 9 The natural imagery continues. The irregular and supernatural darkness typifies the deliberate extinguishing of all the light of rejoicing. Factually, this darkness has been associated with the eclipse of the sun which coincided with an earthquake recorded in June 763 BC. 10 Once Egypt knew such a mourning as this (cf. Ex. 12:30). Now it is Israel. How easily the redeemed forget the holy nature of their God and sit loose to His requirements! There is such a thing as the 'vengeance' of the covenant (Lv. 26:25).

11 The day of trouble reveals how strong are the inner springs and resources, and a life solely nourished on the sweetmeats of this world is soon stripped to the bone when they are gone. Then comes the hunger for an authoritative spiritual 'word'. 12 Round the compass they go: from the Dead sea in the south to the Mediterranean sea in the west, and so to the north and east, completing the circuit. No journey too great, no distance too far if only spiritual satisfaction comes at the end. Yet mere desire was not enough, for they shall not find it, not, in this case, by divine unreadiness to give them the word, but because they search in the wrong way and the wrong places. The word was near them (cf. Dt. 30:11–14), the word through Moses and the prophets, the word of Amos and Hosea. Sometimes the pride of a lifetime remains (see v. 7) and makes even the person who knows his hunger unwilling to face the repentance and self-humbling needed for coming to what he had so long and haughtily rejected.

13 What is the source of this thirst? Vv. 13 and 14 should be seen together: Fair virgins and the young men shall faint for thirst (namely) those who swear. . . . The day of the Lord will bring experience of the insufficiency of false religion. The hope of the future seems to be held in mortgage for the sins of the past as the youth of the nation perishes in the snares of false cults. 14 The worship of Ashimah is found later in Samaria (cf. 2 Ki. 17:30), cultivated by the men of Hamath. Since Hamath had been captured in Jeroboam's reign (2 Ki. 14:28) there is no problem of dating involved in finding the cult already established in Amos's day. The Hebrew text makes play upon the fact that Ashimah is very near to the word meaning 'guilt', and we may well hold to the double meaning: in swearing by Ashimah they are not aiding their souls but incurring further guilt (cf. 4:4). As the way of Beer-sheba lives is not understood. Some quote the Arab custom of swearing by the sacred road to Mecca. Did the pilgrims' way to Beer-sheba itself become an object of veneration?

9:1–6 Inescapable judgment divinely enforced

The fifth of Amos's visions reveals the Lord Himself superintending the destruction of the shrine. Total destruction is commanded, involving all the fabric and all the people (v. 1a); no way of escape is left, neither Sheol, nor heaven offer escape; the top of Carmel, the depths of the sea, and the ends of the earth are equally useless. Thus they have no spiritual refuge (Sheol, heaven), no earthly security (Carmel, sea), and no future expectation as they go into exile. This appalling vision of overthrow is finally substantiated by viewing the universal power of a God great enough to put His threats into effect (vv. 5, 6).

2 Sheol; the place-name for the abode of the dead. 3 The serpent was a mythological monster of contemporary paganism, living in the deep, whose storms showed it to be in opposition to the creator-god. Amos uses this, first, imaginatively. For the sake of argument, just as he allows the possibility of climbing to heaven (v. 2), he allows the possibility of such a monster as this to cut off their escape in the dark deep. But, more important, he uses the reference theologically. What in pagan religion was the implacable and often not unsuccessful foe of the creator, is utterly at the bidding of Yahweh, subservient to His purposes. Thus Amos compels mythology to serve the truth and to display the omnipresence and omnipotence of the only God.

5, 6 See Introduction, p. 728 for a discussion of these verses along with their companions, 4:13 and 5:8, 9. God is displayed in terms which show Him as equal to the task of implementing the judgment He has threatened. We see His universal and sovereign power first (v. 5) horizontally: the whole earth is subject to His touch; it offers no resistance, but melts before Him; all its inhabitants are affected; it loses stability and rises and falls like a river. No wonder then that neither in Carmel nor in captivity is there a hiding-place from such a God. Second, the power of God is displayed vertically (v. 6): the heavens, for all their lofty inaccessibility, are no more than His 'stairs' (preferable to upper chambers), His ways of movement and access; from another view the heavens are His vault encircling the earth and binding it—the word elsewhere means a 'bond' (cf., e.g., Is. 58:6). Cf. Is. 40:22. The waters of the sea are also at His command. No wonder then that neither heaven nor sea offers an avenue of escape. In the Hebrew, these verses are not as abrupt as the RSV suggests. In v. 1 Amos opened up a vision of 'the Sovereign' ('ᵃdōnāy); in v. 5 he rounds it off: 'And the Sovereign ('ᵃdōnāy) is Yahweh the Omnipotent. . . . ' There is a compelling unity in this portrayal of judgment.

9:7–15 Controlled judgment and ultimate blessing

Amos now allows the third group of prophecies, opening at 7:1, to come full circle. He began by describing two visions of utter destruction (7:1–6), against which he prayed and the Lord relented. But the substance of the intervening verses has seemingly implied that the state of the nation called for complete overthrow. Thus there has been created a tension between 'it shall not be' in 7:3, 6 and the mounting tide of destruction in 8:1 – 9:6. We need the present section to resolve the tension and to offer final explanations. For the view that the genuine words of Amos end with 9:8a and a reply to it, see Introduction.

The two sections which make up this final division of the prophecy are carefully balanced and contrasted: v. 7, Israel's equality and identity with the nations, is balanced by vv. 11, 12, Israel's ultimate possession of the nations; v. 8, the dimensions of divine judgment, is balanced by v. 13, the dimensions of the Messianic blessing; vv. 9, 10, the act of God in sifting Israel, are balanced by vv. 14, 15, the act of God in planting Israel (see Introduction).

9:7–10 The insufficiency of privilege. Amos begins to examine this topic by stressing God's moral concern (vv. 7–8a). All nations are equally under the executive control of God. He has organized every migration of peoples: not just Israel, but the Syrians (their recent opponents), the Philistines (their ancestral foes), and even as far as Ethiopia—i.e. to the world's end. But we make Amos contradict himself if we conclude that all nations are exactly equal in the sight of God. In chs. 1 and 2 Israel and the nations were equally under judgment, but Israel was under judgment within the closed circle of revelation (2:11) and election (3:2). Amos is not now suggesting that Israel's 'speciality' has been abandoned. What he is teaching is this: Israel is associating privilege—the privilege of being God's people—with the historical past. They are the whole family which He brought up out of Egypt (3:2). But there is nothing special about this unless they are manifesting a proper response to God's historical dealings in terms of daily holiness. It is not past experiences which the Lord gazes upon but present sinfulness (v. 8a), and if He sees sin instead of holiness in Israel then their claim to a privilege will only bring them greater condemnation because they alone of all people ought to have known and been better.

Nevertheless (vv. 8b–10), the Lord will not proceed blindly against His people. In ch. 7 the abandonment of the notion of total destruction (vv. 1–6) was followed by a vision of discriminating judgment (vv. 7–9). Amos does not now say that all sinners must perish, or that only the sinless will be preserved. Spiritual complacency is the main issue: doom awaits sinners who go blithely on, presuming on God's acquiescence in their sinfulness, as they say 'Evil shall not overtake or meet us' (v. 10). The people of God are all of them sinners, but the mark of the true as distinct from the merely professing is that they mourn over their sins (cf. Ezk. 9:4–6; contrast Ps. 50:16–21).

8 Except that. Cf. Je. 4:27; 5:10, 18; 30:11. 9 Pebble. Only elsewhere in 2 Sa. 17:13. Most assume that grain is being sieved. Some urge that 'pebble' means firm, good grain—an entirely unexemplified meaning—and that v. 9 stresses the preservation of the good, balancing the destruction of the bad in v. 10. Apart from the lack of evidence for the required meaning, this would contradict the normal use of a sieve, which in fact collects the refuse and allows the good through. Other commentators suggest that pebbles were included with grain to assist the winnowing. In this case the pebbles would certainly be part of the reject material, and vv.

9, 10 would concentrate on the removal of waste material from the nation. But the word 'pebble', rather suggests the sieving of soil or gravel. The sieve as a metaphor points to the gathering out of impurities. This coincides well with the emphasis of the passage where (v. 8) the Lord's eyes are 'upon the sinful', and (v. 10) 'all the sinners of my people shall die'. We have therefore a distinct insistence on the discriminatory nature of divine judgment: not a final end but a guarded purging.

10 Who say. The Hebrew suggests 'who characteristically say'. The one person whom the Lord cannot tolerate is the person who avers that sin is an allowable way of life.

9:11–15 The certainty of hope. The other side of the discriminatory judgments of God is now opened. The first feature is the restoration of the Davidic rule (vv. 11, 12).

11 Fallen. This may point to the schism of the ten northern tribes which quite undid the whole accomplishment of David (1 Ki. 12). On the other hand, Amos was under no illusions about the future of Judah (cf. 2:4, 5; see also on 3:2), and he may be 'ideally' looking back to the fall of Jerusalem to the Babylonians, as if it had already taken place, and seeing the ultimate restoration of the kingdom from that crushing blow. Again, the verb could be translated, 'which is about to fall', in which case he is looking forward to the fall of Jerusalem and then beyond it to the Messianic restoration.

12 Edom. The full conquest of Edom was accomplished only by David (2 Sa. 8:14). It rebelled against Solomon (1 Ki. 11:14); under Jehoshaphat some sort of Edomite monarchy was recognized (1 Ki. 22:47; 2 Ki. 3:8ff.); under Joram Edomite sovereignty was fully re-established (2 Ki. 8:20). The bitter hostility of Edom, from the very first (Nu. 20:14) probably contributed to the use of Edom typically and eschatologically as the figure par excellence of enmity to the people of God (cf. Is. 63:1ff.; Ezk. 35) to be overthrown finally by David's greater successor, the Messiah Himself. Thus, here, the possession of Edom is one of the signs of the presence of the Messianic Kingdom. And all the nations. In the great Davidic expansion many heathen nations had been claimed in the name of Yahweh (cf. 2 Sa. 12:18). The world-wide rule of the Davidic Messiah is a regular prophetic feature (e.g., Is. 9:6, 7; 11:1–16) and figures prominently in the royal Psalms (e.g. 2:7–9; 72:8–11; 110:5–7). The warlike metaphor in many of these passages is, of course, to be understood in terms of the kingship of the Lord Jesus Christ and the missionary expansion of the church. This is the interpretation authorized by the NT in Acts 15:12–19.

13–15 Amos brings his prophecy to a conclusion on the note of the enjoyment of secure prosperity (vv. 13–15). The prosperity (v. 13) will be so abundant that the ploughman going out to prepare the ground for the next year's sowing will find the harvester still at work gathering last year's crop, and likewise the vintage will over-run its allotted time until it trespasses into the season of planting. And this will not be all, for the very soil itself will seem to run with productivity, a prosperity enjoyed (v. 14) by the people of the land in unbroken tenure for ever (v. 15).

The truth expressed through this imagery tells of the total reversal of the effects of sin. It was through sin that people were insecure in their tenure of the land and lived under threat of eviction and exile (5:26, 27); it was through sin that people were disappointed in their expectation of enjoyment of the fruits of the earth (5:11); it was sin which perverted nature itself away from its proper penalty and its full benevolence toward man. Adam was king in Eden (cf. Gn. 1:28; 2:15ff.), heir and monarch of the abundance implied in the permission to eat freely of every tree in the garden save one. But with the entrance of sin the liberality dried up to become a trickle, and that hard won (Gn. 3:17–19) and grudgingly given. When, however, its rightful King returns to Eden (cf. Is. 11:6–9) all the energies, pent up for the centuries during which sin abounded and death reigned, will explode in one triumphant burgeoning as nature hastens to lay its tribute at the feet of Him whose right it is to reign.

The great seal, guaranteeing the vision as certain to be fulfilled was affixed in the very last words Amos transmitted to us: Says the Lord your God. It is the word of Yahweh, the Exodus-God, the God whose eternal nature (Ex. 3:15) is to judge His enemies and redeem His people; it is the word of your God, ours not by our choice but by His sovereign choice (cf. Dt. 7:7, 8; Ezk. 20:5–7; Jn. 15:16; Eph. 1:4, 11); it is a word utterly reliable, for without more than a hint of paraphrase it takes all the Messianic promises and blessings and affirms them saying, 'On these the Lord your God has made up His mind.'

Obadiah

INTRODUCTION

AUTHOR AND DATE

The title of this little prophecy—the shortest book in the OT—is 'The vision of Obadiah' (v. 1). Who this Obadiah was we have no means of knowing. The name means 'servant of Yahweh' and occurs a number of times in the OT, but there is nothing to connect this prophet with any of the others so called. For the use of the word 'vision' to describe the contents of a prophecy, and as throwing light on the way in which the prophet received his message, cf. the opening verses of Isaiah, Ezekiel, Amos, Micah, Nahum and Habakkuk; see also Nu. 12:6.

The prophecy is 'concerning Edom'. Edom is denounced for her pride, especially for her lack of brotherly kindness towards Judah, and her judgment in the day of Yahweh is predicted along with that of all the nations.

As for the date of the prophecy, we may refer it to some time after the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadrezzar, king of Babylon, in 587 BC. This event seems to be clearly alluded to in vv. 11–14. There are scholars, however, who place the prophecy before the fall of Jerusalem, and refer to 2 Ch. 21:16, 17 or 2 Ch. 28:17 as providing the possible historical context for the attack on Jerusalem to which the book alludes.

There are marked similarities both in ideas and phraseology between the first part of Obadiah (vv. 1–8) and Je. 49:7–22, a passage which belongs to the years before the fall of Jerusalem. Literary critics do not agree on the exact relationship between the two passages. Some argue for the direct dependence of one on the other. But while Je. 49 is almost certainly earlier than Obadiah, and while the passage in Obadiah shows some signs of having been derived from another source, yet in certain respects the Obadiah passage appears the more original of the two. For this reason many critics hold the hypothesis that both Jeremiah and Obadiah are making use of an earlier prophecy. This is not inherently unlikely, as the character and doom of Edom was a constantly recurring theme among Hebrew prophets.

EDOM AND JUDAH

The ancestor who gave his name to the Edomites was Esau (see Gn. 36:1, 8, 9). His relations with his twin brother Jacob, father of Judah, are described in Gn. 25–36. Even while the children struggled together within the womb of their mother it was told her by the Lord that 'two nations are in your womb, and . . . the elder shall serve the younger' (Gn. 25:22f.). Subsequently Esau is portrayed as one 'who sold his birthright for a single meal' and who thus became the type of 'irreligious' man (Heb. 12:16), insensitive to spiritual values. He was born within the covenant, but he failed to appreciate the privilege which was his by right, and he failed also to enjoy the accompanying blessing. God's estimate of Jacob and Esau respectively is most succinctly expressed in the declaration 'I have loved Jacob but I have hated Esau' (Mal. 1:2f.; cf. Rom. 9:13).

The Herods of the NT were Edomites, and were true to type. Notice how they showed themselves insensitive to spiritual truth, especially as it was embodied in Jesus Christ, the perfect representative of Jacob and Judah. (See especially Mt. 2; Lk. 13:31f.; 23:8ff.; Acts 12:21ff.)

Gn. 36:8 tells us that 'Esau dwelt in the hill country of Seir'. Seir, the chief mountain range of Edom, is often used as a synonym for the whole land, which became the land of Esau's descendants. Edom is the area directly south of the Dead Sea, especially the mountainous country east of the Arabah (i.e. the depression connecting the Dead Sea with the Gulf of Aqabah). The southern part of Edom is the region of Teman, also sometimes used in the OT as a synonym for the whole land (e.g. Hab. 3:3), and Edom's two principal cities are Bozrah and Sela. The latter (which means 'crag' or 'rock') is now identified with Umm el-Biyara, the rocky eminence dominating the enclosed valley in which the famous city of Petra (also meaning 'rock') was built by the Nabateans in later times (4th century BC).

From Ezion-geber on the Gulf of Aqabah, 'the king's highway' ran through Edom northwards. It was along this highway that Moses wanted to lead the children of Israel. The account of Edom's refusal to give the necessary permission is found in Nu. 20:14–21 (cf. Dt. 2:1–18). The antagonism continued after the settlement in Canaan (see, e.g., 2 Sa. 8:14; 2 Ki. 14:7; 2 Ch. 28:17), and we find the prophets denouncing Edom continually. For the principal anti-Edom prophecies, see Is. 34:5; Je. 49:7–22; La. 4:21f.; Ezk. 25:12–14; 35; Joel 3:19; Am. 1:11f. A vivid picture of judgment is given in Is. 63:1–6, Edom being used to typify the world's hostility to God's people and purposes, and its overthrow as typical of the universal Messianic conquest (cf. Is. 34:8ff.; Ezk. 35). Some time later we find a backward look to Edom's destruction in Mal. 1:2–5. There were recrudescences of the power and influence of Edom after the close of the OT period, but today the remarkable ruins at Petra are all that is left of Edom's greatness.

For Edom's part in the sack of Jerusalem in 587 BC see especially Ezk. 35:5, 12, 15 and Ps. 137:7. This participation by Edom is not mentioned in the historical books, though it would easily fit into the picture as we see it, e.g., in the marauding raids described in 2 Ki. 24:2.

Esau and Edom occupy a place of profound significance in the divine revelation of truth. That significance is brought into sharp focus in this small prophecy of Obadiah. 'The background of the picture presented to us by Obadiah is Jacob; the foreground is Esau. Jacob and those descended from him are seen passing through suffering, which is of the nature of chastisement, to ultimate restoration. Esau is seen proud, rebellious, defiant, moving towards ultimate destruction' (G. C. Morgan). We may rejoice that, in the day of the Lord, 'the kingdom shall be the Lord's' (v. 21), but we should no less be warned by Esau's example, for, after all, 'is not Esau Jacob's brother?' (Mal. 1:2). In the NT the writer to the Hebrews exhorts us to 'see to it that no-one fail to obtain the grace of God; that no "root of bitterness" spring up and cause trouble, and by it the many become defiled; that no one be . . . irreligious like Esau. . . . For you know that afterward, when he desired to inherit the blessing, he was rejected' (Heb. 12:15ff.).

1–9 IMPENDING DOOM ON EDOM

1, 2 This opening section of the prophecy of Obadiah, which describes some terrible disaster apparently about to overtake Edom, is prefaced by the words: Thus says the Lord God concerning Edom. Yahweh does not actually speak until v. 2, and the form of the intervening passage, We have heard tidings from the Lord . . ., suggests that Obadiah is here quoting an earlier prophetic oracle which he believes has come near to fulfilment. It is interesting, therefore, that most of this section appears almost word for word (though not in the same order) in Je. 49:7ff. Obadiah is perhaps quoting from Jeremiah, whom he may have heard preaching in Jerusalem, or both prophets may be employing an earlier prophecy; Jeremiah and Obadiah were assuredly not the first to speak of Edom in such a way. (See also Introduction.)

The immediate occasion of Obadiah's utterance, and for which he draws on the words of an earlier prophet, seems to be indicated in v. 7. This verse, which has no parallel in Jeremiah, gives the idea (though the Hebrew is somewhat obscure in details) that Edom's own neighbours and confederates were turning against her. 'The men of your covenant' and 'the men of your peace', to give a literal rendering, were either treacherously hostile or were yielding none of their expected assistance. In this situation Obadiah saw the appropriateness of the former oracle . . . a messenger has been sent among the nations: "Rise up! let us rise against her (Edom) for battle!"

3 The chief ground of Edom's proud confidence was her almost impregnable position. The Edomites were not the first nor the last to put their trust in a rocky fortress city. But neither their strong position nor their wit (Edom was renowned in antiquity also for her wisdom) could deliver them now. No matter how high Edom should go, to inaccessible eagle's eyrie, or among the very stars, yet God would bring her down to the ground. The rock is the capital Sela (see Introduction).

5 A picture of the completeness of Edom's coming destruction. Had it been a case of an ordinary raid by a band of robbers, there would have been plenty left to salvage. Plunderers by night, depending on speed and surprise, would take only a limited amount of booty, and so steal only enough for themselves, much as grape-gathers leave plenty of gleanings behind them. But Edom, by contrast, is 'cleaned right out', as we should say, and the utter devastation evokes the prophet's exclamation: how you have been destroyed!

6ff. Another picture of the completeness of Edom's destruction is in the exposure of all the treasures contained in her inaccessible and mysterious strongholds. All is sought out and laid bare. Since the judgment of Edom is here seen in the context of the final judgment of the day of the Lord (v. 15), its characteristics are the more worthy of study. It is always part of the judgment of God to 'bring to light the things now hidden in darkness' (1 Cor. 4:5). Edom gloried in her wisdom, might and riches (cf. Je. 9:23ff.). But her 'hidden treasures' (RV) will be sought out, her wise men destroyed (v. 8), and her mighty men dismayed (v. 9).

10–14 EDOM'S BEHAVIOUR TOWARDS JUDAH

10 Why was all this to befall Edom? The reason is given in vv. 10, 11: For the violence done to your brother Jacob. 'The name Jacob is expressly used (in place of Israel or Judah) in order to recall the relationship between the nations. In Dt. 23:7 the claims of kinship between the two peoples are urged upon Israel; but Edom had shown no reciprocal sense of brotherly relationship' (G. W. Wade). Not only did this age-long antagonism date back to the time in the wilderness when Edom refused to give Israel passage through his border (Nu. 20:20f.), but, as v. 11 shows, it reached a head in the sack of Jerusalem by Nebuchadrezzar in 587 BC. The participation of Edom on this occasion was long and bitterly remembered by the Jews. In exile by the rivers of Babylon they cried: 'Remember, O Lord, against the Edomites the day of Jerusalem, how they said, "Rase it, rase it! Down to its foundations!" ' (Ps. 137:7).

11 clearly looks back on the destruction of Jerusalem, when Edom had stood aloof instead of coming to his brother's assistance against attack by foreigners. For aloof RV has, more literally, 'on the other side'. One is reminded of the unbrotherly conduct of the priest and Levite in Lk. 10:31f.

12–14 appear in RSV as a series of reproofs, you should not have gloated . . . you should not have rejoiced, etc., whereas RV renders as prohibitions, 'look not . . . rejoice not', etc. The latter represents the actual construction of the Hebrew, but this is a rhetorical device, and RSV is right in seeing that in fact they have a past reference. These verses, then, may be taken as describing the actual part taken by the Edomites in the sack of Jerusalem.

First they gloated insolently and without pity over the fall of Jerusalem (v. 12). Then they entered the gate of the city and joined in the looting (v. 13). Finally they took up positions where they prevented fugitive Jews from escaping and even rounded up any they could find unapprehended (v. 14).

Note the use of the word 'day', especially in such phrases as the day of your brother (v. 12). Cf. 'the day of Jerusalem', as already quoted in the passage from Ps. 137:7. 'The expression day is often thus used to denote the occurrence of either good or bad fortune in connection with some place or person' (Wade). Jerusalem was to have another 'day' (Lk. 19:42), the time of her visitation, but she knew it not. The day of the Lord, on the other hand, which the next section of Obadiah introduces, is the day of Yahweh's final and uninhibited vindication of His own righteousness.

15–21 JUDGMENT ON EDOM AND ALL NATIONS IN THE DAY OF THE LORD: JUDAH'S RESTORATION

15 The day of the Lord is one of the great themes of the OT. Its character is emphasized rather than its exact time, although it is the ultimate issue of history and is often spoken of as imminent. Since 'the Lord alone will be exalted in that day' (Is. 2:11) it is a day of just retribution on all 'the nations that forget God' (Ps. 9:17). Among these Edom shall suffer: as you have done, it shall be done to you.

16 seems to be an ironical thrust. The prophet, recalling the way in which the Edomites caroused and drank in Jerusalem after the plunder of the city, declares that the heathen nations shall drink indeed, but it shall be such a drinking and swallowing down as shall make them as though they had not been.

17 In Yahweh's judgment on the nations, however, there shall be one safe place: Mount Zion. Here, those that escape of the exiles of Judah shall congregate. The phrase it shall be holy refers not to moral quality but to security from defilement and so from assault of the heathen, as in Joel 3:17. Best of all, the saved remnant of the house of Jacob will be reinstated in the territories which God had given them of old.

18 It is interesting to notice that the house of Joseph is mentioned alongside the house of Jacob. This means that there is to be a restoration of the northern kingdom of Israel as well as of the southern kingdom of Judah. Historically, it was only through a faithful remnant of the single tribe of Judah—indeed through the single faithful Israelite. Jesus Christ, 'the Lion of the tribe of Judah' (Rev. 5:5)—that God's saving purposes were carried out. But by His death the Christ of God was to 'gather into one the children of God who are scattered abroad' (Jn. 11:52), and in God's purposes His chosen people, 'the Israel of God' (Gal. 6:16) will ultimately stand complete in all its tribes. It is the fully restored nation of the children of Israel which will consume as a flame the whole house of Esau (cf. Dn. 7:22; 1 Cor. 6:2).

19 Vv. 19, 20 describe the full extent of Israel's 'possession' of its inheritance. Not all the details are clear, and the passage may be somewhat corrupt in Hebrew, but a glance at the main physical divisions of the kingdom on a map and at such a passage as Je. 33:13 will help to give the general sense well enough. The Negeb (meaning 'the south') is the area south of Hebron towards the wilderness of Paran. The second division, the Shephelah, is the lowland lying roughly west of Hebron towards the sea. The actual seaboard was occupied by the Philistines who had come there in the 12th century, after the Israelite entry into Canaan. The third division of Judah ought to be the hill country, and it has been conjectured that the next sentence of v. 19 has lost its original subject and that (here with some support from the LXX) it should be restored to read 'they of the hill country shall possess Ephraim and the hills of Samaria'.

20 The text of this verse is even more uncertain, but on the whole it seems best to take it as a reference to the future of the two principal groups of exiled Hebrews: first, those deported from the northern kingdom of Israel by Sargon after the fall of Samaria in 722 BC (the exiles . . . of the people of Israel), and secondly, the exiles of Jerusalem, i.e. those carried off from Judah by Nebuchadrezzar in 587 BC. Halah is a conjectured emendation in the RSV of the Hebrew text ('this army'), Halah being a place in Assyria to which Israelites were deported from Samaria in 722 BC (2 Ki. 17:6). This group will occupy Phoenicia, since their original area is now occupied by Jews from the southern kingdom. The latter group will occupy the cities of the Negeb, which the Jews who occupy Edom have vacated (v. 19). Sepharad has been variously located. Ancient identifications included Spain and the Bosphorus. More plausible modern suggestions include Sardis, capital of Lydia in Asia Minor, and, more likely, Saparda (probably the Persian Sparda), mentioned in Assyrian annals as a neighbouring country in Mesopotamia. It was no doubt a group of exiled Jews in which Obadiah and his hearers had some special interest.

21 gathers together the main themes of the book in two fine affirmations. First, there is the actual execution of judgment on Edom by saviours, whose headquarters are in Jerusalem. In regard to the Jews they are deliverers or defenders (cf. Jdg. 2:16 and Is. 19:20), and with regard to the Edomites they are executors of justice.

Finally, the kingdom shall be the Lord's. The people of God never doubted that Yahweh was ruling as King, 'be the earth never so unquiet' (Ps. 99:1, Prayer Book Version), but they awaited the full expression and acknowledgment of His sovereign rule. See Dn. 2:44 and 7:27, and especially Rev. 11:15, where the people of God still rejoice in the assurance that 'the kingdom of the world has become the kingdom of our Lord, and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever'.

Jonah

INTRODUCTION

The book of Jonah is entirely concerned with the personal dealings between Yahweh and His servant Jonah the son of Amittai. These dealings arise out of a prophetic commission and its attempted evasion. Jonah finds that God's thoughts are not his thoughts, and that his ways are not God's ways. But God will not leave Jonah to himself. In the first half of the story He lets him go to the extremity of almost losing his life, only to restore him to where he was before he attempted, by physical means, to evade Yahweh's command. In the second half of the story He lets him go to the extremity of both mental and spiritual depression only to reveal to him the essential rightness of His merciful purposes.

THE MESSAGE AND ITS FORM

The form of the book is that of a piece of biographical narrative, similar (in style, language, atmosphere and miraculous content) to the various incidents in 1 and 2 Kings concerning Elijah and Elisha, who, indeed, were Jonah's immediate predecessors as prophets in the northern kingdom of Israel, and who, like him, performed part of their work in relation to heathen peoples: Elijah to Sidon (1 Ki. 17:8ff.), Elisha to Syria (2 Ki. 5:1ff.), Jonah to Nineveh.

Indeed, if we are looking for literary parallels (which we must do if we are to determine the literary genre to which the book of Jonah belongs) there are marked similarities between Jonah and the episode of Elijah's encounter with Baal-worship in 1 Ki. 17–19: a terse oracle of judgment (1 Ki. 17:1 = Jon. 3:4); God's intimate protective dealings with His prophet; a series of miraculous occurrences; after the prophet's great moment, his solitary depression, accompanied by God's provision for him and His confrontation of him; the final utterance of God, rebuking the prophet's narrowness and vindicating the divine sovereignty (1 Ki. 19:18 = Jon. 4:11). If Jonah does not actually belong to the same cycle of stories as those of Elijah and Elisha, it could well have been modelled on them. The latter possibility would be compatible with the story itself being a literary invention (whatever purpose the writer may have had in view). The fact that Jonah comes to us as part of the prophetic Canon, however, means that it owes its place in the Bible to its acceptance by the Jews as recording the experience of the actual prophet Jonah, a belief obviously endorsed by Jesus (see below). Is there sufficient reason to reject this view? The popular modern view is that Jonah was written as an imaginative tale, either as an allegory of the exile and mission of Israel (cf. Je. 51:34), or to teach the truth of God's universal love by way of parable. The difficulty of accepting this view in preference to the traditional view is that it rests on subjective impression rather than on comparative literary tests: no other biblical book can be classed as either parable or allegory, and where these literary forms appear within larger books there is always some internal or contextual indication that it is parable or allegory we are dealing with. But there is no positive evidence, either internal or external, to show that Jonah is allegory or parable.

The allegorical view is not, in fact, held by many, owing to the difficulty of finding a consistent allegorical interpretation in detail. The parabolic view is more favoured, partly no doubt because it seems to relieve the reader of the necessity of accepting as factual the miraculous events of the story. This, however, increases the difficulty of determining the literary genre of Jonah, for, in the case of most biblical parables, the cogency of the parable depends on its verisimilitude as portraying a human situation. This means that, if the miraculous will not do in history, it equally will lend no conviction to a parable. There is still the possibility that Jonah is a deliberate imitation of the Elijah–Elisha type of prophetic episode, designed to teach a certain truth. If this view is taken, however, much of the ground for thinking Jonah a literary invention (i.e. the miraculous element) is removed, unless the whole prophetic cycle is to be classified as similarly didactic invention. Are we to argue that there was no encounter between Elijah and the prophets of Baal at Mt. Carmel, and no encounter between Elijah and God at Horeb, on the ground that the episode includes miraculous interventions, exhibits Elijah's exclusiveness and teaches a doctrine of the remnant?

The particular revelation with which the book of Jonah is concerned may be expressed in the words which form the conclusion of the story of Peter and the Gentiles in Acts 11:18: 'Then to the Gentiles also God has granted repentance unto life.' This revelation is so given as to emphasize, on the one hand, God's supreme mercy and justice in granting Nineveh 'repentance unto life', and, on the other hand, the sinful particularism of God's servant, Jonah, in resisting this manifestation of His will.

While this truth might well be conveyed in a number of literary forms in inspired Scripture, it is not necessary to suppose that it cannot be conveyed by the medium of historical narrative. God's revelation is regularly conveyed by means of the record of events and of the prophetic interpretation of those events. E.g. Acts 10 – 11:18, which, we have already suggested, is in some respects the NT counterpart of Jonah, has a similar didactic motive. But we are not therefore to infer that Luke thought he was writing parable or homiletic fiction. Similarly, the presence of miracle in a story is no evidence that it was not recorded as, and intended to be accepted as, historical narrative.

Any assessment of the literary character of Jonah must take into account the following facts. First, Jonah himself was an historical figure, a prophet of Yahweh in Israel (2 Ki. 14:25). Secondly, the work is prima facie historical narrative, without any positive indication that it is to be interpreted otherwise. Thirdly, neither Jews nor Christians have ever, until quite recently, regarded Jonah as anything but a record of the prophet's experience, whatever they may have taken its message to be. Fourthly, our Lord Jesus Christ clearly believed that the repentance of the men of Nineveh was a real occurrence, and it is most natural to take His allusion to Jonah's 'three days and three nights in the belly of the whale' (Mt. 12:40, 41) in the same way. In addition it may be urged that the whole force of Yahweh's self-vindication to Jonah demands an actual mission to a heathen city with an actual repentance and 'sparing' of it. It is not easy to believe that the challenge 'Should not I pity Nineveh?' was presented to the people of Israel through the inspired writer as a purely hypothetical consideration.

DATE AND AUTHORSHIP

No certainty can be reached as regards the date of the book. Some have argued that the entire story would have no meaning after Nineveh had actually been destroyed (612 BC). There is force in this argument. 'Should not I pity Nineveh?' would then be not only a hypothetical consideration, but a particularly ill-chosen one. (Jon. 3:3 will be considered in the commentary.) The book has actually been assigned, by various prominent scholars, to every century from the 8th to the 2nd BC. But it should be pointed out that the chief reason why many scholars hold the book to be a product of the post-exilic period is that 'the general thought and tenor of the book . . . presupposes the teaching of the great prophets' including Jeremiah (S. R. Driver). With this highly subjective judgment we see no compelling reason to concur.

'The presence of Aramaisms in the book cannot be made a criterion for determining the date, since Aramaisms occur in Old Testament books from both early and late periods' (E. J. Young, Introduction to the Old Testament, 1953, p. 255). Indeed, L. Morris is able to quote learned opinion that '"Aramaic" words are now known from the Middle Babylonian and Middle Assyrian period, c. 1400 BC' and that 'the evidence of early Aramaisms is abundant' (L. Morris, Ruth, TOTC, 1968, p. 233 n. 2). With the linguistic evidence must also be reckoned the fact that 'there is not in them (Jonah, Joel, etc.) one certainly Persian word, nor a single Greek word' and 'not a Babylonian word not already found in the earlier literature' (R. D. Wilson, 'The Authenticity of Israel', PTR, Vol. XVI, pp. 280–298, 430–456). This evidence does not support the theory that Jonah belongs to the post-exilic period. S. R. Driver, who himself held the post-exilic view, admitted as a possibility that 'some of the linguistic features might be consistent with a pre-exilic origin in northern Israel' (Introduction to the Literature of the Old Testament, 1909, p. 322).

Jonah exercised his ministry in the reign of Jeroboam II (793–753 BC), and it seems most natural to suppose that the story was first committed to writing some time before the fall of the northern kingdom in 722 BC, though there may easily have been circumstances occurring between 722 BC and 612 BC, when Israel was governed from Nineveh, which prompted the wider publication of the book in that period.

Nothing is said in the book of Jonah about its author. Although Jonah himself must obviously have been the main ultimate source of information for the story, there is no reason why he should have been the writer. No doubt the story soon became known in Israel, and we may presume that the sailors did their share of the telling. There were schools of prophets in Israel in the 9th century (2 Ki. 3:13; 6:1) and in Judah in the 8th century (Is. 8:16ff.) among whom such prophetic stories may first have circulated.

JONAH AND JESUS

A number of important scriptures should be studied alongside Jonah. In the OT, e.g., Je. 1:4–10 (for the prophetic commission); Je. 18:7–10 (for the effect of repentance on God's proclamation); Pss. 16:8–11; 139 (for the prophet's experience). In the NT, Acts 10:1 – 11:18 and Rom. 9–11 illustrate the missionary message of Jonah, and vice versa. But, in particular, the Gospel passages which refer to Jonah should be compared and studied (Mt. 12:38–41; Lk. 11:29–32). Some points will be dealt with in the commentary. But here we may notice that Jonah is the only OT prophet with whom Jesus directly compared Himself. Jesus obviously regarded Jonah's experience and mission as of great significance. It is the more interesting, therefore, to recall that both Jesus and Jonah were 'prophets of Galilee'. Jonah's town, Gath-hepher, was only a few miles to the north of Nazareth, Jesus' town. It was less than an hour's walk away. Jesus must often have gone there. Perhaps even in His day the tomb of Jonah was pointed out there, as it was later in Jerome's day. Was it here that, in the days of His obscurity, Jesus began to meditate on the significance of Jonah and of His own mission?

According to the usual text of Jn. 7:52, the Pharisees taunted Nicodemus with the claim that 'no prophet is to rise from Galilee'. A recently discovered manuscript, P 66, gives the sense 'the prophet does not rise from Galilee' (cf. Jn. 6:14; 7:41; Dt. 18:18). They failed to perceive that 'something greater than Jonah is here' (Mt. 12:41).

1:1–3 THE COMMISSION GIVEN TO JONAH AND REJECTED

1 Jonah appears as one to whom the word of the Lord came, i.e. as a prophet. (Cf. 2 Ki. 14:25 for other details of Jonah.) 2 His assignment was as unusual as it was unwelcome, for Nineveh, mighty and famous, was capital of the heathen Empire of Assyria, the constant enemy of Israel. The phrase has come up before me pictures Yahweh as 'Judge of all the earth' (Gn. 18:25; cf. Gn. 6:13; 18:20, 21).

3 Jonah's resignation of his prophetic commission is immediate and deliberate. The emphasis on his fleeing from the presence of the Lord (see also v. 10) does not imply a belief, like that of Naaman in 2 Ki. 5:17, that the presence of Yahweh was restricted to the soil of Israel. Vv. 2b and 9 prove the contrary. Rather it indicates a withdrawal from the prophet's intimacy with Yahweh. No longer could the prophet say of his God, 'before whom I stand' (1 Ki. 17:1). Jonah did what Moses feared to do (cf. Ex. 33:14, 15), and he forfeited also the 'rest' which accompanies the presence of God. With a gesture of independence, the servant of Yahweh selects his own destination. Tarshish apparently refers to more than one place in the OT (cf. 1 Ki. 22:48). Here it may be Tartessus, a mining port in Spain, far away at the western end of the Mediterranean Sea. Relying now on his own resources, he paid the fare of the ship and embarked. Joppa, modern Jaffa, is the only considerable port on the coast of Palestine. It is interesting that Joppa also plays a part in the NT story of Peter and the Gentiles in Acts 10:1 – 11:18.

1:4–17 JONAH'S FLIGHT AND THE LORD'S PURSUIT

Jonah's desperate attempt to evade God, even to the point of accepting death by drowning, and God's reclaiming of Jonah, occupy the largest section of the narrative. The disobedient prophet cannot escape from Yahweh. We have not yet been told why it was that Jonah chose to disobey Yahweh's command; that will be disclosed later in its appropriate place.

Here we are confronted with a fundamental fact of God's elective purposes, viz. that 'the gifts and call of God are irrevocable' (Rom. 11:29). To all His prophets He said, as Jesus said to His apostles, 'You did not choose me, but I chose you' (Jn. 15:16).

4 Yahweh took two steps to recover Jonah. First, He hurled a great wind upon the sea. This resulted in the terror of the sailors, the exposure of Jonah and his being thrown overboard. Secondly, 'the Lord appointed a great fish to swallow up Jonah' (v. 17; see note below). This was the means of preserving him from death and of causing him to throw himself on the mercy of God. God's instruments here were a great wind and 'a great fish'. Cf. other occasions when God works for His people through the manoeuvring of His creatures, e.g. in the Exodus (see Ex. 14:21; Nu. 11:31).

It is instructive to study Jonah's experience in the light of Ps. 139. The writer's thoughts, words and every movement are known to Yahweh. 'Whither shall I flee from thy presence?' he asks. 'If I make my bed in Sheol, thou art there! If I . . . dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, even there thy hand shall lead me, and thy right hand shall hold me' (Ps. 139:7–10). So Jonah found it.

5–16 The account of the ship in distress is graphic and realistic—the violent gale, the mariners of many races and religions, their panic, the excited questioning of Jonah, their reluctance to take the desperate step he suggests, their frantic rowing. The LXX adds the detail that it was Jonah's snoring as he lay asleep in the inner part of the ship that first attracted the shipmaster's attention to the suspicious traveller!

Jonah's behaviour is set off against the behaviour of the heathen sailors. They have a strong sense of religious obligation and are amazed at Jonah's temerity in fleeing from the presence of his God (v. 10). They are scrupulous when the ejection of Jonah appears inevitable; and when the sea is finally calmed, they show proper fear towards Yahweh (v. 16). Yet the incident clearly shows that Jonah is no coward. He is comparatively calm and self-possessed. He professes his faith and his guilt deliberately, and as deliberately chooses to drown rather than let others perish on his account. No doubt he regarded his impending death as Yahweh's punishment. A comparison of Jonah's behaviour with that of the characters in Acts 27 and Mk. 4:35–41 (and parallels) will be found instructive.

It ought not to be overlooked that Jonah testified to one God only over all the earth (v. 9). To him, Yahweh is the transcendent God of heaven, the Creator and Sovereign of the sea and the dry land alike. Yet Jonah, in his religion and devotion, cramped this glorious doctrine of God into the narrow confines of a jealous exclusivism. It is thus part of the purpose of the book to warn against a life and practice which falls below our grasp of the truth.

17 Speculation as to the nature of the great fish is needless. Our Lord's reference to this same incident in Mt. 12:40 carefully adopts the same designation, emphasizing the entombment rather than the creature itself (Gk. kētos, 'a large sea-monster', translated and interpreted by AV, RV and RSV as 'whale'). For theories concerning the fish the reader is referred to A. J. Wilson's article in PTR, Vol. XXV, pp. 630–642. It may not be without significance that the Sumerian and Akkadian ideogram for the city of Nineveh is nina written with a sign compounded of a fish within a large dwelling-place or tomb. The information that Jonah was incarcerated for three days and three nights, if intended literally, is not likely to have been supplied by Jonah himself, who, even he had been conscious for the whole time, would hardly have had any means of marking the passage of time. It must then have been calculated from information supplied by the sailors. On the other hand, this may be only a conventional expression for a shortish period of time (cf. 3:3 and Jos. 2:16). The addition of three nights does not necessarily add to the accuracy of the expression, and we know that elsewhere 'after three days' is equivalent to 'on the third day'. Cf. the NT references to the duration of Jesus' entombment (e.g. 1 Cor. 15:4). Mt. 12:40 shows that 'three days and three nights' was regarded then as sufficiently accurate to denote a period of not more than 36 hours.

2:1–10 JONAH'S PRAYER FROM THE FISH'S BELLY

In this section Jonah describes his experience, ascribing salvation to Yahweh, and is restored to land. We are perhaps meant to observe the contrast of Jonah's position: he who, in the ship, apparently declined to arise and call upon his God (1:6) is now constrained to pray 'to the Lord his God from the belly of the fish' (2:1).

Jonah's prayer, a psalm in Hebrew elegiac metre, has often been declared to be an extraneous insertion. It has, however, a real appropriateness in its context, and we need not doubt that its sentiment belongs to the occasion to which it is ascribed, even if its poetic form should belong to the period of reflection after the deliverance from death ('Sheol'), and not, as some seem to think it ought to have been, a prayer to be saved from the fish.

The sequence of thought in vv. 2–7 suggests that after his desperate prayer Jonah was overcome by the water and pressure of the depths, and that the next thing he was conscious of was simply that he was still alive. If we are to take it that his thanksgiving was uttered near the end of the three-day period, we may suppose that for most of the preceding time he was insensible, as perhaps he was already insensible when swallowed by the great fish. In that case, his was the further experience of Ps. 139:18, 'when I awake, I am still with thee'. Yahweh had heard Jonah's prayer and had brought up his life 'from the Pit' (v. 6; i.e. Sheol). Jonah promises a sacrifice of thanksgiving, for 'deliverance belongs to the Lord' (v. 9).

We should note, however, that although Jonah is no doubt ready now to obey God's command, there is no evidence that he feels any compassion for the Ninevites. His experience of God's mercy only confirms him in his belief that those who 'pay regard to vain idols forsake their true loyalty' (i.e. cut themselves off from Yahweh, the only true source of succour for them) (v. 8). This evidence of Jonah's exclusiveness, even in the midst of Yahweh's mercy, gives further point to Yahweh's remonstrance in ch. 4. But this attitude was not peculiar to Jonah. Again Ps. 139 has a parallel; note the similar transition of thought there from v. 18 to vv. 19ff.

This psalm of Jonah is of especial importance in the light of Jesus' reference to him in Mt. 12:40; for the nature of the similarity between Jonah's experience and that of Christ is most clearly seen here. Thus, Jesus, the greater than Jonah, the true Servant and Prophet of Yahweh, went to the extremity of human suffering (because of the disobedience of others). What Jonah endured 'figuratively' (Heb. 11:19—a similar figure of death) Jesus endured in reality. In His 'distress' He went to 'the belly of Sheol'; all God's waves and billows passed over Him (cf. Is. 53). As Jonah cried, 'I am cast out from thy presence' (v. 4), so Christ was constrained to cry, 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?' (Mt. 27:46).

And yet the entombment of Jesus not only denoted the extremity of His passion (as the Creed states, 'He descended into hell', i.e. Hades, or Sheol); it also emphasized the reality of His deliverance from death to life. Study Peter's Pentecostal sermon in Acts 2, especially vv. 24ff.: 'But God raised him up, having loosed the pangs of death, because it was not possible for him to be held by it.' Jonah's testimony, 'yet thou didst bring up my life from the Pit' (v. 6), has a striking parallel in the verse from Ps. 16:10 quoted by Peter in Acts 2:27: 'Thou wilt not abandon my soul to Hades, nor let thy Holy One see corruption.'

2, 3 First Jonah describes how in his extremity his voluntary resistance to Yahweh broke down, and as the awfulness of his fate impressed itself on him he cried in desperation to his God. (Cf. Peter's spontaneous cry in Mt. 14:30.) The belly of Sheol is the place of the dead (the word for 'belly' is different from that used for 'belly of the fish'), whose inhabitants, if they had died as Jonah was in danger of dying, estranged from God and unforgiven, were thought of as being cut off from God's hand and remembered no more by Him (cf. Ps. 88:5; read the whole of this Psalm for an understanding of Jonah's horror).

4 Thy holy temple, here and in v. 7, symbolizes the place of Yahweh's presence, whence Jonah had fled. It is in extreme contrast to 'the belly of Sheol'. At whatever shrine Jonah may have been accustomed to worship in Israel, it is probable that he who worships the God of heaven is here thinking of thy holy temple as 'heaven thy dwelling place' (1 Ki. 8:39).

3:1–9 THE PROPHETIC COMMISSION RENEWED AND DISCHARGED

1 Jonah, having been restored to land at Yahweh's commandment, is commissioned a second time. Chastened by his experiences he obeys, although he is not apparently more charitably disposed towards Nineveh than before. 2 The message that I tell you emphasizes that the preacher speaks not of himself, but 'oracles of God' (1 Pet. 4:11). What is true of Christ the Son, the eternal Word, must also be true of all His servants: 'He whom God has sent utters the words of God' (Jn. 3:34). Cf. also the case of Moses (Ex. 4:10–16), Jeremiah (Je. 1:6–9) and Jesus' disciples (Mt. 10:19, 20). Jonah knew from the beginning that he must preach the preaching that God bade him; he was a disobedient, not a false, prophet.

3 A note here draws attention to the magnitude of Nineveh, and thus of Jonah's task. Exceedingly great is lit. 'great to God' or 'great before God', which is a regular way of expressing a superlative. This, however, has caused difficulty to some people on two scores. First the verb was is in the perfect tense in Hebrew, and has been thought to imply that Nineveh had long since perished (thus supporting a late date for that book). Secondly, modern archaeological research does not altogether confirm the great size of Nineveh. The first difficulty is not decisive, for since the whole narrative is cast in the past, the statement that Nineveh was an exceedingly great city need imply no more than that this is how it was when Jonah went there. Cf. 'now the famine was severe in Samaria' in the Elijah story in 1 Ki. 18:2, referred to in the Introduction. Alternatively, the note may be a gloss inserted later by a scribe to explain the following verse. The second difficulty is likewise capable of solution. Nineveh city itself, according to the dimensions given by Sennacherib and modern surveys of its ruins (c. 12 miles), was considerably smaller than the language of Jonah implies. Gn. 10:12, however, applies the title 'the great city' to four cities in the area, of which Nineveh proper is first named and most important. Recent archaeological discoveries show that one of these, Calah, had a population of 70,000; and as this city is known by its walls to have been about half the size of Nineveh, the much doubted figure of 'a hundred and twenty thousand persons' (4:11) is seen to be most likely a census figure of Nineveh in its prime. In later times Nineveh was calculated (by Ktesias and Diodorus) to have had a circuit of some 480 stadia, or about 60 miles, and this seems to reflect the tradition of a very large city area (though it was never bounded by a single wall, as Diodorus seems to think it was). The entire circuit of the four seats of the Nineveh district is, in fact 61½ miles, or about three days' journey. Now, in addition to this note in 3:3 which we are considering, Nineveh is on three separate occasions described as 'that great city' (1:2; 3:2; 4:11) and the addition of this term may indicate that the larger area or 'district' is deliberately intended. We may compare such modern appellations as 'Greater London'. It may be significant that the term is not added in 4:5; 'the city' here is no doubt Nineveh proper, the city of 'a day's journey' where Jonah had first entered (3:4). Here the word of Jonah's preaching came to the king of Nineveh, by whose proclamation the fast of repentance extended to all the people of Nineveh.

4–7 We do not know what other circumstances in Nineveh may have been favourable to the producing of contrition, but Jonah's preaching of imminent doom—the only actual 'prophecy' in this prophetic book—resulted in an immediate and widespread repentance. The king himself ordered a national fast. Note the curious inclusion of animals in the fast (v. 7), as in Judith 4:9ff., and as in the famine of Joel 4:19, 20. The very beasts of the field who cry unto the Lord are in turn the objects of His compassion, as the last words of Jonah tell us.

'The sign of Jonah' (Mt. 16:4) includes not only his 'death' and 'resurrection', but also his preaching, by virtue of that 'resurrection', to Gentile Nineveh. Ponder the great importance of this sign for Christ's generation (cf. Lk. 11:29ff. and Mt. 12:38ff.) and for our own.

3:10 – 4:11 TWO REACTIONS TO NINEVEH'S REPENTANCE: THE LORD CHALLENGES JONAH

and averting of judgment is, of course, not arbitrary. It is a basic postulate of the book of Jonah that God repents of evil (cf. on Joel 2:13, 14 and especially Je. 18:6–10). But we have reached the core of Jonah's problem. Jonah now explicitly confesses the reason, hitherto unexplained, for his first attempt to evade Yahweh's command. The question which forms the climax of the book here comes directly into view: 'Should Yahweh have pity on Nineveh?'

2, 3 It was in the certain knowledge that God would spare Nineveh if she repented that Jonah fled to Tarshish. Now that Nineveh has repented, Jonah knows that judgment will not fall, and this he cannot face. He cannot reconcile himself to what he knows is the unchangeable character of God. Again he seeks death rather than see God's face and live. Take my life from me . . . for it is better for me to die than to live. Cf. Elijah's prayer in 1 Ki. 19:4 and the grounds for it.

4 But Yahweh directly challenges Jonah. His question may be construed as 'Are you rightly angry?' or 'Are you very angry?' The force is not very different. The first is an explicit challenge to the righteousness of Jonah's behaviour. The second is more in the nature of an exclamation of surprise that Jonah should be at variance with God's mind.

5–11 In the final passage of the book, God presents His challenge to Jonah in dramatic form, in the acted parable of the gourd. By means of this parable God elicits from Jonah a confession in the matter of the gourd which carries a condemnation of his unrighteousness in the matter of Nineveh.

Jonah, awaiting in forlorn hope the expiry of the 'forty days' of his prediction (3:4), is again the object of God's 'preparations'. This time a plant, a worm and a sultry east wind are employed. In his depression God dealt with him thus: first He relieved Jonah's grief by providing additional shelter in the thick leafage of the tropical gourd. Next day He reversed the situation and allowed Jonah to suffer acute physical distress by destroying the gourd. Jonah was angry because the gourd perished. Though it was in no sense 'his' gourd, and was by nature short-lived, yet Jonah would have spared it, because it brought comfort to him.

11 And should not I pity Nineveh? asks Yahweh. Cannot Jonah see some ground for pity in the 120,000 ignorant people and the dumb beasts therein? Persons who do not know their right hand from their left is probably a reference to their ignorance, as compared with the Israelite, of the law of God. The ignorance of the people and the helplessness of the cattle are not, of course, the sole ground for the exercise of Yahweh's mercy, but they are mentioned to show how lacking, even in common sympathy, Jonah's religious exclusiveness has made him. Selfishness, blindness, unrighteousness: these are progressively revealed by the parable as Jonah's sins.

The last word is with God, 'whose property is always to have mercy', and the book of Jonah is another signpost to the full revelation of the salvation of God, which, in His sovereign mercy and grace, was to be 'a light for revelation to the Gentiles' (Lk. 2:32). The evangelical message of the book may be expressed in the words of Paul: 'What shall we say then? Is there injustice on God's part? By no means! For he says to Moses, "I will have mercy on whom I have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I have compassion" ' (Rom. 9:14, 15).

Micah

INTRODUCTION

The prophet Micah was probably from an obscure family, since his father's name is not given. Certainly he came from an outlying provincial town, Moresheth, bordering upon the Philistine territory of Gath. His concern and interest seem to be centred a little more upon the plight of the oppressed lower classes than was the case with his contemporary, Isaiah (who was apparently a citizen of Jerusalem itself).

His career began in the reign of Jotham, perhaps after Ahaz had already become co-regent with his father in 743, but before Jotham's death or deposition in 736. Ahaz ruled on until 728, when Hezekiah his son came into power, and Micah continued his ministry well into his reign. (Exact dating in this period is notoriously difficult. For a slightly variant view, see Introduction to 1 and 2 Kings, pp. 321ff.) We have no reliable evidence for a terminus ad quem to his career. Certainly he received revelations concerning the Babylonian captivity and the subsequent restoration, just as Isaiah did (and for this reason it is customary for some critics to deny the authenticity of such passages in both prophets). This may possibly suggest a date after the Assyrian invasion of 701 BC, but the criteria for this are quite tenuous.

Some analysts regard this book as a series of disconnected and miscellaneous discourses but, as the Outline below will demonstrate, a logical progression and interconnection of thought can be made out between the successive units of the book of Micah, and there is no strong case tor heterogeneity.

OUTLINE OF CONTENTS

1:1–16 God's sentence upon both idolatrous kingdoms

2:1 – 3:12 The upper classes guilty of oppression
- 2:1–11 Exploitation of the poor and defenceless by the idle rich

- 3:1–4 The government devours its people instead of defending them
- 3:5–8 The corrupt state religion confronted by the Spirit-empowered prophet
- 3:9–12 Utter destruction impends for all three: rulers, priests and prophets

4:1 – 5:15 The ultimate triumph of God's grace towards Israel
- 4:1–8 The triumph of the Messianic kingdom over the Gentile world
- 4:9–13 First must come suffering, exile, restoration, and judgment upon Israel's foes
- 5:1–6 The divine-human Victor who will defend His flock and destroy the world powers
- 5:7–15 The triumph of Israel after it is purged of idolatry

6:1–16 God's controversy with ungrateful Israel
- 6:1–5 Israel summoned to repent, recalling God's mercy at the Exodus
- 6:6–16 Response to repentant Israel: valid worship must be accompanied by a godly life

7:1–20 Covenant promises will be fulfilled to the faithful remnant
- 7:1–6 True Israel laments the sins of selfishness and corruption
- 7:7–10 True Israel will continue trusting in God's mercy
- 7:11–20 The triumph of Christ through the church age and the millennium

COMMENTARY

1:1–16 GOD'S SENTENCE UPON BOTH IDOLATROUS KINGDOMS

1 Micah's ministry extended from the reign of Jotham (751–736 BC) to that of Ahaz (743–728) and Hezekiah (728–696). Apparently even ch. 6 was delivered before 724, since any later appeal to the northern kingdom of Israel would have been pointless. 2 You peoples, all of you suggests that God's dealings with Israel had an important bearing upon the destiny of all the surrounding nations as well. His proclamation comes from his holy temple (cf. Am. 1:2) as the one valid meeting-place between God and man, with its altar of substitutionary atonement. The universal validity of the unique OT revelation is here implied. 3, 4 Destruction (at the hands of future Assyrian and Chaldean invaders) awaits the idolatrous high places in both Samaria and Judah, a catastrophic devastation like volcano and earthquake, or avalanches caused by torrential rains. 5 This disaster will be brought on by Israel's moral degeneracy, for both the capital cities, Samaria and Jerusalem, have become centres of idol-worship.

6, 7 Jerusalem's destruction is still 150 years off, but Samaria's is imminent (722 BC), and will be so thorough as to leave her a deserted mound of ruins, with her stone walls tumbling down into the valley through erosion and neglect. The Assyrian troops of Sargon would smash her idols and destroy the dedicated treasures and votive monuments (her harlot's hires from her false lovers, the heathen gods) in her temples. All the materialistic gains and advantages (such as the political alliance with Phoenicia engineered by Jezebel's marriage to Ahab) will be wiped out or carried off as spoil by the enemy.

Now follows (vv. 8–16) an anguished lament by the prophet as he foresees the inexorable march of the Assyrian host under Shalmaneser V, and the Chaldeans under Nebuchadrezzar a century and a half later. Twelve cities are mentioned, chiefly those whose names contain elements of ill omen.

8 Jackals (more accurate for tannîm than AV's 'dragons') have a peculiar howl at night, beginning with a high-pitched, long drawn-out cry repeated at a successively higher pitch, and finishing with a series of loud yelps. The ostriches (rather than AV's 'owls') had an eerie, doleful cry. 9 Samaria's wound (AV 'wounds') is incurable (or 'desperately ill': the same word is figuratively applied to man's heart in Je. 17:9), and is destined to be inflicted on Jerusalem also in time to come (the Chaldean invasion is especially in view here).

10 Gath was the nearest Philistine city to Judah, and would be most apt to hear with joy about the disaster to the Hebrews, their hereditary foes. Hence the Jews must not weep aloud when calamity strikes, but keep it secret as long as possible. Beth-le-aphrah (possibly the same as Ophrah in Benjamin near Bethel) means 'House unto Dust', suggesting the dust in which the mourning Hebrew will roll in despair. 11 Shaphir (possibly Sawafir, SE of Ashdod) meant 'Beautiful', which accentuated the pathos of her naked, stripped condition as the Chaldeans would lead her inhabitants into exile. Zaanan (perhaps Zanan in the Shephelah; cf. Jos. 15:37) suggested the verb yāṣā' 'go or come forth', which is what its hapless people would not be able to do under siege. Beth-ezel ('House of Nearness', perhaps the same as Azal in Zc. 14:5 (AV), E of Jerusalem) suggests the ominous proximity of the besieging invaders to the beleaguered capital. The wailing of Beth-ezel shall take away from you its standing place (rather than AV's 'receive of you his standing') means that in their despairing lamentation the defenders of Beth-ezel retreat to Jerusalem, taking along with them the refugees from Zaanan and Shaphir, who have briefly made it their standing place or abiding-place.

12 Maroth was doubtless another suburb of Jerusalem; its name meant 'Bitterness'. 13 Lachish, in SW Judah, was apparently one of its first cities to permit the N Israelite cults to be established in it; now its inhabitants must harness their horses and flee with their goods as the invaders approach. 14 Lachish will have to give parting gifts or a 'dowry' (suggested by Heb. mōreshet, 'a betrothed woman') as Moresheth-gath (Micah's own home town) is given up to the enemy. The house of Achzib (suggesting 'akzāb, 'deceitful'), a town SW of Adullam, proves a deceitful hope for the Judean forces attempting to stem the advance of the foe.

15 The conqueror will take possession of Mareshah ('possession' from Heb. yāraš, 'take possession of'), NE of Lachish (according to Aharoni), pushing back the glory of Israel (i.e. the flower of army and nobility) toward Adullam, site of a famous cave in which David hid out from Saul (1 Sa. 22:1) to the E of Achzib. 16 The plucking out or shearing off of hair in a paroxysm of grief was customary for mothers who had received tidings of the death of their sons. Since the Hebrew nešer could mean 'vulture' as well as 'eagle', it may have been the former which Micah had in mind here, since the carrion vulture has neither feathers nor hair around its head and neck. The exile here foretold is more likely to be the Babylonian (cf. Mi. 4:10) than the Assyrian (which involved only the provinces, not Jerusalem itself). (J. Aharoni, The Land of the Bible, 1967, prefers the Sennacherib invasion; cf. the map on p. 338 of his book.) Perhaps both invasions (701 BC and 587 BC) are in view.

2:1–11 Exploitation of the poor and defenceless by the idle rich

1 These grasping land-owners and money-lenders are so obsessed with acquiring wealth by foreclosure or fraud that they even lie awake at night thinking up new schemes for exploiting the poor. In the power of their hand may also be rendered, 'Their hand is as a god (to them)'; i.e. they make their own power the highest force they will recognize. (It is unusual to render 'ēl as 'strength' rather than 'god'.) 2 They covet (Heb. ḥāmaḏ is the same verb as in the tenth commandment, which they deliberately and cynically violate) the property of others, as Ahab coveted Naboth's vineyard (1 Ki. 21). This meant depriving Israelite families of their ancestral inheritance conferred upon them by the Lord Himself back in the days of Joshua.

3 In punishment for this disregard of their obligations of brotherhood under God's covenant with Israel, God will 'devise' or counterplot against these ruthless plotters, who have succeeded in evading justice from human authorities. He will bring down calamity upon them all as a yoke pressing down upon their necks. The family meant here is the family of the rich oppressor (although Keil would equate it with the whole nation of Israel; cf. Am. 3:1). 4 In that day (i.e. the day of God's intervention to punish or redeem) 'one shall take up' (more accurate than RSV's they) a taunt song, or more likely 'a proverbial utterance' (Heb. māšāl), since the lamenting speakers must be the Israelites themselves (We are utterly ruined), rather than their jeering foes. They will deplore God's removal of their ancestral portion in the land of promise as they are driven off by their enemies. Render the final clause: 'To the rebellious (Heb. šôḇēḇ) He is dividing our fields' (rather than AV's 'turning away he hath divided', or RSV's among our captors which implies a different word, lešôḇēnû, for which there is no textual support). The 'rebellious' in this case would refer to the heathen invaders who have never entered into covenant relation with Yahweh or recognized His sovereignty. 5 These unscrupulous oppressors will have no descendants to cast lots for the apportionment of the land, as their forebears had done back in the days of Joshua (cf. Jos. 14:1, 2). The line here is the surveyor's measuring cord used in determining the bounds of real estate.

6 Micah's warning is scornfully rejected by his public: Do not preach ('prophesy', AV, RV, BDB, GB; 'drivel', Kleinert). Literally, 'cause to drop down, drip'; perhaps 'prate' brings out best what the word connotes here. The cynical Jews refuse to listen to the old-fashioned ranting of Micah and his colleagues: 'They shall not prate to them.' 'Disgrace shall not overtake' (there is no us expressed in the Heb.) is the hope of these hardened materialists. RSV's overtake assumes a change in the Hebrew text from yissag, 'will draw back', or 'depart', to yassīg, 'will overtake'. It is better to render: 'Reproaches (i.e. by these tiresome prophets) will not depart', or 'cease' (so BDB). (AV's 'that they shall not take shame' is no truer to the Heb. grammar than this latter rendering, and does not fit in with the context as well.) 7 Should this be said (cf. RV) understands the Hebrew he'āmûr as a question, but it could also be, 'The one who is called'. Cf. AV's 'O thou that art named' (so Keil). Or else he'āmûr could mean, 'That which is spoken' (so Kleinert, who inserts ' "in" the house of Israel'). Is the Spirit of the Lord impatient? (Heb. qāṣar, lit. 'is short'; rendered 'straitened' in AV and RV). The question here implies a negative: God's Spirit is certainly not impatient. Are these his doings? refers to His deeds of punishment, which are not His characteristic or congenial dealings with His covenant people, Israel. Normally His words have a benevolent intention towards them, as they lead a righteous life.

8 But you rise against my people as an enemy implies reading Hebrew eṯmûl as a compound preposition, 'against', or else as attem le-, 'Ye against . . .'. AV's 'of late' (so RV) implies equating eṯmûl with eṯmôl, 'yesterday' or 'recently', which is far more likely. Render: 'But of late My people rise up as an enemy (sc. against Me).' Their crime is, 'You strip the broad-dress-cloak (Heb. 'eḏer) from off (mimmûl) the upper-garment (śalmâ, a by-form of śimlâ) from those who pass by trustingly, turning away from war' (i.e. peaceably disposed). The RSV rendering implies several changes in the Hebrew text. Presumably they committed this robbery against travellers or strangers passing through their territory, in blatant disregard of the Torah (cf. Ex. 22:21). 9 The ruthless mortgage-holders expel widows and orphans from their homes, and deprive these children of their dignity and glory as members of the commonwealth of Israel by selling them into life-long slavery to foreign owners in heathen lands, to secure payment for their loans to the helpless survivors of the deceased. This means depriving Yahweh of His glory, for they belong to Him. 10 The ungodly Hebrews are bidden to leave and go off into captivity, for the Holy Land cannot bear the defilement of their abominable crimes. 11 Literally, 'If a man walking in vanity (lit. according to wind) and falsehood should lie: "I will preach (or prate, prophesy) to you with reference to wine and strong drink", then he would be the preacher of this people.' These false prophets stand ready to preach a popular message of earthly blessings and sensual enjoyment, disregarding completely the spiritual and moral conditions necessary for any lasting prosperity and safety as a nation.

2:12, 13 The eventual regathering of the dispersed of Judah

In contrast to that false message of carnal security, the Lord has a true word of encouragement to the remnant of sincere believers who still heed His revelation. 12 Israel's hope is not to be found in any immediate political success or moral reformation; her apostasy has gone too far under King Ahaz for anything but temporary respites under Hezekiah and Josiah. But her future is bound up with the minority of true believers who will remain faithful to God through the coming ordeals of military disaster and captivity. I will surely gather (rather than AV's 'assemble') all of you, O Jacob, i.e. the remnant of Israel . . . 'as the sheep of Bozrah'. (RSV's sheep in a fold assumes a noun boṣrâ, meaning 'fold', for which there is no real evidence and which never occurs elsewhere. The town of Bozrah in Edom was a well-known sheep-raising centre.) A noisy multitude of man lacks textual support. 'They shall make a land noise from (i.e. by reason of) men': i.e. the remnant returning to Palestine will become a large multitude under the care of the divine Shepherd.

13 He who opens the breach (AV 'the breaker'), from pāraṣ, 'make a breach through a wall', refers to God as Deliverer of His people from the prison-house of Babylonian captivity. (It first appeared as a Messianic title in Ob. 21, back in the 9th century.) Probably their king also refers to Yahweh or His Messiah. This promise, then, is an encouraging revelation from God, rather than the vain optimism of some unnamed false prophet (as Ewald, Kleinert and Orelli suppose).

3:1–4 The government devours its people instead of defending them

Keil regards this as the commencement of a separate address by the prophet; yet the chapter begins with the Hebrew connective wᵉ- which means 'and' or 'but'. 1 And I said: Hear, you heads of Jacob introduces an address to the ruling classes of government and society in Judah under the rule of Ahaz. 2, 3 They who have been entrusted with the faithful administration of justice and the carrying out of God's law have used their power only for injustice and the heartless exploitation of the governed. They are like cannibals who prey upon their brethren, as things rather than as people, mercilessly devouring all their substance like ravenous beasts and reducing them to absolute destitution, starvation and death. Is it not for you to know justice? (Hebrew mišpāṭ ('justice') is the application of the principles of righteousness to concrete situations, as administrative decisions are made or judgments are rendered in the lawcourts.) They have not simply been deflected by considerations of expediency or personal gain; they have taken up arms against justice and conceived a bitter hatred for goodness and virtue.

4 When the coming judgment befalls the nation, and invaders threaten to destroy all their possessions or even their very lives, these leaders of Israel will look in vain to Yahweh for deliverance, 'according as (which is better for Heb. kaʾašer than because) they have made their deeds evil'. Because they have turned their back on God's law, He will turn His back on their cry for help (as it turned out later in 587 BC).

5 The unscrupulous governors and judges have received support and encouragement from the venal clergy, the popular prophets who preach messages of false reassurance and optimism to those who pay them well. But those who are of no financial benefit to them or who exert no influence in their favour become the objects of their scathing condemnation. RSV without justification omits 'who bite with their teeth' after who lead my people astray. The Hebrew word for 'bite', incidentally, is nāšak, which is ordinarily used of the bite of a serpent. Instead of being men of God and standing out against the sins of the people, these faithless prophets have become professionalistic career men who cherish only worldly values. 6, 7 Literally, 'Therefore night unto you away from (or, without) vision.' Here, as in Am. 5:18 and Zp. 1:15 the darkening of the sky symbolizes terrible judgment and despair. The seers (ḥōzîm) and diviners (qōsᵉmîm; a class of soothsayers strictly forbidden for Israel by Dt. 18:14) will become completely discredited and humiliated in the coming day of national emergency, because they will be utterly unable to tell their countrymen what is going to happen. God will grant them no revelation whatever, despite their most anguished entreaties. They shall all cover their lips by covering up their faces up to the nose, a customary gesture of mourning and despair in ancient Israel (cf. Lv. 13:45; Ezk. 24:17).

8 In contrast to these false prophets with their self-invented messages, Micah, for all his unpopularity and outdated emphasis on righteousness and justice, nevertheless has one quality that they lack. He is filled with power by God's Holy Spirit, for what he says is the truth of God, not the speculation of man. With the authority of a herald from the king he proclaims God's judgment upon guilty Israel. He has no time for dialogue with scholars of differing theological insights, but what he foretells has power behind it, for it actually comes to pass. Rather than going along with the fashionable new morality, Micah thunders forth the sanctions of the unaltered and unalterable Ten Commandments and pronounces 'guilty and condemned' upon his countrymen, for all their suave sophistication, and makes them tremble.

3:9–12 Utter destruction impends for all three: rulers, priests and prophets

9, 10 Hear this is better rendered, 'Pray hear this' (since the Heb. precative -nāʾ is used here). The utter perversity of Israel's rulers is here stressed, as defenders against crime who have themselves become criminals, and who imagine that they can build security for themselves and their state upon a foundation of 'bloodshed' (more accurate for the plural dāmîm than blood, which is the singular dām). Who build implies the Hebrew bōnê instead of bōneh (which probably means 'one is building'); but the LXX, Targum and Syriac Versions seem to support bōnê (lit. 'builders of'). 11 The judges had the sacred responsibility of rendering decisions impartially, not influenced by personal motives, but these judges were willing to sell their verdict to the highest bidder. The priests were required to give instruction concerning God's law (Lv. 10:11; Dt. 17:11; 33:10), but these priests demanded a fee, which meant that their services were not available to the poor. Yet they have the effrontery to claim God's protection and care, simply because His Temple was in their midst; on that account they suppose that He is obliged to safeguard them from evil, no matter how wickedly they live.

12 On the contrary, because of their flagrant ungodliness God will not only withdraw His protection from them against their heathen foes, but He will see to it that the holy Temple (which they suppose He is obliged to defend) is reduced to rubble, and the sacred precinct to a ploughed field, or a neglected hill overgrown with trees. (Cf. Je. 26:18, 19, where this verse is quoted verbatim, with the added information that Ahaz's son, Hezekiah, trembled at these words and besought the Lord's mercy to defer imposing this dreadful judgment upon Jerusalem.) It is interesting to observe that in later times, even after the return from Babylon, Mt. Zion was apparently left outside the city walls, and still is to this day, for it was dug down and deprived of defensive value in the 2nd century BC and the name 'Zion' was later transferred to the south-western eminence of the Upper City.

4:1 – 5:15 THE ULTIMATE TRIUMPH OF GOD'S GRACE TOWARDS ISRAEL

4:1–8 The triumph of the Messianic kingdom over the Gentile world

The first three verses of this chapter are nearly identical with Is. 2:2–4. It may have been that the same revelation was granted to both prophets at about the same time; it is hardly likely that one would have copied from the other.

1a In the latter days is literally 'at the end of the days', an expression used by the prophets to refer to the last days, or the times of the Messiah (cf. Je. 23:20; Ezk. 38:16; Ho. 3:5). If this was a symbolic vision, Micah may have seen Mt. Moriah lifted up above all other mountains on earth, but the import of this symbol was surely the exaltation of the kingdom of God to a supreme position above all the kingdoms of this earth. As the highest of the mountains; more accurately, as RV, 'on top of the mountains'. 1b, 2 Peoples . . . many nations (Heb. gôyîm), i.e. Gentiles, shall come to God's kingdom, His holy Mt. Zion, which symbolizes the uniquely authoritative revelation of God through the Scriptures. Flow. They will come, not merely as individual proselytes, but like a flowing river (the verb translated flow is the same root as nāhār, 'river') in order to be taught by Yahweh concerning His saving truth, so that they may lead God-pleasing, God-serving lives. For out of Zion shall go forth the law and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem. These Gentile converts will recognize God's revelation from the altar and the ark of the covenant as uniquely authoritative. They will embrace the gospel and the sacrifice of Christ on their behalf, and His salvation will become known throughout the Gentile world.

3 He shall judge between many people; i.e. He shall become the absolute Arbiter for all moral and ethical questions among all the nations of the earth. But this is so reinforced by the next clause (and shall decide—or 'reprove', or 'exercise the judge's office'—for strong nations afar off) that an established sovereignty of Christ upon earth is clearly suggested, beyond anything which now obtains in this present church age. For when He assumes this supreme and effective authority among the nations of the earth, then a warless society will commence: they shall beat their swords into ploughshares. Under His rule men will turn their energies from manufacturing weapons of war to tools of fruitful production, and the nations shall not learn war any more. Clearly this points beyond this present age to a future era when Christ will have complete control here on earth (there would be no employment for ploughshares or pruning-hooks in heaven!) and the uninterrupted peace and harmony of the millennium will prevail all over the world. No nation will lift up a sword against any other nation. 4 Accompanying this universal peace will be universal security and prosperity: every man under his vine and under his fig tree, and none shall make them afraid. This indicates that the final world order will not be any kind of socialist or Marxist state ownership of all property, but every man will remain undisturbed in the enjoyment of his own personal property. (Cf. 1 Ki. 4:25 where this ideal condition is said to have obtained for a time, at least, during the prosperous, well-ordered reign of Solomon. This v. 4, incidentally, was not included in Isaiah's form of this revelation.)

5 Comforted and encouraged by this assurance of the ultimate triumph of God's truth and grace, Micah and his fellow-believers express a new confidence and commitment to Yahweh: For all the (non-Israelite) peoples walk each in the name of its god, but we will walk in the name of the Lord our God for ever. To walk in the name of a deity means to live in conformity to the will and character of the one whom they serve. The name of God includes all His self-disclosures to His believers, all that by which He makes Himself known. 6 In that day points to the future age of Messianic fulfilment once more. In the coming age of the restoration of God's people, the lame and those whom I have afflicted will come back to God; i.e. those who are lame and wretched in soul, miserable because of the chastening of the Lord and the afflictions of exile. 7 And yet it is these who, confessing themselves to be spiritually crippled and in need, make up the remnant of true, repentant believers among national Israel. After their conversion to Christ He will assume the throne and reign over them directly and personally, and on a permanent basis, from this time forth and for evermore. 8 The hill (Heb. 'ōpel) of Zion was apparently the southern end of the eminence of Zion (which lay due south of Mt. Moriah). It was fortified by a great tower, probably in the reign of Jotham, Hezekiah's grandfather (2 Ch. 27:3). It is here termed the tower of the flock because from it the dynasty of David watched protectively over the flock of Israel, just like a watch-tower erected by shepherds to keep an eye on predatory beasts or human poachers who might endanger their sheep. Cf. 7:14, where Israel is represented as the sheep of Yahweh's inheritance.

4:9–13 First must come suffering, exile, restoration, and judgment upon Israel's foes

9, 10 The prophet reverts to the present situation. Because of Judah's unfaithfulness and apostasy, the kingdom will be bereft of effective leadership by David's descendants. Lacking a king with God's blessing and power to support him, having no leader who had access to God's will and plan (as David did) and could be their wise counsellor, the commonwealth is reduced to utmost anguish (like the physical anguish of a woman in labour). Inexorably the chastening judgment of God closes in upon them, their city is destroyed and their land laid waste, and their survivors are driven off into captivity in a foreign land. Amazingly enough, the prophet foretells the land of their captivity: not Assyria (which was then mistress of the Middle East), but Babylon, which in Micah's day was only a subject province of Assyria. As in the case of Micah's contemporary, Isaiah, supernatural revelation disclosed 130 years in advance the triumph of the Chaldean power under Nebuchadrezzar. More than that, it also foretold the eventual release of the captives and their return to the land of promise, which was fulfilled under Zerubbabel and Jeshua in 538 BC. Commentators who resist this evidence of predictive prophecy are compelled by their own presuppositions to classify this verse as a later insertion, and they are nearly unanimous in doing so. Groan (Heb. gōḥî) rests upon a purely conjectural emendation; it should be rendered 'burst forth' (of the expulsion of the foetus from the womb, from the verb gûaḥ). AV's 'labour to bring forth' is quite justified.

11 The scene is depicted of the gathering of Nebuchadrezzar's Chaldean and allied troops encircling besieged Jerusalem in 588 BC (2 Ki. 24:1f.) and planning to plunder and destroy not only the city itself but the Temple on Mt. Moriah as well. Let our eyes gaze upon Zion is a literal rendering of the Hebrew, but in actual usage the verbs 'to see' (rā'ah) and (as here) 'gaze at' (ḥāzâ), when followed by the preposition b^{e}-, always implies a keen satisfaction in the heart of the beholder, and usually a malicious or spiteful satisfaction. Render: 'May our eye gloat over Zion!' 12 Little do these exultant troops of Nebuchadrezzar realize that they are only being used as instruments of Yahweh. But here their own doom is foretold in such a way as to suggest that these Chaldean forces prophetically symbolize the combined armies of the world powers that will converge upon Jerusalem in the last days (cf. Zc. 14:1–3), only to be completely crushed and annihilated by God's special intervention, as sheaves of grain are trampled out by oxen on the threshing-floor. Some commentators regard Sennacherib's invasion in 701 BC as the fulfilment of this, but their disaster did not occur near Jerusalem, nor did it involve a crushing military defeat, as this implies. 13 The agents for the destruction of Jerusalem's besiegers will apparently be the daughter of Zion, for it is she who will do the 'threshing' with hoofs of bronze (symbolic of the irresistible hardness of their destructive force) and equipped with iron horns (for the horn was a customary figure for offensive power, like the lowered horns of a charging bull). The Hebrew text makes the Lord Himself the subject of devote: 'and I will devote their gain unto the Lord' (RV mg.). The LXX, Syriac and Vulgate support the RSV emendation of haḥ^{a}ramtî to haḥ^{a}rmt, 'you (feminine singular) will devote', yet it should be noted that God is occasionally quoted in the OT as referring to Himself in the third person, as here. In other words, victorious Israel will not appropriate the spoil of its heathen foes to her own use, but lay it all under the ban (ḥērem), as Joshua did in the case of Jericho (cf. Jos. 6:17–19). Yahweh will therefore sanctify the wealth of the fallen foe to Himself by its complete destruction.

5:1–6 The divine-human Victor will defend His flock and destroy the world powers

1 is numbered as 4:14 in the Hebrew Bible, but improperly so, since this verse introduces a new movement in the thought: the coming of the Messiah. Translate (with RV), 'Now shalt thou gather thyself in troops, O daughter of troops' (RSV's Now you are walled about with a wall involves extensive and unwarranted emendations of the Hebrew text). Besieged Jerusalem gathers its various detachments and troops of defenders (hence its title here baṭ g^{e}dûḏ, 'daughter of a troop') in the great national crisis which now looms up (presumably the assault of Nebuchadrezzar's armies in 587)—the word now ('attâ) here indicates a new point in time—the preliminary series of events leading up to the advent of Christ. As the ruler of Israel (i.e. her executive head) is to be smitten on the cheek, he will be defeated and crushed (as Zedekiah was by the Chaldeans, 2 Ki. 24). Possibly the defeat of the Jewish king, Aristobulus II, by Pompey's forces in 63 BC is also had in view. 2 In contrast to this vanquished king of Israel, a new ruler is to rise over God's people, and He is going to come from a town almost too small to be included among the 1,000-family towns of Judah, namely Bethlehem (which for the sake of added solemnity is here addressed by its ancient name of Ephrath or Ephrathah (cf. Gn. 35:19; Ru. 1:1, 2) meaning, perhaps, 'Fruitful'). RSV renders 'al^{e}pê by 'clans of', rather than 'thousands of' (RV), but even though this is a possible rendering for 'elep̄, it does not seem appropriate as a term for a municipal unit. This new ruler from Bethlehem is no mere human being, for His origin (better, as RV, 'goings forth', since môṣā' ōṯāyw is plural) has been from the remotest age, from ancient days (AV and RV retain 'from everlasting'). This phrase, y^{e}mê 'ôlām, means literally 'the days of the age', and is elsewhere used of the earliest beginnings of human history (Dt. 32:7f.), or of the days of Moses and Joshua (Is. 63:9), or even of the time of David (Am. 9:11). In Mi. 7:14 it refers to the time of David. When used without yᵉmê, ʿôlām may mean 'eternity'. Cf. Ps. 90:2 where mēʿôlām ('from eternity') refers to beginningless eternity. But with 'days of' it refers only to antiquity. In the present context, therefore, it views the Messiah's ancestry as reaching back to the early founders of Israel, the promises and predictions of Him as dating from the earliest times, and Himself as pre-existing the actual date of His appearing.

3 Since this Ruler is to redeem God's people in due time, Yahweh will give up the Israelites to disciplinary judgments in order to prepare them for His coming. He will be brought forth by a woman who will give birth. She who is in travail (yôlēḏâ; cf. Is. 7:14) is probably the virgin Mary, although it may possibly refer to the nation Israel. His brethren as a believing remnant (the rest of, yeṯer) will return to Him from the captivity of sin and judgment. In the first instance the Jews who would be converted to the Christian faith, although possibly also the Gentile believers (children of Abraham by faith, cf. the 'sheep . . . not of this fold', Jn. 10:16), are intended. 4 As the good Shepherd, Christ will feed His flock on the bread of life, defending them from the malice and deceit of Satan, guaranteeing them an eternal security (Jn. 10:28), and extending His saving power to the ends of the earth as the church carries out the great commission. 5 Christ will constitute the peace and welfare of His people as they come under the attack of their foes, who are (very appropriately for Micah's time) represented by the Assyrian, but doubtless this term here includes all the future enemies of Israel and the church: the Seleucid Syrians, the Romans, the Inquisition, the Modernists and the Marxists. All these will be checked and repulsed by Spirit-empowered leaders: the Maccabean patriots, the apostles, Athanasius, Augustine, Wycliffe and Luther, and whoever else would be needed to preserve the community of true believers from conquest or extinction. The number seven represents the full and perfect work of God, and would be quite sufficient, but one more (eight) is added to ensure that there will be more than enough to furnish the proper leadership against all assailants. Instead of upon our soil, which rests upon a reading of the LXX and Syriac, RV reads, 'shall tread in our palaces', which faithfully renders the Hebrew text, and fits in perfectly well with the context.

6 The tone of this verse is more definitely eschatological, and lends support to the view that v. 5 may also refer to the conflict of the last days and the overthrow of the world powers at Armageddon. They shall rule (rāʿâ means 'govern the flock as a shepherd') with the sword would seem to point to the imposition of Christ's authority by force as His millennial kingdom is established. Assyria, symbolic of the area formerly held by the hostile world power, was called the land of Nimrod because he was the original founder of historic Assyria (Gn. 10:8–11). Render with RV, 'and he shall deliver us', referring to Christ's irresistible power at His second coming. There is no textual warrant for RSV's they shall deliver, nor for its substitution of the drawn sword for the 'in the entrances therefore' of the Hebrew text.

7 The remnant (šeʾērîṯ) of true believers in Israel will bring showers of refreshment and blessing (the liberating truths of Christ's gospel) to the many peoples of Gentile mankind, and that on the initiative of God rather than of man. 8 In the last days the Lord's battle champions will carry the field before them, and the destruction of the enemy (at Armageddon; cf. Rev. 16:16) will be irresistible and complete. 9 Shall be lifted up ignores the jussive form of the verb tārōm. Render with RV, 'Let thine hand be lifted up above'; so also, 'and let all thine enemies be cut off'. This is a summons of encouragement to God's victorious people in the day of final conflict. 10, 11 This victory by the Israel of God will not be accomplished through any human strength or military resources; all their horses and chariots (or the latter-day military equivalents of horses and chariots) and fortifications will be stripped away from them before they spring upon the astonished foe (like an unarmed Samson upon the Philistines) and utterly crush them.

12–14 God's people will also be purged of all idolatry and heresy before that day of triumph comes. Every form and type of idol is here enumerated in 8th-century BC terms: cultic pillars (AV's 'standing images'), or stone uprights which represented the male god on the pagan 'high places'; and the Asherim (AV's 'groves'), or cultic wooden pillars representing the female consort of the male god. Note the indication that astrology and spiritism will be especially rampant in the degenerate 'post-Christian' society of the last days. 15 The wrath of God will pour out irreversible judgment in that final day upon the rebellious world, a destruction far transcending anything that history has ever recorded (cf. Rev. 16).

6:1–5 Israel summoned to repent, recalling God's mercy at the Exodus

This chapter contains a separate discourse, which is generally thought to be addressed to the northern kingdom of Israel in the declining years of Hoshea's reign (730–722 BC; 2 Ki. 17), because of the reference to Omri and Ahab in v. 16. Yet there was a sense in which the malign influence of Ahab's dynasty infected Judah as well, through his daughter Athaliah, queen of Judah (841–835 BC; 2 Ki. 11), whose example of Baalism helped to prepare the way for the apostasy of Ahaz (743–728 BC; 2 Ki. 14). Therefore these admonitions were intended for the southern kingdom as well.

1, 2 The mountains and hills (referred to as the enduring foundations) have witnessed God's abiding mercies to Israel ever since the Exodus and conquest; hence they are appropriately invoked here (as in Is. 1:2 and elsewhere) as Yahweh remonstrates with His covenant people for their ingratitude and faithlessness. 3, 4 They have treated the Lord as if He had been guilty of injustice towards them; yet they cannot cite any wrong He has done to them except perhaps His loading them with undeserved benefits and mercifully delivering from all their dangers and foes since the days of Moses and Aaron, whom He sent to lead from Egyptian bondage to the land of promise. 5 They should remember how God turned the malignity of Balak King of Moab into their benefit, as the prophet Balaam, whom he had hired to curse them, was compelled to pronounce their blessing and triumph over all their foes, while they were encamped at Shittim (Nu. 22–24). RSV supplies the words and what happened (cf. RV 'remember') before from Shittim to Gilgal; the Hebrew text is elliptical here, apparently (although AV is content to render it quite literally as it stands). Saving acts is too inexact and interpretative for ṣiḏᵉqôṯ Yahweh, 'the righteous acts of the Lord' (cf. RV).

6:6–16 Response to repentant Israel: valid worship must be accompanied by a godly life

6, 7 The prophet imagines the idolatrous Israelites moved to fear and repentance by his warnings (as some of them doubtless were; cf. Je. 26:18, 19, at least in Judah), and they show a basic misconception of the purpose of sacrificial worship as they propose to buy God's mercy and favour by lavish and extravagant sacrifice: thousands of rams, with ten thousands of rivers of oil, going far beyond anything specified in the law of Moses. They even offer to appease His wrath by the pagan practice of infant-sacrifice (as followed by the kings of Israel and by Ahaz of Judah cf. 2 Ki. 16:3; 17:17), even though this was sternly denounced in the Pentateuch as an abomination to Yahweh (e.g. Lv. 18:21; Dt. 18:10; cf. Gn. 22). But they, of course, have long since 'outgrown' and therefore neglected the Holy Scriptures in their search for an up-to-date and 'relevant' theology, and would therefore ignore Ex. 13:13 as they contemplated reconciliation with God.

8 This prophetic answer to those who seek to bypass true repentance and self-surrender by lavish gifts to the Lord is a stern but loving reminder that valid sacrifice and acceptable worship must include a presentation of their own bodies as living sacrifices to Him. 'Be holy, for I am the Lord your God.' It would be a gross misinterpretation of this verse, a violent wrenching of the text out of its context, to construe this as a mere pronouncement that the whole point of religion is a virtuous life, without the need of atonement or of faith in God's revealed word. On the contrary, it is a reminder to those who are under the covenant that God requires a true and living faith which manifests itself by obedience and love. The Israelites are addressed as O man, not in any universalistic sense that would include unbelieving pagans the world over, but only as mere human beings ('ādām) standing before the infinite and eternal God. A true and living faith, then, will be evidenced by a will, firstly, to carry out justice (mišpāṭ) in accordance with the principles of Scripture revealed as God's will: secondly to love kindness, or 'steadfast love', i.e. the covenant loyalty and covenant love (ḥeseḏ) which involves honouring the commitment of loyalty and love subsisting between husband and wife, parent and child, subject and king, and, most especially, between the believer and his God; and, thirdly, to walk humbly (lit. 'making humble to walk') with (or in fellowship with) the Lord Himself, in utter dependence upon His enablement to lead a godly life, and in full recognition of the total lack of personal ability or merit which might furnish a base for pride or self-justification. This last verse, by the way, is quoted from Dt. 10:12, or is at least a paraphrase of it.

9–11 These verses contain many unwarranted textual corrections in the RSV; it is safer to follow RV in rendering, 'Hear (or, give heed to) the rod (maṭṭeh, which may also mean 'tribe', although it hardly does so here), and Him who appoints it.' I.e. give heed to the warning of disciplinary judgment, and the God who has appointed it to be used for the chastening and correction of His people. Likewise read, 'Are there still treasures of wickedness', rather than RSV's completely unfounded Can I forget the treasures . . . ? Also (v. 11) the correct translation of the Hebrew text is 'Shall I be pure with . . . ?' (the repentant Israelite is here speaking), rather than Shall I acquit the man with . . . ? (which implies that God is speaking, but requires reading 'azakkeh rather than 'ezkeh). These verses teach that God is the faithful Protector and Enforcer of the moral law, and no-one who has failed to make restitution for sin can possibly hope for His forgiveness and favour. 12, 13 Because Micah's countrymen have abandoned the biblical standards of morality and have given themselves over to dishonesty and deceit, God has brought calamity and disaster upon them in order to bring them to repentance.

14, 15 The Lord promises depression to their agricultural economy, and consequent shortages and famine, later to be followed by invasion and slaughter at the hands of the enemy. For RSV's there shall be hunger, RV has 'thy humiliation shall be in the midst of thee'. The word here, yešaḥ, is uncertain; for it occurs nowhere else in the OT. BDB suggests that it means 'emptiness', which would favour the RSV rendering. 16 For you have kept the statutes assumes an unnecessary alteration of the text. RV is preferable, 'For the statutes of Omri are kept'. The statutes of Omri included unbridled wickedness and Baal-worship (cf. 1 Ki. 16:25); the works of the house of Ahab involved the slaughter of God's prophets and of citizens like Naboth who stood in the way of his greed (1 Ki. 16:29 onwards). For the scorn of the peoples read 'the scorn of my people' (cf. RV), i.e. the shame which God's people will have to bear as they go down to defeat and are carried off captive by the Chaldeans.

7:1–20 COVENANT PROMISES WILL BE FULFILLED TO THE FAITHFUL REMNANT

7:1–6 True Israel laments the sins of selfishness and corruption

Here the prophet speaks, not in his own name, but in the name of spiritual Israel, which confesses and deplores its rebellion against God.

1 Backslidden and disobedient believers mourn over their fruitlessness, like some field or orchard from which the crops and fruits have been removed, or a vine bereft of all its grapes. 2 Israelite society has so degenerated morally that the old-fashioned virtues of integrity and honesty have all but disappeared, and crime and gang warfare run rampant in the cities. The net was used in traps to catch unwary birds or beasts; hence it stands for malicious craftiness which seeks to overreach and defraud one's neighbour. 3 They are all eager to make a dishonest living, and the administration (prince) and judiciary are both honeycombed with corruption, so that wealthy criminals can buy protection. 4 A thorn hedge. RSV has omitted any attempt to translate the preposition min ('from', 'than') prefixed to this word. RV reads min as 'worse than a thorn hedge'. The Hebrew text reads 'your watchmen' rather than their watchmen, and 'your punishment' rather than their punishment (so RV). The watchmen are of course God's prophets, who have denounced and warned their backsliding countrymen in vain, until the threatened disasters overtake them. They fall into confusion or 'perplexity' (RV) because they have lost their wager that divine justice would not catch up with them, and they cannot now turn to God for deliverance after they have all their lives despised or ignored Him. 5 So thorough and pervasive is the general depravity that no one can trust anyone else, not even the members of the same family: here we see the breakdown of the home.

7:7–10 True Israel will continue trusting in God's mercy

7 The repentant remnant now turn with horror from the morass of sin into which their nation has fallen, and cast themselves wholly upon God, whose promises never fail. They look to Him to deliver them somehow from the dreadful judgments that are to befall their people. 8 Israel's foes have already counted her out and expect her complete extinction; but they reckon without Israel's God, who knows how to rescue His faithful remnant from destruction even through national disaster and the Babylonian captivity. He still has a future for His covenant people, which He will reveal in due time. 9 Because this believing remnant perceives Yahweh's faithfulness and consistency in fulfilling all His promises of punishment for apostasy, they can trust Him to deal with their foes and oppressors in His own time and way. Deliverance is more accurately 'righteousness' (RV), here in the specific sense of promise-keeping righteousness with redemptive results. 10 Thus the cynical scepticism of the worldly wise, who spurn the revelation of Holy Scripture and despise the biblical faith, and who jeer at those who are simple-minded enough to embrace it, will be shown up to be tragic folly. As Assyria and Babylon each in turn fell beneath the blows of their invaders and were trampled in the mire of their own streets, so it will be with every world power, or system of religion or philosophy that raises itself up against the God of Scripture, Not so much because of malice but because of joy that God has vindicated His own righteousness and truth, the remnant are pictured here as looking with pleasure upon the fall of the apostate and the God-blaspheming heathen.

7:11–20 The triumph of Christ through the church age and the millennium

11 The walls of God's kingdom are to be built, and its boundary (ḥōq) will become extended (yirḥaq) beyond the diminutive area of Palestine, where it was confined before Christ's coming. Others interpret ḥōq ('prescription, statute, ordinance') to refer to the restrictive law of Moses, which will be 'removed' (yirḥaq) when the gospel is proclaimed to the Gentiles. But rāḥaq occurs nowhere else with such a passive meaning. 12 To Egypt should rather be, with RV, 'and the cities of Egypt' (implying 'ārê instead of RSV's 'adê). From all over the earth converts to the true faith will come to the Lord and join themselves with believing Israel. 13 After this ingathering of converts will come the terrible destruction of the tribulation and the last days, as a judgment upon the wickedness of mankind.

14 After this destruction of the rebellious world powers the good Shepherd will personally take control as Defender of Christian Israel, fulfilling for them all of the promises of God concerning a prosperous and undisturbed enjoyment of the entire territory promised to Abraham and his seed, all the way from Mt. Carmel in the west (so render garden land, Heb. karmel) to Bashan and Gilead in the east (i.e. Transjordania), as in the days of old (yᵉmê 'ôlām), i.e. the time of David and Solomon. 15 For the re-establishment of this millennial kingdom of Israel the Lord will spare no miracles of intervention necessary for the purpose, just as He had done back in the days of the Exodus. 16 All the Gentile nations will be reduced to impotence before this display of divine power, and will surrender unconditionally to Yahweh's reign, so that Christ's empire will extend over all the earth.

18–20 Lifted up to a pinnacle of joyous thanksgiving by this disclosure of the ultimate triumph of God's grace, the prophet breaks into a paean of praise. He adores God for His pardoning grace and steadfast love (or 'loving-kindness', Heb. ḥeseḏ; cf. on 6:8) in language reminiscent of Ex. 34:6, 7. Yahweh's forgiveness will mean the complete removal of sin and guilt, so that He will remember them no more. Thus He will fulfil completely all of His gracious promises to Abraham and the patriarchs of old, without compromising His holiness or tarnishing His glory. On this triumphant note these remarkable prophecies come to a close.

Nahum

INTRODUCTION

THE DATE

The prophecy of Nahum anticipates the fall of Nineveh. The prophet speaks of the fall of the city with a clarity and an intimacy which suggests that the event is almost immediate. This would date the prophecy of Nahum shortly before the fall of the city in 612 BC. The prophet also mentions the sack of Thebes (3:8) as an accomplished fact. This city was pillaged by King Ashurbanipal of Assyria in 663 BC. The prophecy may therefore be dated between these two events. Another small piece of internal evidence suggests that the date may be fixed more precisely as being shortly after the Josianic reformation of 621 BC. There is one reference (1:15) which suggests that the importance of observing religious ceremonies was fresh in the minds of the people of Judah at this time. We may therefore tentatively place the prophecy between 621 and 612 BC. The prophet was therefore a contemporary of Zephaniah, Habakkuk and Jeremiah.

THE MAN

The writer is described as 'Nahum of Elkosh'. The name Nahum means 'consolation', 'comfort', or 'relief'. While the primary message of Nahum is the impending doom of Nineveh, a necessary consequence of the fall of the Assyrian tyrant was the relief of the oppressed Judah. In that sense, the message of Nahum justified the name of the prophet. He had no word of judgment or of condemnation for his own people, but only of comfort. He declares in the name of the Lord, 'Though I have afflicted you, I will afflict you no more. And now I will break his yoke from off you and will burst your bonds asunder' (1:12, 13).

The title of the prophet indicates that he was closely connected with a locality known as Elkosh. Of the four locations suggested for this place—Elkasch, a little village of Galilee; Capernaum in Galilee; Alqush near Mosul in Assyria; and Elcesei, a village of Judah—the last is the least difficult. Nahum may therefore have come from Judah and have delivered his prophecies in Jerusalem, perhaps in the Temple itself.

HIS MESSAGE

The primary note of Nahum's message is 'Vengeance is mine, I will repay, says the Lord'. 'The Lord is a jealous God and avenging' (1:2). The word 'jealous' here means the zeal, or the intense feeling, of God towards His enemies. Nahum apprehended and declared with passionate insistence the one truth that the wrath of God is provoked by wickedness. He bears long with men, but His anger is eventually aroused. Then He punishes those who have provoked Him. He strikes and makes an utter end. The wrath of God is terrible and inescapable. He who divides the storm-darkened sky with spears of lightning and cracks the rocks is an awful adversary. Puny man is nothing before Him. Men may take counsel with themselves. They may say, 'We are strong. Who can throw us down?' God will deal with them. No matter how strong they may be, no matter how many helpers they may have, God will inflict upon them a death-blow. There have been others stronger than they. These were overthrown. So shall the enemies of God always be overthrown.

Nahum singles out two sins in particular for denunciation. There is first the sin of ruthless military power. As a result of this evil, blood is shed in rivers, nations are annihilated, institutions are destroyed, and war is waged with every kind of ferocity (2:11–13). The track of Assyrian conquerors, e.g. Ashurnasirpal, was marked by impalements, by pyramids of human heads, and by other barbarities too horrible to be described. Of the people who so violate the decencies of human life, it is declared, 'Behold I am against you, says the Lord of hosts.'

The other sin which Nahum denounces is unscrupulous commerce. The surrounding nations are corrupted so that they may minister to the luxuries and vices of the conquering city. Merchants, motivated by greed for gold, sell their wares in a city lusting for fine things. Morality and honesty are allowed to perish so that wealth may be acquired and pleasures enjoyed (3:1–4).

To his own people Nahum declares that messengers with good tidings are already on their way. As an expression of gratitude for the destruction of the oppressor, the people of Judah are to observe the religious seasons and scrupulously to discharge the obligations of their faith (1:15).

HIS SIGNIFICANCE AS A PROPHET

Like Cato, the Roman senator, who closed every speech in the senate with the words Carthago delenda est ('Carthage must be destroyed'), Nahum is dominated by one idea, Nineve delenda est. His gaze is fixed on Nineveh and her sins, almost to the exclusion of all else. His heart and prophecy are full of exultation at the thought of the vengeance which is coming upon her. He has little to say of the inwardness of true religion. He does not call for a personal and national return to righteousness, rather than the observance of religious fasts, as does Amos (Am. 4:4, 5). He does not seek to win his own people with the tenderness of Micah (Mi. 6:3). He does not warn Judah that she also will be judged, as Zephaniah warns her (Zp. 1:4). He does not proclaim mercy for all men, even for Nineveh, with the breadth of vision and the wide charity of the book of Jonah. He sees only the evil-doing of Nineveh and her doom, and he believes that this doom will result in deliverance for Judah. He does not pause to require from his own nation the moral standard which he so sternly demanded from others. For this reason, some scholars have regarded Nahum as a type of the 'false' prophet, and have argued that his ethics are poor. It has been said that he is narrow and nationalistic in his outlook; that he proclaims judgment on Nineveh, and leaves his own people with the impression that, provided they observe the worship of Yahweh, all will be well with them. It might even be said that Nahum was like the prophet Hananiah, the opponent of Jeremiah, who spoke peace to his people where there was no peace for them (Je. 28).

But this is to do Nahum less than justice. There are reasons for the apparent limitations of Nahum's message. The date at which his prophecy was composed may help to explain his apparent lack of concern over the sins of his own people, his omission of their moral and spiritual obligations, and his seeming lack of charity towards Nineveh itself. If the prophecy were composed just before 612 BC (the fall of Nineveh), then it was not long after the Josianic reformation (621 BC). It is true that Jeremiah saw that the reforms were not sufficient; but possibly at the time of his prophecy, indications were still favourable enough for Nahum to have felt that the nation was now on the right road. The disillusionment brought about by Josiah's untimely death in 609 BC had not yet taken place, and the relief felt at the impending destruction of Nineveh was for Nahum the over-riding consideration. Equally, however, it should not be overlooked that 1:1–8, e.g., while it belongs to 'the oracle concerning Nineveh', is couched in general terms and makes no direct reference to Assyrian misdeeds. Its clear reminiscence of such passages as Ex. 34:6, 7, and Dt. 4:24 means that the applicability of its truth to the covenant people themselves is direct and inescapable. Nahum would thus not altogether lack a moral and spiritual message to his countrymen.

The prophecy of Nahum has been well called 'the cry of an outraged conscience'. It is a passionate assertion that justice in its stern retribution will prevail. This truth he declares with insistence. He proclaims its moral necessity. He envisages its accomplishment with unrivalled lucidity. He foresees the completeness of its fulfilment. In the great corpus of truth taught by the twelve prophets, this truth is particularly the property of Nahum, and if his prophecy is the prophecy of one idea, at least he presents that idea with much power and complete effectiveness. Limited as the message of Nahum may have been, his place among the prophets is secure.

1:1–15 AN ALPHABETIC ACROSTIC

1:1 The book's title

An oracle concerning Nineveh. This is an exact description of the contents of the prophecy, and is a better translation of the original text than the AV 'the burden of Nineveh'. The book of the vision of Nahum of Elkosh. The word book does not necessarily mean that the message of the prophet was prepared in written form and that it was not orally delivered, but it does suggest that it was early committed to writing. The vision of Nahum signifies the revelation of Nahum, as the vision of Isaiah (1:1) is the revelation of Isaiah.

1:2–8 The poem: the vengeance of our God

There are a number of poems in the Bible which have each verse, or perhaps each line, beginning with successive letters of the alphabet. Pss. 111; 112; and notably 119 are examples of this arrangement, the purpose of which was probably to act as a kind of aide-memoire. In some cases, as here, the whole alphabet is not employed.

The distinctive peculiarity of the poem, with its successive initial letters is of course lost in translation. An indication of the working out of the scheme, however, may be given here. 'Alēp̄; 'The Lord is a jealous God' (v. 2). Bêṯ; 'His way is in whirlwind and storm' (v. 3). Gîmel; 'He rebukes the sea and makes it dry' (v. 4). The letter dāleṯ cannot be traced. Hē; 'The mountains quake before him' (v. 5a). Waw; 'the earth is laid waste before him' (v. 5b). Zayin; 'Who can stand before his indignation?' (v. 6a). Ḥêṯ; 'His wrath is poured out like fire' (v. 6b). Ṭêṯ; 'The Lord is good' (v. 7a) Yôḏ; 'he knows those who take refuge in him' (v. 7b). Kap̄; 'he will make a full end of his adversaries' (v. 8).

Some critics make the liturgical hymn include v. 9. If that be the case, the order of the clauses requires to be reversed, as at present the first begins with mēm and the second with lāmeḏ. In the revised order, they read lāmeḏ; 'he will not take vengeance twice on his foes'. Mēm; 'what do you plot against the Lord? He will make a full end'.

2 The theme of this poem is the certainty and the severity of God's vengeance upon the heathen, and it begins with a very forceful statement of this fact. With cumulative repetition, the prophet affirms and reaffirms that the Lord takes vengeance. He declares that just because the anger of the Lord is slow to gather, it will be slow to dissipate. 3 The Lord will by no means clear the guilty, but will hold them responsible and will judge them. It is all too easy to loose sight of these moral truths. Only too readily do men think that, because wickedness is allowed for a time, it is therefore condoned. A passage such as this is a reminder that God's anger is directed against all unrighteousness and that, without repentance, there is no cheap and easy forgiveness.

4, 5 To convince his audience of the terror of the Lord, Nahum points to the phenomena of physical nature and in vivid language paints a picture of storm, whirlwind, drought, earthquake and destruction. These all reveal the power of the mighty God and, confronted with them, even the boldest of men become aware of their own insignificance. 6 Who can stand before his indignation? asks Nahum. Who can endure the heat of his anger? His wrath is poured out like fire, and the rocks are broken asunder by him.

7 Nahum then states the moral implications of the power of God, both for the righteous and for the wicked. Just because God is so strong, He is a safe refuge. He knows them who trust in Him. He delivers them. 8 On the other hand, He is mighty to smite those that rise up against Him. He knows them also, and His vengeance will not fail. Their doom is certain.

A note may be added on the textual point of v. 8. The text of this verse may be incomplete. The first phrase, But with an overflowing flood, may be completed by supplying some such sentence as 'He delivers them'. It is better to read his adversaries, or 'those that rise up against him', with the RSV, following the Greek text. To read 'her place', or 'the place thereof' with the AV, following the Hebrew text, is to employ an expression for which there has been no preparation. The last line may equally well be translated 'darkness shall pursue his enemies' or he will pursue his enemies into darkness. The latter translation is preferable, because it does not involve a change of subject from the previous line.

1:9–15 The punishment of enemies

9–11 In this arrangement we have separated v. 9 from the liturgical hymn, although, as we have pointed out above, a number of critics include it in the hymn. Working on the theory that Nahum did not compose the alphabetic acrostic, but that it was added later to his prophecy, these commentators consider that vv. 10 and 11 are the first genuine verses of Nahum. Some, indeed, wish to place 1:10, 11 after v. 1 of ch. 2, thus making these verses part of the war song describing the attack upon Nineveh. There is, however, a close connection between these verses and those which have preceded them. The same theme is handled and the two thoughts previously noticed are worked out, i.e. the punishment of the enemies of the Lord and the consequent relief to those whom they have oppressed.

While the vengeance of God threatens them, God's enemies are not yet subdued in mind. They still refuse to believe that He will smite. But He is about to deal with them. His punishment of them will be complete and final. He will not need to strike twice (v. 9). In describing this judgment Nahum uses a metaphor which is a favourite with the prophets (cf. Is. 5:24; Joel 2:5; Ob. 18) and one likely to appeal to the imagination of an agricultural people. God's enemies will be gathered together as thorns and consumed as fire burns the dry straw after harvest (v. 10; cf. Mt. 13:30).

11 Did one not come out from you, who plotted evil against the Lord . . . ? Nahum seems to see the evil of the Assyrian people summed up in the person of one of their leaders. He is so contemptible that especial shame is reserved for him (v. 14). His family will cease to be, his gods will be thrown down and he himself will be put to death. 12, 13 As a consequence of the overthrow of the enemies of the Lord there is relief for His oppressed people. 15 The arrival of this good news is declared in a picturesque and beautiful fashion. Perhaps it was because good news must of necessity be brought to Jerusalem over mountain roads that it was announced by the prophets in this form (cf. Is. 52:7). Behold, on the mountains the feet of him who brings good tidings, who proclaims peace! In gratitude for this deliverance, Judah is exhorted to cultivate her religious life (v. 15b). Along with this section may be taken 2:2, where AV is obscure. It is better to read with RSV, For the Lord is restoring the majesty of Jacob . . . The meaning might be expressed thus: 'The vine of Judah shall bloom afresh as the vine of Israel, although the spoilers have spoiled him and destroyed his tendrils.'

Thus Nahum deals with his theme of the overthrow of Nineveh in a general and introductory manner. He has given the setting in relation to the justice of God and to the oppressed people of Judah. In the remaining two chapters he turns to his subject in particular and in detail, setting forth its accomplishment in word-pictures of battle, unrivalled in Hebrew literature.

2:1–13 A THREEFOLD PICTURE

2:1–6 The siege

1 The enemy is come up against Nineveh. These verses may be dated after the death of the great Assyrian ruler Ashurbanipal in 627 or 626 BC. Nineveh was beset by many enemies. Among these were the Scythians, wandering bands of horsemen in search of plunder; the Chaldeans from the edge of the Persian Gulf, whose king, Nabopolassar, had seized Babylon; and the Medes from the area of the Caspian Sea, led by their king, Cyaxares. In 616 BC the allies appeared before the gates of Nineveh. Nahum, with bitter mockery, exhorts the Ninevites to prepare defensive measures. 2 See above. 3 Scarlet was a favourite colour with the fighting men of Media. Their shields are red, as are their cloaks. The whole scene is lit by the light of torches, carried by the chariots in the darkness of the early morning before the assault. 'Fir trees' (AV); RSV corrects the text and translates the chargers prance. 4 The chariots roll along the broad ways in the large built-up areas which surround the central fortifications of Nineveh. 5 Officers are called to lead the attack. The attackers come forward at a stumbling run. The mantelet, a movable defence under cover of which they make ready for the final assault, is set up. 6 Then, having captured the sluices and water-gates controlling the river Chaser which flowed through the city, they suddenly open them, so allowing a great flood of water to pour down on the buildings and increase the terror. The AV rendering 'dissolved' suggests an even more arresting picture. A great flood of water pours down on the buildings. Foundations are loosened and in this way the palace is literally dissolved.

2:7–10 The sack

7 Its mistress is stripped; i.e. the queen, or perhaps the female representative of the goddess Ishtar, goddess of Nineveh. The AV reads 'and Huzzab shall be led away captive'. The word 'Huzzab' is difficult. It has been variously translated as a verb (see AV and RV mgs.) and as a noun: a symbolic name for the city, like Rahab for Egypt; a name for the image of the goddess of Assyria; or even a name for the car in which the image of the goddess was carried. It seems simpler just to accept the RSV mg., 'The meaning of the Hebrew word is uncertain', and to render the word as mistress, signifying perhaps the female representative of the goddess. Her female attendants follow her as she is carried off. They moan in their distress like doves cooing in a wood and beat upon their breasts. 8 Nineveh has been a reservoir of trade and wealth into which have been flowing from all quarters streams of goods and gold and has thus become like a pool fed by many tributaries. She has a heterogeneous population, held together only by the opportunities to acquire wealth which the power of Nineveh gives. When the blow falls there is nothing to make these people cohere. They rush in every direction, as waters break out when a dam bursts. A few try to rally the defence crying Halt! Halt!, but the inhabitants flee wildly, without looking back. 9 House-to-house plunder begins. Silver . . . gold . . . every precious thing, the accumulated wealth of centuries, are looted. 10 The sacked city stands desolate. The few terrified survivors look sadly on the ruins.

2:11–13 The overthrow

Nahum closes the ode with a magnificent picture of a pride of lions which has been destroyed. Where is the lions' den? In vivid words he describes their fearlessness, strength and rapacity. But now the den is forsaken and the menace a thing of the past. So the Lord has finally dealt with Nineveh. She also was cruel and blood-thirsty. But her brood has been smoked out and slain with the sword. She will not prey upon the surrounding nations any more.

Thus ends the first of two powerful odes on the fall of Nineveh. In the closing verses of this poem the emphasis seems to be laid on the ruthlessness and aggressiveness of Nineveh. Of all empires, Nineveh has been one most unashamedly founded on force and cruelty. Nahum teaches that force will be destroyed by superior force; 'for all who take the sword will perish by the sword' (Mt. 26:52).

3:1–19 A WAR SONG

3:1–7 The wickedness of Nineveh

1 Other aspects of Nineveh's wickedness are indicated, namely her commercial unscrupulousness and evil influence. 2, 3 Her sins are punished in 'the battle of the streets'. These verses are a superlative example of Nahum's powers of description, and form one of the most vivid battle scenes in Hebrew literature. The confusion and noise as the chariots and horsemen attack, the glint of the sun on armour and weapons, the huddled dead lying in heaps about the streets, so thickly strewn that the advancing troops stumble over the bodies. A grim picture!

4–7 Nahum then speaks of the city of Nineveh under the simile of a harlot. This metaphor for sinful nations and cities was a favourite one with biblical writers. Sometimes it was used to describe idolatry. The people of Israel worshipping other gods were compared to an adulterous woman (cf. Lv. 17:7). It was also used of their action in imitating the ways of the Gentiles (cf. Ezk. 23:30). It condemned the practice of superstitions associated with idolatry (Lv. 20:6). Finally, as here, it was applied to the exchanges of trade which the Gentile peoples carried on among themselves. It is evident that after her conquests Nineveh endeavoured to build herself up as a centre of world commerce. Presumably this was for the sake of the wealth and luxuries to be gained thereby. She approached people with her wares. She deceived them by her lies. She enervated them with her luxuries. Like a harlot she corrupted them with her immoralities. For these sins also will she be punished. Instead of honour, she will be a gazingstock. Instead of fine living and soft clothing, she will be humiliated with every circumstance of degradation.

3:8–15 Comparison with Egypt

8 To convince Nineveh of the certainty of her doom, Nahum reminds her of the fate of Thebes, which fell despite its strength. This town, described by Homer (Iliad IX. 383) as hundred-gated, was the most ancient and most honourable in Upper Egypt. Of great extent, it was beautiful with temples, obelisks and sphinxes. It was situated on both banks of the Nile, the waters of which were led to the gateways of its temples by canals. The wonders of this mighty place may still be seen by visiting Karnak and Luxor. Nahum refers to its river and canals when he writes that she sat by the Nile, with water around her. 9 In addition to her natural strength, Thebes was at the centre of a strong political alliance. Egypt was united under one dynasty with Ethiopia, the latter a poor and backward country, but producing vigorous Sudanese warriors. The whole length of Egypt lay between Thebes and her Assyrian foes in the north. She was also helped by Put and the Libyans. Put may be identified with the Punt of the Egyptian inscriptions (the present Somalia on the Red Sea).

10 Yet in spite of all this total strength of Egypt and her allies, the cruel Assyrians themselves under Ashurbanipal overthrew Thebes in 663 BC. 11 A like fate shall overtake Nineveh. She will reel and stagger under her misfortunes. The brightness of her glory will be clouded over. You will seek a refuge from the enemy; i.e. she will attempt to form defensive alliances, just as Thebes did, or the people of Nineveh may proclaim public fasts and prayers to the gods, as indeed the last Assyrian king did, but nothing will save her. 12 The forts of her outer ring of defences are ready to fall. Just as a man shakes a fruit-tree and collects the over-ripe fruit which falls easily, so will the enemy gather up her forts. Her people have no stomach for resistance. The strongholds in the passes which led to Nineveh have been forsaken. 13 As the Assyrians were wont to do those who attack Assyria have already burned her defences with fire. The city of Calah was burned before Nineveh was destroyed.

14 As in 2:1, Nahum then ironically bids the city make ready for war. Let them lay in a water supply that will not become exhausted during a long siege. Let them build ramparts and repair the breaches in the towers. Let them go to the clay-pits, dig out the clay, mix it with straw, set it in moulds, fire it in the kilns, and repair the walls with it. 15 Such measures, though very necessary, were somewhat late, when the enemy was at hand. The great buildings of Nineveh will be given to the flames. The sword will cut down her chief men. The city will be stripped bare as a field is denuded by the locust.

3:16–19 The irremediable doom

16, 17 The prophet takes up this image of the locust, one of the facts of nature familiar to oriental minds, and serving for a favourite literary illustration. Having already applied it to the ravages of the invading army (v. 15a), he now uses it to describe the numbers of Nineveh's citizens (vv. 15b, 16). Nineveh had grown to be a great community: there were innumerable merchants; persons of wealth and authority were as common as grasshoppers, or perhaps as voracious as locusts; there were great companies of scribes employed in keeping accounts and records. All these had gathered within the city, like a swarm of locusts gathering together for warmth on a wall or fence in winter. But when the sun shines forth, the locusts scatter. There is not one to be seen. They suddenly disappear, rising in clouds to seek new fields. So the men who were attracted to Nineveh by self-interest will take flight in every direction, when her evil day comes.

18 Your shepherds are asleep. Hence the people are scattered on the mountains like lost sheep with none to gather them into the fold. The picture is of a helpless nation deprived of all its leaders. 19 There is no assuaging your hurt. For Assyria there is no hope of a 'remnant'. This is the end. And the news of her overthrow will cause satisfaction in all places where her wickedness has been experienced.

The striking fulfilment of Nahum's prophecy in the disappearance of Nineveh from the face of the earth is a seal upon the abiding truth of his message. Here is no mere piece of antiquity, but a confirmed word of God. To be sure, God gives opportunity to repent (Jon. 3), but when succeeding years expose the hollow unreality of professed repentance, and godless cruelty continues as though God had never spoken, then the time of repentance passes, giving place to the time of wrath. The government of the earth rests, not with wicked men, but with the righteous God.

ALEXANDER FRASER

Habakkuk

INTRODUCTION

THE AUTHOR

We know nothing about Habakkuk apart from his book, and even here he does not give us his genealogy or tell us when he prophesied. The name itself is akin to an Assyrian word which signifies a plant or vegetable. In the LXX it appears as Ambakoum. Jerome derived it from a Hebrew root meaning 'to clasp' and said 'he is called "Embrace", either because of his love to the Lord, or because he wrestles with God'. Luther and many modern commentators have favoured the same derivation. It is certainly not unfitting, for in this little book we see a man, in deadly earnest, wrestling with the mighty problem of theodicy—the divine justice—in a topsy-turvy world. The same sort of conflict meets us in the larger book of Job.

Habakkuk is the first prophet to arraign not Israel but God. The book contains a soliloquy between himself and the Almighty. What baffles him is the apparent discrepancy between revelation and experience. He seeks an explanation. No direct answer is given to his query, but he is assured that patient faith will win the day (2:4). He expresses this faith very vividly in 3:17–19, where the sentiment finds a more recent echo in William Cowper's hymn: 'God is His own interpreter, and He will make it plain.'

Because of the musical arrangement of ch. 3, some have thought that Habakkuk was a Levite. It may be that he was a member of a professional guild of prophets attached to the Temple (1 Ch. 25:1). He is the only one of the canonical prophets who is styled a 'prophet' in the title verse of his book (1:1), and this is thought to indicate professional status. For the contrast with Amos see Am. 7:14f. Certainly he helps us to see what the office of a prophet entailed; in 2:1ff. we see him preparing to receive a vision, and in 3:16 we note some of the physical and spiritual symptoms which accompanied the process. Cf. Is. 21:1–10.

Habakkuk appears in the Apocryphal story of Bel and the Dragon as the one who rescued Daniel from the lions' den for the second time; but this is only legend.

DATE AND OCCASION

In 1:6 we are told that God is raising up the Chaldeans (i.e. the Babylonians) as an instrument of punishment. This no doubt refers to the revived kingdom of Babylonia which overthrew the weakened Assyrian Empire at the close of the 7th century BC. Nineveh was destroyed in 612 BC and Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon defeated Pharaoh Necho of Egypt at Carchemish in 605.

Three years before this battle, Pharaoh Necho slew Josiah king of Judah at Megiddo (2 Ki. 23:29, 30; 2 Ch. 35:20ff.) and set up puppet kings on the throne of Judah, but neither he nor they were any match for the growing power of Babylon, and so, for the next 20 years, Judah was at the mercy of the Chaldeans and was finally carried away into captivity in 586 BC.

The prophecies of Habakkuk clearly refer to this period and may have been delivered either before or after the battle of Carchemish. In both cases Habakkuk would be a contemporary of Jeremiah (626–587 BC).

In favour of the earlier date is the suggestion in 1:5 that the raising up of the Chaldeans is still future and, at the time of the prophet's speaking, is still a thing to be wondered at; in favour of a date after 605 is the detailed description of Chaldean methods of warfare as something already well known (1:7–11).

The reign of the evil king Manasseh had been 'an age to try the faith of pious souls' (Kirkpatrick). The reformation under King Josiah (639–609 BC) had proved ineffectual and so the iniquity and perverseness (1:3) of backsliding Judah must be punished. For this God is raising up the Chaldeans.

This is the general view of scholars. Some, however, refer 1:2–4 not to backsliding Judah but to some heathen oppressor. The oppressor may be Chaldea herself; if so, the text must be rearranged so that vv. 5–11 precede vv. 2–4 (Giesebrecht) or are eliminated (Wellhausen). Or the oppressor may be Assyria; so Budde, who places vv. 6–11 after 2:2–4 and dates the prophecy just after 625 BC when Nabopolassar the Chaldean made himself independent of Assyria. But in this case why is Assyria not mentioned? Thirdly there is Egypt: so G. Adam Smith, who compares 1:2–4 with 2 Ki. 23:33–35.

But Habakkuk's complaint in 1:12 – 2:1 is not that God is using one heathen nation to punish another, but that He is using a heathen nation to punish Judah. In spite of the rediscovery of the law in the Temple in 621 BC (2 Ki. 22:8; cf. Hab. 1:4), the people of Judah are bent on violence and injustice. The rearrangement of the text to suit a particular theory is always a questionable expedient. It seems safer to take the text as it stands and refer 1:2–4 to the people of Judah.

Others, however, with a certain amount of support from the Greek versions, omit the word 'Chaldeans' in 1:6 altogether, or else, with Duhm, substitute for it the word 'Kittim', i.e. Cypriot Greeks, and so place the book in the days of Alexander the Great, c. 333 BC. Such views demand considerable tinkering with the text and are not very feasible. But it is interesting to note that the Dead Sea Scroll which contains the Habakkuk commentary, although lacking the first half of 1:6, has this note about it: 'Interpret (this) of the Kitti'im, whose fear is upon all the nations.' This, however, may only be a 'modern application' of an older situation. As Eissfeldt says, Qumran's identification of 'Chaldeans' with Kitti'im presupposes 'Chaldeans' in the text, and is an argument against Duhm's contention rather than for it. In no circumstances must 'Chaldeans' be excised or explained away.

It seems best, then, to put the date of Habakkuk at about 600 BC, or a little earlier.

The Qumran commentary on Habakkuk, found near the Dead Sea in 1947, deals with the first two chapters only. Into the text, which shows a few variants from MT, are inserted 'interpretations' linking the words of Habakkuk with events contemporary with the commentator, viz. the 1st century BC. Some of these are noted here. Whoever the Dead Sea sectaries were, they certainly 'gave the status of canonical Scripture to the biblical texts they used' and showed that 'for them the Bible of their day was authoritative in all matters of faith and conduct' (J. G. Harris).

TEXT AND COMPOSITION

The meaning of the Hebrew text is not always clear and the LXX has a few interesting variations, e.g. the great assertion in 2:4 is in one text of the LXX 'through and through Messianic' (T. W. Manson). See note in loco. Uncertainty as to whom various passages refer to has led many critics to rearrange the text, and, in some cases, to divide the authorship. To some, Habakkuk is the author of ch. 3 and the compiler of chs. 1 and 2, to others he is the author of ch. 1 and most of ch. 2, whereas ch. 3 is a late poem of the Persian or Maccabean period. But many prefer to look upon the book as an artistic and connected whole. Kuhl, for instance, says that the style and conception of ch. 3 are so similar to those of the previous two chapters that 'it is quite unnecessary to postulate a different authorship'. As a cult-prophet, Habakkuk would be well able to add the liturgical and musical notes which are to be found in ch. 3.

As to the Qumran commentary, 'its corroborating evidence of the primitiveness of the traditional form adds considerable weight to the view that the traditional text of this prophecy has been transmitted with remarkable fidelity from early times' (J. G. Harris).

MESSAGE

Like Nahum, Habakkuk is not out to reproach his own people (except in 1:2–4 if this be taken to refer to the ungodly within the nation). But there is no complacency about him. The book reveals 'an agony of spirit at the evil which follows from the world-rule of an unjust and immoral power' (Eissfeldt). It is no accident that a greater than Habakkuk, the apostle Paul, chose a saying from this book to express his new and deeper religious experience. What William Temple said of the author of Ps. 73 is true also of Habakkuk: 'In his fellowship with God he has found that nothing matters in comparison with that fellowship' (Nature, Man and God, p. 43).

1:1 INTRODUCTION

The theme is greater than the man; hence the briefest mention of the prophet's name and status together with his oracle, i.e. prophetic utterance (AV 'burden'). The word is practically synonymous with 'revelation': thus saw (as a 'seer'). Cf. 2 Ki. 9:25.

1:2–4 THE FIRST COMPLAINT

2 How long shall I cry for help? The prophet speaks as the conscience of the nation. He is troubled at the presence of iniquity among God's people to the detriment of all religious institutions. 4 The law (i.e. tôrâ) is slacked, i.e. is numb, ineffectual. It never goes forth, i.e. it is never put into practice. Why does not God intervene? Such a question could arise only in Israel. Only to men who believe in one God who is both holy and good and is at the same time the omnipotent Creator and Upholder of the universe can there be any real problem of theodicy. The dilemma 'if God, then why evil?' is no dilemma to those who believe in a pantheon of warring deities whose morals are hardly different from those of men and women. But if there is one only God, of undeviating righteousness and irresistible power, then the demand is created for an explanation of the conflicting experiences of life. There are times in some men's lives when this tension becomes particularly acute, as here. The wicked surround the righteous as an enemy with a view to causing his ruin.

1:5–11 GOD'S ANSWER

The Chaldeans, who are already wreaking destruction on surrounding nations, are to be turned against Judah and to become, in God's hands, an instrument of chastisement. This is the work which the people of Judah would not believe if told (v. 5), so incredible would it appear that God should so act towards His people and should use so unlikely an agent. For the Chaldeans are a law unto themselves (v. 7b) and mock all authority (v. 10); they worship their own strength (v. 11) and with them might is right.

5 For among the nations (Heb. baggôyyîm) LXX reads 'you despisers' which probably reflects the Hebrew bogᵉdîm, 'you traitors', a reading found also in the Qumran commentary. Qumran adds: 'The interpretation of this word refers to the betrayers with the man of falsehood, for they have not believed the words of the Teacher of Righteousness' (presumably the leader of the Qumran community). The 'man of falsehood' would be the Jerusalem high priest whose corrupt ways were abominable to the sectaries. This is an interesting though uncompelling 'application'. Nevertheless 'you betrayers', the faithless Judahites of Habakkuk's day, may be the preferable reading. Cf. Moffatt, 'faithless creatures'.

9–11 are difficult. 9 Terror is a translation of an emended Hebrew word, which, in its present form, is not found elsewhere. Duhm, emending differently, translates, 'From Gomer (i.e. Cappadocia) they marched towards the east', and applies it to the campaigns of Alexander the Great, and makes the heaping up of earth or dust (v. 10) refer to the siege of Tyre. This extensive adaptation of the Hebrew is, however, unnecessary. RSV achieves the most sense by the smallest alteration. 11 For guilty men (cf. RV 'and be guilty'; AV 'and offend'), the Qumran text following a slightly different Hebrew reads 'and he makes', viz. a god of his own strength. Though this makes good sense, it is not necessary to adopt the alteration.

1:12 - 2:1 THE SECOND COMPLAINT

1:12–17 If the Chaldeans idolize their own brute strength, how can they be used by a God who cannot, by His very nature, look on wrong (v. 13). If He uses them, then He must be like them, treating men as if they were the fish of the sea (v. 14) to be captured and slaughtered at will, the only consideration being the pleasure derived from their destruction (vv. 15ff.). The revealed nature of God and the actual object of Chaldean worship seem dead against the assumption that God can use the Chaldeans. The prophet can see no possibility of contact from either side. In seeking to solve this dilemma, Habakkuk starts from a position of faith (cf. Je. 12:1). Since God is unchangeable, the preservation of His people is certain (v. 12). But how can a God who is unchangeable in holiness tolerate to use such vile instruments (v. 13)? The question is given point by considering the wickedness (v. 13b) of the Chaldeans; their inhumanity (v. 14) in treating others as a disposable commodity; their joy in conquest (v. 15) and devotion to their own instruments of self-advancement (v. 16). The seine (vv. 15, 16) is the dragnet. We are not to understand that the Chaldeans actually treated this as a religious object. The language is metaphorical: they 'idolized' their pitiless power of conquest. Does Israel's God look on in silent complacency while His people are treated as though He were not their king (cf. v. 14b), and while the Chaldeans appear to be set for an unending career of domination (v. 17)?

2:1 Habakkuk is conscious of the urgency of getting an answer, and therefore I will . . . look forth to see what he will say. Some have suggested that we should read 'and what He will answer', but the thought of holding dialogue with God, though daring, is suitable. Habakkuk is determined not to be fobbed off, but to receive satisfaction for his complaint.

2:2–4 GOD'S ANSWER

Chaldaea, God's instrument of chastisement, is itself under God's judgment and will not escape the just penalty of its misdeeds. Arrogance and faithlessness each has its own reward, as those who wait will see.

At first sight, there does not seem to be anything very inspiring about this assertion. Some have even doubted whether it constitutes a 'revelation' at all. Some, e.g. Budde and Eissfeldt, regard 1:5–11 as part of the revelation and place it after 2:3. Weiser thinks that the mention of several 'tablets' demands something longer than the epigram in v. 4 and that therefore the answer of God is contained in ch. 3, which may originally have followed immediately after 2:1–3 and was then placed at the end of the book for liturgical reasons. 2:4 would then belong to the Woes (see note below). But there is more here than meets the eye, and the use of this passage in the NT shows it to be indeed a pregnant one. It is 'a saying which was only fathomed in its utter profundity by St. Paul' (Kuhl).

But whatever treasures the statement in v. 4b was later made to disclose, one thing is immediately clear, and that is that the prophet himself has been given the realization that the only lasting element in an unstable, wicked world is character. Tyranny, greed and pride are all self-doomed; only integrity lasts on.

2 Make it plain upon tablets. Clay tablets were used in Babylonia (cf. Is. 8:1) and we also hear of tablets of wood or ivory (see NBD, p. 1343, section b). So he may run who reads it; a Hebrew idiom. The meaning is: 'that he may read it quickly (whoever sees it)'. 4 The righteous shall live by his faith. This great theme is developed by St. Paul in Rom. 1:17; Gal. 3:11, and by the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews in Heb. 10:38. The first half of the verse is differently rendered by the LXX which has: 'If he, i.e. the promised deliverer who will surely come (v. 3), draw back, my soul hath no pleasure in him.' This version is reproduced in Heb. 10:38 but the clauses are there inverted. LXX continues 'but the just shall live by my faith'. The 'my' is omitted in Heb. 10:38. The Hebrew text of Habakkuk (cf. also Rom. 1:17; Gal. 3:11) has 'his faith' (so also AV, RV) and the reference is not to the Messiah who is to prove His identity by courageous fidelity to His commission, but to the believing soul who in 'faith' has the touchstone of perseverance. Live is used in the pregnant sense of enjoying God's favour with or without temporal benefits.

Here 'faithfulness' as well as faith is in view; the term is wider than in Paul or Hebrews. But 'this faithfulness must spring from faith: hence Paul's insight is a true one' (Kirkpatrick). 'Faithfulness' (Heb. 'ĕmûnâ) is used of the steadiness of Moses' arms in Ex. 17:12, and in Je. 5:3 it signifies fidelity ('truth') as opposed to falsehood. In Is. 11:5 it is parallel to righteousness. Its general meaning is therefore moral steadfastness. 'The upright man will survive, will win through, if he maintains his integrity.' But how can he do that? Habakkuk opened his 'complaint' by asserting the truth about God (see on 1:12). The 'faithfulness' of which he now speaks is not only moral endurance to the end (Mk. 13:13) but persistent belief that God will be true to Himself. 'Faith' in this narrower sense is an essential element in the wider fidelity, as Paul and Luther clearly saw.

2:5–20 THE FIVE WOES

These verses contain five predictions of the doom of the man 'whose soul is not upright in him' (v. 4). Cf. the six woes of Is. 5:8ff. Note the recurring phrase for the blood of men in vv. 8, 17, which may originally have been a refrain concluding each of the five woes. Some regard the last three woes as later additions, but S. R. Driver regards all five as authentic.

5, 6a are introductory, and the meaning of v. 5 has been a long-standing problem. Instead of wine, Qumran has 'wealth'. Some have urged the possibility of reading 'woe', making this the first of six woes. Duhm reads 'Ionian' (i.e. 'Greek'), making the phrase refer to Alexander who 'neither keepeth at home' (AV) but collects as his own all peoples. J. H. Eaton (TBC, ad loc.), on the other hand, urges that the puzzling nature of this opening verse was part of Habakkuk's purpose. He made use of a proverbial utterance concerning 'wine' in which, though 'the words were aimed obliquely, they would nevertheless find their target; where the cap fitted, it would in this case descend of its own accord, for it was the sure justice of God which had been invoked'. Thus he figures and denounces the deceitful and insatiable Assyrian.

2:6–8 Woe against aggression

Some see here a reference to King Jehoiakim (609–597 BC; see 2 Ki. 23:36ff.) but the application to the plunderer of many nations (v. 8) makes the Assyrian the likelier target, and so throughout these woes. But the principle laid down in v. 5, that if the cap fits then any may wear it, remains in operation. Habakkuk asserts not just the doom of a bygone Assyrian war-lord but of all who at any time behave in this way. He uses now the metaphor of a merciless moneylender, causing his victims to cry out How long? in their despair of relief, while he takes more and more of their belongings as pledges against his loans (v. 6) and endlessly pauperizes them. Exact retribution will be his lot (vv. 7, 8).

2:9–11 Woe against self-assertion

9 Set his nest on high. As birds built in the tops of tall trees, so he would put himself out of harm's way. Jehoiakim engaged in building projects (cf. Je. 22:13), but again the cock-sure Assyrian (cf. Is. 36:18ff.) may be more in mind, figured here as a rogue who uses his ill-gotten wealth to 'feather his own nest'. 10, 11 But the house has been built by shame, and even its very material fabric will in the end witness against him; cf. Am. 3:10.

2:12–14 Woe against violence

12 Cf. Mi. 3:10. Habakkuk may be quoting from this passage. 13 The meaning is that since God alone can establish a city (Ps. 127:1) all human attempts to do so, however violent, are foredoomed. It will only be for fire, or, as we might say 'go up in smoke'! 14 quotes freely from Is. 11:9, and means that the future is with God, not with any human achievement. Cf. Is. 2:17.

2:15–17 Woe against inhumanity

15 The second clause has been variously rendered. AV has 'that puttest thy bottle to him'; RV 'that addest thy venom thereto'; RSV, omitting one letter of the Hebrew, makes best sense. Of this cup of the divine wrath (cf. Ob. 16; Is. 51:17; Ps. 75:8) Assyria had been the bearer to the nations, but had used the opportunity for base self-advantage (cf. Is. 10:5–15). 16 reiterates the principle of exact retribution, and that from the Lord, 17 for the violence done by invading armies to nature (Lebanon), animals, men, and property.

2:18–20 Woe against idolatry

18, 19 With v. 18 we expect another woe, and, because of its absence, some have wished to transpose vv. 18 and 19; others have labelled v. 18 a scribe's comment, but Eaton (op. cit.) is to be heard when he says that 'the doom-laden "woe" is held back, heightening the tension, while two rhetorical questions prepare the way'. The questions touch on the Assyrian's idolatry, and therefore expose his greatest offence, failure to bow to the glory of God. With v. 18, cf. Is. 44:6–20, and with v. 19, cf. 1 Ki. 18:26; Ps. 115:4–8. 20 In contrast to this helplessness of man-made gods, and completing the series of woes with a cry which prepares us for the theophany of ch. 3, v. 20 describes the Lord in his holy temple. The temple is heaven, the place of power and authority. As in v. 4 we are encouraged to wait upon the Lord, before whom no other attitude is proper but to keep silence whether in submissive, patient faith, or in speechless terror.

3:1–19 A VISION OF JUDGMENT

'For sublimity of poetic conception and splendour of diction', says S. R. Driver, this chapter 'ranks with the finest which Hebrew poetry has produced.' It contains reminiscences of the Babylonian creation myth (see on v. 10) but 'the mythological elements have been tamed to liturgical use' (IB). The prophet also draws on the great events of Israelite history, particularly the Exodus and the defeat of the Canaanites at the river Kishon (Jdg. 4, 5).

The genuineness of this chapter, as coming from the pen of Habakkuk, has been questioned. E.g., there are no features in it which connect it specially with either the Assyrians or the Chaldeans; the calamities in vv. 17ff. are due to natural causes rather than to enemy action. But such details can be overpressed, making the contrast too sharp, and it is better to see this chapter as an example of that 'faithfulness' by which the just man is enabled to look beyond present frustrations to eternal justice ceaselessly at work in the world. In fact, it bears the same marks as those Psalms which, in the Psalter, are associated with historical events: they do not set out to describe details but to enunciate principles, and in this light ch. 3 could hardly be more suitable to what has preceded. Eaton energetically espouses the view that 'ch. 3 was deliberately designed by Habakkuk as crown of his whole composition'. The omission of ch. 3 from the Qumran commentary need not mean that it was not thought to belong to Habakkuk. More likely, it did not suit the purpose and style of the commentator.

1 Shigionoth, cf. the title of Ps. 7, is apparently an indication of the musical setting to be employed for this poem. It may derive from a verbal root meaning 'to reel' or 'to err', and if so points to some irregular rhythmic mode. At all events, as when such words occur in Psalm titles, it points to the use of this hymn in Temple worship. 2 God's action of old, of which Habakkuk has heard the report, while its immensity makes him tremble, yet is the basis of his prayer for a present divine intervention. But if any are to escape, it will only be because in wrath He remembers to be merciful. While this is the more probable meaning, Habakkuk could have intended 'In the wrath which we are suffering, come in mercy and help us'.

3 God came from Teman. Teman was a district of Edom, and here, poetically, the part means the whole; cf. Am. 1:12. Paran was the hilly country between Edom and Sinai along the Gulf of Aqabah, and was regarded as the cradle of Israelite religion (cf. Dt. 33:2). The implied prayer is, therefore, that God will come now in the fullness of that revealed nature which once He showed to Israel at Sinai. See also Jdg. 4, 5; Ps. 68:7, 8. Selah (see also vv. 9, 13) is a direction for the liturgical use of the hymn, but its significance is not known. 4, 5 We now turn to the power of His coming. It is pictured as a storm. The rays allude to the lightning flashes, for, as often, the theophany is pictured in terms of a gathering storm. His coming is also inescapable. Those who may escape the preceding pestilence will be overtaken by the following plague; 6 and this is reinforced by the deliberate acts of God whereby He stood and looked, taking deliberate aim, so to speak, before He released His thunders.

7 Cushan was a Midianite or Arabian tribe (cf. Nu. 12:1); in affliction means 'torn to shreds'; to tremble is to 'flutter wildly'. 8 asks, 'What was the purpose of it all?' and the answer is given in v. 13. 9 is very obscure. Delitzsch says that 'nearly a hundred translations of this verse have been offered'. Thackeray sees in the 'oaths', 'tribes' (or 'rods') and 'word' of AV and RV a reference to the three passages of Scripture read during Pentecost, viz. Dt. 16:9–12; Nu. 17:1ff., Gn. 12:1ff., each known by these catchwords. This is, however, over subtle. These older versions, attempting the best that may be done with the unemended Hebrew text, rather suggest this, that when God's bow is bared for action it is not an uncontrolled force of destruction, but acts according to His Word: that is to say, in faithfulness to His chosen tribes, and with all the power of the Creator's word over His created world. RSV, attempting to correct the Hebrew for easier understanding, makes the verse throughout speak of the power of the divine judgment: when the bow is readied for action, it possesses all the cutting force of that creative action which once made ways through the earth for rivers.

10 Before such a One all creation is helpless. The deep (Heb. t^{e}hôm) is the Tiamat of Babylonian mythology, the chaos which forcibly opposes the Creator's purposes, but the use of such language does not, of course, imply acceptance of the ideas behind it, and is simply used to enhance the truth of the divine Creator's irresistible power. 11 The sun and moon stood still either as hidden by the storm-clouds, or as eclipsed by the glory of God's appearing (cf. Acts 26:13) or, as in Jos. 10:12f., where the regularities of nature are suspended in order to guarantee the fullness of the Lord's victory. 12–14 The picture of the Warrior-Creator continues as we see Him bestride the earth; nothing is beyond His reach or above His power, but yet, as the prophet had prayed, in wrath He does remember mercy, for all this energy of victory is for the salvation of thy people, those whom He had anointed for Himself (cf. Ps. 105:15). RSV mg. reveals the problems of translating vv. 13b, 14, but the text makes the best possible rendering of them, as the prophet continues the tale of complete divine conquest. 15 He returns to metaphor: the sea is often the picture of restless power in opposition to God; cf. Ps. 93:3, 4.

16 With this verse Habakkuk's hymn comes full circle. He who confessed to being terror-struck at the report of God's past acts (v. 2) now trembles and melts with fear as he seems to hear the on-coming march of such a God. The end of the verse seems full of paradox. How can he tremble and totter and at the same time quietly wait with an apparently assured calm? 17, 18 His assurance is born of the living faith which these verses so beautifully express. Though everything which, humanly speaking, supports life may fail, yet he can now rejoice in the Lord. Personal faith is the practical answer to life's discontents. The contemplation of the history of God with His people, that all His deeds are 'for the salvation of thy people' (v. 13) now leads the prophet to rejoice in the God of my salvation. 19 Thus Habakkuk has discovered the answer to his initial questioning, and his deep contentment with the answer is expressed in the testimony that he makes my feet like hinds' feet. He feels as if he is 'walking on air', so light-hearted and sure-footed is he. Not even the most trying high places (cf. Dt. 32:13) through which life's path may lead can daunt the man of faith.

The concluding words of v. 19 are further liturgical directions. The hymn is assigned to the Choirmaster's Collection, and is to be accompanied by the Temple strings.

Zephaniah

INTRODUCTION

AUTHOR AND DATE

The book of Zephaniah is the ninth of the books of Hebrew prophetic literature. It is typical in that it sounds the usual prophetic notes of judgment, renewal, and prediction, but it stands out as important in that its prophecies broke a prophetic silence of two generations and it marks 'the first tingeing of prophecy with apocalypse'. Zephaniah was obviously a plain-spoken man, sober and restrained but also employing impressive powers of imagination and vivid, realistic figures of speech. It is almost certain that he was a young man when he began to prophesy. He was a contemporary of Jeremiah among the prophets and of the good Josiah (640–609 BC) among the kings. Some would say that Nahum also belonged to Zephaniah's time or that he actually preceded him. Nahum's prophecies were solely concerned with the city of Nineveh, and since the destruction of Nineveh did not take place till 612 BC it may be that Nahum prophesied nearer to that date than in the period covered by 640–621 BC, which is the period within which Zephaniah must have appeared (Ellison, Men Spake from God, 1958, p. 70).

It was some 70 years since Isaiah and Micah, the prophets of the period of Assyrian ascendancy, had been heard. The fate of Samaria in 722 BC had brought a solemn reminder of God's might and majesty and righteousness. The 50 years before the reign of Josiah had sounded a new depth of degeneracy and barrenness in the history of Judah, and so Zephaniah's youthful vigour and zeal were qualities needed by the situation in which he was called to serve, and they are easily discernible in his book. The forthrightness and the unsparing tone of the pronouncements of judgment are typical of a young man possessing strong convictions and manifesting an unusual degree of moral sensitiveness and earnestness. The reforming zeal of the young King Josiah (640–609) was well matched by the earnest preaching of the new young prophet. They were both 'come to the kingdom for such a time as this' and their youthfulness and the difficult years which moulded them fitted them well to play a worthy role in this new era.

G. A. Smith suggests that Zephaniah's name, which means 'Yahweh has guarded (or hidden)', may indicate that his birth took place in the killing time of Manasseh (The Book of the Twelve Prophets, 1900, Vol. II, p. 47). It is certain, at any rate, that when, in the providence of God, Zephaniah stepped to the front of the stage of events in Judah, he marked the beginning of a new line of prophets which was to contain Jeremiah, Habakkuk, Obadiah and Ezekiel (and Nahum, if the later date for that prophet is accepted), all of whom were to seek to save Judah from the fate which had already overtaken the northern kingdom. It is therefore possible to say with certainty that the main body of the book is to be associated with the reformation connected with Josiah which took place in 621 BC, and it is reasonable to suppose that Zephaniah's preaching was one of the contributory causes of it. We may conclude, therefore, that the probable date of utterance was c. 627 BC.

It would appear that Jeremiah began his work soon after Zephaniah. It has been claimed that they were around the same age, but there is no proof that this is so, or that there was any close collusion between them. Indeed, at certain points, Jeremiah seems to detect weakness and danger in Zephaniah's sweeping and lightning-like revival. Doubtless he rejoiced in the reforms which Zephaniah's preaching caused Josiah to make, but Jeremiah seemed to see further and deeper—perhaps because he lived longer—and he viewed some of the reformation as an outward form, a fashionable gesture to a popular movement, and not a sincere, spiritual purification with qualities of permanence about it.

CIRCUMSTANCES OF ITS UTTERANCE

As already indicated, the circumstances in which Zephaniah was called to prophesy were, at one and the same time, perilous and promising. During the long reign of Manasseh (696–642), the evil son of the good king Hezekiah, the moral and religious state of Judah had sadly deteriorated (2 Ki. 23:11, 12; 2 Ch. 33:1–11). Although Judah had a certain independence, it came in reality to be little more than a vassal state of the Assyrian Empire, and Manasseh was both unable and unwilling to resist the cultic and ethical changes which came from Nineveh. Throughout his reign Manasseh had opposed the revival of religion which had marked his father's reign. He had built again the altars which his father had thrown down and restored the debasing nature-worship associated with Baal. Superstition, worship of the stars and even human sacrifice became part of a religion of outward form and ceremony devoid of inward reality, and without spiritual or ethical convictions. It is possible to construe all this as a sincere, though fanatical, return to the religion of his grandfather, Ahaz (2 Ki. 16), but it was nevertheless a religious syncretism which paid too much deference to the Assyrian overlords, and in the eyes of the prophets it was sheer, headlong wickedness. Those who had tried to preserve the purity of the worship of Yahweh were rewarded for their pains with persecution and even death, for 'Manasseh shed very much innocent blood, till he had filled Jerusalem from one end to another' (2 Ki. 21:16).

It is true, of course, that Manasseh repented from this attitude before his death in 642 BC, and 'humbled himself greatly before the God of his fathers' (2 Ch. 33:12). His son Amon who succeeded him as king showed no desire to reject the gross idolatry of his father's reign and he fell a victim to intrigue and treachery on the part of his palace officials (2 Ki. 21:19–24).

It is apparent, however, that the evil tendencies of these two reigns had not completely won the support of the people. Once again a remnant had not bowed the knee; there were those who wished and worked for better times. It was this factor which made the times promising as well as perilous. When Josiah came to the throne in 640 BC, there were many who yearned for a purer religion, and were ready both to hear Zephaniah and to follow the king in his reforming zeal.

Mention must also be made of the Scythian invasions in and after 630 BC. This tribe of horse-riding nomads (cf. NBD, art. 'Scythians') had been held in check by the Assyrian Empire when at the height of its power, but it was a mark of waning Assyrian ascendancy that they began to make vigorous and disruptive inroads into the Fertile Crescent. They assisted Assyria, nevertheless, against the Medes. They also pushed southwards to the very borders of Egypt, and were deterred from invading that land only by large bribes from Pharaoh Psammetichus I. They are credited at this time with the destruction of Ashkelon and Ashdod, and their activities in this direction may even have sharpened Zephaniah's awareness of the power of the Lord to inflict universal judgment (cf. IDB, 'Scythians', 'Zephaniah').

The account of this invasion, which is given by Herodotus in Book IV of his History, serves to explain the waning power of Assyria, and when Ashurbanipal died in 627 BC the way was open for Josiah to press on energetically with his reforms unhindered by his erstwhile masters. Some scholars, on the other hand, doubt the accuracy of Herodotus's account because of the demonstrable errors which it contains, and because it is our only authority for the story that they swept as far south and west as the Egyptian border (cf. J. Bright, A History of Israel, 1960, p. 293). Moreover, it is argued that, since we are here dealing with 'the typical vague language of eschatology, where everything is seen through a haze of dust', the judgments here announced cannot refer to this invasion (Ellison, op. cit., pp. 81, 68).

It is not essential, however, to suppose that the Scythian invasion is actually portrayed, but it is reasonable to hold that, knowing of it as he most certainly would, Zephaniah should see in it a picture of what would happen if Judah persisted in her present course of rebellion against the Lord. As a matter of fact the Scythian invasion does not seem to have touched Judah at all; her ultimate oppressor and instrument of God's judgment was Babylon.

ZEPHANIAH'S MESSAGE

Zephaniah was an inhabitant of Jerusalem, as is obvious from references to specific parts of the city which could have been made only by one well acquainted with them (cf. 1:4, 10, 11, 12). In the city he observes people bent on living by force and fraud among themselves, and idolatrous and sceptical towards God. His early prophecies are, on that account, of almost unrelieved gloom; the dark line in the face of God is very clearly seen in the picture given in 1:1 – 3:8. From that point onward, however, a new note is sounded: the hope of universal salvation and ultimate restoration for Judah. The section 3:9–20 is so different from what precedes it that some scholars would dissociate it from the rest of the book (cf. IDB, 'Zephaniah'), but there is no real reason why this should be done (cf. J. H. Eaton, TBC, 1961). It is true that the great burden of Zephaniah's prophetic preaching was about judgment, swift, imminent and disastrous, on Judah and the surrounding nations. Yet we often find that those who discern most clearly God's judgments abroad in the world are those who also see the rainbow of His love and mercy arching the horizon of the future. And while Zephaniah foretold the judgments upon Judah, he foresaw them as a purgative essential to Judah's becoming the blessed of the Lord and His handmaiden to the whole world.

THE INTEGRITY OF THE BOOK

Recent study of this prophecy has resulted in a much more conservative attitude on the unity and consistency of the book as a whole. Formerly the authenticity of very many verses had been called in question by one commentator or another. This was done on various counts: the break in the elegiac measure after ch. 1; the presence of certain words which were in more frequent use in post-exilic writings; the difference in tone between the general message of universal judgment and destruction and the notes of hope sounded in 2:7b, 9b; 3:8–20. These points have been fairly met and answered. The presence here and there of a word which came into wider use in later years does indeed occur, but this need not invalidate the work as being Zephaniah's. 'Meek' and 'meekness', e.g., are Hebrew words which occur often in the later psalms and prophets, but they also occur in Ex. 10:3; Nu. 12:3; Is. 2:9; Mi. 6:8.

Other difficulties were concerned with the historical accuracy of the details of the prophecies, e.g. that the Scythian invasion did not affect Moab and Ammon since it did not come through their country at all; or that a destruction of Jerusalem is presupposed in 2:8, 10; or again, that the prophecy is inconsistent in its attitude towards Judah as evidenced by comparing ch. 1 with 2:9, 10. The first two problems are hypothetical in origin. The invasion which punished Moab and Ammon need not have been that of the Scythians. Furthermore, 2:8, 10 do not in fact actually demand the destruction of Jerusalem, while the blessed hope of the emergence of a remnant of God's people, spared and redeemed from the general destruction, is always breaking through in the prophetic writings. The promise of salvation was not nationalistic but proffered to the humble and penitent in the nation.

1:1 THE TITLE: ZEPHANIAH INTRODUCED

A biographical introduction such as this is not unusual (cf., e.g., Ho. 1:1; Am. 1:1; Zc. 1:1). It informs us about the prophet himself, about his genealogy and the times in which he prophesied. The significant thing to note here is that it is unusually long. When this occurs it may indicate some epic achievement or some ancestor of note (cf. G. A. Smith, The Twelve Prophets, 1900, Vol. II, p. 47). Here it may even draw attention to the fact that Zephaniah came of royal lineage and that four generations separated him from King Hezekiah (cf. J. H. Eaton, TBC, 1961, p. 121). If this is so, then the conclusion seems sound that Zephaniah cannot have been much more than twenty by the time Josiah came to the throne. It would also add interest to his outright condemnation of the royal house for their aping of foreign manners and for the high-handed wrongs practised by their retainers.

Notes. On the word of the Lord, see Am. 1:1. Cushi. The name of Zephaniah's father means 'Ethiopian' and may indicate some African mixture of race, or some strong pro-Egyptian bias on Gedaliah's part to give such a name to his son. Cf. Je. 38:7–13; 39:15–18 for the presence of an Ethiopian at court a little later than Zephaniah's time. It has also been suggested that in view of the fact that in Dt. 23:8 no Egyptian or Ethiopian could be admitted into the Jewish community unless he could show a pure Jewish pedigree for at least three generations, Zephaniah's genealogy here is unusually full in order to meet any opposition on this score. Hezekiah. In spite of the fact that no mention is made of him as 'King of Judah' it is generally thought that it is the good King Hezekiah (715–687 BC; 2 Ki. 18; 2 Ch. 29) who was so outstandingly great as to need no tag to indicate who he was. In the days of Josiah. This could mean anything from 640 to 609 BC, but the whole tone of the book indicates that the prophecies must have been delivered before Josiah's great reformation (621 BC; 2 Ki. 22–23). The particular vices condemned in this book are exactly those which Josiah wiped out. These events must therefore be placed within the period 630–621 BC.

1:2 – 2:3 THE DAY OF THE LORD ANNOUNCED

This is a warning of universal judgment (1:2, 3) spoken as by the Lord Himself: 'I will sweep away . . . I will overthrow'. It is then concentrated on Judah and especially the inhabitants of Jerusalem (vv. 4–13). The meaning of this for the whole world (vv. 14–18) is described as Zephaniah takes up again the theme with which he opened. In stark, vivid language the prophet tries to arouse and awaken a sinful people and world to the approaching crisis and to a possible catastrophe. Nevertheless in the midst of all this denunciation and warning the prophet holds out in God's name a hand of mercy and a promise of salvation from the day of the wrath of the Lord (2:1–3).

1:2, 3 Its universality

2 This is an assertion of God's sovereign right and power to judge the whole earth (not 'land' as in AV) rather than an announcement of an impending doom. 3 The cataloguing of all the various forms of life is designed to stress the totality of the scope of judgment and the concluding reference to the wicked of mankind concentrates attention on the central point at issue: sin and its inevitable reward.

1:4–13 Its focus on Jerusalem

4 Jerusalem is regarded by Zephaniah as the fountainhead of the rampant evil and idolatry of the period. Judgment must begin at the house of God and, as he will show, the salvation which God intends for the world must be effected in germ at Jerusalem. There must be a complete disappearance of the Baal-worship which had flourished in the days of Manasseh and Amon (2 Ki. 21:1–9, 16, 21), and the name of the idolatrous priests must disappear. The persistence of the Canaanitish religion in the life of God's people was phenomenal. 5 There was also the worship of the host of heaven, of the sun, moon and stars, practised on the rooftops. This does not seem to be alluded to by prophets to the northern kingdom and owed its strength in Jerusalem to the time of the Assyrian overlordship (2 Ki. 21:3, 5, 21; Je. 7:18; 44:17–19). From the same source and equally abhorrent to God originated the attempt to combine the worship of God and of Milcom, 'the god of the Ammonites' (cf. 1 Ki. 11:5). No man can serve two masters and such an attempt to divide their loyalties had disastrous results. The prophet foretold its destruction and Josiah saw to it that it was swept away when the reformation took place (2 Ki. 23:13). 6 In addition many were wilfully or through sheer neglect ignoring the worship of God. This was their crowning sin and it would not go unpunished. Compromise can be appealed to but studied indifference slams the door in God's face. 7 Consequently the prophet solemnly announces that the Lord is ready to act in judgment. The sacrifice is prepared and the Lord has consecrated (not 'bid', AV) His guests.

8, 9 The prophet now turns from the sphere of worship to the life of the royal court. The king is not specifically named but he, his courtiers (officials) and his sons had aped the ways, the dress and the customs of an alien faith. The religious significance of this to the prophet was disloyalty to God. The court was obviously full of cruel and dishonest practices and had apparently grown immensely rich by means of them. 10–13 The commercial life of the city was no better. Zephaniah obviously knew the city well and he knew it to be full of covetousness and dishonesty. The vast majority of the merchant class had done well out of the people's poverty. They had grown inordinately wealthy, lazy and indifferent to God and men. They had survived many a crisis and had even begun to think they could hoodwink God, that He was morally indifferent to what they did. But Zephaniah declared that their hidden assets would be discovered, their magnificent houses would fall into disorder, their grandiose schemes would be unproductive and yield them no satisfaction, but only bitterness and ruin.

Notes. 4 The remnant of Baal. The use of this phrase is sometimes thought to prove that Zephaniah spoke after Josiah's reforms and not before them. This does not necessarily follow, however, and the bulk of the book is against it. What is intended rather is that the very last sign of Baal-worship should disappear. The idolatrous priests (AV 'Chemarims', see NBD, s.v.) were the non-Yahwistic priests. The term was used somewhat contemptuously, and especially of those who tried to combine true and false worship at the high places. 5 Milcom (AV 'Malcham') was the national God of the Ammonites (1 Ki. 11:5, 33; 2 Ki. 23:13) and this worship received much encouragement when Solomon built high places for it in order to please his foreign wives (1 Ki. 11:7f.).

7 Be silent before the Lord God! God's judgment is here shown as a sacrificial feast and this phrase from the Temple liturgy, calling for a breathless silence as the climactic moment approaches, is certainly vivid enough. J. H. Eaton has also suggested that the arrangement, ideas and language of the book could have been influenced by the intention to recite it in the course of Temple services. 9 Leaps over the threshold. This is thought by some to refer to some pagan superstition (cf. 1 Sa. 5:5). In view of the sentence which follows it is perhaps better to regard it as a proverbial term for anyone bent on plunder by oppression. The threshold was considered the domain of the household gods who guarded the dwellers against intrusion. 'Leaping the threshold' was the phrase used to describe anyone who would try to avoid them in order to enrich themselves. 10, 11 The topographical references may indicate the route of the traders into the city. The Fish Gate (also referred to in Ne. 12:39) in the north wall was the entrance into the area of the city known as the Second Quarter (cf. 2 Ki. 22:14). The Mortar (AV 'Maktesh'), so called because it seemed to be a hollowed-out piece of ground, is thought to be that part of the Tyropoeon Valley ('valley of the cheesemakers') where foreign merchants congregated (ISBE, p. 1969). The hills may be another sector or industrial landmark within the city.

12 Thickening upon their lees. The allusion here is to the process of wine-making. The wine must not be allowed to settle or else it thickens with sediment. It has to be poured from one vessel to another in order to mature properly. Character degenerates when it ceases to be disciplined. When men have all they need and become independent of God moral decay soon sets in and contaminates society. Lamps (not 'candles', AV); God is shown here as a night watchman. No-one can hide from Him and no sin escape. This figure of speech moved mediaeval artists painting Zephaniah to show him as the man with the lamp. It was in many ways the correct picture of the man, his character and his mission.

1:14–18 Its imminence

14ff. Zephaniah returns now to the thought of the universal scope of the judgment which the day of the Lord will bring, but the specific emphasis here, adding to the information sketched out in vv. 2, 3, is that the day is near and hastening fast.

There is no favouritism with God and He has an appointment to keep with all men. This passage recalls the famous hymn of Thomas of Celano, the 'Dies Irae' (the wrath of God). The language is apocalyptic in character but the urgency of the situation strikes home with every phrase and is true in every age when men forget or defy God. He will break down the walled fortifications, which suggest those defences behind which men feel safe from God. 16 may suggest an actual invasion of Jerusalem by an enemy already poised to invade, such as could have been prompted by the example of the Scythians, and which was fulfilled by the Babylonians who arrived in 597, and sacked Jerusalem in 587 BC. In any case it is to be clearly the day of the Lord. His wrath has been aroused through the false worship and dishonesty of Jerusalem and its people. 17 When it dawns, men who think they can be independent of God soon discover that they are as helpless as blind men to get away from Him. The whole value will go out of life and the futility but worthlessness of a godless existence is conjured up in the use of the word dung. 18 Neither an abundance of wealth nor the security of vaunted privileges can save from the fire of the jealousy of the Lord, and this will fall on all impartially.

Notes. 14ff. The . . . day of the Lord. According to Von Rad (Old Testament Theology, Vol. II, 1965, p. 119), there are sixteen OT passages which refer to this important idea, and Zephaniah's prophecy concerning it is 'certainly one of the most important sources of material at our disposal'. Prophets such as Isaiah, Amos, Ezekiel, Joel and Zephaniah saw in their current dilemmas situations which called for the intervention of God in judgment. They read back into the story of Israel and believed that God's final uprising would take much the same form as in the days of old. They expected the day of the Lord to bring war in its train, e.g., and they looked at a predicament that was of local or national importance as a phenomenon of cosmic and universal significance. By whatever instrument it was brought to pass, the day of God's zealous anger was largely aroused by His abhorrence of the worship of foreign deities, and His judgment was carried out with unquenchable zeal. (Cf. on Am. 5:18.)

18 The jealousy of God is a familiar OT concept. God is to be worshipped exclusively, and with all the ardour of a thwarted lover He resists the unfaithfulness of His sinning people. We must not, however, think of His jealousy as identical to our human emotion so often charged with anger and sin. God could not be a jealous God if He were not a God of love. God's jealousy is the measure of His love. That is why He wants to possess His people all to Himself. Earth ('land', AV). This change in translation is regretted by some who still think Zephaniah speaks only of Judah and Jerusalem. Some even suggest that v. 18b is not Zephaniah's phrase because of the universal destruction it visualizes. But we have seen above, the near and the distant often merge as the prophets survey the horizon of events. Events which are historically separate are often seen in a timeless sequence. (See S. Winward, A Guide to the Prophets, 1968, p. 107.)

2:1–3 The door of hope

1 Zephaniah now calls for a halt and a final reflection. There may still be a chance. Those who see the worst in human nature are often the first to see a gleam of hope. Following the gloom, unmitigated and unrelieved in any way, Zephaniah sends one shaft of light into the darkness. A remnant may yet be saved. 2, 3 He does not see any way of escape for any but for the humble, whom He mentions in contrast to the proud who have provoked the jealous wrath of God. There is no mention of the mercy of God here, it is true. Zephaniah's gospel appears sternly moral as he commands them to seek righteousness and humility. But we are not to understand that he thinks otherwise than that all our hopes of ultimate salvation begin in the mercy and grace of God.

Notes. 1 Come together and hold assembly. The text is difficult and has been variously translated: 'Gather for yourselves stubble and be stubble' (Wade, WC, 1929); 'Pull yourselves together and collect yourselves' (Eaton, TBC); 'Be ashamed together and feel shame' (J. P. Hyatt, Peake's Commentary, 1962). Whatever the best rendering may be, the sense is clearly a call to humiliation and repentance. It reminds the nation that they are no more able to stand against God than chaff is to withstand the storm. 3 Humble (Heb. ānāw) is the word used so often to describe the devout worshipper of Yahweh. It carried with it the suggestion of an attitude towards God rather than towards men. The meek man is not necessarily the weak man but one who humbles himself before God as opposed to the 'proud' and the 'evildoers'. Who do his commands (cf. 'which have wrought his judgment', AV; 'do right', LXX). Humility expresses itself in obedience to God's will, whatever it may be.

2:4 – 3:8 THE DAY OF THE LORD IMPLEMENTED

2:4–15 Against the nations

This whole passage is a series of prophecies about certain neighbouring nations. The prophet deals in turn with those on the western (vv. 4–7), eastern (vv. 8–11), southern (v. 12) and northern (vv. 13–15) borders of Judah, and the formal way in which this is done suggests a primary didactic intention. In other words, these nations were undoubtedly enemies of God's people yet they are summoned here and addressed as being typical of all the enemies everywhere who oppose God's people and defy His rule. Then, as now, God took steps to pull down the mighty from their seats and to lift up the humble. The proud are humiliated and it makes no difference whether they are in the land of Judah, or of Judah's heathen neighbours.

2:4–7 Philistia. 4 First, the enemy on Judah's western side is mentioned. Through this gateway there had come successive waves of invaders from Europe, from as early as 1200 BC. Commerce came this way and the coastal cities were large and prosperous. The whole area was ruled by a league of five cities (Jos. 13:3) and of these, four are mentioned here: Gaza, Ashkelon, Ashdod, and Ekron. The destruction of the other one, Gath, is mentioned in 2 Ch. 26:6. The area would be depopulated (deserted) as the result of a swift, surprise attack, at noon; i.e. either it would occur when least expected, or it would be over in half a day.

5, 6 The character of the coastal plain (sea coast) would be drastically changed. That it should become a place of pasturage is basically a metaphor for depopulation (cf. Is. 5:14–17), for the shepherd leads his sheep away from busy and peopled areas, but it conceivably also suggests that the materialistic civilization of Philistia could only be reformed by returning to simpler and less sophisticated ways. Behind it all may lie the defeat of Goliath, the Philistine champion, by the shepherd lad, David (1 Sa. 17). This, more than anything else, prepares for the revelation of 7 that this land was then to be given to the remnant of the house of Judah. God always preserves something out of catastrophe on which to rebuild. It is not simply that Judah will be restored nationally but that looking on down the centuries of time God's chosen people, the new Israel of God, will arise. This conception of the remnant pushes back the limitations of race and privilege until at last 'the full number of the Gentiles come in, and so all Israel will be saved' (Rom. 11:25f.).

Notes. 4 The Scythian invasion aimed at Egypt certainly passed through the coastal plain (Herodotus i. 103–106). Nebuchadrezzar captured and destroyed Ashkelon in 604 BC (D. J. Wiseman, Chronicles of Chaldaean Kings, 1956, p. 69). 5 The Cherethites were a Philistine clan occupying the sea coast. They were said to come from Caphtor (Je. 47:4; Am. 9:7) which is generally taken to be Crete. O Canaan, land of the Philistines. The use of the name Canaan as synonymous with Philistia occurs nowhere else in the OT, although in Egyptian inscriptions it is used in different ways. At an earlier time, when the Assyrians occupied all land west of the Jordan except Judah, Canaan was practically confined to what was Philistia. 'Canaanite' was also a term used of merchants, and it could well be that the rich commerce of this land was in the hands of the old original families who controlled the life and industry of the newcomers.

7 Much of this verse is sometimes classed as post-exilic editorial addition because it speaks of the coming glory of the remnant of Judah whose fortunes are to be restored (cf. Hyatt, op. cit.). This rests on a somewhat odd view of the prophets as men who could see the coming divine judgments of the people of God but who then made no attempt to resolve the resulting tension between God's wrathful acts and His previously stated covenant promises. Furthermore, in the present context (cf. Eaton), the victory of the people of God over the Philistines has the deep symbolic value of showing the victory of the godly humble over proud ungodliness, foreshadowed, as we suggested above, in the triumph of David over Goliath. In the same way David's people will ultimately possess all the nations. Any apparent nationalism in the prospect of possessing the nations is smoothed away in the due development of Zephaniah's teaching, wherein he shows that in fact 'the peoples' will be transformed so as to call upon the name of the Lord (3:9).

2:8–11 Moab and Ammon. 8 These two nations are linked together because they were both on the eastern side of Judah, both Semitic in origin and descended from Lot (cf. Gn. 19:36–38). Their reproaches and revilings of God's people were exceedingly bitter, and their desolation would be thorough and permanent. (Cf. Is. 16:6; Je. 48:25–27; Ezk. 25:3, 6, 8.) 9, 10 The seriousness of their offence is reflected in the solemn terms in which this prophecy is announced; As I live, says the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, indicating 'the living nature of the affronted Lord and the certainty of His retribution' (J. G. Gailey).

Notes. 9 Sodom and Gomorrah are often used as outstanding examples of utter overthrow (cf. Dt. 29:23; Is. 13:19; Je. 49:18). In the present context the reference is all the more apt because of the connection of Lot with these nations (cf. Gn. 19). Indeed, the fact that Lot was so mercifully saved from the overthrow even serves to add emphasis to the pronouncement of utter doom on his descendants. Nettles (Heb. ḥārûl, cf. Jb. 30:7; Pr. 24:31) is properly chickling or vetch, a plant of the pea family. The picture is one of a land run wild. This again is a frequent prophetic metaphor for depopulation (cf. Is. 7:23–25).

10, 11 Four thoughts emerge in turn in these verses as Zephaniah reveals the inner motives of the divine wrath against Moab and Ammon. First, it is the due and just reward of their pride (v. 10a). The Lord's acts are always in opposition to sin and directed against guilty sinners. Against this background we are able to see that when the prophet reveals the Lord's second motive as the vindication of His chosen people (v. 10b), this is not a bare act of favouritism. The Moabites invited wrath because of what they were, quite apart from what they did. Yet the truth is precious that the Lord does intervene on behalf of His people. Thirdly (v. 11a), the Lord acts in pursuance of a spiritual conflict with the gods of the earth whom He will not permit to possess for ever what is rightfully His. Fourthly, He designs in thus acting to bring all lands to Himself (v. 11b).

2:12 Ethiopia. The prophet now turns his gaze south. It may be that he is here sarcastically referring to Egypt, because Egypt was ruled by an Ethiopian dynasty 715–663 BC (cf. Hyatt). Alternatively, since this situation in Egypt considerably antedates Zephaniah, it may be that he is using Ethiopia (Heb. kûš) simply as a cypher for the remotest parts of the earth, and thus continuing the vision of the Lord's world-rule from v. 11. If the reference is to Egypt, it may have found fulfilment in Nebuchadrezzar's punitive invasion of Egypt in 568 BC (cf. J. Bright, op. cit., p. 333). This would certainly match the threat that they would be slain by my sword.

2:13–15 Assyria. Assyria was undoubtedly Judah's worst and most bitter and cruel enemy. It was described as 'the climax and fount of heathendom' over 200 years before Israel first felt the weight of bondage to her. About 100 years earlier her hosts swept through the land, and for at least 50 of these this supremacy had been accepted by Judah and expensively paid for. But as she had menaced, so she was now menaced herself. 'It was the close of an epoch' (G. A. Smith, op. cit., p. 66). It is also certain that nothing seemed less likely when it was first prophesied, yet so it was. The nation that ruled the world was brought to nothing, a dry waste like the desert, a lair for wild beasts, and the haunt of beasts and birds. Assyria flaunted her strength and boasted her self-confidence: I am and there is none else (v. 15b; cf. 'I am the Lord, and there is no other', Is. 45:5, 6, 18, 21). The place that was once the centre of pride and glory became nothing more than 'a few mounds and monuments in a wilderness, at which a traveller shakes his head'. So fickle is earthly glory, so uncertain her rewards, and so exact and true the vengeance of God.

Notes. 13 Nineveh was the capital of Assyria. Cf. Nahum passim for the loathsomeness of Nineveh to the people of God, as expressive of all that they had suffered at Assyrian hands. 15 Hisses and shakes his fist, i.e. as an expression of intense scorn and contempt. Cf. Ezk. 27:36; Na. 3:19.

3:1–8 Against Jerusalem

No city is mentioned by name, but it is quite clear that Jerusalem is intended. Up to this point social sins have not been mentioned much in Zephaniah's prophecies, but here he shows that they are far from being forgotten. Indeed it would seem even that he had held off until now in order to give them a special emphasis. Social sins are specially unpardonable in the people of God, they represent the height of iniquity, the supreme sin, the unanswerable indictment of their corrupt worship of God.

1 The impartial wrath of God fastens upon the evil which is all too evident among His own people. The city is charged with active disloyalty (rebellious; better than 'filthy', AV). This is the fundamental tragedy of being out of tune with God and actively engaged against Him. The city has shed innocence and holiness and is defiled. Furthermore, such moral decay had overtaken the city that injustice ruled the day and the oppressing city earned a reputation for injustice and wrong. 2 This attitude was carried over into the religious realm: she behaved with haughtiness and disobedience towards the prophets, acting independently of God and with indifference towards His law. She neither acknowledged His claims nor sought His mercy, neglecting the opportunity to draw near in worship of Him.

3, 4 Four kinds of leaders are mentioned, each found, under the scrutiny of divine judgment, to be wanting and therefore solemnly warned: the rapacious officials, the chief executives; the judges, other rulers and civil servants, who were as fast to pursue injustice as wolves after their prey, and too greedy to leave anything over for another time; the prophets, who trimmed their message in order to court popularity; and the priests, who profaned their sacred task of teaching the law (cf. Mal. 2:5–7), violently altering its precepts. Wanton arises from a verb meaning 'to gush (like water)' (cf. Gn. 49:4, 'unstable'; Jdg. 9:4, 'reckless'). The ideas, therefore, of untrustworthiness and garrulity are combined. 'It characterises the prophets as vapourers, extravagant and arrogant in their own imaginations and conceits' (A. B. Davidson, CBSC, 1920).

5–7 In stark contrast to all this is the unchanging righteousness and justice of the Lord. He is daily showing what is right and good, but the ungodly never learn from it. Indeed, the punishment of other nations was meant to be a warning to Judah, but she was all the more eager to be corrupt. 7 Eager to make their deeds corrupt. Cf. 'rose early, and corrupted', AV; Je. 7:13, 25; 11:7; 26:5, contrast RSV with AV. 8 Zephaniah pleads finally for Jerusalem to return to God. He will surely destroy everything that rises up against Him. This verse has been variously interpreted: by some as an ironical call to Judah to await the predicted universal judgment; by others as an encouragement to bear up until God decides to act. The latter undoubtedly provides the straightforward sense in which it is to be taken. There is, however, little doubt that the 'tinges of apocalypse' are beginning to appear. Zephaniah sees beyond the events that are near, beyond the iniquities of Judah and her neighbours, even beyond the events of the impending future to the time and the judgment of the End. The immediate events are not themselves the end, but 'heralds of the climax' (Winward, op. cit.).

3:9–20 THE VICTORY OF THE LORD

From this point forward there is a new note of victory in the prophecies of Zephaniah. Indeed, the change is so marked that some commentators insist that this section must belong to a much later period, i.e. after the Exile, when optimism might possibly promote a note of triumph. The reality of these verses as the Word of God would not, of course, be imperilled if it were proved to be a later editorial addition, but this has not, in fact, been done, and in these verses Zephaniah can still be heard, singing a new song above and beyond the din of disaster and the dust of judgment.

Eaton rightly points out that the dramatic rituals of the Temple, as reflected in the Psalter, held together the contrasting themes of a judgment which appeared final and an abrupt dawning of mercy and hope when all hope seemed gone (op. cit., pp. 150f.; cf. Introduction to Psalms). To him, as clearly also to Zephaniah, it is 'of fundamental importance . . . that the Day of the Lord must have two necessary aspects: punishment and peace. The conquest of opposition to God's rule is thus matched by the resultant perfection of his kingdom.'

3:9–13 The new Jerusalem

The order of the announcement of judgment (1:2–6) is repeated in the order of the revelation of hope. 9, 10 There is a world-wide vision of redeemed peoples which 11–13 almost at once concentrates its focus upon the new Jerusalem wherein a chastened and humble remnant will no longer be troubled by the proudly exultant and haughty, who had brought nothing but trouble and shame to the city.

Notes. 9 Change the speech of the peoples to a pure speech. This means not that they will worship God with better Hebrew but with purer hearts. Cf. Is. 19:18, 'In that day there will be five cities in . . . Egypt which speak the language of Canaan and swear allegiance to the Lord of hosts.' The divisive curse of Babel (Gn. 11:9) will be gone. 10 The use of Ethiopia here is to include the most distant nations of all, Ethiopia being considered as far away as they could imagine (cf. on 2:12). My suppliants, the daughter of my dispersed ones. Some small textual difficulty does not obscure the essential clarity of this phrase, but the assumption that it refers to the regathering of a Judahite dispersion has led some to assume that we are dealing with a late addition to Zephaniah. Even were this the meaning of the phrase, the conclusion drawn would still be far from necessary, but in fact 'my dispersed peoples' (as the idiom involved could be translated) may well be taken to refer to those whom God purposes to bring to Himself out of every nation. Cf. the 'other sheep' of Jn. 10:16, and 'the children of God who are scattered abroad' of Jn. 11:52. Once more, Zephaniah is looking back to the initial 'dispersion' of Gn. 11:9.

12 Humble (Heb. ānî) means one humbled by misfortune, as compared with ānāw (2:3), which is one who is humble in character. Seek refuge in the name of the Lord; i.e. in contrast with their former, fatal alliances with pagan nations. 13 Two further marks of the people of the new Jerusalem are given. Corresponding to their new-found humility (v. 12) there is their new tongue and speech, ever a prime mark of the regenerate (cf. Jas. 3:2ff.), and matching their seeking of refuge in the Lord (v. 12b) is their unbroken security and peace.

3:14–20 The new Israel

14 This verse commences a series of three distinct pictures of the Lord in relation to His people, which are then followed by three matching statements of their transformation by grace. 15 The Lord is the King of Israel, seen here performing the distinctively kingly acts of pronouncing an acquittal over His people (v. 15a), driving out their foes (v. 15b), and guaranteeing their security (v. 15d). 16, 17a Continuing the theme of security from the end of v. 15, we now see the Lord as a warrior, encouraging the spirit of His people (v. 16) and giving victory (v. 17a). 17b, 18a The third picture now follows. RSV agrees with many commentators in assuming some need to read a different text here. Consequently we read that he will renew you in his love (following LXX). Wade (op. cit.) emends to 'He will be stirred in his love', as being more in keeping with the Lord's exuberant joy. The Hebrew, however, reads, 'He will be silent in his love' (RSV mg.). Eaton comments: 'He is further represented as the Bridegroom, who in his love for his bride, Zion, now proclaims his joy, now falls into rapt silence.' 18b Now comes the first of the matching statements of a transformed people. Corresponding to the work of the King (vv. 14f.), there is a people freed from reproach and disaster, if this is indeed the meaning of a most difficult text.

19 The divine warrior who called for an end to despondency (v. 16b) is matched by a people changed from the helplessness of lameness and banishment to praise and renown. 20 Finally, the Bridegroom brings home His bride and she sees at last with her own eyes all that her Lover and Lord has done for her. And lest for us, the Bride of Christ, the tarrying of the vision should provoke any lingering doubt of the promise, Zephaniah ends his prophecy with words which provide a divine countersignature upon its authority and a shout of triumphant assurance echoing out of his heart and into ours: 'The Lord has said it.'

JOHN T. CARSON

Haggai

INTRODUCTION

AUTHOR

Haggai, the earliest prophet of the post-exilic restoration of Judah, is known, apart from this book, only from references made to him in Ezra. These show him as a contemporary of Zechariah, serving in Judah and Jerusalem. As a result of their joint ministry the work of rebuilding the Temple was resumed and completed (Ezr. 5:1; 6:14). Nothing is stated about the private life of Haggai and it is generally assumed that he was one of the main group of exiles who returned from Babylonia following the decree of Cyrus in 538/7 BC, which allowed the rebuilding of the Jerusalem Temple. If so he would have witnessed the initial work then undertaken and the subsequent lapse of effort in the face of opposition. Since he employs a technical ritual argument (Hg. 2:11–14) it has been suggested that he was in some way connected with the Temple service. Such a general interpretation of the law, however, made as a result of an inquiry, and the allusion to the covenant promise made at the time of the Exodus (Hg. 2:5), would be known to any devout Jew. His name Haggai (Lat. Festus, Gk. Hilary) could simply imply that he was born or dedicated on a festal day. The name could be similar to that borne by several Levites (Gn. 46:16; Nu. 26:15) or a variant of Haggiah (1 Ch. 6:30). Tradition (Epiphanius) describes him as a young man on the return from Babylon; there is no evidence for the view that he was of great age, having seen the Solomonic Temple before its destruction in 587 BC (as some assume from Hg. 2:3) or that he reached the city with a special party under Zerubbabel only briefly before his recorded prophecies. The LXX links Haggai and Zechariah with Pss. 137; 144–148.

The prophecies are introduced by date formulae which ascribe them to precise days in the sixth (1:1, 15), seventh (2:1) and ninth months (2:10, 20) of the second regnal year of Darius I (Hystaspes) of Persia who ruled 522–486 BC, i.e. 29 August–19 November, 520 BC. The language and style is consistent with this date.

This was a time when the outlying provinces of the Persian Empire, each under their appointed governor (1:1), were deprived of direct help from the central government. The enlightened policy of encouraging local autonomy in secular and religious affairs initiated by Cyrus, by whose decree the first return of Jews had begun in 536 BC, had ceased with his death some 6 years later. His son Cambyses (530–522) showed less sympathy to vassal states and this doubtless contributed to the failure of the Jewish people to press forward with the reconstruction of the Temple at Jerusalem where work had come to a standstill soon after the arrival of the first returnees under Sheshbazzar, the Judean governor nominated by the Persians. This interruption was prolonged by the opposition of the Samaritans and local landowners which led to a prohibition of further work. Cambyses failed to use his powers to uphold the lost building permit originally granted by his father (Ezr. 4). On the death of Cambyses revolts broke out, one leading to the seizure of the throne by Bardiya until his death at the hand of Darius three months later. In Babylonia a local revolt brought Nidintu-Bel (Nebuchadrezzar III) to the throne (3 October–18 December, 522). On his defeat Darius gained control there for almost a year. Then Araka (Nebuchadrezzar IV) led another rebellion, and it was late in 521 BC before Darius could restore order there. The effect of these disturbances on the economy and on communications with the west was worsened by a series of famines. Haggai is the sole direct evidence for these troubled conditions in Judah at this time (cf. Zc. 1:11), though archaeological evidence supports his statements concerning the prevalence of poverty (1:9–11; 2:16, 17). Morale was low and men concentrated on the betterment of their own circumstances. To them it was an inappropriate time to spend effort and wealth on God's house (1:2).

MESSAGE

Haggai is designated 'the prophet' (1:1, etc., also Ezr. 5:1; 6:14) by whom came the word of the Lord (1:1, 3, 5, 7, 9; 2:1, 10). He claimed to be sent by the Lord (1:12, 13) and to be under His authority (Ezr. 5:1). His single objective was to encourage the people to complete an unfinished task, the building of the Temple. Although his public work as recorded covered only about three months, he was to be one of the few prophets who lived to see the fulfilment of his words, the work being finished in the sixth year of Darius (6 October, 516; Ezr. 6:15). His words were expressly stated to have greatly helped the work forward (Ezr. 5:1).

He concentrates thought upon the Temple of the Lord as the place of the divine presence and glory (1:8; 2:3, note also the frequent reference to 'I am with you', 'among you' (1:13; 2:5, etc.). This was in no way to encourage dependence on the physical Temple, and in this he followed Jeremiah (Je. 7:4). Haggai clearly stated that the failure to complete the House of God was the direct cause of the unfavourable economic conditions. The Law taught that such conditions resulted from national sin (1:11; Dt. 11:17; Am. 4:7). Thus directly, as indirectly in the analogy of levitical uncleanness (2:11–14), Haggai followed the earlier prophets in diagnosing the cause of the present low spiritual and economic state of the people. Unlike Amos, who uses the prevailing distress as the basis for a call to repentance (Am. 4:6–11), Haggai stresses it as a call to works meet for repentance. It was left to his contemporary to call directly for repentance (Zc. 1:3f.). Though different in presentation, Haggai's message is identical in purpose with that of Zechariah and follows the same general arrangement and dating. The book of Haggai reminds us that God's will and work must always take priority. 'Seek first his kingdom and his righteousness, and all these things shall be yours as well' (Mt. 6:33).

It has been argued that Haggai marks the change from prophet to teacher. In practice these roles are always combined in OT prophecy. His recurrent use of brief quotations introduced as 'Thus says the Lord' or of questions (1:4, 9; 2:3, 12, 15, 19) have been taken to foreshadow the later rabbinic style of teaching, but these can equally be found in the earlier prophets. The style and brevity of the prophecies may also be explained by taking them as but a selection related expressly to the work on the Temple from the prophet's fuller sayings. His style is terse, direct and forceful and thus admirably suited to his purpose. He preaches for a decision and response to God's demands (1:12) and throughout appeals to the mind and emotions. He employs a rhythmic prose style rather than the common poetic form often characteristic of the prophets (but cf. 2:4, 5, 14). Most scholars accept the integrity of the book and message though a few consider the introductory formulae as artificial and some material as out of place (e.g. 1:15a), but this often requires emendation of the text which is not supported by any internal or external evidence. The message is consistent and unified.

In keeping with the rising feelings of nationalism encouraged by the external political situation, Haggai looks forward to the ultimate glory of the finished Temple. Like Isaiah before him, he sees it as a place of international significance (2:6–9; cf. Is. 2:2–4). At the same time he points ahead to the Messianic hopes revived in the new 'shoot' of the Davidic line to spring up from the barren earth (2:20–23; cf. Je. 23:5). Zerubbabel would continue the promised royal line in Zion; he was to be the ruling authority (signet) of the new age marked by the completed Temple. Man-wrought economic distress would be replaced by divinely-given prosperity.

1:1, 2 THE MESSAGE TO THE LEADERS

The principal subject of the whole collection of prophecies—the building of the Temple—is introduced by a statement of the problem which hinders the work. The civil and religious leaders are told of the people's doubts that it was an appropriate time to take action.

1 The use of a precise date to introduce a specific prophecy is common in post-exilic writings (e.g. Zc. 1:1, 7; Dn. 7:1; 8:1; 9:1; Ezk. 8:1). Zerubbabel, i.e. 'seed of Babylon', was thus born in exile. He was son of Shealtiel and thus grandson of the last rightful ruler of Judah, Jehoiachin (cf. Ezr. 3:2; Mt. 1:12). In 1 Ch. 3:19 he is said to be son of Pedaiah, perhaps by levirate marriage (but LXX here agrees with Hg. 1:1). The special term (district-) governor (peḥah) is a reminder of foreign domination. It accords with Ezra's 'governor of the Jews' (Ezr. 6:7). Both civil and religious leaders are equally responsible to God. 2 This people implies that Haggai considered himself their spokesman. The time has not yet come (cf. v. 4). The tense indicates their low morale for it implies that they also did not see a future appropriate time coming. Their excuse could not be occupation with harvest for that was now past (first and fifth months) or the opposition of the Samaritans and Persian government, for that was 16 years previously (cf. Ezr. 4:1–5). It is noteworthy that none of these factors delayed the work when once there was the will to do it.

1:3–11 THE CHALLENGE TO THE PEOPLE

The people are asked the same question as their leaders since they are equally responsible and guilty of neglecting God's house. The underlying cause of their failure and of their feeble circumstances is shown to be selfishness. This sin is emphasized by the withholding of divine blessing.

4 Is it a time for you . . .? This could be a rhetorical question, in effect an emphatic denial. Haggai goes straight to the point. What are our priorities? Should people live in panelled houses while wood is in short supply for the House of God (this house)? The technical term (sāpan) is used of decorative panels (1 Ki. 7:7) and of roofing beams (1 Ki. 6:9) and might have been chosen as a play on the identically spelt Aramaic/Babylonian verb (sāpānu) meaning 'flattened (crushed)', a sidelong glance at the contrasting state of the Lord's House. The latter verb is used also of ground prepared for sowing seed. 5 'Consider your ways' (AV; cf. v. 7; 2:15, 18), consider how you have fared (RSV). The former is preferable since the challenge is to decide on the future ways (plur.), meaning 'way of life'. 6 Cf. vv. 9–11. A description of the barrenness of life and ineffectual work as a pointer to spiritual need. 8 Bring wood may indicate that this was the main commodity required, since stone would be at hand. As with the Solomonic Temple, the design may have followed the Syrian style with wood beams laid as courses between the stones. The reference to 'ruins' (v. 4) may preclude the view that all that was still needed was wood from the mountains (i.e. large logs) for roofing. On either interpretation the major need required sacrifice and effort if it was to be met. God's glory was always thought to be expressed visually (cf. Ex. 16:7) especially in His House (cf. 2 Ch. 7:1–3) and in the body of His people as a temple (cf. 1 Cor. 3:16; 6:19). All material things are to be used for His glory and not for selfish ends. 9 Brought it home; to your own house as opposed to Mine. 10 The heavens withholding their dew was set as a direct sign of God's displeasure on sin (cf. Dt. 11:10–12; 28:23, 28; Am. 4:7) and as such was to be regarded as a call to repentance.

1:12–15 THE RESPONSE OF THE PEOPLE

Obedience to God's Word through His messenger brings unity of purpose, a further word from the Lord, encouragement and stimulus to right action.

12 The remnant of the people (cf. v. 14; 2:2, 3) is used as in Isaiah's eschatology (cf. Is. 10:20f.) of all those who would keep true faith and righteousness (cf. Zc. 8:6–8, 12). It does not refer only to the returned exiles or those left in the land. The phrase cannot be dismissed as a gloss since it defines the necessary subject for the final sentence, the people . . . the Lord. The voice of the Lord and the words of Haggai the prophet are shown to be identical. This is true prophecy. The source of the words in God and their consequent authority over men is acknowledged in the obedience of the people. This always results in the fear of the Lord, i.e. an attitude of heart and mind which leads to worship, wisdom and the renunciation of evil (cf. Pr. 1:7; 8:13). 13 The messenger of the Lord follows from his being 'sent' by the Lord (v. 12). The term is used by Isaiah (42:19; 44:26) and in the name of Malachi (1:1; 3:1; 'My messenger'). He was this because he acted 'in the commission of the Lord' (rather than with the Lord's message). The word could be used also of an 'angel' (cf. Gn. 19:1) or of any messenger (hence the qualifying words here), the derivative noun being commonly used for 'occupation, work'. I am with you is an unchanging promise by an unchanging God. These words have always stirred men to faith and action, so Moses (Ex. 3:12), Gideon (Jdg. 6:16) and the disciples of Christ (Mt. 28:20).

14 Obedience to the commands of God always results in, and is witnessed by, the Spirit of God working on the spirit of man (cf. 2:5). 15 The unexpected date can best be explained as an indication of the time (23 days) taken to respond to the call of v. 1. Before work could begin time would be needed for the acquisition of materials and personnel. The proposition that it is an out-of-place preface to 2:15–19 would require an emendation of the text to 'ninth' month, the date of the new foundation (2:18), and would imply that the prophecies have not been arranged in chronological order. A considerable rearrangement of the whole text would be needed to give logical sense to the whole new idea and is unnecessary.

2:1–9 THE WORD OF ENCOURAGEMENT

After one month's hard toil God graciously sends a further word of encouragement to all the team as they work. This time any despondency is dispelled by a reminder of the previous word (v. 4, 'I am with you'), an exhortation to renewed effort (v. 4, 'take courage', 'work') and a promise of unfailing power (v. 6, 'I will shake'), provision (v. 8) and ultimate splendour and prosperity (v. 9).

1 The seventh month . . . the twenty-first day was the last day of the Feast of Tabernacles and preceded the day of solemn assembly (cf. Lv. 23:34–36). 3 Despite the joyful occasion a few were downcast at the contrast between their puny efforts and Solomon's great building (cf. Ezr. 3:12). 4 Take courage. The word means to be or grow firm. The people of the land here is not a special term for peasants or any particular class, but denotes all citizens. God's presence is the source and strength of all true work (cf.

Jos. 1:6, 9). 5 The promise was traditionally known and repeated by all devout Jews (cf. Ex. 29:45; Ne. 9:20; Zc. 4:6). 6 Once again is another reference back to the Sinai events (cf. Ex. 19:18). A little while—to encourage steadfast hope (cf. Jn. 16:16). I will shake the heavens; quoted in Heb. 12:26, 27. 7 All nations points to the future when, as at the Lord's coming, all nations will pay tribute to His people (cf. Is. 60:9–11). The present disturbances in the Persian lands might well have occasioned the thought. The treasures. RSV here follows LXX. RV 'the desirable things' is preferable to AV 'the desire', since the following verb is plural. Or read possibly 'that which is desired (by the Lord)'. There is not necessarily a reference here to the Messiah. Rather it points to the gifts to be brought by the Gentile rulers to adorn the Temple. This would have a first fulfilment soon (v. 9; cf. Ezr. 6:8, 9) but not completely so until Christ's reign (cf. Eph. 2:17–22). Zechariah emphasized the eagerness with which men would desire to associate themselves with God's people in Jerusalem (Zc. 8:20–23).

8 The splendour of the Temple, though from one point of view the result of man's wealth and labour, is nevertheless God-given. This is the biblical answer to man's claim of absolute possession. 9 I will give prosperity. Thus RSV translates a word often found as 'peace' (cf. AV, RV). It is in fact more comprehensive than either translation, signifying total spiritual, mental and physical well-being. This is the opposite of the conditions then experienced by the builders. The Lord of hosts, a title of God which stresses His universal dominion and control of the forces of heaven and earth, is particularly appropriate here. Note its frequent use (15 times) in this short book. The occurrence throughout Isaiah (49 times) and Jeremiah (76 times) shows that it cannot be used for dating sections of the text (cf. 1 Sa. 1:3, 11).

2:10–19 THE PROMISE OF BLESSING

Between this and the last message Zechariah had called for repentance (Zc. 1:3–6). Haggai now underlines that demand by a public question to the priests (vv. 12–15). This aimed, by analogy with the levitical law, to remind the people that the fact that they were engaged in work on a holy place did not of itself make them holy. The sin which had led God to judge His people and allow the destruction of the very place they were rebuilding persisted. Contact with holy peoples, places or things will not make a man holy (cf. 2 Tim. 2:22). By realizing the true state of affairs they would be ready to take the first step, showing the reality of their repentance by their work, which would be followed by immediate blessing (vv. 16–19).

2:10–15 The reality and realization of sin

Failure to free themselves from dead works had brought failure just as contact with a dead body (failed life) rendered anyone touching it unclean (Nu. 19:13). Sin is contagious in the human race and can continue to be infectious even when a holy life has begun.

11 Ask the priests; their ritual had been continued amid the building activities. This question is insufficient evidence to class Haggai himself as a ritualist; rather it identifies him with the earlier prophets who upheld the traditional law. 13 Unclean may well have been applied by the newly returned exiles to the hostile Samaritans and to those locals who had maintained a ritual at the altar set up in the ruins (the dead thing; cf. Ezr. 4–5) which to them would be imperfect. Haggai makes it clear that it refers to the people, nation and work (v. 14). 15 Stone . . . upon a stone refers either to the present reconstruction or back to the earlier work begun 16 years before. If to the latter, the following verses (15, 16) hark back to the perilous state of the economy discussed in 1:9–11.

2:16–19 The need for repentance and work

17 Blight and mildew were given as signs that the Law had been broken (cf. Dt. 28:22; Am. 4:9). Yet you did not return to me renders a difficult text in the light of Am. 4:9. 18 The twenty-fourth day picks up v. 10 to emphasize from this day onward (cf. vv. 15, 19), a phrase customary in drawing up ancient legal documents involving new pledges. The day that the foundation . . . was laid may well relate to the ritual act to mark a new start (as Ezr. 3:10). If this and the date given in this verse are accepted there need be no clash with the Ezra account. More than one foundation ritual was commonly employed for temples (J. S. Wright, Building of the Second Temple, 1958, p. 17). It is likely that the first marked the subterranean foundation-laying and the second the first building at ground level as in ancient Mesopotamian practice. This phrase could also be a simple reference to work continued on the foundations laid by Sheshbazzar (cf. Ezr. 5:16).

2:20–23 THE PREDICTION TO THE PRINCE

A special message is sent to Zerubbabel, heir to the throne of David and a link in the line to Jesus Christ (cf. Mt. 1:13). It tells of the dominion of the Lord of hosts (v. 21), already the subject of the second prophecy (vv. 6, 7), and of the choice of the Judean prince to bear the authority of kingship (signet).

Some have criticized this section as it bears the same date as the preceding prophecy, repeats 2:6, 7 and does not seem to correspond to Zc. 6:11 which describes the coronation of Joshua the high priest as 'Messiah'. But this involves the unlikely assumptions that no more than one prophetic message could be given in a single day or a phrase be used by more than one prophet (Is. 13:13; Joel 3:16; cf. Heb. 12:26). The reclothing and coronation of Joshua is a separate incident emphasizing the priestly function of Messiah (J. Davies, Princeton Theological Review 18, 1920, pp. 256–268) which in Christ was to be combined with the royal powers here vested in Zerubbabel. The latter's rule was real though little is known about it, as is the case of others in the Messianic line. He was closely associated with Joshua (Hg. 1:1, 12; 2:4). Both were 'typical' (so Zc. 3:8). There are thus no grounds for asserting that Zerubbabel's designation as Messiah is a case of unfulfilled prophecy.

20 For the second time in a single day Haggai has to speak, this time to an individual. To Haggai. When compared with the earlier 'by Haggai' (1:1, 3; 2:1, 10) this is slender evidence for the view that demands a change in the role from prophet to teacher. 21 Once again God will intervene in human affairs (shake the heavens and the earth, so v. 6). As the former promise of the same action (v. 6) resulted in the universal recognition of the Temple, so now all would see in the overthrow of Judah's opponents Zerubbabel's authority continuing the Davidic line as a new, independent and authoritative leader. 23 Zerubbabel would be recognized publicly. The signet ring was the official mark of supreme authority as well as of the pledge and favour of the Lord towards His own people (cf. Ct. 8:6). The imagery of the ring had been used of Zerubbabel's grandfather (Je. 22:24). While Haggai may have foreseen the violent end of the Persian Empire, it has been suggested that the silence concerning the fate of Zerubbabel might mean that he was subsequently demoted by the Persians for his aspirations of independence. Against this, Haggai was himself still active when the Temple was completed (cf. Ezr. 6:14).

These brief prophecies close on a spiritual note. All human activity which is to build and not pull down must be the result of divine action in that He 'will take . . . will make . . . has chosen'. As Haggai's contemporary wrote, 'This is the word of the Lord to Zerubbabel: Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, says the Lord of hosts' (Zc. 4:6).

Zechariah

INTRODUCTION

THE BOOK

Luther described the book of Zechariah as 'the quintessence of the prophets'. This term, from ancient philosophy, was used of a heavenly substance latent in all things, and so has come to mean the essential nature of a thing, the refined extract, the pure and perfect form. Allowing for a modicum of overstatement in Luther's estimate, it remains true that Zechariah exhibits many links with earlier prophecy. Thus, the four horns in 1:18 reflect Dn. 7:7, etc.; the measuring line in 2:1 reminds us of Je. 31:39 and Ezk. 40:3; the brand plucked from the burning in 3:2 of Am. 4:11; the seven eyes in 4:10 of 2 Ch. 16:9; the call to righteousness in 7:9, 10 of the language of the book of Exodus (e.g. 22:21–24); the penalty of scattering in 7:14 of Lv. 26:33 and Dt. 4:27, 28; 28:36, 37; the prospect of Jerusalem in 8:3–13 of Is. 2:2–4; 54:1–17; Je. 3:17, 18; 50:4, 5; and the oracles against surrounding nations in 9:1ff. of Am. 1:2 – 2:3. The promise of restoration in 1:17; 2:10 recalls Is. 40:1; Ho. 2:23; Mi. 7:14; and the living waters flowing from Jerusalem in 14:8 recall the new Jerusalem of Ezekiel's theocracy (Ezk. 40–48, especially 47:1ff.). As Zechariah claims in 1:1–7 and 7:1ff., he is in the strict prophetical succession, and his pure Hebrew echoes the language of his predecessors in the sacred office. Zechariah's far-reaching acquaintance with all parts of the OT was due to his priestly duty of interpreter of the sacred writings.

The second and third sections of the book (chs. 9–11, 12–14), consisting of a series of predictions, must be read in the light of the NT as Messianic, either directly or indirectly. The Apocalypse of the NT is coloured by images taken from this book.

THE PROPHET

The title 'prophet' in Zc. 1:1 comes at the end of his genealogy and belongs naturally to him as the chief person named. Brackets are really required after the names Zechariah and Iddo, contrary to the Hebrew punctuation, however, which connects the title with Iddo, his grandfather.

We know nothing about Zechariah's life except what is revealed here. His ancestor, Iddo (Ezr. 5:1; 6:14), head of a returned priestly family (Ne. 12:4), was part of the captivity led back by Zerubbabel and Joshua (cf. Ne. 12:16). The inference is that Zechariah was both a priest and a prophet.

Evidently Zechariah's father died while he was still young, so that he was reared by the head of the clan and brought to Jerusalem while a boy. The suggestion is often repeated that the reference to Berechiah, his father, is an insertion here from Is. 8:2 (Jeberechiah), but this is unnecessary. The link between Zechariah and Berechiah persists in Mt. 23:35 (cf. Lk. 11:51) which certainly points to the fact that the combination of the two names was a familiar one. Does it also suggest that Zechariah was actually martyred, and thus throw light on the mysterious reference to the smitten shepherd in Zc. 13:7?

The prophet's name means 'Jah remembers', and was a common one in the OT, being found twenty-eight times. He probably returned from exile with his grandparents in 537 BC and grew up in the rampartless city while the Temple foundations were being laid and while the building operations were in abeyance. In 520 BC, in company with his fellow-prophet Haggai, he sought to arouse the remnant of the returned exiles to recommence the work. The 'man with a measuring line' in 2:1ff. may be his own image projected into the night vision.

The peculiar nature of these night visions in chs. 1–8 marks a transition stage between the older type of prediction and national diagnosis, and what is called apocalyptic, with its lurid portrayal of the future in terms of catastrophic imagery. Affinities have been sought in the Akkadian oracular dreams of Ashurbanipal (ANET, 451), but the links are slender. The prophet in fact always retained his self-consciousness and remained alert to question the angelic medium concerning the significance of the events revealed.

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

The period covered by chs. 1–8 is that of Ezr. 5 and 6. In the first year of Cyrus the Great of Persia, a decree had permitted the return of the Jews from exile in Babylon, with a licence to rebuild the Temple of the Lord at Jerusalem; cf. 2 Ch. 36:22f.; Ezr. 1:1f.; Is. 44:28. Zerubbabel, son of Shealtiel and legal heir to the throne of David, led the return; cf. Ezr. 3:8; 5:16 (where he is named Sheshbazzar; see further on Ezr. 1:8); Hg. 1:1, 12; Mt. 1:12; Lk. 3:27. In 1 Ch. 3:19 he is called the son of Pedaiah (son of Jeconiah, son of Jehoiakim). Shealtiel probably died without male issue, and his brother Pedaiah (in accordance with Dt. 25:5–10) had taken his deceased brother's wife (cf. Je. 22:18; 28:30).

A feeble response had hindered the work of rebuilding and local opposition had also delayed it. The two prophets provoked the people to renewed activity and the Temple site was completed. Unlike Solomon's Temple, and the Tabernacle previously, the new edifice did not contain the Shekinah glory (cf. Ex. 40:34; 1 Ki. 8:10, 11; 2 Ch. 5:13f.; Hg. 2:7–9). The references in Zechariah to glory (e.g. 2:5, 8, 10) may be due to this omission. There is instead a Messianic significance to the term; cf. Hg. 2:7, 8.

TEXT AND CANON

Ecclus. 49: 10 (c. 180 BC) refers to 'the twelve prophets', and probably implies that the prophetic canon was already fixed by that date. According to C. D. Ginsburg, the order of the twelve is not the same in every MS, nor in the earliest editions of the printed Hebrew Bible. It is, however, an essential preliminary to the subject-matter of the next section to note that in them all, chs. 9–14 appear as an essential part of Zechariah, separate from the roll of Malachi. There is no MS evidence that they were ever considered to be an addition from an unknown source. For fuller references to the Talmudim see W. H. Lowe, Hebrew Students' Commentary, 1882, p. xvii. No doubt was ever cast on the genuineness of the last six chapters by the Rabbis. The language is good classical Hebrew, free from Aramaisms which might have been expected in a returned exile, but which may have been avoided on purpose to show the spiritual lineage with the former prophets. The text is obscure in parts and there may be minor displacements (e.g. 13:7–9) and possibly an occasional gloss. An obscure text, however, is not necessarily a corrupt one. In textual studies the harder reading is often to be preferred, in view of the tendency of scribes to simplify the rendering.

THE COMPILATION

The prevailing tendency among scholars is to divide Zc. 1–8 from Zc. 9–11 and 12–14, and to introduce each section with the title, 'An Oracle'. Cf. Zc. 9:1; 12:1; Mal. 1:1. The night visions and their two appendices (2:6–13; 3:6–10) are thus severed from the verbal predictions. The first scholar to question the genuineness of chs. 9–14 was Mede, the great exponent of prophecy, who died in 1638. He questioned it on the ground that Mt. 27:9 (evidently from Zc. 11:12, 13) ascribed it to Jeremiah. Also the pre-exilic allusions in chs. 9–11 convinced him of a different authorship. No-one today argues for a pre-exilic authorship, however. E. J. Young (Introduction to the Old Testament, 1958, pp. 278ff.) gives an interesting account of the history of interpretation and shows that scholarship is divided on the issue. In view of the great variety of dates proposed for the different strands within the section 9–14, no confidence can be placed in any one of the proposed solutions. This particular period of Jewish history is meagre in data and our knowledge of it is limited. It is hazardous to be dogmatic. P. R. Ackroyd (Peake's Commentary on the Bible, 1962, p. 651) says, 'It may be wondered whether the attempt to date the allusions is the most useful method of approach.'

Three main arguments are employed against the unity of authorship. First, it is argued that there is a different atmosphere in chs. 1–8 from that of 9–11 and 12–14. The first section is concerned with the rebuilding of the Temple and the restoration of the nation. The second and third sections face a different situation altogether. Neighbouring peoples, a discredited prophetic institution, and discord between Judah and Jerusalem fill the canvas. Second, 9:13 refers to the sons of Javan (Greece) as the dominant power in the Middle East, whereas in Zechariah's day Persia predominated. Third, the changed form of the prophecy points to a later era.

In reply, traditional defenders of Zechariah's authorship affirm that difference of style, language and form can be fairly explained on two grounds. a. When chs. 9–14 were written, the situation had changed radically from that of 520 BC. Also Zechariah was older. His message, therefore, was aligned to face a new age. b. Visions are bound to take a different structure from verbal predictions. Van Hoonacker in 1908 argued that the subject determines the nature of the media to be employed. L. G. Rignell (Die Nachtgesichte des Sacharja, 1950) argued that Zechariah prophesied at three different times and was also editor of his own work. Literature, like music, can differ in form and yet emerge from the same mind. Even within the same composition changes of form may be devised to convey the complex features of the work, but subtle links will be found to unify the whole.

These are not lacking in Zechariah. E.g., a. an expression is found in both parts of the book, which only elsewhere occurs in Ezk. 35:7: literally, 'from passing through and from returning', 7:14; 9:8. b. The formula 'says the Lord' is common to the whole book, appearing in 10:12, 12:1, 4; 13:2, 7, 8 as well as throughout part one. c. 'The eyes of the Lord' occurs in 4:10 (cf. 3:9); 9:8; 12:4. d. 'Lord of hosts' as a title of deity occurs in 1:6, 12; 2:9; 9:15; 10:3; 13:2. e. The active verb yāšaḇ ('to sit', 'dwell') is used in the passive sense in 2:4; 7:7; 12:6; 14:10, and rarely elsewhere. f. Cf. 2:10 with 9:9 for resemblance of language and ideas. In both parts of Zechariah there is a fullness of language as the writer lingers on a word, phrase or idea; e.g. 6:13; 9:5; 12:4. g. Five sections to a verse are rare in Hebrew, yet in both 6:13 and 9:5, 7 this feature is found. h. In both parts no mention is made of any earthly ruler except the Messiah.

The strand that runs through the whole like a thread is the habit of incorporating quotations from the other books of the OT. Suggestive images, dominant ideas, particular words all echo a single mind. The unity is thus deeper than appears at first sight. These are not proofs in themselves, but they are pointers towards the reasonableness of accepting the MS evidence of the unity of authorship. The lack of agreement in critical analysis shows up the difficulty of providing a satisfactory alternative.

The strongest argument for post-exilic authorship is the reference to the sons of Javan (Greece) in 9:13. 'From about 520 BC onwards the Greeks in Asia Minor were a continual source of trouble to Darius, and in 500 BC a great Ionian revolt occurred. In 499 BC the Athenians burnt the Persian stronghold of Sardis, and in 490 BC and 480 BC, the Persians, in full-scale invasion of Greece, were defeated at Marathon and Salamis' (NBD, art. 'Zechariah, Book of'). The prophet could have seen Greece as a menace to the Persian Empire, and accordingly it fits Zechariah's day as well as any later time. Indeed the defeat of Greece is also foreseen, in company with other nations, in the purpose of God.

THE CHARACTER OF GOD

The prophet's messages to the people, like every sermon, were conditioned by a particular situation. Except by inference these situations are unknown to us now. The compilers of the Canon preserved these utterances as authentic words of God because they felt such messages were readily applicable to a wider audience and to new needs in the worshipping community. Every truth in the book hinges on the character of God revealed to the prophet and portrayed by him in his declarations.

The Lord had a supreme purpose in making Jerusalem the centre of the world and the city of His presence (Zc. 1:1–6; 8:7). But this goal could not be achieved without His people being prepared for such bliss. The prophet, therefore, had to warn men of the punishability of sin and to promise deliverance to the penitent (cf. 3:2, 9; 5:3, 4, 8). His control extended to all nations and to the whole of creation (cf. 8:23; 12:1). Ultimately all nations will recognize Him as King (cf. 2:13; 6:1–8; 14:16–21).

His will is communicated in a variety of ways. His Word is given through angelic agents, oracular media and the pressure of a burden upon a sensitive spirit. God's Spirit is the controlling agency and the energizing force (cf. 4:6). His character is just and no ritual observance can appease His righteousness (cf. 7:5–14). Yet due seemliness in worship is required (cf. 2:13; 14:16–21). Acceptance of man by the Lord of hosts is dependent upon repentance, and the cleansing fires of judgment and grace and the divine promise to bless (cf. 3:2; 12:10; 13:1–9).

The Lord's purpose is centred on the Messiah. In part one He is lowly (cf. 3:8, 'my servant'), of Davidic origin (cf. 6:12, 'the Branch'; see also Is. 4:2; Je. 23:5; cf. Is. 11:1). In part two He follows the Davidic pattern as Shepherd (cf. 11:4; 12:10; 13:7) and as the King (cf. 9:9; 14:9).

The early Christians saw a fulfilment of some of these predictions in the life and passion of Jesus (cf. 11:13 with Mt. 27:9). His ministry was patterned on these oracles (cf. 13:7 with Mt. 26:31). He also provided them with the key to unlock the Messianic secret and to interpret the allusions in Scripture to His own Person (cf. Lk. 24:44, 45). Other links are to be found between this book and the NT. Additional to the bare reference to Zechariah in Mt. 23:35, a wide range of apocalyptic imagery is quarried from his book (cf. Mt. 24:30 with Zc. 12:12; Mt. 24:36 and Mk. 13:32 with Zc. 14:7; Mt. 26:15 with Zc. 11:12). In addition Acts 1:11 must be linked with Zc. 14:4, and 1 Thes. 3:13 with Zc. 14:5; cf. Jude 14.

John in the Apocalypse also drew upon this source for material (cf. Zc. 1:8 with Rev. 6:4, 5; Zc. 1:18, 19, 21 with Rev. 17:3, 16; Zc. 3:4 with Rev. 7:14; Zc. 3:9 with Rev. 5:6; Zc. 4:2 with Rev. 1:12; 11:4; note the phrase, 'Sir, you know', in Rev. 7:14 as an echo of Zc. 4:13; cf. Zc. 6:2, 3 with Rev. 6:2; Zc. 6:11 and 9:16 with Rev. 6:2; Zc. 12:10 with Rev. 1:7; Zc. 14:7 with Rev. 21:23, 25; Zc. 14:8 with Rev. 22:1; Zc. 14:11 with Rev. 22:3). The ultimate fulfilment of many of these realities lies in the unknown future, but it is a day 'known to the Lord' (cf. 14:7).

ANALYSIS OF CONTENTS

Zechariah belonged to the prophetic succession (1:1). In the prologue (1:2–6) the lesson of history is spelled out and becomes the divine word to the returned exiles.

Then follow eight visions (1:7 – 6:15) to portray the divine zeal for the rebuilding of Zion. The Lord has intervened in the events of the times to deliver His own people from their oppressors, and to resettle them in their own land (1:7–21). Zion will be rebuilt (2:1–13) and the Temple restored with a consecrated high priest (3:1–5). He will typify the Messiah, whose special name here is the Branch, to signify both His humble human origin and His supernatural growth (3:6–10). Israel will be like the golden candlestick in the Temple, a lampstand for the divine light to shine into the darkness of the world (4:1–14). In order to achieve this position the nation must be purged of guilt by its recognition and its removal (5:1–11). These two visions of the flying scroll and the women in the barrel are linked with the chariots of the Lord (6:1–8) by a key phrase 'going forth'. The heavenly patrol represents the divine control of the nations. The section concludes with a symbolic crowning of Joshua and a further oracle concerning the Branch (6:9–15).

In the second section (7:1 – 8:23) the same themes are covered in a different way. The lessons to be learned from the past history of the nation are the material for the prophetic word of exhortation, followed by a tenfold promise of restoration, which has remarkable parallels to the preceding chapters.

In the third section (9:1 – 14:21) the Messianic theme is further elaborated. Once again the neighbouring nations come under divine judgment (9:1–8) and this is aptly concluded with a lyric on the coming of Zion's King (9:9–17). The scattered Israelites are recalled to their own land (10:1–12) and a taunt song is taken up against their enemies (11:1–3). This is extended into an allegory against worthless rulers (11:4–17). An oracle for Judah and Jerusalem outlines the nature of deliverance after a period of setback (12:1–9) followed by the purification of the city to make it holy, and of the land to make it fit for God's presence (12:10 – 13:6). Then a mysterious oracle is uttered concerning the smitten Shepherd which the Gospels link with Jesus Christ and His passion (13:7–9). Like most prophetic narratives the last chapter is concerned with the final rout of Zion's foes, and the arrival of their King to dwell among a dedicated people (14:1–21).

1:1–6 THE PROLOGUE

The opening message is an appeal for obedience to God. The people of God find security when they put God first. The flagging zeal of the returned exiles was a clear symptom of a deterioration in their spiritual condition (cf. Hg. 1). Zechariah's remonstration warned them that a great work claimed their allegiance, with no time left for postponement, or they would commit the same folly as their forefathers.

1 This may be editorial framework. Emphasis is placed on the date, October–November 520 BC, 18 years after the return of the first contingent of exiles from Babylon (cf. 2 Ch. 36:22; Ezr. 1:1; Is. 44:28). Darius is Darius I (522–486 BC). Eighth month; i.e. between Hg. 2:1–9 (seventh month) and Hg. 2:10–23 (ninth month). 4 Former prophets implies a succession of witnesses. 'God buries His workmen but continues His work.' The divine Word has thus an enduring quality, and its fulfilment in every age confirms its truth.

1:7 – 6:15 EIGHT VISIONS (AND THEIR TWO APPENDICES)

Before launching upon the admittedly complex details of these visions, it is advantageous to try to chart the over-all course which they follow. They fall into two groups: visions 1–3 (1:7 – 2:13), and visions 4–8 (3:1 – 6:8). The first group is focused on Zion and the future glory which the Lord will bring to it; the second group is focused on the Messiah as Priest-King and on the various steps by which the Lord will bring about the promised glory. The sequence is as follows: the Lord will return in blessing to Zion (1:7–17); its opponents will be overthrown (1:18–21); and the city, indwelt and guarded by the Lord Himself, will extend its unwalled boundaries (2:1–13). But if this is to come to pass and the Lord is really to dwell with His people, then sin must be dealt with. Hence there is need of a perfect priestly mediator, the Messianic Branch (3:1–10), who, being King as well as Priest, is the complete means of blessing to the people (4:1–14). His work, likewise, is total: sinners are purged out of the land (5:1–4), wickedness itself is removed (5:5–11), and, in a final confrontation between God and the world-system in which wickedness has found a resting-place, evil is overthrown and God's wrath appeased (6:1–8). The symbolic crowning of the Priest-King (6:9–15) looks forward to the consummation of the kingdom of God.

1:7–17 The first vision

The call to repentance is followed by a series of night visions, all apparently seen in one night, early in 519 BC. They are not direct from the Lord, in the sense that an angel mediates them and interprets them to the prophet. The theme of the first vision is the zeal of the Lord for the rebuilding of Jerusalem. The earth was now at rest after the people and their land had enjoyed a compulsory sabbath of 70 years.

8 A man riding upon a red horse is probably the angel of the Lord (cf. v. 11; see also Introduction to Exodus, p. 116). In this scene, enacted in the valley bottom, he is the protector of God's people. Aspects of the divine providence are represented in the colours of the heavenly scouts. Red depicts battle and bloodshed (cf. Rev. 6:4); white represents victory and peace (cf. Rev. 6:2); sorrel, i.e. reddish brown, is the aftermath of confusion in the unsettled period after the end of hostilities (cf. Rev. 6:5–8). 9ff. The prophet is puzzled by the vision. The interpretation fits the contemporary situation. Darius's Empire was being shaken by revolt, and only a temporary peace had been secured at that moment. 12 Seventy years may be a round number, or the period which expired with the return of the exiles (see on 2 Ch. 36:21).

16 Thus says the Lord. Four years later when the Temple was rebuilt, v. 16a was fulfilled. The rebuilding of the city by Nehemiah in 445 BC saw the fulfilment of v. 16b. 17a This prosperity waited until the vitcorious reigns of the Maccabean princes in 165 BC (see NBD, art. 'Maccabees', p. 762), while 17b is Messianic and awaits realization. Chs. 9–14 are thus anticipated.

1:18–21 The second vision

The end of heathen supremacy is foretold. Four horns, perhaps on the heads of four beasts, symbolize the power of the nations which have scattered Israel and Judah. They are frightened away by four craftsmen, who may represent the Temple workmen. This vision was an additional assurance that God's purpose would be fulfilled. The scattering experience was completed, and now nothing could hinder God's people in their task of restoration.

18 Four. Many attempts have been made to identify four historical foes, e.g. Assyria, Babylon, Medo-Persia, and Greece (see, e.g., C. H. H. Wright, Zechariah and his Prophecies, 1879), but possibly the numeral is symbolic rather of danger 'on every side', just as we speak of the 'four' points of the compass. The people of God are ever surrounded by a menacing world. Horns are symbolic of power. 20 Four smiths, or craftsmen, indicate that the victory of the people of God would be achieved by peaceful means as they responded to the call to engage in the craftsman's work of Temple-building (cf. Hg. 1:8, 13; 2:4–9, 15–19). As the danger had been 'fourfold' so the remedy is 'fourfold'; the divine strategy is sufficient to meet the peril from every quarter.

2:1–13 The third vision

1–5 This follows directly from the first two visions. The foreshadowing of the city yet to be is provided in the rebuilding and restoration of Jerusalem. Josephus regarded the building works of Herod Agrippa as its literal fulfilment. But the final chapters of the book envisage a more glorious future with Zion as the central metropolis of the world. In the first part of the vision the angel stops the young man from measuring the old boundaries of the city because the new limits will overspill the ancient landmarks. Within an all-embracing divine omnipotence, its inhabitants will dwell safely. The Shekinah glory that departed with the deportation of the people into exile in 586 BC had now returned in some measure to the city to dwell there, and to make it a holy abode once more (cf. Ezk. 11:22, 23; 43:1–9; 48:35).

6–13 The second part of the vision is a lyric poem of triumph. A summons is issued to the Jews still in Babylon to return to their own land. Haste is urged lest they should be engulfed in the doom of Babylon and also that they might share in the promised prosperity of Jerusalem.

8 After his glory sent me. The translation is difficult because the Hebrew reads simply 'after glory' (cf. RV). This could be the war-cry of the Lord for His host (cf. Jdg. 5:14, RV). The speaker is the Messiah, who is sent to the Jews, to whom pertains the glory (cf. Rom. 9:4), to be their Protector and to perfect their salvation. The glory of Zechariah's time was the restoration of Jerusalem, mentioned in v. 5, which foreshadowed a greater glory to come in the Person of the Messiah. After in this case means in search of the glory. The phrase sent me is repeated in v. 9 to emphasize the importance of the commission. The apple of his eye (cf. Ps. 17:8). From every angle the pupil of the eye is safely guarded against attack. This is symbolic of God's protection of His own from all hostile powers that menace this precious possession. Others, however, think that the pronoun refers to the enemies of Israel and means that they endanger their own safety by hostility toward the elect.

9 Then you will know. The requital of their oppressors, as instruments of His chastisement, is proof of the prophet's mission. Shake my hand is the attitude of threatening (cf. Is. 10:32). 10 Daughter of Zion. Cf. 9:9 for a similar term, and evidence of the stylistic links between the three parts of the prophecy. 11 Many nations . . . in that day also anticipates the later chapters of the book (e.g. 8:22; 14:16). 12 The holy land is used only here in Scripture, although the idea is found elsewhere (cf. Is. 11:9; 27:13). 13 Be silent (cf. Hab. 2:20) is an impressive announcement of the advent of the Lord that implies more than the ordinary divine activity in history. He has invested Himself to partake in a holy war on behalf of His people (cf. 14:4ff.). His holy dwelling is heaven itself and not the Temple in Jerusalem.

3:1–10 The fourth vision

From the promises of a glorious future for the city and people of God, Zechariah turns to the means by which they are to be achieved. God will raise up a perfect priestly Mediator, of whom Joshua and his fellow-priests are a foreshadowing (cf. 3:8). This is followed by the vision of the golden lampstand (4:1–14), which symbolized the bestowal of the power of the Spirit of God upon His people to spread the light of the gospel throughout the earth. They need first to be purged of all iniquity (5:1–11) before the universal sovereignty of the Lord can be acknowledged (6:1–8). The setting up of this Messianic kingdom is symbolized by the crowning of Joshua (6:9–15).

In the fourth vision Joshua is vindicated and the promise of the Messianic Branch is made. The high priest probably signifies the chosen representative of the nation, whose misfortunes are due to a super-human adversary, as well as to their own ceremonial defilement. This uncleanness may also be due to the people's failure to rebuild the Temple (cf. Hg. 2:14), or to the limitations of the priesthood (cf. Mal. 3:1–4). The Targum interprets it as the sin of marrying foreign wives, which characterized the period 60 years later (cf. Ezr. 10:18). Joshua is arraigned like a criminal before the angel of the Lord. In the presence of supernatural witnesses the adversary accuses him. Joshua was laden with personal iniquity (v. 4) as well as the guilt of the land (cf. 5:6). His pardon, therefore, had to be both personal and representative.

2 Satan. W. E. Barnes (Zechariah, CBSC, 1917, in loc.) treats this person as no more than a prosecutor, acting under orders from the Judge, in the sacred court. The use of the article (Heb. 'the Satan') shows that it is not a proper name, but the fact that Satan is rebuked by the Lord implies that his designs are contrary to the divine purpose. A brand. Perhaps a proverbial expression. Israel as a nation had been rescued from the furnace of Babylon (cf. Am. 4:11) to become a torch to enlighten the nations. This idea is further enlarged under the figure of the lampstand in the next vision. 4 Rich apparel signifies the white robe of cleanliness, and the plural in the Hebrew points to the different articles of dress in the robe of state. 5 The clean turban is to the high priest what the headstone is to the Temple, its crowning glory and the evidence of its renovation. Atonement has been accepted by God for His people (cf. Ex. 28:36ff.; Is. 62:3; Zc. 14:20). And I said. The prophet intervenes, enthusiastic to see the complete establishment of a full and acceptable priesthood.

6, 7 Enjoined. The angel of the Lord gives a solemn charge to Joshua concerning his personal holiness and his faithful discharge of his sacred office. Consequent upon his obedience, he is promised the principal charge of the rebuilt Temple, and the prospect of access to the heavenly council. Like the angels he will be a co-worker in the fulfilment of the divine purposes for Zion and Israel. Peaceful security would lead to settled conditions and prosperity. Perhaps there is also the suggestion of a rejuvenated earth like the pictures in 8:12; 9:17; 14:6. 8 Men of good omen. Joshua and his fellow-priests who sit before him as subordinates are those for whom the miracle of renovation has been wrought. They thus become a pledge of the approach of Messiah's kingdom in which the perfect priestly mediation and reconciliation will be achieved. My servant, the Branch. This is a technical term in the prophets to portray the coming Davidic Prince (cf. Is. 4:2–6; Je. 23:3–5; 33:14–26; Zc. 6:9–15; Is. 11:1 uses a different word, but involves the same idea). From obscurity He would arise to become the builder of the Temple, and combine in Himself the offices of King and Priest. Joshua knew that he could not be the Branch because he was not of the Davidic line. Zerubbabel, the civic head, was not present, neither was he a priest, so he did not qualify for the office.

9 A single stone with seven facets (lit. 'seven eyes') is another Messianic title. Whereas 'the Branch' is the kingly-priestly Messiah (mainly in relation to His human lineage with David), 'the Stone' with its seven engraved eyes (cf. Ex. 28:11, 12, 36–38; Ps. 118:22; Is. 28:16) suggests His divine omniscience (cf. the eye as the organ of knowledge, 2 Ch. 16:9; Ps. 94:9). Thus as the perfect Priest, endowed with divine knowledge (cf. Is. 53:11), He brings about the perfect cleansing (v. 9b). Seven facets, literally 'seven eyes', are wrought on the stone, and one of this character was actually found at Gezer. The same general symbolism appears again in Rev. 5:6. The sacred number 'seven', signifying completeness and perfection (cf. Rev. 1:4; 3:1) here depicts God's all-knowing character and all-inclusive rule, while the 'eyes' (cf. Rev. 1:14; 4:6b) speak of God's watchfulness over the Temple, its worshippers and the events yet to come. A single day anticipates the making of a complete atonement (cf. Heb. 10:12) and the full enjoyment of its benefits in the regeneration of all things (cf. Zc. 14:7).

4:1–14 The lampstand and the two olive trees

The deep significance of this vision is implied by the manner in which it was brought to the prophet's notice. He was aroused out of his sleep by the question from the angel, What do you see? The object that attracted his notice was a golden lampstand.

The structure of the lampstand resembled that which stood in the Tabernacle (cf. Ex. 25:31–40), but certain features were different. Those common to both are omitted in the description, and only the peculiar features are mentioned here. In Solomon's Temple ten candlesticks (cf. 1 Ki. 7:49) of the Tabernacle type were provided, and were probably deported into captivity (cf. Je. 52:19). In the second Temple only one such lampstand was used (cf. 1 Macc. 1:21; 4:49, 50; Josephus, Antiquities xiv.4.4). Each one was similar in form to the Mosaic pattern if the Arch of Titus can be relied upon for accurate details, but they were not identical with it (cf. C. H. H. Wright, op. cit., p. 82).

There is a close connection between the work of rebuilding the Temple and the ministry of the congregation of the Lord as a spiritual light in the world around them. This characterized the NT church also (cf. Mt. 5:14–16; Mk. 4:21, 22; Lk. 12:35; Jn. 8:12; Phil. 2:15; Rev. 1:20; 2:5). The church of the old covenant and of the new, purified by divine grace, should show forth God's glory throughout the nations.

The peculiar features in the vision point beyond the 'earthly sanctuary' (cf. Heb. 9:1) to the reality it foreshadowed. No priest was required to trim the wicks nor to supply the reservoir with oil, which came directly from the two fruit-bearing trees, positioned on the right and left sides of the golden candlestick.

More than God's providence is expressed by the imagery of the vision. There is an advance in thought from the continual watchfulness of the all-seeing God (cf. the association of the seven lamps with the seven eyes of the Lord in vv. 2, 10b with vv. 12, 13, 14) to the coming of the Messiah.

The answer of the interpreting angel is intentionally obscure because the two mysterious agents are Joshua and Zerubbabel, who as Spirit-filled men convey blessing from God to church and state, and are a type of the Messiah as Priest and King. These 'two anointed ones' thus replace the ministers of the sanctuary as a sign of Messiah's coming ministry. It envisages the Light of the world shining through lesser lights amid the darkness that covers the nations (cf. Is. 9:2).

2 Seven lips; a curious, fantastic detail which causes problems in exegesis. Such things are possible only in dreams. The seven is repeated in MT for emphasis and corresponds to the seven eyes of the Lord (v. 10). The lips are the 'nozzles to contain the wicks, rather than "pipes" as RV' (P. R. Ackroyd, op. cit., p. 648). 6 Not by might (RV mg., 'an army'). Possibly there had been some loose talk about a revolt against Darius The reference could also be to the opposition encountered from local groups of different nationality (cf. Ezr. 5). 7 Grace, grace to it may be an exclamation of admiration from the multitude at the completion of the Temple, with the implication that divine favour had enabled them to complete the task. 10 Whoever has despised the day of small things is a caution against a human failing. An answer is implied in the question, which amounts to a prohibition, 'Let none despise it', since God does not scorn meagre beginnings. All such work proceeds under the watchful eye of the Lord God. Superhuman energy is promised to Joshua and Zerubbabel for the finishing of this tremendous undertaking.

14 It is a matter of some difficulty to decide, throughout this vision, what is the source and the direction of flow of the oil. It would seem more natural to take the two trees as the source, therefore standing for the all-providing Lord, and the two anointed (the 'two branches' of v. 12) would thus be the kingly and priestly rulers mediating the Spirit of God, via the central reservoir, to the people, the seven lamps, shining into the world. It is difficult to see, however, why trees, rooted as they are on earth, could well symbolize the divine source. Elsewhere the planted tree is either the godly man (cf. Ps. 1) or the established kingdom (cf. Ps. 80:8ff.). Maybe, therefore, the central reservoir stands for the self-sufficient God, the eternal, self-replenishing fount of life. The trees represent the people of God securely established on earth, and the lamps represent them in their function as witnesses. There are two trees in order to reflect the two distinct Messianic functions by which they are sustained: the priestly work of cleansing and the kingly work of ruling, and in this the existing functionaries, Joshua and Zerubbabel, foreshadow the single, Messianic royal Priest who was yet to be.

5:1–11 The sixth and seventh visions: the flying scroll and the large barrel

The two visions together take up the theme of 3:9b and follow naturally after the cleansing of the high priest as the nation's representative (3:4). The flying scroll appears to represent the main provisions of the law, both moral and religious, and symbolizes the divine standard of holiness. Its flight in the heavens shows from which quarter judgment comes and also the speed of its execution. Two particular sins are condemned, one on each side of the scroll, according to the force of the Hebrew. The curse lights upon every thief and perjuror, theft and lying being typical sins of a poor community (cf. 7:9, 10; 8:17). So penetrating and permanent is the penalty that it enters and consumes the very structure of the house of the wrongdoer as though the building were defiled by leprosy (cf. Lv. 14:45).

The large barrel (ephah) with its leaden lid contains a woman who is the personification of wickedness. As she tries to escape, the angel thrusts her back into the barrel. Two wind-borne women transport the barrel with its contents into the land of Shinar, S Babylonia, where mankind first organized a revolt against God (cf. Gn. 11:2ff.). The living power of evil must yet be banished from Israel, and this operation can successfully be achieved only by the power of God.

In the sixth vision the land was purged of social evils, but in the seventh of apostasy. 'Sin not only finds a natural home in Babylon, but worship is paid to it' (IB, p. 107).

6 Iniquity; RSV accepts LXX text. MT has 'their eye', i.e. their appearance, which is a better reading. Two interpretations have been suggested for the phrase. 'Their desire', the longing eye towards the female, as the inclination towards wickedness of which she is the symbol. Many prefer to take the weights and measures as typifying the sometimes abused (cf. Am. 8:5) fondness for commerce which increased during the period in captivity and which had dominated them ever since the exile. Ephah is a measure containing over 7 gallons. There may be a play on words here (Heb. 'āpâ, 'flying', and 'ēpâ). 8 Wickedness was also applied to Athaliah in 2 Ch. 24:7. 9 Stork is a migratory bird with powerful wings, and capable of flying long distances. There may be another play on words here: 'pious' (Heb. ḥāsîḏ), and 'stork' (ḥᵃsîḏâ). 11 They will set the ephah down when the house for ungodly worship is ready.

6:1–8 The eighth vision: the universal sovereignty of the Lord of the whole earth

The final vision resembles the first, and anticipates ch. 14. Four chariots, drawn by horses of different colours, represent the servants of the Lord in the ministry of subduing the nations. They are held in check before being released upon the world powers to fulfil the divine purpose of universal dominion.

1 Two mountains; literally 'the two mountains'. The article suggests that they were well known. Zechariah may here be drawing upon some current mode of thought concerning the last days, and possibly we may discern a similar reference in 'the valley of my mountains' (14:5).

2–8 The general teaching of these verses is clear in spite of much difficulty in explaining the details. The chariots represent the exercise of divine rule over the whole earth, and in the sequence of visions they foreshadow the final ordering of all things in conformity with the will of God (see introduction to 1:7). Consequently, since 'the land of Shinar' (5:11) was the final stronghold of wickedness, so the report that the Spirit of God is 'at rest in the north country' (6:8), i.e. Shinar (Babylon), signals the completion of God's universal victory. Thus the scene is set for the crowning of the Messiah as universal King (6:9ff.).

2 Red. It is likely that the four colours mentioned have no significance other than that they serve to differentiate four chariots to match the 'four winds' (v. 5), i.e. the four cardinal points of the compass. But this does not explain why the red horses are not specified in v. 6. It seems arbitrary and unsatisfactory to say that possibly their work was already done, and to instance some historical fact (as, e.g., that the Chaldean Empire had already fallen to the Persian). It is better to urge that we are dealing with symbols of divine government rather than references to historical events. While, therefore, the red horses (presumably detailed to patrol eastwards—the compass-point unmentioned in v. 6) are necessary to complete the symbolism of world-wide rule, in fact no enemy ever attacked the people of God from the east. Enemies marched in from the south (Egypt), the west (the Philistines) and especially the north (Assyrians, Babylonians, Greeks). The prophet naturally concentrates on these. 3 Dappled grey. The translation is not at all certain (cf. RSV. mg.; RV mg.). Nothing of vital consequence appears at stake, however. 5 Four (cf. on 1:18) symbolizes 'on every side'. 8 Have set my Spirit at rest. Cf. 'have quieted my spirit' (RV), i.e. have removed all cause of offence and grief to the Spirit of God (cf. Is. 63:10; Eph. 4:30). The north country. Babylonia (Shinar, in 5:11, the archaic name being used because Zechariah is consciously dealing with symbols) was geographically due E of Judah, but since attacking armies from the various eastern empires never made frontal assaults across the desert but always marched round the Fertile Crescent and attacked from the north, they were popularly called 'the kingdoms of the north' (e.g. Je. 1:15).

6:9–15 The symbolic crowning: the harmonious rule of priest and king

Zechariah is commanded by God to take gifts of silver and gold from a deputation of returned exiles and to make a composite crown of circlets for Joshua. This coronation of the high priest took place in the house of Josiah. Three men were witnesses of this symbolic act (cf. 3:8). No mention is made in MT of the Davidic prince, Zerubbabel. Most modern commentators, following Ewald, insert his name here, and assert that the crown is a royal diadem. Another theory claims that blanks were left in the text for the names of the leaders, but owing to the fear of treason charges they were never actually inserted until the priestly rulers of Maccabean times were instrumental in inserting Joshua's name. There is no MS evidence for this ingenious but unnecessary theory, disproved by the careful wording of the passage. False hopes of the restoration of the temporal kingdom would have fostered revolt. The oracle points to someone other than the two men, Joshua and Zerubbabel, as the fulfilment. 'Behold, a man of distinction, his name is the Branch', draws a sharp contrast between the present leaders and the One to come. This is achieved by the emphatic pronouns used. The offices of king and priest will be combined in the person of the Messiah.

12 The Branch is used here as if the title were part of the accepted terminology of Messianic expectation. This is what we would expect from its previous use by Isaiah and Jeremiah (see on 3:8 for the references). Signifying that which shoots from a parent root, it invites enquiry into Messiah's ancestry, and thus becomes one of the OT evidences for the expectation of a divine-human Messiah (see NBD, art. 'Messiah'; J. G. Baldwin, 'semaḥ as a Technical Term in the Prophets', VT, Vol. XIV, 1, 1964). The reference to growth here recalls Is. 53:2, stressing the humanity of the coming One.

13, 14 Royal honour; literally 'majesty', but not necessarily regal. 'It may be that the crown here is a sign of special honour, and not necessarily of kingship' (J. G. Baldwin, art. cit.). The repetitive element in this verse is deliberate, and foreshadows a greater Temple than the work of the exiles, and a vaster kingdom than the land of Israel. In the light of Christ's offices of Priest and King, their significance is spiritual and heavenly. Between them both. If two leaders had been meant, then harmony would reign between the civil and religious heads of the nation, as against the possibility of jealousy under dual leadership. But it points to the perfect union of Yahweh and the Branch. Was the crown placed in the Temple to invest it with spiritual meaning and safeguard the donors from a charge of treason?

15 Help to build. The crown of gold was put aside until the Temple was completed, and then deposited there as a memorial to the men who had formed the deputation. An assurance was thus given that those who were afar off should come to add their strength to that of the returned exiles (cf. Hg. 2:6–9). If you will diligently obey. The sentence ends rather abruptly, although it is not necessarily incomplete. This sentence structure could be deliberate, with its potential promise, conditional upon obedience.

7:1 – 8:23 THE DEPUTATION FROM BETHEL

7:1–3 Questions about fasts

An interval of 2 years stands between the night visions and the events which are recorded in chs. 7 and 8. After the deputation from Babylon came another from Bethel in December–January, 518 BC. RSV takes the names of the men as the deputation, and not those of the chief citizens of Bethel. The motive of enquiry is whether fasts which had been instituted as memorials to tragedy should continue to be observed in the new economy. In an era of peace and prosperity, should the destruction of the Temple in 586 BC (the fast of the fifth month, v. 3; cf. Je. 52:12ff.), and later the murder of Gedaliah its governor (the fast of the seventh month, v. 5; cf. 2 Ki. 25:8–25), be worthy of commemoration?

7:4–14 The negative answer: severity

Four parts complete the answer to the delegates' questions (7:4, 8; 8:1, 18). The negative answer is given in ch. 7, the positive answer in ch. 8, and the result is the conversion of fasts into feasts. The negative answer is marked by severity.

3 RSV omits 'separating myself' (RV), following the best Greek MSS. This is a loss. Like a Nazirite under religious and ceremonial vows, they had practised self-denial (cf. Nu. 6:1ff.). 4–7 The searching enquiries by the Lord imply that the fasts were self-imposed, devoid of true religious motive and therefore unacceptable to God. The calamities which the fasts were instituted to commemorate were the direct consequence of disregarding the former prophets who had in fact expressed the true mind of the Lord regarding fasting (cf. Is. 58:1–10; Joel 2:12, 13). 8–10 A summary of their teaching is then provided, to indicate that a religion in pre-exilic times which was never short of ritual observance (cf. Is. 1:11ff.) yet failed to register a true moral response to the Lord, and that this failure was manifested in social carelessness over the needy among men. Thus fasting as such is religiously inconsequential compared with the Lord's demand for moral obedience (see on Je. 7:21ff.; Am. 5:25). 11 Like a beast fighting against the yoke, the people had resisted the claims of the law. 12–14 The punishment matched the crime. God had called them by His law but they had rebelled; in their turn, when adversity came, they called to Him but He refused their cry for help. Ch. 7 is thus an extended comment on 6:15, enforcing by harsh lessons from the past the necessity to obey the word of God. 12 Adamant. When men turn from doing the will of God they become progressively insensitive and opposed to His truth. The adamant heart speaks of the final hardening and depicts the terrible moral consequences of disobedience. 14 Was made desolate. The Hebrew is active, not passive, attributing blame to the people (cf. RV).

8:1–23 The positive answer: promises

Ten promises are now uttered, each introduced by the usual formula by which the prophets authenticated their messages (vv. 2, 3, 4, 6, 7, 9, 14, 19, 20, 23). They spoke from the mouth of the Lord, not their own (Ex. 4:16; 7:1, 2), Most of the promises are concerned with the future prosperity of Jerusalem, making a marked contrast between the present times of the prophet and the times to come. The chapter looks beyond the immediate future to the glorious era of Messiah's reign and forms a glowing prelude to chs. 9–14. Some of the themes, indeed, of those chapters begin to appear here, e.g. the dwelling of God in Jerusalem (v. 3; cf. 9:9; 14:9, 16), family life no longer disrupted by war (vv. 4, 5; cf. 10:6, 7; 12:5–8), the return of the exiles (vv. 7, 8; cf. 9:11–17; 10:6, 8–10), the enjoyment of harvests with no hostile despoiler (vv. 9–12; cf. 9:16, 17), the incorporation of the nations into the people of God (vv. 20–23; cf. 9:10b; 14:9, 16). The Messianic reference here is not direct but it features the true development of OT religion and faith in Christianity. The mission to the Gentiles by the Christian church was an initial fulfilment of this prediction.

3 I will return (cf. Ezk. 11:22f. with 48:35). The restoration of the exiles did not exhaust this promise, which spoke of the invisible splendour of the presence of the Lord in a city which was faithful to Him. Its new name is 'The city of the truth' as the seat of the God of Truth, and 'The mount of holiness' as the abode of the Holy One of Israel (cf. 14:20, 21). 6 Marvellous in my sight. The picture is too brilliant for the returned remnant to visualize. God's question to them implies a negative answer. 'With God nothing will be impossible' (cf. Lk. 1:37; Gn. 18:14). He repeated His promise in order to renew His former favour toward them.

9 Let your hands be strong (cf. v. 13). This is designed to encourage the Temple builders. As the foundation had been laid according to promise, so the completion was assured by promise, but, like all promises, dependent upon their faith in God's enabling power. Such a purpose could be achieved only by loyalty in the community itself. Dishonesty and selfishness would destroy their very unity and resolve. 12 A sowing of peace and prosperity, literally a seed (which flourishes in times) of peace, i.e. the vine, etc. 18, 19 Fast . . . feasts; a more particular answer is given to the enquiry of the Bethel deputation (see 7:2). Fourth; cf. Je. 39:2. Tenth; cf. 2 Ki. 25:1. Their failure to love truth and peace had led to their past sorrows. 21 I am going is the eager reply of the citizen invited to belong to Zion (cf. Mi. 4:2, 3; Is. 2:2–4). 23 Ten men stands for an indefinitely large number (cf. Gn. 31:7; Lv. 26:26). A Jew, literally 'a man, a Jew', is to contrast the nature of the believer in the true God with the mass of Gentiles. God is with you, declare these Gentile converts to the true worship of the Lord. The general title for God, not the special one, is used by them, and is an echo of the Immanuel prophecy (cf. Is. 7:14; 45:14). Take hold of the robe means to become a disciple of their religion and to embrace the Jewish ways of living. Such men were called proselytes, or 'God-fearers', in NT times.

9:1 – 13:9 THE WORLD-WIDE RULE OF ZION'S KING

9:1–8 An oracle of judgment on surrounding peoples

As we approach this difficult section of the book we do well to heed the salutary warning of H. S. Nurnburg (The Man of Sorrows, 1942): 'We have no right to assume that an obscure text is the same thing as a corrupt text.' There are reasons normally for the obscurity.

Israel, in its entirety, looks for divine deliverance from powerful enemies and is not disappointed. Syrians, Phoenicians, and Philistines are named, which suggests a pre-exilic situation. But the primary reference of the passage is to the conquests of Alexander the Great in 332 BC, and to similar campaigns by his successors, the Seleucids.

1 Oracle. RSV makes this a title, whereas the Hebrew by its system of accents connects it closely with the word of the Lord (cf. RV). It is thus a formula for presenting the divine will (cf. 12:1; Mal. 1:1). 'The phrase is part of the oracle and not a further title' (P. R. Ackroyd, op. cit., p. 652). This divine word is portrayed vividly as resting heavily upon the land of Hadrach like a burden of wrath. Hadrach is mentioned only here in the OT but the Assyrian inscriptions refer to it. Probably it was near Damascus. The rabbinic interpretation of it was Messianic. By dividing the name into two words, 'sharp-gentle', they forced a meaning from it: 'Messiah is sharp toward the nations of the world, and gentle toward Israel.' The cities of Aram. This is a conjectural emendation, found in the margin of Kittel's Biblica Hebraica, and incorporated into the text of the RSV without any support from the other Versions. MT has 'the eye of Adam (mankind) is toward the Lord'. D. R. Jones (Haggai, Zechariah and Malachi, 1962, in loc.) says, 'RSV ought not to be accepted and is unnecessary'. The point of the reference is that God's judgments will cause both Jew and Gentile to turn to Him (cf. Is. 17:7). This future recognition of the sovereignty of the Lord has just been mentioned in 8:23. 2 Tyre was the bastion for Philistia. Her destruction meant that the five cities of the Philistines were vulnerable to attack. 6 A mongrel people. Two views are proposed; that this refers either to the occupation of Ashdod by a Jewish community, or to the end of the Philistines' independence by their becoming Jewish proselytes. After the conquests of Alexander the Philistines disappeared as a separate people. 7 Abominations. The consumption of unclean foods, which were often sacrificial offerings to alien gods, will cease. Like the Jebusites of old, the Philistines will be amalgamated into the holy people (cf. Ps. 87:4). According to Josephus such an incorporation of the Philistines among the Jews did actually take place (cf. Antiquities xi.8.3). Moreover they gave their name to Palestine (cf. Joel 3:4, AV). 8 As a guard. RSV follows LXX. MT has 'on account of an army'. Alexander passed by with his army en route for Egypt, and having founded Alexandria, he returned this way. No oppressor shall again overrun them. Alexander spared Jerusalem and gave the Jews special favours. His successors, the Seleucid dynasty, did not succeed in enslaving them. With my own eyes (cf. 4:10; Ex. 3:7). This is both the promise of a speedy execution of the prediction and also the assurance of God's watchful care over His city and Temple.

9:9–17 The coming of Zion's King

V. 8 is now further expounded beyond the nearer limits. Ibn Ezra saw in the passage, which is like a psalm about a monarch (cf. Pss. 2; 72), the figure of Judas Maccabeus. Rashi, another mediaeval Jewish commentator, regarded the picture as that of King Messiah. Modern expositors adopt one position or the other. If we accept the unity of the book, and there are no reasons sufficiently weighty against such a view, then the passage elaborates 6:13. In the strict context it refers to the theophany of the Lord God (see vv. 14, 15, 16). It echoes the prediction of Zephaniah delivered in 630 BC (cf. Zp. 3:14–20). Israel will not use earthly weapons to establish the Messianic kingdom (cf. Zc. 4:6).

9 The speaker is the Lord and the prophet is His mouthpiece. The ideal Israel is personified as the audience. Rejoice greatly; cf. 2:10; Is. 62:11; Mt. 21:5; Jn. 12:15. Your King. The long-expected, long-promised, legitimate heir of David, their very own monarch. Triumphant (lit. 'righteous') is a mark of the suffering Servant of the Lord (Is. 53:11; cf. 32:1; Je. 23:5, 6). Victorious; literally 'the recipient of salvation'. LXX has 'Saviour'. He is vindicated by the Lord after His rejection by men and restored to rightful honour. This is another mark of the suffering Servant (cf. Is. 53:10–12). Humble; i.e. in the sense of oppressed, humiliated, poor and lowly. The idea is further elaborated by the description of His advent upon an untamed colt. The allusion to Gn. 49:10, 11 is clear. Judah will produce a mysterious ruler, who is not a worldly conqueror but will maintain His right by peaceful means. The contrast is strongly marked between the ass and the war-horse, the emblems of peace and war respectively. In the Messianic age weapons of destruction will be banished (cf. Is. 2:2–4; Mi. 5:10; Zc. 8:2–23).

10 Dominion; the language resembles Ps. 72 (especially vv. 7–11) and the reign of David's great son, Solomon. There the primary reference is to well-known geographical boundaries. Its ultimate reference is to universal sovereignty. 11 Blood of my covenant. Zion is addressed (cf. Ex. 24:8). The exiles are hailed with emphasis (as for you also), and reminded that their charter of redemption is the covenant. This same ground of confidence inspired other prophets also (cf. Is. 42:5–7; 51:14–18; Je. 31:31; cf. Heb. 10:29; 13:20). 12 Restore . . . double. According to Is. 40:2 it is the full quota which had to be paid for the sins of the nation. Now a recompense is to be made and the portion of the heir is to be bequeathed to them (cf. Is. 61:7).

13 O Greece. This prediction was largely fulfilled during the Maccabean struggle for independence from Syrian overlords in 165 BC. They tried to impose Hellenistic practices upon the Jews in Palestine. The prophecy also prefigures the warfare between the hosts of God and His foes. The language is graphic as it describes God engaging the enemy and taking His people as weapons of attack. Greece (Heb. yāwān) may only be a poetic rendering and an archaic way of describing Gentile and distant peoples. In the next century it received a literal fulfilment at the battles of Sardis in 499 BC, and at Marathon in 490 BC, when the Greek power challenged the Persian for world supremacy. This verse is no evidence of late authorship except when prediction has been ruled out as impossible.

14 The Lord will appear (lit. 'reveal Himself on their behalf') as champion with the thunder for His war-trumpet, the forked lightning as His arrows, and the whirlwinds of the desert as the fury of His might. Cf. Jdg. 5:4; Hab. 3:3. 15 Slingers (lit. 'slingstones', which recalls David's unconventional weapons of victory; cf. 1 Sa. 17:40, 49, 50). The imagery is that of Israel's battles of the past. It also recalls the battle feast of Ezk. 39:17–20; Is. 25:6. Drink their blood. RSV gives an impression of unheard-of ferocity, based on emendations of the text. But the very idea of drinking blood would be abhorrent to a Jew as forbidden in the law. Hence the translation must be rejected as unsuitable. Israel's enemies (see RV) will fall under them like slingstones which have missed their mark and lie trodden down in the victor's onward rush. So complete is the victory that the celebration is both exhilarating and sacred. The instruments which God will use are to be as consecrated as any holy vessel because it is a holy war that He wages. The unusual metaphor expresses the fullness of victory.

16 Jewels of a crown. His people now glitter like a flock of sheep on the Judean foothills. The stones in the Messiah's diadem portray a people consecrated to the divine will, like the high priest's mitre. 17 How fair it shall be! seems to be a sigh of wonder by the prophet as he contemplates that which is unutterable. The revelation granted him is beyond words. How good is the Lord's salvation and how fair is His crown of beauty! (Cf. Ps. 45:2; Is. 28:5; 33:17.) Flourish. The fertility of the soil will increase the population. This is a familiar theme in the prophets (cf. Ezk. 36:29; Joel 2:19; Zc. 3:10; 8:4–6).

10:1–12 The recall of the scattered flock

1, 2 are a connecting link with the previous chapter. In Palestine the fertility of the land is dependent upon the rainfall. The lightning heralds the spring rains that mature the crops. The storm-clouds provide 'the pourer' (as the type of rain is so aptly named) which breaks up the hard dry ground after the summer drought in readiness for the autumn ploughing. Thus prepared, the seed can be sown. Blessing is promised when the people seek the Lord and not the diviners for the rainfall upon which everything else depends. No longer now will there be recourse to the superstitions of the heathen nations around them. Such boons will be God's gift to a people enjoying His salvation.

Teraphim were probably household gods, connected with ancestor-worship, and used as oracles. Four strong terms are employed in v. 2 to show how such practices fall into disrepute. The imagery is apt. For lack of true guidance the people had lived aimlessly and drifted into calamity. There was no shepherd to lead them, i.e. no Davidic king with powers to rule justly (cf. Ezk. 34:5–8). The true shepherd of Israel had ceased to guide and protect them. Afflicted. Diviners and dreamers reply to their pathetic enquiries for help and only add to their plight. The bland lead the blind.

3–12 As through a second Exodus, Israel and Judah are to be re-united, and restored to the land of promise. 3 Leaders (lit. 'he-goats'; cf. Ezk. 34:17); i.e. the principal men of the nation. There is no need to regard them as the Ptolemies, or any foreign rulers, but the unsatisfactory government which they then experienced. In their dire straits the Lord Himself will become the Shepherd of the flock. Suddenly the metaphor changes. Judah will become His proud steed for battle, and majestically lead Him to victory.

4 Out of them is repeated four times in this verse. Judah will provide the corner-stone for security. In Is. 28:16 this is a figure for the Davidic king. The tent peg, or nail, was the hooked peg built into a wall to hold the implements of war as well as the household utensils. This is the attribute of reliability (cf. Is. 22:23). The battle bow refers to effective power in leadership (cf. Ho. 1:5). Every ruler (lit. 'oppressor'); usually the word is employed in a bad sense, but here it is used positively. Their prince-leader will not oppress by unjust taxation or impose crushing burdens too great for the poor to bear, but will exact tribute from their vanquished enemies. Oesterley ascribed the above titles to Simon, Judas, and Jonathan Maccabeus, but each one of the four is undoubtedly Messianic. The ultimate reference is to the Lion of the tribe of Judah, by whose aid His people will conquer every foe. Christians have read these words as the missionary expansion of the church in every age.

5 Historically the formidable might of the Syrians was put to flight by the Maccabeans. Judah's success is due to the presence of the Lord. Notice the figurative nature of the verse in the little word like. 6 Not rejected. A favourite theme of the prophets is mentioned, viz. the restoration of the northern kingdom to the Davidic Prince (cf. Je. 3:18; Ezk. 37:21; Ho. 1:10). I will answer contrasts with v. 2. This is the sole ground of the prophet's confidence. 7 Their children. Posterity will see the fulfilment of this promise. Ephraim shall share the same elevation as Judah and promotion will be equal.

8 Signal; i.e. as a shepherd for his flock or a beekeeper for his swarm (cf. Is. 5:26; 7:18). As many as of old is an allusion to the rapid increase of the people at the time of the Exodus (cf. Ex. 1:12). The promise is that of Jeremiah (cf. Je. 23:3; Ezk. 36:11). 9 Scattered. Contrast RV 'and I will sow'. The former rests on minimal emendation of the Hebrew, but the difference between scattering and sowing hardly affects the meaning of the verse. Common to both is the idea that Israel will bear fruit among the nations. The real difference between the two is found in the tenses: RSV looks back to the scattering of the Exile, whereas RV looks forward to a time when the dispersed people will blossom spiritually and return to the Lord. 10 Egypt, Assyria, Gilead, and Lebanon are the countries where the ten tribes spent their exile. Gilead is mentioned because it was the first to be taken by Assyria (cf. 2 Ki. 15:29). Lebanon was the symbol of pride, to be abased on the day of the Lord (cf. Is. 2:13). The reference may also be to the eastern and northern boundaries (cf. Dt. 11:24).

11 Egypt. RSV here emends the Hebrew which reads 'distress' (see RSV mg.) and which ought to be retained (cf. RV). The 'distress' of that time will be to those involved in it as was the (Red) sea to the generation of the Exodus, i.e. a seemingly insoluble problem which, none the less, vanished before the power of the Lord (cf. Is. 43:2). The point of the prediction is the new redemptive act which will be like a second Exodus. The distressing waves are parted to give them passage to safety (cf. Is. 11:15, 16). Assyria and Egypt are symbols of world powers and possibly 'cover terms' for the present oppressors. 12 Glory (MT 'walk'; see RSV mg.). The MT means that the returned exiles will conduct their manner of life in accordance with God's code of conduct, and hence they will bring glory to His name. Says the Lord ends the statement and it is a solemn oracular utterance. Throughout the section the emphasis has been on the Lord's speech and His operation. With this characteristic touch the whole message is terminated.

11:1–3 The wail of the shepherds

David Baron (The Visions and Prophecies of Zechariah, 1918, p. 375) draws an interesting parallel between the visions (chs. 1–8) and the verbal prophecies (chs. 9–14) in the book of Zechariah. Ch. 11 stands to chs. 9–14 as ch. 5 to chs. 1–8. Five visions have given the promise of restoration. Then follows the obverse side of the message in the vision of the flying scroll and large barrel, depicting apostasy and judgment. Yet in ch. 6 the nation emerges from the valley of sin, and Israel's Messiah is crowned as Ruler and Priest on His throne. Jew and Gentile are included in his Temple. So in the verbal prophecies is the same sequence found. After the promise of restoration, suddenly in ch. 11 the nation is brought to a precipice of national apostasy and consequent judgment.

There is a reason for this order. To prevent the complacent misuse of the promises of salvation by the godless majority of the people, the gulf of sin and apostasy is revealed. From the deep abyss the land and people emerge in the next three chapters and see the glorious conclusion in the reign of King Messiah over all the earth.

In the opening three verses of the chapter characteristic notes of judgment are sounded: fire (cf. Am. 5:6), the felled forest (cf. Is. 10:33, 34), the wail (cf. Am. 5:16, 17). If we were to view these verses in the light of the rest of the chapter we would see that their most significant content is 'the wail of the shepherds' who have been despoiled of all they ever gloried in (v. 3). The whole chapter centres on this point: worthless rulers have exploited the people of God for blatant self-advantage, but the hour of their condemnation and judgment is approaching. Cf. Ezk. 34.

1 Lebanon . . . cedars. As aristocrats of the forest, the cedars of Lebanon are apt symbols of worldly pride (cf. Is. 2:13; 10:33; Ezk. 31:1ff.). Fire is the emblem of divine judgment. 2 Cypress. If the great cedar has fallen, how much more the lesser trees should fear. Not even the oak in its strength has ground of confidence if the thick forest has fallen. Thus, symbolically, the prophet shows that neither worldly place nor worldly strength avails in the day of divine visitation. 3 Shepherds. The metaphor is now brought home to its human centre of reference, the national leaders. But the prophet returns at once to metaphor: even the lions in the jungle of the Jordan cannot resist the onslaught which deprives them of cover and security. Zechariah thus builds up, in picture form, the vision of total, irresistible catastrophe, but the centre of his vision is unelaborated: the judgment is destined to fall on the national leaders. It remains for the rest of the chapter to show how and why this shall be.

11:4–17 An allegory: the true shepherd and the worthless shepherds

Many of the details of this section are obscure. Consequently, it will be to our advantage to try to grasp the main outline of the narrative. Zechariah may be describing the contents of a visionary, or, more likely (cf. D. R. Jones), a series of acted oracles which he performed by divine command. First, he is cast by the Lord into the role of the true shepherd (vv. 4–8a), even though (vv. 4–6) the Lord forewarns him that his shepherding activities will not save the people from the doom which hangs over them. Nevertheless, he takes up the emblems of his office and engages in his work, even to the extent of opposing false shepherds and destroying them (vv. 7, 8a). Secondly, however, finding that his shepherding work provoked nothing but hate against him (v. 8b), he gave up his work, signifying its end by breaking his staff (vv. 9–11), and asked for his wages, which he cast down in the house of the Lord (vv. 12, 13), and then completed his symbolic conclusion of his office as true shepherd by breaking the second staff (v. 14). His third acted oracle (vv. 15–17) was to garb himself as a worthless shepherd, symbolizing the shepherds whom the Lord would impose as an act of judgment on the people (v. 16), and by whom they would be despoiled. Finally, the chapter fittingly returns to its point of departure: the proclamation of a curse on the worthless shepherd (v. 17; cf. v. 3a).

However much this recital may reflect the rejection of any or all the prophets whom the Lord sent to His people, it is obviously and truly fulfilled only in the Lord Jesus Christ, His coming as the true shepherd, His exposure of the existing 'shepherds' as false, His rejection and the shameful payment of 30 pieces of silver, and the subsequent delivery of the people into the hands of leaders who brought them into conflict with Rome and the horrors of the fall of Jerusalem in AD 70.

4 Doomed. The Lord sees the end from the beginning. The only means of saving them will be the sending of the true shepherd, but his rejection by them will be the occasion of their irretrievable condemnation. 5 With this picture of self-seeking rulers using their position for personal gain, cf. Ezk. 34:2, 3. 6 In rejecting the true shepherd, the people automatically choose for themselves shepherds of the opposite sort, and thus become the architects of their own destruction.

7 Those who trafficked: LXX for a difficult expression of MT. Johanon Aharoni (The Land of the Bible, 1967, p. 61) says that 'Canaanite' in ancient times had the meaning 'merchant', and here it is preserved in this sense (cf. Ho. 12:7, RV and RV mg.). P. R. Ackroyd (op. cit.) renders it as 'tax-gatherer' and regards it as a reference to the Roman oppression. Two staffs (cf. Ps. 23:4); maybe the standard equipment of the shepherd. Grace . . . union. The former speaks of the covenant relation of grace between God and His people, the latter (cf. v. 14) of the consequent union obtaining among the people of God. Zechariah thus casts himself into the role of the great shepherd-king, David, under whom the people of God had been knit together, and in doing this deliberately foreshadows the coming greater David (cf. Ezk. 34:23, 24).

8 One month . . . three shepherds. Commentators go to great pains to establish the symbolic value of the 'month' and to identify the three shepherds, and may well be right in doing so, but nothing like a consensus of opinion has been reached (see Baron, op. cit., in loc. for a useful summary of opinion among the older commentators). It may well be, however, that in the 'month' we are to see no more than that the activity of the true shepherd was short-lived indeed. He received no acceptance among his people. And as to the 'three' shepherds whom he destroyed, the OT often recognizes a threefold division of authority in the nation: kings, priests and prophets (e.g. Je. 13:13).

10 The covenant which I had made. It is clear that in acting the part of the Messiah, Zechariah knew himself to be acting the part of the Lord Himself, for no other could annul the divine covenant as is symbolically done here. All the peoples is an unexpected phrase. Does it stress the northern and southern kingdoms, Israel in toto? 11 The traffickers. RV here preserves the Hebrew intact: 'the poor of the flock that gave heed unto me', and the change seems both needless and improbable. One would not expect the perception indicated here to be found among the self-centred rulers. 12 Thirty shekels; a contemptuous sum, the compensation money for an injured slave (Ex. 21:32)! 13 Treasury. See RSV mg., 'potter', which accurately reads the Hebrew. No satisfactory explanation of the reference to the 'potter' has been advanced, and it may be that we are dealing with a proverbial but otherwise unknown expression of extreme contempt: 'To the potter with it!' The casting down of the price in the house of the Lord has had various explanations attached to it: that since the shepherd was acting for the Lord, he must bring back to the Lord evidence of his rejection; or, since the real rejection was of the Lord Himself, it had to be signalized in this way, etc. 14 Peace among men is a by-product of peace with God, and when the latter is gone (cf. v. 10) the former inevitably follows. Civil strife and anarchy characterized the nation under foreign domination. In AD 70, e.g., when the holy city was besieged by the armies of Titus, four separate Jewish groups fought within the city for control of it.

15, 16 Worthless shepherd, because of his unworthy character, which is outlined in the fivefold defection (v. 16). His identity is not disclosed. It was so typical of the many that one portrayed the rest. Behind the neglect of the healthy, the merciless treatment of the weak, and the voracious devouring of the wealth of the flock, was the lack of care for them. 17 My worthless shepherd. Eli Cashdan (The Twelve Prophets, 1948, in loc.) aptly comments, 'The instruments that fail are punished: the arm of strength is completely enfeebled, the right eye that lacked discernment is utterly darkened by judicial blindness.' The principle that privilege carries responsibility is here set forth (cf. Am. 3:2). The chapter foreshadows the terrible afflictions of the Jews, subsequent to their rejection of the Messiah, and the ultimate downfall of their overlords. That this ruler is spoken of as my shepherd offers significant light on the sovereignty of the divine rule over history. He is where he is by divine appointment (v. 16) and the scandalous acts which his wicked heart teaches him to perform are the Lord's dread judgment on a people which rejected the true shepherd. See General Article, 'Old Testament Theology', under 'God and history' (pp. 27f.).

12:1–9 The deliverance of Jerusalem and Judah

In the preceding chapter we were made aware of the crucial test through which the people were to pass: the coming of the true Shepherd, consequent upon whose rejection there would be a colossal act of divine judgment upon the chosen false shepherds and their flock. How this judgment would be inflicted, we were not informed. In the present chapter we find Jerusalem and Judah under the heel of the nations and internally disunited. We are thus invited to understand that, as so often, the Lord has used the power of the nations against His people. But this is a situation which He will not suffer to continue indefinitely, for to do so would be to go back on His promises.

The main theme of the verses is the overthrow of the nations which fight against Jerusalem. The historical background to the concept of Jerusalem as the scene of the final battle is found in incidents like the divine overthrow of Sennacherib (2 Ki. 19); it may also be that the abiding hostility of the kings of the earth to the people of God, and the eleventh-hour deliverance of the city from their grasp, formed part of an annual liturgical drama in the Temple in pre-exilic times (cf. Introduction to Psalms; D. R. Jones, op. cit., in loc.) and that for this reason also Zechariah is handling a well-known group of ideas.

A somewhat unexpected feature of these verses is the apparent quarrel between Jerusalem and Judah (vv. 2, 7; cf. 14:14). No historical occasion affords a parallel for the references, and nothing in apocalyptic writings offers a clue to its meaning.

The verses open with a brief hymn to the Creator (v. 1; cf. Am. 4:13; 5:8; 9:5, 6). The purpose of this is to authenticate the vision of world conquest which is to follow. The God of whom Zechariah speaks has the inherent authority and power to bring this to pass. In consequence of this universal power, Jerusalem will not fall to the nations but will be their destruction (vv. 2, 3). Far from the nations having their way, the Lord will render them impotent (v. 4a), but will bring spiritual illumination (vv. 4b, 5) and victory (vv. 6, 7) to Judah, protection and glory to Jerusalem (v. 8) and destruction to the nations (v. 9).

1 The affirmation of the divine origin of this message is very strong. An Oracle should not really stand as a heading but be joined to what follows: 'The oracle of the word of the Lord . . . the Lord's utterance.' Heavens . . . earth . . . man. The totality of the divine sovereign sway, embracing height, depth, and inwardness; or, things invisible, things visible and things spiritual. 2 A cup of reeling. Cf. Is. 51:22, 23; Je. 25:17f. The metaphor of the cup is used to denote the Lord's sovereign disposing of the lot of men and nations (cf. Ps. 75:8). It will be against. This suggests that Judah is linked with the enemies of Jerusalem and with them receives the cup of reeling. D. R. Jones offers the alternative translation: 'And Judah also shall be involved in the siege that is laid against Jerusalem.' This postpones the revelation of disunity between the two and here simply prepares the way for the fact that the first movement of divine deliverance is towards Judah (vv. 4–7). 3 A heavy stone. The metaphor of the 'cup of reeling', implying the fuddling of the minds of the attackers, is matched by that of the heavy stone, beyond their physical prowess. Thus, in every way, Jerusalem is beyond their reach.

4 Horse . . . rider. To the insufficiency of their mental and physical powers is now added the immobilization of their military force. Open my eyes; i.e. in favour, protection. Cf. the metaphor of the uplifted countenance of blessing, Nu. 6:26. Eyes . . . blindness. There is a contrast between the stupefied eyes of the panic-stricken attackers and the protective eyes of the Lord, watchful over the attacked. 5 Then. Behind this verse lies the implication of some disaffection between the country and the city, but the day of deliverance is also a day of enlightenment, in which the alienated Judahites will recognize that Jerusalem and its inhabitants possess a genuine access of divine strength, and a special relationship whereby the Lord can be called, with some distinct implication, their God. The truth behind this is that the promises of David were also promises centred in Jerusalem. 6 In consequence of this new mind, Judah turns upon the attackers. 7 Another sidelight on the implied hostility between Judah and Jerusalem: it would seem that some spiritual pride on the part of the Jerusalemites had given offence to Judah. But the Lord's award of prior victory to Judah would be a corrective of this. 8 Nevertheless there would be no abandonment, but rather a new affirmation, of the Davidic and Jerusalem promises, and the royal house and city would come into new splendour and even divine dignity. Like God, like the angel of the Lord looks forward to the actual divinity of 'great David's greater Son'. On 'the angel of the Lord', see General Article, 'Old Testament Theology' (p. 29); also Introduction to Exodus (pp. 116f.).

12:10–14 The purification of Jerusalem

Just as victory is a sovereign gift of God, so is repentance. To this spiritual aspect of the Lord's activity for His people the prophet now turns.

10 Compassion and supplication; i.e. the Spirit of God, sent forth in consequence of the divine compassion for His people, creates in them a new spirit of supplication to God concerning their needs. If we adopt the probably more correct rendering 'grace' instead of compassion, the essential meaning remains unaltered but the picture becomes one of God's bestowal of the particular grace of supplication. Supplication is, in Hebrew, a plural of intensification: intense and efficacious prayer. Look on him; Hebrew 'on me'. All the ancient Versions and the best Hebrew MSS read the first person singular. The change to the third person in RSV is prompted by the immediate switch to the third person in the following phrase mourn for him. It has a harmonistic motive, and possibly also proceeds from the unsuitability of thinking that the Lord Himself is pierced and mourned for. In pursuance of this line of thought, various suggestions of historical personages have been made in an attempt to identify the pierced one—the brother of Johanan, Onias III, c. 170 BC, or Simon the Maccabee, c. 134 BC, or the Teacher of Righteousness mentioned in the Dead Sea Scrolls, or even Zerubbabel, and others. But the traditional identification with the suffering Messiah remains the best understanding. Just as in 11:10, the prophet, posing as the true Shepherd, also acted in the person of the Lord Himself, so here there is an identity of the Sender and the Messiah whom He has sent (cf. Mal. 3:1; Mk. 9:37; Lk. 10:16). The verse is really another form of the prophecy of the Servant of the Lord (Is. 52:13 – 53:12): He who is 'the arm of the Lord', God Himself come down to save, and who is yet smitten by God for the people's transgressions. Pusey (The Minor Prophets, 1907, Vol. 8, in loc.) says that Zechariah has concentrated in a few words the tenderest devotion of the gospel. To look on the pierced form of Christ by faith is to discover what we owe to Him for His suffering on our behalf. See D. R. Jones for a different interpretation with supporting translation of the verse: Jones holds that the 'pierced' are those who died in the war of the foregoing verses. In contemplating their death, the survivors learn the costliness of salvation. From this point, Jones proceeds to relate the verse to Is. 53.

11 Hadad-rimmon. The allusion is obscure to us. Hadad was a Canaanite god; Rimmon (cf. 2 Ki. 5:18) belonged to the Assyro-Babylonian pantheon. We must assume that Zechariah refers to some heathen rite of lamentation, like, e.g., the mourning for Tammuz (cf. Ezk. 8:14). Megiddo recalls the death of Josiah (cf. 2 Ch. 35:22–25) and the mourning which followed. The lamentation over the death of a good and loved king is an apt reference in a passage which centres on the death of the true Ruler and only Saviour. 12 David . . . Nathan . . . Levi . . . Shimeites. Two views are possible here. Either these names represent leading classes in the nation, i.e. royal, prophetic, priestly, and scribal, and the groups are separated from each other from the greatest to the least, or else David stands for the chief ruler and Nathan for the subordinate ruler (cf. 2 Sa. 5:14); Levi the chief of the priests with Shimei as the subordinate priest (cf. Nu. 3:18–21), or as representing the associated tribe of Benjamin (cf. 2 Sa. 19:16). Their wives by themselves. This custom need not be an indication of a late date. It is intended to elaborate the distinction between personal and private grief and the public expression of it. The whole context denotes a very great mourning by the land, the family, and the individual.

13:1–6 The purified land and the disannulment of false prophecy

Moral reformation is the inevitable consequence of national repentance. Mourning for sin is a preparation for cleansing from sin. A spring will be opened permanently for such purification (v. 1). It will be like one of the 'rivers of paradise' which flow from the city of God (cf. Ps. 46:4; Ezk. 36:25). In Zc. 12:1 the 'doors' had been opened to admit the fire of judgment. The nation's uncleanness had compelled them to be separated as a sign of contrition. Now the means for removal of defilement had been provided by God: a living fountain ever flowing free. Idolatry was the prime cause of the land's defilement. But without the false prophet such substitute-gods could not have flourished. Hence with the cleansing ritual must also come the exclusion of the false principle. Ungodly inspiration had to be removed (v. 2). Whenever anyone tried to revive the institution of the prophetic guilds, his parents were to remember the injunction of the Mosaic code in Dt. 13:1–11, and chastise him for the folly of his ways and the error into which he would lead the nation (v. 3). This parental correction would hold in check the foremost cause of the adulteration of true religion. Such discredit would be cast on the false prophet by his own kin that he would be ashamed to wear the tokens of which he had formerly boasted (v. 4). His garb and his dream would be discredited (cf. 1 Ki. 19:19; 2 Ki. 2:2–13). To avoid the suspicion of being a false prophet, the deceiver would try to pass himself as a serf in the fields, engaged from his youth in the humble tasks of husbandry (v. 5; cf. Am. 7:14).

5 Contrast the challenge to Amos and his reply, Am. 7:10ff. The land has been my possession; rather, 'Man has possessed me', i.e. I have been a slave. Jones (op. cit.) tellingly remarks 'The word for man, 'adham, is one which designedly contrasts man with God, and the vivid antithesis is with Amos' "the LORD took me". Such will be the exposure and humiliation of the false prophets, that they will disclaim any connection with Yahweh, and prefer to call themselves slaves of man.' 6 Wounds on your back, literally 'between your hands', which could signify anywhere on the hands, arms or chest. The point of the question is that self-inflicted wounds would have been one of the tell-tale marks of the false prophet (cf. 1 Ki. 18:28) and may have been the thing which first prompted the enquiry whether or not this person belonged to one of the prophetic guilds. The house of my friends may be a subtle prevarication. By his 'friends' the dissembling false prophet would intend the false gods to whom he is devoted, but in the ears of his questioner it would sound as if he was saying that these were (perhaps) marks left by loving parental discipline, or (as Jones urges) 'the result of a private brawl'.

13:7–9 The purified land: separation of the unworthy

These verses are related by association of ideas to what has immediately preceded, and also by way of explanation of some bare hints earlier dropped by the prophet. In the smiting of the Lord's shepherd we cannot but see an incredible counterpart of the treatment which the false prophet (v. 6) claimed to have been meted out to him. Here is a most unexpected and undeserved smiting of the true Shepherd in the house of His friends. Furthermore, we learn here of the inner meaning of the piercing of the divine One, mentioned at 12:10. A sword awakes against the Lord's Shepherd, and as a result there is a sifting out among the people and, in the end, a purified company in fellowship with the Lord.

7 My shepherd. A Messianic stamp has been given to this by Jesus in Mk. 14:27, but even apart from this authoritative directive as to the meaning of the passage, it is the sense which best suits it and relates it to its context, as above. The man who stands next to me. The additional description is given in order to distinguish 'my shepherd' in this passage from the personage who, for other reasons, and in another sense, was the Lord's shepherd in 11:16 (q.v.). Here a true intimacy and fellowship is intended, and the relationship is reminiscent of 6:13 (q.v.). Turn my hand. As the Lord is the Agent here in sifting the flock, so we understand Him to be the Agent wielding the awakened sword which smites the shepherd. Cf. Is. 53:6, 10; Acts 2:23. 9 Refine is the same picture as that painted by Ezekiel in 22:17–22, linked with Zc. 11:13, as a removal of the ignoble and rebellious elements where they still exist. Call . . . answer are the two attitudes of the suppliant and the Supplier and depict a relationship of mutual harmony and cordiality between the purified remnant and its God. My God is a personal affirmation and the climax of the renunciation of idolatry. Such mutual responsiveness in prayer, worship, and service is the heart of the covenant. This has always been the secret life of the city of God.

14:1–21 THE DAY OF THE LORD

14:1–15 The rout of Jerusalem's foes

In this chapter the theme of the previous section is expanded in outline. It opens with a characteristic formula that is slightly different and is therefore particularly emphatic. 'Lo! there is a day coming that belongs exclusively to the Lord', i.e. for His glory. Yet strangely it features the last siege of the holy city (cf. vv. 2–4, 12–14). Previous chapters have already described the event in some detail, and now it is set forth in lurid imagery. The words are addressed to Jerusalem whose capture, with the horrors attendant upon such an event, is outlined vividly with a few strokes of the pen. So complete is the sack of the city that the united nations will sit down in the midst of it to divide the inviting spoil.

The judgment of God against Jerusalem will recoil eventually upon the very ministers of His wrath. Such world powers as Babylon and Rome have already experienced it in full measure. They are types of the future oppressors of the church. As the captives go forth from the gates to face unspeakable misery, so the Lord goes forth to the battle (v. 3). The divine intervention will be neither too soon nor too late for deliverance. The war is not for conquest but a holy engagement (cf. Dt. 7:17–26; 9:1–5), and the imagery employed is that of the Red Sea escape (cf. Ex. 14:14). Now the mountains will be divided to provide the preservation of Israel from their heathen foes.

The direction of the flight is also indicated by the cleaving of the Mount of Olives. By His demonstrated power in thus cleaving the mount the Lord will again establish His claim as Lord of all natural forces. The valley of safety will be created by the removal of the mountain toward the north and toward the south. The former valley that intervenes between Olivet and Jerusalem will thus be stopped up (v. 5), and this new valley will be named (lit.) 'my valley of the mountains'.

5 For the awkward expressions in this verse, various solutions have been proposed. RSV has aimed at a smooth translation. From the MT the translators have extracted a preposition, translated the side of it, from the Hebrew 'āṣal (which appears as a place-name, Azel, in RV); they have also altered the three verbs which are alike in form, as though the repetition was a mistake, and changed the meanings of the first to stopped up. The place Azal (MT) is unknown, but according to Cyril of Jerusalem (c. AD 315–386) it was a village on the extremity of the mountain and destroyed by the Romans when they besieged Jerusalem in AD 70 (see Pusey, op. cit., p. 340). The Hebrew could also be rendered 'God will withdraw Himself' to become the rearguard of the fleeing multitude as He did when the Egyptians pursued the host into the cul-de-sac by the Red Sea (cf. Ex. 14:19f.). Other names have also been suggested by Ackroyd (op. cit.).

Further amplification is made in the reference to the earthquake. According to Am. 1:1 such a disaster of some magnitude furnished a date from which other events were sometimes reckoned in Israel. Beside the cleft mountain two other features describe the theophany: His feet shall stand (v. 4) as a symbol of domination over every foe, and He shall come with His host (v. 5). Holy ones come as attendants upon the divine majesty. RSV has altered the possessive pronouns to your and with him. 'My' and 'you' are relegated to the margin. Who are these attendants? They could be saints, angels, or celestial beings (cf. Dt. 33:2, 3; Ps. 89:5–7). Is it not the return to the city of the fleeing host with the angel of the Lord as their vanguard?

A break occurs here in the Hebrew text between vv. 5 and 6. What follows in v. 6 is a description of the unique day. To the eye of the prophet the events are being unfolded as though they are happening before his very eyes.

6 On that day. RSV mg. says that the MT is uncertain and to obtain a suitable translation has resorted to the Greek, Syriac, Latin, and Aramaic Versions. Three different interpretations have been proposed for this allusion. The first suggests a contrast between the judgments in the days of Noah and the radical revision of the covenant which emerged from that era (cf. Gn. 8:22). So the rendering must be, 'There shall not be heat and congealing cold, but there shall be continuous day.' It is urged, secondly, that the imagery is that of the universe clothed in darkness after the intense light of the theophany. The heavenly bodies will contract their spendour and wane (cf. Is. 13:10). This will be like day one in the creation narrative. The Hebrew has 'It is day one'. A third possibility is the comparison with the long day recorded in Jos. 10:12–14, 'There has been no day like it before or since.' The three views need not cancel out one another.

7 Continuous day suggests a transformation of nature after the victory over the heathen confederacy against the hosts of God; the world will bask in continual springtide (cf. Rev. 21:25). It is known to the Lord is placed in brackets in RSV because it sounds like the wistful sigh of the prophet, or his scribes, or like the warning given in parenthesis in Mt. 24:15. But Mt. 24:36 seems to be a closer parallel. 8 Living waters picture the river of God in paradise regained (cf. Gn. 2:10 with Ezk. 47:8 and Rev. 22:1). The figure is more than a mere solution of the land's chief problem, that of water supply: it is the satisfaction and sustenance of the city of God for ever.

9 Become king. If we accept the unity of the book, then there is a progression of ideas concerning kingship. It begins with the anointed representative of the Lord, whether priest or monarch (6:12), and advances finally to the majesty of the Eternal as Sovereign over all His renewed creation. His name one. Jewish exegetes said that the ineffable name of Yahweh will be written as it is pronounced and will be found in the mouths of all men. This will mean universal monotheism. The one day and the one name speak of the harmony restored, in contrast with the babel and chaos of the old, fallen creation (cf. Phil. 2:9–11).

10 Geba is the mountainous district 6 miles north of Jerusalem, and Rimmon is 35 miles southwest of the city. The new plain will be lowered to the level of the plain of the Arabah so that Jerusalem will tower above all the area (cf. Is. 2:2). 11 No more curse (mg. 'ban). The 'ban' is the utter destruction which happened in a holy war (cf. Dt. 7; Jos. 6; Mal. 4:6). All things will have returned to a state of primitive perfection. The picture is ideal.

14 Even Judah will fight against Jerusalem. The preposition against is literally 'in'. Confusion is caused as the verb 'to fight' uses the same preposition for two different meanings, 'to fight against a foe', and 'to fight in a place' (cf. Ex. 1:10 with 17:8). The place of the contest gives the better sense here and this is the rendering in the LXX. Eli Cashdan (op. cit.) aptly comments 'at that time the city will be in the hands of the enemy'.

14:16–21 The glories of the king's abode

16 The feast of booths (Tabernacles). Passover was the chief Jewish festival because it commemorated the Exodus from Egypt. The Feast of Weeks also celebrated the giving of the law. The Feast of Tabernacles concluded the agricultural year with the celebration for the ingathering of summer fruits. It will be the appropriate festival, therefore, to commemorate the final ingathering of nations and the renewal of nature into a harmonious whole. Men who have long dwelt in the wilderness of ignorance and idolatry will then acknowledge their return to the true God. Of the three festivals, Booths seems to be the most fitting for the inclusion of the Gentiles. 17 If any . . . do not go up recognizes the possibility of a recalcitrant element within the spared remnant. The same sequence of ideas appears again in Rev. 21:8. 18 Egypt is singled out because the rainfall was not the vital factor in the economy of the land. Its prosperity was bound up with the inundation of the Nile, which provided seasonable irrigation for cultivation. So an equivalent alternative to the withdrawal of the rains vital to Palestine is named. Instead of drought there will come upon Egypt its dreaded plague (cf. Ex. 15:26; Dt. 28:27).

20 Horses. The old distinction between secular and sacred will have been abolished. Everything will have become holy because it will be dedicated to a holy purpose. The instruments of war, looked upon with such disfavour by the prophets, will be converted to better use (cf. Mi. 4:3, 4). They are even to bear the same inscription as the mitre on the head of the high priest (cf. Ex. 28:38). Pots are mentioned as the commonest of vessels, and like everything else they will be transformed by their consecration to the Lord. This recalls Ezk. 40–48. 21 Trader (lit. 'a Canaanite'); one who might exploit the pilgrims, mar the glory of the consecration and be unworthy of the golden age (cf. 11:11 for the same word, and the commentary on 11:4–17 for its meaning). There is a play on words here. The ancient inhabitants of Canaan had been a corrupt people. Their name had become a byword for all that was profane and unholy (cf. Ezk. 16:3). Sacrifice. Christians naturally understand the reference to the offering of animals in worship in the light of the NT (cf. Heb. 10:1–4, 10). Animal sacrifice, however, is not one of the main features of the imagery. Throughout the prediction existing institutions are used to illustrate the wonder of the age to come. The chief point is the exclusion of all unworthy elements from the holy worship of the universal King.

The vision defies any historical identification.

It must be regarded as ideal. Everywhere the figurative and the Messianic predominate. Such a unique day, of which everything we know is but a shadow, is known only to the Lord (v. 7). The vision is the assurance that it will become a reality when God shall be 'all in all' (cf. 1 Cor. 15:28, RV; Rev. 11:15).

Malachi

DATE

It is not possible to fix the date of Malachi with any exactness. We know from his reference to the Temple and the priests that he lived after the rebuilding of the Temple (516 BC). The reference in 1:3 to a raid on Edom is not helpful as many such raids occurred in the 5th and 4th centuries. Nor is the 'governor' in 1:8 necessarily a Persian governor. However, the state of affairs during the prophet's ministry is similar to that presupposed by the reforms of Ezra and Nehemiah, and scholars are of the opinion that the book was written shortly before their coming to Jerusalem. This date (c. 460 BC) is very generally accepted.

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

The Persian Empire succeeded the Babylonian in 539 BC, and lasted until the time of Alexander the Great. Little is known of the Jews during the period 515 to 450 BC. The Persian kingdom was ruled by satraps, to whom local governors were responsible. Apparently Judah did not have a governor to itself and was administered from Samaria. The Temple had been rebuilt at the beginning of the period, and possibly the high priests were the local representatives. There was considerable friction between the subject Jews and the Samaritan officials, and, when in the reign of Artaxerxes I (464–423) the dwellers of Jerusalem began to rebuild the walls of their city, they were accused of sedition by the Samaritans. The reply of the king, who was afraid of rebellion and of the loss of tribute, brought the work to a halt. See Ezr. 4:6–23.

For the Jews, relations were strained also with neighbouring peoples, among whom were to be found the Edomites and the Arabs. The Edomites had taken advantage of the weakness of Judah after the fall of Jerusalem in 587 BC and had made inroads into the country. Powerful Arab tribes were also on the move along the southern borders. See on 1:3.

POPULAR MORALE

The Jews, had returned from exile with high hopes. Inspired by Haggai and Zechariah, they had rebuilt the Temple. This building did not have the glory of the original one which had been destroyed by the Babylonians, but it served its purpose. As the years passed, the Jews became disillusioned. The promised prosperity did not return. Life was hard. They were surrounded by enemies, who sought to thwart them at every opportunity. They suffered from drought and bad crops and famine (3:11). They began to doubt the love of God (1:2). They questioned the justice of His moral rule (2:17). The evil-doer is good in the sight of the Lord, they said. They argued that there was no profit in obeying His commandments and walking penitently before Him, for it was the evil and self-reliant who prospered (3:14f.).

THE PROPHET'S MESSAGE

The prophet proceeded to answer them and to show them that this scepticism was hypocritical. If adversity was their lot, it had befallen them not in spite of their godliness, but because of their sinfulness. There was, e.g., the corrupt worship of the priests (1:6). They were irreverent and extremely perfunctory in their Temple duties (1:13). They gave a bad lead to the people who brought blemished offerings, even after promising good ones (1:13f.). The very Gentiles offered worthier sacrifice (1:11). The people were also transgressing, the men divorcing the wives of their youth, and contracting foreign marriages (2:14). Sins of all kinds prevailed: sorcery, adultery, dishonesty, oppression of the weak and general ungodliness (3:5). How could they expect to prosper when the country was rotten with such practices?

Malachi, in true prophetic strain, condemned these sins and summoned the people to repentance (3:7). If they would purify their worship, obey the law and pay their tithes in full, God's blessing would follow (3:10). In sounding forth this call, the prophet revealed that he had a lofty conception of God. God was the majestic Lord of hosts (1:4, etc.); His decrees and judgments were irresistible (1:5); His love was holy and unchanging (3:6).

Malachi found ultimate salvation for his people not in their repentance but in the Lord's action. The great day of the Lord would dawn. It would purify and vindicate the godly and destroy the wicked (3:2; 4:1). That day would be prepared for by the coming of the prophet Elijah (4:5).

THE MAN

All that we know of the prophet himself we have to infer from his utterances. He was a true prophet. He spoke with full authority. He could say 'Thus says the Lord of hosts'. He had an intense love for Israel and for the services of the Temple, and a high conception of the tradition and duties of the priests. It has often been said that, while the other prophets emphasized morality and inward religion, Malachi laid stress on worship and ritual. While this is true on the whole, we have to note that he was not altogether forgetful of Israel's moral obligations (see the formidable list at 3:5), and that for him ritual was not an end in itself, but the expression of the people's faith in the Lord (for the unity of priest and prophet in Israel's religion, see NBD, art. 'Prophecy', especially p. 1044). Some have drawn attention to his limitations, but he was no mere uninspired expounder of traditional law. Like a true prophet, he was strong enough to resist the current of popular thinking, and some of his viewpoints are well in advance of his time, e.g. his respect for Gentile worship (1:11), and his daring condemnation of divorce (2:16). His sense of the all-embracing Fatherhood of God is finely expressed in 2:10.

His style is simple and direct, and marked by the frequent occurrence of the words 'Yet you say'. Perhaps this is more than the rhetorical method of the writer; it may have had its origin in the protesting and questioning cries of the hecklers, when he first delivered his message on the streets.

NEW TESTAMENT QUOTATIONS

Only three passages are referred to or quoted in the NT, viz. 1:2; 3:1; 4:5f.

The first of these, 'I have loved Jacob but I have hated Esau', contains an idea that has proved somewhat offensive to modern taste. Yet it is difficult to avoid holding some doctrine of election in view of the many statements in the Bible and of the facts of human experience. Truly one is often taken and another left. Further, like Abraham, Israel was chosen that it might bring blessing to all the families of the earth. It is in support of the doctrine of the election of the true Israel that Paul quotes the verse in Rom. 9:13.

Mal. 3:1 is about the messenger who will prepare the way for the Lord; 4:5f. identifies the messenger with Elijah and describes his function as effecting reconciliation between father and children. In this conception of the precursor we have a new note in Jewish eschatology, and there are indications that this became an element in the subsequent thinking about the day of the Lord (see on 4:5f.). In Mt. 17:10 the disciples mention the current view of the scribes that Elijah must first come, and in Mt. 11:10, 14 Jesus applies the words of the prophet to John the Baptist: John is the preparer of the way and the Elijah who was to come. The identification does not mean that John is Elijah come back to earth according to some principle of reincarnation. The two were distinct personalities. Rather does it mean that John ministered in the spirit and power of Elijah. Cf. Lk. 1:17. The mantle of the true prophet rested on John as much as it did on Elijah's earliest successor, Elisha. John was responsible for the revival of prophecy before the coming of the Lord.

THE CESSATION OF PROPHECY

With Malachi the curtain was rung down on prophecy until the coming of the Baptist. The living and powerful words of the prophets were heard no more. The scribes and the priests became the central religious figures. The age of creativeness had given way to the age of learning. The Jews had now a large body of literature, and its exegetes, those who expounded it, were the new channel of the voice of God. Of this coming situation, in which religion was mainly legalistic, we have a clear sign in the book of Malachi.

THE UNITY OF THE THOUGHT

The Lord God has a great love for Israel (1:2–5), but the people have not made an appropriate response. On the contrary, they have dishonoured the Lord in their careless and blemished worship, their broken vows, and their culpable partiality. Both priests and people are involved (1:6 – 2:9). This faithlessness is revealed also in the prevalence of divorce and of foreign marriages (2:10–16).

Such sin can lead only to the judgment of a holy God, but because it is the judgment of a faithful and loving God it will involve deep purging but not complete destruction (2:17 – 3:6). There is still time for repentance, which should be expressed in the giving of tithes and which would change the threatened curse to blessing (3:7–12).

Though Israel has been on the whole faithless, there are those who have consistently reverenced the Lord and in the day of judgment they shall experience new life (3:13–18). Salvation will eventually be found in the day of the Lord, and the people are exhorted to prepare for it by keeping the law of Moses and awaiting the coming of Elijah (4:1–6).

1:1 THE SUPERSCRIPTION

The oracle of the word of the Lord. The Hebrew phrase appears also in Zc. 9:1; 12:1. Oracle. Something taken up solemnly on the lips (AV, 'burden'). Malachi. The word means 'my messenger or angel'. There has been considerable discussion as to whether this was the real name of the prophet. If so, it may be the contracted form of Malachiah, 'the Lord's messenger', on the analogy of Abi for Abijah ('Yahweh is my father') and Uri for Urijah ('Yahweh is my light'). Calvin took the word as a title. It is now more generally taken as a common noun. The proper name does not occur elsewhere. The LXX reads 'by the hand of his messenger', and the Targum has 'by the hand of my messenger, whose name is called Ezra the scribe', a tradition which is accepted by Jerome. One conjecture is that the oracle was originally anonymous and that a compiler took 'malachi' from 3:1, and that the word was elevated to the plane of a proper name to provide a title analogous to the other prophetical books.

1:2–5 THE LORD'S LOVE FOR ISRAEL

This love is seen in the Lord's choice and care of Israel and in the devastation of Edom.

2 But you say. The prophet employs the vivid method of question and answer eight times (cf. 1:6, 7; 2:14, 17; 3:7, 8, 13). Men are asking for a proof of the Lord's love. It is to be found in the favour He has shown Jacob (i.e. Israel), and in the overthrow of Edom, a people originally sprung from Jacob's twin brother Esau, but in recent years Israel's hated foe. 3 Edom has suffered utter and final desolation, and in the future her waste places will be a witness of her wickedness and of the Lord's anger. The reference in this verse is to some recent calamity that had befallen Edom.

Edomites took advantage of the calamity of the fall of Jerusalem in 587 to migrate to southern Judah. Those who remained in their homeland in Mt. Seir were driven out by subsequent Arab pressure and occupied most of south Palestine to a point north of Hebron, an area eventually called Idumea. By the 5th century Arab tribes had overrun Edom completely, and even begun to mingle with the Edomites in south Palestine. Edom remained without settled population through the Persian period. The explorations of Glueck have shown that when Edom was resettled it was by a new people, the Nabateans.

4 The Lord of hosts. This title occurs twenty-four times in the book. The hosts are heavenly powers, and the phrase speaks of the universal and sovereign rule of God. The wicked country. The thought is that when men of a future generation see the desolation, they will conclude that Edom must have been desperately wicked to merit such punishment. Israel, on the other hand, will have indisputable proof of God's sovereign care. 5 You shall say. 'You' is emphatic in the Hebrew. Beyond the border of Israel may also be translated 'above the territory of Israel'. The first rendering shows us God's sovereignty over all nations, the second, His special care over Israel.

1:6 - 2:9 ISRAEL'S DISHONOUR OF THE LORD

Sacrifices are blemished and worship is perfunctory. Deception is practised in the fulfilling of vows, and partiality is shown in the administering of the law. The priests fall far below the dignity of their calling, and the people are involved in the irreverence.

1:6 A son honours his father. In Israel this attitude towards one's father was stressed above all others. To think of God as Father, therefore, should result in honouring His authority and majesty. My fear; i.e. reverence for Me, of the sort that is due to a master from a servant. 7 By offering polluted food . . . Follow AV. This is not an answer to the preceding question, but a second predicate descriptive of the priests, which is explained in v. 8: they despise His name in thinking that the Lord's table may be treated with contempt, and they pollute Him by their blemished offerings. 8 Blind . . . lame or sick. Every sacrificial victim had to be without blemish (see Dt. 15:21). Governor; Hebrew peḥâ. The word is used for the governorship of Zerubbabel in Hg. 1:1, and of Nehemiah in Ne. 5:14. The governors instanced by Nehemiah in Ne. 5:15, who made heavy exactions and whose very servants behaved with insolence towards the Jews, might well have been governors in Malachi's time. The word peḥâ appears also in earlier literature, e.g. 2 Ki. 18:24; Je. 51:23. In v. 8 the governor could be the governor in Samaria, and the point is that the priests were bringing offerings to the altar which they would not dare present to the civil ruler. Their efforts to entreat God's favour will avail nothing if they bring such gifts to Him. Show you favour; literally 'lift up your face', to assure you of acceptance.

10 It is better to close the Temple doors and have no sacrifice at all than offer this vain worship.

11 In the prophet's day the very Gentiles were offering worship which was more sincere than that in Jerusalem. This estimate of Gentile worship may have been due to Malachi's understanding of Persian religion, which seems to have been purer than most heathen religions, and is similar to the thought of Acts 10:34f. Some think that the contemporary reference is to the worship of Jews living in foreign lands, those of the Dispersion, especially as my name suggests the divine revelation to Israel. But this view would require an understanding of incense and offering in a spiritual sense, whereas the terms suggest sacrificial worship. Further, the picture of this worship as from the rising of the sun to its setting would be an exaggeration in Malachi's time. The verse has also been understood as applying to the future, whether of the acceptance of Israel's religion by the nations, or of the universal response to the gospel, or of the Lord's Supper. But there is no verb in the Hebrew phrase my name is great, and so it is natural to render it by a present; cf. v. 14 ('my name is feared'). Nor is it reasonable to use a fact from the future to express disapproval of the current worship in Jerusalem. What is required is a contrast with a contemporary reality. 12 When you say. Cf. v. 7; it is their attitude rather than their actual utterance that the prophet has in mind. 13 The priests find the Temple services boring, and the people, following their example, are stingy and deceitful. 14 Cursed be the cheat. We are reminded of the story of Ananias and Sapphira in Acts 5. Dr M. Dods quotes appositely from Pirqe Aboth 1:16, 'Say little and do much. Be like Abraham, who only promised a morsel of bread, but fetched a calf tender and good.' And vows it. The reference here is not to one of the regular offerings, but to a free-will offering of the type that a man might vow to pay when he was in trouble. Cf. Lv. 22:18–20. But God is a great King, and so is not to be trifled with.

2:1 This command; i.e. the teaching of the subsequent verses. For you. The 'you' is emphatic. 2 Glory. The word that is translated 'honour' in 1:6. The curse. The Hebrew has the definite article, and the allusion may be to such a verse as Dt. 28:20. In Scripture the curse is more than an expression of displeasure; it is a potent instrument of God's judgment, travelling like a well-aimed missile against the wrongdoer. Your blessings. Probably the priestly benedictions, a most solemn part of the divine service (cf. Nu. 6:22–27), though some would understand the phrase as meaning the personal advantages enjoyed by the priests. 3 Dung. Not excrement but the contents of the bowels of the slain animals (cf. Lv. 4:11). I will put you out of my presence. The LXX reads 'Behold, I remove the shoulder from you', i.e. incapacitate you from your function of blessing. The German Bible has the interesting reading, 'It shall remain stuck to you'. The obvious meaning of v. 3 is that the priests will be openly disgraced and thoroughly discredited unless they learn to be worthy representatives of God's covenant with Levi (v. 4). See Nu. 25:12, 13 and Dt. 33:9.

5–7 The nature of the true priestly service is indicated. These verses give a remarkable picture of the qualifications, duties and dignity of the priest and need to be noted, especially as the popular view of Malachi is that he was wholly a formalist and a ritualist. The true priest is among men as a messenger of God. He is not simply a professional expert in the minutiae of ceremonial observances. He is a teacher, able to instruct men in the knowledge of God and of His will. He is a man of devotion and integrity. The peace of God is in his heart and he is a strong moral influence on the lives of men. It is a mistaken view that contrasts the OT priest with the prophet to the disparagement of the former. In Malachi there are indications of the future and perfect union of prophet and priest in the Son of God. Peace means here general prosperity. The covenant of God promised prosperity in return for true reverence. Instruction (RSV mg., 'law'; Heb. tôrâ) is authoritative teaching acquired by revelation. Priestly duty included the exposition of what God had taught His people. He is the messenger. The priest, as well as the prophet, is the Lord's messenger with the duty of imparting knowledge, i.e. of the Lord and of His commandments.

8 But you; 'you' is emphatic. You have corrupted the covenant; i.e. 'broken' it. This they have done by showing partiality towards the rich and influential and generally doing the opposite of what was expected of them. Little wonder that they were despised by the people.

2:10–16 CONDEMNATION OF DIVORCES AND FOREIGN MARRIAGES

The holiness of the Lord's people has been profaned by marriages with foreign women and God Himself outraged by the practice of divorce.

10 Have we not all one father? The fact that Israel has in God a common Father and Creator ought to bind them closely together, and make them despise any treachery that tends to break the unity. The covenant of our fathers contains a prohibition of marriage with non-Israelites (Ex. 34:15, 16; Dt. 7:3, 4). 11 Judah has been faithless and profaned the Lord's sanctuary with her foreign marriages. Sanctuary means either the Temple or the holy people (cf. Je. 2:3). The daughter of a foreign god is a woman of another religion. Such mixed marriages involved the very real and ever-present danger of apostasy. 12 Any to witness or answer. This phrase in the Hebrew (cf. mg.) may be idiomatic and mean everyone belonging to him. The RSV is based on an emendation and signifies 'anyone to defend him in a court of law'. This suggests the loss of civil rights, and the last phrase in the verse suggests the loss of all religious rights.

13 There are two ways of understanding the verse. The weeping may be that of the divorced wives, as a consequence of which the worship of the people is not acceptable before the Lord. Or the weeping may betoken the renewed efforts of the zealous but impenitent people to procure the Lord's favour, after their offerings have been rejected by Him. 14 Your wife by covenant; i.e. the wife to whom you have vowed loyalty. The marriage contract is understood as having been made when the men were youthful. Monogamy is obviously here assumed as the rightful practice. 15 The meaning of the first half of the verse is obscure. A closer rendering of the Hebrew would be: 'Has not one made and a remnant of spirit was his'? And what does the one seek? A godly seed. So take heed to your spirit . . .' The key words appear to be 'one' and 'spirit'. 'One' seems to echo the one God of v. 10, and the Spirit of God seems to be understood as the source of the spirit of life in man. We are reminded of passages like Gn. 2:24; Is. 42:5; Mt. 19:4–6. There have been many interpretations of this passage. The general sense seems to be that the one Fatherhood demands loyalty among the members of the family. When Israelites put away their wives they are guilty of disloyalty. Faithlessness to the tradition of their religion is especially in evidence when they proceed to marry non-Israelitish women, for the religion of the seed or offspring is more likely to be that of the mother than that of the father. Godliness is therefore more likely to be ensured by marriage within the covenant people. 16 For I hate divorce. God's opposition to divorce is nowhere else found in the OT. Malachi leaves his hearers in no doubt as to the Lord's attitude to this putting away of their wives, so justifying his call to them to take heed. Covering one's garment with violence. When a man claimed a woman as his wife, he cast his garment over her (cf. Ru. 3:9). In this verse, therefore, garment has to be understood in the sense of 'marriage relationship', and the reference is to the brutal treatment involved in divorce.

2:17 – 3:6 THE COMING JUDGMENT

God's righteousness will be vindicated in the coming judgment, for which He will prepare by the sending of His messenger. There will be an extensive purging, but the Lord's faithfulness will prevent the destruction of Israel.

2:17 The people have wearied the Lord by saying that He delights in the evil-doer and by doubting the justice of His rule. The attitude expressed in this verse has to be understood against the background of the hardships of the post-exilic years. The prophet announces a day of judgment, when they will learn that the Lord is indeed holy, and that He acts in righteousness.

3:1 My messenger. See Introduction, p. 805 and 4:5. The messenger will remove obstacles from the way, and, like the herald who announces the approach of an earthly monarch, will prepare men to receive the Lord. Whom you seek refers back to the last question in 2:17. Messenger of the covenant. Some understand this as another description of 'my messenger', and hold that vv. 2–4 describe the activity of the messenger. But it is better to take the messenger of the covenant in whom you delight as in apposition to the Lord whom you seek. The messenger of Yahweh or the angel of the covenant is not a created angel but One who 'not only bears the divine name but has divine dignity and power, dispenses divine deliverance and accepts homage and adoration proper only to God'. See NBD, art. 'Trinity', p. 1298. Christ's cleansing of the Temple comes to mind when we read this section. Covenant. This is the sixth occurrence of the word in Malachi (cf. 2:4, 5, 8, 10, 14). The concept is distinctively a scriptural one and speaks of the relationship that God establishes with His people, a relationship of sovereign and redemptive grace, of divine faithfulness and of eternal blessing, demanding holiness and obedience on the people's side. All the covenants of the OT find their fulfilment in the new covenant of Christ.

2 The day of the Lord is a day of darkness and not light (cf. Am. 5:20), yet its purpose is to purify rather than to destroy. Contrast 4:1. Fullers' soap. A 'fuller' was a bleacher of cloth. In the Anglo-Saxon Gospels John the Baptist is called 'the Fuller'. 3 He will sit as a refiner. The silver refiner sits over his crucible until the impurities are burnt away and the surface shines like a mirror. The sons of Levi. Judgment will begin at the house of the Lord in the person of the priests, purifying them to fit them for their high function (v. 4).

5 shows that the prophet is concerned about the social morality of the people as well as their worship. The coming Judge will expose and condemn evil-doers of all kinds. Swift witness. He will be resolute in action when the time comes. Sorcerers. They use curses, magic spells and charms in order to exercise a malign influence over people and events. See Ex. 22:18. Those who swear falsely. Those who, while making a solemn affirmation or promise under oath, are guilty of lying. The sinners in the second part of the list are those who take selfish advantage of the defenceless, e.g. of the sojourner. As the stranger was liable to have few friends to protect him and to ensure that he received justice, special concern was shown for him in the Law (cf. Lv. 19:10, 33). 6 I the Lord do not change. The Lord's love for Israel is unchanging, and so Israel is not destroyed (cf. La. 3:22). This verse may go equally well with the following section; so RSV.

3:7–12 REPENTANCE BY TITHES WILL BRING BLESSING

Their disobedience has been revealed in their withholding of tithes. Repentance and payment of these would lead to an overflowing abundance.

7 From the days of your fathers. Their apostasy has been deep-rooted, and the prophet now calls them to return to the Lord and to the observance of His ordinances. 8 Rob. The Hebrew word is a rare one occurring elsewhere only in Pr. 22:23 (qābā'). They are well named the sons of Jacob (v. 6). As Jacob cheated his brother and deceived his father, so they rob God. Tithes. See Lv. 27:30; Nu. 18:21. They have been robbing God by withholding from Him His dues. This has brought down a curse upon them. 9 Me is emphatic in Hebrew. Nation. The word here is normally used only of the heathen, and so it reminds them that their conduct was unworthy of a covenant people. 10 The full tithes. The people had been keeping back part of what they should bring. Times were admittedly bad, but Malachi calls them to prove God by bringing to His house what the law demanded. Then the windows of heaven (cf. Gn. 7:11; 2 Ki. 7:2) would be opened, a phrase which suggests that they had been experiencing drought and bad crops, and there would be more than enough for all. Storehouse. See Ne. 13:5. 11 The devourer; i.e. the locust. See Joel 1. Fail to bear. The cause of this would be mildew and blasting (ICC). 12 When the surrounding nations see the prosperity which will follow liberality towards God, they will rightly judge that it is the Lord's action in blessing His people. You is emphatic in both places. A land of delight. Cf. Is. 62:4.

3:13 – 4:3 THE COMING VINDICATION OF THE GODLY

In a time of great cynicism there have been those who have truly feared the Lord, and they will be spared, and animated by gladness in the day of judgment.

3:13 Stout; i.e. unyielding, insistent. The attitude of the people to God has been one of defiance. Spoken. The form of the verb in Hebrew is the Niphal, which is used of reciprocal action. The meaning is that they have spoken to one another, perhaps in little groups. Among themselves they have questioned the profitableness of serving God loyally, and have imagined that it is the evil-doers who are prosperous. 14 As in mourning; i.e. in penitence for any failures to obey the Lord's commands. 15 We is emphatic. 16 Some, following the LXX, would read, 'Such things spoke they that feared the Lord to each other'. But it is better to follow the Hebrew as in AV and RSV. The words in v. 14 are the complaints of the sceptics. The faithful refuse to be moved by these arguments and seek to deepen their fellowship with each other and to reassure themselves of God's justice. Their names and records were written down in the Lord's book of remembrance (cf. Ex. 32:32, etc.). Malachi seems to be the first to link this book with eschatology. 17 My special possession. Cf. Ex. 19:5; Dt. 7:6, etc. As God's special treasure the faithful will be spared the judgment which will fall on the ungodly. 18 Distinguish between. There will be a restoration of the moral order that obtained in the pre-exilic days. 4:1, 2 The wicked shall be punished, burnt up like stubble; the godly, on the other hand, shall be justified and healed, as in the rays of the sun. Leaping like calves. The picture is of a joyful, vigorous and carefree life. 3 describes the triumph of the righteous. Cf. Am. 9:12; Mi. 4:13; 7:17; Jos. 10:24.

4:4–6 CONCLUSION

They are exhorted to keep the law of Moses, and promised the coming of the prophet Elijah before the day of the Lord.

4 appears in the LXX after v. 6. Horeb. The name given to Sinai in Deuteronomy; there are several traces of the influence of Deuteronomy in our book. With this exhortation to remember the law of Moses, we might compare the ending of Ecclesiastes: 'Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: Fear God and keep his commandments' (AV). 5 Elijah. See Introduction, p. 805 and on 3:1. There is a reference to 4:5f. in Ecclus. 48:9f. (c. 180 BC); it speaks of Elijah, the unique prophet taken up to heaven in a chariot of fire, who is 'ready at the appointed time, it is written, to calm the wrath of God before it breaks out in fury, to turn the heart of the father to the son, and to restore the tribes of Jacob'. The coming of Elijah is a popular theme in the Jewish Mishnah. According to Josephus some 1st-century Jews believed that Elijah had been hidden by God until the time of his return. The coming of this prophet will reconcile fathers and children, and avert the threatened curse. 6 The vision would be inspired in part by the conditions in the prophet's day; there was an estrangement between the older and younger generations, probably not unconnected with the laxity about the marriage bond and the subsequent weakening of family life.

These closing verses indicate that both the Law and the Prophets have their part to play in preparing for the coming of the Lord. Cf. Mk. 9:4; Lk. 24:44.

The New Testament

Matthew

INTRODUCTION

IMPORTANCE OF THE GOSPEL

The Gospel according to Matthew has probably had more influence upon Christian thinking than any of the other three canonical Gospels. It was long thought to have been the first one written, and its position at the beginning of the Canon helped to establish its importance. We find it to be the most quoted of the Gospels from the 2nd century onwards, and the one which enjoyed the greatest liturgical use. Its systematic arrangement and the collections of the teaching of Jesus, such as the Sermon on the Mount, have particularly proved their usefulness to generations of Christians everywhere. The emphasis on the priority of Mark in the last 100 years or so has tended to discount the importance of Matthew in the opinion of scholars, but it is much to be desired that the particular contribution of Matthew should once again receive full recognition.

SOURCES OF THE GOSPEL

The question of the relationship between the Synoptic Gospels is dealt with in the General Article, 'The Fourfold Gospel', p. 64. In this commentary it is assumed that Mark is the basic source of Matthew, which is almost a revised version of Mark. Matthew omits only fifty-five verses of Mark altogether, but he compresses many Markan stories. His alterations are normally concerned with making the narrative smoother and tidying up the style and vocabulary or with guarding against misunderstanding of some of the blunter statements in Mark.

In addition to what comes from Mark, there is in Matthew a good deal of material which is also found in Luke. It is assumed here that this comes from a common source used by both evangelists, known to modern scholars as Q. The exact nature and content of Q are by no means established. It appears that Matthew, with his emphasis on collecting the teaching of Jesus, has been rather freer with the order of this source, as it consists largely of sayings, than with that of Mark, which is basically narrative.

Besides the verses coming from the two major sources (Mark, 500 verses; Q, 250 verses), there are just over 300 more verses in Matthew. These are peculiar to him and are known as M. The particular characteristics of the Gospel spring largely from the content of these verses. They may depend upon some grouping of oral material handed down to Matthew. The 'formula quotations' (see below, p. 814) from the OT may have come from a separate source but we do not have enough evidence to postulate a 'testimony book'.

STRUCTURE AND CONTENTS

It is clear that Matthew has taken considerable care over the arrangement of his material, but scholars are nonetheless divided about the exact nature of his plan. It is evident that there are five discourses in the Gospel (5:1 – 7:27, 'The Sermon on the Mount'; 10:1–42, the mission charge to the Twelve; 13:1–52, the parables of the kingdom; 18:1–35, relationship in the kingdom; 24:1 – 25:46, the second coming). Each of these is followed by a note stating that when Jesus had finished this teaching He went on to further action. It has been suggested that the blocks of narrative and teaching are akin to the kērygma and didachē of the apostolic church.

As far as the teaching is concerned, there is no question about its topical arrangement. The first discourse is basically ethical, the second missionary, the third kergymatic, the fourth ecclesiastical and the last eschatological. It is probable that ch. 23 (the denunciation of the religious leaders) should be taken as part of the final discourse.

For the over-all plan of the Gospel, numerous solutions have been proposed, but the most promising is that suggested by J. C. Fenton (Saint Matthew, 1963). He sees the arrangement as chiasmus, i.e. a, b:b, a. There is then found to be a similarity in length, and to some extent in subject-matter, between the first discourse (chs. 5–7) and the last (chs. 23–25) and between the second (ch. 10) and the fourth (ch. 18). The third discourse, the parables of the kingdom (ch. 13), is the central point. It is not apparent that there is any particular parallel between the narrative sections, as far as the third (chs. 11, 12) and the fourth (chs. 14–17), or the second (chs. 8, 9) and the fifth (chs. 19–22) are concerned. But there is parallelism between the beginning and the end of the Gospel. While it is not clear that Matthew intended the baptism (ch. 3) and the death (ch. 27) of Jesus to match up to each other (but cf. Mk. 10:38f.; Lk. 12:50), it is striking how the birth of Jesus is followed by the first quotation from the OT, 'God with us' (1:23) and the rebirth of Jesus from the dead is followed by His last word, 'I am with you always' (28:20).

This commentary will assume that Matthew had some such outline plan and that there are a good number of smaller numerical groupings within the Gospel which show evidence of a desire for a systematic presentation of the facts of the gospel.

CHARACTERISTICS

What special features belong to Matthew as distinct from the other Synoptic Gospels? They may be classified as stylistic and theological. As has been shown, the Evangelist is careful in arranging and grouping his material, with the result that he presents a much more systematic work than Mark. Together with that goes a tendency to abbreviate the narratives of Mark and to touch them up a little in the interests of good Greek, or to avoid misunderstandings. Also noteworthy is Matthew's use of the reverential Jewish expression 'kingdom of heaven', where the other Gospels speak of the 'kingdom of God'.

More important, however, are his theological interests. Perhaps the most striking thing is his interest in the fulfilment of the OT and his repeated use of 'formula quotations' to bring this out (1:22f.; 2:15, 17f., 23; 4:14–16; 8:17; 12:17–21; 13:35; 21:4f.; 27:9f.). Careful study of the context shows these to be much less arbitrary than is often alleged. (See R. H. Gundry, The Use of the Old Testament in St. Matthew's Gospel, 1967.) This involves fulfilment of the law (but not its destruction) by Christ (5:17–20), and consequently a new ethic which goes further than the current interpretation of the OT (5:21–24, 27–30, 33–37). Jesus is represented clearly as the Messiah, the Son of David (the phrase occurs eight times) and is shown to have royal authority at the time of His passion (26:53) as well as supremely after His resurrection (28:18). Yet, at the same time, Matthew makes it plain that He is the Servant of the Lord who took men's infirmities (8:17) and who dealt gently with people (12:17–21).

One who is concerned about the relation of the old covenant and the new inevitably gives prominence to the place of Israel in God's plan. The genealogy of Jesus is taken back to Abraham (1:1f.). Matthew alone records that Jesus' mission was only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel (15:24), as was that of the Twelve (10:5f.). But it is the people of God, and in particular their religious leaders, who receive the most severe condemnation for their failure to see the law in perspective and for their hostility to and rejection of the prophets and the Messiah Himself (23:1–39). The murderers were to be destroyed and their city burnt (22:7). The Servant of God was to proclaim justice to the Gentiles and they were to hope in His name (12:17–21). The final charge of Jesus recorded in the Gospel is to go and make disciples of all nations (28:19f.). The old people of God has lost its inheritance to a new one (21:43). There is therefore considerable emphasis in Matthew on the church. It is only in this Gospel that the word ekklēsia occurs; and it is clear that the evangelist is concerned about authority and order in the Christian community (16:17–19; 18:15–18).

In this Gospel there is also emphasis on the miraculous. It alone records the finding of the coin in the fish's mouth (17:24–27). But this interest is particularly prominent in the last two chapters, where the raising of the saints (27:51–53) and the action of the angel at the tomb (28:2–4) are described. Matthew also contains a good deal of teaching about the parousia or second coming of Christ. The word itself is found only in Matthew's Gospel (24:3, 27, 37, 39) and there are a number of occasions where he inserts apocalyptic sayings into the Markan material (e.g. 24:30f.). A number of the parables peculiar to Matthew deal with this theme (13:24–30, 36–43, 47–50; 25:1–46). He records as much as the other Gospels sayings which relate to the present activity of the kingdom in the person of Jesus, but he clearly has a special interest in the future consummation.

DATE AND PLACE OF ORIGIN

The first unmistakable quotation of Matthew is found in the writings of Ignatius (c. AD 115), and it is generally agreed that it was written some years before that. A decision about the earliest date at which it could have been written depends, in the first place, upon the view taken of its relationship to Mark. If, as seems most likely, Matthew is dependent upon Mark in its present form and Mark was published after Peter's death (c. 65), then Matthew must clearly be dated later than that.

A second factor is its relationship to the fall of Jerusalem in AD 70. Some have argued that the Gospel must be dated before AD 70, for it would have been very strange for Matthew not to have made explicit reference to the destruction of the Temple if it had occurred, because it would clearly have marked the end of the old covenant. But Matthew would be less concerned to make such a point than would the writer to the Hebrews. On the other hand, the majority of scholars have suggested that the indirect references to the fall of Jerusalem demand a date after AD 70. Such an argument loses much of its force, however, if its basic assumption, that Jesus could not have predicted such an event, is challenged. (Yet it must be conceded that the reference to the burning of the city in 22:7 could be a 'footnote' bringing the parable up to date after the event.)

There are certain features of the teaching in the Gospel, such as the assumed development of church order (16:19; 18:17f.), conditions of persecution (10:22; 24:9ff.), the emphasis on the certainty of the parousia after delay (24:37–51; 25:1–12), and the Gospel's general 'theological atmosphere', which are generally assumed to reflect a period towards the end of the 1st century. A few scholars have supposed that references to 'their synagogues' (4:23; 9:35; 10:17; 12:9; 13:54) demand a date after the exclusion of Christians from Jewish synagogues c. AD 85, but the evidence for this is not compelling. Any attempt at the precise dating of a Gospel is precarious, unless its publication can be shown to be closely connected with some known historical event. It is wiser, therefore, to say that Matthew should be dated somewhere between AD 65 and 110, with the Jewish nature of the Gospel and its many parallels with the Dead Sea Scrolls suggesting a date well within the first half of the period.

There is no certainty either about the place of origin of the Gospel. Its Jewish character is undoubted and the absence of explanation of Jewish customs (e.g. 15:2; 23:27) suggests a centre where Judaism was strong. It must, however have been a place where Greek was the normal language spoken as it is clear that our Gospel is not a translation from the Aramaic, and does not include some Aramaic words found in Mark. Most scholars therefore hold that it was not written for a community in Palestine. Some suggest Phoenicia as a likely place of origin, but most would favour somewhere in Syria, probably Antioch. Here there seem to have been Greek-speaking Christians, most of them of Jewish origin. It was a meeting-place between Jews and Jewish and Gentile Christians, and it was a centre of the Gentile mission. The interest of the Gospel in Peter and its use by Ignatius support this suggestion. This is probably the best hypothesis, but its acceptance does not involve the belief that all the material in the Gospel was necessarily collected at Antioch. The true place of origin of the Gospel may still have been Galilee and Jerusalem.

AUTHORSHIP

It was the unanimous tradition of the early church that the Gospel was written by the apostle Matthew in Hebrew (or Aramaic) and that it preceded the others. This view is now very widely challenged. The most serious difficulty is the supposition involved that an apostle, who was an eyewitness of the events recorded, should have made such use of Mark's Gospel, whose author was not an apostle. This does seem unlikely, yet if Mark preserves the Petrine tradition it could be seen that this would be taken as authoritative even by the other apostles, and Matthew could have edited Mark's version of it with touches based on his own experience. It is further alleged that some of the stories, usually of a miraculous nature, in Matthew's special material, and some of the teaching, particularly the emphasis on futurist eschatology, could not have come from an apostle. This is a problem, though to some extent it may beg the question of how far Mark is really the norm and whether the special emphases of the other Gospels do not give us a fuller picture of what Jesus in fact said and did.

Of particular importance is the saying of Papias: 'Matthew composed the Logia in the Hebrew tongue and everyone interpreted them as he was able.' This assumes an Aramaic origin for the Gospel which has been generally abandoned on account of the use made of Mark and of the LXX version of the OT. Those who do accept it have to suppose that our Gospel was based on a thorough revision of this Aramaic original with frequent reference to Mark, and this seems most improbable. Papias is therefore assumed to be wrong about the language, but right about Matthew's authorship of the Gospel, or to be referring to something else. If the latter is the case, what is meant by 'the Logia'? There have been two suggestions which have gained support. First is the possibility that it refers to a collection of 'testimonies' or proof-texts from the OT, but there is very little evidence that there was ever such a collection in book form. Secondly, the reference may be to a collection of sayings and, if this is so, it is tempting to identify it with Q. But again we do not know whether Q was written or oral and if written whether it was one document or more. In any event the term 'Logia' can mean more than a collection of sayings and is used elsewhere in early Christian literature and possibly by Papias himself in the sense of 'Gospel'.

It seems undeniable that the apostle Matthew is connected in some way with the Gospel which bears his name, not in the text but in the title, which was probably affixed early in the 2nd century and is evidence of the widespread belief in his authorship. He was not prominent enough to be an obvious choice for having a Gospel fathered on him if its paternity were unknown. The fact that he is named 'Matthew' not 'Levi' at his call is hardly basis enough for this (9:9; Mk. 2:14). Precisely what the connection is we cannot tell, but if the apostle did not actually write the Gospel, it is likely that he was a leader in the community out of which it emerged (perhaps a sort of catechetical school), or had played a prominent part in collecting and transmitting much of the material which is included in it. The systematic nature of the Gospel has often been thought to bear the mark of a revenue official. At any rate, the author may well have his own function in mind when he records the saying of Jesus that 'every scribe who has been trained for the kingdom of heaven is like a householder who brings out of his treasure what is new and what is old' (13:52).

PURPOSE

The general purpose of any Gospel is well summed up by John (Jn. 20:31). It is to make a selection of the deeds and words of Christ to induce faith in Him and life through Him. The basic contents of a Gospel are the contents of the apostolic kērygma, 'beginning from the baptism of John until the day when he was taken up from us' (Acts 1:22). The special purpose of Matthew can be sought by examining again the special characteristics of his Gospel.

The Jewish nature of the Gospel, with its emphasis on the fulfilment of the OT, suggests that it was intended as apologetic against unbelieving Jews. Six of the 'formula quotations' deal with either the birth and infancy or the death of Jesus, both obstacles to faith in Him for most Jews, because of rumours of illegitimacy and the scandal of a crucified Messiah. Emphasis is also laid on the reality of the resurrection against Jewish attempts to explain it away (27:62–66; 28:11–15). Yet it does not give the impression of being written directly for the outsider so much as for the Christian to use to deepen his own understanding of the fact of Christ, and then to be able to use its material in apologetic for the faith.

Because of its systematic arrangement, Matthew's Gospel has always been the most useful for teaching. Whether or not this was the product of a rabbinic type of 'school' (see K. Stendahl, The School of St. Matthew, 1954), it bears some of the marks of a 'manual of discipline' for a local church, with its emphasis on casuistic ethics and church order. It has also enjoyed more use in the liturgy of the church than any of the other Gospels, but this does not mean that it had its origin in the worship of a Christian community. (Cf. G. D. Kilpatrick, The Origins of the Gospel according to St. Matthew, 1946.)

We may conclude that the Gospel was probably written by a Jewish Christian for Jewish Christians in close contact with unbelieving Jews somewhere near to Palestine in the latter part of the 1st century AD. It was intended to instruct them carefully in the way in which Jesus had fulfilled the prophecies of the OT and had laid the foundations of the Christian church, continuous with the people of God in the old covenant and yet reformed and constituted from among all men on a spiritual basis. This instruction was to enable them to refute the attacks of the non-Christian Jews and to present to them also Jesus as their true King.

1:1 – 2:23 THE BIRTH AND INFANCY OF THE CHRIST

The essential starting-point of the Gospels, as of the kērygma, is the baptism of John. Matthew, like Luke, has two preliminary chapters to explain Jesus' identity and to show how even in His birth and infancy prophecy was being fulfilled. The material here is all peculiar to Matthew. It seems to represent Joseph's story of the events, while Luke gives Mary's.

1:1–17 The genealogy of Jesus

The systematic arrangement of the genealogy is important as it shows at once the way in which Matthew approaches the gospel events.

1, 2 The book of the genealogy means literally 'the book of the genesis'. It is unlikely to be an attempt to parallel the first book of the OT as a whole. The phrase is, however, probably influenced by 'the book of the generations' of Gn. 5:1. Jesus is the normal name by which our Lord was known during His earthly life. Its significance is given in v. 21. Christ, literally 'anointed', was the title of the Messianic King of Israel. David was the greatest of the kings of Israel, with whom a covenant was made that his son should sit on his throne (2 Sa. 7:12–16; Pss. 89:29, 36, 37; 132:11). This came to be understood in a Messianic sense. Jesus is referred to as son of David also in 9:27; 12:23; 15:22; 20:30f.; 21:9, 15; 22:42, 45. This shows the royal emphasis of the Gospel. Abraham was the father of the Israelite race, with whom God also made a covenant of blessing through his descendants (Gn. 12:1–3; 17:1–8). The true fulfilment of this was likewise through the Christ. Luke goes back to Adam (Lk. 3:38) showing his universalism, Matthew starts with Abraham demonstrating his emphasis on God's working through the chosen people.

3 Tamar is one of four women mentioned to show that irregular unions had been part of the royal ancestry. This may have been done because of slanders about Jesus' origin. She was an adulteress (Gn. 38). 5 Rahab had been a harlot and was a foreigner (Jos. 2). Ruth was a Moabitess (Ru. 1–4). 6 The wife of Uriah was Bathsheba with whom David committed adultery (2 Sa. 12). 11 The deportation to Babylon is important because it marked the end of the Davidic succession and pointed on to a greater king. 16 Joseph the husband of Mary: it seems as if Matthew has been tracing the legal descent down to Joseph while Luke may be giving the natural descent. The lists diverge after David, coincide for Shealtiel and Zerubbabel, then diverge again until Joseph. There is no suggestion in this verse that Joseph was the natural father of Jesus. The mention of Mary and the story which follows make that quite clear. Even the Sinaitic Syriac MS, which makes Joseph the father of Jesus, does not necessarily mean anything more than the legal father. 17 Fourteen generations is a stylized presentation, because three names have been left out from the first group, and the third group contains only thirteen generations (hardly an indication of a separation between Jesus at His birth and at His becoming the Christ later on). Perhaps Mary was supposed to be included. The numerical value of the letters of the Hebrew form of David is fourteen, and thus the royalty of Jesus is further stressed.

1:18–25 The birth of Jesus

The details given here are quite different from those in Luke, though both agree on the basic points that Jesus was conceived without a human father and was born at Bethlehem. In the nature of the case, it is hardly surprising that the details were treated with reserve by Joseph and Mary and were not part of the primitive Christian proclamation. Matthew's account of the birth and infancy emphasizes the guidance of God given in dreams and the fulfilment of OT prophecy.

18 Betrothed: this was a binding relationship and unfaithfulness during it was regarded as adultery. The Holy Spirit takes the initiative in the conception of Jesus (cf. Lk. 1:35). There were occasions in the OT where God's action brought about the birth of a man of God (Gn. 18:11–14; 1 Sa. 1:4–20) and the same happened in the case of John the Baptist (Lk. 1:5–25). But nowhere is it suggested that both parents were not involved in the act of procreation. Here and in v. 25 it is specifically denied that Joseph had intercourse with Mary before the birth of Jesus. 19 Husband was a term which could be used of a fiancé. Because the engagement was binding a divorce would be necessary. Joseph, as a just man, wished to do the correct legal thing. Of the alternatives of a court action and simply giving her a writ in the presence of two witnesses, he chose the latter. Justice should be tempered with mercy. 20 A dream was the means of guidance also in 2:12, 13, 19, 22. Son of David is a reminder of the legal Messianic descent of Jesus via Joseph. 21 Jesus is the Greek form of the Hebrew Joshua, 'the Lord saves'. It is possible that Joshua, as well as Moses, provides a type for some of the actions and sayings of Jesus in the Gospel, but this is nowhere made explicit. The removal of sin was one of the features expected in the Messianic age, but the way in which Jesus was to do it was totally unexpected.

22 is the first of the 'formulas' which introduce special OT quotations (see Introduction). 23 A virgin: Hebrew 'almâ does not normally mean anything more than a young woman. In the context of the quotation in Isaiah (Is. 7:10–17), it seems that the woman referred to may have been a wife of King Ahaz. LXX translated the word by the Greek parthenos ('virgin') for reasons which are uncertain. There was no expectation of a virgin birth in Israel, and it is clear that for Matthew the fact leads on to the prophecy rather than vice versa. It is useful to him that LXX has used this word, but the point is subsidiary to the name Emmanuel. The sign given to Ahaz was the pledge, through the birth of a son, that God was faithful to the covenant made with David by delivering His people from their enemies and being with them in His living presence (2 Sa. 7:4–17). This new sign fulfils all this and more, for God's presence is with men not in the Temple but in something greater, the person of His Son (12:6). This note is taken up more clearly in the promise of the perpetual presence of the risen Christ (28:20).

24, 25 imply that Joseph and Mary had normal sexual relations after the birth of Jesus, though RSV rightly omits AV's 'firstborn'. It is natural to suppose that the brothers and sisters of Jesus (13:55f.) were children of Joseph and Mary.

2:1–12 The visit of the Magi

This story has often been dismissed as legendary, partly because of parallels in other literature and partly because of the unusual features involved. But it seems that Matthew is treating it as factual and it would not be surprising that, if Jesus was God incarnate, His infancy as well as His birth and ministry should have been attended by remarkable phenomena.

1 Bethlehem was the birthplace of David (1 Sa. 16:1) and the census had taken Joseph and Mary there because of their Davidic descent (Lk. 2:1–6). Judea was the name of the Roman province, but it is probably mentioned here as a reminder of the descent of Jesus from the royal line of Judah. Herod was an Idumaean, known as 'Herod the Great'. He was a puppet king under the Romans and was given the title 'King of the Jews' in 40 BC. He died in 4 BC, and this fact is the only help we get from Matthew in dating the birth of Jesus. Wise men (Gk. magoi) were astrologers, probably from Persia or thereabouts. There is no reason to suppose that they were thought of as evil men practising black magic.

2 King of the Jews: the royalty of Jesus runs right through the Gospel as far as the cross (27:11, 29, 37). Here it is set in contrast to Herod's kingship over the Jews. (Luke on a broader canvas contrasts Caesar Augustus, who claimed the titles 'Saviour' and 'Lord', with the 'Saviour, who is Christ the Lord' (Lk. 2:1–11).) The title is equally misunderstood by Herod who feels threatened by it, and Pilate who feels bewildered by it (27:11–14). His star: it was thought that the star signified the presence of a great man. As it denoted someone great in Judea, they naturally went through the official channels, never expecting the obscurity which surrounded the One whom they sought. There is no certainty about the astronomical phenomenon but it may have been the close conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn in 7 BC.

3 While the Gentiles come to worship (cf. 12:18–21), those in control of Jerusalem, the city of God, are troubled. 4 Herod recognizes that a person of such importance to the Magi is likely to be the Messiah. 5 For the belief that the Messiah would be born in Bethlehem, cf. also Jn. 7:42. 6 This 'formula quotation' of Mi. 5:2 agrees neither with MT nor LXX. It should probably be taken as the comment of the Evangelist rather than part of the words of the priests and scribes. Matthew takes as a starting-point the assertion that Bethlehem is least (though clearly the prophet only considered it least in the eyes of the world) and shows that now it is by no means least. Rulers is a possible translation of Hebrew 'elep̄, 'thousands' or 'clans' in LXX. Who will govern: Greek poimanei literally means 'shepherd'. The thought is found in Mi. 5:3f., but this clause is in fact quoting 2 Sa. 5:2 where the tribes of Israel came to make David king over them in Hebron.

10 It is interesting that Matthew does not link the star with the prophecy of the star from Jacob (Nu. 24:17) which was taken as Messianic in Judaism and the early church. This suggests that this prophecy had no part in shaping the story. 11 The reference to the child suggests that this may have been a considerable number of months after His birth. The Magi probably told Herod when they first saw the star, and his killing of the children under two years old (v. 16) suggests that there was a fair period of time involved. They worshipped, even though they would not have full understanding at this stage of the one who was 'God with us' (1:23). The background of Ps. 72:10; Is. 49:7; 60:10, brings out some of the significance which was later attached to the gifts, and explains why the Magi came to be thought of as kings. The mention of three gifts is the basis on which the Magi were believed to number three. None of these points is made by Matthew and they are purely speculative. The Son of God, having been revealed first to Mary and Joseph, two humble and poor Jews, is now revealed to representatives of the learned and rich among the Gentiles.

2:13–23 The flight to Egypt and the return

This section has likewise been seen as having a legendary character and as being inspired by the desire to demonstrate the fulfilment of Scripture both by type and by prophecy. Our attitude to it will again be determined by what we believe Matthew is trying to do and by whether we accept the divine overruling of history.

13 There is irony in the fact that Egypt, the place of bondage (Ex. 20:2), is now the place of safety. It is here that Jesus must be taken to escape the wrath of the king (cf. Heb. 11:27) in the promised land. 15 The quotation in its original context (Ho. 11:1) refers to the people of Israel as God's son (cf. Ex. 4:22). Matthew uses it here because he sees that Jesus is not only the Son of God in a unique way, but also the embodiment in Himself of the people of God. He is soon to go through the water and the desert, as did the people at the Exodus (Mt. 3:13 – 4:11). 16 This action is quite typical of what is known about Herod. There may have been only a score or so children of that age-group in the area, so that there is no reason why this should have been recorded by secular historians in comparison with some of his more notorious deeds. His action is similar to that of Pharaoh (Ex. 1:15–22) and the comparison of Jesus with Moses (as well as with Israel as a whole) is clear in this passage. Yet the differences are such that there is clearly no attempt to make the pattern of Jesus' experience the same as that of Moses.

18 The connection of this quotation (Je. 31:15) with the events does not lie on the surface and it is further evidence that for Matthew learning of the event comes first and finding the appropriate scripture follows. Rachel is the mother-figure of Israel and her tomb at Ramah, some 5 miles north of Jerusalem, was near the route that the Israelites took on their way to exile in Babylon. She is said to have died 'on the way to Ephrath (that is, Bethlehem)' (Gn. 35:19; cf. 48:7), and the Bethlehem allusion may also be in mind. The context of Je. 31 shows that the taking away of the 'children' of Israel into captivity, while a matter for profound sorrow and mourning, was in fact the prelude of a new era for the people of God, in which 'There is hope for your future, says the Lord' (Je. 31:17). So the weeping of the mothers of Israel is here a prelude to the saving work of the Messiah. 20 Cf. Ex. 4:19. 22 Archelaus succeeded to Herod's territory in Judea, Samaria and Idumaea. Herod Antipas became tetrarch of Galilee and Peraea, and Philip of the area north and east of Galilee. Archelaus was seen to be a greater threat to the safety of the infant Christ than was Antipas. 23 This is the most difficult of the 'formula quotations' to trace. The prophets (plural) suggests that several passages may be in mind. It is usual to relate it particularly to the nēṣer ('branch') of Is. 11:1. This was taken to be a Messianic passage foretelling the lowly origin of the Christ despite His Davidic ancestry. It seems that the name Nazareth brings this point to the mind of the evangelist. There is no real reason to see any connection with Nazirites. For the contempt of Nazareth, cf. Jn. 1:46. Matthew must show that the fact that Jesus lived in Galilee did not mean that He was not born in Bethlehem (cf. Jn. 7:41f.).

3:1 – 4:25 THE BAPTISM AND TEMPTATION OF THE CHRIST

Matthew has shown us the royal, Messianic, divine origin of Jesus and the way in which the Scriptures were fulfilled in His birth and infancy. There follows a long gap and the story is not picked up again for some 30 years (cf. Lk. 3:23). The saving events are connected with His ministry, death and resurrection, and it is these that form the main content of the kērygma. John the Baptist stood at the beginning of the kērygma (Acts 1:22; 10:37; 13:24f.) and at the beginning, therefore, of the main part of the Gospels (cf. Mk. 1:2ff.; Lk. 3:1ff.; Jn. 1:6ff.). He was the last of the prophets of the old covenant (Mt. 11:13), who came as the forerunner of the Messiah (11:11; Mk. 1:2) and was a witness to the incarnation (Jn. 1:7f.) rather in the way that the apostles were witnesses to the resurrection. He is an antitype of Elijah (Mt. 11:14) and may also be compared to Moses, bringing his people to the borders of the promised land but not being able to enter it himself (11:11). Here we move from the voice of the prophets in Scripture (chs. 1, 2) to the voice of the living contemporary prophet teaching us the truth about Jesus.

The baptism of Jesus, in which He was commissioned for His Messianic ministry, leads on naturally to His temptation, where His vocation is thoroughly tested. Once that has been done and John's ministry has been brought to an end (4:12), the way is open for Jesus to begin His own ministry and call men to share with Him in it.

3:1–12 The ministry of John

This section partly follows Mk. 1:2–8, but for vv. 7–10, 12, cf. Lk. 3:2–9, 16f. It describes the general tenor of John's ministry before he was called to his supreme task of baptizing the Christ.

1, 2 In those days is perhaps a rather vague time note (Luke alone of the Evangelists gives dates), but it may mean 'in those momentous days'. John the Baptist is well enough known to readers of the Gospel not to need any further introduction. The wilderness of Judea embraced a large area which was not cultivated, but much of which was suitable for grazing. Traditionally the wilderness stood for the simplicity of life with God as against the corruption of city life, and some prophets and ascetic groups operated in or from it. Any connection of John with an Essene group is purely speculative, but his object was quite different from theirs. He did not try to withdraw people from the main body of Judaism but to create a spiritual remnant within it. The content of John's preaching is summarized by Matthew in the same terms as that of Jesus (4:17). Repent meant a change of attitude to self and to God. The call is made because of the imminence of the Messianic kingdom. Matthew uses the reverential expression kingdom of heaven while the other Evangelists all speak of the 'kingdom of God'.

3 In MT of Is. 40:3 there should probably be a colon after 'crying'. The evangelists have taken over the quotation in the form here and see the Lord as a reference to Christ. This oracle originally calling for preparation for God's deliverance of His people from the Exile is appropriate for this new act of deliverance which is about to happen. 4 The sartorial model is clearly Elijah (cf. 2 Ki. 1:8). 5 John evidently caused a great stir at the very heart of Judaism. 6 The exact procedure of baptism is uncertain. The Qumran community made repentance a condition for receiving its rite of baptism.

7 His clientele was surprisingly far-ranging. The Pharisees might have been expected to think that their legalism, and the Sadducees that their ritualism, would be sufficient passport to heaven. But many of them came from a sense of fear like snakes fleeing from a forest fire. John's bluntness is characteristic. 9 The danger of relying on pedigree, rather than on spiritual conformity, is an ever-present one (cf. Jn. 8:39f.). It is not stated whether they were in fact baptized, but it seems unlikely at least for most of them (cf. 21:25f.). 11 John's baptism was to point not only to the person of the Messiah but also to His activity. John admits himself unfit to be His slave. As Jesus is greater than John, so will His baptism be greater than John's. The Holy Spirit should probably not be understood here in the fully personal sense in which the third person of the Trinity was revealed at Pentecost. There was to be an inward work of God in their hearts. 12 The wind of the Spirit and the fire were alike agents of decisive judgment.

3:13–17 The baptism of Jesus

This is close to Mk. 1:9–11 (cf. Lk. 3:21f.), but vv. 14, 15 are peculiar to Matthew. Most commentators see the baptism of Jesus not only as a commissioning for His ministry (cf. 21:23–27) but also as a symbolic recapitulation of the Exodus from Egypt, performed by Jesus the new Israel and bringer of the new Exodus of salvation (cf. 1 Cor. 10:1–4). As Matthew alone records John's hesitation about baptizing Jesus, vv. 14f. have often been regarded as unauthentic and as an addition to meet objections that Jesus' acceptance of baptism at the hands of John implied both sinfulness and also inferiority to John. It is thought unlikely that John recognized Him as the Messiah (cf. Jn. 1:31). For this does not mention any such recognition but only John's sense that he was dealing with someone morally superior. John would have known Jesus' character, and His bearing on this occasion would confirm that here was no sinner in need of repentance. It would appear from Jn. 1:31–34 that through what happened at Jesus' baptism, John himself realized who He was, or came more deeply to appreciate the work He had come to do.

15 To fulfill all righteousness: this seems to mean that He accepted the divine plan and vocation and identified Himself with the remnant within Israel. 16 Went up: the same word is used of the Exodus (e.g. Ex. 13:18) and of the entry into the promised land (e.g. Dt. 1:21), and this may be significant in the context, though it is, of course, a common descriptive word. The opening of the heavens may be in fulfilment of Is. 64:1 and symbolizes the coming of God into the world in Christ (cf. Jn. 1:51). The Spirit's descent like a dove was something which only Jesus is said to have seen. 17 The voice was the voice of God (the baṭ qôl). The words are generally taken to be a combination of Is. 42:1 and Ps. 2:7. This would show that Jesus was the Messiah but that His Messiahship is to be interpreted in the light of the prophecies of the Servant of the Lord. This is . . . does not mean that Jesus became Son of God at this moment but that He was commissioned for His work as Son of God (cf. 17:5). My beloved Son is a phrase which suggests a unique relationship (cf. Jn. 1:18) and Jesus is referred to as 'the Beloved' in Eph. 1:6. With whom I am well pleased: not only in His obedience thus far but also as the agent by whom God will fulfil His plan of salvation.

4:1–11 The temptations of Jesus

These are referred to briefly in Mk. 1:12f. For this account, cf. Lk. 4:1–13. The only substantial difference from Luke is the order of the second and third temptations. Matthew's account works to a psychological climax; Luke's seems to be governed more by geography. Only the Synoptic Gospels and Hebrews mention the temptations (cf. Heb. 2:18; 4:15). There is no doubt at all about the Exodus typology here. The answers which Jesus gives from Deuteronomy, which is a theological commentary on Israel's time in the wilderness, show that He has entered into an understanding of His recapitulation of the role of Israel in His own person. The temptations are basically the same as those of God's people (cf. also 1 Cor. 10:1–13) and come to test both the person and the programme of Jesus. There is a further parallel with the temptations of Adam and Eve (Gn. 3), described as 'the lust of the flesh and the lust of the eyes and the pride of life' (1 Jn. 2:16), which suggests that the temptations were typical of those which mankind as a whole has to face.

1 This was a work of the Spirit because it was necessary for Jesus to overcome temptation. 2–4 The forty days in the wilderness after His baptism are a miniature of the 40 years of Israel in the wilderness after their baptism at the Exodus, when as God's son they were called out of Egypt (Ho. 11:1). If you are the Son of God: cf. v. 6; 27:40, 43. The declaration of God (3:17) is put to the test (cf. Gn. 3:1). To turn stones into bread would have been quite inconsistent with the creative power of God who made these things different. It is written . . . The scripture is Dt. 8:3, referring back to Israel's grumbling about the manna (Nu. 11:4–9). This, then, is a temptation to the body ('the lust of the flesh'; cf. Gn. 3:6, 'good for food'), to be dissatisfied with God's provision and to embark on a programme of miraculous feeding in order to achieve His ends. 5–7 The pinnacle was probably some projecting turret or buttress. The ascent does not seem to be literally intended. Satan's quotation of Scripture is subtle but out of context. Jesus' reply is from Dt. 6:16, meaning not that the devil should not tempt Him but that He should not put God the Father to the test. This refers to the incident at Massah where the people demanded signs of God's presence (Ex. 17:1–7). This is therefore a temptation to the mind ('the lust of the eyes'; cf. Gn. 3:6 'a delight to the eyes'), to be dissatisfied with God's methods and to embark on a programme of spectacular wonder-working in order to achieve His ends. 8–10 A very high mountain seems to be symbolic. The scripture quoted is Dt. 6:13 which refers back to the incident of the golden calf (Ex. 32:1–6). This is the culminating temptation—to the soul ('the pride of life'; cf. Gn. 3:5 'you will be like God') to be dissatisfied with God Himself and to embark on a programme of unscrupulous manipulation to achieve His ends. 11 This does not mean that He was never tempted again (cf. Lk. 4:13: 'until an opportune time').

4:12–25 The beginning of the ministry

Vv. 12, 17–22 are parallel to Mk. 1:14–20 (cf. Lk. 4:14). Vv. 13–16, 24f. are peculiar to Matthew. Matthew omits the story of Jesus in the synagogue at Capernaum (Mk. 1:21–28), and places the healing of Peter's mother-in-law and of the sick at evening (Mk. 1:29–34) in 8:14–16. He also omits the reference to Jesus' withdrawal (Mk. 1:35–38) and again parallels Mk. 1:39 in v. 23. In this section the Messiah, who has been commissioned for His work, now begins it in Galilee and begins to call to Himself disciples to be associated with Him in it. A general summary is given of His work in Galilee.

12 The arrest of John is the signal for Jesus' ministry to begin. 13 Nazareth was apparently not in the territory of Zebulun and Naphtali while Capernaum was. This becomes 'his own city' (9:1) and the move is seen to be a fulfilment of prophecy. 15, 16 quote Is. 9:1f., where the contrast is made between the darkness of the northern regions subjugated by the Assyrians and the light of deliverance which would shine on them. So it is in the despised provinces that the Messianic King begins His work unknown. 17 is the summary of Jesus' message in the first part of His ministry (cf. 16:21 for His message in the second part). The message is the same as John's in outline (cf. 3:2). 18 The call of the disciples and their immediate response may be accounted for by the fact that Jesus had met them before (cf. Jn. 1:35–42). 19 Follow me was a command to be obeyed literally and figuratively. 23 is a general summary of Jesus' Galilean ministry. Teaching and preaching follow in chs. 5–7, and healing in chs. 8, 9. The disciples are to be associated with this threefold work (cf. 9:35–37). 24 Syria may be used in the sense of the Roman province to which Palestine belonged, rather than specifically the territory north of Galilee. The area had a mixed population and some contact with Gentiles must have occurred.

5:1 – 7:29 THE SERMON ON THE MOUNT

Matthew is shown here par excellence as the collector and systematic arranger of the teaching of Jesus. While much of the Sermon is his own material, there is a certain amount found also in Luke, but in different places in his Gospel. If Matthew is indeed a handbook of Christian instruction, we should expect him to lay more stress on the subject-matter than on the occasion of utterance of many of Jesus' sayings. It is natural to see Jesus as the new Moses delivering the new Torah (Law) with a new authority (5:21f., 27f., 31–34, 38f., 43f.). But it is not a new legalism, despite the emphasis on the importance of law and the danger of antinomianism (5:17–20). The real criticism is directed not against the OT law but against the rabbinic interpretation of it. Matthew shows how Jesus 'radicalizes' the demand of God, revealing it to be something that deals with the inward man and which can be worked out only through the power of love (5:21–48). It is didachē (moral teaching) but it is set within the framework of kērygma. It can be attempted only by the man who has responded to the challenge of the kingdom presented by Jesus, and who seeks to obey on the basis of grace. The perfection demanded (5:48) does not mean that there is a double standard, but that the new life of sonship in Christ is the only basis on which the principles set out are in any way attainable. Only that can give the right outlook and attitudes, and it is these, particularly as they are expressed in personal relationships, rather than the outward actions, which have the primary significance. Yet no divorce is expected between the two.

5:1–16 Characteristics of discipleship

This section is peculiar to Matthew in this form, but there are parallels to vv. 3, 5, 6, 11, 12 in Lk. 6:20–26. Matthew does not include the woes given by Luke. This is a 'programmatic' discourse (like the sermon at Nazareth in Lk. 4:16–30) setting the tone of the teaching ministry of Jesus. The emphasis is on the Messianic bliss of the poor and oppressed. For vv. 13–16, cf. Mk. 9:50; 4:21–23; Lk. 14:34f.; 8:16–18; 11:33.

1 The mountain has not been identified; the word does not signify a peak but a place withdrawn enough for Him to escape from the crowds and to be with His disciples. There is no apparent emphasis on the comparison with Moses giving the law from the mountain. He sat down, as was the custom of teachers in the synagogues (cf. Lk. 4:20). 3 Blessed: the 'Beatitudes' received their name from the Latin word beatus, 'blessed'. The sense is 'Oh, the blessedness of . . . ' (cf. Ps. 1:1). Many of the Beatitudes have close OT parallels. Jesus, however, unites them into one integrated Christian character. Some ancient versions place v. 5 before v. 4 and, if that is the correct order, the Beatitudes fall naturally into four pairs with v. 11 expanding the eighth in v. 10. The poor in the OT were often the pious (cf. Ps. 69:29–36; Is. 61:1). 4 Mourn: cf. Is. 61:2. The comfort is Messianic. 5 This statement is very similar to Ps. 37:11. The earth may simply mean the 'land', with the idea of the promised land. 6 Cf. Is. 55:1f. Righteousness may mean not only right ethical conduct but vindication by God. 7 There does not seem to be a clear OT parallel to this Beatitude. 8 See God: cf. Ps. 24:3f. 9 Peacemakers is a rare word. In Is. 27:5 there is the idea of making peace with God.

10 The Beatitudes are rounded off as they were begun with the promise of the Kingdom. Here righteousness must mean right conduct and it is only when this is involved that the persecuted can be regarded as blessed. All the Beatitudes upset human calculations, but this one more than most. It is expanded and personalized in vv. 11, 12. 11 Matthew makes a point of the evil being spoken falsely (cf. Lk. 6:22). 12 Rejoice, because of, rather than in spite of, persecution. The reward offered is not something for mere selfish enjoyment but a greater capacity to enjoy and serve God. Persecution is the mark of the prophetic succession (cf. 23:37). 13 Salt is of value as a preservative. To the Rabbis it denoted wisdom (cf. Col. 4:6). The wise life and speech of the disciple should have their effect on society, but contact without dilution is necessary. 14 The light of the world was said by the Rabbis to be God, Adam, Israel, the law, the Temple or Jerusalem. The Jews, at least in their own estimate of themselves, and Christians are both referred to in such terms by Paul (Rom. 2:19; Phil. 2:15). But for the NT, Jesus is supremely the Light of the world (Jn. 8:12). 16 Where the motives are really good, public doing of right is much to be commended (but cf. 6:1). Your Father: a very important concept in the teaching of Jesus. He never identifies the relationship of the disciples to God with His own relationship to God (cf. Jn. 20:17).

5:17–48 The old and the new law

This section is largely peculiar to Matthew, but there are some parallels to vv. 38–48 in Lk. 6:27–36 and to vv. 18, 32 in Lk. 16:17f. For vv. 25f., cf. Lk. 12:57–59. After an initial statement of His attitude towards the law and the prophets (vv. 17–20), Jesus then gives examples of the application of His principles to various OT precepts and their normal rabbinic interpretation.

5:17–20 The validity of the law. These verses have caused considerable difficulty because they seem to demand a total acceptance of the OT law in a way which was neither practised by the early church nor apparently advocated in the rest of the Sermon on the Mount. Their very difficulty should make us less ready to write them off as unauthentic. Nor is there any objective ground for calling v. 19 'anti-Pauline polemic'. The verses seem to be basically a criticism of the position of the Pharisees with a warning against antinomianism.

17 Think not: some of His early actions might have caused them to think this (cf. Mk. 2:23–28). Abolish may mean rather to 'break up' the divinely-given unity of law and prophets as a whole in Scripture. To fulfil (Gk. plēroō) is probably not so much to obey them as to 'give them their full meaning'. This is the way in which the word is used in the 'formula quotations'. Law and prophets find their deepest significance when the Messiah comes. 18 Some have tried to take this as referring to the attitude of the Pharisees, but this seems unnatural. Iota probably refers to the Hebrew yôḏ which may often be omitted. Dot probably refers to the small strokes on certain Hebrew letters, but it may signify the Hebrew waw which was also dispensable. Till heaven and earth pass away means 'during the present age', stressing its relative permanence. Pass (Gk. parerchomai) is the same word as pass away. All is accomplished: the Greek word ginomai is frequently used in Matthew of something which happens in fulfilment of prophecy (cf. 1:22; 21:4; 24:6; 26:54, 56). There is a close parallel to this verse in 24:34f. where ginomai and parerchomai are both used. The sense may well be that in this age nothing shall pass away from the OT until everything which it predicts about the Messiah has happened and so been given its full significance.

19 extends the principle from what is 'fulfilled' in the coming of Christ to the attitude of disciples to the law. Relaxes: this is what the Qumran sect and others thought the Pharisees did. By their casuistry they made the law practicable and therefore blunted its moral force. These commandments are usually taken as referring to the OT law, but it may be that these looks forward to what follows—Christ's deeper interpretation of the law, which indicates the way to its true fulfilment. 20 Exceeds: in quality rather than quantity. The scribes were those who claimed to teach the law, and the Pharisees those who claimed to do it. Entry into the kingdom depends on a new relationship with God (righteousness and 'justification' are cognate words) which must be demonstrated by lives and teaching of a new depth and power.

5:21–26 Killing and anger. The commandment from the Decalogue is extended to deal with the motive of anger. There is a similar pattern in the following five paragraphs also. The repeated I say to you emphasizes Jesus' authority in giving moral principles more radical than the rabbinic hālāḵâ (cf. 7:28f.).

22 'Without cause' (RSV mg.) is not in the best MSS. The prohibition is absolute. It is hard to see a clearly ascending scale of wrongs and penalties, even if judgment simply means a human court. It may be that they said that whoever insults his brother shall be liable to the council. This would mean that Jesus twice contrasts an eternal punishment with a temporal one (judgment human: judgment divine; council: hell of fire) though this is not the most natural way to take the Greek. It is possible, on the other hand, that the Greek morē (fool) is a transliteration of the Hebrew mōreh, 'apostate' (Je. 5:23; Ps. 78:8). 23, 24 move on from being angry with others to others being angry with the disciples. Offering your gift at the altar implies a situation within Judaism rather than the church. The Day of Atonement was held not to cover offences against a man's neighbour unless there was reconciliation. 25, 26 were probably originally in an eschatological context, as in Lk. 12:57–59. The principle of getting right with God is here extended to getting right with one's neighbour. It is the realization of human bankruptcy towards God and the need to keep short accounts with Him that should underlie dealings with one's neighbour (cf. 18:23–35).

5:27–32 Adultery and lust. Here there is a similar extension of the Decalogue followed by a statement about divorce.

27, 28 Adultery meant in the first instance a man's taking another man's wife, and was similar to taking his property or his life. The principle is probably to be extended to all forms of sexual relations outside marriage. The desire has the same nature as the action. 29, 30 are also found in 18:8f., cf. Mk. 9:43–48. Metaphorically the eye is the organ through which the wrong thought is stimulated and the hand the limb by which it is put into action. A limitation of certain areas of experience is preferable to having the whole body, which represents the whole personality, thrown into hell, the place of final destruction. 31 This instruction was given in Dt. 24:1–4. It was a limitation on unfettered divorce without proper safeguards. Jesus supports the stricter school of Shammai. 32 Except on the ground of unchastity: there is a parallel to this passage in 19:1–9; cf. Mk. 10:2–12; Lk. 16:18. Only Matthew includes the exception, but he may only be making explicit what was implicit in the other Gospels. Unchastity (Gk. porneia) originally meant sexual relations before marriage, but it came to have a wider connotation of all sexual irregularity. Makes her an adulteress: presumably because she will remarry. If she has been divorced for unchastity then she has already made herself an adulteress. This is the absolute ethic of the kingdom which is no more meant to be a subject for legislation than anything else in this passage.

5:33–37 Oaths and truthfulness. This is based upon the ninth commandment. The prohibition of false witness was extended to an obligation to keep oaths which were sworn (Nu. 30:2; Dt. 23:21; cf. also Jas. 5:12). 33 Swear: not necessarily to God. What is sworn to a neighbour in His name a man must perform to the Lord. 34, 35 All the things used for oaths were in some way related to God, despite the fact that the Rabbis did not regard them as binding (cf. 23:16–22). 36 Oaths sometimes presume a power of the swearer which is quite lacking. 37 A man's word should be capable of being trusted without any verbal ritual to give it validity. Evil: probably in the sense of fallen human society, but it may mean 'the evil one'.

5:38–48 Revenge and grace. There are parallels in Lk. 6:27–36. The legalistic basis of 'tit for tat' which must provide a general framework for society, must also yield within the kingdom to the principle of grace.

38 The lex talionis (principle of revenge) stated in Ex. 21:23f. was a restriction on unlimited revenge (cf. Gn. 4:23f.). Jesus carries the principle further. 39 Do not resist: the context suggests that it is applicable to wrongs done to a person himself and not a prohibition of the defence of others. The disciple is ready to give extra rather than to demand restitution. 40 Coat: the undergarment which could be demanded as a legal fine or pledge. The cloak was the outer garment which had to be returned to the poor man (Ex. 22:26f.; Dt. 24:12f.). 41 The Romans could press those who were not Roman citizens to carry equipment for a mile (cf. 27:32). 42 The obligation to give is one to which the disciple is open without limitation, though there is no command to give precisely what is asked for (cf. Acts 3:6). 43 The law only commanded love to the neighbour (Lv. 19:18). Sectarian groups in particular extended this to hatred of those who did not belong to the righteous. 44 The law in fact provided for kindness to enemies (Ex. 23:4f.). Persecutors are the most difficult enemies to love. Prayer is an essential step towards loving them. 45 This attitude comes from a quality of life which depends on a family relationship to God (cf. 5:9). He is indiscriminate in his general undeserved blessings ('common grace') to mankind. 46, 47 What reward . . . ? is probably to be taken in the sense of 'What have you done for which you would deserve a reward?' and is parallel to the expression in v. 47, what more . . . ? The disciple does extra in response to the God who gives extra far beyond deserts. (Cf. Lk. 6:32–34 where Gk. poia charis probably means 'what sort of grace are you showing?') 48 The perfection demanded springs from this relationship which revolutionizes attitudes. It is a perfection which is unattainable and therefore continually to be aimed at.

6:1–18 Religious observance

If the last section (5:21–48) has been mainly dealing with the teaching of the scribes, this one deals with the practice of the Pharisees. It is peculiar to Matthew, except for the Lord's Prayer (vv. 9–13; cf. Lk. 11:2–4). V. 1 links up the idea of reward with the preceding passage. It shows that the motive is what counts in religious observance as well as in morals. It demonstrates that these must be undertaken in the spirit of sonship. Vv. 2–4 deal with almsgiving—the obligation towards men. Vv. 5–15 deal with prayer—the obligation towards God. Vv. 16–18 deal with fasting—the obligation towards oneself.

2 Alms were thought by many Jews to atone for sin. Hypocrites literally means 'actors'. They were not necessarily insincere, but they had such a wrong idea of what religion was about that their usually correct outward acts did not correspond to any inward spiritual reality. People with such an attitude have their reward. They have achieved what they wanted, human praise. They have been paid in full and there is no further reward to come. 4 The almsgiving not seen by men is seen by God and He alone provides a reward of a truly satisfying kind. (The word 'openly' in AV here and in vv. 6, 18 does not occur in the best MSS.) 5, 6 The same principles apply to ostentatious prayer. It is even more reprehensible that something supposed to be directed towards God is so flagrantly directed towards men. 7, 8 Heap up empty phrases: or, 'gabble'. This is the 'slot-machine' principle. You put in words and get out answers. Prayer is not really like that but springs out of personal relationship to the Father. His prescience does not destroy the point of personal requests which deepen the sense of dependence and gratitude.

9–13 The Lord's Prayer occurs also in Luke. Jesus may have given it in slightly different forms on two separate occasions, but, if it is taken as the same utterance of His, then it appears that Matthew has expanded a number of the points in it in order to make the meaning plainer. The doxology (v. 13, AV) is no part of the original text but came into it through its use in the worship of the early church. As with much else about the teaching of Jesus, it can be paralleled from Jewish sources. Its originality lies in its compact arrangement, its sense of the Fatherhood of God and its emphasis on the coming of the kingdom. It treats first of God's will and glory and then of human need.

9 Like this: it is a model as well as something to use itself (cf. Lk. 11:2). Our Father . . . : Luke has simply 'Father'. 'Heavenly Father' is a common phrase in Matthew (cf. 5:48; 6:14, 26, 32; 15:13; 18:35; 23:9). The use of the Aramaic abba (Rom. 8:15; Gal. 4:6) shows the impact made by this teaching (cf. also Mk. 14:36). Hallowed be thy name is in the passive which was used to express reverence in Jewish prayers. It involves the revelation and acknowledgment of the holy character of God. 10 The coming of the kingdom means bringing into human life the eternal reign of God. It was 'at hand' when the ministry of Jesus began (4:17) and every significant event in His career was a further step in its coming until the final consummation. Thy will be done ... is peculiar to Matthew and seems explanatory of the previous phrase. It involves present ethical response but is in the context of God's eschatological activity. 11 This day: Luke has 'each day'. Daily (Gk. epiousion) is a very unusual word, with several possible derivations. The most likely meaning is 'for tomorrow'. The idea may be based on Ex. 16:22f. A prayer of this kind would be good reason for lack of anxiety about tomorrow (cf. v. 34). But it must almost certainly carry overtones of the Messianic feast, and the bread of the eucharist could be thought of as a token and pledge of that banquet. 12 Debts: Jews thought of sins (the word 'sins' occurs in Luke) as debts. 13 seems to mean 'Do not let us be put to the ultimate test' (cf. 24:22), with deliver us from evil (not in Luke) an explanation of that. Evil may mean the evil one. It is in the final trial that men are particularly tempted to apostasy (cf. 24:9–13).

14, 15 draw out the point about forgiveness and drive it home (cf. 18:23–35). Human forgiveness is not the basis of divine forgiveness, but it is evidence of a life lived on the principle of divine grace (cf. 5:44f.). 16 The same principle of secrecy and spiritual reward applies to fasting. There is no idea of its complete abrogation nor on the other hand of its formalization. How sadly the point was missed by a 2nd-century writer: 'Let not your fasts be with the hypocrites, for they fast on Mondays and Thursdays, but do you fast on Wednesdays and Fridays' (Didache 8:1).

6:19–34 Material possessions

This section is closely paralleled in Lk. 11:34–36; 12:22–34; 16:13. It takes on the thought from concern about reputation to concern about material provision and shows the need of right motives (vv. 19–24) and of faith (vv. 25–34).

19 Rust (Gk. brōsis) means 'eating' and could be rendered 'worm' with RSV mg. The Pharisees thought of wealth as a reward for keeping the law. 20 When the reward is spiritual this is not selfish. 21 is a searching truth. 22 Sound: Greek haplous probably means not 'single' but 'generous' (cf. the noun in Rom. 12:8; 2 Cor. 8:2; 9:11, 13). A wide-ranging outlook means a greater intake of light in the spiritual sphere. 23 Not sound: Greek ponēros means 'grudging' (cf. 20:15 RSV mg.). A restricted outlook has the opposite effect of a lesser intake of light. 24 Mammon means wealth in all its forms. The claims of Jesus reach to the bottom of a man's bank account.

25 Life (Gk. psychē, often rendered 'soul') and body are more important than food and clothing. The man himself is more important than his trappings. 26 God provides food for the lesser creation without their worrying; all the more will He do it for men. 27 Span of life is probably the meaning rather than stature (RSV mg.). 28–30 God provides clothing also for the lesser creation, and so all the more for men. 31 It is anxiety rather than proper stewardship and forethought which is condemned. 32 The Gentiles represent those who do not know a personal, loving, provident God (cf. vv. 7f.). 33 Material provision is not unimportant but the first motive must be the will of God (cf. vv. 10f.). 34 may be a combination of two proverbs. There may be an ironic touch about it. The saying occurs only in Matthew.

7:1–12 Attitudes to man and God

This section is largely paralleled in Lk. 6:31, 37–42; 11:9–13. It deals first with a right estimation of the character of others (vv. 1–6), then with a right estimation of the character of God (vv. 7–11), and ends with the golden rule (v. 12).

1 A censorious attitude towards others will bring a divine judgment (cf. 6:15). 2 Men can in a sense set their own standards for God to judge them by. 3 The contrast between the speck and the log is meant to be ridiculous. 4, 5 The need for helping others even in the correction of a fault is not denied (cf. Gal. 6:1f.). But self-examination and reformation will stop a man being a mere do-gooder, approaching from a position of assumed superiority. 6 is peculiar to Matthew. It suggests a right-minded discrimination in spiritual matters. Dogs and swine were descriptions of Gentiles and the meaning has probably been transferred to dealings with those outside the Christian community. The Didache (9:5) applied it to the eucharist. 7, 8 These are confident promises that God will answer the requests of His people, though not necessarily in just the way they ask (cf. 5:42). 9, 10 On the other hand, a useless or dangerous thing will not be given when something beneficial is requested. 11 Who are evil probably has the sense of 'for all your meanness' (cf. 6:23). Despite our grudging human nature, we provide for our children. A fortiori the gracious and omnipotent God will give His children good things. Cf. Lk. 11:13 where the reference is seen to be to the supreme 'good thing', the Holy Spirit. 12 The golden rule was found in Judaism, though it was expressed in the negative form. The positive form reaches much further. Here Jesus describes it as the summary of the OT.

7:13–29 The demands of the kingdom

This section is partly peculiar to Matthew but has parallels also in Lk. 6:43–49. There is the challenge of entry into the kingdom (vv. 13f.), the danger of false prophets (vv. 15–23) and the need for obedience to the words of Christ (vv. 24–27). The Sermon on the Mount is then rounded off with a reminder of the impact which the teaching of Jesus had on the crowds (vv. 28f.).

13, 14 This was probably uttered on a different occasion from the saying in Lk. 13:23f. The idea of the two ways is found also in, e.g., Je. 21:8; Ps. 1:6; Pr. 14:12. Some MSS omit the second mention of the gate but it should probably be retained. There are two gates and two roads.

The wide gate leads on to a 'broad' (rather than easy) way, and is therefore popular. The narrow gate leads on to a 'restricted' (rather than hard) way which only a minority choose. The decision between life or destruction is made in response to the gospel. 15 False prophets were always a danger (cf. 24:11, 24) and often smoothed over the issues of life and death (cf. Je. 6:13f.). 16 Deeds must be the test of words and the true indication of character. 17 For the metaphor of tree and fruit and its connection with judgment, cf. 3:10; 12:33–35; 15:13. 21 shows again that words are no substitute for deeds. 22, 23 On the judgment day even the claim to have used this name and to have exercised charismatic gifts will be useless. The decisive distinction then will be between those whom He recognizes as His, and those on whom He passes judgment as doers of lawlessness (Gk. anomia). The role of Christ in judgment is shown strikingly here by the way in which it is stated without arguing. 24–27 If words without action have just been condemned, now hearing without action is condemned also. The two ways of preservation and destruction are vividly portrayed. This combined exhortation and warning is a fitting conclusion to the Sermon on the Mount (cf. Lv. 26; Dt. 28). 28 This concluding formula is basically the same for all five discourses in Matthew (see Introduction). 29 The authority of Jesus came from His person and His fresh, unitary and penetrating treatment of the OT.

8:1 – 9:34 THE WORKS OF THE CHRIST

Having finished his first major collection of the teaching of Christ, Matthew now goes on to a collection of the deeds of Christ. Of the thirteen paragraphs in this part of the Gospel, ten are paralleled in Mark (i.e. all but 8:5–13, 18–22; 9:32–34, all of which are paralleled in Luke). This shows how close Matthew and Mark are in their record of the deeds of Jesus, as compared with Matthew's independent collection of the words of Jesus as shown in the Sermon. The incidents are found in various places in Mk. 1–10. There are nine mighty works divided into three groups of three with non-miraculous paragraphs in between. The healings of the leper, the centurion's servant and Peter's mother-in-law are followed by the scribe's promise to follow Jesus. The stilling of the storm, and the healings of the demoniacs and the paralytic are followed by the call of Matthew and the teaching on fasting. The raising of Jairus's daughter and the healings of the woman with a haemorrhage, the blind men and the dumb man finish with a warning of the Beelzebub controversy ahead. Problems have been raised by the inclusion of a second demoniac in 8:28 and a second blind man in 9:27 (cf. Mk. 5:2; 10:46). This may be because Matthew had more details, but it seems possible that he is collecting the deeds of Jesus (as he did His sayings) and telling them with an economy of words. He may therefore be indicating that Jesus did these healings more than once (possibly referring to Mk. 1:21–28; 8:22–26 which he does not include). This is less likely in the case of the blind men because two men are also healed in 20:29–34. There is possibly significance in the double witness (cf. Dt. 19:15).

8:1–17 Acts of healing

This section includes the first three miracles—the healing of the leper (vv. 1–4; Mk. 1:40–44; cf. Lk. 5:12–14), the centurion's servant (vv. 5–13; cf. Lk. 7:1–10) and Peter's mother-in-law (vv. 14f.; Mk. 1:29–31; cf. Lk. 4:38f.). It closes with a summary verse about general healings (v. 16; Mk. 1:32–34; cf. Lk. 4:40f.) and a quotation from Isaiah (v. 17).

1 is a link with the Sermon on the Mount but does not demand that all the healings happened in exact chronological order after all the teaching. 2 The healing of the leper may come first as indicating Jesus' attitude to the OT ceremonial law. 3 Matthew and Luke do not include Mark's 'moved with pity'. The miracles of healing are immediate in their results in response to the expression of personal need and faith. 4 Jesus observes this law, which was an important rule of public health and a reminder of the need of giving thanks to God (Lv. 14:2–32). The law was of course impotent to effect the cure. To the people, to show that Jesus was not against the law; or 'to them' (RSV mg.), literally, meaning the priests, as a witness of his cure.

5 Matthew and Luke agree in the dialogue of this story but each has given the setting in his own words. 8, 9 This was a remarkable statement of humility and faith in the power of Jesus to heal at a distance, reached through a comparison with the centurion's own position in the army. 10 It is a Gentile who first acknowledges the authority of Christ in this way. 11, 12 are paralleled by Lk. 13:28f. Sit at table: at the Messianic banquet. Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob are of course the Jewish patriarchs. The sons of the kingdom rely only on their natural descent, and so the whole concept of the phrase will have to be redefined.

16 Matthew emphasizes that they brought many and Jesus healed all (reversing the use of the words in Mark). 17 The 'formula quotation' is from Is. 53:4. Some of the Rabbis took this literally, though most spiritualized it. The NT as a whole refers the suffering Servant passages to the redemptive death of Christ. The Hebrew text is followed here and the point is made that the healings are not just works of mercy, but are part of the all-out attack of the Messiah on every kind of evil in God's world (cf. 12:29). He took our infirmities and bore our diseases, not in the sense of transferring them to Himself but of removing them. This was a foretaste of the new age when, by His dealing with sin, the physical ailments belonging to the fallen state of mankind would also be done away (cf. Rev. 21:4).

8:18–27 Faith put to the test

This section contains the scribe's promise to follow Jesus (vv. 19–22; cf. Lk. 9:57–60) and the stilling of the storm (vv. 18, 23–27; Mk. 4:36–41). The first is a challenge to the non-disciple to commit himself absolutely to following Jesus; the second a challenge to the disciples to trust absolutely in Jesus.

18 Jesus often avoided the crowds because they were liable to misunderstand His mission. 20 Jesus points out the insecurity of a life of wandering discipleship. It is not recorded whether or not the man faced up to the challenge. The Son of man is the term which Jesus undoubtedly used most frequently to describe Himself. It is based on Ps. 8 and Dn. 7 (which are both probably inspired by Gn. 1). Sometimes Jesus uses it to mean 'I' (e.g. 16:13), sometimes He refers the term to His suffering (e.g. 17:12) and sometimes to His glory (e.g. 16:27). The term was meant to stimulate faith. 21 The father may not yet have been dead and the son may have wished to wait until he could receive his inheritance. 22 The claims of the kingdom are absolute and immediate. Those who are spiritually alive will react to the situation quite differently from those who are spiritually dead (cf. 10:37f.). Again, we do not know the response of the man. 26 While there are a number of differences in detail from Mark, this verse shows Jesus exercising the power of the Creator (cf. Ps. 89:9; 107:23–32) and rebuking the lack of faith of the disciples. 27 They must not only follow Him as their teacher and leader but also trust in Him as someone different from ordinary men.

8:28 – 9:8 Further acts of healing

This section contains the healing of the demoniacs (8:28–34; cf. Mk. 5:1–20) and of the paralytic (9:1–8; cf. Mk. 2:1–12). Jesus is shown to be capable not only of physical healing but also of psychological and spiritual healing.

28 Gadarenes is probably the right reading in Matthew's account. The town of Gadara itself was about 6 miles from the lake and the term was probably used here because Gadara was the metropolis of the region. If 'Gergesenes' (RSV mg.) is correct, then the town in question may be the modern Khersa on the eastern shore of the lake. So fierce . . . Matthew summarizes where Mark gives much more detail. 29 O Son of God: the demons are shown to have recognized the supernatural power and person of Jesus long before most men did (cf. Mk. 3:11) because of His assault on the realm of Satan (12:22–29). Before the time: Jewish apocalyptic literature taught that the destruction of demons would take place at the last judgment. In Jesus the kingdom is breaking in now (cf. 12:28). 30 The reference to swine shows that it was an area with a mainly Gentile population. 31 Not enough is known about demon-possession for us to be sure what this verse means. It seems as if the demons wished to be reincarnated. 32 This provided the man with convincing proof that his affliction had been cured. It also showed that human life is of more value than that of animals. 34 Economic interests take precedence over spiritual (cf. Acts 19:23–27). They no more wished for the 'interference' of the Son of God in their affairs than did the demons (v. 29).

9:1 His own city is now Capernaum (cf. 4:13). 2 In this story spiritual healing precedes physical. Their faith may include that of the patient as well as of his friends. There is a great power in corporate faith (cf. 18:19). 3 Blaspheming because forgiveness was a divine prerogative (cf. Mk. 2:7). 4 Knowing need not imply a supernatural knowledge, but simply a keen spiritual discernment. 6 It was easier to speak of forgiveness because it could not be tested. Yet the actual provision of forgiveness required a greater authority even than of healing a paralysed man. As in the previous story something physical was a sign of a psychological cure, so here something physical is a sign of a spiritual cure. There is no suggestion that the man had suffered as a direct result of his sin (cf. Jn. 9:2f.). 8 They glorified God (cf. 5:16) in contrast to the Gadarenes' reaction (8:34). To men: Jesus was seen as a man, yet one who was able to exercise the authority of God as the true Son of man (v. 6; cf. Ps. 8:5f.).

9:9–17 The call of Matthew and questions about fasting

For the two stories here, cf. Mk. 2:13–22; Lk. 5:27–39. They follow the healing of the paralytic in Mark.

9 The name Matthew occurs in this connexion only in this Gospel. Mark and Luke have 'Levi'. While all have Matthew in the list of the apostles, only this Gospel describes him as a 'tax collector' (10:3). While it would be unusual for a man to have two Jewish names, it may be that Matthew was a 'Christian' name, probably meaning 'gift of the Lord'. If Matthew were the Evangelist, or were in some way closely connected with the Gospel, it would be natural to include his new name here. The change of name in itself is hardly likely to be the basis for the tradition that Matthew was the Evangelist.

10 It is noteworthy that Matthew included two of the three challenging sayings to would-be disciples which are in Luke (8:19–22; Lk. 9:57–62). He did not record the saying about going to bid farewell to the people at home, perhaps because this story showed that there was a right way of doing this. In the house is almost certainly Matthew's house. Tax collectors were normally Jewish and were employees of the publicani, who may have been Roman citizens. They were very unpopular because of the nature of their work and the way in which it easily led to corruption and extortion. Sinners included outcasts of every kind, from the morally degraded to those who did not keep the full ceremonial law. It was the tragedy of much Pharisaism that it could not distinguish between them. Jesus treated people as individuals. 12 The reply is a model of common sense as well as a heartening expression of divine grace. 13 The quotation is from Ho. 6:6, and occurs again in Mt. 12:7. Mercy (Heb. ḥesed) means 'covenant love', a mutual relationship between God and His people, defined in the second half of the verse in Hosea (not quoted) as 'the knowledge of God'. On the basis of this conception of religion the Pharisees can only be called the righteous ironically. (AV 'to repentance' is not part of the original text.)

14 The disciples of John may have been a considerable group of people (cf. Acts 19:1–7). Only Matthew records that they asked the question. 15 The bridegroom was a Messianic figure (cf. 22:2; 25:1). Taken away: probably by the ascension rather than the crucifixion. Fasting seems to have been practised on a regular basis by John's disciples as well as by the Pharisees. The apostolic church seems to have followed Jesus' habit of fasting for special occasions (cf. 4:2; 6:16–18; Acts 9:9; 13:2f.; 14:23). It was recognized as important but could lead to dangers of ostentation (Mt. 6:16) or self-righteousness, as here. 16, 17 There is a radical newness about Jesus' message which needs new forms of expression. Patching up Judaism will not do. New wine: cf. Jn. 2:1–11.

9:18–34 Further healings

There are three more healing stories here, that of the raising of the ruler's daughter (vv. 18–26; cf. Mk. 5:21–43; Lk. 8:40–56), within which is also included the cure of the woman with a haemorrhage, that of the two blind men (vv. 27–31) which is in a form peculiar to Matthew, and the dumb demoniac (vv. 32–34; cf. Lk. 11:14–16). Stories similar to the last two occur in Mt. 20:29–34; 12:22–24.

18 The ruler was an office-holder in the synagogue (cf. Mk. 5:22). Cf. and contrast Mk. 5:23; Lk. 8:41f. It would appear that Jairus meant that his daughter was already as good as dead, and that the actual occurrence of death was shortly confirmed. See Mk. 5:35; Lk. 8:49. 20 The woman seems to have suffered from continuous menstruation and would therefore be unclean (Lv. 15:25). This probably explains her coming up behind Jesus. The fringe was probably the tassel (Nu. 15:38). 21 There is a combination of superstition and faith. 22 Made you well: Greek sesōken is the usual word for 'saved' in the spiritual sense. Even if the physical cure took place by touching the garment (cf. Mk. 5:29), wholeness of the personality can only come through face-to-face confrontation with Jesus. 23 Flute players were hired with other mourners after a death had occurred. 24 Depart, because there was no need for people who were only putting on a show of mourning for money. Sleeping: it is usual to take this as metaphorical, but it may be literal if she was in a coma, but see the doctor's account in Lk. 8:53, 55. 25 Matthew gives only the action of Jesus and not His words. 26 Matthew alone emphasizes the way in which His reputation spread. 27 Son of David: the Messiah was expected to restore sight to the blind (Is. 35:5). 28 The house is probably His own house rather than Matthew's (9:10). Yes, Lord implies faith in the power and the person of Jesus, though the term 'Lord' would not here have its full Christian sense. Sternly charged, because it was important not to receive the wrong sort of publicity arousing wrong expectations. 31 It was hardly possible to keep such a happening quiet, human nature being what it is. 33 Again there is emphasis on the crowd's reaction. In Israel: even among the people of God with their sacred history. 34 This is a foretaste of controversy to come (cf. 12:24).

9:35 – 10:42 THE MISSION OF THE TWELVE

After a preliminary section which describes the motives of Jesus and His calling of His disciples for mission, the bulk of this part of the Gospel is the mission charge. It forms the second of the five discourses which make up the teaching material of the Gospel.

9:35 – 10:4 Jesus' compassion and call

These verses are found in a number of different places in the other Synoptic Gospels (cf. Mk. 3:14–19; 6:6b, 7; Lk. 9:1; 10:2; 13:22).

35 Teaching, preaching and healing are the three characteristics of the ministry of Jesus (cf. 4:23); 36 the motive is compassion for the people of Israel without a God-given leader (cf. Nu. 27:17–20; 1 Ki. 22:17). The aim of His mission was to help them to recognize Him as such. 37, 38 The metaphor of harvest was used more with evangelism and preaching than with teaching. This was a work where others had to be associated with Jesus.

10:1 This is the first mention of his twelve disciples. Though healing authority may have been recognized as having been given 'to men' (9:8), the Mediator of this divine authority is Jesus. Every disease and every infirmity: the scope of their ministry of healing is to be as wide as His (cf. 9:35). 2 Apostles: the term 'disciple' means a learner. Only after they had been this could they be 'apostles', men sent out from Jesus with His authority (Heb. šᵉlûḥîm). The term is mainly kept for the Twelve and Paul, but in some instances has a wider use. They are named here to show the connection of their calling with their sending out (v. 5). There are twelve as representing the twelve tribes of Israel (19:28; cf. the Qumran MS, 1 QS 8). Only Matthew gives them in pairs, perhaps for easy memorization. First denotes his leadership. Matthew has considerable interest in Peter (cf. 16:17–19). The tax collector: Matthew alone records this. If the Evangelist is the apostle it would be a recalling of his once having been an outcast. Thaddaeus: as in Mark. Luke has 'Judas . . . of James'. 4 Cananaean: as in Mark. Luke calls him 'the Zealot'. The word probably comes from Aramaic qan'ān ('zealot'). The Zealots were a militantly nationalist party. Iscariot has usually been taken to mean 'man of Kerioth' but may come from Aramaic 'išqaryā' ('the false'). Who betrayed him would then be seen to follow naturally from his name. He is presumably placed last because he was the traitor (probably the only Judean and bearing the very name of the royal tribe), but it may be that he was associated with Simon as a Zealot.

10:5–42 The mission charge

The material here again seems to have been collected by Matthew from a number of different places, and a number of things which were probably said by Jesus on other occasions are gathered for convenience of reference into this teaching on mission. For vv. 9–16, cf. Mk. 6:8–11; Lk. 9:1–5; 10:1–12. Vv. 17–25 have parallels in the eschatological chapters Mk. 13 and Lk. 21. Vv. 26–39 are similar to Lk. 12:2–9, 51–53; 14:26f.; 17:33. Vv. 5–8 and 40–42 are peculiar to Matthew.

5 The order of priority in evangelism in the apostolic age was 'to the Jew first and also to the Greek' (Rom. 1:16). This was even more so in the case of Jesus whose task was to call God's people to repentance and to the recognition of their own vocation through the Messiah to take the gospel to all men (28:18–20; cf. Acts 1:8). 6 The lost sheep are probably 'am hā'āreṣ (the people of the land), who were despised as ignorant. 7 The substance of their preaching was to be the same as that of John (3:2) and of Jesus (4:17). 8 Healing was part of the work of evangelism, and was associated here with preaching. The third of Jesus' activities, teaching, was hardly possible for them at this stage of their understanding. Raise the dead is not in some good MSS but is probably a correct reading. There is to be no restriction on the power of the apostles to do what their Master did (cf. Jn. 14:12). You received without pay, give without pay: they had received the gift of forgiveness and the power to heal from Jesus gratis. So they were to proclaim forgiveness and exercise the powers to heal gratis.

9, 10 They were to travel light, both because of their need for haste and also because of the obligation of the people to support them; for the labourer deserves his food. The fact that the gospel is free means that its proclamation is not on a business basis, but there is an obligation, inspired by gratitude, on local believers to extend hospitality to travelling evangelists (cf. 1 Cor. 9:14; 1 Tim. 5:18). Nor a staff: one is permitted in Mk. 6:8. Luke agrees with Matthew. It is possible that a 'Q' saying from another context is being used here. At any rate, they are to have the minimum of encumbrance. 11 Worthy: probably in the sense of responsive to the preaching and willing to offer hospitality. 12 Salute it: with some such greeting as 'Peace be to this house'. 13 The greeting would not be something merely conventional. Peace would be brought at a new level to those who responded. 14 Shake off the dust: as a sign of complete rejection of them in their turn. 15 Sodom and Gomorrah were types of spiritual wickedness and refusal to listen to God's messengers (Gn. 19:4–9; Ezk. 16:48–50; Mt. 11:23f.). The day of judgment presumably means the last day, but there may be at least some hint at the coming temporal judgment in the horrors of the Jewish War of AD 66–70.

16 The defencelessness of sheep in the midst of wolves means that their position must be supported by both wisdom (the subtlety of the serpent—cf. Gn. 3:1) and innocence (which would mean that as they were doing God's will they would have His protection). 17 Men: it seems that they were warned against the reaction of the human race as a whole. Councils were local sanhedrins. The flogging would be the traditional thirty-nine lashes (2 Cor. 11:24). 18 The scope of the mission was to extend beyond Judaism. Their testimony to the truth of the gospel would often have to be given as prisoners (cf. Acts 23:11; 25:11). 19 Do not be anxious: cf. 6:25–34. It is God's provision which should allay anxiety, whether concerning material things or words. 21 The gospel will divide families (cf. vv. 34–36). 22 The universal hatred experienced by those who brought a message of love to the world was particularly hard to bear, as was the charge that they themselves hated the human race. For my name's sake: i.e. because you belong to Me and bear the name of Christian (cf. 1 Pet. 4:14). To the end probably means to the end of his life, through persecution, rather than to the end of time (cf. 24:9, 13).

23 is a very difficult verse. Schweitzer based much of his 'thoroughgoing eschatology' on it, saying that Jesus expected the end at this time. Clearly Matthew did not think of it in this way. A possible solution is that they would not have completed the rounds of the towns of Israel before the Son of man came in judgment through the Romans in the Jewish War (cf. Cyrus the Persian king as God's shepherd and anointed in Is. 44:28; 45:1). 24, 25 explain the reason for the hatred which the apostles would receive (cf. Jn. 15:18–21). Beelzebul: see 12:22–32.

26 Have no fear of them probably refers to what follows, the need to preach openly, rather than to what precedes, slander of the apostles. 27 In some ways the apostles were to have more of a public ministry than did Jesus Himself. 28 Him who can destroy both soul and body in hell must refer to God, rather than to Satan. The soul in biblical thought is not immortal, except when new life is conferred upon it through Christ (1 Tim. 6:16; 2 Tim. 1:10). Hell is therefore the place of its destruction as Gehenna, the valley of Hinnom, was of the rubbish of Jerusalem. 29 God who is the terrible Judge of all is also the loving Father of those who trust Him (cf. 6:26). 30 is a vivid picture of the detailed loving care of the Father. 31 For the a fortiori argument, cf. 6:30. 32 Mark and Luke in parallel sayings both refer to the Son of man.

Matthew shows that Jesus meant to refer to Himself when using the expression in this context. Open confession is an essential mark of discipleship (cf. Rom. 10:9–11). My Father is parallel to 'your Father' (v. 29), but there is always a distinction in the relationship. 'Our Father' (6:9) is for the disciples, not for Jesus too.

34 Jesus came as the Prince of peace, and peace on earth was His ultimate goal (cf. Lk. 2:14). But because of the variety of human response to the gospel, the immediate result was a sword, which Luke rightly interprets as 'division'. 35, 36 are based on Mi. 7:5f. which depicts the breakdown of trust in human relationships and contrasts it with the faithfulness of God. The object of the coming of Elijah was reconciliation in families (Mal. 4:6), but in the short term the reverse is often the case. 37, 38 are similar to Lk. 14:25–27, where the comparative is made absolute by the use of the word 'hate'. Worthy of me: to belong to Me and to be called My disciple. Take his cross: in sacrificing his whole personality. 39 His life (Gk. psychē) is his soul or real self. Only the man who is in a right relationship to God in Christ has become what he was created to be. Vv. 38, 39 are repeated in 16:24f.

40 shows the solemnity of their commission as apostles or agents (šᵉlûḥîm) of Jesus, for 'a man's šāliaḥ ('agent') is as the man himself' (Berakoth 5:5). 41 Receives a prophet: cf. 1 Ki. 17:9–24; 2 Ki. 4:8–37. Righteous man: presumably one whose witness is primarily by his life. For prophets and righteous men see 13:17. 42 Little ones probably refers to the humble believers. The smallest act of kindness is truly significant (cf. 25:40).

11:1 – 12:50 THE CLAIMS OF THE CHRIST

After the mission charge, which was teaching contained within a narrative, Matthew gives us two chapters of narrative which contain a good deal of teaching. The stories collected here are designed to show the nature of the Messiahship of Jesus and the fact of the unbelief of Israel. The kingdom has been announced to Israel by John the Baptist (ch. 3), by the words (chs. 5–7) and deeds (chs. 8, 9) of Jesus and the apostles (ch. 10). Israel is shown here, in the person of the Pharisees, to reject the Messiah and so the first step is taken towards the presentation of the gospel to the Gentiles (12:18–21).

11:1–19 Jesus and John

After a linking verse, Matthew gives the story of the visit of John's disciples to Jesus and His teaching the crowds about John. This section is closely parallel to Lk. 7:18–35, apart from vv. 12, 13 which are similar to Lk. 16:16.

1 This verse is more clearly connected with the preceding than with the following section (cf. 7:28f.). 2 John was arrested by Herod Antipas (4:12) and kept, according to Josephus, at Machaerus, a fortress on the east side of the Dead Sea. He was later executed on Herod's orders (14:1–12). The deeds of the Christ are the Evangelist's way of putting it. John had doubts about their significance. 3 He who is to come was probably a general Messianic term. John himself had spoken of the coming one (3:11). There is no doubt in his mind about the fact of the Messiah's coming, only about the identity of the Messiah. Perhaps John expected Him to begin to put the judgment into effect already (cf. 3:12) and also to release him from prison. 4 Luke records healings done 'in that hour'. But the words and works of Jesus as a whole are the evidence. 5 These are Messianic works as foretold in Is. 29:18f.; 35:5f.; 61:1. They are a reminder to John, the accent of whose ministry was on judgment, that basically the ministry of the Messiah is one of mercy. 6 Offence might be taken because Jesus did not conform to people's ideas of what the Messiah should be (cf. 13:21, 57; 15:12).

7, 8 John was neither one who bowed to popular opinion nor one who sought an easy life. 9, 10 He was a prophet, a man who by his words of judgment and life of asceticism in the wilderness stood out against the easy-going society of his day. But he was more than a prophet because he had to identify the Messiah of whom the other prophets had simply spoken in general terms. He was the messenger and forerunner of whom Malachi had spoken (Mal. 3:1; cf. Ex. 23:20). 11 No one greater: because of his divinely-appointed role. Yet he belongs to the old covenant and therefore even he who is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he, in the sense of having a more privileged position (cf. 13:16f.). 12 is one of the most difficult verses in the Gospel. Lk. 16:16 is similar but not identical in wording and the order is different, and so may have been spoken on another occasion. Has suffered violence represents the Greek biazetai. This may be passive, as in RSV. It would mean that Zealots and others had been trying to take hold of the kingdom (cf. Jn. 6:15f.), or that it was being violently stormed by people eager to enter it, though despite the marvelling of the crowds we are not given the impression that many had responded to the claims of the kingdom at a deep level. But biazetai may be in the middle voice, as in RSV mg. It would then mean 'has been coming violently'. The radical claims of the kingdom had a disruptive effect on Jewish life. It is probable that the passive rendering should be adopted. 14, 15 are peculiar to Matthew. John was not Elijah reincarnate (cf. Jn. 1:21) but he fulfilled the role of Elijah prophesied by Malachi.

16 This generation were the privileged witnesses of the redemptive acts of the new covenant, as had been the generation of the Exodus in the old covenant (Dt. 1:35; 32:5, 20; Ps. 95:10; Mt. 12:39, 41f., 45; 16:4; 17:17; 23:36; 24:34; Acts 2:40; Heb. 3:10). They are therefore in a particularly responsible position in their reaction to the gospel. 17 They were sulky and unwilling to 'play weddings' with Jesus or 'funerals' with John. 18, 19 For the issue of fasting, cf. 9:14–17. For Jesus' association with sinners, cf. 9:10–13. Yet wisdom is justified by her deeds: Luke has 'children' for 'deeds' and that may be the more literal rendering. Justified seems to mean 'proved right', though this may be only in the long term. 'Deeds' or 'children' would mean the actions taken by John and Jesus respectively, which gave the proof to their words. There is almost a personification of wisdom here (cf. Lk. 11:49). (For further teaching about John see Mt. 3:1–17; 14:1–12; 21:23–32.)

11:20–30 The refusal and offer of the gospel

This section consists of an oracle of judgment against the towns which had rejected the good news of the kingdom (vv. 20–24; cf. Lk. 10:13–15), a prayer of thanks to God for His revelation of the truth (vv. 25–27; cf. Lk. 10:21f.), and a statement of what Christ offers to those who respond to Him (vv. 28–30), found only in Matthew.

20 Most of his mighty works are said to have been performed in a small area at the north end of the Sea of Galilee. 21 Woe means 'Alas'. Chorazin was about 3 miles north of Capernaum, and Bethsaida a little farther away from Capernaum to the west. Tyre and Sidon were Phoenician cities treated in the OT as pictures of wickedness and spiritual pride (Is. 23; Ezk. 26–28). 22 Day of judgment may have a temporal as well as an eternal significance (cf. 10:15). 23 is based on Is. 14:12–15, which refers to Babylon under the figure of Lucifer (but see also the similar reference to Tyre in Ezk. 28:2–8). The attitude and the fate of Jesus' own city (9:1) will be worse than that of the oppressor of God's people, the 'foreign land' in which it was so hard to sing the Lord's song (Ps. 137:4). Sodom was another city which was a by-word for wickedness and the rejection of God's messengers (Gn. 19:1–29; Mt. 10:15).

25–27 The style of this saying is very similar to that of John's Gospel (cf. Jn. 3:35; 17:2). It has been called 'an erratic block of Johannine rock'. While many scholars are inclined to make it secondary and late because of its similarity to John, it could be equally well argued that this provides important evidence that Jesus could have taught in the style used in John. There are many Semitic turns of phrase and it looks to have been a rhythmical oracle in Aramaic. The terms 'Father' and 'Son' are used absolutely also in 24:36, denoting a unique relationship between God and Jesus. The Father has complete authority in heaven and earth and He delegates that to the Son (cf. 28:18). He has, therefore, complete power of revelation and has chosen to hide these things (the meaning of Christ's words and deeds) from the wise and understanding (or those who are such by human standards) and to reveal them to babes (those who are spiritually dependent enough to be able to receive them; cf. 18:3). The whole sum of divine truth is transmitted from Father to Son (cf. Jn. 5:20). The central part which comes only by the gift of God is the knowledge of the Father and the Son, something which goes beyond facts to a personal relationship (cf. Jn. 17:3). The sovereignty of the Father and the Son is shown by the words gracious will and chooses. For the revelation of the Son by the Father see 16:16f. 28–30 have affinities with the invitation of Wisdom in Ecclus. 51:23–25. Come to me is similar to Is. 55:1–3. All: the sovereign invitation is not a restricted one. The rest promised is not mere idleness but means a new yoke for service. The yoke of the law, as the Rabbis called it (cf. Pirqe Aboth 3:5), was something that proved heavy and burdensome because of its impersonal and external nature (cf. 23:4). The acceptance of the yoke of Christ (His hālāḵâ or moral instruction) was different because of His character. Like the suffering Servant He was gentle and lowly in heart (cf. Is. 42:2f.; 53:6f.). In a paradoxical sense, despite the absoluteness of His claims, His was the easy way (cf. 6:13f.). Such is the wonder of the divine offer.

12:1–14 Controversy about the sabbath

For this section, cf. Mk. 2:28 – 3:6; Lk. 6:1–11. The regulations about the sabbath were one place where the yoke of the law as interpreted by the Pharisees was particularly burdensome. The two stories show different examples of meeting human need through preparing food and healing.

1, 2 It was permissible to pluck ears of grain in another man's cornfield normally (Dt. 23:25) but the Rabbis had made restrictions on the practice on the sabbath (Mishnah Shabbath 7). 3, 4 The account of David's eating the bread of the Presence is in 1 Sa. 21:1–6. He broke a minor law in order to meet a human need. 5 The priests had to offer some sacrifices on the sabbath (Nu. 28:9f.). The Rabbis allowed this to overrule the sabbath law. 6 Something greater is the kingdom of God in the person of Jesus. The argument is a fortiori. If David and the priests can break sabbath technicalities to meet human need, how much more can the bringer of the kingdom? 7 Ho. 6:6, which is quoted here, contains an important prophetic principle. It is also quoted in 9:13. Guiltless: as the Rabbis held the priests to be (v. 5). 8 Matthew and Luke omit Mark's phrase 'the sabbath was made for man . . .'. The Son of man here means the ideal man, Jesus. If David was able to do what he did without condemnation, how much more was the Messiah able to decide the real meaning of the sabbath law? 10 Jesus obviously had a reputation for fresh interpretation of the law, and it seems that there was almost a plot here to see how far He would go. It was held to be lawful to heal on the sabbath where a man's life was in danger, but this sort of healing could have waited without undue harm. 11, 12 Only Matthew records this argument, but cf. Lk. 13:15. The Pharisees permitted the rescue of an animal, but at Qumran the rule was 'If (a man's beast) should fall into a cistern or pit, he shall not lift it out on the sabbath' (CD 11). By the a fortiori argument based on the superiority of man to the animals (cf. 10:31), Jesus justifies His action. Though there is no emergency, it is an opportunity to do good on the sabbath. 14 Mark tells us that the Pharisees took counsel with the Herodians. The leading representatives of these two very different parties were united in their desire to destroy the life of the Giver of healing and life.

12:15–37 Further healings and controversy

In this section, vv. 15, 16 are very much shorter than the parallel passage in Mk. 3:7–12 (cf. Lk. 6:17–19). Vv. 17–21 are a 'formula quotation' peculiar to Matthew. For vv. 22–32, cf. Mk. 3:22–30; Lk. 11:17–23; 12:10. For vv. 33–37, cf. 7:16–20; Lk. 6:43–45. The plot made by the Pharisees leads on to further healings by Jesus and a justification of His approach from the OT. The allegation that Jesus' healings are inspired by the devil leads to a head-on clash and a stern warning about the relationship of words and character.

15 Jesus' knowledge of the plot made Him move on. Again He is followed by a large crowd and again His healing is universal (cf. 8:16). Again He seeks not to have unnecessary publicity (cf. 8:4; 9:30). 18–21 quotes Is. 42:1–4 (mainly following the Hebrew text), which is probably alluded to both at the baptism (3:17) and the transfiguration (17:5) of Jesus. A longer passage is quoted here in order to bring out His gentle ministry to the outcast and its further extension to the Gentiles. My servant has been identified with Israel as a whole, with the faithful remnant and with the Messiah. It is probable that all three references overlapped in the prophet's mind. In any event, Matthew sees Jesus as the embodiment of the true Israel (2:15). He will not wrangle or cry aloud explains that Jesus did not seek controversy, though He sometimes had to engage in it, and that He did not wish to publish His Messiahship in the wrong way. Brings justice to victory: the vindication of the ways of God is something seen to be of great importance. This vindication occurs partly through the mission to the outcast and ultimately to the Gentiles.

22 Luke gives the occasion of the following controversy, but Matthew alone says that the dumb man was also blind. 23 Matthew alone states that the crowds were wondering if Jesus was Son of David (cf. 9:27). 24 It is always possible to find a perverse explanation for any good thing. Beelzebul probably comes from baʿal zebûl, 'Lord of the house' or 'exalted Lord'. In 2 Ki. 1:2 the god of Ekron is called 'Baal-zebub' or 'Lord of flies', presumably as a Hebrew estimate of his worth. But the ending in '1' may also be derogatory in Hebrew usage if it were derived from zebel 'dung'. He was not regarded by the Jews as a god but as the prince of demons. 25, 26 Jesus makes a reductio ad absurdum of their argument.

27 Another powerful refutation of the charge is provided by the fact that the sons (presumably disciples) of the Pharisees also practised exorcism, though perhaps with notably less success than Jesus (cf. Acts 19:13–16). 28 The Spirit of God seems to be an interpretative rendering while Luke has preserved the saying more literally as 'the finger of God'. This would refer to the miracles performed before the great act of redemption in the OT (Ex. 8:19). The miracles of Jesus are a prelude to the great act of redemption of the new covenant. Has come upon you: the Greek (ephthasen) almost means 'has come by anticipation'. It has just arrived, but not yet in its fullness. The cross and resurrection are essential for its power to be revealed. 29 The ministry of Jesus is a process of binding Satan and stopping his activity, preparatory to entering his realm of death and freeing his captives (Heb. 2:14f.). 30 The conflict with Satan demands wholehearted dedication to the cause of Christ. It is perhaps significant that He speaks of those with me (the loyalty being to Himself), while in the converse statement (Mk. 9:40; Lk. 9:50) it is us or you (the loyalty being to the disciples).

31 The blasphemy against the Spirit seems to be the deliberate labelling of good as evil (cf. Mk. 3:30). That will not be forgiven because those who persist in it are putting themselves in a position where they cannot receive forgiveness (cf. Jn. 3:19f.). 32 The Son of man may be misunderstood as a human being and people may fail to see His divine character, but that is different from the deliberate quenching of conscience. 33 The nature of the tree determines its fruit. The Pharisees thought that by making the fruit good the tree would be made good. Jesus shows the essential priority. 34 Evil sayings were the inevitable result of evil character. The Pharisees are also described as vipers in 3:7; 23:33. 36, 37 It is often the careless word which reveals the true character of a man. The careless words of the Pharisees about Jesus had shown them up and would in the end be evidence on which they would be justified or condemned. (For judgment based also on apparently trivial deeds, cf. 25:31–46.)

12:38–50 Challenges to commitment

In this section, with vv. 38–42 cf. Lk. 11:16, 29–32; with vv. 43–45 cf. Lk. 11:24–26; with vv. 46–50 cf. Mk. 3:31–35; Lk. 8:19–21. The inevitably divisive nature of the ministry, leading to controversy with Jewish religious leaders and the foreshadowing of the Gentile mission, is further illustrated in three calls to repentance and discipleship.

38, 39 A sign would have been something spectacular, which Jesus would not do for them (cf. 4:5–7; Jn. 4:48; 1 Cor. 1:22). They had already seen a number of miracles (called 'signs' in John's Gospel), but the appetite for the spectacular is insatiable and was hardly likely to lead to faith (cf. Lk. 16:30f.). They were adulterous in turning away from God to this sort of religion. The sign of the prophet Jonah was primarily his preaching which led men to repentance (Jon. 3:2–5), though in some way he provided a sign in his own person, having escaped from 'the belly of Sheol' (Jon. 2:2; cf. 1 Pet. 3:18–20). 40 This brings out the full meaning of the Jonah story. Only the more general statement has been retained in Luke. The whale was a 'great fish' (Jon. 1:17). Three days and three nights seems to be a Semitic idiom and need not be supposed to contradict the resurrection on the third day (16:21). 41 Something greater is the kingdom of God, as present in the person of the Messiah. The men of Nineveh were Gentiles and oppressors of the people of God. 42 The queen of the South made the long journey from Sheba in Arabia because of her desire to know the truth (1 Ki. 10:1–10). The men of this generation did not respond to a far greater spiritual revelation which was occurring in their very midst.

43–45 The context suggests that this refers to Judaism as a whole, though the truth applies also to individuals. There was a certain movement for reformation highlighted by the ministry of John. Then there was the exorcizing work of Jesus. But repentance without possession by the Spirit of God meant the danger of relapse into a much worse spiritual state than previously. The waterless places of the desert were thought of as the abode of demons. 46 His brothers were presumably younger children of Joseph and Mary. It is usually thought that Joseph was dead by this time. RSV rightly omits v. 47 on MS evidence. 50 The relationship that counts is not physical, but moral and spiritual. It is to belong with Him to the family of the one Father in heaven and to do His will (cf. 5:43–48; 6:9f.; Lk. 11:28).

13:1–52 THE PARABLES OF THE KINGDOM

The stories in the previous section have brought into focus the crisis of faith and unbelief. Now there is a collection of seven parables of the kingdom which explain different aspects of this crisis. The parable of the sower and its explanation, together with the reason for teaching in parables (vv. 1–23), agrees with Mark (cf. Mk. 4:1–20; Lk. 8:4–15; but for vv. 16f., cf. Lk. 10:23f.). The parable of the weeds (vv. 24–30) and its explanation (vv. 36–43) is peculiar to Matthew. The mustard seed (vv. 31f.) is found also in Mark (cf. Mk. 4:30–32; Lk. 13:18f.), the leaven (v. 33) is found also in Luke (Lk. 13:20f.) and the habit of using parables occurs in Mark, and is expanded by a quotation (vv. 34f.; cf. Mk. 4:33f.). The treasure (v. 44), the pearl (vv. 45f.) and the net (vv. 47–50) with the concluding verses (vv. 51f.) are all peculiar to Matthew.

In this, the third great discourse, Matthew makes it plain that there was a distinction between the teaching which Jesus gave publicly and privately. A parable was a story to illustrate a spiritual or moral truth. It was different from an allegory where every detail had to be decoded. There was usually one main thrust to a parable, though there were often subsidiary points and it is absurd to deny that Jesus may have used the occasional allegorical touch. But the main point of a parable was to bring men into a judgment on a situation often by ridicule (7:3–5) or by indignation (cf. 2 Sa. 12:1–7a; Mt. 21:33–41). The parables in this chapter are concerned with the response which must be made to the coming of the reign of God among men in the person of Jesus. Because of an over-emphasis on the difference of a parable from an allegory, there has been a widespread tendency amongst recent scholars to dismiss the explanations of the parables of the sower and of the weeds as unauthentic and to suggest that the early church missed the real point. This only adds to the problem because it assumes that even the closest disciples did not understand the parables. We can agree that the main emphasis is on the coming and the triumph of the kingdom, without holding that references to the different kinds of response are necessarily to be excised.

1–9 Comment on these verses will be found under vv. 18–23, where the explanation of the parable is given. 10–15 The sheer difficulty of these verses is proof enough of their authenticity, although v. 12 may originally have been in another context (cf. Mk. 4:25). Given: the sovereignty of God in revelation must be maintained (cf. 11:27). The corollary of not been given is brought out only in Matthew. Because seeing they do not see: Mark and Luke have 'so that', and it may be that both are possible translations of the underlying Aramaic. The sense in the context is no different. It seems that parables are in a sense to prevent revelation. Matthew alone quotes Is. 6:9f. (LXX) to back this up (but cf. Jn. 12:39–41; Acts 28:26f.). It is not to be assumed that the parables stopped people from believing who otherwise would have done, but probably that they served to harden dispositions already formed (cf. Jn. 9:39; 3:17–19). The suggestion that it means they see the parables though they do not see the truth, and that therefore the parables are a pictorial method of evangelism, does not seem to meet all the points in the context, which clearly shows the great moral problems of unbelief and judgment. 16, 17 are a reminder of the privileged position of the disciples over against the saints of the old covenant (cf. Heb. 11:39f.). Luke has 'kings' for righteous men. 18–23 describe the different sorts of people who come in contact with the gospel: the casual, the shallow, the worldly and the responsive. The seed is the same; the soils are different. The point is made that there will be antagonism from the evil one (cf. 6:13), and from the world both in tribulation and persecution (cf. 24:9–13) and in its cares and pleasures (cf. 19:23f.). The sower, whether it be Jesus in the first instance or a disciple later, can be assured that, although much of his seed is wasted, there will be an abundant harvest.

24 The kingdom of heaven may be compared to a man: there is not meant to be an exact comparison of the kingdom and the man, but a comparable situation. There are some parallels to the parable of the seed growing secretly (Mk. 4:26–29), but enough differences to make it more likely that they are separate parables. (For further comment on vv. 24–30, see on vv. 36–43 where the explanation of the parable is given.) 31, 32 The point is that from small beginnings there are eventually enormous results. The mustard plant can grow to 10 ft or more. The birds of the air are generally taken to be the Gentile nations (cf. Dn. 4:20–22). The extent of the spread of the gospel could hardly have been imagined by Jesus' contemporaries. 33 The influence of the kingdom is intensive as well as extensive. It affects the whole society with which it comes in contact. Leaven normally has a bad meaning in the NT but this seems unlikely here.

34, 35 The use of parables is again defended on the basis of fulfilment of prophecy. While some MSS read 'Isaiah' instead of prophet, this is unlikely. Matthew may have had in mind that Asaph, to whom Ps. 78 is ascribed, was described as a prophet (1 Ch. 25:2), but in any event the psalmists speak prophetically. The writer was revealing the inside story of God's dealings with His people in redemption and judgment under the old covenant. The quotation is based on the Hebrew text. 36–43 The weeds refers to darnel which looked very like wheat. So will it be at the close of the age: the parable is a warning against an attempt to make a premature harvest (vv. 28–30; cf. 1 Cor. 4:5). There is bound to be a 'mixed' community, caused by the actions of the Son of man sowing good seed and the devil sowing weeds, but in the end the truth will be revealed and men will be divided into two classes, the evildoers and the righteous. This will be a final division made by the Son of man with His angels (cf. 24:30f.; 25:31–46), leading to anguish on being rejected (cf. 8:12; 22:13; 25:30) or the radiance of being accepted (cf. Dn. 12:3).

44–46 While it has been suggested that these two parables refer to Jesus' giving all for mankind, this seems unlikely. Rather does it stress the infinite worth of the kingdom for which any sacrifice is not too great (cf. 16:24–27). If there is any distinction in meaning between the two it may be that the first shows how a man can stumble upon the kingdom without really seeking it, while another may be searching through all sorts of substitutes before his quest succeeds. 47–50 The parable of the net has a similar meaning to that of the weeds. There will be a great harvest of the sea (cf. Jn. 21:11) but it will be a mixed catch to be sorted out at the close of the age. 51, 52 show the importance of understanding on the part of the disciples. Those who have understood are like scribes (knowing the law) who have been trained for the kingdom of heaven (instructed in the gospel). This is often thought to have been the evangelist's self-portrait, as he brings out of his treasure what is new and what is old.

13:53 – 17:27 THE REJECTION OF THE CHRIST

After the collection of parables which explain the issues of faith and unbelief, Matthew follows the narrative of Mark showing the build-up of conflict with the Jewish leaders which is to lead to the rejection and death of Jesus. The order of Mark is followed throughout and the only additions are 14:28–31, Peter walking on the water; 15:12–14, a comment about the Pharisees; 16:17–19, the promise to Peter; and 17:24–27, the Temple tax. It will be noted that in three of these passages Peter plays a prominent part. This part of the Gospel on the one hand shows the build-up through the miracles and the confession of Jesus as the Christ to the high point of the transfiguration, and on the other shows His rejection at home, the rejection of John, the disputes with the Pharisees, the faithlessness of the disciples and the predictions of His suffering and death.

13:53 – 14:12 The rejection of Jesus and the execution of John

For this section cf. Mk. 6:1–6a, 14–29; Lk. 9:7–9. Matthew is close to Mark in the story of the rejection of Jesus but gives a briefer account of the execution of John. Luke does not include the story of the rejection, for he has already told a similar story at the beginning of the ministry (Lk. 4:16–30) and he alludes only in passing to the execution (Lk. 9:7–9).

53 is a linking verse following a discourse (cf. 11:1). 54 His own country seems to be Nazareth, where He had been brought up (2:23). Any Jewish man might be invited to teach in their synagogue. The wisdom was presumably that of His teaching, but it is not clear whether He performed mighty works there. 55 The carpenter's son: Mark has 'the carpenter'. The Greek (tektōn) could mean a mason. The mention of names other than Joseph's suggests that he was dead (cf. 12:46). 56 Where then did this man get all this? The fact of His local and humble origin made it impossible in their eyes to account for what Jesus was doing. 57 They took offence at him, therefore, and looked for some explanation which would not involve commitment to Him. A prophet: though the saying may have been proverbial, Jesus did at least claim for Himself this title. His own house: for the unbelief of His brothers, cf. Jn. 7:5. 58 Mark records more bluntly that 'he could do no mighty work there', but qualifies this with reference to the healing of a few sick people.

14:1 Even if His own people would not believe, the fame of Jesus reached as far as Herod the tetrarch. This was Herod Antipas, son of Herod the Great, who had succeeded to part of his father's realm, the provinces of Galilee and Perea. 2 suggests that the ministries of Jesus and John did not overlap (cf. 4:12), for if Herod had heard of their both working simultaneously, he could not have formed this view. Luke says that others held what seems to have been a superstitious belief in John's resurrection. These powers seem to refer to the miracles of Jesus. John did not perform signs (Jn. 10:41). Herod's guilty conscience could have confused him concerning two men of God. 3 Josephus says that John was arrested because he was suspected of possible revolutionary activity (Antiquities xviii.5.2). That may well have been the pretext while the greater reason was more personal. Philip was not the same as Philip the tetrarch (Lk. 3:1). 4 For the law see Lv. 18:16; 20:21. This would be regarded as incest. 5 He wanted to put him to death: Mark makes the point that it was Herodias who wanted to put him to death, while Herod heard him gladly. The mixture of motives is not uncommon in such a guilt-ridden situation. The chief priests and elders were similarly afraid because of John's reputation (21:26). 6 The party would normally be an all-male affair. It may be assumed that the dance was of a suggestive nature. The only known daughter of Herodias was Salome, who later married her uncle, Philip the tetrarch. 7 Such a rash oath was probably made in a state of inebriation. 8 Herodias was clearly waiting for such an opportunity. 10 Josephus says that John was imprisoned at Machaerus east of the Dead Sea, and presumably the prison was part of the castle there. 12 A courageous action by John's disciples. Only Matthew records that they went and told Jesus. For many of them He would now be their leader, though groups of John's disciples remained (cf. Acts 18:24 – 19:7).

14:13–36 The feeding of the five thousand and the walking on the water

For this section, cf. Mk. 6:31–56; Lk. 9:10b–17 (Luke has only the feeding). These miracles are recorded also in Jn. 6:1–21, and this provides the most substantial convergence of the Synoptic and Johannine traditions before the passion narrative. This suggests that they may be of special importance.

13 This takes up the story from v. 2. Vv. 3–12 have been an explanation of why Herod was so worried. Jesus was not ready for a confrontation with Herod at this stage. (Luke suggests that Herod had been given his last chance of responding to the truth. See Lk. 13:31–33; 23:6–12.) But He could not get away from the crowds. 14 Mark explains the reason for His compassion as being that 'they were like sheep without a shepherd'.

15–18 indicates how difficult it was to arouse faith in the disciples, but at least they did what they were told. The five loaves were probably of barley, the normal food of poor people. The fish may have been smoked or pickled and would be a delicacy. 19 The threefold action of taking, blessing and breaking would be the normal action at a Jewish meal; it also shows a connection with the last supper (cf. 26:26). Blessed: 'gave thanks to God'.

20 The provision of enough and to spare is important (cf. 2 Ki. 4:42–44). This was a miracle performed out of concern for the needs of the hungry, but essentially as a sign of Jesus' exercising the power of the Creator who is always multiplying bread and fish. Here the action is localized and speeded up. It also points forward to the Messianic banquet at the end of the age. John, in the discourse which follows, records the parallels with the feeding of the people of Israel with manna in the desert. Mark's reference to the greenness of the grass, and the companies in which they were made to sit down and his emphasis on the men, have been taken to suggest that this was an attempted Messianic uprising, as the Messiah was expected to appear at Passover time. John's account lends strong support to this suggestion, but there is little hint of this aspect in Matthew's account. 21 Besides: Greek chōris could mean 'without', but it is more naturally taken as it is here.

22, 23 Cf. v. 13. It was a constant struggle for Jesus to find privacy with the opportunity for prayer. The other side: it is not quite certain what part of the lake they were crossing. 25 The fourth watch was between 3 and 6 a.m. Walking on the sea: it is possible for the expression to mean 'on the sea shore', but this is unlikely in the context. It seems as if His power over the natural order was being vividly demonstrated to the disciples. 27 It is I: Greek egō eimi can mean 'I am' (cf. Ex. 3:14) or 'I am He' (cf. Is. 41:4). It seems to be frequently used in John as a claim to divinity, but this is not the primary sense here.

28 This is typical of the impetuous Peter. 30, 31 As on other occasions, Peter had forgotten the difficulties and had committed himself beyond what he was able to achieve (cf. 26:33–35). While some have seen these verses as an allegory of Peter's life, there is no reason to think that the Evangelist did not intend it to be taken as fact. 32 Cf. 8:26. 33 You are the Son of God does not occur in Mark. It seems to be a groping after a title for One who can do such wonders (cf. 8:27) and does not imply commitment in the same way as Peter's confession at Caesarea Philippi (16:16). Gennesaret was just south-west of Capernaum. 36 Touch the fringe of his garment: this was probably the tassel (cf. 9:20). Presumably this was not mere superstition but a symbolic act accompanying an encounter with Him.

15:1–20 The tradition of the elders

This section is paralleled in Mk. 7:1–23, but includes in addition vv. 12–14, paralleled in Lk. 6:39. It is an important development in the growing conflict with the Pharisees over the nature of true religion.

1 From Jerusalem: the Galilaean ministry seems to have caused a stir even in the capital. Perhaps Jesus was being consulted as leader of a rabbinic school who might have a special teaching on the points at issue. 2 The tradition of the elder was the oral tradition handed down by the great Rabbis and regarded as a supplement to, and often as an interpreter of, Scripture. Much of it was codified and written down in the Mishnah at a later date. It was treated as of equal authority with the law.

Wash their hands: the law laid down for the priests that they should make themselves clean from defilement (Lv. 22:1–16), and it may have been in an attempt to assert the priesthood of all that the Pharisees had adopted this rule about washing. 3 This question of Jesus struck at the very heart of Pharisaism and showed its inner self-contradiction. 4 The quotations are from Ex. 20:12; 21:17.

5 Matthew omits the technical word 'Corban' which occurs in Mark, as he does also the explanation of Jewish customs. Something could be dedicated to the Temple and the owner could still enjoy the proceeds of it, rather than having any obligation towards his parents. By the end of the 1st century the Rabbis accepted Jesus' position on the conflict of vows with obligations under the law. 6 Made void: cancelled, in practice at least. The opposite to Jesus' intention to 'fulfil' it (5:17). 7–9 The quotation is based on LXX of Is. 29:13. It shows the vanity of the externalism which results from man-made religion. 10 The action and words emphasize the importance of the principle about to be stated. 11 As the comment in Mk. 7:19 confirms, this statement implied that the ceremonial laws concerning clean and unclean foods (Lv. 11) had no absolute moral validity. 13 Every plant refers to the Pharisees rather than their teaching (cf. Is. 60:21). 14 The Pharisees' claim to light was ironic when they in fact obscured the light of the Torah (cf. Rom. 2:17–24). They and their disciples were on the road to spiritual disaster. 15 The parable must be the saying of verse 11. 18 The mouth is here connected with spiritual defilement, not as an entrance for physical food, but as an organ of expression for the thoughts and attitudes of a man's heart, i.e. his imagination and will. 19 Matthew has only seven vices to Mark's thirteen, but false witness is not mentioned in Mark. 20 But to eat . . . : this conclusion occurs only in Matthew, and may be an editorial note.

15:21–39 Further healings and the feeding of the four thousand

This section is parallel to Mk. 7:24 – 8:10 with some variations and some abbreviations. There is no parallel in Luke. There is the healing of a Gentile and a general description of healings followed by a further example of feeding the crowd.

21 Jesus withdrew from the legalism of His own people to Gentile territory, near to two notoriously ungodly cities (cf. 11:22). 22 Canaanite: descended from the inhabitants of Palestine before the Conquest under Joshua, who were regarded as likely to corrupt the Israelites (Ezr. 9:1). Such an outsider can nevertheless call on the Son of David. 24 This was the general policy of Jesus (cf. 10:5f.) but He allowed exceptions, as here. 26 Perhaps this was said half-humorously as He saw her faith developing. Many Jews referred to Gentiles as dogs (cf. 7:6). 27 Her reply shows her faith and humility. 28 As in the other Gentile healing, the cure is effected at a distance (8:13). 30, 31 Mark has only the healing of one deaf and dumb man. For other general healings, cf. 4:23; 9:35; 19:2. The God of Israel: this particular phrase suggests that these healings took place in an area where there was a considerable number of Gentiles. 32–39 While many scholars suppose that this is a 'doublet' of the feeding of the 5,000, there are many differences and the fact that Mark includes both in his relatively short Gospel is evidence that he at least believed there were two separate incidents. In the narrative as it stands it is hard to see why the disciples ask where they are to get bread when they know that Jesus has already fed an even larger number with even less food, but there may have been reasons for their obtuseness (cf. 16:9f.). It may be that this second feeding was mainly of Gentiles. The region of Magadan is unknown.

16:1–12 Pharisees and Sadducees

In this section Matthew parallels Mk. 8:11–21, with the addition of a saying about signs (cf. Lk. 12:54–56) and an explanatory note at the end.

1 There had been a request before in similar terms (12:38f.). Now the Sadducees are involved. 2b–3 do not occur in some MSS and NEB omits. Rather different weather phenomena are described from those in Luke, but the point is the same. Their sensitivity to meteorological signs makes a mockery of their insensitivity to the spiritual crisis. 6 Leaven usually has a bad connotation in the NT (cf. 1 Cor. 5:8). 7 The misunderstanding of spiritual metaphors arising from the feeding miracle is even more clearly described in Jn. 6:25–58. 8–10 There was no need to worry about literal bread when they had experienced two feeding miracles. 11, 12 The point at issue must therefore be teaching. The Pharisaic and Sadducean approach has often enough corrupted the thought and life of the church.

16:13–28 The confession and challenge of Messiahship

This section is closely parallel to Mk. 8:27 – 9:1 (cf. Lk. 9:18–27), with the insertion of the promise to Peter (vv. 17–19) and the omission of the saying about being ashamed of Jesus, to which there was a parallel in 10:32f. The confession by Peter of Jesus' Messiahship is in many ways the turning-point of the Synoptic Gospels, because it is from this point that the shadow of the cross falls over the ministry.

13 Caesarea Philippi was formerly called Paneas after the Greek god Pan. It was rebuilt by Philip the tetrarch and called Caesarea in honour of Augustus, and Philippi to distinguish it from other towns named in honour of the emperor. It is ironical that it was in such a district that the first true confession of the Messiah of the Jews was made. Son of man is here equivalent to 'I'. 14 For confusion with John the Baptist, cf. 14:2. Elijah was expected to return (Mal. 4:5). Only Matthew mentions Jeremiah (cf. quotations from Jeremiah in 2:17; 27:9). Jesus was acknowledged to be the prophet like Moses (Dt. 18:15; Acts 3:22f.). 15 More important than other people's opinions is their own response to the challenge of His person. 16 You are the Christ: despite foreshadowings (especially 14:33) this is the first considered affirmation of such faith in Jesus. Matthew alone includes the words the Son of the living God, though Luke has 'the Christ of God'. The Messiahship thus confessed was something more than current Jewish expectation, though it is doubtful whether the phrase 'Son of God' would have had its full Christian meaning at this stage. Simon Peter took the lead as so often, but may only have been the spokesman for the Twelve who must often have discussed the Messianic characteristics of Jesus among themselves.

17–19 have in the past been considered by some scholars not to be a genuine utterance of Jesus. The word 'church' does not occur in the Gospels apart from here and 18:17, and its inclusion has been taken as evidence of Matthew's ecclesiastical bias; also the rest of the NT does not seem to attribute to Peter the primacy which is given him here. The discoveries at Qumran have, however, removed many of the difficulties about attributing to Jesus the idea of founding a community, and a careful exegesis of the promise to Peter shows that there is no necessary conflict with other references to him in the NT. It has also been pointed out that there is a sort of parallelism between the commendation of Peter in vv. 17, 18a and the rebuke to him in v. 23.

17 Simon Bar-Jona was his full Aramaic name, meaning 'Simon, son of Jonah'. Flesh and blood: human nature (cf. the revelation to Paul, Gal. 1:16f.). 18 Peter: Greek Petros, meaning 'stone', is here linked with rock (Gk. petra). The play on words would be brought out even better in Aramaic where one word kepha lies behind Petros and petra. (For the use of Cephas as a proper name, cf. Jn. 1:42; 1 Cor. 1:12; 3:22; 9:5; 15:5; Gal. 2:9.) The name need not have been given to Simon here for the first time (cf. Jn. 1:42; Mk. 3:16), but it receives a new significance. Some have wished to place this saying after the resurrection, but it would be strange if Jesus had given Simon this name during the ministry and never explained the reason for it. Abraham is spoken of as 'the rock from which you were hewn' (Is. 51:1) but the metaphor is rather different from this. Jesus is also referred to as the corner-stone (Is. 28:16; cf. 1 Pet. 2:8; Eph. 2:20) and the rejected stone (Ps. 118:22; Mt. 21:42; 1 Pet. 2:7), as well as the stone of stumbling (Is. 8:14f.; Rom. 9:32f.; 1 Pet. 2:8), and the foundation (1 Cor. 3:11). Some interpreters have therefore referred to Jesus as the rock here, but the context is against this. Nor is it likely that Peter's faith or Peter's confession is meant. It is undoubtedly Peter himself who is to be the rock, but Peter confessing, faithful and obedient. There is no suggestion of any kind that the promise was made to his successors in office and the situation involved hardly allows for further foundations in the post-apostolic age. That Peter is to exercise his authority in conjunction with the rest of the apostles is made plain in 18:18. The leading role which Peter played is shown throughout the early chapters of Acts. My church does not necessarily mean the universal church as a distinct entity from the people of Israel. It may refer in the first instance to Jesus' own community, intended to act as a remnant within the people of God, though He would see how it would inevitably develop. The powers of death: literally 'the gates of Hades or Sheol'. The phrase occurs in the writing of Hezekiah (Is. 38:10). The gates suggest the picture of a fortress or prison which lock in the dead and lock out their rescuers. This would imply that the church is on the offensive, and its Master will plunder the domain of Satan (cf. 12:29; 1 Pet. 3:18–20).

19 The keys of the kingdom of heaven: the phrase is almost certainly based on Is. 22:22 where Shebna the steward is displaced by Eliakim and his authority is transferred to him. 'And I will place on his shoulder the key of the house of David; he shall open, and none shall shut; and he shall shut, and none shall open.' (This is applied directly to Jesus in Rev. 3:7.) In rabbinic usage the terms 'bind' and 'loose' signified the promulgation of rules of conduct (hālāḳâ) and most commentators therefore believe that the keys represent internal authority in the church rather than the power to open it up to outsiders. If this is so it would give Peter, and the apostles associated with him (18:18), not only the power to preach the kērygma but also to formulate the didachē. The promise does not of course mean that God will be bound by anything that Peter says (cf. Gal. 2:11), but that things done according to the will of Christ will have binding validity. It may be significant that these verses seem to have so many allusions to Isaiah on the one hand and so many connections with 1 Peter on the other hand. 20 Despite this momentous confession, the news was not to be blazed abroad. It was still better that men should make the discovery for themselves.

21 From that time: a new depth of teaching is possible when they have recognized who He is. As soon as the confession has been made it must be reinterpreted in terms of suffering. He must go: because it was written of Him. The fact that the disciples were bewildered when the crucifixion and resurrection took place is hardly surprising, even if they had been previously warned. 22 Took him: perhaps drew Jesus to him with a gesture implying superior knowledge. Already the blessing has gone to his head and he has failed to understand. 23 Satan: for a moment Peter is almost an incarnation of Satan (cf. Mk. 5:9), just as previously he has been given the authority to do the work of God (v. 19). He was repeating the temptations to avoid the cross (4:1–11). Hindrance: RSV mg. 'stumbling-block'. The rock of foundation has already become an obstacle, though this was due to a change in Peter's attitude. Jesus is both foundation and obstacle to men but that is due to their different attitudes (1 Pet. 2:6–8). Despite the revelation which was from God and not man (v. 17), his outlook now was purely human.

24 The way of the disciple must be that of the master. Deny himself means to say 'No' to his own assertion of independence. Take up his cross: on the way to crucifixion (cf. 27:32). 25 Life (Gk. psychē) also means 'soul' (cf. 10:39). The verse means that a man finds his real self when he abandons his own self-assertion and self-seeking for the sake of Christ. 26 There is no comparison of any kind between what a man is and what he has (cf. 6:25). 27 He will repay every man for what he has done: only Matthew has these words, which are taken from Ps. 62:12; Pr. 24:12. Deeds are the evidence of attitudes (cf. 7:21). 28 The Son of man coming in his kingdom: Mark has 'the kingdom of God come with power'. This must refer to a very significant event which will vindicate the new sense of values in the preceding verses. Many scholars refer it to the parousia, and state that Jesus was mistaken about its date. But His unwillingness to predict its time may make us wary about supposing that He even said it would happen before some of His audience had died (cf. 24:36). Some have referred it to the transfiguration but the reference to death when this followed only six days later seems strange. It is more likely to be a major event constituting a stage in the coming of the kingdom after Jesus Himself had tasted death and others had expressed their willingness to (26:35). Mark's 'power' is connected with both the resurrection (Rom. 1:4) and Pentecost (Acts 1:8) and either of these could be in mind.

17:1–27 The transfiguration and its consequences

This section is closely parallel to Mk. 9:2–32 (cf. Lk. 9:28–44; 17:5f.) with some minor additions and some substantial abbreviations, but vv. 24–27 are peculiar to Matthew. The transfiguration in all the Synoptic Gospels follows Peter's confession and is a foretaste of the glory of the Messiah. There are connecting links back to the baptism and forward to the resurrection, exaltation and parousia of Christ. Some scholars have dismissed the transfiguration as entirely unhistorical, and others have suggested that it is a resurrection appearance read back into the ministry of Jesus. The exclusive revelation to the three disciples makes it unlikely to be a post-resurrection appearance, and there are good reasons why Jesus should have wished to be revealed to them in this way before His death. The transfiguration story leads on to a saying about Elijah, a healing and a further prediction of the passion. Then Matthew adds the story about the Temple tax.

1 After six days: cf. Ex. 24:9–18, where the cloud covers the mountain for six days and God speaks on the seventh. Peter and James and John were the inner circle (cf. 26:37; 20:20). The mountain may have been Tabor or Hermon, which was near to Caesarea Philippi. It was the place of divine revelation. 2 Transfigured (Gk. metemorphōthē): cf. Rom. 12:2; 2 Cor. 3:18. Something of Jesus' true morphē (or 'form') as God (Phil. 2:6f.) was revealed. His face shone like the sun: He was the source of light, while Moses' face shone with the reflection of the divine light (Ex. 34:29–35). His garments became white perhaps as the Messianic high priest's garments. 3 Moses and Elijah represented the law and the prophets. Neither of them had a known grave (Dt. 34:6; 2 Ki. 2:11). Each of them had conversed with God on a high mountain (Ex. 31:18; 1 Ki. 19:9–18).

4 Peter seems to wish to make the experience more lasting. Mark alone comments 'for he did not know what to say, for they were exceedingly afraid'. There may be some connection with the Feast of Tabernacles which was thought of as a time when the nations would come up to Jerusalem to worship (Zc. 14:16–19). 5 The bright cloud was a symbol of the divine presence. This is my beloved Son: this recalls the voice at His baptism (3:17). Only Matthew records with whom I am well pleased which makes the link explicit. Listen to him is generally taken to be an echo of the promise that one day a prophet like Moses should come (Dt. 18:15). Elijah in his day had also been in some ways a prophet like Moses. 6, 7 are peculiar to Matthew, but Mark also stresses the awe which this revelation of the glory of Jesus inspired.

9 The vision suggests something more than a merely subjective experience. It would be meaningless to others before the risen Christ had appeared. 10–13 It has been argued that Jesus really filled the role of Elijah preparing in His coming in humility for His coming in glory. Even if some facets of Elijah are types of Jesus rather than of John, the gospel tradition as a whole sees John as fulfilling the role of forerunner (Mal. 3:1; 4:5). Matthew makes this quite explicit in v. 13.

14 The pattern of the ministry is a continual one of withdrawal and involvement. From Jesus alone (v. 8), they return to the crowd. 16 From the glory of the mountain, they return to the suffering and impotence of the plain. 17 Faithless and perverse generation seems to echo Moses' comment on the generation of the first Exodus (Dt. 32:5; cf. Mt. 11:16). He is disappointed at their failure to cope without His being on the spot, for His physical presence will not be with them for long, and then they will have to learn to rely upon Him spiritually.

18 Rebuked him: the demon. 19, 20 Matthew, whose story is shorter, brings out more clearly than Mark the lack of faith of the disciples. It is interesting that this is an occasion where the apostle Matthew was involved in the rebuke, but Peter, who stands behind Mark's Gospel, was not. This mountain must be taken figuratively of any seemingly immovable obstacle (cf. 21:21f.). 21 is absent from the best MSS.

22, 23 He has to keep emphasizing the coming passion because they are quite unable to see its necessity (cf. 16:21; 20:18f.). 24–27 This story emphasizes the fact that Jesus was a loyal Jew who accepted the imposition of the Temple tax, but was under no theological obligation to pay it. The analogy of the Roman government taxing aliens heavily would be well understood. 26 The sons are free: cf. Gal. 4:21–31. 27 Not to give offence: to avoid causing difficulties for those with a less emancipated conscience (cf. 1 Cor. 8:9–13). He was willing to identify Himself with His people in their religious obligations (cf. 3:15) though He was Himself greater than the Temple (cf. 12:6). A shekel: the half-shekel was not in general use so two men paid a shekel. A miracle seems to be implied, but it is the only case in the Gospels where a miracle is not made explicit. Various attempts have been made to explain the incident in other ways, but without much success. The story would have more point if the Gospel were written before AD 70, but it does not demand an early date for the Gospel.

18:1–35 LIFE IN THE MESSIANIC COMMUNITY

This is the fourth of Matthew's discourses and it deals with relationships within the Christian brotherhood, laying particular stress on humility and forgiveness as two vital attributes. Vv. 1–5 are parallel to Mk. 9:33–37; cf. Lk. 9:46–48. Vv. 6–9 are parallel to Mk. 9:42–48; cf. Lk. 17:1f. Vv. 10–14 have a parallel in Lk. 15:1–10 and 15–22 in Lk. 17:3f. Vv. 23–35 are a parable peculiar to Matthew.

1 At that time seems to be more than a formal link as the order is the same as that of Mark, and in addition the question is appropriate in view of Matthew's story about the tax. Matthew omits the record of the disciples' quarrelling. The idea of rank was a prominent one at Qumran, 'that every Israelite may know his place in the community of God according to the everlasting design. No man shall move down from his place nor move up from his allotted position' (1 QS 2:19–25). Greatness in the kingdom is attributed to those who observe and teach the least of the commandments (5:19; cf. also 11:11). 3 Turn: a complete reorientation of the life towards God. Become like children: in respect of dependence and humility rather than innocence (cf. Mk. 10:15). Never enter: this is necessary not only for greatness in the kingdom but for entry into it (cf. Jn. 3:3, 5). 4 Jesus reverses all human ideas of greatness (cf. 5:3–12; 20:25–28).

5 Not only must the disciple be like a child receiving the kingdom, he must also be able to receive a child in Jesus' name. He must treat the weakest as a person to be respected, not as a thing to be manipulated (cf. 10:40; 25:40). 6 Causes to . . . sin: literally 'to stumble' (RSV mg.). The Rabbis regarded Jeroboam the son of Nebat as the greatest of sinners, because he caused Israel to sin (1 Ki. 14:16). Any terrible physical punishment would be preferable to the spiritual responsibility of upsetting others. 7 preserves the biblical balance between the inevitability of evil and the moral responsibility of those who perform it. 8, 9 The substance of these verses is found in 5:29f. Here Matthew, like Mark, groups a number of sayings connected with Greek skandalon ('stumbling-block'). This one deals with the individual's need for care in his own spiritual life.

10 occurs only in Matthew. The little ones are not necessarily children. They may be those weak in faith. Every believer may have been thought to have a guardian angel with access to God to report on his charge (cf. Ps. 91:11; Acts 12:15). 12, 13 The emphasis here is on the worth of each individual, while in Lk. 15:1–7 it is on the joy over the repentant. The sayings were probably given on different occasions. 14 This emphasizes the pastoral concern for every member of the Messianic community, none of whom God wishes to perish.

15 Your brother: presumably within the community of those who recognize God as their Father. Against you is omitted by good MSS, which NEB follows. If this is correct, then any kind of sin will be in mind. Private reasoning with an offender is the first step of love (cf. Lv. 19:17f.). Gained your brother: probably in the sense of keeping him as a member of the community. 16 The refusal to listen to a private word means that it has become a corporate affair, and so two or three witnesses must be called, presumably to try to establish the facts and conciliate. But if that fails they are then to give evidence of the offence to the community publicly (cf. Dt. 19:15). 17 The church is the local community of believers. Failure to listen to the church means excommunication (cf. 1 Cor. 5:4f.; 1 Tim. 1:20). The Gentiles and tax-collectors are the types of outcasts from God's people, though in fact they were responding to the gospel (21:31, 43). For Qumran procedure see 1 QS 5:25 – 6:1. 18 See 16:19. Judicial rulings, like the promulgation of rules of conduct, are binding. 19, 20 The conditions for what is done on earth being ratified in heaven are real agreement in prayer, gathering in the name of Christ and His presence in the midst. The Christian community has a solemn duty to exercise discipline in this pastoral and spiritual way. Where it is done according to the will of Christ it will have the authority of Christ.

21, 22 Seventy times seven may be as in RSV mg. 'seventy-seven times'. This is a complete reversal of the situation before the law laid down equivalent revenge (Ex. 21:24; cf. Mt. 5:38). 'If Cain is avenged sevenfold, truly Lamech seventy-sevenfold' (Gn. 4:24). Now forgiveness is to be equally unlimited. 23 This parable vividly illustrates the point of the extent (rather than the frequency) of forgiveness. It also expounds the petition in the Lord's Prayer about forgiveness (6:12, 14f.). 24 Ten thousand talents: NEB 'ran into millions'. The figure is unrealistic in a human story but it sharpens the point of the extent of human sin and divine forgiveness. 28 A hundred denarii: NEB 'a few pounds'. 32 Wicked 'mean'. A natural action was here inexcusable. The contrast is really immeasurable. 33 The divine mercy is the only true basis for human mercy (cf. 5:43–48). 35 So also: not all the details of the parable are to be pressed. But the point is clear that the unforgiving man cannot be in a position of forgiveness before God. The man forgiven by God through what Christ has done will give in his treatment of others unmistakable evidence of His gratitude to and dependence upon Him.

19:1 - 22:46 CHRIST'S JOURNEY AND CHALLENGE TO JERUSALEM

Having shown something of the life which will be possible within the Messianic community, the Messiah now moves away from Galilee to Jerusalem to present to the holy city and the Jewish leaders the challenge to become the centre and nucleus of the renewed people of God. Matthew is parallel to Mk. 10:1 - 12:37, but has in addition 19:10–12 (celibacy and the kingdom), 20:1–16 (the labourers in the vineyard), 21:14–17 (the children crying out in the Temple) 21:28–32 (the two sons) and 22:1–14 (the royal wedding). There is an atmosphere of crisis, for men must decide about Jesus and their decision is connected with temporal and eternal judgment (to which theme the teaching collected in vv. 23–25 is devoted).

19:1–15 Marriage and children

This section is parallel to Mk. 10:1–16 with the addition of the saying about celibacy (vv. 10–12). The saying about the children is also in Lk. 18:15–17. Jesus had already made a pronouncement about divorce in the Sermon on the Mount (5:31f.), and here similar issues are raised again in controversy.

1 When Jesus had finished these sayings: cf. 7:28; 11:1; 13:53; 26:1. 2 The large crowds may have been on their way to the Passover. 3 For any cause: there was a difference in the interpretation of the reference to 'some indecency' in Dt. 24:1 by the main rabbinic schools. Hillel allowed it to be anything which displeased the husband, while Shammai limited it to unchastity by the wife. 4 Jesus takes them back behind the law (cf. Gal. 3:17) to the creation which showed that the two sexes were according to the purpose of God (Gn. 1:27). 5 And said: it is natural to take this as the words of Scripture (Gn. 2:24) being attributed to God. But it is possible that NEB 'and he added' is right. One: literally 'one flesh'. A consummated union means such a deep relationship between the two partners 'knowing' each other (cf. Gn. 4:1, etc.) that they become one on the human level corresponding to the oneness between Christ and the Christian (1 Cor. 6:16f.). 6 The ideal is plain. Man must not undo the work of God.

7 Jesus' pronouncement has seemed to rule out divorce altogether. This would seem to be an assault on the law (Dt. 24:1–4). 8 For your hardness of heart: Moses had to legislate for those already involved in disobedience. He allowed (contrast their view in v. 7 that he 'commanded') them to divorce their wives, but in fact this was a restriction on the unlimited freedom of the husband. 9 Jesus in effect accepts the interpretation of Shammai. Some difficulty has been caused by the fact that Mark does not include the phrase 'except for unchastity' (cf. 5:32). Here we have explicit what may be implicit in the saying recorded in Mark. Matthew does not include Mark's reference to the wife divorcing her husband, which was not a Jewish custom but a Greek and Roman one. The moral principle of monogamy is clearly stated here, but there is no reason to suppose that civil legislation should not permit divorce in cases where the ideal has not been attained. 10 shows how far short men fell of the ideal in practice. 11, 12 For most Jews marriage was a duty. Some Essene groups included people who had voluntarily undertaken celibacy. Who have made themselves eunuchs: this was understood literally by some early Christians, including Origen. The claims of the kingdom of heaven are such that even the most desirable human experiences ordained for mankind by God may need to be sacrificed. But this is given (v. 11) to those able to receive it; it is not a 'superior' way of life but a special vocation (cf. 1 Cor. 7:7).

13–15 Parents may have thought that there would be special blessing from a great Rabbi. The disciples may have rebuked the people, not because they thought this was not the right thing to do, but because they felt He was too busy. To such belongs the kingdom of heaven: to children and to those who have a childlike faith (cf. 18:3f.; Matthew omits the similar verse which appears here in Mark). This provides a justification for treating children as members of the Christian community (cf. 1 Cor. 7:14). The word hinder (Gk. kōluō) was used as a technical term with reference to baptism later (cf. 3:14; Acts 8:36; 10:47), but the incident by itself is not a blueprint for infant baptism.

19:16 - 20:16 Riches and rewards

19:16–30 is parallel to Mk. 10:17–31 (cf. Lk. 18:8–30), but includes a saying about the disciples judging Israel (v. 28) similar to one which occurs in Lk. 22:28–30. 20:1–16, the parable of the labourers in the vineyard, is peculiar to Matthew. The dangers of material wealth are emphasized and the reality and unexpectedness of spiritual rewards.

19:16, 17 The story is introduced by Matthew with a rather different question and answer than are found in Mark and Luke. Mark has 'Good Teacher' and 'Why do you call me good?' In Matthew the emphasis is not on the goodness of Jesus in Himself but on His authority as a teacher of goodness. The law has already revealed what is good (cf. Mi. 6:8). Keep the commandments: obedience to them is not normally given as the way to enter life. It may be that Jesus is meeting him on his own terms in order to show him that this was not the way. 18, 19 Which? suggests both the idea that some were more important than others and that he was better at keeping some than others. Jesus gives the five commandments which deal with actions towards others (omitting that on coveting) and adds (in Matthew alone) you shall love your neighbour as yourself (Lv. 19:18), which sums up the others (cf. 22:37–39; Rom. 13:9). 20 What do I still lack? probably is an expression of felt need rather than of complacency. 21 Perfect: it has sometimes been suggested that this is an instance of Matthew's tendency to create a double standard (the other Evangelists do not include the word). But perfection is something at which it is the obligation of all disciples to aim (5:48). The challenge was to prove his love for his neighbour through his pocket and through wholehearted commitment to Jesus. As with the saying about celibacy (v. 11), this was a command to one person, and while the principle of Christ's Lordship over money is binding on all, the practice of selling up and giving the proceeds to the poor may apply only to some.

23 Many Jews thought that wealth was a reward for the righteous (Ecclus. 44:6), though there was also a tradition of the rich as oppressors (Lk. 1:53). 24 There have been attempts to interpret this saying either by supposing that camel (Gk. kamēlos) should really be 'rope' (Gk. kamilos) or that there was a small gate known as 'The Needle's Eye' to pass through which a camel would need to stoop. Either of these is possible but they are simply speculations. Jesus may well have used a ridiculous figure to make His point (cf. 7:4f.; 23:24 where 'camel' is used presumably because of its size). 25 The disciples must have thought of wealth as a reward for piety. 26 Salvation is the gift of God unattainable by human effort; therefore He can bestow it upon any who will receive it.

27 seems rather a complacent remark by Peter (cf. 4:18–22). 28 New world: literally 'new birth' of the world (cf. Is. 65:17; 66:22; Rom. 8:18–22; Rev. 21:1–5). Josephus uses the word of a new birth of the land of Israel (Antiquities xi.3.9). The Son of man is judge of all (25:31) and the Twelve are associated with Him as patriarchs of the new Israel. Judging can mean 'ruling' (cf. Ps. 2:10). 29 There are far more satisfying possessions and relationships in the spiritual realm when these things are done for my name's sake. Eternal life is not itself a reward but a gift, but those who have made such sacrifices are able to enjoy its full outworking. There is nothing 'unspiritual' about desiring such rewards (cf. 6:4). 30 The divine perspective upsets human values, and this will be made plain in the world to come (cf. 20:16).

20:1–16 This parable tells a story involving absurd economics, to get home a truth of the kingdom. As in other parables, many of the details are to give colour to the story and are not to be pressed for a theological meaning. The point is that in the kingdom men receive what they need (the denarius was a day's wage for a labourer), and this is eternal life (for there are differences in spiritual privileges, 19:29). This is given by God, who is continually calling men of different degrees of moral attainment and spiritual privilege to His service, and therefore no-one has any claim on Him for more than anyone else. There is nothing unjust about God's dealings for He gives what He promises (v. 13). He has sovereign freedom to do as He pleases for generosity may be added to justice (vv. 14f.). The self-righteous, no doubt particularly those with leading positions in Israel, were only upset because His generosity was given to others (vv. 12, 15). The grateful are better off than the grumblers (v. 16). The theme is similar to the story of the elder brother of the prodigal (Lk. 15:25–32).

20:17–34 The suffering and love of the Messiah

This section closely follows Mk. 10:32–52 (cf. Lk. 18:31–43), except that there are a number of differences in the healing of the blind men. The teaching about the reversal of human values continues—a crucified Messiah and greatness in service—and a sad human need is relieved.

17–19 He took the twelve disciples aside: because this was private teaching to those who had acknowledged His Messiahship. This is the third prediction of the passion and resurrection (cf. 16:21; 17:22f.). Here there is specific mention for the first time of deliverance to the Gentiles and of crucifixion. 20 The mother of the sons of Zebedee is not mentioned by Mark, who refers only to James and John themselves. There can be no serious attempt here to shift the onus from the sons, as many scholars allege, since the others are indignant at them (v. 24). 21 They thought that exaltation could be obtained without suffering, and that Jesus could dispose the places in the kingdom. 22 The first misapprehension was that suffering might be bypassed. The cup is one of suffering (26:39; cf. Is. 51:17). Mark refers also to His baptism of suffering. 23 James was put to death as a martyr (Acts 12:2). It is probable that John lived on to an old age. Neither of them was ready to face up to martyrdom with Jesus at the coming Passover. It is the Father who has prepared places in the kingdom, and Jesus does not state whether He knows the order of precedence.

24 The others show the same ambitious spirit as James and John. 25 In most human societies power is sought for personal ends. 26 It shall not be so among you: the standards of the kingdom are quite different. Greatness is shown in service. The word for servant (Gk. diakonos) was adopted as the most common one for Christian ministry in the NT and every 'minister' should remember its true meaning. 28 The basis of such an approach is the example and atoning death of the Son of man. The Jews thought of the death of the righteous atoning for others. Here Is. 53:10–12 probably lies in the background. Ransom (Gk. lytron) means a costly act of deliverance without specifying to whom the price is paid. Many is inclusive rather than restrictive (cf. 26:26). The Greek preposition anti suggests an equivalence or substitution. Even in an ethical context great theological truths can be taught (cf. Phil. 2:1–11). Here are set side by side the humility of Jesus, the suffering Servant of the Lord, and His greatness in being able in the sacrifice of Himself to provide for all a means of deliverance from their sins.

29–34 Cf. 9:27–31. Matthew's account is briefer than Mark's. He records a second blind man but does not include the name Bartimaeus. The cry Son of David is now full of extra significance (cf. 9:27). Jesus in pity touched their eyes comes in Matthew only. Here is the selfgiving love of Jesus which is soon to lead Him to His death.

21:1–17 The triumphal entry and cleansing of the Temple

In this section Matthew continues to agree with Mark closely, but the cursing of the fig-tree occurs a few verses later in Matthew, and he includes the children crying out in the Temple (cf. Mk. 11:1–11, 15–17; Lk. 19:28–40, 45f.). He also introduces a formula quotation. The Messiah's entry into His capital causes enormous popular enthusiasm, but the peaceful, yet stern, nature of His Messiahship was shown by His riding on an ass and by His driving the exploiters out of the Temple.

1 The Mount of Olives was the place where the Jews expected the Messiah to appear. Bethphage was probably on the east side of the hill and not in view of Jerusalem. 2 The village opposite you may have been Bethphage or Bethany. You will find: probably by previous arrangement with friends. 3 The Lord may be Jesus or God or simply the owner of the ass. 5 The 'formula quotation' is from Is. 62:11 and Zc. 9:9. There is no doubt that the quotation refers to only one beast, as it is an example of Hebrew parallelism. It is asserted by most commentators that Matthew misunderstood this and therefore introduced a second animal (vv. 2, 7). This seems a priori most unlikely when it is remembered what a knowledge of the Hebrew OT, as well as LXX, the Evangelist has. He does not include Mark's phrase 'on which no one has ever sat' and it may be assumed that he mentions the mother because she would be needed to calm the colt in the crowd. The word ass (Gk. hypozygion) in the last line of the quotation refers to a male ass, and if Matthew realized this when translating LXX it is clear that he was not equating this with the female ass (Gk. onos) in the narrative.

7 He sat thereon: it is amazing how many commentators seem to have referred this to the two animals and not to the garments. 8 Spread their garments: cf. 2 Ki. 9:13. The branches were a further sign of a royal welcome. Hosanna originally meant 'save now' but it had become a shout of praise. Blessed be he who comes in the name of the Lord is a quotation from Ps. 118:26. This was part of the Hallel (Pss. 113–118) sung at the Feast of Tabernacles and the Feast of Dedication, as well as at Passover. The blessing of the psalm was on all pilgrims coming up to the feast. It is especially appropriate for the Son of David, who came as the supreme Pilgrim to enter His kingdom. The question has been raised whether this did not take place at one of the other festivals, but the impression given is that it occurred just before the Passover. 10, 11 All the city was stirred: this statement and the question and answer of the crowds are peculiar to Matthew. The Galilaean crowds acclaim Him as the local prophet, but the whole symbolism of the occasion marks Him out as Messiah and the context of the quotation from Zechariah indicates His world-wide dominion of peace.

12 The temple means the whole Temple area, and the particular part of it was the court of the Gentiles. The money-changers were those who changed foreign coins for those in which the Temple dues might be paid. Presumably they made a profit on the transaction. Those who sold pigeons did so to the poor as offerings (cf. Lk. 2:24). A good deal of extortion went on in this field. 13 This is a prophetic act symbolizing the coming of the Messiah in judgment (Mal. 3:1–5) and Jesus quotes Is. 56:7 and Je. 7:11. The words 'for all peoples' from the first quotation are omitted by Matthew, but Jewish readers would have known that this was the court of the Gentiles. The context of the second quotation is one of judgment and destruction upon the people and the Temple. Between them they point to the replacement of the old order by the new (cf. v. 43). 14–16 The blind and the lame had been hated by David (2 Sa. 5:8), but the Son of David heals them. The children were still using the words of the crowds without fully understanding them, yet this could not be stopped because it was an expression of praise to God the Creator (cf. Lk. 19:39f.; Ps. 8:2). Jesus by His action and His acceptance of the acclamation of the crowds and the children had presented a direct challenge to the whole established order of things. 17 At this stage he went out of the city as many pilgrims did because of the shortage of accommodation.

21:18 – 22:14 Judgment on the Jewish leaders and nation

In this section Matthew is parallel to Mk. 11:12–14, 20–33 (cf. Lk. 20:1–8) in the cursing of the fig-tree (21:18–22, though the order is different) and the question about the Baptist (vv. 23–27). The parable of the two sons and the reference to the Baptist (vv. 28–32) are peculiar to Matthew. He parallels Mk. 12:1–12 in the parable of the wicked tenants (vv. 33–46; cf. Lk. 20:9–19), but the royal marriage (22:1–14), though showing some resemblances to Lk. 14:15–24, is peculiar to him. The theme of judgment on God's people is symbolically acted first and then strongly pressed home in three parables.

18, 19 The fig tree would not be expected to have full-grown figs on it at this time, but there should have been some small edible growth. The fig-tree represented Israel in Ho. 9:10, where the context was one of judgment for breaking the covenant. Matthew emphasizes that this happened at once. Immediate results were usual in the case of miracles (cf. 8:3; 20:34). There is little doubt that this action, unusual as it was, symbolized the coming judgment on a faithless Israel (cf. the parable of Lk. 13:6–9). 20–22 emphasize the unlimited power of God available to faith (cf. 17:19f.). 23 These things probably refers mainly to the cleansing of the Temple and the events associated with it, but could include His teaching. His actions and words had been in the style of a prophet. They wish to know His authority as they would the credentials of any other Rabbi or prophet. 25 The baptism of John: it is sometimes taken as an evasive counter-question. But it is more likely to mean that just as John was called direct by God so was Jesus, or that His baptism was the moment of commissioning when the divine authority was given to Him by John representing the law and the prophets and the divine voice acknowledging Him (3:13–17). 27 They confess themselves incompetent as teachers and there is no point in the circumstances in Jesus' saying anything more about His authority.

28–32 The context shows clearly the contrast between the professedly religious and the outcasts. The ministry of John as well as that of Jesus divided men on this score and expectations were overthrown. Again the last are first and the first last (20:16). 33–46 There is little doubt that this parable has allegorical features, as Israel is seen as a vineyard in Is. 5:1–7 (cf. Ps. 80:8–11). 33–36 The tenants are presumably the leaders of the Jews who kill God's servants, the prophets (cf. Je. 7:25). 37 Afterward suggests the last appeal to them through his son. 38 The inheritance was used in the OT to refer to Israel as a nation (Ps. 33:12) or to the promised land (Ps. 105:11). 41 Only Matthew records that the answer to Jesus' question was spoken by His audience. Here is a vivid example of a parable moving people to indignation (cf. 2 Sa. 12:1–6). 42 The quotation is from Ps. 118:22f. (part of the Hallel, cf. v. 9). For the idea of Jesus as the stone, cf. Acts 4:11; Rom. 9:33; Eph. 2:20; 1 Pet. 2:7. 43 In Matthew the meaning of the parable is made explicit—the kingdom of God would be taken away from the people of God constituted on a national basis, and given to the people of God constituted on a spiritual basis, who would produce the fruits of it. 45, 46 The issues were now clear to the chief priests and the Pharisees, but they had the same reservations about taking action against Jesus as they had about speaking against John (v. 26).

22:1–14 The parable is very similar to that of the wicked tenants. 1ff. The marriage feast gives the idea of the Messianic banquet. The invitations are sent out more than once but those invited prefer to get on with the everyday things of life. 6, 7 Commentators have pointed out that these verses do not go naturally in the parable. With the parallel verses 21:35, 36 in mind, they may have been introduced as an interpretative marginal note referring to the fall of Jerusalem and then later been incorporated into the text. 9 The invitation is therefore extended to the outcasts (not necessarily Gentiles). 10 Both bad and good; cf. 13:47f. 11 It is not clear whether the wedding garment was something which the guest should have brought (presumably representing good deeds as evidence of a true heart) or something which the host supplied (representing forgiveness). 14 Many are called, but few are chosen: the calling must refer to the gospel message to which they make a merely outward response, not being chosen by God.

22:15–46 Controversy with the Pharisees and Sadducees

This section follows fairly closely Mk. 12:13–37 (cf. Lk. 20:20–44), but Matthew abbreviates the account of the lawyer's question. In the final round of controversies with the Jewish leaders, Jesus faces questions about taxation (vv. 15–22), life after death (vv. 23–33), and the greatest commandment (vv. 34–40). In His turn He poses to them the last question concerning their views about the Messiah (vv. 41–46).

15–22 The presence of the Herodians would be no doubt to take advantage of any remark Jesus made which might appear treasonable. 17 Is it lawful . . . ? This question of taxation was hotly debated among the Jews. 20 The likeness and inscription were offensive to the Jews because of the tendency to deify Caesar. 21 Render therefore to Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and to God the things that are God's: this was a brilliant answer, getting to the heart of the problem. Caesar represented the legal government and in that sense owned the coinage and therefore had a right to taxes. But man bears the image and likeness of God (Gn. 1:26) and therefore the whole of his life has a higher loyalty to the divine will.

23–33 The Sadducees based their faith entirely on the five books of the Law. Their question was based on the law of levirate marriage (levir is Latin for brother-in-law) which was an attempt to perpetuate the race on the physical level (Dt. 25:5). 29ff. Their attempt at a reductio ad absurdum of the doctrine of resurrection was refuted by the explanation that the life to come will be of a different order from the present one. The angels (in which they did not believe either, cf. Acts 23:8) are spiritual beings and show that the life to come will not be physical, though there will be a body (cf. 1 Cor. 15). The Sadducees did not in fact know their Pentateuch, from which Jesus quotes Ex. 3:6. God spoke of Himself as the God of the patriarchs long after their physical death, and so they must still be in some sense alive. The phrase God of Abraham, etc. is used with special reference to His keeping His promises in redemption, and therefore is specially relevant to the subject.

34–40 The question at issue was one that was keenly debated but the attempt to test him was probably with hostile intent. The combination of Dt. 6:5; Lv. 19:18 was not unknown in Judaism (cf. Testament of Issachar 5:2). Jesus shows that love is at the heart of the OT. 41–45 The challenge has to be put to them as to what their views of the Messiah really are. Matthew has given great prominence to the idea of Jesus as the son of David (1:1, etc.). But this is not a sufficient designation for Him. He is in some sense Lord as well. There is some difficulty about the use of Ps. 110:1. Though this was entitled 'A Psalm of David', it looks as if it were more a psalm in praise of the Davidic king, who was the psalmist's lord. But the Rabbis understood the Psalm in a Messianic sense, and it had its true fulfilment in one greater than David. Considerable use of the Psalm is made in Hebrews. 46 The time for questioning has ended. They cannot defeat Him in the field of argument. When next they appear on the scene it will be with force (26:47).

23:1 – 25:46 CHRIST'S WARNINGS AND PROPHECIES OF JUDGMENT

At this stage Matthew gives us the fifth discourse of Jesus—on judgment. Ch. 23 consists of a detailed criticism of the scribes and Pharisees and a warning of judgment coming on that generation. It contains much that is peculiar to Matthew and appropriate to a Jewish-Christian Gospel. Ch. 24 resembles Mark's apocalyptic discourse with some additions, mostly paralleled in Luke. It deals with both the coming judgment on the Jews and also the final judgment. Ch. 25 consists of three parables peculiar to Matthew about the final judgment. If the emphasis in these chapters is on the future coming of Christ, the Gospel as a whole shows a balance between that and the present coming of the kingdom in the ministry. Matthew is not one-sided in his eschatology and it would be arbitrary to reject as unauthentic anything which heightened it, though one may allow that each evangelist had a particular viewpoint in his selection of the sayings of Jesus.

23:1–39 Woes against the scribes and Pharisees

This section is a collection of sayings which takes the place of the summary warning against the scribes which comes in Mk. 12:38–40. There are parallels to many of them in Lk. 11:37–52 and the last three verses are almost the same as Lk. 13:34f. There is a warning against the practice of the scribes and Pharisees (vv. 1–12), then seven woes on them (vv. 13–36), followed by the lament over Jerusalem (vv. 37–39). The chapter may have been based on the 'Song of Moses' (Dt. 32).

1 Then said Jesus: this chapter is probably to be regarded as the start of a new discourse rather than simply the continuation of the controversy in the previous chapter. 2 Moses' seat was the teaching chair of the synagogues. 3 Practise and observe whatever they tell you: it is very hard to take this at its face value in view of 15:1–20. It is likely to refer to everything consistent with the law of Moses. They preach but do not practise: this is not likely to be a wholesale condemnation of all Pharisees, many of whom were well aware of the danger of inconsistency. 4 With their burden and yoke, cf. that of Christ (11:28–30). 5 To be seen by men: cf. 6:1, 5, 16. Phylacteries were small amulets containing passages of the Pentateuch (cf. Ex. 13:16; Dt. 6:8; 11:18). They were normally worn only at prayer. Fringes were tassels worn on the outer garment (cf. 9:20). 6, 7 All these things were meant to mark out the man with a superior knowledge of the law. 8–10 Rabbi meant 'my great one'. Father was probably mainly applied to great Rabbis of the past. Master means something more like 'professor'. None of these terms has any finality because it is God and Christ who have true spiritual authority. It is doubtful if the use of the terms themselves is intended to be forbidden, but rather the attitude of mind of those who seek to be dependent on others and those who like to receive that dependence. 11, 12 The reversal of human values is again emphasized (cf. 20:25–28).

13 Woe to you: 'alas for you'. This is a very searching condemnation of the Pharisees, but it is done in love. There are affinities between the 'woes' here and the Beatitudes (5:1–12). Not to enter the kingdom was bad enough. To prevent others from entering was far worse. 14 is probably to be omitted on MS evidence. 15 Despite their missing the kingdom, there was still a proselytizing zeal among many of them, with disastrous results. Proselytes were Gentiles who had received proselyte baptism and circumcision and become Jews fully. Many 'God-fearers' would not take this step. 16–22 The intention of the Rabbis was good—to discourage rash oaths by sacred things. But because of popular custom they had to make some rules allowing certain oaths. This led to such abuse, when everything in fact derives from God, that Jesus forbade the use of oaths (5:33–37). 23, 24 They went beyond the requirements of the law (Dt. 14:22f.). But they missed the true requirements of God (cf. Mi. 6:8). Their lack of proportion in spiritual matters is as ridiculous as straining out a gnat (to avoid defilement, Lv. 11:41) and swallowing a camel (cf. 19:24).

25, 26 The Pharisees not only lacked proportion, they tended to treat religion as a matter of external observance (cf. 15:10f.). 27, 28 are similar in their contrast of appearance and reality. The tombs were whitewashed in order to prevent people bumping into them and becoming defiled. Iniquity means 'lawlessness', when they were apparently keeping the law in all its minutiae.

29–33 For the putting to death of God's messengers, cf. 21:33–43; Heb. 11:32–38. It is always easier to honour a dead prophet than to heed a living one. They witness against themselves that they are the physical sons of the prophets' murderers. What they do not realize is that they are the spiritual sons also. 32 Fill up: they were to bring it to fulfilment (Gk. plēroō) in the supreme murdering of the Prophet and righteous One. 33 Cf. 3:7. Their judgment is a final one.

34–36 Luke introduces this with 'the Wisdom of God said', but it is not clear what he is quoting. Prophets and wise men and scribes presumably all belong to the Christian church (cf. 1 Cor. 12:28f.). Their fate will be as Jesus warned the disciples (Mt. 10:17, 23). Zechariah mentioned here is generally thought to be the son of Jehoiada (2 Ch. 24:20–22). As 2 Chronicles was the last book in the Hebrew canon, Abel (Gn. 4:8) was the first martyr and Zechariah the last. Zechariah the son of Barachiah was the prophet (Zc. 1:1). There is no tradition that he was murdered. It seems likely that the two have been confused at some stage. There was also a Zechariah the son of Baris killed in the middle of the Temple just before the siege of Jerusalem (Josephus, Jewish War iv.5.4). This generation (cf. 11:16) brought unbelief to its culmination in the murder of the Messiah, and the crimes of centuries were in a sense avenged in the horrors of the Jewish war.

37–39 A sad and loving prophetic oracle. For Jerusalem as the centre of rejection, cf. Lk. 13:33f. How often implies previous visits to Jerusalem such as John records. The rejection of the protection of God incarnate, in favour of the outward trappings of religion in which they had a vested interest (your house), could only have the result of their losing those as well (cf. Jn. 11:47–53). For the desolation of the Temple, cf. 1 Ki. 9:7f.; Je. 12:7; 22:5. The One who could have saved it will not be seen again until the end when Blessed is he who comes in the name of the Lord will have a new meaning altogether (cf. 21:9).

24:1–42 The fall of Jerusalem and the coming of the Son of man

This section is close to Mk. 13:1–32 (cf. Lk. 21:5–33) with divergences in vv. 10–13 and the addition of vv. 26–28, 37–42, which have parallels in Lk. 17:23–37. After the introduction (vv. 1–3), there is teaching on disturbances (vv. 4–8), persecution and evangelism (vv. 9–14) and the great tribulation (vv. 15–28). These refer mainly to temporal judgment. There follows the coming of the Son of man in final judgment (vv. 29–31) and the linking of the two phases of judgment together (vv. 32–36). There are then a number of warnings in the form of illustrations of sudden disaster.

1, 2 The disciples look at the buildings of the temple with the awe of provincial pilgrims. Jesus saw far more clearly the judgment to come upon it because men had not used it as they ought (21:12f.). 3 shows that there are two things involved in the chapter: this (the destruction of the Temple) and the sign of your coming and of the close of the age. It seems that Matthew makes explicit the two signs of the end. Both parousia (coming; cf. vv. 27, 37, 39) and the close of the age (cf. 13:39, 49; 28:20) only occur in Matthew of the Gospels. 5 There were a number of Messianic pretenders in the 1st century (cf. 7:15). 6 Wars may be more than just the Jewish war of AD 66–70. There was a programme of events but this was not the end. 8 It was the beginning of the sufferings: 'of the birth-pangs' of the new age (cf. Is. 26:16–19; Mi. 4:9f.).

9 summarizes Mk. 13:9–13 (cf. 10:17–21). 10–12 are peculiar to Matthew and list most of the spiritual disasters which can come on the Christian community—apostasy, treachery, internal hatred, heresy, lovelessness. 13 Full salvation nevertheless comes to those who stand fast. 14 The world-wide proclamation of the gospel is an essential preliminary to the end. 15 The desolating sacrilege (Dn. 9:27) seems to refer to the Roman standards (which were often worshipped) preparing for the siege of Jerusalem (cf. Lk. 21:20). Let the reader understand: the Evangelists thus show that this is a cryptogram to be solved and Matthew tells them the book to turn to. 16 On the basis of this saying many Christians fled to Pella in AD 68. 17–20 stress the urgency and the suffering that there will be. Sabbath does not occur in Mark, but this is a subject in which Jewish Christians would be interested. 21 This was the eschatological suffering coming upon this generation (23:36). The horrors of the Jewish War were indescribable, though in quantity at least they have been exceeded since.

22 The idea of a definite length of tribulation shortened for the sake of the elect is found in 2 Baruch 20:1f. 23–25 In such times of stress there are always counterfeit deliverers. 26, 27 The coming of the Son of man will not be secret but open and sudden. 28 The eagles may well be the Roman standards about to swoop on the rotting corpse of Judaism. 29–31 Immediately might suggest that the end was to come straight after the fall of Jerusalem. Some have assumed that vv. 29–31 refer to that event in vivid symbolic language. But they are more naturally taken as referring to the end, and 'immediately' (Gk. eutheōs) might have a weakened sense (euthys), as it often has in Mark. There will be cosmic disorder, the appearance of the Son of man (cf. Dn. 7:13f.), the mourning of despair by those who were taking their side with the crucifiers of the Messiah (Zc. 12:10–14) and the gathering of the elect from all over (Dt. 30:4) at the sound of the trumpet (Is. 27:13; cf. 1 Thes. 4:16).

32, 33 This seems to mean that the sufferings of the Jewish War are a sure sign of the imminence of the end. It is unlikely that the fig tree is to be taken allegorically of Israel and the reference to its putting forth its leaves as meaning her repentance. 34 This generation has been interpreted as the Jewish race (Gk. genea may mean 'generation' or 'race'), or as the human race, or as the generation which sees the signs of the end. It is much more likely that it should be taken in its normal sense of the generation of Jesus' own day, the generation of the second Exodus (12:41f., 45; 23:34–36). These things will then refer to the events connected with the fall of Jerusalem, which occurred almost exactly 40 years (a round figure for a generation—cf. Ps. 95:10f.) after Jesus' words. 35 emphasizes the permanence of Jesus' words even in the most extreme cosmic disaster (cf. 5:18).

36 That day seems to refer to the end. If it is true that Jesus does not know the date of it, it seems unlikely that we should refer His prediction of v. 34 to the same event. Nor the Son should probably be retained and occurs anyway in Mark. An attribution of ignorance of this kind to Jesus could hardly have been invented. A distinction must be made between His ignorance which He confessed on such an occasion and the possibility of error when He taught things authoritatively. 37–39 The story of Noah (Gn. 6–9) is not used typologically (cf. 1 Pet. 3:19–21) but simply as a warning of the suddenness of disaster for the unprepared. 40, 41 The parousia will make a sharp division between people outwardly similar who are working together. 42 All this makes it essential to watch.

24:43 – 25:46 Five parables about the judgment

In this section the first parable, the householder and the thief (vv. 43f.) is closely paralleled in Lk. 12:39f., and the faithful servant (vv. 45–51) in Lk. 12:42–46. The same ideas are found in Mk. 13:33–37. Those of the ten maidens (25:1–13), the talents (vv. 14–30) and the sheep and the goats (vv. 31–46) are all peculiar to Matthew, though there are a few similarities in the parable of the talents with the Lucan parable of the pounds. Each emphasizes the need for faithfulness or alertness in view of the coming judgment.

24:43, 44 This is a warning to those who will be condemned by the Son of man at His sudden coming unless they repent (cf. 1 Thes. 5:2–6; Rev. 3:3). 45–51 It is not certain whether any definite group is in mind, and it may refer to disciples generally. The reward of faithfulness and responsible service to others is further responsibility. The punishment (RSV mg. 'cut him in pieces') for abuse of power in the church seems to be irrevocable.

25:1–13 There are certain allegorical features to this parable. The bridegroom (probably we should omit 'and the bride' of RSV mg.) represents the Messiah, and the maidens, who were to meet him and join in escorting the couple to his home for the wedding feast, represent professing Christians. Lamps (Gk. lampadas) are almost certainly torches (cf. Rev. 4:5; 8:10). If this is so, the torches would be going out (v. 8), not because the oil had been burnt up but because they never had any oil and they could not get their torches going at all. All slumbered and slept (v. 5): the distinction was between those that made preparations at the right time and those who did not and tried to rely on others when the crisis came. Spiritual preparedness is not something which can be distributed round in a crisis, and the wise are not being selfish but realistic when they point this out. The foolish were shut out because the bridegroom did not know them in a personal way (cf. 7:21–23).

14–30 show the need for responsible use of the gifts of God in His service during the time when Jesus is not present. The first two servants were good and faithful (vv. 21, 23), for they made the most of their opportunities for their master's sake. The third saw no point in trying to get a profit which would go to the master at the risk of making a loss for which he would be punished. He is condemned (v. 26) as a wicked (Gk. ponēros probably has the force of 'mean'; cf. 20:15) and slothful servant (the opposite of the good and faithful servants). You knew . . . (v. 26) is rightly given as a question. On the supposition that he was right, he ought all the same to have acted differently. The parable concludes that different spiritual opportunities are given to different people. Those who take them will have further ones (presumably especially in the life to come) and those who do not will be thrown out as useless.

31–46 This is not strictly speaking a parable, but a pictorial description of the last judgment. It will be a universal affair of all the nations (v. 32), though the separation into sheep and goats looks like the judgment of individuals (cf. Ezk. 34:17). The small acts of kindness done to the least important of Christ's brethren (which seems to mean all men rather than just Christians) are done to Him, and vice versa (v. 40; cf. 10:40–42). These small things have not been remembered as meritorious by the righteous (for presumably they are the outcome of a living faith and not the basis of acceptance), and have been neglected by the others. The division is absolute between inheriting the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world (v. 34) and going into the eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels (v. 41; not for men). Eternal punishment and eternal life (v. 46) are not necessarily the same in duration. Eternal (Gk. aiōnios) simply refers to the age to come and makes the point that the division is final for men's destiny.

26:1 – 27:66 THE PASSION AND DEATH OF THE CHRIST

There is great emphasis in all the Gospels on the death and resurrection of Christ, the central point of the kērygma. The fact that they occurred at the Passover gave them particular significance as a fulfilment of all that had been foreshadowed through the Exodus in the OT. Here were the events which ushered in the kingdom of God, not yet in its consummation, but in the demonstration of love and power which was sufficient to place life on a new plane. The paradoxes found already in the Gospel reach a climax here, as it is through the death of the Messiah at the hands of the Romans and at the instigation of His own people that life is won for the world. Matthew parallels Mark quite closely (Luke is more independent) with the inclusion of a number of short pieces of which the most important are the saying about the sword and the angels (26:52–54), the death of Judas (27:3–10), some references to Pilate (27:19, 24f.), the resurrection of the saints (27:51b–53) and the watch over the tomb (27:62–66).

26:1–16 The anointing and betrayal

This section closely agrees with Mk. 14:1–11 (cf. Lk. 22:1–6; Luke does not give the story of the anointing as he has a different anointing in Lk. 7:36–50). The actions of all the protagonists come into sharper relief as Jesus goes knowingly to His death which the chief priests and elders are plotting in detail, and to which Judas is preparing to betray Him.

1 With this link-verse, cf. 7:28; 11:1; 13:53; 19:1. 2 Matthew alone draws attention to Jesus' knowledge of the connection between the Passover and His death. The Passover was the major Jewish festival. It was a commemoration every year of the deliverance of the people of Israel from Egypt, with all that this implied for Israel becoming a nation with its own land, and a source of blessing to the world (see Ex. 12; cf. 1 Cor. 5:7). After two days indicates that this was Wednesday. 3 Caiaphas was high priest from c. AD 18 to 36. 5 Not during the feast: probably this intention was overruled by events. The reason given is political rather than religious. There was considerable danger of a popular uprising with the large number of Galilaean pilgrims at the festival.

6–13 The woman seems to have anointed Jesus with very expensive ointment (v. 7) as a mark of devotion, but possibly also as private acknowledgment of His Kingship (cf. 1 Sa. 10:1; 1 Ki. 1:38f.; 2 Ki. 9:4–10). Jesus interprets it as being done to prepare Him for burial (v. 12), for that is the immediate destiny of the Messiah. The reaction of the disciples, Why this waste?, is understandable enough. Yet devotion to the person of Jesus has often in the long run produced the greatest benefit for the poor. Her deed would be an inspiration to others because it would be remembered in the world-wide proclamation of the gospel, of which the central point was Jesus' death and resurrection.

14–16 One of the twelve: this sad phrase highlights the tragedy of the betrayal. No motive is ascribed to Judas in the Synoptic Gospels (but see Jn. 12:4–6). Matthew alone records his question What will you give me? and the exact price of thirty pieces of silver (cf. Zc. 11:12; for other citations of or allusions drawn from Zechariah's prophecy, see on 21:5; 24:30f.; 26:31; 27:9).

26:17–29 The Last Supper

In this section Matthew is close to Mk. 14:12–27 (cf. Lk. 22:7–30). Through the Passover meal Jesus interprets His coming death and Judas is identified as the traitor.

17–19 The first day of Unleavened Bread was the same as the Passover day and was followed by a further seven days of Unleavened Bread. There seems little doubt that the Synoptic Gospels present Jesus as eating a Passover meal. There is some difficulty in reconciling this with John, but it is possible that there may have been two different calendars in use, and it seems very unlikely that any of the Evangelists would not have accurate information about the dating of the last few days of Jesus' life or that he should feel free to alter it for supposedly 'theological' reasons. My time is at hand indicates the sense of destiny which Jesus had. 20 The twelve seem to have been there alone with Jesus. 22 They were very sorrowful, partly because Jesus was to be betrayed and partly because one of them was to do it. Is it I, Lord? is an incredulous question which yet allows the possibility that it is so. 24 For this blend of predestination and moral responsibility, cf. 18:7. 25 Master means 'Rabbi' (RSV mg.). The others call Him 'Lord'. You have said so may lay the emphasis on Judas' saying it himself or it may simply mean 'Yes'. There is no mention of the departure of Judas.

26 Jesus performed the action of the head of the household at an ordinary Jewish meal. He blessed God for providing the bread. The words of institution are very brief in Matthew and Mark, and the command to eat is not in Mark. This is my body: in the context of the breaking and eating it suggests His coming death and the way in which His incarnation and passion will sustain their lives (cf. Jn. 6:53–58). The bread cannot be identical with His body, but it is an effective sign of it when received in faith. 28 This is my blood of the covenant has echoes of Ex. 24:8, where the old covenant is connected with the great act of redemption. The word 'new' (RSV mg.) was probably added to emphasize the parallel. Many is inclusive rather than exclusive (cf. 20:28; Is. 53:11). For the forgiveness of sins: this is in Matthew alone, and, as he alone omits it with reference to John's baptism in 3:2, it looks as if he wishes to emphasize that the true basis of forgiveness is the redeeming death of Christ. 29 The Supper looks forward to the Messianic banquet (cf. 14:13–21) as well as backward to the mighty act of redemption.

26:30–56 Gethsemane

This section parallels closely Mk. 14:26–52 (cf. Lk. 22:31–53). The prediction of the failure of the disciples (vv. 30–35) is followed by Jesus' acceptance of the will of His Father (vv. 36–46) and His arrest (vv. 47–56).

30 The hymn was probably the second half of the Hallel (Pss. 115–118). 31 I will strike: the quotation is from Zc. 13:7 and Jesus has changed it from an imperative to a future indicative. This is probably intended to show that God is in control of all that is about to take place. 32 For reference to Galilee, cf. 28:7, 10. 33–35 Peter is the leader in vain boasting as he had been in the confession of Jesus as Christ (16:13–19). The first to confess also becomes the first to deny. 36 Gethsemane means 'oil-press'. It was an olive grove just east of the Kidron. 37 Peter and the two sons of Zebedee witnessed His glory (17:1ff.) as now they witness His agony. 37, 38 The sorrow was caused partly by His rejection by His own people and partly by the horrors of the atoning death which lay before Him. With me is included only by Matthew here and in v. 40. Jesus needed human companionship in His hour of trial. 39 The cup represented suffering and death (cf. 20:22; Is. 51:22). 41, 42 There are many features here reminiscent of the Lord's Prayer: My Father; thy will be done; not enter into temptation (cf. 6:9–13). He Himself in His incarnation faced the problems which He knew His disciples would also have to face. The flesh is weak: for His own experience of the weakness of the flesh see Heb. 5:7–10. 45 Are you still sleeping?: RSV is almost certainly right in making this a question.

47 One of the twelve emphasizes both the fact that he would know where to find Jesus and the enormity of his treachery (cf. v. 14). 48 The sign was necessary as there were probably many pilgrims about, and if there had been a struggle the wrong man might have been arrested in the darkness. 49 This would be the way in which a pupil would greet a Rabbi. 50 Friend, why are you here? would be a loving rebuke by implication. But it may be rendered with RSV mg. 'do that for which you have come'. In any event there is love and peace, for the struggle has been fought out in prayer with His Father. 51 The one who drew his sword was Peter, according to Jn. 18:10. Luke and John relate that Jesus healed the servant. 52–54 Matthew alone records these sayings. All who take the sword will perish by the sword means that in general terms violence will always beget violence. The deliberate resort of the Jewish leaders to violence here reaped its due reward (cf. 27:25). 53 If the angels looked after the little ones (18:10), how much more could they come in force to wait upon the Son of God. 54 The scriptures are probably the passages referred to frequently in the passion narrative, such as Ps. 22; Is. 53. 55 A robber was probably a terrorist, a role which Jesus may have been suspected of taking and which Judas may well have betrayed Him for not taking. 56 The prophets may be a wider term which could include the Psalms, as in 13:35. Jesus is left to face His ordeal alone.

26:57–75 The trial before Caiaphas

This section is closely parallel to Mk. 14:53–72 (cf. Lk. 22:54–71), though Matthew's account is shorter in places. There is now a confrontation between the religious leaders and the unrecognized and rejected Messiah. He confesses to His Messiahship, only to be met by the sentence of death from the court and denial by His leading disciple.

57 A number of difficulties have arisen about this meeting of the Sanhedrin, as it was not supposed to reach a verdict in a capital case at night-time, nor was it supposed to meet on the eve of a sabbath or of a festival. It seems likely, therefore, that this was an informal meeting hastily summoned with the intention of passing Jesus on to Pilate as a dangerous Messianic claimant. 59–61 Two witnesses were needed to sustain a charge (Dt. 19:15). In this case their testimony was not exactly false, for Jesus had made a statement about the destruction and raising again of the temple of His body (Jn. 2:19). The wrong implication was taken (cf. Acts 6:13f.). 63 For the majestic silence of Jesus, cf. Is. 53:7. He is then put on oath to say whether He is the Christ, the Son of God. 64, 65 You have said so presumably means the same as the more straightforward 'I am' in Mark. His assertion is a combination of Ps. 110:1 and Dn. 7:14. Hereafter (Gk. ap' arti) suggests something soon to happen. The whole sentence may refer to the exaltation and vindication of Jesus (as in Dn. 7 the Son of man goes to God). It is more likely to refer to something in two parts—an immediate exaltation followed inevitably by a return in glory (cf. 24:30). The blasphemy lay in the claim to be seated at the right hand of Power, a reverential periphrasis for 'God'. 66–68 seems to show that there was no legal verdict, but simply a decision accompanied by abuse of the prisoner.

69–75 There seems little doubt that this story must go back to Peter himself. His boasts had proved vain and Jesus' prediction had come true (vv. 33–35). Peter was given away as a disciple of Jesus, not by the quality of his life (cf. Acts 4:13) but by his provincial accent. The man called by Jesus to be a rock twice denied that he knew his Master, to servant girls and once to bystanders. No wonder that he went out and wept bitterly.

27:1–31 The death of Judas and the trial before Pilate

This section closely parallels Mk. 15:1–20 (cf. Lk. 23:2–5, 17–25). There is the addition of the death of Judas (vv. 3–10) and references to Pilate in 19, 24f. While the chief priests and elders take the final steps in handing Jesus over for crucifixion, the one who handed Him over to them in remorse commits suicide. Pilate is baffled by the silence of the supposed Messianic claimant. He tries to release Him by a special annual amnesty but in the end gives in to the pressure of the Jews who say that Jesus has claimed to be their King.

2 Pilate was the governor of Judea and Samaria from AD 26 to 36. His official headquarters were at Caesarea but he had to be present in Jerusalem on any occasions when there might be disorder. 3–10 For another account of Judas' death, cf. Acts 1:16–20. The word here translated repented is not the normal word for a whole-hearted turning to God. It seems more like remorse. 4 The chief priests seem to have no spark of humanity, let alone morality. 9, 10 This is a composite quotation from Jeremiah and Zechariah. The main passage referred to is Zc. 11:12f. where the wages of thirty pieces of silver were cast into the treasury, though MT reads 'to the potter'. There is some disagreement about the reference to Jeremiah, who may have been named because the allusion to Zechariah was so obvious. Most commentators look to Je. 32:6–15, where the purchase of a field is a token that God's people will return from exile to their own land. Both passages are near to references to the new covenant (Je. 31:31–34; Zc. 11:10). But there may also be allusion to Je. 19:1–13, in which the prophet breaks a potter's vessel in the valley of Hinnom as a token of judgment on the people of Judah who 'have filled this place with the blood of innocents'.

11–14 King of the Jews was a title with clearly seditious overtones. There is no point at this stage in Jesus' explaining what the real meaning of it is in His case. 16 Matthew does not mention, as do Mark and Luke, the terrorist activities of Barabbas. Some MSS read 'Jesus Barabbas' (RSV mg.). If this is correct, there is an ironical choice between the two who are 'Saviour', for that is what 'Jesus' means (cf. 1:23) and 'Son of the Father', which is what 'Barabbas' means (cf. 11:27). 19 For dreams, cf. 1:20; 2:12, 13, 19. 20 It is not certain what arguments were used to persuade the people, but probably Jesus was said to be against the Temple and the law (cf. 26:61; Acts 6:13f.).

24, 25 Only Matthew includes these verses. The hand-washing was a Jewish custom to signify the removal of guilt (Dt. 21:6; Ps. 73:13) but Pilate may have used it either in desperation or in mockery. The people make a terrible cry, accepting the consequences of Jesus' death, which was fulfilled in the horrors of the Jewish War (23:34–36). This most Jewish Gospel affirms that it was all the people. The saying has been wrongly used in later generations to persecute the Jews. 26 Pilate probably gave in in the end because of the need to keep in with the emperor (Jn. 19:12). 27–31 This is a combination of physical and mental cruelty. Battalion suggests more men than were likely to be involved. The scarlet robe was probably a soldier's cloak. The crown of thorns was probably a 'radiate' crown, a symbol of divinity.

27:32–56 The crucifixion

This section is closely parallel to Mk. 15:21–41 (cf. Lk. 23:26–49), with the addition of the reference to the resurrection of the saints (vv. 51b–53). The mockery, the suffering and the rejection of Jesus reach their climax in His crucifixion as a criminal and His separation from His Father. Yet even in this tragic scene there are signs of life and faith, hope and love.

32 The naming of Simon suggests that he became a Christian. Mark refers to him as 'the father of Alexander and Rufus', who were probably well known in the church to which Mark wrote. The part of the cross which had to be carried was probably the horizontal piece. 34 Drugged wine was offered to those about to be crucified to deaden the pain. Matthew describes the drug as gall to show the fulfilment of Ps. 69:21. Jesus presumably preferred to drink the cup of suffering to the dregs (26:39) by remaining conscious on the cross. 35 This fulfilled Ps. 22:18. It was customary for the soldiers to have prisoners' garments as perquisites of the job. 37, 38 The 'crime' of Jesus is specified, but not that of the robbers. They were probably Zealot terrorists with whom Jesus may have been associated in the Romans' minds. 40 For the charge about the Temple, cf. 26:61; Jn. 2:19. If you are the Son of God: cf. 4:3, 6. 42 It was only by not saving Himself that He could save others at the deepest level (cf. 20:28). 43 He trusts in God . . . is based on Ps. 22:8.

45 All the land presumably means the promised land (cf. the darkness over Egypt at the Exodus, Ex. 10:21f.). The period was from noon until 3 p.m. At the paschal full moon it could not have been caused by an eclipse of the sun. 46 Eli, Eli, lama sabach-thani seems to be a mixture of the Hebrew and Aramaic versions of Ps. 22:1. The repeated Eli is more like a transliteration of the Hebrew than of the Aramaic. The best MSS read 'lema sabachthani', which is Aramaic. Jesus does not address God as Father as is usual. He enters fully into the anguished distress expressed by the psalmist as He bears the sins of the world. The Psalm goes on to speak of vindication later. 48 The vinegar may have been a soldier's drink but it is also in fulfilment of Ps. 69:21. 50 Jesus is triumphant even in death.

51–53 While Mark records the tearing of the Temple curtain, signifying access into the presence of God (cf. Heb. 10:19f.), only Matthew refers to the resurrection of the saints. It is most natural to take the Greek as meaning that they were raised at this time but did not come out of the tombs until after his resurrection. Christ is 'the first-born from the dead' (Col. 1:18; 1 Cor. 15:20), and there is some difficulty about an anticipation of His resurrection unless it is intended to be something like the raising of Lazarus. The claim that they appeared to many makes it almost certain that Matthew means these verses to be taken literally and to refer to some anticipation of the general resurrection at the last day. 54 The centurion, though a Gentile, because he observes what is happening makes a confession of Jesus, though with limited understanding, in terms which the leaders of His own people have only used in mockery (vv. 40, 43).

56 The mother of the sons of Zebedee is presumably to be identified with Mark's 'Salome' (see also 20:20).

27:57–66 The burial, and setting of the guard

In this section Matthew has a shorter story of the burial than that in Mk. 15:42–47 (cf. Lk. 23:50–56), and includes the story of the setting of the watch. The emphasis here is on the reality of the death of Jesus, against Jewish denials of the resurrection.

57 Joseph is clearly described as a disciple here and in Jn. 19:38. It seems as if the crucifixion had given him the necessary boldness to go and see Pilate. Bodies had not to be left overnight on crosses because of the danger of polluting the land (Dt. 21:22f.). 60 New tomb: rich people would often have these built during their lifetime. Jesus would be the first to occupy this as He was the first to occupy Mary's womb (1:18–25). The great stone was put there to prevent possible rifling of the tomb. 61 This showed courage and devotion and also made it unlikely that they would go to the wrong tomb later. 62–66 Matthew seems deliberately to avoid mentioning that it was the sabbath. After three days I will rise again may be the Christian way of putting what they said. You have a guard: if this is the right translation it will refer to the Temple police. If it is imperative (RSV mg.) then he is offering them Roman troops.

28:1–20 THE RESURRECTION OF THE CHRIST

The second half of the Gospel has been leading up to the cross and all the shattered hopes involved in the shameful death of the Messiah at the instigation of His own people. But while Jesus has been speaking of His death, He has also been promising that He will rise again (16:21; 17:9, 23; 20:19). Now, in a brief final chapter, Matthew shows how tragedy is turned into triumph through the empty tomb, the appearances to the disciples and the world-wide mission of the church.

28:1–10 The resurrection

The narrative has some affinities with Mk. 16:1–8 but also considerable independence (cf. Lk. 24:1–11). Matthew makes explicit the miraculous nature of the event.

1 Matthew continues to emphasize the watch being kept on the tomb by the women as well as by the guards. 2–4 Matthew alone mentions the details of how the stone was rolled back. It is not suggested that the earthquake and the angel were involved in the rolling away of the stone to let Jesus out, but only in making it possible for the women to see that the tomb was empty. 5 The angel is the same as the 'young man' 'dressed in a white robe' of Mark. Do not be afraid: there was an impressive display of divine majesty and power, but the faithful women were not to be frightened like the unbelieving guards. 6 As he said: see 16:21; 17:9, 23; 20:19. 7 The news must be communicated quickly. Going before you to Galilee: this does not rule out any Jerusalem appearances (cf. 26:32). 8 Contrast the initial awe-struck silence recorded in Mk. 16:8. 9 Them is the women, not the disciples. Their response was a recognition of His divine power. 10 My brethren: cf. 12:49; 25:40. The term seems to be wider than just the eleven. There they will see me: this was to be Jesus' main appearance to commission them as His witnesses.

28:11–15 The bribing of the guard

This is peculiar to Matthew. It is here included to meet Jewish denials of the resurrection, just as the birth stories were to refute Jewish rumours.

11 All that had taken place: all the phenomena they had seen (vv. 2–4). 13 This was the only way of explaining the fact of the empty tomb. 14 If they were Roman soldiers, Pilate may have handed over responsibility for them on this duty to the Sanhedrin, and therefore he might be persuaded not to punish this offence of sleeping on duty. 15 This does not help us much in the dating of the Gospel.

28:16–20 The final commission

This section is peculiar to Matthew.

16 It is not clear which mountain is indicated. It may be the same as that from which He had given the Sermon (5:1) or that on which He was transfigured (17:1). 17, 18 There seems to be a division between faith and doubt even among the disciples, but it may be only that they were uncertain until Jesus came. Jesus has now received universal authority as a gift from His Father, not as something wrongly grasped by worshipping Satan (4:8f.). The Messiah has come into His own, though His inheritance had not yet reached its full consummation (cf. 24:30f.). 19 Make disciples of all nations: the universal authority of the Lord leads to the universal mission of the church. Here is the authority for Christian baptism. It would not have been likely that it would have been practised so early after Pentecost (see Acts 2:38–41) if it had not been commanded by Jesus. It was administered 'in the name of Jesus' (Acts 2:38; 8:16, etc.), the name indicating ownership. In due course it came to be administered in the name of the Trinity. The reference to the Trinity here may not be intended as a baptismal formula but as a theological description of the meaning of the sacrament. 20 As a new Moses, Jesus stresses the importance of obedience to His commandments. One of the functions of His servants was to teach obedience, just as Jesus Himself had a ministry of teaching. Emmanuel, 'God with us' (1:23) in humiliation, is now glorified and with His disciples until the close of the age (cf. 13:39, 40, 49; 24:3). He has accomplished His work in His incarnation. He gives us His presence so that we may accomplish ours.

Mark

INTRODUCTION

AUTHORSHIP

The Gospel does not refer to its author. Yet the authorship of Mark, the associate of Peter, has never been seriously questioned. Although Mark (Marcus) was one of the commonest of Latin names, there is little doubt that this Mark is the 'John whose other name is Mark', who is mentioned 8 times in the NT. He was a relative of Barnabas (Col. 4:10) and the statement in 1 Pet. 5:13 may mean that he was converted through Peter.

Evidence for the Markan authorship is abundant in the writings of the church Fathers of the first four centuries. Papias, Justin Martyr, Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, Origen, Eusebius and Jerome all refer to it.

DATE AND PLACE OF WRITING

In fixing the date of the Second Gospel, opinion differs widely within the limits of the 35 years from AD 40 to 75. But it is now almost universally agreed that Mark's Gospel is the earliest of the four. On the one hand, the statement of Irenaeus that Mark composed his Gospel 'after the departure (exodos) of Peter and Paul' would indicate a date not earlier than AD 68, assuming that 'departure' here means death, which it possibly may not; while the discourse of Mark 13, reflecting the situation before the investment of Jerusalem, suggests one not later than AD 70, when Jerusalem was destroyed. Vincent Taylor favours AD 65–67, and thinks 'attempts to date the Gospel earlier are precarious'. On the other hand, the relation of Mark to the other Synoptics, particularly Luke which antedates Acts (Acts 1:1), tends to throw the date back into the fifties. A date somewhere between AD 55 and 60 would represent a position midway between extremes.

Most scholars, following ancient testimony, favour Rome as the place of writing. Peter's greeting in 1 Pet. 5:13 tends to confirm this, if indeed 'Babylon' is a code-word for Rome, as a number of commentators have concluded, such as H. B. Swete, F. W. Beare, A. M. Stibbs. Other suggestions have included Alexandria, Caesarea and Syrian Antioch.

The Gospel was probably written for Gentile readers in general, but particularly for Romans. OT quotations and allusions are relatively few; Aramaic expressions are interpreted (e.g. 5:41); Jewish customs are explained (e.g. 7:3, 11); there are some Latin words. The general tone, depicting the Lord's ceaseless activity and His power over demons, disease and death, is such as would appeal to Roman readers, whose interest was in deeds rather than words. The writer's purpose was doubtless to provide for the needs of the church in Rome, to strengthen its faith in view of impending persecution and to supply material for evangelists.

MARK AND PETER

A tradition which dates from Papias (AD 70–130) says that behind the record of Mark's Gospel there is in fact the preaching and authority of the apostle Peter. The statement of Papias (preserved by Eusebius) is that 'Mark, having become the interpreter of Peter, wrote down accurately all that he remembered of the things said and done by the Lord, but not however in order'. This tradition has been called in question by some of the most recent scholars (e.g. A. M. Farrer), but it is confirmed by other patristic writers and 'is so sound', says Vincent Taylor, 'that if we did not possess it, we should be compelled to postulate something very much like it' (Gospel According to St. Mark, 1952, Preface, p. vii). This does not mean that Mark was little more than a scribe or amanuensis, or that he did not make use of material from other sources, including his own reminiscences; for it is evident that the author, though not an apostle, was nevertheless very close to the events he narrates, and there are all the marks of originality in his record. His order or arrangement of the material is evidently criticized in the Papias tradition; and it appears from the Gospel itself that in some places this is homiletical rather than chronological; although C. H. Dodd goes so far as to say that 'there is good reason to believe that in broad lines the Marcan order does represent a genuine succession of events, within which movement and development can be traced' (C. E. B. Cranfield, St. Mark, CGT, p. 18, quoting C. H. Dodd, ExpT, XLIII, 1932, pp. 396–400).

The internal evidence for the influence of Peter is equally clear:

The Gospel begins at the point where Peter became a disciple, and gives no account of the nativity.

The Galilaean ministry is prominent, centring particularly on the district around Capernaum, Peter's home.

The vividness of the narrative suggests the first-hand acquaintance of an eyewitness.

Details such as the benediction at Caesarea Philippi and the walking on the water, which tend to present Peter in a favourable light, are omitted; while others less favourable, such as the denial, are related with exceptional fullness.

SOURCES

In view of the established priority of Mark, inquiries into the sources which lie behind this Gospel have not been nearly so successful as in the case of Matthew and Luke. In regard to the oral tradition, much work has been done in the last 50 years in the field of form-criticism, of which Martin Dibelius is one of the originators. Form-criticism postulates the existence, prior to any written Gospel, of comparatively small tradition cycles (mostly oral, though some may have been written and be such as Luke's preface mentions). The nomenclature for these cycles differs with various critics. B. S. Easton divides the material into Sayings-groups, Parables, Dialogues, Miracle Narratives and Passion Narratives. Vincent Taylor distinguishes Pronouncement Stories, Miracle Stories and Stories about Jesus. The very diversity of these analyses points to the danger that lies within them, namely that the isolation of these groups must be purely subjective, since there is no external check such as textual criticism supplies. If we are to explore behind the documents, any plausible hypothesis may be put forward. On the other hand, there is value in the claim of the form-critics that the gospel was 'preaching' before it was a written record. Much of the material tended in the course of time to assume well-defined forms for mnemonic and catechetical purposes, and there may be traces of this in Mark's topical grouping.

This oral tradition is largely Semitic in its colouring and atmosphere. The presence of a quite considerable Aramaic element in Mark's Greek indicates this, though it is probably insufficient to justify the conclusion, strongly maintained by C. C. Torrey and others, that the Gospel is a translation from an Aramaic original. What is of importance is that this fact undoubtedly enhances the historical value of the record, inasmuch as Mark, though Gentile in his sympathies, nevertheless stood very near to the original Jewish Christian tradition.

In regard to documentary sources, the main question is whether Mark knew of and used the elusive document known as Q. In the opinion of B. H. Streeter, it almost certainly antedated Mark, and some consider there are traces of it in Mark's Gospel. Beyond this vague possibility, however, nothing more can be said. Attempts have been made to show the existence of an earlier edition or draft behind our Gospel, known as 'Ur-Markus', or Original Mark, in order to account for some of the alleged phenomena, such as 'doublets', 'extracts' from a sayings-source, and the apparent use made of Mark by Luke; but these may be dismissed as at best hypothetical and highly subjective.

Summarizing, we may say that the principal source of this Gospel is the preaching and teaching of Peter, whose sermon at Caesarea (Acts 10:34–43) is practically a résumé of it. This was supplemented by other oral tradition of a general kind and by Mark's own reminiscences, together with perhaps some documentary material.

HISTORICAL RELIABILITY

More recently there has been a change of emphasis in NT investigations, and scholarship has become less occupied with documentary and historical problems and has devoted more attention to theological and religious matters. We are warned against treating the Gospels as biographies, and it is pointed out that the purpose of the Evangelist is not biographical but theological. The material handled by Mark 'bears all the signs of having been community tradition and cannot therefore be derived directly from St Peter or any other eyewitness', and Mark's 'understanding of Christ was for the most part simply that of the church to which he belonged, and he was not conscious of doing anything more than commit the "gospel" of that church to writing' (so D. E. Nineham). This, of course, at once calls in question the Papias tradition. The most extreme form of this scepticism is that represented by Rudolf Bultmann, whose contention is that the Gospel narratives, even of such historical events as the incarnation, resurrection and ascension, contain a mythological element unacceptable to the modern mind, and therefore need to be 'demythologized'.

Now it is vital to Christian faith that its foundations rest not upon any myth, philosophy or teaching, however lofty, but upon these mighty acts of God in history, and to call them in question 'is in our view, whether it proves attractive to modern man or not, an example of heteron euangelion ho ouk estin allo' (a different gospel which is not another: Gal. 1:6, 7) (C. E. B. Cranfield). It is of importance to us to know, not merely what Jesus had come to mean to Christian faith in the closing decades of the 1st century, but what He actually was and said and did historically. The Gospels are, indeed, not biographies and should not be read as such; if they purported to be, they would be fragmentary and ill-proportioned. But this is not to say, with Nineham, that if the modern reader approaches them without adequate knowledge of their origins and consequent character, positive misunderstanding is likely to result. In that case many generations of believers, who were unfortunate enough to be born too soon, have already been terribly misled. One is tempted to observe that the ultimate expert in these matters is not the theologian or scholar but the saint.

The Gospels are a revelation of the Person and teaching and work of Christ, as far as these things affect our life and godliness, and there is good reason to believe, as we have already seen, 'that in Mark we have an authority of first rank for our knowledge of the Story of Jesus'; this Gospel 'sets at the centre the personality of Jesus Himself and His redemptive work for men' (Vincent Taylor).

THEOLOGY

The Person of Christ

It has frequently been said that Mark's presentation of the Person of Christ is that of the Servant of God (cf. Is. 52:13 – 53:12), while, correspondingly, Matthew presents the King, Luke the Man and John the Son of God. Several features suggest this, such as the absence of genealogy and the predominance of deeds over teaching. The title 'Son of man', which occurs 14 times, is in most cases (e.g. 8:31; 9:9, 12, 31; 10:33, 45; 14:21, 41) to be interpreted in terms of this conception. Nevertheless, as Mark asserts in his very first verse, the lowly Servant is also beyond all doubt the Son of God, whose ministry was authenticated by mighty works. The divine attestation of this at the baptism and the transfiguration (1:11; 9:7) is unequivocal. Vincent Taylor considers this the most fundamental element in Mark's Christology, which, he says, 'is a high Christology, as high as any in the New Testament, not excluding that of John'.

The Messiahship of Jesus is seen in Mark's Gospel to be in the nature of a carefully guarded secret, at least until the confession of Peter (8:30). This was doubtless to avoid the peril of the popular national and materialistic conceptions with which the expectations of the Jews invested the title, and to secure for it an ethical as well as an apocalyptic content. The term 'Christ' occurs only 7 times, and in no instance does Jesus use it of Himself.

The work of Christ

The two metaphors of 10:45 and 14:24 indicate the two main lines of teaching. Our Lord's life, laid down sacrificially, is 'a ransom for many' and the 'blood of the covenant'. The former effects deliverance from sin and judgment, while the latter provides covenant relationship and fellowship between God and men. This is not to say that in Mark's Gospel these conceptions are worked out into anything like a developed doctrine. Still less is there any justification for thinking that the ransom saying is an indication of Pauline influence. 'If we find the same thought in Paul', says James Denney, 'we shall not say that the evangelist has Paulinized, but that St Paul has sat at the feet of Jesus.' All the Synoptists mention the three occasions when Jesus made deliberate attempts to initiate the disciples into His approaching passion; but Mark especially notes the varying attitude of the disciples (8:31f.; 9:31f.; 10:32).

Eschatology

The eschatology of the Gospel is contained chiefly in two passages, 8:38 – 9:1 and 13:1–37, where Jesus seems to have had in view two widely separated events, the destruction of Jerusalem in AD 70 and His personal return in glory. Nevertheless it has also to be said that Mark's view of the kingdom of God is predominantly eschatological. The primary ideas in this conception are, first, of the kingly rule or sovereignty of God, and then of a realm or community which may be entered (9:47; 10:23). Sayings of the latter kind may carry a future meaning as well, but in others, such as 14:25 and 15:43, the reference to a future consummation is unmistakable.

Affinities with Pauline teaching

Reference has been made above to the suggestion that Mark was subject to Pauline influence. This has been strongly debated for many years. An examination of the vocabulary and ideas of this Gospel undoubtedly betrays much that is common to Mark and Paul, but it could with equal truth be claimed that such common ground belongs in fact to early Christianity as a whole. And it still remains that many of the distinctively Pauline words and doctrinal concepts, such as righteousness, justification by faith, union with Christ, life in the Spirit, and others are entirely absent from Mark. The most we are entitled to say is that Mark lived and wrote in a Roman and Pauline environment, and may have been acquainted with some of the earlier Epistles. But, as Vincent Taylor says, 'he has neither recast nor obscured the historic tradition. His Jesus is the Jesus of Galilee.'

COMMENTARY

1:1–13 THE PREPARATION

1:1–8 John the Baptist

1 The opening verse is probably intended by Mark as a title to the whole book. The gospel, however, is not the book itself but its contents, 'the good news about Jesus Christ'. It is possible to treat vv. 2, 3 as a parenthesis, thus connecting v. 1 directly with v. 4: 'The beginning of the good news about Jesus Christ the Son of God . . . was John who baptized in the desert . . .' This is attractive, and brings out the suggestion that good news of the Messiah's coming began in a religious revival, not, as was commonly expected, in a political upheaval. It tends, however, to subordinate the importance of the OT quotation; and the RSV arrangement, which places a full stop at the end of v. 1, leaving it as the title, is to be preferred.

2, 3 In Isaiah the prophet; the quotation is actually a composite one, v. 2b embodying the LXX of Ex. 23:20 and the Hebrew of Mal. 3:1, while v. 3 is substantially from Is. 40:3. The important phrase is in the wilderness (v. 3), which is taken up in v. 4. Mark may have named Isaiah as the author of this, at the same time including the previous quotation for its obvious suitability—unless v. 2a (as in 9:13; 14:21) refers back to v. 1—for Isaiah is the prophet of good tidings (see Is. 40:9; 52:7; 61:1). Both prophecies are introduced to show the nature of John the Baptist's mission, as a preparation for the coming of the Messiah. Both speak in their original setting of a drawing near of God to His people, yet they are here significantly applied to Jesus Christ. 4 The quality and influence of John's preparatory ministry are further indicated. It was a preparation of the hearts of men, and notable for its moral power; a baptism of repentance with a view to the forgiveness of sins. The Greek word for repentance (metanoia) originally denoted change of mind, but in the NT it assumes the deeper meaning of a deliberate coming to one's senses, resulting in a change of conduct. This aspect of John's ministry is more fully described in Lk. 3:1–20 (see commentary in loc.). 5 The whole province of Judea was affected; Jesus Himself came from Galilee (v. 9), but that Judea should be so deeply stirred was a measure of the power of John's mission. The confession of sins was probably oral, an open avowal, after which the one who confessed was plunged (baptizō, the intensive form of baptō) in the waters of the river, as a representative action. 6 John's clothing and food indicated frugality and separation from worldly interests. His dress was characteristic of the prophets, and particularly of Elijah (2 Ki. 1:8) whom John resembled in other respects also (see on Mk. 9:11ff.). Locusts, though tolerated as food only by the poorest, are said still to be eaten roasted or salted by the bedouin. 7 The testimony of John is centred in the One who is mightier than I who was at hand, and 8 whose baptism should be not with water but with the Holy Spirit. That this would characterize the days of the Messiah was also in accord with OT teaching (Is. 44:3; Ezk. 36:26f.; Joel 2:28f.).

1:9–11 The baptism of Jesus

9 Jesus appeared at Jordan simply as one of the many who came to John's baptism. Matthew records the surprise and diffidence of John (Mt. 3:14, 15), but upon our Lord's insistence John took the sacred body and immersed it in the waters. It is noteworthy that Jesus made no confession of sin, and although He received John's baptism, the early church remained unshaken in its faith in His absolute sinlessness. For Him, the baptism was, first, the fulfilment of all righteousness; secondly, an act of identification, in which He was 'numbered with the transgressors' (Is. 53:12); thirdly, an act of dedication to His ministry. In the record of these opening events, we are provided, as it were, with 'essential clues to the understanding of what follows'. Mark records our Lord's 'submission to the baptism of repentance, the messianic gift of the Spirit, and the declaration of divine Sonship, thus putting the reader in the way to know the secret of his person—the Servant, the Messiah, the Son of God' (Cranfield).

10 Immediately; the first instance of Mark's favourite adverb, occurring 41 times. As Jesus emerged, a threefold experience set Him apart from all others and marked Him as having a unique relation to God. First, He saw the heavens opened, i.e. being rent asunder (Gk. schizomenous, present participle), signifying open vision of heavenly things (cf. Jn. 3:12, 13; Is. 64:1). Secondly, He saw the Spirit descending upon him like a dove. That the dove was something visible, and more than a poetic simile of the gentleness of the phenomenon, is clear from Luke's addition, 'in bodily form' (Lk. 3:22). An interesting suggestion connects this with Gn. 1:2, where the Spirit is seen hovering like a bird over the primaeval waters. 11 Thirdly, the voice of the Father was heard from heaven, bearing witness to His Son; so also in Mk. 9:7 and Jn. 12:28. The words are reminiscent of Ps. 2:7 and Is. 42:1. There is thus a clear revelation of the Trinity here, but the final focus is on the Son; for, although God is a Trinity, man's first encounter with Him must always be in Christ.

1:12, 13 The temptation of Jesus

Information about this must have come from Jesus Himself. Mark's account is exceptionally brief, which is the more remarkable in view of his evident interest in the victory of the Son of God over the powers of darkness. 12 All the Synoptists agree in emphasizing the close proximity of the baptism and the temptation. Edersheim (Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, 1, p. 281) suggests that in the former, Jesus was active, in the latter, passive, driven by the Spirit; in the former case He fulfilled righteousness, in the latter His righteousness was tried. Before ever He entered upon a ministry whose purpose was to challenge and ultimately to break the power of Satan in others, that enemy had to be met and defeated on the battle-ground of His own life (cf. Heb. 2:18; 4:15). 13 The loneliness of the struggle is reflected in the words he was with the wild beasts (a detail noted only by Mark), and its severity in the fact that the angels ministered to him (cf. Lk. 22:43). No merely psychological explanation is adequate. The encounter was real; Satan was real, seeking to divert his opponent from the path of the obedient Servant to some less costly way; the angels were real. In a lesser degree, every disciple, called to some high task, must expect similar conflict and may enjoy similar victory. Mark considers it unnecessary to say who was the victor.

1:14 – 9:50 THE GALILAEAN MINISTRY

1:14–20 The call of the first disciples

1:14, 15 The ministry of Jesus. According to Mark this began after John was arrested, which implies that there was an interval between Jesus' baptism and His Galilaean ministry. But what Jesus did in that period Mark does not say. The Gospel of John, in this as in other matters, supplements the Synoptic record (see Jn. 1:19 – 4:42).

14 Arrested; this word, which means simply 'handed over', seems to be used by Mark, and indeed elsewhere, with the underlying suggestion that the purpose of God is being fulfilled in what is done (cf. 9:31; 14:18; Rom. 8:32). 15 Jesus began to proclaim the good news from God, that the time of waiting was at an end and the long-expected kingdom of God was at hand. In view of its advent, men everywhere were required to repent, and believe. These are the two key words of the Gospel on its human side. The kingdom of God is the rule of God in the hearts of men and in society; clearly it is intimately connected with the actual Person and presence of Jesus; He is Himself the kingdom, so that we are able to say that it has both come and is still to come, since Jesus has already come and yet is to come again.

1:16–20 The call of Peter, Andrew, James and John. The choosing and training of the Twelve, who were to share with Him the proclamation of the good news and to continue it after His ascension, was a matter of vital importance in the ministry of Jesus. The two pairs of brothers here had all met Jesus before (see Jn. 1:35–42), and had believed that He was the Messiah. Now He calls them to the further step of leaving their fishing in order to follow Him wholly. Their previous work as fishermen would have provided good training in the patient endurance necessary for the work of winning men for Christ. Nevertheless more is needed, and if they will now follow Him, He declares I will make you become fishers of men. Christ calls men, not so much for what they are, as for what He is able to make them become, if they are prepared to obey Him.

1:21–45 The first sabbath in Capernaum

This compact account of the day when Jesus first came forward in Peter's own town (cf. Mt. 9:1) and ministered in his home would be related with especial personal interest by Peter. It bears all the marks of personal reminiscence and of the evidence of an eyewitness. A parallel account is given in Lk. 4:31–44.

1:21–28 The cure of a demoniac in the synagogue. Though but little of the actual teaching of Jesus is recorded by Mark, much emphasis is placed upon His teaching ministry (see 2:13; 4:1; 6:2, 6, 34). 21 Synagogue is strictly a Greek word meaning 'a bringing together' or 'an assembly'; but it was often used, as here, for the building in which the congregation met. Of the origin of synagogues nothing is known. The service in them was largely instructional: but they were also courts of justice (Lk. 12:11; 21:12), where punishment could be inflicted (Mt. 10:17). It was the custom for the president of the synagogue (Gk. archisynagōgos) to arrange who should read and expound the Scriptures each sabbath, and at this stage of His ministry this provided Jesus with manifold opportunities, for wherever He went He would be invited to teach. Paul was similarly invited later. 22 The authoritative tone of Jesus' teaching contrasted sharply with the utterances of Jewish teachers whose knowledge was entirely derivative and who invariably appealed to tradition or to the sayings of famous rabbis. 23, 24 While Jesus was thus speaking, either His very presence or His utterance, or both, provoked an outburst from a demon-possessed man. Demon-possession is a subject that presents many difficulties to the modern mind, which tends to dismiss it as an outgrown superstition. It is, however, a phenomenon specially associated with the period of our Lord's presence on earth. It is referred to only twice in the OT, and twice in the NT outside the Gospels; and it is clearly distinguished from mental disorders. 'The question whether the spread of a confident certainty of the demons' non-existence has not been their greatest triumph gets tragic urgency from such twentieth-century features as Nazism' (Cranfield). The demons were real, and knew of the Messianic office of Jesus long before the disciples were aware of it, although they were never allowed to proclaim the fact (see v. 34 and Jas. 2:19). Jesus had but lately challenged the prince of evil; little wonder that the subordinate spirits of wickedness realized they had now met their conqueror. 25, 26 The authority of the Saviour's word is now seen not only in the quality of His doctrine but in His power to command; for at His word the unclean spirit, having convulsed the man, came out of him; though, as Luke the physician tells us (Lk. 4:35), it had 'done him no harm'. Jesus never touched a demoniac in order to deliver him; the spoken word sufficed. 27 The people watched in awe, and then broke out into a buzz of conversation (cf. RV). 28 Quickly the fame of Jesus spread throughout the region.

1:29–31 Peter's mother-in-law healed. The house of Simon and Andrew became almost a headquarters for Jesus from this point, when He was in Galilee (see 2:1; 3:19; 9:33; 10:10). In Jn. 1:44 we are told that these two brothers belonged to Bethsaida. They may have moved in the meantime. On the other hand there are some who think that this Bethsaida was the fishing quarter of Capernaum. 1 Cor. 9:5 confirms that Peter was married, and that later, possibly, his wife accompanied him in the ministry. To him, this occasion in his own home was unforgettable. The rapidity and completeness of the cure is indicated by the fact that, without any of the exhaustion and debility generally consequent upon such a fever, the restored woman served them at the sabbath meal after the synagogue service.

1:32–34 Healing after sunset. The sabbath ended at sunset; it then became possible to move the sick without infringement of the law. The physically sick are classified separately from the demon-possessed. People began flocking towards the door of the house, and soon a dense crowd was formed. Jesus did not fail them, for the divine compassion and power are always put forth in response to the appeal and acknowledgment of human need. The awareness of these evil spirits concerning the Person of Christ is an example of the truth stated in Jas. 2:19: 'Even the demons believe—and shudder.' There are no atheists in the realms of evil!

1:35–39 Departure to solitude and a tour in Galilee. 35 It was an unexpected development that from the midst of such scenes Jesus should arise a great while before day (lit. 'very much at night') and slip out of the town before others were awake. The story is related from the point of view of those within the house who discovered He was gone, and who at once felt He was discarding valuable opportunities in Capernaum without realizing how widely He was sought after. 36 Simon Peter at once began to lead and with his friends followed him (lit. 'hunted Him down'—a strong word occurring only here in the NT but frequently in LXX, e.g. Ps. 23:6). 38 The determining motives of Jesus' withdrawal were desire for communion with His Father and the need to preach elsewhere. He could not be monopolized in Capernaum. That is why I came out probably refers not to His departure from the town but to His mission from the Father (Lk. 4:43). The RSV rendering unfortunately tends to obscure this.

1:40–45 The cleansing of a leper. The miracles of healing apparently aroused particular excitement, and there was the danger, so common in our own day, that this type of ministry would eclipse the more fundamentally spiritual work of the gospel. So we find no mention of healing in v. 39. This case of a leper, however, evoked the Lord's compassion and was of a type that cannot be explained on any basis of 'suggestion' or 'faith-healing' so called. The leprosy of the Bible varied considerably in malignity, some skin diseases being classed as such.

40 With the leper's If you will should be compared the father's 'if you can' in 9:22. Leprosy is never said to be healed in Scripture, always cleansed. 41 Moved with pity, he stretched out his hand. 'It was owing to His compassion for mankind that He had a hand with which to lay hold' (Plummer). An alternative reading, however, found in many MSS, has 'moved with anger'; this would suggest the strength of His emotion as He confronted the forces of disease, death, sin and Satan in the man. 44 Having first experienced the power of Christ, the man is then able to fulfil the requirements of the law (Lv. 14:2–20). This is the order of Christian experience (Rom. 8:1–4). His ability to do so is a proof to the people. See RSV mg., 'Greek to them'; i.e. either to the priests or to the people in general. The leper was strictly bound to silence. 45 His disobedience necessitated a temporary change in the Lord's sphere of ministry from town to country.

2:1 – 3:6 The beginnings of opposition

2:1–12 The paralytic and forgiveness. This incident is the first of a series in this section, showing the gradually mounting hostility to Jesus which was now appearing among the scribes and Pharisees. 1 The rumour went round Capernaum that Jesus had returned and was at home again. It was almost certainly the home of Peter and Andrew, the one previously mentioned (1:29). Like many Palestinian houses, it would have an outside staircase leading to a flat roof. 2 While Jesus was within, preaching the word (almost a technical term for the 'good news'; cf. 4:14, 33; Acts 8:4; 11:19, etc.) to the crowd who had gathered again, 3 four men arrived carrying their paralysed friend, 4 and with commendable earnestness and resolution to overcome all obstacles mounted the roof and began to break through it. Luke mentions the 'tiles' (Lk. 5:19). Then they lowered the man on his mattress to the feet of Jesus. The plight of some needy souls is such that the sympathetic faith of believing friends is required to bring them to Christ (cf. 5:36; 9:24). Their common task of mercy would also have created an interesting bond between the four friends themselves.

5 When Jesus saw their faith, i.e. the faith of all five, He immediately responded, but in an unexpected way. He by no means taught that every case of affliction results from sin (cf. Jn. 9:2; Lk. 13:1–5), but as the Great Physician He diagnosed this case unerringly. The man's physical condition had a fundamentally spiritual cause. The conclusions of much modern psychotherapy are thus anticipated. Jesus' pronouncement, your sins are forgiven, was not a mere declaration that God had forgiven his sins; it was an authoritative action. Jesus Himself forgave the man, exercising the divine prerogative. That the scribes understood it so is clear from the sequel. His authority to do so is the crucial point of the story. 6, 7 The scribes were right when they asked Who can forgive sins but God alone?; but their question was a challenge to the implied deity of Christ. 8 He answered this first by replying to their thoughts without anything being said; He who knows the hearts of men can pardon their sins. 9, 10 Secondly, He provided a test. The claim to forgive sins could not be substantiated by any visible result; but the power to heal could be demonstrated at once. If therefore He can cause the man to walk, let them know that the Son of man has authority on earth to forgive sins. Son of man is a title used exclusively by our Lord of Himself, and originating probably in Dn. 7:13. Opinions differ widely as to its precise meaning, though most expositors believe it had Messianic significance. At least it seems to convey the idea of the essential and representative humanity of Christ. But that the Son of man has authority on earth to forgive indicates that He had not, by incarnation, been emptied of divine prerogatives. 12 The forgiven man was then enabled to arise and walk, for divine forgiveness is always accompanied by power to discontinue sinning, i.e. to 'walk in newness of life' (Rom. 6:4).

2:13–17 The call of Levi. The identification of Levi with Matthew the publican (Mt. 9:9) and author of the First Gospel is practically beyond doubt, though none of the four lists of apostles gives the name Levi. His renunciation of a lucrative calling was greater than that of the fishermen, since it was final, whereas they could on occasion return to their fishing. His call illustrates the grace of the Lord in choosing a despised tax collector to be an apostle, but also the wisdom of the Lord, for Levi probably knew both Aramaic and Greek; and 'the only thing he took with him out of his old occupation was his pen and ink' (Alexander Whyte).

13 That Jesus went out again beside the sea suggests a recurrence of the circumstances of 1:16 in which yet another is called to join the apostolic company. 14 Levi was an official in the service of the tetrarch of Galilee, Herod Antipas. 15 His first missionary act was to entertain Jesus in his house and invite his colleagues and acquaintances to meet Him. Lk. 5:29 confirms that the house was in fact Levi's, and there is the suggestion that it was spacious by comparison with the humbler home of Peter. The meal table is regarded in the East as the place of most intimate fellowship. 16 The next ground of offence therefore to the Pharisees is the close association of Jesus with moral and social reprobates in this way. This time they voice their objection to the disciples. 17 Jesus' answer reveals the irreconcilable difference between Himself and them, and precipitates the conflict which is eventually to end in His death. The message of Christ is essentially redemptive, a message to the masses of the unwashed, ignorant and erring. He is the physician to the sin-sick soul, and He looks for the response of confidence and committal (Rom. 3:21–24).

2:18–22 The question of fasting. Only one fast day, the great Day of Atonement, was prescribed by the law (Lv. 23:27–29; Acts 27:9). Others, however, had been added to such an extent that fasting had become a feature of religious life in our Lord's day (cf. Lk. 18:12). 18 While the disciples of John were actually engaged in such a fast, along with the Pharisees, and in answer to this third objection Jesus points out the incongruity of such behaviour for His disciples. 19 His companionship with the disciples constitutes a situation as joyous as a wedding feast. Wedding guests, or groomsmen; NEB 'the bridegroom's friends'. 20 Taken away from them; i.e. violently (Gk. aparthē). This word is found only here and in the parallel passages in the NT, but the simple verb occurs twice, significantly, in the LXX of Is. 53:8. That there is a reference here to a violent death can scarcely be doubted, and we thus have the first hint of the passion from the lips of Jesus Himself. 21, 22 To impose upon this new situation of the gospel the religious observances of the old Judaism is as incongruous as applying a patch of new-made cloth to an old garment, or pouring unfermented wine into hard, inelastic wineskins, and as disastrous in its results. This was precisely the mistake of the later Judaistic teachers, against whom Paul's polemic is directed in the Epistle to the Galatians (e.g. Gal. 4:9, 10). On the subject of fasting, it may be said that Jesus sanctions it without enjoining it (Mt. 6:16–18). The essence of it is self-discipline; not the formalism of the ascetic or monastic, but the voluntary subordination of the physical to the spiritual (cf. 1 Cor. 9:24–27).

2:23 - 3:6 Jesus' attitude to the sabbath. Two incidents illustrate the fourth objection, one which is frequently levelled against Jesus in the Gospels (cf. Lk. 13:10–17; 14:1–6; Jn. 5:1–18; 9:1–41), namely His attitude to the sabbath. The disciples walking through the cornfields were doing what was quite allowable on any other day (Dt. 23:25); but the Pharisees classed it as reaping, which was forbidden on the sabbath (Ex. 34:21). In answer, Jesus quoted as a precedent no less a person than David, whose greatness was acknowledged. The fourth commandment (like all the rest) was given, not for the sake of imposing religious restrictions, but to meet man's physical and spiritual need.

26 When Abiathar was high priest; this is thought by most commentators to be incorrect and a possible later addition, since the high priest in question was actually Ahimelech, father of Abiathar (1 Sa. 21:1ff.). But textual evidence is not decisive against the reading 'Abiathar'. The OT context suggests that Abiathar was one of a considerable number who exercised priestly functions at Nob during Ahimelech's high-priesthood, and most of whom were slain by command of Saul very shortly after the occasion here referred to. 27 And he said to them rather indicates the conclusion of the cornfield incident and that Mark has here appended the saying of Jesus as generally relevant. The sabbath has been given for man's benefit. Therefore the Representative Man may decide how it can best be used. Under His influence it has been changed to another day of the week and made available to all nations. We disregard it to our loss and peril.

3:1–6 The second incident introduces a positive note. The sabbath should be devoted not merely to rest and passive inactivity, but to works of love and mercy (cf. Jn. 5:16, 17). 4 To save life or to kill has a double significance. The rabbis themselves admitted that relief might be given to a sufferer when life was in danger, and being in danger was interpreted liberally. On the other hand they were using the sabbath with murderous intentions, plotting to kill Jesus. Which was more appropriate to the day, His healing or their plotting? In this case there was, in fact, no danger to life. Could the man therefore not have waited until the next day? It has been suggested that our Lord felt a sense of urgency in His confrontation of the forces of evil of which sickness was but one manifestation. 'Evil works seven days a week. And the warfare against Satan must go on on the sabbath as well as on the other six days' (T. W. Manson). The healing of this man provoked the final cleavage between Jesus and the religious authorities; it was the parting of the ways. 5 Hardness of heart is rather 'blindness' (Gk. pōrōsis) of heart (cf. Rom. 11:25; Eph. 4:18); NEB 'obstinate stupidity'. 6 So bitter was the opposition aroused that the Pharisees, ardent nationalists, were ready to join forces with their deadliest opponents, the Herodians (who were quislings of a kind), in a common effort to destroy Jesus.

3:7–19 The Twelve appointed

7 Perhaps because of the imminent danger, Jesus with His disciples withdrew to the Sea of Galilee. He never adventured Himself into danger unnecessarily, and in the interests of His ministry such precaution was right and proper. 8 A graphic and lifelike description follows of the crowds who were attracted by His works of healing. Two multitudes seem to be indicated, one from Galilee and the other from remoter places. Almost the whole of Palestine is represented in the latter group, with the exception of Samaria; which shows how widespread the fame and influence of Jesus had by this time become. 9 The purpose of the boat was probably the purely practical one of enabling Him to cope with the situation. He did not apparently use it on this occasion as a pulpit; but cf. 4:1. 10 The crowds almost fell upon Him (Gk. epipiptein) in their eagerness to touch Him, especially all who had diseases (Gk. mastigas, lit. 'scourges'). The word (which occurs also in 5:29, 34; Lk. 7:21; Heb. 11:36) suggests distressing bodily diseases inflicted as a divine chastisement. It is a wholesome thing when such affliction drives people to Christ.

11, 12 Reference is again made to works of exorcism, and for the third time we learn that the demons who recognized Jesus were forbidden to make Him known (cf. 1:24, 25, 34). Great happenings draw great multitudes, and where human need is truly met there is no lack of seeking souls. Moreover, Jesus was never unequal to the increasing demands made upon Him.

13 From the lake Jesus went into the surrounding hill country, where Luke tells us (Lk. 6:12) He spent the whole night praying in preparation for the momentous task of choosing the Twelve. This was the first step in organizing the church, and from this point the teaching and training of these men became a matter of paramount importance to our Lord. They were chosen in absolute sovereignty; Jesus called to him those whom he desired, i.e. according to His pleasure, not theirs. But in free will they responded and came to him. 14 The 'Twelve' quickly became an official designation, used sometimes even when not all were present (1 Cor. 15:5). Some important MSS insert the words 'whom he named apostles'; but they may be an interpolation from Lk. 6:13. Their appointment involved communion and companionship, to be with him; commission, to be sent out to preach; 15 and delegated authority, to cast out demons. 16–19 The list is given four times in the NT (cf. Mt. 10:2–4; Lk. 6:14–16; Acts 1:13) with slight variations in the order. But three groups of four are distinguishable, headed in each list by Peter, Philip and James the son of Alphaeus. Judas Iscariot is always last. Five of the twelve (Peter, Andrew, James, John, Matthew) have appeared in the narrative before (1:16, 19; 2:14). 17 The origin of the name Boanerges is obscure, most explanations being in the nature of attempts to account for Mark's phrase sons of thunder, which at least has the merit of appropriateness in the light of Lk. 9:54. 18 Philip's first contact with Jesus is recorded in Jn. 1:43. Bartholomew is a patronymic (i.e. son of Talmai, a name which occurs in 2 Sa. 3:3). He has anciently been identified with Nathanael (Jn. 1:45), for John never mentions Bartholomew, and the Synoptists never mention Nathanael. But the identification, though probable, is not certain. All that we know of Thomas comes from the Fourth Gospel. James the son of Alphaeus is so called to distinguish him from James the son of Zebedee; he may be the same as 'James the younger' (Mk. 15:40). Nothing is known of Thaddaeus, for whom Luke substitutes the name of another Judas (Lk. 6:16; Acts 1:13); the two may, of course, be the same. Simon the Cananaean is derived probably from the Hebrew qanna, 'jealous' or 'zealous', and is correctly interpreted in Lk. 6:15 as 'the Zealot'; NEB 'a member of the Zealot party'. 19 The title Iscariot (lit. 'man of Kerioth', a place whose site is uncertain) applied to Judas indicates that he was the only apostle who was not a Galilaean.

Here were twelve typical men, no two alike, and all imperfect; yet, with one exception, there was a place for each in the fellowship of Christ.

3:20–35 Charges against Jesus

20 The lake and the mountain are left, and Jesus with His disciples enters 'a house' (NEB). RSV he went home is perhaps too strong. It may have been the house of Simon and Andrew in Capernaum once again. Here opposition arises from two quite different sources: from His family (vv. 20, 21, 31–35) and from the scribes (vv. 22–30). 21 It is evident that we are to understand his friends (lit. 'those belonging to Him') to be the same as the relatives mentioned in v. 31. So that vv. 22–30 represent an interlude going on in the house, while His family were outside seeking contact with Him. This at least is a more natural and satisfactory explanation than that the material has been editorially assembled in this way by the Evangelist. The opposition from the family was in the nature of well-intentioned, but misguided, remonstrance. He is beside himself means not that He has lost His reason, but that He is suffering, as we would say, from religious mania and has become eccentric. A similar charge was more than once brought against Paul (Acts 26:24; 2 Cor. 5:13), and is often made against an earnest Christian.

22 The opposition from the scribes was more serious and resulted from bitter hatred and jealousy. They were attributing the work of the Holy Spirit to Satan. Beelzebul. The name is of uncertain spelling and derivation; it may originate in 2 Ki. 1:2, 16, where Baal-zebub means 'Lord of flies'. It is no less uncertain whether the name is another name for Satan or represents an inferior evil power. The charge seems to have been made behind the Saviour's back, for 23 he called them to him in order to answer them. In reply, He showed first the sheer absurdity of such an allegation, then warned of the awful consequences which would result. There is nothing so illogical as unbelief. 24–26 The gradation is noteworthy: kingdom, house, Satan. The smaller the community the more fatal the division. In an individual, division is a contradiction in terms. 29 The saying about blasphemy against the Holy Spirit is one of the most challenging utterances of Jesus. Wrongly understood it has caused untold distress. On the other hand it must not be explained away. The unpardonable sin is not an isolated act or utterance, but an attitude of defiant and deliberate rejection of light, a preference of darkness to light (Jn. 3:19). Jesus did not say the scribes had committed it; only that they came perilously near; guilty of an eternal sin would perhaps be better rendered 'involved' in it, or 'liable' for it (Gk. enochos). Such an attitude of wilful unbelief might rapidly harden into a condition where repentance, and therefore forgiveness, became impossible. But 'Of all religious teachers no one was less inclined than He to minimize possibilities of forgiveness and amendment and the boundless resources of divine grace' (Vincent Taylor). The very fact that anyone is overcome by the fear that he may have committed this sin is itself, surely, clear evidence that he has not committed it.

31 On the subject of his brothers the literature is extensive, but three main views have been held. They were either Jesus' own brothers by blood; or half-brothers, the sons of Joseph by a former wife; or cousins, the sons of Mary the wife of Clopas and sister of the Virgin Mary. The second and third alternatives have been argued by some, principally Roman Catholic writers, in the interests of the dogma of the perpetual virginity of Mary. The available evidence is unfortunately not conclusive; but the fact that Jesus had His own brothers is the most natural inference from such passages as Mt. 1:25 and Lk. 2:7. From a doctrinal point of view it would, moreover, emphasize the reality and completeness of the incarnation. Mary the mother of our Lord appears only here in Mark, and the absence of any reference to Joseph suggests that he was dead. 33–35 The answer given by Jesus, when at last the message from without reached Him, does not in any way depreciate the sacredness of family relationships, but asserts that the ties which bind the spiritual family of God are even deeper and dearer, and are based upon obedience to the will of God. This is, so to speak, the germ truth out of which grew the early church.

4:1–34 Parabolic teaching

This chapter introduces a new departure in the teaching ministry of Jesus, namely His adoption of the parabolic method. The change coincides significantly with a shifting of the principal objective of His teaching from the multitudes to the Twelve, whose training He is now taking in hand. The people are still in view, but they have hitherto been far more attracted by His works than by His words. They came for physical healing, but are as yet unresponsive to His spiritual teaching.

1 Beside the sea once more, therefore, Jesus first secured a measure of detachment by withdrawing into a boat (possibly the same one as in 3:9), and using it as a pulpit from which to address the crowd assembled on the shore facing the sea. 2 The word 'parable' means literally the placing of two things side by side for purposes of comparison; hence, the illustration of truth in the spiritual realm by a story in the earthly or natural realm. This, according to Aristotle, was its meaning in classical Greek; and it is predominantly so in the NT also. There are, however, instances where it seems to represent the equivalent of the Hebrew māšāl, which in fact it frequently translates in the LXX. This was often no more than a wise saying or aphorism. Cf. Lk. 4:23 where 'proverb' (RSV) is the same word; and Mk. 7:14–17. 3 Yet a parable was more than a mere illustration to enlighten. The word Listen (preserved by Mark alone), followed by the repeated injunctions to hear (vv. 9, 23, 24), suggests that parables were designed to provoke serious thought. They were also moral weapons to surprise and stir the conscience. Nathan's parable to David (2 Sa. 12:1–14) may be compared as an OT example of this.

The parable of the sower, recorded by all three Synoptists, reflects the immediate situation in which Jesus found Himself in His preaching, and at the same time enunciates principles which hold good for all time in regard to the preaching of the word. 5 Rocky ground is not ground full of stones, but with rock close to the surface so that there is no depth of soil. Such ground is common in Galilee. 8 The emphasis of the story is on the abundant harvest, despite initial discouragement (cf. Jn. 4:35; Mt. 9:37). Mark alone of the Evangelists preserves this emphasis by using the singular (some seed fell . . .) of the three failures, and the plural (other seeds fell . . .) of the one success (Gk. ho men, v. 4; allo, v. 5; allo, v. 7; alla, v. 8). The seed on the good ground was the most abundant.

10 Before giving the explanation of the parable to the Twelve alone, Jesus makes a further statement about the purpose of parabolic teaching in answer to their question. 11, 12 These verses have for long presented a difficulty to expositors. The OT reference is to Is. 6:9, 10, and on the face of it it seems to suggest that the purpose of parables is twofold, first to reveal the truth to disciples, secondly to conceal it from those outside, as judgment or chastisement upon their blindness (cf. vv. 24, 25). And certainly this receives support from the reference to the secret of the kingdom of God (Gk. mystērion, a word which in the Pauline Epistles has the sense of an 'open secret', made known by revelation, but previously hidden; cf. Eph. 3:3, 4; Col. 1:27). Nevertheless this interpretation has been felt to be so intolerable by some expositors that they have preferred to surrender the verse as an authentic saying of Jesus, regarding it and the explanation which follows as secondary tradition enshrining later Christian beliefs. Other attempted interpretations are that this judgment upon unresponsive hearers is in fact merciful, delivering them from the guilt of rejecting plain truth; or that Mark's compressed style here creates the difficulty, and that the words so that are a loose equivalent for 'in order that the scripture might be fulfilled which says . . .' (cf. Mt. 13:14). NEB adds in parenthesis 'as Scripture says'. Or, more probably, Cranfield: 'God's self-revelation is veiled, in order that men may be left sufficient room in which to make a personal decision. A real turning to God or repentance is made possible by the inward divine enabling of the Holy Spirit, but would be rendered impossible by the external compulsion of a manifestation of the unveiled divine majesty. The revelation is veiled for the sake of man's freedom to believe.' The basic assumption which all expositors seem anxious to secure is certainly right, namely that the ultimate purpose of a parable is to help and not to hinder the apprehension of the truth. But beyond this we may say that it belongs to the very nature of revelation that the capacity to receive it depends upon the prior surrender and obedience of the will. 'Come and see' (Jn. 1:39) is the order of Christian experience; moral conquest must come before intellectual enlightenment. The disciples had so surrendered to the sovereignty of Jesus and could therefore know. If temporarily parables concealed the truths of the kingdom from the outsider on the intellectual plane, it was only in order that moral conviction might first be secured with a view to intellectual enlightenment afterwards. There are many who through intellectual pride would like to have it otherwise, but it cannot be (cf. Mt. 11:25ff.).

13 So far from being a specimen of the work of the early church exhibiting its excessive tendency towards allegorization, this interpretation is clearly given as an example, to provide canons of interpretation for all parables, much after the manner of a teacher who, when teaching something new, works an example or two on the blackboard. The first part of this verse should probably be taken as a statement, and the distinction preserved between the two words understand which are different in Greek. 'You do not understand (ouk oidate) this parable; how then will you come to know (gnōsesthe) all My parables?' 14 The kingdom is to be propagated by the sowing of the word. This conception is fundamental to all evangelism; the task of the evangelist is not merely by means of cogent argument or persuasive eloquence to induce others to think in a certain way, but to sow living seed of the word of God in the soil of human hearts. The germ of the new life is in the word, and without its implantation no-one ever became a Christian (1 Pet. 1:23). 15–20 There are things that hinder the reception of the word: hard-hearted indifference (v. 15), lack of spiritual depth (vv. 16f.), preoccupation with the cares and riches of the world (vv. 18f.). But where the word is heard, understood and believed, the harvest is sure (v. 20). 15 The reference to Satan is strong evidence that Jesus taught the existence of a personal power of evil, for He could easily have explained the birds in v. 4 as impersonal temptations. 16 There is no confusion between the seed and the soil. We commonly speak of land being sown, i.e. planted with seed, which is the sense here.

21–25 Two groups of sayings, each introduced by the formula And he said to them, further explain the parabolic method with special reference to the moral responsibility of the hearers. The statement about the lamp confirms the view of v. 12 taken above, that the ultimate purpose of a parable is to enlighten and reveal, even if it temporarily conceals. A bushel is a vessel for measuring seed. The second group teaches that response to the truth is the condition of receiving further truth. Where there is no response, even the power to respond is diminished; like the atrophy of a physical faculty through disuse.

26–29 The parable of the seed growing secretly is the only one peculiar to Mark. Its principal emphasis is upon the fact that the word of God will do its own work in human hearts if given the opportunity in right conditions, in exactly the same way as the earth produces of itself (Gk. automatē) (cf. Is. 55:10f.; 1 Cor. 3:6f.). Outside instrumentality is limited to two things, first sowing and finally reaping (Jn. 4:35, 38). Between these initial and final activities it is a matter of confidence in the vitality of the seed and in the fruitfulness of the interaction between seed and soil.

30–32 The expression used to introduce the third parable of the kingdom, that of the mustard seed, is unique: what parable shall we use for it?, lit. 'in what parable are we to place it?', as though the parable were a kind of wrapper to contain the truth. This parable may be viewed in one of two ways, as showing either the expansion of the kingdom from insignificant beginnings, or (as Campbell Morgan held) its development into abnormal proportions so that the fowls of the air (spirits of wickedness) find lodgment in it. The latter view has the merit of a certain consistency in the use of the symbols (e.g. the birds represent evil both here and in the parable of the sower, and it may be said that history supports it. For it was when, under the Emperor Constantine, the church gained an imperial position and patronage it was never intended to have, that it became corrupt). On the other hand the traditional view is the simpler, and accords better with the general atmosphere of the chapter which is one of optimism and confidence in the ultimate prosperity of the word of God.

33, 34 A statement by the Evangelist finally summarizes the purpose and principle of parabolic teaching. The kingdom of God was so different from prevalent notions about it, and the parables were well fitted to dislodge these popular ideas where direct statements would not have been received. The nature of the kingdom was declared to the people by comparison rather than by definition. But to His private disciples privately (Gk. kat' idian de tois idiois mathētais) Jesus gave fuller instruction.

4:35 – 5:43 Mighty works

The series of parables is followed by a series of miracles, as though to suggest that the works of Jesus vindicate His words. What He does confirms what He says. A similar arrangement is found in Matthew, where these and earlier miracles are recorded as following the Sermon on the Mount.

4:35–41 The stilling of the storm. 35 Jesus decided to cross the lake from west to east. This may have been either to disperse the crowd or to find a new sphere for His ministry, or perhaps for both reasons. 36 Just as he was refers back to v. 1. After some hours of teaching the multitude and the disciples, He was too weary even to help in sending the people away. 37 The sudden storm is characteristic of the region round the Sea of Galilee, where the movement of the air currents causes the wind to sweep with tremendous violence down the narrow gorges that descend to the shore from the surrounding hills. 38 It is Mark alone who preserves the vivid detail that he was in the stern, asleep on the cushion. The cushion was probably a rower's wooden or leather seat used as a head-rest. There is a note of resentment and reproach in the disciples' question paraphrased by Moffatt, 'Teacher, are we to drown, for all you care?' 39 Jesus therefore awoke, and said to the sea, Peace! Be still! (lit. 'be silent, be muzzled'; the latter word is the same as in 1:25).

The story illustrates, first, the divine authority of Jesus over the forces of nature; He is superior even to a storm which caused experienced fishermen to panic with alarm. It also shows His true and real humanity, for He had evidently toiled up to and almost beyond the limit of His strength. On no other occasion is His sleeping mentioned; but He needed sleep, just as He needed food. Again, some have thought the story was intended to bring a message of peace to a storm-tossed church in a time of persecution. The disciples were in the path of obedience, but even obedience brings no immunity from trouble. Dangers beset the church even when engaged in carrying out the Master's commands. Nevertheless there is no ground for cowardice or craven fear. They should have known enough of Him by now to enable them to trust and believe that neither could the Messiah perish in a storm, nor would He allow them to perish because they had obeyed Him. 'Have you no faith even now?' (NEB).

5:1–20 The Gerasene demoniac. 1 It is not clear to what part of the opposite shore Jesus crossed. The country of the Gerasenes represents the best reading, though 'Gadarenes' is found in Matthew. At only one point on the E shore of the lake is there a steep bank (v. 13), and there are no rock-hewn tombs in the vicinity of this; but tombs built on the ground (cf. Lk. 11:44) may possibly be meant.

The fullness of detail in this account illustrates Mark's particular interest in this type of miracle of exorcism, which exhibits the power and authority of the Lord Jesus Christ even in the spirit realm. It has also been pointed out how the narrative seems to be arranged in scenes in which the centre of interest shifts from the man (vv. 1–10) to the herd of swine (vv. 11–13), then to the townspeople (vv. 14–17) and back again to the man (vv. 18–20), almost like a little drama in four acts. 4 First the demoniac is described as to his strength. Man had tried to tame him as a beast is tamed, but the external remedies of coercion and restraint had failed. 5 His life was one of misery to himself, for he knew neither rest nor sleep, but only ceaseless outcry and self-laceration. 6 His recognition of Jesus and acknowledgment of His authority seem to have been a common feature of these cases (cf. 1:24; 3:11), and show that no merely psychological explanation can account for the facts. This man was more than a case for the psychiatrist.

7 The expression the Most High God is one used repeatedly in Scripture by Gentiles (Gn. 14:18; Is. 14:14; Dn. 3:26; Acts 16:17) and suggests that the man was not a Jew. The population on this side of the lake was probably of a mixed character, for Jews would not have been found keeping swine. It is remarkable that in a frantic appeal to Jesus not to inflict immediate punishment the unclean spirit used the same formula, I adjure you by God, that was employed in exorcisms. 9 Two explanations have been given of the question, What is your name? First, the ancient belief that knowledge of the name gave power over an adversary. Alternatively, and more probably, it was to recall the man to a sense of his own personality apart from the demon. Legion was a Latin word, which to people under Roman domination would suggest numbers, strength and oppression. He felt himself to be a conglomeration of evil forces, without moral unity, and this divided personality is reflected in the alternating singular and plural pronouns on his lips. 10 For the expression out of the country, Lk. 8:31 has 'into the abyss', which suggests that what the spirits feared was complete disembodiment. 11–13 The ethical implication of Jesus' action in regard to the swine has given rise to much discussion. Was it not wanton destruction of property with consequent heavy loss to the owners, and did Jesus anticipate the result, or did He not? Those who accept a psychological explanation of demon possession are obliged to account for the panic of the swine by saying that in the paroxysm which accompanied his deliverance the man struck terror into the herd and drove them down the cliff. 'But, supposing we are right in suggesting that there may be more in the NT view of the demons than has for some time been generally allowed, we must then take seriously the possibility that Jesus permitted real demons to enter the herd of swine, and the question "Why"? becomes pressing' (Cranfield). The most satisfactory view is that the destruction of the swine was permitted by the Lord as an ocular demonstration to the demoniac that the demons had in fact departed from him, and to confirm his faith. The sacrifice of brutes and property is justifiable where the sanity and lives of persons are at stake. One man is of more value than many swine.

15 Three phrases describe the completeness of the transformation wrought in the man by the grace and power of Christ; he was sitting instead of restless, clothed instead of naked, and in his right mind, sober instead of raging. Thus does Jesus expel the spirits of anger, pride, selfishness, impurity and the like from the lives of men, restoring them to spiritual health and clothing them with the garments of salvation. 17 But the townspeople, filled with alarm in the presence of the supernatural, and probably fearing, as so many have done since, that if Jesus stayed yet other things might have to go, began to beg Jesus to depart; and He will never stay unwanted. 18 The prayer of the man was very different; but Jesus' answer was contrary to His usual practice of enjoining silence in such cases (cf. 3:12). The reason was probably that, in this country beyond Jordan, there was not the danger of the miracle being used for political purposes, as in Judea. 20 Decapolis was, as the name implies, a group of ten Greek cities, all except one being east of the lake.

5:21–43 The raising of the daughter of Jairus and the healing of the woman with an issue of blood. These two miracle stories, the one within the other, illustrate the Lord's authority over disease and death. It will be convenient to consider the story of the woman first. Her malady was one which made her ceremonially unclean and would convey the uncleanness to all who came in touch with her (Lv. 15:25). 27 For this reason, probably, she approached Jesus from behind, in order not to be seen. 28 It was an ancient belief that even handkerchiefs and aprons carried from the person of a healer possessed healing power (cf. Acts 19:12), and similarly his shadow (Acts 5:15). 29 Having touched the Lord's garment, the woman was instantly cured, 30 but He would not allow her to escape without a fuller understanding of what had taken place. His inquiry Who touched my garments? seems therefore to have had a twofold purpose. First He desired the information; for although He was aware that the power proceeding from Him had gone forth in conscious response to the touch of faith, there is no need to suppose that He exhibited supernatural knowledge where information could be obtained without it. Secondly, He wished to elicit her open confession (cf. Rom. 10:9, 10). What follows is an interesting lesson in the nature of true faith.

31 The impatient remonstrance of the disciples shows that there is a world of difference between thronging Jesus and touching Him in personal faith out of a deep sense of need and a conviction of His saving power. It is still true that, while multitudes throng Jesus, it is the few who touch Him. 34 Calvin pointed out that the words of this verse do not encourage a belief in the efficacy of relics! We may go further and say that no outward 'sacrament' is efficacious apart from faith in the living Christ. There was no magical power resident in the garment. Again, although Jesus attributes the woman's cure to her faith, nevertheless in the NT view faith is no mere subjective experience, but something which derives its virtue from the object in which it rests, 'a spiritual experience which begins in a venture of spirit and is constituted and made effective by God Himself' (Vincent Taylor). The Greek of this verse is ambiguous, perhaps intentionally so; we could equally well translate, 'Your faith has brought you salvation.' The whole story is a parable of salvation by faith.

35 The delay caused by the intrusion of the woman must have been an agonizing test of faith to the ruler of the synagogue, who had approached Jesus by the lakeside and, casting aside his dignity in the acuteness of his distress, had fallen at His feet (v. 22). This was only intensified when a message from his house suggested that it was already too late, Your daughter is dead. 36 It is not quite clear whether Jesus overheard this message or ignored it. RV and RSV take the latter view (but see RSV mg.). The word ignoring (Gk. parakousas) means 'to refuse to listen' in the LXX and in Mt. 18:17. Perhaps both meanings are implicit here. Jesus overheard the message and deliberately set it aside in giving a word of assurance to Jairus. Only believe. The present imperative to denote continued action. Jairus was called not to a single act but a steady attitude of faith. 37 For the first time Jesus took with Him Peter and James and John, who were later present also at the transfiguration (9:2) and in Gethsemane (14:33). This was not for favouritism; but first, because in sovereignty He had chosen them for special service; and secondly, perhaps, because they emerged as a nucleus of the most responsive among the apostolic band. 39 The crucial question in the story is the meaning of the words The child is not dead but sleeping. Some expositors take the view that whereas Matthew (9:18) and particularly Luke (8:53, 55) plainly imply that the child was dead, the Markan saying, which is earliest, is ambiguous and could mean that she was only in a coma or trance-like sleep. In which case, 'the miracle is reduced to a penetrating diagnosis that saved the girl from being buried alive' (Cranfield). This is, however, by no means decisive. The scorn of the people points to the contrary. So also does the injunction to silence, which may among other reasons have been designed to forestall the suggestion that He was right after all; she was only asleep. It is better to conclude that here in fact is the germinal truth of later Christian teaching about death. As God sees it, it is a sleep from which there is to be an awakening (1 Thes. 4:13, 14). Our knowledge of the other world is limited, but it is within reach of the Saviour's voice and our dead are safe in His keeping. His authority extends beyond the grave. This is particularly true in regard to little children. The apostle Peter evidently observed his Master's technique on this occasion very closely, and the story of Dorcas in Acts 9:36–43 not only invites an interesting comparison, but well illustrates the great truth of Jn. 14:12.

6:1–13 Rejection at Nazareth and the mission of the Twelve

1 His own country is clearly Nazareth, as the context indicates. This visit is to be distinguished from that described in Lk. 4:16–30, which took place a year earlier. Jesus had left Nazareth as a private individual; now He returned as a Rabbi, surrounded by His scholars, presumably to give His own folk a further opportunity. But the result was the same as before; their jealousy was aroused. It was inconceivable that one of their fellow-villagers could have any mission from heaven. The reason for this attitude is stated as their unbelief (v. 6). 2 The fact of His wisdom and power was undeniable, but they questioned the divine origin of these things, the implication being that when the obviously supernatural does not come from God it must emanate from the devil. This is the essence of unbelief, the stubborn refusal to accept the evidence and admit the presence and power of God; and nothing so inhibits the power of God. That he could do no mighty work there (v. 5) is one of the boldest statements in the Gospels, but it clearly shows that our Lord's miracles were no mere magic; they were vitally related to the moral condition and faith of the people. Though He is omnipotent, God in His sovereignty will not act for blessing in the face of human rebellion.

3 Of the family mentioned, James afterwards became president of the church in Jerusalem (Acts 15:13; Gal. 2:9, 12) and author of the Epistle of James; Judas the author of the Epistle of Jude. Little is known of the others or of the sisters. 5 Matthew (13:58) modifies the statement to read 'he did not do', instead of Mark's could do no mighty work there. Mark's statement, however, does not imply that Jesus was in any sense powerless, but that He could not proceed in accordance with His purpose where faith was absent. Vincent Taylor refers to Holtzmann, who 'comments on the deep impression of historical accuracy left by verse 5'.

7–13 This mission of the Twelve is said by Matthew (9:35–38) to have originated in the Master's compassion for the people, which led Him to bring in at this point as 'fellow-labourers' those whom He had chosen and was training for the purpose. At the same time this first preaching tour may have been in the nature of an experiment forming part of the training itself. They would learn much from it, as, e.g., that Christ's power extended beyond His presence and could even be delegated to them; that God could supply their temporal needs; that their commission was one of moral dignity and authority. They were to go in twos for the sake of witness (Dt. 19:15; 2 Cor. 13:1) and fellowship. Their equipment was to be simple and serviceable, avoiding either extreme of slovenliness or extravagance. 8, 9 The exception of the staff is peculiar to Mark as is also that of the sandals. Both these items are expressly forbidden in Mt. 10:10, and the sandals in Lk. 10:4. The tendency of modern commentators is to suggest that Mark has modified the instruction to suit western conditions of travelling and missionary work. Plummer, however, thought that the discrepancies were of no moment. The bag was a begging-wallet; they were not to beg. 10, 11 Hospitality was to be accepted where offered; but where it was refused they were to 'shake the dust off . . . as a warning to them' (NEB). This action did not express personal resentment; it was symbolic of the fact that the place was to be regarded as heathen, the intention being to provoke thought and lead to repentance. 12, 13 The threefold ministry of the Twelve is summarized as preaching repentance, exorcizing demons and healing the sick. Anointing with oil is mentioned only here, Lk. 10:34 (a case of medicinal use) and Jas. 5:14. It is probably to be thought of here as an accessory to miraculous healing and a stimulus to faith.

6:14–29 Herod and John the Baptist

14 Herod Antipas was the son of Herod the Great (Mt. 2:1ff.) and Malthace. The title king as applied to him is at best one of courtesy or local custom. He was actually 'tetrarch', or ruler of a fourth part, in Galilee and Peraea, under the overlordship of Rome, and is invariably so described by Luke. Of the varying reports of Jesus which reached the ears of Herod, pangs of conscience probably led him to fix on the first as the most likely, John the baptizer has been raised from the dead, and that was why supernatural powers were at work in Him. 17ff. Mark now narrates retrospectively and with some fullness the circumstances which led to the murder of John. This not only throws light upon the character of Herod, but seems to be a kind of interlude before proceeding to the acount of Jesus' further ministry in Galilee, within Herod's jurisdiction, and beyond it into Gentile territory. According to Josephus, the scene of John's imprisonment was Machaerus, a combined fortress, palace and prison just NE of the Dead Sea. Herodias was in fact the niece of Antipas, being the daughter of Aristobulus his half-brother; she had married yet another half-brother whom Josephus calls Herod, but who may also have borne the name Philip. 18 John had repeatedly rebuked Antipas for this union on the grounds of Lv. 18:16; 20:21, with the result 19 that Herodias nursed a grudge and was only restrained from carrying out her fell desire by Herod himself, whose conscience was evidently not yet completely dead. 20 presents the picture of a vacillating moral weakling, torn between his respect for John and his passion for Herodias. The story is told after the manner of the oriental potentate and should be compared with Est. 5:2f. There is reason for thinking that Herod Antipas is an example of one who had committed the unpardonable sin (Mk. 3:29). He had persistently and deliberately trifled with the truth as John gave it to him, and when later Jesus Himself appeared before him for the first and only time (Lk. 23:7–11) Jesus had nothing to say to him. That silence is most significant, for, had he been responsive to any entreaty, the Lord would surely have spoken.

22 The identity of Herodias' daughter here is uncertain. There are three MS variations: a. The best attested has the reading 'when his daughter Herodias came in'. This is felt, however, by most commentators to be intolerable, since it would imply either that Herod had a daughter of his own of this name and that 'mother' in v. 24 is used very loosely, or that the union of Herod and Herodias was of longer standing than the story seems to suggest. b. The second reading, accepted by most scholars, is: 'when the daughter of Herodias herself came in.' This would presumably refer to Salome, Herodias' daughter by her first husband, Herod Philip. It could also be translated 'when her daughter Herodias . . .', but this would involve the daughter having the same name as her mother. c. The reading represented by RSV omits the possessive pronoun altogether. The real difficulty is that of believing that a Herodian princess would thus dance before the court of Antipas.

6:30 – 8:26 Miracles and teaching in Galilee and beyond

6:30–34 The return of the disciples. 30 Here and here only in this Gospel are the Twelve called apostles. 'Having discharged a temporary commission, they went back to school to make greater advances in learning' (Calvin). 31 They report to the Master and are taken aside to recuperate. Cf. Lk. 9:10. 32 The position of the lonely place is thought by most commentators to have been the NE side of the lake. There is a time for rest as well as for work in the service of Christ. 33, 34 But, as so often, the seclusion of both the Master and His disciples is invaded by the claims of human need, and once more His deep compassion is the source of the events which follow. This compassion reflects the very heart of God in a picture of surpassing tenderness (cf. Je. 23:1–4; Ezk. 34).

6:35–44 The feeding of the five thousand. This miracle has the distinction of being the only one recorded by all four Evangelists. See Mt. 14:13–21; Lk. 9:10–17; Jn. 6:1–15. 36 The suggestion of the disciples was perhaps not wholly in the interest of the people. They had been disappointed of their time apart with Jesus and may have been hungry themselves (v. 31). 37 The answer of Jesus must therefore have come as a seemingly impossible challenge; and the word you is very emphatic: 'they are not to go away; you are the ones to feed them.' Such words come as a lasting rebuke to the helplessness of the church in face of a starving world, and regarding her own paltry resources with dismay. Yet it is evident that the need can be met if the Lord is allowed to direct the use of those resources. Estimates of the worth of a denarius or penny necessarily vary owing to the changing values in the purchasing power of money; but it was a day's wage for a working man, and the point of the computation here is that a sum far greater than the disciples had with them would be hopelessly insufficient. Mark's description of what followed is singularly vivid. 39 The people were arranged in an orderly fashion by companies (Gk. symposia symposia, lit. 'drinking parties') upon the green grass . . . 40 in groups (Gk. prasiai prasiai, lit. 'garden beds'). They resembled garden beds in their bright colours against the green background. The purpose of this, however, was rather the practical one of dividing up the assembly into manageable groups so as to avoid confusion and secure that all were served 'decently and in order' (1 Cor. 14:40). 41 Attention has been drawn to the similarity of this verse to 14:22, as though to suggest that the meal in the wilderness was in some sense an anticipation of the Last Supper. That may be so, but probably the safer view is that these simple actions were usually associated with any meal on the part of the host, and were later invested with new and richer meaning by the Lord in the fellowship of His disciples. 42 The manner of the miracle alone is left unrevealed, as to whether the multiplication took place in the hands of the Lord or of His disciples. Various attempts have been made by the rationalists to dispose of the miraculous element altogether, by supposing that the numbers are exaggerated, or that the crowd were persuaded to share their provisions; in which case it is difficult to see why so ordinary an event has been preserved in a fourfold record. Everything depends upon the view we take of our Lord's Person. If He was in fact incarnate Deity, there is no real difficulty in believing that He wrought on this occasion a creative act, as the Evangelists clearly supposed. In the light of John's account, which leads on directly to the great discourse about the bread of life, we are left in no doubt as to the meaning of the story. Jesus is not only the Giver of life; He is the Support and Sustainer of it, as indispensable for Christian living as daily bread for the body, the complete satisfaction and nourishment of the believing soul who daily, hourly feeds upon Him in the heart by faith. 43 The baskets (Gk. kophinoi) were provision-baskets carried by travelling Jews to avoid eating Gentile food (cf. 8:8, 19, 20). Broken pieces were not crumbs, but surplus portions.

6:45–52 The walking on the water. By comparison with the earlier story of the stilling of the storm (4:35–41), the central feature here is the fact that Jesus walked upon the sea. There He was in the boat with the disciples; 45 here they were alone, having been compelled by Him to embark while he dismissed the crowd. The reason for this compulsion appears from John's remark (Jn. 6:15) 'that they were about to come and take him by force to make him king'. The disciples would have been delighted if they had done so, for this was precisely what they had always hoped for. 46 But Jesus recognized it to be a moment of supreme peril necessitating the immediate dispatch of the disciples and His own retirement into solitude and prayer. It was the temptation of Lk. 4:5–8 all over again. There is a geographical difficulty about Bethsaida (cf. v. 53 and Jn. 6:17), which led some older scholars to conjecture the existence of a western Bethsaida as a kind of fishing suburb of Capernaum and distinguishable from Bethsaida Julias to the NE. But the simplest solution seems to be that the disciples set out to cross the bay, and were blown off course and out to sea, eventually making for Gennesaret on the western shore. 48 It is remarkable that Jesus did not immediately intervene. The disciples struggled for some hours until the fourth watch of the night; or three o'clock in the morning according to the Roman reckoning which Mark is using. Even then Jesus meant to pass by them. This is entirely after the manner of His conduct on other occasions (cf. Lk. 24:28; Jn. 11:6) and we may infer that His purpose was to test their faith. 49, 50 Mark is careful to tell us that they all saw him; it was no subjective delusion or hallucination, but someone objectively visible to the whole company. 51, 52 Yet such was their blindness of heart (see on 3:5) that even the miracle of the loaves afforded them no basis for further understanding. The human heart can be unbelievably obtuse in spiritual matters.

Here once more objections have been raised to the miraculous element: first, on the ground that the intervention of Jesus does not meet any desperate need, for the disciples were not in jeopardy; secondly, and more seriously, because the story has been held to support a Docetic view of the Person of Christ, that His body was heavenly and not truly human. But if Jesus was only wading through the surf, there was no cause for terror, neither could He have conversed with them, nor is there any adequate explanation of the words out on the sea (v. 47). Furthermore we cannot dogmatize upon what would be possible or impossible for a unique Personality such as His.

The omission of the story of Peter's stepping from the boat (Mt. 14:28–31) points to the influence of the apostle himself on the Markan narrative. As we have seen (Introduction, p. 851), he is careful to avoid incidents which might tend to magnify him. Many of the Christians at Rome and elsewhere probably felt they were making little headway against the contrary winds of persecution, and the record of this incident would bring untold consolation to them, assuring them of the presence and power of their Lord.

6:53–56 Ministry at Gennesaret. 53 Gennesaret was a fertile and populous plain, lying S of Capernaum. The scene here so graphically described marks the climax of the Galilaean ministry. 54, 55 As Jesus moved through the district, the people followed Him, carrying around their sick upon pallets. Sometimes they were too late and missed Him; then they carried the sufferers from place to place until they overtook Him. 56 Their desires apparently did not rise above the healing of the body; and as there is no mention of any further teaching here, it seems that Jesus gave Himself unreservedly to them to do as much as they would let Him. The fringe of his garment was that worn by a pious Jew according to Nu. 15:37ff.; Dt. 22:12.

7:1–23 Teaching about cleansing. 1–4 The first four verses provide further evidence that this Gospel was written for Gentile readers, for the Jewish customs in regard to ceremonial ablutions are carefully explained. 2 Defiled (Gk. koinais, translated 'common', Acts 10:14, 28, and 'unclean', Rom. 14:14) was a technical term for what was ceremonially unclean to Jews. 3 All the Jews has been thought by some to be an exaggeration, since the earliest Jewish authority on the subject, the Talmud (c. AD 450), makes these ablutions obligatory only on the priests in the time of Jesus. 'Accordingly', says Nineham, 'the story as it stands can hardly be historical.' But, in the first place, the Synoptic Gospels may be regarded as 'at least as good an authority for the customs prevalent during the period A.D. 1–70 as the Talmud' (Vincent Taylor, quoting G. Margoliouth), and secondly, Mark may have had in mind Jews of the Dispersion. Moreover, recent light on the subject from the Dead Sea Scrolls, particularly the Manual of Discipline, suggests that in fact these rules were widely observed. They were not for the purpose of cleansing in the hygienic sense but for the removal of ceremonial defilement. The untranslated Greek word referred to in the RSV mg. is pygmē, 'with the fist', as RV mg. This has been variously rendered 'diligently' (RV), 'up to the wrist' (Moffatt). The Talmud refers to 'dipping up to the wrist' as a minor ablution, 'plunging up to the wrist' as more extensive. Some MSS read pykna, 'frequently'; cf. AV 'oft'.

In this section three groups of people are addressed ; a hostile group of critics (v. 1), the people (v. 14) and the disciples (vv. 17f.). 5 The Pharisees raised the question of the tradition of the elders. 6–8 In reply Jesus stated that human tradition can never have the same authority as the Word of God. There were times when the scribes made even more of it than of the commandments, preferring, as so many still do, religious ritual to that which is inwardly moral and spiritual. It is an ancient attitude of the human heart, aptly described by Isaiah (Is. 29:13), for human nature is basically the same in every generation. 9–13 Jesus then cited an outstanding example which is not necessarily hypothetical; some think there may have been some contemporary cause célèbre of the kind which was current gossip. It related to the Corban vow. The law concerning duty to parents was plain, being doubly emphasized in the OT, but the Jews, with characteristic sophistry, had devised a means of evading it, even under the cloak of piety. A son could pledge his money to be paid into the Temple treasury. This could be done in an ideal sense without any actual payment being made, or the payment could be deferred until after his death. He could even do it in a fit of anger, and could then tell his old parents in their time of need that he could offer them no help, since his money was Corban, i.e. dedicated under oath. Corban is a transliteration of a Hebrew word meaning an offering or gift devoted to God. The Jews, being determined to establish their own righteousness, 'must needs attempt to render the Law something they could live with on other terms than the forgiveness of sins, something compatible with their self-righteousness and complacency. In so doing they substituted for the Law of God a human legalism. "It is characteristic of all those who would find their justification in the Law", says

H. Roux, "that they always end by modifying it or perverting it, in order to escape from it and to make void its authority" ' (Cranfield).

14, 15 Having answered the Pharisees on the subject of tradition versus commandment, Jesus now turned to the whole company to deal with the question of defilement. This He did in a parabolic saying which is revolutionary in its religious implications and was destined to liberate Christianity from the bondage of legalism. On the one hand, nothing external can pollute a man; on the other, the real source of all impurity is within, a matter not of the hands but of the heart. 17 The disciples did not at the time understand, and therefore asked the Lord privately about it. 18–23 are an expansion of the two parts of the saying in v. 15. The comment in parenthesis (v. 19) may well be a reflection of Peter's in the light of his experience at Joppa (Acts 10:9–16). Jesus had ended the old distinction between meats clean and unclean. 21, 22 In the catalogue of vices that follows, Mark begins where all sin begins, in the realm of thought. Gal. 5:19–21 may be compared. It is a thoroughly Jewish catalogue, with an OT flavour about it, rather than a mark of Pauline influence. Foolishness is that moral inanity that considers 'sin is a joke, and mocks at those who treat it seriously' (Plummer).

This whole section, 'with its message of emancipation from Jewish particularism, is a fitting prelude to the account which follows of Jesus' ministry on Gentile soil' (Nineham).

7:24–30 The Syro-Phoenician woman. The significance of this and the following two miracles is that they took place on Gentile or pagan territory, whither Jesus had gone not only to avoid a premature clash with the hostile Jews, but primarily to secure some privacy with His disciples. His undertaking of a brief Gentile ministry also foreshadows the universal scope of the gospel. 26 The woman is introduced by her religion, as a Greek, i.e. either Greek-speaking or 'Gentile', and so 'pagan'; and by her nationality, a Phoenician of Syria, Syrophoenician being a term used in distinction from Liby-Phoenician or Carthaginian. These Phoenicians came from the Canaanites, and Matthew (Mt. 15:22) so describes her. We might indeed ask, Was she the first heathen convert to Christ? 27 The apparent roughness of the Lord's answer to her plea for the healing of her daughter admittedly arises from the fact that she was a stranger to the covenant, but none the less brings into focus the question of the sovereign grace of God in election, which at first sight looks like divine favouritism. But election is merely the method of God's initiative in salvation. 'Particularism is a stage towards a wider universalism in God's plan' (E. Y. Mullins). Cf. Eph. 2:11–18. God seeks to save not as few but as many as possible. The stage of the wider universalism has not yet been reached, but it is foreshadowed in Christ's treatment of the woman. 28 Her answer, which so clearly evinced her faith and earnestness, seized upon two things. First, the term dogs (Gk. diminutive kynaria, 'little dogs', household companions, not outside scavengers) has not the opprobrium we associate with it. She assented to His estimate and drew her own conclusion. Secondly, His word Let the children first be fed led her to expect that her own turn would come eventually. 29, 30 Some modern expositors regard this story as a case of supernatural or telepathic knowledge rather than miraculous healing. But it seems clear that Mark, followed by Matthew, intended us to understand that Jesus healed at a distance, the only example in this Gospel of His doing so.

7:31–37 The healing of the deaf mute. 31 The geography is difficult, as a glance at the map will show. In involves a long detour proceeding first northward, then eastward and southward. Most of the attempts that have been made to account for this long journey are speculative and unsatisfactory. We cannot do more than surmise that Jesus may thus have tried to gain the necessary seclusion for the instruction of the Twelve, which He had twice previously failed to secure (cf. 6:31–34; 7:24). For Decapolis, see on 5:20. Once more Jesus was near the country of the Gerasenes, where in the meantime the healed demoniac had been bearing his testimony (cf. 5:19) and thus acting as a pioneer. 32 The people of the district accordingly brought to Jesus another helpless soul, who was deaf and had an impediment in his speech (Gk. kōphon kai mogilalon; the latter is a rare word occurring only here and in Is. 35:6ˇLXX, which was almost certainly in Mark's mind). He was not necessarily dumb, but a stammerer. A well-supported variant reading, moggilalon, which Vincent Taylor thinks cannot be dismissed, describes him as 'harsh of speech'. The account is full of vivid and interesting detail of the method employed to restore him; 33 first the retirement from the crowd, perhaps to avoid distraction and unnecessary publicity (cf. v. 36); secondly, the various means of contact, including the use of saliva which was supposed to be remedial, but in this case was designed to evoke in the man the co-operation of faith (cf. 8:23; Jn. 9:6); 34 thirdly, the upward look and the sigh or groan, an indication of the Lord's deep feeling and compassion and an example of those human emotions in Him which Mark delights to record; fourthly, the actual Aramaic word used, Ephphatha, which could easily be read from the lips by a deaf person. 35 Dumbness usually results from deafness. If our ears are open to listen to the word of the Lord, then our tongues will surely be unloosed in praise, prayer and testimony. Furthermore, only as the church hears the Word of God has it anything worth while to say.

8:1–10 The feeding of the four thousand. The chief question which arises is whether this narrative is a doublet of the feeding of the five thousand (6:35–44). There is admittedly considerable agreement, even verbally; and it is argued that the disciples must have been incredibly stupid to have asked such a question as that in v. 4, in the light of their earlier experience. On the other hand there are differences which ought not to be minimized. 2 The period of three days is much longer than in the case of the 5,000, which occupied hardly a day. 3 In the earlier narrative the dismissal of the crowd is urged by the disciples; here it is rejected by Jesus on His own initiative. The variation in numbers, though not of the same importance, is nevertheless not negligible. 8 But particularly striking is the difference in the word used for baskets. Here this is spyris, an affair woven of twigs or rushes, of the kind carried by Gentile merchants and large enough to contain a man (Acts 9:25). The basket of the earlier occasion was the Jewish provision basket (Gk. kophinos; see on 6:43). These two kinds are carefully distinguished by Jesus in vv. 19, 20. It is scarcely satisfactory therefore to dismiss these differences as mere modifications of the tradition, and we may be pardoned for suspecting that some commentators are finding themselves in difficulties when they admit that Mark indeed usually adheres closely to the original tradition, but that this is an exception where he has allowed homiletical or other impulses to colour the record of the Lord's words. The significance of this occasion seems to be that Jesus was still among the Gentiles, to whom the bread of life is to be offered as well as to the Jews. 10 The identity of Dalmanutha, a name which occurs only here, is not known. Mt. 15:39 has 'Magadan' (RSV) or 'Magdala', which suggests a crossing once more to the western side of the lake.

8:11–21 The demand for a sign from heaven. 11–13 should be compared with Mt. 16:1–4, where Jesus condemns the Pharisees for their failure to discern the signs of the times. They were insincere in their demand, and far more anxious to secure material for proving that Jesus was not the Messiah than to be convinced that He was. Cf. also Mt. 12:38–42; Lk. 11:29–32. Signs on earth were not wanting, and Jesus' saying to the disciples (vv. 17–21) implies that both miracles of feeding were of that order. But it is a sign from heaven that is required; a voice, or a wonder in the sun or moon, would be more convincing, so they suggest, than the meeting of human need. Yet would it? There is none so blind as those who refuse to see, and to the moral perversity that shows itself in these Pharisees Jesus has nothing more to say. 13 The words And he left them mark a tragic abandonment.

14ff. The occasion is used to warn the disciples of those corrupting influences which more than anything cause blindness of heart. Cf. Mt. 16:5–12. 15 We learn from Lk. 12:1 that the leaven of the Pharisees was hypocrisy; the leaven of Herod was probably worldliness and sensuality. But even the disciples were completely missing the inner spiritual meaning of their Master's teaching and supposed that He was referring to some specific kind of leaven about which the Pharisees were very punctilious. Of the perplexity of the disciples, Trench (Notes on the Miracles, in loc.) appropriately says: 'It is only the man of a full-formed faith, of a faith which the apostles themselves at this time did not possess, who argues from the past to the future, and truly derives confidence from God's former dealings of faithfulness and love (cf. 1 Sam. 17:34–37; 2 Ch. 16:7, 8).' The stubbornness and dullness of the human heart frequently appears in Scripture (cf. Ex. 14:31 with 16:2, 3) and was evidently a source of grief to the Lord here. The disciples' condition, however, was not that of the Pharisees, for which there was nothing but abandonment (cf. v. 13); it was rather their spiritual dullness which called for and met with infinite patience from the Lord. There is consolation in this. The keynote of this passage therefore is the all-important one of spiritual discernment, a faculty all too rarely possessed even by disciples. It is a matter of the heart rather than the head (v. 17), of moral sympathy rather than intellectual erudition. Cf. 1 Cor. 2:9–16; Eph. 1:17f.

8:22–26 A blind man healed at Bethsaida. There are remarkable similarities between this miracle and that of the deaf mute (7:31–37). They are the only miracles peculiar to Mark. In each case, the sufferer was isolated from the crowd, spittle and the touch of the hand were used and undue publicity was to be avoided. But in one notable feature this work of healing was unique, in that the cure was gradual. 24 The man looked up and said, I see men; but they look like trees, walking; and a second touch was required to restore his sight completely. This highly distinctive detail alone confirms the historical character of the incident. It is difficult to resist the conclusion that Mark has introduced the narrative here with a purpose. The disciples were at this time rather like the blind man in the first stage of his recovery. But a note of hope is sounded. There is thoroughness in every work of Jesus and He will not be satisfied short of perfection. What He has begun He will finish; and presently, after the second touch of His Spirit at Pentecost, they will see all things clearly.

8:27 – 9:29 Messiahship and suffering

From this point the narrative becomes dominated by the thought of the approaching passion, of which there are three definite predictions (8:31; 9:31; 10:33f.).

8:27–33 The confession of Peter and the first prediction. 27 Caesarea Philippi was the most northerly town reached by Christ. It is to be distinguished from Caesarea Stratonis on the W coast, the seat of Roman government frequently mentioned in Acts. There Jesus put to the disciples two questions: first a general one which elicited the information that men recognized in Him someone outstanding, but no more. 29 The second challenged them personally, and Peter, as spokesman for them all, made the tremendous affirmation that He was the Christ, the Messiah, promised and predicted of old. Significantly the Lord's benediction upon Peter at this point is omitted. Peter had doubtless preserved a modest silence about it. But the parallel account in Mt. 16:13–23 should again be compared. After the blindness of the Pharisees and the dullness of the disciples, Jesus rejoiced to find the light of revelation beginning to dawn. They were beginning to see; but, as the sequel shows, their vision like that of the blind man was by no means clear yet. Nevertheless those who knew Jesus best reverenced Him most. With human characters it is not always so; familiarity often breeds contempt; on approach the halo often becomes dim. The reverse was the case with Christ.

This confession is the crisis-point of the teaching of Jesus and the watershed which divides the Gospel record in two. Jesus Himself had been aware of His Messianic mission at least from the beginning of His public ministry and probably before (cf. Lk. 2:49); aware too of the suffering involved and of the necessity of the cross which had shadowed His pathway from the first (Jn. 2:19; 3:14). But only at this decisive point did He begin to speak of it plainly. And from this point Mark's narrative becomes governed by the one purpose of establishing the thesis that Jesus was not taken unawares, but that the course of events was foreknown, and indeed was part of the predetermined counsel of God (Acts 4:28).

The disciples were right as to the fact, but wrong in what they understood by it. The OT prophets foreshadowed the Messiah in two ways, as triumphant (Is. 11) and as suffering (Is. 53); cf. Lk. 24:26; 1 Pet. 1:10, 11. The Jews cherished the material and political implications of the former and conveniently ignored or rejected the spiritual implications of the latter. And at this stage even the disciples shared the common view. 31 Jesus therefore began to teach them that the Son of man must (Gk. dei, of the divine decree) suffer. The disciples were obviously staggered by this revelation, and 32 Peter, probably after some deliberation on the matter, drew the Lord aside and began to rebuke him. 33 Through Peter's lips Jesus recognized a voice He had heard before (Lk. 4:5–8). It is a solemn reflection that a well-meaning but unspiritual disciple can become the tool of Satan. The goal of true discipleship is complete conformity to the divine mind, as revealed in Jesus. NEB renders v. 33, 'you think as men think, not as God thinks' (Gk. phroneis ta tou theou). Paul uses a similar expression in Col. 3:2. This is further developed in what follows.

8:34 – 9:1 The conditions of discipleship. 34 The first mention in Mark of the cross is here, and with its familiar Roman associations the word must have fallen upon apostolic ears far more startlingly than it does upon ours. For the follower it means precisely what it meant for the Lord; not mere inconvenience or discomfort, but death. The mind of the disciple in relation to the world is defined in this way. He will experience an essential antagonism resulting in persecution, and he will exhibit non-resistance to that persecution (Jn. 15:19; Gal. 6:14). He will accept the last consequences of obedience and take the last risk. In relation to himself his attitude will be that of self-denial, which means the complete dethronement of self that the life may be Christ-centred. In relation to his Lord, he will follow in submission to His will. 35, 36 Paradoxically such surrender and submission is the surest and most abiding gain; whereas the self-realization and self-expression so dear to the modern mind is to lose one's own soul. 37 And once lost, what has a man to give in return (Gk. antallagma, a marketable equivalent) to redeem it? The loss is irrevocable.

But lest such stern doctrine should utterly discourage, Jesus went on to speak of His coming (8:38) and His kingdom (9:1). Although suffering awaited the Son of man, nevertheless that other strand of Messianic prophecy which spoke of His victorious reign should not go unfulfilled. 9:1 The precise meaning of this verse remains somewhat uncertain. Four possible interpretations which have been suggested are: the transfiguration; the resurrection and ascension; the destruction of Jerusalem in AD 70; Pentecost and the beginning of missionary enterprise. If the first of these be accepted the words amount to little more than an assertion that some of the disciples would still be alive six days hence, which seems pointless. Of the other three the last is probably most satisfactory. The disciples eventually came to see that the cross, which was now such a stumbling-block to them, was in fact the sign and secret of conquest over the hearts of men, and thus of the coming of the kingdom. On the basis of the rather speculative idea that the designation 'Son of man' denotes the elect community (a view advanced by some expositors), Vincent Taylor (The Gospel according to St Mark, in loc.) says: 'A visible manifestation of the rule of God displayed in the life of an Elect Community is the most probable form of His expectation.' This may be so in this particular context, though we prefer to think that 'the Son of man' should be interpreted personally rather than communally.

9:2–8 The transfiguration. 2 This is the second occasion on which the Lord took the three disciples into special intimacy with Himself (cf. 5:37). The high mountain is nowhere named but is generally conjectured to have been Mt. Hermon (9,200 ft), about 12 miles NE of Caesarea Philippi. The time was probably at night (Lk. 9:32), though Luke is careful to emphasize that the disciples were thoroughly awake when it happened. 3, 4 Hypotheses advanced in explanation of the phenomena of this event differ widely, ranging from those which attribute no more than a legendary or symbolic value to the story, or explain it as a resurrection story read back into the earthly life of Jesus, to the other extreme of the spiritualists who claim it as a seance. In reply to the latter it may be pointed out that there was no communication from Moses and Elijah to the disciples, and the subject of discussion was the cross (Lk. 9:31), not usually a topic at seances! 5, 6 The behaviour of Peter is thoroughly true to life and argues strongly for the historical character of the narrative, as does also the appropriateness of the story in its context. Campbell Morgan considered that what the disciples saw was not the effulgence of deity but the glory of sinless and perfected humanity, that the Lord at that moment was ready to return into heaven again without dying (for death is the result of sin, and He was sinless), but 'for the second time turned His back upon heaven, in order that, as perfected Man, He might share in the mystery of human death'. But the transfiguration, while an event of tremendous significance in itself touching the Person of Jesus, also played an important part in the spiritual education of the disciples and profoundly impressed the early church (2 Pet. 1:16–18). It confirmed their faith, which may well have begun to waver after the revelations of 8:31, 34. It showed that in fact the conception of a suffering Messiah was not contrary to the OT revelation, but accorded well with the testimony of the Law and the Prophets, of whom Moses and Elijah were representatives. 7 It urged the importance of listening to the Lord when He spoke of His approaching passion (cf. Dt. 18:15); this Peter had been unwilling to do (8:32).

9:9–13 The descent from the mount. 9, 10 For the last time we meet the command to keep silence, this time with the resurrection as a time limit. The concealment of the Lord's Messiahship had been necessary because of the current political and materialistic expectations. But once He had died and risen again, the danger of seeing in Him a Messiah of this world was over. Also, what the three had seen would help them to understand what had happened to Christ's body, when the tomb was found empty (see Jn. 20:8).

11 The question arose from the presence of Elijah at the transfiguration. 12 In reply the Lord made two things clear: first, that 'Elijah' had already come in the person of John the Baptist and had been rejected and killed; secondly, the Son of man would suffer the same fate as His forerunner. 13 As it is written of him must refer to the persecutions Elijah endured (1 Ki. 19:1–3). John had found his Ahab and Jezebel in Herod and Herodias.

9:14–29 The epileptic boy. The contrast between the glory of the mountain and the scene of human tragedy and failure in the valley has often been observed and is probably intentional. The group in the valley represents the world in miniature: youth in the grip of evil, parental anguish, nine disciples to whom the necessary power had been given (6:7) so that they ought not to have failed, but who, for certain reasons they were later to learn, were helpless before the challenge of this need, and finally scribes arguing with them, a collection of critical and hostile religionists. It is easy to criticize the failure of others and do nothing ourselves. 15 In view of v. 9 we conclude that it was the opportuneness of the Lord's unexpected arrival that occasioned the amazement of the people, rather than any remaining traces of the celestial glory. 17, 18 Modern medical science would probably regard the case as one of epilepsy; but that is not incompatible with the view that the malady was caused by the presence of a demon with whom Christ directly deals. We have already noted Mark's special interest in such miracles of exorcism (see on 1:20–28 and 5:1–20), and his account here is distinctive for its wealth of vivid detail. 19 Before such a situation the Lord first expresses His distress, describing the whole company as an unbelieving generation (cf. Heb. 12:3). Nevertheless infinite forbearance is His, How long am I to bear with you? and infinite compassion, Bring him to me. 20–22 It is remarkable that Jesus should have left the boy in his distress while He engaged in conversation with the father. This was evidently to lead the father to the point of faith first. 23 Jesus takes up his doubting words if you can and flings them back at him. 24 He responds to the challenge, I believe, but feeling the very weakness of his faith casts himself all the more upon Jesus. 25 The crowd in this verse is not necessarily the same as that in v. 14 from which apparently Christ and the father had withdrawn while the boy was being fetched.

28 If we have failed, the wisest thing is not to set up a committee of enquiry, or even to discuss our problems among ourselves, but to ask the Master, privately. This the disciples did. 29 Comparing Matthew's account here (Mt. 17:19–21) we find the Lord gave three reasons for failure: lack of faith—unbelief deterred them from using the power they had been given; lack of prayer—perhaps they were so stunned by the announcement of the cross that they forgot to pray and were thus out of touch with God; lack of self-discipline (fasting). The words 'and fasting' referred to in the margin are omitted by Codices Sinaiticus and Vaticanus, and are said by some to have been added in the interests of early asceticism. But the evidence against them is not conclusive. The meaning is that only prayerfulness and strict self-discipline can make a man competent to deal with such cases.

9:30–50 Rebukes and warnings

9:30–37 Second prediction of the passion. At this point begins the final journey southward towards Jerusalem and the passion. 30 The reason for the secrecy preserved was probably twofold: first, the fact that the Galilaean ministry was now ended; secondly, the desire to instruct the disciples. 31 For he was teaching his disciples; i.e. His coming passion was the constant theme along the road. The second prediction of the cross follows (cf. 8:29–31). Delivered has reference to the divine action rather than the treachery of Judas. The thought is that of Paul in Rom. 8:32. 32 Once more the disciples failed to comprehend, and were afraid to ask him. Undoubtedly the reason was their preoccupation with prospects of political power. 34 Their dispute may have arisen out of the privilege accorded to the three who were specially chosen to witness the transfiguration. Such is human nature that even the highest spiritual privileges may engender pride. The cardinal sin is pride, and there are times when God has to take drastic steps to secure that humility in us which is of paramount worth to Him (cf. 2 Cor. 12:7). 'Humility is the ornament of angels, and pride the deformity of devils,' wrote William Jenkyn, an old Puritan. 35–37 The Lord's answer, first in plain words, then by means of a child as an object-lesson, is at once an encouragement to all parents and teachers and any who have the care of little children, and at the same time a rebuke to proud ambition.

9:38–50 Lessons in discipleship. These verses contain a miscellaneous collection of sayings of Jesus, which are distributed in various forms and different contexts in the other Gospels. This suggests that, while they are all genuine, they have nevertheless been assembled editorially here by Mark and were not necessarily spoken on the same occasion. If we look for some common theme linking them together, we may say that there are two groups, the first (vv. 38–42) dealing with the duty of mutual charity and toleration, and the second (vv. 43–50) dealing with the need for personal discipline. The first governs the disciple's attitude to others, the second his attitude to himself. Towards others he must be charitable, towards himself strict.

38 Unlike the exorcists of Acts 19:13–16, the man described by John was at least sincere and successful, in however defective a way; 39 and if lives are being blessed and delivered from the power of evil, such work ought not to be hindered. There is no more forthright rebuke of ecclesiastical intolerance than this. 40 Mt. 12:30 should be compared. The two sayings are complementary, not contradictory. 'While the principle of Mk. 9:40 should govern the attitude of the Church toward those without, the principle of Mt. 12:30 must be part of the Church's preaching both to those without and to those within' (Cranfield); to be neutral toward Christ is to decide against Him. 41 Even a much less spectacular service than exorcism shall earn its reward if it be from the right motive. 42 Possibly the disciples' discouragement of the man had in fact caused him to stumble and this accounts for the stern warning. A great millstone (Gk. mylos onikos) is one large enough to require an ass to turn it.

43 The language of this second group of sayings is obviously figurative. 'We must shrink from no spiritual surgery to save the life of the soul' (J. D. Jones). The word hell (also in vv. 45, 47) is the Greek geenna; this is a loose transliteration of the Hebrew gê-hinnōm, 'the valley of Hinnom', a gorge just outside Jerusalem which had in ancient times been the scene of human sacrifices (Je. 7:31), but later, during the reforms of Josiah (2 Ki. 23:10), became the refuse-heap of the city. It was a natural metaphor for the place of future punishment. 49 At least fourteen or fifteen possible explanations have been advanced of this obscure verse, the latter half of which, referred to in the margin, should probably be omitted on the textual evidence, as being an attempt to explain the preceding statement on the basis of Lv. 2:13. It is probably a challenging word on the purifying value of suffering, which would be particularly relevant to the church at Rome facing persecution. In which case the fire of v. 49 has nothing to do with that of v. 48 (which is destructive rather than purificatory), and every one means every disciple. 50 The connection seems to be purely verbal and artificial, for salt here is used in its more familiar sense of the grace of Christian character.

10:1–52 THE JOURNEY TO JERUSALEM

1 The geography of this verse is complicated somewhat by textual uncertainty. The region of Judea and beyond the Jordan, which is probably the best reading, may mean the region of S Palestine on both sides of the river. At all events, the teaching and incidents here described are to be thought of as taking place in the course of the journey.

10:2–12 On marriage and divorce

2 Once again the question put by the Pharisees was malicious, in order to test him. Divorce was a matter of dispute at the time, and there were two distinct schools of thought. 4 The Mosaic enactment (Dt. 24:1–4) stated that a husband was allowed to give his wife a writing of divorcement if he had found some unseemly thing in her. The question turned upon what constituted an unseemly thing. The school of Shammai maintained the strict interpretation of this, that the marriage bond was indissoluble except in the event of the wife's infidelity. That of Hillel took the liberal view allowing divorce for almost any cause. 5 In reply, Jesus first pointed out that Moses' legislation was a concession to human weakness and rightly introduced to regulate divorce in a defective state of society. 6–9 Secondly, He took them back beyond Moses to God's ideal at the beginning, from which we discover that marriage was instituted as the divine ideal for man and woman, and that the bond is permanent and indissoluble. 10–12 When, later, His disciples questioned Him in private about the matter, He took them further in order to indicate that in this particular the sexes are on equal terms. Jewish law did not allow a wife to divorce her husband. 12 is therefore an innovation.

It is not possible to comment exhaustively on this complicated question as it affects modern society. Something depends upon the view we take of the exceptive clause introduced by Matthew (Mt. 5:32; 19:9). Suffice it to say that, while the teaching of Jesus to unbelievers moves on one level and, without in any way lowering the divine ideal, can be interpreted as endorsing the Mosaic concession, yet to the disciples it moves on a higher level at which, undoubtedly, the individual believer must reckon with it. Paul's development of the subject in 1 Cor. 7:10–16 is designed to meet the new situation in the church of the post-marital conversion of one partner. The individual Christian need not be left in doubt. But 'for its own protection and well-being society will do well to be guided by His positive teaching in defining grounds for divorce which threaten personal and family life' (Vincent Taylor).

10:13–16 On childhood

The subject follows naturally from that of marriage, which leads modern commentators to think that its insertion here is topical. It is difficult to resist the attractiveness of the older suggestion, however, which associates the children with the house in v. 10. They 'were brought to Him to say good-night and receive His blessing before being sent to bed' (Salmon). The Lord is the Defender both of womanhood and of childhood; and when the disciples, true to their materialistic ideas of the kingdom, attempted to drive the children away 14 he was indignant. This is the only occasion where this word (Gk. aganaktein, implying anger) is predicated of Jesus. Do not hinder them. Some scholars suggest that this is an allusion to the baptismal rite of the early church, in which the question: 'What hinders?' was asked before the candidates were baptized. Cf. Acts 8:36. It is, however, to be noted that the Lord's invitation was Let the children come, not 'let them be brought'.

The disciples had a wrong estimate both of the worth of a child and of the nature of the kingdom. As to the first, it is not necessary for a child to become an adult before participating in the kingdom; rather the reverse is the case, the adult must be converted, turn back and become a child (cf. Mt. 18:3). 15 As to the second, the kingdom is not a matter of achievement or merit; we must receive the kingdom of God as a gift, and this is where the child has the advantage. The point is not that it is innocent or humble, which it may not be, but that it is receptive and willing to be dependent upon others. 16 And so Jesus took up the children and blessed them. It is a delightful picture conveyed by the strong compound word in Greek (katēulogei), occurring nowhere else in the NT: 'He blessed them fervently, again and again.'

10:17–31 On riches

17 It is Luke (18:18) who tells us that this man was a 'ruler', though of what seems uncertain. His youth is rather against his being ruler of a synagogue. There are several indications of the attractiveness of his character, apart from his own words which constitute no mean claim (cf. Phil. 3:6). Mark adds the details that he ran up and knelt, which suggests both eagerness and respect. But his form of address, Good Teacher, was a very unusual one, quite unknown among Jews to a Rabbi, and perhaps intended as a fulsome compliment. In Mark the expression eternal life, so common in the Johannine writings, occurs only here and at v. 30, and whether it has in this passage the full Johannine connotation of a present possession is at least doubtful. In the mind of the young man it probably had an eschatological meaning of life in the age to come, which a man inherits. V. 30 confirms this. Of such life he could feel no sense of security despite all he had attempted to do. 18 In answer, Jesus took up a word the man had used, and threw it back upon him for consideration (cf. on 9:23). The theological implications of this answer have been variously understood. Many of the Fathers and some modern commentators have taken the view that Jesus was trying to lead him to a perception of His divinity; as much as to say, 'God alone is really good; and as you do not believe I am God, but only a teacher, I cannot accept that epithet from you.' But it is extremely doubtful whether the man would have understood this at all. Strictly, the theological implications are secondary; and in so far as there are such, the meaning probably is that in an absolute sense goodness belongs to God the Father alone. By contrast, the goodness of Jesus was in some sense subject to growth and testing in the circumstances of the incarnation wherein He 'learned obedience through what he suffered' (Heb. 5:8). So H. R. Mackintosh (The Doctrine of the Person of Christ, p. 37). But the primary bearing of the words is upon the need of the man who, despite his sense of insecurity for the future, 20 nevertheless felt himself to have attained a measure of goodness judged by the standards of the law. What he now expected was to be told to undertake something difficult and exceptionally meritorious, to make good anything that might be lacking. It is this popular idea of meritorious goodness—and there is no sin more subtle than this—that our Lord attacks. The lesson to be learnt is that human attainment, such as he relied upon, can produce nothing 'good' in God's sight (Rom. 7:18). It is still true that perfect obedience to the law without failure or deviation would mean eternal life; but see Jas. 2:10, 11. In fact this man was breaking the first and greatest commandment; for his possessions were his god. 21 Therefore Jesus administers to him a liberal dose of the law as his 'schoolmaster' to bring him to Christ that he might be justified not by works but by faith (Gal. 3:24). The command to sell his possessions is accordingly not of general application; it concerned this man in particular. Neither did Jesus promise him eternal life in return for the sacrifice of his riches; but only a secure treasure in return for an insecure one. The way of life is to dispose of anything that hinders and then to follow continuously (Gk. akolouthei—present imperative). It is quite possible to part with one's possessions in some good cause without becoming a follower (1 Cor. 13:3). 22 We do not know whether this man ever thought better of it and returned. An interesting conjecture is that he did, and that his name was Barnabas.

23, 24 The disciples were astonished when Jesus pointed out how difficult it is for a rich man to enter the kingdom, for it was the prevalent opinion in Judaism that riches were a mark of divine favour, as with Job. When He went on to repeat the statement in tender tone (Children, . . .) but 25 stronger form, that it is difficult for anyone, rich or poor, 26 they were even more amazed. 27 But, after all, it is the fundamental proposition of the gospel that salvation is with men impossible, but not with God. It is the gift of God which money cannot buy; for rich and poor alike it is a miracle of divine grace (cf. Eph. 2:8). The Western Text reverses the order of vv. 24, 25, with the result that the conversation then moves smoothly and logically to the climactic statement in v. 27.

28 In the meantime Peter had been making some characteristic mental calculations and began to compare himself and his fellows favourably with the rich man. We is emphatic. 29, 30 Jesus in reply used figurative language to state the truth that He will be no man's debtor either in time or eternity; but neither will He encourage a bargaining spirit among those who profess to follow and serve Him. 31 Hence the warning added, which may be compared with Mt. 20:1–16 in the same context.

10:32–34 The third prediction of the passion

The journey draws near to its close, and we have depicted here, in an atmosphere of deepening solemnity, a striking procession—Jesus walking ahead, after the manner of an oriental shepherd (cf. Jn. 10:4); then apparently two separate companies, the Twelve, awestruck, and farther back a group of casual followers who have an indefinite presentiment that something is impending. Once more the Twelve are drawn aside and the unwelcome subject renewed, this time in the most explicit terms of all. For the first time it is made clear that both Jews and Gentiles are to have a hand in this thing, the Jews to condemn and the Gentiles to execute. The latter, had the disciples understood it, is tantamount to a disclosure that His death would be by crucifixion. Matthew (Mt. 20:19) so records it.

10:35–45 The request of James and John

From such solemn reflections the transition to this ambitious request is almost abrupt. Nothing could better illustrate the danger of having a mind preoccupied with petty thoughts of self at a time when big things are happening in the spiritual realm. Matthew (20:20, 21) puts the request into the mouth of the mother of James and John. She was Salome, and seems to have been the sister of Christ's mother (15:40; Mt. 27:56; Jn. 19:25). James and John would therefore be first cousins to Jesus. What has been well described as 'the first ecclesiastical intrigue for high places in the Church' doubtless began as a family attempt to steal a march on Peter, the third member of the inner trio. But Jesus, as Bengel finely put it, was dwelling on His passion, knowing that He was first to have others on His right hand and on His left; and all the time their minds were in another world. 38 Using therefore the poetic terms of the cup and the baptism, familiar from the OT (Ps. 11:6; Is. 51:17; Pss. 42:7; 69:1; 124:4, 5), as descriptions of suffering and immersion in overwhelming sorrow, He tried to lead them to see what lay between Him and His glory and therefore between them and the realization of their desire. 39 Their bold assertion We are able is as ignorant as their request; but Jesus took them at their word, as they both lived to discover afterwards (Acts 12:2; Rev. 1:9). 40 Nevertheless the place of their ambition was in the right of the Father alone to bestow, and that not by favouritism but on the basis of fitness of character. As little could an umpire promise the first two prizes to two runners in a race, as could Jesus promise to them the chief places in the kingdom. They might indeed obtain them, but it would be because they were worthy and not as a personal favour.

41 When the ten heard it they displayed little better grace than the ambitious two, for they were by no means content to be last. 42ff. Yet again, therefore, Jesus took them all aside to repeat the lesson they had already been taught (9:33ff.) and to put to them in plainest terms the essential difference between worldly greatness and spiritual greatness. In the world—and the words are as true a reflection of society in this modern age as in any—men delight to domineer and lord it over one another, using personal influence to secure private advancement. In the kingdom, true greatness flows from lowly and voluntary service.

45 But the unique fact about Jesus is that without any exception He practised what He preached; He is the embodiment of His own ethic. We therefore find these principles gathered up now in a saying concerning Himself which is one of the most important in the Gospels, and certainly the key verse of this Gospel. (For the suggestion that this saying is unhistorical and a product of Pauline influence see Introduction, p. 853.) It is one of the earliest explicit statements of the purpose of Christ's coming, and defines His work as being in two parts: first to serve and secondly to give. This, we may note in passing, also provides a simple division of this Gospel, the first part as far as 10:31 dealing with the service or ministry of the Son, and the remainder dealing with the ransom or sacrifice of the Son. Our main interest, however, centres in the remarkable phrase a ransom for many (Gk. lytron anti pollōn). There is little doubt that Jesus has in mind the predictions of Is. 53, which tell of the work of the suffering Servant of God in order to redeem men from evil. The figure of ransom means to deliver by paying a price and should be understood in the light of other sayings of Jesus which imply that the soul of man may become lost or forfeit. Here, for example, is the divine answer to the humanly unanswerable question of 8:37. Jesus came 'to lay down His own life as a ransom price that those to whom these forfeited lives belonged might obtain them again' (James Denney, The Death of Christ, 1951, p. 33). The word ransom (Gk. lytron) occurs elsewhere only in compounds; e.g. 1 Tim. 2:6 (antilytron hyper pantōn), where also it is followed by a different preposition of less intensive force. The use of the Greek preposition anti in this case clearly indicates the substitutionary character of the work of Christ. The force of the two prepositions together may be well illustrated by the action of a signatory for an illiterate person. He does what the other cannot do (hyper, on behalf of) and what the other therefore need not do (anti, instead of). The word many (Gk. pollōn) is a probable allusion to Is. 53:11, 12, and is intended not to limit the scope of the atoning work of Christ as though it applied to many but not all, but to show how a multitude shall derive blessing from the solitary offering of the One (cf. Rom. 5:19). The Early Fathers pressed the analogy of this ransom saying too far, by speculating as to who received the price, God or the Evil One. The results were grotesque, even as the speculation is illegitimate. A metaphor is intended to convey only a fragment of the truth.

10:46–52 Blind Bartimaeus restored to sight

Cf. Mt. 20:29–34; Lk. 18:35–43. There are divergent details in the three accounts of this incident which have for long exercised the ingenuity of the harmonizers. Matthew (Mt. 20:30) speaks of two blind men, while Luke (Lk. 18:35) places the incident at the approach to Jericho instead of when Jesus was leaving the city. These differences do not affect anything vital, being such as one would expect to find in all evidence given by trustworthy eyewitnesses. And this is doubtless a case where, if all the facts were known, there would be no difficulty of reconciliation.

Besides being in all its details an excellent parable of the gospel, the healing of the blind man was a work of Messianic significance (Is. 35:5), and is evidently introduced here by Mark with that in mind. 47, 48 Bartimaeus addressed Jesus by a Messianic title, Son of David, and is the first in this Gospel to do so. The whole incident was a prelude to the public presentation of the Messiah. Yet despite this movement of the divine programme and purpose which took Jesus steadily towards Jerusalem, it is remarkable that He was halted by the impassioned cry of need. God is always responsive to such a cry characterized, as this was, by determination (v. 48), definiteness (v. 51) and faith (v. 52). 50 The vivid picture drawn here in a few rapid strokes is peculiar to Mark. 51 At first the question put by Jesus, What do you want me to do for you? sounds superfluous to a blind man; but it probably had the twofold purpose of making him define his need and of demonstrating to the crowd that this time he was not merely begging for money. The same question had been put previously to James and John (10:36), but there received a very different response. Master (Gk. Rhabbounei). This is stronger than 'Rabbi', and means 'my lord', 'my master'. It occurs only here and from the lips of Mary Magdalene in Jn. 20:16.

11:1 - 15:47 THE PASSION WEEK

11:1–26 The entry into Jerusalem and opening events

With the exception of the last few verses dealing with the ascension, the entire remainder of the Gospel from this point is occupied with the narration of events which took place within the space of 8 days. By comparison, the events recorded hitherto cover a space of 3 years. The same literary ratio is preserved more or less by all the Evangelists, and is an indication of where the emphasis lay in the gospel of the early church. In the language of Dr James Denney, the centre of gravity in apostolic preaching was not Bethlehem but Calvary; not the life of our Lord, but His death; not His example but His expiation; not His teaching but His atonement.

11:1–11 The triumphal entry. The Messianic significance of this event is clear to us from the Gospel accounts. It represented, first, a fulfilment of Zc. 9:9; secondly, an open and deliberate assertion of Messiahship: the hour was approaching when He would be rejected and the issue must now be made plain. Either He is King, or a mistake lies at the roots of His life. He must be rejected as Messiah-King. It seems doubtful, however, whether this was understood either by the disciples or by the crowd at the time. Mark's account here is singularly restrained by comparison with the others, and there are those who consider that it was his intention still to maintain the hiddenness of our Lord's Messiahship. Furthermore John tells us (Jn. 12:16) that at first the disciples did not understand, but realized the significance of these events only after the resurrection. They were 'a veiled assertion of His Messiahship, which would not be recognized at the time, though it would afterwards be luminous for His disciples' (Cranfield). The manner of His entry expressed the character of His Messiahship, for here was in fact no military conqueror upon a war-horse, or political revolutionary of the kind the Jews expected. His purpose was not the overthrow of Rome but the breaking of the power of sin. On arrival in the capital city Jesus went at once to the Temple, which He is depicted as surveying with authority. His work had to do not with the politics and wars of Israel, but with its religion.

Finally, He retired to Bethany for the night. This was His procedure every night of the passion week.

1 Bethphage is named by all Synoptists in this connection, but the name occurs nowhere else in the OT or NT, although it is frequent in rabbinic literature, and means 'house of figs'. Its locality is uncertain. 2 It is not clear whether the village opposite you is Bethphage or Bethany, though it might well be either. There is no need to understand this verse as indicating supernatural knowledge on the part of Jesus; the simpler view, which is not just an easy rationalization, is that He had an arrangement with the owner, who was perhaps an anonymous disciple like 'the householder' (14:14). On which no one has ever sat was one of the general conditions of consecration to God (cf. Nu. 19:2; 1 Sa. 6:7). Plummer points out that the virgin birth and the burial in a new tomb are facts of the same kind. 3 Some expositors prefer to regard The Lord (Gk. ho kyrios) as referring to the owner of the animal, as we might say 'its master', on the ground that the title is not used of Jesus at all until after the resurrection, and then only by Luke and John. But there is an air of artificiality about such a message put into the mouths of the disciples, and it was after all Jesus Himself who needed the colt. He regards Himself as having a certain sovereignty over the possessions of His followers even though He will not take them by force. He promised to return the colt as soon as possible. Such was His poverty that even for this occasion He had to borrow an animal to ride upon. But it was not a mark of His humiliation that the animal was an ass, for an ass is quite in keeping in biblical thought with a royal personage coming peaceably, and this is indeed the real significance of the triumphal entry. 9 The cry Hosanna is a transliteration of the Hebrew of Ps. 118:25, 'Save now'. It is remarkable that Mark does not translate it, but it had probably become a general expression of praise and salutation, as familiar in common parlance as 'Rabbi'.

11:12–14, 20–26 The barren fig tree. Cf. Mt. 21:18–22. In Mark this story is in two parts, divided by that of the Temple cleansing. 12–14 The miracle has aroused criticism from modern scholars on two grounds: first, the unreasonableness of our Lord's action in looking for figs at Passover time; secondly, that such an action associated with His own hunger is both unlikely and unworthy of Him. The usual explanation is to say that a parable like that of the fig tree in Lk. 13:6–9 has reappeared in factual form. As to the first of the two objections, the probable explanation is that the fig tree in Palestine bears an early crop of immature fruit, like green knobs, which appears before the leaves, These are known as taksh and are the common food of the fellahin, or peasants. Their absence was clear indication of the barrenness of the tree. As to the second objection, we may note that this was Christ's only miracle of judgment, performed 'in mercy to man, on an inanimate object, to teach a moral lesson' (T. M. Lindsay). The fig tree was a symbol of the Jewish nation, which abounded in the leaves of religious profession but was barren of the fruits of righteousness. Its cursing was prophetic of the fate of the Jewish authorities who were now about to reject their Messiah.

20–26 The following day, Peter was startled by the rapidity with which the Lord's word had taken effect, and from the incident Jesus drew for His disciples a lesson on the effectiveness of prayer. Prevailing prayer turns upon two conditions, one governing our relation to God and the other our relation to our fellows. 22 The first is faith. Have faith in God (Gk. echete pistin theou) means 'Have a faith which rests on God'. 23 With such you will be able to challenge and remove mountains of obstacles in the way of God's purpose. Cf. Zc. 4:7. 25 The second is forgiveness. The words apply, of course, to the spirit and attitude of the believer when he prays. They do not make God's forgiveness of the sinner, in the evangelical sense, depend upon the sinner's forgiveness of others first (see Eph. 4:32). 26 On good MS authority, this verse is relegated to the margin in RSV and NEB. It is found in Mt. 6:15.

11:15–19 The cleansing of the Temple. The tendency among some modern scholars is to identify this incident, recorded by all the Synoptists at the beginning of passion week, with that placed by John right at the beginning of the ministry (Jn. 2:13–17), though whether Mark's or John's placing of it is the correct one is a matter upon which opinion is sharply divided. By far the most satisfactory solution is that Jesus cleansed the Temple twice. There is nothing improbable about this; indeed it is likely that the evil would revive after a first cleansing. It would agree also with John's general plan of supplementing the Synoptists, and would account for important differences of detail (e.g. the scourge) in his narrative.

The sight that met His eyes the previous evening must have led Jesus to take this course. But it was also yet another function of the Messiah (see Mal. 3:1–4). 15 The scene of action was the Court of the Gentiles where there was a market for the sale of Temple requisites and an exchange to provide Tyrian coinage in which the Temple dues had to be paid. These apparently reasonable amenities had opened the door to extortion by the hierarchy and to all the contentious bargaining of an oriental bazaar where the pilgrims were defrauded. 16 There were also those, apparently, who used the precinct as a short cut between the city and the Mount of Olives, a detail noted only by Mark. We may well picture the confusion caused by Jesus' action, and just as we are entering upon the period when He meekly surrendered to His foes it is valuable to be thus vividly reminded of His capacity for moral indignation. 17 Having cleared the market, He began to teach, basing His teaching upon two OT passages, Is. 56:7 and Je. 7:11, the former of which, significantly, has special refer ence to the provision of a place of prayer and worship for the Gentiles. 18 Yet in face of this, the authorities were still powerless to take any immediate action because of the popularity of Jesus with the multitude. 19 Also, every day during this last week, when He was a 'wanted man', He went out of the city as evening fell.

11:27 – 12:44 Teaching in Jerusalem

11:27–33 The question of authority. 27 They came again to Jerusalem, probably later in the same day as v. 20. It was the Tuesday, and, in view of all that follows, it has been called 'The day of questions'. 28 Such drastic interference as the cleansing of the Temple quite naturally led the Jewish leaders to call Jesus to account on the question of His authority. If He claimed Messiahship, He should in their view have attacked the Romans first, not the Jews. These things refers not only to the events of the previous day, but also to the whole career of Jesus which they considered had been one continual conflict with lawful authority. Yet their question was put not from the motive of protecting the public from an impostor. They sought to trap Him fatally. For Him to claim divine authority would, so they thought, amount to blasphemy; to claim authority as Son of David would be treason against Rome; to disclaim all authority would prove Him an impostor. 29, 30 His reply was in no sense an evasion or clever piece of fencing. It was merely tracing the issue a stage further back, for the right answer to His question would also answer theirs and would, moreover, show whether they had any capacity to test moral authority. 31, 32 John the Baptist had borne testimony to Jesus as the Messiah. If they acknowledged him to be a prophet with divine authority, the answer to their question was plain, and they would see that the authority of Jesus was derived from the same source. The ministry of John was one of high public importance upon which men in their position should be competent to pronounce. 33 When therefore they pleaded ignorance on a matter of such magnitude they virtually abdicated from their office as teachers of the nation, and had no further right to question the authority of Jesus. Our Lord, therefore, did not reply to their question directly. Instead He provided the complete answer in the parable that follows.

12:1–12 The parable of the wicked husbandmen. The chapter division here is unfortunate, since the parable arises out of the challenge of the chief priests. Its scope is remarkably comprehensive, covering the centuries of Israel's past history, depicting the present situation of conflict and pointing to its future issues. 1 As a national symbol of Israel, the vineyard was familiar from the OT (e.g. Is. 5:1–7) and would quickly be so understood. The hedge (Gk. phragmos) to give protection from wild animals, the pit for the wine press (Gk. hypolēnion), a vessel or trough to gather the juice of the pressed grapes, and the tower (Gk. pyrgos), a wooden booth on a high platform for a watchman (all of them words represented in the LXX of Is. 5), are all necessary elements in the story exhibiting collectively the care bestowed by the landlord, but without further significance individually. 2–5 The lesson is, first, that to this nation has been sent through the centuries a succession of servants in the OT prophets, culminating in John the Baptist, all of whom have looked for the fruits of repentance and righteousness (cf. Lk. 3:8). 6 Last of all has come One who is not merely another in the line of servants, but the only begotten and beloved Son and Heir, invested with all the authority of His Father. 7ff. At v. 7 the parable becomes prophetic: first, of the cross involving the rejection of the Messiah by His own people; secondly, of the judgment that would overtake the nation at the destruction of Jerusalem in AD 70; thirdly, of the final triumph and exaltation of the Son. 9 The words He will . . . give the vineyard to others refer to the extension of Israel's privileges to the Gentiles (cf. Mt. 8:11, 12; 21:43). 10, 11 The change of figure from the vineyard to the corner-stone makes possible the allusion to the resurrection, for where the slain son could not be revived, the rejected stone can be exalted. The OT reference is to Ps. 118, the 'Hosanna' psalm, part of which had been sung at the triumphal entry (11:9, 10). Builders are experts who should have known better. It has been objected against the parable that the behaviour of the husbandmen is contrary to natural probability. But is it any more unnatural or unreasonable than the unbelief it is meant to illustrate?

12:13–17 On tribute to Caesar. 13 For the second time the Pharisees are found in alliance with the Herodians who were their political opponents (see on 3:6). Their common purpose was to entrap (Gk. agreusōsin, a hunting metaphor) him in his talk. 14 Their question, put with flattery, concerned the Roman taxes so hateful to the Jews as a sign of their subjection. It involved the usual dilemma wherein an affirmative reply would disgust the people and a negative one would bring Him into trouble with the Romans. 15–17 Jesus' answer is one of several on this 'day of questions' which display His unassailable and perfect wisdom, and one which has profoundly influenced all subsequent thought on the ethical problem of the attitude of the Christian to the state. The whole principle laid down turns on the change of wording from pay (v. 15) to render (v. 17). In the former, AV 'give' is better than either RSV or NEB. For 'it was not a question of giving what might lawfully be refused, but of paying what was lawfully claimed. The tribute was not a gift but a debt. Caesar gave them the inestimable benefit of stable government; were they to take it and decline to pay anything towards its maintenance?' (Plummer). Duty to God and duty to the state are not incompatible; we owe a debt to both. The Pharisees admitted their debt to Caesar by using his coinage; this was why Jesus asked for the coin. If they could produce it, they had the answer to their own question. This answer would be of particular interest to Mark's Roman readers, since it acquits Christianity from the charge of disloyalty to the state. We may compare the teaching of Paul in Rom. 13:1–7.

12:18–27 On the resurrection. 18 This is Mark's only reference to the Sadducees, whom he introduces with a word of explanation. They were a priestly aristocracy, less numerous than the Pharisees and less popular. Religiously they were the rationalists of the day, although conservative in their attitude to the Scriptures in the sense that they denied the validity of the oral tradition which the Pharisees held to be binding. They took their stand particularly upon the authority of the Pentateuch. They were therefore as obnoxious to the Pharisees on religious grounds as were the Herodians on political grounds. But the Pharisees were willing to work with either for the destruction of Jesus. It may be, however, that the Sadducees now hoped to succeed where their adversaries had failed. 19–23 Their question was less dangerous than the previous one, being a matter of exegesis and speculation rather than politics, doctrinal rather than ethical. The fantastic story they told was doubtless intended to draw Jesus into ridicule. It was based on the law of levirate marriage in Dt. 25:5–10, the purpose of which was to prevent the eventuality of a man dying without posterity—a calamity of the first order to a Jew. 24–27 Our Lord's reply deals first with the manner of the resurrection, pointing out that marriage on the physical side, to which the levirate law relates, is relevant only in the world where death prevails and so makes necessary the perpetuation of the race. Life in the next world is not a mere repetition of present conditions. In one sense, the particular question of the Sadducees is of little concern to us today, but objections arising from the difficulty of conceiving a resurrection are still current. It is argued that a resurrection would involve conditions that are incredible. The answer to all such objections is the plain one, you know neither the scriptures nor the power of God. The Lord then proceeds from the manner to the fact of the resurrection, 26 skilfully drawing His proof from the Pentateuch so greatly cherished by the Sadducees. Long after the patriarchs had died, God spoke of Himself as enjoying a relationship with them which remained intimate and permanent. 'The passage suggests the one consideration which above all others confirms the modern Christian in his belief in life after death; for to him this hope is based, not on Platonic arguments concerning the nature of the soul, but upon the experience of communion with God' (Vincent Taylor, in loc.).

12:28–34 On the first commandment. Lk. 10:25–28 is considered by Manson and Cranfield to be neither parallel to, nor a doublet of, this passage, but to refer to a different occasion. This further question, a moral one, is obviously introduced here by Mark as having been asked on the same occasion; it is not inserted merely for topical reasons although belonging chronologically to the Galilaean ministry, as some have suggested. The scribe exhibited qualities not apparent in other questioners. He was sincere and intelligent; yet this did not suffice to bring him into the kingdom (v. 34). 28 His question—literally 'What kind of commandment (Gk. poia entolē) is first of all?'—presupposes a difference in importance between commandments or classes of commandments. Rabbis divided the precepts of the law into 'weighty' and 'light', but the allocation of them into these categories caused much debate. Or possibly the scribe had in mind the distinction between moral and ritual commands. 29–31 The answer of Jesus is remarkable for the fact that it brings together two widely separated scriptures to sum up the duty of man. Yet both were very familiar. The first, Dt. 6:4, 5, was the Shema, or creed of Israel, and would normally be recited twice daily by the questioner himself. It was the commandment actually worn in phylacteries, and sometimes nailed to doorposts in literal obedience to Dt. 6:8, 9. The second is given in the exact words of the LXX from Lv. 19:18. The two are summed up in the one word 'love', first toward God, then toward man; love conceived not as an emotional sentiment but as an active principle embracing the entire personality. It is probably true to say that in modern times men lay great emphasis on love to man, or philanthropy, but are inclined to forget the requirement of love to God. Our Lord links the two and gives primacy to the latter. Philanthropy is no substitute for religion, but should flow from it.

12:35–37a On the Son of David. It is the turn of Jesus Himself to ask a question. The reason He does so is not, as some have suggested, to deny His birth in Bethlehem from the line of David, but to teach that He is in fact far more than 'son of David'; He is Lord. To do this He quotes from Ps. 110:1, the Davidic authorship of which is generally denied by modern criticism. An interesting critical problem is therefore raised, and it is surprising to what subtleties of argument critics will allow themselves to be driven rather than jettison the theory that the psalm is not Davidic. It is impossible to state the position fully here (see the introduction to Ps. 110, p. 521 above), but we may observe that, whereas in other instances the validity of our Lord's pronouncements on questions of OT authorship may be held not to affect His argument, in this case His whole argument turns upon it. It 'is not drawn from the august language of the Psalm, but from David's relationship to the Messiah, and crumbles to pieces if he is not the singer' (Alexander Maclaren). We hold, therefore, that our Lord's attribution of the psalm to David must foreclose the question of authorship for all who accept His authority. (Cf. Acts 2:34. See also Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, ii, pp. 405f.)

12:37b–40 A warning against the scribes. That the great throng, or 'the mass of the people' (Moffatt), heard him gladly is a statement which belongs probably to what follows rather than to what precedes. His teaching still attracted crowds. They were fascinated by His wisdom and perhaps enjoyed seeing the rout of the professional teachers. But nearly all, under pressure, were later prepared to consent to His death. Not all the scribes were equally bad (cf. v. 34), but the general tendency of their class was in the direction of ostentation, avarice and hypocrisy. Let simple folk beware of religion of this kind; moral and spiritual power counts for far more than long robes and officialdom.

12:41–44 The widow's two mites. This choice story brings welcome relief after the heat of controversy, for here is one who, in the simplicity of her lowly worship, gave to God her all. It is no doubt in place here as to its historical setting, but possibly the saying about devouring widows' houses (v. 40) gave it a topical appropriateness as well. 41 It is not certain that there was a building called the treasury (Gk. gazophylakion; cf. Jn. 8:20); but along the colonnade which surrounded the Court of the Women there were thirteen chests with trumpet-shaped openings (Heb. šôpārôṯ) provided for the offerings of the worshippers. At some vantage-point in full view of this part of the Temple Jesus sat, probably wearied by the prolonged disputations of the day.

The lesson of the whole story is that our Lord's first concern is not what men give but how they give it. Money in itself has no value in the kingdom of God; so Jesus refused to count totals but looked at the motives of the donor (cf. 2 Cor. 8:12). 42 Therefore when His eye fell upon the solitary figure of a poor widow who put in two copper coins (Gk. lepta, the smallest copper coin in use) which Mark, for the benefit of his Roman readers, computes in terms of Roman coinage as equivalent to a penny (Gk. kodrantēs, a transliteration of the Latin quadrans; NEB 'a farthing'), 43, 44 He called the attention of the disciples to her. In answer to the question how Jesus came to know the amount of her gift, we reply that He may have discovered by quite ordinary means which are not disclosed, or, as some prefer to think, by supernatural knowledge; but in any case the question is irrelevant to the story. The essence of all true giving is sacrifice, and the value of every gift relative, not absolute.

13:1–37 The prophetic discourse

It is not possible within the scope of our present purpose to discuss at any length that form of criticism in regard to this great chapter, in which it has been called the 'Little Apocalypse'. For some time it was a widely-accepted hypothesis that the core of the chapter was a small Jewish or Jewish-Christian apocalyptic writing. Two considerations, however, tend to discredit the idea. First, certain characteristics of true apocalyptic are wanting. There is none of the highly figurative language of Daniel or Revelation, featuring strange beasts and visions; also, while apocalyptic is predictive to the almost entire exclusion of moral exhortation, the latter is present here in a marked degree throughout. Secondly, as Edersheim has shown, contemporary Jewish opinion regarding the end-time was utterly different from anything expressed here. Moreover, it is significant that this discourse of our Lord on Mt. Olivet is recorded by all the Synoptists at considerable length and with substantial agreement as to the main details; they further agree in placing it at the same point in our Lord's ministry (see Mt. 24:1–51; Lk. 21:5–38). This indicates that the early church recognized and accepted it as part of the original gospel tradition.

13:1–4 The question of the four disciples. 1 As was His custom at the close of the day, Jesus left the Temple and the city. On the way, an unnamed disciple drew attention to the magnificence of the Temple buildings. We may imagine that the Temple, larger than York Minster, and having a façade of gold, would present a most imposing spectacle from the Mount of Olives. Some of the stones measured as much as 30 ft in length. To the Jew nothing seemed so stable as this building, the symbol of God's presence with His people. 2 Little wonder that the disciples were astounded to be told that the great edifice should be completely overthrown. 3 Four of them, therefore, the two pairs of brothers who were called at the beginning (1:16–20), 4 put to Jesus in private a twofold question as to the time and the sign of this terrible calamity. It is not quite clear what these things refers to, and Matthew (Mt. 24:3) expands the question into a threefold one looking on to the end of the age. In any case, from this question flows the discourse that follows in which two major events seem to be in view throughout: first, the immediate event in the fall of Jerusalem in AD 70, and secondly, the ultimate event of the return of Christ in glory. It has frequently been observed that there is a kind of perspective in the point of view of prophecy, whereby crises of history are seen like mountain ranges portrayed upon a canvas, one behind another, without any cognizance of the tracts of territory between. This chapter, with its two great crises in view between which already 1,900 years have intervened, is an illustration of this principle, and this fact should be borne in mind when seeking to interpret it.

13:5–13 Warnings to disciples. Some take the view that this section derives from a group of sayings relating to the 'coming' of Christ, or parousia (a word found only in Mt. 24 in the Gospels), rather than to AD 70, and that therefore it is no part of the original answer to the question in v. 4. It is obvious, however, that Mark intends us to take it as the answer, and we prefer to think that Jesus spoke these words, as He so often did, first for the disciples there present, but also with an eye to the future needs of the church. He is, as it were, using the events associated with the immediate crisis to foreshadow those connected with the ultimate crisis, and this explains why the two are interwoven so closely.

5 Jesus began to say to them, Take heed. The words not only state the main lesson of the chapter (cf. vv. 9, 23, 33) but also emphasize the true purpose of all biblical prophecy, which is not speculative but practical, not to enable us to forecast the future but to interpret the present, not to satisfy curiosity but to deliver from perplexity and to encourage watchfulness. 6–8 The disciples are warned against deception. There would be impostors in the religious sphere, commotions in the political and international field and calamities in the physical realm; but such things are incidental to the course of the age, and are not necessarily to be taken as the signs of the end. Rather are they the beginning of the sufferings (Gk. ōdinōn, 'birthpangs'). 9–13 A second warning follows against spiritual failure in view of what will happen to them personally and within the Christian community. This paragraph brings vividly before us a truth which is often lost sight of in modern times, namely that the role of the Christian church during this age is unquestionably one of suffering. Indeed the church has never flourished better than at those times when it has been an illicit society driven underground. Worldly favour and prosperity, as in the days of Constantine, have always had an enervating and enfeebling effect upon it. 9 One of the first to fulfil the prediction of this verse was Saul of Tarsus, as a persecuting Jew and then as a persecuted Christian (Acts 9:1, 2; 2 Cor. 11:24). 10, 11 significantly place the preaching of the gospel in this context of suffering, a context which it undoubtedly has in the book of Acts, where the greater part of apostolic preaching was not before respectable congregations gathered for the purpose, but in courts of justice. 11 offers no encouragement to the unprepared preacher; it is a promise to those suddenly called upon to defend their faith in the face of persecution, that they may count upon the moment-to-moment guidance and inspiration of the Holy Spirit. 13 To endure to the end probably means not to the end of the age, as in v. 7, but to the uttermost (cf. Jn. 13:1), an endurance which is complete. Endurance, therefore, is one of the keynotes of Christian life and witness in this age. It is very often much easier to be busily engaged in work and action than it is to endure with patience (cf. Heb. 10:32–39; 12:3, 4; Rev. 1:9). The expression will be saved is used here, of course, in an eschatological sense (cf. Heb. 9:28).

13:14–27 The two crises of the future. A new section of the prophecy seems to begin here. Having answered the questions of v. 4 thus far in a general, rather negative manner, pointing to certain phenomena which are not signs of the end, Jesus now speaks of a particular notable event, and of the proper behaviour of the disciples when such an event shall come to pass.

14 The desolating sacrilege (Gk. to bdelygma tēs erēmōseōs) is an expression which comes from Dn. 9:27; 11:31; 12:11. In OT usage this is any idolatrous person or object such as would excite the disgust and abhorrence of the Jew. Cf. 1 Ki. 21:26; 2 Ki. 16:3, where the same Greek word occurs in the LXX. The fact that Mark here deliberately, though ungrammatically, connects a masculine participle, set up (Gk. hestēkota), with this neuter noun indicates that a person is in view. We conclude therefore that the first reference in this verse is to the profanation of the Temple by the Romans in AD 70; this is confirmed by Lk. 21:20. Nevertheless the meaning of the words is not exhausted by this, and Jesus was probably referring in a secondary sense, for the benefit of the future church, to the appearing of antichrist. The context supports this, for the language of vv. 19, 20 is certainly eschatological and far too emphatic to apply only to the circumstances of the siege of Jerusalem, however terrible. Where it ought not to be is an intentionally vague expression, since more precise terms would perhaps have been politically dangerous for Mark's readers. Let the reader understand may be either the words of Jesus calling attention to the passage in Daniel, or those of Mark calling attention to this saying of Jesus. 15–18 A series of vivid illustrations of the need for instant flight as in conditions of war. Prayer for temporal advantages to facilitate escape is enjoined. 18 Winter may perhaps better be rendered 'stormy weather'. Just prior to AD 70 the Christians of Jerusalem did in fact make their escape in this way and Eusebius, the church historian, tells us that they fled to Pella, in Peraea, E of Jordan. 21–23 These verses are thought by some to be a doublet of vv. 5, 6, derived from a different source and reflecting a doctrinal situation in the early church similar to that of 2 Thes. 2:9. There is, however, no inherent improbability in the suggestion that what is undoubtedly the chief practical lesson of these prophetic utterances should have been thus reiterated and expanded by our Lord. His technique as a teacher is no less perfect than His technique as a physician. 24, 25 From this point Jesus goes on to speak of the second great crisis yet future, namely the return in glory of the Son of man. The impression is conveyed that this follows soon upon the tribulation of vv. 14–23, which again leads us to think that the latter has an eschatological significance and was by no means limited to the happenings of AD 70. How far the language here is to be understood symbolically of political and international convulsions, as most commentators of the past 60 years have understood it, is difficult to decide. Much that used to be relegated unhesitatingly to the realm of apocalyptic may now, in an atomic age, be seen to have rather the semblance of sober truth and grim reality; and it would be unscientific, to say the least, to affirm that these words may not refer to objective phenomena in the form of cosmic disturbances prior to the return of Christ. 26 The Son of man coming in clouds is a clear reference to Dn. 7:13. Early in His ministry Jesus began to use the title 'Son of man' of Himself (see on 2:10), but here for the first time the connection with the prophecy in Daniel is apparent. Amid much that is perplexing in the details of such a chapter as this, the one fact that stands out with crystal clarity is the ultimate triumph of Jesus; the suffering Messiah shall eventually enter into His glory, although the use of the third person here, then they will see, rather intimates that those whom He is addressing will not live to see it. 27 The gathering together of the elect by the angels (cf. Heb. 1:14) suggests that the divine purpose in v. 10 will have been accomplished in the meantime.

13:28–37 Parables and sayings on watchfulness. This is the practical application of all that has gone before. The chapter concludes with a plain assertion that these injunctions belong not to that generation alone, but to every generation of the Christian church. 'What the Church of the New Testament has been and is, that her Lord and Master made her, and by no agency more effectually than by leaving undetermined the precise time of His return' (Edersheim).

28 The lesson of the fig tree draws attention once more to what is the true purpose of prophecy (see on v. 5), not that disciples may prophesy, but that they may with spiritual insight discern the unfolding of God's purpose in the moving spectacle of events. 30 This is a saying of acknowledged difficulty, preserved by all three Synoptists. Two meanings seem possible: either that the Jewish race will survive until the end of the age, or that Jerusalem would be destroyed within the lifetime of the generation then living. This latter actually happened and is the more probable meaning; although Swete (in loc.) concedes in regard to the word generation (Gk. genea) that it may have been purposely employed because it was capable of being understood in a narrower or a wider sense. Clearly we are to learn from this and 31 the following verse that the fact of Christ's personal return is unalterably sure. 32 The time alone is uncertain, being locked in the counsels of the Father, so that even the Son, in the voluntarily-accepted limitations of His incarnation, does not share the secret. The absolute use of the Son is specially significant. 'It is an important piece of evidence against the view that Jesus could not have thought of himself as the unique Son of God' (Cranfield). 33 The necessity for vigilance and prayerfulness is therefore reiterated. 34, 35 The parable of the master of the house helps to define vigilance not as a leaving of our duties, but a faithful doing of them, in the expectation that the Master will one day examine our work (1 Cor. 3:13–15; 2 Cor. 5:10). Our duty is to use the time that remains in the work of winning others for Him.

14:1 – 15:47 The passion narrative

14:1–11 The plot to betray Jesus. We treat this paragraph as a whole, because vv. 10, 11 are directly connected with vv. 1, 2, and the intervening story of the anointing has evidently been introduced here by Mark with the twofold purpose of throwing into relief the treachery and avarice of Judas and of showing that the incident was at least one factor in his turning traitor. For here he heard Jesus speak quite plainly of His burial, and perhaps at last realized that his cherished hopes of material power and advancement were doomed.

The chronology of events on the Thursday and Friday of passion week presents one of the most difficult problems in the Gospels. What is clear is that those events moved according to divine programme, not human design. The priests evidently planned to arrest Jesus after the Feast of the Passover to avoid an insurrection. But the unexpected offer of Judas Iscariot simplified matters considerably, so that they were able to act without further delay. They had secured a competent agent whose responsibility it now was, instead of theirs, to find an opportunity to arrest Him. Thus it came to pass that the divine plan was followed, and Jesus, 'the Lamb of God', yielded up His life on the great festival day. There is therefore discernible in Judas an amazing fusion of divine sovereignty and human free will. The latter must not be surrendered in an attempt to soften his guilt. Jesus must suffer; but Judas need not have been the traitor; he opened the door to Satan (Jn. 13:27) and well illustrates the solemn principle enunciated in Heb. 6:4–8 that there is a supreme peril in enjoying spiritual privileges and failing to respond.

3–9 The lovely story of the anointing is placed by John 'six days before the Passover' (Jn. 12:1). His precision in dating it is not likely to be erroneous, and we conclude that Mark, followed by Matthew (Mt. 26:6–13), has sacrificed the chronological order for homiletical reasons. It is John also who identifies the woman with Mary of Bethany. Simon the leper was probably one who had been healed; he may have been related to Lazarus and his sisters. The identity of name has led some, even as far back as Origen's time, to confuse this narrative with that in Lk. 7:36–50. But whereas the difficulty of believing in two such anointings is infinitesimal, that of believing that Mary of Bethany was ever 'a woman of the city, who was a sinner' is enormous. Moreover Simon was one of the commonest of names. C. C. Torrey makes the interesting suggestion on the basis of the Aramaic that the word for leper should in fact be 'jar-merchant', the two words in Aramaic having identical consonants. The meal was probably the special festive meal of the sabbath. At that last feast of fellowship Mary alone among the disciples and guests seemed to discern how near the end was. An alabaster jar would probably be a fragile unguent flask with a long narrow neck. The precise meaning of the expression ointment of pure (Gk. pistikēs, 'genuine') nard is uncertain. That it was of special quality and value is clear.

Whether Mary fully appreciated the significance of her action at the time may be questioned; for it is probably true of most service and worship offered in pure devotion to Christ that it possesses a worth and meaning beyond our understanding. So far as we know, Jesus' body received no other anointing for burial; cf. 16:1. When therefore this fact came home to her, how great would be her joy! In humility, love and faith she exemplifies 'the fellowship of his sufferings' (Phil. 3:10). 5 Three hundred denarii represents a sum of money roughly equivalent to a labourer's wage for the greater part of a year, the 'denarius' being a day's wage.

14:12–25 The Last Supper. 12 The first day of Unleavened Bread, when they sacrificed the passover lamb was the day we know as Good Friday, 14th Nisan. But according to Jewish reckoning this day began at sunset the day before. The events of this paragraph therefore took place on the Thursday evening. The question of whether the supper was in fact the Passover meal remains unsettled despite prolonged discussion on both sides. The Synoptic tradition, as here, clearly indicates that it was. On the other hand John, with precision and consistency (Jn. 18:28b; 19:31), places the Passover on the Friday evening after the crucifixion. There is hardly likely to be any better solution than to conclude that Jesus, knowing that He could not observe the Passover at the proper time, kept it a day in advance. It is attractive to believe, accordingly, that 'Christ, our paschal lamb' (1 Cor. 5:7, was sacrificed for us at the very hour when the Passover lambs were slain in the Temple. 13 In preparation for the feast, Jesus sent two of his disciples, whom Luke names as Peter and John (Lk. 22:8), into the city to look for a man carrying a jar of water. This was unusual, since normally only women carried such jars (Jn. 4:7). The man would evidently be a servant, and on following him they would be led to the owner, with whom it seems Jesus had a previously arranged understanding about the use of the room. 14 This is rather implied in the question The Teacher says, Where is my guest room? 'There is perhaps a hint of messianic sovereignty in the word' my (Nineham). For security reasons it was necessary that both the identity of this anonymous disciple and the location of the venue should be a well-kept secret. 15 The large upper room would be furnished with such necessities as table, couches for reclining, basin, water and towel (Jn. 13:4f.). 16 The disciples would complete the preparations for food. Perhaps the most significant detail is that there is no mention of a lamb being provided or consumed, and it is very improbable that there was one. There would be no need of a typical lamb when the true Lamb of God was present and about to be offered the very next day.

Originally the Passover lamb was eaten standing (Ex. 12:11), but this custom had long been abandoned, and the feast was now celebrated reclining, in token that the people were no longer slaves but free, enjoying the security of the land of promise. 18 The disclosure of the betrayal is made with startling plainness, yet not, according to Mark's account, in such a manner as to name the traitor. We depend upon John (Jn. 13:26) for the knowledge that this information was secretly given to the beloved disciple. The enormity of the crime is indicated by the fact that, to the oriental, the fellowship of a meal was specially sacred, and hostile action against one with whom one ate bread was absolutely precluded (cf. Ps. 41:9). 20 In this case Judas not only ate with Jesus; even more intimately, he dipped with Him in the dish. The dish (Gk. tryblion) was probably the bowl of sauce into which pieces of unleavened bread were dipped, assuming that the meal was in fact the Passover. 21 clearly states both the divine sovereignty and human responsibility to which we have already referred (see on vv. 1, 2, 10, 11), and places the latter squarely on the shoulders of Judas. 'The divine necessity for the Passion was no excuse for the free agent who brought it about' (Swete).

22–25 Mark's account of the institution of the Lord's Supper is concise almost to the point of obscurity, but it brings before us the second main line of teaching in the Gospel concerning the work of Christ (see Introduction, p. 853, and on 10:45). The following points are clear. First, Take indicates that His death with its benefits was a gift which His disciples must appropriate, and that this appropriation is of a most intimate kind comparable with the assimilation of food and a partaking of its nourishment and efficacy. Secondly, His death is the inauguration of the covenant of grace prophesied by Jeremiah (Je. 31:31–34). Moses had spoken of the 'blood of the covenant' (Ex. 24:8) in connection with the old covenant which God made with Israel at Sinai. Centuries later Jeremiah revealed the terms of the new covenant, namely divine forgiveness and indwelling, but he said nothing about its ratification by blood. This would strike Hebrew ears as unusual, for among oriental peoples any kind of covenant or agreement between two persons, such as, for example, two bedouin of the desert, would be sealed in some way by blood. It is as though Jesus now completed the picture outlined by Jeremiah; the new covenant would be sealed in His blood. Poured out for many (cf. again 10:45) once more echoes Is. 53:11, 12. Jesus thought of His death as a vicarious sacrifice for men. The expressions this is my body and this is my blood, though literally rendered in the RSV, are perhaps as well translated by Moffatt as by any: 'Take this, it means my body . . . This means my covenant blood.' 'Our Lord's human body was present and His blood had not yet been shed. Therefore all carnal ideas respecting the meaning of these words are excluded' (Plummer). Thirdly, Jesus looked forward beyond His death to His risen life and to the perfect fellowship of the consummated kingdom. The table of the Lord has a forward aspect towards the consummation as well as a backward reference to the cross. 25 The vocabulary and ideas of this verse are strongly Semitic. Barth connects the refusal to drink again of the fruit of the vine with the Nazirite vow (Nu. 6:1–21), by making which 'Jesus consecrates Himself for the imminent sacrificial offering of His life'. Or the words may imply a final break with the Jewish dispensation under which He had hitherto lived. The eschatological interest appears also in Paul's account (1 Cor. 11:26), while the idea of a Messianic banquet in the kingdom of God belongs to both OT and NT. Cf. Is. 25:6; Mt. 8:11; Lk. 14:15; Rev. 19:9.

14:26–31 Peter's denial foretold. 26 When they had sung a hymn; it was probably the second part of the Hallel (Pss. 115–118). 27 As Jesus foretold the betrayal, so now, on the way from the upper room to the Mount of Olives, He foretells the denial by Peter. The words of Zc. 13:7 will find fulfilment in the case of Himself and His disciples. A time of testing will come upon them as a result of which the faith of them all will give way. 28 Nevertheless beyond the dark hour He will meet them again in Galilee. Jesus scarcely ever referred to His death without looking beyond it. 29 Peter protested, as once before (8:32f.), and 30 Jesus' reply is in the most solemn terms, Truly, I say to you. . . . This very night brings the denial within the space of the next few hours. 31 It is well to remember that all the disciples associated themselves with Peter's vehement protestations.

14:32–42 The agony in Gethsemane. Again the privileged three are taken and there are several points of similarity between this scene and the transfiguration. With vv. 37–40 cf. 9:5f.; Lk. 9:32. 32 Sit here is spoken to the eight who are left near the entrance. 33 While still in the company of the three He began to be greatly distressed and troubled (Gk. ekthambeisthai kai adēmonein). These are words supremely difficult to translate. They express the utmost degree of unbounded horror and suffering. 34 Little is said in Scripture about the soul of the Lord Jesus, but when He says My soul is very sorrowful, even to death, the deep anguish of His humanity becomes evident. 35 So great was it that He was driven from them a short distance—Luke says 'about a stone's throw' (Lk. 22:41), where they could both see and hear—to seek the face of His Father. 36 Abba is Aramaic for 'Father'. The addition of the Greek patēr is probably not a translation by Mark. Some think the two words together are a very early liturgical formula of address in prayer. But it is more likely that they reflect a natural prayer habit of Jesus Himself, which some of His disciples caught and transmitted (cf. Rom. 8:15; Gal. 4:6). In any case they are a reminder that our faith had its origin among a bilingual people.

We shall never know exactly what this cup was from which Jesus shrank in such horror. It was certainly more than physical suffering, otherwise many a martyr has since shown greater courage than He. We may say that it was the agony to His sinless soul of being 'made sin' (2 Cor. 5:21) and exposed to the divine judgment on sin, of tasting in all its bitterness that death which is the wages of sin, that those who trust in Him might never taste it (Heb. 2:9). This is something beyond the range of human experience altogether, since He alone was sinless. The words yet not what I will, but what thou wilt are the crucial point in Gethsemane. Doctrinally they illustrate the important truth that there was in Jesus a real human will, distinct from, but always submissive to, the will of His Father. Experimentally they mark the point of His triumph, so that the victory of the cross was in fact won in prayer in the garden beforehand and Jesus went to Calvary victoriously. Man's arch-enemy wrought sin and death by asserting his will against God (Is. 14:13, 14); Jesus wrought salvation by submitting His will to God. Acceptance of the will of God is always victory, whereas self-will inevitably leads to defeat. 37 The picture of the sleeping disciples is in sharp contrast with that of Jesus at prayer. Peter is addressed as the one who had protested that he would die with Jesus; yet now he had not the strength to watch for an hour. There was clearly an element of conflict with Satanic powers in the garden. The earlier temptations of our Lord's ministry were here renewed in a last titanic assault, the intensity of which He felt. 38 Knowing full well that victory in temptation was to be won only at the price of vigilance and prayer, He warned the slumbering disciples of their own need. 41 It is possible that between the question here and what follows we are to understand an interval of time during which Jesus Himself watched over them.

14:43–52 The arrest of Jesus. Few details in history have so powerfully impressed the minds of men as the fact that Judas betrayed the Son of God with a kiss. 45 An emphatic form of the verb (katephilēsen; RV mg. 'kissed him much') is used, as though to suggest more than usual fervour and affection. 47 One of those who stood by. This anonymous person is referred to by John (Jn. 18:10) as Peter, and the servant's name is given as Malchus. Luke alone (Lk. 22:51) records the healing of the ear. 49 Day after day 'suggests a longer ministry in Jerusalem than Mark has recorded and is perhaps evidence in support of the Johannine tradition in this respect' (Cranfield). 50 All is emphatic in the Greek. Without exception the disciples failed Jesus and He was completely forsaken. 51 A young man. Why is this curious incident mentioned? Many commentators favour the suggestion that the young man was Mark himself, who thus, as it were, 'paints a small picture of himself in the corner of his work' (Zahn). If, as some also have conjectured, he was the son of 'the householder' in v. 14 (cf. Acts 12:12), his appearance at this juncture is even more intelligible. Becoming aware of the noise and the lights in the garden near at hand, he took the first thing that came to hand as a covering and ran out to see what was happening. No good reason can be shown for the recording of the incident unless it is based on personal reminiscence.

14:53–65 The trial before the high priest. The combined Synoptic record makes it plain that the trial of Jesus was in two parts, one ecclesiastical before the Jewish authorities as here related, the other civil before the Roman governor as related in the next chapter. Again, the ecclesiastical trial seems to have been in two parts, the first of an informal and preliminary character at midnight, and the second before a full official meeting of the Sanhedrin in the early morning (15:1). Luke's account (Lk. 22:54–71) is clearer than Mark's in this respect. The whole proceeding transgressed the requirements of Jewish law in several particulars. The meeting of the Sanhedrin by night was in itself illegal, as was also the suborning of witnesses. 53 The high priest was Caiaphas (Mt. 26:57) who held office AD 18–36. Nothing is said by Mark about Annas (cf. Jn. 18:13). 54 Peter's affection for his Lord evidently reasserted itself to a degree, but to follow at a distance is in any circumstances to invite disaster. 55ff. From this point the narrative consists almost entirely of sayings, questions and answers, and seems to lack the usual artless details which characterize the record of eyewitnesses. This may be due to the fact that no disciple was an immediate witness of the trial, though Jn. 18:15f. suggests that the beloved disciple and Peter were in the vicinity. The efforts of the council were at first unavailing. 56, 59 The witnesses did not agree, and 61 Jesus kept silence. The high priest therefore sought to force an issue, and put to Jesus a point-blank question about His claim to Messiahship. 62 Thus challenged, Jesus for the first time in the Gospel acknowledged who He was, using the language of Ps. 110:1 and Dn. 7:13.

63 Tore his mantle. For his own misfortunes the high priest was forbidden to do this (Lv. 21:10), but in his official capacity he protested in this way against any utterance regarded as blasphemous. The Talmud prescribes the exact manner in which it must be done. His question reveals 'the satisfaction of the conspirator . . . through the distress of the official' (Plummer). 64 They all condemned him as deserving (Gk. enochon, 'worthy of'; RV mg. 'liable to') death, but had no power to inflict the penalty; only Pilate could do that. 65 That members of the supreme court could behave in this manner shows the malignity with which they had come to judge their prisoner.

14:66–72 Peter's denial. It is well to remember that this particular account comes without doubt from the recollections of Peter himself and is accordingly related with singular fullness and vividness. 71 That he began to invoke a curse on himself and to swear (Gk. anathematizein kai omnynai) does not, however, mean that he used profanity; but rather that he affirmed on oath. He called down the 'anathema' of God upon his head if what he said was not true. 72 He broke down and wept (Gk. kai epibalōn eklaien); the exact meaning of the Greek words has long constituted a difficulty. RSV here is perhaps the best attempt.

15:1–15 The trial before Pilate. 1 As soon as it was morning, i.e. as soon as it was lawful to transact business, a brief and formal meeting of the Sanhedrin was convened to confirm the proceedings of the irregular midnight session and to get the matter dealt with by the Roman governor before the paschal lambs were killed in the afternoon. The delivering of Jesus to Pilate initiated the civil trial. Pontius Pilate was procurator of Judea under the legatus of Syria from AD 26 to 36. Normally he resided in Caesarea but came to Jerusalem for the Passover season to ensure order at a time when national feeling ran high. He is represented in secular history as corrupt and cruel, but the Gospels seem to take a less unfavourable view of him. Mark's account here does not hide the deplorable weakness of the man but, at the same time, seems designed to exonerate him as far as possible and to place the ultimate responsibility for the crucifixion upon the Jews. It would be of particular importance to Roman readers to learn that, in the eyes of the Roman officer, Jesus was held to be innocent and could not be condemned as a political agitator.

2 King of the Jews. The hierarchy had evidently framed the charge with this political flavour, since a claim to Messiahship would be meaningless to Pilate. You have said so is an answer which assents without necessarily agreeing to the meaning which Pilate would attach to his question. The general course of the proceedings becomes more intelligible if we compare the more detailed account given by John (Jn. 18:28 – 19:16). There we discover that Jesus explained to Pilate in private that His kingdom was not of this world. 3 The priests felt their case was not going too well, so they multiplied accusations. 6 Nothing is known of this custom beyond what is told us in the NT. 7 Barabbas means 'son of a father' and the name invites a contrast with 'the Son of the Father'. In the parallel passage (Mt. 27:16) there is an interesting variant reading 'Jesus Barabbas', which was originally rejected by Hort as a corruption. At that time, however, the Koridethi manuscript of the Gospels and the Sinaitic Syriac Version, both of which contain it, were unknown. Vincent Taylor therefore concludes that 'There is good reason to think that it is original in Matthew . . . and to conjecture that it was read in Mark'. Barabbas was just the type of political insurgent the hierarchy had wanted to see in the Messiah, one who would use force where Jesus had refused to do so. 8–10 Here the crowd comes into view. Pilate began to discern that the real crime of Jesus was not hostility to Rome, which Jews would not normally resent, but that He had been too popular and the priests were envious of Him. He therefore hoped that a proposal to release

Jesus in honour of the feast would be welcomed by the people. 11 The amazing fickleness of the crowd, stirred up as they were by the chief priests, is thought by some to be almost incredible. But it was undoubtedly a profound shock to them to see the supposed Messiah a helpless prisoner in the hands of the heathen procurator. There was a violent change of feeling, psychologically characteristic of a mob, and they were quickly ready to clamour for the punishment of the impostor. 15 Wishing to satisfy the crowd. The lasting shame of Pilate is that he chose expediency above principle. Multitudes have done, and are doing, precisely the same thing since. The punishment of scourging usually preceded crucifixion. It was a brutal torture, inflicted with whips of leather loaded with metal or bone. One infliction of it often proved fatal. John seems to suggest that Pilate resorted to it in the hope that the Jews would be satisfied (Jn. 19:1). Even so it was a flagrant breach of Roman justice in the case of an uncondemned man.

15:16–41 The crucifixion. In all the Gospels the actual crucifixion is narrated in the most straightforward manner and with marked restraint. Our Lord's physical sufferings are not dwelt upon, for nothing is gained by gruesomeness. Moreover the physical pain was only secondary to the bitter desolation of spirit which He experienced because of sin. The comment of Calvin is noteworthy here: 'These matters call for secret meditation, rather than for the ornament of words.'

16 Jesus was handed over to the soldiers who made sport with Him. The praetorium is translated 'hall of judgment' in Jn. 18:28 (AV); it was probably part of the residence of the procurator, which some think was in Herod's palace in Jerusalem. 17 The purple cloak may have been a soldier's faded garment which looked like purple. In all this they acted out of contempt, not so much for Jesus, perhaps, as for the Jewish nation whose King He claimed to be. 20 It is not said that they eventually removed the crown of thorns as well as the purple, but it is probable that they did. Plummer points out that the centurion would not have allowed the mockery to continue when the march to the place of execution began. Pictures of the crucifixion are therefore misleading when they represent the Saviour as wearing the crown of thorns. Perhaps the dominant impression left upon the mind by this account of the mockery is that of the intense loneliness of Jesus.

21 Cyrene is in N Africa. There was a strong colony of Jews there and Simon may have been one of them, arriving in Jerusalem for the Passover; or he may have been a Gentile stranger. The mention of his sons indicates that they had become disciples. We know nothing further of Alexander, but Rufus may be the Rufus of Rom. 16:13, a member of the church in Rome. 22 The place of a skull was probably so called from the contour of the ground. 23 Wine mingled with myrrh was an opiate or anaesthetic. But Jesus refused to meet death with His mental faculties clouded. Had He received the potion, we might never have had the words from the cross. 25 The third hour was 9 o'clock in the morning. Various explanations have been advanced to explain the apparent disagreement with Jn. 19:14. But John is probably reckoning from midnight, in which case he merely states that Jesus was still before Pilate at 6 a.m. 26 The inscription accords with Roman custom; all four Evangelists record it, but no two agree exactly as to the wording. Mark's version, however, is basic to all and preserves the words that were so particularly offensive to the Jews (cf. Jn. 19:21). 27 The robbers occupied the places for which James and John had asked (10:37). 31 The mocking words of the chief priests constitute 'one of the supreme ironies of history' (Vincent Taylor). He could have come down from the cross, but did not. His staying there was our salvation; and that salvation costs us nothing because it cost Him everything.

33 All the Synoptists record the darkness from noon until 3 p.m. Though brought about by natural causes, the timing of it was clearly supernatural. It could not have been the darkness of a solar eclipse, for, as Origen pointed out, it was full moon. 34 The cry of dereliction is the only word from the cross recorded by Mark and Matthew. It is preserved in the Aramaic, but it is not improbable that Jesus actually quoted the words of Ps. 22:1 in the Hebrew. Mark translates the Aramaic into Greek for the benefit of his readers. We may not fathom the depths of the saying, for it brings us to the very heart of the atonement. But it is important that we do not interpret the words merely of the feeling and subjective consciousness of Jesus, as though the dereliction were not a fact. This is the tendency among some modern scholars. But the view of the older theologians (e.g. R. W. Dale, The Atonement, pp. 61f.) is to be preferred, namely that since God cannot look upon sin (Hab. 1:13) He hid His face when our sin was laid upon His sinless Son. Jesus, the sinner's substitute and sin-bearer, was in fact forsaken that we might never be (Heb. 13:5). This was indeed the supreme and unparalleled sorrow from which He shrank. To affirm that such a view is inconsistent with the love of God (so Vincent Taylor, in loc.) is to emphasize the love of God at the expense of His holiness. 'It is, of course, theologically important to maintain the paradox that, while this God-forsakenness was utterly real, the unity of the Blessed Trinity was even then unbroken' (Cranfield). 37 None of the Evangelists says He died. Mark's expression is simplest: He breathed his last; i.e. 'expired' (Gk. exepneusen). But even here the loud cry confirms what is even more clearly expressed by the others, that His death was not the result of natural causes or of exhaustion. It was a voluntary act and therefore unique. Before any natural cause became fatal, and at the moment of His own choosing, He delivered up His spirit, so that Pilate marvelled that He was already dead (v. 44, AV; cf. Jn. 10:17f.). 38 This again is recorded by all the Synoptists. It would be observed and reported by the priests, of whom afterwards many believed (Acts 6:7). Upon the Hebrew mind such a momentous happening must have made a tremendous impression after centuries of Tabernacle and Temple worship in which the Holy of Holies had been closed to all except the high priest on the Day of Atonement. Its meaning for us is clearly set out in Heb. 10:19ff. 39 The centurion, whom tradition has named as Longinus, and who was stationed directly opposite the cross where he saw all that happened, was evidently impressed by precisely those peculiarities about our Lord's death that we have noted above. Though his words may not have meant for him all that we read into them, nevertheless he stands at the close of the Gospel story as the first among the heathen to be drawn to faith in Christ by the power of His death. 40, 41 The women at the cross surpassed the disciples in their devotion, and may even have supplied to the Evangelist some of his information concerning the crucifixion. Salome was the mother of James and John (Mt. 27:56). Mark does not mention the mother of our Lord.

15:42–47 The burial. The burial of Jesus occupied an important place in the creeds of the early church because it proved the reality of His death (see 1 Cor. 15:3f.).

42 The day of Preparation is the technical term for the Friday before the Jewish sabbath, as Mark explains for his Gentile readers. An additional reason for urgency in burying the body of Jesus was the law of Dt. 21:22f., commanding the burial of criminals before nightfall on the day of execution. 43 Joseph is described as 'from' Arimathea (Gk. apo). He had probably ceased to reside there, and had settled in Jerusalem. The location of Arimathea is uncertain. The tomb (Mt. 27:60), and possibly also the garden containing it, were his. As a member of the Sanhedrin that had driven Pilate to condemn an innocent person to death, his action would indeed require courage. But reverence and love for the Master prevailed in him. 44 Mark alone records the questioning of the centurion.

16:1–20 THE CONSUMMATION

16:1–8 The resurrection

Evidence for the resurrection is unimpeachable. The tomb was empty and no-one could produce the body. His friends could not have stolen it and His foes would not have done so. If further evidence is needed we may find it in the very existence and survival of the Christian church. We may with profit compare here Paul's enumeration of the consequences that result from the dire hypothesis, 'If Christ be not risen . . .' (1 Cor. 15:14–19).

1 When the sabbath was past. Complete silence hangs over this sabbath except for the brief statement of Lk. 23:56 that they rested that day. The accounts of the resurrection differ in details as all genuine eyewitness evidence does; but the main outlines of the day's events are clear. 2 The first visit was made by women who came very early. When the sun had risen is thought to be difficult in view of Jn. 20:1, 'while it was still dark'. Torrey repunctuates and connects the phrase with v. 3: 'When the sun was risen and they were saying . . .' But something depends upon the point of view from which the events are narrated. The actual resurrection was unseen by human eyes, and 4 the first sign of it was the removal of the stone. 5 Angels appeared before Jesus Himself was seen. Mark leaves us to infer that the young man was an angel. 7 The words and Peter are peculiar to Mark and constitute one of the evidences of the connection between this Gospel and the apostle. Peter would cherish the fact that, despite his grievous fall, his risen Lord showed special remembrance of him.

16:9–20 The epilogue

These last 12 verses, relegated to the margin in RSV, present one of the major textual problems of the NT. The principal facts are as follows. The two Codices Sinaiticus and Vaticanus omit the whole section, though their scribes possibly knew of it. Four other MSS of less weight supply an alternative and much shorter ending also given in the margin, and three of them add an explanatory note. Most other uncial and cursive MSS, together with versions and patristic writers, support the inclusion of 16:9–20. Conybeare found in an Armenian MS of the 10th century a note ascribing the verses to Aristion, the disciple of John of whom Papias speaks. This would mean that they are at least very early (perhaps AD 100), even if non-Markan, and have something of the authority of John. The transition from v. 8 to v. 9 is abrupt and there is a change of subject. Mary Magdalene is introduced as a stranger in v. 9, despite her appearance in v. 1. Instead of the vividness of detail so characteristic of Mark, we have here a kind of résumé or summary of the resurrection appearances.

The generally accepted view is either that the Gospel was, very early on, mutilated at the last page, or that Mark was unable to finish, perhaps owing to the rising tide of persecution. There remains the possibility, however, that Mark intended to end abruptly at v. 8 and this has been argued with some force by R. H. Lightfoot (The Gospel Message of St Mark, 1950, ch. vii).

An interesting theory, which would fit the facts, is that when the Gospels of Matthew and Luke appeared, by reason of their greater detail and interest they eclipsed Mark in popularity, with the result that the latter was discarded in obscurity for a time. Shortly afterwards, when the church at Rome began to be interested in the preservation of its records, the only copy of Mark which could be found was mutilated at the end and this became the parent of future copies, the present conclusion being supplied to round it off. Yet although the question of literary authenticity must remain uncertain, all scholars agree that these verses are canonically authentic. They are part of the Canon of Holy Scripture. The passage contains four sections. The appearance to Mary Magdalene (vv. 9–11); the appearance to two travellers (vv. 12, 13; cf. Lk. 24:13–35); the appearance to the eleven (vv. 14–18); the ascension and the session on high (vv. 19, 20).

12 In another form: the risen body of Christ had powers which it did not possess before the passion. 14 The term the eleven is used in a collective sense to designate the apostolic company irrespective of the exact number. Though upbraided for their unbelief, 15 they are given the great missionary commission. 16 It is noteworthy that no mention of baptism is made in the negative member of the pair of clauses. It is unbelief which leads to condemnation, not absence of any ritual observance. 17, 18 Instances of all these signs may be found in the NT, with the exception of drinking poison. See, e.g., Acts 8:7; 2:4; 28:3–5; 28:8. 19, 20 From one point of view our Lord's work on earth, of which this Gospel is the record, is finished: He sat down at the right hand of God; from another point of view it is to continue through the church which is His mystical body: they went forth . . . while the Lord worked with them. And so the Gospel which pre-eminently sets forth the power and activity of the Son of God on earth closes with the revelation of the unfinished task of the church on earth. That task still awaits completion, but the same Lord still works with those who obey His command, confirming the message by the signs that attend it.

Luke

INTRODUCTION

THE THEOLOGY OF LUKE

The Gospel according to Luke differs from the other three Gospels in that, while they are each independent, self-contained writings, Luke is part of a two-volume work which has as its theme the beginnings of Christianity. In his opening dedication (1:1–4), written in the style of a secular historian, Luke has expressed his concern to give an orderly narrative for the benefit of those who have learned something already about the Christian faith. For Luke this story is a piece of history, and he is much more of a self-conscious historian than the other Evangelists. He believed that Christian faith was based on historical events which could be regarded as the acts of God, and he was trying to establish a firm historical foundation for the faith of his readers. He had his own characteristic understanding of the faith, complementary to that of the other Evangelists; by his methods of selection and emphasis he has drawn attention to those aspects of the life of Jesus which he considered to be of especial importance. He possessed fine literary gifts and used them to the full in the telling of his story.

1. Luke narrates the story of Jesus as a piece of history. Of all the Evangelists he comes the nearest to writing a biography of Jesus, although he has recorded the facts that are vital for faith rather than the general details of appearance, character, psychological development, and so on, which would interest a modern biographer. He traces out the continuity between the ministry of Jesus and the rise of the early church, thus making the story of Jesus part of the history of the church. This is not unimportant, for even Paul does not place so much emphasis on the earthly life of Jesus as part of the gospel. Luke, of course, does not mean that the life of Jesus is merely a part of church history. Rather it is the central era in God's gracious dealings with men, preceded by the history of Israel and inaugurating the period of the church; history will be wound up by the return of 'this same Jesus' whose earthly life is the central act in redemption.

2. The keynote of the ministry of Jesus is the gospel of salvation. Two of Luke's favourite words are 'preach the gospel', and 'salvation'. The former sums up the character of the ministry of Jesus; His teaching, healing and acts of compassion were all part of the proclamation of the good news that God was visiting His people. The latter word sums up the content of Jesus' message; it is contained in nuce in 19:10: 'The Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost.' In Mark the message of Jesus was that the kingdom of God had drawn near (Mk. 1:14f.). Luke brings out more clearly the fact that the ministry of Jesus was the era in which men actually received the salvation associated with the kingdom of God. Indeed, it is God Himself who has come to men in Jesus, a fact expressed in Luke's frequent use of the title of 'Lord' (the name for God in the Greek OT) for Jesus.

3. If salvation is for the lost, it is for all men, since all are lost. No-one can fail to observe that Luke shows particularly how Jesus brought salvation to the less privileged people in Judea—the poor, women, children and notorious sinners—and how, although for the most part He confined His ministry to the Jews, He indicated plainly that the gospel embraced the Gentiles, and in particular the despised Samaritans.

4. It is a curious feature of Luke's Gospel that it has very little to say about the significance of the cross as the place of salvation. Luke shows that suffering and death form the divinely appointed path which Jesus must tread before entering His heavenly glory, but only in Lk. 22:19f. and Acts 20:28 does he speak clearly of the sacrificial nature of the death of Jesus.

5. If no writer has emphasized more than Luke the 'wideness in God's mercy', at the same time in no other Gospel are the claims of Jesus expressed more stringently. Jesus summoned men to be disciples, and would-be disciples had to be prepared to count the cost, to deny themselves and to follow Jesus. The grace of God is not 'cheap grace'; the sinner must be prepared for repentance and renunciation of his sin.

6. Luke has reserved for his second volume the story of the church, but already in the Gospel he has indicated the characteristics of that period. It is the time during which Jesus, having ascended to heaven, sits at the right hand of God. His servants must continue His work of preaching the gospel of salvation to all nations, and they are enabled to do this by the power of the same Holy Spirit who equipped Jesus for His ministry, and as they call upon God in prayer, just as Jesus prayed. Only when this task is complete will Jesus suddenly return as the Judge of mankind and set up His heavenly kingdom.

THE SOURCES OF LUKE

Luke himself has expressed his indebtedness to his predecessors who had written about the life of Jesus and to the early eyewitnesses and Christian preachers. Speculation enters when we try to identify these sources more precisely. The most commonly accepted theory of Gospel origins is that Luke and Matthew each had access to the earlier Gospel of Mark and to a further written document or (more probably) a collection of traditions (generally designated 'Q') which has not survived. In addition to this material shared with Matthew, Luke had a considerable amount of further information of his own (generally indicated by the symbol 'L').

Two theories of the way in which he went to work are held. The older view is that he made Mark the basis of his work and inserted into it at appropriate places large blocks of additional material from Q and L. A more recent view is that Luke first combined the Q and L material into one document, and then later combined this 'proto-Luke' with Mark; one may plausibly associate the first stage of this process with Luke's period in Palestine while Paul was a prisoner there, and the second stage with his arrival with Paul in Rome, where Mark very probably wrote his Gospel. The arguments for and against these theories are highly technical, and any theory of composition must remain very hypothetical at the moment, but of the two the proto-Luke theory is perhaps less open to objection.

What is more important is whether we can be sure that the sources employed were reliable and that the author used them faithfully. The former question can be answered only in a general study of Gospel origins, but it may be said here that Luke's sources have high claims to reliability. In particular, the L material is of high worth, and the contacts between it and traditions independently preserved in the Gospel of John indicate its strong attestation. As regards the author's use of his sources, scholarship is very much divided at present. A growing body of radical opinion has stressed the creative ability of Luke and holds that he has manipulated the sources in the interests of his own theology. For example, where Luke records an incident also told by Mark in very different wording or tells of a similar but apparently different incident, such scholars are inclined to attribute the differences to Luke's rewriting of his sources rather than to his possession of additional, authentic information. Now it must be admitted that Luke has made a thorough stylistic recasting of his sources and has made many changes of a minor character in his narrative, but against this must be set his expressed intention of faithfully recording his story, his great accuracy in portraying the geographical and political background of events, and the way in which he makes very little alteration when reproducing the actual words of Jesus. To say, as some scholars have done, that Luke was not concerned with historical accuracy, is to fly in the face of his own expressed intentions. When these things are borne in mind, the case for Luke's fidelity to his sources is seen to be a strong one. If, like John, he has given us an artist's portrait of Jesus rather than a photograph (and even photographs are taken from a particular point of view and contain an element of interpretation), he has given us a true portrait.

THE AUTHORSHIP AND DATE OF THE GOSPEL

If the Gospel rests on sound tradition faithfully recorded, the question of its author's name is one of secondary importance. That he was Luke, the 'beloved physician' and companion of Paul, is the clear and consistent verdict of writers in the early church from the latter half of the 2nd century onwards. It is sometimes argued that this tradition is simply an intelligent deduction from the NT evidence that Luke-Acts was written by a companion of Paul, who is most likely to have been Luke, and that consequently the tradition possesses no independent value. The matter is not so simple. The tradition is unequivocal in singling out Luke from among several possible companions of Paul; we can trace it back to a fairly early date (possibly even to c. AD 120); and there is no sign of any other tradition in the early church. Attempts have been made to strengthen the argument for Lucan authorship by finding examples of medical language, such as a physician might readily use, in Luke-Acts, but the indications are perhaps too slight to provide anything more than corroboration of a view already held on other grounds.

Two arguments are commonly brought against the traditional view of the authorship. One is that the portrayal of Paul in Acts is too far removed from historical reality to be the work of a contemporary and companion; see the discussion of this point in the Introduction to Acts. The other is that the Gospel breathes the atmosphere of the sub-apostolic period. It is said that Luke gives the impression of being written at a time when the early church had had to come to terms with the fact that the second coming of Jesus had not taken place as soon as was expected, and when the early church had settled down into 'early catholicism'.

Neither of these last two points is convincing. The former assumes that at first the early Christians expected the parousia almost hourly and that only later its continued delay brought them to the point (reached in Luke) of transferring it to the distant future and thereby depriving it of its significance for the Christian life. But the evidence is decisively against the view that the early Christians expected the parousia to happen immediately, and it is simply not true that the parousia has lost all significance in Luke; see 12:35–40; 17:20–37; 18:8; 21:5–36. As for the second suggestion, that in Luke the church has developed into an institution for dispensing salvation, it is sufficient to compare Luke's writings with the Apostolic Fathers, in which this type of theology begins to find expression, to see that it entirely fails to carry conviction. In short, the burden of proof still rests upon those who would deny the Lucan authorship of the Gospel.

The date of composition is uncertain. It is closely bound up with the problem of the dates of Mark and of Acts. There are two serious possibilities, a date in the early sixties or in the later decades of the 1st century. The latter is the view most commonly held, and AD 80 is often given as a round figure. This view presupposes that Luke was not dependent upon the writings of Josephus (c. AD 93), but that he did write after the fall of Jerusalem (AD 70). This last point, however, is uncertain, and a date before AD 70 can certainly not be ruled out.

The place of composition is also uncertain. Early tradition suggests that Luke wrote in Achaia (Greece), but the relation of the Gospel to Mark suggests a connection with Rome. It is possible that Luke wrote in Rome but intended his Gospel for Achaia; if we knew who Theophilus was, the matter would be solved, but his identity remains a mystery.

OUTLINE OF CONTENTS

The structure of Luke closely resembles that of Mark and Matthew in which the ministry of Jesus is broadly divided into a Galilaean period and a Judean period. Luke differs from Mark in prefixing to the ministry an account of the birth of Jesus, and in developing at great length the account of the final journey of Jesus to Jerusalem.

COMMENTARY

1:1–4 PREFACE

Unlike the other Evangelists, Luke begins his Gospel with a brief preface in excellent Greek, such as one would find in the work of a secular writer. He was addressing the world at large and claiming a place for Christianity on the stage of world history. He justifies his venture by referring to the precedent of earlier Gospels, to the trustworthy nature of his sources and to his own qualifications to produce an orderly narrative based on careful research. His purpose was to give a reliable historical account which would form a sound basis for Christian faith.

1 Many should not be taken too literally. The things . . . accomplished among us include all that is related in both Luke and Acts. 2 The apostles and their immediate circle were the original transmitters of an authoritative tradition, and their testimony was based on personal experience. 3 Theophilus is otherwise unknown. Most excellent may be simply a piece of politeness or may indicate his official status (cf. Acts 23:26; 26:25). 4 Whether Theophilus was already a Christian depends upon whether informed means the reception of catechetical instruction; this remains uncertain.

1:5–2:52 THE BIRTH AND CHILDHOOD OF JESUS

As a prologue to the ministry of Jesus, Luke relates the story of His birth and shows how He was born as the Son of God (1:35). Closely linked with this story is the parallel narrative of the birth of His forerunner who prepared the people for the coming of the Lord (1:16f., 76f.). The account is characterized by frequent allusion to OT parallels and prophecies which show how God's new acts were entirely consonant with His earlier deeds and promises; and by various supernatural elements which marked out the two children as God's servant and Son respectively. The origins of the narrative must lie in traditions handed down by the parents of John and of Jesus, but Luke has written up his sources in his own style.

1:5–25 The prophecy of John's birth

The story of Jesus begins with the prophecy of the birth of His cousin. His coming is announced in words almost as majestic as those reserved for Jesus, since John was the greatest man of his generation (7:28). His parents were devout members of the old dispensation (cf. Gn. 17:1; 1 Ki. 9:4), and it was while his father was engaged in his priestly duties that he had a vision of an angel who told him that his prayer for a son was to be answered. The boy was to be called John ('God is gracious') and he was to prepare for that final coming of God to visit His people, which was the hope of Judaism. He would be separated to God's service like a Nazirite and empowered for his task by the Spirit. He would bring joy to the people, for his role as the new Elijah (cf. Mal. 4:5) would assure them that God's day was at hand. Like Abraham before him (Gn. 15:8), Zechariah could not believe the word of God and asked for confirmation. The angel replied by giving his name and divine commission, and added that Zechariah would be dumb (and deaf, 1:62) until the child's birth. When the priest reappeared outside, the people attributed his speechlessness to shock at the vision which they assumed he must have experienced. In due time God fulfilled His promise, and the child was conceived.

5 Herod the 'Great' ruled until 4 BC; cf. 2:1. 6, 7 Childlessness was a great reproach to a Jewish woman (1:25; Gn. 30:23), and was sometimes regarded as a punishment for sin. But v. 6 shows that this was not so here; indeed the birth of a child to a previously barren woman was sometimes an indication of great blessing for the people (e.g. through Isaac, Gideon and Samuel). 8–12 The large priestly tribe of Levi was subdivided into twenty-four divisions, that of Abijah (v. 5) being the eighth (1 Ch. 24:10). Each division did priestly duty at the Temple for two weeks in the year, and many of the priests spent the rest of the year away from Jerusalem (v. 23) following secular occupations. Incense was offered twice daily, and the choice of the individual to perform the actual offering in the Holy Place was a matter of lot, no priest being allowed to have this supreme honour more than once in his lifetime and many never having the opportunity. The priest was alone during the actual offering; the people prayed outside until he reappeared and gave them his blessing. 13 Giving a name was the father's duty. When God took over this task, it was a sign that He was making the child His responsibility. 24 Elizabeth hid herself during the period when her pregnancy would not be especially obvious and she would still be liable to reproach for childlessness. The news was first broken to Mary, and the miracle remained a secret from the people at large.

1:26–38 The prophecy of Jesus' birth

The story of the announcement of the birth of Jesus is very similar to the preceding narrative, but this time interest is centred on the mother of the child. Mary was engaged to Joseph, but their marriage had not yet taken place. Like Zechariah she was filled with fear by the angelic vision and perplexed by being addressed as 'favoured'. The angel's reply was that she was favoured by God, for she was to bear a son who was to be the Messiah (Is. 7:14). Mary's question to the angel (v. 34) has caused much difficulty: if she was engaged to a descendant of David, why should she protest that she had no husband? The view of some Roman Catholics that she had taken a vow of virginity can be safely discarded. Probably Mary understood the angel to be referring to an immediate conception and could not imagine how this was possible before her marriage; it is said that usually a year elapsed between engagement and marriage. The angel's reply made it clear that her Son was not to be an earthly Messiah, merely adopted by God as His Son (cf. 2 Sa. 7:12–14), but truly and really the Son of God; His birth would be due to the power of the Spirit coming upon Mary so that her child would be 'holy', i.e. divine. In confirmation of his word the angel spoke of the miracle already experienced by Elizabeth, and Mary quietly accepted her high honour.

26 Sixth: cf. v. 36. 27 The emphasis of the narrative is not so much upon the negative fact that Mary was a virgin as upon the positive fact that her child was born of God. Of the house of David refers to Joseph; as his adopted son, Jesus was legally a descendant of David. 28 Favoured means simply that God graciously chose Mary to be the mother of Jesus and not that she was 'full of grace'. 31 Jesus (Heb. Joshua) means 'Saviour'. 32, 33 The description is based on OT language and describes the significance of Jesus as the Jewish Messiah or anointed king in the line of David who would rule over an everlasting kingdom. 35 The coming of the Spirit is described in words reminiscent of the resting of the glory of God on the Tabernacle (Ex. 40:35). Overshadow is not a euphemism for 'beget'. The basic meaning of holy is 'separated to God' rather than 'morally pure'; hence it can mean 'divine' (cf. Ps. 89:5, 7).

Note. The historicity of the virgin birth

The story of the virgin birth is one of a miraculous, supernatural occurrence. We cannot here spend time on those criticisms of it which reject the supernatural on principle. Such doubts are part of a general outlook which must be discussed in a different context. Other factors are more important: a. The silence of most of the NT writers. The fact that the virgin birth is scarcely mentioned is not a strong objection to its historicity, for the story, if true, can have come only from the family of Jesus, and was not one to be publicly proclaimed. Jewish slanders regarding the illegitimacy of Jesus' birth indicate that there was known to be something out of the ordinary about it. b. Pagan parallels. Critics have adduced pagan stories of great heroes being the offspring of the gods, and of mortal women being visited by gods who had intercourse with them. It has therefore been argued that the story of the virgin birth represents an admixture of Jewish or Hellenistic myth into the Christian faith in an attempt to express poetically or mythologically the divine origin of Jesus. But there is a world of difference between the atmosphere of the pagan stories and that of Lk. 1–2; and a precise parallel to the Christian story can be gained only by some elaborate and highly speculative jigsaw work on the sources. The force of the argument should not be underestimated, but in the end it fails to carry conviction. c. Details in the narrative. Historical difficulties over such matters as the census will be treated below. In any case, they do not affect the central matter at issue. d. Doctrinal objections. Such arguments as that Jesus is not truly like us if He were not born in the normal, human manner lie beyond our present scope. The reader may be referred to J. G. Machen, The Virgin Birth of Christ, 1958, for a full, masterly and satisfying discussion of the problem.

1:39–56 Mary's visit to Elizabeth

Mary's reaction to the angelic message was to fulfil the implied command to visit Elizabeth; she stayed until the birth of Elizabeth's child. Further confirmation of the angel's promise was given by Elizabeth, who was filled with prophetic inspiration and burst forth into a benediction. She realized that Mary was to be the mother of the Messiah and was overjoyed that she should visit her; she praised Mary for accepting the angel's word. The very movements of the child in her womb were a response to Mary's arrival.

Mary's poetic reply is known as the Magnificat. It is filled with echoes of OT praise, especially from Hannah's psalm (1 Sa. 2:1–10), and the best commentary on it (as on the whole of this chapter) is the margin of a good reference Bible. The wording, as in the other hymns in these chapters, is rather general, and Jewish rather than Christian. It is probable that Mary employed words already familiar in Jewish praise (she will hardly have composed the hymn extempore) and that what she said has been written up and elaborated later. Her hymn praised God for His personal blessing to her, a merciful act which was thoroughly in line with the way in which He cared for the humble and brought down their haughty oppressors.

41 In later life John apparently did not know Jesus very closely (Jn. 1:31; Lk. 7:19). This is in harmony with this passage, where nothing is said about the two boys subsequently coming into contact with each other. 46 Some MSS read 'Elizabeth' instead of Mary, and hence it has been conjectured that it was really she who spoke the Magnificat. But the textual evidence is extremely weak, and the hymn fits Mary better. Elizabeth's sentiments are fully expressed in vv. 42–45, and a comment by Mary, expressing her reactions, is a fitting and necessary conclusion to this scene (cf. v. 38). 48 The low estate (lit. humiliation) is Mary's feeling of unworthiness for her great honour. 49 God shows that He is holy by saving His people and acting mightily on their behalf (Ps. 111:9). 51–55 The past tenses indicate what God always is doing.

1:57–80 The birth of John

Elizabeth's neighbours rejoiced that God had shown His mercy to this previously barren woman. They expected that the child would be called after his father, but his mother insisted that he be called John, and the dumb father confirmed her choice. It is not certain whether she had been told by Zechariah about his vision or chose the name independently and hence miraculously; probably the former view is correct. Thereupon Zechariah regained his speech, and his first words were the hymn of praise which follows in vv. 67–79. The whole event made a tremendous impression upon the neighbours, who foresaw an unusual future for a child whose birth was accompanied by such signs.

Zechariah's prophetic hymn, the Benedictus, resembles Mary's hymn in its sentiments and fits equally well into this Jewish context. It begins by praising God for bringing redemption to His people through a scion of David in accordance with the ancient prophecies and covenant made by God. The second part is specifically directed to the future mission of John as the prophet who would prepare the way of the Lord by assuring the people of forgiveness of sins when His salvation was at hand.

For the moment the record of the fulfilment of the prophecy is delayed as attention is again focused on Jesus; a brief note speaks of John's upbringing.

59 The eighth day was the appointed date for circumcision (Lv. 12:3), but the naming of the child on this occasion is unusual, as in the OT names were given at birth. 63 His name is John: not 'will be', for the angel had already commanded it. 65 Fear is the normal human reaction in the Bible to the supernatural (cf. v. 12). 66 The people resolved to see whether what had happened was confirmed by later events. For the hand . . . is Luke's comment, not the people's.

67–79 The hymn is a prophecy, as is shown by vv. 76–79. There is a change in tone between the more general sentiments in vv. 68–75 and the specific language in the prophecy, but this does not detract from the unity of the hymn. 68 To visit is to come in order to save (1:78, see mg.; 7:16). 69 An animal's horn is a symbol of strength. Zechariah, like his wife, would know that Mary's child was to be the Davidic Messiah. 70 The prophecies include 2 Sa. 7:12; Is. 9:11; cf. Acts 3:21. 71 Zechariah's hymn, like Mary's, has the flavour of the Jewish Messianic hope. Note, however, that there is here no thought of vengeance upon the enemies of the Jews. 73 The oath of Gn. 22:16–18; 26:3; Ps. 105:9–11 is understood to mean that God will make it possible for His people to serve Him in holiness and righteousness. 76 John is given the rank of a prophet (cf. Is. 40:3; Mal. 3:1). By the Lord is meant not Jesus (contrast 1:43) but God—a God, however, who acts through Jesus. 77–79 John's preaching of forgiveness was the sign that God had begun to act. Through the tender mercy of our God (v. 78) qualifies knowledge of salvation (v. 77), which is to be understood in a moral, not political, sense. In the second half of the verse follow RSV mg: 'whereby the dayspring will visit'. 'Dayspring' (Gk. anatolē) is either a translation of the Hebrew 'shoot' or 'branch', used as a Messianic title in Zc. 3:8; 6:12, or (more probably) refers to the rising sun (Mal. 4:2; cf. Nu. 24:17). In either case the reference is to the Messiah and not to John. It is not clear whether v. 79 is parallel to v. 77 or dependent on v. 78.

In this section John's mission is described in lofty terms; this contrasts with the subordinate position he occupies in the Gospel and shows that Luke did not invent the hymn; on the other hand, the view that the hymn was preserved by a group of John's followers who regarded him as the Messiah ignores the way in which John is plainly differentiated from the Messiah in the hymn.

80 In the wilderness could mean that John lived near Qumran where a Jewish sect practised an ascetic regimen with ritual baths and looked forward to the coming salvation of God. John may well have acted later in conscious correction of their outlook.

2:1–20 The birth of Jesus

(Cf. Mt. 1:18–25.) During the reign of Augustus (31 BC–AD 14) the Romans reorganized their administration in several parts of the Empire and carried out fresh censuses of the population for purposes of taxation. The execution of such an imperial decree in Syria (of which Judea formed a part) brought Joseph and Mary to Bethlehem, long ago prophesied as the Messiah's place of birth. The fact that Mary travelled with Joseph means that they were now married, but the description of her as betrothed (v. 5) to him (if this is the correct text—some MSS, followed by AV, have 'his wife') shows that they had not yet consummated the marriage (cf. Mt. 1:25). A 2nd-century tradition gives a cave as the scene of the birth, but Luke appears to mean an outhouse of the inn. The child's birth was heralded to an unexpected and even a despised group of people, shepherds. They had a vision of an angel who announced the significance of the birth: a Saviour had come. His message was confirmed by a chorus of angels who sang: 'Glory to God in highest heaven, And on earth his peace for men on whom his favour rests' (NEB). Of the older renderings 'good will toward men' (AV) and 'men of good will', the former is based on an incorrect text, and the latter reflects a theological misunderstanding. God's peace is not given to men because they deserve it, but to the undeserving whom He has freely and graciously chosen to favour.

2 The enrolment or census (not 'taxing', AV) of Augustus is surrounded by numerous problems. There is, however, sufficient evidence to show that a census of this nature was possible, that it could have taken place within the kingdom of a Roman client king, and that it was based on where one resided or held property. The real problem is the date. Quirinius was governor of Syria from AD 6, and during this time there was a rebellion over the imposition of the census (Acts 5:37 and Josephus). Jesus, however, was born before the death of Herod (4 BC). Possible solutions are: a. 'Quirinius' is a textual error for 'Saturninus', governor 9–6 BC. b. Quirinius may have held an earlier post in the East, during which he initiated the census. This could not, however, have been the governorship of Syria, as W. Ramsay held. E. Stauffer has argued that he had a 'roving commission' in the eastern Empire. c. Since this was the first enrolment in Judea, the process of listing the people and then actually taxing them would take several years. Luke mentions the name of Quirinius as the well-known governor under whom the process was completed after Herod's death; and the rising in Acts 5:37 will then have taken place when the new tax was first collected.

7 Swaddling cloths were the normal dress for a new-born child. 8 Flocks were kept out in the field by night from April to November, but this was apparently possible in winter also. There is, however, no evidence that Jesus was born in December. 10 All the people means Israel; only in v. 32 is the world-wide significance of Jesus revealed. 11 Christ the Lord: some think that this is a slip for 'the Lord's Christ' (cf. v. 26), but the wording is probably as Luke intended it to be. 12 The sign is the confirmation of the unusual significance of the child as Saviour by the unusual place where He was to be found. Earlier critics held that the finding of a miraculous child in a manger by shepherds was a theme drawn from pagan myth, but more recent criticism has shown that this view rested on an erroneous interpretation of inadequate evidence. 19 This verse probably points to the source of the story. Some readers may feel that the narrative has been poetically embellished, but, as B. S. Easton remarked, 'critical discussion of this perfect story is idle'.

2:21–40 The presentation of Jesus in the Temple

V. 21 briefly relates how Jesus was circumcised and named, the stress falling on the significant name which He was given before His conception. Prophecies regarding John's future had been made at his circumcision, but in the case of Jesus these took place later at the Temple. Three distinct elements must be unravelled in the background to the prophecies. a. After the birth of a male child, the mother was unclean for seven days and had to remain at home for a further thirty-three, after which on the fortieth day a purification sacrifice had to be offered (Lv. 12:1–8). This is described in v. 24. b. A firstborn child had to be 'redeemed'. All firstborn were regarded as holy or consecrated to God; the firstborn of animals were sacrificed, but the firstborn of men were redeemed by a payment of 5 shekels when they were one month old (Ex. 13:13; Nu. 18:15, 16). The law did not require the child's presence at the Temple when payment was made, but on this occasion the two ceremonies were simultaneous. c. A third consideration entered in also: Mary seems to have made a special dedication of her child to God, just as Hannah had earlier given Samuel to God at the Tabernacle (1 Sa. 1:11, 21–28).

The main theme, however, is the reception given to Jesus by Simeon and Anna. Simeon was a godly Israelite who looked forward to God's redemption of His people and had received His promise that he would not die before the coming of the Messiah. When he came into the Temple at the impulse of the Spirit and received the baby into his arms, he did not need any further confirmation that this was the Messiah, but expressed his gratitude to God and his readiness to die now that the promise had been fulfilled. He had seen the coming of a Saviour for all mankind, and not merely for the Jews; here is struck the note of universal redemption promised in the OT (see Ps. 98; Is. 49:6). Simeon then pronounced God's blessing upon Mary and Joseph and made a further prophecy. The child's coming would bring judgment as well as salvation, for men would be revealed as they really were in their hearts, and Mary herself would suffer anguish at the treatment meted out to her Son. Simeon's words were confirmed by the arrival of Anna, who gave thanks to God for the coming of the Messiah and prophesied the redemption that God would bring to His people through Him. Thereafter the family returned to Nazareth (but cf. Mt. 2), where Jesus grew up with the evident blessing of God upon Him.

22 Their purification should strictly be 'her purification' (as in AV, based on inferior MSS); Luke, however, included Jesus with Mary since he was thinking of the redemption of the firstborn at the same time. 24 Joseph offered the cheaper sacrifice permitted for poor people. 25 Consolation; cf. Is. 40:1; 61:2. 27 Joseph and Mary are called His parents here and elsewhere because Jesus was the adopted son of Joseph; the usage in no way contradicts the fact of the virgin birth. 33 Some scholars have argued that the wonder of Mary and Joseph at Simeon's words is incomprehensible if they had already heard the angelic messages about Jesus, and that therefore the two stories are independent and even contradictory. This is being extremely pedantic. The parents' surprise is psychologically probable, as they were given fresh confirmation of the significance of their Son. 34 It is not certain whether this verse refers to the fall of some persons and the rising of others or to the penitence and restoration of the same persons (so AV, NEB mg.). 36 Asher was one of the northern tribes, the so-called lost ten tribes. 37 Anna was eighty-four years old. But the Greek could mean that she had been a widow for that period (RV, NEB mg.). The second part of the verse should not be pressed to mean that she never left the Temple (cf. 24:53). 38 Jerusalem means the same as Israel (cf. v. 25) in this context. It is the place from which redemption started (Acts 1:8). 39 The sojourn in Egypt (Mt. 2:13–23) must be fitted in at this point. 40 The wisdom of Jesus is demonstrated in the next incident.

2:41–52 The Passover visit of Jesus to the Temple

Of the three great festivals which Jewish men were required to keep in Jerusalem, only the Passover was strictly observed; whole families went up to Jerusalem, and an estimated 60,000 to 100,000 visitors packed themselves into a town whose normal population was about 25,000. Large caravans of people travelled together for companionship and security, and it is not surprising that Mary and Joseph did not bother unduly about Jesus on the first day's journey home. A second day was spent in returning to Jerusalem, and on the third day He was found in the Temple. His intelligent discussion with the Rabbis was an earnest of His later teaching, but the passage does not mean that Jesus was trying to instruct them, but only that they were impressed by His unusual promise as a pupil. Jesus' reply to His parents was in effect: 'You ought to have known where to find me—in my Father's house.' Thus from an early age Jesus was aware of an intimate filial relationship to God, a relationship which went beyond the normal religious consciousness of a devout Jew, as His later teaching made clear (10:21, 22). One should not see here a criticism of His parents; He sought to be obedient to them (v. 51). The final verse indicates how His perfect growth as a boy (v. 40) continued during His adolescence (cf. 1 Sa. 2:26).

42 At the age of twelve a boy was prepared for entry to the religious community as an adult; it was not necessarily Jesus' first visit to Jerusalem. 46 Teaching took place in the environs of the Temple (cf. Acts 5:25). 49 The alternative translation 'about my Father's business' (AV, JB) is less apt.

3:1 – 4:13 JOHN THE BAPTIST AND JESUS

3:1–20 The preaching of John

(See Mt. 3:1–12; Mk. 1:1–8; Jn. 1:19–28.) Like the first Christian preachers, Luke saw the real beginning of the gospel in the appearance of John the Baptist (cf. Acts 10:37). He places this important event in its historical context by giving its date and a brief description of the political situation in Palestine. The ministry of John marked the end of the old era (cf. Lk. 16:16) as well as the beginning of the new. He was not only the fulfiller of prophecy but also the last of the prophets, and is described as a prophet (cf. vv. 1f. with Je. 1:1f.). His coming was in fulfilment of Is. 40:3–5, a text which the Qumran sect also saw fulfilled in their activities, and his task was to proclaim a baptism which pledged forgiveness of sins.

This proclamation is expanded in three brief sections. In the first (vv. 7–9) John warned the people that it was no use being baptized without a true repentance that showed itself in deeds. A mere claim to physical descent from Abraham was no defence against imminent judgment. The axe was already poised, ready to chop down the unfruitful tree, but there was just time for repentance before it was too late. A second paragraph (vv. 10–14), peculiar to Luke, gives specific instructions to the people. The multitudes, composed of poorer people, must practise generosity, a work of love as opposed to the works of the law. Tax collectors ('publicans', AV) and soldiers were to act honestly and justly in their professions. There is here no radical upheaval of the existing social order, but an insistence on those moral principles which will lead to a transformation of society from within rather than by the path of violent revolution. A third paragraph (vv. 15–17; cf. Jn. 1:19–34) brings the vital point. Many people asked during John's lifetime and after whether he was the Messiah. Whatever his followers thought, John knew his own subordinate position. A mightier One would follow him. John cleansed men ceremonially with the sacramental symbol of water, but the coming One would cleanse men's hearts with the fire of the Holy Spirit; He would carry through the great separation among men, like a harvester who preserves the wheat and destroys the chaff. Therefore let men repent without delay.

This message is summed up as 'good news' (v. 18), and the force of this word should not be weakened, for the coming of John meant that the coming of Jesus was near. But before His arrival is described, the story of John is rounded off with the story of His arrest (cf. Mk. 6:17–29), and the stage is left clear for Jesus.

1 There are two alternative ways of reckoning the chronology of Tiberius' reign (AD 14–37) which make his fifteenth year either AD 27–28 or AD 28–29. Pilate was governor of Judea AD 26–36; a recently discovered inscription shows that his proper title was prefect and not procurator. Abilene lay to the north-east, within the general bounds of Palestine; Lysanias is mentioned in inscriptions. 2 There was only one high priest at a time. Caiaphas held office AD 18–37, but his father-in-law, Annas, who held office AD 6–15, remained very influential. 7 Vipers were regarded as evil and destructive. According to Matthew, this choice epithet was addressed to the Pharisees and Sadducees. Who warned you . . . ? i.e. 'Did somebody tell you that you could escape judgment simply by being baptized (sc. without repenting)?' 8 Stones and children give a pun in Aramaic. 11 A man might wear two coats to keep warm on a journey or in the open at night. 14 The soldiers may have been members of Herod's police force. 16 It is debatable whether fire is a symbol of final judgment or of present cleansing by the Spirit; if the metaphor in 17 supports the former view, Acts 1:5 is decisive in favour of the latter.

3:21, 22 The baptism of Jesus

(See Mt. 3:13–17; Mk. 1:9–11; cf. Jn. 1:32, 33.) Luke mentions the actual baptism almost parenthetically and lays all the stress on the accompanying revelation. The words in bodily form emphasize the reality of the coming of the Spirit to equip Jesus for His ministry (cf. 4:18). The heavenly voice, its words reminiscent of Gn. 22:2; Ps. 2:7; Is. 42:1, does not indicate the adoption of Jesus as God's Son but the divine approval with which He began His work as God's Servant and Son.

3:23–38 The genealogy of Jesus

(See Mt. 1:1–17.) It may seem odd that the genealogy is inserted at this point where it interrupts the developing narrative, instead of coming somewhere in the birth stories. (Was it part of 'proto-Luke' before the birth stories were added to it?) But ancient writers did not have the device of removing material from the main text by using footnotes.

The purpose of the genealogy is to establish that Jesus was legally a descendant of David (cf. 1:27, 32, 69) and to assign Him a place in the Jewish branch of the human race. It is nonsensical to say that v. 38 is meant to prove that Jesus was the Son of God. The existence of a genealogical table going back through Joseph is no argument against the historicity of the virgin birth. It has been observed that the list contains 77 (i.e. 11×7) human names, but grouping of the names in this way does not lead to any very useful results.

The genealogy differs from that in Matthew. Apart from being in reverse order and tracing back the line beyond Abraham to Adam, it contains a quite different and longer set of names between David and Jesus (only Zerubbabel and Shealtiel occur in both lists). Both lists give the descent of Jesus through his adopted father Joseph ('as was supposed', v. 23), and the theory that one of the genealogies is really that of Mary has little to commend it. The least difficult explanation is that Matthew gives the legal descendants of David down the royal line (i.e. who was heir to the throne at any given time), whereas Luke gives the particular line to which Joseph belonged (so J. G. Machen), but it must be confessed that in the absence of fuller information the problems of explanation and harmonization are insoluble.

23 The son of does not imply strict paternity any more than Matthew's 'was the father of', and allows for gaps in the line. For Heli, Matthew has 'Jacob'. 24 It is uncertain whether Matthat should be identified with Matthan (Mt. 1:15). 27 Zerubbabel was the leader of the Jewish community after the Exile; for Shealtiel see Hg. 1:2, but in 1 Ch. 3:19 (Heb., not LXX) Zerubbabel's father is Pedaiah. According to 1 Ch. 3:17; Mt. 1:12 Shealtiel was the son of Jeconiah, and not of Neri; an adoption may have taken place. 31 Nathan: not the prophet; cf. 2 Sa. 5:14. From v. 32 onwards the names are in agreement with the LXX, except for minor spelling differences. They are drawn from Gn. 5:1–32; 11:10–26; Ru. 4:18–22; 1 Ch. 1:1–34; 2:1–15; 3:5–19. 33 Admin and Arni do not occur in the OT; 1 Ch. 2:10 has Ram. 36 Cainan is found in the LXX but not in the Hebrew text.

4:1–13 The temptation of Jesus

(See Mt. 4:1–11; Mk. 1:12, 13.) The final episode in the preparation of Jesus for His ministry was a period of testing by Satan. The experience came to Jesus as He followed the guidance of the Spirit, and He resisted every temptation in the power of the Spirit. 3, 4 The first temptation urged Jesus to use His newly confirmed status as the Son of God (3:22) to perform an act of power in order to satisfy His hunger. The temptation was directed against Jesus' obedience to God, and implied that the satisfaction of His bodily desires was more important than the spiritual experience which produces a steadfast character (Rom. 5:3). Jesus resisted it by quoting the scriptural principle that a man's real life does not depend on the satisfaction of physical hunger (Dt. 8:3; AV, following inferior MSS, completes the quotation).

5–8 Then Jesus was taken up on high and given a vision of the entire world. Its ruler (Jn. 12:31) offered to surrender dominion over it to Him if He would acknowledge his higher authority. But ultimately the world does not belong to the devil; his promise was not to be trusted; and to bow to his will was incompatible with worshipping and serving God (Dt. 6:13).

9–12 Finally, the devil, defeated by Scripture, tried to enlist its service in his own cause, and suggested that Ps. 91:11f. justified Jesus in leaping down from the high colonnade of the Temple which overlooked the ravine of the Kidron valley. The act was presented as one of filial trust in God, but in reality it would have been one of disbelief. To have yielded to the temptation would have been to doubt the reality of His Sonship and His relationship to the Father, for a person tests the faithfulness of God (Dt. 6:16) only when he doubts and no longer trusts Him. Thus the devil was repulsed each time and departed from the fray.

The temptations were all directed against the divine Sonship of Jesus. They encouraged Him to misuse His divine powers, to gain His purpose in the world by obeying the devil instead of His Father, and to doubt the reality of His Father's love and care. The temptations were therefore not directed specifically against the Messianic office of Jesus, encouraging Him to win the people by performing spectacular miracles, but rather against the inner relationship of Sonship on which His Messiahship rested. There are some parallels with the experience of Israel in the wilderness (Dt. 6–8), but these should not be pressed too far.

13 The devil does not reappear until 22:3, but it would be rash to assume that he was inactive in the intervening period (cf., e.g. 13:16; 22:28).

4:14 – 9:50 THE MINISTRY IN GALILEE

4:14 – 5:11 The good news of the kingdom

4:14, 15 Introductory summary. (See Mt. 4:12–17; Mk. 1:14, 15.) Luke opens his account of the work of Jesus in Galilee with a brief summary which stresses His activity as a teacher and the great impression which He made on His immediate hearers and in a wider area.

4:16–30 Jesus teaches at Nazareth. (Cf. Mt. 13:53–58; Mk. 6:1–6.) It is widely agreed that Luke has placed this incident ahead of its proper chronological position (v. 23) because it provided an ideal opening summary of the message of Jesus. In the synagogue of His home town Jesus read the 'second lesson' from Is. 61:1, 2 and gave a discourse on its fulfilment. There was the note of present fulfilment: what the prophet had foretold was now finally coming true. There was also personal fulfilment: the One anointed with the Spirit was Jesus Himself. There was finally gracious fulfilment: the era of God's salvation had arrived, and it may well be significant that Jesus did not go on to finish the quotation with its reference to 'the day of vengeance of our God'.

Apparently the people were at first amazed by what Jesus said, but their response quickly became hostile as they took exception to one of their own number making such pretentious claims. Jesus saw their attitude as one of disbelief. They would have liked some tangible proof of His claims before their own eyes: let the physician perform some cures at home as well as at Capernaum! So they failed to recognize in Jesus a prophet, and He could only tell them that when the prophets of Israel had been faced by similar disbelief they had wrought their wonders among the heathen (1 Ki. 17:8–16; 2 Ki. 5:1–14). Thus the word of judgment was spoken—against themselves—and Jesus implied that the gospel would ultimately go to the Gentiles. In their wrath the people would have lynched Him for making such a suggestion.

16, 17 The synagogue service consisted of prayers, readings from the law and the prophets, and a sermon. The leader of the service stood to pray and read, and sat to teach. Any competent person present could be invited to take part (cf. Acts 13:15). There was at this time a set lectionary for the readings from the law, but Jesus was probably able to choose His own reading from the prophets. 18, 19 The text includes a phrase from Is. 58:6, probably included by the narrator because of its obvious fitness to describe the ministry of Jesus. The various acts described are to be taken spiritually rather than literally. The acceptable year is the one graciously chosen by God as the era of His favour to men. 22 The swift transition from praise to disbelief is perhaps strange. Some scholars have therefore thought that two or even three distinct incidents (vv. 16–22, 23f., 25–30) have been run together as one here. Others retranslate this verse: spoke well (lit. 'bore witness') could mean 'bore witness against', and wondered may indicate annoyance rather than acceptance. Gracious words are words speaking of God's grace. Jesus would be known locally as Joseph's son (but see Mk. 6:3). 25 Three years and six months: cf. Jas. 5:17. 30 A miraculous disappearance is probably not meant.

4:31–44 Successful work at Capernaum. (See Mt. 8:14–17; Mk. 1:21–39.) From the hill country Jesus went down to Capernaum on the lakeside. His main activity was teaching in the synagogue at worship on the sabbath. On one occasion He was interrupted by a demoniac who possessed supernatural insight into His Person and purpose: Jesus had come from God to destroy all that was unholy. Perhaps the demoniac hoped to overpower Jesus by using His name—this was a common ancient superstition—but Jesus peremptorily ordered the demon to be silent and leave the man. The healing confirmed the impression of tremendous authority already made by Jesus' teaching, and the people were not slow to spread the news.

Illness too was seen to be subject to His authority. On leaving the synagogue, Jesus healed both Simon's mother-in-law and many other people. He silenced the cries of the demoniacs because He wanted people to learn for themselves who He was. In the morning He could scarcely escape the crowds, but nevertheless left them. The task for which He had been sent by God was to proclaim the good news of God's rule far and wide, and He could not stay in one place and become the idol of an admiring throng.

33 A person possessed by a demon would undoubtedly be regarded today as suffering from mental illness. This, however, is not a full diagnosis of the phenomena in the Gospels, where the demoniacs also possessed a supernatural knowledge of things unknown to ordinary men. The presence of an evil, supernatural power cannot be rationalized away, and, just as theologians speak of the 'concursive' action of the Holy Spirit in men, so we may perhaps argue for a like action by evil spirits. 34 The Holy One of God means the same as 'the Son of God' (v. 41) or 'Christ' (v. 42), and stresses the opposition of Jesus to evil, perhaps as the bearer of the Holy Spirit. 38, 39 A high fever may be a technical medical term. Jesus rebuked it almost as if it were a person.

40 Once the new Jewish day had begun at sunset, the sabbath restrictions were lifted, and the sick could be carried to Jesus. By laying His hands on the sick, Jesus showed that He was bestowing God's power upon them. 42 Luke does not mention here that Jesus was at prayer (Mk. 1:35), but see 5:16. 43 Kingdom of God: see Mk. 1:15. 44 Judea here means Palestine as a whole, including Galilee (which some MSS have here); Jesus did not enter Judea proper for a settled ministry until later.

5:1–11 The call of the disciples. (Cf. Mt. 4:18–22; Mk. 1:16–20.) Mark's briefer account of the call of the first disciples concentrates attention on the basic fact that the proper response to the message of the kingdom of God is instant obedience to the call to discipleship. Luke's longer account shows that the call took place only after Jesus had won the friendship of Simon and revealed His heavenly power to him. Although Simon, as an experienced fisherman, knew that there was little likelihood of a catch, he was already sufficiently impressed by Jesus to obey His command. When the full revelation of Jesus' power came to him, he was overcome with a profound sense of fear and unworthiness in the presence of One who displayed heavenly power and was thereby demonstrated to be holy in His nature. Jesus, however, bade him not to be afraid (cf. 1:13, 30), and issued His call to discipleship in words obviously suggested by Simon's present occupation. All the attention is focused on Simon as the leader of the Twelve; we are left to infer Andrew's presence from v. 6.

1 Gennesaret ('Chinnereth' in the OT) is an alternative name for Galilee, and refers specifically to the district immediately south of Capernaum (cf. Mk. 6:53). 3 Cf. Mk. 2:13; 4:1f. 4, 5 The best fishing was done by night in deep water; during the day-time they fished in the shallows. 8 Simon Peter receives his full name only here in Luke (cf. 6:14), since his call was the moment which made his new name possible. He was not necessarily any more sinful than other men, but he felt that fear which all sinful men ought to feel in the presence of the divine (cf. Jdg. 13:21f.). 10 Critics who argue that Jesus could not have used this metaphor in a good sense, because it occurs only with a bad sense in the OT, are preferring a far-fetched explanation to the obvious one. 11 Theories that the great catch of fish was meant to provide provision for the dependants of the disciples during their travels with Jesus or is an allegory of the catch of men which they would take (cf. Jn. 21:1–14) are alike speculative.

5:12 – 6:11 The beginning of controversy with the Pharisees

In this section Luke recounts five incidents in all of which (apart from the first) various actions of Jesus and His disciples led to criticism from the Pharisees and showed up the nature of the new faith in contrast with the old legalism.

5:12–16 The healing of a leper. (See Mt. 8:1–4; Mk. 1:40–45.) The first story stands in contrast to the ensuing narratives, for it illustrates how Jesus normally abided by the OT law. If a man who had previously been certified as a leper claimed to be cured, he had to to through the proper form of discharge from the priest before being allowed to move freely in society again (Lv. 14:1–32), and Jesus instructed this man to obey the law. The story also makes clear how Jesus wrought cures in response to faith (though the word itself is not used), and indicates how His reputation was growing, both as a teacher and a healer.

12 Leprosy can mean any of several skin diseases, not all of them infectious.

5:17–26 Jesus' authority to forgive sins. (See Mt. 9:1–8; Mk. 2:1–12.) Luke (unlike Mark) indicates at the outset the presence of the Pharisees and teachers of the law, and prepares the reader for their hostile reaction to Jesus. When Jesus did not immediately heal the paralysed man but declared that his sins were forgiven, the unspoken thought of the onlookers was that this was a blasphemous declaration: only God could forgive sins, and Jesus had no authority to speak in His name. Jesus' response was to give indirect proof of His authority to forgive sins by showing that He possessed divine authority (v. 17) to heal; performance of the visible act should convince them that He also possessed authority for the invisible, and therefore unprovable, act. What the Pharisees said, however, was lost in the chorus of praise from the healed man and the bystanders alike which testified to the reality of Jesus' power.

17 The Pharisees were a religious party who placed great stress on punctilious observance of the unwritten law. The teachers of the law (or scribes) were a professional class of lawyers and teachers, usually but not exclusively members of the Pharisaic party. 19 Mark's description of a roof made of mud and wattle is in accord with Palestinian house construction; Luke has retold the story in terms of the Hellenistic roofing with tiles with which his readers would be more familiar. 20 The fact that Jesus singled out this man for a declaration of forgiveness may imply that he was guilty of some particularly culpable sin; it certainly does not mean that disaster is always due to sin (cf. 13:1–5). 21 A prophet or priest could forgive sin in God's name; the question, therefore, was whether Jesus possessed prophetic authority. In fact He claimed the higher authority of the Son of man who is associated with God's final judgment on men (cf. Dn. 7:9–22; Lk. 9:26; 12:8f.).

5:27–32 Jesus' attitude to sinners. (See Mt. 9:9–13; Mk. 2:13–17.) Unlike the story in 5:1–11, the story of Levi tells only incidentally what is implied in discipleship. Its main purpose is to show the kind of people Jesus called and to justify His action. He was glad to bring the gospel to Levi and his former companions, and His justification of His action was unimpeachable. No more than a doctor could He be expected to keep His hands clean. His duty lay with the needy whom He invited to repent; those who thought themselves to be righteous were not His primary concern.

30 Tax collectors were religiously unclean because they worked for the Romans, and hated because they fleeced their fellow-Jews and lined their own pockets with conspicuous success. Sinners included prostitutes and their kind, criminals and ne'er-do-wells, all of whom were beyond the pale for the Pharisees.

5:33–39 Jesus' attitude to fasting. (See Mt. 9:14–17; Mk. 2:18–22.) 33–35 The OT required fasting only on the annual Day of Atonement. Jesus disregarded the Pharisaic innovation of fasting twice a week. He argued, first, that it would be as fitting for His disciples to fast as for the groomsmen at a wedding to mourn instead of leading the festivities. The plain implication is that the new era of salvation has come, and the mournful rites of the old era are incompatible with it; only during the sad days between the death of Jesus and His resurrection would mourning be fitting. 36–39 Second, it is futile to try to combine the new religion with man-made legalism; the new religion will be debased, and in any case the two ways cannot be mixed, just as an unshrunk patch of cloth will pull away from an old garment or fermenting wine will burst old skins that have lost their elasticity. (38 The addition in AV misses the point.) 39 is probably an ironic comment on Jews who rejected the new wine of the gospel and held that the old ways were better.

6:1–11 Jesus' attitude to the sabbath. (See Mt. 12:1–14; Mk. 2:23 – 3:6.) The first of this pair of stories deals with the rigid sabbatarianism which prescribed meticulously what men must not do on the sabbath, even down to rubbing ears of grain in their hands. When the Pharisees heard (no doubt from some tell-tale) that Jesus was breaking their man-made law and criticized Him, He referred them to the example of David, who was allowed by the priest to give the bread of the Presence to his men, although it was normally reserved for the priests to eat (1 Sa. 21:1–6). It is important to observe that David was not breaking the OT law, and that Jesus was not citing his action as a precedent for doing so. Rather Jesus was showing that the OT itself does not uphold the rigorous legalism which the Pharisees had developed in their man-made traditions. The sabbath was made for man, and consequently the Son of man is its Lord. Since the sabbath is the Lord's day, this statement of Jesus is a veiled claim to equality with God.

In the second incident it looks as though the opponents of Jesus 'planted' the sick man in the synagogue to see what Jesus would do. He at once accepted the unspoken challenge and posed His searching question: if His action in healing a man on the sabbath was to be considered sinful, how much more sinful was their plotting of His death. For the penalty for transgression of the sabbath law was death, and Mark tells us that from this time the Pharisees began to plot the death of Jesus.

1 The AV and RSV mg. text 'the second sabbath after the first' is unexplained; it may be a technical term of the Jewish calendar or a scribal error. 2 In the Mishnah there is a list of thirty-nine occupations forbidden on the sabbath, including threshing. 9 The view that to do harm and to destroy life refer simply to not healing the sick man is less likely than that suggested above.

6:12–49 The teaching of Jesus to His disciples

Having given us a sketch of the general character of the ministry of Jesus and depicted the relationship of Jesus to His opponents, Luke now describes the relationship of Jesus to His disciples. After narrating the call of the Twelve, he presents the teaching which Jesus gave to all who wished to follow Him.

6:12–16 The call of the Twelve. (See Mt. 10:1–4; Mk. 3:13–19.) Luke alone draws attention to the way in which Jesus prayed all night before making the momentous choice of the Twelve. Out of the larger company who had responded to His teaching He chose His apostles. The use of this title is often regarded as an anachronism from the time after the resurrection, but it is entirely in harmony with the way in which Jesus spoke of sending (Gk. apostellō) them out on mission (10:3).

14 Luke does not tell when Simon received his new name of 'rock' (cf. Mt. 16:18; Jn. 1:42). Bartholomew is probably the same as Nathanael (Jn. 1:45–51). 15 Matthew and Levi (5:27) are the same person. It was not uncommon for Jews to have two names. A Zealot was one of the extreme Jewish nationalists who eventually took up arms against Rome. 16 Judas (cf. Jn. 14:22) is the Thaddaeus of Mark's list. Iscariot may mean 'man of Kerioth' or 'assassin' (Latin sicarius) or 'false one'.

6:17–19 The assembling of the people. (Mt. 4:23–25; Mk. 3:7–12.) From the hills Jesus returned to a level place where the people could more easily reach Him as they swarmed together from all over the area surrounding Galilee. They may have been especially attracted by His healing power, but Jesus did not lose the opportunity to teach them.

17 The same scene is described in Mark before the call of the Twelve. The Evangelists were obviously not concerned to give an exact chronological record. Luke's arrangement shows that there was a substantial crowd to hear the following sermon (cf. 7:1) and that it was not delivered solely to the Twelve. 19 Cf. 8:46.

6:20–26 Two kinds of men. (See Mt. 5:1–12.) The 'Sermon on the Plain', so called to distinguish it from the 'Sermon on the Mount' (Mt. 5–7), is basically a shorter version of the latter, and it is generally agreed that Matthew has enlarged the sermon found in Luke by adding to it other sayings of Jesus on the same or related topics.

The Sermon here begins with a contrast between two types of men. The first group are those who by all outward appearance are to be pitied, but in the judgment of Jesus are blessed or happy because of what is promised to them. They are poor and needy, hungry and sad. This can hardly refer purely to their literal condition, and must be understand spiritually (as Matthew indicates) of those who feel dissatisfied with this present world and long for what God has to give to them. They are promised that He will hear them and fulfil their longings in the coming kingdom which was the theme of Jesus' message. Men may hate and revile them for putting their trust in God's representative, the Son of man, but, like the prophets, they will receive their reward from God. This fourth 'beatitude' shows that the persons whom Jesus has in mind are His disciples, and that what He is speaking of are the privileges and implications of discipleship. The other group of men are those who have what the present can offer—satisfaction of their desires for material goods, happiness and a good reputation among men—and do not want anything more: no need for them to cry out to God in prayer, for they think they have enough. The time will come, says Jesus, when they will have nothing; many in Israel will fall (2:34).

6:27–38 Love and mercy. (See Mt. 5:39–48; 7:12, 1f.) If the first part of the sermon dealt with the disciples' relationship to God, this second part now deals with their relationship to other men. It is summed up in the idea of love for one's enemies. The general principle is laid down in vv. 27f., where it is made clear that the enemies meant are especially those who persecute the disciples. Two brief examples of such love are given—refraining from retaliation when struck a blow and readiness to give a footpad who robs you more than he demands. The disciples must be prepared to give away their possessions freely, and their conduct is summed up in the 'golden rule' of v. 31.

This sort of behaviour is revolutionary. Most people are quite ready to do good to those who have helped them or from whom they expect some benefit in return. But if sinners can do that, disciples ought to go further and abandon this principle of mutuality; their love should not simply repay love or expect something in return. There may well be no earthly credit or reward (AV 'thank'), but there will be a heavenly reward, and they will be accounted as true sons of the God who shows mercy to the undeserving.

What the reward is is shown in vv. 37f. The man who loves like this will receive a like love—and more—from God. He who does not judge his fellow-men will not be judged by God, and he who gives will receive ample return, like a measure of meal so well filled that it is running over.

Notice again that all this is spoken to disciples. Jesus is not saying that all a man has to do to inherit a heavenly reward is to love his neighbour.

29, 30 Jesus is not of course advocating the kind of indiscriminate generosity which would encourage lazy and parasitical good-for-nothings. 34 Probably sinners hoped to get even more back by charging a fat rate of interest.

6:39–49 Pictures of discipleship. (See Mt. 15:14; 10:24f.; 7:3–5, 16, 21, 24–27; 12:33–35; cf. Jn. 13:16; 15:20.) In the final part of the sermon a series of parabolic sayings brings out the character that disciples should show.

39–42 The first group speaks of spiritual sight. The disciple must learn before he can be a teacher. For one who is taught is not better than his teacher, and if the teacher himself falls the pupils will fall also. The disciple must also see himself clearly before he can point out the faults of others. Jesus makes His points with humorous exaggeration.

43–45 A second group of sayings shows that good conduct can come only from a good heart. It is as foolish to expect good fruit from a bad tree as to expect good deeds from a bad man. Only the man whose heart is richly stored with good will bring forth good teaching.

46–49 Finally, what ultimately matters is not simply hearing Jesus but obeying His words. The man who hears and does not obey is as foolish as the man who builds a house without care to secure a good foundation; the man who hears and obeys will be as secure on the day of judgment as the man who takes care to build his house with strong foundations on the rock.

7:1–50 The compassion of the Messiah

7:1–10 The healing of a centurion's servant. (See Mt. 8:5–13; Jn. 4:46–53.) The central figure in this story is a Gentile, possibly in the employ of Herod Antipas (cf. 3:14). He had sufficient money to help in the building of the synagogue in Capernaum; even an honest man could readily make money in the police force. He is presented as a man of the highest character in his concern for his slave, his attitude to the Jews and his consciousness of unworthiness in the presence of Jesus. What shines out especially is the quality of his faith. As one who himself had been given such authority from his superior officers that he could enforce the obedience of his subordinates, he recognized in Jesus one who had the authority of God to quell disease, and he was prepared to trust Jesus to heal even by a simple word of command. Well did Jesus commend such faith, and note that a Gentile had surpassed the Jews in showing it.

The story as told by Luke differs somewhat from Matthew's version in that here the centurion sends two groups of messengers to Jesus instead of appearing personally; it may be that through abbreviation (cf. Mt. 9:18–26 with Mk. 5:22–43) Matthew has given a different impression. There is a very similar story in John about an official whose son was ill in Capernaum. The similarity is greater if the word pais (used in Lk. 7:7 and Matthew) is translated as 'boy' (= son) rather than as 'boy' (= servant), and if it is assumed that Luke's use of 'slave' (vv. 2, 10) is mistaken. But there is nothing in Matthew or Luke which suggests that a son is meant, and the details of the story in John are very different.

3 The elders were the leading men in a small community, and would be closely associated with the synagogue. 6–8 The messengers would report the centurion's message verbatim.

7:11–17 The healing of the widow's son. The story of the healing of a person at the point of death is followed by that of the resurrection of a dead man. His death especially aroused the sympathy of Jesus because his mother was a widow and he would be her only means of support. The funeral procession was already going out of the town to a cemetery with the dead man carried on an open bier. Ignoring ritual contamination with the dead body, Jesus stopped the bier and commanded the young man to arise. His simple word of command sufficed to work the miracle, and the people were filled with mingled terror and joy in the presence of the supernatural. They remembered that Elijah and Elisha had worked similar wonders (1 Ki. 17:17–24; 2 Ki. 4:18–37) and glorified God far and wide.

11, 12 Nain was a village to the south of Nazareth. Archaeologists suggest that since it was never fortified it may not have had a gate, and it is possible that here Luke describes the scene in terms of the kind of city with which his readers were familiar. 13 Luke alone of the Evangelists makes frequent use of the title Lord to designate Jesus. Jesus was probably not known generally as 'the Lord' during His lifetime (see Mk. 11:3); when He was addressed as 'Lord', it meant no more than 'Sir' as a common title of respect. 16 Cf. 1:68, 78.

7:18–35 Jesus and John the Baptist. (See Mt. 11:2–19.) In his prison John was perplexed by the news that filtered through from his followers about Jesus: Jesus did not seem to be setting the heather on fire in quite the way that John had anticipated. So he sent messengers to ask Jesus plainly whether He was the promised One or not. Jesus' reply was to draw attention to the works of mercy which He was performing and to send messengers back to John with words drawn from Is. 26:19; 29:18f.; 35:5f.; 61:1. This should show John that the signs of the age of salvation were being performed. Let not John miss their point and 'lose faith in Jesus' (JB). Whether the message confirmed John's faith we are not told directly. Perhaps there is a hint in the way in which Jesus went on to praise John. Here was no easy-going or fickle person who lived in comfort. This was the greatest of the prophets, the greatest man ever born, the forerunner of the Messiah. The praise is unstinted, and then comes the surprise: even the most insignificant person in the kingdom of God is superior to John, for John lived just outside the era of salvation. In vv. 29f. we are told in parenthesis how the supporters of John in the crowd praised God that their prophet had been vindicated by Jesus, but the Pharisees and lawyers rejected John and Jesus alike.

Then Jesus commented on the attitude of the Pharisees and their followers. They were like children playing games. When one group of children suggest playing at weddings and play merry music, the other group refuse to dance; and when the first group suggest playing at funerals instead and sing a dirge, the others still refuse to play and will not join in the mourning. The Jews did not find the ascetic John to their liking, and they bitterly criticized Jesus for mixing with frivolous people and joining in their revels; we may be sure that their pictures of both men were over-drawn and exaggerated. Despite them all, said Jesus, God's wisdom is shown to be right by her children, i.e. those who responded to John and Himself.

19 He who is to come may have been a title. Jn. 6:14; 11:27 might suggest that a coming prophet was in mind, but it is more likely that the Messiah was meant (cf. Heb. 10:37). 22 Since the signs were those of the actual coming of salvation, Jesus was not merely the prophet of the new age, but the actual bringer of it. 23 Perhaps John was offended by the absence of judgment from the message of Jesus (cf. 4:18f.). 24, 25 The reed represents an easy-going person. The fact that John did not live in luxury meant that he was not likely to condone easy-going ways in his hearers. 27 Cf. Mk. 1:2. The quotation is based on Ex. 23:20 and Mal. 3:1 where God promises to send His messenger to His people. 34 The title of Son of man here refers to Jesus in the humble character of His earthly life as one rejected by His generation. Some hold that the Aramaic phrase could be used as a periphrasis for 'I', so that Jesus' hearers may not necessarily have realized that He was using a title. It is extremely unlikely that anyone would have invented this saying and then ascribed it to Jesus. 35 For children Matthew has 'works'. Wisdom is a periphrasis for the name of God.

7:36–50 The woman who was a sinner. (Cf. Mt. 26:6–13; Mk. 14:3–9; Jn. 12:1–8.) The immediately following story gives point to the accusation made in v. 34. Jesus had been invited to the home of a Pharisee, probably for a meal after a synagogue service. It was not uncommon for uninvited guests to be found at a banquet, and among them was a woman well known as a prostitute. She proceeded to anoint Jesus with ointment, very possibly bought with her immoral earnings, but the fulfilment of her intention was interrupted by her tears. The Pharisee was disturbed by the way in which Jesus accepted this respect given in so embarrassing a manner from so undesirable a person; his feelings that Jesus might be a prophet (possibly the prophet, RV mg.) were being contradicted by the latter's apparent ignorance of the person of the woman. But Jesus knew what He was doing. He made His point with a crystal-clear parable. Love is the proof of the reception of forgiveness, and the more a person is forgiven, the more he will love. There is no need at all to read supercilious indifference into Simon's reply (v. 43), and it is unnecessary to suppose that his treatment of Jesus had been discourteous; he had performed the duties of hospitality but had not gone out of his way to give Jesus a special welcome. By contrast the sinful woman had lavished her devotion upon Jesus. This was proof that she had been forgiven many sins (cf. v. 47, NEB).

Jesus then proceeded to confirm her forgiveness by a clear declaration and to assert that her faith had brought her salvation. Many commentators, especially an older generation of Roman Catholics, have held that the woman's love for Jesus was the cause of her forgiveness rather than its result. They would interpret v. 47 as 'the reason why her sins are forgiven is because she loved much' and see in v. 48 the first intimation of forgiveness to her. This interpretation is unquestionably wrong. It makes nonsense of the parable (vv. 41f.) which shows that love follows forgiveness, and it ignores the stress on faith in v. 50. It arises from failure to recognize that 'to love' is the Hebrew phrase for 'to show gratitude'. We must assume rather that the woman had already heard and received the gospel from Jesus.

The story is not to be identified with that in the other Gospels.

37 The woman would easily be able to reach Jesus as He reclined on a couch at the table. 38 The woman's actions were unseemly, but she was too much under emotional stress to care what people thought. 41 The denarius was roughly an agricultural worker's daily wage. 46 Olive oil was vastly cheaper than ointment. 50 Saved must be taken spiritually.

8:1–21 Jesus teaches in parables

8:1–3 Travelling arrangements. This brief paragraph notes how Jesus began to travel round the countryside after a period of fairly settled ministry. Various women took part in the campaign and helped to provide for the necessities of the missionaries (cf. Mk. 15:40f.); there is a thematic link between v. 2 and the story of the woman who anointed Jesus, but nothing suggests that it was Mary Magdalene who anointed Jesus.

1 Cf. 4:44; Mt. 9:35. 2 Magdala was a village near Capernaum. Seven is a round number, indicating the worst possible state of corruption; cf. 11:26. 3 Joanna: cf. on 9:9; 24:10.

8:4–8 The parable of the sower. (See Mt. 13:1–9; Mk. 4:1–9.) After giving us stories not found in Mark (6:20 – 8:3), Luke now returns to the general framework in Mark and follows it to 9:50, omitting many details found in Mark. Thus he has not mentioned the lakeside scene in which Mark sets the parables of Jesus. The first parable is a simple description of the varying fortunes of seeds sown broadcast over a field which contains different kinds of soil. Nothing is said regarding the meaning of the parable: the people were meant to ask themselves: 'What is all this about?'

4 The word parable is used in the OT to describe any kind of non-literal utterance, including oracles, similes, fables and stories, and riddles. Similar stories were told by Jewish teachers, although their parables fell far below those of Jesus in quality. The 'parables' of Jesus included metaphors and similes (e.g. 5:36–39), proverbs (e.g. 4:23), typical happenings (as here) and particular events (e.g. 10:30–37) which were used to illustrate the nature of God's acts (e.g. 13:18–21) and the kind of response that men ought to make to them (e.g. 16:1–9).

8:9–15 The meaning of the parable. (See Mt. 13:10–23; Mk. 4:10–20.) When the disciples later asked Jesus what the parable meant, He began by giving a general statement on the use of parables. Those who responded to His teaching had been given a knowledge of His purposes by God: secrets means the plans of God for the outworking of His kingdom which had long been hidden from men but were now made known to those whom He chose. Other people refused to accept Jesus' message, and therefore it was presented to them in a veiled form, so that, if they did not make the effort to understand it, they would be none the wiser; thus they would fulfil the prophecy in Is. 6:9f. about men who do not understand the meaning of what they hear.

The wording of the explanation of the parable of the sower differs from that in Mark, and Luke has no doubt stressed certain elements that were important for his readers. He brings out the need for the coming of God's word to be met by faith and perseverance if the hearers are to be the kind of ground which produces good fruit. In some men's hearts the seed may never get a chance to germinate, in others its growth is arrested because they fail to endure.

8:16–18 The parable of the lamp. (See Mk. 4:21–25.) The audience is presumably again the general public. The application of the parable of the lamp is obscure. It may refer to the need for the disciples to reveal to others the light they have received, or to the way in which the teaching of Jesus, now conveyed obscurely in parables, will one day be clearly expressed. Those who enter may be the Gentiles. 18 brings out the meaning of v. 10: receptive listening leads to fuller understanding, but refusal to listen will mean deprivation of even the opportunity to listen.

8:19–21 Jesus' true relatives. (See Mt. 12:46–50; Mk. 3:31–35.) Luke has placed this incident here (in Mark it precedes the parables) to illustrate how men should respond to the teaching of Jesus. Those who receive it obediently are accepted by Him as on a level with physical relatives. The saying does not of course imply any denigration of His relatives; their presence simply provided Him with an object lesson.

19 The brothers were Mary's later children by Joseph (cf. 2:7; Mt. 1:25) who was probably now dead.

8:22–56 A group of mighty works

8:22–25 The master of the storm. (See Mt. 8:23–27; Mk. 4:35–41.) The lake of Galilee is surrounded by steep mountains with narrow valleys down which the wind is funnelled in sudden, strong squalls. When Jesus lay unconcernedly asleep while the boat was awash, the disciples roused Him, apparently in the hope that He would do something to help them. His answer implied that they should have known that, even if He was asleep, no harm could come to them, but nevertheless He arose and masterfully addressed the elements. The disciples rightly asked, Who then is this . . . ? The answer is that God rules the waves, and His power was at work in Jesus (Ps. 89:8f.; 93:3f.; 106:8f.; 107:23ff.; Is. 51:9f.). But they did not yet fully realize this.

8:26–39 The Gerasene demoniac. (See Mt. 8:28–34; Mk. 5:1–20.) On arrival at the other side Jesus was met by a man suffering from a manic-depressive psychosis associated with demonic possession, which gave him an uncanny insight into who Jesus was. Human medicine knew no better cure for the mentally ill than to keep them under the severest restraint, but this man had eluded all attempts to control him. He was driven by such a mass of conflicting impulses that he felt himself to be possessed by a legion of some 5,000 demons. Jesus had compassion on him and freed him from the demons who entered into a herd of swine. Critics have demurred at the loss of the swine, but it is an adequate reply that one man is worth many swine. Others have suggested that the rational explanation of the incident is that it was the rampagings of the demoniac which frightened the herd into a stampede. If, however, the fact of demon-possession is accepted (cf. on 4:33), it would be unwise to brush aside the explanation given by the Evangelists when we have no means of knowing whether any other theory is true.

The people around were alarmed and frightened by the whole affair, and besought Jesus to depart. Their minds were so filled with fear at the incursion of the supernatural into their daily life that they could not see through to the grace and mercy of God. This was surely why Jesus urged the cured man to stay at home; if the people were frightened of Him personally, they would listen to a man whom they knew and hear from him of God's goodness revealed in Jesus.

26 The name of the place varies in the MSS. The best authorities name it as Gerasa, a city some 30 miles south-east of the lake; its territory could have reached to the lakeside. Others refer to Gadara (only 6 miles from the lake) or to Gergesa (modern Khersa) on the lakeside, which was probably the actual site of the incident. 27 The tombs were caves in which a man might shelter. 31 The abyss is the abode of demons (Rev. 9:1–11). Here it is a place of confinement or punishment. 32 In a largely Gentile area the keeping of swine would not be strange.

8:40–56 The healings of Jairus's daughter and the woman with a haemorrhage. (See Mt. 9:18–26; Mk. 5:21–43.) Back on the Jewish side of the lake Jesus found a ruler of the synagogue anxious for His help for his sick daughter. His journey to Jairus's house was interrupted by an incident which should have confirmed the nascent faith of Jairus, but perhaps simply made him impatient at the delay. The newcomer was a woman with a haemorrhage which refused to yield to treatment. Since her disease made her religiously unclean, she was afraid to approach Jesus openly, but she had sufficient faith to hope that mere physical contact with Him would heal her. We may be tempted to dismiss her belief as superstitious, but Jesus did not. His healing power (v. 46, AV 'virtue') did not flow from Him automatically at a touch, but was under His control, and He responded instinctively to the faith which He felt to be present. Then He summoned the woman into the open so that He might complete the cure by restoring her self-respect and making her relationship with Him one that was fully personal and free from the suspicion of superstition.

The delay seemed to spell doom for Jairus's hopes, for now news came that Jesus was going to be too late. But Jesus assured him that this was not the end. At the house He went in quietly to the dead girl, and a word from Him restored her to life. The fact of her recovery could hardly be kept secret, but Jesus wished for the privacy to be as great as possible; nobody need know just what had happened in the sick-room. It was His occupational hazard in performing miracles that people might believe in Him as a wonder-worker because of the power which He displayed instead of believing in Him as the Son of God and the Saviour of the world because of the revelation of divine love in Him.

41 The ruler of the synagogue arranged the synagogue services and its other affairs; his wishes were executed by the attendant (4:20). 42 Attempts to deny that the girl really died go against the whole tenor of the story (cf. v. 49). 43 Luke does not mention that the woman had tried many doctors in vain; but it is not clear whether this is simply due to his habit of abbreviation or to a desire to remove a possible slur from his profession. 52 Funeral rites took place with great speed in the ancient East (cf. Acts 5:5–7), and the mourning would have commenced as soon as the girl died. 55 The command to give food may be a demonstration that the girl was really alive, but more probably shows the human compassion of Jesus.

9:1–50 Jesus and the Twelve

9:1–9 The mission of the Twelve. (See Mt. 10:5–15; 14:1–12; Mk. 6:7–29.) The expansion of Jesus' work (8:1) gave Him the opportunity to give the Twelve practical training. Equipped with His authority they were to do His work of preaching and healing. They were to live frugally, perhaps so as to avoid the reproach of making a good thing out of their mission, and to avoid being mistaken for other less reputable types of wandering preacher. They were not to go from house to house seeking hospitality; if a town did not receive them, they were to do what Jews did when leaving a Gentile town, so as to indicate by an acted parable that the inhabitants were cutting themselves off from the true Israel.

Between the missionaries' departure and return Luke notes the opinions which men were now holding about Jesus, and thus prepares for the question in v. 18. Herod Antipas was inclined by his guilty conscience to accept the view that perhaps John the Baptist had returned from the dead. But his longing to see Jesus was scarcely motivated by a lofty purpose (23:8).

1 Luke omits the story in Mk. 6:1–6; see 4:16–30. 3 Mk. 6:8 allows the use of a staff; this will be an adaptation of Jesus' teaching for more rigorous conditions outside Galilee. AV 'scrip' means 'bag'. 8 For the return of Elijah see 1:17. 9 Here Herod comes short of identifying John and Jesus; contrast Mk. 6:16. Luke seems to have had fuller details about Herod, possibly from Joanna (cf. 8:3).

9:10–17 The feeding of the five thousand. (See Mt. 14:13–21; Mk. 6:30–44; Jn. 6:1–14.) Jesus had hoped to take the Twelve away for rest after their mission, but the crowds thwarted the scheme, and Jesus took the opportunity to teach them. At the end of the day the disciples were anxious about the crowds; they themselves had a pitifully small amount of food and certainly not the money to provide for such numbers. Jesus, however, took what was available, and having given thanks in the normal Jewish way He broke and distributed the food. The story is told simply as an indication of the power of Jesus; Mark and John bring out more clearly that it reveals Jesus as the Supplier of human needs, the Giver of bread from heaven.

10 Bethsaida, at the head of the lake, was the destination of the disciples after the feeding (Mk. 6:45); the feeding must have taken place in its vicinity. 12 Luke alone mentions the need to find somewhere to lodge; the people would camp out or seek near-by hamlets. 16 Jesus blessed not the loaves (as AV implies) but God; the Jewish grace is 'Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the world, who bringest forth bread from the earth.'

9:18–27 The Person and destiny of Jesus. (See Mt. 16:13–28; Mk. 8:27 – 9:1.) Luke omits the stories about Jesus which occur in Matthew and Mark between the feeding of the five thousand and Peter's confession; he may have felt that they added nothing distinctive to the picture of Jesus which has already been given. The reader has seen sufficient to be able to appreciate why Peter, speaking on behalf of the disciples, confessed that Jesus was the Christ (or Messiah) rather than simply a prophet, even a prophet raised from the dead. The fact that Jesus told them not to reveal this to anybody means that He accepted Peter's estimate of Himself. The reason for this command to secrecy was to prevent misunderstanding of the Messianic claim in a political sense.

But now a new fact must be learned. He must endure suffering and death and be raised from the dead. The Jews do not seem to have thought of anything like this happening to the Messiah, and the disciples themselves never grasped the meaning of Jesus' words that He must suffer as many righteous men suffered and above all perfectly fulfil the prophecy of the suffering Servant of Yahweh. It consequently took them a long time to realize also that the disciples of the Messiah must be prepared to suffer. If they seek to save their (earthly) lives, they will lose the life that really matters, but if they are prepared to lay down their lives for Jesus, they will know real life. For on the day of judgment those who loved their earthly lives so much that they despised Jesus will find themselves rejected.

22 Jesus' favourite title for Himself was the Son of man (5:24; 6:5, 22; 7:34). The Jewish Messiah was a human figure, but the Son of man (Dn. 7:9–22) is a heavenly figure and is better fitted to express the role of Jesus. Jesus' concept of His function was so different from that of popular Messianism that He avoided open use of the title. He also reinterpreted the functions of the Son of man by speaking not only of His activity on the day of judgment (v. 26) but also of His suffering (Is. 52:13 – 53:12). 27 The reference of this saying is somewhat uncertain. It can hardly mean that Jesus expected the end of the world within the lifetime of His hearers; it may refer to the coming of the kingdom in His own ministry or in the life of the church, but the position of the saying suggests that it refers to the transfiguration as an event prophetic of Jesus' future exaltation.

9:28–36 The transfiguration of Jesus. (See Mt. 17:1–8; Mk. 9:2–8.) The very precise time note shows that the transfiguration must be linked closely with the preceding saying (v. 27). As Jesus was praying on a mountain, His appearance and garments took on a heavenly lustre, and He was joined by two men, long before departed from this world, who spoke with Him about His departure (Gk. exodos), i.e. His death (AV 'decease') and resurrection, thus confirming the prophecy made in v. 22. Peter felt that they should make three 'booths' or tabernacles for the heavenly visitors, either to honour them or to prolong their stay. But the narrator expressly comments that Peter had misunderstood the occasion. The true significance is to be found in the heavenly voice which assured the disciples that the Jesus whom they confessed to be the Messiah was indeed the Son of God, not despite His coming passion but because of it; they were to obey Him—and Him alone.

28 Eight days means 'a week'; Mk. 9:2 has 'six days'. 29 Luke alone records that Jesus was praying and thus in contact with the heavenly world. Is the story an account of how the disciples' eyes were opened to see what was happening when Jesus communed with His Father (cf. 2 Ki. 6:17)? 30 Jewish tradition expected both Moses and Elijah to reappear at the end of time. They represented the law and the prophets, and both had unusual departures from this world. 34 A cloud regularly symbolizes the presence of God. 35 The voice repeats the address at the baptism of Jesus, but this time speaks to the disciples. 36 Luke has omitted the conversation on the way down from the mountain, as well as all geographical indications.

9:37–50 Experiences in the valley. (See Mt. 17:14–23; 18:1–5; Mk. 9:14–41.) In this final section on the work of Jesus in Galilee a number of incidents all show the need of the disciples for power and instruction. 37–43a In the first story a boy suffering from epilepsy and demonic possession had been brought to the disciples who had not accompanied Jesus on the mountain, and the case had proved to be beyond their healing powers (9:1). The boy was then brought to Jesus who expressed His sorrow at the faithlessness and perversity of men who required His personal presence before the power of God could operate. The act of healing amazed the people with its revelation of the greatness of God's power.

43b–45 A swift contrast to this revelation was given by the words of Jesus in which He again told the disciples that the Son of man must suffer rather than make His way through the world in triumph. Like Mark, Luke stresses the obtuseness of the disciples who found this teaching beyond their grasp and attributes it to the purpose of God.

46–48 Two further incidents stress this lack of comprehension. The first shows the disciples quarrelling about rank and position among themselves. Even disciples could have ambitions of this kind, and Jesus was able to penetrate to the elemental motives that struggled for mastery in their hearts. Setting a child—the most insignificant member of society in Jewish eyes—in their midst, He said that the person who was humble enough to receive a child would receive Himself and His Father. When men have that kind of attitude, questions of precedence will not arise.

In this connection John remembered how they had treated a man who was casting out demons in the power of the name of Jesus and yet was not one of the Twelve (vv. 49f.). He was not to be despised, said Jesus, for a man who is not against Him is on His side; the saying in 11:23 shows that there is another side to this truth.

9:51 – 19:10 THE JOURNEY TO JERUSALEM

Luke omits the incidents recorded in Mk. 9:42 – 10:12 and does not return to the outline of events in Mark until 18:15. Instead he gives much material which is not in Mark. The impression is given of a journey to Jerusalem which covers the next chapters (contrast the briefer account in Mk. 10), but it is difficult to believe that all that is recorded here took place on one journey. Some of the incidents and sayings given here seem to belong to Galilee or Jerusalem, and it is likely that Luke has gathered together material from various periods in the ministry of Jesus and grouped it thematically at this point. (Compare the procedure of Matthew in his 'great discourses'.) We also know from John that Jesus paid several visits to Jerusalem, and it is probable that this section of Luke reflects details of a number of journeys to Jerusalem rather than just one. The general theme of the section is discipleship, and this is expressed against the background of following Jesus to Jerusalem.

9:51 – 10:24 The duties and privileges of discipleship

9:51–56 The Samaritan village. Jews and Samaritans deeply hated each other, but Jesus refused to meet human opposition with judgment (cf. 2 Ki. 1:10f.). The additional words recorded in RSV mg. (and AV) in v. 56 are not a true part of Luke's text, but express accurately the mind of Jesus: He suffered opposition without retaliation because He had come to save.

51 To be received up is used of the total event of passion, death and ascension. He set his face: Is. 50:7. 52 Were the messengers to arrange an evangelistic meeting?

9:57–62 Readiness for discipleship. (See Mt. 8:19–22.) Many men wish to follow Jesus, even to Jerusalem, until they find out what is involved. Jesus' reply to the first would-be disciple speaks of the homelessness of the Son of man and His disciples. Since many friends provided for the material needs of Jesus, the saying refers metaphorically to His being rejected by men. A second man was told that he must not make any excuses for delay. The third had to be told that there can be no turning back in the service of Jesus, any more than a backward-looking ploughman can expect to produce a straight furrow. All three sayings stress the idea of absolute commitment to Jesus.

60 means 'Let that duty look after itself' or 'Leave that task to the spiritually dead'. 61 is more rigorous than 1 Ki. 19:19–21.

10:1–16 The mission of the Seventy. (Cf. Mt. 9:37f.; 10:7–16; 11:21–23.) Only Luke records that in addition to the Twelve Jesus sent out a further group to do mission work for Him. He addressed them in words similar to those with which He sent out the Twelve (9:1–6). After speaking of the richness of the harvest to be gathered, He indicated paradoxically that they were going out in simplicity among a ravenous horde of wolves who would frustrate their work. They were to travel lightly like the Twelve and not to waste time in long, oriental salutations. They were to accept the hospitality given to them as their 'wages', but were not to seek for better conditions by going from one house to another. Their message was that the kingdom of God had arrived; the tokens of its presence were the works of healing which they performed. Where the message was not received, a warning of divine judgment was to be uttered. As if in parenthesis, Jesus then alluded to the towns which had refused His own preaching and soliloquized upon their fate at the day of judgment. Heathen towns of old would have given a warmer response to the gospel than these Jewish towns; their pride would experience a swift downfall. Then, finally, He emphasized that the disciples were to be His personal representatives and consequently God's representatives.

1 The MSS here and in v. 17 (and in other passages also) are divided in reading seventy or 'seventy-two', with the latter having slightly better support. The number may allude to the number of nations in Gn. 10 or to the seventy elders (Ex. 24:1). 6 A son of peace is a peace-loving man, one worthy of the Messianic gift of peace. Note how real power resides in a word of blessing. 7 See 1 Cor. 9:14. Jesus taught that those who receive the gospel should provide for the evangelist. The early church carried out the principle by providing for its teachers and evangelists so that they would not be dependent on those whom they evangelized (3 Jn. 7f.). Paul sought to impose no burden at all on his churches, although he was fully entitled to do so (1 Cor. 9:14) and quoted this text in connection with the rights of elders (1 Tim. 5:18). 9 Has come near (Gk. ēngiken): when the gospel is proclaimed, the blessings of God's rule are within the grasp of all who will accept them; cf. Mk. 1:15. 11 The missionaries disclaim further responsibility after having clearly presented the message. 13 Chorazin, a town north of Capernaum, not mentioned elsewhere in the Gospels. 16 Cf. 9:48; Jn. 15:23.

10:17–24 The return of the Seventy. (See Mt. 11:25–27; 13:16f.) When the missionaries joyfully returned, having found that their healing powers even extended to exorcism, Jesus saw a sign that Satan's throne was toppling. Yet it would be wrong to rejoice too much over this; men may cast out demons and yet be excluded from the kingdom (cf. Mt. 7:22f.). Far better to rejoice that one's name is recorded in God's book.

Then Jesus rejoiced and thanked God for His revelation given to ordinary men in accordance with His purpose which does not take account of human wisdom. His prayer culminates in the great saying confessing that all such knowledge has been given to Him by His Father; there is an exclusive, mutual bond of personal knowledge between the Father and the Son, so that only the Son can make the Father known to men. The disciples have received this knowledge from the Son; the men of the past would gladly have seen the coming of the kingdom, but only the disciples had been granted to see and hear the Son of God.

18 Cf. Rev. 12:7–10. Jesus is speaking metaphorically. He has a vision of the spiritual defeat of Satan which took place at the cross; and the exorcisms, the defeat of Satan's minions, confirm His certainty of the coming victory over their master. 19 Serpents and scorpions are symbolical of spiritual wickedness: Dt. 8:15; Ps. 91:13. 20 Cf. Phil. 4:3. 22 The slight difference in wording from Mt. 11:27 does not affect the meaning. The authenticity of the saying has been much attacked, but it is being increasingly recognized that the language is thoroughly Jewish. All things means 'all revelation' rather than 'all power'. The word know is used in Hebrew to express personal knowledge (e.g. Gn. 4:1 of the marriage relationship) or choice (Am. 3:2); here it expresses the personal communion between Jesus and His Father, reflected in the prayer of Jesus (cf. Mk. 14:36), as a result of which Jesus alone is qualified to reveal the Father to men. The saying is thoroughly in keeping with Jesus' teaching in John (e.g. Jn. 10:15).

10:25 – 11:13 The characteristics of disciples

10:25–37 The good Samaritan. The story is not to be confused with the different one in Mk. 12:28–31. Here Jesus is asked about how a man may qualify for eternal life (cf. 18:18) and He replies by referring His questioner in good Jewish fashion to the law. The question then becomes one of summarizing the essence and purport of the law. The lawyer gives the same reply as that given by Jesus in Mk. 12:29–31, a fact which should not surprise us, since there is evidence that the Jews had already coupled Dt. 6:5 and Lv. 19:18 before the time of Jesus. In view of Gal. 3:12 Jesus' answer may sound legalistic, but it is not so when considered in the total content of His teaching.

The lawyer had 'lost face' by being given this textbook answer, and tried to regain the initiative by demanding a more precise definition of his neighbour. The parable given in reply is most remarkable. One commentator has suggested that we would expect to hear a parable which tells how a Jew should show love to anybody, even to a Samaritan, but in fact Jesus shows how even a Samaritan may be nearer to the kingdom than a pious, but merciless, Jew. For although the lawyer asked 'Who is my neighbour (passively understood)?' Jesus suggests that the real question is rather 'Do I behave as a neighbour (active sense)?' In other words, Jesus does not supply information as to whom one should help, for failure to keep the commandment does not spring from lack of information but from lack of love. It was not fresh knowledge that the lawyer needed, but a new heart—in plain English, conversion.

30 A steep road, 17 miles long, descended the 3,300 ft from Jerusalem to Jericho, which was a country dwelling of priests (cf. 1:23). The story may well be based on fact. 31, 32 The priest and Levite may have feared defilement by touching a corpse. 33 The audience no doubt expected that the third character would be a Jewish layman, thus giving an anti-clerical point to the story. 37 The lawyer could not bring himself to say 'the Samaritan'!

10:38–42 Serving Jesus. Martha was busily preparing supper while Mary listened to the teaching of Jesus. When Martha rudely complained to the guest about her lazy sister, Jesus replied gently but firmly. Martha, He said, was busy trying to provide an elaborate supper with many dishes when only one course would be sufficient. Mary had chosen to listen to Jesus, and that was more important than preparing a large supper. The story is not meant to show the value of the contemplative life compared with the life of action, but to teach that service to Jesus must not be misdirected to such an extent that a person has no time to learn from Him; one honours Him more by listening to Him than by providing excessively for His needs. Cf. Jn. 6:27.

38 Since the village was Bethany on the outskirts of Jerusalem (Jn. 11:1), the incident took place before Jesus' last visit to Jerusalem or is not recorded in chronological order. 41 The text is uncertain, but the meaning is clear. 42 Good is Semitic for 'better'.

11:1–13 How to pray. (See Mt. 6:9–13; 7:7–11.) Christian prayer goes back to the example and precept of Jesus Himself. His own prayer was the occasion for the disciples to ask Him how to pray. He replied with the Lord's Prayer which appears here in a different form from the more familiar version in Matthew. It is not certain whether Jesus gave His disciples two versions of the prayer or the early church adapted His original words in different ways to meet its needs. Luke's form is the shorter; it contains an address and two sets of petitions. 2 Father is the translation of the Aramaic Abba used by Jesus (cf. 10:21; Mk. 14:36); here, therefore, Jesus introduces His disciples to the same intimate relationship with the Father which He enjoyed. Hallowed be thy name is the first of two petitions concerned with God Himself. May His name, which represents His Person, be honoured and accepted in the world of men. Such hallowing forms the basis for the second petition: Thy kingdom come. May God's rule in peace and righteousness swiftly come about. It is a prayer for God to act by hastening the coming of the day of the Lord. Only after these petitions are the needs of the petitioner mentioned. 3 First, there is a prayer for the supply of daily bread each day. Commentators increasingly see here a petition not simply for ordinary food (though this is included) but for the bread of life, the gift of God without which man cannot live. (Daily (Gk. epiousios) is a word of uncertain meaning: 'for the morrow' or 'necessary' are possible renderings. The former brings out the way in which the prayer asks for a foretaste of the blessings of the kingdom now.) 4 Second, there is the prayer for daily forgiveness, which is granted only to those who forgive others. Finally, the petitioner asks to be preserved from tribulation and testing which would weaken his faith and exclude him from God's kingdom.

The prayer is followed by parables whose purpose is to encourage men to pray. 5ff. Although the friend who has bread (cf. v. 3!) in his house is asleep and unwilling to get up, yet because of the unblushing persistence of the caller the bread will be supplied. It is a parable of contrast: if even a human friend will respond to importunity, how much more will God respond without importunity, even if He seems to delay (cf. 18:1–8)? 7 A one-roomed house is envisaged. 11ff. Just as earthly fathers do not deceive their children in their gifts, so God will give His good gift of the Spirit to all who ask. With these assurances confident prayer can be a reality. Fish and serpents, and eggs and scorpions resemble one another in appearance.

11:14–54 Opposition to Jesus

11:14–28 In league with the devil? (See Mt. 12:22–30, 43–45; Mk. 3:22–27.) 14–23 The performance of miracles does not automatically lead to belief. The Pharisees thought that they could explain away the exorcisms performed by Jesus by attributing them to the devil and demanded some more certain sign from Him. Jesus replied that a kingdom or household divided against itself soon comes to nothing. It was, therefore, preposterous to suggest that Satan, alias Beelzebul, was promoting civil war in his own kingdom. Moreover, the argument could equally well be turned against Jesus' opponents themselves, for their own 'sons', i.e. pupils, also performed exorcisms. In fact the casting out of demons was an act of divine power and a sure token that God's era of salvation had come. One stronger than Satan was stripping him of his armour and delivering his captives. In this situation to refuse support to Jesus was not to take up a position of neutrality but to join the opposition.

14 Cf. Mt. 9:32–34. 15 Beelzebul (AV 'Beelzebub' is due to the influence of 1 Ki. 1:2f.) was a name for the devil. 20 Cf. Ex. 8:19; Ps. 8:3.

24–26 The following parable of the empty house is added at this point because of its subject-matter. Dry waterless places were regarded as the normal abode of demons, but they preferred human habitation. The point of the story, however, is not to give interesting facts about demonic ecology but to warn against the fearful danger of a repentance that is purely negative. A relapse can lead to dreadful danger. What is needed is 'the expulsive power of a new affection'.

Opinions differ as to whether this story is meant to be taken literally or as a parable of spiritual deterioration. For seven see on 8:2.

27, 28 Mark has a different story at this point (Mk. 3:31–35), which Luke has told already (8:19–21) and which teaches the same lesson as the brief incident now recorded. The woman's rather sentimental benediction on Jesus' mother meant, 'If only I had such a son as this.' Jesus' reply is that something else matters far more—namely, to hear the message He proclaimed and to obey it (cf. 6:46–49). The Pharisees should have perceived that He was speaking God's word without wonderful signs to confirm it, and acceptance of it would prevent the kind of relapse described in v. 26.

11:29–32 The sign of Jonah. (See Mt. 12:38–42.) Jesus has now answered the charge made in v. 15, and the present section forms a reply to the question in v. 16. 29 The people wanted some miraculous demonstration to attest the message of Jesus, but He was unwilling to accredit Himself or His words by deeds of power that would overawe men, but only by works that would reveal the character of His Father as Judge and Saviour. He therefore refused to give any sign at all (Mk. 8:11f.) except for the sign of Jonah. 30 Only in the way in which Jonah was a sign to Nineveh would He be a sign to the Jews. 31 The meaning of this sign is explained by the parallel saying about the queen of the South (cf. 1 Ki. 10:1–10, where she came from Sheba in SW Arabia); she would be a witness against the Jews of Jesus' time, for she made great efforts to hear Solomon and yet the Jews were not impressed by the wisdom of one greater than Solomon. Similarly, the men of Nineveh responded to the preaching of Jonah, and yet the Jews failed to respond to the preaching of Jesus. The 'sign of Jonah' is thus the preaching of Jesus. But there is a deeper implication. The use of the future tense in v. 30 and the way in which Mt. 12:39f. mentions the resurrection of Jesus as a parallel to the resuscitation of Jonah suggest that the sign is the preaching of the risen Jesus or possibly the parousia.

11:33–36 Light and darkness. (See Mt. 5:15; 6:22f.) This little group of sayings is not easy to understand. In v. 34 the eye is regarded as the means by which light reaches a man's personality; a healthy eye lets light in, but an unhealthy eye leaves a man in darkness. The hearers of Jesus must be sure that what they accept as light really is light and not darkness (v. 35). Then v. 36 may mean that the person who is full of true light will himself illuminate others. But what about v. 33 (cf. 8:16–18)? The saying may urge the hearers not to hide the light which they have received (Mt. 5:15), or may refer to Israel which had hidden the light God gave her (cf. v. 52), or (most probably) it may be a reference to the light shining from Jesus which the people were unwilling to receive. The whole paragraph, therefore, is a warning against spiritual blindness and hardness of heart.

11:37–54 The hypocrisy of the Pharisees and scribes. (See Mt. 23:4–7, 13, 23–36; cf. Lk. 20:46.) More than once in Luke Jesus visited the homes of Pharisees (cf. 7:36; 14:1), here for one of the two daily meals. He did not wash before eating, a practice that was not primarily connected with hygiene but with removing sinful defilement through contact with Gentiles and other sinners (Mk. 7:1–5). He justified His conduct in a speech that was very critical of the Pharisees and what they stood for. In cleansing their bodies (v. 39), the Pharisees resembled a man cleaning only the outside of a vessel full of filth. If God made both the inside and the outside of man, surely both demanded cleansing. Instead of showing rapacity and wickedness, the Pharisees should give alms and then they would be truly clean in their hearts.

In a series of three woes (vv. 42–44) the failings of the Pharisees are exposed. They so concentrated on the tiny details of religion that they forgot the great moral principles. They had grown to love the respect of men for their religiosity. They were as a result hypocrites who misled men, just like hidden graves which men might tread on and hence be contaminated.

The lawyers (see on 5:17), condemned by what Jesus had already said, had further charges brought against them. They created the pettifogging regulations of the law, and either did nothing to relieve the burden or failed to shoulder it themselves. Although they built elaborate tombs for the prophets, they were really at one with their ancestors who had killed them by making sure that they stayed dead! God in His wisdom had foreseen what they would do; their attitude to the prophets and apostles of the church would simply be the culmination of a long history of persecution of His messengers, and judgment would follow. Finally, the lawyers stood condemned for obscuring God's revelation and keeping men out of His kingdom. It is no wonder that after this denunciation they plotted against Jesus.

41 Give for alms may be Luke's interpretation of 'cleanse' (Mt. 23:26). 42 The Pharisees went beyond the law's requirements in their tithes. 43 This saying must refer to Pharisees who were scribes (cf. 20:46). 48 Building tombs is scarcely sympathy with murder; the saying is metaphorical and ironical. 49–51 Probably a saying from a different context, since it disturbs the structure of the three 'woes'. 51 For Zechariah see 2 Ch. 24:20f. and on Mt. 23:35.

12:1 – 13:9 Readiness for the coming crisis

In this and later sections (17:20 – 18:8; 21:5–38) Luke has gathered together teaching in which Jesus spoke of the crisis that was coming upon men as a result of His ministry. The gospel of salvation had its dark side for those who refused the message. Jesus warned the Jews of the fearful consequences of rejecting Him, both in terms of political destruction and in terms of rejection by God on the day of judgment. At the same time He warned His disciples to stand firm in the days of trial that lay ahead and to be ready for the coming of their Master. In the event, destruction came upon Judea in the war with Rome (AD 66–70), but the return of the Lord is still awaited. Difficulties of interpretation arise because Jesus closely linked these two events as parts of one great act of God, but it should be remembered that Jesus confessed ignorance of the precise times settled by the Father (Mk. 13:32).

12:1–12 Fearless confession. (See Mt. 10:26–33; 12:31f.; 10:19f.; cf. Mk. 3:28f.) The opening verse links with the previous section on the Pharisees; their teaching acted like leaven or yeast in its penetrating effects upon society, and had a corrupting influence because of its hypocrisy. But all men must beware of hypocrisy, for one day the hidden thoughts of men will be revealed.

Disciples, however, might be tempted to a different kind of dissimulation, that of hiding their allegiance to Jesus out of fear. But it is far worse to be hypocritical and then have to face the judgment of God, who can cast men into Gehenna, than to suffer at the hands of men. There is indeed no reason to fear men, for not even the worst that persecution can devise can take place without God's knowledge and care for men.

Men, therefore, have the alternatives of confessing or denying Jesus, and corresponding to their choice will be the decision of the Son of man to be witness for or against them at the heavenly judgment seat. In v. 10, however, it is stated that denial of the Son of man is a pardonable offence. It would seem that v. 9 is addressed to disciples who have no excuse for ignorance about the significance of Jesus, but v. 10 is addressed to the crowds for whom the Son of man was a phrase which did not necessarily disclose who Jesus really was. If, however, they refused to accept the clear evidence of the working of God's Holy Spirit in Jesus (e.g. by attributing His power to Satan), then they were sinning against the light and liable to judgment. But if a man does confess Jesus, then the Holy Spirit will sustain him when on trial before men whom he would otherwise fear.

1 First: the sayings are addressed especially to disciples. 2 Cf. 8:17. 6 Mt. 10:29 has 'two sparrows for a penny'; the point is the same. 8, 9 Jesus appears to speak of the Son of man as somebody different from Himself. That this was the case is most unlikely, and it is probable that this was part of His attempt to avoid making open declarations about the divine significance of His Person to the crowds. 10 A change of audience at this point (see above) is not explicitly mentioned, but is not unlikely in view of the way in which the Evangelists gathered together Jesus' teaching thematically.

12:13–34 Material possessions. (See Mt. 6:25–33, 19–21.) Since Jesus was commonly regarded as a Rabbi, it is not surprising that His opinion was sought upon a legal matter, a dispute over property; probably a younger brother was being defrauded of his share in an inheritance. Jesus refused to decide the matter, for He was not an ordained Rabbi. He did, however, go to the root of the matter by giving a stern warning against covetousness, which may well have been motivated by His personal knowledge of the man in question. Covetousness, or the desire to have more than one has (not necessarily through envy of somebody else) not only leads to strife but also expresses a fundamentally wrong philosophy of life, according to which possessions are all that really matter. It only needs God to take away the life of a man who thinks that he can retire in comfort and ease thanks to a bumper harvest, and at once it becomes apparent how useless possessions can be. Money cannot buy everything. The rich man had failed to acquire the true riches of a right relationship to God (one step in which would certainly be to give to the poor, v. 33!), and so he was a fool, a godless and therefore a senseless man.

How, then, should possessions be regarded? The disciples should not worry about food and clothing (the two essential requirements of the body) as if they were the most important things in the world. The man himself is more important. If God feeds even carefree birds and clothes the flowers, surely He will all the more provide what is necessary for His children. In any case, what good is it to be anxious about these things, when worry cannot make a man live any longer? In a world in which men are set on the rat-race for superior living conditions, let the disciples first seek God's will and His salvation, and they will find that bodily needs are taken care of. Let them sell their possessions and give to the needy, and set their hearts on a heavenly treasure that will not pass away.

Such teaching may seem to encourage laziness and lack of concern about worldly things—'God will provide; I don't need to do anything.' It is, however, not addressed to the lazy but to the worried and to those who are tempted to join the rat-race. They are urged to trust in God and to get their priorities right.

13 The lawyers or Rabbis dealt with both religious and civil matters. 25 Span of life and 'stature' (AV, RSV mg.) are equally valid translations, but the former fits the context better. 31 To seek God's kingdom is to set one's aim in life on God Himself and the accomplishment of His purpose of bringing in His rule with all its blessings. To all such seekers God has promised that He will fulfil their longings.

12:35–48 The coming of the Son of man. (See Mt. 24:43–51.) From the thought of the way in which men should set their minds on the kingdom of God Jesus turns to consider their attitude to the future. The great event to which they look forward, bringing with it both the judgment (vv. 8f.) and the kingdom, is the coming of the Son of man (v. 40) at an unexpected and unknown hour. The disciples must be ready for this event by being diligently engaged in the service of their Master. Like servants left in charge of the household, they must be ready to greet Him when He appears. If they are ready, He Himself will reward them by serving them. A second, extremely brief parable speaks of the situation of a householder who is surprised by the invasion of a burglar. This depicts the other side of the expectation, and illustrates the serious effects of the coming of the Son of man for those who are not ready.

But for whom is this teaching meant? Speaking as it does of the Master's servants, does it refer to all of them or merely to the leaders of them? Jesus appears to have the latter principally in mind. A servant who is set over a household and does his duty properly will be rewarded with fuller responsibility. But if the servant left in charge takes advantage of his master's absence to behave irresponsibly, he will get a shock when the master comes unexpectedly and find that his lot is with the unbelievers. His punishment will depend upon his knowledge and consequent measure of responsibility. The implication is that the heavenly judgment is not a matter of a simple verdict of guilty or not guilty; there are varying degrees of judgment and reward.

35 Girding the loins meant kilting up a flowing eastern garment for ease of movement; 'roll up your sleeves' is the modern equivalent. The imagery of night is used to stress the need for wakefulness. 42 The future tense will set suggests a reference to positions of responsibility in the church after the departure of Jesus. Note that all the parables in this section refer allegorically to the period after the resurrection and before the second advent. Many scholars argue that this is a reinterpretation by the early church of parables originally meant to arouse the Jews to awareness of the coming crisis. But the arguments for this view are far from compelling, and it is altogether likely that Jesus did warn His disciples against the danger of backsliding.

12:49–59 The crisis for Israel. (Cf. Mt. 10:34–36; 16:2f.; 5:25f.) Finally, Jesus returns to the crisis actually upon men as a result of His ministry; it is the period in which they must decide whether or not to confess Him as their Lord. His coming means that there will be division among men. His coming is meant to set the world on fire, and He longs that the fire might be kindled and burst into flame. It entails suffering for Jesus Himself, and He longs that it might soon be accomplished. For His ministry and response to it do not mean peace and ease, but strife as opposition is set up even within families to the progress of the gospel.

And in this situation men fail to realize that the time is up. They know how to tell a change in the weather from the direction of the wind, but they cannot read the signs of the times and act accordingly. They fail to realize that they are like a man being haled to court by his accuser. The wise man will make sure that he comes to a settlement long before he arrives at court and finds a watertight case being presented against him and then is cast into prison. Now is the time to respond to Jesus; soon it will be too late.

49 The fire symbolizes the spread of the message or of the power of the Spirit, and Jesus longs that it might spread the more quickly. 50 In the OT, being plunged into water is a metaphor for distress and suffering (cf. Ps. 69:1–3). Here, therefore, baptism is a metaphor for the passion of Jesus (cf. Mk. 10:38f.). Constrained: cf. 2 Cor. 5:14; Phil. 1:23. 56 Hypocrites has here the Hebrew sense of 'godless' rather than the Greek sense of 'acting a part'. 58 Luke has put the scene into Greek terminology; Matthew describes it in the language of Jewish law. 59 A doctrine of purgatory can be read out of this verse only if it is first read into it.

13:1–9 The need for repentance. Two brief concluding pieces of teaching further stress the need for response to the crisis brought about by the coming of Jesus. Some Passover pilgrims from Galilee had been butchered by Roman troops in the Temple while they were slaying their sacrifices, and the matter was reported to Jesus to see what His reaction would be. His response was to contradict the orthodox Jewish view that the greatness of the calamity suffered by these men showed that they were unusually wicked sinners; with equally scant justification could one say that men accidentally crushed to death by falling debris were exceptionally sinful. Rather, the Jewish nation as a whole was sinful in God's sight, and its members would all suffer the fate of sinners if they did not repent.

And God had graciously provided opportunity for repentance. The situation of the nation resembled that of an unfruitful tree which was ripe only for destruction; the ground it occupied could be well utilized for something more fruitful. But just as the owner was prepared to feed it and give it a chance, so God was prepared to appoint a further limit for Israel to repent. If they failed to respond, their fate would be their own responsibility. Perhaps the vine-dresser represents Jesus as an advocate to God for undeserving Israel.

1 The story is thoroughly in keeping with Pilate's character, although this particular act of murder was evidently too slight to excite the comment of a historian like Josephus. 4 Likewise, the accident at Siloam was no more likely to figure in a history book than any one of the countless road accidents in our own time. 6 Trees of all kinds were planted in vineyards. For the metaphorical use of the fig tree see Ho. 9:10. 7 Since fruit could not be taken from a tree during the first three years (Lv. 19:23), the tree was presumably six years old; there is no allegorical meaning in the three years.

13:10–35 The saving effects of God's rule

13:10–17 The bent woman. In the previous section, the ministry of Jesus appeared as a period of crisis; the accent now falls again on the coming of salvation. The story is of a woman suffering from a spinal deformity who was 'freed' (v. 12) by Jesus on a sabbath in the synagogue. The ruler of the synagogue argued that healing in a case like this where her life was not at stake could equally well have waited until a weekday. Jesus' reply was that if cattle could be loosed on the sabbath to be watered a woman could all the more be loosed from an infirmity. Note how the disability is said to be due to 'a spirit of infirmity' (v. 11), a state of being bound by Satan (v. 16). Human suffering is due to the same cosmic power as human sin. The final note brings out how the people rejoiced at the salvation revealed in Jesus while His opponents had nothing to say.

15 The Rabbis argued as to which kinds of knots could be tied and untied on the sabbath.

13:18–21 Two parables of the rule of God. (See Mt. 13:31–33; Mk. 4:30–32). Whatever their original context may have been, these parables are here connected with the coming of God's saving rule in Jesus. They contain the promise that God's work would come to a glorious fulfilment, no matter how small its beginnings seemed to be. Just as a mustard seed grows to tree-like proportions and a small amount of leaven (or yeast) permeates a large mass of dough and makes it expand, so what begins as a small influence will increase and spread widely. Attempts to distinguish between the meaning of the two parables are risky, and the view that leaven represents evil here is certainly wrong.

13:22–30 Entry to the kingdom. (Cf. Mt. 7:13f.; 22f.; 8:11f.) The mention of Jerusalem (where the reader knows that Jesus was crucified) gives an abrupt reminder of the context of Jesus' teaching. Would many men be saved, i.e. enter the heavenly kingdom of God? The orthodox answer was that all Jews—except of course for gross sinners and heretics—would find entry. But Jesus refused to speculate on the issue. It is far more important, He said, to ensure that one gets in personally. The kingdom is like a house with a narrow door (AV 'gate' rests on inferior MSS) offering limited admission; it is shut when the feast begins (Mt. 25:10), and then it will be too late to seek entry. It will be no use pleading acquaintance with Jesus if there has been no response to His message. On that day there will be no question of automatic admission for Jews. Some Jews will be excluded, and in their place will be found Gentiles from all over the earth alongside the saints of the OT. Those who thought that they ought to be first will find themselves placed last. Once again the lesson of the need for repentance (chs. 12, 13) is emphasized; salvation and judgment cannot be separated from each other.

13:31–35 The fate of Jerusalem. (See Mt. 23:37–39.) The primary point of this section lies in vv. 34f. The preceding verses tell how some Pharisees warned Jesus to flee from Herod's dominions. Whether they were friends warning Jesus of possible danger or hypocrites acting in collusion with Herod to frighten Jesus away is not clear. In any case Jesus had nothing but contempt for the murderer of John the Baptist and his threats. Herod could not harm Jesus, for the divinely appointed path for Jesus led to Jerusalem, and there at God's appointed time He would suffer. For the present He would continue His work, and then finish His course as a prophet in Jerusalem. The thought made Him break out in sorrow over the city which had so persistently rejected the messengers of God and would in the end find itself locked out of the kingdom. Even before the love and compassion of Jesus Jerusalem remained adamant. Therefore its Temple would be empty of God's presence, and it would not see Jesus until it was prepared to welcome Him as the Messiah or was visited by Him as its Judge.

31 Herod's dominions included Galilee and Peraea. 32 The fox probably typifies cunning, or possibly insignificance. Today and tomorrow is to be understood from Ho. 6:2 where 'two days' represents a short period of time before a crisis ('the third day'). Jesus expresses His determination to carry on His work until either it is complete or the time of His martyrdom comes (cf. 2 Tim. 4:7). 33 The Syriac Peshitta version has 'I must work today and tomorrow and go on my way (i.e. die) the day following' which gives parallelism with v. 32. The text, however, gives a good sense without this emendation. 34 How often implies that Jesus visited Jerusalem more than once before His passion. 35 Blessed . . . is echoed in 19:38, but the reference here is to the second advent.

14:1–24 Jesus at table

14:1–6 The man with dropsy. The setting of this section is a visit by Jesus to the home of a Pharisee for a meal after the synagogue service on the sabbath. The meal provided an opportunity for teaching in which Jesus made use of the imagery of a banquet, but first of all there occurred a healing miracle which aroused the anger of a suspicious and hostile audience by being performed on the sabbath. Jesus justified His action by claiming that it was not different in principle from rescuing an animal which had fallen into a pit. The story makes a similar point to that recorded earlier in 13:11–17, and it is possible that the two stories were originally told as a pair (like the two parables in 13:18f.). Here, however, the main point may be the way in which Jesus showed compassion to an uninvited guest (cf. vv. 13, 21).

1 A ruler . . .: perhaps 'a leading Pharisee' (NEB). 2 Dropsy is a swelling of parts of the body as a result of fluid collecting in the tissues. 5 The text is uncertain; the best MSS have 'son' instead of ass, but the latter fits the context better. What Jesus here regards as permissible by orthodox Jewish law was forbidden in the austere rules of the Qumran community: 'Let no beast be helped to give birth on the sabbath day; and if it fall into a cistern or into a pit, let it not be lifted out on the sabbath' (CDC, 11:13f.).

14:7–11 Places of honour. The teaching given here by Jesus is not to be regarded simply as good advice for guests similar to that given in Pr. 25:6f. It is described as a parable, which means that it has a spiritual significance, and it refers to a marriage feast, which was a recognized symbol for the kingdom of God and heavenly bliss (v. 15). The parable is based on the practice of seating guests at table by rank and distinction. The more important guests no doubt arrived last (as they often still do!), and an unwary early arrival might have to move to a lower place (AV 'room' is archaic) so as to accommodate them. Far better to adopt an attitude of modesty and wait to be invited to a better seat. For God exalts the humble and debases the proud. It needs no saying that Jesus is not commending the false modesty which takes a lower place simply in order to be publicly exalted later.

11 The passive form of the verbs will be humbled and will be exalted is a circumlocution for naming God as the subject.

14:12–14 The choice of guests. This plain piece of advice is in line with Jesus' other teaching about deeds which receive their full recompense in this life: see Mt. 6:1f., 5, 16. Men ought to do those deeds which God will reward. This, however, can easily be misunderstood. On the one hand, Jesus is not making a downright condemnation of holding a party for one's family or friends; this would have conflicted with His own practice (e.g. Jn. 2:1–11). Rather He is condemning the attitude which does good simply for the sake of a tangible, earthly reward. But, on the other hand, He is not saying that one should do good simply in order to receive a heavenly reward. The point is that men should seek to do good to those who cannot give anything in return, and leave the whole question of recompense to God.

14 To speak of the resurrection of the just (cf. 20:35) does not exclude a resurrection of the unjust for judgment (Acts 24:15). The implication is that only for the just has the resurrection a positive character.

14:15–24 The heavenly banquet. (Cf. Mt. 22:1–10.) The mention of the resurrection caused one of the guests to utter a blessing on those who would share in the heavenly banquet. Jesus at once took up the statement with a parable which discussed the kind of people who would be present. The double invitation (vv. 16, 17) was characteristic of Jewish practice. It has been suggested that the parable was deliberately modelled by Jesus on a Jewish story of a nouveau riche tax collector who tried to gain social standing among the aristocrats by inviting them to dinner but was harshly rebuffed by them. The upper-class audience addressed by Jesus would have thoroughly appreciated the story—until it was borne in upon them that this was how they were treating God's invitation given to them by Jesus. So that his meal might not be wasted, the tax collector in the story invited the poor in, and so, implied Jesus, does God seek out the needy and poor from both inside and outside the city to receive His largesse. It is, therefore, all very well to express the kind of pious sentiment found in v. 15; the vital point is whether one has accepted the heavenly invitation. The story foreshadows the defence given by Jesus for bringing the gospel to the 'tax collectors and sinners' in 15:1–32.

A very similar story occurs in Mt. 22:1–10; it is a moot point whether Jesus originally told one parable, developed by His disciples into two different forms, or told two similar but distinct parables.

16, 17 There may be an allegorical allusion to the invitations from God in the OT and through Jesus. 18 To make excuses does not necessarily imply the falsity of the pretexts put forward, but there can be little doubt that the guests could have come if they had wanted to. 23 The inclusion of the Gentiles is probably implied.

14:25–35 The cost of discipleship

(Cf. Mt. 10:37f.; 5:13; Mk. 9:50.) Before taking up the theme of 'the gospel for the outcast', foreshadowed in vv. 21–24, Jesus indicates the stringency of the claims which are implicit in His invitation to men to come to God's banquet. He warned the multitudes who flocked after Him that discipleship meant readiness to place His claims above those of both family and self. The disciple must be prepared even to face death for the sake of Jesus. Let men therefore count the cost of total self-renunciation before embarking upon a course which they may not be able to sustain. Even today men speak of a building left unfinished for lack of funds as a 'folly'. How foolish too is the army commander who does not reckon up the strength of his army before engaging a superior foe in battle. A disciple who gives up in midstream because the going is too tough is like salt which has lost its taste and is unfit for seasoning food or even for fertilizer; it cannot be made useful again.

26 Hate means 'love less' (cf. Mt. 10:37). 27 Cf. 9:23. Crucifixion was a sufficiently common event in Palestine to account for Jesus' saying, but He may have had His own coming fate in mind. 34 The impure mixture used as salt could lose its salt content and become useless.

15:1–32 The gospel for the outcast

15:1–10 The lost sheep and the lost coin. (Cf. Mt. 18:12–14.) The theme of the parable of the heavenly banquet (14:15–24) receives fuller treatment in the three parables which are told here. Their lesson, which is crystal clear, is indicated in vv. 1f. Jesus' ministry to the members of society commonly regarded as sinful and unrepentant by the Pharisees had earned Him their continual criticism. 'Let not a man associate with the wicked, not even to bring him to the Law' is a saying in the rabbinic literature which sums up their attitude. Jesus had already defended His attitude by pointing to the need of these people (5:29f.). In the parable of the heavenly banquet He had declared that He would issue God's invitation to such people rather than to religious people who spurned it. Now He presents the highest reason of all, that God rejoices over the recovery of a lost sinner. It is His pleasure to seek and to save the lost, and therefore it is Jesus' supreme desire to do the same (19:10). This divine attitude is illustrated by the willingness of a shepherd to go out over the moors and hills so that not even one sheep may be missing from his flock. There may well be shepherds who ask 'What does one lost sheep matter compared with ninety-nine safe in the fold?' and ignore the value of the individual. Not so with God. He rejoices even more over the return of the lost than the safety of those at home. In precisely the same way the housewife who has lost one coin out of ten rejoices when it is found, and summons her friends to share in her rejoicing. In the same way, it is implied, the Pharisees should share in God's rejoicing over the salvation of the outcasts.

The parable of the lost sheep is also found in Mt. 18:12–14, but there it serves as an object lesson to the members of the church to care for the weaker members of the flock of God. 7, 10

Joy in heaven and before the angels of God are both circumlocutions for saying that God Himself rejoices. At the same time, it is implied that God's people share in His rejoicing. 8 The ten silver coins may have formed the woman's headdress. Their intrinsic value was not great and suggests that the woman was comparatively poor. She had to light a lamp because she lived in a typical Palestinian peasant house with a low door and no windows.

15:11–32 The lost sons. The third parable makes the same point at greater length, so that the main character in it is really the father himself. The dramatic situation is that the younger son demanded immediately full rights of possession over the portion (about one-third) of his father's estate which he could expect to inherit in the normal course of events when the father died. While the elder son remained at home, and his father retained his rights over the produce of his portion of the estate, the younger son turned his share into cash and departed to enjoy the proceeds away from home and parental control. When extravagant and dissolute living had reduced him to penury, and his erstwhile friends had deserted him, he was forced to take the most menial form of employment, one that was particularly loathsome to a Jew who regarded swine as unclean animals. He would gladly have eked out his miserable wages by sharing the carob pods which the swine ate but, it is implied, he was too disgusted to do so. His desperate state brought him to repentance. He realized not only that he had landed himself in sorry straits but also that he was unworthy to be called his father's son; he was fit only to be a servant, and he was prepared to humble himself and seek reinstatement at that level. But before he reached home his father was already looking for his arrival, and before he could blurt out the whole of his intended confession, his father had welcomed him back into the family circle, treated him with great honour, and given orders for a feast of rejoicing over the return of one who had been as good as dead.

One person refused to join in the celebration, and grumbled at the lavish care being expended on a ne'er-do-well. He accused his father of failing to treat him in the same free and joyous manner, only to be reminded that all the resources of the home were his. One can be lost even at home. The discovery of the lost and the resurrection of the dead were occasions for joy. One question is left unanswered: did the elder brother eventually join in the celebration and accept his brother back as a member of the family? The omission is deliberate. For the elder brother represents the Pharisees and their spiritual kin, and the parable is an appeal to them to receive the outcasts. Jesus was waiting for their verdict.

But although this is the primary purpose of the parable, one cannot help but feel that the pardoning love of God, which should have shamed the Pharisees into response, is the centre of attention. It is true that there is no mention of His seeking the lost (as in 15:3–10) or of atonement for sin, but this story is a parable, not a detailed allegory, and these other manifestations of divine love are sufficiently plain elsewhere in the teaching of Jesus.

12 The legal position is correctly depicted. Property could be disposed of either by a will or by a gift during one's lifetime. 18 Heaven is again a periphrasis for 'God'. Note that there is no suggestion that the son's repentance was in any way insincere, even if it required a desperate situation to induce it. 21 The addition in RSV mg. (also in AV and RV) is by a scribe who failed to realize that the father interrupted the son's statement before he could finish it. 22 The gifts are all signs of honour and authority. Shoes were the prerogative of free men, not of slaves. 29, 30 The elder brother's complaints are expressed extravagantly. He could not bring himself to say 'my brother' but spoke contemptuously of this son of yours.

16:1–31 Warnings to the rich

Having vindicated His preaching to the poor and outcasts, Jesus now issued warnings to those whose avarice and wealth (vv. 14, 19) blinded them to the need for response to the gospel before it was too late. They should in any case have heeded the teaching of the OT Scriptures about the moral law of God, which remains permanently valid. Various sayings on these and allied themes have been collected together, so that the chapter also discusses the disciples' attitude to wealth.

16:1–9 The prudent steward. A steward, entrusted with his master's estate and accounts, was suspected of mismanaging his affairs, if not of actually behaving dishonestly. When he realized that he was in danger of dismissal, he summoned his master's debtors and allowed each one to enter a lower figure on his IOU or promissory note. The debtors would thus feel indebted to the steward and help him when he was out of a job. He had acted with commendable astuteness in providing for his own interests.

There are various interpretations of the parable. a. The parable may simply urge men to prepare for the crisis brought about by the ministry of Jesus with the same zeal of the steward facing an uncertain future. b. Jesus commented that astuteness is shown much more by worldly people than by those who belong to the new era. Men should learn from the steward and use their wealth to make God their friend, so that, when money is no longer of any help to them, God may receive them into His presence (v. 9). As such, the parable may be giving advice to the disciples ('the sons of light', v. 8), or to the Pharisees whose greed was excluding them from God's friendship (v. 14; cf. 11:39–41). c. Recent study of Jewish law has suggested that the steward may not have been acting dishonestly at this point. He was merely releasing the debtors from the huge interest payments which had been imposed (quite illegally) when the loans were made to them. Keeping the law and showing generosity are the ways for wealthy people to gain God's approval. None of these interpretations can be excluded; the original story possibly ended at v. 8a, and the ensuing verses contain sayings of Jesus bringing out a series of different points from the parable.

6, 7 The measure of oil (bath) was 4–5 gallons, the measure of wheat (kor) about 12 bushels. Since oil was cheaper, the reductions were about equal. 8, 9 The master may be the steward's master or Jesus Himself (in which case 'master' means 'Lord'; cf. 18:6); in any case it was the steward's astuteness and not his morality which was commended. Dishonest (AV 'unjust') and unrighteous typify the people and money (mammon) of this present, evil age. They (v. 9) means 'God'.

16:10–13 Faithful stewardship. (See Mt. 6:24.) Various general principles of stewardship for disciples follow. First, the way in which a man acts as steward of a little shows how he will act as a steward of much (v. 10). Therefore, if a man is a poor steward of money, he will hardly be entrusted with spiritual riches (v. 11). And if a man cannot exercise proper care over a trust given to him, for which he can be brought to account, he will not be given wealth of his own to use as he pleases (v. 12). Second, it is impossible to be committed to two masters, God and wealth (v. 13). The ancient idea of slavery did not envisage such a division of labour or devotion as might be practised by a man who works, say, for one employer in the morning and another in the afternoon. God makes exclusive claims.

16:14–18 The Pharisees and the law. (Cf. Mt. 11:12f.; 5:18, 32.) Jesus' teaching did not appeal to those who tried to combine the pursuit of wealth with piety, and He warned the Pharisees that, while they may have given the appearance of piety to men, in fact the secret avarice of their hearts made them an abomination to God.

Vv. 16–18 present an antidote to the antinomian attitude which argued that the message of Jesus made the OT law and its moral demands out of date; Jesus stated that this was not so, and that men would find God's will still expressed in the OT (v. 29). It was true that the era of the law and prophets had ended, and now the new era of the kingdom had come. But this did not mean that the law had been countermanded. For example, divorce followed by remarriage is adultery. This particular example in fact sharpened the law; the Jews thought of adultery as a sin by a woman against her husband or by one man against another; Jesus taught that a man may commit adultery against a woman.

16 Luke's version (the good news . . . preached) is probably a (correct) interpretation of Matthew's difficult 'the kingdom of heaven has been coming violently' (Mt. 11:12, RSV mg.). Every one enters probably refers to ordinary people eager to enter the kingdom rather than to demons or men opposing the kingdom violently or to zealots attempting to force God's hand.

16:19–31 The rich man and Lazarus. Egyptian and Jewish sources have furnished stories similar to this one in describing the reversed fates of rich and poor men in the next world. The parable implies that the rich man did scarcely anything to alleviate the beggar's distress. When the latter died, he found a place of honour beside Abraham, the father of the Jewish race and the friend of God. The rich man found himself in Hades (AV 'hell') in torment and agony. He called upon Abraham as 'father' for mercy, but the reply of Abraham, though it called him 'son', offered no hope. Thus far the story follows traditional lines, but now there is a fresh element. Could the rich man's brothers, presumably rich and careless themselves, be warned before they reached Hades? The reply was that the teaching they possessed in the OT should be enough. Not even the miracle of somebody returning from the dead to warn them would have any effect on those who had shut their ears to the voice of God in the Scriptures. Failure to practise the love and mercy taught in the OT will lead to loss in the next life.

It is a moot point whether the parable is intended to give literal information about the next world, and, if so, whether it refers to an intermediate state before the final judgment or to a lasting state. But, although the language (e.g. Abraham's bosom) is surely symbolical, it speaks of real destinies for men.

19 A recently discovered MS gives the rich man's name as Neues. 20 We are to infer that Lazarus ('he whom God helps') was a pious man. 21 Dogs were unclean animals. 26 The imagery expresses with all clarity the irreversibility of God's verdict upon men.

17:1–19 Teaching for disciples

17:1–4 Stumbling-blocks. (Cf. Mt. 18:6f., 15, 21f.; Mk. 9:42.) Various pieces of teaching for disciples are collected together here. While Jesus knew that 'stumbling blocks' (RSV mg.) are inevitable in this world, He warned sternly against the danger of being the cause of another person's sin. It would be better for a tempter to suffer drowning than the fate reserved for tempters. Let each man, therefore, take heed to himself in this matter. On the contrary, the disciples should help any brother who does fall into sin both by warning him as to what he has done and by being ready to forgive, no matter how often this may be necessary.

2, 3 The NEB punctuation, with a full stop after yourselves so that v. 3a is linked to v. 2 rather than to v. 3b, is preferable.

17:5, 6 Faith. (Cf. Mt. 17:20; Mk. 11:22f.) Jesus commended the desire for the faith necessary to enable disciples to obey His commands; even a tiny 'amount' of faith can do great wonders.

5 Increase our faith may simply mean 'give us faith'. 6 Sycamine: the black mulberry (Morus nigra). Jesus was speaking metaphorically.

17:7–10 Duty. Once a servant has done his duty, he has no right to expect any more than his normal wage and remains 'unworthy', i.e. has nothing of which to boast. Elsewhere Jesus taught and demonstrated a different attitude by Himself serving His disciples (Jn. 13:1–16; cf. Lk. 12:35–38; 22:27). This fact shows that He is not here teaching that God's dealings with men are on a basis of law and duty rather than of grace and faith; instead He is giving a necessary lesson to all who are tempted to feel proud of their 'work of faith' (1 Thes. 1:3) for God.

7 The fact that Jesus here uses an illustration from slavery is no proof that He would have commended slavery as an institution any more than dishonesty (16:8).

17:11–19 The healing of ten lepers. When some lepers sought healing from Jesus, He simply commanded them to go and show themselves to a priest (5:14). The implication is that their faith would be shown by obedience. All showed faith and were cleansed, but only one both praised God and thanked Jesus for his cure. Jesus commented on the ungratefulness of the others (all presumably Jews) and confirmed that the Samaritan's faith had made him well in body and soul. The story is both an illustration of wonder-working faith (cf. v. 6) and a lesson on the need for gratitude as an aspect of faith.

11 The location on the border explains the mixed character of the group of men. The geography is not clear; perhaps Galilee here includes Peraea (also ruled by Herod). 14 The story is similar to that in 5:12–16, but there is no good reason to believe that it is based upon it.

17:20 – 18:8 The coming of the Son of man

17:20–37 The kingdom and the Son of man. (Cf. Mt. 24:23–28, 37–41.) In previous episodes Jesus had spoken of the coming of the kingdom and the Son of man. The natural question to ask was when this would happen. Would there be some indication that it was about to take place, so that men might prepare themselves for it? Jesus' reply was that the coming of the kingdom is not something accompanied by observable signs (AV 'with observation'). Men will not be able to say, 'Here it is.' But the second part of Jesus' statement is not easy (v. 21b). The words translated in the midst of you may mean 'within your grasp' (NEB mg.) or 'within you' (RSV mg., AV, RV). The third rendering is to be rejected, not simply because the kingdom was hardly within the Pharisees, but rather because Jesus never elsewhere spoke of the kingdom as an inward, spiritual state of affairs. A decision between the first two translations is less important. A further difficulty is whether the saying means that the kingdom is or will be in the midst of you. The analogy of such a passage as 11:20 supports the former possibility, in which case Jesus is saying that the working of God is already present in His ministry for those with eyes to see it; salvation is within their grasp.

In the following verses, however, Jesus is looking to the future and saying that God will suddenly intervene in history without any premonitory signs. He warns His hearers that they will long to see the coming of the Son of man and the new age, no doubt because of their tribulation and distress. That will be the time when they must not be misled by false signs. When the Son of man does come, His glorious appearance will be sufficiently clear for all to see—in marked contrast to the suffering and humiliation which He must first undergo. It will come as a surprise to the godless world (and therefore it behoves men to prepare now for it). Just as the flood overtook the world and the fire devoured Sodom by surprise, despite the witness of Noah and Lot (2 Pet. 2:5–8), so will it be when the Son of man comes in judgment. It will be too late to escape then; men must therefore beware of attachment to earthly things, remembering the terrifying example of Lot's wife. Only the man who has given up living for himself will escape. There will be separation even between members of the same families and groups of workers. When Jesus is asked where it will happen, He makes no concessions to those who want a map as well as a timetable: just as the location of a corpse in the desert is obvious from the crowd of circling vultures, so it will be quite obvious where the Son of man is.

20 Jesus' warning against looking for signs seems at first to be out of harmony with His own words in 21:5–36, and some scholars have rashly concluded that one or other strand of His teaching is not authentic. But premonitory signs were a recognized part of apocalyptic teaching, and Jesus had to warn people against trusting to them for security. At the same time, He had to prepare His followers for the troubles that lay ahead of them, lest they should lose faith (cf. 18:8). 22 Days of the Son of man seems to mean the period immediately before the coming of the Son of man, but there is no agreed interpretation of this unique phrase. 34 Two men: i.e. two persons (e.g. man and wife, cf. on 24:25). 36 is omitted by the best MSS; it is a gloss from Mt. 24:40.

18:1–8 The unjust judge. Although we think of this parable as being about prayer, it really forms the closing part of the teaching about the future given in 17:20–37. Like the very similar parable in 11:5–8, it makes its point by contrast. If even a judge who honours the laws neither of God nor of men can be induced to act by the incessant appeals of a widow, how much more will God act to vindicate His elect when they cry to Him. The last clause of v. 7 is difficult. The NEB gives the alternatives 'while he listens patiently to them' and (in the mg.) 'while he delays to help them'. Another possibility, which assumes that the original Aramaic has been slightly obscured in the Greek translation, is 'even if he keeps them waiting for him'. The point is that even if God gives the appearance of unwillingness to answer, like the unjust judge, yet He will certainly answer prayer without the need for importunity. He will vindicate His elect speedily ('soon enough' NEB) or perhaps 'suddenly and unexpectedly'. The vital question is not whether He will respond to importunity but whether there will be faithful men, who have persisted in prayer, when the Son of man comes. Luke has rightly characterized the parable as one to encourage men to continue in prayer without losing heart before the end comes. There is an interesting parallel in Ecclus. 35:14–19.

2 The mention of a single judge probably means that the woman was seeking satisfaction in a financial matter. 4 The judge would be waiting for a bribe, but the woman was too poor to pay; persistence was her only weapon. 7 The elect are the people who have heard God's call and responded to it. Here they are in a situation of persecution and long to be vindicated; they pray, 'Thy kingdom come.'

18:9 – 19:10 The scope of salvation

18:9–14 The Pharisee and the publican. Like the preceding parable this one too deals with prayer, but its purpose is different. Here the prayers recorded are reflections of two characters. The Pharisee was a pious man living an honest and upright life. He more than observed the law by fasting regularly on Mondays and Thursdays, although the law required fasting only once annually on the Day of Atonement, and by giving tithes of all his possessions. His sin was that he commended himself for his piety, despised his neighbours and was self-sufficient in God's presence. By contrast, the tax collector stood far from the Holy Place and did not dare to lift up his eyes, still less his hands, in prayer, but simply poured out a confession of sinfulness and an appeal for God's mercy. Jesus' verdict was that he went home justified and accepted by God, but the Pharisee was not accepted. The parable thus vindicates 'the gospel for the outcast' once again by stressing that God is always ready to receive the unrighteous when they call to Him and closes His ears to those whose pride in their piety makes them self-sufficient.

11 The Pharisee here was not untypical of his sect, although it did contain many excellent men. Prayers very similar to this one are preserved in rabbinic sources. Prayed thus with himself: better 'took up a prominent position and prayed'. 14 Rather than is too weak: 'and not' gives the true meaning.

18:15–17 Jesus and children. (See Mt. 19:13–15; Mk. 10:13–16.) After a long section (9:51 – 18:14) without parallels in Mark, we now come to a series of incidents in which Luke again keeps in step with the older Gospel. The first of these tells how Jesus received the 'infants' (Luke alone uses this word) whom His disciples would have prevented from bothering Him, and pronounced that the kingdom of God belongs to such as they. In Mark this is the main point of the story, and it is emphasized by Jesus taking the children in His arms. Luke omits this feature, not because he felt it was an improper thing to record, but because he wished to concentrate attention on the lesson that the kingdom of God is only for those who are prepared to receive it like children in a humble and receptive frame of mind (cf. 18:14).

15 Touch implies 'bless', i.e. pray to God to bless them. 16 The kingdom is for children as well as for the childlike.

18:18–34 The rich ruler. (See Mt. 19:16–30; 20:17–19; Mk. 10:17–34.) The same theme of the attitude accepted by God from men continues. A ruler addressed Jesus as 'Good teacher' and asked the way to inherit eternal life (i.e. to enter the kingdom of God (v. 24) or to be saved (v. 26)). Jesus asked if he really knew what he meant by using the word 'good' indiscriminately. Note that He did not repudiate the address; there is hidden here a consciousness of divine Sonship. Then He answered the question in the orthodox Jewish manner by citing the commandments, the 'second table' of the law which could be tested by a man's outward conduct. When the man claimed to have kept them, He probed deeper. Let the ruler realize his not inconsiderable assets, give to the poor and become a disciple. The man's failure to respond showed that he did not truly love his neighbour as himself, and that he worshipped himself and his wealth rather than God. Outward conformity to the law was again a mask for a sinful heart. Here was clear proof that it is extremely hard for a rich man—and, we may add, for any man whose heart is set on riches—to enter the kingdom. In fact, it is as impossible for a rich man to be saved as for a camel to go through the eye of a needle. Indeed, it is not too much to say that it is impossible for any man to be saved. There is only one way. Although man cannot overcome his sinful heart, God intervenes to save those who will respond to His call. Peter suggested that the Twelve had made this response and given up everything for Jesus. And Jesus made His promise that those who were prepared for the sacrifices involved in the path of discipleship would receive far greater blessings both now, in the fellowship of God's people, and in the world to come.

In Mk. 10:30 the disciples are also promised persecution. This is omitted here, but is surely implied in the prophecy of the fate of the Son of man with its details of the shameful treatment which He would receive from the Gentiles. The Twelve, however, failed to understand. As is clear from Mark's story of the ugly struggle for precedence which followed, they rejected the idea; see 9:45 for their earlier, identical reaction.

18 The man's status as a ruler is uncertain. 20 The peculiar order of the commandments is also found in the LXX. The command against covetousness is omitted, perhaps because this is not an outwardly observable attitude. 25 A similar Jewish proverb speaks of an elephant. 31 See Is. 49:7; 50:5f.; 52:13–53:12 and also Pss. 22; 69.

18:35–43 The healing of a blind man. (See Mt. 20:29–34; Mk. 10:46–52.) The final two stories in this section are both examples of men who responded to the call of God given by Jesus. A blind man, hearing that Jesus was in the vicinity, called upon Him as the Son of David to help him. He showed persistence (cf. 18:1) in continuing to call for help, despite those who would silence him, and Jesus responded to his faith. He received his sight and became a follower of Jesus. The crowds joined him in praising God for revealing His power in Jesus.

35 In Mark the healing of Bartimaeus took place as Jesus was leaving Jericho, but here as He was entering the town. It has been suggested that two towns, Old and New Jericho, lay near to each other and that the incident took place between the two. Luke may have inserted the story of Zacchaeus (not recorded in Mark) last, to gain a climax, and altered the historical order slightly for this purpose (cf. on 6:12–19). 38 Son of David was a Messianic title: see Is. 11:1–10; Je. 23:5f.; Ezk. 34:23f.; Lk. 20:41–44.

19:1–10 Zacchaeus the tax collector. Not all rich men departed from Jesus sadly. Zacchaeus is an example of what is 'possible with God' (18:27). The Romans farmed out the task of collecting the taxes in any particular area to the highest bidder. The man did not receive any salary for his work but collected as much money as he could so that he would have a handsome rake-off after paying the government the appointed sum. Zacchaeus was such a tax farmer. His attempt to see Jesus, the man known as the friend of tax collectors (7:34), indicates his interest in Him. Whether he hoped to be hidden from view is not certain, but in any case Jesus summoned him before Him with a request that he would provide lodging. The command was obeyed, and Zacchaeus showed both repentance and joy as he welcomed Jesus. Outside there were great murmurings about Jesus' fraternizing with such a man, but Jesus was able to justify His action; salvation had come to the house of Zacchaeus, a son of Abraham who was as much entitled to hear the gospel as any other Jew. In this event the purpose of the coming of Jesus is fully and finally summed up; as a shepherd seeks for the lost sheep (cf. 15:3–7; Ezk. 34:16), so the Son of man seeks and saves the lost of humanity.

8 I give and I restore are present forms having, as often in Greek, future significance. The resolve corresponds to the penitence expressed in 18:13. 9 The saying does not imply the omission of the Gentiles from Jesus' concern, but stresses that one Jew is no more or less valuable than another in God's sight.

19:11 - 21:38 THE MINISTRY IN JERUSALEM

19:11–27 The parable of the pounds

As Jesus' ministry moved to its climax and Jerusalem came in sight, the Twelve continued to hope that a successful worldly type of revolution was about to take place and inaugurate the promised reign of God. They bickered about the places which they would occupy in the new order (cf. Mk. 10:35–45). The present parable was meant to be a corrective to this attitude by warning that the Messiah was going to be rejected by men and by teaching that there lies ahead a period when the disciples of Jesus must engage in faithful service during their Master's absence until He returns in kingly power. Two strands of thought are thus intertwined.

As an 'earthly story' the parable reflects the action of various members of the Herodian family in going to Rome to petition for, or to be confirmed in, royal power over their realm. In particular, Archelaus, the son of Herod the Great, went to Rome in 4 BC to have the provisions of his father's will confirmed, but an embassy of Jews followed close on his heels to protest to Augustus, 'We do not want this man to rule over us', and as a result Augustus severely limited his powers. Jesus was probably using this incident as a basis for His parable. The fate of the rebellious citizens was thoroughly in accordance with ancient despotic ways (though there is no record that Archelaus himself actually behaved thus).

The centre of interest, however, is not the rebellious citizens but the ten servants (a round number), each of whom was given a pound with which to trade (AV 'occupy') and make a profit. The first servant, having successfully demonstrated his faithful and competent stewardship, received the privilege of high office. The second servant, less successful, received a correspondingly lesser privilege. A third, however, had not done his duty, not even to the extent of letting a banker do the work for him. He criticized his master for his harshness in unjustly appropriating the fruit of other men's labours, and perhaps he was afraid to trade lest he incurred a loss and consequent punishment. He was rebuked for his laziness and his money was confiscated. So the need for faithful service is taught, and the prospect of reward and loss put before the servants.

The parable has a family resemblance to that of the talents. Moreover, it contains some curious inconsistencies. In v. 20 the Greek text has the other (so JB), as if there were originally only three servants, as in Matthew. Again, it is curious that an extra pound should be given to a man who has just been given ten cities and that this should arouse a protest (v. 25). Finally, the part of the story about the ruler and his rebellious citizens is not in the parable of the talents and is perhaps slightly inconsistent with a story of trade transactions. Many scholars therefore hold that two independent parables of Jesus have been fused into one here and that some of the details have been changed in the telling of the stories. Something similar has probably happened in Mt. 22:1–14. These facts, however, in no way affect the basic truths taught in the parable.

13 The pound (Gk. mna) is said to be worth £5, but it would have a much larger purchasing power. 21 The description of the master as severe and the account of his use of harsh ancient cruelty in v. 27 should not be pressed to give false conclusions about the character of God, but at the same time the reality and seriousness of divine judgment cannot be evaded.

19:28–40 Jesus rides on a colt

(See Mt. 21:1–9; Mk. 11:1–10; Jn. 12:12–19.) Having warned His disciples against false expectations of what would happen in Jerusalem, Jesus prepared for His distinctive entry to the city. Taking His seat on a colt He rode down the slope of the Mt. of Olives towards the city. His companions spread their clothes on the road as a sign of acclamation (cf. 2 Ki. 9:13). Those who had come from Galilee with Him broke into praise over the mighty works which they had seen, no doubt in anticipation of more to follow in Jerusalem itself. They hailed Jesus as the coming One, the King possessed of divine authority. Only Luke records how the Pharisees, fearful of the consequences, warned Jesus to quieten His enthusiastic followers. He was not prepared to do so, for in a deeper sense than the crowds realized their words were true: the Messiah had come. In hyperbolical fashion He told the Pharisees that the crowds could not but welcome Him. The Pharisees do not seem at this point to have been opposed to Jesus (see perhaps 13:31). Was it Jesus' refusal to repudiate the acclamation of His followers that made them begin to turn against Him?

29 Bethphage and Bethany were villages east of the Mt. of Olives, which itself was east of Jerusalem. 31 It is not certain whether the Lord means Jesus Himself or the colt's owner ('the boss'!). The latter view is possible if 'its owners' (v. 33) refers to the underlings looking after the colt for its real master, with whom Jesus will have made a previous arrangement. But Jesus may have referred uniquely to Himself as 'the Lord' on this occasion. 38 The wording differs from that in Mk. 11:9f. where the kingdom rather than the King is welcomed, but the difference is trivial. In either case the crowds seem to have expected some kind of coup by Jesus despite all He had said to the contrary. Peace in heaven . . . is probably Luke's paraphrase of 'Hosanna . . .' for Gentile readers: does it imply that peace is no longer possible on earth for Jerusalem (2:14; 19:42)?

19:41–48 The destruction of Jerusalem

(See Mt. 21:12f.; Mk. 11:15–18.) There is a sudden change of tone as Jesus turns to look at the city spread before Him and utters a sorrowful prophecy about its fate. He longed that even at this late stage it might repent and seek what would be for its welfare: how little did the conduct of Jerusalem, the city of peace (Heb. 7:2), resemble its name! The time would come when the city would be besieged with a bank (AV 'trench') round it and captured with tremendous loss of life, and all because it had failed to recognize that God was visiting it and longing to save it.

Then Jesus entered the Temple and drove out the people who carried on commerce within its precincts. Their trade was associated with the needs of pilgrims, like a modern souvenir shop under the shadow of a cathedral selling Bibles along with picture postcards, but it was conducted in a manner that was not beyond reproach and had grown to alarming proportions. The Court of the Gentiles had become a thieves' kitchen instead of a place of prayer.

So began a brief period in which Jesus taught daily in the Temple to the accompaniment of rising opposition from the authorities and strong sympathy from the crowds who appreciated His words.

42 These words strongly imply that, as we know from John, this was not Jesus' first visit to Jerusalem but that had He ministered there earlier. See on 13:34.

20:1 – 21:4 The growth of opposition

20:1–8 The authority of Jesus. (See Mt. 21:23–27; Mk. 11:27–33.) As in Matthew and Mark the story of Jesus' last visit to Jerusalem is filled with a series of incidents in which the points of difference between Him and the Jewish leaders became ever more clear, and they were encouraged to take action against Him. In the first of these incidents His preaching of the good news was interrupted by a deputation from the Sanhedrin. What was His authority for setting Himself up as a teacher, they asked? Or was it that He claimed to be a prophet with divine authority? Jesus replied with a counter-question. Let them first tell Him whether John the Baptist had received his authority from heaven, i.e. God (cf. 15:7), or from men. To have answered 'From heaven' would have raised the awkward question why they had not responded to his message (Mt. 21:32) and would have implicitly indicated that Jesus too had divine authority. But to deny the divine authority of John was to run the risk of alienating the people for whom John had certainly ranked as a prophet. Their pitifully weak 'We do not know' earned a crushing rebuke. It would be wrong to see in this story a clever piece of logic-chopping by Jesus. Rather it brings out the character of the questioners, unwilling to recognize divine authority and vacillating in fear of public opinion.

1 Representatives from the three groups of leaders mentioned here constituted the Sanhedrin, the Jewish 'parliament' composed of 71 persons and chaired by the high priest. The chief priests were either the members of the high-priestly families or the holders of various special priestly offices (e.g. the ruler of the Temple, the leaders of the weekly and daily courses, the captains and the treasurers). The elders were the lay leaders of the people.

20:9–19 The parable of the wicked husbandmen. (See Mt. 21:33–46; Mk. 12:1–21.) Jesus next took the offensive with a parable whose meaning was but thinly veiled. Any Jew who knew his Scriptures would be reminded of Is. 5:1–7, where a vineyard expressly represents Israel. In the owner's absence the tenants decided first to withhold the fruits from him and then to ensure that the vineyard would pass into their possession. They killed the heir and sat tight on the property. The picture is based on the law of the time, but it portrays the history of Israel and its leaders who had continually rejected the messengers of God. We know that 'the beloved son' represents Jesus, but whether the first hearers would have realized this is uncertain. They may possibly have seen in the title of Son a Messianic designation or known that Jesus claimed a unique filial relationship to God. Certainly Jesus had in mind His own identity and fate, but it would have been thoroughly in keeping with the manner of His public teaching for Him to have been designedly ambiguous in this parable. It required no skill to guess what a landlord would do with such tenants. Nevertheless, the hearers said 'God forbid!', a reaction which indicates that they were already applying the parable to 'the vineyard of the Lord of hosts' and were aghast at the suggestion of the Gentiles taking possession. But Jesus claimed scriptural support for what He said. What else could be meant by the metaphor of the rejected stone being given the chief place in the building but that the One whose authority they refused (20:1–7) was the person of God's choice. Anybody who rejected Him would suffer judgment (see Is. 8:14f.; Dn. 2:34, 45).

9ff. The slight differences in wording in the Gospels reflect the minor adaptations made by Christian preachers in telling the story. 14 In certain conditions the property of a Gentile or proselyte who died intestate would pass to whoever was first to gain possession of it.

20:20–26 Tribute to Caesar. (See Mt. 22:15–22; Mk. 12:13–17.) The message of the parable was so plain that the scribes and chief priests would have arrested Jesus on the spot, but the time was not propitious. They contented themselves with collecting further evidence against Him and trying to put Him into a position which would make Him lose favour with the populace or incur the suspicion of the Romans. They therefore asked directly about the relationship of Jews to the Roman government. The poll tax imposed by Rome (see on 2:2) had been accompanied by riots at its imposition (Acts 5:37) and remained exceedingly unpopular. Would Jesus oppose it, and perhaps be arrested as a rebel, or uphold it and lose popular support? He demanded whether His questioners could produce a coin, not necessarily because He did not possess one, but so that He might demonstrate that they themselves used Caesar's money. To use his coinage obliged them to pay back his property to him. At the same time, said Jesus, going beyond the original question, there is a parallel debt to God. Perhaps there is the thought that men are God's 'coinage' for they bear His image. The respective spheres of Caesar and God are not defined here. Jesus' point was simply that those who benefit from Caesar must pay him for it. It looks as though His wise answer impressed His hearers, at least for the moment.

24 The coin, a silver denarius, bore Caesar's image on the obverse and the goddess of peace on the reverse, with an inscription which read, 'Tiberius Caesar Augustus, son of the divine Augustus, Chief Priest'.

20:27–40 The problem of the resurrection. (See Mt. 22:23–33; Mk. 12:18–27.) The Sadducees were the next to test Jesus. They were a party chiefly drawn from the priesthood and the wealthy aristocracy, perfectly happy with the status quo and willing to fraternize with the Romans. They professed a traditional, conservative religion based solely on the five books of Moses, but it was empty and formal. They were materialists and denied the resurrection, angels and spirits (Acts 23:8). Their question took the form of an absurd story based on the principle of levirate marriage (from Latin levir, a brother-in-law; see Gn. 38:8; Dt. 25:5f.): how could a wife have seven husbands in the resurrection? Jesus' reply had two parts. First, He asserted that conditions in the resurrection are not like those on earth. Since there is no death and hence no need to replenish the race, there is no need for procreation. This should not be taken to mean that earthly relationships like marriage will come to an end in heaven. Rather, all relationships will be taken up to such a high level that the exclusiveness of marriage will not be a factor in heaven as it is on earth. The continuance of earthly relationships is surely implied in 1 Thes. 4:17f.

Second, Jesus gave an argument for the fact of the resurrection based on the law of Moses. At the bush God had said to Moses, 'I—the God of Abraham' (Ex. 3:6). As is normal in this type of Hebrew sentence, there is no verb, and Jesus implies that the present form 'am' must be supplied (as is done in the LXX), showing that God was still the God of Abraham centuries after his death and that consequently Abraham must still be alive. He who was Abraham's God in his lifetime would not let death interrupt the relationship but would resurrect him. The scribes, who believed in the resurrection, could not but applaud the discomfiture of their rivals.

35 See on 14:14.

20:41–47 The Person of the Messiah. (See Mt. 22:41–46; 23:6; Mk. 12:35–40.) The final episode in these conflict stories shows Jesus taking the initiative in criticizing inadequate views of the Christ or Messiah. The Jews looked forward to the coming of an earthly deliverer and king, a descendant of David (see on 18:38). But in Ps. 110 David called the Messiah 'My Lord': how could he thus speak of his son? A purely earthly Messiah was an inadequate conception of God's deliverer.

The implications of the argument are not pressed home. Instead, Jesus turned to expose the inadequacies of scribal religion. The scribes had become proud of their robes and loved the respect of the people. They were hypocrites who cheated the poor and put up an empty show of piety. They who of all men should have known God's will would receive the greater condemnation. Note, however, that there were individual exceptions (Mk. 12:28–34).

21:1–4 The widow's offering. (See Mk. 12:41–44.) In sharpest contrast to the false religiosity of the scribes is placed the attitude of a poor widow who gave two of the tiniest coins in circulation (AV 'mites') as her offering alongside the large gifts of the rich. In the sight of Jesus her gift was the greatest, for what God measures is not so much the size of the gift as what remains after it has been given. In this particular case the donor had given her whole income.

1 The treasury: i.e. the place where free-will gifts were received in the Temple.

21:5–38 The destruction of the Temple, and the last things

21:5–7 The fate of the Temple. (See Mt. 24:1–3; Mk. 13:1–4.) Like many other Jews, the disciples were filled with admiration for the lavish and flamboyant architecture of Herod's new Temple which was the main scene of Jesus' ministry in Jerusalem. Jesus, however, did not share their enthusiasm, but used the opportunity to prophesy that it would be razed to the ground. The disciples then asked when this would happen and what indications there would be that it was about to happen. In posing their question in this form, they appear to have associated the destruction of the Temple with the end of the age, and in the ensuing discourse Jesus certainly linked these two events.

The discourse which follows differs considerably in wording from that in Mk. 13. Scholars debate whether Luke rewrote the discourse in Mark to make certain lessons clearer for his readers or had access to different traditions of the words of Jesus. The latter is the more likely theory, although some interpretation by the Evangelist cannot be excluded. Like the Sermon on the Mount, it contains sayings of Jesus probably spoken on several occasions (see on 6:20–26).

5 Some: i.e. the disciples.

21:8–11 Signs of the end. (See Mt. 24:4–7; Mk. 13:5–8.) Jesus' first words were a warning not to expect the end immediately. The disciples were not to be misled by false messiahs. Nor were they to be tempted to despair by the dreadful events which would precede the end. There would be both human conflict and cosmic disaster before the end.

8 The false prophets declared 'I am', meaning 'I am the Messiah' or 'I am Jesus', and announced the coming of the end in words reminiscent of Jesus' own preaching (cf. Mk. 1:15).

21:12–19 The fate of the disciples. (Cf. Mt. 10:17–22; 24:9–14; Mk. 13:9–13.) The course of events is not given in chronological order, and discourages any attempt to work out an 'apocalyptic timetable'. Before all this (see v. 12; i.e. before the cosmic signs just mentioned) there will be tribulation for the disciples themselves as they suffer persecution from both the Jews and the Romans. This apparent disaster will be an opportunity to witness to the gospel. They need not be worried about preparing speeches beforehand, for in the hour of crisis Jesus Himself will inspire them for bold and incontrovertible witness. Persecution will come even from family and friends and lead to martyrdom and universal hatred. But in all this they will be under the hand of God, and whatever happens to them, those who endure faithfully to the end will gain eternal life.

14, 15 This saying plainly applies to Christians suddenly arrested and brought into court, not to preachers going peacefully to their pulpits! I will give. . . . In 12:11f. the Holy Spirit is to be the teacher of the disciples; Jn. 16:7 shows that He is sent by Jesus. 18, 19 In view of the preceding teaching, these verses can hardly mean that the disciples will be saved from physical harm and martyrdom; they contain the promise of divine control over their fate and a summons to perseverance.

21:20–24 The fall of Jerusalem. (Cf. Mt. 24:15–22; Mk. 13:14–20.) Two distinct stages in the coming of the end are now described. The first is the encirclement of Jerusalem by armies. Men who value their lives will flee before it is too late, for it will be the time of God's judgment upon the city. At the thought of the inevitable suffering, especially for the women, Jesus again broke out in sorrow. The city would be depopulated and handed over to Gentile domination for a fixed period.

20 Although the language describes a siege much more clearly than the corresponding section in Mark, this does not mean that Luke was writing after the event. The wording is familiar from OT prophecy, especially the passages foretelling the fall of Jerusalem in 587 BC. But whether Jesus used the words in Mark or Luke (or both) or Luke has brought out the meaning of His cryptic words more clearly as coming events were casting their shadows in the air is hard to determine. 24 The times of the Gentiles are the period of Gentile domination of Jerusalem; some scholars regard them as the period of the conversion of Gentiles (Rom. 11:25), but this is a thought alien to the present context, whatever its scriptural justification elsewhere. Jesus says nothing about whether Jerusalem would be reinstated at the end of the period.

21:25–28 The coming of the Son of man. (See Mt. 24:29–31; Mk. 13:24–27.) The second stage in the coming of the end is the cosmic disorders (21:11) prophesied in the OT. Some scholars think that this description is metaphorical of the overthrow of the Gentile powers. After this final prelude the coming of the Son of man is announced in language based on Dn. 7:13f. where the coming is associated with the day of judgment and the final, visible establishment of God's rule. Because the disasters ahead are the prelude to this divine act of release, the disciples should be filled with hope, in contrast to the fear which will characterize the rest of men.

21:29–33 The certainty of the end. (See Mt. 24:32–35; Mk. 13:28–31.) 29 In Palestine the fig tree is the first to show its leaves and act as the harbinger of spring; in other countries all the trees join it in announcing that summer is at hand. So the dreadful events prophesied by Jesus are in reality a sign of hope that the coming of the kingdom is near.

32, 33 What is the meaning of this saying, so strongly affirmed (v. 33) by Jesus? All, He said, was to happen in this generation. We are to understand by 'all' the premonitory signs, including the fall of Jerusalem in AD 70, which took place as prophesied, rather than as including the coming of the Son of man (cf. v. 36 for this distinction). But the fulfilment of these signs was to be proof that His coming was near, and this has not yet taken place. We dare not assume that Jesus was mistaken, especially in view of v. 33, but must take into account Mk. 13:32 (with its Lucan equivalent in Acts 1:7), and admit that a full understanding of His words is hidden from us. What can be affirmed with certainty is that the first coming of Jesus and the judgment upon Jerusalem have brought the coming of the kingdom near, even if God's understanding of 'near' has proved to be different from our expectations. It is worth asking whether the coming of the end is not dependent in some way upon the church's fulfilment of the command to evangelize the world.

21:34–38 Preparation for the end. Meanwhile, the vital thing is not speculation or despair but readiness for the end. The day will mean judgment for those who fall prey to worldly temptations, and so the disciples must pray for strength to persevere to the end.

A final statement notes that Jesus was lodging outside Jerusalem, as many pilgrims had to do at passover time when the city was overcrowded.

22:1 – 24:53 THE PASSION AND RESURRECTION

22:1–38 The Last Supper

22:1–6 The treachery of Judas. (See Mt. 26:1–5, 14–16; Mk. 14:1f., 10f.; cf. Jn. 11:45–53.) Once the Jewish leaders had decided to do away with Jesus, their main problem was how to avoid an uprising by His supporters; chs. 19–20 have shown that Jesus had much sympathy among the common people, many of whom would have been ready to take up arms on His behalf. The offer of Judas was to provide an opportunity to arrest Jesus quietly. Since there could be about 100,000 people in and around Jerusalem at the Passover season, the chances of tracking down an individual who wished to remain hidden would be slight.

1 The feasts of Unleavened Bread and the Passover, originally separate, were regarded as one in practice. The Passover was celebrated on the 14th and 15th of the month Nisan. During the afternoon of the 14th the Passover lambs were slaughtered at the Temple; in the evening of the same day (by our reckoning) the feast was held. Since, however, the Jewish day began at sunset, the feast was in fact held in the early hours of the 15th. The days of Unleavened Bread lasted from the 15th to the 21st of Nisan inclusive. In 22:7 the 14th is described as the first day of Unleavened Bread, possibly because the feasts were closely linked or because Luke was writing for readers who followed our reckoning of the day starting at midnight. Note that Luke agrees with the Markan chronology of the Last Supper and crucifixion; this is significant because, although Luke's passion narrative shows a number of important links with John, he does not suggest that Jesus held His supper a day earlier than the official Passover; see also on Jn. 13:1. 2 Luke does not tell us why the Jewish leaders wished to execute Jesus. 3 This is the first mention of Satan since 4:13; see note there. 4 The captains were the leaders of the Temple police.

22:7–13 Preparation for the Supper. (See Mt. 26:17–19; Mk. 14:12–16.) On the appropriate day Jesus sent two of His disciples to prepare for the Passover meal. They would need to secure a suitably furnished room within Jerusalem itself and the food—a lamb, bread, bitter herbs and wine. The arrangements made suggest that Jesus had already planned where to meet without being disturbed and made a secret arrangement with a friend in Jerusalem. The room was quite probably that mentioned in Acts 1:13, possibly in the house of Mary (Acts 12:12). A man carrying a water jar would be an unusual sight.

22:14–23 The significance of the meal. (See Mt. 26:20, 26–29, 23f.; Mk. 14:17, 22–25, 20f.; cf. Jn. 13:21–30.) The normal course of the Passover meal was: a. An inaugural blessing and prayer were followed by the first of four cups of wine and a dish of herbs and sauce. b. The story of the institution of the Passover was recited, Ps. 113 was sung, and the second cup drunk. c. After a grace the main meal of roast lamb with unleavened bread and bitter herbs was eaten, and after a further prayer the third cup of wine was drunk. d. Pss. 114–118 were sung, and the fourth cup was drunk.

Jesus began with words expressing His knowledge that He would shortly suffer and His desire to eat this last meal undisturbed. It would be the last supper, for the next occasion for Him would be the fulfilment of the meal in the kingdom of God. The reference is probably to the Messianic banquet rather than to the church's observance of the Lord's Supper. Then Jesus took a cup of wine (the first or second in the series), and reaffirmed that this would be the last occasion on which He would drink before the coming of the kingdom; thus He clearly linked His death to the coming of the kingdom. Next He gave thanks for the bread eaten with the main course and distributed it, saying 'This represents my body'. According to vv. 19b–20 (RSV mg.; see below), He indicated that His body was about to be given for the disciples in sacrificial, vicarious death, and bade them repeat the rite in remembrance of Him. Similarly, He interpreted the third cup of wine to mean His blood by which the new covenant was sacrificially inaugurated (Ex. 24:8; Je. 31:31–34). Finally, He spoke of His imminent betrayal, bringing together in one enigmatic sentence the facts of the divinely ordained course which He must follow and the free responsibility and consequent guilt of His betrayer.

15–18 Luke has put the prophecy of betrayal, recorded by Mark at this point, at the end of the meal, and has brought forward the 'vow of abstinence'. This and much other evidence show that for the passion story Luke had access to other traditions in addition to the one recorded in Mark. The words seem to mean that Jesus Himself did not share in the meal or at least in the fourth cup of wine. 19, 20 The words recorded in RSV mg. are omitted by only one Greek MS (Codex Bezae) out of nearly 3,000, and a number of Latin and Syriac MSS. If the omission is correct, Luke has given an account of a supper in which the wine preceded the bread and which had no sacrificial significance. But there is no evidence in early church order for such a sequence at the Lord's Supper. Despite the support given to the 'short text' by the RSV and NEB, the longer text is to be preferred (see on 24:3). It has links with the tradition recorded by Paul in 1 Cor. 11:23–26, but is not interpolated from there. The shorter text may have arisen through misunderstanding or in an attempt to keep the central Christian 'mystery' as a secret from pagans.

22:24–38 Sayings of Jesus at table. (Cf. Mt. 26:31–35; Mk. 14:27–31; Jn. 13:36–38.) Four sets of sayings by Jesus complete the narrative. 24–27 First, a dispute among the disciples as to which of them would be the greatest led Jesus to tell them that the question of status does not arise in the kingdom of God, whatever may happen in the world. In human society the one who is waited upon is reckoned the greatest, but the example of Jesus who served His disciples shows that this is not so in the kingdom. The story reminds us of the narrative about the feet-washing in Jn. 13 and also of the dispute recorded in Mk. 10:35–45; it seems simplest to suppose that Luke and Mark are recording two different incidents.

28–30 But the second saying of Jesus does allow some honour to the Twelve. They were supporting Jesus in His trials and would both share in the Messianic banquet and act as rulers over the tribes of Israel in the kingdom of Jesus. It is strange that the saying takes no account of the defection of Judas and that it allots places of honour after Jesus has just rebuked self-seeking (cf. Mk. 10:28–31 for the same problem). What is probably the same saying is found in Mt. 19:28, and it may be that this is the better context. The difficulty about the twelve tribes disappears if the saying refers metaphorically to the 'new Israel'.

31–34 In the third section Jesus tells how Satan had sought to have the disciples in order to sift them (cf. Jb. 1–2; Dn. 10:13) and lead them into apostasy. Jesus had permitted this, but at the same time He had prayed for Peter that he would not fail in faith and so be able to strengthen the others. Nevertheless, Peter himself would fall like the others and deny his Master. The sequel shows that he did not fall away completely.

35–38 Finally, Jesus spoke of the new situation. Formerly, when the disciples had gone out on mission, they had not lacked anything. Now they would need a purse, a bag and even a sword. The saying is heavily ironical, for Jesus knew that now He would have to face universal opposition and be put to death. But the disciples misunderstood Him and produced weapons. 'That's enough', said Jesus, to end a conversation which they had failed to understand. The way of Jesus, as they should have known, was not the way of the sword, but of love.

22:39–53 The prayer and the arrest of Jesus

(See Mt. 26:36–56; Mk. 14:32–50; Jn. 18:1–11.) After the meal Jesus went out to the Garden of Gethsemane at the foot of the Mt. of Olives. Conscious of the temptations surrounding them all, He urged His disciples to pray and then withdrew by Himself and prayed that, if possible, the cup of suffering and wrath (cf. Is. 51:22; Mk. 10:38) which lay ahead of Him might be averted. Nevertheless, as an obedient Son, He freely put Himself at His Father's disposal. After intense strain, He rose to find His disciples asleep, and again urged them to pray. It was only the One who had prayed who remained strong during the next few hours. Already the betrayer—contemptuously designated 'the man called Judas' (v. 47)—had arrived and given his traitorous greeting. The disciples realized what was about to happen and one of the two swords (v. 38) was promptly produced and used. Jesus restrained His followers and then turned to the mob: was this the way to arrest a peaceable teacher? The hour of evil's sway had come!

40 If the place was one visited regularly by Jesus (cf. v. 39), this would explain how Judas knew where to find Him. 43, 44 These verses are omitted by some of the best MSS, but their language is Lucan and they are probably genuine. It is not clear whether the sweat was in great drops like drops of blood or was literally blood, but like implies the former view. 52 The people mentioned were the proper persons to deal with disturbances in the Temple.

22:54–71 The Jewish trial

(See Mt. 26:57–75; Mk. 14:53–72; Jn. 18:12–27.) Jesus was taken first to the high priest's official residence. Peter slunk in and joined the servants at the warm fire. The big fisherman had no doubt been a conspicuous companion of Jesus earlier, and now he had to run the gauntlet as one person after another accused him of being a friend of Jesus. The fact that he came from Galilee, evidenced by his speech (Mt. 26:73), was regarded as positive proof. In fear for his life Peter yielded to temptation. Luke alone records how Jesus gave him a searching glance, and Peter, full of remorse, broke down completely.

Meanwhile, Jesus had His own load to bear. He claimed to be a prophet: very well, let Him show His powers in a grim game of blind man's buff for the amusement of the guards.

At daybreak the Sanhedrin was convened and Jesus was brought before it. The preliminaries are passed over; the decisive question was whether Jesus claimed to be the Messiah. At first He hesitated to reply, for His hearers would not believe an affirmation from His own lips, and they would not answer if He were to seek their opinion. Nevertheless, He declared that from now onwards the Son of man would be seated at God's right hand. Did that mean that He claimed to be the Son of God? 'That is your way of putting it', said Jesus. It was enough; He was guilty of blasphemy.

In Mark there is a description of a lengthy trial by night in the high priest's house, at which substantially the same dialogue as that recorded by Luke took place; this was followed by a brief morning meeting of the Sanhedrin. Luke records no trial by night, but confines his attention to the morning trial. It is clear that there was an unofficial enquiry at night at the high priest's house, which Luke has passed over in silence, and this was followed in the morning by an official session of the Sanhedrin (which Mark passes over hurriedly) at which the earlier decisions were ratified. It is uncertain whether the dialogue reported by Luke really took place at night, or whether Jesus was subjected to a brief re-examination in the morning. This explains why the accounts of Peter's denial and the mockery by the servants occur before the (morning) trial in Luke but after the (night) trial in Mark.

55 The house had an open central courtyard off which the various rooms opened. 60 A literal cock crow is probably meant, rather than the Roman bugle call at 3 a.m. (gallicinium). 66 See on 20:1. 69, 70 The words of Jesus differ from those recorded in Mark. Where Mark has one question addressed to Jesus and one answer, Luke has two, separating the titles of Christ, Son of man and Son of God. More important is the fact that where in Mark Jesus says that His judges will see the Son of man sitting at God's right hand and coming as the Judge, here He speaks of the present enthronement of the Son of man. The two accounts are complementary rather than contradictory. The sitting of the Son of man at God's right hand as judge implies a previous exaltation to that position, which is stressed more in Luke's version. Note how Jesus again substitutes Son of man for the title of Christ (9:20–22). 71 The charge against Jesus was thus that He claimed to be the Messiah or Son of God; probably the latter was regarded as a Messianic title, or else some garbled version of Jesus' private teaching to His disciples had reached their ears. To claim to sit at God's right hand was blasphemy (Mk. 14:64).

23:1–25 The Roman trial

23:1–5 Jesus before Pilate. (See Mt. 27:1f., 11–14; Mk. 15:1–5; cf. Jn. 18:28–38.) Since the Jews had in general no power to carry out a death sentence (Jn. 18:31), it was necessary to take the case before the Roman authorities. A Roman governor would not listen to 'questions about words and names' (cf. Acts 18:14f.), and therefore the charge against Jesus had to be reformulated as one of sedition against Rome. Of the two particular charges made, the first was false (cf. 20:25), but the second was true, although not in the sense in which the Jews meant it (cf. Jn. 18:36f.). So, when Pilate asked Jesus if He claimed to be a king, He answered in a non-committal way. Pilate will have questioned Jesus more closely before reaching his verdict that there were no grounds for a political charge against him.

1 Pilate was normally resident in the administrative capital of Caesarea (Acts 23:33; not to be confused with Caesarea Philippi), but (like Herod) visited Jerusalem at the Passover season. 2 A king is elucidation of 'Christ' for Roman ears.

23:6–12 Jesus before Herod. The mention of Galilee by the Jews (v. 5) gave Pilate his cue. Throughout the trial he gives the impression of baiting the Jews. He was well aware that Jesus had committed no crime, and deliberately played with the Jews as he tried to thwart their purpose. In the end, when the situation was getting out of control, he was quite prepared to sacrifice an innocent man in order to keep the peace. For the moment, it would do no harm to send Jesus across to Herod Antipas, the tetrarch of Galilee. Herod is presented as a trifler, hoping to see some amusing tricks performed by One whom he probably regarded as some kind of magician, but to such a man Jesus had nothing to say. He and his soldiers descended to rough mockery before returning the problem prisoner to Pilate. Later in the day they amused themselves by chatting over their experiences.

6, 7 Pilate was not necessarily trying to rid himself of the case; he may simply have been taking a second opinion. There is no good reason to think that the incident has been fabricated from Acts 4:25f.; see on 9:9. 10 Some Jewish representatives went across to Herod's residence to ensure that their case did not go by default.

11 The mockery is very similar to that by Pilate's soldiers, but one set of troops could easily have copied the other's example.

23:13–25 The sentence of death. (See Mt. 27:15–26; Mk. 15:6–15; Jn. 18:38 – 19:16.) Pilate perhaps hoped that the people (v. 13) might side with him in resisting the Jewish leaders when he delivered his verdict. No doubt the prisoner had been something of a public nuisance, but for this a scourging would be an adequate penalty. But the crowd had been swayed by the priests and they shouted for Barabbas, a well-known revolutionary, to be released instead of Jesus. Pilate was naturally ill-disposed to a suggestion which involved not only the death of an innocent man but also the release of a dangerous, convicted criminal, but the intensity of the public uproar was such that he deemed it prudent to yield. Pilate's character was summed up by Agrippa I as 'inflexible, merciless and obstinate'; it is borne out by this scene, for the common view that Pilate here shows vacillation and weakness is certainly an over-statement. One thing is certain, that Pilate showed no mercy.

16 Scourging was both a punishment in itself and a normal preliminary to crucifixion (Mk. 15:15). 18 Luke does not explain what led the people to ask for Barabbas, unless v. 17 be accepted as part of the original text, against the evidence of the best MSS.

23:26–49 The crucifixion of Jesus

(See Mt. 27:32–56; Mk. 15:21–41; Jn. 19:17–30.) A condemned man usually carried the cross himself to the place of execution (Jn. 19:17), but in this case a passer-by was requisitioned to help with the load; 'behind' (v. 26) may be a conscious echo of 9:23; 14:27. A crowd always attended executions out of compassion or curiosity. The women among them raised a death-wail for Jesus, but He raised, as it were, a death-wail for Jerusalem. Let them have pity for themselves, for a day would come when they would rue having borne children who were to endure such terrible suffering and long for some mighty convulsion of nature to put an end to their sufferings (cf. Ho. 10:8; Rev. 6:16). For if this is how the Romans treat the innocent Jesus, how much worse will be the fate of guilty Jerusalem. The words are of pity rather than of condemnation.

After being crucified between two criminals (cf. Is. 53:9, 12), Jesus' first recorded words in this Gospel are a prayer for forgiveness for His executioners. The division of the dead man's clothes among the executioners was a recognized custom. Meanwhile, the rulers sneered at Jesus with unconscious irony; the Christian reader knows that it was the death on the cross which decisively showed that Jesus was the Christ and the Saviour. The soldiers also joined in the mockery, taking their cue from the Jews and making use of the words in the titulus, or charge-sheet, nailed on the cross. Even one of the criminals repeated the same taunt. Luke alone records how the other criminal, perhaps after initially taunting Jesus also, was of a different mind and uttered a confession of his own sin and Jesus' innocence. Turning to Jesus he asked that He would remember him when He came in His kingly power to reign. Even at this late hour his faith was accepted and he was promised a place in Paradise instead of Sheol, with the justified instead of the condemned.

From noon (the 'sixth hour', v. 44, by Roman reckoning) there was darkness for three hours. The Greek word used need not mean an eclipse of the sun, and cannot mean one, since it was the Passover season of full moon. The cause of the darkness was perhaps a dust-laden sirocco wind, strong enough to split the curtain of the Temple. The significance of this is not indicated by the Evangelists: was it regarded as a prophecy of the forthcoming destruction of the Temple or as an indication that the way into God's presence was now open for all men (Heb. 9:8–14; 10:19f.)?

Then at the ninth hour came the end as Jesus committed Himself into God's hands with the words of Ps. 31:5. The manner of His death led the officiating centurion to glorify God by saying, 'Certainly this man was just'. The words declare the innocence of Jesus, and perhaps allude to His sharing the frequent fate of the just (cf. Wisdom 2:12–20). But why did the centurion praise God? Was it because God had sustained Jesus to die nobly after living nobly? The mourning by the crowds is dismissed by some critics as imaginary, but this is surely perverse. The final note emphasizes that Jesus' friends saw Him really die.

33 The place of the crucifixion, here called The Skull (Aramaic Golgotha) is still uncertain, but was probably near the Church of the Holy Sepulchre on the north of the city; the identification of the site with the skull-shaped hill known as Gordon's Calvary is today generally rejected. 34a is omitted by a formidable list of early MSS, but it should be retained either as a genuine part of Luke (cf. Acts 7:60) or as a reliable piece of extraneous tradition. It would be omitted by scribes who felt that it was unseemly or not answered. 36 This action seems to be distinct from the kind act in Mk. 15:36. Vinegar was the cheap wine drunk by soldiers. 39, 40 It is unnecessary to suppose that the criminal's words were ironic but nevertheless accepted by Jesus, still less that the whole incident is legendary. Here, as elsewhere, Luke had access to other traditions than those recorded in Mark. 42 In your kingly power means 'when you return as King'. The variant text 'into your kingly power', expressing Jesus' vindication by God, is less likely. 43 Paradise is the resting-place of the redeemed before the final judgment, and is opened to those who trust in Jesus. There is some tension with other statements which imply that Jesus visited Hades (Mt. 12:40; Acts 2:27, 31; 1 Pet. 3:19f.) before His resurrection. The difficulty is perhaps due to our inability to think of the after-life in any other than spatial categories; perhaps today means the new era inaugurated by the resurrection. 47 For innocent Mark has 'the Son of God'. Luke may have wished to avoid giving the impression that the centurion thought of Jesus in pagan fashion as a demi-god.

23:50–56 The burial of Jesus

(See Mt. 27:57–61; Mk. 15:42–47; Jn. 19:38–42.) The bodies of crucified criminals were usually left hanging and then cast into a common grave. A friend and disciple of Jesus spared Him this indignity. Joseph, a member of the Sanhedrin who had not agreed with its verdict upon Jesus, gained permission from Pilate to bury the body. He wrapped it, according to Jewish custom, in a shroud and placed it in a new grave. Jewish graves were caves, natural or man-made, in the sides of hills, large enough for a man to enter, and sealed by a sliding stone across the entrance. Joseph, however, did not embalm the body, and the women from Galilee decided to repair this omission as soon as possible after the sabbath which they observed in the normal manner.

50 Arimathaea was about 20 miles north-west of Jerusalem on the border between Judea and Samaria. 51 Since all Jews were looking for the kingdom of God, the phrase here must mean that Joseph held the particular form of expectation taught by Jesus and lived in accordance with this hope. 52 Death by crucifixion was normally slow and drawn out; Luke does not mention Pilate's surprise at the rapid death of Jesus. 54 The day of Preparation for the weekly sabbath extended from sunset on Thursday to sunset on Friday. But the sabbath 'was dawning' (RSV mg.; Gk. epiphōskō) implies not sunset but sunrise (cf. Mt. 28:1); here, however, the word should perhaps be taken to mean that the lights were being lit on the Friday evening when the sabbath was imminent (JB).

24:1–53 The resurrection of Jesus

24:1–12 The empty tomb. (Cf. Mt. 28:1–10; Mk. 16:1–8; Jn. 20:1–10.) Very early on Sunday morning an unspecified number of the women from Galilee came to the tomb of Jesus, found it open and went inside, only to discover that there was no body there. Two 'men', clothed in the white garments associated with heavenly beings (cf. 9:29) appeared and spoke to them, gently criticizing them for expecting to find in a tomb One who had prophesied His resurrection from the dead (9:22; 18:33). They therefore made their way back from the tomb and told the story to the other disciples of Jesus. The naming of some of the women (v. 10) is perhaps an indication that they ought to have been regarded as credible witnesses, but nevertheless for the moment the apostles were not disposed to believe the story. Peter, however, went to the tomb and confirmed that it was empty (v. 12, RSV mg.).

The historicity of the story has often been called in question. It has been argued, e.g., that the women went to the wrong tomb, but it is quite incredible that both they and the later visitors to the scene could have been mistaken on such a point. The argument that, while there may have been 'resurrection appearances', the story of the empty tomb is both late and mythical is exposed to the fundamental objections that in fact the tradition of the empty tomb is early (it is presupposed in 1 Cor. 15:3–7), and that the NT understanding of resurrection is of a bodily resurrection; to hold that the bones of Jesus are still somewhere in Palestine is to disbelieve in the NT doctrine of the resurrection and is at the same time to adopt what is historically a very tenuous hypothesis. But if the basic facts are certain, it must be confessed that it is as difficult to harmonize fully the various versions of what happened on Easter morning as it is to frame a coherent account of any modern cataclysmic event witnessed by a number of individuals. If this absolves the witnesses from any possible charge of collusion, it does leave a number of loose ends which it is difficult to tie up satisfactorily.

1 They stands in contrast to the visit of Mary Magdalene to the tomb by herself in Jn. 20:1–10; it is possible that two or more separate visits have been telescoped in Luke's account. 3 Here and in a number of places in this chapter (vv. 5, 12, 36, 40, 51, 52) RSV has removed phrases to the margin. With one exception, the evidence for omission is confined to one Greek MS (Codex Bezae) and some Latin authorities (cf. on 22:19f.). Although Westcott and Hort omitted the phrases, it is being increasingly recognized that they are probably a true part of the text. 4 Mark mentions only one young man at the tomb and his words are different. In particular, Luke does not record the command to go to Galilee (Mk. 16:7; cf. 14:28), very probably because he has not described any appearances of Jesus in Galilee. 9 The statement in Mk. 16:8 that the women said nothing to anybody out of fear should not be regarded as contradicting this verse, since it is uncertain what Mark may have gone on to record at this point, and in any case he probably meant that they said nothing to anybody except the Eleven. 10 For Joanna see 8:3. 12 A summary of the story in Jn. 20:1–10.

24:13–35 The walk to Emmaus. (Cf. Mk. 16:12f.) On the same Sunday afternoon two of the disciples were walking to Emmaus and discussing the recent events. When the risen Jesus joined them on the road they did not recognize Him; a supernatural failure to perceive His identity is meant, rather than that He had a different form (though this is possibly implied in Mk. 16:12). By professing ignorance He learned what had saddened them and that His tomb was rumoured to be empty. They remembered that there had been a prophecy of His resurrection on the third day, but they had not heard of anybody seeing Him. They had expected Jesus to be the redeemer of Israel, but they could not understand how He had been rejected by the rulers. Jesus' reply was that suffering was the necessary prelude to the Messiah's entry into kingly glory, and He directed them to the scriptures which prophesied this (see on 18:31, for references). When they arrived at their destination they pressed Him to accept their hospitality for the night. They prepared an evening meal, but at the table He assumed the position of host, took up the bread, gave thanks to God, broke it and gave it to them. The language used is reminiscent of that describing the action of Jesus at the feeding miracles and the Last Supper (9:16; 22:19; Mk. 8:6). But whether or not the disciples were reminded of these acts (there is no evidence that they were present on any of those occasions), the veil immediately fell from their eyes and they recognized Jesus, who immediately vanished from their sight. Then they realized that they had felt a strange elation as their unknown companion had spoken with them on the way. They must tell the others what had happened, and promptly rose to go back to Jerusalem to tell them. But before they could tell their story, they were greeted with the exciting news that Jesus had appeared to Simon. He was risen!

13 Emmaus is usually identified with Kubeibeh, some 7 miles north-west of Jerusalem. Mozah, in the same vicinity, is another possibility. 18 Cleopas may be the Clopas of Jn. 19:25. 19 This describes the most that Jesus can be to those who do not believe that He is risen. 21 The disciples knew that Jesus had spoken about something significant happening on the third day, and that His tomb was said to be empty. But this was not adequate evidence for the resurrection; this could be provided only by the appearance of the Lord Himself. 25 Men is too strong a translation. Greek idiom would use the masculine form to address a mixed company (cf. 17:34), and it is likely that the unnamed disciple was Cleopas's wife. 27 The Jewish Scriptures consisted of three parts: the Law of Moses (Genesis–Deuteronomy); the Prophets (Joshua, Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel, 1 and 2 Kings, and the prophets, with the exception of Daniel); and the Writings (the remaining books of our OT). The first two groups were complete and closed by the time of Jesus. The third (sometimes called 'the Psalms', v. 44, from its chief component) was virtually closed, but doubt still existed about the status of two or three books. The omission of the third group here is not significant, the OT writings are here considered from the point of view of their prophetic content. 34 For the appearance to Simon see 1 Cor. 15:5. The brief summary in Mk. 16:12f. which says that the disciples did not believe them refers to the incredulity and disbelief later in the story at vv. 37, 41.

24:36–53 Jesus appears again to the disciples. (Cf. Mt. 28:16–20; Mk. 16:14–20; Jn. 20:19–23; Acts 1:6–11.) The excited story of the two travellers was interrupted by the sudden appearance of Jesus in the room and His greeting 'Peace to you'. The disciples were very naturally filled with panic at this supernatural manifestation, but He spoke so as to relieve their distress. It was really He Himself, and He showed them His physical body with its flesh and bones, and His hands and feet with the nailprints in them. To give further proof of the reality of His presence He ate some food in their presence.

What follows need not necessarily have happened on the same occasion or on the same day. If the account is taken literally, it would imply that the resurrection and ascension both occurred on Easter Sunday. Luke's own account in Acts 1 shows that this was not the case, and therefore what he has here described briefly and compactly must have taken place over a longer period. There was a repetition of the instruction given to the two disciples on the road to Emmaus, so as to enable all the disciples to understand the OT prophecies of His coming. Two new factors are introduced. The command to preach repentance and faith to all nations was issued, and those who had been witnesses of His resurrection appearances (a much larger group than the Eleven) were promised that God's power would enable them to be His witnesses. Finally, He led them out of Jerusalem to Bethany where He gave them His parting blessing and was then carried away from them into heaven. They returned to Jerusalem and waited there in joyful expectation of the fulfilment of His promise.

The story bears resemblances not only to that in Jn. 20:19–23 but also to that in Mt. 28:16–20 where Jesus gives the mission charge on a mountain in Galilee. There need be no doubt that Jesus appeared to His disciples both in Jerusalem (as in Luke, Acts and Jn. 20) and in Galilee (as in Matthew and Jn. 21), but it is more difficult to harmonize the mission charge in Luke with that in Matthew. It should, however, be noted that Mt. 28 is not a record of the ascension but of a resurrection appearance, and it is by no means unlikely that Jesus repeated His last commands more than once to His disciples.

39–43 The description of the resurrection body of Jesus in strongly physical terms has worried many scholars, but it is hard to see why He may not have appeared in this form. The mention of 'honeycomb' alongside the broiled fish in v. 42 AV is not upheld by the best MSS. 47 For prophecy of the preaching to the Gentiles, cf. Is. 2:3; 42:6; 49:6; 51:4f.; Rom. 15:9–12. 50 Bethany lay at the foot of the Mt. of Olives (cf. Acts 1:12). The various uncertainties in the text of vv. 51f. (cf. on 24:3) may be due to alterations made in the text of Luke and Acts after these two books, originally meant to be read as one, were separated from each other when John was inserted between them. Some MSS may have tried to avoid an apparent contradiction with the forty days' period in Acts 1. 53 Continually should not be taken too literally (cf. 2:37), as Acts 1:13f. indicates.

AUTHORSHIP

It is not possible in brief compass to give more than a bare outline of the discussion over authorship of this Gospel. But the main features of the discussion may be summarized as follows.

a. There is a very strong tradition, supported by early evidence from patristic sources, that the author was the apostle John. There are no specific references to the identity of the author in the Gospel itself. It is necessary therefore to weigh carefully the external evidence to decide how reliable it is. At least as early as Irenaeus there was belief in the apostolic authorship, and his witness is strengthened by the possibility that he may have had access to authentic tradition through his earlier acquaintance with Polycarp. The latter did not himself refer to or cite from this Gospel when writing his epistle to the Philippians, but this need not lead to the conclusion that he was ignorant of it. The sole opposition to the apostolic authorship came from a group known as the Alogoi, who appear to have been a small splinter group in Rome. Their views were opposed by Hippolytus who wrote a defence of this Gospel. The history of the book before Irenaeus is not easy to determine, but it must have been regarded as authoritative for some considerable time to have been placed indisputably on a level with the other three as part of the fourfold Gospel.

b. Some internal considerations corroborate, although they do not prove, the veracity of the tradition, as, e.g., 1:14; 19:35; 21:24. Although all of these references have been otherwise understood by some scholars, it is most natural to see them as evidence of the author's own claim to be an eyewitness. Moreover, John, son of Zebedee, is nowhere mentioned by name in this Gospel, while John the Baptist is named simply as John without further description. This would certainly be more intelligible if the author were himself the other John. A further consideration is the mention anonymously of the 'disciple whom Jesus loved', which may well be a reference to John the apostle. Some dispute that John would have described himself in this way and prefer to regard this as evidence that the apostle was not the author. Others identify the beloved disciple as Lazarus or some other follower of Jesus. It is impossible to be sure, but his close association with Peter would support the view that he was John, as would the fact that some of the references to him show his very close association with Jesus in the upper room.

c. The author appears to possess detailed knowledge of Palestine and of Jewish customs. This would be most intelligible if he were a Palestinian Jew, although the evidence does not demand this. He may have obtained his information from another source.

d. Many incidental details also suggest that an eyewitness account lay behind the Gospel, as, e.g., the number of waterpots at Cana and the number of fish caught in the Sea of Galilee when Jesus appeared to His disciples after His resurrection. Such details are not essential to the narrative, but add a certain vividness to the account.

e. The Hellenistic characteristics of this Gospel are, nevertheless, said to militate against the correctness of the early tradition, since John the apostle was not a Hellenistic Jew. Moreover, parallels with the non-Christian philosophical tractates known as the Hermetica are said to support this contention. There are certainly parallels in terminology with both Philo of Alexandria and Hermes, but this factor does not conclusively show that the author was a Hellenist. Some similar parallels in thought are found also in the Jewish literature from Qumran.

f. The close acquaintance of the author with rabbinical methods of argument is another reason why some have rejected the apostolic authorship, since John was a Galilaean fisherman. But due allowance must be made for the fact that the rabbinical arguments are found in the teaching of Jesus, not in the author's own comments.

g. The Evangelist, moreover, appears to adopt a polemical attitude towards the Jews, as if they are a race apart from himself, a feature which would be surprising if John the apostle were the author. But this may be evidence of the deep feeling of a Jewish Christian over the bitter hostility of his own people towards Jesus.

h. Alternative theories regarding authorship generally attempt to retain some connection of John the apostle with the Gospel by regarding him as the witness, while at the same time postulating another author. The most widely held theory is that another John, known as John the Elder, was the author. If there were two Johns so closely associated in the production of the Gospel, it is not impossible that confusion may have arisen between them in the early tradition. But the existence of John the Elder depends on a somewhat ambiguous statement of Papias, who makes no mention in any case of a Gospel being written by him.

i. Some deny all connection of John the apostle with the Gospel and suppose that it was attributed to him to gain apostolic authority for the work.

j. In face of all these various opinions it is difficult to be dogmatic, but it would appear reasonable to suppose that the apostolic authorship accounts best for all the evidence, internal and external.

PURPOSE

We cannot do better than examine the author's own statement of purpose in Jn. 20:31. That purpose was specifically evangelistic. It was aimed to produce faith in Jesus as Christ and as Son of God. The record of the various signs was intended to produce this result, and with this in mind the many references throughout the Gospel to believing and to non-believing become significant. Both the historical narratives and the didactic discourses were chosen because of their power to focus attention on the specific claims of Jesus. John has no thought, therefore, of producing a biographical or psychological study. It must not be supposed that an evangelistic purpose weakens the historical veracity. To be effective the theological motive needs an authentic historical basis. This is not to exclude the possibility that John regarded some at least of his material as possessing symbolic significance.

There may well have been some subsidiary aims, such as a presentation of the true relationship between Jesus and John the Baptist, or a refutation of Docetic views about Christ (i.e. theories which draw a distinction between the heavenly Christ and the human Jesus). Some have supposed an eschatological or a sacramental corrective against misunderstandings.

A strong body of opinion regards the Gospel as a presentation of Christianity in a Hellenized form. The prologue (1:1–18) may seem to lend support to this theory. But the crucial factor is the extent to which the prologue determines the purpose of the Gospel as a whole. It is better to suppose that the body of the Gospel supplies the key to the understanding of the prologue, rather than vice versa. The teaching of Jesus was sufficiently comprehensive to be intelligible to Greek as well as Jew without the necessity to posit such thoroughgoing interpretation as the Hellenistic school supposes.

THE RELATION TO THE SYNOPTIC GOSPELS

A comparison with the other Gospels shows a marked difference in John in the substance and in the method of presentation. A large amount of material included in the others is lacking from John, whereas a considerable amount of the Johannine material is lacking from the Synoptics. In fact there is little material common to all four Gospels, apart from the passion narratives. A major difference is that the Synoptics concentrate on the Galilaean ministry, whereas John fixes his attention on the Jerusalem ministry. This largely accounts for the difference in style of Jesus' teaching, the parabolic teaching of the Synoptics giving way to the dialogue and discourse style of John. Certain historical differences have also been noted, such as the setting of the cleansing of the Temple, the events which precipitated the arrest of Jesus, the duration of the ministry and the date of the Last Supper. From these considerations some have concluded that John aims to correct and supersede the Synoptics, but this is difficult to maintain, for on so many occasions he assumes knowledge of the Synoptic traditions as a basis for his own. It is better to regard John as complementary to the Synoptics, although this does not in itself explain all the differences. The most difficult problem is the chronology of the passion events. The solution may lie in the use of different calendars by John and the Synoptics, but the data are not sufficient to point to a completely satisfying answer.

It may at first seem that the Johannine presentation of Jesus differs so completely from that of the Synoptics that both portraits cannot be of the same person. But this would be a wrong deduction. When sufficient attention is paid to the different purposes of the separate Gospels, and to the different types of audiences to which Jesus addressed His teaching, the contrast is more intelligible. Some have attributed the difference in John to the probability that the material had for a long period been adapted to the Evangelist's own teaching ministry. But a more probable explanation is that the Evangelist was himself drawn to the more reflective style of the discourses and allowed his own style to be considerably moulded by his model.

DATE AND PLACE OF WRITING

There is some dispute whether or not any certain traces of John's Gospel can be found in writers before the time of Irenaeus. But there is good ground for supposing that Justin (c. AD 150) knew and used the Gospel and a possibility that Ignatius also knew of it. Apart from patristic citations there are two early 2nd-century papyrus MSS which show the early existence and circulation of the Gospel. The Rylands papyrus contains a scrap of John's Gospel and the Egerton papyrus echoes the language of John and the other Gospels. It is impossible therefore to date this Gospel much later than the end of the first century at the latest. If the apostle was the author, a date a few years before the end of the century would almost certainly be required as the latest possible date. Since the Gospel must have come after the Synoptic Gospels, a date fairly late in the first century is generally preferred (c. AD 90), although some have suggested an earlier date.

As for the place of origin, tradition has it that John was resident in Ephesus and there seem to be no real grounds for disputing this. Some who do not maintain apostolic authorship suggest not only that this Ephesus tradition is unreliable, but also that John did not live to old age. The evidence which is claimed to support this view consists of scanty and none too reliable clues that John died a martyr's death much earlier than the Gospel could have been written. But the tradition of his long life and of his writing the Gospel is much stronger.

THEOLOGY

John has many characteristic features, particularly in his presentation of Christ, and this may be said to be the most significant feature of his theology. It has already been pointed out that his major purpose was theological, and indeed Christological. The focus of attention was on Messiahship and Sonship. The Messianic status of Jesus more than once formed the topic of discussion among the Jews (7:26ff.; 10:24). Moreover, three times in this Gospel there are recorded confessions of the Messiahship of Jesus (1:41; 4:29; 11:27). To the Evangelist Jesus was the fulfiller of all the Messianic hopes of the Jewish people. In full harmony with this is the frequent appeal to the OT testimony.

Jesus as Son of God is far more characteristic of the Gospel. Many times does Jesus bring out His own filial relationship with the Father. Whereas this aspect is not absent from the Synoptics, it is specially noteworthy in John because of the frequent occurrence of the term 'Son' without further description. The plan of salvation was effected by the Father through the Son. It was through love for the world that God sent His Son (3:16). The Son is the agent through whom the Father reveals Himself (1:18). The claim of Jesus to be Son of God was the basis of the charge before Pilate that according to Jewish law He ought to die (19:7).

The most characteristic feature of the Synoptic Gospels is Jesus as Son of man, and although it is not quite so prominent in John, it is still basic to his presentation. It is the Son of man who not only reveals the Father but who will be lifted up (3:13, 14). This process of lifting up will result in the glorification of the Son of man (12:23). Moreover, there are many indications of the perfect humanity of Jesus in this Gospel. He can experience human emotions, can hunger and thirst, can be tired through a journey. The exalted Christology is never allowed to detract from the perfect humanity of Jesus.

In the prologue the pre-existence and deity of Christ are expressed explicitly. The Logos was not only with God in the beginning, but was God (1:1), and it was this Logos who became flesh and is identified with Christ. Whatever the origins of the idea of the Logos for the Evangelist, his own Christology is clear. The narrative which follows is not that of a mere man but of the pre-existent Son who shared with the Father the creation of the world (1:3).

A further feature of the Johannine Christology is the number of statements of Jesus introduced by the significant 'I am'. In this way He described Himself as the Way, the Truth, the Life, the Resurrection, the Bread, the Shepherd, the Door, the Vine. All of these suggestive titles explain different aspects of what He came to be and to do for men.

There are many figures of speech used to describe the nature of the work of Christ. The sacrificial lamb (1:29), the temple of His body (2:21), the serpent in the wilderness (3:14), the shepherd giving his life for his sheep (10:11), the grain of wheat (12:24). The death of Jesus was even recognized as expedient by the high priest that year, but John sees a deeper meaning in it than Caiaphas (11:51). There is throughout the Gospel a sense of the inevitable as Jesus' hour draws gradually nearer.

One further important factor in Johannine theology is the frequent mention of the Holy Spirit. His work in regeneration (3:5ff.), His promised outpouring following the glorification of Jesus (7:37ff.), and the five sayings about Him in the farewell discourses (chs. 14–16) are all found only in John's Gospel. In the latter sayings, He is described as Counsellor, as dwelling in the believer, as the Teacher, as a witness to Christ, as convicter of the world and as guide into all truth for Christ's people. Of all the Gospels John shows most clearly that the continuation of the ministry of Jesus would be through the agency of the Spirit.

This is a Gospel which contributes much to the theology of the NT and repays the most diligent study. Its language is often simple but its thought is profound.

1:1–18 THE PROLOGUE

Unlike the other Evangelists, John does not begin his Gospel with an immediate introduction of the historical Jesus. Instead he introduces his readers to the Word (Gk. logos), whom he does not identify with Jesus Christ until the end of his prologue. There can be no doubt that his method of leading up to the historical events has considerable bearing on the interpretation of the whole. For this reason an appreciation of the meaning of the 'Word' as it would have struck the earliest readers of the Gospel is essential, but on this question there have been varying points of view. A strong body of opinion has maintained the Greek associations of the idea.

The term Logos was used among the Stoics in describing the principle of divine reason (logos spermatikos) which caused the natural creation to grow. This idea was much more fully developed as a distinct entity in the writings of Philo where it is used of the instrument through which the world was created. Any similarity between this concept and the statement in Jn. 1:3 is more than offset by the fact that there are crucial differences in the use of the term in the two writers. Philo never conceived of the Logos as a person, nor did he explicitly claim its pre-existence to the world. But the most significant distinction between the two is Philo's denial of any incarnation of the Word and John's express assertion that the Word had become flesh. Some similarities of expression may be found between this Gospel and the syncretistic philosophical literature current during the early centuries of the Christian era known as the Hermetica, but the essential thought is quite different. It will be seen, therefore, that although Greek thought can be regarded as part of the background of John's prologue it by no means furnishes a complete or even adequate explanation.

In view of the similarity of the opening of John's prologue to the opening of the book of Genesis, and in view of the constant appeal throughout the Gospel to the OT, it would seem reasonable to assume that Jewish thought contributed a major part of the significance of the Logos. The notion of the creative activity of God being effected through His word or wisdom is particularly dominant in the Jewish wisdom literature (cf. Pr. 8 and Wisdom 18:15, 16). Closely linked to this is the rabbinical practice of attributing to the law some agency in creation. The Dead Sea Scrolls, which have shown some combinations of ideas similar to those of John's prologue, have led to a more sympathetic consideration of the Jewish milieu behind the prologue.

But John's prologue must be considered on its own merits. It is distinctively Christian. It is designed to prepare the way for the record of the activities and teachings of a unique Person. For this reason the prologue must be interpreted in terms of the remainder of the Gospel, not vice versa. If any readers began reading the Gospel convinced that there could be no incarnate link between God and man, they would soon discover that John's conviction is quite different and that the life of Jesus must be conceived as a unique phenomenon. A careful analysis of the prologue will show how integral it is with the recurrent ideas of the Gospel.

1:1–5 The pre-existent Word

1, 2 When the opening words of Genesis and John are compared, there is enough similarity to show the close connection in the latter writer's mind between the two, although John's distinctive contribution is to show that before creation the Word existed. In the beginning was the Word. Here the verb used, although referring to the past, emphasizes continuity. The Word that is now was the Word before creation began. With God. The form in which this is stated is suggestive, for the preposition (Gk. pros) conveys the idea of communion. The literal idea is 'towards God', which at once requires some distinctiveness between God and the Word, a feature which has significance for the interpretation of the next clause. The Word was God. Some translators have incorrectly rendered this 'The Word was divine', but this is an unwarranted weakening of the statement. As there is no article in the Greek (theos), the term must be taken as a predicate, in which case it states the characteristic of the Word; but since it is a noun and not an adjective it must assert the Godhead of the Word. It involves not merely divinity but deity.

3 The thought next turns to the creative activity of the Word. The Greek draws attention to the agency of the Word (through, Gk. dia) and then goes on to exclude all possibility of creation apart from Him. The close connection between the Father and the Son, which has already been stressed in Their essential relationships, is seen also in Their part in creation. Any conception of creation which does not take account of this is not in harmony with NT teaching generally. This would certainly exclude Gnostic ideas of intermediaries in creation, which were designed to protect God from direct contamination with an essentially evil world. John's assertion that the Word was life is a logical sequence from His creative activity. This view of the Word as the source of life is basic to this Gospel, for John states his purpose as being that his readers might have life in Him (Jn. 20:31).

4 The close connection between life and light is not unexpected. In the physical world, life is dependent on light (cf. the creation narrative) and John transfers the idea to the spiritual world. An alternative reading (see mg.) connects the end statement in v. 3 with the phrase 'in him was life' in v. 4, but this is a more difficult punctuation and the other is to be preferred.

5 The light shines in the darkness. There can be no doubt that the light here must be interpreted by means of v. 4. There it is an illumination which comes to man generally and would seem to refer to the light of conscience and reason. But here the idea is developed, for the light is focused on its environment, which John describes as darkness. Since in this case the light is personal it is not external as the light from a lamp. Rather, the light of spiritual enlightenment which mankind has received is exclusively derived from the divine Word. The following statement that the darkness has not overcome it could also be rendered 'has not apprehended it', but the former fits the context better for it draws attention to the superior quality of the light.

1:6–8 The witness of John to the Word

Having stated that light has shone in darkness,

John moves nearer to the historical setting of the ministry of the Word by appealing to the witness of John the Baptist. 6 The important feature about John's testimony is that it was divinely appointed. The verb sent is characteristic of this Gospel, especially in describing the mission of Jesus. Even the herald was specifically sent. 7, 8 The purpose was to bear witness to the light. It is not improbable that the Evangelist knew of some who attached more importance to John's teaching than to that of Jesus and he designed therefore to clarify at once the relationship between them (cf. also vv. 15, 26ff.). The express repudiation of any idea that he was the light and the double assertion of his character as a witness focus attention on John's true position. The ultimate purpose of all true Christian testimony is to lead to faith, the scope of which is universal as the all shows.

1:9–13 The light coming to men

The subject of the witness is more important than the witness. Hence the greater concentration upon it. 9 The true light . . . was coming into the world. This gives a better connection of thought than AV which relates the latter phrase to 'every man' and gives the impression that all men receive light at the time of birth. The following verse makes clear that this could not be true of light in the specific, personal sense in which John clearly intends it. Before the coming of Christ some light certainly existed, but when He came He was constituted as the only true illumination from whom all existing light was derived. 10 There was a general lack of recognition of Him by the world, by which John evidently meant not so much the physical creation as the world of men. It is characteristic of this Gospel to contrast the mission of Jesus with the world, which generally symbolizes people adversely disposed towards God.

11 He came to his own home. RSV is justified in rendering the text in this way, rather than relating the neuter plural adjective to 'things'. In the next clause John leaves no doubt that he is dealing with people. Failure to receive Christ is a personal responsibility. His own home would presumably, therefore, relate to Israel. That His own nation were opposed to Him is amply illustrated in the body of the Gospel. It is the Jews who are consistently seen to be at enmity with Christ. John does not intend his readers to suppose that none of His own people received Him, for he makes this clear in the next statement. Another possible interpretation takes his own to mean His own world in the sense of His own property. 12 For the Evangelist there is a close connection between receiving and believing, indeed they are identical. He gave power to become children of God. Through the divine Word a new relationship is possible. The word power (Gk. exousia) describes a rightful authority. It is clear that sonship once received is in no jeopardy of being dispossessed for it originates from God and not from man. This supernatural characteristic is particularly evident in John's next statement about the divine origin of the new birth. 13 Not of blood nor of the will of the flesh. This at once excludes all idea of natural process. Since the word blood is in the plural in Greek, some exegetes suppose that the blood of both parents in natural birth is alluded to (so C. K. Barrett), but others maintain that the singular would for Christians suggest the blood of Christ, which would make the statement less valid (cf. E. C. Hoskyns). Another suggestion sees in the whole verse an allusion to the virgin birth, but this requires an extension of the plain literal meaning.

1:14–18 The incarnation of the Word

At this point in his prologue John describes the coming of the Word into human life. It is here that the record of Jesus' life really begins. 14 The statement, the Word became flesh, distinguishes John's use of the word Logos from all others, especially its emphasis on flesh, which is here used as a symbol of humanity. He who was God then became truly man. The wording, dwelt among us, draws special attention to the residence of Christ in our midst for a limited period of time. It is significant that grace and truth are singled out as characteristics of Him, for these are biblical rather than philosophical terms, and show that John has no intention of treating the theme of his story in a speculative way. We have beheld his glory. At its face value this statement would be assumed to refer to an eyewitness observation, but some scholars take the first person plural to refer to Christians generally. Yet if glory was visibly seen, the former interpretation must be right. It may be that the glory was the transfiguration scene, but more likely that it was the moral splendour of the whole ministry, including especially the signs (cf. 2:11). John himself defines the glory as that of an only Son, which highlights the unique Sonship of Jesus. 15 He who comes after me. The parenthesis about John the Baptist is unexpected, but is intended to add greater strength to the witness. Ranks before me means that Jesus is superior to John in respect of His office. John was only the herald, whereas Jesus was the Messiah. He was before me. Cf. 8:58 as a testimony to Christ's pre-existence.

16 After the parenthesis of v. 15 the thought returns to the idea of fullness which must be compared with the similar idea in v. 14. While it is a Gnostic term, fullness is not here used in a technical sense. Grace upon grace seems to mean continuous grace, showing its inexhaustible quality. The preposition in the Greek is anti, which means 'in place of' or 'in exchange for', and this has led some to suppose that OT grace is exchanged for NT grace; but since John draws a distinction between law and grace this interpretation is unlikely. 17 The contrast between Moses and Jesus Christ lies in the method of approach to God. Obedience to law is clearly inferior to the simple acceptance of grace and truth. In this verse John identifies the Logos for the first time specifically as Jesus Christ.

18 The comparison between Moses and Christ is carried on, for it was inherent in the law that God was too holy to be approached directly and certainly could not be seen. Yet Christ has made Him known. The only Son. There is an alternative reading here, which has 'God' in place of 'Son', and this undoubtedly has the stronger MS support. Yet in view of the subsequent statement, 'who is in the bosom of the Father', the reading 'Son' seems more intelligible, especially with the adjective only (Gk. monogenēs). The alternative reading would have to be understood as an assertion of the deity of Jesus Christ. He has made him known. The verb means literally 'interpreted' or 'narrated'. Jesus Christ is the perfect exegete of God.

1:19 – 2:11 INTRODUCTORY EVENTS

1:19–34 The testimony of the Baptist

The witness of John has already twice been referred to in the prologue, but is now placed in a specific historical setting. 19 The occasion chosen is a deputation from some of the Jerusalem Jews with the challenge to John to declare his identity. 20 I am not the Christ. Importance is clearly attached to distinguishing the forerunner from the Messianic Person he had come to announce. 21 Are you Elijah? Some see in John's answer to this question a correction of the Synoptic tradition, since Matthew records our Lord's identification of John the Baptist with Elijah (Mt. 11:14; 17:12). But Jesus' comment shows that He was not identifying John with Elijah in the generally accepted sense of the term. John denies that he is the Elijah of current popular expectation; but Jesus asserts that he is Elijah in the true spiritual sense. Are you the prophet? It seems best to refer this to the expectation found in Dt. 18:15, of one who was to come. It does not appear to have been a Messianic title (cf. 7:40, 41). The enquirers were examining all the popular possibilities. 22, 23 What do you say about yourself? It is interesting to note that here John the Baptist is said to cite Is. 40:3, but in the Synoptics the words are not found on John's own lips. The difference is understandable, for in this Gospel the herald is obliged to give a self-identification, whereas each of the other Evangelists gives his own comment. There is no contradiction. Make straight the way of the Lord. The imagery is drawn from the practice of heralds clearing a path for the approaching king, an office of considerable importance. Although John is no more than a voice, he is herald of the Messiah Himself. 24 Now they had been sent from the Pharisees. John identifies the senders, referred to in v. 19 as Jews. The Pharisees were the party concerned about Messianic speculations. 25 The question now turns away from the Baptist himself to a demand for an explanation of his baptizing mission. The form of the question shows that the rite was being understood in the sense of an official sign of authority. But John the Baptist did not fit into any of the current expectations. This is why the official mind instinctively turned to the question of John's authority.

26 John's answer draws attention once again to the distinction between his work and Christ's. I baptize with water. Since water was the natural medium of baptism, this statement must be intended to contrast with a different kind of baptism to be practised by the Messiah. It is not, however, until v. 32 that the spiritual nature of His baptism is brought out. 27 The thong of whose sandal I am not worthy to untie. This remarkable self-effacement of John the Baptist bears eloquent testimony to his awareness of the tremendous superiority of the Messiah. To loose his master's latchet was a slave's task, which John does not consider himself worthy to perform. 28 Bethany beyond the Jordan, the place of John's baptizing activity, is carefully distinguished from another place of the same name mentioned in 11:1 as the village of Mary and Martha.

29 It is noticeable that in John 1 and 2 a series of chronological allusions are made which suggest that events covering six days are being recorded (cf. 1:29, 35, 43; 2:1). At the conclusion of the ministry John records another sequence covering six days (cf. the time reference in 12:1). Behold, the Lamb of God. Since this is John the Baptist's first personal introduction of Jesus to his followers, it is a startling statement. It is necessary to enquire what it meant to the hearers, to John and to Jesus Himself. To the hearers the idea of a lamb must at once have suggested the paschal lamb. The offering of lambs in Temple sacrifices was so familiar to Jewish minds that it would be difficult to think of the concept 'Lamb of God' apart from this. But the real difficulty occurs in the transference of the lamb imagery to a person. Whether the hearers connected this up with the servant concept in Is. 53 is doubtful, but it is by no means improbable that John himself did so. Indeed the full statement can only be fully understood against the background of both Ex. 29:38–46 and Is. 53:4–12. Such a synthesis must have been in the mind of Jesus as He listened to and accepted John's testimony concerning Him. Regarding the further statement, who takes away the sin of the world, there is some debate about the significance of the verb. The most natural understanding of the word would be in an expiatory sense. This would be supported by the evidence from Is. 53, where the idea of vicarious suffering is inescapable. It has been objected that the notion of 'bearing away' sin cannot here be present in view of the fact that the paschal lamb was not sacrificed as a sin-offering (cf. C. H. Dodd). Yet there is no need to suppose that John's statement must be rigidly interpreted in terms of the paschal lamb. It is clear that in the mind of the Evangelist this formed an important key to the ministry of Jesus which historically begins at this point. The baptism of Jesus, which John does not record, had already taken place (cf. v. 32). The impression is at once created of a universal redemptive mission of the most far-reaching kind.

Some scholars find difficulty in believing that John the Baptist spoke these words, particularly because at a later stage in the ministry of Jesus he expressed doubts about the Messiahship of Jesus. Various alternative suggestions have been proposed. Vincent Taylor sees a dramatic representation, R. H. Strachan an echo of an early Christian liturgical formula, and others an idea of the Evangelist attributed to John the Baptist. Yet it cannot be said to be impossible as a genuine utterance of John the Baptist unless it be denied that he could have had a passing glimpse of the majesty of Christ's mission consequent upon the enlightenment gained when Jesus was baptized. So penetrating a concept of Messiah's work would explain John's self-effacing devotedness to his own task.

30 There follows a repetition of the same statement as in v. 15, evidently intended to emphasize Jesus' superiority to John. 31 John's words, I myself did not know him (cf. v. 33), must be limited to knowledge of Him as the 'Coming One'. In stating the purpose of his baptizing mission, John shows that Messiah is to be revealed to Israel. It is significant that in this Gospel 'Israel' is never used in the adverse sense in which the word 'Jews' is used. 32 John's own testimony to the descent of the Spirit is marked by a more distinctive objective note than is found in the Synoptic accounts, for the Baptist claims here to have seen the bodily form. The dove may symbolize gentleness of character or may be used as an emblem of flight to show the reality of the Spirit's descent. The contrast between this and the visible manifestations of the Spirit's descent at Pentecost is striking (cf. Acts 2:2, 3). Both descents were intended to be extraordinary attestations to divine missions. 33 The baptizing with the Holy Spirit is specifically contrasted with baptizing with water in order to show the essentially different character of the Messiah's mission. 34 John the Baptist affirms that his testimony, based on what he has seen, is that Jesus is the Son of God. This links up with the conclusion of the prologue and shows again the divine status of the Messiah whose ministry is about to be recorded.

1:35–51 The calling of the first disciples

35, 36 The same announcement concerning the Lamb of God follows the next day without the descriptive clause (cf. v. 29). In this case it was the effect which the statement had on two of John's disciples which is brought into focus. No doubt the Baptist gave them more information about Jesus than his brief recorded statement contains. Yet brief as it is, its implications as mentioned above are far-reaching. The identity of one only of the two disciples is given, i.e. Andrew (see v. 40). The other may perhaps have been John. 37 They followed Jesus. Although sometimes used in a technical sense of becoming a disciple, the word 'follow' is here neutral and means 'pursuing'. 38 Jesus' question and the further question of the men in reply shows the latter's seriousness of purpose. Their clear intention was to attend on the mission and teaching of Jesus. They called Him Rabbi, which was a title generally given to scholars and teachers. This has led some to question whether it would have been used of one who was untrained in the official schools. But it is probably used here only in a general sense as a mark of respect. 39 The fact that it was about the tenth hour is stated as the reason for their staying with Jesus, but the note of time is strange. It would have been late afternoon, if John's reckoning is according to normal Jewish custom. If this were so the statement would perhaps imply a stay until next day. But on Roman reckoning it would be 10 a.m., which makes a stay 'that day' more intelligible. The point of John's reference to the hour, however, is more to draw attention to the serious contact between Jesus and His disciples than to provide precise chronological data. 40 Andrew, Simon Peter's brother. On two other occasions John mentions Andrew (cf. 6:8, 9; 12:22), in both of which flashes of insight are given into his character. 41 We have found the Messiah. It is noticeable that both here and in v. 38, John gives an interpretation of Jewish terms for the benefit of non-Jewish readers. No doubt the two disciples differed from Jesus in their ideas of what Messiahship involved. Some have seen here a contradiction of the Synoptic accounts which suggest that not until Caesarea Philippi was the Messiahship of Jesus recognized and even after this, especially in Mark's record, there were repeated exhortations to secrecy. Yet there is no need to suppose that the disciples had a fully developed notion of what Messiahship actually meant. 42 There is a marked emphasis on personal relationships in this next development related, involving Andrew, Simon and Jesus. Clearly John is inferring here that Peter received his special name Cephas at his first meeting with Jesus, although both Mark and Matthew mention it later in their accounts. Cephas was the Aramaic form equivalent to the Greek Peter. It should be noted that Jesus uses a future form of the verb, which could relate to the more official occasion referred to in Mt. 16:18. More probably, however, the Matthaean account is intended to bring out the theological significance of the name. Simon did not, in fact, become 'a stone' till he confessed Jesus as Christ. Cf. the way in which others become stones (see 1 Pet. 2:4, 5).

43 Another day sees more disciples added to the group of Jesus' followers, on this occasion in Galilee. In the case of Philip, Jesus takes the initiative. He is another disciple mentioned several times in John (cf. 6:5; 12:21; 14:8). He appears to have been a man with a practical frame of mind. There is no knowing whether Philip had met Jesus before, but if not, the call to follow must have come very abruptly to him. 44 The fact that Bethsaida is specially mentioned as the city from which Philip, Andrew and Peter all came suggests that Jesus was acquainted with them all previously and knew where to look for Philip. 45 We have found him of whom Moses in the law and also the prophets wrote. Many passages in the Pentateuch were regarded as Messianic by the Rabbis and the Christians interpreted various other passages in the same way. Philip had soon grasped the fact that Jesus of Nazareth, the One whom he knew as Joseph's son, was the expected Messiah. Nathanael has often been identified with Bartholomew, who is mentioned in the Synoptic list of apostles next to Philip. Since Nathanael is named with other apostles in Jn. 21:2, it is not improbable that this identification is correct. At the same time there is no certain knowledge that Nathanael was definitely an apostle. He was certainly highly esteemed by Jesus. 46 Can anything good come out of Nazareth? appears to be a proverbial saying, although no such saying appears elsewhere. It may at first seem strange that a Galilaean should repeat a saying derogatory to a Galilaean city. But Nazarenes appear to have had the type of character to give rise to such a proverb, if their treatment of Jesus is anything to go by.

47 The guilelessness of Nathanael is specifically mentioned as characteristic of a genuine Israelite. The statement, Behold, an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile!, implies that many Israelites were not guileless. Jesus may have been comparing him with Jacob, who was clearly in His mind in the statement in v. 51. 48 Nathanael's response is one of surprise, which deepens as Jesus converses with him. His question, How do you know me?, shows that his surprise springs from the fact that he had had no previous acquaintance with Jesus. In view of this, Jesus' answer shows a foreknowledge which deeply impressed Nathanael and led to the conviction that He was of supernatural origin. When you were under the fig tree, I saw you. The phrase may be illuminated by the rabbinic use of a similar expression for those who studied the Torah at home. On the other hand, the reference to the precise location may be mentioned simply to draw attention to the remarkable acquaintance of Jesus with Nathanael's movements. 49 Son of God . . . King of Israel. The order of these ascriptions is interesting, as it might have been supposed that they would have been reversed. But the combination of the two names significantly focuses on Kingship, since a true Israelite is seen to recognize at once his true King. The idea of divine Sonship was probably only rudimentary as far as Nathanael was concerned, but for the Evangelist this early testimony was important. It was to be often reiterated throughout the Gospel.

50 Greater things. These things are elucidated by v. 51, which points to a development of spiritual vision. 51 The double Truly, truly, which occurs several times in John, gives additional emphasis to the following statement. The vision of angels ascending and descending upon the Son of man is probably an echo from the story of Jacob (Gn. 28:12), but applied in a specific sense to our Lord. The meaning of this statement seems to be that heaven is now opened for continuous communication with men, the representative of whom is Christ Himself under the title of Son of man. It is remarkable that this title is substituted for Nathanael's 'Son of God'. The link between heaven and earth depends as much on the Mediator's human character as on the divine.

2:1–11 Revelation through signs

In John's Gospel various miracles are described as signs. There is a sequence of seven such signs which are narrated. Most of these lead into a discourse on a related theme. It is clear, therefore, that these signs are an integral part of the structure of the Gospel. The first one in some senses sets the stage for the rest. They are all interpreted as manifestations of Christ's glory (2:11).

1, 2 Cana in Galilee, where Jesus performed His first miracle at a village marriage feast, would have been about three days' journey from where John was baptizing. 3 They have no wine. It would have been regarded as an act of discourtesy for an eastern host to fail to provide wine for his guests. 4 O woman, what have you to do with me? My hour has not yet come. It may seem strange that Jesus should have spoken to His mother in this way, but His purpose is to correct an impression that must have been in Mary's mind, that Jesus might take His directions from her. His commands came only from the Father (as John's Gospel so frequently demonstrates). But the remark may alternatively be regarded as idiomatic, meaning 'Your ideas and interests are not Mine. My time for acting in the way you suggest has not yet come'. (Cf. Jn. 7:2–6, 10; Is. 55:8, 9.) The reference to the hour of Jesus is another characteristic of this Gospel (cf. 7:30; 8:20; 12:23, 27; 13:1; 17:1). It reveals an awareness of approaching crisis and climax, not only in the mind of the Evangelist, but also in the mind of Jesus. 6 Six stone jars. The fact that John explains the connection of the jars with Jewish purification rites suggests that a symbolic meaning may be intended. Some see the whole incident as a symbolic rather than a factual account, to portray the superiority of Christianity over Judaism. In this view, the water would represent the Torah, for which there is some warrant in rabbinic tradition. But it is better to see in the incident a demonstration of divine power in a domestic setting. Twenty or thirty gallons. The total quantity of water when all the jars were filled would have been over 100 gallons. It is not stated whether all the water was changed to wine, or only the water which was drawn off for the feast, but the latter is the more likely.

8, 9 The steward of the feast was the official in charge of the festivities. It has been suggested that sometimes one of the guests was appointed wine-taster (arbiter bibendi), in which case his ignorance of the source of the wine would have been more intelligible. 10 You have kept the good wine until now. This ran contrary to custom. But why is it referred to at all? The main point is the unexpected quality of the wine which may suggest the superiority of the Messianic provision over previous provision. 11 The first of his signs. The fact that John mentions the beginning (Gk. archē) of signs is important, because it shows that the apocryphal miracles of Jesus' childhood cannot be authentic. On the other hand, the 'first' here must be related to 4:54 where a 'second' sign is mentioned, also in Cana. It may be that the 'first' is the first of a series in Cana. In view, however, of the importance of 'signs' in this Gospel, a wider reference to all the miracles of Jesus is more probable. The two results of this sign are typical of all the 'signs' which John records, namely the manifestation of the glory of Jesus and the development of faith in the disciples. Signs are of no significance to those who have no readiness to see and hear.

2:12 – 4:54 EARLY ENCOUNTERS IN JERUSALEM, SAMARIA AND GALILEE

2:12–25 At Capernaum and Jerusalem

12 His brothers. There is no reason to suppose that these were other than the children of Mary subsequent to the birth of Jesus. This verse serves only as a link with the following passage, in which the time reference is more specific. 13 The Passover of the Jews. Some see here a description intended to distinguish the feast from the Christian Passover, but it is probably added for the benefit of non-Jewish readers. 14 In the temple. This would here refer to the outer court where animals were prepared for sacrifice. The details of the incident are graphically described, and differ in some respects from the record of the similar event in the Synoptic Gospels. It is only John who mentions that Jesus drove out oxen and sheep. The money-changers were the people who exchanged other currency for the official Temple currency. This was a legitimate pursuit, but was open to abuse since it offered opportunity for exorbitant exchange rates. 15 Jesus' use of a whip of cords was a symbolic act, for the scourge was a symbol of judgment. 16 You shall not make my Father's house a house of trade. Our Lord's claim that the Temple was His Father's house is a distinctive claim which fits in with His Messianic office. It was the threat that the traffickers made to true worship that Jesus challenged. 17 The appeal to Scripture (cf. Ps. 69:9) in support is characteristic of the early Christian approach. 18 What sign . . . ? The word 'sign' is here used in the general sense of 'miracle' and not in the more specific Johannine sense. 19 Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up. It is not surprising that the Jews misunderstood, for the statement is enigmatic. The explanation is given in v. 21, although even the disciples did not recognize this until after the resurrection of Jesus. 20 The statement was perplexing for the Jews, because of the considerable time taken to build the Temple thus far. It was not in fact completed until 36 years later. The contrast between forty-six years and three days was ludicrous to those who never imagined that Jesus was speaking symbolically. 21 But he spoke of the temple of his body. The application of the concept of a Temple to the body of Jesus is suggestive. Both were the dwelling-place of God. Some find difficulty in supposing that Jesus is referring to His own body, because there is no parallel reference to Jesus raising His own body. Accordingly the body is interpreted of the church. But the three days clearly refer to the resurrection of Christ. At the same time there is a close connection between the resurrection of Christ and the emergence of the church. 22 His disciples remembered. After the resurrection the disciples not only recalled but understood the significance of many things not previously grasped. It is worth noting that memory led to faith both in Scripture and in the statement of Jesus, a reminder of the close connection of these in the thought of the early Christians. The word of Jesus was placed on a level with Scripture in the faith of the disciples.

23–25 The passage closes with a general statement regarding happenings at the Passover Feast and the emphasis is again on the close connection between signs and faith. John's purpose, stated in 20:30, 31, furnishes the key. The signs recorded are in order that the readers might come to faith in Jesus as the Christ and Son of God. But here there is an unexpected consideration—Jesus' hesitation to trust them. Although some faith had been exercised, Jesus knew its unworthy character and its fickleness. The statement, he knew all men, draws attention to a supernatural knowledge of human motives. Jesus did not need advice from others, because His own knowledge was already perfect. The Nicodemus incident which immediately follows this illustrates the statement.

3:1–21 The new birth

1 A man of the Pharisees. John has much to say about the Pharisees throughout the Gospel, generally in an adverse sense. But here he writes about a Pharisee who had a serious purpose in seeking Jesus. He was, moreover, a man of some importance, since he was a member of the Sanhedrin. This would account for his reluctance to be seen openly approaching Jesus. 2 He addressed Him as a teacher come from God. Not all Jewish teachers had the evidence of a divine commissioning, for their authority was derived from the tradition of the Schools. It is noticeable that Nicodemus recognized the stamp of God upon Jesus by the character of the signs. They were, in fact, authenticating. 3 Unless one is born anew. The word translated

'anew' could be rendered 'from above' (see mg.), which would draw attention not only to the need for rebirth, but also to the spiritual character of it. It is probable that Jesus had in mind this latter significance, but that Nicodemus missed the force of it, as his reply suggests. Many of the early Fathers understood the statement to refer to baptism, supported by the further statement in v. 5. The kingdom of God. An expression not used much in John but occurring frequently in the Synoptics in the teaching of Jesus. It primarily refers not to the sphere over which God rules, but to the sovereignty which He exercises. The connection of the kingdom idea with regeneration is important, because it describes the essentially spiritual character of God's kingdom. In an age when many materialistic and political notions of kingship were predominant, this idea of a spiritual kingdom would have been difficult for a Jew to accept. It should be noted that 'seeing the kingdom' here and 'entering the kingdom' in v. 5 are so closely parallel as to be inseparable. If any distinction is to be made it must be that 'entering' is a positive development from 'seeing', involving a definite decision. On the other hand only those who take the step of faith to enter can be said in any real sense to 'see' the kingdom. 'Seeing' in this sense may be understood as experiencing (cf. v. 36). The new birth is prior to and not consequent upon the 'seeing'.

4 Can he enter a second time into his mother's womb? It is surprising to find so literalistic an interpretation of Jesus' statement in the mind of a Jewish leader, who could not have been entirely ignorant of the concept of spiritual regeneration. Was he being serious? Or was he desiring to make Jesus' statement look absurd? It is more probable that he was in a genuine difficulty, because the transformation of people who have reached the age of maturity and have settled into fixed habits cannot be imagined along natural lines. The only alternative that Nicodemus could think of was an entirely new beginning, which was nevertheless a physical impossibility. 5 Unless one is born of water and the Spirit. Some consider that 'water' refers to baptism and 'the Spirit' to regeneration. If this is correct, it must have been connected in the mind of Nicodemus with the baptism of repentance practised by John the Baptist. If those who submitted to John's baptism considered themselves reborn, it was necessary for them to learn that the outward rite was insufficient without spiritual regeneration. Another possibility is that 'water' refers to natural birth, and if this interpretation is correct it would follow naturally from Nicodemus' question. But the major difficulty with this exegesis is that no parallel exists to support the connection of water-birth with physical birth. Moreover, the former view is more in keeping with the close connection between water-baptism and Spirit-baptism elsewhere (cf. 1:33; Mt. 3:11). There is little doubt that the emphasis in the present statement lies on 'Spirit' and not on 'water', as vv. 6–8 show, but the connection between the two is close. 6 Flesh . . . Spirit. Here is an antithesis which frequently occurs in the Epistles of Paul, although the word 'flesh' is not here used, as so often in Paul, in a moral sense. It seems rather to refer to the physical and external as contrasted with the spiritual and essential. Our Lord is pointing out that the character of those born is determined by the source that gives them birth. 7 You must be born anew. In this repetition of the need for spiritual regeneration the statement assumes an imperative force. There is nothing optional about spiritual rebirth.

8 The wind blows where it wills. There are two ways of understanding this statement, since the word for 'wind' is the same as that for 'Spirit'. When understood in this latter sense it would imply that the Spirit breathes where He wills, so stressing the sovereign character of His operation. But to recognize a reference to the wind is the more natural interpretation, since both in its apparent unpredictability and in its invisibility the wind serves as a useful illustration of the activities of the Spirit. The miracle of new birth cannot be arranged by human ingenuity. Its operation is beyond human control. 10 A teacher of Israel. Since the Greek has the definite article, the 'teacher' must be taken in a representative sense. The whole class of those who claimed to be teachers of Israel is represented by Nicodemus, who ought to have understood but failed to do so. 11 It is significant how often in John's Gospel misunderstandings lead to further elucidations, as here. We speak of what we know. Jesus clearly distinguishes Himself from the rabbinical teachers and implies the lack of authoritative teaching on their part. But why does He use the plural instead of the singular? It may be that He is including His disciples, although at this stage they had come to know very little. It is possible to regard the plural as adding strength to the statement, in the style used sometimes by the apostle Paul. Some have suggested that the 'we' includes the prophetical witnesses, but this seems unnatural. Others consider the Father and the Spirit are included and there is less objection to this. The words, you do not receive, illustrate the general statements of 1:5, 10, 11. 12 Earthly things . . . heavenly things. The 'earthly things' must be related to the previous disclosures, in which case they include spiritual truths, such as the new birth. The 'heavenly things' would then be those truths which cannot be fully revealed on earth. 13 No one has ascended . . . but he who descended. Since the first verb is in the perfect and not in the future, it cannot easily refer to the ascension of Jesus. Most scholars take it therefore to refer to the state from which Jesus descended and to which He returned at His ascension. The descending certainly refers to the incarnation. The concluding statement is in some MSS 'the Son of man who is in heaven', but the best MSS have 'Son of man' without further description. The additional phrase does not readily fit into the context. It could be interpreted only as a reference to the pre-existence of Christ and could underline His heavenly authority which nevertheless has already been emphasized. 14 As Moses. The incident in the OT of Moses and the brazen serpent (Nu. 21:8, 9) is cited to illustrate the earthly work of the Son of man. The uplifting clearly refers to the cross and not to glorification. 15 The real force of the analogy is in the necessity for faith. It is important to notice that the uplifting of the Son of man is stated as an imperative necessity. It was for this purpose that He came. The reference to eternal life may be compared with 'life in his name' (20:31), which John mentions in stating the purpose of his Gospel. The adjective eternal expresses the indestructibility of the life received.

16ff. There is some dispute as to whether the next passage is a continuation of Jesus' discourse or a comment by the Evangelist. The conjunction 'for' would seem to suggest a connection with the previous discourse and rather favours the view that it is Jesus speaking. 16 The statement that God so loved the world shows the object of God's love to be universal. The expression of that love is sacrificial. The purpose of it is eternal life for believers, who must otherwise perish. It is no wonder that this verse has been described as 'the gospel in a nutshell'. The tense used for the verb have shows that believers have a present possession of life. The two following verses elucidate the same theme. 17 The purpose of the Son's mission was not condemnation but salvation; 18 but this salvation is available only for those who believe. The specific object of faith is stated to be the name of the only Son of God. This again connects with the purpose of the Gospel (20:31), while the adjective only (cf. v. 16) echoes the prologue (cf. 1:18). 19 Another allusion to the prologue is seen in the introduction of the antithesis between light and darkness (cf. 1:5). Evil deeds are specifically linked with darkness, and judgment follows as a result of men's preference for darkness rather than light. There is an implied contrast between God loving the world (cf. v. 16) and men loving darkness. 20 Lest his deeds should be exposed. Man's love of darkness is not for its own sake, but because of what it can hide. On the other hand, those whose deeds are true welcome light because of what it can reveal. 21 He who does what is true. Such phraseology is found in rabbinic writings. It implies worthy moral actions. The last clause of v. 21 can be understood as expressing either the content of what is seen, i.e. that his deeds have been wrought in God, or the reason why he comes to the light, i.e. because his deeds have been wrought in God. The former presents a better parallel to v. 20.

3:22 – 4:3 Jesus and John the Baptist

22–24 Here the narrative resumes and a historical connection is stated between John's activity and that of Jesus. It is significant that at this period of the mission John's baptizing runs concurrent with that of Jesus and His disciples. The Synoptic Gospels, with which John at this point runs parallel, show that Jesus continued the same message of repentance that John had preached. The fact that John's imprisonment had not yet taken place makes clear that the events so far recalled were prior to the Synoptic narratives (cf. Mk. 1:14).

25–30 John's testimony to Jesus is called forth by a dispute. His disciples are mystified by the apparent competition caused by the baptismal activity of Jesus and His followers. 27 No one can receive anything except what is given him from heaven. What connection has this with the comment of John's disciples? It may draw attention to the fact that John's disciples are giving him more supremacy than God intended, which would well suit the context. Or it may express the divine authority of Jesus, which John could not take away. 28, 29 John shows his own function to be merely preparatory, like the work of the bridegroom's friend. His task is to attend to the happiness of the bridegroom. The bridal imagery is found in Jesus' teaching in the Synoptics (cf. Mt. 22:1ff.; 25:1ff.). The idea of the church as the bride of Christ is found explicitly elsewhere, especially in Eph. 5:22ff. 30 He must increase. This reiterates the superiority of Jesus already emphasized in ch. 1. It is not only John who must decrease, but the whole of the old order which he represented.

31ff. The concluding section of the chapter could be either the words of John the Baptist or of the Evangelist. The latter is the preferable interpretation. The passage sets out the superiority of the One whom God has sent. a. 31 He is from above and above all, i.e. in distinction from the earth, which means that earthly methods of assessing His importance are invalid; b. 32 His testimony is based on personal experience; c. His testimony is generally rejected, 33 but those who receive it not only give credence to the message of Jesus, but also authenticate the source of the message as utterly trustworthy. 34 God can commission His Son to speak only what is in accord with His own nature. For it is not by measure that he gives the Spirit. It is not clear from the Greek whether it is God who gives the Spirit, or Christ, or whether it is the Spirit who does the giving. In the last case the gift must be the words of God. It seems best to take God as the subject, in the sense that He endues those whom He sends with the Holy Spirit in abundant measure. 'Not by measure' would then mean 'unrestrictedly'. This interpretation is supported by v. 35, which speaks of the Father's gifts to the Son. 35 The fact that God has given all things into his hand shows the supremacy of Christ, not only in the created order, but in all spheres (cf. 5:22, 27; 5:26; 12:49; 17:2; 17:24). 36 The concluding sentence in this chapter is an echo with some variations of v. 15. The disobedient are here said not only to lack the possession of life ('seeing life' is idiomatic for experiencing it), but also to incur the wrath of God. The result is thus stated both negatively and positively. The idea of wrath is active and its occurrence here should be compared with John the Baptist's use of it in Mt. 3:7 and Lk. 3:7. It is God's judgment in action. In the phrase rests upon him the verb suggests a present and continuous abiding.

4:1–3 There is a return to the historic situation to account for Jesus' departure from Judea. It was because of probable repercussions from Pharisaic sources over Jesus' having greater impact than John the Baptist. John they just tolerated, but Jesus was clearly going to be a more serious threat to them. The use of the title Lord is unexpected and perplexing in view of the following use of the name Jesus. The variant text which reads 'Jesus' in both places is understandable, but may have arisen through the desire to remove the title 'Lord' from the narrative because it is unfamiliar in John. If the title is original it reflects the high esteem of the Evangelist for Jesus. 2 (Jesus himself did not baptize . . .) This parenthesis is added to correct the Pharisees' report.

4:4–42 Jesus in Samaria

4 He had to pass through Samaria. The verb suggests necessity. It was the quick route from Jerusalem to Galilee and anyone taking this route could not avoid Samaria. 6 Jacob's well was there. This was at Sychar, commonly identified as Shechem. The significance of Jacob to the Samaritans is seen in v. 12. And so Jesus, wearied as he was with his journey, sat down beside the well. The importance of this statement lies in the human tiredness of Jesus. In a Gospel setting out to lead to faith in the Son of God, the human touches have more than usual meaning. The mention of the hour adds colour to the story. On Jewish reckoning the sixth hour would be noon.

7 A woman of Samaria. To a Jew there would be a double prejudice in this encounter—on grounds of sex and of race. 8 John mentions the absence of the disciples in order to throw into greater relief the uniqueness of the following conversation between Jesus and such a woman. 9 The strangeness of Jesus' request for a drink prompts the woman to ask a reason and leads immediately to Jesus' comment about the gift of God. The woman would no doubt have recognized that Jesus was a Jew by His speech. For Jews have no dealings with Samaritans. This may be regarded either as the Evangelist's comment or as a continuation of the woman's question. In either case it explains the surprise of the woman. The verb means 'to use together with' and some scholars have supposed that this refers to the prohibition of common use of vessels. But a Jewish regulation to this effect is no earlier than AD 65 or 66. Relations between the two races were certainly not good. 10 If you knew the gift of God. The word for gift (Gk. dōrea), whenever it is used in Acts or in the Epistles, is always used of a divine gift. The gift in mind here is the Spirit of God, as always in the book of Acts. There is a close connection between living water and the Spirit in 7:37–39. And who it is. The gift of the Spirit can be bestowed only by Jesus. If only the woman had known that He had power to impart such a gift, she would have changed her request. Living water. The Rabbis spoke of the law in terms of water and the figurative use of the idea is found in the OT (cf. Pr. 13:14; Je. 17:13; Zc. 14:8). 11 But the woman fails to understand and takes the expression literally. The well is deep. It was incongruous to her that Jesus could offer her water without the use of a bucket. 12 Such a feat would outdo Jacob who dug the well in the first place. It is always difficult for people to conceive that anyone could be greater than a venerated patriarch from the distant past (cf. 8:53 for a similar remark regarding Abraham). There is here a touch of fanatical veneration of a sacred site because of its associations rather than its abundant supply. The word for 'well' used by the woman (Gk. phrear) describes the masonry construction, but Jesus uses in v. 14 the word for 'spring' (Gk. pēgē), thus describing the water itself. 13, 14 Jesus brings out the contrast between water which temporarily quenches thirst and that which does so permanently. The latter is infinitely superior, particularly as it leads to eternal life. With unerring insight Jesus perceived the basic spiritual character of the woman's need. 15 But any understanding of His teaching on her part was non-existent, for she conjured up the possibility of never again coming to draw from Jacob's well. There was, in fact, a moral blockage in her understanding.

In the next section of the story the dialogue becomes more personal. 16 Go, call your husband, and come here is intentionally abrupt. It precipitated a crisis in the conversation. The woman was obliged to face reality. 17 You are right in saying, 'I have no husband' is Jesus' commendation of her confession, although in some respects it involved an evasion. It enabled Him to face her with both her past and her present life. 18 Five husbands. The Rabbis did not approve of more than three marriages. 19 Sir, I perceive that you are a prophet. She acknowledges at once the insight of Jesus and considers that He must be a seer to know so much. 20 Our fathers worshipped on this mountain. The woman turns the conversation from her own moral problem to a fundamental religious problem. Worship was closely linked to a sacred place; to a Samaritan it was Mt. Gerizim and to a Jew, Jerusalem. Why should one be preferable to the other? It was more comfortable to turn from a matter of conscience to a matter of religious controversy. 21 Yet Jesus graciously takes up the point. The hour is coming. The present hour may be one of controversy, but an hour of certainty is imminent, an hour when it will be realized that the aspect which gives genuineness to worship is spiritual, not local (cf. v. 23). The controversy over locality is entirely irrelevant. 22 Of more importance was the object of worship and here the Jews were superior to the Samaritans in their spiritual comprehension. We worship what we know, for salvation is from the Jews. The Jews had a much fuller revelation than the Samaritans, since the latter restricted themselves to the Pentateuch. Since the neuter 'what' is used, attention is drawn more to the essence than to the person of the object of worship. 23 But the hour . . . now is. This brings the previous statement in v. 21 to the present. There is nothing now to prevent anyone, Jew or Samaritan, from worshipping in spirit and truth. The linking of spirit with truth throws light on the meaning of 'true worshippers'. These are genuine worshippers as opposed to those who merely appear to be so by participating only in outward ceremonies. The main emphasis is on spirit, as the following verse shows. For such the Father seeks to worship him. The basic reason why true worship must be spiritual is found in the nature of God. He can seek as worshippers only those who accord with His own nature. 24 Hence the next profound statement about that nature: God is spirit. This must refer to His essential character. The spirituality of God was not an alien idea to the Jews, but they had not recognized the need for correspondence between worshippers and the One worshipped. 25 It was probably because the Samaritan woman found herself out of her depth that she self-consciously introduced the subject of the Messiah as one who will be able to clarify these issues. There is some question about the extent to which Samaritans were acquainted with Messianic hopes. Their ideas may have been vague, but this woman was, at least, looking for a Revealer, i.e. a Prophet (cf. Dt. 18:15). 26 I who speak to you am he. There is no reserve on Jesus' part in admitting that He was a Messiah of that kind, although the Synoptics often record such reserve. There was no fear of political repercussions when Jesus was among Samaritans as there may well have been among Jews. This would sufficiently account for the difference of approach. Here was a personal revelation of the Messiah to one who clearly had some expectancy and was therefore prepared for such a revelation.

27, 28 The return of the disciples from their errand to buy food (cf. v. 8) had a double effect. It caused them to marvel at what they saw—Jesus talking to a woman—and it caused the woman to leave her jar and go to the city. The marvelling may have been occasioned by the disciples' knowledge that Jewish Rabbis were not permitted to speak to women in the street. What do you wish? more literally means 'What do you seek?', implying that the only reason for the conversation must have been because Jesus was asking the woman for something (cf. v. 7). The disciples seem too embarrassed to enquire. Their eventual somewhat nervous exhortation that Jesus should eat (v. 31) bears this out. 29 Come, see a man who told me all that I ever did. It was the Lord's penetrating discernment of her moral condition which had impressed her most, in spite of the fact that she had sidetracked the issue. Conscience became more awakened as conversation had proceeded on other lines, as so often happens. Can this be the Christ? The form of the question in the Greek suggests that she cannot bring herself to believe it. It might be translated, 'Surely this cannot be the Christ?' 30 The question, however, aroused immediate interest in the hearers.

31ff. Jesus' discussion with the disciples forms a sort of interlude which is nonetheless closely linked to the main narrative. 32 In reply to the offer of food Jesus turns the conversation to spiritual issues: I have food to eat of which you do not know. Both pronouns are emphatic and draw attention to the strong contrast between Jesus and His disciples. 33 They can think only in materialistic terms. Since Jesus had no food when they left, someone else must have given Him some. Perhaps they thought the woman had done so. 34 My food is to do the will of him who sent me, and to accomplish his work. The principle here enunciated seems to be that doing God's will must take precedence over physical food, although Jesus is not here advocating neglect of physical needs. As so often in this Gospel, the Lord's deep consciousness of His mission comes to the fore. He cannot be satisfied until He has accomplished it, i.e. brought it to completion. 35 The reference to the harvest is intended to illustrate the accomplishing of the work. It is not predictable on a chronological basis like the natural harvest, in which the time of harvest can be calculated after the seed has been sown. But there is a spiritual harvest which is not governed by seasons. Lift up your eyes, and see. Did Jesus mean this literally or not? If He did, what were the whitened fields? It may be that He and the disciples could see the Samaritans coming towards them up the hill and He regarded them as the spiritual harvest from the seed already sown in the mind of the woman. Otherwise the words can be taken metaphorically as an exhortation to use spiritual discernment in seeking opportunity of bringing others. 36, 37 He who reaps receives wages, and gathers fruit for eternal life. Our Lord is here elucidating the illustration by pointing out a fundamental spiritual principle, i.e. that the reaper deserves a reward, but He links this with the reminder that no reaper can reap apart from the sower. 38 I sent you to reap. Jesus reminds the disciples that their recent and present experiences owe much to the labours of others. The word for labour is that used for heavy toil. The others to whom Jesus refers are those who have prepared the way for Christ. This principle means that no single individual can claim all the credit in a spiritual mission.

39 Many Samaritans from that city believed in him. Since the message of the woman was mainly based on the extraordinary insight of Jesus, the content of the faith of these Samaritans was necessarily limited. 40, 41 Yet after a further two days of personal contact with Jesus many more believed and it must be supposed that their faith was deeper in content. 42 Indeed this fuller faith is seen from their confession, we know that this is indeed the Saviour of the world. No doubt Jesus had explained much to them about the essential purpose of His mission, but their idea of Saviourhood would naturally fall far short of the more developed ideas of Paul (cf. his use of the same title in Phil. 3:20).

4:43–54 Return to Galilee

43–45 The section is intended to mark the transition from Samaria to Galilee and to comment on the reception that Jesus received in Galilee. The saying about a prophet's honour in his own country, which is clearly proverbial, occurs also in the Synoptic Gospels, but there his own country is Galilee, while here it appears to be Judea. The warm reception given to Jesus by the Galilaeans supports the interpretation. It should be noted that in Mk. 6:4 and Mt. 13:57 the saying is given as our Lord's words in direct speech, but here the Evangelist gives a reported statement. Alternatively the Evangelist may be contrasting the success in Samaria and in Jerusalem with the general reception in Galilee, and especially in Nazareth, as known from the Synoptics. In that case there is special point in John's mentioning that He was welcomed by those who had been at the feast, i.e. who had had experience of Jesus outside His own country. On the other hand, for a Jew a prophet's country was generally regarded to be Jerusalem. Hence signs in Jerusalem would deeply impress the Galilaeans.

The second recorded sign also takes place at Cana. 46 An official whose son was ill. Both the word for official (Gk. basilikos), an officer in the king's service, and the reference to his son distinguish this miracle from the similar healing of the centurion's servant (Mt. 8:5–10; Lk. 7:2–10). There are other differences which make identification of the incidents difficult. It is better, therefore, to treat them separately. 47, 48 The official's urgent pleading for Jesus to go to his son brings a surprising response: Unless you see signs and wonders you will not believe. Jesus knew the man's mind. He knew that true faith was not present. Perhaps there was a kind of magical belief which could exist only if propped up by sight. This statement shows the ineffectiveness of signs which are regarded as no more than wonders.

49 It is astonishing how quickly the man responds to Jesus' challenge. After a further respectful request that Jesus should come, 50 he at once reacts when Jesus tells him to go, for his son lives. The man believed the word that Jesus spoke to him. No longer did he require to see anything. The rebuff of v. 48 had been wholly effective.

51–53 The conclusion of the incident draws attention both to the timing of the healing and more particularly to its completeness. The effect of the father's discovery that the healing was at the precise hour of Jesus' assurance, and was also instantaneous, was faith for himself and his household. The sign had, in fact, led to more faith in Jesus. 52 The seventh hour. On Jewish reckoning this would be 1 p.m., but on Roman reckoning 7 p.m., which is more probable in view of the reference to 'yesterday'.

5:1–47 HEALING AND DISCOURSE IN JERUSALEM

5:1–18 Christ makes the lame to walk

1 After this there was a feast of the Jews. Since the feast is unnamed, it is impossible to be certain of its identity. The reason for its being mentioned here is probably to account for Jesus' presence in Jerusalem after being for so short a time in Galilee. 2 There is some dispute about the identity of the pool, for some suggest the Pool of Siloam, and others the Virgin's Well. Some texts call the place the Sheep Pool. The most important detail is the number of porticoes which could hold a great many ill people waiting for healing from the medicinal waters. 3, 4 It should be noted that the latter part of v. 3 and the whole of v. 4 in AV is omitted from RSV on the basis of good textual authority. 5, 6 When Jesus saw him and knew that he had been lying there a long time. John tells us the illness was of thirty-eight years' standing. It was evidently common knowledge. Perhaps the man was in the habit of advertising the fact to rouse the sympathy of the bystanders. Jesus' question, Do you want to be healed? suggests the need for a pointed challenge to rouse him from apathy. 7 It is striking that he gives no direct answer to the question. When the water is troubled. Although there is no other evidence to support the view that the waters when disturbed possessed curative properties, it is certainly not impossible that many people believed that they did. The point of the man's complaint was the impossibility of getting himself into the pool during the brief spells when the waters were believed to be curative. 8 Rise, take up your pallet, and walk. Jesus does not comment on the popular belief. His command would have seemed incredible to the curious bystanders, 9 but the man must immediately have felt new strength come to him which made response possible.

Now that day was the sabbath. This statement supplies the key to the sequel. Here was the first open violation of the sabbath by Jesus in Jerusalem. 10 Jewish casuistry is vividly seen in the objection made by the Jewish critics. To carry the pallet was regarded as an act of work. According to the Mishnah, a couch could be carried only if it had a man on it. Although it is the healed man who is here criticized, it is, in fact, an indirect attack on Jesus Himself (cf. v. 16). 11, 12 The discussion between the healed man and the Jews over the identity of the healer is interesting because of his complete ignorance. He gets no nearer than to describe Jesus as the man who healed me. So far the miracle was not a means of revelation to him. 13 For Jesus had withdrawn. His withdrawal from the crowds was most probably to avoid popular acclaim. 14 It also gave Him an opportunity to seek out the man for a personal encounter. See, you are well! Sin no more, that nothing worse befall you. There appears to be here a distinction between physical healing and moral disorder. It could be that there was a definite connection between the man's illness and his moral life, although this is left undefined. Alternatively, the moral disorder may have had nothing to do with the illness, and the worse thing may be understood as spiritual lameness. The imperative is in the present tense—'do not continue in sin'. 15 The man went away and told the Jews. What was his motive in doing this? Probably it was his Jewish sense of duty in obeying instructions. He knew the hostility of the Jews, but his action shows little sense of gratitude to Jesus. 16 The immediate result was persecution. 17 The position was further aggravated by Jesus' statement: My Father is working still, and I am working. The connection of thought seems to be that the healing act was evidence of divine activity, which supersedes human regulations. There is no difference between the works of the Father and the works of Jesus. They are exactly similar in character. 18 The Jewish objectors recognized this as a claim to equality with God. To the Jewish mind this would, of course, be a more serious offence than breaking the sabbath. It challenged their basic monotheism.

5:19–47 The Father and the Son

The implications of the statement in v. 17 are now worked out more fully. Jesus' teaching is aimed to show the essential unity between the Father and the Son. 19 Truly, truly. This gives solemn endorsement to the following statement. It should be noted that the absolute use of Son in this passage follows from the relationship implied in the words of v. 17. The reasons why the Son does nothing of His own accord are stated in four steps: a. 19 the Son acts precisely like the Father; b. 20 the Father shows the Son His plans; c. 21 the Son, like the Father, has power to give life; d. 22 the Son has been given authority for judgment by the Father. Two specific purposes of all this co-ordinate activity are mentioned—20 that you may marvel and 23 that all may honour the Son, even as they honour the Father. The first of these would be misleading apart from the second. Jesus was no sensational wonder-worker, but some of the Jews to whom He was speaking had not yet even reached the position of marvelling at His works. 20 For the Father loves the Son. It is important to note that the basis of unity between the Father and Son is love. This is the reason for the sharing of all plans. 21 As the Father raises the dead. In both the OT and rabbinical literature, this power is attributed to God. In this statement either physical or spiritual resurrection may be intended, but v. 25 must be understood spiritually and vv. 28, 29 physically. 23 He who does not honour the Son does not honour the Father who sent him. This was a pointed challenge to the Jews, who were nonetheless professing to honour the Father.

24 A second important utterance is introduced by another Truly, truly. This relates to the effect of hearing and believing, i.e. eternal life. There is a close link between hearing the teaching of Jesus and believing Him who sent Jesus. Faith springs from a recognition of the divine mission of Jesus and therefore the divine authority of His words. From death to life. The Greek is more vivid: 'out of death'. Death and life are thought of as two distinct spheres. Faith is the means by which men pass from one to the other.

25ff. Another statement is introduced by the same strong formula, in this case concerning the coming resurrection. It is just possible that the reference to the dead may include those raised physically by Jesus, but the words and now is seem to be against that interpretation. It is noticeable that Jesus uses the title Son of God when speaking of resurrection and 27 Son of man when speaking of judgment. The second title, unlike the first, has no articles in the Greek, and must be interpreted generally of His character as true man. Judgment will be executed by One who knows man. 28 The hour is coming. This 'hour' is evidently different from the 'hour' in v. 25, for here it is the final physical resurrection which is in mind. 29 There is a contrast between resurrection of life and resurrection of judgment, the reason for which is the fact that those who possess life are considered to have been judged already, whereas evil-doers have nothing but judgment to anticipate.

The concluding section of the chapter gives a discourse of Jesus on the subject of the nature of the testimony to Himself. It is set forth in various steps.

5:30, 31 Jesus disclaims self-testimony. This is excluded as far as He is concerned because His will is identical to the will of Him who sent Him. Indeed, self-witness would be false witness. The statement in 8:14 does not contradict this, for there Jesus is not considering, as here, the impossible hypothesis of a witness by the Son which conflicted with the witness of the Father.

5:33–35 The testimony of John is valuable but insufficient. 33 He has borne witness to the truth. John's testimony, because it was true, led men to Jesus. Such testimony cannot be decried. 35 The witness was through a brilliant lamp, which must nevertheless be distinguished from the light itself. There was a popular rejoicing—yet over John's own light. 34 Even so, had men believed his testimony they would have been saved.

5:36–38 Testimony to Jesus comes from a greater witness. 36 Jesus next appeals to the testimony of His works. These works are of a special nature because the Father had commissioned them. The works should bear witness, therefore, to the One who commissioned. This is why the witness of Jesus' doings is greater than that of John's words. Yet the testimony had fallen on unproductive soil. 37 In spite of the Father's voice which had spoken through the Son's deeds, they had not heard it nor seen any evidence of Him in those deeds. 38 The plain fact was that, through unbelief, God's word did not abide in them. The 'word' refers primarily to the Scriptures, as the next verse shows.

5:39–47 Testimony to Jesus comes also through the Scriptures. 39 You search the scriptures. The words could be understood as an imperative. The indicative is better, however, because Jesus proceeds to show their ignorance of the true meaning of Scripture. The word 'search' is strong and means thorough investigation, an appropriate description of the Jewish approach to the law. Yet they missed the real aim of Scripture—to bear witness to Christ. 40 You refuse to come to me. This implies a deliberate rejection of the testimony. 41 I do not receive glory from men is stated to explain the absence of official sanction for His mission. This idea is elucidated in v. 43. 42 You have not the love of God within you could mean man's love for God or God's love for man, or perhaps both. 44 Those who love God will seek God's glory, not their own, but by their attitude to Jesus it is clear that the Jews were not doing this. Indeed, it is a moral impossibility to seek one's own glory and God's glory at one and the same time. 45 It is Moses who accuses you. For the Torah-loving Jews, this was a bitter statement. The very Torah itself exposed their inconsistency. There were Messianic germs in the Pentateuch which pointed to Christ. 46 For he wrote of me. The Jews did not lack enthusiasm in studying the Torah, but they lacked insight into its true significance. 47 It was no wonder they did not believe the words of Jesus.

6:1–71 FURTHER SIGNS AND DISCOURSES IN GALILEE

6:1–15 The feeding of the multitude

This is the only miracle performed by Jesus recorded in all four Gospels. For this reason only the salient features of John's account will be mentioned. 1 The Sea of Tiberias. It was probably not popularly known by this name in Jesus' day as the town by that name was not established until AD 22, but John is familiar with it. 2 Because they saw the signs. John accounts for the dimension of the crowd on the basis of signs, in which he has special interest. The signs led men to seek for Jesus. 3 Jesus went up into the hills. It would seem from v. 15 that He must have come down again to perform the miracle. The expression is probably used generally of hilly districts. 4 The Passover. The reason why John mentions this is not at once apparent. He probably attached significance to the connection of the miracle with the spiritual teaching about the heavenly bread which formed the basis of the Christian 'Passover' (cf. v. 51).

5 One difference from the Synoptic accounts is that they record the disciples taking the initiative, whereas John records that Jesus Himself first drew attention to the need for food. His question was addressed to Philip, who is mentioned on three other occasions in this Gospel (1:43ff.; 12:21f.; 14:8f.). 6 John's comment here should not be regarded as the Evangelist's attempt to avoid the imputation of ignorance to Jesus, but as an instance of his insight into the divine nature of Jesus. The details of the arrangements for the crowds to sit down and for the multiplication of the loaves are closely parallel to the Synoptic accounts. 8 A distinctive feature of John is the special mention of Andrew. One tradition had it that Andrew was associated with John in the production of the Gospel (cf. 1:44; 12:21, where he is also mentioned in connection with Philip).

11 When he had given thanks. All the Synoptic Gospels say that Jesus looked up to heaven, then blessed and broke the bread. John's term seems to summarize the first two actions, while definitely omitting the third. The verb used here (Gk. eucharisteō) is used by all the other Evangelists in their account of the institution of the Lord's Supper. This is the more noteworthy because John himself does not record that institution. 13 The baskets, which were light wicker baskets, were easily carried. 14 When the people saw the sign. Here John uses his special word to describe the miracle, but it need not be supposed that the people themselves recognized it as a sign in the fullest sense. They certainly were impressed, however, as their reference to the prophet shows. The coming prophet is an allusion to Dt. 18:15. For these people it probably had Messianic connections, as v. 15 indicates. 15 The plan to make Jesus King is not recorded in the other Gospels, but it explains features of Matthew's and Mark's narratives, e.g. the necessity for Jesus to constrain His disciples to get into the boat. Jesus is again seen to have powers of perceiving human motives.

6:16–21 The walking on the water

This is not specifically described by John as a sign, nor is any indication given of any results which followed it. Yet it seems reasonable to regard it as one of John's sequence of seven signs. 17 The fact that Jesus had not yet come to them suggests that they had a prearranged rendez-vous with Him. 19 They saw Jesus walking on the sea. It is indisputable that John intends his readers to understand a miraculous happening in spite of certain interpretations of v. 21 (q.v.). 20 It is I, do not be afraid. This is not one of the great 'I am' statements, although it shares the same form in the Greek. The message is clear—fear is banished by the realization of the presence of Jesus. 21 Immediately the boat was at the land. Some have suggested that Jesus was on the shore all along, but that the disciples thought He was on the sea. But would they have been frightened had this been the case? They were no doubt nearer the shore than they thought.

6:22–59 Discussions at Capernaum

to explain how many of those who witnessed the feeding of the multitudes were present at Capernaum to hear the discussions. John intends his readers to connect the discussions with the sign.

25 Rabbi, when did you come here? This opening question reveals their surprise. They had no notion that Jesus was beyond material limitations as the walking on the water had shown. 26 But He in His answer goes deeper, by charging them with seeking Him for the sake of food. Jesus here uses the word signs because He is speaking of the people's attitude. They saw no more than the food, so the miracle had failed to convey its full significance. 27 Do not labour for the food which perishes. These words of Jesus must have seemed strange, for His hearers were seeking to avoid labour, but this is His gracious way of declining their quest. Enduring food is a gift, not the result of labour. The seal, which God has set upon the Son of man, is the mark of authentication. He who holds the seal acts on behalf of the owner of the seal. What Jesus does and what He says are the deeds and words of God. It should be noted that it is upon Jesus as Son of man that the seal is set. 28 In the question, What must we do, to be doing the works of God? the questioners conceive of work in terms of earning merit, but 29 Jesus at once draws attention to the need for faith. 30 Then what sign do you do? For them faith can be based only on sight. But they had already seen a sign and had not recognized its true significance. 31 Their concept of 'sign' was limited to a reproduction of manna as in the time of their fathers, i.e. the supply of physical and material needs. The implication seems to be that one miracle of feeding a multitude does not compare with Moses' provision of food throughout the wilderness wanderings. Messiah must surely outdo Moses. Bread from heaven. The Jews cite from Ps. 78 and 32 Jesus takes up the phrase and applies it spiritually. First, He denies that it was Moses who provided the heavenly bread; it was the Father. Then He indicates that the real heavenly bread was not manna, but Christ Himself. 33 Gives life to the world. This comprehensive spiritual food contrasts vividly with the manna which sustained only the Israelites and that for a limited period. 34 The request, Lord, give us this bread always, does not rise above material provision.

35 I am the bread of life. It was necessary for Jesus at once to dispel the materialistic idea and to turn the conversation towards Himself. Note that, in each verse from 35 to 40, the first person is stressed. In this great introductory affirmation, bread of life means bread which gives life. Coming to Christ and believing in Him are seen to be synonymous, as the only means of securing spiritual satisfaction. 36 You have seen me and yet do not believe. The importance of faith is again stressed, this time by a pointed reference to their refusal to give it. 37 In this next verse there is a combination of divine sovereignty (All that the Father gives) and human response (him who comes), but the major stress is on the divine side. There is a distinction between the comprehensive all (neuter) and the personal him who comes. Response is an activity of individuals. In the statement, I will not cast out, the negative is emphatic. 38, 39 There follows another reminder of the complete harmony between the Father and the Son, which ensures that nothing of what the Father has given the Son can be lost (cf. 5:19ff.). Again the neuter all is used, as in v. 37, for the total gifts given to the Son. 39, 40 Twice Jesus here speaks of resurrection at the last day, an emphasis which adds strength to the claim that the Father's will would be accomplished.

41ff. At this point in the discussion, Jewish objections are interjected. 42 The main problem was Jesus' claim to be from heaven, for they knew His humble origins. 43, 44 Jesus does not directly answer them, but once again appeals to the close connection between His claims and the Father's purpose. Logically His claims seemed inconceivable, but discernment needed a spiritual impulse (unless the Father . . . draws him). 45 Confidence that such a divine impulse is to be expected is supported from the prophets. The quotation is from Is. 54:13, which describes the triumphs of the Servant in His kingdom. The direct implication of this statement is that the divine initiative is again stressed. 46 Yet only Jesus (him who is from God) has seen the Father. Others must accept His testimony.

48 The theme changes back to the discussion about the 'bread of life' with the repetition of Jesus' self-identification. 49, 50 The superiority of this heavenly bread over the manna is seen in its effects. One leads to eternal life, the other failed to prevent death. 51 Jesus follows up His comment on this with what is one of the most important statements in the whole discourse. If any one eats of this bread, he will live for ever is a further elucidation of v. 50. All real life is unending. And the bread which I shall give for the life of the world is my flesh. It is Jesus Himself who now gives, whereas previously it was the Father. The word for flesh (Gk. sarx) is used without the moral sense it so often has in Paul's writings. It refers here to the human life of Jesus which He gave up for (Gk. huper) the world. By world is meant the world of men. 52–54 Because the Jews put a literalistic interpretation on His words, Jesus gives a fuller explanation in the following words—unless you eat the flesh of the Son of man and drink his blood, you have no life in you. The metaphor of eating and drinking prepares the way for the later institution of the Lord's Supper. It is understandable that the Jews would not have grasped the spiritual meaning of these words, which can be understood only in the light of the subsequent sacrifice of Jesus upon the cross. The eating and drinking become symbolical of the appropriation of the effects of that sacrifice. 55, 56 Two further aspects of the same thought are then stressed. Such food and drink are real (food indeed and drink indeed) and those who partake of them are really abiding in Jesus. 57 The believer's life is in fact intimately bound up with Christ's. 58 The whole discussion then closes with a repetition of the comparison between the true heavenly bread and the Israelites' manna (cf. vv. 49, 50). 59 In the synagogue. This is the first mention of the place (i.e. the synagogue) where the discussion took place. Clearly not all the discourse took place there, since at first too many people were involved. Perhaps the discussions between 'the Jews' (vv. 41ff.) and Jesus were within the synagogue and the preceding discussions outside.

6:60–71 The disciples' reactions to Jesus' teaching and work

John includes samples of reaction on the part of the general following and then more specifically of the Twelve. 60 This is a hard saying; who can listen to it? The saying here is probably the whole of the preceding discourse. By describing it as hard, they meant 'difficult to accept'. 61ff. Jesus' answer does not appear to be specifically related to their question, but since John draws attention to His knowledge of their murmuring it must be supposed that Jesus is giving an answer to the inner motives that prompted their question. It was perhaps the saying about eating His flesh which provided the main stumbling-block, especially as 'flesh' is explained in v. 63. 62 Then what if you were to see the Son of man ascending where he was before? The sentence is incomplete, but it implies that there will be greater cause for offence than the idea of eating Christ's flesh, i.e. the lifting up of the Son of man and His ascension through a path of suffering. In that event any literal eating of His flesh would be impossible. 63–65 As yet these disciples had not learned to distinguish the physical from the spiritual. This is what Jesus makes clear in these verses. They were concentrating on the flesh, but He urges them to consider the real meaning of the words spirit and life. But there are some of you that do not believe. In spite of the fact that they considered themselves disciples, Jesus knew their true state.

66ff. The contrast in the reaction of the Twelve is striking. Many drew back, but the Twelve, through Simon Peter as their spokesman, affirmed a deepening faith. 68 You have the words of eternal life. So often eternal life had been the theme of Jesus' earlier discussions that the disciples had come to recognize it as the distinctive feature of His teaching. 69 Their reaction consisted of both faith and knowledge. The Holy One of God. There are various other readings with other titles, but this is to be preferred since it is the most unusual. In Mk. 1:24 and Lk. 4:34 it is used by demons. It is less complete than Peter's confession in Mt. 16:16. 70 It is clear that the 'we' of Peter's confession here needed qualifying in view of the reference to the betrayer. Nothing is said about the disturbing effect of this news of the betrayal upon the Twelve. 71 merely gives John's comment identifying the betrayer.

7:1 – 8:59 JESUS AT THE FEAST OF TABERNACLES

7:1–9 Jesus moves from Galilee to Jerusalem

After the discussions of the last chapter, the scene shifts again to Jerusalem. The first section of ch. 7 gives an insight into Jesus' relationship to His brethren. 1 The scene is set here in an atmosphere of hostility in Judea. 2 The Feast of Tabernacles was near and would provide an admirable opportunity for Jesus to display Himself publicly to a large number of people. 3 At least, this was according to the brothers' reckoning. 4 Their statement, For no man works in secret if he seeks to be known openly, shows an evident lack of sympathy with Jesus' true aims. The brothers thought His purpose was to be in the public eye. 5 gives the reason—their lack of faith in Jesus. 6 In declining their suggestion, Jesus again asserts that His time has not come. This brings out vividly His consciousness that all His movements were according to a timetable. 7 The world cannot hate you. Clearly world must here refer to unbelievers. Since those addressed are also unbelievers there is no cause for hatred. But it hates me, since Christ unveils the world's evil by turning the searching light of truth upon it. 8 I am not going up to the feast. Some texts have 'not yet', which probably arose from a desire to avoid the seeming difficulty of v. 10. There must have been an interval of a day or two, which might account for the different plan. But in favour of the alternative reading, it should be noted that 'not yet' occurs in the second clause (for my time has not yet fully come) which gives the reason for Jesus' decision. It is at least possible that the two Greek words involved (ouk, oupō) may have been confused by scribes. Nevertheless, 'not' has the strongest MS support. It could be regarded as a negation of the brothers' public demonstration idea, but not of Jesus' ultimate intention to go. Cf. Jn. 2:3, 4.

7:10–52 The Feast of Tabernacles

Jesus' plan was different from the brothers' scheme. There was certainly some basis for their suggestion, in that much speculation was going on in Jerusalem regarding Jesus' presence at the feast (cf. 11:55ff.). 10 Not publicly but in private. Such unobtrusiveness was unintelligible to His brothers. 12 The different opinions expressed concerning Jesus are typical of reactions towards Him, not only in His own age but in all subsequent ages. Goodness and deception are mutually exclusive opposites. 13 Neither Jesus nor the general populace, at this stage, could be 'open'.

14 It was in the middle of the feast that Jesus' action became more public. 15 The quality of His teaching caused investigations regarding His training. Never studied must be understood in the technical sense of not having passed through the rabbinical schools. 16 In answer to their question Jesus does not refer to learning (Gk. grammata), but speaks of His teaching (Gk.

didachē), which consists of God's revelation. Our Lord then proceeds to elucidate His teaching. a. It is not His own, but God's who sent Him; b. 17 it is available to those who desire to do God's will; c. 18 it is not based on the desire for self-glory; d. it is true. 19 The conclusion to Jesus' answer is abrupt. He appeals to Moses and to the fact that none of His questioners keep the law and then challenges them, Why do you seek to kill me? The connection of thought is missing. The only conclusion to which one can come is that Jesus looks beyond their immediate questioning to their deeper motives. He possessed perfect intuitive knowledge (cf. 2:24, 25). 20 In self-defence the Jews resort to the charge of demonology. 21–23 But Jesus points out their inconsistency in interpreting the law by demanding circumcision while criticizing an act of mercy on the sabbath day. 24 Do not judge by appearances, but judge with right judgment. Jesus criticizes their whole basis of judgment. They were using the wrong criteria.

25, 26 This leads to a discussion about the Messiah. Some of the people are perplexed because the authorities are taking no action. Can the explanation be that the authorities suppose Jesus to be the Christ? But the form of the question implies improbability. 27 Yet there is a problem in the minds of these questioners: the origin of Messiah was supposed to be secret, whereas Jesus' origin was known. It was a Jewish belief that Messiah's advent would be unexpected (cf. 1 Enoch 48:6; Ezra 13:51f.). 28, 29 At this point Jesus proclaimed (lit. 'cried out') in the Temple, thus banishing all thought of secrecy. He challenges their assumption that they know His true origin, on the grounds that they do not know the One who sent Him. 30 So they sought to arrest him. John impresses on his narrative the impotence of any human agency to forestall the 'hour' of Jesus. There is a deep sense of destiny in these incidents. 31 Again the Evangelist mentions that many believed and the connection between faith and signs should once more be noted.

32 Another attempt is made to arrest Jesus, with official backing. The chief priests and Pharisees probably convened an informal Sanhedrin meeting. 33, 34 Jesus' response is enigmatic. I shall be with you a little longer, and then I go to him who sent me. This shows that the Lord's mind is already on His passion. His consciousness of the divine mission again comes to the fore. 35, 36 The perplexity of the Jews is understandable, but it arises yet again from over-literalism. The statement of Jesus, Where I am you cannot come, is not intelligible to the Jews because they cannot think in spiritual terms. All they can think of is the Dispersion, i.e. those Jews who lived away from Palestine. There is an element of scorn in the reference to the Greeks.

37–39 The next passage is important because of its teaching about the Spirit. It is set on the last day of the feast, the great day. This was the climax of the celebrations. At this feast there was a daily water ritual which was specially stressed on the eighth and final day. The ritual was connected with the need for rain during the following year. In saying, If any one thirst, let him come to me and drink, Jesus is claiming to provide a better alternative to the water of the ritual. Again He uses the physical in a spiritual sense. 38 His further comment, Out of his heart shall flow rivers of living water, makes clear that the refreshment is available only to believers. There is a problem about the reference to the scripture here, for the singular form usually refers to a specific passage, but there is nothing which exactly corresponds to this. It must therefore be considered as a general reference to such passages as Is. 58:11; Zc. 14:8; Ezk. 47:1. The idea of the waters flowing out of a person is a vivid reminder of the way in which truth may be communicated (cf. the imagery in 1 Cor. 10:4, where the reference is to men drinking from the Rock, i.e. Christ). The Mishnah refers similarly to a man devoted to the law. 39 John, however, sees something distinctive—the coming of the Spirit. For as yet the Spirit had not been given, because Jesus was not yet glorified. This explanation of the Spirit's coming identifies the coming as subsequent to the resurrection and ascension. However much the water libation may have been understood by the more pious as symbolic of the Spirit, the statement of Jesus pointed to truth beyond the grasp of the Jews who were listening to Him.

40–52 The discourse had certain repercussions. The first obvious result was schism, caused by an inability to agree about the nature of Jesus. There were three views—a prophet, the Christ, not the Christ. 42 For only the last is the basis given—they thought the Scriptures were against it. They appear to be unaware of how precisely Jesus did, in fact, fulfil this prediction (Mi. 5:2). 44 Again the desire and yet the failure to arrest Jesus is mentioned. 45, 46 The officers return empty-handed, because of the deep impression that the teaching methods of Jesus had made upon them. No doubt they realized that Jesus' teaching had won support and they feared a dangerous situation. 47–49 The Pharisees' answer shows their arrogance. The authorities and the Pharisees are set over against this crowd. The Pharisaic contempt is clearly shown in the idea that the common people were accursed. 50, 51 Nicodemus' protest shows that the earlier interview (ch. 3) had not been in vain. He ventures to point out an inconsistency in their approach to the law. Their attitude was out of harmony with the true spirit of the law. 52 This is too much for the Pharisees and a jibe about Galilee is flung at Nicodemus, revealing a further contempt for the provincials by the Jerusalem authorities.

7:53 – 8:11 The woman taken in adultery

It is generally agreed that this section does not belong to this context in John. Most MSS either omit it from this context or mark it with asterisks to indicate doubt. A few MSS place it at the end of the Gospel and a few others after Lk. 21:38. At the same time it has ancient attestation and there is no reason to suppose that it does not represent genuine tradition.

2 The incident took place as Jesus was teaching at the Temple. The scribes and Pharisees sought out Jesus at a time when He was surrounded by a crowd of people. 5, 6 Their intention was to make Him publicly fall foul of the authorities, either religious or civil. The real crux was Jesus' attitude to the Mosaic law. The religious leaders lost no time in drawing attention to the command of Moses in the case of a flagrant act of adultery. Would Jesus condemn the woman and uphold the Mosaic law? If He did, the scribes and Pharisees knew that the civil authorities would not permit sentence to be executed. Or would He evade the issue and by so doing condone the woman's sin? 7 He did neither, but turned the challenge towards His accusers: Let him who is without sin among you be the first to throw a stone at her. The Lord leaves the matter to their own consciences. He transforms a legal quibble into a moral issue. 9 The withdrawal of the accusers from the eldest downwards heightens the point of the story. There is no need to debate what Jesus wrote with His finger on the ground. His presence was sufficient to make all His accusers uneasy, until at length only Jesus and the woman were left.

11 Jesus said, 'Neither do I condemn you; go, and do not sin again.' Here is compassion linked with strong exhortation, a fitting example of the true treatment of offenders. That there is no question of condoning adultery is clear from Jesus' attitude to the woman.

8:12–59 Jesus the light of the world

12 This discourse is a continuation of the discourse in chapter 7 and Jesus is, therefore, addressing the same people. Now He uses the analogy of light, a theme which is found in the prologue (cf. 1:4, 5, 9, 10). Here Jesus makes His own claim in the form of an 'I am' statement. It is noteworthy that light is linked with life, again as in the prologue. In the spiritual world, as in the physical, life cannot thrive in darkness. But the unique feature of Jesus' claim is the personal character of the illumination.

The light of the world. There is an obvious connection here with the prologue, where the Word is said to be light. The immediate occasion which led Jesus to select this imagery may have been the lighting of candelabra in the Court of the Women, to symbolize the pillar of fire. Will not walk in darkness. The imagery is here extended. The picture is of a path shrouded in darkness along which people are walking behind a bright lamp which dispels the darkness as it proceeds. Any who do not keep behind it will soon lose their way. In the spiritual sense it is necessary to follow the light of the world. The idea of walking as figurative of progress is a characteristic of John's writings.

13 This declaration led to a discussion on testimony between Jesus and the Pharisees. Our Lord's self-witness was a stumbling-block to them because they were not prepared to accept it. They conclude, therefore, that it cannot be true. 14 But self-testimony, as Jesus points out, is not in itself necessarily untrue. It depends on what it is based, and in His case it was based on personal knowledge of His mission, of which they were ignorant and were therefore in no position to pass judgment on His testimony (cf. 7:28). 15 You judge according to the flesh, I judge no one. The word flesh is here used of external appearances. The Lord implies that their judgment is superficial. The last part of the statement could either mean 'I do not judge according to the flesh', or 'The purpose of my mission is not primarily judgment'. 16 supplies the key to v. 15, and suggests that the former alternative is preferable. The antithesis of judgment according to the flesh is judgment in harmony with the mind of the Father. I and he who sent me brings out the mission-consciousness of Jesus. His is not isolated judgment, but judgment within His whole life purpose, and it is therefore true. 17 Appeal is then made to the law in support of the greater strength of dual testimony. The description of the law as your law is not evidence of an anti-Jewish approach, but an argument based on the principles accepted by Jesus' critics. He proceeds to show that the Mosaic law conflicts with their method of assessing what testimony is true. 18 There were in fact two witnesses, and not one as the Pharisees supposed, —Jesus' own testimony and the Father. Again the Father is described as the One who sent me.

19 The critics pose the question, Where is your Father?, in which the use of your suggests that natural fatherhood is in their minds. Without any perception on their part of the divine mission of Jesus it is not surprising that they were unconvinced by the claim of Jesus to a corroborating witness, for an absent witness would, in their eyes, be invalid. It is for this reason that they asked 'Where?' and not 'Who?'. But Jesus' answer is to the latter question rather than the former. If you knew me. Their whole attitude towards Jesus showed that they had not penetrated to a real knowledge of Him. Jesus shows that His close relationship with the Father would have become apparent to them had they only understood Him. In no clearer way could Jesus have claimed that He was the means for men to attain a knowledge of God. 20 The treasury was the treasury hall, situated in the Court of the Women. It was a place of public assembly and it is for this reason that it is mentioned here. His hour had not yet come. John by-passes any circumstantial human explanation of Jesus not being arrested and goes for a theological reason. This is a sequel to 7:44 where the desire to arrest Him is emphasized, and to 7:46, which records the report of the officers who returned from an earlier but fruitless attempt to arrest Jesus. The thwarting of human designs is an important factor which John explicitly mentions to show that the events of Jesus' life were under divine control.

21 I go away. Cf. 7:34, where the idea of going away equally mystified the hearers. You will seek me and die in your sin. The point of this statement seems to be that they will seek for Jesus as Messiah too late and will not therefore receive the benefit of His redeeming work. In that case the seeking must be understood in a spiritual sense and so must the following statement, that they cannot go where Jesus is going (cf. 7:34). Since the same idea is later expressed to the disciples (13:33), it draws attention to the uniqueness of the mission of Jesus. 22 The chasm which divided Him from the Jews is seen clearly in the following passage. Their misunderstanding is based on a literal understanding of Jesus' words. All they could think of was suicide, 23 but Jesus points out the essential contrast between His approach and theirs. Below is contrasted with above and this world with not this world. It was the difference between an earthly and a heavenly view of things. 24 Jesus gives His own explanation of v. 21. Dying in sins can be avoided only by faith in Jesus. Unless you believe that I am he shows what the content of the faith must be. It is believing in the full revelation of Jesus. I am he is analogous to the great 'I am' assertions found in the OT and must imply the self-existence of the Messiah. Jesus demands a comprehensive faith in His Person. 25 The 'I am' statement was clearly not intelligible to the hearers, otherwise they would not have asked, Who are you? The person of Christ is the touchstone in matters of Christian faith. The answer of Jesus to their question is, however, enigmatical. The problem lies in the interpretation of the Greek phrase translated from the beginning. If this is the correct translation, the statement implies that Jesus has been consistently declaring His identity from the first, both in word and deed. RSV mg. gives an alternative rendering, 'Why do I talk to you at all?' which is possible on grammatical grounds, but is inconsistent with the context. Another possibility is to understand the words as implying, 'Primarily or essentially I am what I am telling you', which has the advantage of taking the verb as present, which it is in the Greek. Such an interpretation fits well into the context and adds emphasis to the 'I am' assertion preceding it.

26 I have much to say about you and much to judge. In this way Jesus leaves their question to return to the main theme of the preceding conversation, i.e. judgment. He has twice reminded them that they will die in their sins, and there are further strongly adverse comments that He has to make. He again asserts the truth of His testimony on the grounds that He who sent Him is true. What He declared to the world (lit. 'into the world') was only what He had heard from the Father, which again draws attention to His divinely initiated mission. 27 John's comment, They did not understand that he spoke to them of the Father, shows insight into the perplexity of their minds. The whole Gospel is full of instances of pathetic misunderstandings. 28 Our Lord's answer to their perplexity, which must have been only too evident, is surprising. When you have lifted up the Son of man would appear to refer to the cross, but how does this relate to the context? In all probability our Lord has in mind the revelation of the Father which will come as a result of His crucifixion. It would then be evident to those who had eyes to behold and ears to hear that what Jesus had spoken was not only true, but was stamped with the authority of the Father. Then you will know that I am he. Cf. v. 24, where the same expression occurs, only there with the verb 'believe'. Such knowledge as this will come as a result of the resurrection of Jesus, which is understood, although not mentioned, here. 29 He has not left me alone. As in the opening part of the prologue, so here the close relation of the Son to the Father is brought out. The present statement may be contrasted with the cry of abandonment (Mk. 15:34; Mt. 27:46). It does not conflict, for here the emphasis is on an abiding relationship, but there on a temporary experience. I always do what is pleasing to him. The comprehensiveness of this claim shows the measure of oneness between the Father and Son. 30 Many believed in him. This implies faith of a personal kind.

The next section discusses the nature of true freedom. 31 The Jews who had believed in him needed to progress beyond their present condition of faith. Continuing in the word of Jesus implies a full committal to His teaching, which is indispensable for true discipleship. 32 You will know the truth, and the truth will make you free. The connection between truth and freedom is important. Truth never leads to bondage. The whole idea is perplexing to the Pharisees, who are not in the least convinced that they need freedom. In spite of the heavy yokes imposed on others by their casuistry, they never conceived of it as bondage. 33 The appeal to Abraham is considered sufficient to justify their claim to freedom. But this showed that their concept of freedom was deficient in moral content. 34 In answer, Jesus makes a comment to which He attaches great importance, as the introductory formula shows. He proceeds to show the true nature of moral slavery, in order to bring out the true nature of freedom. 35 There is an obvious contrast between a slave and a son in the rights that each possesses and this illustrates the chasm between bondage and freedom. 36 You will be free indeed. Freedom obtained through the Son is real. The idea in the if-clause is that freedom can come only through One who is Himself free. The Son is free and can therefore make free. 37 At this point Jesus refers to their appeal to Abraham. He points out the incongruity of Abraham's descendants seeking to kill One who speaks from God. The basic reason for this incongruity is said to be that Jesus' word finds no place in them. The word used is unusual in this context. It means 'making room for' in order to allow for development. The Pharisees' trouble was that their minds were closed. 38 My Father . . . your father. Although there are textual variants, the reading in the text seems best supported with its specific contrast between Jesus and His disputants. If your father is to be interpreted by means of v. 44, Jesus is meaning to refer to the devil.

39 Abraham is our father. So important to them was their connection with Abraham, that they could not get away from it. This reflects the general belief in the great merits of Abraham, which were believed to become available to Abraham's seed. But Jesus corrects the popular misconception by challenging its basis. Abraham's children must be defined on moral, not on genetic, grounds. 40 But the intentions and actions of these Jews are most clearly un-Abrahamic. To seek to kill anyone who declares God's truth can find no warrant in Abraham's example. 41 The second reference to your father is intended to challenge them further and draws out from them an indignant protest. Because their lineage from Abraham has been called in question, they resort to claiming that God Himself is their father. We were not born of fornication. The most natural interpretation of this statement is to understand fornication in a spiritual sense (as apostasy from God) as used in the OT (as, e.g., in Hosea). This is more likely than to see here an indirect allusion to slanders regarding the birth of Jesus. 42 If God were your Father is an unfulfilled condition parallel to v. 39. You would love me is an advance on 'you would do what Abraham did' of v. 39. True children of God could not fail to love the Son of God. This thought leads Jesus to assert again the divine origin of His mission. He will not allow His hearers to forget this. 43 You cannot bear to hear my word. The Greek here expresses more vividly a moral impossibility—'You are not able to hear'. The word (logos) is closely linked to the Person of Jesus (cf. the prologue). With the Pharisees' presuppositions, it was impossible to appreciate the message and mission of Jesus. 44 But the next statement reinforces the idea of moral impossibility—You are of your father the devil. The implications of this are far-reaching. The connection of thought is in three steps: first, the devil is a murderer; second, you are seeking to kill Me; third, therefore you are his children. The most characteristic feature about the devil is his opposition to truth. This is expressed in various ways in this verse: he has nothing to do with the truth, no truth is in him, he is a liar and the father of lies. The latter expression could mean 'the father of the liar', which would have a similar but more personal meaning. It would, however, fit better the charge that the opponents of Jesus were of their father the devil. 45 The sequence in this verse moreover suggests that their rejection of the truth shows their basic allegiance to falsehood. You do not believe me. Once again the attitude towards Jesus Himself is made the touchstone. Since He speaks truth, all that is contrary to Him must be false. 46 His opponents' attitude of unbelief implies that Jesus does not speak the truth—hence the double challenge. 47 There is a syllogism in this verse, the steps of which are as follows: first, he who hears the words of God is of God; second, you do not hear the words of God; third, therefore you are not of God. It is the second step in the argument which the hearers would challenge, for Jesus' estimate of their piety was very different from their own. Their strong reaction is understandable.

48 The next section shows the nature of the opposition which the words of Jesus aroused. Are we not right in saying that you are a Samaritan and have a demon? The question expresses strong contempt, although there is no evidence that Samaritan was generally used in this sense. The Jews denied any spiritual kinship with Samaritans, although the latter also claimed Abraham as their father. The charge of demon-possession is a much more bitter charge and is their reaction to Jesus' statement in v. 44. 49–51 The answer of Jesus brings out, first, that honouring the Father is incongruous with demon-possession, and second, that the judge of the matter is not Jesus but the Father, and therefore it is not a question merely of His opinion against theirs. He will never see death may either be understood to mean 'he will never see the terrors of death', i.e. death as it was understood in the contemporary world; or it may be taken more literally with the implication that no-one can ever completely keep the word of Jesus. The former is preferable. 52 The Jews, however, took the words literally. It is significant that they changed the words to taste death. 53 Are you greater than our father Abraham? To the devout Jew none could be greater. Moreover, even the prophets gained much greater status than the Jews were ready to grant to Jesus.

54–56 Jesus' answer to the question Who do you claim to be? is indirect. He virtually declines to answer, but rather infers that the Father has shown that Jesus is greater than Abraham. He strongly asserts His knowledge of the Father. Your father Abraham rejoiced that he was to see my day. The your draws attention to their constant appeal to Abraham in argument. But when did Abraham rejoice over such a prospect? Some sort of vision must be in mind. A Jewish tradition held that Abraham saw the whole history of his descendants (cf. Gn. 15:6). But this is not likely to be the meaning behind the words here. The reason for Abraham's rejoicing was the promise that all the peoples of the earth were to be blessed through his seed (cf. Paul's interpretation of this promise in Rom. 4 and Gal. 3). This was supremely fulfilled in Christ. He saw it and was glad. Some regard this as referring to Abraham in Hades, others as referring to his insight when offering Isaac, and yet others to a foreseeing in faith. The last seems best to fit the context. 57 The Jews distort the expression by asking Have you seen Abraham?, 58 but Jesus makes an emphatic declaration in answer. Before Abraham was, I am must refer to absolute existence. The two verbs vividly bring out a contrast and point to the superiority of Christ. That this statement must be regarded as making an exalted claim is clear from the violent reaction. 59 The Jews could think of no other treatment for anyone so indisputably claiming a pre-existence to Abraham. Jesus hid himself may have some symbolic significance for John. Withdrawal was not only from the Temple but from all that it represented. The Jewish leaders were rejecting Him.

9:1 – 10:42 FURTHER HEALING AND TEACHING

9:1–41 The blind man receives his sight

This incident provides an illustration of the theme of the previous chapter. Here is a specific example of Jesus as the light of the world. In view of this it is not impossible than John sees in the incident a symbolic significance. Some scholars regard this as evidence that John is giving an interpretation of Christ, but it is clear that all the Gospels record instances of blind men receiving sight from Christ. What is characteristic in John is his record of the discussion which it provoked.

1 A man blind from his birth. It is worth noting that the healing miracles in John are specifically stated to concern people in a chronic state (cf. 5:5). The power of Jesus is thus seen to be capable of acts of restoration even in extreme cases. 2 Rabbi, who sinned? There was much current discussion about the connection between suffering and sin. The disciples' conclusion that the man's blindness must be due to his own sin or his parents' is typical of current opinion. The idea that a congenital condition could be the result of sin naturally presents difficulties. It may be that the disciples knew nothing about the man and did not know that he was born blind. If they did know, it must be supposed that they conceived the possibility of sin before birth, as in fact some of the Rabbis taught (cf. Bereshith R xxxiv). 3 But Jesus' reply gives no support to either of the disciples' alternatives. But that the works of God might be made manifest in him. This was a possibility which was given little consideration in our Lord's day. That suffering could be used for God's glory was difficult to believe, although it is inherent in the Christian approach to the problem. This miracle, however, is not concerned with that problem. It is aimed to show the illuminating power of Christ, not only in the physical but also in the spiritual sphere. Restored sight led to a developing faith. 4 We must work the works of him who sent me. Some MSS read 'I' instead of we, and this would certainly agree better with the context, since the disciples were not associated with Jesus in the sign of the healing of the blind man. If the plural is retained the statement becomes more general. Night comes. The contrast between day and night appears to be used symbolically, if the reference is to the mission of Jesus, for night would represent the close of that mission. Some, however, have understood the night to refer to the spiritual blindness of our Lord's enemies. The former seems preferable. 5 is a repetition of 8:12 and a further parallel with the prologue. But it is important to note that in this case Jesus announces His claims before performing the miracle. 6 Made clay . . . and anointed. Another instance of healing accompanied by the use of spittle is recorded by Mark (7:33). It was a current belief that saliva was curative, especially for diseased eyes. Jesus clearly used currently understood means, but there is no need to assume that He attached superstitious value to them. 7 Indeed, the healing took place only when the man washed in the pool of Siloam. The interpretation of the name as Sent must have significance, but the purpose is not clear. Some have supposed that there is reference to Christ as the 'Sent One' and this would fit well into the phrase in v. 4. But the interpretation is more probably a note added for the benefit of John's Greek readers in agreement with his characteristic procedure with Hebrew names (cf. 1:42). And came back seeing. Obedience was rewarded with healing. The delay in the cure may well have been to test the man's faith.

8–12 The account of the interchange of conversation between the man and his neighbours is marked by exceptional vividness. The argument about the man's identity, the vagueness of his own knowledge of Jesus and the certainty of the cure are all clearly brought out. Each of those points finds elaboration in the man's subsequent discussion with the Pharisees. 13 They brought to the Pharisees the man who had formerly been blind. What prompted the neighbours to do this is not stated. It is not even certain that it is the neighbours who are referred to. Obviously the people concerned were some who were somewhat hostile to Jesus and were themselves sticklers for the Jewish law. 14 This is supported by the statement that the cure was effected on the sabbath day. Jewish casuistry could regard the making of clay as work which was forbidden on the sabbath. That it was an act of mercy was irrelevant. 15 The man's answer to further questioning shows impatience, which adds further vividness to the account. 16 The Pharisees show a similar division of opinion as the neighbours, although in their case it was a dispute between the extreme legalists, whose only concern was over sabbath regulations, and others who were so impressed with the signs that they could not imagine a sinner performing them. These latter implied that the legalists must be judging wrongly. 17 He is a prophet. This statement from the blind man himself is an advance on his answer to the neighbours' enquiries, on which occasion (cf. v. 11) he speaks of 'the man called Jesus'. A prophet would be considered of greater importance than a Rabbi.

18–23 The next section brings into sharp focus the sheer obstinacy of unbelief. Not only did the Jews disbelieve the man's own words, but also Jesus' power to heal. They demanded the supporting testimony of the man's parents, but their enquiries do not appear to be made in the spirit of impartial examination. They were definitely prejudiced against the possibility of a man born blind ever receiving his sight. It was reasonable to seek confirmation of the identity and previous condition of the man, but unreasonable to expect an explanation of the phenomenon from the parents. Their response to the last demand reflects the fear which conditioned their whole approach to the Pharisees. Threat of excommunication appears to have been a powerful ecclesiastical weapon. At the same time it was justifiable for the parents to pass the question back to the son, who alone could speak from personal experience. Indeed the whole incident shows the clash between academic quibbling and personal testimony (cf. v. 25).

24 Give God the praise. This cannot mean that they were urging him to praise God for the cure, for they still appear doubtful about its veracity. It was a common Jewish oath and must be regarded as a solemn exhortation to the man to speak the truth. 24, 25 We know contrasts with the man's I know. Their knowledge of Jesus was based on a technical breach of sabbath regulations, but his on a personal experience. He cannot debate on the technical question, but he refuses to be put off on a matter of experience. 26 What did he do to you? Baffled by the assertion of fact, they return to the theoretical problem of method, 27 which understandably caused the man no little irritation. The man's question to them, Do you too want to become his disciples? is ironical. He suggests that their desire to hear the evidence all over again shows such eagerness that he can only conclude that they would make good disciples! 28 But his irony only drew out their scorn. We are disciples of Moses. Their legalistic position comes to the fore here. Moses to them is infinitely superior to Jesus. 29 They claim knowledge of Moses and ignorance of Jesus. The contrast implies an unwillingness to give credence to the actions of anyone of whose origins they were ignorant. This would be particularly so for one whom some claimed to be a prophet. 30ff. It is no wonder that the man himself becomes increasingly cutting in his remarks. For him facts were more telling than theories of origin. But he ventures to reason the matter in the following steps. 30 First, his sight has been restored. 31 Second, God hears only those who do His will, not sinners. Third, hence, by inference, the man's healer cannot be a sinner. 32 Fourth, that a mere man could have opened the eyes of a man born blind is without precedent. 33 Fifth, therefore the healer of the man must be from God. 34 The theologically-minded Jews at last see that they can make no headway with a man who can reason in such a manner and so they finally eject him. You were born in utter sin seems to be an admission on their part that the man really had been born blind, which in their theory of suffering meant a deeper condition of sin (cf. v. 2). They are, therefore, more concerned to show contempt for his former condition than pleasure in his present restoration. This reveals how very blind they were and illustrates the comment of Jesus in v. 41.

35ff. The concluding section focuses upon the man's personal interview with Jesus and reaches its climax in his declaration of faith. 35 Jesus heard . . . and having found him he said. By this sequence of verbs, John brings out vividly that the initiative was taken by Jesus. The challenge given to the man is significant for its emphasis on faith and for the title used by Jesus of Himself. It is characteristic of the Johannine signs that they lead to faith and the idea of faith in the Son of man is found elsewhere in the Gospel (cf. 3:14, 15). 36 Yet the man did not without further comment from Jesus understand the term—hence his request for more explanation. 37, 38 As soon as Jesus makes clear that He is the Son of man, the restored man at once believes, which suggests that he already had the seeds of faith in him. Indeed, the earlier account shows a distinct progression of faith. Lord, I believe. There is no need to suppose that the word translated Lord is used in any theological sense, for it is unlikely that the man had come to an understanding of the Lordship of Christ. Most probably it was no more than a title of respect.

39 For judgment I came into this world. It is surprising that Jesus should respond to the man's confession of faith by referring to judgment. The statement cannot be regarded as comprehensive, for judgment was not the primary mission of the Lord. It was rather the inevitable effect of His coming. It brings men to the point of crisis. The cured man had in fact sealed his own excommunication by his act of worship. The antitheses—non-seeing and seeing, seeing and becoming blind—are one of the characteristic features of this Gospel. The notion of sight is used in different ways. The blind man had received both physical and spiritual sight. The Pharisees possessed natural sight and thought they possessed spiritual sight, but their reaction to Jesus shows they were really blind. In this sense His coming brought judgment. 40, 41 Jesus' answer to the Pharisees' question, Are we also blind? is somewhat enigmatic. If you were blind might be regarded as meaning 'If you were conscious of your blindness', with the implication that they would have responded and would therefore have been without guilt. Another interpretation would be to take the if-clause as meaning 'If you were really blind', in which case the then-clause (you would have no guilt) would follow because they could not be held responsible. But they were claiming to be responsible people by saying 'We see', while their rejection of the claims of Jesus proved their guilt. The former interpretation of the if-clause is to be preferred.

10:1–18 Jesus as the shepherd

This section of the Gospel records an allegory, which while akin to the Synoptic parables is nevertheless distinguished from them. But the allegory must not be pressed in its details even here. It is broad principles which are illustrated.

1–10 The opening illustration concentrates on the door, which leads naturally into the shepherd imagery. But the two ideas are inseparably connected. The imagery of the shepherd is often found in the OT (cf. Ps. 23; Ezk. 34; Zc. 9; Je. 23). 1 Truly, truly probably shows a continuation from chapter 9, in which case the teaching about the good shepherd is intended to contrast with the bad shepherding of the Pharisees. Eastern sheepfolds had only one door which was guarded by the shepherd. Those who entered by any other means were false, described in these verses both as thieves and robbers and also as strangers (or aliens). 3 To him the gatekeeper opens. There is no need to attempt to interpret the gatekeeper, who is not identified in the allegory. The focus of attention is on the accessibility of the shepherd to the sheep. Some have seen an allusion to God or to the Holy Spirit. It is the relationship between the sheep and shepherd which is specially emphasized. 4 The calling of the sheep by name and the leading of them out is characteristic of a true shepherd. 5 No such personal relationship exists between strangers and the flock. Although Jesus had at this stage given no interpretation, He clearly intended a spiritual meaning. 6 John characteristically notes the hearers' inability to understand, 7 before recording the specific claim of Jesus to be the door. 8 Then follows another statement which has caused difficulties. All who came before me are thieves and robbers. Some MSS omit the words before me which would lessen the difficulties of interpretation, but the words are probably original. If understood in a temporal sense, the statement implies that others who had before His time claimed to be the door, i.e. the way of access, were impostors (i.e. pseudo-Messiahs). It is unlikely that Jesus is referring to the OT prophets. If before me relates to position and not time, the statement could refer to the present Jewish leaders. The Pharisees' treatment of the man born blind illustrated what alien shepherds of God's flock they were. 9 Jesus' own claim to be the door is repeated in a more extended form, promising not only salvation, but also spiritual sustenance. 10 I came that they may have life, and have it abundantly. The contrast between Jesus and the false shepherds here is vivid. He brings life; they bring death. The abundance of life is characteristic of the Johannine portrait of Christ.

11–18 The next section concentrates on Jesus as the good shepherd. If the metaphors are mixed the spiritual implications are nevertheless transparent. 11 The good shepherd lays down his life for the sheep. Having just claimed to give abundant life to others, Jesus now speaks of sacrificing His own. The verb used could mean 'laying aside', which would draw attention to the voluntary character of the sacrificial act. The main emphasis lies on the fact that the act is on behalf of others. 12 The contrast with the hired shepherd who has no personal interest in the sheep is again vivid. 13 It is the lack of care which is particularly noted. 14ff. The assertion of v. 11 is repeated with additional details in these verses. There is a significant emphasis on personal knowledge; Christ's knowledge of His own people and their knowledge of Him, the Father's knowledge of the Son and the Son's knowledge of the Father. This is a development of the introductory illustration concerning a shepherd's knowledge of his sheep (cf. vv. 3–5). Where no such personal relationships exist, there can be no true shepherd. 16 I have other sheep, that are not of this fold. This is a further development of thought. If the other sheep are Gentiles as differentiated from the Jewish fold, this statement is an important witness to the universalism of Jesus. The distinction between fold here and flock in the next sentence shows the variety which exists within the people of God. There are many folds, but one flock. I must bring them also. The form of the Greek draws attention to a divine necessity. This is the purpose for which Jesus came. The initiative is seen to be with the shepherd. One flock, one shepherd. The unity of the flock arises from the unifying factor of the shepherd. Ecumenical unity could have no other basis. 17 For this reason could refer to the preceding verses with the meaning 'The Father loves Me because I am the good shepherd'. Or it could refer to the following statement, because I lay down my life. The love of the Father is not to be regarded as having its basis in the action of the Son, but it does find its fullest manifestation in that action. That I may take it again. This gives the purpose of the voluntary life-giving, i.e. a self-willed resurrection. 18 So remarkable is this claim that Jesus proceeds to vindicate it. The emphasis is on Jesus' own authority, as the word translated power could well be rendered. But it is an authority received from the Father—another example of the delegated character of the mission of Jesus.

10:19–21 The effects of this teaching

19 A division. Cf. other examples of the same result in 7:43 and 9:16. 20 The demon-possession charge is found also in 7:20; 8:48, 52. The close connection between demon-possession and madness in contemporary thought is reflected here. 21 Can a demon open the eyes of the blind? The force of the Greek question implies a negative answer. Not all the Jews were equally credulous.

10:22–42 Dialogue at the Feast of Dedication

22 There is no particular significance in the mention of this feast, which was first instituted by Judas Maccabaeus, except in so far as John shows special interest in connecting events with feasts. 23 The season of the year, winter, accounts for Jesus walking and discussing in Solomon's portico 24 How long will you keep us in suspense? In all probability an interval of some weeks separated this incident from the preceding discourse, in which case much further discussion may have taken place regarding the claims of Jesus. Their request implies perplexity. 25 But Jesus' answer draws attention to their lack of faith. They do not even believe the works of Jesus. 26, 27 Reference is again made to the shepherd imagery. These Jews showed that they did not belong because they did not recognize the shepherd's voice. 28 I give them eternal life. The tense of the verb is present, which shows that the people of God have already entered into possession of eternal life. No one shall snatch them out of my hand. There can be no doubt Jesus means to imply by this statement the security of His people in face of any adversary. 29 This security is reinforced by the fact that they are the Father's gift to the Son, and there can be no greater security than this. 30 I and the Father are one. Much discussion has ranged around the significance of this statement, but it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that unity of essence is in mind. It is insufficient to regard the meaning as moral agreement. The identity of security in both the Son and the Father bears testimony to a more basic identity.

31 At this point of the dialogue comes the threat of stoning, which turns the discussion to the consideration of motives. 32, 33 Jesus challenges the Jews to cite the 'good' works for which He is being stoned, which brings forth their retort about blasphemy. I have shown you many good works points to the evidential purpose of Jesus' deeds. This is in harmony with the purpose of the Gospel. Because you, being a man, make yourself God is a charge which conveys a sense of contempt, especially in the emphasis on 'you'. A similar charge is found in 5:18. According to the Levitical law (Lv. 24:16) blasphemy was punishable by stoning. 34 Is it not written in your law, 'I said, you are gods'? The word law here embraces all three parts of the Jewish Scriptures so that a citation from Ps. 82:6 is not out of place. The method of exegesis which Jesus used is typically Jewish and illustrates again how He took up the same approach as His hearers when He was contending with them. The argument is a fortiori: since even unjust rulers are called 'gods', how much more reason for the Father's special representative to be called Son of God. How can He be charged with blasphemy? By this means Jesus shows the fallacy of their charge. 35 Scripture cannot be broken. The use of the singular (Gk. graphē) draws attention to this particular passage as inviolable, but the principle is generally applicable. Because of this the truth of Ps. 82:6 has abiding validity. 36 Whom the Father consecrated. Many times in this Gospel Jesus refers to the fact that He was sent, but here the word 'consecrate' is used in addition. It means 'set apart', is frequently used in the OT for the setting apart of a man for a specific office and is used in the NT of Christian believers (cf. Jn. 17:19).

37 The discussion concludes with a statement of Jesus about works and faith. The works of my Father are evidently special works and are connected with, if not identical with, the 'signs'. But the works must have evidence of divine origin, otherwise they should not be believed. 38 The following verse implies that faith based on works is inferior to faith based on what Jesus has said. This statement is in harmony with the purpose of the whole Gospel. The works (or signs) are for a theological purpose—to bring understanding of the relationship between Jesus and the Father. The form of the Greek in this verse is significant—that you may come to know and continually know. Some texts, however, read 'believe' in place of the second verb. Those who had come to understand the intimate relation between the Father and the Son would not have stumbled over the statement of v. 30. The Father is in me relates primarily to the works. It is impossible to differentiate between the Son and the Father in these. 39 The Jews' reaction is still violent, but their attempt to arrest failed.

40–42 A concluding historical note mentions Jordan as the scene of John's baptism. There seems no special reason for the reference, except to give validity to John's witness concerning Jesus. The statement, John did no sign, is clearly intended to contrast with Jesus. The response of faith across Jordan also contrasts with the lack of it in Jerusalem.

11:1–57 DEATH AND RAISING OF LAZARUS

11:1–44 Jesus the overcomer of death

For two main reasons the account of the raising of Lazarus has been objected to; the first is its extraordinary character, the second the silence of the other Gospels concerning it. Basically this story is no more extraordinary than any of the miracles, once the possibility of a divine breaking into the natural world is admitted. The latter condition can hardly be denied if the resurrection of Christ Himself is given credence. It surely becomes more credible to regard the narrative as historical than to view it as an idealized illustration of the statement of Jesus, 'I am the resurrection and the life' (11:25), or, as some have supposed, a development of the story of the widow's son at Nain.

1–4 The occasion of the miracle is briefly stated. John is concerned to make clear the identity of Lazarus and especially his relation to the Mary who anointed Jesus, although he does not relate this incident until later (ch. 12). When John wrote the incident was, of course, in the past and it is for this reason that the past tense is used in v. 2. 3 Lord, he whom you love is ill. It is noticeable that the verb used in the sisters' report is phileō, whereas John uses the fuller word agapaō in v. 5. These statements have been used by some scholars as the basis of the claim that Lazarus is the beloved disciple who is referred to several times in the latter portion of the Gospel. But it is unlikely that Lazarus was present in the upper room. 4 This illness is not unto death. By this Jesus means that the purpose of the sickness is not death, but the glorification of the Son of God. This may be compared with other signs in this Gospel (e.g. 2:11; 9:3). The glory of God is more significant than the sickness. The sickness is conceived of as a means to a greater end (cf. v. 15).

5–16 The report sent to Jesus and the consequent discussion between Jesus and His disciples raises an important theological problem. Why did Jesus delay? 6 So when he heard that he was ill, he stayed two days longer in the place where he was. It is important to notice that there is a definite connection between v. 6 and the previous statement. The delay must be understood in terms of Jesus' love for the Bethany family. This excludes any possibility of regarding the delay as evidence of lack of care or concern. A more dominating purpose must be found and this is indicated both in v. 4 ('for the glory of God') and v. 15 ('that you may believe').

7, 8 In reply to Jesus' suggestion that they should go to Judea, the disciples remind Him that even at that very time the Jews were seeking to stone Him. This recalls what was stated in 10:31, 39. The whole situation was fraught with danger. The Transjordan district where they were at that time was less hostile than Judea. No doubt the disciples were relieved that Jesus delayed His journey and appear to have hoped that He would abandon it altogether. 9 Are there not twelve hours in the day? This response of Jesus to the disciples' panic is surprising. How does it answer their fears? The connection of thought is that the hours of day are not affected by external circumstances. They are there to be used. The implication is that Jesus' hour has not come (i.e. the twelfth hour) and until God wills that it should come, the only course to adopt is to go about one's mission. The reference to a twelve-hour day is based on Jewish reckoning, which divided the period between sunrise and sunset into twelve equal parts. These parts varied in length according to the time of year. 9, 10 The figures of light and darkness and the ideas of walking and stumbling all go to show the contrast between Jesus' unerring progress and the Jews' fumbling attempts to stop it.

In the further discussion over Lazarus' death, there occurs another instance of misunderstanding through taking a metaphorical statement literally. 11 The idea of death being described in terms of sleep was not unknown, but when Jesus stated His purpose as being to arouse Lazarus out of sleep 12 the disciples became convinced that He meant it literally. He will recover. In the minds of the disciples, sleep was a hopeful sign in any illness. All was not lost. Restoration would come independent of any action of Jesus. 13 John explains how the confusion arose and 14 this leads to the plain statement that Lazarus is dead. The tense of the verb here (aorist) is more abrupt than that in v. 11 (perfect), drawing attention to the finality of it. 15 And for your sake I am glad that I was not there. Once again Jesus draws attention to the higher spiritual purpose behind His acts. It is almost as if our Lord's mind was concentrating more specifically on the training of the Twelve than on the two sisters or Lazarus. The effect on the disciples would have a more far-reaching outcome. So that you may believe. This must mean 'in a fuller way than you have so far done'. Again the connection between signs and faith comes into focus. 16 Thomas' response to Jesus' repeated Let us go (cf. v. 7) sounds like a resigned act of despair rather than an act of courage.

17–27 The next scene in this vivid drama is a conversation between Jesus and Martha on the outskirts of Bethany. This is the most theological section of the whole narrative and draws attention to the spiritual truths. 17 Now when Jesus came. From v. 30 it is evident that Jesus remained on the outskirts of the village, perhaps in the vicinity of the tomb (but cf. v. 34). He received a report of the time that Lazarus had been in the tomb. The verb found need not imply a previously limited knowledge. It suggests the completion of the journey (cf. similar use in 2:14). 18, 19 The nearness of Bethany to Jerusalem is mentioned to account for the presence of so many Jews who had come to comfort the sisters. 20 When Martha heard that Jesus was coming. It is characteristic of the Synoptic picture of Martha that she did not wait for Jesus to reach the house. Here was the same bustling, impetuous person whose major interest was action. Mary sitting at home is the same reflective, rather inactive person as in the Synoptic records. 21 Lord, if you had been here, my brother would not have died. Martha and Mary must have speculated much in this vein, for Mary says identical words later (cf. v. 32). It shows a loving faith in Jesus' power to heal. Indeed, v. 22 shows the possibility of a deeper faith. 22 And even now I know suggests some kind of conviction that Jesus would do something. At least Martha affirms her faith that God would grant any request from Jesus. She appears to be reaching out for some ray of hope. Martha manages to hide her grief behind a calm exterior, but Mary weeps until the miracle is performed. 23, 24 Your brother will rise again. It is understandable that Martha regarded this as no more than a conventional statement of consolation relating to the end of the age, as her answer shows. It is probable that her understanding of resurrection was vague and was certainly not applied by her in any personal way.

25 The crux in the whole narrative comes with Jesus' great 'I am' assertion, I am the resurrection and the life. It shows first that Jesus' statement in v. 23 was intended in a double sense. It further reveals Jesus' own approach to His mission. He identifies Himself with the climax of His work, as if the resurrection had already taken place. The greatest possible source of comfort in the hour of bereavement is the risen Lord. It should be noted that resurrection comes before life, because for mortal men new life is the product of resurrection. 26 The availability of this life is by means of faith, which leads Jesus to the direct challenge, Do you believe this? It should be noted that Jesus does not invite a confession of faith in Himself, but in His statement. The two ideas are essentially inseparable, but the emphasis here falls on the content of belief. 27 Martha's response bears a striking resemblance to John's statement of purpose (20:31), as if her confession of faith forms the pattern which the whole Gospel is intended to support. To what extent she understood the Messiahship or Sonship of Jesus it is impossible to say. But there is no doubt that to the Evangelist the content of her faith was highly significant. Faith which fell short of so exalted a concept of Christ was inadequate.

28–37 The next section portrays first the reaction of Mary and then that of the Jews who had come to mourn with the sisters. The salient features of Mary's part in the story may be summarized as follows: a. 28 Jesus sent Martha for her; b. 29 she immediately responded; c. 32 she fell down at Jesus' feet and repeated the same statement that Martha had made on meeting Him (cf. v. 21); d. 33–35 her tears caused Jesus to be distressed and to weep. In this narrative Mary stands out as more emotional than Martha. Even the Jewish observers add to the pathos of the scene. They are shown 31 as consoling Mary, as following her, supposedly to the tomb, 33 as weeping with her, 36 as being touched by the sight of Jesus' tears, 37 as speculating on why Jesus had not prevented this sad happening. 33 The climax of this part of the narrative is in the sentence he was deeply moved in spirit and troubled. The first verb is strongly expressed, meaning 'to show anger', and a problem arises concerning its cause. Some have suggested moral indignation at the result of human sin, i.e. death, and at the sorrow caused by death. But this must have been present to our Lord's mind constantly, whereas His emotion here appears to belong to the specific occasion. Was His distress, on the other hand, caused by His sympathy for the sisters? The verb seems too strong for that. Was it because the Jewish display of grief was unreal? This is a possibility, for any show of hypocrisy must have aroused His anger. It may well be that something of the pathos of human suffering was bearing upon Jesus as He knew His own cup of suffering was so close. The troubling of His spirit proceeded from within. Perhaps it was due to His knowledge of the strength of the unbelief of some of them which would cause them to oppose Him even after they had witnessed the stupendous sign. 37 The question, which links the present incident with the last sign (ch. 9), may well have been asked in mockery.

38–44 The actual account of the miracle itself is relatively brief and is marked by its reserve. The repetition of Jesus' distress, the objection of Martha to the request that the tomb be opened, Jesus' reminder to her that she would see God's glory, the acquiescence in the removal of the stone, the prayer of Jesus, His command to the dead man and the simple instruction to loose him and let him go: all these details have about them the ring of truth. 40 Did I not tell you? It was to the disciples (cf. v. 4) that Jesus had mentioned God's glory, but it was implicit in what He had said to Martha. 41, 42 The prayer of Jesus is significant because of its emphasis on faith and on the authentication of His mission. 44 The reserve in the account is particularly brought out in Lazarus' coming forth, presumably with each limb bound separately, but without saying a word.

11:45–57 The results of the miracle

There were different reactions to the sign. 45 Some believed, 46 some reported the matter, 47–53 the Pharisees discussed the matter in council and decided to plot for Jesus' death, 54 while Jesus Himself withdrew towards the wilderness. Even the most remarkable sign will not convince some men. 47 What are we to do? For this man performs signs. The signs are seen as a threat to their position. They believe that most people (they actually say every one) will believe, but they clearly intend to exclude themselves. 48 The Romans will come and destroy both our holy place and our nation. Their concept of people believing in Jesus is dominated by political considerations. The 'place' is either the Temple or the city, and the nation is the administration, which to some extent was still in Jewish hands. 49 Caiaphas, who was high priest that year. John clearly attaches importance to this because he repeats his comment about 'that year' in v. 51, where he explains its significance. In that fateful year the high priest spoke a prophecy in his representative capacity. 50 It is expedient for you that one man should die for the people. The principle that one should be a substitute for the many is fundamental to the NT doctrine of atonement. Its statement here is all the more noteworthy because uttered, unwittingly, by the very Jewish high priest who helped to execute it. 51 John's comment shows how the early Christians viewed it—as a prophecy which went far beyond Caiaphas's statement, for the application was to be universal. 52 To gather into one the children of God who are scattered abroad. Christ's death was seen to have a unifying purpose, the term 'children of God' being used proleptically of those who would believe.

55–57 The setting was the pre-Passover activity, which consisted of purification rites.

Reports had been passed round about Jesus' signs and the Pharisees' plot. Inevitably speculation followed as to Jesus' movements. John mentions the official plot in order to set the scene for the anointing and the entry into Jerusalem.

12:1–50 CLOSE OF THE PUBLIC MINISTRY IN JERUSALEM

12:1–8 The devotion of Mary

1 The incident of the anointing at Bethany is important because of its connection with the miracle of the raising of Lazarus. Six days before the Passover. The specific time reference is significant for John and may be compared with the six days mentioned in chs. 1 and 2 at the commencement of the ministry. It has been suggested that John may have had in his mind a comparison with the six days of creation, but this seems highly improbable. 3 Mary took a pound of costly ointment of pure nard. There is some doubt about the meaning of the word translated 'pure' as its root meaning is 'persuasive' or 'trustworthy', but the idea of genuineness is no doubt correct. The ointment was probably a liquid perfume. And anointed the feet of Jesus. The normal procedure was to anoint the head, not the feet, as a sign of honour. In the parallel case of anointing in Lk. 7:38 it was also the feet that were anointed. There are many similarities between John's and Luke's narrative, but it is unlikely that the two women concerned should be identified. The woman in Luke's narrative was a sinful woman who is portrayed as deeply penitent, whereas this woman is deeply devoted to Jesus and agrees completely with Luke's own picture of Mary of Bethany. In both instances Jesus' feet are wiped by the woman's hair. It would have been against Jewish convention for a hostess to appear in the presence of men with unbound hair, but in the case of Mary love was stronger than convention. John's mention of the odour filling the house is a vivid detail which would not easily be forgotten by one who was present.

4–6 Judas's complaint about this expensive waste is fully in character with the Synoptic portrait of him. He was stricken not only with the deadly sins of greed and covetousness, but also with dishonesty. 5 Three hundred denarii would, in modern currency, be quite a considerable sum of money. A labourer's rate of pay was one denarius per day. 7 Jesus' answer is Let her alone, let her keep it for the day of my burial. This translation assumes that Mary had some perfume still unused and that Jesus suggested that this remainder should be kept to anoint His body at the burial. But this does not fit well into the context, for Judas is concerned about the perfume already used. In the light of Mk. 14:8, it is better to understand the meaning as in the AV, which suggests that Mary's present act was in fact anticipatory of His burial. There may be the suggestion here that what she had given she had really retained, since her action had become a memorial to her. 8 clearly implies the uniqueness of Jesus.

12:9–11 Reactions to Jesus' presence at Bethany

9, 10 The crowd showed curiosity, which is contrasted with the hostility of the official party. Lazarus was a draw to the former and a threat to the latter. 11 The plot against Jesus and Lazarus was spurred on by many coming to faith.

12:12–19 The entry into Jerusalem

12 One day nearer the Passover pilgrims were increasing in numbers. The desire of such a crowd not only to meet Jesus, but to honour Him, is in marked contrast to the official ecclesiastical line. 13 Branches of palm trees. The practice of carrying palm leaves was an act of honour to a victorious person. Hosanna! Blessed be he who comes in the name of the Lord. The chant of the people comes from Ps. 118:25, one of the psalms sung by pilgrims on the ascent towards Jerusalem. The description, the King of Israel, makes clear the Messianic significance of the cry. 14, 15 John cites Zc. 9:9 in support of the fact that Jesus rode into Jerusalem on a young ass. 16 He does not mean that this occurred to him or any of the disciples at this time. It was only after the resurrection, here referred to as the glorification of Jesus, that any of them understood.

17, 18 These verses appear to refer to two different crowds. One group had seen the miracle of Lazarus' restoration, and the other group had only heard of it. 19 The Pharisees' reaction is one of despair from their point of view—Look, the world has gone after him. They seem to be given to exaggerations (cf. the Sadducean Caiaphas's remark that all would believe in Him, 11:48). Perhaps they feared that Jesus had gained too much popular support for their plot to succeed as easily as they had hoped.

12:20–26 The quest of the Greeks

20 Now among those who went up to worship at the feast were some Greeks. These were evidently Greek proselytes who would be able to join the Jews in the Temple worship. The fact that they had come to worship shows the seriousness of their purpose. 21 The mention of Philip's home town is probably to account for the Greeks addressing their request to him. The men may well have come from the Decapolis, which was within easy reach of Bethsaida. 22 John does not specifically state that the Greeks were actually brought to Jesus by Philip and Andrew, but the narrative gives that impression.

23 The hour has come for the Son of man to be glorified. This is a strange response to the request. The Greeks may have interpreted it in terms of the triumphal entry, but Jesus has His mind on the cross, as v. 24 shows. This reference to the hour points also to the approaching crisis. 24 To explain Himself more clearly Jesus uses the imagery of a grain of wheat. The formula, Truly truly, shows its importance. The principle in nature that death is essential for further life is applied by Jesus to Himself by inference. It bears much fruit. Wheat reproduces its own kind, and Jesus regards His passion in the same light. His death would bring many sons to life. 25 'Loving' and 'hating' life are relative terms which bring out in sharp relief the choice and consequence in which personal reaction to Jesus involves men. 26 To follow Him is to serve Him, not to serve oneself. The Father honours only those who honour the Son.

12:27–50 Attestation and withdrawal

27 Now is my soul troubled. At this point begins our Lord's consciousness of the hour to which the whole Gospel narrative has been moving. There is a clear connection between our Lord's soul-trouble here and the agony in the garden of Gethsemane as recorded in the Synoptic Gospels (cf. Mt. 26:38; Mk. 14:34). It shows that the experience in the garden was the climax to earlier stresses. What shall I say? There appear to be two alternatives—deliverance out of (Gk. ek) the hour, or 28 glorification through it. Jesus was deeply aware that this particular 'hour' was the crucial experience of His whole redemptive work. He could not for a moment entertain escaping from it. At this point the heavenly voice supplies the divine authentication of the choice made by Jesus: I have glorified it, and I will glorify it again. The idea of the whole of Jesus' mission, but especially its climax, as a process of glorification is characteristic of this Gospel. 29, 30 There were three reactions to the heavenly voice. Some heard a noise like thunder, which shows they were not well attuned to receive a revelation. Others distinguished some kind of communication but thought of nothing higher than the angels. Jesus alone recognized the voice as being for the sake of the hearers.

31 Now is the judgment of this world. The repetition of the 'now' (cf. v. 27) shows the more precise definition of the 'hour'. It consisted, in fact, of judgment for the world, by which must be understood the general condemnation of the present world-order through the cross. 32, 33 And I, when I am lifted up from the earth, will draw all men to myself. John's comment on Jesus' words shows clearly how the uplifting is to be understood. But in what sense is the drawing to be taken? The same word (Gk. helkō) occurs in 6:44 of the drawing by the Father of men to Christ. Here it is Christ crucified that acts as a magnet whose influence none can escape. The statement leaves open the result of the drawing. The idea of drawing to judgment cannot be excluded in view of v. 31, but clearly not all will be drawn for this purpose. 34 The reaction of the crowd shows that they understood the uplifting in some sense which was incompatible with the eternal character of the Messiah. In answer to the question, Who is this Son of man?, 35 Jesus draws attention again to the truth which is also a theme of the prologue, that He is the light. This light is again contrasted with darkness. It is not without considerable meaning that immediately after saying, Walk while you have the light, 36 Jesus departed and hid Himself. The light was not Jesus in His presence, but Jesus in His teaching which they had already heard.

37–43 The next paragraph gives John's summing-up of the effect of Jesus' ministry upon the people. The signs had not generally led to faith and Isaiah's prophecy is cited in support of this fact. There is emphasis here on the divine initiative, although in the LXX the statement has the form 'they closed their own eyes'. John's philosophy of history is that God is the First Cause of events and it is in this sense that he understands Isaiah's words. 38 The first citation, from Is. 53:1, draws attention to the tendency for the prophet's report not to be believed, 40 and the second, from Is. 6:10, points out the obdurateness and hardness of heart with which Isaiah had to contend. John is clearly thinking of the occasion of the statement in Is. 6:10, i.e. the vision of glory in the Temple. 41 Because he saw his glory suggests that the vision was the cause of the prediction, in the sense that it provided the occasion. It is important to notice that John regards the Jewish unbelief in Jesus as a direct fulfilment of prophecy (vv. 37, 38), which shows that he believed that what happened to Isaiah might be expected to happen also to Jesus, a view supported by v. 41. 42 Nevertheless many even of the authorities believed in him. John never tires of matching up instances of unbelief with instances of faith. This present statement strikingly complements v. 37. Yet John admits that motives of self-interest were an inhibiting factor in their faith. All too often fear of men has cramped the testimony of faith.

44–50 The concluding passage of this chapter is a kind of summary of the main themes of the ministry. It is as if Jesus, having withdrawn (cf. v. 36), returns to make one last public announcement before devoting Himself more specifically to the disciples. Or else, the words Jesus cried out may refer to His general teaching rather than to a specific occasion. Three times in this passage Jesus refers to 'him who sent me'. Faith is again stressed, as is also the claim of Jesus to be the light. 47, 48 The concept of judgment is further enlarged upon: I did not come to judge the world but to save the world. Although judgment is determined by the word of Christ, His mission was not primarily for this purpose. Salvation was the objective, judgment but the consequence. 49, 50 For I have not spoken on my own authority. When it comes to judgment, authority (Gk. exousia) is of supreme importance, and once again Jesus claims to have received this from the Father. The theme of eternal life mentioned in v. 50 is but a reiteration of teaching already given by Jesus as recorded earlier in this Gospel. This section prepares the way for the events in the upper room which follow (13:1ff.).

13:1 – 17:26 JESUS WITH THE DISCIPLES

13:1–38 The feet-washing and its sequel

13:1–20 Jesus' symbolic action. The events of this section clearly belong to the day before the Passover (as v. 1 shows), i.e. Nisan 13. There is some difficulty over the fact that the Synoptic Gospels seem to imply that Jesus was crucified on Nisan 15. It is just possible that the difference may be accounted for by assuming that the references are to two different calendars. But the problem is a difficult one and cannot be resolved with complete certainty because of lack of sufficient data about the use of these different calendars (see my New Testament Introduction: Gospels and Acts, 1965, pp. 271ff.).

1–3 The opening section gives a concise statement of the spiritual importance of the events about to happen. Note especially the deep consciousness on the part of Jesus of the dawning of the hour, His constant love for His own people, the work of the devil in Judas resulting in betrayal and the awareness of Jesus of the divine origin and destiny of His work. This is a brief epitome of the drama of the Gospel. 2 When the devil had already put it into the heart of Judas Iscariot. The striking antithesis between the Father's love and the devil's designs is clearly brought out. 3 Yet John is convinced that the hour of sorrow was in the Father's hands, because Jesus was unmistakably convinced of this. 4, 5 The girding and washing that followed were prompted by this conviction. It was clearly a studied symbolic act. It was a totally unexpected act of humility, the meaning of which is given in vv. 12ff.

6 He came to Simon Peter. This suggests that Peter was first, but the Greek does not seem to support this (oun, 'therefore', is omitted from RSV, but would make v. 6 subsequent to the action in v. 5). Peter's question, Jesus' assurance that he would later understand, Peter's emphatic refusal followed by Jesus' statement that unless permission were given Peter would have no share in Jesus' work, and Peter's impetuous and extravagant reversal of attitude are all thoroughly characteristic of Peter and of the Lord's dealing with him as recorded elsewhere. 7 Afterward you will understand refers to the post-resurrection understanding. Many of Jesus' deeds must have been enigmatic until after that event. 10 He who has bathed does not need to wash, except for his feet, but he is clean all over. The washing of the feet was more than an example. It was a means by which the disciples could participate in the Lord's humiliation. This brings cleansing. Nothing more is needed. Peter's impulsive request (v. 9) is irrelevant. 11 You are not all clean. John repeats this statement of Jesus, with an explanation, which was not immediately apparent to the disciples. But John desires to draw attention to our Lord's divine insight.

The next paragraph emphasizes the same theme. 12 Do you know what I have done to you? Jesus challenges them because He knows how limited their understanding is. In answering His own question, 13 Jesus appeals first to His relationship to them (Teacher and Lord), 14, 15 and then to the example He has given. The authoritative nature of His approach is unmistakable, but the surprising character of the exhortation becomes even more striking when it is remembered that humility was despised in the ancient world as a sign of weakness. This action of Jesus was revolutionary in the realm of human relationships. You also ought to wash one another's feet is specific in the context of Jesus' own act and some Christians have literally observed it. Others have considered the principle to be more important than the act, stressing as it does the honourable character of lowly service to others. 16 A servant is literally a slave, who had no rights at all in his master's house. He who is sent represents the Greek word apostolos and is a reminder that apostles held a position of great challenge, being commissioned to conform to the nature of the One who sent them, even if it led to humiliation. 17 If you know . . . if you do. Knowing without doing finds no sanction anywhere in the teaching of Jesus. 18 At this point the dark cloud of the betrayal once more appears. Judas was a man who did not do what he knew to be true. His heel was raised against his Master, and scripture (Ps. 41:9) is cited in support to show that such betrayal did not take Jesus unawares. Even such an action came within the divine providence. 19 The present announcement was intended to lead to faith in our Lord's person. 20 This section closes with a saying, which occurs in Mt. 10:40 at the sending out of the Twelve. Our Lord's meaning here is that too much should not be made of one man who did not receive Him. The positive aspect of receiving those whom Jesus had commissioned is more important.

13:21–30 The exclusion of the betrayer. 21 The mounting tension in the mind of Jesus over the betrayer is seen in John's comment, he was troubled in spirit (cf. 11:33; 12:27, where the same verb is used). It expresses strong distress. 22 The reaction of the disciples is even more vividly described in the Synoptics (cf. Mt. 26:22; Mk. 14:19; Lk. 22:23). This was a tense moment not easily forgotten. The details—the disciples looking at one another, the beloved disciple lying close to Jesus, the beckoning action of Peter, the whispered conversation and the Lord's deliberate and symbolic response—are so vividly told that an eyewitness must be presupposed. 23 One of his disciples, whom Jesus loved. Because of the vivid details, it is a reasonable conclusion that the author is here referring to himself. He was deeply conscious of the love which Jesus showed to His disciples. Some consider it more probable, however, that another is here describing John, and yet others that Lazarus is meant (cf. 11:3, 5). But the first interpretation is preferable. 26 So when he had dipped the morsel. This was a gesture of honour and must be regarded as a final appeal to Judas. 27 John's comment that after this Satan entered into him was no doubt the result of considerable subsequent reflection. Anyone who could act like Judas must be under Satanic influence. 28, 29 The immediate reactions of the disciples at Judas's withdrawal were connected only with financial matters, since he was treasurer for the Twelve. When Jesus said to Judas, What you are going to do, do quickly, no-one can tell what passed through the mind of Jesus or of Judas. 30 John simply states that the latter immediately went out; and it was night. It may well be that John intends more than a comment on the time. It was spiritually night for the soul of Judas.

13:31–35 A new commandment given. 31 Now is the Son of man glorified. Judas's act is but a step in the process of glorification, 32 which involves also the glorification of God. And glorify him at once points to the cross and shows our Lord's triumphant estimate of it. 33 Little children. A diminutive term is here used when Jesus turns His attention to His disciples, in much the same way as a Rabbi would address his pupils. The message which the Jews had misunderstood (cf. 7:33) needed clarification for the disciples. Glorification would involve separation; 34, 35 but love would overcome all difficulties and would show men who were the true disciples of Jesus. A new commandment. Commands to love were already known in the sense of the highest devotion to God, but Jesus' command that the disciples should love one another was new in its scope and in the fact that its motive power sprang from a new source—even as I have loved you. Jesus could never have set a higher pattern before His people than this.

13:36–38 Peter's fall foretold. Peter's curiosity gets the better of him and he seeks an elucidation of the Lord's enigmatic statement of v. 33. In answer Jesus predicts that he will follow later, which causes the impulsive Peter to protest his present whole-hearted allegiance. In Mt. 26:33 a similar confident assertion of Peter's is uttered on the way to Gethsemane. It is the kind of assertion that may well have been repeated. 38 No doubt the prediction of the denial seemed quite incredible to Peter. Indeed it was not until the denial had happened that Peter recognized the truth of the prediction.

14:1 - 16:33 The discourse to the disciples

14:1–11 Assurances and questionings. 1 Let not your hearts be troubled. Forebodings of betrayal and denial must have proved deeply disturbing. Jesus' answer is believe, i.e. an exhortation, or less probably a statement (cf. AV). But He also gives assurances. 2 In my Father's house are many rooms. Because Jesus Himself will soon leave them, He turns their thought towards the Father. The rooms represent abiding-places, symbolic of the ample spiritual provision which God makes for His children. This includes room for His disciples—Jesus will see to that. 3 I will come again and will take you to myself. This future coming most naturally refers to the second advent, but some have interpreted it as referring to the resurrection or to Pentecost or even to a coming at the death of believers (cf. Acts 7:59; 2 Cor. 5:8; Phil. 1:23). 4 And you know the way where I am going. The subsequent questionings show a lack of appreciation of spiritual values on their part, but they had no excuse. 5 Thomas suffers from literalism, which closes his eyes to possibilities. 6 But Jesus gives a spiritual answer to his perplexity, by the great assertion, I am the way, and the truth, and the life. The latter two ideas are both mentioned in the prologue; the first follows from them in spiritual experience. The three ideas may be linked—to mean 'the true and living way'—just as Heb. 10:19, 20 speak of 'the new and living way'—i.e. with two of the nouns, following Aramaic idiom, being understood as adjectives. This assertion is our Lord's answer to Thomas's 'How can we know the way?', as if He had said, 'It is enough that you know Me.' The way to God, personified as it is in Jesus, was a way of suffering and of triumph through humiliation. 7 It is a profound truth that knowledge of Jesus conveys knowledge of the Father. 8 Yet this was something difficult to grasp, as Philip's request shows. Was he thinking of a direct vision of God as the only means of satisfaction? 9 He is rebuked by Jesus for his lack of faith. Have I been with you so long, and yet you do not know me? Philip had had ample opportunity, but had never perceived the true nature of Jesus as the revelation of the Father. 10, 11 Jesus appeals to him to believe the close connection between Himself and the Father. Or else believe me for the sake of the works themselves. This is addressed not only to Philip, but to them all. They had seen Jesus' works. They should have known that He possessed extraordinary power, which could have come only from God.

14:12–31 Exhortations to the disciples. In the following discourse Jesus concentrates on exhortation and encouragement. 12 The words are addressed to the disciples who believe and are therefore timeless in their application to all other believers. Greater works than these will he do. Not only are Jesus' own works to be the pattern for the disciples, but they are actually to exceed them. Clearly the 'works' must here be understood in terms of God-given mission, and 'greater works' would then relate to the wider opportunities which the disciples would have when Jesus had returned to the Father. 13, 14 It would then be possible for Jesus to work through His people. The book of Acts is a commentary on this promise. 15 Faith must be linked with love which will lead to obedience. My commandments refers to all the content of the Lord's teaching. This principle of observance of commandments through the motive of love is a revolutionary advance over the Jewish approach to the Mosaic law. 16 The promise which immediately follows is intended to be closely linked with loving obedience: he will give you another Counsellor. This is the first of five important statements regarding the Holy Spirit in these discourses. The Greek word translated 'Counsellor' (paraklētos) includes the idea of one called in to help, but is not to be restricted to a legal advocate. The more general idea of counselling better expresses the meaning. The counsellor's help is not intermittent, but continuous. 17 Even the Spirit of truth (cf. 15:26; 16:13). Our Lord lays special emphasis on the characteristic of the Spirit as truth because of its obvious importance for a counsellor. The Spirit brings out the antithesis between the world and the disciples, which is further developed in the next paragraph.

18, 19 Jesus next assures His disciples of His continued presence with them, even when the world can no longer see Him. The word desolate literally means 'orphans' and adds special point to Jesus' promise about the Father's love (cf. v. 21). Yet a little while points to the resurrection when the disciples would see Jesus in a new light. 21 Loving Christ and keeping His commandments are inseparable. Moreover Christ's love for us is said to be the basis of His self-revelation to us. 22 But this raised a problem for Judas (not Iscariot). Why not love for all men? And how could Jesus be manifested to some and not to others, if Jesus' words be interpreted on a literal plane? 23, 24 In answer Jesus again draws attention to the love motive, as if declining to be deflected by Judas's question. But it was nevertheless a true answer, for wherever there are believers the Father and the Son make Their home with them and others by this means receive a manifestation. But many do not want either Jesus or His words.

25, 26 The work of the Spirit is again referred to in order to give confidence to the disciples to face the departure of Jesus. These men have heard the teaching of Jesus. They will not only be aided by the Spirit in recalling all that Jesus had said, but they will also receive the Spirit's own interpretation. This Paraclete statement is important for determining ideas about the preservation of the tradition of the teaching of Jesus. No view of Gospel origins which is not in harmony with the promised aid of the Spirit can be considered valid. 27 Jesus goes on to speak of peace and reiterates some of the thoughts already expressed in this discourse. My peace I give to you. The possessive idea is strong. It might be rendered, 'The peace that is mine'. It is a peace which has been put to the test. It was completely unparalleled in the world. The antithesis between Christ's way and the world's way is a frequent theme of these discourses. 28 If you loved me, you would have rejoiced, because I go to the Father. This is a mild challenge to them to recognize the inadequacy of their love, for if they really loved Jesus they would not be troubled, as they obviously are, by the thought of His departure. For the Father is greater than I. There is no need to go into the subtleties of patristic exposition of this statement. It must be regarded in its context, i.e. in the light of the thought that Jesus was going to the Father, which was a process of glorification. His future position would be greater than His present position because of the greatness of the Father. This verse should be compared with 10:30. 29 is closely paralleled in 13:19, and again the end in view is faith. 30 The ruler of this world is coming. The same description of Satan is found in 12:31. It is of significance here because Jesus is deeply conscious of the powerful forces arrayed against Him. Yet He asserts, He has no power over me, or literally, 'He has nothing in me', no point of contact. Instead Jesus is wholly devoted to the Father's plans. It was His aim that the world might know of His love to the Father. In this Jesus is an example of the most effective method of overcoming the devil. 31 This part of the discourses closes with an exhortation, Rise, let us go hence, which has led some scholars to place chs. 15 and 16 before 14, in which case the exhortation marks the conclusion of the sequence of teaching in the upper room. As it stands, however, it must imply that His teaching in chs. 15 and 16 must have been given in the open air on the way to Kidron.

15:1–17 The vine allegory. It is not clear from the narrative where Jesus was when He gave this teaching. If 14:31 marks the point of departure from the upper room, it is possible that Jesus and His disciples were passing by a vine which was then used as a spiritual illustration. 1 I am the true vine. This is another of the great assertions of Jesus. It needs to be considered against the OT concept of Israel as a vine or vineyard (cf. Is. 5:1–7; Ezk. 15:1–6; 19:10–14; Ps. 80:8–16). Jesus may be describing Himself as true (Gk. alēthinē) to mark Himself off from all counterfeits, i.e. He is genuine. But the adjective is more probably used with the meaning that Jesus is the reality of which the Vine of Israel is but the type. My Father is the vinedresser. The reference is to the owner who cares for his vines. 2 The purpose of any vine is to bear fruit, hence the vine cannot be considered apart from its fruit-bearing branches. He takes away . . . he prunes. A good dresser looks at the usefulness of each branch. A completely fruitless branch is not worthy of a place in the vine, while pruning can improve branches with a poor yield. Among the disciples, Judas proved no true part of the vine, while all the others underwent 'pruning' experiences before producing much fruit at Pentecost. 3 Jesus regards the 'pruning' as if already complete: you are already made clean. This purifying action has been effected by means of Jesus' own teaching, the importance of which cannot be overstressed. 4 Abide in me, and I in you. The allegory illuminates this spiritual principle. The branch can receive no sap from the vine unless there is constant and unimpeded contact between them. 5 Jesus makes clear the identification of the branches and brings out the principle of the utter dependence of the disciples upon Him. 6 He is cast forth. This is an explanation of v. 2, for the cast-out branches are those not 'abiding' in the vine, i.e. those not essentially a part of the vine. As details of the allegory must not be pushed too far, it is unnecessary to treat the fire as symbolic.

In the next passage, Jesus draws out some of the implications of the spiritual truth which He has just illustrated. 7 Abiding gives assurance of answered prayer, for those who abide will desire to do the Father's will. 8 Fruit-bearing is not an end in itself; it glorifies the Father. In the statement, and so prove to be my disciples, the verb literally means 'become', which points forward to the completeness of discipleship. 9 The Father's love for Christ is the pattern of Christ's love for His disciples. 10 A similar parallel in the form of an exhortation occurs here, regarding the keeping of commandments. The disciples are not left without an exalted pattern. 11 The whole purpose of this teaching is summed up in joy: my joy . . . your joy. The disciples' joy is dependent on the Master's joy, a joy which results from utter self-sacrificial service. Several times in this passage Jesus stresses the motive power of love. 12, 13 Another high example is set before the disciples. When Jesus said, Greater love has no man than this, there is no doubt that here He was referring to His own approaching death, conceived of as an act of sacrifice on behalf of others. 14, 15 The change of relationship from servants to friends is significant because of what friends are able to share. It is strongly expressed as all that I have heard from my Father. Although this is stated as a completed act, the revelation was not completely understood until after the death and resurrection of Jesus (cf. 16:12). The Spirit would be the interpreter. 16 is a development from v. 7, with the important addition of the divine choice. The initiative is with Christ—I chose you and appointed you. The appointment is to specific tasks, the choosing to discipleship. In my name qualifies the whatever you ask, for it must be in harmony with Christ's nature. 17 Both here and in v. 12 love is said to be a command, which shows its essential character.

15:18 - 16:11 The hostility of the world to Jesus and His disciples. The mind of Jesus again reverts to the impending clash with the forces of this world and considers the further position of the disciples. 18, 19 The first principle is the essential hatred of the world. Hate is the antithesis of love and involves hostility. The second principle is that in spiritual matters like attracts like and repels opposites. Hate is inevitable because you are not of the world. From this it is clear that 'world' is to be understood in a moral sense of the world-order under the control of adverse spiritual forces. 20 Recalling a statement made earlier (13:16), Jesus shows that the disciples, as servants (Gk. douloi), could expect no less persecution than their Master. If they kept my word, they will keep yours also. Since this is an unfulfilled condition, it is equivalent to saying that the world will not heed the disciples' teaching. This does not mean, of course, that none in the world will respond. 21 The reason for the persecution is stated to be ignorance of the true mission of Jesus. 22 But now they have no excuse for their sin. The idea seems to be that the coming of Jesus should have been recognized as from God, throwing a moral responsibility on the hearers which would not have been so had He not come. 23–25 These verses return to the theme of hate. Hate towards Jesus must involve the Father. Hate exists because of deliberate rejection of Jesus' works. Hate in this sense is predicted in Scripture (cf. Pss. 35:19; 69:4).

26 To offset any gloom that might have descended on the disciples, Jesus reassures them with another promise about the Paraclete. The most important aspect of this promise is the repeated assertion that the Spirit proceeds from the Father. The preposition used in the Greek (para) in both statements suggests mission from the Father, rather than external procession as understood by the Greek fathers. The Spirit's main function is witness to Christ. 27 And you also are witnesses, because you have been with me from the beginning. The witness of the Spirit is closely linked with the witness of the disciples. They too, in a special way, can testify to Christ because of their experience of Him. They were eyewitnesses of the historic events.

16:1–4 The coming persecution is here referred to more specifically. To be forewarned is to be forearmed. The main purpose of the warning which Jesus gives is to prepare the disciples. 1 To keep you from falling away is lit. 'to prevent you from being caused to stumble' as by an obstacle. In this case the obstacle was Jewish opposition. 2 They will put you out of the synagogues. Excommunication was something that every devout Jew would understand and dread, for it meant turning away from that cherished heritage which he held dear. But all the early Jewish Christians had to come to terms with this threat. Offering service to God. Much persecution has been prompted by the same deluded motive as here. Saul of Tarsus was a notable example (cf. Acts 9:1, 2; 26:9–11). 3 Jesus points out that the basic reason for this inconsistency is that the persecutors have never really known God.

4 There is a distinction drawn between the earlier and later teaching of Jesus. 5 Now that His going is imminent He has had to give some clearer indications of what is to take place. But He points out that no-one asks Where are you going? The disciples have not as yet attained sufficient spiritual insight to ask this question or even to understand the true mission of Jesus. 6 In spite of His own impending sorrow, Jesus shows Himself deeply sensitive to the disciples' feelings. 7 The answer once again lies in the promise of the Counsellor, for unless Jesus departs the Spirit will not come. 8 And when he comes, he will convince the world of sin and of righteousness and of judgment. This is an aspect of the Spirit's work which has not been previously stressed. The convincing or convicting work of the Spirit through the disciples is directed here towards the world, which the Lord has already shown to be hostile to Him. The convicting does not necessarily involve a recognition of the Spirit's action on the world's part. Whatever conscience the world might display is the Spirit's work. The sequence of sin, righteousness and judgment is significant. 9 The Spirit will show that men are sinners because of their unbelief in Christ; 10 that Jesus is righteous and has been vindicated by His exaltation; 11 and that the ruler of this world (i.e. Satan) is evil and has been judged (i.e. at the cross). The judgment of the ruler of this world shows the operation of divine judgment generally. With this assurance of the Spirit's activity, the disciples need not fear what lay in store for them.

16:12–33 Special promises to the disciples. The next section deals with yet another aspect of the Spirit's work. 12 Jesus has not told them everything, 13 so the Spirit will complete the work. He will guide you into all the truth. The masculine pronoun and the idea of a guide both point to the personality of the Spirit. He can guide only in harmony with His own nature, i.e. truth. It is the authority of the speaker which gives importance to any statement, but the Spirit's authority is one with the Father and the Son. 14 He will glorify me. There is no question of the Spirit's activity being directed to any other end but the glorification of Christ. 15 The repetition draws special attention to this.

16 Already in the upper room discourse Jesus has mentioned His departure (14:18–24) and a similar statement is now repeated. You will see me refers initially to the resurrection. Earlier Jesus had made clear that the world would see nothing of Him (14:19). 17, 18 The perplexity of the disciples is again expressed, although no specific question was addressed to Him (cf. v. 19). It was the expression a little while which bothered them most, while the reference to the Father was also clearly not understood. We do not know what he means. This frank confession suggests the comment of one who was well acquainted with the disciples' private questionings. 19 The perceptiveness of Jesus with regard to their inner motives is vividly brought out, although outward signs of their perplexity were no doubt not lacking. The repetition of the former statement, which had perplexed them, focuses special attention upon it. 20 In reply the Lord stresses again what is in store for the disciples. He thus turns their thoughts away from Himself to them, but the main theme is joy not sorrow. The world will rejoice . . . your sorrow will turn into joy. The believer's sorrow is but an avenue to true joy, which is contrasted with the world's rejoicing over the subject of the believer's lamentations, i.e. the crucifixion of Christ. Sorrow will mark the first little while, but joy will mark the second. 21 When a woman is in travail. In the Greek the definite article is used, which shows that the illustration is based on a universal law. Child-birth is accompanied by anguish, but the joy over a new-born human life far transcends the anguish. 22 The same principle of transformation of sorrow into joy is then applied to the disciples, and the main characteristic of the joy is said to be its security. The transformation is to be effected through Christ's seeing them again, i.e. at the resurrection. This will bring a lasting joy which no amount of opposition will ever destroy. The book of Acts furnishes examples of this (see Acts 2:46; 16:23–25, 34). 23 In that day refers to the time when the full implications of the resurrection have dawned upon them, in which case questions such as the meaning of Jesus' enigmatic statements regarding His departure would be unnecessary. In any case questions will not then be put to Jesus, but to the Father in His name. This reference to prayer is important in view of Jesus' departure and special attention is drawn to it by the formula, Truly, truly. 24 Communion with the Father ensures the completeness of joy. The form of the Greek in the last phrase of the verse shows that Jesus has in mind a constant fullness.

25 I have said this to you in figures. The word for 'figures' has already been used in 10:6 to describe the allegory of the sheepfold. As Jesus chose to speak to the Galilaean crowds in parables, so His teaching to His disciples was necessarily at the moment veiled. The revelation of the Father is not naturally comprehended by men. The hour is coming refers to the Day of Pentecost, after which event Jesus through the Spirit will plainly reveal the truth to the disciples. The meaning of the figures used before the resurrection will then become clear. 26 I do not say to you that I shall pray the Father for you. Jesus returns to the theme of prayer and in this statement suggests that no need will remain for this intercession. 27 For the Father himself loves you. This is the reason for the believer's direct access to the Father. But it is remarkable that the disciples' love is said to be the cause of the Father's love. It would be expected to be the reverse. Yet their love towards Christ and their faith in Him is a striking evidence of God's love towards them. There is a close connection here between love and faith, but no significance can be attached to the order of mention since love connects with the Father's love just mentioned. 28 puts into brief compass Jesus' mission and its consummation.

29–33 The concluding section reveals a further case of inadequate understanding on the part of the disciples. They thought they understood, but Jesus has again to make them aware of their coming failure to support Him. 30 By this we believe that you came from God. Faith in the divine origin of Jesus is here said to be based on His deep understanding of their motives, but their confession must have received a shock following His further revelation. 33 Jesus gives a reassurance to them on the ground of His victory over the world. He regards His work as if it were already complete (the perfect tense is used).

17:1–26 The prayer of Jesus

No indication is given of the place where Jesus prayed and from John's point of view this is unimportant. The prayer may be divided into three sections.

17:1–5 Jesus' prayer for Himself. The main theme of this prayer is glory. 1 Father, the hour has come. Cf. 12:23, where a similar statement is made to enquiring Greeks. The glory of the Son contributes to the glory of the Father. 2 Power over all flesh. This authority given to the Son is fully comprehensive (cf. 5:27). The giving of eternal life is introduced as the main purpose of the Son. 3 What the gift involved is further defined: that (Gk. hina) they know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ. The knowing here is progressive and its object is true as contrasted with false deities. Both titles used here are not found elsewhere in John. In fact this is the only occasion on which our Lord is reported to have used the title 'Jesus Christ'. 4 I glorified relates to the mission of Jesus which is now regarded as accomplished, but doubtless He is including in His own thought the approaching passion. 5 The concluding request for the Father to glorify the Son is important because of the words with the glory which I had with thee before the world was made. These words can be understood only in terms of Christ's pre-existence. The glory is that which He possessed before and to which He returned after the ascension.

17:6–19 Jesus' prayer for His disciples. The first section of this prayer deals with Jesus' revelation to the disciples. 6 I have manifested thy name. This contrasts with the Jewish refusal to pronounce the name of Yahweh. In Christ the disciples have learned to use the name Father. They have kept thy word. Here is our Lord's description of the disciples' approach to the message, to distinguish them from the many who have rejected it. 8 explains the meaning here, for the words of Christ are identified with the word of God. The frequently recurring idea of giving in these verses shows how important this concept was for the mind of Jesus. They have received them. The evidence for this took two forms—knowledge and faith, in both cases centred on the divine origin of the mission of Jesus.

9 This prayer for the disciples is specifically distinguished from prayer for the world. 10 Again the idea of gift and possession is emphasized as well as the fact that Jesus is glorified in the disciples. This is a lesser glorifying than that spoken of in vv. 1 and 5. 11 But they are in the world. It is because the disciples are placed in such an adverse environment that the prayer is so vital. Holy Father, keep them. Here only is the Father addressed by Jesus in this way. The adjective Holy is the antithesis of all that the world stood for. Thy name which thou hast given me. Other readings have 'whom' or 'what', thus avoiding the strangeness of the idea of a name being given to Christ (yet cf. Phil. 2:9, 10). That they may be one, even as we are one. The basis of the unity of God's people is the unity of God Himself. The oneness springs from a unity of nature.

The prayer next turns to past achievements and future prospects. 12 I kept them... I have guarded them. Jesus claims the security of the disciples except for Judas, who is called the son of perdition, a description of his character as wholly given to the way which must end in total loss. In the Greek there is a solemn play on words between 'lost' and 'perdition'. That the scripture might be fulfilled. Probably an allusion to Ps. 41:9 (cf. Jn. 13:18). 13 The future prospect is expressed in the phrase, that they may have my joy fulfilled in themselves. No more exalted prospect could be conceived. The possessive 'my' is emphatic. 14 I have given them thy word refers to the whole message and mission which Jesus imparted by what He taught. The world could only hate what did not belong to it. 15 Yet Jesus is not wanting an escape-route for the disciples, but preservation in an adverse environment. From the evil one. The Greek preposition (ek) means 'out of', suggesting that the world lies in the grasp of the evil one. 17 Sanctify them in the truth; thy word is truth. The meaning is that the disciples are to be set apart for a holy purpose, the sphere of which is truth. Thy word refers to the message of God in the teaching of Christ. 19 For their sake I consecrate myself. There is a close correspondence between the mission of Jesus and the mission of the disciples. Jesus' consecration consisted in the determination to carry through the work of redemption.

17:20–26 Jesus' prayer for the church. 20 The prayer is now extended to include those who are to believe in Christ through the disciples' word. 21 That they may all be one. This unity is applicable only to those who have believed in Jesus Christ. There can be no distinction made between those who had personally heard Jesus and those who would hear only second-hand. The unity is exemplified in the unity of Father and Son and is maintained by abiding in both Father and Son. The purpose of such unity is said to be that the world may believe that thou hast sent me. There is a cycle here—faith leads to unity which leads others to faith. 22 The same idea of unity is expressed, but here it is connected with the theme of glory, which has already been prominent in the first part of the prayer. When believers manifest the glory of Christ this engenders a basic unity. 23 That they may become perfectly one. Nothing short of complete unity is in mind and Jesus makes clear that this must be evident to the world, so that the world may recognize its source.

24–26 The concluding verses are a specific prayer that the disciples may behold the glory of Jesus received before the foundation of the world. Again the pre-existence of Christ comes into view (cf. v. 5). In this prayer Jesus asserts that He has made known the Father's love to the disciples. The plea is based on the righteousness of the Father. The prayer ends with the assurance of the indwelling of Christ in believers.

18:1 – 21:25 PASSION AND RESURRECTION NARRATIVES

18:1 – 19:16 The betrayal and trial of Jesus

18:1–11 The betrayal. Although there are certain points of contact between John's account and the Synoptics, this record of the betrayal is mainly peculiar to John. 1 The Kidron valley, where there was a garden. John alone mentions the name of the valley, whereas the Synoptics name the garden as Gethsemane. John does not mention the agony in the garden, yet knows of it, as v. 11 shows. 2 Judas . . . also knew the place. Jesus must have known this, but made no move to avoid it. 3 A band of soldiers. Although the word used might denote a cohort, John clearly intends only a detachment of troops sent to maintain order. They would accompany the Temple police. 4 Jesus does not wait for Judas to single Him out, but steps forward Himself and addresses the soldiers and the police. 5 Jesus said to them, 'I am he.' This may simply be Jesus' identification of Himself as Jesus of Nazareth, or it may carry with it the implications of the divine nature. The latter seems preferable in view of the reaction. 6 The falling back may be due to the moral supremacy of Jesus, or it may be that His presence struck dread into those concerned. 8 Jesus' request that the disciples should be allowed to go free is another feature found only in John. 9 is seen as a fulfilment of the statement of Jesus in 17:12. 10 Then Simon Peter . . . struck the high priest's slave. The fact that Peter carried a sword is surprising, but suggests that he and the other disciples had anticipated trouble. His act was one of desperation. John alone mentions the slave's name. 11 Shall I not drink the cup which the Father has given me? This seems to be a clear allusion to the cup referred to in the Synoptic accounts of the experience in Gethsemane (cf. Mt. 26:39, 40). There is no thought of withdrawal in Jesus' mind.

18:12–27 The ecclesiastical trial. 12–14 The arrest is concisely related, the chief interest of these verses lying in John's specific reference to Caiaphas as high priest that year, which recalls his earlier important statement to the same effect (11:49–51). Annas, Caiaphas's father-in-law, had previously held the high-priestly office, and still exercised considerable influence.

15, 16 The reaction of only two disciples is mentioned, Peter and another disciple, who may well have been John, although his acquaintance with the high priest is difficult to explain. Nevertheless, had it not been John his name would most likely have been mentioned. It was through this other disciple's agency that Peter gained access to the courtyard, 17 but it led at once to the first denial. 18 Because it was cold. This is specially noted by John because it had deeply impressed itself upon his mind. Luke is the only other Evangelist who mentions the fire and he suggests that the maid recognized Peter by the light from the fire (Lk. 22:56).

19–24 John's account of the denial is split by an account of the preliminary questioning before the high priest. The reply of Jesus to this questioning suggests that the high priest was probing for some secret teaching which Jesus had given to the disciples. 20 I have spoken openly to the world is in emphatic contrast to this suggestion. 21 If the high priest wanted evidence there was ample opportunity for him to seek it from witnesses. Indeed, if any trial were to be conducted according to proper procedure, the defence witnesses should have been called first. Clearly the high priest was not proceeding by legal rules. 22, 23 The blow from the officer's hand and Jesus' calm and reasoned reaction also focus attention on the irregularity of the examination. 24 raises difficulties, if the high priest already mentioned in v. 19 was Caiaphas, unless he was present at the examination before Annas, who although no longer high priest may still have retained the title.

25–27 The account of Peter's denial is resumed. Certainly Peter was putting himself in the place of temptation. The reference to Malchus's kinsman shows the author's close knowledge of the event.

18:28 – 19:16 The trial before Pilate. 28–32 The first episode in the trial takes place outside the praetorium. Pilate examines the accused and His accusers. 28 So that they might not be defiled. The irony of the Jewish scruples is highlighted by John. They were already defiled in their hearts by their plot to kill Jesus. 29 What accusation . . . ? To this reasonable question, 30 the accusers give an answer which both evades the issue and reveals their insolence. 31 It is not lawful for us to put any man to death. The Sanhedrin had power to condemn a man to death, but were required to obtain the sanction of the Roman authorities. 32 It is implied that, since Jesus had predicted death by crucifixion, events were overruled in the fulfilment of the prediction.

33–38 The second incident is set inside the praetorium and consists of an interview between Pilate and Jesus. 33 Are you the King of the Jews? Probably Pilate means by this, 'Do you claim this position?' 34 Jesus' answer is designed to show that He does not have the same idea of kingship as Pilate and it was essential that this should be clearly understood if proper judgment was to be made. 36 Hence Jesus' further comment: My kingship is not of this world. Kingship in the political sense must be supported by power, but spiritual kingship needs no such aid. 37 Pilate's perplexity is revealed in his further question, So you are a king? which cannot be divorced from scorn. Spiritual realities were unintelligible to him. Jesus leaves Pilate to decide the answer for himself, since it was he who had first used the word 'king'. For this I was born . . .

to bear witness to the truth. This makes transparently clear the spiritual character of the Kingship of Jesus. The royalty of the world was not generally linked to the idea of truth. Because of this Pilate's question 38 What is truth? is understandable as well as revealing his impatience.

Pilate's own judgment about the innocence of Jesus and yet 39 his proposition to the Jews about the custom of release show his appalling weakness of character. His suggestion was made in sarcasm, for he calls Jesus King of the Jews. 40 The Jews' request for Barabbas is related in all the Gospels, but in none so concisely and poignantly as here. A robber was preferred to the King of truth.

19:1-3 Pilate gives in and scourging and mockery immediately follow. Scourging was normally part of the examination, but Pilate's use of it was utterly arbitrary and unjustified. It is most probable, in view of Lk. 23:16, that Pilate regarded the scourging as an alternative to crucifixion and 4 this is supported by his action here in again declaring the innocence of Jesus. 3 The tense of the verbs is the imperfect, suggesting a succession of mock acts of homage.

5 The belated attempt of the governor to appeal to the people's pity is another pathetic evidence of his inconsistency and weakness. Here is the man! There is no knowing what significance Pilate attached to this statement. But the statement was more important than he knew, for in his humiliation Jesus stands in place of man as the true man. 6 Crucify him, crucify him! In all the records this clamour follows Pilate's offer to release Jesus. Take him yourselves and crucify him, for I find no crime in him. This is said ironically, for Pilate knew the Jews had no power to carry out crucifixion. 7 The accusers now introduce a religious charge based on an appeal to law. It was not the charge that he has made himself the Son of God which perturbed Pilate, but the reference to a law, for the Romans had committed themselves to maintain Jewish customs and laws. 8 It was probably aggravated by a superstitious fear of the description 'Son of God', which clearly mystified him and 9 prompted the question, Where are you from? The question was irrelevant to the charge and was met by silence. 10 Such silence stings Pilate into reminding Jesus of his authority, but 11 Jesus takes up and corrects Pilate's concept of authority. You would have no power over me unless it had been given you from above. Although Pilate possessed the imperial authority, this did not reach to ultimate destinies. Our Lord is conscious that the whole work of redemption does not rest on the despotic action of the Roman governor. He who delivered me to you is Caiaphas, who is held to be more responsible than Pilate.

12–16 Pilate's further attempt to release Jesus and his capitulation under the threat of being disloyal to Caesar bring the account of the trial to an end. 12 You are not Caesar's friend. Although sometimes used as a title of honour for provincial governors, it is here used as a sign of loyalty. Pilate's record was such that he could not afford to risk any report of this kind reaching the emperor (cf. Lk. 13:1). This seems to have clinched the issue for him. 13 The Pavement was a tessellated area near to the castle of Antonia. 14 Now it was the day of Preparation for the Passover. This is mentioned, together with the precise timing (sixth hour), because for John the relation of the death of Jesus to the Jewish Passover was important. In this Gospel the Passover was not held until after the crucifixion, although the Synoptic Gospels seem to imply that the Last Supper was Passover time (cf. Mk. 14:12). 15 Shall I crucify your King? Pilate addresses his question scornfully, but draws out from the chief priests such a confession of loyalty to Caesar that he could not ignore. The confession was the final apostasy of the official representatives of theocratic Israel.

19:17–37 The crucifixion

17 Jesus was regarded as a common criminal in that He bore His own cross. John does not mention Simon's help in bearing the cross (cf. Mt. 27:32; Mk. 15:21; Lk. 23:26), but the transfer must have happened on the way to Golgotha. 18 Nor does John mention that the other two were crucified on charges of sedition. 19 On the other hand John alone relates that it was Pilate who prepared and caused the title to be placed on the cross. Whereas there are slight variations in the different records in the form of the title, all agree that the inscription contained the words, The King of the Jews. 20–22 It was this statement which caused resentful protests among the Jews, but which revealed the obstinacy of Pilate. It is significant that John refers here to the chief priests of the Jews, clearly by way of contrast to the title given to Jesus.

23 The garments of a condemned man were the perquisite of the soldiers on duty. 24 Here John sees a fulfilment of Ps. 22:18, but the Synoptics do not mention this. 25 Watching the operation were certain women, including the mother of Jesus. Comparison with the other Gospels raises the question whether there were three or four women, including Salome, who is not here mentioned by name. It seems most reasonable to suppose that there were two pairs, in which case Salome was Mary's sister and Mary the wife of Clopas was mother of James of Alphaeus (cf. Mk. 15:40). 26 Woman, behold, your son! This was a tender consideration for the mother of Jesus. If the identification of Salome mentioned above is correct, John was related to Jesus and 27 this would throw light on Jesus' words and John's subsequent action.

28, 30 The concluding moments of Jesus' earthly life are marked by two further cries, one relating to His own human need (I thirst), the other to His completion of His task (It is finished). John again notes a fulfilment of Scripture. 29 So they put a sponge full of the vinegar on hyssop. Since hyssop has only a slender stalk, something else must have been used to support it. Mk. 15:36 refers to vinegar being offered on a reed. Some scholars consider that the original here may have been hyssos, a soldier's javelin. The vinegar would give some strength for the concluding cry.

31 For that sabbath was a high day. It was doubly important to the Jews to observe their ritual requirements on a day which was both sabbath and festival. 32, 33 The brutal procedure of the leg-breaking was not part of the punishment of crucifixion but was resorted to in order to hasten death. 34, 35 The spear-thrust and the flowing out of blood and water evidently had particular importance for the Evangelist, as the latter verse suggests. Without going into the various views regarding the blood and water, it is sufficient to note that these prove the physical reality of Christ's death in contrast to the views held by the Docetists, who claimed that He only appeared to die. He who saw it has been interpreted as a reference either to the author himself, or to a third party. It would not be unnatural for an author, who has carefully concealed his identity, to use the third person when authenticating his personal knowledge of the event. His desire to stress the truth of the matter is to lead to faith. The same adjective for true is used here as in the description of the Vine in 15:1 (q.v.). 36, 37 In harmony with his usual practice John again finds support from the Scriptures, one from Ex. 12:46 and the other from Zc. 12:10.

19:38–42 The burial

John's account of the burial is important mainly for its mention of the part played by Nicodemus. Both he and Joseph of Arimathea were members of the Sanhedrin. 38 Although a secret disciple, Joseph became bold to pay his last devoted service to Jesus. Pilate's granting of permission for burial was in accordance with general Roman procedure. 39 When mentioning Nicodemus the Evangelist for the second time recalls his earlier interview with Jesus (cf. 3:1ff.; 7:50). A mixture of myrrh and aloes, about a hundred pounds' weight was a very costly evidence of Nicodemus' devotion. 41 The tomb in which Jesus was placed was situated in a garden, a feature which John alone mentions. Where no one had ever been laid. Luke also mentions this fact (Lk. 23:53) and Matthew refers to the tomb as being new. The significance of this is that Jesus' body was not brought into contact with corruption.

20:1–31 The resurrection

20:1–10 The empty tomb. Clearly in his resurrection narrative John is selective over the incidents he relates. He intends to illustrate some of the spiritual lessons to be derived from the fact of the resurrection. 1 Mary Magdalene came to the tomb early. She was evidently the first to arrive at the tomb. According to Matthew and Mark an angel gave a message to the two Marys and to Salome. This incident must have preceded that. 2 We do not know where they have laid him. By using the plural Mary is including in her thought the other women who had gone with her, or else is including those to whom she is speaking. She is convinced that they will have no more clue than she has. 3–5 The Evangelist gives a vivid touch to the story as he recalls how the other disciple outran Peter but did not enter the tomb. Of both men it is recorded that they saw the linen cloths lying, but different verbs are used in the Greek, a stronger one to denote intentness of gaze being attributed to Peter. 7 The precise positioning of the different cloths is carefully noted. The isolated napkin suggests that Jesus left the grave clothes without disturbing them. 8 Then the other disciple . . . saw and believed. He interpreted what he saw. The mention of faith here must surely be the touch of an eyewitness. The 'other disciple' is the only one who would know the precise moment of faith. 9 For as yet. A specific knowledge (i.e. understanding) of a specific portion of Scripture is referred to here (presumably Ps. 16:10). It is deeply ingrained in Gospel records that understanding did not come even to the disciples until after the resurrection, and even then only gradually.

20:11–18 The revelation to Mary. Faith had come to the 'other disciple', but not as yet to Mary. 11 She stood weeping, having interpreted the empty tomb as evidence of theft of the body (cf. v. 13). 12, 13 The function of the angels here is to challenge Mary over her weeping. They have no words of comfort or encouragement to offer. 14, 15 In Mary's mind there could be only one person who might have removed the body, i.e. the gardener. When Jesus posed the same question as the angels, she blurted out her worst fears, thinking that she was addressing the gardener. 16 Jesus said to her, 'Mary.' By now she was looking away, but the voice of Jesus, which she at once recognized, called her to turn again to Him. Rabboni! (which means Teacher). In this incident there is an emphasis on personal relationships (cf. 'my Lord' in v. 13). 17 Do not hold me, for I have not yet ascended to the Father. There is no contradiction between this statement and the invitation to Thomas to touch Him. Mary was evidently trying to cling to Him and this He disallows. The introduction of the ascension here is to mark the approaching change of relationship between Jesus and His disciples. Mary is told to announce to the brethren, I am ascending to my Father and your Father, to my God and your God. Does this mean that John places the other appearances (cf. vv. 19ff.) after the ascension assuming a descent? It is better to regard the sequence of appearances as constituting a process of ascending. The present tense of the verb would support this. The distinction between my Father and your Father distinguishes Jesus from others who are children of God. 18 It is noteworthy that Mary's announcement was concerned with her meeting with the Lord, not so much with the ascension.

20:19–31 The revelation to the disciples. 19 Before the end of the same day Jesus appeared to the assembled disciples who were still gripped by fear. Peace be with you. Although this was the ordinary salutation, it means more here, for the words conveyed the Master's own gift of peace. 20 There was no denying His identity, for He showed the marks of crucifixion. Even the risen body carried the proofs. 21 The repetition of the gift of peace brings special emphasis to it. 22 Receive the Holy Spirit. The breathing upon them of the Spirit is understandable, since the Greek pneuma means both breath and spirit. This would appear to be in anticipation of Pentecost, although some specific assurance of the conveyance of the gift is clearly given here. 23 The purpose is stated here. If you forgive . . . if you retain. This is addressed to the disciples as a group (the verbs are plural). Although it is not in the power of man to forgive sins, man can pronounce forgiveness on the basis of what God has done in Christ. This is through the agency of the Holy Spirit within him, making him Christ's ambassador. Those who refuse to accept forgiveness inevitably retain their sins. Because v. 23 follows the reference to the gift of the Spirit, and the words were not confined to the apostles, the authority given is general and not confined in its exercise to special ministers. With this verse, cf. Mt. 16:18, 19; 18:18, 19.

24–29 Thomas's unbelief and subsequent leap to faith are no doubt included in John's story to illuminate the main purpose—to lead to faith in Jesus as Son of God. 24 No reason for Thomas's absence is given, 25 but his emphatic unbelief of their testimony reflects his uneasiness at not having been present. 26, 27 Jesus' return after eight days is marked by a repetition of the salutation of peace and a personal challenge to Thomas. The precise repetition of Thomas's own words must have made a deep impression on the man. The Lord showed sympathy for Thomas's misgivings, but there was no need for him to fulfil his own request. 28 Thomas answered him, 'My Lord and my God!' This marks the highest level of faith recorded in this Gospel. The high conception of the divine nature of Jesus is unmistakable and provides a fitting conclusion to John's record of the path of faith. 29 Blessed are those who have not seen and yet believe. This statement of Jesus is for those whose faith rests on the report of others. Such faith is of a nobler order than Thomas's. It is the kind of faith which has sustained the Christian church to the present time. Ultimately true faith must always be independent of sight.

30, 31 Here the author states his purpose. He makes clear that his record is selective (many other signs . . . which are not written in this book) and that its purpose is to inculcate a specific kind of faith, i.e. in the Messiahship and divine Sonship of Jesus, which will lead to an inheritance of life in His name.

21:1–25 The epilogue

Some scholars have supposed that this chapter is by another author, but there is no MS evidence of the circulation of the Gospel without it. It certainly appears to be something in the nature of an afterthought, perhaps to correct a misunderstanding about a saying of Jesus regarding John (21:23). Unlike those in ch. 20, the incidents here are set in Galilee.

1 After this Jesus revealed himself . . . by the Sea of Tiberias. This clearly places this Galilaean appearance after the Jerusalem appearances. 2 The sons of Zebedee. Since these are unnamed, it is support for John's influence behind the Gospel. 3 The fishing episode here shows some interesting similarity to Luke's account of the call of the first disciples (Lk. 5:1–11). But Peter's I am going fishing suggests an action of despair, a return to his former occupation. The fruitless night's toil is paralleled in Lk. 5:5. 4–8 John sees a spiritual principle here, for he proceeds to show the difference when Jesus is on the scene. 6 At Jesus' command the net is cast over again on the right side of the boat and the result is an unusually large haul (see v. 11). 7 It is the beloved disciple who first recognizes the Lord but does nothing other than telling Peter, who acts on what he heard without attempting to verify its truth by sight. Peter's impulsive action is wholly consistent with the general representation of him in the Gospels. 9, 10 There is a vivid touch in the description of the charcoal fire with its fish and the command of Jesus to bring more fish. 11 A hundred and fifty-three of them. Many fanciful explanations of the precise number have been given, but the best solution is to see the vivid recollection of an eyewitness who recalled the counting of the fish. 12 The invitation from Jesus to the disciples to join Him at breakfast supports the contention that this was an ordinary meal.

15–19 The breakfast leads into the interview between Jesus and Peter. The threefold challenge to Peter may well have been designed to parallel his threefold denial. The differences in the three questions are significant. In the third question the verb used for love (Gk. phileō) is the same as that used in all Peter's answers, but differs from that of the first two questions (Gk. agapaō, which is the nobler type of love). There are slight differences also in the three exhortations to Peter. The first and the third use the word feed, whereas the second uses the word tend (Gk. poimainō) which involves all the responsibilities of shepherding the sheep. The second and third are, moreover, directed to the sheep and the first to the lambs. 17 Lord, you know everything; you know that I love you. This is the strongest assertion of the three called out by Peter's grief at being asked three times. The second word for 'know' (Gk. ginōskō) in this statement differs from the first (Gk. oida), which is also used in the other two assertions, and may convey the idea of knowledge gained by experience. 18 When you are old . . . another will gird you. Tradition has it that Peter was crucified upside-down. 19 John clearly knows of some report concerning Peter's death. Follow me (cf. v. 22) recalls the initial commissioning of Peter (Mt. 4:19).

20–23 The brief interchange between Jesus and Peter regarding John seems intended to correct a misunderstanding. The rather elaborate and somewhat self-conscious way in which John is referred to suggests that it is the author himself. Peter is rebuked for his inquisitiveness and the form of this rebuke led to the misunderstanding.

24, 25 The comment would be most relevant if the disciple concerned were still alive, and this is borne out by the additional note. This is the disciple who is bearing witness to these things, and who has written these things. In no clearer way could the author claim to have been an eye-witness. Others are prepared to authenticate the truth of his testimony (as the plural verb shows). The last verse is intended to emphasize again the selective character of the whole Gospel.

DONALD GUTHRIE

The Acts of the Apostles

INTRODUCTION

The book of the Acts is the sequel to the third Gospel, and written traditionally by the same author, Luke, the beloved physician and companion of Paul (cf. Col. 4:14). The external evidence from the 2nd century onwards, which is unanimous on this point, is corroborated by the internal evidence of the style, outlook and subject-matter of the two books. (See The Acts of the Apostles; The Greek Text with Introduction and Commentary[2], by F. F. Bruce, 1952, pp. 1ff.)

Acts, like the third Gospel, is dedicated to a certain Theophilus (cf. Lk. 1:3 with Acts 1:1). The third Gospel is the 'first book' of the opening sentence of Acts. Theophilus appears to have been a person of some distinction, as he is accorded the title 'most excellent', elsewhere given to the Roman governors of Judea (Acts 23:26; 24:2; 26:25). He had already acquired some information about the Christian faith, and it was to provide him with a more accurate account of its trustworthiness that Luke in the first instance wrote his history of Christian beginnings, carrying the story from the nativity of John the Baptist and Jesus (c. 8–6 BC) to the end of Paul's two years' detention at Rome (c. AD 61).

Thus, Luke and Acts are not really two works, but two parts of one work; and the brief preface to the Gospel (Lk. 1:1–4) is intended to apply to both parts. Arguments advanced for the belief that Luke projected a third volume are not conclusive.

The date of the twofold work is a matter of dispute; some would put it as late as AD 90; but the weight of evidence seems to the present writer to favour an earlier date, probably not long after the last event of which Acts tells. Acts ends on a note of triumph, as has often been pointed out, with Paul proclaiming the gospel at Rome, in the heart of the Empire, without let or hindrance.

Would such a note of triumph have been sounded if, indeed, Paul had been executed by the time Luke wrote, or if the Neronian persecution had already taken place? As it is, there is no hint either of that persecution or of Paul's death (unless Acts 20:25, 38 be interpreted in the latter sense). Again, should we not have expected some reflection of the Jewish revolt of AD 66 and the destruction of the Temple and city of Jerusalem four years later if these had been events of the past when Acts was written? Considerations such as these have suggested a date for the composition of Acts practically coincident with the last event it mentions, the termination of Paul's two years of house-arrest in Rome.

On the other hand, the theological outlook of the book has been felt to point to a later date. One scholar has gone so far as to envisage a date towards the middle of the 2nd century, on the ground of affinities between the attitude of Acts and that of Justin Martyr (J. C. O'Neill, The Theology of Acts, 1961). To this it may be said a. that the narrative of Acts is so true to its 'dramatic date' that a date of composition a century later is on that score improbable; and b. that the affinities between Luke and Justin are accounted for in that Luke in several respects serves as the 1st-century prototype for the 2nd-century apologists. More generally, the 'early catholicism' of Acts has been held to be a sufficient argument for its post-apostolic dating. Not only is the 'delay of the parousia' no longer an acute problem and the current 'age of the Spirit' viewed as an independent chapter in the unfolding of the divine purpose on earth; the Jewish–Gentile tension in the church is a thing of the past, resolved once for all by the Jerusalem decree of Acts 15. Paul and the Twelve are brothers-in-arms, not leaders of two separate missionary enterprises, the former orientated to Gentiles and the latter to Jews; Peter preaches to Gentiles (as in Acts 10:34–43) and Paul to Jews (as in Acts 13:16–41) without any feeling that the one is trespassing on the other's mission-field. In this regard, it is said, Acts reflects not the turbulent situation of Paul's Galatian and Corinthian correspondence, where Paul has to contend with Judaizers on one front as energetically and vigilantly as with gnosticizing libertines on the other, but the calmer waters of Ephesians, which from this point of view is self-evidently sub-Pauline, where Jewish and Gentile believers are happily reconciled to each other in Christ, the old hostility having died out. (See, e.g., E. Käsemann, 'Ephesians and Acts', in Studies in Luke–Acts, ed. L. E. Keck and J. L. Martyn, 1966, pp. 288–297.)

With regard to these arguments it must be said that the presuppositions on which they are based call for critical appraisal. In particular, the belief that Pauline Christianity and 'early catholicism' are mutually exclusive is perhaps not so axiomatic as Lutheran scholars especially are prone to assume. Luke has his own distinctive presentation of Christianity, which is not identical with Paul's, and in that presentation 'early catholicism' of the kind we find in Acts was an important element; but there is nothing in this

'early catholicism' which a man of Luke's outlook could not have held in the late sixties. It was one of his concerns to bridge the gap between Jewish and Gentile Christianity, and to show that the Gentile mission (to which he himself presumably owed his faith) was the legitimate development of the ministry of Jesus and original Jerusalem Christianity.

An earlier draft than our present Luke–Acts may have been prepared by Luke, if not to serve as one of the 'documents in the case' when Paul's appeal came up for hearing before the Emperor, then to supply the intelligent middle-class public of Rome, of whom Theophilus was a representative, with reliable information about the origin and character of Christianity. Paul's case must have made it necessary for some Roman officials to acquaint themselves with the peculiarities of this 'Way' which had won for Paul such animosity on the part of his fellow-Jews, but where were they to turn for a trustworthy account? Luke made it his business to provide them with the very thing they sought.

But later Luke expanded this preliminary and ad hoc draft by the inclusion of material which would not have been immediately relevant to that apologetic purpose. If, at the time of publication of the completed work, the Neronian persecution had come and gone, and Paul was now dead, no matter: Nero's damnatio memoriae might stamp his persecution as a horrible aberration from the path of true Roman justice. What the path of true Roman justice was could be shown from the record of Paul's apostolic activities in the eastern provinces—activities which (albeit in restricted circumstances) the authorities allowed him to pursue freely for two years in Rome itself. If, at the same time, Luke seized the opportunity to make a clear distinction between Judaism and Christianity, that would be no handicap to Christianity, but rather the reverse, at a time when Judea was in revolt against the Empire. A date towards AD 70 for Acts in its present form might thus be indicated.

The date of Acts cannot be considered in isolation from the date of Luke. If Acts does not obviously presuppose that Jerusalem has fallen, in the opinion of many this is certainly presupposed in Luke, especially in the eschatological discourse of Lk. 21. It is not so certain as many think that the fall of Jerusalem is in fact presupposed in Lk. 21, but a possibility to be borne in mind in this regard is that the original two-volume work comprised Proto-Luke (see the General Article, 'The fourfold Gospel', pp. 68f.) and Acts, and that those features in Luke which point to a date after AD 70 were not present in Proto-Luke (see C. S. C. Williams, The Acts of the Apostles, 1957, pp. 12ff.).

Very early in the 2nd century, the four Gospels, which hitherto had circulated separately, began to be bound up together in one collection. This led to the separation of the two parts of Luke's history. The second part soon began to circulate independently, under the title 'The Acts of the Apostles'. There is some textual evidence that the separation of the two parts led to a slight readjustment at the end of Luke and the beginning of Acts; possibly at this time the former was rounded off by the addition of the words 'and was carried up into heaven' in Lk. 24:51 (mg.), which naturally involved the addition of 'was taken up' in Acts 1:2. If this be so, some discrepancies which have been noted between the ascension stories of Luke and Acts disappear, for there would then be no record of the ascension in the former.

LUKE THE PHYSICIAN

Luke was not himself a personal companion of Jesus before the cross. He was, according to a tradition going back to the Anti-Marcionite Gospel Prologues at the end of the 2nd century, and even earlier to the formation of the 'western' text (see on 11:27), a native of Syrian Antioch, and in that case his acquaintance with Christianity may have dated from the early days of Christian witness in that city, when the gospel was first preached on a large scale to Gentiles and the first Gentile church was established. For Luke appears to have been a Gentile. In Col. 4:10f. Paul sends greetings from three friends, Aristarchus, Mark and Jesus Justus, whom he calls his only Jewish fellow-workers. And as he then goes on in vv. 12–14 to send greetings from three others—Epaphras, Luke and Demas—we conclude that they were Gentile Christians.

There are several touches about Luke's history which betoken the Greek outlook. Sir William Ramsay suggested that he was a brother of Titus, and although this suggestion can hardly be based on 2 Cor. 8:17–19 (where Origen thought the 'brother, whose praise is in the gospel in all the churches', as AV has it, to be Luke: cf. the Collect for St. Luke's Day), it is at least a possibility. Titus also was a Greek from Antioch (Gal. 2:1–3), and although it is evident from the Epistles that he played a very important part among Paul's companions, he is never mentioned in Acts.

SOURCES AND COMPOSITION

What, then, were Luke's sources of information as he traced the course of all things accurately from the very first? For part of the narrative of Acts, of course, he was himself present at the events. This he indicates delicately but unmistakably by his sudden transition from the third person to the first person plural in 16:10; 20:5; 27:1, three verses which mark the commencement of what we call the 'we' sections. It is, of course, possible to suppose that the author of Acts incorporated in his work the travel-diary of some eyewitness, not himself, but in this case the simplest hypothesis—that the author incorporated part of his own diary, that the 'we' of the diary includes the 'I' of 1:1—is also on general grounds the most satisfactory. And as most of the second half of Acts, even apart from these 'we' sections, is devoted to the activity of Paul, Paul's beloved physician had ample opportunity for first-hand information about these events. While the narrative of the Ephesian ministry, for example, does not fall in one of the 'we' sections, some parts of it exhibit the vividness of an eyewitness account, especially the description of the riot in the theatre (19:23–41), for which Luke was probably indebted to Gaius and Aristarchus, who were present.

He had many other possible informants about events in the earlier days of the church's life, before Paul's conversion, as well as about the events narrated in his Gospel. A native of Antioch must have met many who could tell him about those beginnings, such as Barnabas and even possibly Peter (cf. Gal. 2:11); and he had special opportunities of amplifying his knowledge during the two years when Paul was kept in custody in Caesarea (Acts 24:27). In that city lived Philip the evangelist, with his four prophesying daughters, who are mentioned by later writers as informants about persons and events in the infant church. In Jerusalem, Luke stayed with Mnason, one of the original disciples (Acts 21:16), he met James the Lord's brother, and this contact with the holy family may suggest a possible source for the nativity narrative of Lk. 1 and 2.

The question of written sources, apart from the travel-diary on which the 'we' sections are based, is entirely problematical. One or more Jerusalem sources, a Caesarean source, an Antiochene source and some others have been discerned, but it cannot be established that any of these was available to the author in written form. Some form-critical study has been devoted to certain parts of the book, especially the narratives of escapes from prison and the voyage and shipwreck narrative of ch. 27, but the upshot of this is little more than that these narratives conform in measure to well-recognized patterns widely followed in the relating of such incidents. (See M. Dibelius, Studies in the Acts of the Apostles, 1956.)

One branch of the source-criticism of Acts canvasses the possibility that an Aramaic document or documents may underlie the first half of the book. Here too it must be said that the evidence for written sources is not conclusive. Certainly the earlier chapters of Acts breathe a different atmosphere from the later chapters. When Paul sets out on his missionary journeys, we breathe the fresh air of the wide spaces of the Roman Empire; but in the earlier part of the book, which deals mainly with events in Jerusalem and other parts of Palestine, there is (as might be expected) a clearly discernible Semitic atmosphere. Some sections of these earlier chapters, especially some reports of apostolic preaching, not only reflect an Aramaic-speaking environment but present evidence of an oral Aramaic substratum. (See M. Black, An Aramaic Approach to the Gospels and Acts[3], 1967; M. Wilcox, The Semitisms of Acts, 1965.)

Luke probably employed a good part of the two years of Paul's imprisonment in Caesarea setting in order the material which he had gathered thus far. On the Proto–Luke hypothesis (see the General Article, 'The fourfold Gospel', p. 68), this material, so far as it related to the life and ministry of Jesus, constituted the first draft of the Gospel of Luke, and we may surmise that, so far as it related to the subsequent period, and especially to the career of Paul, it was designed to provide background information which might be helpful when Paul's appeal was heard in Rome. Later, Luke amplified both parts of his work. The Proto–Luke hypothesis envisages the amplification of the first draft of the Gospel by the incorporation (among other things) of a good deal of the substance of Mark's Gospel, and it has been held that Luke was also indebted to Mark for some of the 'Jerusalem' information appearing in the first twelve chapters of Acts. (For a judicious appraisal of the source-criticism of Acts see J. Dupont, The Sources of Acts, 1964.)

HISTORICAL CHARACTER

Luke's sources of information were second to none in value, and he well knew how to use them. The resultant work is a masterpiece of historical accuracy. Unlike the other NT writers, Luke sets his work in the framework of contemporary imperial events. He is the only NT writer who so much as mentions a Roman emperor's name. His pages are full of references to provincial governors and client kings. A historian who does this sort of thing must do it carefully if he does not wish to be exposed as inaccurate; Luke emerges from the severest test with flying colours. What has struck several critics most is the familiar way in which he moves among the multiplicity of varying titles borne by officials in the cities and provinces of the Empire, getting them right every time. Almost as striking is the deft way in which, with a few touches, he paints the true local colour of the widely differing places mentioned in his narrative.

A detailed and thoroughgoing vindication of the historical accuracy of Acts, especially in relation to Asia Minor, was provided by Sir William Ramsay, who devoted many years to intensive archaeological research in that area. When he went out there first in the eighties of last century, he accepted the then current Tübingen theory that Acts was a late and unhistorical production of the middle of the 2nd century; and it was not apologetic interests, but the evidence of archaeology, that compelled him to recognize that Luke's writings reflect the conditions, not of the 2nd century but of the 1st, which were very different, and reflect these with unsurpassed accuracy. Ramsay sums up Luke's qualities as a historian in these words:

'Luke's history is unsurpassed in respect of its trustworthiness. . . . Luke is a historian of the first rank: not merely are his statements of fact trustworthy, he is possessed of the true historic sense; he fixes his mind on the idea and plan that rules in the evolution of history; and proportions the scale of his treatment to the importance of each incident. He seizes the important and critical events and shows their true nature at greater length, while he touches lightly or omits entirely much that was valueless for his purpose. In short, this author should be placed along with the very greatest of historians' (The Bearing of Recent Discovery on the Trustworthiness of the New Testament, 1915, pp. 81, 222). When it is said that Luke 'touches lightly or omits entirely much that was valueless for his purpose', we should observe (perhaps more clearly than Ramsay did) that Luke's main purpose in his finished work is to relate the on-going story of salvation as the gospel advances along the road to Rome, and not necessarily to answer a modern historian's questions—e.g. what happened in the end to Paul and Peter. The 'critical events' for him are those which, like the conversion of Paul and the first evangelization of Gentiles, are epoch-making in the history of salvation.

Ramsay's estimate is frequently regarded as exaggerated, but students of Acts who ignore his unique contributions to the study of that book impoverish themselves and their pupils. 'Every reader of St. Paul the Traveller knows with what a wealth of detail Ramsay brings out the historical value of innumerable passages in Acts' (W. F. Howard, The Romance of New Testament Scholarship, 1949, p. 151). (A more recent assessment of Acts in this regard is provided by H. J. Cadbury in The Book of Acts in History, 1955; see also A. N. Sherwin-White, Roman Society and Roman Law in the New Testament, 1963.)

It has been held against Luke's standing as a historian that he is too fond of miracles. But he does not relate miracles for the sake of the miraculous; to him, as to the other Evangelists, they are important because they are signs as well as wonders—signs, that is, of the inauguration of the New Age, signs of the Messiahship of Jesus. For just as Jesus in the Gospels performs these signs and mighty works in His own Person, so it is He who, in Acts, performs them from heaven by His Spirit in His representatives, as they act in His name and by His authority.

It is noteworthy, too, that the miraculous element is not scattered at random throughout the book; it is more prominent at the beginning than at the end, and that is what we should expect in any case. 'Thus we have a steady reduction of the emphasis on the miraculous aspect of the working of the Spirit which corresponds to the development in the Pauline Epistles; it seems reasonable to suppose that Luke is here reproducing his sources faithfully.' (Cf. W. L. Knox, The Acts of the Apostles, 1948, p. 91.)

When we consider how scanty is our knowledge of the progress of Christianity in other directions during the years AD 30–60, and in all directions during the decades that followed those 30 years, we may estimate our indebtedness to Acts for our relatively detailed knowledge of its expansion along the road from Jerusalem to Rome during the period which it covers.

APOLOGETIC INTEREST

While the primary and stated object of Luke's history was to provide Theophilus (and the class of reader represented by him) with a trustworthy account of the origin of the gospel, and its progress from Palestine to Italy, other aims can be discerned. One obvious one is to demonstrate that the Christian movement was not a menace to law and order throughout the Roman Empire. Luke demonstrates this by citing the testimonies of imperial representatives. As Pilate pronounces our Lord 'not guilty' of the threefold charges of rebellion, sedition and treason (Lk. 23:4, 14, 22), so, when similar charges are brought against His followers, Luke shows what ill success they meet. The praetors of Philippi, it is true, imprison Paul and Silas because of a threat to property interests, but have to release them with a humble apology for their high-handed excess of jurisdiction (Acts 16:19ff., 35ff.). The politarchs of Thessalonica are content to find citizens of that place who will be guarantors for the missionaries' good behaviour (Acts 17:6–9). Gallio, the proconsul of Achaia, the brother of the influential Seneca, who was Nero's tutor and adviser in the early years of his rule, refuses to listen to the charges made against Paul by the Corinthian Jews, recognizing that they are not charges of which Roman law takes cognizance, but internal questions of Jewish theology (Acts 18:12–17). At Ephesus, Paul enjoys the goodwill of the Asiarchs, the chief men of the cities of the province of Asia (Acts 19:31); and when a riot is aroused by the outcry of property interests versus the threat implicit in Christianity against the cult of Ephesian Artemis, the town clerk of the city testifies that Paul and his companions have been guilty of no indictable offence in relation to the worship of the great goddess (19:35–41). At Jerusalem, Paul's bitterest enemies do their best to procure his condemnation by the Roman governors Felix and Festus, with conspicuous ill success; Festus and the petty king Agrippa II agree that he has committed no offence worthy of death or imprisonment, and that he might have been set free had he not, in order to secure a fairer trial than he feared he might receive in Palestine, appealed to the supreme tribunal of the Emperor in Rome (Acts 26:32). And Acts ends on a triumphant note, with Paul in custody, it is true, but yet prosecuting his missionary work unmolested in the Imperial City itself. The implication of all this is that fair-minded judges, reaching a decision in accordance with the impartial ideals of Roman law, could not accept the misrepresentations of those who charged Christianity and its preachers with subversive activity inimical to the interests of the imperial administration.

It could not be denied, however, that wherever Paul and his companions had gone, trouble had risen. If the new movement was really as innocent as Luke maintained, how had it so invariably been attended with so much unrest? In taking up this argument, Luke shows himself a pioneer in another form of Christian apologetic which was to become very popular—the defence of the gospel against the Jews, conducted in such a way as to present Christianity, not Judaism, as the true fulfilment of the faith of the patriarchs and prophets. With the exception of the incident at Philippi and the riot at Ephesus, Luke explains that the trouble encountered by the gospel was due to the opposition fomented in almost every place by the Jews. In the Gospel it is the Jewish Sanhedrin, led by the Sadducean chief priests, who overbear Pilate's desire to acquit Jesus and force him to condemn Him. So in Acts it is Jews who are the fiercest enemies of the gospel in almost every place visited by Paul. In Damascus, Jerusalem, Pisidian Antioch, Iconium, Lystra, Thessalonica, Beroea, Corinth, it is his own fellow-countrymen who form the greatest hindrance to his work. They deeply resented the way in which Paul, as it seemed to them, poached on their preserves by visiting the synagogues and enticing away those Gentiles who attended worship there, and who, the Jews hoped, would one day become full proselytes. The bulk of the Jews, in city after city to which Paul went, would not have Jesus as the Messiah themselves, and were enraged when the Gentiles accepted Him; and while Acts records the steady advance of the gospel in the great Gentile communities of the Empire, it records at the same time its progressive rejection by that nation to which it was first offered.

Yet another branch of early Christian apologetic is adumbrated in Acts—the defence of the gospel against pagan religion, accompanied by an exposure of the folly of idol worship. This apologetic strain appears in Barnabas and Paul's remonstrance with the men of Lystra (14:15–18) and in Paul's speech before the Athenian Areopagus (17:22–31), early Christian expositions of the theme of natural revelation.

THEOLOGICAL EMPHASIS

Luke's historical competence is compromised neither by his apologetic interest nor by his status—increasingly recognized nowadays—as one of the theologians of the NT, standing in his own right alongside the others. Certain features of his theology (e.g. his 'early catholicism') have been mentioned above in the discussion of the date of Acts. But the dominating theological motif of Acts is the presence and work of the Holy Spirit. At the beginning of the book, the promise of the Spirit is made by the risen Lord, and this promise is fulfilled for the Jews in ch. 2, and for Gentiles in ch. 10. The apostles proclaim their message in the power of the Spirit, manifested by outward supernatural signs; the converts' acceptance of the message is likewise attended by visible manifestations of the Spirit's power. This probably explains what some have felt to be a difficulty in Acts—that the Spirit is received by some believers after repentance and baptism (as by the Jews who believed on the Day of Pentecost, 2:38), by some after baptism and the imposition of apostolic hands (as by the Samaritans in 8:15ff. and the Ephesian disciples in 19:6), and by others immediately on believing, before baptism (as by Cornelius's household, 10:44). What Luke is thinking of in each case is not so much the invisible operation of the Spirit in the soul as His outward manifestation in speaking with tongues and prophesying.

Indeed, the whole book might well be called, as A. T. Pierson called it in the title of his exposition, 'The Acts of the Holy Spirit'. The Holy Spirit controls the whole work; He guides the messengers, such as Philip in ch. 8 and Peter in ch. 10; He directs the Antiochene church to set Barnabas and Saul apart for the work to which He Himself has called them (13:2); He guides them from place to place, forbidding them to preach in Asia or enter Bithynia, but giving them clear indications that they must cross to Europe (16:6–10); He receives pride of place in the letter from the Apostolic Council to the churches of Syria and Cilicia: 'it has seemed good to the Holy Spirit and to us' (15:28). He speaks through prophets, foretelling for example the famine of the days of Claudius and Paul's arrest at Jerusalem (11:28; 21:11), just as He spoke through the prophets of OT days (1:16; 28:25). It is He primarily who appoints the elders of a church to be its overseers (20:28). He can be lied to (5:3), tempted (5:9), and resisted (7:51). He is the primary Witness to the truth of the gospel (5:32).

In short, for Luke, as for Paul, the present age is the age of the Spirit, during which the work accomplished by Christ for His people is made effective in them by the Spirit, while the 'powers of the age to come' operate already through the same Spirit. Luke envisages the age of the Spirit as a distinct and substantial phase of the history of salvation, and discourages overenthusiastic eagerness for an imminent parousia. As in his Gospel he relates how the parable of the pounds was told because some 'supposed that the kingdom of God was to appear immediately' (Lk. 19:11), so at an early point in his second volume he tells of the angelic direction to the apostles not to 'stand looking into heaven' (Acts 1:11). The accompanying words imply that Jesus would return in due course, but none the sooner for their standing and looking; meanwhile there was work for them to do, so let them return to Jerusalem and get on with it. For this Lucan perspective see H. Conzelmann,

The Theology of St. Luke, Eng. tr. 1960; the title of the German original, Die Mitte der Zeit (1954), defines his thesis, according to which the age of Jesus is for Luke 'the middle of time', preceded by the age of Israel and the law and followed by the age of the church and the Spirit. To Conzelmann's contribution should be added the insight of D. P. Fuller (Easter Faith and History, 1965), that Luke sees the events which he records in Acts, and especially the Gentile mission, as the fulfilment, outworking and verification of the act of God which culminated in the resurrection and ascension of Christ—an act of God both redemptive and creative, accomplished with a purpose of love for mankind without distinction and attested by apostolic witnesses. Such a perspective does not require more than a generation from the resurrection to take form and expression.

COMMENTARY

1:1 – 5:42 THE BIRTH OF THE CHURCH

1:1–26 The forty days and after

In the first five chapters we have a series of pictures of the primitive Christian community in Jerusalem. The book opens where Luke's Gospel left off, with the risen Lord appearing to His disciples at intervals during forty days, directing them to wait in Jerusalem until they should receive heavenly power, and then to act as His witnesses in Jerusalem, Judea and Samaria, and to the ends of the earth. It has been pointed out that this threefold geographical indication (1:8) forms a sort of Index of Contents to Acts, for this is the order in which Luke describes the gospel spreading. The words of Christ, you shall be my witnesses, are noteworthy as being a quotation from Is. 43:10; the implication is that these words of the great OT prophet are fulfilled in the disciples of Jesus; they form both the remnant of the old Israel and the nucleus of the new.

Then comes the account of the ascension, after which the disciples, 120 strong, wait in Jerusalem for the fulfilment of the promise of the Spirit, and meanwhile fill the vacancy left in the number of the Twelve by the defection of Judas, for whose fall they find OT prediction (cf. Mt. 27:9f.; Jn. 17:12).

1 The first book; i.e. the third Gospel, also addressed to Theophilus (Lk. 1:3). Who Theophilus was we cannot be sure, but he appears to have been a Roman citizen of equestrian rank, and possibly of administrative position, as the title 'most excellent' (Lk. 1:3) suggests. All that Jesus began to do and teach. Since the subject-matter of the third Gospel is summed up thus, the implication is that this new volume is to deal with what Jesus continued to do and teach after His ascension—by His Spirit in His followers. 3 Appearing to them during forty days. Hence in the Christian calendar Ascension Day falls on the fortieth day after Easter. But Jesus' exaltation to God's right hand, which is what Ascension Day really commemorates, did not await the fortieth day after His triumph over death. In the primitive apostolic message His resurrection and ascension, which together constitute His exaltation, are viewed as one continuous movement. The fortieth day marked the last time on which He vanished from His disciples' sight after a resurrection appearance: the series of frequent though intermittent visitations was now brought to an end with a scene which brought home to them their Master's heavenly glory. We should not imagine that the intervals between these appearances were spent by Him in some earth-bound condition. Speaking of the kingdom of God. This brief statement was expanded by the Gnostics to represent Jesus as imparting esoteric teaching such as the Gnostic schools maintained. But 'the kingdom of God is conceived as coming in the events of the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus, and to proclaim these facts, in their proper setting, is to preach the Gospel of the Kingdom of God' (C. H. Dodd). No doubt the bearing of Jesus' passion and triumph on the message of the kingdom was now made plain to the disciples. 4 Staying with them. Or 'eating with (Gk. synalizomenos) them' (RSV mg.). 5 You shall be baptized with the Holy Spirit. Cf. John's own prediction in Mk. 1:8; Lk. 3:16, which is nowhere mentioned explicitly in Acts. 9 A cloud, such as enveloped the glory of God in the OT; cf. Ex. 40:34; 1 Ki. 8:10f. The farewell appearance of the risen Lord took the form of a theophany. 11 In the same way. Possibly with particular reference to the cloud (v. 9); cf. Lk. 21:27 (Mk. 13:26); Mk. 14:62. 13 The list of apostles agrees with that in Lk. 6:14ff., with some variation in order, and the omission here of Judas Iscariot. 14 Mary the mother of Jesus. Her last appearance in the NT. His brothers. Now for the first time associated with the disciples (contrast Jn. 7:5); at least one of them, James, had seen the risen Lord (1 Cor. 15:7).

18 Now this man. . . . Vv. 18 and 19 must be regarded as Luke's parenthesis, not as part of Peter's words to his fellow-disciples. Falling headlong, or 'swelling up' (mg.); the adjective prēnēs is founded in both senses. 19 Field of Blood. Cf. Mt. 27:8.

20 The quotations are from Pss. 69:25 and 109:8. 22 Beginning from the baptism of John. . . . The period is that of Jesus' public ministry, covered by the apostolic preaching (cf. Acts 10:37) and by the Gospel of Mark. The outstanding qualification is that the new recruit to the Twelve must be a witness to his resurrection. 23 Joseph called Barsabbas. Of him Papias relates, on the authority of Philip's daughters, that he suffered no harm after drinking snake-venom (cf. Mk. 16:18). Matthias. There is no further record of him to which any serious attention need be paid. 26 And they cast lots. Deliberate selection and prayer played their parts in this appointment as well as the lot. The lot was a sacred institution in ancient Israel and was a well-established means for ascertaining the divine will (cf. Pr. 16:33), being in fact the principle of decision by Urim and Thummim (see NBD, art. 'Divination'). This is the first and last occasion of the employment of the lot by the apostles; it belongs, significantly enough, to the period between the ascension and Pentecost; Jesus had gone, and the Holy Spirit had not yet come. But if there are better ways of appointing the right men to ecclesiastical responsibilities, there are also worse ways. And he was enrolled with the eleven apostles. The idea that Paul was divinely intended to be the twelfth, and that the apostles here wrongly anticipated God's plan, betrays a misunderstanding of the unique character of Paul's apostleship.

2:1–13 The Day of Pentecost

1 The Day of Pentecost, the Feast of Weeks (cf. Lv. 23:15; Dt. 16:9), which fell on the fiftieth day after the passion Passover, found the little community gathered together in one place. Suddenly the Holy Spirit took possession of them while visible and audible signs accompanied the effusion of the promised heavenly Gift. 2 There was a sound as of a mighty wind; 3 and tongues as of fire appeared, resting on each one of them. 4 But more impressive was the outburst of glossolalia, speaking in other tongues, as the disciples were heard praising God in languages and dialects diverse from their native Galilaean Aramaic, but recognizable by visitors to the feast as those which some of them spoke. Most of the visitors would speak the common Greek dialect (the Koinē) except those from eastern parts (Parthia, Media, Persia, Mesopotamia, Syria), who would speak in Aramaic dialects.

5 There were dwelling in Jerusalem Jews, devout men from every nation under heaven. According to rabbinical tradition, the Feast of Weeks was the anniversary of the giving of the law at Sinai, and on that occasion the voice of God was heard by every nation on earth (seventy in all, by rabbinical reckoning). But Gentiles are not in view here; even if, with Codex Sinaiticus, we omit Jews from this verse, the word devout (Gk. eulabēs) is used in the NT only of Jews; it is Jews from every land of the Dispersion that are intended. 11 We hear them telling in our own tongues the mighty works of God. The reversal of the curse of Babel is probably in the narrator's mind.

2:14–36 The apostolic preaching

The Galilaean dialect was so distinctive and difficult for non-Galilaeans to follow that the disciples' release from the peculiarities of their local speech and their sudden capacity for speaking in a variety of tongues could not fail to be remarked. 14 When once the attention of the people had thus been attracted, Peter seized the opportunity to stand up with the other apostles, and address all who were within earshot. The words of his address are noteworthy, for they show the pattern regularly followed in the primitive apostolic preaching, or kērygma, the pattern or outline which can also be traced as the original framework of our gospel tradition. This pattern shows four main features: a. a narrative of the public ministry and passion of Jesus; b. the divine attestation of His Messiahship in the resurrection, of which the speakers claim to be eyewitnesses; c. 'testimonies' from the OT proving Jesus to be the Messiah; and d. exhortation to repentance and faith.

These features can be traced fairly clearly in this speech of Peter, delivered at a time when the events leading up to the crucifixion were fresh in the minds of his audience. The change in Peter since the night of the betrayal has often been remarked upon; here he straightly charges his audience with the guilt of delivering their Messiah over to the hands of lawless men (i.e. the Romans) and putting Him to death.

The use made by Peter of OT testimonies is striking: his This is what was spoken (v. 16) proclaims that the time has now come of which the prophets testified. For example, the words of Ps. 16:10 (LXX), Thou wilt not abandon my soul to Hades, nor let thy Holy One see corruption (v. 27), ascribed by the Hebrew and LXX texts to David's authorship, cannot, he argues, refer to David himself, for everyone knows that David did die, his soul was left in Hades, the abode of the dead, and his body did see corruption. To whom, then, do the words refer? Not to David, but to Him whom David prefigured, 'great David's greater Son', the Messianic King.

Thus far, every Rabbi in Jerusalem would have agreed with Peter. But, he goes on, there has been only one Person of whom these words could be truly spoken—Jesus of Nazareth; for although (as all knew) He died, yet His soul was not left to Hades, nor did His flesh undergo corruption; He rose from the dead, 'and we are witnesses of this', he adds; 'we saw Him alive.' Therefore Jesus of Nazareth, crucified by men, raised from the dead by God, is the true Messiah; the stone which the builders rejected has become head of the corner. Later we find the same argument drawn from Ps. 16 by Paul at Pisidian Antioch (Acts 13:35–37). But Jesus not only died and rose; He also ascended into heaven; Peter and his companions had seen Him go up. And this fulfilled another Davidic psalm, Ps. 110: The Lord said to my Lord, Sit at my right hand, till I make thy enemies a stool for thy feet (vv. 34, 35). Who was raised to God's right hand? Not David, but King Messiah: that this psalm was Messianically interpreted at that time is plain from its quotation in Lk. 20:42f. and parallels. This, too, corresponded with the actual facts about Jesus of Nazareth; He was therefore undoubtedly Lord and Messiah.

16 The prophet Joel. The quotation is from Joel 2:28–32. The physical phenomena of vv. 18, 19 may have reminded the hearers of the strange darkness of Good Friday afternoon and its accompaniments. 17 But, while the whole section of Joel's prophecy of the Day of the Lord is quoted, the outstanding point of comparison with the present situation is I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh. 23 The definite plan and foreknowledge of God; i.e. as revealed in OT Scripture, especially, no doubt, in Is. 53 (cf. Lk. 24:26, 46). The guilt of those who engineered Christ's death was none the less, but it was overruled by God for the achievement of His saving purpose. 25 For David says. The following quotation, from Ps. 16:8–11, is given for the sake of the words Thou wilt not abandon my soul to Hades, nor let thy Holy One see corruption, which were fulfilled in the resurrection of Jesus. 33 He has poured out this, i.e. the Holy Spirit, upon His disciples. 34 David did not ascend; better, 'It was not David that ascended . . .' 36 Both Lord and Christ. For the triumph and exaltation of Jesus as confirming His Messianic sovereignty cf. Rom. 1:4; Phil. 2:9–11.

2:37–47 The first Christian church

37 Convinced by the power of Peter's argument, the multitude were conscience-stricken; realizing that they were guilty of the blood of the Lord's Anointed, they cried, Brethren, what shall we do? and received from Peter the assurance that forgiveness and the gift of the Holy Spirit would be granted them by God if they repented and were baptized in the name of Jesus as Messiah. The generation as a whole had proved perverse, but there was a place for a believing remnant; having previously quoted from Joel 2:32 the words 'whoever calls on the name of the Lord shall be saved' (v. 21), Peter now urged his hearers to save themselves thus from that perverse generation, and so effective was his exhortation that three thousand believed the good news and were baptized, thus forming the first Christian church.

Then follows a picture of the primitive Christian community, gathered daily in various homes to break the bread, meeting publicly in the Temple precincts (apparently in the colonnade called Solomon's, to judge from 3:11 and 5:12), adhering to the apostolic teaching and fellowship, and increasing in number day by day, praising God and enjoying the favour of all the people. The miracles which, when wrought by Jesus in His own Person, had been 'signs' of the advent of the Messianic age, continued to be performed by Him from heaven through His disciples as they acted in His name, providing additional proof that the divine kingdom had invaded the present age, for these mighty works were indeed 'powers of the age to come'.

38 Repent, and be baptized. This command seems to have caused no surprise to Peter's hearers; they had probably some familiarity with the practice of baptism. Christian baptism is, like John's, baptism in water, accompanied by repentance, but it is administered in the name of Jesus and associated with the gift of the Spirit. Like John's, it has an eschatological reference, but it betokens the realization of that to which John's baptism pointed forward. 39 Cf. Is. 57:19; Joel 2:32. 42 The apostles' teaching and fellowship. The fellowship was shown in the breaking of bread and the prayers and also in the community of goods (v. 45). 46 Day by day. This adverbial phrase modifies every verb in the sentence. 47 And the Lord added to their number day by day those who were being saved. Not that a continuous process of salvation in each individual is here in view, but a continuous procession of individuals who, one after another, accept the offered salvation and are incorporated in the saved community.

3:1 – 5:42 A miracle and its consequences

3:1–26 The cripple cured. In ch. 3 Luke goes on to give an example of these 'wonders and signs' (2:43), narrating one which had interesting consequences. The apostles and the other believers continued to be observant Jews, and attended the Temple regularly. One afternoon, as Peter and John went to the Temple at the time of the evening oblation (about 3 p.m.), they were about to pass through the 'Beautiful Gate', which probably led from the Court of the Gentiles to the Women's Court, when their attention was attracted by a man lame from birth, who lay there to ask alms from people who passed through the gate. Peter commanded him to stand up and walk, invoking the authority of Jesus the Messiah of Nazareth. When he had helped him to rise to his feet, the cripple walked, and, overjoyed with his new-found strength, he raised his voice in praise to God, jumping about so that all the people round about noticed him. Naturally, it created a great sensation, as everybody knew the cripple who had sat so long begging at his usual station. When a crowd had collected in Solomon's colonnade, Peter improved the occasion by proclaiming Jesus as the Messiah, rejected and crucified by the Jewish people, but now risen from the dead and offering remission of sins and fulfilment of the prophetic promises to Israel. And the healed man stood by, a powerful witness to the truth of Peter's words, for it was by the power of the name of Jesus that he had been cured, and his cure was a patent Messianic 'sign', for they could remember how Isaiah had prophesied of the Messianic age: 'Then shall the lame man leap like a hart' (Is. 35:6).

1 At the hour of prayer. The stated times for prayer were early morning, the time of the morning sacrifice; afternoon, the time of the evening sacrifice; and sunset. Josephus (Ant. xiv. 4. 3) says that sacrifices were offered in the Temple 'twice daily, in the morning and about the ninth hour'. 2 Which is called Beautiful. The gate is probably to be identified with what the Mishna calls 'Nicanor's Gate' and with the gate of Corinthian bronze described by Josephus as 'far exceeding in value those plated with silver and set in gold' (Jewish War v. 5. 3). 11 The portico called Solomon's ran the whole length of the east side of the outer court (cf. Jn. 10:23).

13 His servant Jesus (Gk. pais; so in v. 26 and 4:27, 30). The expression harks back to the Servant of Yahweh portrayed in Is. 42:1ff.; 52:13ff. With the present statement that God glorified his servant, cf. Is. 52:13, 'Behold, my servant . . . shall be exalted and lifted up' (LXX doxazō, the same verb as is used here). 14 The Holy and Righteous One; two Messianic designations. 15 The Author of life. 'Author' represents Greek archēgos, 'pioneer', appearing also in Acts 5:31; Heb. 2:10; 12:2. 16 And his name. . . . Perhaps render: 'And by faith in His name He has healed this man whom you see and know.'

17 In ignorance; i.e. they did not know that it was their Messiah who was thus being put to death. 18 That his Christ should suffer. It is not explicitly prophesied in the OT that the Messiah will suffer; this statement is based on Jesus' own identification of the suffering Servant with the Messiah and His acceptance and fulfilment of Messiahship in that sense (see on 2:23). 19 That times of refreshing may come. The sense probably is that their acceptance of Jesus as Messiah would speedily be followed by His parousia and by those conditions of world-wide blessing which the prophets had described as characteristic of the Messianic age. 20 The Christ appointed. This does not mean that between His resurrection and parousia Jesus is only Messiah-designate; it means that by raising

Him from the dead and exalting Him to His throne God has already installed Him as 'Lord and Christ' (2:36; cf. Rom. 1:4). Nevertheless this passage expresses a very early phase of the kērygma, if not 'the most primitive Christology of all' (J. A. T. Robinson). Its perspective is different from Luke's own (see p. 969). 22 Moses said. The quotation is from Dt. 18:15ff., a favourite Messianic 'testimony' in the early church; cf. 7:37; also Jn. 1:21; 6:14; 7:40. (It appears also as a 'testimony', though not a Messianic one, in the Qumran texts.) Jewish Christians in particular in the early centuries AD looked on Jesus as a second Moses. You shall listen to him. The words 'listen to him' in the heavenly Voice at the transfiguration (Mk. 9:7; Lk. 9:35) probably echo this Deuteronomic injunction. 24 All the prophets . . . from Samuel. Samuel is here regarded as first of a series of prophets (cf. 1 Sa. 3:20). There is no record of any Messianic prophecy by Samuel, but the general sense here is that the days which had now arrived marked the consummation of all that the prophets had foretold. 25 Saying to Abraham. The following words are a free quotation from Gn. 12:3; 18:18; 22:18. 26 Having raised up his servant. Here (as in v. 22) raised up may refer, not to Christ's resurrection, but to God's raising Him up as a Deliverer to Israel, as in 13:22 He is said to have 'raised up David' (see also on 13:33).

4:1–22 The rise of persecution. But such a commotion was by no means to the liking of the Temple authorities, who seized the two apostles and put them in custody till the following day, when they were brought for examination before the Sanhedrin. The high-priestly party, who dominated the Sanhedrin, were mostly Sadducees, and it is noteworthy that their grievance was that the apostles were teaching the people and proclaiming in (the case of) Jesus the resurrection from the dead. Besides, the ruling caste, anxious to maintain peaceable relations with the Romans, looked with great disfavour on every Messianic movement, whether political or spiritual. But they could find no legal fault with the apostles, especially in the presence of the once-lame man, whose cure was a strong testimony in their defence.

Peter, bold as ever, pressed home his accusation where it most properly belonged, warning the supreme court that the same name by which the cripple had received bodily health was the only name through which they could receive from God spiritual health. This boldness was the more surprising on the part of 'laymen', untrained in the rabbinical schools; but these men had been disciples of no ordinary teacher, who had Himself excited the surprised comment: 'How is it that this man has learning, when he has never studied?' (Jn. 7:15).

1 The captain of the temple; the sāḡān, who was head of the Temple police and superintended arrangements for the preservation of order in and around the buildings. 2 Proclaiming in Jesus the resurrection from the dead. It is significant that it was adherents of the Sadducean party who objected most strongly to the apostles' preaching, in view of their insistence on the resurrection of Jesus, which naturally involved the general principle of resurrection, repudiated by the Sadducees (see 23:8). 4 The number of the men, i.e. of the males. 5 Their rulers and elders and scribes. In other words, the Sanhedrin, the supreme court of the Jewish nation, consisting of seventy-one elders, including the high priest, who was president by virtue of his office. 6 Annas the high priest and Caiaphas. Cf. Lk. 3:2. Annas was senior ex-high priest, having held the office from AD 6 to 15; his son-in-law Caiaphas (cf. Jn. 18:13) was now high priest (AD 18–36). But Greek archiereus is used not only of the high priest strictly so called, but also of the chief priests in general, i.e. members of the wealthy families from which the high priests at this time were regularly selected. And John and Alexander. Neither of these can be identified with certainty. 11 This is the stone. . . . Quoted from Ps. 118:22, another common early Christian 'testimony', used in this sense by Jesus Himself (Mk. 12:10; Lk. 20:17). 13 Common men. The Greek word here used, idiōtēs, appears in later Hebrew and Aramaic as a loanword (heḏyôṭ) meaning 'unskilled', 'untrained', which is no doubt the sense here. They recognized that they had been with Jesus; i.e. they recognized that this was the explanation of the otherwise inexplicable boldness and eloquence of men who had enjoyed no rabbinical education. 15 They conferred with one another. It is noteworthy that no effective attempt seems to have been made by the Sanhedrin to disprove the central affirmation of the apostles' proclamation, the resurrection of Jesus; yet, if they thought there was a reasonable chance of success, would they not have done so? 19 Whether it is right in the sight of God to listen to you rather than to God, you must judge. Cf. 5:29. Human authorities must be respected (cf. Rom. 13:1–7), except when their law conflicts with God's. 20 We cannot but speak of what we have seen and heard. Because of their commission (1:8) 'necessity' was 'laid upon' them as later on Paul (1 Cor. 9:16).

4:23–37 Continuous expansion. In the absence of any reasonable ground for punishing Peter and John, the Sanhedrin dismissed them, forbidding them with threats to speak any more in the name of Jesus. But the net result was a further increase in the church, which now numbered five thousand men, not to speak of women. The original pooling of property continued, by which the richer members made provision for the needs of the poorer. Among these richer members Barnabas, a Levite of Cyprus, receives special mention for liberality.

24 Sovereign Lord, . . . The opening words of this prayer probably illustrate early Christian liturgical practice, based on Jewish liturgical forms. The phraseology of the exordium echoes such OT passages as Ex. 20:11; Ne. 9:6; Ps. 146:6. 25 Who by the mouth of our father David, thy servant, didst say by the Holy Spirit. The text may be rendered: 'Who didst say through thy servant David our father, the mouthpiece of the Holy Spirit.' Why did the Gentiles rage . . .? Quoted from Ps. 2:1, 2. The application of this psalm to the future Messiah appears first in the seventeenth 'Psalm of Solomon' (c. 50 BC). 27 Thy holy servant Jesus. See on 3:13. Whom thou didst anoint; i.e. 'whom Thou hast made Messiah'. Both Herod and Pontius Pilate, representing 'the kings . . . and the rulers' of v. 26 respectively, as the Gentiles and the peoples of Israel correspond to 'the Gentiles . . . and the peoples' of v. 25. Herod is Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee (4 BC – AD 39); the occasion referred to is that of Lk. 23:7–12. 28 To do whatever. . . . Cf. 2:23 for the foreordained character of the death of Christ. 31 The place . . . was shaken. The phenomena of Pentecost were repeated (cf. 2:2f.).

32 They had everything in common. The reference to the community of goods (cf. 2:44f.) is repeated here to introduce the incidents of Barnabas and of Ananias and Sapphira. 36 Barnabas (which means, Son of encouragement). This is the idiomatic Semitic use of 'son' in a phrase indicating a man's character. How apt the designation was is evident from the record of Barnabas's subsequent career.

5:1–16 Ananias and Sapphira. But in such a large company, especially at such a time of enthusiasm, there must almost inevitably be some black sheep; and the case of Ananias and Sapphira illustrates the temptations to which less spiritual members were liable. That the pooling of property was purely voluntary is plain from Peter's question to Ananias: While it remained unsold, did it not remain your own? The sin consisted not in keeping back part of the money received for their estate, but in pretending that the part which they handed over was the whole. And the lie told to the church was reckoned as told to God the Holy Spirit.

The story has given offence to many; one commentator, for example, finds it 'frankly repulsive'. But we need not make Peter guilty of their death; he told them plainly that they had been trying to cheat God, and the shock produced by the sudden sense of the enormity of such a crime caused their death. Sapphira had the additional shock of having the news of her husband's sudden death so bluntly broken to her. The whole story fits exactly into the picture of spiritual exaltation prevailing in the infant church. The tragedy had a salutary effect on those who might light-heartedly have joined the popular movement; but even so the progress continued.

2 He kept back some of the proceeds. The Greek verb nosphizomai, used here, is the verb used in the LXX of Jos. 7:1, of Achan's misappropriation of part of the consecrated spoil of Jericho. If the Gospels are the 'Torah' of the NT, Acts is its book of Joshua, and there are a number of striking parallels between Joshua and Acts, though beneath rather than on the surface. 3 To lie to the Holy Spirit. The sovereign presence of the Holy Spirit in the church is so real that any action done to the church is regarded as done to the Spirit, just as any action taken by the church is predicated of the Spirit (cf. 15:28). The language of vv. 3 and 4 makes it clear that the Holy Spirit is viewed as a divine Person. 9 To tempt the Spirit of the Lord. The idea is that of seeing how far one can go with impunity. Ananias and Sapphira discovered that they had gone too far. 11 Upon the whole church. This is the first occurrence of church in Acts (the word is absent from the best texts of 2:47). The word (Gk. ekklēsia) has its background in the LXX, where it is sometimes used of the 'congregation' (Heb. qāhāl) of Israel: see on 7:38. The followers of Jesus are the new people of God, continuators and successors of the old 'congregation of the Lord', formerly restricted to one nation, but now about to be thrown open to all believers everywhere. 13 The rest. It is difficult to determine who these are, since they are distinguished from the people; emendations have therefore been suggested, such as Dibelius's 'the rulers'.

5:17–42 A further attempt at persecution. A second attempt by the priestly authorities about this time to inhibit the Christians met with as little success as the previous one. Gamaliel's moderating advice to let the new movement alone, lest it might prove to be of God, was followed for the time being, although the apostles this time had an opportunity of rejoicing that they had been counted worthy to endure stripes for the honourable name which they proclaimed. But before long a new departure within the Christian community gave the authorities an opportunity to institute a really thoroughgoing policy of suppression.

19 But at night an angel of the Lord opened the prison doors. The angel of the Lord represents Gk. angelos Kyriou, the phrase which in LXX renders Heb. mal'aḵ Yahweh, the supernatural messenger who manifests God's presence to men (see on 7:32). It is unlikely that Luke has this particular idea in mind. Certainly he wishes to indicate that the agency of God was behind this opening of the prison doors, but this would be as true if the doors were opened by secret sympathizers with the apostles as if an angel came down from heaven to let them out. Cf. 12:7ff. for the similar experience of Peter himself. On the present occasion all the apostles appear to have been locked up. 20 All the words of this Life. In Aramaic one word represents both 'life' and 'salvation'; the expression used here is thus almost identical with that in 13:26. 21 All the senate; i.e. the Sanhedrin (Gk. gerousia, 'body of elders'). 22 The officers. Probably Levites of the Temple police force. 28 This man's blood. We can probably trace thus early a reluctance on the part of the Jewish religious leaders to refer to Jesus by His personal name (cf. J. Jocz,

The Jewish People and Jesus Christ, 1949, p. 111, for the persistence of this tendency). 29 We must obey God rather than men. Cf. 4:19; cf. also the words of Socrates to his judges: 'I shall obey God rather than you' (Plato, Apology 29d). 30 The God of our fathers raised Jesus. See on 3:26 for the sense of 'raised' here. These words introduce the fourth summary of the primitive apostolic preaching in Acts; the three previous ones come in 2:22–36; 3:13–26; 4:10–12. Note how the emphasis is regularly pointed on the contrast between the hearers' action and God's, so here: whom you killed . . . God exalted him. Hanging him on a tree; harking back to Dt. 21:22, 23, where the divine curse attaches to such a death (cf. Acts 10:39; Gal. 3:13). 32 We are witnesses to these things, and so is the Holy Spirit. Note the continued existence of the apostles' personal testimony (cf. 1:8, 22; 2:32; 3:15; 4:33), with which the witness of the Spirit in them is here combined (see on 5:3). 34 Gamaliel. The most illustrious Rabbi of his day, disciple of Hillel (and now head of the school of Hillel), teacher of Saul of Tarsus (22:3) and leader of the Pharisaic party in the Sanhedrin. The Pharisees were a minority in that body, but they enjoyed the support and confidence of the people to such a degree that their judgment had to be respected by the Sadducean majority. 36 Theudas. The only insurgent named Theudas of whom we know from any other source was a magician who, according to Josephus (Ant. xx. 5. 1), led a band of his adherents to the Jordan, promising to divide it that they might cross dryshod, but was attacked and killed by soldiers sent against him by the procurator Fadus. This incident is to be dated c. AD 44, whereas Gamaliel's speech was delivered 10 or 12 years earlier. Gamaliel's Theudas (who in any case antedates the revolt of Judas in AD 6) is probably one of the innumerable insurgents who infested Palestine after Herod the Great's death in 4 BC. 37 Judas the Galilean arose in the days of the census. When Judea was reduced to the status of a Roman province in AD 6, Quirinius, imperial legate of Syria, held a census there with a view to assessing the amount of tribute to which the new province would be liable. Judas and others, regarding this action as a prelude to enslavement and as a dishonour to God, the only true King of Israel, raised the standard of revolt. The revolt was crushed, but the party of the Zealots kept its spirit alive until the outbreak of the Romano–Jewish War in AD 66. 38 Keep away from these men and let them alone. 'The doctrine preached by Gamaliel is sound Pharisaic teaching; God is over all, and needs no help from men for the fulfilment of His purposes; all men must do is to obey, and leave the issue to Him' (J. A. Findlay). Cf. the dictum of a later Rabbi: 'Every assembly which is in the name of heaven will ultimately be established, but that which is not in the name of heaven will not ultimately be established.'

6:1 – 9:31 PERSECUTION LEADS TO EXPANSION

6:1–15 Appointment of the seven and the activity of Stephen

A new departure in the narrative of Acts is marked by the introduction of the name of Stephen. Stephen appears first as one of the seven officers who were appointed to supervise the distribution of largesse from the common fund to the poorer members of the community. At a very early stage, the church attracted Hellenistic Jews (i.e. Greek-speaking Jews from outside Palestine) as well as Aramaic-speaking Palestine-born Jews; and before long complaints arose that the widows of the latter group were being favoured in the daily 'hand-reaching'. It is significant that the seven officers chosen by the community and appointed by the apostles to supervise this business all bore Greek names, being probably themselves Hellenistic Jews. Two of the seven, Stephen and Philip, were destined to leave their mark on the church far beyond the bounds of this special function to which they were appointed. Stephen seems to have had an exceptionally far-sighted comprehension of the total breach with Judaic worship which the new movement logically and ultimately involved. In this he blazed a trail later trodden by Paul and especially by the writer to the Hebrews.

The Twelve had kept the respect and goodwill of the Jerusalem populace; they attended the Temple services regularly, and appeared outwardly to be observant Jews whose only distinction from others was that they believed and proclaimed Jesus to be the Messiah. But a new note was heard in the debates in the Hellenistic synagogue which Stephen attended, a note which envisaged the abolition of the Temple cultus and the institution of a new and more spiritual form of worship. If the charges made by Stephen's accusers are garbled, yet we are not at a loss to discover the real trend of his arguments; the speech preserved for us in ch. 7 is not so much a speech by the defence aimed at procuring an acquittal as a reasoned exposition of his teaching about the transitory nature of the Jewish worship. An attack on the Temple, as Stephen's teaching was construed to be, ranked as blasphemy of the worst kind (so too Jeremiah had earlier found to his cost); there was also the subordinate consideration that the economy of Jerusalem was based on the Temple. The rulers at once saw their opportunity, and arraigned Stephen on a popular charge. The indictment against him was practically the same as that against his Master at an earlier date (Mk. 14:58), and against Paul at a later date (Acts 21:28); it was alleged that he meditated the destruction of this holy place.

1 The Hellenists murmured against the Hebrews. The Hellenists were Greek-speaking Jews, mainly belonging to the lands of the Dispersion; the Hebrews were Aramaic-speaking Jews, most of whom, like the apostles themselves, were native-born Palestinians. Their widows were neglected in the daily distribution. From the common pool in which the property of the wealthier members had been placed (2:45; 4:34, 35) daily distribution was made to those who were needy, among whom widows would naturally figure prominently. 3 Pick out from among you seven men. It is evident from the names of the seven that they were Hellenists; one of them, indeed, was not even a Jew by birth, but a proselyte from the Gentile city of Antioch. They were probably recognized as leaders of the Hellenistic community in the primitive Jerusalem church. Note that even for such practical duties as fell to their lot spiritual endowment is required as well as a good reputation and general wisdom. While they were appointed on this occasion as almoners, the ministry of those of their number of whom we have any further account was not restricted to this form of service. 5 Nicolaus. According to Irenaeus (who may depend on Papias), the Nicolaitans of Rev. 2:6, 15 took their name from him; the truth of this cannot be determined. 6 They . . . laid their hands upon them. The seven were selected by the rank and file; the imposition of apostolic hands confirmed this selection, commissioned the seven for their special work, and expressed the apostles' fellowship with them in the matter. 7 A great many of the priests. Many of the ordinary priests were humble and pious men, unlike the wealthy ecclesiastical politicians of the high-priestly families. If members of the Temple staff were attaching themselves to the church, such activity as Stephen's was bound to produce tension with his more conservative fellow-Christians as well as with the Jewish rulers. 9 Some of those who belonged to the synagogue. . . . Probably one synagogue is meant, although five, four, three and two have been understood by various commentators. As it was attended by those from Cilicia, it may have included Saul of Tarsus among its members. Freedmen (Gk. libertinoi). Probably Jewish freedmen or descendants of freedmen from the various places mentioned; Deissmann suggests freedmen of the imperial household. There is not sufficient reason to reject the text here for the attractive emendation 'Libyans' suggested by Beza, Tischendorf and Dibelius. 12 Brought him before the council, i.e. the Sanhedrin.

7:1 – 8:1a Stephen's defence and death

Arrested and put on trial before the Sanhedrin, the supreme court of the Jewish nation, over which in those days the high priest presided, Stephen stated his case in the form of a historical review, a form not uncommon among the Jews. The two chief themes of his speech are, first, that the nation, from the days of Abraham onwards, had always been intended to sit loose to any one locality of earth; a movable tent was therefore a fitter shrine than a permanent building; and second, that the nation, from the time of Moses onwards, had always rebelled against God and opposed His messengers, a course of action which had culminated in their slaying of the Righteous One. Any line of argument less likely to conciliate his judges could hardly be imagined. After one or two angry interruptions, which Stephen countered in true prophetic vein, he was prevented from finishing his speech, thrown out of the building and stoned. Whether his death was an act of lynch-law or an excess of jurisdiction on the part of the Sanhedrin is not quite clear; probably it partook of the nature of both.

1 And the high priest said, acting as president of the court. 2 When he was in Mesopotamia, before he lived in Haran. Haran was a flourishing city in the first half of the 2nd millennium BC, to which the life of Abraham belongs. According to the MT and LXX of Gn. 11:31 – 12:5 (see RSV for correct translation), it was after Abraham's arrival in Haran that the words quoted here in v. 3 were spoken. But Philo and Josephus agree with Stephen that Abraham received a divine communication before going to Haran (cf. Gn. 15:7; Ne. 9:7). 5 But promised . . .; cf. Gn. 17:8. 6 And God spoke to this effect . . .; quoted from Gn. 15:13f. Four hundred years. Rabbinical exegesis reckoned 400 years from the birth of Isaac to the Exodus. 7 And worship me in this place. These words come from Ex. 3:12, where they are spoken to Moses and where the place referred to is Horeb. The conflation of separate quotations is characteristic of Stephen's speech as here summarized. 8 And he gave him the covenant of circumcision; cf. Gn. 17:10; 21:4. 'Thus, while there was still no holy place, all the essential conditions for the religion of Israel were fulfilled' (Lake and Cadbury).

9 And the patriarchs, jealous of Joseph, sold him into Egypt. The narrative from here to v. 34 consists largely of a cento of passages from Gn. 37 – Ex. 3. 12 He sent forth our fathers the first time, as distinct from the second visit (v. 13). 14 Seventy-five souls. The MT of Gn. 46:27; Ex. 1:5; Dt. 10:22 enumerates seventy persons, including Jacob himself and Joseph and his two sons; the number seventy-five comes from the LXX of Gn. 46:27 and Ex. 1:5 and is found in a Hebrew MS of Exodus from Qumran; it omits Jacob and Joseph, but reckons nine sons to Joseph. 16 And they were carried back to Shechem. Jacob was buried in the cave of Machpelah at Hebron (Gn. 49:29ff.); Joseph was buried at Shechem (Jos. 24:32). In the tomb that Abraham had bought for a sum of silver from the sons of Hamor in Shechem. Abraham bought the cave of Machpelah at Hebron from the Hittites (Gn. 23:16); Jacob bought the land at Shechem which he gave to Joseph (and where Joseph was buried) from the sons of Hamor (Jos. 24:32). Not only separate quotations (see on v. 7) but separate incidents are conflated in Luke's summary of Stephen's speech.

18 Till there arose over Egypt another king who had not known Joseph; probably a reference to the foundation of the XIX Dynasty (c. 1320 BC). 20 Beautiful before God; probably a Semitism, meaning 'very beautiful'. 21 Pharaoh's daughter adopted him. A daughter of Seti I or Rameses II. 22 And Moses was instructed in all the wisdom of the Egyptians. Stephen is more moderate than the generality of Hellenistic Jewish writers, who represent Moses as the founder of all science and culture, and indeed of the whole civilization of Egypt. And he was mighty in his words and deeds. Moses disclaims eloquence in Ex. 4:10, but the reference here may be to written words. Josephus (Ant. ii. 10) preserves a legend of his prowess in martial deeds. 23 When he was forty years old. Ex. 2:11 says simply 'when Moses had grown up'. 25 He supposed that his brethren understood. . . . This explanation of his action is not given in the OT. Philo, like Stephen, regards Moses' championship of the Israelites at this point in his career as a settled policy. And note the parallel here: Moses appeared as a messenger of peace and deliverance and was rejected; Jesus in due course was treated the same way. 29 He became the father of two sons; i.e. Gershom and Eliezer (Ex. 2:22; 18:3, 4).

30 An angel appeared to him in the wilderness of Mount Sinai. Stephen emphasizes that God is not tied to one city or land; He appeared to Abraham in Mesopotamia, was with Joseph in Egypt and revealed Himself to Moses in the wilderness, in the land where he was an exile (v. 29). This angel is a messenger of the Presence, an extension of the divine personality, 32 who speaks and is spoken to as God.

35 God sent as both ruler and deliverer. The rejected one is God's appointed saviour: this pattern recurs in the careers of Joseph, Moses and Jesus. By the hand; i.e. by the agency. 37 God will raise up for you a prophet. This citation from Dt. 18:15 (see on 3:22 above) helps further to point the parallel between Moses and Christ. 38 This is he who was in the congregation in the wilderness. Probably an allusion to Dt. 18:16 (immediately following the words quoted in the previous verse), where mention is made of 'the day of the assembly' (Heb. qāhāl, LXX ekklēsia) at Horeb. As Moses was with the old ekklēsia, so Christ is with the new ekklēsia, but it is still a pilgrim church, 'the church in the wilderness'. With the angel who spoke to him. In Ex. 32:34 God says to Moses, 'My angel shall go before you'; but later, at Moses' persistent request, He makes a more personal promise, 'My presence (i.e. 'I myself', so LXX autos) will go with you' (Ex. 33:14). In Jubilees 1:27; 2:1, however, an angel speaks with Moses at Sinai (see on v. 53 below). 41 And they made a calf in those days. See Ex. 32 for the narrative of this. 42 But God turned and gave them over to worship the host of heaven. This statement is not based, apparently, on the OT narrative of the wilderness wanderings, but seems to be an inference from the passage from Am. 5:25–27 quoted in vv. 42, 43. In the MT of Amos, the people of Israel are warned that the Assyrian king will deport them 'beyond Damascus', and that they will carry thither the very instruments of that idolatry for which this calamity is about to overtake them. In the LXX (quoted here with variations) this idolatry—the worship of the heavenly host, especially of the planet Saturn—is dated as early as the wilderness period. Did you offer to me . . . in the wilderness? The Greek wording makes it plain that the answer is 'No'. It was not Yahweh but heathen astral deities that they worshipped. 43 The tent of Moloch, in contrast to the tent of witness (v. 44). The Hebrew means 'Sakkut your king', Sakkut being an Akkadian name of the god of the planet Saturn. The star of the god Rephan. The RSV of Amos has 'Kaiwan', an Assyrian name of Saturn; in the LXX (quoted here) the Assyrian name is replaced by an Egyptian name for the same planetary god, represented here by Rephan. Beyond Babylon. Stephen has the Babylonian captivity in mind, as was natural for one speaking in Jerusalem, and therefore substitutes beyond Babylon for Amos's 'beyond Damascus', which referred to the earlier Assyrian captivity.

44 The tent of witness. So called because it enshrined the 'witness' or 'testimony' which God gave to Israel, consisting of the tables of the Law—whence the ark which housed them is also called 'the ark of the testimony' (e.g. Ex. 25:22). According to the pattern that he had seen; quoted from Ex. 25:40 (cf. the development of this idea in Heb. 9:1ff.). 45 Until the days of David. The process of dispossessing the Canaanites, begun under Joshua, was not completed until David's time; besides, and more especially, successive generations had the tent handed on to them until the reign of David (2 Sa. 7:6; cf. 1 Ch. 17:5). 46 Asked leave to find a habitation for the God of Jacob. Cf. Ps. 132:5. Several excellent textual authorities have 'the house of Jacob' here, but this reading gives awkward connection with v. 47, But it was Solomon who built a house for him. There is emphasis upon house—a fixed house as distinct from a movable tent. 48–50 Stephen regards the building of the Temple as a retrograde step, and counters the idea that God could dwell in a house with the quotation from Is. 66:1, 2. Other divinities might be so conceived of, but not the Most High. This unmistakable attack on the most cherished centre of the national religion probably caused an explosion of anger, which drew forth the denunciation of v. 51.

51 You stiff-necked people. . . . The language of the denunciation is thoroughly OT; cf. Ex. 33:5; Lv. 26:41; Dt. 10:16; Is. 63:10; Je. 4:4; 6:10; 9:26; Ezk. 44:7. 52 They killed those who announced beforehand the coming of the Righteous One. Cf. our Lord's accusation in Mt. 23:29–37 and the implication of His words in Mk. 12:2–8; Lk. 13:33, 34. 53 Who received the law as delivered by angels (lit. 'by angelic ordinance'). For the mediation of the law through angels cf. Gal. 3:19; Heb. 2:2. The idea does not appear in the OT, but is found in Jubilees 1:29, Testament of Dan 6:2, Josephus (Ant. xv. 5. 3), and Philo (On Dreams, i. 141ff.).

54 When they heard these things. . . . They cut his speech short; they had heard more than they desired. 55 Jesus standing at the right hand of God. If there is special significance in His standing, it is probably because He appears as Stephen's advocate in the heavenly court, to which Stephen appeals from the judgment of the earthly court. The reference to the right hand of God is based on Ps. 110:1 (see 2:34f.). 56 I see the heavens opened, and the Son of man standing at the right hand of God. This is the only NT occurrence of the title 'the Son of man' outside the Gospels (the expression in Rev. 1:13; 14:14 is different). Many members of the Sanhedrin must have been reminded of the words of Jesus Himself (Mk. 14:62) which drew forth their verdict of blasphemy. Stephen's vision is a fulfilment of Jesus' promise in Lk. 12:8: 'every one who acknowledges me before men, the Son of man also will acknowledge before the angels of God.' 58 The witnesses laid down their garments at the feet of a young man named Saul. It was the witnesses' duty to cast the first stones. The mention of Saul suggests that he played some responsible part in the proceedings, which is confirmed by 8:1a. 60 Lord, do not hold this sin against them. Contrast the dying prayer of Zechariah in a similar situation (2 Ch. 24:22). 8:1a And Saul was consenting to his death. This could, but does not necessarily, mean that he was a member of the Sanhedrin. Cf. 22:20; 26:10.

8:1b–25 Philip and the Samaritans

The execution of Stephen was now the signal for a much more thorough campaign of repression. The large community of believers in Jerusalem was scattered throughout Palestine and even beyond its borders, although the apostles, who perhaps were not identified in the popular mind with the activity of Stephen, stayed in Jerusalem. The dispersion, however, did much more good than harm to the cause; those who were thus scattered carried the good news with them and disseminated it everywhere, even as far north as Syrian Antioch, which led to a remarkable development in that city in a few years' time. But nearer home a fresh departure was made almost immediately, for another member of the seven, Philip, left Jerusalem for Samaria, and began to evangelize its schismatic, half-heathen population (as the Samaritans were in Jewish eyes). Hitherto the gospel had been preached to pure Jews only. But Philip's evangelism was remarkably successful and, when news of it came to the apostles, Peter and John were sent there on a mission of inquiry. (Did John remember his earlier proposition with regard to the Samaritans in Lk. 9:54?) After the arrival of the two apostles the Samaritans who had believed were seen to have received the Holy Spirit. This confirmed the reality of their participation in Christ.

1b They were all scattered . . . except the apostles. It appears from the sequel that the Hellenistic believers were the chief target of the persecution, perhaps as being more closely associated with Stephen. From this time until AD 135 the church of Jerusalem seems to have been composed mainly of 'Hebrews' (but see 21:16 for one surviving Hellenist). 3 Laid waste; i.e. 'ravaged', as a wild beast does the body of its victim. 5 A city of Samaria. The city in question might be Gitta, said by Justin to have been the native place of Simon Magus. A variant reading, 'The city of Samaria', appears in several authorities; it would indicate the ancient city of Samaria, restored by Herod with the new name Sebaste. In any case, the preaching of the gospel to Samaritans represented a widening of its scope (cf. 1:8). 9 A man named Simon. Simon Magus is said in later times to have visited Rome and other parts, where he secured a large following; the Simonians are known to have survived to the 3rd century at least. 10 That power of God which is called Great. This may mean that he claimed to be the Grand Vizier of the Most High. 13 Even Simon himself believed. Theologians may discuss whether or not he exercised 'saving faith'. Although (for a time at least) he continued with Philip, Peter judged that the root of the matter was not in him. Perhaps he was simply convinced of the potency of the name of Jesus when he saw the mighty works wrought by its means.

14 They sent to them Peter and John. For some time the Jerusalem apostles exercised general supervision over the widespread work of evangelization. 15 Prayed for them that they might receive the Holy Spirit. Evidently at their baptism there had been no immediately discernible manifestation of the coming of the Spirit—which is what Luke means by saying 16 it had not yet fallen on any of them. But they had only been baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus (lit. 'into the name of the Lord Jesus'), an expression found in Acts only here and at 19:5. The person so baptized bears public witness that he has passed into Christ's ownership. 17 Then they laid their hands on them and they received the Holy Spirit. It has frequently been held that this action was apostolic confirmation, considered as a sacramental act, distinct from baptism, in which the gift of the Spirit is bestowed. But the evidence of the NT is against this interpretation; Paul, e.g., takes it for granted that all baptized believers (in other words, all believers) have the Spirit of God (cf. Rom. 5:5; 8:9; 1 Cor. 12:13). Not until the rite of Christian initiation itself became divided was any separation between baptism and confirmation envisaged. On this occasion we probably have an act of recognition and incorporation of the new community of Samaritan believers into the larger community of the apostolic church, the imposition of apostolic hands being an act of fellowship, which was attended by manifestations of the Holy Spirit in the new converts. (See G. W. H.

Lampe, The Seal of the Spirit, 1952, pp. 64ff.) 18 He offered them money. He thereby gave the term 'simony' to the ecclesiastical vocabulary. 23 The gall of bitterness; probably a Semitizing genitive, meaning 'bitter gall'; quoted from Dt. 29:18 (cf. Heb. 12:15). The bond of iniquity; cf. Is. 58:6. 24 Come upon me. The 'western' text adds 'who never stopped weeping copiously', an adjectival clause which is tacked on awkwardly at the end of the sentence instead of coming immediately after its antecedent 'Simon'. Simon figures in later Christian literature as the father of all heresies.

8:26–40 Philip and the Ethiopian chamberlain

Once the work in Samaria was well established, Philip was sent by the Holy Spirit to make contact with the treasurer of the kingdom of Ethiopia (Nubia). He had been on pilgrimage to Jerusalem. and was now returning south in his chariot. His perplexed reading of the great prophecy of the suffering Servant in Isaiah gave Philip the opportunity of preaching Jesus to him from this very passage—most appropriately, because this, more than any other part of the OT, colours our Lord's language about His life mission, as well as the language of a number of the NT writers. When this new convert had been sent on his way rejoicing, Philip continued his northward journey along the coast road to Caesarea.

26 But an angel of the Lord said to Philip. The language of this section is curiously reminiscent in places of the Elijah and Elisha narratives of the OT. Gaza. Old Gaza had lain deserted since its destruction in 93 BC; New Gaza, built in 57 BC, was by the sea, a little south of the old city. 27 Candace the queen of the Ethiopians. The kingdom of Ethiopia lay on the Nile between Aswan and Khartoum; its capital was Meroe. The king was deified as child of the sun-god and regarded as too holy for secular functions; these were discharged for him by his mother, who bore the dynastic title Candace. Had come to Jerusalem to worship; probably as a 'God-fearer' (see on 10:2 below). 30 Heard him reading Isaiah the prophet. The ancients habitually read aloud. 32 The passage of the scripture which he was reading was this. The words are from Is. 53:7, 8, in the LXX (this explains the differences between the rendering here and in the English OT, which represents the MT). He had no doubt procured a scroll of Isaiah in Greek in Jerusalem. 34 About whom, pray, does the prophet say this, about himself or about some one else? The answers that have been given to this question throughout the centuries would fill a volume. 35 Yet no answer is so satisfying as that which Philip gave when, beginning with this scripture, he told him the good news of Jesus. 36 What is to prevent my being baptized? Philip's stipulation and the eunuch's response (appearing in v. 37 in AV) do not form part of the original text (they first appear in the 'western' recension); but they do reflect early Christian baptismal procedure. 39 The Spirit of the Lord caught up Philip. The 'western' text has: 'the Spirit of the Lord fell upon the eunuch, and the angel of the Lord caught away Philip'. But even if the best attested text does not explicitly speak of the eunuch's receiving the Spirit, this is probably implicit in the statement that he went on his way rejoicing. 40 Azotus. The OT Ashdod, 20 miles N of Gaza. Till he came to Caesarea. The seaport on the Mediterranean coast, c. 50 miles N of Ashdod, built by Herod the Great c. 13 BC. Here Philip appears to have settled down and brought up a family (cf. 21:8).

9:1–31 Conversion of Saul of Tarsus

The ringleader of the campaign of repression which followed Stephen's death was Saul of Tarsus, one of the greatest men of all time. Although born a Roman citizen in the Greek city of Tarsus in Asia Minor, he was brought up by his Jewish parents not as a Hellenist but as 'a Hebrew born of Hebrews' (Phil. 3:5), and was educated in Jerusalem at the feet of Gamaliel, the great leader of the Pharisees whom we have already met as a counsellor of moderation. The pupil showed little of his teacher's moderation. As a Jew of Cilicia, he may well have attended the synagogue where Stephen debated, and heard those arguments which were bound to undermine the whole religious structure of Judaism. Saul's mind, as penetrating as Stephen's, saw the irreconcilability of the old order and the new, and he set out on his career as a vigorous champion of the ancestral traditions of his people, resolved to stamp out the revolutionary movement.

At Stephen's martyrdom he played a responsible part (see on 7:58), and thereafter, wherever the believers fled in their dispersion, he pursued them, not only in Palestine itself, but even to Damascus. To the synagogues of that city he carried a letter from the high priest, authorizing him to arrest and bring to Jerusalem any who might have sought refuge in the ancient Syrian city. The writ of the high priest was respected in the synagogues of the Empire, and his authority in religious matters was upheld by the Roman power. It was on his journey to Damascus that Saul was confronted by the vision of the risen Christ which wrought such a revolution in his life, and made him thenceforward the most zealous champion of the faith he had hitherto sought to destroy. 'The conversion and apostleship of St. Paul alone,' in the view of the 18th-century statesman George, Lord Lyttelton, 'duly considered, was of itself a demonstration sufficient to prove Christianity to be a divine revelation.' Luke realized the importance of Paul's conversion in the history of salvation for, despite his limited space, he relates it in some detail three times, once in the third person (ch. 9), and twice as narrated by Paul himself (ch. 22 and 26).

The way was prepared for Paul's entertainment by Christians in Damascus by the Lord's appearing to Ananias. The Lord's words to him describing Paul as a chosen instrument have stuck to Paul ever since. In later years he recognized that, without his knowing it, he had been set apart by God for the work of the gospel even before his birth (Gal. 1:15f.; Rom. 1:1). Jewish by birth and education, he was also a Roman citizen, and his privileges as such stood him in good stead more than once. While the influence of the educational atmosphere of his native Tarsus upon him has often been exaggerated, it need not be minimized to the point of vanishing altogether (see on 22:3).

His conversion and baptism were immediately followed by his bold proclamation of Jesus as the Son of God in those very Damascus synagogues to which he had been accredited by the high priest for a very different purpose. But his activities there and in the neighbouring territory of the Nabataean king Aretas IV (the 'Arabia' of Gal. 1:17) roused so much opposition that at last he had to be smuggled out of a city which had become too hot for him to stay in.

On his return to Jerusalem in the third year from his conversion, he spent a fortnight with Peter, and also met James the Lord's brother (Gal. 1:18f.). His contact with these and other Christians was facilitated by Barnabas, who presumably knew him before and could vouch for his sincerity. But when he began to do in the Jerusalem synagogues what he had done at Damascus, he had again to be got away for his own safety, and was escorted to the coast and shipped off to Tarsus; and then, says Luke, the church . . . had peace (9:31). The first wave of persecution seems to have died down with the conversion of the leading persecutor.

1 The high priest. Still, probably, Caiaphas. 2 If he found any belonging to the Way. 'The Way' was a primitive Jewish-Christian idiom denoting Christianity (cf. 19:9, 23; 22:4; 24:14, 22). It was probably in the main refugees from Judea, rather than native Damascene believers like Ananias, that Saul went to arrest. The evidence of the 'Damascus Document', first discovered in the synagogue genizah of Old Cairo early in the present century, suggests that a branch of the Qumran community lived in Damascus; it would be interesting to know what contact, if any, there was between this group and the Damascene disciples of whom Ananias was one. 7 Hearing the voice; i.e. hearing Paul's voice: 'but they did not hear the voice of the one who was speaking to me', he says in 22:9. 10 Ananias. His character is described by Paul in 22:12. He appears to have been a native of Damascus, who knew of the outbreak of persecution in Jerusalem only by hearsay (v. 13). We have no account of the establishment of Christianity in Damascus; it may have been carried there from Galilee. 11 The street called Straight; still called the Darb al-Mustaqim. 12 He has seen. We can distinguish three early visions of Paul: on the way to Damascus (vv. 4ff.); in the house of Judas (v. 12); and on his return to Jerusalem (22:17ff.). 14 From the chief priests. See on 4:6 above. All who call upon thy name; i.e. those who invoked Jesus as Lord (cf. 2:21). 16 How much he must suffer for the sake of my name. He was to endure many times over what he had made others endure, and that for the sake of the same name. But in the kingdom of Christ suffering for the King is a sure sign of His favour and an earnest of His reward. 17 Laying his hands on him not only as a token of fellowship, greeting him as a fellow-Christian (Brother Saul), but also because Ananias, albeit a 'private' Christian, was acting for the time being as the Lord's duly appointed commissioner to Saul. Be filled with the Holy Spirit. Such filling was necessary for the prophetic ministry described in v. 15; the sequel (vv. 20–22) makes it plain that the particular manifestation of the Spirit shown in Saul was the power of his missionary preaching. 18 Something like scales; better, 'a scaly (or flaky) substance'. He rose and was baptized. We are probably to infer that (unlike the Samaritans in 8:16) Saul had received the Holy Spirit before he was actually baptized.

19 For several days he was . . . at Damascus. Whether this was before or after his visit to Arabia (the Nabataean kingdom) mentioned in Gal. 1:17 cannot be ascertained. Luke's chronological indications here are vague; we know from Gal. 1:18 that the events of vv. 26ff. took place in the third year after Paul's conversion. 20 He is the Son of God. It is significant that the only occurrence of this title in Acts should be in the report of Saul's first preaching. While the divine Sonship of Messiah is a corollary of Ps. 2:7, Paul's use of the title here probably marks an advance on the designation of Jesus as Lord and Messiah hitherto (e.g. 2:36). 22 Proving. The Greek word (symbibazō) probably suggests that his method of proof was to place the prophetic Scriptures alongside the events which fulfilled them. 23 The Jews plotted to kill him. According to Paul himself, in 2 Cor. 11:32, 'the governor under King Aretas guarded the city of Damascus in order to seize me'. The leaders of the local Jewish community appear to have made common cause with the representative of Aretas. 27 Brought him to the apostles. The term apostles is used in a wider sense here. According to Gal. 1:18, 19, the only apostles (in a stricter sense) whom he saw were Peter and James the Lord's brother. 29 Disputed against the Hellenists; no doubt in the very synagogue or synagogues which had witnessed Stephen's similar activity. 31 So the church throughout all Judea and Galilee and Samaria had peace. This was the church of Jerusalem, now in dispersion because of the recent persecution.

9:32 – 12:24 ACTS OF PETER: THE GENTILES BROUGHT IN

9:32–43 Peter in Western Palestine

A sign of the peace (v. 31) is seen in Peter's evangelization of the semi-Gentile territory in the Plain of Sharon and his visits to Lydda and Joppa, in both of which he performed miracles of healing.

32 The saints that lived at Lydda. Lydda is modern Lod. Obviously there were Christians at Lydda and Joppa before Peter visited these places (cf. v. 36). 34 Make your bed. The Greek might alternatively mean 'get ready to eat'; this would accord with the interest which Luke and other NT writers elsewhere show in the nourishment of convalescents. 35 Sharon; the coastal plain. 36 Tabitha; Aramaic for Gazelle; in Greek, Dorcas. 37 When they had washed. A reference to the Jewish custom of 'purification of the dead'. 39 Showing coats and garments. The middle voice of the Greek verb indicates that they were wearing them at the time. 43 He stayed . . . with one Simon, a tanner. Simon lived by the shore (10:6), perhaps because he required sea-water for his tanning, and Peter, as a fisherman, might naturally choose a lodging in this part of the town. But that he lodged with a man who followed the 'unclean' occupation of a tanner may suggest that he already enjoyed some sense of emancipation from ceremonial convention.

10:1–48 Peter and Cornelius

A great step forward had still to be taken, and it was at Joppa that Peter learned the lesson that nothing cleansed by God should be called common or unclean. Was it in the light of this lesson that he added to our Lord's teaching on meats the comment, 'Thus he declared all foods clean', reported in Mk. 7:19? At any rate, having learned this lesson, he had immediately to put it into practice when he was invited to visit the Roman centurion Cornelius at Caesarea and make known the good news to him and his household. This is another episode to which Luke obviously attached high importance, for, after telling it in ch. 10, he repeats it in ch. 11, where Peter himself tells the story, and reverts to it in ch. 15, again in the mouth of Peter.

Cornelius as well as Peter had been divinely prepared for the new move. Cornelius, a member of the class referred to by Luke as 'God-fearers', who attached themselves to the spiritual and monotheistic Jewish worship in the synagogues without becoming converts to Judaism, was instructed in a vision to send for Peter. When Peter entered his house and began to proclaim the divine action in the cross and resurrection of Christ, a further proof of divine guidance was afforded in the sudden possession of the Gentile household by the Holy Spirit, manifested by the same outward signs as on the Day of Pentecost. There was this difference: at Pentecost those who were baptized received the Spirit; now Cornelius and his family were baptized because they had already received the Spirit. Without this obvious mark of God's favour, Peter might have hesitated to go so far as to baptize them.

1 A centurion of what was known as the Italian Cohort. A centurion had the status of a non-commissioned officer with the responsibility of a captain. Centurions were the backbone of the Roman army; it is striking that something is recorded to the credit of all the centurions mentioned in the NT. The Italian Cohort (Gk. speira) may be identical with the 'second Italian cohort of Roman citizens' for which there is inscriptional evidence in Syria in AD 69. 2 A devout man who feared God; i.e. a 'God-fearer', one of a class of Gentiles who gave general adherence to the Jewish faith, worship and practice without submitting to circumcision and becoming full proselytes. 4 Have ascended as a memorial. The verb 'have ascended' may suggest the burnt-offering (Heb. 'ôlāh, lit. 'ascending'). The Greek word mnēmosynon, rendered 'memorial', is used in Lv. 2:2ff., LXX, for that part of the meal-offering which was presented to God. For the sacrificial character of such conduct as that of Cornelius cf. Ps. 141:2; Phil. 4:18; Heb. 13:15, 16.

9 About the sixth hour; i.e. midday. 10 Trance, or 'ecstasy' (Gk. ekstasis); a state in which a man, so to speak, 'stands outside' himself. 11 Something (lit. 'a certain object'); the Greek word (skeuos) is quite indefinite. A great sheet was suggested to Peter's subconscious mind possibly by the awning spread over the roof or a sail on the western horizon. Four corners. The Greek word archē, here rendered 'corner' (lit. 'beginning'), was used in medical parlance for the end of a bandage, and in nautical language in the sense of 'rope'. 12 All kinds of animals and reptiles and birds of the air. For the threefold division of the animal world cf. Gn. 6:20. 14 No, Lord . . . ; cf. Ezekiel's protest (Ezk. 4:14). The Jewish food laws were based on Lv. 11. These laws, in their ceremonial application, were now abrogated explicitly as they had been implicitly in Jesus' teaching in Mk. 7:14ff.

19 The Spirit said to him. The Spirit of inner prophetic monition. 20 I have sent them. This raises a question about the relation between the Spirit now speaking within Peter and the apparently external angelic manifestation to Cornelius. 22 Was directed; lit. 'received an oracular communication' (Gk. chrēmatizō). 23 Some of the brethren from Joppa. They were six in number (11:12). 25 When Peter. . . . The 'western' text amplifies this verse: 'And as Peter was drawing near to Caesarea, one of the servants ran ahead and announced that he had arrived. Then Cornelius ran out and met him. . . .' Worshipped him, or 'paid homage to him' (Gk. proskyneō), does not necessarily connote divine honours. 30 Four days ago; by inclusive reckoning. On day one Cornelius received his vision; on day two Peter received his, and Cornelius's messengers came to him; on day three Peter and the others set out from Joppa; on day four they arrived at Caesarea. 33 You have been kind enough to come; an expression of gratitude; i.e. 'Thank you for coming'.

34 God shows no partiality. Cf. Dt. 10:17; Rom. 2:11; Eph. 6:9; Col. 3:25. Divine election does not imply favouritism; God's grace extends to Gentiles as freely as to Jews. To us this is a truism, but it was a revolutionary thought to Peter. 36 The word which he sent to Israel. From here to the end of v. 43 we have the fullest summary of the apostolic message in Acts. Its scope extends from the ministry of John the Baptist to the resurrection, and looks on to the judgment. The present summary bears the marks of fairly literal translation from Aramaic. 37 Throughout all Judea; here used in the wider sense of Palestine (cf. Lk. 4:44, RV mg.). 38 God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Spirit. Anointed carries with it the more formal idea 'made Messiah'; the occasion intended is our Lord's baptism, when the Spirit descended on Him (Lk. 3:21f.). Cf. Is. 61:1, quoted in Lk. 4:18. 39 In the country of the Jews; i.e. all Palestine, like 'Judea' in v. 37. 41 Who ate and drank with him. This emphasized the reality of His bodily resurrection. Cf. Lk. 24:41, 43 (and see on Acts 1:4). 42 Ordained by God to be judge of the living and the dead. This goes back to the 'Son of man' vision of Dn. 7:9ff. 43 Forgiveness of sins. The chief OT prophecy promising remission of sins through Christ is Is. 53.

44 The Holy Spirit fell on all who heard the word. As Peter himself suggests in v. 47 (cf. 11:15), this event reproduced the descent of the Spirit on the original band of disciples in Acts 2. The occasion has been well described as 'the Pentecost of the Gentile world'. No routine procedure would have availed for so unprecedented a situation as the acceptance of the gospel by Gentiles; an unmediated act of God was required. 46 Extolling God; cf. 2:11, 'telling . . . the mighty works of God'. 48 He commanded them to be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ; the same expression as in 2:38. It is nowhere hinted that anything was said to these Gentiles about the necessity, or even the desirability, of circumcision.

11:1–18 The other apostles approve Peter's action

The news travelled quickly to Jerusalem, and when Peter arrived back there he found himself obliged to answer the criticisms of his fellow-apostles. Stephen's activity had been bad enough, in the eyes of men who, while followers of Jesus, were still orthodox Jews; but that the prince of the apostles himself should so outrage sacred convention was too bad altogether. The apostles apparently still enjoyed a measure of popular favour, but they were likely to lose it, too, if it became known that their leader had fraternized with the uncircumcised. It is probably more than a coincidence that, not long after this, Herod Agrippa I made a bid for popularity by laying violent hands on two of the apostles, and also that very soon James, the Lord's brother, appears as leader of the Jerusalem church.

However, when Peter told of his experience of the Lord's guidance, and of the outpouring of the Holy Spirit in the house of Cornelius, asking, Who was I that I could withstand God?, the apostles were convinced that he had acted rightly and praised God for His grace to Gentiles.

2 The circumcision party. The more 'rigorist' party in the Jerusalem church is probably intended here, although the same phrase in 10:45 (lit. 'those of the circumcision') means simply Jewish Christians. 14 By which you will be saved, you and all your household. Additional to the version in 10:22. The 'household' included not only the family in the modern sense, but all who were under the authority of the head of the house—slaves, attendants, and so forth. Cf. 16:15, 31ff.; 18:8. 16 John baptized with water. . . . The words of the Lord in 1:5. 18 Then to the Gentiles; better, 'even to the Gentiles' (in Jewish eyes, the most astounding token of divine grace).

11:19–30 The first Gentile church

The other apostles might well approve Peter's action, for about the same time there took place a great work with far-reaching results at Antioch, in the north of Syria, to which some Hellenistic Jews had made their way in the course of the dispersion which followed Stephen's death. The atmosphere of Antioch was as different as could be from that of Jerusalem. In this busy northern capital, a commercial city where European and Asiatic met, where Greek civilization touched the Syrian desert, men naturally got their rough corners rubbed off, and religious differences which loomed so large in Judea began to look far less important. It was here, then, that some of these Hellenists, not content with preaching Jesus in the synagogues to their fellow-Hellenists, began to preach Him to Gentile Greeks as well, with the result that a great number of these embraced the new faith, so that the second Christian church to be founded had a considerable Gentile element, and the disciples first received the name 'Christians' there.

When news of this innovation reached Jerusalem, the apostles, wishing to look into it, sent just the right man for the job, Barnabas, 'the son of encouragement' (see 4:36). He went to Antioch, and, instead of being scandalized at the mingling of Jew and Gentile, he rejoiced at so astounding a token of God's grace, settled down among them, and did all he could to help this new church and build it up. But the work grew apace, and Barnabas, casting about in his mind for a suitable helper, bethought himself of Saul, who had been for some years now in Tarsus and the surrounding regions. So he went and fetched Saul, and made him his fellow-worker, and both of them continued to promote the great work which God had inaugurated in Antioch.

It was about this time that the prophet Agabus announced in the church at Antioch that great and widespread dearth was to be expected. In consequence of this announcement Barnabas and Saul were sent to Jerusalem by the Antioch church, bearing to the mother church the proceeds of a special collection which the daughter church had made to help the Palestinian Christians in their distress. The Jerusalem church seems to have been afflicted with chronic poverty; later on we find Paul organizing collections in the Gentile churches founded by him for its relief. It was possibly during this famine-relief visit of Barnabas and Saul that the events of Gal. 2:1–10 took place; the 'revelation' according to which they went up (Gal. 2:2) might then be the prophecy of Agabus (Acts 11:28), and the words of Gal. 2:10 are specially applicable to this visit: 'They would have us remember the poor, which very thing I was eager to do.'

19 Now those who were scattered. These words take us back to the same point of departure as we have in 8:4, which begins with the same expression. Phoenicia; i.e. Tyre, Sidon, etc.; cf. 21:3ff.; 27:3. 20 Antioch. The former capital of the Seleucid kingdom, now the seat of government of the Roman province of Syria, and the third largest city in the world (Rome and Alexandria being first and second). Spoke to the Greeks. Whether the true reading here be 'Greeks' (Gk. Hellēnes) or 'Grecians' (AV), i.e. Hellenists, the meaning certainly is that Greek-speaking Gentiles were now evangelized. 22 They sent Barnabas, just as they sent Peter and John to Samaria (8:14). 25 So Barnabas went to Tarsus to look for Saul. Saul had spent the time since 9:30 in various parts of the united province of Syria-Cilicia, in which Tarsus and Antioch were both situated (Gal. 1:21). 26 And in Antioch the disciples were for the first time called Christians; lit. 'they did business (Gk. chrēmatizō) under the name of Christians', i.e. became commonly known by this name. Only from Gentiles could they have received this name (meaning 'Christ's people'), for 'Christ' was a mere personal name in Gentile ears, whereas to Jews it meant 'Messiah' and they would not have called the followers of Jesus 'Messiah's people'.

27 In these days; i.e. during the year that Barnabas and Saul spent in Antioch (v. 26). From Jerusalem to Antioch. The 'western' text goes on: 'and there was much rejoicing; and when we were gathered together, one of them . . .' —thus providing an additional 'we' section which is our earliest witness for the tradition of Luke's Antiochene origin. 28 Agabus. He reappears in 21:10 in a 'we' section of Acts. Over all the world; i.e. the Roman world. In the days of Claudius. Claudius was Emperor from AD 41 to 54. Suetonius confirms that his reign was marked by constant seasons of unfruitfulness. Josephus tells us that about the year 46 Palestine was hard hit by famine, and that the Jewish queen-mother of Adiabene, in North-eastern Mesopotamia, bought corn in Egypt and figs in Cyprus to relieve the necessities of the Palestinian Jews. It is not clear how long before the famine Agabus's prediction was made. Probably the Antiochene Christians set aside money systematically until the time of need actually came, and then sent Barnabas and Saul as their delegates to take the accumulated sum to the Christians at Jerusalem.

12:1–24 Herod Agrippa and the church

A new wave of persecution broke over the Jerusalem church, and this time the apostles, far from being immune, were the chief object of attack. Herod Agrippa I, the grandson of Herod the Great, had received a large grant of territory in and near Palestine from his lifelong friend the Emperor Gaius, commonly called Caligula (37–41), together with the title of king; and Claudius (41–54) added to that territory the regions of Judea and Samaria. During his brief reign over Judea (41–44), Herod, despite his faults, proved a studious patron of the Jewish faith, and maintained friendly relations with the religious leaders of the people. It is said that on one occasion, when reading the law at the Feast of Tabernacles, he burst into tears as he read Dt. 17:15 ('one from among your brethren you shall set as king over you; you may not put a foreigner over you, who is not your brother'), for he remembered the Edomite origin of the Herod family; but the populace cried out: 'Be not distressed; you are our brother!'

His execution of James the Zebedean, and his arrest of Peter, are related here. The words, he saw that it pleased the Jews, are significant, for reasons already suggested (see introduction to 11:1–18). The idea that John suffered martyrdom at the same time as James rests on the flimsiest foundations, in spite of the vigour with which it has sometimes been pressed. Peter's escape from prison, and his unexpected visit to the house of Mary, where the believers were praying for him, are narrated with a masterly vividness.

Soon after this, Herod's death took place under circumstances of dramatic impressiveness which are related by both Luke and Josephus. The two historians differ in details, but agree on the main features; as for their differences, we may quote the German historian Eduard Meyer: 'In outline, in date, and in the general conception, both accounts are in full agreement. By its very interesting details, which are by no means to be explained as due to a "tendency" or popular tradition, Luke's account affords a guarantee that it is at least as reliable as that of Josephus.'

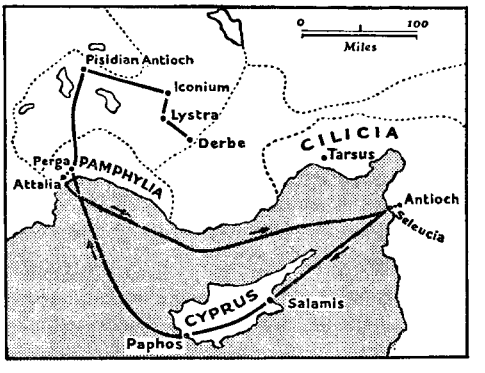
3 This was during the days of Unleavened Bread. The days of Unleavened Bread commenced on Passover eve, Nisan 14, and lasted till Nisan 21 (cf. 20:6). Nisan 14 fell in that year (AD 44) on May 1—an unusually late date owing to the intercalation of a second month of Adar that year from March 19 to April 17 inclusive. 4 Four squads of soldiers. One squad for each watch of the night. Peter was in the custody of four soldiers at a time, of whom two were probably on guard at either side of him, and two at the door. After the Passover. The Passover strictly speaking was celebrated on Nisan 14, but the term was sometimes used in a more general sense, to cover the Festival of Unleavened Bread as well (cf. Lk. 22:1); that is the sense here. 7 And behold, an angel of the Lord appeared; cf. v. 10. Probably the most remarkable modern parallel to Peter's release is the story of Sadhu Sundar Singh's mysterious release from a well in which he was locked by a Tibetan ruler (told by Streeter and Appasamy, The Sadhu, pp. 30f.). But 'Peter thought it was all a vision until he found himself safe and sound. The Sadhu thought the rescuer was a man until he disappeared' (L. E. Browne). 10 When they had passed the first and the second guard, they came to the iron gate leading into the city. 'There were obviously three gates and three wards to pass (Peter was allowed to pass the first and the second, being taken presumably as a servant; but no servant would be expected to pass beyond the outermost ward at night, and a different course was needed there)' (Ramsay). So the street-gate opened of its own accord (lit. 'automatically'; Gk. automatē); how, we are not told. But the whole inserted description reflects the account of an eyewitness, including the 'western' addition 'and went down the seven steps' inserted after they went out. Peter was probably imprisoned in the fortress Antonia, NW of the Temple area. 12 He went to the house of Mary, the mother of John whose other name was Mark. This house appears to have served as a meeting-place for one group of Jerusalem Christians; it is an attractive conjecture that it was the house in which the Last Supper was held. The group associated with James the Lord's brother seems to have had another meeting-place (v. 17). 15 It is his angel!; i.e. his guardian angel or spirit counterpart, capable of assuming his appearance and of being mistaken for him. The Iranian fravashi conception is a parallel. Cf. also the reference to children's angels who behold the face of God (Mt. 18:10). 17 Motioning to them with his hand to be silent; another eyewitness touch. Tell this to James and to the brethren. Evidently by this time James the Lord's brother had attained a special status in the Jerusalem church (cf. 15:13ff.; 21:18). Went to another place. This may simply mean that he went into hiding, 'went underground'. He told nobody at the time where he was going, and Luke could not find out in later years where he had actually gone.

19 That they should be put to death; lit. 'led off' (presumably to execution). Herod probably suspected them of collusion in a plot to rescue Peter. 20 Their country depended on the king's country for food. The Phoenician seaboard depended on Galilee for its food supply, as in the days of Hiram and Solomon (1 Ki. 5:9ff.). 21 On an appointed day. Josephus says it was a festival in honour of the Emperor Claudius (Ant. xix. 8. 2), possibly on his birthday, August 1. This might well have afforded an occasion for public reconciliation between Herod Agrippa and his Phoenician neighbours. Herod put on his royal robes. 'He put on a robe made of silver throughout, of marvellous weaving' (Josephus). 22 The people (Gk. dēmos); i.e. the city populace of Caesarea. The voice of a god, and not of man! According to Josephus, his flatterers, addressing him as a god, said: 'Be gracious to us: hitherto we have reverenced you as a man, but henceforth we acknowledge you to be more than mortal.' 23 An angel of the Lord smote him. For this OT expression cf. 2 Ki. 19:35. Because he did not give God the glory. He accepted the divine honours from his flatterers, instead of ascribing them to God. He was eaten by worms. A medical colleague diagnoses his malady as a hydatid cyst. And died; five days later, at the age of fifty-four. The persecutor dies; 24 the cause he persecuted survives in increasing vigour.



12:25 - 16:5 ANTIOCH BECOMES A MISSIONARY CHURCH

12:25 - 13:12 The evangelization of Cyprus

On the return of Barnabas and Saul from Jerusalem to Antioch, they took with them Barnabas's cousin John Mark, and continued for some time to minister to the church as had been their custom. In addition to Barnabas and Saul, the most gifted teachers of that church, there were three others, whose identity opens up fascinating vistas (see on 13:1).

But the Holy Spirit had further work for the Antioch church to do, and He called upon them to release Barnabas and Saul for the special work to which He had called them. It is worth noticing that it was the two ablest ministers of the church who were thus set apart for what we should call 'foreign missions', though such an expression is not really applicable to a time when almost all the civilized world was politically united under Rome.

Acquiescing in the divine will thus expressed, the church sent forth the two men, expressing their fellowship with them by the imposition of hands. Having set sail from Seleucia, the port of

PAUL'S FIRST MISSIONARY JOURNEY

Antioch, with Mark in attendance on them, they landed in Cyprus, Barnabas's native island, and traversed it from east to west. When they came to Paphos, the western capital, there occurred a passage-of-arms between Paul and the magician

Bar-Jesus, who belonged to the entourage of Sergius Paulus, the proconsul of the province. Bar-Jesus was probably afraid that, if Sergius paid too much attention to the missionaries, his own days as court magician would be numbered. Ancient commentators delighted to point out that the magician's temporary blinding was intended by Paul to have the same effect as his own three days' blindness at Damascus had. Ramsay argues that some members of Sergius's family were Christians in later generations.

12:25 Barnabas and Saul returned from Jerusalem; i.e. to Antioch. A problem is presented by the strong early attestation of the reading 'to Jerusalem'. 13:1 Symeon who was called Niger; i.e. 'the Black'. It is tempting to identify him with Simon of Cyrene (Mk. 15:21; Lk. 23:26); his wife might in that case be the mother of Rufus who showed herself a mother to Paul (Rom. 16:13). Lucius of Cyrene. There is no evidence for associating him with Lucius of Rom. 16:21 or with Luke the Evangelist, although the latter identification was made in antiquity. Manaen a member of the court of Herod the tetrarch; lit. 'foster-brother (Gk. syntrophos) of Herod' (i.e. Herod Antipas; see on 4:27). This Manaen was possibly the grandson of another Manaen, an Essene mentioned by Josephus as a favourite of Herod the Great. It was perhaps from him that Luke received much of his special information about the family of the Herods. 2 The Holy Spirit said; probably through one of the prophets. 5 Salamis. On the E coast of Cyprus, the chief town of the island, and the seat of government of the eastern half. They had John to assist them; lit. 'as their attendant' (Gk. hypēretēs). John Mark was probably one of the 'ministers (Gk. hypēretai) of the word' in Lk. 1:2; his first-hand acquaintance with certain phases of the gospel story would be useful to the missionaries. 7 The proconsul. The Romans had annexed Cyprus in 57 BC: it was a senatorial province from 22 BC onwards. Sergius Paulus. Probably identical with a man of the same name who appears on a Roman inscription as a curator of the Tiber earlier in Claudius's reign. 8 Elymas the magician (for that is the meaning of his name). This does not mean that 'Elymas' is equivalent to 'Bar-Jesus', but that Elymas, being a Semitic word, means 'magician' (Gk. magos). 9 Saul, who is also called Paul. From this point the apostle is regularly given his Roman cognomen Paul (Lat. Paullus) instead of his Hebrew birth-name, Saul, the former being more appropriate when the story is moving into a predominantly Gentile environment. 12 The proconsul believed, . . . for he was astonished at the teaching of the Lord. It has been suggested that the proconsul's courtesy was mistaken for conversion, but a matter-of-fact Roman official was the very man to be convinced by the act of power which accompanied the teaching (cf. Lk. 4:32).

13:13–41 Paul's address at Pisidian Antioch

From Cyprus the company sailed across to Asia Minor, where Mark left them and returned to Jerusalem. His reasons are not given; perhaps he resented the way in which his cousin Barnabas was falling into second place. When they set out from Antioch, it was Barnabas and Saul (v. 2); when they left Cyprus, it was Paul and his company (v. 13). Whatever his reason, Mark went back; Barnabas himself seems not to have minded; he was an outstanding example of the old saying:

> It takes more grace than I can tell
> To play the second fiddle well.

Barnabas and Paul, left alone, now struck up country (Ramsay thought this was because Paul had caught malaria in the low-lying country near the coast, though this is only speculative). They arrived at Pisidian Antioch, a Roman colony in the province of Galatia, and stayed there some time. Roman colonies played an important part in Paul's plan of campaign in all his missionary journeys. With true strategic instinct he picked out for intensive evangelization the important points along the main highways between Jerusalem and Rome. Another constant feature of his method is seen at Pisidian Antioch, where they tackled the local Jewish synagogue first. 'To the Jew first' was Paul's constant programme everywhere.

On the first sabbath after arriving at Pisidian Antioch they went into the synagogue; and after the reading of the law and the prophets the rulers of the synagogue invited the strangers to pass on any word of exhortation they might have for the company. Paul stood up to speak, and the summary of his address is given at some length, probably to show the sort of synagogue sermon he was accustomed to preach throughout the Empire. He narrated the deliverance wrought by God for the nation of Israel at the Exodus, and outlined their history from Moses to David. Then he passed from David to the promised Messiah of David's seed, and declared that the promised Messiah had appeared in their day in the Person of Jesus, whose death and well-attested resurrection proved Him to be the Messiah foretold in Hebrew Scripture. Like Peter at Pentecost, he argued that the words of Ps. 16:10, Thou wilt not let thy Holy One see corruption, could not apply to David himself, who did 'see corruption', but to the descendant of David who had in these last days, as a matter of evidence, risen from the dead. The sermon ended with an application to the present situation of the warning of the prophet Habakkuk on the eve of the Chaldean invasion.

14 Antioch of Pisidia. It was not 'in' (AV) but near the border of Pisidia (one of the regions of the province of Galatia); render 'Pisidian Antioch'. 15 After the reading of the law and the prophets. The law was read through according to a fixed lectionary; readings were selected from the prophets with some resemblance or relation to the preceding lesson from the law. The rulers of the synagogue. These made arrangements for public worship, and invited suitable members of the congregation to read the lessons and give the address.

16 Men of Israel, and you that fear God. These words indicate the two elements in the congregation, the Jews and the Gentile 'God-fearers' (see on 10:2). 18 He bore with them. Some texts, with a change of one letter in the Greek verb thus translated, read 'he carried them like a nurse' (cf. Dt. 1:31). 19 Seven nations. See Dt. 7:1. 20 For about four hundred and fifty years. This time-note probably denotes the interval between the beginning of the patriarchal sojourning and the occupation of the land. 22 I have found in David . . . ; quoted from Ps. 89:20 and 1 Sa. 13:14. The narrative thus far covers the scope of the recurring OT confession of faith or rehearsal of God's gracious dealings with His people: cf. Dt. 26:5–9; Ps. 78. 24–31 contain an outline of the apostolic preaching similar to that in 10:36–43. 25 I am not he; i.e. the Messiah. Cf. Jn. 1:20, 21. 29 They took him down; a generalizing plural. In the Gospels Joseph of Arimathea and Nicodemus are said to have done this. 33 To us their children. Read 'to us and to our children' (F. H. Chase). By raising Jesus. The reference here is to God's raising up Jesus as Messiah in the sense in which He raised up David as king (v. 22; cf. 3:26; 5:30); contrast v. 34, where the resurrection is in view: he raised him from the dead. Thou art my Son, today I have begotten thee; quoted from Ps. 2:7. The day of the king's anointing 'was ideally the day in which he, the nation's representative, was born into a new relation of sonship towards Jehovah' (F. H. Chase); the day of Jesus' baptism is probably intended here (when He was addressed by God, 'Thou art my Son . . .'). 34 I will give you the holy and sure blessings of David; quoted from Is. 55:3. The 'sure mercies' (AV) promised to David find their fulfilment in Christ through His resurrection. 39 Every one that believes is freed. It is noteworthy that only in this sermon of Paul's does the concept of justification (Gk. dikaioō) find explicit expression in Acts. Faith in Christ brings a completely righteous status in God's presence, such as the law could never afford. 41 Behold, you scoffers . . .; cf. Hab. 1:5 (which itself echoes Is. 29:14). The word scoffers is quoted from LXX, where it replaces 'among the nations' of MT.

13:42–52 Reaction to the gospel at Pisidian Antioch

Paul's address had been listened to with special interest by the Gentiles who attended the Jewish place of worship, the 'God-fearers', as Luke calls them, who, without becoming proselytes, were attracted by the pure worship of Judaism, and even kept the Jewish law to some extent, e.g. by observing the sabbath. These were greatly attracted by Paul's proclamation of forgiveness of sins through Christ, and begged that he should address them again next sabbath. These people, indeed, formed the main nucleus of Paul's converts in most of the cities he went to, as he offered them through Christ equal rights before God with Jewish believers, without the necessity of observing the Jewish ceremonial law and becoming proselytes.

Their adhesion to Paul naturally aroused the envy of the Jews of the Dispersion, who resented his drawing after him those Gentiles for whose ultimate conversion to Judaism they hoped. Such envy was speedily aroused at Pisidian Antioch, for the 'God-fearers' spread the news around, and next sabbath nearly the whole Gentile population of the colony attended the synagogue. When the Jews manifested their annoyance, Paul announced that since they reckoned themselves unworthy of the eternal life which he proclaimed, he would concentrate on the Gentiles—a process which was to be repeated in city after city. But such opposition was stirred up by the Jews that Paul and Barnabas had to leave the city, not, however, before a number of the 'God-fearers' had confessed Christ and been formed into a church.

43 Devout converts to Judaism. It is disputed whether actual proselytes or 'God-fearers' are meant, but if it be the latter (as is suggested by the word rendered devout, Gk. sebomenoi), then this is the only place where such people are called converts to Judaism, i.e. 'proselytes' (Gk. prosēlytoi), a word elsewhere used in its strict sense. 46 Eternal life (Gk. zōē aiōnios) represents the Jewish expression 'the life of the age to come (the resurrection age)', which believers in Christ receive while still living temporally in the present age. 47 I have set you to be a light for the Gentiles. . . . This quotation from one of the Isaianic Servant Songs (Is. 49:6) implies that the mission of the Servant of the Lord, inaugurated by Jesus, is continued by His followers. 48 As many as were ordained to eternal life; cf. v. 46. The verb rendered ordained may here have the sense of 'inscribed', 'enrolled'. Cf. Rev. 13:8; 17:8.

14:1–28 Iconium, Lystra and Derbe

The next city to be visited was Iconium where, in the same manner, the apostles entered the synagogue, and as a result of their preaching a large number both of Jews and Gentiles believed. But they were soon forced to leave Iconium in the same way as Antioch. Persecuted in one city, however, they fled to another, and betook themselves to Lystra, another Roman colony, where the healing of a lame man by Paul provoked an outburst of religious enthusiasm among the native Anatolian population. Fancying that their city was again being favoured by a visit from the supreme god and his chief herald, as it had been in mythological narrative, they prepared to pay the missionaries divine honours.

When the apostles discovered what was afoot (the use of the Lycaonian vernacular had prevented their grasping the full situation at first), they succeeded with much ado in dissuading them, and Paul improved the occasion by instructing them in the truth about the one true

Creator who had revealed Himself in creation and providence. This short summary of his speech resembles the longer account of his Athenian speech (17:22–31); and if in ch. 13 we have a sample synagogue sermon of Paul, we have here a sample sermon delivered to pagans which, when taken along with the Athenian speech of ch. 17 and the arguments of Rom. 1:18 – 2:16, shows us the proper function of 'natural revelation' as a praeparatio evangelica.

The visit to Lystra was abruptly cut short by a visit from Jews of Pisidian Antioch and Iconium, who stirred up a riot in which Paul, so recently acclaimed as the messenger of the Immortals, was manhandled and cast out of the city as dead. When he revived (this is narrated in such a way as to suggest miraculous intervention), they went on to the neighbouring city of Derbe. After repeating their programme there and founding another church, they made their way back through Lystra, Iconium and Pisidian Antioch, encouraging the new disciples and placing the young churches on a stable basis by the appointment of elders in each. Some modern missionaries would think it hardly wise to confer presbyteral ordination on 'native' Christians so recently converted from heathenism! But we should not overlook the pluck of the apostles in revisiting cities from which they had so lately been expelled with every circumstance of outrage and brutality. From these cities they made their way to the coast, preaching the gospel en route, until they reached Attalia, from which they took ship for the River Orontes and Syrian Antioch. See map on p. 988 for the complete outline of this first missionary journey.

1 Iconium. The modern rail-junction of Konya, then the easternmost city of the Phrygian region of the province of Galatia. Together; better, 'in the same way' (as in Pisidian Antioch). 2 is recast in the 'western' text: 'But the Jews' synagogue-leaders and rulers stirred up persecution against the righteous, and made the Gentiles' minds ill-disposed towards the brethren. But the Lord soon gave peace.' This recasting is no doubt intended to smooth the transition from v. 2 to v. 3, but it involves a double persecution. V. 2 is really parenthetical, preparing the way for v. 5, and So (i.e. 'So, then') at the beginning of v. 3 is resumptive. 4 With the apostles. Barnabas was no more one of the Twelve than Paul was, but he was probably, like him, a witness of the resurrection. 6 Fled to Lystra and Derbe, cities of Lycaonia; i.e. they crossed the regional frontier from Phrygia into Lycaonia, another region of Roman Galatia. 12 Barnabas they called Zeus, and Paul . . . they called Hermes. The names of the two gods given by Luke have the Greek forms; in Lycaonian (v. 11) native Anatolian names were no doubt used. An altar near Lystra records the dedication to Zeus of a statue of Hermes by men with Lycaonian names; another altar in the vicinity is dedicated to the 'Hearer of prayer' (presumably Zeus) and Hermes. Ovid's tale of how these two gods were hospitably entertained unawares by Philemon and Baucis has also its setting in these parts. Because he was the chief speaker. Hermes had a title similar to this in the Egyptian mysteries. 13 The priest of Zeus, whose temple was in front of the city; i.e. in front of the city gate (the temple of Zeus Propolis). 15 That you should turn from these vain things to a living God. Cf. 1 Thes. 1:9 for very similar language. 16 In past generations. Cf. the reference to 'the times of ignorance' in 17:30.

19 But Jews came there from Antioch; i.e. Pisidian Antioch. They stoned Paul; cf. 2 Cor. 11:25, 'once I was stoned'. 20 He went on with Barnabas to Derbe; near Kerti Hüyük, c. 13 miles NNE of Laranda, and so c. 60 miles from Lystra; render therefore: 'he set out . . . for Derbe'. 22 And saying that through many tribulations we must enter the kingdom of God; a transition from indirect to direct speech. Here 'the kingdom of God' is something yet to be realized. 23 In every church. The churches planted by Paul and Barnabas during this journey are those to which the Epistle to the Galatians was later addressed. 25 Attalia; modern Antalya, at the mouth of the Cataractes; it was the chief port of Pamphylia. 27 All that God had done with them. An expression emphasizing that the apostles were but God's agents, or even instruments. (Cf. the title of Müller's Narrative of the Lord's Dealings with George Müller.) 28 No little time, a characteristic Lucan idiom; probably about a year.

15:1 – 16:5 The apostolic letter from the Council of Jerusalem

15:1–29 The letter issued. The Gentile mission was bound to result in predominantly Gentile churches and an excess of Gentile Christians over those of Jewish birth and background; and the more extreme Jewish party in the Jerusalem church saw that they must act at once if they were to act at all. So a campaign was organized in Antioch, the citadel of Gentile Christianity, urging the wholesale adoption of the Jewish law by all Christians as an indispensable condition of salvation and of fellowship with their Jewish fellow-believers.

What happened at Antioch is described by Paul in Gal. 2:11ff.; so vigorously did the Judaizers press their point of view that even Peter, who was in Antioch at the time and knew perfectly what the rights and wrongs of the matter were, was drawn into an alarming appearance of 'play-acting', as Paul calls it, for he withdrew from the society of Gentile Christians. This action, though Peter may have justified it on grounds of expediency, was bound to have a devastating effect; even Barnabas of all people was inclined to follow suit, and Paul dealt drastically with the situation, charging Peter outright with dissimulation. His rebuke had a salutary effect; at the ensuing Council of Jerusalem Peter supported Paul's arguments in an uncompromising manner.

But the problem raised by the Judaizers had to be dealt with and settled, if the Christian church was to avoid the risk of being split right at the beginning into two bodies, a Jewish and a Gentile. So the church at Antioch sent delegates to the apostles and elders at Jerusalem, and the question was thoroughly discussed by them in the meeting known as the Council of Jerusalem. In spite of the arguments of the Pharisaic party in the church, the weight of Peter's authority, supported by Barnabas and Paul's narrative of God's blessing on the Gentile mission, and finally by James's judicious summing-up, swayed the mind of the Council in the liberal direction.

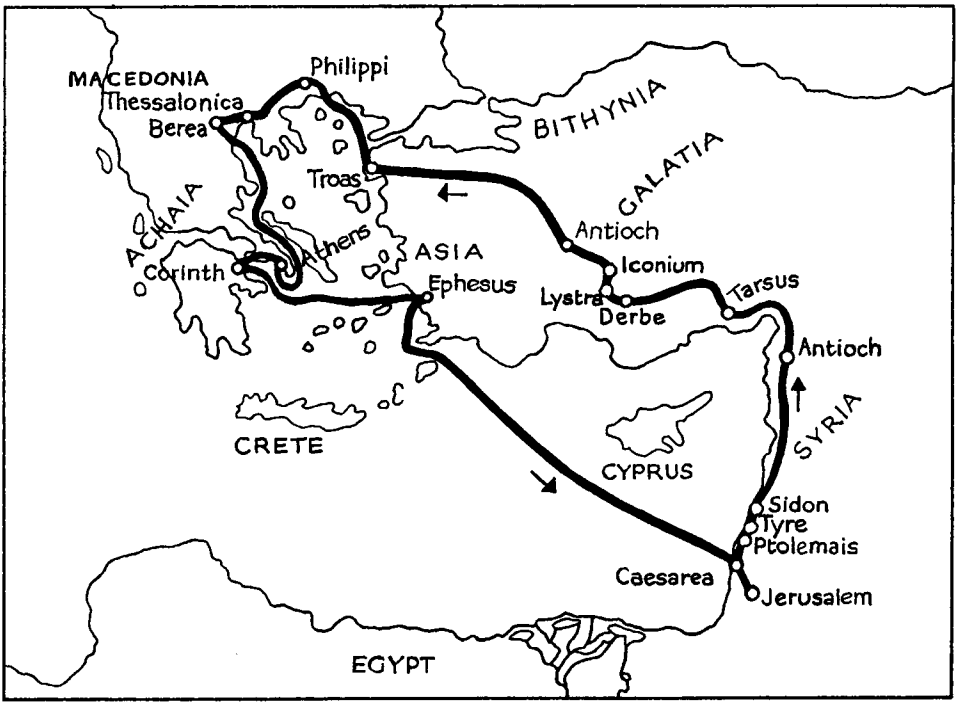
No conditions were to be imposed on the Gentile Christians for salvation or admission to full Christian fellowship, save that condition which God Himself had accepted as sufficient, faith in Christ. Once that principle had been established, it was easier to deal with the practical question of social intercourse. It would manifestly be an act of courtesy and grace on the part of Gentile Christians to respect certain Jewish scruples; and the finding of the meeting was therefore conveyed in a letter to the church at Antioch and her daughter churches, asking them to abstain from food which had been sacrificed to idols, from blood and from flesh from which the blood had not been properly drained (what is strangled), and to conform to the lofty and divinely appointed Jewish code of relations between the sexes. It is nonsense to say, as some have said, that Paul would never have accepted such conditions for his Gentile churches. Where principles were at stake, Paul was uncompromising; where these were not compromised, he was the most conciliatory of men, and there are several places in his letters where he urges upon his converts and others this very duty of respecting the scruples and consciences of others (cf. 1 Cor. 8:1ff.; Rom. 14:1ff.).

1 Some men came down from Judea. Probably the same as those referred to in Gal. 2:12, 'certain men came from James' (though there is MS authority for reading 'certain' there as singular: 'someone came from James'). Cf. v. 24. 5 Some believers who belonged to the party of the Pharisees. There was nothing to prevent a Pharisee from accepting Jesus as Messiah while retaining the distinctive Pharisaic tenets, but he tended to be a legally minded Christian. (Paul, of course, was the great exception to this tendency.) It is necessary to circumcise them, and to charge them to keep the law of Moses. By 'them', of course, Gentile converts are meant. It is not clear whether 'necessary' means 'necessary for salvation absolutely' or 'necessary for recognition by and fellowship with Jewish Christians'. Probably these Pharisees would have considered this a distinction without a difference.

6 The apostles and the elders were gathered together. It seems from v. 12 (all the assembly) that other members of the Jerusalem church were present, although deliberation and decision rested with the leaders. 7 That by my mouth the Gentiles should hear the word of the gospel; a reference to the Cornelius incident (see ch. 10). 8 Giving them the Holy Spirit just as he did to us; cf. 10:47; 11:15–17. 9 Cleansed their hearts by faith. Cleansed (lit. 'cleansing'), like giving in v. 8, is in Greek a simultaneous aorist participle, and both participles denote the same event: as those Gentiles believed the gospel, the Holy Spirit came upon them, cleansing their hearts (cf. 10:15, 'what God has cleansed'). 10 A yoke . . . which neither our fathers nor we have been able to bear. The obligations of the Jewish religion are frequently referred to as a 'yoke' by the Rabbis (cf. the words of Jesus, 'my yoke', Mt. 11:29, 30). Peter's words probably represent the general attitude of the Jewish rank and file (as distinct from people like the Pharisees) towards the practicability of keeping the law. 11 But we believe. . . . This verse probably means: 'But by the grace of the Lord Jesus we are saved by faith just as they are.'

13 James replied. James appears by this time to be the acknowledged leader of the Jerusalem church, and one who commanded the loyalty of the legalists. 14 Symeon, i.e. Peter; Symeon represents Heb. šim'ôn more accurately than Simon does. To take out of them a people for his name; from among the Gentiles, that is, as well as from the Jews. 15 With this the words of the prophets agree. The main quotation is from Am. 9:11, 12 (LXX), with additions at the beginning and the end from Je. 12:15 and Is. 45:21. The prophecy of the restoration of David's house and the extension of its rule over Gentiles is now fulfilled in that not only Jewish believers but many Gentiles farther afield have yielded allegiance to the Son of David.

20 To abstain. The conditions laid down for social intercourse are in the main food laws; the unchastity (Gk. porneia, lit. 'fornication') here prohibited may denote breaches of the Jewish marriage law of Lv. 18 (fornication in the general sense was in any case absolutely forbidden to all Christians). The 'western' text, here and in v. 29 (and 21:25), turns these conditions into ethical regulations—abstinence from idolatry, fornication (in the general sense) and bloodshed—and adds a negative form of the golden rule: 'and that they should not do to others what they do not wish to have done to themselves.' The 'western' reading reflects a time when the Judaizing controversy was gone and forgotten. 21 For from early generations Moses has . . . ; i.e. there is no danger that the Mosaic law will be forgotten, as it is regularly made known in synagogues throughout the Gentile world. 28 It has seemed good to the Holy Spirit and to us. So completely Spirit-possessed is their consciousness that the community is regarded as the very mouthpiece or vehicle of the Spirit.



15:30 – 16:5 The letter received. The letter was taken to Antioch by two Jerusalem Christians, Judas and Silas, who accompanied the delegates from Antioch on their return journey. The reception of the letter at Antioch caused great satisfaction.

Then Paul and Barnabas agreed to revisit the churches evangelized on their former journey, but disagreed about Mark. Barnabas refused to forgo the company of his cousin, and the upshot of the dissension was that instead of one missionary tour there were two: Barnabas and Mark going to Cyprus again, while Paul took Silas, who had the double advantage of being a member of the Jerusalem church and a Roman citizen, and with him went through the cities of Asia Minor visited on the previous journey.

34 (AV), taken over by the Received Text from the 'western' text, is no part of the original, and is therefore rightly omitted; it contradicts v. 33, but was interpolated in an effort to explain why Silas appears again at Antioch in v. 40; it is simple, however, to suppose that Paul sent for 16:1 A disciple was there; i.e. in Lystra, the common factor in Derbe and Lystra (v. 1) and Lystra and Iconium (v. 2). A Jewish woman who was a believer. She is called Eunice in 2 Tim. 1:5. On her 'mixed' marriage, Ramsay suggests that the Phrygian Jews were less exclusive than those of Palestine. 3 Paul . . . circumcised him; so that he might be the more useful in the work of the gospel. Lesser minds have not been slow to charge Paul with inconsistency here (or else to deny the truth of Luke's statement); but Paul was in truth loyal to a higher consistency, the consistency described in 1 Cor. 9:19–23. He fought against any suggestion that Christians should be circumcised in order to complete their salvation; but circumcision in itself, he held, was religiously indifferent (1 Cor. 7:19; Gal. 5:6; 6:15). Timothy had been brought up by his Jewish mother and grandmother to be a Jew religiously in every point but circumcision. Moreover, as his mother was a Jewess, he ranked as a Jew in Jewish eyes, albeit an irregular one because, his father having been a Greek, he was not circumcised. Therefore to regularize his position Paul circumcised him; it was better that he should be clearly one thing or the other than betwixt and between. 4 They delivered to them. . . . The substance of this statement appears in the 'western' text also in 15:41, and that may be its sole original context, since the decisions were addressed to the churches of him to Jerusalem. 39 There arose a sharp contention (Gk. paroxysmos). It is idle to apportion blame between the two apostles; Mark's later development proved that Barnabas had right on his side, but probably Mark would not have developed thus in Paul's company. 40 Paul chose Silas, who is called Silvanus in the Pauline Epistles and in 1 Pet. 5:12. It appears from 16:37 that he was, like Paul, a Roman citizen. 41 Syria and Cilicia. The double province mentioned in the address of the apostolic letter in v. 23.

Syria and Cilicia, mentioned there, and not to those of S Galatia, which are now in view.

16:6 – 19:41 THE AEGEAN SHORES EVANGELIZED

16:6–40 Over to Europe: the gospel in Philippi

As the three made their way in the direction of Ephesus, they were conscious of a succession of heaven-sent inhibitions which barred other roads to them, and turned them north until they found themselves in the Aegean port of Troas, another Roman colony, where they were joined by a fourth companion, Luke, the writer of the narrative.

At Troas Paul had the night vision which led the whole company to conclude that God was calling them to go across to the European mainland with the gospel. So they sailed across the north Aegean, landed in Macedonia and went inland to the colony of Philippi. Here they settled, for Paul saw the value of planting a church here, near the eastern end of a great Roman highway, the Via Egnatia, which connected the Aegean with the Adriatic. The city's status as a Roman colony was perhaps in Paul's mind when at a later date he reminded the Philippian Christians that they were 'a colony of heaven' (Phil. 3:20).

There was apparently no synagogue in Philippi, presumably owing to the lack of the requisite quorum of ten men; but by the River Gangites they found a place of prayer (v. 13)—or, as AV has it, a place 'where prayer was wont to be made'—and spoke to the women who came together there. One of these, Lydia from Thyatira, traded in the purple dye for which her native town had long been famed. When she heard the gospel, she believed, was baptized with her household, and persuaded the four missionaries to accept the hospitality of her home.

Lydia is the first of three people in Philippi whose experience of the power of Christ in their lives is specially mentioned; and the three are so different that they might almost have been deliberately chosen to show how that power was able to bring peace and deliverance to the most diverse types. The second was the fortune-telling slave-girl who persisted in shouting unsolicited testimonials after Paul and his friends in the Philippian streets until Paul in the name of Christ exorcized the spirit that possessed her. Unfortunately from her owners' viewpoint, he exorcized their means of gain as well, and this led to Paul and Silas being dragged before the praetors—the grandiloquent name by which the two chief magistrates of this and other Roman colonies liked to call themselves—with the complaint: 'These men are Jews and they are disturbing our city. They advocate customs which it is not lawful for us Romans to accept or practise.' It is noteworthy that on the two chief occasions in Acts where Gentiles oppose the gospel, it is because of its threat to vested financial interests, the other occasion being at Ephesus (19:23ff.).

Paul and Silas were seized not only because they were the two leaders of the party, but also possibly because they looked much more Jewish than did Timothy, who was Greek on his father's side, or Luke, who was probably a complete Greek. The praetors, without inquiring carefully into the allegations, commanded the two men to be beaten with the rods of the lictors, the attendants of senior Roman magistrates, and to be securely imprisoned. But while the two missionaries were praising God aloud at midnight, in spite of their cramped and painful situation, an earthquake loosened the bars of the prison and the bonds of the prisoners, and the jailer, probably an ex-soldier, awakened in spirit as well as in body, found himself indebted for the preservation of his life and the salvation of his soul to the men whom a few hours previously he had locked in the stocks. (Vv. 25–34 form a pericope which can be removed without doing violence to the sequence of the narrative, but it does not follow that it was not from the first incorporated in Luke's account.)

The praetors, sending next morning to release the prisoners, found the tables turned on them, for they learned what in yesterday's excitement they had omitted to ascertain, that the men were Roman citizens, and therefore legally protected against such shameful treatment as had been meted out to them. So they had to eat humble pie and ceremoniously conduct the two missionaries out of prison. Soon afterwards Paul, Silas and Timothy left, apparently leaving Luke behind to help the new church, which quickly became a church worthy of emulation.

6 The region of Phrygia and Galatia; i.e. the Phrygian region of the province of Galatia. They turned northwards through this territory after the way into the province of Asia was barred. Their original intention probably had been to follow the main road westwards to Ephesus. 9 A man of Macedonia. It is idle to inquire how Paul knew him to be a Macedonian; his words, Come over to Macedonia and help us, were sufficient indication. 10 Immediately we sought. . . . These words mark the beginning of the first 'we' section of Acts, which continues to v. 17.

11 Neapolis; the port of Philippi, modern Kavalla. 12 Philippi; so called after Philip of Macedon who refounded it as a fortified city, c. 350 BC. It was made a Roman colony when Antony and Octavian settled their veterans there after the battle of Philippi in 42 BC. The leading city of the district of Macedonia. Read 'a city of the first division of Macedonia' (Macedonia was divided by the Romans into four administrative areas). 13 A place of prayer; this would normally mean a synagogue, but not here, since there were no men to constitute a synagogue congregation. 14 A worshipper of God; i.e. a 'God-fearer'.

16 Who had a spirit of divination (lit. 'having a python-spirit'). 'Pythons' were people supposed to be inspired by Apollo, the 'Pythian' god, whose chief oracle was at Delphi (also called Pytho), where he was believed to be embodied in a snake (the 'Python'). 17 Servants of the Most High God, who proclaim to you the way of salvation. These religious terms were as current in Greek as in Jewish circles at this time. Among the Gentiles 'salvation' (Gk. sōtēria) was the object of many vows and prayers to the 'Most High God' (Gk. theos hypsistos) and other 'saviour gods' (Gk. theoi sōtēres), and was held out to initiates in the mystery religions. 20 The magistrates; more accurately, 'the praetors' (which is the sense of Greek stratēgoi used as a civil title). They were the two senior collegiate magistrates of the colony. The more general Greek term for magistrates (archontes) is translated rulers at the end of v. 19. 22 Gave orders to beat them with rods. Cf. 2 Cor. 11:25, where Paul says he received this treatment on two other occasions as well. The rods were those which the praetors' attendants, the lictors, carried in bundles (fasces) as a badge of office. 24 Fastened their feet in the stocks. This served as an instrument of torture, as well as of security, for it had more than two holes for the legs, which could thus be forced far apart, causing great discomfort and pain.

25 Paul and Silas were praying and singing hymns to God. 'The legs feel no pain in the stocks when the heart is in heaven,' says Tertullian. 27 Was about to kill himself; since, presumably, he was answerable for the prisoners' safe keeping, and not even an earthquake could relieve him of his responsibility. 28 We are all here. This suggests that the two missionaries were able to exercise some moral control over the other prisoners. The jailer and his actions could be seen from within, silhouetted in the doorway, although the prisoners in the darkness were invisible to him. 30 What must I do to be saved? It is difficult to say how much he meant by this expression, but the salvation he actually received was full salvation, resulting from his acceptance of the word of the Lord (v. 32). 33 Washed their wounds, and he was baptized. 'He washed them from their wounds, and was himself washed from his sins' (Chrysostom). 34 With all his household is an adverb (Gk. panoikei) which modifies rejoiced as well as had believed. For the whole household's becoming Christian cf. the stories of Cornelius (11:14), of Lydia (16:15), and of Crispus (18:8). 35 The police; i.e. the lictors; lit. 'rod-bearers' (Gk. rhabdouchoi). 37 Uncondemned; Greek akatakritos, which probably represents here Latin re incognita, 'without investigating our case'. By a series of laws (extending from the earliest days of the republic to c. 23 BC) Roman citizens were exempt from all degrading forms of punishment. 39 Asked them to leave the city. They could not expel Roman citizens from a Roman city, but only request them to leave; the responsibility of protecting two unpopular Roman citizens was apparently more than they felt able to undertake.

17:1–15 Thessalonica and Beroea

Paul and his company continued along the Egnatian road to Thessalonica, the capital of Macedonia, where they stayed long enough to found a new church. The message on which this church was founded is made plain in 1 Thes. 1:9, 10. Paul first made known the gospel in the synagogue for three successive sabbaths, showing from the Scripture lessons that Jesus was the Messiah. But when the Jews who opposed him accused him of sedition before the politarchs, Paul had to leave the city in a hurry. Continuing south, he came to Beroea, and found its Jewish community more amenable than that of Thessalonica; but Thessalonian Jews followed him there and stirred up the people against him. So he left Beroea for Athens, where he waited for Silas and Timothy, who had remained behind. (The course of events at this juncture must be reconstructed by comparing this passage of Acts with 1 Thes. 2:17 – 3:8.)

1 Amphipolis, a bridgehead position on the Struma, and Apollonia, between the Struma and the Vardar, were Macedonian cities on the Egnatian Way. Thessalonica, made a free city by the Romans in 42 BC, was the capital of the Roman province of Macedonia. 3 Explaining and proving; i.e. opening the prophetic scriptures and setting alongside them the recent historic events which fulfilled them. It was necessary for the Christ to suffer. For this emphasis cf. Lk. 24:26, 46. 4 The devout Greeks; i.e. the 'God-fearers'. 5 Wicked fellows of the rabble; i.e. 'loafers', 'corner-boys'. 6 The city authorities. Greek politarchai, a word not found in classic literature, but attested epigraphically in this sense in a number of Macedonian cities. Thessalonica was governed by a board of five magistrates so named in the Augustan Age. These men who have turned the world upside down. The verb (Gk. anastatoō) suggests subversive revolutionary agitation; there is some evidence of militant Jewish Messianism in a number of places throughout the Empire about this time. 7 Another king; or 'another emperor'. The charge as framed was of the most serious character and could not be ignored. 9 When they had taken security from Jason. Jason and his associates went bail for Paul's good behaviour, which in this case involved his leaving Thessalonica, a situation referred to in 1 Thes. 2:18.

10 Beroea; a city of Thessaly. 11 More noble; i.e. more liberal or open-minded. 14 To the sea; perhaps to Methone or Dium, where he took ship for Piraeus, the port of Athens.

17:16–34 Paul in Athens

Paul's residence in Athens is reported by Luke in a manner which rings true in the ears of classical students. Several centuries earlier this city had been reproached by its statesmen for being more interested in hearing the latest news than in attending to matters of more pressing importance (cf. 17:21). Nothing is said of Paul's aesthetic appreciation of the sculptures of Pheidias, or of any feelings stirred in the breast of this champion of Christian liberty by the knowledge that this was the cradle of democracy; to him the sight of the beautiful city of Cecrops brought sorrow as he beheld it so full of idols. Here he discoursed not only with the Jews in the synagogue, but also with the Athenians in the market-place, the Agora, the centre of Athenian life, where he disputed with followers of two leading philosophical schools, the Stoics and the Epicureans, the former of whom pursued self-sufficiency as the highest good, the latter pleasure. To these Paul appeared as a preacher of foreign divinities (v. 18) and they brought him before the Court of the Areopagus to expound his teaching.

This was the most ancient institution of Athens, founded, according to tradition, over 1,000 years before by the city's patron goddess Athene. When Athens became a democracy in the 5th century BC, much of the power of this court was broken, but it retained great moral prestige, which tended to increase under the Romans; and there is evidence that at this time one of its functions was to examine and license public lectures.

Paul's speech before this body, as reported by Luke, followed lines not unlike those of his speech at Lystra (14:15–17). Beginning with a reference to an altar dedicated 'To an unknown god', Paul declared that his mission was to make this unknown God known to them; and he went on to describe His work in creation and providence, using language borrowed from some of the Greek poets.

Paul then argued that God should not be worshipped after the idolatrous fashion of Athens and the pagan world in general, and that, whereas hitherto God had overlooked the ignorance of men, a change had come now in that He was commanding all men everywhere to repent, in view of the coming judgment of the world, proof of which had been publicly given, seeing that the Man appointed to execute this judgment had been raised from the dead. The audience listened interestedly enough until Paul spoke of resurrection. This they could not stomach. The immortality of the soul was a commonplace of several of their philosophical schools, but the resurrection of the body was to them as absurd as it was undesirable. It is still as much a stumbling-block to many as it was to the Athenians, but it is integral to the Christian faith. (See B. Gärtner, The Areopagus Speech and Natural Revelation, 1955.)

16 Full of idols; i.e. full of temples and images of pagan deities. 17 Devout persons; i.e. 'God-fearers'. 18 Epicurean. The Epicureans took their name from Epicurus, the founder of this school (341–270 BC); Stoic philosophers were so called from the Painted Stoa (colonnade) where Zeno, their founder (340–265 BC), taught his disciples. Babbler (Gk. spermologos); an intellectual cheap-jack, a retailer of scraps of second-hand philosophy (a word of characteristic Athenian slang). Jesus and the resurrection. These may have been taken by the Athenian populace as the names of two new-fangled divinities. 19 Areopagus. Not here a place, but a body of men, the Court of the Areopagus, so called from the Hill of Ares (Areios pagos), on which it originally met; now it met in the Royal Stoa in the Agora (market-place). 21 Now all the Athenians . . . spent their time in nothing except telling or hearing something new. Several examples of this characterization of the ancient Athenians can be found in classical literature. 22 The Areopagus; here, as in v. 19, the men, not a place, should be understood. Very religious. Josephus calls the Athenians 'the most religious of the Greeks'; similar testimonies are provided by Sophocles, Pausanias, etc. 23 'To an unknown God.' Pausanias and Philostratus attest the presence at Athens of altars to 'unknown' deities. 24 Does not live in shrines made by man. Cf. 7:48. The higher paganism agreed with the affirmation which Paul based on OT revelation, that no 'house built by craftsmen could enclose the form divine within enfolding walls' (Euripides). 25 Nor is he served. . . . The true emphasis is excellently conveyed in NEB: 'It is not because he lacks anything that he accepts service at men's hands.' Here the Epicureans would find confirmation of their view that the divine Being has no need of anything that men can give, and the Stoics of their view that He is the source of all life. 26 Made from one; presumably from Adam, the 'one man' from whom, in the Bible, all men are descended. This contradicted the cherished Athenian belief that they themselves were sprung from the soil of Attica. Having determined allotted periods. Cf. the 'fruitful seasons' of 14:17. The boundaries of their habitation. Cf. Dt. 32:8. 28 In him we live and move. . . . This quotation from Epimenides of Crete is interesting for several reasons. For one thing, Epimenides was supposed in Greek legend to have advised the erection of 'anonymous altars' in and around Athens; for another, a further line from the same context is quoted in Tit. 1:12. In the context referred to, Epimenides addresses the Supreme God:

> 'They fashioned a tomb for Thee, O holy and high One,
> The Cretans, always liars, evil beasts, idle bellies!
> But Thou art not dead; for ever Thou art risen and alive,
> For in Thee we live and move and have our being.'

For we are indeed his offspring; quoted from the poem on Phenomena by Aratus of Cilicia.

30 Overlooked; cf. Rom. 3:25, 'he had passed over former sins'. 31 He will judge the world in righteousness; based on such OT passages as Ps. 96:13. A man whom he has appointed; cf. 10:42. For this emphasis on the manhood of the coming Judge cf. Jn. 5:27, which harks back to the 'one like a son of man' of Dn. 7:13. 32 When they heard of the resurrection of the dead. The tragedian Aeschylus had described the god Apollo as saying, on the occasion when the Court of the Areopagus was founded by the city's patron goddess Athene, 'But when the earth has drunk up a man's blood, once he is dead there is no resurrection' (the same Greek word anastasis being used as in Paul's preaching). This, in Athenian eyes, was higher authority than Paul's. 34 Dionysius the Areopagite. A member of the Areopagus Court. The body of Neoplatonic literature ascribed to this Dionysius is actually several centuries later than his time.

18:1–28 Paul in Corinth

18:1–17 The church founded. Paul's next move was to Corinth, a great commercial city with a double harbour. After its destruction by the Roman general Mummius in 146 BC, it had lain in ruins for 100 years, until Julius Caesar refounded it as a Roman colony in 46 BC. It had long enjoyed an unenviable reputation for loose morality, and it was only with difficulty that the church soon to be founded there kept this at bay; yet Paul knew the importance of leaving a strong 'cell' of the new community in this city, and he spent 18 months there. There he met Aquila and his wife Priscilla, who were to prove such a help to him in his subsequent labours.

At first, with some success, he made the local synagogue his base of operation, but when Jewish opposition made it impossible to continue there, he availed himself of the hospitality of Titius Justus, a 'God-fearer' who lived next door to the synagogue.

As Paul went on proclaiming the good news at Corinth, many believed, including the ruler of the synagogue, Crispus (cf. 1 Cor. 1:14). His Jewish opponents, however, did not slacken their efforts to hinder him, and soon accused him before Junius Gallio, the Roman proconsul of Achaia, of illegal religious propaganda. Gallio is an interesting figure; he was the much-loved brother of Seneca, the Stoic philosopher and tutor of Nero. He saw through the specious pleas of Paul's accusers. If Paul had contravened Roman law, he said, he would listen to them, but as the question seemed to concern only Jewish beliefs and interpretations, it did not fall within his jurisdiction. Ramsay emphasizes the importance of Gallio's decision both as a precedent for other governors and as a sign in Paul's eyes that Roman government could be relied upon to protect the liberty of Christian preachers, in which confidence he later appealed to Caesar himself.

The scene which followed Gallio's rebuff to the Jews, the beating of the ruler of the synagogue by the Greek mob, shows how near the surface anti-Jewish feeling lay in those days. If this Sosthenes is the same as that of 1 Cor. 1:1, then he, like his predecessor Crispus, ultimately became a Christian. Another eminent Corinthian convert was Erastus, the city treasurer (Rom. 16:23), whose name has been identified with great probability in a Corinthian inscription.

2 Pontus. A province of northern Asia Minor, on the S shore of the Black Sea. Priscilla; the more familiar form of her name; Paul regularly refers to her, more formally, as 'Prisca'. Claudius had commanded all the Jews to leave Rome; all Jews, that is, who were not Roman citizens. According to Suetonius, he expelled them 'because they were constantly rioting at the instigation of Chrestus', probably a distorted allusion to disputes between Christian and non-Christian Jews at Rome. The expulsion may be dated c. 49–50. 3 Tentmakers. The word may mean, more broadly, 'leather-workers'. It was regarded as proper for a Rabbi to practise a manual occupation, so as not to make monetary profit out of his sacred teaching. 4 Every sabbath. The 'western' text adds, 'inserting the name of the Lord Jesus' (i.e. as an interpretative expansion in the readings from the prophets). 5 Was occupied with preaching; i.e. 'proceeded to devote himself entirely to the preaching', his material necessities being supplied by gifts which Silas and Timothy brought from the Macedonian churches. 6 Reviled him; or 'spoke evil of the name of Jesus'. 7 Titius Justus, a worshipper of God; i.e. a 'God-fearer'. He may be identical with 'Gaius' of Rom. 16:23; 1 Cor. 1:14; in that case his full name as a Roman citizen was Gaius Titius Justus. 8 With all his household. Cf. 11:14; 16:15, 31ff. 10 No man shall attack you to harm you. This promise was fulfilled in the failure of the attack described in vv. 12–17. 11 A year and six months. Probably from autumn 50 to spring 52.

12 When Gallio was proconsul of Achaia. An inscription at Delphi, recording a proclamation of Claudius, makes it probable that Gallio was appointed to his proconsulship in July 51. The Roman province of Achaia included all Greece south of Macedonia; it was a senatorial province of second rank, governed by a proconsul from 27 BC to AD 15 and again from AD 44 onwards. 13 This man is persuading men to worship God contrary to the law; i.e. he propagates a religio illicita, a cult not licensed by Roman law. 14 I should have reason to bear with you. Better, 'I should naturally have taken up your case' (Gk. anechomai is used in this legal sense of 'taking up'). 15 I refuse to be a judge of these things. Previously Jewish opposition had had recourse to mob violence or to city magistrates; it now attempted to influence a higher court, the provincial magistrate, against the apostles. Gallio's decision that the gospel was a form of Judaism, which was a religion specifically protected by Roman law, could not enjoy undisputed validity for long, but as a precedent it did afford protection to Christianity for ten vital years. 17 Gallio paid no attention to this; i.e. he turned a blind eye to the behaviour of the pagan crowd, who followed up the proconsul's snub to the local Jews by assaulting one of their leading representatives.

18:18–28 Paul leaves Corinth and Apollos arrives. In the spring of 52 Paul left Corinth and paid a short visit to Jerusalem, at the Passover season. On the way he called at Ephesus, but could not stay there at the time, in spite of the pressing invitation of the synagogue. He promised, however, to return, and kept his promise in the autumn. Meanwhile great interest was aroused in the synagogue at Ephesus by an Alexandrian Jew named Apollos, well versed in the OT Scriptures and also in the story of Jesus, comparison of which with the OT convinced him that Jesus was indeed the Messiah; and with his powerful reasoning he expounded this teaching in the synagogue. Aquila and Priscilla, who had accompanied Paul from Corinth to Ephesus, heard him and, as he knew only of the baptism of John, they taught him the way of the Lord more accurately, benefiting from the teaching they themselves had received from Paul. When Apollos was about to pursue his journey to Greece, they commended him to the church of Corinth; and so powerful was the assistance he gave the Christians there that Paul could write to them later: 'I planted, Apollos watered' (1 Cor. 3:6). Although some Corinthians tried to make him a party leader in rivalry to Paul, it is clear that there was no party feeling between Paul and Apollos themselves (cf. 1 Cor. 16:12).

18 At Cenchreae he cut his hair, for he had a vow; i.e. Paul. The vow was a temporary Nazirite vow, perhaps one of gratitude for the promise of vv. 9, 10. The full discharge of the vow demanded a visit to the Temple in Jerusalem. Cf. Acts 21:23, 24. Cenchreae was the eastern (Aegean) port of Corinth: cf. Rom. 16:1. 19 Ephesus. An ancient Greek city, at this time capital of the province of Asia and chief commercial centre of Asia Minor. 21 He said. The following words in AV, 'I must by all means keep this feast that cometh in Jerusalem', represent a 'western' addition to the text. The feast was probably Passover, which in AD 52 fell early in April, and as the seas were closed for navigation until March 10 there was the less time to spare. 22 He went up; i.e. to Jerusalem. 23 Went from place to place through the region of Galatia and Phrygia (lit. 'the Galatian region and Phrygia'), revisiting the churches founded on his first missionary journey in Asia Minor.

24 A native of Alexandria, and perhaps therefore given to the allegorizing interpretation of Scripture, like Philo. An eloquent man; or 'a learned man' (RV). 25 Fervent in spirit; i.e. full of enthusiasm. The things concerning Jesus; i.e. the gospel story. He knew only the baptism of John. His knowledge of the gospel may have come from a Galilaean source rather than from the Jerusalem apostles. 27 When he wished to cross to Achaia. According to the 'western' text, some Corinthian visitors in Ephesus heard him there and persuaded him to accompany them back to Corinth.

19:1–41 Ephesus and the province of Asia

19:1–20 Ephesus evangelized. Paul, having paid his visit to Palestine, returned overland to Ephesus and settled down there for some two and a half years, from the autumn of 52 to the spring of 55. There a great work was accomplished, radiating out from Ephesus to other cities of the province of Asia. The effect of the preaching is vividly portrayed by Luke in a few scenes.

In the first scene we meet the twelve 'disciples' who knew only John's baptism and had never heard of the Holy Spirit. Then we have Paul's withdrawal from the synagogue to the lecture-hall of Tyrannus where, according to one textual tradition, he lectured daily from 11 a.m. to 4 p.m., during the heat of the day, after having presumably spent the earlier hours of the morning tent-making. The mighty works wrought through Paul at Ephesus led to encounters with the local magicians, and we have the vivid description of the sons of Sceva and of the bonfire of the magic scrolls.

1 Passed through the upper country. Paul, instead of taking the main route to Ephesus by the Lycus and Maeander valleys, appears to have taken a higher road farther north, approaching the city from the north side of Mt. Messogis. Disciples. This word standing alone means not 'disciples of John' but 'disciples of Jesus', whatever the defects in their knowledge might be. 2 Did you receive the Holy Spirit when you believed? The question may have been provoked by a suspicion that there was something defective about their 'discipleship'. We have never even heard that there is a Holy Spirit, with special reference to the Holy Spirit as sent at Pentecost with outward manifestation (so regularly in Acts). 4 John baptized . . . ; cf. 1:5; 11:16. The baptism of repentance. Cf. not only Lk. 3:3; Acts 13:24, but also the apostolic baptism of Acts 2:38. To believe in the one who was to come after him; cf. Jn. 1:26ff.; 3:25ff. There are striking agreements between John and Acts in their accounts of John the Baptist and of the Holy Spirit. But no reference is made here (or anywhere else in Acts) to the fact that John himself promised that the Coming One would 'baptize with the Holy Spirit' (Mk. 1:8; Lk. 3:16; cf. Jn. 1:33; see Acts 1:5; 10:37; 11:16; 13:24f.). 5 They were baptized in (into) the name of the Lord Jesus. The same expression as in 8:16. This is the only instance of re-baptism recorded in the NT. 6 And when Paul had laid his hands upon them, the Holy Spirit came on them, as happened to the Samaritan converts in 8:17.

9 Speaking evil of the Way, i.e. the gospel, as in 9:2. Argued; i.e. 'conducted discussions' (Gk. dialegomai). In the hall of Tyrannus, which thus served much the same purpose in Ephesus as the house of Titius Justus did in Corinth. The 'western' text adds 'from the fifth to the tenth hour', the midday recess when Tyrannus himself did not use his lecture-room. 10 Two years. Probably two years and a few months, which with the three months of v. 8 approximate to the three years of 20:31. All the residents of Asia; i.e. in the Roman province of that name, and especially in the area round Ephesus. Probably all seven churches addressed in Revelation (Rev. 1:11), as well as those at Colossae and Hierapolis (Col. 4:13), were founded in these years.

12 Handkerchiefs or aprons. Two words of Latin origin: sudaria (lit. 'sweat-rags'; cf. Lk. 19:20; also Jn. 11:44; 20:7) and semicinctia (articles which Paul would use while engaged in 'tent-making'). 13 I adjure you by the Jesus. The use of this name and other Jewish names in pagan exorcisms is attested by papyrus scrolls of magic spells which have come down to us. 14 High priest. Luke is probably quoting, but not confirming, Sceva's account of himself. A Jewish high priest was believed to know the secret pronunciation of the ineffable name of Israel's God, and so to be in command of a specially potent spell. 18 Confessing and divulging their practices; i.e. their spells. To divulge these was to render them useless. 19 Books; i.e. scrolls of papyrus or parchment, like the famous magical papyri, full of spells and 'abracadabra', in the London, Paris and Leiden collections. Such scrolls were so closely associated with Ephesus in Graeco-Roman antiquity that they were commonly called Ephesia grammata, 'Ephesian letters'. Pieces of silver; drachmae ('shillings').

19:21–41 The riot at Ephesus. The most vivid scene of all in Luke's narrative of Paul's Ephesian ministry is the riotous assembly in the great open-air theatre of the city. The local guild of silversmiths, who drew a comfortable income from the sale of silver images of the great goddess Artemis set in silver niches, were alarmed for the prospects of their craft at the sight of so many people becoming Christians and, disguising this alarm as concern for the honour of the goddess, they called an indignation meeting. The indignation spread to the general public, who ran into the theatre and staged a pro-Artemis and anti-Jewish riot. Paul himself was prevented from entering the theatre. Alexander, a local Jew, tried to address the mob, perhaps in order to dissociate the Jewish community from the objects of the popular resentment. But the mob, in no mood to make fine distinctions, howled him down, and kept up for two hours the cry, 'Great is Artemis of the Ephesians!' At last the town clerk, greatly agitated lest the Roman authorities should lay severe penalties on the city for this riotous behaviour, persuaded them to be quiet and go home, telling them that if they had any complaint against these men they should lay it before the authorities in the proper manner.

21 Go to Jerusalem, along with the delegates of his Gentile churches who were carrying gifts from these churches to the Jerusalem Christians (cf. 1 Cor. 16:1–4; 2 Cor. 8;9; Rom. 15:25ff.), to mark the completion of his Aegean ministry. Of these gifts Luke has nothing to say, apart from a general allusion in 24:17. I must also see Rome. Cf. Rom. 1:11ff.; 15:23ff. for Paul's plans. Ramsay finds here 'the clear conception of a far-reaching plan' to visit Rome on his way to evangelize 'the chief seat of Roman civilization in the West' (i.e. Spain), and regards this decision as a crisis in Paul's career. While Rome is Luke's goal, it was but a transit-point in Paul's programme. 22 Timothy. Cf. Phil. 2:19 for this mission of Timothy to Macedonia. 23 The Way, as in v. 9. 24 Artemis. Not the Greek virgin-goddess of that name, sister to Apollo, but the great goddess of Ephesus (a local form of the great mother-goddess worshipped from time immemorial in Asia Minor), whose temple was one of the seven wonders of the ancient world. 27 She whom all Asia and the world worship. Over thirty places throughout the world have been enumerated where the cult of Ephesian Artemis was venerated.

PAUL'S THIRD MISSIONARY JOURNEY

29 Dragging with them Gaius and Aristarchus, Macedonians. Read with some MSS, 'a Macedonian', referring to Aristarchus; Gaius belonged to Derbe in Asia Minor (20:4). These two may have been Luke's informants for this incident. Into the theatre. The open-air theatre of Ephesus could accommodate 25,000 persons and was a convenient place for meetings of the citizen body, regular or irregular. 31 Asiarchs. The chief citizens of Ephesus and of other cities in the province, who constituted the 'council (koinon) of Asia'. From their ranks also the high-priesthood of the provincial cult of 'Rome and Augustus' was recruited. It is noteworthy that Paul found sympathizers in the highest ranks of Ephesian society. 32 Most of them did not know why they had come together. A good example of Luke's quiet humour. 35 The town clerk (Gk. grammateus). He was head of the free municipal administration of Ephesus and the chief liaison officer between it and the Roman provincial government. Temple keeper of the great Artemis; 'Temple Warden (Gk. neokoros) of Great Artemis' was a much prized title borne by the city. The sacred stone that fell from the sky; presumably a meteorite, in which the semblance of the 'many-breasted' goddess was discerned. 37 Sacrilegious; lit. 'temple-robbers'. 38 There are proconsuls. The generalizing plural is used because Junius Silanus, proconsul of the province, had recently been assassinated (late in 54) and his successor had not yet arrived. Cf. NEB: 'there are such people as proconsuls.' The proconsul presided at the assizes (the courts are open means 'assizes are held'). 39 In the regular assembly. The regular assembly (Gk. ekklēsia) of the citizens met three times a month. Rome would not tolerate an irregular and riotous assembly like the present one. 40 Being charged with rioting; i.e. by the Romans.

20:1 – 28:31 HOW PAUL REALIZED HIS HOPE OF SEEING ROME

20:1–38 Paul sets out for Palestine

20:1–16 The apostle sails with the delegates. After the conclusion of his time in Ephesus, Paul spent some time in Macedonia and Greece, during which he travelled to the borders of Illyricum (the modern Albania and Yugoslavia), as we learn from Rom. 15:19. He had organized collections, as an outward sign of fellowship, in his Gentile churches, for the poor Christians in the Jerusalem church; and in the spring of 57 he set sail for Palestine with the delegates whom these Gentile churches had appointed to present their gifts. His intention was, after paying this visit to Jerusalem, to leave the Eastern Mediterranean for the Western, calling on the Roman church on his way to Spain (19:21; Rom. 15:23ff.). Luke rejoined him at Philippi and accompanied him to Jerusalem, and we have a detailed narrative in the first person plural of the voyage to Palestine. The visit to Troas throws some interesting light on Paul's practice when he visited a church; we notice incidentally that his sermons (or rather dialogues) were not of the 20-minute order, and even if his discourse was interrupted by a momentarily fatal accident, yet, after Paul's reassuring words about the young man, the meeting went on till daybreak.

2 He came to Greece; i.e. into the province of Achaia (cf. 19:21 and see on 18:12). 3 There he spent three months; mainly perhaps at Corinth, where early in AD 57 he wrote his Epistle to the Romans. 4 Sopater . . . Trophimus. The names are those of delegates from the Pauline churches on both sides of the Aegean, who were carrying their churches' gifts to the Christians at Jerusalem (cf. 24:17; 1 Cor. 16:1ff.; 2 Cor. 8:1ff.; Rom. 15:25ff.). The churches which they represented are probably 'the churches of Christ' of Rom. 16:16. Sopater; perhaps the Sosipater of Rom. 16:21. 5 These went on and were waiting for us at Troas. They crossed from Cenchreae, presumably, while Paul and Luke crossed from Philippi.

6 We sailed away from Philippi. It is noteworthy that this new 'we' section (20:5 – 21:18) begins where the former one finished (16:17)—at Philippi, where Luke may have spent the whole intervening period. After the days of Unleavened Bread. In AD 57 they ended on Thursday, April 14. 7 On the first day of the week, when we were gathered together to break bread; i.e. to celebrate the Eucharist; probably it was their practice to do this each Sunday evening. In the event it was Monday morning before they 'broke the bread' (v. 11), for Paul prolonged his speech until midnight. 8 There were many lights; i.e. torches. The resultant smoky, oily atmosphere would increase Eutychus's proneness to sleep. 9 Was taken up dead. Luke, as a physician, presumably satisfied himself that this was so. 10 His life is in him; probably implying that life had returned to him. Cf. 1 Ki. 17:22; 2 Ki. 4:34, 35. 11 Broken bread (lit. 'broken the bread'); the article points back to v. 7 and indicates that now at last they celebrated the Eucharist as they had intended to do. And eaten. This refers to their taking food in addition to the eucharistic breaking of the bread. 12 They took the lad away alive. Eutychus evidently recovered consciousness just before Paul's departure.

13 Paul . . . intending himself to go by land. The sea route from Troas to Assos was longer than the land route, as it involved the rounding of Cape Lectum. 14 Mitylene. The chief town of the island of Lesbos. 15 Samos. The following clause, 'and after remaining at Trogyllium' (mg.), is absent from the best texts, but the statement is inherently probable. 16 Paul had decided to sail past Ephesus. He probably made this decision at Troas, and so chose a fast ship which took the straight course across the mouth of the Ephesian gulf, in order to reach Palestine in time.

20:17–38 Paul's address to the elders of Ephesus. The meeting at Miletus between Paul and the elders of the Ephesian church is important because it contains the one record in Acts of Paul's addressing a Christian audience. Its authenticity is strongly supported by its similarity to hortatory passages in Paul's Epistles, the more so as there is no evidence that Luke was acquainted with these. The address throws light both on the course of events in the recent past and on Paul's misgivings for the future, although nothing shifted him from his determination to carry out the work divinely allotted to him and to finish his course with joy.

17 From Miletus he sent to Ephesus. A distance of some 30 miles. 19 Trials which befell me through the plots of the Jews. Cf. the reference to Alexander the coppersmith in 2 Tim. 4:14, which may be relevant here if he is the Alexander of 19:33. It is plain, besides, from references in the Corinthian Epistles (cf. 1 Cor. 15:30–32; 2 Cor. 1:8–10) that Paul was exposed to serious danger during his Ephesian ministry, over and above the danger occasioned by the riot of 19:23ff. 21 Both to Jews and to Greeks; cf. Rom. 1:14ff.; 3:9. Repentance to God and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ. For this summary of Paul's message cf. 26:20; Rom. 10:9ff.; 2 Cor. 5:20f. 22 Bound in the Spirit; i.e. under the constraint of the Spirit (cf. 16:6, 7). 23 The Holy Spirit testifies to me in every city. Speaking through the prophets in various churches (cf. 21:4, 11). Compare the apprehensions expressed in Rom. 15:31a. 24 To testify to the gospel of the grace of God. This is evidently identical with preaching the kingdom (v. 25). 25 I know that all you . . . will see my face no more. His intention, if he survived the foreseen dangers at Jerusalem, was to go to Spain. Whether in fact they did see him again must remain uncertain. 26 I am innocent of the blood of all of you. For the general idea cf. Ezk. 33:1–9. 28 The Holy Spirit has made you guardians; i.e. 'bishops' (Gk. episkopos). In the 1st century AD 'elder' (cf. v. 17) and 'bishop' are practically interchangeable terms. Which he obtained with his own blood. Or '. . . with the blood of His own One', '. . . of His Well-beloved'. 29 Fierce wolves. This refers to one class of false teachers (invaders from outside); another class (those from within) is indicated in v. 30. 31 Three years; see on 19:10. 32 The word of his grace. 'This message of the free bounty of God is the word which has the greatest effect on the heart of man, and so it is able to build up the church' (Rackham). The inheritance among all those who are sanctified; cf. 26:18; Eph. 1:14; Col. 3:24. 34 These hands ministered to my necessities. Spoken no doubt with an appropriate gesture. Cf. 1 Cor. 9:15ff.; 2 Cor. 11:7ff.; 1 Thes. 2:9; 2 Thes. 3:7ff. 35 It is more blessed to give than to receive. This saying is not recorded in the Gospels, though its general sense can be paralleled there. It seems that collections of the sayings of Jesus were already current.

21:1–14 Miletus to Caesarea

When Paul and his companions left Miletus they continued the journey to Palestine and landed at Tyre, where their ship was to unload. The picture of their departure from Tyre, escorted to the ship by the Christian families of that city, fast friends after a week's acquaintance, shows how firm a bond primitive Christianity was. As Paul went from one port to another, indications of the danger lying ahead of him in Jerusalem became more and more ominous; the Tyrian disciples, speaking by inspiration, begged him not to continue his journey there, and at Caesarea the prophet Agabus reappears to foretell plainly what is going to happen to him. But Paul would not be dissuaded from his course. We must not infer that he was wrong in going on; these friends tried to dissuade him because they foresaw the risks to which he would be exposed at Jerusalem, but they seem to have recognized that Paul's movements were divinely guided when they acquiesced in his decision, saying, The will of the Lord be done (v. 14).

At Caesarea we meet Philip again, after leaving him there at the end of ch. 8. Now we find him at home with his four prophesying daughters; Luke was probably indebted to them for some of his information about the gospel story and the history of the early church, if not during the few days they spent in Caesarea at this time, then during Paul's 2 years' detention there.

1 Cos; an island of the Dodecanese; Rhodes is the largest island of that group; Patara is a port of SW Asia Minor. 3 Come in sight of Cyprus; Gk. anaphainō, apparently a nautical term for sighting land. 4 And having sought out the disciples. The Tyrian church was probably planted during the Phoenician mission of 11:19. 7 Ptolemais; OT Acco, modern Acre or Akka. At this time it was a Roman colony. 9 Four unmarried daughters. Some at least of Philip's daughters spent their old age at Hierapolis in Phrygia, where they were renowned as authorities on persons and events belonging to the earliest days of Christianity (cf. Eusebius, Eccl. Hist. iii. 31, 39, v. 24).

10 Agabus. Cf. 11:27, 28. His sudden appearances and disappearances are 'not fiction, but real life' (Lake and Cadbury). 11 He took Paul's girdle and bound his own feet and hands. Acted prophecy of this kind was common in the OT (cf. 1 Ki. 11:29ff.). So shall the Jews at Jerusalem bind the man . . . and deliver him into the hands of the Gentiles. Cf. Jesus' prediction in Mk. 10:33; Lk. 18:32. The general sense, but not each detail of Agabus's prophecy, was fulfilled; in the event Paul was delivered by the Gentiles from the Jews. 14 The will of the Lord be done. Cf. the words of Jesus in Gethsemane (Lk. 22:42). There is a (probably intentional) series of parallels between this account of Paul's last journey to Jerusalem and our Lord's last journey thither.

21:15 – 23:35 Paul in Jerusalem

21:15–30 The apostle in trouble. From Caesarea Paul and his companions went up to Jerusalem, and the party lodged with Mnason, one of the original believers, probably a Hellenist, in whose house the Gentile Christians would be sure of a welcome. When the delegates called on James and the elders of the Jerusalem church they were welcomed; but these good men were clearly troubled because of the exaggerated rumours that had reached Jerusalem about Paul's attitude to the law. They admitted that the position with regard to Gentile believers had been defined at the apostolic Council, but they wished Paul to give the lie in a practical manner to the report that he was dissuading Jewish Christians from keeping the law and from circumcising their children. Paul himself, so far as we can tell, continued to observe the law throughout his life, especially in Jewish company, and his consent to take the advice of James on this occasion and share the purificatory ceremony of four men who had taken a temporary Nazirite vow and pay their expenses was entirely in keeping with his settled principle: 'To the Jews I became as a Jew, in order to win Jews' (1 Cor. 9:20). We may compare his own vow of Acts 18:18, which involved the shearing of his hair. He has been quite unnecessarily castigated for such actions by people whose ideal seems to be that lower brand of consistency which has been called 'the virtue of small minds'.

The carrying out of this duty involved his presence in the Temple, and there he became the object of a hue and cry raised by some Jews from the province of Asia who recognized him. Having seen him in the city with a Gentile Christian from Ephesus, they imagined that he had taken this man into the Temple. A riot broke out at once, the mob dragged Paul out of the Temple, beating him all the time, and as soon as they were outside, the gates were shut.

15 We made ready. The single Greek word episkeuasamenoi might mean here 'having hired horses'. 16 An early disciple (Gk. archaios). The adjective suggests that he was a foundation member of the church. Since he was a Cypriot, we infer that a few Hellenists were left in the church of Jerusalem after the dispersion that followed Stephen's death. 18 Paul went in with us to James; and all the elders were present. Apparently none of the original apostles was now resident in Jerusalem. James (the Lord's brother) is the undisputed leader of the Jerusalem church.

20 How many thousands; lit. 'how many myriads (tens of thousands)'. We may too easily underestimate the strength of early Jewish Christianity. But as the entire population of Jerusalem in normal times was about 55,000 (J. Jeremias), 'thousands' is the more realistic rendering. Zealous for the law; lit. 'zealots for the law'. 21 The customs; i.e. those ordained by Jewish law, 'received by tradition from Moses' (cf. 6:14; Gal. 1:14). 24 Pay their expenses. To perform this service for Nazirites was a pious duty. Cf. Nu. 6:14, 15 for the nature of these expenses. 25 We have sent a letter. A reference to the apostolic letter of 15:23–29. This reference to it does not necessarily mean that Paul is now being made acquainted with it for the first time.

27 Were almost completed. Rather, 'were going to be fulfilled'; the following events took place about the beginning, not the end, of the 7 days. 28 Who is teaching men everywhere against . . . this place. Cf. the charge brought against Stephen (6:13). Brought Greeks into the temple, and he has defiled this holy place. Into the outer court anybody might go; but further penetration was forbidden to Gentiles on pain of death. The Roman government ratified the death sentence passed by the Sanhedrin for this offence even when the trespasser was a Roman citizen. Notices in Greek and Latin were fixed to the barriers separating the outer and inner courts, warning Gentile visitors against further ingress; one of these notices, found in 1871, is now in Istanbul, while another, found in 1935, is in the Palestine Museum. By the letter of the law, Trophimus (v. 29) would have been the guilty party had the charge been true, although Paul would have been guilty of aiding and abetting him.

21:31 – 22:29 Paul fails to pacify the Jerusalem mob. Above the Temple stood the fortress of Antonia, in which a Roman garrison was stationed. Hearing of the riot the captain of the garrison sent down soldiers, who rescued Paul from being lynched. Even so, the mob thronged them to such an extent as they ascended the steps to the fortress that they had to carry Paul to prevent him from being pulled down. At the top of the steps stood the captain, who imagined that Paul was an Egyptian agitator, who had presented himself to the people some time previously in the guise of a second Moses, and who had aroused deep popular resentment when he left his followers to be cut to pieces by Felix's soldiery while he himself escaped. He was, therefore, surprised when Paul addressed him in Greek, and requested leave to speak to the people.

Having obtained leave, Paul stood on the steps and addressed the people below, not in Greek but in the Aramaic vernacular. Silence fell as they heard themselves addressed in their native tongue, and Paul told them of his upbringing at the feet of Gamaliel in that very city, his persecution of the Christians, his conversion near Damascus, where he stressed the part played by Ananias, a devout man according to the law (22:12). They listened to all this with quiet interest, but when Paul went on to tell of his commission to evangelize the Gentiles their fury burst out afresh, and the captain, at his wits' end, ordered Paul to be scourged, so that he might find out the true reason for the trouble. Paul, however, protested his Roman citizenship and thus escaped the scourge, which was a much more murderous instrument than the lictors' rods of Philippi.

31 The tribune of the cohort; i.e. the military tribune in charge of the auxiliary cohort which was stationed in the fortress Antonia (the barracks of v. 34). 35 When he came to the steps. Two flights of steps led down from the fortress to the outer court of the Temple. 38 Are you not the Egyptian . . . ? The story of this Egyptian agitator is told by Josephus in his Jewish War, ii. 13. 4f., and Jewish Antiquities, xx. 8. 6. Four thousand men of the Assassins. The reference is to the sicarii ('dagger-men') who specialized in assassinating Romans and pro-Roman Jews. This figure of 'four thousand' is more probable than Josephus's 30,000. 40 In the Hebrew language; i.e., probably, in Aramaic.

22:2 They were the more quiet; as though a bilingual Irish or Welsh audience, expecting to be addressed by an unpopular politician in English, suddenly realized that he was using the Celtic vernacular. 3 I am a Jew. . . . The following phrases should probably be punctuated 'born at Tarsus in Cilicia, brought up in this city, educated at the feet of Gamaliel . . .' (cf. BFBS Gk. Testament); this implies that while Tarsus was his native place, he spent his boyhood not there but in Jerusalem, where in due course (presumably in his teens) he entered the school of Gamaliel. (See W. C. van Unnik, Tarsus or Jerusalem: The City of Paul's Youth, 1962.) According to the strict manner of the law of our fathers. Paul here emphasizes all those features in his career which would appeal to their religious nationalism. 5 The whole council of elders; i.e. the Sanhedrin. 9 Did not hear the voice of the one who was speaking. See on 9:7. 14 The God of our fathers appointed you. . . . These words of Ananias are not given in the other accounts of Paul's conversion, but we may compare the words spoken by the Lord to Ananias in 9:15, 16. Ananias communicated to Paul the revelation he had received from the Lord concerning him. There is no basic contradiction between this account and Gal. 1:1, 12, where Paul maintains that he did not receive his apostolic commission from man. There Paul is concerned to show that he received his gospel and the authority to proclaim it directly from God, not from the Jerusalem apostles. Ananias acted simply as the mouthpiece, or messenger, of Christ to Paul. To see the Just One. The 'Righteous One' of 3:14; 7:52, where the same Greek adjective (dikaios) is used. Here, as in 26:16, we have evidence in Acts parallel to the more emphatic assertions in the Epistles that Paul actually saw the risen Lord (cf. 1 Cor. 9:1; 15:8). 16 Be baptized, and wash away your sins. These verbs are in the Greek middle voice and might be rendered: 'Get yourself baptized and get your sins washed away.' Calling on his name; i.e. 'invoking His name' by confessing it in baptism; such invoking the name of Christ appears to have been involved in baptism in (or 'with') that name (cf. 2:38; 10:48; cf. the 'word' of Eph. 5:26). 17 When I had returned to Jerusalem. This was in the third year from his conversion (see 9:26; Gal. 1:18). 18 Make haste and get quickly out of Jerusalem. In 9:29, 30 the Jerusalem brethren, getting wind of a plot against Paul, take him to Caesarea. This is not the only place in Acts where action is taken in simultaneous response to divine revelation and human advice. 19 And I said, Lord, they themselves know. . . . Paul argues that he is the very man to persuade the Jews, because they must remember how wholeheartedly he persecuted the Christians and must therefore realize that the reasons for his change of attitude are overwhelmingly cogent. 21 I will send you far away to the Gentiles. And so he went back to Tarsus, and in that neighbourhood and later in Antioch he had ample opportunity to fulfil his commission to evangelize Gentiles.

22 Up to this word they listened to him; i.e. to the word 'Gentiles'; this reminded them of their grievance. 23 Threw dust into the air. 'In England mud is more frequently available' (Lake and Cadbury). 25 Is it lawful for you to scourge a man who is a Roman citizen, and uncondemned? Paul at once protests his Roman citizenship, which exempted him from this treatment. (Thus far he had mentioned only his Tarsian citizenship; 21:39.) A non-citizen might be scourged in order to make him admit the truth. As in 16:37, uncondemned means 'without having my case investigated'. 28 I bought this citizenship for a large sum. This may be sarcastic: 'I know how much it cost me to buy Roman citizenship; if a man like you can claim it, it must have become cheap of late.' The officer's gentile name 'Claudius' (23:26) suggests that he had become a citizen in the reign of Claudius. But I was born a citizen. How Paul's father or earlier ancestor acquired Roman citizenship we do not know. A man of Paul's status might prove his Roman citizenship by producing a diptych containing a certified copy of his birth registration—if he had it ready to hand.

22:30 – 23:35 Paul before the Sanhedrin: he is sent to Caesarea. A Roman citizen must be treated with scrupulous regard to the due processes of law, so next day the captain brought Paul face to face with the Sanhedrin. Ananias, the high priest, behaved in a thoroughly disgraceful manner; and it is excessively squeamish to censure Paul for his plain speaking to him (for which, indeed, he apologized to the official, if not to the man), or for his throwing the apple of discord between the Sadducees and Pharisees. It was just the question of resurrection that made all the difference, for to Paul the general resurrection in which Pharisees believed hung upon the resurrection of Christ. A Pharisee might become a Christian without ceasing to be a Pharisee (cf. 15:5); a Sadducee could not become a Christian and remain a Sadducee.

The captain, as far as ever from learning what the real cause of the trouble was, dismissed the meeting and ordered Paul to be taken back to the fortress. His troubles were not lessened when he learned of a plot against Paul's life, and so he sent him off to Caesarea at dead of night, under a well-armed escort, to Felix, the Roman procurator of Judea.

30 The chief priests and all the council; i.e. the Sanhedrin, in which the chief-priestly Sadducean families played an influential part. If Paul had broken the Jewish law in a matter of which Rome took cognizance, it was the Sanhedrin's business to try and sentence him, and the Roman governor's to ratify a capital sentence. 23:1 I have lived before God in all good conscience. Cf. Phil. 3:6. 2 The high priest Ananias. Ananias, son of Nedebaeus, a notoriously unscrupulous and avaricious politician, was high priest from 47 to 58. 3 God shall strike you. Some have seen the fulfilment of these words in Ananias's assassination by Zealots in 66. Contrary to the law. Jewish law presumed a man's innocence until his guilt was proved. 5 I did not know . . . that he was the high priest. Does he mean 'I didn't think that a man who spoke like that could possibly be the high priest'? You shall not speak evil of a ruler of your people. Quoted from Ex. 22:28. 6 With respect to the hope and the resurrection of the dead I am on trial. The resurrection of Christ, the foundation of Israel's hope, as he saw it, was central to Paul's gospel. 8 The Sadducees say that there is no resurrection. Cf. Mk. 12:18 and parallels. Nor angel, nor spirit. 'What they rejected was the developed doctrine of the two kingdoms with their hierarchies of good and evil spirits' (T. W. Manson). The Pharisees acknowledge them all; i.e. both resurrection and angels and spirits. 11 So you must bear witness also at Rome, thus confirming Paul's own purpose. 12 By an oath, breach of which would automatically incur the divine wrath against perjurers. 14 The chief priests and elders. Not the whole Sanhedrin, as appears from v. 15 (with the council), but that part of it which was most hostile to Paul.

16 The son of Paul's sister. The first reference to any member of Paul's family; we wish that we knew more about them. 23 Get ready . . . to go as far as Caesarea. The escort consisted of heavy-armed infantry, cavalry, and light-armed troops, the three constituents of the Roman army. Caesarea was the headquarters of the provincial administration of Judea. 24 Felix the governor; i.e. Antonius Felix, procurator of Judea AD 52–59. 26 His Excellency the governor. The title 'most excellent' (Gk. kratistos, equivalent of Lat. egregius) was given primarily to members of the equestrian order, from which such procurators were normally drawn (Felix was an exception). It is given in Acts also to Festus (26:25) and in Lk. 1:3 to Theophilus. 27 Having learned that he was a Roman citizen. A delicate manipulation of the truth; it was rather later that Lysias learned this fact! 30 I sent. The 'epistolary aorist' in Greek. The English idiom requires 'I am sending'. 31 Antipatris was about 10 miles N of Lydda and 25 miles S of Caesarea (mod. Ras el-'Ain or Rosh ha-'Ayin). 32 Leaving the horsemen to go on with him. The road from Antipatris ran through open country, inhabited mainly by Gentiles. 35 Herod's praetorium; a palace in Caesarea, built for himself by Herod the Great, and now serving as official headquarters for the procurator.

24:1 – 26:32 Paul in Caesarea

24:1–27 Paul and Felix. Felix, a man of ignoble birth, a freedman who had attained high station because his brother Pallas was an influential favourite at the imperial court, has been pilloried for all time in the cutting epigram of Tacitus: 'he exercised the authority of a king with the mind of a slave.' His present wife was Drusilla, the younger daughter of Herod Agrippa I, and they both knew something of Christianity, though their interest was strictly academic.

A few days later, a delegation from the Sanhedrin, led by the high priest and assisted by the services of a second-rate orator called Tertullus, went down to Caesarea to state their case against Paul. Tertullus began his speech with a magnificent flourish, but it tailed away in a very lame and impotent conclusion, Paul being indicted only in general terms, not unlike those in which Christ was accused before Pilate (Lk. 23:2).

To each of Tertullus's charges Paul opposed a categorical negative, telling exactly why he had come to Jerusalem and what he had done since coming there, insisting again that the whole difference between him and his opponents hinged on this question of resurrection, which was no new-fangled notion of his own, but one which had been handed down from his fathers. If we realize the centrality of the resurrection in Paul's gospel, we shall not quibble at this statement of his case.

Felix adjourned proceedings until Lysias, the captain, could come down from Jerusalem to give his evidence. Meanwhile he and his wife Drusilla availed themselves of Paul's presence in Caesarea to summon him frequently to their presence for theological discussion. Although their interest was academic, Paul's was not, for he seized the opportunity to discourse on three subjects which both his hearers badly needed to hear about—justice and self-control and future judgment (v. 25)—so much so that Felix trembled, but did no more about it. He kept on postponing a decision on Paul's case, hoping to receive money for releasing him, until after two years he was recalled to Rome; and knowing that the Jews were likely in any case to send an adverse report of his term of office to imperial headquarters, he decided to ingratiate himself with them at least to the extent of not releasing Paul, but leaving him in custody for his successor Festus to deal with.

2 Since through you we enjoy much peace. Felix's procuratorship was marked by severe attempts to suppress insurgent bands, and so great was the consequent disaffection that only by courtesy could the ensuing conditions be described as 'peace'. Some Jewish nationalists would have been inclined, in words attributed to a later opponent of the Romans, to charge them with 'making a desert and calling it peace'. The Jews of Jerusalem had, however, co-operated with Felix in putting down the Egyptian mentioned in 21:38. 5 A pestilent fellow, an agitator among all the Jews throughout the world. Tertullus represents Paul as a disturber of the peace in terms which were calculated to suggest that he was another insurgent leader of the class that Felix had so energetically suppressed, but more dangerous than most, because his activities were of wider range. It was easy to portray the spiritual Messianism of the gospel as a form of militant and political Messianism (cf. 17:6, 7). The sect of the Nazarenes. The most natural explanation is that the Christians received this appellation after Jesus the Nazarene; but other explanations are current, such as that the term means 'observants'. In Hebrew and Arabic Christians are still known as 'Nazarenes'. 6 We seized him. The words which are supplied in RSV mg., 'and we would have judged him according to our law. But the chief captain Lysias came and with great violence took him out of our hands, commanding his accusers to come before you' (cf. AV text), represent a 'western' reading which has found its way into the Received Text; although not attested by the best authorities, it bears strong marks of genuineness. The reproachful reference to the 'great violence' with which Lysias took Paul away from his Jewish enemies when they were about to judge him according to their law is an even grosser manipulation of the facts than Lysias himself had practised in his letter to Felix (23:27). 11 Twelve days. From the time-notes which are fairly full in this part of Acts (cf. 21:15, 18, 26, 27; 22:30; 23:11, 12, 23, 32; 24:1), we conclude that the seven days of 21:27 were only beginning when Paul was arrested. 14 The Way, which they call a sect. Christians spoke of their movement as 'the Way', for to them it was the true fulfilment of Israel's faith and the one way of salvation. Non-Christians called it a sect—a party within Judaism (but much less respectable than the parties of Sadducees, Pharisees, and so forth). The Greek word is hairesis, used of 'the party of the Sadducees' (5:17) and of 'the party of the Pharisees' (15:5). 15 Of both the just and the unjust. This is the only place in the NT where Paul refers definitely to a resurrection of the unjust (cf. Jn. 5:28, 29; Rev. 20:12ff.). 17 To bring to my nation alms and offerings. The sums contributed by Gentile churches for the relief of the Jerusalem Christians. This is the only reference to the collection in Acts, and it is expressed in such general and allusive terms as to suggest that Luke's reticence has some apologetic motivation. 21 Except this one thing. He is not blaming himself for his words before the Sanhedrin (he has just repeated the same argument before Felix, vv. 14, 15); but he maintains that the one charge that can properly be brought against him is a theological one. 22 Having a rather accurate knowledge of the Way—possibly derived from his wife Drusilla, who was a Jewess (v. 24), a daughter, in fact, of 'Herod the king' of 12:1. (Felix, despite his low birth, married into distinguished families; his three successive wives were all princesses, one of them a granddaughter of Antony and Cleopatra. Drusilla was his third. They had a son, Agrippa, who perished in the eruption of Vesuvius of AD 79.) 25 When I have an opportunity I will summon you. He did this rather frequently, moved partly by theological interest of a strictly detached character, and partly by financial expectations (v. 26). Laws against bribery were more often violated than observed by Roman provincial administrators. Ramsay argued that there must have been a considerable improvement in Paul's financial position about this time; there is not much evidence for this, but he no doubt received gifts of money from the Gentile churches which he had founded. 27 But when two years had elapsed, Felix was succeeded by Porcius Festus. Felix was recalled because of his violent but ineffective intervention in riots between the Jewish and Gentile inhabitants of Caesarea. A new provincial coinage in AD 59 suggests that this was the year of the change of procurators.

25:1–12 Paul appeals to Caesar. Festus, a more upright man than Felix, arrived in his province some time in AD 59; and after a few days went up from Caesarea, the seat of government, to Jerusalem to meet the high priest and Sanhedrin. These lost no time in bringing up Paul's case, hoping that Festus in his inexperience would allow them to have their way with Paul. Festus did not accede to their request that Paul should be sent up to Jerusalem, but invited them to come down to Caesarea and state their case against him. This they did after 8 or 10 days, making charges which they could not substantiate, and to which Paul returned uncompromising negatives. Then Festus, perplexed and wishing to do the Jews a favour at the outset of his term of office, asked Paul if he were willing to go up to Jerusalem to be tried before him there; and Paul, afraid lest the weakness of Festus might again expose him to danger from his bitterest enemies, made a far-reaching decision: availing himself of his privilege as a Roman citizen, he appealed from the provincial tribunal to Caesar himself to be tried before the supreme court of the Empire. His previous experience of Roman justice probably made him confident of getting an impartial hearing there, and perhaps a verdict which would carry with it independent recognition as a religio licita. Festus gladly seized this opportunity of avoiding the responsibility of making a difficult decision; his only trouble now was to know how to frame the report which he should send to Rome with Paul.

1 When Festus had come into his province. We have no information about Festus outside the writings of Luke and Josephus. His administration was not marked by the excesses of his predecessor and successor, but it was of short duration, being terminated by his death in AD 62. 8 Nor against Caesar. In addition to answering the old charges of offences against the Jewish law in general and of profaning the Temple in particular, he also rebuts the charge of activity against the emperor's interests (see 24:5). 9 Do you wish to go up to Jerusalem? The suggestion seemed reasonable enough; as the alleged crime was committed at Jerusalem, Jerusalem might seem the most appropriate place to have the charge examined, and Festus himself proposed to act as judge. But Paul was afraid that this one concession to the Sanhedrin might lead to others. 10 I am standing before Caesar's tribunal, the procurator being the Emperor's representative. 11 I appeal to Caesar. The right to appeal to the emperor, which every Roman citizen enjoyed, arose out of the earlier right of appeal to the sovereign Roman people. The right might be exercised by appealing against a magistrate's verdict or at any earlier stage in the proceedings, 'claiming that the investigation be carried out at Rome and the judgment pronounced by the Emperor himself' (Schürer). The present emperor was Nero (AD 54–68).

25:13–27 Agrippa the Younger visits Festus. A way out of his difficulty soon presented itself to Festus. On the NE borders of his province was the petty kingdom of Herod Agrippa II (son of the Herod of Acts 12:1), whose capital was at Caesarea Philippi, famed in Gospel story. He and his sister Bernice, the elder sister of Drusilla, were about to pay their respects to the new imperial representative, and Agrippa was known to be an expert in all matters affecting the Jewish religion. Among other things, he had the right of appointing (and deposing) the Jewish high priests, and hence has sometimes been called, not very accurately, 'the secular head of the Jewish church'. So when he and his sister came to Caesarea, Festus sought help from Agrippa in framing his report on Paul; it was necessary that he should grasp the gravamen of the Sanhedrin's accusation in order to communicate it to the emperor, but all that he could make out was that the trouble concerned one Jesus, who was dead, but whom Paul asserted to be alive (v. 19). Paul had made his main point clear enough, in spite of the procurator's lack of comprehension! Agrippa was interested and expressed a desire to see the man himself. So next day Festus, Agrippa and Bernice seated themselves in state, in the company of the procurator's entourage and the chief men of Caesarea. Paul was then brought before them, introduced by Festus to Agrippa, who gave him permission to state his case.

13 Agrippa the king and Bernice. This Agrippa was only 17 at the time of his father's death in AD 44, and so Claudius was dissuaded from appointing him to succeed his father as king of Judea, but a few years later gave him as a kingdom the former territory of Philip the tetrarch (Lk. 3:1), which Nero enlarged. Bernice figures later in Roman history, when the crown prince Titus wished to marry her (c. AD 75) but changed his mind in view of popular disapproval at Rome. 19 Their own superstition; RV 'their own religion'. As Agrippa professed the Jewish religion himself, Festus would hardly have referred to it before him in disparaging terms. 21 The emperor (Gk. Sebastos, Lat. Augustus); a title of honour, 'His Majesty'. 23 Military tribunes; there were five cohorts at Caesarea, each in the charge of a military tribune. 26 My lord; i.e. the emperor.

26:1–23 Paul's speech before Agrippa. Paul proceeded to state his case with no reluctance, saluting the distinguished audience and congratulating himself on so illustrious an opportunity of making known the message which it was his life's mission to proclaim. This speech may well be called Paul's Apologia Pro Vita Sua. Here for the third time we have the story of his conversion, told for the second time by himself. The differences between his narration here and that to the Jerusalem mob in ch. 22 are mainly differences of emphasis; on each occasion he emphasized those aspects of the story which were likely to interest his audience at the time. The present speech may be divided into exordium (vv. 2, 3); his stand as a Pharisee for the hope of Israel, which involves the belief in resurrection (vv. 4–8); the account of his persecuting zeal (vv. 9–11); the heavenly vision (vv. 12–18); his life of obedience thereto (vv. 19, 20); his arrest (v. 21); the substance of his preaching (vv. 22, 23). The Greek style of the original is unusually elegant, as befitting this distinguished audience.

Point by point Paul tells his story, insisting throughout that he is guilty of no innovation, that the hope which he proclaims is the ancestral hope of his whole people, that he preaches no other things than what Moses and the prophets said would happen, namely, that the Messiah was to suffer and rise from the dead, and that light and salvation were thereby to be offered both to the Jews and to the Gentiles.

1 Paul stretched out his hand; i.e. in a gesture of salutation. 2 Before you is emphatic. 5 Our religion (Gk. thrēskeia); i.e. 'cultus', 'ritual' (referring to the external manifestations of religion); a different word from that used by Festus in 25:19 (Gk. deisidaimonia). 6 The promise made by God to our fathers. Paul has in mind the promise made in particular to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, of world-wide blessing to come through their progeny. This promise was fulfilled in Jesus, and especially by His resurrection. 7 Our twelve tribes. Cf. Jas. 1:1. Paul knows nothing of the figment of ten 'lost' tribes. For this hope I am accused by Jews. That Jews, of all people, should show hostility to one who proclaimed that on which the fulfilment of their ancestral hope depended was preposterous. 8 Why is it thought incredible by any of you that God raises the dead? There is no textual or contextual justification for moving this verse to a position between vv. 22 and 23. By any of you is again emphatic: 'by any of you Jews'. The hope of Israel was bound up with the resurrection of Christ. 10 When they were put to death I cast my vote against them. As in the case of Stephen (8:1). 11 Blaspheme; i.e. to say 'Jesus is anathema' (1 Cor. 12:3) or something to the same effect. To foreign cities; i.e. cities outside Palestine, such as Damascus. 14 When we had all fallen to the ground. In the other version of the incident, only Paul is said to have fallen. In the Hebrew language; i.e. in his Aramaic mother-tongue. It hurts you to kick against the goads. The picture is that of an ox kicking out against the goad and only causing itself more trouble by doing so. The expression is proverbial and can be paralleled in several places in Greek literature. The goads are the pressure now compelling Paul to turn round in his tracks and travel in the opposite direction to that which he had been pursuing hitherto. 16–18 summarize the communication which Paul received from the Lord on the Damascus road, through Ananias in the house of Judas, and later in the Jerusalem Temple. 16 Stand upon your feet. Cf. Ezk. 2:1, where Ezekiel's commission contains these words. Ezekiel, too, had fallen to the ground when he first saw 'visions of God'. You have seen me. Cf. on 22:14. 17 Delivering you. Cf. Je. 1:8, where Jeremiah hears similar words when receiving his prophetic commission. 18 To open their eyes. Cf. Is. 42:7. Paul is called to continue the mission of the obedient Servant inaugurated by his Master (cf. 13:47). These echoes of OT prophetic commissions show that in Acts, as in his own writings, Paul is 'a figure of eschatological significance' (J. Munck). The remaining words of v. 18 are characteristically Pauline and can be abundantly paralleled from his Epistles. 20 Deeds worthy of their repentance; i.e. works which would show that their repentance was genuine. Cf. Mt. 3:8; Lk. 3:8. 23 That the Christ must suffer, and that, by being the first to rise from the dead. . . . This verse seems to consist of headings from a collection of Messianic 'testimonies': 'Is the Messiah to suffer? Is He first by the resurrection of the dead to proclaim light to the (Jewish) people and to the Gentiles?' By these headings Luke summarizes the arguments from the OT which Paul pressed upon Agrippa to demonstrate the truth of his gospel. Cf. 3:18; 17:3.

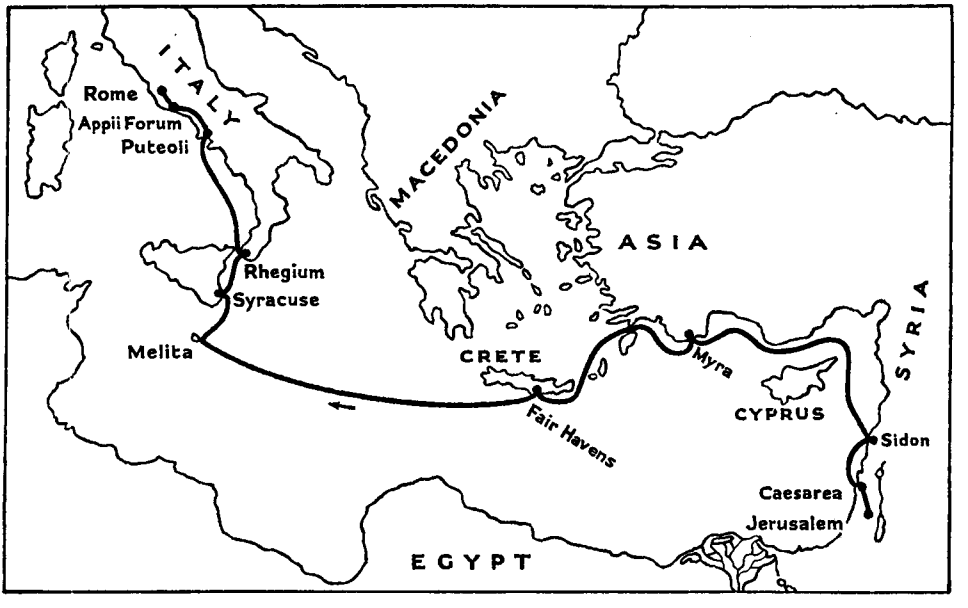
26:24–32 Festus, Agrippa and Bernice make up their minds about Paul. As Paul went on in this vein, Festus, who had been vainly trying to follow the drift of his argument, interjected the observation that his great learning must have driven him mad. Paul was quick to defend himself against the charge of madness, and assured Festus that Agrippa could, if he would, bear witness to the truth of his words, since the subject of all his preaching was also the subject of OT prophecy, and Agrippa himself believed the prophets. His direct appeal to the king put that gentleman in a dilemma. He had followed Paul's talk with interest enough, but he did not want even to appear to commit himself to agreement with Paul and thus lose face with Festus and the others. On the other hand, he did not wish to forfeit Jewish favour by appearing not to believe the prophets. So he laughed off Paul's appeal.



The court then rose, and Festus, Agrippa and Bernice, conferring with one another, agreed that at any rate Paul had done nothing deserving either death or even imprisonment, and that he might have been liberated there and then had he not appealed to Caesar.

24 Your great learning is turning you mad. Festus found himself completely out of his depth, and could only conclude that Paul, while obviously extremely learned, had been carried by his learning over the narrow frontier that divides erudition from insanity. 26 This was not done in a corner; a proverbial tag. The early Christian preachers regularly insisted that the historical foundations of their gospel were matters of public knowledge (cf. 2:22). 27 I know that you believe. The implication is that anyone who knows and accepts the truth of the prophetic writings, as Paul is persuaded Agrippa does, must inevitably agree with Paul's conclusions. But Agrippa is not to be manoeuvred into an appearance of supporting Paul's case, nor can he afford to disclaim belief in the prophets. 28 So he says, 'In short, you are trying to persuade me to play the Christian'—for that is the true sense of his words. 29 And Paul replies: 'The short and the long of it is, I could pray that you and all the others here today were what I am, apart from these manacles' (holding out his chained hand). 31 This man is doing nothing to deserve death or imprisonment. Luke emphasizes again this official testimony of the law-abiding nature of Christianity and its preachers. 32 This man could have been set free if he had not appealed to Caesar. But as he had appealed, the legal procedure must take its course. We need not, with J. V. Bartlet, detect an ominous note in the 'if' clause.

27:1 – 28:31 Paul's journey to Rome

27:1–12 The voyage begins. The narrative of the voyage and shipwreck of Paul is as graphic a piece of descriptive writing as any in the Bible. It has been called 'one of the most instructive documents for the knowledge of ancient seamanship'. (James Smith, The Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, 4th edition, 1880, remains an indispensable handbook to the study of this chapter.) We need not allegorize it as a picture of the rise and progress of religion in the soul or of the history of the Christian church in order to derive spiritual profit from it.

PAUL'S JOURNEY TO ROME

It is, above all, valuable to us for its portrayal of the character of Paul in circumstances in which the real man is most likely to be revealed. We have seen him in many roles, but here we see him as the practical man in an emergency. Not once or twice the world has had to thank the great saints and mystics for providing that help in critical times which realistic, practical men of affairs were unable to give. When Lot had to be rescued from Chedorlaomer and his allies, it was Abraham—Abraham the man of faith, Abraham the 'unpractical' man from the viewpoint of secular business methods—who seized the opportunity and proved himself to be the man of the moment.

Luke, Paul's fellow-traveller on this occasion, looked at the sea with the eye of a Greek, and tells us what he saw. Together with Luke and Aristarchus, Paul set sail from Palestine under the command of a centurion. Paul, with his ready capacity for making friends, soon won the favour of this Roman officer (it is remarkable how the centurions in the NT are uniformly presented in a favourable light); and this favour was to stand him in good stead not only at Sidon at the beginning of the voyage, but to even better purpose at the journey's end, when the soldiers were for killing the prisoners to prevent their escape.

They sailed to Myra in their first ship, which was calling at the ports of the province of Asia. There they transhipped to a vessel of the Alexandrian grain fleet. Egypt was the great granary of Rome, and the fleet which served the corn trade between these two places was a State service. Sailing became dangerous in the Mediterranean after 14 September, and ceased altogether for the winter after 11 November; and before they reached Fair Havens, a harbour on the south of Crete, the Day of Atonement (the fast of v. 9) was already past; it fell on 5 October in AD 59. As it was thus getting late for safe sailing, a ship's council was called, at which Paul, as a distinguished passenger and experienced traveller, was apparently present. He urged them strongly to remain where they were, at Fair Havens, but the shipowner and the helmsman thought they might be able to make Phoenix, another and more commodious port farther west along the S coast of Crete. The centurion, who, as the principal officer on board, had the last word, naturally accepted the advice of the experts rather than Paul's, and so they set sail for Phoenix.

1 That we should sail for Italy. The 'we' narrative is resumed, and continues to 28:16, but Luke was probably not far away from Paul during his 2 years' custody in Palestine. The Augustan Cohort; 'The Emperor's Cohort'. We have evidence that a similarly named cohort (Cohors I Augusta) was in Syria in the time of Augustus; but here we may have to do with the corps of frumentarii charged with the organization of the Roman grain-supply. 2 A ship of Adramyttium, a port in Mysia, opposite Lesbos. The ship was a coaster; Julius expected that at one of the ports which it touched he would find a ship bound for Rome. Aristarchus. Cf. 19:29; 20:4. 4 We sailed under the lee of Cyprus; east and north of it, the prevailing winds in the Levant throughout the summer months being from the west. 5 Myra was an important centre for cross-sea traffic and one of the chief ports of the Egyptian grain service. 6 A ship of Alexandria. With a steady wind from the west, the best route from Alexandria to Rome was by Myra. 7 Cnidus lay at the extremity of the Triopian promontory of SW Asia Minor. We sailed under the lee of Crete; i.e. east and south of the island. 8 Coasting along it with difficulty; perhaps because of the rocks round Cape Salmone (at the east end of Crete). Fair Havens. Modern Kalolimonias. After Fair Havens the coast tends northwards, and would therefore no longer afford such good protection from a north-west wind. 11 The captain; i.e. the helmsman (Gk. kybernētēs). 12 Phoenix; perhaps identical with modern Phineka. The more popular identification with Lutro (so J. Smith) is probably responsible for the doubtful RSV rendering of the closing words of the verse: looking northeast and southeast. RSV mg. reads 'southwest and northwest', which represents the Greek more accurately.

27:13–44 Storm and shipwreck. Before they could make the port of Phoenix, however, a typhonic wind blew down upon them from Mt. Ida, in Crete, from the north-east, and drove them away from the Cretan coast. With great difficulty they got the dinghy on board (in normal weather it was towed astern), and, having jettisoned part of the cargo, they contrived, by careful tacking, to avoid being driven on the quicksands off the Libyan shore. They continued for a fortnight in a west-north-west direction through the central Mediterranean, until all hope of safety was given up—by all except Paul, who stands out as the one man on board able to take charge of this hopeless situation and inspire his fellow-passengers with encouragement and fresh hope. The confidence which he had derived from an angelic visitant he sought to pass on to them, and encouraged them to take food.

Paul's confidence was justified; they found that they were approaching land, and although, by reason of the ship's prow being caught fast in a spit of sand and the stern being beaten by the waves, the vessel broke amidships, yet all on board escaped safe to shore, 276 in all.

14 A tempestuous wind; lit. 'a typhonic wind'. Called the northeaster (RV 'Euraquilo'); a hybrid formation, from Greek Euros ('east wind') and Latin Aquilo ('north wind'). Struck down from the land; i.e. from Crete. 15 We gave way to it and were driven; 'we scudded before it'. 16 Cauda; modern Gavdho, Italian Gozzo, in the vicinity of which the Battle of Cape Matapan was fought on 28 March, 1941. We managed with difficulty to secure the boat; i.e. to get the dinghy aboard. 17 They took measures to undergird the ship. The measures (Gk. boētheiai, 'helps') were apparently cables for bracing the ship. Smith quotes from Falconer's Marine Dictionary: 'To frap a ship is to pass four or five turns of a large cable-laid rope round the hull or frame of a ship, to support her . . . when it is apprehended that she is not strong enough to resist the violent efforts of the sea.' The Syrtis; i.e. the quicksands off the north coast of Africa. Lowered the gear. Smith takes the phrase to mean that they sent down on deck the 'top-hamper'. So were driven; on the starboard tack, according to Smith. 18 The cargo; i.e. the grain which the ship was taking to Italy. 19 The tackle; i.e. the spare gear. 20 Neither sun nor stars appeared. They were thus left in ignorance of their course.

21 Without food. This would be due to various reasons, such as the difficulty of cooking, spoiling of food by sea-water, sea-sickness, etc. Cf. v. 33. You should have listened to me. We appreciate Paul's inability to avoid saying 'I told you so'; but he now proves a tower of strength to his despairing shipmates. 24 God has granted you all those who sail with you. Cf. Gn. 18:26 for the principle that the presence of good men is a protection to a community. 27 We were drifting across the sea of Adria; i.e. the central Mediterranean. (This is not the Adriatic Sea, which was then known as the 'Gulf of Adria'.) They were nearing land; lit. 'some land was approaching'. Possibly they could hear the breakers. 28 They sounded. . . . The soundings agree with the direction of a ship passing Koura on her way into St. Paul's Bay, Malta. 29 They let out four anchors from the stern; i.e. to act as a brake. Anchoring by the stern on this occasion meant that the prows kept pointing to the shore. 31 Unless these men stay in the ship. Paul's presence of mind appears again. Had the sailors made good their escape, there would not have been enough skilled hands to work the ship. 32 Cut away the ropes of the boat; i.e. 'cut away the falls of the dinghy', possibly misunderstanding Paul's advice. They certainly prevented the sailors from getting away, but also made the business of getting ashore more difficult.

33 You have continued . . . without food. Cf. v. 21. 35 Giving thanks (Gk. eucharisteō). Some have conjectured that the Christians on board made this meal a Eucharist, but there is no proof of this. 37 Two hundred and seventy-six. The Vatican MS says 'seventy-six', but there is no improbability in the larger figure. In AD 63

Josephus sailed for Rome in a ship which had 600 on board (and it too was wrecked in the Sea of Adria). 38 They lightened the ship; i.e. by jettisoning the rest of the grain cargo (cf. v. 18). 39 A bay with a beach (lit. 'with a sandy beach'). This sandy beach is the only feature of Luke's narrative now missing from the traditional site in St. Paul's Bay; Smith considers that it was 'worn away by the wasting action of the sea'. 40 The ropes that tied the rudders; i.e. the lashings of the steering-paddles. The foresail (Gk. artemōn), a small sail on the foremast. 41 A shoal; lit. 'a place of two seas' (mg.). This was the narrow channel between Malta and Salmonetta (Smith). 44 On pieces of the ship; or possibly (but less probably), 'on the backs of members of the crew' (lit. 'on some of those from the ship').

28:1–10 Winter in Malta. When the shipwrecked party landed, they found that they had arrived at the island of Malta, an appropriate name, for it is a Phoenician word meaning 'refuge'. The natives received them hospitably, and lit a fire to warm and dry them. Paul again shows a practical turn of mind; he gathers sticks to keep the fire going, even though one of the sticks turned out to be a snake, torpid through the cold. When the heat of the fire thawed it, it fixed on Paul's hand, and there is quiet humour in Luke's description of the natives' reaction, first thinking he was a murderer whom Justice had resolved to destroy, if not by the sea, then by the snake, and then seeing no harm come to him after he shook the beast into the fire, changing their minds and concluding that he was a god.

But although he was not a god, yet both Paul and Luke proved very useful guests during the three winter months they spent in Malta. First Paul healed of dysentery the father of Publius, the chief man of the island. Then others were tended by Paul and Luke and, when at last they left, the islanders loaded them with gifts.

1 We then learned that the island was called Malta. If the sailors did not recognize Malta at first, it may have been because they were accustomed to landing at Valletta. 2 The natives (lit. 'the barbarians'). Greeks and Romans used the term 'barbarians' of all who did not share their civilization. 3 A viper came out because of the heat. Cf. T. E. Lawrence, Revolt in the Desert, p. 107: 'When the fire grew hot a long black snake wound slowly out into our group; we must have gathered it, torpid, with the twigs.' It has been suggested that the snake was a Coronella leopardinus, which is found in Malta and looks like a viper but is not poisonous. There are now no poisonous snakes in Malta. 4 Justice (Gk. dikē), personified as a deity. 6 Said that he was a god. M. Dibelius finds a different attitude in the narrative here from that shown in 14:14ff., where Paul and Barnabas cry out with horror at the ascription to them of divine honours. This overlooks the humour of the situation as Luke sees and describes it. 7 The chief man of the island; lit. 'the first man (Gk. prōtos) of the island'. Both Greek and Latin inscriptions confirm the accuracy of this title in a Maltese context. 9 Came and were cured. 'The whole story of the abode of the narrator in Malta is displayed in a medical light' (Harnack). 10 Many gifts. Gk. timē (lit. 'honour') may mean 'honorarium' here, as in 1 Tim. 5:17.

28:11–16 The last lap. The voyage to Italy was completed early in AD 60 in another ship of the Alexandrian grain service. They disembarked at Puteoli, where they were entertained for some days by Christians. Then they proceeded to Rome, and as they travelled along the Via Appia, they were met, while still 40 miles away from the city, by a delegation of Roman Christians who had walked that distance to greet the apostle and escort him to the capital. There he was handed over to the appropriate authorities.

11 A ship of Alexandria. Probably it also belonged to the grain fleet. Which had wintered in the island; probably in the harbour at Valletta. The Twin Brothers (Gk. Dioskouroi, 'The Heavenly Twins'), i.e. Castor and Pollux. Ships, like inns, took their names from their figureheads. 12 Syracuse was on the E coast of Sicily. It was the chief city of that island, with a double harbour. 13 We made a circuit; better, as in RV mg., 'we cast loose'. Rhegium. This was Reggio di Calabria, a Greek colony in the toe of Italy. Puteoli, modern Pozzuoli, then the principal port of S Italy, and one of the two chief ports of arrival of the Alexandrian grain fleet (the other being Ostia). 15 The Forum of Appius and Three Taverns. Both these places were situated on the Appian Way; Appii Forum was a market-town c. 43 miles S of Rome, Three Taverns (Tres Tabernae) was a station c. 33 miles from Rome. Paul thanked God and took courage. He might well be glad for this assurance that he was not friendless in the Eternal City. He had assured the Roman Christians 3 years previously of his desire to see them; now, in circumstances then unforeseen, he found his desire fulfilled. 16 When we came into Rome. AV adds 'the centurion delivered the prisoners to the captain of the guard'. This clause, which came into the Byzantine text from the 'western' text, is absent from other texts and therefore from RSV. The 'captain of the guard' (Gk. stratopedarchos) might be the camp-commandant of the emperor's praetorian guard. Paul was allowed to stay by himself, with the soldier that guarded him, to whom he would be lightly handcuffed.

28:17–31 Paul in Rome. Paul's interview with the Roman Jews sums up one of the themes of Acts, the general rejection of the gospel by the Jews. Paul, as usual, gets the last word, 'generally with devastating effect', says one commentator, and the last word on this occasion is that quotation from Is. 6:9, 10 which our Lord similarly used in the days of His flesh (cf. Mk. 4:12; Jn. 12:40).

The other and chief theme of Acts is summed up in the closing words of the book, which depict Paul spending 2 years at the heart of the Empire, under house-arrest but free to receive visitors, and proclaiming the gospel without let or hindrance. At last, by mysterious paths, his desire had had its fulfilment: 'I am eager to preach the gospel to you also who are in Rome' (Rom. 1:15). 'The victory of the Word of God,' says Bengel, 'Paul at Rome, the apex of the Gospel, the end of Acts. . . . It began at Jerusalem; it ends at Rome. Here, O Church, thou hast thy pattern; it is thine to preserve it and guard thy deposit.'

19 Though I had no charge to bring against my nation. He confines himself strictly to the defensive; he will make no complaint against the Jewish people. 20 It is because of the hope of Israel that I am bound with this chain. For his constant emphasis on this point cf. 23:6; 24:14, 15; 26:6, 7. 21 We have received no letters. . . . The Roman Jews would be anxious to dissociate themselves as far as possible from the prosecution of a Roman citizen who had won favourable verdicts from Festus and Agrippa. 22 With regard to this sect we know that everywhere it is spoken against. They had probably had more experience of Christianity in Rome itself than they were prepared to admit at the moment (see on 18:2). 25 They departed; better, 'they began to break up'. 28 This salvation of God has been sent to the Gentiles; they will listen. This is a recurrent theme from first to last in the record of Paul's ministry in Acts (cf. 13:46). What appears in AV as v. 29 is a 'western' reading which was taken over by the Byzantine text. 30 Two whole years. They were the years AD 60 and 61. What happened at the end of them we can only surmise. 'Perhaps Paul benefited from the clemency of Nero, and secured a merely casual release. But there is no necessity to construe Acts to mean that he was released at all' (A. N. Sherwin-White). At his own expense, 'on his own earnings'. 31 Preaching the kingdom of God and teaching about the Lord Jesus Christ. Cf. v. 23. 'In the conjunction of these words the progress of doctrine appears. All is founded upon the old Jewish expectation of a kingdom of God; but it is now explained how that expectation is fulfilled in the person of Jesus, and the account of its realization consists in the unfolding of the truth concerning Him. The manifestation of Christ being finished, the kingdom is already begun. Those who receive Him enter into it. Having overcome the sharpness of death, He has opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers' (T. D. Bernard).

THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH AT ROME

Its origin

The fellowship of saints in Rome is expressly stated by Paul not to be of his own founding (1:10–15; 15:20–22). It is the exception to the apostle's rule not to build on another man's foundation (2 Cor. 10:16). Churches established by his co-workers Paul reckons as his own. By whom, how and when the church at Rome came into being forms one of the problems of early ecclesiastical history. The tradition that Peter was the founder is not accepted, but the denial does not exclude the fact that this leading apostle was certainly at some time or other in Rome and there suffered martyrdom. But when Paul wrote his letter to the Roman church it is evident that Peter was not in the city. Had this alleged head of the church been in Rome surely Paul would have mentioned the fact, or indeed never addressed an Epistle to this church at all. It is believed that the church at Rome must have originated in the witness and labours of Christians who were Empire citizens in the habit of travelling to and from the metropolis. It is not unlikely that the work of evangelization was commenced by the 'visitors from Rome, both Jews and proselytes' (Acts 2:10). These witnesses of Pentecost would in after days be assisted by Christians from Syrian Antioch, Ephesus and Corinth and thus augment the fellowship. By the year AD 49 the presence of an active Christian group in the imperial city is attested if, as is likely, the edict of Claudius in that year has in view the disturbance caused by Jewish-Christian debates (Claudius, Suetonius reports, 'expelled the Jews from Rome, since they were continually making disturbances fomented by Chrestus'). By the time Paul wrote his letter to the church at Rome the Christian community would be of a goodly size. This supposition is confirmed by what Clement of Rome (AD 96) says of the martyrs who suffered in Nero's pogrom in the mid-sixties: 'a great multitude of the elect'.

Its character

The church at Rome was evidently composed of both Jews and Gentiles. As Paul does not address any special ecclesiastical dignitary or any persons with recognized authority, it is deduced that there was no central organization.

If Palestinian Christian Jews founded the fellowship they would evangelize first among their own countrymen, who formed a colony in Rome and had many synagogues. The apostle throughout the Epistle implies Jewish readers by addressing them particularly and by many allusions to the OT (there are about 60 direct quotations) and to the history of the children of Israel.

Again Paul certainly has in mind Gentile readers who would form the majority of the Christian community. He addresses such in the opening chapter (1:1–15). Cf. also 15:14–16; 11:13, where there is the unambiguous statement 'I am speaking to you Gentiles. Inasmuch then as I am an apostle to the Gentiles'. It is also significant that the greater number of the names cited in ch. 16 are of Greek or Roman origin. Thus the Roman Christian church was composed of both Jewish and Gentile members, the latter being the more numerous and possibly to a great extent accepting Christianity by way of previous conversion to Judaism. Hence Paul was justified in quoting from the OT and engaging in the problem of the Jewish race.

THE PLACE AND DATE OF WRITING

There is no doubt about the place where this Epistle was written. In his third missionary journey Paul waited at Corinth (see Acts 20:2, 3) for the delegates from the Gentile churches, who bore the offerings for the relief of the destitute Jewish Christians in Jerusalem. We read of this collection in 1 Cor. 16:1–4 and 2 Cor. 8, and of the apostles' last visit to Jerusalem in Acts 24:17, after all the delegates had arrived at Corinth. Some of the names given in the last chapter of the Epistle, such as 'Phoebe, a deaconess of the church at Cenchreae', the port of Corinth, 'Gaius, who is host to me' (cf. 1 Cor. 1:14), 'Timothy, my fellow worker' (cf. 2 Cor. 1:1), 'Erastus, the city treasurer' (cf. 2 Tim. 4:20), have a very definite association with Corinth. Such a careful and well-reasoned Epistle as Romans could have been penned only when Paul was able to stay in a comparatively fixed abode for some period of time. He remained at Corinth for 3 months, according to the testimony of the historian Luke (Acts 20:3), which fulfils the necessary conditions for writing.

An indication of the time of composition is given in ch. 15, where the apostle reveals that he is about to sail to Palestine, bringing with him the 'contribution for the poor', and that then he hopes to be free to visit Rome, and afterwards Spain. This points to the close of the third missionary journey and the last visit to Jerusalem.

It was on the eve of his departure to Jerusalem that Paul finished his letter and addressed it to Rome. Regarding the exact chronology of Paul's life and work no authority can be dogmatic, but depending on the date determined for Gallio's appointment at Corinth (in AD 51 or 52), we may date Paul's residence in that city during the winter of AD 54–55, and fix the writing of the letter in the spring of the later year, AD 55.

THE OCCASION OF WRITING

Why did Paul write to the church at Rome, especially as neither he nor any of his fellow-workers had founded it, nor had he ever previously visited it? The answer to this question involves the question of the form of the Epistle. Is it a theological treatise or simply a letter occasioned by circumstances in the career of Paul? It may be both in some degree, but the point is whether the apostle originally sat down to expound the gospel he preached or took up his pen to write a letter which imminent affairs dictated. The view has been held that Paul felt that his days were numbered and he wished to leave to posterity a definite and final statement of his teaching. That the apostle's doctrine in his day was misunderstood and assailed, that it never lacked critics (especially from the ranks of Judaism), and that it had never had a systematic presentation, may be conceded. The suggestion is, therefore, that Romans was the last will and testament of the great apostle to the Gentiles. Moreover, it is argued that the Roman church was just the right repository for this authoritative document. The logical and theological form of the Epistle, which is the most systematic and closely reasoned, the most doctrinal of all Paul's letters, affords no little ground for the formal theory. But that Romans is a theological treatise is going too far. Note the following arguments against this hypothesis of a studied manifesto of Pauline theology as though it were 'a compendium of Christian doctrine' (Melanchthon).

There is every indication in the Epistle that Paul was addressing a live Christian community out of circumstances which gave reality to his letter.

There is no real justification for suggesting that the apostle felt that 'the sands of time were sinking' and his career about to close so that he must leave his theological system to posterity. Rather, at the time at which he wrote, Paul's eyes were looking to the future of a new missionary enterprise.

Does Romans, in any case, set forth the complete teaching of the apostle? Is there not more of the Pauline theology in his other Epistles which the occasion of writing to the Romans did not immediately educe?

Paul's purpose in writing is definitely stated in the letter and he has no reason to conceal any theological ambition. He writes to intimate his true intention to visit the Roman Christians (see 1:10–13) in order to impart to them as an apostle of Jesus Christ 'some spiritual gift' (cf. 15:29). He makes the best of all his available contacts as ch. 16 reveals. Paul also plainly declares that his coming to Rome falls within a larger plan (see 15:15–24). He has completed as far as lies within his power the evangelization of the Gentiles eastward; now he sets his face to a new missionary enterprise westward. He writes to engage their co-operation in this scheme since Rome is a real strategic centre and the Roman fellowship an influential group in that direction. All the doctrinal part of the Epistle was penned for this very purpose, that the Roman church might apprehend the greatness of divine grace and the wideness of God's mercy, so amazing and so all-embracing that evangelization on his part (and on theirs also) was absolutely imperative.

We may conclude, therefore, that Paul wishes to introduce himself to the readers by a careful statement of what he considers the essence of the apostolic preaching to the Gentiles. 'Romans is the theological self-confession of Paul, which arose out of a concrete necessity of his missionary work' (W. G. Kümmel, Introduction to the New Testament, ET 1966, p. 221). An alternative proposal may be mentioned and considered after the textual question of the letter has been looked at.

THE TEXTUAL PROBLEM

The question here is whether the letter is a complete whole and composed all at the same time by the apostle, or whether any other author has had his writing incorporated at an earlier or later date. The problem arises from four points:

A short form of Romans was in circulation during the 2nd and 3rd centuries. Textual evidence shows that we have MSS, in particular, represented by Marcion's Apostolikon, ending with ch. 14.

The Epistle as we now read it has various endings. 'The God of peace be with you all. Amen' (15:33). 'The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen' (16:24), not found in RSV which omits with the best MSS. 'To the only wise God be glory for evermore through Jesus Christ! Amen' (16:27).

In the shorter recension the doxology which appears in our English versions at 16:25–27 is found at the close of ch. 14. Some MSS insert it at the close of both ch. 14 and ch. 16. Intrinsically also its genuineness has been doubted by some as not being in Paul's usual style.

The personal greetings of ch. 16 are alleged to be inappropriate to the circumstances since Paul was a comparative stranger to the Roman church. They suit rather the church at Ephesus.

In the face of these objections the integrity of the Epistle is still maintained. The solution of the textual problem is probably found in the belief that the heretic Marcion (who flourished at Rome AD 154–166) deliberately expunged the last two chapters because ch. 15 gave Judaism a preparatory function in the furtherance of the gospel. See, e.g., v. 4: 'For whatever was written in former days was written for our instruction, that by steadfastness and by the encouragement of the scriptures we might have hope.' Moreover, ch. 15 has at least five quotations from the OT, while ch. 16 was of no importance to Marcion's views, being neither for them nor against. The longer version, according as we now read it, is accepted as the original version, since the shorter version ending at ch. 14 manifests a bias against the OT. It is possible, however, that Marcion's shortened text is explained not by the heretic's abbreviating work but by the fact that he found the text already mutilated, and this version of the textual history may well account for the presence of 16:25–27 after 14:23 and 15:33 in some traditions as well as after 16:23. As for ch. 16 with its list of names, there appears a certain fitness in their mention considering that Paul's purpose was to create as many contacts as possible, while Rome was as suitable for the home of Paul's friends as Ephesus, even apart from the hypothesis of Ephesus as the origin of many of the Pauline Epistles. The view here accepted is that we have in Romans a complete letter written at one time by the apostle from Corinth. T. W. Manson's theory (set out in reprinted form in Studies in the Gospels and Epistles, 1962, pp. 225–241) accepts 1:1 – 15:33 as Paul's letter in its original form. This was subsequently rounded off by the addition of the doxology, 16:25–27. Manson was able to appeal to P46 (which contains the oldest available copy of Romans) for support, for this is how P46 has the text. He proceeded to argue that this was the version of the letter sent to Rome. Ch. 16 contains (on his view) items which connect it with Ephesus; and the letter (1–16) is a version which found its way into the archives of the Ephesian church. A third version (comprising 1:1 – 14:23; 16:25–27), he suggested, was sent to other Pauline churches (e.g. in Syria).

From this reconstruction of the textual ancestry of the letter, Manson went on to maintain that Romans was originally conceived not as a pastoral letter intended for Christians at Rome but 'a summing up of the position reached by Paul and his friends at the end of the long controversy' reflected in Galatians, 1 and 2 Corinthians and Philippians. The letter is best understood as a charter of Gentile freedom over against the Judaizers, though its immediate occasion was to prepare the way for Paul's visit to Rome from where the next phase of the Gentile mission westwards would be launched. By this suggested origin, Manson was able to explain the reason for and relevance of the letter's transmission to other centres of Pauline Christianity as well as Rome.

1:1–17 THE PROLOGUE

1:1–7 The address

The salutation is briefly 'Paul to all the saints, i.e. God's chosen and holy people, in Rome'. The form is similar to that adopted in all the Pauline letters as it was the regular epistolary style of the 1st century. We have many examples of such letter-writing in the Greek, and all follow the same pattern; first the writer's name, then the reader's, followed by the greeting. This formula is varied in the Pauline literature according to circumstances. Here, as addressing a church which he has neither founded nor hitherto visited, Paul presents his credentials. 1 He is a servant of Jesus Christ (lit. 'a slave'), one whose very life is that of unwavering loyalty and undisputed obedience. Yet, on its OT background, the word stood for an honoured calling and office, gladly accepted by those (such as Israel's kings and prophets) summoned to be God's representatives. Called to be an apostle; lit. 'one sent', 'a messenger', and so rendered in 2 Cor. 8:23; Phil 2:25. The special calling here is apostleship. Paul consistently maintained his direct call to this high office (cf. 'not from men nor through man', Gal. 1:1). The dignity was normally mediated through the living church in response to the will of the living Christ. The title belonged primarily to the Twelve whose distinction was that they were with Jesus in the days of His flesh. Later it was given to other church leaders and preachers (cf. Acts 14:14). Set apart for the gospel of God. Thus Paul further introduces himself, harking back (as in Gal. 1:15) to the commission he received from the risen Jesus (Acts 26:15ff.; cf. Acts 9:15; 22:14ff.). The gospel is God's good news of salvation in Christ, shortly to be expounded in this letter. Occasionally Paul uses the same term to mean 'Christian service' (e.g. Phil. 1:5); and this may be the meaning here. At his conversion-call Paul knew that his future life was to be devoted to Christ's work.

We now have an example of Paul's habit of 'going off at a tangent'. In most of his salutations and elsewhere he expands his thought as ideas chase after each other in swift succession. Here the word 'apostle' leads to the 'gospel' which, in its turn, leads him into a passage of great Christological value. He proceeds to define the gospel of God as divine (v. 1), predicted (v. 2), and Christocentric (vv. 3–5).

2 Before proceeding to describe what the gospel is about, the apostle affirms the continuity of his message with the revelation given previously to the Jewish people. It is in line with all the promises of the prophets of old; it is rooted in the holy scriptures, i.e. the OT, which describes God's liberating of His exiled people as His announcement of 'good news' (cf. Is. 40:9; 52:7; 61:1).

3–5 The main feature of the gospel is that Jesus Christ is its central theme. In this Christological passage Paul stresses first the incarnation, since that must be the starting-point of the gospel message. But His coming according to the flesh was a fulfilment of Messianic prophecy, which looked forward to God's deliverer as a descendant of David's family (2 Sa. 7:12ff.: a Messianic testimony whose importance was seen in the intertestamental Jewish literature, both of the Rabbis and Qumran community, and in the NT church; cf. Heb. 1:5; 2 Tim. 2:8); and so his statement in v. 2 is justified. Secondly, according to the Spirit of holiness, i.e. in respect of His exaltation by the Holy Spirit's power, following his resurrection from the dead. The two phrases containing 'flesh', 'Spirit' denote the two states of Christ (incarnate, exalted). In His earthly life He fulfilled the office of Israel's Messiah (David's Son); risen and exalted by the Spirit's power

(Rom. 8:11), He is now to be acknowledged as the divine Son (Ps. 2:7) ruling in manifest authority. What was hidden in His incarnate life is now openly displayed (2 Cor. 13:4) in His office as the church's Lord, i.e. sovereign ruler (Rom. 14:9). It is likely that Paul is here using an early credal statement which set out in rhythmical form the substance of Christological faith, expanded in Phil. 2:6–11.

This great gospel, divine, predicted and Christocentric, becomes the rule for Christians as such. The unity of writer and readers is Jesus Christ our Lord. Note Paul's use of the personal, the official and the universal names of God's Son who is Saviour, Messiah and King. Grace, which normally means, for Paul, God's undeserved favour shown to sinful men, can also be a synonym for 'power, ability' from God (as in Rom. 12:3, 6; 15:15; 2 Cor. 12:9). So here it qualifies apostleship, and signifies 'the God-given ability to perform the role of apostleship'. Paul ever marvelled at this calling he had received, viz. to bring the Gentiles to faith in Christ (Eph. 3:1–13; 1 Tim. 2:7; 2 Tim. 1:11), as he will remark later in the letter (Rom. 15:16). The end of the Pauline endowment of apostleship is the obedience of faith, or trusting submission, of all the Gentiles to the Saviour of the world. Paul is the apostle of the Gentiles and hence interested in the Romans both as potential and actual sharers of divine grace. Thus he infers his claim to address them. 7 To all God's beloved in Rome, who are called to be saints. There is evidently a Christian fellowship in the metropolis, composed of believing Jews and Gentiles. By the use of terms (beloved, called, saints) which the OT uses in reference to Israel as God's special people, Paul claims that Israel's place and vocation are now offered to a world-wide church. Saints looks back to Dt. 33:2, 3; Pss.; Dn. 7:22, 27 where the term describes Israel or a remnant as God's holy people, called to His service. That designation now fits the whole church at Rome and elsewhere. The address proper concludes with a benediction which is the combination of Greek and Hebrew ideas, grace and peace.

1:8–15 Thanksgiving and Paul's hopes

The apostle expresses his gratification concerning the Roman Christians, every one of them, because their faith is not hid in a secret corner but is public property. They have been faith's heralds to such an extent that God, whom he so worships in his spirit by preaching His Son, is witness to his continual mention of them in his prayers. The burden of his petitions is that God would speed him in due course to a meeting with them, if it be His will, the reason underlying the request being twofold. He wishes to establish them by imparting to them a spiritual gift, and also to share with them the comfort of mutual faith, theirs and his. 10 The implication (which is explicitly stated in v. 13) that Paul had tried unsuccessfully to pay a visit to Rome is not elaborated; we do not know, from any other source, of such frustrated attempts. The Roman Christians must know that, though so far prevented from doing so, Paul had often proposed to visit them in order to see the same spiritual work done among them as had already been done among other Gentiles. He feels his debt to civilized as well as to uncivilized, to wise as well as to fools. His commission is to preach the gospel to all men and, so far as his personal eagerness is concerned, he feels that he owes Rome a debt of evangelization, for he is proud (note the meiosis, not ashamed, in v. 16) of preaching the gospel, which is able to save everyone who believes, Jew or Greek, though the Jew has the first claim and interest.

1:16, 17 The theme of the gospel

This short paragraph is the seed-plot of the subsequent chapters. In brief compass the 'Gospel according to Paul' is set out, using the characteristic terms which match the outline of the Epistle: 'righteousness of God. . . . through faith' (chs. 1–8); 'the Jew first and also . . . the Greek' (chs. 9–11); 'he who through faith is righteous shall live' (chs. 12–15; ch. 16 is an appendix). Moreover, as this correspondence shows, 'righteous-(ness)' in this letter carries a double sense, which may be labelled forensic and moral, though in Pauline thought no strict division should be pressed.

Righteousness is pre-eminently in Scripture a divine attribute which sets a lofty standard for human behaviour. Indeed, it is too lofty for man's unaided attainment; hence the confession of failure in the Psalms (quoted in Rom. 3:10ff.). But the term equally describes God's activity in setting His people 'in the right' with Himself; its outworking brings salvation (see Is. 51:5, 6). So it can be 'revealed', i.e. brought by God within the sphere of human experience, and received by faith. As a third extension, righteousness becomes the quality of life expected of the believer in his personal relationships; and the standard, hitherto unattainable by a man's native powers, becomes possible by the indwelling and energizing Holy Spirit (Rom. 8:2–4).

17 Through faith for faith. By a cryptic use of Greek prepositions Paul writes a phrase which can have a variety of meanings. Probably, however, we should refuse to speculate too closely and should see here a rhetorical expansion meaning 'based on faith and addressed to faith' (so Bruce, Lohse). The appeal to Hab. 2:4 recalls the rabbinic use of this verse as a quintessence of the Jewish faith. Paul goes to the heart of the prophet's message, re-interprets faith as personal trust in God, and insists that a right relationship with God on that basis will work itself out in practical affairs ('shall live'). It is likely, however, that the verb 'to live' looks back to Paul's Aramaic background in which the same Semitic term ḥayyē means both 'life' and 'salvation' (cf. Acts 3:15 for this double sense). In that case, shall live implies the gaining of salvation, and is equivalent to the phrase in the Gospels, 'inherit (eternal) life'.

1:18 – 5:21 THE PRINCIPLES OF THE GOSPEL

The apostle now begins at once the doctrinal part of his letter and so embarks upon a discussion of the principles of his gospel. The subject of the treatise was stated in v. 17 as the (RV 'a') righteousness of God . . . revealed through faith for faith. This great theme is the very heart of the Epistle, even as it was of the gospel which Paul preached. Simply expressed, it is 'justification by faith alone'. The apostle's personal problem, not primarily of his mind but of his practice, was the question, 'How can I be right with God?' Before the arresting experience of the Damascus road Paul had essayed to solve the problem in the Jewish way, by doing right, i.e. by establishing right relations with God by fulfilling the law of God. The method had proved hopeless. No mortal man has ever been sinless, much less positively holy, keeping all the commandments of God. All Paul's theology was experiential, and he discovered that by the way of faith in the finished work of Christ he was set right with God. He was not rectified or put right by himself; he did not get right with God, but was put right by 'a righteousness of God'. This is the meaning of justification. The apostle's terms for 'just', 'justification' and 'righteousness' (Gk. dikaios, dikaiōsis and dikaiosynē) all come from the same root. Justification by faith, therefore, means righteousness by believing, the entrance into a proper relationship with God through faith in Jesus Christ as revealed in the gospel.

It is for this blessed reason in his own experience that Paul is not ashamed of the gospel of God. Some Jews at Rome might stumble at it and some Gentiles think it foolishness (1 Cor. 1:23); but to the apostle this selfsame gospel is real dynamite (power), a spiritual force, a manifest activity of God in his own life, bringing salvation in its most comprehensive sense to body, mind and soul, both here and hereafter. This divine activity within human experience, this entrance into and maintenance of a right relationship with God, is the gist of the apostle's whole message. As the theme of the righteousness of God is developed it involves, in the course of the letter, the doctrines of justification, sanctification and predestination, which emerge from Paul's exposition and defence of it.

1:18–32 Gentile 'righteousness'

The 'righteousness' of the human race is in fact unrighteousness. The absolute moral ideal is the righteousness of God which can come only from God and be revealed, or made known, only through the gospel of Jesus Christ. 18 Paul accordingly draws a vivid picture of the unrighteousness of the Gentile world, describing both heathen religion (ungodliness) and heathen morality (wickedness). Upon both the wrath of God is revealed equally as His righteousness is revealed (see v. 17). The idea of judgment is frequent in the OT as an integral part of the righteousness of God in dealing uprightly with His own people and with the Gentile world. Paul's Jewish readers, at least, would be well aware of the implications of this term 'the wrath of God', which is used, in both Testaments, of God's displeasure at moral evil in His world. The notion of an impersonal principle of retribution (familiar to Paul's Greek audience as nemesis) is not the same as divine wrath which involves an exercise of personal will (though not including anything vindictive or capricious in God's nature).

1:18–25 Heathen religion. The pagan world of Paul's day worshipped idols after the likeness of both men (Athens) and beasts (Egypt). This polytheism was the religious outcome of rationalism, i.e. man's trust in his ability to know God apart from divine revelation. 21 The Gentiles became futile in their thinking; i.e. futile in their philosophies. This section has an importance in Paul's thought and teaching on the moral state of the world of his day. It underlines a. human responsibility which is seen in the way men 'by their wickedness suppress the truth' (v. 18), and so have only themselves to thank for their futility and mental aberrations in regard to the knowledge of God (v. 21). They deliberately chose to accept a falsehood about God and preferred to represent Him in the form of one of His creation—because (we may infer) such a representation seemed more tangible and 'real', and made no moral demands upon them, so leaving them free to indulge their passions at whim (vv. 23–25); b. human pride is exposed as the seat of the strange practice of deifying the creature, for it is a bid to claim 'wisdom' (v. 22) that leads to this result, and a reluctance to confess to any sense of obligation to God which would naturally express itself in thankfulness (v. 21); c. human accountability which Paul is anxious to underline leaves men 'without excuse' (v. 20). This verdict comes as the conclusion of the argument in vv. 19, 20 to which appeal is often made as support for 'natural theology'. That God may be known from His works in creation is a belief found in Stoic philosophy as well as in those parts of Jewish literature (especially the Wisdom of Solomon) which stand under Greek influence. It may be doubted, however, if Paul is simply accepting this conclusion. Perhaps he is agreeing with the best in pagan and Greek religious belief for the sake of the argument (as in Acts 17); more characteristically he insists that such 'natural knowledge' of God leaves men conscious only of their fallen condition and condemned for perverting such knowledge as they have to ignoble ends and so landing them only in the morass of idolatry in the crudest and most ludicrous form (vv. 21–25). So men, left to themselves, 'have rejected the inference (of God's true nature, manifest in His works) and so forfeited this knowledge. The knowledge of God in creation remains an objective possibility, as it were, but the subjective condition for receiving it has been lost. And the consequence is that when man, alienated from God, yet haunted by the lost knowledge of God, attempts to recover it by himself, he reaches only distortions and perversions' (G. S. Hendry, 'Reveal', in A Theological Wordbook of the Bible, ed. A. Richardson, p. 198).

Paul's thought has its background more in the Genesis account of Adam than in Stoic philosophy or the intertestamental literature. See Gn. 1:20–25 for the classification of the species, and Gn. 1:26 for man's creation in the divine 'image and likeness' which he disowned by his bid for independence. The logical outcome was idolatry (vv. 23, 25), symptomatic of man's cherishing a 'heart that enthrones itself in God's place' (Barrett).

1:26–32 Heathen morality. An impure religion results in an impure life. This ghastly picture of heathenism is corroborated by the writers of Paul's day. It was an age of unabashed vice and anti-social sin, a period of unspeakable moral decadence. The inevitable judgment of God fell upon those who preferred human reason to divine revelation. The apostle three times asserts the divine abandonment, God gave them up (vv. 24, 26, 28). It has been observed that this desertion is definitely punitive, not merely permissive in the sense that God allowed the heathen idolaters to give Him up, nor just privative in that He quietly withdrew His grace. It is a positive punishment for culpable ignorance and wilful sinfulness.

26, 27 The divine judgment was an inevitable sequence, a harvest of the seed sown. The heathen world was given over to lust in the unnatural use of their bodies in sexual perversions and finally 28 to a base mind. Observe the play upon the words here. Even as the heathen did not see fit (Gk. edokimasan) to acknowledge God, God gave them up to a base mind (Gk. adokimon noun); i.e. just as these foolish and filthy idolaters disapproved of God, so God abandoned them to a disapproved conscience. 29–31 As we study the fearful list of human turpitude we see 'what happens when a man dethrones God and puts himself at the centre of his own life; he fails to recognize his obligations to others, and exploits their property and even their bodies to serve his desire' (Barrett). 32 indicates that the sins which are condemned are not the result of sudden yielding to temptation, but are indulged in deliberately and are encouraged in others, whether by complicity or condoning the sin. Paul's verdict implicates both the doer and the spectator who nods his approving head or gains a vicarious satisfaction from what he sees or hears of in others.

2:1 – 3:20 Jewish 'righteousness'

Like the 'righteousness' of the heathen world, the 'righteousness' of the Jews is also a miserable unreality and failure. With greater privileges than the Gentile, the Jew nevertheless has not attained to justification. Before entering upon his indictment of Israel, the apostle declares two preliminary principles—the impartial judgment of God (2:1–11) and the universality of moral obligation (2:12–16).

2:1–11 The impartial judgment of God. 11 sums up the first principle upon which Paul bases his charge against his own people. 1 When the Jews act as critics of righteousness, as they are always doing, they condemn themselves, for as judges they do the same things themselves. 2 It is a postulate with Paul that all the Jews acknowledge the undisputed righteousness of God in judgment. Hence the divine verdict is according to the moral reality of the case (rightly, lit. 'according to truth'), quite apart from privilege or profession. 3 The apostle undermines the false assumption that the Jewish people are exempt from universal judgment on the ground of integrity or because they are less sinful than the pagan world. Even the fact of national privilege does not exempt them from judgment (cf. Mt. 3:9; Jn. 8:33; Gal. 2:15). 4 If this has not yet fallen upon the Jewish practitioners of the selfsame sins as the heathen it is only because of the divine forbearance. God's seeming indifference to sin is due wholly to His patience, the aim of which is to induce repentance. The wealth of grace—the riches of his kindness—and 5 the wealth of wrath—you are storing up wrath for yourself—are set in solemn contrast. Every man will be judged according to his deeds, Jew and Gentile alike. Hard impenitence is an investment in divine wrath at compound interest to be realized on the day of wrath. Cf. Is. 13:6; Ezk. 30:3; Zp. 1:7; see also NT references to 'the day of the Lord' (e.g. Acts 2:20; 1 Cor. 1:8; 2 Cor. 1:14; 1 Thes. 5:2). 6 On that day the divine righteousness in judgment will be manifest as strictly just, recompensing every man according to his works. 7 If these are the fruit of patient well-doing in search of glory, honour and incorruption, the result is eternal life. 8, 9 But factiousness, disobedience to the truth and obedience to wickedness culminate in wrath and passion, in trouble and anguish, for every soul of man that works evil, particularly for the Jew (who should know better), but also for the Greek. 11 Thus the impartiality of the divine judgment is demonstrated. None is exempt.

Notes. 1 Paul's style of writing, in which his argument takes on an imaginary disputant with whom he conducts a running debate, is fashioned on the 1st-century literary convention known as diatribē. This method of writing explains the question-and-answer procedure of the following verses (3, 4) as Paul has alternately in view both a Jewish religionist and a pagan moralist, each of whom adopted a stance of moral self-congratulation and criticism of the failures and foibles of 'lesser breeds' who respected no moral code. The apostle turns upon this proud display by exposing its underlying error. 3 The key-phrase is and yet do them yourself, which does not necessarily imply that these moralists were guilty of overt acts; rather Paul, like his Master (Mt. 5:21–48), is searching the hidden depths of the human heart, and scrutinizing the secret thoughts which give rise to the outward actions. 7 No salvation by good living is taught here, but Paul is stating the principle at the heart of Jesus' teaching (Mt. 7:16–20), just as his earlier verse picks up the Lord's condemnation of censoriousness and a critical spirit (v. 3; Mt. 7:1ff.). 11 Partiality translates a Greek composite expression drawn from an OT metaphor, 'to lift up the face', i.e. to show favour to a person. The Jews claimed a leniency from God on the ground of a 'most favoured nation' clause in their covenant relationship with God. Paul, like the Hebrew prophets before him (e.g. Am. 3:2; 9:7, 8) denies this.

2:12–16 The universality of moral obligation. All are accountable to God for judgment whether, like the Jews, they possess the Mosaic law or, like the Gentiles, the 'natural' law written on the conscience of men who are all made after the divine image. All have a valid standard for trial, for it is not he who possesses law that is reckoned righteous but he who practises it. The Jews may not pride themselves in their Torah, for it does not matter whether one has or has not a law. Our actions, which reflect our true character, are the criteria of judgment. 15 Every man has a conscience (Gk. syneidēsis), a moral consciousness, a co-knowledge between the act and its ethical value, or between man and God as ultimate truth or reality. (Paul uses the term in this Epistle also in 9:1 and 13:5, and several times in his other letters.) If he attends to this conscience it will infallibly accuse or acquit him, 16 particularly when on the day of God all secrets shall be read and judged by Jesus Christ. Paul's gospel is here again affirmed to be Christocentric, which is indeed its chief characteristic.

2:17–29 The indictment against the Jews. Having thus prepared the way by affirming both impartiality and universality in divine judgment, the apostle proceeds to his specific charge against the self-assumed righteousness of the Jews. They, equally with the Gentiles, have not lived up to their light, and their light was greater than that of the Gentiles. In fact the Jewish gift of divine revelation was reckoned to mean privileged practice as well as privileged possession. Paul refers to two things in which the Jews prided themselves, the law (vv. 17–24) and circumcision (vv. 25–29), although they neither obeyed the law nor were really circumcised in heart.

17 But if you call yourself a Jew. The emphasis is upon their nationality. The name 'Hebrew' implies origin and language; 'Israelite' recalls their relation to God and religion; 'Jew' speaks of the race in distinction from the Gentiles. The enumeration which follows of advantages included in the gift of the law is somewhat satirical, for the apostle implies that the Jew has perverted his privileges. Rely upon the law. Paul's word (Gk. epanapauomai) suggests complacency. The Jew was the chosen of God, and the gift of the Torah was a proof of the fact. Hence possession was considered to be enough without worrying about practice. Boast of your relation to God (Moff. 'priding yourself in God'). He is charged with a wrong idea of his relationship with God. True, he might glory in God (cf. Je. 9:24) but not arrogantly. The Jew behaved with a conscious superiority over other races which were regarded as 'lesser breeds without the law'. He claimed to be so intimate with God through his possession of the law that he knew the divine will. 18 Approve what is excellent renders one meaning which the Greek allows. 'Things that differ' (RV mg.; Gk. ta diapheronta) may be taken in a comparative sense as well as a superlative one (which RV, RSV accept). The former possibility is adopted by NEB ('you are aware of moral distinction') and JB ('can tell what is right'). The meaning is that the Jew claims to be able to discern right and wrong and the shades of moral value between lesser and greater good (cf. Phil. 1:10). Because of all these advantages of the law the Jew prided himself upon his ability to guide, teach and judge others. 19 A guide to the blind (cf. Mt. 15:14; 23:16) was probably a proverbial phrase. 20 A corrector of the foolish; i.e. the infants in religious knowledge such as the Gentiles appeared to the Jews. Such proud claims all rested upon the possession of the embodiment of knowledge and truth contained in the law of Moses and its rabbinical interpretation which made it cover every facet of human experience. Did Paul mean that the Jew really had the secret of the Lord, the fount of all knowledge and truth, for the term embodiment (Gk. morphōsis) implies the outline, delineation, 'the full embodiment', of the essential form (Gk. morphē; cf. Phil. 2:6, 7)? Or did he imply here, as the context would suggest, that the Jew had only the semblance of the true morphē through his own failure to fulfil it? The apostle uses the term morphōsis only in this passage and in 2 Tim. 3:5 where it is put in contrast to dynamis, 'power'. Certainly the gift of revelation was real; but the point is that the Jew, by his obedience, could have had a fuller insight into it, and, in spite of his boast, was in fact but a poor guide, light, corrector and teacher of the heathen.

21–24 Arising from this there follows a fearless exposure of the unrighteousness of the Jews. 'Well, Mr Teacher-of-others, do you teach yourself? You preach against stealing, are you a thief yourself?' etc. 22 Do you rob temples? This was evidently a crime for which the Jew was sometimes blamed (cf. Acts 19:37), though explicitly condemned by the best Jewish opinion (Josephus, Ant. iv. 8. 10). There may be an allusion, however, to an incident in AD 19 when some renegade Jews at Rome absconded with a sum of money, donated by a Roman lady to the Jerusalem Temple (see Bruce). 24 Paul quotes freely from Is. 52:5 (LXX). Jewish inconsistency of profession and practice and their boasting of God's favour while showing an utter disregard for His standard of morality must cause God's name to be dishonoured among the Gentiles. A similar admonition not to cause Gentiles to blaspheme God by disreputable conduct is found in the literature of the Dead Sea community. 25 Circumcision indeed is of value. Paul admits the advantages of this peculiar and distinguishing rite in which the Jew also boasted and for which he was despised by the Gentiles. Circumcision has its points, but only if the law is kept (Gal. 5:3). If that is transgressed, then circumcision becomes uncircumcision. Similarly, if the uncircumcised man keeps the requirements of the law, surely his uncircumcision should be accounted to him for circumcision? The man who is by nature uncircumcised (as was the non-Jew), and fulfils the law, shall judge the Jewish transgressor of the law. Paul bluntly declares that the upright Gentile in his uncircumcised state is as good as the disobedient, though circumcised, Jew. His teaching should be related to the OT statements (Dt. 10:16; 30:6; Je. 4:4; 9:25f.) which stress the inadequacy of circumcision simply as an outward sign or surgical operation. Its value as a mark of a covenant relationship between God and Israel is forfeited by Israel's defection. Paul insists, moreover, that it belongs to the non-essentials of a spiritual religion and so uses the term of an inner disposition and obedience (Phil. 3:3). 27 The written code (AV 'by the letter'); 29 literal (AV 'in the letter'); Gk. gramma. In the first case the reference may be to the letter of circumcision, the literal commandment; but it probably means the letter of the law which is definitely the meaning in v. 29, thus emphasizing the outwardness of the law. Paul has in mind here 'the written word as an external authority in contrast with the direct influence of the Spirit as manifested in the new covenant' (G. Abbott-Smith, Greek Lexicon). Paul employs the same contrast in 7:6 and 2 Cor. 3:6; cf. Acts 7:51. The idea of a heart circumcision belongs also to the OT (cf. Dt. 10:16; Je. 4:4; 9:26; Ezk. 44:7). 28 Hence, he is not a real Jew who is one outwardly. Thus Paul clearly demolishes the alleged righteousness of the Jew. 29 His praise: a play on the word 'Jew' which derives from Judah, a tribal name linked with the Hebrew (yadah) 'to praise' (Gn. 29:35; 49:8).

3:1–20 Jewish objections answered. Such reduction of Jewish righteousness to unrighteousness could not pass unchallenged. 1–8 The criticism of the apostle's condemnation may come from his opponents, or perhaps arose in Paul's own mind, as he reasoned out his grave charge against his race. From the earlier references in the argumentative diatribe style, the latter reason may be supposed; but we may take note of the recent view of the Epistle which sees it as a summing-up of Paul's case against the Judaizers (see Introduction). If this description is true, then Paul makes clear the sort of answers he was accustomed to give in debate with the Jewish Christians who dogged his footsteps continually. The unseen heckler's objections are four.

a. 1, 2 If the Jews are equally condemned with the Gentiles and are as grievous sinners, what is the good of their privileges, what profit is there in circumcision? Paul replies that in spite of the fact that the Jews abuse their favours, nevertheless such remain for their proper acceptance and world-wide witness. Here he refers only to the highest of all their blessings (he lists others in 9:4, 5); they are entrusted by God to be 'the repository of revelation'. 2 The term logia (oracles; cf. Acts 7:38; Heb. 5:12, AV; 1 Pet. 4:11) refers particularly to the utterances of God on Mt. Sinai and His promises of a coming Messiah.

b. 3, 4 If the Jews are not right with God, what of all God's oracles and promises to them? Is not God going back upon His word? Paul repudiates the argument. The faithlessness of some (Paul is charitable in saying 'some', which is his customary way of referring to opponents whom he does not wish to identify more closely; cf. v. 8; 1 Cor. 15:12, 34; Phil. 1:15, etc.) does not impugn the faithfulness of God. It is obvious that if a covenant is broken by the unfaithfulness of one party, the honour of the other is unimpaired. 4 As it is written. The quotation is from Ps. 51:4 (LXX). While human faithlessness prevails, nevertheless the divine character is vindicated in all God's pronouncements about sin.

c. 5, 6 One objection grows out of the other. The heckler continues questioning the justice of God in punishing sinners. If the unrighteousness of the Jews is only a foil to set off the righteousness of God, and if the failure of the Jewish nation serves only to accentuate by contrast the uprightness of God, can God honourably condemn such serviceable sinners? Paul dismisses the idea as preposterous and declares it to be virtually a denial of God's prerogative to bring the world to righteous judgment. If our wrongdoing commends God's righteousness, are we to say that God is unjust in applying wrath to us? I speak in a human way; i.e. 'Pardon my very human expression; it is perhaps too bold an anthropomorphism'.

d. 7, 8 If my sinfulness, persists the objector, serves to glorify the holiness of God, this fact not only strikes at the root of the divine title to judge me, but condones my sin. Note how, in Paul's presentation of the objection, God's truthfulness is contrasted with the falsehood of the Jews; i.e. the divine fidelity to all promises and revelation is set over against Israel's unbelieving faithlessness and practical falsehood. Why am I still adjudged a sinner? the objector argues. 8 The logical conclusion surely is Why not do evil that good may come? Paul reveals here that some had slandered him in declaring this immoral maxim to be part of his doctrine. These traducers are dismissed in a word: their condemnation is just, i.e. that such men stand clearly in the wrong and under God's judgment is as it should be. They have perverted Paul's teaching in order to make it appear both ludicrous and immoral by their false logic, Why not do evil that good may come? Paul will not stay to rebut them now; that comes later in his insistence on union with Christ and the believer's fulfilment of the law's requirement by the Spirit's aid.

These four questions are not handled by the apostle at any length here, but they crop up again later. Objections a., b. and c. are treated in ch. 9, while objection d. is dealt with in ch. 6.

9–20 In the remainder of this section Paul continues his exposure of Jewish unrighteousness. He points out that it is condemned by Scripture as sternly as the Gentile unrighteousness. Both Jews and Gentiles are sinners. The apostle appeals to the absolute authority of the Word of God, universally admitted by the Jews, and gives a mosaic of Scripture verses in proof, which may have been put together to suggest that the entire human person (throat, tongue, feet, eyes) has shared in sin. With two exceptions these are all taken from the Psalms and are quoted from the LXX. These passages of Scripture represent the law, and they mostly apply to the Jew in his unrighteousness. 20 The conclusion of this section is stated here. The failure of the Jew to find justification was due to his adopting the wrong method; indeed no-one living can hope to get right with God in this way, for no human being (whether Jew or Gentile) will be justified in his sight by works of the law; for the inference is that if the Jews, with their immeasurable privileges, are accounted guilty before God, there can be no other verdict possible for the rest of mankind (cf. v. 23). Truly, the law brings hopelessness, for it creates a consciousness of sin, a realization of what it means to God and man, to the Judge and the judged. 'And this way, Paul says, will not work. Our own piety, our own good deeds, our own churchmanship; all in the end count for nothing. "Nothing in my hand I bring" ' (Barrett).

3:21–31 The way of righteousness

Paul now proceeds to describe the righteousness of God (cf. 1:17), the method by which he himself became right with God. Note the following characteristics.

21 It is apart from law. The law reveals what duty God requires of man (whether it be contained in the Law, the Prophets and the Writings, or more specifically in the Law or Pentateuch) and demands moral effort or works for man's justification. God's saving righteousness must come independently of the law because a. religion based on a code can easily be twisted into legalism and merit-seeking; and b. the moral dynamic needed by sinners to break free from their egocentric world and attain the requirement of obedience to God on which the law insists cannot come that way. A new principle of relationship to God is needed (8:2–4). Only on the basis of a faith-principle can the law's true purpose (viz. to order human lives in conformity with God's will and intention) be achieved; hence the conclusion of Paul's discussion in v. 31.

Secondly, it is attested by the law. The previous mosaic of Scripture passages (3:10–18) was taken chiefly from the Writings, the third section of the complete Hebrew Bible: now the apostle makes the testimony of the law complete by referring to the law and the prophets. The new way of being right with God is really not new at all, but was actually foretold in rites, types and predictions throughout the OT.

Rabbinical thought divided the time-periods of human history into three epochs: the period before the law of Moses was given; the age of the law; the Messianic age. Paul, as a Christian, assumes that the world's history has entered the third phase—where the law's authority as an instrument of gaining favour with God now no longer runs. This daring conviction explains the intense antagonism of his Jewish compatriots (see Leo Baeck, 'The Faith of Paul', Journal of Jewish Studies, 3, 1952, pp. 93ff.); and accounts for the emphatic adverb in v. 21: but now.

22–25 In the third place God's righteousness is provided in Christ through faith. It is for all who believe, through faith in Jesus Christ. The Greek has the genitive case here and is thus capable of being rendered either subjectively or objectively. The divine righteousness may be achieved by the faith of the Saviour even up to the cross, which strong faith was an integral element in the atoning value of His supreme sacrifice. Again, and in harmony with the NT usages, this faith is projected towards Jesus as object, and so becomes faith in the Redeemer. 23 All have sinned and fall short of the glory of God. Glory (Gk. doxa) is the visible brightness and splendour which emanates from the perfect character of God. This is the Shekinah glory of the OT (cf. 9:4; Ex. 16:10; 24:16f.; 29:43; 33:18, 22, etc.) and in the NT is expressed in the incarnate life of Jesus, the Word or expression of the Father (see Jn. 1:14; 2 Cor. 3:18; 4:6). In respect of God's glory all men fall short. The Greek hysterein means 'to fall behind', 'to be inferior', 'to suffer want' (cf. Mt. 19:20; 1 Cor. 8:8; 2 Cor. 11:5; Phil. 4:12). This universal deficiency is one view of sin. Both in reality and consciousness all are far removed from the blazing light of the divine perfection. The biblical background to this verse is suggested by the references to sinned . . . the glory of God, which recall Adam's original state (Gn. 1:26f.) as made in the divine image and his forfeiture of that honour as he sinned by disobedience. Men generally, sprung from Adam's stock, have failed to reach their God-intended destiny and in that sense 'all fall short of the glory of God'. Only in the second Adam is the image restored. Rabbinic Judaism held that Adam, at his fall, lost the image of God.

24, 25 But in face of this universal sinfulness, justification is free or by . . . grace. Christ is a propitiation provided by God, to be received by faith. Christ's blood is the price accepted, in the divine forbearance, in virtue of which man's sins to date are passed over. Paul expresses the ground of righteousness in two pregnant phrases: through the redemption which is in Christ Jesus and an expiation by his blood, to be received by faith. The Greek apolytrōsis means 'release effected by payment of a ransom', hence redemption, emancipation or deliverance. The word for expiation (hilastērion) is the neuter of an adjective derived from the verb hilaskomai, which has three meanings: to placate, conciliate or appease someone; to be propitious or merciful; or to make propitiation for. The NT uses the two last renderings (see Lk. 18:13 and 1 Jn. 2:2). The idea is not that of conciliation of an angry God by sinful humanity, but of expiation of sin by a merciful God through the atoning death of His Son. It does not necessarily exclude, however, the reality of righteous wrath because of sin. Christ is therefore a means of satisfaction for sin, this expiation being effected by the death of Jesus, the blood signifying the principle of life sacrificed (cf. Gn. 9:4; Lv. 17:11; Dt. 12:23). Hence the RSV by his blood, to be received by faith is preferred to the AV 'in his blood'. Justification on such grounds has nothing to do with man's moral effort nor his spiritual merit. It is bestowed by his grace as a gift. In other words we are acquitted for nothing, without price, and out of the undeserved love of God towards sinners. Because of this once-for-all method of dealing with sin, men's sins in the past were temporarily overlooked; and the punishment of sins in the present is likewise delayed; all with perfect righteousness on God's part.

Much discussion has centred on a possible specific setting for the Pauline reference to 'expiation', aside from the more important issue of the most adequate translation of the Greek term. L. Morris has argued forcefully for an 'objective', God-ward application of the benefit of Christ's death mentioned here and has insisted that the word includes a removal by God Himself of His wrath which justly rests on sinners (1:18) and once vicariously was borne by His Son to save them (5:9). On the question of background, a suggestive view sees an allusion to the 'mercy seat' at which God met His people (Ex. 25:22) and which was especially prominent in the annual Day of Atonement ritual (Lv. 16). Atonement was made for Israel's sins as blood was sprinkled on the lid of the ark and confession made. Both LXX and Paul's text use the same Greek word, and a series of contrasts between the two atoning rites (centred on the mercy seat and the cross) has been impressively made by T. W. Manson (JTS, 46 (o.s.), 1945, 1ff.).

26–31 The fourth characteristic of God's righteousness is that it is divinely just. The apostle now expands his last phrase to prove . . . that he himself is righteous. God is not only just, as always; He can also justify, or put into right relationship, those who have faith in Jesus, though apart from Christ they have no right to such justification. God is righteous; and because of His eternal and intrinsic righteousness (not in spite of it) reckons righteous the sinner who has faith in Jesus. On this basis of justification by faith alone the apostle challenges the boasting of the Jew. There is no room for it. 27 On what principle?; i.e. on what grounds is it excluded? Paul uses the term 'law' in a number of different ways. It stands for the Torah and for the Pentateuch; here it means an established principle. The rule of works does not banish boasting, for many a Pharisee was full of self-glorification. But the rule of faith does absolutely exclude any such exultation. 28 The definite conclusion of the whole matter is that a man is put right with God by faith quite apart from any confidence in the law as a way of salvation. Paul does not overthrow the claims of the law (as his traducers suggested, v. 8); rather he rejects its place as an instrument of salvation, and insists that it is by faith, i.e. by trustful acceptance of the proffered mercy of God in Christ and obedience to His word, that salvation is received. But the goal of what the law set out to achieve is not forgotten or changed, though it is reached by another route than law-keeping (see 8:3, 4). In that sense 'we uphold the law' (v. 31). 29 This principle of faith at once abolishes the wall of partition between Jew and Gentile; God is the God of both if they believe. And such belief is the sine qua non which only God can bestow. 30 On the ground of their faith . . . because of their faith. The expressions merely emphasize the contrast between circumcision and uncircumcision. There is no difference in the quality or in the method of faith. So, if there is one God, there is one people whose hallmark is faith. God looks past circumcision to faith in the Jew, and equally past uncircumcision to faith on the part of the Gentile. Both really display the same 'trade mark'. Moreover, Paul adds, in such faith the law is not side-stepped but established. God is not being soft or sentimental. His justice is satisfied.

4:1–25 Abrahamic righteousness

Paul now takes Abraham as a test case, in which he shows the relation of the new system of justification to the OT teaching. He imagines the objector asking where in this discussion Abraham stands. Is he a 'faith' man or a 'works' man? This is a crucial point, but the apostle demonstrates beyond doubt that the patriarch was justified by faith and not by deeds of the law. The ground of the argument is Gn. 15:6: 'And he believed in the Lord; and he reckoned it to him as righteousness.' This quotation from Gn. 15:6 focuses attention on the special relation to God held by Abraham, Israel's great ancestor and founder. Paul chooses this case and verse because precisely this scripture was a basic text for the rabbinical doctrine of merit (zᵉkût 'abôt, lit.

the merits of the Fathers). To the specific question, 'What merit did the Israelites possess that God divided the sea before them?' Rabbi Shemaiah (in 1st century BC) taught: 'Sufficient is the faith, with which Abraham their father believed in Me that I should divide the sea before them, as it is said, And he believed in God and He counted it unto him (i.e. at the sea) for (doing) charity (with his children).' (See, for an illuminating discussion of this chapter, C. K. Barrett, From First Adam to Last, 1962, pp. 22ff.) The review of Abraham's life reveals three realities.

4:1–8 His righteousness was wholly by faith. It was universally accepted by the Jews that Abraham was uniquely righteous and had better grounds than most to boast. 2 But such glorying is inadmissible in the sight of God. 3 Scripture says Abraham believed God, and that was reckoned to him as righteousness (see Gn. 15:6). 4 Now, if a man works, his wages do not depend on his employer's goodwill, but on his employer's indebtedness to him. 5 But if he doesn't work, merely believing in Him who justifies the sinner, his faith is counted as righteousness.

The sacred writer to the Hebrews echoes the OT view in Heb. 11:8–19. Abraham's faith is outstanding and he had an illustrious niche in this author's temple of fame. It is noteworthy that James in his Epistle (Jas. 2:23) also quotes Gn. 15:6, adding 'and he was called the friend of God'. Paul and James arrive at the same conclusion from entirely different points of view. When James declares 'Was not Abraham our father justified by works?' (Jas. 2:21), his aim is to commend good works as the necessary proof and essential fruit of faith. Paul's task, on the other hand, is to condemn good works as the ultimate ground of salvation and to deny to them any merit in getting right with God. The apostle continues to emphasize that this new system of justification, which is his gospel, has its roots in the OT by showing that David is also a 'faith' man; for he expresses the blessedness of those who are reckoned righteous apart from any merit accrued by works (Ps. 32:1, 2). This state of the highest happiness is not pronounced upon the forgiven by David, but by God Himself. The psalmist is merely recording the blessed fact, even though with personal exultation, out of his own experience.

Paul's rebuttal of the claim to merit on the ground of 'works' (v. 2) draws upon an accepted rabbinical principle of scriptural interpretation, viz. that when the same word appears in two separate passages the one can be used to explain the other. The common term is 'reckon', used of Abraham (v. 3) and David (v. 6). This correspondence shows that 'to reckon righteousness' equals 'not to reckon sin' (v. 7), and proves Paul's point that as forgiveness cannot be earned, so righteousness comes only as a gift bestowed, not a right to be claimed (v. 4).

4:9–12 Abraham's righteousness was independent of circumcision. The order in the experience of the patriarch was first faith, then justification, then circumcision. Jewish practice reversed the order, putting the rite first. 10 Taking the idea of blessedness as his link, the apostle shows that Abraham possessed this fruit of faith previous to his circumcision. 11 He received circumcision as a sign or seal. The rite itself was the token, or confirmation, of the covenant made by God with Abraham (cf. Gn. 17:1–14; Acts 7:8). On this ground the patriarch is the father of all who believe, whether circumcised or uncircumcised (cf. 2 Pet. 1:1). In the face of orthodox Jewish teaching, Paul asserts one of the vital principles of his doctrine, the open door for the Gentiles, the universal privilege of justification by faith.

4:13–22 Abraham's righteousness was independent of the Mosaic law. Paul's next point is that Abraham was reckoned right with God some 400 years before the law came into existence, before ever it was promulgated from Mt. Sinai. 13 The promise . . . that they should inherit the world was not given to either the patriarch or his posterity by way of law, but by way of the righteousness of faith. That 'they should inherit the world' is interpreted as the sum of all the promises which Abraham received as revealed in Gn. 12:3, 7; 13:15, 16; 15:1, 5, 18; 17:8, 19, and mentioned in Acts 3:25 and Gal. 3:8. These promises included the gift of a son and heir, a countless posterity, the Messiah, and His universal kingdom. Observe the way in which our Lord, in one of the beatitudes, spiritualized the idea of world inheritance by stating that the meek should inherit the earth (Mt. 5:5). 14 Had those of the law inherited it, faith would have been null and the promise void in securing righteousness. 15 Law, however, can bring only the sense of sin, guilt and penalty; for remove the law and sin is gone. Accordingly faith, not law, is the basis of Abraham's righteousness in the sight of God.

'In laying the supreme emphasis on (the promise to Abraham) Paul parts company with Judaism. For Judaism the great thing was the deliverance from Egypt together with the giving of the law . . . Paul reverses the emphasis. Judaism would read the patriarchal narratives in the light of Sinai. Paul insists on looking at Sinai from the standpoint of the promise to Abraham' (T. W. Manson, On Paul and John, 1963, p. 45).

The apostle argues similarly in Gal. 3:17ff., but the logic there is more legal and historical, whereas here it is more doctrinal. Law and grace are two incompatible spheres. 16 Hence the promise is confirmed to all the seed, not just to that sprung from the law, but also that sprung from faith. By this faith Abraham becomes the father of all believers, Gentiles as well as Jews. 17 In a physical sense the promise is given that he shall be father of all (Gn. 17:5); but Paul is thinking here of a universal spiritual fatherhood. Abraham, the father of the faithful, appears before God as the representative of all believers, Jew or Gentile. Gn. 17:5 is quoted, the significance of which is that 'the LXX renders the word "nations" by the word which to Paul regularly means "Gentiles" (Gk. ethnē). Abraham is thus proved by Scripture itself to be the father of non-Jews' (C. K. Barrett). There may also be a play on words in the Hebrew text of Gn. 17:5 where 'father of a multitude ('ab hamôn) of nations' is similar in sound to the last syllable of Abram's expanded name ('abrāhām).

Note the two arresting and apposite divine attributes which Paul adds here: God . . . who gives life to the dead and calls into existence the things that do not exist. 19 God's life-giving power is seen in the miracles of Abraham's procreation of Isaac (cf. Heb. 11:12, 'and him as good as dead'), by the deliverance of Isaac upon the sacrificial altar (cf. Heb. 11:19, 'God was able to raise men even from the dead') and by the resurrection of Christ (v. 24). The second attribute may be rendered, 'Who also speaks of, or summons, non-existents as if they were really existents.' The reference is to the unborn sons, the future posterity of father Abraham, when historically he was childless.

20 Again Paul eulogizes the faith of the patriarch. No distrust made him waver . . . but he grew strong in his faith, meaning that in reference to the divine promise Abraham did not vacillate in unbelief but was empowered by faith (RV 'waxed strong through faith'), thus bringing glory to God's name by his full faith in the divine ability to fulfil this promise. 22 The conclusion of this test case of Abraham is the assertion with which it began, that his faith was imputed to him for righteousness (cf. v. 3).

4:23–25 The apostle now prepares for his greatest theme, the believer's righteousness. This acceptance of Abraham, the father of the faithful, is recorded that we might also believe and claim the righteousness of God through Jesus, who was offered up for our transgressions and resurrected for our justification. 25 The conclusion of Paul's argument picks up the two earlier convictions that forgiveness and justification are offered freely as gifts of God's grace. Abraham's acceptance with God (which, as Ps. 32 shows, includes the promise of pardon) and his assurance of a continuing posterity (likened to a resurrection from the dead) depend on God's grace and were received by faith. Christians benefit in exactly these ways, and on precisely the same terms. This verse makes use of a pre-Pauline confession of faith in the form of a couplet and betraying by its Semitic structure its Palestinian origin. Its background is Is. 53 with a picture of Christ as the Servant who atoned for His people's sins and who is the guarantee by His living presence of their acceptance with God.

5:1–21 Believer's righteousness

The apostle now passes more into the subjective or experimental sphere. Some consider this chapter to be a devotional parenthesis since it is based on Paul's own experience of God's dealings with him. But the great theme of justification by faith is being here further developed. 'Paul never contemplates the possibility of a justification which was not invariably followed by a sanctification: justification and sanctification are for him inseparably connected in fact.' The one is the wicket-gate, introductory absolution; the other the long road to the heavenly Jerusalem. The apostle unites himself with all believers and speaks for them. On the firm foundation of being right with God the blessed effects of justification are declared (vv. 1–5). Then, in poetic style, there follows the guarantee of such blessedness (vv. 6–11). To this is added the method of justification as men of faith realize it through the new Head of the race (vv. 12–21).

5:1–5 The benefits which justification brings. 1 We have peace with God. Those justified by faith secure peace with God. The best attested texts have the subjunctive instead of the indicative mood in the verb echōmen, the only difference being the long or the short vowel. Hence the hortative rendering of the RV, 'let us have'. But as Paul seldom mingles his teaching and his preaching, the meaning is the milder exhortation 'we should have', and so 'we do have' (cf. Sanday and Headlam, p. 120). We actually enjoy, as men of faith, peace with God; we may approve the NEB rendering: 'let us continue at peace with God.' It is a new relationship with God which is not a question of mere feeling but of fact. Second, 2 we have obtained access. The believer does not enter into favour with God on his own merit. The idea of access is introduction into the presence-chamber of the king. This presentation before the royal throne is effected by one near the monarch himself. Here it is Jesus who leads us to God (cf. Eph. 2:18; 3:12). The apostle describes the active favour of the Father to believers by the term grace (cf. Gal. 5:4; 1 Pet. 5:12). The justified are ushered into a state of grace which brings security and confidence. 2, 3 A third blessed result of being right with God is joy, a triumph based on hope and victorious over tribulation. Believers exult in our hope of sharing the glory of God. They rejoice in the glory (cf. 3:23) which one day will be the crown and consummation of all things for the justified. They also boast even in trial, because trouble is productive of many fine qualities in believers, who know that sufferings produce patience, and 4 this endurance (cf. 2:7) leads to a tested character, and this proved experience (cf. 2 Tim. 2:3) brings forth hope. (Paul uses this 'chain-catalogue' style again in 10:13–15; cf. also 2 Pet. 1:5–7.) 5 This high hope does not carry disgrace nor prove illusory (cf. 2 Cor. 7:14; 9:4) because the souls of believers are flooded with God's love, which is in fact the presence of the Paraclete. The justified become conscious of God's love toward them through the indwelling Spirit. (Cf. the blessedness of the man to whom God reckons righteousness apart from works; 4:5–8.)

5:6–11 The security of the believer. The believers who are set right with God enjoy their new relation with God, their standing in grace, with perfect security. It is guaranteed on the one hand through the death of Jesus Christ upon the cross (vv. 6–8), and on the other through the risen life of the same Saviour (vv. 9–11). 6 Christ died for the ungodly (cf. v. 8). Christ's death on the cross was for us first while we were yet helpless; i.e. when we were weak and impotent to save ourselves by legal merit (though the description of Abraham as impotent by human standards, in 4:19, may have suggested Paul's thought here) and were indeed the ungodly (v. 6), sinners (v. 8) and enemies (v. 10). Secondly it was for us at the right time. This right season, the 'psychological moment' of the world's clock, is frequently expressed by Paul (cf. Gal. 4:4; Eph. 1:10; 1 Tim. 2:6; 6:15; Tit. 1:3). For us, then, in the fullness of time, Christ died, even though we not only had nothing to commend us, but in very truth had everything to condemn us. 7 The apostle makes a verbal contrast between the righteous and the good man. But no hard-and-fast distinction should be drawn. Paul's use of analogy runs: 'You would scarcely bring yourself to die for a righteous man, would you? Well, perhaps for a really good man you might. . . . But now see what Christ has done. We were neither good nor righteous, but still sinners when He died for us' (Barrett). 8 Behind this display of saving mercy stands God's love which is proved to us by the cross.

9 Much more. Paul continues his assertion of the security of the believer's righteousness with a triumphant a fortiori argument. The love of God toward us as undeserving and rebellious sinners is testified by the sacrifice of His Son on our behalf, a death upon the cross which brings us into a completely new relation with Him. This amazing love of God in putting us right with Himself is the greatest fact of our salvation. 10 God achieved reconciliation by the death of his Son when we were in a state of unbelieving hostility. Much more, then, shall God be able to keep us in peace with Himself as His friends by the risen life of His Son. If God can accomplish our justification, beyond doubt He can also accomplish our sanctification. The idea is all of life, the believer's life through the Saviour's life. Paul does not use the term 'sanctification' in his measuring of the greater and the great. His contrast is between justification and salvation. But the latter term has just this meaning of progressive holiness. In union with Christ as a living Lord we are empowered to live the holy life of moral and spiritual overcoming so that we, in our sanctified personality, escape the wrath of God on the judgment day through the completed and efficacious work of Jesus Christ.

11 This finished work upon the cross, which puts believers right with God and involves their being kept right through the life of Jesus, is the constant spring of intense joy. This relationship is termed our reconciliation. The Greek katallagē means 'change' or 'exchange'; hence, when predicated of persons, a change from enmity to friendship, a reconciliation. This implies a change of attitude on the part of both God and man. The necessity of change on the human side is obvious; but many theologians deny any need for such on the divine side. God's love is abiding and He in Himself is unchangeable. But note that the apostle speaks of a reception by us (Gk. elabomen) of a reconciliation freely given to us by God. Implicit in the doctrine of justification is the changed attitude of God toward the sinner on the ground of the work of Jesus Christ, which does 'not mean that He changed God's feeling to the race. That was grace always, the grace that sent Him. But He did change the relation between God and man. The reconciliation of one always means a great change for both parties' (P. T. Forsyth).

5:12–21 A righteousness of grace. The apostle now concludes this section on the believer's righteousness by emphasizing that it is in truth a standing in grace, for it is accomplished through grace (vv. 15, 20). The channel of justification is through one Person by the free gift of God, a principle which leads Paul to discuss the two heads of the human race, Adam and Christ (cf. 1 Cor. 15:21f.). Note the construction of the passage. After stating the truth of the universality of sin and its penalty through Adam (v. 12), the apostle digresses in a parenthesis (vv. 13–17), and resumes his argument in vv. 18, 19. We have in v. 12 a grammatical anacoluthon. There is no sequel to the 'as' clause which depicts Adam as the type of Him who was to come. This 'as' does not find its sequel until v. 18, after the parenthesis had dealt with some difficulties.

The typological contrast between Adam and Christ has a twofold objective. First it is used to show how the activities of an individual can affect the lives of others who are intimately connected with the former; and then, Paul uses the Fall of Adam as a foil to set forth the excellence of God's renewal of lost humanity in Christ. Paul is employing two exegetic methods known in the Judaism of his day: a. the principle of solidarity by which Adam represented the whole of mankind. Paul builds on this, and extends it to include the notion of the 'whole Christ', i.e. Christ and His people who are one with Him in His acceptance by God. Also, b. Paul learnt from his Jewish faith the close tie-up between events at the beginning of the world and a setting right of earth's wrongs at the end of the age. This principle (known as restitutio in integrum) permitted him to teach that as the old creation had been ruined by Adam's Fall and paradise lost, so Christ's obedience and vindication by God would lead to a new order of harmony and reconciliation, with paradise regained. But he does not say simply, 'The second Adam restores what the first Adam lost', although that is included. By his use of the 'much more' contrast (vv. 17, 20) he goes on to demonstrate that the ultimate Adam gains for His people far more than ever their connection with the old order could have meant. Hence the explanation in v. 15, 'But the free gift is not like the trespass' on two counts, viz. Christ's work undoes the mischief caused by Adam's transgression, and lifts His people on to a new plane altogether (v. 16).

12 is the crucial verse of the passage. Here the doctrine of the relation of the one to the many is set forth. Special emphasis is laid upon the two prepositions used in the Greek, dia, 'through', and eis, 'into', whereby a channel and a passage are indicated. Through one man as channel sin passed into the world (kosmos), and through sin, as its penalty, death. The world hitherto had been pronounced by the Creator 'very good', but now, by Adam's transgression, both sin and death had entered in. The point which Paul makes is that all are involved in the sin of Adam, all have sinned in him and with him. Humanity is not simply accounted as having sinned and just legally charged with Adam's sin, but all are declared to have actually and actively sinned with Adam.

13 This dogmatic statement leads the apostle into a parenthesis where he faces two difficulties. The first is that up to the time of Moses the law had not been declared. As there was no law there could be no sin. He lets that go, admitting that sin is not counted where there is no law; i.e. is not regarded as guilt involving penalty. 14 In the second place he argues that, law or no law, sin's penalty was in operation from Adam's time. The universality of death nobody could deny, and Paul adheres to the doctrine that death is the sentence of God upon sin, although there was no law until Moses' day, and although those penalized did not sin after the likeness of Adam's sin, i.e. eating the forbidden fruit. Commenting upon this v. 14 some argue for the universality of sin but not for its Adamic origin. This would be to deny our oneness in Adam, which is the type of the oneness of the redeemed in Christ.

15 Up to this point Paul is describing the comparison between Adam and Christ. Both by a single act influenced the whole race. Now follows the contrast. The effect of Adam's sin is death; the effect of Christ's righteousness is life. But Paul has more to say than that. He states that the result is abounding, or overflowing, grace or the free gift, which is further defined in v. 17 as the free gift of righteousness. 16 The sentence was of one to the condemnation of all; the free gift was of many transgressions to a pronouncement of justification. The Greek dikaiōma, not the usual dikaiōsis, rendered simply justification, means a judicial utterance, or decree, or act of justification or putting right with God. The same Greek word occurs in 1:32; 2:26; 8:4. 17 The contrast between Adam and Christ is further developed in this verse where the one establishes a reign of sin and death, the other a reign of grace and life. The connection with Christ annuls for eternity the sinful connection with Adam, and makes possible a new relationship with God undreamt of in Adam.

18 Paul now links up with the principle posited in v. 12, restating it and adding the other limb of the parallelism, so one man's act of righteousness leads to acquittal and life for all men. Christ's life of perfect submission to His Father's will (Jn. 8:29) was crowned by His acceptance of the cup of suffering and death, and so may be summed up as His obedience (v. 19; cf. Phil. 2:8) or righteousness indifferently.

19 Obedience may look back to Is. 53:11, especially if the Hebrew text (translated 'By his knowledge shall the righteous one, my servant, make many to be accounted righteous' in RSV) means 'By his submission (in obedience to God's will)'. Clearly, it seems, Paul is fusing the two ideas of Christ as the second Adam and Christ as the obedient Servant of the Lord. The latter part of the picture is most obviously to be seen in the recurrence of the term 'many' (vv. 15, 16, 19), drawn from Is. 53:11. The expression is a Semitic way of saying that 'all' are included with the assurance that 'the all' are not a few in number.

The sum of the whole comparison and contrast between Adam and Christ is stated here as the conclusion of the argument that the believer's righteousness is one of grace. It leaves us, however, with the problem of the relation of Adam and Christ to mankind whereby sin on the one hand and grace on the other are transmitted. Imputation is a legal conception and does not completely satisfy. The theory of federal headship is helpful, which lies in the thought of both Adam and Servant of Yahweh typologies. The former is based on a racial interdependence, the latter on a faith-relationship (Is. 53:4–12). Paul elsewhere teaches that this spiritual headship of Christ antedates the physical headship of Adam (cf. Eph. 1:4; Col. 1:15–17; see also Jn. 1:1–5). Yet by his deductions from it the apostle indicates a closer relationship, for humanity has no power of choice to commission its representative. The scientific fact of the solidarity of the race gives the best solution. As the whole lies in the germ, the oak in the acorn, so all humanity resides in Adam and, by grace through faith, also in Christ. As we are a physical, so also are we a spiritual organism.

20, 21 Paul concludes this section of the believer's righteousness with an appended note on the function of the law. Gal. 3:19 explains more fully; and both verses attribute to the law a parenthetic and provisional character. Indeed, the entry of law serves only to exacerbate the sinner's plight by giving legal definitions which both multiply offences and (human nature being what it is) actually provoke transgressions by inciting man's rebellious instinct. Yet even an increase of sin cannot overwhelm God's grace; indeed the latter rises with every fresh tide of lawlessness. 21 Grace is not the end. It leads through righteousness to its consummation, eternal life.

6:1–23 ETHICAL PROBLEMS RAISED BY THE GOSPEL

Paul now proceeds to defend the doctrine of justification by faith against the charge that it is incompatible with morality. He does so by affirming the doctrine of sanctification. This is not merely a theoretical sequence to justification; it is a vivid fact in the apostle's experience. It is equally a common message of all the NT writers 'that we are justified by the faith that works through love' (Gal. 5:6), and the link uniting justification by faith with justification by works is the obedience of faith expressed in 'works of love' (A. B. Crabtree, The Restored Relationship, 1963, p. 77). This ethical problem takes two forms. First, does not being reckoned righteous by God simply encourage sin? Secondly, does it not result in lawlessness?

6:1–14 The charge of licence

Paul's doctrine of justification, the objector argues, implies 'the more sin, the more grace'. If more sin means more grace, why not continue to live in sin? Paul's reply centres in the fact of the believer's union with Christ. This mystical relationship with the Saviour is here set forth for the first time in this Epistle. The apostle's characteristic thought is illustrated by the rite of baptism in the mode of immersion. The three actions therein are symbolic: into the water—death; under the water—burial; out of the water—resurrection. 3 To be baptized into Jesus Christ is to be brought into union with His death, 4 His burial and 5 His resurrection. Burial is really a confirmation of the fact of death. Christ's death was concerned with sin. It was a sacrifice by which sin was put away (cf. Heb. 9:26). 10 He died to sin, once for all; cf. 1 Pet. 3:18; Heb. 7:27; 9:12, 28; 10:10. His resurrection marked His entrance upon a new life 'apart from sin'. 11 The believer, accordingly, passes through the same experiences. It is the way of sanctification, the destined issue of justification. God not only puts us right, but keeps us right with Himself. His righteousness is first imputed, then imparted to us.

12, 13 Paul has been dealing so far with the Godward side of sanctification through faith-union with Christ. Now he declares the manward aspect. Moral effort is necessary in the progressive righteousness of the believer. The believer must not present his members as instruments of wickedness. This would mean continual sinning (Gk. paristanete; continuous present tense). The second presentation, as instruments of righteousness, is 'an act of choice' (Gk. parastēsate; completed past tense) whereby believers definitely yield themselves to a life of holiness, although such cannot be continually sinless. 'Do not go on presenting your limbs to sin as weapons of unrighteousness. Present yourselves outright (once for all) to God.'

14 The transition to the next aspect of the ethical problem is found in this verse, where Paul exults in the certainty of progressive righteousness, and cries: 'Sin shall not lord it over you. You are not under law, but under grace.' The 'Thou shalt not' of the law must give place to the power of the Spirit.

Notes. 3 Paul's appeal to baptism as the event in a believer's life which marked his union with Christ and acceptance of His Lordship is amplified in Gal. 3:27; 1 Cor. 12:13. In NT times the baptismal experience must have made an indelible impression on the newly converted man or woman, signifying the passage from the thraldom of sin to a new life of incorporation into Christ and the church (see Eph. 5:14 as a baptismal chant). 6 Our old self was crucified with him relates to the effect of Christ's death which frees the believer from the tyranny of the sinful body, i.e. his unregenerate nature, inherited from his membership in the fallen creation 'in Adam'. Christ's sacrifice and victory (v. 8), while accomplished by Him as a historical fact at Calvary and on Easter morning, have far-reaching ramifications; for they involve His people whom He inclusively represented in His obedience and triumph. The precise question posed by the verse is: granted that the general sense is clear, that all that Christ did He did to liberate His people from sin's dominion (v. 6c), when exactly was it that our old self was crucified with him? When the Christian died with Christ long ago at Calvary? Or, at the moment of baptism when by faith he identifies himself with the past act of salvation and makes it his very own? Some verses in Paul's exposition (vv. 9, 10) suggest the former; others (vv. 3, 4, 8) the latter alternative. But 'is it not apparent that both these views are inadequate (on their own) and that both are embraced at once by Paul? . . . It is the old problem in a new guise of relating the objective work of redemption to the personal appropriation of it' (G. R. Beasley-Murray). Our controlling guide should be that Paul's doctrine of baptism is ethically oriented, with his chief insistence on the fact 'We were baptized into Christ' (v. 3) and its inseparable purpose, in order that 'we too might walk in newness of life'. 7 NEB suggests a proverbial expression by its translation: 'a dead man is no longer answerable for his sin.' 'Death pays all debts', so the man who has died with Christ has his slate wiped clean (Bruce).

6:15–23 The charge of lawlessness

'Not under law but under grace' (v. 14) was the triumphant conclusion of Paul's argument; but it was capable (as 3:8, 31; 6:1 shows) of being misused and the false deduction being drawn: 'If we are no longer under the law, which forbids us to sin, we can do as we please and sin without compunction. Indeed (Paul's enemies were insinuating) the more we sin, the greater opportunity we give for God's grace to be displayed in forgiving us; and now that the law as our master is dead, we are at liberty to enjoy our independence.'

Paul's answer to this objection against free grace is that, while it is true that the believer is not under law but under grace, this does not mean that he is lawless (cf. 1 Cor. 9:21). He owes allegiance to God. 16 There are two possible masters to lord it over us—sin or God. To make his point the apostle takes an illustration from the slave-law of the time. (He is using the term doulos, slave, throughout.) A slave could buy his freedom by paying his price to the temple, i.e. he gave his purchase money to some god or goddess and in this way claimed his freedom; but the gold actually went, via the temple, to the master. Thus the deity ransomed the slave from the owner and the slave went free, although still the slave of the god. In a similar way the believer is free in the sense that he has become God's slave. He is not an irresponsible person without a master, for Jesus is Lord of all his life. 19 The apostle realizes the inadequacy of the analogy but reminds his readers that he speaks in human terms (cf. 1 Cor. 15:32; Gal. 3:15) and owing to your natural limitations, i.e. their immaturity. 20–23 Paul closes his argument by an appeal to the results or fruits of the two services, sin or righteousness. The one issues in shame and death; the other in sanctification and life eternal.

Notes. 17 The standard of teaching to which you were committed. 'The creed you were taught' is the JB translation, which is an acceptable rendering provided we think of a code of moral instructions and guidelines (such as Paul alludes to in Eph. 4:5) available to early Christians. Elsewhere Paul refers to 'the traditions' in the same sense of a pattern of ethical counsels to regulate believers' conduct (1 Cor. 11:2; 2 Thes. 2:15; 3:6; Phil. 4:9; Col. 2:6).

7:1 – 8:39 THE CHRISTIAN AND THE LAW

Another difficulty involved in the apostle's doctrine of 'the righteousness of God' as a free gift, or 'justification by faith alone', was the position of the law. The law was almost worshipped by the Jews and it was sheer blasphemy to assert that faith should take its place. To this question of the abrogation of the law Paul now addresses himself.

7:1–6 Law is valid only in lifetime

1–3 The illustration is used of the emancipated widow released from the law of the husband on his death. She is free to marry again. The law is superseded and is no longer valid or operative in this case. 4 Similarly believers have died to the law through the body of Christ; i.e. through Christ as crucified in the body (see E. Best, One Body in Christ, 1955, pp. 52f. for discussion). The 'you' becomes 'we' by coming to belong to the body of Christ, the totality of whose members, or limbs, constitutes the body of which Christ is the Head. The point of the analogy is that the believer, being dead to the law, is free to be united to the risen Lord. The apostle here substitutes the law for sin, deadness to which, accompanied by life unto righteousness, was his teaching in the previous chapter. 5, 6 He stresses now the emancipation through death. In the flesh, the contrast to which is 'in the spirit', describes the life of sinful indulgence. The two states of slavery are again contrasted in the phrases the new life of the Spirit (cf. 8:9) and the old written code; and they represent the state of grace and the state of law and describe the antithesis between 'spirit' and 'letter' (as in 2 Cor. 3:6) which is taken from Je. 31:31ff.

7:7–25 Law and sin are not synonymous

Paul, as we have seen, has substituted 'law' for 'sin' in his argument. This fact gave rise, either in his own mind or in that of his critics, to the question, That the law is sin? (v. 7). Are these two things identical? The regenerate man dies to sin and self, and so to law. What then is the relation between sin and law? The apostle defines the connection between the two from his own personal experience. This section has been understood as autobiographical, although some commentators have thought that Paul is speaking quite generally. The better view is that it is the regenerate man who is speaking from his own experience. We have no picture of unregenerate experience per se, but rather the righteous man's retrospect, for he alone is in a position to assess the slavery of sin. 'The chapter should be taken as a dialectical analysis of the state of the naturally sin-enslaved soul "under law"' (W. Manson). Paul regards his own experience as typical. The true relationship between law and sin is set forth as threefold.

7:7, 8 The law reveals sin. I should not have known what it is to covet if the law had not said. . . . Were there no law we would be unconscious of sin's vitality, and so of sin's existence. This is really an ethical commonplace, so very commonplace that it is ignored. Sin, finding opportunity (cf. v. 11). Sin, like a military strategist, made the law a sort of 'base of operations'. This is the literal sense of the Greek word aphormē when applied to warfare. It means a 'starting-point', and so, metaphorically, an 'occasion', 'claim', 'opportunity' (cf. 2 Cor. 11:12; Gal. 5:13. The soul, ignorant of the prohibitions of the law, is happy in unrecognized sin; but when the knowledge of sin comes then sin arouses rebellion against the law, which keeps on saying 'Thou shalt not', and so sin works all kinds of covetousness.

Scholars have drawn attention to the allusions to the Genesis account of man's temptation and fall: a. 'commandment' recalls the divine command in Gn. 2:16; 3:11, 17; b. sin is personalized, if not actually personified, here as in Gn. 3; c. 'The suggestion that sin is "dead" apart from the law reminds us of the serpent lying inactive, motionless, hidden, and as it were dead in the garden: nothing resembles a dead serpent more than a living serpent so long as it does not move' (Leenhardt); d. the verb to covet may cover any evil desire (as it does in 1 Cor. 10:6ff.) and Paul may have in mind Gn. 3:6. This reference could throw light on v. 10.

7:9–13 The law stimulates sin. Once, says Paul, I lived free from any consciousness of sin. I really lived apart from the law. But when the commandment came (i.e. a particular injunction of the law; perhaps represented in Paul's experience when, as a boy of 13 years, he accepted membership of the covenant-community of his people), sin revived (Gk. anazēn, 'to leap into life') and I died. 10 The apostle's experience was that the law, decreed to promote life (cf. 10:5; Lv. 18:5) by obedience, turned out to be death to him. 11 Indeed, through the law, sin beguiling him (cf. Gn. 3:13; 2 Cor. 11:3; 1 Tim. 2:14) slew him. This death does not mean atrophy or paralysis of this or that living function. It means wholesale death, the kind of thing that drove Paul to a frenzied persecution of the Way, to a mania of hatred towards it, which the Lord alone 'cured' by the vision on the Damascus road. Every law-begotten covetousness (i.e. evil 'concupiscence') must have leapt into a new heinousness as the Christian looked back upon the frenzied baiter and persecutor, as Paul indeed looked back upon Saul, and understood the misery of his hatred. 12 The apostle will not allow that the law, in whole or in part, is anything but holy, just and good. Its purposed effect is life. 13 Only when perverted by sin and made subservient to its deceit does the law work death. Sin is the mischief that waylaid and slew Saul. The divine intention was to show sin in its true colours, as already declared (see vv. 7, 8). But sin turned God's blessing, the law, into a curse.

Notes. 10 Some particular part of God's law seems intended; if so, the prohibition of the tree was intended for Adam's good and obedience would have brought 'life' (Gn. 3:3). As it happened, disobedience to that very commandment incurred death. 11 The verb deceived (as in 2 Cor. 11:3; 1 Tim. 2:14) matches the same word in its simple form in Gn. 3:13 (LXX): 'The serpent beguiled me.'

7:14–25 The law creates a conflict with sin. The apostle reaches now the very core of his bitter experience. He confesses that he sees the better way, and approves thereof; but he follows the worse. He realizes the difference between the nature of the law and his own nature. Spiritual and carnal are opposites: one is of the Spirit, the other of the flesh. 15–19 Paul continues in a classical picture of divided consciousness to sketch his inner conflict between what psychologists term the organized and disorganized self. The real self centres in an ideal, in Paul's case Christ, or the good and holy law. Sin, personified in the graphic and emotional portrait, is the disorganized self and definitely not Paul as he longs to be. 20 When doing what he does not approve he declares it is no longer I that do it, but sin, identified here with his lower or disorganized self. 21 The apostle's experience provides a principle, enunciated here, which operates all through life. 'To be saved from sin a man must at the same time own it and disown it; it is this practical paradox which is reflected in this verse' (James Denney). 24 The emotional expression of this inner conflict and divided consciousness culminates in a cry of distress or despair. Paul lives again his experience, which he presents as typical, of being the convicted sinner. Wretched man that I am! Who will deliver me from this body of death? The body is the instrument of sin and destined to die; so repulsive is sin, and death so much its synonym, that Paul agonizes to be rescued from this death's body which, in his horror, he feels it to be. 25 Then follows the swift reaction in a paean of praise, as salvation floods his soul: Thanks be to God through Jesus Christ our Lord!

Notes. 14 Sold under sin; cf. Wisdom of Solomon 1:4, 'wisdom will not enter a deceitful soul, nor dwell in a body enslaved to sin.' 15 Ovid's dictum, 'I see and approve the better life, but I follow the worse one' is often quoted as parallel, but the correspondence is not exact, mainly because Paul's self-estimate is viewed in the light of God's law, and he looks upon sin as an alien intruder into his life (v. 20), setting up an inner conflict (cf. Gal. 5:17). 24 This body of death. Paul is not describing his physical frame as evil; no disparagement of the human body, made by God, is intended. Rather, it is the 'heritage of human nature subject to the law of sin and death which he shares with all the sons of Adam' (Bruce) that he refers to in this phrase. 25 I of myself, or 'I, left to myself', 'when I rely on my own unaided effort'. Then the result is this unequal conflict between his aspiration and achievement. But this is not the final word nor the whole of the picture, as the next chapter will show.

8:1–39 Sin is vanquished by Christ and the Spirit

The law, while thus exposing and exciting sin and splitting the self, is still in its purpose holy and good. The law is the friend of men if it could be allowed to operate, but it is weakened by the flesh (v. 3). However, through Christ, it is strong and condemns sin in the flesh, for Christ is absolutely righteous and He dwells within us. We are also in Christ and by this union fulfil the law (vv. 1, 4). Christ's obedience is our obedience. We satisfy in this way the claims of the law and render it powerless. So in this chapter the apostle proceeds to chart the course of the Christian life in which believers are set free from the law of sin and death by the law of the Spirit of life in Christ (v. 2).

8:1–4 The failure of law. The previous system of life through obedience to the law had manifestly never been successful. Now it is made good by the incarnation of Jesus and the presence of the Spirit. Law is unable to confer benefits, but what the law failed to do, grace accomplished through Christ and the Holy Spirit. The overcoming life begins here and now in the absence of any sentence for being in the wrong with God. 1 United with Christ, the believer is acquitted and is free for ever from the tyranny imposed by the law of sin and death. The term condemnation refers, as a legal expression, to the sentence which the guilty and convicted man receives and his ensuing punishment. The believer is set free from both the law's power over him and any punishment it could inflict upon him as a condemned 'law-breaker'. The just requirement of the law, a righteous life, is accomplished not 'by' us but in us (v. 4). 3 This is what the law . . . could not do. The idea is more of the inherent inability of the law to do anything in the direction of a holy life, than merely of its impotence to do what Christ accomplished. The failure of the law is absolute. 2 The new law under which we are brought is the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus, and this law emancipates us from the law of sin and death. 'This verse contains a complete picture of the Christian life as Paul understood it' (Barrett). Sin is foreign to human life. It is an intrusion. By sending His Son in the likeness of sinful flesh God dealt with sin. Paul does not here imply that Jesus was incarnate in sinful flesh, as if all flesh were tainted or corrupt with sin. The Evangelists are very definite about the advent of our Lord as regards the manner of His birth. The holiness of the child is marked both as originated by the Holy Spirit and as itself holy (cf. Lk. 1:35). Our Saviour's flesh was the true, unfallen humanity of the divine intention. Our Lord's body was only 'in the guise of sinful flesh' (Moff.), not in sinful flesh itself which is our legacy from Adam. The Pauline point here is that the Father sent His son to deal with sin in the very same circumstance and sphere in which our human race in Adam had been worsted. This engagement with sin implies all that Jesus was, said and did to condemn sin in His own body on the tree (cf. v. 3, RSV mg. 'as a sin offering', reminiscent of Is. 53:10; cf. also Rom. 3:25; 2 Cor. 5:21). Flesh was the realm of sin; but in the case of believers God put that sphere of influence out of court, the death of the Son annulling the power of sin over saints completely and permanently. Man in Christ is free for ever from the law of sin and death. 4 The just requirement of the law, a righteous life, is accomplished not through the law (for it has failed) but through grace; and the grace of God makes available to the man renewed in Christ the power he needs to translate the law's 'righteous requirement' into action. 'God's commands have now become God's enablings' (Bruce) because the law's exactions, now placed within the Christian as his guide and mentor (fulfilling Je. 31:31ff.), are matched by the promise of the new spirit (also placed within the Christian; Ezk. 36:26f.) which loves to do God's will, and by the indwelling Spirit is enabled to do it.

Notes. 3 The likeness of sinful flesh is a composite phrase which guards against the twin false notions of a. denying a real taking of our human life by the incarnate Son of God (the heresy of Docetism), for one sense of 'likeness' stresses a similarity which borders on identity (as in Rom. 5:14; men did not sin just as Adam did); and b. too close an identity of the incarnate Lord with our fallen nature which would incapacitate Him from being man's Redeemer. Hence the qualifying sinful flesh, which He did not share, else He would not have been 'without sin'. 'The flesh of Christ is "like" ours inasmuch as it is flesh; "like", and only "like", because it is not sinful' (Sanday and Headlam).

8:5–11 The triumph of grace. The apostle proceeds to describe the grace-life as one of the Spirit and to contrast it with the life of the flesh under the law. The old life has its interests and absorptions in fleshly things, but the new in spiritual things. If our life accords with the flesh, the carnal streak will run through our mental outlook. If the spiritual element prevails, the analogous results will be seen in our spiritual alignments. 6 The sum of the matter is to set the mind on the flesh is death, but to set the mind on the Spirit is life and peace. On the one hand death is the result of the flesh-life: on the other life flows from the Spirit-life. The underlying reason is plain. 7 The carnal life is hostile to God, frustrating the divine ideals for humanity. It is self-centred and at war with God. By its very nature it is powerless to submit itself to the law of God. 8 Living in the world of self as supreme it cannot please God. The flesh, in fact, is the seat of revolt against God. John's synonym for the flesh in this Pauline sense is 'the world' (cf. Jn. 16:8–11; 17:6, 9). It is life without God in it: one of egotism, self-indulgence and disobedience to the light of conscience.

9 Paul now turns directly to his readers and addresses them as Christians in whom the Spirit dwells. The motive power behind the spiritual life is the indwelling Holy Spirit. Hence the victory of grace over law; for by grace, through faith, the Spirit is in them and they in the Spirit. Here mark Paul's characteristic preposition 'in', which he uses in the metaphorical sense of union or communion with God in Christ through faith (e.g. 8:11; 9:1; 1 Cor. 3:16; cf. 1 Thes. 4:8). The Spirit of God . . . the Spirit of Christ are used interchangeably, showing the equality and functions of the one Godhead. The Father is the source of all grace; the Son, the channel; the Spirit, proceeding from both the Father and the Son, the agent. The criterion of the Christian is this indwelling, divine motive power, apart from which dynamic there can be no communion with God. 10 Your bodies are dead because of sin. This is true 'in the sense that it is "mortal", "subject to death" ' (Bruce), but not to shed as a useless clog, for the Lord has a purpose for the body, sanctified by His incarnation (Heb. 10:5ff.), indwelt by His Spirit and useful in His service (1 Cor. 6:15ff.), and at last to be raised in a manner patterned on His resurrection (1 Cor. 15:35–55; Phil. 3:21). This teaching may suggest an alternative interpretation of Paul's phrase, making 'dead' refer to the believer's passage out of sin's domain, so that he no longer employs his body as a tool for evil, but regards it as a vehicle of his true life, viz. his spirit which is alive (to God) as conversely his body is dead to sin. Cf. 7:6. This view necessitates the taking of spirits (Gk. is singular, pneuma) of the human spirit, enlivened by the Holy Spirit, though some (e.g. Bruce) prefer to see the Holy Spirit's activity directly mentioned here. Because of sin . . . because of righteousness. This is another way of expressing the triumph of grace over law. Nothing but death is in the old way of sin, but all life pulses through the new way of righteousness, or justification, that stupendous thing which God does for us, in the doing of which we ourselves have neither part nor competence. Such justification, the pure judicial assignment of righteousness to us on God's part, is the basis of such moral righteousness as results from receipt of the blessings of Christ. 11 The statements made about the Spirit are analogous to those made in v. 10 about Christ. This makes the verse most important for the Trinitarian conception of God, so vital and indispensable to true Christian knowledge.

8:12–17 The goal of grace. Vv. 12 and 13 form a hortatory aside. The brethren at Rome are admonished, along with the preacher himself, not to go on living to the lower self, as if that were a necessity (cf. 1:14; 13:8), but to engage in living to the Spirit, causing death to all selfish actions and so gaining, not death, but real life.

14 Sonship with God is the glorious end of all grace's triumph. Led by the Spirit of God; cf. Gal. 5:18. The contrast of slavery – freedom is worked out in Gal. 3:23 – 5:1. The dangers of reverting to a state of slavery to fear (v. 15) are very real. In this Epistle Paul simply assumes that his readers are aware of these tendencies, and will resist them. Those whose lives are controlled by the Spirit are in fact, from the moment of their reception of the Spirit, in filial relationship with the Father. They hold a rank which entitles them to privilege. (Cf. Peter's conception of Christians as a royal priesthood in 1 Pet. 2:9.) 15 The spirit of slavery is neither the human nor the divine spirit, but rather a temper, mood or state. The corresponding phrase the Spirit of sonship is a phrase framed to contrast with 'spirit of slavery', yet in spite of this formal similarity a reference to the Holy Spirit is evidently intended. It is the Spirit who imparts the assurance of sonship and enables believers to call God their Father. Sonship means an adopted state, a position conferred upon one to whom it is not natural. It is by Christ's act of grace that Christians are in such a relationship. The Jews had no such custom of adoption, but it was common to both Romans and Greeks.

Paul does not go out of his way to deny any doctrine of universal fatherhood, but definitely teaches the necessity of Christian sonship, the relationship to God as Father in Jesus Christ through the Holy Spirit. This sonship is no mere official recognition of a filial tie, a title only. It is an actual fact. We are sons with a right to say Abba! Father!, as sharing the sonship of the eternal Son. When we cry—in prayer, though the unusual verb may suggest some public utterance in congregational worship in the early church. Abba, meaning 'dear Father' as an invocation of God, may conceivably be the opening word of the Lord's Prayer (as in Lk. 11:2); whether this is so or not, the name of God as Father certainly goes back to Jesus' own usage of the familiar title which Jewish children used of their earthly father. The precise Aramaic form Abba was avoided in both synagogue and private prayers out of reverential motives, some alternative form (e.g. Abinu, 'our Father') being substituted. Yet Jesus calls God by the homely title (Mk. 14:36); and this usage became indelibly fixed upon the prayer-speech even of Greek-speaking Christians. 16 The cry under intellectual or spiritual emotion reveals the naked soul of the believer and is spontaneously accompanied by the corroborating testimony of the Holy Spirit to real sonship.

17 Paul now advances in his exultant thought, and if children, then heirs (cf. 4:14). The idea of inheritance runs through both OT and NT (cf. Nu. 26:56; Ps. 25:13; Is. 60:21; Mt. 5:5; 21:38; Gal. 3:29; 4:7). The advent of the indwelling Spirit is the earnest, or guarantee, of the believer's inheritance (cf. 2 Cor. 1:22; 5:5; Eph. 1:14). Christ is God's Son, hence we are His fellow-heirs, heirs of God, and fellow heirs with Christ. Christians have a common inheritance with Christ, which they will share in due course. In v. 17b Paul may be quoting a familiar saying of the early church (cf. 2 Tim. 2:11–13) that believers experiencing adoption are co-heirs with Christ if indeed 'they share His sufferings that they may share His glory too'. The Christian's life is a reproduction of the life of Christ. We suffer with him implies the communion of cross-bearing or self-sacrifice; not that our experiences are redemptive in themselves, but we 'complete what is lacking in Christ's afflictions' (see on Col. 1:24).

8:18–27 The glory which shall be revealed. In his ecstasy over the victory of grace Paul has soared far beyond the richest possibilities of law. He is entranced in a realm which the law could never know. 18 The apostle has no doubt about the 'hardness' needed for following Christ (cf. Paul's sufferings in Acts 19:23–41; 20:18–35; 2 Cor. 1:3–11; 6:4–10; 11:23–33). As little does he doubt that the glory to come will far outbalance present sufferings. This future glory or ultimate manifestation of God in Christ will be no mere objective vision alone, but a subjective transformation of the believer's character (cf. 2 Cor. 3:18; 1 Jn. 3:2). The assurance of future glory is not a passing emotion of optimism. Paul confirms his confidence with three testifying facts.

19–22 First he points to the organic unity of creation. Paul here states a scientific fact viewed theologically. Man and nature are so closely related that, as by man's sin nature suffered with him, so by free grace in putting man right with God nature also shares the hope of righteous readjustment or perfect completion. 20 The creation was subject to futility, not of its own will. Man fell of his own free will, but the universe automatically and not voluntarily was corrupted with him, according to the decree of God. Its fate was to be subjected to futility or cursed with dissatisfaction or incompleteness, yet not without hope of deliverance. By the will of him refers most naturally to God, although some scholars argue for an allusion to Adam or Satan; but the concluding mention of hope can really be explained only if it is God who intends creation's final deliverance and restored harmony. 21 The content of that hope is given in the words 'that the creation itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption' (RV). Man's redemption will mean for the whole of groaning nature the fulfilment of the prophecy that the desert shall blossom as the rose. 23 The apostle strikes again the main theme of the passage, that this present grace of possession of the first fruits of the Spirit awaits the future redemption of our bodies. Adoption, already a fact as the Spirit imparts the witness of our sonship (vv. 15, 16), will one day be fully realized at the resurrection. The present possession of the Spirit is a sample (first fruits) of the full harvest to be reaped at the redemption of our bodies. In a like earnest expectation to that of the visible world, Christians who experience the 'first instalment' (the same word is found in 2 Cor. 1:22; 5:5; Eph. 1:14) of the Spirit, the foretaste of His transforming power, also sigh for the deliverance of the body from sin and sin's environment. The resurrection will be the final stage of sonship with God. The passage in 2 Cor. 5:1–10 is closely parallel. Cf. Eph. 4:30.

24, 25 Paul now proceeds to call as his second witness the Christian's conscious hope, which by its very nature proves the reality of future glory. It is another ground of assurance. For in this hope we were saved. Paul, by emphasizing hope in this way, does not thereby discard or minimize the pre-eminent function of faith in the believer's salvation. Some prefer to render 'in hope' (as RSV) so as to avoid misunderstanding, but 'by hope' (AV) and 'through faith' serve the same purpose. Faith is the definite means of salvation and hope can emerge only within the faith-attitude. The point which the apostle is making here is that by its very nature hope testifies to the fact of future glory. Hope is no longer hope if it can realize the consummation for which it looks. Our duty, then, is to wait for the end, to endure, to exercise patience. We are saved, yet full salvation still lies ahead.

26, 27 The help of the Holy Spirit is the third witness to the full realization of adoption, the third ground of assurance that grace will become glory. Likewise the Spirit helps us in our weakness. Paul is fortified in his faith in the believer's final glory by the experience common to all Christians of the Spirit's operation in furthering prayerful aspiration towards the realization of complete adoption as sons of God. If God is thus involved in our movement towards the glorious consummation, then the end is no delusion but a wonderful reality. The term helps (Gk. synantilambanetai) is in the original a very forcible word, being compounded with two prepositions, syn, 'along with' and anti, 'over against', as prefixes to the verb, lambanein, 'to take hold of'. The metaphor is of a helper supporting the weight in co-operation with the bearer and at the opposite end of the burden. Weakness refers to the frailty of the Christian in his ignorance or part comprehension of the will of God, for we do not know how to pray as we ought. Here the specific help of the Spirit is realized. His intercession is within us; the intercession of the Saviour is at God's right hand (Heb. 7:25). The Paraclete, not merely beside us but dwelling within us, strengthens us by energizing and inspiring the inarticulate longings of the soul towards a full sonship of imparted righteousness as the fruit of imputed righteousness. Divine intercession gives utterance to our sighs and the intervention prevails: our great longing for the consummation is borne to the Father's throne. He who searches the hearts is God Himself who is omniscient, knowing the direction and movement of the Spirit in His inspiration of human aspirations. But even more specifically the Father knows this mind of the Spirit, for it is His own mind.

8:28–30 The sovereign will of God guarantees grace. The human and divine Spirit, harmonized into one will, are in fact, Paul asserts in this paragraph, realizing the all-embracing will of God. 28 In view of such divine working in us and on our behalf, we are aware that to them that love God all things co-operate for good, that is, to those who are effectually called according to his purpose. The eternal will is behind the called, who not only hear the call but obey it. The subject of the verb works can hardly be 'all things' as in the familiar AV. The best alternative is to regard the Spirit as subject in both vv. 27, 28 (so NEB, 'he pleads for God's own people in God's own way; and in everything, as we know, he co-operates for good with those who love God'). What is established in the divine foreknowledge and foreordination inevitably reaches the divine goal for the divine glory, which includes the blessed state of the elect. 29 This eternal purpose and plan is to make believers conformed to the image of his Son, who is Himself the perfect image of the Father (cf. 1 Cor. 15:49; 2 Cor. 3:18; 4:4; Col. 1:15), so that He is the firstborn among a host of brethren. First-born implies not mere priority but pre-eminence within the host of redeemed brethren. Paul reveals the stages of the divine decree and its accomplishment. The eternal order operating in space is foreknowledge, then foreordination. The predestination is based upon the 'knowing beforehand'. The several stages thus develop one from another. The term 'to foreknow' (Gk. proginōskō) means 'to unite oneself before with someone' (Cremer, p. 161). The idea is a personal and pre-temporal association, and in the dynamic not static sense, for it is the prolific origin of subsequent activities. Thus 'to foreknow' anyone is to enter into communion with a view to conferring special favour upon him. Here 'to foreordain' decides that this special favour will take the shape of sonship in Christ. Foreknowledge according to the biblical usage of the verb 'know' (cf. Pss. 1:6; 144:3; Ho. 13:5; Am. 3:2; Mt. 7:23; Jn. 10:27; 1 Cor. 8:3; Gal. 4:9) implies favour or grace as the eternal beginning of all the other processes of salvation, an interpretation which accords with the whole Pauline theology. 30 Then the divine decree passes over into time and is manifested as calling, justification by faith, and finally glorification. This miraculous consummation, planned in eternity, is worked out in our earthly experience. It holds promise of an issue in our creaturely praises in the state of sanctification here and glory hereafter. He also glorified. The past tense used of a future event is remarkable; it is probably to be explained as an example of the 'prophetic past', common in the OT to describe the fulfilment of an event which, to the eye of faith, is so certain that it can be regarded as having already occurred even though it belongs to the prophet's future.

8:31–39 A hymn of praise. With a triumphant paean of praise Paul concludes his review of the course of the Christian life, which is lived in a realm beyond the grasp and power of law. If God be in our destiny nothing else matters. To us who are of the faith-family He gave His own Son, and with the greatest gift all else is certainly included. 32 Did not spare his own Son is reminiscent of Abraham's sacrifice (Gn. 22:16). Isaac's willingness to be bound on Mt. Moriah was invested by the Rabbis with atoning efficacy; and Paul draws upon the analogy to emphasize the Father's love and the Son's obedience, which make available a full provision for all the church's need. The apostle continues from this all-inclusive promise of limitless blessing by reverting to his first statement in v. 1. 'There is therefore now no condemnation.' There are two main questions to which the thought of the hymn is subordinated. First, 33 Who shall bring any charge against God's elect? and second, 35 Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? If God justifies, can anyone dare to accuse the chosen of God? And again, if Christ Himself died for the faithful, rose again for them, and now at God's right hand is their continual Advocate, is there any possible power to sever the love-link between the Saviour and the saved? There can be no charges and there can be no dissolution of redemptive bonds. 34 Who is to condemn? is a question answered by the rhetorical Is it Christ Jesus who died . . . ? Cf. Is. 50:8f. Who is at the right hand of God draws upon the oft-quoted testimony of Ps. 110:1, used in the NT of the enthronement and consequent supremacy of Christ over all the church's foes, and the guarantee of God's supply for every need (Eph. 1:20–23).

Paul in his ecstatic confidence now defies every conceivable antagonism. There are two classes of frustrating opponents. 35 First he lists temporal adversities experienced generally by those professing Christ who, suffering with Him, shall also share His glory. The sufferings are real indeed, as the apostle well knows (cf. 16:4; 1 Cor. 4:11; 15:30; 2 Cor. 11:23–27; cf. Acts 12:2), and 36 he quotes to prove his case Ps. 44:22 (LXX). 37 In all these things; i.e. 'despite all these adversities'. Secondly, 38, 39 there are spiritual powers recorded almost with derision because of the futility of their attempts to separate from the love of Christ. AV reads 'powers' after 'principalities', but most modern versions put 'powers' after 'things to come' (cf. NEB). These terms signify the enemies which 1st-century Hellenistic man most feared, summed up in the malevolent control exercised over human life and destiny by the stars and heavenly bodies in the sublunar region. From the tyranny of astrology and the 'loss of nerve' that feared all life was in the grip of a pitiless 'fate', the gospel of God's love and care in Christ came as a great deliverance. Christ has conquered all enemies and put them under His feet. The glorious consummation of this victory is 'that God may be everything to every one' (cf. 1 Cor. 15:24–28).

9:1 - 11:36 THE PROBLEM OF JEWISH RIGHTS AND PRIVILEGE

Paul at this point appears to have reached his climax and all is ready for the practical application of his teaching on how to be right with God and how to keep in the same reconciled relationship. He has successively expounded the doctrines of justification, sanctification and glorification. But there emerges another problem, the Jewish question. The apostle must have faced this difficulty many times. Stated simply it is this: This new gospel of 'faith-righteousness' in place of 'law-righteousness', which opens the door of salvation for the Gentiles, abolishes the covenant rights and privileges of the Jewish race and, moreover, passes them by as the channels of revelation. The Jews are not only reduced in the order of grace but altogether rejected. What value has their history been and what is their future to be? Historical facts and the Pauline gospel do not appear to agree; hence the apostle's gospel of a new way of life must be false. No preaching could alter the place of the Jews in God's revelation.

Paul felt this objection keenly. It meant that he was accused of being no genuine apostle and his gospel was being treated as entirely untrue. This was not, however, the sharpest sorrow. The tragedy of the Jews was that they had been left outside the progressive revelation of God and cut off from the economy of grace. He therefore addresses himself to this historical problem. It was obvious that the people of God were losing their place in the kingdom and that the Gentiles were now filling it. The gospel given to the heathen people was being readily received and it appeared as if Israel was now neither being saved nor being serviceable. When the Gentiles were in their sin, Israel had the revelation of God. They were God's own chosen people. Elected and rejected! How can this be? He essays the solution in three assertions. The first deals with the absolute sovereignty of God (9:1–29), the second with Jewish responsibility in the historical situation (9:30 – 10:21), and the third with the merciful purpose of God (11:1–36).

9:1–29 The absolute sovereignty of God

9:1–5 Paul's personal sorrow. As a preface to dealing with the main problem, Paul expresses his own anguish at the state of the Jews. 1 I am speaking the truth in Christ. This is the apostle's solemn oath. His Judaistic adversaries charged him with insincerity; hence his vehement defence. In it he reveals himself as a true patriot. 3 Moses' solemn adjuration (Ex. 32:32) may be in the apostle's mind. He loved his race and was unashamed to call them my brethren, my kinsmen by race. 4, 5 He is proud of the Jewish privileges and recounts them with a certain flourish, the greatest of all being that Christ sprang from the Jewish stock. The sonship refers to Israel's place as Yahweh's people (Ex. 4:22f.; Ho. 11:1). The glory, the OT Shekinah, denotes God's radiant presence with His people in their pilgrimage and at worship. The promises are presumably the Messianic prefigurations of what God intended for His people, especially the provision of a righteousness-by-faith, exemplified in the promise to Abraham and his family and now made good in Christ and His church (cf. 4:13–21). 5 God who is over all be blessed for ever. Cf. AV and contrast RSV mg. and RV mg. 'Beyond all fair question, the Greek here (in view of the usual order of words in ascriptions of praise) is certainly best rendered as in AV; had it not been for controversy, probably, no other rendering would have been suggested' (Moule). An even more telling point in favour of the ascription of the phrase to Christ is that some such designation of the Lord as 'God over all' seems required to balance according to the flesh, i.e. as regards His human descent. Paul complements this with a statement: as regards His eternal being, He is God . . . over all (so Bruce, and Cullmann, The Christology of the New Testament, 1959, p. 313).

9:6–13 God is not unfaithful in His promises. This is the substance of the first objection. 6 Paul begins his reply by denying that the word of God had failed. The promises which he has already mentioned (v. 4) are not broken but fulfilled to the true Israel. The distinction between a racial and a real claim to belong to the elect people of Israel has already been registered in 2:28f.; and the distinction between the patriarchal lines through Abraham–Isaac and Abraham–Ishmael is elaborated in Gal. 4:22–31, with the same contrast (v. 8) between 'children of the flesh' and 'children of the promise' (cf. on v. 4). God's Israel is henceforth contrasted with Judaism, hitherto the official heir of Abraham, but now rejected owing to its lack of faith and its refusal to accept the claims of the Messiah. 7, 8 The apostle makes his point by distinguishing between spiritual and carnal sonship with illustrations from the patriarchal history. Had history given the whole Jewish race a claim upon God, reversing what seems more normal, God's claim upon them? Because they were the seed of Abraham are all Jews the children of God? Paul declares that God in the exercise of His sovereign will has decreed that faith, not heredity, is the eternal principle of sonship. 9, 10 Within God's redemptive purpose the actual promises of God to Sarah and Rebecca were fulfilled. God was free to exercise His selective grace in the case of the patriarchs, for He alone is the originator of its purpose. 11, 12 Righteousness then is not because of works but because of his call, thus excluding all human merit. Jacob and Esau were not differentiated on the ground of their life and character, for Jacob was chosen before the twins were born. 13 Jacob I loved, but Esau I hated must be interpreted in the sense of nations, not individuals, which is the original reference in the two OT quotations (Gn. 25:23; Mal. 1:2, 3). The nations of Israel and Edom are in view, not Jacob and Esau as individual men, whose names occur as eponymous ancestors of the later tribes. Edom had called down on itself the divine judgment, as the OT makes plain (Ps. 137:7; Is. 34:5ff.; Je. 49:7ff.; Ezk. 25:12ff.; 35:1ff.; Ob. 10ff.). Moreover, 'love' and 'hate' are not the grounds of election as we understand these subjective feelings. God is not arbitrary in His choice and cannot be charged with irrational favouritism. The emotional terms indicate rather a special function and destiny. Judah, not Edom, was elected for progressive revelation in history. This meaning may be supported by the rendering 'Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I loved less' (cf. Gn. 29:30–33; Mt. 10:37; Lk. 14:26; Jn. 12:25).

9:14–24 God is not unrighteous in His dealing. The Judaistic objector (real or imaginary) now advances his accusation that if Paul's gospel is true then God has been unrighteous. 14–18 Paul deals first with the suggestion that God is unfair in His choice. 14 He expresses himself vehemently in his categorical denial of this charge: By no means! (AV 'God forbid'). Let no-one say this! 15 Mercy and pity are entirely of God. So much is this so that we cannot understand, but can only accept their incidence as being His will. This is no new doctrine. It was revealed of old time to Moses (Ex. 33:19, LXX). 16 Neither human purpose nor human effort enters into divine election. It depends not upon man's will or exertion. God alone acts alone. It just is, and no human can hinder it! 17 The scripture, almost personified here, in mind is

Ex. 9:16 referring to the Egyptian ruler Pharaoh Rameses II, whom God raised up so that he played a positive part in His purpose. 'How could God's power be revealed, and how could His name be spread abroad, if it were not for Pharaoh?' (Barrett). Pharaoh is but a medium to enable God to display His power in that monarch and to publish His own holy name far and near. Of His own will absolutely God shows mercy; of the same will He hardens men. 18 Echoing Ex. 33:19 as well as Ex. 7:3; 9:12; 14:4, 17, Paul's references to God's actions of mercy and judgment must be taken together. No-one objects when God is merciful; by parity of reasoning, no-one should boggle if His mercy, rejected and disowned, wears an aspect of wrath. Note that the verb used for wills is thelō, not boulomai. The latter is the firm term for will denoting determined purpose. Paul uses it sparingly and prefers the former word, as here, which permits a bigger background in the divine character than bare volition (cf. Eph. 1:5, 11). It is God as our Father in Christ Jesus who wills one way or the other, not stark, cold, divine will. In a word it is God who wills, not an unknown Will that wills.

19–24 Paul now proceeds to deal with the charge that, if what he has said is true, then God is unjust to blame. If God is absolutely free to elect for better or worse, as Paul has now demonstrated, what of human responsibility? 19 'Since none can withstand this omnipotent divine will, sin is not voluntary; hence the sinner is not blameworthy'; so ran the implied objection. 20 Paul replies that this argument is out of court. The creature may not find fault with the Creator, although the reverse stands. Who is anyone to 'speak back' to God? The thing moulded simply cannot quarrel with God over its formation. 21 The apostle introduces the illustration of the potter and the clay (cf. Is. 29:16; 45:9, 10; 64:8; Je. 18:6). It is the potter's prerogative to make out of the same lump of clay one vessel for beauty and another for menial use, one a work of supreme art and another a homely article. Cf. 2 Tim. 2:20. 'What answer will you make now?' Paul challenges his opponent. If God wishes, on the one hand, to display His wrath and manifest His power, that is His will and He will await His time to reveal it. If God wishes, on the other hand, to publish His mercy in His election to salvation, that is again a matter of His good pleasure.

22, 23 The contrast is vividly expressed in the terms vessels of wrath and vessels of mercy. The sovereign will of God in relation to the latter is an eternal preparation for glory. Can it be likewise interpreted that the former are predestined pre-temporally to destruction? The vessels of wrath are the disobedient, with whom God is justly angry and upon whom there comes the nemesis for sin. Are they also prepared beforehand for eternal loss? Note, in the first place, that the two verbs are themselves different. The vessels of mercy are prepared beforehand (Gk. proētoimasen), while the vessels of wrath are made for (Gk. katērtismena; lit. to render 'fit' or 'complete', with the perfect participle giving a sense of 'equipped' or 'perfected'). God is not stated to be the agent of the 'fitting'. The condition is stated simply as historical fact. Hence some would prefer the rendering 'fit for destruction', i.e. 'ripe and ready for destruction' (Moff.). Secondly, note that the prefixes of the two parallel verbs are different—pro, signifying beforehand, and kata, signifying intensity of the action of the verb. It is legitimate to deduce from this that in the case of the disobedient the stress on the eternal aspect is missing. The mystery of predestination must remain, yet there appears here no warrant for any dogma of predestination to damnation, while the parallel foreordination to glory is stated with no uncertainty. In the third place it seems clear from Paul's language and thought that, while in the case of the vessels of mercy God's action was pre-preparation, in the case of the vessels of wrath He took no action but endured with much patience. He was active on the one hand and passive on the other. 'God has tolerated most patiently the objects of his anger' (Moff.). Paul thus leaves his opponent without an answer; for no mortal man can reply either to the right of God in election or to His exercise of that right. There is no answer; but nevertheless the character of God remains irreproachable.

9:25–29 God's election confirmed by the Scriptures. In this whole section dealing with the Jewish question the apostle probably has in mind more particularly the Jewish Christians in Rome. He therefore turns naturally to the law and the testimony for confirmation of the statements he has made. To corroborate his conclusion that the divine will is absolutely free to include Gentiles and reject Jews, and to create an election within the election, Paul quotes freely first from Ho. 2:23 (LXX) and 1:10 (LXX) and secondly from Is. 10:22, 23 (LXX) and 1:9. Here the doctrine of 'the remnant' is introduced to be treated further in 11:1–10 (where see notes).

9:30 – 10:21 Jewish responsibility in the historical situation

In this defence of the legitimacy of his gospel, the gist of which was the new way of justification by faith, not works, Paul has routed all charges by the thunder of a high and inscrutable predestination. His opponent is silenced, but the apostle feels that the Jew will now take refuge in an attitude of fatalism. To avoid a drift into determinism Paul now turns to examine the question of human responsibility. The Jewish question is therefore reviewed, not now from the divine standpoint as previously, but from the human standpoint. Paul asserts that the Jews themselves are to blame for their rejection by God as the media of revelation to the world and (which is even more tragic) as sons of God themselves.

9:30 – 10:13 The Jews sought law-righteousness instead of faith-righteousness. The Jews are responsible for their own apostasy. It is they who reject God, not God who rejects them. A vivid contrast is drawn between the Gentiles who had only the light of conscience and the Jews who possessed a special revelation. The one secured salvation by faith, even acceptance by God; the other lost the way of life by relying upon the observance of law. 32 They have stumbled over (i.e. 'took active offence at' or 'showed irritation at') the stumbling stone (i.e. 'the stone which causes stumbling or offence'). The reference is partly to the cross (1 Cor. 1:23), a seeming shame which the Jews could not endure as being the destiny of their Messiah (because of the rubric which pronounced a crucified man under God's curse, Dt. 21:23; cf. Gal. 3:13); more likely, however, Paul's conclusion embraces the failure of the Jews to understand the offer of righteousness-by-faith, apart from the law. 33 The historical background to this citation is Is. 8:13–15, where the Assyrian invasion is foretold and the one place of refuge promised is God Himself whose word is to be trusted (Is. 8:17). The alternative is to court national and personal disaster as the invader sweeps down on the people; then the very provision of God, once spurned, becomes an occasion of ruin as God's faithless people are dashed against the rock which He had appointed for safety. A similar setting is to be understood in Is. 28:16.

Paul cannot get over the plight of the Jews. 10:1 His heart's desire, longingly laid before God, is for their salvation. 2 Their appetite for religion is strong. But this zest is not enlightened; 3 their action arises from their being ignorant. Paul does not mean that the Jews are unenlightened (RSV is misleading here; NEB 'ill-informed' is only a slight improvement. Moff. 'ignorant' is what is needed) and without revelation of the righteousness of God. Rather they have not paid careful attention to (Gk. epignōsis) and have ignored (Gk. agnoeō) God's righteousness. Their ignorance is culpable. Their keenness is not in question; but they have not fully grasped the crucial point that God has a righteousness above the righteousness of the law. 4 They do not see that Christ is the end of the law, now superseding its sway and gaining its goal. Christ is the real righteousness; that of the Mosaic law might be enough if it could be kept, for law-righteousness must be kept (see v. 5). But faith-righteousness is a thing totally other. It is applied righteousness when applied by God to man.

Christ is the end (Gk. telos) of the law is an important Pauline dictum, capable of diverse meanings. The crux is whether the Greek words rendered 'for righteousness' (AV) go with 'Christ' who thus fulfils the law and provides a righteousness available to all believers, or with 'law' (so NEB mg. 'Christ is the end of the law as a way to righteousness for everyone who has faith'). The latter would make Paul utter a truism, viz. Christ makes an end (telos) of legalism; but legalism has never been viable for Christ to terminate it, except in the preaching of Judaizers. The former interpretation makes Christ the goal to which the law points (as in 3:21). He ushers in a new era, and so renders the law as a way to obtain righteousness otiose. Obviously there is ambiguity here and it is hard to decide between the two views, but the NEB text ('Christ ends the law and brings righteousness for everyone who has faith') seems preferable. (See C. F. D. Moule in Christian History and its Interpretation, 1967, pp. 401ff. In this volume there is also a good discussion of Paul's use of Dt. 30:11–14 (in vv. 6–8) in the light of his Christ–wisdom contrast.) The Jews equated law and wisdom as media of divine revelation; Paul counters the implied claim by associating Christ with heavenly wisdom (thought to be inaccessible to mortals but entrusted to Israel as a precious heritage). So 'righteousness based on faith does not annul the law but brings it to its true goal, for "the word of faith which we preach" is Jesus Christ, incarnate wisdom', the goal of the law (M. J. Suggs, op. cit., p. 311). So NEB text (quoted above). C. E. B. Cranfield's rendering (cited by Moule) is even clearer: 'for Christ is the goal of the law, so that righteousness is available to everyone that believeth.'

Paul now portrays for his readers the divine method. 5–10 His first point is that the way of salvation is not difficult and remote but near and easy. He quotes from Dt. 30:11–14 and places an interpretation on the words with reference to Christ which he is careful to indicate. Christ is ever available to faith and so likewise is the gospel. 9, 10 indicate the form taken by the earliest Christian creed. Cf. Paul's reply to the question of the Philippian jailer in Acts 16:31. Salvation is a matter of personal trust in a living Saviour, which will be evidenced by open confession made in baptism. These actions of belief and witness are complementary and Paul could hardly envisage one existing without the other. 11 The quotation is repeated from 9:33 and is itself taken from Is. 28:16. It follows naturally on the thought that those who believe will also be proud to confess. 11–13 Paul then picks on the word No one . . . will be put to shame to introduce his second point, that the way of salvation is within the reach of all, Jew and Gentile alike. 13 This universality of the gospel is emphasized by a further quotation from Joel 2:32 which leads inevitably to the conclusion that, if they do not call upon the name of the Lord, the Jews are themselves responsible for their fate.

10:14–21 The Jews are without excuse in their unbelief. Israel cannot validly object that there has been lack of opportunity or warning. 14–18 In the first place the gospel, this righteousness of God by faith, has been universally preached. The Jews may allege, by way of exoneration of their unbelief, that the preaching of the gospel has never reached them. 14 Call upon picks up the phrase of v. 13 (from Joel 2:32). To invoke the name of God is no formality nor 'knowing how to use the right religious formula' (Barrett); it means trusting the Person whose name is invoked and (as an OT phrase) committing one's way of life to God's service (Gn. 4:26; 21:33). Paul replies by a series of questions and answers laced with the words of prophecy (see Is. 52:7; 53:1; Ps. 19:4). 15 The first quotation is drawn from Is. 52:7 which Paul freely translates from the Hebrew text. The picture of the herald announcing the promise of Israel's restoration from Babylonian exile becomes, for him, an adumbration of the good news of God's mercy in reclaiming sinners and restoring them to His family through Christ. 16 But, as in Israel's history, good news is often met with incredulity, especially when it is unexpected and dramatic. The 'suffering Servant' of Is. 52:13 – 53:12 had to endure rejection and humiliation; and Paul sees a re-enactment of this failure to understand and accept God's message in the obduracy of the Jews of his day. 17 The desired response to the preaching of Christ (i.e. the gospel proclamation) is faith, noticeably lacking in the Jews' claim to a righteousness before God (9:31, 32). 19–21 In the second place lawgiver and prophet alike have issued a warning that Israel would reject God's message. The Jews cannot plead ignorance of their attitude. They cannot say it was not told them. God provoked this nation and angered it by what was not a nation, a nation void of understanding. Not a nation is a subtle play on words, combining Dt. 32:21 and Ho. 2:23. The Gentiles are meant, who are also spoken of as foolish, i.e. denied the true knowledge of God. 20 And Isaiah, who asserts that God was found by them that sought Him not, and revealed to them that did not ask for Him (Is. 65:1), has recorded that Israel, on the contrary, rebuffed God's approach by their disobedience and contradiction.

11:1–36 The merciful purpose of God

Paul now proceeds to consider more carefully whether the historical fact of the apostasy of the Jews and their consequent dereliction by God does necessarily amount to a final, absolute rejection of Israel. He comes to the conclusion that it does not, and glows with hope as he reasserts the fact of the believing remnant, the election within the election. Further, he is confident that, as the Jews have led to the conversion of the Gentiles, so the Gentiles will be the agents of the conversion of the Jews. The issue of the divine purpose will be to include all under grace.

11:1–10 The rejection of the Jews is partial, not complete. 1 Has God rejected his people? By no means! The apostle with some heat repudiates the very idea that the disobedience of Israel was tantamount to God's rejection of His own people. It may have appeared as if this were indeed the end of Paul's argument, but the apostle rejects it in strong language. The idea of an all-inclusive casting away of God's own chosen and favoured people is as blasphemous to him as to the Judaizers. God did not wholly reject. The issue of a total abandonment, which the historical situation seemed also to uphold, was avoided by reference to the past as well as a plain insistence that Paul himself bore witness to a continuing remnant of believing Jews. His autobiography elsewhere confirms these details (2 Cor. 11:22; Phil. 3:5). 2 Paul then selects the case of Elijah (1 Ki. 19). Of Elijah (lit. 'in Elijah') can mean either 'in the passage of the OT to do with Elijah' or (more likely) 'in regard to Elijah's case', which is held up as a pattern. It is parallel to the present situation. The prophet had good cause to condemn Israel then and to despair of its destiny; but God corrected his pessimism by the revelation of the remnant. 4 However stubborn a people may be at any time, there is always room for God's elected remnant. The faithful in Israel at the time of Ahab's apostasy are appealed to as proof that God never totally abandons His people. 5 And that He does reserve a nucleus is a sign of grace, not human deserving. God still had grace for Israel. Election is by grace. 6 If it were of works, there could be no grace. 7 The elect obtained it, but the rest were hardened. Israel as a whole failed to get right with God, but the true election secured this righteousness of God. The rest were hardened according to the purpose of God (cf. 9:18); i.e. 8 a spirit of stupor (cf. Is. 29:10) was given them, a sort of spiritual insensibility. 9, 10 By quoting Ps. 69:22, 23 Paul places them on a level with David's own adversaries. The use of Ps. 69 is amply attested in the early church, especially in reference to the Lord's passion. The point here is that, as David knew enemies whose evil plans needed to be checked, so the greater David encounters in His offer to Israel through the church a spirit of rejection, except for the response of the believing remnant. But, Paul goes on, this is not the final verdict on Israel.

11:11–15 The rejection of the Jews is only temporary, not final. 11 Again pressing the high predestination of God, the objector seems to ask, 'Was it the purpose of God to make the Jews stumble in order that they might fall? Did the Almighty cause this irretrievable tragedy?' Paul once more protests By no means! The fall was not an end in itself but had in view a larger issue. The ruin of Israel was not final. One great result of their defection is the salvation of the Gentiles which is, in its turn, a goad to Israel's jealousy. The apostle still abjured any facile dogmatism such as his adversaries would spin from the situation. He still falls back upon an ultimate justification of God against plain appearances. 12 If Israel's trespass is the world's wealth and their loss the Gentiles' gain, then, a fortiori, a much greater blessing may be anticipated from their return. The word trespass (Gk. paraptōma) is a moral concept; hence full inclusion (Gk. plērōma) must also have an ethical meaning, although the Greek term is quite neutral, signifying 'completeness'. The context suggests a perfect consummation of faith, a spiritual goal which does not exclude material success. 13 What Paul is saying is addressed to the Gentiles. But he wants them to understand that one of the reasons why he makes so much of his special commission as an apostle to them is that his brethren may be made jealous and in this way find salvation for themselves. 'The large-scale conversion of the Gentile world is to be followed by the large-scale conversion of Israel (cf. verse 26)' (Bruce). 13–15 thus repeat the thought of vv. 11 and 12. 15 The description of this recovery of Israel as life from the dead may suggest that it will take place as part of the preparatory events leading up to Christ's return and the resurrection of the dead. Cf. Ezk. 37:1–14. This idea of the interaction between Jews and Gentiles is then further enlarged by an illustration.

11:16–24 The figure of the olive-tree. Paul begins with two metaphors in his mind: the piece of dough offered as a heave-offering (Nu. 15:17–21) consecrating the whole, and the holy root consecrating the branches. He passes over the first, however, and develops only the second (cf. Je. 11:16; Ho. 14:6). 16 The metaphor of the first fruits (in Lv. 23:10ff. as well as in Nu. 15) is taken by Paul to apply to the risen life of Christ, which promises the resurrection of all His people (1 Cor. 15:20ff.). Here the application is to the Jewish-Christian ecclēsiola which presages the full ecclēsia of God to be realized when God's purposes for Jews and Gentiles are completed. 17–24 The figure of the olive tree serves the twofold purpose of warning the Gentiles against boastful pride, and of substantiating Paul's Jewish optimism. The Gentiles are prone to adopt a supercilious attitude towards the Jews because of the gift of the righteousness of God by faith which they have received. Paul therefore applies the illustration first to them. 17 It happens that branches are broken off, and wild olive strains are grafted in their place. A wild olive shoot, i.e. Gentile Christians, inserted into the purpose of God's redeeming grace. 18 In consequence the grafted shoots feed on the fatness of the original roots. Hence Paul insists that Gentiles should not boast themselves as the olive's branches, for the branches are supported by the root and not vice versa. Gentile believers were evidently prone to congratulate themselves on their good fortune in being incorporated into the church, and 19 despised the faithless Jews whose place they were taking. 20 Paul counters this false spirit, as in Eph. 2:11ff. So do not become proud, but stand in awe. 21 God punished the Jews, the natural branches. 22 Therefore the apostle warns the Gentiles, the grafted branches, lest this severity take the place of His goodness toward them. All Christians hold their place in God's family by His grace, the counterpart of which is an obedience to Him which shows itself in continuance in that grace. Cf. 1 Cor. 10:12. 23, 24 Paul then applies his illustration to the Jews. His hope for their future is presented as being perfectly natural by the a fortiori argument of how much more can the natural branches, once cut off, be grafted back into their own olive-tree. If only Israel would give up their persistent unbelief, God has the power to graft them in again. Here Paul implies a spiritual, if not a horticultural, reality; the original branches are more akin to the tree than the wild shoots and should therefore be easier to graft into the stock from which they were originally taken. Contrary to nature. Ordinarily a farmer would take slips from a cultivated tree and graft them into a wild plant, thus producing a new fruit-bearing plant. Paul pictures God working the other way; and admits to the strangeness of this procedure. 'He is arguing from God to nature, not from nature to God' (Barrett).

11:25–32 The fullness of both Jew and Gentile. Thus may be seen, Paul continues, the purpose of God working upwards through apparent severity to a beneficent goal, the restoration of all. 25 He calls attention to this mystery. In Paul's period, the age of 'the mystery religions', the meaning of the word was a secret known only by the initiated. But by the term as applied to the Christian faith Paul means a secret, hidden in the past, but now revealed openly (cf. 16:25; 1 Cor. 2:7; Eph. 6:19; Col. 2:2; 1 Tim. 3:9). Here the particular sense of the mystery is the new light shed upon the unbelief of the Jews, as in Eph. 3:3ff.; Col. 1:26f. where the 'mystery' entails the special revelation to Paul of the universal church, comprising Jews and Gentiles in one body. The historical situation was now to be viewed with a different interpretation. This defect of Israel was not to be their last condition; for restoration was the divine will. The apostle desires the Jews to mark well this issue, lest in the pride of their own wisdom they arrive at the wrong conclusion. A hardening; Gk. pōrōsis, from pōros, a stone, hence 'a covering with a callus'. Here the agent of the hardening is not mentioned. It is merely a historical fact morally interpreted. The partial hardening of Israel finally issues in their salvation as eternally decreed. Until the full number of the Gentiles; i.e. until the 'great multitude' of Rev. 7:9 is complete. The suggestion is that there will be little response to the gospel on the part of the Jews while the Gentiles are being brought into the kingdom. 26 And so all Israel will be saved. This conclusion taken together with v. 32, that he may have mercy upon all, is not infrequently interpreted as Pauline universalism. In what sense does the apostle use such terms? In v. 32 the word all evidently refers to the unbelieving Jews and the unbelieving Gentiles who have now come into the kingdom by their repentance and faith. In v. 26 all Israel could mean either the true spiritual Israel or the people taken as a race. Some commentators, bearing in mind statements such as those in 9:6–8 in which Paul stresses the spiritual nature of the true Israel, interpret the word here as referring to the true and eternal seed of Abraham which includes, of course, both Jews and Gentiles (cf. Gal. 6:16). Others point out that in the following verses Paul seems to have clearly in mind the Jews as a race and feel that 'Israel' must therefore be interpreted in this sense in v. 26. In that case Paul is envisaging a future from the 'present time' of v. 5 until the historical Israel is saved. Some, again, would interpret this of the Jewish nation as a whole. Others feel that the phrase should not be regarded as so all-embracing and that it has the same meaning in relation to the Jews as has the term 'fullness of the Gentiles' in relation to non-Jews; i.e. all means 'all those who, in the purpose of God, will turn in faith to Christ'. Evidence for this view is found in the use of the phrase, current in Paul's day, 'All Israel'. The Rabbis used this to stress the totality of Israel without necessarily implying every single individual in the whole. It means 'all—except those not included' for various reasons, usually because they chose to contract out by their sinful practices (as in Mishnah, Sanhedrin 10:1ff.). This view seems to be the best background of Paul's thinking (so Sanday and Headlam; J. Munck, Christ and Israel, ET 1967, p. 136). To interpret it as referring to a universal salvation conferred upon men and women in view of their physical birth irrespective of their belief would be to contradict what Paul has plainly taught elsewhere (see, e.g., 2:28, 29). 29 The gifts and the call of God are irrevocable; i.e. the unchanging God never regrets His promises or falters in His purpose, a fact which in vv. 26 and 27 Paul corroborates from Is. 59:20, 21 and 27:9. From the gospel standpoint the Jews are objects of God's hostility, they are enemies (v. 28); but from the point of view of 'the election' they are beloved. Actively and at the 'present time' the Jews are against Christ in the Gentile interest; passively, i.e. on historical considerations, they are beloved in the covenant sense. Disobedience characterizes both Jews and Gentiles in God's sight and even in this there is a purpose; it is so that God may have mercy on both, for neither party can really claim any pre-eminence over the other. Mercy apart, there is nothing for either Jew or Gentile. 32 All men . . . upon all. The universalistic references are probably to be understood in a representative sense, as in Col. 1:23, i.e. all without distinction, not all without exception (cf. Jn. 12:32; 1 Tim. 2:4). See on v. 26 above.

11:33–36 Doxology. The apostle has now ended his argument. He has vindicated the justice and mercy of God in the rejection of the Jews and the election of the Gentiles on the basis of the merciful purpose of God. He has shown how even unbelief and sin are overruled for good. Paul ceases his arguing and concludes with praise. The eternal decrees of God are beyond man's understanding, but they are both wise and good. The divine acts are all-mysterious. If God condemns, who shall question or annul the decree? We behold His works in redemption, but the 'how' of them utterly baffles; for, after all, He is God unsearchable, inscrutable. All things originate from Him, continue through Him, and find their consummation in or for Him, for His glory. This ascription of praise is called forth from the apostle's heart, though the language he employs is drawn 34, 35 partly from the OT (Is. 40:13; Jb. 35:7; 41:11) and 36 partly from the liturgical vocabulary of the early church, which veils a Trinitarian ascription (see G. Bornkamm's study of the verse in Das Ende des Gesetzes, 1961, pp. 70–75).

12:1 – 15:13 CHRISTIANITY IN PRACTICE

The apostle has completed the doctrinal sections of the Epistle dealing with principles and problems. He has set forth how to get right and how to keep right with God. He has defended this free righteousness of God against all objections. Now he seeks to explain the life of faith in practice and to impress upon his readers the duty of Christian living. The righteousness of God accepted by the believer is an inward experience which must have an outward expression. The therefore of v. 1 marks the transition from the defended doctrines of justification, sanctification and election to applied Christianity. At root the Christian life is one consecrated to God, lived not in conformity to the world but in 'transformity' to God. The apostle's approach to the Roman Christians is a model for all true preachers. 1 I appeal to you therefore, brethren; cf. for the same appeal Eph. 4:1; 1 Tim. 2:1; 1 Cor. 4:16. Note that the mercies of God form the ground of the appeal. They are collectively all that Paul has described in God's compassionate dealing with sinners of both parties, Jews and Gentiles. The demand is for a spiritual worship in contrast to the sacrifice of brute beasts, a moral rather than a ceremonial surrender to God (cf. 1 Pet. 2:5). Paul is contrasting the worship which expresses the gospel under the new covenant with 'the externalities of Israel's temple worship' (Bruce), but this statement of true worship as embracing the whole of the Christian's life from day to day does not exclude the importance of congregational assembly which is worship's focal point. This consecration involves both body and mind. Paul urges the Roman Christians to present their bodies, i.e. themselves as living persons; but the use of the verb present (which is the same as 'yield' in 6:13, 19) may be occasioned by an existing tendency to belittle the flesh and to abuse the earthly temple as evil in essence. The Christian view of the body as sacred and as the servant of the soul is unique among the religions of the world, Judaism excepted. The yielding of the life in holy living is well-pleasing to God (cf. 14:18; Phil. 4:18). 2 This living sacrifice also includes the mind which, however, must first be renewed before it can be offered. This is a miracle of transformation, a readjustment to both temporal and eternal realities. The ideas conveyed by the terms used to express nonconformity and transformation are striking. The first has the root schēma, implying external semblance; the other is derived from morphē, meaning essential and radical likeness. But it is doubtful if a rigid distinction between these Greek terms ought to be pressed. AV and RSV 'conform' and 'transform' adequately represent Paul's meaning (see C. E. B. Cranfield, A Commentary on Romans 12-13, 1965, pp. 15ff.). The consequence is the recognition of God's will as right and fit and ideal.

After this exordium dealing with the fundamental principle of Christian living, self-sacrifice and devotion to God, the apostle proceeds to apply the law in four main sections of exhortation.

12:3–21 Personal ethics

In this section the apostle evidently has in mind relations with both Christians and pagans. His admonitions are given spontaneously without any attempt at logical presentation; yet many characteristically group themselves together.

12:3–8 The exercise of gifts. 3 By the grace given to me; Moff. 'in virtue of my office'. Paul declares that talents which come from God ought to be used with humility. He who is specially endowed is tempted to fancy himself and become self-important; hence the apostle warns that such must take himself seriously and avoid conceit. The sane view is grounded on the fact of the givenness of gifts from God and on the truth of mutual interdependence, each according to the measure of faith which God has assigned him; i.e. every Christian ought not to be conceited in his self-estimate, but to think of himself and his gift with sober judgment, measuring himself by the standard which God has given him in his faith. 4, 5 This latter idea of faith-distribution as the norm of endowments leads the apostle to refer to the figure of the body and its members (cf. 1 Cor. 12:12; Eph. 4:16; Col. 1:18). He is clearly thinking of the Christian community as a social organism with the various members co-operating in mutual service. 6–8 There follows a list of seven illustrative gifts functionally correlated. Prophecy, i.e. inspired utterance of truth, or preaching (cf. 1 Cor. 14:3), is to be exercised in proportion to our faith. This phrase may be taken in two ways: either 'drawing upon the prophetic inspiration of the Spirit' and so controlling the utterance to the limits of that inspiration, or 'in agreement with the standard of faith' contained in the apostolic gospel. The latter is preferable. Service (i.e. deacons' work, service in things material rather than spiritual), teaching and exhortation are three gifts which are to be used each in its place; otherwise they will be ineffectual. Giving or contributing is to be exercised in liberality, i.e. without any parade (cf. 2 Cor. 9:7, 13; Jas. 1:5) and purely because of the need for the gift. He who gives aid (Gk. ho proistamenos) represents a term which older commentators (Origen, Calvin) took to mean 'a ruler over congregational life' (so AV 'he that ruleth'); but more probably it stands for 'the administrator in charge of the charitable work of the congregation' (Cranfield; RSV agrees). He who does acts of mercy, i.e. is active in glad ministry to others (Moff. renders 'the sick visitor must be cheerful'). The phrase expresses the general idea of Christian kindness, as do no fewer than four of the seven 'special gifts' referred to in vv. 6–8.

12:9–13 The law of love expressed in various activities. Love, which is really the ruling principle of Christian living, is more than an emotion and of firmer nature than mere sentimentality or pure philanthropy. The Greek term agapē implies a quota of intellect and volition as well as feeling. It is akin to the divine quality behind 'the mercies of God' (v. 1) and all His redemptive intervention in the destinies of a lost world. 9 If this love be genuine, i.e. void of hypocrisy and pure and sincere in its outflowing, then it will find activity in various forms. Love will produce loathing of evil and hungering after good. 10 Also it will inspire a mutual affection for kindred souls. Outdo one another in showing honour is a phrase capable of several possible interpretations. It may mean putting the interests of others before our own, or being forward to pay honour to others, or eagerly surpassing others in praiseworthy works. The first meaning—'honour your fellow-Christian above yourself'—is argued for by Cranfield on the (theological) ground that the fellow-believer is the representative of Christ to me, or rather the one in whom Christ is mysteriously present for me. 11 Never flag in zeal appears to refer to the service of God and our neighbours, linked as a common responsibility. The idea is that love, if allowed to rule, will never allow enthusiasm to flag. Be aglow with the Spirit is memorably rendered by Moffatt as 'maintain the spiritual glow', the reference being not to the divine but the human spirit. But RSV assumes the divine Spirit, and some scholars rightly relate this fervency (cf. AV) to the Spirit's action in the believer (so Calvin, Bruce, Cranfield; cf. Acts 18:25; 1 Thes. 5:19). Serve the Lord; i.e. the Lord Jesus Christ. Some MSS read tō(i) kairō(i) for tō(i) Kyriō(i), hence the rendering 'serving the opportunity' (RV mg.; cf. Eph. 5:16). But this reading of the Western textual tradition is certainly to be rejected and regarded as 'a purely accidental error, perhaps due to the use of abbreviations' when the Greek consonants only were written (Cranfield). 12, 13 The apostle continues the manifold manifestations of the dynamic of love in Christian living by citing cheerfulness in the reality of the Christian hope, endurance in suffering, perseverance in prayer, sharing the needs of Christian brethren and the practice of hospitality.

12:14–21 Additional maxims of Christian ethics. In this further list of moral precepts Paul may have non-Christians more in mind. Some certainly are definitely relative to those outside the fellowship of the church. 14 echoes our Lord's teaching in the Sermon on the Mount (Mt. 5:44). 15 'Share your fellows' joys and sorrows' admonishes the apostle. 16 Live in harmony with one another; lit. 'mind the same things' (Barrett); cf. 2 Cor. 13:11; Phil. 2:2; 4:2), i.e. never alter your Christian attitude to your fellows. Beware of selfish ambition. 'Aspire not to lofty tasks but follow the stream of lowly duties' (David Smith). Beware of self-conceit (cf. Pr. 3:7). 17 Never return ill for ill (cf. Mt. 5:43, 44; 1 Cor. 13:5, 6; 1 Thes. 5:15; 1 Pet. 3:9). Take thought for what is noble in the sight of all; i.e. either consider the best things of any philosophy or religion in your cosmopolitan environment (cf. Pr. 3:4; 2 Cor. 4:2; 8:21), or think nobly of all men, or aim to be above reproach in the eyes of all (Moff., NEB). But it is more likely that Paul regards as the criterion of what is noble and good, not human philosophy or opinion, but the gospel by which the fallen human mind is renewed (12:2). 18 To be at peace with all men is the next admonition, attached to which is the concession so far as it depends upon you. The other man may make it impossible.

19 The last injunction on vengeance is an important point, he seems to say, by the introduction of a stylized Beloved. Leave it to the wrath of God. This means either that we should leave it to God to exercise wrath as declared in Dt. 32:35, or that we should let the principle of retribution inherent in the moral universe pursue its course (cf. 1:18). The first affords the best interpretation. 20, 21 The attitude of the Christian under the rule of love must be one of mercy, the very opposite of retaliation. You will heap burning coals upon his head; i.e. give him a burning sense of shame; though some writers want to see a specific reference, e.g. in Egyptian ritual a man purged his offence by carrying on his head a dish containing burning charcoal on a bed of ashes. The verse is a quotation from Pr. 25:21, 22 (LXX), but omitting the closing words, 'and the Lord shall reward thee'. Paul gives a nobler meaning: 'Treat your enemy kindly; this may soften his hard heart and take away his evil disposition.' 'The best way to get rid of an enemy is to turn him into a friend' (Bruce). Therefore let good triumph over evil.

13:1–7 Political ethics

In this second section of admonitions Paul passes from purely personal matters to the realm of political ethics, and declares the Christian's duty to the state, a subject most revelant to his Roman readers. The apostle's view of the state in relation to the believer presents the principle of Christian submission which has ever been recognized as the mind of God and obligatory upon the church. The grounds of this obedience to secular powers can be expressed under three headings.

13:1, 2 Civil government is a divine institution. 1 Every person. Paul exhorts the Roman Christians, not as a social community merely, but as individuals, to be subject to the Roman rule. The apostle had always found the Roman high officials to be just and helpful, but this fact does not wholly account for an inspired dictum on political relations. It is the divine revelation for the church in all ages, for which rational grounds are afforded. The teaching here falls into two parts. First, God is sovereign ruler of nations. It is He who sets up rulers and behind all earthly dominion lies His authority (2 Sa. 12:8; Je. 27:5f.; Dn. 2:21, 37f.; 4:17, 25, 32; 5:21). Then, every Christian has a duty to recognize the state (be subject to implies the recognition of a claim laid upon us), to obey lawful authority so far as such obedience does not conflict with God's law or Christ's authority, and to intercede for those who hold such responsible posts (1 Tim. 2:1ff.). More problematical is the precise meaning of the governing authorities. All agree that civil authorities represented by the Roman Empire in Paul's day are in view; and a novel modern view sees a further allusion in the phrase to the angelic powers, thought to stand behind and to act through these members of civil government (see Cranfield for a full discussion sympathetic to this double reference). 2 The believer who resists lawful earthly authority is, in fact, disobeying God. For such disaffection the rebel will incur judgment. It has been plausibly suggested that in Paul's thought here both Jew and Gentile are visualized as possible, if not actual, resisters. The Jew in his religious assertiveness and the Gentile believer in his Christian dogmatism might both indulge in some hot-headed fanaticism against the authorities. Such conduct is condemned.

13:3, 4 Civil government is ordained to promote good and to prevent evil. Obedience to secular powers is further commanded because of its service to the very righteousness of God which is the Epistle's theme. Twice here Paul describes the secular authority as God's servant, continuing the idea of divine appointment into that of its purpose. A Christian must obey the magistrate because, in God's hand, his business is to keep order, commending the good and punishing the evil. Only evil-doers need tremble before the judges of the earth, for they are on the side of right-doers. Bear the sword: an allusion to the Roman ius gladii, by which a Roman citizen serving in the army could be condemned to death, has been seen (Barrett), but this is doubtful. Paul rather has a general statement in mind, that the state has power to quell resistance when civil order is in peril. The magistrate is appointed by divine providence to conserve good order (for your good) and to restrain and punish evil (to execute his wrath on the wrongdoer), as the servant of God.

13:5–7 Civil government has the approval of the Christian conscience. Obedience to the powers that be is a Christian's duty, not only because of the inevitable penal consequences of resistance, but for the sake of conscience, i.e. lest, by seditious disobedience to a God-ordained authority, he should incur a guilty conscience. The moral constitution of the believer approves of the workings of the moral constitution of the state. 6 Hence, taxes due as citizens of Rome or as a subject people must be paid. 7 Indeed the apostle, enlarging the scope of the obligation, declares that all dues, taxes and tolls are to be honoured (cf. Mt. 17:24ff.; 22:21; Mk. 12:17; Lk. 20:25).

13:8–14 Personal ethics

Paul at this point reverts to exhortations in relation to one another after the style of ch. 12. He has just said 'Pay all of them their dues', which carries him back to the fundamental principle of all ethics, the law of love. 8 The Christian has one debt, spoken of by Bengel as 'his immortal debt', which suggests that we owe it to all men indiscriminately rather than to fellow-Christians exclusively. Origen says, 'It is our duty always to pay and always to owe this debt of love.' Love is the one obligation which fulfils all obligations. For he who loves his neighbour has fulfilled the law could be translated 'for he who loves has fulfilled the other law' (i.e. the Mosaic law, as well as the civil obligation imposed by Rome) or 'the rest of the law' (i.e. the second part of love to one's neighbour, Mt. 22:39). But we should stay with RSV, being careful to give to neighbour the NT sense of 'anyone who is needy and is thrown across my path in life' (cf. Lk. 10:25–37). 9 A summary of the Decalogue spelt out in terms of Lv. 19:18. 10 This conclusion does not invalidate the Ten Commandments in the interest of a nebulous, existential 'Love, and do as you please' (as Augustine's dictum is popularly misunderstood and misapplied). Love realizes the end of all law (cf. Gal. 5:14) and is the spirit in which we are to keep the law; but we need the law's particulars and prescriptions to give body and definition to love's 'situational' approach to ethical obligation.

11 To reinforce this exhortation to love Paul reminds his readers of the approaching return of our Lord. The imminence of the parousia is cited as one of the strongest motives for Christian living, as in Phil. 4:4–7; 1 Thes. 5; Heb. 10:24f.; Jas. 5:7–11; 1 Pet. 4:7–11; and in the Gospels, Mt. 25:31–46; Mk. 13:33–37. You know what hour (Gk. kairos, time of crisis and challenge) it is. It is the definite age before the second coming, the period yet to pass until the Lord appears again according to promise (cf. Mk. 1:15; 1 Cor. 7:29). The admonition is to wake from sleep, to be up and doing, living more intensely the Christian life in its dynamic love. The end of the 'opportunity' is near, drawing ever nearer every day. The introduction of the word first before believed emphasizes rightly the aorist tense of a definite time, that of conversion. 12 . . . night . . . day . . . darkness . . . light. These contrasts are found elsewhere (Ps. 43:3; Is. 2:5; 9:2; 42:6f.; 60:1ff.; Lk. 16:8; Jn. 1:4ff.; 3:19ff.; 8:12; Acts 26:18; 2 Cor. 6:14; Eph. 5:8; 1 Thes. 5:4f.) and 'children of light' was a self-designation of the Dead Sea community in opposition to the 'sons of darkness' against whom they protested. The aroused condition of the believer under the stimulus of the signs of the times will result in three resolute duties of higher living. First, put on the armour of light (cf. 2 Cor. 6:7; Eph. 6:13; 1 Thes. 5:8), the negative of which is abjuring all evil deeds which are associated with the night-time of ignorance. Cast off (lit. 'put off') . . . put on represent two Greek terms which played an important part in NT ethical patterns, especially in the training of new Christians and in preparation for baptism. The baptism actions of stripping and re-clothing may have suggested these calls to moral decision (Eph. 4:22ff.). Secondly, 13 let us conduct ourselves becomingly. Conduct must be as seemly as in the open day. Light is contrasted with darkness in v. 12, and here again day with night, since the admonitions are being based on the passing of night-time and the nearness of the day of the Lord. Thirdly, 14 put on the Lord Jesus Christ, the negative of which is refusing all provision for the lower man and his lusts. Christ is here conceived as the complete panoply of the believer (cf. Gal. 3:27).

14:1 – 15:13 The strong and the weak

Paul now addresses himself to the special situation in the Roman fellowship of which he had been reliably informed. There are always brethren in every church who entertain imperfect conceptions of Christian truth combined usually with a certain doggedness for their defective creed. These are not to be browbeaten. Their conscience, partially enlightened as to the liberty which Christians enjoy in Christ, must be reverenced, and the conduct of the other members of the society of believers must not hurt them. On the other hand such troublesome brethren must not criticize the rest, advance their views as standards and demand uniformity. Evidently the apostle was familiar with this type of mind, as such men were found in other churches under his inspection, especially in Corinth (cf. 1 Cor. 8:1 – 10:33) and Colossae (cf. Col. 2:16–23). Two of the vexed questions upon which difference of opinion arose in Paul's time were the keeping of the sabbath and the eating of flesh. Probably the church at Rome refused membership to those who held eccentric views and Paul was endeavouring to advance the milder policy that they should be accepted upon confession of the essentials of the Christian faith and afterwards instructed in the Lord. Many had scruples in these matters and the apostle seeks to avoid schism in the church and to counsel toleration under the law of love.

14:1–12 The weaker brother is not to be despised. Paul first of all stresses the point that every man must have his own reasoned convictions. Let him regulate his conduct thereby with intellectual and moral honesty and suffer his neighbour to do likewise. He lives not in the presence of his fellow-men, but before the Lord at whose judgment seat we shall all stand. 1 Weak in faith implies a lack of balance in discerning between the essentials and non-essentials of saving and sanctifying faith. Paul with apostolic authority commands the reception of such weak brethren into the Christian fellowship, but not for disputes over opinions; i.e. without entering into critical discussions or condemning their scruples by 'attempting to settle doubtful points' (NEB). Prejudices of such minor importance are not sufficient grounds for denying sacramental privileges. Paul proceeds to note the two problems at issue, flesh-eating and holy days. 2 Eat anything . . . eats only vegetables. The former group rejoiced in their freedom from Jewish dietary rules, on the basis of Ps. 24:1 (cf. 1 Cor. 10:26); the latter maintained vegetarian principles, fearing an unconscious infringement of the law which forbade the eating of animal blood or defilement because of their touching food formerly used in pagan sacrifice, only a token part of which was consumed in the idol-shrine. It is not clear here whether flesh is abstained from simply per se, or whether there is the added taint of consecration to idols (1 Cor. 10:25; for the background to the problem at Corinth, see NBD, art. 'Idols, Meat offered to'). It is likely that both elements entered into the prejudice. 3 At any rate there must be no criticism between eater and non-eater. 4 Before God alone and not his fellow-men the eater stands or falls, i.e. is acquitted or condemned, or, if taken subjectively, is morally unshaken in his liberty or becomes immoral in licence. But Paul adds that the free man shall be in no danger, for the Lord can preserve him, having already welcomed him.

The other question is to be solved in the same spirit of liberty and toleration. 5 One man holds by the sanctity of special days, another considers all are the same. The groups were divided over the observance (presumably by the practice of fasting) of certain 'holy days'. Cf. Col. 2:16. 6, 7 The observance or non-observance of such days, provided Christians think through their decisions, is non-consequential for fellowship; it should not be made a matter for refusing to accept a fellow-Christian; it is a decision which affects only the Christian and his Lord. Hence the warning in vv. 10, 13. Each should settle his own way of regarding such matters so long as it is in honour of the Lord. This motive of service justifies observance or non-observance. 7–12 Paul becomes gripped with this normative principle of the inspiration of service and expands it in these verses. The Lordship of Christ is supreme and all-inclusive of life and death and judgment. 12 When Christians remember that each shall give account of himself to God, other matters will assume the right perspective.

14:13–23 The weaker brother's conscience must be respected. Paul passes from his wise counsel to the Roman Christians not to judge one another to the suggestion that their critical faculty could be better employed by being turned upon themselves. They ought never to put temptation in the way of the weaker brethren by parading their own liberty in the matter of eating and drinking. 13 Such freedom in the presence of those whose conscience disapproved might become a hindrance or a stumbling block, i.e. a snare in the path of moral progress. Action taken against the light of conscience, however poor that light may be, is moral failure. 14 When the apostle states that he believes that no meat is unclean in itself and he appeals to the teaching of the Lord Jesus (in Mk. 7:14–19) for his authority, he is referring simply to edible food under the ban of the ceremonial law or custom. Some think differently and for them, as for all, their view must regulate their conduct. This principle again picks up the teaching of Jesus in Mk. 7:20–23 (cf. Tit. 1:15). 15 The motive for deferring in this way to a weak brother's opinion is the ruling principle of love which Paul has already expounded (12:9–13), and to which he now joins the fact that such a one is beloved of the Lord and a sharer in the benefits of His atoning death. Do not . . . cause the ruin. Paul uses this strong term to describe the final result when a weak brother is caused to act against his own conscience. 16 To allow one's good, i.e. one's liberty, to grieve and destroy others in this way would cause the gospel to be evil spoken of or 'become an occasion for slanderous talk' (NEB). 17 As far as the kingdom of God is concerned love is more important than questions of eating and drinking, and its expression in righteousness, peace and joy is the thing which matters most. Paul here is evidently combating the Jewish materialist conceptions of the Messianic kingdom. 20 Do not . . . destroy, i.e. 'pull down'. It is the opposite of upbuilding in v. 19. The principle of total abstinence in all things that give offence is commended as the Christian's rule in living the life of faith-righteousness, lest a brother be tempted, not so much to carnal degradation, as to moral and spiritual ruin by suppressing his conscience. 22 The faith that you have is the Christian's stance and conviction in controversial issues, reached by intelligent thought, careful consideration of all interests involved, his brother's included, and in obedience to the Lord's will for him (earlier key-verses in the chapter: 5, 6, 8, 15 combine to form these 'controls'). Cf. 1 Cor. 8:9–13; 10:29–33. In some circumstances our faith may have to be expressed not openly but secretly in our communion with God. The happy man is the one whose conscience is clear. But the one who acts against his conscience condemns himself. 23 Faith, i.e., in this context, conviction and fixed principle, is the all-important factor. To change one's behaviour in such a matter without believing that it is the right thing to do is, in fact, sin.

15:1–13 A plea for unity. The apostle now warns against the unwisdom of division, urging unity within the church at Rome, especially as regards the questions of Christian liberty and Gentile privilege. Basing his counsels upon the teaching already given, he pleads for mutual understanding and helpfulness between those whose views and practice differ in the matters he has discussed. 1 We who are strong. This is the first time that the apostle uses this term to describe those whose conscience enjoys the greater light, although the idea was implicit in his use of the term 'the weak' (cf. 14:1; 1 Cor. 8:11) to describe their opposites. The idea is one of moral ability, which serves not only its possessor but also others who may need support. True oneness of heart can be achieved in two ways, both of which are essential. First, it is the duty of the strong to bear with the weak and not to assert themselves. Egotism must be shunned. 3 The life of self-sacrifice was the example set us by Christ, for even He did not please himself. In confirmation of the point he is making Paul quotes from a Messianic psalm (69:9); 4 this leads him to assert the value of Scripture in its inspiration for present Christian living (cf. 1 Cor. 10:6, 11; 2 Tim. 3:16).

7 The second way of achieving unity is for the strong, representing the authorities of the church, to admit the weak into their fellowship. This duty the apostle had already urged (14:1), using the same term, Welcome; for after all it is Christ who welcomed us all (cf. 14:3), strong or weak, into the fellowship of His people, at our conversion when we had nothing to commend us to Him save our need. Glory then be to God! 8 For I tell you is an unusual opening in this context, and what follows probably means 'I am telling you "strong" Christians to put up with the religious oddness of the "weak", and this is precisely what Christ did; for He made Himself the servant of the oddest of all religious people—the Jews' (so Barrett).

9 Paul then reminds the church at Rome that the mercy of God is extended to both Jew and Gentile alike. On this ground he exhorts to unity between circumcised and uncircumcised. That the fellowship at Rome should be split, or in any wise suffer, because of this universalism of the gospel is unthinkable. Christ was equally a servant to Jew and Gentile alike. By His life and work our Lord confirmed to the circumcision the promises made to the patriarchs (cf. 9:4, 5). But the promises made to the uncircumcision in the OT are similarly confirmed so that the Gentiles might glorify God for his mercy. Paul avers that all are 'one in Christ Jesus' (cf. Gal. 3:28). To prove to the Jews this sublime truth, the 'mystery' of his Epistle, Paul adds several OT quotations; see Ps. 18:49 (LXX); 10 Dt. 32:43; 11 Ps. 117:1 (LXX); 12 Is. 11:10 (LXX). 13 Paul then concludes the section by a benedictory prayer. The God of hope; cf. v. 5, 'the God of steadfastness and encouragement' (RV 'comfort'), and v. 33, 'the God of peace'. The reference to hope connects with the promise drawn from Is. 11:10 in v. 12, that Messiah's blessing will cause the Gentiles to hope in God's mercy.

15:14 – 16:27 EPILOGUE

15:14–21 Paul's justification for writing

The apostle has now come to the conclusion of his noble Epistle. He begins his closing section with a reference to his own vocation as the explanation of his writing to the Roman Christians. 14 With supreme tact he commends their spiritual maturity and ability in mutual self-help. He is persuaded that they are full of goodness. Paul did not know the Christians at Rome at first hand; hence this tribute to their solid Christian profession. His letter is simply a reminder of truths they have learnt already, even though he had not been their teacher. 15 His boldness in addressing them arises from the fact of his apostleship to the Gentiles. 16 Paul describes his divine commission in terms of the priesthood: a minister (Gk. leitourgos; lit. 'a priest'; cf. Heb. 8:2), in the priestly service (Gk. hierourgōn) and offering (Gk. prosphora) are three sacerdotal terms. In the exercise of his preaching ministry as the prophet of God he is also a priest, offering the sacrifice of the Gentiles made righteous to God and consecrated by the Holy Spirit. The same metaphor of offered sacrifice is used in 12:1, 2 and Phil. 2:17 with the same association of assured acceptance. There is perhaps a polemic slant in the use of these sacral terms drawn from the sacrificial cult of Judaism, especially in the reference to the offering of the Gentiles as sanctified. Paul's Jewish enemies might have argued exactly to the contrary on the ground that Gentiles were regarded as 'unclean' in God's sight (cf. Acts 10:14, 15, 28).

16, 17 An indirect allusion to his whole Gentile mission, using language which recalls Phil. 1:26; 2:16. 18 The success of his work among the Gentiles is another mark of his apostolic commission upon which Paul rests his authority to write this Epistle. His mission has prospered, not through himself but through Christ working in him. 19 These miracles wrought by the power of the Holy Spirit are the only ones of which he is free to speak. He refers to his field of labour as from Jerusalem and as far round as Illyricum; i.e. 'the north-west coast of the Adriatic with its hinterland, extending perhaps even into the Roman province of Macedonia'. Most of the Roman eastern provinces are meant, although there is no record in the Acts of Paul's missionary travels in Illyria. From Jerusalem is mentioned as a terminus a quo of Paul's missionary labours partly because in a vision there (Acts 22:17–21) the call came, but more likely because of his theological conviction that OT prophecy (e.g. Is. 2:1–4) promised salvation for the Gentiles as 'the word of the Lord' proceeded from Jerusalem. 20 The apostle, while not an individualist, is diffident about mentioning the labours of others; his policy had always been to pioneer with the gospel and not to build on another man's foundation, a rule he also states in 2 Cor. 10:15, 16. The figure of a foundation he also uses in 1 Cor. 3:10 and Eph. 2:20. Paul justifies his missionary strategy to go to the regions beyond by a citation from Is. 52:15 (LXX).

15:22–33 Plans for future journeys

Dealing with more personal affairs, Paul now

alludes to his future plans. 22 The breaking of all this new ground has hitherto prevented a visit to Rome. 23 But now the work has been covered and, having for many years longed to visit them, 24 he hopes soon to come en route to Spain. Indeed the apostle expects the assistance of the Roman Christians to further his missionary enterprise in the West. If ever he was to fulfil this cherished ambition and reach Spain he would need a new base. Antioch and Ephesus were too remote; it would have to be Rome. Hence once I have enjoyed your company for a little. He will not leave them until he has had the opportunity of satisfying some of the longing to have fellowship with them which he has already expressed in v. 23.

25–27 Meanwhile Jerusalem calls for his ministry as the bearer of alms from Macedonia and Achaia for the poor. The Hebrew Christians have shared with the Gentiles their spiritual treasures; it is therefore the duty of the new converts to contribute in temporal things to the needs of the mother church. Contribution (Gk. koinōnia) emphasizes the sense of sharing in a common cause (in this case, the relief of the needy Christians in Jerusalem) at some cost (see NBD, art. 'Communion'). The generosity of the churches in Macedonia is stated in 2 Cor. 8:1ff. and the same generous spirit is advocated as an incentive to the Corinthians (2 Cor. 8:7). The effectiveness of Paul's earlier plea is evidenced by this tribute to Achaia, i.e. churches in southern Greece, including Corinth (2 Cor. 9:2). 28 With this charitable commission fulfilled, Paul plans to visit Rome on his journey to Spain. RSV mg. offers a literal translation of some obscure words: 'having sealed to them (the church in Palestine) this fruit.' The last word clearly means the collection, but Paul elsewhere uses the figure of 'fruit' (1:13; Phil. 1:22; 4:17) of his ministry to the Gentiles. This application is confirmed by his use of the commercial term 'seal', again employed elsewhere (1 Cor. 9:2; 2 Cor. 1:22) to affirm that his ministry as apostle to the Gentiles was authenticated by God. So we should see in this passage 'Paul's hope that the collection would move the Jerusalem Christians to recognize the full and present validity of his mission to the Gentiles' (K. F. Nickle, The Collection, 1966, p. 129). 29 He arrived at Rome in circumstances never envisaged in his plans; but this confidence that his coming would be in the fullness of the blessing of Christ was abundantly fulfilled. We do not know whether he ever reached Spain, though it is just possible that 1 Clement (5:6, 7) refers to a wider ministry than is given in Acts: 'he (Paul) was a herald both in the east and in the west . . . he taught righteousness to all the world, and when he had reached the limits of the west, he gave his testimony before the rulers.'

30–33 This more personal section ends with an apostolic charge that they should pray to God for him. His requests are, first, that he might be delivered from the unbelievers in Judea, i.e. the Jews who were still rejecting the claims of their Messiah; secondly, that he might find his missionary contribution acceptable to the Jerusalem saints; thirdly, that his western visit might be unto edification by God's will, with the blessed result of refreshment both for the Roman Christians and for himself. As later events show, Paul's wish was far from being fulfilled. His experience, both in Jerusalem and Rome, was very different from his peaceful dreams. With v. 33 cf. vv. 5 and 13.

16:1–16 Greetings to friends in Rome

As Heb. 11 has been termed the 'picture gallery' of OT saints, so we may call Rom. 16 the 'picture gallery' of NT believers. It may be thought strange that Paul, who had never been to Rome, should yet have so many friends there. This remarkable list in a letter sent to a church Paul had never visited lends weight to the theory that ch. 16 does not belong to the letter to the Romans, but is a fragment of a Pauline letter to the Ephesian church. Up to 1935 this hypothesis remained a conjecture for which there was no MS evidence. But with the publication of the Chester Beatty Codex leaves of Pauline Epistles (P46: 3rd century) it has been clear that the oldest known MS of Romans ended with the doxology at the close of ch. 15. This means that the view of a separate origin of ch. 16, which earlier commentators like Lietzmann and Dodd had not felt free to accept (in default of tangible MS evidence), 'has a stronger claim than ever before to the most serious consideration' (T. W. Manson). But F. F. Bruce (in loc.), who presents a balanced picture of the pro and con, opts for retaining ch. 16 as integral to the letter to the Romans, chiefly on the ground of the large number of inscriptions containing personal names connected with Rome (see the full discussion in Dodd, pp. xx ff.) as well as the fact that travel was frequent and swift, thanks to Roman roads and world peace. The Jews of the 1st century (as of every century afterwards) were a commercial and migratory people. They moved along the trade routes and followed the markets. The commendations and salutations were to saints either going to, or living at, Rome. The greetings are varied, each giving a true index of the work performed and of the character won. One third of the names on this historical roll are those of women, revealing the prominent place women held in the church at Rome. Paul was a pioneer in the recognition of the function of women in Christian service and his attitude has been much misunderstood in this sphere.

1, 2 His testimonial to Phoebe is most honourable. She is described as our sister, i.e. in the spiritual family of the Lord, suggesting equality of privilege with the brotherhood: as a deaconess of the church at Cenchreae (cf. 1 Tim. 3:11, NEB mg., for this order of ministry in the early church); and as a helper (Gk. prostatis, 'patroness'), implying 'probably some measure of wealth or social position' (Dodd). It is believed that Phoebe was on her way to Rome and Paul entrusted his precious Epistle to her care for safe delivery. 3 Prisca and Aquila are a married couple whom Paul met at Corinth (Acts 18:1–3) on his first visit there; being of the same trade (they were tentmakers), the apostle lodged with them. We read of them further in Acts 18:18, 19, 26; 1 Cor. 16:19; 2 Tim. 4:19. 4 Apparently they had risked their lives for Paul's sake at or near Ephesus in some unrecorded incident which was well known to all the churches. Note how these churches are united with Paul in this expression of gratitude. Here, as in four out of the six instances in the NT, the wife's name (AV 'Priscilla') precedes her husband's, the reason being unknown. 5 The church in their house is included in Paul's salutation. In the early church there were at first few, if any, church buildings. Groups of Christians met in houses of prominent believers or in other available rooms (cf. Mt. 26:18; Acts 12:12; 1 Cor. 16:19; Col. 4:15; Phm. 2). This is the first of five groups of believers in Paul's list, but the only one referred to definitely as a church (see vv. 5, 10, 11, 14, 15). Epaenetus is marked as a special friend and one of the first of Paul's converts in the Roman province of Asia. 'What a tremendous thing it was, when for the first time, in a vast area and a huge population, a man had the grace and the courage to say "Jesus is Lord"!' (Barrett). 6 Mary is mentioned for her conspicuous service to the Roman church (among you). Paul may have gleaned this scrap of information from Prisca, but it is remarkable that he knows a small detail about the church at Rome. The difficulty would be eased if the reference were to Ephesus. 7 Andronicus and Junias are kinsmen or, rather, fellow-countrymen (cf. 9:3), i.e. Jewish Christians like Paul. Three interesting pieces of further information are given. They had been fellow prisoners with Paul, probably implying simply imprisonment for Christ's sake and maybe a period of confinement with the apostle in the same prison, possibly at Ephesus. They were of note among the apostles, i.e. outstanding apostles themselves in the wider sense of mission-preachers (cf. Acts 14:14; 1 Cor. 15:7; 2 Cor. 8:23; 11:13). They were in Christ before me, i.e. they became converts to the new way of faith-righteousness before Paul had his own experience of the Damascus road. Their non-Hebraic names suggest that they may have belonged to the Hellenists of Acts 6:1. 8 Ampliatus, a slave name, is unknown, but it has been suggested (by C. H. Dodd) that this man's name on a tomb inscription in the cemetery of Domitilla in Rome is a silent witness to him. 9 Urbanus, also a slave name, and Stachys are likewise unknown. 10 Apelles is distinguished as a well-tried Christian (cf. 1 Cor. 11:19; 2 Cor. 10:18; 13:7). The family of Aristobulus is the second group of Christians listed. This noble was a grandson of Herod the Great, who lived privately at Rome. Those belonging to him, aptly rendered 'his family', including officials and slaves, had a Christian fellowship among them. 11 Herodion, as his name implies, belongs to Herod and probably is included in the household of Aristobulus. He may have been a leader in the group already mentioned in v. 10. Along with Andronicus and Junias he is described as a kinsman of Paul. Hence, if we exclude Mary, who may have been a Jewess, there are only three Jews of the church at Rome in the catalogue of commendation. Similarly among the greetings from Corinth given later in this chapter (vv. 21–23) there are only three other Hebrews. The family of Narcissus contains the third group of Christians mentioned. 12 Tryphaena and Tryphosa were probably twin sisters. Another lady, Persis, is honoured in this verse. The name occurs in an inscription as that of a freed woman. 13 Rufus is perhaps the Cyrenian noted in Mk. 15:21. The apostle refers to him as eminent (AV 'chosen', NEB 'an outstanding follower of the Lord'), in the sense of being set apart for distinguished service. His mother at some time or other evidently 'mothered' Paul (possibly when Paul was brought to Antioch, Acts 11:25f.) and so is included in the greeting. 14 Now follows another group of believers, the fourth in this roll of honour, the most important of them being named—Asyncritus, Phlegon, Hermes, Patrobas, Hermas. 15 A fifth company of saints, if not actually a church, comes next. The prominent members are mentioned—Philologus (lit. 'lover of wisdom'), Julia, supposed to be husband and wife, with their family, Nereus (whom the tradition of the church at Rome associates with Domitilla, a Christian who was exiled by her cousin, the emperor Domitian, in AD 95) and his sister, and Olympas. 16 A holy kiss is referred to by Paul in 1 Cor. 16:20; 2 Cor. 13:12; 1 Thes. 5:26. Another name is 'the kiss of love' (1 Pet. 5:14). In all cases, as we know from Justin's description of Christian worship in the middle of the 2nd century, the setting is that of the church assembled for public praise and worship. To salute with a kiss was the usual Eastern manner of greeting. The apostle now closes his roll of honour by greetings to the Roman saints from all the churches of Christ. This is the more general phrase which Paul adopts. He claims to speak sometimes in their collective name (cf. 16:4; 1 Cor. 7:17; 2 Cor. 8:18; 11:28). His practice, however, is to localize the fellowship, while generalizing the members, e.g. 'all the saints' of such and such a church (e.g. 2 Cor. 13:13; Phil. 4:22). Once he writes 'the churches of Asia' (1 Cor. 16:19). Here he sends greetings in the name of the whole Gentile mission to the believers in the imperial city, which held a special place in the world.

16:17–20 A final admonition

This warning against false teachers is as surprising in its interruption as that inserted in the Philippian letter (3:2). It is suggested that at this point of the Epistle Paul took the pen from his scribe to add his name as its credential of genuineness (cf. 1 Cor. 16:21–24; Gal. 6:11–18; 2 Thes.

3:17, 18). Then the pastoral emotion arose in the apostle's heart and he could not refrain from a last word of exhortation. Such an interpretation would suit a normal situation. On the other hand some advance the idea, as in the case of the church at Philippi, that something unusual had happened, perhaps the advent to Rome of the very false teachers against whom Paul feels urged to warn. It is not definitely known who these were, though the closest parallel would be the type of false teaching castigated in Phil. 3:18f. and would suggest a Gnosticizing tendency in both cases. The basic idea began with a dualistic conception of God and the world which was held to be alien to Him. The human body, as part of the material order, could safely be ignored or indulged without restraint or conscience. 17 Paul exhorts the Roman saints with an impressive imperative, take note; i.e. so as not to follow them. In Phil. 3:17 the term is used positively as a call to follow a good example. The evil of these false teachers lies not merely in their doctrine but in their divisive influence. They cause dissensions and difficulties; i.e. by introducing teaching subversive of the apostolic gospel. Paul's experience in other churches leads him anxiously to this warning. 18 He appears to know these disturbers well. Their aim is not to glorify the Lord but to benefit themselves. He charges these deceivers with selfish egotism: their own appetites. RSV mg. is less euphemistic and recalls Phil. 3:19 which uses the same Greek word. Indiscriminate indulgence is implied, and not simply food but all the sensuous appetites were given free rein on an acceptance of the Gnostic principle that the human body is a useless and irrelevant vehicle of the spirit. They also exercise the accomplished art of flattery and trap the unwary. Paul commends the fidelity of the Roman church to the traditional Christian faith which is already widely known. 19 Further his ideal for them (cf. Mt. 10:16) is his motive in this warning. 20 The appropriate title God of peace (cf. 15:33) is used in this exhortation to beware of those who cause divisions and offences. Paul is confident that the Maker of peace is stronger than the destroyer of peace and soon Satan shall be thrown under the feet of the Roman saints that they may trample upon him (cf. Gn. 3:25; cf. also 2 Cor. 11:13–15).

16:21–23 Greetings from Corinthian brethren

Paul had interrupted his long list of salutations with a warning he felt a strong urge to give. Now he seeks to conclude. His companions at Corinth, where he is writing, wish to associate themselves with the apostle's greetings. Whether it is because they are prominent saints or have some connection with Rome is not revealed. 21 Timothy is well known as an intimate associate and fellow worker in the gospel. Lucius and Jason and Sosipater are three of Paul's fellow-countrymen who are with him at Corinth, just as he has three Hebrew friends in Rome (see on v. 11). The three Corinthian Jews (if we assume that my kinsmen, i.e. fellow Jewish Christians, applies to all three names) may be identified as Lucius of Cyrene, connected with Antioch (Acts 13:1)—but this is only a guess; Jason, Paul's host at Thessalonica (Acts 17:5–9); and Sopater of Beroea who went with Paul from Corinth to Asia (Acts 20:4). 22 It appeared to the amanuensis that Paul had now finished and so he added his own name Tertius to the salutations. The use of a scribe by authors of NT books is attested also by 1 Pet. 5:12, though Tertius and Silvanus (Silas) are the only two names preserved (cf. Gal. 6:11, marking Paul's own epilogue in his own handwriting). Amanuenses employed to write 1st-century letters were highly regarded and had a share in arranging the sender's thoughts. 23 However, the apostle remembers some more people interested in the brethren at Rome and so he puts in a postscript. Gaius is described as host to me; clearly Paul had found a lodging with him during his stay at Corinth. He is probably the same person whom Paul baptized along with Crispus (1 Cor. 1:14), and almost certainly the man known as Titius Justus in Acts 18:7. The name is found in Acts 19:29; 20:4; 3 Jn. 1. But he is also host of the whole church, i.e. the church at Corinth. Its gatherings were, presumably, held in his house. Erastus is a high official in Corinth, the treasurer of the city, and certainly a Christian. He is most likely to have had some civil connection with the imperial city. The same name is mentioned in Acts 19:22 and 2 Tim. 4:20, but no certain identification is possible. A more promising link is with the Erastus who is mentioned in a Latin inscription found at Corinth ('Erastus, commissioner for public works, laid this pavement at his own expense'). But the term in the inscription ('commissioner' or 'aedile') is not the same as Paul's Greek oikonomos tēs poleōs (the city treasurer). Quartus is an unknown brother. The benediction of v. 24 is omitted by RSV in accordance with the best MSS. See the Introduction, p. 1013.

16:25–27 A concluding doxology

While not always concluding an Epistle with a doxology, Paul has composed several (cf. 11:36; Gal. 1:5; Eph. 3:20; Phil. 4:20; 1 Tim. 1:17). The ascription of praise is here offered to God in two aspects of His perfection. He is able to strengthen and is also the only wise God. This divine ability has already been referred to in the Epistle (1:16; 14:4). God's omnipotence is redemptive through the gospel for it is 'the power of God unto salvation'. This conception, which was early emphasized in the Epistle, is now, at its close, proclaimed after the inspired exposition of the gospel entrusted to the apostle. The appropriateness of the wording in this doxology answers the objection, occasionally brought against these verses, that they represent an addition to the letter made by the 2nd-century heretic, Marcion, or at least a Marcionite follower. But it has to be admitted that some of the key terms are unusual. 25 This gospel is described as the preaching of Jesus Christ; i.e. the offer of a faith-righteousness in place of a works-righteousness on the ground of the finished work of reconciliation through the life, death and resurrection of Jesus Christ. It is also the mystery, which . . . is now disclosed, a reference to the inclusion of the Gentiles in the privileges of the righteousness of God (11:25; Eph. 3:3ff.; Col. 1:26f.). 26 It is also through the prophetic writings . . . made known, i.e. attested. The gospel, Paul all along maintained, had been foretold by the Scriptures of the OT (cf. 1:2; 3:21; 9:1 – 11:36). The prophets of old were commissioned by the eternal God to declare His will of salvation to all men, to bring about the obedience of faith. Paul also throughout his Epistle conceives of the divine omnipotence in its redemptive aspect as an inward force in the believer whereby he is able to stand. The power to establish the Roman saints is an inner experience whereby he is upheld (14:4). Thus, in this concluding doxology, the characteristic concepts of Paul's teaching are repeated: the new way as the real consummation of the old, the effectual call of God to His servants in both dispensations to reveal His will, the universalism of the gospel, and the one condition, 'faith'. Only wise is another phase of the divine character which evokes the adoration of the apostle. The wisdom of God in the Pauline thought is not mere speculation, or philosophy, beyond the ken of human understanding. It is rather an attribute wherein Paul sees the mercies of God toward sinful men, practically designed and achieved through Jesus Christ. Such wisdom is the sole prerogative and property of God. Hence eternal glory be to God! Laus deo. Amen.

1 and 2 Corinthians

INTRODUCTION

CORINTH

Paul first reached Corinth in the autumn of AD 50, in the course of his second missionary journey. His stay of more than 18 months (Acts 18:11, 12) was unusually long for him, but he did so on the direct instruction of the Lord (Acts 18:9, 10). Even apart from this, Paul would have appreciated the city's strategic value for the gospel. Astride the Isthmus of Corinth, the land-bridge linking N Greece with the Peloponnese, and with sea routes to east and west, Corinth was splendidly placed for commerce and communications. Julius Caesar rebuilt the earlier city, left in ruins by other Romans 100 years before, and raised it to the status of a Roman colony. The famous commercial prosperity of the first Corinth soon returned, and so did its notorious reputation for sexual licence, which had spawned a new word, to 'Corinthianize'. The temple of Aphrodite, the goddess of love, perched 1,875 ft up on the Corinthian acropolis, about 1,500 ft above the town, provided an attractive religious excuse for a city remarkable even by ancient standards for its vice. The lot of the infant Corinthian church had indeed fallen in a foul place.

The city's importance was enhanced in 27 BC when Corinth became the Roman governor's seat and the administrative capital of the province of Achaia; this covered the whole of Greece south of Macedonia. Paul was the first to seize the opportunity which Corinth offered (1 Cor. 3:5f.; 4:15), for with all its coming and going, anything preached there would quickly be spread abroad in all directions and among all sorts and conditions of people. Thus within 25 years of the crucifixion, the gospel was being proclaimed in the first and worst city of S Greece, with its teeming cosmopolitan population of half a million Greeks, Roman colonists and Jews.

THE CHURCH AT CORINTH

The Corinthian church seems to have been fairly large (Acts 18:8, 10), and secure from the threat of persecution (1 Cor. 4:10). There were some Jews in its membership (Acts 18:7, 8); but it was predominantly Gentile and ex-pagan in character, and included many who had been rescued from the very dregs of society (1 Cor. 6:9–11). Judaizing tendencies, which troubled other churches with Jewish members, seem to have been only a minor problem in Corinth (1 Cor. 7:18). The 'super-apostles' of 2 Corinthians with their 'other gospel' appear to be more concerned to undermine Paul's authority than to drag converts back into Jewish practices. On the other hand, the pagan world blankets the whole of life in Corinth, and Paul has to deal extensively with the practical problems the Corinthian Christians were meeting every day. Purity was an odd novelty in the pagan world, and even more so in Corinth (1 Cor. 5:9; 6:9–11, 15). Christians too had to decide on their attitude towards pagan clubs (1 Cor. 8 and 10) and about such matters as invitations to dine with pagan neighbours (1 Cor. 10:27).

Socially, the church ranged from the well-to-do city treasurer (Rom. 16:23) to Jewish refugees (Acts 18:2) and former thugs (1 Cor. 6:10f.). Not many in the church were cultured or clever (1 Cor. 1:26), and there was some striving after airs and graces (1 Cor. 4:10). Many were delighting in cheap rhetoric (1 Cor. 1:20f.; 2:1ff.), boasting about their teachers (1 Cor. 3:4), and even modifying some of Paul's 'cruder' doctrines to make them more 'contemporary' (1 Cor. 15:12).

The instability of the Corinthians is not surprising in view of the novel tensions to which their utterly anti-Christian religious and moral environment exposed them, not to mention the multi-racial character of the church membership. Their lack of OT background was another factor, although Apollos was able to remedy this in some measure (Acts 18:27f.), and Paul appreciated his efforts (1 Cor. 16:12). The divisions in the church are marked by party-cries (1 Cor. 1:12) and the existence of opposite perversions—witness the attitudes towards incest on the one hand (1 Cor. 5) and celibacy on the other (1 Cor. 7). Paul rarely suggests, however, that the divisions were doctrinal. It was rather that the Corinthians were behaving 'just like men of the world' (1 Cor. 3:3, Phillips). James Stalker once said that Paul's letters take the lid off the meeting-places of the early Christians and let us look inside. This is particularly true of his Corinthian correspondence.

PAUL'S LINKS WITH CORINTH

We have a record in Acts of two of the visits Paul made to Corinth (Acts 18, 20), and know that he exchanged letters with the church he planted there (1 Cor. 7:1a; 2 Cor. 2:4). Judging by his own Epistles, Paul's relations with the Corinthians were close and personal. He stayed with Aquila and Priscilla, leather-workers like himself, who had taken up residence in Corinth (Acts 18:1–3). Although Paul arrived very uncertain about his reception in the city (1 Cor.

2:3), several notable converts were won, including Crispus, the ruler of the synagogue (Acts 18:8), with his household, and Sosthenes (1 Cor. 1:1), probably the same man who succeeded Crispus in the synagogue (Acts 18:17). There were many conversions, too, among the ordinary folk of the city (Acts 18:8, 10; 1 Cor. 1:26).

The arrival of Timothy and Silas encouraged Paul to an even greater effort, and this aroused strong opposition from the Jewish quarter. But the new Roman proconsul, Gallio, dismissed the Jews' attempts to bring a charge against Paul, and indeed their action provoked a popular anti-Semitic demonstration by the Greek townspeople (Acts 18:12–17). So Paul stayed, turned to the Gentiles, and built up the church under the implicit protection of the Roman authorities. After 'many days' (Acts 18:18) he embarked upon another missionary tour to Ephesus, Jerusalem and Antioch, through Asia Minor, and back to Ephesus. There he remained for 2 years (Acts 18:11, 18–23; 19:1).

Aquila and Priscilla had left Corinth with Paul. In Ephesus they were able to be of considerable spiritual help to a promising Jewish convert named Apollos, who went across to Corinth and filled the gap left by Paul's absence (Acts 18:28; 1 Cor. 3:6). Other teachers were not lacking (1 Cor 4:15), though the 'Cephas party' (1 Cor. 1:12) need not imply a visit by Peter. Soon afterwards Paul revisited Corinth from Macedonia and stayed a further 3 months, before leaving (for the last time, so far as we know) by the overland route instead of going by sea, thus avoiding another Jewish plot (Acts 20:3). But some of the details of all this programme are not clear.

HOW MANY LETTERS AND VISITS?

1 and 2 Corinthians pose more problems than do most of Paul's letters, about the sequence of events to which he alludes as he writes. Earlier commentators assumed that the apostle had paid only one visit to Corinth before writing 2 Corinthians, that an earlier letter mentioned in 2 Cor. 2:3 and 7:8 is our 1 Corinthians, and that the offender in 2 Cor. 2:5–11 was involved in the case of incest in 1 Cor. 5. None of these suppositions is now considered likely by the majority of commentators, who feel that the character of 1 Corinthians as a whole hardly suits a letter said to have been written 'out of much affliction and anguish of heart' and 'with many tears' (2 Cor. 2:4). If this view is correct, then the 'severe letter' has not been preserved.

There is less agreement, however, on another problem. This concerns chs. 10–13 of 2 Corinthians. The abrupt change of tone is thought to indicate that this section has been attached to 2 Corinthians by a later hand and is really part of the 'severe letter' mentioned in 2 Cor. 2:3. In addition, fragments of a lost letter are supposed by some scholars to be preserved in 1 Cor. 6:12–20 and 2 Cor. 6:14 – 7:1. It must be made clear, however, that there is no evidence whatever from MSS or patristic sources for any of these conjectures. Early church editors with scissors and paste are a modern imagination. The ancients used papyrus rolls, not sheets, for important long letters, and it is hardly likely that self-contained sensible portions of such rolls conveniently survived for a later editor to join together.

Recently scholars have been more ready to accept the unity of 2 Corinthians, a unity which can be observed, despite the variations in subject and tone, in the common theme of Paul's intended third visit. 'In spirit the reader follows Paul from Ephesus through Troas to Macedonia (2 Cor. 1–7); then he lingers with him for a moment in the churches of Macedonia (chs. 8, 9); finally, he is led to the consideration of conditions in the church at Corinth from the point of view of Paul's coming visit there' (Zahn).

The sequence of events is perhaps as follows: 1. The 'previous letter' sent from Ephesus (1 Cor. 5:9). This has probably disappeared, though some writers think part is preserved in 2 Cor. 6:14 – 7:1. 2. The Corinthians' reply, asking further questions (1 Cor. 7:1). 3. Our 1 Corinthians written from Ephesus (1 Cor. 16:8) in answer to the Corinthians' letter. 4. Paul's brief and 'painful visit' (2 Cor. 2:1). 5. The 'severe letter' (2 Cor. 2:3, 4, 9; 7:8) written from Ephesus. Some scholars consider part of this forms 2 Cor. 10–13. Probably, however, this letter too has not survived. The Corinthians would hardly be keen to preserve it. 6. The letter of reconciliation (our 2 Corinthians) written from Macedonia. 7. Paul's third and last visit to Corinth, where he winters before going on to Judea via Macedonia with the collection for the Jerusalem church.

DATES

The 18 months that Paul spent in Corinth at the end of his second missionary journey (Acts 18:11) probably stretched from the early days of AD 50 to the spring of 52. We can accurately date this period of Paul's life from an inscription at Delphi. This reveals that Gallio, a brother of Seneca the philosopher, came to Corinth as proconsul of Achaia in July 51 (Acts 18:12–17). Gallio's bēma, or judgment seat (Acts 18:12), and the makellon, or meat-market (1 Cor. 10:25; AV 'shambles'), have also been identified. The arrival of Gallio for his 1-year appointment appears to have inspired the Jews to attempt to bring Paul to trial. But his opponents were confounded without the apostle having to say a word (Acts 18:14), and then routed by a popular demonstration. So Paul remained 'many days' longer (Acts 18:18) before going off on another missionary journey.

Some 5 or 6 years later, Paul returned to Achaia for 3 months (Acts 20:3) and almost certainly must have spent part of that time in Corinth. Then he left on what turned out to be his last visit to Jerusalem. The outside dates for the two canonical Epistles are therefore AD 51 and 57. 1 Cor. 16:8 indicates that the first letter was written in Ephesus towards the end of his stay there. This would date 1 Corinthians about the spring of AD 54. It is likely that Titus delivered this letter in order, among other things, to set in motion the arrangements for the collection intended for the poverty-stricken Christian Jews in Jerusalem. If this is so, then 2 Cor. 8:10 suggests that the second letter should be dated a year or so later. It was composed somewhere in Macedonia (2 Cor. 2:13; 7:5–7; 8:1; 9:2–4). The subscription 'from Philippi' in some MSS is early and a likely conjecture, though if Paul wrote the letter piecemeal while on his travels through the province this might go some way to explain sudden changes of tone which worry the commentators.

At all events the Corinthian letters are among the earliest documents in the NT, compiled about twenty-five years after the crucifixion. Hundreds were still alive who had vivid memories of Christ's life and ministry, and Paul indeed draws attention to this very point in his famous list of our Lord's resurrection appearances (1 Cor. 15:6).

AUTHENTICITY

None of the books which make up the NT comes to us with better credentials than 1 and 2 Corinthians. The internal evidence of both is so strong that commentators usually accept it without debate. Besides the writer's claim to be Paul (1 Cor. 1:1; 16:21; 2 Cor. 1:1; 10:1), the letters are unmistakably Pauline in the tone and character of their teaching and in their vocabulary and style. The mention of the many survivors of the 500 who had seen Christ after His resurrection (1 Cor. 15:6) would indeed be a 'bad joke' (Godet), if it be the work of a 2nd-century forger. The many coincidences with Acts and with the other Pauline letters are together beyond chance or invention.

The external evidence is also impressive. In his own letter to the church at Corinth, Clement of Rome appeals to the authority of 1 Corinthians as the 'epistle of the blessed Paul the apostle' (1 Clement 47:1). This was about AD 95. It is the first time any NT writer is quoted in literature outside the Bible. Ignatius (AD 110) seems to have known much of 1 Corinthians by heart. Polycarp (martyred c. AD 156) provides the earliest quotations from 2 Corinthians, in his letter to the Philippians. But the genuineness of both Corinthian letters as the work of Paul has never seriously been questioned. The heretic Marcion (AD 150) found them a place in his rather select canon.

PAUL'S PURPOSE IN WRITING

Corinth lay almost opposite Ephesus, less than 300 miles across the Aegean. Ordinary cargo-boats averaged two or three knots and took only a few days for such a trip. Communications between the two ports, therefore, must have been constant, and no doubt from time to time Christians went to and fro. Among the travellers were 'Chloe's people' (1 Cor. 1:11), possibly her slaves or freedmen (but see commentary). They brought Paul disturbing news. The Corinthian Christians were splitting into factions, not on doctrinal grounds but merely because some were becoming 'fans' of one teacher or another. Paul's homelier and more direct expressions, e.g., were being compared unfavourably with the polished speech of Apollos (1 Cor. 1:12; 3:4; 4:6). Perhaps this was not surprising since Greeks had long enjoyed literary refinements from Stoic preachers. It seems possible too that Judaizing Christian teachers had come from Jerusalem (1 Cor. 7:18), as in the case of the Galatians. Chloe's people had even more serious reports. One man had married his widowed stepmother (1 Cor. 5). Corinthian Christians were bringing business disputes before pagan courts (1 Cor. 6). Gatherings for the Lord's Supper were degenerating into convivial cliques which left some members out in the cold (1 Cor. 11:17ff.).

While Paul was grieving over this news, a letter arrived from the Corinthians themselves (1 Cor. 7:1; 16:7). This is the only letter we know for sure that Paul received; but the papyri reveal that the Greeks were great letter-writers, and undoubtedly Paul had his share of mail. The Corinthians had little Christian experience and no literature to guide them in practical Christian living. So they put their questions to Paul. What were the right Christian principles about sex, marriage, and divorce? Should they do their shopping at meat-markets associated with the great pagan temples? Should a woman dress for services as for a private or for a public function? (There were no church buildings, of course, and Christians met for worship in some large private house.) Should capable women take a leading part in those services? (Greek women were used to far more liberty than Jewish, and the Corinthian church included both cultures.) The worship itself was sometimes disturbed by uncontrolled ecstatic speaking. What guide-lines should be followed? And finally, while to the Greek mind immortality was a familiar notion, what was meant by 'resurrection' (a Jewish concept)?

Our 1 Corinthians is Paul's response, first to the alarming reports brought by Chloe's people (1 Cor. 1–6), and then to the problems raised by the Corinthians in their letters. However precious subsequent readers have found Paul's first letter, we are not altogether surprised, from a 'public-relations' point of view, that the Christians in Corinth were upset by the apostle's reply. Paul at first completely ignores their own letter and vigorously attacks the evils reported to him by Chloe's people. Whatever steps Paul may have taken to check the truth of the hearsay, we can readily imagine that his listening to tales from some third party would cause resentment. No-one likes being spoken to deprecatingly (1 Cor. 1:26), or addressed like a child (1 Cor. 3:1; 4:21), or put in his place (1 Cor. 11:16; 14:36). Compared with what Paul intended in his love and fervour, 1 Corinthians was not altogether appreciated by its first recipients.

The next stage in the relationship of Paul with the Corinthian church is revealed in the earlier verses of our 2 Corinthians. It seems that the situation in Corinth had deteriorated and Paul interrupted his work in Ephesus to pay them a hurried visit. But the trip proved a painful failure. So at great personal cost, but in duty bound, he wrote another letter (2 Cor. 2:3, 4), even though he regretted that its plain speaking would hurt their feelings further (2 Cor. 7:8). Titus took the letter, and Paul arranged to meet him at Troas to hear what the reaction had been (2 Cor. 2:12, 13). But Titus did not appear, and though there were plenty of evangelistic opportunities in Troas, a worried Paul could not settle and he went on into Macedonia (2 Cor. 2:12–14). There to his relief he met Titus and was overjoyed to learn of a complete change of heart among most of the Corinthians (2 Cor. 7:5–7). So Paul wrote to them again (our 2 Corinthians) to express his thankfulness at the reconciliation which had been brought about. But even now he has to speak forcefully about certain self-styled 'super-apostles' who had arrived on the scene to try to undermine Paul's authority (2 Cor. 10–13). Yet still the apostle's love shines through his sternness: 'I will most gladly spend and be spent for your souls' (2 Cor. 12:15). 'Remembering the background of the membership, it is difficult to know as we read 1 Corinthians and its sequel whether to be more astonished at the dauntless faith and magnificent courage of the apostle, who might have given up in despair, or whether to be more heartened that it was upon such unpromising foundations that God built a world church' (William Neil).

COMMENTARY

1:1–9 INTRODUCTION

1:1–3 Greeting

1 Paul follows 1st-century custom: writer, intended recipient, greeting. But each item is given a Christian elaboration. Called, i.e. 'to be a Christian', is in the NT always a call obeyed. The will of God can refer to Paul's conversion (Acts 22:10; Gal. 1:15) and to his unique appointment to take God's message to the Gentiles (Acts 9:15; Rom. 15:15f.). Paul underlines his divine authority, a claim some Corinthians challenged (see, e.g., 1 Cor. 9:1f.). Sosthenes; perhaps the synagogue leader (Acts 18:17), now a Christian brother (cf. Mt. 23:8). Believers are now on a level as sons of the one Father (cf. Gal. 3:28; Col. 3:11). 2 The church of God; i.e. formed by God and belonging to God, not to some party (cf. 1:12). At Corinth; the local expression of a universal society (see Introduction, 'Corinth'). Sanctified; i.e. set apart by the Spirit, not by human action. Saints; i.e. 'holy persons', not primarily in the ethical sense, but 'separated as God's people' (cf. Ex. 19:6; see on 2 Cor. 1:1), with great moral consequences. All . . . who in every place call on the name, i.e. in trust and worship (cf. Rom. 10:12, 13); a significant description indicating who belong to the universal church. 3 Grace is the God-given basis of all Christian life; peace is the outcome of God's redemption in Christ (see on 2 Cor. 1:2). The Lord Jesus Christ, living in Palestine only 25 years before, is now wondrously resident in God's church everywhere, including Corinth as Paul's letter is read. He is also regarded as one with God as the source of blessing.

1:4–9 Thanksgiving

4 Thanks. Paul is ever mindful of what God has done. Although severe criticism will follow, Paul genuinely encourages his converts whenever he can. The grace of God is the source of all they have. 5 Paul mentions two gifts which the Corinthians as Greeks highly prized: speech, the telling forth of truth; and knowledge, the grasp of truth. 6 Testimony; borne to Christ by Paul while he ministered among them, and confirmed as true by their transformed lives. 7, 8 Spiritual gift. The term is used of salvation (Rom. 5:15), God's gifts in general (Rom. 11:29), and (as here, and particularly chs. 12, 14) of the special gifts of the Spirit. Paul himself did not lack spiritual gifts (cf., e.g., 14:18); but his confidence is in Christ. It is He who will sustain . . . to the end—a gentle reminder that the Corinthians had not yet 'arrived' at perfection, despite their many gifts. Full redemption awaits the day of Christ's return in triumph; but then they will be declared guiltless and found unimpeachable (cf. Rom. 8:33). 9 God's character guarantees the outcome of His call (cf. 1:2). Fellowship; created by Christians' common participation in Christ. The Lordship of Christ is mentioned many times in these opening verses as Paul sets the scene.

1:10 – 4:21 DIVISIONS IN THE CHURCH

Chs. 1–6 give Paul's vigorous reaction to reports of scandals in Corinth (1:11). See Introduction, 'Paul's purpose in writing'.

1:10–17 Rival cliques

10 Paul appeals to their common relationship in Christ; they are brethren to him and to each other. By invoking the name of Jesus the apostles healed (Acts 3:6), baptized (Acts 2:38), pronounced judgment (1 Cor. 5:3). This one authoritative name, standing over against party labels (v. 12), can heal wounds that rend a church. Agree; literally 'say the same thing', i.e. avoid party cries. United; Greek 'mended', the word used in Mt. 4:21; 2 Cor. 13:11. Judgment; opinion. Reported; made clear (cf. 3:13, 'disclose'), so leaving no room for doubt. 11 Chloe's people; possibly someone's slaves. But Chloe was the popular name for the goddess Demeter (the Roman Ceres). She had 56 temples in Greece, including one at Corinth. Chloe's people appear as disinterested critics outside the church parties mentioned. They may therefore be devotees of Chloe, and would be sympathetic to Paul, for they worshipped a pure deity and had baptismal rites, sacramental cake, and a belief in an after-life. They would hate the orgies practised by the rabble as much as Paul did. Quarrelling . . . brethren. The juxtaposition is pointed.

12 Each one. Not necessarily everyone, but the majority. The reason for this personality cult can only be guessed. I belong to Paul; probably the claim of some of his converts. Loyalty he appreciated (2 Tim. 4:11), but not partisanship. Apollos succeeded Paul in Corinth (Acts 18:24; 19:1). His eloquence doubtless appealed to Greeks and his Bible knowledge to Jews. Paul always speaks highly of him. Cephas; Aramaic form of Peter (cf. Jn. 1:42). Some unrecorded visit to Corinth is possible (1 Cor. 9:5 suggests itinerant preaching); or the personal attachment may be due to his standing among the Twelve, or to his special interest in work among the Jews (Gal. 2:7). A Christ sect is surprising. Possibly it refers to some who boasted of spiritual independence. I belong to Christ could be Paul's own corrective comment (there is no or in the Greek), but the parallel form of words makes this unlikely. 13 Note Paul's decisive appeal to the Person, work, and name of Christ. Rightly understood these all unite and leave no room for attachment to Paul or anyone else. 14, 15 Paul is not decrying baptism, but expressing relief that by practising it he has not unwittingly recruited devotees to himself. Crispus; cf. Acts 18:8. Gaius; cf. Rom. 16:23. 16 The family of Stephanus was the first to be converted in Achaia province. This verse is doubtful evidence of infant baptism since this household appears from 16:15 to have been adult. 17 To baptize was not Paul's primary commission. Eloquent wisdom, beloved by Greeks, would merely dazzle, and obscure the meaning of the cross.

1:18 – 2:16 God's wisdom

18, 19 Paul contrasts human wisdom, which leaves God out of account and is man-centred, with the wisdom of God. Word; i.e. preaching. It is folly; cf. Gal. 5:11. It appears to be 'nonsense' (Phillips) that the Son of Almighty God should go unrecognized and be so ill-treated. Men would expect the Lord to destroy sin, but not apparently to be destroyed by it. Perishing . . . being saved. The process of division is going on. Destruction and salvation will be consummated in the last day. God's power (cf. Rom. 1:16; Gk. dynamis); 'dynamite' to shatter human pride and human 'wisdom', i.e. good advice about what to do (cf. 1 Cor. 2:5). I will destroy . . . ; from Is. 29:14, LXX. This antithesis between God's wisdom and man's was revealed in the OT. 20 'What have the philosopher, the writer, and the critic of this world to show for all their wisdom?' (Phillips). Each Corinthian party argues for its greater cleverness. But true 'rightness' comes from a broken heart, not from brains.

21 In the wisdom of God; in God's providential ordering of human affairs (Acts 14:16; 17:30). To know God implies harmony with His mind and character (Je. 22:15, 16), something alien to the world (Pr. 1:7; 3:7). Through wisdom; i.e. self-chosen ways (Rom. 1:21f.). Pleased emphasizes God's love and sovereign choice. Folly; because of its unexpected contrast with human expectation. What we preach; i.e. the content of the message. Believe; present continuous tense indicating constant attitude. 22 The demand for signs (cf. Nu. 14:11; Mt. 16:1–4) implies distrust of God, and also the Jews' false expectation of a spectacular Messiah. The seeking of wisdom illustrates the effort to discover God through human speculation. 23 A crucified Messiah was to Jews unthinkable (Dt. 21:23; cf. Gal. 3:13), while for God to take human form and then be put to death was to Greeks incomprehensible. 24 To those responding to God's call the cross makes available the power of God to overcome sin, and reveals the true wisdom of God in offering men the only effective scheme for their salvation. All man's unaided attempts to know God or to defeat sin prove futile. 25 Foolishness (i.e. in the world's eyes); not the abstract noun, as in vv. 18, 21, 23, but a neuter adjective: 'foolish act'. God's apparent weakness (neuter adjective again) shown in allowing His Son to hang on the cross is stronger, more effective, than any human effort (cf. 2 Cor. 13:4).

26 The paradox of God's method is further seen in the socially despised membership of the Corinthian church (see Introduction, 'The church at Corinth'). Your call; i.e. from God to be Christians: not 'vocation' in our sense. 27, 28 Few Corinthian Christians were outstanding according to the sophisticated society of the day; but their transformed lives demonstrated how God was overturning the world's standards. God chose. Three times His initiative is emphasized. What is foolish . . . weak . . . low. God has not merely chosen to confound what the world considers wise and strong. He has used for the purpose what the world deems of no account. Low; in birth (slaves) and in morals. Things that are not. Once there was no church in Corinth, save in God's mind (cf. Rom. 4:17). Despite opposition and its own weakness that church now existed, even though its members count as nothing in the eyes of the world. 29 God's purpose is to remove any occasion for human self-congratulation in His presence, however much men may boast to one another (cf. 1:12). 30 Source. The believer's new life derives from God (cf. 2 Cor. 5:18; Eph. 2:8). In Christ; cf. 2 Cor. 5:17. This is a favourite phrase of Paul's to describe the believer's intimate relationship with the Person of the risen Saviour. The Greek suggests that wisdom (cf. Col. 2:3) is defined by what follows. Our righteousness (cf. 2 Cor. 5:21); as sinners our right relationship with God is secured only because of Christ's death on the cross. Similarly, sanctification, holiness of life, is a divine work. The ground of all these blessings is Christ's act of redemption, i.e. of liberation by purchase, effected for us by His death on the cross (cf. 6:20; 1 Pet. 1:18, 19). The full fruits of His action will be experienced by the believer in the last day (Rom. 8:23). 31 The only boasting permitted the Christian is in what Christ has done for him. Paul's application of Je. 9:23f. to Christ points to His deity.

2:1 When I came. See Acts 18:1f. and Introduction, 'Paul's links with Corinth'. Testimony; bearing witness to God's work in Christ for men's salvation (cf. 1:6). 2 I decided. Paul is not suggesting that following apparent lack of response in Athens (Acts 17:32f.) he changed his method on moving to Corinth. He is here stating his invariable practice, the more positively because he addresses those who prize 'wisdom', and also in contrast to others in Corinth. Paul concentrates on the central truths: who Jesus is—the Christ or promised Messiah; and where hope of salvation lies, viz. in what He did: in the Messiah crucified (the him is emphatic). 3 Weakness; cf. 2 Cor. 10:10; 12:10. Fear; see Acts 18:9, 10. 4 The Corinthians might not appreciate plain speech, but flights of oratory or philosophy were not for Paul. Message; i.e. the content of what he said and the way he said it. Demonstration; convincing proof, brought about solely by the power of the Spirit. 5 Paul's purpose from the outset was to ensure that their faith was divinely based and not due in any sense to human persuasiveness. For faith to survive in a city like Corinth it needed a supernatural basis.

6 Mature. There are spiritual 'babies' at Corinth (3:1; cf. Heb. 6:1), but others who have grown in the Christian life will understand what Paul means by the revealed divine wisdom (defined in 1:30). Not a wisdom of this age; i.e. not simply the clever use of words, which is no substitute for true Christian preaching. Worldly wisdom obstructs the work of the Spirit, and puts forward man-centred values which readily suggest that the cross is foolishness. Rulers of this age. Behind the evil designs of the earthly authorities (e.g. Pilate, Caiaphas) were the supernatural powers of darkness (cf. Col. 2:15). 7 AV follows the Greek literally: 'We speak the wisdom of God in a mystery.' 'Mystery' (Gk. mystērion) in the NT is a 'secret revealed to faith', as RSV brings out. Hidden; impossible for men to discover by reasoning. Before the ages. God's wise plan of salvation (1:18) is no afterthought (2 Thes. 2:13, 14). 8 The earthly rulers of the time showed their complete lack of understanding in the way they treated Christ (cf. Acts 4:27). In His love God has all along had our glorification in mind; hence Christ is described as the Lord of glory. 9 As it is written; a free adaptation of Is. 64:4 and 65:17. The natural man is unable to perceive or imagine what God has in view to do.

10 To us; emphatic in the Greek. The divine plan about Christ's work has been revealed to Christians. The whole process is the work of the Spirit (cf. 12:3). Searches everything. Not in the sense of needing information but rather of 'penetrating' into all things. Depths of God; 'unfathomable' to human minds. 11 A human analogy is helpful. Only a man's spirit (his 'self-consciousness') knows that man's thoughts. How much less can a mere human being know the inward truths of God, unless the Spirit of God takes the initiative and reveals them to him? 12 But Christians are privileged to have God's Spirit and thereby can understand all the blessings freely bestowed by the gospel. The spirit of the world may inspire geniuses in human fields, but not apostles for the spreading of the knowledge of God. 13 We impart this. No-one can pass on this secret to others except as he is taught by the Spirit, and even then the ground must be prepared by the Spirit. 'God alone can speak truth about God' (Pascal). The very words, not merely the ideas, are provided by the Spirit. The perpetual problem of communication is here answered. Two translation problems obscure the latter part of this verse. To those who possess the Spirit paraphrases one Greek adjective, which RSV takes as masculine. It could be neuter, however: 'with spiritual things' (RSV mg.). Interpreting. The Greek usually means 'combining'. L. Morris (The First Epistle of Paul to the Corinthians, TNTC, 1958) suggests: 'combining spiritual things (the words spoken) with spiritual things (the truths expressed)'. C. K. Barrett (The First Epistle to the Corinthians, 1968) prefers: 'interpreting spiritual truths by means of spiritual words'.

14, 15 Unspiritual; 'natural' (AV, RSV mg., RV), one lacking the Spirit and the spiritual insight He alone can give (cf. Eph. 2:1; 4:17f.). Receive; welcome as a guest. Discerned. The Greek verb means 'to scrutinize, sift', the word used of the Beroeans examining the Scriptures (Acts 17:11). The same verb is translated judges . . . judged in v. 15. The spiritual man; one with the Spirit within him, i.e. a Christian. All things; i.e. both secular and spiritual. No one; no man lacking the Spirit. The Christian's source of inspiration and strength is a mystery to the natural man, who therefore finds him an enigma. 16 Who has known . . . ? is from Is. 40:13. This declares the natural man's ignorance of the mind of God. What is otherwise impossible has now come to pass. Mind of Christ. The Holy Spirit enables the Christian to see things from Christ's point of view (cf. Phil. 2:5).

3:1 – 4:21 God's servants

1 During Paul's first stay in Corinth he could not address the Christians there as spiritual men, those who had matured (cf. Eph. 4:13–16) as they were but young in the faith (cf. 1 Pet. 1:23). Unhappily they have failed to grow spiritually since then. 2 Milk; i.e. elementary teaching (cf. Heb. 5:11f.), but not a 'watered-down' message. Its content was defined in 2:1, 2. 3 The Corinthians are still of the flesh, i.e. though Christians, they are dominated by their lower nature (Rom. 13:14; Gal. 5:16–24), and so in practice are little better than ordinary men who know nothing of the Spirit (cf. Jas. 3:14f.). 4 One says; taking up again the party cries of 1:12. Merely men; arguing like worldly people, an attitude completely unspiritual and therefore un-Christian.

5 What, rather than 'who' (AV), fixes attention upon the function of those named, and their relative insignificance—servants of the one Lord. As the Lord assigned. The apportioning of the work is His responsibility. The servants are merely the agents through whom He works. 6, 7 The agricultural symbolism stresses the limited and subordinate character of what Paul and Apollos have done. I planted. Paul was the first evangelist in Corinth (cf. Rom. 15:20). Apollos watered; cf. Acts 18:27 – 19:1. God gave the growth. The creation and fostering of faith is the work of God alone. Without Him there would be no result from men's efforts. 8 Equal; literally 'one'. Their activities, whether 'planting' or 'watering', are one and complementary; so they ought not to be the cause of dissensions. Each has his own responsibility and each will receive his wages (cf. Mt. 20:8). The controlling factor is according to his labour, not 'his success' (cf. Mt. 25:21). The Corinthians are in effect quarrelling about which of the 'under-gardeners' is more important. 9 RSV takes fellow workmen as 'those co-operating together in God's service', but the Greek is probably as AV, 'together with God' (cf. RSV mg.; Mk. 16:20). In the Greek the word God's is very emphatic, being thrice repeated as the first word of three phrases. The apostle now changes the picture from work in a field to work on a building.

10 Commission; Greek charis, 'grace'. Paul glories in an undeserved privilege enjoyed by God's free gift (cf. Rom. 12:3; Eph. 3:8). Skilled (Gk. sophos, 'wise'); used of the workmen who erected and adorned the Tabernacle (Ex. 35:10). The master builder (Gk. architectōn) superintended the building operation, contributing knowledge rather than labour. I laid; i.e. on Paul's first visit to Corinth. Another man is building. In the establishment of the church in Corinth different workmen have co-operated (v. 6a). Each man is answerable to God for his share in the work. The phrase comes four times in vv. 8–13. 11 Men have no choice about the foundation, which must be the Person and work of Jesus Christ (cf. 2:2; 1 Pet. 2:5). Any other foundation would not produce the church (Gal. 1:7). 12 What is built upon the foundation may be durable: gold, silver, precious stones; or perishable: wood, hay, stubble. The precious stones are either costly, as marble or granite, or suitable for ornamentation (cf. Is. 54:11f.; Rev. 21:18ff.). 13 The Day, i.e. of judgment, when Christ returns (cf. 4:5), will be the occasion when each man's work will be shown up in its true character. It will be revealed. The subject is probably the Day rather than a man's work (cf. Mal. 4:1). Fire illumines as well as burns (cf. 2 Thes. 1:7). It is frequently a symbol of divine activity (e.g. Ex. 3:2; 13:21; 19:18; Acts 2:3). Work . . . done; i.e. in building on the foundation of Jesus Christ. Only those who minister in the church of God are in view here. 14 The reward (cf. 3:8) is undefined, but cannot be salvation itself (see v. 15). The parable of the pounds (Lk. 19:11–27) suggests opportunites of higher service. 15 Loss; i.e. of his reward (cf. 9:27). 'He personally will be safe, though rather like a man rescued from a fire' (Phillips). Through means 'out of the midst of', not 'by means of' (cf. 'through water', 1 Pet. 3:20). There is no suggestion here of a purifying fire or 'purgatory'. The fire reveals the quality of work done here on earth; it is not a means of improving the character of him who did it.

16 Do you not know? appeals to an acknowledged fact; the phrase occurs ten times in this letter. Temple; not the Greek hieron, which includes the temple precincts, but naos, 'sanctuary', suggesting the very dwelling-place of God (cf. 1 Pet. 2:4–10). You is plural, i.e. the local church, the worshipping community of believers (cf. 2 Cor. 6:16; Eph. 2:21f.). 17 If any one destroys; i.e. by false teaching or by causing grievous division, thus driving out the Spirit of God. God's temple is not the church of God in general (cf. Mt. 18:17) but as represented by the local congregation. Such local churches have indeed vanished in history (e.g. those of Rev. 2, 3). God will destroy him. Retribution is not vindictive but inevitable, for the one responsible reveals by his activity that he rejects God's salvation. Holy; i.e. set apart for God's use, and sanctified by His presence.

18 Paul reverts to the subject of the folly of worldly wisdom. In this connection it is fatally easy for anyone to deceive himself (cf. 6:9; 15:33; Gal. 6:3, 7). Wise in this age hints at changing fashions. Become a fool; i.e. in the eyes of the world, by becoming a Christian, but thereby gaining spiritual insight which is true wisdom (cf. 2:6; Col. 2:3). 19 Paul quotes Jb. 5:13 to drive home his point—quotations from Job are rare in the NT. Catches expresses the secure grip God has upon the slippery cleverness of the wicked. Though craftiness may deceive men, it cannot deceive God. 20 The Lord knows . . . is quoted from Ps. 94:11. Thoughts (Gk. dialogismoi); often in a bad sense of men questioning God's ways (cf. Lk. 5:22; 6:8). Futile; without lasting result (cf. Rom. 1:21). 21, 22 Far from needing to boast of men and their wisdom and ability, as the Corinthians were doing (1:12; cf. 1:31), they were as Christians possessors of all things (cf. Rom. 8:32). This includes all Christian teachers (inverting 1:12) and their gifts of ministry. By each following one favoured teacher, the Corinthian parties were impoverishing themselves. The world; not merely in the ethical sense (v. 19), but the whole of creation viewed as the Christian's rightful inheritance (cf. Gn. 1:26; Rom. 4:13). 23 You are Christ's; not Paul's (cf. 1:12). Each believer belongs to and is responsible to Christ (cf. 1:30; 6:19f.). The Christian's life must reflect this community of interest and duty of service. Christ is God's; cf. 11:3; 15:28. No subordination within the Godhead is intended. Messiah and His people are viewed as one entity belonging to God. The incarnate Son voluntarily took a lowly place among men to bring about man's salvation. Christ 'has all, because He is content to belong to the Father (Jn. 14:28; 1 Cor. 11:3); and we have all, while we are content to belong to Him' (H. L. Goudge, The First Epistle to the Corinthians', WC, 1915).

4:1, 2 The apostles are not rival party-leaders (cf. 1:2), but Christ's servants (Gk. hypēretai, 'under-rowers', those who rowed in the lower bank of oars on a large ship) and stewards. A 'steward' had the responsible oversight of his master's household (cf. 1 Tim. 3:15). By stewards Paul is not suggesting that apostles should be ecclesiastical administrators (cf. Acts 6:2) but emphasizing the need to be absolutely trustworthy. They are stewards of the mysteries of God (see on 2:7), i.e. responsible for proclaiming unblemished the clear facts of the gospel (cf. 1:17; 2:2), not their own views. 3 Judged by you. Paul is answerable to his Master (Rom. 14:4), not to any amateur human court raked together by his Corinthian opponents. Judge myself. It is impossible rightly to assess even one's own achievements. To attempt this may result in improper elation or depression. 'Judging' in the sense of self-examination to improve one's Christian life and service is not in view here (cf. 11:31). 4 Paul is not aware of any failure in his service, but he is not relying upon a clear conscience to be acquitted, absolved by God's tribunal, which alone is competent to reach a correct verdict. 5 Things now hidden; i.e. facts of men's conduct now unknown or forgotten. Darkness in the NT often refers to evil deeds (Jn. 3:19). Purposes; only God can rightly assess motives (Rom. 2:16). Commendation from God is the only praise that matters (Mt. 25:21; Rom. 2:29); and being from God the award is final.

Three judgments (evaluations) are mentioned in this section: a. Judgment others pass on us (v. 3). This must be without full knowledge and can be disregarded. b. Judgment of one's own conscience (v. 4). This also lacks some factors, and although very important cannot be perfect. c. Only the Lord's judgment (v. 4) can be complete and final (cf. Jn. 3:20).

6 For your benefit. Paul has talked of himself and Apollos. The Corinthians know to whom also (as unworthy ministers in Corinth) these standards of judgment ought to be applied. According to scripture (lit. 'what is written'); i.e. according to its general sense. Parry in CGT argues that the Greek means 'not to go beyond the terms', i.e. of their commission as teachers, but, as the RSV translation brings out, Paul probably had the OT in mind. Puffed up. Their conceit and arrogance is mentioned several times (4:18f.; 5:2; 8:1; 13:4). 7 Their supposed superiority is self-assumed. All is owed to God's grace, and so boasting is out of place. 8 With heavy irony Paul contrasts apostolic truth with Corinthian illusion. Already . . . filled. The Corinthians are perilously self-satisfied (Rev. 3:17; cf. Mt. 5:6). Without us; not 'without our help' but 'without our company'. Kings; they have already 'arrived' while apostles still struggle! 9 Exhibited. 'God meant us apostles to come in at the very end, like doomed gladiators in the arena' (Moffatt). Condemned criminals were often paraded in public. This corresponds to the condition of discipleship—the real meaning of bearing one's cross (Mt. 16:24). Note that this condition is God-given. The apostles, not the Corinthians, exhibited what God intends Christ's followers to be. Spectacle; Greek theatron, 'seen as in a theatre'. To angels; cf. 1 Pet. 1:12.

10–13 pungently depict the harsh facts of life for the apostles (cf. 2 Cor. 6:4–10; 11:23–29). 10 Fools; i.e. in the eyes of the world. Wise in Christ; or so the Corinthians complacently think. Held in honour; eminent. In disrepute (Gk. atimos); used of one deprived of citizenship (cf. 2 Cor. 12:10–12). 11 Present hour; not past and perhaps exaggerated memories, but an up-to-date report. Paul and his companions are treated like tramps. 12 Working; 'slogging'. The Greeks despised manual labour, but Paul gloried in it (cf. 9:6; 1 Thes. 2:9). Paul highlights the Corinthians' failure to appreciate true Christian values, for to bless (cf. Lk. 6:28) . . . endure . . . conciliate were all responses alien to the worldly-wise Greeks. 13 The Greek words for refuse ('sweepings') and offscouring were used with reference to human sacrifice. Worthless members of society were chosen in such cases, which adds point to Paul's remarks.

14 No doubt Paul's words did make the Corinthians blush, yet his purpose was rather to admonish. The cognate noun in Eph. 6:4 describes a father's 'instruction' of his children. Beloved children emphasizes his tender parental relationship. 15 Countless guides ironically implies too many! A 'guide' (Gk. paidagōgos) was a slave who escorted his master's child to school. Though he might love his charge, he could never be as close to him as the father, a relationship Paul claims to the Corinthians (cf. 9:2). 16 Imitators. Not personal following (cf. 1:12), but as defined in 11:1. Paul boldly accepts that preaching and practice must tally. 17 Paul exercised his right as their spiritual father to exhort them. The visit Timothy made was evidently short, for he is back when Paul begins 2 Corinthians. My . . . child. He was converted through Paul at Lystra (Acts 14:6, 7; 16:1). Everywhere in every church. Paul is not treating the Corinthians differently. Cf. 7:17; 11:16; 14:33b, 36. 18, 19 Arrogant; confident that as Paul had sent a substitute before (v. 17), so he would still not dare to come himself. Possibly the 'Christ' party (cf. 1:12; 2 Cor. 10:7–11), who despised apostolic authority, is meant. 20 The kingdom of God; mentioned in 1 Cor. 6:9, 10; 15:24, 50, but rarely outside the Gospels. God's rule is not a matter of fine talk (cf. v. 8) and good advice. Men often know what they ought to do; they need God's power to do it. 21 Love must sometimes wield a rod, ready to chastise and rebuke (cf. 2 Sa. 7:14).

5:1 - 6:20 MORAL FAILURE

5:1–13 Incest

1 Another example of conceited self-satisfaction among the Corinthians is their condoning incest (cf. Lv. 18:8), presumably on the ground of their 'liberty' in Christ (cf. 1 Cor. 6:12; 10:23). Corinth was notorious for its sexual licence (see Introduction, 'Corinth'), but this case scandalized even the pagans. Father's wife. Presumably the culprit's pagan stepmother, otherwise Paul would have said 'mother' and included her, if a Christian, in the indictment. 2 Mourn suggests that the church is bereaved of a member. The offender should have been removed, excommunicated (see v. 13).

3, 4 Absence from Corinth does not prevent Paul from condemning the 'new morality'. He calls for a solemn church meeting to be held and disciplinary judgment passed. He indicates the sanctions which give its action authority—the power and the name of the Lord Jesus (cf. Acts 3:16). 5 The Corinthians are to expel the culprit from the church and thus back into the domain of Satan (cf. Col. 1:13; 1 Tim. 1:20; 1 Jn. 5:19). Flesh is man's lower nature, the seat of evil; but here doubtless includes the body, for destruction is physical. Illness often appears in the Bible as Satan's work (see Jb. 2:7; Lk. 13:16). He is here to be made to serve God's purposes. Moral disorders were thus sometimes followed by sickness and death (cf. 1 Cor. 11:30). Paul's intention is clearly disciplinary and remedial, and ultimately for the man's spiritual benefit. 6 By their laxity the Corinthians betray their ignorance of the nature of Christian life. Boasting is aptly portrayed by the swelling of dough. Leaven (yeast) in Scripture symbolizes evil (cf. Ex. 12:15; Mt. 16:11, 12). One evildoer is enough to defile the whole Christian fellowship. 7 Cleanse out. Evil must be removed entirely, for it is by nature corrupting. Fresh dough. The church is a society of those whose lives have been radically and divinely recreated (cf. 2 Cor. 5:17). The Israelites had to remove all leaven from their houses before the Passover festival (Ex. 12:15, 19f.). Their paschal lamb prefigured Christ (1 Pet. 1:19). (The crucifixion probably took place on Nisan 14, the day the paschal lambs were slain.) His sacrificial death, by taking away sin, makes Christians, the new Israel, unleavened, i.e. free from evil. 8 Let us celebrate; continuous present tense. The Christian life is likened to a constant festival; so believers must continuously keep 'leaven' out of their lives and fellowship.

9, 10 If some Corinthians were too lax, others were too rigid, refusing all contact with unbelievers. I wrote. The 'previous letter', which has not survived (see Introduction, 'How many letters and visits?'). Paul's instruction not to mix with immoral men had been misunderstood. Of course in this world it is impossible not to mix with some evil men. The command to cease fellowship applies only to professing Christians (church members) who become immoral. 11 He may bear the name of brother, but he is not living the life of a Christian. The catalogue of sins vividly sketches the background from which many early converts came. Not even to eat; i.e. social meals, but the Lord's Supper is included. Note the stern view taken, e.g., of covetousness and abusive language, and the open and severe character of the disciplinary action. 12 It is not a Christian's function to pass judgment on the heathen behaviour of outsiders (cf. 6:2). But those inside the church are certainly the church's responsibility. 13 Drive out. In the OT (e.g. Dt. 17:7) this instruction always has a singular verb. Paul uses the plural: excommunication concerns the whole church community, with whom, under Christ, authority is vested. The old covenant ordained death for gross sinners, and so the penalty under the new covenant is not excessive.

6:1–11 Litigation

1 Paul now deals with another cause of scandal. Grievance against renders a Greek phrase used in the papyri for 'lawsuit'. Does he dare? i.e. 'How dare he!' Paul was deeply shocked. Even Jews living in heathen cities did not take such cases before Gentile courts. Unrighteous; i.e. not Christian. Paul is not suggesting that pagan courts are corrupt. As a good citizen the Christian acknowledges civil law (Rom. 13:1–7). Paul himself claimed its protection (Acts 18:12f.; 25:16). But to invoke pagan courts to settle lawsuits between believers was a confession of Christian failure. When a dispute between brethren could not be amicably settled by them, the matter should be decided before the saints, the church (cf. Mt. 18:17). 2 Do you not know? An appeal to a recognized fact. The words occur six times in this chapter. Judge the world; not now (see 5:12) but in the next age (cf. Dn. 7:22; Mt. 19:28; Rev. 3:21; 20:4). 3 The inclusion of angels (cf. Jude 6; 2 Pet. 2:4) indicates that world here means the universe, not just human society. This is based perhaps on Dn. 7:18, where sharing the kingdom would involve sharing the king's authority. 4 Least esteemed; i.e. pagans, those whose standards and judgments are worthless compared with those of Christians. Or, as AV, RV mg.: If judgment on such matters is necessary, let those thought least of in the church tackle them. 5 Shame; cf. 4:14. Wise enough. A stinging reference to the Corinthians' claim to wisdom (cf. 4:10). Surely without setting up a court to conduct a trial a fellow-Christian could be asked to give his decision. 6 Goes to law. Lawsuits against one another should anyway be avoided by Christians; and to engage in them with unbelievers as judges was surely unthinkable. 7 Defeat; i.e. in the spiritual contest, whatever the legal verdict. Suffer wrong; a principle laid down by Jesus (Mt. 5:39f.). 8 Defraud. Sharp practice, unethical in any company, was doubly sinful in a society based on brotherly love.

9, 10 Unrighteous; those who are not Christians (cf. 6:1). They are defined in type and character by the lists which follow. Inherit; i.e. be citizens of the future kingdom of God and enjoy its benefits and privileges (cf. 15:50; Gal. 5:21). The inclusion of idolaters among sexual offenders recalls the immoral nature of much contemporary heathen worship (see Introduction, 'Corinth'). 11 Paul frankly recognizes the pre-Christian character of the Corinthian converts. Three times a strong adversative 'but' (Gk., AV) stresses the contrasts. Such unpromising material required the mighty power of God to recreate characters and attitudes (cf. Rom. 6:17). In the name of ... Christ ... Spirit ... God. Note the unconscious Trinitarianism. The words may recall the actual formula used in baptism and the complementary baptism of the Spirit which effects the vital change. Lightfoot considers there is reference here to the external and internal essential of baptism. Thus association with the sinners of v. 10 is all the more intolerable. Justified; i.e. declared righteous before God's tribunal because of Christ's atoning sacrifice. To jeopardize the 'inheritance' (vv. 9, 10) by a return to the evil practices listed is unthinkable (cf. Tit. 3:3–7).

6:12–20 Fornication condemned

Paul dealt with a particular case of immorality in ch. 5. Now he turns to the basic principle, and incidentally provides Christian teaching about the body. Redeemed by Christ's sacrifice (v. 20) and indwelt by the Spirit (v. 19), the Christian's body forms part of Christ's body, the church (v. 15); after death it will be raised (v. 14) and so continue God's purposes.

12 All things. . . . Perhaps a current slogan (repeated in 10:23), claimed by the Corinthians to justify their loose behaviour. The maxim needs careful qualification (cf. 1 Pet. 2:16). Liberty is not licence. Helpful; i.e. towards Christlikeness. Only actions motivated by love build up (cf. 8:1). It is possible so to use liberty as to become enslaved by one's desires (cf. 2 Pet. 2:19; Gal. 5:1, 13). 13 Food is meant. . . . Perhaps another slogan. The implied comparison is that sex is as natural and transient as eating. Paul replies that God did not design the body for fornication or passing sexual 'satisfaction', as He did the stomach simply for food. For Paul, body is much more than the physical: it includes the whole personality. As the stomach requires food for its proper function, so the 'body' requires the Lord to fulfil its God-intended purpose of service and sacrifice (cf. Phil. 1:20; Heb. 10:5), and can find its true satisfaction only in Him (Jn. 6:54). 14 The resurrection of the Lord and of Christians is intimately linked (cf. 1 Cor. 15:20; Rom. 8:11; Phil. 3:21). The present physical body must be properly valued and used (cf. 2 Cor. 5:10). As a resurrected body (cf. 15:35f.) it will still be needed for God's purposes.

15 Members of Christ. Paul develops the thought of Christians as the body of Christ in 12:12f.; Rom. 12:5; Eph. 5:23; Col. 1:18. Take ('take away'); i.e. from their proper Lord and their proper use. 16, 17 Prostitute; i.e. attached to a pagan temple: not a 'call-girl'. In both Testaments resort to a temple prostitute meant resort to a strange god. As it is written; in Gn. 2:54. Cf. Mt. 19:5; Eph. 5:31. Joins (v. 16) and united (v. 17) translate the same verb, which literally means 'glued'. The bond is as close as it can be. Becomes one spirit. The Christian's body and personality are controlled by the Holy Spirit, a position brought about by the work of the Lord (Christ). 18 Shun ('flee from') immorality; present imperative, indicating a constant attitude and reaction (cf. 10:14; 1 Thes. 4:3). Disapproval is insufficient: evasive action is required. Every other sin against the body (e.g. gluttony, drunkenness), as Tasker points out (TNTC, p. 102), involves 'the use of that which comes from without the body. The sexual appetite rises from within. . . . They are sinful in the excess. This is sinful in itself.' Against his own body, and therefore against his own personality (v. 13). 19 Do you not know?—for the sixth time in this chapter. Temple. The individual Christian is the personal shrine of the Holy Spirit, who is not concerned simply with a man's soul. From God. Since the temple belongs to God, the Christian is not independent. 20 Bought; aorist tense, pointing to Christ's one decisive action on the cross (cf. 7:22f.; 2 Pet. 2:1). The language reflects a contemporary custom. By paying the price of his liberty into a god's temple, a slave became the god's property; but society now considered him free. Our redemption by Christ from the enslavement of sin was no such pious fiction, but at the cost of His sacrifice (1 Pet. 1:18, 19; Gal. 5:1; Tit. 2:14). Glorify God; but not simply by refraining from immorality: the body, i.e. the whole person, is to be used positively in Christian service (cf. Rom. 12:1).

7:1–40 MARRIAGE PROBLEMS

In chs. 7–15 Paul deals with matters raised in a letter from Corinth (see Introduction, 'How many letters and visits?'). Ch. 7 is not a treatise on marriage, but answers six questions on the subject, with a general governing principle in vv. 17–24. The problems posed by the Corinthians would be prompted by the different cultures represented in their church—Jewish, Greek, Roman—each with an accepted approach to marriage. Paul distinguishes between commands of Jesus during His ministry and his own apostolic rulings, for which inspiration is claimed (v. 40); and between divinely ordained principles obligatory upon all and points into which personal choice may enter (see, e.g., vv. 7, 36f.), for men's gifts and calling differ, and circumstances vary.

7:1–7 Question one

Are couples to continue normal sexual relations after conversion? Yes; they owe it to one another to do so.

1, 2 Now concerning (repeated 7:25; 8:1; 12:1; 16:1) introduces Paul's replies to the Corinthians' questions. It is well . . . woman is probably a quotation from their letter (cf. 6:12), for Paul goes on to disagree. Touch a woman; a euphemism for sexual intercourse (cf. Gn. 20:6). Some were probably urging complete abstinence. Having opposed licence in 6:13–20, Paul now opposes asceticism. The two extremes were encouraged by Gnostic views of matter as evil (cf. 1 Tim. 4:3). Paul argues that marriage is the norm. Celibacy, as some say, is good. But temptation to immoral acts (the Greek is plural) abounds, especially in Corinth (see Introduction, 'Corinth'). Marriage was the divinely appointed safeguard; so each should have (i.e. 'must', not 'may') his own spouse—an incidental reference to monogamy. 3, 4 Marriage must be real, not 'spiritual'. Should give; the Greek indicates the paying of a debt rather than the conferring of a favour (cf. Mk. 12:17). Husband and wife have equal sex rights, a novelty in antiquity. 5, 6 Do not refuse (Gk. 'defraud'), i.e. withhold what is owed. Any abstention must be mutually agreed, temporary, and have a spiritual objective (cf. 1 Pet. 3:7). Devote yourselves; literally 'have leisure for'. Cf. Ec. 3:5; Joel 2:15, 16. Paul's concession shows wise balance. Abstinence carried to extreme may only expose one to temptation—to satisfy the appetite wrongly. 7 As I myself am; i.e. by God's special gift not in need of a marriage partner. If Paul was once married, he is now widowed. Celibacy and marriage alike are special gifts. Every Christian is called to serve God in one state or the other (cf. Mt. 19:11f.). Different courses are in consequence God's will for different individuals.

7:8, 9 Question two

Should the unmarried marry? Paul commends celibacy—but only for those with that gift.

8 Single has been inserted by RSV. But unmarried (Gk. agamos) covers divorcee (as v. 11), bachelor and widower. So probably unmarried here means 'widowers' (pairing with widows), otherwise the omission of bereaved husbands is strange. (Greek has no special word for widower.) Only exceptionally did a Jew remain unmarried (cf. Je. 16:2). Probably the apostle was a widower. If 'I cast my vote' (Acts 26:10) indicates Paul belonged to the Sanhedrin, he must have been married. It is well for them; see vv. 26, 32. 9 Self-control. If they lack the gift of celibacy, they should marry. Enforced abstinence is valueless if it means being aflame with passion, i.e. emotionally distracted by unsatisfied appetite. Sexual desire is natural and marriage is provided for its fulfilment.

Is divorce permitted to a Christian couple? No.

10 Not I but the Lord; i.e. Jesus (cf. Mk. 10:1–12). These are not simply Paul's own views. 11 Should not divorce. Christ's exception in a case of fornication (Mt. 5:32; 19:9) is not mentioned; but Paul is not composing a full treatise on the subject. If two Christians who have separated find they cannot happily live a single life, the only course properly open to them is to be reconciled. Remain single. Remarriage is excluded while the other spouse is alive (cf. Rom. 7:3). Separated partners are thus still subject to church discipline; they are not expelled from the fellowship.

7:12–16 Question four

When one partner gets converted, should old relationships continue with the pagan spouse? Yes. The Christian is not to leave the unbelieving partner unless the latter desires separation.

12, 13 The problem of mixed marriages would hardly have arisen during Christ's ministry, and so Paul cannot quote a specific word of the Lord. But his own judgment is given authoritatively. 14 The unbelieving husband is consecrated, i.e. not 'made personally holy' (cf. 6:11), for he is still unsaved (v. 16), but treated as in a special relationship with God solely for the purpose of the marriage. Children of such a union are similarly covered, presumably until of responsible age. Scripture teaches that divine blessings extend to individuals' children and to their sphere of life (Gn. 17:7; 39:5). Some would contend that since the children are holy this means they should be treated as members of the people of God, and therefore baptized. Logically, however, this would also apply to the pagan spouse, for consecrated and holy derive from the same Greek root. Paul's aim is doubtless to reassure Christians that there is for them nothing in a mixed marriage contrary to Christian holiness. 15 But if, following the other's conversion, the unbelieving partner desires to discontinue the marriage, separation may follow. The brother or sister, i.e. the Christian partner, is not bound to maintain the union against the other's wishes. Since one is now converted, there is a new and fundamental difference between them, with social as well as spiritual consequences. Separation in this case presumably means that the Christian is free to marry someone else—provided he or she is a Christian (v. 39). The guiding principle must be what tends to promote peace, for this is God's general will and purpose for Christians. 16 Whether you will; i.e. 'perhaps you will'. If the believer views the mixed marriage, with its inevitable difficulties, as a missionary situation, it is possible that the heathen partner will ultimately be converted (cf. 1 Pet. 3:1f.).

7:17–24 A general principle

17 The conditional liberty allowed in the matter of mixed marriages is exceptional. Normally a Christian is to continue to lead the life he was living when God's call to become a Christian came to him; i.e. he is socially, etc., to stay put. No violent changes should be made simply because of conversion; this applies to differences of racial custom and social status. Paul twice underlines this principle (vv. 20, 24) as he discusses the great dividing factors in religion and society in his day, circumcision and slavery. 18, 19 Circumcision was the distinctive sign of the divine covenant (Gn. 17:10ff.). Now Christ has come the mark is valueless (Gal. 5:6; 6:15). Paradoxically (for circumcision was itself a divine commandment) Paul now adds that what is all-important is keeping the commandments of God. By this Paul means obeying God's will as now revealed in Jesus (Jn. 14:21; Gal. 6:2). The point is developed in 9:20ff. (cf. Rom. 2:25ff.; 13:8ff.). 20, 21 If a slave is converted, he is not to mind his social status (cf. 1:26ff.). His Christian calling is to serve God where he is (Eph. 6:5), although if he can legitimately gain his freedom he should do so. 22 Relationship to the Lord alters everything. When a slave becomes a Christian, he becomes the Lord's freedman, i.e. he is delivered from bondage to sin and death. When someone not a slave becomes a Christian, he becomes Christ's slave, i.e. he owes Him complete loyalty and service. 23, 24 Believers belong to Christ, for they have been bought at the price of His life (cf. 1 Pet. 1:18f.). So Christians should not be slaves of men, i.e. dragooned by others in the way they are to live. For Christ is now their owner; and His will is that in whatever state each became a Christian, there he should remain—with this difference: that in Christ he now faces life in fellowship with God.

7:25–38 Question five

Ought Christian fathers to give their daughters in marriage? Each father should make his own decision. 'But bear in mind the passing nature of the world and the greater liberty to serve Christ that being single offers.'

25 The unmarried; 'virgins' (AV) can include both sexes (cf. Rev. 14:4). Paul first discusses in general terms the advisability of not marrying, before turning to the specific problem about daughters in vv. 36–38. While Paul again cannot quote a direct command of the Lord (cf. 7:12), he gives an opinion which by the witness of the Spirit he is sure is in line with God's thought (cf. 7:40). Though aware of his human frailties, Paul claims that by the Lord's mercy (cf. 2 Cor. 4:1; 1 Tim. 1:15f.) he speaks authoritatively. Trustworthy. The Greek pistos expresses both faithfulness and the possession of Christian faith; one follows the other. 26 Paul may again be quoting from the Corinthians' letter: 'In view of the impending distress there is much sense, as you say, in a person not changing his status.' The impending distress was evidently more than ordinary antagonism (cf. 2 Tim. 3:12), but probably not the portents presaging the second advent (Lk. 21:23), for Paul never mentions these signs in his many references to Christ's return. This event, however, is not far from his mind (v. 29). 28 Remaining single avoids many worldly troubles (cf. Mk. 4:19), i.e. cares and problems inevitably involved in family life. 29, 30 Apart from the local distress apparently pressing upon the Corinthians, the appointed time for the return of the Lord is imminent. From now on, therefore, they should no longer be engrossed in whatever would normally absorb their attention, be it earthly relationships, e.g. with their wives, or day-to-day experiences like mourning, rejoicing, or trading. 31 Christians are to hold loosely to all that concerns this world (cf. Col. 3:2), as though they had no dealings with it; or rather, 'not using it to the full', i.e. not being absorbed with its affairs (form).

32 Paul commends the unmarried state because a single person can give himself wholly to the affairs of the Lord, i.e. make it his one business to please Him. 33, 34 The married man must of necessity concern himself also with the needs of wife and children. So his interests are divided, i.e. he wants to please both his wife (as a good husband) and the Lord (as a good Christian). A similar difficulty faces a woman. If unmarried, she can serve the Lord wholeheartedly and without family distractions, however legitimate in themselves (cf. Lk. 10:38–42). She can devote herself to personal holiness or full consecration in body and spirit (cf. Rom. 12:1, 2). 35 Paul's advice is intended as wise guidance, not to lay any restraint (Gk. 'put a halter') upon the Corinthians, i.e. coerce them into a course of action like so many farm animals (cf. 2 Cor. 1:24).

RSV assumes that vv. 36–38 refer to engaged couples. This would reflect a more recent and western situation. In Paul's day marriages were arranged by parents. As in 36 betrothed renders parthenos, 'virgin' (AV), the verse could mean, 'If any father decides that he is not doing his duty by his unmarried daughter. . . .' It was a disgrace for a maiden to have 'no marriage song' (Ps. 78:63). The perils in Corinth for an unmarried girl would weigh with a Christian father. 'If she pass the flower of her age', i.e. the usual marrying age (AV; Gk. hyperakmos), is applied by RSV to the supposed fiancé, and translated if his passions are strong. And it has to be may refer to the absence of the gift of continence, or to an existing marriage contract. In such a situation the father should do as he wishes, i.e. act on his conviction that his daughter ought to be married. 37 But another father is firmly established, convinced that there is no necessity for his daughter to be married; but having his desire under control, being free to act in accordance with his judgment, he has determined, made up his mind, to keep her unmarried (RSV, betrothed)—a decision Paul commends. 38 So Paul judges that he who marries off his daughter does well; but he who refrains from doing so, having in mind the contemporary situation, will do better, i.e. act more wisely.

7:39, 40 Question six

May a Christian widow remarry? Yes—with qualifications.

39 Marriage is indissoluble until death. (Here, as in Rom. 7:1–3, the position of women is considered; but men are equally bound: vv. 11, 27.) The Christian widow is free to marry whom she wishes, i.e. unfettered by the law of levirate marriage (Dt. 25:5–10). But only in the Lord, i.e. to another Christian; for she is a member of Christ's body (cf. 6:15). 40 Yet in Paul's judgment not to remarry would make her happier, i.e. with fewer 'troubles' (v. 28), 'anxieties' (v. 32), and distractions from serving Christ (cf. 1 Tim. 5:5). 'I think', Paul adds with a touch of irony, 'that I too (Gk.) can claim to be in tune with the mind of the Spirit of God as much as any of my opponents.'

8:1 - 11:1 CHRISTIAN FREEDOM AND ITS LIMITATIONS

Another problem raised by the Corinthians concerned the Christian attitude towards the use of food previously offered to idols. This included most of the meat sold in the shops. Was it wrong to eat it? Furthermore in 1st-century Corinth it was customary on sociable occasions to gather for a meal in a pagan temple. Might Christians go? Paul answers by reference to the general principles involved. The Christian is free: but other considerations should limit his use of his freedom.

8:1–13 Respect for the consciences of others

1–3 True, we may have knowledge; but it easily breeds conceit, provides glib answers, and at best is incomplete. What matters more is love. This promotes the good of others, and means being known by God, i.e. acknowledged by Him as His (cf. Mt. 7:23; 2 Tim. 2:19). 4, 5 The truth about God that 'there is no God but one' (Dt. 6:4) is fundamental to right understanding and practice. For in spite of the many so-called gods, an idol has no existence as a god. It is a 'nothing' or a 'vain thing' (cf. Dt. 32:17, 21; Acts 14:15). Later (10:20) Paul will add that evil spirits certainly exist, and it is they who promote idol-worship to lure men away from the true God. 6 It is distinctive of us as Christians to acknowledge the one God as Father, and as the first and final cause of the universe; and with Him to acknowledge Jesus Christ also as Lord (i.e. God), and as the agent of all creation.

7 Some were 'weak' as believers in Christ since they were still unconvinced that an idol had no real existence as a god. They felt they were doing wrong when they ate meat offered to it. Their conscience was defiled not by the food in itself (see Mk. 7:18, 19) but by doing something which their so far unenlightened conscience still said was (for them) wrong (cf. Rom. 14:23). 8 Partaking of or abstinence from food makes no difference to a man's standing with God. 9, 10 But a man of knowledge, an enlightened Christian, who uses his liberty to eat at a social occasion held in an idol's temple, could by his example induce a fellow-believer whose conscience is weak, i.e. unenlightened, to do what was still for him wrong; and this would be to trip him up (cf. Rom. 14:23). 11 By using his knowledge carelessly the maturer Christian could bring spiritual disaster to the other; he will be destroyed, not built up (cf. 8:1). 'The last clause (of v. 11) could hardly be more forcible in its appeal; every word tells: "the brother," not a mere stranger; "for the sake of whom," precisely to rescue him from destruction; "Christ," no less than He; "died," no less than that' (A. Robertson and A. Plummer, The First Epistle of St. Paul to the Corinthians[2], ICC, 1914). Such sinning is doubly wrong. It is both against a Christian brother and against Christ. 12 Also it involved heartlessly wounding the weak. 13 Therefore, Paul summarizes, if some otherwise innocent action by a mature Christian proves to be a cause of involving another believer in defiling his conscience, the former must surrender his right to do it. Yet Paul's declaration is conditional, not absolute. He does not say he will henceforth always be a total abstainer, but only if and when such eating may cause his brother to fall.

9:1–27 Forgoing rights

The principle of self-sacrifice brought out in ch. 8 is now illustrated from Paul's own life. He lists his positions, all of which carry rights. 1 As an ordinary Christian he is free. By divine appointment he is an apostle (cf. 1:1). On the Damascus road (Acts 9) he had the privilege of seeing the Lord Jesus (cf. 2 Cor. 12:1), an essential qualification for an apostle (Acts 1:21f.). 2 Though others may challenge his claim to be an apostle, at least he is one to the Corinthians. They themselves are living proof of his divinely-owned ministry (cf. 2 Cor. 3:2; 12:2).

3 The words This is my defence go more appropriately with the preceding two verses. Paul has put his case. Now he lists the rights which are consequently his. 4 As a Christian minister, the church should provide his food and drink. 5, 6 Had he a wife like others, he could, in his ministerial travels, rightly expect support for two. There is surely nothing which disqualifies him and Barnabas from receiving support? 7 The principle is illustrated in ordinary life. A soldier who draws pay, a landowner who plants a vineyard, or a slave who tends a flock, all obtain sustenance from their occupations. The examples are appropriate. The Christian minister fights evil, plants churches, and shepherds congregations (cf. 2 Tim. 2:3–6; 1 Cor. 3:6, 7; Jn. 21:15–17).

8, 9 It was not just human wisdom but a specific divine command (Dt. 25:4) that forbade the muzzling of an ox to prevent it from eating any of the grain it was treading out. The lesson of this commandment is not exclusively to teach God's concern for oxen, though that is not denied (cf. Mt. 6:26). 10, 11 The word was for our sake. (Entirely: Gk. can mean 'assuredly'.) So it has a higher significance: it indicates that the needs of those who toil should be recognized and their labours recompensed. Similarly, the Christian minister, pictured as a ploughman (i.e. one who begins the cycle of work) or a thresher (one who completes the harvest) should rightly expect material maintenance in return for his spiritual work. In vv. 11, 12 the we is emphatic, in contrast to the others. As the founder or father of the Corinthian church, Paul has still more right than they. The others are not Paul's opponents—no wrong is suggested—but other Christian teachers in general who serve the church. 12 The determining concern which made Paul willing for any hardship was not to interrupt the progress of the gospel. He would give his opponents no excuse for personal attack which would hinder God's work (2 Cor. 6:3; 11:9). 13 In both Jewish and pagan religious practice those who were employed in temple service received subsistence from the temple (Nu. 18:8f., 21f.). 14 By the Lord's (i.e. Christ's) explicit command the same rule applies to those who preach the gospel (see Mt. 10:10; Lk. 10:7).

15, 16 His ground for boasting (see on v. 18) is not that he is a preacher. Necessity presses upon him to proclaim the gospel to others. 17 He did not choose the task. The Lord has commissioned him. Such disinterested self-denial was a proof of his integrity and an answer to any who accused him of mercenary motives. To preach is therefore for him an obligation, not an optional personal interest. 18 His reward, his ground for boasting, is to make the gospel free of charge. 'What pay do I get? The pleasure of refusing pay!' This is why he will not make full use of his right in the gospel.

19 Paul has surrendered more than his right to personal subsistence. Though he is free from all men, i.e. in no sense bound by the standards or fashions of others, he is prepared to make himself a slave to all, and conform to their standards or fashions, providing no real principle is at stake, in order to win as many as possible to saving faith in Christ. 20 So when among Jews he acts as a Jew, conforming to their customs under the Mosaic law (Acts 16:3; 18:18; 21:26), though as a Christian he himself is no longer obliged to keep that law (cf. Gal. 2:11–21). 21 Similarly he is ready to identify himself with those who are not bound by the Jewish law, i.e. Gentiles; though he adds an important proviso. Gentiles not only disregard the Mosaic law, but may also refuse to recognize any divine commandment. Paul, on the other hand, is always under the authority of the true God and of His Christ (7:22). Subject to this overriding consideration, he is prepared to conform to the practice of Gentiles as far as is necessary to win them to Christ. 22 To sum up: Paul is willing to become all things to all men (cf. 2 Cor. 11:29). This does not mean that he will act in an unprincipled manner, or compromise on Christian principles; but he will sacrifice his own legitimate interests and preferences completely, if thereby he may save some. 23 His reason is twofold: for the sake of the gospel, i.e. because it is so precious to him; and that he may not fail himself to share in its blessings (cf. v. 27). NEB renders the last clause 'bear my part in proclaiming it'.

24 The need for rigid self-discipline is illustrated by athletes in training, a familiar sight to every Greek. The Isthmian Games, second only to the Olympics, were held every 3 years in Corinth, and drew immense crowds. To win was to be immortalized by the Greek public. 25 Every athlete, literally 'every one that agonizes', exercises self-control in all things, giving up not only unhealthy pleasures, but even legitimate occupations if they tend to make body or will flabby. Greek athletes were prepared to carry out the 10-month training for a mere wreath of leaves. How much more worth while the Christian's prize! And that prize is imperishable (2 Tim. 4:8). 26 The Christian does not run aimlessly, not knowing the point of the race or where the finishing post is. Nor is he like a shadow-boxer, beating the air without purpose (cf. 14:9). 27 On the contrary, Paul realizes he must, so to speak, pommel (Gk. 'give a black eye to') his body and subdue it; i.e. he must be master of himself in every department. Otherwise Paul fears that after preaching to others, like the herald at the games proclaiming the rules of the contest and calling the competitors together, he himself should be disqualified (Gk. adokimos; cf. 2 Tim. 2:15, where the positive dokimos is used). His own salvation is not in question, but his reward for acceptable service (cf. 3:15).

Note. 5 The brothers of the Lord were evidently active in Christian service. The phrase is remarkable incidental witness to the deity and humanity of Jesus; cf. Gal. 1:19. Nothing in the NT forbids the natural interpretation that they were children of Joseph and Mary born after Jesus.

10:1–13 Warnings of perils to be avoided

The Corinthians' shallow view of Christian liberty (exposed in ch. 8) stemmed from their taking idolatry lightly; and this in turn (so Paul now explains) arose from misunderstanding the nature of Christian baptism and the Lord's Supper. They were not-charms. Even an apostle had to persevere in his Christian life (9:27). Paul illustrates his point from the OT. The fivefold repetition of 'all' in vv. 1–4 emphasizes that the Israelites without exception received high privileges. This throws v. 5 into relief (cf. 9:24).

1, 2 The expression our fathers points to the continuation of the church of God from its OT foundations. The cover given by the divine cloud (Ps. 105:39) and the miraculous deliverance through the water of the Red Sea (Ex. 14) are described as the means whereby the Israelites were baptized into Moses, i.e. brought under his authority and leadership, language obviously designed to parallel to some extent the Christian's baptism into Christ (Rom. 6:3; Gal. 3:27). 3, 4 The Israelites were sustained by supernaturally-given food, the manna of Ex. 16:4 (cf. Jn.

6:31f.). The supernatural Rock which provided their water (Ex. 17:6; cf. Jn. 7:37f.) is said to have followed ('accompanied'; cf. Mt. 9:9) them. Paul is speaking metaphorically; i.e. wherever the Israelites were, the supply never failed. (Jewish tradition, however, took Nu. 20:11; 21:16, etc., to refer to a movable rock with its well.) More important is the explicit reference to Christ as pre-existent, and to His being the source of the people's blessings at all times. Note the clear statement that the Rock was Christ. Paul thus gives to Christ a title used in the OT of God Himself (e.g. Dt. 32:15; Is. 26:4). 5 Despite their spiritual privileges, however, most of them, i.e. all the adults except Caleb and Joshua (Nu. 14:30), displeased the Lord (cf. Heb. 11:6); and so by His sentence they were overthrown (cf. 11:30). The Greek graphically suggests a desert strewn with corpses (cf. Nu. 14:16).

6 These things are historical facts recorded as warnings against sinful desires for evil things. For us: Paul is not exempt (cf. 9:27). 7 The temptation to idolatry was as much before the Corinthians as the ancient Israelites. As it is written; see Ex. 32:6. The people sat down to eat and drink; i.e. taking part in the sacrifices offered to God before the golden calf (Ex. 32:4; cf. 1 Cor. 10:20). And rose up to dance; i.e. ritually. 8 Such activities were also common to idol-worship in Corinth (see Introduction, 'Corinth'), and were accompanied by, or inevitably led to, immorality (cf. Rev. 2:14, 20). Paul quotes an example of a consequent judgment by plague which swept off thousands (see Nu. 25:1–9). 9 Neither must the Corinthians put the Lord to the test (the Greek implies prolonged and severe testing), i.e. see how far they can go in defying His requirements. 10 Nor grumble (cf. Nu. 16); for this many Israelites were destroyed (cf. Nu. 14:2; 21:6). The Destroyer (cf. Ex. 12:23), or 'Angel of Death' (Phillips), is not mentioned in this context in the OT, but the point is plain: rebellion against God invokes divine judgment (cf. 5:5; 11:30).

11 The judgments fell upon the Israelites of the day as a warning (lit. 'typically'). God has caused them to be written down for our (i.e. Christians') instruction. (Modern zeal for ascertaining the meaning of the OT for its first readers forgets what is here taught.) Similar temptations faced the Corinthians, and in different guise face all Christians. The end, i.e. the culmination, of all past ages has arrived (cf. Gal. 4:4; Heb. 1:2). All that happened before Christ came was provisional and symbolical. We have the advantage of learning from the Israelites' experiences, and supremely of knowing the full revelation given by Christ. 12 But as with the Israelites, self-confidence, which saps wholehearted devotion to the Lord, easily leads to a fall. 13 A Christian is not exempt from temptation. But neither is he subject to unique temptations not common to all men everywhere and at all times. Temptation here includes testing and trials. God allows these experiences (cf. Jb. 1:12; 2:6) to stretch and strengthen faith (Gn. 22:1). God is faithful; i.e. to His promise of full salvation. Over against v. 12, which speaks to the careless or overconfident, this is a word to the fearful and despondent—a word of assurance and encouragement. Provide (lit. 'make') the way of escape. The Greek suggests an army trapped in the mountains slipping out through a narrow pass.

Note. 8 Twenty-three thousand fell. Nu. 25:9, Philo and Josephus quote 24,000. Both figures are obviously round numbers, though Paul's additional words in a single day may hint at an explanation. Jewish tradition ascribed 1,000 deaths to the action of the judges described in Nu. 25:5.

10:14–22 The impossibility of compromise

14 My beloved. The affectionate address turns command into entreaty. Shun ('flee from'); present imperative—'Make it your habitual practice' (cf. 6:18). Deliberate avoidance is often the best defence against temptation. The Corinthians were playing with fire by attending pagan festivities. Paul has already said that they might mislead others (8:10). 15 He now gives a deeper reason for avoiding idolatrous practices, and one he expects the Corinthians as sensible men to appreciate. 16 The cup of blessing; the third cup in the Passover festival, so called because a Jewish father pronounced a blessing, i.e. a prayer of thanksgiving (cf. Mt. 26:26 with Lk. 22:17), before passing it round the family. It was quite possibly the cup used by Jesus when instituting the Lord's Supper (Lk. 22:17). The mention of the cup first (contrast 11:26, 28) may be due to the prominence of the cup in pagan sacrifices, for Paul's allusion to the Lord's Supper is for the purpose of warning against idolatry. To share rightly (cf. 11:29) in the bread and wine is a participation (Gk. koinōnia, a common sharing) in the benefits won by the sacrifice of the body and blood of Christ (cf. Rom. 3:25; 5:9). The worshippers are thereby bound in fellowship with the living Christ, and so with one another. 17 That unity is symbolized by the use of the one loaf (cf. 5:7).

18 Paul finds parallels in the practice of Israel. AV adds, with Greek, 'after the flesh', i.e. unbelieving Israel (cf. Rom. 2:28f.; Gal. 6:15f.). Jewish sacrifices were consumed by priests (e.g. Lv. 10:12–15) and by other worshippers (e.g. 1 Sa. 9:11–24). Such actions were acknowledged to be a sharing in the altar and all it represented. 19 Paul is not implying by the illustration that idol's food is anything other than food, or that a stone or wooden idol has any reality (cf. 8:4f.). 20 But communion can be only with the living. Thus what pagans sacrifice, whether they realize it or not, they offer to demons (cf. Dt. 32:17), who take advantage of men's leaning towards idolatry. Paul would save the Corinthians (cf. 7:28) from being unwitting partners with demons (Eph. 6:12). 21 On such an issue there can be no compromise. Fellowship with the Lord and fellowship with demons are utterly incompatible (cf. Is. 65:11). 22 Consequently to join in heathen festivities is inevitably to provoke the Lord to jealousy (cf. Dt. 32:21), for devotion to Him must be exclusive.

10:23 – 11:1 Summary of guiding principles

Paul rounds off his treatment of the subject which has occupied him from 8:1 by considering two practical points: shopping (v. 25) and social meals in private houses (v. 27). Though Christians may not attend idol-feasts, Paul agrees that in itself the eating of food previously offered to idols is immaterial (cf. 6:12f.; 8:8).

23 To the Christian all things are lawful, i.e. he has full liberty of action; but that liberty must be used to build up spiritual life (cf. Rom. 14:20). 24 This can be done only by his considering not his own rights and privileges but the spiritual good of his neighbour. 25, 26 He may eat food bought at the meat-market (cf. 8:1f.) without asking if it has been formally offered in a pagan temple. Food is from God, and all His gifts are good (Ps. 24:1). Being offered in idol-worship cannot affect the divine origin of food. It remains, therefore, fit for God's people to eat, if received with thanksgiving to Him (v. 30; 1 Tim. 4:4f.).

27 Attendance at functions in heathen temples is barred to the Christian. But whether to go to dinner in a pagan home is a personal decision. The Christian is not expected to forgo all social intercourse with unbelievers (cf. 5:9f.). The food provided is to be eaten without asking where it came from (cf. Lk. 10:8). 28, 29a But if some one (evidently a weaker Christian; a pagan would not mind) declares that the food has previously been offered in sacrifice, the enlightened Christian is not to eat it. The principle to follow is again consideration for others (cf. vv. 24, 32, 33), by avoiding hurt to their conscience (cf. 8:7; Rom. 14:13–16). 29b, 30 After the parenthesis of vv. 28, 29a, Paul continues his positive exposition of principles: 'But I am under no obligation to let my liberty be permanently limited by other people's scruples. Since I can partake with thankfulness to God, I ought not to be denounced as doing wrong.'

31, 32 Liberty can become selfish and thankfulness Pharisaic (Lk. 18:11), so the regular rules to follow are: positively, do all to the glory of God; i.e. 'show my fellowmen the love and holiness of my heavenly Father' (F. Godet, Commentary on 1 Corinthians, 2 vols., ET 1893); and, negatively, avoid giving unnecessary offence to Jews with their food laws or to Greeks (i.e. Gentiles outside the church) or to weaker consciences within the church of God. Let Christianity offend only for the right reasons (cf. 1:23). 33 It is Paul's over-riding principle to try to please all men, not personally to curry favour or to avoid persecution, but to set forward the advantage . . . of many, i.e. their salvation (9:19, 22). 11:1 Finally Paul can boldly offer himself as the Corinthians' example, but for the one reason that he imitates Christ (cf. Phil. 3:17; 1 Thes. 1:6; 2 Thes. 3:7, 9).

11:2 – 14:40 PUBLIC WORSHIP AND ITS WORTHY CONDUCT

11:2–16 The veiling of women

When praying, Jewish men and women both used veils (cf. 2 Cor. 3:14). So did Romans. Greeks, without the same awe of God, sacrificed bareheaded. With differing traditions represented in the Corinthian church, the Christian attitude needed defining in the interests of orderly worship (14:40). Believers should not unnecessarily flout social conventions, yet their view must be based on biblical principles. In this case Paul appeals to the relative status of men and women in the created order.

2 Paul praises the Corinthians for maintaining the traditions (cf. 15:1–3; 2 Thes. 2:15), i.e. the oral teaching about Christian doctrine and practice, which Paul had (not invented but) delivered, i.e. faithfully handed on from the Lord or the earlier apostles. 3 He first stresses the new Christian principle of union in subordination. Although the woman is subject to her husband (and decidedly so in ancient days), his authority is significantly modified because of his own subjection to Christ (cf. Eph. 5:23). The principle does not interfere with the personal relationships of men and women to Christ (cf. Gal. 3:28; 1 Pet. 3:7). It must be applied today against the background of the different sociological situation. (Otherwise we must revert to the clothes—and slavery—of those times.) 4 The Christian man is not to pray in public (or to prophesy: see on 12:10), as the Jew did, with his head covered, a sign of submission to another person (cf. Gn. 24:65). To do so dishonours his 'head', i.e. Christ, the only one to whom he owes submission. 5, 6 A Christian woman praying unveiled in public dishonours her 'head', i.e. her husband. In Paul's day this meant she repudiated his authority. Paul is outspoken. But for a woman in Corinth to be unveiled in public was as shocking in its social significance as being shorn, the contemporary punishment for a prostitute.

7–9 A man ought to be unveiled when praying to God since he is His image and glory. Gn. 1:26, 27 includes both sexes with regard to the image, i.e. 'constitution as a rational and morally responsible being' (D. Kidner, Genesis, TOTC, 1964), but does not mention glory. Paul derives this from the prior creation of the man (Gn. 2:18–22). For a woman to pray uncovered would display the glory of man, and in God's presence this must inevitably turn to shame. The 'glory of man', i.e. the woman, must therefore be covered, lest dishonour be brought upon the woman's 'head', i.e. the man (see M. D. Hooker, 'Authority on her head: An examination of 1 Cor. xi. 10', in NTS, X, 1963–64, pp. 410–416). 10 A woman should (lit.) 'have authority on her head' (cf. RSV mg.), i.e. wear the veil in public, to symbolize submission to her husband, and to protect her honour and dignity before other men. An unveiled woman in public would be despised and insulted. Because of the angels probably means that a woman who shocks men will shock angels, as guardians of the created order (vv. 8, 9) and who were present at public worship (cf. 1 Tim. 5:21). At Qumran men with physical blemishes were excluded from 'the assembly of God', for 'the holy angels are present'; i.e. nothing unseemly must come before them (G. Vermes, The Dead Sea Scrolls in English, 1962). Or possibly it means 'because the angels do', i.e. reverently veil their faces before God (Is. 6:2). Tertullian considered that bad angels were meant here and that Paul was warning against a repetition of the sin of Gn. 6:1–4.

11, 12 Paul qualifies what is meant by 'subordination'. In the Lord, i.e. in the Lord's intention in the created order (Gn. 2:23), man and woman are interdependent. 13–15 The Corinthians can see for themselves the fitness of Paul's arguments, supported by the accepted convention that women should be veiled in public, and also by nature—which expresses the will of the Creator. A woman's hair is distinctively longer than a man's. For her to wear it so indicates a willingness to fulfil what God intended her to be. 16 Paul's teaching is not peculiar to him but common to all other local churches (cf. 14:33, 36). As churches of God they are under His government. To dress with decorum is a Christian principle of permanent validity, for the outward appearance reflects the inner attitude. How this principle finds expression in detail will vary from place to place and from age to age.

11:17–34 The Lord's Supper

In the early days the observance of the sacramental acts of the Holy Communion took place in connection with a common meal or 'love feast' (Jude 12), in imitation of the Last Supper. Such opportunity for fellowship was welcomed by Christians from the first (Acts 2:46). But at Corinth the sacred harmony intended to be expressed thereby had been scandalously disrupted.

17 In Paul's judgment the matter is serious. He sends no more advice but authoritative instructions. He cannot commend (contrast 11:2) actions which ruin Christian life and witness. 18 The root of the trouble is in their divisions (not necessarily those of 1:10). I hear, presumably from Chloe's people (1:11) or Stephanas, etc. (16:17). 19 Factions are unedifying but to some extent inevitable; so divine providence makes them serve a positive purpose—they expose men's true characters. 20 When the Corinthians assemble for worship it is impossible to eat the Lord's (emphatic) supper, with all that it is intended to express. 21 Their manner is utterly selfish. They do not wait for latecomers (e.g. slaves) nor share what they have. Each is interested only in his own (emphatic) supper, not the Lord's. The divisions of v. 18 are obviously based on money and class. 22 The Corinthians are despising both the dignity and brotherhood of the church, and its creator, God. So there is nothing whatever for Paul to commend.

23 Paul makes straight for bed-rock. He recounts the institution of the Lord's Supper. (This is our earliest record, and includes some features not found elsewhere; cf. Mt. 26:26f.; Mk. 14:22f.; Lk. 22:17f.) Received and delivered are terms often applied to oral Christian teaching (cf. 11:2; 15:3). But the emphatic I and of the Lord suggest a special revelation to Paul (Gal. 1:12; 2:2). He reminds the thoughtless Corinthians of the poignant setting of the first Lord's Supper—on the night of being handed over (by God) to death. 24 When he had given thanks (cf. 10:16) translates one Greek word from which comes 'eucharist'. This is how food is consecrated for us: by thanksgiving to God the Giver (1 Tim. 4:4, 5). 'Broken' (RSV mg.) for you. The interest is focused on what happened to His body on the cross and why. So the bread is not equated to His body as it then was in the upper room, or as it now is in glory. Do this. This is the chief, if not the sole, authentic place in the NT where the command to repeat the Lord's Supper occurs. The Greek words for Do this can only mean 'perform this action', not 'offer this (sacrifice)'. Again the Greek for in remembrance of me cannot bear the sense 'to remind God of Me', but only 'to remind yourselves of the death I (emphatic) suffered to win your redemption'. 25 The cup, after supper. In the upper room the bread and wine were deliberately separated by an interval, just as the pieces of slain animals were divided in covenant-making (Gn. 15:9f.) to represent the violent death of the covenant-maker, should he break the covenant. Covenant. The Greek word (diathēkē) means not a mutual compact but (as with a will) a solemn disposition by one party for the benefit of others. Jesus is referring to the 'new covenant' of Je. 31:31f. (replacing that described in Ex. 24) established through the shedding of His blood. The benefits flowing therefrom are all by His gift. 26 Proclaim the Lord's death can only mean 'to men' and not 'to God'. The Greek verb occurs 17 times and always concerns the proclamation of the gospel before men. The action that does it is eating and drinking, not offering, and is only to be used until he comes. Then He will drink with them in person at the triumph feast (Mt. 26:29).

27 This solemn rite demands a reverent approach. To take part in an unworthy manner, i.e. carelessly (cf. vv. 21, 29), is to deny the purpose of Christ's self-offering. It is thus to share the guilt of those responsible for the crucifixion, rather than by faith to receive the benefits of His sacrifice. 28 The worshipper must examine himself, i.e. his spiritual condition and motives (2 Cor. 13:5), for he is answerable directly to his Lord. 29 Every Christian is unworthy, but Paul defines his meaning as not discerning (lit. 'not distinguishing') this bread as signifying the body . . . of the Lord. Some think body here refers to the church (cf. 10:17), but a change of meaning from v. 27 seems unlikely. 30 Such carelessness invites judgment, i.e. not eternal damnation but divine chastisement, expressed physically in illness and death (cf. 5:5). 31, 32 If we judged ourselves, i.e. 'distinguished' between what we are and what we should be, there would be no need to be judged by the Lord; i.e. chastened, as children of the Father, not in the sense of being eternally condemned along with the unbelieving world (cf. 3:15).

33, 34 Consequently when the Corinthians meet for the Lord's Supper, they are to wait considerately for one another (cf. v. 21). This is a time of togetherness. If they forget the true purpose of this sacred meal (which is not for the satisfying of physical hunger), their misbehaviour will be condemned by God and by their fellows.

12:1–31 Gifts of the Spirit

Characteristically Paul begins his discussion of the gifts of the Holy Spirit (chs. 12–14) with a basic reminder of the Lordship of Christ. Their use must always be subject to Him; and, when exercised publicly, in a manner making for order and harmony, not confusion (14:40). Some gifts are admittedly spectacular and exciting, but they are less important than the outworking of divine love (ch. 13) in Christian character (cf. Gal. 5:22f.).

1, 2 The Corinthians knew from pre-Christian experience the dangers of being led astray ('carried away'), i.e. under undesirable and unprofitable constraint. Dumb idols (Ps. 115:4–8), unable to reveal spiritual truth (Hab. 2:19). Paul accepts that the Corinthians were moved. Behind lifeless idols were evil spirits (cf. 10:20); they were still active. 3 Hence the blasphemous cry Jesus be cursed!—perhaps an ecstatic utterance by an uninstructed worshipper who had misunderstood teaching about Christ being made 'a curse' (Gal. 3:13). Cursed (cf. 16:22); Gk. anathema, meaning 'devoted' like Jericho was, set apart for destruction (Jos. 6:17). The Spirit of God bears witness to the Lordship of Christ. He alone can or will do this (cf. 1 Jn. 4:1–3).

4–6 Competition among the Corinthians over the use of the gifts had split the church. This was a false rivalry, for Christians differ in their gifts, in opportunities for service, and in the way God's power is applied through them. But behind all the variety is the one unifying author, God Himself. The doctrine of the Trinity is unconsciously but clearly expressed in these verses. 7 Gifts were not for private individual enrichment nor for rivalry and jealousy, but for the benefit of all.

Paul lists nine gifts. 8 The utterance (lit. 'a word') of wisdom (cf. 2:6–10). What is divinely imparted is the power of communicating to others. Paul associates knowledge with mysteries, revelations, and prophecy (13:2; 14:6), and it evidently means knowledge supernaturally given (cf. that of Peter in Acts 5:3). 9 Faith (cf. 13:2) is distinct from saving faith, though that too is divinely given (Eph. 2:8). George Müller is a modern example of one with the special gift of faith. Gifts of healing (lit. 'healings'); the plurals suggest different gifts for different diseases. 10 The working (Gk. plural) of miracles (Gal. 3:5; Heb. 2:4) is distinguished from acts of healing (cf. Mk. 16:17f.; Acts 5:5, 10; 13:11). Prophecy in Scripture includes foretelling future events (Acts 11:27f.; 21:10), but more often refers to 'forthtelling' God's message in inspired words (cf. Lk. 1:67ff.; Acts 19:6; 21:9). Some thus outstandingly gifted were recognized as 'prophets' (1 Cor. 12:28f.). The ability to distinguish between spirits, good and evil, was specially needed in the palpable paganism of Paul's day. But the battle still continues (Eph. 6:12; 2 Thes. 2:2). 1 Jn. 4:1 suggests a more general ability bestowed upon all Christians (as with 'faith', v. 9). Various kinds of tongues (cf. 14:1f.); i.e. ecstatic speech in languages usually unknown (14:9; cf. Acts 2:6), apart from the gift of interpretation (14:13). 11 All these gifts have one Author and Distributor, the Spirit, who acts not as men may demand (though cf. v. 31) but as he wills (Heb. 2:4), words which imply the personality of the Spirit as having a mind of His own.

12 The functioning of the physical body provides an appropriate analogy of variety in unity within the church, the body of Christ (v. 27). 13 We were all baptized. The rite of baptism is one and the same for all professing Christians, from whatever cultural background (Col. 3:10f.). The common application of water externally symbolizes the converts' vital incorporation by the Holy Spirit into the living unity of the body of Christ. The Spirit is around us (the figure of immersion in water) and within us (the figure of drinking). All Christians have been 'saturated with one Spirit' (Goodspeed).

14 The very idea of a body implies many members which are complementary and interdependent. Perhaps some Corinthians felt second class, because they lacked spectacular gifts possessed by others. 15, 16 Foot is contrasted with hand, not with eye, 'because we are wont to envy not those who are very far above us, but those who are a little higher' (Chrysostom). A 'foot' bearing the weight of the body might easily envy a 'hand' swinging free and unencumbered. I do not belong. A Christian lacking, say, the gift of tongues is not any less a part of the body of Christ. 17, 18 A body needs many components to carry out its varied functions. God in His wisdom provides them all and fits and places them for their own tasks. The emphasis is on God's plan, choice, and appointment. 19 If all organs were alike, the result would be 'a creature with only one sense organ, such as is found in the lowest forms of animal life' (Godet). 20 Others in Corinth evidently considered that they alone were capable, and wanted to do everything. But all the different parts of a body need one another. 21 For example, the eye, though naturally placed 'above' the hand, cannot do without it. Boasting is quite inappropriate. 22 Moreover, what in one way are weaker parts. e.g. the eyes, are in fact indispensable. 23 Less honourable. Far from despising the humbler members of the church, they should be given special consideration. 24, 25 God has so arranged the interrelation of organs within the human body that they operate not only without conflict but also in positive co-operation and interdependence. 26 In so far as the Christian church is functioning properly as a body, all its members will feel involved in the misfortune or prosperity of fellow-Christians, with sympathy but without envy.

27 Paul's simile of the body applies directly to the local church in Corinth, for in Christ they constitute a body—His body—in which they are individually members, each with a responsible part to play. 28 God has appointed in the church; i.e. He has chosen their character and given them their place to further His own purpose (Eph. 4:11f.). Apostles had a unique primary ministry as custodians of the authentic gospel (Eph. 2:20). Prophets were particularly needed until the NT was written and in general circulation. The fact that some may render a primary or more fundamental service does not make them lords over God's heritage. Their function is ministerial, not magisterial. Then follow lesser necessary but complementary ministries. The gift of tongues, excessively prized by the Corinthians, is twice placed last (vv. 28, 30), after the more prosaic yet necessary helpers and administrators (cf. Rom. 12:6–8; Eph. 4:11f.). 29, 30 Are all apostles? . . . prophets? . . . teachers? These questions, all expecting the answer 'No', emphasize once more diversity and interdependence. 'God did not want any one to be self-sufficient. He so arranged things that all the brethren should need each other' (Godet). 31 The higher gifts are to be sought by prayer and self-preparation (14:1). But there is a still more excellent way of service, the way of love (ch. 13). 'A little love is worth more than any amount of eloquence, learning, or ecstasy' (G. Deluz, A Companion to 1 Corinthians, ET 1963).

13:1–13 Divine love

This famous hymn in praise of love is 'the greatest, strongest, deepest thing Paul ever wrote' (Harnack). It has a literary and rhythmic beauty. Agapē was rare in Greek before Christians made it their characteristic word for 'love'. The usual terms; erōs (sexual love) and philia (a more general term meaning affection) are essentially 'love of the deserving', coupled with the desire to possess. By contrast, agapē is 'love of the undeserving', love which gives. Its classical expression is in Rom. 5:8: 'God shows his love for us in that while we were yet sinners Christ died for us.' Paul's exposition is in three parts: vv. 1–3, the futility (for their possessor) of spiritual gifts without love; vv. 4–7, love's characteristics (an incidental portrait of Christ); vv. 8–13, love's permanence.

1 By tongues Paul doubtless means the gift (cf. 12:10; 14:18); but human eloquence, however 'angelic', is likewise censured as mere noise, disturbing and unhelpful, if it lacks love. The noisy gong and clanging cymbal were familiar in Corinthian temples to Dionysus and Cybele. 2 Similarly, one who possesses prophetic powers (cf. 14:3), however important (12:28) or desirable (14:39), and understands all mysteries (see on 2:7) and all knowledge (12:8; cf. 8:1f.), and has the special gift of wonder-working faith (12:9; cf. Mt. 17:20), yet lacks love—is himself valueless for all his valuable gifts. 3 The rashest philanthropy or the most painful self-immolation without the love-motive, gains no credit at the judgment, whatever material benefits others may reap.

The moral excellences named as love's virtues (vv. 4–7) are aimed at the special faults exhibited by the Corinthians. 4 They include being patient, passively 'long-tempered' with people, and kind, actively generous and helpful. Eight negatives follow. Love is not jealous at the success, or because of the gifts, of others (12:26; cf. 3:3); not boastful, a 'wind-bag' (cf. Mt. 26:33 with Jn. 21:17), ostentatious, out for applause. 5 Love is not arrogant (cf. 4:6; 8:1), inflated with empty conceit; or rude ('not behaving properly' in 7:36). 'Love does nothing to raise a blush.' Love is not out for its own way, not self-seeking (cf. 11:21), but disinterested (10:33). It is not irritable, touchy, ready to take offence. It is not resentful; literally 'it reckons (accountancy term) not the evil thing', i.e. it keeps no register of wrongs, and so harbours no resentment. 6 Love does not rejoice in the opportunity to censure wrong; or, 'cannot share in the glee of the successful transgressor'. But 'joins in rejoicing' (a stronger expression) in the right, literally 'truth' (1 Jn. 1:6). 7 Positively, love bears, i.e. either covers (1 Pet. 4:8), or endures (1 Thes. 3:1, 5), all things. Love credits others with good intentions; or, 'never loses faith' (Barrett). Love hopes, not with unreasoning optimism, but in expecting ultimate triumph by the grace of God. Love endures, i.e. in an active positive sense. 'When love has no evidence, it believes the best. When the evidence is adverse, it hopes for the best. And when hopes are repeatedly disappointed, it still courageously waits' (Robertson and Plummer). Come what may it is undismayed.

8, 9 Love never ends, literally 'never collapses'. It is eternal by nature (1 Jn. 4:16), unlike the gifts, which are designed for the present life. Prophecy and tongues (see on 12:10) will be unnecessary in the immediate presence of God. Knowledge, human and divinely revealed (cf. 12:8), will be superseded by fuller light and understanding. 10 When the perfect comes: not perfection in quality so much as totality; i.e. full knowledge about God. The imperfect, the partial (cf. Je. 31:34), that which is characteristic of our present experience. 11 Childish reckoning and speaking are naturally replaced with maturity. But Paul says he gave up childish ways, i.e. he determined no longer to be governed by childish attitudes. By overstressing tongues and undervaluing love the Corinthians were displaying immaturity. 12 Our present understanding is like peering into a primitive metal mirror with its imperfect reflection (cf. 2 Cor. 5:7). But then, in the next life, we shall see face to face (cf. 1 Jn. 3:2). Similarly with knowledge: partial now, perfect then—even as God's knowledge of each Christian is perfect already. 13 Faith, trustful acceptance of God as He is, hope, 'perseverance in faith' (Calvin), and love, are eternal, as present gifts of the Spirit are not. Abide is singular and suggests these three graces form a unity (cf. Col. 1:4, 5; 1 Thes. 1:3). Only the final agapē in v. 13 has the definite article; greatest is the Greek comparative (normally taken as superlative). R. P. Martin (1 Corinthians–Galatians, Scripture Union Bible Study Books, 1968) therefore suggests: 'Faith, hope, love abide—the well-known trio; but greater than these is the love (of God)' shed in our hearts (Rom. 5:5).

14:1–40 The gifts of prophecy and tongues

1 Paul now resumes (from 12:31) his discussion of the gifts of the Spirit. Assuming that the Corinthians now appreciate the supreme importance of love, they are to go on to seek the very best God offers. While acknowledging the Spirit's sovereign will in distributing His gifts (12:11), the Corinthians should earnestly desire to receive them—particularly the higher gifts (12:31) and most of all prophecy. 2 A tongue is ecstatic speaking in a language usually unintelligible to speaker and hearer (see on 12:10). Some consider the gift in Acts 2:6f. is different, since some or other of those present did understand what was said. But in both cases God not man is primarily addressed (Acts 2:4, 11). Mysteries, i.e. things not understood by unaided human reason. In the Spirit, i.e. through the gift bestowed by the Holy Spirit. Or the reference may be to the man's own spirit, i.e. he is not using his mind. 3 The gift of prophecy (see on 12:10) builds up believers in their faith by giving encouragement, i.e. counsel to the mind, and consolation, i.e. comfort to the heart. 4 Tongues are for the personal blessing of the speaker. He is edified, not indeed in his understanding (cf. v. 14), but by what has been called 'the glow of soul associated with the exercise of the gift' (cf. Acts 2:13). By contrast, prophecy benefits not simply the speaker but the church, i.e. the assembled congregation (cf. v. 19; 11:18; 14:23). 5 Paul encourages the proper use of tongues for personal edification through the worship of God (cf. v. 28). Tongues may not be used in public services unless another believer present has the gift of interpretation. He who prophesies is greater, i.e. as a better servant (Mt. 20:26) he has something more to offer the church than merely his own spiritual advancement.

6 Revelation is the source of prophecy (cf. vv. 29–31). Knowledge (see on 12:8) is the source of teaching. 7, 8 Paul illustrates the need for 'tongues' in public to be interpreted. A melody cannot be recognized if the notes are indistinct. An army is baffled if the bugle calls uncertainly (cf. Nu. 10:9). 9 So with yourselves (pronoun emphatic). Intelligible communication is vital, however highly the Corinthians may prize the gift of 'tongues'. 10, 11 The languages of the world all have meaning, for their whole purpose is for intelligent communication. But if the language is not understood, speaker and listener are foreigners to each other. Foreigner is Greek barbaros, 'barbarian', one whose speech sounds like 'bar-bar' to another, i.e. makes no sense. 12 The Corinthians are rightly eager for manifestations of the Spirit through His gifts, for these demonstrate the presence and activity of God. But only some gifts are valuable in building up the church in worship and service. These are the gifts to seek, for the motive must be the general benefit of the church (12:7), not unspiritual self-gratification.

13 Therefore, for the good of the church, the further gift of interpretation should be sought to widen the usefulness of 'tongues'. Spiritual gifts additional to those received on any one occasion are thus obtainable. 14, 15 The gift of interpretation also benefits the one who speaks in a tongue. Without it his mind lacks understanding, and thus remains unfruitful, i.e. produces and contributes nothing. Worship must be intelligent as well as fervent. 16, 17 With the spirit (only), i.e. without the mind, and so unintelligibly. Outsider (cf. vv. 23, 24); idiotēs was used in some religious associations for 'non-members who may participate'. Note that apparently such interested enquirers had a recognized 'place' in the Christian community. Where 'tongues' are concerned Paul implies that even committed Christians, if lacking the gifts, might feel themselves in the position of 'outsiders'. Amen; from Hebrew 'to confirm'. Christians followed Jewish practice in adding Amen to make a prayer their own (Ne. 8:6). 18 Paul is not without experience of tongues. Perhaps this was not generally known because he exercised the gift in private. 19 In church, i.e. wherever Christians gather for worship, five understandable words addressed to men edify far more than a torrent in 'tongues' addressed to God.

20 The spectacular nature of 'tongues' appealed to the Corinthians, but Paul gently implies that their attitude is childish. 21, 22 'Tongues' can have another purpose, besides blessing the user in private or, in conjunction with the gift of interpretation, believers in general. The law (here, Scripture generally—as, e.g., Rom. 3:19—not the Pentateuch only) shows that 'tongues' have significance for unbelievers too, in their case as a sign of judgment (cf. Heb. 4:2). Paul's quotation is freely taken from Is. 28:11f. Israel has spurned the prophet's message as fit only for children. Since God's people refuse to listen in obedience and faith to His plain word, they will hear words they cannot understand, i.e. be punished by exile among men of strange tongues, the Assyrians, and be hardened in their unbelief (Is. 6:9f.). 23 Paul evidently has this last point particularly in mind. The use of 'tongues' in a public service could well confirm non-Christian visitors in their unbelief, instead of persuading them of the reality of Christianity. The use of 'tongues' in a gathering of believers is, therefore, inappropriate. Outsiders (see on v. 16) or unbelievers; i.e. interested non-Christians attending the service out of curiosity or spiritual concern. 24, 25 If all prophesy. In church the thing that should make non-members conscious of God's presence and bring them under deep inner conviction is the prophetic word given by the Holy Spirit (cf. Acts 5:3f.)—not sensational 'tongues', or liturgical ritual, or even elaborate visual aids!

26–33 reveal some of the activities in an early church service. Note their varied and spontaneous character. 26 Paul's list suggests the eagerness of each one to use his gift in public worship. Any member present might take part. A hymn (cf. v. 15; Eph. 5:19) might be one composed by a member. A lesson, literally 'teaching', would be some exposition of a text from the OT, following Jewish custom, rather than just a reading from Scripture (cf. Col. 3:16). Prophesying is omitted, but is perhaps the same as a revelation. The overriding principle controlling the use of the manifestations of the Spirit in public worship is again stressed: the edification of all present. 27 In turn; literally 'by shares', i.e. sharing the time. The exercise of the gift is under the control of the speaker's will, even if the language is not understood by the mind. 28 'Tongues' may be used publicly only if someone present can interpret. 29, 30 The use of prophecy is qualified. Messages through this medium are not to be accepted uncritically, but tested against Scripture (cf. 1 Thes. 5:21), e.g. to ensure that the source is divine and not Satanic (cf. 12:10; Dt. 18:22; 1 Jn. 4:1). 31 Despite the limitations imposed by Paul, all who can prophesy will have an opportunity to use their gift at some time so that all the church may benefit fully from this ministry of the Holy Spirit. 32 Just as those who speak in tongues are able to keep silence if necessary (v. 28), so prophesying is under the control of the one possessing that ability. 33 God is the source and inspiration behind all these gifts, and so any confusion or lack of self-control occurring in church services cannot be according to His will or due to His Spirit.

34, 35 Paul's famous instruction that women should keep silence in the churches and not . . . speak is still much misunderstood by being divorced from its local and contemporary context. Paul has earlier discussed what is meant by the subordinate status of women (see on 11:3, 11). He is keenly aware of the need for emancipated Christian women to avoid unnecessary scandal through flouting the social conventions of the day. Women had to be wise in using their newly-given liberty in Christ. Paul is here protesting against the disturbance of services by feminine chatter—the meaning of speak in vv. 34, 35. Some women (they sat apart from men) were perhaps calling out questions, and commenting knowingly on things said in the service. Paul did not condemn women to complete silence in church for he mentions some able to prophesy (11:5; cf. Acts 21:9), and this was a gift exercised in public. Paul's injunction also has positive value. A woman's femininity and so her influence (cf. 1 Pet. 3:2) are alike enhanced by the practice of silence. Men too are told to be silent on occasions (vv. 28, 30). Only in quietness could the word of God be heard and absorbed.

36 Paul ironically enquires if the Corinthians alone possess the word of God and know proper Christian practice. Due weight must be given to the experience of all the churches of the saints (cf. v. 33). 37 Anyone claiming to be a prophet, or spiritual, i.e. in tune with the Lord's mind, should be the first to recognize the correctness of what Paul has been expounding. 38 If such a man does not recognize divine truth when he hears it, he himself is not recognized as authoritative (cf. 11:16), either by God or by the other churches; i.e. he stands self-condemned. 39 Paul's conclusion is positive. The gift of prophecy is to be sought eagerly; 'tongues', with due safeguards, are to continue. These are God's good gifts. 40 All things in public worship should be carried on in a manner which is (lit.) 'well formed', i.e. with beauty and harmony, and in order, a military metaphor (cf. v. 33).

15:1–58 THE RESURRECTION

15:1–11 The resurrection of Christ

The last major subject Paul discusses is doctrinal and fundamental to Christianity. To deny the resurrection of the dead (15:12) is to evacuate the gospel of all its worth. So Paul restates the essentials of the gospel. He shows how the truth of the resurrection of Christ is an assured part of it (vv. 1–11), and that it implies the resurrection of Christians (vv. 12–34). Finally certain difficulties raised against the doctrine are resolved (vv. 35–58).

1, 2 Paul feels it necessary to remind them of the essentials of the gospel itself—the truth which was the subject of his preaching and the sole grounds of their salvation as Christians. The need to do this makes him question whether they have forgotten it or never really embraced it. Note the measure of implied rebuke and the radical character of the apostle's concern. 3, 4 This is a very early summary of the preaching and shows a tendency to set it forth in brief credal form (note the fourfold that in vv. 3–5; also the vocabulary is not Paul's usual style). Far from being ideas of human origin, they are objective facts concerning God's Christ which were long ago divinely anticipated and have recently been historically fulfilled. Here is what happened—death, burial, resurrection; and why —for our sins. That he was buried and did not rise till the third day emphasizes the reality of Christ's death and excludes the possibility of swooning. The repeated phrase in accordance with the scriptures draws attention to the further divinely inspired witness provided by written prophecies. In v. 4 the phrase probably applies to the fact of Christ's resurrection (cf. Is. 53:10–12; and Ps. 16:10 was often used in early preaching) rather than on the third day, for which only Jon. 1:17 and Ho. 6:2 can be cited (cf. Lk. 24:46). 5 This list of appearances by the risen Lord is selective; e.g. no women are included. This also suggests a tendency towards a recognized and widely used (official) list of divinely chosen witnesses. The appearances to Cephas (cf. 1:12; 9:5) and to the twelve (a nominal, and official, title—Judas and Thomas were missing) are recorded in Lk. 24:34–36. 6 The five hundred brethren may be linked with Mt. 28:10, 16ff. Most of them were still alive when Paul wrote: their testimony could still be verified by doubters. Note too how the death of Christians is described as sleep (cf. 1 Thes. 4:14). 7 James is probably the Lord's brother, an unbeliever during Jesus' ministry (Jn. 7:5), but converted soon after the resurrection (Acts 1:14), and later a pillar of the Jerusalem church (Gal. 2:9). The assured truth of Christ's resurrection is the firm and essential basis for Paul's classic exposition of the doctrine of the resurrection in this chapter.

8, 9 Last of all in the series of the resurrection appearances, which otherwise ceased at the ascension, came that to Paul himself on the Damascus road (Acts 9), as to one untimely born. Ektrōma is not a 'late birth' as the context might suggest, but the opposite, an 'abortion' (NEB, 'monstrosity'). The expression refers not to the timing of Paul's conversion, but either to the sudden intervention by which he was torn from opposition to become an apostle or to his sense of utter unworthiness—'as unworthy to be called an apostle as an abortion is to be considered a man'. Though Paul here describes himself as the least of the apostles, he is not suggesting his ministry is inferior to that of others (cf. 2 Cor. 11:5; Gal. 2:11), for he has actually laboured more abundantly; but because he had persecuted the church of God (Acts 26:9f.; Gal. 1:13) he was not fit to be an apostle at all (1 Tim. 1:15). 10 He owes everything solely to the grace of God—his life as a Christian, his apostolic ministry, and the way he has been enabled to persevere in the work. All this too is evidence that Christ is risen indeed. 11 So we preach. This gospel thus authenticated continues without variation to be preached by all the apostles, including Paul. It is the one and only foundation of the decisive self-committal of faith.

15:12–34 The resurrection of Christians

In vv. 12–19 Paul indicates the fatal consequences for Christian believers of denying all possibility of resurrection; viz. it makes apostolic preaching a lie, and faith a delusion; dead Christians are lost, living Christians pitiable in the extreme.

12 Some Corinthians were still maintaining Greek ideas about the immortality of the soul, i.e. that after death the soul escaped from the body, to be absorbed into the divine or to continue a shadowy existence in the underworld. To Greeks physical resurrection was impossible (cf. Acts 17:18f., 32). 13, 14 But to accept this would rule out Christ's resurrection and destroy the whole foundation of Christian preaching; any so-called faith in Christ would then be vain, i.e. empty of meaning or practical effect since He is not alive to save. 15 Also it would mean that the apostles have been found ('caught out') deliberately lying about their supposed good news. 16, 17 If this is so, then the redemptive work of Christ lacks vital proof, and anyone's claim to know forgiveness is mere self-deception. 18 There is no hope either of further life for Christians who have died (cf. Rom. 6:1–11). 19 If in this life Christians have only 'hope' and no 'next life' to follow, all their purposeless struggling makes them supreme objects of pity for being deluded. Another reading (RSV mg.) applies the only to this life: 'If Christianity means simply hoping in Christ in this life, that and nothing beside. . .'.

20–28 Here over against the negative consequences of denial are the positive consequences flowing from Christ's resurrection. 20 But in fact, overthrowing the six hypothetical 'ifs' just listed, Christ has been raised (perfect tense: a past event with continuing consequences), never to die again. So faith is established, forgiveness a genuine experience, and the after-life for Christians assured (cf. Heb. 6:19f.). First fruits implies community of nature with the 'harvest' to follow; i.e. Christ's resurrection promises the ultimate home-gathering of all God's people. The full harvest was foreshadowed and consecrated by the first sheaf brought as an offering on the day following the sabbath after the Passover (Lv. 23:10f.), i.e. on Easter Day, the day of Christ's resurrection. Death with its sting gone (v. 55) is for Christians no more than falling asleep. 21, 22 It is in Adam as the representative man or federal head that all die; it is in Christ as Himself truly man that all Christians are resurrected (cf. Rom. 5:18f.; see further on vv. 45–49). (Note that Paul treats Adam as an historical figure; cf. Rom. 5:12.) Physical and spiritual death entered the world through Adam's sin (Gn. 2:17). All men, as members of the human race, inherit the inclination to sin, and thereby the penalty of sin, death. The second all in v. 22 is limited by v. 23 to those who belong to Christ (cf. 1 Thes. 4:16); a universal resurrection (including that of unbelievers) is not here in view (cf. Dn. 12:2). Be made alive suggests not simply physical resurrection but abundant spiritual life (cf. Jn. 10:10).

when Christ was raised (cf. 2 Tim. 2:18); that of believers will follow (cf. vv. 51–53; 1 Thes. 4:15f.). At his coming; Greek parousia (commonly in the papyri of a royal visit), used by Christians as a technical term for the Lord's return. 24 Then; how soon is not indicated. Paul means when these things happen; i.e. the parousia of Christ and the resurrection of Christians will usher in the end, viz. the climax of the ages. When Christ thus returns to assert His full and direct authority (2 Thes. 1:7f.) every rival power will be destroyed ('rendered inoperative'). With His commission fulfilled (Mt. 28:18) Christ then delivers His authority back to God the Father. The kingdom; i.e. not territory but 'kingly power' (see Lk. 19:12; cf. RSV with AV). 25 He must reign. Christ is exercising kingly rule now—before the end—but not till every rival power has been put down will the end come. God has already promised to His Christ the final and complete overthrow of opposing powers. Under his feet alludes to the promise in Ps. 110:1, the verse most quoted in the NT. 26 Death is personified (cf. Is. 25:8). It was defeated by Christ's resurrection (cf. 2 Tim. 1:10); and, although still at work in the world, at His return it will openly be destroyed (cf. Rev. 20:14), i.e. 'robbed of all power' (as v. 24), when all its captives are raised. 27 Ps. 8:6ff., which speaks of the subjection of all things to man, is fulfilled in the representative Man, Jesus Christ (cf. Heb. 2:6–9). 28 Christ's total triumph is in no sense in competition with the Father's rule, to which the Son Himself is subjected, i.e. is obedient (cf. Jn. 6:38; Heb. 10:7). The goal is that God may be everything to every one (cf. Rom. 11:36). This does not mean loss of all distinction by absorption into God, but the perfectly acknowledged rule of the God of love over all His creatures. It is noteworthy (in contrast to some prophetic interpretations that Christ is coming to reign and that this reign will follow the parousia) that here Christ's special exercise of sovereignty ends with the overthrow of the last enemy, and He can report to His Father that His work is complete (cf. Mt. 13:41, 'his kingdom'; 13:43, 'the kingdom of their Father').

29 Baptized on behalf of the dead is possibly proxy-baptism on behalf of friends who had died unbaptized. The Greek can also mean 'baptized because of the dead', i.e. the reference is to the baptism of those influenced by the testimony of a Christian who had recently died, and in the hope of being re-united with him at the resurrection. In either case, if death is the end the future is hopeless. 30 Similarly, Paul's mortal risks would be foolhardy and pointless (cf. 4:9; 2 Cor. 11:23f.). 31 My pride in you (cf. Phil. 4:1). The winning of the Corinthians from the pagan world is worth many deaths. 32 Paul's fighting with beasts at Ephesus is evidently metaphorical (sentence to the arena involved loss of citizenship—which Paul still retained in Acts 22:25). The occasion was one of intense peril (cf. 2 Cor. 1:8f.). Let us eat . . . ; from Is. 22:13. 33 Bad company . . . ; a proverb found in Menander's lost comedy Thais. The Corinthians will ruin their Christian lives by mixing with those who live merely for selfish pleasures because they deny any resurrection or final judgment. 34 Come to your right mind; 'wake up properly from your drunken stupor'. 'Some of you claim to be agnostics. But ignorance of God while natural to pagans is shameful to Christians.'

15:35–58 The nature of the resurrection body

35 With what kind of body do they come?; i.e. out of graves. Greeks thought only of soul-survival and denied any resurrection of the physical body. Consequently some Corinthian believers assumed that Christianity taught that corpses were resuscitated, and resurrection-life was simply a prolongation of material existence. Paul takes up two points. 36 First, how can death give rise to life? The seed analogy indicates that death can be necessary to perpetuate life (cf. Jn. 12:24). Note how Paul appeals here to their individual experience and exposes their lack of sense and observation. 37 Secondly, what is the nature of the resurrection body? It is intimately linked with the old but not identical with it. 38 God gives. The new life is not automatic but dependent upon the predetermined will and the creative act of God. 39–41 Not all flesh is alike. Different forms of existence imply different spheres and modes of operation, for which each form is suited by the Creator; and there is obviously very great variety in such differentiation.

42 So it is. The Christian's resurrection body will be fitted to its radically new sphere (cf. 2 Cor. 5:1–4). Resurrection means re-appearance or restoration to function in a new form (Phil. 3:21), and Paul describes this in a series of couplets. What is sown can apply both to the body during life and to its lying in the grave. Perishable; subject to decay. This basic fact was why Greeks objected to any doctrine of resurrection. 43 Dishonour (Gk. atimia, 'without rights of citizenship'), and weakness (cf. 2 Cor. 13:4), i.e. powerlessness (cf. Ps. 115:17; Is. 14:10) are both characteristic of a corpse. 44 If there is; i.e. 'since there is'. Physical body; i.e. subject to the conditions of natural life; literally 'psychic', formed to be the organ of the psychē, 'soul'. Spiritual body; i.e. controlled by man's spirit in perfect harmony with the Spirit of God. Physical and spiritual indicate the spheres or forms of existence for which the bodies respectively are fitted. 45, 46 Further support is found in Gn. 2:7. A living being. Man is distinct by being made 'a living soul' (AV). It is characteristic of man in his present form of existence that he has a soul-governed body. The last Adam; i.e. Christ, the progenitor of the new race of redeemed men. He is their life-giving spirit (cf. Jn. 6:63). It will be characteristic of the life to be that we shall have a spirit-controlled body. 47 Man of dust again alludes to Gn. 2:7. Of dust implies liable to decay and dissolution. From heaven means of a higher, imperishable order. Christ is 'from heaven', originally as God become man, and eschatologically in the glory of His resurrection body. 48, 49 Who are of the dust. All men share in the corruption which is characteristic of the human race. Christians because of their relation to, and new life in, Christ are already 'of heaven'. This holds the promise of ultimate bodily likeness to the man of heaven (1 Jn. 3:2). We shall . . . bear. The Greek can mean 'wear' (cf. 2 Cor. 5:3). 50 Flesh and blood; i.e. man's present kind of mortal physical body. Paul is contradicting crude notions of physical resurrection (see on v. 35). A new type of body is needed for the new conditions of the next life.

51 Mystery; a divine secret now revealed to Paul to declare (cf. 1 Thes. 4:15). On Christ's return the bodies of Christians still living on earth will be transformed without experiencing death (Phil. 3:21). Dead Christians will be raised and given new bodies. 52 In a moment; instantaneously. The last trumpet (cf. Mt. 24:31; 1 Thes. 4:16); not the last of a series (as in Rev. 8:2) but the call announcing 'the end' (v. 24). The trumpet sometimes accompanies divine interventions in history (e.g. Ex. 19:16). 53 Must put on, as clothes; cf. 2 Cor. 5:1–4. 54–56 Death is swallowed up . . . (cf. v. 26); a free quotation from Is. 25:8, folowed by one from Ho. 13:14. Paul speaks of the ultimate destruction of death. At present death is still operative; it retains its sting, i.e. sin, which gives death its power of wounding mortally. Death follows sin not simply as a biological but as a moral consequence. Paul frequently connects sin, law, and death, though he does not develop the theme here (see, e.g., Rom. 5:13; 7:7–25). 57 Who gives us. The believers' sharing in the fruits of Christ's triumph is so certain that Paul can use the present tense. The sting of death is sin, and so victory over death is forgiveness and participation in resurrection life. Note the full title: our Lord Jesus Christ, emphasizing the majesty of His Person. 58 Therefore (as a consequence now comes the practical application) be steadfast. The Corinthians needed such exhortation because of their instability. Their labour ('wearisome toil'), i.e. in building up the church, if it is in the Lord, i.e. in His wisdom and power, cannot perish or be in vain ('never be thrown away', Moffatt). The firm and clear grasp of the great doctrine of the resurrection provides the motive-power for always abounding in the Lord's work.

16:1–24 OTHER BUSINESS

Characteristically Paul can now turn from the consideration of lofty themes to practical everyday matters and personal news. Saint and theologian though he is, he keeps his feet firmly on the ground when it comes to details of administration.

16:1–4 A special collection

1 The contribution is a gift which Paul is arranging from a number of Gentile churches to poverty-stricken Jewish Christians in Jerusalem (v. 3; Acts 11:29; Rom. 15:25). A year later Paul had to urge the Corinthians to greater efforts (2 Cor. 8, 9), but finally their contribution was completed (Acts 24:17; Rom. 15:26). Although the collection is not mentioned in our canonical letter to the Galatians (cf. Gal. 2:10), the Corinthians apparently heard about the proposal from the Galatian Christians. 2 The first day suggests that Sunday was already the day when Christians met for worship (cf. Acts 20:7; Rev. 1:10). In readiness for Paul's arrival each Christian, whatever his means, is regularly to set aside a proportion of his weekly income (2 Cor. 8:12). (Note the assumption that of course everyone will do so.) This would avoid a last-minute scramble, underline personal responsibility over a period, and probably raise far more money. 3 When I arrive; Greek 'whenever': Paul's plans are still uncertain. The Corinthians, however, are to select and authorize their own delegates (see 2 Cor. 3:1f., and commentary) to take the gift to Jerusalem. Paul will neither handle the money nor himself appoint their representatives. He thus wisely safeguards his position (2 Cor. 8:19–21). 4 If it seems advisable; i.e. if the sum raised warrants an apostolic escort (so Moffatt, NEB); or, if Paul's plans allow him to go.

16:5–12 Paul's plans

5 Paul now confirms his proposed visit to Corinth (4:19) after travelling through the province of Macedonia (see Introduction, 'How many letters and visits?'). For I intend implies that the Macedonia trip will be news to the Corinthians. 6 Paul expects to remain in Ephesus until Pentecost (May–June) and possibly to winter at Corinth. When the bad weather has passed and ships are able to sail again (cf. Acts 28:11; Tit. 3:12), the Corinthians can speed Paul on his journey (cf. v. 11; Rom. 15:24; 3 Jn. 6), e.g. assist in finding a suitable ship and travelling companions; money would not be in mind on this occasion (cf. v. 2; 2 Cor. 12:17). Wherever I go. Paul's further plans, more clearly settled later (Acts 19:22), have not been fixed at the time of writing. 7 Paul emphasizes his desire to spend a longer period with the Corinthians and not just to give them, like the Macedonian churches, a brief passing visit. He seeks to avoid any delay on his part being misunderstood or misrepresented as unloving or fearful (cf. 2 Cor. 1:15). If the Lord permits (cf. Jas. 4:15); the apostle's arrangements are always subject to his Master's overruling. 8, 9 Paul explains why he cannot come sooner. He intends to remain in Ephesus until Pentecost (the great festival 50 days after Passover; cf. 5:7; 15:20), because evangelistic opportunities are many and, as a spiritual consequence, the opposition is great (Acts 19:9, 23f.). Thus it will be a little while before he can reach Corinth. This is not to contradict the promise of 4:19 to 'come soon'. In ch. 4 Paul is rebuking those who wanted to ignore the apostle: 'Anyone would think I was never going to set foot in Corinth again; but look out! I'll be there sooner than you think' (Barrett).

10, 11 When Timothy comes; overland through Macedonia (4:17f.; Acts 19:22), thus taking longer than Paul's letter by sea. Timothy's unease is due perhaps to timidity—some Corinthians could be overbearing (cf. 2 Cor. 10:10; 11:5; 12:11). Years later his 'youthfulness' is still evident (1 Tim. 4:12). Yet Paul obviously thinks highly of him, entrusting him with personal commissions. The Corinthians are told to treat him worthily because he too is engaged in the same work of the Lord as Paul, in evangelism and building up the churches (cf. 1 Tim. 4:13). The brethren may include Erastus (Acts 19:22). 12 The Corinthians had apparently enquired about another visit from Apollos (Acts 19:1; see Introduction, 'Paul's links with Corinth'). Despite Paul's urging, Apollos perhaps decided that Christian unity at Corinth would better be served by his staying away for the present (cf. 1:12). No further visit is recorded, nor is Apollos mentioned in 2 Corinthians.

16:13–24 Final greetings

13, 14 Be watchful. Not enjoining vigilance generally, but referring to imminent eschatological events (as Mk. 13:34f.; Rev. 3:3). Christian conduct should be constantly governed by two factors: one is Christ's return, the certainty of which should encourage the Christian to be courageous and strong (cf. 15:58) in facing temptation, persecution, and everyday troubles. The other is Christian love (cf. 8:1; 13; 14:1).

15 The household of Stephanas (cf. 1:16) are described as the first converts in Achaia, the province including Corinth and Athens. Paul presumably means the first complete family, as distinct from individuals (cf. Acts 17:34; Rom. 16:5). 'To the apostle's mind the pledge of a future Church came not in Athens but in Corinth' (T. C. Edwards, The First Epistle to the Corinthians, 1885). Devoted themselves (lit. 'appointed themselves'); i.e. spontaneously on the Spirit's direct prompting, without waiting to be told by Paul or the church (cf. 2 Cor. 8:17). Saints (cf. 1:2); i.e. Christians generally, both in the local church and those visiting Corinth. 16 The spiritual calibre of such men as Stephanas should be recognized and their lead followed. Labourer; i.e. 'one who toils to the point of weariness' (cf. 1 Thes. 2:9; 1 Tim. 4:10). 'Many work, a few toil' (Edwards). 17, 18 We know nothing about Fortunatus and Achaicus. They probably brought Paul the Corinthians' letter (see Introduction, 'How many letters and visits?') to which the present Epistle is in part a reply. Paul had been refreshed (cf. 2 Cor. 7:13) by their visit. The verb is used of 'giving rest' in Mt. 11:28 and suggests Paul's anxiety for news from Corinth. As well as yours. Evidently these three men were noted for their ability to encourage.

19 The churches. Paul writes from Ephesus (v. 8), but is in close touch with Christian groups elsewhere in the province of Asia (cf. Acts 19:10, 26). Aquila and his wife Prisca left Rome (Rom. 16:3) after the emperor Claudius' edict against Jews in AD 49. Paul met them in Corinth (Acts 18:2) and they accompanied him to Ephesus (Acts 18:18f.), where they willingly opened their house for church worship (cf. Rom. 16:5). They were a courageous couple (Rom. 16:4), and evidently well instructed Christians (Acts 18:26). Hearty greetings suggests real affection for the Corinthians, based on their common faith in the Lord. 20 Paul invites the Corinthians to greet one another, when his letter is read to the congregation, as he would have done had he been present. The contemporary practice of the holy kiss (of peace) would further unity among them (cf. 1 Pet. 5:14). So Paul is implicitly exhorting them once more to abandon their unhappy divisions.

21 With my own hand. Paul usually dictated his letters (cf. Rom. 16:22), then added a concluding word himself to show their authenticity (cf. 2 Thes. 3:17). 22 Accursed; i.e. by separation from God (Gk. anathema; cf. 12:3). Paul declares the final condemnation of traitors to Christ (cf. 1 Thes. 2:16). True devotion to Him would correct party-spirit and moral laxity in Corinth. Our Lord, come! Maranatha, which is Aramaic, the language of the earliest Palestinian church, here appears untranslated in the Greek text. The catchword's preservation by Greek-speaking Christians suggests its frequent use to express their eager longing for the Lord's return (cf. Rev. 22:20). AV divides the phrase Maran atha, 'Our Lord has come', i.e. at the incarnation. 23, 24 Paul ends with the usual prayer for grace (cf. 2 Cor. 13:14) and by sending his Christian love to all, including the troublers (cf. 2 Cor. 11:11; 12:15).

Notes. 22–24 Paul's letter would be read aloud when the Christians met for worship. NEB, following recent scholarship, arranges the closing verses as a liturgical dialogue. The characteristic notes of a communion service are sounded: fraternal love having been established (v. 20), the table is 'fenced' by the dismissal of those who are not committed believers. Our Lord, come! invokes the risen Lord's presence with His people at the meal. The concluding grace is pronounced, and Paul adds an affectionate greeting (Martin).

COMMENTARY

Much of this letter, written some 12 months after 1 Corinthians, is intensely personal, 'a pouring out of the man himself'. Though including several doctrinal matters (e.g. 5:1–10 on the resurrection; chs. 8, 9 on Christian giving), the letter vividly reveals Paul's feelings—and his faith—as he faces peril and disappointment, and counters slander and disloyalty, while he carries out his commission as an apostle. Often we are puzzled by unexplained references and allusions to people and events, doubtless familiar to the Corinthians, yet tantalizingly obscure to us. But in general the letter is Paul's spirited refutation of certain sham 'apostles' who had infiltrated the Corinthian church for their own ends, and in the process were busily discrediting Paul and the true gospel he preached.

1:1 – 2:17 PAUL'S RECENT EXPERIENCES

After greeting his readers (vv. 1, 2), Paul tells how his knowledge of God has been intensely deepened (vv. 3–7) through certain recent fearful experiences (vv. 8–11).

1:1, 2 Greetings

1 Paul's greetings are never perfunctory. Although his opening words are similar to those in 1 Corinthians, a year or so earlier, Paul again carefully lays down the ground of his authority. He writes as an apostle of Jesus Christ, i.e. as His commissioned representative. This is no self-appointment, but one made by the will of God (cf. Gal. 1:1). Though generously associating colleagues with him in his greetings, it is Paul who is the apostle, while Sosthenes (1 Cor. 1:1) and Timothy are each simply described as a brother, a fellow-believer. 2 Grace . . . peace could suggest a Christian linking of the common Greek and Jewish greetings. More probably the words reflect the ancient Aaronic blessing (Nu. 6:24f.).

1:3–7 The value of suffering

3 Paul at once praises God for His great mercies. Being brought through the desperate situation mentioned in vv. 8, 9 has deeply enriched his understanding of God's character. God is the Father of mercies, i.e. the most merciful Father, one whose outstanding characteristic is mercy (Ps. 86:5, 15; Mi. 7:18), and God of all comfort, i.e. encouragement and cheer. 4, 5 Through unusually severe trouble Paul had had a profound experience of divine comfort. He describes his afflictions as a sharing of Christ's sufferings. While the latter are unique (2 Cor. 5:14f.; cf. 1 Cor. 1:13), possibly Paul's were too. At his conversion he was warned of the sufferings he would face as the apostle to the Gentiles (Acts 9:15, 16; Col. 1:24). Paul's as . . . so clause indicates that he means only sufferings which Christians endure in virtue of their union with Christ (cf. 2 Cor. 4:10), and not those due to their own sin. The same union explains why we can share abundantly in comfort too. 6 The apostle's sufferings and comfort would doubly benefit the Corinthians. First, Paul himself was now better fitted to serve them, for experiences which come to a Christian are not for the individual alone but also for the profit of others (v. 4). 7 Secondly, the Corinthians too could learn to draw from the same source of comfort. This is one practical illustration of what is meant by the communion (koinōnia, 'fellowship', 'sharing') of the saints. Christians should thus encourage one another.

1:8–11 Paul's providential deliverance

8, 9 Paul explains why he feels so moved about divine comfort. In Asia Minor he had been in such desperate straits that even he had decided his end had come; and the apostle was no stranger to perils (cf. 2 Cor. 11:23–27). His unexpected deliverance was to him virtually a resurrection (cf. 4:10f.; Eph. 1:19f.). 10, 11 But all danger was still not over, and so he asks the Corinthians to help by praying. When those prayers are answered, they will be able to share in the thanksgiving (cf. 4:15; 9:11). Thus in Christian fellowship God can use us to involve and enrich one another, to His own greater glory.

Note. 10 So deadly a peril (lit. 'so great a death') is not defined. It happened after the First Letter was written (v. 8 indicates that the 'peril' was news to the Corinthians), which excludes whatever is meant by 'fighting with beasts' at Ephesus (1 Cor. 15:32). Nor does Acts 19:23–41 seem to provide an answer, for the riot at Ephesus did not apparently involve Paul in direct personal danger. The 'peril' could have been a desperate illness, but more probably it refers to mob-violence or the near-success of some plot against him (cf. 1 Cor. 16:9).

1:12 – 2:17 Why his plans were changed

1:12–18 evidently reflects allegations being made in Corinth against Paul because a promised visit had been postponed. The real reason for the changed plan (1:23) was to avoid 'another painful visit' (2:1). At the centre of the trouble then was some prominent antagonist of Paul's (2:5–11). A sharp letter (2:9; cf. 7:8) from the apostle had brought the man to repentance and Paul assures the Corinthians of his forgiveness. The section concludes (2:12–17) with reference to Paul's activities after the Ephesus riot (Acts 19; 20:1) and to the effect of the gospel.

12 Paul claims their sympathetic prayers with a clear conscience, for with God's help his conduct in Corinth before pagan and Christian alike had been irreproachable. 13 It is the same straightforward Paul who now writes. He is not a man who speaks or writes one thing while meaning another, as some in Corinth were apparently alleging. 14 When everything was finally revealed on the day of the Lord Jesus, i.e. when He appears as Judge, both Paul and the Corinthians would rejoice to discover how much each had in fact profited the other (cf. 1 Thes. 2:19).

15, 16 Originally Paul intended to visit Corinth after passing through Macedonia (1 Cor. 16:5). Later he had apparently told the Corinthians he would visit them both before and after the Macedonia trip, to give them double pleasure. But then hostile reports from Corinth made Paul change his mind a second time and he decided to go straight to Macedonia. 17 Normally a change of plan would have disappointed his friends, but nothing worse. His opponents, however, charged Paul with vacillating (AV, using 'lightness', suggests a ship without ballast) and acting like an unprincipled pagan; 'such unreliability must affect his teaching too'. Paul retorts that his life has been perfectly consistent, and well they know it. 18 His emphatic as surely as God is faithful inspires a little homily. 19, 20 Paul argues that anyone who like himself wholeheartedly proclaims Jesus Christ, who is truth, and the utter reliability of the promises of God in the OT, must so absorb this positive attitude as to be incapable of practising double-dealing in other matters. Find their Yes; their full and satisfying endorsement in Christ (Rom. 11:36). Yes represents the Greek and Amen the Hebrew form of affirmation. Paul characteristically brings together the two languages. The clear preaching of Christ and the hearty acceptance of that message are alike to the glory of God. 21, 22 God's gift of constancy is not limited to apostles. Neither is His gift of the Holy Spirit. He is bestowed upon all believers as a mark of His ownership (1 Jn. 2:20, 27). Establishes . . . commissioned . . . put his seal are all expressions of the divine affirmation. All the Trinity is active: God the Father establishes the believer, i.e. in his faith, in Christ. At the same time he is commissioned (AV 'anointed', lit. 'christed'), i.e. by the Spirit, for the service of Christ. In the ancient world a seal was a sign of ownership or genuine production ('trademark'), and a pledge of security. Guarantee is another commercial term, meaning deposit, first instalment, and in modern Greek an engagement ring (cf. Eph. 1:13; 4:30). The Spirit guarantees the believer's security in Christ and the full blessings of salvation (cf. 5:1; Eph. 1:14). 23, 24 Paul had changed his mind about coming, not from fickleness or cowardice, but to avoid another painful and profitless visit. Because of the hostility some had stirred up against him in Corinth, he would have had to come 'with a rod' (cf. 1 Cor. 4:21). The phrase to spare you could imply authority to punish, so Paul carefully disclaims any desire to lord it over them in matters of individual faith (1 Pet. 5:3). As a true pastor he works together with his converts for their joy (Phil. 1:25), so that spiritually they learn to stand on their feet (Rom. 14:4; 1 Pet. 1:21).

2:1 Another painful visit. See Introduction, 'How many letters and visits?'. The Greek order suggests that Paul had paid one such visit, of which Acts says nothing (2 Cor. 12:14; 13:2). 2–4 It would give Paul no pleasure to cause his converts further distress. Already in duty bound he has had to rebuke them sharply in a letter, though it cost him a great deal. Tough though he is, he does not hide his tears (Acts 20:19, 31) but reveals 'the essential qualification of the Christian minister—a heart pledged to his brethren in the love of Christ' (J. Denney, The Second Epistle to the Corinthians, EB, 1894).

5 If any one. This is not a hypothetical case, but one notorious to the Corinthians. Neither does it concern the culprit of 1 Cor. 5:1, for something personal against Paul is implied (vv. 5, 10, and 7:12). All the same, Paul insists that the offence is really one against the whole church (1 Cor. 12:26). Not to put it too severely, i.e. not to exaggerate. 6 As Paul has since learned from Titus, the church had sharply disciplined the offender, unlike their earlier failure (1 Cor. 5:4), and the apostle considers that the punishment given is sufficient. It appears that the sentence was decided only by a majority; Paul's next remarks suggest the rest wanted sterner measures. 7, 8 But the penitent must not be allowed to despair utterly and left to drift away (Gal. 6:1; 1 Thes. 5:14). He must be brought back into the church fellowship. 'The cure of souls is the art of arts and the whole body must take its share in it' (H. L. Goudge, The Second Epistle to the Corinthians, WC, 1927). Pastoral discipline among the early Christians was always remedial. The temporary exclusion of an impenitent offender was to safeguard the fellowship from being implicated in his sin, and to secure his repentance and subsequent return. 9 The reason why Paul wrote was to see if the Corinthians would acknowledge his authority, first by disciplining the man and then by restoring him when he repented. 10 Now that the church has taken action successfully, Paul reassures them that the matter is closed as far as he is concerned. 11 If an unforgiving spirit were kept up after the offender had repented, only Satan would benefit. Now the breach has been healed the members of the church must stand together. Unity in Christ is 'the final security against the devices of Satan' (Denney).

12, 13 The narrative of 1:8–10 is now briefly resumed. When Paul decided against going to Corinth and instead wrote the 'severe letter', he asked Titus to report on the Corinthians' reaction (8:6; 12:18). Paul moved northward (Acts 20:1) to Troas, the port of embarkation for Macedonia, to meet Titus on his return. Although his preaching met with much response in Troas, Paul could not settle down as he awaited news from Corinth. So Paul left Troas, crossed the Aegean Sea and entered Macedonia, hoping to find Titus. At last he did.

14 Paul characteristically breaks off the narrative to praise God as he recalls the good news which Titus eventually brought (cf. 7:6). God had indeed won the victory in Corinth. This sets Paul reflecting on the conquests of the gospel generally. Leads us in triumph. Paul is visualizing a Roman 'triumph', the technical term used of a victorious general parading through the packed streets of Rome. As the long and wretched procession of captives and booty (Col. 2:15) revealed the greatness of the Roman victory, so Paul sees his own hardships (Acts 9:16) as glorifying God. 15, 16a The once proud Pharisee is, as it were, being led in Christ's 'triumph', spreading the knowledge of Christ like the aroma scattered by the incense-bearers who accompanied triumphal processions. That aroma was certainly sweet to those praising the victory, but smelled of death to the doomed prisoners. 16b, 17 Who is sufficient for such a responsibility of proclaiming the gospel with its awesome consequences to the hearers? No man is—in his own strength. And certainly not those in Corinth who were preaching a watered-down gospel (cf. 11:4, 12–15), as mere pedlars of God's word, i.e. simply in the business for selfish gain. Unlike these false teachers, Paul and his colleagues were men of sincerity with the purest of motives (1:12); neither were they self-appointed, but commissioned by God (cf. 1:1).

Notes. 2:3 I wrote; i.e. the 'severe letter' (between 1 Corinthians and 2 Corinthians), which has probably not survived (see Introduction, 'How many letters and visits?'). Earlier commentators took this letter to be 1 Corinthians, but v. 4 hardly suits the first canonical Epistle. 6 By the majority (lit. 'by the more'); from the use of a similar expression at Qumran, a reference to the assembly of the church could be intended. 11 Satan (also 11:14; 12:7), 'the god of this world' (4:4), 'Belial' (6:15), and 'the serpent' (11:3), all stress the personal nature of the evil power. 13 Titus is mentioned nine times in 2 Corinthians and highly praised. According to Eusebius, Titus became the first bishop of Crete. W. M. Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, 1895), thought he was Luke's brother, for surprisingly he is not named in Acts. 16 Fragrance. The Rabbis likened the Mosaic law to a drug: its effects were either deadly (to the ungodly) or life-giving (to the righteous). From death to death . . . from life to life. The expressions probably represent a Semitic idiom whereby verbal repetition conveys emphasis.

3:1 – 7:16 PAUL'S MINISTRY

3:1–18 Ministries old and new

of the gospel over the old covenant founded by Moses.

1 Commend ourselves again does not imply earlier self-praise, but carries on the thought of 2:14–17. Letters of recommendation (cf. Acts 9:2; 18:27; Rom. 16:1); Paul does not need them in Corinth—as some do. Jewish opponents armed with such letters had gone to Corinth to discredit him. 2, 3 The Corinthians themselves are authentic testimony to Paul's work, for their astounding transformation (1 Cor. 6:9–11) is known everywhere. Each Christian in that profligate city is a letter from Christ . . . , written not with ink, which was washable (cf. Nu. 5:23) and the tool of men, but with the life-giving Spirit. The authentic gospel, as preached by Paul, inscribed the new covenant not on tablets of stone, as in the case of the old covenant (Ex. 31:18), but on tablets that are human hearts (Je. 31:33; Ezk. 36:26); and hearts that are reachable only by divine action. The law has not been cancelled by the gospel, for this indeed now provides the means of fulfilling it, through the power of the risen Christ within the believer (Rom. 10:4f.).

4 The changed lives at Corinth confirm Paul's confidence concerning his divine appointment. 5 But he declines to claim any credit for the content of the gospel or for its effect. What he is and what he does are the work of grace (1 Cor. 15:10; 2 Cor. 4:7). 6 New; Greek kainos (new in quality), not neos (new in time). The biblical covenant is a relationship offered by God to man. Man cannot initiate or alter it, but only accept or reject it. The new covenant requires ministers qualified by God's Spirit (1 Tim. 1:12). The old written code (Ex. 24) demanded a standard impossible to reach unaided. But the new covenant inaugurated by Christ (1 Cor. 11:25) also offers man the spiritual ability to keep it. 7–11 Paul makes three contrasts between the dispensations: letter and Spirit (vv. 7, 8); condemning and justifying (v. 9); passing and permanent (v. 11). 7 The function of the Mosaic dispensation ('administration') was the education of man's moral sense (Gal. 3:24). But it lead to death, for unless the moral law it laid down was kept, men's relationship with God was severed (Rom. 7:9–11). The brightness on Moses' face (Ex. 34:29), gained from being with God on Mt. Sinai for the giving of the law, did not last. That very fact symbolized the transience of the old dispensation, brought in only until the time came to supersede it with that which is final (Rom. 5:20; Gal. 3:19). The old dispensation, by which God demonstrated man's moral impotence, was accompanied by splendour, because it had a divine origin. 8 Since the new dispensation also has God as its active agent, i.e. the Spirit within men's hearts, it is attended with greater splendour than the earlier dispensation (cf. 4:6). By it God freely provides men with a right standing with Himself, otherwise impossible for them to attain. 10 The old dispensation has come to have no splendour, as the moon loses its brightness when the sun has risen.

12 Paul can rightly be very bold, for his gospel will not pass away. 13 Neither has he anything to hide, unlike Moses who had to put a veil over his face lest the fading radiance suggested to the Israelites the impermanence of the dispensation he was inaugurating (Ex. 34:32f.). Yet its very insufficiency pointed to the greater dispensation to follow (Heb. 8:13). 14 Read the old covenant, i.e. the Jewish Scriptures; this is the first time they are so described. Only through Christ is the OT fully intelligible. Paul's special mission was to proclaim Christ as the 'end', the perfect fulfilment, of the law (Rom. 10:3f.).

15, 16 To this day; i.e. as Paul writes. But the truth still holds. A man, i.e. a Jew, cannot 'see' this truth (Rom. 11:7–9) whenever Moses (the Pentateuch) is read, until he turns to the Lord, and so finds in Jesus the Christ all the righteousness demanded by the law. This theme is worked out in Romans and Galatians, and loomed large in Paul's own experience (Acts 9:20). 17 Freedom; i.e. from every kind of bondage, to fear (Rom. 8:15), to sin (Rom. 7:6), to corruption (Rom. 8:21–23), and especially to the law (Gal. 5:18). 18 We all, Hebrew and Gentile Christians alike, prominent or obscure, have the privilege of looking upon the glory of the Lord, i.e. of the Father as revealed in Christ (cf. 4:6; Jn. 17:24). With unveiled face; i.e. as did Moses, though in the earlier dispensation he alone was permitted to do that (Ex. 34:34). Nevertheless, in the present life even Christians see but imperfectly, beholding God's glory as if looking in a primitive metal mirror (1 Cor. 13:12). But by contrast with Moses' experience, this glory for the Christian goes on increasing from one degree to another, as his knowledge of the Lord increases (cf. 1 Jn. 3:2). Neither is the glory superficial, but inward, the work of the Spirit, here described explicitly as the Lord (cf. the Nicene Creed), i.e. Yahweh Himself.

Notes. 16–18 In English these verses seemingly confuse Christ with the Holy Spirit. a. Some who take Lord to mean Christ interpret v. 17 in terms of v. 6, where 'Spirit' is set over against 'letter'; i.e. if Christ is recognized as present in the Mosaic law, that law is living and life-giving (cf. 1 Cor. 15:45); without Christ the law is dead and death-dispensing (cf. 2 Cor. 2:15, 16). b. Others take the Lord to mean Yahweh, the God of Israel revealed in the OT. Paul normally uses the Greek definite article with 'Lord' when he means Christ, and omits it when he means Yahweh. In this passage only the first 'Lord' in v. 17 has the article, and there it is probably retrospective: 'Now that Lord (i.e. Yahweh, v. 16) whom Moses approached, means for us Christians the Spirit.' (In the OT theophanies Yahweh is sometimes the pre-existent Lord Jesus and sometimes the Holy Spirit; see N. Turner, Grammatical Insights into the New Testament, 1965.)

4:1–15 Human weakness and divine glory

1 The splendour of Paul's God-given ministry of the new covenant, superior to that of Moses (3:6–18), spurs him on. It is the undeserved gift of God's mercy, for Paul fully realizes his own unworthiness (1 Tim. 1:12–17). 2 Renounced. Paul is not implying that he did practice cunning (Gk. panourgia, used in 11:3 of Satan's deceit of Eve), though he was accused of this (12:16). Neither did Paul tamper with God's word, i.e. by misapplying it (cf. 2:17) or even ignoring it (cf. 1 Cor. 9:21; 14:21), as Judaizers in Corinth were apparently alleging. God's word is here primarily the OT, but includes the Christian revelation. For those whose minds are not darkened (3:14), the open statement of the truth in Paul's preaching is plain enough to reach every man's conscience. The Greek can mean 'human conscience in all its forms'. 'The truth' is often almost a technical term for 'Christ' or 'gospel'.

3, 4 Paul concedes that many fail to respond. The parable of the sower (Mk. 4) suggests the same point. The 'seed' is not at fault, but the 'soil'. Those who are perishing (Gk. present participle); not yet 'are lost', as AV, but 'losing the way'. The god (i.e. Satan; cf. Is. 14:14) of this world (lit. 'age'); i.e. of the present dispensation (cf. 1 Jn. 5:19). Satan is a mere 'squatter' in the world (cf. Mt. 4:8f.) and his apparent power but temporary. Christ's likeness of God (cf. Col. 1:15) means, in Paul, not 'a pale imitation' but the visible representation of the invisible God. The phrase is amplified in v. 6. 5 What we preach is not ourselves; i.e. not for personal advantage or following. Those who reject 'our gospel' (v. 3) refuse not the preacher but the subject, Christ. Your servants invites contrast with Corinth's 'super-apostles' (2 Cor. 10–13). 6 In the first creation God's fiat brought light (Gn. 1:3). In re-creation light comes personally (Heb. 1:2f.), an aspect of the gospel vividly impressed upon Paul by his Damascus road experience (Acts 26:13).

7 Paul likens Christians to earthen vessels (cf. Is. 64:8; La. 4:2), i.e. cheap pottery lamps, which carry Christ's light (cf. v. 6). The same Greek word is used of Paul at his conversion when he was appointed a 'vessel' (RSV 'instrument') to carry Christ's name to others (Acts 9:15). Or the 'triumph' (2:14) may still be in mind; valuable booty was often paraded in earthen vessels to show up its glory. The frail meanness of the gospel's human 'containers' magnifies God's power. 8, 9 The present tenses, and 'always' (v. 10), speak of Paul's incessant experience (cf. 11:23f.). The four contrasts can be paraphrased: 'Hemmed in, but not hamstrung; not knowing what to do, but never bereft of all hope; hunted by men, but never abandoned by God; often felled, but never finished.' The end of man's resources is not the end of God's. More than any other Christian, Paul demonstrated that human extremity was the best position in which to prove divine power. 10, 11 Paul's 'dying' day after day (1 Cor. 15:30f.; Rom. 8:36) was a sharing of his Master's earthly experience as a man. This is stressed by the reiteration of the personal name Jesus. Through such excessive sufferings the powerful life of Jesus was also being more clearly revealed in him (Phil. 3:10). 12 The paradox of v. 11 is repeated; Paul points out that the Corinthians reap the benefit of what he is going through. This is not irony, but sober fact (1:4).

13 Paul realizes that he could well die through one of these experiences (1:9; cf. 5:1). In the face of that possibility the apostle expresses his faith by an apt quotation from Ps. 116:10. 14 Even if death should come, the resurrection of Jesus by God guarantees the resurrection of Christians (1 Cor. 15:20f.). So death will not separate Paul either from Jesus or from the Corinthians. Bring us; i.e. present us as to a sovereign (Col. 1:22). 15 As more and more people come to know what Christ is doing in and through Paul, so more will learn the art of thanksgiving, a practice which glorifies God (1:11; 9:11; Ps. 50:23; cf. Rom. 1:21).

4:16 – 5:10 Earthly decline and heavenly renewal

16 Our outer nature, earlier described as 'earthen vessels' (v. 7), 'bodies' (v. 10), 'mortal flesh' (v. 11), ought not to be confused with the 'old self' (Rom. 6:6) and the 'old nature' (Eph. 4:22; Col. 3:9), which are ethical connotations referring to the old unregenerate nature. Wasting away. Sufferings are taking their physical toll. This would be true of anyone. But they cannot touch the Christian's inner nature, 'the highest part of our immaterial being, which is capable of being the home of the Holy Spirit and of being ruled by Him' (A. Plummer, The Second Epistle to the Corinthians, ICC, 1915). Humanly speaking, Paul's sufferings were intense and unending. 17 But taking the heavenly standpoint, he counts them as light and momentary compared with the consequent eternal weight (i.e. 'solid worth') of glory (1 Cor. 2:9; Rom. 8:18). 18 His afflictions and their physical effects, though plain for all to see, are after all only transient, i.e. for the length of this life. He is occupied rather with the unseen and eternal (cf. Heb. 11:1).

5:1 Paul now naturally turns to the provision of a new type of body, fitted for the next life (see also on 1 Cor. 15:35f.). We know; i.e. not by human reasoning, but by divine revelation (cf. 1 Cor. 15:51). The doctrine goes far beyond the Greek idea of the immortality of the soul. Earthly tent, although a usual Greek expression for body, is for Paul an appropriate symbol of transitoriness, alluding to Israel's pilgrim life in the wilderness (cf. 1 Pet. 2:11). Destroyed; dismantled as a tent or booth (cf. Lv. 23:42, 43). We have; not yet, but awaiting us. Not made with hands; not belonging to the perishable natural order, but from God, supernatural, heavenly, eternal. 2 We groan; not in complaint but in prayer (Rom. 8:23, 26). 3 Found naked. Hebrew and earlier Greek thought considered that disembodied spirits were under the earth and incapable of taking part in life in any region of the universe. 4 Further clothed. Paul longs that the return of Christ may take place in his own lifetime and that the heavenly body may arrive before what is mortal is gone. Some consider that since writing 1 Cor. 15 Paul had changed his views on this subject because of the delay in Christ's return and his own physical extremity. But Paul's earliest letter (see 1 Thes. 4:13f.) recognized that some Christians would die before the Lord came back. Swallowed up; Is. 25:8; 1 Cor. 15:54. 5 Prepared. God has had this end in view from the beginning. Guarantee; see on 1:21.

6, 7 Away from the Lord; but only in the sense of being unable to see Him. 8 We would rather. Paul's own preference is clear (cf. Phil. 1:21–23), though as a 'runner' he intends to complete (not abandon) his earthly course (see on 10:13; cf. 2 Tim. 4:7). 9 But whether at home or away, i.e. living or dead when the Lord comes (cf. Rom. 14:8), the Christian's aim or ambition must be to be well pleasing to Him then. 10 We must all; i.e. all Christians, not unbelievers. Appear; be made manifest, laid bare. The teaching here about the judgment of actions is not at variance with the doctrine of justification by faith alone. Professor G. E. Ladd comments in NBD (p. 389) that this judgment seat of Christ is also the judgment seat of God (Rom. 14:10, RV, RSV). However, because of the redemption in Christ, the day of judgment has lost its terror for the man in Christ (1 Jn. 4:17). But this tribunal will assess, with complete justice and impartiality, the worth of our Christian lives, i.e. our actions after conversion; it will disclose both what has been good, i.e. valuable to God's kingdom, and what has been evil, i.e. worthless (cf. Jn. 15:8; 1 Cor. 3:10–15).

5:11 – 6:10 The ministry of reconciliation

11 The fear of the Lord; solemn awe prompted by the thought of rendering account to Him, i.e. Christ (v. 10), at His judgment seat. We persuade men. The reference is not to preaching the gospel to the unconverted (as vv. 19, 20), but to the need to convince certain Christians of Paul's integrity as a Christian and an apostle. 12 Not commending ourselves; cf. 3:1. Giving you cause; i.e. providing his Corinthian friends with material with which to refute Paul's denigrators. 13 If we are beside ourselves. Paul's detractors are evidently making such a charge aginst him (cf. Mk. 3:21). In both his intense enthusiasm and times of spiritual ecstasy (12:1f.), and in his more sober moments, Paul is never out for his own ends; it is for God and His glory and for you and your spiritual benefit. 14 The love of Christ, i.e. his love for Paul as a sinner, controls or constrains him; it shuts him up to one course of action. The same Greek verb is used in Lk. 12:50 of the compulsion felt by Jesus. One has died for all; therefore all have died. The reasoning here implies that Christ died not only on their behalf but in their place, i.e. He died the death they should have died. 15 This fact should impel those who realize it to spend the rest of their lives for Him and no longer for themselves (cf. 1 Cor. 6:19). And was raised. In the NT the death and resurrection of Jesus are always linked (cf. 1 Thes. 4:14). Death without resurrection would evacuate Calvary of all meaning.

16, 17 Paul's outlook has been transformed and made new by his being in Christ, his favourite expression for a Christian, and one denoting the most intimate faith-union with Jesus in His death and resurrection (Gal. 2:20). From a human point of view; i.e. from worldly considerations. Applied to Christ, however, modern radical theologians assume that Paul is here discarding 'the human Jesus of the Gospels' and exalting 'the glorified Christ of faith'; but so to interpret his words would destroy the essential historical basis of Christianity. More probably Paul means that before his conversion he had assumed that Jesus was merely a Messianic pretender. Now as a Christian he worships Him as the Christ of God and Lord of the universe (Phil. 2:9–11).

18 God . . . reconciled us to himself. He is both the initiator and the goal of reconciliation. Reconciliation in the NT sense is not something brought about by man dropping his antagonism towards God. It is something accomplished by God when through the death of Christ He put away everything that on His side meant this estrangement from man. The obstacle which God had to remove was His wrath 'against all ungodliness and wickedness of men' (Rom. 1:16–18). The ministry of reconciliation is the preaching of the good news that at infinite cost God's wrath has been put away by His only beloved Son bearing it upon the cross. The priceless peace won thereby is now freely offered to men. (See J. Denney's magnificent exposition in The Second Epistle to the Corinthians.) 19 God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself. AV wrongly inserts a comma after Christ, whereas was taken with reconciling gives: 'God was by means of Christ reconciling the world to Himself' (cf. RSV mg.). 20 We beseech you. The very conception of ambassadors descending to entreaty is, as Calvin says, an incomparable commendation of the grace of Christ. Paul preaches the gospel in the spirit of the Gospel (Denney). Be reconciled to God; i.e. accept the reconciliation already made by God through Christ's death on the cross (Rom. 5:11).

6:1 Working together with him; a consciousness confessed in 5:18–20; cf. 1 Cor. 3:9. The grace of God; God's provision in Christ described in the previous passage, and entirely His work. But men have the responsibility of receiving it. In vain; either superficially (Mt. 13:20f.; cf. 1 Cor. 15:2) or because false apostles had subsequently misled them into supposing that they themselves could contribute something towards their own salvation (2:17; 11:4). Either way the results which should follow in Christian living would be lacking. Paul may still have the judgment seat in mind (5:10). 2 For he says; Is. 49:8. The acceptable time means the season acceptable

(not to man but) to God (cf. Is. 61:2) because it is the day of salvation decreed by Him, i.e. a period of grace giving men the opportunity to respond to God's message through Christ. Implied also are the responsibility of men to respond and the limitation of God's offer of reconciliation to a certain time. 3 No fault; no cause for blame or ridicule. 'There are people who will be glad of an excuse not to listen to the gospel, or to take it seriously, and they will look for such an excuse in the conduct of its ministers' (Denney). 4, 5 Nine trials are listed in three groups of three, preceded by the supreme quality of great endurance, needful for them all. The first group of general testings are afflictions, pressures physical, mental, and spiritual; unmitigated hardships; and calamities, frustrating situations. The second lists hardships caused by other men; beatings (11:24f.), imprisonments (Acts 16:23), tumults (Acts 13:50; 14:5, 19, etc.). The third concerns hardships Paul accepted to undergo to further the gospel: labours, physical and spiritual fatigue (i.e. he was 'overworked' NEB); sleepless nights (Acts 20:31; 2 Thes. 3:8) and hunger (i.e. sometimes 'starving', NEB).

Paul's list of tribulations is now, in vv. 6–10, matched by a catalogue of spiritual qualities which enable him to endure triumphantly. Even in translation the literary structure of these verses is impressive. 6 Purity; i.e. in moral life, and single-heartedness in motive. Knowledge; i.e. of the truth as it is in Jesus (Col. 2:2f.). Saving knowledge, not intellectual, is meant. Forbearance; unprovoked by hurts inflicted. Christian kindness (Gk. chrēstotēs, appropriately close in sound to Christos, Christ) is the response of God's kindness toward us in Christ Jesus (Eph. 2:7; Tit. 3:4). Forbearance and kindness are also linked in Gal. 5:22 and 1 Cor. 13:4. The inconspicuous place here given to the Holy Spirit appears surprising. The meaning can be 'a spirit that is holy'. H. B. Sweete concludes, 'It is not the person of the Spirit but the gift that is intended.' 7 Paul now turns to the conditions of his ministry. Weapons of righteousness. The genitive defines the origin of the weapons; one result of justification is the provision by the Holy Spirit of weapons for the spiritual battle (cf. Eph. 6:16f.; Is. 59:17).

8–10 reflect the calumnies being spread about Paul by his opponents at Corinth. 9 He was dismissed by some as unknown, a nobody, not 'recognized'; yet well known, making an unforgettable impression upon others. As dying; 'finished' (cf. 1:9)—and behold, much to everyone's surprise, we live, 'we still keep going' (1:9; Acts 14:19). Punished can refer to sentences by human authorities or to 'chastening' by God (Ps. 118:18). 10 Always rejoicing; ever conscious of an unquenchable joy in the Lord (Rom. 8:35f.; Phil. 4:4). Poor materially, yet making many rich in what really counts, the knowledge of Christ (Eph. 3:14f.; Phil. 3:7f.) Possessing everything; i.e. all that matters (Rom. 8:17, 32; 1 Cor. 3:21f.).

6:11 – 7:1 Keep clear of ungodly attachments

Some scholars consider that the abrupt change of subject and tone at 6:14, and the fact that the thought of 6:13 is carried on by 7:2, suggests that 6:14 – 7:1 is misplaced. But MS evidence for this is absent, and no editor would insert an incongruous passage carelessly (see Introduction, 'How many letters and visits?'). It would not be unnatural for Paul at this point to bring up briefly and sharply some critical affair known to the Corinthians, if not to us. He has just invited them to 'widen' their hearts (6:13) and here is a practical reason for doing so. We can only guess the point at issue. Paul recognized that Christians could not isolate themselves from human society (1 Cor. 5:9f.). Existing mixed marriages were not to be broken (1 Cor. 7:12f.), though the Christian must not marry an unbeliever (1 Cor. 7:39). Dining with heathen neighbours was not impossible (1 Cor. 10:27). (See Introduction, 'Paul's purpose in writing'.) In this passage Paul prohibits some particular though unspecified relationship with unbelievers (v. 14). The veto somehow concerns heathen sacrifices; and certainly any association with heathen worship involved immorality of the worst kind (see Introduction, 'Corinth').

11 Corinthians. Paul addresses his readers by name only when his feelings are stirred; cf. Gal. 3:1; Phil. 4:15. Our heart is wide; open-heartedness is for friends (cf. Mt. 12:34). 12, 13 He is speaking intimately as to those he trusts, and appeals for a similar loving response in return. Indeed, he speaks as to children, in whose affections their father should have a special place.

In a series of antitheses in vv. 14–16 Paul brings out the principle of the incongruity of believers being paired with unbelievers; fundamentally they have nothing in common. 14 Mismated; unequally yoked (Lv. 19:19; Dt. 22:10; cf. Phil. 4:3). 15 The climax is reached in naming the chief figures on the two sides, Christ and Belial (Satan). No harmony between them is possible. 16a With idols. Conversion for Gentiles meant an absolute break with Corinth's entire way of life, which revolved around idol-worship. We, the Christian community, are the temple of the living God (1 Cor. 3:16; Eph. 2:19–22; 1 Pet. 2:5). 16b–18 As God said. Paul presses home his argument by citing, as one statement, words culled from all over the OT (see RSV mg.). Separation may mean loss of relatives, friends, and livelihood, and giving up apparently innocent involvements. But the holy God promises to dwell among His people, and there can be no compromise with anything contrary to His interests. 7:1 With such promises, given repeatedly down history, what does earthly loss matter? The recompense will be out of all proportion: the privilege of personal membership of God's own family (Mk. 10:29). Let us cleanse ourselves. The moral demand of the passage is finally expressed positively. Make holiness perfect. Personal sanctification demands persistent effort.

The fear of God is the regulating standard; i.e. reverence for God as Himself holy and demanding holiness in His people (cf. 1 Pet. 1:14–17).

7:2–16 Paul's confidence in the Corinthians

2 resumes the thought of 6:13. 3 I said before; in 6:11–13. 'You are in my very heart, and you will be there in death and life alike' (Moffatt). 4 The cheerful statements are due to the good news Titus has brought from Corinth (vv. 6, 7); see Introduction, 'Paul's purpose in writing'.

5 At 2:13 Paul spoke of his restlessness at Troas waiting for Titus to return with a situation-report from Corinth (see Introduction, 'Paul's links with Corinth'). Now he resumes the narrative. He had crossed the Aegean into Macedonia to meet Titus. There an anxious Paul had to face additional troubles, of which Acts (20:1–3) says nothing; but these were apparently unconnected with Corinth. 6, 7 God, who comforts; cf. Is. 49:13b. See on 2 Cor. 1:3, 4. Titus had conveyed Paul's 'severe letter' to Corinth (see Introduction, 'How many letters and visits?'). Now at last Titus brings his reassuring report, and Paul is overjoyed with relief. 8, 9 Though his letter had made them sorry, and Paul regretted hurting them, it had had the desired effect, because they were grieved into repenting. So Paul had no continuing regret about it. Repentance means submitting conduct to God's standard and seeking His forgiveness. 10 By doing this the Corinthians had truly shown godly grief; and this, far from bringing lasting regret, leads to salvation. Worldly grief is merely remorse; it has no place for hope, forgiveness, or grace, and simply produces death and despair, because it cannot result in positive action. 11 On the other hand, this godly grief has really stirred the Corinthians to set their house in order; so Paul can now pronounce them guiltless in the matter. 12 Not on account; rather, 'not so much on account'. Paul uses a Semitic idiom to express a comparison by a contrast. (For a similar usage see Lk. 14:26 and cf. Mt. 10:37.) The most important object of the 'severe letter' had been achieved in bringing the Corinthians to a radical change of heart in their attitude towards the apostle; but it had also been necessary for the one who did the wrong to be punished (cf. 2:5).

13 Paul's own satisfaction is increased by the joy given to Titus through the success of his errand. 14 Paul's forecast of the Corinthians' reaction had proved correct. 15 Titus had grown to love the Corinthians during his stay. The fear and trembling; i.e. not fright but a 'solicitous anxiety lest love should fail in doing all that is required' (C. Hodge, The Second Epistle to the Corinthians, 1959). 16 Perfect confidence in you. Paul writes as any proud father whose children have not disappointed his expectations (6:13). But Paul is also leading up to the delicate question of collecting money for the poor Christians in Jerusalem (8:1 – 9:15).

8:1 – 9:15 THE LOVE-GIFT FOR THE JERUSALEM CHRISTIANS

Relief for the Jerusalem Christians is first mentioned in Acts 11:27–29 and Gal. 2:10; the story ends in Rom. 15:25–29. Paul laid the duty on the conscience of his churches to express the loving concern of Gentile Christians for their Jewish brothers and sisters in Christ in the mother church at Jerusalem (Rom. 15:27). The acute poverty of the large Christian community there stemmed from the day the first Jewish converts were inevitably cut off from relatives, society, employment, and Temple. Those better off had at once responded (Acts 4:32f.); so later did Christians at Antioch when famine increased their plight (Acts 11:27f.). Paul had evidently raised the question with the Corinthians before writing 1 Cor. 16; by the following year (2 Cor. 8:10) not much progress had been made. With their change of heart, however, the moment seems ripe to press the matter further. In doing so Paul provides us with two chapters (8 and 9) on the philosophy of Christian giving.
