17:24–41 The origin of the Samaritans. 24 After the northern kingdom was conquered and many of its people taken into exile, the Assyrian king imported peoples from other places. Cuthah, Avva, and Sepharvaim are considered to be in Syria near Hamath on the Orontes. 25, 26 The appearance of lions (cf. 1 Ki. 13:24) was considered by the king of Assyria to have resulted from the ignorance of the god of the land by these people who had been imported; and therefore priests were brought. 27 One of the priests: Gray suggests 'some' or 'chosen ones of the priests'. 30 Succoth-benoth: many interpretations have been suggested; none is very convincing. Nergal was the god of Kutu. Ashima, possibly a goddess of the Assyrians, but some would read 'Asherah'. 31 Nibhaz and Tartak are unknown. Adrammelech: some would read 'Adad-melekh', and the following word 'Anu-melekh', Adad and Anu being ancient gods of Babylonia. The gods of Sepharvaim: again none of the many suggestions seems compelling. All of these religious practices are used as lessons to the people of the Lord who will read this account.

18:1 - 21:26 JUDAH AND THE ASSYRIAN EMPIRE

This period covers about 100 years, and coincides with the gradual decline of the Assyrian Empire from its zenith to mediocrity. This is the final phase of the history of Judah and is told in much detail, although the detail frequently is religious and not simply historical.

18:1–12 Hezekiah of Judah

Cf. 2 Ch. 29–32, an almost exact duplicate in Is. 36–39; Josephus, Ant. ix.13 - x.2. Hezekiah is listed as one of the greatest of all the kings of Judah, who gave himself to religious reform. His reign was contemporary with that of Shalmaneser, Sargon II and Sennacherib. Historians complain that we have more information about Hezekiah's boils than we have about the political situation. For the first time a canonical prophet (Isaiah) takes an active part in state politics.

18:1–8 Introductory statement. The religious estimate of this reign is entirely good, comparable only to that of Josiah. 1 Third year of Hoshea: this is one of the data that are out by 12 years (Thiele). Kitchen (in NBD) rejects Thiele's theory and says that co-regencies will account for the differences; but this would mean that Hezekiah became co-regent in 728 at the age of 13, when Ahaz was only 26 and had reigned only 6 years. Gray supposes that Hezekiah was adopted as heir-apparent in 729 at the age of 10 (by my calculation, 13). 4 The suggestion has been made that this portion was taken from the reforms of Josiah. It is true that there are many parallels but, as Gray points out, there is no good reason to deny Hezekiah the credit of the reformation described here. It certainly fits in with the period of Isaiah as well as the reforms of Josiah fit in with the period of Jeremiah. On the bronze serpent, cf. Nu. 21:9. 8 From watchtower to fortified city: this is a merism to indicate all types of Philistine holdings.

18:9–12 The fall of Samaria. Except for chronological data, this paragraph repeats in condensed form what is told in 17:3–8.

18:13 - 19:37 Jerusalem besieged by Sennacherib

Cf. Is. 36:1 - 39:8. The story is told at great length, but the military and political details are hardly mentioned.

18:13–16 Hezekiah pays tribute. 13 Fourteenth year of King Hezekiah, another element in the problem of chronology. Sennacherib came to the throne in 705 and his third expedition is dated positively at 701. If the 6th year of Hezekiah was 722 (the fall of Samaria, 2 Ki. 18:10), then the 14th year could not have been 701. Any attempt to change the figures, such as to read 'twenty-fourth' instead of fourteenth, involves the ages of Hezekiah and Ahaz, and several different scripture references. We conclude that Hezekiah became king in his own right in 716/15 and reigned until 687 BC. Sennacherib tells of this invasion (cf. ANET, pp. 287f.). He claims to have laid siege to 46 walled cities and many villages, to have taken 200,150 people, and to have shut up Hezekiah in Jerusalem 'as a bird in a cage'. His figure, '30 talents of gold, 800 talents of silver, plus many other items', is in close agreement with the statement of vv. 14–16. Possibly the 300 talents of silver of v. 14 was in minted form, whereas the '800 talents of silver' in Sennacherib's record included the silver mentioned in v. 15. The value of the gold and silver in v. 14 by one calculation is about $1,750,000 (£730,000); according to another estimate, $5,650,000 (about £2,350,000).

18:17–37 The taunts of the Rabshakeh. Cf. 2 Ch. 32:9–19; Is. 36:2–22. 17 Tartan: Akkadian for 'second in command', the commander-in-chief of the army (cf. Is. 20:1). The Rabsaris: a high military official (cf. Je. 39:3). The Rabshakeh: probably a high civil official. These are treated as proper names in AV. The conduit of the upper pool: site not positively identified; possibly a conduit to bring water from the Virgin's pool to the pool of Siloam (cf. Is. 7:3). 18 Eliakim: cf. Is. 22:20. For the offices, see on 1 Ki. 4:2, 3. According to Is. 22:15ff., Shebnah is 'over the household' and is denounced, and Eliakim is to replace him. Some scholars consider the two Shebnahs as different persons. 23 Rabshakeh taunts them with a wager, and 25 also with the boast that he has come at the command of Yahweh. We need not assume that this was true, or even if it was true that Rabshakeh knew it. 26 Aramaic language: the language in general use in diplomatic and commercial circles, but obviously not understood by the common people of Judah at this time. We assume that the Rabshakeh was speaking Hebrew through an interpreter. 27 His reply to Eliakim is insulting and 28 his appeal to the people over the heads of their leaders in the language of Judah (or Hebrew) is an indication of his boldness. 31, 32 indicate that the conditions of exile will not be difficult if the people go meekly. 34 Hamath, etc.: Syrian cities which had been taken over by Sennacherib (cf. 17:24). Lucian and Old Latin insert 'Where are the gods of Samaria?'

19:1–7 Isaiah's counsel. At last the king turns to Isaiah, who has steadfastly opposed alliance with Egypt (Is. 30:1–7, 15; 31:1–9). 2 The prophet Isaiah: the first appearance of the canonical prophet in the historical books of the OT. 4 The remnant that is left: cf. the name of Isaiah's son (Is. 7:3).

19:8–19 The message from Rabshakeh. 9 Tirhakah poses a problem of date, since his reign is dated 688–670 BC. Some have supposed a second invasion by Sennacherib at that later date. Others assume that Tirhakah was acting as general (he is not called 'Pharaoh') for his uncle Shabataka, but this raises the objection that Tirhakah was much too young to have been the general in 701. In our text it seems that the rumour of the approach of the Egyptians caused Sennacherib to rush back to Assyria, but according to record the Assyrian king defeated Pharaoh and his allies at the battle of Eltekah in 701. Scholars assume that it was news of an impending revolt in Babylon that caused Sennacherib to leave the west and return to his homeland. 12 Gozan: perhaps Tell Ḥalaf (Gray), the name of a river in 17:6. Haran: a chief trading city of NW Mesopotamia on the Balikh river. Rezeph: one of several places with this name; this one is on the road from Haran to Palmyra. Eden: the Aramaean state Bit-adinni near Haran. Telassar: site unknown; Gray suggests Til-Bashir. 13 Sepharvaim: see on 17:24. Hena: site unknown.

19:20–34 The prophecy of Isaiah. Cf. Is. 37:21–35. 21–28 are sometimes described as a 'taunt song' in qinah metre. 22 The Holy One of Israel, a common expression throughout Isaiah (see Introduction to Isaiah). 23 Densest forest: AV 'the forest of his Carmel'; to treat karmillo as a proper name here makes little sense (cf. 2 Ch. 26:10, AV and RSV). 24 All the streams of Egypt: AV 'all the rivers of besieged places'. Egypt is not in the Hebrew; on the other hand this word for 'river' generally means 'Nile' in the OT. MT reads 'I will dry up', LXX and Vulg. translate in the past tense; but Sennacherib actually never invaded Egypt, and the future tense makes better sense. 25 Cf. Is. 10:5–11. 28 My hook in your nose. Esarhaddon's relief at Zenjirli shows Tirhakah of Egypt and Baalu of Tyre each with a ring in his nose and the cords in the hand of the conqueror. Cf. 2 Ch. 33:11. 29 Isaiah predicts the deliverance of the land, with at most the loss of harvest for 2 years. This is a prophecy in prose. 30 Cf. the doctrine of the remnant, set forth by Isaiah in Is. 10:20–22, although the same word does not appear here. For the miraculous deliverance, cf. Is. 30:15; 31:1–5. 32 This does not agree with Sennacherib's inscription of his campaign of 701 BC, where he mentions a rampart, and may support the view that the oracle refers to a later campaign. In his cylinder inscription Sennacherib does not claim to have attacked Jerusalem.

19:35–37 The deliverance from Sennacherib. Cf. Is. 37:36–38; 2 Ch. 32:21–23. 35 That night: in Hebrew indefinite 'on such a night', omitted in Isaiah and Chronicles. A hundred and eighty-five thousand: there is no evidence outside the Bible of such tremendous loss; in Chronicles it is much more moderate. Herodotus (ii.141) tells of the tradition that the army of Sennacherib was routed in the vicinity of Pelusium in a single night, when mice infested the camp and ate the quivers, bow-strings, and leather shield handles. Some have suggested that this may refer to the same situation, although the location does not fit; a pestilence such as bubonic plague may have been behind both stories. In any event Sennacherib did not take Jerusalem at this time. 37 Nisroch: otherwise not known; scholars suggest the god Nusku, worshipped at Nippur; others suggest Marduk. Adrammelech and Sharezer. According to Eusebius, Sennacherib was killed by his son, Ardumuzanus or Adramelus (these may not be the same person), and was succeeded by Nergilus who was killed by the Adramelus just mentioned. Nergilus could be Nergal-sharezer, which could be the Sharezer here. The Assyrian records do not give the names of the assassins but simply state that Sennacherib perished by the hand of one of his sons. The assassination took place in 682 BC.

20:1–21 Conclusion of Hezekiah's reign

20:1–11 Ḥezekiah's illness. Cf. Is. 38–39; 2 Ch. 32:24–26. 1 Set your house in order: cf. 2 Sa.

17:23. 6 Fifteen years: calculated from Hezekiah's death in c. 687, this could mean that the illness occurred in 701, which would be the year of Sennacherib's siege (cf. v. 1, 'in those days'). There is an objection to this date, on the grounds that Merodach-baladan (v. 12) was king of Babylonia 721–710 and again in 702 for a few months, at which time he was hardly in a position to send an embassy anywhere. But Merodach-baladan started to regain his throne in 705, at the death of Sargon, and during the next few years he was trying to cultivate as many allies as possible. We should probably date Hezekiah's illness prior to the siege of Jerusalem, perhaps between 705 and 702, and not take the prophecy of 15 years as a means of establishing the date of the illness. 7 Some scholars have suggested that the illness could not have been very serious if a poultice of figs, commonly used for opening boils, was sufficient to heal him. This ignores, however, the divine element which lies behind the story, even if not mentioned specifically in this verse. That he may recover: RSV translates as a purpose clause, which makes sense in the context; AV reads it as simple past tense, 'he recovered' (cf. Is. 38:4–22). 9 Ten steps: AV 'degrees'; we need not suppose a sundial; the construction of steps can be arranged so that the shadow cast by the sun gives an approximation of the time. A recent suggestion, based on the word in the Dead Sea Isaiah scroll, proposes a shrine for astral worship on some rooftop, and an eclipse of the sun as the sign. But this would not account for the details of the story nor for the psychological effect on Hezekiah described in the text. Whether the sun was actually moved backward, or some refraction of its rays caused its shadow to move backward, is a discussion based on attempts to find more than the biblical text actually says. 11 The sun, based on Syriac (cf. Is. 38:8); Hebrew lacks 'sun'.

20:12–15 The embassy from Merodach-baladan. Cf. Is. 39:1–8; 2 Ch. 32:31. 12 Merodach-baladan: MT 'Berodach', an obvious mistake arising from the similarity of B and M in the older script. Josephus says the aim of the embassy was to secure Hezekiah as an ally (Ant. x.2.2). 13 Snaith points out that there is something to be said for the date 702, for Hezekiah actually did revolt. Hezekiah welcomed them (Heb. 'listened to them'): a difference of one letter in Hebrew would read 'Hezekiah rejoiced', or 'was glad', which agrees with LXX, Vulg., Syr., and Is. 39:2.

20:16–19 Isaiah rebukes Hezekiah. 17 Some scholars put this prophecy at a later period, doubtless following the widely-held principle that there can be no predictive prophecy. This principle, however, fails to explain the psychological effect which the prophets had on their contemporaries. Entirely apart from the fact that God could reveal these things to Isaiah, there is really nothing in these verses that had not already been the experience of many smaller nations that had been carried into captivity by the Assyrians. If someone objects that it is Babylon that is mentioned, it may be replied that Babylon is already challenging Assyrian rule, and it was a Babylonian embassy that caused Hezekiah to commit this folly. 19 Peace and security in my days: in the spirit of the sorry words from Munich in 1939.

20:20, 21 Summary of Hezekiah's reign. 20 The pool and the conduit: probably a reference to 'Hezekiah's Tunnel' discovered nearly 100 years ago; the Siloam Inscription describes the completion of the tunnel. Is. 22:9ff. may indicate that the Siloam tunnel was built after 701.

21:1–18 Manasseh of Judah

Cf. 2 Ch. 33:1–20; Josephus, Ant. x.3.1 - 4.1. Manasseh reigned longer than any other king in Judah, coming to the throne as co-regent in 696, becoming sole ruler in 687/6, and ruling until 642. He is described as the worst of all the kings, and the sins of Manasseh are given as the reason for the judgment on Judah (24:3). The peak of Assyrian prosperity in the west came during his reign. In 671 Esarhaddon invaded Egypt, and for the next 20 years at least, Assyrian troops continually moved back and forth on the coastal route to Egypt—which provided peace and security for Judah, but also meant that Judah was vassal to Assyria. Manasseh's name occurs in several Assyrian inscriptions, but the account in Kings deals mostly with his religious apostasy.

21:1–10 The abominations of Manasseh. 2 The abominable practices of the nations: these are described in the following verses. 3 High places: see on 1 Ki. 3:2. Manasseh is the only king of Judah likened to Ahab of Israel. The host of heaven: Manasseh reintroduced astral worship. 6 Burned his son: part of the worship of Melek (Molech), cf. 16:3. It was practised in the valley of Hinnom (2 Ch. 28:3; Je. 32:35). Soothsaying . . . augury . . . mediums . . . wizards: ancient practices that possibly had never completely died out, but Manasseh gave them the support of the throne. It makes little sense to claim that Deuteronomy was written to offset the abominable practices of this period, when so many of these can be traced back before the time of Moses. 7 Asherah: see 1 Ki. 15:13. 7–15 According to some scholars these verses are the work of a later editor, c. 550 BC, who had to account for the fact that Jerusalem was destroyed and the kingdom brought to an end. But this ignores the reason why Jerusalem was destroyed. According to the consistent biblical picture, prophets undoubtedly living and prophesying before the date of the destruction were already saying such things, and Jerusalem refused to listen.

21:11–16 Yahweh's word to Manasseh. Idolatry and wickedness did not begin with Manasseh in Judah. To suppose that the 'editor' had any such notion is to infer that there was no sin at Sinai, no disobedience against Yahweh in the days of the judges, no idolatry in Solomon, and no prophetic voice in the land crying out against idolatry prior to 550 BC. Manasseh is the culmination of all rebellion against Yahweh; he represents the antithesis of David, an 'Antidavid' whose purpose is to destroy the Davidic covenant. It is significant that there is no prophetic voice during the reign of Manasseh. 13 Measuring line . . . plummet: see Am. 7:8. 16 Josephus (Ant. x.3.1) says that Manasseh slew some every day. According to tradition he slew Isaiah the prophet, sawing him asunder (cf. Heb. 11:37).

21:17, 18 Summary of Manasseh's reign. Nothing further is added, except that he was buried in the garden of his house; we are not told why this deviation from the usual interment.

21:19–26 Amon of Judah

Cf. 2 Ch. 33:21–25. Amon reigned only 2 years, and followed in his father's footsteps. There is no indication that Amon was made co-regent with Manasseh—a notable fact, considering the age of Manasseh and his long reign. 19 Jotbah, about 20 miles N of Ezion-geber (Nu. 33:33). 23 Amon was assassinated at the age of 24 by his servants, but 24 the people avenged his death by killing the conspirators and made Josiah, his son, king.

22:1 - 23:30 THE REFORMS OF JOSIAH

22:1–20 The book of the law

22:1, 2 Introductory statement of Josiah's reign. Cf. 2 Ch. 34:1 - 35:27. Josiah is an ideal king in many ways, and in the book of Kings, he and his great-grandfather Hezekiah are the only kings receiving unqualified approval. The reign of Josiah is approximately contemporary with the prophet Jeremiah, yet strangely there is no mention of Jeremiah in Kings and only a passing reference to Josiah in Jeremiah's prophecy. Ashurbanipal of Assyria was a weak king, and Josiah could pursue a course of independent action. 1 Eight years old: the grammar suggests a higher number. His sons Jehoiakim (24:36) and Jehoahaz (24:31) were 25 and 23 when he was about 39, which would make him a father at 14 or 15—but this is not impossible. If he was hidden for 7 years, the figure eight is in order. Moreover, if we were to read 'eighteen', it would mean that Amon was only 7 when Josiah was born. The death of Josiah may be accurately dated by the Babylonian Chronicle at 609; therefore he became king in 639.

22:3–7 The repairs to the Temple. Snaith (IB) supposes that Josiah could not begin repairs until after the death of Ashurbanipal, and then the Scythian invasion further held up the plan. 3 Eighteenth year: 621 BC, 5 years after the death of Ashurbanipal. According to 2 Ch. 34:3, Josiah's reform in Jerusalem began in the 12th year of his reign, which would be 628. 4 The procedure is the same as followed by Jehoash (12:9–15).

22:8–13 The discovery of the book of the law. The details of the story sound like the result of many tellings, an indication of the great importance of the event. 8 The book of the law: this has become a primary item of critical study. The earliest critical view was that it was the 'D'-document, probably Dt. 12–26, which had been recently written, and was 'found' to give it prestige. Scholars have modified this view in so many different ways that little remains of the original theory. On the other hand the conservative view, that it was the entire Pentateuch, does not commend itself if for no other reason than the tremendous size of the scroll of the Pentateuch. 8, 10 The book of the law was read publicly twice in a part of the same day. Since the reforms were so closely related to the material in Deuteronomy, there can be little doubt that the book of the law was either Deuteronomy, or a substantial portion of it.

22:14–20 The prophecy of Huldah. Scholars are inclined to accept this as an accurate record, for it is extraordinary to have a woman speak for Yahweh. Both Jeremiah and Zephaniah were active; an artificial writing of the account would almost certainly have made use of one of these prophets (cf. 2 Ch. 34:20–28). 15 The man. Snaith notes that the king is but a man: 'This needs to be remembered in the face of all attempts to show that among the Hebrews the king was regarded as divine.' 16–20 The prophecy of the destruction of the Temple and the carrying of the inhabitants into exile, according to some scholars, was written by the later editor. But in the light of the experience of so many other nations, and particularly of the northern kingdom, there is no reason for even a rationalist to have to date this passage after the fact.

23:1–30 Josiah's religious reforms and subsequent death

Cf. 2 Ch. 34:29–32.

23:1–3 The making of the covenant. In some ways, the religion of the OT is the covenant between Yahweh and His people. It is above all fitting to re-establish this relationship in a time of religious revival. 3 The pillar: cf. 11:14. Joined in: AV 'stood to' represents the Hebrew, and probably describes the actual ritual of standing within the covenant symbols.

23:4–20 The destruction of the cult places and objects. Cf. 2 Ch. 34:3, 4, 7, 33. 4 Priests of the second order: perhaps it should be 'the second priest' (cf. 25:18 and Je. 52:24). Fields of the Kidron: Lucian has 'lime kilns of Kidron'. 5 Priests: the word used here always refers to priests of a foreign religion (Ho. 10:5; Zp. 1:4; perhaps Ho. 4:4). Constellations: the Hebrew word occurs only here in the OT, but is used commonly in rabbinical Hebrew for the signs of the zodiac and the planets; it seems to be part of astral worship. 6 The brook Kidron, later called the 'Valley of Jehoshaphat', the scene of the final resurrection and judgment of the world. Cf. the end of the verse with Ex. 32:20. 7 Cult prostitutes: probably including both sexes, although the word is masculine (cf. Dt. 23:17).

Hangings (Heb. 'houses') is a Jewish traditional interpretation, and finds support in an Arabic word having the same consonants. 8 The high places of the gates: the same consonants would read 'the high places of the satyrs', or 'goat demons' (see Lv. 17:7; 2 Ch. 11:15). 9 is difficult to interpret; it suggests that these priests were admitted to the sacred meal but were not allowed to sacrifice. 10 Topheth, probably 'fireplace', referring to the valley of the sons of Hinnom where children were burnt as sacrifices (cf. Dt. 12:31; Je. 7:31). The valley of Hinnom was located on the S side of Jerusalem, and came to be known as Gehenna (see on 16:3). 11 Precincts: meaning unknown; probably some kind of structure W of the Temple (1 Ch. 26:18). Some scholars take the word to be Persian and therefore date this portion very late, but a Babylonian etymology has been suggested. (Cf. Montgomery, ICC, p. 540.) Chariots of the sun: part of the symbol of the solar deity, hence solar worship, or the worship of the sun god, is intended here. 13 The mount of corruption: see on 1 Ki. 11:7. Scholars believe that the word corruption has been repointed from the word for 'anointing oil', and that this refers to the Mount of Olives, E of the brook Kidron. 15 He pulled down and he broke in pieces, based on LXX; Heb. 'he burned the high place' makes little sense. 18 The prophet who came out of Samaria: see 1 Ki. 13; but the passage is difficult.

23:21–23 The celebration of the Passover. This was the climax of the reformation, and followed the description in Dt. 16:1–8. According to some scholars, this was the first Passover ever held in Jerusalem, hence new regulations were needed. Neither this passage nor 18:4 makes mention of the Passover of Hezekiah (2 Ch. 20). The Passover, like all religious ritual, certainly shows signs of development historically. At the same time it seems impossible to separate it from the Exodus, since it is so deeply woven into the cultus as well as the faith of the people of the OT.

23:24–27 Further reforms and the Lord's word. Josiah presses the reform throughout Judah in order to establish the words of the law. There seems to be little point in supposing that the author/editor could not understand why this did not turn away Yahweh's anger and therefore added vv. 26, 27. The great 8th-century prophets had spoken, and Jeremiah and Zephaniah were even then speaking: if we remove from their prophecies all warnings that are like these verses, there would be little left! 24 Teraphim: household images (cf. 1 Sa. 19:13–16; Gn. 31:32, 34). 25 Expressed in the words of the Shema (Dt. 6:5), which was obviously already liturgical.

23:28–30 Summary of Josiah's reign. Cf. 2 Ch. 35:20–27. The great reform suddenly collapses, when Josiah marches his army to Megiddo to oppose Pharaoh Neco and is killed. The city of Nineveh had fallen in 612 BC through a two-pronged attack by the Medes and the Babylonians. We do not know the reason why Neco was marching; possibly he wanted to support the tottering Assyrian kingdom, or more likely he wanted to take Syria for himself. Likewise the reason why Josiah decided to march to Megiddo is not given. He may still have been under some obligation to Assyria, although this seems unlikely and certainly is not mentioned; or he may have been moving to extend his own authority (cf. 2 Ch. 35:20–24). The suggestion that Josiah went out at the invitation or demand of Neco is flatly contradicted by the account in Chronicles. 29 Neco: Neco II of Egypt, 610–595 BC. AV Neco 'went up against the king of Assyria', following the logical meaning of the Hebrew, seems to make no sense and RSV is better, Neco went up to the king of Assyria. The confusion of 'el 'to' and 'al 'against' is quite common in the OT. 30 Dead: the Hebrew could mean 'dying', which agrees with the account in Chronicles, but the construction of the Hebrew sentence would be a bit strange. Megiddo: from Heb. har mᵉgiddôn, 'Mount Megiddo' is derived from Greek 'Armageddon' (cf. Rev. 16:16). Notice that the people made Jehoahaz king to succeed Josiah.

To suggest that with the death of Josiah the whole 'Deuteronomic structure, which the first editor had erected, fell to the ground' (Snaith, IB) is to speak of a structure which the critics have erected. The so-called first editor would never have written the book if his hopes had collapsed—or was he supposed to have been writing as the events occurred?

23:31 – 25:30 THE LAST DAYS OF JUDAH

From the death of Josiah to the destruction of Jerusalem is but a short span, and the events pass at an ever-quickening pace. In 22 years there will be 4 kings, and 3 invasions of Jerusalem.

23:31–35 Jehoahaz of Judah

Cf. 2 Ch. 36:1–4. Manasseh was Hezekiah's son, and Jehoahaz had Josiah for a father: in each case, the son of the reformer was 'evil'. We must ask ourselves, Why? Hezekiah forgot to ask the Lord before he opened his treasury to the Babylonians, and Josiah forgot to ask whether he should go to Megiddo—is there any connection? 31 Jehoahaz was not the oldest son of Josiah (see v. 36). Apparently the people felt he would be a better king. Jehoahaz was his throne-name; his private name was 'Shallum' (Je. 22:10ff.; 1 Ch. 3:15). Reigned three months: confirmed by the Babylonian Chronicle which states that Neco's campaign in 609 lasted from Tammuz (June/July) to Elul (August/September) (D. J. Wiseman, Chronicles of Chaldaean Kings, pp. 62f.). 32 He did what was evil, but he did not have much opportunity. Gray suggests that he turned to Egypt for aid, but this does not fit the events in vv. 33, 34. More likely he opposed turning to Egypt for support and Neco put him in bonds, laid the land under tribute, and made Eliakim king in his place. 33 Riblah: an important city about 20 miles S of Hama, in the Beqa' near Qadesh on the Orontes. A hundred talents of silver: about $240,000 (or £100,000) at today's price. A talent of gold at the official rate is about $42,500 (£17,500). 34 Eliakim was the older son of Josiah; Jehoiakim was probably his throne-name. Jehoahaz was taken to Egypt and died there. 35 In contrast to the tribute in the days of Manasseh which was imposed upon the wealthy, this tribute, very much smaller, was imposed upon the entire country, suggesting that the country was very poor.

23:36 – 24:7 Jehoiakim of Judah

Cf. 2 Ch. 36:5–8; Je. 22:18, 19; 26:20–23; 36:1–26; 1 Esdras 1:32–36; Josephus, Ant. x.5.2. (Josephus contains a long extract from Berossos, our primary authority for this portion of Nebuchadrezzar's empire.) Jehoiakim reigns for 11 years, part of the time as a vassal to Nebuchadrezzar. After 3 years, Jehoiakim revolts, which is possibly to be taken in connection with Neco's march northward (according to Je. 46:2 in the 4th year of Jehoiakim). This was the occasion for Nebuchadrezzar to destroy Neco and extend his authority to the border of Egypt. It was probably at this time that a number of the royal family and nobility were taken to Babylonia (Dn. 1:1–6; but cf. Je. 52:28). There are difficulties to be resolved. According to Josephus, in his 8th year Jehoiakim refused to pay tribute and Nebuchadrezzar sent a punitive expedition; this would agree with the Babylonian Chronicle which records an encounter with Egypt in Palestine in that year.

23:36, 37 Introductory statement. Jehoiakim (Eliakim, v. 34) is put on the throne by Neco, forced to pay tribute to the Pharaoh, and he did what was evil in the sight of the Lord, which is not further described. Jehoiakim's influence in Egypt is suggested by Je. 26:21–23. His reign may be dated 608–597 BC.

24:1–4 Nebuchadrezzar's reign. This great king of Babylon reigned 605–562 BC. His name is regularly given as Nebuchadrezzar in Jeremiah, which is nearer the Babylonian Nabu-kudurri-uṣur. 1 Jehoiakim became his servant three years: 603–601, if we accept Josephus' figure, but it is also possible that Nebuchadrezzar as the commander of the Babylonian army immediately moved toward Jerusalem after Neco had withdrawn to Egypt in 608, in which case Jehoiakim's revolt would be in 605. In that year Nebuchadrezzar was on a campaign in the west and had to return home to receive the throne on his father's death. 2 The picture would fit a time when Babylon was preoccupied elsewhere and the border tribes were making the most of the occasion. The prophets: Jeremiah and Uriah (Je. 26:20ff.). For background see Je. 7:16–18; Ezk. 8:5–18.

24:5–7 Summary of Jehoiakim's reign. 6 Slept with his fathers indicates a peaceful death, but according to 2 Ch. 36:6 Nebuchadrezzar 'bound him in fetters to take him to Babylon', and Jeremiah (22:19) says he was to have 'the burial of an ass' (i.e. none). One suggestion is that Jehoiakim revolted again and when Nebuchadrezzar attempted to take him to Babylon, he was wounded and died and his body was cast away. 7 Babylon was at last in control of the west.

24:8–17 Jehoiachin of Judah

Cf. 2 Ch. 36:9, 10; Je. 29:2; 1 Esdras 1:41–44; Josephus, Ant. x.6.3 and x.7.1. The young king reigned only 3 months, during which Jerusalem was in siege. According to the Chronicle of Nebuchadrezzar the siege extended from Chislev (December) to Adar (March) 598/597. For an evaluation of him see Ezk. 17:12–24. 8 Jehoiachin: his throne-name; his real name was Jeconiah (1 Ch. 3:16) or in brief Coniah (Je. 22:24). 12 The eighth year of his reign: the first time the scripture writer has used foreign dating; Nebuchadrezzar's 8th year would be 597 BC; Je. 52:28 'seventh year' is based on a different system of calendration. According to a Babylonian tablet, the capture of Jerusalem is dated to 15/16 March (2 Adar) 597. 13 Cf. Je. 27:19f. All: the word is frequently used figuratively in Scripture (cf. 25:15). From Dn. 5:2; Ezr. 1:7–11 we assume that only the vessels that were too large to be carried away were cut up. The others were taken to the temple of Marduk in Babylon. The story of Jehoiachin is continued in 25:27–30. It is obvious that he was considered to be the legal or true king of Judah. 13, 14 Some scholars claim that this refers to the destruction of Jerusalem of 586. However, the figures in vv. 14, 16 do not agree with those in Je. 52:28–30, as Snaith points out (in IB). 15 Cf. Je. 27:20. 16 Cf. Je. 52:28ff.; some scholars prefer Jeremiah's figures.

24:18 – 25:7 Zedekiah of Judah

Cf. 2 Ch. 36:11–21; Je. 39:1–10; 40:7 – 41:18; 52. The struggles between the pro-Egyptian and the pro-Babylonian parties in Judah are reflected in Jeremiah; Zedekiah apparently falls in with the pro-Egyptian party. When Psamtik II came to the throne of Egypt in 593 BC he stirred up trouble in the western provinces of the Babylonian Empire. With his successor Apries (Hophra), who came to the throne in 588, this unrest apparently breaks out as rebellion, doubtless involving Zedekiah. 18 Zedekiah, whose name was Mattaniah (v. 17), was full brother of Jehoahaz and uncle of Jehoiachin, as Je. 52:1 and LXX of 2 Ch. 36:10 indicate; the Heb. of 2 Ch. 36:10 therefore has to be reinterpreted. 20 The writer has skipped over the intervening years of Zedekiah's reign and does not tell us the reason for the revolt. Since there was a revolt under Hophra (Je. 44:30) in 588, it seems logical to tie Zedekiah's revolt in with this.

25:1 The date is given according to the Babylonian calendar. The siege began toward the end of December; hence the year had begun in March. Why it took 19 months to capture Jerusalem is not clear. In the light of Je. 37:5 we may assume there was some diversion of the Babylonian forces, probably including Hophra's rebellion. The revolt broke out in 588, the 9th year of Zedekiah (25:1). 2 The eleventh year would be 586 and 3 the fourth month, Tammuz (June/July). 4 The king . . . fled: from LXX; lacking in Hebrew. Cf. Je. 39:4; 52:7. The Arabah: here the Jordan depression or the steppe land E of Jerusalem. Zedekiah apparently escaped from the SE corner of the city and made his way toward Jericho through the desert. 6 He was captured near Jericho and taken to the Babylonian king at Riblah (cf. 23:33). 7 His punishment is recorded here, but his death is probably recorded in Ezk. 12:12ff.

25:8–30 The destruction of Jerusalem and the Exile

Cf. 2 Ch. 36:14–21; Je. 52:12–30. The Babylonians burnt the entire city, Temple, palace and houses, deported the population, leaving only the farm workers. This was a deliberate punishment and destruction of the city. According to Albright the virtual depopulation of Judea has been confirmed by archaeological research (Archaeology of Palestine, pp. 140ff.; Recent Discoveries in Bible Lands, ch. 17).

25:8–21 The destruction of Jerusalem. 8 The nineteenth year, 586, and the seventh day of the fifth month, July/August. Lucian and Syr. read '9th day', which agrees with the Jewish tradition that on the 9th of Ab the Temple was destroyed, as was the Temple by Titus in AD 70. Jeremiah records captivities in the 7th year (52:28), in the 18th year (52:29), and in the 23rd year of Nebuchadrezzar (52:30). Wiseman and Albright prefer 587; Thiele and others, 586. 16, 17 Cf. Je. 52:20–23. There is no reference to the bronze bulls (cf. 2 Ki. 16:17). 18–21 The men who had been responsible for the revolt were put to death by Nebuchadrezzar at Riblah.

25:22–26 Gedaliah is made governor of the land of Judah. According to Josephus (Ant. x.9.1f.), Gedaliah was gentle and generous, but put his trust in men who were unworthy of it—which ultimately led to his assassination. 23 In the open country: cf. Je. 40:7; these words are not in the Hebrew text. Mizpah, the seat of local government now that Jerusalem has been wiped out (cf. 1 Ki. 15:22), identified with Tell en-Nasbeh, about 9 miles N of Jerusalem, one of the few undisturbed sites at this time, according to archaeological discovery. It is interesting to note that Gedaliah's father supported Jeremiah's position against the pro-Egyptian party (Je. 26:24). A clay stamp seal found at Lachish from this period has the reading 'belonging to Gedaliah who is over the house', almost certainly this Gedaliah. Ishmael: nothing further is known about him. Seraiah, the grandson of Hilkiah the priest (1 Ch. 5:39, 40, MT). 25 It seems that Gedaliah and all those representing Babylonian authority were assassinated, and 26 the assassins and those who supported them fled to Egypt. Egypt: there was a considerable settlement of Jews in the Delta (cf. Is. 19:18, 19 and Josephus, Ant. xiii.3.1). Somewhat later we find Jews settled at Elephantine in Upper Egypt.

25:27–30 Jehoiachin is freed from prison. 27 The chronology is still counted with reference to Jehoiachin and this is synchronized with the year that Evil-merodach became king of Babylon. The new king, whose name should be pointed to read 'Amēl-Marduk', reigned from 562 to 560 BC. Graciously freed: Heb. 'lifted up the head' (cf. Gn. 40:13). 29 Dined regularly at the king's table: cf. 2 Sa. 9:7; 19:33; 1 Ki. 2:7. Cuneiform tablets from the period 594–569 BC refer to provisions supplied to Jehoiachin (in Babylonian Yaukin) together with his five sons. It is obvious from the date of these tablets that Nebuchadrezzar had treated Jehoiachin with the respect due to a king, and the action of Amēl-Marduk was the liberalizing of that policy. The Jews in Babylonia reckoned the years by those of Jehoiachin's captivity (cf. Ezk. 1:2), an indication of their faith that the Davidic covenant was still in effect and the line of David was still in Yahweh's care.

1 and 2 Chronicles

INTRODUCTION

ITS POSITION IN THE CANON

The English versions follow the LXX and Vulg. in placing Chronicles immediately after Kings, but in the Hebrew Bible Chronicles is the last book of the OT. It will have occupied that position as early as the time of Christ (see on 2 Ch. 24:20f.). In Hebrew it is one book (though the printed Hebrew Bibles have followed the Christian tradition); the division into two goes back to the LXX.

TITLE AND DATE

Our name, Chronicles, is derived from a suggestion by Jerome. It is a fair rendering of the Hebrew title dibrê hayyāmîm, i.e. 'The events of days' or 'Annals'; but it does not fairly express the nature or purpose of Chronicles. (See below under 'Purpose'.) The name used in Roman Catholic translations, Paralipomena, goes back to LXX via Vulg. It means 'things omitted' (from Kings), not a very suitable name.

An obvious terminus a quo for the date is given by 2 Ch. 36:22, i.e. 537 BC. The evidence, however, seems conclusive that Chronicles and Ezra-Nehemiah were originally one book. This would bring the date down to after 430 BC. The list of the descendants of Zerubbabel (1 Ch. 3:19–24) to the sixth generation suggests a date not earlier than 400–340 BC (but see note on this passage). Ne. 12:10f., 22f. brings the list of high priests down to Jaddua, who lived about 332 BC. Rudolph (Esra und Nehemia, 1949) maintains, as is intrinsically quite possible, that these are later scribal additions, and dates the book shortly after 400 BC. Albright (JBL, 1921, pp. 104–124) from other premises reaches a similar date. In any case dates later than 300 BC may be ruled out as improbable. The weakness of the arguments for a late date may be judged from Pfeiffer, Introduction to the Old Testament, pp. 811f.

AUTHOR

The facts just given make it very difficult to accept the Jewish ascription of authorship to Ezra, as does also the fragmentary description of Ezra's activity. But it seems that the tradition has been misunderstood, and that it is only the genealogies (1 Ch. 1–9) that are attributed to him (see Jewish Enc., in loc.). If so, Delitzsch's view that Ezra was the compiler of much of the material used by the Chronicler may well be right, or even Welch's (Schweich Lectures, 1939) that the bulk of the book is pre-exilic. In either case the Chronicler will remain unknown to us by name.

PURPOSE

A chronicle differs from a history in that it is a record of passing events without any clear principle of selection in what is included and what omitted. The 'Chronicler' is obviously writing history, for there is a very clear principle both in his additions to Samuel and Kings and in his omissions. His additions concern mainly the Temple and its services and such incidents as exalted the religious side of the state in contrast to the civil. Obviously he is concerned mainly with Israel as a religious community. His omissions show that he is concerned with the development of two divine institutions, the Temple and the Davidic line of kings. Hence only the death of Saul is mentioned; his reign, David's sin, Absalom's rebellion, Adonijah's attempted usurpation are all omitted. The history of the northern kingdom, which was in rebellion against both of God's institutions, is mentioned only where it touches the fortunes of Judah.

That is why Chronicles is said to represent the priestly standpoint; it is concerned with the working out of what God has ordained and not, as Samuel and Kings, with the prophetic standpoint of how God dealt with His people and so revealed Himself.

The reasons for the writing of Chronicles are not far to seek. The post-exilic community had to understand how it had come into existence, that it was a true continuation of the pre-exilic kingdom (hence the genealogies), and what was the role of God's gift, the Temple and its services, that had been entrusted to them. The omission of so many familiar scenes from Samuel and Kings underlined that, though those that had returned from exile were few in number, God had always been eliminating from the history of His people that which was in rebellion against Him.

In an age when there is an ever-growing tendency to abandon the old revelation of God in the Scriptures, Chronicles has its lesson of encouragement and warning for us.

SOURCES

It is clear that the main source of Chronicles is Samuel and Kings. In addition reference is made to a number of other sources, twenty in all, e.g. 1 Ch. 5:17; 9:1; 23:27; 27:24; 29:29; 2 Ch. 9:29; 12:15; 13:22; 24:27; 26:22; 27:7; 33:19; 35:25, et alia. While there is no need to doubt that these sources existed (for their interpretation see ICC), it does not follow that the Chronicler must have made direct use of them, for he may have been using one or more works based on them.

It is improbable, though not impossible, that all these sources should have survived the Exile. He normally follows Samuel and Kings very closely, though he is prepared to make alterations at times; there is no reason for supposing that he has not followed his other sources equally closely, though there is evidence that he felt free to recast their language.

HISTORICAL VALUE

It is clear that Chronicles read by itself would give an unbalanced view of Israelite history; but it is equally clear that its author presupposed a knowledge of Samuel and Kings on the part of his readers so that criticism on this ground has no validity. More difficult is the large number of discrepancies between Chronicles and Samuel and Kings, some real, some imaginary. This is probably the reason why, in the Talmud, we find its historical accuracy queried, though not its canonicity.

In modern times the truth of all sections not found in Samuel and Kings has been queried (they have even been regarded as inventions of the Chronicler). But in the few cases where archaeology can pass an opinion it has tended to be favourable, and today the criticisms of scholars are normally much more cautious. There is no reason to doubt the essential accuracy of the Chronicler and his sources. Some of the discrepancies may be due to textual corruption in his sources, and in places the text of Chronicles has been poorly transmitted.

One of the main problems in Chronicles is bound up with the numbers contained in it. Many are impossibly large, some disagree with Samuel and Kings, others are incompatible with the discoveries of archaeology. Yet there are other numbers that will not make sense of the usual suggestion that we are dealing with plain exaggeration, e.g. the 300 chariots in 2 Ch. 14:9 contrasted with the million footmen. The most obvious solution is that we are dealing with textual corruption either in the sources or in the transmission of Chronicles. A study of the variants in the genealogies will show how much of this there has been. There is, however, another aspect to be considered. Numbers from a thousand upwards were used not merely as round figures, but also hyperbolically (cf. HDB, III, p. 564; ISBE, p. 2159). So in a number of cases mentioned in the commentary probably only a large, or very large, number is meant. There is a discussion of the large numbers in the OT by R. E. D. Clark in JTVI, Vol. 87, 1955, pp. 82ff. and by J. W. Wenham in Tyndale Bulletin, No. 18, 1967, pp. 19ff. In this difficult area of biblical interpretation all conclusions are, of course, necessarily tentative.

For the chronology of the period covered by 1 and 2 Chronicles see Introduction to 1 and 2 Kings.

COMMENTARY

1:1 - 9:44 GENEALOGIES

The purpose of the genealogies is one with the main purpose of Chronicles. It is plain that the Davidic line and the descendants of Levi are the chief interest (note the pointed omission of the house of Eli, which did not serve the Jerusalem Temple in a high-priestly capacity; cf. 1 Ch. 24:3). Next in importance are the two tribes especially connected with the monarchy, Judah and Benjamin. The passing mention of so many in the genealogies shows that their later omission is deliberate; they were not serving God's purposes. On the other hand the mention of many of no importance is the guarantee that none of God's people are forgotten.

Many of the names are taken from other canonical books; the sources of the others are generally not given, but the fragmentary nature of many of them is the best evidence that the Chronicler had portions of old records before him. In many cases, as elsewhere in Chronicles, there are variants in spelling compared with the same names in other canonical books. An * is placed against the form usually considered correct; where no * occurs we cannot be sure which is the original form. It will be seen that generally, but not always, it is the form in Chronicles that is inferior. For this the copiers of Chronicles are often responsible, not the author.

1:1 - 2:2 Genealogies from Genesis

The extremely condensed form of much of this section shows that a knowledge of Genesis was assumed.

1:1–4 The antediluvian patriarchs. See Gn. 5:3–32. Note the omission of the line of Cain in full conformity with the principles of Chronicles.

1:5–23 The genealogy of the nations. See Gn. 10:2–29. 6 Diphath; 'Riphath' (Gn. 10:3). 7 Rodanim; 'Dodanim' (Gn. 10:4). 17 Note that Uz, etc. were the sons of Aram. Meshech; *'Mash' (Gn. 10:23). 22 Ebal; 'Obal' (Gn. 10:28).

1:24–27 The descent of Abraham. See Gn. 11:10–26.

1:28–33 The descendants of Abraham through Ishmael and Keturah. See Gn. 25:12–16 and 1–4.

1:34 The descendants of Abraham through Sarah. Note that the Chronicler always uses Israel, not Jacob, consistently with his general outlook.

1:35–54 The descendants of Esau. See Gn. 36:10–14, 20–43. 36 Zephi; 'Zepho' (Gn. 36:11). In Gn. 36:12 Timna is the concubine of Eliphaz and the mother of Amalek. 39 Homam; 'Hemam' (Gn. 36:22). 40 Alian; 'Alvan' (Gn. 36:23). Shephi; 'Shepho' (Gn. 36:23). 41 Hamran; 'Hemdan' (Gn. 36:26). 42 Jaakan*; 'Akan' (Gn. 36:27). 50 Hadad*; 'Hadar' (Gn. 36:39). Pai; 'Pau' (Gn. 36:39). 51 Aliah; *'Alvah' (Gn. 36:40).

2:1, 2 The sons of Israel. See Gn. 35:22–26. The only explanation for the unusual position of Dan is that it was dropped by a scribe, placed in the margin and entered the text in its present position.

2:3 - 4:23 Genealogies of Judah

It seems impossible now to unravel these genealogies with any certainty; the difficulties are due in part to the incomplete and sometimes even fragmentary nature of the genealogies and in part to the possible duplication of names. Textual corruptions and the fact that we are sometimes dealing with names of places rather than of persons further complicate matters.

2:3–9 Some descendants of Judah. 3 Some descendants of Shelah will be found in 1 Ch. 4:21; 9:5; Ne. 11:5. They are not dealt with here because the Chronicler wishes to reach the royal house as soon as possible. Bath-shua, i.e. the daughter of Shua. Cf. Gn. 38:2. 5 Hezron and Hamul. See Gn. 46:12. The list of Hezron's descendants commences in v. 9. It must not be assumed that Hamul was childless. Cf. Nu. 26:21. 6 Zimri; *'Zabdi' (Jos. 7:1). It is quite probable that Ethan, Heman, Calcol and Dara are to be identified with the Ethan the Ezrahite (i.e. descendant of Zerah), Heman, Calcol and Darda of 1 Ki. 4:31, in which case Mahol will be an intermediate link between them and Zerah. 7 Carmi was son of Zabdi (Zimri). Achar; 'Achan' (Jos. 7:1). The form in Chronicles is probably deliberate (cf. Jos. 7:26). Achan was Carmi's grandson; this and the failure to mention the link between Carmi and Zimri presuppose a knowledge of Joshua in the reader. 8 RSV is not justified in changing 'the sons of Ethan' to Ethan's son; the remainder have been omitted for the sake of brevity.

9 The interpretation of the genealogies of Judah as a whole will depend in large measure on the interpretation of this verse. Chelubai, i.e. *Caleb (cf. v. 18; there is no justification for the spelling ch), is identified by most scholars with Caleb the Kenezite (see 1 Ch. 4:15; Jos. 14:6), a non-Israelite incorporated into the tribe of Judah (Nu. 13:6). To do so is automatically to deny the authenticity of a considerable portion of these genealogies and to make a considerable part of Judah non-Israelite. It is much easier to assume two individuals, this Caleb antedating the hero of the conquest by several centuries. The mention of Achsah (v. 49; cf. Jos. 15:17; Jdg. 1:13) does not necessarily invalidate this view. The later Caleb's daughter must have been born after his incorporation into the tribe of Judah, and he may well have chosen the name deliberately. Jerahmeel. His descendants are mentioned in 1 Sa. 27:10; 30:29. They are usually taken to be a non-Israelite clan that later coalesced with Judah. This would again destroy the historicity of the genealogy. It is much simpler to suppose that the descendants of Jerahmeel, who in any case were settled in the south of Judea, retained their nomadic habits longer, and so in the days of David were reckoned separately from the rest of Judah.

2:10–17 The ancestry of David. See Ru. 4:18–22. 11 Salma. So Ru. 4:20 (Heb.); 'Salmon' in Ru. 4:21; Mt. 1:5. Jesse had eight sons (1 Sa. 16:10, 11); only seven are mentioned here. 1 Ch. 27:18 mentions a son Elihu, but this is almost certainly a variant of Eliab. The missing son probably died young. 16 Abigail. According to 2 Sa. 17:25 she was the daughter of Nahash, in which case she was David's half-sister, or stepsister. 17 Jether the Ishmaelite*; 'Ithra the Israelite' (2 Sa. 17:25, Heb.).

2:18–24 The descendants of Caleb. See also on 2:42–55. 18 The context does not suggest that Caleb had two wives. Either Jerioth was another name of Azubah, or there is a textual corruption. Rudolph is probably correct with the emendation 'And Caleb the son of Hezron begat by his wife Azubah Jerioth, and her sons were . . .', Jerioth being a daughter. 20 Bezalel; see Ex. 31:2. 21 Afterward Hezron, i.e. after v. 9. 23 But Geshur and Aram . . . The time of the loss of these cities is nowhere indicated, but it was probably before the reign of Ahab. 24 RSV rightly follows LXX and Vulg. This was probably before the Mosaic lawgiving, which forbade such a marriage.

2:25–41 The descendants of Jerahmeel. Nothing is known of any of those mentioned here. 31 There is an apparent contradiction with v. 34. Ahlai may be a grandson by some daughter other than that mentioned in v. 34.

2:42–55 Further descendants of Caleb. See also on 2:18–24. This is probably a supplementary genealogy to that in 2:18–24. There are few points of contact between them. 42 RSV is probably incorrect in following LXX with Mareshah his firstborn. Rudolph is probably correct in rendering 'Mesha his first-born, who was the father of Ziph, and his second son Mareshah, the father of Hebron'. It should be noticed that a number of names in these verses are names of towns. It is not always possible to interpret these remarks with certainty. Sometimes it means that a man had given his name to a town. E.g., 50 in a case like Shobal the father of Kiriath-jearim it is clear that Shobal had founded or refounded Kiriath-jearim, not that he had a son of that name. 55 is a statement that the Rechabites were originally a Kenite family (cf. 2 Ki. 10:15; Je. 35) who were incorporated into Judah.

3:1–9 The sons of David. With the list of David's sons cf. 2 Sa. 3:2–5; 5:14–16. 1 Daniel; 'Chileab' (2 Sa. 3:3) = 'all the father', obviously a pet name. 5 Shimea; *'Shammua' (1 Ch. 14:4; 2 Sa. 5:14). Bath-shua; *'Bathsheba' (in 2 Samuel and 1 Kings). Her father's name Ammiel is possibly only a variant of 'Eliam' (2 Sa. 11:3). Are we to understand that Shammua (Shimea), Shobab, Nathan were also her sons? If so Solomon stands last as the most important. It is more probable that the three younger are not named. 6 Elishama, Eliphelet; *'Elishua, Elpelet' (1 Ch. 14:5; cf. 2 Sa. 5:15). In both these cases the second rendering is obviously the correct one, otherwise there would be two pairs of brothers with the same name. See v. 8. 8 Eliada. So 2 Sa. 5:15; *'Beeliada' in 1 Ch. 14:7. See on 1 Ch. 8:33.

3:10–16 From Solomon to the captivity. 10 Abijah; so elsewhere in Chronicles; in 1 Kings 'Abijam'. 12 Azariah; so generally in 2 Kings; but elsewhere in Chronicles, in 2 Ki. 15:13, 32, 34, and the prophets, 'Uzziah'. 15 Johanan, not otherwise known. 16 Zedekiah his son. This is not the Zedekiah who was Jeconiah's uncle (mentioned already in v. 15), who followed him on the throne.

3:17–24 The house of David from the captivity. It should be noted that neither of the NT genealogies of our Lord makes any use of these names, except 17 Shealtiel and 19 Zerubbabel. According to Ezr. 3:2; Hg. 1:1; Mt. 1:12; Lk. 3:27 Zerubbabel was the son, which may mean grandson, of Shealtiel. The natural inference of vv. 17–19 is that he was his nephew. An old Jewish explanation interprets v. 18 as listing the sons of Shealtiel. Another explanation would be that he was grandson of both Shealtiel and Pedaiah. 18 Shenazzar, quite likely the Sheshbazzar of Ezr. 1:8, where see note.

This section, so important for the dating of Chronicles, cannot be interpreted with any certainty. The difficulty is the connection between the two halves of v. 21. The usual interpretation is that vv. 21b–24 mention various other branches of the Davidic house, whose connection with Zerubbabel is unspecified, and of only one of which have we further details. On the basis of this Young (Introduction to the Old Testament, 1953) argues that we have only two generations from Zerubbabel given us, and therefore there is no obstacle to Ezra's authorship. There is weight in the argument, but it cannot be accepted as it stands, for, even if Shecaniah was not a contemporary of Hananiah, he can hardly be from an earlier generation than that of Zerubbabel, and we have four generations reckoned from him. Also we cannot reject out of hand the reading of the LXX, Vulg. and Syr.: 'And the son of Hananiah was Pelatiah and Jeshiah his son, and Arnan his son, and Obadiah his son, and Shechaniah his son.' If this reading is correct, we have eleven generations from Zerubbabel.

4:1–23 Fragmentary genealogies of Judah. This chapter is a collection of fragments which have little or no connection one with another or with the lists in ch. 2. 1 Carmi. A comparison with 2:9, 19, 50 will show that it should be Caleb. 9, 10 Jabez (lit. 'he giveth pain') has special attention given him because his faith was triumphant over his name, which was regarded as possessing almost magic power. 13 Othniel and 15 Caleb. These verses must be interpreted in the light of Jos. 15:17. They confirm the impression created by Jos. 14:6 that Caleb was a non-Israelite adopted into the tribe of Judah, for his genealogy does not link up anywhere. 21 The sons of Shelah; see on 2:3. 22 And returned to Lehem, i.e. Beth-lehem. Though unconnected with it, it is an interesting reminder of Ruth. We have no indication how Joash and Saraph came to occupy positions of high authority (ruled is too strong) in Moab. 23 Potters. Archaeology has shown that the potter's craft was hereditary.

4:24 – 5:26 Genealogies of Simeon, Reuben, Gad and Manasseh

4:24–43 The descendants of Simeon. 24 Cf. Gn. 46:10; Ex. 6:15; Nu. 26:12–14. There are a number of minor variations in the form of the names and it is difficult to determine which are correct. 28–33 Cf. Jos. 19:2–8. 31 Until David reigned. This points out that at this time one town (Ziklag, 1 Sa. 27:6), and possibly more, became the possession of Judah. 39–43 describe some of the conquests of Simeon and clearly show that the division into ten tribes and one in the time of Rehoboam (1 Ki. 11:30) must not be interpreted too literally. Simeon neither separated from nor lost his identity in Judah. 39 Gedor. Site unknown; perhaps we should read 'Gerar' with LXX. 43 And they destroyed the remnant of the Amalekites. In the light of 1 Sa. 14:48; 15:3; 2 Sa. 8:12 some time in the reign of David or Solomon is probably meant. We know nothing further of this Simeonite kingdom in Mt. Seir, though Is. 21:11, 12 may refer to it. To this day refers presumably to the time when this source of Chronicles was written.

5:1–10 The descendants of Reuben. 3 Cf. Gn. 46:8, 9; Ex. 6:14; Nu. 26:5–9. Chronicles does not give all the names mentioned in Numbers, nor does it indicate how 4 Joel is to be linked with Reuben. 6 Tilgath-pilneser; *'Tiglath-pileser' (2 Ki. 15:29). 9 He also dwelt to the east. Part of the reason for this expansion into the steppe country E of Gilead seems to have been Moabite pressure on their original territory. 10 Hagrites; AV 'Hagarites' suggests a connection with Hagar which may not be justified. It is quite likely that this war is the same as that mentioned in vv. 18–22.

5:11–17 The descendants of Gad. There is no obvious reason why the details in Nu. 26:15–18 have been omitted. 17 Jeroboam king of Israel. Obviously Jeroboam II; see 2 Ki. 14:23.

5:18–22 The war with the Hagrites. See on v. 10. This section, together with 4:34–43, should warn us against assuming that the Bible history is necessarily complete. There may be many other gaps in Samuel and Kings which Chronicles has not filled. This was a major victory leading to an important addition of territory.

5:23–26 The descendants of Manasseh (eastern half-tribe). Earlier details are omitted to avoid overlapping with 7:14–19. 25, 26 Cf. 2 Ki. 15:29 and note that this captivity of the Transjordan tribes is not mentioned in 2 Chronicles. 26 Pul and Tilgath-pilneser (see on v. 6) are the same man, Pul being his personal name which he retained as king of Babylon and Tiglath-pileser his throne-name as king of Assyria (see DOTT, pp. 57, 83). See on 2 Ki. 15:19.

6:1–81 Genealogies of Levi

It should be borne in mind that the information of this chapter is repeated and extended in 1 Ch. 23–26.

6:1–15 The high-priestly line Cf. also vv. 49–53. The list is obviously incomplete; not only does it deliberately omit the names of the Shilonite high priests, the house of Eli, but also Jehoiada (2 Ch. 22:11), Urijah (2 Ki. 16:11) and Azariah (2 Ch. 26:20). The motive for the omissions is unknown.

6:16–48 The Levitical genealogies. First we have three genealogical trees beginning at vv. 20, 22 and 29 respectively. Then we have the genealogies of Heman (33–38), Asaph (39–43) and Ethan (44–47) in reverse. That of Heman is the same as that beginning in v. 22, and that of Asaph may perhaps be linked with that in v. 20; no plausible connection can be made between the other two. A comparison of vv. 22–28 with vv. 33–38 will reveal big variants. 16, 20, 43 Gershom; 'Gershon' in 6:1 (AV) and always in the Pentateuch. 28 Samuel. Cf. v. 33. This is the prophet Samuel. Cf. 1 Sa. 1:1; 8:2. It shows that the description 'Ephrathite' (AV) in 1 Sa. 1:1 must be interpreted in the same way as the phrase 'of the family of Judah' in Jdg. 17:7 (where see note), and that he was a Levite, though it could not be inferred from 1 Samuel (see on 1 Sa. 1:1). Were this invention, we could confidently expect him to have been linked with the Aaronic priesthood.

Advocates of the Merenptah and Rameses II dates of the Exodus, c. 1225 or c. 1290 (see Introduction to Exodus, p. 116 and to Judges, p. 252), point out that from Aaron to Zadok (3–8, 50–53), Korah to Heman (22–28, 33–37) and Mahli to Ethan (44–47) are in each case eleven names, and from Shimei to Asaph (39–42) are twelve. They argue that this cannot be a coincidence and that this number of generations comfortably spans two centuries, but could hardly span the four centuries demanded by the 15th-century date for the Exodus. The argument must be treated with respect, for it shows that, if the genealogies have been shortened, there must have been some principle at work in the choice of the number to be mentioned. On the other hand it must not be overlooked that the argument demands a shortening of the list in vv. 33–35, and ignores the lists beginning with vv. 20 and 29, as well as the direct line of Korah to Shaul (v. 24). These are all too short, and if they have had names omitted we can have no certainty that this has not been done with the others.

6:49–53 The descendants of Aaron. Cf. vv. 4–8 and see on 6:1–15.

6:54–81 The Levitical cities. For this section see Jos. 21:1–42. Chronicles shows some rearrangement and abridgement. There are numerous variations in the names, due mostly to copyists' carelessness. 61 The text is corrupt. For the meaning see Jos. 21:5.

7:1–40 Genealogies of Issachar, Zebulun (?), Dan (?), Naphtali, Manasseh, Ephraim and Asher

7:1–5 The descendants of Issachar. 1 Cf. Gn. 46:13; Nu. 26:23–25. Puah; 'Puvah' in Genesis and Numbers. Jashub.* So in Nu. 26:24, but 'Iob' in Gn. 46:13.

7:6–11 The descendants of Zebulun (?). If these verses are taken as a genealogy of Benjamin, it seems impossible to reconcile them with ch. 8, nor is it possible to explain why two genealogies should be given. No genealogy of Zebulun is given, and since this is the place where it might be expected from the geographical point of view, it is very widely, and possibly correctly, held that we have here a genealogy of Zebulun obscured by scribal errors, but Rudolph does not agree. See ICC or Cam. Bible for details.

7:12 The descendants of Dan (?). In precisely the same way as in the preceding verses a genealogy of Dan is generally found here, and with more probability, but if so the text has been seriously mutilated; for details see above.

7:13 The descendants of Naphtali. See Gn. 46:24f.; Nu. 26:48f.

7:14–19 The descendants of Manasseh. Cf. 1 Ch. 5:23f. The information is fragmentary and not easy to interpret. A number of the names in Nu. 26:28–34 are not reproduced. 15 Zelophehad. See Nu. 26:33; 27:1–11. 16 Maachah the wife of Machir. In v. 15 she seems to be his sister, but there are signs of textual mutilation here.

7:20–27 The descendants of Ephraim. For the first four names in the list see Nu. 26:35–37, although the spelling varies. Of the remainder it seems impossible to say whether they were sons or descendants of Ephraim—the non-mention in Nu. 26 is inconclusive (cf. Beriah in v. 23). So we cannot say whether 21 Ezer and Elead are his sons. 22 Their father is inconclusive, as the word is used loosely in Hebrew of any ancestor. The cattle-lifting raid (v. 21) must have been made from Egypt. 24 presents problems that cannot be answered. Not only have we no other information about Uzzen-sheerah, but its site has never been identified. The whole verse suggests connections of the Israelites with Canaan during their sojourn in Egypt (so also v. 21), which have left no trace in the Pentateuch, but which may point the way towards a solution of some of the problems connected with the conquest. 25–27 Joshua's genealogy is given. Until Ammihud the names are unknown from the Pentateuch. It is worth noting that there are more names in it than in any comparable genealogy. The refusal to give more details about the Joseph tribes must be deliberate and links up with the consistent ignoring of the northern kingdom throughout the book as a rebel against the God-appointed Davidic kingship and Aaronic priesthood.

7:28, 29 The territory of the sons of Joseph. Not a complete list of towns, but an indication of the borders by the mention of the main border towns. Such a mention, unique in the genealogical lists, for there is no real comparison with the mention of the Levitical cities (6:54–81), is probably intended to indicate that all later attempts of the Joseph tribes to obtain wider rule, e.g. Abimelech (Jdg. 9), the Ephraimite attack on Jephthah (Jdg. 12), and Jeroboam the son of Nebat (1 Ki. 11:26) were usurpation.

7:30–40 The descendants of Asher. 30, 31 Cf. Gn. 46:17; Nu. 26:44–46. The only new name is Birzaith, which is generally taken to be the name of a town. 32–39 The names are all otherwise unknown. 34 Shemer and 35 Helem are almost certainly the same as 32 Shomer and Hotham; probably Shemer and Hotham are the correct forms. 39 Ulla is probably miswritten for one of the names in the previous verse. 40 The figure given links neither with the census figures in Numbers nor yet with 1 Ch. 12:36. With our fragmentary knowledge we cannot fix the period to which the number refers.

8:1–40; 9:35–44 Genealogies of Benjamin

The very full details about Benjamin as contrasted with most of the other tribes should not be put down to the availability of greater information, but should be regarded as a tribute to Benjamin's loyalty to the Davidic line. The parallel list in 7:6–12 has been regarded as a corrupted genealogy of Zebulun and Dan; see comments in loc. In any case it cannot be harmonized with this chapter.

8:1–5 The immediate descendants of Benjamin. Cf. Gn. 46:21; Nu. 26:38–40. The divergences between these three passages are very great, and no convincing harmonization has been offered. 1 Bela his first-born*; 'Bela' and 'Becher' (Gn. 46:21). Nu. 26:38 omits 'Becher'. In Hebrew 'Becher' and 'firstborn' have the same consonants. 3 Abihud. Otherwise unmentioned; in the light of v. 6 it is probably to be read '(Gera) the father of Ehud'; cf. v. 6.

8:6–28 The descendants of Ehud. This is probably the best way to treat these verses. For Ehud cf. Jdg. 3:15, although the identification is not certain. 6–8 are as obscure in Hebrew as in English and serious textual corruption probably exists. Various attempts at emendation have been made but they are probably of little serious value. All the names in this section are otherwise unknown to us. 8 No indication is given as to what took Shaharaim to Moab. 12 Who (i.e. Elpaal) built Ono and Lod. We are unable to date the incident. 13 Who put to flight . . . Again the incident cannot be dated. 28 These dwelt in Jerusalem. It is generally assumed that this is a reference to the post-exilic city and the inference is then drawn that the bulk of the names given are of post-exilic Benjaminites. This must be considered a most hazardous assumption, the more so as none of the names are found in 9:1–17 (cf. Ne. 11:1–19), which specifically deals with the post-exilic community in Jerusalem. As virtually the whole of Jerusalem lay within the tribal area of Benjamin, we may expect there to have been a large Benjaminite population in the period of the monarchy. Cf. v. 32.

8:29–40 The house of Saul. Cf. 9:35–44. These parallel passages are virtually identical, but where there are textual variations the latter is normally the better preserved. The RSV has in two obvious cases corrected one from the other, and as this is indicated in the margin attention is not here drawn to the fact. For other variations see AV mg., RV mg. 30 Baal. Read with 9:36 and LXX, 'Baal, Ner'. 31 Zecher. In 9:37 'Zechariah, and Mikloth'. 32 These also. Probably refers to Mikloth and Shimeah (or Shimeam), in which case the verse as a whole would refer to a Benjaminite settlement in Jerusalem after its capture by David (cf. v. 28).

33 Reference to 1 Sa. 9:1 will show that Chronicles omits a large section of Saul's genealogy, once again showing that the gaps in Chronicles are often deliberate. A comparison of 1 Sa. 9:1 with 1 Sa. 14:51 will show that Kish and Ner were brothers. Hence scholars may be correct in proposing here: 'And Ner begat Abner; and Kish begat Saul', though there is no support from MSS or versions. The Hebrew seems incompatible with 1 Sa. 9:1, but this could be corrected to read 'Kish, the son of Ner, the son of Abiel'. Abinadab. So 1 Sa. 31:2, but omitted, probably by scribal accident, in 1 Sa. 14:49. AV mg., RV mg. are wrong in equating him with Ishvi. Esh-baal.* In 1 Sa. 14:49 'Ishvi' (RV); everywhere else Ishbosheth. As Ishbosheth means 'man of shame', it needs no argument to show that this could not have been his name. Baal is not a proper name but a title—'Master'. In the period of the judges and under Canaanite influence it was applied by many to Yahweh. The custom seems to have been prevalent in the family of Saul. Cf. 'Baal' (v. 30) and 'Meribbaal' (v. 34). Late scribes found the custom so abhorrent that they put in the place of Baal bosheth, 'shame' (so Ishbosheth, Mephibosheth for Merib-baal, Jerubbesheth for Jerubbaal), or El, 'God' (so Eliada, 2 Sa. 5:16; 1 Ch. 3:8, for Beeliada, 1 Ch. 14:7), or Jah (so Ishvi for Esh-baal). The various consonantal and especially vowel changes involved are only a matter of euphony. 34 Merib-baal. Though the English versions hide the fact, the second occurrence in 9:40 is spelt 'Meribaal'. Either spelling gives a good meaning in Hebrew. In 2 Samuel it is spelt 'Mephibosheth'; see above on v. 33.

39, 40 do not occur in the parallel passage, as all that was necessary there was to show that Saul's line continued. It is quite likely that we have his genealogy carried down to the Exile.

9:1–34 Post-exilic family heads resident in Jerusalem

9:1–16 The family heads. See Ne. 11:1–19, where a similar list is given. There are considerable variations, but only one outstanding case will be mentioned. Both Nehemiah and Chronicles show signs of copyists' carelessness. It should be noted that no effort is made to link the names of this chapter with the detailed genealogies of the preceding chapters. The former give the framework in which the history of the divine ordinances unrolls; the latter stress that the post-exilic community was a legitimate sequel of what had gone before.

1a seems rather to be a summary of the preceding chapters than an introduction to the section which follows. 1b The Book of the Kings of Israel. AV 'the book of the kings of Israel and Judah' follows LXX, Vulg., Targ. If we accept this, we must assume that 'and Judah' has dropped through haplography. 2 is almost incomprehensible as it stands. It can be best understood as a compression of Ne. 11:1, 3. First is probably to be taken in the sense of 'principal'. Israel has the meaning here of non-Levites. Temple servants (Heb. nethinim). Cf. Ezr. 2:43; Ne. 11:3. Probably non-Israelite Temple slaves descended from the Gibeonites. Cf. Jos. 9:27. 3 Ephraim, and Manasseh. Though no details are given they are probably specially mentioned as an answer to the Samaritan claim to be the true representatives of these tribes. 2 Ch. 11:16; 15:9; 30:11, 18; 34:9 stress that a considerable number of northerners had joined Judah at various times. 5 Shilonites; i.e. Shelanites (Nu. 26:20), descendants of Shelah. Cf. 1 Ch. 2:3; 4:21. 11 The chief officer of the house of God. The meaning is not clear. It probably does not mean high priest, unless it refers to Ahitub. Cf. 2 Ch. 35:8. 14 Merari*; 'Bunni' (Ne. 11:15).

9:17–34 The gate-keepers and their duties. There are a number of difficulties here, due probably to over-compression of the original record. The organization of the gate-keepers is dealt with also in 1 Ch. 26:1–19. The reason for the section here is not so much any special importance of the names mentioned as a stress that the post-exilic community was primarily a religious community.

17 Gatekeepers. Many think that a contrast with v. 14 is intended by the Chronicler and that the gate-keepers were not Levites. This is improbable; cf. ch. 26 and see on 9:26. 18b–21 stress the importance of the gate-keepers. They exercised their office already in the wilderness. Just as they had guarded the tent erected by David, so they had the Tabernacle. Hitherto; i.e. up to the time of the Chronicler; no change is implied. 20 The Lord was with him. Render 'May the Lord be with him!' Such phrases were very common in post-exilic Judaism when speaking of the illustrious dead. 21 The tent of meeting. Not, as the context would suggest, the Tabernacle, but the tent that housed the ark in David's time. Zechariah. Cf. 26:2, 14. 22 David and Samuel the seer. The simple explanation would seem to be that, while the institution of gate-keeper went back to the time of Moses (v. 19), the ornate Temple to be built by Solomon demanded a great development of the service. The same was true of the Levitical singers. It is not clear what Samuel's role was; it is, however, reasonable to suppose that he may have prepared David from time to time for his coming responsibilities as king, or even have left written advice. Otherwise David's initiative in this sphere of organization is not easy to understand. 24–26 The general setting supports Rudolph's emendation: 'The four head gatekeepers were entrusted with the gates on the four sides . . . for the four chief gatekeepers were on duty continually. They were Levites.' The most natural interpretation of the last clause is that the lower order of gate-keepers were not Levites, but the general tenor of the passage does not suggest this, nor was this the case in NT times. It seems safer to assume that compression has led to lack of clarity.

28 Some of them. This could refer to the gate-keepers, but since the verses that follow cannot possibly do so, it is better to assume that here we have the beginning of a very compressed outline of some of the principal servile duties of the Levites and even priests (v. 30). 33, 34 read like the heading or conclusion of lists that have been omitted.

9:35–44 The genealogy of the house of Saul

See above, on 8:29–40. From one point of view it might have been better to detach these verses from the genealogies and to have counted them as the beginning of the Book of David. They serve to link the story with the past as recorded in 1 Samuel.

10:1 - 29:30 THE REIGN OF DAVID

10:1–14 The death of Saul

See commentary on 1 Sa. 31:1–13. Apart from vv. 13 and 14, which give the reasons for Saul's fate, the two passages are virtually identical, the differences calling for no comment. In this, the sole longer reference to Saul's life, we learn something of the Chronicler's interpretation of history. As Saul had been appointed king by God, he could not be passed over in silence; but as he had later been rejected, an account of his death—the final proof of his rejection—was sufficient. David had been God's king from the time of his anointing by Samuel; the period of his rejection by men, however, is passed over in silence as being contrary to the will of God. But see on 12:1–22. The Chronicler is silent regarding the short reign of Esh-baal (Ishbosheth) for the same reason.

11:1 - 12:40 David is made king

The Chronicler normally follows the order of Samuel, but his omissions make the by no means clear chronology of the earlier book still more obscure. For information on these points see the relevant comments on 2 Samuel.

11:1–9 David, anointed king, captures Jerusalem. See 2 Sa. 5:1–10. 4 That is Jebus. Cf. Jdg. 19:10. The name Jerusalem in the form 'Urusalim' is as old as the Amarna tablets, c. 1390 BC, and a similar form is found in the Egyptian Execration Texts from the 19th and 18th centuries. Cf. Gn. 14:18. But the Jebusites, whose centre the city was, may well have used the name Jebus. 6 Joab . . . became chief. This information is peculiar to Chronicles and is in no contradiction with 2 Sa. 2:13. The commander-in-chief of the king of Judah would not automatically have become commander-in-chief of the king of all Israel. 8 Joab repaired the rest of the city. Again the information is peculiar to Chronicles, but the variants in some Heb. MSS, LXX and Syr. suggest that the text may be faulty.

11:10–47 David's mighty men. For vv. 10–41a see 2 Sa. 23:8–39. Owing to the natural link of this section with ch. 12, the list of David's mighty men has been put at the beginning of his reign; this must not be taken to imply that the incidents recounted took place before David became king. 10 is peculiar to Chronicles. Its meaning must not be pressed too far. The majority, but probably not all, of the mighty men were with David in exile. 12, 13 Clearly as a result of a scribal error several lines have dropped out between these verses. Cf. 2 Sa.

23:9b, 10. 41b–47 are a continuation of the list peculiar to Chronicles. The names do not occur elsewhere. We can hardly doubt that the author of Samuel deliberately ended the list with Uriah the Hittite in order to underline the heinousness of David's sin. 42 And thirty with him; in its setting obviously a scribal corruption. Moffatt may be correct in rendering 'captain of a Reubenite company of thirty'.

12:1–22 David's adherents in exile. This section is peculiar to Chronicles. With one possible exception the names are otherwise unknown. This is sufficient to show that the list is no mere invention by the Chronicler, who would surely have introduced the names of great men of the time, if he had composed it himself.

1–7 give a list of Benjaminites (v. 2) who supported David. They are mentioned first because their action was the more remarkable, when we consider that Saul belonged to their tribe. A comparison of v. 1 with vv. 8, 16 shows that they were not the first to join David in point of time. 4 Ishmaiah of Gibeon. His name is not in ch. 11. It may be that the list of mighty men is not complete as the Chronicler's additions (11:41b–47) suggest; or simply that Ishmaiah was worthy not merely to be a member of the thirty, but to be over them, or possibly a member of a third thirty. 6 The Korahites. Probably not Levites. Korah was a son of Kohath, and the Kohathite cities were not in Benjamin.

8 From the Gadites. The Spirit moves as it pleases Him; no indication is given of the motives that drove these men from across the Jordan to join David while he was still a fugitive in the wilderness of Judea. Their action was the more remarkable, as it exposed their relations to Saul's vengeance, which they would be powerless to hinder. The fact that they 'separated themselves unto David' (AV, RV) suggests that they could not even reckon on the sympathy of their fellow-tribesmen. At the stronghold. Cf. v. 16. Probably the cave of Adullam is meant, but it cannot be affirmed with certainty. 10 Jeremiah. Cf. v. 13. In Hebrew the names are spelt differently. 15 Cf. Jos. 3:15. The Jordan flows through a flood plain as much as 150 ft below the level of the main Jordan valley and from 200 yards to a mile wide. It is the ga'on ha-Yarden, the jungle or pride of Jordan (mistranslated in AV 'the swelling'). In spring it is filled from side to side with rapidly-flowing water. Not only did this handful of men cross this natural obstacle, but they routed those on both sides who, in the interests of Saul, tried to stop their march.

16 The men of Benjamin and Judah. Though those from Judah probably predominated, the Benjaminites are mentioned first for the reason mentioned under vv. 1–7. David's suspicion reflects exactly the conditions of 1 Sa. 23. 18 Then the Spirit came upon Amasai (lit. 'Then the Spirit clothed himself with Amasai'). So Jdg. 6:34; 2 Ch. 24:20. Amasai, who was chief of the thirty, is unknown from the list of the mighty men. Some conjecture that Abishai is meant; others Amasa. See 2 Sa. 17:25; 19:13.

19 Some of the men of Manasseh. For the background see 1 Sa. 29; 30. 20 David had to pass through the territory of Manasseh as he returned to Ziklag. The action of these Manassites was not as meritorious as that of the others already mentioned, for by this time Saul's fate was clear. 22 A great army. There was evidently a continual increase of David's strength during the time he was king in Hebron. Cf. 2 Sa. 3:1. Like an army of God refers to size, not quality; it is a common Hebrew idiom.

12:23–40 The forces that came to Hebron to make David king. This account, which is peculiar to Chronicles, gives every impression of having been derived from the old official account of David's recognition and coronation, which may well have been hardly legible in parts. Note that we are not given the size of the contingent from Issachar, and there is a diversity in the size of the contingents which is hard to explain if we assume the correct transmission of the numbers. 27 There is no reason to assume that Jehoiada was the father of Benaiah (11:22, etc., but see on 27:5); nor is it stated that he was high priest. 28 Presumably Zadok is David's high priest of the same name. 32 Men who had understanding of the times. Cf. 2 Sa. 20:14–22, especially v. 18. Abel of Beth-maachah was in Issachar.

This section represents 2 Sa. 6:11 – 7:29 with considerable additions of a religious nature. In order to enhance the importance of David's dealings with the ark, the Chronicler has presumably put the first attempt to bring it to Jerusalem out of its proper chronological position as shown in 2 Samuel.

13:1–14 The first attempt to bring the ark to Jerusalem. Except for vv. 1–4 see 2 Sa. 6 and comments there. 1 David consulted. The Chronicler is obviously making more of the occasion than the writer of Samuel, but the consultation described in vv. 1–4 is clearly implied by 2 Sa. 6:1. The ark was the symbol of the unity of the tribes of Israel based on a common worship of Yahweh. For it to be brought to Jerusalem meant that the city would be the religious as well as the political centre of Israel. David wanted popular and unanimous approval for this. 2 Our brethren who remain; i.e. those who had not come to the consultation. The cities that have pasture lands. Cf. Nu. 35:1–5.

5 So David assembled all Israel. In spite of appearances there is no contradiction between this and 2 Sa. 6:1. All Israel was present in its chosen representatives. Virtually all passages referring to the gathering of all Israel are to be interpreted thus. Shihor is in Is. 23:3; Je. 2:18 the Nile, but in Jos. 13:3 it is, as here, the Brook of Egypt, the Wadi el-Arish (Nu. 34:5; Jos. 15:4, etc.). The entrance of Hamath. This is in Hebrew Lebo-hamath, which today is generally identified with Lebweh, a town near the source i.e. the Kiriath-baal of Jos. 15:60, a Gibeonite city. The name was evidently changed to Kiriath-jearim to avoid the hated name of Baal. 9 Chidon*; 'Nacon' (2 Sa. 6:6).

14:1–17 Early events in David's reign. See 2 Sa. 5:11–25 and comments there. 4–7 See on 1 Ch. 3:5–8. 12 And they were burned. Chronicles deliberately avoids the possible ambiguity of 2 Sa. 5:21. For the burning cf. Dt. 7:5, 25. 16 Gibeon.* 2 Sa. 5:25 has 'Geba', but LXX has 'Gibeon'.

15:1–24 Preparations for the second attempt to bring up the ark. This section is peculiar to Chronicles. 2 Sa. 6:12 (1 Ch. 13:14) tells how David hears of the blessing on the house of Obed-edom. This shows him that Yahweh had no objection to the removal of the ark, and this leads him to the true reason for the death of Uzzah.

1 David built houses for himself. There is no contradiction between this and 13:14; 14:1 took place long before the first attempt to bring the ark to Jerusalem. A tent. Not the Tabernacle, which was in Gibeon (1 Ch. 16:39; 2 Ch. 1:3). We are not told how the Tabernacle came to be moved there—but note that Gibeon was a neighbour of the less important Kiriath-jearim—nor why it was not moved to Jerusalem as well. It may be that David already had the project of a Temple in his mind, and so it suited him to respect the inevitable protests of the Gibeonites. Equally it may have been disintegrating through old age. 2 No one but the Levites may carry the ark of God. The reason why a new cart was used in the first instance (1 Ch. 13:7) is quite clearly because God had tolerated that method for the return of the ark from the Philistine country (1 Sa. 6:7). They had not learnt that God's exceptions do not put aside the express revelation of His will. David now recognized the mistake.

4ff. It is very striking that the names of the Levites do not link up with the Levitical lists in chs. 23–26. Had these lists been a mere invention of the Chronicler, as is so often suggested, he would surely have tried to link them up for the sake of verisimilitude. 12 Sanctify yourselves. This refers to outward, ritual holiness. It involved washing (Ex. 19:10, 14), the avoidance of defilement (Lv. 11:44) and refraining from sexual intercourse (Ex. 19:15). It is not sufficient to be holy; there should be the outward appearance as well. 18 Their brethren of the second order. ICC and Cam. Bible propose 'their brethren twelve'. RSV rightly omits the scribal error 'Ben' found in AV, RV. 21 Azaziah is omitted in 16:5. Obed-edom. The name appears frequently in 1 Chronicles and it is not certain whether more than one individual is intended. It is simplest to assume that there was only one of this name. The ark was lodged in his house. It is usually assumed that 'Gittite' (1 Ch. 13:13) must mean from Gath; but it is incomprehensible that the ark should have been left with a Philistine, nor would he of the Orontes (see also on 1 Ki. 8:65). 6 Baalah; have been willing to take the risk on himself' In addition Gath (lit. 'winepress') appears in its dual form Gittaim as a place in the vicinity of Kiriath-jearim (2 Sa. 4:3; Ne. 11:33) as well as in a number of compound place-names. See on 2 Sa. 6:10, 11. Quite naturally, as the result of the divine favour, he was appointed one of the special guardians of the ark (v. 24). As he served well, he and his sons were appointed doorkeepers for the Temple to be built by Solomon. Cf. 1 Ch. 26:14, 15. On the day of the bringing up of the ark to Jerusalem Obed-edom and his companion Jeiel (v. 18) acted exceptionally as singers (v. 21), and so Berechiah and Elkanah were made temporary guardians of the ark (v. 23). This seems the simplest interpretation. ICC and Cam. Bible propose far-reaching textual reconstructions, which seem unnecessary. Obed-edom is a good example of the results of faithfully using unexpected opportunities of service. 20, 21 According to Alamoth . . . the Sheminith. Cf. the titles of Pss. 46; 6 and 12. 24 Jehiah. Probably the Jeiel of v. 18.

15:25 – 16:3 The ark brought to Jerusalem. See 2 Sa. 6:12–19. 26 Seven bulls and seven rams. This is the sacrifice of the elders and captains; David's sacrifice was an ox and a fatling (2 Sa. 6:13).

16:4–7 The ministry before the ark. The smaller number of names compared with the lists given in ch. 15 is accounted for by the ministry in the Tabernacle at Gibeon. See v. 39. 5 It is probable that the mention of Obed-edom and Jeiel and the second mention of Asaph are to be referred to a scribal error. See on 15:24 and cf. 16:38. See also on 15:21.

16:8–36 The psalm of praise. It should be noted that the RV, RSV do not state that David was responsible for this psalm. It is actually composed from three psalms: Ps. 105:1–15 (vv. 8–22); Ps. 96:1–13 (vv. 23–33); and Ps. 106:1, 47, 48 (vv. 34–36). For a commentary the relevant passages should be referred to. There are a number of minor variants, some deliberate, some accidental. In the latter case the text of Psalms gives the better reading.

None of the three psalms used is Davidic and all are later, possibly even post-exilic. Cf. v. 35; Ps. 106:47. The Chronicler evidently found no psalm in his authority and so put together a suitable piece. By drawing from the Psalms and choosing anonymous ones he did not imply Davidic or contemporary authorship. 36b is the doxology of Book IV of the Psalms but here it is a statement of fact, not a call to worship. It is the only doxology to take this form, so it has evidently been taken from Chronicles.

16:37–43 The service in Jerusalem and Gibeon. This section is really a continuation of vv. 4–7, beginning with a summary of them. 38 Obed-edom and his sixty-eight brethren. RSV follows LXX and Vulg. More probable is 'Obed-edom and Jehiah' (cf. 15:24), or possibly 'Obed-edom and Hosah', in each case with 'and their sixty-eight brethren'. 39 Zadok the priest. We are obviously to infer that Abiathar, the senior in age, was in Jerusalem with the ark. It may well be that Zadok already was the priest of the Gibeon sanctuary. The presence of the Tabernacle implied the ministry of a priest of the highest rank. 42 The sons of Jeduthun. Cf. v. 38. This seems to refer to the sons of Obed-edom.

17:1–27 David's wish to build a Temple; God's answer; David's thanksgiving. See on 2 Sa. 7:1–29. The variations are minor. 5 But I have gone from tent to tent . . . 2 Sa. 7:6 gives the correct reading: 'I have been moving about in a tent for my dwelling.' 6 Judges*; 'tribes' (2 Sa. 7:7). 17 And hast shown me future generations. See on 2 Sa. 7:19. It would seem that the text of both Samuel and Chronicles is faulty; there is no really satisfactory emendation.

18:1 – 20:8 David's wars

18:1–13 A summary of the wars. See 2 Sa. 8:1–14. 1 Gath and its villages. This is probably the correct interpretation of 2 Sa. 8:1. 4 A thousand chariots, seven thousand horsemen. The LXX of 2 Sa. 8:4 agrees with Chronicles. 8 Tibhath* and Cun; 'Betah' and 'Berothai' (2 Sa. 8:8). The sites of these towns are uncertain, but they are probably in the Anti-Lebanon. 9 Tou.* So also the LXX in 2 Sa. 8:9. 10 Hadoram; 'Joram' (2 Sa. 8:10). 12 The victory evidently involved a number of contingents acting to some extent individually, for in 2 Sa. 8:13 the credit is given to David, and in Ps. 60 (title) to Joab. In any case the subject in v. 13 must be David.

18:14–17 David's officers. See 2 Sa. 8:15–18. 16 Ahimelech the son of Abiathar. RSV has followed the LXX, Vulg., and 2 Sa. 8:17, regarding 'Abimelech' (AV) as a scribal error. See 1 Sa. 22:20; and on 1 Ch. 24:3. It is generally assumed that we should read both here and 2 Sa. 8:17 'Abiathar the son of Ahimelech', but Abiathar may already have been in semi-retirement through age, letting his son replace him. Shavsha*; 'Shisha' (1 Ki. 4:3), 'Seraiah' (2 Sa. 8:17), 'Sheva' (2 Sa. 20:25). The variants in spelling are probably due to his having been a foreigner; cf. 'Uriah the Hittite', 'Ittai the Gittite'. 17 David's sons were the chief officials. . . . A deliberate, but correct, alteration of 2 Sa. 8:18, 'were priests'. By the time of the Chronicler the term 'priest' had become too technical to be used as it could be in Samuel. The original concept of a priest was that of an attendant on the god.

19:1 – 20:3 War with the Ammonites. See 2 Sa. 10:1 – 11:1; 12:26–31. 6 A thousand talents of silver. An immense sum, for Amaziah could hire 100,000 men for a hundred talents (2 Ch. 25:6). As the mention of Mesopotamia is in anticipation of v. 16, it is probable that this is the total sum spent on foreign mercenaries during the war. Mesopotamia; Heb. 'aram-nahaʿrayim, the area immediately across the Euphrates and very much smaller than that included under the name Mesopotamia today, or perhaps rather the ancient Naharin, or N Syria. 7 Thirty-two thousand chariots. This is an impossible number. Shalmaneser III claims that the coalition he defeated at Qarqar put 3,940 chariots in the field against him (cf. DOTT, p. 47). A comparison with 2 Sa. 10:6 will show that we have the sum of two bodies of footmen; the chariots are not mentioned there. 18 Seven thousand chariots. 2 Sa. 10:18 has 'seven hundred chariots', the more possible reading. Forty thousand foot soldiers.* In 2 Sa. 10:18 'forty thousand horsemen'. 20:1 David remained at Jerusalem. At this point the account in 2 Samuel inserts the story of Bathsheba and the death of Uriah, etc. (2 Sa. 11:2 – 12:25). The Chronicler's omission of the story is not to whitewash David; he wants to give the divine pattern, not the aberrations from it. No blame is attached to him. There were affairs of state that demanded his attention. 3 And sent them to labour, reading wayyāśem for wayyāśar. Extreme servitude rather than massacre is indicated.

20:4–8 The death of Philistine champions. See 2 Sa. 21:18–22. 4 Gezer; 'Gob' (2 Sa. 21:18). Sippai; 'Saph' (2 Sa. 21:18). 5 And Elhanan the son of Jair slew Lahmi the brother of Goliath the Gittite. 2 Sa. 21:19 reads: 'And Elhanan the son of Jaare-oregim, the Bethlehemite, slew Goliath the Gittite.' It is axiomatic with the extreme critic that 2 Samuel is correct and as a result the story in 1 Sa. 17 is merely a worthless tradition. The reading of this verse is then dismissed as an attempt on the part of the Chronicler to get rid of a discrepancy. For a detailed discussion see on 2 Sa. 21:19 and Appendix 5 to Samuel. There is no adequate reason for not accepting the statement of Chronicles.

21:1 – 22:19 The preparations for the Temple

Except for ch. 21 this section is peculiar to Chronicles. Even ch. 21 has a different setting, for here it is not told as a story in itself but simply as an account of how the site of the future Temple came to be bought. The question of where these chapters are to be placed in David's life is discussed in the comment on 22:2.

21:1–27 The census and the plague. See 2 Sa. 24. 1 Satan. In 2 Samuel David's act is attributed to God's moving; here to Satan's. But the difference is only apparent. Popular Christian ideas of Satan, in so far as they are derived from the NT at all, are the result of that unsound exegesis which forgets that the foundations of all NT conceptions are in the OT. In the OT Satan, however evil, is an angel of God, a minister of God, a being who has only as much power as God entrusts to him. Cf. Jb. 1 and 2; Zc. 3:5. So Satan here is only the minister of God's purposes. 5 It does not look as though the divergence between the numbers given here and those found in 2 Sa. 24:9 is due to textual corruptions. No entirely satisfactory explanation has been given (but see on 2 Sa. 24:9).

7 God was displeased. This verse is not represented in Samuel and must be looked on as anticipating the development of the story. There can be no question of the plague coming on Israel until after David's choice (vv. 13, 14). Moreover Samuel is quite clear that it was David's conscience, not the divine punishment, that made David recognize his sin. 12 Three years of famine. In 2 Sa. 24:13 the Hebrew has 'seven'. The Chronicles reading, with which the LXX of 2 Samuel agrees, is to be preferred. 15 Ornan the Jebusite; 'Araunah the Jebusite' (2 Sa. 24:16). The difference in the consonantal text is small, and the variations probably go back to its being a foreign name. Cf. on 18:16. 20 His four sons . . . hid themselves; i.e. to avoid seeing the angel. Cf. vv. 15, 16. Now Ornan was threshing wheat. Obviously this was before the angel came; Ornan would then have hidden himself with his sons. Jewish tradition pictures him as hiding in the cave which undoubtedly existed under the rock over which the Holy of Holies was later placed, and which can still be seen under the Dome of the Rock (the Mosque of Omar). 25 Cf. 2 Sa. 24:24. It is generally recognized by all who are not out to discover discrepancies that there is no contradiction here. 2 Samuel gives the price of the rocky threshing-floor, Chronicles of the whole area (the site). The surroundings will have been bought somewhat later (and, since there was no plague to be stopped, at a much stiffer price); but it is characteristic of the Chronicler that he fuses the two events.

21:28 – 22:1 The choice of the Temple site. The syntax of this section is difficult. Vv. 29 and 30 should be printed in brackets; 22:1 follows straight on from 21:28. 28 He made his sacrifices there would be much better rendered 'when' or 'after he had sacrificed there'. This has been interpreted to mean that from this time on there were sacrifices on this site; but neither the Hebrew nor the context supports this.

22:2–5 David's preparations for building the Temple. While this and the following sections are not dated, a consideration of the evidence in 1 Kings clarifies the position. The only rational interpretation of Adonijah's attempt to make himself king (1 Ki. 1:5) is that he hoped to face his father with a fait accompli made possible because David had never publicly designated his successor. Cf. on 1 Ki. 1:5, 11. After 22:17 this could hardly be the case. So we are forced to look on chs. 22–29 as covering a limited period of time, from 22:6 onwards being after Solomon's anointing as king (1 Ki. 1:39). The apparent break at 23:1 is due to the use of a new source, not any lapse of time (see note in loc.).

It is often claimed that Chronicles is irreconcilable with 1 Kings. But 1 Ki. 2:1 in itself implies an interval between Solomon's anointing and his father's death. It is no unusual thing for a crisis to call out unrealized reserves of vigour in an old man. Most chronological outlines find it hard to allow Solomon a full 40 years' reign, and so strongly suggest a period of co-regency with his father (see also on 22:17). It is quite typical of Chronicles that while it ignores 1 Ki. 1 it reveals knowledge of it by 29:22.

2 Aliens. This is an accurate but possibly misleading translation. The Hebrew gēr is a tolerated sojourner. These remnants of the old inhabitants had not accepted the worship of Yahweh and therefore their presence in the land was not of right but of tolerance. David's treatment of them here is an anticipation of Solomon's policy (see on 1 Ki. 5:13–18; 2 Ch. 2:17f.; 8:7f.). If the treatment seems harsh, and it was, it must not be forgotten that those living in a land were expected to worship the god of the land. At the time conditions in this type of work were so hard that it was not considered suited to freemen.

22:6–19 David's charge to Solomon and the princes. 8 You have shed much blood. This is not mentioned in the prophetic message recorded in ch. 17, nor does Solomon repeat it in 1 Ki. 5:3. The truth will have come to David as he pondered on God's refusal to allow him to build the Temple. Very frequently God does not explain His refusals but allows them to be interpreted afterwards through prayer and the Word. 9 I will give him peace from all his enemies. As so often, although no condition is expressed, one is implied. Cf. 1 Ki. 11:14ff. There is no suggestion that Solomon stood higher morally than David, and still less that David's wars were not justified. Even then men felt that warfare was a contradiction of the divine order. David was paying for the sins of his predecessors. Had Israel been faithful in the conquest of the land, they would not have experienced the dark period of the judges, and David would have ruled over a people too strong to be lightly attacked, as was Solomon's fortunate position. 12 Only, may the Lord grant you discretion and understanding. Was it his father's prayer that prompted Solomon's request? See 2 Ch. 1:8ff. 13 Cf. God's charge to Joshua in Jos. 1:7ff. 14 With great pains. This is an attractive but uncertain translation of a difficult Hebrew phrase. Cf. other translations. RSV is supported by Rudolph. The numbers in this verse, if taken literally, would make David a much richer king than Solomon, which is contrary to the whole tenor of Scripture. It is better to treat them as equivalents of large, very large, enormous. 15 Craftsmen without number. This is to be understood as 'more than enough'; they would have been numbered for the purposes of pay and rations.

17 The leaders of Israel. This translates the Hebrew śar, usually rendered 'princes'. These were not principally or even primarily members of the royal family, but the tribal leaders and the civil and military officials (and so elsewhere in the OT). In other words, this passage implies Solomon as co-regent or at least king-designate. See on vv. 2–5 above.

23:1 – 26:32 Organization and duties of the Levites

23:1, 2 The last acts of David. No long interval need be read into the text between this section and the preceding one. The language implies merely a new section, probably based on a different source. These verses are a summary telling how David made Solomon king (cf. 28:1 – 29:25); he gathered the leaders of Israel (cf. 27:1–34), with the priests (cf. 24:1–19) and the Levites (23:3–32; 24:20 – 26:32). As so often in Chronicles when it comes to detail the order is reversed, except for some supplementary details about the Levites.

23:3–23 The twenty-four orders of Levites. 3 Thirty years and upward. See on 23:24. Though not expressly stated it may be inferred that they were under 50 (cf. Nu. 4:3). 4 Attempts to regard the figures here as absurdly high overlook the fact that the Levites were divided into 24 courses. 1,000 overseers on duty at one time, considering the scale of the work, is not unreasonable; the same applies to the other groups. Officers and judges. Cf. Dt. 17:9; 2 Ch. 19:8, 11. 6 The number of Levitical orders corresponded to the 24 orders of priests. This passage (vv. 6–23) is largely paralleled by the obviously fragmentary section 24:20–31. The minor variants in names call for no mention. What is more important is that only 22 orders can be counted, or 23, if, as seems probable, Eleazar (v. 22) is reckoned as the head of one through his daughters. We cannot say where the name may have dropped out. It may be in v. 9, where Shimei reveals some textual corruption (cf. v. 10), or in v. 16, where only one of Gershom's sons is mentioned. 7 Ladan; 'Libni' (1 Ch. 6:17). Many think that Ladan may have been a descendant of Libni.

23:24–27 The age of Temple service. It is impossible to interpret this section with certainty, but its general meaning is clear. David, as he considered the future, saw that the ornate ritual of the Temple would need more Levites, but that their actual service would be easier. He therefore ordered that once the Temple was completed the age at which service should begin should be lowered from 30 to 20. It is not clear whether a second census was taken or not. See on 24:1–19.

The importance of this section is that it shows that a command in the law could be changed by lawful authority without any reference to an alleged Mosaic tradition. Why then, if modern criticism is right about the growth of the Pentateuch, should all the later laws have been attributed to Moses?

23:28–32 An outline of the duties of the Levites. These regulations were necessary, as many of the Levites had been carrying out priestly duties at the smaller and less regular sanctuaries. Cf. 2 Ki. 23:8f. and especially Jdg. 17:7–13; 18:30. 30 There were a great many technical ritual acts involved in the bringing of sacrifice, and in these the Levites helped. By NT times the proportion of priests to Levites had so increased that the latter had been to a large extent ousted from this service.

24:1–19 The priestly courses. During the period of declension under the judges there was plenty of work for the descendants of Aaron at the many local sanctuaries; but now that Jerusalem was to become the central sanctuary, they were too many. The position would, in any case, have been created by the natural growth in population. They were divided up into 24 courses, which meant a fortnight's priestly duty a year, besides being on call at the great festivals, when in any case they should be in Jerusalem. As in the Jewish calendar the year has 13 months on an average of about 2 years in 5, the period of service would gradually move round the year. In NT times the service was for 2 separate weeks in the year and the great festivals (see Edersheim, The Temple, for this and other details of the NT period), and it may well have been so from the first. 3 Ahimelech of the sons of Ithamar. Cf. v. 6, 'Ahimelech the son of Abiathar', and see on 18:16. It would seem that the family tree was Ahitub, Ahimelech (1 Sa. 22:9), Abiathar (1 Sa. 23:6), Ahimelech. It is easy to see how confusion could have arisen. Here the text will be correct. Abiathar was too old by this time to be troubled with administrative details. 4 The smaller number of descendants of Ithamar can easily be explained by the misfortunes of the house of Eli, especially the massacre of the priests of Nob (see 1 Sa. 22:11ff.). 5 Officers of the sanctuary and officers of God. The two phrases should probably be regarded as synonymous. The whole verse probably means that except for the number of courses no distinction in honour was made between the two families. 6 The scribe Shemaiah . . . a Levite. The stress is not so much on his being a Levite, but that he was not the royal scribe. One father's house being chosen for Eleazar and one chosen for Ithamar. The order of service was decided by lot, the choice for the first 16 courses being alternately from Eleazar and Ithamar. Some of the priestly names which follow seem to occur in Nehemiah. See on Ne. 12:1 in Cam. Bible. 10 Hakkoz. Cf. Ezr. 2:61; Ne. 3:4, 21.

24:20–31 Levitical families. Cf. 23:6–23. This section is obviously fragmentary, the Gershonites being omitted without obvious reason. In vv. 26 and 27 there seems to be textual corruption. We have no other evidence for Jaaziah as a son of Merari; he was probably a later descendant. 26 Beno is not a proper name; it is literally 'his son'. In v. 26 it has probably entered by dittography from v. 27, where it may well be an error for Bani.

25:1–31 The families and courses of the singers. 1 The chiefs of the service. Obviously the Temple service is meant. Who should prophesy. While there is probably a reference to 1 Sa. 10:5, it seems clear that these chosen singers are being given an honour higher than that of the ordinary Levite. It may be that many Christians do not rank music high enough in the service of God. 2–4 The names listed here are found again with certain minor variations in vv. 9–31. 4 Hananiah. . . . Some think that these last nine names are improbable as names. Taking the consonantal text and occasionally dividing the words otherwise the following sense is obtained:

Be gracious unto me, O Jah, be gracious unto me!
Thou art my God whom I magnify and exalt.
O my help when in trouble, I say,
Give an abundance of visions.

It is thought that this feature cannot be accidental and therefore one of the few reasonable explanations is that some early scribe saw the possibility of reading this petition in the names of Heman's sons and altered them slightly for his purpose. 5 Note that Heman is called a seer. And three daughters. This may imply that they too took part in the Temple worship. Cf. Ps. 68:25. 8 Teacher. Better rendered 'the skilful' as in v. 7 (RV), though RSV interpretation may well be correct. It is simpler to omit the last clause with LXX. The 288 were the skilful ones, the remainder (making a total of 4,000; see 23:5) were the scholars. Both classes were divided into 24 courses to match those of the priests and Levites.

26:1–19 The courses and stations of the door-keepers. Cf. 9:17–27. It is not clear how the gate-keepers' duties were divided up. While 24 names seem to be mentioned in vv. 1–11, there is no suggestion that there were 24 courses. 13 Lots were cast for the place, not time of service. Vv. 8, 9, 11 may suggest that there were 93 chief door-keepers; but this may be an incorrect inference, as 9:22 says 212. These would be the chiefs of the 4,000 (23:5). Vv. 17, 18 give a total of 24 (chief?) door-keepers on duty at a time. 16 For Shuppim. Omit; it is a case of dittography from the previous verse. There is no such name in the genealogy, and LXX does not know it. Shallecheth and 18 the parbar. Neither can be identified with certainty.

26:20–32 Various Levitical officers. 20 And of the Levites, Ahijah had charge. Read with LXX, 'And the Levites their brethren were over.' The alteration required is very small. Two treasuries are here mentioned; that of the house of God under the descendants of Ladan, and that of the dedicated gifts under the descendants of Amram. 21 Jehieli; *'Jehiel' (23:8). 22 The sons of Jehieli. Probably to be deleted. Zetham and Joel were brothers of Jehiel (see 23:8). 27 The house of the Lord. This need not mean the Temple. The earlier dedications were probably for the repair of the Tabernacle, and the upkeep of the tent in Jerusalem. Cf. 15:1. 29 Outside duties. Cf. Ne. 11:16. It is quite probable that they were collectors of Temple dues and royal taxes (cf. v. 30). There is no obvious reason why there should be only 30 one thousand seven hundred men for W Palestine, while there were 32 two thousand seven hundred for Transjordan. This is one of the many indications that, while the numbers in Chronicles are often hard to understand, they are not inventions.

27:1–34 The civil leaders of the nation

27:1–15 The army courses. ICC and Cam. Bible assume that we have here the number of the royal bodyguard, which at 24,000 a month would be excessive. But this is not said. In any case the impression clearly created by 2 Samuel is that the royal bodyguard consisted mainly of foreign mercenaries, the Cherethites and the Pelethites (2 Sa. 8:18; 20:23; 1 Ki. 1:38). If we picture them as scattered over the kingdom, the number is reasonable. It should be noticed that v. 7, with its reference to Asahel, implies that this division was of long standing, though perhaps in a less developed form. Asahel was killed when David was still king in Hebron (2 Sa. 2:19ff.). Though the forms of the names vary slightly in places, all the 12 chiefs seem to come from the list of David's mighty men. 5 Benaiah, the son of Jehoiada, the priest. This could be the Jehoiada of 12:27. Since, however, there is no other suggestion that Benaiah was a priest, we may well be dealing with a scribal error based on an association of ideas with 2 Sa. 8:18. Benaiah acted as emergency executioner (1 Ki. 2:25, 29, 34, 46), a post we can hardly associate with a priest.

27:16–24 The tribal officers. These were appointed at the time of the census (see vv. 23, 24). We have 13 names. Zadok probably represents the whole people. The two halves of the tribe of Manasseh are reckoned separately. Gad and Asher are omitted, possibly by a defect of transmission. It is not likely to have been to preserve the number 12, as that had already been broken by the introduction of Zadok. 18 Elihu. Presumably 'Eliab' (1 Sa. 16:6; 1 Ch. 2:13). 23 Below twenty years of age. The omission of those under 20 conforms to the wilderness pattern (Nu. 1:3); it is implied by 2 Sa. 24:9; 1 Ch. 21:5.

27:25–31 Various royal officers. These are the chief stewards of David's landed property. Note that 30 Obil and 31 Jaziz are foreigners.

27:32–34 The king's counsellors. This list is of a rather different nature from that of David's officers (see 18:14–17; cf. also a later list, 2 Sa. 20:23–26), though some names are common to both; if so, they are found here in their capacity of counsellors. Like the previous list it has no particular connection with its setting at the end of David's reign. One at any rate had been dead for some time. 32 Jonathan, David's uncle. Not otherwise mentioned. On the basis of 20:7 many would render 'David's nephew'. While the Hebrew allows this, it seems unnecessary and on the grounds of age unlikely. Jehiel. Evidently the tutor of the king's sons. 33 Hushai . . . the king's friend. Cf. 2 Sa. 15:32, etc. 'The king's friend' is an official title, probably borrowed from Egypt; hence the AV 'companion' is to be rejected as misleading. Ahithophel. See 2 Sa. 15:31, etc. 34 Jehoiada the son of Benaiah; though otherwise unknown, there seems no reason for reversing it and reading 'Benaiah the son of Jehoiada'. For reasons of age it can hardly refer to the well-known Benaiah's son. Abiathar. Presumably the priest of that name.

28:1 - 29:30 Solomon made king

There is every probability that, after a hurried anointing like that described in 1 Ki. 1:39, the new king would as soon as possible be introduced in a solemn assembly to the representative leaders of the people for their confirmation of what had been done. 'Made Solomon . . . king the second time' (29:22) shows that the Chronicler knew of Adonijah's attempt and its result. The proper interpretation of 23:1, 2 (see comment in loc.) rules out the possibility that the first time is the one mentioned in 23:1. He is silent about Adonijah in conformity with his purpose of omitting, so far as possible, deviations from the divine pattern.

28:1–10 Solomon presented to the national assembly. 1 With the palace officials. Though the Hebrew word is sometimes used more generally, it is not likely to be the case here. AV mg. and RV mg. correctly render 'with the eunuchs'. This is the first mention of this abomination at the Israelite court: but cf. 1 Sa. 8:15, RV mg. The corruption of power had acted quickly. 2 Then King David rose to his feet. In normal circumstances, as many archaeological discoveries suggest, David would have spoken seated, the more so because of his age. His standing emphasizes the religious nature of the occasion. David, the chosen of Yahweh (v. 4), presents to the people the new chosen of Yahweh (v. 5), who has been chosen for the special purpose of building the Temple (v. 6). Though there is no direct affirmation of God's choice of Solomon in Samuel and Kings, yet 2 Sa. 12:24, 25 may hint at it. 5 To sit upon the throne of the kingdom of the Lord over Israel. Cf. 29:23, 'the throne of the Lord'. The king was Yahweh's deputy. 10 Take heed now. This charge is continued in v. 20.

28:11–19 The plans of the Temple. Our interpretation of the passage will depend on our interpretation of plan (v. 11). Ex. 25:40 clearly suggests an original seen by Moses, which he was later to describe to those carrying out the work. As Ex. 25 seems to lie behind this section, it is probable that David described to Solomon the vision that he had had by inspiration. (See v. 19, from the hand of the Lord, and cf. mg., which is probably correct.) If this is right, then the writing in v. 19 is the account in Exodus of the Tabernacle, the necessary modifications of which to suit the Temple David was caused to understand by inspiration. This is the more likely, as there has never been any satisfactory typical interpretation given to those details of the Temple where it varied from the Tabernacle; note Hebrews is concerned with the latter, not the former. The Bible never suggests a heavenly prototype of the Temple as it does of the Tabernacle. 18 His plan for the golden chariot of the cherubim. Better, as in RV, 'the chariot, even the cherubim'. The cherubim were thought of as forming God's chariot. Cf. Ps. 18:10 and especially Ezk. 1.

28:20, 21 Concluding encouragement for Solomon. The thought resumes from v. 10. The LXX shows us that a section has accidentally been dropped at the end of v. 20. It reads, 'Now behold the pattern of the porch (of the temple) and of the houses thereof, and of the treasuries thereof, and of the upper rooms thereof, and of the inner chambers thereof, and of the house of the mercy-seat, even the pattern of the house of the Lord.'

29:1–9 David's appeal for liberality and the response. David announced a huge gift from his own private fortune for the building of the Temple over and above the sum mentioned in 22:14, and used this as the ground of an appeal to the generosity of the assembly. The motive is less likely to have been the need for further gifts than the wish to make as many as possible have a share in the building of the new Temple. It seems impossible to accept the figures both of David's and the people's gifts as they stand. How enormous they are cannot so easily be judged by turning them into modern currency as by comparing them with the tribute that Sennacherib was able to wring out of Hezekiah (2 Ki. 18:14) or Tiglath-pileser from Menahem (2 Ki. 15:19). Some idea of the quantities can be obtained from the Moffatt translation.

1 The palace (Aram. bîrâ); this late word is used only three times of the Temple. But hêḵāl, the word normally translated Temple, also has as its root meaning palace or great house. 5 Consecrating himself (lit. 'filling his hand'). This is a technical term of inducting a person into the priestly office (cf. Ex. 28:41, etc.); but here it is used metaphorically with the approximate sense 'who will offer willingly like one consecrating himself to the priesthood?' (ICC).

7 Ten thousand darics. The daric was a Persian gold coin (an obvious anachronism indicating the date of Chronicles) worth about a guinea. The difference between the very large number of talents and the small amount in darics may be because the latter refers to minted coins (the talent is a weight). As, at present, we have no evidence for minted coins earlier than the 7th century BC, we cannot disprove the suggestion that this may be a complete anachronism due to a misunderstanding of his source by the Chronicler.

29:10–19 David's closing prayer of thanksgiving. One of the finest prayers in the OT. 13 We thank thee, our God, and praise thy glorious name. The Hebrew expresses continual action. Moffatt renders well, 'Hence, O our God, we ever thank thee and praise thy glorious name.' 15 We are strangers before thee. The thought is not that we are strangers to God. The picture is of the notoriously insecure position of the stranger; but as they dwell before, i.e. in the sight of, God, they are secure. There is no abiding. Better, as in RV mg., 'there is no hope', i.e. apart from God. 17 shows that the merit of the gifts for the Temple lay not in their amount but in that they had been given willingly. David trusts that God, who knows men's hearts, will see the same willingness in the others as has been already seen in him.

29:20–25 The close of the assembly: Solomon made king. 20 And worshipped the Lord, and did obeisance to the king. The word normally translated 'worship' in the OT means to prostrate oneself. Hence, as here, it can be used equally for God and the king; RSV has felt compelled to translate the one word twice in two different ways. 22 King the second time. See note at the beginning of this section. And Zadok as priest. We do not know enough of the customs at the time to be dogmatic, but a literal interpretation seems to be hazardous. Zadok is always presented to us as joint high priest, so any such consecration (or reconsecration) seems to be excluded. There is no evidence for the reconsecration of the high priest at the accession of a new king. It is easiest to regard this as the Chronicler's hint at the deposition of Abiathar, known to his readers from 1 Ki. 2:26. 23 The throne of the Lord. See on 28:5. 24 And also all the sons of King David, pledged their allegiance. An indirect reference to Adonijah (1 Ki. 1:53). 25 Such royal majesty as had not been on any king before him in Israel. Translated thus, the comparison is limited to David and Saul. It is likely that we should take the Hebrew to mean 'such royal majesty which was not on any king more than on him in Israel'. This would refer to Solomon's successors as well.

29:26–30 A summary of David's reign. 27 See 1 Ki. 2:11. 29 Samuel the seer (Heb. rō'eh), . . . Gad the seer (Heb. ḥōzeh). See on 1 Sa. 9:9 and Appendix 3 to Samuel. The former term, used of Samuel in 1 Sa. 9:9, 11, suggests something akin to clairvoyance; the latter suggests the seeing of dreams or visions. 30 The circumstances that came upon him; i.e. his vicissitudes. Upon all the kingdoms of the countries. Obviously only those countries with which David had contacts are intended.

2 Ch. 1:1 - 9:31 THE REIGN OF SOLOMON

The Chronicler gives us very little information that is not in Kings, though a few of his additions are of importance. Some of his omissions, like Adonijah's attempt on the throne and Solomon's apostasy and its results, are in conformity with his general purpose; we get the impression that the majority of them are merely to save space. The most remarkable feature is the manner in which, instead of closely following Kings, he has repeatedly rewritten, expanded and contracted it.

1:1–17 Solomon confirmed in the kingdom by God

1:1–13 Solomon's initiatory sacrifice and vision at Gibeon. 1–6 The bulk is peculiar to Chronicles. Obviously such an initiatory sacrifice would be carried out with great pomp. 7–13 are an abridgement of 1 Ki. 3:5–15 (where see commentary). 3 The tent of meeting of God. The non-mention of the Tabernacle by Kings may imply that it was no longer in use but had been honourably lodged in the Gibeon sanctuary. That would explain why David had not brought it to Jerusalem to house the ark.

1:14–17 Solomon's wealth. See 1 Ki. 10:26–29, with which it is virtually verbally identical, and cf. 2 Ch. 9:13–28. Such a heaping up of bullion was bound to have an inflationary effect, which would affect the farmers worst of all.

2:1 - 5:1 The building of the Temple

For this section see 1 Ki. 5:1 - 7:51. The Chronicler omits the details of Solomon's other buildings (1 Ki. 7:1–12) and also some of the details of the Temple itself.

2:1–16 Solomon and Hiram. See 1 Ki. 5:1–12. The Chronicler has a considerably expanded form of the correspondence. Since vv. 7, 13f. bear the stamp of authenticity (cf. 1 Ki. 7:1), it is likely that we have a condensed version in Kings. 2 is a doublet of 2:18 (q.v.). 3 Huram the king of Tyre. Except in 1 Ch. 14:1, where it is found in the mg. of the Hebrew, Chronicles always uses this form instead of *Hiram, found in Samuel and Kings, which in turn is short for Ahiram. 7 A man skilled to work in gold . . . trained also in engraving. Archaeology has fully borne out Israel's backwardness in the arts at this time. 8 Cypress, and algum timber; for the former see 1 Ki. 5:8; for the latter see on 1 Ki. 10:11f., and the parallel of 2 Ch. 9:10f. The latter have probably been accidentally introduced here, though in our ignorance of the exact kind of timber intended we cannot be sure. 10 For the quantities of food listed see on 1 Ki. 5:11.

11–16 The authenticity of Hiram's answer has been objected to on the ground of the religious language he uses. In a polytheistic society politeness to a neighbour's god cost nothing. 13 Huram-abi. See on 1 Ki. 7:13, 14. There are no grounds on which we can choose between Huram and Hiram; the name of the king is no guide. Some claim his name was Huram-abi (or abiv), which is possible, but more likely it should be: 'Huram, my (his) trusted counsellor.'

2:17, 18 The preparation of a labour pool. See also vv. 1, 2 and see on 1 Ki. 5:13–18.

3:1–4 The construction of the Temple. See on 1 Ki. 6:1–10. In Chronicles the account is strangely truncated. 1 Mount Moriah; cf. Gn. 22:2; the only place where Mt. Zion or the Temple mount is so called. Note that in Genesis Moriah is the name of a district, not of a hill. 4 Its height was a hundred and twenty cubits; if the porch was like an Egyptian pylon, the height is possible; if it was a portico, as seems more likely, for the general style seems to have followed a Phoenician pattern, we must omit the 100 as an accidental corruption.

3:5–14 The interior of the house. See on 1 Ki. 6:14–36. Again the description is greatly abbreviated, but a few details are added. 5 The nave; i.e. 'the holy place'. Cypress. On the basis of 1 Ki. 6:15 we must interpret this of the floor and possibly of the ceiling, the material of which is not mentioned in Kings. Chains; a word used only of ornamental chains, the links here being of flowers; cf. 1 Ki. 6:18, 29. ICC renders 'garlands'. 6 Parvaim; perhaps in Arabia, but not identified. 8 Six hundred talents; on the most likely calculation nearly 65,000 lb., a seemingly impossible figure (cf. on 1 Ch. 29:1–9). 9 Upper chambers; cf. 1 Ch. 28:11. It is not clear what is referred to. 14 The veil; not mentioned in Kings, even as Chronicles does not mention the doors.

3:15–17 The bronze pillars. See on 1 Ki. 7: 15–22. 16 He made chains like a necklace. The textual emendation adopted by RSV is small and almost certainly correct.

4:1 The bronze altar. Not in Kings; its non-mention cannot be explained with certainty, for it assumes its existence (1 Ki. 8:22, 64). One might assume that it had dropped from the text by a scribal error, were it not that it is not mentioned in the summary in 1 Ki. 8:41–43; 2 Ch. 4:11–16 (!) either. Perhaps the easiest explanation is that the bronze altar was brought from Gibeon (1:5), but it was then found to be too small (7:7) and so was later replaced by a much larger one (cf. 4:1 with Ex. 27:1). Chronicles, summarizing as it does, mentions the later altar in the general description, while Kings, dealing with what was made for the dedication, does not mention it. This is contradicted by 7:7, but this could be a later mistaken scribal addition. Would an altar surface of 90 sq. ft really have been too small?

4:2–6, 10 The sea and the lavers. See on 1 Ki. 7:23–37. The difficult description of the stands for the lavers in Kings is omitted. 5 Three thousand baths; 1 Ki. 7:26 has 'two thousand'; see commentary in loc.

4:7 The lampstands. Cf. 4:20f. Note that he refers to Solomon, not to Huram. There is no suggestion that the gold articles were made by the latter.

4:8 The tables. Cf. 4:19 and 1 Ki. 7:48.

4:9 The courts. See on 1 Ki. 7:2–12.

4:11–18 A summary of Huram's work. Virtually identical with 1 Ki. 7:40–47 (q.v.).

4:19 – 5:1 The golden vessels. Virtually identical with 1 Ki. 7:48–50 (q.v.). 19 The tables for the bread of the Presence. 1 Ki. 7:48 has, obviously correctly, only one table. The other nine had value only as ornaments. The increased number of tables and lamps was demanded mainly by the quadrupling of the floor-space of the Holy Place.

5:2 – 7:22 The dedication of the Temple

This section is virtually identical with the corresponding section in 1 Ki. 8:1 – 9:9, the few additions giving mainly liturgical information.

5:2–14 The moving of the ark. See on 1 Ki. 8:1–11. 4, 5 The Levites took up the ark . . . the priests and the Levites brought them up. Chronicles alters 'priests' (1 Ki. 8:3) to Levites (v. 4), and the Hebrew omits and between priests and Levites (v. 5). RSV has followed the versions and some 24 Hebrew MSS. One must ask, however, whether this is not one of the cases where the more difficult reading should have been followed. The Chronicler may simply have been following the common phrase in Dt. 18:1, etc. It is very far from clear from the Pentateuch whether priests or Levites had to carry the ark. It may well be that the latter carried it up to the Temple site and then the former took over. In any case it is clear that the distinction between the descendants of Aaron and the other members of the tribe of Levi was not so strictly enforced at this time. 5 The tent of meeting. If we possessed only Chronicles we should naturally interpret this in the light of 1:3. From 1 Ki. 8:4 it is more natural to interpret it of the tent erected in Jerusalem by David to house the ark, for Kings does not otherwise mention the old Tabernacle.

11b–13a are an addition by Chronicles stressing the pomp of the occasion; obviously all available priests and Levites were on duty, not merely the weekly course (cf. 1 Ch. 24). The blowing of the trumpets was specifically a priestly duty (Nu. 10:8).

6:1 – 7:3 The actual dedication. See 1 Ki. 8:12–61, from which this account differs only very slightly. 13 A bronze platform. This information is omitted by Kings. 40–42 take the place of 1 Ki. 8:50b–53. As they are in no way alternatives, it is likely that the concluding verses in Kings have dropped out by a scribal error in Chronicles. On the other hand Kings may well have deliberately omitted the conclusion here. 7:1–3 is not in Kings. 1 For fire came down from heaven cf. Lv. 9:24; 1 Ch. 21:26; 1 Ki. 18:24, 38. The remainder is an enlargement of 5:13b, 14. Chronicles omits Solomon's blessing of the people (1 Ki. 8:54–61), perhaps in disapproval of the king's taking priestly functions on himself. There was always a strong temptation to the king to arrogate priestly functions to himself in imitation of his heathen neighbours (cf. 1 Sa. 13:8–14; 2 Ch. 26:16–20).

7:4–10 The sacrifices and feast. See 1 Ki. 8:62–66. 7 The bronze altar. See on 4:1. 9, 10 On the eighth day . . . On the twenty-third day. This is difficult to reconcile with 1 Ki. 8:65f., where the picture seems to be of a 7-day dedication festival (8th to 14th Tishri), followed by the Feast of Tabernacles (15th to 21st Tishri), followed by the dismissal of the people next day. Chronicles, finding in its additional sources that the people had been dismissed on 23rd Tishri, rightly understood that there had been an extra day. Kings reckons a 7-day dedication feast with the Day of Atonement (10th Tishri) in the middle, i.e. 8th to 15th Tishri, followed by Tabernacles a day late, i.e. 16th to 22nd Tishri. Chronicles reckons the dedication feast as including the Day of Atonement, i.e. 8th to 14th Tishri, followed by Tabernacles (15th to 21st Tishri), plus the eighth day closing festival (Lv. 23:36). So it is a question of how the festivities were broken up, and perhaps no clear line of demarcation was drawn, as there will have been little or no distinction between the two halves.

7:11–22 God's answer to Solomon. See 1 Ki. 9:1–9. There are only minor verbal differences except for vv. 13–16, which are merely an expansion of what is implicit in 1 Ki. 9:3.

8:1 - 9:31 Solomon's glory

See 1 Ki. 9:10 - 10:29; 11:41–43. The differences between Kings and Chronicles are for the most part insignificant. 1 Ki. 9:11–16 are omitted, while 2 Ch. 8:13–16 have no parallel in Kings.

8:1, 2 Solomon's transactions with Hiram. See 1 Ki. 9:10–14. It is often alleged that Chronicles here contradicts Kings. It is more likely that the Chronicler disapproved of Solomon's transactions with Hiram, and therefore mentions only the final incident in them, which, however, is not mentioned in Kings (see commentary in loc.). It could be that from the first these cities were intended to serve as a pledge for ultimate payment.

8:3–11 Solomon's levy and city building. See 1 Ki. 9:15–24. 3 The campaign against Hamath is peculiar to Chronicles. Hamath had voluntarily become tributary to David (2 Sa. 8:9ff.) and probably took advantage of his death to try to regain independence. This, the only campaign waged by Solomon, was probably very brief. 4 Tadmor in the wilderness was interpreted by all the versions as Palmyra, about half-way between Damascus and the Euphrates. Tadmor existed already in the time of Tiglath-pileser I of Assyria, c. 1100 BC, so it may have been in Solomon's possession. Since, however, in 1 Ki. 9:18 the true reading is certainly Tamar (see commentary in loc.), the mention of Hamath may have misled some scribe. The store-cities which he built in Hamath may have been to cover the northern approaches of Israel (cf. on 1 Ki. 8:65). 10 The discrepancy of two hundred and fifty with the 550 of Kings hardly calls for comment; the number will not have remained constant throughout the reign. In fact if we add the figures in 1 Ki. 5:16 and 9:23 we get the same total as when we add 2 Ch. 2:18 and 8:10. 11 The statement about Pharaoh's daughter is hard to understand. My wife shall not live . . . is misleading, for it suggests that the objection was that she was a foreigner; in fact we should render 'no wife of mine shall dwell . . .' (Cam. Bible, Moff.). It is no longer possible to reconstruct the circumstances.

8:12–16 Solomon's worship. It would seem from v. 16 that this section originally wound up the description of the building of the Temple. All modern commentators agree that the LXX should be followed, at least in part, in v. 16, as does RSV.

8:17, 18 Solomon's Red Sea trade. See 1 Ki. 9:26–28. 17 Then Solomon went need no more be taken literally than the parallel in Kings 'And king Solomon made a navy'. 18 Huram sent him . . . ships. It is absurd to read into this that ships were transported overland. There is such shortage of timber round the Gulf of Aqabah that it would have to be brought from Phoenicia, and it was probably to a large degree shaped in advance. It is true that they would possibly have been sent via the Nile and the canal linking the Nile and the Red Sea, but this is not suggested by the text.

9:1–12 The visit of the queen of Sheba. Almost verbally identical with 1 Ki. 10:1–13 (q.v.).

9:13–28 The trade and riches of Solomon. See 1 Ki. 10:14–29. To 1 Ki. 10:26–29 we really have a doublet in 2 Chronicles, viz. 1:14–17 and 9:25–28. 16 For the weight of the three hundred shields see on 1 Ki. 10:17. 18 A footstool of gold is merely a corruption of the text of 1 Ki. 10:19 (see commentary in loc.). 21 The king's ships went to Tarshish. The Chronicler knew only of traffic based on Ezion-geber (8:17; 9:10) and since v. 21 is obviously the same as 1 Ki. 10:22, we are dealing with a careless scribal error. The ships may have gone as far as India but they did not circumnavigate Africa to reach the Mediterranean where Tarshish was (Jon. 1:3). Nor are the products brought back Mediterranean products. The same error has slipped into 20:36, 37. It is true that there was more than one Tarshish, for it was a generic name for a port where copper ore was loaded. So there could have been a port on the Indian ocean with this name, but we have no record of it, nor is there any mention of a suitable cargo from it.

9:29–31 Summary of Solomon's reign. See 1 Ki. 11:41–43. The Chronicler omits the story of Solomon's idolatry and troubles, even as he does that of David's sin and its results, and just for the same reason. He is concerned with the monarchy as an institution rather than with the personal failings of those that sat on the throne; see Introduction, p. 369.

10:1 - 12:16 Rehoboam

Chronicles brings us a number of interesting points, some of importance, which are not mentioned by Kings.

10:1–19 The disruption. See 1 Ki. 12:1–19. Note the deliberate omission of 1 Ki. 12:20. Not even the making of Jeroboam king is to be mentioned. For the Chronicler the northern kingdom is from the first apostate, which, of course, in the truest sense it was.

11:1–4 Civil war averted. See 1 Ki. 12:21–24. 3 Note the insertion and to all Israel in Judah and Benjamin. The Chronicler constantly insists that there were always elements of the northern tribes that remained loyal to the Davidic king. This is too readily overlooked when we are dealing with certain modern theories.

11:5–12 The organization of Judah. Not in Kings. As soon as Jeroboam could organize the north it was bound to be stronger than Judah both in its population and natural resources. Jeroboam was an ambitious man not likely to be content with what God had given him, and so Rehoboam did his best to strengthen his diminished kingdom. 6 He built; i.e. he refortified. This may have been after Shishak's invasion, for all the towns are in the south. On the other hand he must have known that Shishak would support Jeroboam (1 Ki. 11:40), so it may be that his best efforts were inadequate.

11:13–17 Immigration from Israel. Cf. 1 Ki. 12:31; 13:33. 14 The mention not merely of Jeroboam but also of his sons, i.e. his successors, shows that while the major part of the immigration of priests and Levites took place at once, yet it continued over a period, the turn of phrase in Hebrew in v. 13 being consistent with this. Cast them out. We may be sure Jeroboam would have been glad to keep them, but by his insistence on a Canaanized version of Yahweh worship he had made it impossible for those who were loyal to remain. We may be sure some will have put their pocket before their conscience and stayed. 15 Satyrs (Heb. śā'îr) are the demons or jinn believed to inhabit desert and waste places; they were looked on as hairy, or of animal shape; hence RV 'he-goats' (cf. Lv. 17:7 and Robertson Smith, The Religion of the Semites, p. 120). The return to nature worship meant a return to old superstitions. The calves which he had made; important as showing that Chronicles takes a knowledge of Kings for granted. 16, 17 The natural interpretation is that some of those who disobeyed Jeroboam's ban then came to Jerusalem to worship and made their permanent home there; cf. 15:9.

11:18–23 The royal family. 18 Rehoboam's chief wife was Mahalath, whose parents were Jerimoth, an otherwise unnamed son of David, and Abihail, a niece of David's. 20 But his favourite wife was Maachah, or Michaiah (13:2), the grand-daughter of Absalom (cf. v. 20 with 13:2). 23 And procured wives for them. He was following Solomon's policy of trying to strengthen the throne by suitable marriages both for himself (v. 21) and his sons.

12:1 Rehoboam's idolatry. See 1 Ki. 14:21, 22. It is not clear why we have no details, for they are clearly implied in 14:2, 3. All Israel means in Chronicles the southern kingdom.

12:2–12 Shishak's invasion. Cf. 1 Ki. 14:25–28. We have Shishak's own account of the invasion recorded on the outside wall of the temple of Karnak. This and other archaeological evidence (see ANET, pp. 242f., 263f.) shows that Israel was engulfed as well as Judah, even Ezion-geber being probably destroyed, and that Egyptian overlordship must have lasted some years. It is probable that no resistance was offered. 3 Sukkiim; unidentified. 7 Some deliverance; better 'deliverance within a little while' (RV mg.); the Egyptians could not keep up their effort for long. 8 That they may know my service; that it is better than serving others. 12 Conditions were good in Judah. It is far from certain that this is better than 'and moreover in Judah there were good things (found'RV). It is clear that while the north gladly accepted the Canaanized distortion of Yahweh worship patronized by Jeroboam, it did not really get a grip of Judah till the reigns of Ahaz and Manasseh.

12:13–16 Summary of his reign. Cf. 1 Ki. 14:29–31. 15 Iddo the seer. As the mg. suggests, there seems to be a textual corruption here.

13:1–22 Abijah

Cf. 1 Ki. 15:1–8. 1 No satisfactory explanation of the difference between the forms Abijah in Chronicles and Abijam in Kings has been given; so we cannot decide which was his real name. 2 For his mother see on 11:20. 3 The size of the armies should be compared with the census figures (2 Sa. 24:9; 1 Ch. 21:5). This was an all-out effort at conquest. 4 Mount Zemaraim; cf. Jos. 18:22. 5 A covenant of salt was unbreakable (Nu. 18:19). Abijah was far from practising what he preached (1 Ki. 15:3); but what was settled religious policy in the north was still only an aberration in Judah. 6, 7 His picture of the disruption is rather fanciful, for Rehoboam was 41 when he came to the throne (12:13). 12 Abijah claims it is a holy war. 15 God defeated. There would seem to have been some form of supernatural intervention. 17 We must take the five hundred thousand picked men as no more than 'a very large number', for the only result of the victory was the capture of a few border towns which Asa soon lost (see on 1 Ki. 15:16–22).

14:1 – 16:14 Asa

14:1–5; 15:16–18 Asa's reformation. See 1 Ki. 15:9–15. There is no reason for thinking that Asa's reformation was really in two stages. The impression arises from the way the material from Kings has been joined to other sources. Maachah's image (15:16) must have been disposed of right away.

1 If we put together 1 Ki. 15:28 and 16, it becomes clear that the ten years is only a round figure. 3–5 only make explicit what is implicit in 1 Ki. 15:12. 3 He took away the foreign altars and the high places. It is alleged that this is a deliberate contradiction of 1 Ki. 15:14 (see commentary in loc.). The self-consistency of Chronicles is then vindicated by suggesting that 2 Ch. 15:17 is either a later addition from Kings or that Israel there means the northern kingdom. The more reasonable explanation is that foreign should be construed with high places as well as altars; he removed these high places that could make no legitimate claim to existence.

14:6–8 Asa's defensive measures. Not in Kings, but cf. 1 Ki. 15:23.

14:9–15 Asa's victory over Zerah. Not in Kings. 9 Zerah is generally, but with little linguistic justification, identified with Pharaoh Osorkon I or II and there is a little archaeological evidence to favour an invasion by the latter. But he is called ha-kushi, 'the Cushite' (RSV the Ethiopian). Cush is either Ethiopia, i.e. the Sudan, or part of Arabia (Gn. 10:7; 2 Ch. 21:16, q.v.). Since the XXIInd Dynasty of Egypt was not Ethiopian, though they may have controlled part of the Sudan, it is quite possible that it was an Arabian invasion, but with Egyptian backing (cf. 16:8, 'Libyans'). Note the nature of the booty

(v. 15) which would suit an Arab invasion. The three hundred chariots is proof enough that the numbers are not invented; therefore a million probably means no more than an exceedingly large number. 13, 14 Gerar and the neighbouring cities were Philistine; they had probably aided Zerah. 15 The tents of those who had cattle. A possible emendation; 'cattle owners' is probably better.

15:1–15 Azariah's exhortation and its results. Not in Kings. The main thought of the passage is clear enough. 1 Azariah explained the victory 2 by saying 'The Eternal was on your side, because you were on his side' (Moff.) and so 7 encouraged them to carry through the reformation which till that time had been carried on only at the official level. 10 This was sealed at a great popular gathering at the Feast of Weeks. 3–6 It is these verses that create a difficulty. They seem to describe the position under the judges, and are apparently a commentary on the last section of v. 2. But whether they are Azariah's words or a comment by the Chronicler is not clear. 10 The fifteenth year compared with 14:1 shows that no complete chronology of Asa's reign is being attempted; see too on 15:19. 9 Those from Ephraim, Manasseh, and Simeon who were sojourning with them. They may have migrated to Judah, especially in the troubled time when Baasha wiped out the house of Jeroboam (1 Ki. 15:27–29); but why Simeon? There is no evidence for their living elsewhere than in the south, and they were always part of Judah. Indeed they had so become part of Judah that their separate existence is no longer mentioned in 1 Ki. 11:36; 12:20. The tribal portion of Simeon (Jos. 19:1–9) could not have been attached to the northern kingdom. Either it implies that until now their hearts had been with the north, or more likely it is an unintelligent correction of an early scribal error.

15:19 – 16:6 Asa's war with Baasha. See 1 Ki. 15:16–22. The figures in 15:19; 16:1 are impossible, for Baasha died in the 26th year of Asa. It has been suggested that the original reading was '. . . unto the five and thirtieth year (i.e. of the kingdom), that is, in the fifteenth year of the reign of Asa . . . in the six and thirtieth year, that is, in the sixteenth year of Asa', and it is supported by Thiele, The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings,[2] pp. 57–60, but it remains more plausible than convincing.

16:7–10 Hanani's rebuke of Asa. Not in Kings. 7 Hanani tells Asa that if he had trusted he would have defeated the combined armies of Baasha and the Syrians, though the Lucianic Greek suggests that we should read 'the army of the king of Israel'. 10 Asa's reply was to put him in the stocks. The stocks, which could have been nicknamed 'Little Ease', were even more an instrument of torture than their much later English counterpart. When he inflicted cruelties (better 'tortured', Moff.) upon some of the people, it may have been for showing sympathy with Hanani. This is the first recorded instance of the ill-treatment of a prophet.

16:11–14 Summary of Asa's reign. Cf. 1 Ki. 15:23, 24. 12 If, as is probable, the physicians were foreigners, the condemnation is easily understandable, as their cures will have had more of magic than of medicine about them. 14 They made a very great fire in his honour; they did not cremate him, but burned spices (cf. Je. 34:5); the worthy funeral for a worthy king is being stressed.

17:1 – 20:37 Jehoshaphat

17:1–6 The character of his reign. 3 In the earlier ways of his father. RSV is correct in following some Hebrew MSS and LXX in omitting David (cf. chs. 14 and 15 with 16). 6 He took the high places . . . out of Judah; cf. on 20:33 and on 14:3. The lack of detail about Jehoshaphat's reformation shows it was no more than the rectifying of slackness since Asa's reformation (cf. on 19:4).

17:7–9 Regular teaching of the law. Arguments about the ability or otherwise of people to read at a given time are often far from reality. The cost of a scroll of the law would have been beyond the means of all but the richest in the time of Jehoshaphat. The priests should have known it by heart, but that could not be taken for granted in a time of religious slackness.

17:10–19 Jehoshaphat's greatness. 11 The Arab. If Zerah was an Arab (see on 14:9), this may have been a result of Asa's victory. 14–18 The numbers of Jehoshaphat's army are among those in Chronicles that we can no longer explain. See Introduction, p. 370. They are far too high when compared with those available to Ahab and with the probably inflated figures given by Shalmaneser III in his account of the battle of Qarqar (see DOTT, p. 47; ANET, pp. 278f.), and indeed with the evidence of archaeology generally. If we divide each figure by ten, we reach a total 112,000 of trained soldiers, not militia, which would have been within the powers of Judah at the height of its prosperity and comparable to the half-million militia in the time of David (2 Sa. 24:9).

18:1–34 Jehoshaphat's alliance with Ahab. See 1 Ki. 22:1–38. Except for vv. 1, 2 and the details following Ahab's death (1 Ki. 22:36–38), which have no bearing on Jehoshaphat, the parallels are almost identical. The main changes are intended to put Jehoshaphat more in the centre of the picture. 1 He made a marriage alliance with Ahab; see 2 Ki. 8:18, 26; cf. on 1 Ki. 3:1.

19:1–3 Jehoshaphat's alliance rebuked. 1 In safety (lit. 'in peace'); cf. 18:26, 27. 2 Jehu the son of Hanani. In 1 Ki. 16:1 Jehu the son of Hanani pronounces the doom of Baasha; in 2 Ch. 16:7 Hanani the seer rebukes Asa. This Jehu is probably the grandson of the Jehu in 1 Ki. 16:1. It was not rare for names to alternate like this in some families. Because of this, wrath has gone out against you; fulfilled in the invasion of 20:1.

19:4–11 Administration of law. 4 Jehoshaphat dwelt at Jerusalem; i.e. he paid no more visits to Israel. And brought them back to the Lord; purity of religion could be bought only at the price of eternal vigilance.

A closer study of the Mosaic legislation will show that it is incomplete, though the Pharisees, by ingenious exposition, were able to make it cover all life; this becomes particularly obvious when it is compared with an ancient code like that of Hammurabi. In other words it did not entirely replace the existing tribal law, but showed how it had to be modified and developed. That meant that side by side there had been, from the first, civil (Ex. 18:25, 26) and religious (cf. Ex. 21:6; 22:8, 9, RV) judges. This is clearly legislated for in Dt. 16:18; 17:8–12. 5 In his reform Jehoshaphat appointed civil judges throughout the land, probably because the old system, based on family headship, had broken down. 8 In Jerusalem there was a mixed court of appeal: to give judgment for the Lord, i.e. cases covered by the law of Moses; to decide disputed cases, i.e. civil cases. 11 There were two chief judges, Amariah the chief priest (1 Ch. 6:11), and Zebadiah representing the king. Increasingly the king was withdrawing from the actual administration of justice to a position where he could see that it was being administered.

20:1–4 An invasion by Moabites and their allies. This invasion must have been earlier than the campaign in 2 Ki. 3, which may have been a sequel to it. 1 Some of the Meunites. The Meunim are mentioned in 1 Ch. 4:41; 2 Ch. 26:7. They were, if not Edomites, resident in Edom, and are (in vv. 10, 22) connected with Mt. Seir. The reason why the name Edom is not mentioned is that Edom at this time was under Judah (cf. 1 Ki. 22:47; 2 Ki. 3:9). These were some of the inhabitants who linked up with the invaders as they passed through their territory. 2 From Edom. Hebrew has 'from Syria'; this confusion between 'dm amd 'rm is frequent. To cross the sea, i.e. the Dead Sea, they had passed round its southern end through Edom. In any case the water at that time probably stretched only as far south as Masada. 3 Jehoshaphat feared, for he knew this was the expression of the divine wrath (19:2).

20:5–19 Jehoshaphat's prayer and the divine answer. 5 The new court; see on 1 Ki. 7:2–12. Evidently changes had been made since Solomon's time of which we are not told. 17 The reason for the particular form of victory promised is that Yahweh had brought the invaders as a punishment. Since they had achieved their purpose Yahweh would remove them Himself. This is the more striking because of Jehoshaphat's own strength.

20:20–30 The deliverance. 21 Jehoshaphat's trust is seen in the singing of praise before the fulfilment of the promise. In holy array; here, as elsewhere (1 Ch. 16:29; Pss. 29:2; 96:9; 110:3), this replaces AV 'the beauty of holiness'. A possible translation would be 'in holy attire'. 22 The Lord set an ambush. Action by Jehoshaphat is excluded. It could refer to action by the inhabitants of the overrun area, but far more likely by supernatural agents, otherwise unspecified. They were routed; explained by v. 23. 24 The watchtower; better 'the outlook point' (Cam. Bible, ICC). 26 Beracah; i.e. blessing. The name is preserved near Tekoa to this day.

20:31–37 Summary of Jehoshaphat's reign. See 1 Ki. 22:41–50. 33 The high places . . . were not taken away. Cf. 17:6; we have the same type of contradiction as between 14:3 and 15:17 (q.v.). The simple fact was that nothing short of the drastic steps taken by Josiah could abolish them, if the people resisted the royal policy. The high place (Heb. bāmâ) did not have to be on a hill, though it often was; bāmâ implies no more than the platform on which the cult objects were placed; there was no need for a building, and the whole could be quite insignificant. Until Josiah desecrated the sites (34:5), destruction meant little, for it was the site rather than the cult objects that was holy. 35–37 It is not clear why Chronicles should single out the section about Jehoshaphat's fleet as it does. To Tarshish; they were ships of Tarshish to go to Ophir; see on 9:21.

21:1–10 Jehoram's reign. See 2 Ki. 8:16–22. Except for vv. 2–4 this is identical with the passage in Kings (q.v.). 4 There is no reason suggested for Jehoram's act. The fact that it was not confined to his brothers, but he slew . . . also some of the princes of Israel (Moff. renders correctly 'of the nobility in Israel'—Israel being, as usually in Chronicles, the southern kingdom), suggests that he was removing opponents to his intended religious policy.

21:11–20 Jehoram's apostasy and its results. Not in Kings. 11 Since in 23:17 (2 Ki. 11:18) only one temple of Baal is mentioned, it is probable that Jehoram deliberately prepared for the introduction of Baal worship by fostering a debased form of Yahweh worship. Note that his son's name, Ahaziah (22:1), is compounded with Yah. 12–15 The difficulty about Elijah's letter is that Elijah was indubitably dead by this time (cf. 2 Ki. 3:11, in the reign of Jehoshaphat). We may only suppose that it was written before his translation so that, when Athaliah tried to carry out her mother's policy in Judah, she should be faced by the memory of her mother's great opponent. 16 The Arabs, who are near the Ethiopians; see on 14:9. 17 All the possessions they found that belonged to the king's house. There is no suggestion that they captured Jerusalem; cf. 22:1. Except Jehoahaz, his youngest son. This is no contradiction with 22:1. Jehoahaz = Yah + ahaz, Ahaziah = ahaz + Yah; both mean 'Yahweh has grasped'. 19 His people made no fire in his honour; see on 16:14.

22:1–9 Ahaziah. See 2 Ki. 8:25–29. Vv. 7–9 have no close parallel in Kings. 1 Cf. 21:16, 17. The inhabitants of Jerusalem. It may be that the country people were so opposed to the policy of the court that they would have been willing to transfer the crown to some other branch of the Davidic family. 2 Forty-two years old; an obvious scribal error; cf. 21:20; 2 Ki. 8:26. 2–6 See on 2 Ki. 8:25–29. 6 He returned to be healed; obviously Jehoram.

7 presupposes a knowledge of 2 Ki. 9:1–28, but 9 is irreconcilable with 2 Ki. 9:27, 28 and 8 with 2 Ki. 10:12–14, if we are to assume that Chronicles means to put their death before Ahaziah's. It is likely that we have to do here with a case of major textual disorder. What we may not do is to ascribe a deliberate contradiction to the Chronicler, for, as is his custom, he has already by v. 7 referred the interested reader to Kings for further details. 9 The house of Ahaziah had no one able to rule the kingdom. The slaughter of 21:17; 22:8 had removed everyone able to stand up to Athaliah.

22:10 – 24:27 Joash

22:10–12 Athaliah as queen. See 2 Ki. 11:1–3.

23:1–15 The plot against Athaliah. See 2 Ki. 11:4–16.

23:16–21 The covenant. See 2 Ki. 11:17–20.

24:1–14 The repair of the Temple. See 2 Ki. 11:21 – 12:16.

24:15–22 The apostasy of Joash. Not in Kings, though hinted at. It is very strange that some scholars doubt the authenticity of this section. Why should the Chronicler so wantonly blacken the reputation of a king like Joash? The merciful silence of Kings is more easily understood in the light of this passage.

The overthrow of Athaliah and the reforms that followed it were largely the work of the country people (the 'people of the land'). 17 Now after the death of Jehoiada the princes of Judah came; better 'the nobles of Judah' (Moff.). 18 The inheritors of the old court tradition came and won him back to the old ways. 20 Zechariah the son of Jehoiada . . . stood above the people. The present vast, almost level, Temple area was built by Herod. At that time the altar was considerably higher than the court with the worshippers. 21 They conspired against him; probably some trumped-up charge as in the case of Naboth (1 Ki. 21:8–13). They stoned him . . . in the court of the house of the Lord; cf. Mt. 23:35; Lk. 11:51. Our Lord's reference to Zechariah shows that in His time Chronicles stood in the Hebrew Canon, where it now does, as the last book. Zechariah is mentioned as the last martyr to be named. In the court of the house of the Lord; 'between the sanctuary and the altar' (Mt. 23:35). Rabbinic tradition made this murder one of the chief reasons for the destruction of Solomon's Temple. Certainly Judah never fully recovered spiritually from Joash's apostasy.

24:23–27 Punishment for apostasy and death of Joash. See 2 Ki. 12:17–21. 27 In the Commentary on the Book of the Kings; cf. 13:33. It is not clear what authority is intended by this name.

25:1 – 26:2 Amaziah

25:1–4 Amaziah's accession. See 2 Ki. 14:1–6.

25:5–13 The victory over Edom. Cf. 2 Ki. 14:7. 5 The result of Amaziah's census was to show a considerable fall since the days of Asa (14:8). 6 He hired also a hundred thousand mighty men of valour from Israel. In the light of 2 Ki. 13:7 it is clear that once again we are dealing with round figures to express a large number. 7 Israel, with all these Ephraimites. This explanation of the term Israel is given because it is normally used of the southern kingdom in Chronicles. 8 The LXX suggests that this verse is corrupt. As it stands, it tells Amaziah that, do what he may, he will be defeated. ICC and Moff. may be correct in making a small insertion and rendering 'Go by yourself, strike your own blow, be brave in battle; God will not let you fall before the foe' (Moff.). RSV follows the LXX. 11 The Valley of Salt; cf. 2 Sa. 8:13; probably the extension of the rift valley south of the Dead Sea. In any case the Dead Sea did not extend so far south at that time (cf. on 20:2). The usual identification of Sela (2 Ki. 14:7) with Petra is far from certain, especially as there is no trace of Joktheel (2 Ki. 14:7), the later name of Sela, linked with Petra. 12 Why ten thousand captives were massacred is not said; but see Am. 1:11, which is not much later in time. It is probable that Amaziah's victory gave him the control only of the route down to Elath (26:2; cf. 2 Ki. 8:22; 14:22). The mercenaries had marched home in anger (v. 10). 13 When they reached Samaria they heard that Amaziah was away in Edom, so they raided Judah. This is the only reasonable meaning that can be given to the Hebrew. Rudolph may be correct in seeing a textual corruption; he suggests 'Migron' (cf. Is. 10:28) for Samaria.

25:14–16 Amaziah's idolatry. Not in Kings; but note the hint in 2 Ki. 14:3. The Bible is never concerned with a man's justification for his actions, but with his actions. Amaziah's rather contemptuous dismissal of the prophetic warning (v. 16) shows that he regarded the whole incident otherwise. He held the debased view of Yahweh by which He was the supreme god, but yet one god among others. His victory over Edom was proof of Yahweh's victory over the gods of Edom (about whom we have no information). Yet they were gods in spite of their defeat, so 14 he brought their images to Jerusalem to deprive the Edomites of their help. Even captive gods deserve respect, so he worshipped them, making offerings to them. Did the magnitude of the unexpected victory even make him think that the Edomite gods had changed sides? But that did not mean for Amaziah a rejection of Yahweh. For the prophets Yahweh stood alone, and so the placing of other gods beside or even under Him meant rejecting Him.

25:17–24 Amaziah's encounter with Joash. See 2 Ki. 14:8–14 with which it is virtually identical. 17 Then Amaziah . . . took counsel; better 'let himself be counselled' (Moff.); this was the divine misleading (cf. 18:18–22).

25:25 – 26:2 Summary of Amaziah's reign. See 2 Ki. 14:17–22 with which it is virtually identical.

26:3–23 Uzziah

26:3–5 Introduction to reign. See 2 Ki. 15:1–4. The relation of the names Uzziah and Azariah is not clear; the former means 'Yahweh is my strength', the latter 'Yahweh has helped'.

26:6–15 The wars and greatness of Uzziah. 7 For the Meunites, see on 20:1. 9 Not sufficient is known of pre-exilic Jerusalem to interpret this verse with certainty. 10 The towers were for the protection of the cattle. The Shephelah, the low hills between Judea and the Philistine plain. In the plain; 'in the tableland' (RV mg.), probably of Transjordan (cf. v. 8).

26:16–23 Uzziah's sin and its punishment. Cf. 2 Ki. 15:5–7. Uzziah's wish to perform priestly functions was, in fact, his giving way to the constant temptation of the kings to look on themselves as 'divine kings'; see 1 Ki. 12:27. He was smitten with leprosy rather than another disease, because leprosy was considered a token of special divine judgment.

27:1–9 Jotham

See 2 Ki. 15:32–38. 3 Ophel; part of the old Jebusite city, perhaps the citadel, which became 'the city of David', remaining an important part of Jerusalem (cf. NBD, p. 618a).

28:1–4 Ahaz' apostasy. See 2 Ki. 16:1–4. 3 Burned his sons. The parallel has the more probable 'his son' (2 Ki. 16:3).

28:5–15, 17–19 The Syro-Ephraimite attack. See 2 Ki. 16:5, 6. We have here in addition the information about the Edomites and Philistines (vv. 17, 18) and about Israel's treatment of the prisoners they had taken (vv. 6–15). It would seem that there was a change of heart in some in the north, when it was already too late; cf. 2 Ki. 17:2. 15 The city of palm trees; cf. Jdg. 1:16; 3:13.

28:16, 20–27 The appeal to Assyria and its result. See 2 Ki. 16:7–16. 16 To the king of Assyria; RSV and the versions are probably correct in reading the singular. 20 Tilgath-pilneser; i.e. Tiglath-pileser (cf. 1 Ch. 5:6, 26; 2 Ki. 15:19). And afflicted him; doubtless by the amount of tribute demanded. 23 He sacrificed to the gods of Damascus which had defeated him. Vv. 22, 23 are really parenthetic and refer to the time of the Syrian attack; this has no connection with 2 Ki. 16:10 (q.v.). 24 Ahaz . . . cut in pieces the vessels of the house of God. This probably refers to the incident of 2 Ki. 16:17 with perhaps other items as well; 29:18, 19 show that there had been no widespread destruction of the Temple vessels. Ahaz . . . shut up the doors of the house of the Lord. As is clear from Kings, Ahaz continued to worship Yahweh after his fashion, and 2 Ki. 16:12–16 clearly indicates the continued use of the Temple courts. Ahaz may have considered the imageless sanctuary unsuited for his worship. This is supported by the continued use of the Temple in the worse apostasy of Manasseh.

29:1 – 32:33 Hezekiah

Over half the information in Chronicles is peculiar to it, and where it is paralleled by 2 Kings and Is. 36–39 the information has been largely abbreviated and rewritten.

29:1, 2 Hezekiah's reign. See 2 Ki. 18:1–3.

29:3–19 The cleansing of the Temple. Not in Kings. 3 He opened the doors of the house of the Lord; see on 28:24. 4 The square on the east; cf. Ezr. 10:9. 5 The filth; the accumulated dirt of years of neglect. 7 They also shut the doors of the vestibule; see on 28:24. They . . . have not burned incense or offered burnt offerings; this is superficially in direct contradiction to 2 Ki. 16:15. Just as the prophets refused to regard the Canaanized worship of Yahweh as anything but Baal worship, so Hezekiah refused to look on the sacrifices offered on an Assyrian altar as offered to Yahweh; for him they were sacrifices to the Assyrian gods. 8 The wrath of the Lord; see the disasters of ch. 28. 10 To make a covenant with the Lord; cf. 15:12; 23:16; 34:31. The motive was good, but the power to keep the covenant lacking. 12–14 The record of names of the Levites confirms what we know from other sources (e.g. Pr. 25:1), that the time of Hezekiah was a time of literary activity leaving considerable records to the future. 16 To the brook Kidron; cf. 15:16; 30:14. 19 Which King Ahaz discarded; cf. on 28:24.

29:20–36 The renewal of Temple worship. Not in Kings. 21–24 The opening service was one of atonement in which seven he-goats were brought as a sin-offering, and seven bullocks, rams and lambs as a burnt-offering. A careful study will show that the sin-offering was always accompanied by a burnt-offering. The choice of seven animals may be due to the associations of the number, or because the people were divided into seven categories; three are mentioned in v. 21—kingdom means the royal house, sanctuary the priests and Levites. 25, 26 The mention of the music is probably due to Ahaz having changed the Temple music along with his other ritual rearrangements. There will have been musical accompaniment to the burnt-offering from at least the time of David (cf. 1 Ch. 23:5; 25:1), and probably earlier. 27 The song to the Lord; it is now virtually universally recognized that the vast majority of the psalms were written for use in the Temple on various occasions; 30 makes it clear what was sung. The princes; here probably the chief priests (cf. on 1 Ch. 25:1). 32, 33 The comparatively small number of offerings under the circumstances shows how greatly Judah had suffered under Ahaz. Normally (Lv. 1:5, 6) the killing and flaying of the burnt-offering was the worshipper's duty; 34 the exception here may be due to their being congregational (v. 32) rather than personal offerings. The priests were too few. Urijah, the high priest (2 Ki. 16:10ff.), had done nothing to oppose Ahaz, but had co-operated. He probably drew in many of the other priests, while most of the Levites may have stood aloof (were more upright in heart).

30:1–12 The invitation to keep the Passover. Not in Kings. 1 The choice of the passover, 2 even though it would have to be kept in the second month (cf. Nu. 9:10, 11), was deliberate. The chief feast of the Canaanized Yahweh worship was Tabernacles (cf. 1 Ki. 12:32), the great nature New Year feast, but Passover was the New Year feast of the supernatural Yahweh who ruled history. Since the destruction of Samaria occurred in 723 BC, but Hezekiah did not come to the throne till 716 BC, Ephraim and Manasseh (v. 1) refer to those not carried into captivity (see 2 Ki. 17:6). As Hezekiah was tributary to Assyria, the new settlers will have had no objection. 10 That Hezekiah's messengers went only as far as Zebulun suggests that in the far north of Galilee the Israelite elements had already disappeared.

30:13–27 The celebration of the Passover. Not in Kings. 14 Even as the priests had cleansed the Temple, so the people now cleansed the city. Into the Kidron valley; cf. 15:16; 29:16. 15 The zeal of the people shamed the backward priests and Levites so that they sanctified themselves in time. 17 The burden on them was heavier than usual, for the Levites had to kill the lambs instead of the worshippers doing it, 18 for many of them were ritually unclean. In many cases the uncleanness needed 7 days for removal, and the pilgrims had not reached Jerusalem in time to carry out the regulations. 20 The Lord . . . healed the people; i.e. forgave them (cf. Ps. 41:4; Je. 3:22; Ho. 14:4). 23 The Feast of Unleavened Bread was doubled in length; cf. on 7:9, 10. This was felt to be a rededication of the Temple. 24 The mention of the offerings is because they were mostly peace-offerings, which were mainly eaten by the worshippers. 26 There had been nothing like this in Jerusalem. It was not the Passover celebration that was unique, but the great joy.

31:1 Destruction of idolatrous shrines. Cf. 2 Ki. 18:4. 1 Pillars . . . Asherim; see on 1 Ki. 14:23, and NBD, art. 'Asherah'. It being a purely popular demonstration, the representatives of Assyria in the province of Samaria had no grounds of objection.

31:2–21 The organization of the priests and Levites and their support. Not in Kings. 2 Hezekiah regulated the priestly and Levitical courses, 3 the official contribution to the sacrifices and 4 the tithes. 5–10 These were brought in with great generosity. 6 The dedicated things. The RSV rightly treats the Hebrew (see mg.) as impossible, but probably oversimplifies. The text has been damaged by haplography and should read '. . . and the tithe of the produce of the field, which had been consecrated . . .'. 7 Owing to the rainless Palestinian summer they could be piled in heaps in the open. This long unpractised generosity made it necessary to organize, or reorganize, the control of the tithes. This involved the making of a register of those entitled to receive them.

32:1–8 Preparations for Sennacherib's invasion. There are only minor contacts with Kings, but cf. on 2 Ki. 18:13–16. 3, 4 Cf. on 2 Ki. 20:20. 5 The Millo; cf. 1 Ki. 9:15. Weapons; more likely 'missiles' (Moff.). 7, 8 With us . . .; perhaps a recollection of Isaiah's Immanuel ('God with us') prophecy (Is. 7:14).

32:9–23 Sennacherib's threats. This is a summary of 2 Ki. 18:17 – 19:37 (q.v.). Note that 2 Ki. 19:9–13 is introduced parenthetically in v. 17; v. 18 continues v. 16. 20 The prayer of Hezekiah is given in 2 Ki. 19:15–19; the prayer of Isaiah is not mentioned in Kings. It is characteristic of the Chronicler that with the evil kings he goes into details with their defeats, but he only hints at the extent of the troubles of the good kings. The very way in which he weaves in 2 Kings into his narrative shows that he knew his readers were familiar with it.

32:24–33 Summary of Hezekiah's reign. 24 See 2 Ki. 20:1–11. 25, 26, 31 See 2 Ki. 20:12–19. 30 See 2 Ki. 20:20. 27 Cf. 2 Ki. 20:13. 33 In the ascent of the tombs of the sons of David. The rendering, though possible, is improbable. 'A preferential place among the tombs' seems to be the sense (cf. AV).

33:1–20 Manasseh

Cf. 2 Ki. 21:1–18. 1–10 See 2 Ki. 21:1–15; Chronicles omits the details of God's message. 3 The plurals Baals, Asherahs, where Kings has the singular, should not be stressed. 6 Sons; cf. on 28:3. Such sacrifices were very rare. In the valley of the son of Hinnom; cf. Je. 7:31. Chronicles, which stresses the religious side, omits the murders (2 Ki. 21:16). 11 Late in his reign (648–647 BC) there was a rebellion against Ashurbanipal in favour of his brother, viceroy in Babylon. Whether Manasseh was involved or only suspected, he was taken with hooks (lit. 'with thorns') and bound with fetters . . . to Babylon. For the custom see on 2 Ki. 19:28. Ashurbanipal was probably in Babylon because of the rebellion just suppressed. It was some time before he could turn to the west, so Manasseh was taken very late in his reign to Babylon and his reign after his return must have been very brief. This explains why his repentance and reformation (vv. 12, 13, 15–17) are not mentioned in Kings and why they left no lasting impression. It should be noted, too, that Chronicles does not mention the removal of the altars of the host of heaven. Having once accepted these signs of Assyrian rule, he would not have dared to reject them now. This explanation, however, leaves many questions unanswered. It seems clear that he had time only to make a beginning, and that Amon immediately restored all the idolatry. 14 cannot be interpreted with certainty in our lack of closer knowledge of pre-exilic Jerusalem. 18 His prayer to his God . . . . 19 And his prayer. The Prayer of Manasseh in the Apocrypha has no claim to be regarded as authentic.

33:21–25 Amon

There are only minor variants from 2 Ki. 21:19–26 (q.v.). No motivation for the assassination is given. Amon may have been the vicious son of a bad father, or it may have been out of disgust for his following of a discredited policy.

34:1 – 35:27 Josiah

34:1, 2 Introduction. Cf. 2 Ki. 22:1, 2.

34:3–7, 33 The reformation. Superficially at least, the Chronicler is further from Kings in his account of Josiah's reformation than elsewhere in his book. This is partially due to the peculiarities of Kings. This section in it was almost certainly written by an eyewitness for eyewitnesses. He, therefore, felt himself free so to present the facts as to lay the main stress on what he considered the really important details. The Chronicler wished to take over 2 Ki. 22:3 – 23:3 as intact as possible, and so he amalgamated the details of clearing out the rubbish of the past in this section without caring for chronological order.

3 Eighth year . . . twelfth year . . . 8 eighteenth year. The main reason for the gradual introduction of the reformation was that it was political as well as religious. In Josiah's 8th year (632 BC) Ashurbanipal, the last great king of Assyria, had just died. Failure to worship the Assyrian gods, and even more the removal of their symbols and altars from the Temple, would be regarded as a sign of rebellion. Josiah and his advisers evidently decided that they must act slowly to find out the repercussions. Josiah was 16 in the 8th year of his reign and probably came of age then. 4, 5 It should be obvious that these verses preceded the rebuilding of the Temple, at least in part, while 6, 7 followed it (cf. 2 Ki. 23:15–20). 4 And strewed it over the graves . . . 5 burned the bones of the priests on their altars. The former profaned the 'holy' dust of the cult objects and images, the latter profaned the altars and the 'holy' ground on which they stood. 6 In their ruins. This makes no sense. The cities had long since been rebuilt. The most likely meaning is 'in their places', i.e. it was both altars and the sanctuary sites that were profaned. 7 Then he returned to Jerusalem. A clear sign that he is borrowing from 2 Ki. 23:20.

34:8–14 The repair of the Temple. See on 2 Ki. 22:3–7. 9 The mention of Manasseh and Ephraim and from all the remnant of Israel is probably to those from the northern tribes who had settled in the south (11:16; 15:9), rather than to those left in the north, for, unlike Hezekiah's reign (30:11), there is no special mention of people from the north at Josiah's Passover.

34:15–19 The finding of the book of the law. See on 2 Ki. 22:8–13.

34:20–28 Huldah's message. See on 2 Ki. 22:14–20. 20 Abdon the son of Micah; 2 Ki. 22:12 correctly 'Achbor the son of Michaiah'. 22 The son of Tokhath, son of Hasrah; 2 Ki. 22:14 correctly 'the son of Tikvah, son of Harhas'.

34:29–32 The covenant. See on 2 Ki. 23:1–3. The omission of the prophets in v. 30 is deliberate; see 2 Ki. 22:14.

34:33. See above, with 34:3–7.

35:1–19 Josiah's Passover. Cf. 2 Ki. 23:21–23. For the significance of the keeping of the Passover see on 30:1, 2. 3 Put the holy ark in the house . . . ; presumably it had been removed for the period of repairs. There is, however, much to be said for Rudolph's small amendment, which makes the passage read, 'From the time that they placed the holy ark in the house which Solomon . . . built, you have had nothing to carry on your shoulders, so now serve the Lord your God and his people Israel.' 4 Following the directions of David . . .; see 1 Ch. 23:26. And the directions of Solomon; cf. 8:14. 6 Kill the passover; cf. 30:17, but since the same reason did not hold good, it is likely we should not stress the phrase. 7, 8 Bulls. These were for peace-offerings during the Feast of Unleavened Bread; cf. on 30:24. 11–13 It would seem that the actual Passover sacrifices and the later sacrifices of the week have for brevity been amalgamated. 18 No passover like it had been kept . . .; cf. 30:26. Passover had been overshadowed by Tabernacles celebrated as the New Year feast.

35:20–25 Josiah's death. See on 2 Ki. 23:29, 30a. 25 Jeremiah also uttered a lament for Josiah; this has not been preserved. Obviously it has no relation to the book of Lamentations.

35:26, 27 Summary of Josiah's reign. See on 2 Ki. 23:24–28.

36:1–23 Downfall and restoration

36:1–4 Jehoahaz. See on 2 Ki. 23:30b–35. 3 Laid upon the land; i.e. 'fined the country' (Moff.); the tribute was heavier than it would otherwise have been as a punishment.

36:5–8 Jehoiakim. See on 2 Ki. 23:36 – 24:7. We should presumably look on v. 7 as anticipatory of v. 10, though it may refer to the incident of Dn. 1:2. It was due to Jehoiakim's sins and rebellion that Jerusalem was taken and the Temple ransacked.

36:9, 10 Jehoiachin. See on 2 Ki. 24:8–17.

36:11–13 Zedekiah. See on 2 Ki. 24:18 – 25:7. 10 His brother Zedekiah. Read with the versions 'Zedekiah, his father's brother'. With the legitimate king in exile, and the Temple ransacked, the Chronicler has no reason for describing the last agony of Jerusalem. 13 The last generation in the city is well typified by its perjured king.

36:14–21 The destruction of Jerusalem. Chronicles gives merely a general summary showing how the destruction of the city was the inevitable result of its sin. 20 To him and to his sons; i.e. his successors, Evil-merodach (2 Ki. 25:27), Neriglissar and Nabonidus, the last two being usurpers. 21 Until the land had enjoyed its sabbaths. The implication is that the sabbatical year was not observed under the monarchy (cf. Lv. 25:1–7; 26:34, 35). Seventy years. Judah was subject to Babylon from the battle of Carchemish (605 BC, Dn. 1:1) till the fall of Babylon (538 BC), i.e. 67 years, 70 being a round number.

36:22, 23 Restoration. These verses are identical with the opening verses of Ezra; see Introduction to Ezra. That Ezra and Chronicles were originally one book is shown by the last verse's ending in the middle of a sentence.

Ezra and Nehemiah

INTRODUCTION

THE RELATIONSHIP OF THE BOOKS

The two books of Ezra and Nehemiah were originally one, being attached to the book of Chronicles to form a composite historical work for the period from Adam to Nehemiah. A comparison of 2 Ch. 36:22f. with Ezr. 1:1ff. indicates this continuity, while a similarity of style and interests (the Temple and its cultus, statistics and genealogies, etc.) in Chronicles and Ezra suggests a unity of authorship. Ezra and Nehemiah cover a period of history not dealt with in the books of Kings (unlike Chronicles, which, in measure, is a duplication of history) and so were detached from Chronicles and given a more prominent place in the third section (the Writings or Hagiographa) of the Hebrew Canon.

COMPARISON WITH 1 ESDRAS

There are two distinct Greek translations of Ezra–Nehemiah: the LXX (Esdras B), which follows the Hebrew text, and 1 Esdras (Esdras A, usually called the Greek Ezra). The latter, written in elegant Greek, contains the last two chapters of 2 Chronicles, the whole of Ezra and concludes with Ne. 7:73b – 8:12. It probably reflects a better Hebrew text than the Massoretic text but the translation is very free and its historical and chronological details are unreliable, and so the biblical Ezra is to be preferred. The Jewish historian Josephus bases his work upon 1 Esdras.

The confusion which sometimes arises over the different titles used to distinguish between the various texts may be resolved by the following table:

English	LXX	Vulgate
Ezra/Nehemiah	= Esdras B	= 1 & 2 Esdras
1 Esdras (Apocrypha)	= Esdras A	= 3 Esdras

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

The Babylonian Empire was finally overthrown by the Medes and Persians when Babylon fell in 539 BC. Cyrus, the Persian king, was an enlightened character who reversed the repressive policies of the Assyrians and Babylonians. He showed restraint towards those he conquered and consideration towards those who had been forcibly removed from their countries under the previous administration, encouraging them to return to their homelands. Whenever possible he allowed the subject peoples local autonomy and in particular he posed as the champion of the indigenous religions. A contemporary inscription, the Cyrus Cylinder, records, '. . . the gods who live within them (i.e. the cities) I returned to their places . . . All of their inhabitants I collected and restored to their dwelling-places.' It was under this policy that a number of Jews, under the leadership of a prince of the Davidic line, were allowed to return to Jerusalem in 538 BC.

The books of Haggai and Zechariah provide considerable supplementary detail, whilst the book of Malachi (which cannot be accurately dated) probably throws light on the general situation before the arrival in Jerusalem of Ezra and Nehemiah. Contemporary documents include the Cyrus Cylinder, noted above, and the Elephantine Papyri. The latter, written in Aramaic, preserve some correspondence of a Jewish military colony in Upper Egypt in the 5th century BC. Bagoas the Persian governor of Judea, Johanan the high priest (cf. Ezr. 10:6; Ne. 12:22) and Sanballat the governor of Samaria (Ne. 2:19, etc.) and his sons, are mentioned in these documents.

The Persian kings involved in this period are:

559–530	Cyrus
530–522	Cambyses
522–486	Darius I (Hystaspes)
486–465	Xerxes I (Ahasuerus)
465–424	Artaxerxes I (Longimanus)
424–423	Xerxes II
423–404	Darius II (Nothus)
404–358	Artaxerxes II (Mnemon)

THE RELATIONSHIP OF EZRA AND NEHEMIAH

Controversy still rages around this problem, which is undoubtedly the greatest unsolved difficulty of the two books. Arguments, both for and against the various views, are notoriously inconclusive. The salient points may be summarized as follows.

The date of Nehemiah's return

This is the fixed point of the discussion. Nehemiah was at Jerusalem from the twentieth year of Artaxerxes I (Ne. 2:1) to the thirty-second year (Ne. 13:6), i.e. 445–433 BC. He returned to Jerusalem for a second term after an absence of unspecified duration at the Persian court (Ne. 13:6). One of the Elephantine Papyri, dated 407 BC, which refers to Johanan, presumably Jonathan, the grandson of Eliashib, Nehemiah's contemporary (Ne. 3:1; 12:10f., 22) and to Delaiah and Shelemiah, sons of Sanballat, Nehemiah's enemy, precludes a date for Nehemiah in the reign of Artaxerxes II.

The date of Ezra's return

Amongst a multitude of hypotheses three main possibilities emerge.

1. That Ezra arrived in Jerusalem in 458 BC. This is the traditional view, which identifies the king noted in Ezr. 7:7f. as Artaxerxes I. This would mean that Ezra preceded Nehemiah, which accords with the biblical order. One weak point in favour is that Ezr. 8:36 makes no mention of a governor in Jerusalem, which, some allege, suggests that Ezra arrived before Nehemiah's appointment. Against this, Nehemiah himself refers to 'former governors' (Ne. 5:15).

There are several objections to this view. Many of these are inconclusive, and it must be borne in mind that even the cumulative effect of a large number of such arguments falls short of proof. In the list which follows, a.–h. are considered to be weak and i.–l. must be treated seriously.

a. A 'wall' is mentioned in Ezr. 9:9 (AV, RV, RSV mg.) which is held to refer to Nehemiah's wall. But the reference could be figurative, as suggested by the RSV 'protection'. There is considerable evidence (Ezr. 4:12, 23; Ne. 1:3) of an abortive attempt to build a wall in Jerusalem just before Nehemiah's arrival. If this was under Ezra's direction, such an overstepping of his authority would have put him in disfavour with the Persian officials, and prevented him from carrying out his specifically religious functions. But since the events in Ezr. 9, 10 appear to take place soon after Ezra's arrival in Jerusalem, there was a gap of about 10 years before this abortive attempt was made, increasing the probability that the reference in Ezr. 9:9 is figurative.

b. Ezra was surrounded by multitudes in Jerusalem (Ezr. 10:1), whereas Nehemiah found the city sparsely populated (Ne. 7:4) and had to institute a policy of repopulation (Ne. 11:1). But Ezr. 10:1 specifically notes that the crowd was drawn from the outlying areas.

c. Four treasurers were appointed by Nehemiah (Ne. 13:13), an arrangement which was still operative when Ezra arrived (Ezr. 8:33). But a tradition of appointments of this kind easily establishes itself, and Nehemiah, in a time of disorder, may simply have appointed four honest men as replacements.

d. It is held that Ezra's unprotected journey, during the early and disturbed period of Artaxerxes I, is unlikely. But the point of Ezr. 8:21ff. is that there was grave danger, which involved an unusual sense of dependence upon God.

e. Nehemiah arrived at a ruined city, whereas Ezra does not indicate any insecurity. But since Nehemiah's commission was specifically connected with the wall and the defence of Jerusalem, a concentration of interest on this aspect is only to be expected.

f. Nehemiah was forced to deal with economic irregularities (e.g. Ne. 5:1–13). Why did Ezra allow these to continue if he was on the scene earlier? This is an argument from silence. In any case, abuses can arise very quickly, as happened during Nehemiah's relatively brief absence from the capital (Ne. 13:6–31).

g. It is held that Nehemiah's reforms were somewhat impromptu, whereas Ezra's were based on the law. Yet the latter apparently failed, if he arrived first. This objection overlooks the differences in position and personality between the two men. Nehemiah appears as the more vigorous, dynamic character. Moreover, he wielded the civic authority, whereas Ezra's appeal was moral and spiritual. The problem of mixed marriages was clearly a recurring one, being dealt with by Ezra (Ezr. 9, 10), by Ezra and Nehemiah together (Ne. 9:2; 10:30) and by Nehemiah independently (Ne. 13:23–29). Even allowing that Ezra failed, in measure, before Nehemiah's arrival, this would not invalidate the position which he held in later Jewish tradition. An Ezra may well need the support of a Nehemiah before he can fulfil his potential.

h. Ne. 12:26 lists Ezra after Nehemiah, and Ne. 12:47 omits any reference to Ezra between Zerubbabel and Nehemiah. The reason for this may simply be the priority given to the civic authorities.

i. Few, if any, of those who returned with Ezra appear in the list of those who built Nehemiah's wall (Ne. 3). But Ne. 3 mentions only the chief builders, who are likely to have been long-standing residents in Jerusalem.

j. Nehemiah was the contemporary of Eliashib the high priest (Ne. 13:28). Ezra was the contemporary of Jehohanan (Ezr. 10:6; cf. Ne. 12:22), the grandson of Eliashib. Therefore Nehemiah must have preceded Ezra. This is a weighty point, although Ezr. 10:6 gives no indication that Jehohanan was high priest at that time.

k. The mission of Ezra was concerned with the promulgation of the law (Ezr. 7:12), yet, if the traditional view be accepted, the law was not read in public, apparently for the first time, until c. 444 BC (Ne. 8:1–8), a delay of c. 13 years. This remains a major problem. The silence is explicable if Ezra exceeded his mandate by his building operations, and fell into disfavour with the Persian authorities. It must be admitted, however, that there is no actual evidence to connect Ezra with the unauthorized attempt to build the wall (Ezr. 4:7–23). Nor is there a scrap of evidence to suggest what Ezra was doing, on the traditional dating, between 458 and 444 BC. 1 Esdras attaches Ne. 7:73b – 8:12 to the Ezra narrative, which would allow for an earlier dating of the law-reading ceremony, but this demands the elimination of Nehemiah's name (Ne. 8:9) as a gloss.

l. When Nehemiah made his census ,he utilized the list of those who returned with Zerubbabel (Ne. 7:6–72) but is silent concerning those who returned with Ezra (Ezr. 8:1–14).

2. That Ezra arrived in Jerusalem in 398 BC. This view identifies the king of Ezr. 7:7f. as Artaxerxes II. In favour of this view is the fact that it eliminates any suggestion of failure in Ezra's ministry; indeed, it allows it to be decisive. Moreover, it accounts for the embarrassing fact that Nehemiah and Ezra appear to ignore each other's contributions, which would be unusual if they were contemporaries. Another point urged in its favour is that it is unlikely that the Persian authorities would countenance two sponsored Jewish officials at the same time. This, however, is indecisive, since the spheres of authority of Ezra and Nehemiah were quite distinct. Another point urged in its favour is that the historical situation at this time, when Egypt had just been lost to the Persian Empire, would encourage the Persians to treat Judea liberally, in the hope of gaining its loyalty. The appointment of Ezra, with a free hand to promote the Jewish religion based upon the law, would serve such a purpose.

There are, however, two main objections to this view:

a. The so-called Passover Papyrus of the Elephantine texts, dated 419 BC, indicates that the religious affairs of the Jews of the Dispersion were already being regulated through Jerusalem on the authority of the Persian king. This was the province of Ezra, and his appointment, as Ezr. 7:25f. suggests, was the initial one of this kind. Ezra therefore must have been in Jerusalem before 419 BC and a date in the reign of Artaxerxes II is invalidated.

b. The view involves several textual emendations. Nehemiah's name has to be eliminated in Ne. 8:9 (this has the support of 1 Esdras) and Ezra has to be omitted from Ne. 12:36 and possibly 12:26. Ezra and Nehemiah could not both have been associated with the events of Ne. 9, 10. A good working rule is that the greater the textual surgery involved, the greater the improbability of a theory.

3. That Ezra arrived c. 428 BC. This involves a slight emendation, in which the date for Ezra (Ezr. 7:7f.) becomes 'the thirty-seventh year' of Artaxerxes I. This means that Ezra's return would be soon after the commencement of Nehemiah's second term of office. It is surmised that Nehemiah, realizing his own limitations, may even have arranged for Ezra and a company of priests and Levites to return to Jerusalem. This view satisfies the tradition that the two men were contemporaries and allows Ezra's work to complement and complete that of Nehemiah. John Bright is one of many who champion this view strongly and maintains that it solves the problem '. . . in a manner which is, I believe, both plausible and faithful to the evidence' (A History of Israel, 1960, p. 386). The outstanding difficulty is the unanimity of all the versions concerning the date in Ezr. 7:7, 8.

The complexity of this problem is obvious, and the reasons supporting the various views often appear ingenious rather than convincing. Certain difficulties attach to the traditional view but nevertheless it remains the most convincing, although dogmatism is ruled out. It involves no textual surgery or emendations and connects reasonably with the strong evidence for a fresh influx of settlers in Jerusalem and a major attempt to rebuild its walls just prior to Nehemiah's return. Clearly, a great deal was hoped for from this. If this was not under Ezra's leadership it is not easy to account for. If it was the abortive conception of Ezra, designed to bring stability into Jerusalem and thus make religious reform possible, then the difficulties attaching to the earlier part of his career are explicable. The traditional view, therefore, is retained as the best working hypothesis.

THE RELIABILITY OF THE CHRONICLER

One of the assumptions often underlying the rejection of the traditional view is that the Chronicler, through ignorance, has confused the order of Ezra and Nehemiah. The peculiar difficulties attaching to the Chronicler are admitted (see the introductory article to 1 and 2 Chronicles) but this particular suggestion must be resisted. The autobiographical Nehemiah memories are distinct in style and content from the books of Chronicles and Ezra. The present order of Ezra and Nehemiah probably results from the fact that the Chronicler himself added the Nehemiah memoirs to his own work, with no attempt at chronological integration.

There is evidence to suggest that the Chronicler was, in fact, a near contemporary of Ezra and Nehemiah. The Davidic line, in the post-exilic period, is extended to a maximum of six generations; some believe it to be no more than four (1 Ch. 3:15–24). Allowing c. 25 years for a generation, the last-mentioned of the line must be dated soon after 400 BC. Similarly the last-mentioned high priest is Jaddua (presumably the great-grandson of Eliashib, Ne. 12:22), who probably commenced his high priesthood in the early decades of the 4th century BC. Such use of genealogies is admittedly tenuous, since names could be added to complete a list, but at least it provides some evidence for dating purposes. In any case the Chronicler was so close to Ezra and Nehemiah, even allowing a date as late as c. 350 BC, that a major chronological blunder is unlikely. Indeed, the view that Ezra himself was the Chronicler is maintained by W. F. Albright and other leading scholars (W. F. Albright, The Biblical Period from Abraham to Ezra, 1963, p. 95).

SOURCES

As well as the personal memoirs of Ezra and Nehemiah we may note the following: Ezr. 1:1 – 4:7; 6:19–22 is probably a free composition of the Chronicler, utilizing various sources, including possibly the books of Haggai and Zechariah. Ezr. 4:8 – 6:18; 7:12–26 is in Aramaic (the diplomatic language of the period) and contains official correspondence with the Persian authorities, with connecting sections. There are many lists, genealogies, inventories, etc., some of which are integral parts of the Ezra or Nehemiah memoirs. These include Ezr. 1:9–11a; 2:1–70; 7:1–5; 8:1–14; Ne. 3:1–32; 7:1–73; 11:3–36.

EZRA AND JUDAISM

As a result of the Babylonian attack of 588/587 BC, the Davidic line and the kingdom as such virtually came to an end and the Temple was destroyed. The Jews in exile, under the leadership of Ezekiel, reflected on this tragedy and construed it as the chastisement of God for their apostasy. Clearly a new focal point of unity was required unless they were simply to disappear as a nation. This was found in their allegiance to the law, the Mosaic covenant and its attendant symbols of sabbath observance and circumcision. After the return from the Exile, the rebuilt Temple provided a rallying point for the small theocratic community, but the years from 520 BC, when the Temple was dedicated, were years of mediocrity. It was Ezra, building upon the foundation of Nehemiah's political achievements, who gave a new sense of impetus to his people. The law-book which he expounded (Ne. 8:1–8) was certainly not new in content and not necessarily new in form. But Ezra initiated a new era in which the Pentateuch was not simply a book of laws but a manual of instruction covering every detail of life, developed by a technique of exposition which assumed both oral and literary forms. Ezra became the 'father of Judaism' and this way of life, which centred upon an unswerving allegiance to the Torah, not only moulded Jewish life from that point on, but enabled it to survive the searching historical crises of the succeeding centuries. Ezra must not be blamed for the unlovely features of later Judaism. The fact is that his policies saved Judea from oblivion in a particular historical situation.

1:1 – 2:70 THE RETURN FROM EXILE

1:1–4 The decree of Cyrus

The authenticity of this decree need not be doubted. When Cyrus conquered Babylon in 539 BC one of his first acts was to allow the communities which had been deported by the Babylonians to return home. Exception has been taken to the wording of this decree, which seems to suggest that Cyrus was a worshipper of Yahweh. In fact, this is paralleled in the Cyrus Cylinder where he ascribes his victories to Marduk, whilst in a text discovered at Ur it is Sin, the moon-god, who grants him victory. It was the policy of Cyrus to conciliate the indigenous religions of his vast empire. The Hebrew form of the decree appears to be the official, heraldic proclamation to the Jews (cf. 6:1–5).

1 The first year of Cyrus; i.e., the year in which he conquered Babylon. He had been king of Persia since 559 BC. By the mouth of Jeremiah; Cyrus was the instrument through which Yahweh fulfilled His word (cf. Je. 25:11f.; 29:10). 2 He has charged me; cf. Is. 44:28; 45:13. 4 A connection with the Exodus (cf. Je. 16:14, 15) appears in this enrichment of the returning exiles by their neighbours (cf. Ex. 12:35f.).

1:5–11 The response to the decree

6 All that was freely offered; this indicates the offerings designated for the Temple (cf. v. 4b). 7 The vessels of the house of the Lord; Nebuchadrezzar had plundered the Temple in 597 BC and again in 587 BC 2 (cf. Ki. 24:13; 25:13ff.). It was standard practice for a conqueror to place the gods of the vanquished in his own sanctuary (cf., e.g., 1 Sa. 5:2). Since the Jewish faith was imageless, the Temple vessels served as a substitute. The enlightened Cyrus permitted the return of the captured gods and, in this case, the Temple treasures. 8 A problem attaches to the identity of Shesh-bazzar. Some believe that he is to be identified with Zerubbabel. Others distinguish Shesh-bazzar as the uncle or great-uncle of Zerubbabel (cf. 1 Ch. 3:17ff., assuming that Shenazzar is the same as Shesh-bazzar). Possibly Shesh-bazzar died soon after the return. A third view regards Shesh-bazzar as the officially-appointed leader and Zerubbabel as the popular, but unofficial leader. (See on Ezr. 5:14–16.) 9–11 RSV follows 1 Esdras. The Hebrew text is faulty, since the total number of items is actually 5,469 and not 5,400 as the Hebrew states (see RSV mg.). In Hebrew, numbers were written in words in the earlier period; later on letters were used to express them, while in popular Aramaic a sign notation was employed. Understandably, then, numbers were peculiarly susceptible to copyists' errors in transmission. The journey from Babylon to Jerusalem would take approximately 4 months (cf. Ezr. 7:8, 9).

2:1–67 The register of the returned exiles

The same list, with some variations in names and numbers, appears in Ne. 7:6–73 and 1 Esdras 5:4–46. It is not easy to account for the discrepancies. A. Weiser explains the inclusion of the same list twice by the fact that it already stood in the two sources used by the Chronicler, although he observes that the literary connection is looser in Ne. 7 (Introduction to the Old Testament, 1961, p. 322). Others have suggested that later scribes were less meticulous in their copying of the books of the Writings, the third section of the Hebrew Canon. Allied to this there is the possibility that the list of those who returned in 538 BC was modified and expanded to include others who returned subsequently, and even some who, though they had never been in exile, were fully in sympathy with the returned exiles. Seven groups may be distinguished:

2a The leaders. Zerubbabel was either the son of Shealtiel (cf. Ezr. 3:2; Ne. 12:1; Hg. 1:1), or of Pedaiah, brother of Shealtiel (cf. 1 Ch. 3:19). Possibly it was a case of levirate marriage (cf. Dt. 25:5f.). Jeshua, or Joshua, the first high priest after the Exile, was the grandson of Seraiah, the last high priest before the Exile (cf. 2 Ki. 25:18). Nehemiah was not the famous wall-builder. The corresponding lists in Nehemiah and 1 Esdras include twelve names; one appears to have dropped out here, for considerable importance was attached to the number of the tribes (cf. Ezr. 6:17; 8:35). 2b–35 The men of the people of Israel. The family groups are identified either by the names of their ancestors or the names of their towns. 36–39 The priests. The relatively high proportion of priests amongst those who returned was doubtless due to the prospect of a new Temple, with its opportunities of service. 40–42 The Levites. Only 341 Levites returned, in contrast to 4,289 priests! Their inferior status in the post-exilic period probably made them reluctant to return. At a later date Ezra encountered the same tendency (Ezr. 8:15). 43–54 The temple servants (AV 'Nethinims'). This group is mentioned only by the Chronicler (cf. 1 Ch. 9:2; Ezr. 8:20). The name comes from the root of the Hebrew verb 'to give'. A plausible theory, supported by the considerable number of foreign names, is that they were prisoners of war allocated to the Temple for the more mundane tasks (cf. the Gibeonites, Jos. 9:27). They were certainly inferior to the Levites. 55–57 The sons of Solomon's servants (cf. Ne. 11:3). The names in this group are mostly foreign but no pausible explanation of its origin has been advanced. They were probably another group of Temple-labourers. 59–63 Those of uncertain genealogy. Genealogies were of great importance in ancient Israel. A man who had no knowledge of his tribe or clan was under a serious disability, and was specially excluded from the priesthood (v. 62). 61 Barzillai; cf. 2 Sa. 17:27; 19:32–39; 1 Ki. 2:7. 63 The governor (AV 'the Tirshatha'); a Persian title, 'the One to Be Feared', which approximates to 'His Excellency'. It was used of Nehemiah (cf. 8:9; 10:1) but here it refers to either Shesh-bazzar or Zerubbabel. Urim and Thummim (cf. Ex. 28:30; Nu. 27:21; 1 Sa. 14:41f.; 28:6). These were kept in the breastplate of the high priest and were used to ascertain the divine will. Most likely they were marked, flat stones which could be interpreted by the various combinations of the markings. (See NBD, art. 'Urim and Thummim'.) There is no evidence of their actual use in the later period of the monarchy or in the post-exilic period.

64–67 The final statistics. The same total (42,360) is given in Nehemiah and 1 Esdras but in none of the three do the constituent parts add up to this, indicating errors in interpreting numbers or in transmission (see the introductory note on this chapter). It is interesting to observe that no attempt at harmonization has been made. The list of possessions shows that the Jews had accumulated considerable wealth in exile (but cf. 1:4). 65 Singers; these were secular entertainers, in contradistinction to the Levitical singers (v. 41). 66 Horses . . . mules were the more sophisticated beasts of burden.

2:68–70 Arrival in Jerusalem

68 The house of the Lord. Although the Temple was in ruins, the site continued to be used in the exilic period (cf. Je. 41:5). 69 The differences from the Nehemiah account (Ne. 7:70–72) are capable of explanation. The Ezra version is a condensed account in which the offerings of the governor, clan chiefs and the people have been grouped together and a cash estimate of 20,000 gold darics added in lieu of the 50 basins (cf. Ne. 7:70). The precise totals for the silver minas and priests' garments in the Nehemiah version are here represented by round figures. One textual emendation is assumed in the harmonization of the two accounts: it is that the unlikely figure of 530 priests' garments of Ne. 7:70 should read as 500 silver minas and 30 priests' garments.

3:1 – 4:5 THE WORK OF RESTORATION BEGUN

3:1–6 The re-establishment of worship

The first recorded act after the return of the Jews to their homeland was the presentation of their free-will offering (cf. 2:68). The Feast of Booths (i.e. Tabernacles; v. 4), occurring on the 'seventh month' (v. 1), was presumably the first of the three great national feasts after their settlement in their towns, when the people were required to be present at the central sanctuary (cf. Lv. 23:33–36). The great ceremony of Ne. 7:73b – 8:12 took place at the same time of the year. The Feast of Tabernacles, which commemorated the wilderness wanderings, would now also serve as a reminder of the return from the Exile. A comparison with 3:8 makes it clear that this was the seventh month of the first year after their return.

2 Jeshua takes precedence here over Zerubbabel in view of the religious nature of the occasion (cf. 3:8; 5:2; Hg. 1:1, etc.). 3 In honouring the Lord through the erection of the altar on its proper site the people sought to ensure His protection against the peoples of the lands, i.e. the mixed population which was consistently hostile to any attempt to restore Jerusalem's fortunes (cf. on 4:1, 4). 5 The new moon marked the first day of the month and was a holy day. Nu. 28:11–15 lists the offerings for this occasion. Some scholars, on the basis of Isaiah's condemnation (Is. 1:13f.) believe that it was not of Mosaic origin, but the prophets' objection was to the abuse of the cultus, not the cultic practices themselves. 6 The revival of the cult preceded the erection of the Temple.

3:7–13 The laying of the foundations of the Temple

One can readily understand the deep, emotional stresses which such an occasion would produce. A comparison with Je. 33:10, 11 reveals their consciousness of the part they were playing in the fulfilment of prophecy. The tragedy of the national humiliation and the apparent futility of their endeavours would be felt acutely and would conflict with the spontaneous expressions of joy (vv. 12f.).

7 Notice the obvious attempt to follow the pattern of the building of the first Temple (cf. 1 Ki. 5:7–12). 8 The Levites acted as building superintendents. The minimum age before entering full Levitical service was reduced from 25 years (cf. Nu. 8:24) to 20 years in David's reign (cf. 1 Ch. 23:24), presumably to increase the number available. 9 Jeshua was the Levite of 2:40. 10 A comparison with 5:1f. and the book of Haggai shows that little was achieved until 520 BC, apart from the actual laying of the foundations. 11 They sang responsively. The singing was antiphonal, with either two choirs, or a choir and a priest-soloist. This is a feature of many psalms. The words preserved in our text would be the chorus (cf. 1 Ch. 16:34; 2 Ch. 5:13; 7:3; Ps. 136). Steadfast love (Heb. ḥeseḏ) has particular reference to love and loyalty within the covenant relationship.

4:1–5 Opposition in the reign of Cyrus

The opposition hinted at in 3:3 becomes explicit here.

1 The adversaries, or 'the people of the land' as v. 4. The significance of the latter phrase varies considerably in the biblical period. Originally it indicated an influential group, possibly the principal land-owners (cf. 2 Ki. 23:30). Haggai appears to apply it to the returned exiles (Hg. 2:4) whereas his contemporary, Zechariah (c. 520 BC) uses it of those who had not gone into exile (Zc. 7:1–5). By the Chronicler's time (c. 400 BC) it refers to the hybrid population, later known as the Samaritans, descended from groups settled in the area by the Assyrians (cf. 2 Ki. 17:24–41). Since Jerusalem was within the province of Samaria at this time there would be mutual resentment based upon long-standing rivalry. 2 Esar-haddon (681–669 BC) was following the Assyrian practice in this deportation. Such a policy effectively stifled any nationalistic spirit. It would also result in a syncretistic religion, which Hezekiah and Josiah's reformations had been unable to purify (cf. 2 Ki. 23:19; 2 Ch. 30:1–10; 34:6f.). 3 The refusal by Zerubbabel and Joshua constitutes a claim that the newly-restored Jerusalem community was the true Israel. Such an exclusive attitude has been widely criticized, but it is difficult to see how the Jewish faith could have survived apart from the drawing of such sharp distinctions. 4 The fear noted here is exemplified in Zc. 8:10. Haggai shows that selfishness, apathy and procrastination also contributed to the poor morale of the Jews. 5 A comparison with v. 24 shows that the story is resumed at that point.

4:6–23 FURTHER OPPOSITION TO BUILDING PROJECTS

This section interrupts the chronological sequence, but it has been included here because it also deals with opposition to Jewish building projects.

4:6 Opposition in the reign of Xerxes (486–465 BC)

Since the Temple was completed in 515 BC this must refer to more general opposition during the reign of Xerxes (the biblical Ahasuerus). The beginning of his reign; i.e. his accession year. The opponents of the Jews were not wasting any time before exerting pressure on the king.

4:7–23 Opposition in the reign of Artaxerxes I (465–424 BC)

4:8 – 6:18 which contains mostly official correspondence linked by short, narrative sections, is written in Aramaic, the lingua franca of the Empire. The objection in this period was to an attempt to rebuild the wall of Jerusalem (vv. 12, 16). Notice the subtle threefold appeal: the king would suffer financially (v. 13), his honour would be impaired (v. 14) and his Empire would be diminished (v. 16).

8 Rehum and Shimshai may have constituted a permanent royal commission investigating affairs in the provinces. 9 The imposing list adds authority to the letter. 10 Osnappar is the Aramaic equivalent of Ashurbanipal (669–630 BC). Beyond the River. The capitals indicate that this was the official designation of the fifth Persian satrapy, which included all Palestine and Syria. 12 This verse is highly important evidence for a migration of Jews in the reign of Artaxerxes. If the traditional dating of Ezra's return (c. 458 BC) be accepted, the verse could well indicate the group which returned with him. The cessation of the building, which was unauthorized, may have been that reported to Nehemiah (Ne. 1:1ff.). Ezra may have realized that no effective reform could be achieved without the security of a wall, but he had no commission for this, hence the appeal to Nehemiah. Apart from this reconstruction, there is no historically-attested connection for this group. 14 We eat the salt; i.e. 'we are in the king's service'. Covenants were often ratified with salt (cf., e.g., 2 Ch. 13:5). 15 The records of your fathers. This would include the Assyrians and Babylonians, to whom the Persians regarded themselves as lawful successors. 19 Evidence may have been discovered of rebellions in Judah in 701, 601 and 587 BC, amongst others (cf. 2 Ki. 18:7, 13; 24:1, 20). 21 The decision was, in fact, later revoked by the same king (cf. Ne. 2). 23 No time was lost and no energy spared in enforcing the king's decree (cf. again Ne. 1:3).

4:24 – 6:22 THE TEMPLE COMPLETED

4:24 – 5:2 A ministry of encouragement

The date is now 520 BC (cf. Hg. 1:1; Zc. 1:1). The contemporary records of Haggai and Zechariah throw light upon this period, and the former, in particular, shows how the people needed to be stimulated after 16 years of discouragement. Similarly, after so much official opposition, the Jewish leaders would need a great deal of encouragement to sponsor further rebuilding. They received this in full measure from the two prophets.

5:3–17 The challenge to the Jewish rebuilding programme

Tattenai, who is mentioned in a contemporary business document as 'the governor of Trans-Euphratia', appears to have dealt fairly with the Jews, which contrasts with the unmasked hostility of ch. 4. The vigorous nature of the rebuilding project is apparent (v. 8) but there is no hint that it extended beyond the Temple. This militates against the view that it was part of a nationalistic movement, encouraged by the internal dissensions within the Persian Empire after the death of Cambyses in 522 BC.

8 Huge stones; literally 'stones of rolling', i.e. so large that they had to be moved on rollers. 12 The destruction of 587 BC is viewed in a theological perspective, in contrast with the attitude of 4:15. 14–16 The inference is that Shesh-bazzar had died by this time. If, as was suggested in the Introduction, he was the Persian-appointed leader, it would account for the fact that in this official communication he is tactfully mentioned as laying the foundation of the Temple, whereas Zerubbabel, possibly the popular leader, is given prominence in the domestic account (cf. 3:8–11). Understandably, the Jews did not wish to weaken their case by admitting their neglect over a period of 16 years. 17 The decree was not discovered at Babylon, but such was the efficiency of the Persian organization that it was found at Ecbatana (6:2). Tattenai enquires whether the king wishes to ratify the decree, if it be found.

6:1–12 Darius encourages the work of rebuilding

Darius was clearly following, and even extending, the policy inaugurated by Cyrus of encouraging the native religions of his subjects. The care and diligence displayed in this matter reflects creditably upon the Persian administration. The record which was found at Ecbatana was not a formal decree (cf. 1:1–4) but a memorandum containing brief details of the building specifications. Since Cyrus had promised governmental aid this was a necessary formality! In the Elephantine Papyri there is a brief memorandum concerning the rebuilding of the temple there.

2 Ecbatana was a pleasantly-situated fortress which was used as a summer residence by the Persian kings. 3 Its height shall be sixty cubits. Since this is double the height of Solomon's Temple (cf. 1 Ki. 6:2) it is reasonable to assume that it relates to the length of the projected building, which is not otherwise indicated, and that the height has dropped out. 6–12 The original decree of Cyrus is now reinforced by a strongly-worded one from Darius, who probably had Jewish advisers to ensure that the wording was appropriate. There is no direct evidence of lavish official support in Haggai or Zechariah. This is hardly surprising, since all Haggai's prophecies, and most of Zechariah's, were directed at getting the work on the Temple restarted, in the second year of Darius (cf. Hg. 1:1; Zc. 1:1, etc.). The decree of Darius did not come until the work was well advanced (6:8).

6:13–18 The consecration of the Temple

The 'credits' for the rebuilding operation included

Darius, Tattenai and the Jewish elders. But greater prominence attaches to the ministry of Haggai and Zechariah, and especially to God as the ultimate Initiator. The Temple was completed on 12 March 515 BC, a little over 70 years after its destruction. The dedication ceremony has parallels with its prototype in Solomon's reign (cf. 1 Ki. 8), although on a less lavish scale, indicating a smaller and poorer community. 14 Artaxerxes; the mention of this king is anachronistic. He was possibly included here because he, at a later date, contributed to the beautifying of the Temple (cf. 7:21–28).

6:19–22 The celebration of the Passover

The Passover, observed after many of the outstanding events in Israelite history (e.g. Nu. 9:5; Jos. 5:10; 2 Ki. 23:21ff.; 2 Ch. 30), followed one month after the dedication of the Temple. Passover marked the beginning of the year in the Mosaic legislation (cf. Ex. 12:2), but due to the influence of the Canaanite (autumn–autumn) calendar it was the Tabernacles feast-complex which commenced the year during the period of the monarchy. In the post-exilic period, Passover assumed its rightful place, doubtless influenced by the spring–spring calendar of Babylonia. 21 Two groups are indicated; the returned exiles, and those who had not been in captivity but were prepared to make a clean break with the idolatrous practices of the Samaritans, etc. The returned exiles were not completely isolationist, but their objection to the Samaritans was based on religious grounds which were not insurmountable. 22 Had turned the heart of the king of Assyria. Notice how the Chronicler traces God's influence upon heathen emperors (e.g. 1:1; 7:27). The reference to the king of Assyria is an obvious scribal error, although Darius, of course, reigned over the territory formerly held by the Assyrians.

7:1 – 8:36 EZRA'S RETURN TO JERUSALEM

7:1–28 Artaxerxes appoints and sponsors Ezra

If the traditional date for Ezra's return (458 BC, see discussion in the Introduction) be accepted, then almost 60 years divide chs. 6 and 7. This period, apart from the brief reference in 4:6, is one of complete obscurity, only illumined by the possibility that the book of Malachi dates from c. 465 BC. What happened to Zerubbabel is conjectural. Most likely his death, and that of Joshua the high priest, brought an end to the high hopes that centred upon them (cf. Hg. 2:20–23; Zc. 6:9–14). Until Ezra and Nehemiah returned to Jerusalem and brought order and stability into its life, the life of the despised community of the Jews followed a very mediocre course.

7:1–5 Ezra's genealogy. This is obviously selective, its intention being to trace back Ezra's line to Aaron himself. A comparison with other data (e.g. 1 Ch. 6:3–15) helps us to fill in the gaps. Son of is frequently equivalent to 'descendant of'.

7:6–10 Ezra's journey to Jerusalem. In the pre-exilic period a scribe was no more than a secretary (cf., e.g., 2 Sa. 8:17; 1 Ch. 27:32), but after the Exile, when prophecy declined and the authority of the law became paramount, the office of scribe increased in importance. The best summary of the duties of a scribe is found in v. 10. He was both the preserver and the interpreter of the law. 7 The seventh year of Artaxerxes. For a full discussion on the identity of this king and possible emendations of the year, see the Introduction. The 4-month journey from Babylonia would be about 900 miles.

7:11–26 The letter of Artaxerxes. Doubt has been cast upon the authenticity of this letter because of its markedly Jewish tone and the extremely generous support which is promised. The former objection may be answered by assuming that Ezra himself, in his official position as 'Secretary of State for Jewish Religious Affairs' (such is the implication of v. 12) drew up the letter. The latter objection is weakened by the undoubted generosity of other Persian kings; such a price was a small one to pay for peace and stability in part of the Empire. The scope of Ezra's ministry included the entire area of the fifth Persian satrapy (see on 4:10) and allowed him the right to appoint magistrates over all Jewish communities. This would include the Samaritans and explains their attitude to Ezra, whom they styled 'Ezra the accursed'. The purpose was to secure conformity to recognized Jewish practice. In the light of this, it is unlikely that 'the book of the law' (see on Ne. 8:1 where this matter is further discussed), with which Ezra was associated, was a new creation, or there would be the risk of upsetting the Jerusalem (and other) communities, thereby promoting discord rather than concord. Considerable incentives to return were given to the priests, etc. (v. 24). 25, 26 The implementation of these provisions, if taken literally, must have involved Ezra in a great deal of travelling over an extended period. This may account for the relative silence of the years between 458 and 445 BC.

7:27, 28 The commencement of Ezra's memoirs. The abrupt change to the first person reveals the autobiographical nature of the account. These verses and the remainder of the book are in Hebrew. The character of Ezra, though not as clearly delineated as Nehemiah's, is revealed in the outburst of praise to God. His exultation over the beautifying of the Temple reveals the heart of a priest. His natural timidity, revealed here and in 8:21ff., was overcome by the consciousness that the hand of the Lord my God was upon me.

8:1–14 The list of those who returned with Ezra

There are slight differences between this list and its counterpart in 1 Esdras 8:28–40. Here the total is 1,496, while in 1 Esdras it is 1,690.

13 Those who came later translates one Hebrew word, 'last'. It may indicate, as the RSV infers, that other, smaller groups followed Ezra's company.

8:15–23 Preparations for departure

For a possible reason for the poor Levitical response see on 2:40ff. Such a situation would greatly inconvenience the programme which Ezra was to implement, and hence his urgent appeal for reinforcements. Before th eparty set off, a fast was held at the assembly point. The background of this is more than just the natural hazards of a long journey; it was a time of great unrest, particularly in the western half of the Persian Empire. Clearly Ezra considered an escort to be necessary, but since this betokened lack of faith in the Lord the alternative was to rest implicity upon Him. Nehemiah, who was not travelling with a large company, had no qualms about accepting an escort (cf. Ne. 2:9).

15 Ahava (cf. v. 21); the site of both the river and the town are unknown. 17 The place Casiphia is also unidentified. The concentration of cultic personnel may indicate that there was a Jewish temple there, as at Elephantine. The word for 'place' is used of the Temple itself in 9:8.

8:24–30 The custody of the Temple treasures

The value of these gifts was well over a million pounds but this is by no means inconceivable in view of the immense wealth of the Persian Empire.

24 (Cf. vv. 18, 19, 30.) There were twelve priests and twelve Levites.

8:31–36 The journey to Jerusalem

31 A comparison with 7:9 shows that all the preliminary preparations, including the fast, were completed in 12 days. 32 Nehemiah took a similar rest period (cf. Ne. 2:11), necessary after such an arduous journey. 36 The king's satraps. There was normally only one satrap in the province Beyond the River, with several subordinate governors. Possibly the terms were used somewhat loosely. The non-reference to a governor in Jerusalem is not determinative in view of Ne. 5:14ff.

9:1 – 10:44 THE PROBLEM OF MIXED MARRIAGES

9:1–5 The magnitude of the problem

Ezra had been in Jerusalem about 4½ months (cf. 8:31; 10:9) when the officials brought to his notice the problem of mixed marriages. The offenders were probably those who had returned with Zerubbabel; many of them had established families (cf. 10:44), which rules out those who returned with Ezra. 10:18–43 lists 111 guilty men. The law of Deuteronomy (e.g. Dt. 7:1–5) warns of the pernicious effects of mixed marriages, and the history of Israel from the period of the judges onwards exemplifies this (e.g. Jdg. 3:5f.). Hence the firm line taken by Ezra. The same stand was taken by Nehemiah (Ne. 13:23–28) and Malachi (Mal. 2:11, 13ff.) which suggests that this was a recurring problem, possibly due to a preponderance of men amongst those who returned.

3 It was customary to show grief by rending garments and by shaving the hair (cf. Jb. 1:20; Ezk. 7:18). Ezra's extreme measures betoken the intensity of his concern. Notice that his appeal was moral and religious, with no appeal to his official status or power. Reformation can never be achieved by force.

9:6–15 Ezra's vicarious intercession

Ezra's prayer and confession should be compared with Ne. 9:6–38 and Dn. 9:4–19. He does not stand apart from his people and coldly condemn them. Rather, although personally guiltless, he fully identifies himself with them in their guilt and need, an example to all would-be intercessors. The danger was that God's judgment would again fall upon His people, as it had in the events leading up to the Exile, but without the promise of a remnant to provide for a new beginning (vv. 8, 14). But apart from this element of divine chastisement, there is no doubt that had the practice of intermarriage been continued and extended, then the Jews would speedily have lost their national identity. Similarly, the NT warns against marriage with unbelievers (cf. 2 Cor. 6:14).

8 A secure hold, literally 'a nail' or 'tent-pin'. The reference is a figurative one; just as a tent-peg secures the whole tent, so those who returned from exile to rebuild the Temple and re-establish its cultus were the support of the whole nation. 9 Protection (lit. 'a wall'); it is doubtful if any attempt at rebuilding the wall (as in 4:7–23) had been undertaken so soon after Ezra's return. Therefore the reference is best understood figuratively, as in the RSV.

10:1–44 The situation remedied

The vivid detail of this chapter suggests that it once formed part of Ezra's memoirs. Possibly the Chronicler adapted it, changing the account to the third person and possibly shortening it, e.g. in the foreshortened speech of v. 10f.

10:1–5 The impact of Ezra's prayer. 1 It is unwarranted to suggest, as does Batten in the ICC, that Ezra's prayer 'was evidently intended to produce an effect upon the audience rather than upon God, perhaps like many other public prayers'. Nevertheless, the effect of such evident concern was dramatic. It prompted the people to take a certain initiative themselves which would guarantee greater success than a reformation forced upon them. 2 Their spokesman, Shecaniah, does not appear in the list of offenders. 3 A covenant was the most binding form of self-committal (cf. 2 Ch. 15:12–15).

10:6–17 Procedure for dealing with the situation. The sense of urgency which activated the Jews is shown in their prompt assembly at a most unpropitious time from the point of view of the weather. All but an insignificant minority, whose view was nonetheless noted (v. 15), were in favour of reform, and a committee of investigation seemed the most propitious way of dealing with an evidently large-scale problem. 6 There is no suggestion that either Jehohanan or Eliashib was high priest at this time. According to Josephus, who follows the traditional dating, Joiakim, the father of Eliashib, was the high priest when Ezra arrived in Jerusalem. Both his son Eliashib and his great-grandson Jehohanan could have had private rooms in the Temple precincts. 9 The ninth month; i.e. December, when the heavy rain could be bitterly cold. 14 The local officials, accompanying the offenders, would ensure accuracy of detail. 16, 17 The committee took three months to complete its investigations.

10:18–44 The list of guilty men. The RSV lists 111 men (17 priests, 10 Levites, 84 men of Israel), an emendation of v. 38 reducing by two the 113 of the AV. The length of time in the investigation may suggest that other cases were considered in which divorce proceedings were not considered necessary. The unhappiness caused by these broken homes must be set not only against the initial transgression involved in the contracting of the marriages, but also against the ultimate blessing to the whole world that could only come through a purified community. The offence had to be dealt with sternly, and sentiment was not allowed to influence the profound principles involved.

COMMENTARY

1:1 – 2:11 NEHEMIAH RETURNS TO JERUSALEM

1:1–3 The appeal to Nehemiah

This was undoubtedly an effort to secure the support of Nehemiah, an important official with access to the Persian king. An attempt to rebuild the wall in Jerusalem, which cannot be other than that noted in Ezr. 4:7–23, had ended disastrously and the Jews desperately needed a friend in high places.

1 The words of Nehemiah. This introduces the 'Nehemiah memoirs', one of the outstanding autobiographical masterpieces of the ancient world. The month Chislev was the ninth month. The twentieth year; archaeological evidence makes it certain that this was in the reign of Artaxerxes I (see the discussion on the date of Nehemiah's return in the Introduction). But there is a copyist's error either here or in 2:1, where the date is Nisan, the first month. Probably 1:1 should be emended to 'the nineteenth year'. Susa was the winter capital of the Persian kings. 2 Hanani; cf. 7:2.

1:4–11 The response of Nehemiah

Nehemiah was probably in close touch with the Jerusalem community and he may have known of the attempt to rebuild its wall. But there was a grave personal risk involved if he championed the cause of a distressed Jerusalem, since his master had accepted the estimate of Jerusalem as a rebellious and seditious city, and ordered an end to the illegal building operations (cf. Ezr. 4:17–22). Any request to Artaxerxes would involve asking him to rescind a decree made no more than a few years before. Like Ezra (Ezr. 9:6–15) and Daniel (Dn. 9:4–19), Nehemiah shows his complete identification with his people, accepting the rightness of God's judgments (v. 8) but recalling also the graciousness of the divine promises (vv. 5, 9). Nehemiah knew the law and quoted from such passages as Lv. 26:33 and Dt. 30:1–5. If the suggested emendation to the year (v. 1) be accepted, then this period of waiting upon God and seeking the propitious moment lasted 4 months.

11 Cupbearer. This was a position of complete trust. Nehemiah would not be the only cupbearer, but it would give him access to the king. His main duty was to taste the wine in the presence of the king to ensure that it was not poisoned. Most officials in this position were eunuchs, and since there is no indication that Nehemiah was married it is unlikely that he was an exception.

2:1–8 Nehemiah seizes his opportunity

The sense of high drama is preserved in the narrative. Such was the absolute power of a monarch of this period that to appear sad in his presence could cause dismissal or death. Sadness, after all, might suggest the dissatisfaction of a plotter. In this sharp crisis Nehemiah retained his composure and had the courage to mention, in general terms, the cause of his distress. Artaxerxes was discriminating enough to realize that there was a question underlying Nehemiah's observation. To Nehemiah this was the crucial moment. The extended prayers of the previous 4 months were now followed by the shortest of 'holy telegrams'. The prayer life of Nehemiah is itself an absorbing study (cf. 1:4–11; 2:4; 4:4f., 9; 5:19; 6:9, 14; 13:14, 22, 29, 31). A comparison with 5:14 shows that Nehemiah's appointment as governor of Jerusalem was made about this time. This involved the separation of Judea from Samaria. There is evidence that shortly before this incident there was a revolt by Megabyzos, satrap of Beyond the River, and the creation of an independent Judea, with a governor loyal to the king, may have seemed a wise measure to Artaxerxes.

1 Nisan. For a discussion on the date see on 1:1. 6 I set him a time. Nehemiah actually returned after 12 years (cf. 13:6) but this was probably extended from an earlier agreed period. 7f. Nehemiah had obviously given careful thought to what would be required, a characteristic feature of the man.

2:9–11 Nehemiah arrives in Jerusalem

No time-reference is supplied. Sanballat and Tobiah, who would learn of Nehemiah's plans through the official correspondence, immediately assumed their role of chief opponents. This would be primarily political, since Samaria would no longer control Judea. Sanballat is mentioned in an Elephantine Papyrus, dated 408 BC, as governor of Samaria. The names of his sons, Delaiah and Shelemiah, suggest that he worshipped Yahweh. Possibly he was born in Beth-horon, in Ephraim. Tobiah probably governed the area east of Judea. He was either subordinate to Sanballat, or hand in glove with him (cf. 4:1–3; 6:12, 14).

2:12 – 3:32 THE BUILDING OF THE WALL COMMENCED

2:12–16 Nehemiah's preliminary survey

Nehemiah's capacity for detailed planning (cf. vv. 7f.) is again in evidence. His secret reconnaissance would acquaint him with the actual situation and thus enable him to deal with any opposition through an 'it-can't-be-done' attitude. The city walls at this period were probably limited to the north-eastern and south-easten hills. 13 The Valley Gate, Nehemiah's starting-point, was probably on the south wall, in the south-west corner of the city. The Dung Gate was c. 500 yards (cf. 3:13) to the east. 14 If the King's Pool was the Pool of Siloam, then the Fountain Gate was on the eastern wall; 15 and the valley was the Kidron. Nehemiah then retraced his steps, making no attempt at a complete circuit. Recent archaeological excavation reveals that the area he covered was, in fact, the critical one, where the destruction of walls and buildings on a very steep slope had caused a completely chaotic state of affairs. It is now known that Nehemiah made no attempt to follow the existing line of the wall in this area but built his wall upon the ridge of the south-eastern hill (Ophel), i.e. above the area of acute destruction.

2:17–20 Nehemiah encourages the people to build

Nehemiah could now speak with personal experience. But no doubt the greatest factor in his appeal to the people was his remarkable testimony to the way in which God had controlled matters to that point. The shadow of opposition was not long in coming, however; clearly Sanballat had his informants in Jerusalem. Nehemiah confronts this with a strong faith in the living God.

19 Geshem; John Bright describes him as 'known from inscriptions as a powerful chieftain of Qedar (Dedan) in north-western Arabia. Under nominal Persian control, he governed the province of Arabia, which at this time included both Edom and Southern Judah. Nehemiah had enemies on all sides' (op. cit., p. 366). Are you rebelling . . . This was sheer bluff on Sanballat's part, but such a policy of intimidation, with the events noted in Ezr. 4:23 still painfully fresh in Jewish minds, had every prospect of success. 20 You have no portion or right or memorial in Jerusalem. This forthright declaration of particularism was precipitated by the unswerving animosity of Sanballat and his friends.

3:1–32 The list of builders

It is not certain that Nehemiah was the author of this section. More likely the list was preserved in the Temple and subsequently incorporated by the Chronicler. Only the leaders of the 42 sections are named. The name of Ezra is not mentioned and there is uncertainty whether any of those who returned with him can be positively identified. This is not decisive evidence that Ezra and his party returned after Nehemiah. Those mentioned would be, in the main, well-established citizens of Jerusalem. If Ezra was in Jerusalem at this time, he, like Nehemiah who is also unmentioned, would probably be in an official supervisory capacity. The description commences with the Sheep Gate, at the eastern end of the north wall and proceeds in an anti-clockwise direction. All classes participated in the project, including priests (v. 1), goldsmiths and perfumers (v. 8), rulers and the womenfolk (v. 12), Levites (v. 17) and merchants (v. 32).

1 The high priest and a priestly group with him gave a good lead to the people. 5 The Tekoites were the inhabitants of Tekoah, about 10 miles south of Jerusalem. Their rulers were either in sympathy with Sanballat or afraid of reprisals if they openly identified themselves with Nehemiah. Their territory was on the fringes of civilization, adjacent to the area controlled by Geshem (cf. 2:19). The jarring note which this verse introduces is compensated for by the mention in v. 27 of the extra portion which the Tekoites built. Other groups also accepted a second allocation (e.g. vv. 11, 19–21, 24, 30). Evidence of an incomplete list is provided by the fact that the first allocation of some of these is not recorded (e.g. v. 11). 10 Opposite his house (cf. v. 30b). Nehemiah seems to have followed a policy of assigning men to their own local section of the wall, where they would have a personal interest in the security provided by a well-constructed section (cf. 4:14).

4:1 – 7:4 THE WALL COMPLETED IN SPITE OF OPPOSITION

4:1–6 Opposition by ridicule

This was the first of a series of attempts to thwart the rebuilding operations. Although Samaria, Judea, etc., were within the Persian Empire, local rivalries were not precluded. But there was a limit to these, and Sanballat was probably influenced by the knowledge of the favour which the king had shown to Nehemiah. Ridicule, far from being an innocuous weapon, often succeeds in discouraging an enterprise where more direct methods fail.

2 Will they finish up in a day? A sarcastic question inspired by the prodigious activity of the Jews. And burned ones at that. The effect of fire is to crack and so weaken the slabs of stone. The accusation here and in v. 3 is that this was a jerry-built structure. 4f. The imprecatory prayers of the OT, inconsistent with Christian standards, were within the context of the covenant relationship with Yahweh, whose honour was involved in this attack on His people. 6 For the people had a mind to work. This, together with Nehemiah's dynamic leadership, made for the success of the project.

4:7–23 Opposition by the threat of armed intervention

Jerusalem was now completely surrounded by hostile factions: Samaria to the north, Ammon on the east, Geshem and his Arabs to the south and Ashdod, a former Philistinian city now the centre of another Persian administration unit, to the west. A direct confrontation was out of the question, since Artaxerxes had authorized the building, and so a policy of infiltration and terrorist activity was planned. Nehemiah countered this by careful planning, based on sound psychology; the people would resist tenaciously when their own families were in jeopardy (cf. 7:3). There seems to have been a period of acute danger when work was completely suspended (vv. 13ff.). After this, the building was resumed in an atmosphere of instant readiness for defence.

9 Notice this OT counterpart to 'Praise the Lord and keep your powder dry'. Reliance upon God is not incompatible with the taking of sensible precautions. 10 A supplementary discouragement was the very immensity of the task. Archaeology witnesses to the thoroughness of the Babylonian destruction of 587 BC. 11, 12 The whispering attack was particularly effective amongst the Jews who lived in outlying areas and to whom Sanballat and his associates had readier access. 14 Remember the Lord; Nehemiah frequently recalls the people to their basic trust in Yahweh (cf. vv. 9, 20). 22 This measure strengthened the reserves of manpower in the capital, but would make the provincial cities more vulnerable. The attitude of the nobles of Tekoa (cf. 3:5) may have been influenced by this consideration. 23 The men of the guard; a contingent of Persian soldiers is probably indicated, although the main escort party (cf. 2:9) had probably returned by this time. Each kept his weapon in his hand, Hebrew 'each one his weapon the water'. The precise meaning is not clear, but the inference is that complete preparedness was maintained, whether when washing (as AV delightfully suggests), or during any other activity.

5:1–19 Nehemiah's social and economic measures

Since Nehemiah is unlikely to have called a great assembly (v. 7) in the middle of an urgent reconstruction scheme, and since v. 14 is clearly retrospective, it is usually held that these events took place after the rebuilding of the wall. It is just possible that the economic pressures caused by the building programme, in which most normal income would be suspended, brought the underlying abuses of vv. 1–5 into such prominence that Nehemiah was forced to give urgent attention to them.

5:1–13 Social injustices remedied. Three classes were involved: the landless, who were desperately short of food (v. 2); landowners who, because of a severe famine, had been compelled to mortgage their properties (v. 3); those forced to borrow money at exhorbitant rates to meet the Persian taxation upon property (v. 4). The lament of v. 5 is probably a composite one, reflecting the condition of all three groups. Slavery within Israel was permitted, within well-defined limits (cf., e.g., Ex. 21:2–11; Lv. 25:39–43; Dt. 15:12–18), but interest was not to be charged on loans to poor fellow-Israelites (cf. Ex. 22:25; Lv. 25:35ff.; Dt. 23:19f.). Nehemiah's relief measures included the return of all alienated property and the cessation of future payment of interest, thus allowing those who had borrowed money to pay off the capital sum in due course. 8 The Jewish nobles, taking advantage of Nehemiah, had sold their fellows to foreign masters, knowing that Nehemiah's policy was to buy them back. 9 Notice the appeal to the national conscience and testimony to other nations. 10 Nehemiah admits that he has been forced into the policies he now wishes to outlaw. One assumes that his interest charges were more reasonable than those of others. 11 The hundredth of money, etc., probably relates to the monthly interest rate. 13 I also shook out my lap. A gesture symbolizing complete rejection.

5:14–19 Nehemiah's unselfish government. In a completely guileless manner Nehemiah catalogues his praiseworthy achievements as governor, against a background of the exhorbitant demands normally made by a man in his position. 14f. Normally the people would be taxed for the support of the governor's establishment. The former governors who were before me. Not a reference to Shesh-bazzar or Zerubbabel but to those immediately preceding Nehemiah, either the governor of Samaria or a subordinate official at Jerusalem. 16 Nehemiah and his servants had taken their full share in the rebuilding programme. 17f. He extended generous, but not ostentatious, hospitality (cf. the provision made for Solomon's household, 1 Ki. 4:22f.). 19 (Cf. 13:14, 22, 31) Nehemiah's memoirs may have been a votive offering presented to the Lord in the Temple.

6:1–14 Further opposition to the rebuilding of the wall

6:1–4 Opposition by intrigue. The progress on the wall having advanced so swiftly that the danger of armed attack was considerably lessened, Sanballat and his accomplices now attacked the leader himself. Their aim was to lure him away from his supporters in Jerusalem, to make his assassination easier, or to facilitate an attack upon Jerusalem in his absence. 2 Ono was 'neutrally' situated between the provinces of Ashdod and Samaria, but it was 19 miles from Jerusalem.

6:5–9 Opposition by blackmail. The earlier expedient having failed on four occasions, a fifth attempt was made to intimidate Nehemiah. An open letter was one that could, and therefore would, be read by anyone who handled it, thus broadcasting the innuendo. It was written upon a fragment of pottery, leather or papyrus. Two points lent weight to this attack: Geshem was an important official whose word would carry weight with the Persian authorities; and the insinuation concerning Nehemiah's pretensions to the throne might have a ring of plausibility to a Persia very sensitive to any suggestion of rebellion, especially in the light of past events in this area. Nehemiah refused to bow to this pressure, giving the answer of complete integrity and seeking added strength from the Lord.

6:10–14 An attempt to discredit Nehemiah. Since Tobiah is twice mentioned first (vv. 12, 14) it is assumed that, with his known contacts in Judah (vv. 17ff.), he took the lead in this plan. 10 Shemaiah, a prophet (v. 12), is unknown apart from this passage. The inference is that he claimed to have a special revelation for Nehemiah concerning a plot on his life. His suggestion to Nehemiah that they might meet a second time in the Holy Place of the Temple, from which all but the priests were specifically excluded on pain of death (cf. Nu. 18:7), would give Nehemiah a bad reputation and alienate the priests, if acted upon. Less likely is the view that Shemaiah was inviting Nehemiah to seek sanctuary in the Temple. Shut up can hardly mean that he was ceremonially unclean, since this would debar him from the Temple. Possibly it refers to a state of prophetic ecstasy. 14 False prophecy seems united in opposition to Nehemiah, as it was to his counterparts in pre-exilic Jerusalem.

6:15–19 The wall completed

The task was completed in an unbelievably short period, although doubtless a certain 'touching up' was done later. The fact of divine assistance, implied throughout the narrative, was evident even to their adversaries.

15 Elul was the sixth month, i.e. August–September. From the point of view of agriculture the building operations were well timed, coming between the main cereal-harvest and the vintage-harvest. 18f. The daughter of Meshullam. Meshullam was one of the leading wall-builders (cf. 3:4, 30). Nehemiah faced a well-organized fifth column amongst his own leading citizens but there is no suggestion that he took any reprisals against its members.

7:1–4 Safety precautions in Jerusalem

The practically-minded Nehemiah did not rest on the security afforded by the newly-constructed wall, but took steps to see that an adequate guard, under loyal supervision, was established. Later on he was to deal with the problem of a sparsely-populated Jerusalem (cf. 11:1f.).

1 All three classes mentioned could be Temple personnel. The problem of available and dependable men for guard duties must have been considerable. 2 Hanani and Hannaniah. The name, in its shorter or longer form, was a common one (cf. 3:8). The need for trustworthy leadership is emphasized by 6:18f. 3 Each opposite his own house. Another instance of a wise understanding of human nature (cf. on 3:10; 4:14).

7:5 – 13:3 OTHER EVENTS DURING NEHEMIAH'S FIRST TERM OF OFFICE

7:5–73a The register of those who returned with Zerubbabel

This list, which was probably stored in the Temple archives, was probably the basis of Nehemiah's repopulation measures (cf. 11:1f.). It is made quite clear that it is not Nehemiah's own census-list (vv. 5f.). The list is practically identical with that of Ezr. 2, where see notes.

7:73b – 8:18 The great law-reading ceremony

7:73b – 8:8 The law read and expounded. In 1 Esdras the account of Ezra's reading of the law follows Ezr. 10 and the name of Nehemiah is missing (cf. Ne. 8:9). It is questionable whether such a ceremony as this could have been arranged before Nehemiah brought security to the city, and order out of the heaps of rubble. The chapter, then, is best located in its present position, although it may be the Chronicler's paraphrase of what was originally a part of the Ezra memoirs. It is instructive to note that the initiative (8:1) appears to come from the people, although the readiness with which Ezra and his company were able to comply suggests that it was a contrived initiative. It appears that this was the first time that the law had been read or expounded (cf. v. 12b) in this way, since the reaction caught the leaders by surprise (v. 9).

8:1 The book of the law of Moses. It has been commonly supposed that this was the priestly code, brought by Ezra from Babylon, and which subsequently became the framework of the completed Pentateuch. Such a view labours under the grave disability that the Samaritans, who hated Ezra and could not conceivably have received anything from him, accepted the completed Pentateuch. It is plausible to suggest therefore that the Pentateuch had been completed long before this, that it was this which was read by Ezra, and that the reaction of the people was due to their ignorance of its provisions. 4 The number of Ezra's assistants varies in the versions. 5f. The reverent attention to the Torah, and the attitude of standing during its reading, were to become characteristic of later synagogual Judaism. 8 They read . . . clearly. This could refer (with RSV mg.) to an extempore translation; possibly some of the people understood only Aramaic, not Hebrew (cf. 13:24).

8:9–12 The reaction of the people. There are similarities to the response of Josiah when the lost 'book of the law' was read to him (cf. 2 Ki. 22:8–13). It needed considerable effort on the part of the leaders (probably Ezra is the speaker in v. 10) to convince the people that the day was one of rejoicing. 9 The name of Nehemiah is absent from 1 Esdras, which also misreads 'the governor' for a proper noun 'Attharates'. Some would therefore advocate omitting Nehemiah's name as a later gloss. Possibly the omission in 1 Esdras was deliberate, since the writer was concerned solely with Ezra, not Nehemiah.

8:13–18 The celebration of the Feast of Booths (Tabernacles). The essential character of this festival was thanksgiving (cf. Dt. 16:13ff.; compare the detail of Lv. 23:33–43). It was known in Solomon's time (cf. 1 Ki. 8:2) and by Hosea in the northern kingdom (cf. Ho. 12:9); it was observed in the preceding century by Zerubbabel and his company (cf. Ezr. 3:4). Yet its detailed provisions were unknown even amongst the religious leaders (v. 13f.)! The answer probably lies in the fact that the character of Tabernacles changed fundamentally under Canaanite influence, during the monarchic period, becoming the feast associated with the Davidic covenant (cf. 2 Sa. 7) and losing something of its connection with the wilderness period, in Judah at any rate. The reading of the law was one of the prescribed features of Tabernacles (cf. Dt. 31:9–13). No mention is made of the Day of Atonement, held on the tenth day of the seventh month, just before the Feast of Tabernacles (fifteenth to the twenty-second day of the month). The Chronicler must have known of the existence of this feast and could have included it in his account had it been kept at this particular time.

9:1–37 The great national confession

A majority of scholars accept that this chapter originally followed Ezr. 10, which would allow for a three-week interval between the two events (Ne. 9:1; cf. Ezr. 10:17). This arrangement makes good sense, since both occasions were connected with the fact of separation from non-Israelites (Ne. 9:2). Such plausibility does not eliminate the possibility of a connection with Ne. 8–10, wherein the conviction of sin, caused by the reading of the law and temporarily suppressed by the leaders as inconsistent with a joyous occasion (8:9–12), is now allowed to find its natural expression two days after the conclusion of the Feast of Booths. In this new ceremony three hours of reading the law were followed by three hours of confession and worship (9:3).

Ezra's prayer (vv. 5–38) opens with an acknowledgment of God's majesty and then continues with a recital of the major turning-points of Israel's history. The first of these is the call of Abraham (vv. 7f.), which was virtually the beginning of history for the Hebrews. The next turning-point is the Exodus and the giving of the law (vv. 9–14). In the wilderness period God's gracious mercy contrasted with the waywardness of His people (vv. 15–23). God's favour was again shown in the conquest of Canaan (vv. 24f.) but Israel continued to be rebellious, in spite of the warnings of the prophets and the deliverances wrought by the judges (vv. 26, 27, 30). God had chastised His people through other nations, yet with forbearance and purpose (vv. 30f.) and this had at last produced the humility and repentance and absolute trust that was an essential element in the covenant between Him and Israel.

4f. No convincing explanation has been given of the differences between the names in vv. 4 and 5. 14 Thou didst make known . . . thy holy sabbath. The command concerning the sabbath is in the ethical Decalogue (Ex. 20:8ff.), the book of the covenant (Ex. 23:12) and the ritual Decalogue (Ex. 34:21), suggesting that it was a foundational element in Israelite religion. It was made a covenant sign at the time of the Exodus.

9:38 – 10:27 The leaders who participated in the covenant

10:1 The signatories occur in the reverse order of 9:38. Nehemiah the governor. If these events be connected with Ezr. 10 (see introductory note to Ne. 9:1–37), then Nehemiah's name must be removed as a gloss if the traditional view concerning Ezra's return, or the view that he returned in 398 BC, be held. Zedekiah; otherwise unknown, but his position, between the governor and the priests, suggests that he was a person of consequence. 2–8 Most of these names recur in 12:1–7. As only four priestly families arrived with Zerubbabel (cf. Ezr. 2:36–39), others may have developed from them or arrived subsequently. 9–13 All but four of the Levites are mentioned in 8:7; 9:4, 5; 12:8. 14–27 Variations in the list of the leading secular families when compared with Ezr. 2 may be due to such variable factors as movements, subdivisions or even the extinction of families.

10:28–39 Provisions of the covenant

The stipulations of the covenant included the forbidding of mixed marriages (v. 30), details of sabbath-observance and the sabbatical year (v. 31) and the provision of an adequate income for the maintenance of the cultus (vv. 32–39). An obvious connection between these and the reforms initiated by Nehemiah during his second term of office (13:10–31) has led some scholars to suppose that this covenant was part of Nehemiah's policy to eradicate such anomalies. More likely is the view that his anger on that occasion was vented against those very abuses which the people had solemnly covenanted to rectify only about 12 years before.

30 This was a recurring problem in this period (cf. Ezr. 9, 10; Ne. 13:23–27). 31 The law does not specifically exclude sabbath trading but this was clearly understood (cf., e.g., Je. 17:21, 22; Am. 8:5). For the law of the sabbatical year see Lv. 25:2–7; Dt. 15:1ff. These provisions, which would have alleviated the recent distress in Jerusalem and district (cf. Ne. 5:1–4) were apparently not observed at any stage in Israel's history prior to this point, largely through the pressures of vested interests (cf. 2 Ch. 36:21, where the 70-year exile is viewed as punishment for this non-observance of this custom during 70 sabbatical years, i.e. 490 years). 32 The third part of a shekel was less than the recognized amount (cf. Ex. 30:13; Mt. 17:24), probably owing to the impoverished economic situation. 34 The wood-offering; this stipulation is a natural development from the command to keep the altar fire continually burning (cf. Lv. 6:12f.) 37 The tithes of cattle are not mentioned here (cf. Lv. 27:32) although the firstborn are mentioned in v. 36 (cf. Nu. 18:15–18). Possibly there was a shortage of cattle at this time of poverty which made some relaxation of the law desirable.

11:1 – 12:26 Lists of inhabitants

11:1–24 Citizens of Jerusalem. The list of vv. 3–19, with minor variations, corresponds with that in 1 Ch. 9:2–17, and probably relates to those already resident in Jerusalem. It includes the rulers (vv. 3–9), priests (vv. 10–14), Levites (vv. 15–18) and gatekeepers (v. 19). These were augmented by a compulsory 10 p.c. levy drawn from surrounding areas and an unspecified number of volunteers (v. 2). 20–24 Amongst some general notes concerning the oversight of the Temple personnel there are two items of peculiar interest: v. 23 an imperial provision was made for certain classes; v. 24 a representative of the Jewish people was in attendance at the Persian court. The likelihood of these arrangements is increased by documentary evidence of the nature of Persian rule, particularly the interest shown in religious affairs.

11:25–36 Villages occupied by the Jews. The verses list towns and villages in the former territories of Judah (vv. 25–30) and Benjamin (vv. 31–36). No reason can be given for the non-mention of important settlements mentioned elsewhere in Ezra and Nehemiah, e.g. Tekoah (Ne. 3:5), Beth-zur (3:16), Bethlehem (7:26). Kiriath-jearim (7:29), Jericho (7:36), etc. 25 Kiriath-arba; the old name of Hebron (cf. Jos. 14:15). 30 From Beer-sheba to the valley of Hinnom, i.e. from the southern to the northern boundaries of Judah.

12:1–9 Priests and Levites who returned with Zerubbabel. The Chronicler has grouped together several lists in 12:1–26. The interpretation of these is most difficult. The four priestly families of Ezr. 2, with the exception of Passhur, are mentioned here. The extra names probably relate to their descendants in Nehemiah's day, the building of the Temple and the development of the cultus calling for extra, specialist family groups.

12:10f. The genealogy of post-exilic high priests. This is a continuation of the list of 1 Ch. 6:3–15. Eliashib was the contemporary of Nehemiah (cf. 3:1). Jonathan, or Johanan (cf. 12:22), or Jehonanan (cf. Ezr. 10:6), is mentioned in texts from Elephantine dated 411 and 408 BC.

12:12–21 A list of priests in the time of Joiakim; cf. v. 10.

12:22–26 A list of the Levites in the time of Joiakim and subsequently. A number of sources are indicated by the three time-references (vv. 22, 26), although only one is nominated (v. 23). The completion of these lists appears to be after the lifetimes of Nehemiah and Ezra (v. 26).

12:27–43 The walls dedicated

The Nehemiah memoirs are again resumed, possibly amplified by the Chronicler in vv. 27–30. No reference to time is indicated but some scholars infer from 2 Macc. 1:18 that the date was the twenty-fifth of the ninth month, i.e. three months after the completion of the walls. If the traditional dating of Ezra's return (viz. 458 BC) be rejected, then either his name must be removed from v. 36, or else the dedication ceremony must be put impossibly late.

12:27–30 Levitical reinforcements. These would be necessary to cope with the extra demands on the cultic personnel (cf. v. 43). The purification (v. 30) was presumably by the application of sacrificial blood.

12:31–43 The procession around the walls. The two companies appear to have started from a point on the south wall, possibly at the Valley Gate. The first processed in an anti-clockwise direction and the second in a clockwise direction, the meeting-point being in the Temple area. Each was led by a choir (vv. 31, 38). Hoshaiah (v. 32), who is otherwise unknown, seems to have occupied a position in the first company corresponding to Nehemiah's in the second, Ezra being given a special place with the first priestly contingent. Numerous sacrifices were offered on an occasion of great rejoicing (cf. the multiplied references to joy in v. 43).

12:44–47 The care of the Temple personnel

This section derives from the Chronicler, who had a peculiar interest in the Temple cultus and its officials. In particular he stresses the part played by David in the planning of the cultus of the first Temple. Nehemiah, with Zerubbabel, is singled out for praise in view of his support of the Temple staff (cf. 13:10–14).

47 The Levites paid the tithe of the tithe to the priests (cf. 10:38; Nu. 18:25–32).

13:1–3 The heathen excluded from the congregation

The connection of this section is obscure. The opening words imply that it was the same occasion as 12:44 but the more obvious connection is with the following incident, i.e. the clash between Nehemiah and Tobiah the Ammonite (13:4–9; cf. 2:19). It provides yet another illustration of the perennial problem of the relationship between the Jews and their heathen neighbours.

1 It was found written. The reference is to Dt. 23:3–6 (cf. Nu. 22–24). More liberal treatment was afforded the Edomites and Egyptians (cf. Dt. 23:7f.) but the post-exilic situation appears to have demanded a more stringent application of the law.

13:4–31 NEHEMIAH'S SECOND TERM OF OFFICE

13:4–9 The scandal concerning Tobiah the Ammonite

This incident had its genesis during Nehemiah's temporary absence from the Persian court, in accordance with his agreement (cf. 2:6). The kind of problem which Nehemiah faced is well illustrated here. There was an obvious liaison between the officials in Jerusalem and the leaders of the surrounding provinces, but an alliance between the high priest (cf. 3:1; 13:28) and Tobiah, one of Nehemiah's principal enemies and a leading opponent of the attempt to rebuild the wall, beggars the imagination (cf. v. 28). Nehemiah's vigorous action not only removed the offence, but it allowed the chambers to be used for their rightful function.

4 Now before this. This is not an accurate time-reference, as it may relate to an incident in Nehemiah's memoirs which has been omitted. The chambers of the house of our God. The construction of the Temple provided for a great deal of subsidiary accommodation, which was used by the cultic officials and for cultic purposes (cf. 1 Ki. 6:5; Ezr. 8:29; 10:6; Ezk. 40:6f.). 6 The thirty-second year of Artaxerxes king of Babylon, i.e. 433 BC. Babylon was the administrative centre of the Empire and one of the residences of the Persian kings.

13:10–14 Provision for the Levites

The legislation of 10:35–39 is presupposed. Neglect of the Levites inevitably affected the standard of religious life in the Temple. Eliashib the high priest was obviously blameworthy (vv. 4f.) and must have been a party to the dishonest practices which Nehemiah sought to rectify by the appointment of four reliable treasurers (v. 13).

10 Each to his field. According to Dt. 18:1 the priests and Levites were not allowed to own land, a stipulation which was not obeyed in the post-exilic period.

13:15–22 The law of the sabbath enforced

Two classes of offenders are apparent: the Jews themselves, while not actually selling on the sabbath, were preparing or transporting their wares (v. 15); Phoenician traders were actually trading on the sabbath (v. 16). Possibly the nobles had a responsibility to police this kind of conduct (vv. 17f.). Nehemiah took preventative action and threatened more direct measures to those who failed to take the hint or even attempted to break the blockade by setting up their stalls outside the city (vv. 19ff.). The operation, superintended in its earlier stages by his own servants, who had the greater authority, then reverted to the control of the Levitical gatekeepers (cf. 7:1).

13:23–29 The question of mixed marriages again

If the traditional dating for Ezra be accepted then he had dealt with this same problem almost 30 years before (cf. Ezr. 8, 9), whilst incidents and legislation during Nehemiah's first period in Jerusalem (e.g. Ne. 9:2; 10:28ff.) show that it continued to be a thorny issue. Now, during Nehemiah's absence, it had arisen again, doubtless encouraged by an example within the high priestly family (v. 28). The ecumenicity of our present generation must not blind us to the danger of the extinction of the Jewish religion which this practice presented. In a historical situation men like Nehemiah built a wall of separation about the Jews which enabled them to fulfil God's universalistic purposes. Once more Nehemiah displayed characteristic vigour (vv. 25, 28); if he was a eunuch (see on 1:11) he displayed none of the effeminateness characteristic of this group. Josephus (Antiquities xi.7.8) uses an incident which has similarities with v. 28 to explain the complete rupture between the Jews and the Samaritans, culminating in the building of the rival Samaritan temple on Mt. Gerizim. His dating is at fault, however, for he sets the incident almost a century late, in the early years of Alexander, although he is probably correct in dating the Samaritan temple at this time.

25 Presumably, as well as guarding against future violations, he made the offenders put away their foreign wives.

13:30, 31 Finale

Nehemiah's achievements were considerable. The building of the wall, together with his other economic, social and religious measures, set the Jerusalem community, which had been in a desperate plight for almost a century, on a secure foundation. With Ezra's great contribution centring upon the law, the two men made it possible for Judaism to survive in the succeeding centuries. Had the liberal opposition party, led by the high priest Eliashib, succeeded in blunting their sharply-defined policy, it is difficult to conceive how the Jewish faith could have survived.

Esther

INTRODUCTION

The story of Esther is set, not in Palestine, nor even in Babylon, but farther east still in a capital of the Persian Empire, throughout which Jews of the post-exilic period were scattered. Cyrus the empire-builder, well known for his liberal attitude to conquered peoples, allowed Jews to return to Jerusalem after he had conquered Babylon in 539 BC. Darius, the Persian king mentioned in Haggai and Zechariah, organized the administration of his huge empire during his reign (522–486). Ahasuerus, the Persian monarch of Esther, was his successor.

The narrative tells of the grand vizier Haman, who, as a result of a private grudge against one Jew, plotted the extinction of all Jews living within the Persian Empire. Such was the extent of the Empire that virtually the whole race would have been wiped out. In such a crisis providential intervention was to be expected, and it came through Esther, the Jewish girl who had been chosen queen by the monarch. In an unforeseeable way circumstances so fell out that Haman became the victim of his own plot, the Jews were delivered, their enemies were liquidated, and a Jew was appointed to the position of greatest influence next to the king. This miraculous reversal of affairs was celebrated throughout the Persian Empire, and is still celebrated annually by Jews in every part of the world at the festival known as Purim. The scroll of Esther is read each year as part of the celebrations, the congregation joining in at suitable places to express their approval or disapproval, as the case may be, so that the story is better known than any other part of the OT to the ordinary Jew. Moreover, whenever persecution has been the experience of Jews throughout the centuries, this book has fostered the assurance of ultimate deliverance and survival, and kept alive nationalistic hopes; hence its great popularity among them.

TEXT AND PLACE IN THE CANON

One result of this popularity is that there are more MS copies of Esther than of any other book of the OT. Another is that rabbinic comment on the book abounds from early in the Christian era. This has been preserved in the Talmud and is still revered by Jewish scholars. Early translations of the book contain a variety of readings different from the Hebrew, so raising problems concerning the original text. The LXX is particularly important in this respect because it was probably translated as early as the 2nd century BC, and yet contains over 100 verses that are not in the Hebrew. These additions can be read in the Apocrypha, where they have been separated from their original place in the story, and put together as Additions to the Book of Esther. At the end of a very detailed consideration of all the early texts and versions L. B. Paton concludes that the Massoretic text, on which our English versions are based, 'unquestionably represents the purest form of the text that has come down to us, and it must be taken as the basis for all critical discussion of the book' (ICC, Esther, p. 47). The LXX additions probably arose as an attempt to improve on the original book by introducing a more obviously religious emphasis.

The book as we have it almost certainly comes from one author, for though some have thought that the last section, 9:20 – 10:3, is a later addition to the original, their arguments have not been entirely persuasive. The alleged change in vocabulary and style is accounted for by the change from narrative to directions for the observance of Purim. Moreover, it is not quite true that mention of Purim is confined to this section, for it is anticipated in 3:7, and indeed the story seems to be told with the express purpose of commending observance of the festival. Such unity of purpose presupposes one author.

Of the five scrolls in the third section of the Hebrew Canon Esther is generally the last, because Purim is the last festival of the Jewish year. In our English Bibles it comes after Ezra and Nehemiah, books with which it shares a Persian background.

THE ORIGIN OF PURIM

The derivation of the word pûrîm puzzled earlier commentators, who connected it with the Hebrew word pûrā meaning 'wine-press', and thought that the festival might have originated from a Greek cask-opening feast. Another suggestion was that the wine-press spoke of the wrath of God, revealed in action when Judas Maccabaeus won his victory over Nicanor on the 13th Adar 161 BC. Against this is the fact that the day of the month is wrong, and there is early evidence that the two festivals were quite distinct (2 Macc. 15:36). Other scholars tried to find a Persian or Babylonian feast from which Purim might have originated, but no suggestion commanded wide support. It is now well known that pûrîm is a plural word deriving from the Assyrian pûru, which occurs in texts of widely differing periods in the sense of 'lot'. The information given by the writer in 3:7 has proved correct, and no better explanation of the origin of Purim has been put forward than the one he has given.

HISTORICITY

During the last 200 years there has been almost unanimous agreement among commentators that the book is not to be read as sober history. Some have contended that it is pure fiction; others have seen in the names of the principal characters reminiscences of Marduk and Ishtar, deities of Babylon, in rivalry with Humman and Mashti, gods of Elam, and on these grounds have postulated that pagan mythology lies behind the story; another recent view is that it is a historicized wisdom tale. The most popular current opinion takes account of the accuracy of the local colour in the story, and designates it a historical novel, thus acknowledging much of the evidence for historicity, but judging the plot itself to be imaginary.

The days of Ahasuerus are so far removed from our time that it is easy for objections to the historicity of the story of Esther to be based on a subjective assessment of its credibility rather than on knowledge of Persian affairs during the 5th century BC. We are fortunate to have independent information from five main sources:

1. The Histories of the Greek historian Herodotus, which are readily available in English in a paperback edition. Writing during the second half of the 5th century BC after travelling extensively, Herodotus traced the events which brought Persia into conflict with Greece. Chs. 7–9 deal with the period to which our book belongs. They reveal the king, who was called Xerxes in Greek, to have been capricious, sensual, cruel and despotic, and while it is true that he was not the only Persian king to demonstrate the characteristics, Herodotus corroborates the picture of Xerxes given us in Esther. Other parallels between the two books are pointed out in the course of the commentary.

2. An inscription of Xerxes found at Persepolis and translated in ANET (p. 316) enables us to read his own testimony: 'I am Xerxes, the great king, the only king, the king of all countries which speak all kinds of languages, the king of this big and far-reaching earth. . .' There follows a list of the nations he ruled.

3. Excavations at Shushan by French archaeologists have unearthed a text in which Darius relates how he built his palace, using materials from every part of the Empire. Xerxes completed what his father had begun. The whole palace complex, surrounded by a high mud-brick wall, was to the west of the city, between it and the river Choaspes, which provided water for the royal 'paradise' or garden round the throne room. The entrance to the palace, known as the king's gate, was to the east, and inside the gate, to the right, was the treasury, but straight ahead were three courtyards surrounded by living quarters, and on the right of the innermost was the harem. Three large halls still had to be traversed before the throne room was reached. It was an Apadana, or hall of pillars, 65 ft in height and approached by wide stairways, all of which would have been guarded. The impression intended by the designer would have been one of spacious coolness, and, for the monarch, remote dignity. Besides the palace and the residential area Darius built a citadel, and all were enclosed in the great outer wall and surrounded by a moat.

4. A cuneiform tablet from Borsippa, near Babylon, mentions Marduka as a high official at the court of Susa during the early years of the reign of Xerxes, under Uštannu, satrap of Babylonia and 'Beyond the River'. Marduka was an accountant or a privy councillor. This Marduka has been identified with Mordecai, who, if this suggestion be accepted, would have been an official of some importance before his appearance in Esther. His connection with the king's gate would have been an official one, and it is thought that he may have had the trusted position of gate-keeper.

5. In a collection of tablets from the reigns of Artaxerxes I and Darius II more than a hundred Jewish names occur in connection with important positions in the realm. We know that Nehemiah was cup-bearer to King Artaxerxes I (Ne. 1:11), but we can now add that several Jews were even governors of administrative districts. This would not have been true in the time of Darius I, and so a change must have come about some time between his reign and that of Artaxerxes, that is, in the time of Xerxes. S. H. Horn (Biblical Research, IX, 1964) suggests that the influence of Mordecai could have accounted for it (10:3).

All this information strongly supports the historicity of Esther. The author knew as much as we do, and perhaps even a little more, concerning the king, the city, and the situation about which he was writing. His book begins with the traditional Hebrew formula used in history writing, he names a source of information by which his statements may be verified (10:2), and he refers to people and customs as though he knew Persian court life from the inside. One unsolved problem concerns the name of Xerxes' queen. According to Herodotus she was Amestris, the daughter of a Persian general, and she was already married to Xerxes by the time events recorded in Esther began. How this information is to be reconciled with our story we do not yet know, but the difficulty is not insurmountable in a polygamous society, especially when the volatile character of the king is taken into account. Other points relevant to historicity are dealt with in the course of the commentary. They are mainly arguments from silence or questions concerning the probability of the story.

AUTHORSHIP AND DATE

We do not know who wrote the book, and the suggestion that Mordecai was the author is based on a misunderstanding of 9:20. All the same the writer is likely to have been a Jew, for his nationalism permeates the story, and his knowledge of Persian words and customs suggests that he lived in that land, before the Persian Empire fell to Greece. Only so can the author's accurate knowledge of Persian ways be accounted for. Nevertheless there are those who would attribute it to the Greek period, and specifically to the 2nd century, on the grounds that it breathes the nationalistic feeling of the Maccabean era or the fierce patriotism of the time of John Hyrcanus. It is true that the earliest mention of the feast of Purim is in 2 Macc. 15:36, and that Josephus is the first to quote the book, but the absence of evidence does nothing to prove that the book had not been in existence earlier.

PURPOSE AND SIGNIFICANCE

There can be no doubt that the author's purpose was to record the amazing deliverance of the Jewish people under Xerxes, and to see that the memory of it was kept alive through later generations by the observance of the annual Purim festival. Even to the present day the miracle of Jewish identity, preserved amid the multitude of other cultures, is an undeniable fact of history, as is the miracle of Jewish survival, notwithstanding all the attempts that have been made through persecutions, pogroms and concentration camps to prevent it. God has not cast off His ancient people, but continues to deal graciously with them because He keeps His promise for ever. Yet Esther is part of the Christian as well as the Jewish Canon of Scripture, and rightly so. The promises of God are the heritage of all believers, and therefore that providence which protected His people in Persian times still operates on behalf of His church, guarding and sustaining it in all its dangers, obvious or subtle. More than that, the book asserts the rule of the sovereign providence of God in all the affairs of men, whether they like it or not.

TEACHING

1. The book shows the worthlessness of superstition as a guide to life. Haman never even lived to see his 'lucky' day, for God, and not some impersonal fate, controls the destinies of men. 2. There was no question of the Jews deserving God's favour; no-one ever has deserved it, and Mordecai and Esther were no better than most; moreover, in seeking to run all their enemies to the death they were positively blameworthy. 3. The book reveals the sovereignty of God at work in a particular situation, accomplishing His purposes, but without in any way overriding the 'free' decisions and actions of the people involved. To be sure the king was sleepless, and so had the annals read to him just at the right time, but Haman was pursuing his own evil intent in getting up betimes, and it was exactly that evil intent which, by God's will, hastened his destruction. Mordecai made prudent use of his privileged position 'in the gate', while Esther for her part had to resolve to do what was right and carry her resolve into action. God's outworking of His purpose did not eliminate human responsibility for moral decision and moral action, and yet if Esther had failed He would not have been thwarted, for relief and deliverance would have risen for the Jews 'from another quarter' (4:14). Even the fact that God is not mentioned in the book makes it all the more clear that He rules sovereignly all the time, and not only in response to human request. He turns human evil to fulfil His just purposes, but without Himself being tainted with the sin. On the other hand, when human wills are put at His disposal, then the blessing received is commensurate with the bounty of His sovereignty.

1:1–22 THE PERSIAN KING DETHRONES HIS QUEEN

1:1–9 A display of royal splendour

1 Ahasuerus represents the Hebrew transliteration of the Persian name Khshayarsha, better known to us in the Greek form Xerxes. He succeeded his father Darius and reigned 486–465/4 BC. His correct identity is assured by the author's note on the extent of his empire, from India, i.e. the area drained by the Indus river, a territory added to Persia's domains by Darius, to Ethiopia or Cush, now the North Sudan, conquered by Cambyses, king of Persia 530–522. One hundred and twenty-seven provinces. Herodotus (iii. 89) says Darius 'set up twenty provincial governorships, called satrapies', but these were taxation areas, whereas the biblical writers use a different word, and refer to racial units. 2 The Hebrew verb suggests 'when King Ahasuerus came to take up his throne in Susa', but why in the third year of his reign? Presumably he had previously ruled from one of the other royal residences, at Ecbatana or Babylon. Susa is the Greek and Shushan the Hebrew form of the Persian Shushin or Shushim. This city, the ancient capital of Elam, had been rebuilt by Darius, and seems to have been Xerxes' winter residence. In summer it was unbearably hot. 3–5 We are to understand that the banquet, mentioned in v. 3, but referred to in more detail in v. 5, lasted seven days. It was the culmination of a six months' exhibition of the king's resources, to which delegates had flocked from all over the empire: officials, courtiers, the army of Persia and Media (RSV has inserted the word chiefs), nobles and provincial governors. The Persians are known to have held huge feasts, a whole city sometimes partaking at once. The purpose of the gathering may well have been to plan Xerxes' Greek campaign of 482 BC (Herodotus vii. 8). That done, all the assembled company present in Susa was feasted with wine for seven days in the spacious courtyard of the palace, overlooking the royal gardens. 6, 7 The writer skilfully conjures up the splendour of the scene, with its cool white and blue muslin curtains, marble pillars, gold and silver couches and multi-coloured mosaic floor. Each goblet was of unique design, and the supply of wine was unlimited, so wealthy was the king. 8 There appears to be a contradiction here, but it may be that the first two clauses should be combined as in the LXX to read, 'and the drinking was according to no prescribed law', i.e. the servants were to satisfy each individual guest's desire. 9 We know from the book itself that custom did not prevent wives from dining with their husbands. The large numbers probably made necessary a separate feast for the women guests.

1:10–22 Queen Vashti defies her husband

10 No hint is given as to the reason for Vashti's defiance, but it is of no importance for the story. 12 The king's dignity was publicly affronted by her refusal, and some strong measures to enforce his authority were certain to be taken. 13 Wise men were regularly in attendance on an oriental monarch to give advice, but wise men who knew the times specifies astrologers, and the second part of the verse lays stress on their ability in matters of justice. 14, 15 That seven were specially selected to serve in the immediate presence of the king is noted by Herodotus and referred to in Ezr. 7:14. It was their duty to advise the king in all matters. The names given are Persian. 16–18 Memucan voiced the opinion of the council of seven. Not only the king's honour but male supremacy generally was at stake, therefore strong sanctions must be applied to prevent anarchy. 19, 20 If Vashti were deposed by an irrevocable edict and replaced, such a danger would be averted. Though no extra-biblical reference to the irrevocability of the laws of the Medes and Persians has come to light, such a doctrine is in keeping with their pride, which would be injured by an admission that their laws could be improved. 21, 22 That the king should send out the decree in all the many languages of his vast empire is generally thought to be an exaggeration. Aramaic was widely understood and was used for state business from Egypt to India. There is, however, plenty of evidence that Xerxes delighted in the number of different peoples who composed his realm (cf. Introduction, 'Historicity', 2) and, with representatives of many of them in his court, translations could have been made. All the same there is something a little ludicrous about this decree that a husband was to take charge in his own household, for this was the rule in an oriental home; that his language was to be spoken in the home, would presumably apply in the case of a mixed marriage. The law was not even enforceable.

2:1–18 THE CHOICE OF A NEW QUEEN

1 After these things suggests a lapse of time, and since v. 16 tells us that it was the seventh year of Ahasuerus before Esther went into the king's presence, it is likely that the Greek war intervened before the king gave a thought to Vashti. 2–4 Lest he should reinstate her the courtiers suggested that he should choose a new queen from among the most beautiful girls of his realm. Little imagination is needed to appreciate the horror caused by the round-up of these girls, whose fate it was to be carried away from their homes to be secluded for life as the king's concubines. What a liability to be beautiful! 5–7 It is in this connection that we first meet Mordecai and his cousin Esther, who lived in Susa. A Jew. Though the word derived from 'Judah', it was used from the time of the Exile to designate any Israelite. The well-known names

Shimei (cf. 2 Sa. 16) and Kish (cf. 1 Sa. 9:1) could refer either to immediate ancestors of Mordecai or, more probably, to the famous Benjamites of the early monarchy, in which case the relative pronoun who in v. 6 must refer to Mordecai. Yet if he had been carried away captive in 597 BC it is not likely that he would be taking part in affairs in the year 480. This verse is often cited as an example of the writer's historical inaccuracy, but he may well have been using an elliptical expression, meaning, 'whose family was carried away . . .'. Mordecai showed practical piety in bringing up the orphan girl, but, living in the citadel, he would have had difficulty in hiding her from the king's officers who had to supply the harem. Hadassah is Esther's Hebrew name and means 'myrtle'. The name 'Esther' most probably derives from the Persian word for star, though some connect it with the Babylonian goddess Ishtar.

9 From the beginning Esther became a favourite with Hegai, the eunuch in charge of the harem; she accepted without question the beauty preparations and the food provided, unlike Daniel who protested against breaking the food laws. 10 To protest was impossible for her if she was to obey Mordecai's instruction, given most likely for her benefit, so that her chances were not prejudiced by her race. Some commentators, however, suggest that Mordecai was ambitious, and hoped for promotion through her. Still another view is that the writer inserted this note simply because the plot required it. 11 Mordecai could not enter the harem, but he had his own way of discovering each day that all was well with Esther. 12–14 Though these girls had every luxury, and could choose any adornment to enhance their beauty, they returned from the king's presence to the house of the concubines, mere chattels, awaiting the king's pleasure, if indeed he ever remembered them again. It is understandable that Mordecai should have wanted to make life as bearable as possible for his adopted daughter. 15–18 Esther made no extravagant demands when her turn came to meet the king during the month Tebeth (Dec/Jan) 479 BC. During the Exile the Jews adopted the Babylonian names for the months of the year. The king's delight in Esther was immediate. She was crowned queen, and the glad occasion was marked by a special feast, by the proclamation of an amnesty, and by the distribution of royal gifts. Remission of taxes is an interpretation. The Hebrew word means 'release' (AV), and, as well as remission of taxes, could imply a holiday (RSV mg.), a release of prisoners, or a release from military service.

2:19–23 THE KING'S LIFE IS SPARED

19 No fully satisfying explanation of the statement that the virgins were gathered together the second time has been put forward. If a queen had been found, why should further virgins be required? It seems reasonable to assume that girls from a distance might arrive late, and likely that a man such as Xerxes would not be satisfied without further concubines. The incident is mentioned to indicate when it was that the plot against the king was discovered. Mordecai evidently had ample opportunity as he went about his business at the king's gate, to know what was going on in the palace. 20 Though queen, Esther continued to obey Mordecai as if he were her own father. (Is there not an indirect reference to the fifth commandment here?) If Mordecai had been ambitious it would have been in his interests not to remain incognito but to allow Esther to seek promotion for her nearest relative. As it was, circumstances ultimately brought about the honour that he might have engineered for himself. 21–23 By some chance Mordecai became aware of a plot devised by two eunuchs of the royal bodyguard to put the king to death. It was as a result of such a plot that Xerxes finally lost his life, but on this earlier occasion Mordecai secretly passed the news to Esther, who reported it in Mordecai's name. Not only were the conspirators hanged, but the incident was written up in the Book of the Chronicles, the court diary, which was kept in the presence of the king.

3:1–15 HAMAN'S EDICT

1 After these things calls attention to another lapse of time. V. 7 mentions Xerxes' twelfth year, so Haman was promoted at some time between the seventh and twelfth years of his reign. The Agagite was understood by Josephus to mean that Haman was descended from the Agag of 1 Sa. 15. On this ground Josephus, and many other commentators, assumed that Haman was an Amalekite and therefore a traditional enemy of the Jews. In this case Mordecai was continuing the ancient enmity between the house of Kish and the Amalekites, and his victory would be seen as the outworking of the curse against them (cf. Dt. 25:17–19). Though this is possible the significance of the word 'Agagite' is by no means sure. Agag was not the name of an individual but the title of the Amalekite king; it seems hardly likely that a tribal name should derive from a title. Whatever his lineage Haman was promoted to the rank of grand vizier, maybe unexpectedly, and maybe from an unimportant position, for 2 particularly points out that the king had had to command all court officials to bow before him. Reluctance on the part of the courtiers to do so is implied. It is puzzling to know why Mordecai refused obeisance; Israelite subjects were expected to prostrate themselves before their king (cf., e.g., 2 Sa. 18:28) and before other leaders (cf. 2 Sa. 18:21). 4–6 The only explanation offered is that Mordecai claimed exemption on the ground that he was a Jew. Probably the inference is justified that Haman was demanding not mere allegiance but worship, and Mordecai would not break the first commandment. The LXX additions to the book (13:14) take this view by putting into the mouth of Mordecai a prayer in which he says that he would not bow down to any but the Lord. If fear of idolatry lay behind the refusal to bow down then no Jew would bow down, and Haman's decision to take vengeance on the whole people becomes understandable. Similar acts of revenge involving wholesale slaughter are recorded by Herodotus (i. 106; iii. 79). Jews in Judea had already experienced antagonism against them because they insisted on keeping themselves separate (cf. Ezr. 4; Ne. 4, 6). In Esther, however, anti-semitism proper makes its appearance with Haman's express intention of wiping out the Jewish race. It might well seem incredible that one man's injured pride should lead to such an irrational conclusion if it were not that history has produced an equally irrational attack on the Jews in the 20th century.

7 It was in the first month of the year that Passover commemorated the deliverance from Egypt; ironically in the same month Haman began to plot destruction. The Persians, like all Near Eastern people, were very superstitious (cf. Ezk. 21:18–23); Haman was no exception, hence the casting of lots to ascertain the most propitious time for carrying out his designs. Day after day . . . The probable meaning is that lots were cast first of all for the day of the month and then for the month of the year. Pur, a non-Hebrew word, has now been found in Assyrian texts with the sense of casting a lot (cf. Introduction, 'The Origin of Purim'). 8 Haman carefully avoided naming the Jews when he accused them to the king of having their own law, which was true, and of disregarding the law of the land, which was not true, except in the one detail that concerned his status. They had been taught to seek the peace of the city of their exile (cf. Je. 29:7) and had done so. This subtle blend of truth and error provided a plausible case for ridding the land of such a stubborn and potentially dangerous element in the population. 9 Financial interests added a further incentive. It is not clear where this huge sum of money (the equivalent of at least £3,000,000) was to come from. V. 13 implies that those who carry out the massacre will keep the plunder, and they would no doubt help themselves to a share of it; even so land belonging to those who suffered the death penalty normally became crown property in the Near East (cf. 1 Ki. 21:15). Haman would be expected to make some profit himself and still have funds to pay into the king's treasury. It is not impossible, however, that Haman was already very wealthy (cf. Herodotus i. 192 for an idea of the wealth of the Persian governor in Babylon) and could promise the money from his own capital. 10 Xerxes had not even the interest to enquire the name of the people who were to die, but was content to take a rest from responsibility, and leave the country's affairs in the hands of his grand vizier. Once in possession of the king's ring there was no limit to Haman's power, for worked into the ring was the official seal, the ancient equivalent of a signature. With it he could pass any decree he liked in the name of the king. 11 Whatever Haman did with the people or the money the king would approve of it.

12, 13 Without delay the edict was drawn up, copied, translated, sealed and sent to all parts of the empire by means of the postal system inaugurated by Cyrus (Herodotus v. 14; viii. 98). The decree would reach even distant parts of the empire with months to spare before the thirteenth day of Adar. Those who treat the book as fiction regard this date as the author's delaying device; those who take the book as history see the outworking of Pr. 16:33. God had controlled the disposing of the lot, and superstitious Haman would not dare to disregard it. 15 The incident closes with a brilliant dramatic contrast: on the one hand the nonchalant king and courtier with their wine; on the other the people of the city, apprehensive at the publication of so arbitrary an edict.

4:1 – 5:14 AN ALLY AT COURT

1–3 Mordecai and Jews everywhere publicly displayed the traditional signs of mourning: they had no 'house of the Lord' to visit as Hezekiah had done in a time of national emergency (cf. 2 Ki. 19:1), but they would resort to prayer just the same, as they fasted and wailed and daubed themselves with ashes. 4, 5 Everyone except the unfortunate women closeted in the harem understood the mourning, but the queen had to find out its meaning through Hathach, the eunuch who attended her. 7 Mordecai, who could reveal not only his own experiences but the sum mentioned between Haman and the king, was well informed. 8 Hathach returned with a copy of the decree which he was to explain to Esther, perhaps because she could not read Persian, and with the challenge to her to use her influence with the king.

11 Court ceremonial protected the king against unwanted intruders, but this particular detail is unattested outside this book. Esther's concern for her own safety has been commented upon, but it is very human, and a mark of the genuineness of the story. As the queen of a polygamous and capricious monarch, who had not given a thought to her for a month past, she might receive even less sympathy than a stranger could expect. What reason had she to think that she would be able, simply by stating her case, to reverse a decree of favoured Haman? 13, 14 Mordecai's argument is brutal in its clarity. Death awaited her whether she approached the king or not, therefore she had nothing to lose. If she failed then help would come from somewhere else, for Mordecai was convinced that the Jewish nation would somehow be saved from extinction, but she could be the chosen instrument for this very crisis. God's name is not mentioned, but Esther is being encouraged to see that there was a divinely ordered pattern in her life, and that this was her moment of destiny. 16, 17 Though Esther accepted the challenge, her reply reveals her deep sense of inadequacy. The plea for support in a three-day fast indicates her dependence on divine help, for prayer would be the purpose of this emergency measure. If I perish, I perish. Esther made her resolve with great courage, but without any conviction that she would succeed. A way forward was evidently made clear to her during the days of fasting.

5:1 Esther took her courage in both hands and, wearing her regalia, approached the king as he sat in state in his audience chamber. For a representation from Susa of Darius seated on his throne, and holding his sceptre, see art. 'Darius', NBD. 2, 3 The golden sceptre extended to her indicated that she might approach, and the invitation could not have been more reassuring. 4, 5 Nevertheless Esther moved with caution. A private dinner party would prepare the way. 6–8 Even after that Esther's intuition told her that her strategic moment had not yet come. Though she cannot have foreseen it, her second invitation played an essential part in bringing about her opportunity. 9–12 Haman was overwhelmed with a sense of his own importance at being the only guest at the royal table. That this was to happen a second time was the climax of his boast to his circle of friends. 13, 14 The memory of Mordecai's defiance was the only barrier to his complete satisfaction; in this Haman is true to type, for it is the lesser men who exaggerate slights, while the great can afford to overlook them. The excessive height of the gallows, 83 ft or approximately the height of the city walls, need not be an exaggeration, especially as it was Haman's purpose to make a spectacle of Mordecai's downfall. Haman is confident that the king will pass the death sentence at his request.

6:1–14 AN UNEXPECTED DEVELOPMENT

While Jewish commentators see God at work in the events recorded in this chapter, most others judge that such a series of coincidences is more characteristic of fiction than of real life. The reader will decide in the light of other apparent coincidences, both in Scripture and in present-day experience, whether or not the events recorded are improbable.

1 In his sleeplessness the king ordered his servants to read to him from the royal diary, mentioned in 2:23. The Hebrew indicates that they kept on reading, evidently all through the night. 2, 3 Eventually they came to the record of Mordecai's service in saving the king's life. 4, 5 A reward was due, and the king, requiring some suitable suggestions, invited the early arrival at court to make them. 7–9 Haman, who was preoccupied with his own evil scheme, jumped to the conclusion that any special honour must be meant for him, and made the most extravagant proposal he could think of. Everyone would think the king himself was coming, for all the outward trappings of royalty were to be used. The practice of setting crown-like headdresses on horses is attested by Assyrian reliefs. 10, 11 The king had no idea of the irony of the situation in which he was placing his favourite. He alone was ignorant of the feud between Mordecai and Haman, and of the fact that Haman's decree was directed against the Jews, and therefore included Mordecai; the mortification of Haman as he proclaimed his enemy to be the man whom the king delighted to honour, would not escape the people of Susa. 12 Mordecai was not given any permanent change of status, but returned to his usual place in the king's gate. Haman, however, returned home, utterly humiliated, as the act of covering his head indicates. 13 Those who had so recently encouraged him to take vengeance now sensed a change of fortune and superstitiously recalled that no-one ultimately prospered who plotted against the Jews. 14 Guests were usually fetched and escorted to oriental feasts. This time Haman arrived 'in haste' and was altogether at a disadvantage.

7:1–10 ESTHER'S REQUEST

1–3 Within 24 hours the whole situation had so changed that, when the king again invited Esther to state her petition, she was able boldly to make it, requesting first her own life and then that of her people. The Jew is still very aware of his personal involvement in the destiny of his people. Esther's request has been incorporated into two Jewish liturgies. 4 We are sold refers to Haman's bribe. They were being sold for annihilation and not merely for slavery; so much is clear, but the last clause is obscure. The word translated affliction elsewhere in the book always means 'enemy'. The AV is consistent in keeping this meaning here, and the sense of the AV is, 'although the enemy cannot compensate for all that the king will lose in tribute when they have been killed'. This is not satisfactory because it does not explain why Esther would have held her tongue, and this the context demands. The RSV is not satisfactory because it fails to keep the grammatical connection between the clauses, and does not make the sense any clearer. This is an ancient difficulty, for the early versions do not provide any help, and so far no satisfactory solution has been proposed. 5, 6 Not until Esther names Haman does the king link Esther's plea with Haman's plot. 7 The king shows a very usual reaction to stress in getting up and striding out of the room, and Haman takes advantage of the momentary absence of the king to plead for the queen's mercy. 8 He is still prostrate before the reclining queen, probably clasping her feet as a suppliant (cf. 2 Ki. 4:27), when the furious king returns, ready to put the worst possible interpretation on Haman's posture. As the words left the mouth of the king. The AV keeps the singular 'word' as in the Hebrew. This could be translated 'judgment' and imply that the king immediately pronounced his verdict, after which courtiers covered the criminal's face. 9 Harbona, one of the inner circle of seven in 1:10, added yet another offence to Haman's account when he pointed out the gallows which had been intended to end the life of Mordecai, the king's favourite. Many commentators suggest that Esther should have interceded for Haman, or at least corrected the king's false inference, but this is to underestimate the tension created by the king's fierce outburst, which would have precluded any interruption. 10 The author found satisfaction in this outworking of justice, which well illustrates Ps. 9:16b, 'The wicked are snared in the work of their own hands.'

8:1–17 A NEW GRAND VIZIER AND A NEW EDICT

1 In accordance with the law already referred to (see on 3:9), the property of Haman was confiscated by the king, who bestowed it upon Esther. She had by now disclosed to the king her relationship with Mordecai, and accordingly he became one of the privileged few with access to the king's presence. 2 Once promoted to be grand vizier by the gift of the royal signet ring, and to be manager of Esther's estate, he came into all the prestige and authority that Haman had known. 3 Though so much had been accomplished, Haman's edict was still in force, hence Esther's request that it should be annulled. 4 This time the king extends his golden sceptre to indicate that she should rise and stand before him. 5, 6 Her concern is for the Jews of the provinces, though all were still due to perish, including Mordecai and herself. 7 The king indicates that he is favourably inclined towards the Jews. 8 He cannot annul the previous edict which has gone out in his name, but a second can counteract it.

9 This second edict is accordingly drawn up and sent to all who received Haman's document and also, in Hebrew, to Jews of every province. 10 The RSV translates the difficult vocabulary of this verse better than the AV. The swiftest steeds will deliver the new edict. 11, 12 It is instructive to compare the new edict with that of 3:13; the exact treatment intended for the Jews is to be meted out to their enemies. Since the old edict remains in force the Jews can defend themselves only by anticipating the attack on the day appointed. 15–17 The appearance of Mordecai in his state robes and crown of office coincided with the publication of the pro-Jewish edict to produce a great ovation from the population of Susa; whereas Haman's decree had caused perplexity, that of Mordecai resulted in gladness, particularly for Jews, first in Susa, and then in every place as the news arrived. Such a providential outworking of events in favour of the Jews convinced many of the power of their God, and caused them to become proselytes.

9:1–32 THE ORIGIN AND OBSERVANCE OF PURIM

The purpose of the writer in relating these events is fulfilled in this chapter, which explains how matters turned out on the 13th of Adar.

1 The emphasis is on the amazing reversal of all that had been intended by the enemies of the Jews, for the animosity of one man had spread to his supporters everywhere. 2–5 The Jews made their attack on all their enemies with extraordinary success. The rulers, torn between two contradictory edicts, favoured the one published by the current régime, especially in view of Mordecai's popularity. 6–10 With such support the Jews were able to wipe out their enemies, including 500 in Susa, together with the ten sons of Haman, whose names are traditionally printed in perpendicular type in Hebrew texts, a device which draws attention to them, as though to gloat over them. The Jews' studious refusal to take any spoil, even though they had the right to do so (cf. 8:11) is carefully noted here and in vv. 15, 16. At least they had no mercenary motives. 11–15 The report on the day's events in Susa prompted the king to enquire whether the queen had any further petition to make. Though we have no means of knowing the exact situation, in the light of such facts as we have Esther was extremely vindictive in asking for a further day's slaughter in Susa. To respond to the grace of God by hatred to men was particularly despicable. The purpose of hanging the dead bodies of Haman's sons would be to let all Susa know their fate. 16–19 It is possible to translate the verbs of v. 16 by the pluperfect, and this makes better sense. The author wants to arrive at his main point, which is to explain that, whereas in the provinces the 14th day of Adar was a holiday, in Susa, owing to the two days of bloodshed, the holiday was celebrated on the 15th. Modern Jews hold their festal meal towards the evening of the 14th, just a month before Passover. The practice of exchanging gifts of food on days of rejoicing is mentioned again in Ne. 8:10, 12.

20–22 The providential turn of events in favour of the Jews was so remarkable that the occasion deserved to be commemorated by an annual celebration. By order of Mordecai, who first wrote some account of the deliverance to be remembered, both the 14th and 15th days of Adar were to be annual feast days, and an occasion for remembering the poor. 23–28 The Jews accepted the institution of the festival, agreeing that it should be perpetuated through every generation of Jews, and celebrated by Jews and proselytes in every part of the world. Vv. 24, 25 may be a quotation from Mordecai's letter, following from the second clause of v. 23. The story is much abbreviated, and there is an ambiguity at the beginning of v. 25, where the name 'Esther' has been inserted in the AV and RSV as the subject of the verb, because the Hebrew verb has the feminine ending. The RV translates, 'when the matter came before the king', and the LXX makes the verb refer to Haman, who had just been mentioned. It is strange that the author should refer to Esther without repeating her name, for it had not appeared in the text since v. 13, but to add 'Esther' does avoid emending the Hebrew. The particular detail emphasized in this summary is that Haman cast Pur; the word recurs in v. 26, with its Hebrew plural ending, Purim, the name by which the festival has always been known. 29–32 A second letter, issued by Esther and Mordecai together, was sent out to endorse the original edict. Words of peace and truth would be the greeting with which oriental letters began, and the purpose of this second message was to add the name of the queen to that of Mordecai, so strengthening the authority behind the decree. V. 31 mentions for the first time fasting in connection with Purim; when this was to be observed is not specified, but the 13th of Adar, Haman's 'propitious' day, would be the obvious choice. Jews still keep this day as Esther's fast before the Purim celebrations proper, which, besides the reading of the roll of Esther in its traditional chant, accompanied by the blessings and hymns, include the festive meal and jollifications. In v. 32 the RSV rightly interprets the Hebrew idiom, it was recorded in writing. No particular book is meant.

10:1–3 CONCLUSION

The author brings his work to a close with a brief historical note, in which he refers the reader to a source of further information; he may himself have been referring to this document when he began the chapter, intending to tell more about the reign of King Xerxes, but he contented himself with drawing attention to the story of Mordecai recorded there. The final note about Mordecai, commending his wholly good influence, is couched in thoroughly biblical terms. The prophet Zechariah says of Jerusalem's coming king, 'He shall command peace to the nations' (Zc. 9:10), and no ruler could do more than speak peace to all his people, even if there is a hint that Mordecai specially sought the welfare of the Jews.

J. G. BALDWIN

Job

INTRODUCTION

AUTHORSHIP

The author is unknown. Various suggestions have been made: Job, Elihu, Moses, Solomon, Isaiah, Hezekiah, Baruch the friend of Jeremiah, etc. None can be established. All that can be said with certainty is that he was a loyal Jew who refused, however, to be shackled by every detail of the popular creed, in particular its remorseless bracketing of suffering and sin.

DATE AND BACKGROUND

Uncertainty also shrouds the question of date. There are no direct references to historical events which might assist in the dating the of book.

A distinction has to be drawn between the age of the historical background to the book which we find in the prologue (chs. 1–2) and epilogue (42:7–16) and the rest of the book. The former is clearly pre-exilic. The atmosphere is patriarchal. Wealth is reckoned in cattle and Job appears as his own priest (1:5). There is a reference to Job in Ezekiel (14:14). The historical basis would be preserved by tradition from generation to generation, until it was incorporated into the book of Job with the addition of the poetic form in which we find the dialogue.

Some have maintained that the tradition was maintained orally; others have favoured Duhm's theory that prologue and epilogue are fragments of a popular book (Volksbuch) where the story of Job appeared. A. B. Davidson argues cogently that the reflective atmosphere of the book and the knowledge of distant lands in it exclude a date earlier than the age of Solomon. He maintains that probabilities favour the age of the captivity of Judah (597 BC). The suggested dates vary between 600 and 400 BC. The question of date is not really important. Oesterley and Robinson say with truth: 'There are few poems in all literature whose date and historical background are of less importance than they are in the book of Job. . . . It is a universal poem, and that is one of the features which give it its value and interest for us today.'

There are interesting points of contact with other books in Scripture. Cf. Jb. 3 with Je. 20:14–18 and Jb. 15:35 with Is. 59:4. There are striking similarities between the figure of Job and the Servant of the Lord in Isaiah. Cf. Is. 50:6; 53:3 with Jb. 16:10; 30:9ff. See also Ps. 8:4 (Jb. 7:17); 1 Cor. 3:19 (Jb. 5:13); Jas. 5:11.

TEXT AND LITERARY STYLE

The Hebrew text has given much difficulty to scholars. The authors of the original LXX found the text so difficult that almost a quarter of the book was missing. There are passages which defy translation as they stand in the early Hebrew text known as the Massoretic. Many unique words were used which led some to imagine that the book was originally written in Arabic or in Edomite and then translated into Hebrew. It is sounder to hold with W. A. Irwin that we are dealing with a Hebrew dialect different from that found usually in the OT.

In the opinion of William Neil the best translation of Job is that of James Moffatt. In spite of occasional arbitrariness, Moffatt worked with the sensible assumption that, whatever happened to the text in the course of the years, it originally made sense.

Job includes both poetry and prose. The prologue and epilogue are in prose, while the main part is made up of three cycles of dialogue in poetry.

Job has clear affinities with Hebrew wisdom literature but the genius of the book defies exact classification. It has a worthy place beside the great tragedies of history from Greek to modern times. There are many unforgettable passages.

CONTENTS AND VALUE

The setting of the story is 'the land of Uz', about whose precise location there is some uncertainty. The slight biblical evidence which we have points to the region east of the southern Lebanons.

Four friends of Job, Eliphaz, Bildad, Zophar and Elihu, represent all that orthodox theology could say about the significance of the calamities which had devastated Job's happiness and stability. With the possible exception of Elihu, their contribution was seriously restricted by an inexorable interpretation of suffering in terms of personal sinfulness. If they had merely set out to establish human solidarity in sinfulness, they would have obtained Job's immediate assent, for nowhere does he claim to be a perfect man: but when they first hinted, and then directly affirmed, that Job's suffering was the inevitable harvest of seeds of sin sown when the eye of God alone was upon him, Job vehemently and consistently denied the accuracy of their judgment.

The book of Job is a universal book because it speaks to a universal need—the agony of the human heart when wracked by 'the heart-ache and the thousand natural shocks that flesh is heir to'. The testimony of a woman dying of cancer, that the book of Job spoke to her need as no other book in the Bible, is sufficient evidence. Great Christians and great poets have added their voices to the testimony of great sufferers, in appreciation and admiration of the truths the book conveys, sometimes through the medium of the most magnificent poetry. Luther held that Job is 'magnificent and sublime as no other book of Scripture'; Tennyson spoke of it as 'the greatest poem of ancient or modern times'.

What, then, has the book to say to the universal need?

It is a striking reminder of the inadequacy of human horizons for a proper understanding of the problem of suffering. All the human figures in the drama speak in total ignorance of Satan's allegations against Job's piety, reported in the prologue, and of the resultant divine permission to prove his point, if he can. Against the background of the prologue Job's sufferings appear, not as damning evidence of the divine judgment upon him, as his friends had sought to establish, but as proof of the divine confidence in him. We must avoid the naïveté of using language which might seem to indicate that an omniscient God needed such a demonstration of His servant's integrity, to silence, as it were, some tiny doubt in His mind: but we are entitled to find here a suggestion of the truth that now we can only 'see in a mirror dimly'. Job and the others were trying to fit together the pieces of a puzzle without having all the pieces within their grasp. Consequently the book of Job is an eloquent commentary on the inadequacy of the human mind to reduce the complexity of the problem of suffering to some consistent pattern. It is a book where silent men accomplish more than speaking men. Cf. 2:13; 13:5.

But while the author would certainly have recommended humility in any contemplation of the fact of suffering, he would not have advocated despair. He believes in a God who has the answer to human need. The appearance of men to counsel Job leads to controversy, disillusionment and despair; the appearance of God leads to submission, faith and courage. The word of man is unable to penetrate the darkness of Job's mind; the Word of God brings abiding light. The God of the theophany does not answer any of the burning questions that are debated so hotly in the course of the book; but He answers the need of Job's heart. He does not explain any phase of the battle; but He makes Job more than conqueror in it. (See detailed note at the beginning of ch. 40.)

Like the other books of the OT Job is forward-looking to Christ. Questions are raised, great sobs of agony are heard, which Jesus alone can answer. The book takes its place in the testimony of the ages that there is a blank in the human heart which Jesus alone can fill.

COMMENTARY

1:1 – 2:13 PROLOGUE

1:1–5 A good man in a sinning universe

1 His character appears in a remarkable light as blameless and upright. Blameless does not imply sinless perfection, which is never claimed for Job. Rather it encourages us to think of Job as a moral all-rounder, a man of balanced, full-orbed character. Spurgeon could have said of Job, as he said of Gladstone: 'We believe in no man's infallibility, but it is restful to be sure of one man's integrity.' His moral and spiritual stability moved in the setting of a secure universe. 2 The gift of children, 3 extensive material possessions and 4 domestic unity and rejoicing all contributed to his happiness. The words of Ps. 1:3 could be applied without qualification.

5 His moral maturity was explained by his profound reverence for God. The profundity of his spirituality is seen in the account of his domestic piety. Spiritually ambitious for himself, he was no less so for his family. His regular sacrifices provided against the bare possibility that his children had sinned against God. In their hearts reveals impressively that Job's spirituality did not skim on the surface; it was aware of the necessity of praying 'Create in me a clean heart, O God' (Ps. 51:10).

1:6–12 The sky begins to darken

6 We are introduced to a dramatic heavenly council attended by the sons of God, i.e. the angels, including Satan. We are not to look for any 'full-dress' doctrine of Satan as depicted in orthodox theology. He does not appear as a fallen angel but has regular access to heaven (1:6; 2:1). The name Satan is preceded by the definite article; cf. Moff. 'the Adversary'. Professor N. H. Snaith summarizes his role by saying: 'He is God's Inspector-of-man on earth and man's adversary in heaven.' He is an agent of God whose duty is to give the closest attention to human virtue and vice. He appears as the supreme cynic of the heavenly court. 8 God's affectionate praise of His servant (cf. Ps. 149:4) calls forth the ugly question, 9 Does Job fear God for nought? 10 The material possessions hedging in his life, according to Satan, are a sufficient explanation of his piety. 11 Remove the hedge, and the piety will disappear. The charge is that material prosperity is not an accretion to Job's faith but the root cause. The removal of the root would mean the withering of the bloom.

12 The challenge is accepted by God, but the theatre of investigation must not extend beyond Job's possessions to his person. The stage is set for the drama of which the book of Job is the discussion.

1:13–22 The storm breaks

Four staggering blows fill Job's world with pain. 15 The Arabs (Moff., for Sabeans), 16 the lightning, 17 the Chaldeans and 18, 19 a whirlwind sweeping over the desert deprive him of flocks and servants and, most agonizing of all, of his family. But with all the waters of affliction going over him he could still say in the words of Bunyan's Hopeful in the river of death: 'I feel the bottom and it is good.' So the lie was given to the adversary's insinuation. The loss of possessions had not entailed the loss of faith. 20 Grief might change his appearance; it could not cheat him of the consolations of faith. He faced affliction in the attitude of the worshipper. 21 In that attitude he found strength to give us one of the most beautiful expressions of submission to the will of God in the fragrant story of faith. In the darkest hour of his life he could bless God. Naked I came from my mother's womb. The general idea has a parallel in 1 Tim. 6:7. Just as we bring no material adornment with us into the world, so we cannot take anything with us when we leave the world. The precise meaning is more difficult. Perhaps mother's womb is a reference to the womb of Mother Earth, an interpretation followed by Ewald and others. Cf. Gn. 3:19. 22 Or charge God with wrong. Wrong conveys the idea of 'tastelessness, insipidity, and so, want of moral discernment' (Strahan). Cf. our colloquial condemnation of an action as 'in bad taste'.

2:1–8 The storm sweeps on

A second heavenly council ushers in an extension in the adversary's theatre of investigation. 3 He will not admit that he has been mistaken about Job's integrity. The Lord claims that Job has come through the furnace of affliction as pure gold. 4, 5 The adversary complains that the trial has not been radical enough. He accuses Job of callousness. So far calamity has affected only the lives of others. His own skin has been untouched. Let his own person be involved and there will be no more 'holding fast his integrity'. Skin for skin! was probably a common proverb. Skins were in common use for business transactions. The charge is that Job was willing to give up the skins of others—cattle, servants and children—provided that his own skin was safe.

6 The adversary is given an opportunity to prove his point. Job's person is no longer shielded. 7 The identification of diseases bearing ancient names is by no means a simple matter. The sores may indicate a painful form of leprosy. All that can be said with certainty is that Job suffered from a distressing skin eruption. Nothing more aggravating and depressing can be imagined. 8 The ashes is a reference to the local refuse-heap outside the walls of the town. There the dung and other rubbish was burnt at regular intervals. It was the happy hunting-ground for dogs on the prowl for carcases which often were tossed there, and for the local urchins who were always eager to root about among things unwanted by others. There, in this place of discarded things, sat the man who once had been 'the greatest of all the people of the east' (1:3).

2:9–13 Reactions to the storm

2:9, 10 Job's wife. 9 The loss of family, of possessions, and now last of all, her husband's health, leaves her faith in ruins. She recommends that Job should curse God, even if death is the outcome of his blasphemy. Death is preferable to his present hapless lot. 10 Job sees another support for his faith taken from him. He can no longer count on her spiritual support in the stern battle his faith is fighting. Resolutely he sets aside her suggestion. It is worthy only of impious (so Moff., RV mg., for foolish) folk. He bows before the sovereign hand of God whether it bestows or takes away, whether it caresses or strikes. He could have prayed 'Thy will be done' with a depth of meaning that it does not always possess in so-called Christian prayer.

2:11–13 Job's friends. Job's friends have not always received the credit due to them. A 'Job's comforter' has come to be a very doubtful distinction. 11 In fairness to these men let us remember that when a multitude of fair-weather friends mysteriously disappeared, their friendship staunchly faced the storm. They had once rejoiced with a rejoicing Job; they were no less ready to weep with a weeping Job. 12 The sight of Job's disfigured countenance filled them with profound anguish. 13 For seven days they sat in silent sympathy with the sufferer—surely clear evidence of the sterling worth of their friendship. The ministry of silence helped Job much more than the ministry of words (cf. 13:5). There is a warning here for those who seek to comfort sorrowing hearts.

3:1 - 14:22 FIRST CYCLE OF SPEECHES

3:1–26 Wretched life! Blessed death!

We hear a cry of anguish from a soul quivering with agony. In this and in other speeches we must not submit every statement to microscopic examination, assuming that every word has been thoroughly weighed before utterance and is an exact expression of Job's deepest thoughts. Job was soon to complain that his friends were training their verbal armoury upon the speeches of a desperate man, which he himself readily acknowledged were as wind (cf. 6:26). As this hurricane sweeps before us, we must marvel, not at every twist it takes, but at the agony of spirit behind it.

3:1–12 Job curses his birthday. 4 May God above not seek it. God is thought of as summoning forth the successive days. Cf. Is. 40:26, where He summons the stars. May the day which summoned Job to wretchedness never be called forth again! 5 Let the blackness of the day terrify it. The reference is to eclipses. 6 Let it not rejoice among the days of the year. May it be blotted out from the calendar, from the joyful company of the days! 7 A proud joyful voice had once welcomed his coming into the world (cf. Jn. 16:21). May such a voice never be heard again on that night! 8 Let those curse it who curse the day, i.e. the sorcerers, thought of as having the power to make a day unlucky. Leviathan. Some see here a reference to the dragon of popular mythology who, by twisting himself round the sun, could cause eclipses; others, to the monster whom God vanquished at creation. In ch. 41 Leviathan is the crocodile.

3:13–26 Life's fitful fever. 13 The troubles of life are contrasted with the placid sleep of death. The more Job dwells on the fact of death the more he finds himself fascinated by it. He thinks of his company in the dormitory of death: 14, 15 distinguished men; 16 still-born children; 17 the wicked whose passions no longer shake themselves (cf. Is. 57:20) or other people; the weary who at last have found a place of rest; 18 slaves who no longer hear the taskmaster's strident shout; 19 the small and the great, once severed by the world's standards, now lying side by side.

St. Francis of Assisi could address death as 'Thou, most kind and gentle death'. Job could have used exactly the same language but for different reasons. For St. Francis, death was a creature of his God and King whom he could summon to praise the Creator like other creatures—a signpost lit with the radiance of immortality pointing to a heavenly home where a Father's love had planned many glad surprises. For Job, it was an escape from life, an anaesthetic which would make his soul forget the 'slings and arrows of outrageous fortune'. 20 The light of life appears as a doubtful privilege. It only shows up the hapless lot of the miserable and the embittered. 21 In Job we have a man in whose eyes death is no longer the prince of terrors to be shunned, but a prize to be sought with the avidity of a man digging for treasure. 23 The light can only mock the man who has lost the way in life, who has the feeling that God has hedged him in at every turn. Strahan comments pertinently: 'Light without liberty is a poor boon.' The most brilliant light can only mock a man in a dungeon, or a bird in a cage. In sharp contrast to this mood, see Ps. 118:5. 24 For my sighing comes as my bread. Moff. probably has the sense: 'Sighs are my daily bread.'

4:1 – 5:27 Eliphaz speaks

4:1–11 He offers advice. Job has broken the silence. Eliphaz now offers words of help, of healing and of warning. 2 He hopes that by so doing he will not offend his friend; but he is in the grip of the inner constraint of truth. His duty to his friend, to his own convictions, and to his God forces him to speak. 3–5 His first appeal to Job is to one who has been a distinguished member of the 'ministry of encouragement' in the past. He had been quick to help all who were treading the via dolorosa. Now that he was on that way himself, let him apply the comfort he had offered to others. 6 Let him turn to the consolations of religion and to the testimony of a clear conscience.

7–11 The lesson of Job's fine record of service to those in need has been underlined. Eliphaz now gives expression to the thoughts set in motion by Job's cry of anguish. Job had revealed a passionate longing for death. Let him remember that sudden, unnatural death is the portion, not of the righteous, but of the wicked. Cf. 5:26.

4:12 – 5:7 Job's criticisms answered. Eliphaz replies to Job's implied criticism of God's treatment of him. How can frail, imperfect mortal man venture to raise critical eyes to his Maker? 12–16 He bolsters his argument by impressively narrating a vision which he had once experienced. 17 The mysterious voice had clearly demonstrated the absurdity of mortal man expecting to be righteous before God. 18 When complete trustworthiness and service without error cannot be claimed by God's heavenly servants, 19 how dare any man, with his fleeting life, with his only partially successful quest after wisdom, imply by his demeanour that he has a right to make that claim? Before the moth means 'sooner than the moth' or 'like the moth' (LXX, RV mg.). 21 Tent-cord. Their death is compared to the collapse of a tent by plucking up the tent-cord.

5:1 Job's appeal against God can find no support among the angels. The case of morally and spiritually senseless people who are fretful under God's chastening rod (cf. 5:17) ought to be a solemn warning against making any such appeal. 2 Jealousy. 'Indignation' (RV mg.) makes excellent sense. 3 Such impatience merely paves the way for further calamities, a truth Eliphaz deduces from his observations of life. 4 The gate of the town was the place where eastern justice was administered. 5 Out of the thorns may refer to the raids of nomads bursting through the thorn hedges about the fields. 6, 7 Trouble does not germinate itself, says Eliphaz; it springs from man's evil heart, as inevitably as sparks fly up from a fire.

5:8–27 Job urged to appeal to God. 8–16 Eliphaz extols the power, kindness and justice of God. 17 Accept, he says, the chastening of such a God, sent presumably to correct some flaw in the character, and all will yet be well. 18 The Almighty hurts to heal. Bear the hurt, and the healing will extend to every conceivable trouble; 19–27 it will ensure prosperity for field, flock and home alike, a prosperity for ripe old age to enjoy. A man in harmony with God is in harmony with nature too. 19 Six . . . seven. The numerals have the force of 'in every conceivable case'.

There is much to admire in Eliphaz. First, he is the most sympathetic of Job's friends. He does not probe Job's soul with clumsy fingers. His wounds are not the wounds of a foe, but the faithful wounds of a friend. Second, he comes, not as a man puffed up with human philosophy, but as a man with a real experience of God. He feels God has spoken to him about suffering; that is why he must speak to Job. His words again and again have a ring about them which we find echoed in other scriptures. With 5:13 cf. 1 Cor. 3:19 (the only clear case of quotation of the book of Job in the NT). With 5:17 cf. Ps. 94:12; Pr. 3:11; Heb. 12:5, 6.

But while Eliphaz is the most sympathetic of Job's physicians, he is still a physician who fails. There is no acknowledgment of the extraordinary submission to God Job has already shown (e.g., in 1:21 and 2:10). There is no clear word of sympathy in all his words. Strahan refers to him as 'a theologian chilled by his creed'. He resembles a commander urging soldiers who have been exhausted by struggling against fearful odds to still more resolute endeavour, without a word in praise of what has already been accomplished.

Again, his ready assumption that Job's suffering must be the reaping of his own sinfulness ill-equipped him to be a true comforter. He was not wrong to claim that he had a divine explanation of the facts of human suffering. Experience abundantly testifies that in countless ways man brings trouble upon himself by his sinfulness. Eliphaz was a mouthpiece of divine revelation there; but when he went on to assume that he had a divine commentary upon all the facts of human suffering and that he had correctly diagnosed Job's case, it was the word of man, not the Word of God. He has not stood where we have stood, witnessing the clash between God and the accuser in the heavenly places, where issues of which Job and Eliphaz are ignorant are being decided. He has not learnt the salutary humility of Paul's confession of the limitations of human knowledge: 'now we see in a mirror dimly'. How often a man must find a place for that confession in his religious thinking, and not least of all with regard to the problem of suffering!

6:1 – 7:21 Job answers Eliphaz

6:1–13 A cry for fair play. Eliphaz obviously views with disapproval Job's impatience under suffering, and the latter accuses him of looking only at one side of the balance. 2, 3 Eliphaz censures the weight of the impatience: but if only he were to look at the affliction side, he would find the load there immeasurably heavier. 4, 5 Job feels like a man into whose body the almighty Archer is sending poisoned arrows. He cannot help their poison going right through him; he cannot help wild, delirious words. Is due allowance being made for that? There is reason for his cry of agony. His is not a case of 'much ado about nothing'. 6, 7 He has lost his taste for life, which he compares to 'insipid food and saltless' (Moff.). The slime of the purslane. Cf. AV, RV, Moff. 'the white of an egg'. 8–10 For death, on the other hand, he has an eager taste. The prospect of death is his only comfort. The fearlessness of Job's attitude to death is emphasized. His mind runs to meet the thought of death, even death through a gateway of unsparing pain. He has nothing to fear from death, nor from the God whose commands he has never denied. 11–13 Life has made too heavy demands upon his strength and patience. He can fight no further battles for he is no superman, with the strength of stones and with flesh of brass. Natural resources are exhausted.

6:14–30 A rebuke to his friends. A man who is sinking under affliction ought to be able to count on the sympathy of his friends. 14 It is impossible to be sure of the meaning of this verse. Cf. AV 'To him that is afflicted pity should be shewed from his friend; but he forsaketh the fear of the Almighty'; RV '. . . . even to him that forsaketh the fear of the Almighty'; Moff. 'Friends should be kind to a despairing man, or he will give up faith in the Almighty'. Job has been denied human pity. 15, 16 In a striking figure he compares his friends to brooks. We have a picture of them, bound by snow and ice in the cold weather and thawing with the return of warmer weather, until at length they dry up altogether. 18–20 We are next given a glimpse of Arabian caravans hurrying towards the brooks, only to be disappointed. They swing away into the desert to their doom. 21 A reason for the friends becoming broken cisterns whose waters have failed is suggested: the fear roused by a contemplation of Job's calamities has chilled their sympathy. They are afraid that to take Job's side would mean standing on the other side from the God who has it within His power to bring similar trials upon them.

To the end of the chapter there is a contrast between what Job expected from his friends and what he actually received from them. 22–24 He had not requested aid, but he had hoped for genuine sympathy and for forthright dealing. Instead, there had been insinuations against his integrity. 25–27 His friends had made the mistake of dealing with the wild, whirling speeches of a desperate man as if every word was cool and calculated. 28 He is ready to stand by his integrity, to look the whole world in the face with clear conscience and steady eye. 29 Turn has the sense 'change your ground; look for some other interpretation of my suffering'. 30 Job asks, 'Is my moral taste perverted? Cannot I differentiate between good and evil?'

7:1–10 The hardness and brevity of human life. In a series of striking figures Job pictures life as a hard struggle. 1, 2 It is like a distasteful period of service laid upon a hired servant, whose only consolations are the cool shadows of the evening, in which the day's work is forgotten, and the wages which he receives at the end of the day. 3, 4 Job can think of no sweeter rest, and no more valuable wages, than death. Is it any wonder when life holds sleepless nights and loathsome disease? 5 Worms means that his sores breed maggots. 6–10 He proceeds to dwell on the brevity of life. Life is a swiftly moving shuttle; wind; an insubstantial, fading cloud, moving towards the grave—the realm from which there is no return to familiar scenes.

7:11–21 A remonstrance with God. 11 Impelled by the weight of human misery and by his own suffering, he utters a bitter complaint. 12 The divine treatment of him might almost seem to imply that he was like the sea, to be kept under restraint, or a cruel monster endangering the order of the universe. 13–16 What accounts for this unremitting superintendence of him, which has scared the wits out of him and made him detest life? 15 My bones. Job has been reduced to a skeleton. 17, 18 The atmosphere is strikingly different from that of Ps. 8:4, where the question arresting the attention is, 'How can a majestic, powerful God stoop so low that He notices and plans for insignificant man?' Here the question is rather, 'If God is so great, why can't He leave man alone?' 19 Till I swallow down my spittle is an expression still in use among the Arabs, meaning 'for a single moment'. 20 Watcher of men. Moff. 'thou Spy upon mankind'. Why must this great God be so restlessly on the prowl? Here Job seems to think of God as an irate inspector, whose visits are always followed by unhappiness, for He is certain to find fault. What can the little sin of a little man mean to the mighty God? Can He not find it in His heart to forgive? 21 Soon a divine approach in forgiveness will be too late, for the sleep of death will have overtaken him. In these verses we find a mistaken view of sin. It argues: 'I don't see that my sin can make very much difference to God. It is not asking much of a mighty God to forgive the little sins of little men.' There is a thoroughly modern ring about such words. Compare the puzzled question of a dying farmer following upon the vicar's call to him to repent: 'What harm have I ever done Him?' He would have united with Job in wondering how his sin could disturb Almighty God. Gladstone was on safer ground when he held that the tiniest sin that settled on his soul gave God as much pain as the speck of grit blown into his own eye. If Job could have listened to Calvary's commentary upon sin that is 'sinful beyond measure' (Rom. 7:13) his language would have been different. It is because God is so great, not in spite of it, that He has taken such drastically sacrificial action to deal with what people term so lightly the 'little sins of little men'.

8:1–22 Bildad speaks

8:1–7 A rebuke. This friend calls upon Job to bow before traditional wisdom. 2 First he rebukes Job for his 'wild and whirling words' (Moff.) which have involved a criticism of God's dealings with him and with humanity as a whole. 3 Bildad stands forth as the champion of the justice of God. 4 Goodness and evil alike reap the harvest they have sown. Job's children had sown evil; God sent them an evil harvest. 5 Let Job sow goodness; let him adopt the attitude of a humble suppliant; 6 let him be pure and upright, 7 and the harvest he will reap will defy comparison with anything in his past experience.

8:8–19 Tradition. 8–10 Listen to the voice of the past which has the last word to speak about the issues we are discussing. Behind this section is the assumption that 'they are short-lived ignorant moderns, not wise and happy antediluvians' (Strahan). Pearl after pearl of that ancient wisdom is offered for Job's examination and instruction. The perils of the ungodly man appear in striking figures. Bildad does not expressly say 'Thou art the man'; but he is certainly keeping his mind open to the possibility of unrighteousness in Job. 11, 12 The picture is of the waters of the river receding from the papyrus and the reed-grass growing on the fringes. The healthy vegetation then withers and dies, sooner than any herb. 13 The hope of the ungodly man does not save him (cf. Rom. 8:24); it damns him, for his hope is not in God but in himself. 14 It is as insubstantial as a spider's web. 15 The household which he has always looked upon as solid and lasting will suddenly crumble beneath him. 16–18 He is a plant with the evidences of healthy life upon it, which suffers sudden destruction. The picture in v. 17 is of a plant with its roots snaking their way through the stones of the stone heap, going deep down into the earth. 19 The joy of his way is difficult. If this reading is followed, Bildad must either be speaking ironically or he is describing what has been a joyous way of life. The LXX reads 'This is the end of the godless' (cf. Moff. 'So ends a godless man').

8:20–22 Destiny. Is Job a man of integrity? If so, eventually he must find himself in a world of rejoicing. Calamity rounds off the life of the ungodly alone. We find two grave deficiencies in Bildad which make his words worse than useless from Job's standpoint. First, he was tragically lacking in the sympathy for which Job craved. His assumption that the sudden death of Job's family was the divine punishment for their sinfulness was a sword thrust into an agonized heart. Job knew that it was untrue. In the second place, he was totally hidebound by tradition. He was so busily engaged in looking into the past that he quite failed to realize that Job was feeling out for a richer and more intelligent experience of God than anything he himself had known. He assumed that the whole of the divine Word had been spoken; he would have been hostile to the thought that a clearer, more dynamic word was yet to be spoken through prophets, saints and apostles, and uniquely through One who was the Word come down from heaven.

9:1 – 10:22 Job answers Bildad

9:1–16 How can a man be just before God? The theme of the whole of this chapter is the impossibility of obtaining justice from God. Job does not attempt a detailed answer. He fastens rather on a general principle accepted by all the friends and expounded by Eliphaz in 4:17—the impossibility of mortal man appearing just before God. 2 Job accepts the truth of the principle, but goes on to deny that there can be a grain of comfort in it. 3 What is the point in attempting to establish one's innocence before a God of infinite wisdom, who can ask a thousand unanswerable questions? 4–10 He is a God of infinite power too, shaking heaven and earth, heaping up marvels beyond human ken. Plead one's case before such a God? How futile! 11 When God transfers His attention from nature to man, His power sweeps on just as arbitrarily.

12 When He pounces on His prey who can challenge His action? 13, 14 When even the stoutest rebels at length have to capitulate before the naked power of God, how can he, Job, or anyone else, hope to stem its onward rush by mere words, no matter how carefully marshalled they may be? The helpers of Rahab. The reference may be to a current myth which spoke of the overthrow of an assault on heaven made by the sea monster Rahab and her confederates. 15 Even stainless innocence, Job goes on, would be struck dumb before Him, and would only break the menacing silence at length to blurt out a plea for pity. 16 Even if God had answered Job's call that God and he should meet in some judgment-court, he is sceptical about receiving a fair hearing.

9:17–24 A complaint against God. A terrible picture of God follows: 17 a God storming and striking without cause; 18 not giving him a moment's breathing-space; 19 relying not on justice but on might; 22 destroying good and evil men indiscriminately; 23 laughing at the tortures of the innocent; 24 allowing the earth to be the happy hunting-ground of the wicked, covering the faces of judges so that they do not see aright. How can he expect a fair hearing from such a God? 20, 21 Job is tortured by the fear that he would be so upset and bewildered that he would confess a guilt that did not belong to him in reality. I am blameless. Squarely he takes his stand on his integrity. He cannot relinquish that even if he dies for it. Connect this with 22 It is all one. Probably the sense is: 'It is all one whether I live or die. Life has become obnoxious.'

9:25–35 The brevity of life. 25, 26 Job turns from the wounds of the world to consider his own sorrows and the fleeting nature of life. 27 When more optimistic feelings struggle towards the surface, 28, 29 they are driven down again by the knowledge that God is determined to hold him guilty. He may as well give up the unequal struggle. 30, 31 Job is up against a God who intends to duck in filth a man genuinely craving for purity of soul. 32, 33 'Oh that I were dealing with man and not God!' cries Job; 'for then I would be on ground where I could feel at home. But it is not so, nor is there an umpire to ensure fair play for God and me'. 34, 35 The chapter closes with Job turning sadly from what might have been to the stern reality he knows—the terrifying divine rod smiting him. If only God would take away, he would be able to speak out fearlessly in affirmation of his innocence, for he has a clear conscience.

In the remarkable yearning for the God of the mysterious, terrifying beyond to reveal Himself in the fabric of understandable human experience, one is reminded forcibly of the words of Browning's Saul: "Tis my flesh that I seek in the Godhead.' In this cry for an umpire between God and man we see a prophetic reaching out for the 'one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus' (1 Tim. 2:5). There was no finally satisfactory answer to Job short of the incarnation. The passage is strongly forward-looking to Bethlehem.

10:1–7 An appeal to God. 1, 2 With no umpire to help him, Job is forced to appeal directly to God, in an attempt to solve the mystery of the divine antagonism to him. Every suggestion his distraught imagination can concoct is now expressed, no matter how extraordinary. 3 Is the divine oppression of him a paying concern? 4 Can it be explained by divine short-sightedness, which means that God cannot see clearly what He is doing in His dealings with men? 5, 6 Or can it be that, like man, God knows that His span of life is limited? Therefore He must punish what He suspects to be sinfulness before there has been time to examine the case thoroughly. 7 Even while expressing these suggestions Job knows their emptiness. He cannot get past the conviction that God must know him to be a man of integrity.

10:8–22 The depths of despair. 8, 9 There follows an appeal to the divine Potter who has lavished such painstaking care upon His handiwork. 10–12 Both in the antenatal period and the years which followed Job can see many signal evidences of divine preservation. What was the goal before the divine mind in such dealings with him? 13ff. In the answer which follows we see Job touching depths of doubt and despair blacker than anything found elsewhere in the book. The Potter has concentrated on making the vessel especially beautiful so that, in the hour when He decides to mar it, the contrast between past and present may be all the more striking. 'All the while this was thy dark design!' (Moff.). 14 Job feels that he is dealing with a God who is swift to note even trivial sins. 15 His imagination quails at the prospect of what would happen if he were really guilty. Righteousness makes no difference. He still has to hang his head, cowed before a God 16 who, like a fierce lion, delights in hunting him with relentless assiduity. 17 Fresh hosts. The thought is that host after host of the afflictions which are God's witnesses against his integrity lurk about him. 18–22 There are two pathetic cries in these verses: 'Would that my one and only cradle had been the grave!' and 'Cannot I have a brief breathing-space before the perpetual night of death?'

11:1–20 Zophar speaks

11:1–6 Job is rebuked. 1, 2 Zophar bluntly reproves Job for his prodigality in empty words. 3 He cannot expect men who know better to stand by in silence. 4 Job's words have implied a claim to straight thinking and straight living. 5, 6 If only God would speak, he would find both claims utterly shattered. His puny human wisdom would wilt before the vast sweep of the divine wisdom; and he would discover that, in actual fact, God was recompensing his sinfulness very lightly.

11:7–12 God's wisdom magnified. 7–9 The meaning of this powerful and memorable passage is well brought out in Moffatt: 'Can you discover the deep things of God? can you reach the Almighty's range of wisdom? Higher it is than heaven—how can you match it? deeper than death—how can you measure it? Its scope is vaster than the earth, and wider than the sea.' 10, 11 It is this wisdom which passes its verdict upon vain man, and such a verdict must be infallible. 12 Let Job submit to the breaking-in process which the divine wisdom wants to carry through, and there is hope that genuine understanding will be the final outcome, even though, like other men, he has the stubborn stupidity of a wild ass's colt. The meaning is that Zophar sees no more hope for stupid people than for a wild ass to be born human. Stupidity can be lost only in the vast sea of divine revelation.

11:13–20 A call to repentance. 13, 14 Zophar now calls on Job to put away all known sin and portrays the glittering rewards of repentance. 15 One result will be the ability to look the world in the face fearlessly and unashamedly. Cf. 10:15. 16, 17 It will lead also to forgetfulness of the misery of the past, whose darkness will be swallowed up in the brilliant light of the present; 18, 19 and to security and hope (cf. 7:6). 20 But if there is no repentance, the only hope left for Job will be to breathe his last.

Zophar is the narrow dogmatist par excellence. We find in him two flaws characteristic of his type. In the first place he is too confident in his religious standpoint. We find no traces of a humble 'I do not know'. He is right in maintaining that he is in touch with truth (see, e.g., 11:7–11, which speaks of the peerless, transcendent wisdom of God). He is wrong in thinking that he has all the truth. He understands not a whit more than Job about the reason for Job's sufferings. Second, he is lacking in humility. He is swift to call Job to go down on his knees at the recollection of the limitations of human knowledge. Yet, as he talks down to Job, he forgets that the mind scrutinizing his sufferings is limited too. Unknown to himself, his deductions from Job's misery have a far greater stamp of the wild ass's colt (11:12) on them than the most agonized cries of the sufferer.

12:1 – 14:22 Job answers his friends

12:1–12 He resents their assumed omniscience. Up to the present Job has given only scant attention to the sentiments of his friends. 2–4 Now he brings to bear his powers of sarcasm and logic upon their facile assumption that they have a right to talk down to him. 5 How easy for them to mouth their glib commonplaces in their still secure and comfortable world! 6 If he had been a successful robber and not a religious man, his position perhaps would have commanded greater respect. Their god in their hand. The only god these robbers worship is their own power, as symbolized by the sword in their strong hand. 7–9 Job now states his familiarity with everything that they have said about the wisdom and power of God. Even the beasts of the field are not ignorant of that. The voice of nature is one and undivided in that respect. 10 He is also aware that all life is in the hand of God. The question perturbing his mind, which his friends will not face, concerns the use to which God puts His power. What kind of character controls the operation of the power? 11 He is not prepared to swallow down, unexamined and undigested, the opinions of others, no matter how ancient, if they do not commend themselves to his moral and spiritual palate. 12 Moffatt is probably right in translating: 'Wisdom, you argue, lies with aged men . . . ?' Cf. 8:8–10.

12:13–25 A description of divine power. Job pictures God's power sweeping on indiscriminately and irresistibly, devastating the earth in natural calamities, shattering the influence of the wise, the mighty, the respected, bringing them to power only in order to grind them down again, saddling the people with leaders whose idea of the direction they are taking is no clearer than that of one groping in the dark, or of an intoxicated man. We look in vain for any principle integrating the divine actions which he describes, and feel that we are meant to conclude that for Job in this hour there was none. 18 The bonds of kings are the bonds by which they control the people. 22 The exact force of this verse is elusive. Perhaps there is a reference to God's exact knowledge of the most deeply concealed secrets of the heart. Cf. Is. 29:15.

13:1–12 He rejects their counsel. Again Job turns from his friends, scathingly and impatiently. They whitewash with lies and are futile physicians of the soul, seeking to justify the ways of God by maxims of ashes and defences of clay. He accuses them of being, not genuine allies of God, but cringing sycophants, using twisted arguments to bolster a cause they support out of a wholesome respect for their own skin. We may compare them with a man supporting the cause of a bully, not because he is interested in the rights and wrongs of the cause, but because he is afraid of the man's strong right arm. The friends have made much of God's omniscient gaze upon Job. Are they remembering that the very same gaze is upon the motives for their championship of God? How will they fare when they stand at the bar of the majesty and the omniscience of God? 9–11 A striking hint is given that sincere opposition to God may fare better than insincere support of Him.

13:13–28 He appeals to God. 13 Conscious that further appeals to his friends are useless, Job turns to God. 14–18 He is aware that such an appeal is a risky affair, but he cannot prevent himself defending his case. 19 Recklessly he calls for a successful challenger of his innocence. If such a person could be found, he would not have one further word to say.

15 In the understanding of the section the interpretation of this verse is both crucial and difficult. RSV I have no hope wrecks many a good sermon following AV 'Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him'! This RSV rendering adopts an alternative Hebrew reading l'ō (not) for lô (for him), which gives the translation '. . . I will not wait' or 'I have no hope'. Similarly RV mg. reads 'Behold, he will slay me; I wait for him' (i.e. to strike). W. A. Irwin argues against the excision of hope from v. 15 and recommends the translation, 'Though he may slay me, I will not delay; but I will argue my ways to his face.' The following points must be remembered in support of this position: a. Blank hopelessness does not seem to fit in with v. 16, with its assertion that the verdict will go favourably for Job and that it is only godless people who have reason to be afraid in God's presence. b. It is perfectly possible to say that in v. 15 there is an anticipation of the fine insights of 14:13–17. c. The thought of vv. 9–11, that God is opposed to the dishonesty of the friends, suggests a just God who will not disappoint the hopes of those who put their trust in Him. Perhaps the sermons on the basis of the AV of v. 15 can stand after all!

20, 21 Job proceeds to appeal for a fair hearing from God. This would mean the removal of the heavy hand now upon him and of the numbing, frightening sense of the divine majesty. 22 If these conditions are granted, he will be equally happy in the role of plaintiff or defendant. 23–26 As it is, he is ignorant of the charge against him. He asks for a clear statement of the reason for the divine hostility, which has issued in such a harsh sentence. Can it be that God is making him smart for the unthinking irresponsibilities of youth? 27 Whatever the reason, there is no denying the reality of the situation: the drastic restrictions God has imposed upon him. And yet, what is the target of the divine enmity? 28 Just a humble creature, tossed about by life, with the mark of corruption upon him.

14:1–22 The yearning for an after-life. 1–6 It is strange, says Job, that divine justice should fasten on a creature like man. His existence is fleeting, troublous, and involved in the universal sinfulness of humanity. Why then must a single individual, who is no heinous sinner, incur such a weight of divine displeasure? Cannot God grant the creature of a day a brief breathing-space from trouble? 7–12 The fate of things is contrasted with the fate of persons, to the advantage of the former. A felled tree may sprout again, but death writes an inexorable 'nevermore' on man's life. 13–15 The gloom of the picture penetrates Job's spirit so profoundly that there is a dramatic revulsion from it. His soul soars up in quest for the light of a worth-while hereafter. At present he feels the rod of the God of wrath across his shoulders. Presumably he must bear it while the present life lasts. But after that? He gives expression to the lovely dream of the God of grace granting him asylum, first in Sheol, the abode of the dead, and then calling him back to an existence in which He, the Creator, would yearn over the work of His hands. If I could believe that, says Job, 'I could endure my weary post until relief arrived' (14b, Moff.). They are the words of a man who cannot let go his faith in the God whose present dealings are a blank mystery to him; a man raising questions which Jesus alone can answer. Cf. Jn. 11:25; 2 Tim. 1:10, etc. 16, 17 The glory of the dream fades in the recollection of the grim facts of the present. The God of grace retires to the background. and Job imagines a God who, miser-like, keeps constant check on every sin; 18, 19 a God who pulverizes the mightiest works of nature and dashes the hopes of man. 20 Death is the supreme trump card of man's divine Antagonist. 21 It makes man unable to rejoice in the rejoicings of the children he leaves behind, or to weep with them in their perplexities. 22 It does not even mean the cessation of his own pain. This may refer to the terrible idea that the soul in Sheol had sympathy for the decomposing body, feeling the touch of corruption upon it.

15:1 – 21:34 SECOND CYCLE OF SPEECHES

15:1–35 Second speech of Eliphaz

Eliphaz has been cut to the quick on finding Job treading under foot the pearls of wisdom let drop by his friends. It seems that their attempts to make Job bow in humble submission before the all-wise and all-powerful God have been unsuccessful. Perhaps he will be warned in time by a commentary upon the divine judgment descending upon the wicked. This is the spearhead of the friends' attack in the second cycle of speeches. It seems that the consolations of God (v. 11) of which they have been the mouthpiece have been too small for Job. Perhaps the terrors of God will bring him to his senses.

As we listen to Eliphaz we feel that his pride has been wounded as well as his religious convictions.

15:1–16 Job's attitude criticized. 1–6 Eliphaz accuses Job of being a windbag and irreligious at heart. His assumption of integrity and his criticism of God have been a crafty defence mechanism. 7, 8 He accuses Job of being self-important. He talks like some primeval man, existing from the beginning of things, like a member of God's secret council, like a man with a monopoly of wisdom. 9–13 How preposterous to reject the testimony of age and experience! 14–16 His talk throughout has tragically ignored the uncleanness of man who greedily gulps down iniquity as a thirsty man drinks water. If only he would raise his eyes to the God before whom the very angels and the heavens are stained!

15:17–35 The fate of the wicked. Eliphaz takes up Job's statement in 12:6. 17–19 He calls to his aid the words of the wise, reaching back to the good old days when there were no foreign influences to corrupt morality and religion. 20 Job had claimed that wicked men enjoy security. Monstrously untrue! Such security as they have is dogged by constant pain; 21 it is haunted by the dread of coming calamity, the first threatening murmurs of which their ears are for ever catching. 22–24 And when at last the dreaded darkness descends, all hope must be surrendered. For them, now, only violence, hunger, trouble and anguish. 25, 26 In their hour of fleeting security they may make their proud assaults upon the Almighty, as if their stout shields could keep them safe; 27 they may play the role of successful, bloated sensualists; 28 they may be guilty of the impiety of rebuilding ruined cities which have borne the curse of God. 29, 30 But the final darkness of the day of doom is gathering, which will blot out their prosperity. 31–35 Their fate is the fate of a plant, withering and dying prematurely.

16:1–5 He spurns such empty comfort. 2, 3 Windy words. Eliphaz has accused Job of being a windbag rebel against God (cf. 15:2–6). Job hurls back the accusation that his friends are windbag comforters. 4, 5 If he were comforter instead of sufferer, there would be genuine substance in the comfort he would offer.

16:6–17 His desperate condition described. The woefulness of his impasse is drawn in poignant fashion. 6 Speech and silence alike are powerless to ease his misery. 7, 8 His gaunt frame is proof positive that the grip of his divine Antagonist is upon him. 9 In his afflictions he feels that God is straddling him like a wild beast, looking down on its powerless prey with flashing eyes. 10, 11 The hostility of God is echoed in the hostility of men, 'the pack of petty foes that howl at the heels of his greater enemy' (A. B. Davidson). 12, 13 At the end of v. 12 the figure changes: God appears as an archer, sending a stream of arrows into his vitals. 14 Yet another change of figure: God is now a warrior, repeatedly breaching the walls of the stronghold of his soul. 15–17 These divine assaults have condemned him to habitual mourning and humiliation; and yet the target of these assaults has been an innocent man.

16:18–21 His faith again triumphs. Once again Job rises from the profoundest depths to the greatest heights. He has been unable to let go his innocence in face of the insinuations of his friends. Now we find he cannot let go his God in face of his ugliest doubts and fears. 18 When an unjust death lays in the dust his innocent life, the voice of his innocent blood will rise to highest heaven. Cf. Gn. 4:10. 19 And there in heaven he suddenly catches sight of a divine Champion, a divine Sympathizer, who will be prepared to vouch for his integrity. 20, 21 Tearfully he appeals to the heavenly Witness to support his cause in the teeth of the insinuations of his friends, and of the shattering blows of the God who is responsible for his earthly afflictions. This passionate longing for a heavenly Witness on his side strikingly points forward to the Christian thought of 'an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous' (1 Jn. 2:1). Here faith is reaching out for a 'God for us'. Again, Jesus alone can answer Job. Cf. Heb. 9:24.

16:22 – 17:16 The brevity and sorrow of life. 16:22 – 17:2 The appeal gains force when he remembers that the years are rolling him forward inexorably towards the grave. Away with the mocking hopes of a bright tomorrow outlined by his friends, when the misery of today will be forgotten! Away with all hopes offered by men! 3–5 Only God can undertake suretyship for him. 6ff. The misery of Job's present lot is described. He has become the butt of moralizing and insult. 8, 9 Righteous men may well be astonished at such suffering for such a man, though it cannot break their inflexible determination to pursue the way of righteousness whatever the price. Scholars have differed widely about these two verses. Some have maintained that the sentiments sound strange on Job's lips, and have suggested that they have strayed to their present place from a speech of one of the friends. This conjecture seems unnecessary. Delitzsch speaks of the passage as 'a rocket which shoots above the tragic darkness of the book lighting it up suddenly although only for a short time'. In a similar strain A. B. Davidson describes it as 'perhaps the most surprising and lofty in the book'. 10–12 The gloom deepens as the chapter proceeds. Again the hope of the friends that Job's night would be changed to day are swept aside. 13–16 His only hope is in the grave for which he has almost family affection.

18:1–21 Bildad's second speech

Bildad has nothing new to say and certainly nothing that can have any significance for Job. A portrayal of the doom of the wicked can speak only to a man with a guilty conscience.

18:1–4 Introduction. These verses introduce his main theme and reveal how keenly he resents Job's attitude to the attempts of his friends to be helpful. 2 Bildad accuses Job of hunting for far-fetched arguments which are mere words without any real content. 3 Job is treating them like unintelligent cattle. 4 He has accused an angry God of tearing him (cf. 16:9), while in reality he is tearing himself. His attitude virtually demands that the whole earth, with its moral order, should be turned upside down to substantiate his criticism of God and his championship of himself.

18:5–21 The fate of the wicked. 13 The firstborn of death. Moff. 'deadly disease'. The general sense is: 'Death's most loyal henchman will be his foe.' 15 Brimstone is scattered. Strahan comments: 'It was the custom to spread salt over places which had come under a ban; and brimstone, suggestive of the cities of the plain, may have been used to symbolize a deeper curse.'

19:1–29 Job answers Bildad

R. S. Franks speaks of this chapter as the 'watershed of the book'. From the most tragic sense of dereliction, Job rises to the most triumphant affirmation of faith.

19:1–22 His humiliation at God's hand described. Anger gives way to sorrow as he addresses the friends. 2–4 Even if he has sinned, his sin cannot harm them. Ten times means 'often' (cf. Gn. 31:7). 5–12 He complains that God is bent on humiliating him. Not content with prostrating him through this personal antagonism, God has enlisted a perfect host of co-operators. 13–20 Job's relatives, intimate friends, servants, and his very wife, all turn from him with loathing and he is thus robbed of the affection of those who mean most to him. 21 Quite broken down by the realization of his lonely state, Job pathetically appeals to his friends for pity. The tragic relationship between Job and his friends appears in a clear light. Surely, says Job, the realization that the hand of God is afflicting him ought to move them to pity. Yet it was for that very reason that they could not pity him. Their inflexible creed would not allow them to do so. They had to choose between their friend and their faith. 22 demonstrates as strikingly as any verse in Scripture the extent of our debt to the Lord Jesus Christ as regards our view of God. In our Christian era, our complaint against men must often be that they are not godlike enough (cf. Lk. 6:35, 36; Eph. 4:32). But Job's complaint against his friends was that they were too godlike. In their attitude to his suffering, which was gradually becoming more unsympathetic, he imagined he saw a reflection of the attitude of God who seemed so callous about the weight of sorrow with which He was crushing him down to despair.

19:23–29 Faith again triumphs. He looks into the future to find the hope, denied him by the present, blazing forth again. 23, 24 If only his case could be recorded in a book, on a leaden tablet, or in an inscription graven on the face of a rock! Surely generations to come would react more favourably to it than does his own. But, dramatically and impressively, we see that this man cannot for long rest content with the thought of a future 'well done' from the lips of humanity. His sense of alienation from man is infinitely less serious than his sense of alienation from God. There we have the key to the agony of heart which we see in the book.

25–27 Suddenly we have a wonderful vision of a Redeemer or 'Vindicator' (RSV mg.) appearing to champion his cause, to allow him to hear the 'not guilty' for which he craved, and to give him a vision of God. In general it must be said that no Christian can read vv. 25–27 without finding the passage a mirror of the One who 'always lives to make intercession' (Heb. 7:25), who has 'brought life and immortality to light through the gospel' (2 Tim. 1:10). But 'we must not turn Job into a modern Christian' (Wood). He was unaware of the priceless jewels encased in his words. 'He was like an aeolian harp across which the wind sweeps making music', says G. C. Morgan.

Wood treats vv. 25–27 as a vision corresponding to that of Eliphaz (4:12–21). While this is not impossible the evidence seems to be lacking. The Hebrew text of the passage is extremely difficult, making dogmatism about every interpretation out of place. Redeemer (Heb. gō'ēl) is rendered 'One to champion me' (Moff.). Strahan summarizes the role of the gō'ēl by saying, 'The gō'ēl was the nearest blood-relation on whom civil law imposed the duty of redeeming the property or person of his kinsman, and criminal law that of avenging his kinsman's blood if it was unjustly shed.' Is the Redeemer man or God? In recent commentaries Irwin (1962) and Wood (1966) have favoured the former view. Irwin finds the clue to his nature and function in the Ras Shamra literature which refers to 'the messenger of the gods who was instrumental in the release of the dead god of life'. This is purely conjectural. It is surely sounder to expound gō'ēl against the background of Job's thought in other passages. He has called upon God as his Judge (13:15–18); as his Witness (16:19); as an Advocate to plead his cause (16:21). It is difficult to see, then, why some scholars find it impossible to hold that Job viewed God as his gō'ēl. The same epithet is applied to God in Ps. 19:14 and in many passages in Isaiah (e.g. 41:14; 44:6; 47:4; 60:16; 63:4, 9). The truth is, however, that we have insufficient evidence to state precisely Job's conception of the person of the gō'ēl. The stress is certainly on the role of the gō'ēl: to vindicate him in the eyes of men and to effect reconciliation with God. At last. Heb. 'aḥaron can mean 'last' or 'later'. The passage does not tie down the vindication of Job's innocence to some distant resurrection day; it merely points to a coming vindication. Various translations are possible for upon the earth; e.g., 'on the dust' or 'on my grave'. Cf. 7:21; 17:16.

26 Without my flesh may also be rendered 'from my flesh' (RSV mg.). This may mean that Job was expecting to be a spectator at his vindication from the vantage-point of a body of flesh, or that he looked forward to being present at the scene as a disembodied spirit. We cannot be certain of the meaning. 27 On my side, or 'for myself' (RSV mg.). Cf. Luther's great remark that the whole of religion lies in the personal pronouns. No hearsay opinion of God for Job! And not another. RV mg. has the interesting alternative 'not as a stranger' (cf. Moff. 'estranged no longer'). This suggests the beautiful thought that Job was eagerly anticipating the time when the God of the present, who so often appeared as a 'mystery God', as a Stranger with slumbering depths of puzzling hostility to him, would appear in His true character as a Friend who would be quick to reverse the adverse opinion the present life was writing across him. The thought of the coming vindication overwhelms him. 28, 29 The chapter closes with a note of warning. Job's Vindicator will punish those who have arrayed themselves against him, assuming that they have diagnosed the real cause of his affliction.

20:1–29 Zophar's second speech

Zophar's text is the brevity of the wicked man's prosperity, and the inevitability of doom—a text equally cruel and irrelevant for Job's case. The text is expounded with power, heat and impetuosity. 2 The whole of his speech must be interpreted in the light of his remark, My thoughts answer me, because of my haste within me. Haste can be responsible for an incorrect view of man (cf. Ps. 116:11, AV, RV); and no less for an incorrect or partial view of God. 'His haste explains his theology,' says Strahan. 'Had he taken time to observe and reflect, he would have said, "Some sufferers are saints"; had he taken still more time, he might even have added, "And some are saviours".' Suffering Job appears in a false light as sinning Job. The false light on man results from a distorted vision of God. There is nothing in Zophar's words to suggest that God is anything more than an impatient judge, as impatient as Zophar himself. 'When the zealot makes his own opinions and sentiments the standard of divinity, there is a magnified Zophar on the throne of the universe' (Strahan). 26 A fire not blown upon; i.e., a fire for whose blazing there is no natural explanation. Cf. 1:16.

21:1–34 Job answers Zophar

21:1–6 Introduction. Zophar's words sting Job into giving a more detailed answer to the theme of the friends than anything that has yet appeared in the second cycle of the dialogue. 2, 3 He appeals for a fair hearing. That is the only consolation he wants from them. 4 His task is difficult enough without lack of co-operation from man, for his complaint is directed against the God of heaven. 5, 6 The very thought of pursuing it fills him with dread, but honesty compels him to face the tremendous facts his own observations are thrusting in upon him.

21:7–22 The prosperity of the wicked. Job flatly contradicts Zophar's dogmatic picture of the wicked (cf. 20:4, 5, 11, etc.). 7–12 In bold colours he paints their enduring prosperity in home, family, field and flock. 13 At the end of the day they pass away without a struggle. 14, 15 All this in spite of the flat defiance their manner of life has thrown in the face of God. 16 Is not their prosperity in their hand? cf. Moff. 'Are they not masters of their fortunes?' 17–19 It is no reply to say, as the friends might be inclined to say in defence of their position, that the children of the wicked will feel the weight of the divine displeasure. That would imply that the wicked would get off scot-free. They cannot feel the weal or woe of their children after them. 22 Suddenly Job accuses the friends of presumption in their cut-and-dried theories about divine government. They are virtually teaching God how He ought to govern, instead of facing the facts as they are.

21:23–34 The facts as Job sees them. 23–26 One man dies in effortless prosperity; another in abject misery. 27–31 Who has a right to assume that virtue explains the former and vice the latter? That is theory and not fact, theory that is wrecked on fact as can be borne out by the testimony of those who have a broad knowledge of men and affairs and who can point to specific cases where wickedness seems to pay. 34 In view of that, what comfort can he expect to find in his friends' sweeping generalities, which are based on cases which suit their argument and which conveniently ignore those which do not? 32, 33 describe how an honourable burial is given to the wicked man. His grave is carefully guarded; his success inspires widespread imitation. In v. 33 those who go before and after are members of the funeral procession.

22:1 – 31:40 THIRD CYCLE OF SPEECHES

22:1–30 Third speech of Eliphaz

22:1–5 The reason for suffering. Eliphaz proceeds to demonstrate that there must be some reason for human afflictions. The key cannot be found in God, since human morality cannot affect His almighty power. The explanation must be sought, therefore, in man. Is Job being punished for piety? Inconceivable! Then he must be paying for his wickedness. 3 To Eliphaz the answer to the question he poses is undoubtedly negative. It would be clearly positive to the writers of such passages as Je. 31:20; Ho. 11:8; Mt. 23:37; etc. In his estimation, the aloof God in the icy altitudes of His remote heaven could not be concerned in His own person about human virtue or vice. See on 7:20. He could not have said, 'God so loved the world . . .'; he could only have said, 'God has so legislated for the world . . .' He had no cross on Calvary to inform him of the love and agony on God's heart as He surveys sinning men and women, and of His gladness when they allow themselves to be set in the right relationship to Him. He knew nothing of the miracles in which Christianity glories—'the election of man, from nonentity, to be the beloved of God, and therefore (in some sense) the needed and desired of God, who but for that act needs and desires nothing, since He eternally has, and is, all goodness' (C. S. Lewis).

22:6–20 Job is openly accused. Now that Eliphaz has ventured out into the open with what has previously been only hinted by him, he proceeds with specific charges against Job. 6–9 He fathers on him the typical outrages of an oriental tyrant. It is implied that he has been practising a 'Jekyll and Hyde' existence. 10, 11 This sinfulness has been responsible for Job's present calamities. 12 Instead of giving to the exalted Lord of highest heaven the respect that is His due, 13, 14 he has wrongfully assumed that His remoteness guarantees the slackness of His supervision of human affairs. 15 As a result he has trodden the way of the godless, 16 and at the end of that way is doom. 19, 20 The moral conscience of the righteous man approves the judgment of God. 15 is linked closely with vv. 12–14. Moffatt renders: 'Is that the line you choose, the line that evil men took long ago?' 17, 18 Many scholars treat these verses as an insertion. They strongly remind us of the words of Job in 21:7–16 (see especially vv. 14 and 16). 18a sounds especially strange on the lips of Eliphaz and 19 certainly follows v. 16 much more smoothly than it does v. 18.

22:21–30 An invitation to return to God. The mild spirit of Eliphaz breaks through the fire-and-brimstone preaching, in a passage full of beauty and spiritual truth, when it is lifted out of its narrow application to Job and interpreted generally. 21 Man finds authentic peace, not in his sins, but through the forgiveness of them; 22 through acceptance of the truth revealed by God; 23 through a humble return to God and 24, 25 through a new judgment of values whereby the preciousness of the divine treasure eclipses all else. 26 Such peace will bring with it joy, 27 communion with God, 28–30 triumph and usefulness to others. Vv. 24 and 25 are interesting in that they reveal a beautiful distinction between religious and material values. 30 The reading is uncertain. The LXX, Syriac OT, Vulgate and RV all accept the Hebrew 'him that is not innocent'. RV has: 'He shall deliver even him that is not innocent: yea, he shall be delivered through the cleanness of thine hands.' RSV surely makes the better sense.

23:1–17 Job's heart laid bare. He is no rebel against God; he does not complain for the sheer joy of complaining. 2 He has made a real effort to restrain his cries of protest, but his misery has wrung them out of him. His hand. The LXX and Syriac OT have 'my hand'. This would give the translation, 'My hand is heavy upon my groaning', i.e. 'I am attempting to control it'. 3–7 If he does rebel, it is against what seems to be God's arbitrary wrath. Thus he expresses a passionate longing to find the God of grace. Such a God would deal intelligibly with him, meting out justice to his cause and not numbing him by a parade of sheer power. The wistful cry of these verses from a man seeking to find God can be answered only by Jesus, in whom God takes the initiative to find man. (Cf. Jn. 14:9.) 8–12 The frustration of his longing to find God is expressed. The most untiring efforts to bring about the meeting for which he yearns are fruitless, although God has the means of knowing the integrity of his heart of hearts. 10 He knows the way that I take. Literally, as in RV mg. 'the way that is with me'. Moffatt translates 'how I live'. In the words When he has tried me, I shall come forth as gold we are probably not to detect a reference to the gold which comes through the refining fires of suffering; nor is there an arrogant claim on the part of Job that his nature is gold all the way through. Rather he is contradicting the insinuations of his friends. They maintained that Job was being punished for secret dross in his nature, which he had successfully screened from men. In his sufferings, according to them, God was tearing the screen aside.

13–17 The longing to find God is somewhat clouded over. Job finds himself wearily toiling up the hill of predestination 'with its icy altitudes' (W. M. Macgregor). His sufferings have been determined by an iron decree. 15 W. A. Irwin criticizes the translation I am terrified, pointing out that essentially the same word is rendered by 'overwhelm' in 22:10. He translates: 'Therefore I am overwhelmed because of him, and I fear him.' 17 The exact force of this verse is elusive. A. B. Davidson (following one MS) translates: 'For I am not dismayed because of the darkness, nor because of myself whom thick darkness covereth.' If this translation is adopted, the verse means that Job's most baffling problem was not the external darkness of calamity about him, nor the darkness that had invaded his own person, but rather his sense of the arbitrariness of the divine action.

24:1–25 The providence of God. Job puts the problem in a world setting. Various classes of wrongdoers are mentioned. Why does God not intervene? 1 Note the Moffatt rendering: 'Why has not the Almighty sessions of set justice? Why do his followers never see him intervening?' 5–8 These verses describe aborigines, driven into the wilderness by the oppression of a stronger race. 6 Fodder is coarse food more suitable for animals than for human beings. 10, 11 Wretched labourers are depicted, working for an inadequate wage, hungry and thirsty in the midst of plenty. 13–17 depict the nefarious doings of 14 the murderer, 15 the adulterer and 16 the robber. 17 Friends with the terrors of deep darkness. Apparently there is a contrast between the attitude of respectable people and that of the night-birds. The former dread the darkness with its unknown terrors; the latter 'love darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil' (cf. Jn. 3:19). Their familiarity with the darkness had bred contempt. If they know fear, it is during the day, perhaps because of the knowledge that justice will then find it easier to catch up with them. 18 Upon the face of the waters. Perhaps the picture is of a twig, hurried along on the surface of a swiftly moving flood (cf. Ho. 10:7).

The chapter is difficult because it is not easy to distinguish between Job's sentiments and those of his friends. 18 You say follows the insertion of the RV mg. 22, 23 should probably be ascribed to Job. If 24 is his, we are to look for the force of it, not in a little while but rather in 'as all other' (following the LXX). In defiance of the sentiments of his friends Job maintained that there was nothing abnormal about the death of the wicked.

25:1–6 Bildad's third speech

The shortness of the speech has caused considerable comment. There are two main views: a.

'We deal with a tattered manuscript' (Irwin). This is either a fragment of Bildad's speech or 'a collection of platitudes thrown together to supply the lack of Bildad's speech'. b. We are meant to conclude that Job has run his friends' arguments into the ground. Dogmatism has nothing new to say. This short speech is not a case of multum in parvo, but an indication that the ideas of the friends are all but exhausted.

2, 3 Taking the speech as it stands, Bildad strives to bring Job to his knees before the might of God. 4–6 When the mightiest heavenly bodies must tremble before Him, subdued and convicted, how can insignificant and corrupt man hope to look up, unafraid of what the light may disclose? Cf. 4:17ff. and 15:14ff. There is point in the speech, but in the sense intended by Bildad it cannot help Job. The latter never claims that there is no darkness in him, but only that there is not the darkness suspected by his friends.

Job demonstrates that he understands what Bildad has said about the might of God. His controversy with him and with the others cannot be explained by failure to stand where they have stood in appreciation of the omnipotence of God; it must rather be explained by his honesty in facing certain puzzling facts of experience which they have either overlooked or suppressed. A. B. Davidson has the chapter heading: 'Job rivals Bildad in magnifying the greatness of God.'

2–4 embody the most pointed sarcasm. Such words of wisdom as have been offered Job bear the stamp of the inspiration of some great person! 5, 6 speak of the divine power operative in the underworld. The shades. The Hebrew word is r^{e}pā'îm. Two usages of it should be noted. It refers to pre-Israelitish people (e.g. Gn. 14:5; 15:20). It can also refer to the dead (e.g. Ps. 88:10). Schwally maintained that 'it was applied by the Israelites to people who were dead and gone, and of whom they knew little'. Probably it is better to translate, 'The shades beneath the waters tremble, their inhabitants (i.e. of the waters) also.' Abaddon is a synonym for Sheol. There are two other occurrences of the word in Job (28:22; 31:12) and seven in the whole Bible.

In 7–13 Job shows that heaven and earth and sea have the same testimony with regard to the power of God. How mighty must be the God of an ordered universe! 9 The moon. It is probably better to read with RSV mg. 'his throne'. God's 'throne' is covered with clouds. 13 Serpent. See on 3:8. 14 rounds off the chapter in a most impressive way. Moffatt translates: 'And all this is the mere fringe of his force, the faintest whisper we can hear of him! Who knows then the full thunder of his power?' The idea is that when you have fully described your most exact impressions of the power of God, there is always infinitely more that could be said.

27:1 – 31:40 Job replies to his friends

It has been suggested that at this stage in the book we are to imagine a pause. Job waits in vain for Zophar to speak; but the friends have shot their bolt. On this hypothesis there now follow two general replies to the friends, introduced by the same words, Job again took up his discourse (27:1; 29:1).

27:1–6 Job reaffirms his innocence. Job again repudiates the charges insinuated or directly affirmed by his friends. 2 His affirmation is introduced by what Strahan calls 'the most extraordinary form of oath in the Scriptures'. He swears by a God who has taken away his right. It is a remarkable picture of a man whose faith is abiding with him in the storm, who still can call 'my God' the God he is tempted to imagine is forsaking him. 5, 6 He cannot doubt the reality of almighty God, or the fact of His government of the world; it is the mode of His government, and in particular its application to himself, which puzzles him. The present vexations cannot be explained by his sinfulness.

27:7–23 The end of the wicked. This passage presents a number of difficulties. The connection between Job's affirmation of innocence and this picture of the end of the wicked is hard to fathom. The friends had maintained that sinfulness was the clue to Job's adversity, and had accordingly denied his innocence. That denial was the logical outcome of their creed. And now, without a trace of warning, Job appears as a perfervid believer in that creed. In the second place the passage flatly contradicts what Job has already said about the prosperity of the wicked. Cf. 21:22ff.; 24:1ff., and note the contrast between 27:14 and 21:11. We have no parallel to these verses in Job's speeches in any other part of the book. On the other hand, the passage would sound perfectly in place on the lips of the friends. There are two alternatives: a. We may argue that Job is modifying his previous sentiments. 'He strengthened all the arguments of his friends' is G. C. Morgan's comment on the passage. According to one interpretation, in ch. 26 we found him rivalling Bildad in magnifying the greatness of God while retaining a larger creed than his. Perhaps in this passage the author meant us to think of Job as sympathetic with the general truth of his friends' sentiments, but unwilling to accept the arbitrariness and the narrowness of their application of them. b. On the other hand, many scholars hold that there has been a dislocation in the book at this point and they attribute this section to Zophar, which would mean that all the friends speak three times.

11 Concerning the hand of God. The words have a somewhat strange ring. He is undertaking to teach people whose previous speeches have revealed that they are past masters in the lesson. 18 Like a booth refers to the flimsy construction erected by the nightwatchman in a vineyard. 23 The clapping of hands is a token of indignation (see, e.g., Nu. 24:10).

28:1–28 God's gift of wisdom. The chapter consists of a fine poem on wisdom which is meant to teach that wisdom is completely beyond the reach of man unless the quest is carried through in the setting of the fear of the Lord. Many scholars doubt whether the chapter can be attributed to the original drama and they treat it as a later addition. In the first place, the connection between chs. 27 and 28 is elusive. Second, this placid acquiescence in the superior heights of the divine wisdom contrasts strangely with many of Job's statements before and after this stage in the book. Elsewhere Job appears as 'a chained eagle, who spreads his wings and dashes himself against the bars of his cage; he would soar unto God's place and pluck the mystery out of the darkness' (A. B. Davidson). See, e.g., 23:3; 31:35ff. One must, however, bear in mind that it is unreasonable to expect level-headed consistency in a sufferer. We have seen striking inconsistencies in Job's view of God. God has appeared sometimes as foe, sometimes as friend. The pendulum may also have swung in respect of Job's thoughts on human understanding of the ways of God. Whatever our view of the place of ch. 28 in the book, there can be no doubt about its value. We are brought face to face with the truth that true wisdom means faith in God and renunciation of evil; it is the reverence which acknowledges that there are more things in heaven and in earth than are dreamt of in human philosophy; it is the obedience to the will of God, however mysterious, which brings the seeker for truth much further than intellectual speculation (cf. Jn. 7:17). Wood says finely: 'One effect of this chapter is to slow down the movement of the previous arguments between Job and his friends. It is like the gentle application of the foot-brake in a motor-car with a view to reducing speed . . . It provides a pause in the journey and gives the traveller an opportunity to look back and see how far he has come and how far he has still to go'. In ch. 28 the 'traveller' looks back upon the futility of the wisdom of the friends with their relentless equating of suffering and sin. He also looks forward to the only possible answer in the Word of God conveyed in the Yahweh speeches. Chs. 29–31 restate the problem to which the Word of God alone has the solution.

1–14 In these verses we have a picture of man's successful and unresting activity in worrying out of the earth its treasures of precious ores and stones. 3, 4 The miner is seen groping his way through the darkness, carrying through complicated underground operations. They swing to and fro. The passage is obscure. RSV seems to imply descent into a deep shaft by a 'swinging' basket. Irwin points out that this is anachronistic. The Hebrew word behind 'shafts' is literally 'stream-beds'. Irwin interprets the 'swinging' of the devious turnings of the tunnels in regions where human feet do not tread. 9, 10 describe the miner cutting through the rocks. 5 is meant as a contrast between the quiet growth of the corn above ground and the miner's forceful tactics underground.

7, 8, 12–14 The narrative speaks of a quest which must baffle the most careful ingenuity of man or beast: the quest for wisdom. 12 Earth cannot work out an answer to the question, Where shall wisdom be found? The words of this verse may well have circulated among thoughtful men in Israel as a riddle. 15–22 Wisdom cannot be obtained in any human market. All living things and the dark forces of the underworld are alike impotent to answer the question asked in v. 12 and again in v. 20. The most they can do is allude to a vague rumour about wisdom which they have heard.

23–27 The only One who can answer the question is indicated. The God who can restrain the mighty forces of the universe, the God of creation, has an exact mastery of the hidden things of wisdom. 28 If man would travel profitably towards an apprehension of that wisdom, of which God is, and can be, the only possessor, he must be godfearing and moral.

29:1–25 Job's memory of a golden past. This is one of the most effective chapters in the book. The sources of Job's happiness are portrayed with consummate skill.

2–4 First, he was a God-preserved man. We have the pathos of the whole book in In the days when God watched over me. At the heart of his past happiness was the conviction that God was watching over him. His present misery is explained by the feeling that God is no longer watching—or, if watching, with unreasonably critical eyes. 5 Second, Job was a domestically happy man. In the reference to his children we hear the 'sob of a great agony' (G. C. Morgan). 6 Third, he was a prosperous man. The rock poured out for me streams of oil does not refer to a prosperity emerging even from unlikely quarters, as we might imagine. The olive tree thrives in a rocky soil, and oil presses are hewn out in the rock. 7–10, 21–25 In the fourth place, he was a universally respected man. When he took his seat as a city councillor it was noted with respect by all classes of the community. His opinion was waited upon with respect, and when it had been expressed there was nothing more to say. His speech was like refreshing rain for drooping spirits. His very smile was a tonic for the irresolute.

11–17 These verses explain the 'well done' invariably written by men across Job's name. The man who was 'watched over' by God was scrupulous in watching over the interests of the needy. 16 Even perfect strangers could depend on his thorough championing of their cause. 14 In all these social activities, righteousness was his garment and justice his turban. The idea is almost that justice incarnated itself in Job. Cf. Jdg. 6:34, which can be rendered 'But the Spirit of the Lord clothed itself with Gideon'. 12–20 Job's anticipations for the future at that time, so rudely shattered by the calamities described in the first two chapters of the book, are here portrayed. He expected an unbroken prolongation of the 'golden' days. 19 speaks of a prosperity in touch with unfailing springs; 20 of manly strength symbolized by the bow.

30:1–31 The contempt into which he has been brought. The grey now stands in bleak contrast to the golden 'then'. The misery of the present approaches from every quarter. 1–15 First it comes from without. He is insulted by men, even by the 'underdog' class, which in the old days he had been quick to befriend (cf. 29:11–17). 4–8 The miserable lot of the men who now reviled Job is depicted. They are grateful to scrape a miserable livelihood from the roots of the ground and to make their bed in rocky barren places, when respectable men harshly refuse them a place to lay their head. Such is the lot of people with an unknown and unloved name. 9–15 Now Job himself is a target for the skits and the crude contempt of such people. 11 speaks of unrestrained humiliation at the hands of God. RV mg. yields the good sense of God loosening Job's 'bowstring'. Cf. 29:20. 12 The rabble distressing Job appears as a host beleaguering a city, 13 making escape impossible, 14 and then pouring in when the wall has been breached.

16–18, 30 Second, misery approaches from within. He describes the tormenting burning pains of his disease. 18 is difficult. With violence it seizes my garment may not be right. LXX has 'my garment is disfigured'. AV 'By the great force of my disease is my garment changed' gives the picture of his garment hanging loosely on his shrunken frame. 18b, on the other hand, seems to imply a tight-fitting garment. Peake suggests that the reference is to certain abnormally swollen parts of his otherwise emaciated body.

19–23 Third, misery approaches from above. He is dealing with a God who has cast him into a miry pit (cf. Ps. 40:2), and now is cruelly indifferent to his cry for help. God's tempest of trouble is inexorably sweeping him forward to the grey portals of the house of death.

24 The Hebrew is obscure. Dillmann translates 'Howbeit, doth not a sinking man stretch forth his hand?', giving the excellent sense that a drowning man will grasp at a straw. Job felt himself sinking in a storm he imagined a cruelly callous God had sent. Yet again and again the cry rose in his heart, 'Lord, save me'. It was the hand of faith reaching out for a Saviour he could not yet firmly trust. 25, 26 Underlying these verses we hear the note: 'If only God had dealt with me as generously as I have dealt with others, how different my present position would be!' 27 describes his feelings in ferment, while 28 and 31 portray the sorrow that has taken the place of the gladness of old. 29 speaks of his ostracism from the civilized community. 28 Blackened is a reference to black mourning garments. 30 Black, through disease, is a different word.

31:1–40 Job's final protestation of innocence. This chapter gives a very remarkable insight into the character of the man. His ideas are not easy-going and unambitious, but exacting and inward. 'He judges himself by an almost evangelical standard of excellence,' says Strahan. Duhm speaks of the chapter as the high-water mark of the OT ethic. We shall note several striking correspondences with NT teaching. Job makes six main claims for his former way of life.

a. 1–12 He was untainted by immorality. 1, 7, 9 His external conduct had been pure, but no purer than his secret thoughts (cf. Mt. 5:8, 28). Adultery appears in a terrible light. 2, 3 First, it deserves the punishment of God. The purity of Job's action had emerged from a background of the 'fear of the Lord, that is wisdom' (28:28). 11 Second, it deserves the punishment of man, for it is an offence, not only against God, but against society. 10 Grind for another refers to the lowliest form of bondage, that of a slave-woman at the mill (cf. Ex. 11:5). 12 Third, it is a fire that has in it the threat of indiscriminate destruction—of a man's health, home, happiness (cf. Pr. 6:27, 28).

5–8 paint on a canvas wider than that of sensualism. Here Job denies vanity and deceit of any kind. 5 Strahan effectively speaks of falsehood (AV 'vanity') as 'masked nothingness'. 6 Job is not afraid of the scales of God's justice, if only they are fair. 7 If his claim to integrity is unsound, 8 he will gladly forfeit the produce of his work in the field.

b. 13–23, 31, 32 He was untainted by thoughtlessness. 13–15 His servants always received fair play from him, for he remembered that there was a God in heaven to whom he was answerable—the Creator of both master and servant (cf. Eph. 6:9). 15 surely stands out as a gem because of its remarkable social consciousness (cf. Pr. 14:31; 22:2). 16–20 Nor was it possible for his household to complain of frugal catering any more than they could complain of injustice. But his kindness was not confined within the walls of his own household; it went out to seek and to save the needy, the poor, the widows and the fatherless. Exploitation and oppression of the weak were foreign to his nature, 21 though he could easily have used his influence to twist the justice offered by the courts. Rather he had been a help of the helpless. 17 is particularly striking. His full stomach had never made him indifferent to the empty stomachs of others. No Lazarus was allowed to lie at his gate, unnoticed and unhelped (cf. Lk. 16:20). 31, 32 He was 'given to hospitality' (Rom. 12:13, AV), when he could not have the faintest chance of return (cf. Lk. 14:12–14).

c. 24, 25 He was untainted by what G. B. Shaw called the 'Gospel of Getting on'. He made friends by means of 'the unrighteous mammon' (cf. Lk. 16:9), but his attitude to his riches never ran the risk of the warning: 'You cannot serve God and mammon' (cf. Mt. 6:19–21, 24).

d. 26–28 He was untainted by secret hankering after idols. 27 speaks of the throwing of the kiss of adoration to the heavenly bodies.

e. 29, 30 He was untainted by bitterness towards his enemies. In such a passage Job is travelling in the direction of our Lord's words in Mt. 5:44.

f. 33, 34 He was untainted by insincerity. 'His true eyes had never practised how to cloak offences with a cunning brow', because he dreaded popular disapproval, and more especially the disapproval of the great families.

35–37 The recollection of his past way of life causes Job to break into an almost reckless 'not guilty' cry, with which he challenges high heaven. Note especially v. 35. The appearance of the indictment would not confuse or humiliate him. He would carry it triumphantly, joyfully and openly (v. 36); and with princely, confident step enter the presence of the Adversary he had found so elusive, ready to give Him an exact account of his daily walk (v. 37).

In this chapter Job has so far claimed that neither the voice of man nor the voice of God can convict and confuse him. He is guiltless of such charges as his friends have sought to fasten on him. 38–40 He goes further and says in effect: 'Even if my land had a voice, no more could it condemn me.'

32:1 – 37:24 THE ELIHU SECTION

For the following reasons many scholars maintain that the Elihu section is an interpolation by another hand: a. There is no mention of Elihu in prologue or epilogue. b. There are linguistic and stylistic differences from the rest of the book. c. The Elihu speeches, it is maintained, add nothing to what has gone before.

On the other hand, Budde, Cornill, Kamphausen, Wildeboer, Sellin, Bauer and Peters have argued for the originality of the speeches. It seems highly unlikely that a later interpolator, writing with a knowledge of the activities of the Satan mentioned in the prologue, should ignore the prologue altogether.

Characteristics of the Elihu speeches are a profound atmosphere of reverence for God; a view of sin deeper than that which appears elsewhere in the speeches of the other friends; the appearance of God as a Teacher (35:11; 36:22), intent on leading man through the discipline of suffering to a wiser way of life. Budde maintains that the supreme function of the speeches is to expose Job's most potentially dangerous characteristic—spiritual pride (33:17; 35:12; 36:22). The curative value of suffering has no doubt appeared in other speeches, but not with the same emphasis.

32:1–22 The reason for Elihu's intervention

Throughout this chapter there is a clear ring of 'necessity is laid upon me' (cf. 1 Cor. 9:16). The failure of the friends to answer Job's doubts and fears had forced him into the controversy. As he had listened, a twofold anger had burned in his breast—against Job, because of the confident eyes he was raising unflickeringly towards heaven, and against the friends for their failure to refute Job. We are surely meant to remember that it is an angry young man who is speaking. 2–5 There are four references to his anger in these verses. Such a recollection will blunt the charge of boastfulness frequently made against Elihu. Hahn, e.g., dismisses him as 'a most conceited and arrogant young man'. (For his boastfulness see especially vv. 14, 17, 18.) But anger may readily sweep a man beyond the strict frontiers of balanced humility. Also we must remember that it is an oriental man who is speaking and his words are meant for oriental ears. In such a setting the boastfulness, so clearly detected by Western ears, would assume almost a commonplace character. Cox looks upon his introduction as 'little more than a string of scholastic formulae, sentences which were the current form of debate'. Wood is surely right in his verdict: 'The much maligned Elihu deserves to be better treated than is customary.'

6–16 Elihu points out the reason for his silence up to the present stage in the debate: a young man's natural respect for grey hairs had sealed his lips. But a still more authoritative respect had broken the seal: 8 his respect for the revelation of God which could come to young men as to old. Men who are 'great' in age are not always 'great' in their appreciation of spiritual wisdom. Silence now could only mean greater respect for the person of man than for his God. Elihu was not built on such lines (see vv. 21, 22). Old men had failed to pierce Job's defence. Let them not conclude that it must be impregnable in the face of every human attack. Let them not say: 'We found him too clever for us! It must be God, not man, who puts him down!' (v. 13, Moff.). Job has not yet had to reckon with Elihu's distinctive assault upon his positions.

17–22 graphically depict a man in the grip of the constraint of what he felt to be the truth of God. Cf. 1 Cor. 9:16. He was bursting to speak. Only speech could relieve the inner tension.

33:1–33 Elihu denounces Job's attitude to his sufferings

1–7 In the opening verses of this chapter Elihu maintains that he is utterly sincere, 3 speaking directly from his heart, 4, 6 and also that he is on exactly the same plane as Job in creaturely dependence upon God. Job had complained that the spectacle of the divine might numbed and terrified him (cf. 9:34; 13:21), making it impossible for him to do himself justice before God, either in thought or in word. 7 No such complaint could have relevance in the verbal warfare to which Elihu was challenging him. Job's present assailant was a man like himself.

8–13 Elihu rebukes Job for maintaining his integrity and for charging God with hostility to him. Such a charge against the great God, whose greatness immeasurably transcends the power or wisdom of man, is totally unfounded. And yet Job seemed to assume that such a God would be prepared to assume the role of a disputant like some party in a petty human squabble! But while God will not speak as a disputant, He will speak (as the mighty God that He is) in ministries of mercy. Yet Job has denied that very fact. 13 My words. RSV refers to such passages as 9:16 and 19:7. LXX has the reading 'his words'. A. B. Davidson renders v. 13: 'Why dost thou contend against Him that He giveth not account of any of His matters?'

14–30 Elihu refers to the various ways through which a patient God seeks to give an account of Himself in human affairs. First, 15, 16 He speaks through dreams and visions, through which He would leave the seal of His instruction upon human minds, and 17 reclaim men from evil purposes 18 which must issue in death and destruction without His intervention. Second, 19 He speaks through pain (cf. Heb. 12:6). 20 Suffering may deprive a man of his appetite and 21 of his firm, healthy flesh; 22 it may bring him to the very jaws of death, where the destroying angels await him; but it may give God His chance with the soul. 23 speaks of the intervention of an angel of mercy to cheat the destroying angels of their prey by interpreting to the sufferer the meaning of the chastening rod and the correct reaction to it. One of the thousand presents the idea that God has an indefinite number of ministers of mercy under His command. 24–30 speak of the results which follow a right response to the approach which a gracious God makes to the sufferer. First, 25 his body regains its health. Second, 26 health of soul is restored, with the joy which is its inevitable fruit. He accepts. Man is given back his righteous standing with God. Third, 27, 28 joy of soul issues in joyful witness to others concerning God's dealings with the soul.

31–33 Elihu now challenges Job to speak if he has anything worth saying. 'I fain would see you cleared' (v. 32b, Moff.), he says. But if he cannot speak words of wisdom, let him listen to him.

34:1–9 Job's complaints summarized

Silence follows Elihu's challenge to Job, so his denunciation of Job's sentiments continues. 2 He appeals first for the ear of all intelligent listeners. 3, 4 Let there be discrimination between words of truth and words of error. In which of these categories must Job's words be placed? Elihu condenses Job's speeches into two complaints: 5, 6 the first is that God has wronged an innocent man, inflicting a wound on him quite capriciously. 7 Such words, says Elihu, only go to show up Job as a man with a unique and insatiable thirst for scorning, 8 a man of faulty opinions, which surely must be a significant commentary upon the faulty company he has been keeping. 9 In the second place Job has complained that 'it is no use for man to be the friend of God' (Moff.).

34:10–33 Job's first complaint refuted

10–12 Job has complained of unrighteousness in God's dealings with him. With all the conviction of his pious nature Elihu affirms that God is just, and that He has placed man in a moral universe. Man reaps what he sows, whether the sowing is of evil or goodness. He supports his affirmation by various considerations.

First, absolute authority belongs to God and to God alone. 13 The control of the universe has not been foisted on Him by some other power. That might entail indifferent or self-regarding government. Self-regard on the part of God would shatter the fabric of the universe in an instant. 14, 15 Man is utterly dependent upon the 'breath' of God (cf. Gn. 2:7). In v. 14a AV mg. has the interesting translation, 'If he set his heart upon himself.' If human life is maintained by the breath of God, where is there a motive for injustice in God?

He argues in the second place 17 that the very continuance of the rule of God implies justice in that rule. 18 The charge of injustice is a serious enough one to make against earthly monarchs, for justice wielded in an unjust way has the seeds of ruin in it (cf. Mt. 12:25); 19 but how can such a charge be made against the Creator of all men, whether princes or paupers, who shows partiality to neither prince nor pauper, but cares for all alike? Again, where is there a motive for injustice?

Up to the present stage in the chapter Elihu has been moving on somewhat theoretical ground. 20–28 He now turns to more practical considerations. God's omniscience guarantees His justice. People and princes alike feel the weight of God's might. 23 A time. The verse is to be understood against the background of Job's appeal to God for 'sessions of set justice' (24:1, Moff.). Divine knowledge of human ways and judgment upon them are simultaneous.

29 Elihu moves from a general contemplation of God's working in history towards Job's case. Is there a ring of 'Thou art the man' about a man? The argument of the verse seems to be: whether nations or individuals are passing through days of quiet enjoyment of God's presence, or days when they lose sight of His face in the midst of trials, they must take the way of uncomplaining submission to His will. 30 His justice is fairly administered for the good of men. 31, 32 Elihu then asks Job 'if any man who uses the language of penitence will presume to dictate to God the chastisement he should receive' (Strahan). 33 Elihu emphatically dissociates himself from Job.

34–37 Elihu then calls for the verdict of thinking men with regard to Job's rebellious words. For Elihu, Job's rebellion is more terrible than his trials. Until he surrenders that rebellion, for his own good the trials must continue. 37 He claps his hands. See on 27:23.

35:1–16 Job's second complaint refuted

Job had argued that righteousness brings no advantage to the righteous man—no more than if he had been a flagrant sinner (cf. 21:15; 34:9).

5–7 Elihu's reply is that human virtue or vice cannot bring any advantage to the transcendent God. 8 It is other men, and not God, who have reason to be concerned about human conduct. For the error in Elihu's argument, see on 7:20 and 22:3.

Elihu proceeds to demolish certain considerations which might seem to support Job's contention that no advantage is attached to righteous conduct. 9, 12 There is the problem of unanswered prayer. 13 Elihu believes that when prayer is unanswered it is empty. It is a case of 'You ask and do not receive, because you ask wrongly' (Jas. 4:3). A deep religious note is missing from the prayer. 11 It is a cry of pain, which does not raise man any higher than the level of the beasts. The divine Teacher has loftier altitudes of trust in store for man (cf. 36:22). 10 The night is, of course, the night of suffering. God can teach the teachable, even through suffering.

The thought of God as a Teacher, intent on steering man through a rough and thorny maze of pain to a deeper experience of Himself, gives us an important distinction between Elihu and the friends. For them, God appears more characteristically as a Sovereign or Judge.

14, 15 The translation is problematical. A. B. Davidson makes good sense in the rendering, 'Yea when thou sayest, Thou seest Him not, the cause is before Him; therefore wait thou for Him.' Similarly Moff.: 'Hush! only wait for him.' In v. 15 Elihu says that God is quite lenient in His treatment of those whose approach to Him is shallow. This leads some people to take advantage of Him. 16 If Job continues to multiply words without knowledge he will fall into this danger.

36:1 – 37:24 The mighty works of God

Attention!—to a man of 'unerring insight' (v. 4, Moff.) into the ways of God with man in general and with Job in particular. 3 From afar means that his argument is going to range widely through the realm of truth.

5–7 Behold a mighty and gracious God! His providence is trustworthy, adamantly opposing the wicked, vigilantly superintending the righteous. 8–10 Even when they are cramped and constrained by affliction, the divine Teacher is intent on leading them through to a large place (cf. v. 16) where they acknowledge and renounce the transgression that had involved them in affliction. 11–15 Obedience to the Teacher leads to happiness; disobedience, to ruin. 13 Anger refers to their smouldering resentment against God. They do not cry means 'they do not pray', with the content of trust in their prayers which is pleasing to God (cf. 35:10).

17–25 The action of a mighty and gracious God, which has been generally enunciated, is now applied to Job's particular case. 18 The greatness of the ransom is evidently a reference to the severity of the afflictions through which he is passing. Nothing else can win for him that larger trust in God to which he is being called through his afflictions. His own strength certainly cannot do it. 20 The force of the word night is elusive. Cox sees a reference to Job's loathing of life; Davidson, a synonym for judgment. Cf. Job's frequently expressed desire to meet God in judgment. 21 is logically difficult. The first part expresses a warning against turning to iniquity; the second states that this has been done already. The Complete Bible renders the second part: 'Because for this you were tried by suffering.' RSV can, however, yield excellent sense, in the warning against persisting in the way of rebellion which Job has already chosen in preference to walking the way of affliction with meekness. 22, 23 There will be a change if only he will behold the God of sovereign might, the mighty Teacher who is answerable to no-one. 24, 25 Down on our knees before such a God! That is the place for man.

36:26 – 37:24 In a passage full of literary beauty and spiritual significance Elihu takes up again his theme of the greatness of God. He calls the phenomena of nature to witness to the might of God.

a. 27, 28 The formation of the rain drops.

b. 36:29 – 37:5 The thunderstorm. 30 is difficult. A. B. Davidson translates, 'Behold, He spreadeth His light around Him, and covereth Him over with the deeps of the sea.' He interprets sea as referring either to the 'masses of water in the thunder clouds which enshroud the Almighty', or to 'the sea on earth . . . as it were drawn up from its bottom in cloud and vapour to form the pavilion of the Lord'. 31 speaks of the thunderstorm both as a minister of God's judgment and of His mercy (accompanied as it is by fructifying rain).

c. 6–10 The snow and ice. He describes the paralysing effect of the rigours of winter upon human work and upon the animals. The helplessness of man before the severity of the weather is meant to serve as a timeless reminder that he is creature and not Creator.

d. 11–13 The clouds. These move in accordance with the divine command on ministries of discipline or mercy to man or land. 12 They refers to the individual lightning flashes.

14 The weight of testimony of the wondrous works of God to the God operative in them is now applied to Job's case. It ought to pull him up in his tracks in the way of rebellion along which he had been hurrying; it ought to make him a reverent listener to the Word of the Lord spoken through such impressive testimony to the might of God. 15–18 Only One is perfect in knowledge of the ways of the Lord in nature. Man must confess the imperfection of his knowledge when confronted by the phenomena of nature.

19 Human understanding of the ways of the Lord with man is similarly conditioned by the limitations of the human mind. Such limitations make it impossible, in the first place, for man to address God aright (cf. Rom. 8:26). 20 By presumptuous speech a man is running the risk of destruction. 21 Second, a man cannot appear with confidence before a God whose majesty must completely blind him. 22 How much more must the light of God's majesty dazzle him! Golden splendour is literally 'gold': the reference is evidently to the splendour of the light which results when the north wind sweeps away the clouds. 23 Third, these limitations mean that man cannot understand God aright. See Moffatt's moving translation: 'The Almighty is beyond our minds. Supreme in power and rich in justice, he violates no right.' 24 In view of such human limitations, man's proper role is to lean, not on his own intelligence (the force of wise in their own conceit), but on God in reverential fear.

38:1 – 41:34 THE LORD ANSWERS JOB

38:1–3 Job is called to account

The silence of heaven in face of Job's challenging cries is broken. 2 has been applied by some commentators to Job; by others to Elihu. Counsel implies that in His dealings with Job God was not acting in a haphazard way, but according to consistent, intelligent design. All the speeches up to the present stage in the book, both by Job and the four friends, had sent shadows across that truth. 3 An interesting word is used for man: geḇer. 'It denotes man, not in frailty but in his strength, man as a combatant' (Strahan). Repeatedly Job had used language (e.g. 31:35–37; 13:22) which seemed to suggest that in him God would find a worthy combatant. Ironically God takes him at his own valuation. But it is not long before the frail creature bows in abject confession of need before a fresh revelation of the mighty Creator (see 42:6). The combatant becomes a worshipper.

38:4–38 The marvels of the inanimate world

38:4–11 Earth and sea. Was Job a partner with God in creation, initiated in all its mysteries? 7 poetically speaks of stars and angels alike joining in the paean of praise on creation's morning. 8–11 magnificently depict the sea bursting forth from the womb, with clouds and darkness as its swaddling clothes, not as a rebel, but as a creature of God, called forth by God, controlled by God.

38:12–15 The dawn. Job is reminded of his fleeting life in contrast to the antiquity of the world and God's eternal being. The effect of the dawn on the wicked, who 'love darkness rather than light', is then described. 13 The dawn shakes them out of their treasured refuge. 14 portrays the effect of the dawn on the earth. Dyed. This emendation is unnecessary as the Hebrew makes good sense as it stands. RV is better: 'It is changed as clay under the seal; and all things stand forth as a garment.' Detail, beauty, and colour appear. 'It' in v. 13a is the dawn, but in 13b the earth.

38:16–21 Job's ignorance of hidden things. Job is asked if he has roamed at large through the deep springs that supply the sea, and through the mysteries of the underworld. 18 Does he know the extent of the earth's surface? 19, 20 Is he versed in knowledge about the home of light and darkness? Can he conduct them to their proper spheres and then bring them home again? 21 Could there be a better example of irony than that found in this verse?

38:22–30 Natural phenomena. Even common things like snow and hail, the artillery of heaven, wind, rain, lightning, frost and ice, are mysteries too great for Job. 24 The distribution of the light may be a reference to the diffusion of light over the earth. 26, 27 are noteworthy. Let not proud man imagine that he is the sole object of the divine providence. God not only sends His rain 'on the just and on the unjust' (Mt. 5:45); He remembers also the dreary, uninhabited regions of the world. The inference is that providence is a much more involved affair than Job had imagined. 28 A father refers to a human father; i.e., is the rain Job's offspring?

38:31–38 The universe. Does Job control the constellations and the heavens? 31 The chains of the Pleiades (RV 'the cluster of the Pleiades'). The precise meaning of the verse is elusive. Cox interprets it: 'Canst thou bring back the gracious fruitful warmth of spring, and release the frozen earth from winter's sterile bands?' 32 There are various identifications of the Mazzālôṯ—the Zodiac or part of it, the Morning or Evening Star, or the constellations (Heb. mazzaroth) of 2 Ki. 23:5. 33b refers to the popular belief that the heavenly bodies exercised an influence over the affairs of men. 36 The meaning of the Hebrew is uncertain. AV 'Who hath put wisdom in the inward parts? or who hath given understanding to the heart?' is surely wrong. This would break the continuity of the portrayal of the marvels of the inanimate world by a sudden reference to man. Moffatt translates: 'Who taught the feathery clouds, or trained the meteors?' 38 describes the soil caked by the sun.

38:39 – 39:30 The marvels of the animal kingdom

38:39 – 39:4 Job's ignorance of their ways. A contrast between man and God is implied in these verses. Man is disposed to kill the lion, certainly not to assist in finding food for him or for the cubs. God, on the other hand, cares for him and for the cubs. Let Job, who had accused God of savagery in dealing with him, remember God's attitude even to savage beasts. RV and Moffatt have 'lioness' for 'lion'. Lk. 12:24 is the NT answer to the question in v. 41.

39:5–12 The wild ass and the wild ox. The first reference, to the wild ass, is to an animal very different from the domestic ass—fleet of foot, graceful, wandering in herds over vast stretches of country. The emphasis is on its freedom. It is as high-spirited as if it had been suddenly released from captivity. This is not a work of man. The emphasis in the reference to the wild ox is on the animal's strength and unreliability. Can Job use this creature for agricultural purposes as men use the tame ox? Only One can control him, the God who created him.

39:13–18 The ostrich. 13 The pinions and plumage of love is a reference to the proverbial cruelty of the ostrich (cf. La. 4:3). The discussion of the ostrich is based on the popular belief that she neglects her young. There have been various explanations of this belief. a. The bird sometimes wanders away from her eggs during the daytime and loses her way back. b. 'Apparently some eggs are laid outside the nest, and either by accident or design, those eggs are used for food for the newly-hatched chicks. The broken pieces of egg-shell seem to have given rise to the view that the ostrich neglects her young' (Wood). Of the modern ostrich the Encyclopaedia Britannica writes: 'The parents display great solicitude for their young.' 16 She has no fear means that she does not care if her labour in laying eggs goes all for nothing. 17 is suggestive; her proverbial foolishness is ascribed to an act of God. Man does not know the reason for the act of God; he cannot, for he does not possess the Creator's wisdom which ranges the universe. 18 is a reference to the great speed of the ostrich when running.

39:19–25 The horse. 19 Strength. RV has 'quivering mane'; AV 'thunder' may be right here. This is the normal Hebrew word for thunder with the qualification that it is usually masculine, not feminine as here. Perhaps the author is comparing the arched neck of the war-horse to the bow in the sky in stormy weather. 20 Locust. Cf. Rev. 9:7.

39:26–30 The hawk and the eagle. Toward the south refers to the southward migration of the bird when the cold weather comes. The description of the eagle's powers and habits is particularly vivid. Job is further shown his human frailty by being reminded that he has no say in such matters.

40:1 – 41:34 The mighty power of God

40:1–5 Job's self-esteem shattered. We are now moving towards the human response to the divine word, introduced by the question given in v. 2. Ironically God had taken Job at his own evaluation as a combatant (see on 38:3). Has Job, the combatant, any answer to offer after listening to the impressive commentary upon the wonders of nature, animate and inanimate, which the God of nature had graciously granted him? But the revelation of heaven has made the defiant combatant a humble worshipper. 3–5 Here we have a classic illustration (cf. 42:1–6) of the results which must always follow when the silence of heaven is broken, when the almighty God appears with a fresh revelation of Himself, to which man listens in that posture of faith without which 'it is impossible to please him'. At such times the speech of earth is stilled; Job could have bitten out his tongue for some of the hot words of complaint which he had poured out. At such times man sees himself in his true light: I am of small account. It is not a confession of sin, although there is no doubt that Job would have immediately acknowledged the sinfulness of some of his words and attitudes. It is rather a confession of insignificance. As he looked away from himself to the God he was seeing in a more impressive way than ever before, he saw himself in a new perspective.

Some commentators are unimpressed by Job's reaction. They seem to regret the spectacle of Job in retreat, 'cowed' and 'bludgeoned' by this too-overwhelming revelation. Clearly they prefer the earlier Job who had been 'Honest to God' in downright rebellion. Irwin writes: 'His complete surrender and humiliation has provoked comment by students of the Prometheus drama that the tortured Hebrew is a figure far inferior to the Greek god who could not be broken with thirty thousand years of acute agony.' It is felt that the unconditional surrender of Job places a strain on our credulity. Disappointment is also expressed that Job's searching questions are simply under the carpet.

'Retreat' is surely the wrong word to use. In Job's reply we are rather in touch with an advance to a more adequate view of God, and to at least something of what Paul called the 'secret and hidden wisdom of God' (1 Cor. 2:7). Man is not in a position to comprehend every aspect of the meaning of the human situation. Job came to the realization that what had been, and still was, a puzzle to him was no puzzle to God.

At this stage of the book it would be a greater tax on our credulity if Job were portrayed carrying on his one-man war with God. In his eagerness to prove his integrity he had travelled dangerously towards imagining that he could attain to equality with God. He deserved the divine irony in such a word as 'Deck yourself with majesty and dignity; clothe yourself with glory and splendour' (40:10). To have persisted in his attitude would have pushed him right over the brink of the sin behind all other sins, to which the serpent lured Adam and Eve in the glittering dream 'You will be like God, knowing good and evil' (Gn. 3:5). But the Satanic whisper cannot survive the divine Word. That Word brought a transformation which the word of man had been totally unable to achieve. From chs. 3 to 37 we have one long commentary on the inadequacy of the word of man, and the wisdom of man, to explain the mystery of suffering. Eliphaz, Bildad, Zophar and Elihu had all poured out words, without speaking a single word which brought conviction or comfort to Job. Job's replies had also failed to interpret the mystery; they had also darkened God's 'counsel by words without knowledge' (38:2). The Word of God came and the strife of words was over. It did not come through a carefully reasoned argument, dealing a deathblow to Job's intellectual difficulties by its inexorable logic; it did not come through a cut-and-dried explanation of the strands of suffering in Job's experience. There is silence on such issues; silence about the question of retribution, which had bulked so large in speech after speech; silence about the disciplinary aspect of suffering. The Word came through a fresh vision of God—of the mighty, majestic God behind the marvels of animate and inanimate nature, painstakingly attentive to the unexpected and the insignificant (see especially 38:26, 27, 39; 39:30), towering above human might and wisdom.

The Word in the vision convinced Job that he could trust such a God. It brought home to his heart the realization that providence was a much more involved and painstaking affair than he had imagined it to be. He had been like a man living in a stuffy room, whose closed windows had been shutting out God's clean, sweet air, and whose drawn blinds had been excluding God's sunshine. With the appearance of God, the windows had been thrown open and the blinds had gone up. God did not answer the problems of his mind, but He did answer Job; He healed the wound of his heart and brought quiet resignation flooding back into his heart. This was not a man who was 'cowed' or 'bludgeoned', but a man who was convinced that all was well with the world because the everlasting arms could not fail. And yet Job had never heard that most impressive divine Word, which has given mankind the clearest vision of God, and the most indisputable evidence that God can and must be trusted—the Word of the cross. The vision of the God of nature made Job a worshipper. How much more can the vision of the God of Calvary bring the sufferer to his knees, 'lost in wonder, love, and praise'!

40:6–14 God's power in the moral order. The irony that has been running through the divine speech is strongly reflected in these verses. G. C. Morgan sees in the passage 'satire as gentle as the kiss of a mother when she laughs at a child'. 8 asks if Job is prepared to hold on to his own innocence, at the price of rejecting the justice of God. 9 The thought now swings from the natural order of the universe (chs. 38–39) to the moral order. Has Job the mighty arm and the commanding voice of God? 10 If so, let him take God's glorious garments; 11–13 let him mount the throne of the universe, to send the thunderbolts of his anger speeding against the proud and the wicked. 14 Then, and only then, can he pass an intelligent judgment upon the divine ordering of things and earn the divine 'well done'. Acknowledge (RV 'praise'). Strahan points out that the Hebrew word used here (yāḏâ) is 'ordinarily used by a worshipper who is lauding or giving thanks to God'. Here the Creator lauds the creature!

40:15–24 Behemoth. In 40:15 – 41:34 we have a description of two monsters, Behemoth—usually identified as the hippopotamus—and Leviathan—usually identified as the crocodile. The atmosphere of the passage is that of chs. 38 and 39 rather than of 40:6–14. Its force in the argument proceeds on some such lines as: Can Job assume sway over the material order as represented by these formidable creatures? It is a much more formidable undertaking to stand forth as a combatant against their Creator (41:9–11). By this turn in the argument the Lord closes the last possible escape route by which Job might have tried to make sense of his predicament. The adversities of life can be brought within a framework of logical explanation if one is able to say that God is not wise enough always to make our circumstances match what we may deserve, or if, though wise, He is thought to be nevertheless unjust in His nature, or finally, if, though He is both wise and just, yet He lacks the power to put His wisdom and justice into effect. In His speeches to Job, the Lord opened on the theme of loving, detailed, provident wisdom (38:1 – 39:30); the second theme (40:1–14) is God's power in the moral order, His ability to abase the proud and to tread down the wicked (40:11, 12). Thus His moral justice is asserted. The marvels of physical strength, Behemoth and Leviathan, are intended to point to the awesome power of God. To men, these giants represent untamable strength, but yet they must submit if their Creator bring near his sword (v. 19). How powerful then is God! Along the line of this threefold argument, God brings Job to his final position of repentance and faith. He cannot argue his way out of his difficulty by denying the wisdom, justice or power of God, but he can, after he has seen just how wise, just and powerful God is, rest humbly and trustfully upon Him. 19 Cf. RV. 24 Can one take him with hooks adopts a reconstruction of text. AV 'He taketh it with his eyes' and RV 'Shall any take him when he is on the watch . . .?' follow the Hebrew 'in his eyes'.

41:1–34 Leviathan. The formidable qualities of the crocodile are emphasized in VV. 1–9. Ironical questions run through the passage. 1, 7 Can Job look upon the crocodile as a suitable object on which to demonstrate his fishing ability? 4 as a domestic servant? 5 as a plaything? 8 might be paraphrased to mean: 'Meddle with him in any of these ways, and you will rue the day.' 6 RV translates: 'Shall the bands of fishermen make traffic of him?' 9 The hope of a man: i.e. of getting the better of him. 10, 11 If a creature is too formidable to assail, what then must be said about the Creator of all things? Cf. Rom. 11:35. God is indebted to no man. Man has given him nothing; He has given man everything. So it is preposterous for man to imagine that he can stand on an equal footing with God. Yet some of Job's reckless challenges to God had almost implied that he could.

caused by the movements of his body in the waters.

42:1–6 JOB'S RESPONSE TO THE DIVINE WORD

Cf. 40:1–5 and see commentary in loc. The one who had been a combatant against God is now seen as a worshipper, humbly confessing his sinfulness, and entering into an experience of the divine forgiveness. The unveiling of God's glory led to an unprecedented experience of the divine forgiveness. Cf. Rom. 3:23. Associated with this new experience of sin is, first, an unprecedented confidence in God's providence. 2 All things certainly include the fulfilment of a beneficent divine purpose in Job's suffering. Cf. Rom. 8:28. Job the rebel had no confidence that no divine purpose could be thwarted; Job the humble penitent possessed it in rich measure.

Second, Job now completely renounces the force of human words and human reason. 3 'Who is this that hides counsel without knowledge?' is an echo of 38:2. His words, his wisdom, in which he had prided himself, had merely cast a clumsy screen across the consistent pattern running through God's dealings with him. 4 We have a further echo of God's words here. Cf. 38:3; 40:7. Answer a challenge like that, with his puny human mind, unable to grapple with the range of the divine wisdom? Impossible! Job the rebel would have had a different answer to give.

Third, 5 Job can rejoice in a fully personal religious experience. In comparison with the radiant personal faith the vision had brought to him, his earlier religious experience had been a matter of hearsay and not of personal experience.

42:7–17 EPILOGUE

The text now passes from poetry to prose, the style of writing used for the prologue. The conclusion opens with the condemnation of the three friends, Eliphaz, Bildad and Zophar. The omission of Elihu from public censure is significant and may have bearing upon his repudiation of the traditional theology that suffering necessarily implies sin and is always in proportion to its gravity. The three friends are charged with not speaking of me what is right (vv. 7, 8). Their view of the divine character was erroneous, especially in the case of God's rule upon earth and His dealing with men. Job, on the other hand, is commended. This, of course, does not mean that everything he had said was right. The narrative continues to portray the integrity of Job. The patriarch freely forgives the hurt that false words had given and even makes intercession for the three pseudo-comforters. God upholds Job publicly as a righteous man.

42:7–10 Job's spiritual blessings

The passage provides a beautiful picture of the spiritual and material tokens of this divine approval, of which the spiritual tokens are of supreme significance. 7, 8 Note first that God refers to Job as my servant four times in these two verses. One is reminded of the suffering Servant of Isaiah 53. (Cf. 1:8.) Then God commands Job for his sincere quest for truth, and censures the friends for their opposition to that quest. The large sacrifice mentioned in v. 8 is surely meant to indicate how much they were out of favour with God. We remember, of course, and are meant to remember passages in the friends' speeches, redolent with beauty and spiritual truth, while not infrequently Job had gone perilously near error, rebellion and blasphemy: but, as McFadyen has pointedly said, 'Job was right in his intellectual temper, in the drift, the impulse, the sheer intrepid honesty of his thought . . . . Out of all the welter of the discussion, Job stands as the champion of intellectual and religious freedom with the seal of the God of truth stamped upon his disfigured brow.' The passage is a striking warning that 'intrepid honesty' in facing the facts of existence —no matter how disturbing and unfamiliar—is much more pleasing to God than timid clinging to familiar and comfortable ideas in the teeth of the evidence. 9, 10 Finally, God honours Job's prayers for his friends. Job enters the company of the great interceders—Abraham, praying for Abimelech, and Moses for Pharaoh. The costly sacrifice was not enough: prayer was necessary. Is this a hint that orthodox ritual was insufficient to deal with human sin? (Cf. Ps. 51:16, 17.)

42:11–17 Job's material blessings

In passing from the spiritual tokens of God's approval to the material, it is striking to note 10 that it was when Job was praying for others that his material prosperity was restored. It was when his attention was focused on the spiritual interests of others that all other things were added to him (cf. Mt. 6:33). These verses speak 11 of the restoration of friendship; 12 of property; 13–17 and of family. This OT drama fittingly ends with the words And Job died, an old man, and full of days. Cf. Gn. 25:8; 35:29. As a sort of commentary upon the great passage of resurrection hope (19:25–27) the LXX adds 'and it is written that he will rise again with those whom the Lord raises up'.

Anyone who is familiar with modern commentaries on Job will be aware that many scholars do not believe that the epilogue is in fact a fitting conclusion to the book. Crucial reasons advanced are:

a. It is a 'sad concession to a low view of providential dealings' (Cheyne), to portray these material tokens of the divine approval.

b. The epilogue is open to the charge of falsity. Life often does not have a fairy-tale ending. The epilogue therefore is open to the very charge which Job levelled against his friends, i.e. that their theories did not fit the facts of human experience.

c. It is difficult to accept 42:7, 8 as a true description of the dialogue. It is claimed that a rebuke to Job is implied in the divine speeches, and that they echo what the friends had reiterated again and again, and what Job had decisively rejected.

Such considerations led scholars like Peake, Sellin, Duhm and Franks to hold that the author adapted an earlier book of Job and put in a dialogue of his own in place of the original speeches. Irwin claims that the author of the dialogue was 'too penetrating and too honest ever to have offended his readers with these superficialities' (i.e. of the epilogue). He postulates 'one more ancient writer who was stirred by the greatness of the Dialogue'.

There is an adequate answer to all the above difficulties.

a. The unfairness of Cheyne's criticism appears from various considerations. At a time when there was no clear picture of a life after death, how could the fact that righteousness is woven into the very texture of reality, and must ultimately bear the stamp of God's vindication, be demonstrated, unless on the canvas of this present life? There is no inconsistency in this since the aim of the book has not been to deny that there is a connection between righteousness and material prosperity, but only that the connection is invariable. We should also remember that Job's material prosperity has been shattered as a test of Satan's insinuations about the sincerity of Job's piety. The march of events has given the lie to Satan. Justice now demands some restitution.

b. How can the charge of falsity be laid at the door of the epilogue? This would only be valid if its message was: 'This is what happened to Job in the end and it will happen to everyone else in exactly the same way.' Nowhere is there a shred of evidence that the author dwelt in a fairy-tale world. On the contrary we have every right to hold that he was no less penetrating and observant than the author of the Psalms which reflects so clearly the problem of the prosperity of the wicked. There is no real evidence that in a moment of weakness he allowed an old ending to an old story to stand, although it really did not square with his own convictions, or that the ending is the work of a less resolute mind.

c. There is no insuperable difficulty in looking upon 42:7, 8 as a true description of the dialogue provided that it is remembered that the crux of the argument of the friends was that Job was being punished because he was a sinner in a sense that was not true of them. This was not the case and, of course, is not implied in the divine answer. Conviction of sin came, but it came through the vision of God, not through the views of the friends. Job came to realize that his sin was self-sufficiency: but this is the sin of every mortal man—including Job's friends. Their distinctive error was that they equated their own religious orthodoxy with the mind of God.

For these reasons it is possible to maintain a common authorship of prologue, dialogue and epilogue. The epilogue leaves us with a note of hope, not with a mechanical answer to the problem of suffering. All servants of God may not be treated as this great servant was, but all can rest assured that, however paradoxical life may appear to be, God has the whole world, and every human life, in His hands. The paradoxes of Job point forward to Calvary. William Neil finished his commentary on Job with the words: 'We have reached the heart of the message of Job when we can say: "Nothing in my hand I bring, simply to thy Cross I cling" or echo Paul's words in Romans 8:35–39.'

The Psalms

INTRODUCTION

The use of the Psalms in centuries of Christian worship is sufficient evidence to show that, without discounting the problems involved, there is no part of the OT in which the Christian finds himself more easily and more completely at home. We readily see here the same God who has now been fully disclosed to us in Christ; we see men of the same flesh and blood as ourselves, wrestling with, and finding God sufficient for, situations which are in principle the same as ours. We are deeply challenged and frequently rebuked by recognizing that their love for God, their joy in knowing Him, and their willingness to suffer for their faith far outstrip ours, notwithstanding that to us God has shown His love 'in that while we were yet sinners Christ died for us' (Rom. 5:8). Indeed, just as we soon learn in the NT that the era of grace is not without law, so pre-eminently in the Psalms we learn that the era of the law was not without grace. Joy and peace in believing, as well as the tribulations by which we must enter the kingdom, have ever been the experience of the Israel of God.

AUTHORSHIP AND COMPILATION

The OT is full of poetry and song. In this way Moses celebrated the Exodus (Ex. 15), and Deborah and Barak marked the defeat of Sisera (Jdg. 5). Ordinary folk like Hannah (1 Sa. 2), David (e.g. 2 Sa. 1:17ff.) and Hezekiah (Is. 38:9ff.) among the kings, and many of the prophets (e.g. Is. 37:21ff.; Hab. 3) marked their most significant experiences in song. It is no surprise, therefore, that out of such a religion there should emerge this anthology of its psalmody. But very difficult questions nevertheless remain: from what sources and by what steps did the Psalter come into its present form?

The superscriptions

At first sight the origin of the Psalms seems to be no problem at all. For the most part they are furnished with superscriptions or 'titles', and the majority of these contain a personal name which could conceivably be that of the author. 'David' features in seventy-three superscriptions (e.g. 3; 4; 5), the 'sons of Korah' in eleven (e.g. 44–49), 'Asaph' in twelve (e.g. 73–83; cf. other individual names in 88; 89; 90).

In assessing the value and meaning of these superscriptions, it no longer constitutes any problem that the ascription of a psalm to David involves us in supposing a very early date of composition. Psalm-study has long since left behind the curious fashion of insisting that the bulk of the Psalter originated in Maccabean times, and, for reasons which we shall presently explore, it is now quite commonplace to find the monarchy presupposed as the era of psalm-composition, and to find David reinstated as the 'sweet singer of Israel'. There is every reason to place reliance in traditions like that preserved in 1 Ch. 16, that David was the organizing spirit behind the schools of Temple-singers. But on the wider question of the date of the Psalms in general, we may note the opinion of Kaufmann that 'there is no psalm whose plain sense (as distinct from the midrashic romancing of modern exegetes) requires a dating later than the exilic Psalm 137' (E. Kaufmann, The Religion of Israel, 1961, p. 311).

Weiser appears willing to extend the possibility of early dating equally to the superscriptions. He writes: 'The term l^{e}dāwīd ('to David') in the titles of individual Psalms is . . . of an earlier date than the collection of "Davidic Psalms" which is hinted at in Ps. 72.20 . . . and can probably be traced back to a custom practised already in pre-exilic times by collectors of psalms at the Temple' (A. Weiser, The Psalms, 1962, p. 96). If this is the case, the way lies open for a more balanced assessment of the evidence of the LXX on the titles, for it has often been urged that there are so many Septuagintal variations from the Massoretic text that we are bound to conclude that we are dealing with a very unreliable textual tradition. Stated thus broadly, this is very far from the truth. The tendency of the LXX is to confirm the Massoretic text of the titles, and then, in not a few cases, to add something further. This does not, however, invalidate the Hebrew tradition: it confirms it. And if a considerable lapse of time occurred between the Hebrew titles and the LXX, such additional material is by no means unforeseeable.

Even so, however, the superscriptions do not solve the question of authorship. What does the preposition 'to' mean in the expression 'to David' (l^{e}dāwīd)? While it can imply authorship, as Hab. 3:1 shows, more literally it means 'belonging to'. In the case of psalms rooted in stated personal experiences (e.g. 3), it is easiest to understand 'belonging to' as a statement of authorship, for there is no good reason for disputing the accuracy of these historical allocations. But where a psalm 'belongs to the sons of Korah' is it not easier to understand that this was part of their recognized repertoire and to be found in the 'hymn-book' which they had compiled for their own use? Or again, the superscription of Ps. 102 is clearly intended to suggest on what sort of occasion the psalm can most suitably be used, just as modern hymn-books divide hymns into convenient categories. Weiser (op. cit., p. 96) takes this further with the suggestion that l^edāwîd, similarly, means 'for the use of the David (i.e. the Davidic king)'—a psalm to be recited by the king as he carried out his royal function in public worship. This last suggestion belongs, of course, with Weiser's total view of the Psalms and of the part played by the king in the Temple cult, but at the moment it serves to show that no simple solution offers itself as to the meaning of the superscriptions.

The ascription lam^enaṣṣēaḥ, found fifty-five times (e.g. 4–6) and now usually though still tentatively understood as 'to the precentor' or 'choirmaster', suggests that at some point a 'master of the Temple music' made a collection out of existing sources. Apart from Pss. 66; 67, this ascription is always coupled with some personal ascription, 'to David' or 'to Asaph', etc., which shows that the 'choirmaster' was careful to acknowledge copyright. But none of his superscriptions contains the name of more than one individual, and if such names only point to 'collections' and not to 'authors' it is rather too much of a coincidence that no psalm should have been found to 'belong', for example, both to 'David' and also to 'Asaph'. This reasoning would lead us to suppose that, in the case of Ps. 88, the choirmaster, on taking the psalm into his collection, intended his superscription to mean: 'This psalm was first included in the Korahite collection, and was composed by Heman the Ezrahite.'

Editorial work

Even when we grant that the bulk of Pss. 3–41; 51–72 once formed an independent 'Davidic' collection, and that other such collections are still visible in the Psalter (e.g. the 'Songs of Ascent', Pss. 120–134; or the 'Hallelujah' psalms, 111–113; 116–118; 135; 136; 146–150), and that collectors like 'the choirmaster' were at work, we are still very far from being able to explain how the Psalter reached its present arrangement and size.

Several facts combine to indicate that it grew by stages. First, Pss. 14 and 53 are identical, save that the former uses the personal name, Yahweh, for the God of Israel, and the latter uses the noun '^elōhîm (meaning 'God') throughout. Coupled with this is the observation that the usage of Yahweh predominates throughout Pss. 3–41, and that of '^elōhîm throughout 42–83. It is unreasonable to suppose that the same editor included one psalm twice in his anthology, and consequently we must assume two editors, one of whom worked in a situation which tended to avoid using the divine name. A similar editorial situation must be assumed in connection with the identity of Ps. 70 with 40:13–17, and 108 with 57:7–11 and 60:5–12. Second, as we noted above, 72:20 must have originated as an editorial note marking the complete edition (as far as was known) of the psalms of David. Third, a glance at the numbers of the 'Hallelujah' psalms above shows that they are not gathered into one section, but are spread through the latter part of the Psalter. This suggests a piecemeal process of growth rather than a consistent editorial policy carried out in one act of compilation. The fourth indication of the growth of the Psalter and the absence of a single, over-all editorial policy is provided by the musical and liturgical directions (e.g. the word 'Selah'). These are not spread evenly through the Psalms: 'Selah' occurs sixty-seven times in Pss. 1–89 but only four times subsequently.

The 'Five Books'

By whatever hands and under whatever pressures it was shaped, we have 150 psalms arranged into five 'books', probably with the deliberate intention of matching the five books of the Law with five of praise. The division between the books is marked by an editorially appended doxology (41:13; 72:18, 19; 89:52; 106:48). There is no doxology at the end of the Psalter, possibly because Ps. 150 in itself offers a shout of praise which aptly concludes both the fifth book and the whole collection.

THE INTERPRETATION OF THE PSALMS

The Psalms offer to the Bible student an outstanding opportunity for practising the analytical approach to Scripture. The reader should come to each psalm on the assumption that here is a self-contained unit of writing, that it has a single theme, and that it develops its theme in a clear, concise way. This is, of course, a generalization: it does not seem to apply, for example, to Ps. 119. The psalm under study should be read and re-read until its theme has been discovered, and until by the same process it is gradually becoming clear how the thought moves from one section to another. Special attention should be paid to connecting words like 'because' and 'therefore' which link the sub-sections together. By this process the modern reader can come to see in what circumstance the ancient writer composed this meditation, what pressures were heaviest upon him, and what consolations and reassurances he found in God. It is by finding out what the psalm meant to the author that we find what it may now mean to us.

Historical situations

One help which the Psalms themselves sometimes give to the reader is the association of some individual psalm with a stated historical situation (Ps. 3 and thirteen others). The present mood of OT study is unsympathetic towards these suggestions of origin, and would agree with G. W. Anderson in saying that 'the poetry of devotion is related to recurring situations in congregational worship and in the life of the believer, rather than to specific incidents in history' (A Critical Introduction to the Old Testament, 1959, p. 174). But many of these psalms have a warmth and urgency which is more readily explained in another way, namely that a recent personal experience has been not so much described as expressed in terms of the general truths which it embodied. Helmer Ringgren writes thus of the 'laments' in the Psalter, that they are not the 'life history of the individual' but express his distress in typical and universal terms, for 'their purpose is not to describe an event but to assign it to familiar categories'. He urges that 'this classification helps the individual to understand his suffering and to show him the way to obtain aid' (Israelite Religion, 1966, p. 181). As we shall see, e.g. in Ps. 51 with its extremely detailed dating, this is exactly what has happened, and in fact to take the historical heading seriously explains several otherwise inexplicable points in the psalm. It is, in fact, usually possible at least to say this, that if a man of deep spirituality generalized on the specified experience, this could well have been his exposition of the matter.

The work of Hermann Gunkel

The progress of psalm-study in this century has been based on the attempt to place each psalm accurately in the situation which gave it birth (Sitz im Leben), and the most influential writer has been Gunkel, whose classification of the psalms laid the foundation on which others have built. Gunkel, working between 1900 and 1926, turned specialist attention away from the often profitless task of trying to determine the date of origin of a psalm to the more satisfying task of probing its content and discovering its central idea. 'Gunkel', says A. R. Johnson ('The Psalms' in The Old Testament and Modern Study, ed. H. H. Rowley, 1951, p. 165), 'sought as a first step to classify the psalms according to their types and then, only secondarily and on the basis of this, to deal with the question of authorship and date.' This procedure is surely correct, and in Gunkel's hands was marked by much perception and common sense. A fuller discussion of Gunkel may be found in Johnson's essay: here we can do no more than sketch out the main categories which he distinguished, and which were five in number: 1. Hymns, i.e. psalms dwelling on the greatness and attributes of God, His acts in creation and history. Ringgren aptly sums up these psalms as 'descriptive praise' (op. cit., p. 179). They include Pss. 8; 19; 29; 68; 100; 103; 105; etc. 2. Communal laments, used by the assembled congregation in times of national threat. Pss. 44 and 74 are typical. 3. Royal psalms (e.g. 2; 18; 20; 45; 72) were supposed by Gunkel to have been used by the reigning Davidic monarch as part of his royal ritual in the public worship of the Temple. Gunkel tried to find a specific historic occasion for each and, e.g., assigned Ps. 132 to a celebration of the anniversary of the founding of the Davidic dynasty. 4. Individual laments formed for Gunkel the largest single group (e.g. 3; 5; 6; 7; 22; 42–43; 51; 88) and gave expression to individual grief, but in the setting of the assembled congregation. He noted a great similarity of structure in these psalms, and pondered specially the frequent note of assurance or certainty of being heard by God which they contain. Of this two explanations were thought possible: either that in the course of his lament the sufferer received inner assurance from God (e.g. 6:8–10), or that into his lament there was injected a word from God spoken by one of the Temple personnel (e.g. 55:22; cf. 2 Ch. 20:4–13, 14–17). Gunkel insisted on the individualism of these psalms, as against the view that they gave merely personalized meditations on party strife within post-exilic Judaism. 5. Individual songs of thanksgiving. Very often the individual laments vowed thanksgiving to God in the event of deliverance (e.g. 54:6). Gunkel recognized the public fulfilment of such vows in a separate group of psalms, including 18; 30; 32; 34; 116; 118.

The Psalms and the cult

Throughout Gunkel's work there is the conviction that the Psalms belong in the setting of the public worship, or cult, of Ancient Israel. Very often the Psalms themselves reveal their cultic orientation: they delight in God's house (84:10); they see the entrance to God's presence as provided by the 'holy hill', the 'tabernacle' and the 'altar' (43:3, 4); they include cultic directions (118:27, see commentary); they see inward piety as necessarily expressed in outward religious acts (116:13, 14, 17, 18). It is difficult to see how it could ever have been held that the Psalms were opposed to the practice of animal sacrifice. This was never, in fact, a well-founded theory. The verses to which it appealed (e.g. Ps. 50:13, 14) could support the case only if their context (50:5) were ignored (see further on Ps. 51). It is now recognized that, far from being anti-cultic, the Psalms are rooted in the cult, and, like the rest of the OT, insist that sacrifice as an outward act is useless unless it accurately reflects the inner state of the worshipper's heart: they must be 'sacrifices of righteousness' (4:5, AV; RSV 'right sacrifices'), sacrifices proceeding from a right disposition.

The ancient annotations included in the titles of the Psalms reinforce this cultic relationship, probably indicating in what way the various psalms were best suited for public use: among these words are 'psalm' (mizmôr, Ps. 3 and fifty-five others), and 'song' (šîr, Ps. 30 and thirteen others), though the difference between these is not clear; 'prayer' (Ps. 17 and four others), 'praise' (Ps. 145) and 'for instruction' (Ps. 60) are self-explanatory; three words are of doubtful meaning: 'Shiggaion' (Ps. 7; cf. Hab. 3:1) probably means 'dirge'; 'Miktam' (Pss. 16; 56–60) is hesitatingly associated by some with 'gold'—'a Golden Psalm', perhaps expressive of the estimation in which it was held; but by others, with more probability, with a verb meaning 'to cover', and hence associated by them with 'covering' or expiating sin. The psalms in question would be used in the rite of the sin-offering. All the psalms thus described are, however, concerned with protection from worldly foes, and this may be the sense in which they are 'psalms of covering'; 'Maskil' (Ps. 32 and twelve others) is certainly related to a verb meaning 'to have insight', and may mean 'a didactic poem'. Another group of descriptive words seems to have reference to the musical ordering of worship: 'for the flutes' (Ps. 5), 'with stringed instruments' (Ps. 4); 'Sheminith' (Ps. 6 and twelve others) may mean a particular 'eight-stringed' instrument, or eight-part arrangement; 'Gittith' (Pss. 8; 81; 84) may be related to the word for 'wine-press' and therefore point to the use of some joyful music such as was associated with the ingathering. A word which remains totally unexplained is yet the most frequent of all, 'Selah' (e.g. Ps. 3:2, 4, 8; seventy-one times in all). It seems to be a technical term, but whether it bears on the music, the voice(s) of the speaker(s), or the response of the worshippers remains unsettled. It may be related to a verb meaning 'to build up', hence 'raising of voice', crescendo of music, transposition to higher tone; or to a word meaning 'pause', hence 'musical interlude' or 'period of meditation'; or it may be an acrostic of three letters 's-l-h', meaning either 'change of voices' or 'repeat'. Finally, many psalms seem to include in their titles a suggestion of what tune should be used (9; 22; 45; 46; 53; 56; 57; 60; 80; 88).

All these things have been pointing to the cultic setting of the Psalms, but it has really only been under the impulse of Gunkel that detailed exploration has taken place. One distinctive line of enquiry is associated with the name of Mowinckel, who, while agreeing that the significance of the Psalms is to be sought by means of their setting in the cult, has urged in particular that the focal point of this setting is Yahweh's enthronement as universal King, depicted in an annual Temple-ceremony. Mowinckel insists that the opening words of Pss. 93; 97 and 99 (cf. 96:10) must be translated 'Yahweh has become King', and that they constitute the joyful cultic shout at the annual feast. By similarity of content with these psalms, he finds the same cultic setting suitable for 46; 48; 76; 87; 120–134 and many others (for fuller study see Johnson's essay mentioned above, and also his book Sacral Kingship in Ancient Israel, 1955).

There is, of course, no mention of such a festival in the historical books of the OT, but it is known that, in his anxiety to detach the ten tribes from their old affiliation to Yahweh and to the house of David, Jeroboam proposed to centralize religion at a northern shrine and to do so by means of 'a feast on the fifteenth day of the eighth month like the feast that was in Judah' (1 Ki. 12:26–33), and that in this feast he, as king, played a leading part. This suggests the existence of a Judahite feast whose emphasis was on God and king, and conceivably it could have been the Feast of Tabernacles, held annually exactly a month earlier than Jeroboam's imitation. In the admittedly much later reference in Zc. 14:16ff. Tabernacles is firmly linked with kingship and prosperity.

It is doubtful if thought on this subject would have proceeded even thus far were it not for the discovery of a 'New Year Festival' in Babylonian religion, which (it is often claimed) provided a pattern for identical celebrations throughout the Fertile Crescent. The chief Babylonian god, Marduk, was proclaimed as creator-king and to him was ascribed the pre-creation victory over the forces of chaos (figured by 'the deep') and present victory over all other gods (cf. Pss. 93; 95:3–5). The combat leading to this victory was dramatically represented, the reigning king portraying the victorious god. But the king also played a part in his own position as mediator between the god and the people. In this he was first ritually humiliated (cf. Ps. 89) until all hope of a revival of his rule was gone, but at the very eleventh hour he was delivered by divine intervention (cf. Pss. 46; 48), the opposing forces were routed, stability was restored, and prosperity guaranteed for another year. In Babylon, the fertility which promised prosperity was promoted also by the so-called 'sacred marriage' in which the king united himself with a chosen girl, and some have held that even this aspect was taken into Israel and is reflected in Ps. 45 and in the Song of Songs. But, apart from this, Ps. 46:8 with its invitation 'Come, behold', and Ps. 48:9, translated 'We have depicted', are said to point to Temple dramas associated with the New Year Festival.

The few references in the Psalms just given poorly represent the wealth of material which these theorists have combed from the Psalter, and must be viewed simply as typical. It should also be stressed that not all would allow that features such as the 'sacred marriage' were adopted in Judah: Israel's distinctive religious position would not permit wholesale taking over of pagan rites, and in particular a fundamental difference opened up between Babylon and Israel in that the former only required the exact performance of the ritual in order to secure divine favour, whereas in Israel the requirement was throughout righteousness, and the New Year Festival, if it existed, was more in the nature of an annual national act of consecration.

But theory remains theory and the strength of the opposition may be gauged by noting that both de Vaux (Ancient Israel, Its Life and Institutions, 1961, pp. 504ff.) and Martin Noth (The Laws of the Pentateuch and other Essays, 1966, pp. 145–178) have ranged themselves against it, the latter insisting, for example, that the existence of a common pattern of festival is extremely doubtful, that monarchy was a 'late-starter' in Israel and contained an element of election by the people which made it different in kind from the so-called 'divine kingship' of the Ancient Near East, and that there is no necessity to suppose a ritual of the divine king if the person were not there.

Another line of enquiry into the Psalms, arising from Gunkel's fundamental studies, is associated with the names of Weiser (see A. Weiser, The Psalms, 1962) and von Rad (cf. Ringgren, op. cit., pp. 191–197). The psalms which centre on the divine Kingship, or which presuppose the person of the human king, and, indeed, the majority of the rest of the Psalter, were composed for the celebration of the Feast of Tabernacles which was pre-eminently a 'covenant' feast, and whose regular celebration was commanded in the Law (Dt. 31:10). Such celebrations are reflected, so it is held, in Jos. 24 and Dt. 26. The constituents of this festival were typically Israelite: some representation of the coming of God to be with His people (e.g. Ps. 50:2, 3), even though we do not know how such a theophany would be portrayed. Ps. 50 suggests that it was by means of light; Is. 6:4 by smoke; Ex. 19:16 by trumpets. Second, the great historical acts of Yahweh were rehearsed (cf. Ps. 136), His will for His people was proclaimed (cf. Ex. 20) and to Him was ascribed Kingship over all creation. It is suggested that Ps. 8 accompanied some sort of dramatic representation of the work of creation in which the Davidic king played the role of the first man, representing all mankind.

Once again we remain in the realm of theory, except that here we are dealing with a known Israelite festival involving distinctively Yahwistic concepts. But proof remains impossible. Much value, however, has accrued to psalm-study by these investigations, and in particular a new appreciation of the place and importance of the king, and a new and vigorous sense of continuing Messianic expectation centred upon his person (see NBD, art. 'Messiah').

LEADING IDEAS OF THE PSALMS

It is impossible to offer more a than bare summary of the rich field of teaching constituted by the Psalms, but under each topic representative psalms will be mentioned in the hope that reference to them will open up the subject for the reader.

One of the most remarkable features of the Psalms is that, though personal testimony is their chief mode of expression and the first personal pronoun abounds, yet the clearest impression left is not of man but of God. In this respect the Psalms are the OT in miniature. They assert that God is the Creator (8; 104), but this is no abstract concept merely of how the world began: it is the ground of His present, active and powerful rule over all things as King (29; 96–99). The righteousness of His rule is often noted (11; 75), but in the great rhapsody of divine Kingship (145) we see that righteousness is plaited into a threefold cord with greatness and graciousness (cf. 146). The goodness of God (34) is inseparable from His holiness (103), and finds its obverse in the clear truth of His wrath (38). Another pair of matching truths is the universalism of God's rule (67) and the particularism of His choice of Israel (87), and these are linked by the figure of the Messianic King to whom, in His capacity as Davidic and priestly (110) ruler of Israel there is promised a world-wide sway (2; 72).

Both to His people as a whole (80) and to the individual (23) God is the Shepherd. While this provides a basis for the absolute confidence which looked to God alone for deliverance (16; 25; 31), recognizing His attentiveness to the needs of His own (3; 27; 57; 90; 91), it also gave rise to the problems of divine providence, the frequent adversities of God's people, individual (10; 12; 37; 73; 77; 88) and collective (44; 74; 80). It is in the light of this fact—that God's people have ever experienced suffering and enmity (54; 55; 56)—that we must understand the apparently automatic linking of righteousness and prosperity in Ps. 1. This is not a testimony of invariable experience but a credal statement: 'Since our God is good, and there is no other God, then it must be well for the righteous.'

The experience of adversity and enmity produced the fierce denunciation of their foes which has caused such offence especially to sensitive Christian ears. It is customary simply to allude to such passages as proper subjects of condemnation, evidences of the distance which separates the revelation of Christ even from the best of earlier men. And, indeed, can the Christian have any fellowship with the desire for the sudden destruction of foes (35:8), their death (55:15), the breaking of their teeth (58:6), the destitution (109:10) and massacre (137:9) of their children?

It is, however, unconvincing merely to write these passages off as 'Old Testament morality', because, first, similar praying and even rejoicing is found in the NT (Gal. 1:8, 9; Rev. 6:10; 18:20; 19:1–6); second, equally with the NT, the OT teaches the duty of love (e.g. Lv. 19:17, 18), God's hatred of violence (Ps. 5:6), and the propriety of returning evil with good (Pss. 7:5; 35:12–14); third, the psalms in which the imprecations are found in almost every case contain sentiments which ought to be the envy of the Christian: in Ps. 71, e.g., as against the 'offending' v. 13, note the experience of God claimed in vv. 2–7, the worship of v. 19, and the desire to testify in vv. 8, 15, 16, 18.

Turning to a more positive assessment, it must be clearly grasped that all the offending passages are prayers. There is no indication that adversaries were personally rebuffed by either word or deed. The persecuted men flew to God, and even though they certainly expressed themselves with vigour, fundamentally they assert their contentment to leave all to God, a course of action which Christians are commanded to follow (Rom. 12:19ff.). This trust in divine action is based on the revealed truth of the righteous judgment of God (see Ps. 7, where the imprecation of v. 6 rests on the theology of vv. 11–13). J. R. W. Stott aptly comments: 'I do not find it hard to imagine situations in which holy men of God do and should both cry to God for vengeance and assert their own righteousness. Since God is going to judge the impenitent, a truly godly person will desire him to do so, and that without any feelings of personal animosity' (The Canticles and Selected Psalms, 1966, pp. 11, 12, 154).

In summary, the motives behind these imprecations were three in number: first, the moral passion of a holy man (e.g. 139:21, 22). Stott confesses that 'I myself would find it hard to echo these sentiments. The reason for this is not, however, that they are beneath me, but that they are beyond me. . . . I cannot attain to desires for divine judgment without vindictiveness nor to assertions of my own righteousness without pride' (loc. cit.). Second, they were moved by a zeal for the clearing of God's good name (e.g. 9:16–20; 83:16, 17), and third, by a determination to be realistic. Is it right to pray that God will avenge His persecuted people? If it is—as assuredly it must be—then the precise petitions of Ps. 137:7–9 are often involved, even if in our polite way we prefer to leave them unsaid. In the same way, we would readily pray Ps. 143:11, but hesitate over its realistic corollary, v. 12; likewise, we happily pray for the second coming without stopping to think that we are actually praying for the events of 2 Thes. 1:8. Possibly, therefore, our sense of offence at the imprecations arises not so much from Christian sensitivity as from our general inexperience of persecution and our failure to make common cause with Christians under the lash. 'The victory of God', says Hubert Richards, 'cannot be had without the crushing of evil. It is an absurd sentimentality to want the one without the other' (The Psalms in Latin and English, 1964, p. viii).

But there was more to the psalmists' facing of the facts of life than imprecatory praying. When they affirmed the 'creed' of Ps. 1, they were in fact holding fast to four great truths. First, they would have admitted that because God looks for righteousness (4; 5; 15; 24; 50) and opposes the ungodly (52), they, acknowledging their own sinfulness (51), must expect life to contain an admixture of adversity. Second, the oft-remembered goodness of God to Israel (78; 81; 114) bred a confidence that He would never utterly forsake His people—a confidence which proved well founded, as the many testimonies, individual (18; 40; 116) and national (46; 47; 48), show. Third, they asserted that the privilege and wealth of having the Lord for their God outweighed any transitory, earthly tribulation. The Psalms abound in this sort of joy (9; 100; 136; 150); they speak of a loving longing for God (63), satisfaction in His presence (123; 131), desire for His house (42; 43; 84), the goodness of His revelation (19), delight in His law (40; 119), and the wonder of forgiveness (32; 51). Out of personal travail, one psalmist spoke for all: 'My flesh and my heart fail, but God is the strength of my heart and my portion for ever' (73:26)

Fourth, the psalmists asserted the blessed hope of a life with God hereafter in glory (see on Pss. 6; 16; 17; 30; 49; 73; 88; 115). This has been and remains a matter of dispute among OT students, but it seems broadly true to say that the further we move from the era when a supposed evolution of religious thought was taken as the arbiter of OT beliefs, the more we approach what Robert Martin-Achard so well described as 'the discovery of the imperishable blessedness of the man who lives in God' (From Death to Life, 1960, p. 165). This, above all, is the conviction of the psalmists as they faced life and death, and it is the conviction which a study of their writings will, please God, impart to us also.

BOOK ONE. PSALMS 1–41

PSALM 1. LIFE'S ALTERNATIVES

This psalm well serves as an introduction to the whole collection, for it deals with a theme close to the heart of the psalmists: the alternative characters of men, displayed in alternative modes of conduct, and issuing in alternative destinies. It is closely associated with Ps. 2 which deals with the same themes on a national level. The psalm is not, however, to be understood as promising unvarying prosperity to the godly man at all times. The OT knows life too well to do that, and, for instance, it is interesting to note that the opening psalms of Book 2 (Pss. 42–44) show us the godly man and the godly nation in extreme adversity (cf. Pss. 73; 74). Ps. 1 is a sort of 'creed'. Just as we say 'I believe in God the Father Almighty', and yet sometimes pass through experiences which seem to suggest that He is neither our Father nor Almighty, so also Ps. 1 is an assertion of the blessedness of the righteous man and the faith that God will see him through, as indeed v. 6 insists.

1 The psalm begins by showing the distinctive public life of the righteous. The verbs (walks . . . stands . . . sits) indicate not sinless perfection but the resolute cast of the man's mind: he has determined to differ from the principles (counsel) which govern the life of the wicked, to make no common cause (stands) with those whose lives 'miss God's mark' (sinners), to shun the fellowship (sits) of the avowed enemies of God (scoffers; cf. Pr. 21:24). 2 This resolute will is rooted in his secret life of delight in what the Lord teaches (law), and of continuing meditation on it. Thus we are taught that the resolute will which governs the outer life is rooted in emotions captivated by God's truth, and a mind constantly fed upon His teaching. 3 could open with the words 'And consequently': such a secret life as v. 2 describes yields a distinctive harvest. Drawing vitality from the law of God as from a river, it is fruitful, evergreen and prosperous. It may not necessarily be what the world would call prosperity. 4, 5 By contrast, the wicked are as worthless as chaff, possess no stability, are helpless before divine judgment, and have no share in the fellowship of God's people. 6 The ultimate significance of these alternative modes of life and thought is found in the attitude of the Lord. It is He who knows the way of the righteous; i.e. He watches over and approves of their whole character and conduct (cf. 2 Tim. 2:19), guaranteeing for them a destiny in diametrical contrast to that of the wicked (cf. Jn. 3:16; Rom. 6:23).

PSALM 2. PLOT AND COUNTERPLOT

This is rightly regarded as a Messianic psalm. It was probably based upon a historical occasion such as that recorded in 2 Sa. 5:3 or the coronation of one of the Davidic kings. Another aspect of the situation is outlined in Ps. 83:5ff. But the distinction of Ps. 2 lies in its discernment of the cosmic crisis behind a national event.

The poem represents the whole world organized against the Lord in deliberate opposition to His rule, and points the contrast between the agitation and futility of rebellious peoples and the equanimity and immutable purposes of God.

1–4 The sovereign God

1 The question is rhetorical not analytical; for any revolt against God is regarded as baseless. The collective power of nations and peoples can only plot in vain. 2, 3 Just as the NT sees the Christian as opposed by the ungodly world (cf. Jn. 15:19) and its rulers (cf. Eph. 6:12), so here the OT sees God's universal purpose for His anointed (cf. Ps. 72:8–11) under attack from the world and its rulers. Historically the object of their attack was the anointed of the Lord, viz. David (cf. 1 Sa. 24:6); prophetically it was the Messiah (cf. Acts 4:25–27). 4 But as the One who sits in the heavens and as Lord (Heb. 'ᵃdōnāy, 'sovereign'), God's position and power give Him such confidence in the face of opposition as to make it laughably pathetic.

5, 6 The appointed king

5 Then has peculiar force: it signifies the termination of the age of man's apparent freedom and the establishment in the earth of the divine purpose. So sure is this appointed climax that God does not hesitate to allow centuries to the rebellious nations so that all their plans may mature, all their objections to His rule may be voiced and every resistance attempted. In this He is governed by His own merciful desire to save (2 Pet. 3:8, 9), and by His absolute justice which judges none before his own deeds have made him ripe for judgment (Gn. 15:16). Then, in the fullness of time, He intervenes with wrath (lit. 'blowing nostril') and fury (lit. 'burning anger') and 6 utters His emphatic word (cf. Rom. 1:18; 2 Thes. 2:8–13), I have set my king on Zion, my holy hill (cf. Heb. 1:2, 3). Emphasizing the divine purpose (lit. 'as for me, I have set . . .'), the psalm points to the person and the place: God's king in God's city, the destined world-ruler.

7–9 His charter of kingship

It is imagined that the rebellious nations, gathered in tumultuous revolt upon the earth, have been momentarily quelled by the divine declaration which echoes from heaven. In the silence which is supposed to follow, David himself addresses the assembled kings and peoples. If, as some hold, this psalm reflects a ritual enacted at the time of a coronation or annually on its anniversary, how dramatic this would all be! First of all he asserts his kingship to be authorized by the Lord on the grounds of relationship (v. 7), endowment (v. 8) and vocation, i.e. the power to overcome (v. 9).

7 The phrase You are my son can be paralleled in Ps. 89:26, 27, and the words today I have begotten you may be understood historically as referring to the day of David's enthronement, indicative of his adoption as God's son (cf. 2 Sa. 7:14), and truly fulfilled in Jesus Christ. Acts 13:33 and Rom. 1:4 declare that He was acclaimed 'Son' by the very fact of the resurrection. Heb. 1:5 and 5:5 quote the phrase as associated with the incarnation and priesthood of Christ. 8 Similarly the promised gift of the peoples and realms of this world came to be a Messianic expectation and has long been understood of Christ. 9 Rev. 2:27 quotes this verse in connection with 'the end', i.e. the coming of Christ in glory and power. Cf. also Rev. 19:15.

10–12 The moment of decision

In the second part of David's address he reverts to the reality of the situation described in vv. 1–3. That peril has not passed; the crisis is not yet resolved; the elasticity of the divine Then (v. 5) has not yet snapped; the issue may still be moulded by men. 10 Hence the appeal to the kings and rulers of the earth. 11, 12 The alternatives of wrath or refuge, perishing or blessing lie before them.

PSALM 3. PRAYER CHANGES THINGS

Pss. 3 and 4 are related as being prayers of the morning and evening, in each case following a period of great danger and rich protection. The occasion indicated by the title is completely suitable to the content of the psalm. 1 The king's distress of heart arose from the magnitude of the rebellion (cf. 2 Sa. 15:13) and 2 from the prevalent feeling that not even God could help David now. But note that trouble drives David to God in prayer, not from Him in disbelief (cf. 1 Sa. 30:6). 3–8, which express his reaction, are a sublime expression of unquenchable trust in God.

1–4 Despondency at nightfall

The sombre developments of the day are summed up in an evening prayer and left with the Lord in confidence that He has heard and heeded. 3 In his danger, the Lord is his shield; in his humiliation, He is his glory, i.e. having God he has everything, even if he is bereft of all else (2 Cor. 4:7–11), and He may be trusted, as the One who shall vindicate David against his enemies and detractors, to lift up his head. 4 All this confidence rests upon experience of answered prayer (the verbs represent unvaried custom), and upon revelation of the nature of God as He has shown Himself on his holy hill, whether this refers to Sinai or Zion. It was this knowledge of the Lord which enabled him to sleep (v. 5).

5, 6 Vigorous faith at morning

The Lord sustains me. The freshness of body and serenity of faith with which the writer awoke the next morning were due to an implicit assurance of divine mercy and preservation. This not only rid ominous circumstances of any power to intimidate but initiated a claim to actual triumph over them.

7, 8 A call to God

But one night of safety has not dispelled the danger, and prayer remains David's resource. 7 The latter part of this verse could be a reference to past deliverances (cf. RV), in which case former mercies act as present encouragements. But in RSV David recalls the changeless faithfulness of God, and then 8 looks to Him as the sole bestower of deliverance or salvation, and the sole source of His people's blessedness.

PSALM 4. AN EVENING PRAYER

V. 8 shows that this is an evening prayer, which we may well associate with the same period of danger indicated in the title of Ps. 3.

1, 2 Appeal

1 At night as much as in the morning the Lord is David's resource, to whom he appeals on the ground of personal relationship and changelessly holy character as (lit.) 'my righteous God'. Equally he is encouraged by God's former deliverances, giving him room to move when he had been enclosed in distress (e.g. 1 Sa. 23:26–29), and by God's gracious disposition towards him. 2 While David waits in prayer before God he makes a meditative appeal to his opponents whom he imagines to be gathered before him. In the turmoil that followed the rebels' initial failure to organize promptly the capture of the fleeing king, through Absalom's mistake in not following Ahithophel's advice (see 2 Sa. 17:1ff.), there was opportunity to have second thoughts about supporting Absalom. David metaphorically appeals to them, charging them with dishonouring the royal dignity he has received from God and recalling the proud misrepresentations of the facts which had led them to join the rebellion (e.g. 2 Sa. 15:1–6).

3, 4 Warning

David reinforces his appeal by a warning reminder of his special place in God's providential ordering of affairs. 3 He makes no reference to his position as the Lord's anointed but simply to his godly character. Being innocent of their charges he confidently trusts the Lord to intervene for him (cf. Ps. 66:18). 4 As ever, human anger trembles on the brink of sin (cf. Eph. 4:26; Jas. 1:20) and before continuing in their opposition they would do well to listen to the voice of conscience speaking in their hearts.

5 Admonition

Right sacrifices, indicative of a heart desirous of being at peace with God, offer the way of restoration, and in calling his opponents to take this course David summons them from their baseless reliance on Absalom to trust in the Lord.

6–8 Testimony

The way of trust is a blessed one. 6 He recalls that in contrast to the many opponents of 3:1 there are many looking to God alone for alleviation, and resting as they do this on His unchanged character as shown in the Aaronic blessing (cf. Nu. 6:26), for when the Lord looks with radiant face upon His people then their fortunes change and they are blessed indeed. 7 In support of this, he also confesses joyfully that in his own case a desperate plight had been transformed by an inward sense of divine grace, which far surpassed the material blessings of food brought by the aged Barzillai (cf. 2 Sa. 17:27–30). 8 Alone. The Hebrew word may mean either that God alone gives him protection or that God makes him to dwell in safety even when alone (cf. RV mg.).

PSALM 5. A MORNING PRAYER

This is a companion to the previous psalm: the circumstances are similar but v. 3 marks it as a morning prayer.

1–3 The invocation

The urgency of his need once more drives him to prayer. 2 The titles of my King and my God imply a relationship between David and the Lord which enables him to claim the aid of supreme power and righteousness. 3 In the morning. As the first act of the day he (lit.) 'sets (it) in order' and the reference may be either to an ordered statement of his needs in prayer (cf. RV) or to a duly presented sacrifice. Then in complete trust he will watch in expectation of the Lord's response.

4–8 God's way with the wicked

This expectant confidence is based on the character of God which is so unlike that of the men who oppose him, and is so highly esteemed in his own heart. 4, 5a Three negative statements, followed 5b, 6 by three positives show the inflexible opposition of God to the wicked, in particular to people of boastful self-importance, liars, and those of ruthless and dishonest conduct to others. The speaker then emphasizes in two respects his own differing characteristics. 7 In reverential awe he worships in God's house (cf. Ps. 27:4). 8 In his trouble, his ambition is for God to guide him. Not only does he need to know the right; he needs to have removed all those obstacles which would hinder him from walking in God's way. Make thy way straight; i.e. 'make thy pathway unimpeded'.

9–12 God's way with the righteous

This part of the psalm deals with the same elements as the previous section, i.e. the wicked and the godly, but the orientation and emphasis are quite different. Vv. 4–6 consider the wicked as in the sight of God; vv. 9, 10 describe them as they are in life. Vv. 7, 8 form a humble confession of trust in God; vv. 11, 12 speak of jubilant confidence in God's blessing. The prayer has become more precise and faith has become much more assured. 9 Sins of speech are once more singled out for special condemnation (cf. vv. 5, 6), and 10 are seen as leading directly, and by the providence of God, to destruction. This principle of sin bringing its own inevitable results is frequently expressed in the Psalter. Cf. Ps. 28:4 and see Gal. 6:7, 8.

PSALM 6. A PRAYER OF ANGUISH

This psalm further stresses the same message as the preceding three: that the proper reaction to trouble is to pray. But a new factor enters the discussion here: the possibility that human hostility is the outward expression of divine disapproval, and it is specifically against this that the psalmist now prays, for the troubled man must always search his conscience for sins which provoke God, and supplicate for mercy and restoration.

1–7 Opposition countered by prayer

While clearly still oppressed by human foes (vv. 7, 10), the psalmist's primary fear is that God has become his enemy, and this absorbs all his attention in his prayer. The prayer rests upon three grounds: first, 2, 3 he pleads his present need. The anguish is so severe that both his bones, his bodily frame, and soul, his inner resources of mind and spirit, are on the verge of breakdown. Of them both he says that they are troubled (lit. 'terrified'). His condition is one of the utmost terror, felt both physically and nervously. For this condition, his tranquillizing agent is prayer. Second, 2 he pleads the nature of God, whose broad characteristic towards the troubled is to be gracious, and 4 whose particular attitude towards His own people is one of steadfast love. His prayer is an effective antidote to his trouble because it leads him to repose on such a God as this. Third, 5 he pleads the fact of his eternal destiny. This verse does not describe the invariable lot of the dead in OT thought. It is speaking exclusively of one sort of death, the death presupposed by the opening verse, death under the wrath of God. Should one die with God as his unreconciled enemy, what hope could he possess? Against such a fate the psalmist pleads (cf. Pss. 30:3, 9; 88:5). 6, 7 Such hopelessness results in bitter sorrow.

8–10 Prayer issues in assurance

These verses are best interpreted as an anticipated experience of what is most desired. It may be coloured by memories of former occasions, but this is primarily an intuitive sense of a fulfilment which is yet in the future. 8, 9 The intervention of God is a direct response to his sorrow and supplication and will invert all their values and utterly and unexpectedly throw them into confusion (cf. Pss. 35:4–8; 83:13–17; 2 Thes. 2:4–10; 2 Pet. 3:3–10). 10 is a more sober but equally confident expectation of that fulfilment; his opponents will be disgraced by the obvious contradiction of their expectations. In place of his own terror (v. 3) they will be sorely troubled ('terrified'). 'If God is for us, who is against us?' (Rom. 8:31).

PSALM 7. AN APPEAL FOR JUDGMENT

This is another prayer for divine protection against ruthlessness and calumny. Cush (see title) is not named in the chronicles of the time. The Talmud identifies him with Saul; he may have been one of Saul's fanatical fellow-tribesmen, like Shimei (2 Sa. 16:5). It is generally assumed that the poem belongs to the period of Saul's persecution of David. See introduction to Ps. 52.

1–10 An appeal to God

1, 2 The situation is one of flight from cruel enemies, of which one is particularly to be feared because his malevolence seems as violent as that of an angry lion. 3–5 reveal a conviction of personal innocence almost as vehement as that of Job when he closed the debate with his friends (Jb. 31). Evidently those who sought David's life accused him also of dishonour, i.e. of attempting to seek vengeance on the anointed Saul. The words of v. 4b recall the incident of 1 Sa. 24:1–12. 6, 7 Prayer, however, is still the sole resort of the godly man. In the face of base calumny, he does not answer back, but submits his case to the judgment of God (cf. 1 Pet. 2:23). The psalmist links his own vindication with a vision of the trial of all humanity before the high court of heaven (cf. Is. 43:9). The Judge of all the earth (Gn. 18:25) necessarily does right, and very often individual acts of divine judgment are associated with God's universal office as Judge in order to affirm their correctness and finality (Is. 3:13–15). 8 So here it is as though the court of heaven were already constituted and the universal trial begun. The psalmist first appeals to God for a favourable judgment upon himself on the grounds of his own integrity. 9 He then asks for a true judgment on the wicked, those who seek his destruction, on the ground that, in such an ultimate and true assessment of life, all evil doing must be disclosed as engendering its own condemnation. Righteousness is seen here as no mere outward conformity. Minds and hearts, thoughts and emotions come under divine scrutiny, and 10 none may look to God as his protective shield except the inwardly upright.

11–17 The divine judgment

11 That God has indignation every day reveals that it is part of His unchanging nature to be hostile to all that offends His righteousness. 12, 13 This reaction is depicted in the imagery of irresistible aggression—the sharpened sword, taut bow, deadly weapons and fiery darts—encountered by the sinner who obstinately advances to his doom because he will not turn to the central fact of God's grace and mercy. 14–16 The whole career of wickedness is then described in its beginning, its action and its end (cf. Jas. 1:15). 14 The evil man of his own nature gives birth to falsity and error; 15 his work fails in its design and becomes a snare to himself (cf. Ps. 9:16); 16 his plans and methods ultimately cause his ruin (cf. 1 Sa. 25:39; also Mt. 21:33–41; 25:24–28).

17 All these thoughts evoke in the psalmist a profound conviction of God's worthiness of praise, not only for His innate righteousness but because of His sure response to this appeal for judgment, whose name is Yahweh, the Most High.

PSALM 8. MANKIND, A PARADOX

Unlike the supplicatory psalms which immediately precede and follow, this poem is meditative and lyrical. The first and last phrases are identical and form a frame for profound ideas concerning God's essential being and His works on earth.

1, 2 The universal majesty of God

1a O Lord, our Lord. Lit. 'O Yahweh, our Sovereign'. Speaking as an Israelite who knows his God as Yahweh, the psalmist acknowledges that none other than He is the universal sovereign ruler. It is from this truth that the assurance of faith springs: I am in the care of Him whose hand controls all and whose will as sovereign none can gainsay. 1b, 2 is both difficult to translate and to understand. RSV and RV give the most likely alternatives. RV suggests that the majestic glory of God, seen stamped upon the heavens, is equally seen when He takes the insignificant babes of the earth and uses them to confound the ungodly. Maybe the psalmist was present when the simple faith of a child silenced an arrogant opponent! RSV rather enquires how the invisible glory of a God who is above the heavens is to be seen and known. The answer is found in two acts of God: first, when children grasp and rejoice in the simple truths of God, His glory is truly seen; secondly, when the moral law which sets a bulwark against unrestrained sinfulness is contemplated, God's glory is seen. The mention of the restraining of the avenger (cf. Nu. 35:14–28) supports this latter view.

3–9 The inscrutable ways of God

A sense of paradox is being developed in the psalm, and this is now elaborated with respect to man's existence. 3 Meditation upon the varied work of creation in the skies (cf. Jb. 36:22 – 37:12) and in the heavenly bodies (cf. Ps. 19:1–6; Jb. 9:7–10; 38:31–33) brings a conviction of man's frailty and insignificance. 4 Man . . . son of man. The Hebrew words denote man's lowly origin and human frailty. Why should God remember any man and, indeed, never leave him alone (cf. Ps. 144:3; also 33:13–19 and Ex. 3:15, 16)? Reason and observation can offer no answer to this question. It can be met only by divine revelation, one which discloses a concept of man that seems wholly incompatible with man's own inferences. The essential purpose of creation as revealed of old discloses a threefold peculiarity which lifts man from the negligible to a position of amazing eminence. 5 He has been created by God as 'but little lower than God' Himself. This image of God imparted to man is accompanied by certain attributes, glory and honour, which mark out man as superior to all other creatures. 6–8 Moreover, the world and its forms of life have been placed under man's authority (Gn. 1:26–28). 9 This consciousness of a high calling and destiny evokes in the psalmist the ultimate and exuberant praise of the final verse.

It must be noted that the NT amplifies this psalm and also interprets it with reference to Christ. Heb. 2:5–9 first quotes the LXX version (where 'ĕlōhîm is translated angelous) and then bases its argument upon a full and literal exegesis of v. 6b. The statement Thou hast put all things under his feet is taken to be a prophetical allusion to Jesus. In a similar way 1 Cor. 15:27 also interprets this same verse of Christ, in whom is fully seen the dominion which God intended man to have and which, in Christ, all the redeemed will ultimately share.

PSALM 9. THE BASIS OF PRAISE

This is the first of the so-called acrostic or alphabetical psalms, making use of the successive letters of the Hebrew alphabet to commence the opening word of its verses. In this case the acrostic is not complete as only the first eleven letters, with one omitted, are used. The acrostic may be continued (though still imperfectly) in Ps. 10, and it is possible that the editor who associated Ps. 10 with Ps. 9 because of the suitability of its content imposed this somewhat artificial appearance of unity to bind them together. Ps. 9 (see especially vv. 3, 5, 6) could well have originated in a situation such as is described in 2 Sa. 5:17–25. It possesses a very coherent structure, such as is frequently exemplified in the Psalms. In vv. 1–10 the psalmist testifies of his thanksgiving to God, and in vv. 11–18 invites the whole company to join in praise. Within these sections we then have, first, the explanation why praise is thus offered (4, 5; 12–14), namely because of God's acts of deliverance; secondly, the situation which resulted from those acts (6; 15); and finally the abiding truths exemplified in God's acts, the nature of His universal rule (7–10; 16–18). The psalm then aptly concludes with a desire for His world rule to be established forthwith (19, 20).

1, 2 Wonderful is a word the OT reserves for things, people (cf. Is. 9:6), or deeds which are miraculous or supernatural. David here discerns the hand of God in his deliverance and cannot but testify. 3, 4 The historic cause of his elation and thanksgiving is, first, victory in battle, whereby God has vindicated David's kingship. Truth and righteousness have been demonstrated as being with David's cause. 5, 6 Secondly, he rejoices in the destruction of his enemies, who have ceased to exist as dangerous foes. 7, 8 The abiding truths which he sees to be exemplified in these experiences are, first, the perpetuity of God's righteous rule; the themes of God's inexhaustible being and essential justice are used to bind together the spheres of His celestial enthronement in power and His terrestrial administration of ceaseless vigilance. 9, 10 Secondly, he praises God for the infallibility of His gracious care; all men who acknowledge and obey the Lord (those who know thy name) can fully rely upon His protective care when they are harassed and oppressed.

11, 12 The historical basis of the psalmist's praise is particularly his own, but the religious basis can know no such restrictions; hence he calls upon the whole company who have heard his testimony to give world-wide publicity to the acts of the God who is known in Zion (cf. Ps. 96:3, 7–10). Such corporate recognition of God's sovereignty could not be evoked in the same way as the psalmist's, but it could be induced by the realization among men that the eye of God is inescapable (cf. Ps. 33:13–15). All bloodshed caused by human motives is repugnant to God (Gn. 9:5; cf. Lk. 11:50, 51; Rev. 6:10) and His intervention is to be expected.

13, 14 are a typical 'cry of the afflicted' (v. 12) to which God hearkens and upon which He acts. Peril has thrust him to the gates of death, i.e. to the very edge of life (cf. Ps. 107:18, 19); but his hope in God is that he will come again to the gates of Jerusalem where he will testify to divine deliverance. 15, 16 are a statement of the psalmist's own faith, expressing the general truths reaped from individual experience. Disaster to the wicked, whether actual or anticipated, usually assumed to be the operation of 'natural retribution' (cf. Ps. 7:15, 16), is an aspect of divine irony wherein God's essential righteousness is inexorably displayed (cf. Gal. 6:7, 8; 2 Cor. 5:10). 17 Those men who wickedly ignore God or rebel against the principles of godliness must surely die. Sheol is the place of the dead. 18 On the other hand the needy and the poor are just as surely the objects of God's special care. Contrast vv. 5b and 6. The frequent reference in the Psalter to 'poor and needy' does not necessarily imply material destitution; the phrase is applied to all who have been reduced to utter dependence upon God (cf. Mt. 5:3).

As though to compensate for the activity of evil-doers, there is always the possibility of the intervention of God. 19, 20 The confident trust in the Lord which marked the opening verse is now focused in a petition that He should assert His power, judge the peoples of the earth (cf. Ps. 7:6–9), and so awe the arrogant by a demonstration of His majesty that every man shall have to confess his own human weakness and ephemeral nature (cf. Jas. 4:14).

PSALM 10. A PRAYER IN A TIME OF SOCIAL DISORDER

Apart from the acrostic relationship of Pss. 9, 10 (see introduction to Ps. 9), they are also linked in theme and phrasing. In particular, vv. 1–11 are well seen as an expansion of the brief prayer with which Ps. 9 concludes.

The theme is a familiar one in all periods of church history, and not least today: the apparent impunity with which ruthless men go their self-seeking way, regardless of God or man, allowing neither morality nor humanity to set limits to their methods or objectives. No thoughtful person who has faced either organized crime or the impersonal Juggernaut of vested commercial interests will have escaped the feeling of helplessness which the psalmist here shows. But he is in fact by no means helpless, for he believes in a living, reigning, merciful and just God to whom the ultimate victory belongs.

1–11 Why is God silent when wickedness abounds?

Evil men and their deeds could never prosper if divine righteousness immediately checked their wickedness. But, on the other hand, wickedness could never bring its own condemnation unless wrongdoing found some expression. 1, 2 The psalmist's perplexity has arisen because God continues to seem indifferent long after injustice among His people has become flagrant, frequent and full-grown (cf. such Pss. as 22; 35; 37; 38; 73).

3–11 give a detailed description of the ways of the wicked. They are characterized, first of all, by self-sufficiency based on worldly success. 3 The wicked boasts; i.e. sings praise to himself, thus making his own desire into his God (cf. Hab. 1:15, 16). 4 Note Ps. 14:1 and Jb. 21:14, 15. It is not that evil man denies the existence of God (atheism was virtually unknown among Jews at this time), but 5, 6 he ridicules the notion that God is concerned how men behave. The absence of immediate punishment upon wrongdoers is always a strong argument for a sinner whose values are located wholly within this world, so that even death has little menace for him (see Job's vehemence about this in Jb. 21:17). 7 There is also an inner falsity which springs from his evil desires. Guiltiness is added to blindness, and this is incurred first through speech and then 8 in secret deeds against the innocent and helpless. 9 These cruel practices are described again, 10 the deceitfulness is restated and 11 the primary falsity of his speech is again expressed.

12–18 An appeal to God to intervene

Apart from v. 1 the theme of the first part of the psalm has been 'the wicked', to whom there were a score of references; in the second part the theme is the Lord and He is mentioned a dozen times. The direction of thought is changed from details of wicked practices to characteristics of God's rule. These are wholly at variance with the notions of evil men whose inward assurance about God's indifference is altogether untrue. 14 The afflictions of His people are not only observed but become occasions of divine action. 15 The psalm thus becomes an appeal to God that He would intervene and eliminate wickedness. 16 The psalmist finally comes to rest on the ever-comforting and secure truth that the Lord is king for ever and ever. But there are two sides to this truth. On the one hand the nations, which here means (as in 2:1) organized opposition to God, whether explicit or implicit, must disappear. There is no future for ungodliness in any form. 17 On the other hand, there is the truth of an equally inevitable comfort for the godly oppressed whom the Lord first hears, then strengthens with inner resources in their heart so that they may endure, and 18 finally delivers, for the ultimate impossibility is that man who is of the earth, mere earthly, creaturely man (cf. Ps. 9:20; Is. 2:22) should have the last word.

PSALM 11. A SONG OF STEADFASTNESS

The theme of serene Godward trust even in face of peril is the same as characterized Ps. 10:16–18. This poem may reflect David's attitude at the time when friends advised him to flee from the brooding envy of Saul even before the third and most serious attempt on his life (see 1 Sa. 18:11; 19:10); but the psalm belongs to all occasions when evil powers threaten the security and well-being of God's people. The vision of the enthroned God is the great stabilizing factor of life. The psalm opens with an affirmation of faith (v. 1a). This is then debated: the argument of the opposition (vv. 1b–3); the reply of faith (vv. 4–6). The psalm concludes (v. 7) by giving the verdict to the original affirmation.

1–3 The warning by prudence

The advice Flee like a bird . . . what can the righteous do? may have been given to David by friends, or it may represent the voice of expediency in David's own heart. 1 Sa. 27:1 shows how common and persuasive the voice of worldly prudence is—and how deceptive, as the subsequent history of David among the Philistines proves. 2 The power of the opposition and their capacity for surprise attack in the dark unite to undermine the position of faith. 3 The argument is strengthened by an appeal to general considerations: 'Wherever the foundations of society are undermined, what have good and righteous men ever done to prevent its collapse?' (see RV mg.). Prudence dictates the abandonment of the sinking ship.

4–7 The watching by God

Over against the danger of current events and the apparent ineffectiveness of innocency (v. 2c) and goodness (v. 3b) there is the supreme and vigilant holiness of God. He whose habitation is heaven, and whose authority is enthroned over all, is nevertheless ceaselessly scrutinizing the behaviour of all men (cf. Pss. 33:13–18; 9:49). 4 We watch, as it were, God's face—the eyes which miss nothing, the narrowing of the eyelids as He assesses the character and conduct of men. 5 Then we watch His providential ordering of life whereby the righteous and the wicked alike are tested and proved (cf. Jas. 1:12; 1 Pet. 1:6, 7), for the Lord does nothing without enquiry and examination (cf. Gn. 18:20, 21). He responds in no uncertain manner to what He sees: to the godly He extends His protective presence; 6 upon the wicked, whose deeds are repugnant to Him, He sends the disasters of natural calamity (cf. Gn. 19:24; Ps. 18:7–14).

7 Faced with these two differing aspects of life, the psalmist has no hesitation in adopting the latter and committing himself to the ever-watchful Lord who loves those who seek His righteousness. In utter contrast to unsettled days and the uncertainty of life, the heart that steadfastly trusts the Lord shall have, after being tested, peace in His presence. Cf. 1 Pet. 5:10; Rev. 7:14–17.

PSALM 12. UNTRUTH VERSUS TRUTH

Although this psalm belongs to the large group of laments over the success of evil-doers (e.g. Pss. 7; 10; 17; 25; 37), its theme is more specialized than some. The activity of the wicked is primarily felt by the innocent and godly as being in the realm of speech, i.e. the falsification and perversion of the divine gift of language. Hence the intervention of the Lord must be not only in deeds but in words. The poem sets the effective purity of God's word over against the specious claims of vain lips, and adds yet further testimony to the serious view the Bible takes of sins of speech.

1, 8 The social trend

The first and final verses outline the contemporary corruption of society, with worthless and base men in positions of influence and power, so that wickedness is openly approved and upright men of godly faith are being squeezed out of public life.

2–4 The specious tongue

Communication amongst men is riddled with falsity, flattery, duplicity, and vanity of speech (cf. Jas. 3:5–10). The acme of human pride is when men forge language into such a powerful weapon that deceitful propaganda seems invincible.

5, 6 The sublime truth

Although the vain and vile may disdain the poor man who cries to God, their contempt is as groundless as their pride. The truth is that God is quite aware of the oppression of the faithful and at the right moment He will intervene to bring them security. 6 Silver refined in a furnace. This imagery of a crucible, from which the fully-refined silver is poured down into moulds set in the earth, is an apt illustration of the purity, value and applicability to worldly needs of the divine word, swiftly revealed and lastingly preserved. Elsewhere in the OT the process of refining is almost always applied to the children of God, who are purged in the furnace of affliction. Cf. Ezk. 22:17–22; Mal. 3:3.

7 The sure trust

The word of God which has been acclaimed so fervently (v. 6) is now appropriated by the trusting heart. Because God is kind (v. 5) and His word true, He can be fully relied upon to safeguard the godly even when on every side around him, and exalted over him, he can see nothing but the wicked and their vileness.

PSALM 13. DESPONDENCY CHANGED TO CONFIDENCE

Continuing the lament for the degeneration of society, Ps. 13 is a personal and poignant cry. Its initial mood is one of tedious frustration and strained patience; but the very act of appealing to God stimulates the psalmist's hope so that the final mood is one of joyous appreciation of God's work and purpose in his life. Prayer is not only the proper reaction of the godly to trouble, it is also his medicine against depression in the face of it.

1, 2 A need

The words How long . . . for ever? are a question wherein hope and despair pursue each other in closed circle (cf. Pss. 74:10; 79:5). The four aspects of sorrow are: a sense of being forsaken by a God who has forgotten him; the hopelessness of one who cannot get through to a God who continually hides Himself away; ceaseless inner hurt and grief; and defeat at the hands of vaunting foes. These are not unconnected experiences, for to be out of touch with God brings the personality to the point of breakdown and leaves us at the mercy of foes, human and spiritual. We may note at once that in the course of the psalm the psalmist found relief of his essential need in experiencing again joy and satisfaction in God.

3, 4 An appeal

Despairing need gives way to prayer in which each necessity in turn is laid before God. Even when God appears to have forsaken him, the psalmist's faith holds firm. Believing intercession is the antidote to overwhelming grief and defeat. 3a First, in respect of the averted face of God, he pleads Consider (lit. 'look') and answer, and the depth of his faith is revealed in his continuing grasp of the personal relationship expressed in the words my God. 3b Second, he reveals the nature of his confessed inner grief, the fear lest he should die uncomforted by any sense of God's favour. 4 Third, he prays against continuing humiliation before his foes.

5, 6 An assurance

To envisage that from which his soul is utterly averse is to rebound by faith into the experience of satisfaction. The sober reflections and strong appeals of vv. 1–4 give place to the fundamental attitude and disposition of his heart. But I; i.e. 'as for me, I do trust in Thee'. My heart shall rejoice . . . I will sing. His despondency is changed to confidence as his faith lays hold on four characteristics of the Lord: His steadfast love, His delivering intervention, His readiness to give that which truly delights men, and His abounding goodness to the very man who had been restless. This irrepressible hope, always clarified and crystallized by prayer, is one of the constant features of the Psalter (cf. also 1 Cor. 15:19; Heb. 6:18, 19).

PSALM 14. OUTLINE OF A CORRUPT SOCIETY

This description of degenerate and unrighteous men primarily refers to humanity as a whole and not merely to a period of extreme moral decay in Israel. This is endorsed by the use of the first three verses in Rom. 3:10–12. The psalm was rewritten in later years and reappears as Ps. 53. The poem adopts alternately the viewpoint of earth and heaven.

1 The iniquity of men

Fool, or 'vile person' (1 Sa. 25:25); i.e. a man wholly indifferent to the moral standards of the law, and who daily adopts as his own principle the belief that deity cares nothing about the differences between men's behaviour. Out of this practical atheism proceeds an evil influence upon men, for they are corrupt, or 'spread corruption', a life abhorrent to God—the constant meaning of abominable—and a total absence of moral worth.

2–4 God's inquiry and verdict

The question of ultimate standards of moral conduct is ceaselessly raised by the Lord. 2 He is meticulously concerned about men's deeds, and notes any who act wisely; i.e. any man who governs his life according to divine wisdom. 3 The diagnosis given here cannot be supplied by the godless man, for he has repudiated objective goodness, righteousness and truth. Indeed this is the first characteristic of such men; everyone has gone astray from right living and become tainted in his nature (cf. Jb. 15:16). Hence, without exception, all are workers of evil; there is none that does good. 4a might be rendered 'Shall the workers of iniquity not know?'; i.e. these things will not remain hidden from those who pillage God's people as casually as they eat bread. Doubtless the standard example is Ex. 5:10–19.

5, 6 Fear comes upon the wicked

The psalmist pictures himself watching as the evil-doers come to the place and moment of truth envisaged in v. 4, as, e.g., the formerly enslaved Israel watched the Egyptians fight in vain against the Red Sea (Ex. 14:24, 25). Yet always God is with the righteous and the cloudy-fiery pillar at the Red Sea indicates what this divine presence can mean (Ex. 14:19, 20). 6 Furthermore, no machinations or counter-attacks of the wicked can deprive the poor, here meaning those who are downtrodden by the world, from finding refuge in the Lord.

7 A prayer for divine blessing

It is all very well, however, to recall thrilling experiences of the past, but what about now? The psalmist faces the present by looking to God to restore the fortunes of his people.

PSALM 15. THE QUALIFICATION FOR FELLOWSHIP WITH GOD

This brief poem sets out the ideals which the psalmist believed God would expect in His guests. The blameless character is assessed by personal and social conduct only; i.e. the standard is purely ethical. A description in similar terms is found in Ps. 24:3–5 and in Is. 33:14b–16.

1, 5b The theme set

These verses set the theme of the poem, viz. the godly man's highest aspiration. 1 On the one hand it is to have freedom of access to the presence of God—typified by His tent (the traditional emblem of His presence amid the exigencies of life's pilgrimage), and by His holy hill or Mt. Zion (the historical symbol of His effective rule amid the vicissitudes of national policies). 5b On the other hand, it is to have security and also steadiness or consistency of character and conduct, whatever the circumstances, so that, as a righteous man, he shall never be moved, i.e. he will enjoy safety and display stability.

2, 3 Personal conduct

2 On the positive side he is blameless in manner of life (cf. Gn. 6:9; 17:1), actively upholding right dealing in all transactions, wholly free from duplicity because his heart is set upon truth. 3 Negatively he is one who does not slander, i.e. go about as a tell-tale, unkind and discourteous in speech. He is careful to avoid mere gossip (cf. 1 Tim. 5:13), never taking advantage of a fellow-man, careful not to distress his friends by foolish and tactless talk about things they have done and since regretted.

4, 5a Social conduct

4 Again the positive traits in the ideal character are first given. In that there are two paths in life, he is careful to estimate people by their moral standards rather than by other factors. He discounts a reprobate, a man who, for whatever reason, merits being despised, and respects any man who honours and fears the Lord. The negative side is next stressed. Should he have undertaken a duty, or sworn a bond, which later proves to be irksome and costly, he does not evade his responsibility, for the spoken word of a vow is a sacred thing (cf. Jos. 9:19); 5a in relation to material wealth, he rejects the typically grasping practices of usury (cf. Lv. 25:36, 37; Pr. 28:8). Open-handed generosity is more the mark of the children of God (cf. Mt. 10:8). He will have nothing to do with the corruption of justice by bribes, least of all if the inducement seems to injure an innocent party.

PSALM 16. THE WAY OF FAITH

The psalm is ascribed to David (cf. Acts 2:25; 13:35, 36), and contains a number of expressions which would suit well the period of David's life when he was an outlaw. It falls into three divisions.

1–4 The marks of the believer

These are four in number: 1 God is the object of his trust in the sense that he takes refuge in Him; 2 to him Yahweh is his sovereign Lord and utterly sufficient, so that apart from Him he desires no good thing; 3 he acknowledges the worth and delights in the fellowship of the saints (lit. the 'holy ones'), the people set apart for God's possession and in whom His holy character is seen (cf. 2 Thes. 1:10); 4 he shuns all false worship (cf. Jos. 23:7; 1 Jn. 5:21).

5–8 The present blessings of the believer

These are a satisfied heart (vv. 5, 6); counsel and correction (v. 7); and security (v. 8). 5 The literal rendering is 'Yahweh is the portion of my share and of my cup'. The mention of cup suggests that the first word refers to a portion of food. The meaning then becomes 'Yahweh is all that I need to satisfy hunger and thirst'. My lot could be an abbreviation for 'the land that has become mine by casting lots' (cf. Nu. 26:56), but equally a different thought could be introduced: 'You are in control of my destiny.' In this case, v. 5 teaches the sufficiency of the Lord for present (5a) and future (5b) alike. 6 The lines; i.e. the portion of land measured out to him by line. Cf. Ps. 78:55; Am. 7:17. 7 My heart (lit. 'kidneys'; used figuratively of the seat of the emotions and the conscience; cf. Ps. 73:21, 22), which in the night watches kept with God instructs him, involving both correction and direction. 8 presents a beautiful picture of the psalmist hidden behind God, who stands between him and his foe, yet also as a friend at his right hand.

9–11 The prospects of the believer

These are preservation from death (vv. 9, 10); the path of life made known to him (v. 11a); joy in God's presence (v. 11b). David is thinking of his future prospects in this world; but his words shine with deeper meaning. 9 The glandess is explained by the fact 10 that the Lord will not (lit.) 'abandon my soul for Sheol to possess', which signifies that dreaded death under divine wrath and rejection (see on Ps. 6:5). 11 By contrast to this, the path of life is revealed, and in context this is most naturally seen as the 'path which leads to life' and terminates in thy presence in fullness of joy. This was true for David as for every other believer before and since, because in its deepest and fullest sense it is true of Christ (Acts 2:25–28; 13:35).

PSALM 17. A RIGHTEOUS MAN'S PRAYER FOR VINDICATION

Three psalms are entitled 'A Prayer of David' (17; 86 and 142), but this is the most spontaneous of them. It may well express his fervent cry in the desperate situation at Maon (1 Sa. 23:26), especially as David was very confident of his integrity at that time (1 Sa. 24:11). The intensity and urgency of his prayer is conveyed not only in the general impression of anxiety but also in the three facets of his appeal.

1–5 His desire to be heard

1, 2 Such words as hear, attend, give ear, let thy eyes see give shape and force both to the shrill cry (Heb. rinna, a loud cry) from his heart, and to the strong conviction of his own righteousness. These are thrown into greater prominence, first by an implicit comparison with the prayer of lips . . . of deceit, and secondly by his clear sense of innocence, shown in his willingness to be scrutinized by thy eyes which see the right of the matter.

3–5 This second element in his appeal, viz. his integrity, is more fully stated. This conviction is supported and asserted first by reference to God's testing of his inmost soul as though by an exhaustive examination, yet without disclosing anything false. Secondly, he declares that in his dealings with men he has always watched and carefully heeded the word of the Lord (cf. Ps. 119:11), in consequence of which he has never strayed from nor stumbled in the path indicated by God.

6–12 His prayer for protection

The note of passionate appeal is reintroduced in such words as I call, thou wilt answer me, incline, hear, show, and there is again an indirect allusion to his opponents (v. 7c). The new note, as compared with the peremptoriness of vv. 1, 2, is that of worship and trust. 7 Note the phrase Wondrously show thy steadfast love, where the adverb points to God's supernatural power and the adjective and noun point to His unchanging grace, and the concept of God as a refuge for the trusting heart. The object of his prayer, i.e. his need of protection from his attackers, is specified more exactly in vv. 8–12. 8 First there is his own desire to be tenderly cared for, as though he were immensely precious to God, who would as instinctively and immediately protect him as a man reacts to any threat to the apple (pupil) of the eye, or as lovingly welcome and hide him as a mother-bird spreads her feathers over her chick (cf. Dt. 32:10, 11). 9 This desire is quickened in him because he is surrounded by deadly enemies, i.e. men whose aim is his death.

Then his enemies' character is portrayed in various aspects. 10 They close their hearts to pity and utter threats, confident of their power. 11

And, because they have surrounded David and his friends, they already see the psalmist's company cast to the ground as captives. 12 One (or each) of the attacking men is like an enraged lion (cf. Ps. 7:2; 1 Pet. 5:8), and the thought of his stealthy power introduces the final phase of the prayer.

13–15 His plea to be vindicated

This abrupt and repeated call to God is the natural reaction to the analogy of a lurking lion ready to spring upon him at any moment. 13 The psalmist calls upon his protector to intervene and to confront his enemy, so making him to cower down. Nothing but a decisive act of God, coming as an armed man with sword and 14 mighty power (hand) will suffice for this emergency.

The contrast is now developed between the essential characters of the wicked and the godly. The psalmist's foes are men . . . of the world; i.e. men whose sphere of activity and range of thought are wholly in the physical realm (cf. 1 Jn. 2:15–17). The grim but yet spiritual realism of the Psalter appears at this point. The psalmist recognizes first that he cannot pray against his foes without calling into operation that law of divine providence which punishes the wicked by satiating their wicked desires, and beyond that there is the fact of heredity, as expressed in Ex. 20:5. This is realistic praying, and it is found in the Word of God in order to warn us to look at the implications of what we pray for, and to be sure that in all our prayers our conscience is as clear as that of the psalmist, and our ambitions as holy. 15 His ambition is not to own earthly wealth, but to enjoy unbroken fellowship with God. His supreme desire is to experience the form of God (cf. Nu. 12:8). This, of course, includes the notion of an unclouded vision of God when the cloud of enmity is past, but the context suggests that the psalmist is contrasting himself with those (v. 14) who have no hope beyond this world. He speaks of awaking to the eternal vision of God (cf. Is. 26:19; Dn. 12:2; Phil. 3:21; 1 Jn. 3:2; Rev. 22:4).

PSALM 18. DAVID'S VICTORY SONG

This appears to be a version of 2 Sa. 22, slightly revised to make it suitable for general use. The title indicates the circumstances of this jubilant thanksgiving. His deliverance from all his enemies (see title) would suggest the period after 2 Sa. 8, when his life was crowned by almost unbroken successes. The words the servant of the Lord in the title are not found in 2 Sa. 22. The phrase is a highly honourable one and, apart from two references to Joshua, it is almost always applied to Moses, or used prophetically of the Messiah.

1–3 Introduction

1 The forceful and unusual first word is very striking: rāḥam means to love very tenderly, as with a mother's love. 2 God is called a rock both by the precedent of Moses (Dt. 32:4, 18, 30, 31, 37), the history of Israel (Ex. 17), and David's own experience (1 Sa. 23:25, 28). The seven graphic titles ascribed to God in this verse are all expressive of impregnability and reflect the dominance of this thought during the years when he was hunted by Saul.

4–19 Dire peril and divine deliverance

4, 5 His feelings at this time are likened to those of a drowning man swirled round in strong floodwaters, or of a wild beast in a net. 6 There was none who could help except the Lord, so to Him David cried out in his distress. The verb is in the present tense, as if the event was still vividly before him. 7–15 God came to his aid. The divine coming is described in the most vigorous and awesome manner; the spiritual fact is translated into a disturbance of nature so profound that it might almost seem as though creation was being undone. The divine advent is seen as associated with smoke and blackness and the voice of words, as when the law was given at Sinai. It is also marked by brilliant radiance and lightning as in the swift illumination of the revelation of grace (cf. Heb. 12:18–24). Note that there is no similitude of God Himself in all this tumult (cf. Dt. 4:11, 12). The contrast of God as intangible and yet mighty, as inscrutable yet inescapable, lies behind the imagery, and yet the parallelism with the imagery of Sinai (Ex. 19) calls to mind that the God who came to save David did so by virtue of His long-ago revealed character as the Saviour of His people (Ex. 6:6, 7). The imagery is terror-striking, but the revelation is of saving grace.

16–19 This act of God was intensely personal, and in this account of the psalmist's deliverance the background of the natural world fades away. Even his powerful foes are mentioned only indirectly, for the experience was so intimately his own. Hence the repetition of He . . . me . . . and the culminating marvel that the Lord delivered him out of all his troubles because he delighted in me. 16 There is a suggestive parallel here with the rescue of the child Moses from forces which threatened to crush him. The verb drew out is found only here and in Ex. 2:10. The whole passage has many parallels also with the divine intervention described in the book of Job (cf. Jb. 36:29 – 38:1).

20–27 The ground of God's intervention

This section is an expansion of the thought that God delights in the psalmist. There are two aspects: David's character and work (vv. 20–23) and God's way (vv. 24–27). The intervention of God on his behalf is the reward of his godly living. This protective care is not claimed as of right, but the fact of it is asserted in the simplicity of a heart that feels unembarrassed even in the searching holiness of the court of heaven. David's righteousness is not limited to his relations with Saul; it has been upheld in every phase of his life which he claims to be upright, honourable, merciful, single-hearted and pure. 23 I kept myself from guilt (lit. 'my iniquity'); i.e. 'I have been so careful to be a man of God that I have not done anything which could be called "my iniquity", i.e. something which had become, as it were, a part of me' (cf. 1 Ki. 14:8; Acts 23:1). The principle underlying this section is that God reinforces the character which men choose to acquire, behaving toward them as they behave to Him (cf. 1 Sa. 2:30; Rom. 1:28).

28–45 The high calling of God

David's two declarations of personal righteousness, and of the divine principle whereby God deals with men in accordance with their character, are plainly endorsed by the preceding account of his deliverance. That is only one instance; but they can be supported also by the whole course of David's life. The psalm now deals with these larger aspects of David's life.

28, 29 The dynamic of David's life is the Lord my God, whose indwelling light and vigour both maintain the burning glow of personal existence and give incentive and power whereby difficulties are overcome. Cf. 1 Sa. 30:8, where the word 'band' is in Hebrew the same as troop here. Leap over a wall. A reference, perhaps, to the incident of 2 Sa. 5:6–10. 30, 31 God is worthy of all honour and adoration, not merely because of the blessings He bestows but because of His essential qualities—absolutely true in all He says and perfect in all He does. Therefore He cannot protect those who are antagonistic to Him, but to those who trust Him, He is utterly trustworthy. Beside Him there is none other (cf. Is. 45:5, 6). 32–36 David has been carefully trained by God. This preparation has been physical; health, strength and agility have been provided to bring David's way to completion. It has also been instructional—skill in the use of warlike methods and arms had been gained—and moral: the Lord had freely given His own equipment for resistance, His sustenance in danger, and His gentleness (v. 35 mg.); i.e. His understanding patience or, more literally, meekness, during all the long years since He so graciously raised a shepherd lad to a throne of power (cf. Ps. 23:5, 6). 37, 38 David eagerly accepts the purpose of this training. In fullest confidence that God has efficiently and adequately prepared him for this task, he undertakes the subjugation of his foes. 39 It is God who works in him. The conquest of his foes is really the Lord's doing. 40 God had made his enemies turn their backs in retreat; thereupon he cut them off. 41, 42 It was inevitable therefore that any prayer by such rebellious foes would be unheeded by God; consequently David was able to crush their opposition.

43–45 The climax of his supremacy is now described. Not only had all civil insurrection been put down (cf. 2 Sa. 3:1), but God had made David the head of many nations (cf. 2 Sa. 8); and even those peoples with whom there had been no previous contact would acknowledge his sovereignty as soon as they heard of him. There is some historical support for this in 2 Sa. 10:18, 19, but there is also a prophetical aspect. Cf. Is. 52:15 and Ps. 2:8.

46–50 Conclusion

The pre-eminent inference from these reflections is the living reality of God to whom David is inexpressibly grateful. 47 The phrase gave me vengeance implies no vindictiveness; it is a declaration that God and not man had vindicated the rightness of a cause. 49 The psalm concludes with a promise by David that he will utilize his dominion over many peoples to spread abroad the praise of his God, a concept which Paul adjusts to the reign of David's Lord (Rom. 15:9), in whom salvation and loving-kindness are fully exhibited. 50 Finally, David names himself in connection with the permanent alliance with God which was ultimately fulfilled in the eternal kingdom of the Son of David. Cf. 2 Sa. 7:12–16; Lk. 1:32, 33.

PSALM 19. THE TWO WITNESSES TO GOD

Apart from the concluding prayer, the psalm obviously falls into two parts, vv. 1–6 and 7–13. Each part deals with a source from which man may acquire knowledge of God, first by inference from the visible cosmos, and secondly by instruction through the Torah, or law. These are respectively the material and the moral realms. Without the physical light of the sun and the spiritual light of the divine commandments, all life would fail.

1–6 The physical glory of the universe

1–4a The glory of the firmament. The wonder of the sky is a constant stimulus to praise in the book of Psalms (cf. 29; 93; 104). The emphasis here is upon objective testimony rather than subjective interpretations. 1 The heavens ceaselessly declare the glory of God; the firmament, or extended expanse of the sky, reveals Him by being His workmanship; 2 each day speaks to the following day, and each night makes Him known. 3, 4 While they themselves are silent and inarticulate, their testimony is heard everywhere. Cf. Rom. 1:19, 20.

4b–6 The special glory of the sun. Far from worshipping the sun, the psalmist regards it as an agent of God who has set up a tent in the vast heavens for the sun's continual use. Certainly the wide range of the sun's light and heat is a reflection of God's universal power and knowledge. This thought leads to a meditation upon the inward light afforded by the law, or Torah.

7–13 The perfect glory of the Torah

7–10 The moral effect of the law. Whereas the visible creation bears witness to God's everlasting power and divinity, the revelation of Himself is given to the children of Israel in the Torah. This distinction is observed in the replacement of God (vv. 1–6) by the Lord (i.e. Yahweh) (vv. 7–14). Six aspects of the inward work of the Lord are described. 7 The Torah is perfect, or inerrant (cf. Jas. 1:25), bringing strength and comfort to men. The testimony, i.e. the word which testifies to God's character and will (pre-eminently the Decalogue), transforms the simple, i.e. the open-minded person who is otherwise liable to be swayed by whoever happens to be speaking (cf. 2 Tim. 3:15). 8 The precepts of the Lord are definite rules, the keeping of which gives a clear conscience. The commandment is a divine imperative which shines as a guiding light to men who seek the way of life (cf. Acts 26:18; Heb. 11:13). 9 The fear of the Lord, which it is the law's aim to inculcate, brings freedom from debasing practices (cf. Ps. 106:35–40). His ordinances governing social life and practice are absolutely true and righteous. 10 All these qualities make the inward revelations of the Lord more desirable than wealth and more pleasurable than honey. The whole passage is elaborately extended in Ps. 119.

11–13 The personal desire for a life free from sin. Just as the first part of the poem focused thought upon the sun, so the second half concentrates on a man's life. Meditation upon the revealed will of Yahweh turns into prayer for absolute cleansing from hidden defects in character and conduct. The law is esteemed as a major factor in living a true life, but it holds no guarantee of purity outside personal conviction. What of inadvertent and unwitting acts of sin and error? 'The Lord Himself must thoroughly cleanse my life and also prevent me from proud and impulsive sins which swiftly become habitual and turn me into an enemy of God.' This attitude of mind is labelled great transgression (cf. 1 Jn. 3:19–21).

14 Concluding prayer

This last verse echoes the dual themes of the poem: the outward word and inward meditation of the psalmist, and the objective reality and manward activity of the Lord.

PSALM 20. PRAYER FOR THE KING BEFORE BATTLE

This and the following psalm form a pair, describing the people's intercession and thanksgiving before and after a battle in which they were led by the king. Weiser (see Introduction) finds difficulty in accepting this and suggests that here we have an example of a psalm used in celebrating or commemorating the king's coronation, and seeking his prosperity during the coming year. The use of the personal pronouns, 'you', 'I', and 'we', indicate the three sections in the psalm.

1–5 Intercession by the people

It is uncertain whether the scene of the prayer is the sanctuary in Zion or the vicinity of the battlefield. 1 God's name means 'all that God has revealed about His character'. The prayer is for that fullness of protection which God's revealed nature would lead us to expect. The primary emphasis of this section is on the initial word, the Lord: He is requested to answer, protect, send . . . help, give . . . support, remember, regard. The Lord grant . . . and fulfil all the king's plans, so that his people may shout for joy and wave their banners in triumph. But the triumph will be the Lord's. All the victories of God's people are from Him and arise out of His gracious acceptance of a perfect sacrifice. 3 Regard with favour your burnt sacrifices suggests an actual service before the altar (cf. 1 Sa. 7:9); but the comprehensive all your offerings, 4 all your plans, 5 all your petitions may indicate a retrospective view inclusive of all previous acts of worship.

6 Assurance for the king

It is not clear whether the king, or possibly a prophet present at the liturgy (cf. 2 Ch. 20:14ff.), is speaking; in either case the note of confidence is intended for the Lord's anointed one, whom the Lord will answer from heaven by mighty acts of salvation.

7–9 Final confession, anticipation and prayer of the people

7 The allusion to enemies who trust in speedier and more powerful armies is timeless. A general principle is being enunciated, not a reference to any specific foes. The power of and appeal to the name of the Lord is vividly illustrated in 1 Sa. 17:45. 8 This trustful committal of their cause to the Lord fills them with such expectation of success as to warrant the use of the perfect tense, as though the conflict were over, but 9 the reality and tension of the moment leads the assembled warriors to plead for victory. In the Bible assurance never breeds complacency, but rather offers ground for urgent prayer and calling upon God to save.

PSALM 21. THANKSGIVING FOR THE KING AFTER BATTLE

The connection with the previous psalm is neatly summarized by comparing 20:4 with 21:2. But the difficulty of associating them as prayer before and thanksgiving after battle appears in that the defeat still seems to be future (21:8ff.). Weiser, who notes this problem, again associates the psalm with some royal festival: 'a fragment of the ritual of the coronation of the king'. This would provide a positive foundation for the element of Messianic expectation rightly found here, for the Davidic kingship was consciously acknowledged from early times as a figure of the true.

1–7 An acknowledgment of the Lord's goodness to the king

The main thought of exuberant praise is focused upon the present moment. 3 A crown of fine gold. There may be an echo here of the Ammonite crown (cf. 1 Ch. 20:2), but there is also the actual Davidic crown bestowed by divine favour, and all its prophetic overtones. 5 Divine glory . . . splendour and majesty are bestowed upon him (cf. Ps. 8:5) and 6 he is made to be blessed and to be a blessing for ever as he rejoices exceedingly in the presence of the Lord. These Messianic ideas are often incorporated in the NT (e.g. Heb. 1:8, 9; 2:9; Rev. 5:12–14). 7 Finally the reason why the king has been so divinely blessed is his attitude of trust in the Lord. The title Most High belongs to Melchizedek's God (Gn. 14:18) whom Abram identified with Yahweh (Gn. 14:22). The special worship of Yahweh as 'God Most High', widely evidenced in the Psalms (e.g. 9:2; 46:4; 47:2; 92:1), was probably popularized by David's capture of Jerusalem, Melchizedek's city, and may have become expressive of that aspect of the divine nature most closely associated with the function of the royal-priest. As a title it signifies supreme dignity, unhampered power and universal sway.

8–13 The king's power extolled

The change of theme is marked by the alteration from 'thou' (the Lord) and 'he' (the king) of the previous verses to 'you' (the king) and 'the Lord' in this section. This is a forceful address to the king by his subjects who exalt his supremacy over all enemies. 9 The destruction of enemies by the majesty of the king's presence is a Messianic idea (cf. Mal. 3:1, 2; Mt. 21:40, 41; 2 Thes. 1:7–9).

13 The last verse is spoken by king and people to the Lord. They pray for the continued expression of the divine power and glory. So shall their boundless praise be sustained.

PSALM 22. SALVATION IN EXTREMITY

To Christians this psalm is inseparably associated with the crucifixion, not only because the opening words were quoted by the Lord, but because the first part of the poem seems to describe His bodily condition and emotional experience. Yet the first meaning of the poem must be sought in the days of its composition, although the Spirit of God undoubtedly constrained the psalmist so to frame his expression that it acquired a significance beyond the range of his own life (see Acts 2:30, 31a). What that experience was cannot be precisely stated: it could well be founded on some dark period of David's ever-painful and sometimes despairing outlaw days; to some it is the voice of the Davidic king speaking in the annual royal liturgy, sensing his helplessness in the face of surrounding foes, his utter dependence on God, and in the end rejoicing in confident assurance of divine aid. Either way, its prophetic Messianism is well founded.

1–21 Suffering and prayer

1–11 Despair and two appeals to precedent. 1, 2 The poignant words indicate the perplexity of spirit which has been induced by the severe affliction and the apparent heedlessness of his God. He still trusts in God, but finds intolerable the suspense of waiting for evidence that God has not turned from him. Three comfortless thoughts possess his mind: his suffering (groaning . . . cry . . . no rest), his ceaseless supplication (words . . . by day . . . by night), and the utter silence of God (forsaken . . . far . . . not answer). The order of the thoughts in the psalm indicates that the last is uppermost in his mind. Here is the problem of 'the silence of God'. 3–5 In the absence of any response from God the sufferer is cast back upon his former beliefs, foremost among them being the concept of God as just and righteous. This belief is strengthened by the long precedent of Israel's praises for deliverance in earlier years. God had not failed to help those who trusted Him in previous generations. 6–8 Why should the speaker be an exception and his trustfulness be turned into a reproach? As soon as his thought touches upon himself he becomes engrossed with his affliction. He is despised as a worm, not recognized as one with human rights, or features (cf. Is. 52:14). For the laughter of ridicule, the lips opened in the language of abuse, and the excited turning of heads in the animated conversation of a crowd, see Lk. 23:35; Mt. 27:39, 43. For the action of trustfulness cf. Ps. 37:5.

9, 10 The thought of dependence upon one who delighted in him reminds the psalmist of the days when, as a baby, he was dependent upon his mother. But the very fact of his birth is sure evidence of divine intervention in human life, and a habit of reliance upon God was implanted in him with his own life and his mother's milk. 11 This section ends with a plea for the realization of God's presence even as He has been nigh in the years since his infancy, because now there is no-one to help and trouble is near (cf. Jb. 3:24–26).

12–21 Intense anguish in the immediate distress. The mood changes here from the humiliation of misunderstood relationships (God does not heed his need, and men do not respect his person) to the pain of a tormented body. In the intensity of this anguish there is no reminiscence comparable with vv. 4 and 9, and the awful loneliness of soul implied in v. 1 is replaced by the unforgettable impression of a multitude of savage faces which enclose him like a ring of snarling dogs. The telling of such an experience is sharpened by a series of graphic metaphors. 12, 13 He likens his tormentors to fierce animals ready to devour him. 14, 15 His physical weakness and complete helplessness are vividly portrayed. 16 Then a note of evaluation enters.

The crowd consists of evildoers, who are dogs, i.e. worthless people (cf. 2 Sa. 16:9). But the personal anguish quickly reasserts its dominance, for the mass of howling beasts have begun to bite and gnaw at his feet and hands; 17 while burning eyes already mark out the portions of his body which teeth will soon devour. 18 Next, the scuffle of attacking beasts is replaced by the allocation of his clothing amongst his enemies. 19–21 Yet is his reliance upon God unblemished by disbelief: indeed, in the uttermost extremity of his soul, the bond with his Lord stands out the clearer in a strong cry for the aid of His presence. 21 The RV should be consulted for another view of this verse (cf. RSV mg.), namely that what begins as a sentence of final appeal ends as a cry of immeasurable relief. God has broken His silence.

The details of Calvary are all so clearly here; mockery (v. 8), shame (vv. 13, 17), the pain of crucifixion (vv. 14–16)—for even if 'pierced' (v. 16) is an uncertain translation (cf. mg.), the agony to hands and feet is specifically mentioned —and the parting of garments (v. 18). All this took place by the agency of those who neither knew the Scriptures nor had any interest in fulfilling them, and provides dramatic and unanswerable evidence of the divine inspiration of the Bible and of the faithfulness of God to His Word.

Furthermore, the incidental revelation of the Lord Jesus Himself should not be overlooked, and in particular of His sinlessness. There is no note of confession in the psalm; the intense suffering does not seem even to raise the possibility of some sin lurking in the background, and throughout the suffering described here the sufferer remains utterly sinless in his relation to God (vv. 1–11, 19–21), to his persecutors (vv. 6, 7, 12, 13, 16–18) and to himself (vv. 6, 10, 14, 15 are notable for the absence of self-pity). Cf. 1 Pet. 2:22–24.

22–31 Assurance and testimony

The remainder of the psalm consists of praise and thanksgiving to God for His faithfulness and glory. The theme is thy name (v. 22), which is simplified in v. 24 to mean the Lord's compassion, honour and gracious attentiveness. But the sphere wherein His praise is to be heard has two parts, one immediate and local, i.e. the congregation or assembly of those who are his brethren by blood and by faith, the other more comprehensive in time and place.

22–26 Praise among his brethren. 22–24 Those descendants of Israel who reverence God are urged to bow before the Lord because of His greatness and magnanimity as disclosed in His actions. 25 Because all his praise is stimulated by God's salvation which has come to him, David invites other humble and godly men to join with him in the votive meal he has vowed to give to his Deliverer (cf. Lv. 7:16), and 26 in the imaginative anticipation of their presence he pronounces a benediction on his guests: May your hearts live for ever!

27–31 Praise by all mankind. The sense of having experienced the reality of God's essential goodwill toward the trustful heart prompts the psalmist to call upon all peoples. 27 He can foresee no other outcome than that the nature of God should be known and revered throughout the earth. 28 Is He not the supreme sovereign? (Cf. Je. 16:19; Zc. 14:9; Rev. 11:15.) 29 Even the proud will partake in His worship (cf. Is. 49:7; Phil. 2:10): indeed every mortal man shall render homage to the immortal Lord (cf. Is. 25:6; Rev. 19:9; 22:17). 30 An endless posterity shall serve Him and the story of His great deed of deliverance shall be the permanent heritage of every generation (cf. Lk. 1:48–50). 31 Each shall come into being and shall declare the Lord's effective righteousness (cf. Is. 59:21).

No experience of suffering and of divine deliverance other than our Lord's experience of the cross and resurrection has had such a universal result. It is, indeed, impossible to imagine that any man of the ancient world, whether David or another, could in fact have seriously considered that his individual experience of God would have world-wide and time-long repercussions. The psalm therefore cries out to be seen as predictive prophecy, and is best satisfied by supposing that David consciously wrote in this hyperbolic fashion, being inspired by God to speak of his greater Son.

PSALM 23. SHEPHERD AND HOST

This poem owes much of its charm to the skilful blending of contrasted imagery which covers the major aspects of human life, viz. outdoors (vv. 1, 2) and indoors (v. 6b); peace (v. 2) and peril (v. 4b); the possibility of evil (v. 4b) and the prospect of good (v. 5); times of invigoration of soul (v. 3a) and times of ominous gloom (v. 4a); the experience of following (vv. 1, 2) and a life of stable security (v. 6b). Nevertheless, all the literary facets of this lyrical gem are focused upon the Lord whose tender care, ceaseless vigilance and perpetual presence impart to life all its colour and satisfaction. Indeed the sevenfold activity of the Lord described in vv. 2–5 (He makes, He leads, He restores, He guides, Thou art with me, Thou preparest a table, Thou anointest my head) is framed within the name of the Lord (the first and final words of the poem).

The dominant concept is that of God as guide and protector through the vicissitudes of life. The suggestive imagery of a shepherd as applied to the Lord goes back to the days of patriarchal pastoralism (cf. Gn. 48:15) and it has been constantly enriched ever since (cf. Ps. 78:52–54; Is. 40:11; Ezk. 34:1–23; Jn. 10:1–18). A second concept is introduced in v. 5—that of the Lord as a host of boundless benevolence. This imagery of man as a surprised guest at a sumptuous feast provided by God is likewise an integral part of the whole biblical panorama from the symbolism of Joseph the provider of food (Gn. 43:34) to the miracle of the feeding of five thousand (Mt. 14:19) and the parables of the great supper (Lk. 14:15–24) and the marriage feast of the Bridegroom (Mt. 22:1–14; Rev. 19:9).

1–4 Pilgrimage

David is completely dependent on the Lord as a sheep on its shepherd. The two aspects are serenity, as of lying down in green pastures and by restful waters, with a suggestion of physical well-being; and safety, as of a protected journey along right paths, with a suggestion of personal calm and mental ease because anxiety is impossible when His strong care is evident. The theme is weighted in the direction of innocent carefreeness, and a bond with the shepherd of inexplicable affection.

Life's two great problems, the one largely unrecognized, the other all too pressing, are contained in these verses. 1–3a The first is the problem of pleasure, for it should never be far from the believing mind to query: How can a holy God deal so lovingly with a sinner like me? 4 The second is the problem of suffering, the question raised by the onset of life's adversities. 3b takes the solution as far as the Bible permits us to go. Life is directed by the Shepherd along paths of righteousness, paths which are right in His eyes, and all He does is suitable to His name, i.e. utterly in harmony with His revealed nature.

5, 6 Hospitality

These verses stress David's careful discernment of the Lord's munificence as the perfect host. The two aspects are fullness—the provision for his needs and enjoyment is complete in every sense, it is unhampered by any human antagonists; and finality—the rich relationship with the Lord is unlimited, and the privilege is fully personal. Contrast the use of thou with the use of he in the earlier part.

PSALM 24. AN ANTHEM FOR THE INVESTITURE OF JERUSALEM

The great occasion in David's life when he brought the ark of the Lord from the house of Obed-edom to the recently captured city of the Jebusites was joyfully celebrated by several chants and psalms (2 Sa. 6; 1 Ch. 15:16–23). This psalm may well have been composed for this occasion, or possibly for one of its anniversaries. The psalm was greater than the occasion, and has generally been interpreted as prophetic of Christ's ascension after victory over death and sin (see v. 8 and cf. Col. 2:15; Heb. 2:14, 15) and of His ultimate sovereignty over all (see v. 10 and cf. Rev. 5:11–14; 17:14).

1–6 Approaching the hill of Yahweh

This processional hymn has two themes. 1, 2 The first is the divine sovereignty over the material (v. 1a) and human (v. 1b) world, a sovereignty arising from His position as Creator (v. 2). If David had been pondering the vicissitudes by which both the ark of God and he himself had been brought to this day (1 Sa. 5; 6; 30:1–6; etc.) he would well have marvelled at a sovereign providence.

3–6 The second theme is the righteousness required of men if they are to be blessed of God. Imperceptibly the theme of the divine sovereignty has given way to that of divine holiness. Possibly he recalled 1 Sa. 6:20; certainly the events of 2 Sa. 6:6, 7 would be fresh in his mind. How can a man have that holiness without which none can see God (Heb. 12:14)? 4 A comprehensive holiness of hands (outward) and heart (inward), an unblemished loyalty towards God and towards men (cf. Ps. 15:4). 5 offers the explanation of a life acceptable to God: only then may a man stand before Him, when He has bestowed a blessing in terms of 'righteousness' (as vindication should be translated; cf. AV, RV). David discovered that through the offering of sacrifices (2 Sa. 6:13) he could stand with safety, and even with joy (2 Sa. 6:14), before the holy God of the ark. This doctrine of imputed righteousness came to its fullness in the sacrifice of the Lord Jesus and our standing before God through Him (e.g. Phil. 3:9). Such a blessing can come only from the God of his salvation. But how may this blessing be ours? 6 replies that it belongs to those who seek him who is Jacob's God, the God who transforms the twister into the prince (Gn. 32:28). The word generation is of disputed meaning, but probably signifies a company of people with a common characteristic, in this case of having received the greatest blessing, as did Jacob, by asking for it.

7–10 Entering the gateway of Zion

The procession is halted awhile before the city's closed gates and the demand for entrance, i.e. submission, is formally made in the name of the King of glory. 7, 9 The command to lift up, or extend, the gates and archways implies, as Weiser says, that 'doors built by the hands of men are not adequate to admit the mighty God'. 8 In reply to the ceremonial challenge of the sentries the name of the incoming king (cf. 2 Sa. 6:2b) is declared to be the Lord, mighty in battle. David had recently captured the Jebusite stronghold and won many other battles. This designation alone was insufficient to warrant the opening of the gates, and 9 the call to provide access to the city is repeated. 10 The Lord's presence and pre-eminence in Zion is based on grounds other than His intervention in Israel's historic battles. The Lord is king of all in His own right, possessing powers and qualities which transcend earth and time. The King of glory is the Lord of hosts (cf. 1 Ki. 22:19), the Lord who possesses every potentiality and power, and who alone has the right to be called Yahweh, the Omnipotent.

PSALM 25. A PERSONAL PRAYER

This is another acrostic psalm. It expresses the alternation of fervent petition and sober meditation which often characterizes the soul's waiting upon the Lord. There are three main moods in the prayer, but they are closely bound together.

1–7 A plea for guidance

This is a prayer in itself, but its themes are dealt with more fully in the following verses; e.g. with the prayer for vindication from his enemies (vv. 2, 3), cf. vv. 19–21; with the expression of his need for instruction and guidance by the Lord (vv. 4, 5), cf. vv. 8–10 and 12; his penitence (vv. 6, 7) is brought out again in v. 11; and his avowal of trust in God (v. 1) is repeated in v. 15.

The situation is a familiar one in the Psalms. 1, 2 Trouble, in the shape of treacherous enemies, urges the psalmist to trustful prayer. We see again into the mind of these men of old: prayer was their sole weapon against the foes, to whom they neither answered back nor acted vengefully. His prayer is, first, heartfelt: this is expressed by the word lift up my soul, for the soul is the centre of the whole being, and here he raises it above earthly interests so that it may focus upon God alone; secondly, trustful, and thirdly, 3 expectant, as he associates himself with those who wait for thee, a phrase which is full of expectancy of divine action.

4, 5 Faith, however, if it does not display obedience, is false to itself and to its object. Consequently there follows the plea for guidance in all the truth of God on the ground of a sincere and a full allegiance to Him (cf. Ex. 33:13; Ps. 86:11; Jn. 14:15). But, as ever, obedience, while it shows the reality of faith, does not in itself purchase the goodwill of God. 6, 7 Therefore, having given this pledge of the reality of the faith from which his prayer proceeds, the psalmist now turns to expose the ground on which faith rests, the mercy, love, forgiveness and goodness of God.

8–15 The goodness of the Lord

8 In a common manner of OT meditation, the final thought of one passage is made the theme of the following section. The goodness of God (cf. v. 7) is reiterated here, and a conclusion drawn from it. Because He is absolutely good and true, therefore He is sure to offer help to sinful men uncertain of the right way of life. This conclusion is not, of course, logical. In fact it is contrary to logic that a God who is upright, 'straight' in all His ways, should have any contact with sinners. That He does so illuminates the gracious, forbearing quality of His perfect nature. Behind the word sinners lies the idea of 'going astray' or 'missing the road', and 9 they are further defined as humble, the word being repeated so as to emphasize what sort of sinners may expect divine aid: those who are 'lowly' before Him, and 10 who are committed to a life of obedience. 11–15 This intimacy of the Lord with sinners is developed and successively the promises are made of forgiveness, guidance, security, friendship and deliverance, arising respectively from an attitude of confession, reverence and reliance.

16–22 A prayer for deliverance

The metaphor of being trapped in a net has reminded the psalmist of his present predicament, and this evokes a passionate supplication for deliverance. 16–18 He is particularly oppressed, for his troubles have isolated him from all friends and his heart is swamped with anxieties, so he cries for deliverance, attentive care and forgiveness. 19–21 Nor are these fears and troubles subjective; his enemies are as implacable and violent as they are numerous, hence the appeal for protection and vindication.

22 Redeem Israel, O God. Just as in vv. 1–3 the personal petition broadened to include all in the same situation, so here the private grief takes into its purview the national grief. True prayer can never be selfish or exclusive. The whole church is the responsibility of the individual member.

PSALM 26. THE WAY OF THE WORSHIPPER

This psalm expresses the uneasiness of any devout soul when immersed in a godless society. J. H. Eaton (Torch Commentary, 1967) suggests that parallels with such 'royal' psalms as 18 (esp. vv. 20f.); 28; 101 suggest that the speaker here is the Davidic king, hard pressed by some national crisis.

1, 2 His approach to God

The outspoken request for the Lord to vindicate, prove, try and test him implies a tension which is expressed in the contrasts of the following verses. He does not claim a sinless life but asserts a sincere and consistent endeavour to walk uprightly (cf. Ps. 139:23, 24).

3–10 His determination to avoid wicked men

3–5 He describes, on the one hand, the truth and loving-kindness of the Lord and, on the other, the vanity, duplicity and wickedness of certain men. The former he cherishes, the latter he shuns and hates. 3 suggests a deliberate modelling of human life upon the character of God (cf. 1 Jn. 4:11).

6–8 His own choice is now described. He will take his place among those who surround God's altar, and in preparation for the act of dedication he will cleanse himself from defilement (cf. Ps. 73:13; Ex. 30:17–21). The metaphor of walking (v. 3) is replaced by the more intimate one of entering the house of the Lord. His declaration that he will avoid ungodly men (v. 4) is changed into a song of grateful testimony. The hatred of evil gatherings (v. 5) is replaced by the love of the dwelling-place where he meets the glory of God.

9, 10 He brings his spiritual ambitions to the bar of divine judgment. The prayer is very compressed, but implies: 'Grant me such godly separation from sinners (going astray from God), from ruthlessness towards others (bloodthirsty acts of inhumanity) and underhand means of securing my own ends (evil devices and bribes), that at the day of judgment I will not be swept away with such by the wrath of God.'

11, 12 His dedication and assurance

The outcome of the prayer of faith is that 11a he commits himself to be the sort of person he has asked God to make him, 11b albeit in constant reliance on a gracious Redeemer; but also his prayer issues in 12a security and 12b testimony.

PSALM 27. AN ANTHEM OF DELIVERANCE

The difference between the first and second halves of this psalm is very obvious, and the change after v. 6 from exuberant praise to earnest petition may appear to be an inversion of mood. But it is sound spiritual practice to strengthen oneself in God, before launching on supplication. In this way we pray to a God whom we see clearly, and we finally share with the psalmist that assurance which comes from committing even our gravest crisis into the hand of a known and loved God.

1–3 Whole-hearted trust

A hymn of irrepressible gaiety wherein the threats and needs of life are abundantly met by the Lord. 1 There is a triple parallelism. The Lord is my light, my salvation and my stronghold. 2, 3 Although I am faced with adversaries, multitudes, and the risk of war, my foes stumble in the darkness from which I am freed by His light; the massing of armies cannot affect my experience of heart-peace through His salvation, and the threat of widespread conflict has no power to capture my stronghold.

4–6 A supreme desire

A sublime expression of the constancy of a devout heart. The psalmist is determined to seek the abiding security and joy of God's presence. 4 His desire is to dwell with the Lord, to behold His beauty and to inquire in, better 'to look with delight upon', his temple. This is the longing for the intimate and felt presence of God, sought through the appointed means of Temple sacrifices (cf. v. 6b). 5 Thus he will be secure, God sheltering him above and giving him a rock beneath. 6 No enemy can penetrate to the man who thus tarries in the place of sacrifice (cf. Heb. 2:14, 15).

7–12 A prayer for deliverance from danger

Following the division in RSV, the prayer displays the three essentials of true intercession. 7–9a It rests upon the invitation of God, 9b, 10 casts the whole burden upon God alone, permitting no human help, and 11, 12 while seeking the specific request of deliverance it seeks primarily to know and do God's will.

13, 14 The unfailing Lord

These words mark a return to the present moment. They are a testimony and a strong exhortation to steadfast endurance. This conclusion of the anthem emphasizes human frailty, but stresses the fact of divine intervention, the utter certainty of the Lord's sufficiency, and the patience of faith which waits with confidence. Cf. Pss. 62:1, 5; 123:1, 2; Is. 40:31.

PSALM 28. A PLEA FOR RETRIBUTION

This psalm was first spoken in some time of peril at the hands of evil men. As often in psalms of intercession, it contains an abrupt note of confident praise (vv. 6–8) indicative of the element of assurance inseparable from the prayer of faith. Both parts of the poem have a personal and a corporate section.

1–5 A cry for help

1 The expressed fear that God might be deaf and silent does not arise from any lapse of faith, but rather indicates that self-deprecating reverence which is our only proper attitude towards God, and also our recognition that His and our sense of timing may not coincide, and it may be His will to act as if deaf and to lead us into a period of trial (cf. Ps. 23:4). The burden of his prayer is separation of himself from the wicked and their ultimate reward. 3 He beseeches His Lord not to drag him away with all the crowd of guilty men; 4 but he pleads even more vehemently for a just recompense to be given to such evil-doers, not vindictively but in demonstration of righteousness. 5 The wicked are without excuse. They deliberately ignore or deny the proofs of the living God, seen in His works (cf. Is. 5:12, 18, 19; Rom. 1:18–20).

6–9 Thanksgiving for God's response

This fulfilment of the prayer of v. 2 is not evoked by a sudden surge of remembered deliverances, but by the realization of an immediate response by the Lord. 8, 9 The experience of a divine blessing brings such relief and joy that the psalmist craves a like enrichment for all his people. Are not his subjects the Lord's people? To them He furnishes both the strength of a fortress and the tenderness of a shepherd (cf. Is. 40:11). 8 is more dramatic than RSV (following an emended text) allows. Eaton renders it: 'The Lord—(all) strength is his! he is the stronghold of salvations (intensive plural) for his anointed.'

PSALM 29. THE THUNDER OF GOD

This song of a thunderstorm is heard within the auditorium of heaven, and the angels are summoned to join in the praise and worship of Yahweh. Vv. 3–9, the core of the poem, describe the passage of a storm from the waters of the western sea across the forested hills of N Palestine, to the waste places of Kadesh in the uttermost borders of Edom (Nu. 20:16). This event is depicted not as a demonstration of natural power, but as a symphony of praise to the Creator.

The descriptive part of the poem falls into three equal stanzas which correspond with the formation, onset and passage of the storm, but the subordination of natural phenomena to spiritual forces is constantly emphasized.

3, 4 The approach of the storm

This is presented by the suggestive repetitions as though of distant mutterings. 3 Upon the waters; i.e. either the sea or the swollen flood-waters of the coastal hills where rain is already falling. The general impression is one of sultry foreboding, the activity is concealed, power is leashed, the sense of colossal energy speaks of the glory, 4 power and majesty of God.

5–7 Its onset

The word powerful (v. 4) announces a new phase, a scene of increasing action as the branches of great trees are tossed about and then torn away by violent gusts which leave the trunks gaunt and shattered. This climax of the storm is vividly described so as to convey the impression of reckless power—like the action of a bull-calf or a young wild-ox skipping about in mad exuberance. Sirion is probably Mt. Hermon which appears to join the peaks of Lebanon in a mad dance as the storm swirls about it.

8, 9 The storm passes away

The storm passes over to the distant east-land. With so many trees uprooted the remaining foliage of the forested hills is now insufficient to conceal the splintered limbs and fallen trunks. The impression that is left is one of breathlessness, as though the whole temple of nature echoed with a whispered 'Glory' to the Lord who had but to speak and it would be done, who uttered His voice and the earth melted (cf. Ps. 46:6).

These three scenes, suggestive of boisterous energy, depicted in rain-fed torrents, dishevelled forests, and winds dancing into the distance, are set fast within a framework of wholly different quality. 1 The glory and strength of the Lord are not fully disclosed in nature's wild power but in the impressive dignity of the high court of heaven, where the angelic 'sons of the mighty' (RV) bow in holy adoration. Indeed the focus of all action and thought is the Lord Himself eternally enthroned, and unwaveringly bestowing upon His people not merely the gift of strength but the blessing of peace (vv. 10, 11). The poem skilfully fuses the natural and the spiritual, but with clear emphasis on the latter aspect. The first word ascribe is a call to worship and the last word peace implies His will to bless. Divine power prompts one and provides the other, but the created world cannot provide more than an elemental, though fearfully impressive, index to them.

PSALM 30. MOURNING INTO DANCING

The allusion in the title to the dedication of the temple might refer to the decision about Ornan's threshing-floor (1 Ch. 21:18–27), and the terrible experience of imminent death which is mentioned in the psalm would be the pestilence which approached Jerusalem (1 Ch. 21:7, 13ff.). Alternatively, it may refer to David's palace which he was prevented from occupying at first because of the great Philistine invasion which reached Bethlehem (2 Sa. 5:11, 18, 22; cf. 23:13–17). A third possibility is that the phrase may have been added to the title when the psalm was used at the dedication of the second Temple, in which case the poem in its origin is a personal record of deliverance from some severe distress; but the community, gathered to celebrate the dedication, use his personal expressions as describing their former communal distress and present communal joys. Either of the Davidic associations, however, and especially the second, gives an easier approach to the distinct individualism of the psalm.

1–5 What God hath wrought

1–3 A summary of past experience is presented, the central theme being God's action in bringing David up from the dim depths of the well of the dead into which he had fallen and into which others had sunk beyond recall. This deliverance had disappointed his enemies, who had thought his plight to be beyond the power or likelihood of divine intervention (cf. Ps. 3:2). 4, 5 are an expression of gratitude in which personal experience is seen as illustrating a general principle of God's dealings with men, setting a limit to the darkness and ever giving the assurance of approaching dawn and hope.

6–10 The psalmist's plight

He now contrasts the apparent security afforded by prosperity with the appalling silence of death, and recalls a critical period of his past life. 6 It seemed as though the Lord had made him as strong and sure as the mountains. 7 Then illness or sudden peril reminded him that his well-being was God's blessing. Dismayed is a strong word in Hebrew implying shattering terror. 8 Appalled by his previous boastfulness, he now called upon the Lord, 9 asking what advantage God would gain by his death, because once he has entered the grave he will no longer be able to praise Him. As in Ps. 6:5 (see commentary in loc.), the psalmist does not speak here of death in general—as though OT man entertained no hope beyond the grave—but of a death in which God hides His face in displeasure. For such a death there is indeed no hope beyond.

11, 12 A memorable resolve

The indisputable fact of God's response, whereby his grief was turned to joy (cf. Je. 31:13), merits unceasing thanksgiving.

PSALM 31. TRIAL AND TRUST

This psalm has the familiar motif of 'the distress of the innocent'. It was frequently in the mind of Jeremiah. The phrase terror on every side (v. 13) occurs in Je. 6:25; 20:3; 46:5; 49:29 and indeed part of v. 13 is actually quoted in Je. 20:10. The simile of a broken vessel (v. 12) was a favourite phrase of Jeremiah (cf. 18:4; 19:10, 11; 22:28).

1–8 Outline of an effective faith

1–3 The Lord's honour, ability, holiness, graciousness and faithfulness, as known to the trusting soul, are the background to the psalmist's request to Him to demonstrate His nature in his immediate circumstances. The intercession, though urgent, is also filled with peace because of the unreserved confidence in the Lord so ardently expressed in the opening words. 3, 4 For thy name's sake. The thought is that, because of the Lord's character or name, He will lead, guide and deliver.

5 Faith toward God is the committal of life to Him (cf. Lk. 23:46). 6 The act and confession of so doing strengthens trust and accentuates the difference between truth and falsity (cf. Jon. 2:8). 7, 8 The cycle of adoration, expectation and committal is closed by thanksgiving for deliverance. In this respect faith discounts time's delay and lays hold upon things not seen as yet.

9–24 Details of a profound experience

First of all the psalmist deals with his plight. He makes an appeal to the Lord for mercy on the ground of extreme distress (vv. 9–13), and then seeks justification by an act of divine deliverance (vv. 14–18). 9 His distress is poignantly described as affecting his soul and his body. 10 His misery arises from anxiety and uncertainty; 11 his life is withered by the misgivings and cold suspicion of his acquaintances; his enemies have shaken the loyalty even of his friends (cf. 1 Sa. 22:22). 12 He feels like a useless broken vessel; his life has become so different from what it once was that his former self is like a man who is dead and forgotten. 14, 15 Nevertheless his trust is rooted in God and all his life is in His care (cf. v. 5). 16 He therefore pleads for the evident favour and approval of God, i.e. for the radiant joy and peace of His presence. 17b This would also shame his adversaries and dispel all mists of suspicion about him. Indeed, those who are the source of such calumny and plottings should be imprisoned in the silence of Sheol.

Second, the psalmist deals with the goodness of God. 19, 20 The past experiences of all godly men show that the Lord is especially concerned for their welfare. The resources of His goodness are available for them, and the security of His presence ensures their immunity from the effects of slander and dissension. Cf. Ps. 27:5, 6. 21, 22 But his own immediate experience also shows the Lord's goodness; for when he was beleaguered by evil and impulsively said he was beyond God's power to save, yet the Lord heard and answered. 23 An exhortation to all godly people to trust Him implicitly and fully through the future days naturally follows, for once more personal experience has but enshrined a general truth. His saints are those of whom the double relationships of 1 Jn. 4:11 are true; their demeanour in all circumstances is that of faithful acceptance of and continuance in God's will. 24 Such can well be inwardly encouraged by the psalmist's testimony to maintain their attitude of patient and confident waiting for the Lord.

PSALM 32. THE JOY OF FORGIVENESS

This psalm deals with the blessedness which is known when sin is forgiven and gives insight into the psychological and religious implications of sin and its removal.

1–5 The joy of forgiveness

These verses describe the great satisfaction and joyous freedom of the soul whose sin has been covered, cancelled and cleansed by the wholly righteous Lord. 1, 2 The fact of sin and forgiveness is stated in four ways, and repeated in v. 5 with an emphatic climax. Inserted in this comprehensive statement of a soul's transformation is an account (vv. 3, 4) of the deep conflict which accompanied the previous sense of guilt. 3 The initial impulse to stifle guilt by silence simply thrust it into the subconscious, but it seeped out in symptoms of physical distress—deep-seated pain and involuntary groans. 4 Sleep brought no cessation from such profound disharmony, and its very persistence was an indication of the inescapable hand of God's righteousness. Obstinate persistence in such repression steadily reduced his vigour, like the withering of a tree in a prolonged drought.

5 The turning-point was when he decided to confess to God, who at once both freely forgave and completely dealt with his problem. The clear teaching of these verses, therefore, is that by simple confession sin in all its aspects—the outward act (signified by the word sin), the rebellious disobedience (transgressions), and the inward corruption (iniquity)—is completely forgiven, and covered so as to remain no longer an issue between God and man.

6–11 The basis of confident prayer

6 David's personal experience of God's forgiveness (vv. 1, 2) is made the basis of a call for confident prayer by any godly person provided that the plea is offered while the Lord may yet be approached (see mg.). 6b, 7 The implication is that by repentance one comes into a new sphere of divine protection amid the storms of life (cf. Lk. 13:3, 5).

8, 9 are the counterpart of vv. 3 and 4. David's guilty silence is replaced by the divine word of sympathetic guidance. 8 The lonely isolation of the impenitent sinner is replaced by mutual understanding: I will counsel you with my eye upon you implies that ideal bond between teacher and pupil, between father and son. 9 In contrast to the sensitive response of the teachable heart is the stubborn will, which refuses to draw near to God and must be disciplined by judgment. These thoughts of instruction in godliness and of free confession should be compared with Ps. 51:13–15.

10, 11 speak first of the alternatives which were in mind in v. 5. Sin brings either punishment or mercy; the difference arises from confession to the Lord. His steadfast love is such that all who can claim to be righteous (through acceptance of His forgiveness) have a source of pure delight which springs from a guileless heart. Peace is inseparable from purity.

PSALM 33. AN ANTHEM OF WORSHIP

This poem, which has no title, picks up part of the concluding sentence of the previous psalm, but, unlike it, is not a personal record of experience. It is a corporate expression of praise and worship marked by balance of thought and symmetrical structure.

The introduction (vv. 1–3) and the conclusion (vv. 20–22) are clearly distinguished from the main body of the poem. 1–3 describe the enthusiastic singing of a choir accompanied by music. 20–22 describe the fervent faith of the worshippers who are surrounded by the protection and mercy of the Lord. The symmetry and sequence of these ideas are significant. The anthem of praise becomes the prayer of faith. The change is also from the externals of worship to the inward experiences of trust and hope.

In the body of the psalm are two sections, vv. 4–12 and vv. 13–19, the first of which deals with God the Ruler, and the second with God the Judge.

4–12 The all-ruling word of the Lord

Verses 4–11 are made up of four groups, each of four phrases. 4, 5 First the stress is on the fidelity of God to His word. It is upright, and this quality is reflected in what God does, what He loves, and in the evidence provided by the created world. Throughout all, He is faithful and steadfast to what He has spoken. The earth introduces the next concept: 6, 7 the power of the word of God revealed in the work of creation (cf. Gn. 1:3) and in the subjugation even of such turbulent elements as the seas. The question now arises: what response is due to such a God? 8 answers that men should fear and stand in awe (better, 'go in dread') of Him, 9 because of His irresistible word. 10, 11 contrast the helplessness of the words of men and the certain fulfilment of the words of the Lord. Finally, 12 expresses the blessedness of being linked to this God of effectual rule over the world.

13–19 The all-searching eye of the Lord

The preceding section has implied the following question: granted the blessedness of possessing and being possessed by this great God, how are we to know that we are in this place of blessing? Who are His people? 13 God's choice is not restricted: it is made from all the sons of men. This thought leads to the next theme, that of divine comprehensiveness. 14 God looks from heaven to earth and scans every living being. In vv. 13, 14 two Hebrew words for 'look' are used. 15 Moreover, He looks not only upon the outward appearance; He discerns the thoughts and intentions of the hearts which He Himself has fashioned. Cf. Ps. 139:1–5; Heb. 4:12, 13.

At this point a striking feature occurs. From v. 4 each new concept has been introduced by a remark in the preceding statement; but 16 brings forward a theme which has no precedent in the poem, that of human impotence. While there has not been the slightest hint of imperfection or peril in all the wide survey of space and time, we are now to infer that the divine scrutiny of mankind has disclosed so prevalent a defect that the need for salvation is unquestionably accepted by all. Certainly there is no earthly power to deliver; neither rank, numbers, personal prowess, 17 nor natural forces (symbolized by the horse) can effect redemption. If salvation is to be obtained, God must intervene. 18, 19 Hence, as a final theme the election of the godly is firmly declared. This is not a repetition of the concept of divine sovereignty in vv. 12, 13, but a statement of the basis of true life. There is nothing arbitrary or capricious about it; it is a righteous principle available to all. The fundamental principle is simply that of the Lord's faithfulness; all who honour Him and rest or hope in His mercy and goodness, He will undertake to deliver from death and to sustain in every exigency of life. This inescapable law of faith is the personal counterpart of that immutable lot of the good and the true which was the closing thought of the first half of the poem.

PSALM 34. TESTIMONY

This is an acrostic poem, as is Ps. 25. The title associates the hymn with David's escape from Gath to Adullam (1 Sa. 21:10 – 22:1). See introduction to Ps. 52. Abimelech was very possibly the title of the king of Gath, in the same way as 'Pharaoh' was used in Egypt, and 'Agag' among the Amalekites (cf. Gn. 20:2; 26:1). In 1 Samuel his name is given as Achish.

The spirit of exuberant confidence in the Lord is of more importance than any logical structure in the poem. Many of its phrases have become an essential part of the vocabulary of devotional worship.

1, 2 Introduction

1 David has reached the point of spiritual certainty where he feels able to say that his praise of God is independent and irrespective of circumstances. 2 It is the product of his soul, the very centre of his being, and he desires that it may bring alleviation to those whom life has afflicted, or trodden down.

3–8 Personal testimony

The exhortations to magnify the Lord (v. 3) and taste and see that the Lord is good (v. 8) are a framework for an unforgettable experience. 4 'I enquired of the Lord, and He answered me.' 5 Indeed, all who look unto Him become radiant-faced, and can never be abashed. 6 The will to help the downtrodden (v. 2) arises from the fact that it was when poor himself—the same word—that he cried, was heard, and was saved with full salvation. 7 Out of his people's past, he knows how to interpret his experience: the divine Deliverer, the angel of the Lord, intervened to save (cf. Gn. 16:7–13; 48:16; Ex. 14:19; Jdg. 6:11–24; cf. Jos. 5:13–15).

9–18 General exhortation

9 The personal appeal of v. 3 is here enlarged and generalized. Cf. also vv. 6, 7 with vv. 17, 18. Two themes are then elaborated. 10 First, the concept of deliverance from all fears is doubly illustrated by the imagery of young lions going hungry, because even powerful beasts in their prime have less security of life than those who turn to God for sustenance and enjoy His abundant provision. 15 Second, the simile in v. 5 of looking unto the Lord, with its suggestion of reflected radiance (cf. 2 Cor. 3:18), is reversed, and it is the eyes of the Lord which are upon the righteous (cf. Ps. 32:8) and 16 by His face the wicked shall be abashed.

11–14 Inserted within this general development of the psalm is a sub-section distinguished from the context by its didactic tone. 11 David here teaches his followers what it means to fear the Lord (cf. v. 9). 12 The ideal life, the life which is marked by the joyfulness of the Lord's continual benevolence, has three characteristics: 13 strict avoidance of all falsity of speech (cf. Mt. 5:37); 14 an uncompromising activity in doing good; perseverance in the quest for peace with men (cf. Rom. 14:19; Heb. 12:14). That David and his men acted thus is attested in 1 Sa. 25:14–16. These essential rules for godly living are quoted verbatim in 1 Pet. 3:10–12, and are implicit in such synopses of Christian ethics as that given in Col. 3:8–17.

19–22 Conclusion

This is a summary statement of the two trends and issues of human life. On one hand there is the pursuit of righteousness and godliness which, for all its incidental affliction, is inseparably bound up with the goodness and power of the Lord who maintains the believer's inward strength. On the other hand there is the choice of wickedness and its inevitable doom; by its very antagonism to the good, the practice of evil will entail the ruin of its guilty adherents. Finally, there is an echo of the initial testimony in vv. 1 and 2, and an emphatic assertion that it is impossible for those who trust in the Lord to share in the condemnation of the guilty. (Cf. Rom. 8:1, 33, 34.) 20 He keeps all his bones. A vivid figure for complete preservation. It was literally fulfilled in the experience of Christ (Jn. 19:36).

PSALM 35. A LITANY

This strong cry of distress could well date from the period when David was being hunted by Saul. It may be regarded as an elaboration of 1 Sa. 24:15. At such a time David's mind would be extremely agitated because of his enemies at Saul's court, the king's instability of character, the awful scope of human ingratitude and hatred, and the elusive details of God's purposes which in themselves were plain and yet contradictory (cf. 1 Sa. 24:6, 20). This prayer for judgment on his foes was no expression of secret malice against Saul, for had he not spared his life? It is a plea for the visible demonstration of essential righteousness.

The psalm has three sections, each of which ends with the expectation of thanksgiving for deliverance.

1–10 Prayer for a vigorous deliverance from violence

1–3 are a call to the Lord to help, expressed in the terms of the battlefield. 4–8 are an intimation of what should be done to those who are seeking his hurt (cf. Ps. 1:4; Je. 23:12). 9, 10 anticipate the time when fervent praise will be offered to God because of His gracious deliverance. 1 Contend. The Hebrew word is often used of disputes at law, but here the court of judgment is the field of battle. Cf. vv. 11 and 23.

11–18 Argument for immediate deliverance from injustice

The situation is one in which false witnesses bring fantastic charges against the psalmist. 12 They requite me evil for good. His grief is the greater because those who accuse him are ones whom he has befriended. The contrast is presented in some detail. 13, 14 describe his solicitude for others; when they were ill or distressed he sympathized with them so deeply that he virtually identified himself with them (cf. Jb. 2:12). He could not have done more even for his next of kin. I prayed. Better, as in RSV mg., 'My prayer turned back'. The meaning is that his prayer, though seemingly fruitless, shall return in blessing to himself. 15, 16 When the situation is reversed how differently they act. They do not wait for him to be in great need; he had but to stumble and they gloat over it and initiate a campaign of slander and calumny so that their words rend and stab. 17, 18 This argument closes with an appeal similar to those in Pss. 13:1, 2; 22:19–21.

19–28 Appeal for a statement of acquittal

The situation is now presented as a moral issue; i.e. the appeal to the Lord is made solely on the grounds of His righteousness (v. 24). 20 The conflict is not now one of weapons but of words; the wrongful imputation of evil against those who are law-abiding (who are quiet in the land) can do great mischief unless truth is made known. 21 The inwardness of the issue is seen in that the appeal is not for a stopping of mouths but 25 a silencing of their heart's intention. 23 Hence the urgent appeal to the Lord who is addressed as my God and my Lord. Note the Hebrew names here, 'ĕlōhîm and 'ᵃḏōn (cf. Jn. 20:28), expressive of One who possesses the fullness of divine attributes and the omnipotence of divine power and sovereignty. Such an appeal is possible only because the psalmist has a clear conscience and because his request that those who rejoice at his difficulties should be disgraced (cf. v. 4) springs from his deep aversion to the evil desires and practices of such men. 27, 28 His own desire is for the widest experience of God's goodness, hence the concluding intercession that the joyous testimonies of godly men may be incapable of denial by those who were formerly sceptical. Wink the eye (v. 19) and open wide their mouths (21) are gestures of exultant malice and contempt.

PSALM 36. THE GOODNESS OF GOD

The central theme of this psalm is the loving-kindness of God (vv. 5, 7, 10). In sharp contrast is the picture of a wicked man (vv. 1–4). The psalm ends with a prayer for deliverance, and the assurance through faith of the overthrow of the wicked (vv. 10–12).

1–4 The limitations of evil

1a Transgression is imagined as speaking within the heart of a wicked man who regards it as an oracle (lit. 'The wicked man has an oracle of rebellion in his heart'). In other words, sin leads the sinner to project his evil concepts on to the seat of moral authority, whence God has been dispossessed. 1b This spirit of rebellion against God assures the sinner that he need have no fear; i.e. he need not dread any consequences of his conduct. This self-deception of the wicked is due to his deliberate blindness toward God: he shuts himself within himself and, by listening to the smooth words of his own oracle, persuades himself that he is immune from ultimate disgrace and dereliction. 2 This psychological diagnosis should be read in the light of Mk. 7:21–23 (cf. Dt. 29:19). The rejection of the true God inevitably entails the erection of a false god endowed to the full with the deceitful propensities of the rebellious heart.

After thus sketching the philosophy of the self-deceiving sinner, the actual process of his life is described. 3 As often, sins of speech head the list; next the abandonment of moral standards. 4 When he lies resting he does not meditate upon God but is engrossed in base and wicked schemes. His whole life is shaped and set into the pattern of the 'not good' (cf. Is. 28:15) and thus he neither recognizes nor rightly reacts to evil.

5–9 The greatness of God

Language is not able adequately to express the attributes of God. Their greatness is of a quality other than size and surpasses any mental concept of it. But language is all we have to convey our apprehension of truth, so the psalmist uses material height and depth to illustrate spiritual dimensions (cf. Eph. 3:18), and draws pictures of living needs such as parental protection and thirst's satisfaction to symbolize the rich realities of divine-human fellowship.

5 The steadfast love and faithfulness of God are as limitless as the heavens and the endless perspectives of the clouds. 6 His righteousness and judgments, signifying respectively His principles and practices, are as immovable and unfathomable as the mountains and the ocean (cf. Rom. 11:33). There is not a man or beast in all the earth that is uncared for by the Lord. 7 His benevolent vigilance is unspeakably precious (cf. Ps. 139:17). 8 His resources overshadow all people and, like the Garden of Eden, there is no dearth nor drought for the soul which commits itself to Him (the word delights is from the same root as Eden). 9 Only by outflow from Him is life itself enjoyed, and only by His illumination do we possess the light of truth (cf. Jn. 1:9).

10–12 A prayer for continued blessing

10 Whereas the wicked man is unaware of the glories of the divine nature, the godly man has been given some knowledge; hence the only consistent course for the psalmist is to ask the Lord for a continuance of His steadfast love, so that 11 he may neither be trodden down by insolent feet nor driven out by impious hands. 12 In faith he foresees the ultimate downfall of the ungodly.

PSALM 37. A MEDITATION UPON THE PROSPERITY OF THE WICKED

This poem is built upon an acrostic of the Hebrew alphabet and consists of a series of thoughts characteristic of OT wisdom literature. E.g., cf. v. 1 with Pr. 24:19; v. 5 with Pr. 16:3; v. 16 with Pr. 16:8; v. 23 with Pr. 16:9. There are some resemblances also to statements in the book of Job. Cf. v. 6 with Jb. 11:17; v. 10 with Jb. 7:10; v. 19 with Jb. 5:20. The psalmist was certainly troubled by the prosperity and power of wicked men, but he believed this to be only a temporary reversal of true values. The poem should be read alongside Ps. 73, where the issue is seen (v. 17) from a spiritual and not a material standpoint.

The poem has no obvious structure apart from its main thread of confidence in God's future work; this links the various statements together and is particularly symbolized in the repeated words shall possess the land (vv. 9, 11, 22, 29, 34).

1–8 Definition of the right attitude to life's problem

Facing the problem of life's inequalities, the initial emphasis is negative (fret not, be not envious), but the principal stress is on the positive actions of trust, take delight in, commit, be still, wait, all in connection with the sufficiency and goodness of the Lord. 1 Vv. 7b, 8 repeat the exhortations of this verse. 2 On the negative side there is the use of a metaphor so apt that it is frequently used both in the OT and in the NT (e.g. Pss. 90:6; 103:15; Is. 40:6–8; Jas. 1:10, 11). 3–5 On the positive side there is the clear concept of a definite transaction between the Lord and the trusting soul. See, e.g., v. 5 (lit. 'Roll your way upon the Lord'); cf. Ps. 55:22; 1 Pet. 5:7. This attitude must be maintained by the doing of good (v. 3). 6 On His part there will be the sure vindication of faith, as certain as the noonday sun, and 4 also He will bestow upon the soul that delights in Him the fulfilment of his desires, i.e. Himself. 8 The reminder to refrain from angry annoyance at injustice is repeated by James (Jas. 1:26; 3:9); it is far better to be silent and to banish all fretfulness by an unswerving reliance upon God. Cf. Ps. 62:1, 5.

9–22 The psalmist's underlying belief analysed

9, with its for and but, sets out the basis for the right attitude to the moral anomalies of life. After a little while the wicked shall disappear and the godly shall live undisturbed. 10, 11 Each aspect is expanded (cf. Mt. 5:5) and 12–14 the theme thus introduced is further elaborated. The wicked plot, gnash with the teeth, draw out the sword and bend their bow in order to cast down and slay the righteous who walk uprightly. 15 But their own weapons shall be their destruction. 16 In contrast, righteous men are altogether different and their worth is measured by moral values, not by material well-being, 17 and by God's estimate of them, displayed by His supporting grace. 18, 19 The meditation now turns to the upright who are further described. Their outstanding characteristic is a security which is not rooted in the circumstances of everyday life, so that when misfortune comes upon them they are not abashed, and in scarcity are still contented (cf. Phil. 4:11–13). 20 In contrast, the wicked have no enduring security, no more so than the finest pastures which, for all their brave show, are as insubstantial as smoke (cf. Mt. 6:30).

23–33 Belief and testimony

The psalmist's thought now turns to the essential factor in life—the sovereign good pleasure of the Lord. 23, 24 He makes safe and sure the way that a righteous man takes, and even if that man should trip over he is not left prostrate (cf. Lk. 10:33–35; Jude 24). This is no fanciful notion but a fact of experience. 25 does not mean that a good man is never destitute (cf. 1 Sa. 21:3; 25:8), but that he is never forsaken by the Lord and ultimately, in his children, conditions become improved. 27 At all times the only right principle is to keep on doing good (cf. Ps. 34:14), because equity in dealing with men and loyalty toward God are always approved by the Lord and fostered by His co-operation. 28, 29 The psalmist's meditation is now turning from the theme of the Lord's providential care to the actual experiences of his saints. Not only do they possess this enduring quality but 30 their speech is marked by pleasant reflections upon the law and truth: the mouth is the primary evidence of character (cf. Ps. 36:3). 31 His life is genuine, for his heart is occupied with God's will. 32, 33 Even though evil men plot against the righteous and accuse him before corrupt judges, nevertheless the Lord will not fail to intervene sooner or later.

34–40 Concluding counsel

34 Set your heart upon the Lord and keep your life on His path; then eventually the downfall of the wicked will be witnessed. This is not a matter for personal gratification; it is demanded by the moral bases of life. 35, 36 The psalmist here adds his second testimony to the effect that he himself had known a wicked man acting as a terrible tyrant and flourishing like a leafy tree in its own native soil; yet he was suddenly cut down and removed from the scene as though he had never existed. 38 All transgressors are bound to be destroyed: there is no possible future for any wicked man. 37 But let everyone take note of what happens to a man who is upright and godly; there is indeed a future for him, and for his posterity.

39, 40 are a confession of faith in the character, power and absolute trustworthiness of the Lord.

PSALM 38. CONTRITION WHEN HARASSED WITHIN AND WITHOUT

This prayer for divine aid was prompted by great physical and moral distress. The descriptive details in vv. 1–8 may be metaphorical (cf. Is. 1:5, 6), and this leads Eaton to suggest that it 'may rather have been a psalm in the Temple repertory which could have been used on behalf of any grievously sick person'; but the pronounced element of personal experience in these verses suggests some serious disease. But whatever its point of origin, the title indicates its use in association with 'the memorial offering', designed prayerfully to seek God's intervention in some desperate need.

1–11 The disquiet of sin

1 His experience leads him to infer that the Lord's present attitude to him is one of wrath and displeasure. 2 His agencies are as sharp piercing arrows and strong pressing hand. 3 Ultimately sin is the cause of all his distress. 4 These iniquities are described first as a suffocating flood (cf. Jon. 2:3–5; Ps. 42:7), then as a burden crushing the life out of him (cf. Gn. 4:13). The swift change of metaphor accentuates the restless and distraught spirit of a sinner convicted of guilt. 5–7 Beginning with festering wounds, the consequences of his sinful folly are graphically described: a pain-racked body, bent and bowed like that of a mourner; his whole frame fevered and diseased. The description then gradually turns from outward symptoms of the flesh to evidences of an inner malady which is well known to God. 8, 9 There is a general sense of numbness and incapacity, the inarticulate groaning of an aching heart and a troubled conscience. 10 Such a moral malady finds expression in a throbbing heart, a loss of zest in life, dullness of vision, and 11 a suspicion on the part of friends and even of kinsmen which causes them to hold aloof from him, as if he were a leper.

12–17 The decision to turn to God

This thought of other men provides a link for a theme of certainty. 12 He knows that those who have sought his life are now, during his distress, actively plotting and scheming against him. 13, 14 Moreover, because of his sense of guilt, he must behave as though unaware of their slanders, for he cannot plead innocence in a matter of greater moment. Rebukes: RV mg. suitably suggests 'arguments'. 15 The external pressure of his enemies clarifies the psalmist's real attitude of heart; his trust is rooted in the Lord. Not only so, he must leave it to the Lord to speak in reply to his adversaries, and 16 so implicit is his trust that he does not even sketch out the nature of the reply, saving only that the Lord vindicates him against their triumphant mockery. 17 For himself, he has reached the end of his tether. There is one step more to penitence.

18–22 The confession of sin

18 He admits his sin, and recognizes that it is this which is the root cause of his sorrow and care. 19 Nevertheless his enemies are still active and numerous and are apparently unaffected by his change of heart. 20 Indeed they are quite ready to repay any graciousness on his part with ingratitude. I follow after good; i.e. in his behaviour towards them. 21, 22 The prayer concludes with an urgent call to the Lord not to forsake him nor to be slow to intervene. Faith has not yet risen to the triumphant certainty of Ps. 6:8, 9, but it is implicit in the final words, O Lord, my salvation!

PSALM 39. FACING DEATH

The superscription to Jeduthun refers to a notable leader of the Temple choir (cf. 1 Ch. 16:41, 42; 25:1–6). He is also named in the titles of Pss. 62 and 77.

The psalmist tells of his unavailing effort to keep his trouble to himself (vv. 1–3). He then records the words of a prayer centring on the brevity of life and the seriousness of sin (vv. 4–11), and ends (vv. 12, 13) with a plea for divine mercy.

Two main interpretations have been offered. According to one (see Weiser), the trouble which overcame the psalmist's reticence is not recorded here. His concern in the psalm is the fact that in speaking he broke faith with God and dishonoured Him in the presence of the wicked (v. 1). Vv. 4–11 are his plea for forgiveness and to be strengthened against repeating this offence. He asks for a due regard for the shortness of life so that, living as a man about to die, he will be circumspect in all his doings. The final two verses plead for divine aid for the remainder of his pitifully short life.

The other interpretation, offered here (cf. Eaton and most commentators), takes vv. 4–11 as the outburst which he longed to avoid but could not contain. Commentators, of course, vary in their understanding of what was in the psalmist's mind, and why he so fervently wished to keep these thoughts to himself.

1–3 Suppression

1 The decision to exercise a strict watch over all that he says and to refrain from complaint about his own distress was motivated by a fear of giving the wicked ground for attacking the honour of God. Cf. the companion fear expressed in 73:15. 2, 3 This suppression of his feelings, however, simply caused a psychological explosion; he could no longer restrain himself.

4–11 Outburst

The theme of his cry is the brevity and frailty of man's life. 4 In this context, his great fear, the ground of his overpowering anxiety, was of sudden death which came without forewarning upon one who had not been made aware that his end was upon him and that the measure of my days had run its course. 5a Against such a death he would have no defence, for it expressed what God had predetermined as his life span, a pathetic few handbreadths of time and a veritable nothing compared with the eternities of God Himself. 5b, 6 But if he is defenceless because of the irresistible will of God, he is doubly defenceless because of his own human nature. Man is of innate fragility, and even in matters of worldly business and the apportionment of his own resources he cannot pierce into the future so as to make it suit his wishes. How then can he armour himself against death itself?

7 Yet all is by no means lost. There is hope in God expressed in relation to three great realities of life. 8a First, there is hope of forgiveness. The psalmist reveals a cardinal factor in his fear of sudden death, that of dying unforgiven. Herein also we may surmise why he kept his fears from the wicked (v. 1). They would scoff at a man whose religion and faith did not give him security in the face of death, but would take no account of the moral factor of the deadliness of unforgiven sin. Hence they would scorn a God who failed His servants at the last. 8b Secondly, hope in God touches the matter of vindication from scorners. They would not understand how the regenerate soul senses the divine abhorrence of sin, but they would have their mouths stopped if they saw him triumphing where they expected his downfall. 9–11 Thirdly, there is hope residing in the divine purpose for human life. 9 should be restored to a past tense (cf. RV). The psalmist's former silence was due to a reverent acceptance of God's will. Now because God is One in whom he has hope (cf. v. 7), 10 he looks for a divine decision to lift his burden, 11a in merciful recognition that, however just the punishment, 11b it deprives man of his dearest, though fragile, possession, life itself.

12, 13 Prayer

This is the counterpart of vv. 1–3. The dominance of the subjective I said, I will, I was, etc. disappears before the objective reference to the Lord whose ear, and word, and benevolence are desired because therein is true life. 12 The plea is based on the kindly mercy of God to whom tears constitute a prayer, and who will be as attentive to the passing guest, the alien refugee, as He instructed His people to be (cf. Dt. 10:18, 19). 13 Look away from me; i.e. 'turn away thy look of wrath' (cf. v. 10). The psalmist beseeches his Lord to attend to his need and yet asks to be spared any further scrutiny of God's critical eye.

PSALM 40. A LITURGY OF A FULL HEART

It may quite well be that the contrasting moods reflected in this poem were occasioned by the circumstances related at the end of the first book of Samuel. The lament over the destruction of Ziklag (1 Sa. 30:4–6), the swift defeat of Amalek (1 Sa. 30:16–20), and the news of the Philistine victory at Gilboa and of the death of Saul with all its implications for David, occurred within three or four days (2 Sa. 1:1). This poem, therefore, may be the expression of his release from a perilous exile wherein had been great gain in Godward trust (vv. 1–3), of his readiness to undertake the expected call to be leader of the people (v. 7) and of dedication to that work (v. 8), of his recognition that not all his foes had fallen on Gilboa (vv. 14–16), and that many of his deeds in the period of Saul's animosity must now come home with painful consequences (v. 12) if the exile became king. The poem certainly expresses his consciousness of utter dependence on the Lord (vv. 13, 17) as well as his delight in Him (vv. 1–5) and eager service of Him (vv. 6–10). Even though this connection with David's history is, of course, hypothetical, it does show how a psalm of such diversity can yet be a unity arising out of the manifold variety of experience. There is no need therefore to follow those commentators who find it necessary to suppose that several psalms were gratuitously joined together.

The elements of royal dedication which this psalm contains (vv. 6–8) aptly became prophetic of the royal and priestly Messiah (Heb. 10:5–10), while the elements of confession (v. 12) serve to show how short His human prototypes fell of His matchless perfection.

1–5 Thanksgiving

1–3 The past experience. 1 David's patient waiting upon the Lord is noted, not in order to dwell on its duration, but in view of what happened. The Lord's ear was alert to his prayer. 2 God has brought him out of the place of insecurity, and put him firmly on the rock of His sufficiency (cf. Ps. 18:31–33). He made plain the way of his going (cf. Ps. 37:23), and 3 gave him a new song so that many others should hear, reverence and trust.

4, 5 The new song. 4 This rhapsody in two movements first glorifies the way of faith, in which there is a. a deliberate choice and action by the man who makes the Lord his trust; b. a recognition that there is no ground for confidence in the proud, men whose promises are hollow; and c. a complete rejection of any other supernatural aid as erroneous and false, or lying. 5 Next, glory is ascribed to the Lord my God, the object of his faith, whose wondrous (i.e. supernaturally marvellous) deeds are a reflection of His inner thoughts towards us. He is indeed beyond compare and mercies already experienced are but a fraction of what is still kept in store (cf. 1 Cor. 2:9).

6–10 Dedication

6–8 The supreme offering. Supreme among the plans of God which have been disclosed to the ear of the psalmist is that whereby worship is consummated not in the ritual of the blood of beasts as such, but in the willing surrender of the worshipper's life for continual obedience to the will of God. The four offerings here mentioned are detailed in Lv. 1–4. But while they had a rightful place in divine worship centred in the altar, they were not the sole or primary requirement laid upon the worshipper (cf. Dt. 10:12f.). Offerings in isolation from the moral and spiritual response of repentance and dedicated obedience were recognized as 'vain' (Is. 1:13). But the OT never supposed that offerings were a dispensable element in religion, or that all worship could be offered solely through moral response to God. What appear here as alternatives are to be understood as comparatives in order of priority (cf. 1 Sa. 15:22; Ho. 6:6). This passage is interpreted in Heb. 10:5–10 as being spoken by Jesus Christ and fulfilled in Him.

6 An open ear (lit., as RSV mg., 'ears thou hast dug for me'). This is a unique expression in the Bible and for its meaning appeal can be made either to the custom of piercing the ear (consecration to perpetual service, Ex. 21:6; Dt. 15:17) or to the idiom of opening the ear, signifying the imparting of a revelation from God (e.g. Is. 50:5). The common denominator of these two ideas is obedience and it is most likely that this is what the phrase is intended to stress: God the Creator has hollowed out man's ears, giving him the faculty of hearing in order that he might learn and then obey the divine will.

9, 10 The public testimony. God's work of deliverance has been proclaimed before men; it has not been kept for his own secret delight. The faithfulness, mercy and truth of the Lord have been preached before crowds of men, His salvation has been advertised. The movement from v. 8 to v. 9 is significant. The reality of a man's testimony about the state of his heart is seen in his willingness to share the good news of God with others. If private religion does not become public it ceases to be true.

11–17 Supplication

11–13 For salvation of soul. The emphasis from the first word is on the Lord. 'Do Thou, on Thy part, not withhold Thy compassions from me, even as I have not withheld (restrained) my lips. Let Thy loving-kindness and truth, which I have not concealed from men, continually be my protection, because a multitude of evils have coiled around me and the consequences of past sins have blurred my vision just when I need to see clearly.' Hence the petition of v. 13.

14–17 For deliverance from danger. 14, 15 This request seeks the overthrow of David's foes by a recoiling upon themselves of all their schemes and slanders against him. 16 This appeal is linked with a desire for blessing upon all who can join from the heart in his song of praise (see v. 3). 17 What if he is poor and needy; i.e. downtrodden and helpless? The Lord will certainly take thought for him (see v. 5) and free him from all difficulties, however tenacious and troublesome (see v. 2). The poem's whole expression of praise, its reliance upon God's promise and its plea for help are caught up and crystallized in the words of this last verse. None other but the Lord can help; none other is sought for help. May He then not tarry.

PSALM 41. ABUSE AND ASSURANCE

The charge against 'my bosom friend' (v. 9) links this poem with Ps. 55:13, 14, 20, 21. If the psalm is to be associated with a particular episode in David's life, it must belong to the treachery of Ahithophel (2 Sa. 15:12, 31), though there is no reference there to David's being, or having been, ill. The main point in the psalm, however, seems to be some notable sickness, during which treachery on the part of once trusted friends became evident. The Lord Jesus Christ used the psalm to speak of His own experience (Jn. 13:18), and in the wonderful variety of Scripture it enshrines the not-uncommon experience of human disloyalty, and speaks for the comfort of those who suffer at the hands of friends.

1–3 A statement of principle

1 While the psalmist includes himself in the category of those who are poor, i.e. downcast, he is making a general statement valid in all similar cases. Happy is that man who considers how best he may aid the needy. In the day of trouble the Lord will be his helper. 2 The wicked hopes of his enemies will be confounded by actual events. 3 Should such a man become seriously ill, he will experience divine support, even to the extent that the Lord becomes his nurse and 'changes all his bed' in his sickness (RSV mg., correctly, for v. 3b).

4–9 David's bitter experience

A specific case, his own, is now cited wherein the principle of benevolence has not been reciprocated. 5 At a time when, because of illness, his enemies were openly desiring and forecasting his death, then those from whom he expected kindness and sympathy returned him deceitfulness and antagonism. 6 Some of those who visited him in his sickness were obviously pleased to find him laid low, and lied when they expressed a desire for his speedy recovery. 7 Their true thoughts were spread abroad outside the sick chamber so that his secret enemies were emboldened to plot against him and 8 circulated rumours of some incurable disease, brought on by evil doing, which would prevent his ever leaving his bed. 9 Bitterest of all was the behaviour of my bosom friend (lit. 'the man of my peace'), bound together in a covenant of loyalty (cf. 1 Sa. 18:3), expressed and cemented in the sacred grace of hospitality. The extent of his spiteful animosity is expressed as a spurning of the prostrate sufferer with his heel.

10–12 A sure confidence in the Lord

In spite of the bitter disappointment caused by his trusted companion David's reliance upon God is unimpaired. 10 He not only prays for restoration to health so that he might carry out his duty of just requital as the royal judge, but he affirms a threefold testimony to the Lord: a. 11 as the God who reveals His good pleasure in vindicating His own; b. 12a as the God who does not allow virtue (integrity) to go unrewarded; and c. 12b as the God who brings sinners (cf. v. 4) into a permanent intimacy with Himself.

13 Doxology

The last verse is a doxology added by a compiler to mark the end of the first of the five books of Psalms (cf. Pss. 72:18, 19; 89:52; 106:48). See Introduction, on 'The Five Books'.

BOOK TWO. PSALMS 42–72

PSALMS 42 AND 43. THE LONGING FOR GOD'S SANCTUARY

These two psalms probably constitute one poem: in several Hebrew MSS they are joined together; Ps. 43 is the only poem in the second book to lack a superscription; the theme in both is that of deep grief caused by exclusion from the sanctuary of the Lord; Ps. 43:5 is virtually identical with Ps. 42:5 and 11, providing a refrain which divides the poem into three stanzas.

42:1–5 Yearning and regret

1 The imagery of a timid fallow-deer audibly panting because of extreme thirst vividly expresses the intense and searing sense of want experienced by the psalmist (cf. Pss. 63:1; 84:2). 2 His craving to draw near to the living God, who is the fountain of living water (cf. Je. 2:13), is inseparable from the remembered habit of going up to the sanctuary. But the repetition of 'ĕlōhîm (God) shows that the yearning is for communion with God Himself. 3 The strength of his intense love and longing for God is shown by his constant tears over the scepticism of his companions. 4 This atmosphere of unbelief has enhanced his memories of how he used to lead the throng of pilgrims in procession to the house of God (cf. 2 Sa. 6:15–19). 5 This moody retrospect is suddenly challenged by an upwelling of irrepressible faith and the psalmist calls upon his mournful soul not only to trust in God but actively to hope for His deliverance.

42:6–11 Dejection and hope

6 The second stanza picks out of the refrain the words cast down. It is significant of his honesty with God, and also of the tender nature of the God to whom he speaks, that having rightly assured himself that a downcast spirit is unnecessary (v. 5), he at once confesses that he is living on a lower level than his faith would require. The psalmist now reveals to us that he is in the far north, where snow-capped Hermon looks down on the head waters of the Jordan. How he came to be there he does not disclose, but the deep sadness of his poem suggests that he was one of the many strings of captives led off by invading kings. 7 The thunder of the waterfalls as Hermon's snow melted seemed to answer to the depth of his own sorrows, but at the same time faith reasserted itself: if he found himself storm-tossed, the waves were God's waves. He was still kept by a sovereign Hand. 8 is not easy to connect with v. 7. Owing to the flexibility of meaning of the Hebrew tenses, we may translate it present (as RSV), in which case he testifies to the comfort he derives from his confessed sense of God's overruling; or we may translate as future (cf. RV), in which case the psalmist states his assurance that God will enable him to triumph in the midst of the storms; or the verbs could be past continuous ('used to'), leading into the sad query of v. 9, with its associated complaint of a pain that is physical in its intensity (v. 10), as he faces his taunting adversaries. 9 Nevertheless, not for nothing did he call God his rock—One unchangeable in faithful strength, a sure refuge (Ps. 94:22), abundant in overflowing grace (Ex. 17:5, 6)—and the prayer of sadness 11 turns into the exhortation of faith.

43:1–5 Confidence in God

In the third stanza of the complete poem the human elements of distress and despondency are replaced by a realization of God's faithfulness and power. The mood of plaintive regret in the first stanza and of fitful perplexity in the second is changed in the third to one of confidence and trust. 1 The baffling circumstances are still present. Hence his plea for vindication against men who are unkind, deceitful and unjust, and his request for heartfelt assurance in the matter of divine care. 2 God is his supreme resource, why then does He seem to have rejected him? Why must the psalmist go about by himself as solitary as a mourner? Nevertheless, these needs are referred to God precisely because his desire and hope and faith are in Him. 3 Whatever gloom may shade his soul, God Himself is unchangeable light; moreover, His truth must prevail over all misleading tendencies. Consequently God will surely remove the existing barriers both within and without which hinder him from going up to Mt. Zion. 4 But his desire is not for the place, except in so far as it houses the altar of God, which affords access, through the blood of its sacrifices, to God in whom alone is all his satisfaction (lit. 'the God of the joy of my exultation'). 5 This anticipation of unhindered fellowship with God, who is the delight and source of all his joy, introduces the final refrain, unchanged in words but possibly transformed in tone. Faith's rebuke to dejection (42:5) and faith's exhortation in bewilderment (42:11) become faith's triumphant declaration of certainty (43:5).

PSALM 44. THE BEWILDERMENT OF A GODLY PEOPLE

This psalm is the first of several national poems in the Psalter. See, e.g., Pss. 83; 106. In each case the underlying motive is an intense desire to know God's ways and specially to see how His actions in human history can be justified. The usual view regarded national distress or disaster as the direct result of the people's wrongdoing. God responded to their national life by rewards and punishments, giving victory and prosperity at a time of godliness, and sending defeat and dearth when sinful practices dominated the nation. See, e.g., Jdg. 2:16–23; Ps. 106.

Ps. 44 is outstanding because it faces the problem of the sufferings of godly people (see vv. 17–22). 'Israel', as Eaton well says, 'is facing the fact that fidelity to God leads to the Cross.'

1–8 Material blessings enjoyed in the days of old

This review of the past first rehearses certain events (vv. 1–3) and then repeats the expression of faith (vv. 4–8) which accompanied and grew out of those events. Foremost in the nation's previous experience was the unique acquisition of the land of Canaan. In references to this event the emphasis was usually placed upon their deliverance from Egypt (e.g. Ps. 78:42–53); but here the settlement in Canaan is selected as a historical monument of divine activity not only because it was so amazingly accomplished (cf. Dt. 4:35–38) but because it was so obviously the antithesis of their present experience (see v. 11b).

1–3 There could be no mistaking God's aid in the days of old: weapons alone were no guarantee of success (cf. Pss. 20:7; 33:12, 16). 4–6 Their Lord was a 'man of war' (Ex. 15:3; note also Is. 59:16, 17); that was why they had power to crush all opposition. 7, 8 These memories of triumph are rooted in a God who is still the same, and in whose people's hearts the same triumphant boast throbs as of old. The present tenses of vv. 4–8 thus prepare for the unforeseeable and inexplicable contrast of the following verses.

9–16 The profound dishonour of the present condition

9 The word Yet introduces tremendous contradiction. Their King and God has cast off His people and repudiated His connection with them, or so it would appear (cf. Pss. 43:2; 89:38). Their armies have gone to battle and the Lord has held back. 10 They are perplexed and at a loss, their enemies despoil them at their pleasure, and 11 the people of the Lord are as helpless as sheep. 12 It looks as though God has given them away, or sold them virtually for nothing. 13, 14 Certainly He has gained no prestige for Himself among the nations. 15, 16 In short, the people of God are humiliated and utterly crestfallen because of the inescapable mockery of men who blaspheme and say 'the promises of the Lord your God are obviously worthless'. Their experience is, in fact, the national counterpart of 42:3, 10.

17–22 The unmerited nature of this experience

17, 18 The sting of all this arises from a lack of any sense of guilt on their part. If they had fallen away from God (cf. Ps. 16) or been disobedient to the covenant (cf. Dt. 28:15ff.), then their plight would be understandable. But the national conscience is clear, and yet 19 their country is devastated so that it looks like the dreary haunts of jackals (cf. Is. 34:13). 20, 21 There is here a sincere conviction that the trend of national life and policy was without fault before God; and after all, He should know if this was falsely said. 22 Indeed it would appear that the attack upon their national existence can be explained only as being for thy sake, i.e. either 'for some inscrutable reason which makes sense only to God' (cf. Ps. 23:3b), or 'because we are Thy people and are hated for it' (cf. 1 Jn. 3:13). This insight into the discipline of godliness is taken as axiomatic in the NT (cf. Mt. 5:11; Jn. 15:20, 25; Acts 14:22; Rom. 8:36; 2 Tim. 3:12).

23–26 The urgent need of divine aid

The pressure of circumstances makes itself felt above any consolation afforded by the great truth just expressed (v. 22), and 23, 24 voices its plight in the daring pictures of God, as asleep, in hiding and forgetful, by which the call for help is made. How outspoken God allows us to be! 25 And with what patience He allows us to plead our necessities as the basis on which prayer is made, 26 though, as ever, the resting-place of faith is, finally, His steadfast love.

PSALM 45. A ROYAL WEDDING SONG

This song of a royal marriage was almost certainly prompted by the ceremony of a Hebrew king marrying a foreign princess. The identity of the king is uncertain, for his warlike activities (vv. 3, 5) hardly befit Solomon (cf. 1 Ki. 3:1), and his devout character (vv. 6, 7) is not in keeping with Ahab—at least, not after his marriage with Jezebel (1 Ki. 16:31).

The song was included in the Psalter because it illustrated an idea which is frequently used in Scripture, viz. that the human marriage relationship is an echo, or at least an allegory, of the covenant relationship between God and His people. This same basic idea is carried over into the NT where the church is described as the Bride of Christ (see 2 Cor. 11:2; Eph. 5:31, 32; cf. Mt. 22:2ff.; 25:1ff.; Rev. 19:6–9).

1 Introduction

The author describes his irrepressible desire to speak of something particularly fine and good, his feelings of appreciative delight on behalf of the king are literally 'bubbling over' and he senses that the eloquence of his pen will be in keeping with so glorious a theme.

2–9 In praise of the royal bridegroom

The description of the king opens with an intimate insight into his personal relationship with God (v. 2), which is no quiescent pietism but issues in active campaigning for truth and right

(vv. 3–5). In explanation of the victory which has been accorded to the king, it is stated that his devotion to righteousness has been rewarded by a divine act of exaltation (vv. 6, 7), which has left him without equal. His exalted status is finally displayed by reference to the fragrance and joy of his circumstances (v. 8), and the fact that the ladies of his entourage are royal in their own right (v. 9), eloquent of the prestige in which neighbouring states hold him. It is no wonder that this eulogy of the Davidic king was seen to be prophetic of Him who alone merits its full meaning (Heb. 1:8, 9).

2 The king's lips give the primary evidence of what he is, and such is the impression created by hearing him (cf. Jn. 6:68; 7:46) that the psalmist says therefore, i.e. 'by this we see that' behind it lies an eternal blessing of divine grace. 4, 5 The spread of Messiah's kingdom is often seen in the OT in terms of conquest (Ps. 110:5–7; Is. 11:12–16), but, as here, the emphasis is not on territorial expansion but on the warfare of the truth. 6, 7 The translation your divine throne (which is possible but not the most intrinsically likely) expresses the notion that the Davidic king is God's vicegerent, ruling in His name (1 Ch. 28:5; 29:23). We should, however, rather read 'Your throne, O God' (cf. RV), allowing the verse to partake of that tension which belongs to the OT view of the Messiah whereby there is a clear suggestion of divinity, while at the same time God can be called your God in speaking to Him (cf. Is. 9:6, 7; and see NBD, art. 'Messiah').

10–17 In praise of the bride

10, 11 The change of subject is intimated by an appeal to the bride. She is exhorted to a loyalty to her husband which supersedes all former loyalties, and is given the reassuring hint that this will be no arduous task because of the ardent devotion which he will bestow on her. 12, 13 Furthermore, to her will come an ingathering of suppliant pagan nations, bringing their resources. The poem speaks of her waiting within the palace, resplendently dressed in her bridal array, 14, 15 whence she will be led to the king in many-coloured robes, accompanied by her bridesmaids and with joyful music. The exactness of the portraiture of Christ and the church, coupled with the incorporation of the Gentiles, could hardly be improved.

16, 17 The remaining words about the future are addressed to the king, as is implied in v. 17. There will be an abundant offspring, royal as their father is royal. But the lasting praise of the ongoing generations and the ingathered peoples will be his alone.

PSALM 46. A SAFE STRONGHOLD IS OUR GOD

This is the first of a group of three poems which have a common theme. God is extolled and adored because He has brought His people through a great crisis which had threatened to become a national calamity.

Two interpretations are suggested. The older view associated the deliverance with the invasion of Sennacherib (2 Ki. 18; 19). The newer view links the psalm with the suggested annual Temple ritual in which the Davidic king was shown in all his human helplessness to be at the mercy of the powers of earth, until the Lord intervened to save him and destroy his foes. Such a dramatized ritual would serve to keep fresh the nature of kingship in Israel. Since both interpretations are hypothetical, the psalm offers an excellent field in which to try out their respective merits.

1–3 Firm anchorage in God while all else is insecure

The emphasis here is on external change. Metaphorically the opposing kings are seen as cosmic forces of destruction threatening the whole fabric of the ordered world of creation. But against all this, says the psalmist, 'God is ours (or, on our side), a refuge and strength, proving Himself an abundant help in troubles of every sort.'

4–7 Joyful assurance in the impregnable city of God

The emphasis here is on internal resources, especially upon the security which ensures serenity even though outward powers rage and threaten. 4 The source of this inward strength is pictured as a stream of quiet content (Ps. 23:2; Is. 33:21; 58:11), as the river of Paradise (Gn. 2:10), symbolic of God's living presence as the following verses depict it. The Hebrew, however, is abrupt, and the word river may be meant to point back to the foaming waters of v. 3: no matter what rage and fury is evident in the world, all is so controlled by the sovereign God that it becomes a fair stream for the benefit of His city and people. 5–7 Either of the foregoing interpretations lead well into these verses, stressing as they do the presence of God with His own, and the immediate effective control of God over the whole earth.

8–11 A call to consider the works of the Lord

8 The inference from the crisis must be plain to all peoples. Surely no nation could doubt that the Lord had done astonishing deeds. The rout of the enemy—whether a historical, political foe or a cosmic and spiritual one—was beyond dispute. Yet, greater than the event was the divine power which moulded it, and in the cessation of this campaign the psalmist catches a glimpse of the future inauguration of undisturbed peace, 9 when all implements of warfare will be destroyed (cf. Is. 2:4; 9:5). 10 The moral of the psalm is plain: because the Lord is God, let all men cease their efforts to usurp His sovereignty. 11 Note that the refrain in vv. 7 and 11 is threefold: the Lord of hosts is His title of divine power, the God of Jacob is His title of a covenant relationship, and God is with us is His name Immanuel (cf. Rom. 8:31).

PSALM 47. OUR GOD IS THE EXALTED KING

This festive hymn elaborates the words 'I am exalted in the earth' which occur at the end of the previous psalm. The main concept is that God, having come down from heaven in power and great might to deliver His people, is now returning to His throne. Such an assumption of dignity and power calls for public acclamation, not only on the part of His people Israel, but also by all the nations (cf. Ps. 66:1–7).

The poem, therefore, has two themes closely interwoven. 1 The first is a call to the peoples of the earth, regarded as assembled to acclaim Yahweh as King, to clap hands and shout, 5 to blow upon the horns and trumpets, 6 to sing psalms of praise, indeed to sing them incessantly and 7 with understanding (see mg.).

The second theme is a description of the majesty of God, who is the cause of their rejoicing. There are three phases. 2, 3 First, the Lord who controls the affairs of men is our King. The Most High inspires us with awe and none in all the earth can withstand Him. 4 He it is who chooses Canaan for our inheritance and we are proud of this token of His love toward us. 8 Secondly, the ascended Lord is our King. Indeed, in this aspect too He is the King of all the earth (cf. Je. 10:6–8; 1 Tim. 1:17; 6:15, 16); and as He has demonstrated His rule in the nature of recent events, He now openly resumes His seat of supreme and holy power. 9 Thirdly, the enthroned Lord is the supreme Sovereign. Because He is thus exalted, there must ultimately be a gathering together of all peoples, represented by their princes, as His people. Abraham will be the father of a multitude of nations and the heir of the world (cf. Rom. 4:16; Gal. 3:7, 14, 29). To God belong all the shields of office; i.e. all rightful authority wielded by kings and governors. Thus He is exalted beyond all (cf. 1 Cor. 15:24–28).

PSALM 48. REJOICE, FOR THE LORD IS IN MOUNT ZION

The first poem in this group celebrated the nation's deliverance from peril; the second extolled the power and majesty of Him who wrought their salvation; this third poem describes the glory of the city which God has so marvellously preserved. The Hebrew word translated 'greatly' in v. 1 is found also in 46:1 ('very') and 47:9 ('highly'). It is one of the incidental links between these psalms. God greatly helps, is greatly to be exalted, and is greatly to be praised.

1–3 The city of God extolled

Just as the Lord is highly to be praised because He is King of all the earth (47:6, 7), so is His city worthy of all honour. Jerusalem was regarded as incomparable in situation (cf. Ps. 50:2; La. 2:15). Heathen nations situated the mountain of the gods in the far north (cf. Is. 14:13f.). By thus placing Zion in the far north, the psalmist subtly claims sole and ruling deity for his God.

4–8 Attackers dismayed and repulsed

4 Even though a league of kings assembled together to besiege the city, 5 yet when they saw its strength they lost heart, became confused, and turned away in panic. 6 The sudden onset of their terror is symbolized by the vivid picture of labour in childbirth, 7 and the greatness of the divine power which induced it by reference to the mighty forces of the wind against which even the ships of Tarshish, the greatest of the ancient ships, were helpless.

8 The people's praise is evoked by their witness of God's power. Even as they had heard of God's mighty acts in their fathers' days, so had they seen His hand in Jerusalem's recent history, or, as some hold (Weiser, Eaton, Johnson), in the festival ritual dramatized in the Temple. This seemed to guarantee the city's preservation for ever. Such words were in later years too readily stripped of their spiritual significance. They became the foundation of the fanaticism of the city's religious leaders when Nebuchadrezzar's army besieged it. The real citadel was the heart that trusted in God (cf. Je. 1:18f.).

9–14 A meditation of God's loving-kindness

Since the threat of destruction was removed, the beloved city has been viewed with fresh delight. But behind this affection for Jerusalem there is a deep love for the Lord of the city. When the inhabitants enter into the Temple they know that the loving-kindness of the Lord is more to be contemplated than are the outward forms, such as the number of the city's battlemented towers. Upon such a God, upon Him and none other, they will rely.

9 could be translated 'we have portrayed', with reference to the Temple drama. 11 The daughters of Judah are the neighbouring and dependent townships delivered in the deliverance of the capital city. 12 The invitation to number ('count') her towers looks back to the frightful threat to which the city had been exposed and from which it has come entirely unscathed. 14 Our guide for ever arises from one emendation of the Hebrew, but a much lesser change gives 'unto (or 'against', or 'beyond') death', and is to be preferred (cf. RV).

PSALM 49. DEATH DISCLOSES A MAN'S TRUE WORTH

This psalm belongs to the class of 'wisdom' writings, not so much because of literary style, which is in a standard poetical form, but because of its content. It tackles the sort of problem beloved of the authors of Job and Proverbs, namely what is the attitude of the godly man to life's inequalities.

1–4 Introduction

The opening verses are introductory, and have typical 'wisdom' emphases: a universal appeal (vv. 1, 2), the offer of a practical solution to the problem to be proposed (vv. 3, 4).

3 The words wisdom and understanding are both plural in the Hebrew, signifying the promise of wisdom in full and plenty. There will be no superficiality in the handling of the problem, but a complete solution. 4 The source of this teaching is claimed to be revelation: I will incline my ear, i.e. to hear God's answer.

5, 6 The problem

Whether recording an actual experience or imaginatively placing himself in a typical situation, the psalmist faces the fears of a man against whom blatant materialists of considerable resources have set themselves. While the interrogative form of these verses suggests that such fears are groundless, the question itself is of great practical importance (cf. Jas. 2:6, 7) and the purpose of the psalmist is to provide us with such truths as will steer us safely through such a storm.

7–12 The answer: Part 1

There is a limit to the power of money. 7–9 Such trust in wealth as v. 6 indicated will take a man far in this world, but it cannot buy God off when death comes. Ransom and price are the stock words of the doctrine of redemption in both Testaments. Note carefully therefore how they involve here the payment of a substitutionary price. 10 All alike die, 11 and the eternal habitation of the grave is the reply to those who sought to perpetuate themselves by giving their names to great estates. 12 In respect of the mere fact of death, man and beast are precisely equal. In his pomp, probably 'in spite of his dignity', referring to the many glories of humanity above the beasts. Thus death the leveller gives perspective to life's inequalities, but only a partial answer to life's problems. For seeing that the wise also die (v. 10), it is cold comfort indeed to say to one oppressed by opulent neighbours that all will one day be solved by the equality of the grave.

13–15 The answer: Part 2

The real wisdom of the psalmist is to pierce beyond death and to show that the equality in which men come to the grave leads to vividly contrasting eternal destinies. 13, 14 The Hebrew text is difficult. RSV and RV represent the main lines of approach, which make it clear that while details are obscure the main thrust of the verses is unequivocal. On the one hand are the men whose foolish confidence was exposed in v. 6. Like the rich man of the parable, they had their good things in their portion here on earth (cf. Lk. 16:25a), but beyond the grave they are helpless as sheep, destined for Sheol, the abode of the dead, committed to the care of a shepherd named Death, arriving at this destination without any intermediate state or second chance, knowing from henceforth only a greatly diminished existence in a very undesirable home. 15 On the other hand there is the emphatic But. In contrast to man's inability to find his own ransom price (cf. vv. 7, 8), God provides the ransom price which destroys Sheol's power to retain the soul, and takes the ransomed one to Himself. The verb receive almost has the status of a technical term for God's taking of a person to Himself in glory (cf. Gn. 5:24; 2 Ki. 2:9; Ps. 73:24). Thus the psalm, taken in its straightforward sense, teaches that the inequalities of life can finally be faced in the light of the blissful redemption which God provides for His own and the contrasting fate of those who preferred alternative objects of faith. Here, as Weiser says, 'is the hope of faith that reaches beyond death and in doing so overcomes death spiritually'.

16–20 The practical lesson

The knowledge of the doom of the ungodly in Sheol removes all lustre from his wealth in this world. 17 The glory here is outdone 19 by the darkness there. 20 RSV has made this verse identical with v. 12 by removing the words translated in RV 'and understandeth not'. If for all his dignity man does not understand the eternal issues of life and the way of salvation, then indeed what is his dignity worth (Mt. 16:26a)?

PSALM 50. MAN IMPEACHED AT HEAVEN'S COURT

1–6 Introduction

1 The impressive opening phrase, The Mighty One, God the Lord ('ēl 'ĕlōhîm Yahweh), is intended to evoke the solemnity and awe proper to the psalm's theme of a Great Assize. The threefold name represents God as the Almighty One, God in the fullness of His Deity, and God as the eternal and gracious One who has made a covenant with His people (cf. Jos. 22:22). This God has uttered His voice and summoned all earth's inhabitants to attend His tribunal, to witness the judgment of His people. 2 The summons emanates from Zion and is accompanied by the light of His truth (cf. Ps. 80:3; 2 Cor. 4:6; 1 Jn. 1:5). 3 First His word is heard, then His light is seen, and now the poet sees as in a vision the coming of God Himself, whose approach is described in terms of lightning and tempest. 4 The heavens and the earth are summoned to appear at the Assize as witnesses, for they have been the witnesses of all that has transpired (cf. Jos. 24:27). 5 God now calls for the party who is to be arraigned, the people with whom He had a covenant, renewed on their part by each succeeding generation, and ratified from the first by sacrifice (Ex. 24:3–8). 6 The proceedings open with a testimony by one of the witnesses to the righteousness of the divine judge.

7–15 God speaks to His people

7 His word to Israel is one of admonition. He speaks to them as their own God. 8 His accusation is not that they have been guilty of negligence in the ritual of sacrifices; that duty has been regularly performed. 9–13 His charge concerns their motives. They have offered their beasts to Him as though He had immediate need of them and must therefore feel grateful for their generosity. God declares the absurdity of such a view of worship; all man's possessions, all nature in fact, belong to Him. He would be less likely to ask them for food than the ocean would be to ask its fishes for water. As if God needed meat like a man! 14 True worship does not consist in the offering up of the dead flesh of beasts, but in the personal response of thanksgiving (couched in the appropriate sacrifice) and dedicated faithfulness with God (cf. Ec. 5:4, 5), 15 coupled with a confident casting of oneself upon God leading to the experience of His help, with consequent praise.

16–23 God speaks to the wicked

16, 17 This stern denunciation is directed against those who speak of God's laws but do not keep them (cf. Mt. 7:21–23), i.e. men who resent moral discipline and repudiate God's commandments; 18 men who delight in the fellowship of thieves, condone sexual licence, 19 tolerate in themselves an uncontrolled, foul and lying tongue, 20 and even betray those to whom they are bound in blood-brotherhood. 21 God's patience they regard as weakness, and His forbearance, which would give them opportunity to repent, is construed as indifference or even acquiescence. Their casual assumption that God must be as lawless, fraudulent and faithless as themselves will be utterly demolished. Their every deed will be brought before them and its consequences upon their own selves will be shown.

22 You who forget God. Cf. Je. 13:25; Ezk. 22:12. The poem concludes with a terrible warning to such godless people (cf. Jude 15) and also 23 with the offer of salvation to those who relate their lives Godward in gratitude and obedience. The whole of this section serves as a basis for Rom. 1:18–32; 3:21–25.

PSALM 51. A PENITENT'S PRAYER

The explicit statement in the title associates this psalm with 2 Sa. 12:1–13. As an expression of a heart overwhelmed by shame, humbled and broken by guiltiness, and yet saved from despair through penitential faith in the mercy of God, this poem is unsurpassed.

1–8 Conviction of sin

It is necessary to remember that, immediately David made confession of his sin, Nathan declared the forgiveness of the Lord. David is aware, therefore, of the wonder and immediacy of mercy and of an exceeding great and precious promise of pardon for a very great wrong (2 Sa. 12:13); but he cannot rest in this until full and heartfelt confession has been made, and this is the function of the poem. David's conviction of sin is dominated by four themes.

A sense of personal accountability. Note the frequency of my iniquity, my transgressions, my sin. There is no evasion of responsibility here on the grounds of chance circumstance or an instinctive urge; no blaming of ignorance, necessity or evil agency; no attempt to make Bathsheba share the guilt of adultery and murder. The wrong which has been done is David's responsibility and he exhausts the OT vocabulary of sin to express it (cf. on Ps. 32:5). His depth of conviction is stressed in the words my sin is ever before me (v. 3).

A conviction of having turned against God. Irrespective of Bathsheba and Uriah, his action ultimately was against God. Against thee, thee only, have I sinned (v. 4). The psalmist now makes unreserved confession of his guilt so that when God pronounces judgment upon the sinner He may be innocent of any insinuation of caprice, harshness or bias.

A plea for complete cleansing from sin. The phrases are massed together in vehemence and fervour. Blot out (v. 1); i.e. 'wipe off', as writing is erased (Ex. 32:32), or as water from a dish (2 Ki. 21:13). Wash me thoroughly (v. 2) is a launderer's word. Sin is seen as deeply ingrained in life's fabric and needing intensive treatment; i.e. bleach away the stain. Cleanse me (v. 2), as a leper is declared pure by washing (Lv. 14:8, 9), which cancels his religious defilement and restores him to God's fellowship.

A casting of himself upon God who alone can save him. This has been his implied attitude throughout: against God he had sinned, and to God alone he supplicates. But now this truth becomes explicit. In vv. 5, 6, linked by the repeated Behold, he confesses the true depth of his sinfulness as being the natural state of man from birth, and acknowledges the immensity of God's standards and requirements, an inward being and secret heart conformed to His truth. Only God can supply the necessary purging (v. 7), and only God can accomplish total restoration of soul and body from the damage of sin (v. 8).

5 It is not the act of conception or the process of birth which is here deemed sinful, but rather that were one to trace David's personal history back to the moment in which his mother travailed to give him birth, and beyond that to the very instant of conception, he was marred by sinfulness. This is the OT's greatest statement of the doctrine of original sin, and it is not pleaded as an excuse but called as a witness to the depth and extent of man's need as a sinner. 7 Hyssop was used to apply the blood of sacrifice (Ex. 12:22). The man who in v. 16 confesses that he knows of no sacrifice which God would accept for his sin, here looks to God in the confidence that some such sacrifice is known to Him and that He will apply its saving efficacy.

9–14 Distress, and a longing for holiness

9–11 The additional concept of sin as separation from God is now introduced with its twofold emphasis upon distress at the possibility of being severed from God for ever and deprived of His Holy Spirit, and a craving for moral health, a cleansed record, a new heart and a steadfast spirit (see mg.). He realizes that when any man sins it is not merely an action against God, but it leads the man himself away in the direction of outer darkness and disgrace. That is the selfish misery of hell.

Penitence implies the dispossession of sinful desires, and the psalmist now expands the positive aspect of his experience. 12 He pleads for a restoration of joy toward God of which he had been robbed by sin, and for an unfettered spirit that shall be ever willing to do right. 13 If he is granted these things, he will be so relieved and transformed that other sinners can be convincingly urged likewise to turn in repentance unto such a gracious God. This verse completes the psalmist's prayer. 14 Why then does he reopen the confession and mention the specific sin of bloodguiltiness? There is no explanation of this break in the ordered structure of the psalm unless we accept the heading as true: David cannot rest content until he has spread all his sin before God. There is no confession unless there is detailed confession, and we see in v. 14 the agony of remorse over his complicity in killing Uriah (2 Sa. 12:9).

15–19 True worship

The psalm ends by looking forward to acceptable personal praise of God grounded upon repentance (vv. 15–17), and the corporate worship of a community which God has blessed and made secure (vv. 18, 19). 16, 17 These verses do not deny the principle and practice of sacrifice. No sacrifice was prescribed in the law for adultery and murder, and therefore none could be offered. David could only rely on God's wisdom to provide such a sacrifice (see on v. 7) and himself bring that contrite spirit without which all sacrifice for sin is ineffectual. 18, 19 are not best understood as a post-exilic addition making an individual psalm suitable for corporate worship. The sin of a king threatened his whole people (cf. 2 Sa. 24). David's adultery and murder are here seen as having undermined the walls of Jerusalem. In his own restoration he pleads for the restoration of his people to favour (v. 18a), security (v. 18b), and fellowship with God (v. 19).

PSALM 52. THE DOOM AWAITING A POWERFUL AND WICKED MAN

This is one of eight psalms which are associated by their titles with David's experiences as an exile from Saul. The others are Pss. 7 (concerning Cush); 59 (Saul seeks to kill David); 56 (David goes to the Philistines at Gath); 34 (David at the court of Abimelech); 57 (he flees to the cave of Adullam); 142 (a prayer in the cave); 54 (David is almost betrayed by the people of Ziph). Ps. 52 is one of the earlier poems. It relates to David's flight to the tabernacle at Nob. The help given him by Ahimelech the priest was reported to Saul (1 Sa. 21:1–9; 22:9–23). This psalm is an expression of David's righteous indignation at Doeg's betrayal.

1–3 The mighty man of mischief and his words

The opening words are vehement, sarcastic and contemptuous. Doeg is not worthy of being named. He is a boaster, one who not only does evil but takes pride in it. He spends his life in antagonism to the enduring mercy of God. He is deceitful, slanderous and false, using his tongue as his principal weapon (cf. Pss. 7:14–16; 10:3–11). Throughout the psalm, the tongue is offered as primary evidence of character. As a man speaks, so he is. The parallelism of v. 3 is therefore significant: the love of evil displays itself in a lying tongue. Contrast Ps. 34:11–14.

4, 5 His certain undoing

There is an automatic divine reaction which RSV rather conceals by But God. Better 'God likewise' (see RV) or 'God on His part'. This doom is vividly expressed as, in turn, demolition, utter removal, uprooting.

6, 7 The comment of the righteous

The obvious retribution meted out to Doeg would fill all righteous men with fear and also with satisfaction at the evident vindication of righteousness. There is no need to read any personal vindictiveness, or mood of retaliation, into this; cf. Jb. 31:29. Godly men will turn to each other and comment upon the flimsiness of all life which trusts in temporal power and evil purposes. There is a play here on v. 1, as if to say 'Lo, this wreck is the mighty man who made not God his stronghold'.

8, 9 The psalmist's enduring devotion

In contrast to the fate of the wicked, David sees himself as a flourishing leafy olive tree (cf. Ps. 1:3). This destruction of the wicked and permanence of the righteous arise from the character of God, in whose steadfast love David trusted. Cf. Ps. 34:15, 16.

In the context of this trust, three further marks appear in his life: gratitude, because God has intervened for him; testimony to the loveliness of his God's character; and fellowship with the people of God.

PSALM 53. OPPRESSION, PAST AND PRESENT

This is a revised version of Ps. 14, where see notes. Its two chief differences are, first, the alteration of the name Yahweh, which occurred four times in the earlier poem, and the use of 'ĕlōhîm in each of the seven references to the Deity. Whatever the reasons behind this change it suggests a more universal scope for the poem than was implied in the former covenant-title of Yahweh, which was exclusively for Israel. Second, the fifth verse of Ps. 14 has been completely rewritten, a fact which suggests a phenomenal deliverance of the nation since the composition of the earlier poem. This may have been the collapse of the Ammonite league (2 Ch. 20:22–24), or, more probably, the supernatural panic of the Syrian army (2 Ki. 7:6, 7).

PSALM 54. GOD IS THE UPHOLDER OF MY SOUL

Soon after David had been joined at Keilah by Abiathar, who had escaped Doeg's massacre at Nob (Ps. 52), he heard that Saul was advancing upon the town to besiege it. Although David had rescued the town from the Philistines, he was warned of the unreliability of the inhabitants, so he and his men fled eastwards before Saul arrived (see 1 Sa. 23:5, 6 and 13). They took refuge in the wild and wooded hills south of Hebron, but their presence was betrayed to Saul by men of the adjoining township of Ziph (1 Sa. 23:19). According to the title, this psalm expresses David's reaction to the animosity of the Ziphites.

1–3 A plea for help

The ever-present characteristic of the Psalms is here: in the face of adversity, resort to prayer. Deliverance is sought by thy name, i.e. on the grounds of the divine character as protector of the oppressed, and also by means of the manifestation of His might. 3 not only describes David's enemies, but also diagnoses them. Towards him they are insolent (lit. 'seething'—whether with anger or pride) and ruthless, because of their attitude to God.

4, 5 A profession of faith

Unlike his foes, David could point to God as his source of help. Indeed, he had none other. The Lord was supremely the Helper and the Upholder (cf. Ps. 3:5; Is. 41:10; Jn. 14:16–18). Hence it is certain that He will take action to counter the wrong done to David.

6, 7 A promise of gratitude

When David shall have been saved by the name of the Lord (v. 1), he will gladly and freely express his gratitude to that name. In the sincerity of his Godward trust he envisages his defeated enemies and tastes even now of that deliverance which 'He' (or it, i.e. the good name) will bring about (cf. Is. 30:27). The past tenses (v. 7) express the confidence that the Lord will be as good as His name (cf. Ex. 14:30 – 15:2).

PSALM 55. BAFFLED AND BURDENED, BUT UPHELD

This is the expression of a heart which, deeply wounded by the faithlessness of a friend, turns to God in supplication and confidence. The deep hurt which his spirit has sustained is shown in the almost distracted way in which his poem leaps back and forth between faithless men and the faithful God. In the experience of the psalmist another contrast develops: that between the escapist tendencies of the oppressed man (vv. 6–8), and the genuine way of escape afforded by faith (v. 22).

1–8 Serious forebodings and the desire to escape

The way this supplication is framed indicates the craving for certainty. 1 Hide not thyself; cf. Ps. 27:4. 2, 3 The psalmist desires an open vision and an immediate reply from God, because he is so distraught. He cannot keep silent because of the suspense created by his suspicions, which have grown so rapidly as to be crushing and unbearable. Memories of a host of incidents, unheeded at the time, now suggest a network of evil schemes, and a barrage of malevolent plottings seems to be hurled at him. 4, 5 In such a mood he not only envisages the success of his enemies but has a presentiment of death by violent means.

6, 7 The pressure of events has now become so intolerable that the heart makes a desperate move to escape in fantasy. He would change his conditions altogether and become a dove, dwelling in quiet places remote from men, 8 struggling desperately to reach shelter and security amid a sudden storm. The urge to escape from reality is a perversion of a universal desire to be at rest. The motif of 'fleeing away' (from duty, discipline, or from God) is very evident in Scripture, and is a basic factor in man's endless restlessness and discontent. No-one yet found that an escape into the wilderness experience brought rest; rather is it found to be the realm of temptation.

9–15 A prayer for the destruction of the wicked

Agitated thoughts now turn in anger especially against one man, formerly almost as close a friend as a man might desire, who was evidently one of the chief antagonists. 9 The psalmist pleads with God to send among these schemers such a confusion of tongues and division of counsel as will make their work as unsuccessful as Babel (cf. 2 Sa. 15:34; 17:4; Gn. 11:7). 10, 11 imply sedition and corruption, both among the soldiers guarding the wall and among the shopkeepers in the streets. Some regard violence and strife (v. 9) as personified, and the pronoun they as referring to these forces. So also with mischief, and trouble . . . ruin . . . oppression and fraud. That kind of thing he could have borne; 12–14 what incurs his wrath is the treachery of a trusted friend, one of like status as himself, a frequent companion, one with whom the rich exchanges of understanding had been a pleasure, a man with whom he had known unity of heart as they worshipped God. 15 Let that intimacy be matched by the immediacy of divine judgment; let the ground swallow them all (cf. Nu. 16:30–33). We cannot rid our reading of this verse of a tone and sense of vindictiveness, but we need to beware of imputing our emotional reactions to others. The judgment of going down to Sheol alive is proper to those who rebel against leaders appointed by God. The psalmist, whether David or a Davidic king, looks here, as his clear allusion to the incident of Korah shows, not so much for personal vindication as for a divine sign of approbation upon his office as king.

16–23 Faith towards God

16 Unlike his enemies, David can call on God with assurance. 17 His incessant cries for help will be heard, his predicament resolved, 18 his dire peril (as in battle) remedied notwithstanding the number of his foes. 19 God, who is eternally enthroned as Judge of righteousness, shall come to his aid and humiliate his foes by His answer. 20 The psalmist's thoughts then revert to his false friend who moved in wickedness against those who were at peace with him and tore up the covenant of friendship between them. 21 His heart was actuated by malice, for all the suavity of his speech. His former words, interpreted now by his subsequent action, are like sword thrusts in the heart.

But neither escapism, regret, indignation or bitter disappointment can provide a satisfactory avenue of life amid the profound personal and civic upheaval. 22 The right course of action is declared at last. It consists of unburdening the heart's sickness and care, and placing all in the responsibility of the Lord. 23 This David is resolved to do, and thereby experiences the divine upholding of the heart itself (cf. 1 Pet. 5:7). The Lord watches over righteous persons and allows no fatal deflection to be evilly imposed upon their course. On the other hand wicked, false and murderous men shall never finish their days. Compare the experience of Paul in 2 Tim. 4:10, 11 and 17.

PSALM 56. 'IF GOD BE FOR ME, WHO CAN BE AGAINST ME?'

The title refers to David's first sojourn in Gath when he was evidently under some restraint (cf. 1 Sa. 21:13; 22:1). Ps. 34 was composed shortly after his escape from the Philistines, but Ps. 56 is expressive of his misgivings while actually in the hands of Achish.

The psalm's two parts are each followed by a refrain (vv. 4, 10 and 11), while vv. 12 and 13 form a brief conclusion.

1–4 Contrast and tension

1, 2 This exists between God and frail men (the Hebrew word signifies man as mortal); between One who is gracious (AV 'merciful') and many who all day long oppress him and trample upon him in their pride. 3, 4 This dilemma of soul leads to the paradox I am afraid . . . without a fear. The tension is eased not simply by the decision to trust, but by the realization that God's word will not fail.

5–11 The two watchers

David's life is set between 6 the men who watch his steps and 8 the God who counts his tossings. His stability in trouble depends on the choice made between these. 7 His decision is revealed in the plea that God's righteous wrath should overturn the haughty assumptions and pernicious words of the suspicious Philistines in a general judgment upon all ungodly peoples (cf. Ps. 7:6–9; Jude 14–16). 8 God knows all about his life of insecurity, and his tears, registered in heaven, are precious in God's sight. 9 Moreover, his prayers are not merely appreciated by God but are efficacious: This I know, that God is for me (cf. Rom. 8:31). 10, 11 Hence he is doubly sure of God's power and the Lord's faithfulness, and the refrain of v. 4 is amplified and strengthened.

12, 13 Conclusion

12 Finally he foresees, as if already present, a state of deliverance wherein he shall be carrying out his present vows of praise to God for his complete salvation. 13 Deliverance from death and preservation from falling will enable him always to walk before God in the light of life.

PSALM 57. NO DESPAIR IN SPITE OF PERIL

As indicated by the title, this psalm was composed soon after David's escape from Gath (see 1 Sa. 22:1) and it resembles the preceding psalm in both theme and style. Both begin with identical words (cf. AV), are in two parts each followed by a refrain (vv. 5 and 11), speak of similar perils (56:1, 2; 57:3), and express the same deep trust in God. Cf. 2 Cor. 4:7–11.

1–5 His plight and prayer

1 The imagery of a young bird instinctively seeking protection under its mother's wings is used in Pss. 17:8; 36:7; 91:4. Note the repetition of take refuge. This is the same mood of escape from calamities as in 55:6–8, but the movement is not away from God, but unto Him. 2 His prayer is directed to God Most High. 3 In this instance God will send forth his steadfast love and his faithfulness (cf. v. 10) and rescue him from his pursuers who would trample him down. This personification of divine attributes is but a striking way of saying that the steadfastly loving and faithful God will Himself come to the rescue. 4 The imminence of his peril is seen in the fact that the psalmist has to sleep in hidden places while those whose hearts are aflame with enmity, and who speak words that are as sharp weapons, are searching in that vicinity. This seems to be the meaning of v. 4. 5 The glory, for whose open display the refrain pleads, must in context be the steadfast love and faithfulness of God (cf. v. 3b). The same meaning is clear in vv. 10, 11.

6–11 His preservation and praise

6 The imagery of pursuit by wild beasts is replaced by that of men stealthily laying a trap for a hunted animal. The psalmist feels utterly despondent apart from trust in God, but his faith is so irrepressible and buoyant that he suddenly foresees the whole organization of evil recoiling upon his enemies. The wrong they do with the intention of harming the innocent is seen to encompass their own downfall (cf. Pss. 7:14–16; 9:15, 16). 7 Now, as often in psalms of supplication, there arises full assurance of heart and a glad spirit of thanksgiving. 8 The call, Awake, my soul! is an exhortation to the best and highest in himself, and the familiar instruments of praise are likewise bidden to rouse themselves from the night of their inactivity so that the dawn of the day of deliverance may be heralded with eager anticipation. 9 To balance these private devotions at daybreak there will be a later general thanksgiving among all the peoples. 10 The theme of praise in both cases will be the heavensent steadfast love and faithfulness (cf. v. 3b) which bring the realm of God to this earth. 11 Finally and supremely is the pre-eminence of God Himself far above all.

PSALM 58. 'THERE IS A GOD WHO JUDGES'

A passionate denunciation here of corruption masquerading as justice. The leading problem in this psalm is to decide the meaning of the address you gods (v. 1). Some doubt surrounds the very word itself, and it may be that RV is correct in its suggestion that human judges cannot do their work 'in silence'. But the translation you gods is the more widely supported. It might have reference to the (hypothetical) New Year Festival (see Introduction), one feature of which was the victory of Yahweh over all gods. Some therefore see Him here exercising His prerogative as Judge ,rebuking the false gods for their misleading of men, and including in His reproof their human tools (vv. 3–5). Others, more persuasively, urge that it is not impossible that human judges should receive the title 'gods' as an honorific. Cf. the interchangeable use of 'before God' and 'before the priests/judges' (Ex. 21:6; 22:8, 9; Dt. 17:8–13) and the coupling of God and the civil rulers in Ex. 22:28; Dt. 19:17, 18. In this case you gods means 'you who sit in God's place, exercising judgment'. Their malpractice is exposed in vv. 3–5. On either view, the remainder of the psalm from v. 6 is a plea that God will take the rule of earth into His own hands.

1–5 The indictment

No matter at what point the indictment begins, it soon clearly focuses on the human heart, giving us a clear view of a nature astray from God. 2 The wrong in the heart leads to the violence of the hands. 3 This inner perversion belongs with our humanity as such, infecting the unborn embryo and the new-born child. 4 It is a deadly poison, and 5 it is also intractable, deaf to all appeals or pressures.

6–9 The petition

The conviction of the accused is taken for granted, and the prosecutor pleads for a sentence which shall bring about the complete removal of such rulers from the earth. In a vivid series of pictures, each of which contains its own implied plea, he asks first 6 that they be rendered harmless and 7a vanish completely. 7b, 8a The second pair of pictures asks that they be shown up in their true colours, both in respect of their transiency and frailty, in spite of the bold show that they make, and then in respect of their essential evil. The third pair of pictures asks for their removal, 8b a removal so complete that it will be as if they had never been and 9 as instantaneous as the striking of the kindled flame on the pot.

10, 11 Conclusion

These verses express vehemently the profound satisfaction experienced by the righteous, i.e. the redeemed people of God, viewed by Him as righteous (see on Ps. 24:5), when evil is visibly crushed and removed. The language is figurative (cf. Rev. 19:13–18), but the aspiration is praiseworthy: that all other men should at last openly acknowledge the worth of righteousness (cf. Phil. 2:9–11) and confess the inescapable judgment of God.

PSALM 59. SAFEGUARDED AMIDST NIGHT'S LURKING TERROR

Although married to Saul's daughter, David was dogged by men commissioned by Saul to kill him (1 Sa. 19:1, 9–18). The content of the psalm agrees well with this ascription.

1–5 Invocation of divine aid

1, 2 The progression gives the sense of mounting alarm: those who at heart are enemies now rise up for action. From such, known to be those who work evil, the worst can be expected, 3 for they will stop at nothing, not even the taking of life. 4 David's innocency (which can be examined in the story in Samuel) gives him firm ground to plead for God's vindicating action. 5 God's intervention as Judge is based first on His omnipotent power as Lord God of hosts, His covenanted faithfulness to His people as God of Israel and His universal office as the One who in righteousness (cf. Gn. 18:25) will judge all the nations. We may understand this 'universalizing' of David's individual grief if we consider how in moments of private tribulation we groan for the second coming of Christ.

6–10 Description of a dangerous situation

6, 7 Like scavenger-dogs, David's enemies make the most of night's darkness, their inmost thought being that they are thus covered from all scrutiny, human and divine. 8, 9 By contrast with their confident prowling, David is already safe: mark the present tenses. These verses strikingly contrast his enemies' powerlessness against God (cf. Pss. 2:4; 37:13) with his own power in God, who gives him strength in his own person and the surrounding protection of a fortress. 10 It is notable that his confidence of divine empowering is here entirely related to the character of this personally-known God, who comes to meet David in his need clothed in his steadfast love.

11–13 A plea for judgment

David's plea to God for a visitation upon his would-be assassins is now shown to be free of vindictiveness. He is concerned for the imparting of a moral lesson to his people (v. 11), the just punishment of sin (v. 12), and a universal revelation of Israel's God (v. 13). 11 He does not ask for their swift destruction; his people would too soon forget that. Rather he asks that these enemies be somehow made a lasting exhibition of how God opposes sinners and judges them. The writing of the story in Scripture has been God's answer to this. 12 Once again the Psalms declare to us the deep seriousness of sins of speech. In David's mind this sin of their mouths is more worthy of mention than their subtle attempts to take his life.

14–17 Affirmation and confidence

14, 15 Parallel in content and spirit to vv. 6–10, he sees the desire of his foes go unsatisfied, 16, 17 while in the light of this experience his own joy and confidence in God are intensified.

PSALM 60. A LAMENT FOR DEFEAT

The title associates this psalm with David's war with Aram-naharaim (i.e. Mesopotamia) and Aram-Zobah (between Damascus and the Upper Euphrates). Cf. 2 Sa. 8:3–6. Apparently, while the war was being waged in the north-east, Edom and Moab invaded from the south. In this sudden crisis David recalled Joab to bring his forces to bear on the new threat. This psalm conveys the sense of national humiliation resulting from a wholly unforeseen military reverse.

1–4 The people lament a national disaster

1 In a typically biblical way, the psalmist regards God as responsible for every happening. Secondary causes, physical, strategical, cultural, etc., were not necessarily held to be significant. Hence this unexpected military reverse had struck a tremendous blow at the people's morale. 2 It was like an earthquake which rends strong buildings. 3 Divine action had led to defeat; both led to demoralization; the nation reeled as a man who has just drunk drugged wine (cf. Is. 51:17; Je. 25:15ff.). Their defeat was all the more demoralizing in that they believed themselves to be the people of the Lord, 4 under whose banner (cf. Ex. 17:15, 16) they would experience security. The heart of their problem and distress was thus that God's promises seemed to go unfulfilled.

5–12 The king seeks confirmation of a promise of victory

5 What is the reaction to an unkept divine promise? Turn the promise into prayer and plead it before God.

6–8 There is first the promise of God about Israel's dominion: the words are attributed to God. The promises themselves, epigrammatically expressed, may be explained as relating to tenure of the promised land, the special significance of the chosen people, and victory over surrounding foes. Thus Shechem, Ephraim and Judah represent the occupation of land west of Jordan, and Gilead and Manasseh the eastern occupation; Ephraim and Judah are the main constituent members of the people of God, and bear the marks of the helmet for strength, and the sceptre for rule; the surrounding countries are designated for subordinate roles, servile to God's people: Moab for bathing the feet, Edom, the lackey to whom the sandals are thrown, and Philistia, to provide the topic for a victory song.

9, 10 The promises have been quoted; now they will be pleaded. Man cannot fulfil the promises of God; if God does not keep them, they fall to the ground. 11 Nor can man even help if God withholds His help. All therefore depends on God, and all is summed up in the single plea, O grant us help. But it is the plea of faith. 12 notes that where human aid avails nothing, God can lead His people to victory, and the psalm concludes with a confident forecast of the victory He will win for His people.

PSALM 61. A PRAYER OF A DISTRAUGHT KING

There must have been many moments in the life of David—as of any other king or leader, then or now—when in the loneliness of his office he felt himself at the end of his tether (vv. 1, 2a), urgently needed a new sense of security (vv. 2b, 3), longed to get away from it all (vv. 4, 5), and found his resource in prayer and his true joy in his relationship with God (vv. 6, 7).

1, 2a This is an impassioned plea from a heart burdened by a sense of distance from God, to whom he must cry from the end of the earth, and of personal feebleness. 2b He craves for a realization of security unattainable by his own efforts, i.e. to be led 'to a rock that is too high for me' (cf. RV mg.), i.e. to which of himself he cannot attain. But what is this unattainable rock? 3 Nothing other than God Himself. 4 pleads for the hospitality extended to a guest or a refugee, and the motherly love of a bird, fluffing out her wings to house her young. Just as v. 3 supported the plea by appealing to God's nature, so now 5 recalls God's past acts. It probably looks back to the king's coronation day on which he made vows to God, and on which God gave him charge over 'the inheritance of the Lord' (cf. 1 Sa. 10:1; 2 Sa. 21:3; 1 Ki. 8:51). Will not the Lord who gave the responsibility give also the grace to bear it? 6 Being devoid of personal strength (cf. v. 2a), he can only continue if God prolong his kingship. 7 But mere prolongation in office is not enough: his desire is to live in God's favour and guarded by His emissaries (see on Ps. 57:3). 8 Those who truly pray know that the companion of intercession is dedication. Past vows (v. 5) are not enough.

PSALM 62. GOD ALONE IS MY REFUGE

This is a song of trust wherein the psalmist cannot find words sufficiently strong and significant to describe the absolute security and unalterable strength of God who is accessible to him (cf. Ps. 18:1, 2). Its two parts both deal with the action and reaction between godless and godly men; and are introduced by similar words (cf. vv. 1, 2 and 5, 6).

1–4 The two forces at work in David's life

1 On the one hand God is to David the sole basis and crown of life. God only is real, and in silence his soul waits unreservedly upon Him. It is not only that from God comes my salvation, but that 2 God is . . . my salvation. This relationship is the kingpost of his immediate existence, and though as mortal man he may be slightly displaced by external pressure (cf. 2 Cor. 4:8, 9), he knows that he will not be dislodged. 3 On the other hand men are doing their utmost to wreck his life: he describes them as rushing upon him with menaces and blows; they think he is about to crumple like a collapsing wall or a rickety fence. 4 Their sole concern is to thrust him down from his eminence or throne (contrast v. 2), and to that end they have pleasure only in lies and untruths speciously disguised (cf. 2 Sa. 15:2–6).

5–12 The ultimate resolution of the conflict

Observe the contrast between the vision of sense and the vision of faith. To the vision of sense David appears as a wall already about to fall (v. 3), to the eye of faith he is secure in a high tower built upon a rock (vv. 2, 6, 7). To the soul whose trust is wholly in God, time can bring only confirmation of his faith. 5, 6 Hence, in this second portion of the psalm, the fundamental principle of David's life (vv. 1, 2) is reaffirmed more strongly. Cf., e.g., not be greatly moved (v. 2) with not be shaken (v. 6). 7 The onslaught of his enemies (cf. v. 3) need not be a cause of anxiety, for his salvation and full regal honour rest altogether upon God. 8 Moreover David is confident that his loyal people also will be preserved if they commit their lives unto God. 9 On the other hand, mere men, of whatever social degree, if devoid of faith are devoid of stability (cf. Ps. 39:5, 11; Jas. 1:9–11; 4:14). 10 All reliance upon earthly possessions proves to be disappointing (cf. Pr. 11:28).

The psalm has been consistently forward-looking. It has asked what will be the outcome of life; which man has a future, the man of faith (1, 2, 5–7) or the man of falsehood (3, 4, 9, 10)? 11 A reiterated (and therefore sure, Gn. 41:32) word of God in the psalmist's experience has affirmed three things of God: His power, 12 steadfast love and exact justice. The outcome of life therefore is in His hands.

PSALM 63. GOD IS MY JOY

According to the title this psalm originated in David's experiences in the Wilderness of Judah. The essential value of the poem lies in its expression of continual fellowship with God even though the psalmist is cut off from the outward and visible means of grace, and surrounded by discomforts and perils.

1 Introduction

David's yearning for God was intensified by his keen sense of exclusion from the sanctuary in Jerusalem and his separation from the ark, the symbol of the divine presence (cf. 2 Sa. 15:25, 26). His soul's desire, and his bodily habit of attending worship, were both thwarted by circumstances (cf. Ps. 42:1). The surrounding wilderness of Judah had become a spiritual desert (cf. 2 Sa. 17:29).

2–4 An immutable relationship

2 Some interpret this verse as meaning that in the wilderness David was granted a vision of God no less clear and distinct than that which he had seen in the sanctuary, and causing him in the midst of his despondency to break out in an ecstasy of wonder, 'So I have looked upon thee in the sanctuary, beholding thy power and thy glory.' This would explain the sudden change from sadness to great joy. But the meaning rather is that his longing for communion with God was as strong as in those former days when he had been able to behold God's power and glory in the sanctuary. Where others might be driven by circumstances to cry out for bodily rest and refreshment, David's longings were for God. 3 But, in addition to this, he had lost his throne and kingdom, but he saw that God's steadfast love remained and was better than allelse.

5–8 A satisfying experience

Humanly speaking David's experiences were of deprivation and insecurity, but his experience of God is more than compensating. 5, 6 God is his sufficient sustenance, and 7, 8 his shelter. It was in the responsive acts of 6 thinking and meditating and 8 clinging that this spiritual abundance became his.

9–11 A stark contrast

9, 10 Seen in the light of God's favourable goodness to him, David's enemies must surely be destroyed, their souls going to the abode of the dead and their carcases, fallen in battle, will be the prey of jackals (cf. 2 Sa. 18:7f.). 11 But David, and, indeed, all who swear by God, i.e. acknowledge and obey Him, shall rejoice because of God's care and goodness (cf. Dt. 10:20).

PSALM 64. PLOT AND PUNISHMENT

A prayer that the schemes and plots of unscrupulous men, who seek to overthrow those who are upright and godly, shall not only be in vain, but shall entail the condemnation of such evil-doers.

1–6 Prayer for protection against plotters

1 The plea is for a deliverance from threatened peril and from the fear or terror of that threat, 2–4 for protection alike from the secret plottings of wicked men and from their open assaults. The condemnation of all looseness or idleness of speech, so frequent in the Scriptures, is here reinforced by an observation of the power of an ill-used tongue to hurt. 3 It is a sword, and its words like arrows. 5 Behind the tongue, and evidenced by it, lie the evil purpose and 6 the deep mind and heart of man, here revealed both as deceiving others with his cunningly conceived plot, and self-deceived in his supposed immunity from observation and enquiry (cf. 2 Tim. 3:13).

7–10 Assurance of divine retribution

The psalmist's faith now overcomes his previous apprehension. That which wicked men desire against the blameless shall prove to be their own undoing. 7 If they shoot arrows against him, God shall shower arrows upon them and wound them; 8 because by words they seek to entrap him, so shall their own tongue trip them up. 9 In such judgment all men shall recognize the work of God and reverence Him. 10 Moreover every godly person shall be glad in the Lord's watchfulness and solicitude for those that are upright in heart, and shall take refuge in Him.

PSALM 65. A SONG OF PRAISE FOR HARVEST

'To have God at one point', remarks Weiser, 'means to have him in all his fullness.' In this case, God's goodness in a bountiful harvest provides the thin end of the theological wedge, and before the psalm is over we have a full-orbed joy in our divine Saviour, Creator, Lord and Provider.

1–4 The forgiving God

1 The vows of OT religion were not techniques of putting pressure on God or of driving a bargain with Him. They were a recognition that prayer for His blessings must go hand in hand with consecration, and that thanksgiving can never be merely verbal and must receive concrete expression in lives and goods. Thus praise and vows are due to a bountiful God. 2, 3a But before there can be any effective approach for purposes of praise, there must be a meeting of the common need of all flesh for forgiveness. While the psalmist looks forward to the day when this blessing shall be experienced on a world-wide scale, 3b he and his people can now enter into the reality of forgiveness, 4 coupled with the blessings of fellowship with God and full spiritual satisfaction. Thus the worshipper becomes a priest, chosen to draw near to God (cf. Nu. 16:5), to abide in His courts, and find his highest aspirations satisfied in the good life of His house (cf. Ex. 19:6; 1 Pet. 2:9; Rev. 1:6).

5–8 The saving and ruling God

5 From the personal experience of salvation (vv. 3, 4), the psalmist naturally looks back to the great deeds of God whereby salvation was accomplished, the Exodus, the Passover and the blood of the lamb. Herein also he discerns a universal hope. Only the God who has saved Israel can save the world. 6 This belief is established by an appeal to God's world-wide activity of creation, 7 control of both natural and human forces, and 8 to the fact that it is His ordering of natural phenomena which provides world-wide fear and joy.

9–13 The providing God

The God who saves His people and rules His world has so graciously guided the programme of nature that the praise due to Him is finally presented in a burst of spontaneous and vivid praise for the beauty, richness and comfort afforded by the harvest of fields and flocks. The natural increase is attributed directly to the divine presence and working. (Note the repetition of the word Thou.) 9 It is the overflowing river of God which gives the former rain to enrich the prepared ground, and the latter rain to swell the grown crops. 12, 13 The whole countryside—upland grazings (the wilderness), hillside pastures encircling the cultivated land of the lower slopes, and even the meadows in the valley bottoms—all alike are rich, replete and rejoicing because of the goodness of God (cf. Ps. 96:12).

PSALM 66. A SONG OF DELIVERANCE

This psalm was obviously designed for public worship and to celebrate some national deliverance—such an occasion, e.g., as the overthrow of the Assyrian forces under Sennacherib.

1–12 Corporate worship

Note the world outlook of the psalm. 1 Such a call as this, addressed to all the earth, implies that the nation's experience of deliverance is of world-wide significance (cf. Ps. 47:1, 2). 2 This arises not from the preservation of God's people so much as from the disclosure of God's glorious being—the glory of his name—in and through historical events. Hence all peoples are exhorted to proclaim the divine nature in their praises. 3, 4 The sense would be easier if we translated v. 4 'Let all the earth . . .', understanding it as an implied prayer for that universal knowledge of God which provokes universal praise. 5 As a cause and stimulant of such praise all the earth is invited to come and see what God has done. 6 Foremost of His deeds hitherto is the deliverance of the children of Israel from Egypt, i.e. the dryshod crossing of the sea. There did we rejoice (see Ex. 15). It is noteworthy that throughout the Psalter no other historical event is viewed with as much awe and wonder as the Exodus (cf. Pss. 18:15–19; 68:7, 8; 74:13–15; 77:16–20; 78:13 and 52, 53; 89:7–10; 106:7–12; 136:10–15). 7 This song now affirms that God is ever the same; His rule is now as wide and His eye as watchful as always; therefore, let not the rebellious exalt themselves.

This last clause of v. 7 leads on 8 to a heartfelt hymn of thankfulness for a recent national deliverance which is regarded as being of international importance. 9 This adoration is called forth by the evidence of a present security (cf. Ps. 121:3; Jude 24). 10 Associated with their testimony of God's keeping power is a recognition of His moral purposes at work in national history (cf. Dt. 8:2–4). 11 To test them God had caused them to lose their freedom like fish in a net. Sore burdens had been laid upon them and 12a they had known defeat in battle. 12b But now, the God who appointed the crucible for their testing (cf. Mal. 3:2, 3) has brought them to spacious liberty.

13–20 Personal worship

This final portion of the song appears to be the testimony of the king, speaking in the person of the community. There are two phases. 13–15 First, he speaks to God on behalf of himself, as representative of the nation. During the previous emergency of threatened calamity he had made certain vows to God which were to be fulfilled when deliverance came. These vows are now being fulfilled, not grudgingly, but in full measure (cf. Ec. 5:4, 5; Rom. 12:1). 16–20 Then the king speaks to all godly men on behalf of God to the effect that prayer (I cried) mingled with praise (extolled) which springs from a pure heart and a good conscience had been and always would be heard and heeded. This basis of effectual prayer, i.e. a blameless heart, is a constant element in scriptural teaching (cf. Jb. 27:2–9; Is. 1:15–17; 59:1–3; Ezk. 14:2, 3; Jn. 9:31; 1 Jn. 3:21). 20 But beyond all human conditions which lead to answered prayer, there is that without which no words or works of men would avail: the steadfast love of God, His unchanging goodwill for His people (Mal. 3:6; Phil. 2:13).

PSALM 67. TO EARTH'S REMOTEST BOUNDS

The Feast of Tabernacles, binding together thanksgiving for God's saving and providing mercies to Israel (cf. Dt. 26:1–11) with the universal hope of His bountiful rule over the world (cf. Zc. 14:16), provides a good setting for this psalm, occupied as it is with exactly these themes. What God has done for Israel is symbolic of what He will do for the world; national blessings typify universal blessings.

1 is an echo of the priestly benediction in Nu. 6:24–26, and it may well be that this blessing was spoken by the high priest before the assembled people responded in the words of this psalm. 3 and 5 would then be refrains sung from the throats of the multitude with special emphasis, and the same words may have been repeated after v. 7 by the high priest as he concluded this extended benediction (cf. the double blessing in Lv. 9:22, 23). The psalm would thus consist of three short motets. 1, 2 Israel is shown as the mirror of God wherein all nations may behold Him. 4 All peoples are regarded as the Israel of God; they are radiantly happy because He judges them (in the sense of 'governs') and fully secure because He governs, or guides, them even as He ruled and led the chosen people through the wilderness. 6 is an acknowledgment of a bounteous harvest. In vv. 6, 7 has blessed is past continuous, 'has blessed time and time again'; the continuance of this favour towards Israel would give confidence to the prayer for world-wide reverence. The psalm thus becomes for the church a very apt expression of its missionary aspirations.

PSALM 68. A PROCESSIONAL HYMN

This is one of the most magnificent songs of triumph in the whole of the OT. Its dramatic commentary upon a memorable event, its wide perspective of thought and speech, its spirit of invincible faith in God, and its presentation of the historic past and the envisaged future, combine to make it an outstanding portion of the Psalter.

It was almost certainly written to celebrate the transference of the ark of the Lord from the house of Obed-edom to the new Tabernacle which David had prepared for it on Mt. Zion (cf. 2 Sa. 6:2–18) or, possibly, to celebrate an annual memorial of this great procession wherein Yahweh's Kingship would be vividly portrayed and praised. The psalm was constructed around the incident in such a manner as to convey a double teaching. First, the actual journey of the ark from its temporary resting-place to its final abode in Jerusalem is regarded as a dramatic reminiscence of the nation's journeyings from Egypt to Canaan. Secondly, the actual completion of this great historical movement, which was to acquire such profound significance, provides a unique opportunity to present a fundamental theological truth concerning God. The whole action, historical and symbolical, was a tapestry whereon the divine name might be discerned with increasing clarity, e.g. God (v. 1; 'ĕlōhîm), his name (v. 4; JAH), the Almighty (v. 14; 'el šadday), the Lord (v. 16; Yahweh), the Lord God (v. 18; Jah 'ĕlōhîm), the Lord (v. 19; 'ăḏōnāy), God, the Lord (v. 20; Yahweh 'ăḏōnāy).

1–18 The procession

1–3 The beginning. The ark is lifted from its resting-place and, because it was the pledge and symbol of God's presence with the people, its movement is a reflection of God's intervention. The scene is an echo of the wilderness experiences as recorded in Nu. 10:35 and Ex. 14:25. 2, 3 aptly recapture the experiences of the Exodus. God's enemies are as helpless before Him as smoke before the wind or as wax . . . before fire, while, on the other hand, the only part played by God's people is to rejoice in what He has done (Ex. 14:13, 14; 15:1–3).

4–10 The procession sets out. 4 As the ark with the attendant priests, king, and singers moves off along the route, the cry is heard 'Cast up a highway for him who rides through the deserts' (see mg.; cf. Is. 40:3; 62:10). The name of this potentate, before whom all obstructions must be removed, is JAH (cf. Ex. 15:2). The repetition of the phrase from v. 3, exult before him, suggests a further development of thought. The attention is turned from the route of the march to the personal character of God. 5 He is enthroned in heaven, his holy habitation, yet He is intimately aware of human needs: He is a father to orphans and the protector of the weak and lonely (cf. Ex. 22:22, 23; Jn. 14:18); He cares for the solitary and He delivers the oppressed. 6 He has especially blessed Israel in having brought them out of Egyptian bondage into comparative prosperity; on the other hand, the bodies of rebellious folk who could not enter in because of disbelief were left in a parched land (cf. Heb. 3:12, 19). 7–10 This brief allusion to the Exodus leads the psalmist to give a brief résumé of that inerasable memory which was now, in a very real sense, being relived.

11–18 The approach to the city. The ark had been sent back from the Philistines in a manner comparable with the release of the children of Israel by the Egyptians; the incident of Uzzah's death had been an echo of the dread and death of Sinai (cf. Ex. 19:12; 2 Sa. 6:6, 7). Now that the ark was approaching Jerusalem it was, in one sense, retraversing the route of the invasion and conquest of Canaan. This part of the chant consists at first of a series of disjointed sentences which seem to reproduce the shouts of the crowd. 11 There are the hosts of women that proclaim the tidings (RV; cf. Ex. 15:20); contrast the reference to the official singers in v. 25. Some cried one thing, some another; snatches of old war songs (vv. 12, 17), fragments of unpreserved psalms (v. 18), and festive folk songs (v. 13), possibly symbolizing times of prosperity; phrases from traditional forms of tribal challenge and response (vv. 13a, 14; cf. Jdg. 5:16a). All these are woven together so as to create a sense of pageantry enriched by memory, even as modern radio and TV documentaries evoke a certain frame of mind by a series of impressions swiftly and successively faded in and out. 13 The spoil, exemplified in the reference to the ornamental dove, is received by those who took no part in the fight—an apt recollection that the battle is the Lord's and the fruits are His people's. 14 When God dispersed the hostile kings referred to in this snatch, their flight was reminiscent of snowflakes driven by the wind against the dark wooded slopes of Zalmon (Jdg. 9:46–48). 15 The mountain of Bashan was probably the towering, snow-capped Mt. Hermon. 16 Honour, however, lies not in physical majesty but in spiritual dignity, and this the Lord has conferred on Mt. Zion alone.

The procession and its attendant crowd is really a shadow of a greater concourse converging upon the house of God. 17 His hosts are beyond numbers and the divine glory of the sanctuary of Zion is as real as the awe-full theophany upon Sinai. 18 Eventually, as the ark approaches the city gates (cf. Ps. 24), the capture of this strong and rebellious city is recalled (2 Sa. 5:6–10), and both events are seized upon as evidences of His irresistible purpose. All around Him bring their gifts. Even those who were rebellious are content that He, Yah 'ĕlōhîm, should dwell there.

19–35 The arrival

19–27 The procession ends. 19 As the ark moves on its way, it is not described as an object; it is recognized as a token and symbol of the Lord, the God who is our salvation. 20 Hence this fervent adoration of Him to whom belongs escape from death, and 21 who wields unquestioned power over all men guilty of defiance no matter how far they may flee in the endeavour to escape Him, 22 whether in distant Bashan, or on the sea-bed. 23, however gruesome its details, vividly assures God's people that victory will be His gift to them.

24 These thoughts concerning the invisible and irresistible God of righteousness are a fitting prelude to the disappearance of the ark into the sanctuary. 25 The priests, singers, minstrels, and the company of girls with timbrels have now passed out of sight, and the whole action of the procession from start to finish is seen to be symbolical of all God's glorious and inscrutable goings through Israel's history. In a sense, Israel has been the procession and the peoples of the earth have been the onlookers. 26, 27 introduce the hymn of praise sung by the concourse. This crowd includes all who have come from Israel's fountain, but they are specified under four significant names: from the southern tribes we have Benjamin, who provided Israel's first king (1 Sa. 9:1, 2), and royal Judah, David's tribe (1 Sa. 16:1; Heb. 7:14); and from the north Zebulun and Naphtali, possibly chosen because of their zeal in the Lord's cause (Jdg. 5:18).

28–31 The hymn of Israel. This is local and historical, dealing with Jerusalem and Egypt. 28, 29 Because God has been the source of national strength and coherence the people beseech Him, first, to continue to be so; 30 secondly, to rebuke Egypt—the beasts that dwell among the reeds—and to constrain the herd of bulls with the calves, i.e. the rulers of other peoples around Israel. Thirdly, they pray that God will scatter all potential enemies who would exact tribute from Israel and who, with this in mind, delight in war. 31 Fourthly, the prayer turns to seek the ever-widening extension of the Lord's rule over the world.

32–35 The hymn of all the earth. 32 The finale of praise swells out to include all earth's kingdoms, for the Lord is high, strong and mighty. 33 He rules the heavens and 34 His power is visible in the skies (cf. Ps. 19:1–6): 35 His works performed from His sanctuary in Israel arouse awe throughout the world. Let all men ascribe (i.e. 'testify') to His mighty power, and proclaim Him blessed because of His faithfulness.

PSALM 69. DESPAIR TRANSFORMED TO PRAISE

This psalm is a companion to Ps. 22; both deal with the theme of undeserved suffering which has been due in large part to a steadfast loyalty to God (cf. Pss. 35; 44; 109). The experience implied recalls the suffering of Jeremiah (cf. Je. 38:6). Note also the similarities with Lamentations (e.g., cf. v. 2 with La. 3:54; v. 12 with La. 3:14; v. 21 with La. 3:15). In vv. 33–36 there are a number of phrases which could be interpreted as references to the Exile and as expressing a longing for restoration.

The psalmist's thoughts move through four phases. His affliction is described, divine help is requested, retribution upon his enemies is desired, and the hope is expressed of deliverance for himself and all others like him. Note the many quotations of this psalm in the NT: e.g. v. 4 (Jn. 15:25); v. 9 (Jn. 2:17; Rom. 15:3); vv. 22, 23 (Rom. 11:9, 10); v. 25 (Acts 1:20).

1–12 Despair of himself

There are two parts in this section: the first is factual (vv. 1–6); the second is analytical (vv. 7–12). 1 The psalmist begins with a cry for help, and then describes himself as a drowning man (cf. Jon. 2:5), 2 as one who is bogged in a morass and as one who, crossing a ford, is suddenly swept downstream to deep pools by an unexpected rush of flood-water. 3 Moreover, he is beyond human help, for none has heard his cries, and now he steadily grows weaker. 4 The occasion of this calamity is rooted in the false and unjustified antagonism of his fellows. These have used their power to press upon him claims which are quite unwarranted; they have made him yield up things which he is wrongfully accused of having stolen. 5 This complaint carries no imputation of the psalmist's complete blamelessness: God knows the measure of his guiltiness, for no sins are hidden from Him. 6 Nevertheless he has sought to live an upright life and he foresees despair as taking hold of other godly men who will become discouraged if his urgent need receives no recognition and response from God.

7–12 Having stated the facts of the situation, and 8 adding only the new fact of the unnatural hostility of his own family, the psalmist proceeds to outline the conditions which preceded this perplexing development. Outstanding among these has been his personal allegiance to God. Reproach, separation, misunderstanding, tears, grief, ribaldry, and derision have been his lot simply because, 7 in his zeal for the honour of the God of Israel and 9 for God's house, he has subordinated all personal interests to the welfare and glory of that name. 8 People of all ranks of life, his brothers, 12 the civic elders as well as the dissolute, have scoffed at God and at him.

13–21 Dependence upon God

Nevertheless, and in this lies the anomaly of true faith, the psalmist's trust in God is unshaken. Shame has no power to weaken constancy (cf. Heb. 10:32ff.; 12:2), and all reproach would vanish if God so answered as to demonstrate the truth of His promised salvation. 13 The emphasis on as for me and thy faithful help (lit. 'the faithfulness of thy salvation'; cf. RV) is intended to echo the opening words of the psalm, Save me, O God, and serves to direct attention to the deliberate parallel between this portion of the psalm and the preceding one. 14 reflects v. 2; the earlier statement of an experience is changed into a prayer for a transforming action. The whole imagery of flood, mire and deep pool (vv. 1–3) is altered from its original sense of extremity and finality to that of a temporary and remediable situation. 15 Let God intervene and old values, meanings and possibilities, even the pit, will be done away; all will become new. 16 There is here an intentional contrast with v. 4. Both speak of that which is beyond counting, viz. the hairs of my head and thy abundant mercy, but whereas the former is a metaphor for those who hate me, the latter is descriptive of Him whose steadfast love is good. 17 The antithesis is continued in the thought of a servant before the face of his righteous master, and the memory of mighty ones who seek his dismissal from life (v. 4b). Such men had wrongfully exacted from him that which was his own (v. 4c), 18 but God is now besought to redeem and set him free (lit. 'ransom', 'pay the price for'); i.e. let God reclaim His own possession (the psalmist's soul) and thus undo the work of unrighteousness. 19 The shame and reproach of v. 7 also reappear here. The prayer ends at this point, but the parallel between the two portions of the psalm continues. 20 accentuates the existing plight out of which prayer has been offered and not yet answered. The agony becomes intensified: those who were expected to show compassion and comfort toward him, because of a special bond of understanding with them, prove to be as disappointing and suspicious as his own kinsfolk (v. 8; cf. Mt. 26:37ff.). 21 Formerly he had fasted (v. 10), but now his enemies give him poison for food.

22–28 Denunciation of his foes

The sense of human injustice, cruelty and dishonour which has been expressed in the preceding verses releases the indignation which hitherto the psalmist has curbed. His denunciation of those who have maltreated him is developed in terms of God's turning upon themselves the consequences which their conduct has effected upon others, such as himself. For example, as they had offered poisonous food (v. 21), 22 let their own feasts be a snare to them. In that they had brought darkness and weakness to him (vv. 2, 3), 23 let them discover what it feels like to have no outlook and no power (trembling loins). They had been zealous in their opposition to him (v. 4); 24 let them experience another's hot indignation pursuing them. They had caused him to be outcast by his family (v. 8); 25 let them become homeless vagrants. They had noticed God's chastening of the psalmist (vv. 10, 11), 26 and had eagerly attacked him as well; 27 let them find out what it is not only to have double sins, but double punishment too. They had sought to deprive him of God's blessing (v. 20); 28 so let them be debarred from the bliss of righteousness and let their name be erased from the register of godly men (cf. Ex. 32:32; Is. 4:3; Phil. 4:3; Rev. 20:12, 15; 21:27). The fact that we cannot conceive of ourselves praying this prayer without an emotion of self-seeking vindictiveness ought not to be allowed to colour our view of the psalmist. If he is to pray at all for the open vindication of righteousness and to take his prayer beyond the point of platitudinous generality, it must be something like this, for sin, in the biblical view, has a 'boomerang' quality, and the principle of precise equity is part of the divine nature.

29–36 Dedication to the Lord

29a should be translated 'But as for me' (emphatic as in v. 13), 'who am afflicted . . .'. The psalmist's full reliance upon God brings about the prophetic realization of the Lord's transforming intervention. 30 This stirs him to utmost praise and dedication, I will praise the name of God with a song; 31 a form of worship which is more acceptable to God than any sacrifice of an ox or a bull. 32, 33 The psalmist feels that the most amazing fact of experience is not distress, frustration, conflict, misunderstanding, retribution, or even death; it is that the Lord hears the needy. 34 That truth is cause enough for heaven and earth, the sea and all that therein is to praise the Lord. 35, 36 In this joyous assurance the future can be contemplated with hope; Zion shall yet be redeemed, the desolate cities of Judah rebuilt, and the heirs of the righteous shall dwell there and prosper.

PSALM 70. AN URGENT PRAYER FOR DELIVERANCE

These five verses are the end portion of Ps. 40 (vv. 13 to 17) which has been detached for separate use in the Temple services (see title). A few words have been changed here and there, and the name for God, Yahweh, has sometimes been altered to 'ĕlōhîm.

It has a number of points of agreement with Ps. 69. Both open with a note of urgency, both invoke judgment on the opponents of righteousness (cf. 70:2, 3 with 69:23–27), and both appeal to God on the ground of personal necessity (70:5a; 69:29a). Moreover, the psalm of which this was formerly a part, Ps. 40, has also much in common with Ps. 69; both begin with allusions to mire and darkness, and to the action of divine rescue. The difference is that in the former case the experience of deliverance has occurred so that the parched mouth (69:3) has been filled with a new song (40:3; cf. 69:30). The experience which this snatch of verses depicts is all too common, even in Christian experience, and it is good to have it isolated in this succinct way. When we are thus tested we may know that our situation is by no means unique (1 Cor. 10:13), and we may see clearly what is our resource and our best line of action.

PSALM 71. THE CONFIDENCE OF A MATURE FAITH

This psalm is the prayer of an old man (vv. 9, 18), and there is a mellowness and serenity about it which is characteristic of a long life spent in reliance upon God (cf. vv. 5, 17).

There is a marked parallel between vv. 1–9 and vv. 10–18. The rest of the psalm has a different structure but also falls into two groups corresponding to the previous section.

1–9 Intimate communion with God

The quiet dignity and confidence of these verses are unmistakable. 2 The plea for divine aid is introduced in a gentle phrase and 3 is interwoven with an appreciation that God has always safeguarded him. The principal feature of this section is the spirit of adoration toward the Lord: each of the first 8 verses speaks of Him with faith and gratitude: 1 In thee, O Lord; 2 thy righteousness; 3 thou art my rock; 4 my God; 5 thou art my hope; 6 thou art he; 7 thou art my strong refuge; 8 thy praise and . . . glory. The whole passage prepares the way for the personal petition of v. 9. 7 A portent to many. The general significance of portent is 'something which clearly shows that God is at work'. In the course of his long life the psalmist has become something of an exemplar to the people of God. Consequently how he reacts to trouble now, and how God deals with him, will be seen as a revelation of what God is like and can do.

10–18a Resolution in spite of distress

These verses are really another version of the previous prayer, but they have a wider and a more forward vision. (Contrast, e.g., vv. 6 and 18.) 10 The writer turns to consider his enemies; 13 judgment is desired, 14 hope is an inspiration, 15, 16 praise is foreseen and 18 work is anticipated. 11 His enemies believe that the Lord has forsaken him and are about to attack him. 12 That is why the prayer of vv. 2 and 3 is urgently repeated in the words O God, be not far from me. 14 The earlier confession of hope is reiterated. 17 The anticipation of ceaseless praise concerning the glory of God (v. 8) is now reinforced by a lifetime of divine tutelage. 18 Finally, the plaintive cry of v. 9 is transformed; the former prospect of failing strength becomes indefinitely deferred until a full life's work has been accomplished.

18b–21 Hope in God

The mood of these verses is comparable with that of vv. 1–10. 19, 20 Not only is there a very real awareness of God's former acts of compassion, but there is a kinship of thought. For example, it was the loftiness of God's holiness which prompted the prayer, Incline thy ear (v. 2). Again, the notion of re-birth out of the depths of the earth, i.e. deliverance from the gates of death, is an extension of the thought of physical birth (v. 6): both are regarded as works of God. But essentially these verses show us that in the Bible old age is a purposeful thing. The man who (v. 18a) longed to be preserved until he had done all that God required of him, now looks forward to receiving all that God has to give him: revival and 21 new personal advances in his experience of God. Cf. the longing soul of Moses in his old age (Dt. 3:23–25).

22–24 Praise and adoration

In this last portion the emphasis is placed upon the future, as in vv. 14–18 (the pronoun 'I' is stressed in both v. 14 and v. 22). But in place of enemies and plots are the instruments of praise, the harp and the lyre. He is confident of the answer to the prayer expressed in v. 12 and therefore extols the faithfulness of his God. He had previously looked forward hopefully to declaring thy deeds of salvation all the day (v. 15); now he grasps the certainty of so doing, for the rescue of his soul is cause enough for talking all the day long. Finally, the spirit of worship is enhanced by the title Holy One of Israel (cf. Pss. 78:41; 89:18), for it is His holiness above all else which is the inspiration of joyful praise.

PSALM 72. THE IDEAL FOUNDER OF A RIGHTEOUS DYNASTY

The kingly rule which is the theme of the poem is certainly described idealistically, a common feature of the royal psalms, and the basis of their Messianic interpretation. From the earliest days of David's reign brilliant hopes were centred in the monarchy (2 Sa. 7), and in the psalms we see their central features spelt out in detail (see NBD, art. 'Messiah'). The heart of this psalm's delineation of ideal kingship is that 'in the role of the KING was focussed the fundamental requirement: a justice which brings new life to the unfortunate and destroys oppression' (Eaton). Prophetically the psalm looks through and beyond the individual Davidic king for whom it was first sung, reminding him of his high calling, and 'attains a vision of Christ', seeing that 'in him the helpless find the powerful redeemer, and by his fulfilment of royal righteousness he will bring healing to all Creation, till none shall hurt or destroy in all God's holy kingdom (Isa. 11.1–9)' (Eaton).

1–7 The king's administration of his own nation

1 The primary characteristic of his rule is righteousness and justice, the balance of meaning of these words being that the former stresses character and moral principle, the latter administration and moral practice. Three main truths are brought forward. First, that this king, unlike the oriental despot, is no autocrat but is subject to God's requirements. Hence the prayer is that he may possess thy righteousness, a righteousness possessed by, coming from and acceptable to God. 2, 4 Secondly, out of his righteous relationship with God flows a likeness to God in his dealing with his people, his concern for the poor and his opposition to the oppressor. 3, 6 Thirdly, as ever in OT faith (cf. Dt. 28), the fruit of righteousness will be natural fertility and 7 that full-orbed well-being of individual and society, in character and conduct, manward and Godward, which the Bible calls peace. The righteous king will be a second Adam, reigning in God's Eden (cf. Is. 11:5–9; Am. 9:11–15).

8–14 The king's sovereignty in the eyes of all men

8 So righteous a ruler will inevitably be acknowledged outside his own nation, and the extension of his power will include all the earth. The normal bounds of the promised land were the river Euphrates on the east, and the Mediterranean Sea on the west. These are here surpassed (cf. Zc. 9:10). 9 Those who dwell in the wilderness (see mg.); i.e. the nomadic tribes. 10, 11 Foreign states as far afield as Tarshish (S Spain), the Mediterranean isles, Sheba (S Arabia), and Seba (Ethiopia), shall honour him with gifts (cf. 1 Ki. 10:25). These wide dominions will not be acquired through personal ambition, or desire for imperial fame, but through the intrinsic merit of an ideally righteous administration. 12–14 elaborate the thoughts of vv. 2–4 (cf. Jb. 29:11–16). Not only has he sympathy with the helpless (poor) and destitute (needy), but he esteems each man's life (blood) precious and worthy of redemption from evil powers.

15–17 The king's perpetual benevolence and glory

The thrilling prospect of such a king causes the psalm to end in a climax of deeply-felt petitions to God for him. 15 These touch on the honour in which he is to be held, 16 the prosperity of his dominions, 17 and the duration and extent of his kingdom. 15 We could translate 'May prayer be made to him'. This would in the first instance refer to the stream of suppliants, whom a king of this character would rightly attract, but it would also accommodate the thought of the deity of the Messianic King on which the OT quietly insists. 16 The prayer is for unusual fertility: a land cultivated and productive even to the mountain tops, and corn-stalks as sturdy and productive as the cedars of Lebanon! 17 In reference to the Davidic king, the enduring name would have a dynastic significance, but once more it is an easy transition to the divine Messiah who lives and reigns for ever (cf. Lk. 1:32, 33) and who alone is the universal source of blessing for which prayer is here made (cf. Eph. 1:3).

18–20 Doxology

See on Ps. 41:13. These final three verses are, of course, editorial material marking the end of the second book of Psalms, but never was a doxology more appropriately placed than vv. 18 and 19 at the conclusion of Ps. 72!

BOOK THREE. PSALMS 73–89

PSALM 73. THE MYSTERY OF PROSPEROUS WICKEDNESS

Ps. 73 deals with the same theme as Ps. 37 (cf. Pss. 49; 94). The problem is that of an apparent inversion of morality and success; in the life of this world evil men prosper while godly men are often in serious distress and need. The emphasis here, however, is not on the temporary nature of the prosperity of the wicked. It may, and often does, persist through life (see v. 4; cf. Jb. 21:7–13), although ultimately there must be condemnation. The essential truth for a righteous man was that it is well with him really, i.e. the true test of one's well-being consists not in the power and riches of this world, but in personal relationship with God. The discovery of this truth is treated retrospectively.

1–3 Previous doubting recalled

1 Truly God is good. This positive statement indicates the absence of doubt in the psalmist's mind now. 2 Nevertheless there had been a time when he had almost turned aside from the path of Godward trust, he had almost staggered through the sudden pull of unbelief (cf. Rom. 4:20) and 3 had gone so far as to feel envious at the success of those who spoke boastfully and were obviously enjoying more worldly success than he, notwithstanding their wicked character and life.

4–12 The facts stated objectively

The characteristics of ungodly men are described first outwardly (conditions and conduct, vv. 4–7), and then inwardly (speech and motive, vv. 8, 9). 4 reads literally 'their dying has no pangs', which RSV has gratuitously changed. The psalmist is thus not contemplating the temporary well-being of the ungodly (cf. Ps. 37:35, 36), but a life-long prosperity ending in peaceful and painless death. This state of affairs is reflected in their conduct. 6 They behave insolently and unscrupulously as regularly as they wear their rich clothing. 7 Their gaze is intent on self-gain and the thoughts and imaginations of their hearts are become utterly vain. 8, 9 It is only to be expected that such behaviour should indicate an exaggerated self-opinion, and their mouths are, as ever, a true index of their hearts. Nothing in either the heavens or the earth is above or beyond their criticism.

There are other elements in the situation, which increase the sense of mystery that God should tolerate it. 10–12 People are led astray and blasphemy is promoted. Indeed, in v. 10, the Hebrew reads 'his people'; i.e. those who had been called out from the ungodly life of the nations and made into a people for God's own possession are being tempted to return to evil and corrupt practices.

13–17 The problem described subjectively

The psalmist himself was tempted to doubt the necessity of a strict integrity of heart and conscience. 13, 14 His adherence to the high moral code of the law seemed vain so far as tangible advantage was concerned; indeed his endeavour to live a godly life brought him no evidences of divine approval, but only a daily chastening. 15 Had he voiced his doubts in public, he would have been a traitor to God's children, encouraging them to doubt. See how the godly man controls his tongue, thinks before he airs his problems, and gives pride of place to the spiritual well-being of others. 16 The more he pondered over the meaning of this inversion of values the more wearisome it became. 17 At last he went into the sanctuary of God and meditated upon the ultimate state of the wicked. There he discovered a new outlook; he perceived that life had baffled him because he had not looked at it in the light of the final issue.

18–25 The nature of his readjustment is recalled

18–20 The psalmist sees clearly now that the wicked cannot flout God and escape. The question arises, however, when will this overthrow take place? Was the psalmist reiterating a traditional doctrine of inevitable retribution in this world? If so, then he was by no means as clear-sighted as his psalm would suggest, for this would be a pathetically insufficient answer. By far the majority of those who live in proud godlessness pass without evident punishment. Here, then, is the importance of retaining in v. 4 the Hebrew text with its reference to painless death. The psalmist was in fact facing the full rigour of the problem. He saw men go into death unscathed; but he saw that, on awaking, their situation was quite different, one of insecurity, ruin, destruction and terror. Indeed they awake (cf. on Ps. 17:15) and see what a dream they have lived in, and before the judgment of an awakening God (cf. Ps. 44:23–26) all their so-called solid worldly achievement is no more than a phantom.

21–25 Very different is the psalmist's awareness of his own life with God. 21, 22 He owns that his period of bitterness made him utterly devoid of insight into the things of God, 23, 24 but now he is alive to the reality of his spiritual wealth: his peace with God, whereby he is continually with thee; his security, for thou dost hold my right hand (cf. Is. 41:10); his sense of God's plan, or counsel, guiding his life; and afterward thou wilt receive (cf. on Ps. 49:15) me to glory (cf. Lk. 23:43; Acts 7:55, 56). 25 It is not only upon earth but also in heaven that God and fellowship with God constitute the sufficient and superior wealth of the man of faith.

26–28 The relevance of his belief to the immediate circumstances

26a The readjustment of values, previously described, had to withstand everything which pressed upon the powers of mind and body, bringing them into distress or weariness. This would include the shadow of old age and approaching death. 26b Nevertheless the knowledge he had gained of God's eternal and blessed fellowship had matured also and the psalmist was able confidently and fervently to state the ends of the whole matter, viz. 27 those who withdraw from God's way would be inevitably destroyed, 28 but, for himself, the proximity of God was the source and cause of all his well-being. The general statement of v. 1 has become a personal confession and a testimony. Note the contrast between far from thee and near God.

PSALM 74. A LAMENT FOR THE DESTRUCTION OF THE SANCTUARY

This is one of several poignant lamentations which found utterance at the destruction of Jerusalem and the beginning of exile in Babylon (cf. Lamentations and Ps. 79). The tragedy was not merely that the centre of religious life, the Temple, had been destroyed: that which cut the cord of hope and overwhelmed the nation with moral dismay was the inference that God had forsaken them. Where was God's faithfulness to the covenant? As one year followed another, the long duration of the captivity (vv. 1, 3, 10, 19, 22, 23) lent credence to the thought of divine rejection and urgency to prayer.

1–11 The appeal

Disappointment is mingled with bewilderment as the psalmist voices the cry of the people in an insistent 'Why?' to God (vv. 1 and 11). Into the midst of this challenging inquiry is inserted a less emotional statement of their distress (vv. 3–9).

1 The sense of the sovereignty of God over the world is strong in these verses: He has been the Agent; His anger has been manifested in the activities of the enemy. 2 The anomaly is that God's hot anger is directed against those who are His own flock (the 'Shepherd of Israel' is a metaphor much used in the Asaphic psalms), against His own purchase, and the tribe of His own inheritance (cf. Ex. 15:16, 17). His wrath is directed even against Mount Zion, His own habitation (cf. Ps. 68:16). In other words, the people's distress and disgrace were a dilemma because God seemed to be ruining His own work and breaking His own word. 3 Let Him come swiftly (direct thy steps) and inspect the appalling ruins of His city and the defilement of His sanctuary.

4 There follows a more or less factual statement of what He would see, but details are given only of the sanctuary. Thy foes have made tumult in the place of quiet. Military ensigns have taken the place of divine symbols, 5, 6 and wanton damage has been caused to the beauty and form of the building (cf. 1 Ki. 6:29) so that it looks like the derelict waste of splintered and futile stumps that mark a felled forest. 7, 8 Finally the place had been burnt (2 Ki. 25:9, 10; Is. 64:11); and, furthermore, as the enemies' intention had been utter havoc, not only the Temple but the religious life of the people had been destroyed. It is doubtful if the translation meeting places can be sustained, as the word elsewhere means the time or occasion of meeting, or the people assembled, but never the place. We may catch the sense of the Hebrew with 'They said in their heart: "The entire race!" as with fire they put a stop to the festivals of God in the land'. 9 The result was that not a vestige or outward sign of their religious life remained and there was not even a prophetic hint as to how long this would continue (cf. La. 2:9).

10 The concluding phrase of this descriptive section, how long, is a resumption of the appeal to God in vv. 1 and 2. Profound as the disaster was, the psalmist could not believe it to be permanent. It was unthinkable that the name of the Lord should be left permanently in disrepute. 11 Judgment must surely fall upon their opponents, although for a mysterious interval God's chastening hand was withheld (cf. Ex. 15:6).

12–23 The hope

That fervent appeal to God implied a hope which was not wishful merely but reasonable. They were appealing to a God whose character they knew of old; of His power there could be no doubt at all. This conviction is borne out by the emphatic Thou of vv. 13–17. The indisputable facts of the Exodus are recapitulated; 13 the division of the Red Sea, the destruction of the Egyptian army (symbolized by the dragons of v. 13b; cf. Ezk. 29:3), 14 the utter disgrace of the Egyptian power (symbolized by Leviathan, usually taken to mean the crocodile), the dishonour to the Egyptian carcases washed up as a prey to robbers and as food for the beasts of the desert. 15 God had wrought this: He also had brought water out of the cleft rock (Ex. 17:1–7) and dried up the perennial Jordan (Jos. 3). 16 Indeed, day and night, the very light and sun, were His. 17 All the physical features (the bounds) of earth, all seasonal phenomena, were originated solely by Him.

The appeal and hope is now based, not on grounds of earthly circumstance, but on divine faithfulness. 18 Let Him consider that His name has been blasphemed by a base or foolish people (cf. Dt. 32:21). Where then is His honour? 19 His poor family are harassed and defenceless as a dove among wild beasts. Where then is His compassion? 20 The covenant whereby He pledged Himself to them seems to be ignored. The land has gone dark because of His disfavour and violence abounds. Where then is His faithfulness? 21 Let not the burdened souls which cry to Him turn back from Him in shame and confusion because of His apparent indifference. Where then would be His mercy and what source of divine praise would remain in earth? 22, 23 Oh that God would act in His own interests—so far as His name on earth is concerned! Let Him remember how vile persons abuse His name and continually cause their clamour to 'ascend' before Him.

PSALM 75. 'GOD IS THE JUDGE'

Unlike the preceding psalm, this poem does not question the goodness of God but rather exults in His sovereignty and righteousness. There is a background of calamity (v. 8) and a sense of recent relief from serious peril. In this respect the psalm is akin to Pss. 46–48 and probably belongs to the same period (see Is. 36 and 37). The LXX associates it with the Assyrian invasion. If this is correct, it explains why the north remains unspecified for help in v. 6, for it was the direction of the enemy advance. Also the intervention of God at a time He decides (v. 2) admirably suits the Assyrian crisis.

In the following suggested analysis, we may imagine a prophet stepping forward in the assembly with a word from God (vv. 2, 3; cf. 2 Ch. 20:4–19). The suggestion that vv. 4–10 were spoken by the king rests upon the content of the verses, only suitable to a royal speaker, and comparison with the royal oath of consecration, Ps. 101.

1 The voice of the people: thanksgiving

The expression of thanks, doubled for intensity, is occasioned by an experience of the name of God coming near (see mg.; cf. Is. 30:27), i.e. God Himself acting in the fullness of His revealed character, and doing wondrous (or supernaturally marvellous) deeds such as He alone could do.

2, 3 The voice of God: sovereignty

If we cast ourselves into the Assyrian crisis we will get the feel of this word of God. Jerusalem was humbled to the dust, and at the very 'eleventh hour', as men reckon things, God acted. But there is no crisis with God. 2 He does not act because things have come to a desperate pass, but because the time appointed for action has come. 3 To the human view the earth is tottering to its doom, but its stability is neither secured by men, nor upset by them. The world and its inhabitants are kept in place by God.

4–10 The voice of the king: dedication

4, 5 The downfall of the arrogant Assyrian (cf. Is. 37:23–25) is an object-lesson to all the boastful, to all who lift up the horn, i.e. vaunt their own powers. The king is determined to match the acts of the divine King in his own rule, and we might translate his opening word as a response: 'I have determined to say . . .' The reason for speaking out admonishingly to boasters now follows: 6, 7 promotion is not self-achieved, but is the gift of God, 8 and is based on moral factors. For the picture of the Lord's cup, cf. Ps. 60:3; Is. 51:17; Je. 25:15; Ezk. 23:32–34; note also the cup of joy and salvation, Pss. 16:5; 116:13. 9, 10 As the king sings out in praise to God, he resolves to match this aspect of the divine ways of government also. He too will cut off the wicked and promote the righteous (see mg.).

PSALM 76. A SONG OF DELIVERANCE

The same circumstances which lay behind Ps. 75 form the background of this poem also: it celebrates a victory in which Yahweh has signally revealed Himself. Where Ps. 75 culminated in the dedication of the earthly king, Ps. 76 culminates in certain conclusions about the nature of the divine Kingship.

1–3 Self-revelation: fact and place

1 'Self-revealed' is the first Hebrew word in this psalm and it announces its subject-matter. Israel signifies, not the northern kingdom, but the chosen people of God. In the setting of this people, and specifically in the land of Judah, God has so made Himself known (the verb is reflexive) that His people testify with new enthusiasm that his name is great: they see the greatness of His revealed nature. 3 The occasion of the self-revelation was a great victory. Some interpreters see here a historical deliverance of the city, e.g. from Sennacherib (2 Ki. 19:32–35; cf. on Pss. 46–48); others hold that thinking about the royal city, the Lord's anointed king and the divine King Himself had always included the idea of the opposition of the evil world, and that this was dramatically represented in the ritual of the Temple—the assault of the kings and their overthrow. There is, of course, no need to make these views strict alternatives. Both may well have been true: historical deliverances confirmed the faith regularly expressed in the ritual that the Lord is the Defender of His people.

4–9 Self-revelation: content and response

Compared with vv. 1–3 and 10–12, these verses are a personal address to God. The self-revealing acts of the Lord have become the basis of personal knowledge and personal faith. The phrases alternate between some truth about God and some description of His supremacy: 4 His glorious majesty, 5 supremacy over all the strength of man, whether of heart (courage) or hand, 6a His powerful word of rebuke, 6b His supremacy over man's weapons, 7a His awesomeness, 7b His supremacy over every imaginable foe, 8a His heavenly authority, 8b, 9 His supremacy over the whole earth in the interests of justice and mercy.

10–12 Self-revelation: conclusions

10 First, the victory has revealed the almightiness of divine providence by which even man's anger is turned to serve God's purposes. 11 Secondly, the only proper response to such a God is integrity, devotion and reverence. 12 Thirdly, the past victory is seen as the pledge and foretaste of His ultimate world-wide conquest.

PSALM 77. THE HISTORICAL BASIS OF HOPE

While there is no objection in principle to hearing in this psalm the voice of communal distress, expressed in individual terms—a view almost unanimous among the older commentators—or the voice of an individual interceding on behalf of afflicted Israel, as recent commentators suggest, the exceedingly personal terms of the psalm are best explained if we assume an individual sufferer seeking comfort in God and finding help in meditating on God's well-remembered acts of redemption for His people. The psalm says nothing of peril, pursuit, hardship, disease, or suchlike difficulties. The root cause of the distress which afflicts the psalmist may be the continued absence of any sign of divine compassion (vv. 7–9), but it is more helpful to picture the psalmist as one whose spirit is overwhelmed—for whatever cause. How well, in this case, he speaks to all who are depressed and prescribes the tonic of remembrance.

1–9 His despondency

2 The extremity of soul is forcefully presented in this imagery of a sick and restless person calling in vain at night for someone to minister comfort. 3 Actually the misery of soul arises from meditation about God, 4 nor is respite easily found in sleep, for God seems to keep his eyes wide open. 5 But this turns out to be a merciful withholding of sleep, for as he ponders over the days of old, 6–9 he encourages himself to think that the favour, love, promises and grace of God are changeless. He expresses this in six questions, each expecting the answer 'No'.

10–20 God's acts remembered

10 is specially difficult to translate. RSV should be understood as an act of submission: assured by his own questions that there is no ultimate change in God, he accepts it as his divinely allocated grief that God's hand toward him has changed from favour to distress. Alternatively, we may translate: 'This is my plea, years of the right hand . . .', i.e. a prayer of faith, arising from the affirmation of divine changelessness and seeking a restoration of His favour; or again, 'This explains my sickness, years of the right hand . . .'—the all-gracious God has decreed a period of suffering. Whichever is correct, the psalmist ministers a tonic to himself by recalling, first (vv. 11–15), that no human power can withstand God, and that His power is characteristically power to redeem His people; and secondly (vv. 16–20), that no natural forces or circumstances can withstand God, and that He uses them rather for the protection and care of His people.

15 Jacob and Joseph are mentioned as being the 'founding fathers' of the people who came out of Egypt, but possibly also as being outstanding examples of God's providential care: Jacob and his sons were preserved from famine by Joseph who had been raised from prison and oblivion to rule Egypt, and then the descendants of both were miraculously preserved against Pharaoh's murderous intentions. All this enhances the concept of redemption: it is entirely the work of God who magnifies both His power and His mercy by selecting those who have no power in themselves to help themselves. In mentioning Joseph, the psalmist might also have found help in considering the individuality of redemption. 16 The opening of a path through the Red Sea. 17, 18 A poetic development of the divine mastery of the forces of nature in overthrowing the Egyptians in the sea. 19 Thy footprints were unseen; probably a reference to the returning waters which obliterated from sight, but not from memory, the path taken by the cloudy-fiery pillar. 20 The contrasting providences of God: one minute the crashing of the storm, the next shepherds with their flock. So He superintends the welfare of His people.

PSALM 78. GOD'S HAND IN HISTORY

Along with Pss. 105; 106 and 136, this is one of the four great national hymns in the Psalter. In each case the dominant theme is the experience of Israel's deliverance from Egypt. The purpose of the psalm is so to rehearse the early story of the nation that future generations might be warned against a repetition of past failures (see vv. 1–11; cf. 1 Cor. 10:1–11). Writing some time after the leadership of the nation had passed from the Ephraimite house of Saul to the Judahite house of David (vv. 67–70), the psalmist believes himself to possess the exact clue to past misfortunes and reverses. With great artistry, he refrains from 'applying the moral', but stops abruptly at David's accession and wise rule, leaving the new ruling family to draw its own conclusions.

1–8 Introduction

1 The psalmist calls for attention, 2 promising a parable, i.e. an instructive discourse, not a mere story but a story with a meaning, and dark sayings, or 'riddles', clearly implying that it is their solution which he intends to offer. 3 The material of his discourse is traditional, 4 and he intends to be a faithful steward in passing it to the next generation. 5–8 explain more of the background: God intended this passing on of teaching from one generation to the next (vv. 5, 6) for the express purpose of learning from the mistakes of the past and in particular—here comes the key-idea of the psalm—that they should be warned of the danger of forgetfulness (vv. 7, 8).

9–39 The first exposition of the acts of God

The psalmist is keenly interested to know what went wrong with the monarchy of Saul, and why it was replaced by that of David (cf. vv. 67–70). He starts therefore with the wholesale defeat of Saul's well-equipped standing army on Mt. Gilboa (1 Sa. 31). 9 Why such a defeat, when the human prospects of victory were so bright? 10a The reply is that defeat springs from disobedience, 10b rebellion, 11 and forgetfulness. If only they had remembered the acts of God!

We are now given a review of the acts of God—with particular reference to His wonders shown in the realm of nature—and of constant rebellion on Israel's part. His acts were redemption (vv. 12–14), provision (vv. 15, 16), judgment (vv. 17–33) and mercy (vv. 34–39). 12 Zoan was an ancient capital of Egypt, here used as a poetic parallel for Egypt itself. 13 Cf. Ex. 14:21, 22. 14 Cf. Ex. 13:21, 22. 15 Cf. Ex. 17. 18, 19 To test God is not the same as simply asking for signs (e.g. Jdg. 6:36–40), but rather to challenge Him to do what one believes Him to be unable to do. These verses, therefore, are a key passage explaining what such a sinful 'test' is. 22 This is the heart of the sinful 'test', they had no faith.

23–31 Cf. Ex. 16; Nu. 11. Calvin well remarks on this passage: 'That which his favour . . . would have led him to refuse, he now granted them in his wrath. This is an example well worthy of our attention, that we may not complain if our desires are crossed by . . . God when they break forth beyond bounds. God then truly hears us when, instead of yielding to our foolish inclinations, he regulates his beneficence . . . to our welfare; even as in lavishing upon the wicked more than is good for them . . . he loads them with a deadly burden.' The food was not sought in a spirit of faith to satisfy legitimate need, but in a spirit of doubt to indulge immoderate appetite. To such God replies by granting in wrath exactly what they asked, but to their destruction. 32, 33 Probably a reference to the refusal to enter Canaan (cf. Dt. 1:26–46; Nu. 14:1–35) and the following utter pointlessness of the 40 wandering years.

40–72 The second exposition of the acts of God

Tracing the course of divine providence from Egypt (v. 43) to Canaan (v. 54), these verses dwell specially on God's acts in the realm of history, how He dealt with opposing peoples for His own people's sake. At the head of the section, and introducing it, vv. 40–42 take a final explanatory glance back to the preceding exposition of God's acts. Everything God did had been met by disobedience and rebellion, but now we are told of one common denominator of all their ill-dealings with Him: 40, 41 behind the rebelling, grieving, testing and provoking, 42 they did not keep in mind . . . (lit. 'they did not remember')—the central folly and sin of forgetfulness.

From this follows the second exposition of God's acts, and it takes the same sequence as the first: His acts were redemption (vv. 43–53), provision (vv. 54, 55), judgment (vv. 56–64) and mercy (vv. 65–72). 43–51 Cf. Ex. 7–12. 51 Ham was the son of Noah from whom the Egyptians were descended (cf. Gn. 10:6). 60 Shiloh was the great sanctuary which was finally presided over by Eli (1 Sa. 1–4). We do not read of its destruction but presume that it fell in the same Philistine onslaught which captured the ark. The fall of Shiloh made a deep impression and became an object-lesson in God's dealings with His people (cf. Je. 7:1–14). It stands in history as proof that mere religion is not enough for God. If the religious act does not match the state of the heart it is meaningless, and if the heart does not flow through the act into a changed life it is hypocrisy. 65 Very daring comparisons, but how vividly the OT sees God's concern for His people: this is the divine 'jealousy' (cf. Is. 42:13, 14). 67 The whole story of Saul's monarchy is summed up by the one word rejected. Saul did not achieve any lasting benefit for Israel, and the psalmist leads us dramatically to that event which set the course of history for the next 400 years, the choice of David. 69 He built his sanctuary is most easily explained if the psalm was composed after the building of Solomon's Temple. But since the psalmist does not mention the division of the kingdom (1 Ki. 12:1–20)—a fact which would have greatly assisted his argument—we may suggest that when, in Solomon's reign, evidence began to accumulate that old errors were being repeated, he stated his view of the inner workings of the history of the past.

The supreme intention of this dramatic presentation is to show the peculiar responsibility of the Davidic king. God has intervened, not merely to free the nation from their adversaries, Pharaoh (v. 42) and the Philistines (v. 66). but to select Judah to be His people, Zion to be His habitation, and 70–72 David to be His servant who would feed (be the shepherd of) His people (cf. 2 Sa. 3:18; 5:2). But if the acts of God in redemption, provision, judgment and mercy are not pondered and kept in mind, then again forgetfulness will breed rebellion, and rebellion will issue in defeat. This is the implication of the psalm's abrupt ending, and its abiding lesson for us.

PSALM 79. JERUSALEM MADE A HEAP OF RUINS

This is a companion psalm to Ps. 74. It expresses the plight (vv. 1–4), prayers (vv. 5–12) and promise (v. 13) of God's people in a day of calamity, the Babylonian Exile. Its plea for divine redress and restoration is based on three grounds: first, the agony and distress of His saints (v. 2); secondly, the compassionate nature of God (v. 8); thirdly, the ignominy and dishonour which other nations will attach to God's name if He leaves desolate those who are His servants and representatives (v. 10). These three aspects of the prayer are interwoven throughout the psalm but they are stressed in turn in its three sections.

1–4 Ruin and massacre

1 Cf. Ps. 74:2, 7; also note the fulfilment of Micah's prophecy (3:12) quoted in Je. 26:18. 2, 3 The corpse-strewn battlefield round about Jerusalem was so awful and ominous a memory that it became symbolic of the ultimate judgment of men (cf. Ezk. 39:1–20; Rev. 11:8, 9; 19:17, 18). 4 The derision of neighbouring peoples, like Edom, Moab and Philistia, was a continual source of irritation to the afflicted people of God (e.g. Ezk. 25:2, 12 and 15; Ob. 12).

5–9 Wrath and mercy

The events of history were considered to be the direct acts of God Himself in accordance with His moral providence, and, of course, the prophets had been clear that He, as righteous Judge, was the real agent in the overthrow of Jerusalem (cf. Ezk. 8). But would God never cease to be angry with His chosen ones? A twofold appeal follows: 6, 7 first, an appeal to the divine jealousy. Surely God will not stand idly by while the heathen lay violent hands on His people. 8, 9 Secondly, an appeal to the divine forgiveness. The utter absence of merit on man's part is brought into relation to God's utter readiness to forgive. Sin is seen as inherited from the past, the cause of present need, and offensive to God.

10–13 Revenge and majesty

The final plea of the psalmist goes right outside all personal feelings of distress or vengeance. The intervention of God is sought for His own honour and glory. 10 In the first place there should be no cause whatever for the heathen to scoff at God because of Israel's misery and dereliction. Compare the arguments of Moses about the Egyptian reactions to an exodus that failed (Ex. 32:12; Nu. 14:13–17). 12 Then, in the course of this demonstration of divine faithfulness, power and justice, let the derisive neighbouring states (cf. v. 4) experience the derision of the Lord (cf. Ps. 2:4), for in reproaching Israel they have really scorned Him. 13 The psalm concludes on the note of dedication, not in a spirit of bargaining with God but because true supplication must be linked with consecration: the vow is of thanksgiving to God and testimony to men.

PSALM 80. AN ELEGY FOR ISRAEL

This psalm is wholly concerned with the northern kingdom of Israel, depicted by the names Joseph, Ephraim, Benjamin and Manasseh—these latter three being reckoned as the 'camp of Ephraim' in the marching order of the people (Nu. 2:17–24). Though Benjamin was often linked with Judah, it was essentially a northern tribe. For example, Saul, the Benjaminite, was an Ephraimite monarch. Either we have here a prayer of devout Israelites referring to the fall of Samaria (722 BC), or else a prayer of the whole exiled community after 586 BC composed by someone with close affiliations with the old northern kingdom.

1–3 Petition

1 The Lord is addressed as the Shepherd of Israel. That view of the Exodus which saw in it a flock movement under a divine Shepherd is common to several psalms (e.g. 78:52). The Shepherd is, however, the divine King Himself, enthroned between the cherubim of the ark. It seems a great while since any light from God cheered His people (vv. 3, 7, 19). Hence the prayer that He will shine (or 'flash') forth from the Holy Place for their comfort. Thus Christians, in experiences of life's darkness, look to the light of the second coming (Rom. 13:12; 2 Thes. 1:7f.; Tit. 2:13). 3 The prayer relies wholly on what God can do: He only can restore His people (lit. 'cause us to turn' back to Him); He only can welcome them back with shining face, significant of His pleasure in them. Out of this double 'turning'—of us to Him, and Him to us—comes the assurance that we are saved.

4–7 The basis of the prayer

We learn here again the gracious truth that as God's people we can come to Him simply pleading our own need: such is His grace and our privilege. 5, 6 These verses are a reminder of the sorrow and the scorn into which God has led them. We may note that there is no loss of faith in Him in spite of their experiences. This is what He has justly done. 4 But the sorest need is now present: that when they seek His answer even their prayers seem to anger Him. Their sense of the divine alienation from them is very great. 7 Hence the added urgency of the renewed petition (cf. v. 3), with its appeal now to the God of hosts, God the omnipotent.

8–16 The allegory of the vine

At this point, the psalmist breaks off in order to introduce the allegory of the vine which is often used as an emblem of Israel (cf. Ho. 10:1; Is. 5:1–7; Ezk. 15:1–6; also Lk. 20:9ff.; Jn. 15:1ff.). 8, 9 The transplanting of a vine slip from Egypt (cf. Gn. 49:22) was possible only because of God's special intervention (cf. Ps. 44:3). 10, 11 Once planted, the vine flourished so as to spread, during the empires of David and Solomon, over the mountains of Judea as far as the cedar forests of Lebanon, the Mediterranean coast, and the Euphrates river (cf. Dt. 11:24). 12, 13 Now all the vineyard is derelict: the gardener has abandoned it and consequently it has been invaded by the Gentiles—symbolized by wild beasts. The threat of Is. 5:5–7 has come true. 14 This leads to the cry of penitence and need. 15, 16 The whole anomaly of careful planting and utter rejection, the assiduous cultivation of the stock, or vineyard, and then the outcome of fire instead of fruit, is summed up in these last verses.

17–19 The plea for divine action

Throughout the psalm God has been reminded of the special and beloved place Israel occupies in His plan: they are His flock (v. 1), His people (v. 4), and His vine (v. 8). 17 Now comes the tenderest title of all. When Benjamin was born (Gn. 35:18) at the cost of his mother's life, she, her mind full of her fatal travail, aptly named him Ben-oni, 'son of my sorrow'; but his father, loving the child for the sake of the beloved Rachel, refused the name, calling him rather Benjamin, 'son of (my) right hand'. So is Israel, by grace, to the Lord. 18 And if only God will replace His hand upon the direction of their affairs, Israel will thus become the 'ideal Israel'. 19 Longing for this blessing is expressed in the fullest form of the refrain.

Note the changes in the divine name: O God (v. 3); O God of hosts (v. 7); O Lord God of hosts (v. 19): 'O Yahweh, God the omnipotent', a comprehensive appeal to covenanted grace and supernatural power.

PSALM 81. A HYMN AND HOMILY AT HARVEST-TIME

This psalm is best associated with the Feast of Tabernacles, though some link it with the Passover, on the ground of the reference to Egypt in v. 5. All the great feasts of Israel were, however, based on the Exodus, and Tabernacles associates well with this psalm in that it regularly placed God's law before the people (Dt. 31:9ff.; cf. vv. 8–10) and was the feast of the ingathering (Ex. 23:16; 34:22; cf. vv. 10, 16).

1–5 The summons

The Feast of Tabernacles began in the middle of the 7th month, i.e. at full moon (v. 3b). 4 This festival was a statute for Israel, 5 having been instituted by divine decree, but better 'for a testimony' (RV), i.e. to bear witness to the goodness of the God who went out over, i.e. imposed His rule upon (cf. Gn. 41:45) Egypt at the Exodus. Some (Eaton, etc.) hold that at this point in the ceremony of Tabernacles a prophet stepped forward in the assembly to declare the word of God (cf. 2 Ch. 20:14), announcing his inspiration in the words I hear a voice . . . It is hard, however, to think that a prophet would speak of the Lord as a voice I had not known. It is better to understand a reference back to Israel's situation in Egypt when Moses came bearing a message from the God of their fathers now revealed in new terms (cf. Ex. 6:2, 3) (so Delitzsch, Kirkpatrick, ICC).

6–16 The message

6–10 His work of deliverance. 6 Israel's burden of slave labour and tedious toil in Egypt was suddenly removed. 7 They had called upon God and He came down to deliver (Ex. 6:5ff.). The thick darkness of the thunder cloud (the secret place of thunder; cf. Ex. 14:20) refers to His immediate presence with them in the 'pillar of cloud'. The allusion to the waters of Meribah (meaning 'strife'; cf. Ex. 17:7) may be suggestive of the custom at the Feast of Tabernacles of fetching water from Siloam (cf. Jn. 7:37) in remembrance of the miraculous provision of water in the wilderness. Whereas the psalm says I tested you, Ex. 17:2 says that the people 'put the Lord to the proof'. In other words, life's adversities are deliberately planned divine tests (cf. Dt. 8:2–5) to which we respond either in the faith which accepts and trusts or in the doubt which questions and rebels (cf. Ps. 95:8, 9; 1 Cor. 10:9ff.; Jas. 1:2-4, 12).

This action of God was inseparable from His commandments to them. 9, 10 Only the first commandment is named here (cf. Ex. 20:2–7), for this embodied their essential and distinctive characteristic (cf. Dt.6:4, 5; see also Mk. 12:28ff.). But just as blessing preceded the call to obedience (vv. 6, 7), so blessing is promised as its outcome (v. 10b).

11–16 Their waywardness of desire. The keen edge of this reproach lay in the rejection of God by those towards whom He had been especially kind, patient and active. 11 Their wilfulness temporarily frustrated His purpose; 12 in consequence they were left to their stubborn hearts, and allowed to walk in their own counsels —instead of in His ways.

13 Nevertheless, the repetition of the divine aside (cf. v. 8b) suggests a willingness on His part to bless Israel. 14, 15 But the blessings of victory and provision (v. 16) await the response of heartfelt obedience (v. 13). 16 To this the people are called by the promise of even greater blessings than their fathers enjoyed—not water, but honey from the rock—for the grace of God is neither exhausted nor limited by even the best of the past.

PSALM 82. UNJUST JUDGES IMPEACHED BY GOD

1 See Ps. 58:1 for a discussion of the meaning of the gods mentioned here. The same considerations apply and the same conclusion holds that here the Lord, the supreme Judge, gives judgment in the High Court against earth's corrupt judiciaries.

2–7 constitute the charge and condemnation of those who had exercised judicial authority in a false and unjust manner, i.e. having respect of persons (see Lv. 19:15; Jas. 2:1–9), and ignoring necessitous cases. 5 Each of the three sentences contains a testimony: first, about the accused, their lack of moral discernment; secondly, about the helpless, their continuance in unrelieved trouble; thirdly, about society, its fundamental insecurity when justice is mal-administered. 6 Therefore God (I is emphatic), who caused these men to be appointed to the office of judges so that they became sons of the Most High, 7 pronounces sentence. Their failure entails a death like any descendant of Adam, and a disgrace comparable with the condemnation of many princes in former times.

8 In the final verse the psalmist calls upon God Himself to control all nations and administer true judgment.

PSALM 83. PRAYER, THE REACTION IN CRISIS

No such widespread alliance of adjacent states as is described in vv. 6–8 is mentioned in the OT. The nearest approach to such a situation was the coalition against Jehoshaphat (see 2 Ch. 20:1–12). It may be that, in presenting this urgent plea for help, the writer is stating in a more vivid way the basic spiritual situation displayed in Ps. 2: secular opposition to the kingdom of God.

1–4 The peril

1 The serious nature of the threat is reflected in the impetuous words O God, do not keep silence; lit. 'O God, let there be no rest to thee.' 2 This urgent plea is reinforced by the description of the aggressors as thy enemies and those who hate thee. 3 Secret conferences have been held and plans prepared against thy people. The promises of God are an added basis of prayer as thy protected ones recalls their coverage by His covenant (cf. Pss. 27:5; 31:21). 4 Finally, the imperative need of action by God is implicit in the disclosure of the plot utterly to wipe out Israel and remove from earth the memory of God's chosen people.

5–8 The confederacy described

The forces massed against Israel had two characteristics. 5 They acted with complete unanimity; they had made an alliance against God Himself. 6, 7 Those concerned were mostly the semi-nomadic peoples whose petty kingdoms stretched along the east side of the Jordan valley, i.e. Edom, Moab, Ammon, with the Hagrites and Ishmaelites who lived still farther east (cf. 1 Ch. 5:10) and also the people of Gebal (south of Edom). In addition, there were the forces of the western seaboard, Philistia and Tyre. 8 And in the background was the might of Assyria which had already lent an arm of help to the children of Lot, i.e. to Moab and Ammon (Gn. 19:36–38).

9–12 An appeal to history

Ominous situations had occurred previously in Israel's history and astonishing deliverances had been experienced through the unmistakable intervention of God. Two of the most noteworthy were the attack by Sisera (Jdg. 4; 5) and the invasion of the Midianites (Jdg. 6–8). In both cases the Israelites were not merely outnumbered, but also outclassed in aggressive equipment. Nevertheless both perils were amazingly overcome; the menace was swiftly and entirely removed and at very little loss to the Israelites. Compare Isaiah's comment on the second event (Is. 9:4; 10:26).

13–18 The plea for help

13–15 The recollection of previous deliverances gives passion and eloquence to the cry for immediate help, expressed in three pictures of total vanquishment by divine intervention. 16–18 The supreme aim of this prayer is the glory of God, and the psalmist pleads for an unforgettable experience of humiliation for the opponents of God so that they and all men everywhere might acknowledge that thou alone, whose name is the Lord, art the Most High over all the earth.

PSALM 84. REJOICING IN THE SANCTUARY

This is a companion to Ps. 42 (also a Korahite psalm), but whereas that was a lament because of exile from the house of his God, this is a song of joy in the dwelling-places of the Lord of hosts.

1–4 The joy of the house of the Lord

We may well picture a pilgrim newly arrived, exclaiming in rapture over the long-anticipated beauty of the Lord's house. His first reaction is to its loveliness (vv. 1, 2); his second, to its safety (vv. 3, 4). 2 Longs . . . faints . . . sing for joy. The tenses of the Hebrew are not reflected here. Possibly, the perfects 'have longed . . . fainted' look back to the breathless anticipation with which he looked forward to his pilgrimage, and the present 'sing for joy' reflects the outburst of fulfilled longing. His soul is his innermost being; his heart and flesh represent the totality of his being, inward and outward. 3 Seeing even tiny birds making themselves at home, he realizes the safety of God's house, and for himself associates this with the Lord's provision of thy altars, the places of sacrifice for sin, reconciliation and communion with God.

5–8 The joy of the pilgrimage

From the vantage-point of his present blessedness in God's house (v. 4), he looks back to the joy that attended his way. 5 Blessing attends those who draw their strength from God and are utterly devoted to pilgrimage. 6 Certainly they will meet dry, desolate places on their journey, places like the valley of Baca, but he makes light of its trouble and treats it as if it were a spring of water, and to such joyful faith the Lord responds with His refreshing rains. 7 The pilgrimage is crowned by the meeting with God Himself and 8 fellowship in prayer.

9–12 The joy of the Lord

The prayer for the king is unexpected but is explained by the following verses. If the psalmist is to be preserved in his enjoyment of spiritual privileges, then he must pray for national stability. 9 In this direct sense his communion with God depends on the continuing favour of the Lord to His anointed king, who is a shield to his people. 10–12 The climax of the psalm lies in these concluding verses: it is not the house that is his delight so much as its Occupant, loved for His nature as sun and shield, His bounteous gifts and the simplicity of the way of faith.

PSALM 85. A PRAYER FOR REVIVAL

Written at a time when God's people were enduring some set-back of communal fortunes, this psalm reflects the three dominant thoughts of the godly men who faced the labour and toil of reconstruction.

1–3 God's goodness recalled

Three actions of God are described, viz. their territorial restoration, national forgiveness, and reconciliation to God. This provides a basis for the spirit of prayer and optimism which pervades the psalm. God's past mercies fortify His people for present distress and assure them of future glory.

4–7 Present distress

These verses expose the nature of their trouble: a sense of alienation from God. The past mercies are not being experienced in the present time. 4, 5 Therefore they pray, first that God will be reconciled to them in the putting away of His indignation; 6 secondly that they may be revived so as to rejoice in Him; 7 and thirdly that they may experience fulfilment of the covenant-promises of His steadfast love and their own salvation.

8–13 Promise

8 In this verse the psalmist speaks to himself in tones of hopefulness. He is sure about God; He will speak peace to his people. But that is conditional (according to the reading in the text) upon sincerity, or (as the mg. reads, following the Hebrew) upon consistent loyalty. 9–13 represent his perception of the word which the Lord speaks. 9 The blessing of salvation will soon be experienced by those who fear him, and they will know the reality of God in all His glory (cf. Is. 60:1ff.) dwelling in their midst (Zc. 2:4, 5, 11). 10 When this salvation comes it will be seen first to involve absolute harmony of the divine attributes: He shows steadfast love to sinners without abandoning faithfulness to His own holy nature; His righteousness of character is not at loggerheads with His gift of peace to men (1 Jn. 1:9; Rom. 3:23–26). 11 Secondly, salvation issues in harmony between man and God, and people will live in fidelity under the eye of a righteous God. 12 Thirdly, as ever, the day of salvation is the restoration of Eden: nature itself burgeons with new life. All this is no idle fancy. 13 It is surely grounded in the righteousness of God, His absolute adherence to His pledged word and His declared purposes. This righteousness, personified as a herald, goes before Him as He draws near with salvation for His people.

PSALM 86. O TURN UNTO ME!

This psalm, something of a mosaic of quotations and reminiscences of other psalms, is an expression of a devout soul seeking the assuring fellowship and strengthening grace of the Lord. The petition for aid against certain foes (v. 14) does not necessarily root the poem in a particular historical situation. A striking feature of the psalm is that each petition is accompanied by a reason why the prayer should be granted.

1–7 Supplication

This is an expectant and humble cry for an experience of God's favour which shall reinvigorate the psalmist's soul and provide confidence respecting the future outlook. This plea is based on a stated relationship with God: 1 he belongs to the poor and needy, often, as here, synonyms for God's 'dependants'; 2 he is one of the godly, the covenant-people, and also a believer. 5 It is also based on the divine nature: good and forgiving, abounding in steadfast love. For possible sources of these phrases see, e.g., Pss. 70:5a; 72:2b; 25:20a; Is. 26:3; 25:1; Ex. 34:6; Ps. 55:1.

8–11 Adoration

8–10 This expression of the ground of the psalmist's faith in the Lord comprehends His creative power and ultimate purpose, His essential goodness and continuous activity, His sovereignty over all and His accessibility to man. 11 This estimate of God leads to the desire to become like Him in mind and manner, i.e. to be integrated in a life inseparable from Him (cf. Je. 32:39). Compare possible sources in, e.g., Ex. 15:11; Dt. 3:24; Pss. 22:27–29; 77:14; 83:18; 25:4; 27:11.

12, 13 Thanksgiving

A climax of praise and worship is reached wherein the godly soul experiences a unity of being which is a partial participation in eternal glory: it is the affirmation of a God-centred life. The basis of this is a former experience of divine deliverance from uttermost desolation.

14–17 Petition

14 Finally, mention is made of certain immediate circumstances of peril. 15 But the confession of faith toward God is repeated (see v. 5). 16, 17 The intensity of the whole prayer is then summarized in the passionate words Turn to me . . . Show me a sign of thy favour. Cf. Pss. 25:16; 69:16. The phrase son of thy handmaid implies a relationship akin to that of a slave born into his master's household and therefore having a double claim upon his master's protection. With v. 17b cf. Ps. 35:4. The words thou, Lord in the concluding phrase are emphatic.

PSALM 87. ZION, THE MOTHER OF ALL MEN

This brief psalm is essentially prophetic (cf. Is. 2:2; 44:5; 66:23; Zc. 2:11). The vision of Zion as the metropolis of the world-wide kingdom of God is not to be interpreted geographically, but spiritually (cf. Heb. 11:10). The dominant thought is that of a universal and glad acceptance of God as Lord and King, in which allegiance all sources of international friction are removed. Cf. Gal. 3:8; 4:26; Heb. 12:22ff.; Rev. 7:9; 15:4.

1–3 Zion exalted by the choice of God

1 The city which God has founded is beloved by Him. 2 The whole city, represented poetically by its gates, is pre-eminent above all other dwelling-places. 3 This fact is proved by the glorious things which God has spoken about His city (e.g. Is. 2:2–4; 4:2–6; 28:16).

4–6 Zion exalted by the ingathering of the Gentiles

The words This one was born there (or, in her) occur in three separate sentences attributed to God, and contain the basic concept of the whole poem. This one and that one refers to the nations such as Rahab (Egypt; cf. Is. 51:9; Ps. 89:10); Babylon, from whose great power the children of Israel had been rescued; Philistia, Tyre, both typical of Israel's age-long enemies; and Ethiopia, representative of the remote peoples of the earth. The words was born there imply the identity of these Gentile nations with Israel; they receive similar privileges of citizenship (cf. Eph. 2:19). Indeed in the spiritual Zion each and every nation, 'this man and that man', shall claim incorporation on the ground of a rebirth, and the Most High Himself shall make it so. When He draws up the roll of the peoples in His city there will be no aliens (cf. Ps. 47:9; Am. 9:11, 12; Eph. 3:6; Rev. 7:9, 10).

7 Zion exalted by the testimony of the redeemed

This reconstruction of the basis of society inaugurates a period of great jubilation. Whether folk sing or dance, whatever they may say or do, the theme and ground of their life is All my springs are in you. These words summarize the thought that the new life of the redeemed finds its perpetual inspiration and vigour in the experience of dwelling in the city of God.

PSALM 88. A CRY OF AFFLICTION

This lament is unique in the Psalter because of its gloom and unrelieved misery, devoid even of hope. Contrast the conclusions of Pss. 22 and 31 with vv. 15–18. It seems to be a personal elegy by someone who, like Job, was strained between an undeviating trust in God as the sole source of his salvation, and an intensely bewildering experience which appeared to negate the foundation of all such trust. The divisions of the psalm are marked by those verses in which the psalmist recalls how patiently he has prayed to God: vv. 1, 9b, 13.

1–9a Patient faith in the face of calamity

The psalmist's faith is shown by the fact that throughout this troubled psalm he appears as a man of prayer. 1 Here his patience in believing intercession is noted by the words day . . . night. 3–5 The situation which prompts this tireless prayer is, in general, that his troubled life is about to terminate in death, a death in which he sees no light of hope, for he feels himself to be dying without a single gleam of divine favour (cf. Pss. 6:4; 30:9). 6–9a But, in particular, he complains of the wrath of God, the alienation of friends and his bitter personal distress.

9b–12 Patient faith in the face of crisis

9b Notwithstanding such travail he does not cease to pray or falter in faith. Every day his voice and his posture appeal to God. 10–12 The urgency of his cry is provoked by the finality of death. It is not, of course, that the OT saw all death in these terms, but that, like the NT, it saw the awful possibility of dying under divine wrath, and in that case going beyond the point where God might be expected to intervene in supernatural wonders, or where there would be cause to praise Him. Not even the covenant love and faithfulness of God can avail for those who have died under His wrath; they live in darkness, aware only of His dread forgetfulness. Consequently, this section is full of the sense of crisis; if God is to act on his behalf, it must be now, at once, for all too soon it will be too late. 11 Abaddon, meaning 'destruction', was another name for the abode of the dead. See Jb. 26:6; 31:12; Pr. 15:11.

3–18 Patient faith in the face of perplexity

13 But again, though distress has reached critical proportions, faith greets each new day with prayer, in spite of the fact that he is utterly perplexed by God's purposes as seen in his life. 14, 15 Divine wrath, which he cannot explain, has been his long-standing lot, and 16, 17 now the wrath which he has long experienced rises like a flood to swamp and destroy. 18 Not only so, but it is God who has alienated human sympathy from the sufferer so that, literally, 'my friends are darkness', i.e. there is nothing to be seen but darkness and hopelessness where he might reasonably and rightly expect light and relief (cf. Jb. 6:14–20). Aptly, but dreadfully, the last word of the psalm is darkness, and yet therein lies its wonder—the wonder of triumphant faith, that a man should see no light at all but yet go on supplicating in fervent, trustful, ceaseless prayer (cf. Is. 50:10). Truly the OT saint can be our master and teacher!

PSALM 89. GOD'S SURE COVENANT AND ISRAEL'S DISTRESS

The last psalm in the third book of the Psalter may be regarded as a companion to the first one, Ps. 73. Both deal with certain questions which confront a godly man in this earthly existence. On the one hand there is the problem of the prosperity of the wicked (Ps. 73), and on the other there is the mystery of how God is faithful to His word when events seem to show His abhorrence of it (Ps. 89). The particular promises which are here called in question by the tide of events are those which God made to David and his dynasty. The psalm stems from some dark days in the experience of one of the Davidic kings, or else, as some hold, it belongs to the annual liturgical drama in which the king's utter dependence upon the Lord was portrayed in his first being humbled to the dust and then receiving an eleventh-hour deliverance by divine intervention. Out of the darkness of either (or both) historical or liturgical despair this wonderful psalm proceeded.

The question which the psalm poses is this: what is to be done when the promises of God are denied by the facts of experience? It answers: turn the promises into prayers and plead them before God.

1–4 Introduction

1, 2 The speaker is the psalmist. He intends to sing, first, of the Lord's steadfast love, i.e. of His loving-kindnesses to the children of Israel, and especially to the house of David. Secondly, of His faithfulness, i.e. His consistent adherence to His promises and covenants. These two attributes of God are mentioned again in v. 2 together with the same qualities of perpetuity and permanence. They also form the foundation and scaffolding of the psalmist's subsequent worship (see vv. 5, 8, 14, 24, 33, 49). This initial affirmation is an expression of faith, the greatness of which must be measured against the sombre conditions referred to at the close of the psalm. 3, 4 This attitude of faith arises from God's own declaration in former times (cf. 2 Sa. 7:8–16), which is quoted as the origin of the psalmist's belief.

5–37 God's majesty and covenant

5–18 The divine attributes extolled. These verses are an expansion of vv. 1 and 2. 5 In place of the psalmist's voice (v. 1), there is the angelic host which extols the ageless wonder of God's ways with men. 6–8 The purpose of these verses is to declare the heavenly uniqueness of the Lord, and therefore to give reason for believing that His promises are sure. Since none of the heavenly beings, whether of His immediate council (cf. 1 Ki. 22:19, 20) or of the general throng round about him, can match or resist Him, then surely His faithfulness is linked with supreme might and His promise must stand.

9 From this verse the emphasis is upon God's power in the earth rather than in the heavens. He rules the raging sea; 10 He crushed the power of Rahab (i.e. Egypt, as in Ps. 87:4), and has scattered all other foes. 11 He possesses heaven and earth. 12 Indeed the whole earth, from one end to the other (the north and the south), is His and the most noticeable features of Palestine, Mts. Tabor and Hermon, are testimonies and monuments to His greatness. 13 Events have repeatedly shown His mighty arm and strong hand, 14 and furthermore, in earth as in heaven, the divine power is inseparable from the divine righteousness. Once again the implied question arises: are not His promises secure?

As a consequence of this, Israel, chosen by God who is so great, must be exceptionally blessed. They will surely enjoy the victory, and will see how central their king is to the Lord's purposes. 15 The festal shout could well be the cry at the Feast of Tabernacles acknowledging the Lord as King. 17 Our horn is exalted. The horn symbolizes strength, and its exaltation implies triumphant strength. 18 The shield describes the king in his covenanted obligations as the protector of his people.

19–37 The explicitness of the Davidic covenant. These verses expand the truth of v. 18 by showing the place given by God to David and the subsequent blessings David enjoyed. In the development of the psalm so far they come naturally as the logical outcome of being chosen by the all-powerful and all-gracious God, but they are preparing us for the shock of contradiction which the next section is to bring. First, David is described, in himself (v. 19b), in relation to others (v. 19c), in relation to God (v. 20), and secondly, his prosperity is indicated (vv. 21–37). Throughout, the emphasis is on the Lord as the source of each aspect of David's success. The Lord recalls His vow to overthrow David's foes (vv. 21–23), extend his dominions (vv. 24, 25), exalt his sovereignty (vv. 26, 27), and establish his kingdom for ever (vv. 28–37). 19 Of old refers back to 2 Sa. 7. 20 Cf. 1 Sa. 16:1–13. 25 The sea is the Mediterranean; the rivers may be a plural of majesty for the 'great' river Euphrates, or it may signify 'all' rivers: the universal dominion of the Davidic king (cf. Ps. 2:8; Is. 9:7). 27 First-born refers to his adoption as God's son (Ps. 2:7). 30–37 The faithlessness of men does not overthrow the faithfulness of God. His covenant with David was moral in that it did not offer him a 'blank cheque' but contained stated moral requirements and responses of obedience to God (2 Sa. 7:14), but the divine oath vowed a perpetual dynasty. Herein lies the whole dilemma of the psalm.

38–51 The psalmist protests that God has now spurned the covenant

The emphatic But now initiates the forceful contrast which is provided by the following verses. The protest has two aspects which reflect the two themes of the preceding part of the psalm. First, the honour and power of God and His goodness to Israel (vv. 5–18) are reversed in the evidences of the destruction He has wrought, the inversion of His promises, and the disgrace and shame brought to Israel (vv. 38–45). Secondly, the explicit and solemn covenant with David (vv. 20–37) is reversed in the inexplicable and seemingly capricious abandonment of the undertaking (vv. 46–51).

38–45 A deliberate parallel. The pattern of the words 'thou hast done so and so' is a deliberate parallel with the similar structure of vv. 9–14. 38 The raging sea is replaced by wrath toward the king, 39 the humiliation of 'Rahab' is surpassed by the degradation of the throne (the crown defiled). 40, 41 The creation of the world, its bounds and its mountains, is matched with the destruction of the kingdom, its frontiers and citadels. 42 The might of the divine arm had exalted righteousness and judgment and made glad the people (vv. 13–15), whereas now it is the right hand of his foes which is exalted and it is the enemies who rejoice. 43 He who had been the glory of their strength (v. 17) now fought only in pretence, for His weapons were reversed and harmless, 44, 45 and their throne was covered with shame.

46–51 A deliberate contrast. 46, 47 The first thought, life's weakness and brevity, is the opposite of the strength and permanence of David in vv. 22–29. 48 It seems that God has made men for a mere nothing; all must die and that comparatively quickly. Unless God reaffirms the covenant speedily the Davidic dynasty, the trusting psalmist and all men will come together to the grave and deliverance will be too late.

49–51 The second and final thought, Where are the Lord's faithfulness and mercies?, needs no repetition; but it is the counterpart of His perpetual presence and guidance which were implicit in vv. 30–35. In conclusion the psalmist reverts to his opening words, first concerning the oath sworn to David (cf. v. 3), and secondly concerning the song of praise he intended to sing (v. 1). We must not miss what he is actually doing. As he thus epitomizes the promises of God he makes them into prayers. This is equivalent to saying that the last word will not be with the adverse events of history but with the God whose faithfulness now seems called in question but which will yet be triumphantly vindicated.

BOOK FOUR. PSALMS 90–106

PSALM 90. RECONCILIATION, THE BASIS OF LIFE

Commentators profess either agnosticism or complete disbelief in the ascription of this psalm to Moses. They give, however, no reasons for their hesitation, and there is in fact no good reason for doubting Mosaic authorship. Delitzsch and Calvin are among those who accept the ascription. The core of the poem (vv. 7–12) appears to have as a definite historical background the latter months of the 38 years' wandering in the wilderness when the generation which was adult on leaving Egypt was rapidly dying off (see Nu. 14:21–23), and this sense of Israel's mortality, accentuated by the judgment on their stubborn unbelief, provides an excellent point of origin for the contents of the psalm.

1–6 The eternal Creator and our ephemeral life

1 Since the days of Abraham the people of God had had no abiding place, but it could be truly said that the Lord had always shown Himself to be their perpetual place of rest (Dt. 33:27). The psalm thus opens with the relationship of peace with God: not that He dwells with us (the presence of God) but that we dwell with Him, the privilege of a reconciled people. Against this basic truth the psalm considers the pitiful brevity of human life and the reality of the wrath of God. How could these things be faced and borne if the basic issue of reconciliation were not settled?

The Eternal is now contrasted with the transient. 2 God outlasts even the most enduring things in man's experience, the very fabric of the earth, 3 whereas man himself returns, by virtue of the divine edict upon fallen humanity (Gn. 3:19), to the dust in death. 4 God outlasts and shames into insignificance even the longest time-measurements known to man, 5, 6 while man can offer no resistance to the flood which sweeps him away, is as insubstantial as a dream, and for all his fine show perishes as quickly as grass.

7–11 Life's sorrows and God's holiness

The security of v. 1, moving through the reference to sin and the Fall in v. 3, is brought into contrast with the dread fact of divine wrath, the opposite of peace and reconciliation. 7 It is this wrath which brings death, 8 and that not just as a physical fact but as a judgment upon our spiritual state. 9, 10 It is this wrath which mars life and makes even extension of days by no means an unmixed blessing. 11 Yet, even so, men neither appreciate nor realize to the full what the wrath of God means. 'And in regard to the fear due to thee, (who considers the power of) thy wrath?' The point is that, though the wrath of God is the leading factor to be considered in a sinful world, people neither take note of it nor regulate their lives in respect of it.

12–17 Prayer for peace with God

Human life is set between two points: the wrath of God, which makes life transient, and peace with God which gives it stability and permanency. The concluding prayer asks for the latter experience.

12 It starts by asking for a change of attitude: first, on man's part, that, taught by God, he may learn wisdom in his brief life; 13 and secondly, on God's part, that He might turn from His just wrath to tender pity, for salvation always ultimately rests upon God's being satisfied to forgive sinners. 14, 15 The prayer next asks for a change in experience: permanent joy and the end of the wrath. 16 And finally it requests a change of prospects: the prolongation of the nation, under divine favour, to succeeding generations, 17 and present security coupled with conscious experience of divine benevolence. Note how the prayer exactly matches the stated needs: the need of knowledge (v. 11) and the prayer for it (v. 12); the experience of wrath (vv. 7–10) and the prayer for salvation (vv. 13–15); the fact of transience (vv. 2–6) and the prayer for continuance (vv. 16, 17). To read all this in the light of Dt. 2:14–17 is to see the exact aptness of the psalm to the Mosaic situation, but its truth runs on to the wonder of the peace with God, the deliverance from wrath, and the eternal security that are ours in Christ.

PSALM 91. THE SECURITY OF FAITH

The vocabulary of protection and deliverance is ransacked to make this the Psalter's central utterance on the security of the believer. Two voices address an unnamed person assuring him of his safety in God: the first voice speaks to him as 'you' (vv. 1–13), and the second voice is that of the Lord (vv. 14–16). It may be that Eaton is correct in thinking that 'a Temple minister speaks to the king (cf. 21.8–12) and concludes by citing an oracle for him (vv. 14–16)'. But since this interpretation is not compelled by the contents of the psalm, its message applies directly to every believer. It ought to be noted that RSV achieves this division of the psalm into two voices by altering the Hebrew text slightly in vv. 2 (from 'I will say . . .') and 9 (see mg.). RV is a very faithful rendering of the Hebrew which gives us the concurring testimony of three voices on the theme of security, as follows: v. 1 announces the theme; in v. 2 the psalmist gives a personal testimony; in vv. 3, 4 another voice testifies about the Lord; in vv. 5–8 (note the change to 'you') the Lord testifies to the psalmist. This pattern is then repeated again: v. 9a, the psalmist; vv. 9b–13, the second voice; and vv. 14–16, the Lord.

1–8 The grounds of security

1 Our security rests, first, on the nature of God. He is the Most High, the all-ruling God (Gn. 14:19); He is the Almighty (Heb. šadday), the God who intervenes in saving power when man's strength is quite gone (Gn. 17:1; 28:3; 48:3; 49:25); He is both shelter, offering protection (cf. Is. 4:6), and shadow, offering refreshment (cf. Is. 32:2); He offers not only a dwelling-place, but, as the verb abides indicates, makes Himself our Host and makes us His protected guests (cf. Gn. 19:2), safe because it is His duty to keep us safe.

2 Our security is grounded, secondly, on personal faith. Whether we follow the Hebrew 'I will say' or RSV He . . . will say, this verse is testimony of the God in whom I trust, and, in trusting, I find in Him both refuge and fortress, One who gives both safety to those who trust and safety from the danger which threatens.

3, 4 The third ground of safety is God's faithfulness. 3 matches the word fortress, safety from, and 4 matches refuge, safety for. The security offered covers the snare (things visible), the pestilence (things invisible), the fowler (things human). The doubling of the words pinions . . . wings (the security the animal world knows), shield . . . buckler (the security man devises) denotes completeness. Central to it all is God's faithfulness.

5–8 The fourth security is that of character, the righteousness implied by the contrasting fate of the wicked. 5, 6 This security touches all times, night . . . day; all circumstances, darkness . . . noonday; all dangers, the arrow of the human foe, the unseen foe of pestilence, and possibly the demonic foe, destruction (so the Hebrew may be understood); 7 all catastrophes, even the gravest which might bring death to a thousand or even ten thousand. None of these expressions, of course, must be understood as saying that the believer will be untouched by worldly calamities. They are to be understood in the light of Ps. 73, that the believer always possesses a wealth and security in God unknown to the world.

9–16 The blessings of security

9 The opening phrase sets the course of the second section of the psalm, as it describes what follows for the one who has made the Lord his refuge. 10–12 The first blessing is that of God's guidance: the angels of God opening out life's pathway (cf. Gn. 32:1, 2; 48:16; Ex. 33:2; Acts 12:6–11). 13 The next blessing is victory, the doubly mentioned lion representing every opposition of strength, and the doubly mentioned serpent every opposing subtlety (Gn. 3:1). 14–16 But the third blessing receives the most attention, the blessing of fellowship with God. On man's side this fellowship is expressed in love, knowledge of God's name (i.e. intimate awareness and joy in the revealed nature of God), resort to God in prayer; on God's side it is expressed, as the words signify, in the deliverance which makes a way of escape (cf. 1 Cor. 10:13), the protection which lifts him high above the danger (cf. Ps. 27:5), the constant watchfulness which hears and heeds the cry of need, the presence of God known especially when the need is greatest (cf. Ps. 23:4), the intervention of God coming in power to the rescue, the bestowal of honour in God's sight, a life spent in true self-fulfilment and satisfaction, and beyond all, the full enjoyment of eternal salvation.

PSALM 92. A SABBATH HYMN

The association of this psalm with the sabbath is probably due to its spirit of joyful praise and its outlook upon a world cleansed of sinners and evil-doers. In this latter sense, the psalm may be anticipatory of the eternal sabbath rest for the children of God which in its fullness is yet to come (cf. Heb. 4:9ff.).

1–3 Introduction

The praise and worship of God is not merely approved by Him as good but is a most pleasant activity for men (cf. Ps. 147:1). 1 Thanksgiving focuses upon the name (revealed nature) of God as the redeeming Yahweh and the sovereign Most High (cf. Gn. 14:19, 20, 22) and 2 upon the steadfast love and faithfulness which are His constant attitudes towards us. The practice of having morning and evening periods of prayer and praise is often mentioned in the Psalter. See, e.g., Pss. 5:3; 42:8; 55:17; 63:6.

4–9 God's works and His judgment on the wicked

God's activity is seen both in His works of creation and in His rule over the affairs of men. It is the latter which the psalmist has most in mind and is most evocative of his praise. 4 I sing for joy, or 'exult', because the designs and purposes of God are actually and continuously being disclosed in history (cf. Pss. 33:11; 40:5; 139:17). 5 We are thinking His thoughts after Him but usually find them too deep for us to grasp (cf. Is. 55:8ff.; Rom. 11:33).

6, 7 Men who are dominated by sensuality or by moral perversity cannot discern this providential government in the world nor understand why the wicked flourish as the spring grass. The psalmist not only declares the destruction of the wicked, but implies that their short-lived prosperity is an intentional lesson to the godly (cf. Ps. 73:17ff.). 8 This is because the Lord is exalted in judgment (cf. Ps. 29:10) and 9 all opposition to Him or His people shall be thoroughly disrupted.

10–15 Personal blessings and God's goodness to the righteous

Adoration of God frequently arises from a realization that we are not merely observers of God's mercy and judgments, but are ourselves caught up into the pattern of His holy beneficence (cf. 2 Pet. 1:2–4; Eph. 2:19ff.). 10 This consciousness of being a partaker with God is often expressed by the psalmists in the metaphors of an upraised horn belonging to a source of great power (Nu. 23:22; Pss. 29:6; 89:17) and of an inverted horn out of which flowed the anointing oil, symbol of identification and incorporation (cf. 1 Sa. 16:13; Ps. 45:7). 11 As he feels almost a partner with God, the psalmist knows that he will see and hear of the downfall of all those who oppose the servants of the Lord. He feels that he is inseparable from the triumphant activity of God.

12 The contrast now reaches its climax. It has been suggested in the antithesis of vv. 6 and 11, and is expanded in the imagery of the tall, erect and ever-green palm tree which is so superior to the grass underfoot (v. 7). The cedars of Lebanon were noted for their size and excellence (cf. Is. 2:13). 13 The imagery of such great trees growing luxuriantly in the house of the Lord has been found previously in Ps. 52:8. 14 The basic idea is that of permanence and nourishment. 15 But behind it lies the thought of acceptance and eternal security with God which leads on to that fruitfulness in which is seen at work the combination of strength and refreshment in the divine rock (cf. Ex. 17:5, 6; 1 Cor. 10:4).

PSALM 93. THE LORD'S ETERNAL SOVEREIGNTY

If Jerusalem enjoyed an annual festival in which the Lord was specially worshipped as Creator-King (see Introduction), how suitable this psalm would be for use at it! But suitability does not constitute proof, and the psalm rather bears witness to the richness of the doctrine of God the Creator in the OT. In the structure of the psalm we note that vv. 1, 3, 4 describe situations, while vv. 2 and 5 record testimonies. It is as God's people dwell on the basic truths about Him that they are drawn out in devotion and dedication.

1, 2 The Lord in relation to the world

The thought moves through three consecutive points. 1a First, there is the reigning God, majestic and mighty; 1b secondly, there is the stable world, and the conclusion is invited, though not explicitly stated, that the stability of the created order depends on the strength of its ruling God; 2 thirdly, the people of God, knowing Him personally and therefore able to speak to Him as thou, ascribe strength and stability where it belongs and to whom it belongs. They throw in their lot with the unseen power of God known by faith, for it is 'by faith' that 'we understand that the world was created by the word of God, so that what is seen was made out of things which do not appear' (Heb. 11:3), and that what is seen is also maintained by what does not 'appear', the everlasting God.

3–5 The world in relation to the Lord

The order of the first two of the foregoing three thoughts is here reversed so that first we look at the world, then at God, and finally we hear again the testimony of God's people. 3 The floods typify the restless fretfulness of the world against the Lord (cf. Ps. 46:3, 6; Lk. 21:25, 26), but 4 they can avail nothing against the Lord who in power is mightier and in exaltation is lifted up on high. Thus in OT thought God the Creator is both world Sustainer, as in the first section of the psalm (cf. Ps. 24:1; Is. 40:25, 26), and world Ruler, as here. 5 The reaction of the people of God, again addressing Him directly, is heard. Since their God rules over all, they acknowledge that He rules them also. His decrees, that which He has testified to be what He requires of them, are sure, i.e. to be relied upon as correctly stating His will and correctly outlining His rules for them; and His basic requirement of those admitted to the fellowship of His house is holiness, a requirement He will never relax but which will stand for evermore.

PSALM 94. AN APPEAL AGAINST THE DELAY OF GOD'S JUDGMENT

The theme of this psalm is the age-old problem of reconciling what happens in the world with the goodness and power of God. Primarily this psalm expresses the immediate reaction of the natural man to the affirmation of faith in Ps. 93. It is the challenge of harsh realism to the confidence of heartfelt trust, a reminder of the anomaly of man's devilry within the moral order established by God. Apart from the invocation in the two opening verses the psalm falls into three parts, each introduced by an inquiry or protest.

1, 2 Introduction

The appeal has no sense of malice about it, but is simply a cry for recompense (cf. Je. 51:56c), that all worldly pride may be terminated and all ungodly deeds recoil upon the perpetrators (cf. Jb. 4:8; Ho. 8:7a; Gal. 6:7ff.). This process would inevitably accompany the manifestation of divine truth, hence the appeal shine forth. The prayer for recompense rests upon a facet of the character of God.

3–15 How long shall the wicked triumph?

3 The query concerns the present period of time; it does not imply any suspicion of divine impotence. The inquiry is elaborated in three respects:

4–7 Facts. 4 The wicked are described as pouring forth a stream of arrogant and boastful words which spring from self-esteem. 5 They are not only pompous ranters but they also crush that remnant of devout souls who form the Lord's people and heritage. 6 The appeal to the divine nature implied in the cry for recompense is strengthened by noting that these oppressors vent their spleen on those helpless ones dearest to the Lord (cf. Dt. 10:18; Pss. 68:5; 146:9). 7 In doing this, they act as if it were possible to escape the divine Observer, adding folly to their crimes.

8–11 Principles. 8 The lack of discernment (v. 7) is not on God's part but theirs (cf. Jn. 9:39ff.). Three principles are declared.

9 First, the Creator must be greater than His creatures; i.e. He who made doors of access to the human mind must have the power and right of entry.

10 Secondly, the moral ruler of great historic movements must exercise His holy authority over every man, i.e. if the ordinary nations are trained and instructed in right and wrong (cf. Rom. 1:18ff.) and are held responsible for their misdeeds (Rom. 1:32), how much more shall He Himself, teacher of the knowledge of righteousness, be righteous in His rebukes?

11 Thirdly, the Lord knows fully the nature of human thoughts (cf. Ps. 139:1–4; Jn. 2:24, 25) and recognizes that they, both the thinkers and their thoughts, are as insubstantial as breath (cf. Pss. 39:5, 6; 62:9).

12–15 Beliefs. After the historical and philosophical, there is the religious aspect. This is a development of the central thought in the previous paragraph (see v. 10). 12 Blessed is he whom God teaches by imposing a discipline upon him (cf. Ps. 119:71; Heb. 12:5–9) and instructing him in the law of the Lord, i.e. in the nature and meaning of the divine self-revelation. 13 That man is given peace of heart and mind; he is at rest inwardly, even in times of adversity, which will continue until the full and final judgment of the wicked is effected. 14 That ultimate action is inevitable, and equally sure is the faithfulness of the Lord to His chosen people. 15 Judgment will become righteous (contrast vv. 5, 6) and the upright shall follow the way of godliness without hindrance.

16–19 Who shall champion me against evil?

The belief in an ultimate vindication of the moral order provides a poor defence against immediate and unscrupulous injustice. 16 The query is the natural response of the godly man who is oppressed. The answer is implied 'The Lord is my defender', and this is affirmed in detail in the following three verses which correspond to the three aspects previously outlined. 17 The physical threat of being driven to an unjust death, the silence of the grave (see vv. 5, 6), has been averted solely by the providence of the Lord. 18 The psychological peril of slipping from the path of sober-minded trust in God because of the difficulties of going on has been prevented only by the effectual and sustaining mercy of the Lord (cf. v. 8; Ps. 145:14; Jude 24). 19 The spiritual danger of lapsing into the intense solitariness of unbelief has never developed because, whenever anxious cares surged round his inmost soul, the consolations of the Lord ensured real heart-peace (cf. v. 14; Ps. 27:5).

20–23 But are the wicked to claim God as their ally?

The satisfactory testimony of the godly soul, to the effect that the Lord fully sustains him in periods of adversity and oppression, did not touch the external situation which is the root of the whole problem. 20 What, then, is God's relationship to the wicked? Is there any divine approval behind the fact that the wicked are in the places of authority and use legal statutes to make wrong appear right?

The psalmist offers no solution to this point but simply reiterates the three major aspects of the matter. 21 He first declares the existence or fact of injustice, as in vv. 4–7. 22 Secondly, he testifies to the Lord's care and protection in his own case, replacing the abstract principles of vv. 8–11 by personal experience. 23 Thirdly, he affirms his belief in the power and righteousness of God and in the ultimate retribution upon the wicked, as in vv. 12–15. His answer is practical, not theoretical. In the time of trouble the godly man has God and hope, and that is sufficient.

GENERAL INTRODUCTION TO PSALMS 95–100

These six liturgical psalms have a common theme—the joyous adoration of Yahweh as the supreme Ruler of His creation as well as the covenant God of Israel. Although written separately, they have been fitted together into an elaborate choral work centred on the fact that 'the Lord reigns'. The basic structure is the usual Hebraic alternation of parallel themes and it is almost certain that each of these psalms was sung antiphonally. Similar groups of psalms arranged for choral services of praise occur in 113–118 and 146–150.

The anthem begins (Ps. 95) with the knowledge of God imparted exclusively to Israel in connection with the acts of deliverance in Egypt and at the Red Sea. A larger view develops in Ps. 96; Israel is unnamed and the call to worship is addressed to all nations and creatures. Israel's covenant of Ps. 95, 'He is our God and we are His people', is replaced by the natural and general elements in which God is known as Creator of the heavens and Source of all righteousness and truth.

These two aspects of deity are amplified in Ps. 97, where He is described, first as the supreme One before whom creation is ever on the verge of dissolution, and then as the faithful One whose goodness and holiness are always being disclosed to all people through Zion. This great privilege granted to Israel evokes a jubilant song of praise (Ps. 98), not so much on the grounds of Israel's monopoly, but because of the marvel that the divine revelation of salvation should be made known to the ends of the earth.

Nevertheless, although all creation is under an obligation to praise the Lord, He has chosen Zion as the centre and focus of His self-revelation. Consequently Ps. 99 is the most particular of the whole group—the cherubim in Zion's sanctuary, the divine purpose in the history of Jacob, God's personal response to such leaders as Moses, Aaron and Samuel, and His patient mercy in dealing with a wayward nation. Finally, in Ps. 100 the appeal for universal adoration of the Lord is fused, both with Israel's position as His peculiar people, and with the enduring quality of the Lord's mercy and goodness.

This is the most concentrated song of the divine universal enthronement in the OT. The fact that it bears clear marks of liturgical arrangement and use underlines the celebrating of the Lord's Kingship in Temple festivals, and to that extent underlines the possibility of an annual 'Enthronement' Festival. But once again the abiding value is to enter into the riches of OT teaching on God the Creator King.

PSALM 95. PRAISE THE CREATOR'S POWER AND PATIENCE

This great threefold call (vv. 1, 6, 7a) insists that the nature of our response in worship is determined by the nature of God as revealed.

1–5 A God of kingly power

1, 2 Praise and thanksgiving proceed from the fact that God has saved us, 3 and in doing so has shown Himself to be the supreme God and world Ruler. There is only one God, but men do find and follow other objects of worship, and in this sense there are other gods. On such an occasion as the Exodus, the Lord revealed His supreme power. 4, 5 The facts of creation reveal the power of the Creator (cf. Is. 50:3), but also His sole Deity, for in pagan thought the depths were ascribed to Molech, the heights to Baal, and the sea to Tiamat.

6, 7a A God of special grace

Worship in the prostrate posture of utter dedication arises from contemplating His special care of His own people: bringing them into being, as their Maker, superintending the course of their history as Shepherd, and placing His Shepherd's hand of love on each individual.

7b–11 A God of holy wrath

7b Obedience is His due who so signally showed His wrath against the disobedient. 8 This doubting, rebelling state of the heart needs continually to be watched, 9 for it led the wilderness-generation to doubt God's ability (Ex. 17:1–7), to forget the evidence of His work (cf. Is. 5:12, 18, 19), and 10, 11 to forfeit the promised land (Nu. 14:21–23; Dt. 1:34–39).

PSALM 96. THE UNIVERSAL KING

This psalm shows the extent to which a missionary universalism had entered OT thought. All the earth (v. 1) and all peoples (v. 7) are summoned into the church. 1–3 In the first movement of the thought the emphasis is that this universal message centres upon the name or character of God as revealed to Israel, and the supernatural marvellous works He has done for them.

4–6 The second movement exposes the unreality of other gods (cf. Is. 2:8, 18, 20; 40:19ff.; 41:21–24; 44:12ff.). On the other hand the glory and power of Yahweh are said to be evident in the heavens. See, e.g., Pss. 19:1–6; 33:6; 104:1–3. The attributes of God are represented in v. 6 as His regalia (cf. Pss. 93:1; 104:1); His strength and beauty were symbolized in the ark of the covenant combining as it did moral purity (the Ten Commandments) and pardoning grace (the mercy seat).

7–9 The third movement summons all peoples to homage, praise, offering, prayer, opening full membership of God's people to them through the sacrificial offerings.

10 The fourth movement repeats the theme of Ps. 93:1. Men must realize that the Lord is King and that only in Him does the world become stabilized. This cry of acclamation that the Lord is become King echoes against the background of His creation of the world out of chaos.

11–13 The two final stanzas of the psalm seem to be Messianic anticipations. The effect of His coming will be seen in the realm of creation (cf. Is. 44:23ff.; 55:12; also Ps. 24:1), and in the realm of government. To judge is not (in the OT) necessarily to condemn, but to rule over and to decide about. When the Lord thus rules, the world will for the first time have an utterly righteous government, and be blessed in the knowledge of the truth.

PSALM 97. KING OF ALL, KING OF ZION

Continuing the concluding thought of Ps. 96, the joy of the coming reign of God is called for in the light of His present reign. First, therefore, the earth with its far-flung coastlands (v. 1; AV 'isles'), and secondly, Zion (v. 8) are urged to rejoice and be glad. This double summons, with its repeated verbs, gives the division of the psalm.

1–7 The nature of God's sovereign rule

1–3 His rule is marked first by morality, for while much about God remains hidden, as with clouds and thick darkness He conceals His blazing glory, He has revealed the principles of righteousness and the decisions and acts of justice on which His government rests. Righteousness is holiness in action (cf. Is. 5:16b), and justice is righteousness applied to specific cases. God's moral nature is not passive, but is a fire of holiness (cf. Ex. 19:16–18). 4–6 Secondly, it is marked by universality whereby His world-wide, intense power is made known by means of general revelation (cf. Ps. 19:1–6). 7 Thirdly, He is to be adored as the only God.

8–12 The response of God's chosen people

Those facets of the divine rule—the morality, and universal rule of the only God—which will one day be clear to all are at present known to and must govern the response of the chosen people. 8, 9 Thus Zion, with all its dependent daughter villages throughout Judah, is summoned to rejoice in the known reality of the judgments, or active rule, of the only God, 10, 11 to model their lives on His known moral requirements, 12 and to adore Him as the sole object of their religious devotion.

PSALM 98. TO EARTH'S REMOTEST BOUNDS

This psalm is obviously suited to the Feast of Tabernacles, the paramount feast of Kingship (cf. Zc. 14:16f.). Rooted in the Exodus-events (Lv. 23:42ff.), Israel could recall annually their divine salvation, accomplished before the eyes of the heathen. In the light of the Abrahamic promise (Gn. 12:3) God's saving acts were all implicitly world-wide, and this is the theme of Ps. 98: the saving acts of God for Israel, in which the Gentiles also are saved. Hence there is a summons to rejoice: to God's people (vv. 1–3), who ever find something new as they contemplate His salvation and are stirred to new songs of praise; to the whole earth (vv. 4–6), to hail the Lord's universal Kingship; and to all nature (vv. 7–9)—even to His traditional foes, the floods (cf. Ps. 93:3)—to greet Him as He comes to rule.

1 Marvellous has the connotation of miraculous, supernatural. The hand and arm signify the personal acts of God: He, by Himself, accomplished the victory. 2 Vindication is the word basically translated 'righteousness', and signifies His fidelity to His own nature and to His declared purposes in saving His people. 9 To judge means to take up active executive control—in the present case, to right all wrongs, redress all imbalances, and to show Himself publicly to be the sovereign King, which has been His incognito status all the while.

PSALM 99. THE THRICE HOLY GOD

This psalm continues the themes which mark the whole group of psalms dealing with the Lord's Kingship: His enthronement and reign (v. 1), His universal sway centred at Zion (v. 2), His love of righteousness (v. 4), His historical revelation of Himself (v. 7). But more than the others it stresses the holiness of the divine King (vv. 3, 5, 9), marking the divisions of the psalm by this as a refrain.

1–3 The Holy King of the world

1 opens and 2 ends with a reference to the peoples, and thus the tone of the section is set. While the Lord's Kingship is centred in Zion and it is pre-eminently there that He is known as great, yet all must tremble and even the very earth quake (cf. Is. 6:4) before this holy God. Enthroned upon the cherubim. The golden figures bowed over the ark (Ex. 25:18–22) were thought of as the 'pedestal' of the invisible throne of God. Cf. Isaiah's vision of the enthroned God whose flowing robes filled the Temple (Is. 6:1f.).

4, 5 The Holy King of Israel

4 The only people mentioned here is Jacob, and the topic is the nature of the Lord's reign among His own. The Hebrew of v. 4 needs no correction, but reads (cf. RSV mg.) 'and the king's strength loves justice'. The 'king' referred to is the Lord, and to say that His 'strength loves justice' means that He delights to use His royal power in doing right. This has been shown to His people in three ways: 4b first, in His establishing them as a society based on equity, a reference to the just and equitable law which He gave to them; 4c secondly, in His continuing to insist upon and enforce rules of justice and standards of righteousness, e.g. by acts of wrath and punishment against their rebellions (Jdg. 2:11–23) and by the prophets' denunciations (1 Ki. 21:17–24); 5 and thirdly, by providing a way for them to worship in His very presence, made welcome before His holiness. His footstool must, of course, be the ark itself. The Lord is enthroned above, and His feet rest on the very foundation of all, the place where the holy law of God is satisfied by the sprinkled blood of atonement upon the mercy seat.

6–9 The Holy King of the individual

Names are named in this section: Moses, Aaron, Samuel, and some commentators find in them the assertion of the principle of the mediator, the one through whom God's people come to God. The section, however, seems to dwell on God's dealings with them rather than through them to others, and therefore to stress what the Kingship of God means when it is applied to individual lives. It means, 6 first, the privilege of answered prayer; 7 secondly, the obligation of obedience to revelation; 8 and thirdly, submissiveness to the merciful discipline of God.

PSALM 100. ONE GOD, ONE BLESSED PEOPLE

The theme of the Lord's Kingship reaches its climax in this invitation to all the world (vv. 1, 2, 4) to enter into the blessedness which Israel already possesses (vv. 3, 5) of owning and being owned by such a God (cf. Eph. 3:6).

1–3 The Lord is God

1, 2 stress the gladness of access and worship, and 3 lays the foundation for this joy in the divine Lord Himself as made known in Israel's experience. His threefold claim to possess His people is registered: first, because of creation, for He made us; secondly, because of election, for we are his people (cf. Eph. 1:11, 18); thirdly, because of providence, for as Shepherd He presides over and guides the sheep of his pasture (cf. Ps. 95:7).

4, 5 The Lord is good

4 The summons to worshipful thanksgiving arises 5 from contemplation of the character of the Lord as good, and especially in that His steadfast love for us, and His reliable faithfulness towards us, are not dependent on anything in us, nor are they divine whims for a moment, but (as the emphasis in the Hebrew makes doubly clear) they are the abiding attitudes and activities of this good God at all times (for ever) and to all succeeding generations.

PSALM 101. THE DAVIDIC IDEAL

Though some commentators see in this psalm a reflection of the ritual 'humiliation' of the king in the course of the annual royal festival (see Introduction), and interpret it as his plea for divine intervention based on the righteousness of his reign hitherto, it is simpler to hear in the psalm the coronation oath of the Davidic king, pledging him to those distinctive ideals which marked the monarchy in Judah. The plea, Oh when wilt thou come to me? may be an echo of 2 Sa. 6:9, in which case the psalm belongs to David's very early reign, and could well have originated as his dedicatory vow on the occasion of the coming of the ark to Jerusalem. The Christian mind, of course, runs forward to find here the perfect rule of the true Davidic King, the Lord Jesus Christ.

1–4 Personal standards

Vowing to reproduce in his own reign the characteristics of the Kingship of the Lord (v. 1; cf. Pss. 99:4; 100:5), he commits himself to that blameless holiness 'without which no one will see the Lord' (v. 2a; Heb. 12:14). This comprehensive blamelessness concerns his private life at home (v. 2c), his desires, both of the eyes (v. 3a) and also in making moral judgments (v. 3b), his determined separation from any sin which might cleave (v. 3c; Heb. 12:1), and the inmost thoughts which might knowingly dwell on evil (v. 4). 1 Loyalty is the word which, when used of the Lord's attitude to us, is translated 'steadfast love' (e.g. Ps. 100:5). 2 Blameless is rather the positive idea, 'perfect' (Gn. 17:1; Ex. 12:5). Integrity belongs to the same word-group as 'blameless'; both express the notion of 'wholeness', such as admits no base alloy in either the outward life or the inner heart. 4 Perverseness is rather 'pervertedness', that which is crooked or twisted off course.

5–7 Household standards

Vv. 6 and 7 emphasize that we are here dealing with the court, those who dwell with the king and minister to him. He here pledges the holiness of both home and business, for the king's palace is also his office. 5 The sly traitor and the proud man are out of court, 6 but the trustworthy man and the man of open integrity are in office. 7 The underhand and the liar are excluded. Sins of speech, of heart and of life have no place before the king.

8 Public standards

This is the tell-tale verse which indicates that the whole psalm belongs to the king, for here is exposed the power of the royal sword to purge society (cf. Rom. 13:1–7). Such surgical purging of society is his daily task, laid on him as a religious necessity as king of the Lord's city. It belongs in perfection to the royal Lord and Lamb (2 Thes. 1:8–10; Rev. 21:22–27).

PSALM 102. A PRAYER OF THE AFFLICTED

An anonymous sufferer brings his grief to God; but the comfort he receives is not that of direct relief, but it comes as he contemplates the changelessness of God in His dealings with His people as a whole (vv. 12–22), and the eternal purpose of God which includes in it such grief as he now endures but which will never let His people go (vv. 23–28).

1–11 A cry of suffering and despair

1, 2 After this invocation he proceeds to describe his present sources of grief: 3 the transience of life, 4, 5 ill-health, 6 loneliness, 7 sleeplessness, 8 opposition and division, 9 sorrow, and 10 the burden of divine anger and apparent desertion.

12–22 The unchanging and compassionate Lord

The contrast between man's nature and vicissitudes and God's nature and unchangeableness is introduced with an emphatic But thou (v. 12). This part of the psalm is in three stanzas, each of which has Zion for its central thought.

12–14 The time to restore Zion has come. 12 The changelessness of the Lord is expressed in His eternal throne and His enduring character, or name (cf. Ex. 3:15). 13 Because of this He will come in compassion to Zion, and there could be no more needful time for His pity than now. 14 Yet, though the Lord acts out of His own changelessness, it is thus that He shows respect for the desires of His servants. He is not indifferent to what they so deeply feel.

15–17 The effect of the restoration on mankind. 15, 16 All men will revere the glory of the Lord as revealed in Zion's renewal; 17 but once more the Lord's motive is not simply His own glory, but to respond to the prayers of His destitute ones.

18–22 The divine nature of the deliverance. 18 It will be recorded for all time, not just that the Lord delivered Zion, 19, 20 but specifically that He heard the groans of the prisoners. In all these three sub-sections, therefore, the changelessness of God has focused on this one point: He hears and answers the prayer of the troubled. In this way we see how the meditation on the Lord's ways with Zion meets the needs of the individual praying sufferer.

23–28 Man's weakness and God's strength

The two opening themes of the psalm are now brought together: man's frailty (vv. 1–11) and God's changelessness (vv. 12–22). But the purpose is to show that the relationship between them is not merely one of contrast. Man's changing fortunes (vv. 23, 24), like the wear and tear of the natural world (vv. 25, 26), are due to the active will of the changeless God. Is the psalmist broken down? It is God who has done it (v. 23). Does nature alter? It is God who changes its face (v. 26). Because our changeful lot is thus embraced by changeless and sovereign mercy, the psalmist can end on the note of confidence (vv. 27, 28). God will not forget His servants, and their descendants, of whom the psalmist is himself one, will be established and secure (cf. Dt. 10:15). 24 The psalmist excites the divine pity by noting the pathetic brevity of our span compared with His eternity (cf. Ps. 89:47); but, more than this, his prayer is an active expression of his belief in the divine sovereignty: he reposes his frailty in God.

PSALM 103. IN PRAISE OF THE GOD OF ALL GRACE

The psalm is an expression of praise evoked firstly by the psalmist's own experience (note the singular pronouns in vv. 1–5). But it is tremendously strengthened by the evidences of the Lord's amazing compassion and mercy toward men in general: His forgiveness and solicitude for such insignificant creatures as men must lead to universal adoration.

1–5 The individual response

1 Blessing God combines the bowing of the knee in reverence for his holy name, 2 and opening the heart in adoring gratitude for all his benefits. Upon this task the psalmist focuses his essential self, or soul, and unites all his individual faculties. 3–5 The enumerated benefits are all spiritual, for it is here that we see the characteristic goodness of the Lord: He cancels sin's debt by forgiveness, counters the diseases, or weaknesses with which sin has infected our being, reverses the rewards of sin, exchanging the Pit for the crown, and the death which sin brings for constantly renewed life. 3 Diseases signifies here not bodily but spiritual disorder, as, e.g., in Ps. 107:17, 20. 4 Redeems describes the action of the 'next of kin' voluntarily shouldering the responsibilities of the helpless, as, e.g., Boaz accepted Ruth (Ru. 4:4, 9, 10). So the Lord makes common cause with us in our sin.

6–19 The testimony of the redeemed people

The opening and closing verses of this section stress the universality of the Lord's benevolence (v. 6) and rule (v. 19), but within this world-wide compass, the intervening verses cite the experience of Israel as typical of the Lord's tender care for the oppresssed. 7 To them, through Moses, the truth about God was made known, 8, 9 and this is stated first in the form in which Moses received it (Ex. 34:6, 7). But next, the theology of the Exodus-revelation comes alive in experience in the first person plural testimony of vv. 10–14: 10 far from dealing with us on the basis of our merits, 11 He has made us know his steadfast love, as different in its greatness from anything else we have ever experienced as heaven is high above the earth; 12 secondly, He has finally and completely dealt with our sin; 13, 14 and thirdly, He has bestowed a fatherly pity called forth by consideration of our weakness. 15, 16 Association of ideas links v. 15 with v. 14 and, by contrast with man's native frailty, 17, 18 we learn of his eternal security in the Lord. Throughout these verses the hallmark of the people whom the Lord blesses is stressed: those who fear him (vv. 11, 13, 17), which is interpreted finally as the obedient ones (v. 18) within the covenant.

10, 12 The whole vocabulary of sin is in these verses: sins are outward acts of wrongdoing; iniquities are the inner corruptions of the fallen nature; transgressions are wilful rebellions against the known will of God. 13 Pities. The noun of the same family means 'a womb', translated in 1 Ki. 3:26 as 'her heart yearned': thus our Father loves us with a mother's love. 17 From everlasting to everlasting: not simply in its own nature but upon, i.e. in its application to, those who fear him, and hence speaking of their eternal security (cf. Eph. 1:5, 6).

20–22 The universal summons

Calling upon all created beings and things, and at the last coming back to the personal soul with which he started, the psalmist summons forth universal reverential adoration or blessing for such a God of grace.

PSALM 104. IN PRAISE OF THE GOD OF ALL CREATION

This is one of the Scripture's outstanding descriptions of the glory of the natural world; it ranks with Jb. 38 and 39. See also Pss. 8 and 29. The psalm may be regarded as a poetical commentary upon the first chapter of Genesis.

1–23 Description

This survey of the external realm of life covers five aspects, viz. the majesty and power of the Lord God (vv. 1–4); the creation of the major terrestrial features of sea and land (vv. 5–9); the inauguration of a comprehensive water-supply for the maintenance of life (vv. 10–13); the provision of food (especially for man) and of the natural means for secure habitation for men and beasts (vv. 14–18); finally, the institution of the daily and seasonal rhythm of life and work (vv. 19–23). Note the range of thought, from the immensity and versatility of the Lord (vv. 1ff.) to the tiring routine of a day in a man's life (v. 23); from the vast labour and purpose of the earth's creation (vv. 5ff.) to the effortless song of a bird on a tree top (v. 12). Similarly the thirst of wild asses (v. 11) is matched by the hunger of young lions (v. 21); the awesome expanse of the deep waters which clothe much of the earth (vv. 6ff.) is contrasted with the restful greenery of meadows and olive groves

(vv. 14ff.); the timid and elusive goats of the high hills (v. 18) are as well known as the beasts of the forest which creep stealthily in the shadows of evening (v. 20).

In particular these verses declare that all creation is subject to the Creator (vv. 1–9), whereby we see His greatness, and that all creation is ordered by the Creator (vv. 10–23), and blended together so as to provide for the requirements of His manifold creatures. Thus the material universe is subject to the needs of animals and man (vv. 10–18), and the animals and man are in turn subject to the seasonal regulations of the universe (vv. 19–23).

2 As light both reveals and also dazzles, so God both shows Himself and hides Himself (cf. Jn. 1:18). Very aptly, then, is light His robe. 3 From the observer's point of view the vaulted heavens rest on earth, and we suppose the psalmist to have been here gazing out over the sea to where the heavens of God's dwelling met the waters. Clouds . . . wind: all the natural agencies are active only at His bidding. 5–9 are a poetic fantasy on Gn. 1:6–10; 7 God's rebuke is His authoritative command, and the thunder is the voice of Him who speaks and it is done (Gn. 1:3, 6, 9, 11, etc.; Ps. 33:6).

24–30 Meditation

The psalmist turns now to meditation on the fact that this varied and mighty world is utterly dependent upon its Creator. 24 He exclaims first at the multiplicity and variety of God's works, then at the magnitude and richness of the divine wisdom that brought into being these creatures. 25 He is particularly impressed by the greatness of the sea. It extends so far and contains so much that moves; in it are countless living creatures, on it move ships and animals, all enhancing the sense of wonder we should have toward God's works. 26 Leviathan was the mythical sea-monster (cf. Jb. 41:1ff.), symbolic of the mighty power reposing in created life yet utterly subject to the Creator. 27, 28 All creatures are dependent on God for food, 29 for their experiences of distress, for the duration of their lives (cf. Jb. 12:9, 10; 34:14, 15) and 30 for the renewal of their kind in the following generation. All have been created by the Spirit of God who continuously renews earth's natural life from year to year. In the OT as in the NT the Spirit is the Lord and life-giver, seen here in His distinctive creative work.

31–35 Supplication

The satisfaction which the world finds by God's providential ordering gives rise to the question whether God is equally satisfied with His world. 31 The psalmist prays that He may be, 32 and at the same time recognizes that He is of power to make all things conform to His will. 33 Consequently he pledges himself to worship this great God and 34 prays for acceptance. 35 But the other side of the truth must be faced with equal realism. The Creator is the Holy One, and ultimately there is no place for sin in His world. The prayer that He might look with pleasure on His creation requires the prayer that all who offend be removed.

PSALM 105. PRAISE TO GOD FOR THE FULFILMENT OF HIS PROMISE

This is the second of four great songs of Israel's history (cf. also Pss. 78; 106; 136). It deals with Yahweh's covenant with Abraham concerning the land of Canaan and rehearses the events which led to its occupation by the children of Jacob. The emphasis throughout this survey is upon the mercy and faithfulness of the Lord as declared in all his wonderful works (v. 2; cf. v. 5). Note the constant repetition of 'he'. The pronouns 'he' and 'his' referring to the Lord occur more than 40 times in vv. 5–45.

This detailed rehearsal 'of what he has done', especially in the deliverance from Egypt, concludes with a very generalized and brief statement about the invasion and possession of the promised land. The purpose of this historical survey is primarily to demonstrate the Lord's faithfulness to His covenant, concluded with Abraham (v. 9), reaffirmed in the Exodus (vv. 26ff.) and brought to an interim climax in the gift of the land, the prize reserved for His chosen ones (v. 43). This great covenant, as the psalm shows, is all of God and all of grace. No word is spoken about man, either of his sin or of his response to God. It is in this setting that we come to the final verse and the requirement of obedience (v. 45). Here, as Rodd remarks, 'is the true basis of biblical ethics—to keep His statutes . . . not because of fear of punishment, but out of gratitude for God's great goodness. "We love, because He first loved us" (1 Jn. 4:19).'

1–6 The call to worship

1 Ch. 16:8ff. associates the opening verses with David's bringing of the ark into Jerusalem, and doubtless the psalm owes its final form to its regular use at the great annual festivals while the Temple stood. 1, 2 Thanksgiving and testimony, joy, 4 fellowship with God and 5 remembrance are the characteristic privileges of God's people as their attention is focused on the Lord Himself, known by name (vv. 1, 3), on His works—wonderful, in that they demand a supernatural origin, miracles, in that they cause men to marvel—and on the judgments he uttered, the verbal revelation which explained what He was doing. 6 These privileges are theirs because they are God's chosen ones, and the purpose of the psalm is to illustrate the reality of this truth, returning to it again in conclusion (v. 43).

7–15 God's covenant with the patriarchs

7 Is it too incredible that God chose a single people for Himself? Nevertheless it is the truth, for though He has shown Himself to be ruler of all the earth, yet He is our God, 8 and the history of God's people shows that he is mindful of his covenant. 9 It began with Abraham (Gn. 15:18; 17:1–14) and was reaffirmed as a sworn promise to Isaac (Gn. 26:2–5), 10 and to Jacob (Gn. 28:13–15). 11, 12 That such a promise could be meaningful was contrary to all natural expectation, 13 and indeed contrary to the experience of the patriarchs, 14 yet the Lord proved that He stood by His choice of them by many protective interventions (cf. Gn. 12:17; 20:6ff.; 31:24, 42; 48:15, 16). 15 Thus they were shown to be His anointed ones, i.e. the recipients of His special favour (cf. Gn. 26:27–29), and His prophets holding the privilege of direct access to Him (cf. Gn. 18:23–33; 20:7).

16–24 Joseph and the settlement in Egypt

God is faithful also to the darker side of His promises (Gn. 15:13), and here we see Him at work to bring His people into Egypt, yet carefully preparing for their welfare there. 16–19 Natural and personal catastrophes are to be accepted from the will of God, who is thus working out what he had said, and it is the part of the man of God to accept the discipline and testing which the Lord thus imposes. 20–22 But the ultimate purpose is glorious. God, in whose hand is even the heart of kings, brought Joseph from the prison to the throne in one triumphant movement. 23, 24 At this point, the stage was set for Jacob's entry into Egypt and his initial prosperity there.

25–38 Moses and the deliverance from Egypt

The ways of God are not to be understood at the moment of their being accomplished, but only in such a retrospect as this psalm gives us. 25 The inscrutability of the divine plans is seen in that it was God who turned their hearts to persecute Israel. Yet though the Egyptians were instruments in His hand, they were responsible and culpable for their treatment of Israel, for their hatred was their own response of envy and self-interest to this favoured people (Ex. 1:9–14). 26 Against this enmity God had His plans laid and His servants appointed. 27ff. The sequence of the plagues here is not the same as in Exodus. In this great psalm of the acts of God, the psalmist sacrifices chronology to put first 28 the plague wherein the Egyptians were first forced to assent to the Lord's claims (Ex. 10:24), then, omitting the fifth and sixth plagues altogether, he groups the remaining six plagues around three ideas: 29, 30 the destruction of Egypt's glory in the pollution of the Nile and the defiling of the royal palaces; 31–35 the humbling of Egypt's pride as the granary of the world (cf. Gn. 41:57) in the spoiling of its crops; 36 and the blighting of Egypt's hope for the future in the death of the firstborn. 37, 38 But in all this Israel was a separated people (cf. Ex. 8:22; 9:4; 11:7), and their distinctiveness was seen in that they left Egypt rich, whereas it was spoiled; vigorous, whereas it was worn out; and dreaded where once they had been despised as slaves.

39–41 God's care in the wilderness

Three typical miracles of providence are chosen to illustrate further that they were a separate and chosen people. 39a The protecting cloud contrasts with the destructive covering of the locusts (vv. 34, 35; cf. Ex. 10:15); 39b the light contrasts with the darkness (v. 28); 40 the provision of food contrasts with the destruction of food (v. 35) and 41 of water with the judgment upon the Nile (v. 29). Egypt typifies the folly of a merely worldly confidence; Israel is miraculously nourished by divine grace.

42–45 The reasons for this wondrous work

42, 43 Behind all God's dealing with Israel lay His faithfulness to His promises. The great family principle which lies at the heart of the divine covenant (Gn. 17:7, 12) meant that, in the chosen Abraham, his descendants, Israel, were also God's chosen ones and this description is now filled out with meaning in the light of the age-long history of divine protection and provision which has been surveyed. 44 But chief among the evidences of divine faithfulness was the possession of the promised land, the great seal upon the promises of God. 45 But just as, on the one hand, God's dealings with Israel looked back to His unexplained choice of Abraham, so, on the other hand, it finds its reason in the responsive life of obedience to which it looks forward. Past blessings constitute an inescapable obligation.

PSALM 106. A SAGA OF SINS AND SALVATION

The same history, which in Ps. 105 was reviewed in order to display the grace of God, is here laid under consideration to show the unworthiness of the chosen people. In the former psalm we saw God's faithfulness in the blessings of the covenant; here we see His faithfulness in its punishments. National hymns which deal with national sins are exceptional, and the composition and preservation of Pss. 78 and 106 can be attributed only to an unquestionable hope and an irrepressible faith in the covenanting God. V. 47 does not require the Babylonian captivity as its setting. There could have been no occasion from the entrance into Canaan onwards when some Israelites were not held in alien slavery and when the nation as a whole was not conscious of surrounding paganism. Pss. 105 and 106 reflect the continuing faith of Israel within the covenant and the liturgical expression of this faith in the Temple festivals.

1–6 Introduction

The body of the poem (vv. 7–46) contains four major movements. These are historical in character but they are not handled in strictly chronological order; the psalmist's main aim was to portray the process of spiritual degeneration in a privileged community. The incidents are grouped into the sequence: the Exodus from Egypt (vv. 7–12); episodes in the wilderness wanderings (vv. 13–23); the defaults when twice they approached Canaan (vv. 24–31); and the corruption which followed their settlement (vv. 32–46). This section includes an echo of earlier obstinacy (vv. 32, 33) and an allusion to later instability (v. 43). The introductory words of praise and prayer, expressive of the psalmist's delighting in God, declaring His works, doing His will, desiring His blessing both for himself and for the nation, contrast sharply with the confession of sin in v. 6 and show the reality of the forgiveness of sins and of reconciliation with God.

7–12 The Exodus from Egypt

The psalmist's purpose is to display a double truth: that where grace abounded sin abounded, and where sin abounded grace abounded. Hot on the heels of divine redeeming grace, shown at the Exodus, came immediate resentment at the Red Sea (cf. Ex. 14:11, 12), but God did not cease from His saving grace and, delivering them yet again, caused them to trust and praise.

13–23 In the wilderness

13 How fickle the people were in contrast with the changeless grace of God! Three instances are given of craving for personal satisfaction: in the realm of appetite (vv. 14, 15), political equality within the nation (vv. 16–18), and religious licence (vv. 19–23). 14, 15 The desperate craving for meat at Kibroth-hattaavah was a notable crisis in their journeyings (see Nu. 11:4–34). 16–18 The rebellion against Moses and Aaron arose out of a claim of equality amongst all the congregation (see Nu. 16). 19, 20 The making of the bull calf was particularly offensive to the Lord because it was done at His holy mount of Horeb (see Dt. 9:8) and because the Israelites ascribed to this image the wondrous works of the Lord (see Ex. 32:4). Note the persistence of this heresy (1 Ki. 12:28b). 23 For Moses' intercession, see Ex. 32:11–14, 31, 32; Dt. 9:18, 19; cf. Rom. 9:1–3.

24–31 Further rebellion

This third section of the main part of the psalm links together the two blunders of the people when they were within sight of the promised land. 24 On the first occasion, at Kadesh-barnea, they despised the pleasant land, having no faith in his promise (cf. Nu. 13:32; 14:41). 28 Some years later, when encamped by Jordan at Shittim (Jos. 2:1; Nu. 25:1ff.), they attached themselves to the Baal of Peor with licentious idolatry. This was a serious default from the obligations of the covenant; for it arose not from their inexperienced bewilderment (v. 7) or their concern for their welfare (vv. 15–20), but from an inward rottenness, the recurrent malady of unbelief. 30 Hence the plague which was stayed only by the action of Phinehas (cf. Nu. 25:7, 8).

32–46 Corruption in the promised land

These verses describe how the people mingled with the nations and learned to do as they did (v. 35). 36–39 This was a deliberate breaking of the covenant with Yahweh and swiftly led to horrible idolatrous practices (cf. Lv. 20:2–5; 1 Ki. 11:7; 2 Ki. 16:3; Ezk. 16:20ff.; 20:23–30). 40 In consequence of this the anger of the Lord was aroused and 41–46 the people were oppressed and humiliated—but not without a continuance of His pity (cf. Jdg. 2:11–23).

47 A concluding prayer

The prayer, addressed to 'Yahweh our God', is based upon God's covenant relationship and arises out of the recollection of His unchanging loving-kindness (vv. 44–46). In some measure its four phrases are related to the preceding errors. Save us (cf. vv. 41, 42), gather us (cf. v. 35), give thanks (contrast vv. 25 and 32), and glory in the praise (cf. v. 12 and contrast vv. 23a, 26).

BOOK FIVE. PSALMS 107–150

PSALM 107. THE SONG OF THE REDEEMED

It is frequently held that Ps. 107 must belong to the post-exilic period, since vv. 2, 3 are most easily explained as referring to the regathered community at worship in the second Temple. This is, however, by no means a necessary interpretation, and it may well be that we find here the pre-exilic community viewing themselves as in principle gathered from the world and all its dangers (cf. Weiser). The psalm is grounded on those truths about God and His relation to Israel which are associated characteristically with the Exodus: note specially the link between vv. 1, 43 and Ex. 34:5–7, and the emphasis on the Lord as Redeemer and Israel as the redeemed (v. 2; cf. Ex. 6:6, 7). The linked theme of judgment and mercy in vv. 33–43 also owes its origin to the Exodus, where the mercy the Lord showed to His people was in the context of His judgment of His foes.

It is illuminating to see the psalm as a meditation on the nation's history as seen in the light of the revelation of God at the Exodus. God has rescued them from the wilderness experiences which beset their forefathers of patriarchal and Mosaic times (vv. 4ff.), the perils of their own sin (vv. 10ff.), the adversity of circumstances typified by the hostile waters (vv. 23ff.). But from whatever part of national history the psalmist drew his inspiration, he distilled from these experiences their essential elements and transformed them into symbols of much wider applicability, four 'figures of the true' which still reappear over and over again in the history of God's people and in the personal experiences of His children.

The psalm falls into six sections: an introduction (1–3); four matching pictures of redemption (4–32): each stanza opens (4, 5; 10–12; 17, 18; 23–27) by describing a period of former peril from which, in answer to prayer (6, 13, 19, 28), they were delivered by divine intervention, and closes with a reasoned exhortation to praise (8, 15, 21, 31); and a summary (33–43) 'which generalizes the testimony and teaching already given' (Eaton).

1–3 The goodness of the Redeemer

Thanks to the Lord is prompted by the awareness that he is good. His goodness is demonstrated in His enduring steadfast love (v. 1). This, in turn, has been made known in His work of redemption, specified as deliverance from trouble (v. 2), and ingathering from the world (v. 3). 1 The translation steadfast love (Heb. ḥesed) excellently includes the two ideas of absolute faithfulness and warm affection: the two sides of the Lord's regard for His covenant people (e.g. Ex. 2:24; Dt. 7:7, 8; Is. 49:14–16). 2 Both noun and verb redeemed express Heb. gā'al, the basic idea being that of the 'next of kin' to whom belongs the right to intervene and rescue his afflicted relative (cf. Ru. 3:9–13; 4:3–10, and commentary in loc.). Clearly the relationship was one of right rather than obligation, and as between God and His people it is entirely gracious that He should so relate Himself to us and bear our misfortunes. In its biblical image gā'al always contains the associated idea of 'paying a (redemption) price' (cf. L. Morris, The Apostolic Preaching of the Cross,[3] 1965, pp. 19ff.). 2, 3 The ideas of redemption from trouble and from lands (or the unwelcome attentions of other people) continue through the psalm.

4–32 Facets of redemption

Much of life's affliction comes before us in the four stanzas of this section: pilgrimage (4–9), imprisonment (10–16), the soul sickness that heralds death (17–22) and the violent storm (23–32). Behind these may lie some meditation on the wandering Abraham, the blind Isaac (Gn. 27:1), the many sorrows of Jacob (e.g. Gn. 37:34ff.), but it is best to see them as typifying that element of 'tribulation' out of which God has ever redeemed His people (cf. Rev. 7:14).

4–9 Redemption from personal insufficiency. Man's search for fellowship and fulfilment is examined here. 4 He is shown as looking for a city to dwell in, a place of community and security. But at Babel God cursed man's effort to make himself secure by means of an entrenched, defended society structure (Gn. 11:4, 8), and in consequence man has never been able to be the architect of his own salvation by measures of social security, or even to find the perfect city to dwell in. 5 Not only so, but there is individual failure to find full personal satisfaction, and each remains in some degree hungry and thirsty. 6 All this is solved by prayer which, because it is set in trouble, recognizes personal insufficiency. Distress is anything which makes life 'narrow' or 'cramped'. Contrast the liberty of the children of God (Ps. 4:1; Rom. 8:21; Gal. 5:1). 7–9 By divine responsive action God's provision is immediate and exact. In contrast to their wandering (v. 4), His way is straight, and leads to the fellowship and fulfilment they could not achieve for themselves. 8 Wonderful expresses 'supernatural', 'miraculous'. Man can find self-fulfilment only by the steadfast love of God working a miracle.

10–22 Redemption from sin. The cause of distress is now rebellion against the words of God (v. 11), and sinful ways (involving a different word meaning 'rebellion') and iniquities (v. 17). 10–16 This idea, common to the two stanzas, is shown first in the setting of bondage. 10 This is bondage of the mind, symbolized by darkness (Rom. 1:21; Eph. 4:18), of the bodily capacities (irons), and 12 of the heart, the effective centre of personality. 11 Rebelled (Heb. mārāh) expresses the rebellion which chafes against the word of God. Spurned means 'to reject with contempt', the sin in question being exposed in all its presumptuousness by the entitling of God as the Most High (cf. Gn. 14:19, 20). 12 Just as (vv. 4, 5) man cannot be his own saviour, neither can he find any other man to save him. 14, 16 But no bondage proves too hard for the Lord who can shatter even bronze and iron.

17–22 Secondly, rebellion is shown to issue in sickness. 17 Bodily sickness is, of course, in view, for it is the experience of some to be visited clearly and directly in this way, but (see RV, which attempts to translate without emendation of the Hebrew) we ought rather to find reference to that sickness unto death which is the wages of sin (Rom. 6:23). Some were sick (Heb. 'fools'; see mg. and cf. RV). Added to the ill-fruits of sin is the folly of the sinner (cf. 1 Tim. 2:14a; Heb. 3:13). Suffered affliction is a reflexive verb, possibly signifying 'bring affliction on themselves'. 20 The word of God is the key factor. Just as disobedience to the word (v. 11) ushered in the life and fruits of sin, so the word is God's messenger and instrument (Ps. 147:15) for their salvation (cf. Eph. 1:13; Jas. 1:18). 22 Only in connection with redemption from sin does the psalm enjoin sacrifices (cf. Heb. 9:22; 10:18).

The two stanzas therefore define sin as disobedience (vv. 11, 17), and show its temporal (v. 10), personal (v. 12) and eternal (v. 18) results.

23–32 Redemption in life's adversities. In the course of life's ordinary and necessary activities

(v. 23), the people of God encounter ferocious storms. God is both their author (v. 25) and their finisher (v. 29), and the cry of the utterly needy (v. 28) is sufficient for deliverance. As well as being a great psalm of redemption, this is a great psalm of prayer. 24 What we would thoughtlessly call the disasters of life are in fact the wondrous (supernaturally accomplished) works of the Lord, 25 to be accepted as His will and 31 subsequently the subjects of thanksgiving (wonderful works is the same word). 30 The blessing of a guaranteed outcome to life; cf. Ps. 73:24.

33–43 The steadfast love of the Lord

The purpose of these two remaining stanzas is to reduce the illustrative material of the psalm to a statement of principle: that the Lord is both steadfast and loving to His redeemed. Two categories of people appear in these verses: on the one hand there are the wicked inhabitants (v. 34) and the oppressive princes (vv. 39, 40), both justly punished for their sins. On the other hand, there are the hungry (v. 36; cf. v. 5) and the needy (v. 41) who are both inexplicably blessed, provided for and exalted. What is this but to say that the love of the Lord is utter love? The punishment is merited, but as regards the other group, they are loved for no other reason than that the Lord loves them (cf. Dt. 7:7, 8).

Equally, His love is steadfast. Once given it is not withdrawn. These verses seem broadly based on the history of Israel from Egypt onwards: 33, 34 the devastation of Egypt and the drying up of the Red Sea; 35 provision in the wilderness (cf. Ex. 17:6); 36–38 the occupation of Canaan (cf. Dt. 8:7–17); 39–41 the ups and downs of life in the land. It is this last that is significant. On the basis of vv. 33, 34, we must say that v. 39 presupposes wickedness in the people of God (cf. Jdg. 2:11–19; 3:7, 8; etc.), but the Lord does not abandon them utterly or finally: He intervenes yet again, and yet again raises them up.

42 Consideration of these things will gladden the upright, those who are right with God and before men, convict the wicked, and 43 above all establish the great truth of the steadfast love of the Lord.

PSALM 108. ANTHEM OF VICTORY

This psalm is composed of two earlier fragments, viz. Pss. 57:7–11 and 60:5–12. Evidently they were joined together for use in Temple worship. Whoever compiled this psalm selected only those portions which expressed confidence in the Lord. For details consult the notes on the original psalms, but observe the effect created by the juxtaposition of these two fragments. Together they offer a striking instance of true biblical faith. Human steadfastness (v. 1) rests upon divine steadfastness (v. 4; note the connecting for). Divine steadfastness is expressed in great promises (vv. 7–9) which give confidence in coming victories (vv. 10–13).

PSALM 109. RIGHTEOUS INDIGNATION

This is by far the most outspoken of the imprecatory psalms (see Introduction). Its three major sections are a plea for divine help because of a false and unjustified attack upon the psalmist (vv. 1–5), a comprehensive curse invoked upon one man who has clothed himself with cursing (vv. 6–20; cf. v. 18), and a prayer for divine protection and for judgment upon adversaries (vv. 21–31). Such vehement imprecations as are found in vv. 6–20 are not easily assigned to one who trusted in the Lord (vv. 21–31) and sought His blessing above all else (vv. 26, 28). There are two approaches to the difficulty. In view of the plain distinction that vv. 6–19 speak only of him, his and he, while the psalm elsewhere speaks of they and them who are opposed to I and me, some (e.g. Weiser) have urged that this passage is a quotation of curses directed against, not spoken by, the one who prays (v. 7b). This view finds some further support in that vv. 1–3 declare that they have beset the psalmist with words of hate. Yet there has been no just occasion for this attack (v. 3b). The psalmist has given love and received hatred; he has encountered evil in return for good (v. 5). Nor is there anything in the poem to suggest a sudden reversal of this righteous attitude.

Against this view there are four objections. First, that there exists a righteous indignation against evil (cf. Mt. 23:13ff.) which is an echo of divine wrath. This psalm is unique only in its detail, not in the nature of its utterances.

Secondly, the imprecatory words in vv. 6–19 are in part a prayer that the Lord should remember His own word (Ex. 20:5b) and visit the iniquities of the parents upon their children (vv. 14, 15). In part, also, they are an appeal, so often heard in the Psalter, to the universal law of retribution (see vv. 17–19 and cf. Gal. 6:7). There is, in fact, no essential difference between vv. 19 and 29; if a man deliberately surrounds himself with cursings, he must, inevitably, be the first to feel the backlash of his own malevolence. It must be remembered that 'God deems it just to repay with affliction those who afflict you' (2 Thes. 1:6; cf. Jude 15).

A third objection is that Peter in Acts 1:20 not only includes Pss. 69 and 109 within the authorship of David, but attributes the two 'curses' he selects to the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, and asserts that they were prophetically uttered 'concerning Judas' (Acts 1:16). Peter obviously identifies the psalmist with Jesus and sees in Judas the enemy who has returned hatred for love. It is inevitable, therefore, that he should fall into condemnation, and vv. 6–19 point to that.

Fourthly, it must be noted that v. 20 expresses the wish that vv. 6–19 may come upon his foes, and, even if only by this clear implication, he makes them his own.

1–5 A prayer for help

The psalm opens on the note of prayer which it maintains throughout. The purpose of the psalmist is not to initiate vengeful action but to place the whole matter in the hands of Him to whom vengeance belongs (cf. Lv. 19:18; Dt. 32:35; Rom. 12:19). Before considering the imprecations we are allowed to feel the provocations. Wickedness, deceit, lies, hatred (vv. 1–3) have been the psalmist's portion, not only without cause but in base return for love, prayer and good (vv. 4, 5).

1 God of my praise expresses both the fact that he is accustomed to praise God and the fact that God is worthy to be praised. In such a context as the present, it is an indication of the psalmist's spiritual stature that the note of praise is the first to be sounded (in the Heb. taking precedence over the request Be not silent). 3 Attack; lit. 'make war on'. 4 Accuse; Heb. root śāṭān, whence Satan. I make prayer; lit. 'and I prayer': the juxtaposition of pronoun and noun indicating that the psalmist was 'all prayerful concern' for his foes.

6–20 A prayer for justice

6–15 concentrate upon the ill-desert that should attend the man who has thus acted towards the psalmist, whether we think the singular him (vv. 6ff.) to be the ringleader and chief instigator or to be in effect distributive, signifying 'each'. Nothing can diminish the terrible content of this prayer, yet based as it is on the principles of exact retributive justice which Scripture reveals, and addressed to the God from whom those principles derive, it does no more in fact than spell out in detail what we would more readily hide under some such pious formula as 'Thy will be done'. The prayer touches the man himself (vv. 6, 7), the involvement of the future with his present sins (vv. 8–13) and his own involvement with the inherited past (vv. 14, 15).

6, 7 Three opponents: beside him an accuser (Heb. śāṭān) as wicked as himself; before him a judge to pronounce him guilty; and above him a God who sees his prayer as a tainted thing of sin—for there is no mercy for the merciless (Mt. 18:35; Jas. 2:13). 9 Cf. the principle enunciated in Ex. 20:5, and illustrated in Jos. 7:24, 25; Am. 7:17. This is not contradicted by Ezk. 18:1f., where the teaching is that the grievous entail of the past does not bind the penitent and consecrated individual. 14 The iniquity of former generations is not an excuse for his conduct but an aggravation of his guiltiness (cf. Ps. 51:5). This is the individual counterpart of the principle applied nationally in Lk. 11:50, 51.

16–19 explore the grounds on which such a dire sentence might be passed on the wicked man. His basic lack of good will showed first in complete absence of pity for the needy (v. 16a), next in active hostility towards them (v. 16b); he went on to indulge his propensity for malevolence (v. 17), and finally adopted it as the deliberate policy and mark of his life (vv. 18, 19).

16 Poor and needy represent those without natural or social resources for their own defence, who easily become 'downtrodden' (as the former word suggests) and are inevitably 'compliant' (as the latter suggests) to more powerful interests. 17 All sin has a 'boomerang' quality: the prayer here takes note of the fact (cf. Ps. 37:14, 15). 18 Clothing often has a symbolic force, representing both the character and the capacity of a person (cf. Is. 11:5; 59:17; 61:10).

21–31 A prayer for protection

The foregoing anathema describes what God would do to the wicked if they reaped what they had sown. But the psalmist pleads for his own treatment on another basis. 21 Deal on my behalf (not as I deserve but) for thy name's sake and because (of) thy steadfast love, an appeal to the character and kindness of God made all the more acute 22–25 because of personal helplessness. 26 introduces the final prayer for divine help. This is uttered in full confidence (as in Pss. 22:22ff.; 35:27ff.; 69:30ff.) because, unlike his opponent, his Lord is characterized by steadfast love (cf. v. 16). 27 The prayer asks for some unmistakable act of God, 28 whereby God will show that for Him there is a difference between the righteous and the wicked and 29 which will issue in their dishonour: their 'reaping of shame' will be as plain to all as is their outer clothing. 30, 31 The psalmist finally anticipates his action of public praise to the Lord, because, unlike the circumstances of vv. 1, 2, where the adversaries prosecuted him, the Lord is at his right hand as an advocate to protect him and deliver him from his antagonists.

PSALM 110. KING AND PRIEST FOR EVER

The Davidic authorship, divine inspiration and Messianic meaning of this psalm are clearly maintained in the NT (e.g. Mt. 22:43–45; Mk. 12:36; Lk. 20:42) and given a Christological interpretation (see Acts 2:34, 35; 1 Cor. 15:25; Heb. 1:13; 5:6; 7:17, 21; 10:12, 13). The exaltation of Christ to 'sit at the right hand of God' is frequently referred to elsewhere (e.g. Mt. 26:64; Heb. 1:3; 8:1; 12:2; 1 Pet. 3:22). This does not mean, of course, that it had no contemporary significance. Like all the royal psalms, while it had fulfilment only in the Messiah, it was a pattern held up before the reigning Davidic king to remind him of the ideal which he was expected to embody. Some modern interpreters suggest that this psalm even contains an outline of the ceremony of enthronemment of the king in Jerusalem (e.g. L. Dürr, in A. Bentzen, King and Messiah, 1955, pp. 22, 23).

The structure of the psalm is interesting. Its two main sections are each introduced by a divine utterance (vv. 1, 4), and the contents of each section are parallel to each other, so that the whole is self-interpreting and complete. Its theme is the royal priest, appointed to be king (1) and universal priest (4), ruling by divine agency both over his own people (2) and his foes (5), enjoying consecrated obedience (3a) and the world-wide extension of his sway (6), continually refreshed with new life (3b) and timely renewal (7).

1–3 The authority of the priestly king

1 The Lord says is a very forceful expression, 'Oracle of Yahweh', its solemnity underscoring the importance of the inauguration of David's Lord (cf. Mt. 22:45) to the place of highest authority at Yahweh's right hand (cf. Heb. 1:3, 4). 2 Centred in Zion (cf. Heb. 12:22), and destined to expand by the agency of the Lord, His rule is now in the midst of your foes—i.e. in contrast to the actively spreading rule of vv. 5, 6, the king is here seen with his own people, who are characterized (v. 3a) by glad acquiescent enlistment in royal service. 3 Upon the holy mountains gives poor sense: in the light of the promise of foes overthrown (v. 1), and expanding dominion (v. 2) and a gladly volunteering people, it is an anticlimax to find that nothing more is afoot than a march on (presumably) the hills around Zion. The alternative rendering 'in holy array' (RSV mg.; cf. 1 Ch. 16:29) gives the view of a priestly people, consecrated and clad for holy service. The king with his attendant priests (vv. 1–3) thus balances the priest with his attendant soldiers (vv. 4–7). The womb of the morning is a picturesque way of suggesting where the dew originates. It may also (cf. Is. 14:12) be using the language of an ancient mythology to suggest supernatural, heavenly origin for the king. Your youth. Does this mean 'the young (men of the people)' whose youthful freshness will be as dew to the king, or 'your youth(ful prime)', in which case the dew is God's fresh life ever preserving the king in 'the power of an indestructible life' (Heb. 7:16)? The latter accords well with the foregoing reference to the womb of the morning, with the dew as life-giving (Is. 26:19; Ho. 14:5), and as coming secretly (2 Sa. 17:12).

4–7 The power of the royal priest

The positions are now reversed. Yahweh stands at His royal priest's right hand (v. 5), lending His power. Authority of position (v. 1) is thus balanced by power of accomplishment (v. 5) issuing in world-wide conquest (v. 6)—a task in which the zeal of the royal priest will allow him to do no more than snatch quick refreshment from the opportune stream (v. 7), an earthly resource contrasting with and matching the heavenly life of v. 3b.

4 Melchizedek (Gn. 14:18) possessed a Gentile priesthood which was also acknowledged by Abram and was therefore in principle world-wide. Priest of 'God Most High, maker of heaven and earth', he also possessed in principle world-wide sway as vice-gerent of his God. Very likely a Melchizedek type of priesthood survived in Jerusalem and was ultimately taken into the line of David, to become a different type of priesthood from that of Aaron and to represent more fully the royal priesthood of Messiah (cf. Heb. 7). 6 The military metaphor continues but the picture is that of establishing a universal and unchallenged sway (cf. Ps. 72:8–11; Is. 9:7). The OT describes in the terms nearest to hand (cf. Is. 11:14–16) what the NT portrays as the universal mission of the church, a warfare (Eph. 6:10f.; 2 Tim. 2:3f.) in the interests of 'another king, Jesus' (Acts 17:7). Shatter chiefs (lit. 'shatter (the) head'); cf. Gn. 3:15. 7 Lift up his head; i.e. in token of lordship and conquest.

PSALM 111. THE WORK OF THE LORD

Pss. 111, 112 are a pair: both consist of ten verses and each poem contains twenty-two phrases which are arranged as an acrostic, the phrases successively commencing with the letters of the Hebrew alphabet. Almost every phrase consists of just three Hebrew words, and in both poems the last two verses contain three phrases and not two as is the case in the other verses. The two psalms deal with twin themes. Ps. 111 is in praise of the Lord; Ps. 112 is a panegyric of the godly man.

The references to the assembled congregation (v. 1), the works of the Lord (vv. 2, 3, 4, 6, 7) and the covenant (vv. 5, 9) suggest that the psalm was designed for use at Passover or Tabernacles in the pre-exilic community. (Cf. Weiser; contrast Kirkpatrick.)

1 The psalm opens with the worshipper's declared intention of giving thanks. Company stresses the element of 'fellowship' (cf. Ps. 25:14), congregation the element of 'assembly'. Upright, while not etymologically belonging to the 'righteousness' family of words, contains the like ideas of being right with God and right before men, as here (cf. v. 8). 2 The psalm proceeds to ground this thanksgiving on what is known of the Lord and His works, noting 2a their greatness, 2b how they delight His people, 3 what they declare of God, and 4 how He has required remembrance to be kept of them (caused . . . to be remembered means 'appointed a remembrance (feast)'; cf. Ex. 12:24–27; Lv. 23:42, 43). The content of the remembrance now follows in neatly rounded form. 4b Reference to God's character (cf. Ex. 34:6) opens and closes the sequence (cf. v. 9c); 5 next His covenant with its associated blessings of provision (cf. Ex. 16:4, 12) and redemption (cf. v. 9a, b); 6–8 finally, and most suitably if the people were engaged in a ceremony of renewing the covenant (cf. Dt. 31:9–13), the gifts of the land and the law, i.e. a place to live and a manner of life. 9 Redemption (Heb. pᵉḏût) stresses the price paid (cf. Ex. 13:13; Nu. 3:46–48). Terrible; 'to be reverenced, or feared'. 10 God is revealed in grace (v. 4), law (v. 7) and holiness (v. 9); so, here, in reverse order, the response is awesome fear (10a), obedience (10b) and praise (10c).

PSALM 112. THE WAY OF A GOOD MAN

The theme of the concluding verse of Ps. 111 is developed, and a description is given of the life of a God-fearing man who is made in the likeness of his God. 1 The proposition is that fear of the Lord and obedience bring blessedness, complete well-being. The facets of a life of well-being are, 2, 3 first, prosperity, seen in influential (2a) and upright (2b) descendants, earthly sufficiency (3a) and personal character (3b); 4, 5 secondly, generosity, translating v. 4 with reference to the 'blessed man', 'he rises up as light . . . for the upright (i.e. he is a source of comfort, etc., to his fellow-believers), being gracious, merciful, and righteous' (see RSV mg.). He is thus like God (Ps. 111:4). Generosity marks all his dealings (5a), in the setting of true discernment (justice, 5b). 6–8 The third facet of well-being is stability, in adversity (7a) and in character (7b, 8). 9, 10 The psalm concludes with a contrast clinching the argument: the godly man is generous, enduring and exalted; the wicked man is grudging, evanescent and disappointed.

GENERAL INTRODUCTION TO PSALMS 113–118

These psalms have been linked in Jewish liturgies with the feasts of Passover and Tabernacles. In the Jewish home, at Passover, Pss. 113, 114 are sung before the meal and Pss. 115–118 after (cf. Mt. 26:30; Mk. 14:26). The title 'Egyptian Hallel' is sometimes given to this collection because of the exceptionally fine poem of the Exodus (Ps. 114), and also in contradistinction to the title 'The Great Hallel' (Pss. 120–136).

PSALM 113. THE UNIQUE LORD

Ps. 113, 114 are well paired. The former states a truth, the latter records the supreme example of that truth. We will grasp Ps. 113 best if we suppose that it is written to answer the question, What is distinctive about the God of Israel? The psalm replies in three ways, rising to the climax of the third.

1–3 His praise

1 While those who serve the Lord and know His nature as revealed in His name may well encourage each other to praise Him, 2, 3 He is worthy of praise also for all time and from every place. Blessed . . . praised. The form of each verb suggests 'worthy to be . . .'. To 'praise' is to acknowledge with joy what God is; to 'bless' has the added suggestion of kneeling in worship.

4–6 His exaltation

The 'highness' of the Lord links these verses: 4a not even the collective might of all humanity, 4b nor the physical marvel of the lofty heavens can overtop Him. 6 Indeed, He must 'make Himself low' (cf. AV, RV; lit. 'who acts in lowliness to see . . .') if He is even to bring the heavens within His vision!

7–9 His compassion

But the true uniqueness of the Lord is not His meriting of universal, endless praise, nor the sheer fact of His transcendence, but 7 that He draws near to the needy to deliver them, 8 to transform their state and 9 to satisfy their longings. Cf. 1 Sa. 2:1–8; Pss. 103:4; 105:17–22; Is. 49:19–21.

PSALM 114. THE UNIQUE EVENT

The truth of Ps. 113 now receives its crowning illustration, wherein the Lord is seen to be supreme over the nations (v. 1), identified with the outcast (v. 2), sovereign over the natural order (vv. 3–7), and preserver of the needy (v. 8)—the Exodus from Egypt. Note the absence in this psalm of the effective cause, 'the name of the Lord', which is so conspicuous a phrase in the preceding and following psalms. The omission makes the introduction of 'the Lord' (v. 7) remarkably impressive.

1, 2 Redemption and indwelling

The Lord's redemptive work is not just a beginning, an act of deliverance. It is a total work accomplishing total transformation, catering for every need. In its poetical exemplification of this the psalm opens by asserting that 1 when the Lord redeems, 2 He also indwells. This is the same as to say that He redeems because He loves: His is no impersonal concern for the social amelioration of Israel. He desires this people for Himself, and fulfils the desire by coming to live among them. On the other side, from Israel's point of view, redemption involves 1 separation from the world and 2 separation unto the Lord. Judah . . . Israel. The people of God are here described in the light of their main later components, and in the light of the fact that the Lord's sanctuary was on Mt. Zion in Judah.

3, 4 Creation and completion

That Israel's Redeemer is the world's Creator was shown by the natural marvels attendant upon the Exodus: 3 the dividing of the Red Sea (Ex. 14:21ff.) and of Jordan (Jos. 3:14–16); 4 the marvels at Sinai (Ex. 19:16–18). But the miracle at Jordan also underlines the truth that the Lord brings in to the promised land those whom He brought out of Egypt: He begins, He also completes, and the assurance that He can do so is the supremacy of His power as Creator, whereby no power can resist Him or barrier stand in His way.

5–8 Compassion and provision

5, 6 The questions hurry us forward to the climax: 7 this earth-shaking work (vv. 3, 4), performed by the Lord in person, was wrought for one as weak, unimpressive, often even despicable a person as Jacob! Behind the work of redemption is the attitude of compassion towards the needy and the sinful. 8 But compassion did more than prompt the action. It prompted those works of provision whereby the pilgrims were sustained on the way (cf. Ex. 17:1ff.; Ps. 107:35).

PSALM 115. NOT TO US, O LORD

This psalm gives an insight into one aspect of Israelite worship: the responsive participation of leader and congregation. This seems a reasonable deduction from the arrangement of vv. 9–11 where we can readily hear a single voice pronouncing the first half of each verse, the second half being a congregational response. Vv. 14, 15 sound like two halves of the congregation responding to each other.

There is, of course, no need to follow the older commentators in requiring a post-exilic date. Those who 'fear the Lord' (vv. 11, 13) are not necessarily Gentile proselytes, and even if the phrase had that technical meaning, there were proselytes at every period of Israel's life. But Ps. 22:23 indicates that the God-fearers in question are the people of Israel. It is altogether simpler to see here the congregation assembled for worship at one of the great festivals in monarchic days.

The opening verses, with their appeal to the glory due to the Lord's name (cf. Jos. 7:9; Dn. 9:18, 19; cf. Nu. 14:15, 16; Is. 48:11), may suggest that the psalm was designed to focus attention and trust upon God in a time of national emergency, but it is more probable that a festival purposing to recall the mercies of God in Exodus times would equally prompt the remembrance of national shortcomings and issue in this confession that Israel can base no plea on personal deserving but only on the name and nature of God.

1–8 Honouring God

Whether facing some great crisis, or simply looking forward into another year from the vantage-point of an annual festival, Israel emphatically puts God first:

1, 2 Jealous and loving. They are concerned to say before anything else 'Hallowed be thy name', and it is their belief that God is equally concerned. He is jealous for His own glory (cf. Ex. 20:5; 34:14; Dt. 4:23, 24; Is. 42:8). But if God were to act solely for His own glory, how could sinful Israel be spared? Therefore the plea is also to His steadfast love and faithfulness, expressive of His covenanted attitude towards Israel.

3–8 Alive and sovereign. 3 Were Israel to reply to the taunting question (v. 2; cf. Ps. 42:3, 10) it would be that God is in heaven, sovereignly free to accomplish His will, a truth pointed up by a responsive taunt (cf. Is. 44:6–20) on the deadness of idols: as to 4a their material, 4b origin, 5–7 lifelessness and 8 influence. It is characteristic of the OT's monotheism to see all other gods in this light, for, of course, no idolatrous people thought of its god as dead matter!

9–18 Trusting God

True honour for God passes over into living faith as its first evidence.

9–11 Reliance is the first element in trust. God is able both to support (help) and protect (shield) those who trust Him. Such simple reliance is to mark every member of God's people: 9 merely to belong to Israel is not enough; 10 nor to have a professional status; 11 nor a reputation for religion: all alike must come in personal reliance on Him.

12, 13 Assurance next marks God's people: assurance concerning His attentiveness and His benevolence: He has been mindful, He will bless, and in this none is overlooked. Not only are the three categories repeated from vv. 9–11, but there is the added reassurance, both small and great.

14, 15 Prayer follows as an essential component in genuine trust, for trust is the attitude which seeks God alone for help and sees in Him an utter sufficiency for His people's present (you) and future (your children) needs. This trustful attitude, expressed in prayer, is grounded on the almightiness of God, exemplified in His creation of heaven and earth.

16–18 Dedication is the coping-stone on the edifice of trust. It is confident self-committal. The three verses are in an observable sequence of thought: 16 God, who possesses all things, has allocated this earth as the sphere of human activity. 17 Time is not unlimited: all too soon death comes to silence the voice of earthly praise. 18 Consequently, worshipful adoration and joy in the Lord, starting from this time and continuing ceaselessly, should characterize His people, The final praise the Lord is the firstfruit of this dedicated spirit.

17 Too often this verse is made the substance of a supposed OT view of death, bringing it into conflict with the evidence, e.g., of Pss. 16:9–11; 17:15; 49:15; 73:23, 24. Reference to Pss. 6:5 and 88:4f. is misplaced, since they are specifically concerned with the awful possibility of death under God's wrath. The present verse is to be understood in the same sense as Cowper's words, 'When this poor lisping, stammering tongue lies silent in the grave'. Then the earthly praise will be over: gone for ever the opportunity to praise the Lord in the circumstances of this life. Of this alone v. 17 speaks, and does not warrant or invite further deductions concerning the state of the dead.

PSALM 116. THE PATTERN OF DEDICATION

This is a peculiarly personal song. Amid the surrounding psalms of corporate worship, it records the voice of the worshipping individual. We find him, in the presence of the assembled congregation, testifying of a divine deliverance personally experienced, and preparing to offer a sacrifice of thanksgiving (v. 17). Maybe this psalm evidences another feature of the liturgy of the sacrifices: the personal confession of the individual, appropriate to the sacrifice which he is offering.

1–9 I love

Each of the three sections of this psalm is an amalgam of recollection and dedication. In this first part, he recollects how God heard and answered prayer in a time of great need, and he records how, as a result, he loves the Lord (v. 1), will ever continue to pray (v. 2), and will live henceforth for God (v. 9).

1, 2 Heard . . . inclined. The second verb adds the thought that hearing prayer is an attitude deliberately adopted by the Lord. 3 Without being told the nature of his trouble, we learn of its severity: it seemed likely to end in death. Sheol is the place-name of the abode of the dead. 4 Name. He laid hold in prayer on all that God had revealed of Himself.

5 Gracious . . . merciful. Cf. Ex. 34:6, 7. The Lord proved true to His name. 6 Simple. The word describes the 'young and inexperienced', consequently lacking true guiding principles for life. The thought is that the Lord preserved one who was helpless to preserve himself. 9 I walk. The wholesale deliverances noted in v. 8 would be better suited by the dedicatory 'I will walk' (AV, RV). Cf. Gn. 17:1.

10–14 I will lift up

V. 10 in RSV sounds a self-congratulatory note which accords ill with the rest of the psalm, and especially fails to prepare for the key verses 12, 13. Possibly we should translate, 'I believed: though I kept saying. . . . It was I who said in consternation . . .' Here the stress lies on the poor quality of the faith which has so signally failed to measure up to the tests of life. But to this poor faith, the Lord replied with bounty (v. 12), and realizing how much he yet needs, he resolves to take the proffered salvation (v. 13a), persevere in prayer (v. 13b) and launch out in public commitment (v. 14).

11 Possibly in his time of stress he had looked to men for help, and finding none, fell into a panic, believer though he was. 13 Cup. Cf. Ps. 16:5, the cup is one's personal 'lot'; Ps. 75:8, the cup is the portion allotted by the Lord. For the psalmist He has bountifully decreed (full) salvation (plural of amplification), and he gratefully takes it up.

15–19 I will offer

How is the personal desire to be in a loving relation to God (v. 1) and to experience His saving benefits (v. 13) brought to fruition? This section shares with the previous ones two features of dedication: commitment to pray (v. 17b; cf. vv. 2, 13) and to public devotion (v. 18; cf. vv. 9, 14). But it adds a new leading feature: love (v. 1) and receptivity (v. 13a) are fulfilled in the offering of sacrifice (v. 17). Only thus is God truly met in fellowship and is the dedicated life solemnized. Behind this supreme moment lies thankful recollection and testimony: the death of God's people does not happen lightly, but is a thing prized and guarded by Him (v. 15). The psalmist's recollection of how near he came to death (cf. vv. 3, 8) and yet was drawn back, confirms to him that he is under divine lordship (v. 16a, b) and that his lord's decree was for his liberation from the bondage of trouble (v. 16c). Consequently, dedication must be the order of the day, solemnized in the approved manner, bathed in prayer (v. 17) and sealed by public witness (vv. 18, 19).

17 Thank-offerings were peace-offerings (Lv. 7:11–15), and therefore contained the elements of the fellowship meal (Lv. 7:15) signifying peace with God and men, atonement (Lv. 3:2) as the ground of peace, and consecration (Lv. 3:5).

PSALM 117. ALL NATIONS

This doxology is akin to Ps. 100. Its comprehensiveness offsets the individual prayer of Ps. 116. 1 All nations; i.e. all Gentiles (note Rom. 15:11). 2 Great . . . toward us. The acts of God for Israel (us) are of world significance. The chosen people exemplify what God desires on a universal scale, and the salvation He works for them is the salvation of the world.

PSALM 118. HIS STEADFAST LOVE ENDURES FOR EVER

This hymn, expressive of high spiritual elation, is a processional song for varied voices. The occasion cannot be positively determined. Former commentators thought of dedication feasts as in Ezr. 6:15f.; Ne. 8; 1 Macc. 4:54ff.; 2 Macc. 10:1ff. But evidence for any post-exilic date has never been strong. Jewish sources, Targum and Talmud, say that the psalm was used for antiphonal singing in the liturgy and connect it with the Feast of Tabernacles. In line with this, recent exposition associates the psalm with the postulated autumn festival of enthronement in which the Davidic king, symbolically put in jeopardy by his foes, is delivered by the Lord and restored to kingship. The psalm was sung in the triumphal procession, culminating in sacrifice: vv. 1–18, on the way to the Lord's house; vv. 19, 20 at the entrance; vv. 21–25 as the procession moved on to the altar; v. 26, the priestly greeting; and vv. 27–29, the worship accompanying the sacrifice.

1–4 Invocation

The psalm commences and concludes with a phrase that had evidently become a liturgical formula. Cf. 1 Ch. 16:34; 2 Ch. 5:13; Ezr. 3:11; Ps. 136. 2–4 For the triple call to praise see Ps. 115:9–11.

5–19 The approach to the Lord's house

The king, as Melchizedek priest (cf. Ps. 110:1), leads his people in joyful worship. Behind him and them lies the threat from hostile worldly power (cf. vv. 10–12), sometimes actualized in foes such as Sennacherib (2 Ki. 19) but ever-present. Cf. on Pss. 46–48, esp. 48:4–8. Whether in symbol as part of the autumn celebration of Tabernacles, or in grim reality, the threat has been dispersed and faith in the Lord vindicated. It is likely that the voice of the royal leader is heard in vv. 5–7, the congregational response in vv. 8, 9; vv. 10–12 are antiphonal, the people responding in the repeated words; possibly we hear the same corporate voice replying to the king in vv. 14, 15b, 16b, and the king's great affirmation at the Temple gate in vv. 17–19.

5 Historically exemplified in 2 Ki. 19:1–3, 15–19. If those commentators are correct who, on the basis of psalms like this, suppose an annual royal festival, there was a symbolic humiliation of the king, instancing the truth that his throne did not depend on force of arms and that, militarily speaking, worldly forces were ever stronger. But the prayer of faith prevailed: David's throne rested on divine promises. 17, 18 The royal psalms are full of the terminology found here: the threat of death (cf. Pss. 22:15; 48:14 'our guide even unto death', cf. RV), 19 the consequent life of righteousness (cf. Ps. 24:5, RV).

20–26 From the gate to the altar

Possibly the priests, guardians of the Temple, now meet the procession, laying down the condition (v. 20) that none but the righteous can enter (cf. Pss. 15:1ff.; 24:3–6). The king replies in testimony that God has saved him in answer to prayer (v. 21), thus declaring him to be in the right with God. The popular response (vv. 22–24) rejoices in God's choice of His king and in His bestowing on His people such a day of gladness. Now the priests turn and lead the procession on as they voice prayer and benediction (vv. 25, 26).

20 Righteous basically ever means to be 'in the right with God'. 21 Thus the Lord's saving of the king from his foes shows who is accepted before Him and who is not. 22 Isaiah (28:16) uses identical terminology about God's promises to David: it was the error of Hezekiah at that time to seek military security rather than the security of trusting the promises. In standing by His promises, God chooses the stone which the worldly-wise rejected. Cf. Dn. 2:34, 35, 44, 45; Zc. 3:9; 4:7. Stone was obviously in common use as a symbol of the Davidic monarchy and a Messianic term. 25 Save us has been anglicized as 'Hosanna' (cf. Mt. 21:9); it expressed the Messianic longing of the people.

27–29 Sacrifice and praise

The priests now command the initiation of the sacrifice, presumably one of thanksgiving (v. 27). The king first (v. 28), and then the whole congregation (v. 29) voice a testimony of thanksgiving (cf. Introduction to Ps. 116) to the Lord as the sacrifice is offered.

27 Light is another key idea of the royal psalms. The Lord has brought His king out of death's darkness with light and liberty (cf. Pss. 18:28; 97:11). Bind. This is a correct literal translation of the verb, but it has a more suitable extended meaning. In activities which involve binding, girding on, harnessing, etc., it also means 'to make ready' or 'to initiate (some activity)': thus 'to make ready' a chariot (Gn. 46:29; 1 Ki. 18:44), 'to initiate' battle (1 Ki. 20:14). The custom at Tabernacles of weaving branches, whether to carry in procession or for making booths, justifies the verb here. Hence: 'Initiate, or prepare the festival with (woven) branches, (and come) up to the horns of the altar.'

PSALM 119. LOVE FOR THE LORD AND HIS LAW

This is an elaborate, ingenious and passionate meditation upon the law of the Lord. 'Law' in the OT should not be confused with Pharisaic legalism. The Hebrew word is tôrâ, meaning 'teaching'. It stands for the will of God revealed to Israel. It is the loving instruction of a parent (Pr. 4:1, 2).

The psalm has an acrostic pattern: each of the twenty-two letters of the Hebrew alphabet is made the initial letter of eight verses in the successive sections. The major feature, however, is the repetition of eight synonyms of the will of God: law (tôrâ), 'teaching', notes that God has made His truth known by personal verbal communication, just as a teacher or parent would; this is also expressed by word (dāḇār, or 'imrâ). Testimonies ('ēḏôt) stresses the content: God has testified of Himself and His requirements. These latter come to man as statutes (ḥuqqîm, root ḥ-q-q, to engrave) or unchangeable rules; judgments or ordinances (mišpāṭîm), decisions which God has made; precepts (piqqûḏîm) authoritatively imposed; commandments (miṣwôṯ) expecting obedience; all issuing in a way (derek), habitual modes of life and thought. (Cf. Ps. 19:7ff.) One or other of these terms occurs in every verse of the psalm, except v. 122; but they have no obvious methodical sequence from stanza to stanza. We may reasonably assume, however, that within each stanza the poet was governed by more than the bare consideration of the initial letter of the sayings he selected. There must at the least be a general suitability of one thought to another.

1–8 The way of the Lord is good

Wholesome benefits follow from devotion to God's law: a good life (1), freedom from deviation (3), no cause for shame (6), inner integrity (7). But the Lord looks for deliberate conformity to His will (1), single-mindedness (2), obedience (4), study (6).

3 Wrong: that which deviates, a mistake, a misuse, or a perversion.

9–16 The remedy for sin

Defilement (9), inconsistency (10), actual sin (11), all yield to the pure influence of God's word. Hence the need, and the psalmist's determination to be watchful (9), devoted (10), committing the word to memory (11), looking to God for understanding (12), sharing the truth with others (13), subjecting his emotions to the love of God's word (14, 16), giving it concentrated attention (15).

17–24 A light for dark days

When life seems precarious (17) and earthly days seem far from home (19), and authorities are condemnatory and suspicious (22, 23), God's word gives purpose to life (17) and makes it bearable (19). But without divine aid there is no comprehension (18), without obedience no blessing (21, 22). How, then, we should long for God's law (20), delight in and submit to it (24).

18 Wondrous; cf. Ps. 107:8. 19 Sojourner: resident alien. On God's action in relation to His word in vv. 18, 19, cf. Lk. 24:32, 45.

25–32 Faithful God, Divine Teacher

God is faithful to His word (25, 28) and to those who love His word (26, 30, 31), but His word can be understood only if He teaches it (26, 27, 29, 32). The word is a source of revival (25), comfort (28), direction (29) when, under God as teacher, the pupil is earnest (27), deliberate (30), persistent (31) and resolved (32).

30 The way of faithfulness: the trustworthy rule of life, i.e. God's law.

33–40 Single-mindedness

The whole law throughout a whole life (33), the whole heart (34), which delights in it (35) and utterly rejects alternative paths (36, 37)—this is the single-mindedness of one who fears God (38), fears His displeasure (39; cf. v. 21) and longs for His blessing (40).

33 End: either of the requirements of God, or of his own life. 36 Gain. The word is used of self-advancement at any price, exclusive appreciation of the world's wealth. By contrast, it is the testimonies which express and possess true value in this life.

41–48 Complete and equipped

Here is a man who is right with God (41), enjoying personal fulfilment (45), and ministering to others (42, 43, 46): the man of God (2 Tim. 3:17) abiding in the word of God (2 Tim. 3:10–16).

41 Cf. Eph. 1:13. 44, 45 The element of perseverance; cf. Pr. 2:4. 48 I revere (lit. 'lift up my hands unto'): the attitude of prayer (cf. Ps. 28:2), significant of the reverence felt for God's word.

49–56 Solace and strength

Comfort in trouble (50a), vitality to meet opposition without deviating (50b–52), emotions anchored to true moral values (53), uplifting thoughts when otherwise depression might strike home (54, 55). No blessing surpasses that of knowing and obeying God's precepts (56).

51 Godless: translated 'insolent' in v. 21; the idea is 'seething with self-importance'. Utterly deride: this verb supplies the noun 'scoffer' (cf. Ps. 1:1), the person who feels there is simply nothing to be said on the other side. In 1:1, he is the man who dismisses with contempt the thought of God. Here he equally dismisses the godly man, who is nevertheless maintained by the vitalizing power of God's word. 52 From of old: the thought is either that God's word has stood the test of time, or that history abounds in examples of the overthrow of godless scoffers. 53 Cf. v. 136. 54 Pilgrimage: 'sojourning', residence as alien or refugee; cf. v. 19. 56 That, or 'because' (AV, RV).

57–64 The Lord is my portion

We cannot have God without His word. Such is the lesson of this section. The man who wants God (57), whole-heartedly desires God's favour and grace (58), seeks His presence (62), associates with those who reverence Him (63) and sees His steadfast love evidenced everywhere (64) must at the same time choose and cultivate the word of God. It is impossible to abide in Him unless His words abide in us (Jn. 15:7).

57 My portion; cf. Jos. 13:32, 33; 18:7. 58 Favour (lit. 'face'); cf. Nu. 6:24–26; 2 Sa. 14:24; 2 Cor. 4:6. 61 Cords: the snares and pressures introduced by others to make him deviate.

65–72 God's good discipline

God does good (65), teaches good (66), is good (68) and purposes good (71). Of necessity He sometimes must bless us with affliction, but this is both according to what His word leads us to expect (65; cf. Jb. 2:9; Ps. 94:12; Pr. 3:11, 12; Heb. 12:5ff.), and designed to attach us the more devotedly to His word (67, 71). The particular affliction appears to have been a smear of lies (69), but it only succeeded in driving him into more whole-hearted devotion to the word (69), a clear-eyed discernment (70), and a supreme valuing of the law of God (72).

66 Judgment: a word meaning 'taste', i.e. discernment.

73–80 A faithful Creator

In this section, which could well act as a scriptural comment on 1 Pet. 4:19, the verses correspond to each other: 73 to 80, 74 to 79, and so on. Four topics emerge. First, the way of life (73, 80): since God is the Creator, how needful for the creature to understand His commandments (73), with an unmixed devotion, for only in this way will life be lived successfully (80). Secondly, the secret of influence: the Creator looks for mutual helpfulness among those who fear Him (74, 79): the life grounded on the word gladdens (74) and instructs them (79). Thirdly, the meaning of suffering (75, 78): the Lord makes no errors (75a), nor does He act out of character (75b) in afflicting—not even if He uses the godless (78, i.e. the insolent proud) as His instruments and allows His servants to be wrongfully treated. True godliness is shown in holding on to the word (78b). Fourthly, the assurance of comfort (76, 77): God's mercies can be relied upon, for two reasons: His word promises them (76), and the troubled soul delights in His law (77).

81–88 Lord, how long?

Often the godless seem to have it all their own way (85, 87), and the silence of God baffles His saints. However, even when they ask with perplexity why the promises have not been kept (82, 84), yet their only comfort is those very promises themselves (81, 83, 86, 87), for they are sure (86), having originated from His mouth (88).

83 Wineskin in the smoke; i.e. black, shrivelled, past being of further use. 84 The shortness of life is often the basis of appeal (cf. Pss. 88:3; 89:47).

89–96 God's word, immutable, inexhaustible

The psalmist views three areas: heaven (89), the long sweep of human history (90) and the created order (90b, 91): all alike bear witness to the unchangeable character of God's word. All alike are His servants, i.e. they obey His will expressed in His word (91b). This changeless word must therefore be the most secure basis for life in all its aspects (92–96).

96 Perfection is an otherwise unused word. It may mean that all that man counts perfect has, in the end, its limitations, but God's commandment is inexhaustible. It could mean 'completeness', contrasting the finite universe (however large) with the infinite extent of God's word.

97–104 Here is wisdom

A man taught by God's law is wiser than opponents (98), would-be teachers (99), the proverbially wise elders (100), the enticements of sin (101). The explanation is that in His word God is the teacher (102), and the result is love (97), desire (103) and sound moral judgment (104).

98 Thy commandment . . .: lit. 'Thou—that is, thy commandments . . .'. No distinction can be made between God and what He says. 101 The element of moral discipline in obedience.

105–112 A pragmatic argument

In the foregoing section, the divine origin of the word (98, 102) constrained the psalmist to value it. Now it is its practical usefulness as a guide (105) which makes him solemnly determined (106, 111, 112) to hold to it, in trouble (107), joy (108), peril (109), hostility (110).

105 Feet . . . path possibly suggest 'for the next step as well as for the more remote destination'. 111 Cf. on v. 57.

113–120 Loving God's law

Nothing opens a window into the OT view of the law of God more than the verb 'love' (113; cf. v. 97). To the OT saint, God's law was not the burdensome legal imposition of Pharisaism as the NT reveals it. It was liberating (v. 45), delightsome (v. 103), a joy (v. 111). This love was all-absorbing, utterly excluding the double-mind (113), but to maintain such an attitude requires decisiveness: a seeking of God and an abhorrence of evil (114, 115); it also requires divine strengthening (116, 117), and a recognition that God cannot bless where His word is deserted (118), so that it is necessary deliberately to adopt (119, therefore) the contrary attitude. Finally, love is not stunted but rather is fostered by the reverence and holy fear due to God and His judgments (120).

114 The sufficiency of God: a true hiding place secures from danger; a shield protects in danger. 116 My hope; i.e. of seeing God's promises fulfilled (cf. v. 114). 118 Cunning here describes the alternative authority espoused when the word of God has been rejected; cf. 2 Tim. 4:4. 120 Identical attitudes towards God and His word.

121–128 Grounds of appeal

The psalmist pleads for divine action, first on the ground of his own loyal service (121, 122): his circumstances are due to his obedience, surely God will stand by him (cf. Is. 50:5–8); secondly, on the ground of God's pledged word (123); thirdly, of His steadfast love (124); fourthly, of his position as servant (cf. Is. 41:9b, 10); fifthly, of the urgent circumstances of the day (126). These are grounds which every believer may plead in prayer. The psalmist's certainty of divine response is indicated by his decisive actions to be pleasing to God (127, 128).

129–136 How God blesses His word

Vv. 129–131 are statements about God's word and the psalmist's response to it: in itself it is wonderful (129), i.e. a marvel beyond man's power to accomplish; in its effect, it illuminates (130). These features prompt obedience (129b) and spiritual hunger (131). Vv. 132–135 are prayers: God's word is effective only if God uses it for blessing, but when He does, then it tells of His steadfast love (132, see note below), it gives victory to the obedient (133), desire to obey it is a proper ground of appeal for other divine blessings (134), to learn God's statutes is to see

His face (135). Consideration of these benefits provokes tears that any should disobey such a precious and potent thing (136).

132 As is thy wont: lit. 'according to the judgment with respect to those who love . . .'. 'Judgment' signifies the revelation of God's mind on some point: in this case, His graciousness to those who love Him.

137–144 God's other Self

The worth of God's word constantly excites the psalmist's devotion to it: so here (139, 140, 141, 143). The peculiar worth of the word as stated in this section is that it mirrors God (137a, 144a), particularly being associated with His faithfulness, or 'trustworthiness' (138), and also being described as tried, meaning 'purified from all dross' (140), and true (142) or veracious.

145–152 The two resources

Vv. 145–147 recall a period of intense prayer, whole-hearted (145), directed to God (146), at cost to self (147), and we must suppose that some crisis was thus combated. Vv. 149–152 speak of a crisis of foes drawing near (150), but the psalmist's resource is that the Lord also is near (151).

Between these sections is a memorable statement of devoted study of God's word (148) which links the other references to the word throughout the verses. Why is he so devoted in meditation? Because effective prayer requires resolute obedience (145, 146), and springs from a grasp of promises (147); and the Lord's nearness is granted to one who can testify (151) with conviction (152) to the truth of His commandments.

153–160 Give me life

Experience of life's afflictions comes to the fore throughout Ps. 119, and especially in this section. Like all the psalmists, when trouble comes he runs to God in prayer, not from Him in rebellion. Three times (154, 156, 159) he prays Give me life, appealing in turn to God's promise, the will of God; God's justice (AV, RV 'judgments'), God's decisions, the mind of God; and God's steadfast love, the heart of God. Since God will act only according to His word, none can expect to enter into blessing but those who love and obey it (153, 155, 157); but all who honour it may rest confident that God will keep it (160).

160 Sum: God's word in its entirety.

161–168 Honour where it is due

In four areas of life, God's word has pride of place: worldly honour (161), ambition (162), religion (163, see note below), and the use of time (164). This bears a fourfold fruit: peace of conscience (165a), consistent living (165b), assurance of salvation (166), and fearlessness under the scrutiny of God (167, 168).

163 Falsehood often refers to false gods, and abhor is almost a technical term for the Lord's disgust at pagan religious practices.

169–176 The paradox of blessing

The psalmist chooses to end his great meditation on the word of God by noting again that while for every spiritual blessing we are utterly dependent on God (the prayers of 169–172, reading 171, 172 as in RV, 'Let. . . .'), we can none the less, and must, put ourselves in the way of blessing by obedience to God's word (173–176). Consequently, biblically based prayer and biblically directed obedience are the marks of the godly man, seen in his mind (169), mouth (171, 172), will (173b), emotions (174) and conscience (176).

GENERAL INTRODUCTION TO PSALMS 120-134: THE 'SONGS OF ASCENTS'

These fifteen psalms are each entitled 'A Song of ascents' (AV 'degrees'). The significance of the phrase is uncertain. Different explanations have been suggested. For example, a somewhat vague Jewish tradition says there was a liturgy associated with the fifteen steps between two of the Temple courts and compares the number of the steps to that of the psalms. The LXX title is 'A Song of the steps'. Another suggestion is that they are a collection of songs which the exiles sang on returning to Jerusalem from Babylon. Cf. Ezr. 7:9 where the same word 'ascent' is used of the journey from Babylon to Jerusalem. A third explanation is that the phrase denotes the literary style of several of the poems, viz. that the thought progresses by well-marked stages (e.g. Ps. 123).

Not wholly satisfactory, but on balance the best suggestion is that these psalms were used by worshippers going up to Zion for the three great festivals of the Jewish year. Even though only one (Ps. 122) is obviously in keeping with the spirit of such pilgrimages, others (e.g. Ps. 121) can be easily applied to pilgrim situations.

Whatever the precise meaning of the superscription, one thing is evident; this collection of psalms constitutes a distinctive group, and is, in itself, a miniature Psalter. It can be divided into five groups each consisting of three psalms. The first two groups deal with external pressures on the godly soul, expectant trust in the intervention of God, and the realization of the tremendous stability, power, and righteousness in Him; and the choice of Zion as the hinge on which turn the Lord's purposes for men. The third group has more in common with the Wisdom literature; the viewpoint is much more general, outward and philosophical; there is no mention of divine mercy, redemption or forgiveness, nor of prayer, the services in the sanctuary, nor the house of David; the emphasis on home and family life is peculiar to this group. The fourth group is intensely personal and devotional; the theme is the discipline of patience. The last group is dominated by the concepts of divine choice; the covenant, the community, and the sanctuary; there is a very real sense of the inheritance of the historic past.

PSALM 120. DELIVER ME

This prayer for relief was prompted by a pervasive atmosphere of untruth and deceit; it is the cry of a man who is spiritually exiled, and summarizes the patience, suffering, and cruel dilemma of the church in a hostile world. Of such slander campaigns the Scriptures give clear examples (Ezr. 4:1ff.; Ne. 4:1ff.), and there must be few believers who cannot identify themselves with the situation of this psalm.

The psalmist records his prayer (vv. 1, 2), anticipates divine retributive action (vv. 3, 4), and laments his uncongenial circumstances (vv. 5–7).

2 The strength of the psalmist's opposition to misuse of the tongue is remarkable. Cf. Pss. 5:9; 10:7; 12:2–4; 36:1–4; 52:2–4; 64:1–4. 3 Be given: a legitimate translation of the Hebrew 'will he give', but possibly the literal rendering should be retained: the psalmist looks for divine retributive action. What more recalls the oath formula (cf. 1 Sa. 3:17, etc.). Possibly the psalmist had even been involved in legal proceedings in which falsehood had been spoken even under oath by his opponents. He looks therefore for the 'more also' of just retribution. 4 Cf. Pss. 7:11–13; 64:2, 3. The warrior is the Lord. In return for the arrows of evil words come the arrows of divine judgment. Broom: a hard wood giving fierce heat: fire is characteristically the wrath of God against sin (cf. Pss. 18:12–14; 140:10). 5 Meshech . . . Kedar. Since the former lived between the Black and Caspian Seas, and the latter were Arabian nomads, we have here a metaphor for uncongenial surroundings and not a factual statement of the psalmist's home. 6, 7 The people of God in an alien world are marked by desire for peace, and a form of speech contrasting with that of their neighbours.

PSALM 121. GOD MY HELPER

This song implies a situation of uncertainty, but any possibility of danger is offset by unquestioning trust in the Lord. Its application to the perils of pilgrimage is obvious, and on the whole this sort of setting makes best sense of the psalm.

1, 2 The God of creation

1 The psalmist may lift up his eyes to the hill of Zion, the goal of pilgrimage and the mount of God (cf. Pss. 3:4; 20:2; 134:3), anticipating from Zion's hill and Zion's God all necessary aid; or he may be fearing the perils of a mountain journey, and be looking with apprehension for sudden attack in lonely ravines or passes. 2 Either way, the God of creation, God the almighty is his help.

3, 4 The God of history

His confident answer (v. 2) gives him a testimony to share with others. The God of Israel is no Baal (1 Ki. 18:27), but one who throughout a long history has ever preserved His people. 4 The duplication of words, neither slumber nor sleep, is as ever an expression of certainty (cf. Gn. 41:32).

5, 6 The God of the individual

The Keeper of Israel (v. 4) is your keeper, shading from sun and moon alike, i.e. from all adversaries at all times, day and night.

7, 8 The God of eternity

Not only all adversaries (v. 6), but all evil, every sort of trouble, and in all activities of life, and for all time.

PSALM 122. THE JOYS AND DUTIES OF THE CITY OF GOD

At the end of his stay in Jerusalem, a pilgrim reviews his sense of privilege at having been in the city, meditates on what Jerusalem means and calls for prayer.

1, 2 Jerusalem, the source of joy

Anticipation (v. 1) has been succeeded by actualization (v. 2), and the pilgrim's mood is one of unfeigned joy and privilege. Cf. 1 Cor. 2:9; Heb. 12:22–24; Rev. 7:9–17.

3–5 Jerusalem, the place of fellowship

The very appearance of Jerusalem, a compact, integrated city (v. 3), suggests visually what is realized there in terms of people: unity, fellowship (v. 4). The tribes find in it a common focus and meeting. This unity finds expression in thanksgiving (v. 4c) for God's self-revelation, and finds its centre in the throne and rule of David (v. 5).

3 Bound: verb 'to be joined', of diversity united (Ex. 28:7; 39:4), of 'common humanity' (Ec. 9:4). 5 Thrones: possibly a plural of majesty, the 'great throne' of David and his dynasty.

6–9 Jerusalem, the object of prayer

The unity of God's people finds expression now in prayer. 6, 7 indicate the terms of the prayer; 8, 9 its motives, love of the brethren, love of God's house, the peace of atonement by sacrifice.

PSALM 123. SOVEREIGN GRACE

None of the psalmists sat in the seat of the scornful (Ps. 1:1), but in many of their prayers they showed themselves very conscious of the society of proud and arrogant men (e.g. Pss. 17:10, 11; 22:6–8; 35:19–26; 44:13–16; 69:4–12; 102:3–10). This then is another prayerful exposure of such a situation as gave rise to Ps. 120. Whereas there the theme is one of sad expectation of God's judgment on the defamers, here the theme is the glad certainty of mercy for the defamed. Personal experience of a sovereign God (v. 1) issues in the repose of faith (v. 2): with expectant eyes fixed on the single source of power and supply (hand), trustfully leaving the decision to Him (till). But He is moved by His people's needs. They can plead on the basis of personal need (for we . . ., v. 3b).

PSALM 124. THE GRACIOUS SOVEREIGN

This psalm is a series of tableaux depicting rescue from danger. Vv. 1–5 give utterance to the nation's consciousness that the deliverance was Yahweh's doing; vv. 6–8 express their thanksgiving and confidence in Him.

Four deadly dangers are instanced to reveal the magnitude of the threat and the greatness of the deliverance: 3 earthquake (cf. Nu. 16:30–32), 4, 5 flood, 6 beast of prey and 7 trap. The completeness of deliverance is shown not by escape alone, but that the snare is broken, the danger itself is destroyed. 8 While they adore the sovereign Creator as their Helper, they recognize that the relationship is all of grace: the name of the Lord, Yahweh, the Saviour of Israel.

PSALM 125. ABIDING SECURITY

A deep conviction of security and of the unchanging power and faithfulness of the Lord finds expression in this song. The psalm was written in Jerusalem during some period of restlessness and tediousness. Evidently this had overcome many of the faint-hearted amongst the community so that they had turned aside to do as other workers of iniquity, and would be led forth to the like judgment. The psalm falls into two parts: an expression of confidence in God (vv. 1–3) and a prayer and warning (vv. 4, 5).

1 The people of God are defined by their attitude of simple trust in the Lord. This trust brings them stability comparable to that of Mt. Zion, 2 and security such as the encircling mountains give to the city. The Lord, who is the object of their trust, is also the means of their security, both present and eternal. 3 This truth is borne out by the emphatic assertion that the sceptre of unrighteous rule shall not rest permanently over the promised land lest, if it did, a general failing of faith should occur among the righteous. The Lord sovereignly controls the trials of His people (cf. 1 Cor. 10:13). The Lord in whom they trust and are secure is the Lord of history.

4, 5 He is also the Lord of righteousness and none dares suppose his security in God to free him from the discipline of moral choice and inner goodness. Thus, as always in scripture, God's sovereignty sets man in a position of moral accountability (cf. Ps. 119:91, 94; Is. 10:5, 6, 12).

PSALM 126. SOWING AND REAPING

The gladness of this psalm is unmistakable. Yet there is also a sense of tearfulness, as if the unexpected blessing (v. 1) ought not to have issued in depression (v. 5). The message of the psalm is that there is no simple solution on earth for the problems of the people of God, no single act of God which will bring them into unbroken joy, rid them of trials and temptations, or establish them in perfection this side of heaven. Joy over supreme divine blessings (vv. 1–3) is immediately followed by the onset of new problems, new adversities calling for new acts of God (v. 4), and the task of His people is ever to persevere in faithful continuance in well-doing (vv. 5, 6).

Understandably, commentators have associated this psalm with the period of the return from exile, when God's mighty deliverance was followed by the depression and disappointment so clearly depicted by Haggai (1:5–11) and the local opposition recorded in Ezr. 4. But the psalm suits that period only because it deals in general principles illustrated over and over in the historical books. Weiser allowably makes the verbs of vv. 1, 2 present tense expressive of general truth: blessings bring joy, but the people of God must learn that holiness is perfected by the testings of life (Jas. 1:2–4), and in the will of God there is no other way forward.

1–3 Laughter

Deliverances are always wholly the acts of the Lord. 1 That the people of God should seem to themselves to have been dreaming signifies both their wonderment and also that they did not themselves contribute to the deliverance. 2 Even the heathen recognize only the Lord as the Agent, 3 and this is the consequent testimony of His people, who contributed nothing but gained all.

4–6 Tears

4 But soon the people face the fact that they are as needy and dependent as ever: a new situation finds them in an identical need; yet again their fortunes need restoring. Only a miracle of divine power will suffice: watercourses in the Negeb! 'Rivers in the sun-scorched desert in the south, an impossible thought indeed!' (Weiser). But not with God! 5, 6 His word now reassures His people. The similarity of theme in these two verses suggests that v. 5 (cf. AV, RV) should be an affirmation, not a prayer. It is not that their efforts contribute to blessing, any more than the farmer can make the seed grow. But if he is not obedient to God's natural laws—even when the task is wearisome unto tears—there will be no harvest. The obedience of His people is the context in which the Lord works miracles of transforming blessing.

PSALM 127. YOUR HEAVENLY FATHER KNOWS

The Bible never places any premium on idleness or improvidence (cf. Ps. 128:2; Pr. 24:30–34), and this psalm neither glorifies slackness nor denigrates effort, but rebukes anxiety. In all, three areas of human endeavour are reviewed: personal prosperity and investment (v. 1a), the building of one's own house; civic or national security (v. 1b); and procreation, the begetting of children (v. 3). Each of these is a fruitful source of the anxiety which the psalmist reproves (v. 2), not in order to take the work out of life, but to take away the worry. His foe is the man whose fretful will to succeed keeps him at his desk from morning to night (v. 2a) and whose meals even become additional committee meetings (v. 2b). Into his thinking the psalmist would inject two truths: the Lord rules, the Lord gives; sovereignty and grace. The outcome of all depends on Him (v. 1) and every needful thing it is His delight to give to His beloved (v. 2). Even children, whose conception and birth has all the appearance of an inevitable cause-and-effect mechanism, are the gifts of the Creator, not the fruitfulness of the procreator (v. 3).

Those commentators may be correct who see this psalm as composed of two originally independent pieces (vv. 1–2, 3–5), but if so the person who united them was of considerable perception. Vv. 3–5 not only add the third area of human activity, thus completing the picture, but supply the perfect illustration of the principle he seeks to inculcate. For while children will not be conceived without parental intercourse, conception and birth—with all the attendant joy (v. 5a) and security (v. 5b) that children bring—are not the result of the intercourse but (in the ultimate analysis) the decision of the Lord.

Hence, the essence of the psalm is thus expressed: he gives to his beloved sleep (v. 2c). God's love gift to His beloved is restfulness (the opposite, not of effort, but of restlessness)—to rest in Him in all the ambitions, duties and joys of life.

2 Sleep. RV mg. 'in sleep' is a possible but not obvious translation. The meaning, however, remains unaltered. God's will for His children is not fretful care, but rest. Cf. Mt. 6:25–34; Lk. 12:16–34. 3 Cf. Gn. 20:18; 30:1, 2; Ru. 4:13; 1 Sa. 1:5; Lk. 1:13ff., 24, 25. 5 Gate: the centre of communal life, the place where all disputes were settled and business transacted (e.g. Ru. 4:1). A large family gave a man a strong position in the ancient community.

PSALM 128. FRUITFUL TOIL

A counterpoise to Ps. 127, this psalm lays down the conditions (vv. 1, 4) for fruitful toil (v. 2a), personal well-being (v. 2b), and a happy home (v. 3), and ends with a prayer for the realization of these blessings (vv. 5, 6).

1 Fears . . . walks: just as Jesus, inculcating the principle of non-anxiety, envisaged a person busy in God's affairs (Mt. 6:31–33), so here the repose in God (suggested in Ps. 127:2c) is not one of relaxation but one of mobilization of spiritual energies: reverence issuing in obedience. 2 Fruit of the labour; i.e. as distinct from fruitless toil; cf. Hg. 1:5, 6, 9; 2:16, 17. The link between obedience and prosperity is unvaried in the OT; cf. Dt. 28:1–14 and contrast vv. 15ff. 3 A fruitful vine: a happy choice of symbol for a loved wife—like a vine, needing support yet ever giving more than getting in providing joy for her husband (Ps. 104:15a). Olive shoots: wine and oil are two symbols of God's unhindered blessing (cf. Dt. 8:8; Ho. 2:22). The olive symbolizes vitality and continuance (Ps. 52:8). 4 This repetition of v. 1 is for the purpose of emphasizing that these covetable blessings are properly experienced only in the context of the fear of God. 5, 6 It is not religion as such that brings a man personal and domestic fulfilment. It comes only and specifically from the God who dwells in Zion. Furthermore, no man is an island, and his personal well-being is bound up with the prosperity of Jerusalem, the good of God's people.

PSALM 129. THE SUFFERING CHURCH

Ps. 128 might suggest an automatic, experienced link between religion and prosperity. But the well-being of the godly is a position of faith (see on Ps. 1), and this psalm provides another perspective.

1–4 The lessons of history

Hundreds of years in the experience of the people of God are condensed into four verses. Enslavement in Egypt supplies most of the metaphors, but the testimony is of one opponent after another, as the words from my youth (cf. Ho. 11:1) indicate. Yet the most up-to-date testimony (now, v. 1) is of survival. This is due to the righteousness of the Lord, i.e. He never deviates from His purposes and promises. Cf. Ps. 23:1–4 where both the green pastures and the valley of deep darkness are 'paths of righteousness', right paths appointed by Him.

5–8 The resource of faith

Just as one restoration of their fortunes still leaves God's people needing yet another (Ps. 126:1, 4), so one opponent replaces another, but the resource remains the same: prayer to the righteous Lord who never forsakes His own. Prayer and prayer alone is the reply to opposition. 5 The prayer asks that all opponents may be disappointed of their expectations (put to shame), 6 impermanent, 7 fruitless and 8 friendless. The violence of these supplications may well surprise us, but once more the psalmist (see on Ps. 109) is only spelling out details we would prefer to leave vague, and is thereby revealing how far our sanctification falls from the place where we might sinlessly give voice to indignation.

PSALM 130. THE LORD'S THREE COMPANIONS

If this psalm is to be linked with the pilgrim feasts of Israel, its natural association is with the Day of Atonement (Lv. 16). If so, then it is another demonstration of the attitude of the devout individual to public occasions of worship and sacrifice. Cf. on Pss. 116; 118.

1–4 Intercession

Attention should be paid in these verses to the forms of address used to God. There are three: first (v.1a), there is LORD, standing for Yahweh, the personal name of Israel's God; the name which holds together mercy and judgment: mercy towards enslaved Israel, holy judgment upon stubborn Egypt (Ex. 20:1). Secondly there is its diminutive, Yah, appearing as LORD (v. 3) and holding the same significance. Finally there is Lord (vv. 2, 3b; Heb. 'ᵃḏōnāy), a name meaning 'sovereign', 'master', pointing to the exaltedness of God. The psalmist's awareness of exalted holiness makes him realize the depths to which sin lowers a man and the problem involved in forgiveness. Yet his awareness of Yahweh the redeemer encourages him to pray.

3 Iniquities: the deepest and most inward of the OT words for sin: it represents the corruption of the heart. Stand; cf. Pss. 1:5; 24:3. Sin's consequences are not only in the realm of conscience (v. 1), but also in the realm of eternity, unfitting a man for God's presence. 4 Forgiveness: the first of the Lord's companions (cf. v. 7); in Hebrew 'the forgiveness', i.e. genuine forgiveness. Feared: being aware of the greatness of his sin (vv. 1a, 3), how exceedingly and fearfully great is God who can triumph over it by forgiveness?

5, 6 Expectation

The sinner is impotently helpless in his sin. He can do nothing. Only God can forgive, and for that sovereign act man must wait. 5 It is not, however, a waiting of dull hopelessness or of desperation. The sinner can rest on promises and revealed truths—in his word I hope. 6 Soul: the personality at centre. We might express the same intensity by saying 'From the bottom of my heart'. Watchmen. The idea combines intensity of longing with confident expectation.

7, 8 Exhortation

The penitent now has a testimony to share: it is worth while to hope in the Lord! Out of personal experience he calls others to enter into divine forgiveness. 7 The Lord has two more companions with Him (cf. v. 4): there is His own steadfast love, the love which will never abandon His people, and which is His permanent attitude towards them; there is also with him . . . plenteous redemption. Redemption (Heb. pᵉḏût) always contains the truth of the 'ransom-price' (cf. Ex. 13:13; Nu. 3:46, 47). The steadfast love of the Lord reaches out to sinners by means of a price for sin which satisfies Him. Why does He forgive? Because of steadfast love. How does He forgive? Through a redemption-price. 8 What does He forgive? All iniquities (cf. v. 3a).

PSALM 131. SCHOOLED IN HUMILITY

The form of this psalm bears some resemblance to the previous psalm in that it is intensely personal, except in the final verse where Israel is mentioned. In content, it is an eminently suitable companion piece. Humbled by sin and forgiveness, the soul dwells quietly with God.

1 Lifted up . . . high: the heart is seen in the eyes (cf. Ps. 101:5; Pr. 30:13). Occupy myself; i.e. my walk and manner of life. 2 Calmed . . . quieted. Before weaning, the infant is aware of the mother as the source of food and it frets for the breast. After weaning, it is content to be 'with mother': her presence is enough. So ought it to be between us and God.

PSALM 132. DAVID'S OATH AND THE LORD'S OATH

It is interesting to associate this psalm with the dedication of Solomon's Temple (cf. 2 Ch. 6:41f.), or possibly with some anniversary of that event. Suitably to such occasions its form derives from 2 Sa. 7, where David's desire to build a house for the Lord (2 Sa. 7:1–3; Ps. 132:1–10) is transformed into the Lord's promise to build a house for David (2 Sa. 7:11ff.; Ps. 132:11ff.). V. 10 clearly supposes the present rule of the Davidic king, and it may be (cf. Eaton) that annually the royal festival contained a re-enactment of the story of the founding of the house, and the depositing there of the ark. This would suitably become the occasion of prayer for the king, and public recollection of the divine oath (v. 11) and the moral foundation (v. 12) on which the monarchy rested. The two halves of the psalm are closely integrated. Note how the prayer (vv. 8–10) is answered in the response (vv. 14–17).

1–10 David's oath

The psalmist requests that the hazards and troubles which David encountered in capturing Jerusalem and bringing thither the ark (cf. 2 Sa. 6:8–10; 1 Ch. 21:13, 30) be remembered by the Lord, i.e. in blessing to his dynasty.

2 The Mighty One of Jacob: this title is found elsewhere only in Gn. 49:24; Is. 49:26; 60:16, always in the context of the prevailing power of the Lord. Suitably, therefore, it would be on David's lips when (contrary to all odds) the Lord had brought him to the throne and subdued all his foes (2 Sa. 7:1). 5 A dwelling place: plural in Hebrew, suggesting 'a worthy dwelling'. 6–8 These verses recall in order the sojourn and removal of the ark from Kiriath-jearim (v. 6; 1 Sa. 7:1, 2; 2 Sa. 6:1–3), the call to communal worship at the dedication (v. 7; 2 Sa. 6:17–19;

1 Ki. 8:1–3, 62, 63, 65, 66), and the ceremonial depositing of the ark in its new home (v. 8). 6 Ephrathah: possibly an old name for Ephraim, here poetically recalling the shrine at Shiloh. In 1 Sa. 1:1 'Ephraimite' is in Hebrew 'Ephrathite'. Was memory of the ark's whereabouts lost during the twenty years of 1 Sa. 7:2, necessitating first enquiry at Shiloh in Ephraim and the gradual tracing of it to the fields of Jaar, i.e. Kiriath-jearim? 7 Footstool; i.e. the ark, above which the Lord was invisibly enthroned (2 Sa. 6:2). 9 Saints (Heb. ḥāsîḏ): those who have been the objects of ḥeseḏ, the Lord's 'steadfast love'. 10 The very existence of the central shrine with the ark depended on the continued existence of the Davidic throne. Hence the prayer for the king. Cf. Ps. 84:9.

11–18 The Lord's oath

God's response to David replaced the king's conception of a permanent, stone building to house the presence of the Lord with a more enduring expression in human flesh (vv. 11, 12) of the Lord's power and steadfast purpose (cf. Ps. 89:19–37). Nevertheless, a particular relationship was affirmed between the Lord and a physical locality, i.e. Zion; this was for ever (vv. 13, 14). Thus there was linked together the Lord's reign over His people, mediated through the anointed king, and His ministry of pardon to them through the priesthood and its sacrifice (cf. v. 9a). These are the characteristics of the Lord in Zion: sovereignty, holiness and grace (cf. on Ps. 150:1, 2).

11, 12 Cf. 2 Sa. 7:12ff. 15 Concern and provision for the poor is ever a mark of the Lord and His king (cf. Ps. 72:12–14). 16 Clothe. Clothing is seen symbolically as expressing character and function. In v. 9a it represents the righteous character of the priests (cf. Is. 11:5; Eph. 6:14). In v. 16 it represents their function to dispense salvation in their role as priestly officiants in the sacrifices (cf. Is. 59:15–17; 61:10; 63:1, 2). 17 Horn symbolizes strength (cf. Zc. 1:18, 19); lamp, perpetuity (cf. 1 Ki. 11:36).

PSALM 133. THE BLESSINGS OF BRETHREN DWELLING IN UNITY

This is a poem about the family unity of God's people. The coming together of the scattered nation at the pilgrim feast would suggest the topic.

The psalmist illustrates the blessings of unity in two ways. 2 First, it is like the special consecrating oil of the high priest. Oil has the general significance of joy (cf. Pss. 23:5; 104:15) with the related ideas of fragrance (Ct. 1:3) and comfort (Is. 1:6), but the oil of priestly anointing was a sanctifying thing (Ex. 30:22–33). The abundance of the anointing oil (v. 2b, c) suggests how abundantly the Lord blesses and sanctifies His people through their fellowship.

3 In the second place he likens this unity to the refreshing dew, heavy as that on high Hermon, and falling also on Zion. The main idea, dew, expresses divine refreshment: God's gift of life and fruitfulness (see on Ps. 110:3), but the linking of Hermon (in the northern kingdom) with Zion indicates that God gives His gift to His people when they are in fellowship. The falling of Hermon's dew on Zion would be a miracle, and fellowship is a miracle of divine grace (Eph. 2:11–22) wherein individual blessings are shared with mutual profit. Such fellowship (v. 3b) is something God delights to bless, and is proof of the possession of life for evermore (cf. 1 Jn. 3:14).

PSALM 134. A PRAYERFUL GREETING AND GRACIOUS RESPONSE

A psalm for the vigil of a night festival (cf. Ex. 12:6–8; Is. 30:29). The first two verses are an invitation to worship, extended to those who remain in the Temple throughout the night (cf. 1 Ch. 9:33). To bless the Lord, to worship Him with thanksgiving and with the bowed knee of adoration, is a fitting work for servants. Their privilege is to be in His house and presence, and their characteristic occupation is prayer, the lifting up of the hands.

The invitation, spoken by the leader of the worship, meets the congregational response of v. 3. Thus, fellowship is cemented for the night service. The blessing sought is individual (you is singular, contrasting with the plural of vv. 1, 2), from Zion's Lord (see on Ps. 132:13, 14), and backed by the Creator's power.

PSALM 135. THE SECURITY OF ELECTION

This glorious hymn of praise has many points of contact with earlier psalms, and there is no doubt that it was composed for festivals of public worship, and was deliberately designed to evoke memories and associations of other songs of praise.

The appointed subject for which the Lord is praised is His choice of Israel to be His people (v. 4). The rest of the psalm expands this theme of election, its nature, reality, and privilege.

1–4 The meaning of election

The invitation to the Lord's servants to praise Him (vv. 1, 2) rests firstly on the revealed nature of the Lord as good and gracious (v. 3), and then moves on to the particular display of goodness and grace in the choice of Israel (v. 4).

3 Good expresses what God is in Himself and is well defined on the one side as His utter moral purity (cf. Jas. 1:13); on the other side it is His gracious kindness (cf. Jas. 1:17), linked here with his name, for the kindly goodness of God to Israel is pre-eminently seen at the Exodus in which also the meaning of His name was made known (Ex. 20:2). 4 For himself . . . his own possession. The word possession (cf. Ex. 19:4–6) signifies the specially treasured and intimately personal property of One who possesses everything. This is the meaning of God's choice of His people (cf. 1 Pet. 2:9, 10).

5–14 The reality of election

Five grounds are set forth whereby Israel may be certain that the Lord's choice of them to be His people is a secure reality. 5 His supremacy, whereby His choice cannot be revised by others (cf. Jn. 10:28f.); 6 His sovereign independence—therefore His choice was an act of personal will, deliberate and uncompelled (cf. Jas. 1:18); 7 His almightiness, whereby, over all the earth, things visible and invisible are at His sole command: He who could do anything He wished, chose Israel; 8–12 His historical acts on the people's behalf, covering deliverance (vv. 8, 9), conquest (vv. 10, 11) and settlement (v. 12)—clear proof of His choice of them as His own; 13, 14 and finally His changelessness, whereby He never alters in Himself or in His attitudes of power and pity towards His people.

15–21 The privilege of election

The predicament of all other nations is exposed by consideration of their gods—15 their origin, 16, 17 lifelessness and 18 effect. Exclusiveness is part of the essence of the religion of the Bible. To the nations their gods were worshipped as living, but to Israel there was only one living and true God. We must take care to understand 'all gods' (v. 5) in the light of vv. 15–18. The former verse must not be understood to admit their reality as existing but inferior beings. They exist only as supposed and chosen objects of worship. In the same sense, the Christian is warned to keep himself from idols (1 Jn. 5:21).

19–21 How great, then, is the privilege of the people of the only God!

PSALM 136. THE WONDER OF ELECTION

This companion and parallel to Ps. 135 was clearly devised for public worship, the people responding in the recurring refrain. Undoubtedly it tends to be wearisome to us, but it is the purposeful persistence of successive hammer-blows driving home the truth. What, we might ask, is the 'steadfast love' of which we read? How can it 'smite' (v. 10), 'overthrow' (v. 15), slay (v. 18)? Because it is God's active, gracious, saving and providing power towards Israel, the means by which He implements His choice of the people for Himself. This 'steadfast love' is the essence of the goodness of God (v. 1) and the special feature of His supremacy over all claimants to be God (vv. 2, 3); it governs the performance of His wonders (v. 4); it fills all His activities in creation (vv. 5–9) and history (vv. 10–22). Yet it is prompted by no merit on the part of its recipients (vv. 23, 24), and (a mundane but impressive ending) it is concerned to provide daily bread (v. 25). We may search through the whole nature of this exalted God of heaven, the God who is free of all earthly limitations and possessor of all heaven's fullness, and find nothing more worthily the object of thankful praise than that his steadfast love endures for ever (v. 26).

2 God of Gods. Cf. on 135:15ff. He is supreme over all that man may worship, 3 and as Lord of lords supreme over all that holds man in bondage. See on 130:2, 'Lord' ('ᵃḏōnāy). 4 Wonders. Cf. on Ps. 107:8. 5 For creation as evidencing the wisdom of God, cf. Is. 40:12–14; Pr. 8:22–31. 6 Earth upon the waters. This is not intended to be a comment upon the structure of the universe (the so-called 'three-decker' view) but a realistic poetic observation. Happily, the earth is spread upon the waters! 10–15 In two groups (10–12; 13–15) these verses show the power of God implementing His steadfast love for Israel: each group contains a statement of power (12, 13), of overthrow (10, 15) and of deliverance (11, 14). 12 Hand . . . arm. Cf. Ex. 6:1, 6; 13:3; Dt. 4:34; Is. 51:9; 52:10; 53:1. The 'arm of the Lord' stands for the Lord Himself coming to save. 17–22 Cf. Dt. 2:26 – 3:13. 23, 24 A succinct picture of helplessness: no resources, many foes. 25 How the very ordinariness and homeliness magnifies the gracious, kindly love of God!

PSALM 137. BITTER MEMORIES, DIRE EXPECTATIONS

The concluding verses of this psalm, which, as Eaton says, 'rank high among the passages in the Old and New Testaments which hurt the conscience', confront us with the problem of imprecatory psalms in a particularly vivid form. Yet it will not do to say (e.g. with A. F. Kirkpatrick, The Psalms, 1910, in loc.) that 'the new law, "Thou shalt love thine enemy", had not yet taken the place of the old maxim, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour and hate thine enemy".' In the first place, this bland command to love and hate belongs not to the OT but to the Jewish traditional law. The OT nowhere commands the hatred of enemies as a principle, though urging it as right in specific cases and for flagrant offences (e.g. Dt. 23:3–6) to maintain an attitude of antagonism. Interestingly enough, love of Edomites, the hated foes of Ps. 137:7, is encouraged in Dt. 23:7, 8, though Kirkpatrick fails to take account of this. Secondly, simply to denigrate the imprecations of this psalm as evidence of the untutored conscience of ancient man is to overlook the shining devotion and spirituality of the opening verses.

To a marked degree, therefore, this psalm contains that tension between high, covetable spirituality and strong expressions of animosity which is found throughout the imprecatory psalms (see Introduction). This, in itself, should warn us that no naïve appeal to a supposed lower morality of the OT will solve this problem. Furthermore, the psalmist clearly has not disappeared into the depths of human rage quite as completely as, e.g., Weiser suggests: his spirit of animosity and vengeance exhausts itself in prayer, and there is no suggestion that it ever would, or ever intended to, express itself in deeds. Here also, as in the opening verses, this writer can be a teacher and example for modern man.

It is essential to recall that when the NT quoted another of the imprecatory psalms (69:25), it described it as a scripture 'which the Holy Spirit spoke beforehand by the mouth of David, concerning Judas . . .' (Acts 1:16). That is to say, there is such a thing as the wrath of God (here voiced by the Holy Spirit), there are people who rightly deserve to be the targets of that wrath (Judas or, in Ps. 137, Edom and Babylon), and there are people raised up by God to give expression in words to that wrath (David, the psalmist of Ps. 137, etc.). We, whose anger ever trembles on the brink of sinfulness, do well to admit that we could not guiltlessly voice these sentiments. But in doing so we admit, not a greater sanctity nor a more enlightened conscience than the men of old, but a duller moral perception of the eternal significance of right and wrong, a less clear-cut devotion to God and good, and a failure to include in our portrait of the Lord Jesus Christ the NT insistence on 'the wrath of the Lamb' (Rev. 6:16). (Cf. W. Alexander, The Witness of the Psalms to Christ and Christianity, 1878, pp. 43–58.)

Commentators mostly favour a post-exilic date for this psalm, resting their opinion on the verb tenses in the opening verses, which appear to look back on the Babylonian captivity as past. But one within the period of the captivity could thus look back on a specific incident such as vv. 2, 3 relate, and in general the melancholy beauty of vv. 1–6, which contain no suggestion of Jerusalem revisited or in any way restored, as well as the fresh vigour of the denunciations of vv. 7–9, are better explained as arising from the homesickness and anguish of enslavement. Kaufmann (The Religion of Israel, 1960, p. 311) makes this the latest psalm in the Psalter, dating it within the Exile.

1 Waters. Israel's captivity in Babylon is often associated with rivers (cf. Ezr. 8:15; Ezk. 1:1; Dn. 8:2); the captives may even have been used as slave-labour on irrigation works. But in the present passage it is not their suffering but the mere sight of the Babylonian landscape, so different from that of Zion, that prompts the comparison and leads to tears. 2–4 In the poetical arrangement of the psalm, v. 4 belongs with 5 and 6, but in thought it concludes 2 and 3. Decisive laying up of the musical instruments was the reaction to a request from their captors for Hebrew music, for it exposed the incongruity of the Lord's song in a foreign land. 3 Mirth. Here we see OT religion through OT eyes: asked for a Temple song, they spontaneously thought of religious joy. It is well for us to recall that OT religion knew nothing of Pharisaic bondage and burdensomeness. Cf. Is. 43:23b.

4 A foreign land. There is nothing here of the thought of the Lord being confined to the boundaries of Canaan, but rather that His people, in a foreign land in these circumstances, had the sense of being rejected and cast off by Him. Therefore how could they act as though nothing had happened and all was well? The psalmist knew the seriousness of sin as alienating the Lord and separating His people from Him. 5, 6 Note the strong element of self-imprecation in these verses. The things of God are to have priority in his memories and in his enjoyments. If it is otherwise, then he enters into a curse involving loss of his faculties. If even to this extent, i.e. of forgetting Jerusalem or failing to treasure it above all, he sides with the Babylonian and Edomite foes of the sacred city, he does not spare himself the pains he will presently invoke upon them. Thus we see in advance that his wrath is a genuine religious emotion, directed against all ungodliness wherever found, however expressed, and is no mere self-indulgent human vengefulness.

7 The Edomites were Israel's ancestral brothers, through Esau, a relationship which Israel had been careful to observe (cf. Dt. 2:1–8), but relations between the two nations had been incessantly bitter, culminating in the atrocious Edomite exultation in the fall of Jerusalem (cf. Ob. 8–14). 8, 9 These verses should not be taken as a statement of the divine principle of exact retribution, a principle that is safe only in the hands of God. but rather an acknowledgment of the human methods of reprisal. D. R. Jones (on Zc. 14:13, in Haggai, Zechariah and Malachi, 1962) uses the words: 'Less a crude piece of Old Testament savagery than the result of empirical realism. This is how things happen in the conflicts of an evil world.' Words could not more exactly introduce the present verses. Here is a man who is so sure of his purity of mind and motive that he can spell out his petition in terms of the actuality of its fulfilment in a hard and cruel world.

PSALM 138. THE ONLY AND TRUSTWORTHY GOD

This is above all things a psalm of confidence in God. The psalmist faces three other existing forces in turn and proclaims in relation to each of them the superior power of the Lord: thus, in relation to other gods (vv. 1–3), the name of the Lord alone is to be praised, and this confidence arises out of the experience of answered prayer (v. 3); in relation to secular authorities (vv. 4–6), he asserts that even they must come to acknowledge the Lord when they learn how the Lord has dealt with him (vv. 4b, 6); and in relation to enemies who threaten him personally (vv. 7, 8), he is confident of his abiding security because of the faithfulness of the Lord to His purposes (v. 8).

What situation best fits a psalm such as this? It is hardly likely that a private individual could think of some purely personal experience as exercising a convincing influence over the kings of the earth. But if the individual were a king himself, such a hope is possible. Were it not for the reference to the Temple (v. 2; assuming, as seems correct, that this means the earthly building which Solomon made) the psalm would fit suitably the career of David (cf. 2 Sa. 7:8, 9; 12:7). Of the other kings Hezekiah is, of course, the obvious candidate, for his miraculous deliverance from Sennacherib could clearly give him cause to vaunt over the heathen gods, to sense that a testimony had been at least implicitly made to the kings of the earth, and to feel a new surge of confidence in the power of the Lord. His deliverance was, as a matter of fact, associated with a clear answer to prayer (2 Ki. 19:14ff.). But doubtless there were many occasions on which individual kings were divinely brought to victory and to the renewal of faith.

It may be, however, that some psalmist, at the time of Cyrus' decree (Ezr. 1:1–4), speaks out in the name of the nation (for a similar personification, cf. Ps. 129:1–3), celebrating the Lord's overthrow of the gods of Babylon (cf. Is. 46:1–7), anticipating the world-wide testimony which the publication of the decree will effect (whether Cyrus was sincere or not is no matter), and expressing buoyant confidence regarding the national future.

1–3 The God who hears

The Lord has dealt with the psalmist in such a way as to capture the devotion of his whole heart, and to rule out the possibility of his defecting to worship any of the gods (v. 1). Yet it is not so much a matter of what God has done but of what He is, as seen in His deeds; therefore worship is directed towards the temple, the place where God had presenced Himself among His people, and His name, which summarized all that He had told them of Himself. But in particular He is thankfully adored for steadfast love and faithfulness, even to an extent which exceeded everything previously known (v. 2). The occasion of this revelation was the answering of the psalmist's prayer (v. 3).

1 The gods. There is an ambivalence in the OT concerning 'other gods'. It strenuously denies their existence as beings (cf. Ps. 115:4–7) but ever recognizes their reality as objects of somebody's worship and their potential to seduce Israel away from the Lord. Cf. 1 Jn. 5:20, 21. The psalmist's purpose here is simply to assert the absolute supremacy of the Lord against all such claimants to his worship (cf. 1 Cor. 8:5, 6). 2 RSV mg. is to be retained: the Lord's recent word, i.e. what He replied and then implemented in response to prayer, has outstripped all that the psalmist ever previously knew His name to signify.

4–6 The God who acts

Words (v. 4) looks back to the word of v. 2: what the Lord replied and then implemented. This act is such as to convince even kings, and to make them rejoice over the glory of the Lord as manifested in His ways, His characteristic acts (v. 5). And this is His character, to lift up the lowly man who has reached rock-bottom, but to alienate Himself from the haughty (v. 6).

4 For, or 'when'. If the latter translation is accepted, the force is that, should the news of such a God get abroad, it would convince kings, etc. 6 High; cf. Is. 57:15. The haughty; cf. Is. 2:10–17.

7, 8 The God who purposes

There are two sides to the Lord's love for His own: protection and victory. He preserves them against attack, but also He counter-attacks, dispersing the threat. The psalmist dares to speak of this as habitual divine action (the present tenses of v. 7) because of his assurance of the Lord's inflexible purpose, resting as it does on His unchanging love. Yet this does not breed in him a mood of complacency, for he ends with a prayer that the Lord will persevere with him until the work is fully finished.

8 Cf. the confidence of Phil. 1:6 coupled with the prayer of Phil. 1:9–11.

PSALM 139. NO ESCAPE, NO REGRETS

It is characteristic of the Bible to express its great truths in the context of personal experience. Partly, this is because God is never proposed as a subject for man's intellectual, speculative enquiry (cf. Jb. 11:7, 8), but for his devotion, worship and obedience. It is also because the Bible never considers a truth 'known' until it controls the life of the learner. Of all this view of things Ps. 139 is a classic instance. The psalm could be said to teach God's omniscience (vv. 1–6), omnipresence (vv. 7–12), sovereignty (vv. 13–16), and holiness (vv. 17–24), yet in the truest sense nothing could less exactly express the psalmist's mind than these four great abstractions. To the psalmist, omniscience is 'God's complete knowledge of me', omnipresence is that 'God is with me no matter where I am', and so forth. The 'I–Thou' relationship is basic to the poem.

How is this relationship understood? We must reject out of hand any suggestion that the psalmist is a would-be fugitive from God, motivated by an awareness of the danger of his plight as a sinner (cf. F. Delitzsch, Commentary on the Psalms, 1881; E. J. Young, Psalm 139, 1965, both v. 7). Far from being anxious to go where God is not, the psalmist delights in God (v. 17), happily recognizes the permanence of divine companionship (v. 18) and even invites God's scrutiny (vv. 23, 24). This is the psalm, then, not of a man who would escape God if only he could, but of one who knows that he cannot do so and finds no regret, but only joy, in the fact.

Security in God is the central truth of the psalm. God's complete knowledge of him (vv. 1–6) focuses upon God's encirclement and tender care (v. 5); God's omnipresence (vv. 7–12) means that His hand ever guides and holds (v. 10); and God's creative power (vv. 13–16) includes the pre-planning of all his days (v. 16). At all times, in all places and in every circumstance, God is in control and the psalmist is in safety.

We may well ask what prompted him thus to meditate on his happy security. The psalm is a unity. This is evident not simply from the progression of its main sections one from the other (notice the explanatory for which opens the new section at v. 13), but also in the matching ideas of the opening and closing verses. The key to the occasion of the psalm (as Eaton clearly notes) is the prayer against enemies (vv. 19, 20). The psalm leads up to this and flows away from it. Under pressure from godless foes, the psalmist meditates upon his joyous security in God (vv. 1–18), prays for their destruction (vv. 19, 20), and finally asserts his own moral disengagement from them and their ways, urging God to search his heart to find that this is so (vv. 21–24).

Two comments may be offered on this. The first is that Ps. 139, besides being one of the greatest of all the Psalms, is also the greatest of the imprecatory psalms. We do not know its date of origin, except to say that the evidence of Aramaisms in the language 'is not firm proof of a post-exilic date' (Eaton), but the situation is clear enough: the onslaught of foes is met by prayer for their destruction. It is interesting to note that some commentators who are forward to charge other imprecatory psalms with low and unschooled moral values hasten to say that here 'the wrathful words . . . need not cause surprise. . . . The psalmist cannot do other than hate them' (W. O. E. Oesterley, The Psalms, 1939, p. 557), for the sheer loftiness of the whole psalm peremptorily forbids any other view! As we noted, this feature, in one degree or another, marks all the imprecatory psalms: alongside their imprecations there is some indication of an exalted sense of God, a high value of true religion, a covetable spirituality, and it is this rich theology which prompts and renders inevitable a clear-cut theodicy. In the matter of the judgment due to the wicked the psalmist can no more stand aloof than he can view the divine omnipresence as a mere philosophic abstract unconnected with daily life.

Secondly, to us who also face, in varying measure, daily spiritual harassment from ungodly foes, circumstantial, human or superhuman, this psalmist speaks directly. His message bridges the years to tell us that our resource is restful confidence in God, prayer, and energetic moral commitment.

1–18 Security

1–6 The all-knowing God. God knows him in his own person (v. 1), in his outward actions (v. 2a) and inward thoughts (v. 2b). He knows him at all times, whether as he walks the daily path or rests, lying down, at night (v. 3a). He knows him in his habitual ways and his words (vv. 3b, 4). This intimate, detailed knowledge is seen as part of God's protective, tender care (v. 5), which runs beyond the psalmist's capacity to understand, yet reassures him that he is cared for by a wisdom that is far in excess of his own (v. 6).

2 Thou is emphatic. The psalmist knows that he is searched and known in every aspect of his being (v. 1), but the Knower is the personal Lord Himself. This is the 'I–Thou', or better, the 'Thou–I', relationship on which this psalm rests. Thoughts, rather in the sense of 'intentions'. Hence, from afar means 'long before'. The Lord has 'seen to the heart' of the psalmist's plans even before he himself entertained them. 3 Acquainted: 'to be carefully, painstakingly familiar with'. But it may be another verb meaning 'to winnow', 'to sift through and through'. 5 Such knowledge as God possesses of us could be a terrifying thing, but it is here allied to a protective purpose. Beset: the verb is often used in the sense 'to besiege', but here, as Oesterley says, it means 'like a rampart round a city "thou dost encircle me".' The strength of this protection is matched by the tenderness of layest thy hand upon me; cf. Gn. 46:4; 48:14; Jb. 9:33.

7–12 The ever-present God. Another truth about God is that, by His Spirit, He is everywhere present (v. 7), and the absolute reality of this is clarified in a series of contrasts (vv. 8, 9): the world to come (Sheol, v. 8), the present world (v. 9); the contrasting dimensions of height (heaven, v. 8), depth (Sheol, v. 8), and distance (the uttermost parts, v. 9). But this omnipresence is the essence of blessedness, for it means that God is present to lead and hold (v. 10). Furthermore, this divine presence remains the same in all the varied circumstances of life, its darkness and light (vv. 11, 12).

7 Thy Spirit. See the General Article, 'Old Testament Theology', pp. 28f. This verse shows that the OT enjoys the same truth about the Holy Spirit as Jesus expressed in Jn. 14:16–18, the Spirit as the mode of realization of the personal presence of God, involving as it does the divinity and personality of the Spirit Himself. Presence: lit. 'face', thus emphasizing that God's personal presence is specifically stressed. 8 Sheol: the abode of the dead, the 'paradise' of Lk. 23:43, though in Ps. 6:5 (q.v.; cf. Introduction to Psalms) it foreshadows the other element in the NT delineation of the world to come (cf. Mt. 25:41, 46a). 9 Wings. A picture of the swift spreading of morning light over the earth, indicating that not even flight with the speed of light can separate us from God. 10 This key verse tells us how to understand v. 7, i.e. not 'that he wishes to escape from God but that escape would be impossible if he wished it'

(Kirkpatrick). 11 Let only . . .: RSV unfortunately here suggests that the psalmist desired to be hidden from God. This, of course, would contradict the evidence of v. 10. See RV, 'Surely darkness . . .', i.e. expressive of a momentary fear of losing the comfort of God's presence. Cover involves a small emendation of the Hebrew, which literally reads 'bruise' (the verb as in Gn. 3:15, hence RV 'overwhelm'). We may have here a play on the idea of darkness, as both a physical circumstance and also a metaphor for the difficulties of life (cf. on 23:4). 12 Darkness is as light with thee: lit. 'darkness and light are identical', i.e. as equally unable to divorce him from the divine presence.

13–16 The all-sovereign God. God is the Creator, superintending both the psychological (inward parts, v. 13a) and physical (knit me, v. 13b) structure. In this as in all His works He displays wonderful, i.e. supernatural, powers, but the implication of this creative work is His intimate knowledge of His creature (vv. 14, 15). The Creator's work, however, covered not only the person concerned (v. 16a), but also the experiences yet in store for that person (v. 16b). Here again is the comfort implicit in the truth: the Creator plans all life; all our experiences are under sovereign control.

13 Inward parts (lit. 'kidneys'): used of the seat of emotion and affection, e.g. Ps. 73:21; Je. 12:2 (both 'heart' in RSV), and here of the psychological aspect of man. Knit, or 'cover', the former representing God's direct activity in the growth of the foetus, the latter His protection of it as it grew; both implying His concern for the physical frame of man. 15 The depths of the earth may express no more than that the earth is far below the height of heaven where God is ('the depths, namely, the earth') and yet He knows all about our birth. Or it may be, as Delitzsch urges, that as Adam was formed from the earth, so 'the mother's womb out of which the child of Adam comes forth is the earth out of which it is taken'. 16 The days that were formed for me. The Creator does not push out the boat of the individual's life to take its chance on the stream of time. The days were 'formed' (the potter's verb, as in Gn. 2:7) by Him also. Even to this degree does He care for us.

17, 18 Conclusion: the preciousness of security in God. The knowledge of God is precious and inexhaustible, and the presence of God a changeless reality.

17 Thy thoughts, i.e. '(these) thoughts of Thee'. 17, 18 Sum . . . count: both their collective magnitude and their individual multiplicity. 18 Awake refers both to the experience of awaking day after day (i.e. the faithful abiding presence of God all through life) and to the great awakening after death (cf. Ps. 17:15). I am still with thee differs from 'Thou art still with me' in that the latter would express the idea of the presence of God, while the former expresses also the idea of that peace with God whereby we may remain constantly in His presence.

19–24 Commitment

The circumstance revealed in the prayer (vv. 19, 20) was evidently the occasion which moved the psalmist to lay fresh hold on the truth of his security in God. Godless men were upon him, and he would rather that they depart (v. 19), yet what moves him is not consideration of his own comfort but detestation of the moral and spiritual values which these men embody (v. 20). The abhorrence voiced in his prayer arises from his unreserved commitment to God whereby he must needs act towards them as they towards God (v. 21), and in his attitude towards them there is nothing but hatred and antipathy (v. 22); no trace or remainder of secret or sneaking admiration for what they are or of envy for the life they live. Yet can anyone have complete self-knowledge? Only God knows all that there is to be known (cf. v. 1), therefore let God be the judge of his heart; let God search and expose any remaining wickedness and lead him in the way to eternal life (vv. 23, 24).

19 Slay the wicked. Weiser holds that, however justified is the psalmist's outcry against the wicked, he does not here follow the divine course 'which in the end leads to the . . . compassion that Jesus showed on the cross'. But this is to ignore the Jesus of Mt. 25:41, 46a, the Lamb of Rev. 6:15–17, and indeed the whole biblical dimension of the wrath of God. The imprecation here reveals a man who could selflessly and sinlessly rise to the height of the divine hatred of sin. Men of blood: guilty of crimes of violence against others. 24 Everlasting: contrasting with the impermanence of the wicked (cf. Ps. 1:4–6) and partaking of the nature of God (cf. Gn. 21:33).

PSALM 140. SLANDER

Pss. 140–143 can be considered as a linked group: they are alike in portraying the reactions of the godly to trouble, each psalm showing a different facet of it (as indicated in the titles in the commentary). Similarities of wording and thought connect them: cf. 140:2–4a with 141:2–4a; 140:5 with 141:9, 10a and 142:3b; 140:6 with 142:5 and 143:10; 140:9 with 141:10; 140:13a with 142:7b; 140:13b with 143:10b; 142:3 with 143:4; etc. Most noticeably, they are all prayers, revealing that the first reaction to trouble is to take it to the Lord. As to the occasion from which this group sprang, there is no good reason for questioning the assertion made in the psalm-title to Ps. 142.

1–5 A prayer for protection

In structure this psalm consists of two prayers (vv. 1–5, 8–11), each followed by an affirmation (vv. 6, 7, and 12, 13). The first prayer consists of two general pleas for protection (Deliver . . . preserve, v. 1; Guard . . . preserve, v. 4) followed by statements of the danger which threatens. The description is full, indicating the place which may be given in prayer to sharing all the details of life with God. Thus he exposes the character (vv. 1, 2, 4a), speech (v. 3) and treacherous hostility (vv. 4b, 5) of his opponents, thought, word and deed proceeding in that order. But the particular stress of the psalm is on vicious slander (vv. 3, 9, 11), and on the sly, insidious ways of his foes (4, 5). In these circumstances there is no resource but God.

6, 7 God's care

The psalmist is still at prayer (v. 6b), but the force of the prayer is now to strengthen his own hand by some re-assurance of God's care for him. There are three strands of confidence: his personal relationship with God (v. 6a), his awareness of God's majestic power to save (v. 7a), and his past experiences of divine deliverance (v. 7b).

7 My Lord. The printing indicates that this represents the Hebrew 'ᵃḏōnāy, meaning 'sovereign Lord'. My strong deliverer: lit. 'strength of my salvation', 'my saving strength'; i.e. the one whose power to save is available for and directed towards me.

8–11 A prayer for victory

Two views of sin alternate here: first, that it is the object of divine opposition (vv. 8, 10); secondly, that it has a boomerang quality which makes it the cause of its own destruction (vv. 9, 11).

8 In the mystery of divine providence, God sometimes makes use of the wicked as the instruments of His holy punishment of the disobedient (cf. Is. 10:5–15 and the General Article, 'Old Testament Theology', pp. 27f.). The psalmist prays that this may not be the case in his present plight. 10 Pits are specifically 'flooded areas': thus the verse contains the characteristic divine judgments of fire and flood, indicating a return to the thought of God's opposition to and inevitable judgment upon sin. 11 Hunt: his enemies had acted as though he was their prey and they the hunters (cf. vv. 4, 5), but their wickedness will yet recoil on them.

12, 13 God's righteousness

The thought of v. 11a is developed. It is contrary to God's righteous ways to allow the wicked to be established, and it is in accordance with His righteousness to uphold the cause of the godly. The present tenses of v. 12 express the general principles of divine providence; the future tenses of v. 13 express the faith of the people of God.

12 Needy. The basis of the word is 'to be willing'; hence it came to mean 'pliable', in the bad sense of 'able to be manipulated' or 'pushed round', and 'pliant' in the good sense of 'ready for all Thy perfect will'. Hence 'needy' is often, as here, a word expressive of the socially oppressed but religiously committed man. 13 In thy presence: lit. 'with thy face'. The hope of the godly is nothing less than their residence in the very presence of God.

PSALM 141. PROVOCATION

In the stress of trouble, the psalmist senses the danger of being provoked into ill-considered speech (v. 3), into making common cause with the ways and persons of the wicked (v. 4), of refusing the counsels of the righteous (v. 5a, RV), or into a wrong comment upon the overthrow of the wicked when it comes (vv. 5b, 6). The time of trouble can so easily detach us from God and from godliness, and it is against these things respectively (vv. 1, 2 with 8; and vv. 3–7) that he prays.

1–4 Action

The element of urgency in his prayer is noticeable: 1a he looks for haste on God's part, 1b for an answer contemporary with his request (when has the force of 'while'); 2 he desires God to find in his prayers all the divinely-willed power and acceptability of the appointed offerings. To what end is a prayer of such urgency made? Not for deliverance from trouble but deliverance from sin! His foes were men of unguarded and vicious speech (Ps. 140:3, 11), 3 but he would have God guard all that he says. Behind their wicked speech lay their evil heart (Ps. 140:2), 4a but he would have a heart free of inclination to evil. He was aware of their diligent pursuit of devious ways (Ps. 140:4, 5), 4b but such a course is not for him, 4c nor even to be found in the company of such people, however attractive it may appear. The need for godly separation from the words, thoughts, ways and fellowship of the ungodly could not be more fervently stressed. Incline not: just as God, for His own holy purposes, may give the wicked liberty to advance their schemes (Ps. 140:8), so also He may punish the godly by allowing the natural evil of their heart to have its way (cf. Ps. 78:29–31). The psalmist recognizes that, should his heart cease to be controlled by God for righteousness, then evil and wicked deeds inevitably follow. Dainties: the attractions with which sin adorns itself and with which the ungodly deck their schemes.

5–7 Reaction

The Hebrew (see RSV mg.) of v. 5 is rather better treated in RV. The danger in question appears to be that in a time of stress the advice of the righteous will be arrogantly rejected—specially if the righteous comes with a word of rebuke. He prays that he may take it as a kindness and even as a blessing or anointing which his head gladly receives. In contrast with this reaction of welcome, there is the abiding reaction of enmity which he desires to show against all wickedness (v. 5b). But he also envisages the day when the wicked will be publicly overthrown, and vows that in that day people will hear from him nothing but gracious and kindly words.

5 The Hebrew is abrupt rather than problematical: 'Let the righteous strike me—a kindness! Let (such a one) reprove me—oil for the head—let not my head refuse it!' 6 True: lit. 'they shall hear my words, that they are sweet'; i.e. hear nothing but pleasant words from me. No words of vindictive triumph, self-gratification, etc., but only what is designed to heal and soothe.

8–10 Refuge

But the wicked have not yet been overthrown, however certain their eventual and utter downfall may be (cf. v. 7), and prayer for protection must continue. 8 is the contrast to v. 4: having refused to extricate himself from trouble by the methods and aid of the wicked, he declares that God alone is his refuge: 8a the sole source from which he expects help and 8b the sole place in which he seeks shelter. This truth is turned to a prayer for 8c defence, 9 guidance and 10 retribution.

PSALM 142. LONELINESS

Ps. 141 envisaged the possibility that the righteous might so fail to understand his position that they would come to him with rebukes. The blow has now fallen in a more severe form: he is utterly man-forsaken (v. 4), and faces the problem of isolation. Man-forsaken, but not God-forsaken! The hour of trial is faith's opportunity to lay hold on the faithful God.

1–3 Divine providence

The additional bitterness of his situation appears at once 2 in the words complaint and trouble, and 3 in the admission of a faint spirit. The problem is the same (v. 3b), the subtle hostility of his foes, but before he can state it, a gleam of light appears: Thou knowest my way (v. 3a). Cf. 'The Lord knows' (Ps. 1:6). This certainly involves the idea of intimate, personal knowledge; it reaches out to include superintendency and possibly even means divine appointment. The snared pathway was as much in His loving, knowledgeable care of His child as the deep darkness of Ps. 23:3b, 4. Cf. Dt. 8:14–16.

4, 5 Divine refuge

In contrast to the divine care stands human carelessness. Yet the Lord remains as both his protection (refuge) and satisfaction (portion). 4 Refuge: rather the more negative idea of 'escape'. Among men he can find no way out of his plight. 5 Refuge: the positive idea of a place of strength and safety; a different word and idea. Portion; cf. Nu. 18:20; Jos. 13:33; 18:7; Pss. 16:5; 73:23ff.

6, 7 Divine sufficiency

The two leading thoughts of the psalm are now united: on the one hand the low and dispirited state to which lack of human sympathy, coupled as it was with active hostility from his opponents, has reduced him (vv. 5, 6) and the contrasting thought of divine oversight and faithfulness (vv. 3, 5, 7). His final cry to God is full of assurance. Human strength may be both at an end and overpowered, but God can work deliverance (v. 6), restore freedom of movement (v. 7a) and thankful gladness (v. 7b), and bring back into being the lost fellowship of the righteous (v. 7c).

7 Prison: not in the sense of 'gaol', but in the sense of being restricted in movement. Me is emphatic, as if to say 'me, of all people—the one they now reject'. Bountifully: rather 'completely', meeting every need.

PSALM 143. THE IMMINENT END

This brief series of 'psalms in a time of trouble' now comes to its climax (see introduction to Ps. 140). The psalmist feels that he has reached the limit of endurance: the enemy has metaphorically 'entombed' him (v. 3b)—how suitable to David's experience in 'the cave' (psalm-title, Ps. 142; cf. 1 Sa. 23:19ff.)—but now the reality of death seems to draw near (v. 7b); spirit and heart can stand no more buffeting (vv. 4, 7a); God's mercies seem to belong entirely to the past (v. 5), and there is no refreshing sign of His favour in the present (v. 6); there is even the possibility that He too has adopted an attitude of judgment (v. 2). Yet whatever else fails, the spirit of prayer blossoms. The deeper the trouble the more deeply is refuge sought in God. At the same time the wear and tear of prolonged stress is evident in the very form of the psalm. Certainly it is a unity, and in one sense any analysis mars its sustained appeal, but it also has a staccato quality, seen in the eleven petitions in vv. 7–12, in which we enter into the helpless urgency of the flight of this battered soul to his God.

1, 2 Divine forbearance

Each section of this sustained prayer rests on a different ground of appeal. The first of these is the nature of God: the forbearance which looks favourably on the psalmist (v. 1) and which forgoes the divine right of strict judgment (v. 2).

1 Supplications: specifically a plea for divine grace. Thus the psalm opens on the note of absence of merit on the part of the intercessor, coupled with the existence of grace for the undeserving in the nature of God. Faithfulness . . . righteousness: God's undeviating pursuit of His own declared policies. In this verse, following the line laid down by supplications, the reference is to His purposes of grace and salvation for His people. 2 The possibility raised in Pss. 140:8; 141:4 (q.v.), that God might be using the psalmist's enemies to bring a merited punishment upon him, is here faced in its basic form. God has every right to assume the mantle of judge, and the psalmist does not deny that he too deserves divine judgment. But if God so acts, then all hope is at an end.

3, 4 Personal exhaustion

The privilege of the people of God is that they may not only plead divine saving grace (v. 1) against the divine right to judge (v. 2) but that, such is the tender relation into which God has brought them with Himself, they can frankly plead on the ground of personal need. The picture here is of chase (v. 3a), capture as the hunter leaps upon the prey (v. 3b), imprisonment (v. 3c), with ensuing hopelessness (v. 4).

5, 6 Spiritual longing

Nevertheless, the truth abides that God 'satisfies him who is thirsty' (Ps. 107:9), and it is this sense of longing for God which now pervades and gives basis to the prayer. It finds expression in remembrance (v. 5) and mute appeal (v. 6). The fact ought to be noticed, for it is characteristic of the psalmists, that in every plight their chief desire was for God rather than for mere release from trouble; cf. Pss. 43:3, 4; 63:1–4.

5 I remember; cf. Pss. 42:4; 63:5–8; 77:5ff. The call to remembrance is impressive in the OT, and is chiefly related to the encouragement drawn from recalling God's deeds of old (e.g. Dt. 1:29–33; 7:18; Ne. 4:14) and the consequent motive to obedience (e.g. Dt. 5:15; 8:2, 18).

7, 8 Impending finality

Urgency governs the appeal: Haste . . . fails . . . the Pit . . . morning. The end of personal strength (v. 7a) yields to the darkness of imminent death (v. 7b). He longs for news of God (v. 8a) and a word from God (v. 8b).

7 Hide not . . . Pit. The reference here to death (the Pit) is linked with the sense of the loss of divine favour (the hidden face). Once more (cf. on 6:4, 5; 30:9; 88:10, 11; and see Introduction to Psalms) it is not death as such which appears hopeless, but to die without any light of divine favour. 8 Morning: the soon-coming time of light, following the darkness of night (cf. Ps. 30:5), therefore metaphorical for hope. Teach me. Just as in vv. 5, 6 the longing was for God Himself rather than for the bare end of the trouble, so here the end of the apparent divine aloofness is desired, not because it will automatically dispel the present difficulties, but more because it will make possible a dedicated life of obedience.

9, 10 Personal dedication

The personal and dedicated seeking after God which v. 8 introduced is now elaborated. Deliverance (v. 9a) will give him the opportunity, teaching (v. 10a) will give the knowledge and ability, and guidance by the Spirit (v. 10b) the actual experience of serving God according to His will. The appeal therefore is for the chance to live for God (as contrasted with the possibility of dying in His displeasure, vv. 7, 8), and the basis of the appeal is an exclusive seeking after and devotion to God (vv. 9b, 10a).

10 Spirit. See the General Article, 'Old Testament Theology', pp. 28f.

11, 12 Divine righteousness

The psalmist returns to the opening thought of the nature of God. On the ground of His revealed character (name, v. 11a), His undeviating pursuit of His holy purposes, especially of salvation towards His people (righteousness, v. 11b; cf. Is. 45:21–23), and His changeless love to those within His covenant (steadfast love, v. 12), the plea is made for preservation (v. 11a; contrast v. 7), the end of trouble (v. 11b) and the complete dispersal of all threat (v. 12). The right of the psalmist so to plead the favour of God comes at the end: the personal helplessness of a servant (or 'slave', v. 12b) is linked with the almighty power of the One who is his Lord, and the relationship itself gives him the right to plead for what that Lord alone can do.

11, 12 These verses further illuminate the question of imprecations. We would certainly be happy to pray v. 11, but might shy away from v. 12. This is a failure of realism on our part. There are circumstances (such as David's in respect of the incurable nature of Saul's enmity) where there can be no deliverance without destruction, and to pray for the one is to pray for the other.

PSALM 144. FULL SALVATION

Praise prevails from this psalm onwards to the end of the Psalter. But the present psalm also undoubtedly looks back to the sombre tones of Pss. 140–143, telling us that in God's good time the long desired 'morning' (143:8) dawned, bringing with it a glorying in God which almost defied the resources of language to express (vv. 1, 2), a humbling sense of His condescension (vv. 3, 4), a triumphant re-assurance of His sufficiency for present needs (vv. 5–11) and the prospect of greater blessings yet to come (vv. 12–15). The clear links with Ps. 18 (v. 1b with 18:34; v. 2 with 18:2; v. 2c (RV) with 18:47; v. 5 with 18:9; v. 6 with 18:14; etc.) make the psalm (see psalm-title to Ps. 18) eminently suited to the stated occasion of Pss. 140–143 (see psalm-title to Ps. 142). The possible linking of the psalm with the ritual triumph of the Davidic king over his foes in the autumn festival (see Introduction) does not, of course, in any way rule out a basic historical occasion for the composition and therefore the main associations of the psalm.

1–4 Past salvation

The greatness of God (vv. 1, 2) is contrasted with the insignificance (v. 3) and insubstantiality (v. 4) of man. David, secure at last on his throne, ascribes all the glory to God and views with nothing but wonder the fact that he has himself been the recipient of such favours.

1 Rock combines the ideas of strength and changelessness (e.g. Dt. 32:4; 2 Sa. 22:47–49) with those of refuge (Ps. 31:2, 3) and sustenance (Ex. 17:6; Ps. 95:1, 8). Trains. Salvation is all of God; of this the psalm is sure. Yet the enthroned David knows that the God who gave him victory called him to fight. (Cf. Eph. 2:4–7; 6:10–17.) 2

Rock. Note RSV mg., and cf. RV. The retention of the Hebrew 'my steadfast love' (i.e. 'the One who bestows steadfast love on me') aptly sounds the note of the basis of salvation in the love and mercy of God (cf. Eph. 2:4). The peoples under him. This reading stresses that the whole agency of salvation is God's; the text, as reflected in RV, includes also the idea of David's personal enjoyment of what God alone had done for him. 3, 4 The positive truth of God as the sole Saviour is safeguarded by the negative truth that man can never either deserve or accomplish his own salvation.

5–11 Present sufficiency

David, though enthroned by the wonder of God's acts for him, was yet in need of divine help. What God did in the great deliverance (cf. Ps. 18:9) He must continue to do (v. 5), for dangers past (cf. Ps. 18:16) are dangers present (v. 7). Yet, having experienced that great past deliverance, his life, though still beset by foes, can never be the same again: it has a new song (v. 9).

5 Bow; cf. Na. 1:3b. God's descent to fight with the foes of His people is pictured as the lowering of storm clouds over the earth. Touch. The power of the Creator over the created world (cf. Ex. 19:18) is illustrative of His power to save His people (cf. Is. 50:2, 3). 7 Stretch forth thy hand; i.e. the personal activity of God to save (cf. Dt. 5:15; Mt. 14:31). Many waters: figurative of overwhelming threats (cf. Ps. 124:4, 5). Aliens: possibly foreign foes, such as in the main were David's concern after his accession, but more likely in a general sense (cf. Ps. 142:4 where another form of the same word is translated 'takes notice') of those who hold themselves estranged and aloof in their hostility. 8 Right hand: as used in oath-taking (cf. Ps. 106:26). They swore fidelity but practised treachery.

12–15 Future expectation

The psalmist looks forward in prayer to the glories awaiting God's people. The key-note is one of certainty. He asks for blessings in family (v. 12), business (vv. 13, 14a) and nation (vv. 14b, c), but he sees these as already secured by the possession of the Lord as God (v. 15).

12 Youth points here to young manhood, and the prayer is that, like the full grown plants, they may be soundly rooted, and grow without deformity or stunting. Corner pillars; i.e. both occupying a secure position in the building and at the same time giving stability to the building in which they themselves are secure—the position of the wife and mother in a well-ordered society. Cut: or, possibly, 'adorned'. 13 Cf. Dt. 28:2–11. 14 Mischance or failure in bearing. The reference may be indeed, as RSV, to some disease causing miscarriage among the herds, but we could equally understand the psalmist to turn here to another aspect of the prosperous life: national security. Hence, 'No breach and no offensive and no mourning', the references being respectively to involvement in a defensive and an offensive war, coupled with the mourning for the dead which accompanies each.

PSALM 145. KNOWING AND PROCLAIMING GOD

The verses of this psalm begin with the successive letters of the Hebrew alphabet. One letter (nûn), missing in the Hebrew text, is found (rightly or wrongly, but at any rate quite suitably) in LXX, and appears in RSV as v. 13b (The Lord is faithful . . . all his deeds). The reference to the Lord as King (vv. 1, 12, 13), coupled with the mention of abundant harvest (vv. 15, 16), has led Weiser to associate the psalm with the Feast of Tabernacles (cf. Zc. 14:16f.), but there is surely no season of rejoicing on which this glorious hymn of praise could not suitably be sung. We enter here into the joyousness of OT religion.

Within an initial (vv. 1, 2) and concluding (v. 21) affirmation of intention to proclaim the Lord, the body of the psalm is a somewhat fugal meditation on three stated aspects of the divine nature: His greatness (v. 3), His graciousness and mercy (v. 8), and His justice or righteousness (v. 17). In the Hebrew these are announced in matching phrases: 'Great is the Lord. . . . Gracious and merciful is the Lord. . . . Just (Righteous) is the Lord', thus providing a broad framework of analysis. But within each subsection the attributes of God are intertwined, for God is One and there is no conflict in the divine nature: thus His greatness includes His goodness and righteousness (v. 7), His graciousness includes His greatness (vv. 11–13), and His righteousness includes His graciousness (v. 17).

1, 2 Introduction: I will bless thy name

The psalmist ascribes the highest place to the God whom he knows for himself as King, but when he contemplates the revealed nature (name) of this God he turns rather to adoring and grateful worship (bless, v. 1). Eternity will exhaust neither the subject nor the desire for blessing such a God, and in practice this means that every day adoring worship will issue in glad shouts of praise (v. 2).

1 Extol: lit. 'to ascribe height (to)', as when we sing 'the highest place that heaven affords is His, is His by right'. 2 Praise: the verb as in the glad shout, Hallelujah, hence vocal and exuberant praise.

3–7 The Lord is great

All who know God are bound to tell of Him. Though His greatness is unfathomable, yet it is made known (and is therefore the subject of testimony) in His works (vv. 4, 5) and acts (vv. 4, 6) by means of which the Lord has established a (true) report (fame, v. 7) of His goodness and righteousness.

4–7 Note the intertwining of general and individual responsibility for testimony: One generation (4) . . . I (5) . . . Men (6; lit. 'they', matching they in v. 7) . . . I (6) . . . They (7). 4–6 God's deeds are successively mighty (4), wondrous (5) and terrible (6): the first word stresses their power, the second their supernatural quality, marking them as arising from God and being beyond the scope of man, and the third their ability to inspire awe. 7 Fame: the same noun translated 'thus I am to be remembered' in Ex. 3:15; i.e. by His deeds God has given a definitive account of Himself.

8–16 The Lord is gracious

The specific divine graciousness to the covenant people (v. 8; cf. Ex. 34:6, 7) is accompanied by a universal goodness of God (v. 9), and just as on a universal scale thanks return to Him (v. 10a), so in particular His own people (saints, v. 10b) bless Him; and to them belongs the task of testimony (v. 11) to the Lord's kingly power and sway (vv. 12, 13), His faithful promises (v. 13b), and gracious acts of support and supply (vv. 13c–16).

9 Compassion: the tender love of a mother; cf. on 103:13. 10 Saints. This title (Heb. ḥasîḏ) is related to 'steadfast love' (Heb. ḥeseḏ), and therefore denotes primarily those who have been the object of the covenant love of the Lord; it then advances to include also the thought of their responsive love towards Him (cf. 1 Jn. 4:19) and towards each other within the covenant-family (cf. 1 Jn. 4:11).

17–20 The Lord is just

To say that the Lord is just (or righteous) by no means conflicts with saying that He is gracious; rather His justice lives side by side with His kindness (Heb. ḥasîḏ, used here as an attributive, 'possessing and displaying steadfast love'). His righteousness is, in these verses, His discernment of the heart of those who draw near to Him: He knows if they call in truth (v. 18), if they fear (v. 19) and love (v. 20) Him, or if they belong to the wicked, the objects of His wrath (v. 20). Yet, though He cannot be deceived, His righteousness is truly the righteousness of grace: the grace which draws near (v. 18), responds, hears, saves (v. 19) and keeps (v. 20).

21 Conclusion: Let all flesh bless His name

Individual resolve to testify is the fitting response to knowing such a God, but the end of the matter, and by implication through the agency of this testimony, is that all flesh will come to know by name and therefore to adore Him.

PSALM 146. INDIVIDUAL PRAISE

The Psalter concludes with five psalms devoted to praise. They contain no word of petition or suggestion of personal need; there is a minimum of historical allusion. All focuses upon God who alone is worthy to be praised. Each psalm in the group brings to light some particular aspect of the praise which ascends to God, and Ps. 146 strikes the characteristic note of individualism. If 'I' do not praise, then the praise of God is incomplete (cf. on 103:19–22).

That which calls forth such fervent individual praise (vv. 1, 2) is the blessedness of trusting in the Lord. In order to clarify this truth, the psalmist first explores what is required in one who is to be trusted (vv. 3, 4). These verses are not to be understood as a cynical command never to trust anyone. The psalm moves at the more fundamental level of the nature of the ultimate object of trust: what, in the long run, is individual life to be founded upon? Man, even princely man (v. 3a), cannot qualify for this position, first because of lack of ability (v. 3b), secondly because of impermanence (v. 4a) and, in consequence, thirdly, because of unreliability (v. 4b). In contrast the Lord has the absolute power of the Creator (vv. 5, 6a); allied to this is His permanent reliability (v. 6b); but, more than all else, that in Him power is wedded to pity (vv. 7–9). His power characteristically operates in the three realms of the social (v. 7), the personal (v. 8a, b) and the moral (vv. 8c, 9). The concluding verse (10) acts as a summary and climax: the Lord, the God of grace described in vv. 7–9, will reign, i.e. will exercise His sovereign power, for ever, permanently.

3 In princes, in a son of man. A prince, for all his appearance of stability and power (and therefore his seeming worthwhileness as an object of trust) is a mere man. Son of is a Hebrew idiom meaning 'in the condition of'. 5 The God of Jacob; cf. v. 10, thy God, O Zion. The distinctive and trustworthy character described in vv. 7–9 belongs to this God exclusively and to no other: the God who is known to Israel and in Zion. This is the exclusivism of the OT. The abstract concept of 'deity' is not enough for a man to trust; nor is any other claimant to the title 'god'. Only one God is worthy of trust and He is to be found only in Jacob and Zion. 9 Sojourners were resident aliens, often political refugees and frequently completely dependent on charity and kindness. They are linked therefore with the widow and the fatherless as the helpless and potentially neglected and maltreated section of the community. But the Lord equally characteristically chooses them as special objects of His powerful compassion (cf. Dt. 10: 18; Ps. 68:5, 6).

PSALM 147. COMMUNAL PRAISE

Developing the theme of the praise that is due to the Lord, this psalm moves from the individual praise of Ps. 146 to the communal praise of God's people, as indicated by the emphasis resting on the chosen city (vv. 2a, 12) and the chosen people (vv. 2b, 19). The exclusivism of the Lord in heaven (Ps. 146) is here matched by the exclusivism of Israel as His only chosen people on earth

(vv. 19, 20). Therefore they are under a special obligation to engage in His praise.

The psalm is in three sections, indicated by the call to praise (vv. 1, 7, 12). Within each section there is a reminder of the tender mercy of the Lord (vv. 2, 3; 9; 13, 14), His authoritative power as Creator (vv. 4, 5; 8; 15–18), and His primary concern with matters of righteousness (vv. 6; 10, 11; 19, 20). The call to praise, therefore, rests on the consideration of His mercy, power and holiness, with special emphasis on the exclusive position of Israel in relation to these divine attributes.

1–6 The Lord's tenderness

Calling attention to the winsome loveliness (the word translated gracious, v. 1) of the Lord, the psalm expounds this aspect of God by recalling His concern for the welfare of Jerusalem, for the individual scattered members of His people, and specially for those needing gentle care (vv. 2, 3). This is seen to be an aspect of all the Lord's activities: He is not the God of Israel alone, but the universal Creator whose power is manifested in His detailed care of the stars (v. 4), whereby He shows both might and wisdom (v. 5). On earth, however, moral factors enter the picture, and the Lord is unequivocally for the downtrodden and against the wicked (v. 6).

2 Builds up, in the general sense of making secure or advancing the welfare of. The word does not tie the psalm to any specific occasion (e.g. Ne. 6:15). Outcasts: a general reference to an event such as the Exodus, as well as, doubtless, to many an individual mercy experienced by members of God's people. 3 Wounds: rather 'hurts' or 'pains'; whatever they feel to pain them becomes His concern. 4 The force of the reference to the Creator's power, here and throughout the psalm, is both to keep the universal dimension of the Lord's sway before our eyes, and also to give assurance to God's people: His special regard for them is backed by the power of One who rules all (cf. Is. 40:27–31).

7–11 The Lord's delight

This subsection lacks the initial reference to Israel found in the other two (see vv. 2, 3; 13, 14). This is because it is transitional. It designs to show wherein is the Lord's great delight, leading into the final subsection which praises Him for putting Israel in the position, alone among the nations, to give this delight to Him. In the natural world, the Creator shows His concern for His creatures: great natural resources (v. 8a, b) and the immense power of growth (v. 8c) are laid under contribution in order to feed the animal world (v. 9). Yet concerned as He thus is for the physical well-being of His creatures, His greater concern and supreme delight is in those who reverence Him and who rely on the steadfastness of His love (vv. 10, 11).

11 Steadfast love is specifically the divine love within the covenant and for the covenant people. The reference therefore prepares the way for the next section. It raises the question: But who can wait expectantly for His love except those to whom that love has been revealed?

12–20 The Lord's favour

Truly the Lord has blessed Zion with material blessings: security (v. 13a), numbers (v. 13b), well-being (peace, v. 14a), provision (v. 14b). But this cannot be all, for physical well-being is not the Lord's chief concern (cf. vv. 10, 11). His work as Creator shows Him as ruling the world by His word (v. 15), by which agency He apportions both the hardships (vv. 16, 17) and the alleviations (v. 18) of life. His word, in this sense, is known throughout the world (cf. Ps. 19:1–6), but in its precise sense as revelation (v. 19a) and as commandments (v. 19b), that word is known only in Israel (cf. Ps. 19:7–14). This nation alone is in a position to give delight (cf. v. 11) to the Lord. They have been privileged by the divine choice of them (v. 20a). How well, therefore, they ought to praise Him (v. 20b)!

19 The essential speciality of God's elect is their possession of His word. As the word of the Lord, it brings knowledge; as statutes and ordinances ('specific laws' and 'unchanging precepts') it calls for obedience. The mark, therefore, of God's people is to know and obey Him.

PSALM 148. UNIVERSAL PRAISE

Beyond the praise of the individual (Ps. 146) and of the chosen people (Ps. 147), a praise is due to the Creator from the whole creation. That is the subject of this psalm. Cf. Ps. 96:11, 12; Rev. 5:13.

1–6 Celestial praise

The heavenly beings (v. 2), the heavenly bodies (v. 3) and the very constituent parts of the heavens themselves (v. 4) are summoned to praise, on the ground that the Lord is their Creator (v. 5b), Sustainer (v. 6a) and Controller (v. 6b).

2 Host here refers to the unnumbered company of beings who are at the Lord's command (cf. Ps. 103:20, 21). 4 Highest heavens (lit. 'heavens of heavens'): the extension upon extension which modern knowledge has taught us to call space. Waters above the heavens: a poetical reference to rain-clouds; cf. the similar reference to the wind in Ps. 135:7. 5 He commanded. See the General Article, 'Old Testament Theology', pp. 26f.

7–14 Terrestrial praise

Praise must also ascend to the Lord from the earth (v. 7a), involving the depths and their creatures (v. 7b), the forces of nature (v. 8), the physical world (v. 9a) with its flora (v. 9b) and fauna (v. 10), and the total human population (vv. 11, 12). The call to praise rests on something that is true in heaven—the sole and supreme exaltation of the Lord (v. 13)—and something that is true upon earth—the establishment there of a people who are His own (v. 14a), who have been made the recipients of His love (v. 14b) and drawn close to Him (v. 14c).

7 Sea monsters; cf. Gn. 1:21. 8 Fulfilling his command. While grammatically this phrase belongs with stormy wind, it also indicates generally how the mute creatures, the forces and features of nature do in fact praise the Lord: i.e. by being what they are, His subjects occupying the place He has appointed for them and fulfilling the function allotted to them; cf. v. 6, where the praise of the heavenly bodies is their subservience to the fixed divine ordinances. 13 Name. Implicit here is the idea of special revelation whereby the meaning of the name has been imparted; cf. Ex. 3:15; 6:2ff. The question remains how the world's population at large is ever to praise the Lord in terms of a name which has not been revealed to them. The answer is indicated in the next verse. 14 He has raised (lit. 'and he has raised'); i.e. we are not dealing here with the praise due to Him from Israel, but with an additional reason why the world should praise Him, namely that He has acted to make one people His own people and has therefore established a centre where He may be known (cf. Is. 2:2, 3). Horn: symbol of strength (cf. on Zc. 1:18ff.), figurative here of God's setting of His people as a fixture on earth. Saints describes their heavenly relationship, recipients of His love (cf. on Ps. 145:10), and this is sealed by saying that they are near to him, i.e. that the divine love is not bestowed on them as a remote object but is given in the context of an intimate relationship.

PSALM 149. MISSIONARY PRAISE

Ps. 148 ended with an unexplained implication: the world is to praise God because in one of its many nations the Lord has set the knowledge of Himself. The present psalm, expressed in terms of an earthly kingdom of God, sees the chosen people in vigorous action to bring the whole world under the divine sway.

1–4 The people with a song

By means of the new song of the redeemed (cf. on Ps. 144:9), God's beloved people (v. 1, faithful, lit. 'saints'; cf. on Ps. 145:10) offer corporate praise. This praise is directed (v. 2) to their Maker and King, being expressed in bodily, vocal and instrumental fashion (v. 3). The reason is that He continually delights in them (cf. on Ps. 147:11), and though they are helpless in themselves He adorns them with victory (v. 4).

2 Maker in the double sense, first that He is Creator, and secondly that, as Redeemer, He has made this people for Himself (cf. Ps. 95:6, 7a). Sons of Zion: the privilege of membership of the city of God (cf. on Ps. 87; also Eph. 2:19). 3 Making melody: the word is elsewhere (e.g. Ps. 147:1) translated 'to sing praises'. The reference therefore is to vocal praise with instrumental accompaniment. 4 Humble; i.e. 'downtrodden' (cf. Ps. 147:6). The people of God are usually at the mercy of worldly powers, and their possibility and experience of victory (or 'salvation', RV) resides entirely in the Lord.

5–9 The people with a sword

The wording and formation of vv. 5, 6 indicate the beginning of the second section of the psalm here. The reference to the faithful ('saints') matches that in v. 1; also there is no verb in the Hebrew of v. 6, which is consequently in apposition to v. 5, indicating another dimension of the praises of the faithful: while they sing with their voices they wield a sword with their hands. In using this sword to take vengeance (v. 7) and to take captive (v. 8), they are carrying out a predetermined judgment and achieving their own glory (v. 9).

6 Two-edged swords. The metaphorical meaning of the sword which is found in the NT (e.g. Eph. 6:17; Rev. 1:16) belongs to the OT also (e.g. Ps. 45:2, 3; Is. 49:2), and the otherwise curious linking of the couch (v. 5) with the sword may mean that the psalmist is being consciously metaphorical here also. The distinctive possession of the Lord's people is His word (see on Ps. 147:19), and with this they go on His warfare to bring the nations into subjection to Him (cf. 2 Cor. 10:4–6). This form of thought came more readily to the OT even than to the NT, for the visible kingdom of God was either in reality before their eyes or vivid and dear in memory. It is no wonder, then, that it contributed a whole vocabulary to the notion of the world coming to acknowledge the God of Israel (cf. on Ps. 110; Is. 11:14–16; 45:14–25). 7 Vengeance. Bearing in mind that the 'day of vengeance' is the darker side of the 'day of salvation' (cf. Is. 61:1, 2; 63:1–6; 2 Thes. 1:6–10, noting in v. 10 the idea of God glorified in His saints), we may assume that this psalm emanated from a situation in which the writer was more aware of those features of pagan life which could only expect divine judgment. We ought not to assume that this was his total view of the relation between the people of God and the pagan world, or that he intended consciously to deny what he simply did not wish to mention, namely that along with the inevitable judgment on wickedness went the salvation of those who in all the ends of the earth turned to the God of Israel (cf. Is. 42:13–17; 45:22–25). 9 Judgment written; i.e. in God's predetermined plan of salvation for the world (cf. Is. 4:3).

PSALM 150. LET EVERYTHING THAT BREATHES PRAISE THE LORD!

In principle now, as we have followed through the sequence of psalms beginning with Ps. 146, we reach the moment Isaiah foretold when he said, 'To me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear' (45:23) and to which the NT church still looks forward, when 'every tongue (shall) confess that Jesus Christ is Lord' (Phil. 2:11). The world has, in vision, been brought into submission to the Lord (Ps. 149:5–9) and the anthem of the redeemed is about to be sung (cf. Rev. 5:8–14).

1, 2 Praise commensurate with God

On what grounds is praise here encouraged? First, God is to be praised as He is revealed in his sanctuary, the Holy of Holies of the earthly shrine: the God of unapproachable holiness who yet has appointed a sacrifice whereby sins may be forgiven and sinners accepted before Him (cf. Lv. 16:13–17; Heb. 9:11–28). Secondly, our eyes rise to his mighty firmament, lit. 'the firmament of (in which is seen) His power'. God is to be praised in the role of the Creator, the whole expanse of heaven being the chosen example of His creative power. Thirdly, there is the revelation of God in his mighty deeds, which would refer to those demonstrations of powerful acts of mercy and judgment (e.g. the Exodus) whereby God has overthrown His foes and saved His people, thus showing that the revelation of holiness and redemption depicted in the sanctuary is no theory but the reality of the divine nature. When, then, the call goes out to praise him according to (in a manner commensurate with) his exceeding greatness (lit. 'the abundance of His greatness'), it is the greatness of His holiness, His creative power and His redeeming grace which the psalmist has in mind.

1 Sanctuary. Some commentators think of the heavenly sanctuary: God's eternal, invisible dwelling. But the thought seems rather to start with the earthly shrine and to end with the contemplation of God in His greatness, as indicated above. 2 For. The preposition is the same in the Hebrew as that translated in throughout v. 1 (cf. RV), and means 'as He is revealed in'.

3–6 Praise commensurate with creation

In 'the uninhibited exuberance of lives devoted to God' (J. R. W. Stott, The Canticles and Selected Psalms, 1966, p. 158), every vehicle of praise (vv. 3–5) and every creature capable of praise (v. 6) is summoned to a shout worthy to act as a climax to the joyousness of OT religion, and to be a foretaste of that 'Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Spirit' which will fill the courts of heaven and last to all eternity.

Proverbs

INTRODUCTION

AUTHORSHIP

The general title is 'The Proverbs of Solomon the son of David'. At several points in the book, however, there are rubrics giving the authorship of different sections. Thus sections are ascribed to Solomon at 10:1 and to 'the wise' at 22:17 and 24:23. At 25:1 there is the rubric 'These also are proverbs of Solomon which the men of Hezekiah king of Judah copied'; ch. 30 is headed 'the words of Agur son of Jakeh', and ch. 31 ascribed to 'King Lemuel', or, rather, to his mother.

The Rabbis said, 'Hezekiah and his company wrote Isaiah, Proverbs, the Song of Songs and Ecclesiastes' (Baba Bathra 15a)—i.e. they edited or published them. As regards Proverbs, this tradition probably has no other basis than the rubric of 25:1.

The accuracy of the ascriptions of authorship made within the text was regarded as highly doubtful in the late 19th and early 20th centuries, but a welcome recent practice of considering the book within the framework of Ancient Near Eastern wisdom has led to the rejection of many of the arguments against Solomonic influence. This kind of study has disposed of such chronological rules-of-thumb as that which claims that short compositions are generally earlier than longer ones. Albright has shown (Wisdom in Israel and in the Ancient Near East, eds. M. Noth and D. Winton Thomas, 1955, pp. 1–13) that the closest extra-biblical linguistic and literary analogies to Proverbs are to be found in the Bronze Age. This has resulted in a tendency noted by W. Baumgartner (Old Testament and Modern Study, ed. H. H. Rowley, 1951, p. 213) 'to treat seriously the ascription of x. 1 – xxii. 16 and xxv – xxix to Solomon', and has led to more respect for the other attributions which may be considered individually.

Let us consider the several attributions.

1. Solomon

In Proverbs, wisdom is not simply intellectual but involves the whole man; and Solomon at the zenith of his fame is the embodiment of this wisdom. He loved the Lord (1 Ki. 3:3); he prayed for an understanding mind which could distinguish good and evil (1 Ki. 3:9, 12); his wisdom was God-given (1 Ki. 4:29) and accompanied by genuine humility (1 Ki. 3:7). His wisdom was put to the test in practical matters, such as just administration (1 Ki. 3:16–28) and diplomacy (1 Ki. 5:12); it was pre-eminent in the East (1 Ki. 4:30f.; 10:1–13). He composed proverbs and songs (1 Ki. 4:32) and answered hard sayings (1 Ki. 10:1). Much of his lore was drawn from nature (1 Ki. 4:33).

Many of the proverbs in 10:1 – 22:16; 25–29 contain ideas and expressions which may be found elsewhere in the OT and Near Eastern wisdom and it would be ludicrous to claim that Solomon actually conceived each thought, uninfluenced by other writers. He is rather to be seen as a wise and learned man compiling an anthology of wise sayings, his own and others, and leaving on it the imprint of his own personality. In that sense it is his composition.

2. The wise

The nations of the Ancient East had their 'wise men' whose functions extended from state policy to education. (For Egypt, cf., e.g., Gn. 41:8; for Edom, cf. Ob. 8.) In Israel, where it was known that 'the fear of the Lord is the beginning of knowledge', 'the wise' had a more important function: in Jeremiah's time they were on a par with priest and prophet as an organ of revelation (Je. 18:18). But, just as the true prophets had to contend with prophets and priests with unworthy motives, so some of 'the wise' compromised their function of declaring the 'counsel of Yahweh' (Is. 29:14; Je. 8:8, 9).

Collections of 'sayings of the wise' occur in 22:17 – 24:22 and 24:23–34. Perhaps chs. 1–9, with their exposition of the aim and content of the 'counsel of the wise' come from a like source. It is virtually impossible to date these collections. Probably they represent the distilled wisdom of many over a considerable period; but much of it is certainly of early date, and Albright's remarks about Bronze Age dating (see above) are relevant to much of them. There is nothing to indicate that the sayings were only of Israelite wise men. Possibly the attribution of the book as a whole to Solomon (1:1) indicates that he compiled these collections in the same way as those mentioned in 1. above, but drawing more heavily on other sages' wisdom.

3. Hezekiah's men

From 2 Ch. 29:25–30 we learn that Hezekiah took care to restore the Davidic order in the Temple, the Davidic instruments and the psalms of David and Asaph. Perhaps a revival of interest in the 'classic' wisdom of Solomon was another outcome of this reformation, prompted not by mere antiquarianism, but by the desire to explore the wisdom of the greatest of the wise. At any rate 'Hezekiah's men' published the Solomonic collection of Pr. 25–29.

4. Agur the son of Jakeh

We do not know who Agur was, but the ascription of 30:1 can be translated 'the words of Agur son of Jakeh, the oracle' (cf. AV, RV) or 'of Agur son of Jakeh of Massa' (RSV). Massa was an Arab tribe descended from Abraham through Ishmael (Gn. 25:14), and the eastern tribes were famous for their wisdom (1 Ki. 4:30).

5. King Lemuel

The king's mother is given as the source of 31:1–9, but he is likewise unknown, though again he may belong to Massa (see 4. above and the commentary). We need not suppose him to be the author of the magnificent poem on the perfect wife (31:10–31) which forms an appendix to the book.

DATE

The formation of the separate collections into one book may not have been undertaken as one step, and it has already been suggested that much of the compiling and editing may have been undertaken in Solomon's reign. The final form had not been achieved by Hezekiah's reign (25:1) but the text was already established by the time (c. 180 BC) of Ben Sira (Ecclus. 47:17). It probably received its final editing in the period immediately following the return from exile.

FORM AND CONTENT

The word translated 'proverb' (māšāl) comes from a root which seems to mean 'to represent' or 'be like'. Its basic meaning is thus a comparison or a simile, and its germ may be an analogy drawn between the natural and spiritual worlds (cf. 1 Ki. 4:33 and Pr. 10:26). The word is aptly translated 'parable' (AV) or 'allegory' (RSV) in Ezk. 17:2. The word was, however, extended to sayings where no such analogy is evident, and came to designate a short pithy saying or byword.

But the proverbs in this book are not so much popular sayings as the distillation of the wisdom of teachers who knew the law of God and were applying its principles to the whole of life. The LXX title of the book, Paroimiai, which might be rendered obiter dicta, gives a good idea of the contents. These are words by the way for wayfaring men who are seeking to tread the way of holiness.

In form the book is similar to the collections of instructions or teachings known from Egypt. The introductory exhortations and the grouping of maxims roughly according to subject indicate that the compiler was following a recognized international literary form. As the modern translations indicate, the work is in poetic form; in many places it is metrically exactly parallel to Ugaritic literature of the 14th/13th century BC.

PROVERBS AND THE WISDOM OF OTHER NATIONS

The many biblical references make it clear that the Hebrews were well aware of the wisdom of Israel's neighbours (1 Ki. 4:30; Je. 49:7; Dn. 1:4; Ezk. 28:3, etc.) and the international nature of Solomon's court (1 Ki. 4:34; 10:1–13, 24) provided ample opportunity for the interchange of wisdom. (Wisdom texts survive in quantity from Mesopotamia and Egypt and show an occupation with the same problems that confronted the biblical sages.) It is not surprising therefore that many of the subjects dealt with and attitudes taken find parallels in the extra-biblical texts.

Some superficially close verbal resemblances often disappear under close scrutiny, but have formed the basis for claims that large portions of Proverbs are borrowed from non-Israelite sources. The best-known examples are in the section Pr. 22:17 – 23:11 where, it is often argued, the similarities with the Egyptian Teaching of Amenemope are too great to be coincidental. In spite of Baumgartner's claim (op. cit., p. 212) that the 'theory that Amenemope is the original of Pr. xxii. 17 – xxiii. 11 has now been generally accepted', it seems more reasonable to explain the similarities as arising from the same literary and cultural milieu. The view that Amenemope borrowed from Proverbs is no longer tenable in view of recent discoveries of manuscripts of the Egyptian text dating from well before Solomon's period.

Notwithstanding the close parallelism of expression there is a world of difference in the underlying philosophy. The texts of Egypt and Mesopotamia are a mixture of morality and opportunism such as one finds in the proverbs of most nations, and wisdom is viewed predominantly as a practical virtue. In Proverbs, the emphasis is on wisdom as a way of life, and the aim of the book is not the achievement of material success but the inculcation of a godly, righteous and sober life.

THE USE OF THE BOOK OF PROVERBS

Principal Wheeler Robinson described OT wisdom as 'the discipline whereby was taught the application of prophetic truth to the individual life in the light of experience' (Inspiration and Revelation in the Old Testament, 1946, p. 241). It is this which makes the book perennially relevant. It is a book of discipline: it touches on every department of life and shows God's direct interest in it. Wisdom does not consist in the contemplation of abstract principles governing the universe, but in a relationship with God of reverent knowledge issuing in conduct consonant with such a relationship in concrete situations. The man who refuses this is, frankly, a fool. And wisdom must dominate a man's whole life: not just his devotion, but his attitude to his wife, his children, his work, his business methods, even his table manners. 'For the writers of Proverbs . . . religion means a well-furnished intellect employing the best means to accomplish the highest ends. The feebleness, the shallowness, the narrow, contracted views and aims, are on the other side' (W. T. Davison, The Wisdom Literature of the Old Testament, 1900, p. 134).

There is ample evidence that our Lord loved this book. Every now and then we get an echo of its language in His own teaching: for instance in His words about those who seek the chief seats (cf. Pr. 25:6, 7), or the parable of the wise and foolish men and their houses (cf. Pr. 14:11), or that of the rich fool (cf. Pr. 27:1). To Nicodemus He reveals the answer to the question posed by Agur the son of Jakeh (cf. Pr. 30:4 with Jn. 3:13). And He reminds those who, like the indiscriminating 'fools' of Proverbs, do not recognize Him or His message that 'wisdom is justified by her children' (Mt. 11:19).

Our Lord, in fact, used in His parables exactly the method of teaching found in Proverbs. The Hebrew māšāl is best rendered in Greek as parabolē, 'parable', and the same Greek word would translate the Hebrew ḥiḏâ, 'dark saying', or 'riddle'. Hence in Mk. 4:11 we see that, to those who do not recognize Him, everything connected with the kingdom appears in the form of riddles or dark sayings which they hear but do not interpret.

Was it from his company with our Lord that Peter derived his fondness for Proverbs? At any rate, his letters show a close acquaintance with the book (cf. 1 Pet. 2:17 with Pr. 24:21; 1 Pet. 3:13 with Pr. 16:7; 1 Pet. 4:8 with Pr. 10:12; 1 Pet. 4:18 with Pr. 11:31; 2 Pet. 2:22 with Pr. 26:11). Paul also quotes from and echoes the book (cf., e.g., Rom. 12:20 and Pr. 25:21f.), and when he speaks of 'Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God' (1 Cor. 1:24), the eighth chapter of Proverbs floods rich meaning into his words. Again, Heb. 12:5f. commands us not to forget 'the exhortation which addresses you as sons', that we 'do not regard lightly the discipline of the Lord'. The quotation is from Pr. 3:11f., and portrays for us the true nature of the book, a study in the paternal discipline of God.

The sayings, like our Lord's parables, need to be pondered to be fully appreciated, and it is probably best to consider each separately, reading only a few at a time. (F. D. Kidner's commentary in the TOTC series will be found an excellent companion in this.) 'A number of small pictures crowded together upon the walls of a large gallery are not likely to receive much separate attention from the visitor, especially if he be paying a short visit in a hurry' (Davison, op. cit., p. 126). Conversely, it is important to remember that each saying is part of a whole body of teaching. To take a proverb quite apart from its relationship to the whole and to seek to apply it to any situation may be quite misleading.

TEXTS AND VERSIONS

The Hebrew text of Proverbs is not the easiest of the OT books, but even so does not warrant the drastic treatment it has received from many commentators. Recent philological studies in other Semitic languages (cf., e.g., M. Dahood, Proverbs and North West Semitic Philology, 1963) have demonstrated that many proposed emendations are unnecessary. Gerlemann's studies in the LXX (Oudtestamentische Studien deel VIII, ed. P. A. H. de Boer, 1950, and Studies in the Septuagint: III Proverbs, Lund, 1956) have shown it to be of little help in establishing the text since it has its own distinct literary character.

COMMENTARY

1:1–7 THE BOOK'S TITLE, PURPOSE AND MOTTO

This is the longest title of any OT book. The ascription to Solomon does not mean that he wrote the whole book (cf. 24:23; 30:1; 31:1) but indicates its most illustrious contributor and the greatest figure in the proverbial lore.

1 Vv. 1 and 6 form a single elliptical sentence:

'The proverbs of Solomon . . . written down that you may know. . . .' 2 The reader is invited to learn from the book wisdom (the nature of which is explained as the book proceeds) and instruction. The latter comprehends the whole concept of spiritual education and discipline (it is translated 'discipline' in 3:11; note its use in Heb. 12:5ff.). 3 To receive instruction in wise dealing; better than AV 'of wisdom'. Righteousness, justice, and equity are characteristics constantly demanded by the prophets, and are features of the rule of God and His Messiah (see, e.g., Is. 9:7 and 11:4). 4, 5 V. 4 shows that this wisdom is available for the youngest and most inexperienced (cf. Is. 35:8), v. 5 that those who have already drawn deep of wisdom's well will yet find abundantly more. Simple probably means 'open to every influence'. Acquire skill (AV 'attain unto wise counsels') is suggestively translated by the LXX as 'shall acquire a steersman'. This idea is implicit in the Hebrew root. 6 The book is also written to provide a key to all the proverbs of wise men (cf. Mk. 4:13). The precise meaning of the word translated in AV 'the interpretation' is uncertain. This translation is possible, but in line with its only other occurrence in the OT, Hab. 2:6, we might translate 'satire', and 'allusion' has also been suggested. RV, RSV, noncommittally, have figure.

7 forms a sort of motto for the book, and describes its foundation principle. Beginning (Heb. r'ešît) implies both starting-point and essence. Without the knowledge and fear of Yahweh, the One true God, the wisdom which affords guidance for the whole of life cannot begin to be acquired. The motto is repeated, slightly differently, at 9:10. Cf. also 15:33; Jb. 28:28; Ps. 111:10.

It is worth comparing these verses with Is. 11:1–5, where most of the gifts here set out are shown to be attributes of the Messiah and the outcome of the presence of the Spirit of God.

1:8 – 9:18 THIRTEEN LESSONS ON WISDOM

The address 'my son' begins each lesson except the last, which is given by wisdom herself. A master is addressing his disciple.

1:8–33 The first lesson

1:8–19 Shun evil companions. The disciple is urged to follow the teaching he received from his parents as a child. 8, 9 Hear, as often in the OT, means 'obey'. The Hebrew word for 'law' (tôrâ) has here its primary sense of teaching, as is shown by the parallelism. The content of this teaching is described for us in the book of Deuteronomy; see especially Dt. 4:9; 6:7; 11:19; 32:46.

A lawless state of society is depicted in vv. 10–19. Organized robbery with violence seems to have been endemic in Palestine throughout the biblical period (cf., e.g., Ps. 10:8ff.; Ho. 4:2; 6:8f.), and even in the firmly governed Palestine of our Lord's day was established enough for Him to base a parable upon it. It is plain from these verses that the desperadoes would not stop at murder to gain their booty. 12 The apparent meaning is a sudden murderous assault; they will pounce upon their victim as avidly as death devours hers. 13–15 But the invitation to an equal share in their ill-gotten gain (v. 14) is to be consistently refused (v. 15). 16, which is not in the LXX, occurs again at Is. 59:7. 17 The metaphor is difficult. One may follow Oesterley and interpret the bird of the instructed disciple: being forewarned, he will avoid the snare of joining such evil company, just as no bird walks into a net that he has watched being laid. But the widely held alternative, that the robbers and such inexperienced youths as follow them, blind to everything but gain, are like birds rushing for seeds scattered on the ground not noticing the trap, is certainly possible. 18, 19 speak of the inevitable fate of those who enrich themselves in this way. When they lie in ambush for others they are, unknown to themselves, compassing their own destruction. Such are the ways of all . . .; i.e. 'this is the outcome for everyone . . .'

1:20–33 Wisdom's unheeded appeal. This is the first of the sections in which wisdom is personified. That wisdom which has its origin in the fear of God invites the people at large to learn: but the great mass of mankind refuse to listen, despite the fact that in doing so they bring ruin and distress upon themselves. We are reminded of the manner in which the prophets pleaded with Israel to 'seek Yahweh and live', and met with stubborn lack of understanding. Indeed, there is much in this section that is reminiscent of the teaching of Hosea and Isaiah and Jeremiah.

Vv. 20, 21 describe the manner of wisdom's proclamation. 20 Wisdom is either a plural, to express intensity or fullness, or an unusual form of the word. Wisdom is represented as calling out its message in the streets and public thoroughfares (cf. RV). The prophets also proclaimed their message in the streets and public places; cf. Je. 5:1; Is. 20:2ff. 21 On the top of the walls; RSV has followed LXX, probably unnecessarily: the Hebrew text has 'head of bustling' (sc. streets); cf. AV's 'chief place of concourse'. The entrance of the city gates was the place where public and private business was transacted and courts held (cf. Ru. 4:1ff.).

Vv. 22, 23 give wisdom's appeal. 22 Three classes who pay no heed are named. Simple: the root seems to mean 'open to influence', whether good or bad; in origin the word (petî) is morally neutral (cf. v. 4). But the people in question refuse the proffered wisdom and thus remain 'simple': so the word comes (as in English) to have an unenviable connotation. Scoffers (Heb. lēṣîm) are a class we shall meet again. They are wisdom's worst enemies, arrogant, cynical and defiant. Fools are represented as hating the knowledge which alone can save them from disaster. There are three words in Proverbs translated 'fool': the nāḇāl (17:7, 21; 30:22; cf. 30:32) is boorish, churlish and dull. The 'ewîl (19 times) is flippant, obstinately careless (10:8; 12:15), without restraint (27:22). Almost as undesirable is the kᵉsîl (used here and nearly 50 other places in Proverbs) whom Toy sums up as 'one who is insensible to moral truth and acts without regard to it'. (On all this see Kidner, TOTC, pp. 39–42.)

23 may be taken in either of two ways. It is possible that the fools are instructed to turn and face wisdom's reproof, and the words which wisdom makes known are contained in vv. 24–33. But it is better, bearing in mind the 'How long?' of v. 22, to take this as a last appeal to the heedless to receive knowledge. Give heed; the word is literally 'turn' (cf. mg.), an expression often used in the prophets with the sense of 'repent', which is surely the meaning here. The 'spirit of wisdom' is associated with the Messiah (Is. 9:2), and is a privilege of Messiah's people (Eph. 1:17).

Vv. 24–32 describe the general reaction to the appeal and the dire consequences. For calamity will certainly follow such disobedience, and then it will be too late to seek the aid of heavenly wisdom. The wisdom they rejected will laugh in their faces as they have so long laughed at it; the memory of despised knowledge will be bitter to those who are perishing. The search for wisdom induced by the final calamity will be in vain, a note of severe finality which stamps many of our Lord's parables of the kingdom. 29 Note that again knowledge and fear of God are linked. 32 The simple, exhorted to turn to God (cf. v. 23), have turned away from Him, and this will bring about their destruction. Complacence; better than AV 'prosperity'. The parable of the rich fool in Lk. 12:16–20 is sufficient commentary here. There is no denial of the fact that the fool may temporarily prosper.

33 holds out the promise of true security for those who do obey wisdom's voice.

2:1–22 The second lesson

2:1–9 The search for wisdom and its reward. This section stresses three things: that wisdom requires diligent search (vv. 1–5), that it is none the less God-given, and not the result of mere human effort (v. 6), and that God watches over and keeps in His will those who receive it (vv. 7–9). The principles involved here are implicit in Solomon's dream in Gibeon (1 Ki. 3:5–15) and are made explicit by Paul in Phil. 2:12, 13.

2, 3 Heart has a wider meaning in Hebrew than in English, as it relates to the intellectual and moral faculties as well as to the emotional. The pupil is being exhorted to apply all his powers in the quest for understanding, until he can be said to be shouting out aloud for it. 4 The emphasis is probably less on the fact that silver has to be mined and that the treasure requires intensive search than on the fact that both are immensely valuable. Our Lord takes up and develops this thought, applying it to the search for the kingdom of heaven (Mt. 13:44). 7 The literal meaning of stores up is 'hides away', and sound wisdom (Heb. tûšiyyâ) may be 'abiding success', i.e. the effect of sound wisdom: but note from vv. 9ff. the moral character of this abiding success, and that God hides it away for and not from the righteous. 8 Read with RV 'That he may guard the paths of judgment, And preserve the way of his saints'. In other words, God Himself becomes a shield for His people in order that He may see that what is perfectly right is constantly maintained. Preserving means 'watching over': God watches over the path His people take, both to protect them in it and to keep them in the right way. Saints represents those who loyally render to Yahweh the love due to Him in the covenant between Him and His people. 9 The virtues named are reflections of His will: see on 1:3.

2:10–22 Some benefits of wisdom. The protection which the possession of wisdom affords is enlarged upon. 11 The discretion which is promised contains the idea of purposefulness. Vv. 12–19 mention classes from whose pernicious ways those who have received wisdom may escape. 12 First there is the 'evil man'. The AV rendering suits the context better than the RV, RSV from the way of evil; but in either case cf. the petition in the Lord's prayer, 'Deliver us from evil' or 'from the evil one'. There are the men of perverted speech, literally men who speak things turned upside down, i.e. the liars. 13–15 Such men are crooked and perverse. 16 Above all, there is the loose woman, against whom many warnings are given in the book. See further on 5:3. 17 Here, at least, the warnings are against the allurements of the adulteress who has known the law of the true God. Companion (cf. RV, 'friend'); more exact than AV's unwarranted translation 'guide'. But from a passage like Je. 3:1–4 we see clearly that the word was used to designate the marriage partner. Not only does the woman sin against the husband she married in her youth; in doing so she sins against God, to whom, as an Israelite, she is bound in a covenant relationship. It is He who has ordained the marriage covenant, and He who has laid down as part of His covenant, 'You shall not commit adultery' (Ex. 20:14). 18 Her house is a steep descent all the way down to death, and her victims do not regain (or 'attain unto', RV) the ways leading to life which all men desire to reach. 'The process is that wisdom and knowledge, when they become your own way of thinking, and your acquired taste (10), will make the talk and interests of evil men alien to you (12–15). Even the adventuress . . . will show up at once as . . . femme fatale: who offers a taste of life, and sells you death' (Kidner, p. 62).

20 After this long digression, v. 20 picks up again the thought of v. 11. Not only will God's gift of wisdom protect from these evil ways; it will enable a good and upright manner of life to be followed. 21, 22 Land; the primary reference is doubtless to 'the land which the Lord your God gives you' (cf. Ex. 20:12; Ps. 37:9–11). But the significance does not stop there, as is shown by our Lord's beatitude, based on Ps. 37:11, 'Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth.'

3:1–10 The third lesson

The theme is 'trust and obey'. 1, 2 Observance of the teacher's words is urgently enjoined, as a source of long life and peace. The primary reference is to long life on earth, often regarded in the OT as a great good; observance of the fundamentals of right living will enable a man to avoid the worst snares and pitfalls of life. But 'commandments with promise' (cf. Eph. 6:2) take a deeper significance as God's revelation unfolds, and our Lord declares that His words are spirit and life (Jn. 6:63). Teaching; again from tôrâ (cf. on 1:8).

This theme is developed in vv. 4–10, and the content of the life-giving teaching referred to in v. 1 is outlined. 3 First loyalty and faithfulness must be maintained. This expression means more than appears on the surface. Loyalty (AV 'mercy'; Heb. ḥeseḏ) is a word which is hard to understand apart from the idea of covenant. It represents covenant-love, and the full range of what that means we see from the 'great commandment' and the one like it (Dt. 6:5; Lv. 19:18; cf. Mt. 22:36–40). Faithfulness (AV 'truth'; Heb. 'ĕmeṯ) means 'firmness' and hence 'trustworthiness', 'stability', and eventually what faithfulness demands—reality and truth. So the Lord is 'faithful and true' (Rev. 19:11): the one quality implies the other. Loyalty and faithfulness are divine attributes (cf. Ps. 25:10, where RSV translates 'loyalty' as 'steadfast love'), and are often linked in the OT. Toy well says they are 'the expression of perfectly good relations between man and man, or between man and God'. The advice to bind these qualities to oneself may be paralleled by the command (Dt. 6:8) to bind on God's covenant commandments, a constant reminder of His requirements. But men require more than to be reminded; and so mercy and truth are to be written upon their hearts, their very minds (cf. Je. 31:33). 4 The outcome of this is stated here. Favour and good repute represent a slight change in the Hebrew, which has 'favour and understanding', but the appropriateness of this combination is not immediately apparent. It may, however, mean that the practice of 'loyalty and faithfulness' will bring about not only divine and human favour, but divine and human recognition as possessing true understanding. We find the great example of this in Lk. 2:52.

In the second place faith is enjoined; faith which includes trust in God (v. 5), acknowledgment of Him in every department of life (v. 6) and reverent awe of Him (v. 7). Relying on one's own human understanding, setting a high value on one's own wisdom (cf. Is. 5:21), and living on easy terms with evil are the antithesis of this trusting dependence on Yahweh. 6 Make straight; make plain, clearing obstructions. The word is used in Is. 40:3 of clearing the highway in the desert. The effect of such faith as is described is also physically beneficial. 9, 10 Finally, the pupil is instructed that the reverence due to God involves giving on the part of His worshippers. The substance with which he honours Yahweh is his wealth, or revenue. He need not fear that this will finally involve him in loss (cf. Mal. 3:10–12). The teaching is cast in agricultural terms. The reference to first fruits looks back to the law in Dt. 26, where the worshipper annually takes of the firstfruits of his produce and remembers with joy and gratitude God's redemption of Israel and His continuing goodness—the OT harvest festival.

3:11–20 The fourth lesson

The theme of this section is the delights of wisdom, a development of the recurring theme in the third lesson that the teaching brings a rich reward. 11, 12 But first comes a warning that God in His love may bring adversity as well as prosperity upon His children. Bacon's dictum, 'Prosperity is the Blessing of the Old Testament; Adversity is the Blessing of the New; which carrieth the greater Benediction, and the Clearer Revelation of God's favour', must be qualified by such passages as this. The rendering in Heb. 12:6, 'For the Lord disciplines whom he loves, and chastises every son whom he receives', follows the LXX, which has read the same Hebrew consonants with different vowels to obtain the word 'chastises'. (Cf. 2 Sa. 7:14.)

13–18 With this warning the teacher expounds the blessings which follow the possession of wisdom. All around him men were engaged in the all-absorbing pursuit of riches and honour. He is therefore at pains to show that heavenly wisdom is a thing infinitely more precious than all those things that men seek after, and, indeed, holds the key to the things most desired by them (v. 17), things which are added as a by-product of the search for wisdom. 14 We may note the germ of yet another of our Lord's parables: that of the pearl of great price (Mt. 13:45, 46). 16 The blessings of the right hand rate more highly than the (still desirable) gifts of the left: but wisdom gives access to both. 18 As a tree of life wisdom is a constantly growing, self-renewing source of life to those that attain her.

19, 20 further show the glory of wisdom and its exalted status before God. It was His guiding principle in creation, and remains so in His government of the universe, whether in epochal cataclysmic events (the reference to the breaking forth of the depths points back to Gn. 7:11) or in the regular moistening of the earth on which life depends. Dew may include rain; cf. Jb. 36:27f. See further on 8:22–36.

3:21–35 The fifth lesson

We have been watching celestial processes: we are now firmly brought to earth. The same wisdom with which God creates and maintains the universe also has to do with human daily life and personal relations. Sound wisdom and discreet purposefulness (see on 2:7) will be life and health and peace (vv. 21–26).

21 RSV, in order to bring out the meaning more plainly, has reversed the order of the lines (cf. AV, where the Hebrew order is retained and where 'them', despite its position, refers, as in RSV, to those who keep sound wisdom). 22 The word translated soul (Heb. nepeš) seems, though this is disputed, to have meant originally 'throat', and thence 'living being', 'person', 'self', 'life'. And they will be life for your soul means, then, 'they shall be life to you'. Bearing in mind the parallelism, however, it is possible that nepeš has here its original sense of 'throat', and is used by synecdoche for the whole body. 23 RV mg. reads, more literally, 'thou shalt not dash thy foot'. 25 The injunction do not be afraid when the ruin of the wicked comes may be linked with the numerous passages of hope and encouragement to the righteous with which the prophets mingle their announcements of impending judgment for the nation's sin (see, e.g., Is. 10:24ff.), and with our Lord's words to His people when catastrophe overtakes the world (Lk. 21:28).

27–35 consist of short detached proverbs like those of the central sections of the book, all illustrating the theme already set out in this lesson. James tells us that heavenly wisdom is pure, peaceable, gentle, easily intreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without uncertainty or insincerity, and that it has a diabolical parody whose marks are envy and strife. This is illustrated by the teacher's precepts. 27 The first enjoins prompt payment of debts. The Hebrew reads 'do not withhold good from the owners (be'ālim) of it'. The LXX may be right in interpreting this of the poor rather than of creditors. 'It would be in harmony with the Hebrew usage to apply the term here to the person who is deserving of your kindness or is in need of it' (Greenstone). 28 The second orders prompt and whole-hearted generosity (cf. Jas. 2:16). 29ff. The others warn against unprovoked attack and violent methods. 31 The man of violence may prosper. To the prophets it was only too obvious that he often did. But his unjustly gained wealth is not to be coveted, nor his methods imitated.

32–35 The last group of proverbs brings these injunctions into relation with the fear of the Lord. 32 One way of life is hateful to Yahweh: the other leads to real harmony with Him. The upright are in his confidence. Oesterley happily renders 'familiar and confidential intercourse'. 33 On the one way God's curse rests, on the other His blessing (cf. Dt. 11:26–28). 34 God rewards with His favour humility, not arrogance (cf. the allusions to this verse in Jas. 4:6 and 1 Pet. 5:5). 35 It is the wise, i.e. the righteous, just and humble, who eventually receive honour—and that, like a legacy, without conscious effort—not the fools (Heb. kesîlîm; see on 1:22). The second half of this verse presents difficulties of translation, but the AV rendering, with its touch of irony, has at least virility and pungency, which most of the suggested emendations do not possess.

4:1–9 The sixth lesson

This section contains a little piece of autobiography. Consumed with desire for the moral and spiritual health of his pupils, the teacher tells of his own father's wise instruction, proved by the experience of his own life, in the effort to impress upon them the urgency of obtaining above all things the 'wisdom from above'.

1 shows the teacher taking up the position of a father to his pupils. Hear, O sons is more literal (the word is the same as that which begins all the other lessons), but AV 'children' conveys the idea better. He relates how concerned his own parents were for his welfare. 3 I was a son with my father, with the parallelism that follows, implies that the teacher's father took particular care over his son's education. 4–9 Whether the whole of these verses represents the father's words, or whether the teacher is in the later sentences applying them, we cannot tell. Once more, the acquisition of wisdom is seen to provide life (v. 4), protection (v. 6), honour (v. 7) and adornment (v. 9). 7 The beginning of wisdom is this: Get wisdom. The AV translation here cannot be warranted, for the Hebrew has only 'the beginning of wisdom is—get wisdom'. This is often abandoned by commentators as unintelligible, but Perowne points out the similarity with the message of 2:1–5, especially if 2:5 is interpreted in the light of 1:7, and the sentence may well be a compression of that message. Whatever you get; read with RV 'with all thou hast gotten', and cf. Mt. 13:44–46.

4:10–19 The seventh lesson

The theme is 'Abhor that which is evil'. Once more the teacher opens with an urgent injunction to his pupils to be teachable and maintain their grip on the lessons they have learned (vv. 10–13). 10 Once more, the possession of wisdom will confer long life. 11 They have already learned from his teaching in what direction wisdom lies. Paths of uprightness, i.e. of moral conduct of life; better than AV 'right paths'. 12 The wisdom which shows itself in such conduct will be a sure guide into true liberty. Hampered; a word expressive of the restricted movements of those who leave 'the way of wisdom' and 'the paths of uprightness'. 13 The urgency of gripping this discipline is well illustrated in the accumulation of expressions here. Oesterley renders the last phrase 'because wisdom is all in all to a man'.

14–19 contain warnings to shun the by-paths followed by the wicked (vv. 14, 15), a description of the men who follow them (vv. 16, 17) and vivid, contrasting pictures of what it is like to follow the true road (v. 18) and the by-paths (v. 19). 17 probably refers to the wicked gaining their sustenance by wickedness and violence (cf. 20:17), though it may also mean that evil was their food and drink and constant enjoyment (contrast Jn. 4:34). 18 The AV is more literal, but the light of dawn conveys the right idea. 'As the sun climbs the heavens, shining brighter and brighter, from the first faint glimmer of dawn till he reaches his meridian height and appears to stay there firm and motionless: so is the path of the righteous. His sun standeth still at last in the heavens, and hasteth not to go down for the whole everlasting day' (Perowne). With this verse cf. Is. 2:5.

4:20–27 The eighth lesson

The theme is 'Cleave to that which is good'. Yet another appeal to heed the teacher's life-giving instructions (vv. 20–22) is followed by an appeal to maintain heart (v. 23), speech (v. 24), eyes (v. 25) and feet (vv. 26, 27) in the direction that leads to life.

21 The teacher shows that it is not enough to hear wise instruction: it must be assimilated, pondered, kept at the centre of man's being. Cf. Ps. 119:11 and Lk. 2:19. 22 RSV makes the object of both lines singular; AV makes both plural. The Hebrew has a plural and a singular, and might perhaps be rendered, 'They are life to those who find them and health to the flesh of every one of them'. 23 gives the key to this whole series of lessons. Wisdom leads to life, but fundamentally wisdom originates, not in the following out of a collection of wise precepts, but in the heart, the focus of the mind and will and the fountain of action. (For the Hebrew connotation of heart see on 2:2.) What backsliding Israel needed was 'a heart to know . . . the Lord' (Je. 24:7). Our Lord's words on this subject which caused such offence (Mt. 15:10–20) draw out the teaching of this verse. For with all vigilance, RV mg. 'above all that thou guardest' is preferable. 26 The first phrase is difficult. AV evidently connects the Hebrew with a similar word for scales: it is well to 'weigh up' one's route. RSV take heed to assumes a different derivation. RV (and LXX) 'make straight', with its implication of the removal of moral hindrance (cf. Heb. 12:13) also fits here, if less happily where the word recurs in Pr. 5:6, 21. The pupil is also bidden to see that his ways are sure. The root means 'to make firm'. The road, having been carefully chosen, traced, or cleared of obstacles, is then to be made firm. 27 Thereafter there must be no deviation from it.

5:1–23 The ninth lesson

The theme is wisdom applied to the relations between the sexes. After an opening appeal for close attention (vv. 1, 2) the teacher proceeds to a description of the 'loose woman' and her allurements (vv. 3–6), an injunction to avoid her (vv. 7, 8), a warning of what befalls her victims (vv. 9–14), a call to cherish holy love (vv. 15–19) and a reminder that God is watching continually (vv. 20–23).

3 The loose (lit. 'strange') woman is a figure who often appears in the book (cf. 2:16; 6:24; 7:5; 20:16; 23:27; 27:13 mg.). Broadly speaking, there are four different views of the meaning of the phrase: that it represents Israelite harlots or adulteresses, described as 'strange' because they have no right to the relationship portrayed; that 'strange' has its usual meaning of 'foreign', and Canaanite or Phoenician women are meant (we know that sacred prostitution was practised in Canaanite religion); that the reference is to a foreign cult, perhaps of Astarte the goddess of love, with a strong sexual element, met with in trade relations with neighbouring countries; and that the whole is allegorical and refers to the seductions of Greek philosophy or religion. Of these, the first explanation is the simplest, the most natural, and the one that best meets the statements in 2:17; 7:19f.

4 End refers to the consequence of associating with her: she may seem like honey, but those who have dealings with her find the abiding taste is wormwood—an insecticide and exceedingly bitter (cf. Dt. 29:18; Je. 9:15). Sheol; the abode of the dead: we might say 'death'. 6 There are several possible renderings. RSV has cut the knot of a difficult translation, but may give the approximate sense. She could equally well be translated 'thou' in both halves of this verse. In the second half, D. Winton Thomas suggests that the word translated know in fact comes from a different verb, 'to be quiet'. This would give good sense: 'Her ways are not stable and she is not at rest.'

9–14 describe the conclusion of the Rake's Progress. 9, 10 The picture seems to be of the adulterer, his bodily strength sapped, his worldly goods gone, spending his remaining years as a slave in another's house. Merciless is masculine singular. 11–14 More terrible, however, are the pangs of his remorse, which has come too late. I was at the point of utter ruin means either 'I have had the narrowest of escapes from the supreme penalty which might have been inflicted for this sin', whether death (cf. Lv. 20:10) or otherwise; or 'I have committed the depths of evil even though a member of the holy congregation of Israel'. In this latter interpretation the phrase assembled congregation is viewed as a corporate designation for Israel as the people of God, and the fact that the sin was committed in the midst of such a people would constitute an aggravation of it (cf. Heb. 12:15). The whole passage is an illustration of 1:26ff. where wisdom is represented as 'laughing' when those who have rejected her realize their error.

From this warning of the evil consequences of sin, the teacher passes to positive instruction on the joy and sacredness of a pure and marital life, in terms similar to those of the Song of Solomon. To the Oriental the love-song is a sacred thing, and there would be nothing indelicate in the terms in which he speaks. 15 urges the learner to delight in his own wife as opposed to 'the loose woman'. 16 If we retain the AV rendering the meaning is that 'purity of married life will diffuse itself abroad like streams from a fountain' (Perowne); but the context is better suited by the RSV, involving a return to the warnings in the last section against promiscuity. 18 The fountain is blessed when enjoyed with respect to the laws of God: the wife of your youth is 'the wife you married when young', early marriage being customary in OT times.

21–23 again bring all the precepts taught into relation with the covenant of the living God. 21 He watches over every life, whether 'weighing it up' or 'scrutinizing' it (see on 4:26). 22 The rebel rapidly becomes a victim of his own rebellion. 23 The reason is that he has not heeded the divine discipline. In this verse for lack of discipline is much to be preferred to AV 'without instruction' (cf. Ho. 4:6). Such is the teacher's final deterrent from sin. For the thought of the passage cf. Eph. 4:17–19.

6:1–19 The tenth lesson

This lesson is based on the principle enunciated in 5:22. Three examples are taken of the process there described, and a list of seven deadly sins is added.

6:1–5 The surety. In early days Israel's commercial law was straightforward. Borrowing was necessary only for particular emergencies, and so the taking of interest from a fellow-Israelite was strictly forbidden (e.g. Lv. 25:36), and if a garment was taken as security for a loan, it was to be returned by nightfall to serve as a blanket (Ex. 22:25–27). With the growth of civilization and foreign trade relations, the practice of suretyship seems to have grown up, a man accepting responsibility for the debts of another. The action of the Merchant of Venice revolves, of course, round this or a similar custom. Perhaps further research will throw more light upon what was actually involved. At any rate, in our book it is uniformly condemned. As Kidner remarks, the objections to it come nearer to banishing gambling than to banishing generosity: 'A man's giving should be fully voluntary: its amount (cf. 22:27) determined by him (for then its effectiveness can be judged, and competing claims on him assessed), and not wrung from him by events outside his control' (p. 71). It is worth noticing that Proverbs is especially concerned with surety transactions involving strangers (foreign traders?); see, e.g., 6:1; 11:15; 20:16; 27:13.

1 Given your pledge for a stranger refers to the act ratifying the transaction. The surety is, like the wicked man of 5:22, trapped by his own folly. In the verses that follow he is urged to make every effort to free himself, importuning, if need be, the one on whose behalf he has made the pledge to release him.

6:6–11 The sluggard. In The Pilgrim's Progress Sloth, in company with Simple and Presumption, is seen by Christian asleep by the wayside. By teaching them 'to presume that they should do well at last', Sloth and his companions cause others to follow his example. But when Christiana passes by she sees them 'hanged up in irons a little way off'. This picture is true to that given in Proverbs. A proverb from nature, such as Solomon made (1 Ki. 4:33), is used to shame the lazy man into action (vv. 6–9), but if he heeds not, his slumber will soon be rudely interrupted (vv. 10, 11) by the stark fact of poverty and need —another example of a fool caught in the toils of his own folly (cf. 5:22). 11 Like a vagabond; 'highwayman' conveys the right sense.

6:12–19 The 'man of Belial'. A brief but vivid portrait is sketched of what A. D. Power well calls 'The Perfect Bounder' (vv. 12–14). Perverse, deceitful, divisive and vicious, he too will eventually be overthrown as a result of his sin (v. 15).

12 A worthless person is literally 'a man of Belial'. 'Belial', meaning 'without profit', is perhaps the only genuine compound word in Hebrew: it is often used in the OT to denote wickedness (e.g. Jdg. 19:22), and Paul uses it as a title for Satan (2 Cor. 6:15). 13 Scrapes with his feet; AV 'he speaketh with his feet' is a literal translation; RV mg. reads 'shuffleth'. In each case insincerity is implied. Points; cf. RV 'maketh signs'. Not 'teacheth', as AV.

16–19 The next section also relates to the man of Belial. The seven deadly sins enumerateb as things that God hates are marks of 'the bad lot'. He sins with his eyes (vv. 13, 17), hands (vv. 13, 17), heart (vv. 14, 18) and feet (vv. 13, 18); he is a divider and mischief-maker (vv. 14, 19). We have other 'numerical proverbs' in ch. 30. Perhaps this was originally a didactic form for classroom use, and ran 'What six things does Yahweh hate? . . .'

6:20–35 The eleventh lesson

The theme is the seventh commandment. The exordium treats of the guidance offered by sound teaching (vv. 20–23); and solemn warnings are uttered against the specific sin of adultery (vv. 24–35).

20 Commandment and teaching (tôrâ; cf. on 1:8) refer to parental teaching; in v. 23 they seem to refer to the law of the covenant. It was this law, however (cf. Dt. 6:6, 7), which was the content of the home teaching of the godly Israelite. The divine law, taught and expounded, provides clear guidance for life. Oesterley makes a distinction between commandment as the lamp and the law (teaching) as the source of light, and compares the way in which John the Baptist is called a lamp (Jn. 5:35) and Jesus Christ the light (Jn. 1:8f.). At all events God's law is to be inwardly held and outwardly manifested (v. 21), guiding and controlling all activities (v. 22).

24 It is stressed that the law and discipline and correction in the light of it (cf. 2 Tim. 3:16) afford protection from the evil woman. Here a case might be made out for an allegorical interpretation, and when we remember that the figure of an adulteress is often used in the OT to describe sinful Israel (cf. Ho. 2) and that James uses it to describe the worldly Christian (Jas. 4:4, AV), it is clear that the reach of these chapters is far beyond sexual misconduct.

Nevertheless the way in which detail is relentlessly pressed home requires us to believe that the teacher means his words to be taken literally.

25 Her eyelashes (or 'eyelids', AV) were probably painted (cf. 2 Ki. 9:30). 26 It is not clear whether the teacher distinguishes two types of immoral woman. If this is so, the verse says that a man may be brought to poverty (cf. AV 'to a piece of bread') through a prostitute, but runs the risk of his life (by social or legal action) through consorting with an adulteress (lit. 'a man's wife'). Probably, however, the same woman is referred to in both parts of the verse. RSV less satisfactorily follows LXX in rendering For a harlot may be hired for a loaf of bread, but . . . . 27 Bosom means the fold of the garment across the chest. 29 brings us again to the thought of the living God. Shall not go unpunished; literally 'shall not be innocent', a state of 'non-innocence' in OT thought inevitably implying punishment. 30 is rather obscure. The simplest explanation is that if a thief who steals to feed himself, though much less despicable than an adulterer, has still to make restitution in full measure (sevenfold in v. 31 is probably a general, not an exact term), how much more shall the adulterer pay the penalty? 32ff. Only in his case he is destroying himself; he can expect condign punishment and public disgrace (v. 33), and will receive no quarter from the wronged husband (v. 34); unlike the thief, he can make no restitution (v. 35).

7:1–27 The twelfth lesson

The theme, like that of the previous lesson, is the peril of adultery. First there is the customary exhortation to observe and ever keep in mind the paternal teaching which is the way of life and is particularly proof against the strange woman (vv. 1–5). The relationships mentioned in v. 4 depict the close personal knowledge of wisdom that the teacher desires in his pupils: sister implies family intimacy (cf. Mt. 12:50). There follows a passage of superb vividness giving an eyewitness account of how a young man fell a prey to the strange woman (vv. 6–23). This forms the bulk of the lesson, vv. 24–27 pointing the moral.

7 The picture of the victim is skilfully sketched. He is a man without sense, a 'simple' man (see on 1:22). This is illustrative of the fact that one who is simple in the negative sense without formed ideas of good and evil is in peril of becoming a fool and a reprobate if he remains uninstructed. 8, 9 We learn that he spent the time from twilight to midnight walking the streets near her house. 10–13 The woman is lustful and restless, with impudent face (an excellent translation!) and quite shameless. 14 She introduces a subtle religious pretext. Under the law of the peace-offering (Lv. 7:11ff.), the flesh of the animal had to be eaten by the worshippers on the same day as the sacrifice, or, in the case of a vow, on the following day. The woman, having made her vows to Yahweh, now invites the youth to share in the sacrificial feast. 15 She claims to have looked for him specially to share her table. 16–19 She paints in glowing colours 'the pleasures of sin', and their extraordinary luck in that her husband is away for some time. Actually in the Hebrew she calls him simply 'the man', possibly what Toy calls 'a refined sneer'. 21–23 After some hesitation (implied in v. 21) the youth suddenly capitulates. All at once (i.e. 'suddenly') is better than AV 'straightway'. The text in vv. 22, 23 is notoriously difficult. RSV has been influenced by LXX, which is rather longer than the Hebrew. Whatever the actual words, the sense is clear: the young man's fate is sudden and drastic.

Having reached this dramatic climax, the teacher closes the lesson with a few solemn sentences. 26 The casualties caused by the evil woman have been innumerable. A mighty host (AV 'many strong men') has been slain by her. In other words, 'Let any one who thinks that he stands take heed lest he fall.' It is a strange irony that it was his 'foreign wives' that led to Solomon's own decline from wisdom (1 Ki. 11:1–8).

8:1–36 The thirteenth lesson

The lesson, after a brief introduction by the teacher (vv. 1–3), is given by personified wisdom herself: and with it we reach the high-water mark of the series. In severe contrast with the shuffling, dusk-loving, seductive manner of the woman of the last lesson, wisdom clearly and with dignity and in the most public places pleads with men to receive her and declares the treasures of her reward (vv. 4–21). Wisdom's part in creation is then set forth (vv. 22–31), and she adds her own exhortation to cleave to her in vv. 32–36.

This chapter with its personification of wisdom was interpreted Christologically from the earliest Christian centuries. Certainly Paul (cf., e.g., 1 Cor. 8:6; Col. 1:15–18), the writer to the Hebrews (cf. Heb. 1:3) and John (cf. Rev. 3:14) see in it terms which have their full meaning only in 'Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God' (1 Cor. 1:24). Theophilus of Antioch, the first Christian writer to use the word 'Trinity' of the Godhead, speaks of 'God, His Word and His Wisdom' (Ad Autolycum ii. 15: like other 2nd-century writers he is not clear on the division of functions between Son and Spirit). We may believe that the Fathers were justified in seeing in the personification of wisdom a foreshadowing of that revelation made clearer in the NT of three hypostases in the one God. 'The vivid and august personification falters not on its way, till it presents to us rather than predicts Him, who is "the Wisdom of God", "the Only Begotten of the Father" and "the Son of His Love"; who "became flesh" and "dwelt among us", because from all eternity His delights had been with the sons of men' (Perowne, CBSC). Finally we may note that our Lord Himself refers to the personified wisdom of God (Lk. 11:49) in speaking of the prophets and apostles, the mouthpieces of God's wisdom, who were consistently rejected by God's people.

8:1–21 Wisdom among men. 1–4 In the most conspicuous places wisdom addresses the whole of mankind. 5 Once again we see that discerning shrewdness (prudence) is offered to the simple, and even hardened foolish men (kᵉsîlîm; see on 1:22) still have a chance to learn. 6–9 Wisdom's words are true, straightforward and sincere. 10, 11 She offers a rich reward: far richer than the things for which men spend their lives.

Wisdom then explains further what she is. 12 The meaning is that wisdom is demonstrated in actual life by discernment (prudence) and possesses the other forms of understanding spoken of in 1:4. 13 Wisdom identifies herself with the fear of the Lord (cf. 1:7), and God and wisdom hate the same things: wisdom, for all its practical, earthly uses, has no clashes of interest with godliness. 14 Among her other possessions are counsel and strength (RV 'might'), qualities of kingship which are seen in their fullness in the King Messiah (Is. 9:6; 11:2). 15, 16 This leads naturally to wisdom's part in guiding rulers. Solomon himself asked for wisdom to guide him in his rule (1 Ki. 3:5–12). 17 Wisdom is accessible when sought (cf. Lk. 11:9–13). 18–21 Wisdom confers great riches upon those that love her, the greater because they are righteously obtained (vv. 18, 20). That her blessings are more than simply material is shown by the contrasts in v. 19. Enduring (AV 'durable') occurs nowhere else in the OT: RV mg. suggests 'ancient'; Koehler (Lexicon, in loc.) 'hereditary'.

8:22–36 Wisdom with God. Wisdom speaks now of her part in creation. 22 Since the time of the opening of the Arian controversy in the 4th century this verse has been one of the most discussed passages in the OT. The main point at issue is, what is the meaning of the word qānâ translated 'possessed' (Vulg., AV, RV) or created (LXX, Targ., RSV). The Arians used the LXX 'the Lord created me' as one of their main proof-texts for their thesis that Christ was a created being. They were confuted on other grounds, but it is highly questionable whether the Hebrew here bears this meaning. The ordinary meaning is 'to get, acquire', as in 1:5, 4:5 and elsewhere. There are other occasions where it could well mean 'create, make' (e.g. Gn. 14:19—'maker of heaven and earth' or 'possessor'?; Ex. 15:16—'the people thou hast made' or 'acquired'?) and RSV has so translated it here. But long ago C. F. Burney argued that it meant 'beget', and a parallel in Ugaritic literature often translated 'creatress of the gods' seems to imply parenthood rather than creation. The meanings of possession and parenthood are in fact closely related (see Gn. 4:1, where qānâ is again used, and cf. the width of meaning of 'got' in archaic English). Whether 'possessed' or more precisely 'begotten', wisdom in Proverbs is inseparable from God, and was with Him from all eternity.

23 Set up may refer to God's appointment of wisdom for her task. The word is used in the sense of consecrate. Originally meaning 'to pour out', it came to mean 'to consecrate by pouring libations'. 24 Wisdom preceded all created things, even the primeval depths (note here and in v. 25 the metaphor of birth; some have argued a royal birth). But that is not all. 30 Wisdom is not only present at, but is the mediatrix of creation. Human craftsmanship is the product of wisdom (Ex. 35:31); so also is the craftsmanship that formed the worlds. 'The versatility of the mind of man is but an image of the versatility of its archetype' (Cheyne, Job and Solomon, 1887, p. 118). Master workman represents a rare word, and this meaning, though likely, is less than certain. AV has apparently read it with different pointing to give 'nurseling', which certainly makes sense, but fits the whole context rather less effectively. It is not an insuperable objection that Yahweh Himself is presented throughout as the Maker. We may easily and in the same context speak of the owner, the architect and the builder all 'building' the same house. 31 Wisdom rejoiced over the advancing creation, and her joy was complete when it was ready for mankind to live there. A more literal rendering would be 'sporting in the inhabited world of His earth'. With the whole passage cf. 3:19, 20.

32–36 In the concluding verses wisdom speaks like a teacher and addresses her audience as sons, reminding them again that to love her brings life (v. 35) and to hate her, death (v. 36). 'Sinneth against me' (v. 36, AV); better, as in RSV, misses me. The Hebrew word 'to sin' meant originally 'to miss', i.e. 'to miss the mark': this original meaning is better here, where the contrast is with he who finds me. To miss wisdom is to wrong oneself; to hate her is suicide (v. 36).

9:1–18 Summary of the thirteen lessons

Some of the main topics dealt with in chs. 1–8 are summarized in the form of a picture of wisdom and folly each inviting men to a banquet.

9:1–12 The seven pillars of wisdom. 1 Once more personified, wisdom is now seen as a gracious hostess. There has been much speculation about the seven pillars. They have been made to represent things as various as the seven days of creation, the seven liberal arts, the sun and moon and five known planets, and even the first seven chapters of Proverbs (see the list in Toy, ICC, Proverbs, p. 185). But they may indicate only the structure of a large and ideally constructed house: Sennacherib's new year festival house, discovered in recent years, has seven pillars.

2, 3 Within her house wisdom has laid a magnificent feast and despatched her maids to call the guests. She goes herself (vv. 3–6) to call whosoever will to her banquet. 4 There is a special place for the uninstructed simple and for the ignoramus; 6 they may yet receive life and understanding. 'Forsake the foolish' (AV) (or rather, 'the simple ones', as in v. 4) is the most straightforward translation. Some prefer 'Forsake, ye simple ones'—calling them to a clearcut decision (RSV leave simpleness follows LXX). There is an evident connection between this great supper and that described in Lk. 14:16ff.

There follow comments, still by wisdom herself, on the impossibility of making any impression upon the scorners by such an invitation as she was extending to the simple. 7–9 The contrast is not between those invited and those not invited to the banquet, but between the reactions of the scorner and the teachable man to the holy discipline imparted by wisdom. This, too, is an element in our Lord's teaching (cf. Mt. 7:6). See also 1:4, 5 and 1:22 and the commentary there. 10, with its repetition of the motto of the book (1:7), gives the reason for this difference of reaction. Wisdom begins with the fear of God; the cynical scorner can therefore never learn. The Holy One; read with RV, RSV (cf. AV 'for the holy').

9:13–18 Folly's feast. Folly is also personified —as a harlot. Brazenly she invites the simple to her feast. She makes her invitation as widely known as does wisdom (cf. vv. 14, 15 with vv. 3, 4). But whereas wisdom offers a feast indeed and of her own preparation (v. 5), folly offers a paltry meal, stolen, illicit and clandestine (v. 17), and her guests go to their death (v. 18).

13 A foolish woman; literally 'a woman of folly'. Perhaps, with RV mg., we should translate simply 'folly'. Wanton represents a word of uncertain meaning. Knows no shame rests on a slight emendation of the text. Another possibility is 'and is ever restless'.

We may note that the invitations of both wisdom and folly are directed to the simple and ignorant (vv. 4, 16). The wise, though they may still grow in wisdom (vv. 8, 9), and the scoffer (v. 7) need no invitation.

10:1 - 22:16 THE FIRST BOOK OF SOLOMON

The long connected 'lessons' are the prelude to large collections of detached sayings. 'By now the reader is in a position to orientate himself in the thicket of individual sayings . . . and to see in each cool, objective aphorism a miniature and particular outworking of the wisdom and folly whose whole course he has seen spread out before him in Section I' (Kidner, p. 23). The first and much the largest of these collections, estimated to contain 374 proverbs, is attributed directly to Solomon. Whether the collection was made by Solomon himself, by a member of his court, or by a later collector, we have no means of knowing. But the exact figure quoted in 1 Ki. 4:32 suggests that collections may have been made in his lifetime, so that this may be one.

Most of the proverbs are of one type, consisting of two lines, the second pointing a contrast to the first. The arrangement is not quite so haphazard as may at first appear. Often a series of proverbs on the same or a similar subject, or demonstrating the same principle, may be grouped together; or the repetition of a catchword or catchphrase may be the link between proverbs on different subjects. But the proverbs were spoken at different times and there is often no connection between them. It must be stressed that the titles at the heads of sections are only approximate guides to the contents for the sake of convenience.

10:1–32 The rewards of right and wrong living

1 Just as the lessons sometimes begin with an exhortation to follow parental teaching (e.g. 1:8; 6:20), the collection opens with a proverb about the response to this teaching. Foolish is more than 'stupid'; the son is a kᵉsîl (see on 1:22). 2 speaks of the reward of uprightness. Righteousness is right living. The prophets frequently speak of oppression, cheating and exploitation of the weak as denials of the righteousness God demands in His people. 3 The catchword righteous introduces the next proverb dealing with God's supply of the physical needs of His people (cf. Mt. 6:11, 33), and His frustration of the evil desires of the wicked.

4, 5 Lest this be taken as an invitation to fecklessness, these verses concern laziness and industry—which affect others as well as oneself. A slack hand (lit. 'palm') conveys the idea of the hand hanging loose.

6 The mouth of the wicked conceals violence: AV's 'violence covereth the mouth of the wicked' is preferable. From the parallelism we would expect this to refer to the reproaches or blows about the mouth which follow for the wicked as assuredly as blessings on the 'head' of the righteous, but ḥamas (violence) usually refers to wrongful treatment, and it is better to understand it of violent, vicious language enveloping the mouth of the wicked.

7 The effects of righteousness and wickedness continue on earth after death. 9 Cf. 2 Tim. 3:9. 10 He who winks the eye refers to crafty, insincere conduct. RSV, probably rightly, follows LXX with its excellent antithesis; AV's 'prating fool' seems to have slipped in scribally from v. 8. 11 The righteous man's mouth is a constant source of inspiration, a wayside spring from which wayfarers are refreshed; violent, noxious language covers (so, probably rightly, AV—see on v. 6 above) the wicked man's mouth. We may observe that, as in 6:12f., righteousness and wickedness may be manifest in the heart (v. 8), mouth (vv. 6, 8, 10, 11), feet (v. 9) and eyes (v. 10). 12 A deep saying (cf. Jas. 5:20; 1 Pet. 4:8) on love and hatred is linked to v. 10 by the catchword 'covers'. For the meaning of covers in this verse, note its opposite in the first line, and that 'covers' is a possible translation of the word normally translated 'bears' in 1 Cor. 13:7.

14 Lay up; i.e. for the proper occasion. The idea is that while wise men conceal what they know, the fool (an ʾᵉwîl; see on 1:22) is likely to blurt out his stupidity and endanger himself and others in consequence. 15 Ruin serves as a catchword. Here it suggests the threat of imminent disaster: in the social revolution of Solomon's time the lot of the poor must have been constant insecurity. When the first half of this saying is repeated, however (18:11; AV is preferable), it is shown that this is not the whole story, and that the rich man's wealth is not in itself a sufficiently strong city. 16 This realistic acknowledgment of the comfort of a good income is immediately followed by a reminder that what really distinguishes between men is how they use their income. Its use and abuse have serious and permanent effects.

18–21 Four proverbs on speech. It is evil both to hide hatred hypocritically, and to manifest it in slander; words are best used sparingly; their value depends on the person uttering them. 21 Feed is the word commonly used of a shepherd's care for his flock. The righteous, by virtue of their speech, become pastors; fools die for lack of the wisdom the righteous can impart to others. 22 Yahweh's blessing is unadulterated. (The marginal rendering is dubious.) 24, 25 We return to the former theme of the respective rewards of the righteous and wicked. The latter's life is based on what is temporal and temporary; he dreads the sudden disaster, the tempest which removes everything he trusts in. Cf. the parable in Mt. 7:24ff.

26 The sluggard reappears, a plague to all who deal with him. We hear a master's judgment on one such wicked and slothful servant in Mt. 25:26. For the converse cf. Pr. 25:13. 27–30 Four more proverbs on the fate of the righteous and the wicked. The first three designate life, joy and strength respectively as the blessings of the righteous. 29 While RSV is preferable here, a grammatical alternative would be 'The way of the Lord (i.e. the way He deals with men) is a stronghold to the upright'. 30 This takes further the principle expressed in Ex. 20:12 and taken further still by our Lord in Mt. 5:5. 31 Brings forth; 'puts forth buds of wisdom' (Moffatt).

11:1–31 Some aspects of wickedness

Dishonest business; pride before a fall; distortions of treacherous men; the riches you cannot take with you; life as an obstacle race; evil desires and their effect; the sudden dissolution of the wicked man's security; destructive speech; the civic effects of righteousness and wickedness; the unwisdom of showing contempt; the talebearer; lack of advice; the menace of suretyship; the gains of good women and bad men; the harvest of our lives; skin-deep beauty; desire and fulfilment; the hidden miseries of money-grubbing; misdirected search and misplaced trust; losing one's temper; lawlessness and requital.

1 Commercial and business practice is brought into direct relation with the law of God. 2 There is a direct affiliation between wisdom and humility. 3 The treacherous (AV 'transgressors') represents a term which frequently stands for those who break or revolt against God's covenant. This in itself makes for distortion (so, literally, crookedness). 4 In the day of wrath—be it in a sudden disaster, at death, or in the 'day of the Lord' spoken of by the prophets (cf. Is. 10:3; Am. 5:18)—it is righteousness that delivers, not riches. This is one of many passages in this book which, while limited in its application in its original context, expresses eternal principles and is flooded with fuller meaning for the Christian. 5 A contrast between the respective paths of the blameless (connected with the word translated 'integrity' in v. 3), who is able to clear the obstacles from his path as he goes, and the wicked, for ever tripping himself up. 6 It is their evil desires which ensnare and overthrow the rebels. 7 The expectation of the godless comes to naught; literally 'the expectation of strength perishes': i.e. the wicked rich, with their expectation based only on human resources, however powerful in life, find themselves frustrated at death: they cannot even ensure that their children will inherit their prosperity. No book in the Bible is more concerned with eschatology than is the book of Proverbs.

9 Godless, or 'apostate', came to mean 'hypocrite' (so AV). Whether by seduction, subversion, or slander, he is destructive, and the best defence is the knowledge of a righteous person, who is accordingly not misled. 10, 11 The righteous and the wicked each have their effect on public life. The whole township rejoices at a good man's prosperity and at the fall of the evil. A city is ennobled by the presence within it of men who are blessed of God and overthrown by the mouth (i.e. in counsel or leadership) of wicked men. (We may recall this principle at work in Gn. 18.) The city in mind is a Hebrew walled city (qiryâ); the character of the city rulers may be decisive for the whole community. Oesterley points out that these verses belong to a date when Israelite cities were governed by Israelites, i.e. before the Exile.

14 This saying about the need for wise guidance in government and the need for taking extensive advice (cf. 15:22; 24:6) would have been especially relevant soon after Solomon's death (cf. 1 Ki. 12:1–15). 15 'None ever knew so well that "He who hateth suretyship is sure" as He who having counted the cost became for us "the surety of a better covenant" ' (Perowne). 16 A comparison instead of the usual antithesis. A gracious woman wins and keeps renown as surely as violent men seize their booty. 17 Kind; the kindness is ḥeseḏ, 'covenant love'. The reference is to those covenant obligations which require that a man love his neighbour as himself. In doing so he naturally does good to himself: the cruel man, neglectful of the covenant, does himself damage. 18 The present prosperity of the wicked man is deceptive, since it will not benefit him for ever: the reward of the righteous is certain (cf. Gal. 6:7). 19 The Hebrew is very compressed but the sense is not in doubt. The word kēn can mean 'as' (so AV) or steadfast (RV, RSV).

21 Be assured; literally 'hand to hand', apparently a strong asseveration (cf. our 'shake on it'). Those who are righteous; literally 'the seed of the righteous', i.e. righteous people as a whole (cf. Jn. 8:39; Gal. 3:7, AV). 24–26 Wealth is not conditional on miserliness, but rather the reverse; and the practice of keeping back food in order to run the price up is reprehensible (cf. Am. 8:4–6). 27 Those who seek goodwill find God's favour; those who look for trouble will find more of it than they bargained for. 28 Wither; better, 'fall' (cf. mg.—RSV has needlessly emended).

30 Lawlessness; RSV has followed LXX, and the rendering makes a good antithesis with the first line. Takes away lives is certainly a more natural rendering than 'winneth souls' (cf. AV—'souls' here will stand for 'persons' or 'lives'). However, the Hebrew text as it stands reads 'a wise man takes (away?) lives', which may mean that by his example he gains the lives of other men, so that his righteousness is a tree of life to others as well as himself (Mt. 4:19 could then be an echo of this proverb). 31 Both righteous and wicked will receive their desert on earth. The LXX took this to mean that both will be punished for their sins; i.e. if the righteous are to be punished (for even they have sinned), how much more the sinner? It is the LXX rendering which is taken up in 1 Pet. 4:18.

12:1–28 Contrasts in conduct

Differing reactions to discipline; what gives a man roots; the difference wives make; the thoughts, words and fate of the wicked; the differing reputation of differing degrees of sense; on playing the great man; animals know whom it is best to work for; industry and frivolity; the wicked and the righteous; the differing effect of differing people's words; on advice; what to ignore; words good and bad; planning, good and bad; self-betrayal; the outcome of diligence and sloth; anxiety and sympathy; those who help and those who hinder; the reward of the diligent; the two ways.

2 Condemns is a legal term; literally 'he will cause to be wicked', i.e. God will reckon him as wicked. 4 A good wife; the term implies both nobility of character and effectualness in the home: the sketch is filled out in 31:10–31. 5–7 Three contrasts between the righteous and the wicked: in their intentions (so thoughts, v. 5); in their words (the righteous do not simply not speak harm, they deliver men, v. 6—unless the thought is 'deliver themselves', whereas the plotters tend to trap themselves); and in their ultimate end (v. 7; cf. Mt. 7:26). 9 RSV has followed LXX here. AV, RV have used the same consonants with different vowels, to give the meaning that it is better to be of low social status and still have enough to keep a servant than to have a high opinion of oneself and go hungry. The thought is similar: RSV is more direct, and to be preferred, in its expression.

11 The industrious peasant working his own piece of ground triumphs over the trifler who follows worthless pursuits (RSV) or people (AV, RV). 12 A difficult verse; RSV has emended the text. This reads 'The evil man has desired the net of the wicked but the root of the righteous gives' (AV, RV add 'fruit'), apparently indicating that what bad men desire is delusive, perhaps self-destructive. 14 'Words can bring in as substantial a return as deeds, for they establish relationships and implant ideas' (Kidner, p. 97). Cf. Mt. 12:36; 2 Cor. 5:10. 17–19 Three contrasts in speech. The true witness who declares what is right and the lying evidence; the sharp-tongued whose speech wounds (cf. Ps. 106:33) and the helpful, healing conversation of the truly wise; the permanence of true words and the transitoriness of a lie. 20 Not only do the wicked speak lies; their mind (heart) is deceitful, a contrast to the joy of those who plan good (the Heb. šālôm, 'peace'—cf. AV, RV—conveys the idea of general welfare). 21 The wise man must, like the questioner of our own day, have seen apparent exceptions to this principle: he is no Job's comforter. As it was for suffering Paul, it is ultimately an affirmation of faith in a righteous and victorious God: cf. Rom. 8:28, 36, 37.

24 The hard worker brings himself responsibility: the lazy man finds himself under the lash in the labour gang. For the background in Solomonic times cf. 1 Ki. 9:15ff.; 11:28. 26 The sense is clearly that good men are a help and bad men a hindrance to others on the path of life, but the Hebrew of the first line, which RSV has emended, is obscure. 27 The meaning of some words in this verse is not certain. If LXX and RSV are right in translating catch (or if others are right in connecting it with an Arabic root used as a hunting term), the sluggard is too lazy to hunt his food; if AV is right in following Jewish tradition (for which some linguistic support can be adduced), he is too indolent, having so far stirred himself as to hunt, then to cook it. The sluggard wastes what little he accomplishes by not finishing it. The second half of the verse reads literally 'But the substance of a precious man is diligent'. Perhaps AV, RSV are right in transposing diligent and precious. 28 Again the Hebrew of the second half is obscure. RSV emends. Among other suggestions (needing no major emendation) are 'And the journey of her pathway is no-Death!' or 'But (there is) a way (which is) a path to death' (see Kidner, in loc.).

13:1–25 Life and discipline

Wise man and cynic; pure speech; how to be satisfied; telling the truth; riches and poverty; the light that failed; strife the fruit of insolence; easy come, easy go; hope deferred; keeping the commandments; the man of sense; ambassadors good and bad; the uses of criticism; getting one's desire; wisdom and folly are both infectious; due rewards; an education; satisfaction and frustration.

2 The pure speech of a good man will be rewarded (cf. 12:14) but the appetite of the treacherous (i.e. rebels against God's covenant) is for violence. 3 Opens wide his lips suggests a vulgar grin (see Koehler, Lexicon, article pshq). 4 Acts shamefully and disgracefully; or perhaps 'causes to stink and makes ashamed', those who pollute all they touch being contrasted with the righteous who detest falsity. 7 As translated, the antithesis is between miserliness and extravagant display. AV, whose rendering is equally tenable, contrasts true and false riches. A man may be wealthy and not 'rich toward God', or he may be poor and have great treasures (cf. Lk. 12:21). We cannot separate this from the thought of Him who though He was rich, yet for our sakes became poor (2 Cor. 8:9) and in whom the verse reaches its height of meaning. 8 There are advantages in wealth and poverty alike. The rich man can use his wealth to get himself out of difficulty; the poor man is less likely to be exposed to such difficulties, or, perhaps, he has 'nothing to lose but his chains'. 9 Be put out; perhaps better 'go out', while that of the righteous goes on burning merrily.

12 Tree of life; cf. 3:18; 11:30, and notes. 13 It is perilous for him who despises the word of God—here not necessarily confined to the law of Moses, but certainly including it; cf. Is. 30:12. 14 The teaching (tôrâ, here with its primary sense of 'instruction') of the wise is refreshing and revitalizing. 15 Faithless; again the traitors to the covenant are in mind. RSV has followed LXX and other ancient translations in reading their ruin; the Hebrew reads 'is perennial'. (AV's 'the way of transgressors is hard', though celebrated, cannot really be sustained.) Another possibility is indicated by G. R. Driver, that the word 'not' has dropped out. The last line would then read: 'The way of the rebels does not last.' 17 Healing; or 'security'.

19 'Although there is nothing more sweet than to gain a high and noble desire, fools will not leave their unworthy ways to do that; to do so would be hateful (an abomination) to them.' 20 Will suffer harm. The Hebrew has a pregnant ambiguity: the companion of fools either 'suffers evil', or 'becomes evil'. 21, 22 'Proverbs is concerned with the general rule; Job (e.g. chapter 21) with the exceptions' (Kidner). 23 On RSV's rendering, the poor man's ground, though potentially fruitful, may be subject to deprivation by injustice. Another possibility is that the latent potentialities may be squandered by lack of judgment (cf. AV); the size of one's assets matters less than the discretion applied to their use.

14:1–35 Life in the fear of the Lord

Home building; walking uprightly; the effects of talking; order without adventure; true and false witness; the search for wisdom; profitless company; discerning conduct; ultimate loneliness; permanent residence; the misleading signpost; all our joy is touched with pain; requital; gullibility and discernment; quick temper; the peril of the simpleton; final vindication; neighbours; doing good and evil; labour and gossip; the ornaments of wisdom and folly; true and false witnesses; the fear of the Lord; prince and people; tranquillity of mind; exploitation of the poor; the glory of a nation; good and wicked servants.

1 Wisdom; actually 'wisdom of women' (see RSV mg.), or 'womanly wisdom', doubtless with reference to the family life which may be built or torn down by the wisdom or folly of the wife and mother. Cf. the houses of wisdom and folly (both of whom are personified as females) in 9:1ff. 2 Uprightness and perversity ultimately spring from attitudes to God—one of realism, the other of lack of it. 4 RSV has made a slight emendation. AV has 'Where no oxen are, the crib is clean'. The sense would be: 'No oxen, no stable-cleaning—but also no ploughing, and therefore no corn.' Considerable disturbance may be a requisite of growth. 6 The scoffer, however able, fails to find wisdom even when he seeks it, because his cynical arrogance leaves no room for 'the fear of the Lord' (cf. 9:10). 9 RSV has emended an obscure first line, which reads literally 'guilt (-offering) mocks at fools'. This might mean that the sacrifices offered by sin mock them by their ineffectiveness (cf. Is. 2:11ff.), but seems a curious way to express it. 'Every fool mocks at guilt (-offering?)' is a possible, though not an easy translation (cf. AV, RV). AV's 'but among the righteous there is favour' is doubtless right in seeing favour as referring to relations among men. The guilt-offering had reference to relations both with God and with other men (cf. Lv. 6:1–7). But translation of this difficult verse remains tentative.

10 This beautiful and poignant saying shows that the wisdom teachers were not concerned purely with outward conduct, and illustrates that in this book heart can refer to the emotional as well as the intellectual faculties. 17 RSV follows LXX and with the bad-tempered man contrasts the man with discretion used in a good sense. The Hebrew text has 'hated' instead of patient; one may thus (like AV) take discretion in a bad sense—deviousness, which may be a far worse thing than bad temper. 18 This conviction finds its ultimate fulfilment in the events described in Phil. 2:9–11. 25 A witness has it in his power to save or murder life or reputation. In such circumstances, the man who utters (literally 'breathes out') lies is 'all deceit' (cf. RV). 26 His children; i.e. those of the godly man referred to in the first line.

30 Composure preserves, envy corrodes the person who harbours them. 31 Exploitation of the poor is a direct affront to God. With the whole verse cf. Mt. 25:32ff. 32 Finds refuge; better 'seeks refuge'. Through his integrity: RSV has followed LXX in reading two consonants differently from the present Hebrew, which has 'in his death' (so AV). The godly man thus commits himself to God in his death. AV may be right: though the scope of the teachers of wisdom was normally within this world, an occasional forward glance must not be a priori excluded. 33 Not known; RSV follows LXX in reading not, which is missing in the Hebrew. If the text is not emended, the sense may be that even among fools there is some recognition of the wisdom which is truly at home in the wise man. 34, 35 Proverbs for Solomon's court. The true glory of a nation is in its correspondence with the righteous law of God. 'The study of the things concerning the king is to the thoughtful reader of the Proverbs a study of the things concerning Christ. The ideal elements speak of Him; the actual shortcomings cry out for Him' (R. F. Horton).

15:1–33 On the path of life with a cheerful heart

Gentle answers and hurtful words; responsible speech; God's watch on life; giving words and taking them; laying up treasures; acceptable piety; what God loves and what He hates; on discipline; no hiding place down here; the cynic not as daring as he seems; gladness and sorrow; minds grow by what they feed on; the feast of a cheerful heart; life's desiderata; quick and even tempers; straight roads are easiest roads; father and son; senseless joy; ill-considered plans; a word in season; the upward path; the Lord the widow's friend; on bribery; how far away is God?; the savour of good news; on teachability.

1 A harsh word: the Hebrew suggests one that hurts. 2 Dispenses knowledge; perhaps better, with AV, 'uses knowledge aright'. The quality, as well as the quantity, of speech is contrasted with the trash blurted out by the fool. 3 Cf. 2 Ch. 16:9. 4 Gentle speech is healing, life-giving; twisted speech can crush people (cf. Is. 65:14 for the effect of a 'broken spirit'). 8 For God's refusal to be 'bought off' by sacrifice from the basically unrepentant, cf. Is. 1:11ff. 11 Sheol (the abode of the dead) and Abaddon (lit. 'Destruction') are coupled also in 27:20; Jb. 26:6. They are perhaps synonymous, though the latter may refer particularly to the abode of the wicked. They are, like everything on earth, open to God's continual inspection. For the thought, cf. Ps. 139, especially v. 8.

19 The sluggard goes for a short cut; as usual, it turns out the hardest way. 25 It is in the nature of the proud to devour widows' houses (Lk. 20:47), but God is ever on the side of the exploited: a recurrent biblical theme which in the Magnificat (Lk. 1:46–55) becomes a sort of Marseillaise. 26 Thoughts; i.e. plans—hateful to God even before their execution.

16:1–33 The Lord's watch on human life

The overlordship of God; arrogance, loyalty and faithfulness; the effects of pleasing God; when a little is better than a lot; the king's place; the business man's place; the king's power; the worth of wisdom; walking on the highway; pride and humility; wisdom's pleasantnesses; the road to death; the commonest incentive; damaging activities; venerable men; self-control; God decides the outcome.

This group of sayings contains several clusters of proverbs on themes that are similar or related, such as the group on divine sovereignty (vv. 1–4), on the king (vv. 12–15) and on various types of harmful person (vv. 27–30); but sayings on these same themes are found outside the clusters (cf., e.g., vv. 10, 33).

1 A man may make plans, but the execution of them—which becomes concrete in speech (the answer of the tongue)—fulfils God's designs. Cf. v. 9. 2 A man may be satisfied with himself, but God is the final judge of his behaviour (cf. 1 Cor. 4:4). 3 Literally 'Roll your work upon the Lord . . .'. 4 The saying is compressed: there is no sense of an arbitrary predestination of men for the coming evil day. 'The general meaning is that there are ultimately no loose ends in God's world: everything will be put to some use and matched with its proper fate' (Kidner). 6 Loyalty (i.e. covenant love) and faithfulness (see 3:3, 4) are the means of 'atoning for' (lit. 'covering') sin, just as love is stated to be at 10:12. This is not put forward as a formal principle of atonement; it expresses God's basic requirements under the covenant with Israel (cf. Mi. 6:6–8; Hab. 2:4) and is closely linked with a deserting of evil ways, caused by reverent awe of God. It also expresses the response to atonement, i.e. faithfulness and departure from evil, occasioned by fear of God and grateful love towards Him.

10 Inspired decisions; literally 'divination'. The king when he gives a righteous judgment speaks oracularly, like a prophet, and his mouth does not revolt against justice. This prepares us for the portrait of the Messianic King, with His divine judgment (cf. Is. 9:7; 11:3, 4). 11 God's stamp is on the standard weights and measures: any unfair practice in trade is in opposition to Him. 12–15 For the OT understanding of kingship see Dt. 17:18–20. How far short of the ideal the actual royal house fell is revealed in history. But the portrait remained, to be drawn more clearly by the prophets and fulfilled in the Kingship of Christ. 'The reckless fury of the Eastern despot . . . is but the abuse of the awful justice of the Archetypal King' (Perowne). 26 This is lifted to a new level by Jn. 6:27. 33 The lot is cast into the lap from the folds of which it is to be shaken out; but it is God who determines what it says. The background is doubtless the sacred lot (cf. Jos. 7:14–18; 14:1, 2) but the meaning intended is far wider. God disposes: there is no such thing as chance.

17:1–28 Home, friends and fools

A peaceful home; privileges can be forfeited; the Lord the Refiner; slander and heartlessness; three generations of joy; unbecoming speech; bribery; conciliation and alienation; criticism that sinks in; rebellion, folly, strife, injustice; a friend in need; the surety; twisted mind, crooked tongue; the grief stupidity causes; cheerfulness; setting one's sights aright; crime in court; golden silence.

1 Feasting with strife; literally 'strife-offerings', an ironic commentary on substantial 'peace-offerings' consumed amid contention. (For peace-offerings as a family feast cf. Dt. 12:11, 12.) 2 Soon after Solomon's death, his own 'servant who dealt wisely', Jeroboam, divided the inheritance with Rehoboam, 'the son who acted shamefully'—and took the lion's share (1 Ki. 12). 3 The drastic tests of human character which God applies are not destructive in their intention: he is purifying silver and gold; cf. 1 Pet. 1:7. 8 Magic stone; perhaps an over-translation (cf. AV 'precious stone'), but it may well be that the flashing stone in an amulet or talisman is in mind, blinding the briber and the bribed. Cf. v. 23.

10 A cruel messenger is the messenger (whether human or angelic) of the rebel's doom. Intemperate himself, he is treated in like manner. 14 A quarrel may begin with a slight friction, like a trickle through a tiny hole in a bank. It is wise to leave off before it is aggravated, and a sluice opened. 16 It has been inferred from this that the wise charged a fee for their instruction, but this is not necessary: the picture of the fool turning up with a tuition fee is essentially satirical. Wisdom is an inward thing, and requires not payment but a properly inclined heart. 24 Wisdom is easily accessible to the properly disposed: it is right in front of the man accustomed to straightforward ways. The fool, devious to the end, is looking on the ends of the earth—and never seeing wisdom.

18:1–24 Perils and blessings

The selfish individualist; the self-parading fool; fellow-travellers; the wellspring of wisdom; miscarriage of justice; misusing the mouth; the destructive sluggard; the strong tower and the shaky wall; haughtiness, humility and haste; demoralization; the acquisitive mind; giving presents; hearing both sides; disputes and their resolution; the tongue—source of satisfaction and lethal weapon; a good wife; rich and poor; true friendship.

1 RSV, probably rightly, has followed LXX in reading seeks pretexts, the same phrase translated 'seeking an occasion' in Jdg. 14:4. (AV is ponderous and obscure here.) 3 Three different words for shame are piled up—the inevitable travelling companions of wickedness. 4 Deep waters; i.e. hidden. But wisdom comes bubbling out, ever fresh, beyond the risk of stagnation. 10, 11 The name of the Lord represents His power and majesty, which affords perfect assurance to the righteous. The wealth of the man of property may indeed be his fortification, but a very insecure one compared with the strong tower of the righteous; it is a high wall only in his imagination (so RSV mg.; cf. AV, RV). 12 Cf. 15:33; 16:18.

16 The line between the present (like Jacob's to Esau, Gn. 32:13ff.) and the bribe is sometimes very fine; in any case, Proverbs realistically recognizes the power of the gift (cf. 17:8) while uniformly condemning the favouritism and injustice it brings (cf. 17:23). 17 The immediate reference is apparently to a legal dispute, but the proverb is of wider application. 18 The conviction that the decision of the lot was of divine decree was probably more effective in ending disputes than endless arguments, often productive only of bitterness. Christians who live in the age of the Holy Spirit may similarly unite when a decision on a disputed course of action has been prayerfully reached (cf. Acts 20:14 in context). 19 The text is uncertain. RSV has followed LXX; but AV's 'A brother offended is harder to be won than a strong city' (a paraphrase rather than a translation) may preserve the sense. 20 Satisfied in a good sense, or 'sated' in a bad sense. 24 The first line is again obscure and capable of more than one translation. Whether one prefers RSV, or RV's 'He that maketh many friends doeth it to his own destruction', the point of the proverb conveyed in the famous second line remains.

19:1–29 Studies in character

The upright pauper and the worthless rich; deliberation and haste; fuming against God; the power of money; the punishment of false witnesses; enlightened self-interest; position in wrong hands; the wisdom of magnanimity; the possibilities of kingship; domestic miseries and blessings; sloth; keeping the commandments; giving to the helpless is lending to God; over-indulgence; ungovernable temper; future investment; the sovereignty of God; covenant loyalty; the fear of the Lord; forceful rebuke; without natural affection; concentration on truth; depravity; the punishment of fools.

1 Cf. 28:6. 2 An 'also' (as in AV, but omitted in RSV) joins this proverb to the preceding. 7 The only three-line proverb in the first book of Solomon. 10 Luxury: D. Winton Thomas identifies another root with the same characters, which might yield the translation: 'Administration is inappropriate for a fool . . .'. 12 'Subordinates may learn tact here, and superiors pleasantness' (Kidner). The proverb is perhaps addressed to the latter, those who have it in their power to bring stress and terror or refreshment and productiveness. Cf. the different form in 20:2. 13 Dripping of rain; sc. through the roof. 14 While a man may inherit his home and wealth from his ancestors, a good wife is God's direct gift. 16 Cf. 13:13; Rom. 6:23. 17 It is not sufficient to avoid oppression of the poor: the good man gives active help, and since God identifies Himself with the helpless, such giving turns out in the end to be only a loan—to the Lord. Cf. Mt. 25:34ff.

18 Do not set your heart on his destruction, sc. by over-indulging and refusing to correct him. 19 An obscure verse: but the sense seems to be that an ungovernable temper is an endless source of trouble to its owner. 22 Loyalty; i.e. ḥesed, covenant love. Cf. Mi. 6:8. 24 The man is so lazy that, having dipped his hand, oriental fashion, in the dish, he cannot be bothered to take it to his mouth. 25 'When bad men are punished, the morally ignorant are warned'

(Toy). 27 Do not listen to instruction simply to forget it again.

20:1–30 Appearances and realities

Drink; the wrath of the king; avoiding quarrels; no work, no food; insight into character; loyalty professed and real; posthumous blessing; attributes of a good ruler; all have sinned; abominable trade practices; self-revealing activity; the functions of the body, God's handiwork; the value of knowledge; the surety; the after-taste of ill-deserved success; on taking advice; gossip; unnatural behaviour; avenge not yourselves; divine sovereignty; rash vows; the lamp of the Lord; the basis of the throne; age and youth alike have their beauty; effective punishment.

1 Wine and strong drink are personified as a drunkard, who becomes a blasphemer and brawler. 4 Autumn; AV, RV have 'by reason of the cold': the meaning is the same on either reading. The sluggard finds it too uncomfortable in the cold season to plough, and then looks in vain for a crop the following year. 5 One aspect of understanding is insight into human character. 7 Many boast of their loyalty, but it is desperately hard to find a man who will under all circumstances be absolutely trustworthy. 8 Winnows; i.e. separates chaff from wheat. Cf. v. 5, and Solomon's request in 1 Ki. 3:9. 12 'Not only the organs of hearing and sight, but their functions are the work of God (cf. 16:14). The implication is that what the ear listens to, and what the eye rests upon, should be right and pleasing to God' (Oesterley). 14 The buyer complains that the article is trash, but when he has bought it he boasts to others of the good bargain he has got.

16 Surety; see on 6:1. The addressee is the creditor: he should make no advance without security (for the garment as security cf. Ex. 22:26f.), for a man so reckless is a bad risk. 18 Cf. Lk. 14:31. 25 It is possible, on impulse or by imitation, to 'dedicate' more than we really intend. Cf. Ec. 5:5. 27 The spirit of man marks him off from the beasts. An animal can have a nepeš ('soul') but it was into man's nostrils that God breathed the rûaḥ ('spirit' or 'breath') of life. That very fact means that even in fallen man God has His lamp whereby He searches the inner man (cf. 1 Cor. 2:11), bearing witness to Himself by the light of conscience, illuminating the dark corners of the heart. 28 Loyalty (sc. to the covenant) and faithfulness are again marks of the ideal king, and the covenant mercy of God (righteousness is the same word translated loyalty in the first line) upholds his throne. Teneo et teneor. For what such a statement would have meant to Solomon, cf. 2 Sa. 7:12ff.

21:1–31 The God who acts

The only Ruler of princes; God weighs the heart; what God really wants; arrogance; diligence; ill-gotten gains; sweeping up the wicked; crooked paths; a nagging wife; ruthlessness; the lessons of discipline; the ruin of the wicked; the agony of Dives; the power of the gift; justice does not please everybody; luxury leads to poverty; the wise man's treasure and his abilities; self-control; desire and generosity; the abominable piety of the wicked; testimony; bluff; God's sovereignty.

1 The mind of the king—powerful among men as he may seem—is directed by God as firmly as the irrigator cuts and controls the channels. 2 Cf. 16:2. 4 Lamp; either the standards by which the wicked direct their lives, or the symbol of their prosperity (cf. 13:9). 6 Snare; RSV has followed LXX; others have read 'seekers of death' (cf. AV). Though compressed, the main point is clear enough. 9 'It is better to dwell in an attic on the roof, than in a double bedroom with a nagging wife' (A. D. Power). Cf. 25:24. 12 A verse very difficult to translate. If the text is sound we should perhaps read 'The Righteous One (i.e. God; cf. Jb. 34:17) observes . . .'. 13 Cf. Lk. 16:19–31. 18 Cf. Is. 43:3, 4, where Egypt is stated to be the ransom for Israel. 'There is a kind of substitution; a ransom is paid to enable the righteous to escape, and the ransom is the person of the wicked' (R. F. Horton). This makes the picture of the just suffering for the unjust (1 Pet. 3:18) stand out starkly.

21 An OT adumbration of the Lord's 'Seek first his kingdom' (Mt. 6:33). Righteousness and kindness (ḥeseḏ, 'covenant love') are required in God's covenant people (cf. Mi. 6:6–8), and those that seek them will have 'all these things' (life and honour) as well. 26 The wicked; RSV has followed LXX: the Hebrew has simply 'he' (cf. AV). But the subject may well be the sluggard of the previous verse; the two should be read together. 28 A man who hears; i.e. the man who is prepared to listen and understand is the proper contrast to the false witness. 29 Considers; better, with mg., 'establishes', 'makes sure'. 30, 31 'Two companion proverbs. . . . Nothing avails against, nothing without, God' (E. H. Plumptre).

22:1–16 Cause and effect in the spiritual realm

Reputation; the common origin of men; prudence; God's rewards; the booby trap; education; the power of the purse; the harvest of injustice; generosity; the author of discord; integrity and charm; the eyes of the Lord; fresh excuses from the sluggard; the adulteress; the economics of oppression.

2 Whatever barriers may exist between men on earth, they have a common origin and a common responsibility to God. 4 This verse, with its close connection between humility, the sense of dependence expressed in piety, and the fear of the Lord, sums up several of the main lessons of the book. 7 Just as the rich lord it over the poor, so the borrower, with an equally forced dependence, is under constant obligation to the person from whom he has borrowed. 8 The rod of his fury will fail; the time will come when this man will lose his capacity for exercising anger. (For the meaning, cf. Is. 10:5.) 14 See 5:1ff. and notes. 16 A dark saying: there seems to be a double condemnation, of exploiting the poor and currying favour with the rich.

22:17 – 24:22 THE BOOK OF THE WISE

See the Introduction, pp. 548 and 549. There is more connection between the sayings in this group than in the previous collection, and many parallels with the sayings of the Egyptian sage Amenemope. It is arguable that, like Amenemope's book, it has thirty paragraphs (see below on 22:20), but the Egyptian work has a more closely-knit order.

22:17–21 The proper function of proverbs

The teacher calls for the attention of the pupil to the sayings he has drawn up for his instruction (v. 17), calls on him to make them part of himself (v. 18) and shows that their aim is to lead to faith in Yahweh (v. 19) and strengthen, to others' benefit, his own grasp of truth (v. 21).

20 Thirty sayings. The Hebrew consonantal text has šlšwm, which can also be rendered 'three days ago' (hence RV mg., following earlier commentators, 'formerly', which is ingenious but forced); 'things in threefold form' (so LXX and Vulgate—Origen used this rendering to support his threefold approach to exegesis); and, perhaps, 'excellent things' (AV, RV, from a word meaning 'officers', and hence, it is urged, 'pre-eminent', 'excellent'). Amenemope, however, has 'consider these thirty chapters . . .', and it seems simplest to read the text as RSV, and see reference to (approximately) thirty paragraphs in this 'book of the wise'.

22:22 – 23:11 Some things to avoid

Elementary wisdom involves the creation of some fixed aversions. First, exploitation of the poor, whom God Himself protects (22:22, 23); second, the infection of bad temper (vv. 24, 25); third, suretyship (vv. 26, 27—these verses have no Egyptian counterparts); and fourth, violation of boundaries (v. 28; cf. Dt. 19:14). A note on the promotion of the conscientious follows (v. 29). Amenemope, who was a civil servant, is equally assured on this point.

The sage's instructions proceed with a passage on table manners (23:1–3) and other warnings about social climbing (vv. 4, 5), and a delightful picture of the miser—the sort of person with whom the social climber may vainly seek to ingratiate himself—at home (vv. 6–8). Conversation with a fool is not recommended (v. 9). Then comes a renewed warning against encroaching on the rights of the (apparently) helpless (vv. 10, 11), for they have a strong Redeemer to act on their behalf.

22:22 Crush the afflicted at the gate; i.e. use legal or judicial action against them. (Ordinary justice was dispensed 'at the gate'.) 23 While the preceding verse is parallel to a saying in Amenemope, this corollary has no obvious parallel in the Egyptian. 23:9 Redeemer; Hebrew gō'ēl. The gō'ēl in the OT is the kinsman who holds or acquires the right and responsibility to avenge blood (Nu. 35:19) and redeem property (Ru. 4:4) and generally to protect the interests of his dead kinsman's family.

23:12–25 What to look for

The appeal to hear instruction is renewed (v. 12) as the next stage of the sage's exposition is unfolded. Discipline, and from an early age, is needed to save a child from (self-) destruction (vv. 13, 14). To see wisdom in his pupil will rejoice his teacher (vv. 15, 16; cf. 2 Jn. 4); nor need the man who fears God see anything to envy in those who do not (v. 17): his hopes are set in the future (v. 18). The festive character of the revellers' carousals is illusory (vv. 19–21). The 'first commandment with promise' is then recalled (v. 22): and its happiest fulfilment is in a son who is good and wise (vv. 23–25).

23:26 – 24:2 Snares in the path

The earnest appeal is again renewed (v. 26), as the teacher warns against the prostitute and adventuress, seductive but ruinous (vv. 27, 28); drink, fascinating, debilitating, demoralizing, disabling, addictive (vv. 29–35); and mischievous company, an 'inner ring', to which entrée is nothing to covet (24:1, 2).

26 Give me your heart; i.e. attend to me carefully. Observe; RV follows some ancient versions in reading 'delight in'. 27 Deep pit . . . narrow well; the victim is suddenly trapped, and escape is difficult. 34 Mast; the actual word is obscure, but the picture of the nauseated toper could hardly be more vivid.

24:3–22 Studies in wisdom and folly

The acquisition of wisdom and knowledge is compared to the building and furnishing of a house (vv. 3, 4). The relation between wisdom and strength is now sketched out (vv. 5–7; cf. 11:14; 20:18). Certain situations show up the fool's incompetence: he cannot speak 'in the gate', the centre for business and legal transactions (v. 7). The calculating schemer and the scoffer who cynically devises folly will be repudiated by public opinion (vv. 8, 9).

Strenuous responsibilities, under which it would be contemptible to surrender, lie at the door of the man who would be wise (v. 10): to stand up for those in danger of death—whether by injustice, oppression by the powerful, or at the hands of a lawless society such as is described in 1:10ff. If this duty is neglected, God, the vindicator of the helpless, will know (vv. 11, 12).

Wisdom has its sweets both now and hereafter (vv. 13, 14): it is not worth the trouble to plunder the righteous, for though he may fall seven times (sc. into calamity, not into sin), he always gets up again, while a single disaster is sufficient to overwhelm the wicked (vv. 15, 16). Even so, one must never gloat at the fall of an enemy: in such a case, God's wrath, ever active, may turn from the fallen enemy to those who indulge in such misplaced delight (vv. 17, 18; cf. Is. 10:5–11).

After another assurance that the wicked are essentially unenviable (vv. 19, 20), comes a warning of the danger of provoking the wrath of God, or that of the king, His earthly representative (vv. 21, 22).

5 A wise man is mightier than a strong man. RSV follows LXX; certainly a sharper utterance than 'A wise man is strong' (lit. 'is in strength'), cf. RV. 11 Stumbling to the slaughter; G. R. Driver has attractively translated, from another root, 'at the point of slaughter'. 21 Note the use made of this proverb in 1 Pet. 2:17 in context. And do not disobey either of them; RSV follows LXX, which makes a better connection with v. 22 (them both). But if D. Winton Thomas is correct in rendering the word translated either of them by 'those of exalted rank', the Hebrew text may have a very similar force. The normal translation of the Hebrew text, 'do not associate with those who change', is difficult: the verb is intransitive, and can hardly yield the sense 'revolutionaries', and the connection of thought with v. 22 is less clear.

24:23–34 SAYINGS OF THE WISE: ANOTHER COLLECTION

The heading (v. 23a) indicates a new collection of proverbs has begun.

Favouritism in judgment, with its accompanying recognition and justification of wickedness, is abominable: to paint wickedness for what it is wins gratitude (vv. 23b–26). Counting the cost and preparing the materials is a necessary preliminary to any enterprise (v. 27). Baseless accusations and spiteful litigation are alike to be avoided (vv. 28, 29). The picture of the sluggard asleep, his vineyard a wilderness, repeats the words of 6:6–11 with a new and ominous note.

26 Kisses the lips seems a little odd in the context. If the word translated kisses can bear a sense which it can in post-biblical Hebrew, the rendering could be something like 'He who equips his lips (sc. with wisdom) gives a right answer'. 27 The application should not be limited to marriage; early marriage was in any case common among the Hebrews. For the sense cf. 1 Ki. 6:7; Lk. 14:28.

25:1 – 29:27 THE SECOND BOOK OF SOLOMON

For the title, see the Introduction, p. 548.

25:2–28 Instructive comparisons

God and the king; contentious litigation and personal relations; fitting speech, fitting speaker; a self-endowed reputation for generosity; quiet importunity; too much sweet stuff; outstaying one's welcome; the broken reed; offensive merriment; doing good to enemies; the analogy of slander; a nagging wife; good news from abroad; on compromise; too much honey; self-control.

2 The ways of God are inscrutable, and this reflects His glory. The king, on the other hand, has a duty to 'get to the bottom of a thing'—that is his glory. 6, 7 Cf. Lk. 14:8–11. Note that the last line of v. 7 properly belongs to v. 8, as in RSV. 8–10 Cf. Mt. 5:25, 26. 11 Apples . . . setting; the precise nature of the fruit and the 'setting' is unknown. 'The whole simile is of uncertain interpretation, but at least its components . . . carry associations of attractiveness, value and craftsmanship' (Kidner). 15 Cf. Lk. 18:1–8. 20 Vinegar on a wound; RSV follows LXX, probably correctly. Our Hebrew text has 'vinegar on soda'. 21 Cf. Mt. 5:44; Rom. 12:20. 27 An obscure verse. RSV has reconstructed the text of the second line eclectically; and AV's 'so for men to search their own glory is not glory' has arbitrarily inserted a negative. D. Winton Thomas, with a slighter emendation than RSV, translates 'and he who despises honour is honoured'.

26:1–12 A book of fools

Honour does not fit fools; the causeless curse; how to handle fools; do you answer a fool?; the danger of employing fools; the fool as pseudo-philosopher; the fool as recidivist; self-esteem the height of folly.

2 The curse that is unjustified never does anyone any harm. This is the only verse in this section which does not explicitly refer to the fool (kᵉsîl; see on 1:22). It is a refutation of the superstition (held by the fools in question?) that the righteous could be hurt by the malicious curse. 4, 5 The apparent contradiction here caused trouble to the Rabbis, who were driven to conclude that 'one refers to the things of the Law and the other to worldly affairs' (cf. Tractate Shabbath 30b). It is more likely however that the difference is simply between profitless arguing with a fool at his own level and occasionally, lest he think that he cannot be answered, meeting his prating with wisdom.

8 Who binds the stone in the sling; i.e. ties it in so that it cannot come out. To promote and give permanence to a fool is just as futile a proceeding. 10 RSV has made the best of a bad job in translating a very obscure, and probably damaged, text. 11 Cf. 2 Pet. 2:22. 12 But after all has been said of the fool, he has more hope of redemption than the man who is blinded by self-conceit (cf. Rom. 1:22).

26:13–16 A book of sluggards

Excuses for inactivity; the slumbering sluggard; the last point of laziness; the wisdom of the sluggard.

26:17–28 A book of scoundrels

The busybody; the practical joker; the stoker up of fiery quarrels; the purveyor of exquisite whispers; the hypocrite; the liar and flatterer.

23 Glaze. This conjectural rendering of RSV (cf. AV 'silver dross') is based on a parallel from Ugaritic, and makes good sense. The hypocrite appears smooth, polished, bright: but this conceals an interior of very different appearance. 26, 27 These verses have particular reference to the plausible rogue of the preceding verses.

27:1–27 Remarks on human relations

Boasting of the morrow; self-praise is no praise; the fool's provocation; the ugly dynamic of jealousy; on frankness; possession and desire; the unhappy wanderer; on friendship; the pupil the teacher's testimonial; prudence; the surety; horrid heartiness; the nagging wife; character and intellect developed by human relations; rewards; the mirror of the mind; insatiable desire; the testing nature of praise; the fool inseparable from his folly; the pastoral life.

1 Cf. Jas. 4:13–16. 3 Provocation; or, with a different sense, 'wrath', as in AV. 5 Hidden love; i.e. that which does not show itself in administering necessary reproof. 7 A general statement about possessions. To have them does not satisfy; not to have them may cause agonies of envy. 9 But the soul is torn by trouble. RSV follows LXX. AV's 'so doth the sweetness of a man's friend by hearty counsel' is more pungent, and fits the first line better; but the Hebrew is obscure. 18 Cf. Mt. 25:21. 19 As the water gives a true reflection of a face, so the hearts of men essentially correspond with each other. 20 Sheol and Abaddon; see on 15:11. 21 A man's reaction to praise is a severe test of his character; or, perhaps, a man is shown up by the things which he praises. 23–27 The purpose of this short treatise on the pastoral life is no doubt to encourage this industry, the real backbone of Israel's prosperity, and to discourage the corrupting influences of other, superficially more attractive, ways of making money.

28:1–28 Pure religion

Conscience makes cowards—or brave men; national stability; mean oppression; the law as man's protection; only the righteous understand justice; honest poverty; a father's pride and shame; the usurer; abominable piety; the fate of the corrupter; the wealthy man's false confidence; response to triumph; repentance; the happiness of fearing God; unworthy rulers; blood-guilt; the safety of integrity; the fruit of industry; how not to get rich quickly; the corruptible judge; frankness; the unnatural son; trust rather than greed; walking in wisdom; giving and withholding; a people's bane.

2 This saying would be particularly apposite when Hezekiah's men copied it out, for the northern kingdom of Israel had tottered to its ruin after a series of coups and changes of dynasty. 3 A poor man; LXX has 'a wicked man', but the text, with its reference to humanity's universal capacity for oppression, makes good sense. The hard-hit landlord or official endeavours to secure his own income in bad times by tightening the screw on those poorer than himself; the result is general starvation. 8 The extortioner and usurer (a forbidden practice in Israel; cf. Lv. 25:36f.) will lose his gains to a more just man. 13 Cf. 1 Jn. 1:8f. 17 To be taken alongside 24:11f. 18 Into a pit: RSV emends the Hebrew, which has 'in one'. If correct, this may mean 'at one blow, at once' (cf. AV, RV).

21 For a piece of bread; i.e. a man will betray justice for the smallest bribe. 24 Doubtless attempts by children to obtain their parents' property are in mind. Though foreign to the whole spirit of the Mosaic law, there was no specific legislation against it, so a man might say That is no transgression. Cf. Mk. 7:10–13.

29:1–27 God and society

The sudden end of obduracy; what makes a happy people; a prodigal son; justice the good ruler's hallmark; flattery; the snared path; the rights of the poor; inflammatory scoffers; the blusterer; innocence the target of the violent; self-restraint; encouraging deceit; the common origin of men; justice for the poor; correction; the wicked in authority; revelation a people's guide; hastiness; pride and humility, fear of man, trust in God; favours from rulers, justice from God; what good and bad men abominate.

2 Rejoice; RSV has slightly emended the text, which has 'increase'. 3 Cf. Lk. 15:13, 30. 6 Sings and rejoices; a more forceful parallel is given in one MS, 'runs and rejoices'. 10 RSV has emended the text to avoid the suggestion that 'the upright' seek the life of the blameless. But RV's 'And as for the upright, they (sc. the bloodthirsty) seek his life' is tenable. 13 Cf. 22:2, and, for the meaning, Ps. 13:3; Mt. 5:45. 15 Solomon might recall that Adonijah had been such a child (1 Ki. 1:5, 6).

18 Prophecy; the normal word for the prophetic revelation (ḥāzôn; cf. Is. 1:1; Je. 14:14). Cast off restraint; the same word is used in Ex. 32:25 and the whole affair of the golden calf is an historical illustration of this verse. Law; the revealed will of God (note this is parallel with prophecy). The law, the prophets and the wisdom literature meet in this verse. Where the revealed will of God, as expressed in His word, is not kept constantly in view, His people break loose from their allegiance. This is another word which Hezekiah may well have taken to heart. 21 His heir. We do not really know the significance of the word so translated (cf. mg.), and so the verse is obscure. 23 Cf. Mt. 5:3; Lk. 14:11. 24 The curse; i.e. the judge's adjuration that any who have knowledge of the crime should give evidence.

30:1–33 THE WORDS OF AGUR

30:1–4 The knowledge of God

Agur longs after the knowledge of God and confesses his utter ignorance, shared with the rest of mankind. He has reflected on the immensity of the natural forces, and stood amazed at the One behind them. There may be a touch of sarcasm in the opening words; he was confronted by those who professed to know all about God and His dealings.

1 We do not know who Agur son of Jakeh was, or where he flourished. If RSV is right in reading of Massa, he was an Ishmaelite; but RV's 'the oracle' is quite tenable. But in any case Agur may have been, like Job and Balaam, a non-Israelite with knowledge of the true God. Ithiel . . . Ucal. AV, RSV take these as proper names, doubtless Agur's disciples. But it is possible, by using different vowel points, to gain 'I have wearied myself, O God, and am consumed' (cf. RV mg.).

4 Enoch and Elijah ascended; none had been known to return (cf. Jn. 3:13). His son's name; i.e. that of the hypothetical person who has scaled the heights to look on God and precisely measured His creation. Who is he—or (if he lived some time ago) where are the descendants of such a person?

30:5, 6 The word of God

God's revelation must not be mixed with human speculation, which may prove to be utterly wrong. Cf. Ps. 18:30.

30:7–9 A prayer

The wise man prays to be preserved from the temptations of riches and poverty alike.

30:10 A detached aphorism

For the fullest application, see Rom. 14:4.

30:11–14 Four studies in arrogance

30:15, 16 Insatiable things

15 Leech; a notoriously obscure allusion. If it is the correct translation, the reference may be to blood-sucking creatures, themselves reared on blood, characterized by their insatiability (they cry has been supplied by RSV: perhaps Give, give are the creatures' names). But the Palestinian haemopis does not attack man.

30:17 The turbulent son

Another detached aphorism. Cf. Dt. 21:18–21. The implication is that the corpse will lie unburied for the birds to feed on.

30:18–20 Four wonderful things

The wonder is often supposed to be in their leaving no trace behind them. If this is so, the examples—the serpent particularly—seem curiously chosen. More likely the wonder is 'the easy mastery, by the appropriate agent, of elements as difficult to negotiate as air, rock, sea—and a young woman' (Kidner). 20 The way of an adulteress is also wonderful, but a parody of the last. She covers up her sin and calmly says she has done nothing wrong.

30:21–23 Four intolerable things

There are two examples from each sex. 22 Filled with food; i.e. rich and prosperous.

30:24–28 Four little things and wise

25 The ants do what the sluggard will not do (cf. 6:6). 27 The locusts go in ordered ranks, without jostling one another (cf. Joel 2:8).

30:29–31 Four stately things

31 There are some obscurities in this list: the rendering cock is based on LXX and other old versions; several other guesses have been made. The king in the last example is certain, but striding before his people is less so.

30:32, 33 A closing admonition

32 Put your hand on your mouth: as a silent admission of blame.

31:1–9 THE SAYINGS OF LEMUEL

See Introduction, p. 549. 1 There is the same ambiguity about Massa as in the case of Agur (see on 30:1). King Lemuel provides a short treatise on the duties of kingship, learned from his mother. Is it possible that Lemuel was an Ishmaelite whose mother came from Israel?

2 Lemuel is the son of his mother's vows (i.e. granted in response to her vows, cf. 1 Sa. 1:11). He is urged, and emphatically, to avoid dissipation, either with women or wine (vv. 3, 4), which takes a ruler's mind off his duties, and is thus a cause of injustice (v. 5). Drink is the anodyne of the hopeless—there is no excuse for it in those who are not in this condition (vv. 6, 7). His task is to defend those who cannot speak for themselves (v. 8) and stand out uncompromisingly for justice (v. 9).

31:10–31 APPENDIX: THE PERFECT WIFE

This is a beautiful acrostic poem, the first verse beginning with the first letter of the Hebrew alphabet and each of the remaining twenty-one letters coming in turn. There is no reason to attribute it to Lemuel; it is an anonymous appendix to the whole book, exalting, as Proverbs does elsewhere, the honour and dignity of womanhood, and the importance of a mother's teaching. Here also is a remarkable picture of woman in Israelite society: trusted implicitly by her husband and amply rewarding that trust; hard-working and shrewd, with a liberty of choice and action in a wide range of affairs (v. 16), which she directs to the family good, at the same time remaining generous and kind-hearted (v. 20) and a wise and faithful teacher (v. 26). By contrast the nauseous attractions of 'the loose woman' lose all their glitter. Our book closes with the ringing praise (v. 29) accorded to the perfect wife by the husband and children whose sustenance, comfort, reputation (v. 23) and knowledge of God (v. 26) have all been enhanced by her.

21 Scarlet; i.e. the best cloth. But the consonants could mean 'double' (thickness; cf. AV), which would explain the reference to snow. 26 Kindness (Heb. ḥeseḏ, 'covenant love') is the theme of a good mother's teaching.

Ecclesiastes

STYLE

Ecclesiastes is in many respects an enigmatic book. Disjointed in construction, obscure in vocabulary, and often cryptic in style, it baffles the understanding of the reader. It contains a number of words which are not found in the rest of the OT and whose meaning it is hard to determine with precision. It makes allusion to incidents, customs and sayings which would be easily understood by its original readers but to which we have no clue. It contains apparent inconsistencies which make it difficult to ascertain what the author's own view is. These contrasts have led some to suppose that an original book has been worked over and 'bowdlerized' by several hands. The way in which the writer has put together his material suggests that it was not meant to have any connected sequence of thought running through it. The book may be a collection of fragments or jottings, like Pascal's Pensées, with which it has often been compared.

In spite of all its difficulties and obscurities, however, the book exercises a powerful fascination. It is at once apparent to the discerning reader that there is a penetrating observation and criticism of the human scene. The profundity of such of the writer's observations as we can immediately comprehend lures us on to plumb his deeper insights, as once Socrates, delighted with the wisdom of Heraclitus speaking clearly, was led to seek a deeper wisdom in his obscurities.

INTERPRETATION

The crucial problem presented by the book is that of its place within the Canon of Scripture. There were some among the Jews who disputed its right to be included among the sacred books from the beginning, and its presence among them has been a source of bewilderment to many Christians since. Those who think that the prevailing tone of the book is one of disillusionment and despair, tempered only by a modified Epicureanism, must indeed find it hard to see how it can be reckoned among those which are able to make us wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus.

Some recent studies of the book, however, have shown this popular understanding of it to be superficial, and have led to a truer appreciation of the peculiar standpoint of the writer. This is probably indicated by his chosen name, Qoheleth (Qōheleṯ) 'the Preacher' (Ecclesiastes is the Greek equivalent of this). The word is connected with qāhāl, the public assembly, and it suggests the kind of wisdom delivered by the speaker to those in the outer court, as distinguished from the 'hidden wisdom' which is known only to those who have been admitted to the mystery of God (1 Cor. 2:7). Qoheleth writes from concealed premises, and his book is in reality a major work of apologetic or 'eristic' theology. Its apparent worldliness is dictated by its aim: Qoheleth is addressing the general public whose view is bounded by the horizons of this world; he meets them on their own ground, and proceeds to convict them of its inherent vanity. This is further borne out by his characteristic expression 'under the sun', by which he describes what the NT calls 'the world' (Gk. kosmos). His book is in fact a critique of secularism and of secularized religion. For secularism need not be irreligious, and the religion of the Jews tended to be unduly secular and to forget the transcendence of God (5:2). As such, it has an abiding message, and not least for our own time when secularism dominates the minds of men as perhaps never before in history, and religion has gone far to conform and seeks to commend itself as a means of the amelioration of life 'under the sun'. The book of Ecclesiastes discharges an indispensable function within the Canon of Scripture by providing the corrective against all attempts to reduce religion to a mere tool of secularism.

The fatal weakness of secularist utopianism is, as has been said, that it takes insufficient account of the twin facts of evil and death. The eyes of Ecclesiastes are fully open to the vanity and the corruption to which the creation is subject (Rom. 8:20ff.), and the whole book has been aptly described as an exposition of the curse of the Fall (Gn. 3:17–19). The writer sees how these two facts bracket the whole of life under the sun with a negative sign and defy all attempts to force it to yield either sense or satisfaction by itself.

But though the tone of the book is preponderantly negative, it is a mistake to brand Ecclesiastes as a sceptic or an apostle of despair. The melancholy refrain, 'Vanity of vanities, all is vanity', is not his verdict upon life in general, but only upon the misguided human endeavour to treat the created world as an end in itself. He knows all the time that it has a positive significance; how indeed could he take it upon himself to utter such destructive criticism if he did not know? This secret he keeps in the background, except for a hint here and there, because his immediate concern is to dispel all false and illusory hopes which possess the minds of men and of which they must be purged before they can be brought to the hope which is sure and steadfast and which 'enters into the inner shrine behind the curtain' (Heb. 6:19). 'In order that men may be able to find the true happiness, he destroys with merciless blows the false happiness which they continually seek in the world and which yields them only unhappiness' (G. Kuhn, Erklärung des Buches Koheleth, 1926). But he knows that the world can yield happiness and enjoyment, as witness his frequent exhortations to seek it (2:24; 3:12, 22; 5:18; 9:7; 11:9), and that we can find in the world a life-work which is worth while (3:12f.; 9:10); otherwise the counsels he offers for life and conduct in this world would be meaningless.

The significance of the world is that it can become a medium for the revelation of God's goodness, wisdom and righteousness. It is only when man treats it as an end in itself, and makes it his chief end to gain the world, that it turns to vanity. But there is a way in which man can accept life under the sun, with its gifts and withdrawals, its apparent irrationalities and injustices, and that is 'from the hand of God' (2:24; 5:18–20). Plainly this is not scepticism or pessimism; it is faith. As it has been expressed by a modern writer, in whom something of the spirit of Ecclesiastes lives again, faith has always protested that 'all things would be absurd if their meaning were exhausted in their function and place in the phenomenal world, if by their essence they did not reach into a world beyond this'; and it has always 'trusted the inward vision, which discerned behind nature a something more divine than nature, in recessu divinius aliquid' (W. Macneile Dixon, The Human Situation, 1937, pp. 40f.). Ecclesiastes is a sceptic only in so far as he rejects the pretension of human wisdom to elucidate the work of God (3:11; 8:17). He knows that we walk by faith, not by sight; and he exhibits the necessary humility or reserve of faith in face of the transcendent wisdom of God, of whose eternal providence he is firmly assured (3:14).

The characteristic complexity of his thought with its apparent contradictions or its 'counterpoint' (W. Vischer, Der Prediger Salomo, 1926) shows clearly in his utterances on death. On the one hand he speaks of death as the final reduction of life under the sun to nothingness (3:19f.; 9:4–6; 11:8). But to say that he regards death as final extinction is to fail to do justice to another strain in his thought. He repeatedly affirms the certainty of divine judgment (3:17; 11:9; 12:14), and he remains assured, in spite of all the injustices of life under the sun, that 'it will be well with those who fear God' (8:12). His position resembles that of Ps. 49. Like the psalmist he is opposed to any specious immortality erected upon premises derived from life under the sun. The psalmist's verdict, 'Man abideth not in honour: he is like the beasts that perish' (Ps. 49:12, RV), is echoed in Ec. 3:18: 'I said in my heart with regard to the sons of men that God is testing them to show them that they are but beasts.' But over against this the psalmist sets 'the great "But God" ' (Ps. 49:15; cf. Eph. 2:4), and in the light of it he modifies his first conclusion: 'Man that is in honour and understandeth not is like the beasts that perish' (Ps. 49:20, RV). The significant phrase in Ecclesiastes, 'they are but beasts', surely indicates that he knew of this understanding which alone gives man pre-eminence above a beast (3:19). At all events, his resolute denial of all human possibilities at least clears the way for the new possibilities of God, and entitles us to speak of Ecclesiastes as standing before the threshold of the resurrection.

OUTLINE OF CONTENTS

As has been pointed out above, the book defies any logical analysis, and therefore no Outline of Contents is presented. The paragraphs, into which the book divides itself, have been indicated by the main headings.

COMMENTARY

1:1–11 Introduction

1:1 The title. The Preacher. For the probable meaning of this term see Introduction. The author does not really claim to be Solomon but places his words in Solomon's mouth. We may compare the practice of ascribing written works to famous historical personages which was a familiar literary device in antiquity. It was intended to indicate the type, or genus, of literature to which a work belonged. It was not intended to deceive anyone, and none of its original readers would in fact have been deceived.

1:2 The text of the discourse. All is vanity. 'All' for those he addressed, but not for himself; for how could Ecclesiastes pronounce all to be vanity, unless he knew of some validity, some sure ground to which his spirit clung? His object is not to counsel despair, but to refute secularism on its own ground.

1:3–11 Existence a vicious circle. Ecclesiastes goes direct to the heart of the matter without preliminary skirmishing. The world assesses life in terms of profit and loss. But what profit can a man win that he must not finally lose? 'Fool!

This night your soul is required of you; and the things you have prepared, whose will they be?' (Lk. 12:20). The pursuit of wealth stands confuted by man's mortality, as the world itself knows well; for its own poets and philosophers have told it often enough. But men endeavour to screen themselves from the icy wind of mortality by the thought of their posterity and the continuing race. 'Their inward thought is, that their houses shall continue for ever, and their dwelling places to all generations; they call their lands after their own names' (Ps. 49:11, RV). They seek a pseudo-immortality in the fancied perpetuity of their works, or in 'minds made better by their presence', or in 'leaving footprints on the sands of time', or in the idea of 'progress'. But there is nothing to support this in the course of nature, which is circular, as Ecclesiastes points out (vv. 5–7), or in the course of history, which endlessly repeats itself (vv. 9, 10). Progress is ever accompanied by regress. It is only the actors and the scenery that change; the pattern of history remains the same, 'little more than the register of the crimes, follies and misfortunes of mankind'.

1:12 – 2:23 The failure of all attempts to give meaning to existence

1:12–18 The philosophical attempt. Man cannot rest content with a meaningless existence. There is within him an irresistible urge to find rhyme or reason in it; for he is a 'thinking reed' (Pascal). God has implanted in man this unquenchable longing for order and system. Yet it only adds to man's torment; for the jig-saw puzzle of life cannot be completed; some of the parts are missing (v. 15). The attempt to frame a complete philosophic system can be achieved only by doing violence to reality, by making straight 'what is crooked'. The last word of human wisdom, as some of the wisest have realized, is to confess that we know nothing, that the key to the final mystery eludes our grasp. Such is the wisdom of the Tao Te Ching:

Thirty spokes together make one wheel;
And they fit into 'nothing' at the centre:
Herein lies the usefulness of a carriage.
The clay is moulded to make a pot;
And the clay fits round 'nothing':
Herein lies the usefulness of the pot . . .
Thus it is that, while it must be taken to be advantageous to have something there,
It must also be taken as useful to have 'nothing' there.

The wisdom which ends in this 'hole at the centre' must needs be vexation of spirit, until it finds 'the wisdom from above' (Jas. 3:17), 'a secret and hidden wisdom of God, which God decreed before the ages for our glorification' (1 Cor. 2:7).

2:1, 2 The sensual attempt. Why bother your head trying to puzzle out the meaning of existence? Have 'a good time', enjoy the pleasures life affords. Listen to Mephistopheles:

Grau, teurer Freund, ist alle Theorie
Und grün des Lebens goldner Baum.

But no need to waste words on the madness of this experiment; for it quickly belies its promise.

Pleasures are like poppies spread,
You seize the flower, its bloom is shed.

The pleasure-addict cannot escape the 'morning after' and the revulsion of satiety.

2:3–23 The cultural attempt. The failure of the quest for wisdom and the quest for pleasure suggests a compromise, a middle way which avoids one-sided extremes and aims at a rich, varied and balanced life. This is culture. The cultured man is he who lays hold on all the riches of life, pleasure, wisdom and action, and seeks to blend them into one harmonious whole. He soon learns the 'paradox of hedonism' and finds his pleasure, not in sensuality, but in the full exercise of his faculties of mind and will (v. 10). But he cannot finally escape the quiet hour of reflection and self-questioning which comes after the day's labour is done; and then 'the native hue of resolution is sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought'. Has he attained the true prize of life? Is his reward commensurate with the labour expended? It is certain that wisdom is relatively superior to folly; for the wise man makes a better job of life than the fool. But this relative is cancelled out by the absolute of death, a fact which seriously challenges the worth of wisdom. There is a paradox about wisdom: wisdom means looking forward. While the fool, like the grasshopper, lives for the moment, the wise man, like the ant, dips into the future; he takes his bearings from tomorrow, and endeavours to plot his course accordingly (v. 14). Yet this wisdom is most hazardous; for it is not in our power to foresee, still less to control, the future. 'You do not know what a day may bring forth' (Pr. 27:1). And the wisest plans may be confounded:

The best laid schemes o' mice an' men
Gang aft agley.

Note. 12 What can the man do . . . ? This would appear to have been a proverbial saying, and its meaning can only be guessed at. It has been suggested that the sentence has been misplaced.

2:24 – 3:15 The wisdom of creation

Is there any way out of the dilemma in which we find ourselves placed as between wisdom and folly? Only by a new wisdom, a wisdom which has a different standpoint and orientation; not the wisdom of this world, nor of the princes of this world (nor, we may add, of the proletariat of this world), but the wisdom of God in a mystery (cf. 1 Cor. 2:7). The first axiom of this wisdom is that the creation and its bounty are to be enjoyed. Any wisdom which denies this in the interest of its own man-centred system is presumption. True wisdom proceeds from the given fact of our creatureliness in the midst of creation. Here we are and 'the world is so full of a number of things' to be enjoyed. This is the decree and the gift of God (2:26).

But it is not an easy wisdom; for it must forswear system. A systematic world-view, a Weltanschauung, would be possible only if we occupied the centre from which we could survey the whole and see it in its true perspectives. But that is the position of the Creator, not of the creatures. From our creaturely position under the sun we see, as it were, the reverse of the tapestry with many confused lines and loose threads. To seek to unravel it from our standpoint is to become involved in an endless labyrinth. This also is vanity and vexation of spirit.

The beginning of our wisdom is the fear of the Lord (cf. Ps. 111:10; Pr. 1:7), and one element of it is the recognition of the divine election in the difference of the times and seasons. Theoretically all times are equal, but this is true only when they are emptied of their contents. We have no experience of empty time. Every time comes to us charged with its own particular challenge and opportunity; and the wisdom of life is to interpret the time (cf. Lk. 12:56), the kairos (cf. Rom. 13:11), the decisive moment (cf. Ec. 8:5, 6), the moment on which 'the accent of eternity falls'. 'There is a tide in the affairs of men.'

This incalculable, unrationalizable feature of history and experience is a sore perplexity to man. For man is not merely a creature of time; there is within him that which transcends time; 'Man has Forever'. He seeks to stand back from the time-process and to discern the plan and pattern of the whole. But he is too deeply immersed in it to succeed; the end and the beginning elude him. The tension between Today and Forever in the life of man cannot be completely resolved. Yet man can find Forever in Today by gratefully accepting the gifts of God and doing His commandments.

3:16 – 4:3 The righteousness of God

The moralistic interpretation of life breaks down on the hard fact of human wickedness. The hankering after a moral order is deeply rooted in the heart of man, but it makes him prone to two common delusions. One is the pathetic belief, widely entertained in our time, that order is secured by organization. Even so shrewd an observer as Lenin succumbed to this belief. But the wickedness which makes organization necessary does not stop short at the portals of organization. The egoism which taints individuals taints governments not less, but rather more; for organization magnifies power (4:1), and power is amoral. Then, quis custodiet ipsos custodes? (who will take care of the caretakers?). The other attempted solution is the theory of a moral government of history: 'The mills of God grind slowly . . .' This is a more respectable notion, perhaps; yet, in spite of its immense popularity, it yields no real satisfaction to the moral demand. For even if it were true, it requires for its display a canvas so much larger than the brief span between the cradle and the grave. What comfort is the thought that 'the mills of God grind slowly' to those whose life is altogether ground between the upper and the nether millstones?

O dreadful thought if all our sires and we
Are but foundations of a race to be.

A moral view of life, resolutely pursued, leads to the conclusion that men are beasts. 'Man cannot abide in his pomp, he is like the beasts that perish' (Ps. 49:20). But what about his 'immortality'? 'Who knows whether the spirit of man goes upward?' (Ec. 3:21). What is there in man by himself to suggest that his destiny is so very different from that of the beast? 'That the soul of man is in its own nature Eternall, and a living Creature independent of the body; or that any meer man is Immortall, otherwise than by the Resurrection in the last day (except Enos and Elias) is a doctrine not apparent in Scripture' (Hobbes, Leviathan, xxxviii).

God is the Judge. But the righteousness of God is not subject to our judgment. As the righteousness of God, it belongs to His time, though it may be hidden from ours. He who does not understand this has no choice but to esteem death better than life.

4:4–16 The vanity of life

4:4–6 Of industry, idleness and contentment. What is the motive that inspires human industry and enterprise? It is the desire to do a little more than survive, to outstrip one's rivals, to excel in the competitive struggle. But the attainment of this desire does not yield the satisfaction it promises; for it excites the envy of others, and anxiety lest they should overtake him besets the leader in the race. Without this desire to excel, man would not be man. Yet the irony of it is that it is often the least enterprising, the fool (v. 5), the 'finite clods untroubled by a spark', who obtain the most satisfaction. There must be some happy mean between these extremes.

Note. 5 Eats his own flesh. Eats what meat he has without coveting that of others. It is not a reference to the autophagous tendency of idleness, as the English words suggest; this hardly suits the context.

4:7–12 Of solitude and society. Can the motive of profit in human enterprise be balanced by that of benefit to society? Can it be urged that 'unrestricted private enterprise' is conducive to the common good? It is difficult to maintain this when it is observed how strongly the profit motive operates in those who have no society and do not give twopence for it. It is doubtful, indeed, whether one who has no ties of family can have any real feeling for society. On the other hand, where the sense of solidarity is strong, the satisfactions it yields are of a different sort.

4:13–16 Of popularity. Of all the glittering prizes life holds out, surely the vainest is popularity. The promise of youth is always preferred to the petrifaction of age (as witness the studied illusion of perennial youth in contemporary fashion). But youth inevitably becomes age, and then it must endure the pain of seeing the fickle fancy of the mob turn elsewhere.

This passage is highly cryptic, and it is impossible to interpret it with assurance. It seems to contain an allusion to some historical episode with which its contemporary readers would be familiar: a decrepit old monarch succeeded by a brilliant youth who romantically issued from prison amid universal enthusiasm but who rapidly fell into disfavour.

5:1–9 The vanity of worship and service

5:1–7 Wisdom and folly in the worship of God. Surveying the vanity of all things under the sun, Ecclesiastes turns his critical eye upon religion; for secularized man is by no means averse to religion; only, his is a religion which is secularized and humanized. This is the great pitfall of religion, against which warning is given. For there is an inveterate tendency in men to seek to 'make use of God' (Deo uti, Luther), to subject God to themselves and their own concerns, to treat Him as an ally, an anodyne or an insurance agency. Characteristic of this man-centred religion is its verbosity; its anxiety to say its say is reflected in a never-ending stream of reports, statements, pronouncements, pamphlets, etc. But it loses the ear for the word of God. The word of God is not the echo of our words. It is His own word, His word of judgment and of grace, and before it we must be silent and listen. In our approach to God it is necessary to remember 'the otherness of God', and respect 'the infinite qualitative difference between God and man' (Kierkegaard).

Note. 6 The messenger; the priest or minister. Why should God be angry . . . ? It is pre-eminently against human infidelity that the wrath of God is revealed.

5:8, 9 Of the civil magistrate. The fear of God is coupled (naturally) with respect for authority in the state. Cf. 1 Pet. 2:17. For there is no power but of God: the powers that be are ordained of God. Not that the ruling powers are beyond reproach. On the contrary, there is corruption at every stage of the political hierarchy. Even the highest in the land is not free from sin. Thus the existence of injustice and oppression is not to be marvelled at; for the remedy for this lies not in any human authority. Yet there is a relatively best form of government; and Ecclesiastes expresses his preference for a patriarchal monarchy, where the king is intimately acquainted with the concerns of his (agricultural) subjects—a judgment which is no doubt sound in its emphasis on agriculture and its implied rejection of bureaucracy, but difficult of application to large, industrialized states.

Notes. 8 Watched by a higher. The passage is ambiguous, perhaps intentionally. Looking up the ladder of authority we may, according to our vision, see only 'the powers that be', or we may see above them Him who will 'do justice to the fatherless and the oppressed, so that man who is of the earth may strike terror no more' (Ps. 10:18). 9 has been variously translated. The best rendering would seem to be: 'Profitable for a land in general is a king devoted to the tilled field.'

5:10 – 6:12 The vanity of riches and human destiny

5:10 – 6:9 Of wealth and acquisitiveness. The fancied satisfaction of mammonism, which conceives of man's life as consisting in the abundance of the things which he possesses and identifies his state with his estate, is a mirage which continually recedes; for the lust of acquisitiveness, once unleashed, becomes insatiable, and the appetite grows with eating. Capitalism can thrive only on an expanding market, and the circle of supply and demand, however expanded, remains a circle; it cannot be squared. Further, acquisitiveness brings anxiety; for wealth is uncertain (cf. 1 Tim. 6:17), the bubble of prosperity bursts, and slump follows boom. Finally, the rich man dies, and what good is all his wealth to him then?

Are we then to commend ascetic renunciation? By no means. The good things of the world are God's gifts to be enjoyed by us with thankfulness and contentment. The key to enjoyment is to substitute grace for grab. 'For everything created by God is good, and nothing is to be rejected if it is received with thanksgiving' (1 Tim. 4:4). Experience shows that the art of enjoyment usually comes readiest to those least cumbered with worldly goods, while those who possess 'all the advantages' may miss it.

Notes. 5:20 He will not much remember . . . He who is in correspondence with God, he whose chief end it is to glorify God and enjoy Him, can live in the present and enjoy the gifts of God today, without anxious thoughts for the morrow. Cf. Mt. 6:33, 34. 6:3 And also has no burial. It has been suggested that this clause has been misplaced and that it belongs to v. 5; it would certainly seem the more likely end of an untimely birth than of one who begot a hundred children, where it is oddly inappropriate.

6:10–12 Of human destiny. The nature and destiny of man are determined by One mightier than him, and he cannot contend with his Maker or add to his stature one cubit. All his endeavours to find enduring substance in this transitory life issue in vanity, and leave him facing the final question.

7:1–14 The wisdom of death

Ecclesiastes sets forth a wisdom of life which takes full account of the great negatives, adversity, sorrow and death. He who would live wisely must lay death to heart and integrate it with his view of life. The wisdom which would see 'life steadily and see it whole' must see death also; it 'exacts a full look at the worst'. The modern flight from death, shown by the avoidance of serious consideration of it in popular thought and even of all mention of it in polite conversation, as if death were a sleeping dog one could pass on tiptoe, is the index of a view of life to which death has no meaning save that of an irrational brute fact which rudely interrupts man's efforts and aspirations. Man's hopes today are bound up with a progressive postponement of death and the dream of its eventual elimination. If Ecclesiastes is able to look death fearlessly in the face, it can only be because he sees it, not as a simple negative, but as a 'horizon', a line marking 'the threshold of metaphysical possibilities' and pointing to a hidden dimension of life. The lessons which he recommends us to gather from the sterner disciplines of experience may be described as a kind of chessboard wisdom: instead of complaining bitterly that the board is all black, or sighing for 'the good old days' when it was all white, this wisdom consists in patient acceptance of its real condition as the ultimate fact which we can know, but which points beyond itself. It is a mistake to suppose that the fatalism of Omar is the only, or the only logical, inference to be drawn from the chessboard character of life.

Note. 11, 12 are difficult to understand in their present context and may have been displaced. Alternative positions suggested for them are after v. 14 and after v. 21.

7:15–29 The excellence and difficulty of wisdom

7:15–22 'Critique of practical reason'. The attempt to reduce the raw material of life to system by means of moral principles breaks on the anomalies of experience. The consistent application of morality plays havoc with life, which will not be forced into this Procrustean bed. There is need of humility and restraint in both the thought and the practice of morality. It must be remembered that all moralities are conditioned by man's finitude and tainted by his sin. We must be careful to avoid moral pride. 'Moral pride is the pretension of finite man that his highly conditioned virtue is the final righteousness and that his very relative moral standards are absolute. Moral pride thus makes virtue the very vehicle of sin' (Niebuhr, Human Nature, p. 212).

7:23–28 'Critique of pure reason'. The attempt to reduce the raw material of life to system by means of theoretical ideas breaks down likewise. The most penetrating wisdom cannot reach the final harmony in which the discords of existence are resolved; every attempt comes to grief on the problem of evil, 'das radikal Böse', in the human heart. Ecclesiastes finds the most obstinate manifestation of evil in the female of the species (v. 26); for him the wisdom of Socrates miscarries on the problem of his wife, Xanthippe.

7:29 The Fall. The conclusion, which is the utmost to which human wisdom can attain, is that man has fallen from the state in which God created him, and through his cleverness has brought about his own undoing. The irresolvable antinomies of life have their focal point in the fact that man is at variance with himself.

8:1–9 The powers that be

The logical inference from the universality of human corruption would be anarchy ('Jack's as good as his master'). But political wisdom is not a logical science, it is a psychological art. It is guided not by what is logically sound and consistent but by what is relatively opportune (v. 5). Thus an authoritarian order of society may be irrational and even evil (v. 9b); nevertheless, loyalty to it is preferable to insurrection. Cf. Rom. 13. This is hardly an acceptable doctrine nowadays; yet it is a profound challenge to those who identify change with progress. The idea of reform was no doubt strange to the mind of the writer, who construes criticism of authority as simple insurrection. But his reflections are no less applicable to it. The inability to see the outcome of any proposed change places the onus probandi upon those who advocate or instigate it. It is a fact that reforms which are designed to remove one evil often put others in its place; and long-term policies are called in question by the short term of human life. The real problem of life is urgent and cannot be postponed; for the time is limited. 'Now's the day, and now's the hour.' We know not if we shall see tomorrow—and 'what good is it to the primeval horse that one of its descendants wins the Derby?' (K. Heim).

Note. 9 To his hurt, i.e. to that of the ruled, not of the ruler.

8:10 The reversal of human judgments

The precise meaning of this very difficult verse cannot now be recovered. About a dozen different interpretations have been proposed. But if we accept the rendering of RV as approximately correct, the thought would seem to be the fallibility of popular judgments either as detected by the writer's own acuter eye or, more probably, as reversed by posterity.

8:11–17 The hidden righteousness of God

The mills of God grind slowly—so slowly that men may easily suppose they do not grind at all. The universe appears indifferent to moral distinctions, and Ecclesiastes is well aware of the difficulties of a too facile acceptance of the Jewish 'philosophy of history' and of attempts to discern divine judgments in the course of events (v. 14). Nevertheless he knows of the certainty of judgment, even though it be not manifest in the things that are seen and temporal, and for this cause he faints not and can even laugh at despair (v. 15). Here he shows, more clearly perhaps than anywhere else in the book, that his own soul has an anchor within the veil.

9:1–10 More of the wisdom of death

Life is a course in which all must run together, all must take the same hurdles and the same hazards, and all come to the same end. There is no anticipation of the judgment, no discrimination in favour of those who 'run the way of God's commandments'; men can turn the race into a wild stampede with apparent impunity. Nevertheless there is a judgment; there are some who are in God's hand, whose works are accepted of Him, and who may devote themselves with a single heart to the task of the moment without anxious thought for the morrow. So long as the race is running there is hope for all, even for those who appear most hopeless; the knowledge that they must die may make the living wise; but for those who have passed the limit hope is gone; for them the day of grace is past, and 'the door is shut' (cf. Mt. 25:10).

9:11–18 Negative corroborations

The wisdom which looks for light beyond the horizon of death receives confirmation from the darkness and confusion of the scene on this side. So, from his scanning of the horizon, Ecclesiastes saw that under the sun the race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong (v. 11). So true it is that we walk by faith, not by sight. 'Faith is of things which do not appear. And so, that there may be room for faith, it is necessary that all things which are its objects should be hidden. They cannot, however, be more remotely hidden than under their contrary objects, feelings and experiences' (Luther, De servo arbitrio). What counts in the world's judgment is wealth and self-advertisement; genuine, unostentatious merit goes unrecognized, unrewarded. This Ecclesiastes describes ironically as the wisdom which he saw under the sun and it seemed great to him (v. 13). One sinner destroys much good (v. 18). This clause introduces the next series of reflections.

10:1–7 Of folly and wisdom

Wisdom is excellent, but it is at a disadvantage in comparison with folly, which produces disproportionately large effects. A little leaven of folly can vitiate a whole lump of wisdom, and a single fool can undo the work of many wise men. Further, folly is more immediately evident; it proclaims itself on the street. When folly manifests itself in high places, the course of wisdom is patience and conciliation. Least said is soonest mended. If it be argued that this would justify a policy of appeasement, Ecclesiastes would answer that the wise man is guided by time and judgment (cf. 8:15). There is a time to keep silence, and a time to speak (cf. 3:7). That folly does invade high places is proved by the familiar observation that fools are exalted to honour and dignity in the state, and true worth passes unrecognized.

Note. 6 The rich. Ecclesiastes probably means those of hereditary wealth, the aristocracy, as distinguished from the nouveaux riches.

10:8–11 Counting the cost

The general import of these gnomic utterances, which may have been current proverbs, would seem to be that no change can be effected without risk, and especially that anyone who interferes with established institutions is liable to get his fingers burned. Before embarking on any such enterprise it is well to count the cost and make sure that one has adequate skill and resources at his command (cf. Lk. 14:28ff.).

10:12–20 Words and deeds

10:12–15 The wise man and the fool. Ecclesiastes here touches on the notorious talkativeness of folly and the capacity for mischief that is inherent in it. Cf. Jas. 3:5, 6.

Note. 15 To know the way to the city would appear to have been a proverbial expression for practical wisdom or effective action. The fool can talk plenty, but he is incapable of action.

10:16–19 Slothfulness at court. Ill fares the land when Sybaritism prevails at court.

Note. 17 The son of free men (RV 'nobles'). Perhaps a double entendre, made possible by the Hebrew idiom which employs the periphrasis 'son of' to form a descriptive adjective: when the king's character and conduct are of a nobility consistent with his birth.

10:20 Reverence due to the king. This warning against seditious talk and 'dangerous thoughts' accords well with Ecclesiastes's attitude of detachment towards politics. It is not a counsel of acquiescence in injustice or oppression but rather a warning against incurring unnecessary risks. Where there is neither the will nor the power to mend matters, mere grumbling and disaffection are foolish.

11:1–6 Directions for charity

If some of the political counsels of the previous chapters have a somewhat conservative, quietistic, 'Lutheran' ring, Ecclesiastes's dialectic now takes a bold, venturesome, 'Calvinistic' turn, as if to show once more that the conduct of life cannot be based on a single principle, but the wise man has regard to 'time and judgment'. In commercial enterprise risks must be taken, and he who will not venture until he has an absolutely safe proposition will wait for ever (v. 4). The future is always unpredictable; accidents will happen to the best regulated businesses; and no-one knows by what 'act of God' (v. 5) the most careful calculations may be upset. The course of wisdom is not to put all our eggs in one basket and not to stake our all on one card but to reduce the risk by dividing it (v. 2).

Note. 1 Cast your bread upon the waters . . . It is fairly certain that the primary reference of the words, as Delitzsch has shown, is to the seaborne corn trade. But Ecclesiastes undoubtedly uses this form of commercial adventure to illustrate the course which wisdom suggests in other fields of life, such as the practice of uncalculating charity, to which the words have been commonly understood to refer. Cf. Lk. 16:9.

11:7, 8 Respice finem

A wise recognition of the uncertainty of the future makes the present all the more important. The present is the only time at our disposal. Tomorrow is in God's hand: we do not know what it will bring forth. It is on today that 'the accent of eternity' (Heim) lies. Like Christ's 'Do not be anxious about tomorrow', this does not imply disregard of the future. On the contrary, it is made possible only by a true regard for the future, viz. the recognition that the future is God's. The Epicurean philosophy which says carpe diem, 'gather ye rosebuds while ye may', contains an element of profound truth, and it is not so very far removed from what Paul says about 'making the most of the time' (Col. 4:5).

11:9 – 12:8 Counsels to youth

11:9, 10 Rejoice. A corollary of Ecclesiastes's emphasis on the present is his counsel to youth to enjoy the season of youth while it is theirs, not to seek to put old heads on young shoulders nor to try to prolong youth beyond its term, but to accept youth with its blessings and opportunities in the sober recognition that youth and age alike are of God's appointment and both are subject to His judgment. Rejoice . . . the sight of your eyes. There is nothing in these words to warrant the interpretation that Ecclesiastes is recommending youth to sow wild oats; nor can we deduce from them any support for the current idolization of youth, with its ridiculous sartorial illusions. But know that . . . 'The great But', in which the wisdom of the Bible is crystallized (Barth). 'All the ways of a man are pure in his own eyes, but the Lord weighs the spirit' (Pr. 16:2).

12:1–8 Remember. Man is a creature of time. In the end his creatureliness asserts itself unmistakably in his dissolution. Surely it is elementary wisdom to take account of this ultimate 'horizon' (Heidegger) in any attempt to construe the pattern of existence. Ecclesiastes recommends the frank recognition of our creatureliness even in youth, at the time when it is least apparent and life seems unquenchable. It is only when seen in this perspective that youth can be rightly understood and rightly enjoyed. The 'problem of youth' which bulks so large in our time is in great measure the consequence of a false perspective, a blurring of the horizons, the playing of blind man's buff with death, which is one of the chief follies of the age.

Notes. 1 Remember also your Creator. It is to be noted how Ecclesiastes shows his hand here. The prospect of age and death yields him, not memento mori (remember you must die), but memento Creatoris (remember your Creator). By this he clearly distinguishes himself from all sceptics, cynics and Epicureans, with whom he has often been confused.

2–7 contains a figurative description of the decay and dissolution of life, but the imagery is difficult to interpret in detail. 2 The picture of the approaching storm may be intended to suggest the approach of death in a general way or more particularly the decay of the inner faculties. 3, 4 The imagery is most probably intended to represent the decay of the bodily organs, the keepers of the house being the hands, the strong men the legs, the grinders the teeth, those that look through the windows the eyes, the doors the ears. The remaining clauses of v. 4 seem all to refer to the decay of the powers of speech and song. One rises up at the voice of a bird. If 'one' means 'an old man', this would involve the abrupt insertion of a literal statement in the middle of an elaborate allegory. But apart from that, it is not true that the old rise up at the voice of a bird. The old are less easily roused than the young, especially as they are often deaf (the doors on the street are shut)! It is probable that the text is corrupt and the original was to the effect that the voice of the old becomes weak and tends to resemble the treble chirp of a bird.

5 The allegory is abandoned and literal description takes its place: the old are afraid of heights, and they are timid of venturing forth at all. In view of the great and fantastic variety of interpretations that have been suggested for the almond tree, the grasshopper, and 'the caper-berry' (RV; desire, RSV), it seems best to follow Wetzstein and Hertzberg and take the three clauses literally as descriptions of phenomena of spring and summer: the almond tree blooms, the grasshopper loads itself (with food) and the caper-berry bursts forth—but all these gladdening sights mean nothing to the old man who, after the dissolution of his earthly house (v. 3; cf. 2 Cor. 5:1), goes to his long home.

6 The allegory is resumed. The figures of the silver cord being snapped and the golden bowl broken would seem to refer to the dissolution of soul and body. The life of man is likened first to a golden bowl (containing oil for a lamp) suspended by a silver cord, then to a pitcher with which water is drawn from a well. The lamp and the pitcher were both familiar symbols of life in antiquity. 7 The spirit returns to God who gave it. Ecclesiastes would seem to have advanced somewhat beyond the position of 3:21, but his words here, while suggestive, are not such as to form the foundation of a hope of immortality. He is viewing the dissolution of body and spirit from the standpoint of 'under the sun', and he simply states that each returns to the source from which it sprang, the body to the dust and the spirit to God (cf. Gn. 2:7). As to the final destiny of the spirit after its return to God, it is not his concern to speak of that. 8 Vanity of vanities . . . The author 'has made all earthly things small, and at last remains seated on this dust-heap of vanitas vanitatum' (Delitzsch). His argument, like all things under the sun (cf. 1:3–11), has come full circle, and he repeats the theorem which he set out to demonstrate (cf. 1:2) with an air of finality, as if to say quod erat demonstrandum.

12:9–14 Epilogue

The remainder of the book consists of an editorial postscript in the form of a 'commendatory attestation' (Plumptre) of the writer and an attempt to sum up the conclusions of his teaching. Does this come from the same hand as the rest of the book, or was it added by another? The question has been much debated. The change from the first to the third person suggests a change of author, but since the author's name Qoheleth (Ecclesiastes) is a pseudonym in any case, it may indicate only that he now steps forward and makes a brief curtain-speech, as it were, in his own name. We may compare Kierkegaard's editorial notes to his own pseudonymous works. There is no change in the vocabulary and style of the epilogue, which bears a strong resemblance to that of the rest of the book (even in the obscurity of the metaphor in v. 11). It has been questioned whether any writer would speak of himself in terms of vv. 9, 10, which, it is suggested, betray the hand of an admiring follower. But this is to attribute the literary fashions of our day to an age when they were very different. In the ancient world authorship was held of small account, so small indeed that the names of many of the authors of antiquity have been lost. The question men asked of a book was not 'Who wrote it?' but 'What does it say?', and there was no need for an author to make a profession of modesty, since his work was not regarded as a personal achievement or a feat of virtuosity. Even in our own time there have been exceptions to the fashion of literary modesty (which is largely humbug), notably Mr. Bernard Shaw, who sometimes spoke of himself in much more flattering terms than Ecclesiastes, and with less ground.

The most important question is whether vv. 13, 14 are a just summation of the teaching of the book, or, as some allege, a tendentious simplification, made with a view to commending it to orthodox readers. It is certainly difficult to see how any statement of a positive duty for man could be logically deduced from the premise that all things under the sun are vanity. But this is not the logic of Ecclesiastes; for he does not seek the premises of human duty in human theory or of moral values in the 'idea' of God. However much he stresses the difficulties of what man is to believe concerning God, he knows (cf. 8:12) that these difficulties do not suspend or abrogate the duty God requires of man; and it may be with a view to correcting any rash inference that might be drawn from his theoretical conclusion that he lays his final emphasis on the practical duty of man. The enigma of life may be insoluble by wisdom, but solvitur ambulando.

Notes. 11 The sayings of the wise are like goads. Though acceptable, they have their sting. The following comparison is typically obscure. The nails are usually understood to be tent-pegs, and compared to them are either the great teachers (as RV, 'masters of assemblies') or the great teachings assembled in their works (as RSV, the collected sayings); the one Shepherd can hardly be other than God, who is the Author and Source of true wisdom. The general idea would seem to be that it is the teachings of the masters, drawn from the fountainhead, which gives stability and strength to life. 12 A final warning is given against intellectualism, directed in the first instance perhaps against the exaggerated pretensions of 'wisdom' in the literature which goes by that name. Ecclesiastes does not despise the intellect (cf. 9:17, 18), but he is aware of its limitations (cf. 8:17).

13, 14 The whole duty of man. This is not the practice of the theory that all is vanity. But Ecclesiastes knows that practice will not wait upon theory or life upon understanding. Theory and practice will remain at variance so long as we are under the sun. The reconciliation, the resolution of the discord awaits the time when faith will give place to sight and every hidden thing will be revealed. So we may say of the last words of Ecclesiastes, spirant resurrectionem (they foreshadow the resurrection).

G. S. HENDRY

The Song of Solomon

INTRODUCTION

The book is aptly headed 'The Song of Songs' for it is difficult to find its equal as a piece of writing on human love. It is a song of great beauty and power with delicately chosen imagery from field and garden, animal life and plant life (1:12 – 2:3; 4:12 – 5:1; 6:2, 3, etc.). Its dream passages (3:1–5; 5:2–8) have a tender pathos. Its passage on untaken opportunity (5:2–8) has provided the basis for many a sermon on that topic. It is unique in Holy Scripture in that it is the only book that deals solely with human love and this it does incomparably.

AUTHORSHIP

The problems of authorship, purpose and literary type are all inseparably intertwined. The title (1:1) may mean either that the song was written by Solomon or that it is about him. The Hebrew can bear the meaning of both. If the shepherd hypothesis (see below) is adopted the first alternative must be ruled out, for Solomon would hardly write a book that deals him such an ethical blow. Some Jewish tradition (Baba Bathra 15a) ascribes the book to Hezekiah. The presence of some later words indicates either a date after Solomon's time or that the book had its final redaction, though not its original composition, in a later period. It may safely be said that neither questions of date nor questions of authorship affect the usefulness and value of the book.

INTERPRETATION

Three related questions are involved here. What is the book's literary category? What is its purpose? How many main characters are involved? For centuries these questions have been debated and, owing to the difficulty of the book, none can afford to be dogmatic in his conclusions.

What then is the nature of the book? Owing to its apparent eroticism the book for centuries has been understood as an allegory of Christ's love for the church. There is, however, no indication that the writing is allegorical and the fanciful, varied and often contradictory results of such a view are not in its favour. The song must be taken literally, i.e. as what it appears to be, a song about human love written in the form of a series of dramatic poems with this one unifying theme. The fact that it probably owes its existence in the Canon to an allegorical interpretation is still no basis for the acceptance of such an interpretation. This is not to say that the book may not at times be illustrative of the relationship between Christ and the individual; this view is reflected in the commentary which follows. A further danger of the allegorical interpretation is that readers may be led into an erotic view of his personal relationship with Christ.

This leads on to the purpose of the book. If the nature of the book is an extended dramatic poem or poems on human love, its purpose is to indicate the rightness and value of true love in all its aspects between man and woman. God in His wisdom has included in the Canon of Holy Scripture one whole book on this important matter which, in every generation, suffers tragic abuse. Thus, in its teaching, the Bible attempts to redeem a situation which has become woefully degraded. Even in its detailed description of the human body (4:1–7; 5:10–16; 6:4–10; 7:1–9) we see a reflection of the doctrine of creation that all that God made was 'very good'.

More point is made to this if the 'shepherd hypothesis' be adopted. (See further on this the IVF Bible Study Course Search the Scriptures.) This is the view in which the two main lovers are a shepherd and the Shulammite. Between them there is a genuine and pure love. Solomon, however, captures the maiden for his harem and attempts to win her affections through the artificial allures of the palace. He is unsuccessful. While not dogmatically held, this is the view of the text taken in the commentary. For it is felt, among other things, that Solomon is hardly the best example of true, loyal, single-minded love in the light of his 700 wives and 300 concubines and all the dire consequences for the nation that followed in the train of his many love affairs (see 1 Ki. 11). Moreover, Solomon was no shepherd (see Ct. 6:2).

The shepherd hypothesis is also endorsed by the main refrain of the book (2:7; 3:5; 8:4). True love needs no artificial stimuli. Love must not be awakened 'until it please'. See further the commentary on 8:8–12. Pure love successfully resists all the false, sensual allures of this world. The book is a censure on lust, polygamy, infidelity. It encourages a love which is exclusive and absorbing (4:12). It highlights a love which is unquenchable and unpurchasable (8:6f.). It endorses the place of physical love within a legitimate relationship.

For these reasons alone it more than justifies its place in the Canon. Its presence indicates the completeness of Holy Scripture, for God is concerned with every aspect of our living; this is the only book which, as a whole, treats this important subject. Young's comment is apt: 'So long as there is impurity in this world we need, and need badly, the Song of Solomon.'

When this book is used illustratively we are reminded, among other things, of the strength of Christ's love (8:7); His delight to hear the prayer of the church (8:13); the sense of yearning for His presence (8:14); the invitation of Christ to share His company (2:13); the dangers of the failure to respond immediately to His knocking (5:2–8; cf. Rev. 3:20). It may well rebuke us on our lack of passion for God; that our relationship to Him is lukewarm and superficial. If it does this in addition to imparting its clear ethical teaching then our study of it will be amply rewarded.

6:4 – 8:14 The king fails in his pursuit of the Shulammite: reunion of the lovers

COMMENTARY

1:1 – 2:7 SOLOMON MEETS THE SHULAMMITE IN HIS PALACE

1:1 The title

See Introduction for questions of authorship. The title indicates the unity of the poem and its superlative nature. As a song on true love this reigns supreme.

1:2–8 The daughters of Jerusalem and the Shulammite

1:2–4 It appears that a number of people speak in this short paragraph. The Shulammite, a young innocent from the country, has been thrust into the king's harem. Clearly she is not at home there and the oversensuous words of the women grate on her sensitive ears. As they see the king approach they long for the touch of his lips on theirs.

2 O that you . . . RSV has no textual ground to change 'he' to 'you'. The women are talking to one another about the king. For your love . . . It is characteristic of Hebrew that the third person passes easily into the second, and vice versa. In any case, perhaps the king is now nearer the harem and another member addresses him. Your love might well be translated 'your caresses'; the Hebrew is plural and it fits the context better. Wine. An apt description of the intoxicating effect of caressing. 3 Anointing oils. Such oils were widely used in the East and were of particular value because of the heat and their pleasing odour. Your name is oil poured out. There is a play on words in the Hebrew. 'Oil' is šemen and 'name' šem. While perfume pleases the noses, the name or person pleases the heart. It is commonly recognized that just saying the name of the beloved brings delight. Maidens; girls growing to maturity. Cf. Is. 7:14. Probably the women of the harem are referring to themselves here. 4 Draw me after you . . . By contrast the Shulammite now speaks. She yearns for her shepherd lover and even though he is absent she calls longingly for him and pleads that he take her away. It is the king who has brought her into his chambers; she has not come willingly. She speaks to her lover as though she were alone with him. True, loyal love is already shining through the lust of the court scene. The last part of the verse gives us the words of the women of the harem. The tone is that of vv. 2 and 3. Exult is from the Hebrew root z-k-r, 'to remember' and here it means 'praise', 'celebrate', 'constantly recall'. The love and caresses of the king are a constant topic of conversation in the harem. Rightly do they love you. The AV reading, 'the upright love thee', is hardly the meaning of the Hebrew and RSV has rightly translated here. The Hebrew is 'in uprightness' and gives the meaning 'it is not surprising that the harem loves such a king'.

1:5–7 The newcomer to the harem is subject to the contemptuous and perhaps jealous looks of the other women and becomes increasingly self-conscious. She apologizes for her tanned appearance, but it was none of her doing. Her brothers, with no concern for the beauty of her skin, had sent her day after day to work under the relentless sun in the family vineyards. All this was to the neglect of the 'vineyard' of her own complexion. But at least they will recognize that despite her tan she has a beauty equal to any of theirs.

5 Dark; not 'black', as AV, but swarthy, tanned, sunburnt. Comely; was it not her beauty that had brought her into this miserable situation? Tents of Kedar. Kedar is the name of the N Arabian Ishmaelites (cf. Gn. 25:13). The Shulammite likens her skin to their black goat-hair tents. Curtains of Solomon. There are parallels of thought here: the 'black tents of Kedar' are parallel to 'I am dark', while 'comely' is parallel to 'curtains of Solomon'. Such curtains were magnificently made and had a beauty all of their own. 6 The Shulammite gives the reason for the colour of her skin. Swarthy is a diminutive of the former word. She has not been able to care for her beauty as these pampered, pale-faced women of the palace. Scorched; literally 'looked upon'. Poetically, the sun is thought of as having eyes; cf. 2 Sa. 12:11. The latter part of the verse gives an indication of her rustic background. My mother's sons; a reference to her full brothers. It would seem that her father was dead and this adds even more poignancy to her situation. My own vineyard. Some think this is her own lover whom she has lost, but it is more natural to take it as her complexion. 7 Tell. The maiden turns from addressing the women of the court and soliloquizes, addressing her absent lover. Could they not make a trysting place at noon? Where is he to be found? Wanders; RSV adopts the reading of the Greek, Syriac and Vulgate through a transposition of the Hebrew letters. The idea may be that the Shulammite has no desire to wander up and down looking for the beloved, coming on every other flock but his own. Where will he be at noon so that she can go directly to him? The Hebrew reads 'is veiled', suggesting her feeling of mourning because of her enforced absence from her loved one.

1:8 The daughters of Jerusalem, overhearing her soliloquy, answer her. Their tone is probably ironic as they describe her as the fairest among women. Let her go and find him for herself. 'Go back to your shepherd life' is their response to her naïvety. The idea of her wanting to give up royal honours so recently gained seems almost ludicrous to them.

1:9 – 2:7 Solomon talks with the Shulammite

1:9–11 The king, for the first time in the book, gives his attention to the peasant girl, but receives no response.

9 My love may be too strong for the Hebrew. It is from the verb 'to associate with', 'to be friends with'. The noun is commonly translated 'friend' or 'companion'. Moffat has 'my dear'. The comparison to an Egyptian mare may fall oddly on our ears. But to Solomon, with his love of horses (particularly Egyptian horses), it was the height of flattery! Cf. 1 Ki. 4:26; 10:26; 2 Ch. 9:28. Solomon not only loved them for themselves but also for the considerable money he made in trading them. Cf. 1 Ki. 10:28f.; 2 Ch. 1:16f.; 9:25–28.

10 Your cheeks. The horse analogy is now dropped, though perhaps there is a transition through the ornamental frills often arrayed on the horse's bridle. Ornaments; literally 'rows'. The verb behind this phrase means to 'bore through' and 'string together'. Such a necklace would have several strings, probably of pearls. But her ornaments are nothing compared with what Solomon will give her. Her homely ornaments will be exchanged for plaits of gold and studs of silver. The decorations on Pharaoh's mare will look shoddy compared with what the king will give to his newly acquired bride.

1:12–14 The Shulammite replies to Solomon. 12 Two possible interpretations are, first, that the king, attracted by the heavy scent of the Shulammite, makes his way to her side. Second, that while Solomon was on his couch and absent from the peasant girl she was able to pour forth the fragrance of her love towards her beloved. Couch; this word is based on the verb 'to go round' and indicates some kind of semicircular divan, probably a reclining seat, for the king. Nard; spikenard, the aromatic ointment used by Mary of Bethany. Cf. Mk. 14:3ff. It is a beautiful and apposite symbol of love and, indeed, this is how our Lord uses it. Cf. also 2 Cor. 2:14–16. 13, 14 On the second interpretation these verses describe the maiden's feelings towards her shepherd lover. Bag describes a small receptacle with crushed myrrh within. Myrrh; the Balsamodendron myrrha whose liquid produces a strong aroma. Between my breasts; memories of her loved one are like the continual aroma from a depository of myrrh so placed on her bosom. Thus the subject is the myrrh and not the lover. Henna; a shrub from N India. A paste was made from its leaves and used as a cosmetic by both women and men. It is also aromatic. Engedi; the fertile area surrounding the fresh-water springs on the west side of the Dead Sea.

1:15 Solomon continues his flattery. In contrast with v. 16, the adjectives here are feminine and so it is assumed that it is the king who now addresses the Shulammite. Twice beautiful is she, so the repetition indicates. Dove suggests tenderness, purity, longing, simplicity. According to some, the dove was the symbol for the goddess of love.

1:16 – 2:1 But the Shulammite is all the time thinking of her shepherd lover. 16, 17 The pronouns and adjectives here are masculine; thus she responds by taking up the turn of phrase used by the king but adding the word lovely. Her thoughts again wander to the country. Their couch was no royal mattress but the natural green grass of the field. Cedar tops formed the roof of their house. Rafters; the meaning of the Hebrew is uncertain. Its basic meaning is to 'meet' or 'cross', and could well describe the overlapping timber of a ceiling. The general picture remains clear. It is not city and palace which please the Shulammite but forest and field. 2:1 In similar terms she describes herself. Rose; many suggestions have been made as to the identity of the plant, but it is certainly not what we understand by rose. The most likely is the Tulipa sharonensis, a bulbous plant related to the Syrian mountain tulip. Lily of the valley; another bulbous plant of which there are many varieties; perhaps here it is the hyacinth. The use of flower-names in love conversation is not uncommon and is most expressive for attractiveness both of smell and beauty.

2:2 Solomon replies, taking up her imagery. Most certainly she is a lily, and compared with her the other women are but prickly brambles.

2:3–7 The Shulammite replies to this, using similar language. 2, 3 If the Shulammite contrasts with other women as a lily to thorns, likewise the shepherd lover stands out as an apple tree amongst other trees of the wood. Apple tree; most likely RSV is correct, though some suggest it is the quince. This, however, is more bitter than the apple and does not fit into the context so easily. Cf. sweet. The point of the comparison lies in the refreshment and sweetness of the fruit plus the security that the shade of the apple tree offers. 4 The maiden recalls a meeting she had with her lover. Banqueting house; literally 'house of wine'. This would either be a real banqueting house or quite simply a house of love, wine being understood metaphorically. This accords with the second half of the verse. Not only were they together in the house of love but his covering for her was his love also. The idea has led many to think of the protective love of God within the house of God. Wine is one of the symbols of God's sacrificial love for us in Christ. Moreover, it was the blood of the slain lamb that protected the Israelites in Egypt (cf. Ex. 12:13, 23).

5 Such love not only protects but sustains and refreshes. Both raisins and apples were used in the fertility feasts of Canaan, but the fruit of procreation is not envisaged here, nor, indeed, anywhere else in the book. Sick with love is an evocative expression for the feeling involved in the deep love between man and woman. 6 She continues to express her longing for both support (the left hand under the head) and caress (the embracing right hand). Embrace; the Hebrew means primarily 'to enfold' but also 'to caress', to stroke gently with the hand. Such physical desires have the imprimatur of God providing that they are in the context of legitimate relationship, as here. 7 These words act as a kind of refrain throughout the poem and this is a key verse in the understanding of true love between man and woman. It is addressed to the other women of the harem, the daughters of Jerusalem. Adjure; this is the only example in Scripture of adjuring by something other than God. The significance of gazelles and hinds is not clear but the words come naturally from a lover of the fields where such animals roam freely and beautifully. Love; AV quite unnecessarily prefaces with 'my'. The reference is to the false rousing of love as an emotion, not to a lover as a person. Artificial stimulation to love is as much outside the will of God as true physical love is within it. There is a time to embrace and a time not to embrace. So here, as in 3:5 and 8:4, the Shulammite earnestly requests the harem not to resort to false stimulation of love. A true and worthy love should owe nothing to excitement coming from without.

2:8 – 3:5 THE BELOVED'S VISIT AND THE SHULAMMITE'S NIGHT SEARCH

2:8–17 The beloved's visit

2:8, 9 The scene has changed. We move from city palace to country home. The Shulammite is alone and thinks longingly of her beloved. The verses which follow are among the most beautiful not only in this book but in love poetry of any age. Suddenly she hears his voice. We imagine her rushing to the window. Behold he comes. And he too is hastened on by the compelling force of his love. He leaps; he bounds. He is sure and fleet of foot like the gazelle or the young stag. In no time he is there peering first through one window and then another until he finds the room where she is. We cannot help understanding the deep feeling of this reunion after separation. This follows the pattern of true love, for love longs to be with the object of that love. How much, too, the Christian should long to see the face of his Lord. Such consummation of the relationship is the great hope of the Christian. And seeing Him we shall be like Him. Cf. 1 Jn. 3:2.

2:10–15 Suitably the time is spring, the time of renewal and vitality. Cameron writes, 'After wintry months devoid of fresh life and growth, the stirring vigour of the Syrian spring follows of a sudden upon the early rain. The earth rapidly assumes a mantle of bright green, intermingled with the varied colours of innumerable flowers. The newly clad woodland comes alive with song.' And above the song comes the sweetest note of all, the invitation of the beloved to come away (v. 10). The association of love and spring clearly has a biblical basis! Spring is the time of youth and hope, of joy and love. And does not the Christian long likewise for an eternal spring in his own experience and for a fresh awakening in the church, the bride of Christ? The invitation is pressing and compelling. Twice the beloved urges, 'Arise, my love, my fair one, and come away' (vv. 10, 13). To the Christian whose heart is solely set on Christ there are no problems of the allure of the counterparts of Solomon's court. Paul was a man shut up to one thing because the love of Christ constrained him. Cf. 2 Cor. 5:14; Phil. 3:13f. Moses was in a similar tradition. Cf. Heb. 11:26. Here is a love that will not let us go, and the true believer does not wish to be let go.

12 The turtledove is a migratory bird whose coming indicated the arrival of spring. It is backed by a whole chorus of birds, always a delightful concomitant to the new season. 15 Foxes; the meaning and position of this verse are not easy to grasp. Most likely the Shulammite is replying, for she was a keeper of the vineyard (cf. 1:6) and this is a vineyard song. She requests that anything which would spoil the vineyard of their lives must be caught and eradicated. Let love be pure and undisturbed. There is no place here for lust, adultery, fornication, cheap sentimentality, or anything else which would spoil true love between man and wife.

2:16, 17 Perhaps the Shulammite senses danger. At any rate she pleads that her lover depart until evening when it would be safer. Until the day breathes is an ambiguous phrase, but is more likely to refer to evening (cf. RV 'until the day be cool') than morning, as in AV. The shadows flee as the sun sinks. Delitzsch uses this as an illustration of the coming of Christ at the evening of the world's history, when the church as the bride will see the heavenly Bridegroom face to face and welcome Him.

3:1–5 The night search

The Shulammite describes either a dream or a real experience. It is most likely the former, in view of the opening sentence and the fact that her modesty would prevent her running the streets at night. Perhaps the lover had failed to return as she had requested (cf. 2:16f.). Sadly she goes to bed and dreams of his absence. In her dream she rises and wanders the streets of the city looking for her lost lover, questioning the watchmen as she goes. She had hardly left them when he is discovered and is clasped to her bosom.

1 By night; literally 'by nights'. Moffat has 'night after night'. She may have dreamed this on several occasions. 4 My mother's house. Clearly everything was above board if she was prepared to take him there. There need be no deceit in a relationship of pure love. 5 See on 2:7.

3:6 – 5:1 SOLOMON'S PROCESSION AND SONGS

3:6–11 Solomon's approach

The destination of this splendid procession of the king is not clear. It could either be Jerusalem or the northern residence of the Shulammite. In the case of the former the girl is being brought with Solomon to his royal residence. If the shepherd hypothesis is adopted it indicates the king's desire to impress upon the Shulammite his wealth and magnificence in an attempt to overawe her and win her love. This is in vivid contrast to the simple love of the shepherd.

6 What is that . . . is a quite permissible translation of the Hebrew and is a question concerning the procession. Wilderness; that between Jerusalem and Jericho is a possibility. Smoke; from censers of frankincense. 7 Behold; as the procession gets nearer it is recognized as the king's. There is a deep sense of drama here. As it comes into view details are noticed. Sixty mighty men; Solomon's strong bodyguard. Cf. 2 Sa. 23:8. 9 Palanquin is a different word in the Hebrew from 'litter' (v. 7) but is a possible translation of a difficult word. Wood of Lebanon; cedar and cypress. 10 The magnificence of Solomon's bed is described, and reflects his extravagant court life. The Shulammite prefers the shepherd's shadow (cf. 2:3). Lovingly wrought within; an extremely difficult phrase. Delitzsch has 'its interior is adorned from love' and is probably as near as we can get. 11 The specific idea of marriage enters. The court women are summoned to go out to meet the king with his wedding crown, a well-worn adornment, for Solomon had 700 wives (cf. 1 Ki. 11:3). His mother; the queen mother played a prominent part in coronations and weddings. It may be significant to recall that Solomon's mother was Bathsheba who had an illicit relationship with David.

4:1 – 5:1 Solomon's love song

4:1–7 This exquisite love song is based on the 'wasf', a lyric still used at Syrian weddings today. Its description of the body may not appeal to western ears but nevertheless indicates that man is not only fearfully and wonderfully made but beautifully made too. This is God's handiwork; should it not therefore be admired? God is not only a God of truth but of beauty and such beauty is reflected in aspects of His creation. Moreover, spoken admiration, so long as it is sincere and devoid of flattery, is an important part of love-making and its inclusion here in Holy Scripture elevates it to its rightful level. It is men who have debased it by their lustful desires.

1 First, the eyes are described even though they are partly hidden by the Shulammite's veil. Doves; see on 2:14. Veil; cf. Gn. 24:65. Second, the hair which was uncovered is compared to a flock of goats on a mountain side. One imagines these black goats covering the hillside in the same way as the Shulammite's black locks fall gently down from the crown of her head and over her back. 2 Third, the teeth, which, because of their smoothness and whiteness, are likened to shorn sheep. Twins; upper correspond with lower; they are perfectly regular. 3 Fourth, her lips are brilliantly red and, surprisingly for an oriental, thin. Fifth, the cheeks remind Solomon of the rounded form and russet tan of the pomegranate. 4 Sixth, the neck. The word arsenal is the difficult part of this simile. The Hebrew is uncertain. It could mean either 'armoury' from the root meaning 'edges', i.e. 'swords'; or 'terraces' or 'trophies' from the root meaning 'to set in a row'. In the latter case the Shulammite's neck is like a tower adorned with trophies. The whole verse indicates regality of bearing. 5 Seventh, the two breasts are like twin fawns 'in respect of their equality and youthful freshness' (Delitzsch). 6 is an interruption. As in 3:7, where the same phrase occurs, until the day breathes indicates the evening. 7 summarizes: 'you are the perfect model'. The whole passage has been used as an illustration of the fact that Christ sees His church in her final form without spot, wrinkle or blemish. Cf. Eph. 5:27.

4:8 – 5:1 is either a continuation of Solomon's love song or, on the basis of the shepherd hypothesis, a song by the shepherd. A third possibility, based on the idea that it is unlikely that the shepherd would be allowed into the court precincts, is that the scene is imaginary, or 'a reminiscence of the dreamy girl'. Certainly there is a different tone to these verses compared with the first half of the chapter.

8 The Hebrew order is important. With me from Lebanon implies 'with me and not another' which would support the shepherd theory. The true lover calls upon the maiden to leave the splendour of Solomon's northern court in Lebanon. 9 You have ravished my heart is a translation of only one word in the Hebrew, meaning you have 'unheartened me' or 'stolen my heart', a well-used expression of love. One look was enough to overpower the shepherd. My sister, my bride is a common term for the lover in ancient love songs, especially Egyptian. The twofold expression indicates an increase of affection. 11 praises the loving words of the betrothed. Her sweet words of tender affection are like milk and honey.

12 A garden locked. The exclusiveness of the relationship denoted by this delightful phrase has much to say to our modern situation of infidelity and disloyalty. Marriage must be monogamous in heart as well as in law. With them the gate is barred; no trespassers are allowed. RSV wrongly repeats the phrase in the next line and AV is preferred: 'a spring shut up'. The next phrase, a fountain sealed, is in parallel, which confirms the AV reading. Again, it indicates an exclusive relationship; not anyone may taste of her charms. But it also suggests an unceasing inner vitality of love that springs perpetually from within the young girl. 13 Your shoots; the expressions of her lovely personality. This phrase is the subject of all that follows in vv. 13–15. She is like a choice garden, beautifully laid out with rich variety of fruit trees, aromatic herbs and shrubs. But she is also the fresh, crystal-clear fountain in the midst of the garden; this thought is an elaboration of v. 12b. Cf. Jn. 7:38. Henna; see on 1:14. 14 Nard; see on 1:12. Saffron; The Hebrew word occurs only here in the OT. It is a substance obtained from a crocus plant and used as a condiment. Calamus; a spice-giving tree from Ceylon. Aloes; an aromatic tree, 120 ft high. Its smell is produced from the burnt wood.

16 is spoken by the maiden and is a passionate invitation to her lover to come and take possession of this garden and to make it fully his own. The invitation to the two winds, the cool north wind and the warm south wind, is given that the fragrant expressions of her personality may be carried abroad to her distant lover. This would entice him into closer communion with her: eat its choicest fruits. 5:1 I come; the whole verse teems with excitement. The invitation is accepted and the shepherd lover enters the garden and gathers his myrrh, spice, honey and milk. Eat, O friends is said either by the shepherd as he invites others to celebrate their love-making, or by a chorus who sympathize with the joy of the happy couple. The joy of the church's union with Christ is celebrated in the bread and wine of the Lord's Supper which speak of a love as strong as death.

5:2 – 6:3 UNTAKEN OPPORTUNITY

5:2–8 The beloved's unexpected visit

This is either a dream similar to that described in 3:1–5, or reality. Either way the verses are packed with vividness, intensity and drama. The bridegroom is first heard knocking at the door, having returned from tending his flock with his hair wet with dew; but strangely the bride at first refuses to open. This is owing either to 'the playful reluctance of love', a kind of teasing, or to sheer 'slumber, sloth and self-indulgence'. The excuses are thin: she has only just completed her preparations for the night and dare not get her feet dirty again merely to open the door. Taking the latter interpretation, it serves as a picture of man's lethargy in response to the insistent knocking of Christ. Cf. Rev. 3:20; Lk. 9:57–62. V. 4, however, probably indicates the former interpretation unless there has been a sudden change as she 'came to herself' for as she hears the lover trying the door her heart is pounding with loving excitement. Her dilatoriness is tragically but rightly rewarded. Love must not be played with. On opening the door she discovers he has gone. As before (cf. 3:1–5), she rushes out into the night, seeking, searching, asking. But this time the immediate sequence is not so happy for the watchmen brutally cuff and bruise her and snatch off her mantle.

2 I slept, but my heart was awake indicates a dream. Was this dream an expression of her subconscious which feared the loss of love? Such dreams are not uncommon. Dew; cf. Jdg. 6:38. Night dew in Palestine is particularly heavy. 3 Garment; that worn next to the skin. 4 Latch; literally 'hole'; through this the hand was inserted to unlatch the inside bolt. 6 My soul failed me when he spoke. Cf. Lk. 24:32. 7 They beat me; she must have appeared as a suspicious character, scantily clad with startled face and at such a time of night. Perhaps they had to use force in their attempt to arrest her. Again, such hindrances in dreams where desires are frustrated are not unknown, like the person who is unable to run. 8 Finally, she makes a cri de coeur to the women of Jerusalem. Sick with love; cf. 2:5.

5:9 – 6:3 The Shulammite answers the women's question

5:9–16 The mocking question of the harem (v. 9) affords an opportunity to describe her beloved in the kind of detail characteristic of the book. After a general introduction (v. 10) she describes him from the head down to the legs (vv. 11–15) with a concluding word on his speech (v. 16). To find detailed comparison with Christ at this point does injustice to the text and leads to an erotic appreciation of the Son of God. For a description of our Lord we must turn to passages like Rev. 1:12–16.

10 Radiant; Hebrew 'to glow', 'to shine'. It indicates the brightness rather than the paleness of his face. 11 Gold; not a reference to colour but nobility of form and carriage. Wavy is better than 'bushy' of AV. 12 Doves; the comparison lies in the movement of his moist eyes, like the dove which sips at water in the brooks. They look as though they had been bathed in milk, so pure are they and so beautifully set. 13 His cheeks. . . . . fragrance; his beard is perfumed. Lilies; brilliant red flowers. Myrrh refers to the perfume of his breath. 14 Arms; better 'hands', as AV. This is a reference to the fingers of the outstretched hands which are like cylinders of gold for their rounded form. Jewels; Hebrew taršîš, which is a precious stone, probably the chrysalite found in the town of Tarshish, or Tartessus, in Spain: referring to his finger-nails. Ivory work; the comparison lies in workmanship rather than colour and describes his beautifully supported body. Sapphires; these are part of the previous picture and need not stand for anything in particular. 15 The theme is continued in the description of the legs as alabaster columns, a reference again to firmness and strength. The bases of gold are the feet. His whole appearance is like the majestic mountain of Lebanon, or like the cedar, king among trees. Speech; literally 'palate' which is considered as the organ of speech. 16 Altogether desirable; an exact and delightful summary.

6:1–3 The question of v. 1 is in similar tone to that of 5:9. Mockingly, the women offer to help the Shulammite find her beloved. But she has no need of their help; she knows where he has gone. It was only in her dream (5:2–8) that she had lost him. Distance may separate them but love binds them. He may be in his far-off garden (v. 2) fulfilling his shepherd duties but nothing can break the common bond between them (v. 3). Their mutual love is constant.

2 Gather lilies; perhaps he is gathering these for a love posy. The Bridegroom of the church may be 'geographically absent' (cf. Jn. 14:2f.; 16:5) but the spiritual union between Him and His bride cannot be impaired (cf. Rom. 8:35).

6:4 – 8:14 THE KING FAILS IN HIS PURSUIT OF THE SHULAMMITE: REUNION OF THE LOVERS

6:4 – 8:4 The end of the Shulammite's stay in court

6:4–10 The wooing king enters the scene once more though his description of the maiden takes on a slightly different hue. The purity and constancy of the Shulammite has challenged and rebuked the king and his artificial flatteries. The refrain 'terrible as an army with banners' (vv. 4, 10) is the keynote.

4 Tirzah means 'pleasantness', a true reflection of the beauty of this city, which was the capital of the northern kingdom from the time of Jeroboam I (cf. 1 Ki. 14:17) to the reign of Omri (cf. 1 Ki. 16:23). We see little indication of the date of the poem here. Terrible as an army with banners. The last four words translated one Hebrew word meaning literally 'beflagged things'. We picture troops going forth to battle with their banners unfurled. It speaks of the imposing personality of the Shulammite. But she conquers not by artificial flattery but by constancy and faithfulness. The contrast between true and false love is again in evidence. 5a Little wonder that Solomon cannot face up to her gaze. 5b–7 more or less repeat 4:1–2.

8 Sixty queens and eighty concubines. The king refers to his own harem though considerably underestimates the number. Cf. 1 Ki. 11:3 where 1,000 women are at his disposal. The exclusive love of the shepherd stands out in vivid contrast (cf. 6:3). 9 Nevertheless, Solomon has to confess that never has he met with one so outstanding as the Shulammite. She is only one in contrast to the 60 and 80 of v. 8. Cf. 2:2. Darling . . . flawless. Her mother shared the verdict of the king. 10 The maidens of the court sing her praise also. Dawn . . . moon . . . sun. These 'light' metaphors point to her radiance and purity. She is blessed indeed; this is the same word used in the beatitudes. Cf. Ps. 1; Mt. 5:3–11.

6:11, 12 The Shulammite reminisces about a previous incident. Consequently, I went down might be better translated 'I had gone down'. She may be referring to the story of her capture. Innocently and quite unsuspecting she had gone to inspect her garden when she was whisked away by the king's men. But all depends on the translation of the difficult v. 12. Fancy is the word mostly translated 'soul' in the AV but it has a great variety of other meanings. Here, it is probably 'desire' or 'appetite'. My prince is an improvement on the AV 'Amminadab', but no-one is sure of the meaning. On the other hand she may be imagining her shepherd lover as a prince among men and in her fantasy she finds herself suddenly transported to a position beside him in his royal chariot.

6:13 It is not clear who is speaking, It sounds an odd request on the lips of the harem after their previous treatment of her. Is it then her own people in the country who long to see her back where she belongs? The fourfold request to return should be noted; it is most intense. V. 13b answers the question of 13a. Her reply indicates that she is unconscious of her beauty. What is there to be seen in her that they should gaze upon her as people gaze on some sort of show or dance. Two armies; literally 'Mahanaim': see RSV mg. This is probably the name of a popular dance.

7:1–5 Delitzsch and Harper take the view that the women of the harem are here praising the Shulammite on the beauty of her figure. Are they flattering her so that she will accept the king's approaches? See v. 5. The general direction of the detailed description is from feet to head. Cf. previous descriptions in 4:1–7; 5:10–16; 6:4–10. The women describe her either in the dressing room or as she dances. Either way it is to be linked with 6:13a.

1 How graceful are your feet. Cf. Is. 52:7.

Queenly maiden indicates her regal bearing. Rounded thighs are compared to jewels in that both show the mark of a master craftsman. There the similarity ceases. 2 Your navel. Some think that this should be translated 'body' but the RSV reading should be kept as it gives more meaning to rounded bowl. Belly; the comparison with a heap of wheat is either that of colour or of plenty. Easterners preferred women of fairly generous proportions. Lilies add a touch of beauty. 3 See 4:5. 4 Ivory tower; i.e. strong and stately. Pools; her eyes are clear and sparkling. Nose . . . Damascus. The writer seems to indicate that a prominent nose was a feature of beauty though westerners would hardly concur. But fashions in beauty vary from time to time and place to place. On the other hand 'nose' can mean 'face' and so the description may be of a courageous countenance. 5 Mt. Carmel was known for its beauty and nobility. Purple; black hair sometimes takes on a purple sheen. Captive; the idea of a lover being captivated by a woman's locks is not uncommon in love poetry. Harper quotes from the poem 'To Althea from Prison': 'When I lie tangled in her hair, And fettered to her eye.'

7:6–9 Very probably it is the king who speaks at this point, making his last attempt to win over the Shulammite. It is of no avail, however.

6 Delectable maiden; literally 'for delights'. The RSV is based on the Syriac reading. Keeping the Hebrew it could be read, as Delitzsch suggests, 'among delights', i.e. above all the delights and pleasures of this life. 7 Palm tree; i.e. tall, slender and graceful. It is a common figure of beauty. Clusters; of dates, not grapes as AV. The analogy must not be pressed too literally; it indicates just a general picture of beauty. Lay hold of; to secure possession of. The figure then departs from date-clusters to vine-clusters, i.e. grapes, which would give a nearer analogy of form. 9 Your kisses; literally 'palate', probably indicating speech rather than kisses. The words she whispers intoxicate him like the best wine.

7:10–13 The maiden will have nothing to do with the king's approach. 10 The Christian will echo her reply in time of temptation, when evil does its best to lure him away from his exclusive love for and loyalty to Christ. It is a mutual relationship: we belong to Him and His love is set upon us. We are reminded of the great covenantal formula: 'You shall be my people and I will be your God.' 11 From this verse the girl addresses her true love and invites him to join her as together they make their way into the environment which is characteristically theirs: the fields and the vineyards. By contrast the king's court is like a foreign country to her. 12 Buddea . . . blossoms . . . bloom; all symbolize the new life of vitality of the spring in their hearts. It is a beautiful picture. The Christian's life should be like an eternal spring in his walk with Christ. Cf. Jn. 7:38. 13 Mandrakes; literally 'love plants', a stemless perennial of the nightshade family, having emetic, purgative and narcotic qualities. Here, only the delightful fragrance is referred to. In the OT it occurs only here and in Gn. 30:14–16. In addition to the new fruit the Shulammite has laid up old fruit in cupboards over the doors that they might enjoy them together. This foresight has a very tender touch and reminds us of the loving foresight of God who has laid up in store such good things for those who love Him; cf. Jn. 14:3; 1 Pet. 1:4. These verses strike one of the highest notes of the whole book.

8:1–4 Here the maiden soliloquizes. 1 Brother; only a brother having the same mother and a father's brother's son have a right to kiss a maiden among the Bedouin. The girl desires freedom to express her love and for it to be acknowledged publicly. If I met you outside. A public display of affection between lovers was condemned, but not so between brother and sister. The Shulammite is saying that if he were her brother then she could kiss him publicly and openly. 2 House of my mother; cf. 3:4. Her that conceived me. This reading is based on the Greek and the Syriac and makes good sense, especially in parallel to the previous line. The Hebrew has 'she (or you) will teach me', i.e. teach me how to behave decorously in such a relationship. 3 expresses the desire for intimate embrace though the verse can be translated in the present tense. See on 2:6. 4 repeats the refrain of 2:7 and 3:5, q.v.

8:5–14 The lovers are reunited

8:5 The couple approach their home. The question here may be on the lips of the villagers with whom the Shulammite has been brought up. The court and its luxuries and allures are now far away and she is back home in every sense. Her own folk see her arriving, supported by her shepherd lover. As they approach the shepherd tells her how he first made love to her under an apple tree in the garden of the village where she was born.

8:6, 7 Here is a moving description of love by the Shulammite. 6 Seal; an ornament worn around the neck so that it would be next to the heart, or a bracelet on the arm. It was a symbol of something intimately dear. So the young shepherd is to own her privately (the heart) and publicly (the arm). Love is strong as death; i.e. love is as irresistible as death. Who can resist the power of true love, for its compulsion is all-conquering? This is supremely so with the love of Christ. Cf. 2 Cor. 5:14; Eph. 3:19. But let not love be treated falsely for jealousy as its close associate is cruel as the grave. Both are all-devouring. Christ has a legitimate jealousy for His bride. Cf. Ex. 20:5; 2 Cor. 11:2ff. A most vehement flame; literally 'a flame of God'. A divine flame of supernatural power. No human power can put it out. 7 continues the image and brings us the deepest expression used of love in the whole book. Where true love exists, no opposition can destroy it. The waters of sin, death, Sheol, Satan and all the rebellion of mankind could not put out the love of Christ for humanity. But true love is not only unquenchable, it is also unpurchaseable. Solomon had made every effort to buy her love with all the luxuries of the court, but to no avail. The Shulammite speaks from experience.

8:8–10 These verses constitute an unusual paragraph but one which is highly relevant to the whole book, for it deals with the alternatives of a too easy response to love and a resistance to attacks on innocence and womanhood. Such is the theme of the whole book.

8 The Shulammite recalls the attitude of her brothers when she was young, when she was their little sister and had no breasts. When she is spoken for is the time of marriageable age. 9 She can in such a day be either a wall resisting the approaches of false love, or a door when she allows a man to pass through her defences. In the first case the brothers will reward her with adornment; the battlement of silver will be added to the wall she has built. In the second case, if it appears that she will give in too easily they will protect her themselves: we will enclose her with boards of cedar. 10 indicates the kind of woman she grew up to be and which has been reflected all the way through the book. When her breasts were like towers, i.e. when she was fully mature, her defences were like a solid wall. Brings peace means either that Solomon, realizing he cannot conquer her, desists from further amorous warfare and 'calls it a day'; or that she finds peace in her exclusive relationship with her true lover.

8:11, 12 The train of thought, that love cannot be bought, is continued. Solomon is pictured as a wealthy vineyard-owner—Baal-hamon means possessor of wealth—who lets out his vineyard to others in return for which they each pay a thousand pieces of silver. By contrast the Shulammite's vineyard (cf. 1:6), i.e. her own person and love, is not on the market. Let out could mean simply 'give'. In that case the 1,000 shekels would be the selling price of the fruit by the recipients of the vineyard. This interpretation is less likely in view of v. 12b. Keepers of the fruit two hundred. The pay of those who looked after the vineyard. The true believer will yield to none but Christ; he is crucified to the world and the world to him.

8:13, 14 The book closes with a request from the bridegroom for the bride to speak so that he and his friends may hear her voice. This beautifully phrased request reflects the constant desire of Christ the heavenly Bridegroom to hear the prayers of His people. 14 is her final recorded response. She earnestly requests that he come to her with the speed and agility of a gazelle or a young stag. Mountain of spices indicates both freedom and extreme delight. Make haste anticipates the request of the Bride of the Apocalypse: 'Come, Lord Jesus!' (Rev. 22:20).

Isaiah

INTRODUCTION

THE HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Isaiah lived through a pivotal period of his nation's history, the second half of the 8th century BC, which saw the rise of written prophecy in the work of Amos, Hosea, Micah and himself, but also the downfall and disappearance of the greater part of Israel, the ten tribes of the northern kingdom.

In 740 BC the death of King Uzziah (6:1) marked the end of an Indian summer in which both Judah and Israel had enjoyed some 50 years' respite from large-scale aggression. This would soon be only a memory. The rest of the century was to be dominated by predatory Assyrian kings: Tiglath-pileser III (745–727), Shalmaneser V (727–722), Sargon II (722–705) and Sennacherib (705–681). Their ambitions were for empire, not for plunder alone; and in pursuit of it they uprooted and transplanted whole populations, punishing any sign of rebellion with prompt and hideous reprisals.

In 735 Jerusalem felt the shock-wave of their approach, when the armies of Israel and Syria arrived to force King Ahaz into their anti-Assyrian coalition. Isaiah's confrontation of the king (ch. 7) brought to light the real issue of this period, the choice between quiet faith and desperate alliances; and the king's decision to stake all, not on God but on Assyria itself, called forth an implied rejection of him and his kind, and the prophecy of a perfect king, Immanuel, to arise out of the felled stock of the Davidic dynasty.

Israel paid for her rebellion with the loss of her northern regions ('Galilee', 9:1) in c. 734, and of her national existence in 722. For Judah, bordered now by a cosmopolitan Assyrian province (2 Ki. 17:24ff.) in the territory where Israel had always stood, there was every discouragement to patriotic gestures.

But it was a patriot who followed King Ahaz. Hezekiah (for whose chronology see on 2 Ki. 18:1) was a firebrand in whom faith and impatience took turns to kindle the flame. Much of Isaiah's energy was devoted to keeping him out of intrigues against Assyria: see on 14:28–32; 18:1–7; 20:1–6. In the end this struggle came to a head in a bitter conflict between the prophet and a pro-Egypt faction at court, implicit in chs. 28–31. The sequel was Hezekiah's revolt against Assyria (chs. 36, 37), which brought the might of King Sennacherib down upon him in 701 BC, and left the little kingdom of Judah almost prostrate in spite of the miraculous rescue of Jerusalem.

But Isaiah's dealings with Hezekiah were never confined to questions of political prudence, nor to the immediate future; and his last encounter with him pinpoints the difference between these two men of faith. In 39:5–7 Isaiah looks far ahead to the Babylonian captivity, the fruit of the king's disobedience; but the king's only reaction is relief. 'There will be peace and security in my days.' It was an understandable horizon for a monarch; unthinkable for a prophet. So the prophecy goes on to completion in the final section.

The events implied in chs. 40ff. are identified beyond doubt by the name of Cyrus (44:28; 45:1), which carries us at once into the world of the 6th century. This king of Anshan in southern Persia had seized control of the Median Empire by 550 BC and proceeded to conquer Lydia in 547, which comprised most of Asia Minor. This put him in a commanding position against the Babylonian Empire (where the Jews had been captives since before the fall of Jerusalem in 587). This Empire was in any case weak and divided by now, the king, Nabonidus, being absent from the capital (where his son Belshazzar deputized for him) and at odds with the priests. In 539 Cyrus defeated the Babylonian army in the field and his forces entered Babylon without a fight. True to God's prophecy in Is. 44:28 he repatriated the Jews (among other subject peoples) with instructions to rebuild their Temple (Ezr. 1:2–4; 6:2–5). His own inscription, on the 'Cyrus Cylinder' (British Museum), reveals that this was his general policy, in order to enlist the good offices of the gods whom he restored to their sanctuaries (see on 41:25).

A considerable number of Jews returned, but soon fell foul of the 'people of the land' by rejecting their help in rebuilding the Temple (Ezr. 4:3). The whole work came to a halt for nearly 20 years, until Haggai and Zechariah inspired a new attempt in 520, which was completed in 516. Many commentators see this situation, with its human tensions and its preoccupation with Jerusalem and the Temple, as the background presupposed in chs. 56–66. In this commentary, however, the thread that binds the last chapters together is taken to be thematic rather than historical, a preoccupation no longer with Babylon but with the homeland and the mother-city, both as they were in their imperfection and as they pointed beyond themselves to the new heavens and earth, and to the 'Jerusalem above'.

AUTHORSHIP

The traditional view

Until modern times the book of Isaiah was universally regarded as a unity, the product of the 8th-century prophet of this name. A single scroll was used for the whole of it, as we learn not only from Qumran but from Lk. 4:17 (where the chosen reading was from one of the latest chapters), and the same assumption of unity is already evident in Ecclus. 48:22–25, written some 200 years earlier. The NT fully concurs: see, e.g., Jn. 12:37–41; Rom. 9:27–29; 10:20f.

Modern criticism

Apart from a tentative query by the mediaeval Jewish exegete Ibn Ezra, whose remarks elsewhere, however, endorse the traditional view (see R. Margalioth, The Indivisible Isaiah, 1964, pp. 11–13) the idea of a multiple authorship of Isaiah has arisen only in the last two centuries. Its simplest, most persuasive form is the ascription of chs. 1–39 to Isaiah, and 40–66 to an anonymous prophet living among the 6th-century exiles in Babylonia. As an appropriate sequel to Isaiah, it was suggested, this work came to be appended to Isaiah's, and, being anonymous, eventually lost its separate identity.

The chief grounds of this view and of its main variants are, first, what S. R. Driver called the 'analogy of prophecy', i.e. the fact that prophets usually address their contemporaries (and the people addressed in chs. 40ff. are predominantly the exiles); the second ground is the distinctive style, vocabulary and theological emphasis of chs. 40ff. These will be considered later.

But in fact no scholar holds the theory in this form, for by its own principles it demands to be carried much further. An average analysis will show chs. 1–39, Isaiah's portion of the book, subdivided into a basic collection of 8th-century oracles by the prophet, supplemented by material from later disciples of various periods (e.g. chs. 13, 14 from the Babylonian exile in the 6th century; chs. 24–27 from perhaps the end of the Persian régime, in the 4th century). This added material, including many shorter contributions, may amount to some 250 verses of chs. 1–39 (i.e. about one-third), and some of the longer units will themselves be analysed as composite, with their own history of growth.

Chs. 40–66 are usually divided into two main parts: Deutero- (i.e. Second-) Isaiah (40–55; exilic; say c. 545 BC) and Trito- (Third-) Isaiah (56–66; post-exilic; say c. 520 BC). The former of these is generally considered a unity, the work of a 'great unknown' disciple of Isaiah; but the latter part (chs. 56–66) is most often thought to come from the second prophet's own followers, of several schools of thought, who interpreted his message to the next generation. Commentators differ over the number of historical situations and of parties (e.g. moralist, institutionalist, patriotic, universalist) discoverable here, and consequently in their analysis of Trito-Isaiah; but at least four sources are commonly isolated in its eleven chapters.

It is important to realize that this suggested galaxy of authors and supplementers is not wholly arbitrary. Once the initial criteria for dividing the book are accepted, they cannot simply be discarded after the first cut; they must be used consistently (with the results we have seen) or not at all. So the attractive simplicity of a supposed two-volume work, by Isaiah and a successor, is chimerical, although the theory is usually pictured in this form. The only viable alternative to a single author is not two authors but something like a dozen.

It is only fair to add that the emphasis of critical scholars has recently been on the unity in this diversity. The supplementers are seen as a school of disciples, steeped in Isaiah's thought, and prophesying in his spirit to new generations. So his teaching, on this view, continued to put out offshoots of new growth for centuries after his death, and his name was appropriately attached to the family of writings fathered by his oracles.

An assessment

In face of the strong tradition of unity of authorship the onus of proof is on those who divide the book. Their chief criteria are not invulnerable.

'The analogy of prophecy.' The claim that a prophet stands not only usually but invariably within his own age and addresses his own contemporaries is contradicted by Is. 13:1 – 14:27 (to go no further afield), which is an oracle on Babylon attributed to 'Isaiah the son of Amoz' (13:1). Babylon is here seen not as the Assyrian province that she was in Isaiah's day but as the world power that she became a century later; and Israel is consoled for her long captivity there (14:1–4). The prophecy is in fact a miniature of Is. 40–48, with which it is universally held to be broadly contemporary. Further, there is more than the title-verse to mark it as Isaiah's: the whole passage (as R. Margalioth has shown) abounds in expressions paralleled in Is. 1–39 but in no other prophet. This oracle, signed and, so to speak, fingerprinted, stoutly opposes the criterion by which the many seeming anachronisms in Is. 1–39 and 40–66 are automatically ascribed to a later age.

It is all too possible, in fact, to exaggerate the degree in which chs. 40ff. are exceptional. Not only sizeable units, such as 13:1ff.; 24:1 – 27:13; 34:1 – 35:10, profess to predict or to stand in the midst of far-off events, but many smaller passages do the same (e.g. 4:2ff.; 11:1 – 12:6; 19:16–25; 21:1–10; 23:13–18) and are accordingly re-dated by a majority of commentators unless they can be matched to an 8th-century situation. Nor is this a peculiarity of Isaiah: such oracles are found in nearly every prophet, and are similarly criticized. The 'analogy of prophecy' by this time begins to appear a little overworked. One may add, first, that even the supreme anomaly, the naming of Cyrus a century and a half before his time (44:28; 45:1), is not unparalleled (see the predicting of Josiah, at twice this interval, in 1 Ki. 13:2); and secondly, that the power to predict is precisely the proof paraded here that Yahweh alone is God (cf. 41:21–23, 26ff.; 44:7, 8, 25ff.; 46:10, 11; 48:3–8; and note that 48:8 blames Israel's deafness, not God's silence, for her ignorance of the new things that were to happen at the end of the exile).

The distinctive style of chs. 40ff. would be a valid argument against Isaiah's authorship only if these chapters were addressed to a comparable situation and audience to those of 1–39. But if they are Isaiah's at all, they are the product of his old age; a message written, not preached; concerned to comfort rather than warn; directed to a future generation with scarcely a glance at the present. These are immense differences. Such prophesying may seem an intrinsic improbability (see above), but one cannot have the objection both ways. For it would be still more extraordinary (granted, for the sake of argument, that Isaiah was the author) if so radical a shift of situation, method and object were to produce no great change of thought and expression.

Certainly one might expect in chs. 1–39, if the whole book is Isaiah's, an occasional foretaste of 40ff., when the latter's themes were momentarily anticipated; and this is so. God's sovereignty in history, a major theme of 40ff., is expressed to Sennacherib in 37:26 (701 BC) in the very tone and terms of the later chapters. 'Have you not heard (cf. 40:28) that I determined it (cf. 41:4, Heb.) long ago? I planned (cf. 46:11, Heb.) from days of old (cf. 45:21; 46:10) what now I bring to pass' (cf. 46:11; 48:3). There is similar language on this theme in 22:11. On the 'greater exodus', ch. 35 not only matches the finest eloquence of chs. 40ff. (with which it has to be grouped to save the theory of multiple authorship) but also, in almost every verse, uses the special idioms of 1–39. Again, in the visions of ultimate concord, the passages 11:6–9 and 65:25 can scarcely be told apart. These may be comparative rarities, but they are recognizable first-fruits of the later crop.

The vocabulary shows a similar pattern. Isaiah's early task of denunciation called for such terms as 'briers and thorns', the 'scourge', the 'storm', the 'remnant'; but the later work of reassurance and vocation emphasized God's initiative to 'create', 'choose' and 'redeem'. His 'purpose' is seen to embrace the distant 'coastlands', the 'ends of the earth' and 'all flesh'; this naturally calls forth the invitation to 'praise', 'rejoice' and 'break forth into singing'. In these chapters the many-sided term 'righteousness' now picks up almost everywhere the colours of salvation (see on 46:12, 13), and even the subsidiary parts of speech reflect the change of subject, for the later chapters abound in those that give warmth and emphasis to an utterance: e.g. 'very', 'but now', 'yea', 'behold', 'together', and the emphatic word for 'not' (Heb. bal)—most of which occur indeed in 1–39, but in far fewer places.

Alongside the variations, however, must be put the significant number of terms which are common to both parts of Isaiah but seldom or never encountered elsewhere in the OT. 'The Holy One of Israel' (twelve times in 1–39, thirteen in 40–66) is the best-known example, but several other expressions for God add their smaller testimony: e.g. the term yōṣēr (one who forms or designs) used with a possessive pronoun (22:11; 29:16; 44:2); 'the high and lofty One' (6:1; 57:15; cf. 52:13); 'the Mighty One of Jacob/Israel' (1:24; 49:26; 60:16). There are also rare or unique designations of Israel that occur in both parts, such as 'blind' (29:18; 35:5; 42:16–18), 'deaf' (29:18; 35:5; 42:18; 43:8), 'forsakers of the Lord' (1:28; 65:11), 'ransomed of the Lord' (35:10; 51:11), 'the work of my hands' (29:23; 60:21), the 'planting of the Lord' (5:7; 61:3). (These examples are taken from the fuller list of R. Margalioth, op. cit.) It is this large stock of Isaianic expressions that has called forth the theory (for which there is very little supporting evidence) that a circle of disciples perpetuated Isaiah's thought-forms through the centuries. It is simpler to suppose a single mind.

As to the theology of Is. 1–39 and 40–66, it should now be clear that these two main parts of the book face different situations and give complementary teaching. But there is more than this. As J. A. Motyer has shown ('The "Servant Songs" in the Unity of Isaiah', TSF Bulletin, Spring 1957, pp. 3–7), the prophecies of 1–39 lead up to the prediction of a devastating historical punishment which poses serious theological problems in view of the doctrines and promises set out elsewhere in those chapters. Chs. 40–66 are therefore more than a completion: they are a solution without which 1–39 would end in unresolved discord. And 'if a prophet can be inspired to declare God's truth in the context of history, . . . it is no great demand that he should also be inspired to find the solutions to the theological problems raised by those revelations . . .' (art. cit.).

To sum up: the theory of multiple authorship (since dual authorship breaks down into this) creates at least as many difficulties as it appears to settle. (It also raises questions elsewhere in the OT, where pre-exilic prophets appear to use material from this book; but this cannot be pursued here.) It makes Isaiah the author of a torso; it admits a criterion of analysis which leaves few of the prophets the sole authors of their writings; it envisages centuries of creative activity by not only an Isaiah-school but similar groups revering other prophets, whose freedom to expand or adjust their master's work compares strangely with the care, at a not much later date, to transmit it unaltered, and whose very existence is no more than an inference. It also has to account for the unbroken early tradition of Isaiah's unity, and to come to terms with the NT's apparent endorsement of that view.

Certainly it may be argued that the NT is not pronouncing on this question, but quoting without digressing; this is the opinion of many who wholeheartedly accept its authority. None the less it is a more direct exegesis, unless the objections are overwhelming, to take it that 'Isaiah' there means 'Isaiah'; and at every point this hypothesis seems to offer a similar simplicity. The alternatives (of which there are more than we have mentioned) tend to grow more elaborate the more they are followed through; and this is not a reassuring symptom. Like the Ptolemaic astronomy, postulating more epicycles the more the heavens were explored, the theories of multiplicity tend to cover the facts at an increasing cost in complexity and the disturbance of other parts of Scripture. When this happens, it is usually time to look for a different centre and a tighter, more integrated scheme.

1:1–31 A SITUATION OF CRISIS

1:1 The prophet and his period

Isaiah means 'Yahweh (is) salvation', a name well suited to the 'evangelical prophet'. The list of kings indicates that he prophesied for at least 40 years, from about 740 BC, the last year of Uzziah (cf. 6:1), until some point after the Jerusalem siege of 701 in the time of Hezekiah, whose reign continued to 687/6.

1:2–4 The great accusation

The appeal to heavens and earth recalls the parting injunction of Moses (cf. Dt. 30:19), to which the emphatic sons adds a note of personal intensity. In the Lord's direct utterance of vv. 2b, 3 (I . . . me . . . my) with the confirming comment of v. 4, we are already at the heart of the crisis: God's family has broken with Him. (V. 3 is still more poignant in the terse original, without the but. In v. 4a the sense may well be '(God's) offspring, evildoers!'—the same paradox as in v. 2b.) The title, the Holy One of Israel, is almost peculiar to Isaiah, with twelve occurrences in chs. 1–39 and thirteen in 40–66. Elsewhere it is found only twice. It echoes the seraphim's cry (cf. 6:3), yet mitigates the remoteness of 'holy' by the fact of God's self-giving to Israel. Ho. 11:9 anticipates the thought.

1:5–9 The devastation of Judah

Whether this is one of Isaiah's later oracles, placed here to open the book on a note of urgency, or whether it is a flash of pre-vision (the 'as' and 'like' of vv. 7d, 8d, rather suggest this, for the prophet seems to be describing what only he can see), either way it highlights certain themes given him at his call. Cf. the closed minds of v. 5a with 6:9f.; the devastation of v. 7 with 6:11f.; the sparing of the few in v. 9 with 6:13. Here is the first hint of the 'Remnant' motif, to be prominent as the prophecy develops (see especially 10:20–22).

5, 6 The picture is not of a sick man, but of someone flogged within an inch of his life, yet asking for more. V. 5a makes this point, and the symptoms of 6b are those of inflicted injuries; sores should be 'weals', as in 53:5 ('stripes'). 7, 8 The literal reality comes out here: it is the land of Judah trampled under foreign hordes, with only Jerusalem (Zion) left standing. It is evidently the aftermath of Sennacherib's invasion, which has its outline in 2 Ki. 18:13, its effects glimpsed in Is. 37:30–32, and its statistics recorded on the Taylor Prism where no fewer than forty-six walled towns are claimed as captured, together with 'innumerable villages' and a fifth of a million people. The booth is the field-worker's or watchman's shanty, a forlorn relic of the harvest. 9 So much for glorious Zion—within an ace of being wiped out like Sodom.

1:10–20 Pious corruption and its cleansing

10ff. To be addressed as Sodom was virtually charge and sentence in one. As a disaster site, Sodom meant all that Pompeii or Hiroshima have come to signify to us; hence v. 9. For ill repute it stood alone—until Isaiah spoke v. 10. He was supported by Ezekiel (cf. Ezk. 16:48) and by our Lord (cf. Mt. 11:23), who measured guilt by opportunity. Of all prophetic outbursts at religious unreality (cf. 1 Sa. 15:22; Je. 7:21–23; Ho. 6:6; Am. 5:21–24; Mi. 6:6–8) this is the most powerful and sustained. Its vehemence is unsurpassed, even in Amos, and the form and content build up together. First the offerings are rejected, then the offerers (vv. 11, 12); but while God's tone sharpens from distaste to revulsion, the specific accusation is held back to the final lurid phrase of v. 15, when at once the pace quickens with the rain of blows, the imperatives of repentance, in vv. 16, 17, only to throw into relief the measured climax of the passage in the great offer of salvation in vv. 18–20.

God is here repudiating not His ordinances but their abuse by the impenitent, together with the whole notion that piety and perfidy (v. 13c) can ever coexist. The reproach, 'Sons . . . have rebelled against me' (vv. 2ff.), and the charge, 'Your hands are full of blood' (v. 15), are related as organically as the two great commandments (Mt. 22.36–40); therefore repentance must be at once fully practical (vv. 16, 17) and fully personal (vv. 18–20).

18 It is striking that the great offer is introduced, like the great accusation of 2ff., with an echo of the law courts: let us reason together, i.e. let us argue our case (cf. Jb. 23:7). God must have frank confrontation; but, given this, He can change the unchangeable and delete the indelible (the scarlet and crimson were not only glaring: they were fast colours); only so can the call, 'Wash yourselves' (v. 16) be anything but a mockery. 19, 20 remind us once more of Dt. 30:15–20 (cf. on v. 2, above), which could almost be called the text of the discourse.

1:21–31 God's lament and resolve

1:21–23 Lost purity. 21, 22 As in a funeral dirge ('How are the mighty fallen!', 2 Sa. 1:25; cf. the 'How—!' of Is. 14:12; La. 1:1, etc.) the theme is vanished glory; even the metaphors for it tail off from the tragic to the trivial (wife . . . silver . . . wine). Only the moral loss is lamented: not David's empire or Solomon's wealth, simply their justice. 23 presents in miniature the same progression from spiritual revolt to social injustice which was traced between vv. 2 and 17.

1:24–26 Refining fire. God takes up His own metaphor from v. 22, to reveal the fiery aspect of love and the merciful aspect of judgment. It is love, the opposite of indifference, which counts your dross as my foes; cf. 62:1; Rev. 3:19.

1:27–31 Destroying fire. God's line between friend and foe, the redeemed and the destroyed, runs right through Zion: not between Jew and Gentile but between converts (those in her who repent, i.e. who 'turn') and rebels. For the latter, the fire is the end, not the beginning. The key to the metaphor of oaks and gardens (vv. 29, 30) is in v. 31: they stand here for human strength and organization, which one is tempted to trust, i.e. the strong man and his work, impressive but precarious; cf. Am. 2:9. (It is unnecessary to see a reference to idols or fertility rites—e.g. the miniature 'gardens of Adonis' whose withering re-enacted the annual death of the god—although these might have suggested the unusual metaphor.) There is a modern ring to the warning that man's very skill can be his undoing, the spark (v. 31) that sets off the conflagration.

2:1 - 4:6 GOD'S JERUSALEM AND MAN'S

2:1 The new heading suggests that these prophecies may have circulated as a unit before their inclusion in the full collection. They alternate sharply between the final glory of Jerusalem and its sordid present.

2:2–5 The city of God

Here, as in the nearly identical Mi. 4:1–5, is seen the true eminence of Zion, that the Lord is in her (cf. Ps. 68:15, 16, where higher peaks look on with envy); and this is the only glory of the church. Her role is to draw men (vv. 2c, 3a), not to dragoon them; but their need is of God's uncompromising truth and rule (vv. 3b, 4a; cf. 42:4), the firm centre to any perfect circle. The idyllic close to the prophecy (v. 4b, c) cannot be torn away from the opening, or we are left with the bitter caricature of this scene in Joel 3:9, 10. So, both here and in Micah, vision issues in appeal (v. 5), not to dream of a world movement one day, but to respond in the present and on the spot.

Perhaps our Lord had this passage in mind when the first token of the Gentile inflow elicited His prophecy, in Jn. 12:32, of being lifted up (the same verb, in a richer sense, as in the LXX of Is. 2:2b) to draw all men to Himself.

2:6–9 The city of mammon

The flood of superstition (v. 6) alliances (v. 6c), wealth (v. 7a), armaments (v. 7b) and idols (v. 8), making cosmopolitan Judah anything but the light to the nations pictured just above, suggests the days of Jotham or Ahaz, early in Isaiah's career, between the prosperity of Uzziah and the reforms of Hezekiah. Thronged though it is, the land is destitute: it has everything but God (v. 6a).

6 On the reputation of the Philistines for soothsaying, cf. 1 Sa. 6:2ff.; 2 Ki. 1:2ff. 7 On the materialism shown here see Dt. 17:16, 17. 8 The word for idols (Heb. 'elîlîm) is a favourite term in Isaiah, perhaps because it is identical with the adjective 'worthless' (cf. Jb. 13:4). 9 Man and men are translated 'low and high' in Ps. 49:2, very much as in AV, RV here; but this is to read rather too much into them. They recur, as a way of saying 'everyone', in vv. 11 and 17.

2:10–22 The terror of the Lord

The ominous refrains (vv. 10b, 19b, 21b; 11 and 17) and the immensity of the scene make this a poem of extraordinary power. It consummates Isaiah's opening vision of the Lord 'high and lifted up' (6:1), and provides the final argument against reliance on earthly might, which is a constant theme of his prophecy. The fact that 'the Lord of hosts has a day' (v. 12) gives Isaiah's preaching the same forward thrust as Paul's (cf. Acts 17:31)—an element the church tends to lose—and in this passage the reference is clearly to the last day, not some intermediate crisis. The apocalyptic chs. 24–27 will attend to this in closer detail.

The array of high things covers much of what we perennially find impressive in natural resources (vv. 13, 14), constructed defences (v. 15), technical and cultural achievements (v. 16; see below), and above all, in man himself and man-made religion (vv. 17, 18). But the end is more striking still, its scene of frantic haste (like that of Rev. 6:15ff.) throwing into relief the present patience of God, who could reduce us in a moment to ignominious flight and to flinging away what He has so long commanded us to put away (v. 20).

16 Tarshish perhaps means a refinery, and ships so named would be those built to carry a cargo of ingots. Or it may stand for Tartessus, in Spain, and for far-ranging vessels (cf. 23:6). The rare word for craft (AV 'pictures', RV 'imagery') has, it seems, the sense of 'ships', stressing in this instance their beauty, by the accompanying epithet, rather than their size. 22 is absent from LXX, but it has the same important function as v. 5, to translate vision into action. The allusion to nostrils . . . breath is to man's slender hold on life; it makes an effective prelude to the next chapter.

3:1–15 Judgment by decay

Here all is as beggarly as in the previous scene it was cosmic and overpowering. It is a study in disintegration, through the pressure of scarcity on a people without ideals. The scarcity, which is desperate, is twofold, of material things (food and water, v. 1; clothing, v. 7) and of leadership (vv. 2ff.). In parts of Judah the prophecy no doubt was beginning to come true by the time the Assyrians had done their pillaging and deporting (see on 1:5–9), but its real fulfilment waited a century to Nebuchadrezzar's removal of the ablest citizens to Babylon (cf. 2 Ki. 24:14), leaving behind an utterly weak and irresponsible régime.

2, 3 The list of leading men provides a first-hand glimpse of the society of Isaiah's day, whose respected figures included a liberal sprinkling of charlatans (diviner . . . magician . . . expert in charms). 4ff. But for all the misrule of this company, worse was to come: first in sheer incompetence and resultant anarchy (vv. 4, 5), and finally in a ruin so complete that it would seem irretrievable (vv. 6–8). The boys and babes of v. 4 are a telling metaphor, like the 'children' and 'women' of v. 12; but the heap of ruins (v. 6) may well be meant literally. In spite of the assurance that Jerusalem would not fall to Sennacherib (e.g. 37:33ff.) Isaiah saw as plainly as Micah that its final glory (cf. 2:2ff.) would have to be preceded by destruction (e.g. 22:4f.; 32:14; 39:6; cf. Mi. 3:12; 4:1ff.). It was no part of his teaching (though this is often asserted) that God would unconditionally preserve His city.

Paradoxically, the utter defeatism which is predicted in vv. 6 and 7 is traced back in the following verses to the present spirit of bravado. 8, 9 The fine show of free thinking and moral daring described in vv. 8b and 9 not only affronts God Himself, who is the only source of glory (as the striking close of v. 8 makes plain), but leaves one ultimately nothing to believe in. After the sceptic has had his fling, he is left stranded in the wasteland he has helped to produce. So 13–15 pass sentence on Isaiah's swashbuckling contemporaries, who have set the fatal process in motion. Ch. 5 will be more explicit; it will not be more damning.

3:16 – 4:1 Silk to sackcloth

Triviality has never been more mercilessly exposed, or more abruptly overtaken by tragedy. Even the opening parade is jarring as well as absurd, against the ugly background of v. 15 which is its human cost. There is no need for caricature: the twenty-one items of finery (vv. 18–23) make a little kingdom of their own, enough to occupy the whole mind, and utterly vulnerable. The terrible transformation-scene (3:24 – 4:1) has often been enacted, and in vv. 25, 26 the fate of the individuals becomes symbolic of that of the mother-city itself—an image to be used again both of Babylon and Jerusalem (cf. 47:1ff.; 52:2).

Although these particular trivialities may seem remote, all generations—and both sexes—have their own solemn absurdities which can be all-absorbing. In the context of these chapters they present us with one more aspect of earthly glory, its emptiness, which must be put to shame before the glory of God. This splendour now breaks through in the following section.

4:2–6 The glory to come

The general tenor of the passage, in its context, is that salvation lies on the far side of judgment. Israel's glory must be that of new growth after destruction, of holiness after a fiery cleansing, and of God's 'Shekinah'—His manifested presence, as in the Exodus days.

2 Branch is a misleading term for the 'shoot of new growth' which is paralleled by the fruit of the land. The point is that Israel must be reborn: from her roots a new crop must spring up when judgment has removed all her present glory and all but a few survivors. It is the renewed community that is in mind at this point; later it will emerge that one Man will be this new growth par excellence (cf. Je. 23:5; Zc. 3:8; 6:12; and cf. similar expressions in Is. 11:1).

3 Notice the individualism: the new Israel will consist of the personally holy and personally saved (cf., with the last phrase, Ex. 32:32; Ezk. 9:4). But 5 depicts them as a community, assembled in a very different spirit from that of 1:13, and overarched by God's glory. This glory will now rest on the whole site, since all are holy, not merely on the sanctuary as in the wilderness. The hymn, 'Glorious things of thee are spoken', basing one of its verses on vv. 5 and 6, rightly sees here God's presence 'for a glory and a covering' over and around His church. 6 Cf. 25:4, 5.

5:1–30 THE BITTER VINTAGE

A self-contained sequence, this chapter has much in common with its predecessors (for the vineyard metaphor, cf. 3:14; for the humbling of the lofty, cf. 2:9 with 5:15) and it castigates some of the social sins we have already met. It brings the book's long overture to a strong climax.

5:1–7 The parable

This is a little masterpiece. 1 Its opening, as a love song, catches the ear and the imagination; the vineyard, like the walled garden and orchard in the Song of Solomon, will surely speak of a bride and her beauty, guarded for the bridegroom. 3, 4 But the listeners are brought up short by the anticlimax and the appeal for their opinion—only to find that like David before Nathan (2 Sa. 12:1–7) they have been assenting to their own impeachment (cf. also Mt. 21:40–43). 7 Finally, in the original language, the charge is pressed home by an unforgettable last line, terse as an epigram. Its double word-play defies reproduction, but might be freely rendered: 'Did he find right? Nothing but riot! Did he find decency? Only despair.'

The parable brings home, as nothing else could, the sheer unreason and indefensibility of sin—we find ourselves searching for some cause of the vine's failure, and there is none. Only humans could be as capricious as that.

5:8–23 The six woes

Here 'the wild grapes of Judah' (G. A. Smith's phrase) show themselves in the plainest of terms. The woes follow one another with increasing rapidity, to give a sense of mounting vehemence, as in the stretto ending of 1:12–17. They are a sample, not an inventory, related to Isaiah's prevailing theme of human arrogance and its downfall; so they are predominantly the sins of the high and mighty.

The attack has all the bite of personal portraiture. Here are the great, for all to see; they emerge as extortioners (vv. 8–10), playboys (vv. 11, 12; cf. vv. 22, 23) and scoffers, whose only predictable values are cash ones (vv. 18–23).

5:8–10 Extortioners. The property law which Naboth defended with his life (cf. Lv. 25:23; 1 Ki. 21:3) has become a dead letter, but the craving for empty acres will be ironically fulfilled. 10 The bath was a liquid measure equal to the dry ephah, of about 8 gallons; the homer (not to be confused with the omer of Ex. 16:36) was ten times as large (cf. Ezk. 45:11). So the harvest was to yield disastrously less than the sowing.

5:11–17 Playboys. Refusal to think, i.e. to face God's facts (vv. 12b, 13a), is anathema to the prophets (cf. Ho. 4:6; Am. 6:1–7; Je. 8:7), whether it takes the form of mindless religion (cf. 1:3, 10ff.), sophistry (cf. 5:20, 21), occultism (cf. 8:19, 20) or the sodden escapism depicted here. The judgment of these sensualists, like that of the fashion-crazed women of 3:16ff., will be to lose the one thing they have lived for (v. 13b), and to find themselves the object of a more insatiable appetite than their own (v. 14). 14 Sheol: see on 14:9, 15; 38:10, 18.

5:18–23 Scoffers. Since Hebrew often uses the same word for a thing and its outcome, v. 18 may mean 'who draw punishment (on themselves) . . . , who draw retribution (on themselves) . . .' (cf. Heb. of Gn. 4:13; Zc. 14:19). The next verse tends to confirm this. Alternatively, the metaphor may be intentionally strange, since the scoffer in his perversity is not dragged into sin but tugs eagerly at it, makes sure of it. There are such 'fearless thinkers' in most generations, whether blasphemous (v. 19), perverted (v. 20) or calmly omniscient (v. 21). They cut as fine a figure as the fearless drinkers of v. 22 and the realists of v. 23, who know the value of money.

5:24–30 God's scavengers

24, 25 The repeated therefore gives a doubly inevitable note to the judgment, in terms of logical outcome (v. 24) and judicial wrath (v. 25), both of which are always present when God punishes. The hand stretched out to strike will be glimpsed again in 9:12, 17, 21; 10:4; so this isolated reference could be a scribal displacement, but is better seen as a shadow of the approaching storm, uniting this chapter of judgment to its successors. 26–30 The army of terrifying precision and ferocity presented in the final verses, machine and wild beast in one, is Assyria's to the life. But this power, the greatest of its day, is at the Lord's beck and call (v. 26)—small comfort to the rebel, for whom this group of chapters ends without a ray of hope.

6:1–13 THE PROPHET'S CALL

Only now do we pause for the inaugural vision, so urgent was the opening call to repentance, and so necessary the detailed scene of these chapters to show what wrung Isaiah's confession from him (v. 5) and what was the context of the decree of hardening (vv. 9, 10). In this vision, the major concerns of the book are discernible: God's inescapable holiness and sole majesty; the glory He has decreed and the clearance it demands; the cleansing of the penitent and the resurgent life that will yet break forth from the stock of Israel.

1 King Uzziah died after, not before, Isaiah's call, as 1:1 makes clear. If his death has significance apart from its date, it is that he died a leper, for flouting God's holiness when 'his heart was lifted up' (2 Ch. 26:16, RV; cf. Is. 2:17). The themes of throne, temple, and 'King' in v. 5, suggest to some writers a festival of divine enthronement (see Introduction to Psalms), but there is no hard evidence for it; their importance in any case lies in showing to whom all human authority must bow.

2 Seraphim means 'fiery ones', an epithet suited to the serpents of Nu. 21:6, 8 and Is. 14:29b; 30:6. Here these winged creatures are man-like (cf. his feet; 'his hand', v. 6), but the point of the description is to re-emphasize the holiness of God, in whose presence even the dazzling and the sinless are overwhelmed, fit neither to see Him nor be seen (v. 2b), yet swift to serve (v. 2, end) and tireless to praise Him (v. 3). 3 The antiphon, for all its brevity, thunders out (cf. v. 4) the nature, name and power of God in its first line (hosts, Heb. ṣᵉbā'ôṯ, are the armies, or resources, which He commands in heaven and earth), and in its second line the scope and character of His dominion. Glory is the shining-out of what He is, and therefore of His holiness; the whole earth, not merely Israel, was made by and for this. The vast implications of it for judgment and salvation are seen in Nu. 14:21ff.; Is. 11:9; 40:5; Hab. 2:14. Full. Notice the variants on the theme of fullness in vv. 1, 3, 4.

4, 5 The shaking of foundations, the darkness and the dismay awaken echoes of Sinai (Ex. 19:16–18) and premonitions of judgment: see the NT's comment on all these in Heb. 12:18–29, and note the relevance of Mt. 5:8. It is integral to Isaiah's message that his words will be those of a forgiven man, himself as guilty as those to whom he will offer life or death. 6, 7 It is also characteristic that judgment is prominent in the cleansing: the fiery messenger and burning coal must have presaged at first anything but salvation (cf. 1:25f.; 4:4); yet they came from the place of sacrifice and spoke the language of atonement (forgiven is from the Heb. verb k-p-r, to atone). The burning coal symbolizes the total significance of the altar from which it came; that the penalty of sin was paid by a substitute offered in the sinner's place. The symbol, applied to Isaiah's lips, the point at which his need was most pressing, assures him of personal forgiveness.

8, 9 Isaiah's Here I am! Send me is doubly remarkable: first for its contrast to his previous despair (v. 5) and to the diffidence of, say, Moses or Jeremiah; and secondly for the fact that this human voice is accepted in the heavenly court. See 1 Ki. 22:19ff. and Rev. 5:1ff. for comparison and contrast. 10–13 The decree of hardening, quoted in full or in part at least six times in the NT (e.g. Mt. 13:14f.; Acts 28:26f.), should be read through to its conclusion in vv. 11–13, where the judgment is seen to clear the ground for new growth. Isaiah fulfilled this commission to blind and deafen by proclaiming (not withholding) the truth. God here shares with the prophet the critical significance of his ministry. Sinful Israel has come to the point where one more rejection of the truth will finally confirm them for inevitable judgment. The dilemma of the prophet is that there is no way of saving the sinner but by the very truth whose rejection will condemn him utterly. The one sign of life (cf. Jb. 14:7–9; Is. 11:1) is absent from the LXX, which omits v. 13c; but the Dead Sea Isaiah Scroll (1 Q ISa) supports our text, and it is inconceivable that Isaiah's doctrine of the godly remnant should have contradicted his opening commission. So the vision ends with hope: instead of the 'seed of evildoers' (1:4, AV, RV) there will survive the holy seed—an expression of infinite promise in the light both of v. 3, concerning holiness, and of the recurrent pledges of the victorious 'seed' in Gn. 3:15; 22:18, etc.; Gal. 3:16.

7:1 – 12:6 STORM AND SUN: ASSYRIA AND IMMANUEL

These chapters have been called 'The Book of Immanuel', after the promised child of 7:14; 8:8, whose nature and reign emerge in 9:1–7; 11:1–10, against a background of local menace (7:1ff.) and world-wide dispersion (11:11ff.). The prophecies arise straight out of a contemporary crisis, but they extend to the last days (9:1) and the whole earth (11:9, 10; 12:4, 5).

7:1–17 Isaiah confronts King Ahaz

7:1–9 The call to faith. The date is c. 735 BC, and the situation a desperate bid by Israel and Syria to unite their neighbours against the all-conquering Assyria. On Judah's refusal to co-operate, they have arrived in force to replace her king with their own man, Ben-Tabeel (v. 6).

3 Isaiah's intervention, amid the general alarm, is impressive and significant. His son Shear-jashub ('A remnant will (re)turn') was a living portent of judgment and salvation (see on 1:27; cf. 8:18); the very meeting-place would prove, one day, how fatal was the course the king was set on (cf. 36:2); 4 above all, the injunction, Be quiet, do not fear was the first of a lifelong series of appeals for trust instead of intrigue (cf. v. 9b; 8:12, 13; 28:16; especially 30:15). The appeal was rational enough: Syria and Israel, the two smouldering stumps, or 'fag-ends' (Cheyne), would soon be snuffed out. Syria was crushed in 732, while Israel lost her northern territories as early as 734, her national existence in 722, and her racial identity through a series of re-peoplings which continued to at least the reign of Esarhaddon (cf. Ezr. 4:2), by the end of which (669) she was indeed 'no longer . . . a people' (v. 8b).

7b–9a The force seems to be that whereas by implication Judah is under the only God, her enemies are inevitably under men—and what men; to name them is enough! 9b, the call to faith, is the pith of Isaiah's preaching, with a slogan-like play on words, as elusive to the translator as that of 5:7. It might be paraphrased (somewhat after Moffatt): 'Hold God in doubt, you'll not hold out!', or 'Unsure—insecure!'

7:10–17 The sign of Immanuel. 11, 12 To offer any proof that Ahaz cared to name made it clear that the call to faith was (and is) primarily a call to the will (cf. Jn. 7:17). To wave the offer aside was to reject God flatly, but Ahaz had already made up his mind. Faith played no part in his religion (cf. 2 Ki. 16:3f., 10ff.) or his politics. Behind the smooth scriptural talk (v. 12; cf. Dt. 6:16) lay a plan to outwit his enemies by making friends with the biggest of them (cf. 2 Ki. 16:7ff.). What kind of friend Assyria would prove, Isaiah made clear in v. 17, reinforced by vv. 18–25.

13ff. Meanwhile God had His own sign, for a wider audience than Ahaz (the you in vv. 13, 14 is plural, for David's whole dynasty), and of richer meaning than a show of power. The attendant details partly reassure (v. 16), partly warn (v. 17); the curds and honey are enigmatic, as symbols of natural plenty (cf. v. 22; Ex. 3:8) yet also of a land depopulated (v. 22b) and untilled (cf. 23–25). But the heart of the sign is Immanuel. Who he is remains unsaid; it will emerge in 9:6f.; 11:1ff. Enough, so far, that while the king calls in an army God looks to the birth of a child (cf. Gn. 17:19).

How the sign fits the crisis is much debated. As a straight prophecy of Christ (cf. Mt. 1:22f.) it may seem too remote to speak to Ahaz; yet the sign was for the threatened house of David (vv. 6, 13; see paragraph above), and the very vision of a coming prince was itself a reassurance. Cf. 37:30; Ex. 3:12; Rom. 4:11, for signs to confirm faith rather than compel it. See also on 8:1–4, below. But God may have unveiled the distant scene by way of the near. Some suggest that the sign had immediate value in (a) the time it indicated (the few years from the conception of a child—any child—now, to his reaching the age of conscious choice: v. 16); or (b) the name ('God (is) with us') which a contemporary mother would be moved to give her son—the opposite of Ichabod (cf. 1 Sa. 4:21); or (c) the rank, if it announced a royal birth, which tends to be a harbinger of hope. (But on any reckoning this child could not be Hezekiah, born some years before.) These possibilities are not necessarily in conflict with each other, nor with the long-term prediction of Christ.

14 For RSV's term young woman, AV and RV have the preferable word 'virgin', supported by LXX as quoted in Mt. 1:23. But the nearest English equivalent is 'girl': it describes a potential bride in Gn. 24:43, and the young Miriam in Ex. 2:8; it presumes rather than states virginity, and is a term outgrown at marriage. Before its NT fulfilment its miraculous implications would pass unnoticed, overshadowed by those of e.g. a. – c. above. (For a full discussion, see E. J. Young, Studies in Isaiah, 1954, pp. 143–198.) The tenses of shall conceive and bear are indeterminate: the Hebrew participles do not distinguish between present and future. 15 When should probably be 'until' or 'in order that' (cf. AV).

7:18 – 8:22 The choice expounded

7:18–25 Invasion and its aftermath. The two metaphors in vv. 18–20 make the swarms of looting soldiers not only an uncomfortably vivid prospect but clearly a divine scourge, a theme developed in 10:5ff. 20 On the hired razor, cf. Ezk. 29:18–20. The irony was that Ahaz imagined he had hired it. 21–25 The point is the sad spectacle of the promised land reverting to jungle for lack of Israelites, its abundance (v. 22) a rebuke to their sparseness, and its wild state a proof of their decline. (The 'silverlings' of AV, RV (v. 23) are silver coins, denoting the former value of the vines.) It is the kind of reproach that a failing church might receive from inherited glories and commitments which it can no longer sustain.

8:1–4 The sign of Maher-shalal-hash-baz. The sign of Immanuel (7:14ff.), although it concerned ultimate events, did imply a pledge for the immediate future, in that however soon Immanuel were born, the present threat would have passed before he could be even aware of it. But the time of his birth was undisclosed; hence the new sign is given, to deal only with the contemporary scene, and with its darker aspect. This child would be of ordinary birth, and by his name, 'Quick-pickings-Easy-prey' (J. B. Phillips), he would be a standing witness (cf. 8:18) to God's predictions both about the enemy at the gate (v. 4; cf. 7:16) and about Assyria's next victim, Judah itself (cf. 7:17). The careful attestation (v. 2) would attract notice and also confirm that the name had preceded the event. (For a later placard see 30:7, 8.)

8:5–8 God's gentle flow, and Assyria's torrent. Since Shiloah (cf. Jn. 9:7) is another word for 'conduit' (in this case an open aqueduct, not Hezekiah's tunnel, which was still in the future), it was probably the encounter with the king (7:3) that suggested this figure for God's quiet help. By calling in evil to fight evil, Judah would find herself in the path of the very flood she had unleashed; and the land she was jeopardizing was Immanuel's. But there is hope as well as menace in the phrase even to the neck (v. 8); for Immanuel's sake there is a limit set (cf. 10:24ff.).

8:9–15 God our refuge or our ruin. 9, 10 These splendidly defiant verses are the prophet's response to the meaning of Immanuel, God is with us; and to the Lord's insistence (his strong hand upon me, v. 11) that the people should reshape all their thinking, including their terms for things, and their emotional attitudes (v. 12), round God Himself. 12a Conspiracy may refer to the intimidating coalition of 7:2; alternatively it may mean no more than 'league' or 'alliance', and be the term Ahaz was using for his siding with Assyria (cf. E. J. Kissane, The Book of Isaiah, 2 vols., 1941, 1943). If the latter, Isaiah is saying 'This is no alliance worth the name'; i.e. 'Don't trust Assyria or fear Syria: trust and fear God.' 12b, 13a are quoted in 1 Pet. 3:14, 15 (which strikingly identify Christ with the Lord of hosts); cf. the call to a transformed outlook in Rom. 12:2. It is as the most solid of all realities that God is presented here: either all-sufficient or insuperable (vv. 14, 15).

8:16–22 The light withdrawn. The general tenor of the paragraph is that Israel is refusing the light (vv. 19ff.) and thereby losing God's teaching and blessing (vv. 16, 17). All they will have is signs (v. 18); all they can expect is darkness (vv. 20ff.).

But 16–18 are a kernel of immense promise. With the expression my disciples, God introduces a new definition of His people and their relation to Him (taken up in 50:4; 54:13, Heb.; cf. Jn. 6:45). These are the willing exceptions to 6:9ff.; Isaiah's responsive faith (v. 17) speaks for such, and the little group of v. 18 is seen in Heb. 2:13 as typical of the church gathered round Christ—a model church indeed, teachable, faithful, expectant, conspicuous. On the function of Isaiah's sons as signs and portents, see 7:3; 8:1–4. (The speakers in vv. 16 and 17ff. are evidently the Lord (16) and the prophet (17ff.); the imperatives of v. 16 are singular, and there is no individual whom the prophet could be naturally addressing. An attractive alternative to Isaiah as implied recipient of God's message might be Immanuel (cf. v. 8c; Heb. 2:13), but Isaiah's sign-bearing sons seem to be in mind in v. 18.)

19–22 The contrast to this godly group is very marked here. With mediums instead of prophets, gibberish instead of teaching, and the dead as guides to the living, it is small wonder that there is no dawn. (In v. 20, while RSV has one possibility, RV is perhaps preferable with 'If they speak not according to this word, surely there is no morning (better, no dawn) for them'.) For the prohibition of such practices, see, e.g., Dt. 18:9–12.

9:1–7 The Messianic dawn

1–5 The Hebrew Bible takes v. 1 with the previous chapter, but Mt. 4:15, 16 makes it the opening of our passage. Zebulun and Naphtali are highly topical here, for they fell to Assyria within months of Isaiah's meeting with Ahaz (see on 7:1–9). So the first part of Israel to succumb would be the first to see the glory (v. 1b)—a striking prophecy which went unheeded: cf. Jn. 1:46; 7:52. The mounting relief and joy in vv. 1–5 as the trappings of war are abolished prepare us to meet the deliverer; but instead of some latter-day Gideon (cf. v. 4b) it is the child (v. 6) already foretold as Immanuel in 7:14; 8:8. (In v. 3 (2, MT) the Heb. text has 'not' (lō') instead of its (lō). The two words, identical in sound, are easily exchanged. Cf. on 63:9.)

6, 7 Whereas 7:14 concentrates on his birth, and 11:1ff. on his kingdom, 9:6, 7 chiefly emphasizes his person. Other scriptures confirm that the first three titles imply divinity: e.g. wonderful regularly means 'supernatural' (cf. especially Jdg. 13:18), and it is Yahweh who is 'wonderful in counsel' in Is. 28:29. There have been attempts to reduce Mighty God to 'god-like hero' (cf. Ezk. 32:21, where, however, the term is plural), but Is. 10:21 uses the identical term alongside 'the Lord, the Holy One of Israel'. Everlasting Father has no exact parallel; but the poetic phrase 'everlasting hills' and the divine epithet 'who inhabits eternity' (57:15, Heb.) underline the paradox of so naming a child yet to be born. Father signifies the paternal benevolence of the perfect Ruler over a people whom He loves as His children. Peace in Hebrew implies prosperity as well as tranquillity, and v. 7 takes up the Hebrew of 'Prince' (in the word government) as well as 'peace', adding now the first explicit assurance that the prince will be Davidic (cf. 11:1). On the final phrase of v. 7, see Ezk. 36:22; Zc. 8:2.

9:8 – 10:4 The shadow over Samaria

God's hand, poised to strike, was seen in 5:25; the same threat overhangs this passage, punctuating it at 9:12, 17, 21; 10:4. While the northern kingdom is principally in mind (vv. 9, 21), the final passage (10:1–4) might well include Judah, as did 5:24, 25.

9:8–12 Judgment on bravado. To laugh off the facts (v. 10) may put heart into an audience, but it is a refusal to face what the symptoms imply. Nothing can then avert judgment. The adversaries of Rezin (v. 11, mg.) would be principally the Assyrians (see on 7:1–9); the pressures of v. 12 may have developed between the Assyrian conquest of Damascus in 732 and Samaria's fall in 722.

9:13–17 Judgment on laxity. Judgment begins with leaders (cf. Jas. 3:1) but does not excuse those who follow (v. 17). Among the former it is the prophets who earn God's contempt as well as His censure, compared, as Delitzsch puts it, to 'the tail of a fawning dog'.

9:18–21 Judgment on disunity. Sin, doubly destructive, first reduces society to a jungle, then spreads its fires through it—as our modern strifes still bear witness. But self-inflicted judgment is still God's judgment: vv. 19a, 21b.

10:1–4 Judgment on injustice. Not the raw passions of the earlier paragraphs but the legalized wrongs of government (v. 1) make the climax to the series. The haunting questions of v. 3 could undermine the exploits of a lifetime, all of them within the law.

10:5–34 God's axe over Judah

This is an important treatment of God's control of history, in the world at large and among His chosen people. Vv. 9–11 seem to date the oracle after the fall of Samaria (722 BC); but Isaiah's complete prior certainty of this event (cf. 8:4) must not be overlooked.

10:5–19 Assyria, God's tool. 5–15 The knowledge that the aggressor is wielded by God puts the question of wicked men's success in its proper context, by showing that it serves the ends of justice when it seems to defy them (vv. 6, 7), and is neither impressive in itself (v. 15) nor ultimately unpunished (v. 12). Its hollowness is self-confessed, incidentally, in the samples of Assyrian thinking: the complacency of vv. 10, 11, the pride of v. 13a, and the thief's mentality of vv. 13b, 14. The strong cities of v. 9 (cf. 36:19) mark the enemy's inexorable approach, preserved in the Hebrew word order, from Carchemish on the Euphrates down to nearby Samaria. Cf. the more localized, whirlwind advance in vv. 27b–31.

16–19 Of the two metaphors, fever and a forest fire, intertwined in these verses (Heb. has no convention against this), the former has the extra bite, perhaps, of corresponding to the actual means God would use against the Assyrian army (see on 37:36), while the latter reiterates Isaiah's dominant theme of bringing low what is lofty (cf. vv. 33f.; 2:12f.).

10:20–23 A remnant converted. Both implications of both terms in the expression 'A remnant will return' (Shear-jashub, cf. 7:3) are brought out in this pregnant passage. On the one hand, no more than a sprinkling will survive the approaching judgment or come back from deportation (vv. 22, 23; cf. 11:11); on the other hand, return . . . to the mighty God (v. 21; cf. 9:6) implies conversion. God looks for men who repent; whose trust, unlike that of Ahaz, is in Him rather than in man (vv. 20, 21). Such is the true Israel: it is not the whole mass of Abraham's descendants (see the allusion in v. 22a to Gn. 22:17; cf. Rom. 4:16; Gal. 3:7ff.). Paul not only quotes this passage (Rom. 9:27f.) but argues extensively that the 'remnant, chosen by grace' (Rom. 11:5) is a key to God's dealings with Israel and the world.

21 On the mighty God, see on 9:6. 22, 23 On the double mention of a decreed devastation, note the deliberation with which God acts throughout this chapter: see the poised hand of v. 4 (with 9:12, etc.), the impartiality of vv. 12, 25, the concern for simple justice in vv. 2, 22b, and the positive outcome envisaged in vv. 20, 21.

10:24–34 The aggressor halted. This is a double appeal for faith: first by recalling 'His love in time past' (vv. 24–27), secondly by depicting an Assyrian threat suddenly brought to nothing (vv. 28–34). This is pictured as a thrust from the north, covering the last 10 or 20 miles to Jerusalem (but Rimmon, v. 27b RSV, is only a conjecture). Since the actual route of Sennacherib's force was to be from Lachish (cf. 36:2), southwest of Jerusalem, the aim of the oracle is not, presumably, to inform but to inspire, first conjuring up the most vivid impression of a northern foe swooping on Jerusalem (cf. E. J. Young, in loc.), then abruptly changing the scene to the toppling of forest giants (vv. 33, 34) —the distinctive judgment metaphor of this prophecy (cf. 2:12, 13; 6:13; 10:18, 19). It gives dramatic reinforcement to Isaiah's 'be not afraid' (v. 24), his watchword throughout the crisis (cf. 7:4; 8:12, 13).

11:1 – 12:6 The Messianic kingdom

We return to the theme of Immanuel, and while the fallen fortunes of the royal house (v. 1) reveal the dark side of the sign given to Ahaz (7:13ff.), the rest is bright.

11:1–5 The perfect king. The tree, felled but not finished, makes a telling contrast to the razed forest of Assyria (10:33, 34). In 6:13 the tree-stump was Israel, living on in the Remnant (see also on 4:2); here it is the house of David, and its growing-point is one man.

1–3a The Spirit (v. 2), not royal birth alone, fits him for office, like the judges and early kings (cf. Jdg. 3:10; 6:34, etc.; 1 Sa. 10:10; 16:13), so that he is a Solomon, Gideon and David in one, yet not partially or fitfully endued, but abidingly (v. 2a) and richly. The gifts are threefold rather than sevenfold: wisdom and understanding for government (cf. 1 Ki. 3:9–12), counsel and might for war (cf. 9:6; 28:6; 36:5, Heb.), and knowledge and the fear of the Lord for spiritual leadership (cf. 2 Sa. 23:2). The delight (rather than 'quick understanding', AV) of v. 3a carries the implication that the fear of the Lord is fragrant to him.

3b–5 show these powers exercised in turn, making him the guide, guardian and example of his people. It is already emerging in v. 4b that he is supernaturally endowed, and this is clear beyond doubt in the ensuing verses.

11:6–9 Paradise regained. In this idyllic scene the title 'Prince of Peace' (9:6) is perfectly unfolded. Significantly, peace is hard-won: it follows judgment (cf. v. 4b) and springs from righteousness (cf. v. 5), true to the sequence expounded in 32:17; but its heart is the relationship expressed as the knowledge of the Lord (v. 9; cf. Je. 31:34). As a picture this is unforgettable, and expresses reconciliation, concord and trust with supreme effectiveness. The reign of Christ already produces this kind of transformation in the sphere of human character, and will ultimately change the whole creation (cf. Rom. 8:19ff.). Whether this will be realized literally as depicted here is another matter; it seems better to view this as an earthly expression of the 'new heavens and . . . new earth' (65:17, 25) in which variety will not be enmity, and the weak will be the complement, no longer the prey, of the strong. With v. 9b, cf. Hab. 2:14.

11:10–16 The great homecoming. 10, echoed in v. 12a, bursts the bounds of nationality, while emphasizing that salvation is in only one name under heaven. This king is both root and offspring (cf. v. 1) of the royal house: cf. Rev. 22:13, 16. Note the voluntary response of the nations in vv. 10, 12a; cf. 2:3; 42:4; 51:5, etc. At the same time, not all will flock to him, and it is as clear in this passage as elsewhere that those who choose enmity will find, logically enough, destruction (v. 14, cf. v. 4). 13, 14 The quenching of jealousy (cf. 9:20f.) is the human counterpart of vv. 6ff., liberating the combativeness of God's people for its proper use (v. 14; cf. Jas. 4:1, 7).

15, 16 The theme of a greater exodus will be greatly developed in the later chapters (e.g. 35:1ff.; 48:20ff.), and that of a highway from Assyria will acquire a richer meaning in 19:23ff.

12:1–6 The song of salvation. After the Exodus allusion (11:16) there are appropriate echoes of the song of Moses: cf. v. 2b with Ex. 15:2a, and less exactly, v. 5a with Miriam's response, Ex. 15:21a.

The anger that overhung Israel in the refrain of 9:12, 17, etc. is at last turned away, and the song celebrates the end of estrangement (v. 1), fear (v. 2) and want (v. 3). It is characteristic of Isaiah that quiet trust (v. 2) finds an early place here, and that God's comfort is the sequel to captivity (v. 1; cf., e.g., 40:1; 66:13). But God Himself is the true centre of the psalm: God in relation to the singer (vv. 1, 2); God known by His deeds (vv. 4, 5) and His name, i.e. His self-proclamation (note the unusual combination Yah Yahweh, v. 2, emphasizing the personal name expounded in Ex. 3:14, 15; also Isaiah's special term the Holy One of Israel, v. 6); above all, God present in power, great in your midst (v. 6).

13:1 – 23:18 MESSAGES FOR THE NATIONS

For all their obscurity of detail, these chapters teach a primary and central truth: that Yahweh's kingdom is the world. This is easy to announce in general terms; to spell it out, as this section does, is to show that this sovereignty is nothing titular, but actual and searching.

The oracles were given at various times (cf. 14:28; 20:1); brought together they form a prelude to the world-visions of chs. 24–27, and an interlude between the prediction of the Assyrian crisis in chs. 1–12 and its onset in chs. 28–39.

13:1 – 14:23 Babylon

That Isaiah the son of Amoz (13:1; cf. 1:1) should prophesy of Babylon as the great oppressor, anticipating her role of a hundred years on, has important implications for the authorship of chs. 40–66; see Introduction, p. 589.

13:1–16 The day of the Lord. 2 The poem plunges straight into a battle scene, with the signals and shouts of an attack which turns out to be a wholesale divine judgment (vv. 4, 5). 3 God's consecrated ones are His warriors (wars were holy wars: cf., e.g., Joel 3:9, AV mg.) whether they serve Him wittingly or unwittingly. The term is non-moral here, as v. 16, e.g., makes plain.

While Babylon is the focal point of the chapter (vv. 1, 19), it stands for something much bigger than itself, since the ambiguous word earth (vv. 5, 9), which need mean no more than 'land' (AV, RV), gives place to world in v. 11, in a setting of cosmic upheaval such as the NT uses to depict the last days: cf. vv. 10, 13 with Mt. 24:29. This is the city of man, not of one nation.

13:17–22 The overthrow of Babylon. 17 The Medes, as the major partner in Cyrus's Medo-Persian kingdom, were destined to conquer Babylon under Cyrus in 539 BC. Their military prowess (vv. 17f.), which overthrew the Babylonian Empire, was not needed against the city itself, taken without a struggle; but this was the beginning of the end for Babylon. 19–22 telescope a process which became complete only when Seleucus Nicator abandoned the city in the late 4th century BC, to build his new capital Seleucia, 40 miles away. 21, 22 The creatures of these verses (cf. 14:23; 34:11ff.; but 35:7) are not all identifiable, but are evidently repulsive and ceremonially unclean; hence satyrs, a kind of demon (cf. Lv. 17:7), is a more likely translation in v. 21 than RV mg.'s 'he-goats' (which were clean). The contrast between 'the glory of kingdoms' (v. 19) and this 'haunt of every foul spirit, . . . of every foul and hateful bird' (Rev. 18:2) reappears in the final overthrow of the ungodly world in Rev. 17 and 18—the world whose glory Satan offered to Jesus in Mt. 4:8f.

14:1, 2 The tables turned. Here is the germ of chs. 40ff., and particularly of chs. 56–66 in which the dominance of Israel is a major interest. The starting-point, as in ch. 40, is divine grace, described here in terms of emotion (contrast God's compassion (v. 1) with the heartlessness of 13:18) and of volition (choose). In this short space two aspects of the Gentiles' future relation to Israel are sketched, showing them as converts or as servants. With the resident aliens of v. 1, integrated into the community, cf. 56:3–8. The degrees of service glimpsed in v. 2, ranging from friendly help (2a) to bondage (2b), reappear in, e.g., 66:18–21 and 60:12–14, where see comments.

14:3–23 A taunt for the king of Babylon. 3, 4a God gives the last word on the great conquerors to be spoken by their victims, not their admirers. As to the identity of the king of Babylon, it is clearly not the ineffective Nabonidus, the final king (for whom Belshazzar deputized), but the whole dynasty, and the kingdom personified in it. See also on vv. 12ff., below.

The two movements of the taunt-song (vv. 4b–11; 12–21), framed by their prologue and epilogue (vv. 3, 4a; 22, 23), announce their themes at once, in 4b and 12, with the characteristic cry of comparison, 'How . . . !' (see on 1:21). Cf. ch. 47.

4b–11 The broken oppressor is the first theme: his real epitaph is the unspeakable relief the world feels at his passing (v. 7). God's name for such thrusters is not 'men of destiny' but 'he-goats' (Heb. for the leaders of v. 9), a description almost as deflating as the pathetic state to which they are all seen to come. The royal coverlet of v. 11 is the last brutal truth for the hedonist. Sheol (v. 9, etc.) is the general term for the realm of the dead; it is not the penal hell (cf. AV, RV here), for which the NT uses the term Gehenna. The word for shades (v. 9) is of uncertain derivation (see article 'Rephaim' in NBD); the poetic description here and in, e.g., Ps. 88:10; Is. 26:14, suggests a virtual suspension of existence; but the OT can look beyond this, on occasion, to the resurrection of the body (see on 26:19; 38:18).

12–21 The fallen Day Star ('Lucifer', AV) is the second theme: i.e. the tyrant's fatal ambition rather than his oppression. This song is often thought to tell of the revolt of Satan (taken with Ezk. 28); but this is a precarious conjecture. The tale of pride and downfall is at most only similar to what is said of Satan in, e.g., Lk. 10:18; 1 Tim. 3:6, and in any case, when Scripture speaks directly of his fall, it refers to the break-up of his régime, not his fall from grace (cf. Rev. 12:9ff.).

Some suggest that an existing tale of the morning star, lording it over the rest and falling to earth, may lie behind this poem (there are Canaanite verbal parallels to the personified Day Star and Dawn, to the title Most High and to the picture of a northern mount of assembly (v. 13) of the heavenly court); but such a tale, if it existed, has not come to light. The idea of storming heaven, however, was certainly connected with Babylon (i.e. Babel, Gn. 11). One of its ironies is the idea that to be like the Most High (v. 14) is to be self-exalted, whereas it is to be self-giving (cf. Phil. 2:5ff.). The ugliness as well as the brevity of the false glory is powerfully shown in vv. 16–21.

The expression the depths (or 'recesses') of the Pit (v. 15), matching the hoped-for recesses of the divine mount (v. 13, cf. RV), gives an early glimpse of the distinctions within Sheol which become clearer in the NT (cf. Lk. 16:26).

14:24–27 Assyria

This briefly reaffirms 10:5–34, on the immediate threat hanging over Judah. 24 God's assertion, As I have planned . . . picks up the very word used of Assyria's own plans in 10:7a ('intend'). 25 That the enemy should be broken in his apparent moment of victory, in my land, is characteristic of divine strategy (cf. Acts 4:27f.). 26, 27 On the hand . . . stretched out, cf. 9:12, etc.; 10:13, 15.

14:28–32 Philistia

Vv. 28 and 32 bring this oracle to life. Ahaz the pro-Assyrian is dead; Assyria is in difficulties (v. 29a); now a Philistine mission (v. 32a) arrives in Zion to propose a rebellion—an idea always after Hezekiah's heart. If this took place in 727, when the Assyrian Tiglath-pileser III died, v. 29a would have added force; but 716/15 is the more likely date (see NBD, pp. 217a, 220). It was as sharp a test of obedience for the new king as was that of ch. 7 for Ahaz; and the Philistines were formidable people to offend (cf. 2 Ch. 28:18f.) at this time.

God's reply is threefold: first, there is worse yet to come from Assyria (v. 29); secondly, Philistia is a doomed people (vv. 30b, 31); thirdly, true welfare is only in the Lord (vv. 30a, 32). It is the constant message of Isaiah: trust, not intrigue.

15:1 – 16:14 Moab

Intimate knowledge and intense sympathy, ready to alleviate judgment but powerless to avert it, are the special marks of this oracle, which is quoted and expanded in Je. 48. Moab had family ties with Israel (cf. Gn. 19:36f.) and particularly with David (cf. Ru. 4:17; 1 Sa. 22:3f.), yet it had nothing in common with Israel's faith, and appears in the OT as an evil influence (cf., e.g., Nu. 25) and inveterate enemy (cf. 2 Ki. 3:4ff.).

15:1–9 Defeat and flight. 1 The site of Ar is unknown; the consonants could be read as 'city', making it another term for Kir, i.e. Kir-hareseth or -heres (cf. 16:7, 11), Moab's chief stronghold (modern Kerak), situated in the south. With Kir fallen, all was lost, but the southward flight to Zoar (v. 5) in Edom suggests that the invasion had swept down from the north, whose cities named here (mostly on the King's Highway, cf. Nu. 21:21–30) had looked to Kir for a stand. 5 The anguish of this verse comes through again in 16:7, 9, 11. Sensitivity to the miseries of war (cf. Je. 4:19ff.) and generosity towards an enemy (cf., e.g., Ex. 23:4f.; Pr. 25:21f.) are not uncommon in the OT, but they are seldom combined as poignantly as here. 7 The refugees clutching their treasures (cf. Lk. 12:21) are apparently crossing a frontier; the Brook of the Willows may be the Wadi el-Hesy between Moab and Edom. 9 But despite God's compassion, the judgment is from Him, and must increase: cf. Mt. 23:37f.

16:1–5 Moab can look to Zion. 1, 2 Moab was advised to 'dwell in the rock' (Heb. Sela, cf. 2 Ki. 14:7; i.e. the Edomite fortress now known as Petra), like a nesting dove (cf. Je. 48:28). But here God has stirred the nest (v. 2) to make her seek a better refuge as a vassal of Zion. Lambs were the customary tribute from this sheep-raising country (cf. 2 Ki. 3:4). The verb in v. 1 may be either 'send ye' (AV, RV) or they have sent (RSV); the former seems preferable.

3–5 can be taken as Moab's plea to Judah (cf. RSV's quotation marks), but its Messianic climax makes it more probably God's charge to His people in response to the Moabite deputation (actual or foreseen) of v. 1. Many of Isaiah's oracles arose in this way (cf. 14:28ff.; 18:1ff., etc.). It is a little classic on the 'caring church', calling it to give its mind (counsel), its conscience (grant justice) and its strength (vv. 3b, 4) to the welfare of these outcasts (whom God seems to name, strikingly, 'my outcasts—Moab' (cf. RV)). It is in key with the Messianic régime, glimpsed at the end of this neglected oracle (vv. 4b, 5).

16:6–14 Moab's pride and fall. Moab's fatal ease is captured in the vintage metaphors of Je. 48:11: 'settled on his lees; he has not been emptied from vessel to vessel'. The vine, a mainstay of his prosperity, dominates this oracle as well, with its secondary products (v. 7), exports (v. 8b) and festivities (v. 10), all of them highly vulnerable.

12 has a bitter word-play in the Hebrew of presents himself . . . wearies himself, and its memorable final phrase shows the bankruptcy of all pagan religion, very much as our Lord does in Mt. 6:7. 14 The years of a hireling mean 'shorter rather than longer', like the grudging timekeeping of an uninterested worker.

17:1–14 Damascus

This is evidently from Isaiah's early days, when Syria and north Israel were hand in glove (see ch. 7), and their kingdoms still intact. Damascus is briefly told its fate, but Israel has the brunt of the rebuke, as well as the indignity of being classed with the heathen, her oracle placed among theirs.

3b, 4, perhaps worded so as to recall the departure of the glory in Eli's day (cf. 1 Sa. 4:21), give an alarming picture of vanished beauty and, with 5, methodical depredation. But God's plan to glean a handful of converts, worshipping their Maker (v. 7) instead of their manufactures, duly came to pass: see 2 Ch. 30:10f., 25. 10, 11 If this was a tragically wasteful process, these verses show that it was of Israel's choosing, in the double metaphor of the neglected stronghold (v. 10a) and the spoilt harvest (the latter depicts the farmer turning over good land to a fancy crop unsuited to it). 12–14 generalize the assurances given in, e.g., 7:8; 8:4; their most striking parallel is Ps. 46, and their most dramatic illustration (see v. 10) was soon to be provided: cf. 37:36.

18:1–7 Ethiopia

1 The word for Ethiopia here is Cush, or in our terms the Sudan; but Isaiah includes the region beyond the rivers (i.e. presumably the Atbara and Blue Nile) which suggests the present Ethiopia. The term for whirring (rather than AV's 'shadowing') is not unlike the word 'tsetse', imitating the buzzing of insects. 2 Everything emphasizes that the envoys of this chapter are from the ends of the earth; and the exotic appeal of this fact would be enhanced by their striking appearance (tall and smooth—not AV's 'scattered and peeled'!) and formidable reputation (v. 2b)—for Cush had now gained control of Egypt. Yet this deputation, like the rest (see on 14:28ff.), is dismissed with God's Go. (AV is again misleading: its insertion of 'saying' in v. 2a changes the speaker and the sense.) 3, 4 God has no need of intrigues: He will bide His time, working as silently as the seasons (v. 4). The enemy will reach the very mountains of Judah (v. 3; cf. 14:25), 5, 6 only to be cut down on the verge of victory, like a crop destroyed on the eve of harvest.

7 The final verse seems to look beyond the immediate crisis of Assyrian aggression which had brought the envoys to Jerusalem. Isaiah now sees the travellers in a new light, as the first of many who will come to Zion one day in homage (the Heb., lacking the word from in v. 7a, suggests that they will be themselves the homage gift). It is the prospect already seen in 2:3; 11:10; it will be further developed in chs. 60–62; it is expressed exultantly in Pss. 68:31ff.; 87:4.

19:1–25 Egypt

This oracle is a strong expression of the truth that God smites in order to heal (see v. 22). The initial breakdown is followed by a renewal which goes beyond anything promised to a Gentile nation in the OT. Perhaps Egypt is shown here in its two aspects: first, as the worldly power to which Israel was always looking (cf. 20:5), but secondly as part of God's world, for which He cares, with a place in His kingdom in which present ranks and races will be quite superseded.

19:1–15 Egypt brought to its knees. 1–4 The metaphor of God's swift cloud (v. 1) indicates that poetic imagery will carry the truths of this passage, in which every asset of Egypt is seen to fail. Her spiritual resources are, significantly, the first to crumble: her beliefs, morale (v. 1), unity (v. 2) and worldly wisdom (v. 3). Next will go her freedom (v 4); the fierce king could be one of her Ethiopian overlords, e.g. Tirhakah in Isaiah's lifetime, or one of her later conquerors, Persian or Greek; it could even be a native tyrant; it is the sequence, from decay to tyranny, that is important rather than an individual's identity. 5ff. Then God touches her physical lifeline, the Nile, and one by one her industries wither. The final state is one of helpless anarchy (vv. 11–15), all the more mortifying to a nation which had prided itself for 2,000 years on the schooling of its officials. 12 Cf. 1 Ki. 4:30. 13 Zoan and Memphis were the current and the ancient capitals of Egypt; and Zoan (probably Tanis, in the Delta) was remembered as the scene of the great oppression (cf. Ps. 78:43). 15 Cf. 9:14f.

19:16–25 Egypt converted. The fivefold refrain, In that day . . ., is a pointer (as elsewhere, e.g. 4:1, 2) to the day of the Lord. Isaiah foresees the conversion of the Gentiles, under the image of that of Israel's most ancient oppressor and seducer (cf. 30:2ff.). The process is traced from its beginnings in fear (vv. 16, 17), leading to submission (v. 18) and God-given access (vv. 19ff.: 'altar' and 'sacrifice'), and right on to fellowship (v. 23) and full acceptance (vv. 24f.).

18 If the five cities are meant literally, we cannot now identify them. More probably the expression either means 'a few', or else (so Kissane) alludes to the precedent in Jos. 10 where the conquest of five Canaanite cities led on to general victory. The City of the Sun would be On, later known as Heliopolis; but the Hebrew spells it here (perhaps punningly) 'city of destruction' (AV, RV). The point, either way, is the spiritual capture of an outstanding stronghold of heathenism. 19 In about 170 BC a temple was built at Leontopolis in Egypt by an ousted high priest, Onias IV, who appealed to v. 19 in justification. But the intention of the verse is, it seems, rather to speak typically: there will be holy ground where all was once profane. With the pillar, cf. Jacob's at Bethel, staking the claim to God's own territory (Gn. 28:13, 18).

23–25, reaching out with the other hand to embrace Assyria as well—so often coupled with Egypt in the worst of contexts (cf. Ho. 7:11; 9:3) —give an unsurpassed vision of the Gentiles' full inclusion in the kingdom. Israel will have only an equal part (a third, v. 24; but not third place), and her distinctive titles will be shared out with her cruellest enemies: my people, cf. Ho. 2:23; 1 Pet. 2:10; the work of my hands, cf. Is. 29:23.

20:1–6 The Ashdod crisis

An inscription by Sargon fills out this picture. The Philistine city of Ashdod had revolted against Assyria, which promptly deposed its king. A new ringleader, Yamani, carried on the struggle, with pledged support from Egypt and Ethiopia, and had also approached Judah. Isaiah's powerful dissuasion turned out to be fully justified: Egypt failed to fight, Ashdod was subjugated, and Yamani, who had fled to Ethiopia, was handed over to the Assyrians' tender mercies.

1–3 The title, commander in chief, is turtanu in Assyrian; hence AV, RV, 'Tartan'. The year was 711; the revolt had broken out in 713, and Isaiah's slave garb (naked would mean clad only in a loincloth) had been adopted then, unexplained, as v. 3 shows. (V. 2 is a parenthesis; see RSV.) The sackcloth was perhaps the rough garment distinctive of a prophet: cf. Zc. 13:4.

Since Judah was left unpunished by Assyria, it seems that the warning was taken. G. A. Smith points out that this sign language (cf. 8:18) brought the message home to the nation, not merely to the court. Isaiah's discomfort and humiliation were the price of his people's safety.

21:1–10 Babylon, 'The wilderness of the sea'

This oracle, like the next, has a strongly visionary quality (in the 'Watchman' metaphor) and a symbolic title. The subject emerges in v. 9 as the fall of Babylon; 1 the phrase wilderness of the sea seems to combine two pictures of nature untamed and encroaching, which are more explicit in Je. 51:42, 43. But the same consonants could yield simply 'wildernesses', or possibly (Kissane) 'destroyers'.

2–7 A disjointed, vivid picture builds up of an attack by the Persians (Elam) and Medes (v. 2) which will catch the defenders of Babylon unprepared and feasting (v. 5), just as Dn. 5 records of them. But Isaiah's involvement in the vision is its most striking feature. His great agitation in vv. 3, 4 is akin to Jeremiah's in Je. 4:19ff., even though the fall of this persecuting city, this place of sighing (v. 2), is the thing he has longed for (v. 4). But these opposite reactions throw incidental light on the writing of the later chapters, in that they are the very feelings of one to whom (as to the exiles) Babylon seemed both prison and home. If Isaiah was indeed to 'speak to the heart' (40:1) of a later generation, as if he were himself one of them, this deep involvement is clearly a prerequisite; it is the inner side of his prophesying. Note, too, his dual consciousness: he stands in some sense apart from his watchman self (v. 6), and must report only what he sees and hears (cf. Hab. 2:1–3). This objectivity is greatly stressed (vv. 6, 7, 10).

In 8a (charmingly inconsequent after v. 7, in the standard text; see AV) RSV justifiably follows the Qumran MS. The prophet, just when his vigil appears endless, sees the promised cavalcade, and knows that it spells the end of Babylon. Rev. 18:2 takes up the cry of 'Fallen, fallen', and treats Babylon as typical of the godless world. 10 The final phrase of the passage, my threshed and winnowed one, captures not only the agony, but the purpose, of Israel's long ordeal.

21:11, 12 Dumah

The place-names belong to Edom, but the title Dumah (cf. Gn. 25:14) may have been chosen for its ominous meaning, 'silence'. The point of the question is 'how long till morning?'— reflecting a time of suffering. The reply is not a platitude but a warning that any respite will be only temporary. Cf. Pr. 4:18,19. The three imperatives translated inquire; come back again, can be taken at their surface meaning or, more deeply, as the basic divine call: 'Seek, repent, come'. Edom's answer can be gathered from, e.g., 34:5ff. and from Obadiah.

21:13–17 Arabia

13 The early versions read the second Arabia as 'evening', which has the same consonants. Possibly there is a double entendre: cf. v. 11 and the symbolic titles in 21:1; 22:1. The special significance of this oracle lies in its warning to the freest and most inaccessible of tribes that Assyria's long arm will reach even them, at God's command. Those of the far south, Tema and Dedan, will have to succour their more exposed brother-tribe of Kedar. This could mean that the trading caravans will have blundered into war-ravaged parts and returned empty-handed and starving; but Sargon's recorded invasion of Arabia in 715 BC makes it more likely that the fugitives will have been under direct attack. 16f. Cf. 16:14 and comment.

22:1–25 Jerusalem

22:1–14 'The valley of vision'. 1 The symbolic title (cf. on 21:1, 11, 13) emphasizes that the prophet's own base, from which he has surveyed the nations, is not exempt from judgment. Valley, borrowed from v. 5, may refer to Jerusalem as surrounded by mountains (cf. Ps. 125:2), or to some more localized spot (cf. Joel 3:12, 14).

2ff. There is a clear contrast between the city's gaiety (vv. 2a, 13) and its grim future. It is not so clear whether the revels are in progress as Isaiah speaks (perhaps after the retreat of Sennacherib, 37:37) or whether we should supply a past verb in v. 2a: 'you who were full . . .', as in the lament of 1:21 (as Kissane suggests). Either way, Isaiah alone sees where this escapism, which is summed up for all time in v. 13b (cf. 1 Cor. 15:32), will end.

With characteristic long sight (cf. 21:1–10) he foretells the fall of Jerusalem a century away (586), with its famine casualties (v. 2b; cf. La. 4:9), its fugitive leaders (v. 3; cf. 2 Ki. 25:4f.) and its houses torn down to strengthen the wall (v. 10; cf. Je. 33:4). The part played in this by warriors from Elam and Kir (v. 6) is not mentioned elsewhere; but Kir was in the Assyrian Empire (cf. 2 Ki. 16:9), and contingents or mercenaries from these outposts could well have been part of the Assyrian legacy to Nebuchadrezzar.

8–14 For the house of the forest as an armoury (v. 8), see 1 Ki. 10:17; for the water supply (vv. 9, 11) cf. the preparations by Ahaz and Hezekiah (7:3; 2 Ki. 20:20) in Isaiah's own day. The two walls (v. 11) were probably, as J. Gray suggests (on 2 Ki. 25:4), 'the convergence of the walls round the south-eastern hill, with an extension to include both pools'.

Note, in all this, that Jerusalem oscillated between activism (vv. 9–11) and escapism (vv. 12–14); the former was a denial of faith (v. 11b), the latter a denial of repentance. The words of 11b (and of 37:26) are a striking anticipation of chs. 40–66, where God is repeatedly named as (lit.) 'making and shaping' (who did . . . who planned), and as doing so from of old. Cf. 44:2, 24; 43:7, etc. It is another hint of single authorship: see Introduction, p. 589f.

22:15–25 'This steward, . . . Shebna'. This high official appears again, with Eliakim (cf. v. 20), in 36:3ff.; 37:2ff. Possibly he was the leader of the pro-Egypt party (see chs. 30, 31) which scoffed at Isaiah's preaching; but his condemnation here is simply for arrogance and display. Every nuance in God's message to him is scornful, from 'this steward' (v. 15) to 'you shame . . .' (v. 18); it exposes the human craving for recognition and power, and the worldly love of status symbols (tomb and chariots) and the trappings of office, all of them mere husks. A large tomb-lintel of just such an official, describing him as 'over the house' (cf. v. 15), has been found and could be Shebna's; but a mortice hole has destroyed the name (see D. J. Wiseman, Illustrations from Biblical Archaeology, 1958, pp. 59, 60).

20ff. Eliakim stands in strong contrast to Shebna, over whom he seems to have been promoted when they reappear in 36:3ff. Godward he is called my servant (v. 20; cf. 'this steward', v. 15); manward, he will be a father to his community (v. 21). Yet his downfall (vv. 24, 25) will come from this very paternalism wrongly exercised: i.e. from his inability to say 'no' to any 'hanger-on' from his family who claims his patronage. However well intentioned, this is an abuse of his office, and God's firmest pledges are never guarantees to cover this. With the sequence of vv. 23 and 25, cf. 1 Sa. 2:30; Je. 22:24; Rev. 2:1, 5.

22 The key of . . . David comes in this context of accountability. A key was a substantial object, tucked in the girdle or slung over the shoulder, but the opening words of v. 22, with their echo of 9:6, emphasize the God-given responsibility that went with it, to be used in the king's interests. The 'shutting' and 'opening' mean the power to make decisions which no-one under the king could override. This is the background of the commission to Peter (cf. Mt. 16:19) and to the church (cf. Mt. 18:18)—with the warning against abuse implied above. Ultimate authority, however, is claimed, in these terms, for Christ Himself (cf. Rev. 3:7, 8).

23:1–18 Tyre

Tyre, 'the merchant of the nations' (v. 3), had a longer reach than even Babylon: her traders were known from the Indian Ocean (cf. 1 Ki. 10:22) to the English Channel. Rev. 17 and 18 combined the OT oracles on Tyre and Babylon (cf. Ezk. 27; Is. 14) for the composite picture of the world as seducer (cf. v. 17) and oppressor, over against the city of God.

23:1–14 The repercussions and reasons of her fall. The news is pictured as reaching her ships at Cyprus, her nearest colony (v. 1; see on 2:16 for Tarshish), leaving them homeless; as making the sea itself seem childless for lack of her merchantmen (v. 4); as striking dismay into Egypt (v. 5) and as scattering the people of Phoenicia to distant Tarshish (v. 6) or nearby Cyprus (v. 12).

Tyre's colonizing, a development of her trading, is the reference of v. 8; and the obscure v. 10 may picture a distant colony breaking out into anarchy at the parent city's collapse. Canaan is used in v. 11 as the name of Tyre and Sidon's home territory, a term which spread to embrace all Palestine; the word traders in v. 8, closely related to it, shows how synonymous was the name of her realm with that of business.

The human cause of the overthrow seems in v. 13 to be Chaldaea rather than Assyria, both of which powers subjugated Tyre in part. (Later, the Greeks, and later still the Saracens and the Crusaders, captured and recaptured it.) But the root cause is sought in v. 8 and answered in v. 9: Who has purposed this . . . ? The Lord of hosts . . . It is a particular instance of His judgment on pride wherever it appears, which is one of the great themes of this book: see on 2:10–22.

23:15–18 Her old appeal renewed. 15 As a fact of history, after each disaster (until the Middle Ages) Tyre recovered after an interval and resumed her trading. The seventy years seem to be a round figure to denote a lifetime, like the 'seventy years' of Jewish captivity. But the metaphor of the forgotten harlot (vv. 15–17) makes the renewal at once pathetic and corrupting; we are shown the perennial seductiveness of things material, although the final verse claims them for their proper use. It is the twofold emphasis of Rev. 18:3 and Rev. 21:24.

24:1 - 27:13 GOD'S FINAL VICTORY

After the separate nations (chs. 13–23), now the world as a whole comes into view. These four chapters, often loosely known as the 'Isaiah Apocalypse', show the downfall of supernatural as well as earthly enemies (24:21f.; 27:1), and of death itself (25:8); they contain (26:19) one of the two clear promises in the OT of bodily resurrection. But this wider scene is still viewed from Isaiah's own vantage-point of Jerusalem, with Judah, Moab (25:10ff.) and the great powers of Egypt and Assyria (27:12f.) in the near and middle distance. Overwhelming as the judgments are, the dominant note is of joy, welling up in the songs which frequently break into the prophecy.

24:1–23 Earth and heaven judged

24:1–13 Humanity in chaos. The powerful word-painting is reinforced by repetitions, rhymes and word-plays. 1 The word twist, or better 'distort', is a sounder translation than 'turneth . . . upside down' (AV, RV); cf. the Jerusalem Bible's vivid term 'buckle'. 5 The reason for the judgment emerges (notice the double 'therefore' of v. 6) in man's flouting of all laws and obligations. Whether the everlasting covenant is the divine promise to all living things in Gn. 9:9ff. is not certain beyond all doubt, since the expression in v. 5 could mean simply 'the most permanent of undertakings'; but notice the reference to the Flood in v. 18b. 7ff. The emphasis on joylessness is a striking comment on what Heb. 11:25 calls 'the fleeting pleasures of sin', and the term the city of chaos (Heb. tōhû, v. 10; cf. Gn. 1:2) is a witness to sin's regressive action, turning God's order back to formlessness. The one ray of hope is the mention of gleaning (v. 13), the leaving of a 'few' (v. 6), as in 17:6 and in the explicit 'Remnant' passages, e.g. 10:20ff.

24:14–16 Ultimate praise, and present privation. The singing seems to come from the scattered remnant (see on v. 13), which in the light of the gospel can be seen to be God's Gentile as well as Jewish people (cf. Jn. 11:52). The expression in the east (v. 15) is literally 'in the lights' (hardly 'fires', AV); the translation is supported by the matching phrase from the west (v. 14). But this is a foretaste; we are back in the straitened present in v. 16 (cf. the same metaphors in 17:4–6).

24:17–23 Cosmic judgment. 17 The first three nouns, strikingly alike in the original, hammer home the relentlessness of the judgment. 18a With the unavailing flight, cf. Am. 5:19. (18b For the background see on v. 5.) 21, 22 The host of heaven (lit. 'of the height') would mean in some contexts merely 'the stars' (cf. 40:26); but here, as counterparts of the kings of the earth, sentenced to be imprisoned and punished (cf. 2 Pet. 2:4), they are clearly 'the spiritual hosts of wickedness in the heavenly places' (Eph. 6:12). The fullest OT reference to such beings is in Dn. 10:2–21; cf. perhaps Ps. 82. In the NT see further, e.g., Rom. 8:38f.; Col. 2:15; Rev. 12:7ff. 23 But the end is sheer glory. If sun and moon are to lose their lustre, it is only as outshone by light itself, by the Lord reigning in full state. It is essentially the same vision as Rev. 21:22ff.

25:1–12 The great liberation

25:1–5 The end of tyranny. This song breaks out unannounced (unlike those of v. 9; 26:1ff.; 27:2ff.), and by its reiteration of the word 'ruthless' (vv. 3, 4, 5) it voices the special suffering and corresponding gratitude of the weak and hard-pressed. It is an OT Magnificat. 1 Two of the characteristics of God's working ('wonderful things', 'counsels', AV, RV) have already appeared in the names of the promised king (9:6), and will recur in 28:29. On the long maturing of His plans (of old), a favourite emphasis in Isaiah, see on 22:11. 2–5 The song accordingly celebrates not only the victory to come (when the enemy's defences will be down, v. 2, his homage received, v. 3, and his clamour silenced, v. 5) but the refuge already to be found in God while evil does its worst (v. 4)—its assault pictured in terms of nature's extremes of driving rain (storm) and overpowering heat.

25:6–8 The end of darkness and death. 6 The feast introduces a positive note into what is otherwise chiefly an account of ills removed. It has the note of achievement (for a feast is a celebration), of plenty (v. 6b), and of shared delight (note the fourfold all in vv. 6–8). Our Lord relished this festive prospect even as He handed a very different cup to His disciples: cf. Mt. 26:29.

7 The covering or veil could be either the mourning (v. 8b) or the blindness (cf. 2 Cor. 3:15) of fallen man; both are apposite. 8a The translation for ever is the most straightforward (cf., e.g., 28:28), but the root does also contain the idea of 'victory' (AV; cf. 1 Cor. 15:54) or pre-eminence, and is so used in 1 Sa. 15:29 where it appears as 'Glory', and as 'victory' in 1 Ch. 29:11. In either sense, the promise is one of the glories of the OT and the NT. In one verse (cf. also Rev. 7:17) the last enemy is gone and the last tear shed.

25:9–12 The end of pride. 9 belongs to the preceding paragraph as well as to this one; but perhaps the conjunction 'for' (v. 10) unites these verses a little more closely. There is a hint of tense expectation, rather than mere passivity, in the verb used for waited; cf. 26:8; 33:2; 40:31; 49:23b. 10 Moab, startlingly local in so universal a scene (cf. Edom in 34:5), is introduced as the embodiment of pride (v. 11b; cf. 16:6), perhaps especially the pride of little men. The dung-pit likewise expresses the indignity as well as the finality of judgment for the proud; cf. the sequence in 14:14, 15, 19.

26:1 – 27:1 Triumph after travail

26:1–6 The enduring city. At last our own city comes into view, over against its rival. The latter has a new epithet, 'lofty' (v. 5), to add to those of 24:10 ('chaos'), 25:2 ('fortified'), 25:3 ('cities of ruthless nations'); 1 but our city is strong, not with brute force but with the saving activity (1b) of the living God, the 'Rock of ages' (v. 4, AV, RV, mgs.). So our enjoyment of its walls and bulwarks depends on our response to Him in truth (v. 2) and trust (vv. 3, 4). 3 The primary stress is on the mind (better, the will) stayed on God. Perfect peace is lit. 'peace, peace', and means positive well-being, not merely lack of strife. Trusts is passive here (but active in v. 4), with the sense, 'he is cast upon thee'. 5 Note the levelling of the lofty, one of Isaiah's most constant themes from 2:12 onwards.

26:7–18 The long night of waiting. The 'waiting' in this passage is partly for the overthrow of evil by the correction (vv. 9–11) or destruction (vv. 11c, 13ff.) of the wicked, but is fundamentally a longing for God Himself ('for thee . . . for thee', vv. 8, 9). 7 RSV's level and make smooth are misleading, for the context is anything but easygoing. The verse should run: '. . . is straight; thou dost ponder the path . . .' (cf. Pr. 5:6). 8 Thy memorial name should be 'thy name and thy memorial', i.e. the proclamation of the name, which could be a moving experience in public worship (cf. Ps. 34:3; 68:4). The last phrase of v. 13 alludes to this, and scorns the tyrants who have trespassed on the crown rights of Yahweh. 14 That these are earthly overlords, not false gods, is proved by 14a (see on 14:9 for the term shades). It is a prediction so certain of fulfilment as to use the past tense (the 'prophetic perfect').

16–18, with their confession of failure and frustration (all too applicable to the Christian church), give another ingredient of this general yearning for better things. There is a similar outburst in the third 'Servant Song', 49:4. Here, as there, God's answer lifts the situation on to a new plane altogether, which is the subject of the next paragraph.

26:19 – 27:1 Resurrection and final judgment. After the prayer of vv. 7–18, the Lord now gives His answer. 19, though obscure in details, clearly promises bodily resurrection. Its companion statement, Dn. 12:2, adds two further prospects: the resurrection of the unjust, and an eternity of life or shame. Read, with RV, 'my dead bodies' (keeping the Heb. consonants intact, unlike RSV)—for God's servants are still His in death, even to their bodies. Dew of light (the freshness and promise of dawn; cf. Ps. 110:3b) is more probable than 'dew of herbs' (AV, RV), though either is possible. The last line could be rendered as in RSV, or as in AV, RV, or else, with Kissane, 'thou wilt subdue the land of shades'. On shades, see on 14:9.

20 reproduces the same pattern of salvation within judgment as was seen when the Lord shut Noah in the ark, and when Israel in Egypt was directed to take refuge from the destroying angel (Ex. 12:22). 21; 27:1 The judgment is as all-embracing as in 24:21, where 'the host of heaven' corresponds to Leviathan here (cf. 'the dragon and his angels' in Rev. 12:7ff.). The unusual epithets, fleeing, twisting, are exactly the terms used of Leviathan (Lotan) in the ancient Canaanite epic of Baal, where the dragon and the sea are also vanquished. (Fleeing, i.e. 'elusive', is a more likely translation than 'primaeval' or 'evil', which have been proposed from other roots.) This Canaanite material is reshaped to the divine truth it now conveys—truth which demolishes its pagan structure. Both here and at 51:9f. the context is judgment, not (as in paganism) a supposed struggle in which, before he could proceed to his desired task of creating an ordered world, the creator-god first disposed of the opposition of the gods of disorder.

27:2–13 A people for God

27:2–6 The fruitful vineyard. The loving care (vv. 2ff.) and teeming fruitfulness (v. 6) must both be seen against the setting of ch. 5, the vineyard that failed and was abandoned. Here is the end to which God has been working. 4, 5 These cryptic verses may be understood to mean that God's wrath is no longer against His vineyard, only against the thorns and briers (that is, His people's enemies) which overran it in 5:6; and even these antagonists He would rather reconcile than destroy. 6 The fruit which will benefit the world is interpreted in 5:7 as justice and righteousness. Note the reminder, as in 37:31, that morally as well as physically, root is the precondition of fruit.

27:7–11 Fruitful hardship, fruitless power. This section brings out the contrast between the measured hardship which would be the making of Israel (vv. 7–9), and the utter disaster which would break the tyrant (vv. 10, 11).

8 Measure by measure: this unique word may mean literally 'by a seah, a seah', i.e. carefully meted out, gallon by gallon; or possibly, 'by shooing them away' (cf. the next word, which RSV rightly interprets as by exile, of which AV makes no sense). In v. 8b, AV's translation cannot be upheld. 9 The renouncing of idolatry is shown as both the condition (by this) and the continuing consequence (the full fruit) of enjoying God's atonement (cf. Pr. 16:6). If exile is a step towards this, it will not be in vain. 10, 11 The fortified city is clearly the oppressor's (cf. 25:2). Here the description in vv. 10b, 11a is perhaps coloured by the contrasted picture of the well-tended vineyard of vv. 2, 3. With v. 11b, cf. 44:18f.; 45:6f.

27:12, 13 Harvest home. The harvest depicted is that of orchard and vineyard, rather than cornfield, since the gleaning (one by one) comes after, not before, the beating, as Kissane points out. Thresh out should therefore be 'beat off' (the fruit), as in AV, RV. The two verses show the Lord's final triumph, in terms not of conquest or new creation (as it can be pictured) but simply of persons gathered in and brought home. This is, after all, the heart of the matter (cf. Rev. 7:9ff.).

28:1 - 31:9 THE ASSYRIAN CRISIS: GOD'S HELP OR MAN'S?

28:1–29 A challenge to scoffers

Ch. 28, a series of lightning flashes rather than a scene steadily illuminated, challenges the triflers who govern Jerusalem to face the realities of history, of morals and of divine action. Snatches of a fierce altercation seem to be preserved in vv. 7–13 or beyond. The setting is the restless period of intrigue with Egypt which led to Hezekiah's revolt against Assyria and the reprisals of 701 BC described in chs. 36, 37; but the prophecies frequently break out of these narrow confines.

28:1–6 The drunkards of Ephraim. This is clearly an early prophecy, before the fall of Samaria in 721. For its function in this context, see on vv. 7–13, below. 1–4 It catches the outward beauty of that affluent city set on a hill, but sees it as a garland on a drunkard's brow (v. 1b) —a rich metaphor for glory that is incongruous and (v. 4a) quickly fading. The second of these aspects is re-emphasized by the hailstorm threat of v. 2 (a reference to Assyria), to be taken up in v. 17, and by the 'ripe plum' metaphor, as we should put it, of v. 4b. In a single paragraph Isaiah has epitomized the warnings of Amos to this pleasure-loving, drink-sodden city (cf. Am. 2:12; 4:1; 6:6). 5, 6 Characteristically, the clouds part for a moment to show the true diadem adorning the true Israel, the remnant (see on 10:20–23). Notice that the spirit of justice . . . and strength (see on 11:2) is the Lord Himself, present and active within a man.

28:7–13 The drunkards in office. 7, 8 In the words these also, the relevance of the foregoing oracle to its present context becomes clear. The besotted Ephraim had come to grief; now Judah is just such another, from her spiritual leaders downwards. The reeling, vomiting priest and . . . prophet are so vividly drawn that this section is thought to preserve an actual encounter between Isaiah and a group of them in conclave.

9–13 In that case vv. 9, 10 may be their taunt (he . . . he being Isaiah), and v. 13 his ominous rejoinder, flinging the same words back. The Hebrew of v. 10 is a jingle, almost the equivalent of our derisive 'blah blah', but not quite as meaningless. (For line, cf. v. 17a.) Cf. J. B. Phillips: 'Are we just weaned. . . . Do we have to learn that The-law-is-the-law-is-the-law, The rule-is-the-rule-is-the-rule . . . ? . . . Yes, with stuttering lips and a foreign tongue will the Lord speak to this people.' I.e. make nonsense of God's sense, and you will get your fill of it from Assyria (v. 11), and your doom from the words that were to save you (vv. 12, 13). The rejected message of v. 12 finds classic expression in 30:15; cf. on 7:9b. Paul's quotation of v. 11 in 1 Cor. 14:21 is thus a reminder, true to this context, that unknown tongues are not God's greeting to a believing congregation but His rebuke to an unbelieving one (cf. C. Hodge on 1 Corinthians).

28:14–22 The sure foundation and the refuge of lies. 15, 16 As in 8:11–15, but now in a setting of reckless confidence, covenant and cornerstone are in contrast. The covenant with death, and with Sheol, could perhaps allude to an invocation of gods of the underworld, e.g. in necromancy (cf. 8:19) or in a treaty with Egypt, but is more probably to be understood like the boast in v. 15b of lies and falsehood; i.e. as God's estimate of their hope, put into their mouths. Their version would have been, no doubt, 'Nothing can touch us; our alliances are watertight.' God knew their real enemy, and their professed friends. The cornerstone promise, with that of 8:14, is quoted in Rom. 9:33; 1 Pet. 2:6; cf. Ps. 118:22. In Is. 8:14 it explicitly signifies the Lord, but here the Lord lays the stone; the two statements meet in Christ, as the NT makes clear. Rom. 9:32, 33 expounds the implications of the faith clause (cf. 7:9), he who believes . . . (possibly the implied inscription on the stone; cf. RSV), and uses LXX's exposition of will not be in haste, i.e. 'will not be put to shame'. Cf. 49:23b, and by contrast, 30:3, 5. Haste implies anxiety and confusion.

Among the profusion of metaphors, those of storm and flood have appeared in v. 2, to signify the Assyrians; 17 the line and plummet recall the finality of 30:13f. and of Am. 7:7f.; 20 the scanty bed and covering say the last word on resources that miserably fail. 21 On Perazim and Gibeon see 1 Ch. 14:11, 16. God who swept away David's enemies will now sweep away David's kingdom. On such strange reversals the next paragraph will have light to shed. Luther, incidentally, found much comfort in reflecting that while judgment is Christ's strange . . . work, salvation is His 'proper work'.

28:23–29 The farmer's craft: a parable. The farmer's constant changes and his varieties of treatment, so capricious at first sight yet so expertly appropriate, give the clue to the complex ways of God, who is his teacher (vv. 26, 29). God's strangest work (cf. v. 21) is exactly suited, it is implied, to the varied times (v. 24), types (v. 25) and textures (vv. 27, 28) that He handles. 29 Notice the linking of wonderful and counsel, as in the name of the divine prince of 9:6, and as in 25:1.

29:1–8 A last-minute reprieve for 'Ariel'

1–4 The end of v. 8 identifies Ariel as Zion, and in Ezk. 43:15 its meaning is 'altar hearth'; hence Moffatt renders it here (emphasizing Jerusalem's high calling) 'God's own hearth and altar'. The cultic allusion in v. 1b confirms this, but v. 2b gives a grim turn to the metaphor by its hint of a holocaust, just as v. 3a pricks the city's pride in its past (cf. 1a, where David encamped).

5–8 The promise of miraculous deliverance had a partial fulfilment in the year 701 (see 37:33–37). But the gathering of 'nations' (vv. 7, 8), the 'siegeworks' (v. 3; cf. 37:33) and the spectacular signs of v. 6, suggest a still greater struggle: cf. Zc. 14:1ff. The nations' disappointment is vividly suggested in vv. 7, 8; there have been already innumerable minor occasions when the world has prematurely licked its lips over the demise of the church.

29:9–24 Israel's inner darkness, deepened and dispelled

29:9–12 A people without vision. 10 The pregnant phrase, your eyes, the prophets, shows that Israel is the subject of this oracle, which enlarges on the lessons of Pr. 29:18 and 1 Sa. 3:1ff. 11, 12 A glimpse of such a state, where God's will has become a closed book, is given in Ps. 74:9. The reflexive verbs in v. 9 suggest that the blindness is judicial: self-will has brought its own punishment. Cf. 30:10.

29:13, 14 Religion without reality. 13 Jesus saw this verse as the very image of Pharisaism (Mk. 7:6f.). 14 is its proper outcome, for without depth, cleverness turns in on itself to obscure all that it touches.

29:15, 16 Contempt of the Creator. 15 The mixture of furtiveness and bravado (cf. 30:1) would probably be expressed in unconscious ways, such as the suppression of unwelcome truths (cf. 30:9ff.). Jeremiah (Je. 2:26; 23:23ff.) and Ezekiel (Ezk. 8:12) found the same mishandling of conscience in their day. 16 The unanswerable potter illustration is used again in 45:9 and, penitently, in 64:8; Paul takes it up in Rom. 9:20ff.

29:17–21 The great reversal. The absurdity of planning against God (v. 15) will appear when His work is complete, when the best that we know will be transcended (v. 17), and the disabilities and injustices of the present made good (vv. 18–21). 17 The point is indicated in its verbs: i.e. the present Lebanon (uncultivated, like the wilderness of 32:15) will be turned into good land, while the present good land will be regarded as mere thicket in comparison with its new fertility.

29:22–24 A people for God's praise. 22 The individual Jacob is meant in 22b: he will no longer (as we should say) turn in his grave at the behaviour of his descendants. 23 The thought of God's people expressing God's holiness (sanctify my name), which is a first concern of the Lord's Prayer ('hallowed . . . '), is developed in Ezk. 36:23 and context, and in Eph. 1:4, 6, etc.

30:1 - 31:9 Egypt and Assyria in perspective

30:1–5 The shadow of Egypt. The illusory refuge denounced in 28:14–22 is named at last. Ten years earlier, Isaiah had dissuaded Judah from playing Egypt's game against Assyria (ch. 20); now the mood has hardened, and Judah's envoys are on their way. 4 His officials seem to be Pharaoh's, in which case Hanes seems implied to be near Zoan (which is Tanis, the nearest important town to the Israel border), rather than 50 miles up-Nile as commonly identified. See NBD article, 'Hanes', for fuller discussion.

30:6–8 The stay-at-home ally. 6 Isaiah sees the discomforts and dangers of the journey (6a) as typical of the whole enterprise, and the treasures of 6b, so incongruous in the wild Negeb, as a picture of misspent effort and resource. 7 Rahab, differently spelt in Hebrew from the familiar name of Jos. 2, is a term for Egypt again in Ps. 87:4 (cf. 89:10). It appears to mean 'arrogant' or 'turbulent', and is associated with 'the dragon' (crocodile?) in Is. 51:9, which is another of Egypt's names in Ezk. 29:3. 7, 8 Moffatt brilliantly renders v. 7c 'Dragon Do-nothing'—a devastating nickname to placard (v. 8) around Jerusalem; as pointed as an earlier slogan had been cryptic (cf. 8:1).

30:9–14 The ill-built structure. Truth and right (v. 10) are shown to be as vital to a community as soundness and accuracy are to a building (v. 13). This is one of the clearest statements of the logic of God's judgments; cf. Ezk. 13:10ff. on (in our terms) papering over the cracks; Am. 7:7ff. on the plumb-line, and Hab. 2:9–11 on the creaking edifice of the tyrant.

30:15–17 The price of unbelief. 15 could be singled out as the distinctive challenge of Isaiah: see on 7:1–9. Returning is repentance, turning back to God (cf. 10:21); rest and quietness are the antithesis of the frantic activism of v. 16 (cf. 28:16); trust colours each of these responses with love. 17 The threat sadly reverses the promise of Lv. 26:8; cf. Dt. 32:30.

30:18–26 The good things in store. Egypt and Assyria fade from sight as the glory dawns, depicted first in personal terms (vv. 18–22), then in material (vv. 23–26). 18 Notice the relation between God's waiting and man's (18a, d; cf. 8:17; 64:4), and the boon of His exaltation as Judge (18b, c; contrast 5:15, 16). 20, 21 The intimacy described in vv. 20f. is that of the new covenant (cf. Je. 31:33f.) rather than the final glory, for it does not preclude adversity or the possibility of straying, limited though this will be (v. 21). Teacher is a plural noun with a singular verb: i.e. a plural of God's fullness or majesty, as in RSV; and the word relates to moral instruction or tôrâ ('law'). His voice, recalling us, comes from behind (v. 21) only when we turn aside, not when we follow. 23–26, in contrast with v. 20a, express in terms of the familiar world the new creation which will utterly transcend it: cf. 60:19ff.; 65:17ff.

30:27–33 The cleansing fire. While these verses survey the immediate situation, naming 'the Assyrians' (v. 31), they further apply to the end-time. 28 One day the godless powers will find themselves caught (like Judah, 8:8) in a rising tide, and drawn by God's bridle (like Assyria in 37:29) towards their destruction. 29–32 Yet for us this is liberation (v. 29): every blow of judgment will deserve the sound of timbrels (v. 32) like Miriam's (cf. Ex. 15:20); 33 but the grave of the oppressors will no longer be the Red Sea, but Topheth (RSV mg.)—i.e. the burning place of final destruction which the NT calls Gehenna, or hell. Je. 7:31f. tells how this meaning was acquired; the allusion here to the king is probably to Molech (RSV mg.; cf. 2 Ki. 23:10), which is basically the same word as king.

31:1–5 Some trust in horses . . . 2, 3 The relative power of flesh and spirit, as seen by Isaiah, quite contradicted his contemporaries' assessment (cf. 30:15, 16)—and, for the most part, our own. It is the key to his thinking, and was to be dramatically vindicated (cf. the taunt of 36:8f. with the outcome in 37:36ff.). In v. 2, disaster rightly interprets the broad term 'evil' (AV, RV; cf. 45:7; Am. 3:6). 4, 5 The growling lion and the birds in flight both depict what is free of man's interference; possibly also (Delitzsch) the formidable and the tender aspects of the Lord as protector (?cf. Dt. 32:11).

31:6–9 The rout of Assyria. The supernatural smiting of the Assyrians is recorded in 37:36. 6 But Isaiah is concerned with conversion (turn) even more than deliverance; notice his penetrating estimate of the situation (cf. 29:15; Ho. 9:9). 7 Cf. 2:20; 30:22. 9 With the Assyrians' far from immovable rock, cf. Dt. 32:31; Is. 26:4. With the Lord's fire . . . in Zion, cf. its searching implications in 33:14.

32:1 – 35:10 SALVATION AND ITS DARK PRELUDE

32:1–8 A kingdom of true men

This fourth oracle on the coming king (cf. 7:14; 9:6f.; 11:1ff.) shows his greatest triumph, in the flowering of his own qualities (given by the Spirit of the Lord, 11:2; cf. 32:15) in the character of his subjects, from his office-bearers downwards. (The passage can be translated 'If a king reigns in righteousness . . . then . . .', etc. But the familiar rendering is both a simpler construction and more relevant to Isaiah's teaching from 7:14 onwards.)

1, 2 After the plural princes, the right translation of (lit.) 'a man' (cf. AV, RV, v. 2a) is each, as in RSV. Here are men in power, using power as God uses it: cf. v. 2 with 25:4f.; 26:4. 3, 4 Here too are people using the faculties they have (v. 3; contrast 30:10, 11; 42:20), and finding new abilities (v. 4). 5 Above all, truth has ousted the fictions under which vice takes shelter. With v. 5, cf. Lk. 22:25ff., for God recognizes no courtesy titles. 6–8 are not a prediction, but a comment on the terms used in v. 5, rightly expressed in RSV's present tenses.

32:9–20 No smooth path to peace

The pampered ladies of vv. 9ff. (cf. 3:16ff.) are only an extreme example of the predominantly escapist society of the time (cf. 22:13; 28:15). Note the triple complacent in vv. 9–11. 10 If RSV is right in 10a, this oracle dates from about the time of Hezekiah's revolt from Assyria, for which the invasion of 701 was the reprisal. But 10a could equally mean 'for a long period' (cf. AV, RV); in any case the disaster of v. 14 and the glory of vv. 15ff. transcend anything that happened in Isaiah's time. The present age since Pentecost (cf. v. 15) may be partly in mind in the picture of a people of God emancipated from the earthly Jerusalem (vv. 14, 19).

The basic principle expounded in this poem is that peace is not a thing God superimposes on a corrupt society: the ground must be cleared and re-sown with righteousness, of which peace is the fruit (vv. 16, 17). For this, the promise of the Spirit (v. 15) is indispensable: it is the secret of the shared gifts of the Messiah described in vv. 1ff., above. On 15b, see on 29:17. Such pictures of a secure and well-watered land (e.g. v. 20) express God's 'new things' to come, in terms of things already known.

33:1–24 The longing to be free

This chapter, Psalm-like in its many changes of moods and speakers, seems designed for public use in a national emergency: cf. the answering voice of God (vv. 10ff.) with that in Ps. 60:6ff., and the dialogue in vv. 13ff. with Ps. 24:3ff.

33:1–9 The thirst for redress. Denunciation (v. 1), entreaty (vv. 2–4), praise (vv. 5, 6) and lamentation (vv. 7–9) break out in rapid succession. 1 The destroyer is left unnamed, for Isaiah is writing (it seems) for other times beside his own, and there will be others whose 'envoys of peace' (v. 7) return rebuffed like Hezekiah's (cf. 36:3, 22). 2 Our arm, as against 'their arm' (AV, RV), is the reading of a few MSS and versions, but 'their' is better attested—perhaps referring to the army in the field. 8 The deserted highways recall (but in different language) the hard times before Deborah (cf. Jdg. 5:6), whose victory transformed another desperate situation.

33:10–16 The answering challenge. God's intervention will not be confined to the enemy (vv. 10–12) but will burn out the evil of Zion as well (vv. 13–16). 14 The devouring fire is not only His personal intolerance of sin; from another angle it is the sinner's self-immolation (vv. 11f.), brought about by the conjunction of vain pursuits (11a) and aggressive attitudes (11b). On this theme of self-destruction see also 1:31 and, with another metaphor, 30:13.

The heart-searching colloquy in vv. 14ff. recalls those of Pss. 15; 24:3ff. It has been suggested that these are based on ritual admission tests employed at sanctuaries, given an ethical content; it is at least as possible that that of Ps. 24 arose out of the self-questioning of David recorded in 2 Sa. 6:9, and these other examples out of the Psalm. 15 Notice the 'puritanism': the vigorous renunciations recognize the potency of habits, words, thoughts and sense-impressions as the seeds of action. If this verse is negative, it is in order to clarify the meaning of 'pure in heart', in readiness for v. 17.

33:17–24 The bliss of fulfilment. The unforgettable promise of v. 17a, for which the last phrase of v. 15 is indispensable (cf. Mt. 5:8; contrast the dismay of Is. 6:5), is the focal point of this passage. Other prospects radiate from it (the spacious countryside, v. 17b, gladdening the eyes after the constriction of siege; and tranquil Zion the place of pilgrimage again, v. 20), while memories of tyrants and indignities now past give added zest to the present (vv. 18, 19); but the eye returns to the Lord Himself as source and centre (vv. 21, 22). The authoritative titles, judge, 'lawgiver' (AV, RV), king, which Judah, like us, was always reluctant to pronounce, are the firm basis of this serenity.

The picture of a city flanked by better defences (v. 21) than Nile or Tigris (cf. Na. 3:7, 8)—for they will be waters which no hostile fleet can use—gives rise to a new metaphor in v. 23 for the disarray of the lawless (whether they are Gentiles or 'the sinners in Zion'; cf. v. 14). But this is a parenthesis; the passage ends by reaffirming God's enriching, healing and pardoning grace (vv. 23b, 24).

34:1–17 The universal judgment

Just as chs. 24–27 crowned the local oracles with the prospect of final judgment and salvation, so chs. 34 and 35 leave the Assyrian crisis far behind. A further similarity is that amidst these cosmic events, whose majestic description in v. 4 is echoed in Rev. 6:13f., Edom, like Moab in 25:10ff., is singled out over against Zion, whose year of release this is to be (cf. v. 8 with 35:4), for a judgment which brings the whole scene suddenly to close quarters. 5–7 The thunderstorm, after encircling the entire horizon, arrives practically overhead in v. 5, and there it remains, for Edom symbolizes in Scripture the profane (cf. Heb. 12:16) and the persecutor (cf. Ob. 10–14), the opposite and adversary of the church. The metaphor in vv. 5–7 is a grim variant of the banquet scene (cf. 25:6), dwelling on the butchery behind the sacrificial feast, and using current idiom to show that the whole people, from 'young bloods' and leading citizens (v. 7a) to the least and lowest (v. 4), is doomed. Cf. 63:1–6.

8ff. The waste land of vv. 8ff. brings both Sodom and Babylon to mind with the 'brimstone' of vv. 9f. and the haunted ruins of 11ff. (cf. 13:19ff.). 11 Confusion and chaos are the 'without form' and 'void' of Gn. 1:2; they imply here and in Je. 4:23 an undoing of the very work of creation. The mention of line and plummet gives this demolition a disquieting air of precision, matched only by the care (vv. 16f.) with which the ruins are furnished with appropriate monsters. 14 On the satyr see on 13:21, 22ff. The night hag is Hebrew 'lilith' (lîlîṯ), which could be either some nocturnal creature or a demon; see further under 'Lilith' in NBD. It is worth noting that judgment is pictured, here and elsewhere, as something worse than extinction: the last state is a kind of parody, obscene and (v. 17b) persistent, of the first.

35:1–10 The flowering wilderness

The glory of this chapter is enhanced, if this is possible, by its setting as an oasis between the visionary waste land of ch. 34 and the history of war, sickness and folly in chs. 36–39.

The theme is the coming exodus, a greater than the first. 1, 2 Why the desert should be carpeted with spring flowers (crocus, or perhaps narcissus, rightly replaces the traditional 'rose') and shaded with great trees (the glory of Lebanon) is a question answered with the news that the Lord is to pass this way; 3–6 and His reason for coming emerges in v. 4 (cf. v. 10): it is to fetch His people home. Heb. 12:12 treats v. 3 as still relevant to the Christian's hope; and while the healings in the Gospels announce that the new age of vv. 5 and 6 has dawned, the full promise of v. 4b is yet to come (cf. 61:2; Lk. 4:19–21; 2 Thes. 1:7ff.).

If God's coming was indirectly portrayed in the opening verses, reflected in the springing wilderness, the upsurge of hope and the miracles of healing (vv. 1–6a), His people's journey home is similarly presented in vv. 6b–10. The desert produces brooks and meadows, the safe highway appears, and finally the singing pilgrims themselves come into view in the last verse, making for Zion.

7, 8 There are some uncertainties of translation and text in these verses. In v. 7a, burning sand is similar to the Arabic for 'mirage' (RV mg.), which would make a telling contrast between false and true; but 'mirage' is out of place in 49:10. In v. 7b, the Dead Sea Scroll (1Q Isa) omits one letter (a suffix) from the word which AV translated 'where each lay', to yield the sentence: 'In the jackals' haunt (shall be) a grassy place with reeds and rushes.' In v. 8b, where the text seems to have suffered (cf. AV, RV), RSV seeks clarity by omitting four Hebrew words. A simpler expedient, among other suggestions, is to presume the omission of one letter, whose insertion would yield: 'but it shall be for his wayfaring people; and fools shall', etc.

So the prophecy reaches a climax which already soars above Isaiah's own times, and anticipates the style and thought of chs. 40–66 (cf. the quotation of v. 10 in 51:11) in its lyrical portrayal of the new exodus, the coming of God Himself, the re-peopling of Zion, and the endless joy of the redeemed.

36:1 – 39:8 THE SUPREME TESTS FOR HEZEKIAH

In these four chapters the political situation that has been developing throughout Isaiah's ministry comes to an immense climax, reinforced by two searching tests of the king's faith and integrity, which are to have far-reaching consequences.

Apart from Hezekiah's psalm, found only in 38:9–20, these chapters coincide almost word for word with 2 Ki. 18–20, to which the reader is referred for detailed comments.

36:1 – 37:38 The Assyrian onslaught

For details, see on 2 Ki. 18:13 – 19:37. Isaiah omits 2 Ki. 18:14–16 and part of v. 17a.

36:1–22 In ch. 36 we may note, in general, the technique of subversion displayed for all time in the speeches of 36:4–10, 13–20: i.e. the tempter's skilful use of truth, barbing his shafts with a few unanswerable facts (e.g. the perfidy of Egypt (v. 6) and the failure of the gods (v. 19)), his use of ridicule (v. 8), threats (v. 12b) and cajolery (vv. 16f.); and his perversion of theology—misrepresenting Hezekiah's reforms (v. 7), selecting from Isaiah's preaching (v. 10; cf. 10:6, 12), and drawing damaging conclusions from false religions (vv. 18–20). The king's instruction, Do not answer him (v. 21), took due account of the fact that the speaker was seeking victory, not truth.

37:1–38 Ch. 37 (see more fully on 2 Ki. 19) is a model of response to intimidation. Hezekiah's steadfastness owed nothing to blind optimism; his sackcloth (v. 1) was proof of that. His call for Isaiah's prayer (v. 4) showed where his confidence lay, and his metaphor of birth (v. 3) proved him a man of vision, whose longings were not for the old order but for the new (note too the evidence of 36:7 for his courageous reforms). His allusion to the remnant (v. 4) further suggests attention to Isaiah's preaching (cf. 10:20ff.). Upon Sennacherib's renewal of the war of nerves (vv. 9ff.) Hezekiah was again too wise either to dismiss the threat or to succumb to it. His spreading out the letter before the Lord (v. 14) epitomizes the act of prayer, and the candour of his words finely echoes the gesture. As in the Psalms, the situation clarified as he prayed (v. 19), and his motive was raised to the highest level (v. 20).

In Isaiah's successive replies (37:5–7, 21–35) note the absence of personal rancour against those whose policies were now in ruins (cf. 28:14ff.; 30:1ff.; on Eliakim and Shebna (v. 2) see 22:15ff.). In the vivid triumph song of 37:22ff. it was now time to answer Sennacherib's challenge 'On whom do you . . . rely?' (36:5) with the question 'Whom have you mocked?' (37:23), and to taunt him with not knowing the meaning of his own career (v. 26; note the Isaianic stress on what God determined . . . long ago; see on 22:11).

The completed story shows that the very successes which feed human arrogance (in any age) proclaim, when all is known, the sure sovereignty of God.

38:1–21 Hezekiah's illness

For comment on 38:1–8, 21f. see on 2 Ki. 20:1–11.

38:9–20 Hezekiah's lament is similar to the outcries of Job (cf., e.g., Jb. 7), and to various Psalms (cf., e.g., Ps. 88), particularly those that turn to praise. The final words, where the singular gives way to the plural, suggest a public use of the psalm (cf., e.g., Ps. 25:22; 51:18f.).

10 Sheol (see also on v. 18 and on 14:9) is pictured here poetically as a city or prison; as a community in v. 18; and as a devouring monster in 5:14. 12 The finality of the weaver's action is the point here; in Jb. 7:6 it is swiftness of his shuttle. But swiftness may also be the point of from day to night—so short a span.

13–15a There is a Job-like bewilderment in these verses, where Hezekiah's instinctive resort to God as his security (i.e. surety or guarantor), is checked by the thought that his predicament itself is from Him: cf. Jb. 17:3. But if this sharpens the problem, it also begins to resolve it, since a single, perfect will is paramount. See below on vv. 17ff.

15b, 16 are of uncertain meaning, as the different versions indicate. In 15b follow RSV mg. (not text), as in AV, RV; but perhaps the Hebrew verb, with its hint of a procession (cf. Ps. 42:4 (MT, 5)), contains the idea 'I will walk with awe'. The reference of these things in v. 16a is not clear, and the awkwardness of the Hebrew here suggests a damaged text, on which the ancient versions and the scrolls have no unanimity.

17–20 Here the fact of God's love dawns and clarifies, from the first assurance, it was for my welfare, on through the striking phrase, literally, 'thou hast loved my soul from the pit' (RV mg.), to the certainty of forgiveness in v. 17c. The use of Sheol as synonymous with death is the key to vv. 18 and 19, and to OT usage in general, which concentrates within this set of terms all that is negative in death: a man's severance from the praising congregation; his forfeiting of power and position; his fading into the past; his return to dust. At the same time, it is clear from v. 17 that Hezekiah had envisaged himself as dying without assurance of the forgiveness of sins, and it is in this context that he views life after death as thankless and joyless—as indeed it would be. Meanwhile there are positive aspects expressed in a distinct phraseology: e.g. being 'taken' by God (e.g. Gn. 5:24; 2 Ki. 2:9; Ps. 49:15), and being 'with' Him (e.g. Ps. 73:23; cf. Pss. 139:18 and 17:15; and see commentary on Psalms, in loc.). Cf., in Is. 26:19, 'live . . . rise . . . awake'. But there is no synthesis as yet. On v. 20, see the opening comments to the chapter.

39:1–8 The envoys from Babylon

For detailed comment, see on 2 Ki. 20:12–19.

The faith of Hezekiah, proof against the heaviest blows, melts at the touch of flattery (notice his delighted account in vv. 3, 4), and the world claims another victim by its friendship. Enough is known of Merodach-baladan to suggest that this enterprising rebel against Assyria had plots to hatch under cover of this visit. But the Bible is silent on this, and Hezekiah is condemned for glorying in wealth and human patronage.

The price of disloyalty is very heavy (vv. 5ff.).

To Hezekiah there was comfort in postponement (v. 8); but not to Isaiah. Evidently he took this burden home with him, and so lived under its weight that when God spoke to him again it was to one who in spirit had already lived long years in Babylon (vv. 6, 7), and could 'speak to the heart' (cf. 40:2) of a generation of exiles yet to be born.

40:1 – 48:22 NIGHT FAR SPENT IN BABYLON

Whatever our view of the relation of chs. 40ff. to their great prelude in 1–39 (see Introduction, p. 589), we emerge in 40:1 in a different world from Hezekiah's, immersed in the situation foretold in 39:5–8, which he was so thankful to escape. Nothing is said of the intervening century and a half; we wake, so to speak, on the far side of the disaster, impatient for the end of captivity. In chs. 40–48 liberation is in the air; there is the persistent promise of a new exodus, with God at its head; there is the approach of a conqueror, eventually disclosed as Cyrus, to break Babylon open; there is also a new theme unfolding, to reveal the glory of the call to be a servant and a light to the nations. All this is expressed with a soaring, exultant eloquence, in a style heard only fitfully hitherto (cf., e.g., 35:1–10; 37:26f.), but now sustained so as to give its distinctive tone to the remaining chapters of the book.

40:1–11 The long-awaited Lord

40:1, 2 The gentle voice. Comfort has its familiar meaning here, not its old English sense of 'strengthen'. It is matched by the womanly gentleness of 66:13, and amplified by v. 2, where speak tenderly is literally 'speak to the heart', a phrase mostly found in contexts of reassurance or of winning a person back (cf., e.g., Gn. 50:21; Jdg. 19:3; 2 Sa. 19:7; Ho. 2:14). My people and Jerusalem will often be in evidence in these chapters, separated until the mother-city receives back her children (cf. 54:1ff.).

The expression, double for all her sins, can be taken either in the bountiful sense of, e.g., 61:7; Zc. 9:12 (these use another word for 'double') or, with most commentators, in the punitive sense of, e.g., Lv. 26:18, 43; Rev. 18:6. The former would well express the underlying grace of these chapters, but the latter need not be pressed to imply any earning of salvation: only a strong assurance that Jerusalem's sentence is already more than served. It is not impossible, incidentally, that 'double' might mean 'counterpart' or 'equivalent'.

40:3–5 The herald's call. The great processional way (to be lined by all humanity, v. 5) suitably dwarfs the ceremonial routes of heathen festivals. The wilderness is doubly significant, both as an example of the barriers that must all yield to the royal progress (cf. v. 4; see ch. 35) and as a reminder of the first Exodus. Ho. 2:14 makes it, in its austerity, a place of repentance and renewal; John the Baptist, with prophetic symbolism, used the literal wilderness for this very work (cf. Mt. 3:1ff.). But God's coming (cf. Mt. 3:13ff.), and the 'exodus' that He was to accomplish (cf. Lk. 9:31), were to take a wholly unexpected form.

40:6–8 The preacher's word. 6 The brief colloquy in v. 6a introduces the prophet and his responsibility (the RSV reading, and I said, retains the Hebrew consonants and is well supported). All flesh echoes the impressive 'all flesh' of v. 5, but puts it in perspective in God's overwhelming presence. 8 Without the great ending of v. 8, the passage would have only the wistfulness of, e.g., Jb. 14:1ff.; with it, it reaffirms Isaiah's tireless preaching of faith (cf., e.g., 7:9; 31:3). Its full implications will emerge in 1 Pet. 1:23–25, where the word, in its final form as gospel, is no longer the mere contrast to our transience but the cure of it. Cf. 1 Jn. 2:17.

40:9–11 The crier's news. 9 Herald of good tidings is a single Hebrew word, of which 'evangelist' is the Greek equivalent (not as a specialized term). It is feminine here, agreeing with Zion, and hence Zion is probably the messenger. In 41:27; 52:7 she is the hearer.

40:12–31 God the incomparable

This superb poem rebukes our small ideas and flagging faith, somewhat in the manner of the Lord's challenge to Job (Jb. 38–41), by its presentation of God as Creator (vv. 12–20) and Disposer (vv. 21–26) of a universe dwarfed by His presence. The goal of the passage is v. 31, where human imaginings (v. 18) and doubts (v. 27) give way to the humble expectancy that is urged on us throughout the book (cf. 26:8; see on 7:1–9).

40:12–20 The Creator. Matter (v. 12), mind (vv. 13, 14) and living creatures (vv. 15–17) are all put in their place before their great Originator, seen as He might see them. This is not to empty them of meaning, but to derive their meaning from Him alone (cf. Pr. 8:22ff.; Rom. 11:34). Such a Creator hardly needs our impatient advice or shares our impotence! The view of us through God's eyes makes the man's-eye view of God (vv. 18–20) doubly absurd. The idolater's pathetic efforts are studied at length in 44:9–20; 46:1–7; and the wilfulness that antedates the blindness is exposed in Rom. 1:18–23.

40:21–26 The Disposer. The gigantic similes continue, and should be taken as poetry, not science (with v. 22b, where curtain suggests the thinness of gauze, cf. the similes of Ps. 102:26; 104:2). 23f., on the transience of potentates, bring the general truth of vv. 6–8 a step nearer to the particular situation of the captives; and 26 draws the true lesson from the majestic progress of the stars: the precision, not the absence, of God's control. The thought is taken further in the final section.

40:27–31 The 'very present help'. 27 The wrong inference from God's transcendence is that He is too great to care; 28 the right one is that He is too great to fail: there is no point at which things

'get on top of' Him. 'He is wise beyond all our thinking' (v. 28d, Knox). But 29–31 make the big transition from power exercised to power imparted, to be experienced through the faith expressed in the word wait (v. 31; cf. on 25:9). So the final reminder of human frailty (v. 30) is forward-looking: it clears the way for trust and the transcending of natural resources. The phrase, renew their strength (v. 31), is literally 'change strength', as one might change into fresh clothes or exchange an old thing for a new. It may be significant that the three final metaphors speak of overcoming one natural impossibility and two natural weaknesses, ending on the note of steady progress.

41:1–29 God and history

41:1–7 God's challenge to the nations. 1 The call for silence opens the imaginary proceedings of a court, where God will face the heathen world with a test question. (The call to renew their strength looks like an accidental repetition of 40:31, but it may be a warning that the encounter will be formidable.)

2 The point at issue is the alarming progress of the one from the east, whom 44:28 will identify as Cyrus. The general consternation proves that the peoples and their gods are taken by surprise. 4 In contrast to their frantic efforts (the details of vv. 7, 8, as of 40:19, 20, indicate that idols, not weapons, are the products in mind) stands the lordly announcement of v. 4. It is the only clear voice in the crisis, and the outcome will vindicate it (cf. 44:28; Ezr. 1:2). It sets God's present action in the context of His age-long plan; it is no mere manoeuvre.

(In v. 2, victory is literally 'righteousness', which tends in these chapters to have the sense of 'putting right', 'vindication', 'salvation'. But RV's 'whom he calleth in righteousness to his foot' (cf. Jdg. 4:10, RV) remains a possible alternative. See also on 46:12, 13.)

41:8–20 God's servant reassured. 8ff. There is sudden warmth in the but you . . . and the repeated personal names. The long chain of promises, in the future verbs of vv. 10b–20, is characteristically anchored in the facts of present and past: a pledged relationship (vv. 8, 10a) and an irrevocable choice and call (v. 9). The word servant will stamp its own character on the coming chapters, with an increasing emphasis on its implication of self-giving, up to the climax of ch. 53. Here however its only corollary is the Master's protection, which is seen as a many-sided assurance of imparted strength (v. 10), scattered enemies (vv. 11–13), triumph over obstacles (vv. 14–16; cf. Mt. 21:21) and inexhaustible provision (vv. 17–20). The divine titles, the Holy One of Israel (vv. 14, 16, 20; see on 1:2–4), your redeemer (v. 14; i.e. your protecting kinsman, cf. Lv. 25:25) and the King of Jacob (v. 21), set their seal on it.

All this stands against a realistic background of an Israel cowed (e.g. vv. 10f.) and puny (e.g. v. 14, where, in parallel to worm, men should perhaps be translated 'lice'), a fit starting-point for God's grace. 15, 16 A threshing sledge, by contrast, was the most solid of objects, being made of heavy boards, flint-studded; it was dragged over the reaped corn to break open the ears, which were then winnowed by tossing them to allow the husks to be blown away (v. 16). The huge scale of the metaphor must have seemed belied by the 'day of small things' that followed the return from Babylon, yet it does not exaggerate the impact of God's people on the world, past and to come.

41:21–29 God's challenge renewed. The tone of vv. 1–7 returns, but now the gods themselves are addressed (cf. v. 23). 22–24 The charge of v. 22 is that they cannot even interpret events (the former things), let alone predict them (see on vv. 26f.). When their incompetence is added to this (v. 23b), the only conclusion is their unreality (vv. 24, 29)—and the word abomination (v. 24) suddenly reveals the taunt as deadly serious. This word is usually reserved for heathen rites or idols (cf., e.g., 44:19); transferred to the worshipper it shows how corrupting is the choice of a lie for one's ultimate allegiance. The point is followed through in Rom. 1:18–32.

Vv. 25ff. cover the ground of vv. 2ff. with some added details. 25 The north and east are now mentioned together (cf. v. 2), defining more precisely Cyrus's conquests, which overarched the Babylonian Empire from the Persian Gulf to the Caspian and Black Seas. The statement, he shall call on my name, must be taken with 45:4; i.e. Cyrus would invoke the name of Yahweh (cf. Ezr. 1:2f.), yet not as a true convert. This is indirectly supported by his inscriptions, which diplomatically attribute his victories to the gods of the peoples he conquered: e.g. to Marduk at Babylon, but to Sin, the moon-god, at Ur.

26f., with their emphasis on prediction, would touch the heathen world on a sensitive spot, since divination was a major preoccupation (cf. 47:13), and Croesus of Lydia was to pay dearly for the Delphic oracle's ambiguity over his prospects against Cyrus. (Told that he would destroy a great empire, he joined battle and destroyed his own.) On this challenge to predict events as Yahweh has done, and its bearing on the authorship of these chapters, see Introduction, p. 589f.

42:1–17 Light for the nations

42:1–9 The first 'Servant Song'. The sudden quietness after the overpowering themes of chs. 40 and 41 has been compared to the still, small voice of 1 Ki. 19:12. Four or five times such a solo passage quietly emerges in these chapters, to portray the Servant as 'the man for others', with an increasing emphasis on suffering in 49:1–13; 50:4–9; and 52:13 – 53:12—followed by the joyful 61:1–4 to enumerate the blessings he distributes.

At the far end of the series he is the one in the place of the many; 1 but here, introduced as my servant and my chosen, he is closely associated with the 'Israel' of 41:8ff. The enduement with the Spirit and the bringing of justice (vv. 1, 3, 4), or true religion, however, are features of the Davidic king of 11:1ff.; 32:1ff. (cf. the blending of this passage with the kingly Ps. 2:7 at the baptism of Jesus, Mt. 3:17), so that already an individual begins to stand out from the mass of Israel. The close of the chapter (vv. 18ff.) will strongly reinforce this impression.

2–7 The Servant's gentleness, both as unassertiveness (v. 2) and as tenderness to the weak and inadequate (v. 3), is unmarred by any weakness of his own: the words fail and discouraged (v. 4) pointedly take up the Hebrew terms already used for dimly burning and bruised (v. 3). The portrait is identified in Mt. 12:15ff., and the glimpse of a waiting world (v. 4c) confirms the character of his mission. A light to the nations (v. 6) was one of the earliest designations of Jesus (cf. Lk. 2:32) and one of the formative titles of His church (cf. Acts 13:47). But while the church was to share in this liberation of the blind and the prisoners (v. 7; cf. 'the lord's servant' portrayed in 2 Tim. 2:24–26), only its Head could be described as God's covenant, uniting the Lord and the people (v. 6; cf. 49:8) in His own person (cf. Mt. 26:28).

8, 9 tie in this Servant-motif with the themes of chs. 40 and 41 respectively, for Yahweh's jealousy for His true glory will chiefly express itself in spreading His light world-wide. This is the coming phase of His design, the new things declared now, which have been disclosed also in outline 'from the beginning' (41:26f.; cf. Gn. 12:1–3, AV, RV).

42:10–12 The world acclaims its Master. Outbursts of singing are a feature of these chapters (cf. 44:23; 49:13; 52:9, etc.), as of chs. 24–27, and are closely akin to Pss. 93; 95–100, in theme and language: 10 cf. v. 10a with Ps. 96:1; 98:1; and v. 10b with Ps. 93:3; 96:11; 98:7. Here not only nature but the nations break out into singing, for joy at the liberation just recounted. 11 Israel's bitter rivals, Kedar (cf. Ps. 120:5ff.) and the Edomite Sela, last heard of in contexts of judgment (21:16f.; 34:5ff.), demonstrate the breadth of this grace. But see the next paragraph.

42:13–17 The Lord declares His zeal. The violent similes, like a man of war (v. 13), . . . like a woman in travail (v. 14), dispose of any idea of grace as a mere softening of God's mood. Rather, His fury (v. 13) against evil, and His pent-up zeal to redress it (v. 14; cf. Lk. 12:50), supply as much of the motivation as do His tenderness (v. 16a) and constancy (v. 16b) towards its victims. Salvation will only come through judgment, and will not be for the impenitent (v. 17). Cf. 63:1–6, the fiery complement of ch. 53.

42:18 – 48:22 Inconstant servant and unchanging Lord

There is a restless interplay in these chapters between the grace of God and the wilfulness of His people, whose determination to destroy themselves is only outmatched by His tenacity, expressed in classic form in 43:21 (AV): 'This people have I formed for myself; they shall shew forth my praise.'

42:18–25 Blind leaders of the blind. This bitter anticlimax to the portrait of the true servant (vv. 1–9), of the waiting world (vv. 10–12) and of the eager Redeemer (vv. 13–17) is vividly apposite to the church's perennial failure to live up to its calling. In Isaiah's first vision, to see and hear without perception (cf. vv. 18–20) was a danger-signal (cf. 6:10f.); here it is a crippling disability. The futility of the incompetent messenger (cf. 'I saw a great tumult, but I do not know what it was', 2 Sa. 18:29) is Israel's futility, and it is wilful: he is an heir of the covenant (v. 19b; see note below); he has the capacity (v. 20) and the data (v. 21) for the knowledge of God's will; he is still invited to attend and listen (v. 23). Even the plight he is now in is designed to teach, not destroy him (v. 25b); but the lesson, so far, is lost on him.

Note. 19 My dedicated one is hardly the most probable sense of mᵉšullām. RV translates it as 'he that is at peace with me' (cf. Ps. 7:4 (5, Heb.)); the passive form suggests 'he that has been brought into peace (friendly relations)'. See also the term 'Jeshurun', 44:2.

43:1–21 Grace abounding. The but now (v. 1) is a feature of these chapters, as the love of God, continually rebuffed, continually returns with the initiative. The same Hebrew expression is found at 44:1; 49:5; 52:5; 64:8 (7, Heb.).

1–7 give Israel in eloquent detail the assurance Christ gives to His church, that the gates of Hades will not prevail against it. Fire and water, peoples and distances, can take no toll: every one (v. 7) will safely arrive (cf. 40:26) whom God calls mine (v. 1). Some of the many strands that bind them to Him are enumerated, such as creation, redemption, call (v. 1), love (v. 4), adoption (v. 6) and the honour of His name (v. 7). The unique relationship is emphasized by the bold figure of a human ransom (vv. 3, 4; cf. v. 14)—i.e., great nations have fallen and will fall to make way for Israel. Pr. 21:18 speaks in similar terms; the other side of the matter is that the nations will gain from Israel far more than they lose (cf. 42:1–9), and that her ultimate ransom must be a very different victim (cf. 53:8f.).

8–13 face Israel again with her sin against the light (v. 8; cf. 42:18ff.); yet she is held to her high calling as servant and chosen (v. 10), as much for her own instruction (that you may know . . . believe . . . and understand, v. 10) as that of the world. Her very history testified for Yahweh (vv. 10–12); one day the title, my witnesses, was to have its full force (cf. Acts 1:8), but for the present Israel appears as a passive and reluctant exhibit. The forensic setting is that of 41:1ff., 21ff.; the point at issue is the non-existence of any God but Yahweh, in ages past, present or to come (vv. 10b, 11, 13).

14–21 name Babylon for the first time since

39:7, and while the Hebrew of v. 14 has its obscurities, the main thrust of the passage is a clear promise of a greater exodus, in which God's wonders in the desert (vv. 19f.) will outmatch even those of the Red Sea (vv. 16–18). The promise is once again rooted in the covenant: note the terms of relationship in vv. 14, 15, and of election in vv. 20c, 21.

For its real fulfilment we must look beyond the modest homecomings from Babylon of the 6th and 5th centuries, although these are certainly in view, to the exodus which the Son of God accomplished at Jerusalem (Lk. 9:31; cf. 1 Cor. 10:4, 11), which alone justifies the language of this and kindred passages. See also on ch. 35 and on 40:3–5.

43:22–28 Grace despised. 22–26 Israel's devastating response to divine ardour is a yawn of ennui. No rebuff could be worse; yet it gives occasion for a penetrating comparison between religion as a burden (vv. 23b, 24a) and as grateful homage (v. 23a) to the burden-Bearer (vv. 24b, 25; cf. 46:3, 4), who once again offers to prove His case in open court (v. 26: cf. 41:1).

27 Your first father is probably Jacob in this context, as the Israelites are being reminded that they have little to boast of, either in their ancestry or in their spiritual leaders (mediators). 28 The final thrust is deadly, for utter destruction is the Hebrew term ḥērem, reserved for such objects of judgment as Jericho or the Amalekites, with whom no compromise was to be endured. It is the strongest term in the language.

44:1–28 The living God and His great design. 1–5, reopening an apparently closed question with a characteristic but now (see on 43:1), amazingly reaffirm the ungrateful Israel's calling as servant and chosen (v. 1, repeated in v. 2), together with the affectionate Jeshurun ('upright' (?); cf. Dt. 33:5, but see too 32:15; cf. on Is. 42:19), and go on to promise greater things to come. The outpouring of the Spirit (v. 3) is a glimpse of the new covenant, as in Je. 31:31ff.; Ezk. 36:26f.; Joel 2:28f.; and the confessions of allegiance in v. 5 are a rare foretaste of the Gentile conversions, like those of Ps. 87:4–6 (where however it is God who enrols them). These new offspring of Israel will mark the flow of God's living water, just as a line of willows marks the course of a river (vv. 3, 4). The book of Acts traces part of this current of life through the thirsty land.

6–8 give the very essence of these chapters, with their emphasis on God as Israel's champion (Redeemer, v. 6; cf. 41:14), their explicit monotheism (vv. 6b, 8b), their stress on prediction (v. 7b) and their reassuring tone towards a diffident Israel (v. 8).

9–20 preach the same message from the other side, turning the visual appeal of idolatry into an embarrassment, sparing no aspect of it. It is a favourite theme of these chapters: cf. 40:18ff.; 45:20; 46:1–7. All worship of things, given by God (v. 9, cf. v. 14) and shaped by man, contains the same absurdity and blasphemy (cf. Rom. 1:25). Man's eventual inability to see this (which is as modern as it is ancient) comes of a prior refusal to face it (vv. 18ff.; cf. Rom. 1:21).

21–28 return to the positive and joyous revelation of the true God. 21 The opening call to remember refers probably to the matters to which Israel can already testify (cf. v. 8), as well as to the heathen follies just described; there is a similar call in 45:8. But the Lord's repeated claim to control and predict the course of history is now dramatically renewed by the specific promises of vv. 26–28. The veiled predictions of good news for Jerusalem and of a liberator, in 41:2, 25ff., are suddenly unveiled to reveal Cyrus and his edict of rebuilding; a prophecy which duly came to pass (cf. Ezr. 1:1ff.). Such minuteness of detail is paralleled only in 1 Ki. 13:2, where Josiah is named 300 years before his time. 27 The reference to the deep is another allusion to the Exodus, a reminder of God's ability to perform these new wonders. 28 The term my shepherd implies no more than God's employment of this ruler for His own ends: see 45:4b, and on 41:25.

45:1–25 The God of all the earth. 1–8 put the Lord's control of Cyrus in the setting of His total sovereignty (v. 7), His world-wide self-revelation (v. 6), and His will to vindicate the right (v. 8).

1–3 The term anointed is the basis of the title Messiah; but its OT use is general, chiefly for God's anointed kings (cf., e.g., Saul: 1 Sa. 24:6f., etc.). Here it stresses that Cyrus is appointed and equipped for a supreme task to which all his victories will be the prelude. Every phrase of vv. 1b–3a highlights these successes; e.g. the treasures of darkness are those that are the most carefully hidden, as being the most precious. (As conqueror of Croesus and of Babylon, Cyrus was to acquire incalculable wealth.) 4 But the act that was the point and climax of his career, the release of Israel (cf. v. 13), was doubtless a minor episode to Cyrus, so faulty are human valuations (cf. 55:8). His acknowledgment of Yahweh (cf. Ezr. 1:2–4), as of other deities, seems to have been superficial (see on 41:25): a recognition of His existence and influence (v. 3b) without a corresponding personal knowledge (v. 4b).

7 Light and . . . darkness, . . . weal and . . . woe, are typically Hebraic expressions, as pairs of opposites, for 'all that is' (cf., e.g., Ps. 49:1, 2). Woe is literally 'evil', but this Hebrew word is too general a term to suggest that Isaiah is making God the author of wickedness; see rather Jb. 2:10; Am. 3:6; Rom. 11:36. Some have seen here an attack on Zoroastrian dualism, with its rival gods of good and evil; but this verse is equally opposed to polytheism, the target of most of these chapters' invective. There is no clear evidence that Cyrus was a Zoroastrian as were some of his successors.

9–13 turn from Cyrus to a rather querulous Israel (the plural subjects of the verbs of v. 11, and the allusion to Cyrus in the third person (v. 13), indicate this change), with a classic rebuke to the suspicion that God is fumbling His work (cf. 29:16). 9 RSV's no handles is very weak; follow RV: 'or thy work (say), He hath no hands?' 11 But RSV rightly takes v. 11's imperatives as highly ironical, the equivalent of indignant questions. 12 The object-lesson from the starry skies has been similarly, if more gently, used in 40:26ff.

14–25, foreseeing the great influx of the Gentiles, leap far beyond the liberation. Chs. 60–62 will take up the theme more fully. Here it is expressed first in an address to Israel (vv. 14–19) and then in an appeal to mankind to acknowledge its Lord, as one day it must, and thereby find salvation in company with the nation it once despised (vv. 20–25).

14 Such names as Egypt, etc., and the details of chains and homage, depict God's triumph in terms of the contemporary scene, using the vivid colouring of human victories. In the fulfilment, these will be transcended, as vv. 20–25 make plain. The Gentiles of this verse are those that were never yet within Israel's empire; their surrender will be as total as that of prisoners of war, yet in reality it will spring from conviction (vv. 14c–16) and issue in salvation (vv. 22, 24).

15 The expression, a God who hidest thyself, may perhaps be a continuation of the converts' confession, acknowledging the invisible God instead of their idols; more probably it is Israel's exclamation at God's inscrutable ways, 'past finding out'. 18, 19 reply that, for all this, He has worked to a great design and has unequivocally revealed Himself. Chaos is tōhû, as in Gn. 1:2 ('without form'); v. 18b looks on to the end in view at the creation (cf. the phrase to be inhabited), the transforming of an initial formlessness into a habitable world. So too, a glorious end will be achieved with Israel.

22–25 The concluding verses are remarkable first for their picture of world-wide and heartfelt conversions, and secondly for the bold use the NT was to make of vv. 23, 24, applying them directly to Christ in Phil. 2:10, 11 (and indirectly in Rom. 14:9, 11). Cf. the use made of 8:12b, 13a in 1 Pet. 3:14, 15.

46:1–13 The helpless gods of Babylon. It is in keeping with the sharpening focus of the whole scene (cf. the explicit references to Cyrus (44:28; 45:1) and to Babylon and its overthrow, 47:1ff.) that particular gods are now specified. 1 Bel ('lord'; cf. Baal) was a title transferred from the old god Enlil to Babylon's patron deity, Marduk, whose son Nebo (Nabu) was the god of learning. Their names appear in, e.g., Belshazzar, Nebuchadrezzar. Both gods were commonly transported in processions, but in this scene they are monstrous refugees, weighing down their struggling pack-animals. The contrast between these burdens, on the one hand, with their demands on money and muscles (vv. 6, 7), and on the other hand the lifelong burden-Bearer, Yahweh (vv. 3, 4), brings the series of attacks on idolatry in these chapters to a telling climax. The theme of prediction, a constant ingredient of these passages (cf., e.g., 41:23), receives its classic statement in v. 10a, and the twin realities of the conqueror's career—as both predatory and predestined—are set side by side in v. 11a (cf. 41:2, 25; 44:28; 45:1ff.).

12, 13 Deliverance is literally 'righteousness', a word with several layers of meaning. Basically it means what is right, i.e. as it should be, in its proper state. So it can include the ideas of rectitude, of justice and of righting what is wrong. In these chapters the last of these senses is predominant, even shading into that of victory (see on 41:2); but the ethical dimension is not lost (cf., e.g., 48:1; 53:11; 58:2), and here it should take precedence in v. 12, as 'righteousness', leaving the secondary sense, deliverance, to emerge in v. 13, parallel with salvation.

47:1–15 Babylon doomed. This is a dirge, or taunt-song, in the characteristic fall-away rhythm of such poems (it can be felt, in translation, in the succession of a longer and a shorter phrase within v. 2a, and again within v. 2b). Cf. 1:21ff.; 14:4ff.

It is Babylon's proper fate: there can be no mercy, for she has shown none (v. 6; cf. Jas. 2:13). Yet the description is not without pity. We are watching the triumph of justice, but equally the tragedy of the sinner. Dust, toil; nakedness, shame; silence, darkness (vv. 1–5)—these symbols of damnation have an added bitterness by the glimpse of the arrogant gaiety ('you pampered jade', v. 8, C. R. North) which they quench for ever (vv. 7–11). We can enter into her sinking of heart as the trusted expedients fail (the 'enchantments', 'sorceries' and horoscopes of vv. 12–14), and the old associates drift prudently away (v. 15) like the fair-weather friends that they are.

The records amply confirm, incidentally, Babylon's profusion of magical rites, alluded to in vv. 9b, 12f.; and Ezk. 21:21 vividly depicts a selection of them in use by Nebuchadrezzar.

48:1–22 'Love to the loveless shown.' 1–8 The shift of attention from Babylon back to Israel is far from flattering. Their glib talk of the Lord and the holy city (vv. 1, 2) accords ill with their persistent idolatry (v. 5); they emerge in fact as hardened hypocrites (vv. 1, 4, 8). It is a darker picture than that of the faithlessness of 40:27 and even the coldness of 43:22, although it was anticipated in the sin against the light implied in 42:18ff. The argument from prophecy, hitherto directed against the heathen (cf., e.g., 41:21ff.), now has to be turned against God's own people, these determined sceptics (vv. 3–8). See Introduction, p. 589f.

9–22 All this, however, serves only to reveal God's patience for what it is: unmerited (v. 9), constructive (v. 10; see note below), resolute (v. 11). After all His outspokenness He can still affirm both His call (v. 12) and His love (v. 14; cf. Dt. 7:7, 8), and give the liberating command, Go forth (v. 20). It will re-echo through the coming chapters: cf. 49:9; 52:11; 55:12; 62:10.

Yet this is no rhapsody; the high price of self-will is stated and re-stated as nothing less than a farewell to peace (vv. 18, 22)—i.e., to all health of soul and society. The sad realism of v. 22 will reappear at 57:21, and the book will end on the still harsher note of 66:24.

Notes. 10 presents problems of translation. RV, RSV assume a small miscopying in v. 10a (the Heb. has 'with' (AV), which could also mean 'at a cost of' or 'in the character of'; this is a single letter, easily confused with like). In v. 10b, the Dead Sea Scroll (1 Q Isa) supports RSV's tried; but 'chosen' is the normal meaning of the word found in the standard text (cf. AV, RV). 16 ends with a startling change of speaker: no longer the Lord, as in vv. 15, 16a, but one sent by Him, as the Spirit is also sent. It could be the prophet, but it is more meaningful if it anticipates the 'me' of 49:1; 50:4; 61:1; in other words, the Servant in whom Jesus was to see Himself. It is a remarkable glimpse, from afar, of the Trinity.

49:1 – 55:13 THE DAWN OF REDEMPTION

49:1–13 The second 'Servant Song'

The limits of this passage have been variously fixed, usually at vv. 1–6. But each of vv. 5–8 introduces part of God's answering commission to His servant; and v. 8, which echoes 42:6, cannot be shorn of its sequel.

After ch. 42, with its mutually incompatible portraits of 'my servant' (42:1ff., 18ff.), the question of Israel's unfitness has become more and more acute. The coming chapters will resolve the tension, not by this servant's dismissal or improvement, but by the clear emergence of a true Servant whose mission will be first of all to Israel itself.

In this passage this is apparent at once from the Servant's clear conscience. In 49:1ff. he shows no contrition for the sins deplored in 48:1ff., or the blindness of 42:18ff.; only a sense of being trained for God's moment (vv. 1–3; cf. 48:16d). The unresponsiveness of Israel is something he has done battle with, not shared (v. 4), and although he is addressed as 'Israel' (v. 3), his mission field is itself 'Israel' (v. 5) before it is the world (v. 6).

This paradox of an Israel sent to Israel is insoluble in OT terms, since no king, prophet or priest is big enough for the title. It is part of the powerful thrust of the OT towards the NT, in which Jesus stands forth as the sole worthy and rightful bearer of the name Israel. Meanwhile the two opposing portraits of ch. 42 have been brought together, with the one bearer of the name Israel entrusted with a converting mission towards the other. Also the theme of conquest through service, broached in 42:1ff., has begun to sound the note of suffering and rejection (4, 7), which will increase in sharpness and significance in the third and fourth 'Songs'.

8 V. 8a is quoted by Paul in 2 Cor. 6:2 as a saying now fulfilled; cf. our Lord's use of Is. 61:1, 2a in Lk. 4:18–21. On the expression, a covenant to the people, see on 42:6. 9ff. The prisoners flocking home in vv. 8–13 are visualized as the dispersed of Israel throughout the world, not merely at Babylon (cf. v. 12 with v. 22); but the allusion to v. 10 in Rev. 7:17 shows that we may rightly see also the Gentiles leaving their darkness for their new homeland (cf. 44:5). 12 Syene, i.e. Aswan, on the Nile (where a Jewish colony existed from the 6th century BC), is an emendation, supported by the Qumran Isaiah Scroll, of the standard text's 'Sinim'. The latter could be China (the Chinese are Sinai in Greek), if the Hebrews knew the name as early as this.

49:14–23 Comfort for Jerusalem

14 The deserted ruins of Zion are a feature of these chapters, personified as a woman bereft of husband and children. 15, 16 God's reply here is typical: first, she is not bereft, for He cannot forget her; 19, 20 secondly, she has her best days before her, when her new family will overflow all her bounds. The NT applies such promises not to 'the present Jerusalem' but to 'Jerusalem above' (Gal. 4:25–27; cf. Is. 54:1), i.e. the universal church in heaven and earth. The ruins of the city were indeed rebuilt in the 6th and 5th centuries, but these prophecies transcend the modest scale of those events. 22, 23 On the abject surrender pictured here, see on 45:14–25. On those who wait for me, see on 25:9.

49:24 – 50:3 Comfort for the captives

There is a double misgiving reflected here, over the power and the will of God to save. The former is answered by affirming God's control of history (49:25, 26) and of creation (50:2, 3), and the latter by a comparison between His character and Israel's (50:1)—for there is no fickleness in Him as there is in her, and no pressure on Him from outside (my creditors). Her sins alone (v. 1b) account for the breach (cf. 59:1, 2); the Lord's attitude is, by implication, that of Ho. 3:1–3, where the erring wife is loved and brought home.

50:4–9 The third 'Servant Song'

After the display of patient gentleness in the first 'Song' (42:1ff.) and the acceptance of frustrating toil in the second (49:4, 7), here the Servant faces the active spite and fury of evil. It is only a step, the reader feels, to the cross. There is no hint now of even the momentary discouragement of 49:4; the Servant has set himself to learn (v. 4) and to give (v. 6), as one dedicated in mind and body. 4 The plurals, those who are taught, emphasize that he is accepting the common course of training (cf. Heb. 5:8), and the element of reiteration in the phrase morning by morning suggests a lifelong attentiveness to God's unfolding will, 'the matter of a day in its day' (cf. 1 Ki. 8:59). The consequent authority and aptness of his words are those of the prophet par excellence.

So his suffering, while still unexplained

(until ch. 53), is already fruitful, as all suffering can be. 5 Godward, he makes it his offering of obedience; 6 manward, a voluntary, costly gift, not a resented exaction (I gave . . . ; I hid not . . .); 7–9 inwardly, he uses his discredit and isolation to clarify his sole trust in God. In Rom. 8:31ff. Paul sings the Christian's variant of this song, for whom Another's righteousness silences the accuser, and for whom God's help (vv. 7a, 9a) is now explicitly declared as love (Rom. 8:35, 37, 39).

50:10, 11 An epilogue to the song

The two verses seize on the words of faith just uttered, to make them the pivot of life or death for the hearer. 10 Commitment to God is clearly allegiance at the same time to His Servant, whose words are binding and his faith normative (cf. vv. 7–9). It is a pointer to his identity, as a single individual and a master of disciples. 11 describes either the persecutors (cf. v. 6 and, e.g., Ps. 118:12) or, more probably, those who are self-sufficient, in contrast to v. 10. Its last line may be a generalization on the sorrow which is always the end of sin, but it may anticipate the NT teaching on punishment after death. C. R. North renders it, 'You shall die and go to a place of torment.'

51:1–8 More sustenance for faith

Faith, which 'comes from what is heard' (Rom. 10:17), is nourished by the three messages introduced by 'hearken' (v. 1) . . . 'listen' (v. 4) . . . 'hearken' (v. 7). They confirm the call of 50:10 to an unflinching trust, by an appeal first to look back to Israel's humble beginnings, to see what God can do with 'but one' (vv. 1, 2); then to look ahead to the promised consummation both in this world (vv. 4, 5) and in the next (v. 6); finally to look at present humiliations against such a background (vv. 7, 8). The thought of man's mortality, in the light of God's eternity, is echoed from the Servant's words in 50:9. 6 The translation, like gnats, as against the weaker expression 'in like manner' (AV, RV), plausibly postulates here a collective singular of the noun used in Ex. 8:16, 17 (12, 13, Heb.).

51:9 – 52:12 Mounting expectancy

Quick repetitions lend urgency to the whole section, which takes its tone from the opening, 'Awake, awake'. Man's appeal draws out an answering assurance and challenge, marked by God's own reiterations: 'I, I am he' (v. 12), 'Rouse yourself, rouse yourself' (v. 17), 'Awake, awake' (52:1), finally 'Depart, depart' (from Babylon), 52:11.

51:9–11 The Exodus surpassed. 9, 10 Rahab and the dragon and the sea, which would suggest to a non-Israelite the chaos-powers confronting the gods at creation (cf. on 27:1), are symbols here of the Exodus, as v. 10 makes clear. Rahab has already been Egypt's nickname in 30:7 (where see note). On rather similar symbolism for the final judgment, see on 27:1. 11 But Isaiah's plea for another Exodus stirs his memory of a promise already made, and this verse quotes, almost to the letter, 35:10.

51:12–16 The captive comforted. 12–14 God Himself (I, I . . .) is the ground of comfort, both as Maker, in contrast to the transience of mere creatures; 15, 16 and as God of the covenant (your God . . . my people), who counts His call of Israel the crowning glory, not the anticlimax, of the startling series, heavens . . . earth . . . Zion. Note that Zion is a term for the people themselves in the last phrase of v. 16. V. 16a recalls the charge to the Servant in 49:2; and in fact, it is as bearer of God's words to the world that Israel has chiefly fulfilled her calling.

51:17–25 The tables turned. The 'you' is not plural but feminine singular throughout this passage, which consistently personifies the mother-city (see on v. 16, above). Of the various metaphors, that of the 'bowl' or 'cup of staggering' destined to change hands (vv. 17, 22) conveys the main message, while the pathos and brutalities of defeat are made vivid by the groping and prostration in vv. 18, 23, and by the simile of the trapped deer (v. 20). The sight of 'every street' (v. 20) littered with the dying was to leave its mark deeply on Lamentations (cf., e.g., La. 2:11, 12, 19, 21).

52:1–10 The good news of peace. 1, 2 God's call, Awake, awake, throws back at Israel her own prayer of 51:9, in a retort which is the best answer. Cf. a comparable rejoinder by our Lord in Mk. 9:22, 23. 3–5 The main object of these verses is to rid the redemption metaphor of any notion of a commercial transaction. As 50:1 pointed out, Israel's overlords have no claims on her, nor on God: they are His agents (and far from guiltless at that), not His creditors. While 1 Pet. 1:18, 19 will give a fresh nuance to v. 3b, the sovereign salvation of God, for the sake of my name . . . my name (vv. 5, 6; cf. Ezk. 36:21; Rom. 2:24), is here the sole concern.

7–10, movingly portraying the arrival of the news (cf. 2 Sa. 18:19ff.), bring out the three component factors of every such experience: first the messenger, whose lustre is that of his message (and this must be a despatch, as Paul points out in Rom. 10:15, nothing less); secondly the watchmen, those who are 'looking for . . . redemption' (Lk. 2:38), otherwise the news will fall on deaf ears; thirdly the event, which is here none other than the Lord in action (vv. 8b–10), seen not from afar, but close to (eye to eye, means 'face to face'; cf. Je. 32:4). Notice the Psalm-like outburst in vv. 9, 10 (cf. Ps. 98:3, 4; see above on 42:10–12).

52:11, 12 The clean break with Babylon. The picture is of a priestly procession, not the unceremonious departure of Ex. 12:33. The homecomings in Ezr. 1:5ff.; 7:7ff. were to have something of this character, and Ezra himself took the promise of divine escort fully to heart (Ezr. 8:22) and was not disappointed. But behind the literal departure from Babylon, Rev. 18:4 sees a greater movement, the withdrawal of the church from the embrace and judgment of the world, 'lest you take part in her sins, lest you share in her plagues'.

52:13 – 53:12 The fourth 'Servant Song'

From the great homecoming we turn to the solitary figure whose agony was the price of it. We are at the heart of the book, the centre of its whole pattern of sin and righteousness, grace and judgment.

The poem, unusually symmetrical, is in five paragraphs of three verses each. It begins and ends with the Servant's exaltation (first and fifth stanzas); set within this is the story of his rejection in sections two and four, which in turn frame the centrepiece (vv. 4–6) where the atoning significance of the suffering is expounded. God and man, reconciled, share the telling (see the 'my' and 'I' of the outer sections, and the 'we' and 'our' of 53:1–6).

52:13–15 The joy set before him. Here is heaven's endorsement of the brave words of 50:7–9, applying to the Servant terms of exaltation that can characterize God Himself (cf. 'high and lifted up', 6:1; 'high and lofty', 57:15; cf. also the other term for 'high' in 5:16; 55:9). The 'many' ranged against him will give place to the 'many' convicted and enlightened (vv. 14, 15; note the return of this word, at a deeper level, in 53:11, 12). 15 The translation startle, supported by the LXX, makes a good opening to the sequence, roused—silenced—convinced. But 'sprinkle' (AV, RV), which is grammatically suspect but not indefensible (see E. J. Young, Studies in Isaiah, 1954, pp. 199ff.), would also suit the context well with its implications of sacrificial cleansing (cf. 1 Pet. 1:2) and perhaps of covenant making (cf. Ex. 24:6, 8; a different word).

53:1–3 The disdain of men. The gulf between revelation and opinion is very plain, in the contrast between what is heard (and so potentially revealed; cf. v. 1 with Rom. 10:16, 17, 21) and what is naturally attractive (v. 2) or impressive (v. 3). Cf. the reaction to the humiliated Jesus in, e.g., Mt. 27:39ff.; Jn. 19:5ff., and to the preaching of the cross (1 Cor. 1:23). Sorrows and grief (v. 3), which recur in v. 4, are lit. 'pains' and 'illness'—which might suggest to the reader either a sick man or one sick at heart, as in Je. 15:18. But there is another category, that of the physician's voluntary involvement; for he is also a man of pain and sickness in the sense that he gives himself to these things and their relief. This is the sense defined in Mt. 8:17, quoting Is. 53:4.

53:4–6 'O sweet exchange . . .'. This is the central stanza, in every sense. Here the meaning of the Servant's disgrace breaks through, with the inverted word-order of v. 4a to stress the exchange of roles, and the emphatic pronouns he and we (vv. 4a, 4b) to expose man's misunderstanding: 'Our ills he bore, and our pains he carried; yet we thought. . . .'

4, 5 The meaning grows in clarity through these verses: the pain he is bearing is ours (v. 4); it is the punishment of sin (v. 5a); it is the price of salvation (v. 5b). But it remains a paradox, one of God's ways which are higher than ours (55:9), as we are reminded by the startling conjunction of his stripes (i.e. weals; cf. 1:6) and our healing, as cause and effect. 6 is perhaps the most penetrating of all descriptions of sin and atonement, uncovering the fecklessness which is second nature to us, and the self-will which isolates us from God and man alike; but also the divine initiative which transferred our punishment to the one substitute. The metaphor whereby iniquity is laid on him is clarified by, e.g., Gn. 4:13; Lv. 5:1, 17 (where one pays one's own penalty) and by, e.g., Lv. 10:17; 16:22 (where the liability falls on another). Note the expressions, all we . . . us all, which give the verse an identical beginning and end in the Hebrew; grace wholly answering sin.

53:7–9 Wicked hands, willing victim. The victim's silence (contrast the outcry of another 'gentle lamb', Je. 11:19; 12:3) springs from love and faith, as Jesus was to show (1 Pet. 2:23, 24), not from weakness or prudence. C. R. North translates v. 8a: 'After arrest and sentence he was led away'; the whole stanza irresistibly evokes the trial of Jesus and its sequel (see on v. 9).

8 Acts 8:33 supports AV's 'who shall declare (better, 'consider') his generation?' but the Hebrew allows the more oblique translation of RV, RSV. The word used for generation mostly denotes 'contemporaries' (cf. Ex. 1:6), 'circle' (cf. Pr. 30:11; Ps. 24:6) or 'life span' (cf. Gn. 15:16); but the sense is perhaps clearest if it can mean 'posterity', as some hold. 9 Made is literally 'gave', i.e. 'appointed'; the abrupt introduction of a rich man was to remain an enigma until the event of Mt. 27:57, 60, and it still embarrasses those to whom detailed prediction is unacceptable. But the ancient versions and the Scrolls confirm the authenticity of rich, the latter source indeed correcting a plural found in the LXX, and restoring the singular, as found in our text.

53:10–12 Crowned with glory and honour. In this stanza vindication is complete. The persecutors fade from view, to reveal the Lord (emphatic in v. 10; cf. Acts 4:28) and the Servant (v. 12, he poured out his soul) as the ultimate doers of what has been done. Further, in each verse the Servant's resurrection and triumph are clearly implied, while even more facets of his atonement appear than in vv. 4–6.

10 An offering for sin is literally 'a guilt-offering', the sacrifice which spoke of compensation or satisfaction. The Hebrew of this verse can make either 'his soul' (i.e. himself) or the Lord ('thou', AV, RV) the offerer of the sacrifice; but v. 12 will leave no doubt of the Servant's self-giving. 11, 12 Other aspects of his saving work are shown in terms of justification (accounted righteous), sin-bearing (see on v. 6), identification (numbered with the transgressors; cf. Lk. 22:37) and intercession, i.e. intervention. He is presented as priest and sacrifice, patriarch (v. 10b) and king. Finally, the many . . . many in vv. 11, 12 (cf. great, v. 12a, the same word), for whom the one suffered, reappear in fulfilment of the opening promise (cf. 52:14, 15, 'many . . . many').

54:1–17 The teeming mother-city

This chapter's exuberance, peace and security spring from the dereliction and death just described, which cut across the description of the great home-coming at 52:13. In Christian terms, the Calvary of ch. 53 is followed by the growing church of 54 and the gospel call of 55.

54:1–10 Wife and mother. Paul linked this passage with the story of Sarah and Hagar (cf. Gal. 4:27), and saw here the true church, its members born from above (see also on 49:14–23). The promise of world-wide expansion (v. 3; cf. 49:19) and the hint of coming strains upon the old structure (v. 2) were to be vividly borne out in the age of the apostles. For the metaphor of the erring wife, see 50:1; here however, with rare sympathy, not the guilt but the pain (v. 6) of the estrangement is put to the fore, with the corollary of the tenderness of reunion (vv. 7, 8)—its permanence seen to be as unconditional and as undeserved (cf. 'compassion', v. 10) as the promise of Gn. 9:11, and (we can now add) of Mt. 16:18b.

54:11–17 Gem-built city. The narrow tent of v. 2 and the shattered Jerusalem are equally outshone by this union of beauty and strength, a glowing picture of the church, to be elaborated in Rev. 21:10ff. But its meaning is translated into non-pictorial terms in vv. 13ff., where the 'righteousness' of v. 14 and the impregnability of vv. 15–17 are rooted in the fact of universal personal discipleship (v. 13; cf. 8:16; Je. 31:34), which is one of the marks of the new covenant. This is the true strength of God's city, which is promised not immunity from attack but the unanswerable weapon of truth (v. 17; cf. Lk. 21:15).

55:1–13 Grace abounding

This call to the needy is unsurpassed for warmth of welcome even in the NT. The chapter builds up twice to a climax, first in vv. 1–5, then, over a still greater range, in vv. 6–13.

55:1–5 Poverty, abundance, mission. 1–3 The fourfold come is as wide as human need (note the stress on unsatisfied longing in vv. 1, 2, as in, e.g., Ec. 1:3; Jn. 4:13) and as narrow as a single individual (note the intertwined singulars and plurals in v. 1, more evident in AV, RV). The Bible closes with an echo of it (cf. Rev. 22:17), and Jesus made the same identification of come . . . and eat with come to me, in Jn. 6:35. The paradox of buy . . . without money throws into relief the twin facts of sure possession and total dependence which are implied in grace; cf. the union of the undoubting and the undeserving in Heb. 4:16.

3–5 raise the invitation to the fully personal plane, engaging mind and will and drawing the hearers into covenant, to share in the world mission of the Messiah. David is named only here in chs. 40ff., but this is enough to identify the kingly Messiah of 7:14, etc. with the Servant of 42:1, etc., for whom the nations wait. (The suggestion, sometimes made, that the promise given to David in 2 Sa. 7:12–16 is here transferred from king to people, goes ill with the emphasis in v. 3b on its permanence. Rather, David's vision in Ps. 18:43–45, 49, of nations subdued for a witness to the Lord, is enlarged by the prospect of nations converted: cf. v. 5 with Zc. 8:20–23; 9:9, 10.)

55:6–13 Sin, pardon, glory. 6–9 If man is hungry and needs satisfying (vv. 1–5), he is also wicked and needs salvation. God's calling and seeking (vv. 1ff.) must be matched by those of the sinner. V. 7 is a classic statement of repentance, challenging the mind (cf. the NT word for 'repentance') and the will, the habits (ways) and the plans (implied in the Heb. for thoughts). It is both negative (forsake) and positive (return, or simply 'turn'), personal (to the Lord) and specific (for mercy); and its appeal is reinforced by the shortness of the time (v. 6) and the abundance of the promise (v. 7).

10, 11 The declaration of vv. 8, 9 not only looks back to verse 7, but on to vv. 10ff., to shame us out of our small expectations. God's thoughts are farther-reaching and more fertile, as well as higher, than ours. The comparison of His word with rain and . . . snow suggests a slow and silent work, transforming the face of the earth in due time. The reference is to His decree (cf., e.g., 44:26; 45:23) rather than His invitation or instruction, which can be refused (48:18f.; cf. the similar imagery to that of v. 10 in Heb. 6:4–8).

12, 13 His decree is given in these verses, combining the joys of liberation (v. 12a), of the Lord's own coming (cf. v. 12a with 52:12; 12b with Ps. 96:12, 13) and of the healing of the old devastations (cf. v. 13a with 7:23–25 and perhaps Gn. 3:18). Notice the living memorial, (lit. 'name') and sign, unlike those of 'conquering kings', in which the Lord delights.

56:1 – 66:24 THE GLORY AND SHAME OF ZION

Whereas chs. 40–55 surveyed the Babylonian exile, tracing the pattern of redemption largely in terms of the Israelite home-coming, the remaining part of the book fixes our attention on the homeland, which is seen partly in its too-familiar aspect as a place of corruption (56:9 – 59:15a) and devastation (63:7 – 64:12), but shown also as it will appear when God has come to the rescue, to make it 'a crown of beauty', the centre and magnet of the whole earth (chs. 60–62). The final chapters (65, 66), like the prelude (56:1–8), show God's welcome of the outsider and the heathen to His holy mountain and eternal kingdom, but press home the peril of an everlasting exclusion from these glories.

In structure, then, there is a certain symmetry within this group of chapters, somewhat akin to that of the fourth 'Servant Song' (see on 52:13ff.), in that the centrepiece (chs. 60–62, the glorified Zion) is flanked by the twin poems of God's vengeance and salvation (59:15b, ff.; 63:1–6), and these in turn by the scenes of sin and suffering (56:9 - 59:15a; 63:7 - 64:12); while the whole is enfolded by the promise of the ingathering of the outcasts of Israel and the world (56:1–8; 65:1 - 66:24).

56:1–8 A welcome for the outcast

1, 2 After the exhilarating climax to chs. 40–55, these verses present the sober obligations of integrity (v. 1) and unworldliness (v. 2) that are the plain fare of salvation. In v. 1, righteousness displays two of its facets by being coupled with both justice (i.e. fair dealing) and salvation (RSV's deliverance is lit. 'righteousness' again); for God's righteousness is oriented towards putting things right, not merely towards condemning them as wrong; cf. Rom. 3:21–26; see also on 46:12, 13.

3–8 produce a similarly practical translation of the missionary vision of chs. 40–55 into modest terms, in the concern shown for the eunuch and the foreigner, outsiders in the midst of Israel. The former are shown that the law against them (cf. Dt. 23:1) was given in love (to make this cruel mutilation abhorrent in Israel, if nowhere else) and this love now sensitively matches their handicap with something better (v. 5), answering their physical exclusion with the words in . . . and within, and their lack of a posterity with the word everlasting. The foreigners are likewise treated according to their attitude, not their birth—a principle already established by God's acceptance, despite Dt. 23:3, of Ruth the convert. But the great words of v. 7b were too big for the Temple's trustees: cf. Mt. 21:13; Acts 21:28. With the little-known v. 8, cf. Jn. 10:16: one of several indications that our Lord knew these chapters intimately.

The importance of the sabbath, reiterated in this passage (vv. 2, 4, 6), emerges most clearly in the two supporting phrases in v. 4b, making this day not an end in itself, but a mark of love for God (cf. 58:13) and loyalty to the covenant (cf. Ex. 31:13).

56:9 - 59:15a The shame of Zion

56:9–12 Watchmen asleep. See, by contrast, 52:8; 62:6. Our own phrases, dumb dogs, sleeping dogs, greedy dogs, are all, substantially, in vv. 10, 11a, and they characterize the spiritual leaders (watchmen; cf. Ezk. 3:17), while shepherds is an OT term for rulers. The sequence is instructive: spiritually, to have no vision (v. 10a; cf. 1 Sa. 3:1) is to have no message (v. 10b) and to drift into escapism (v. 10c) and self-pleasing (v. 11a); meanwhile the civil leadership (vv. 11b, 12) will improve on this example with stronger excess and blither optimism.

57:1–13 Flagrant apostasy. The watchmen have relaxed (56:9–12), and evil has duly flooded in. The times could well be those of Manasseh, Hezekiah's apostate son, whose persecution of the innocent (2 Ki. 21:16) would accord with v. 1, and whose burning of his own son (2 Ki. 21:6) matches the revival of Molech-worship here (vv. 5b, 9).

2 The beds are tombs or biers (cf. 2 Ch. 16:14, Heb.); the thought of the verse is akin to Rev. 14:13. 5 The theme of lust refers to the sexual fertility rites of Canaanite religion, rampant also in Jeremiah's early days (cf. Je. 2:20ff.). (On v. 5b, see the first paragraph, above.) From speaking of literal whoredom it is a natural transition to the figure of Israel as the wife turned prostitute. In 6–13 (where you is consistently feminine singular) the metaphors such as bed, symbol (i.e. harlot's trade sign), perfume, etc., are intertwined with the actualities, such as sacrifice and idols in the religious realm, and envoys in the political realm. Whether v. 9a refers to religion or politics is uncertain; the Hebrew text has 'the king', which could be either Molech (see first paragraph, above) or an earthly ally (cf., e.g., 30:2–5).

There is loving perception in the picture of weary doggedness in v. 10, and of infatuation and coming disillusion in vv. 11–13. The whole passage is a fit companion to Ho. 1–3 and Lk. 13:34f.

57:14–21 Abundant grace. 14 Repetitions, such as build up, build up and, later, peace, peace, are highly characteristic of chs. 40–66 (cf., e.g., 40:1; 52:1; 65:1); so too is the triumph of grace, which is presented here in many forms. The Exodus theme characterizes grace as strong and resourceful; 15 the conjunction of the lofty and the humble displays its condescension; 16, echoing Gn. 6:3, speaks of its forbearance; above all, 17, 18 expound it as a frank resolve to reclaim the undeserving and unpromising, summed up in the memorable first line of v. 18. 19 So the offer of grace is crystallized, to reappear in Eph. 2:17 as the germ of Paul's gospel to the Gentiles. 20, 21 The plight of the wicked is consequently seen, more clearly than in 48:22, in terms of the salvation they have refused. Only their choice separates the 'peace, peace' of v. 19 from the no peace of v. 21.

58:1–14 Cant and reality. God's trumpet-call (v. 1) to the formalists is related to the previous indictment (57:1–13) much as Rom. 2 is to Rom. 1, and its emphasis is largely that of the Gospels and of James. Negatively (vv. 1–5), note the conjunction of religious punctilio (vv. 2, 5) and social ruthlessness (vv. 3b, 4) which the pious of every generation seem to take in their (or our) stride (cf. Mt. 23; Jas. 4:1ff.), but which God finds nauseating (cf. 1:15). Positively (vv. 6–14), the redefinition of fasting as social reform (v. 6), loving care (v. 7), and a forgoing of the luxury of 'pointing the finger' (v. 9b), is a foretaste of our Lord's constructive approach to the law.

9 The promise, Then you shall call . . ., looks back to the unanswered prayers of v. 3 (cf. Jas. 4:3, 8ff.), and its rich development in vv. 9b–12 is an expression of the principle of Mt. 7:2: 'The measure you give will be the measure you get.' 11 The beautiful simile of the watered garden reappears in Je. 31:12. The whole series of metaphors in vv. 10–12 repays study. 13, 14 But lest it should seem that philanthropy is all, these verses describe the strictness and the gladness of the sabbath-keeping God desires. If fasting is to be an opportunity to show love to our neighbour, the sabbath should express first of all our love of God (though both the foregoing passage and the sabbath practice of Jesus insist that it must overflow to man). It will mean self-forgetfulness (v. 13a) and the self-discipline of rising above the trivial (v. 13b). But to people of this spirit God can safely give great things (v. 14).

59:1–15a Mutual alienation. This passage is largely the dark counterpart of ch. 58. There is the same problem of unanswered prayer, and a similar reply (vv. 1, 2). But whereas ch. 58 describes true righteousness and its blessings, ch. 59 depicts sin (vv. 3–8) and its obliteration of all values (vv. 9–15): cf. v. 10 of each chapter. The end is chaos, with human life (in Hobbes's phrase) 'solitary, poor, nasty, brutish and short'.

2 classically explains God's seeming inactivity as the effect of separation; not expounded here in terms of His revulsion (as at 1:15), but as the proper product of sin itself. 3ff. The spreading anarchy of vv. 3–8 clinches the point; if this is sin, not even society survives it, let alone man's fellowship with God. 5, 6 The adders' eggs and spider's web speak tellingly of, first, the poisonous influence of evil men, propagated by the very attempts to stamp it out (v. 5b; cf., e.g., the effects of banning obscene art), and secondly the futility of relying on their policies or promises (v. 6), flimsy as gossamer.

7, 8 Paul drew on these verses in Rom. 3:15–17 in building up to his climax concerning our universal guilt. 9, with its therefore, ushers in the progressive consequences of choosing evil. 10 The groping in broad daylight is the judgment that Jesus' contemporaries courted (cf. Jn. 3:19) and suffered (cf. Jn. 12:35–40). 14 The four personified figures, with truth (i.e. trustworthiness) lying prostrate—it is always 'the first casualty' in disordered times—may have contributed something to the imagery of Rev. 11:7, 8. 15 Perhaps the most revealing touch is the victimizing of the decent man, the only one out of step. It is a worse breakdown than that of Am. 5:13; i.e. not only public justice has warped, but public opinion with it.

59:15b–21 The solitary Rescuer (cf. 63:1–6)

Divine action is the only possible bridge between the shame of Zion just described and the glories to follow (see the comment introducing the section 56:1 – 66:24).

16, 17 The Lord's concern is even sharper than our versions suggest. Wondered should be 'was appalled', as at 63:5. With this unshared indignation cf. Jesus' solitary grief and anger in Lk. 19:41, 45. The armour and clothing in v. 17 reaffirm the point of v. 16b; the Lord has no external aids in fighting evil: only His pure and intense rejection of it. Victory and salvation share the same Hebrew root; righteousness seems to have both its dynamic, crusading sense and its more static meaning of integrity (cf. on 46:12, 13). So God's armour here illuminates Eph. 6:13ff.: it is what He uses, not only what He gives.

This zeal is governed by strict justice: 18 bristles with words of retribution: repay . . . render ('repay'); requital . . . requital (cf. Rom. 12:19); but it clears the way for a kingdom of converts. 19–21 No place of origin will disqualify (v. 19) or qualify (v. 20) a man for membership; the test is spiritual (vv. 19a, 20b; cf. Mt. 8:10–12), and the covenant is recognizably the new covenant, whose participants will not only 'all know' the Lord (Je. 31:34) but all speak for Him as a nation of prophets: cf. Nu. 11:29; Joel 2:28.

60:1 – 62:12 The glory of Zion

These glowing, exultant chapters depict blessings that transcend the old order and even, in places, the Christian era itself; but the language is that of the OT ordinances and of the literal Jerusalem: it will need translating into terms of 'the Jerusalem above' (cf. 54:1ff.; Gal. 4:26). Also Rev. 21 draws freely on ch. 60 for its picture of the radiant city from heaven; and the interpretation of that vision (of which more than one view is possible) must affect that of the present prophecy. The view taken here is that the return of dispersed Israelites to Jerusalem is made the model of a far greater movement, the world-wide inflow of converts into the church, and that the vision repeatedly looks beyond this to the end, the state of ultimate glory.

60:1–9 Lodestar of the nations. The you and your of this chapter are feminine singulars, addressing the mother-city, Zion (see on 49:14–23; 51:17–25; 54:1–10), whose sons . . . and . . . daughters (v. 4) are of every nationality, not only of the Israelite dispersion; cf. Ps. 87:3–6; Gal. 4:26. So the nations (v. 3) and the coastlands (v. 9) are more than mere carriers of this homeward traffic: they themselves furnish a large part of it as seekers who come to (Zion's) light (v. 3) and wait expectantly for the Lord (v. 9), homing like doves to their loft (v. 8; their windows). But see also on vv. 10–16. The gold and frankincense (v. 6) remind the Christian reader of the harbingers of this migration in Mt. 2, whose homage then, however, was disputed and whose gifts included the premonitory myrrh (cf. Mk. 15:23; Jn. 19:39)—pointers to the struggle that still lay ahead.

On the setting and symbolism of, especially, vv. 6–9 (of which v. 7 is crucial to the understanding of the chapter), see the introductory remarks to the section 60:1 – 62:12, above. The priestly terms of v. 7 preclude a purely literal interpretation of the prophecy, since the NT insists that there can be no return to a worship based on sacrificial rams . . . altar and house, which were 'but a shadow of the good things to come' (Heb. 10:1; cf. Heb. 13:10–16; Jn. 4:21–26). On Tarshish, see on 2:16.

60:10–16 The sweets of conquest. The Gentiles of this passage are not converts but subjects, conquered rather than won. Scripture always envisages many such (cf., e.g., Lk. 19:27; Rev. 20:7ff.). In metaphors of victory and its fruits—foreign labour (v. 10), immunity from attack (v. 11a; cf. Rev. 21:25f.), exotic tribute (v. 11b), and the like—God promises the triumph of His kingdom and the endless (v. 15) felicity of His people. The apparent imperialism of the passage only expresses the sober truth that to reject God's sway is suicide (v. 12), and that the meek will inherit the earth.

60:17–22 The full blaze of glory. Gold instead of bronze is a characteristic divine exchange (cf. 61:3, 7), in telling contrast to human decline and devaluations (cf. the makeshifts in 1 Ki. 14:26–28 and the pathos of La. 4:1ff.). The passage is so packed with these new glories that it can only be portraying the final perfection, where, in a people all . . . righteous, no overseers or taskmasters will be needed but the constraint of right and concord (v. 17b), and no defence but the salvation which is inseparable from God (cf. 59:17), and the praise which is trust made perfect. The living centre of this glory is revealed in the two middle verses, 19, 20, viz. the immediate presence of God. Rev. 21:23; 22:5, confirm that this vision outruns not only the OT but the Christian era, expressing in earthly terms (cf., e.g., v. 22) the new creation of which 65:17ff. will speak again.

61:1–4 The song of the Lord's Anointed. Although the term 'the Servant of the Lord' is absent from this song (as indeed from 50:4–9), it seems artificial to make the 'me' of v. 1 a new speaker. Our Lord saw His mission revealed as clearly in this song as in the others (cf. Lk. 4:17–21; 7:22); and we may notice, in this 'Spirit'-endued (cf. 11:2; 42:1) and 'anointed' one, a blending of terms that relate to the Servant and the Messianic King.

The joyful task here is a fit sequel to the travail of the earlier songs (see on 42:1), the fruit of which was glimpsed in 53:10ff. Our Lord could quote this passage at the outset of His career because He had already accepted, in His baptism and temptation, the role of suffering Servant, and with it the cross. These are the 'benefits of His passion'; His miracles spoke the same language.

The setting continues to be the captivity, viewed in turn from Babylon (v. 1b) and the ruined Jerusalem (v. 3). To its first hearers the promise would be as literal as the earlier threat of exile (cf. 39:6); but as fulfilled by Jesus (cf. Lk. 4:21) it inaugurated the blessings proclaimed in the beatitudes and elsewhere to the downtrodden (afflicted is translated 'poor' in LXX, using the word found in Lk. 4:18; 6:20; 7:22), and particularly to those who mourn (cf. perhaps Am. 6:6). The opening of the prison was to be spiritual, too, as John the Baptist had to learn (was his question of Lk. 7:19 provoked by the hopes he had pinned on the 'manifesto' of Lk. 4:18?). Notice the element of slow maturing and patient reconstruction implied in the metaphors of oaks and ruined cities.

But Jesus' marked omission of the words the day of vengeance . . . (cf. Lk. 4:19, 20) points on tacitly to a final stage yet to be fulfilled: cf. Mt. 25:31ff.; Acts 17:31; 2 Thes. 1:7, 8. In its various contexts, then, the prophecy is seen in the bud, the flower and, by implication, the full fruit. See further on 63:4.

61:5–9 The ample compensation. This passage is sometimes thought to fall below the generous missionary spirit of, e.g., 19:24, 25; 45:22; 66:18–21, as though it relegated the Gentiles to perpetual servility. This is to mistake metaphor for fact. Under the figure of a priestly Israel served by foreigners (vv. 5, 6) and enriched by its former plunderers (vv. 7, 8), the reality is the people of God (whose status is not national: cf. 1 Pet. 2:10; Rev. 7:9), vindicated and enjoying their full inheritance as kings and priests (cf. 1 Pet. 2:9; Rev. 1:6), while the pride of man is humbled and his power harnessed. On the Gentiles seen as the vanquished, see on 60:10–16; on Gentile converts see on 19:16–24; 60:1–9. 7 With the promised double portion, cf. possibly 40:2.

61:10, 11 The song of the justified. With this outburst of joy, cf. 12:1ff. and the songs in chs. 24–27. Note the two metaphors for righteousness: first as the robe, on which the perfect comment is 'the best robe' of Lk. 15:22, festive and wholly undeserved; secondly as shoots of plant life, products of what is sown, whose inherent vitality issues in growth and form. The former depicts righteousness as conferred from outside (cf. Rom. 3:22); the latter as springing from within (cf. Rom. 8:10); both make it the gift of God. On its shades of meaning, cf. on 46:12, 13.

62:1–5 The bridal beauty of Zion. This is another poem in the series (beginning at 49:14, ending with 66:7ff.) that depicts Zion as a woman yearning for her husband and family. But here the stress is on God's side of the reunion: the energy of His will (v. 1a), the height (v. 1b) and width (v. 2) of His ambition for her; the pride He takes in perfecting her (v. 3), His joy in bringing home the outcast (v. 4a); and the central mystery—that this is not philanthropy but ardent love (vv. 4b, 5b).

1, 2 Vindication is literally 'righteousness', which is a preferable translation (cf. 61:10, 11), even though the parallel terms salvation and glory indicate that this is far from a mere legalistic rectitude. 4 Of the four names here, the last two have passed into (and out of) the Christian vocabulary as Hephzibah and Beulah (see RSV mg.), and their occurrence together illustrates the contrast between the biblical faith and the Canaanite cults; for the metaphor of God as Husband is one of fidelity (cf. on 50:1) and delight, whereas Baal as husband was little more than a source of fertility. 5 Zion's sons may disrupt the metaphor to our ears, but are meant to enrich it by the reminder that the godly are as much wedded to as produced by their mother-city, whose restoration is their delight as well as God's.

62:6–12 Hastening the great day. As in 61:1–4, the great home-coming is viewed from both the centre and the circumference: from the waiting Jerusalem (vv. 6–9, 11b, 12) and the farthest corners of the earth (vv. 10, 11a). Each of these provides its picture of the human preparations appropriate to God's decisive moment. 6–8 God first gives certain men a concern for Zion like His own (cf. vv. 6b, 7a with 1a), summoning these watchmen (cf. 56:9ff.) and remembrancers (see on 63:7; cf. 2 Sa. 8:16, AV mg.) to importunate prayer (cf. Lk. 11:8; 18:7 with the bold figure of vv. 6b, 7a), which He encourages with explicit promises (vv. 7, 8). 10 Secondly He calls on those who are in bondage to claim their liberty, and to give a lead to the distant peoples from whom He would bring Zion's citizens home. On the latter's identity, see on 60:1–9. 12 Notice finally the fourfold name of this ransomed community (cf. the new name promised in v. 2); a triumphant climax to this group of chapters.

63:1–6 The solitary Avenger

This is the companion piece to 59:15b–21 (cf. v. 5 with 59:16). While both treat of judgment and consequent salvation, this poem with its dramatic dialogue (cf. Ps. 24:7–10) highlights the 'day of vengeance' (v. 4), a theme which was blended in 61:2 with that of restoration. The two activities are related causally, as victory (with its bloodshed) is to liberation (with its joy and peace); the NT endorses the sequence, developing this poem in Rev. 19:11–16, where Jesus is the warrior. But in both testaments God has first described a refuge from His judgment (cf. 53:5).

1, 2 Edom and its city Bozrah have already typified the impenitent world in 34:6. Now there is a play on the name Edom (red) and indirectly on Bozrah, a word similar to 'grape-gatherer'. Announcing vindication: read 'speaking in righteousness' (cf. AV, RV). As in 45:23; 55:11, it refers to God's unfailing completion of what He announces. Notice mighty to save: this is the dominant interest, even in this judgment passage. 3 The phrase, I have trodden the wine press alone, may remind the Christian of Calvary, but its meaning (cf. Rev. 19:15) is that God alone cares enough and has power enough to carry through the work of judgment.

63:7 – 64:12 The crying needs of Zion

The glories of chs. 60–62 and the vision of decisive action in 63:1–6 stir the prophet to one of the most eloquent intercessions of the Bible, as he surveys the past goodness of God and the present straits of His people.

63:7–14 God's former mercies. 7 Isaiah is doing the work of a 'remembrancer' (cf. 62:6); his resolve, I will recount, is literally 'I will bring to remembrance'. 8 In the metaphor of a father's hopes for his children he picks up the opening theme of the book (1:2, 4), and in 9 he draws freely on the book of Exodus; cf. in turn Ex. 3:7; 33:14; 19:4. In v. 9a, retain he was afflicted, rather than the marginal reading; cf. on 9:3. 10–14 The terms are close to those of Ps. 78: e.g. rebelled and grieved (cf. Ps. 78:40); also the simile of leading animals to pasture in vv. 13, 14 (cf. Ps. 78:52, 53, 72). But he uses the terms with a new intensity (cf. v. 9a), and with a new emphasis on the holy Spirit as the Lord in the midst of His people (vv. 10, 11, 14). In vv. 10–14 the reference is to the post-wilderness rebellions of Israel, for which they were chastised (v. 10) but not cast off. For the sake of His former mercies the Lord still led them on; cf. vv. 13b, 14 with Ps. 78:72, where David continues the work of Moses.

63:15 – 64:12 God's forlorn family. The plea, three times over, Thou art our father (63:16; 64:8), gives this prayer its special intensity, as the sense of estrangement struggles with that of acceptance.

The symptoms of estrangement are partly outward, with the enemy treading down thy holy people (63:18), thy holy cities (64:10) and our holy . . . house (64:11); but far more serious are the inward symptoms: the spiritual hardness of 63:17, the ravages of sin described in 64:5b, 6 (a brilliant portrayal of its power to imprison, deprave and disintegrate), and a general listlessness (64:7) which makes the condition humanly incurable.

In all this there is seen the judgment of God, who has withheld His intervention (63:15b), hardened their hearts (63:17; cf. 6:10) and delivered them into the hand of their iniquities (64:7). The last of these phrases makes it clear that God is not to blame for their spiritual plight: it stems from their own dalliance with sin.

On the other side there is a Father's constancy to appeal to (see the opening comment, above); it is more tenacious than man's (cf. 63:16 with 49:15; Ps. 27:10), and of longer standing (of old, 63:16b); further, it is proved by His mighty interventions for those who wait for him (64:4; cf. 8:17; 30:18)—and why should these not be renewed (64:1–5a)? (The NT points out how unimaginably they would be transcended: cf. 1 Cor. 2:9, 10.) Above all, the Father is appealed to as the Maker (64:8) who knows all and controls all. This submissive trust is a very different spirit from that of 45:9, 10; it makes the prayer, which resolutely began with praise (63:7), a model for all who must cry out of the depths.

But it ends with a question. God's answer will reveal how much or little the prophet's contrition has been echoed by his people.

65:1 – 66:24 The great divide

Far from ending in a general radiance, these chapters unsparingly sharpen the contrast of light and darkness, and strip away all cover of privilege. It is an end as searching as that of Revelation and the parables of judgment, pursuing to the last the implications of Isaiah's inaugural vision (ch. 6).

65:1–16 The owned and the disowned. 1, 2 The Hebrew as it stands agrees with Rom. 10:20, 21 in referring v. 1 to the Gentiles and v. 2 to the Jews. RSV, however, with most modern commentators, applies both verses to the Jews by understanding 'sought' and 'found' as ready to be sought, etc. (which goes beyond the known use of the 'tolerative Niphal'; nowhere else does this construction imply a non-event) and by revocalizing 'was not called (by)' to did not call (on). The latter change is supported by the ancient versions, but not by the Isaiah Scroll. Read the verse therefore as in AV, RV and Rom. 10:20, and see it as God's answer to the complaint of 63:19, rather than a mere echo of 64:7.

The Gentiles, then, are to be brought in, and apostate Judaism rejected (vv. 1–7); but vv. 8–10 reaffirm the promise of a 'remnant' of godly Israelites (see on 10:20–23). God's dividing line clearly runs not between Jew and Gentile as such, but between 'seekers' and 'forsakers' (vv. 10c, 11a), who are respectively blessed and cursed in vv. 13–16.

3–7 With the forbidden rites, cf. 57:3–10. The earlier deviations were predominantly licentious; the present ones are provocative, brushing aside God's altars (vv. 3b, 7b; cf. Dt. 12:2–7), dabbling in necromancy (v. 4a; cf. Dt. 18:11), defiantly eating forbidden flesh (v. 4b; cf. 66:17; Dt. 14:3, 8), and claiming a magical 'holiness' from these perversions, potent like a spell (v. 5a, lit., 'for I am holy to you'). For the crowning insult see v. 11.

8 The simile of the good grapes in a poor cluster relates the 'Remnant' theme to that of the spoilt vineyard of ch. 5, using perhaps the opening of a vintage song to make the point, since 'do not destroy' seems to be a tune-name in the titles of Pss. 57–59. 10 On the valley of Achor, with its troubled past and hopeful prospect, see Jos. 7:26; Ho. 2:15. 11, 12 Fortune and Destiny, Gad and Meni, were worshipped in Syria and elsewhere. Note the word-play in v. 12a: I will destine you . . . With the table and cups, cf. 1 Cor. 10:21, 22, where Paul's question, 'Shall we provoke the Lord . . . ?' (cf. our v. 3) could indicate that he had this chapter in mind.

13–16 Here the opening rhythm is that of a dirge or taunt-song (cf. 14:3ff.), and the sharp contrasts anticipate those of the Gospels: cf., e.g., Mt. 25:31ff.; Lk. 6:20–26; Jn. 3:36. The name, the God of truth, in tacit contrast to 'the God of Abraham', etc., probably emphasizes fulfilment, over against promise. Truth is literally 'Amen', i.e. what is sure and faithful; cf. our Lord's expression, 'verily, verily' ('amen, amen'), and His title in Rev. 3:14.

65:17–25 New heavens and earth. The new is portrayed wholly in terms of the old, only without the old sorrows; there is no attempt to describe any other kind of newness. Hence the familiar setting, Jerusalem, and the modest satisfactions, largely the chance to 'enjoy the work of (one's) hands'. This allows the most important things to be prominent in the passage: the healing of old ills (v. 17b); joy (vv. 18, 19); life (v. 20; see below); security (vv. 21–23a); fellowship with God (vv. 23b, 24; contrast offspring of the blessed with 'offspring of evildoers', 1:4) and concord among His creatures (v. 25).

The point of a hundred years old (v. 20) is that in this new setting a mere century is shamefully brief, so vast is the scale.

This leaves the question open whether the passage promises these blessings literally, or depicts the final state by means of earthly analogies. If the conditions are literal, they will be those of the millennium, as in a straight reading of Rev. 20, where the resurrected saints appear to coexist with people of the present order, before the final judgment. Against this, however, is the sequence whereby the new creation (vv. 17, 18) precedes these blessings here, but follows them in Rev. 21:1. For this reason it seems that we should take this passage as an analogy, and its allusions to the sinner (v. 20) and the serpent (v. 25) as promises of judgment and victory. The wicked will no longer flourish, or the strong prey on the weak, or the tempter escape his sentence (cf. v. 25: with Gn. 3:14, 15), in the perfect world to come. But all this is expressed freely, locally and pictorially, to kindle hope rather than feed curiosity. Notice finally the implication, by the allusion to 11:6–9, that this is brought to pass not by a bare creative fiat, but through the Messianic king.

66:1–5 Worshippers, welcome and unwelcome. This is no protest against rebuilding the Temple, as some have suggested, for God commanded it (Hg. 1:2ff.). Rather, it is a rebuke to ecclesiasticism—the spirit that would build human walls round God (vv. 1, 2a; cf. 2 Sa. 7:6, 7; Acts 7:48–50, 54). 2b Note the distinctly chastened attitude that God expects of us, as in Lk. 18:13, since man is not only small but sinful. See, however, 57:15.

Ecclesiasticism also breeds unreality (v. 3) and intolerance (v. 5). 3 The Hebrew runs literally, 'slaughtering the ox, smiting a man', etc., and could either mean (with most versions) that a merely correct ritual is like senseless slaughter and idolatry (cf. 1:13; Je. 7:21, etc.), or else that at present it is coexisting with brutality and sacrilege. The intolerance in v. 5 was acted out, almost to the letter, in Jn. 9:24, 34. It is one of the earliest allusions to purely religious persecution and theological hatred, one of the darkest stains of the church.

66:6–17 The last intervention. Although the terms of this section and the next are still those of the OT, with its Temple (v. 6), chariots (v. 20), new moons and sabbaths (v. 23), they clearly concern the end-time. 7–9 stress the utter newness of the event, which mocks the slow processes of history: the nation . . . brought forth in one moment is the equivalent of 1 Cor. 15:51, 52: 'we shall all be changed . . . in the twinkling of an eye'. V. 9 gives the triumphant final answer to Hezekiah's message to Isaiah in 37:3.

10–14 The exuberant family scene of these verses, concluding the poems on Zion as wife and mother (see on 49:14–23), is now centred on Zion's children (cf. Gal. 4:26). Note that the mother-city is really the secondary, not the primary, source of their wealth and comfort: all is from the Lord, even motherhood (v. 13), although He uses the redeemed community to dispense His gifts. The last two lines of this verse give the 'whence' and 'where' of this help: I will comfort you; . . . comforted in Jerusalem. Direct fellowship with God, and full involvement in His church, are held together here. In Jn. 16:22 Jesus gave v. 14a a strongly personal reference.

15, 16 The fire and sword are the harsh aspect of every divine intervention (cf. Mt. 10:34; Lk. 11:49–51), but this is the final one (cf. v. 24; 2 Thes. 1:7–10). While it has reference to all flesh, the special objects of wrath are the apostates of v. 17 (cf. Lv. 11:7, 29; Is. 65:3–7), who have known the light and despised it. 17 The one in the midst was perhaps the leader in a magico-religious rite: cf. Jaazaniah 'in their midst' in Ezk. 8:11.

66:18–24 The nations gathered in. On a millennialist view, the Lord's coming will be followed by the further evangelizing of the world, the full return of Israel, and the establishment of Jerusalem as the world's capital and centre of pilgrimage. Alternatively one may take this final section to be an epilogue that spans the first and second comings of Christ. V. 18 will then state His purpose for the world, and vv. 19–21 His means of carrying it out: the sign set among men (Christ crucified and risen; Mt. 12:38–40?); the survivors, or saved remnant, sent to the nations (v. 19); and the gathering of His people into His Jerusalem (v. 20), Gentiles being admitted to full membership with Jews (v. 21). Jerusalem on this view is not the literal city: cf. again Gal. 4:25, 26. Vv. 22–24 would describe (still in OT terms) the states of final glory and perdition.

In more detail: in 19 the names represent the distant outposts of Israel's world. Tarshish was probably Tartessus in Spain; Put and Lud are mentioned with Ethiopia in Je. 46:9; Ezk. 30:5; Tubal is located in the far north in Ezk. 39:1, 2; Javan is Greece. 20, 21 From earth's remotest parts, then, the dispersed of Israel will be brought to Jerusalem like a homage-offering by the Gentiles. There is a double meaning in this term (Heb. minḥâ), which stood for the cereal offering in Lv. 2, etc., but also for a vassal's tribute to his overlord. But these Gentiles, too, will be acceptable: not only like a clean vessel, fit to convey the Israelites, but as priests and Levites themselves. (Grammatically, some of them could refer to the returned Israelites, but the anti-climax is improbable.) Paul uses a striking variant of this symbolism in Rom. 15:15, 16.

22 With the new heavens, etc., cf. 65:17. 23 New moon and sabbath have ceased to be binding on the Christian (cf. Col. 2:16), and it is implausible to suggest that these 'shadows' will be reinstated. They stand here for their substance, the joyful dedicating of all life to the Creator.

24 Cf. Dn. 12:2b; Mk. 9:48. In the synagogue, v. 23 is read again after v. 24, to soften the ending of the prophecy. But it is a true ending. 'It is plain' (to quote G. A. Smith) 'that nothing else can result, if the men on whose ears the great prophecy had fallen, with all its music and all its gospel, . . . did yet continue to prefer their idols, their swine's flesh . . . their sitting in graves, to so evident a God and to so great a grace.'

Seek the Lord while he may be found (55:6).

Jeremiah

INTRODUCTION

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

When God called Jeremiah in 627 BC, Assyria had made Judah a subject under tribute. Assyria, however, rapidly weakened when the death of Ashurbanipal (c. 627 BC) precipitated civil strife. The Empire soon crumbled, its capital city, Nineveh, being sacked in 612 BC after a two-year siege. Ashuruballit, the last Assyrian monarch, maintained himself at Harran for two years longer, but potentially succession to Assyrian power lay open to any master-soldier of the day. Necho of Egypt marched his forces along the Mediterranean coast and inland to bolster the Assyrian remnant. On the way he was opposed at Megiddo by Josiah of Judah, whom he defeated and killed (609 BC; 2 Ki. 23:29f.). After the death of Josiah, his people anointed Jehoahaz, his son, as king, but Necho deposed him in favour of Jehoiakim, his brother, who was bound thereby to further Egyptian interests (2 Ki. 23:31ff.). Necho met his master, however, in Nebuchadrezzar, crown-prince of Babylon, who routed his forces at the historic battle of Carchemish (605 BC), and drove him back to his own frontiers, thereby putting an end for the time being to Egyptian ambition to rule the East (cf. 2 Ki. 24:7). Thus it came about that Judah, hitherto subject to Assyria, now passed under the control of Babylon. After Carchemish and his accession to the throne of Babylon, Nebuchadrezzar led his army through Syria and Palestine, subduing Ashkelon (late 604 BC) and unsuccessfully attacked Egypt in 601 BC. Jehoiakim submitted to him in 605–4 BC, but after the Babylonian forces retired in 601 BC turned again to Egypt. Renewed Babylonian activity early in 598 BC cowed Syria and various nomad tribes, and culminated in a large force attacking rebellious Judah. Jerusalem fell, after a siege of two months, in March 597 BC (2 Ki. 23:36ff.). Jehoiakim had died shortly before; Jehoiachin, his son and successor, was carried captive to Babylon with some of his people (2 Ki. 24:8ff.). Zedekiah was given the throne of Judah as a vassal of Babylon, although Jehoiachin, his nephew, was considered king in exile.

Egypt was unable to oppose Babylonian power beyond her own frontiers by force, and instead she sought to weaken through disaffection the bonds imposed by Nebuchadrezzar upon Syria and Palestine. Necho was succeeded in Egypt by Psammetichus II, and presumably it was he who sought to persuade these countries to enter a league with Egypt against Babylon. Zedekiah was one of those approached on this score, and there clearly seems to have been a pro-Egyptian party at court. Hananiah, the prophet, was especially prominent. But Jeremiah set his face steadfastly against the proposal (cf. 2:18, 36; 25:17–19; 28; 37:7), denouncing such prophets as false, asserting that their pro-Egyptian activities were contrary to God's will and would be tragic in their outcome. Undoubtedly they regarded themselves as true patriots, and hated Jeremiah as, in their judgment, a self-confessed traitor. By contrast, Jeremiah's charge against them was that Yahweh had not sent them, but they had come forward on their own initiative. Therefore their word would not come to pass. There, then, was the falsity. They spoke in Yahweh's name when He had not commissioned them. From all this it is clear that sincerity is not enough; only the divine inspiration constitutes a man a prophet (e.g. Je. 23:16, 26, 32).

Whether Nebuchadrezzar had received a direct report of disaffection or only rumours one cannot say, but Zedekiah was summoned to meet him and to report on home conditions. His return implied that he had given pledges of loyalty (cf. 2 Ch. 36:13). The pity was that, seemingly, he had not the moral courage and strength to withstand the influence of such pro-Egyptian plotters as Hananiah and his confederates. Jeremiah consistently urged him to remain faithful to his word (e.g. Je. 37:6ff.; 38:17ff.), but when Hophra became pharaoh in 589 BC, in succession to Psammetichus II, the Egyptian influence in the court gained headway and Zedekiah was finally induced to break faith with Nebuchadrezzar. Egypt was slow to move in support and the Babylonian monarch besieged Jerusalem again in 587 BC. At length the Egyptian army appeared and the Babylonians lifted the siege for the time being (cf. Je. 37:11–15).

The resumption of the siege seems to have brought matters to a head. Jeremiah was positive that his intuitions were of God, that He had revealed to him His purposes of making Babylon the instrument of His will (cf. Je. 27). Trust in Egypt, therefore, could pave the way only for disaster and exile. On the other hand, his enemies used Yahweh's name in support of their pro-Egyptian policy. Consequently they held that his attitude and word weakened the national will to fight (cf. Je. 38:4). This struggle stands out crucially in the person of Zedekiah. He stood between the two influences and was moved now to this side, now to that (cf. Je. 38:5, 10). He appeared unable to make up his mind and face the consequences, and it is clear that Jeremiah was not able to sway him sufficiently to make him abide by his oath of loyalty to Nebuchadrezzar. The 'false prophets' won the day and Zedekiah took the plunge. For his indecision and belated action he paid bitterly. Egypt proved to be a broken reed, the resumed siege was successful, the Babylonian was ruthless (2 Ki. 25), and to his own heartbreak Jeremiah saw the bitter fulfilment of his prophecies.

The book gives details of Jeremiah's personal history up to his enforced departure into Egypt (Je. 43:1–7). Then the darkness sets in, relieved, if at all, only by traditional rumour. There is nothing to establish a final conclusion as to his fate. One Christian tradition is that some five years after the fall of Jerusalem he was stoned to death at Tahpanhes by the Jewish people who even then refused to share his vision and his faith.

JEREMIAH'S MESSAGE AND TEACHING

Politically, as we have seen, Jeremiah lost. But spiritually he won a major victory. He shared the faith of Amos and Hosea, that, though idolatry and disloyalty to Yahweh must invite the punishment stipulated when the Sinai covenant was made (e.g. Dt. 28:15ff.), yet Israel and Judah were not finally outcast from the grace of God (cf. Je. 5:18). He shared with those prophets too the faith that exile as a discipline would be remedial, not wholly tragic. The state, qua state, was doomed; but faith in Yahweh and Yahweh's choice of His people would abide and outlive the shock. Moreover, he saw that the old covenant, centring in the Temple and its ceremonial worship, was ineffective; thus he was led to see that Yahweh would write a new covenant within the heart of the 'remnant' (Je. 31:31–34), through which vital religion would persist and prove a blessing beyond national frontiers (cf. Je. 33:6–9).

When the book of the law, found by Hilkiah in the ruins of the Temple (2 Ki. 22:8), brought about reformation under Josiah in 622 BC, it seems clear that, at first, Jeremiah shared that king's enthusiasm, and lent his influence as aid (cf. Je. 11:2). It seems equally clear, however, that later he distrusted that revival as too facile and superficial to meet the demands of Yahweh (e.g. Je. 7:1–20). The great need was for a change of heart and that was feasible only in a people whose faith was in Yahweh alone. That centrality of faith the generation of Jeremiah refused to give.

It has been urged by many scholars that Jeremiah with other prophets was against all sacrificial ritual, regarding it as not commanded by Yahweh and, indeed, repugnant to Him (e.g. Je. 7:21–23; see commentary and NBD, art. 'Prophecy, Prophets'). Jeremiah's attitude, however, and that of the other prophets, is better understood as teaching that a sacrifice would be invalid, and therefore contrary to Yahweh's desire and will, unless it were a true index of a worshipful and repentant heart, and set in the context of an obedient life.

THE BOOK

The authorship is a disputed issue, falling beyond the scope of a brief introduction. Denial of Jeremiah's authorship of several passages is dependant upon the uncertain criteria of style, for the most part, and so is itself uncertain. For a summary of views see E. J. Young, Introduction to the Old Testament.

The book actually describes how Baruch the scribe wrote down Jeremiah's prophecies (cf. 36:32) and states that 'many similar words were added to them'. Baruch seems to have acted generally as Jeremiah's amanuensis and went down into Egypt with him (43:6).

The arrangement of the prophecies is not by chronological order, and so can be confusing to the western mind with its regimented approach to such matters. In fact it is hard to discern a principle underlying the order of the book. Some indications are noted in the commentary. A scheme of possible dates for the various sections is included in the analysis below. A further complication is the number of differences between the Hebrew and LXX texts of Jeremiah. These do not apply to words only but affect the order of whole passages; moreover the LXX is only seven-eighths the length of the Hebrew. How much value can be given to the LXX text is uncertain; note is taken of passages where it seems to throw light on the Hebrew text. Details of textual problems are clearly displayed by J. Bright in The Anchor Bible, 1965. Incisive exegesis of the book from a more conservative stand has been provided by H. L. Ellison in EQ, 31–40, 1959–68.

THE CHARACTER OF THE PROPHET

Jeremiah was indeed a man of God, sensitive to spiritual influence, capable of deep emotion, clear-sighted and candid in judgment. He could neither be bought nor cajoled. He followed the way of his mind, supported as it ever was by the worshipping spirit within him. He was God's man from first to last, and therefore a true patriot to the end. He was not blind to the sin and folly of his people. He read, with deep bitterness, the iron nexus of sin and penalty, and foresaw exile as the inevitable judgment, unless there was a change of heart. For that change he worked without reserve.

These two things, his insistence on a change of heart and the loneliness of his position as the prophet who stood out against the shallow optimism and political expedients of his contemporaries, gave rise to that emphasis on personal religion which is one of the characteristics of Jeremiah's book. It must not be thought that personal religion began with him and that prior to his day people only acknowledged some sort of corporate religious awareness and responsibility (cf. H. H. Rowley, The Unity of the Bible, 1953, pp. 70ff.). Rather we ought to say that circumstances and temperament made

Jeremiah pre-eminently the prophet who lays bare before us the intimate dealings of his own soul with God and who therefore is the exemplar of the religious individual. This appears most tellingly in the tenderness of God's direct dealings with him at the time of his call (cf. 1:9; contrast Is. 6:6, 7; Ezk. 2:8ff.), and in passages of spiritual autobiography unique in Scripture (e.g. Je. 8:13 – 9:2; 11:18 – 12:3; 15:10, 11, 15–21; 17:14–18; 18:18–23; 20:7–18).

The idea of a close, personal walk with God lies at the heart of Jeremiah's conception of being a prophet. It stems from the distinctly personal terms in which God taught him his own call and appointment (1:5); it was thrust upon him by the isolation consequent on the preaching of an unpopular and rejected message (e.g. 11:19ff.); it was made a condition of genuine reception of a word from God (e.g. 15:19); and, above all, it became a foundation truth in his mighty polemic against false prophets. Jeremiah's own sense of personal inadequacy (1:6) made him more sensitive than any other prophet to the existence of men with an opposite message. Could he be certain that he, and not they, were inspired by God (cf. 1 Ki. 22:24)? Might he not be deceived (Je. 20:7)? The major treatment of this theme occurs in Je. 23:9–40. It is typical of his thought, personality and whole cast of mind that Jeremiah is unable to distinguish the true message from the false by any external criterion, such as the mode by which the alleged message was received. For him, three things substantiate the message: the quality of the life of the messenger (23:13, 14), the tendency of his message (23:17, 22), whether to encourage or to condemn sin, and the reality of his personal fellowship with God (23:18, 22; on 'council', see on Am. 3:7).

Jeremiah, however, was not a mere individualist (cf. H. H. Rowley, op. cit.; also The Faith of Israel, 1956, pp. 99, 148). He also understood the people of God as bound to Him in a link so intimate that only the personal terms of betrothal and marriage were accurate enough to describe the covenant relation (e.g. 2:2; 31:32). Out of this emerged his message of hope, characteristically described as a new covenant (31:31). In God he read promise, not hopelessness (e.g. 29:11), and he expected his people, no less than himself, to endure 'as seeing him who is invisible' (Heb. 11:27).

OUTLINE OF CONTENTS

Analysis of this extensive book is, in the main, a subjective exercise. A division after ch. 25 is fairly reasonable, however, as on the whole prophetic oracles govern the first half of the book, and narrative the second.

COMMENTARY

1:1 - 25:38 ORACLES CONCERNING GOD'S CHOSEN PEOPLE

1:1–19 THE PROPHET'S CALL

1:1–3 Information about the prophet

Jeremiah's call revealed the initiative of God who had predestined him to the office of prophet. 1 Anathoth, some 3 miles north of Jerusalem, is modern Anata. 2 The thirteenth year of Josiah; i.e. 627 BC. 3 The captivity of Jerusalem; i.e. when Nebuchadrezzar destroyed the city in 586 BC. Jeremiah's task thus continued for a few more than 40 years.

1:4–10 The consecration of the prophet

Two thoughts dominate this section: first, the insistence on the basic element of predestination in the appointment of the prophet (vv. 4, 5), and secondly, the adequacy of the divine word to equip him for every eventuality (vv. 6–10).

5 The dealings of God with Jeremiah are no divine afterthought, no panic action deriving from the need to speak a word to the nation in the present crisis. Jeremiah is rather a divine forethought, long planned as God's man for this very time. Before conception, and between conception and birth, divine intimate awareness (knew) and divine separating action (consecrated) have led up to the moment of appointment. 6–8 His commission was equally clear. The contrast drawn is that of shrinking from the task and being inspirited for it. He is the most self-questioning of all the prophets on record. He protested I am only a youth (v. 6), meaning that he was not qualified by training or experience. But his objection was overruled, on the grounds that authority resides not in the person of the messenger but in the divine commission (v. 7a), word (v. 7b) and presence (v. 8).

9 God touched his lips, thereby guaranteeing that the word spoken henceforth will be the living word of God. 10 The word will be both destructive and constructive, and herein is the clue to the pessimistic feature of his prophecies. He understood that catastrophe was the inevitable consequence of disloyalty and lack of faith among God's people. Yet should even the worst happen, Jeremiah knew that that judgment would be but God's prelude to a nobler day. Thus the message of hope is intrinsic in Jeremiah's prophecies.

1:11–16 The declaration to the prophet

The call of Jeremiah was closely connected with two visions, associated with his call to verify it, and to encourage him. Through these visions God made a declaration to the prophet and through him to the people. 11, 12 The vision of the rod of almond introduces the reader to Jeremiah's love and awareness of nature as a revealing agent of God. There is a play on words here: almond (Heb. šāqēḏ) and watching over . . . to (Heb. šōqēḏ). The almond tree is the first to awake in spring; so Yahweh is always aware of events and His word heralds His action. 13 A boiling (lit. 'blow upon') pot, as RV 'caldron' implies, was a large vessel for cooking or washing; facing away from the north suggests that the pot was tilted, about to overflow from Syria into Palestine. 14–16 Yahweh would make a northern people the agent of His judgment (cf. on 3:18; 4:5), which idolatry, involving a tension of two masters, Yahweh and pagan gods, had brought upon the nation.

1:17–19 The charge to the prophet

Just as v. 5 firmly enunciates the fact of predestination, so v. 17 enunciates the requirement of obedience. Jeremiah is warned against fear of his audience; the prophet who is ashamed to stand forth with the word, will soon have no word to proclaim (v. 17). But the Lord of the word can make His servant impregnable, unlike the disloyal state of Judah (vv. 18, 19).

2:1 – 6:30 THE NATION'S SUMMONS

Jeremiah places in the forefront of his prophecies two messages which accurately state the condemnatory side of his ministry. The first (2:1 – 3:5) deals with the inexcusable apostasy of Israel from the Lord, and the second (3:6 – 6:30) states the prospect before the nation, inevitable judgment.

2:1 – 3:5 Jeremiah's first message: the sin of apostasy

2:1–3 The former state of Israel. There was once a time when Israel had been steadfast (devotion), loving (love) and committed (followed) to the Lord, and was thus His special portion (holy . . . first fruits; cf. Dt. 26:2, 10), under His watchful care (evil . . . upon them).

2:4–13 The contention with Israel. 5–7 Yahweh challenges Israel's memory of His gracious provision for them to prove that it was not He who had broken faith. It was they who defiled my land; 8 it was their prophets who prophesied by Baal, the popular Canaanite deity, officially recognized in Israel through the Phoenician alliances of Ahab (1 Ki. 16:31f.). 10 Cyprus represents the West; Kedar, in N Arabia, represents the East. Therefore, taken together, they stand for the whole pagan world. 11, 12 summarize the horror of the prophet at his people's apostasy. Unlike even pagan nations, who remained true to their gods, Israel had preferred 'profitless' gods to Yahweh, their own God. Even the heavens were aghast at such sacrilege. 13 The mention of broken cisterns contrasts the polluted, wasted water with that of a perennial (living) spring.

2:14–19 The humiliation of Israel. This paragraph shows how sin overtakes a nation. Free-born Israel has become a slave. 14, 15 Homeborn. There were two kinds of slaves; those acquired by purchase became slaves through special circumstances, and those born in the house were slaves by nature. But the Lord had redeemed the formerly enslaved Israel (cf. Ex. 20:2). Whence, then, this new slavery, as seen in the devastated condition of the nation? 16 Memphis and Tahpanhes. The former is the capital of Lower Egypt, near Cairo, the latter was in the eastern Delta (cf. 44:1; 46:14). 17, 18 The explanation: Israel has been the architect of its own misfortunes. When the Lord would have led, Israel chose rather the path of apostasy. Yet the lesson has not been learned, and the nation continues to seek resources in alliances with Egypt and Assyria. 19 Disaster with all its bitterness must be the tragic teacher, since the fear of me is not in you.

2:20–28 The degeneration of Israel. 20 Playing the harlot contrasts with v. 2; unfaithfulness in a sexual relationship is a standard prophetic illustration of idolatry. 21 A noble vine; cf. Is. 5:1–7. The force of the metaphor is that the blame for subsequent failures is not the Lord's. 22–25 describe the ingrained nature of their iniquity and their wilful determination to continue in their sin. Jeremiah likens them to a desert creature in heat, whose desire is so great that any mate that wants it can find it without effort. It is as though the female were pursuing the male. 23 Valley (cf. 7:31) balances 'high hill' (v. 20); the whole land furnishes evidence of their apostasy. 25 I have loved strangers (i.e. other gods), and after them I will go. Their desire to share in the idolatrous practices of the heathen nations was so great that they were determined nothing should prevent them from doing so. 26–28 You are my father is indicative of complete devotion to the idol. In the time of their trouble. The testing hour would reveal the impotence of the gods they had made for themselves. They would be shamed like a caught thief (cf. v. 36), but could expect no aid from the God with whom they had broken faith.

2:29–37 The complacency of Israel. The nation which could say 'I am not defiled' (v. 23), when every part of the land proclaimed defilement (vv. 20, 23), now pleads I am innocent (v. 35), thereby showing petulant refusal of divine correction (vv. 29, 30), forgetfulness of His love (vv. 31, 32), and complacency in the face of irrefutable evidence (vv. 33–35). Judgment alone can be their portion (vv. 36, 37).

3:1–5 The wages of apostasy. Contrasting with the happy marriage of 2:1–3, Jeremiah concludes with a much broken marriage which cannot be mended (v. 1). The evidence is abundant (v. 2), but no amount of correction has produced reformation (v. 3). All this gives the lie to words which profess devotion (v. 4) and hope (v. 5a), but are set in the context of wholesale devotion to wrongdoing (v. 5b).

3 The effect of Judah's sin became apparent in the land, as stipulated when the covenant was made (Dt. 28:23f.). 5 You have spoken, but you have done contrasts with God who remains constant to His Word.

3:6 – 6:30 Jeremiah's second message: the prospect of judgment

In the first discourse no hint of forgiveness is given; here a distinct assurance of pardon is held out, provided repentance is genuine and heartfelt, yet the dominant note is that judgment is imminent and inevitable.

3:6–10 The unfavourable contrast between Judah and Israel. 6 The prophet saw that that faithless one, Israel (lit. 'apostasy Israel', signifying Israel as the personification of apostasy) had been sent into exile as a judgment on her adultery; yet Judah read no warning to herself. On the contrary, she feigned loyalty, but there was no evidence of genuine conversion (vv. 6–10). 10 In pretence; the reformation under Josiah did not go very deep. Judah returned, but only superficially.

3:11–18 The urgent call to Israel. Israel, broken and exiled, was told to repent. 11 False Judah; in spite of greater privileges, such as a succession of kings of the same family, the Temple, the Levites, the warning example of Israel, and especially her preservation hitherto, Judah proved faithless. 14 Return, O faithless children. The ground of the divine appeal is the gracious relationship which God had chosen to bear with His people, explained by I am your master (Heb. bā'altî, 'I am lord'), which makes clear that Yahweh was sovereign, and no Canaanite Baal; the people were as wilful children, turning from their master. (The translation 'I am married to you' is possible but less appropriate in this context; cf. on 31:32.) In line with the whole biblical revelation, Jeremiah knew that God delights in mercy. If they returned in penitence He would bring them back to worship at home in Zion, thus reversing Israel's great apostasy (cf. 1 Ki. 12:26–30). 16 The ark had become a talisman, its significance overlooked. In the restored worship both ark and law-tablets would be superseded (cf. 31:33). 17 At that time; when Israel returns to the Lord and from the exile, God's glory in the midst of the people would be evident to all nations. 18 The land of the north; the quarter from which the Babylonian armies would approach and carry away the exiles, and from which they would return. The prophet was looking forward to a time when Jerusalem would be purified from all idolatry.

3:19 – 4:2 The unconditional return of the people to Yahweh. Jeremiah continues to address Israel, the exiled northern kingdom, though his purpose is to appeal to Judah. Just as the Lord's judgment on Israel should have warned Judah (vv. 6–10), and His readiness to forgive Israel should have moved Judah's hard heart (vv. 11–18), so also the depicted total repentance of Israel provides an object lesson for Judah to copy

(3:19 – 4:2). 21, 22 Jeremiah heard a kind of weeping antiphony in the north, of the penitent children crying and the forgiving, healing God soothing in turn. Bare heights, not the 'high places' of pagan cult (cf. v. 23), but the wasted hills of the ravaged land. 24, 25 The shameful thing; literally 'the shame', a term used by the prophets for Baal-worship, and later as a euphemism to avoid the name Baal. The heart-broken confession touches in turn the folly (v. 24), hopelessness (v. 25a), ingratitude (against the Lord, v. 25b), ingrained nature (v. 25c) and disobedience (v. 25d) of sin. 4:1 The Lord instructs His people in the way of penitence, first positively, if you return . . . to me you should return, and then negatively, remove your abominations, i.e. the false gods and all that pertains to their worship. Thirdly, repentance involves moral determination (not waver) to live for God, and 2 carries the promise of a powerful influence on others.

4:3–31 The call to Judah. Jeremiah turns to apply the moral to his own people. The judgment which hangs over their heads can be averted by repentance (vv. 3–18), but it cannot be turned aside by any other means (vv. 19–31).

3, 4 The untilled land and the uncircumcised heart depict the two sides of true repentance: the outward change of a life rescued from the weeds of sin, and the inward change of the new heart; cf. Dt. 10:16; 30:6. 5–18 The coming invasion was probably a Babylonian attack; some see allusions in this and following passages to a historically obscure Scythian raid late in the 7th century BC. Jeremiah pleaded for a deep repentance, in the face of imminent catastrophe (v. 4b). He reinforces his plea by elaborating the threat. The appointed scourge from the north was already on the threshold. 7 The lion had come out of his lair, seeking prey. He was the fierce destroyer of nations and cities, a reference in all probability to Nebuchadrezzar. 10 It shall be well with you. Many read 'and they shall say', i.e. the false prophets of v. 9 (cf. 23:17); so one tradition of LXX. However, Jeremiah may refer to words of past prophets in different situations, still remembered (e.g. Is. 37:33–35). 11 A hot wind is another metaphor of destruction. It is the sirocco from the desert, a hot scorching wind, cyclonic and merciless, not the refreshing wind blowing from the coast at evening and utilized for winnowing. Such must be Yahweh's action upon the guilty land. 13 The same grave judgment appears in different figures of speech, clouds . . . chariots and horses . . . swifter than eagles. 14, 15 The efficacy of repentance is urged against the desolating doom approaching from Dan, the northern limit of the land, and the warning voice is echoed from Mt. Ephraim as near as 10 miles to Jerusalem.

In 19–31 the extent of the coming judgment appals the prophet (vv. 19–29), and in the light of it he notes the pathetic futility of worldly expedients against divine visitation (vv. 30, 31). 19–22 Note the pain of his soul (vv. 19, 20), the question of his mind (v. 21) and the answer of his God (v. 22). His words literally writhe in the agony which tortured him. My anguish, my anguish! I writhe in pain! But Jeremiah was under no illusion. The judgment was just. It was the dark entail of sin upon an abandoned people. 23–28 The imagery in vv. 23–26 is so stark that a shudder vibrates throughout. World chaos has overtaken the cosmos; mountains reel, man vanishes, birds have fled out of the sky, and the fertile earth has become a desert. It is the blast of God, the reversal of creation to the shapeless meaninglessness of Gn. 1:2.

29–31 O desolate one. All flee before God's avenging agent (v. 29), save one who would flaunt herself in a fruitless attempt to gain his favour: so hardened was the conscience of Jerusalem. Such dread finality of sin involves the whole world. Jeremiah saw nothing but irremediable travail, bereft of hope. All these grim predictions were fulfilled in the final overthrow of Jerusalem in 586 BC.

Some authorities consider that this second message of Jeremiah begun at 3:6 is composed of several oracles, some written at Anathoth and others at Jerusalem. Be that as it may, there is a definite unity in the message which justifies a continued treatment. There is the same emphasis upon the hardened sin of a besotted nation and inevitable doom from a holy God waiting to be gracious if only the people would repent.

5:1–9 The corruption of Jerusalem. In 5:1–31 the city is seen under a relentless moral investigation. The prophet attempts a vindication of the severity of God, i.e. a valid theodicy. He felt that were one to search Jerusalem, no honest man would be found to avert the doom (cf. Gn. 18:22–32): the poor in the streets (v. 1) and peer (v. 5) alike are impious in life and deed. 1 Run to and fro through the streets of Jerusalem. The quest was in vain. 6 Hence the nation was as defenceless as a townsman in a forest of wild beasts. The inhabitants of Jerusalem, indeed, had sunk down to the level of beasts. 7, 8 When God had full-fed them they prostituted His bounty and became like full-fed stallions in their lust.

5:10–19 The call to the destroyer. The optimism of the negligent is portrayed in vv. 10–18. God's agents are to carry through the task of purging (vv. 10, 11), yet the doomed (vv. 12–17) cherish the fallacy in blind hope that Yahweh will take no action. 10 A full end. The Lord controls the judgment within the bounds of His promise to preserve His people. They merit judgment, but mercy triumphs ultimately. 12 They have spoken falsely of the Lord, and have said, 'He will do nothing'; i.e. He would do nothing along the line of Jeremiah's prophecy. If this rendering of the text is correct, the people could not believe that God would punish them; 13 so they treated His prophets as false, and said that the punishment would fall on them. 15 Whose language you do not know; difference of speech was always a cause of dread and uneasiness in the ancient world, for appeals for mercy would be fruitless when made in an unknown tongue. 16 Their quiver; a remarkable comparison. Like the grave their weapons were never satisfied.

5:20–31 The stubbornness and folly of the people. This section deals on the one hand with God as the moral Governor and on the other with His rebellious people. God's world is unable to break loose from His unswerving, sovereign will (v. 22); only His people have that liberty (vv. 23, 24); a lone differential for ever characterizing man. 22 The sea; the prophet uses the sea to illustrate the might and majesty of God; it may not pass the bounds that He has set. Is such a God to be trifled with? If the sea is feared—and who does not fear it—is not He to be feared? 23 Stubborn . . . rebellious; not only are the people backsliders, they are openly hostile.

In 26–31 the prophet has three classes of people in mind: the rich who oppress the poor, the false prophets who deceive, and the priests who also misbehave (v. 31, rule at their discretion is uncertain: 'spurn their office' has been proposed as an alternative). The nation sits loosely to the divine will, with the evil consequence that neither justice is done nor is there any desire that prophet and priest be other than what they are—liars and false guides. My people love to have it so. Evil, if practised long enough, is accepted by the rank and file as inevitable.

6:1–5 The investment of Jerusalem. The conclusion of Jeremiah's second message is the inevitable doom imminent upon such an impenitent and incorrigible nation. The destructive agent appointed by God was about to invest Jerusalem. 1 He was watching greedily from the north, ready to bring utter ruin. The warning was to be passed on from Jerusalem to Beth-haccherem (mod. Ramat Rahel, a height between Jerusalem and Bethlehem), an eminence from which a beacon-fire (signal) would be visible as far as Tekoa on another hill some 12 miles south of the capital. The trumpet and signal would warn and guide the city-dwellers to seek refuge in the broken terrain of the south country as the enemy approached from the north. People of Benjamin may mean the men of Judah (cf. 'Ephraim' for Israel in 7:15), the citizens of Jerusalem as a whole, peasantry whose place and practices were not with the city, or the prophet may be showing concern for his own tribe.

3 Shepherds; the enemy from the north is likened to shepherds with their flocks, eating up the grass on every side; everything would be devoured and nothing left. 4, 5 Prepare war; literally 'hallow war', i.e. offer sacrifices to ensure success. The exhortation calls for hostilities to begin, and it is the enemy outside the city walls that thus heartens himself. Their persistence was such that, if the day attack failed, the evening would bring victory. The prophet predicted in the name of the Lord that the victory should be absolute and final.

6:6–15 The coming ruin. 6 Hew down her trees; trees were cut down to construct siege works, but this verse also indicates the devastation the enemy would cause. 9 Under the figure of a vineyard, the gatherers go over and over gleaning the very last grape and leave the vineyard desolate. This verse is addressed to Nebuchadrezzar, or in general to the leader of the besieging army. Israel had not even a 'remnant' left and Judah was facing a like extinction and exile. But the tragedy of the day was that in the gathering gloom the optimism of the religious leaders persisted. 12 Houses . . . fields . . . wives; these coming evils are similar to those mentioned in Dt. 28:30. 14 Healed the wound; the rupture between the holy God and the sinful nation was light-heartedly and superficially doctored. But the day of visitation was at hand.

6:16–21 Yahweh's appeal and Judah's disobedience. 16 An appeal came again from the Lord to the people through the prophet to seek the ancient paths. With the promise contained in this verse cf. Mt. 11:29. Jeremiah based all his appeals on the experience of the past. They refused. The nations of the earth therefore were set against them as witnesses. 20 Sheba lay in the south-west of Arabia and supplied incense to most of the ancient world; cf. 7:21. 21 I will lay stumbling blocks; to Jeremiah, as to his predecessors, there were no such things as intermediary causes; all was ascribed to God. Note, however, that in laying stumbling-blocks the Lord is simply bringing the 'fruit of their devices' (v. 19). It is no arbitrary or capricious act. Cf. Is. 8:14; Ezk. 3:20; 7:19; 18:30.

6:22–30 The enemy's cruelty and the people's incorrigibility. Once more to arouse the nation from its fatal optimistic apathy the enemy was vividly described in terrifying terms. 25 Terror is on every side; cf. 20:10; 46:5; 49:29; Jb. 18:11; Ps. 31:13; hence the fugitives are advised not to go on the road. 26 Make mourning; i.e. 'mourn for thyself'. 27–30 present the prophet's dark intuition. 27 His function was freshly realized as an assayer and tester. Jeremiah felt that his task would be as a 'refiner of silver', but now it was borne upon him that his 'fire' failed to refine the national silver from its dross; i.e. unlike the mineral refining, the human will could refuse the purging 'fire'. God gives such a soul over to its choice. Paul pictures this wilful obstinacy on the part of the Gentile nations in Rom. 1:18–32. 29 The bellows blow fiercely to no avail, for the lead that would draw away the dross is consumed, but the dross remains; cf. 9:7. 30 Refuse silver or 'rejected silver'. This dark shadow closes the second message of Jeremiah and the first section of his prophecy.

7:1 – 10:25 THE ILLUSIONS OF TEMPLE SECURITY

To Judah the Temple was sacrosanct and therefore impregnable to all attack. If the worst came to the worst, Yahweh would undoubtedly intervene to save the city in which He had set His name. Jeremiah here states the very reverse. Shiloh was also held to be inviolate, yet it was overthrown. The 'Temple sermon' given here makes no mention of the alarm and fury it created. In ch. 26, however, such information is given among the historical summaries of the second division of the book, together with the peril to the prophet consequent upon his fearless witness. If the assumption that ch. 26 belongs to the same period as these 'Temple sermons' is correct, then the time would be 608 BC, the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim. This section is Jeremiah's third message, and is in two parts.

7:1 – 8:3 The Temple sermon: ritual correctness or moral rectitude

This word of the Lord is directed to two facets of behaviour that had been separated, wrongly, by Jeremiah's contemporaries: religious profession and moral conduct. The prophet reiterates the burden of the Commandments that it is impossible to respect God and disregard one's fellows.

7:1–20 A warning. 2 The message is addressed to those who enter . . . to worship (LXX omits this phrase), not to heedless passers-by; it is for men who make some appearance of correct belief. A great festival when people crowded the Temple courts may have been the occasion of the speech; equally, it may have been delivered to any who happened to be there on an ordinary day. 3 Your ways and your doings may be explained as 'settled habits and the separate acts which go to form them'. This place; Jerusalem as a whole (cf. v. 7). 4 The temple of the Lord. The repetition may be for emphasis or may represent the chorus of the citizens who trusted in its presence for safety. 5–7 enlarge upon vv. 3, 4; there is still opportunity for repentance. 8–10 reveal the sham of the religious as worse than James's friends whose works belied their faith (Jas. 2). 10 This house was officially holy, set apart geographically and ceremonially as the residence of God. By their own pollution the people contaminate it, so bringing upon themselves the appropriate penalty of expulsion and exile. We are delivered. Evidently the Temple rites had been degraded to the level of magic spells to ward off disaster, spells to be repeated as necessary.

11 Den of robbers; i.e. a place of retreat between acts of crime and violence; cf. Mk. 11:17; Lk. 19:46. 12–14 Shiloh, now Seilūn, lies on the road from Jerusalem to Shechem, north of Bethel. The ark was placed there in the days of Joshua (Jos. 18:1; cf. 1 Sa. 1:3). Its destruction, nowhere described in the OT, was carried through by the Philistines c. 1050 BC, according to archaeological indications. Ps. 78:60 records that God forsook it.

16–20 Addressed as a private word from the Lord to Jeremiah, these verses nevertheless continue the main theme of the Temple sermon. The people have been shown as trusting to ritual for their salvation, but now the Lord invites Jeremiah to look at the character of much of their ritual: it is pagan, abhorrent to the Lord, inviting and guaranteeing utter judgment. 18 Queen of heaven; probably Canaanite Ashtoreth, Babylonian Ishtar, goddess of fertility and of war. The Hebrew word 'queen' is unusual, perhaps foreign; LXX and other texts understood it as 'the host of heaven'.

7:21–28 Obedience and sacrifice. The theme of the relationship between the ritual and the moral aspects of the godly life is here brought to a climax of such force and scorn that it has often been thought that Jeremiah intended the utter repudiation of the sacrificial system. His argument, however, is directed towards the establishment of the true priorities of religion, and not towards the denial of one side of God's revelation through Moses at Sinai. 21 Burnt offerings, symbolizing total commitment to God (cf. Gn. 22:2, 12, 13), were wholly given to God (Lv. 1:6–9), and, unlike e.g. the peace-offerings (cf. Lv. 7:15), were banned from human consumption. The Lord's rejection of the superstitious ritualism of the people is here shown in that He invites them to eat the burnt-offerings also. Their meticulous ritual correctness has become, even to that extent, a matter of indifference to Him.

22 Concerning burnt offerings and sacrifices. All the traditions of Israel's religion available at Jeremiah's time, on any theory of the compilation of the OT, would insist that the Lord had, in fact, given commandment at the Exodus time concerning sacrifices. It is undoubtedly the case that Jeremiah would not be so rash as to jeopardize his case by calling in question the validity of the Mosaic revelation, and therefore we must understand him to be asking about the due priorities of true religion. At Sinai, was the Lord motivated by an overriding concern for sacrifices? Was He not rather looking above all for an obedient people? And were not the sacrifices a derivative legislation, designed both to express obedience (burnt-offerings), to cultivate the fellowship of an obedient people with their God (peace-offerings), and to cater for lapses from obedience (sin-offerings)? If we render the verse, as is legitimate, 'I did not speak . . . because of' or 'for the sake of', this sense is immediately clarified (cf. NBD, art. 'Prophecy and Prophets'). 24 But they did not obey. When compared with 2:2 some difference appears, yet as that passage is obviously a generalization, so is this—in the opposite direction. 27 is another word to uphold 'the prophet of doom'. Although the result of the preaching is known in advance to the prophet, he must still proclaim the word in justice to the people.

7:29 – 8:3 National mourning. The call to the people to lament is because Yahweh has rejected that generation. 29 No person is named, but the verbs are feminine in Hebrew and this points to Jerusalem or the nation personified. The symbol of deep mourning was the cutting off of the hair (lit. 'thy crown'); cf. Jb. 1:20; Mi.

1:16. Some have seen in this a reference to the Nazirite vow (Nu. 6:7). Jerusalem has broken her vows, and so, like a faithless Nazirite, might as well cut off the hair, which was his symbol and badge. 30 They have set their abominations; 2 Ki. 21:5 tells that Manasseh profaned the Temple in the manner here described.

31 Topheth (LXX 'high place') probably means 'fireplace'; cf. Is. 30:33. As a mark of horror and repudiation of the pagan concept, the vowels of the original word were replaced by those of bōšeṯ, 'shame', so that it was read and spoken tōpeṯ. Similarly, the heathen deity Molech contains the consonants of meleḵ, 'king' and the vowels of bōšeṯ; cf. on 3:24. It was to this Canaanite idol that human child sacrifices were offered, a thing never countenanced by Yahweh, and outlawed by Josiah, 2 Ki. 23:10. The valley of Hinnom (Heb. gê' hinnōm) lies at the southern edge of the city, and later seems to have become the municipal refuse tip, where fires burned continuously, consuming the rubbish. Thus its name came to be used as a synonym for Hell (Gehenna, cf. Mk. 9:47, 48, etc.). The exact retributive justice of God is seen in Jeremiah's vision of that foul place overflowing with dead bodies. Their sanctuary was to become their cemetery, and the scene of the covenant-breaker Judas's death (cf. Mt. 27:5–10; Acts 1:18–20). Fitly, therefore, in v. 31, Jeremiah says that its origin never came from God's heart. These verses are echoed in 19:3–9.

8:1 This barbarity was a deliberate insult by the enemy to the defeated (cf. on Am. 2:1), stemming from the pagan idea that disturbance of the burial wounded the dead man's spirit. The destruction of any physical memorial also had the effect of casting the dead into utter oblivion. All had sinned and all would be punished, including the dead. 2 They shall be spread. The heavenly bodies whom they have worshipped will be impotent in the day of judgment.

8:4 – 10:25 The doomed people

Jeremiah has here brought into significant connection with each other selections of his prophetic utterances, doubtless from differing periods and occasions. The purpose of the collection is both to display the inevitability of the coming doom and at the same time to offer some refuge to the truly godly man in the day of calamity.

8:4–17 Diagnosis and prognosis. 4–7 sound the note of an evil mind, stubborn against repentance. For the people of God not to repent is as unnatural as for a fallen person to fail to rise (vv. 4–6) or as for a bird to abandon its instinctive migratory patterns.

8–13 Behind the moral hardness of the people are leaders who mislead: the wise, whose function was to apply God's word to life in practical precepts, but who, rejecting God's word, have abandoned all hope of wisdom (vv. 8, 9); prophet and priest (vv. 10–12) who have justified moral complacency in their hearers, and brought forth no fruit for God (v. 13). 8 Scribes. This is the earliest mention of scribes as a professional class of interpreters of the law. They were evidently active in Josiah's time (cf. 2 Ch. 34:13) and may have had their origin in the reign of Hezekiah (cf. Pr. 25:1). 13 There is no agreed explanation of the last line of the verse; possibly it contains a sense of destruction for lack of fruit, cf. Mk. 11:12ff., etc.

14–17 A belated sense of sin (vv. 14, 15) cannot avert the inevitable doom (vv. 16, 17). The time for repentance is not everlasting (cf. Mt. 27:1–5; Heb. 12:17). The poisoned water (v. 14) and the serpents (v. 17) recall the water of Marah (Ex. 15:23ff.) and the serpents of Nu. 21:6ff., but now no divine cure is available.

8:18 – 9:22 The agony. In this deeply moving passage the prophet reflects in his own heart the anguish of God, as He shares His people's grief (8:18–22), grieves over their sin (9:1–6), and calls them to lament in the face of inevitable judgment (9:7–22). 18 is difficult; RSV is a correction. A possible rendering, involving slight emendation, is 'through lack of healing my grief mounts up . . .'. This is the mounting grief of the Lord as He sees His grieving people. 19 The voices alternate. Their despairing questions imply culpable divine inactivity, but His answering question is in terms of the alienation of God by their sin. 20 Their consternation mounts as the seasons pass without sign of deliverance. 22 Gilead, beyond Jordan, was among the first Israelite territories to fall to the enemy. Its balm was known as early as Gn. 37:25. The reference here is to the progressive failure and abandonment of every human and earthly expedient for healing the hurt of the nation.

9:1–6 The mood changes from overwhelming pity to bitter grief over sin. The people are a race of traitors. Jeremiah (figuring the divine alienation) would abandon the whole breed. Their sin shows itself socially, in corrupt relationships wherein a special emphasis lies on sins of speech, and spiritually in absence of a true intimacy with the Lord. The alteration from do not know (v. 3) to refuse to know (v. 6) shows the tendency of sin ever to become more sinful. 4 Supplanter. The Hebrew has a punning reference to Jacob, cf. Gn. 27:36. God had transformed Jacob into Israel, but Jacob's descendants insist on living the life of the unregenerate.

7–22 A divine necessity. Moved as He is over His people's plight, the Lord is none the less necessarily moved to judge them. Passages of explanation (vv. 7–9, 12–16) here alternate with calls to lamentation (vv. 10, 11, 17–22), the first of which notes the mourning of nature and the second the mourning of the women, thus denoting a total wave of despairing grief over the whole land.

9:23 – 10:25 The God of all the earth. The opening verses of this section sound its dominant note. The most important thing in life is to have intimate contact with God (9:23, 24). The significance of this is explained in stages: there is an imminent universal judgment (9:25, 26). The Lord is able to accomplish this because He alone is God (10:1–13). What a privilege and comfort, then, truly to belong to Him (10:14–16), for even in the day of calamitous exile under divine judgment (10:17, 18) the godly man can accept it from the hand of God and place blame where it belongs (10:19–21). Even in the blackest moment (10:22), such a person can commit himself to the justice of God (10:23, 24) and to His jealousy for His people's welfare (10:25).

9:25, 26 The moral incisiveness of Jeremiah: Judah, though circumcised, lacks inner dedication, and hence lies under the penalty of being a pagan, and as punishable for sin as the nations about her. Actually ritual perfection may involve ethical damnation. This passage anticipates Paul's teaching in the distinction between the circumcision of the flesh and that of the heart (cf. Rom. 2:25–29). That cut the corners of their hair. A custom of certain Arab tribes, prohibited in Lv. 19:27 because of pagan associations. Herodotus (iii.8) records the practice as honouring the chief Arabian deities.

10:1–16 This passage contains a scathing polemic against the very conception of idolatry by one who has known it at first-hand, himself being held in awe only by the monotheistic faith cherished by the best of his people. Cf. Is. 40:18–20; 44:6–20. The polemic itself is impressive. The prophet saw the gods as blocks of wood, inert, dumb, and scorned them as a scarecrow in a garden patch, set up by men to frighten birds, not a holy power that could discipline the rebellious human heart. Idolatry everywhere invites the same biting irony. 2 The signs of the heavens; i.e. heavenly portents, comets, meteors, etc. The pagan people laid great stress on these.

8 The instruction of idols is but wood! Such an expression is strange, the normal explanation is that idols can give nothing better than their own nature. A slight alteration could yield 'the foundation . . .' pointing to the perishable, transient basis of this wisdom, contrasted with v. 10. 9 Tarshish was the extreme limit of the ancient world. The LXX has 'Carthage'; many identify it with Tartessus in Spain. Uphaz is found only here and in Dn. 10:5. Some emend to read 'Ophir', famous for gold. Alternatively it may be a technical term 'refined', cf. 1 Ki. 10:18. 11 This verse, written in Aramaic, may be considered an addition, conceivably an apostrophe to the idolatrous, Aramaic-speaking nations.

17 Gather up your bundle; i.e. prepare for the flight. The Hebrew word 'bundle' occurs here only. 18 I am slinging. A uniquely strong metaphor, expressive of the expulsion of exile. 19, 20 This is all the dire issue of the bad leadership of the leaders (lit. 'shepherds'), who having lost touch with Yahweh were unable to shepherd the people to safety. 22 The old home was to become a jackal lair. 23 The prophet acknowledges his limitation. 24 He makes his supplication; correct me. His 'me' is not the personal self, but the nation whose doom is breaking his heart. 25 He pleads for vindication. As Moses in days past, so Jeremiah intercedes for his people. This verse is repeated in Ps. 79:6, 7. The prophet appears to turn in anger upon a nation summoned by God to carry out His retributive purpose over Judah. Paradoxically, this anger is feasible and just.

11:1 – 12:17 JEREMIAH AND THE COVENANT

This section contains the fourth message of Jeremiah. The covenant here is that of Sinai, perhaps as brought to remembrance through Josiah's reform, yet not simply the book of the law (cf. 2 Ki. 22:8) if identified with Deuteronomy alone. To a forgetful people the prophet says that the ancient stipulations still hold force, including the curses on the unfaithful. A date in the reign of Jehoiakim is appropriate for this discourse. Apparently Jeremiah was residing in, or frequenting, his native Anathoth, for he is made aware of a plot against him (11:18–21).

11:1–8 The covenant

2 Hear the words of this covenant is an exhortation to the people; and speak is addressed to the prophet. 3 This covenant. Yahweh had made it with the people and they had promised obedience (cf. Ex. 24:7; Dt. 5:27–29). 4 It marked their deliverance from the iron furnace, the smelting oven being symbolic of intense suffering; cf. Dt. 4:20; 1 Ki. 8:51; Is. 48:10. 5 A land flowing . . . Outside the Pentateuch this expression occurs only here, in 32:22 and in Ezk. 20:6, 15. So be it, Lord. 'Amen', the prophet's obedient response. 6 In the cities of Judah. A touring prophet is unlikely and the phrase is more easily taken as meaning 'everybody'; cf. 26:2.

11:9–17 A revolt and its consequences

Whatever the people knew of their fathers' fate made no difference, they forgot both God's grace and His justice, with the result that they are doomed to worse than the 'iron furnace' of Egypt. 12 They cannot save. A recurrent theme; what the revered idols cannot do, the neglected God of Israel will not do. The covenant brought blessing to its observers, curses and exile to its breakers, and the people had accepted it outright. 13 For your gods have become as many as your cities, O Judah. A repetition of 2:28b, showing that no change of heart had taken place between the two addresses. 14 Do not pray . . . is also a repetition, in part, of 7:16, and for the same reason. The corruption has gone too far; only judgment can purify the nation. 15, 16 are obscure in Hebrew and so LXX is utilized for the RSV rendering. My beloved; i.e. Judah, who remains the object of Yahweh's love although she must leave His house for her hypocrisy. Olive tree. Despite its devoted nurturing, the slow-growing olive that promised so well is barren, fit only for burning (cf. Jn. 15:2, 6).

11:18–23 The anger of Anathoth

This description of plots against Jeremiah by the folk of his home town is introduced abruptly. In this short paragraph there are three scenes: in the first the people speak (v. 19); in the second the prophet speaks (v. 20); and in the third God speaks (vv. 21–23). Anathoth was the home settlement of the priestly house of Abiathar, close friend of David (cf. 1 Sa. 22:20–23), deposed by Solomon in favour of the younger rival house of Zadok (cf. 1 Ki. 2:26, 27, 35), who from that time exercised priestly dominance in Jerusalem. Here then were all the elements essential to bitterness. Wrath is incurred in a village such as Anathoth whenever a son or kinsman departs from local sentiment, especially when it favours or appears to favour the opposing side. Thus when Jeremiah, bred of the Anathoth priesthood, supported, as a prophet, the deposition of all village sanctuaries (as for a time almost surely he did; cf. 2 Ki. 23:8), he inferentially willed the suppression of that shrine at Anathoth. It was a deadly hurt. Abiathar had borne priestly rank and privilege before the birth of Zadok! Love can turn to hate, given adequate provocation. How bitter that hate was against Jeremiah can be inferred from the appeal he made to Yahweh's tribunal. He pleads that the desires and intentions of his village enemies be scorned and judged by that very tribunal. His own innocence was that of a tame lamb (19), unwitting of peril.

19 That his name . . . Cf. Is. 53:8. Several echoes of Is. 53 can be caught in 11:18 – 12:4 (the pet lamb, v. 19, the shortened life in 12:4 and here); the prophet may be consciously applying the motifs of that passage to his own suffering.

12:1–6 The problem of godless prosperity

Jeremiah concludes by addressing himself to the age-long problem of the success of the wicked. The prophet is among the boldest of any generation who have stood up in their suffering and interrogated the divine sovereignty on the issue of prosperity attending the labour of the godless and impious. Anger (vv. 3, 4) burns within him against the murderous intentions of his antagonists at Anathoth, these prosperous wicked! But God is not at the mercy of man's questionings, no matter what the anomalies of human life. Jeremiah receives no direct solution to his problem, but rather the command to gird his loins for a yet greater tax on his faith and courage. The earlier suffering, which is likened to a race against fellow-athletes, is but a preliminary discipline for a much sterner struggle. If that contest was too much for him, how will he fare if he be matched against race-horses (v. 5)? And if, when the land was peaceful, he was distressed, what will his reaction be in the difficult times ahead (signified by the jungle of Jordan)?

2 Thou plantest them. The metaphor of a tree is applied to the whole nation in 2 Sa. 7:10; here it is applied to the wicked. 4 He will not see . . .; i.e. the prophet will die before, or at the hand of, his enemies, or else his prophecies of doom will not be fulfilled. 5 The jungle of the Jordan connotes the wild, luxuriant and beast-infested growths of the hot marshy land beside the Jordan (cf. 49:19; 50:44; Zc. 11:3).

12:7–17 Yahweh's lament

This section is an appendix to the message of Jeremiah just concluded. The prophet's sorrow, as that of Hosea, with whom he shares not a few characteristics, led him to feel that it had its counterpart in God. This divine lament in its historical setting is recorded in 2 Ki. 24:1, 2, where detail and date are given (c. 598 BC). 7 My house. Here the wider sense of 'my household' is intended, rather than the Temple. 8 Like a lion. Judah has roared against the Lord as a lion would do and has taken up a hostile attitude. 9 Speckled bird. As birds attack other birds of unfamiliar plumage, so Israel, differing from other nations, was attacked by them. 10 My vineyard. The nation is described under various metaphors in this passage—house, heritage, beloved of my soul, vineyard. 'The pastors', i.e. leaders, have destroyed the vineyard initially, and the enemy from without has destroyed it finally. 14–17 The evil neighbours are predicted to share the exile fate of Judah; these Syrian, Moabite and Ammonite aggressors will likewise be punished through the agency of the common foe, Babylon, unless they worship the living God and learn to swear by my name. Again the conditional character of prophecy is to be marked.

13:1–27 FIVE WARNINGS

The date of these warnings is obscure. Vv. 18, 19 probably refer to Jehoiachin and his mother, Queen Nehushta (2 Ki. 24:8–12, 597 BC). The first portion, pregnant with disaster, might cover the later years of his father, Jehoiakim, hence 600–597 BC.

13:1–11 The first warning

Where words alone had no effect, actions might speak louder, and the technique of the 'acted oracle' was often used by the prophets for the more forceful launching of the word of God into a given situation (cf. 2 Ki. 13:14ff.; Is. 20:1–6; Je. 19:1–15; Ezk. 4:1–3; see NBD, art. 'Prophecy, Prophets'). The meaning of the present act is complex. The newness of the garment stands for the nation's pride in itself which allows it to act wilfully against the Lord and seek after other gods. This pride will be humbled by Babylonian exile, just as the garment was marred by the Euphrates (vv. 9, 10). The garment itself, a short kilt, hugging the body, symbolizes the intimate nearness which Israel was intended to enjoy with the Lord (v. 11) but which their sin has destroyed.

1 Do not dip; do nothing to diminish its fresh newness. 4 The Euphrates. Jeremiah's ordered destination could be ambiguous. Euphrates (Heb. pᵉrāṯ) may be the river of that name, some 350 miles from Jerusalem, but it could equally be Parah, about 3 miles from Jeremiah's home town, Anathoth, for in the expression to the Euphrates both names take on an identical form in Hebrew. The journey to the Euphrates would have symbolic value in view of the coming Babylonian captivity, but Parah could achieve much the same by means of a play on words.

13:12–14 The second warning

12 contains the parabolic warning; 13 explains it. The people complacently looked for prosperity and joy, symbolized by the full wine jar, but the imagery of the wine jar rather is made to bear the warning that just as strong drink confuses a man's walk and thought, so will Yahweh's judgment. He will fill the men of Judah with drunkenness and they shall dash against each other and be destroyed. Drunkenness is the dethronement of the alert mind essential to decision in an hour of crisis. The inhabitants of Jerusalem will have neither wits nor strength to defend themselves or to know friend from foe (cf. 25:15–28; Ezk. 23:31–34; Is. 51:17; Ps. 60:3).

13:15–17 The third warning

Here Jeremiah warns his people of the perils of pride. 16 The twilight mountains refers to the plight of travellers overtaken by night before reaching a friendly inn.

13:18, 19 The fourth warning

The contemptuous response to Jeremiah's messages was the cause, in their self-satisfaction, of the people's downfall. Hence the prophet's command to address the royal house personally and directly. 18 The king and the queen mother are, with little doubt, Jehoiachin and Nehushta, cf. 2 Ki. 24:8. The lowly seat which they refused to take was shortly theirs by force, for 37 years in the king's case, see 52:31. 19 The cities of the Negeb, i.e. the south of Judah. The cities of this territory are noted as the farthest away from the invasion, thus emphasizing the completeness of Judah's captivity, all . . . wholly.

13:20–27 The fifth warning

The last warning of judgment makes it plainer than ever that doom is due to obdurate sins. 21 Friends are intimates, trusted (the Heb. word also describes the pet lamb of 11:19), but they are the ones Judah chose, wilfully rejecting the friend of her youth (cf. 3:4). There were times when the Babylonians had been friends and allies of Judah. Hezekiah had eagerly accepted the friendship of Merodach-Baladan, e.g., despite Isaiah's warning (cf. 2 Ki. 20:12–19). This verse may refer back so far, or to some later event. 23 Sin may become so habitual as to involve destiny; the nexus of sin and penalty is unchangeable and unbreakable. The appositeness of such penalty is that it shall be inflicted by those with whom Jerusalem has coquetted. 27 Even exile did not bring Judah back to God; cf. the sorrowing cry of Lk. 13:34.

14:1 – 21:10 SHADOW OF DOOM

This section contains the fifth, sixth and seventh messages of Jeremiah with appendices. Events in the life of the prophet are also interspersed.

14:1 – 15:9 Jeremiah's fifth message: the rejection of intercession

This oracle deals with the plague of drought and the vicarious intercession of the prophet.

14:1–6 The drought. Drought is a deadly enemy of the Near Eastern farmer, eventually affecting the whole population, human (2 people; 3 nobles, servants; 4 farmers) and animal (5 hind; 6 wild asses) and the natural surroundings (4 ground; 5 grass; 6 herbage).

14:7–9 Prayer for relief. The drought is seen as an expression of God's displeasure. 7 Because it touches their normal life, the people are ready to repent, we have sinned. As the nation is still 'God's people' they claim that God must act to save His reputation, act . . . for thy name's sake (cf. v. 9). 8, 9 To them God seems to adopt the role of a passing, unconcerned visitor, despite His Temple in the midst.

14:10–12 The response of God. 10 The past still lives. Now he will remember . . . Perhaps a prophetic stock phrase; cf. Ho. 8:13; 9:9. 11 Jeremiah is commanded once more to cease his intercession (cf. 7:16; 11:14), for nothing could alter the doom of Judah. 12 Sword . . . famine . . . pestilence. David had to choose one of these as a punishment for sin (cf. 2 Sa. 24:13), Jeremiah and Ezekiel repeatedly use all three of the punishment their contemporaries deserved (e.g. 16:4; 24:10; Ezk. 14:21).

14:13–18 Prophets and priests have misled the people. Jeremiah can only plead that other prophets have lied to the people. Such liars were not Yahweh's ambassadors; they prophesied in their own godless authority. Yet the Lord rejects the plea. Deceived the people may have been, but their wickedness (v. 16) is their own and springs back upon them to their ruin. 17 Jeremiah's tears, portraying his own and the Lord's anguish over a destroyed people, are part of his message to them and have the force of an 'acted oracle'. They show the backlash of the message of doom on him who preaches it, and none should preach destruction who cannot weep for those under its threat. 18 The political devastation (v. 18a) is traced to a spiritual cause (v. 18b). Spiritual misleaders constitute the ultimate in national disaster.

14:19–22 Jeremiah's prayer. As, in his tears, we may see his identification with a divine sorrow, so in his intercessions he takes up the people's cause. Many who never heeded the message of the false prophet (cf. 8:11) must yet have prayed for peace and wondered at the silence of God. Their prayer is a model for such times: confessing the divine sovereignty over the circumstance of His people (v. 19), acknowledging sin (v. 20), pleading the name, covenant (v. 21) and almightiness (v. 22) of the Lord.

20 Our fathers. Inherited sinfulness is never pleaded in the OT as an excuse, but always admitted as an aggravation of the offensiveness to God of the present generation (cf. Ps. 51:3–5). 21 Throne; i.e. the Davidic throne with which the Lord had closely associated Himself (cf. 1 Ch. 29:23).

15:1–9 The Lord's answer. God counted on the past, too, and found nothing to soften His verdict (v. 4). 1 Moses and Samuel had interceded with success (cf. Ex. 32:11–14, 30–32; Nu. 14:13–24; Dt. 9:18–20, 25–29; 1 Sa. 7:8, 9; 12:19–25; also Ps. 49:6–8), but now the Lord is as ready to turn His people from the land as the pharaoh had been after the tenth plague (Ex. 12:31). 2 The word of the Lord is final. 7 Gates, i.e. as the invading enemy has burst in. Cf. Is. 28:6. 8 RSV follows LXX. Hebrew reads 'I have brought to them against . . .'. 9 She who bore seven. Seven sons symbolized the height of prosperity (cf. 1 Sa. 2:5; Jb. 1:2); Jerusalem, which has had all she could desire, will be bereft.

15:10–21 Jeremiah's expostulation

Jeremiah becomes introspective. Anguish moves him that he has become a curse to his people, but Yahweh strengthens him and will yet vindicate him. 11 The Hebrew is difficult. As RSV understands it, the burden is that the prophet has acted in the people's interest, yet he is hated. Cf. RV. 12 Iron; a figure of the nation's obduracy in the face of God's word. 13, 14 Cf. 17:3, 4 whence many claim these verses have been erroneously repeated here, but their force in this context is to match the obduracy of the people towards the Lord (v. 12) with this reminiscence of the hardness of His word to them, thus preparing for the revelation of Jeremiah's loneliness (vv. 15–18). 15 Take me not away. The persecution is so great that Jeremiah fears for his life. The dread of death apparent in these words arises from the sense of estrangement from God which is part of his predicament (cf. on v. 18; Ps. 88:10). 16, 17 Jeremiah reviews his recent experience: first, his personal delight in assimilating God's word (cf. Ezk. 2:8 – 3:3) and his sense of God's identification with him in giving him His name; secondly, the distasteful alienation from men because increasingly he became the voice of the divine indignation. 18 There has been no compensating balm from God for his spirit. In the moment of need, the Lord (in contrast to 2:13) has been like a brook which has become as parched under the summer sun as the traveller who looks to it for refreshment (cf. Jb. 6:15–20). 19, 20 The remedy for the forlorn prophet is the same as he has been urging on others: to return to the Lord (i.e. from his rebellious self-pity), and to devote himself in utter faithfulness to His word. On this basis he will become a rallying point for the people, and the former promises of God (1:18f.) will be fulfilled.

16:1–21 Yahweh's instructions to His servant

The prophet is ordered to behave in an eccentric manner to illustrate his message (cf. on 14:17; Is. 20; Ezk. 4ff.); celibacy was extremely uncommon, refusal to participate in funerary rites ill-mannered and disrespectful. Both actions had one meaning: There is no future here. 7 Break bread . . . the cup of consolation. A reference to a funeral feast, in some cases an annual commemoration of the dead man. 14, 15 (cf. 23:7, 8) sound a note of hope, abrupt and unexpected as it often is in the prophets (cf. Is. 28:5, 6; 29:5–8). Jeremiah's careful editing of his prophecies doubtless reflects his own clutching at the promises of God in hours of deepest darkness. Cf. the uprising of assured faith in vv. 19f. 16 Fishers, hunters replace the shepherds who had led astray (13:18ff.) and decimate the flock, for it would not recognize its master. 18 Doubly, perhaps 'equally' is better. Polluted . . . with carcases. The idols were no better than corpses, and so polluted God's land.

17:1–18 Jeremiah's sixth message: truth unchanged, unchanging

Jeremiah lays hold on snatches of proverbial truth to enforce the inevitability of the nexus between sin and punishment. He lays bare the situation: indelible sin, inevitable loss (vv. 1–4). Then he turns to establish this with reference to known truth: contrasting faiths bear contrasting fruits (vv. 5–8), and the all-knowing Lord searches both the quality of the heart (vv. 9, 10) and the life (v. 11). Because His rule is sovereign (v. 12a), He both offers sure hope to His people (vv. 12b, 13a) and sure calamity to those who reject Him (v. 13b), and Jeremiah hastens to identify himself with the former (vv. 14–18).

1 Pen of iron. The iron stylus was used for cutting out inscriptions on hard surfaces like rock or stone (cf. Jb. 19:24). The nation is in the same category of hardness. Sin is inscribed permanently upon its heart and its altars, whence no sacrifice can remove it. As durable and lasting shall be the penal fires of Yahweh (v. 4). Their Asherim. See NBD, art. 'Asherah'. 3, 4 The text is obscure; RSV translates with help from the similar passage 15:13, 14. 9 Desperately corrupt. In 15:18 and 30:12 the word is translated 'incurable'. It is from the same root as 'Jacob' and has related nuance; cf. on 9:4. 11 Partridge. The bird lays two clutches of eggs, one being for her mate, and so appears to hatch more than one brood. 13 Written in the earth; i.e. unenduring, like writing on sand. 16 RSV is based on a minor alteration of vowels, yielding very different sense from AV, RV. The prophet could not ask for the doom to overtake his people, but he does beg God for retribution upon his mockers.

17:19–27 Appendix about the sabbath

This prose discourse raises a problem, for

Jeremiah frequently denounced formality in worship without sincerity. Ellison points out, however, that keeping the sabbath involves the self-denial of ceasing from ordinary business, the requirements of the prophet here. 19 The Benjamin Gate (cf. 20:2; 37:13; 38:7) is substituted by RSV for the unknown 'gate of the people' of the Hebrew, which may, nevertheless, be correct. The prohibition in v. 27 suggests a city gate.

18:1–17 Jeremiah's seventh message: the ways of the sovereign Lord

1–10 This discourse is associated with the prophet's commanded visit to the potter's house, where he understood the mind of God, the divine Potter at work with His human clay. Jeremiah watched again more purposively than ever the potter working at his wheel (v. 3; lit. 'the two stones', upper and lower). He particularly noted, for it may have occurred more than once, the failure to make a vessel. This marring could be attributed to the potter's carelessness or clumsiness, the crude machine, or some flaw in the clay itself. As in the parables of Jesus, not every detail is significant. Here, the central truth is not the marring, but that the potter persevered and made the clay into another vessel. So the Lord is master of the clay, shaping it to the purpose in His mind, whether one of meanness or grandeur. The parable is a vivid picture of divine sovereignty. 6 Can I not do with you as this potter? The question does not ask for permission, but declares the facts. The ensuing verses clarify the terms of divine sovereign power: power to meet repentance half way (vv. 7, 8) and to punish apostasy (vv. 9, 10).

11a The message is clear. Exile is the new mould in which the nation is to be shaped. 11b, 12 Return . . . amend. The first draws attention to the initial process, the other to the more continuous one. The Lord's moulding will is all of grace.

13–17 Jeremiah, instructed by the Lord, warns the men of Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem of the evil of the stubborn mind. The sin of the people is as irrational as it is tragic. 14 Familiar elements of nature even may be cited as their judges: the snow of Lebanon and the running stream are perennial, but Yahweh's people forget Him and worship gods that actually have no existence. 15 False gods; literally 'deceit, emptiness'. In disaster, therefore, Yahweh's face is turned from them (cf. 2:27).

18:18–23 Reactions

At the conclusion of Jeremiah's seventh message we have recorded two reactions, first from the audience and second from the speaker.

18:18 The hostile hearers plot against the prophet. This is the second plot against Jeremiah (cf. 11:19ff.). Jeremiah's enemies were confident that his dire prophecies would fail, that the present order would continue, showing his words to be false and so blasphemous as spoken in the name of the Lord. LXX has 'let us heed his words' to take evidence against him from his own lips. MT is to be preferred: the enemies will accuse or slander the prophet, ignoring his replies.

18:19–23 The prophet pleads for vindication. The retributive fury of this passage is so vehement that many think it is quite unlike Jeremiah. But the exception may prove the rule. The prophet is transparent. His very soul is laid bare. He hides nothing. The provocation is more than he can bear. The surface interpretation of egotistic imprecation may be discarded. Here is a cry that the divine cause, which the enemies so ruthlessly scorned, may be vindicated by the overthrow of their fancied security and power. In the first part of the prayer the emphasis is on himself; in the second half it is on his enemies.

19:1–15 Jeremiah's eighth message: the irretrievable shattering

19:1, 2 The setting. Like the previous oracle, this is an acted parable. The place is significant, the valley of Ben-hinnom at the entry of the Potsherd Gate, i.e. the rubbish tip for broken crockery. The prophet takes representatives of laity and priesthood (elders . . . senior priests), and a water decanter.

19:3–15 The oracle. 3–9 appear to be a summary of past oracles; vv. 4–7 occurred substantially in 7:31–33, yet this is insufficient reason for treating vv. 3–9 as an insertion. The symbolic act brought realism to the prophetic word: the flask was irreparably smashed and thrown on the rubbish heap. The deed and accompanying words probably had what we term 'magical' import to the audience. 6 Topheth. See on 7:31. 7 I will make void (lit. 'tip out'), a play on the related term 'flask'. 14, 15 The prophet returned to his habitual stand and proclaimed the gist of his message to all and sundry: the doom is inescapable.

20:1–6 Jeremiah in the stocks

1, 2 Pashur the priest . . . chief officer in the house of the Lord in savage reaction smites and imprisons Jeremiah in the stocks. In that priestly circle, the prophet was an incarnate menace against their reiteration that, if Babylon attacked them, Egypt would compel him to lift the siege. 3ff. Men like Jeremiah, however, do not change their message with a change in circumstance. In his re-naming Pashur as Magor-missabib, Terror on every side, the meaning is that when the Babylonian victory shall prove how false was his prophecy of security, he shall be seen as responsible for such an incredible disaster, a false prophet, not only in his own eyes, but in the eyes of all his friends (v. 4).

20:7–18 Jeremiah's complaint

This is a unique psychological passage in canonical prophecy, a passage tremendous with feeling, a soul laid bare. Yahweh had drawn him to be a prophet. If he forbore the word of doom, it would be as a flame within him, a tension beyond endurance. His friends taunt him with 'terror on every side'. His perennial stimulus is that the Lord is with him as a mighty man. In the end his enemies will lose the fight. 7 Thou hast deceived. The Hebrew is better rendered 'seduced', 'misled', here and in v. 10. The meaning of this bold accusation is to be sought in 1:6–10 where, in response to Jeremiah's excuse that he has no personal authority for the prophetic task, the Lord peremptorily commands his obedience and promises the authoritative word. With reason, Jeremiah feels that there has been to date little compelling authority in what he has said from the Lord. People are amused but not convinced. The great promises appear as deceitful bait to lure him into an office he never desired. 10 My familiar friends; i.e. those he trusted; cf. Ps. 41:9; Jn. 13:18. 13 A moment of assurance in the tormented prophet's thought (cf. on 16:14). Was this at the instant of his release (v. 3)? 14–18 reveal the breaking-point; they suggest an even darker day, when he would be more outcast from his people than he had ever been, yet had to watch the doom engirdle them. How sure of His man God must have been when He made such a soul plough so lonely and desperate a furrow! The point is that they reveal the soul of a man of God in expostulation against his fate, but a soul yet obedient and loyal. 14 Cursed be the day; cf. Jb. 3, noting that the similarity does not demand literary dependence.

21:1–10 Jeremiah's ninth message: a divine Enemy, a desperate choice

The prophet's word here is another warning that Jerusalem will fall. In 37:3–10 there is a similar account, but it is not a doublet. It deals with the temporary raising of the siege by the Egyptians, only to be resumed later on with greater intensity. Here we have the siege in its initial phases.

1, 2 Zedekiah sends another Pashur to entreat Jeremiah's intercession. 4 The answer is that Yahweh will nullify the power of Judah (4a), prosper the arms of Babylon (4b); 5, 6 and Himself become the enemy of His people. 7 The king, his court and people, all who survive the horror of the siege, its famine and pestilence, will be handed over to Nebuchadrezzar. 8 The figure of two ways comes from Dt. 30:15, 19. 9 A prize of war; i.e. escape with his bare life.

21:11 – 25:38 KINGS AND PROPHETS OF JUDAH: THE VISION OF THE END

21:11 – 23:8 The royal house of Judah

This section contains a series of prophecies relating to contemporary kings of Judah; whether they were uttered by Jeremiah in sequence or not we cannot say.

21:11–14 Royal duty. The execution of justice was a major part of the king's activity, of the 'right' (yāšār) which he was expected to perform in the consciousness of God's watching (cf. Dt. 17:18–20). 12 In the morning. Regularity and primacy are most likely meant, although the normal time for a judicial sitting may be indicated. Cf. on Ps. 101:8. 13 Inhabitant of the valley could possibly be rendered 'living above the valley' as descriptive of Jerusalem, and rock of the plain as 'level rock'. We must take it that the reference is to the complacent sense of security found in the Judahite leaders, smugly confident in their impregnable fortifications.

22:1–9 Communal duty. King and people alike are to execute judgment and mercy, especially to the most needy: otherwise the house of David will become a waste. 5 Yahweh pledges Himself by the most solemn oath that disobedience will be punished by desolation, viz. I swear by myself; cf. Heb. 6:13–18. 6 The house of David, under the figure of a Lebanon forest, is to be gutted with fire. Again unrepentant idolatry is the reason. 7 Your choicest cedars; the leaders of the nation.

22:10–12 Shallum. 10 Weep not for him who is dead. Josiah, whose death at Megiddo (609 BC) was a major disaster to the reformation movement, is not to be mourned, but rather Shallum, i.e. Jehoahaz, who died in Egypt as an exile after reigning only three months (2 Ki. 23:31–34). He was the first ruler of the southern kingdom to die in exile. The whole sense is that it is better to die on the battlefield than to die in long captivity.

22:13–23 Jehoiakim. This king's father had been a reformer, but he did evil in the sight of the Lord (2 Ki. 23:34–37). Josiah was just, his son unjust; Josiah acted as the father of his people, his son faithlessly exploited their basic rights; one was a man of austerity, the other one of ostentation. 13 Builds his house. Excavations at Ramat Rahel (see on 6:1) have revealed ruins that may be identified with this palace. 19 The burial of an ass. No record of this remains (cf. 2 Ki. 24:6), but note the action of a victor foretold in Je. 8:1. 20–23 may speak of Jerusalem; the verbal forms are feminine as usually when the city is the subject. Lovers; i.e. 'allies'. Lebanon, Bashan, Abarim are the mountains bounding Israel on the north, north-east and east, symbolically the places of anxious watch for invaders.

22:24–30 Jehoiachin. The two parts of this prophecy can be understood as a formal declaration (vv. 24–27) and explanatory lament (vv. 28–30). The young king Coniah (shortened from Jeconiah, personal name of Jehoiachin) and his mother are to be exiled; Nebuchadrezzar took them to Babylon in 597 BC (2 Ki. 24:8–15) where Jehoiachin remained in prison for thirty-seven years (2 Ki. 25:27). 24 Signet ring. The most important private possession bearing the owner's mark and authority. 30 Childless . . . shall not succeed. The historian will not find place for Jehoiachin's descendants (he had seven sons, cf. 1 Ch. 3:17) in the list of kings. His name will not be revered by succeeding generations; his brief rule of three months witnessed no accomplishment but that 'he did evil'.

23:1–8 The rulers. While this has a general address, Zedekiah is probably the main object of the prophecy. 1, 2 He and his princes reverse the shepherd's task; true shepherds bring together, lead, and cherish their flocks. The Lord, as Owner of the flock, will treat the false shepherds accordingly. 3, 4 He will restore the remnant of His flock, and install good shepherds. 5, 6 More specifically, He will raise up a descendant of David whose name will be indicative of his nature, Yahweh ṣiḏqēnû, The Lord is our righteousness. Again, the reverse of the current situation is depicted; Zedekiah, 'the Lord is my righteousness', had a similar name to the future king, but he was appointed by Nebuchadrezzar, and was a weakling who possessed none of the traits of a true king. The Branch; i.e. shoot, the fresh growth from the stump of a felled tree. This term for the Messianic figure is found again in 33:14–16; Zc. 3:8; 6:12; cf. Is. 4:2; 11:1. As a title 'Branch' is designed to trace the ancestry of the Messiah, human and divine, and in its actual use it focuses attention on the priestly and kingly aspects of the Messianic task (see references and NBD, art. 'Messiah'). The new king will head the nation established after a fresh 'exodus' which will be remembered as a greater saving act than that from Egypt. Contrast Zedekiah under whom many went into exile, and, in another plane, the 'exodus' mentioned in Lk. 9:31.

23:9–40 The prophets of Judah

From the leaders of state, Jeremiah turns to the leaders of religion. He probes into their life (vv. 9–15), their message (vv. 16–22) and their fate (vv. 23–40). See further Introduction.

9 Broken . . . because of the Lord. Jeremiah's starting-point is the holiness of the Lord, and it is the contrasting moral character of these alleged servants of God which shatters him at his heart. This observation is basic to his great discussion of false prophecy: the messenger should be like Him who sends him. In default of this similarity, his message lacks authentication (cf. 15:19). 10 Adulterers; physically and spiritually, and consequently bringing a curse (cf. Mal. 2:1, 2). Dried up. The experience of the drought was fresh in memory (14:1ff.) and may well provide a date for this oracle. National disasters have spiritual causes, and the chief weight of blame rests on spiritual misleaders. 11 This verse shows that the foregoing complaint is not just of general immorality but specifically of the unclean lives of religious professionals. 14 The effect of immorality in religious high places is that it strengthens the forces of moral laxity throughout the nation until the city of God epitomizes the state of Sodom. 16, 17 Words introduces the new topic: what these men are has been shown, and now we are told what they say. Their message is characterized as unfounded optimism, humanistic (i.e. lacking a basis in divine revelation), and encouraging to those who despise the whole idea of revelation in their insistence on their own wisdom (v. 17).

18–22 urge the essential ingredients of a true prophetic experience: an experience of intimate fellowship with God (v. 18) and a message which does not evade the truth of His wrath against sin (vv. 19–22). 18 Council includes the notion of the consultative assembly, as in 1 Ki. 22:19ff., and the sense of personal fellowship (the word translated 'converse' in Ps. 55:14). 20 In the latter days. Jeremiah is confident that it is this authentic message of wrath which will receive the seal of fulfilment (cf. Dt. 18:22). 21, 22 The situation of the false prophet summarized: uncommissioned (v. 21a), uninspired (v. 21b), lacking personal experience of God (v. 22a), and without a word of rebuke concerning sin (v. 22b).

23–32, which stress the distinction between the true and the pretended word from the Lord (e.g. vv. 28, 29), prepare the way for 33–40 with their condemnation of the pretentious pomposity of the false prophet which has only succeeded in bringing the whole idea of 'a word from the Lord' into disrepute. 23, 24 We are not necessarily to suppose any false prophet ever really thought himself free of divine scrutiny, but each, in giving as from God what he knew full well had no origin outside himself, acted as if the Lord were totally absent and unconcerned. 25 Dreamed. The stress on dreams is not intended to denigrate this particular means of revelation, so often experienced by the true men of God in OT times (e.g. Dn. 7:1), but rather to underscore that element of self-origination which marked the false prophets. 28, 29 Wheat . . . hammer; the nourishment and power of the true word. 30 Steal; another stress on the merely human origin of the false word. 33 Burden, often translated 'oracle' (e.g. Is. 21:1), was a standard word for a message received by revelation from God. The meaning of these verses is that misuse has brought the very term into disrepute, and that it should therefore be avoided lest the true prophet become associated with the false even in this way.

24:1–10 Two baskets of figs

This contrasting picture of good and bad stems from 597 BC when the cream of the population was removed to Babylonia (2 Ki. 24:10–17). Those left in Judah or seeking refuge in Egypt (cf. 26:20–23) were like figs 'so bad they cannot be eaten', a loathsome corrupting (v. 9) heap. The presently unfortunate exiles were, in fact, like 'good figs' which could be planted, re-establishing the land (v. 6). First, however, the exiles are to be wholly reborn of heart and become Yahweh's people (v. 7).

25:1–38 Vision of the end

Here the culmination of Jeremiah's first 23 years' ministry is reached (c. 627–605 BC). In the crucial battle of Carchemish (605 BC) the Babylonians put an effective end to Pharaoh Necho's domination over Palestine (cf. 2 Ki. 24:7). It was one of the decisive battles of history.

In it the prophet clearly read the will of the Lord; the Babylonians were the 'evil from the north' harnessed by Yahweh to carry out His judgment upon Judah (cf. 4:5ff., etc.). LXX places 46:1 - 51:64 (q.v.) after v. 13; some of those passages stem from this time.

25:1–14 A confirmation. 3 Spoken persistently. Precisely this persistence accounts for the repetitiousness of many oracles. 8, 9 Judah's obstinacy had withstood God's patience so long, now the end was beginning. Comparison may be made with Heb. 12:25. The tribes of the north, earlier unnamed, are here shown to be Babylonian forces, having a multitude of ethnic origins, led by my servant (i.e. 'agent'), Nebuchadrezzar. 11 The duration of exile, seventy years, ensures that all the original exiles would be dead before its end; this is a round figure approximately correct. 12–14 Babylon's downfall came at its capture by Cyrus the Persian in 539 BC. Although God's agent in Nebuchadrezzar's day, she was none the less under jugdment for her ungodly pride. Cf. Is. 10:12; and the section 'God and history' in the General Article, 'OT Theology' (pp. 27f.).

25:15–29 A condemnation. The previous section was most probably delivered as soon as news reached Jerusalem that Babylon was victor at Carchemish, with these verses following soon after. Nebuchadrezzar was prevented from following up his victory immediately by the death of his father and the consequent enthronement rites in Babylon, but he returned to Syria a few months later, and began the first of a series of campaigns to subdue all of Syria and Palestine. The prophet's warnings apparently preceded these campaigns, perhaps as an antidote to a false security in the respite after Carchemish. 15 Cup of wine is the symbol of Yahweh's inescapable wrath over Judah and other nations (cf. Ps. 75:8; Is. 51:17). Babylon is His agent. 20 Remnant of Ashdod. The city had been reduced by Psammetichus of Egypt a decade or so earlier. 23 Cut the corners; cf. 9:26. 29 Observe that the fury of the Lord begins with Jerusalem (cf. v. 18) and extends to other nations who also deserve the divine chastisement.

25:30–38 The execution of justice. Fearlessly Jeremiah declares that Yahweh will take up His case against the nations and carry out his righteous verdict. 31 The wicked he will put to the sword. There is no place for man's concept of an entirely loving God where ingrained evil is concerned; cf. Mt. 13:37ff. These verses are a further demonstration of God's control over the affairs of men.

26:1 - 52:34 HISTORICAL NARRATIVES

26:1–24 THE REIGN OF JEHOIAKIM

This chapter contains the story of two prophets: Jeremiah and Uriah.

26:1–19 Jeremiah in peril

This situation is rightly linked with the more detailed account of the 'Temple sermon' in 7:1ff. Cf. introduction to ch. 7. The record of the unfortunate experience of Uriah (vv. 20–23) highlights the courage of Jeremiah in standing forth as he did, and gives point to his preparedness to die for the sake of God's word (vv. 12–15) as no merely theoretical devotion.

9 Shiloh; cf. 7:12–14. 10 Gate; the traditional place for the hearing of law-suits. 12 The Lord sent me; see also v. 15. Jeremiah makes no self-defence in the accepted sense. He throws all on to the divine commission which is his. Now is the moment of testing of the promises of God (cf. 1:8, 18, 19; 15:20, 21) and the reality of professed faith (cf. 16:19; 17:7, 12). 18 Micah. The reference is to Mi. 3:12, but the interest for us lies in the current knowledge of God's previously spoken word and the way in which scripture was used to confirm scripture. Micah had prophesied a century earlier. Mountain of the house; the Temple hill.

26:20–24 Uriah's death

The extradition and murder of Uriah indicate how near Jeremiah stood to death. The fickleness of the people and the loyalty of an influential friend stand out (v. 24), but so also does the contrast between the way of faith (vv. 12–15) and the way of fear (v. 21). For a number of years Jehoiakim was a vassal of Egypt and probably had extradition rights, which explains the ease with which the king 'sent to Egypt certain men' (v. 22). Ultimately Uriah was tested and found 'faithful unto death' (v. 23). Uriah was fetched from Egypt and Jeremiah was later taken into Egypt; both died for their loyalty and devotion to their God.

27:1 - 29:32 THE PROPHET'S COMMON SENSE

These three chapters, which relate to the reign of Zedekiah, may originally have been circulated among the Babylonian exiles to disabuse their mind of a speedy return from exile. Nowhere else, in the same degree, does the sane balance of Jeremiah's mind stand out so clearly as here. The background is already familiar. The first captivity in 597 BC was an accomplished fact; Zedekiah was on the throne on the sufferance of Babylon. But inside and outside the country many were plotting against Nebuchadrezzar. In these chapters Jeremiah sets himself the task of denouncing and correcting the notion that, somehow, it was possible to overthrow the power that had become supreme in the eastern world. The prophet addresses on this subject the neighbouring nations (vv. 1–11), Zedekiah the king (vv. 12–15), the priests (vv. 16–22) and prophets (28:1–16), and the exiles themselves (29:1–32).

27:1–22 The prophetic word

27:1–11 A message to neighbouring kings. In the time of Sennacherib, Hezekiah had headed a revolt in Palestine, now Zedekiah appeared to be a suitable leader for the nearby dissidents. The prophet utilized the ambassadors to convey the word of Yahweh to their pagan masters: their plot was futile, the Lord had spoken, no mere local deity but the Creator and Ruler of the world (cf. 10:11–13), and His prophet alone spoke the truth. 1 The date (cf. RSV mg.) is shown to be erroneous by v. 3; the scribe's eye may have slipped back to 26:1. See on 28:1. 6 My servant; cf. 25:9.

27:12–15 A message to Zedekiah. This consists of an exhortation to the stubborn king to submit to Nebuchadrezzar and a declaration concerning the false prophets. The falsity of these prophets lies in the fact that they speak on their own initiative, with no higher source of information.

27:16–22 A message to the priests. This message too consists of an exhortation and a declaration. MT and LXX harmonize only in the common prophecy that the sacred vessels will be carried into captivity. It is too bold to insist that the shorter form as preserved in LXX is necessarily the original. 16 The vessels; i.e. Temple equipment carried away in 597 BC. Jeremiah countered the facile optimism of the false prophets with the word that they also would experience captivity. 18 From his assurance the prophet could issue such a taunt knowing that no response would be made. 22 'Man proposes, God disposes.'

28:1–17 An open challenge

This chapter shows large divergence between the MT and the LXX. Usually the differences are explained as expansions in the Hebrew of the terse form in the LXX. The chapter contains four speeches, two by Hananiah and two by Jeremiah.

28:1–4 Hananiah's prophecy. As here, the question is always crucial whether a prophet is true or false. Hananiah had heard Jeremiah proclaim exile for the rebellious nation. In fierce reply Hananiah said that Yahweh had spoken the contrary to him, and he symbolized that correction in the broken yoke (v. 4). 1 That same year. The Hebrew has a further confusion, glossed over by RSV (cf. AV, RV), and should probably be read, 'In that same year, in the fourth year of Zedekiah, in the fifth month . . .' and this date applied also to ch. 27. 2 I have broken. This refers to a fact determined upon by the Lord and therefore so certain of accomplishment that it may be said to have happened already.

28:5–9 Jeremiah's rejoinder. Jeremiah could say 'Amen' to Hananiah's words with sincerity, for the whole of his ministry aimed at the establishment of a prosperous Judah, yet he knew that it could not be so; only a change of heart would avert disaster. In addition, Hananiah's 'oracle' was alien to the tenor of earlier, recognized prophets (a test still valid when new teachings appear; cf. on 26:18). The principle was tragically clear; one might be utterly sincere and yet be damned.

28:10, 11 Hananiah's demonstration. Dramatically Hananiah demonstrated his point by breaking the yoke which he had taken from Jeremiah; so would Nebuchadrezzar's power be broken within 2 years. 11 Jeremiah went his way. Why did Jeremiah not answer immediately? Much has been written about this. However, the true prophet could not add to his earlier declaration 'when the word of that prophet comes to pass, then it will be known that the Lord has truly sent the prophet' (v. 9). The crowd must have been greatly impressed by Hananiah's message, and a further rebuttal by Jeremiah might have endangered his life.

28:12–17 Jeremiah's verification of his message. Were there any doubt of his possession of the truth in Jeremiah's mind, it was dispelled by this oracle. 13 I will make. Read 'you' with Hebrew; for Hananiah's encouragement could only inspire a greater fervour among the anti-Babylon party. 15, 16 Sent . . . remove (lit. 'send'; see RV). Claiming a fictitious divine commission, he was in fact to receive a more terrible one. 17 Two months or less elapsed between Hananiah's false prophecy and the fulfilment of Jeremiah's (cf. v. 1).

29:1–32 Directions for the exiles

A large contingent of captives had been carried to Babylon in 597 BC, among them Jehoiachin the king, his household, a company of priests and some prophets (2 Ki. 24:10–17). News reached Jeremiah that certain false prophets among the exiles were prophesying a speedy return to the land. Jeremiah wrote this letter lest the exiles be carried away by the superficial, non-factual optimism of Hananiah and his friends. Patience to await Yahweh's restoration would be the great factor and it should not be endangered by precipitate action. Faith in God's tomorrow is the great principle involved—patience with its expectancy, not the inertness of despair, nor the suicide of folly. In this message the prophet first addresses an exhortation and then makes a declaration. In his exhortation to the people (vv. 4–9) he tells them to carry on the normal activities of life as far as possible. The declaration which follows (vv. 10–32) includes four groups of people: those already in captivity (vv. 10–14), those about to follow them (vv. 15–19), the false prophets in Babylon, of whom two—Ahab and Zedekiah—are named (vv. 20–23), and Shemaiah (vv. 24–32).

7 Cf. Gn. 18:23–33; Mt. 5:13–16. 8 The dreams which they dream. MT is obscure, see RSV mg.; possibly 'your dreams which you encourage (them) to dream', i.e. they speak what the people want to hear (cf. Is. 30:9–11). 10 Cf. 25:11; 27:7. Seventy years is the horizon-limit.

Yahweh will give them a future (lit. 'a latter end') and a hope. Moreover, He is accessible to them even in Babylon (cf. Ezk. 11:14–17). 16–20 are omitted by LXX and by many commentators. While they are reminiscent of 24:1–10, they are not simply repetition. Their position here can be interpreted as a contradiction of the optimistic pronouncements of the false prophets. 22 For the punishment see Dn. 3. A word-play may be detected in curse (Heb. qᵉlālâ), roasted (Heb. qālām) and the name of Ahab's father Kolaiah.

29:24–32 Reaction to the letter. The word of the Lord provoked opposition which His prophet condemned. As Hananiah had died for 'rebellion' so would Shemaiah, nor would he live to see the proof of his error.

30:1 – 34:22 THE FUTURE HOLDS HOPE

Although chs. 30–33 appear to interrupt Baruch's biography of Jeremiah, 29:11–14, 32c introduce the theme of 'the good that I will do to my people'. Previously the prevailing tone of Jeremiah's prophecies has been of judgment, though from time to time a gleam of light has fallen upon the dark path of God's people (e.g. 12:15; 16:14, 15; 23:1–8; 24:6, 7). These chapters present a remarkable change. The atmosphere is still charged with judgment, but a clear sky is in view, and the message is one of hope. If we accept that chs. 30 and 31 were written at the same time as chs. 32, 33, or put in their present form at that time, it is important to realize that this was the very eve of the final collapse of Judah, Zedekiah's tenth year. What an extraordinary situation! Jeremiah is in prison, famine and pestilence rage in the city, and the Babylonian army is battering against the wall of Jerusalem. This was Judah's midnight hour and the people needed hope and comfort. In this dark hour God has a message for His people. The message is that the nation is not to perish. More than that, the time will come when even the Gentile nations will acknowledge God's truth, and when a righteous Branch will arise from the house of David whose name will be the Lord our righteousness.

The whole theme is germane to the spirit of Jeremiah. The section is possibly a collection of sayings, some given earlier in other circumstances (e.g. 31:2–6, 18–22 about Ephraim), and others, many would claim, added to suit the exiles' situation. Affinities of style are found with the latter part of Isaiah which has brought strength to the case for later additions, yet criteria of style are too elusive to yield firm conclusions. Both spirit and expression accord with Jeremiah.

30:1–24 The book of consolation

30:1–11 Restoration assured. The chapter opens with a declaration of the restoration (vv. 1–3). There must be discipline, but not final disaster (vv. 4–11). 2 Write. Cf. the earlier command, 36:2; also Is. 30:8. To give a message written form implies its fixity before God and certainty of fulfilment. 8, 9 What Hananiah sought symbolically to do, but without the right or the power to accomplish it (28:10, 11), Yahweh in His great mercy would yet perform. If vv. 8, 9 are treated as an expansion in prose on the theme of vv. 10 and 11 concerning the day of the Lord, alteration of the pronouns, as in RSV, is needless. David their king does not mean that David the son of Jesse will be raised from the dead; it refers to an ideal king of the house of David (cf. Ezk. 34:23; 37:24).

30:12–17 Wounded and healed. Israel's wounds have been dealt to her by Yahweh at the hands of a merciless enemy. They are the result of her iniquity (v. 15) and are incurable (vv. 12, 15). She has been deserted by all her associates, which helps to emphasize the hopelessness of her position on the human level. But 16, 17 introduce what is almost a paradox, as so often happens in Jeremiah: God orders the affairs of all, caring especially for His chosen people. Those who have spoiled Israel shall themselves be spoiled for their arrogance, and despised Israel's wounds shall be healed.

30:18–24 Restoration. Beyond exile there is home. There is a lilt in this section, as though spring was bursting out of severe winter. This is the equivalent of Is. 35, but in the imagery and spirit of Jeremiah. There shall be laughter and children (vv. 19, 20), and their overlord shall be their own kith and kin (v. 21), both king and priest with priestly access to God (v. 21b). Thus shall be fulfilled the great covenant promise (v. 22; cf. Gn. 17:7; Ex. 6:7; Lv. 26:11–13; Dt. 7:6; 2 Sa. 7:24). Thus the prophet envisages a fivefold restoration—health (v. 17), the land (v. 18), prosperity (vv. 18–20), an ideal king (v. 21), and God's fellowship (v. 22). 23, 24 Cf. 23:19, 20. The latter days; i.e. the fulfilment of these glowing promises is not yet, but reserved for the unspecified future.

31:1–40 Restoration and the new covenant

This whole chapter deals with the restoration, prosperity and peace of Israel—both kingdoms. Vv. 1–22 concern mainly the northern kingdom; vv. 23–26 the southern kingdom; vv. 27–40 both kingdoms. There is not a dark cloud on the horizon; the vision is bright and glorious.

31:1–6 Grace in the wilderness. Northern Israel (Ephraim) is to be restored, rebuilt and cultivated anew, and there is a predicted end to the schism between north and south in a common acknowledgment of Yahweh, the God of the whole nation (v. 6).

2, 3 The general sense of these verses is clear enough: the Lord delivered Israel from Pharaoh's sword (Ex. 14:6ff.) and bestowed grace on them in their wilderness days. This was but the token of everlasting love, which has continued in divine faithfulness until the time of writing. The actual translation of the verses is, however, problematical, as comparison of RSV with RV shows.

In v. 3 RV, retaining an unemended text (see RSV mg.), suggests a grumbling comment from Israel that all the Lord's love was confined to the far distant past, eliciting the divine reply that this is by no means the case, for His love is everlasting. From afar; i.e. from His heavenly dwelling (cf. Ex. 3:8a).

31:7–14 Joy in anticipation. Jeremiah envisages the journey home (vv. 7–9) followed by the joy of the redeemed community (vv. 10–14). 7 Chief; i.e. in the Lord's estimation. 8 Blind . . . lame . . . with child . . . travail. Four categories of people personally incapacitated from making such a journey are chosen in order to show that salvation is not by inherent personal vigour but entirely by the activity of God. 9 Weeping . . . consolations (read rather 'supplications' with mg.; the change is needless). Repentance is ever the way home. First-born; cf. Ex. 4:22: a son, not by any process of begetting as the heathen nations supposed themselves to spring from their gods, but by historical choice and personal redemption (cf. Jn. 1:12; Eph. 1:3–8).

31:15–17 Rachel comforted. An imaginative prophetic touch: Rachel in her grave weeping afresh over the exile of her sons Joseph and Benjamin. But the Lord wipes away her tears in the pledge of restoration. 15 Ramah. Cf. 40:1; Ramah was evidently an assembly point for the captains. The site is traditionally between Jerusalem and Bethlehem (cf. Mt. 2:18) but is often located at Ramah near Bethel (cf. 1 Sa. 10:2).

31:18–22 Conscience and prayer. The same prophetic intuition hears Ephraim awaking to the call of conscience, with the Lord parentally yearning over him. 18 Bring me back. The first move, leading to repentance, must be made by the Lord. Only the turned heart can turn. Cf. La. 5:21. 21 Set up waymarks; signposts or stones marking the road, essential in the desert, but here also an assurance to the departing exiles of the certainty of the return journey. 22 A woman protects a man. Many interpretations are offered, none without difficulty. Some suggest 'a female protects a warrior', implying a peaceful paradise. It may be that we are dealing with a proverb whose meaning has been lost.

31:23–26 Judah the blessed. When these better days come, Judah will be the blessed of the Lord. 26 The prophet seems to record here how sweet to his own heart this visionary dream had been.

31:27–30 The Lord the Re-creator. Once the suffering is over, the Lord will be intent again on re-creating His people. He is the Destroyer only in the face of evil; fundamentally He is the Creator. In the foreseen future day the wilful sinner will suffer the due reward of his deed (v. 29), and the old, fatalistic proverb, which, as popularly understood, was never true to OT thought, will be given the lie (cf. Ezk. 18:1–3). The 'solidarity' of family, tribe and nation (e.g. Nu. 16:26–33; Jos. 7:1–12) is thoroughly recognized throughout the OT but was never intended to mean that any given individual, or even a whole generation, was so immersed in the sins of the past that none could now repent or that fresh moral initiative was impossible. Jeremiah looks forward to new dimensions of divine dealing with the individual (see vv. 31–34) and in the light of this foresees the disappearance of a prevalent excuse for moral indolence.

31:31–34 The new covenant. In a passage of fundamental importance, Jeremiah explains one of the central points of unity of the Bible. The NT declares the advent and establishment of the new covenant, but the idea of a new covenant belongs to the OT. 31 A covenant, in the meaning intended here (cf. Gn. 6:18; 15:18; Ex. 2:24; 6:4–6, etc.), signifies God's pledge to save and keep a people for Himself. Jeremiah is envisaging God's saving purposes coming to a new fruition, and, indeed (see v. 34), their final form. Israel . . . Judah. The new covenant will be the means of the unity of the people of God, overcoming the schisms and enmities of the past. 32 Not like. Wherein lies the newness of the new covenant, as compared with the great covenant-making at Sinai (cf. Ex. 24:3–8)? They broke. This is the one feature of dissimilarity which Jeremiah notes: under the former covenant, the human element was not able to live up to the covenant stipulations, notwithstanding that the Lord was their husband. Here Jeremiah reverts to his favourite view of the covenant relation in terms of marriage (cf. 2:2, 3), and by declaring the Lord as the Husband he intends to note that there was no unfaithfulness on the divine side. The former covenant needs to be succeeded by the new covenant because of human frailty (cf. Dt. 5:28, 29).

33 What, then, will the Lord do? He must either reduce His demands until they are within the range of human powers, or else He must change the heart of men. It is to the latter that He commits Himself. My law. The law reflects the nature of God, and therefore is unchanging. God cannot reduce His standards without ceasing to be Himself, but now the whole inner constitution of men, their hearts, is to be fashioned by God to match the requirements of His law, and in this way the great covenant promise, I will be their God, and they shall be my people, will be fulfilled. 34 How will this come to pass? What act of God will make it possible? Jeremiah first stresses the individualism of the new covenant. Each of the people of God will have independent access to God and intimate dealings with Him, such as the verb know in the marriage-covenant context indicates (cf. Gn. 4:1). This will come to pass (note the explanatory force of the word for I will forgive) through a full and final dealing with sin. Iniquity . . . sin represent respectively the inner and outer aspects of sin, and therefore, together, the totality of it in the individual life. Remember no more is a forcible expression of the finality of God's act. In contrast with the ritual requirements of the Mosaic covenant which faced men with incessant reminders of their guilt (cf. Heb. 10:3), this new divine act will drive the forgiven sins even out of the mind of God, and that for ever (cf. Mi. 7:18–20; Heb. 10:10–18).

31:35–37 Permanence. Two pledges are seen here that Israel shall endure, the world itself being an illustration. The perseverance of Israel rests on the persistence of Yahweh (cf. Heb. 13:8).

31:38–40 The polluted converted. A prophecy, the realization of which, in one sense, Nehemiah was to see and in which he was to have a share. Jerusalem would be rebuilt (vv. 38, 39), the valley of Hinnom, polluted by Baal worship and refuse, would be purified, and the city and its environment would be made sacred for life and worship (v. 40). All prefiguring the glory of the eternal city of God, yet to be (cf. Rev. 21:9ff.).

32:1–44 A pledge of the promised future

The next two chapters are dated in the tenth year of Zedekiah (588/7 BC), i.e. a short time before the final collapse of Jerusalem (cf. 2 Ki. 25:1–3). But, in spite of the encircling gloom, the prophet maintained a steady and impressive optimism, not in the immediate deliverance of Jerusalem but in the final purposes of God. Topically this chapter is in place here; chronologically it follows chs. 37 and 38.

The chapter can be roughly divided into two parts. In the first the prophet of God is prominent; in the second the God of the prophet is prominent.

32:1–25 The prophet of God. We note three things about him: his imprisonment, his optimism and his supplication.

1–5 describe the prophet's imprisonment. This paragraph is actually an introduction to the next one. The enemy was besieging the city and the prophet was deemed too pro-Babylonian to be left at liberty. For his realistic vision they have no room either in mind or heart. 5 Until I visit him; visitation may mean either consolation or punishment. As it turned out, visitation in Zedekiah's case meant penalty (cf. 2 Ki. 25:7).

6–15 speak of the prophet's optimism. Jeremiah had stressed that there would be no total destruction, since Yahweh had resolved on a returning remnant to serve His unchanging purpose (e.g. 5:10, 18; 29:11–14; 31:8–14). The test on this point of faith came through his cousin Hanamel's offer to sell the field at Anathoth, now in possession of the enemy, according to the property law of Lv. 25:25. Jeremiah felt that the revelation known to him must also be experienced by the people; hence the care he took in drawing up and safeguarding the documents of transfer and purchase. He clearly expected some relation to benefit from his action in the future. The paragraph shows three stages involving Jeremiah and others; initiative taken by God (vv. 6, 7); action taken by Hanamel (v. 8); record taken by Baruch (vv. 9–15). 9 Seventeen shekels. Jeremiah evidently had ample funds even in prison, for this can be reckoned as about a year's wage. 11 The sealed deed . . . the open copy. The former was a detailed account folded up and sealed to prevent fraudulent alteration; the latter was an abstract or summary for ordinary consultation. Papyrus was the normal writing material. In classical history there is a similar record. When Hannibal the Carthaginian suddenly appeared within 3 miles of the gates of Rome in 211 BC, the field on which his camp stood was sold without difficulty in the Roman Forum (Livy xxvi. 11).

16–25 contain the prophet's prayer. He recollects the nature of God revealed in history (vv. 17–20), and the nature of God's people (vv. 21–23), scarcely believing that his recent purchase can really have validity. Omission of vv. 17b–23, advocated by many commentators, leaves the doubt of v. 25 without the firm-founded faith that balanced it.

32:26–44 The God of the prophet. God saw the perplexing thoughts of His servant and made a declaration concerning Judah's immediate fate, which is dark, and concerning Judah's ultimate fate, which is bright.

26–35 Judah's immediate fate was grim. The disease had advanced so far that a drastic operation was imperative. Jeremiah, as the voice of God Himself, reads out the history of His people, idolatrous the whole way through, hence the compulsion to discipline them unto righteousness. 27 stands as a reply to Jeremiah's wonderment (vv. 24, 25) at the rather incredible purchase which he has just made, and as a heading to the next two sections, vv. 28–35 depicting the coming judgment and vv. 36–44 the contrasting ultimate glory. God of all flesh expresses in general the Lord's sovereign sway as Creator, but in particular this sway as applied in the sphere of human life. In consequence of this almighty power nothing, whether judgment or restoration, is too hard for Him. 33 Persistently rather dulls the lustre of Jeremiah's vivid 'rising up early'; see RV.

36–44 Judah's ultimate fate was bright and glorious. Discipline there would be (v. 36), but it would not be final disaster. There would be a restoration of the people to the land (v. 37) and to the Lord (vv. 38–41), and there would be a restoration of the land to prosperity (vv. 42–44). 38 Cf. on 30:22. 39 I will give; the whole work of salvation, here viewed subjectively as touching heart and conduct (way), is the gift of God. One heart; i.e. the removal of 'double-mindedness' (cf. Jas. 1:6, 7); utter sincerity and singlemindedness towards God. This looks back to 31:33. One way; i.e. an outward life which is completely consistent. 40 I will put . . . that they may not turn. The preservation of the people of God equally depends on God (cf. v. 39).

33:1–26 Reiteration of restoration

This chapter continues the general theme of Israel's restoration and all that such a restoration will imply. The paragraph of vv. 14–26 is not found in the LXX; many regard it as an appendix of unknown origin. The theme of the chapter is a threefold restoration: the restoration of the people to the land; the restoration of the land to prosperity; the restoration of the Davidic king.

33:1–8 The restoration of the people to the land. These verses are dominated by the now familiar theme of the two acts of God: first, to overthrow Jerusalem in judgment, and secondly to restore and regenerate the people. But as a preface to this there is a reassuring word to Jeremiah (vv. 2, 3; cf. 32:27) that the Lord is over all. 2 Who made the earth adopts LXX reading; Hebrew 'who does it' is a general reference to the two-part plan of God as previously delineated (32:28–35, 36–44). Either way—whether by claiming sovereignty in general as Creator or in particular (cf. RV) as Master Planner—the words reassure concerning the divine control of history. 3 The same truth is emphasized with reference to the source of all knowledge in the mind of God. The Lord invites Jeremiah to supplicate for further revelation, thus implying that earthly events originate in the predetermined will of God. 8 I will cleanse. The truth of 31:34 continues to live with Jeremiah.

33:9–13 The restoration of the land to prosperity. These verses present a very striking contrast between what was and what would be, what the land had become through the sin of man, and what it would become through and by the mercy of God. Instead of desolation there would be prosperity; instead of sorrow, joy; the people in their homes, prosperity in the land, joy in their hearts, and praise in the Temple. One other thing would be needed to complete the happy picture, an ideal king, and to such an ideal king the next paragraph introduces us.

33:14–26 The restoration of the Davidic king. The whole forecast of a blessed future is made to rest on this one fundamental promise: the coming great descendant of David, the Messianic King. The promise to God's people will be kept (v. 14), but in a proper sequence of events: first, the promised Ruler (v. 15) and then the saved and secure people (v. 16). These promises are now affirmed in order: the promise of the king, associated with the Levitical priesthood (vv. 17–22); the promise of the preservation of the people (vv. 23–26).

15 Righteous is a frequent Messianic attribute, e.g. Is. 11:4, 5; 53:11. Branch; see on 23:5f. 16 The Lord is our righteousness was earlier the title of the king (23:6) but here of the city. As a name for the king it means that he is the source of righteousness for his people (cf. Is. 53:11; see on Ps. 24:5); as a name for the city it means that the most striking characteristic of the people of God is that they have been made the recipients of this righteousness (cf. Is. 54:17 (RSV, 'vindication'); Phil. 3:9). 17, 18 The linking of king and priest is a feature of the references to the Messianic Branch, see references at 23:5; the union of the offices was fulfilled in the Lord Jesus. 20 Covenant with the day (also v. 25). The OT teaches that one day follows another, not by any automatic sequence or natural necessity, but by deliberate divine will and faithfulness (cf. Gn. 8:22).

34:1–22 King and people addressed

34:1–7 A message to King Zedekiah. In this message the prophet first makes a declaration to the effect that both the capital and the king will be delivered into Nebuchadrezzar's hands. Nebuchadrezzar, king of Babylon, will enter Jerusalem as victor, and Zedekiah, king of Judah, will enter Babylon as the vanquished. 4, 5 To the declaration the prophet adds a consolation; Zedekiah will not be killed, he will even have a ceremonial funeral, in captivity. 7 The Lachish Letters, dispatches written at this moment, vividly illuminate the situation (cf. NBD, art. 'Lachish').

34:8–22 A message to the people. When the city's danger came to a head in the siege, the king induced his people by solemn oath to emancipate their Hebrew slaves in the hope that such an action would effect God's blessing. When the siege was temporarily lifted by the Egyptian allies this solemn pledge was broken and the slaves were forcibly brought again into servitude. Such circumstances were the background to this prophetic message. The action of the people was a breach of faith with the 'law of release' (Dt. 15:12). It was also a profanation of the name of God, since they had pledged their action in His name. Not only had the people broken God's law but also their own promise, adding perjury to treachery. 14 At the end of six years. MT 'seven years' (see RSV mg.) follows Dt. 15:1, and should be retained here for it denotes the completion of the cycle, the enslavement lasting only six years, as stated. The prophet declared that the people would be removed (vv. 17–21), and that the enemy would return (v. 22). He saw at once that such a breach of faith invited the retribution of Yahweh. As they had perjured themselves by such an action and had riveted bondage again upon Hebrew kith and kin, so Yahweh would lift from them His own protection, with the result that they themselves would become slaves under such ruthless masters as sword, pestilence and famine, until their condition would become 'a horror to all the kingdoms of the earth' (v. 17). 18 The calf. Contracts were solemnized by the dividing of an animal as an unspoken curse (cf. 1 Sa. 11:6, 7) that retribution of similar nature should befall whoever broke the agreement (cf. Gn. 15:9–20).

35:1 – 36:32 PROPHECIES AND EVENTS DURING JEHOIAKIM'S REIGN

In these two chapters we return again to the reign of Jehoiakim. In time sequence they follow ch. 26 but other reasons have led to their present positioning. Ch. 35 is some time later than ch. 36; cf. 35:11.

35:1–19 The lesson from the Rechabites

35:1–11 The prophet and the Rechabites. The prophet is instructed by God (vv. 1, 2) to go to the encampment of the Rechabites, to bring them (or probably their representatives) into one of the chambers in the Temple, and to give them wine to drink. Jonadab had been the ancestor of the Rechabites, and to meet, as a nomad, the Baal-worship associated with the settled agriculturist and city dweller, he had disciplined his folk to forswear vine-culture and house-building, forbidding thereby the drinking of wine (cf. the events of his age, 2 Ki. 10). They were to maintain the austerity of nomad life. As a Kenite tribe they had thrown in their lot with Israel. The advent of the Babylonians had driven them into the city.

Jeremiah does what he is bidden to do (vv. 3–5), and the Rechabites' reaction (vv. 6–11) is that, to a man, the people refused to drink wine.

35:12–19 The prophet and the people. That action the prophet had foreseen, and he now used it to show by way of contrast the practice of Judah. In vv. 12–15 we have the prophet's expostulation; this is followed by a declaration (vv. 16,17), which in turn leads to the pronouncement of blessing upon Jonadab's house (vv. 18, 19). 14 I have spoken is emphatic, putting in strong contrast the success of Jonadab with his people and the failure of Yahweh with His. The Rechabites' constancy in obeying ancestral custom, rather than their way of life, is their merit.

36:1–32 The writing of the scroll

This fascinating chapter is one of the very few indications we have of how the Scriptures achieved permanent written form. We may take it that God in His providence caused this one incident to be recorded in order to teach us of the sort of procedure which underlies all the prophetic books. In the main sections of the narrative three cardinal truths stand out: firstly (v. 4), the miraculous identity of the three sets of words: those intimated by the Lord, those spoken by Jeremiah and those written by Baruch; secondly (v. 18), the accuracy of the transfer of the word from the prophet's mind and mouth to its written form; and thirdly (vv. 23, 29–31, 32) the steadfastness with which the Lord stands by His word once given: it cannot be turned aside; on the contrary it is enforced, enlarged, and at the appropriate time fulfilled.

36:1–26 The first writing. In the fourth year of Jehoiakim (605/4 BC) God commanded the prophet to make a more permanent record of his public utterances (cf. Is. 8:16; 30:8), with a view to securing repentance in the hearts of the people (vv. 1–3). In response to His divine command Jeremiah secured the services of his associate, Baruch, and he recorded what the prophet dictated (v. 4). For whatever reason—political or spiritual—Jeremiah was debarred from going to the house, and bade Baruch act as his deputy (v. 5). His purpose in all this was that Judah should return from her evil way before judgment fell (vv. 6–8).

On a certain feast day some months later (December 604 BC), Baruch read the scroll to a large concourse of people, and we may well imagine the consternation the message caused (vv. 9, 10). Micaiah, who was present and heard what Baruch read, gave an abstract of the threatening nature of Jeremiah's prophecy to the princes of Judah (vv. 11–13). On questioning, Baruch, who had been summoned to appear before the princes with the scroll, replies that he had written the scroll at Jeremiah's dictation (vv. 14–19). The whole matter is reported to the king (vv. 20–26). Thus on one day there seem to have been three readings of the scroll—before the people, before the princes, and before the king. The inference, therefore, is that the scroll could not have been very lengthy, or that Baruch read extracts. When the matter was reported to the king, he must have felt that it was a state affair. As soon as a few columns were read, his anger was immediate, and against the intercession of the princes he flung them into the fire. The king next commanded that the prophet and his scribe be apprehended, but in vain, for 'the Lord hid them' (v. 26). Jeremiah had insisted on subordination to Babylon, and this was soon forced upon Jehoiakim, but the king would not acknowledge this as the Lord's will and concentrated on a contrary policy (cf. 2 Ki. 24). This strong reaction of the king seemingly banished the fear of the princes, roused as they had been by the private reading of the scroll. None appreciated that 'the word of the Lord abides for ever'.

36:27–32 The rewriting of the scroll. Prophecy, other than false, has seldom come to heel at a king's threat. Times without number the prophets of Israel had as part of their duty the discipline of king and court (e.g. 2 Sa. 12:1; Is. 7:1–17). So in this instance. The burning of the scroll brought but a quickened sense that a second must be written, with necessary additions, including an indication of the fate awaiting the impious king. God will have the final word. Nowhere else does prophecy provide so clear a description of its recording. The details are valued as historical evidence, the whole as revealing the purpose behind the prophecy. The first scroll might have brought repentance in the present by the cumulative force of 20 years' oracles (v. 3), the second was for the future, not to be read then and there. The written Word has relevance beyond its primary speaking, it is authoritative, and its origin, as man's, is with God. 30 His dead body; cf. 22:19.

37:1 – 39:18 PROPHECIES AND EVENTS DURING ZEDEKIAH'S REIGN

In these three chapters the emphasis first falls upon the prophet and his captivity (chs. 37–38), and then upon the king and his captivity (ch. 39).

37:1 – 38:28 The prophet's incarceration and preservation

37:1–10 A royal question and a prophetic answer. Zedekiah had been set on the throne and given a new name as vassal of Babylon. His own instability, coupled with court intrigue prompted by Egyptian agents, made him disloyal to his master. In religion, too, he evinced no loyalty, clutching for any aid without trusting wholly to it. He was a kingly Reuben unstable in all his ways (Gn. 49:3, 4). 3 Pray for us. Zedekiah had hopes of deliverance from the armies of Babylon, seeing only the immediate events. 5 The advance of Egyptian troops temporarily raised the siege; 9, 10 but the answer to the king's prayer simply reaffirmed Jeremiah's consistent burden of inevitable doom.

37:11–15 Arrest of the prophet. During the relief Jeremiah attempted to leave the city to attend to some property in his family. This was prior to his purchase of land from Hanamel (cf. 37:21; 32:2). The alert guard-officer arrested him on suspicion of desertion, a course advocated by the prophet (cf. 21:9; 38:2), and adopted by some (cf. 38:19). 16 Dungeon cells. Apparently make-shift quarters in the underground cisterns of Jonathan's house (v. 15). Ellison comments that there must have been widespread opposition to the ruling party to require extra prison accommodation. 17 Zedekiah still had some regard for Jeremiah, whatever his advisers told him, but he had not the faith to bring forth any more helpful prophecy than the blunt, You shall be delivered into the hand of the king of Babylon. Jeremiah's word had been verified by events, yet he was being treated as a traitor. 21 Zedekiah appreciated the truth of the prophet's claims enough, at least, to move him to better quarters and give him food. Bread may have run out weeks before the end of the siege (cf. 52:6).

38:1–6 Jeremiah is silenced. Some suggest that this chapter is a different version of the earlier events in 37:11–21. The same elements are in it: similarity of question and answer, of confinement in cisterns, of release and guard-court imprisonment. Yet the differences are considerable: the reasons for restraint, the demand for execution, the conditions of, and in, Jeremiah's answer to the king, and its setting. Jeremiah was a 'thorn in the flesh' of the king's council, it would not be surprising if he should have suffered more than one imprisonment for his consistently gloomy remarks!

1–3 Jeremiah presents the issue squarely before the people, who doubtless were able to converse with him in the busy guards' court. 4 In the eyes of the princes, however, who bore the burden of the city's welfare and survival against attack, Jeremiah's counsel of surrender to the enemy meant a weakening of morale amounting to treason. In our own time men have been executed for similar attitudes and statements. It has never been, probably never will be, easy to establish in political quarters the priority of religious principle and vision over statecraft. The mistake the princes made was due to their failure to see that Jeremiah spoke with an authority above his own person and mind. He stood, under that authority, for the better welfare of his people, in that he stood for the divine discipline of their sin, leading on to a truer and finer life. Exile was inevitable and essential to root idolatry out of their mind and spirit. The Babylonians were the unconscious agents of Yahweh's will. How hard it is for men who have never shared such vision to accept a message of this kind. Often the history of man supplies illustrations of political expediency silencing the prophetic voice. Thus the princes, on the ground of statecraft, silenced Jeremiah, even to the extent of ordering his execution. This they did not accomplish, but they brought sufficient pressure upon Zedekiah to stop him from interfering in their imprisonment of Jeremiah in a cistern with a deep layer of mire at the bottom, whence his voice would not be heard, and where he would starve to death. This appears to have been Jeremiah's third imprisonment.

38:7–13 Jeremiah is saved. Ebed-melech, a royal Ethiopian slave-eunuch, had the faith and courage to intercede with Zedekiah to lift the prophet out of the cistern, and re-lodge him in the guard-court—the fourth imprisonment, reckoned by number of changes. Altogether these changes strike a strong note of providence (cf. 36:26). The Lord turns to good account the vacillation of Zedekiah, has at the ready a slave (taken into slavery under circumstances unknown to us) who has risen in royal esteem for such a time as this (cf. Est. 4:14b); and, on the day the greatest of the Benjaminites (1:1) is in need, the king is found in the 'Benjamin Gate' as if waiting to hear his case. Ebed-melech was promised safety when the Babylonians took Jerusalem (39:15–18).

38:14–26 Jeremiah is interviewed by Zedekiah. The desperate king again summons the prophet and swears on oath that he shall not be put to death for being candid. The prophet therefore puts before him the dread alternatives. Either go out in surrender to the Babylonians or suffer the worst when the city is captured and set on fire. Zedekiah expresses his fear of mockery if he does so surrender—the unhappy word of a weak, unstable mind. That had been the inner tragedy of Zedekiah: he could not implement in action what his own mind acknowledged as wise and sound. 22 On that Jeremiah utters a dirge in which the king is put in the position he so recently occupied (cf. v. 6). 23 is an extra emphasis, MT having 'thou shalt burn this city' for the last phrase. RSV follows the LXX, Syriac, Vulgate and Targum, in giving passive sense. Although this may be preferred, nevertheless it was Zedekiah's indecision and lack of courage that actually brought about the ghastly result. Quite frequently it is not positive evil that does most harm, but the weakness of an otherwise good man. Zedekiah wins our sympathy through pity roused at the massacre of his family and his own blindness (2 Ki. 25:7), but it is at the cost of respect.

38:27, 28 Jeremiah is questioned by the princes. Zedekiah pledges Jeremiah to silence as to the purport of the interview, and Jeremiah with a half-truth allays the suspicions of the princes. The truth would have betrayed the king and most likely ended Jeremiah's career. 'Sin among men often creates positions where there is no perfect solution or way out' (Ellison).

39:1–18 The collapse of Jerusalem and the captivity of Judah

39:1–3 The collapse of the city. The last hour had arrived. For some eighteen months the city had held out against the might of Babylon, but the inevitable hour could not be postponed indefinitely. Weakened by a long and merciless siege without and decimated by famine within, Jerusalem surrendered. Some difficulty attends the explanation of these verses and the following. 1, 2 appear as an insertion (cf. RV); 4 Saw them is strange if referring to the officers and could be an error for 'saw it', i.e. the 'breach . . . made in the city'. 3 Nergal-sharezer . . .; cf. v. 13, which implies confusion here. Most scholars read 'Nergal-sharezer, prince of Simmagir, the Rabmag; Nebushazban, the Rabsaris, with all the rest . . .'

39:4–8 The capture of the king. Though he had to give up the city, Zedekiah had not yet given up hope of life. With the few defenders who were left he escaped and made his way towards Jericho. But the hour of judgment had come for him and flight was impossible. He was overtaken near Jericho and then taken to Riblah to Nebuchadrezzar. Judgment was meted out to him and his family. His fate was a cruel one (vv. 6, 7).

39:9, 10 The captivity of the people. This was the final captivity of Judah. In 597 BC King Jehoiachin and part of Jerusalem had been carried away; now, 11 years later, the rest of the city followed suit. But not quite. 10 A small remnant, the poor people, are left behind to make a new start.

39:11–14 The release of the prophet. Judgment was given to the king of Judah, captivity to the remnant of Jerusalem, the country to the poor of the land, and freedom to Jeremiah the prophet. Such was Babylon's dealing with Judah. Jeremiah was set free and is given into the generous care of Gedaliah, the son of a friend, to take him home.

39:15–18 The message to Ebed-melech. This is an appendix to ch. 39, which was concerned to continue the narrative of Jeremiah and Zedekiah to its completion, the words refer to 38:7–13. As Ebed-melech rescued the prophet from death through starvation and the foulness of the cistern, so he would be preserved from his enemies (the princes, or the Babylonians to whom he might appear an Egyptian agent?), cf. Mt. 25:34–40. 18 A prize of war; cf. on 21:9.

40:1 – 43:7 PROPHECIES AND EVENTS IN JUDAH

The prophecies to and events among the remnant left behind by the Babylonians clearly fall into two parts: those taking place in Judah (chs. 40–42) and those taking place in Egypt (chs. 43, 44).

40:1–6 The release of the prophet

Jeremiah had remained in Jerusalem and was rounded up and put in fetters with others destined for deportation to Babylon. The watchful providence of God over the hard-pressed prophet is seen in the timely discovery of their error, and Jeremiah was released on arrival at Ramah on the authority of the Babylonian commander. Clearly information had been lodged with this officer as to the identity of Jeremiah and his king's will concerning him. He is given the choice of going to Babylon with promise of the king's special favour, or going where he would. 5 suggests that that second alternative would be to remain with Gedaliah. The first phrase of this verse is omitted from the LXX, and no clear emendation of the Hebrew is feasible. However, his choice is his own, a liberty granted to no-one else in Judah. 2, 3 need not be attributed to a Jewish writer, for such sentiments were normal among the ancients; they are spoken of the people as a whole, not of the prophet. The contrast is that all Jeremiah's work was in the name of Yahweh; on the other hand, he did yeoman service to the Babylonian cause, and his release was his reward.

40:7–12 The return of the fugitives

Gedaliah was now governor of the land, and his new task, now that the leading men had been taken into exile, was to see that farmers and peasantry settled down amicably to secure the harvest out of which the tribute money would be paid to their new masters, the Babylonians. Hence a phase of that new task would be to come to terms with the military forces scattered in the countryside, displaced garrisons, bands of deserters and so forth. That Gedaliah was a Jew would be a great factor in their pacification. His initial words (vv. 9, 10) were such as to win a measure of confidence and loyalty. His sane and cordial policy was underscored by what is reported in v. 12.

40:13–16 The warning of a plot

Gedaliah was the soul of honour, but unfortunately for him one of the escaped leaders, Ishmael, had been suborned by the Ammonite king, Baalis, to overthrow Gedaliah's policy and effect his murder. Johanan, another leader, was aware of this plot, but Gedaliah felt it was too foul to be substantial. Seemingly Gedaliah had overlooked two congruent factors: first, that Ishmael was of the royal house of David, and hence his superior in status. A slight thrown upon Ishmael may thus have created something of jealousy upon which Baalis was able to play. The other factor may have been that in Ishmael's eyes Gedaliah was a traitor to the cause by assuming this post under the Babylonians. Like many other high-souled men in history, before and after his time, Gedaliah lacked the ability to sift the spirit of treachery from that of loyalty, and thereby paved the way for the assassin's stroke.

41:1–9 The execution of the plot

1 Seventh month is to be understood as in the same year ('the eleventh year of Zedekiah', 39:2). The deadly nature of Ishmael's proffer of loyalty is seen in that he used the normally sacred hour of eastern hospitality to carry out the murder. Both Jews and Chaldeans who formed Gedaliah's bodyguard were wiped out by Ishmael's men. One marvels at Ishmael's lack of insight, since Gedaliah's death was a major loss to his people, but jealousy and suspicion blind and brutalize. A murderer has usually no scruples regarding life, and in vv. 4–9 we have a ruthless example of it, an action intended to prevent news of the uprising from spreading. The pilgrims were bringing meal and vegetable offerings to the site of Jerusalem on which the ruined Temple had stood. Their shaven beards and rent garments and gashed bodies symbolized their distress over the desecration and destruction of the house of God.

6 The spirit of murder is often also accompanied by that of hypocrisy (cf. 2 Ki. 10:6–9), as here in Ishmael's weeping as he came. Greed of gain also marks such a character. Ten of the pilgrims saved themselves by revealing a cache of valuable food supplies. It is remarkable that so slight a force, eleven men in all, was able to butcher seventy out of eighty men, surprise possibly being the explanation. 9 MT permits 'whom he had slain because of Gedaliah' but LXX is generally followed here, as RSV. The reference to Asa recalls that he built this cistern to supply his garrison at Mizpah with water (cf. 1 Ki. 15:22).

41:10 The abduction of the remnant

The uselessness of all these murders is shown by the fact that Ishmael had to flee to Ammon, taking captive with him the rest of the refugees in Mizpah entrusted to the oversight of Gedaliah, including, it is assumed, Jeremiah and Baruch. The king's daughters presumably refers to some relationship, direct or indirect, to the royal house.

41:11–18 The rescue of the remnant

Johanan was as prompt in his pursuit of the murderers as he had been in warning Gedaliah against them. Though he failed to capture Ishmael, he secured the release of his prisoners. 16 Soldiers appears to be at variance with what is in v. 3, viz. Ishmael's slaughter of them at Mizpah. Probably we should read 'men, and women, and children' as in 43:6. Fear dissipates sound judgment, especially if, as here, it follows the murder of so important a leader as Gedaliah. 17 Presumably at the caravanserai (Geruth; see RV mg.) of Chimham the final intention was argued out that to go to Egypt would be safer for them than to remain and undergo examination by the Babylonians later on.

42:1–6 The remnant consults Jeremiah

1 There is confusion in MT and LXX over the names; RSV harmonizes with 43:2.

4 Jeremiah must have been gravely exercised in mind over this request, since his word I will keep back nothing from you is impressive. His hesitation, however, was met by the promise that they would abide by Yahweh's command, for on such obedience they felt their welfare rested. 5 Indeed, according to this verse, they invoked His judgment if they broke troth: the Lord be a true and faithful witness against us.

42:7–22 Jeremiah's message to the remnant

For ten days Jeremiah remained silent, but when at last he spoke he left no doubts in the minds of the people who had consulted him as to what God's message was. He began with an exhortation and assurance. They had nothing to fear from the Babylonians, and if they stayed in the land God would prosper them (vv. 7–12). Following the exhortation to remain in the land comes a solemn word of warning (vv. 13–18). Refusal to follow the divine leading involves the divine displeasure with all its dire consequences. There will be no safety in Egypt; a similar calamity to that which had overtaken their city would overtake them in Egypt. But the prophet already knew what the mind of the people would be, he had long and hard experience of them, and expostulated with the men who had asked him to inquire of Yahweh (vv. 19–21). The prophet's message ended with a solemn declaration (v. 22).

43:1–7 The rejection by the remnant of God's word

The leaders of the remnant presumably listened in silence to Jeremiah until he had finished and then gave their considered reply. Their self-assurance was such that they could reject the prophet's words, despite their earlier guarantee (42:5, 6), believing him to be little more than a Babylonian propagandist. Their prayer (42:3) was shown to be utterly insincere when the answer was not what they wanted. 2 Thus they merit the epithet insolent, better rendered 'presumptuous', as ranking themselves above God's word or authority. There is a small textual problem in that MT has 'saying to Jeremiah' (cf. AV, RV), an abnormal form and perhaps erroneous. 3 Baruch evidently argued against flight to Egypt before Jeremiah spoke. 5 Who had returned; cf. 40:11, 12. The company followed the lead of Johanan and not of Jeremiah. 7 Tahpanhes is now Defenneh, an Egyptian frontier town on the Palestine road (cf. 2:16).

43:8 – 44:30 PROPHECIES AND EVENTS IN EGYPT

43:8 – 44:14 Jeremiah's message to the remnant

This is Jeremiah's first recorded message to the remnant in Egypt. It is in four parts:

43:8–13 An announcement of what Nebuchadrezzar would do in Egypt. Jeremiah, carried to Egypt, whether by pressure from his compatriots or of his own volition, continued his ministry of warning there. He again illustrated his message. 9 Pharaoh's palace; read 'Pharaoh's house' with AV and RV. It was an administrative building or a fortress. The pavement could be a large brick paving which archaeologists have uncovered at the site (see NBD, art. 'Tahpanhes'). These men of Judah had fled from Nebuchadrezzar to find, as they thought, secure shelter in Egypt. 10 But all was in vain, since Nebuchadrezzar would conquer that land and upon the stones there hidden build his throne. The stones, then, represented Babylon, and the mortar Egypt. Egypt now appeared strong and hid Babylon for the moment from the eyes of the fugitives, 'but soon the mortar will vanish, and the hard stones, the Babylonian Empire will be set up in Egypt in the presence of these very men who are striving to escape from it'. This is in accordance with the LXX and Syriac approved reading 'he shall set up' (v. 10). Earlier Jeremiah had been silent at their word, and now they are silent at his; it is the silence of a new fear as they hear this note of dark destiny. A fragmentary inscription confirms the fact that Nebuchadrezzar invaded Egypt in 568 BC, Amasis then being pharaoh, and overthrew its defenders. 12 He shall clean. Note the change from AV, RV; the figure is of a shepherd removing lice. 13 Heliopolis; the Hebrew has Beth Shemesh, 'house of the sun', adding which is in the land of Egypt to distinguish it from Beth Shemesh in Palestine. The Egyptian city was called On (Gn. 41:45, etc.) and was the centre of sun-worship, celebrated with tall pillars. It lay 10 miles north-east of Cairo.

44:1–6 A reminder of what God had done in Judah. The clash of opinion was fierce. Jeremiah thrust upon the minds of the Jews then in Egypt the truth that penalty always interlocks with sin. They had burned incense to the 'queen of heaven' (Astarte, the 'Great Mother' of antiquity), and thereby the anger of Yahweh had overtaken the land of Judah. 1 Migdol . . . Tahpanhes . . . Memphis . . . Pathros. The first three are in Lower Egypt, north of Cairo; Pathros signifies Upper Egypt from Cairo to Aswan, and papyri of a century later give us a picture of a Jewish colony at Aswan. The message was for them all.

44:7–10 A rebuke for what the remnant was doing. In spite of all God's judgments, in spite of the many red lights of their history, the remnant had gone blindly ahead, ignoring the warnings of the past.

44:11–14 Judgment upon the remnant. The message which the prophet had to proclaim for so many years to the nation as a whole, he had now to proclaim to the small remnant in Egypt. Judgment would be their lot just as it was the lot of Jerusalem; from it there would be no escape. 14 Some fugitives. Ellison thinks this refers to men who reached Egypt at an earlier stage and were not under a curse as were Johanan's party. A parallel may be seen in the future prophesied for the earlier group of exiles in Babylonia (cf. v. 29).

44:15–19 The remnant's response

Nothing the prophet said could break their obduracy for they believed that their troubles resulted from the suppression of idolatry by Josiah; before his time, under Manasseh, they had prospered, adoring the queen of heaven. Women were prominent opponents because that cult had an especial appeal to them, but all shared in it (cf. 7:18). 15 In Pathros in the land of Egypt. No good grounds exist for deleting this phrase; it describes in general the people who had spread farther south now come together for some unstated purpose.

44:20–30 Jeremiah's final message

This is the prophet's last recorded message, and it is as realistic and relevant as any. The remnant were determined to count other deities as equal with Yahweh, not to reject Him for another but to compromise Him. The papyri from Elephantine (cf. NBD, art. 'Papyri and Ostraca') reveal the extent this syncretism had reached four generations later. Jeremiah went so far as to say that so dire would Yahweh's answer be to such a denial of His presence and action that, on account of such worship, His name would disappear from the mouth of every man of Judah dwelling in Egypt (v. 26). The nemesis of idolatry is that in the end a remnant shall escape to know whose word stands fulfilled—His or theirs (v. 28). As a sign, even Pharaoh, whose protection they had sought, would fall into the hands of his enemies. Herodotus (ii.161) records the fall of this monarch. He was put to death c. 568 BC, 2 years after his dethronement. Amasis was pharaoh in 568/7 BC when Nebuchadrezzar attacked Egypt.

This whole chapter reveals the realism of Jeremiah, based on his insight, compared with the superficial inferences of two fellow-countrymen. They argued that, in the pre-reformation, when they worshipped the Asherah, fortune favoured them; since then disaster covered the land. It was the wrath of the 'Great Mother'. To Jeremiah it was the disciplinary work of God. Although he might not see the day, Jeremiah was confident that God was in control of His creation. With this chapter also ends Baruch's biography of Jeremiah. History has left no trace of what happened to the prophet after the encounter with the remnant related in this scene.

45:1–5 JEREMIAH'S MESSAGE TO BARUCH

The date places this oracle at the time of Baruch's first copying of Jeremiah's speeches (ch. 36). Like the oracle to Ebed-melech (39:15–18), it is placed after the main story, as an appendix to the history of Jeremiah and Judah. Baruch was stricken with sorrow, perhaps at the words of doom dictated to him, perhaps at the unpopularity of his master reflected upon him, despite his faithful hard work. He was reminded that Yahweh's sorrow vastly exceeded his own, for He was demolishing His own construction; how, then, could Baruch seek his own, individual, well-being? Enough that in the end he will win through the disaster that has overtaken the rebellious and the impious. God's gift of bare life is adequate. The you of v. 5 is emphatic.

46:1 – 51:64 PROPHECIES AGAINST FOREIGN NATIONS

In the LXX these chapters follow 25:13, and are in a different order. Here they move from west to east, with Babylon, the final enemy, last. Undeniably many of these oracles belong at 25:13, both historically and by formal comparison with the arrangement of Isaiah and Ezekiel. However, the Ebed-melech and Baruch oracles (39:15–18; 45:1–5) have shown already that a certain type of saying is relegated to an appendix to avoid interruption of the main themes. This position is tenable equally for these oracles. How much or little of this material was added to Jeremiah's own messages is debated; fuller commentaries supply details. As elsewhere, it can be maintained that Jeremiah's spirit and hand are pertinent here, where some of Jeremiah's finest poetry is found. The prophet was not only concerned with the lot of his own people in the currents of world politics, but also proclaimed that God is always at work among all the nations.

46:1–28 Against Egypt

The date of this oracle is 605 BC. Egypt was Israel's ancient enemy and now proving a 'broken reed of a staff' (2 Ki. 18:21).

46:1–12 The battle of Carchemish. Egypt's ambition was checked and humbled at the battle of Carchemish. This was one of the most decisive battles of history, on which bitter field the dream of Pharaoh Necho of Egypt crashed into ruin (2 Ki. 24:7). Perhaps given just before the fight, the verses first thrill as the spirit of an exultant army confronts the foe on the eve of battle; then comes the panic of a smitten army as it breaks up in flight. As nowhere else, perhaps, these verses reveal the insight of Jeremiah's mind as it bears on political implications of his day, revealing also the sanity and clarity of his thinking. He sees in the Babylonian crown prince, Nebuchadrezzar, the will and the force to overthrow the impinging enemies of Israel, Egypt included. Thus the line of Yahweh's will lay clear—peace must be made with him as Yahweh's new and strange scourge of nations. It is a day of Yahweh, a day of His vindication. 9 Egypt's army included many foreign corps (cf. v. 21). Put; the ancient name of Libya. Lud; Lydia in W Turkey whence Egypt drew mercenaries (cf. Is. 66:19; Ezk. 30:5).

46:13–26 Missing the flood-tide. With piercing insight Jeremiah saw that the overthrow at Carchemish left Egypt open to later invasion. Behind that Egyptian collapse, on foreign soil and on home soil, Jeremiah saw the will and act of God. This oracle may have followed closely after the battle of Carchemish, or belong a year or two later, even as late as chs. 43, 44. 14 These are places in Lower Egypt; cf. 44:1. 15 RSV follows LXX, redividing MT nisḥap̄ (RV 'swept away') into nās ḥap̄ (RSV has Apis fled). Apis, sacred bull, was an incarnation of Osiris. 17 Call the name. A minor repointing; MT has 'they called'. The pharaoh was an empty vessel; he was 'found wanting' (cf. 1 Cor. 13:1). 18 Like Tabor; i.e. Nebuchadrezzar towering above all others. Pharaoh must yield before him, even as other mountains must yield in majesty to Tabor and Carmel. 20 Gadfly; a touch of imagery for the Babylonian attack, descriptive of a biting charge causing wild flight. Has come upon her follows LXX and Syriac in a slight change of MT. In the crucial hour of battle, Egypt's mercenaries are but as calves in the hands of the butcher.

22–24 Here we have an effective contrast, a sound of an incredible weakness where the roar as of a lion is necessary: the snake, Egyptian symbol of royalty, creeping back into its hole. The hiss of enmity is ineffective, as the Babylonians come on as an army of woodcutters levelling Egypt as a forest appointed for timber felling. 25, 26 A summary of the oracles against Egypt. She would be given over to the Babylonian entirely, and so would those who trusted in Egypt. Yet there would be a restoration in some measure. 25 Amon; the chief deity of Upper Egypt.

46:27, 28 A message of comfort. These verses are a repetition of 30:10, 11, a note more in line with the thought and style of Isaiah than Jeremiah. It has been suggested that in both places they may be an addition. The main argument against their validity here is that they assume the captivity as having already taken place. But it is quite in keeping with Jeremiah's thought to look ahead and see the future as an accomplished fact. So certain was he of its fulfilment that he speaks of it as already fulfilled.

47:1–7 Against the Philistines

The Philistines were of course Israel's closest enemies. Their power had been considerably reduced in the days of David, but they apparently managed to maintain their nationhood until the days of the Babylonians. The day of their débâcle, then, is a phase of the day of Yahweh.

1 Before Pharaoh smote Gaza. Lack of evidence precludes absolute dating but the context fits well c. 605/4 BC. Necho's march northwards in 609 (2 Ki. 23:29) implies control at that date, but this town was liable to change hands easily. 2 Waters are rising. Waters sometimes signify calamities, and sometimes multitudes of people and nations. Here they signify both. The Babylonians out of the north would come as a mighty flood, and that would mean calamity as far as the Philistines are concerned. 4 Tyre and Sidon. Phoenicia, like Judah, inclined to Egypt, and apparently was allied with Philistia. Caphtor is Crete whence the Philistines came (cf. Am. 9:7). 5 Baldness suggests completion of disaster, as a sign of deep mourning, as does also the gash or cuttings in the flesh. Anakim, following LXX, may be no more than a guess by the translators, although they were connected with Philistines, Jos. 11:22. The Hebrew has 'imᵉqām, which, according to the use of the root 'mq in cognate languages, could well mean 'their strength'. The translation would then be, 'Ashkelon has perished, the remains of their strength.' The same word possibly occurs again in 49:4. 7 How can it be quiet . . . ? So read with LXX, Vulgate, Syriac, AV; RV had to read 'given thee a charge' next for congruence. Here is an antiphony: one voice (v. 6) is the bitter cry of the Philistines under the stroke of Yahweh, and the other (v. 7) is the prophetic intimation that the stroke is Yahweh's judgment.

48:1–47 Against Moab

The context of this group of oracles, and of those against Ammon and Edom, is not indicated. All three states apparently plotted with Judah against Babylon soon after Zedekiah's accession (cf. 27:1–3), and presumably fell to Nebuchadrezzar during the next decade.

The country of Moab was the elevated and rich plateau which lay east of the Dead Sea. After the Israelites conquered her northern territory (Jos. 13:15–32) there was frequent war for its possession and many cities reverted to Moab. (See NBD for locations of these cities.) The poetry is perhaps the most highly finished production of Jeremiah's writings. Parts of this chapter are adaptations of passages in Is. 15; 16.

48:1–10 Yahweh's judgment on Moab's god, Chemosh. The arrogance of Moab was founded on its god and its material strength, and thus the cities would fall and both god and priests be driven into exile (v. 7). 1 Nebo is the city, not the better-known mountain of the same name. The fortress. This is the meaning of the word which AV took as a place Misgab. 2 In Heshbon they planned. The Hebrew contains a play on the root ḥšb, 'plan'. Heshbon had been allotted to Reuben by Joshua. Madmen, another placename, is unidentified. Because it is based on the three Hebrew letters d-m-n, it is sometimes identified with the Dimon of Is. 15:9 (RSV mg.) and this in turn with Dibon (RSV). See on 48:18; NBD, art. 'Madmen'. Brought to silence; the appropriateness of this fate rests on a word-play, the Hebrew verb dāmam, to be silent, being somewhat assonantal with the name. 3–6 A variation of Is. 15:5 which aids interpretation of obscurities here. 4 Zoar. Cf. Is. 15:5; LXX involves only repointing of MT 'her little ones'. The place lay at the SE end of the Dead Sea, a border point of Moab. 5 They go up weeping; cf. Is. 15:5. 6 A wild ass. MT 'like Aroer' may play upon the place-name and the name of a desert bush. 7 Your strongholds. MT 'your works', i.e. achievements, remains a possible reading. 10 A curse is invoked upon any who might execute the Lord's anger on Moab but who hesitate in doing so. Cf. Dt. 7:1–5; 9:1–5; Jdg. 5:23; Mt. 5:29, 30.

48:11–17 A contrast in judgment. A distinct oracle in which Moab is masculine, whereas the feminine is employed in vv. 1–9. 13 Israel had trusted in the Bethel sanctuary in which Yahweh was represented by the golden bull, or deemed to mount thereon, but in vain. Moab had had an immunity from judgment, as wine that had not been changed from vessel to vessel to save it from contamination of the lees (i.e. dregs); but now in the judgment of exile Moab shall be ashamed of Chemosh, a god who in time of peril was impotence itself against the power of Yahweh, the living God. 15 The only clear meaning is that of spoliation. 17 You who are round about him; his neighbours, whose own security was linked with Moab's. Sceptre, staff are figures of strength and authority; both will disappear in the day of judgment.

48:18–25 The calamity of Moab. A picture of complete devastation, partly complementing vv. 3–9. 18 Dibon lay in the fertile hills some 13 miles east of the Dead Sea. 21–24 The piling up of name after name is designed to drive home the message of total judgment. Nothing will be overlooked. The Lord knows all and will judge all. 25 presents a picture of utter humiliation; horn symbolizes power. Cf. on Zc. 1:18.

48:26–34 Moab's antagonist. 26, 27 Moab is to be made drunk, not with her own wine (cf. Is. 16:10), but by the terror of her Antagonist, the Lord. Those who despised Israel would become despicable, a concept resumed in Rev. 1:7, cf. Mk. 15:27–32. In form and content these verses separate themselves from vv. 28–34, but the vivid picture is characteristic of Jeremiah. 29–33 A variant form of the passage Is. 16:6–10, whence some corrections can be made. Jeremiah could reuse these verses quite naturally. 32 As far as Jazer. MT 'sea of Jazer' finds support in a proposal to render more than for Jazer as 'fountain of Jazer' (Heb. mbk 'fountain' by analogy with Ugaritic). The town lay north-west of 'Ammān. 33 No one treads them with shouts of joy. Comparison with Is. 16:10 suggests the reading 'no treader treads them' (shouts of joy erroneously copied from the next line). 34 belongs with vv. 35–39 as a prose composition based on Is. 15; 16. It is taken from Is. 15:4–6, and belongs in sense with vv. 26–33. The waters of Nimrim also have become desolate. The life-giving streams would fail, their sources being stopped by the enemy (cf. 2 Ki. 3:25).

48:35–39 The wail of Moab. Is. 15; 16 are the source of this passage, as careful comparison will reveal (v. 36, cf. Is. 16:11; 15:7; vv. 37, 38, cf. Is. 15:2, 3). Of itself reuse does not mean an origin other than Jeremiah. The cause of Moab's wail is God. He would end the pagan worship, shatter the land as a useless vessel, making Moab a laughing-stock to its neighbours. 36 My heart moans. Jeremiah was not vindictive, the downfall of Moab touched his sensitive mind, however right it was.

48:40–47 Yahweh has the last word. 40 Like an eagle; a figure for Nebuchadrezzar. 43, 44 Cf. Is. 24:17, 18. 45, 46 Cf. Nu. 21:28; 24:17. Balaam's oracle against Moab would now be enacted. 47 may well reflect the pity of Jeremiah's heart as reflecting that of Yahweh. Wrath is always God's 'strange work', and mercy is ever native to His heart. Moab is to be thrust under fierce discipline, not doomed to destruction.

49:1–6 Against Ammon

This short paragraph contains two distinct thoughts: the condemnation and the restoration of Ammon. The condemnation of Ammon (vv. 1–5) is due to its greed in robbing God of some land at an unstated time, perhaps after the fall of Israel. The territory of God was on the east of Jordan, and the country of the Ammonites lay east of that. 1 Milcom was the name or title of Ammon's national god (cf. 1 Ki. 11:5, 33). 2 Rabbah (Rabbath-Ammon) was the capital of Ammon whose name survives in modern 'Ammān. A desolate mound of debris in Arabic is tell, frequent in place-names. 3 Heshbon was Moabite (cf. 48: 2) but as a frontier-town probably changed hands more than once. Ai is unknown and so various emendations have been postulated, but none convinces. 4 Valleys; Hebrew 'āmāqîm, from the root 'mq (see on 47:5), which may, on the evidence of cognate languages, mean 'to be strong'. We could therefore possibly see here, 'Why boast of your strength? Your strength is ebbing.' (See RSV mg.) 6 The prophecy ends on the note of restoration. Once again this judgment would not annihilate, for Yahweh would bring back Ammon from captivity.

49:7–22 Against Edom

Edom, Israel's traditional foe, lay to the south of Moab. Many of the expressions used in Jeremiah's prophecy appear also in Obadiah. The common passages are evidence of either a common source, borrowing by Jeremiah from Obadiah, or by Obadiah from Jeremiah. The last possibility finds most support in close comparison of the verses. Unlike the prophecy against Ammon, there is no message of hope and restoration for Edom: judgment will be final and complete. 7 Wisdom; cf. the story of Job with one character from Teman (Jb. 4:1), a district of Edom. 8 Depths; i.e. the recesses of the desert and mountains. Dedan lay south of Edom in the Hejaz. Esau represents Edom, as Jacob Israel (cf. Gn. 25:30). 10 I have stripped Esau bare; i.e. all the fortresses of Edom are laid bare and he has no hiding-place. In short, there is no escape from judgment. 11, 12 Yet God is just and merciful, and spares the innocent. Drink the cup; i.e. of Yahweh's anger. If Israel had to drink of this cup, surely Edom could not hope to escape it. Indication of a date of composition after 586 BC is seen by many in this verse. 13 Bozrah, a city in the north of Edom, about 20 miles south-east of the Dead Sea. The physical topography is referred to poetically in v. 16.

17–22 closely resemble 50:40, 44–46. Again, there is no reason to doubt the authenticity of a reused descriptive passage. (Note that this passage is a poem, despite RSV's arrangement as prose.) 19 As a lion comes up from the thick growth of semi-tropical vegetation fringing the banks of Jordan, so the enemy would swoop upon Edom and its cities; 20 and as a lion scatters a flock, so the enemy would scatter the inhabitants of Edom. With the exile of the little ones of the flock contrast the Lord's promised care for the helpless children (v. 11). How and when Edom disappeared we do not know; she aided the Babylonians against Judah; cf., e.g., Ps. 137:7; Ob. 10–14. During the next centuries Arab invaders gained control of the land and many Edomites settled in southern Judah, forming Idumaea.

49:23–27 Against Damascus

The scene of judgment now shifts to the north, to Damascus, the ancient capital of Syria. Assyria had subjugated the region, when she fell, Egypt held it briefly, then Babylon took over. Notices in the Babylonian Chronicle record Nebuchadrezzar taking tribute from the area, without any mention of the insurrection envisaged here. Lack of knowledge makes rejection of the oracle, as many wish, unwise; a date early in Jeremiah's career might suit this message (with chs. 4–6?). 23 Hamath; modern Ḥāma north of Damascus. Arpad; probably a little north of Aleppo (cf. Is. 20:9; 36:19; 37:13). Both were formerly independent states. 27 Ben-hadad; the name or title of several kings, among them the major Syrian antagonist of Israel (cf. 1 Ki. 20; 2 Ki. 7; 8).

49:28–33 Against Kedar

Even the nomad Arabs fell prey to Nebuchadrezzar, their only refuge was to scatter in the heart of the desert. The Babylonian Chronicle dates the Babylonian's campaign in 599 BC. 28 Hazor was read as ḥāṣēr 'enclosure' by LXX and refers rather to a nomadic camp-site than the great city north of Galilee (note the existence of similar names in the Negeb). 30 A purpose against you. MT has 'against them'. 31 is addressed to the Babylonians. 32 Who cut the corners; cf. on 9:26.

49:34–39 Against Elam

The date of this oracle (597/6 BC) separates it from the preceding words, uttered earlier. Nebuchadrezzar apparently attacked Elam, east of Babylonia, in 596/5 BC (Babylonian Chronicle), but no details are preserved. These verses may have been a warning to Zedekiah (did he receive an emissary from Elam, as from nearer states; cf. 27:3?) that a revolt at the opposite end of Babylon's Empire would be crushed. 39 The position of Shushan (Susa), Elam's old capital, in the Persian Empire (cf. Nehemiah, Esther) may embody the fulfilment.

50:1 – 51:64 Against Babylon

These two chapters contain a long and impassioned prophecy against Babylon. The oracle presents many difficulties. The critical view sees in it a miscellany of fragments, a few from Jeremiah and more from later writers. The arguments against the Jeremianic authorship of the whole can be stated as follows. First, the historical situation is after the fourth year of Zedekiah when the prophet's words were plunged into the Euphrates (51:59–63; 593 BC), for the Jews were already in exile (50:4, 17; 51:34), the Temple had been ravaged (50:28; 51:11), and the end of Babylon seemed near (50:8; 51:6, 45). Secondly, the point of view is not that of Jeremiah in 593 BC. Chs. 27–29 tell of the prophet's opposition at that time to the false prophets who spoke of Nebuchadrezzar's speedy downfall, and of the exhortation given by Jeremiah to the exiles that they should settle down for a considerable period of time. These chapters, however, assume that Babylon's fall is at hand. Thirdly, it is said that the temper is not that of Jeremiah. He was convinced that the Babylonians were God's agents for the punishment of Judah—a work which had not yet been accomplished in the fourth year of Zedekiah. These chapters on the contrary reveal an anti-Babylonian spirit and a deep satisfaction at the prospect of their approaching fate.

Therefore the suggestion is made that unknown persons compiled these chapters, incorporating some material from Jeremiah, towards the end of the Babylonian Empire, about 540 BC. A later editor of the book of Jeremiah prefixed it to 51:59–64, which was Jeremiah's original oracle against Babylon, consisting of a forecast in very general terms of Babylon's downfall.

However, the reasons for rejecting the oracle as an authentic prophecy by Jeremiah are not conclusive. If 593 BC is accepted as the year of origin, a subsequent expansion after the destruction of the Temple and the deportations, when the prophet was in Egypt, may be surmised (so E. J. Young). Mention of the Medes precludes a date later than 550 BC (see on 51:11), and the sense of imminent destruction is a vivid usage in many oracular passages. The third point confuses Jeremiah's attitude to Babylon in general with his words and counsel in a particular situation. He was ready to accept Nebuchadrezzar as God's servant to punish errant Judah, therefore he advised submission to that servant as according with the will of God. Yet the servant is never greater than the master, and so the pride of Babylon inevitably would meet its end at the hand of the Lord, just as Assyria had done (cf. Is. 10:5–15).

50:1–7 Babylon's future is linked with Israel's. 2 The tense of the verbs views the action as already past; by his utterance of God's word the prophet has set it in motion. Note that vv. 2–17 are in poetry, not partly prose as RSV. Bel, 'Lord', was a title of Merodach or Marduk, chief god of Babylon. 3 Out of the north. The enemy is not identified here (a parallel to the threat to Judah in 1:13, etc.). 4–7 In the confusion occasioned by this disaster Israel, now moved to penitence and covenant loyalty, would be given the chance to escape. 5 Let us join ourselves; so LXX. MT 'they shall join themselves'. 7 We are not guilty; contrast 2:3.

50:8–13 Yahweh summons the spoilers against Babylon. These verses speak of the spoilers of Babylon, the sin of Babylon, and the consequences for Babylon of her sins. 'The mills of God grind slowly, yet they grind exceeding small.' 8 He-goats, leading the flock in orderly exodus (Ellison). 11 As a heifer at grass. So LXX; cf. RV. 12 Your mother. The city is mother to its citizens (cf. Ho. 2:5 where Israel is 'mother').

50:14–16 Encouragement to the attackers. 16 Every one shall turn to his own people. The many exiles and hostages escape to their homelands at the overthrow of their oppressor.

50:17–20 The result for God's people. The remainder of Israel after the depredations of Assyria and Babylonia will regain their land too. 17 Cf. Ezk. 37. 18 Both pagan nations had been servants, both tried to be masters and both fell, the first to the second, and the second to another servant, Cyrus. 17b, 18 are considered intrusive into the poem, and so later (dating from a revision by the prophet in Egypt?).

50:21–28 A further summons to the attack. 21 Merathaim, Pekod are punning forms (see mg.) of two tribal names related to the Chaldeans. 24 You strove against the Lord. An active excitation on Babylon's part, but neutrality would have been as reprehensible (cf. Mt. 12:30; Mk. 9:40). 25 The weapons of his wrath is a figure for the nations who unconsciously perform God's purposes. 27 Bulls; i.e. warriors defeated. Cf. Is. 34:7. 28 This destruction is not wanton. God's people will gain liberty and speak His praise and power. The verse, in prose, may be an addition like vv. 17b, 18.

50:29–34 Babylon's fall; Israel's restoration. This is another poetic section throughout. Israel and Judah may be enslaved, yet they have a Redeemer, and He is strong. The Lord of hosts is peace to them but disquiet to their oppressors.

50:35–40 Babylon's devastation. Here is described the doom and utter desolation of Babylon. Everyone and everything would feel the bitterness of the avenger's sword. 36 Diviners. Without propitious omens the Babylonian armies were leaderless. 38 Drought. MT reads 'drought' which has the same consonants as 'sword' in the previous verses; 'sword' is favoured by commentators and the Syriac.

50:41–46 The Lord and His agent. 41–43 are a reapplication of 6:22–24; 44–46 of 49:19–21. Babylon, the foe from the north for Judah (1:14; 6:1; 10:22, etc.), the 'lion' against Edom (49:19), was to face a similar enemy.

51:1–19 The Lord's plan. Babylon's destroyer would be as one winnowing chaff from grain, a synonym of judgment for that nation's crime against the Holy One of Israel. Israel and Judah had their protector. Let Israel escape when He exacts the due of guilt. 1 Chaldea; MT Leb-qamai, 'the heart of those who rise against me', is a cipher on the principle A=Z, yielding the word kasdîm, Chaldeans, and expressing aptly the nature of the enemy. With 'Babylon' clear beside, there is no hint of secrecy. 2 Winnowers follows LXX, the Targum and Vulgate repointing MT 'strangers', yet the latter could be correct. 5 The land is evidently Chaldea (see mg.). 7–10 are ironic. There may be balm in Gilead (v. 8), but none can avail Babylon (cf. 8:22; 46:11). Her judgment reaches up to the judgment-bar of Yahweh. 7 The nations went mad, i.e. lost control of themselves.

11–14 Yahweh's strange work is described in this next section. He calls a nation that knows Him not to carry out His will to wrath. It is to make an end as though it were destiny incarnate. 11b is considered an insertion. If the theory of a revision in Egypt by the elderly prophet is permissible, this could appropriately come from that time, when the Medes had gained control in the hills to the east and north of Babylon, and were recognized by Jeremiah. Babylon was forced to recognize their power and accepted the truce between Media and Lydia in 585 BC fixing their respective boundaries. This was before Cyrus the Persian seized power about 550 BC. 12 Watchmen here does not mean those who 'look out', but those who blockade the city.

15–19 are an interpolation taken from 10:12–16, but adduced to show the impotence of Babylon's gods to save her.

51:20–23 The hammer of God. Here is a further reversal of Babylon's place. The description applied to Babylon (cf. 50:23) as well as to her conqueror, both instruments in God's hands.

51:24–33 Babylon desolate. Babylon is seen as a mountain injurious to all (a volcano?), also as part of a chain from whence it may be toppled and rendered useless. Compare the figure in Dn. 2:31–45. 27 Prepare the nations for war; cf. 6:4. Ararat = Urartu, ancient kingdom of Armenia; Minni = Mannai in NW Persia; Ashkenaz = the Scythians, spread over the same region. All were subject to the Medes (cf. v. 11b). 32 The bulwarks; better 'the marshes', the reed swamps of S Babylonia, a refuge for fugitives. 33 Threshing floor. Before the actual threshing starts, the earth is beaten down firmly; so is Babylon on the verge of her threshing.

51:34–40 Babylon judged. The drama of the eternal courtroom is given in vv. 34–37. Zion states her case against her aggressor—spoliation, maltreatment, wrong, exile, physical injury. Yahweh makes her case His own. As a result, Babylon, the fabulous garden of the East, becomes a jackals' lair, a scorn and a desolation. 36 I will dry up her sea is perhaps a reference to the lakes created by Nebuchadrezzar's fortifications and waterworks. Babylon was dependent upon the state-organized canal-system for her prosperity. 39 Swoon away. MT 'rejoice' may be euphemistic.

51:41–44 A lament for Babylon. The final end of the city, its power and pride, is delineated. 41 Babylon is written in the same cipher as 25:26 (RSV mg.), and as used in 51:1. 42 The sea; i.e. the enemy army. 44 The heart of the matter. Bel, no longer 'lord', will be broken like Dagon (1 Sa. 5:1–5) before the Lord. Wall probably symbolizes strength.

51:45–53 Judgment and its effects. 45, 46 God's people should have no place in the city, proud, doomed. Unattached, they could disregard rumour and unrest, the rise and fall of Nebuchadrezzar's successors. 47–49 This assurance would strengthen them; Babylon faced an inexorable fate. 50, 51 In such a situation there was no place for smug complacency, the Temple remained in a state of desecration, and the name of the Lord had no visual vindication. 52, 53 In a further passage Babylon is depicted impotent against her foe, the result of the sacrilege (51). 53 An echo of the famous tower's builders is audible.

51:54–58 The fall. In the culmination of the sayings about Babylon, the writer stood in the hour of victory. The crash of doom announces the just recompense of Yahweh, with whom all destinies rest. 58 The walls of the city, up to 25 ft wide, were one of Nebuchadrezzar's greatest constructions (cf. Dn. 4:30), and north of the city was another great wall running between the Tigris and Euphrates. Both were eventually destroyed, the former by Xerxes in 485 BC.

51:59–64 An illustration. In this passage is found the circumstance prompting Jeremiah's first utterance of these words against Babylon. Chronologically it belongs with ch. 29, but contextually its place is here. Zedekiah was required to present himself to his overlord for reasons now unknown and included in his retinue Seraiah, apparently Baruch's brother (cf. 32:12) who was responsible for the royal comfort. Considerable danger surely accompanied Seraiah's mission, which inaugurated the divine plan against Babylon. The scroll will have contained the greater part of chs. 50; 51. 64 MT reads '. . . the evil that I am bringing upon her. And they weary themselves. Thus far . . .' (cf. RSV mg.). Generally it is believed that v. 64b, c belongs before v. 59 and has been displaced. However, it is as straightforward to see here an editorial note to the effect 'Jeremiah's words end at "And they weary themselves" ', indicating that vv. 59–64 and ch. 52 are editorial additions, perhaps after the prophet's death.

52:1–34 HISTORICAL APPENDIX

This closing chapter deals with the fate of Zedekiah and Jerusalem and of Jehoiachin. It is taken from the same source as 2 Ki. 24; 25, from which it diverges little, probably with the intention of reminding readers that Jeremiah's words had been partly fulfilled, and of encouraging, by the final paragraph, the depressed exiles.

52:1–30 Judah's fall

4–16 are abbreviated in 39:1–10 and repeated in 2 Ki. 25. 11b is not found in the other passages. For comparison of the passages see the larger commentaries. 15 Some of the poorest is often deleted as erroneously taken from v. 16 (cf. 39:9; 2 Ki. 25:11) yet it complements that verse well. 24–27 Cf. 2 Ki. 25:18–21. The execution of these representatives signified the execution of the whole nation; Judah was to become extinct. 28–30 is a unique source. The variation of the dates from the earlier passage (cf. v. 12 and 2 Ki. 24; 25) can be explained as mistaken, or as following the Egyptian method of reckoning the king's accession year as his first. 28 refers to the deportation of 597 BC, the number 3023 may be construed as the men (cf. 2 Ki. 24:14, 16 covering whole families). 29 refers to 586 BC. 30 refers to 581 BC, when the Babylonian may have avenged Gedaliah's murder.

52:31–34 Hopeful conclusion

Nebuchadrezzar's son (562–560 BC) showed grace to the imprisoned king. Whereas he had previously enjoyed the fare of a menial (as texts from Babylon record), now he was recognized as royal. In the restoration to his suzerain's favour of the long-punished covenant-breaking king, the editor may have seen reflected the future restoration of covenant-breaking Judah.

Lamentations

INTRODUCTION

TITLE

The fuller title, 'The Lamentations of Jeremiah', is found in the LXX and Greek Uncial MSS. But the Talmud and Rabbinical writers refer to it simply as 'Lamentations' (Heb. qînôṯ), or 'How!' ('êḵâ), the opening word in the Hebrew.

POSITION IN CANON

In keeping with the longer title, the LXX places the book immediately after the prophecies of Jeremiah, as in our English versions. In the Hebrew Bible it is not to be found among the prophetical writings but occupies the middle position among the five Festival Rolls (Megilloth) which immediately follow the three poetical books Psalms, Job and Proverbs, in the 'Writings' or third division of the Hebrew Canon. Each of the Megilloth was read at an annual festival, Lamentations being read on the ninth day of Ab (about mid-July), the anniversary of the destruction of the Temple by Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon. In the Talmud, the poetical books and the Megilloth are rearranged in what appears to be a chronological order, viz. Ruth, Psalms, Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Solomon, Lamentations, Daniel, Esther, etc.

AUTHORSHIP AND DATE

The tradition that Jeremiah composed these poems goes back to the position and title of the book in the LXX, where it is introduced by the words: 'And it came to pass, after Israel had been carried away captive, and Jerusalem had become desolate, that Jeremiah sat weeping, and lamented with this lamentation over Jerusalem and said . . .' It is also asserted in the Syriac Targum and in the Talmud (Baba Bathra) that 'Jeremiah wrote his own book, Kings, and Lamentations'. In 2 Ch. 35:25 reference is made to this prophet's lamentations over the death of King Josiah, which are there stated to have been written down and to have become 'an ordinance in Israel'; cf. La. 2:6; 4:20. But our present book concerns not so much the death of a king as the destruction of a city, and 4:20 could equally well refer to Zedekiah in spite of his unworthiness (cf. the sentiment in 2 Sa. 1:14, 21). Nevertheless Jeremiah as the weeping prophet (see Je. 9:1; 14:17–22; 15:10–18, etc.) might conceivably be held to be the author also of Lamentations, were it not for the fact that there are certain difficulties in accepting this view. The style is much more elaborate and artificial than that of Jeremiah, and in chs. 2 and 4 is more like that of Ezekiel. Ch. 3 recalls Pss. 119 and 143. The attitude to foreign powers implied in 4:17 is certainly not that of the 'collaborationist' in Jeremiah and does not reflect the prophet's own experience.

Many, therefore, regard the author as a younger contemporary of Jeremiah, who, like him, was an eyewitness of the heart-rending calamities which befell Jerusalem at the time of her capture by the Babylonian armies in 587–586 BC. Others consider chs. 2 and 4 as the work of an eyewitness (note the writer's concern for the fate of the children in 2:11, 12, 19, 20; 4:4, 10), c. 580 BC, to which have been added, perhaps from different sources, the national lament of ch. 1, the personal lament of ch. 3, and the prayer of ch. 5. The date of this material may be about 540 BC. Some would place the whole collection much later and make the book refer to the siege of Jerusalem in 170–168 BC by Antiochus Epiphanes or even by Pompey in 63 BC, but this is very improbable. In favour of the traditional dating in the period of the Exile is the despondent note throughout which suggests a time before the rise of Cyrus the Persian. There is also the fact that this particular period of Babylonian history is noted for its threnodies, or dirges, over fallen cities. Cuneiform inscriptions are extant in which 'the daughter of . . .' is bidden lament her lot (cf. 2:1). The technique may thus have been learnt by the Jews in exile.

STRUCTURE

Rabbinic commentators refer to 'the seven acrostics' and it will be noticed at once that each chapter has twenty-two verses, corresponding to the number and order of letters in the Hebrew alphabet, with the exception of ch. 3 which has sixty-six, each successive letter having three verses allotted to it instead of one. This alphabetical arrangement is said to show that 'Israel had sinned from aleph to tau', i.e., as we should say, from A to Z, just as in Ps. 119 the implication is that the law should command a man's whole attention and desire. In ch. 5, however, the successive letters of the alphabet are not employed, although some scholars contend that they must have been used originally.

The first four poems make use of the halting rhythm known as the dirge (Heb. qînâ), i.e. a 3:2 rhythm, which is also found in Jeremiah.

MESSAGE

The book vividly portrays God's identification in Christ with human suffering and sin. G. A. F. Knight (TBC) has called it the Easter eve of the human soul, for in it the soul, weighed down by God's judgments, is nevertheless confident of His unconquerable mercy (see especially 3:19–25, 52–58). The keynotes of the book are, as Gottwald says, doom and hope, and it affords 'an instructive insight into the inner life of the circles faithful to Yahweh after the national collapse' (A. Weiser).

COMMENTARY

1:1–22 FIRST ODE

1:1–7 The desolation of Jerusalem

The opening words of this 'political funeral song' (Gunkel) depict Jerusalem as a woman bereaved of her husband and children and from whom 'has departed all her majesty' (v. 6) through persistent sorrow. So, many years later, a Roman coin which commemorates this same city's destruction by Titus in AD 70 shows her as a woman sitting under a palm-tree, and bears the inscription 'Judaea capta' (cf. v. 3). She upon whom has been centred so glorious a heritage of spiritual and prophetic religion is now brought to utter desolation 'for the multitude of her transgressions' (v. 5).

2ff. All her friends, those surrounding nations to whom she had looked for help, have failed her miserably, and her streets and places of assembly, whether for merchandise (her gates) or for the joyous solemnities of worship, are now deserted (v. 4). 6 Her princes, i.e. Zedekiah and his courtiers (2 Ki. 25:4; Je. 39:4, 5), have turned tail and fled away.

1:8–11 Sin brings suffering

The hint given in v. 5 is now taken up and developed, and eventually becomes one of the major themes of the book. 8 Jerusalem . . . became filthy because she had sinned grievously. 9 She took no thought of her doom, i.e. she failed to consider the consequences of her actions, until it became too late. Countless warnings have gone unheeded, and now she is reaping the fruits of her iniquity. But even while her plight is thus being graphically described, she is pictured as beginning to cry out to God, and her cries break in upon the poet's meditations (vv. 9b, 11b).

1:12–22 A cry for compassion

Zion's first supplicating sobs have already been overheard in the previous section. Now not only the casual passers-by (v. 12), but all nations (v. 18) and, lastly, the Lord Himself (v. 20), are asked to ponder, with sympathetic understanding, the grievous affliction which has been thus placed upon her.

12 The words in this verse have long been associated with our Lord in His passion. Although Christ deprecated sympathy for Himself (cf. Lk. 23:28), He identified Himself so closely with human sin and its consequences (cf. 2 Cor. 5:21) that, as these prophetic words suggest, He would have us consider the significance of that identification.

15 The language recalls that of the great festivals of the Jewish year. But instead of the favoured people of Israel, their enemies are summoned to a feast, the object of which is not the praises of God for His bounty in vintage or harvest, but the crushing of the Jews themselves in the wine-press of affliction. Yet there is no complaint against the divine justice, no problem of theodicy as in the book of Job. 18 The Lord is in the right; and so it is to Him that resort is made, for all human aid is ineffectual (vv. 17, 19, 21). He may punish, but He will bring comfort to those who are led to recognize the reasons for such punishment. And even the very instruments of the divine judgment will themselves be judged by Him whose way is perfect (cf. Ps. 18:30). We have here a vivid demonstration of faith in God's sovereign power, wisdom and grace.

2:1–22 SECOND ODE

2:1–9 The Lord is an enemy

With gruesome details of scenes which he himself had witnessed, the poet describes in this elegy 'the day of the anger of the Lord' (v. 22). God Himself seemed to have 'become like an enemy' to Judah, for all these terrible happenings were but the outworking of His wrath. He, and not a mere human foe, was responsible for them.

1, 2 The Temple (the splendour of Israel) and the ark with its mercy-seat (his footstool; cf. 1 Ch. 28:2), as well as the forts and palaces and the humble dwellings of the people, had been cast to the ground and destroyed. 6 Even his booth or 'tabernacle' (AV), the place of all places where mercy might confidently be awaited, had been broken down and laid in ruins, as if it were no more than a booth of the vineyards, put up temporarily in harvest time and then pulled down again, thereby showing the powerlessness of outward ritual to avert God's judgments from a guilty people. 8 God determined to lay in ruins the wall of the daughter of Zion; a striking testimony to His sovereign activity. Nebuchadrezzar and his Babylonian armies are completely ignored! The capture of Jerusalem, so far from being a defeat for Yahweh, was a victory for His righteousness. See Is. 42:24f. for the absolute supremacy of God. The wrath of God, His judicial displeasure against iniquity, is no idle term, but an awesome reality for those who render themselves liable to it. This fact makes the cross of Christ even more significant (cf. Rom. 3:25f.). 9 The law is no more, either because 'Israel was scattered in a heathen, unclean land, and so could no longer fulfil the precepts of the Law; or else . . . there were no priests left who were able to give ritual instruction to the people' (G. A. F. Knight).

2:10–13 The horrors of famine

The plight of innocent children (vv. 11, 12) is a theme which recurs in vv. 19–21 and in 4:4, 10. The writer evidently could not get the harrowing scenes out of his mind. The elders or heads of families who shared in the administration were powerless to do anything. Grave magistrates and light-hearted maidens alike were reduced to grief-stricken silence (v. 10). Suffering such as this is always a profound mystery; but even a child cannot be considered in isolation. 'It is monstrous to charge the providence of God with the consequences of actions that He has forbidden' (W. F. Adeney). Consider also Christ's own words in Lk. 13:1–5. The trouble which has overtaken Zion is as vast as the sea; there is no end to it.

2:14–17 Prophets false and true

14 Your prophets. This would seem to refer not to Jeremiah or Ezekiel, who were now presumably in Egypt and Babylon respectively, but to the prophets left behind in Judah who, unlike them, were visionless (cf. v. 9) and afraid to expose the true cause of Zion's calamity, your iniquity. 15, 16 They were men who had gone about saying 'bad luck' instead of crying 'repent!' Their words were mocking words, little different from the taunts of the hostile spectators of the city's desolation; 17 and they were utterly apart from the fearless messages of the true prophets in accordance with which God had now done what he purposed and had carried out his threat which he ordained long ago. These shallow optimists with their false oracles (v. 14) had no light to shed on the present situation.

In vv. 16, 17 the usual order of initial letters is reversed and Pe precedes 'Ayin, as it does also in chs. 3 and 4, but not in ch. 1 (which may be a sign of difference of authorship). The quaint Rabbinic explanation of this feature is that 'Israel spoke with the mouth (Pe) what the eye ('Ayin) had not seen', i.e. illicit things.

2:18–22 A call to supplication

The suffering city is not only bidden to cry to the Lord (v. 19), but words are put into the suppliant's mouth (vv. 20–22).

18 is very uncertain, as RSV mg. shows. RSV has undertaken to correct the Hebrew text in a way that leads very well into v. 19, so that the whole is an appeal by the elegist to his countrymen to turn their sorrows into prayer. For 'godly grief produces a repentance that leads to salvation' (2 Cor. 7:10) and therein lies the hope of deliverance. In AV and RV, however, we have a close rendering of the Hebrew text as it stands. At first sight, 'their heart' ought to refer to the exulting foes of v. 17, and the 'wall' may mean those who live within it, i.e. the people of Zion. Thus v. 18 would open with an insolent shout of triumph on the part of Zion's enemies against the God of Israel. But the second half of the verse sounds the note of sadness rather than of spite, and it would seem therefore more appropriate (as with the altered text adopted by RSV) to regard the whole verse as a sympathetic appeal to Zion to give vent to her grief. Calvin in fact takes 'their heart' to refer to the Jews themselves, and we could well understand the second half of the verse as calling upon the very fabric of Zion to share its people's heartfelt grief (cf. Lk. 19:40). The thought would be unusual but by no means impossible, and would lead convincingly into the next verse.

19 The night is either the time of undisturbed reflection or a picture of sorrow itself. 22 Instead of summoning worshippers to a festival, God has called together His terrors on every side (cf. Je. 20:3) and so encircled His people that none escaped or survived.

3:1–66 THIRD ODE

This chapter with its acrostic in triplets concentrates on the personal sufferings of the writer, although he is speaking, no doubt, 'as the typical representative of his people' (T. H. Gaster). Through all his agony there breathes a spirit of quiet resignation and confidence, especially in the second section (vv. 22–39). This is a finished product of literary art, although it is possible to detect a lack of cohesion here and there owing to the exigencies of the alphabetical framework. But in more ways than one, this poem brings us to the very heart of the book. As a foreglimpse of Christ's passion it has affinities with Is. 53 and Ps. 22.

3:1–21 The cry of the afflicted

Once more, in a series of suggestive metaphors, the sufferings are directly attributed to God: 2 he has driven and brought me into darkness. 12, 13 One of the most striking figures here given is that of God as a huntsman, winging His arrows (Heb. 'the sons of his quiver') against the prey. 16 He has also given stones instead of bread; hence the teeth grinding on gravel. 19–21 But here the way is prepared for a different and complementary portrait of the Almighty.

3:22–39 The mercies of God

That such a beautiful expression of assurance in God's unfailing mercies should be found in Lamentations and in such a context is indeed remarkable and carries its own rich consolations. Cf. v. 57. 22 The steadfast love of the Lord never ceases. Targum and Syriac have: 'The Lord's mercies, verily they cease not . . .' 23 They are adapted to each day's requirements (cf. Dt. 33:25b–27). 25ff. The poet universalizes his own experience and inculcates the duties of watchful expectancy and glad submission. 28–33 Let him sit alone in silence, let him put his mouth in the dust like a beaten slave; for the infliction will pass, in that it does not represent God's final will for a man. 34–36 If God is so just that He cannot tolerate the ill-treatment of captives, the perversion of the courts of law, or sharp practices in business, then any sufferer can afford to be patient (cf. v. 26). 37, 38 Evil too (i.e. 'trouble', not moral wickedness) is subject to God's control and has no independent existence. God is supreme, and can use trouble for beneficent ends. 39 No man alive can contend that his sufferings are entirely undeserved. To meet them in the way suggested will turn them into means of blessing. Cf. Ps. 119:71.

3:40–42 A call for conversion

'God's kindness is meant to lead you to repentance' (Rom. 2:4). In true prophetic vein the elegist puts himself alongside his countrymen and entreats them to return to the Lord and to seek reconciliation with Him. Let them examine themselves in the light of His commandments which they have transgressed, and let the lifting up of their hands to God in heaven be accompanied by the lifting up of their hearts also, i.e. let their prayers for pardon be true and sincere. Let them know too what it feels like to be unpardoned, to be under God's judgment still (v. 42b), and they will come to appreciate all the more the wonder of His forgiveness.

3:43–54 The sorrows of sin

The sense of dereliction which precedes every genuine conversion is then described. There comes to the soul a chastening apprehension of the wrath of God against sin and of the barrier which sin has erected between it and Him (v. 44). The effects of sin are fully acknowledged and heartfelt grief ensues. But God is no longer regarded as an implacable enemy. His tender mercy is in view and is keenly awaited (v. 50) to help (vv. 52–54). These last moving verses suggest an actual physical experience on the part of the writer, but if so, it was an experience different from that of Jeremiah who was placed in a dry dungeon by his own people (cf. Je. 38:6). 51 The maidens of my city may be, like the daughter of my people (v. 48), personifications of Jerusalem in its intimate, tender aspect, or a reference to the villages outside the city which were also involved in her terrible fate.

3:55–66 Comfort and cursing

55–60 Out of the depths of self-despair the prayer of the penitent sinner reaches the heights of heaven. Casting himself upon the name, or character, of Yahweh, He finds that God is by his side as advocate and redeemer, with words of consolation on His gracious lips. With this section cf. Ps. 69.

But while admitting the validity of God's judgments he cannot find it in his heart to excuse those who have been the instruments of them. 61–66 They too must be punished: Thy curse will be on them. Such an imprecation at this juncture may strike a jarring note, but it is well to remember that the infliction of suffering upon another man may, in the providence of God, lead that man to come to a recognition of his own sins and to seek the Lord, but it does not, on that account, render the instigator of the suffering less amenable to God's laws. The writer appears to be speaking under considerable provocation, but he places the judgment in God's hands, not his own.

4:1–22 FOURTH ODE

4:1–12 Then and now

A series of bitter contrasts between Jerusalem in her glory and Jerusalem in her shame. Two parallel passages (vv. 1–5, 6–11) are brought to a conclusion in the reflection of v. 12, and the execution of this section is most artistic.

1 recalls the burning of the city by Nebuzaradan in 2 Ki. 25:9. The holy stones are, of course, the stones of the Temple, many of which were of pure gold. 2ff. At such a time even the tender offices of motherhood were in abeyance. Children received worse treatment than the offspring of jackals or the young of the careless ostrich (see Jb. 39:13–17). 6 Sodom perished in a moment by the hand of God; Zion must undergo a long and weary punishment, meted out to her by the hands of men. 7, 8 Those normally conspicuous because of their rank or calling, her princes (AV has 'Nazarites'; the Heb. means lit. 'consecrated ones') are now . . . not recognized in the streets; they are indistinguishable from all the rest. 12 is both an illustration of arrogance and self-confidence and of subsequent disillusionment.

4:13–20 The consequences of sin

13ff. The prophets and priests who had failed to proclaim God's true word are involved in a fearful nemesis. They are treated as lepers and hurried out of the city. Even the heathen give them no shelter (v. 15), for they are guilty men, against whom the prophet Jeremiah had spoken so often (cf. Je. 6:13; 8:10; 23:11, 14), and they had helped to shed . . . the blood of the righteous (cf. Je. 26:20–23). The people too are brought to realize that trust in an earthly ally (such as Egypt, Je. 37:7) was doomed to disappointment (v. 17), nor could the possession of the Davidic kingship be taken as a guarantee of divine blessing and protection (v. 20). 20 The Lord's anointed is Zedekiah, Judah's last tragic king, whose fate is described in 2 Ki. 25:4–7. Thus ecclesiastical leaders, politicians, the king himself, have all been powerless to avert God's judgments from the guilty nation whose end had come (v. 18).

4:21, 22 Edom shall not escape

At the time of Jerusalem's capture, Edom had sought to enrich herself at her kinsmen's expense (cf. Ob. 10–16), and her conduct at that time had been bitterly resented (cf. Ezk. 25:12–14; Ps. 137:7–9). But the Jews could console themselves with the thought that, whereas their own punishment was now accomplished (cf. Is. 40:2), that of Edom was still to come: to you also the cup shall pass. And when it did, it would be a sign of returning mercy for Judah. Uz, the home of Job, is probably mentioned here as showing the extent of Edomite domains. He will uncover your sins. 'Uncover' is the opposite of 'cover', the usual word for 'forgive'.

5:1–22 FIFTH ODE

5:1–10 An appeal for mercy

Although there are twenty-two verses in this chapter, the acrostic arrangement is missing. Here is a prayer which may reflect conditions a little later than the actual destruction of the city, and which is an impassioned congregational entreaty for divine mercy. Although God is responsible for the calamity, yet it is to Him that the sorrowing people instinctively turn for help. Was it not He who had given them their inheritance (v. 2)? Their present forlorn state, in which they were compelled to purchase the bare necessities of life from their captors (v. 4) and to seek their bread in the wilderness at the peril of their lives from marauding bedouin (v. 9), was a plea to God to restore them, for His own name's sake, to their rightful position in the land, so that they would no longer be under the rule of servants, i.e. Babylonian satraps who were often promoted slaves of the king's household (v. 8). 7 The sentiment in this verse is in line with the second commandment. Generations of mankind do not live in watertight compartments, and children normally have to bear, i.e. reap the consequences of, their parents' misdoing (cf. Ex. 20:5f.; Dt. 5:9 f.). That this does not, however, override personal responsibility is made clear in such passages as Ezk. 18:1–4.

5:11–18 The shamefulness of sin

One more glance at the awful retribution which the people of God have brought upon themselves by their persistent transgression of His laws. But the mood is one of sorrow, not resentment. All thoughts of personal revenge are absent, for the rightness of God's judgment has been freely acknowledged and the issue is left in His own hands. The poet, in the name of his people, has won through to contrite humility and patient submission. 13 For young men . . . to grind was dishonouring, as it was women's work (cf. Jdg. 16:21).

5:19–22 God's eternal throne

The last look is reserved for the throne of God which still abides, even though the throne of the Davidic dynasty has been sent crashing to the ground. Only in God is there hope for the stricken people. A great longing for reconciliation and renewal breathes through the petition of v. 21. This in turn intensifies the realization of present forsakenness (v. 20). Suffering has done its work, the prodigal has come to himself and is ready to arise and go to his Father.

22 Hast thou utterly rejected us? Perish the thought! Cf. Rom. 11:1, 2.

Ezekiel

INTRODUCTION

AUTHORSHIP, DATE AND CIRCUMSTANCES

On the face of it the book of Ezekiel appears to proclaim its own unity as proceeding from one author, Ezekiel, resident in one place, Babylonia. The book possesses an orderly arrangement (see outline of contents), a uniform literary style couched throughout in the first person singular, and a coherent system of dates extending from the fifth year of the captivity (i.e. 593 BC, 1:2) until the twenty-seventh year (29:17; 40:1). The accuracy of this system of dating is somewhat confirmed by the collateral evidence of the historical allusions made in the body of the prophecy, where, e.g., Persia is mentioned only as a mercenary of Tyre (27:10) and associated with Put (Punt, on the Red Sea?) and Ethiopia (Cush, 38:5), suggesting that at the time of writing this subsequently imperial power was thought of as remote and without claim to fame. Such allusions would become increasingly impossible between 570 and 550 BC.

In the light of these facts, S. R. Driver (Introduction to the Literature of the Old Testament, 1891, pp. 261, 278) was able to voice the consensus of specialist opinion that 'no critical question arises in connection with the authorship of the book, the whole from beginning to end bearing unmistakably the stamp of a single mind'. Another view, however, was heralded by Kraetzschmar (Das Buch Ezechiel, 1900) and brought to its completion by Hermann (Ezechiel, 1924) and more especially by Hölscher (Hesekiel, das Dichter und das Buch, 1924) who so dismembered the book that he allowed no more than one seventh to Ezekiel, ascribing the remainder to a 5th-century editor. This extreme position, though matched by the views of C. C. Torrey (Pseudo-Ezekiel and the original Prophecy, 1930) and James Smith (The Book of the Prophet Ezekiel: a New Introduction, 1931), has failed to convince the majority of students. Nevertheless the same basic reasoning has led many to adopt a 'moderate' view which holds that Ezekiel's ministry was not wholly in Babylonia, as the book itself would indicate, but was partly in Jerusalem. Specialists who espouse this theory (e.g. Oesterley and Robinson, Hebrew Religion, its Origin and Development, 1930; R. H. Pfeiffer, Introduction to the Old Testament, 1948) differ as to whether Ezekiel or some other was the final editor of the prophecies. V. Herntrich (Ezechiel-probleme, 1932), one of the most influential early advocates of the dual location of Ezekiel, held that a disciple of Ezekiel's edited the work and added to it, but Pfeiffer insists that it is 'gratuitous and idle' to invent a redactor.

It is probably true, however, that the majority of present-day students of Ezekiel have reverted broadly to the tradition of one author in one location. (Cf. G. A. Cooke, The Book of Ezekiel, 1937; C. G. Howie, Ezekiel, Daniel, 1961; D. M. G. Stalker, Ezekiel, 1968; P. R. Ackroyd, however, Exile and Restoration, 1968, p. 106, still finds the dual location the more satisfactory; for a comprehensive review of all literature and opinions, see H. H. Rowley, Men of God, Essay 6, 'The Book of Ezekiel in Modern Study', 1963, first published in BJRL 36, 1953–54, pp. 146–190.) It would seem, indeed, that the problems undoubtedly involved in the book hardly require any of the drastic solutions suggested for them.

To Pfeiffer the attractiveness of a Jerusalem ministry rests on the fact that the command (3:4), 'Go, get you to the house of Israel' suggests a journey to Jerusalem, and the additional command to 'speak' requires the prophet's personal presence there. The death of Pelatiah (11:13) is further evidence of the actual presence of Ezekiel in Jerusalem. In addition, throughout chs. 1–24 Ezekiel displays most detailed knowledge of the state of affairs in Jerusalem, such as an eyewitness could be supposed to possess. Others add to this array of facts the rather more abstract, but deeply important, consideration that there seems not a little absurdity in supposing Ezekiel to reside in Babylonia all the while that he is hurling denunciations at a city hundreds of miles away across the desert!

The first two of these arguments seem too insubstantial to bear the weight of the theory that Ezekiel ministered in Jerusalem. In his book the command to 'go . . . to the house of Israel' is forthwith interpreted by the actual action of the Spirit of God in impelling Ezekiel to Telabib and settling him there among an exiled community (3:12–15), and it is frequent in Ezekiel that the designation 'house of Israel' means the exiles (e.g. 11:15; 37:16). As to the death of Pelatiah, the mystery of this event is not lessened one whit if we suppose that Ezekiel was face to face with the wretched man rather than viewing him in a visionary experience. It is just as easy to imagine that, within the context of a vision of Jerusalem such as chs. 8–11 most reasonably suggest, Ezekiel saw his word of judgment on the city take this token form in the death of someone he knew.

As regards the remaining two arguments, there is certainly more room for discussion. Taking first Ezekiel's detailed knowledge of Jerusalem, it is necessary to say that this is not, in fact, as considerable as is sometimes alleged. We need to recall that there was a free interchange of information between Jerusalem and Babylon (cf. Jeremiah's letter, Je. 29) and it is not at all unlikely that the basic details of chs. 8–11 concerning the desecration of the Temple courts was made known to the priestly Ezekiel through normal channels prior to being woven into the fabric of the vision. At the same time, while it is not necessary to make Ezekiel's experience as unique as is often suggested, there is none the less a residuum of information that could only have been his through supernatural agency, whether we care to use the word telepathy or not. In this category, e.g., there is the foreknowledge of the death of his wife (24:15ff.). In this regard Ezekiel shares with his fellow prophets a unique experience of the miraculous, and unless we are prepared for a total re-writing of OT evidence on this point we can do no other than accept that things were supernaturally made known to the prophets which either in kind or in extent (or in both) exceeded anything which enters the customary experience of men. Cf. J. Pedersen, Israel I & II, 1926, p. 162; A. B. Davidson, Old Testament Prophecy, 1904, p. 126; W. F. Albright, From Stone Age to Christianity, 1957, p. 325.

In the last analysis, however, all depends on the fourth objection: even if Ezekiel could have so prophesied, would he have done so? Is it a justifiable exercise of the prophetic ministry to expend so much indignation on a totally absent audience? The answer to this is much more simple than the question might at first sight suggest. Ezekiel is adopting a teaching method which is found at some time or another in most of the prophets: the method of enforcing truth on a present audience by calling to mind and addressing an absent audience. When any of the prophets, including Ezekiel, addressed foreign nations, are we ever to think either that those nations were present or that the oracles so spoken were meant to be conveyed to them? Were they not rather entirely intended for the ear of Israel (whether to rebuke or to encourage) even though formally addressed to others? (Cf. W. R. Harpur, Amos and Hosea, 1910, on Am. 1:6.) Thus Ezekiel addresses Jerusalem because it is essential for his purpose at that stage of his ministry to make his fellow-exiles see the city as it really was, appreciate the justice of the coming acts of God, and thus arrive at a theology adequate to the stresses of the exile and fitted to raise a barrier against perpetuation of the sins of the past (cf. A. Lods, The Prophets and the rise of Judaism, 1937, pp. 212f.; H. L. Ellison, Ezekiel: the Man and his Message, 1956, pp. 19–21).

We may approach the book, then, in the confidence that it is what it purports to be: the record of Ezekiel's 25-year ministry in Babylonia to his fellow-exiles.

CONTENTS

As the outline of contents shows (see below), the book is constructed on a clearly defined plan, the subjects of each section being mainly adhered to. After the introductory vision of chs. 1–3, Ezekiel concentrates almost exclusively on laying bare the iniquity of his people. He pitilessly drags their sins to the light and pronounces the judgment of God on them. By symbolic actions, parables, fiery oratory and logical statement he reiterates his theme of the wickedness of the nation and its inevitable destruction. The repetition of denunciation and threat of doom is so constant as to make the reader recoil in horror, especially as, whereas other prophetic works light up their threats with promises, this element is largely lacking in the first section of Ezekiel's book. When he does allow a ray of hope to shine through, it usually glows a fiery red, so that the restoration spoken of is a shameful one and not in joy (see, e.g., 16:53–58; 20:43, 44). In this, as in other respects, Ezekiel has affinity with the author of the book of Revelation, for both works set forth, as none other in their respective Testaments, the unmitigated terror of God's wrath.

The second section (chs. 25–32) confines itself to oracles against the nations of Israel's environment, both the petty states that plundered the people in their hour of distress and the greater nations of the day. Here Ezekiel's poetic imagination soars to its height; we are given some of the most vivid word pictures of the OT in his oracles against the prince of Tyre and Pharaoh of Egypt. It is curious that Ezekiel is silent as to the fate of Babylon, the chief destroyer of Jerusalem. Some believe that, since this nation must have figured in Ezekiel's prophecies of doom, it must be symbolized by Gog in the prophecy of chs. 38, 39. There is, however, no hint of this in the text and everything seems to point against the identification. One can but feel that, like Jeremiah, Ezekiel regarded Nebuchadrezzar as a servant of Yahweh and so regarded his actions as divinely ordained; unlike Jeremiah, however, Ezekiel received no subsequent word concerning Babylon and so left the issue with God.

The turning-point in Ezekiel's ministry is occasioned by the arrival of a messenger from Jerusalem, announcing the city's fall (33:21). In face of the consistent scepticism of the people towards his preaching, this event constituted the divine confirmation of his ministry. Henceforth people flocked to hear him (33:30). He was now free to give himself to the task of rehabilitating the scattered nation and this forms the theme of chs. 33–37.

It has been a long-standing perplexity that, after the restoration of the nation in the Messianic era, Ezekiel should have spoken of a further uprising of foreign powers against Israel (38; 39). There are nevertheless cogent reasons lying behind this teaching and we cannot see any necessity for denying it to Ezekiel. See introductory notes to these two chapters in the commentary.

The conclusion of the book (40–48) is the product of a devout mind that has long and affectionately pondered over the worship of Israel in her coming age of bliss. We are here forcibly reminded that Ezekiel was a priest as well as a prophet. As such he combined in himself the two great streams of Israel's tradition. In a land purged of uncleanness, the ideal worship in an ideal Temple is set forth for the observance of an ideal people.

CHARACTERISTICS

Two features of Ezekiel's personality have already been mentioned, viz. the vividness of his imagination and his unique powers of telepathy, clairvoyance and prognosis. These combine with an overwhelming sense of the transcendence of God to produce passages of literature that in many ways seem alien to the modern mind, but which richly reward investigation. How many, for example, are so bewildered by Ezekiel's account of his inaugural vision in ch. 1 that they read no further? Yet that chapter, once grasped, is seen to be highly significant and of great spiritual value, as the Jews themselves recognized. A saying in the Mishnah records that the chariot, i.e. Ezk. 1, and the creation, i.e. Gn. 1, are the two matters to be expounded only to a prudent person (Hagiga 2:1, quoted by Cooke, p. 23). Similar observations could be made concerning many obscure and neglected passages in Ezekiel.

In certain directions Ezekiel pioneered movements of thought which were destined to develop into the characteristic features of later Judaism. He was the first to state with dogmatic clarity the truth of individual responsibility. By the frequency of his visions and the ecstatic nature of many of his utterances, and especially by his prophecies concerning Gog and the future kingdom, he shaped a type of prophecy that in due course led to the apocalyptic movement. Ezekiel is thus the bridge between prophecy and apocalyptic. Further, by his priestly training he was naturally more interested in worship than in evangelism; consequently the missionary spirit, so evident in the latter chapters of Isaiah, is largely absent from his writings. In all these matters, viz. individual responsibility, apocalyptic prophecy and the by-passing of the Gentile in contemplating the kingdom of God, Judaism went much further than Ezekiel and in certain directions actually produced a caricature of his teaching. (See, e.g., the introductory notes to ch. 18 in the commentary.) It is as unjust, however, to blame Ezekiel for these unfortunate developments, as it is to blame Daniel for the puerilities of some apocalyptic writings, or St. Paul for the doctrine of predestination to damnation. Where Ezekiel and Daniel were silent, or at most implicit, Judaism became explicit and exaggerated, just as some people's logic drives them to a position which most Christians believe St. Paul would have disowned. It is unfortunate in the highest degree, therefore, that many biblical scholars should disparage Ezekiel as being retrogressive in its doctrine. On the contrary, this book makes an important contribution in the providence of God to the unfolding revelation of God in the Bible. It needs to be studied with a greater sympathy than some moderns are at present inclined to accord it.

Finally, it may perhaps be mentioned that in some places the text of Ezekiel has suffered badly in transmission. To sort out the difficulties would demand more space than is allowable in a commentary of this compass. Only the more important corrections have been pointed out in the exposition. The interested student is recommended to the very useful commentary by G. A. Cooke in the ICC. While in many respects it goes further in the matter of conjecture than conservative scholars would generally allow, it is nevertheless characterized in the main by a commendable sobriety of judgment. The present writer has not hesitated frequently to draw upon it.

COMMENTARY

1:1 – 24:27 ISRAEL'S SIN AND IMPENDING JUDGMENT

1:1 – 3:27 THE CALL OF EZEKIEL

1:1–28 The vision of the glory of God

1–3 It is not known from what epoch Ezekiel dates the thirtieth year, whether Babylonian or Israelite. Origen thought it represented his own age. The fifth year of the exile of king Jehoiachin, however, fixes the date as 593 BC. Evidences of Jewish settlements have been found at Nippur on the river Chebar, known to the Babylonians as 'The Grand Canal'; that Ezekiel should receive in such a place visions of God would be revolutionary to many of his compatriots, whose feelings rather found expression in utterances such as 11:14, 15.

4–14 Like others before him, Ezekiel's call to the prophetic office came with a vision of God. But, as frequently in prophetic ecstasy (cf. Acts 10), the nature of the vision was conditioned by the environment of the recipient. In this case it was the approach of a storm-cloud by which God revealed Himself to Ezekiel (v. 4). The blackness of the cloud, the unnatural fiery glow and the lightning flashes provided the framework for the manifestation of the greater glory of God. (See Guillaume, Prophecy and Divination, pp. 155f., and cf. the following report of a storm on the Euphrates: 'Dense masses of black clouds, streaked with orange, red and yellow appeared coming up from the WSW, and approaching us with fearful velocity. . . . The clouds by this time were quite terrific. Below the darkest of them there was a large collection of matter, of a dark crimson colour, which was rolling towards us at an awful rate. . . . All became calm and clear as before, and barely twenty-five minutes had seen the beginning, progress and termination of this fearful hurricane.' Chesney, Narrative of the Euphrates Expedition, 1868, quoted by Cooke in ICC, p. 10.) Note the repeated term likeness (vv. 5, 10, etc.); Ezekiel can suggest only parallels to the figures of his vision. The living creatures (v. 5) with their wheels (vv. 15, 16) form an unearthly chariot for the throne of God. The comment of the Rabbis on the faces of the living creatures (v. 10) is frequently quoted with approval: 'Man is exalted among creatures; the eagle is exalted among birds; the ox is exalted among domestic animals; the lion is exalted among wild beasts; and all of them have received dominion, and greatness has been given them, yet they are stationed below the chariot of the Holy One' (Midrash R. Shemoth, 23, on Ex. 15:1). Cf. Rev. 4:7.

15, 16 The wheels enabled the chariot to travel anywhere, a needful reminder for the exiles (see on vv. 1, 2). Viewed from Ezekiel's position, they seemed to revolve within each other; their construction was as though one wheel were in the midst of another though actually there were only four wheels, each separate, standing at the four corners of a square. 17 The movement of the wheels is unimaginable if we have ordinary vehicles in mind; this is a supernatural chariot! 18 Their rims were full of eyes. These eyes denote intelligence, for 20 the spirit of the living creature was in the wheels. 22 Likeness of a firmament; better, 'platform'; rāqîa' is translated 'firmament' in Gn. 1, but its fundamental meaning 'something made firm and flat by stamping' is here in mind. It serves as the basis for Yahweh's throne (v. 26) and is borne by the living creatures.

26–28 Note that the prophet will not say he definitely saw Yahweh, only a likeness as it were of a human form or the appearance of the likeness of the glory of the Lord. (There is the 'large face' and the 'small face' of God, says the Talmud, and man is given to see the latter only; cf. Jn. 1:18.) Nevertheless that which Ezekiel saw was sufficient to overwhelm him; cf. Is. 6:5; Dn. 10:8, 9; Rev. 1:17.

2:1 – 3:3 The prophet's call and commission

2:1 The title Son of man (vv. 1, 3, etc.) applied to himself is characteristic of Ezekiel and emphasizes his status as mere creature over against the majesty of the Creator. It is used by God in addressing the prophet, not by Ezekiel of himself, apparently to show that his duty is to be the mouthpiece of the divine will and nothing more. 5 They will know that there has been a prophet among them finds its counterpart in the oft-repeated phrase 'they shall know that I am Yahweh'. Both truths are to become apparent by God fulfilling the prophet's predictions; cf. 33:32, 33; Dt. 18:21f.

8 The prophet is bidden not to share the rebelliousness of his nation by hiding from them the messages God will declare to him. 9 That God should have directly touched the mouth of Jeremiah (Je. 1:9) but given a written scroll to Ezekiel illustrates the difference between the two prophets; the former declares the immanence of God, the latter His transcendence. 10 The writing on the book on the front and on the back, contrary to normal usage, indicates the fullness of its contents. Lamentation and mourning and woe is a fair description of the major part of Ezekiel's prophecy. His message was not changed until, according to the promise of v. 5, God fulfilled his words in the destruction of Jerusalem (33:21f.).

3:1 Eat this scroll. There is nothing mechanical in this mode of inspiration; that Ezekiel must masticate the roll shows he must make its message his own. 3 Despite the nature of the message, its taste to the prophet was sweet as honey, for 'it is sweet to do the will of God and to be trusted with tasks for Him' (McFadyen). Note the variation in the experience of the NT apocalyptist (Rev. 10:10).

3:4–15 The commission emphasized

5 The prophet is not sent to a foreign nation; 6 nor to the heathen world in general. If it had been so they would have listened. 7 But Israel will listen neither to a prophet nor to God Himself. The traditional obduracy of Israel is referred to by our Lord in Mt. 11:21–24; Lk. 4:24–27. 8, 9 Cf. Is. 50:7; Je. 1:17–19.

11 To the exiles, to your people. Ezekiel's mission, although directed to all Israel (v. 4), is now specified as immediately intended for his fellow-exiles. This would be necessitated by his circumstances; but the writing of the book, or even of its separate parts, would make his message available to the whole nation.

14 The departure of the chariot of glory leaves the prophet in a reaction of bitterness and heat of . . . spirit. But he is compelled to start on his prophetic ministry. 15 He moves to Telabib, the 'house of green ears', a chief centre of the exiles. It takes him seven days to recover from the effects of the vision.

3:16–21 The prophet as watchman

17 I have made you a watchman. A watchman's task was to warn a city of impending danger; so Ezekiel must warn his people of the disaster shortly to overtake them. The passage has in mind the catastrophe about to fall on Jerusalem, but the prophet would no doubt apply it generally. Its importance lies in the relationship to be established between Ezekiel and his hearers; he is responsible for them individually and must warn each man as a faithful pastor (vv. 18, 20); they are individually responsible for their actions and their fate, for God will deal with them as moral persons, not as a unit (v. 19). This is a revolutionary conception and marks a significant step in the process of revelation. See on chs. 18 and 33:1–20.

3:22–27 Silence enjoined

24, 25 Ezekiel is commanded to remain in his house, perhaps owing to a threat of violence. 26, 27 Dumbness will come upon him, except when Yahweh opens his mouth in prophetic utterance. If this episode is in place here, Ezekiel's ministry is a private one, which only they receive who come to his house (cf. 8:1), until tidings of the fall of Jerusalem reach him (33:21, 22). Some feel that this comes strangely after the preceding commission; they suggest that this paragraph may be misplaced and belongs to a later period of Ezekiel's ministry. If that be so, v. 27 relates to a specific occasion when God shall cause the prophet's dumbness to cease (see 33:21, 22). The suggested transference is not impossible, especially as the previous paragraph finds a fuller exposition in 33:1–20. On the other hand, the passage receives a good meaning where it stands now and may be allowed to retain its place: 'his freedom of movement will be restricted by the exiles . . . God will restrain his utterance, suffering him to speak only when specially directed to do so' (Wardle).

4:1 - 5:17 FOUR ACTED PROPHECIES

4:1–3 The siege of Jerusalem

1 The brick used by Ezekiel would be of soft clay, and the drawing would be carved by means of a stylus; when it was finished the clay would be baked as a brick. 2 Presumably the operations described were to be inscribed on the brick. 3 The iron plate perhaps portrays the strong fortifications set up against the city.

4:4–8 The exile

4 The prophet lies on his side, bearing Israel's punishment, for the period of the exile. LXX reads 190 in vv. 5 and 9 instead of 390 and is probably correct. From vv. 5, 6, 9 we gather that Ezekiel was to lie 150 days on his left side and 40 on his right; the period from the deportation under Tiglath-pileser in 734 BC (2 Ki. 15:29) to the taking of Jerusalem in 586 was 148 years, i.e. roughly 150 years, while the 40 years (general designation of a generation) for Judah roughly corresponds to the period 586 to 536, the time of Judah's exile in Babylon. Cooke suggests that the figure 390 was due to a copyist interpreting the punishment of the house of Israel as the whole period of Israel's sinning. According to the chronology of the book of Kings, the period from the division of the kingdom under Rehoboam to 586 was 394½ years.

4:9–17 The famine

Two thoughts about the approaching famine are to be distinguished here: the scarcity of food (vv. 9–11, 16, 17) and the uncleanness involved in eating it in a foreign land (vv. 12–15). 9 The curious mixture of grain merely implies shortage and is not to be compared with Lv. 19:19. 10 Twenty shekels is about 9 oz. 11 The sixth part of a hin is about 2 pints. 12 The dung used in the baking of bread was for fuel. 14, 15 To Ezekiel, brought up as a priest, human excrement was too revolting; in response to his prayers he was allowed to use cow's dung, which is still used for fuel by bedouin. 13 Cf. Ho. 9:3f.; Am. 7:17. All lands outside Canaan were unclean and their products likewise, for Yahweh was not worshipped in them.

5:1–4 The slaughter

1, 2 Shaving the head was a figure for catastrophe: see Is. 7:20; Je. 41:5. Here the act represents the fate of the inhabitants of Jerusalem; they were to be burned, slain and scattered (v. 2); the sword pursuing those that flee the city (v. 2c) indicates the completeness of the destruction. 3, 4 Of the few that truly escape (those bound in Ezekiel's skirts) some shall yet perish, so that the remnant is very small indeed. Ezekiel thus does hold to a doctrine of the remnant (see also 6:8–10; 9:8; 11:13), in spite of the asseverations of some to the contrary; but it is wholly subordinated to his message of judgment until the fall of Jerusalem, after which it becomes his dominant theme.

5:5–17 An exposition of the signs

5, 6 Jerusalem is the centre of the world, alike by her position and privilege (cf. 38:12). This makes her excess of wickedness over the nations more heinous (cf. 16:47f.; Je. 2:10f.). 7 The argument implies that the nations about Israel walked according to such lights as they had, but Israel had not; 8 God accordingly would requite the sins of His people in the sight of the nations, both as an example and vindication of His holiness. 10 Cf. Lv. 26:29 and Dt. 28:53, prophecies fulfilled in the event (La. 4:10). 17 Pestilence and blood are one plague; we thus have the four scourges of Lv. 26, famine, wild beasts, pestilence, the sword. They occur again in 14:21 and figure in the plagues of the book of Revelation (Rev. 6:7, 8).

6:1–14 PROPHECY AGAINST THE MOUNTAINS OF ISRAEL

2 Ezekiel addresses the country under the figure the mountains of Israel, since they formed its chief feature; it is, indeed, 'a central mountain range sloping down to the narrow plains by the Mediterranean and the Jordan' (Toy). 3 Moreover, mountains and hills are usually associated by the prophets with idolatry (e.g. Is. 65:7; Je. 3:6; Ho. 4:13). Ravines (AV 'rivers'; RV 'watercourses'). These and the valleys were used for impure rites and the worship of Molech (see Je. 7:31, 32). High places were originally lofty sites, but came to denote sanctuaries wherever situated; there were many of these in the land where worship was ostensibly offered to Yahweh but actually differed little from that of Israel's neighbours. Apparently the reforms of Hezekiah and Josiah had been in vain (2 Ki. 18:4; 23:5). 4 Incense altars (Heb. ḥammānîm) were either terra cotta braziers for burning incense, as discovered at Megiddo and Beth-shean, or they were like the four-horned limestone altar found at Palmyra in Syria and inscribed with the name ḥammān (see Albright, Archaeology and the Religion of Israel[3], 1953, pp. 146, 215f.). 7 You shall know that I am the Lord. A phrase characteristic of Ezekiel; it occurs in vv. 10, 13, 14 and about 60 times elsewhere. The motive for Yahweh's action is always the acknowledgment by the nations of His sole deity and power.

9 I have broken their wanton heart; not 'I am broken with their whorish heart', as AV. God breaks the heart by sorrow to bring about repentance. 11 Clap . . . stamp. The actions of Ezekiel seem to express exultation rather than horror (see 21:17; 22:13; 25:6). Alas! is better rendered 'Aha!' (LXX, euge, euge; i.e. 'Bravo!'), as though the prophet exults in the coming judgment. His concern is the vindication of Yahweh's honour rather than the fate of sinners. Cf. Rev. 19:1–4. 13 The destruction of idolaters among their idols will reveal the impotence of the latter and convince the survivors that Yahweh alone is God. 14 Riblah. RV 'Diblah' (situated east of the Dead Sea in the south) is almost certainly a misreading of Riblah (lying far north by 'the entrance of Hamath', 48:1), the Hebrew d and r being almost identical. 'From the wilderness to Riblah' thus represents an equivalent of the better-known phrase 'from Dan to Beersheba'.

7:1–27 ISRAEL'S IMMINENT DOOM

There are four short oracles in this chapter (vv. 2–4; 5–9; 10, 11; 12, 13), followed by an exposition of their common theme (vv. 14–27). 2 As the end is stated to be immediately impending, and the date given in 1:1 leaves 7 years to the fall of Jerusalem, it is likely that this chapter was written later. The date at the head of a section does not necessarily embrace everything that follows till the next date is given.

The oracle is directed to the land of Israel, yet vv. 5–7, 10, 12 appear to have the day of the Lord with its universal significance in mind. It is therefore better to translate the concluding phrase of this verse by 'the four corners of the earth' as in Is. 11:12. The judgment upon Israel is set against the background of the judgment of the nations. Note the play of words, as in v. 6, the end (haqqēṣ) has come or 'awakes' (hēqîṣ). Cf. Am. 8:2. 7 The time has come, the day is near. That this is a reference to the day of the Lord seems clear from a comparison with 30:3; Dn. 12:1; Joel 1:15; Mal. 4:1.

10, 11 record a rhythmic oracle which gives the core of the prophecy. All is ripe for judgment, 'the tree has burst into leaf and flower!' (Cooke). The 'rod' (hammaṭṭeh; RSV mg.) and pride probably refer to the king of Israel and his court. Cf. the frequent usage of the word 'rod' for the sceptre of Israel (e.g. 19:11). RSV translates injustice (hammuṭṭeh) and carries the play on words a stage further.

12, 13 The buying and selling appears to be of property, the seller either doing it against his own inclination (cf. 1 Ki. 21:1–16) or at a bad price. The prophet says the one need not be glad, nor the other sorry, for both will shortly be involved in catastrophe. Many have thought that v. 13 refers to the law of jubilee (Lv. 25:10f.), and it may be so. Otherwise the prophet is continuing the thought of v. 12; buying back of ancestral lands is unthinkable, for 'the nation will be broken up and questions of property will cease to have interest' (Toy).

19, 20 Comparing the last clause of v. 19 with v. 20, the uncleanness of their silver and gold is due to their being lavished on idols. Cf. Is. 30:22. 21 Such idols Yahweh will give to the invaders. 26 A threefold division of the people religiously is indicated: the prophet for the immediate word of Yahweh; the priest for instruction out of the law; the elders for advice on civil matters. 27 gives a threefold division socially: the king, the prince (i.e. 'princes'; the singular is collective as in 22:6) and the people of the land.

8:1 - 11:25 JERUSALEM'S SIN AND JUDGMENT: ITS ABANDONMENT BY GOD

8:1–18 The idolaters in the Temple

1 The date is probably August-September 592 BC, 14 months after Ezekiel's inaugural vision (1:1). 2 The appearance of a man (Heb. 'îš); so LXX. Cf. AV, RV, RSV mg., 'the appearance of fire' (Heb. 'ēš). Ezekiel is carried in vision to the Temple and views idolatries taking place there. Whatever information the prophet may have received from the reports of others, this is also a description of things seen by means of a supernaturally heightened gift of 'second sight'. The distance between Babylonia and Jerusalem makes the episode astonishing, but it is not without parallel in the Bible. Cf. 2 Ki. 5:26; 6:8–12; Is. 21:6–10. 3 The image of jealousy (i.e. an image which rouses Yahweh to jealousy) may have been an image of the Canaanite goddess, Asherah. Manasseh had set up such an image (sēmel, the unusual word here used) in the Temple and later removed it (2 Ch. 33:7, 15). This may have been the same idol replaced, but Albright (Archaeology and the Religion of Israel, pp. 165f.) understands sēmel as a 'figured slab' engraved with cultic scenes similar to examples found at several Near Eastern sites. 12 Room of pictures (Heb. maśkît) refers to the frescoed chamber or cavern where the elders were practising strange forms of animal-worship (v. 10). It may imply that each man had his own secret room in his house where he could imagine that his doings were unseen by God.

14 Tammuz, a Babylonian deity, was the god of vegetation, whose death at the time of great heat was mourned annually, and whose resurrection was celebrated in spring. The traditional time of mourning was the fourth month (named, accordingly, 'Tammuz'), but as this vision took place in the sixth month the ritual may have been modified among the Jews of this time. 16 Worshipping the sun. Sun-worship was practised by the Canaanites, but lately had been reintroduced from Assyria (2 Ki. 23:5, 11; Je. 8:2). Between the porch and the altar was the place where the priests offered prayer (Joel 2:17), with their faces, of course, towards the Temple; in this spot, with their backs to the temple, the adoration of the sun took place, as complete a renunciation of Yahweh as possible. Cf. 2 Ch. 29:6.

17 They put the branch to their nose represents a practice which cannot with certainty be identified. Some argue from the use of the term branch (zᵉmôrâ; cf. 15:2; Is. 17:10) that it was associated with Tammuz-worship; some see in it an obscenity, interpreting the Hebrew word as 'stench'; others have noted that a similar action portrayed in Assyrian reliefs seems to be a mark of reverence and worship (Iraq, xx, p. 16).

9:1–11 The judgment of Jerusalem

1 If RSV, RV mg. be followed, the executioners are addressed directly, Draw near, you executioners of the city. 2 Six men with the man with a writing case make a group of seven; they are doubtless angelic beings. Cf. the seven angels who stand before God (Rev. 8:2, 6), who are also revealed as executors of God's wrath. 4 Put a mark. The righteous are marked (the word signifies, strangely, a mark in the shape of a cross) to distinguish them from idolaters and to secure for them Yahweh's protection. Cf. Ex. 12:23; Rev. 7:3–8; 13:16–18; 14:1. 6 Begin at my sanctuary; cf. 1 Pet. 4:17. 8 All that remains of Israel denotes the inhabitants of Jerusalem. The northern kingdom had gone into captivity in 722 BC, and Judah had suffered a partial captivity in 597. In contrast to his cry in 6:11, and to his usual attitude of complete sympathy with the divine judgments on Israel, Ezekiel here pleads for mercy on his erring countrymen. 9, 10 The answer is given: the guilt of the land is so heinous that its punishment cannot be averted. The Lord has forsaken the land; i.e. Yahweh has deserted His people, as is evidenced by their continual troubles. There is accordingly no obligation on their part for continued loyalty to Him. It did not occur to these apostates that their adversity was the righteous judgment of Yahweh upon their wickedness.

10:1–22 The burning of Jerusalem

1 The throne is empty (cf. 9:3); the cherubim wait for Yahweh to remount and depart. 2 The destroyer of the city is the man clothed in linen, who formerly marked off the faithful for preservation; all seven angels are thus ministers of vengeance, as in Rev. 8:1 - 11:15. 7 We are told nothing of the destruction of the city, other than that the commissioned angel took fire from the midst of the cherubim (cf. Is. 6:6) and went out. The vision was prophetic of the fires that actually destroyed Jerusalem in 587 BC (2 Ki. 25:9); but more significant than the prediction is the revelation of the identity of the Destroyer, God Himself. 9–22 The purpose of the repetition of vv. 9–22 is but to impress this very fact; for the description of the glory of God and the chariot had already been given in ch. 1. Its recurrence here in detail underlines the startling fact that the God, whom men thought to be inseparably bound to His sanctuary and city, is to destroy them both and abandon their ruins. Owing to the vagaries of later copyists, some of the description of vv. 9–22 is confused and difficult to follow. E.g., v. 11a speaks of the wheels, v. 11b apparently has the cherubim in mind; v. 13 would read better after v. 6; the first face in v. 14 should be 'ox' not cherub, as in 1:10 (unless we follow Rabbi Resh Lakish, 'Ezekiel besought the Merciful One with regard to it (the ox face) and He changed it into a cherub'!); v. 15 interrupts the sequence and anticipates vv. 19, 20. 18, 19 The glory of the Lord went forth. Yahweh leaves the Temple by the east gate; 11:22, 23 records His departure from the city altogether. Cf. 43:1–5.

11:1–13 Judgment of conspirators in Jerusalem

3 This city is the cauldron. This statement shows the drift of these men's thoughts. The city walls would protect them as a cauldron protects flesh from the fire; the warnings of the prophets, therefore, could be ignored. The first clause may be taken to imply, 'Our present occupation must be war, not the building of houses; let us fight it out'. LXX renders, 'Have not houses recently been built?', reflecting, perhaps, the jubilation of the princes on having overcome the effects of the 597 invasion, and implying that there was no cause for worry now. If RV mg. is followed, 'Is not the time near to build houses?', we are to understand an attitude of defiance to prophetic warnings of danger and a complacent sense of security which allows time for peaceful pursuits. 7 Your slain . . . they are the flesh. The only people who are to enjoy the security of the city will be the slain victims of the plotters; the latter are to be led out (v. 9) and executed on the borders of the land (v. 10). See the fulfilment of this in 2 Ki. 25:18–21. 13 is an integral part of the vision but presumes that the event actually occurred while Ezekiel was 'looking on'. The phenomenon is to be compared with the vision of the idolaters in the Temple (ch. 8), that of the beginning of the siege of Jerusalem (24:2), the death of his wife (24:16), and the cessation of his dumbness (24:25, 26; cf. 33:21, 22).

11:14–25 Promise of restoration

15 Your brethren are Ezekiel's fellow-exiles from Judah; the whole house of Israel are the descendants of those transported from northern Israel in 722 BC (cf. 20:40; 36:10). They have gone far from the Lord. The sneer of the remnant still in Jerusalem reflects the old notion that Yahweh's power was limited to His land; to be away from it was to be cast off from Him (cf. 1 Sa. 26:19). 16 The promise of God here negates such an idea. Cf. Je. 24:1–10; 29:4, 11.

23 The glory of the Lord removes entirely from the city (cf. 10:18, 19). Many exegetes believe the two visions in 11:1–21 occurred later than the rest of chs. 8–11, and have been placed here because they concern events seen in the Temple and the apostates of Jerusalem. Admittedly 11:1–13 comes strangely after the description of the destruction of the people in ch. 9 and the burning of the city in ch. 10; the message of restoration (11:14–21) would also better fit the period immediately prior to the doom of the city. It is, however, unwise to dogmatize either way on the matter.

12:1 - 24:27 PROPHECIES AGAINST JERUSALEM

12:1–20 Portrayal of the imminent exile

2 A rebellious house; i.e. the exiles among whom the prophet lives; they are as obtuse as the Jews at Jerusalem! 5 gives an illustration of the desperation of the besieged and of the ruin of their property; see 2 Ki. 25:4. 6 Cover your face, that you may not see. An allusion to Zedekiah's flight and fate. See v. 12, that he may not see . . . with his eyes. The LXX translates as passive, 'that he might not be seen by the eye'; i.e. the covering of the face serves for a disguise. But the verse is also prophetic of the punishment inflicted by the Babylonians upon the king, who was blinded at Riblah and taken captive to Babylon (2 Ki. 25:5–7). They shall know; i.e. the escaped of Jerusalem, who will know that Yahweh is Lord when they experience these horrors according to prophecy. 16 The nations among which they travel will also know it, for this demonstration of Yahweh's might will convince them that He alone is God. The object of leaving survivors from the catastrophe is solely for the honour of Yahweh's name.

17–20 The acted prophecy of the hardships of the siege is akin to 4:9–17 (see especially 4:16, 17). The symbolic actions of the earlier passage, however, represent the scarcity that will prevail in the siege; this stresses the terror of those days.

12:21 - 14:11 Prophets and people

This passage consists of a group of five oracles dealing with prophecy, true and false, and with the attitude adopted by the people in reference to it.

12:21–28 Scepticism rebuked. Two oracles (vv. 21–25, 26–28) supply reasons for popular disbelief in prophecy. 22 The first is expressed in the proverb, The days grow long, and every vision comes to naught; i.e. time passes but the many threats of doom never come to pass (cf. 2 Pet. 3:4). The element of delay would have been aggravated by Jeremiah's ministry. For the past 30 years he had announced the coming judgment of Jerusalem; events had apparently discredited him. 23 Ezekiel's answer from God is, The days are at hand, and the fulfilment of every vision. 27 The second objection came from those who accepted the truth of prophecy, but regarded it as applying to times far off. 28 The same answer is returned to them, None of my words will be delayed any longer.

13:1–23 Denunciation of false prophets and prophetesses. 2, 3 False prophets were a menace by reason of their opposition to the true word of God and their propagation of untruth. Cf. Jeremiah's struggles against them (Je. 5:30, 31; 14:13–18; 23:9–40; 29:8–10, 21–23). For the test of the validity of a prophet's ministry see Dt. 13:1–5; 18:21, 22. 4 Your prophets have been like foxes; i.e. they were mischievous and destructive. 5 Contrast 1 Sa. 25:16. 6, 7 Divination is the obtaining of an oracle by the reading of omens and drawing lots; cf. 21:21. 9 The register of the house of Israel; i.e. the register of citizens in the coming age of blessedness. Cf. the earlier use of the idea in Ex. 32:32f. and the developed symbol in Lk. 10:20; Rev. 20:15.

10ff. Whitewash (Heb. tāpēl); better than AV, 'untempered mortar'. False prophets merely whitewash the insecure walls (see RV mg.) of the state instead of strengthening it. When God shall shatter the wall, they will be buried beneath its ruins. 15 Read as in v. 12, 'It shall be said to you, The wall is no more . . .'

18 The false prophetesses sewed bands (not 'pillows', as AV) upon all wrists, a process of sympathetic magic which either fastened power upon the consulter, or symbolized the power of the sorceress to bind her victims. The head coverings (veils) served a similar purpose, though the derivation of the term (mispāḥôṯ from an Akkadian root sapahu, to loose) suggests the opposite power of loosing from the influence. Souls; i.e. 'persons'; there is no thought of distinguishing between the spirit and the man. Render the last clause of v. 18 as a statement, 'You hunt the persons of my people but your own persons you keep alive.' 19 Translate 'You have profaned me (because the sorceresses invoked Yahweh's name in their rites) with handfuls of barley and with crumbled pieces of bread'; the latter were not given as a reward but were used for divining the future, just like the liver of a sacrificial victim. 20–23 describe the fate of all those who practise divination of this kind. False prophetesses share the judgment of false prophets.

14:1–11 Idolatrous inquirers. 1 Then came certain of the elders. It is likely that exiles frequently came to Ezekiel, waiting for a word from God that might fall from him (cf. 33:30). 3, 4 Like the heathen, these elders thought that they could worship any god beside their own; they had not learned the meaning of 'I the Lord your God am a jealous God' (Ex. 20:5; see also Ezk. 16:38, 42). I the Lord will answer him myself (AV 'him that cometh'; RV 'him therein'); Yahweh will use no intermediary to reply to such a man. His speech will be in deeds of judgment, as in vv. 12f. 7 Separates himself from me; literally 'dedicates himself away from following me'; cf. Ho. 9:10. 9 As people, so prophet; both alike were corrupt. Only a deceived prophet would give an answer as from Yahweh to idolaters, and both would bear their punishment. Some interpret the 'deception' of a prophet by Yahweh as an instance of the OT overlooking of secondary causes; i.e. the deceived state of the prophet is due to his own perversion of conscience, but since the consequences of sin, equally with the moral law, are of God's ordering, one may say that the deception is brought about by God. Cf. Ezk. 3:20; 1 Ki. 22:21f.

14:12–23 The rationale of judgment

In vv. 12–20 a general principle is laid down, that the judgment of a wicked people is not averted by the righteousness of a few; v. 21 applies the principle to Jerusalem. To illustrate and emphasize it, three notable examples of righteousness are adduced: Noah who saved his family (Gn. 6:8), Daniel his fellows (Dn. 2:12–24) and Job his friends (Jb. 42:7–10). The achievements of these men are not to be cited as examples of the habitual leniency of God. When Yahweh sentences a guilty land, the righteous will deliver themselves only. Possibly Ezekiel had heard that the men of Jerusalem looked for the city to be spared on the basis of the story of Abraham's intercession for Sodom (Gn. 18:23f.); the prophet replies, 'This is the principle on which God acts; if it is true generally, how much more in Jerusalem's case (v. 21), which has no Noah, Daniel or Job!' Cf. Jeremiah's similar assertion of the uselessness of intercession for Jerusalem, even from Moses and Samuel (Je. 7:16; 15:1–4). For the principle of individual responsibility here implied, cf. ch. 18.

14 Daniel (and v. 20). Expositors have long questioned as to whether the man of this name is the Daniel of the book named after him, presumably a contemporary of Ezekiel, or a patriarch of similar antiquity to Noah and Job. That the Phoenicians knew of such a person is attested by the reference to him in the Ras Shamra tablets, c. 1400 BC. That his name is spelt there as in Ezekiel, and not as in Daniel, indicates it may be the patriarch who is meant here. On the other hand, vv. 12–20 mention in turn God's acts of judgment by means of natural calamity, the sword and pestilence, and the biblical Noah, Daniel (cf. Dn. 1:1–4) and Job were respectively rescued from exactly those judgments.

22 The escaped remnant would show, by their corrupt lives, how just was the judgment of Jerusalem and so set at rest the minds of the exiles. When . . . you see . . . you will be consoled.

15:1–8 A vine for burning

This parable suggests that certain Israelites had compared themselves, as Isaiah had done for a different purpose, to the vine among the trees, the choicest among the nations in God's sight. Ezekiel corrects such a notion. Israel is but a wild vine of the forest (not a cultivated one, as elsewhere in the OT); far from being better than other trees, it is useless for anything but fuel. As the wild vine is appointed, as it were, by nature, to be burned, so is Jerusalem destined for destruction (v. 6).

16:1–63 A faithless woman

This discourse seeks to show, in allegorical fashion, that Israel's history constitutes 'one unbroken record of black apostasy' (McFadyen). It is in four movements: a. An adaptation, perhaps, of a popular story concerning a foundling baby that became a queen (vv. 3–43). b. Jerusalem's notorious sisters, Samaria and Sodom, are righteous in comparison with her (vv. 44–52). c. Jerusalem can be reinstated only in conjunction with these formerly despised sister communities (vv. 53–58). d. Penitent Jerusalem will receive a new covenant from God (vv. 59–63). For the comparison of Jerusalem to a faithless wife, cf. Is. 1:21; Je. 3:1f.; Ho. 2:2–23. The allegory is developed with a candour that tends to shock the western mind, but it is normal to the oriental outlook.

3 Amorite . . . Hittite (3). 'The genealogy is moral, not ethnical' (Toy). Nevertheless the Aramaean ancestors of Israel were kin to the Amorites (or Canaanites) and made affinities with certain of the Hittites. 4 Normal care was denied to this child. 'Heathen by parentage, it received heathen treatment at its birth' (Cooke). 8 I spread my skirt over you. For this custom see Ru. 3:9. In the allegory it may be referred to the covenant at Sinai, while vv. 9–14 could be applied to the increasing prosperity of the nation up to the days of Solomon. 10 Leather (not 'badgers' skin' as AV or 'sealskin' as RV); cf. Ex. 25:5.

15 The evil process described here began when Israel adopted the Canaanite sanctuaries of Palestine (cf. 20:28; Je. 2:5–7). 18 The actions described represent the treatment accorded to idols on festal occasions. 20 Your sons and your daughters . . . these you sacrificed. Though Josiah stamped out this evil practice for a time (2 Ki. 23:10) it is likely that it was revived in the desperate days of the siege. 26 is a reference to Israel's perennial tendency to look to Egypt for help; cf. Is. 30:1–5; 31:1–3. 28, 29 Similarly v. 28 refers to dependence on Assyria (2 Ki. 16:7f.; Ho. 5:13; 8:9), and v. 29 to reliance on Chaldea, i.e. Babylonia (2 Ki. 20:12f.).

35–43 describe the punishment of Jerusalem; it will be like that of a harlot, humiliation and death (see v. 38).

44–52 Jerusalem's sin is not only as bad as that of her heathen predecessors (vv. 44, 45), not only of the same order as that of the wicked cities of Samaria and Sodom (v. 46), but even worse than these (vv. 47–51). To her unutterable shame she will later be forced to confess it (v. 52). It is not necessary to assume that Israel's deeds were of a worse character than those of Samaria and Sodom; doubtless the heinousness of her guilt was felt to be accentuated by the uniqueness of her privilege as the betrothed of Yahweh. Cf. Am. 3:2.

53–58 The promise of restoration is put in such a way as to be of little comfort to Jerusalem. She can be reinstated only along with Samaria and Sodom, who will be consoled by the shame-faced recognition accorded to them by their erstwhile proud and self-righteous neighbour.

60 I will remember my covenant. This is the one bright spot in this gloomy sky. Yahweh will make an everlasting covenant with her such as will completely restore the broken relationship and give back her former position. This is the 'new covenant' of Je. 31:31f. See also Ezk. 37:26; Is. 59:21; 61:8.

17:1–24 The vulture and the vine

3 A great eagle; Hebrew nešer. As Jb. 39:27–30 and Mi. 1:16 show, this is the griffon vulture; here it symbolizes Nebuchadrezzar. Lebanon is the hill country of Judah; the top of the cedar is Jehoiachin, king of Judah (2 Ki. 24:10–16). 4 A land of trade designates Babylonia. Zedekiah, son of Josiah, was made king by Nebuchadrezzar in place of Jehoiachin (2 Ki. 24:17). 5 The location beside abundant waters denotes Palestine; cf. Dt. 11:11. 6 A low spreading vine. The metaphor changes from that of the cedar. Cooke links this sentence to v. 5 and by a change of vowels reads 'that it might grow and become a spreading vine'. Nebuchadrezzar set Zedekiah on the throne to be a submissive vassal. 7 Another great eagle. This other vulture is Pharaoh Hophra; see Je. 44:30.

11–21 interpret this figurative language. Zedekiah is denounced for turning to Egypt for help against Babylon (v. 15). The prophets speak unitedly against Israel resorting to Egypt for aid, though their reasons vary (see, e.g., Is. 30:1–5; 31:1–3; Je. 2:36). It was not the political inexpediency of the revolt that drew forth Ezekiel's wrath, but Zedekiah's abandonment of his oath to Nebuchadrezzar (vv. 15–18). From v. 19 it is clear that Zedekiah must have invoked Yahweh's name in the oath; to break it was to disgrace the sacred Name (cf. Jos. 9:15–20). For another instance of Zedekiah's breaking of an oath see Je. 34:8–22.

22–24 really form an additional parable in which the figures of vv. 3, 4 are differently applied. The tender one taken from the topmost of its young twigs is the Messiah of the house of David (Je. 23:5f.; 33:15), who will be planted by Yahweh on Mt. Zion and protect the nation restored from exile. For the image of a tree sheltering beasts and birds cf. 31:6, 12; Dn. 4:12, 21; Mk. 4:32.

18:1–32 Retribution and responsibility

The teaching of this chapter, summarized in v. 20, needs to be set in the context of the whole book to be judged fairly. Its chief purpose is to vindicate the justice of God, and it has a particular crisis in mind. The prophet's contemporaries alleged that they were being punished for the sins of the previous generation. Ezekiel declared that God does not work in that way, but holds each man accountable for his deeds and will requite him accordingly. This is a foundation principle of revealed religion. Ezekiel gave it new emphasis and detail. That it can be abused is unquestionable, especially if men divorce the individual from society. But the prophet does not do this; he usually has the whole nation in mind, and indeed it is difficult to reconcile this chapter with his predictions of the utter destruction of Jerusalem (e.g. 5:12; 7:10–27; 11:7–12), so real is the unity of the nation to him. Ezekiel's teaching has many facets; they should be viewed together to be truly appreciated. The divorcing of this principle from its context led men to argue that a man's condition reflects God's judgment upon him, so that adversity is the fruit of sin and prosperity the result of righteousness. Against this distortion of Ezekiel's teaching the book of Job is directed, but none could fairly say that it was aimed at the book of Ezekiel.

2 The proverb was current in Jerusalem (Je. 31:29) and came from there to the exiles in Babylonia. 4 The principle is stated in brief. Then, in illustration, Ezekiel takes the case of three generations, 5–9 a righteous man who continues in his righteousness; 10–13 his son who behaves wickedly; 14–17 his grandson who repudiates the evil of his father. 20 The principle is elaborated; every man shall receive a just requital for his conduct. Ezekiel primarily has in mind the coming judgment of Jerusalem and the restoration to follow; but he would regard it as capable of general application. 21 If a wicked man turns . . . he shall not die. A man is not only free from the sin of his father; he may be free from his own past if he so wishes. He can repent at once. 23 Kraetzschmar declares this verse to be 'the most precious word in the whole book of Ezekiel'. Cf. 1 Tim. 2:4; 2 Pet. 3:9. 31 Get yourselves a new heart; cf. 36:26, 'a new heart I will give you'. The same dual truth is expressed in Phil. 2:12, 13.

19:1–14 Dirge over kings

Two elegies are joined together in this chapter; in the first the rulers of Judah are pictured as lions (vv. 1–9), in the second as branches of a vine (vv. 10–14). If the two poems were written at the same time, the second is predictive (see on v. 14); but if v. 14 describes past events, the second poem was written later, being modelled on the earlier one and so conjoined to it.

19:1–9 The lioness and her whelps. 2 Your mother is the nation Israel or, more strictly, Judah, as in v. 10. 3, 4 The young lion represents Jehoahaz, who was bound by Pharaoh Necho after a reign of only 3 months and was carried off to Egypt in 608 BC (see 2 Ki. 23:31–34). 5 Another of her whelps. Jehoiakim, brother of Jehoahaz, succeeded him on the throne, but is passed over in silence because he had a peaceful end. Jehoiachin, the son of Jehoiakim, is here described. 9 After three months as king he was taken by Nebuchadrezzar to Babylon in 597 BC (see 2 Ki. 24:8–16). A double application may be seen in vv. 8, 9; not only were lions captured in this manner, for the sport of Assyrian kings, but conquered princes were also confined in cages to be a public spectacle.

19:10–14 The vine and her rod. 11, 12 should be read, with the Greek, Latin and Armenian versions and RV mg. in part, as mentioning a single rod (cf. 'rods', AV, RV); but it is uncertain as to which ruler is meant, whether Jehoiachin, as in vv. 5–9, or Zedekiah, as in v. 14; the former interpretation seems preferable. 14 Fire has gone out from its stem; i.e. Zedekiah who is held responsible for the destruction of Jerusalem inasmuch as the city would have been spared had he submitted to the Babylonians. Cf. Je. 38:20–23.

20:1–44 History of apostate Israel

1 The situation is similar to that of ch. 14; elders come to inquire of the Lord through Ezekiel. As in 14:3 they had 'taken their idols into their hearts', so here the prophet reads their intention of conforming to the idolatry of their environment (v. 32). The answer of Yahweh on both occasions is judgment on the idolaters (14:7, 8; 20:33–39). This review of Israel's history sets forth Israel's fortunes in Egypt (vv. 5–9), in the wilderness (vv. 10–26), in Canaan (vv. 27–29), in the present (vv. 30–32), traversing another wilderness (vv. 33–39), resettled in Palestine (vv. 40–44). The date is July–August 591 BC, 11 months after that given in 8:1. 8 They rebelled against me. We have no information of an act of rebellion in Egypt, unless Ex. 5:21 be in view. There may have been other traditions of this period of Israel's history, current in Ezekiel's day, upon which he draws. 9 I acted for the sake of my name; i.e. so that His reputation among the nations should not suffer through apparent inability to fulfil His word (cf. Nu. 14:16; Dt. 9:28).

16 Their heart went after their idols; cf. Ex. 32:1–6; Nu. 25:1–3. 25 Statutes that were not good . . . . A reversal of the normal purpose of Yahweh's laws; see v. 11. 26 The sacrificing of children was evidently regarded as a fulfilment of the law of Ex. 13:12, an interpretation which the prophet appears to view as due to judicial blindness from God (cf. on 14:9; Is. 6:10–12 and Cooke's note in ICC, pp. 218, 219). 29 Translate 'What is the high place (bāmâ) to which you are the comers (bā'îm)?'

33–38 Judgment is mingled with mercy. Yahweh will lead His people out from the land of exile, as He brought them out of Egypt long ago (v. 34); the guilty will perish in the desert as on the former journey (vv. 35–38; cf. Ho.

2:16, 17). The picture of the future redemption as a second exodus is frequent in the prophets. See, e.g., Is. 41:17–20; 43:16–21; Je. 23:7, 8; Mi. 7:15–17.

40–44 The surviving righteous of Israel will return to their land and worship Yahweh. By this redeeming act Yahweh will make Himself known as God alone, both to the Gentile world (v. 41) and to Israel (v. 42). As in 16:61–63 the promise is tempered with the reminder of their former sinfulness (vv. 43, 44).

20:45 – 21:32 The sword of the Lord

A new chapter commences at 20:45 in the Hebrew text; our English translators have followed the ancient versions in their division of the chapters. Four oracles are here conjoined: the destruction of Jerusalem as by fire and sword (20:45 – 21:7); the song of the sword (21:8–17); Nebuchadrezzar at the cross-roads (21:18–27); the judgment of Ammon (21:28–32). If vv. 21, 22 afford another example of Ezekiel's clairvoyant vision (cf. ch. 8), the chapter dates from 588 BC, when Nebuchadrezzar marched on Jerusalem.

20:46 The south is Palestine; although W of Babylonia, it is so described because the caravan route traversed the Euphrates and then went southward through Syria. 49 Is he not a maker of allegories? This saying reflects the scepticism of the people rather than their inability to interpret what Ezekiel said to them. But in 21:3ff. the prophet uses a plainer figure to ensure that all understood the meaning of his former proverb. 21:6 Sigh therefore. This acted prophecy is intended to show the way the news of the catastrophe will be received; cf. 12:17–20.

8–17 'A wild ode to the avenging Chaldean sword' is the description given by Toy to these verses. Certain of the verses, especially 10 and 13, are difficult of elucidation owing to faulty transmission of the text. 12 Smite therefore upon your thigh; i.e. to express grief (cf. Je. 31:19).

19 Mark two ways. Ezekiel is to draw (on sand?) two roads starting from a common point, i.e. Babylon, and diverging outwards, one leading to Jerusalem and the other to Rabbah, capital city of Ammon. 21 Nebuchadrezzar is seen at the cross-roads. He uses divination to ascertain which road to take. Arrows were used in the same way as lots; one marked 'Jerusalem' and another 'Ammon' would be shaken in a quiver and one drawn out. Liver, owing to its connection with blood, was regarded as the seat of life; the colour and marks on that of a sacrificed sheep provided omens of the future. Teraphim (AV 'images') were small human-shaped images; cf. 1 Sa. 19:13, 16. 23 To them; i.e. to the men of Jerusalem who believe the divination is false. 25 Cf. v. 14. Unhallowed (AV 'profane'; RV 'deadly wounded': some prefer to translate this 'dishonoured'). 27 A ruin. . . . The monarchic succession and the state are to be brought into ruin till Messiah comes. The latter half of the verse echoes Gn. 49:10, 'until he comes to whom it belongs'; cf. RSV mg. 'until Shiloh comes'; see NBD, art. 'Shiloh'.

28–32 The language is reminiscent of vv. 9, 10; but here the sword is that of Ammon drawn against Israel at the time of Nebuchadrezzar's attack; Yahweh will blot out the memory of Ammon (v. 32), a contrast to Israel's future destiny (20:40–44).

22:1–31 Arraignment of Jerusalem

Three oracles are to be distinguished: the sins of the city of bloodshed (vv. 1–16); the smelting of Israel (vv. 17–22); the indictment of 'the classes and the masses' (McFadyen) (vv. 23–31). 4 Jerusalem by its guilt has caused its full number of days and years to draw near. Your day means the city's day of judgment, not the Last Day (cf. Jesus' use of 'my hour', Jn. 2:4, etc.). The princes abused their authority by committing judicial murders (cf. 2 Ki. 24:3, 4). 9 Men who slander (AV 'carry tales'); i.e. informers who got rid of their enemies by false accusations. 13 I strike my hands together; a sign of scorn (cf. 21:14, 17). 16 I shall be profaned through you; follow RV, which makes Jerusalem the cause of her own profanation, and cf. on 20:9.

18 In the second oracle Israel is unrefined ore; Yahweh smelts it in the furnace, but dross is the only result. Bronze and tin and iron and lead are the precipitates of the ore when first smelted, from which the silver is afterward separated. The real point of the figure is the judgment involved in the idea of smelting. Unlike other prophets who use this figure, Ezekiel excludes the possibility of refinement; his generation is but slag! (cf. Ps. 119:119; Mal. 3:3).

25ff. Her princes (Heb. nāśî'; cf. LXX, 'whose princes'); AV, RSV mg. read 'there is a conspiracy of her prophets' (Heb. nāḇî'). If RSV be accepted, Ezekiel indicts the whole gamut of society in Jerusalem, the princes (i.e. members of the royal house), priests (v. 26), nobles (princes, v. 27; Heb. śārîm, i.e. officials and heads of important families), prophets (v. 28), and the ordinary people (v. 29). 30 I sought . . . but I found none. None of the official leaders stood for righteousness and the true welfare of Israel. Ezekiel naturally considered Jeremiah, whom those leaders persecuted, as one apart (cf. Is. 59:16; 63:5).

23:1–49 Oholah and Oholibah

The chapter is in two parts. Vv. 1–35 give the allegory of the two sisters, Samaria and Jerusalem, using similar figures as that in ch. 16 (see notes there). But whereas the earlier poem had in mind the evil influences of Canaanite religion, here it is the making of foreign alliances that is condemned. Vv. 36–49 are an appendix, developing the allegory in a different manner, possibly with a different situation in mind. Here the two sisters are viewed together and are indicted for Molech-worship and profaning the sanctuary and sabbath (vv. 37–39); the foreign alliances appear to be those with countries bordering on Israel (v. 42) rather than with distant empires.

4 The two names are identical in meaning, being coined feminine forms of 'ōhel, a 'tent'. They may have in view tents associated with false worship (see 16:16). The RSV and RV forms of the names should be followed. 7 She defiled herself with all the idols. Political alliances usually involved the adoption of the cults of the superior power. Samaria had made alliances with Assyria (vv. 5ff.) and Egypt (v. 8); Jerusalem went further and approached the Babylonians also (vv. 14–18). Assyrian worship (v. 12) was popularized by Manasseh and remained in the city till its fall (see 2 Ki. 21:1–9; Je. 44:15–19). 16 Sent messengers . . . in Chaldea. The occasion is unknown, unless it be that recorded in 2 Ki. 24:1. 20 Judah's request for Egyptian aid against the Babylonians is in mind, Je. 37:7f. 23 Pekod and Shoa and Koa were tribes east of the Tigris. 29 Naked and bare. This stripping of Oholibah represents the devastation of Jerusalem.

40 describes a petition to a distant people for help, perhaps against the Babylonians. 42 Drunkards from the wilderness (cf. RV; better than AV, 'Sabeans from the wilderness'). These would be Israel's near neighbours, Arabs, Edomites, Moabites, etc. (cf. Je. 27:3f.). 45 Righteous men can hardly be Babylonians (cf. 7:21, 24); they are the few men of Jerusalem who remain faithful to Yahweh and condemn the national policy. 47 Oholah and Oholibah will be judged as adulteresses (see Dt. 22:23, 24).

24:1–27 The beginning of the end

There are three connected themes in this chapter: the parable of the rusty cauldron (vv. 1–14); the sign of the death of Ezekiel's wife (vv. 15–24); the end of the prophet's dumbness (vv. 25–27). 1 Reckoning from Jehoiachin's captivity, the date is January, 588 BC. See 2 Ki. 25:1.

2 The knowledge of the siege again illustrates Ezekiel's supernaturally heightened gift of clairvoyance. The setting down and announcement of this date would constitute a public confirmation of his prophetic office when news filtered through at a later date. 3 Set on the pot. Perhaps Ezekiel was actually preparing a meal in a cauldron when the word of God came to him, declaring this to be symbolic of the judgment of Jerusalem. The use of the figure is wholly opposite to that in 11:3. 6 Take out of it piece after piece. The meat is not to be eaten but thrown away, symbolic of the scattering of the people. The last clause of this verse implies that lots were drawn in 597 BC as to who should go into captivity; this time there will be no option. The city is like a cauldron whose rust (i.e. 'bloodshed'—not 'scum' as in AV) will not be removed. 11 The only recourse is to set the cauldron upside down on the fire and melt it away. 12–14 Jerusalem must be destroyed to be cleansed.

16 Ezekiel is warned that his wife is about to die, either at a stroke, i.e. suddenly, or 'by plague' (cf. Nu. 14:37). 17 He is to hide his grief and show no mourning. 18 The day following his wife's death he carried out his normal occupations. 19 That caused his fellow-exiles to ask the meaning of his conduct. 20–24 It is explained that Jerusalem and its sanctuary are as dear to them as a wife to a husband; when they hear of its destruction, and the loss of their relatives, they too must bow in silence before God; it is His just judgment.

25–27 Read as one sentence: 'On the day I take from them their stronghold . . . on that day a fugitive will come . . . on that day your mouth will be opened.' A considerable lapse of time is to occur between v. 25 and v. 26. Cf. Je. 52:5–7 with Ezk. 33:21. The divine restrictions on Ezekiel's ministry are to cease when the messenger from Jerusalem arrives. See on 3:26.

25:1 – 32:32 PROPHECIES AGAINST FOREIGN NATIONS

The denunciations of Jerusalem are complete. Before recounting his predictions of restoration (33–48), the prophet inserts this group of oracles against Israel's enemies (although some of them belong to a later date) to indicate that all hostile powers must be broken before Israel could be reinstated in glory.

25:1–17 PROPHECIES AGAINST SURROUNDING TRIBES

25:1–7 Ammon

Although at the Babylonian invasion Ammon joined with Edom, Moab and others in persuading Zedekiah to revolt (Je. 27:1–11), at the fall of Jerusalem they seized Israelite cities (Je. 49:1f.), and instigated the murder of Gedaliah (Je. 40:14). Ezekiel makes no mention of these things, only of their malicious joy at Israel's distress (vv. 3, 6). Note that in v. 3 the prophet speaks of the desolation of Jerusalem as a past event.

25:8–11 Moab

Jeremiah denounces Moab for its arrogancy and rebellion against Yahweh and derision of Israel (Je. 48:25f.). Zephaniah speaks of their plundering the Jews (Zp. 2:8). Ezekiel denounces them for their scornful rejection of Israel's claim to be a nation apart, in view of her relation to Yahweh (v. 8).

25:12–14 Edom

For the malice of Edom against Israel at the fall of Jerusalem cf. Ezk. 35:10–15; Ob. 10–16; Ps. 137:7.

25:15–17 The Philistines

We have no information of their behaviour towards Israel in this period other than this passage. Cherethites at one time had formed part of David's bodyguard (2 Sa. 8:18; 15:18; 20:7). See on Jdg. 3:3.

26:1 – 28:26 PROPHECIES AGAINST TYRE

The facts of the contemporary situation account for the prominence given by Ezekiel to Tyre. The Babylonians were about to lay siege to the city. What would be the result? 'On patriotic and religious grounds the Jewish exiles felt themselves to be involved in the issue. Ezekiel has no doubt that it will end in Tyre's overthrow and extinction (26); he anticipates its ruin in a magnificent dirge (27); and threatens its king with retribution (28)' (Cooke). Cf. on Am. 1:9, 10.

26:1–21 The overthrow of Tyre

2 Tyre exults over Jerusalem's fate, for she had been the gate of the peoples. Caravan traffic from north to south would have been subject to taxation by the Jews. 3, 4 As the sea brings up its waves. Tyre was built upon a rock island 'in the heart of the seas' (27:4), a position which facilitated trade and made it seemingly impregnable. 6 Her daughters on the mainland are Tyre's dependent mainland towns. 7 Ezekiel always spells the name of the Babylonian monarch Nebuchadrezzar; this approximates more closely to the Babylonian original Nabu-kudurri-usur, 'Nebo protect my boundary'.

8–12 This description of the campaign here presupposes the erection of a mole from the mainland to the island, a procedure probably adopted by Nebuchadrezzar (cf. on 29:18) and certainly by Alexander with complete success in 332 BC. Your mighty pillars (v. 11) would be those associated with the worship of Melkart, the god of Tyre. 15 The coastlands (AV 'isles') are coasts and islands of the Mediterranean with which Tyre traded. 20 I will thrust you down . . . into the Pit. Tyre is to be brought down to Sheol. You will not . . . have a place in the land of the living. RSV follows LXX, 'you shall not stand in the land of the living'.

27:1–36 Lament over Tyre

The elegy proper (vv. 3–9a, 25b–36) likens Tyre to an expensively equipped ship, filled with goods, which was wrecked by a storm and lamented by those that held an interest in it. The central section (9b–25a), describing the merchandise of Tyre, does not maintain the imagery; but that is insufficient reason for denying its authenticity. The whole chapter has deeply influenced the author of the book of Revelation, who applies its imagery to the anti-Christian empire of his own day (Rev. 18).

5 Senir was the Amorite name for Hermon (Dt. 3:9). 6 Coasts of Cyprus (RV 'isles of Kittim') is a correct translation, but the phrase came to represent a wider area, covering the coastal regions of the E Mediterranean, and this may be its meaning here. 10 Lud (Lydia?) and Put (Cyrenaica in N Africa?) are placed together because of similarity of sound, not because of their supposed proximity. The three names suffice to show that Tyre's mercenaries came from all parts of the ancient world. 11 Helech (AV 'thine army') is Cilicia (Akk. ḫilakku); the men of Gamad probably came from Kumidi in N Syria. 12 Tarshish is Tartessus, a port in S Spain, or it may be Nora in Sardinia (so Albright). 13 Javan; Ionians in Asia Minor. Tubal, and Meshech; situated in E Asia Minor (see on 38:2). 14 Beth-togarmah; Armenia. 15 The men of Rhodes (AV 'Dedan') were merchants who would have traded in ivory and ebony with N African tribes. 17 The obscure 'wheat of Minnith and Pannag' (AV) is slightly emended by RSV to make the more intelligible wheat, olives and early figs. 19 Uzal is probably Sana, capital of the Yemen, but this is an unlikely source of wine. Millard's suggestion is preferable: 'and casks of wine from Izalla', a district in Anatolia famous for its wines (JSS, VII, 1962, pp. 201ff.). 20 Dedan was an Edomite caravan city. 22 Sheba, whence the queen came to visit Solomon, and Raamah were in SW Arabia (cf. 1 Ki. 10). 23 Towns in Mesopotamia. For further information refer to NBD.

25–27 The imagery of the poem is resumed; the good ship Tyre sinks with all hands lost. 26 For the east wind cf. Ps. 48:7, but it may be an allusion to Babylon. 29–34 describe the lamentation of the sailors at Tyre's loss. Cf. Rev. 18:17–19. 35, 36 The inhabitants of the coastland may refer particularly to the merchants among the peoples; cf. v. 3. For the lamentations of the kings and merchants cf. Rev. 18:9–17.

28:1–19 Dirge for the king of Tyre

2 The prince of Tyre (Ithobal II) is addressed as representing the city; his self-exaltation to the status of deity is typical of the pride of the people. Tyre's impregnable position on a rock reminds him of the mythical mountain of God (vv. 14, 16); as God reigns supreme there, so securely is he enthroned in the heart of the seas. 3 Daniel; see on 14:20. 8 The death of the slain is one without burial. 10 Since the Phoenicians practised circumcision, the death of the uncircumcised was shameful, involving a dishonourable position in Sheol.

11–19 Ezekiel seems to have adopted for his threnody a popular story, presumably current in Tyre as elsewhere, of a primal being who dwelt in the Garden of God in splendour and purity but was subsequently driven out through pride; so shall the king of Tyre shortly fall from his glory. It looks like a highly mythological version of the story in Gn. 3, but the prophet does not hesitate to use it since it was well known and admirably suited to his purpose. 13 Your covering; i.e. 'dress'; Babylonian gods were frequently dressed in robes ornamented with jewels. Nine stones are enumerated here; LXX has twelve and they are identical with those of the high priest's robe (Ex. 28:17–20); perhaps the three missing stones dropped out of the Hebrew text by accident.

14 The LXX reads 'with the cherub . . . I set you', and again in v. 16, 'the cherub destroyed you', variations which materially alter the story but which are generally adopted by expositors. 17, 18 The moral of the story is applied first to the king (v. 17) and then to the city (v. 18). Both will be brought to utter ruin.

28:20–26 Prophecy against Sidon

Sidon is to share the fate of its neighbour. Elsewhere the two cities are spoken of together (e.g. Is. 23; Joel 3:4f.). 24–26 state the theme not only of chs. 25–32, but also of the section dealing with Israel's restoration (chs. 34ff.); the destruction of Israel's enemies is necessary both to the establishment of Israel in the kingdom of God and the demonstration to all nations of the sole deity of Yahweh.

29:1 – 32:32 PROPHECIES AGAINST EGYPT

These oracles come from the period immediately following the siege and conquest of Jerusalem (587–585 BC), except 29:17–21 which was written in 571 BC.

29:1–16 The fall of Egypt

1 The date is January 587 BC. 2 Pharaoh is addressed (like the king of Tyre in ch. 18) as representing the genius of his people. 3 Gunkel argues, with considerable cogency, that Ezekiel makes Pharaoh use the speech of the chaos-dragon of the waters (see Haupt's note in Toy) and not simply of a crocodile; 4, 5 his fate is thus similar to that of the monster in the Tiamat story; see further on 32:2–8. 6, 7 Cf. Is. 36:6.

8–12 The allegory is applied. Egypt will suffer a like fate to Israel, devastation and dispersal among the nations for 40 years. 10 Migdol to Syene; these cities were the northern and southern limits of Egypt.

13–16 Like Israel, Egypt is to be restored, but not to a position of glory: it will be the most lowly of the kingdoms.

29:17–21 Nebuchadrezzar's wages

17 The date is April 571 BC. This is the latest in the book and indicates that this oracle has been added as an appendix. 18 Nebuchadrezzar worked hard to take Tyre; heads were made bald and shoulders sore through the toilsome construction of a mole from the mainland to the city. Yet neither he nor his army got anything from Tyre. The city capitulated but there was little booty; the Tyrians had plenty of time to ship away their valuables. Yahweh would recompense His 'servant' (Je. 27:6) by giving him the spoils of Egypt. Nebuchadrezzar invaded Egypt c. 568 BC.

21 Israel will be restored to power once more. The fulfilment of these prophecies will open the prophet's mouth in thanksgiving and renewed prophetic ministry; and the criticism of his hearers over the incomplete fulfilment of his prophecy on Tyre would be silenced.

30:1–26 Egypt's day

In vv. 1–19 is described the approach of the day of the Lord on Egypt, in vv. 20–26 the breaking of Pharaoh's might by Nebuchadrezzar. 2 Alas for the day! See on 7:2 and cf. Joel 2:1, 2; Zp. 1:15. 5 gives a list of Egypt's provinces and allies who are to share its ruin. All Arabia is a slight emendation of the text for the sake of making a place-name; AV 'the mingled people' (Heb. hā'ereḇ) is a reference to foreign immigrants or mercenaries, and is used of Egypt (Je. 25:20), Israel (Ex. 12:38) and Babylon (Je. 50:37). Libya. AV 'Chub', RV 'Cub' is an unknown name; LXX reads 'Lub', i.e. Libya. The people of the land that is in league is an unknown nation confederate with Egypt; it is unlikely that it means Israel, as LXX implies and RV mg. would encourage.

13–19 The destruction of Egypt is described in detail, principal towns being singled out for particular mention. 13 Instead of images (RV mg. 'things of nought'; Heb. 'ĕlîlîm), LXX reads 'chiefs' (Heb. 'ēlîm), a reading favoured by many commentators. 17 On. AV 'Aven' (i.e. 'nothingness') is a contemptuous pronunciation of 'On', the two words being spelt alike in Hebrew. It was famous for its sun temple, and hence its name 'Beth-shemesh' ('House of the Sun') in Je. 43:13 and its Greek name Heliopolis ('City of the Sun'). At Pibeseth the cat-headed goddess Ubastet was worshipped.

20–26 The oracle, dated April 587 BC (v. 20), takes its rise from Nebuchadrezzar's defeat of Pharaoh Hophra, characterized as a breaking of Pharaoh's arm and consequent weakening of his power (v. 21). This will be followed by a further defeat that will completely overthrow the Egyptian monarch (vv. 22f.).

31:1–18 The mighty cedar Pharaoh

The allegory has three movements: vv. 2–9 are a description of Pharaoh, representing Egypt, under the figure of a lofty cedar; vv. 10–14 describe the destruction of the great tree, and vv. 15–18 the reaction to this event on the part of the rest of the nations. Both this chapter and the next have parallels with Is. 14:4–20. Mention of the deep (v. 4), the garden of God (v. 8) and Eden (vv. 9, 18) indicate the probability of a background similar to that of ch. 28 (where see notes).

3 I will liken you to a cedar (cf. AV, 'behold, the Assyrian was a cedar'; RSV mg). The initial letter of t'aššûr (cedar) fell out and produced 'aššûr, i.e. Assyria. The context clearly shows that Pharaoh is in mind. Clouds (as LXX and RV mg.). AV reads 'thick boughs'. 5, 6 The figurative language is frequently used to indicate the greatness of a kingdom (cf. 17:23; Dn. 4:11, 12; Mk. 4:32).

10 Pharaoh's sin is pride, the failing of most tyrants (cf. 28:6; Is. 14:13f.; Dn. 11:12). The fall of Pharaoh is to be a warning to all nations against committing the same fault (v. 14). 11, 12 A mighty one of the nations is Nebuchadrezzar, the most terrible of the nations his armies. 15, 16 The imagery portrays the effect of Pharaoh's doom on the nations left on earth. If with LXX we omit in v. 16 in the nether world, the figure is carried out consistently; the rival nations were comforted in that they were freed from Egypt's domination. 18 Pharaoh is to join in Sheol the uncircumcised and the slain in battle. Since the Egyptians practised circumcision and, even more than the rest of the Orient, paid lavish attention to burial, this involved the uttermost of disgrace—inclusion amongst the lowest ranks of the underworld.

32:1–32 Lament over Pharaoh and Egypt

The first lamentation (vv. 1–16) deals primarily with Pharaoh, the second (vv. 17–32) with the nation's descent to Sheol, though in both poems the thought passes imperceptibly from ruler to people. The former poem itself divides into two, vv. 2–10 describing the fate of the water-monster Pharaoh, vv. 11–16 the desolation of Egypt by the king of Babylon. 1 The date is the end of February 585 BC, 8 months after the fall of Jerusalem.

2 You consider yourself a lion; May (IB, vol. VI) notes that in Egypt the royal sphinx was a lion-bodied creature. But you are like a dragon in the seas. Most commentators believe this refers simply to the crocodile, as also 29:3–5. It is more likely an echo of the chaos-monster allegory, which told how the monster Tiamat, personification of the waters, fought against heaven and was destroyed by Marduk. From its body was made the material creation, but some of it is reserved for food for man (2 Baruch 29:4). The story is applied to any tyrannous peoples (e.g. Is. 27:1; Dn. 7), but especially to Egypt (Is. 30:7; 51:9, 10), thereby showing both their evil character and sure fate. Its use here explains the extraordinary language of vv. 4–8.

11–15 The prophet then passes from the judgment of the king (vv. 11, 12a) to that of the nation (vv. 12b–15); the allegorical language seems to be maintained in vv. 13, 14, the agitated waters settle down and become clear again; that neither man nor beast further troubles them is a sign of desolation.

17 The month is probably the same as that of v. 1, the word coming 14 days later, but RSV follows LXX in inserting the first month. 18ff. In the verses that follow the prophet portrays Egypt going down to the land of the departed, consequent upon her destruction. Egypt must do this at the bidding of the prophet (vv. 19, 20). There they will find the armies of great nations of the past, Assyria, Elam, Meshech with Tubal (vv. 22–27), together with hostile nations of the present, Edom, the princes of the north (i.e. lands bordering on Phoenicia) and Sidon, all which are evidently to be destroyed (vv. 29, 30). When Egypt perishes from the judgment of God, then Pharaoh will at least have the cold comfort of knowing that his is not the only empire that has gone to the grave (v. 31)!

33:1 – 48:35 THE RESTORATION OF ISRAEL

33:1–20 THE RESPONSIBILITY OF PROPHET AND PEOPLE

The interpretation of this passage depends on its true context. If, as many hold, vv. 21, 22 should determine the whole chapter, then this section relates to God's judgment on sinners prior to the re-establishment of Israel in the glorious kingdom. To 'die' is to depart this life before the restoration; to 'live' is to enjoy the privileges of the kingdom. On this reading, 20:33–42 forms an excellent parallel. If, however, vv. 2ff., 10, 20 imply the last desperate stages of the siege of Jerusalem, and the consequent despair of the nation, then this constitutes a final warning to the people. Perhaps the latter is the preferable alternative.

1–6 The parable is drawn from the custom of setting a watchman on the city wall in times of danger to look for the approach of the enemy. The dread responsibility of the watchman's position is here chiefly in mind. 6 Cf. Gn. 9:5. 7–9 With similar seriousness Ezekiel is to view his office at this critical juncture of the nation. These verses repeat 3:17–19, on which see notes.

As the watchman has a responsibility to sound the alarm, so the people have a duty to respond. 10 implies both an admission of the justice of the nation's misfortunes and an attitude of despair. 11ff. Ezekiel calls them to renewal of faith and hope by stressing the grace of God (v. 11), the importance of one's present state rather than one's past life (vv. 12–19) and the possibility of immediate repentance and forgiveness (vv. 11, 14–16, 19).

33:21–33 THE TURNING-POINT IN EZEKIEL'S MINISTRY

The day for which Ezekiel had waited for 7 years (cf. dating given in 1:2) and which he had explicitly prophesied three years before it happened (cf. 24:1, 25–27)! From now on he is free to devote himself to the ministry of building up instead of pulling down, and so to develop the message which he has previously no more than hinted at (e.g. 16:60ff.; 17:22ff.; 20:33ff.). 21 The twelfth year. Jerusalem in fact fell in the eleventh year of Zedekiah (cf. Je. 39:2) and some MSS of the Hebrew, along with LXX, are followed by many commentators (e.g. H. L. Ellison, Ezekiel, the Man and his Message, 1956, p. 118; C. G. Howie, Ezekiel, Daniel, 1961, p. 67; D. M. G. Stalker, Ezekiel, 1968, pp. 209, 240) in altering the text to read 'eleventh' here also. It is possible, however, that two systems of dating are involved, or that the news did not in fact reach Ezekiel till the twelfth year. At all events, the year of the fall of the city was 587 BC. For Ezekiel's dumbness, see on 3:26. 23–29 contain a message of judgment on the Jews left behind in the homeland. For a similar situation cf. 11:14ff.

30 Talk . . . about you. Better than AV, 'against thee'. 30–33 give us a glimpse of the popularity enjoyed by the prophet, no doubt intensified by the fulfilment of his message. But the enthusiasm of the people is shallow; his word is not obeyed by them. 31 Instead of with their lips they show much love, LXX reads 'lies are in their mouth'. 32 Ezekiel is like one of the love-songs which they delight to hear (RV mg., RSV mg.); but probably we are to understand that he is like a singer of such, rather than the song itself, as RSV translates it. 33 When this comes they will realize the personal truth of his words. The reference here is not to judgment but to the redemption and conditions of its enjoyment which henceforth dominate his preaching.

34:1 – 37:28 THE RETURN OF ISRAEL TO HER OWN LAND

34:1–31 Helpless sheep and faithless shepherds

The allegory, apparently a development of Je. 23:1–4, is in two sections: the rapacious rulers of Israel, who must bear responsibility for the plight of the people (vv. 1–16); God's dealings with the nation itself (vv. 17–31).

2 The shepherds, as appears from the end of v. 4, are Israel's rulers, especially those who but lately had governed the nation. For the figure cf. Ps. 78:70ff.; Is. 44:28; 63:11; Je. 2:8; Zc. 11; 13:7. 6–8 My sheep were scattered . . . my sheep have become a prey. A symbolic description of Israel's oppression (by such powers as Assyria, Egypt, Babylon) and of the dispersion after the fall of Jerusalem. 5 Cf. 1 Ki. 22:17; Mt. 9:36. 13 I will bring them . . . and gather them. The exiles are to be brought back from all lands whither they have gone (including Egypt, Phoenicia and Arabia, as well as Babylonia) and settle down under the government of Yahweh. 14–16 The tenderness of Ezekiel, so largely concealed in his prophecies, is well seen in this description of God's beneficent rule as Shepherd of His people. Cf. Lk. 15:3–7; Jn. 10; Heb. 13:20; 1 Pet. 2:25; Rev. 7:17.

17 The figure changes. The prophet turns from the kings to lesser officials who nevertheless tyrannize over their fellow-countrymen. This verse may have suggested to our Lord His parable of the sheep and goats (Mt. 25:31ff.). The teaching of the whole passage reminds us of Ezk. 20:37, 38; restoration is mingled with judgment. 23 I will set up; cf. 2 Sa. 7:12; Am. 9:11. One shepherd implies one flock (not two as formerly); see 37:24 and cf. Jn. 10:16. 24 He is to be another David through whom God rules; cf. 37:25; 46:1–18. Note that his appearing is consequent upon the salvation wrought by God. That salvation is achieved by the Messiah is a distinctively NT doctrine, adumbrated only in the latter part of Isaiah. 25 The covenant of peace between God and His people (cf. 37:26) is linked with the removal of the wild beasts, which would multiply in the period of exile; cf. Lv. 26:4–6; Ho. 2:18; Is. 35:9; 54:10; Zc. 6:13. Only then would it be safe for a man to sleep in the woods.

29 Prosperous plantations (RV 'a plantation for renown'; cf. RSV mg.); the word is a collective singular, implying plantations so fruitful as to become famous. 31 RSV, with LXX and Latin, omits 'men' (see AV, RV, RSV mg.). With this verse cf. Rev. 21:3.

35:1–15 The extirpation of Edom

The insertion of this oracle of doom in prophecies of restoration is explained by Edom's attempted occupation of Israel and Judah (v. 10). Since Israel's restoration depends on her return to the land, Edom must first be overcome; such a judgment is demanded by the cruelty (vv. 5. 6) and blasphemy (vv. 10–13) of this ancient foe of Israel. Cf. Is. 63:1–6 and on Am. 9:11, 12.

2 Mount Seir is properly the mountain range south of the Dead Sea; but it also denotes the country of the Edomites. 5 Edom's perpetual enmity towards Israel goes back to the origins of the two nations (Gn. 27:41). The former had evidently assisted the Babylonians in the slaughter of 586 BC, characterized as the time of their final punishment (cf. 21:25, 29). 10 Edom claimed the territory of Judah and Israel as her own possession. Since this was looked upon as Yahweh's inheritance ('the land of the Lord', Ho. 9:3) and was to be again taken up by Him (48:35), Edom's claim was nothing short of blasphemy (v. 12) in the eyes of the prophet; cf. vv. 12, 13; Ob. 12.

36:1–38 Restoration and regeneration

Israel's external recovery is dealt with in vv. 1–15, her internal renewal in vv. 16–38. 1 As in 6:1–7 the mountains stand for the country itself, for they are its most prominent feature. But whereas in ch. 6 the 'mountains' were denounced, here they are consoled with promises of blessing. 2 The derisive enemy denotes the petty states bordering on Israel (see ch. 25), but with special reference to Edom whose hatred has been the subject of ch. 35. 5 The jealousy of Yahweh is evoked by the nations' seizure of His land and their scorning of His people.

The same jealousy that brought requital on Israel (23:25) brings judgment upon them and leads Israel to a glorious reinstatement (39:25). 8 The end of the exile will come soon. This is the normal prophetic outlook on the redemption of the end-time, both in the OT and NT (cf. Hab. 2:3; Rom. 13:12; 1 Pet. 4:7; Rev. 1:3; 22:10). 10 The whole house of Israel will enjoy restitution, not one tribe only (cf. 37:15f.). 12 You shall no longer bereave them. Possibly Ezekiel recalls Nu. 13:32. A land incapable of supporting its people (cf. v. 30), or wherein they suffered loss through war (cf. 1 Sa. 31:1) or other divine scourges (cf. 14:21), could be said to bereave its people.

Israel's name was bound up with that of Yahweh (vv. 21, 22); their condition therefore reflected on the honour of their God. The nations thought that Israel's distress was due to Yahweh's impotence (v. 20); their restoration to blessedness in their own land would make all see that Yahweh's government was characterized by holiness, not by weakness, and so His name would be revered by all (v. 23). The conception is integral to Ezekiel's thought and is moral in the highest degree. The cleansing from sin, though described in the language of ceremonial (v. 5), is figurative for moral renewal; cf. Zc. 13:1. 26 The new heart and new spirit are practically synonymous, occasioned by the gift of God's Spirit; it is not to be rationalized as simply the inspiration of a new disposition, but is a supernatural gift. The bestowal of the Holy Spirit is frequently associated by the prophets with the coming of the new age (cf. 39:29; Is. 44:3; 59:21; Joel 2:28, 29; Acts 2:16f.). The passage is Ezekiel's counterpart to the 'new covenant' of Jeremiah (Je. 31:31f.). 30 I will make the fruit . . . abundant. Supernatural fertility of the land is a mark of the kingdom of God; cf. v. 35; see also 47:1–12; Is. 35:1, 2; 55:13; Zc. 8:12. 38 The population also will be increased, so that cities shall be as crowded as the streets of Jerusalem used to be when sacrificial animals thronged them at the great festivals.

37:1–28 Resuscitation and reunion of Israel

Ezekiel predicts the political revival of his nation (vv. 1–14) and the reunion of its two divisions (vv. 15–28).

1 Whether the prophet sees the valley (or 'plain') in vision, or whether he is impelled by the Spirit to go to this place to receive a vision (as in 3:22), is not clear. 2 The dry bones indicate an army slain in battle. To the despondent of Israel the nation seemed to be in a similar state. 3 Both the question and answer reflect the hopelessness of the situation (cf. v. 11; 33:10); nothing but a stupendous act of God could effect a restoration. 9 The same Hebrew word rûaḥ signifies both breath (or 'wind', AV) and 'spirit' (see RSV mg.). The phrase the four winds is an Akkadian idiom for the four quarters of the earth (see Cooke, ICC, p. 400). The breath of God does not come from the winds, in the sense of identity with them, but comes from the ends of the earth; translate therefore, 'Prophesy to the breath. . . . Come from the four quarters, O breath, and breathe upon these slain.' Cf. the Greek pneuma and the ambiguity in Jn. 3:8 (see RSV mg., RV mg.) arising therefrom.

12 The interpretation of the vision changes the figure by regarding the Israelites as buried in graves instead of scattered on the ground. This is a prediction of the reintegration of Israel's political life, not of a literal resurrection of the dead. Some expositors are eager to point out that the doctrine of resurrection was unknown in Israel at this time. It is pertinent to ask, however, whether it is more likely that the dogma of resurrection originated from this passage, as many believe, or whether the passage is not rather an application of the idea of resurrection with which Ezekiel was already acquainted. It seems extraordinary, in view of the later teaching on resurrection, that a prophet should coin this figure with no knowledge whatever of the doctrine. Probability would indicate that it is a figurative use of a conception already current in his circles.

15–28 Ezekiel enacts a symbol. Two sticks, representing the southern and northern kingdoms of Israel (Judah and Joseph being respectively their chief tribes), are joined to form one stick, symbolizing the unity of the nation on its return to the homeland. At that time the house of David shall rule over the united nation for ever (vv. 22, 24, 25; see on 33:23, 24). It is sometimes pointed out that this never happened in the post-exilic history of Israel; but the prophet is looking for nothing less than the advent of the Messianic kingdom, when the Tabernacle of God shall be with His people (v. 27; see Rev. 21:3). At that time the nations shall recognize the power of Yahweh through His redemption of His people (v. 28).

38:1 – 39:29 PROPHECY AGAINST GOG

These two chapters are unique in OT prophecy in that they describe an uprising of foreign powers against the people of God after the commencement of the Messianic kingdom. The prophet has already predicted the coming blessedness of Israel (33–37); he now portrays the nation as long settled in their land and transformed into a prosperous community (38:8, 11, 12, 14), a condition which, according to his earlier teaching, involves their prior repentance, regeneration and political revival (33–37). Whereas he had said that Israel's restoration would come 'soon' (36:8), he says that Gog will be mustered 'after many days . . . in the latter years' (38:8). The motive underlying the prophecy is the necessity of earlier prophecies concerning the destruction of hostile Gentile powers being fulfilled (38:17; 39:8) and for the nations of the world to learn the power, holiness and sole deity of Yahweh (see on 39:7). The author of the book of Revelation has both used these chapters to vivify his description of Armageddon prior to the millennium (Rev. 19:17, 18), and adapted their essential idea so as to make it a final rebellion of the godless of humanity at the end of the millennium, before the new creation (20:7–9). In comparing the two writings it should be remembered that Ezekiel knew nothing of a new creation nor of a new Israel which was to inherit the kingdom; if John was to incorporate the prophecy he had of necessity to change its form. In conformity with his usage of OT prophecy generally, he has not hesitated to do so.

38:2 Gog; perhaps from 'Gagaia', home of barbarians, mentioned in the Amarna letters. It is the name of the leader. Magog is both his land (as here) and people (39:6). In Rev. 20:8 Gog and Magog symbolically represent the godless nations of the whole world. Meshech and Tubal are always coupled together, in secular as well as biblical writings (see, e.g., Gn. 10:2; Ezk. 27:13; 32:26); the reading of RSV, AV and RV mg. chief prince of Meshech and Tubal is therefore preferable to that of RV 'prince of Rosh, Meshech and Tubal'. Meshech and Tubal were probably E of Asia Minor and are usually identified with Phrygia and Cappadocia; their equation with Moscow and Tobolsk, and Rosh with Russia, is unsupportable. 5 Put (as RV; AV 'Libya') is E Africa. 6 Gomer is linked with Magog in Gn. 10:2. They were called Gimirrai by the Assyrians and Cimmerians by the Greeks. Originating N of the Black Sea, by Ezekiel's time they had settled in Asia Minor. Their name survives in Gamir, Armenian name for Cappadocia. Beth-togarmah, NE of Asia Minor, is Armenia. From Ezekiel's point of view it appears to be in the uttermost parts of the north just as, to the author of Psalms of Solomon, Rome was regarded as 'the uttermost part of the earth' (Psalms of Solomon 8:16).

8 After many days; the invasion is not to occur for a long time. Cf. Is. 24:22. The latter years indicates the period of the kingdom (cf. Is. 2:2). 11 Israel, long settled in peace in her own land, has no fear of attack and so dwells in unwalled villages . . . without walls, and having no bars or gates (cf. Zc. 2:4). 13 Merchants and slave dealers all over the world are interested in the forthcoming campaign.

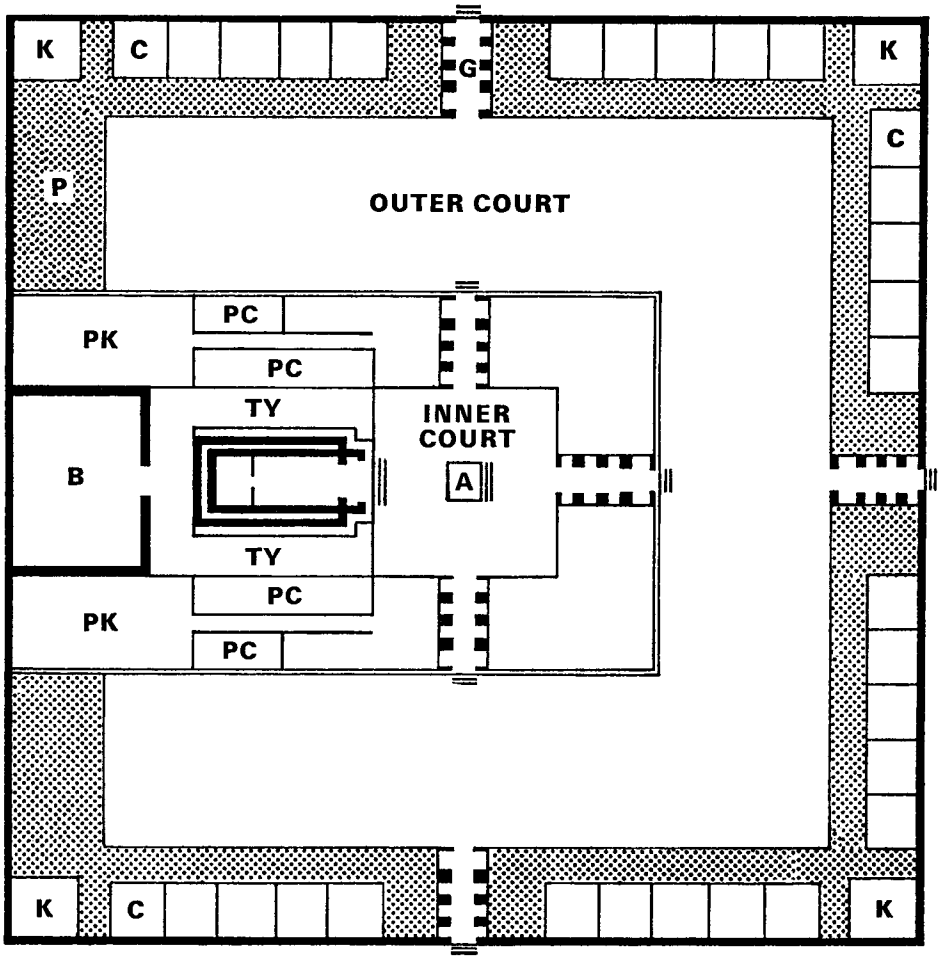
17–23 Gog's destruction will be by earthquake (vv. 19, 20), mutual strife (v. 21) and plagues like those on Egypt at the Exodus (vv. 22, 23); it is presumed that Israel will be brought safely through these calamities as in that former time. The reference to the earlier prophets in v. 17 would be to such passages as Zp. 3:8; Je. 3:6; and perhaps, seeing that the prophets spoke in former days, to prophecies known to Ezekiel but which have since perished.

39:1–20 cover the same ground as 38:2–4, 14–23 (see especially the commencement of the two chapters). The repetition is made to emphasize the marvellous nature of the deliverance; the number of weapons burned by the Israelites and the long time taken to bury the dead show the immensity of Gog's armies, while the feast for birds and beasts stresses the completeness of the victory. Both Israel and the nations will learn of Yahweh's greatness through this judgment (v. 7). This is a recurring theme of the prophecy (cf. 38:16, 23; 39:6, 13, 21–23, 25–29).

11–16 The burial of Gog and his hosts takes place in a valley E of the Dead Sea; strictly this is outside the borders of Israel in the kingdom of God (47:18), but it is sufficiently close to serve as a memorial of honour for the victorious nation. The removal of all trace of corpses is necessary for the complete cleansing of the land (cf. Nu. 35:33, 34; Lv. 5:2).

17–20 The picture of Yahweh's feast serves to underline the terrible destruction of Gog and his hosts. It entails a change of figure, for bodies cannot be both eaten and buried, but the inconsistency is so slight, and in any case vanishes in the light of vv. 14, 15, that it seems a hazardous ground for suggesting that the picture comes from another hand and relates to the Persian or Greek age. 21, 22 stress the supreme lesson to be learned by Israel and the nations. Israel's captivity and Gog's destruction alike reveal the holiness of God and His unfailing grace towards His people.

25–29 are a concluding summary of Ezekiel's prophecies of restoration: God will certainly perform His word to Israel and bring glory to His name in all the earth.



40:1 – 48:35 TEMPLE AND PEOPLE IN THE KINGDOM OF GOD

The concluding chapters of Ezekiel's writing form a strange contrast to the furious oratory of the earlier prophecies. In reality they are the essential complement to the judgments he had enunciated. Ezekiel was a priest as well as a prophet. It was his joyful task to balance the prophecies of the ruin of the Temple, the departure of Yahweh and the scattering of the nation with a detailed prediction of the rebuilding of the Temple, the return of Yahweh to His people and the reorganization of the national life. It was not sufficient to declare that the nation was to return and erect another Temple; they must be instructed how to build it. To ensure the holiness of Temple, people and worship alike, detailed instructions are issued by the prophet which were the fruit of both prolonged vision and reflection. If their reading is tedious to us, we must remember that, to the Jewish mind, it was impossible to bestow too much trouble and thought on the place whose name is 'Yahweh is there' (48:35). Such was the spirit in which these chapters were written. It needs little imagination to realize that among Ezekiel's companions in exile they would excite as much interest and discussion as anything he had as yet issued.

A word must be added concerning the interpretation of these chapters. It need hardly be said that Ezekiel has here advanced plans which he expected to be carried out to the letter. To make them a deliberately symbolic description of the worship of the Christian church is out of the question. Nor was the vision thought of as something to be fulfilled in normal conditions, as ch. 47 shows; it was a plan for the era of God's kingdom. Some expositors, accordingly, look for a rebuilding of the Temple at the second coming of Christ and an exact fulfilment of all Ezekiel's predictions in the kingdom of Christ.

B:	Building	PC:	Priests' chambers
C	Chamber	PK:	Priests' kitchens

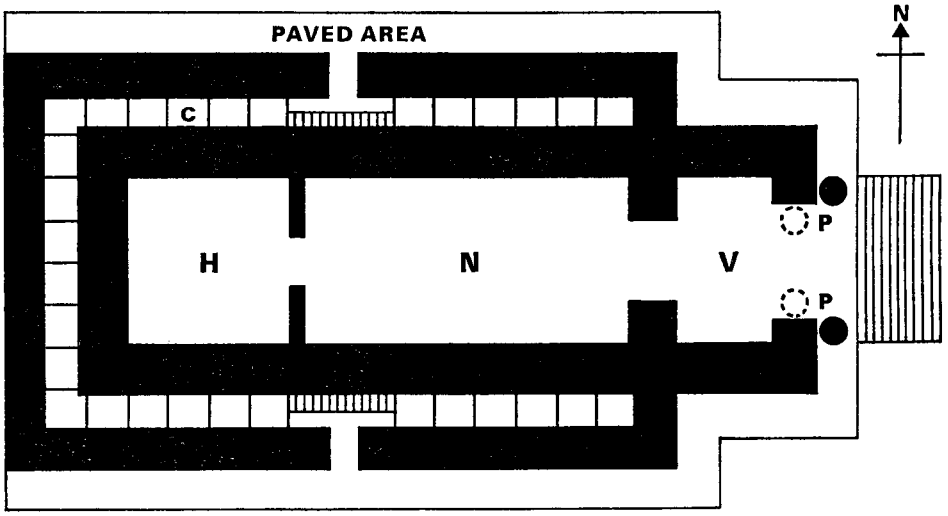
This view is challenged by certain fundamental principles of the NT. a. The atonement of our Lord has nullified all sacrifices for ever (Heb. 10:18). b. The heirs of the kingdom are no longer the Jewish nation but the church, the new Israel in which the old Israel may find its true place (Mt. 21:43; 1 Pet. 2:9, 10). c. John in the Revelation adapts these chapters to describe the church in the kingdom of God (Rev. 21:9 – 22:5) and removes from them all traces of Judaism. To speak of a 'double fulfilment' of all these things at the same time, so that there are two reigning Israels in the kingdom, two new Jerusalems, each having a river of life and trees of life, etc., two rulers from David's seed, an earthly and heavenly Sovereign, and so on, is to demand credence in the incredible. The conclusion of Ezekiel's prophecy, therefore, is to be regarded as a true prediction of the kingdom of God given under the forms with which the prophet was familiar, viz. those of his own (Jewish) dispensation. Their essential truth will be embodied in the new age under forms suitable to the new (Christian) dispensation. How this is to be done is outlined for us in the book of Revelation (21:1 – 22:5).

40:1 – 42:20 The plan of the new Temple

It is impossible in the limits of this commentary to attempt a full exposition of Ezekiel's description of the future Temple. This must be left to the longer works. The reading of his plans will be greatly facilitated if each paragraph is checked against the accompanying drawings.



Ezekiel is transported in vision to Mt. Zion where his angel guide greets him (40:1–4). The first thing that meets his eye is the wall surrounding the Temple precincts (v. 5; see Diagram 1). Passing through a massive gateway on the east side, built in similar style to many he had seen in Babylonian temples (vv. 6–16; see Diagram 2), he comes into the outer court about which was a pavement and thirty rooms set apart for the use of people during festivals (vv. 17–19).

P: Pillars (40:49): position not certain

V: Vestibule (40:48, 49)

N: Nave, or holy place (41:1, 2)

H: Inner room, or holy of holies (41:3, 4)

For the paved area, or platform, see 41:8-11.

On the north and south sides there are gateways similar to the one by which he had entered (vv. 20–26). In the four corners there are kitchens for the people (marked 'K'), but these are not described until 46:21–24. He walks through another large gateway into the inner court, which is at a higher level (note the references to steps in vv. 26, 31 and 34), and views the arrangements made for preparing sacrifices as well as certain rooms set apart for the priests (vv. 28–47). Here also there are gatehouses on the south (vv. 28–31) and on the north (vv. 35–37).

The Temple proper is now described, first the porch (vv. 48, 49), then the nave or 'holy place' (41:1, 2), then the most holy place (vv. 3, 4). See Diagrams 1 and 3. Round the north, west and south sides of the Temple are rooms in three storeys, thirty on each floor, presumably to be used for utensils, stores, etc., needed for the service of the Temple (vv. 5–11; these rooms are marked 'C' on Diagram 3). West of the Temple lies a separate building (marked 'B' on Diagram 1) whose purpose is not mentioned, but which may have been for storage (v. 12). The total measurements of the Temple and its immediate surroundings are supplied (vv. 13–17), and a description of the interior of the Temple follows in vv. 18–26. For the part that was left (v. 11) see Diagram 3 ('paved area'); for the temple yard (AV 'separate place') (vv. 12–14) see Diagram 1 ('TY').

North of the Temple in the inner court are two blocks of three-storey buildings, one twice the length of the other. The larger is to be used by priests for eating sacrifices (42:13), the shorter for dressing-rooms (v. 14). Similar buildings are on the south side of the Temple (42:1–14; see Diagram 1, 'PC'). Next to these are priests' kitchens (marked 'PK') but they are not described until 46:19, 20. The whole Temple enclosure is measured at 500 cubits (vv. 15–20, reading with the LXX cubits instead of AV 'reeds').

43:1–12 Yahweh's return to the Temple

As a fitting conclusion to his survey of the Temple, Ezekiel sees Yahweh returning in splendour by the gate through which He had earlier departed (10:19ff.; 11:23), henceforth never to leave it again (v. 7a). The prophet is told that in the future the shame of placing graves of Israelite kings next to the sanctuary must cease (v. 7b). Whereas in the past the palace had been contiguous to the Temple, separated from it only by a wall (v. 8), the whole of Mt. Zion was to be 'holy of holies' (v. 12).

43:13–27 The altar

The altar is described in vv. 13–17, the procedure of its consecration in vv. 18–27. Toy's summary of this description of the altar admirably clarifies its obscurities: 'It comprises a base twenty-seven feet square and eighteen inches high, with a moulding about nine inches wide; on this is set a square of twenty-four feet, three feet high; on this a square of twenty-one feet, six feet high; and above this the hearth, eighteen feet square and six feet high, on which the victim was laid; at the four corners are the horns, eighteen inches high, originally, perhaps, projections to which the victims were tied.' This translation of Hebrew measurements into English, however, obscures the fact that they are evidently symbolic: Cooke points out that the topmost altar-hearth was 12 cubits square and the height, including the horns, was also 12 cubits.

44:1–31 Levites and priests

After the introductory paragraph concerning the permanent closure of the east outer gate (vv. 1–4), the main topic of the chapter is discussed, viz. the status and offices of the two chief classes of priests. Formerly the menial work of the sanctuary had been done by aliens, probably prisoners of war (cf. Ezr. 8:20; Zc. 14:21). This, declared Ezekiel, had been an offence to God and must cease (vv. 6–9). Foreigners were to be replaced by the former priests of the country sanctuaries, the 'Levites', who had been responsible for much of Israel's religious declension (vv. 10–14). This procedure at once solved the problem as to how foreign labour could be avoided and pronounced a judgment on the Levites for their conduct, for they were henceforth excluded from the higher priestly functions.

15 The Levitical priests were of the line of Zadok, who was made principal priest by Solomon when Abiathar and his family were excommunicated from the priestly office (1 Ki. 2:26, 27, 35). They had continued ministering in the Temple of Jerusalem from that time onwards, and despite their aberrations (cf. ch. 8) were regarded as having perpetuated the true worship of Yahweh. Their obligations and duties are outlined in vv. 15–27, their rights of maintenance in vv. 28–31.

For the problems entailed in estimating the relations between Ezekiel, Deuteronomy and the 'priestly code', consult the larger commentaries.

45:1 - 46:24 Oblations and offerings

45:1ff. A portion of the land is to be offered to Yahweh, a territory about 8 miles square. Of this land a strip, two-fifths of the length, was for the priests, in the centre of which was the Temple (vv. 1–4); a further strip northwards of the same size was for the Levites (v. 5) and the remaining fifth southwards was designated for the city (v. 6). 7, 8 East and west of this square, stretching to the Jordan and Mediterranean respectively, was the prince's territory. The whole scheme appears to be directed to the safeguarding of the sanctity of the Temple, making it in very truth a 'holy of holies'. 9ff. A warning to the prince and his sons not to oppress the people as their forbears had done (v. 9; cf. 1 Sa. 26:19; 1 Ki. 21:19) is followed by a statement of the right standards for weights and measures (vv. 10–12), a source of perpetual trouble both in those and comparatively modern times. 13–17 outline the revenues to be paid to the prince for provision of the regular sacrifices. Two annual festivals are to be observed, the Passover in the first month (vv. 21–24) and the Feast of Harvest or Tabernacles in the seventh (v. 25). A kind of day of atonement is to precede each festival (vv. 18–20). 20 The quotation from the LXX in RV mg. is to be followed, 'so shalt thou do in the seventh month, on the first day of the month'.

46:1–18 Sabbath, new moon and daily offerings are detailed, with the privileges and obligations of the prince. 1, 2 While the prince, like the rest of the populace, was not permitted to enter the inner court, he was allowed to take up a position on the threshold of the east inner gate (i.e. the west end of the gate, facing the inner court) so as to observe the sacrifices more closely. 4–7 He is to make stated offerings every sabbath and every new moon. 8 It is again stressed that he is not to enter the inner court. 9 When the Temple is crowded at feasts, worshippers must pass through the Temple courts from gate to gate and not leave by the gate through which they entered; 10 this applies even to the prince.

16–18 The enactment concerning the prince's bequeathing of his property appears to be a limitation of his powers, both to ensure that his territory remains in the royal family and to prevent his seizure of commoners' lands (cf. on 45:9). 17 The year of liberty is more likely to be the fiftieth year, the year of jubilee (Lv. 25:13–15), than the seventh, the sabbatical year (Ex. 23:10, 11; cf. Ex. 21:2).

19ff. Kitchens for the use of priests (vv. 19, 20) and people (vv. 21–24) are now described, the former being situated at the north-west and south-west of the inner court (marked 'PK' on Diagram 1, p. 683), adjacent to the three-storey buildings running parallel to the Temple (42:1–14); the latter are placed in the four corners of the outer court (marked 'K' on Diagram 1). The kitchens for the people are themselves spoken of as courts (vv. 22, 23); they comprised 'a low wall surrounding each of these four corners; on the ground below and within these walls, recesses were made for the hearths or boiling places where the meals were cooked' (Cooke). This whole paragraph would suitably follow 42:20 and may have dropped out from that place.

47:1–12 The river of life

1ff. The prophet sees a river emerging from beneath the door of the Temple and flowing eastwards, leaving the Temple area just below the outer eastern gate. (Note that Ezekiel has to make a detour to reach that point; see 44:1, 2.) Passing along its banks, he traces its course till, from being a mere trickle (v. 3), it becomes a deep river (v. 5). In this formerly desert land trees in abundance grew on either side of the river (v. 7), yielding a perpetual cycle of fruits and healing leaves (v. 12). The water is fresh, sweetening even the waters of the Dead Sea and enabling fish to multiply wherever it flows (vv. 8–10), a point doubtless made in reference to the fact that fish carried down to the Dead Sea by the Jordan are thrown up on the shores dead.

This description is to be taken literally, but it may also have been intended to show that the source of the nation's blessing in the new age will be none other than Yahweh in His sanctuary. Many other lessons may be learned by the Christian, while John in the NT Apocalypse has characteristically used its figures to portray the spiritual blessings of the church in the age of consummation (Rev. 22:2).

47:13 – 48:35 Boundaries and allotments of the land

47:15–17 The northern border runs from the Mediterranean Sea, just north of Tyre, to a point near Damascus; 18 the eastern border is formed by the Jordan and the Dead Sea; 19 the southern from a little below the Dead Sea to the mouth of the Brook of Egypt (this is not the Nile; see NBD, art. 'Egypt, River of'); 20 the western border is formed by the Mediterranean Sea. No territory east of Jordan is included, neither is the old ideal regarded that the borders of Israel stretch from the Nile to the Euphrates (see, e.g., Gn. 15:18; Ex. 23:31). This may be due to Ezekiel's aiming at 'concentration rather than extension' (Cooke); the prophet was anxious that there should be no contamination of the Holy Land by Gentile influence (cf. 44:9). 22, 23 On the other hand the granting of full participation in the inheritance to the aliens who reside among you is more generous than anything else in OT legislation in these matters (but cf. Lv. 19:34; 24:22; Nu. 9:14).

48:1–35 The disposition of the land is dominated by the position of the Temple and its lands; seven tribes are placed north of the portion (vv. 1–7) and five south (vv. 23–29). This, together with the transference of the 'two and a half tribes' east of Jordan to the west side, has involved a change in the allotment from that of former times (cf. Jos. 13–17). Especially noteworthy is the removal of Judah from south to north. It has been suggested that 'the tribes descended from Leah and Rachel are brought nearer to the oblation than those descended from the handmaids Bilhah and Zilpah (Gn. 35:23–26), as though the more privileged positions were determined by relative purity of blood' (ICC, p. 531).

8–22 The portion has already been described in 45:1–8. In both chapters we are right to read cubits instead of AV 'reeds' in the measurements: see note on 42:15–20. It is inferred that Jerusalem is to be populated by members drawn from all the tribes of Israel (v. 19). Ezekiel draws special attention to the portion, city area and city itself being 25,000 cubits square (v. 20). This feature also impressed John, who however added that the height of the city was also of the same measurement as the length and breadth, so making the city a perfect cube, a tremendous 'holy of holies' (Rev. 21:16). The gates similarly find a place in John's city (cf. vv. 30–34 with Rev. 21:12, 13), but they intersperse twelve apostolic foundations (Rev. 21:14); the city is a Christian, not a Jewish, institution!

35 The whole description of the land and people in the kingdom of God is fittingly concluded by the declaration of the name that is to be given to the City of God, Yahweh Shammah, The Lord is there. The unfolding of this theme is the constant delight of the NT Apocalyptist, who again and again mentions the presence of God as the chief joy of the heavenly city (Rev. 21:1 – 22:5; cf. especially 21:3, 4, 7, 22, 23; 22:3–5).

Daniel

INTRODUCTION

POSITION IN CANON

In the Hebrew Bible the book of Daniel is found in the third division, the 'Writings', rather than in the second, in which the prophetical books occur. The reason for this is not that Daniel was written later than these prophetical books. In some lists, it may be noted, Daniel was included in the second division of the Canon. The reason why the book of Daniel came to be placed in the position which it now occupies lies in the status of the writer.

The authors of the prophetical books were men who occupied the technical status of prophet; i.e., they were men specially raised up by God to serve as mediators between God and the nation by declaring to the people the identical words which God had revealed to them. Daniel, however, was not a prophet in this restricted, technical sense. He was rather a statesman at the court of heathen monarchs. As a statesman, he did possess the prophetical gift, even though he did not occupy the prophetical office, and it is in this sense, apparently, that the NT speaks of him as prophet (Mt. 24:15). Daniel therefore was a statesman, inspired by God to write his book, and so the book appears in the OT Canon in the third division among the writings of other inspired men who did not occupy the prophetical office.

PURPOSE

At Mt. Sinai in the wilderness the God of heaven and earth set His affection in a peculiar way upon Israel, choosing her to be His people and declaring that He would be her God. He thus entered into a covenant relationship with Israel, and manifested this relationship by a mighty act of deliverance. His purpose for the nation was that it should be a 'kingdom of priests' and that God should be its ruler. Thus the theocracy (rule of God) was established. Israel was to be a holy nation, a light to lighten the Gentiles and to bear the saving knowledge of the true God to all people.

To this high purpose, however, Israel was not faithful. After being in the promised land for a time, she exhibited dissatisfaction with the fundamental principles of the theocracy by asking for a human king so that she might be like the nations round about. An evil king was first given to her, and then a man after God's own heart. David, however, was a man of war, and so it was not until the peaceful reign of Solomon that the Temple, the external symbol of the kingdom of God, was built. After the death of Solomon the northern tribes rebelled and renounced the covenant promises. From this time on, both in the northern and southern kingdoms, wickedness characterizes the people, and God announces His intention to destroy them (cf. Ho. 1:6; Am. 2:13–16; Is. 6:11, 12, etc.). The instruments which the sovereign God employed to carry out His purpose of bringing the theocracy to an end were the Assyrians and Babylonians. Under the power of these nations the theocratic people were carried into captivity, and the exile or period of 'indignation' came (Is. 10:25; Dn. 8:19).

The exile itself later gave way to a period of expectancy and preparation for Messiah's coming. It was revealed that a period of seventy sevens had been determined by God for the accomplishment of the Messianic work (Dn. 9:24–27). The book of Daniel, a product of the exile, serves to show that the exile itself was not to be permanent. Rather, the very nation which has conquered Israel will herself disappear from the scene of history, to be replaced by another, in fact by three more human empires. While these kingdoms were in existence, however, the God of heaven would erect another kingdom which, unlike the human kingdoms, would be both universal and eternal. It is thus the purpose of the book of Daniel to teach the truth that, even though the people of God are in bondage to a heathen nation, God Himself is the sovereign and ultimate Disposer of the destinies both of individuals and of nations.

This truth is taught by means of a rich use of symbol and imagery, and the reason for this characteristic is to be found in the fact that the revelations made to Daniel were in the form of vision. So his book may be called an apocalyptic work, but it towers far above the post-canonical apocalypses. The only work which may justly be compared with it is the NT book of Revelation. Essentially, Daniel exhibits the qualities of a truly prophetic book, and its imagery is used for a didactic purpose.

AUTHOR

The book of Daniel is a product of the exile and was written by Daniel himself. We may note that Daniel speaks in the first person and asserts that revelations were made to him (Dn. 7:2, 4ff.; 8:1ff., 15ff.; 9:2ff., etc.). Since, however, the book is a unity, it follows that the author of the second part (chs. 7–12) must also have composed the first (chs. 1–6). The second chapter, e.g., is preparatory to chs. 7 and 8, which develop its contents more fully and which clearly presuppose it. The ideas of the book reflect one basic viewpoint, and this literary unity has been acknowledged by scholars of different schools of thought. Daniel reflects the Babylonian and Persian background, and the alleged historical objections (to be discussed in the commentary) are not really valid. Lastly, an indirect approval of the genuineness of the book seems to be found in the following NT passages: Mt. 10:23; 16:27ff.; 19:28; 24:30; 25:31; 26:64.

In the Christian church it has been traditionally maintained, because of the claims of the book itself, that the historical Daniel was the author. The first known doubt to be cast upon this view came from Porphyry of Tyre (born c. AD 232–233), a vigorous opponent of Christianity, who maintained that the work was the product of a Jew living at the times of the Maccabees. During the 18th and particularly the 19th centuries, Porphyry's view seemed to come into its own in the world of scholarship. It was widely maintained that the book of Daniel was the work of an unknown Jew, living at the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. The reasons for this were the remarkable accuracy with which these times are described in Daniel, the supposed historical inaccuracies in the book, and the alleged lateness of the language of the prophecy. Sometimes too, it would seem, an attitude of aversion toward the supernatural character of the book led men to seek to deny its true prophetic character. Recently, however, perhaps largely as a result of Hölscher's study ('Die Entstehung des Buches Daniel' in Theologische Studien und Kritiken, xcii, 1919, pp. 113–138), there has been more of a tendency to recognize the antiquity of much underlying material in Daniel. It is still maintained—wrongly, we believe—that the book in its present form comes from the 2nd century BC, but that much of the material, particularly in the first part, is very much older.

It may be well briefly to consider some of the historical objections that have been raised against the book of Daniel.

In the first place it is said that the usage of the term 'Chaldean' betrays an age later than the 6th century BC. In the book of Daniel this term is employed in an ethnic sense to denote a race of people, and it is also used in a more restricted manner to indicate a particular class, viz. the wise men. This latter usage, however, it is argued, did not arise until long after the time of Daniel. In answer it may be said that Herodotus (c. 440 BC) speaks of the Chaldeans as a caste in such a way as to show that this must have been the case for years before his time. Since extra-biblical references are so few, we do not know enough to assert that the representations in Daniel are in error.

It has also been charged that Daniel would never have been admitted into the Babylonian priesthood or have been made its head. A careful reading of the prophecy, however, shows that Daniel merely exercised political authority (2:48, 49). There is no evidence that he was admitted or initiated into any religious caste. If the book of Daniel really is late, how can we conceive of the late author depicting Daniel as entering a heathen caste?

It has sometimes been maintained that there are no extra-biblical allusions to the account of Nebuchadrezzar's madness and that therefore the narrative is not historical. However, the historian Eusebius quotes from Abydenus a description of the last days of Nebuchadrezzar in which the language is such that it implies that something strange had occurred toward the end of the king's life. There are certain similarities in this account with what is stated in Daniel. In Berossus also (recorded in Josephus, Contra Apionem, i.20) there is a reflection upon the fact of the king's madness. In Cave IV of the Qumran caves a fragment known as The Prayer of Nabonidus has come to light. Nabonidus states that he was smitten with a malignant disease for 7 years. This account (to be considered in detail in the exposition of ch. 4) apparently reflects upon the account of Nebuchadrezzar's madness in Dn. 4.

Objection to the Danielic authorship of the book has also been advanced on the ground that the Aramaic language in which a part of the book is written belongs to a time after that of Daniel. While there is nothing in the Aramaic usage of Daniel which in itself would preclude Danielic authorship, it seems most likely that the character of the Aramaic is that which may be called 'Reich' or 'Kingdom' Aramaic; i.e., which was introduced into the Persian Empire by Darius I. Does this fact, however, rule out Daniel as the author? Not at all. It is quite possible that the Aramaic in which Daniel is written is simply a working over or modernizing of the Aramaic in which the book was originally composed. The question of the authorship of the book must be settled on grounds other than that of the language in which the book is written. A thorough discussion of Daniel's Aramaic has recently appeared in K. A. Kitchen, 'The Aramaic of Daniel', Notes on Some Problems in the Book of Daniel, 1965, pp. 31–79. A rejoinder appeared in a review by H. H. Rowley, JSS, Vol. XI, No. 1, pp. 112–116.

LITERATURE

The student will find a complete exposition of the modern point of view in the commentary by James A. Montgomery (the ICC Series). This same viewpoint is also expressed in the learned articles of H. H. Rowley. The views of the present writer are more fully expressed in The Prophecy of Daniel, 1949.

COMMENTARY

1:1–21 DANIEL RAISED TO POWER

1:1, 2 Nebuchadrezzar's expedition

1 In the third year of . . . Jehoiakim. According to Jeremiah (25:1; 46:2) the expedition of Nebuchadrezzar (for this version of the name, see NBD) against Jerusalem took place in the fourth year of Jehoiakim. Daniel, however, evidently employs the Babylonian method of reckoning, in which the first year is regarded as following the year of the king's accession to the throne. Hence, the first year would equal the second year of the Palestinian reckoning, and the third year (Babylonian reckoning) and the fourth year (Palestinian) would be equated. There is therefore no conflict with Jeremiah. Cf. D. J. Wiseman, 'Some Historical Problems in the Book of Daniel', Notes on Some Problems in the Book of Daniel, pp. 16–18. Cf. also D. J. Wiseman, Chronicles of Chaldaean Kings, 1956, p. 26. Jehoiakim king of Judah. He was placed on the throne by the king of Egypt and was a wicked king who, in his fourth year, became a subject of Nebuchadrezzar, and three years later revolted. He reigned for eleven years and was followed by his son Jehoiachin. See 2 Ki. 23:36 – 24:9; Je. 22:18, 19; 36:30.

It is not stated that Nebuchadrezzar attacked Jerusalem as king. Rather, he is here called king of Babylon proleptically. Note also that Daniel does not say that Nebuchadrezzar took Jerusalem, as some critics have asserted. It may be, as Berossus (Josephus, Contra Apionem i.19; Antiquities x.11.1) has said, that word reached him of the death of his father, and he returned to Babylon to take up the kingdom.

1:3–16 The Jewish youths at the Babylonian court

3 The etymology of the word Ashpenaz is uncertain. The man, however, was a chief marshal or officer at the court. People of Israel . . . There is no reference to three different classes, as AV suggests; follow RSV. 4 Among these people the king desired those who possessed a sound mind in a sound body, and who could, therefore, the more efficiently serve at the court.

5 In order to accomplish this design, the king provided a daily portion of both his food and wine. 6, 7 The Hebrew youths are introduced, and we learn that their names were changed. 8 Daniel resolved that he would not defile himself with the daily portion, the reason being that this food and drink had evidently been consecrated by a heathen religious rite, and to have eaten it would be, in Daniel's opinion, to have been guilty of idol-worship. 9 Daniel therefore approached the chief eunuch, and God made the officer favourably disposed toward him. 11–15 The steward (evidently an official who was under the chief eunuch) granted Daniel's request, and at the end of the appointed time the appearance of the youths was better and they were fuller in flesh than those who had partaken of the kings' food. Thus began the triumph of God's power and grace in Babylon.

1:17–21 The first triumph of grace in Babylon

17 The lives of the four youths were in the hands of God. He gave to them learning, that they might discern between the false and true in their instruction, which lay in the fields of letters (i.e. literature) and wisdom (which for them would include diplomacy or statecraft). Daniel also attained readiness or facility in the interpreting of dreams or visions. This mention of visions and dreams is an accurate reflection upon the Babylonian background of the book.

21 This does not mean that Daniel continued

only until the first year of King Cyrus. Rather, since the first year of Cyrus was the year which marked the close of the exile, it is mentioned to show that Daniel continued even to this time. The language does not imply that he did not continue beyond this time.

2:1–49 THE KING'S DREAM INTERPRETED BY DANIEL

2:1–16 Nebuchadrezzar's dream

1 In the second year. This phrase is thought by some to conflict with the three-year period of training mentioned in ch. 1. But the phrase 'three years' (1:5) need refer only to portions of years (cf., e.g., 2 Ki. 18:9, 10; Je. 34:14; Mk. 8:31), so that the first year of training could comprise part of the year of Nebuchadrezzar's accession, and the third year part of the second year of his reign (Babylonian reckoning). The king was so disturbed by the dream that his sleep left him. 2–4 Hence he immediately summoned those whom he believed able to tell the meaning of his dream. These men desired to know the dream that they might interpret it. In Aramaic (see RSV mg., v. 4) is found in the original but is not translated in RSV. It seems designed to call attention to the fact that from this point on to the end of ch. 7 the language of the book is Aramaic. It may be, however, that the words serve to indicate the language in which the Chaldeans spoke to the king. Some critics have asserted that such a statement could not be historical, but in the light of the recently-discovered (1942) Aramaic Letter of Adon, such an objection can no longer stand (cf. F. F. Bruce, 'More Light on Daniel's First Verse' in Bible League Quarterly, No. 203, 1950, pp. 6–8).

With respect to the Aramaic used in the book of Daniel, it may be said that there is nothing in it which in itself could preclude usage by Daniel. If, however, the present Aramaic should prove to be later, it would not affect Danielic authorship, but would merely show that the original Aramaic had been brought up to date by a later writer. It is difficult to determine why two languages are employed in Daniel, but Daniel himself probably wrote thus, employing the Aramaic, or language of the world, for those sections of his book which deal principally with the histories of the world empires, and the Hebrew for those sections which develop the future of the people of God and His kingdom.

5 The reason why the king will not relate the dream is not that he has forgotten it, as AV implies, but that he wants to test the wise men. You shall be torn limb from limb. The cruelty contained in this threat was widespread in antiquity, and characterized the dealings of the Babylonian kings. 10, 11 The Chaldeans declare their inability to tell and interpret the dream, asserting that such knowledge can be found only with the gods whose dwelling is not with flesh. By this confession the Chaldeans make reference to God, for even among pagans there has remained the persuasion that God exists (cf. Rom. 1:21). 12, 13 The king, however, was enraged and ordered the wise men to be slain. 14–16 Daniel judiciously intervenes and asks for time.

2:17–23 Daniel's prayer

18 The interpretation is called a mystery, since it is that which cannot be obtained by unaided human reason. 20 In response to the revelation, Daniel blesses God in prayer. To God belongs wisdom—He is omniscient and all-wise—and might, for He governs all things. 21 The course of history lies in God's hand, who changes times and seasons, and the destinies of rulers also are at His disposal. When true wisdom is found among men, it is a gift of God, and true understanding is also from Him. 22 He reveals deep and mysterious things, namely the wondrous works of God for the salvation of men. It is this sovereign God to whom Daniel utters his thanksgiving.

2:24–49 The interpretation of the dream

28 When Daniel reappears before the king he seeks to make clear that he has not come to the interpretation of the dream in his own power, but gives the glory to God. The dream is eschatological; i.e. it has to do with the latter days or, in other words, with the Messianic age (cf. Acts 2:16, 17; 1 Tim. 4:1; Heb. 1:1). 31ff. Daniel relates the content of the dream by describing the colossus which the king saw, the various parts of which were of different metals. The head of gold is identified as Nebuchadrezzar himself, and this probably means that we are to understand the Babylonian Empire as represented by its great king. Other parts of the image are said to stand for other kingdoms.

Different interpretations of this imagery have been offered. Most critical scholars who deny the authenticity of Daniel believe that the four empires represented by the colossus are Babylon, Media, Persia and Greece. It has been maintained by some of the advocates of this position that, since Media did not exist as a separate empire after the fall of Babylon, the book of Daniel is therefore in error. There are, however, strong reasons for rejecting this identification (see the author's The Prophecy of Daniel, 1949, pp. 275–294). Objections to this view will be pointed out as the exposition proceeds. From time to time conservative scholars have identified the kingdoms as Babylon, Medo-Persia, Alexander's Empire, and the successors of Alexander. But for the most part the traditional conservative position has been to identify them as Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece and Rome. This is the only position which interprets v. 44 correctly, a verse which distinctly states that the Messianic kingdom will be erected in the days of the kingdoms already mentioned. The first two views assume that the Messianic kingdom will be erected after the four human empires, and this is definitely counter to the teaching of v. 44.

The dispensationalist teaching interprets the ten toes of the image as representing a time when the Roman Empire will be revived and will be divided into ten kingdoms. It may be noted, however, that no mention is made of the number of toes.

34 The stone cut out by no human hand represents the Messiah and the growth of the Messianic kingdom, which kingdom is described as being eternal and of divine origin (v. 44), and thus standing in contrast with the human and temporal empires of the colossus.

47 God is God of gods . . . Nebuchadrezzar's confession does not really rise above the level of polytheism. He recognizes the superiority of Daniel's God, but does not yet adore Him as the true God. In the Letter of Adon (see on vv. 1–4) appears the precise Aramaic phrase, 'lord of kings', which Nebuchadrezzar applies to God. This fact supports the view that Daniel's Aramaic may date from the 6th century. It also shows that as Adon regarded the Egyptian pharaoh as a greater king than himself, so does Nebuchadrezzar regard Daniel's God as a King to whom he must do obeisance.

48 It need not be thought that Daniel's advancement would necessarily involve him in the superstitions of Babylon. We may be sure that a man of his sterling devotion to God would keep himself free from such defilement.

3:1–30 THE EPISODE OF THE FIERY FURNACE

1 An image. It was customary for the Assyrian kings to erect statues of themselves. That this was a statue of Nebuchadrezzar himself, however, is not expressly stated. It may be that Daniel's identification of the king as the head of gold (2:38) and his own satisfaction at the number of his conquests (among which Jerusalem itself might now probably be included) led Nebuchadrezzar to become filled with pride, and to erect this statue so as to honour both his god and himself. Of gold. The statue need not have been made of solid gold, but may have been gold plated. It is also possible that it may have rested upon a pedestal, and may have been in the form of an obelisk which at its base was 9 feet in breadth. The grotesqueness of the statue is no argument against the historicity of the account, and an evidence of genuineness is seen in the employment of the Babylonian sexagesimal system. The plain of Dura. The exact location has not been determined, although the word duru (an enclosing wall) is fairly common in Babylonian.

5 Objection to the authenticity of Daniel has been raised because of the presence of alleged Greek words here. The names of three of the musical instruments (viz. those translated lyre, harp, bagpipe) have sometimes been regarded as Greek. If they are Greek words, so the argument runs, then surely Daniel would not have known them, since he lived so long before the rise of Greek culture. If, however, these words are really of Greek origin, it does not follow at all that Daniel could not have used them, since Greek culture had spread very early, and there were Greek soldiers in Nebuchadrezzar's armies (see The Prophecy of Daniel, p. 87). See also the recent discussion by T. C. Mitchell and R. Joyce in Notes on Some Problems in the Book of Daniel, pp. 19–27.

12 The unjust character of the charge against the companions of Daniel should be noted. They are said to be Jews, thus stressing the fact that they are foreigners, with the possible implication that, being foreigners, they would not be loyal. Note further the statement that the king has honoured these Jews, the implication being that they were lacking in gratitude. The question has been raised why Daniel is not mentioned in this chapter. Various suggestions have been offered by way of answer, but none of them is satisfactory. Since the Bible at this point does not mention Daniel it is useless to speculate upon the matter.

13–15 In rage the king commands the three accused men to be brought before him and gives them an opportunity to deny the accusation. 16 offers some difficulty, and we may best translate the latter part of it as RSV rather than AV. In other words the three acknowledge the truth of the accusation and, rather than defend themselves, are willing to rest their case in the hands of God. 17 does not cast doubt upon God's ability to save, but rather stresses His ethical ability, i.e. if God in His good pleasure can deliver, He will do so.

19 In response Nebuchadrezzar orders the furnace to be heated seven times beyond what was usual, and the three were cast into the flames. 25 presents the king's astonishment when he sees in addition to the three Jews one in the furnace like a son of the gods. Through the opening at the bottom of the furnace the king saw a fourth Person, and, although speaking from the viewpoint of one steeped in Babylonian superstition, he recognizes the presence of a supernatural Being, one of the race of the gods. The heathen king, of course, could not recognize the true identity of the One before him. Some have thought that it was an angel who appeared in the furnace, but more likely we have to do with a pre-incarnate manifestation of the Son of God.

In the deliverance of the three a mighty miracle was performed by God. A miracle is an act, performed in the external world by the supernatural power of God, contrary to the ordinary course of nature (although not necessarily performed against the ordinary means of nature) and designed to be a sign or attestation. A miracle, therefore, is not to be regarded merely as a mighty work, but as a mighty work designed to attest God's redemptive purposes. The miraculous deliverance from the fiery furnace was designed to show the sovereignty of the true

God over the nation which had taken Israel captive. 29 Nebuchadrezzar acknowledges the superiority of Israel's God for there is no other god who is able to deliver in this way. Although he has advanced beyond what he said in 2:47, he has not yet spoken from a heart of true faith.

4:1–37 A SECOND DREAM INTERPRETED BY DANIEL

4:1–18 Nebuchadrezzar's dream

1–3 The doxology with which ch. 4 begins presents certain difficulties, since its language exhibits familiarity with biblical thought, and this would be strange, it is maintained, on the part of a heathen monarch. But it must be remembered that Daniel had exerted an influence upon the king, and the theocratic language of the edict is probably due to Daniel's influence.

4ff. Nebuchadrezzar states that he had dreamed a dream which the Chaldeans could not interpret, but Daniel in whom is the spirit of the holy gods interpreted the dream. This particular phrase may be paraphrased, 'that which pertains to true deity is to be found in Daniel'. Perhaps the reason why the king did not immediately summon Daniel was not that he had forgotten Daniel, but that he realized that the dream had to do with humiliation which he would suffer at the hands of Daniel's God. He wants to have nothing to do with Daniel's God, until driven to Him by extreme necessity.

The content of the dream is related in vv. 10–18. 10 In the midst of the earth; i.e. the tree occupied upon earth a central position so that it would attract attention. Evidently the king in this symbolism recognized himself. The language is that of paganism, for it is the king who speaks. Probably the king, in mentioning the vigilant, has reference to angels known to him from the Babylonian religion. 16 Here the stump of the tree is personified. Its heart is to be changed 'away from' that which is human. This is to be done until seven times (or periods of time, the length not being stated) pass over him. Since the length of the times is not stated, we are not warranted in identifying the duration in terms of years. 17 The king interprets the decree as of the watchers, but this pagan interpretation is repudiated by Daniel, who says that it is a decree of the Most High which has come upon the king (v. 24).

4:19–37 The interpretation and fulfilment of the dream

Upon hearing the dream Daniel was perplexed, for he himself wished the king well, but realized that the dream contained the announcement of a judgment upon the king from God. 19ff. For a moment, not 'for a long time' as in some editions of RSV. The phrase is an idiom; AV's 'for one hour' is incorrect. We may render correctly 'for a moment'. Daniel then interprets the dream and advises the king as to what must be done if the period of tranquillity before the judgment is to be lengthened (v. 27). It is generally assumed that, if Nebuchadrezzar repents, the threatened calamity will be averted. The text, however, does not mention an averting of the predicted judgment. The thought appears to be that the judgment threatened will come in order to bring Nebuchadrezzar to the knowledge of the true God (v. 25). However, if he repents of his sins he will enjoy a longer period of tranquillity.

27 Jerome and many following him have interpreted this verse as though it said, 'Redeem your sins by almsgiving, and your iniquities by showing mercy to the poor.' This of course teaches salvation by the merit of human works, and such a thought is foreign, not only to this verse, but to the entire Bible. Daniel's words do not mean 'Redeem your sins by almsgiving' but break off (i.e. 'cease') your sins, by means of doing righteously. In other words, we have to do here with a command to repent, to turn from evil and to do good. It is a perversion of the text to force it to teach the doctrine of salvation by human merit.

30 should be noted because it so accurately reflects Nebuchadrezzar's attitude. He was primarily a builder, rather than a warrior, and his own statements, preserved upon the cuneiform inscriptions, show his pride in the city and palace which he rebuilt. 31–33 The judgment came upon Nebuchadrezzar as predicted, and he was driven from men, acting like an animal, apparently suffering from the disease known as lycanthropy. 34–37 At the end of the predicted time the king's reason returned to him, and from a heart of faith he praised the true God.

Among the fragments in Qumran Cave IV (1955) was an Aramaic fragment now called The Prayer of Nabonidus. It is regarded as coming from the second half of the 1st century BC. On this fragment the speaker identifies himself as Nbny (probably Nabonidus), king of Assyria and Babylonia, and claims that for 7 years he was struck with an evil inflammation. When he confessed his sins, a Jew of the exile explained matters to him. The writer of this fragment, it would seem, has confused matters, attributing to Nabonidus the illness of Nebuchadrezzar. His ignorance of history appears in his identifying Nabonidus as king both of Assyria and Babylonia, whereas Nabonidus was king only of Babylonia.

5:1–30 BELSHAZZAR'S FEAST AND THE MYSTERIOUS HANDWRITING

The fifth chapter of Daniel, although it has often been attacked as inaccurate in its statements, is nevertheless noteworthy for its accuracy.

There was a time when the name Belshazzar proved to be a difficulty to expositors since his name was not known from the monuments. Hence, while some sought by various means to identify him, others denied his existence altogether. However, the name of the king, as the subsequent discussion will point out, has been found upon cuneiform tablets, and there can be no question about his historicity. The Bible is thus shown to be accurate in its mention of Belshazzar.

1 King Belshazzar. This statement has been criticized (most ably by Prof. H. H. Rowley, 'The Historicity of the Fifth Chapter of Daniel' in JTS, Vol. XXXII, pp. 12–31), since Belshazzar never reigned as sole king, and is never designated as king (sharru) in the cuneiform inscriptions. Furthermore, it is maintained that there is no evidence to show that Belshazzar ever ruled upon the throne as a subordinate to Nabonidus his father. In reply to these charges we may note, first of all, that the Aramaic word malka ('king') need not have the connotation of monarch or sole king (see R. D. Wilson, Studies in the Book of Daniel, 1917, pp. 83–95). Furthermore, one of the cuneiform documents expressly states that Nabonidus entrusted the kingship to Belshazzar. Now, it follows that if a kingship has been entrusted to a man and that man administers the affairs of the kingship, he is acting as a king. It is precisely that which Belshazzar did. Although on the cuneiform documents Belshazzar is consistently designated 'son of the king', yet he is also set forth as performing regal functions (see The Prophecy of Daniel, pp. 115–118, for evidence). In all probability there was a co-regency between Nabonidus and Belshazzar in which Belshazzar occupied a subordinate position. Since, however, he was the man upon the throne with whom Israel had to do, he is designated king in the book of Daniel. No valid objection can be raised against this usage.

Great feast. Here again we meet the accuracy of this chapter, for great feasts were characteristic of antiquity. The word thousand must evidently be considered as a round number, and serves to indicate the size of the banquet. It was the custom at oriental feasts for the king to sit on a raised platform, apart from the guests. So in the statement that Belshazzar drank in front of the thousand we have another instance of the accuracy of the chapter. 2 Nebuchadrezzar is said to be the father of Belshazzar, and since this seems not to have been so, some commentators have considered the text in error. However, since the use of the word 'father' in the Semitic languages was vague, there need not be an error here. The word 'father' was capable of being employed in at least eight different ways, and it may be that it is used here merely in the sense of ancestor.

5 The plaster of the wall. Excavations have shown that the palace wall did have a thin coating of painted plaster. This plaster was white, so that any dark object moving across it would stand out distinctly. 6, 7 By the sight of the hand, the king was startled out of his stupor of drunkenness, and he promised that the man who could read the writing would be made the third ruler (or 'Triumvir') in the kingdom. The word translated third ruler means 'one of three', and these would include, in the order of authority, Nabonidus, Belshazzar, Daniel. The use of the word implies that Belshazzar himself was only second in the kingdom. It is a mark of accuracy such as would be almost inconceivable if the book of Daniel were a product of the 2nd century BC. 10 And the queen said. This fact of the queen addressing the king also attests the remarkable accuracy of the present chapter. In Babylonia the queen mother held the highest rank in the royal house. 13 Because of her intervention Daniel is summoned. 17–23 He rejects the king's rewards and preaches to the king concerning his wickedness. 24–28 He then proceeds to interpret the strange writing. Each of the words is explained and then applied: MENE, 'numbered', i.e. God has numbered (Aram. mᵉnā') the days of the kingdom; TEKEL, a 'shekel', used both as a coin and as a weight, indicated that Belshazzar was weighed (in the balances) and found deficient; PERES, 'division', your kingdom is divided (pᵉrēs) and given to the Medes and Persians (pārās). The word pārās would seem to point out that the Persians were the dominant power to whom Babylon would fall. When Daniel read the writing he read and PARSIN (v. 25), but in giving the interpretation he employed the form PERES (v. 28). The Aramaic conjunction 'and' is u, after which p becomes ph; hence AV's upharsin. Parsîn is a plural form, whereas pᵉrēs is singular. We have thus a play upon words in which the basic idea of division is linked with the name of the conqueror.

5:31 – 6:28 DANIEL IN THE LIONS' DEN

5:31 really belongs to ch. 6, and is so treated here. The mention of Darius the Mede constitutes a problem, since Darius is unknown from secular history. Attempts have been made to identify him with Cambyses, Astyages, Cyaxares and Gobryas, but, in the present writer's opinion, these attempts are not convincing. The period of the downfall of Babylon is somewhat obscure, and it is possible that Darius was some hitherto unknown figure, who may have been entrusted with the kingship by Cyrus. Recently two scholarly attempts have been made to identify Darius the Mede. John C. Whitcomb (Darius the Mede, 1959) distinguishes Gubaru from the Gobryas of the Behistun Inscription and holds that he and Darius are identical. D. J. Wiseman (in Notes on Some Problems in the Book of Daniel, pp. 9–16) argues for an identification of Darius with Cyrus the Great. One can no longer say that it is not possible to identify Darius or that the writer of Daniel conceived, as has been charged, of a separately existing Median Empire after the fall of Babylon. Darius is said to be a Mede merely because he was of Median ancestry; it is not stated that he was king of the Medes. In this very context (5:28) the Medes and Persians are brought together, and in 6:8 'the law of the Medes and the Persians' (not merely the Medes) is mentioned. All the evidence in the book of Daniel points to the fact that the kingdom which followed Babylonia was Medo-Persia and not the Medes alone.

6:1 Darius appointed 120 satraps or 'kingdom-protectors' to care for the newly conquered country. The statement is not out of harmony with secular history. 3 Since Daniel in his position distinguished himself, jealousy appeared among the others and they sought a means of destroying him. 6 Came by agreement; better than AV, RSV mg. It gives the sense that they acted in harmony. 7 Makes petition; i.e. a religious request, since the king would be regarded as the sole representative of deity. Many critics, since they regard such an action as impossible during the days of the Persian kings, believe this account to be unhistorical. However, while there may be difficulties in the account, at the same time the king may very well have been overcome by the subtle flattery of the proposal and so yielded to it. The foolish and wicked action of the king, however, did not cause Daniel to be unfaithful to God. 10 In continuing to pray, Daniel was not guilty of ostentation, but evidently so prayed that he would be found out only by those who were willing to spy on him.

16ff. Objections have been raised against the account of the den of lions which have been based upon the assumption that the den must have been constructed in a particular way. In all probability there was an opening at the top through which Daniel had been lowered into the den, and through which the king later spoke with Daniel, and also an opening at the side through which the lions were fed. It was probably such a side entrance which was closed by the stone and seal; the entrance at the top was evidently too high for any man to escape through it.

24 In the punishment of the accusers we need not assume, as some commentators have, that 120 satraps, together with their wives and children, were cast into the den. The body of accusers was likely rather small, and these, as instigators of the attack upon Daniel, were doubtless the ones who were punished. Note the phrase, those men who had accused (i.e. 'slandered') Daniel, which seems to single out the guilty from the rest. We must not assume that the author of this noble account would introduce into it an absurdity, such as would be the case if all the satraps and their families had been thrown into the den, and were said to be in the power of the lions before reaching the bottom of the pit.

The accuracy of the account should be stressed, since it was in accordance with Persian custom to punish the relatives of a man because of his crime. 28 The chapter closes with the statement of Daniel's prospering during the reign of Darius and the reign of Cyrus the Persian. The designation of Cyrus shows that he was of different racial ancestry from Darius, who was a Mede. The kingdom, however, over which both reigned was the same; there was not first a Median and then a Persian kingdom. It was one kingdom, administered first by a Mede and then by a Persian.

7:1–28 DANIEL'S VISION OF THE FOUR BEASTS

7:1–14 The vision described

The subject of this chapter is the same as that of ch. 2. 1 The dream which Daniel saw and the visions of his head were not those which originated in his head or brain, but rather those which came to his head and were intellectually apprehended. The dream and visions were special, divinely-imposed revelations, as the remainder of the chapter assumes. We are dealing, then, not with an ordinary dream of Daniel's, but with a revelation from God.

2 In the dream the four winds of heaven were stirring up (RV 'brake forth') the great sea. The sea represents humanity (cf. v. 17); it is not the Mediterranean or any particular sea that is intended, but simply the vast, limitless deep. The four cardinal winds symbolize heavenly powers, and these heavenly powers set the nations of the world in motion.

4 The first beast to arise from the sea corresponds to the head of gold of the image (cf. 2:32). The symbolism of the lion and eagles' wings represents Babylon, as may be seen from Je. 4:7; 49:19; Hab. 1:8; Ezk. 17:3. It is difficult to see how a writer, living long after the destruction of the Babylonian Empire, could have learned of this imagery. Babylon is represented by the most kingly of creatures. The change which came upon the beast evidently has reference to the event of Nebuchadrezzar's madness and his subsequent restoration. Both outwardly and inwardly, a humanizing process takes place.

5 The second beast to arise from the sea has a double-sided aspect. The feet on one side were raised for the purpose of going forward, whereas the feet on the other side were not thus raised. The beast is commanded to devour the flesh which is already in its mouth. Attempts have been made to identify the three ribs, but it is probably best to regard the number as a round one and not to seek for specific identifications.

6 The third beast which arises from the sea is a leopard or 'panther', an animal noted for speed and agility. On its back; the phrase may also be rendered 'on its sides', and it may be that, like the representations of winged beasts from Babylon, the beast had wings on its sides. The wings evidently denote swiftness. Four heads. These stand not for the four Persian kings mentioned in Dn. 11:2, nor for the four successors of Alexander's conquests, but rather, in order to symbolize the universal character of the kingdom, for the four corners of the earth. In Dn. 2:39 it was stated that this kingdom 'shall rule over all the earth'.

7 The fourth beast is introduced with particular solemnity. It is nondescript, for in the animal realm its likeness could not be found. The description stresses the beast's destructive character. Different. In the Aramaic a participle is employed, which we may translate 'was acting differently'. There are three points in the appearance of this fourth beast which call for special notice: first, the beast itself is mentioned; second, the ten horns upon the beast's head; and third, the little horn. It would seem, therefore, that, because of the order of statement, we have to do with the unfolding of a history. 8 After beholding the beast, Daniel was contemplating the horns, and then beheld another horn, a little one. The horn is described as 'little', but constantly acted as though it were big. Thus a contrast appears. This little horn does not grow in size, as does that mentioned in ch. 8. The description of the horn as little serves to call attention to the eyes and the mouth, which speaks blasphemous and presumptuous things against God.

9 introduces a heavenly scene of judgment. Were placed; the thought is that the thrones were placed in preparation for the judgment. Ancient of days; the literal meaning of the phrase is 'one advanced in days'. The Figure upon the throne therefore was that of an aged, venerable Person. The symbolism is intended to signify that God is seated upon the throne, ready to pronounce judgment. 10, 11 The scene of judgment is majestically conceived, and the tenseness with which one anticipates the pronouncement of judgment is heightened by the fact that throughout the preparation of the scene Daniel hears the mouth of the little horn speaking presumptuous things. In the vision the judgment falls first upon the fourth beast, a judgment which utterly destroys it. When the little horn is destroyed, then the power of the fourth kingdom disappears entirely. 12 The first three beasts which were seen in the vision lose their power to rule, but are nevertheless allowed to continue alive until the coming of the time which God had determined.

13 introduces a new aspect to the scene, for the judgment is not concluded by the destruction of the beasts but includes also the establishment of the kingdom of a son of man. With the clouds; i.e. in accompaniment with the clouds. This description is intended to express the deity of Him who comes with the clouds, for it is a symbolism expressive of judgment (cf. Is. 19:1; Pss. 104:3; 18:10–18; Mt. 24:30; Mk. 13:26; Rev. 1:7). Read a son of man, not 'the Son of man', as AV. It is a figure in human form, as distinguished from the beasts which represented the four kingdoms of men. It is not explicitly stated that the figure was a man, but that he was the likeness of a man. Thus, he is a human-like Personage, and so distinguished from the beasts which arose from the sea. The heavenly figure is escorted majestically before the Ancient of Days; 14 and an eternal and universal kingdom is given to Him.

It is now necessary to inquire as to the interpretation of the vision. Three views may be noted.

a. Among scholars who do not hold to the Danielic authorship of the book it is generally thought that the four beasts which arise from the sea stand for the following kingdoms: Babylon, Media, Persia and Greece. Since such an order of kingdoms never occurred historically, it is consequently assumed that at this point the book of Daniel is guilty of a historical error. There are several arguments adduced by those who favour the identification of the kingdoms just mentioned. For one thing it is maintained that if Rome, instead of Greece, is intended by the fourth beast, then the prophecy does not agree with history. When in AD 476 the historical Roman Empire came to an end, ten kingdoms did not arise from it. Therefore, it is argued, the fourth beast does not signify Rome. In opposition to this line of reasoning, however, it may be said that the number ten is not to be pressed and taken literally; it is a round number, and the symbolism of the ten horns merely has reference to a second phase in the history of the beast. It may further be pointed out that those who see in the fourth beast a reference to Greece have great difficulty also in identifying ten kings or kingdoms. In fact, such identification cannot be made. Attempts are usually made to discover ten successive kings after the death of Alexander, whereas the emphasis of the symbolism of the ten horns is not upon succession but upon contemporaneity; the ten horns exist during a second phase of the beast's history.

It is further maintained that the little horn of ch. 7 is to be identified with the little horn of ch. 8. Now this latter horn is expressly identified (8:23) as a king who shall arise from Greece, and therefore it is concluded that the little horn of ch. 7 must also arise from Greece and hence the fourth beast must represent Greece and not Rome. However, in reply to this two things may be said. In the first place, the description of the little horn of ch. 7 and that of the horn of ch. 8 show beyond any shadow of a doubt that they are not intended to be identified. If anyone will list the characteristics of each of these horns and will note carefully what is said about each, he will be impressed with the dissimilarity of the two. Secondly, if one will compare carefully all that is said in ch. 7 concerning the nondescript beast (v. 7) with the description of the he-goat (Greece) in ch. 8, he will discover how essentially different the two are. They differ with respect to origin, nature and destiny.

It is also argued that Darius is portrayed as a Median who ruled after Belshazzar and before Cyrus. However, such a charge is not quite accurate; nowhere in Daniel is it stated that Darius ruled before Cyrus. Furthermore, it has been claimed that Darius is called a Median and Cyrus a Persian, and thus a racial distinction is emphasized. However, the racial distinction has to do with the men themselves and not with the kingdom over which they reigned, which kingdom in the book of Daniel is the kingdom of the Chaldeans. Lastly, it has been argued that according to Dn. 5:28 the kingdom is to be divided between the Medes and Persians.

With respect to these arguments it should be noted that although Darius is identified as a Mede, it does not at all follow that the empire over which he ruled was Median. Such a deduction is a non sequitur. Also, when it is said that the kingdom will be divided (5:28), the meaning is that its present form (the form which it had when Belshazzar was king) would be broken and it would be given to the enemy, the Medes and Persians. The verse does not mean that part of the kingdom will be given to the Medes and part to the Persians. In the light of the above considerations, therefore, we feel constrained to reject the identity of the four beasts which finds Greece represented by the fourth beast. (Note: The student who wishes to read a capable defence of the identification outlined above should procure H. H. Rowley's Darius the Mede and the Four World Empires, 1935. For the conservative position see The Prophecy of Daniel, pp. 275–294.)

Advocates of the position outlined above find the identification of the heavenly Figure like a Son of man in the people of Israel, 'the saints of the Most High'. In support of this interpretation appeal is made to 7:18, 27 where it is stated that the kingdom is given to the saints. However, the saints receive it as a trust from the Son of man to hold it for ever. The Son of man is presented as a supernatural Figure and therefore He is not to be identified with the saints. Rather, they as kings reign in His kingdom.

b. The second interpretation is that held by the dispensationalist school of thought. This agrees with the traditional view in identifying the kingdoms as Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece and Rome. It is believed, however, that there will be a revived Roman Empire which will be divided into ten kingdoms, and so the ten horns of the beast are compared with the ten toes of the image in ch. 2. This ten-kingdom period is said to occur after the return of Christ for His people. The little horn signifies a prince of the revived Roman Empire who will be satanically inspired. We must, however, leave the detailed discussion of this view for consideration in connection with 9:24–27.

c. The interpretation which the present writer believes to be correct is the following. Since the four beasts arise from the sea (mankind), they therefore represent kingdoms which are of human origin and consequently are both temporal and non-universal. The first beast stands for Babylonia. The second, as its double-sided character shows, stands for Medo-Persia, and not for Media alone. The third represents Greece. The fourth beast itself symbolizes the historical Roman Empire.

As for the ten horns, they stand for kingdoms which are to exist during the second phase of the beast's history. It does not necessarily follow that these kingdoms must arise immediately after the downfall of Rome, but only that they may be able to trace their origin back to Rome. They are contemporary only in the sense that they exist during this particular period; they need not be actual contemporaries.

As this second period comes to a close a third period is introduced by the appearance of the little horn. From the symbolism it is not possible to tell whether this little horn represents a man, a government, a coalition of governments or an ideology. He will oppose the saints until the judgment of God brings about the complete destruction of the fourth beast.

The kingdom given to the Son of man is not of human, but of divine origin, and is both universal and eternal. The heavenly Figure does not represent the saints, but, as the symbolism shows, is a divine Personage. It was this vision that our Lord had in mind when He referred to Himself as the Son of man.

7:15–28 The interpretation of the vision

15 As for me, Daniel, my spirit within me was anxious. In the vision itself Daniel introduces himself in order to show how he was affected by what he had seen. 18 The saints of the Most High; not the Jews in distinction from the heathen, but the redeemed, i.e. true believers, who are to be a kingdom of priests, a holy nation (cf. Ex. 19:6). They do not found the kingdom themselves but receive it as a trust from the Son of man, to whom the kingdom was given. 22 Judgment was given. This verse expresses the ultimate outcome of the war which the little horn wages against the people of God. The judgment is one which God makes on behalf of His people, so that they are in eternal and secure possession of the kingdom. 25 A time, two times, and half a time. These words characterize the intensity of the little horn's persecution. The length of period indicated by the word time is not stated, and consequently we are not warranted in identifying it as a year. The expression itself is chronologically indefinite, yet the meaning is quite clear. The power of the little horn will appear for a time, and then for two times. Thus there is expressed symbolically a doubling of the intensity of the little horn's power. It would seem that this power would continue to grow, and we should expect this to be signified by the words 'four times', thus making a total of seven, symbolizing complete and perfect triumph upon the part of the persecutor. Instead, however, we find mention of half a time, and thus learn of the sudden end of the power of the little horn, an end brought about, we believe, by divine judgment and the return of the Lord from heaven.

8:1–27 DANIEL'S VISION OF THE RAM AND THE HE-GOAT

8:1–14 The vision described

2 Susa the capital; RV mg. 'Shushan the castle'. Susa, the capital of Persia, in the OT is constantly designated the 'fortress'. We are not to think of Daniel as actually present in Persia and beholding the vision there, but rather while beholding the vision he was present in the vision in Susa. 3 A ram. The ram with the two horns represents Medo-Persia (see v. 20). 4 The butting of the ram symbolizes the rapid conquests of the Persian kings. 5 A he-goat; this stands for Greece (see v. 21), and the conspicuous horn represents the first king, i.e. Alexander (see v. 21). 7 The symbolism of the he-goat smiting the ram signifies the Grecian conquest of Medo-Persia. 8 The great horn was broken. By this the death of Alexander is symbolized. The four horns which arose in its place represent the four kingdoms into which Alexander's empire was broken, viz. Macedonia, Thrace, Syria and Egypt. 9 The horn which comes forth is not actually described as little, but is said to have 'gone forth from littleness'; i.e. the state of being little. From small beginnings the horn then grew to great power. The glorious land is a designation of Canaan, the promised land (cf. Je. 3:19). 10 Host of heaven; i.e. the stars (cf. Je. 33:22); the symbolism has reference to the saints, who are the objects of attack. 11 The Prince; i.e. God Himself. The 'acting greatly' (magnified itself) toward God consisted in the removal of the temple sacrifices. 14 The length of the desolation which the horn causes is stated as for two thousand and three hundred evenings and mornings. The figures given do not mean 1,150 days, but, as the AV translates, 2,300 days. The expression evening-morning (probably based upon Gn. 1) means a day. This entire period of the abominations of Antiochus would extend from about 171 BC to 165 BC, and then the sanctuary would be restored.

8:15–27 The interpretation of the vision

15 As Daniel in his mind was seeking to understand the vision an angel in the likeness of a man stood before him. 19 The appointed time of the end refers not to the end of all things, nor to the final judgment, but to the end of the time when afflictions will fall upon Israel. The latter end of the indignation; i.e. the end of the period when indignation has fallen upon God's people. It is the period of the appearance of Antiochus Epiphanes. 23 Of bold countenance; i.e. one of unyielding countenance; the reference is to Antiochus. Understands riddles; i.e. one who was a master of dissimulation. 25 By no human hand. It is God who will bring to an end the power of the tyrant.

9:1–23 DANIEL'S PRAYER

2 Books. This term evidently has reference to the Scriptures. From the study of Jeremiah Daniel learns that the period of exile will endure for 70 years (Je. 25:12). He therefore turns to the Lord in supplication because of the sins of his people. 4–14 Daniel makes acknowledgment of Israel's guilt, and in this acknowledgment includes himself. 15–19 constitute a plea for God's mercy and forgiveness. 20–23 While Daniel is still engaged in prayer Gabriel comes from God to make Daniel wise in understanding.

9:24–27 THE PROPHECY OF THE SEVENTY SEVENS

This remarkable section declares that a definite period of time has been decreed by God for the accomplishment of the restoration of His people from bondage. The general theme, viz. the decreeing of a period of seventy sevens, is stated in v. 24, and the details are worked out in the three subsequent verses. It will be necessary to discuss the meaning of practically every word in this brief section.

24 Seventy weeks of years. The word which is usually translated weeks is more accurately rendered 'sevens'. It means a period divided into sevens, the precise length of this 'besevened' period not being stated. The word comes first in the Hebrew, and we may paraphrase, 'a period of sevens, in fact, seventy of them'. Are decreed; i.e. the sevens were decreed by God as the period in which the Messianic redemption was to be accomplished. Concerning; i.e. with respect to Daniel's people and Jerusalem, the holy city. The revelation of this decreed period thus has direct reference to Daniel's prayer. The time of the exile is almost concluded, what then lies in store for God's people? In answer it is revealed that with respect to these people a period of seventy sevens has been determined in which their salvation is to be accomplished.

The seventy sevens have been determined for the express purpose of bringing about six results, three of which are negative and three positive. To finish (RV mg. 'to restrain') the transgression; transgression which hitherto has lain open and bare is to be sealed up and put away, so that it may no longer be considered as in existence. To put an end to sin, and to atone for iniquity. The language implies that a necessary sacrifice will be offered, upon the basis of which iniquity will be forgiven. Thus, the negative result to be obtained is the abolition of the curse which separates God from man. The nature of this curse appears in the use of the words transgression, sin and iniquity (cf. on Ps. 32:5).

The three positive results are now described. To bring in everlasting righteousness. This righteousness is to be brought in from without, i.e. from God through the Messiah. The expression corresponds with the first; the transgression is removed and in its place is introduced the everlasting righteousness of God which, as we learn from the NT, is received by the believer through faith alone. To seal both vision and prophet. The reference is to the OT dispensation, during which the prophet was the representative of God before the nation, and the vision was one of the means by which God made known His revelation to the prophets. A prophet was an Israelite who was raised up by God as an accredited spokesman, to deliver God's words to the people. God made His will known to the prophets by means of dreams and visions (see Nu. 12:1–8). The entire prophetic institution was typical of the great Prophet to come, and, since it was under Moses, partook of the preparatory character of the OT age. When this method of revelation ceased, the OT dispensation itself was at an end, and it is this which is signified by the sealing of vision and prophet. To anoint a most holy place. This difficult phrase, which literally translated is 'a holiness of holinesses', apparently has reference to the enduing of the Messiah with the Spirit of the Lord. It will thus be seen that the six objects to be accomplished are all Messianic, and it may be noted that when our Lord ascended to heaven every one of these purposes had been fulfilled.

In vv. 25–27 the details of the period of seventy sevens are set forth. 25 states the beginning of the period and the length of time until the appearance of the Messiah. Daniel is commanded to know and to understand the message. From the going forth of the word. The text is referring to 'the going forth of a word' from God, not to the issuing of an edict on the part of a Persian monarch. At the same time the effects of the going forth of this word appeared in human history, and this was during the first year of Cyrus, when he permitted the Jews to return to their land. The terminus a quo, therefore, of the seventy sevens, was the year 538–537 BC. This word which proceeded from God had reference to restoring the city of Jerusalem to its former condition. To the coming of an anointed one, a prince; i.e. one who is both anointed and also a prince, or, in other words, one who is priest and prince. There is only One to whom these words may apply, even Jesus who is the Christ. From the terminus a quo of the prophecy until the appearance of an anointed one is said to be 'seven sevens and sixty-two sevens'. It is possible that the seven sevens stand for the period between the first return from exile under Zerubbabel and the completion of the work of Ezra and Nehemiah, and the sixty-two sevens for the period between that time and the first advent of Jesus Christ. The sevens should be regarded as symbolic numbers.

26 deals with that which is to take place after the expiration of the sixty-two sevens. Two events are mentioned, but it is not stated whether these are to occur during the seventieth seven or not, nor how long after the expiration of the sixty-two sevens they will be. In the first place it is said that an anointed one (AV 'Messiah') will be cut off. This anointed one is be identified with the anointed one of v. 25. The reference is to the death of Christ, who was 'cut off' by crucifixion. And shall have nothing. By this expression the utter rejection of the Christ, both by man and God, is set forth.

Secondly this verse mentions the fate of the city and the sanctuary (i.e. Jerusalem and the Temple), which are to be destroyed by the people of the prince who is to come. This seems to be a clear prophecy of the destruction of Jerusalem under Titus Vespasianus. To the end, i.e. of the destruction, war and desolation will continue.

27 And he shall make a strong covenant; better translated 'he shall cause the covenant to prevail'. The Hebrew words are unusual. They are sometimes interpreted as though they meant simply 'to make a covenant'. Such an interpretation, however, is incorrect, for it does not do justice to the original which can only mean to cause a covenant 'to prevail', or 'to make a covenant firm'. The implication is that the covenant is already in existence and that its terms and conditions are now to be made effective. Who is the one that causes the covenant to prevail? Many find the subject in 'the prince who is to come' of v. 26, and refer this, either to Antiochus, or to the Roman ruler of a future, revived Roman Empire. However, the word prince is there in a subordinate position, and it is very unlikely that this word should be the subject in v. 27. It is better to regard the subject as the Messiah, since He has been the most prominent Person in this passage. The covenant which is to prevail is the covenant of grace wherein the Messiah, by His life and death, obtains salvation for His people. The seventieth seven (a symbolical number) thus has reference to the time of our Lord's earthly life. For half of this seven the Messiah, by means of His death, causes the Jewish sacrifices to cease (cf. Heb. 8:13).

Upon the wing of abominations shall come one who makes desolate. As a result or consequence of the death of the Messiah, one making desolate (i.e. the Roman prince Titus) appears upon the wing of abominations. We may understand wing to signify the pinnacle of the Temple. Cf. the use of the Greek pterugion (from pterux, 'wing') for 'pinnacle' in Lk. 4:9. As to the description of the Temple itself (or this part of it) as abominations, those who associate the passage with the activities of Antiochus Epiphanes understand it to refer to his installing of heathen rites and emblems in the Temple (cf. 1 Macc. 1:54, 59; see J. A. Montgomery, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Daniel, 1927, in loc.), but it is hard to see how this event, confined as it was to the altar (see reference in 1 Macc.), would justify the specifying of the wing, or pinnacle. We understand, therefore, that it is the Temple itself which, following the rending of the veil (Mk. 15:38) and the consequent end of its function in the divine plan (cf. Heb. 10:8–18), became abominable and unacceptable to the Lord (cf. The Prophecy of Daniel, in loc.). By this language the complete destruction of the Temple is signified. This state of destruction will continue even until the consummation or 'full end', which has been determined by God, has been poured upon the desolate (i.e. the ruins of Jerusalem and the Temple).

This prophecy of the seventy sevens is one of the most difficult in the entire OT, and although the interpretations are almost legion, we shall confine ourselves to the discussion of three which may be regarded as of particular importance.

a. Those who do not hold to the absolute trustworthiness and divine authority of the Scriptures refer the passage to Antiochus Epiphanes. The desolation described in v. 27 is therefore one caused by Antiochus; the anointed one of v. 25 is usually thought to be the priest Onias III, and the entire passage is deprived of any Messianic character. The objections to this type of interpretation, however, are so serious that it cannot possibly be regarded as correct.

b. A very widespread interpretation today is that of the dispensationalist school of thought. The advocates of this view naturally differ among themselves in some respects, but their position is essentially as follows.

The beginning of the seventy sevens is usually taken to be the twentieth year of Artaxerxes, which is said to be 445 BC (see Ne. 2). The period of seven sevens refers to the restoration from exile and the rebuilding of Jerusalem, and the period of sixty-two sevens carries one on to the triumphal entry of Christ. This school interprets the sevens as 'weeks', each 'week' consisting of seven years and the total comprising 490 years.

The promises made in v. 24, however, according to this view, were not fulfilled at Christ's first advent, and the seventieth seven does not immediately follow the sixty-ninth. Instead there intervenes a long parenthesis which is known as 'the church age', a time that was not revealed to the OT prophets. When this parenthesis has run its course Jesus Christ will return for His people, and the seventieth seven (seven years in length) will begin. Cf. notes in The Scofield Reference Bible and, for a general presentation of a dispensational interpretation, see Robert D. Culver, Daniel and the Latter Days, 1954.

The seventieth seven, then (i.e. a week of seven years), will begin to run its course when Christ returns. His people will be taken up into the air with Him while the events of the seventieth seven transpire. The prince of v. 26 will make a covenant with many Jews for one seven. In return for allegiance to himself he will permit them to erect their Temple and perform sacrifices. In the midst of the seven (i.e. after 3½ years) he will violate the covenant, and a fierce persecution will break out which will last for the remaining 3½ years of the seven, when Christ will return with His saints to reign for 1,000 years. From the exposition outlined above it will be seen that the present writer considers that the difficulties which this view entails are very great.

Two points of difficulty in particular must be noted. i. The verb translated 'he shall make a strong covenant' does not refer to the making of a covenant, but to the causing of a covenant to prevail or to be strong (see The Prophecy of Daniel for discussion). The covenant is already in existence. ii. On the dispensationalist view the antecedent of 'he' in 'he shall make a strong covenant' is said to be the prince of v. 26, which prince is Titus. If this is so, then the 'he' of v. 27 must refer to Titus and not to the prince of a revived Roman Empire as dispensationalism claims.

c. The traditional Messianic interpretation entails less difficulty than do the others and at the same time does justice to the language of the text. Upon this view the seventy sevens serve as a symbolical number for the period that has been decreed for the accomplishment of the Messianic salvation (v. 24). In v. 25 we are taught that two segments of time elapse from the issuing of a word from God to rebuild Jerusalem until the appearance of Christ. After these two segments have elapsed, the Messiah will be cut off by death and Jerusalem and the Temple will be destroyed by the Roman armies of Titus. The Messiah, however, will cause the Jewish sacrifice to cease by means of His death, and He will do this in the midst of the seventieth seven. As a consequence, the Temple will be destroyed, and the destruction will continue until the end appears which has been appointed by God. The precise point of termination of the period of seventy sevens is not revealed. The emphasis, rather, is not so much upon the beginning and termination of this period as it is upon the great results which the period has been set apart to accomplish.

10:1 – 11:1 THE VISION OF GOD

1 The revelation recorded in this chapter was given to Daniel in the third year of Cyrus, which shows that he continued in Babylon even beyond the time mentioned in 1:21. Why he did not return to Palestine with Zerubbabel is not stated. It may be noted that Daniel mentions his Babylonian name Belteshazzar, apparently out of a desire, now that the Babylonian Empire has been overthrown, to preserve his identity among his own people.

And it was a great conflict. In all probability the meaning is 'for a long time', since the word ṣāḇā', which is translated conflict, has now been found on the tablets from Mari in the sense of 'time'. At the time when the revelation was made to Daniel he was engaged in mourning, doubtless occasioned by reflection upon the sins of his own people. 5 Behold, a man; the revelation is a theophany or pre-incarnate appearance of the eternal Son. The language of the description reminds one of the language of Ezk. 1 (cf. also Rev. 1:13–15). The vision produced upon Daniel an effect of weakness (v. 8).

11 O Daniel, man greatly beloved. Cf. 9:23. By the assurance that he is beloved of God Daniel is encouraged and prepared to hear the message, which, he is told, has to do with the latter days (v. 14), i.e. the Messianic age. 20 It is first related that the Speaker will fight against the prince of Persia (i.e. the spiritual power behind the gods of Persia), and when the Speaker is victorious (when I am through with him, i.e. victorious from the struggle), the prince of Greece will next come and must be opposed. 21, 11:1 Only Michael is at hand to help, even as, in the first year of Darius the Mede, the Speaker helped him (cf. v. 13). Thus, there are to be severe trials in store for God's people.

11:2–20 THE REVELATION OF THE FUTURE

2 means that three kings are to arise after Cyrus and the fourth after them will arouse all the kingdom of Greece. The kings therefore must be Cyrus, three yet to stand—Cambyses, Smerdis and Darius Hystaspis—and the fourth, Xerxes. 3, 4 A mighty king; i.e. Alexander the Great. When Alexander has come to power, his kingdom shall be broken. When he died in Babylon he was but 32 years of age. At his death his twelve generals divided the gains among themselves. For a time Aridaeus, a guardian of one of Alexander's children, ruled, but soon the Empire was broken up into four divisions.

5 The king of the south; i.e. the king of Egypt (cf. v. 8). The dynasty which ruled in Egypt after the breaking up of Alexander's kingdom was known as Ptolemaic, whereas that which ruled in Syria was known as Seleucid. The king of the south is Ptolemy Soter (322–305 BC), and the prince mentioned is Seleucus. 6 The daughter of the king; i.e. Berenice, the daughter of Ptolemy, who married Antiochus II, yet was unable to maintain herself against a rival wife, Laodice. Antiochus finally divorced her and Laodice encouraged her sons to murder Berenice. 7 A branch from her roots. Berenice's brother (i.e. from her ancestry) will come against the army of the north and succeed in putting Laodice to death. The scripture then continues by relating the various struggles and wars between the Ptolemies and Seleucids until the appearance of Antiochus Epiphanes.

11:21 – 12:3 THE TIMES OF ANTIOCHUS AND THE ANTICHRIST

21 A contemptible person. With this language Antiochus Epiphanes is introduced. By means of flattery he won to himself the kings of Pergamus, and the Syrians gave in to him. He was a master of cunning and treachery, so that his contemporaries nicknamed him Epimanes ('madman') instead of the title which he himself assumed, Epiphanes ('illustrious'). 22 The prince of the covenant. The identification of this prince is not certain, but the language seems to refer to some prince who stood in covenant relation with Antiochus. 23 He shall become strong; a general statement of Antiochus' rise to power. 24 Without warning; RV 'in time of security'. When men think that all is secure he will slip in. He will take the richest parts of the province and fortresses of the land of Egypt.

25–28 describe Antiochus' first campaign against Egypt, a campaign in which the Egyptian Ptolemy could not stand because of the treachery of those who should have supported him. Antiochus (v. 27) shows hospitality toward his enemy, but actually violates the custom of oriental hospitality by means of lying words. On his return Antiochus sets his heart against the holy covenant, i.e. the land of Palestine.

29 describes another campaign against Egypt, which is the third. Apparently there had been yet another campaign on which the book of Daniel is silent. It should be noted, incidentally, that this entire account is related in the future. According to the writer these events had not yet taken place, but are to occur in the future. The account, therefore, purports to be true prophecy.

30 He shall be afraid and withdraw, and shall turn back and be enraged. The presence of the Romans caused Antiochus to leave Egypt and so, in rage, he turned his attention toward Palestine. On the sabbath Jerusalem was attacked, and a heathen altar was erected on the altar of burnt-offering. 32 Certain apostate Jews are perverted and serve to carry out the conqueror's designs, but many among the Jews, the true elect, suffered death rather than yield to Antiochus (cf. 1 Macc. 1:62). 33 At this time men of true faith were able to instruct others, although they should suffer greatly.

34 The little help which helped the faithful apparently refers to Judas Maccabaeus. Some of the wise who follow him will stumble because of the severity of the persecution. At the same time Judas's rebellion proved to be successful, and on December 25, 165 BC, the altar of the Temple was rededicated.

Vv. 36–45 are of peculiar interest. Many expositors believe that they continue the description of Antiochus. There is a difficulty in such a position, however, since the death of Antiochus was quite different from that which is here described. The interpretation which may be called traditional in the Christian church is to regard these verses as referring to the antichrist. Antiochus who persecuted the church shortly before the first advent of Christ may be regarded as typical of the antichrist who will persecute the church before the second advent of Christ.

36 states that the king will magnify himself above every god, a description which does not well apply to Antiochus. 37 Likewise it is difficult to see how Antiochus showed disrespect for the gods of his fathers. 40–45 The language teaches that at the end of the present age the antichrist will engage in fierce conflict. He will finally take a stand between the sea and the glorious holy mountain (i.e. Zion) where he shall come to his end.

12:1 When these events take place those who are found written in the book will be delivered. The reference is to the elect, those predestinated to everlasting life. The persecution of the antichrist will cause many to fall. Those who are written in the book, however, will be delivered.

2 This is true also of those who sleep. Many of them (the reference is to those who have died during the tribulation—not to all who are dead) shall arise, some to everlasting life and some to eternal reproaches. The reference here is not to the general resurrection but rather to the fact that salvation will be not only for those who were alive but also for some who lost their lives during the persecution.

12:4–13 THE CONCLUSION OF THE PROPHECY

Daniel is commanded to protect the words just revealed until the time of the end. The knowledge of God's purposes is in the world in the Scriptures, and men shall travel to and fro in vain, not seeking in the one place where the truth may be found. 7 refers again to the length of antichrist's power and to his end (see on 7:25). The numbers of vv. 11 and 12 must be taken symbolically, the 1,290 days symbolizing the period of Antiochus' persecution, and the 1,335 days apparently symbolize the whole period of persecution unto the consummation. He who endures throughout this period will be blessed. 13 Daniel himself is assured of his salvation, and that he shall stand in his lot at the end of the days. May this same destination be that of all who read these words!

EDWARD J. YOUNG

Hosea

INTRODUCTION

The birthplace of Hosea son of Beeri is still unknown. From his familiarity with life in northern Israel, certain alleged Aramaisms in his vocabulary and the phrase 'our king' in 7:5, it has been assumed he was from the northern kingdom, but this is conjectural.

The period of his ministry is defined in the title (1:1) which implies over 30 years' activity. References to anarchy and bloodshed suggest that Hosea prophesied during the turbulent days after the death of Jeroboam II, though there is no indication that he continued after the fall of Samaria in 722. Some think the reference in 1:1 to the kings of Judah a later insertion (see below). But since Hezekiah's co-regency began in 729 it is possible that Hosea was preaching in all these reigns. The historical background is to be found in 2 Ki. 14:23 – 20:21 ('Azariah' = 'Uzziah').

Hosea's message has characteristic features. His style is 'pointed, energetic and concise. He is laconic and sententious, so as often to be obscure' (Henry and Scott). Pithy sentences are marshalled into longer passages without losing their identity or power. The long biography (chs. 1 and 3) is evidently related to the whole prophecy, experience moulding expression. The metaphors of marriage and child-rearing reflect home life.

The covenant appears in different aspects. Faithlessness to the patriarchal covenant (1:10) and Sinai (6:7; 8:1) is reflected in human relations (10:4; 12:1). The climax of reconciliation is represented as a marriage covenant (2:16–22). Covenant-love (ḥeseḏ) is prominent. Two other words for love occur frequently: 'āhᵃḇâ, affection for people, things and actions (including sexual attraction), raḥᵃmîm, pity for the helpless, like that of a parent for a child. Ḥeseḏ, translated 'steadfast love, kindness, mercy' is choice-love, involving strength, gentleness, zeal and perseverance to carry out the obligations of a contractual relationship. In early married life Hosea knew 'āhᵃḇâ and raḥᵃmîm; it was later in reclaiming his wife that he learned ḥeseḏ too.

Knowing God as a Person is important to Hosea. In this (as in 'love') he is aptly called the 'St. John of the Old Testament'. He deplores the people's ignorance (4:1–6) and expresses God's desire for communion with man rather than for any mere sacrifice as such from him (6:6). This represents the crux of the prophecy. The sacrificial system, which was intended to remind the people of their obligations in the covenant both Godwards and manwards, had been outrageously abused. A false trust in the ordinances themselves as an antidote to godless conduct or a buttress to false repentance caused Hosea to lay bare the fact that sacrifices were a means and not an end. For further discussion of this see in loc.

Hope (despite allegations by Harper and others) is part of Hosea's message. Snaith asserts that 'no northerner could look forward to a unified nation'; but then what man could? Through divine revelation (1:2) the prophet preached the paradoxical doctrines of justification by faith.

Past events in the nation's history are often recalled by Hosea as an encouragement (e.g. 12:9; 13:4) or a reminder (e.g. 2:15; 10:9). Hosea attacked priests, leaders and people who refused Yahweh as God and as King.

There are fourteen references to Judah in Hosea, ten of them unfavourable. Some think there were editors 'Judaizing' the prophecy: one favourably after Sennacherib's withdrawal from Jerusalem in 701 BC, the other unfavourably after the fall of Jerusalem to Nebuchadrezzar in 586. S. L. Brown, however (The Book of Hosea, 1932), points out that no 8th-century prophet restricted himself to one kingdom. Each prophet occasionally cast a wistful glance at the sister kingdom; it would cause surprise if not (cf. 2 Ki. 17:19, 20). Moreover the eschatological figure of the bride (ch. 2) necessarily included Judah. It is unthinkable that God should preach such love only to part of His people.

Chs. 1–3 and the question of Gomer have long occupied interpreters. Many interpretations of 'wife of harlotry' (1:2) have been suggested: a harlot (despite other simpler terms); a sacred prostitute, even a local 'saint'; one who dressed like a harlot; one of an apostate or immoral nation; a participant in fertility rites; a northern Israelite; a woman of illegitimate birth; one with a tendency to harlotry. The first seems the most likely (cf. 3:3). Some protest that God could not have commanded Hosea to marry a harlot (or one who God knew would become so). But Hosea would not have married such a woman without a special command from the Lord. The command 'have children of harlotry' (1:2) implies such a mother from the start (cf. Heb. 11:31). After her marriage Gomer was probably faithful during the infancy of the three children, later falling into adultery (3:1) and probably slavery (3:2).

This suggests that chs. 1 and 3 are not parallel accounts of one event (third and first person forms respectively indicating different sources) but that ch. 3, as it does not mention children, is a sequel describing an event many (Gordis says 20) years later. Ch. 3 refers in the first place to an adulteress, a faithless wife (3:1). It is most natural to take this chapter as Hosea's reclamation of his wife from degradation and the slavery which would follow her disinheritance when judicially separated. Of the three children only the first, Jezreel, is explicitly stated to be to Hosea (1:3); this does not call in question his paternity of the others—after all Jezreel was his heir. He was given only one command embracing all three children (1:2). Hosea certainly named the first and second children and most probably the third (1:4, 6, 9).

Chs. 1–3 have been variously interpreted but notably (1) as a non-historical allegory, possibly even a prophetic dream. There is no evidence to justify such a view especially as it would reflect on the prophet's own integrity. Also Gomer's name has no clear meaning from which an allegory would benefit. 2. Others think it historical but symbolic, that Hosea and Gomer enacted a didactic drama. This fails to account for the historical details, especially 1:2. 3. A simple historical record of obedience to God which resulted not only in a broken marriage which was restored, but in a prophecy which speaks the truth in love.

Attempts to alter the order of chs. 1–3 gain no advantage. The most convincing is M. Scott (The Message of Hosea, 1921, pp. 25–30) who places ch. 3 bodily between 1:9 and 10.

The text is often difficult to determine. Yet though the details may often be obscure the message as a whole is plain. Perhaps in God's providence, the text has remained doubtful, to emphasize the revealed certainties that are discoverable only by faith. Let us, like Jerome, echo Peter's prayer: 'Lord, explain to us this parable.'

COMMENTARY

1:1 TITLE

This is the title of the whole book, naming the author, dating his ministry and above all setting a divine seal on his call. Hosea did not utter his own thoughts, or even seek the thoughts of God. The word of the Lord came to him by divine authority and initiative, the prophet's message pre-existing in the mind of God (cf. Joel 1:1 et al.; Lk. 3:2; Gal. 1:11, 12). Hosea the son of Beeri. 'Hosea' is a variant of Joshua (Nu. 13:16), meaning 'Yahweh saves' (cf. Mt. 1:21). Ironically Hoshea, another variant, was the name of the last usurper king of Israel (2 Ki. 17:1ff.).

Why did Hosea, whose prophecy is mainly to Israel, date his book first by the kings of Judah? Hosea's message is to both Judah and Israel, concerning judgment and mercy (see Introduction). The end of Israel is nearer but Judah's turn will come. The dynasty of Judah is of the house of David to which the promises of God were made. Hosea recognizes the supremacy of the throne in Jerusalem, prophesying a Davidic king over the ultimately reunited nation (1:11; 3:5). Judah was the kingdom of the theocracy (E. B. Pusey, The Minor Prophets, 1907, p. 26). Why does only Jeroboam's name appear from the seven kings of Israel living during this time? Jeroboam II, though an evil king, was God's instrument for the good of Israel (2 Ki. 14:25–27), the last saving act of God to Israel. Years before God had promised Jehu that his sons of the fourth generation would sit on the throne of Israel (2 Ki. 10:30). Jeroboam II was the last king of Israel to be succeeded by his son. Zechariah, who was assassinated by Shallum, brought Jehu's promise to fulfilment (2 Ki. 15:12). Of the six kings after Jeroboam all either succeeded or were succeeded by assassination. Although 30 more years were to pass before the nation was finally deported, its fate was sealed by the end of the reign of Jeroboam II according to the word of the Lord.

1:2 – 3:5 HOSEA MEDITATES ON HIS CALL AND HIS MINISTRY

The relationship of Hosea's private life to his public ministry is too complex for neat analysis. The two co-exist: at one time the image of the home is distinct and that of the nation blurred; at another time the reverse is true. 'It is not always clear whether the prophet's experience with Gomer is teaching him about God, or whether he is learning about his wife from his understanding of Israel. The two run on parallel lines and flash a meaning across to each other' (J. B. Phillips, Four Prophets, 1963, p. 53).

1:2 – 2:1 His call

As this section is in the third person some think it was compiled after Hosea's death by his disciples. However, such autobiographical use of the third person is not unknown in Hebrew and other languages (e.g. 2 Ki. 5:25; cf. Ho. 1:2).

1:2, 3 The meaning of his marriage. 2 When the Lord first spoke . . . ; the threshold of Hosea's ministry, who was called before his marriage. The phrase resists the attempt of some to place ch. 3 before ch. 1. Through Hosea could be variously construed: 'by Hosea', an ellipsis for 'by the hand (or mouth) of Hosea' as the agent; 'in Hosea', suggesting the assimilation of God's message first by the prophet: 'God enlightened him, and then others through the light in him' (Pusey, op. cit.; cf. Gal. 1:16, mg.); 'with Hosea', signifying his personal communion with the Lord. Go, take . . . i.e. 'marry' (cf. Gn. 6:2; 24:67, etc.). A wife of harlotry, children of harlotry; see Introduction. For the land commits great harlotry; the lesson from Hosea's marriage. Land means the nation, the people of the land. Possibly there are overtones of Baal-worship in which human sexual acts were performed as religious rites, with the purpose of reminding the god to function as the divine giver of all fertility. The beginning of harlotry is by forsaking the Lord, as neglect of good soon leads to practice of evil.

3 Bore him a son. The Lord opens the womb, in contrast to the fertility rites of Baalism, in which a marriage between the god and the earth is supposed, and animal, vegetable and human fertility secured by promiscuous rites.

1:4–9 The meaning of his children's names. 4 Jezreel ('God sows'); a fertile valley desecrated by murder and massacre. Yet a little while. Thirty years were to elapse after the death of Jeroboam II before Samaria finally fell in 722 BC. The blood (plural, indicating much bloodshed) refers to the carnage there by Jehu including the murder of Ahaziah, king of Judah (2 Ki. 9:14 – 10:14). If Jehu was fulfilling Elijah's prophecy concerning the house of Ahab (1 Ki. 21:21, 22; 2 Ki. 10:17, 30) why was his house to be punished? Perhaps he exceeded his duty with misguided zeal (2 Ki. 10:16ff.), killed a king of Judah or, more likely, his own heart was not right with God (2 Ki. 10:29, 31).

5 Break the bow of: i.e. utterly defeat (cf. Ps. 46:9; Je. 49:35). There is no explicit mention of a decisive battle in the valley of Jezreel. The Assyrian army reached as far south as Jezreel (2 Ki. 15:29) and beyond it in the siege of Samaria (17:5). 6 To forgive them at all; literally 'that I should lift up in respect of them'. The phrase is elliptical: it refers to the lifting of guilt (cf. Nu. 14:19b). The verb is intensified. 7 Have pity; cognate with 'womb', the tender love of parent for child. In the case of Judah deportation to Babylon resulted in their deliverance by the Lord their God through the working of God's sovereign will for their return to their homeland. Concerning this reference to Judah see Introduction.

8 Weaned, mentioned only here, is an act of love and not of deprivation. 9 Not my people . . . not your God. This is a reversal of the terms of the covenant God made with Israel: 'I . . . will be your God, and you shall be my people' (Lv. 26:9, 12; Je. 11:1–5; Ezk. 37:23–27). It is repeated in more intimate terms of King David and his successors (2 Sa. 7:14 'his father . . . my son') and quoted by St. Paul in both forms (2 Cor. 6:16–18). The consequences of breaking the covenant are clearly set out in Lv. 26:14–39.

1:10 – 2:1 One God, one people—the promise on which Hosea's ministry was to be based. 10 Judgment deserved is matched by mercy undeserved, to the extent that the latter blessings not merely supersede, but actually surpass, the former. An innumerable company like sand was originally promised in the covenant with Abraham, reiterated to Jacob (Gn. 22:15–18; 28:13–15; cf. Rev. 7:9). Centuries later in the place of Israel's judgment the Son of God came offering the promises of divine sonship to all His believers (Jn. 1:12, 13; 3:3). 11 The reunion of the nation is foreseen in negative and positive terms: gathered together, an acceptance of unity; they shall appoint for themselves one head, an expression of unity. 'The act of God . . . then . . . the act of their own consent' (Pusey, op. cit., p. 55). Some suggest that Jezreel belongs to the next verse, 'O Jezreel, say . . .', and that the final phrase here is 'the day of the Lord'. This removes the force of the sentence; the valley of Jezreel will be transformed; where once death reigned, now life abundant reigns, when the Son of David is enthroned.

2:1 The recovery of the family is completed. It is natural to associate this verse with chapter 1, with brother, sister (MT 'brothers', 'sisters'; cf. AV) referring to the nation. T. H. Robinson (The Twelve Minor Prophets, 1954, p. 8) notes that Israel is regarded as a single person, and the individual Israelites as her sons. But Rowley et al. think that Hosea's actual children reprove their mother. The message of reconciliation comes primarily to individuals, whose repentance is prior to and part of that of the nation.

2:2–23 His basic message

The oracle begins from Hosea's own domestic situation (v. 2), but soon fades into a picture of the nation under the figure of a marriage which has gone wrong (vv. 3–13). The reconciliation begins on the Husband's initiative and ends with a great re-enactment of the marriage witnessed by the whole universe (vv. 14–23).

2:2–5 The faithless nation. 2 Probably by now Gomer has left home and the children are grown up. Plead has the same root as 'controversy' (4:1) and 'contend' (4:4). It is more than an impassioned and perhaps emotional appeal. It suggests the making of a legal case. It is as if Hosea is trying to avoid a law-suit and a divorce. Put away. . . . Take off her adornments: either those to allure, or those given by lovers. 3 The domestic image is disappearing and the nation is coming into view. The promised land was a place of great fertility (Dt. 11:11, 12). Disloyalty to God had changed that. The Canaanites believed that the local baal could give natural fertility to the soil. The Israelites, far from condemning these practices, had actually taken part in them (cf. v. 5). Now God is showing His supremacy in devastating drought (cf. Am. 8:11). Lest; the final humiliation can be averted by true repentance (cf. 1 Cor. 11:31, 32).

4 Their children will enjoy neither the protection nor the provisions of the covenant (cf. Gn. 17:7, 8). 5 My lovers; the Baals, literally 'lords', local gods (e.g. Baal-peor) usually associated with the high places and pillars (e.g. 2 Ki. 18:4). The Israelites had failed to rid the land of Baalism at the conquest and later adopted syncretistic practices, worshipping Yahweh as if He were a Baal. Contrast my with v. 9.

2:6–13 Humiliation and punishment. 6 Israel will be discomfited by prickly thorns and dismayed by an unassailable wall. She will wander distraught as in a maze. 7 But even if she escaped from the maze she would never catch them on the open road. She is wearied and at length comes to her senses (cf. Lk. 15:17). First; 'former'. Better . . . then than now; Israel under judgment will look back to days of prosperity (1 Ki. 4:20, 25; 8:65, 66; Zc. 3:10; Rev. 2:4). 8 She . . . I; emphatic. The natural man is ignorant of the providential goodness of God. They used some things rightly but misappropriated others. Silver and gold; for making idols or money towards the upkeep of Baalism. 9 The Lord was about to do what had never been attributed to any Baal: to bestow a harvest and then withdraw it, by drought, pestilence or foreign tribute (cf. 1 Ki. 17:3–5). Grain-harvest was due in spring and the vintage in summer. Take away; 'snatch away', a sudden humiliating exposure of shame (contrast Gn. 3:21).

10 Now; logical rather than temporal. Lewdness; indecent exposure of the private parts of the body. The nation will be taken in the very act of adultery, in the sight of her lovers in Canaan whilst worshipping Baal. Hand; metaphorically 'power'. 11 The life of the nation was punctuated by regular holy seasons, times of great joy (e.g. Dt. 16:14): feasts, often occasions of pilgrimage (Dt. 16:16); new moons (Nu. 28:11–15); sabbaths, both days (Ex. 20:8–11) and years (Lv. 25:1–7); appointed feasts (a word translated 'seasons' in Gn. 1:14, hence an event fixed by calendar). Put an end; a pun on 'sabbath'.

12 My hire; the reward of a harlot. The vineyards will be desolated and deserted, with no-one to clear the undergrowth or to drive away the animals. 13 Ring and jewelry; typical both of harlots and pagans. And forgot me; Israel was completely devoted to the Baals and now not even trying to worship Yahweh with Baalistic rites (cf. 2 Sa. 5:20). Says the Lord; rare in Hosea, but common among his contemporary prophets.

2:14–23 Chastening and restoration. 14 Here is the beginning of the lasting reconciliation. Therefore; the logic of this is found only in the steadfast love (ḥeseḏ) of the Lord. Everything before this points only to wrath righteously deserved. I will allure her; 'I' is emphatic. Divine initiative in love is the beginning of salvation (Jn. 3:16; 15:16). Into the wilderness; first must come a conviction of sin and of the need of a Saviour (cf. Jn. 16:8, 9), perhaps through a chastening experience (Heb. 12:7–11). Speak tenderly to her; literally 'speak to her heart'. We must be drawn out by fear and drawn in by love. 15 The Lord will triumph over Baal in making even the desert fertile (cf. Is. 35:1, 2), giving not a harlot's hire but the wedding-gifts of a husband. The valley of Achor recalled Achan's sin and Israel's punishment (Jos. 7:24–26). Then it was a door of foreboding but it shall be a door of hope.

16 In that day; a Messianic term. My husband . . . My Baal; literally 'my man . . . my lord', then a customary form of address by a wife (cf. 1 Pet. 3:6). 17 Israel is to be cut off from the remotest association with Baalism, even in the name (cf. 1 Ch. 9:39, 40; 2 Sa. 5:20). The relationship would be intimate and enduring. 18 Covenant; the divine marriage will bring harmony into the natural and social world. Abolish; literally 'break'. The test of real peace and protection is unbroken sleep, to lie down in safety (cf. Ps. 4:8; Pr. 16:7).

19, 20 Seven marks of the new marriage; a. Permanence (for ever). b. Righteousness; N. H. Snaith (Mercy and Sacrifice, 1953, p. 71) says this word in the 8th-century prophets 'shows a persistent tendency to topple into benevolence', and points out that in NT times it can actually be contrasted with strict justice (cf. Dt. 24:13). c. Justice; judgment by precedent as in case-law. God is still—even in the bestowal of grace—absolutely just (cf. Rom. 3:26; 1 Jn. 1:9). d. Steadfast love (ḥeseḏ; see Introduction); both marriage-partners are bound by the obligations of their covenant. e. Mercy (raḥᵃmîm, 'mercies'; see Introduction); the understanding of a God who remembers that we are but dust (Ps. 103:14). f. Faithfulness; loyalty. Never again shall Israel forsake her Husband, nor He her. g. Communion (know the Lord). Again we strike one of the arteries of Hosea's prophecy. Knowledge of God is not a theory but an experience, here expressed as a marriage relationship (cf. Gn. 4:1).

21–23 At the wedding the witnesses render their gifts in turn to the bride. The heavens give rain to the earth, the earth growth to the crops, the crops their goodness to man. Answer; AV 'hear' reverses the stress: 'marry' (Scott) suggests the joy of the occasion (cf. Ps. 65:11–13). The whole creation rejoices as God and man are joined together (cf. Rom. 8:19–21). Jezreel . . . I will sow him for myself; a play on the name. Moffatt has 'repeople' (zāra'), also of grafting (Is. 17:10; Rom. 11:23ff.) and pregnancy. As in 2:1 the curse is lifted and the complete family is restored, a promise fulfilled in the Christian church (1 Pet. 2:9, 10).

3:1–5 His marriage restored by true love

Neither mere affection ('āhᵃḇâ) nor even parental love (raḥᵃmîm) makes a marriage: a stronger, deeper love (ḥeseḏ) is needed. It is this that redeems Hosea's wife and teaches the manifold love of God.

3:1–3 Hosea redeems his wife. 1 Go again; Hosea did not go after Gomer 'because he loved her but because God sent him' (G. Campbell Morgan, Hosea, the Heart and the Holiness of God, 1934, p. 26). Love ('ᵉhaḇ); it was still a matter of the heart, and we need not deny Hosea an affection still for his wife. To be strictly accurate, we should, in fact, translate here, not Go again, love, but 'Go, love again'. Hosea was, so to speak, to resume the courtship of long ago, thus imitating the undying love of God for Israel. Being an adulteress implies the breaking of a marriage-bond, either by harlotry or by an illicit relationship (v. 3) with her paramour ('friend'). 'Beloved of her husband' is a possible translation (cf. Je. 3:20). A marginal reading is 'loving evil and committing adultery'. Cakes of raisins (AV 'flagons of wine'); products of the vintage, when feasts were held in honour of the Baals.

2 Bought her must mean that she had become a slave. After separation she would lose her endowment. Various calculations of the price have been made. From 2 Ki. 7:1, 16 the total value = 30 shekels, the price of a slave. But why did he pay part in kind? G. Campbell Morgan sees it as 'half-price and a day's rations (for a slave)'. To buy one who belonged to him and who owed him much, and who had sunk so low, demanded the exercise of ḥeseḏ.

3 The erring wife is to be disciplined before restoration to her former privileges (cf. Lk. 3:8) Many days foreshadows a long though limited period (v. 4). So will I also be to you; Hosea shares the trial of separation in the spirit of loyalty that he expects from his wife. A marginal reading 'so will I also not come to you' is preferred by J. Mauchline (IB, ad loc.), as neither Hosea's nor God's constancy are in question. It means he will deny himself a husband's rights for the present. For Israel as a whole the many days are still unended.

3:4, 5 God and Israel reunited. To be without their leaders and their religious symbols was chastening to Israel. Some were definitely condemned (pillar, cf. Ex. 23:24; teraphim, cf. Zc. 10:2) and the rest were not God's first choice. Many days does not necessarily mean these would be restored later but that what Israel had come to value would be taken away. 5 The reunion of Israel and Judah under a divine Davidic king. The latter days; the end of the age when Christ is enthroned, when every knee shall bow and every tongue confess that Jesus is Lord.

4:1 – 10:15 THE COMING OF JUDGMENT

The Lord shows what is amiss in Israel (4:1–14), and why the people cannot repent (4:15 – 6:6). He reveals His patience (6:7 – 7:16) but warns of impending judgment on the people and their leaders (8:1 – 10:15).

4:1–14 The Lord's controversy

4:1–3 With the nation as a whole. 1 Controversy; the same root as 'contend', 'contention' (cf. v. 4). It implies the lodging of a case of law against Israel. Three virtues are missing: no faithfulness (J. B. Phillips, 'no honesty') in daily life; or kindness (ḥeseḏ) in personal relationships; no knowledge of God, i.e. spiritual ignorance, one of Hosea's main burdens (cf. 2:8; 5:4; 6:3, 6; 7:10; 11:3; 13:4–6; 14:9). Evils quickly move in to a godless situation. 2 Swearing; cursing (cf. Jdg. 17:2) or taking false oaths (cf. 1 Ki. 8:31), probably both here. In Hebrew 'there is' is missing and 'swearing', etc. is an abrupt salvo of denunciation. Vice abounded: they break all bounds (cf. Pr. 29:18 (Heb.)), i.e. they cast off the restraint of the law. Murder follows murder; literally 'bloods touch bloods', an intensive plural for 'much bloodshed'.

3 Nature suffers for man's sin. The land mourns. either 'the people of the land' parallel to 'all who dwell', or the desolation of a neglected countryside. Languish ('grow feeble') can refer to loss of human fertility (cf. 1 Sa. 2:5; Je. 15:9), but also to a disillusioned and disappointed people who have nothing to live for (J. B. Phillips, 'have lost heart').

4:4–8 With the priests. 4 The divergence of translation rests on with you which by a small variation of pointing in MT would read 'your people' (as AV). The priest had particular responsibility for teaching the people (cf. Je. 2:8; 6:13; Zp. 3:4; Mal. 1:6 – 2:9; Jas. 3:1). The Lord is setting Himself up as Judge. 5 You (sing.); the priest. By day; in days of ease. By night; in times of affliction. A one-letter alteration of almost the same sound in the Hebrew would give 'I will destroy your people' (cf. JB, 'you are the ruin of your people'); see on v. 4. Prophet; the false prophet. Your mother; the tribe of Levi into which all priests were born. 6 Are destroyed; the prophetic perfect viewing the future as already accomplished is generally intermingled with the imperfect, the focus changing rapidly between foreground and background in the prophet's perspective. For the priest's moral responsibility, cf. Dt. 17:12, 13. Forget your children; a threat to the whole future of the priesthood.

7 For I will change some versions read 'they have changed' signifying a lapse into idolatry (cf. Ps. 106:20; Je. 2:11; Rom. 1:23). Whatever secondary agencies may be used, the Lord is the prime-mover in the downfall of the priesthood. Their glory; the privilege of the Levites (Lv. 3:5–13). 8 The sin; one word is used for 'sin' and for 'sin-offering'. It was the duty of the priests alone to eat the flesh of this sacrifice (Lv. 6:24–30): hence they were greedy for their iniquity (lit. 'lift up his soul'; 'lick their lips over the guilt to come', Phillips). Cf. 1 Sa. 2:12–17.

4:9–14 With the people as individuals. 9 Like people, like priest; there was nothing to choose between priest and people: as the priest has been judged so now will the people be. 10 They will not enjoy the Creator's blessing (cf. Hg. 1:6, 9). MT (and some translators) puts harlotry in v. 11, leaving cherish ('keep') without an object. 11 New wine, the potent liquor derived from the first drippings before the grapes are trodden. Understanding (lit. 'heart'); a common metaphor.

12 The appalling spiritual darkness of God's people leaves them groping in superstition, praying to a thing of wood, or 'at his tree'. This may refer to the poles set up at Baal shrines. Their staff; often a walking or riding stick, sometimes symbolic, possibly with pagan carvings, used in rhabdomancy (cf. 'arrows', Ezk. 21:21). My people; emphatic or exclamatory. A spirit of harlotry (cf. 5:4); a deep-seated desire for idolatry. 13 Multiplication of altars was forbidden in Israel (Dt. 12:11–27; 14:23–26). Canaanitish shrines were situated on the high places, or near sacred trees (2 Ki. 17:10) and were to be broken down (Dt. 7:5). Terebinth; a tree affording pleasant shade from the heat. Daughters . . . brides; there was respect neither for the purity of womanhood, nor for the bond of marriage. 14 The men themselves; some translate 'everyone else', 'the leaders themselves'. Cult prostitutes (lit. 'holy women'; i.e. women 'set apart' for immoral religious rites) were common, but were forbidden in Israel (Dt. 23:17, 18). Lack of understanding ('discernment') is the slow-acting poison of a nation doomed to dissolution (cf. 14:9).

4:15 – 6:6 The impossibility of true repentance

Having stated His case against the people of Israel (ch. 4), God calls on the accused to answer the charge, but the sentence is given against them (ch. 5). In desperation Israel sues for mercy, but their appeal is rejected, not being based on any real change of heart (6:1–6). Hosea shows why Israel's repentance is false.

4:15–19 Bad company ruins good morals. 15 Judah is warned not to follow Israel's bad example and to keep clear of the idolatrous places (cf. Am. 5:5). Gilgal should have been a place of happy memories: it was the first encampment (Jos. 4:19–24), and the scene of the first Passover in the promised land (Jos. 5:9–12; cf. Mi. 6:5). But it was the place where Saul was dethroned (1 Sa. 15:21–31) and later a centre of idolatry (Ho. 9:15; 12:11; Am. 4:4). Bethaven ('house of iniquity'); near Bethel (Jos. 7:2). It is possibly an ironic allusion to Bethel but it most likely refers to a pagan shrine left undisturbed. As the Lord lives; a common formula of an oath, false (Jdg. 8:19) or true (1 Ki. 17:1; Je. 16:14, 15). 16 RSV takes this verse as a question, a decision based on the context. The broad pasture suggests prosperity (see Is. 30:23). Even under such ideal conditions the stubborn put themselves outside God's help.

17 Ephraim; Israel in the sense of the ten tribes of the northern kingdom. Ephraim had always held a leading position among them (Jdg. 8:2), but they should have remembered their humble beginnings (Gn. 48:14, 19). Joined to idols; 'wedded to idolatry' (J. B. Phillips). Cf. Mal. 2:14; 1 Cor. 10:20; 15:33, 34. Judah is warned not to get involved. 18 A band of drunkards; AV 'their drink is sour' is unlikely. 'Their drunkenness has come to an end' is possible. Thus some suggest it means 'when their carousal is over they indulge in lewdness'. Others (adding a prepositional prefix) take it with v. 17b: 'leave him alone with a band of drunkards'. RSV gives good sense. Drunkenness (cf. Am. 2:12; 4:1; 6:6) and sexual misconduct were rife. Their glory is a marginal reading, as is 'my glory'. MT has 'her coverings' giving 'they love the shame of her coverings', the hardness of the harlot's heart (cf. La. 3:65, 'dullness of heart').

19 A sudden gust will snatch away the covering of a dull conscience and naked shame will take its place. Them (lit. 'her'); possibly the female counterpart in the illicit relationship: the idols, the harlots or the coverings. Altars; literally 'sacrifice'.

5:1–7 Sins and sin. The whole nation is stumbling, unaware of their imminent fate. 1 Hosea sounds a warning (hear . . . heed . . . hearken; cf. v. 8). The judgment pertains to you (lit. 'the judgment is yours'); i.e. this is your sentence. The three groups correspond to the three places cited. Mizpah was where the first king was proclaimed (1 Sa. 10:17–19). The kings of Israel had led the people into idolatry, especially Jeroboam I, whose sin was a byword (1 Ki. 14:16 – 2 Ki. 17:23, passim). Tabor; part of Issachar (Jos. 19:22) allotted to the priests (1 Ch. 6:77). Their net was their carnal attitude to their ministry. 2 Shittim; the last camp before Jordan (Jos. 2:1; 3:1; cf. Mi. 6:5). Their idolatry here was described as harlotry (Nu. 25:1–3). Made deep the pit of Shittim; they had exceeded their earlier grossness. MT is not certain. AV, RV have 'the revolters are profound to make slaughter', referring to human bloodshed (cf. 4:2) or to many sacrifices offered (cf. 4:13).

3 Although the people do not know the Lord, He knows them: I; emphatic. Now; logical. Ephraim . . . Israel are synonymous. 4 Inveterate evil habits are an obstacle to repentance (cf. Is. 59:2; Jn. 8:34; Rom. 6:16; Heb. 12:17). But more, there is no desire to repent because of the spirit . . . within them. And even if they had a desire to repent, they know not the Lord. Cf. Jn. 3:19; Rom. 1:28–32; 1 Cor. 2:14. Their sins might have been forgiven had their condition of sin not separated them from God.

5:5–7 The unforgivable sin. 5 The pride of Israel; possibly a word-play, a title of God (cf. Am. 4:2; 6:8a; 8:7) or referring to Israel's sinful pride (Am. 6:8b). In spite of warning Hosea foresees the ultimate downfall of Judah. 6 The order stresses the profusion of sacrificial animals, suggesting a shallow, probably insincere repentance (see 14:2). Such half-heartedness never finds God (cf. Is. 55:6, 7; Jas. 4:8) nor receives forgiveness (Lk. 12:8–10). 7 Faithlessly (stronger, 'treacherously'); of adultery (Je. 3:20). Israel had broken the covenant-bond with her Husband and borne strange children, a generation of people who did not know Him. Cf. Mal. 2:13–16. A new moon; another month. 'Any month now . . .' (J. B. Phillips).

5:8–12 Unsuspected corruption. 8 The horn; Israel's national instrument, especially in attack and defence (Jos. 6:4ff.; Ezk. 33:3). The trumpet; for sacred use to assemble the people (Nu. 10:1–10). Both were now to rouse the nation to a sense of aweful expectancy, referring perhaps the Syro-Ephraimitic war of 735. Gibeah, Ramah and Bethaven were near the border of the two kingdoms between Ephraim and Benjamin. Benjamin suggests that Judah was to see Israel's fate and repent. The last phrase is literally 'Behind you, Benjamin!', which may have been the ancient battle-cry of the tribe (cf. Jdg. 5:14). A one-letter change would give tremble, O Benjamin (cf. LXX, 'Benjamin is distraught'). Judah was to beware of an adversary stealing up unawares. 9 Ephraim; emphatic. What is sure; i.e. sure to happen.

10 A surprising switch of attention to Judah (see Introduction). Vv. 10–14 refer to both Israel and Judah. To remove the landmark; to interfere with personal disputes or perhaps to the annexing of Israelite territory under King Asa (1 Ki. 15:20–22; cf. 2 Ki. 14:25–28). 11 Some follow the margin taking oppressed, crushed as 'oppressor', 'crusher'. Vanity (AV 'commandment'); a difficult word, elsewhere only in Is. 28:10 where it represents a childish chant. Kittel suggests 'his adversary', but which? Possibly the king of Assyria (2 Ki. 17:3–6). 12 Therefore; not in MT. I; emphatic. The judgment of God is sometimes a gradual breaking down of the fabric of life.

5:13–15 The failure of human instinct. 13 The symptoms were recognized, but the remedy was wrong. No nation, however powerful, could cure the moral and spiritual sickness of Israel or Judah, nor rescue them from the judgment of God. In going to Assyria (2 Ki. 17:3–6) they were playing into God's hands. The great king; AV 'king Jareb', but identification is difficult. 'A king who contends' is possible: it would be just what Israel wanted. 14 Note the repeated I. Yahweh will tear His prey and carry it off to his lair. There will be no David to rescue (cf. 1 Sa. 17:35) until the Son of David comes (Mt. 15:22ff.). 15 How great is the longsuffering and goodness of the Lord! The lion will lie down with the lamb and lick its wounds. He will wait for a conviction of sin to come to His people, so that they will turn to Him. Saying (not in Hebrew) is better omitted as it implies that 6:1–3 is an acceptable confession.

6:1–6 Inability to grasp the truth. Hosea puts the people's shallow confession into words, probably from what he had heard and knew of them (vv. 1–3). There is no understanding or acknowledgment of guilt (5:15); on the contrary there are signs of self-interest and echoes of Baalism. The Lord's response is to reject their words and to restate His own terms of reconciliation (vv. 4–6).

1 Come, let us return; the impression given is of animated speech which possibly betrays a lack of awe in approaching God. 2 The resurrection-rites of the fertility-gods may be in their minds. Third day may not indicate a definite period of three days (cf. Am. 4:8; 2 Ki. 9:32). Before him; Moffatt, 'under his care'. They were complacently hoping for the best. 3 They knew they lacked knowledge of God but sought it unconditionally. Press on to know; we say 'get to know' a person. His going . . . dawn according to a marginal text might be 'as soon as we seek, so we shall find'. Showers; the 'former rain' falls in December softening the earth for ploughing and the 'latter rain' comes in spring giving growth. The country was utterly dependent on rainfall. Natural religion was all they wanted (cf. Jn. 6:26).

4 God sees their shallow repentance and their love for Him which would soon evaporate (cf. Mt. 13:21). Self-righteousness bars the way between God and man (cf. Lk. 18:11, 12; Rom. 10:3). Love (ḥeseḏ; AV 'goodness'); see Introduction. 5 J. Mauchline (IB, ad loc.) suggests the verbs hewn, slain, goes forth should be construed as prophetic perfects: 'will hew, slay, go forth'. This fits well with the context, although the words could be taken both prospectively and retrospectively. The words of the prophets had the cutting-edge of divine authority (cf. Heb. 4:12). For 'prophets' some read 'stones' seeing a possible allusion to the giving of the law through Moses. Judgment . . . as the light; cf. Jn. 3:19–21.

6 The glory of the new covenant is here beginning to dawn. It may at first seem that God, having given commandments concerning sacrifice through Moses, had changed His mind. And not . . . rather than (cf. Gn. 37:3) are literally translated. Some critics have seen in this (and the five other similar passages: Is. 1:11–15; 43:22–24; Je. 7:21–23; Am. 5:21–25; Mi. 6:6–8) a conflict between the prophets and the sacrificial cultus. (For fuller treatment see NBD, pp. 1043–44.) But nowhere do they deny the validity of sacrifice offered in the right spirit. In each case they denounce the sins of immorality, idolatry or self-righteousness which violate the covenant and invalidate the sacrifices. 'What could make repentance seem so easy as the belief that forgiveness can be won by simply offering sacrifices?' (G. A. Smith, The Book of the Twelve Prophets, 1903, p. 265). Lv. 26:40–45 upholds the same principle: confession, humility towards God bring reconciliation. The phrase and not is paralleled by rather than, not as expressing exclusiveness nor even mere preference but essential priority. The virtues of steadfast love and the knowledge of God (see Introduction), both essential elements of the covenant relationship (Je. 31:3, 34), are the ultimate realities which give meaning to the cultus and survive it into the new covenant. Sacrifice; a general term. Burnt offerings (lit. 'that which rises'); the dedicatory offering in which the whole animal was burnt (Lv. 1; 6:8–13; cf. Eph. 5:2; Phil. 4:18), but even this depends on a relationship with God expressed in knowledge (Je. 9:24) and obedience (1 Sa. 15:22). I desire reveals a divine longing not for the expiation of guilt but for the love which would render such expiation unnecessary. Similarly God looks for real devotion in preference to the most excellent and extravagant tokens of it. Our Lord twice quoted Ho. 6:6, in Mt. 9:13 and 12:7, in each case rebuking the Pharisees for their self-righteousness which exalted their traditions above their relationships to Christ and other people. The wise scribe (Mk. 12:32–34) shows that he has grasped the principle of Ho. 6:6.

6:7 – 7:16 The longsuffering of God

After the sternness and strictness of the judgment seat, the Lord reveals His tenderness (ch. 7). But it is a story of 'what might have been' if Israel had responded to His patient entreaties; instead they prove rebellious or neglectful (7:1, 7, 10, 13, 15).

6:7 – 7:2 No vision, no restraint. 7 The beginning of sorrows was when Israel broke the covenant. Adam; possibly a place (Moff. 'Adam-town'). Transgress; the Hebrew word is also used of crossing a river (cf. Jos. 3:16). Possibly the sin of Achan is in mind (Jos. 6:18, 19; 7:1, 11; cf. Ho. 2:15). Other suggestions are 'in Adam (the man)' or 'like Adam' though there is no record of a covenant with him, or generally 'like men'. There suggests a place. It could well be that we have here a double meaning. Hosea picks the place-name, Adam, out of the Joshua narrative to show that at the very time of covenant-renewal (Jos. 3:16; 5:1–12) the sin of Achan revealed the unchanged heart of Israel. At the same time he subtly pointed back to Adam, the father of all self-seeking sin. 8 Gilead (cf. 12:11) was noted for vice. 9 Shechem had important associations, especially in connection with the covenant: Abram pitched there first (Gn. 12:6, 7), Joshua gathered the people there (Jos. 8:30–35; 24, especially v. 25), though later Baalism had intruded (cf. Jdg. 9:4—Baal-berith, 'lord of the covenant'). Shechem was also a city of refuge (Jos. 20:7). These facts suggest that these crimes were committed almost on the ground hallowed by God's most gracious dealings with His people. To such villains nothing is sacred.

10 The house of Israel; the nation (cf. 1:4, 6) or a local shrine, perhaps Bethel, as there suggests. A horrible thing, to make one shudder. Ephraim and Israel are synonymous. 11a is regarded by some as a later interpolation (see Introduction). 11b, 7:1 The Lord is waiting to bless His folk but their condition prevents it and their misdeeds intervene. Samaria; the capital of northern Israel, and site of an idolatrous shrine (1 Ki. 16:32). Like all capitals it may sometimes stand for the whole country. Fraud, house-breaking and highway robbery represent widespread corruption. 2 The greatest barrier to restoration is the profanity which leaves God entirely out of reckoning (cf. Heb. 12:16, 17).

7:3–7 No respect for godless rulers. The period was notable for assassinations and coups d'état. But the kings never prayed. 3 Make glad; they avoid suspicion by fawning and flattery which keeps the court in a happy mood. 4 The fire and the baker in vv. 4–7 can be interpreted in two ways: (a) when the fire is not being fanned new plots are leavening, or (b) the baker controls the fire to avoid over-cooking the plans. Adulterers; by a slight change we get 'enraged', fitting the context. 5 On; not in MT. The day of our king may be a personal or official anniversary. Stretched out his hand; became a companion, sharing the same meal with mockers, perhaps 'imposters'. 6 Burn; literally 'brought near'. Mauchline (IB, ad loc.) suggests transferring two Hebrew words, like an oven and their hearts, to between lines 2 and 3 giving 'But they approached (the king) with (their) intrigue . . .'. As the carousal nears its end at dawn the plot breaks. Anger ('ap̄); AV 'baker' ('ōp̄eh). 7 A series of short reigns ended by violence. Note the fatalism of a prayerless life.

7:8–10 National decadence. 8 Instead of being distinct from other nations, Ephraim is merely an ethnic ingredient, as useless as a cake half burnt. 9 He (emphatic) knows it not; everyone but he can see the failing of his powers. The so-called protectors Assyria and Egypt were draining the resources of the land in tribute, and Baalism was destroying the nation's spiritual and moral fibre. 'His hair is shot through with grey.' 10 The pride of Israel . . . ; see on 5:5. Decadence creates no desire for better things.

7:11–13 Political vacillation. 11 A double-minded man is 'unstable in all his ways' (Jas. 1:6–8). Ephraim was cooing to Egypt, fluttering to Assyria (2 Ki. 17:3, 4). 'They trimmed their foreign policy to every political wind that blew, and they were always wrong—because they were morally wrong' (John Bright, The Kingdom of God in Bible and Church, 1955, p. 75). This panicky dependence on foreign powers was attacked by other prophets of the time (e.g. Is. 30:1–7). 12 As they go; i.e. to Egypt or Assyria. The entire nation was involved in its leaders' policy. For their wicked deeds; 'as their congregation has heard' (as AV, RSV mg.) is based on MT; a slight emendation gives RSV. Either text would bear simple interpretation: either 'for their evil', or 'as the prophets have foretold'. 13 The possibility of redemption from their enslaved dependence on foreign aid is negatived by their blasphemy, perhaps in attributing blessings to Baal.

7:14–16 Gross ingratitude and insincerity. In spite of all the Lord has done for them, they slight Him with insincere worship or downright idolatry. 14 Moffatt has 'they never put their heart into their prayers'. They wait upon their beds, possibly 'beside their altars'. This might refer, like the next phrase, to the pagan rite. of Baal. For grain and wine they gash themselves Baal was supposed to give fertility to the earth; gashing was a ritual extravagance to invoke Baal to act (cf. 1 Ki. 18:28). Human dignity is at a discount in paganism. 15 I; emphatic. Cf. Gn. 6:6. The training might refer to childhood or to manhood, e.g. for drawing a bow. 16 To Baal. Hebrew reads lō' 'al, i.e. '(but) not upwards' (cf. AV, RV; BDB s.v. al; T. K. Cheyne, Hosea, CB, 1884; also 11:7, AV, RV where 'al occurs in the same sense). LXX translates as from 'al 'lō, 'to nothing', i.e. 'to idols', but most moderns emend more extensively, e.g. l'lō' yō'tl, 'to that which does not profit' (J. L. Mays, Hosea, 1969); labbᵉliya'al, 'to worthlessness' (Kittel, Biblia Hebraica[s]); labba'al, 'to Baal' (RSV; Kohler, Lexicon in Veteris Testamenti Libris, 1958). Insincerity is compared to a treacherous bow 'which is expected to shoot in one direction but actually shoots in another' (W. R. Harpur, Amos and Hosea, 1905). The parallel of the sword and the tongue is striking (cf. Rev. 1:16). Even Egypt may get the last laugh after all.

8:1–14 Judgment hovers overhead

Repeated refusal to repent (ch. 7) inevitably makes repentance more difficult, and ultimately impossible (8:3, 12, 14). The judgment now imminent will be swift (8:3, 7, 8 ,10, 14).

8:1–6 Broken covenant, broken calf. Israel ignored the Lord, both in their counsels and in their worship. 1 The vulture, silently, motionlessly hovering, was a speck in the sky but ready to swoop to the prey (cf. Je. 49:22). Set the trumpet . . . , LXX 'cast dust upon your breast . . .'; a sign of anguish. God gives the root-cause of His judgment: a positive severance of personal relationship through breaking His covenant, and incurring His displeasure through breaking His law. 2 They depended on a bygone experience of grace. My God (Syriac 'our God'), we Israel know thee; a shallow profession (cf. Mt. 7:22, 23). 3 The nation has had every chance. 4 They made kings . . . princes refers not to the divided kingship, for this fulfilled God's threat to Solomon (1 Ki. 11:9–13; cf. 12:24), nor to the original request for a king (1 Sa. 8:19–22) but probably to the frequent depositions by non-Davidic usurpers. 5a As Israel spurned the good so God spurns the evil. AV follows MT, supplying object 'you'. RSV is a marginal reading. T. K. Cheyne (The Book of Hosea, 1913) suggests 'your calf is loathsome'. 5b, 6a In Israel; from LXX. This is the cry of the God of patience. A workman; an engraver. Nothing man-made can either contain or represent God (cf. 1 Ki. 8:27; Acts 17:24, 25, 29). 6b Broken to pieces; i.e. 'smashed to smithereens' (cf. Ex. 32:20).

8:7–10 God is not mocked. 7 Israel has done nothing but sow the wind in idolatry and in national affairs at home and abroad; now, according to both natural and spiritual law (Gal. 6:7), the harvest is due in great measure. Whirlwind; LXX katastrophē. And in the fields there is utter frustration; God is showing Israel that Baal is useless. Note the figure: if it succeeds at one stage it will fail at the next. For aliens, some read 'east wind', the blighting desert blast. 8 Israel has lost its identity as the people of God. A vessel; metaphorically a servant (cf. Je. 22:28; 48:38; 2 Tim. 2:20, 21). 9 The wild ass, Harper observes, is usually found in droves. Wandering alone; rather, 'going off alone', showing wilfulness. Lovers; literally 'loves', which some interpret as love-gifts. An alternative suggested for line 3 is 'To Egypt they give love-gifts', parallel to Assyria. 10 Cease . . . anointing kings and princes. There are various alternatives: cease, AV 'sorrow'; anointing, AV (et al.) 'burden'; king and princes, 'king of princes', i.e. the king of Assyria. Thus it means (inter alia): (a) they shall have no more kings of their own (but 'a little while' suggests eventual resumption, and princes were not anointed); (b) they would be released from the burden of a court that was a liability rather than an asset (Harper suggests 'this continual anointing . . .'); (c) they would be released from heavy tribute to the king of Assyria (2 Ki. 18:14).

8:11–14 Egypt all over again. 11 What was intended to point to forgiveness of sins (cf. Lv. 17:11) has become the occasion of sin (cf. Rom. 7:10). At any one time only one altar was to be set up for all the nation in the place which God would choose (cf. Dt. 12:26f.; 14:24; 27:4–8; 2 Ki. 21:4, 5). 12 No special stress on write suggests that Hosea was already familiar with a written law (cf. Dt. 31:24; 2 Ki. 22:8). 4:2; 13:2, 4 may allude to the Decalogue but this is inconclusive. By ten thousands; RV 'in ten thousand precepts'. They were so alienated from God that they could not recognize a single detail of His commandments. 13 They love sacrifice; LXX suggests the ironical 'their beloved altars'. The people ate only in the peace-offering (Lv. 7:15–19); the priests also had a due in these sacrifices (Lv. 7:31–36). But their hearts were evil and their sacrifices ineffectual. God had said they should never return to Egypt (Dt. 17:16); Hosea is referring to a return to conditions of degradation and oppression such as they suffered in Egypt (cf. 9:3). 14 Allegedly Amos's style: why should Hosea not have caught a phrase from the older prophet of Israel? Palaces; large buildings, even temples. Human achievement is not always to the glory of God (cf. Gn. 11:1–11), who intervenes on His own behalf.

9:1–17 The beginning of the end

The sentence has been pronounced; now the method of execution is given. They shall not remain in the land but be exiled in Assyria (vv. 3–6), ultimately becoming international refugees as punishment for sinfulness over many generations (vv. 15–17).

9:1–6 Learning the hard way. Possibly Hosea was preaching at one of the great harvest festivals. 1 The peoples; the heathen nations. Harlot's hire; the Baals were thought to give grain in exchange for devotion. 2 Winevat; within the press into which the juice flowed. New wine; see on 4:11. Fail; deceive, play false. Though their harvest is prolific their need will exceed it. Pursuit of pleasure, or even the satisfaction of natural religious instincts rather than knowing God Himself, is sure to disappoint. 3 Yahweh is showing whose the land is. To Egypt; see on 8:13. The reference to Assyria indicates that Egypt is to be taken metaphorically. 4 Wine was offered specially at harvest and on the Day of Atonement (Lv. 23). The Lord showed His displeasure to them by reckoning their bread (not in MT (AV)) as defiled and defiling (Nu. 19:14) and by refusing to accept their cereal-offerings. 6 Memphis had one of the largest of Egypt's many burial-grounds. Nettles . . . thorns; a deserted and desolated land. They would reflect in life-long exile on their home comforts.

9:7–10 The sins of the fathers upon the children. 7 Have come; prophetic perfect. A marginal insertion after line 1 reads 'Ephraim shall know it'. The prophet is a fool; either of a false prophet, or popular opinion of a true prophet. G. Campbell Morgan (Hosea, the Heart and the Holiness of God, 1934, p. 96) asserts that 'man of the spirit' is never used of a false prophet. If so, parallelism suggests the true is in mind in both cases. Moffatt: 'a man inspired is a man insane'. 8 The true prophet, though concerned for the highest welfare of his people, is despised and rejected (cf. Is. 53:3; Je. 38:4). Watchman; cf. Ezk. 33:1–9. 9 Gibeah was the scene of a series of atrocities (Jdg. 19, 20). Since then Israel had not changed nor could their sin be attributed to environment. 10 Israel's youth was full of fair promise. But contact with Baal soon exposed them. It was not a temporary lapse; they consecrated themselves. Baal; the Hebrew has bōšeṭ ('shame'). RV translates 'the shameful thing'. People become like their God. See Ps. 111:58 and cf. Rom. 8:29.

9:11–17 God-forsaken. 11 No future—no children, no hope of children, no possibility of children. What irony for a fertility-cult and for one whose name is 'fruitful' (Gn. 41:52)! 12 When I depart from them; the marginal reading is 'for they shall wean their boys and be ashamed'. 13 MT (AV) is difficult, though Tyre was the home of Jezebel and her god Melqart. IB suggests (by a one-letter change): 'Ephraim I see as a guilty man, his children are given for a prey', perhaps 'Ephraim as I have seen as a prey bereft of her sons'. This may refer to the godlessness of human sacrifice (2 Ki. 17:16–18), or to unspecified bloodshed in exile. 14 No children would be better than murdered children: so Hosea ejaculates a prayer.

15 Gilgal, despite its links with Israel's first king-making (1 Sa. 11:15), was the focus of the present apostasy. The cleansing of my house recalls Mk. 11:15–18 and may reflect Hosea's dealings with Gomer. Their princes (śārêhem), rebels (śōrᵉrîm). Of many attempts to reproduce assonance 'their nobles are rebels' (G. A. Smith) is best. Love ('āhēḇ); they have forfeited their right to God's affection; He does not like them. But ḥesed is not exhausted. 16 Their root; cf. Mt. 3:10; Mk. 11:20. 17 This verse corresponds to 2 Ki. 17:23. The reason for God's action is their persistent disobedience. As they have wandered from Him (7:13) so they shall wander without Him. My God; Hosea's heart is torn between his God and his people.

10:1–15 Digging out the roots

The nation has been stricken like a diseased tree (9:16; 10:1). But God is determined that it will not sprout again to bear corrupt fruit: Baalism and the apostate monarchy will be eradicated

(10:2, 8, 15). Not content with felling the tree, God is determined to eradicate the causes lest they should sprout again.

10:1–6 No more idols. 1 The vine is a symbol of prosperity (1 Ki. 4:25; cf. Jn. 15:1). Luxuriant; literally 'empty' (AV), i.e. it yielded its fruit fully. The more God blessed Israel the more they used His gifts to worship Baal. Altars; see on 8:11. Pillars; forbidden (Dt. 16:21, 22). 2 False; literally 'divides' (cf. AV). RV mg. has 'smooth': perhaps from stones used to cast lots and hence divide. They are two-faced. The Lord will do to them what they should have done to Baal (cf. Dt. 7:5). 3 A completely dispirited people. No king; none worthy of the name, or of Davidic descent. They see their folly (we fear not the Lord), but immediately betray their greater folly in thinking still of what an earthly ruler might do. 4 No-one can be trusted, even in business, though it may refer to the King Hoshea's vacillations (2 Ki. 17:3, 4). Weeds; not wanted but inevitable especially where no crops are grown. 5 Israel's chosen champion, perhaps their last hope, will be defeated. Calf, MT 'heifers'; a term of derision. Bethaven; see on 4:15. Idolatrous priests; a term never used of true priests. Wail; for MT 'exult' (AV). 6 Hosea shows how despicable this thing is; it will be ceremoniously mocked. Idol; from margin; MT, 'counsel', i.e. the covenants with Egypt and especially Assyria.

10:7–15 No more kings. 8 The kings from Jeroboam I had caused Israel to sin (2 Ki. 17:21, 22) and many had not only perpetuated the Baal shrines but extended them. Thorn and thistle will wave in undisputed possession of the altars. They; Israel, or probably their altars. Cover . . . Fall upon us (cf. Lk. 23:30); i.e. for shame. 9 Cf. 9:9. 10 As the tribes once rose against Benjamin, so the nations shall rise against Israel. Double iniquity; their idolatry and their reliance on outside help. AV follows Targum, 'bind themselves in their two furrows'. In the East ploughing together means acting in concord as friends (cf. 2 Cor. 6:14). Here the reference may be to their union with Baal and the nations.

11 Ephraim in her youth loved God's will, and gained the reward of obedient service (cf. Dt. 25:4). I spared (lit. 'passed over' or 'by') her fair neck could mean that God spared her the burden of a yoke which would chafe her neck. The yoke, however, usually rests on the shoulders. Harper (op. cit., p. 354) suggests 'I will pass on beside her fair neck', as a driver (cf. IB, in loc.). Or, 'I have passed the yoke over . . .'. Duty, once pleasure, is now drudgery (cf. Gn. 3:17–19). 12 Hosea appeals to the nation. The God of salvation will pour refreshing showers of grace upon those who seek Him. Sow; cf. 2:22, 23. They wanted fruit without delay but now they had to start a new cycle in faith. Break up; eastern husbandmen, understandably as the ground hardens, neglect ploughing and sow among thorns. They will have to go the hard way now but steadfast love (hesed) will ensure the harvest.

13 They have sown, reaped and eaten bad fruit, dependence on defensive pacts and troops. 14 Beth-arbel; location unknown, probably annihilated. Shalman; probably not Shalmaneser V of Assyria but Salamanu, king of Moab, a tributary of Tiglath-pileser. 15 Israel can expect to fare no better than Betharbel. Two double intensives: great wickedness . . . utterly cut off. There is nothing arbitrary about God's judgment: every man shall be judged according to his works (1 Pet. 1:17).

11:1 – 13:16 THE TRAGEDY OF JUDGMENT

In executing judgment on Israel God was not just punishing a sinful nation, but was casting off a people on whom He had settled His inheritance. In that lay the tragedy of it all.

11:1–11 The grief and love of the Lord

The resemblance to the parable of the prodigal son (Lk. 15:11–24) is striking. Both passages reveal something of the great loving Father-heart of God.

11:1, 2 A wayward boy. 1 When Israel was a young nation (child, or 'boy', 'young fellow') God heard their cry of affliction and delivered them from bondage (Ex. 3:9, 10). The NT use (Mt. 2:15) indicates that as Israel had forfeited their privilege of divine sonship, the prophecy would have to be fulfilled in Another (cf. Rom. 11:29). 2 The high hopes of free will are soon dashed in wilfulness. Kept sacrificing; a confirmed practice (cf. 1 Cor. 10:1–12).

11:3, 4 A father's care. 3 The tender self-sacrificing care of a father to his infant children is unknown to them. Ephraim owed his ability, strength and health to the Lord. 4 I . . . love; 'I drove with a harness of love' (Moffatt). The Lord led them by love and understanding, rather than driving them with whips. The considerate herdsman eases the yoke so that they might feed more comfortably. Bent; perhaps ellipsis for 'bent my ear, listened'; LXX 'I kept an eye on him'.

11:5–7 Headstrong and heartless. 5 They shall return. The Hebrew in its most obvious meaning here reads a negative, 'They shall not return', signifying that in spite of what Israel's sin merits the Lord will not reverse His great redemptive act. Redemption is irreversible, and therefore they will not go back to Egyptian bondage, but fall to the Assyrian conqueror. This happened in 722 BC. The contradiction with 8:13 and 9:3 is apparent rather than real, for there, as 9:3 shows, Egypt is used in a typical sense of the place of bondage, but here in its literal reference, as in 11:1, to the place from which redemption had rescued them. Under pressure, however, from this apparent clash, many commentators would espouse the translation adopted by RSV, urging that l'ō means 'to him' rather than 'not', and that it properly belongs to the latter part of v. 4, where, they allege, the text is in a confused state, without, at the same time, offering any agreed or acceptable solution. 6 The sword is depicted as an avaricious monster. 7b MT (AV) reads 'most high' ('al) but RSV has yoke ('ōl). Remove ('raise') means then the lifting of the yoke. The determination of Israel is matched by that of God.

11:8, 9 The tension of justice and love. 8 Here we get a glimpse of the heart of God under a human figure. His heart recoils, His emotions are in turmoil and His compassion glows. He cries in anguish 'How can I?' Admah, Zeboiim; two cities of the plain like Sodom and Gomorrah (Gn. 14:2). 9 It is His unchanging and unchangeable character which settles the issue. To be true to Himself He must devise some just way of dealing with His people. The Holy One came in your midst to seek the lost sheep of the house of Israel (Mt. 15:24) and to give His life a ransom for many (Mt. 20:28).

11:10, 11 A tumultuous homecoming. 10 The Lion of Judah (Rev. 5:5) will roar and His cubs will come trembling and His young lions bounding across the desert. From the west; i.e. the coastlands, but perhaps it refers prophetically to the whole world at the last day. 11 The homing birds will find their way swiftly from distant migration to their own resting-place. I will return them; cf. Jn. 14:3.

11:12 - 12:14 Prosperity is through faith

The hope of restoration is beginning to dawn (11:8–11). But Hosea criticizes the nation for foreign trading-pacts (11:12 - 12:1) quoting patriarchal history (12:3, 4, 9–13). Jacob in Canaan and his successors in the wilderness were providentially sustained believing God's word through the angel and the prophets (12:4, 10, 13). In spite of these lessons Ephraim remains intransigent (12:8, 11, 14).

11:12 - 12:1 Trade is no substitute for truth. 11:12 Witnesses to Israel's dishonesty crowd around the Judge. The apparently favourable reference to Judah, thought by some to be the work of a Judaistic editor, may read (mg.) 'Judah roams with, or is still wayward with, God and with a Holy One who is faithful'. 12:1 Wind, often 'vanity' (cf. Ec. 1:6, 14) a wild-goose chase. East wind; a parching desert blast. To improve their economy they make trade pacts with godless nations.

12:2–6 Jacob became Israel. 2 Indictment; 'controversy' (4:1). 3 In the womb (Gn. 25:22, 23). From took . . . by the heel we get 'Jacob'; from strove 'Israel'. Jacob had used unscrupulous cunning to get the birthright (Gn. 27:18–29). 4 It was the blessing which changed his nature (Gn. 32:24–28). Bethel; the very place of Israel's idolatry. In Genesis 'Bethel' comes before 'Peniel'; 5 Hosea's purpose is to link 'Israel' with 'Jacob' and the vision of Bethel with Yahweh's name and title. Name; literally 'memorial'. The hosts may be the angels of God ascending and descending. 6 Hosea appeals to Israel to live up to their great name. But no-one can turn to God without His help. Love (hesed); the sort of love you can cling to. They were to be just and trustful in their God's provision.

12:7–9 Israel has become Canaan. 7 A trader; literally 'Canaan!' The Canaanites were proverbial for their cheating. 'Swindler!' (Moffatt). False balances; deceit worse than Jacob's. But even worse, 'he loves to play crooked' (IB). 8 God warned Israel about this pride of achievement which would be their ruin (Dt. 8:17–19). But even if Ephraim were rich, he has the wrong currency to buy off his guilt before God (cf. Mi. 6:7). MT (AV) difficult in v. 8b; LXX gives RSV. 9 God reminds them of His redemption, which was the purpose of the appointed feast (Nu. 10:10) and of His provision, as they dwelt in tents during the Feast of Booths (Tabernacles) (Lv. 23:39–44; Dt. 16:13–15).

12:10–14 Faith comes by hearing. God used every occasion to arrest their attention (cf. Je. 7:13, 25). 10 And He used every means: plain speech, visions and parables. 11 If ('im) does not harmonize with 6:8; a change of one letter ('im) gives simply 'in Gilead'. Gilgal . . . stone heaps (gallîm); a pun. 'On level ground . . . excess rocks were gathered into piles in the fields. But on the hillsides they were built into terraces to keep the good soil from washing away' (NBD, p. 19). The altars would resemble a pile of debris. 12 Some think this should follow v. 4, but it fits here: there is a similarity of metre with v. 13, and they both end with the same verb 'keep' (šāmar). 13 A prophet; Moses. The redeeming and preserving power of God's Word is recalled. As Jacob kept sheep for the wife he loved (Gn. 29:20) so the Lord kept Israel for love's sake (Dt. 7:7). 14 Bitter provocation; perhaps at Marah (Ex. 15:22–25).

13:1–16 The death of Ephraim

The end is near: a forgotten Saviour is an awful Foe (13:4–9). The last possible glimmer of repentance fades away as the nation's spirit curls up and dies in the womb of despair (13:13).

13:1–3 Sin, the cause of death. 1 The subject of all verbs may be Ephraim, the superior tribe, before whom others demur. This usage is unusual in Hosea. Sellin thinks the emphatic he (was exalted) demands a change of subject thus: 'Ephraim spoke . . . and incurred guilt, Moses bore it . . . and died.' Mauchline (IB, ad loc.) suggests: 'When Ephraim spoke trembling (as a child), Yahweh was exalted . . . when Ephraim incurred guilt . . . he died'. In any case it shows the connection between sin and death (Rom. 6:23). 2 Man-made gods mean more sin both in devising them and worshipping them. Kiss; of homage (cf. Ps. 2:12). 3 Four transient figures: mist, dew (cf. 6:4), chaff (cf. Ps. 1:4; Mt. 3:12), smoke (Is. 51:6).

13:4–11 Deliverer turns Destroyer. 4 Cf. 12:9; the intransient God. A god which cannot save is no god at all. No other god is knowable; 5 or knowing. Drought; burning thirst: the wilderness was a test for Israel and for the Lord. 6 Satisfaction of their natural appetites led to spiritual pride (cf. Dt. 8:11–17): note therefore (cf. Jn. 6:26). 7 Lurk beside the way; probably 'on the way to Assyria' (to get help) corresponding to 'there' in v. 8. 10 Yahweh challenges the kings and princes of Israel to make a case for the defence, for they shared judicial functions (cf. 1 Ki. 3:9; Je. 38:7; the gate of the city was the place where justice was administered). 11 The kings hold office only by God's consent. The verbs are iterative indicating general practice, but showing that the kingship is God's second best and subject to His will.

13:12, 13 A remote chance of life. 12 The newborn child will have a legacy of sin saved up over the years. Nothing will be forgotten (cf. Mt. 12:36). 13 But instead of facing up to reality he prefers to die. He is 'a senseless babe' (Moff.). There is a remote chance of survival if the nation will humble itself as a child.

13:14 The executioner is summoned. 14 Ransom refers to the payment made, redeem to the new relationship. The interpretation hinges on shall I . . . where? AV has affirmatives. Where probably means 'hither with' (cf. Moff. 'come with'). God is closing His eyes to them as death marches in. Paul (1 Cor. 15:55) shows that in invoking death and destruction He was not overwhelmed but has actually overcome this enemy in His Son.

13:15, 16 Guilty and innocent suffer together. 15 Flourish, 'be fruitful'; Ephraim (cf. Gn. 41:52). East wind; Assyria, commissioned by the Lord to strip the land. 16 Samaria; either the capital and shrine or the whole nation. Sinners never suffer alone in this world.

14:1–8 THE GOSPEL OF GRACE

The new Ephraim, a tree of beauty, fragrance and fruitfulness is planted by the Lord (vv. 5–8). At last they acknowledge their guilt and receive free pardon (vv. 1–4), becoming God's children by grace of adoption (v. 3b).

14:1–3 True repentance

1 How gentle yet firm is the invitation to return. They must acknowledge their iniquity in words. 2 Yahweh asks for the sacrifice of a broken and contrite heart (Ps. 51:17). Take . . . words; cf. Ex. 23:15. Mg., 'say to him, all of you'; a personal and national repentance is necessary. Take away . . . is not imperative but an imperfect of desire: 'Please, take away . . .'. All has emphasis of position. Accept . . . good; AV 'receive (us) graciously' is better, for they have nothing good to offer except the sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving, the fruit (pᵉrî) or 'calves' (pārîm) of our lips (Heb. 13:15; 1 Pet. 2:5). Weiser remarks, 'The prophet . . . shows he knew, and approved, a Yahweh cult . . . in which the central portion is held by the Word (God's Word and prayer).' Here is justification by faith (cf. Rom. 3:24). 3 True repentance involves abandoning known sin. Here the double iniquity of reliance on nations (horses = Egypt) and idolatry is confessed. Finds mercy (yᵉruḥam); the Father-love of God for His adopted children (cf. Rom. 8:15, 17).

14:4–8 Reconciled and regenerate

4 Faithlessness; sin is a deep-seated malady. How graciously God alters our desires, making us both to want and to do His will (Ps. 37:4; Phil. 2:13). Freely; of His own will, spontaneously. This is possible because His anger has turned away. Hosea gives no details of this atonement, but the Gospels do. 5 Dew; here not transitory, but refreshing. The new Israel will have the beauty of the lily (cf. Mt. 6:28, 29) and the noble strength and stability of the poplar (lit. 'Lebanon'). 6 The olive was noted for its shade and its fruit and Lebanon for the aroma of its coniferous forests. Christians are to be attractive, stable, useful. 7 Garden (gan) may be 'corn' (dāgān). They, Israel, will enjoy the protection and vitality of God. All the blessings they struggled, cheated and killed for, will be forgotten in the greater blessings of His grace. 8 Look after you; a play on 'Assyria': the Lord will care for His own by making them fruitful ('Ephraim') as part of Himself (cf. Jn. 15:1–5). Answer; cf. 2:21, 22.

14:9 THE LESSON TO BE LEARNED

Cf. Ec. 12:13, 14; Ps. 107:43. This may have been added later: it is none the less part of the inspired text. Right; undeviating like the Lord. Wise; wisdom is more than and rarer than mere knowledge. Knowledge sees the way in which to walk; wisdom walks in it unerringly.

J. B. HINDLEY

Joel

INTRODUCTION

AUTHORSHIP

Nothing is known about the author of this book except his name (which may be symbolic; see the commentary) and his father's name. A very late tradition puts him down as of the tribe of Reuben, but the book itself seems to point to Judah, and in particular Jerusalem, as his background.

He may have been a priest, like Jeremiah or Ezekiel. He certainly was greatly interested in the worship at the sanctuary, like Haggai and Zechariah. But he was undoubtedly a prophet, and therefore many modern scholars and commentators have described him as a 'Temple prophet' or 'cultic prophet' meaning one who has a recognized position in relation to Israel's official religion, and one whose focus was the Temple. He shows great knowledge of farming and the plagues associated with farming life. This, however, is the rule rather than the exception in agricultural Israel, and does not necessarily prove that he was a farmer in the same sense as Amos (cf. Am. 7:14).

DATE

As to the date, most modern scholars feel that a date of about 400 BC would suit, for a variety of reasons. Israel, as the old northern kingdom, does not appear. National life is on a smaller scale, centring around Jerusalem, but there is no king mentioned. The whole life of the community centres around the worship of the Temple, as in the days after the return. Lastly, the language is tinged with Aramaisms. On the other hand the book is unlikely to be very late. While neither Assyria nor Babylon is mentioned, the Greeks are not yet a world power. The Persian vengeance has not descended on Sidon (345 BC), so that we might place the book some time before that date, and after the completion of the wall of Jerusalem by Nehemiah in 444 BC (Joel 2:7 seems to demand this).

Old scholars have placed Joel in the reign of the boy king Joash in the 9th century, but references to the captivity and literary dependence on other prophets seem to rule this out. The position of Joel in the Canon, with reference to other books, is probably not significant. We do not know upon what principle 'the twelve prophets' were arranged, but it was certainly not chronological. The reference to 'the valley of Jehoshaphat' does not help us to date the book; see the commentary on Joel 3:2.

Kapelrud compromises by suggesting the time of Jeremiah, just before the fall of Jerusalem. He does this mainly on the basis of stylistic similarities, but his view is open to the objections made above, and to maintain it he must attribute part of the book to later editions.

OCCASION

The occasion of the book was an exceptionally severe plague of locusts, possibly accompanied by a drought and followed by bush-fire. Like all true prophets, early or late, Joel interprets this historical event, and the combination of event and interpretation becomes God's revelation. In keeping with OT thought, he interprets this plague in terms of divine wrath, and therefore as intended to lead to repentance. His book thus becomes a great plea for a return by Israel to right relations with God. When these relations are restored, there follows a promise of renewed fertility, rather like that in Hg. 2:19.

From this living situation, the book moves gradually into a wider sphere. The locusts become symbols at first of an invading army (perhaps Persian or Greek) coming down from the north, and then a picture of the great complex of events that we call 'the last things', ushering in the acknowledged rule of God within a purified earth. These foreshadowings, however, appear in the distant future; the immediate occasion is the locust plague, and the spiritual and practical issues which it involves for Judah.

NATURE

The book is probably written entirely in verse, in spite of the arrangement of the RSV, which prints part as verse and part as prose. It contains no reference to written prophecy, unlike Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel. It was therefore probably delivered as a spoken message to the people of Jerusalem, much as we may imagine that of Haggai to have been. It is reasonable to suppose that Joel delivered his oracles to the crowds gathered at the Temple as Jeremiah did (cf. Je. 7:1–4) and Amos in his day (cf. Am. 7:13) and Peter in NT times. The book may even have been 'preached' at one of Israel's great agricultural festivals, when crowds would flock to the city, and when the lack of available offerings would be more conspicuous (1:9), perhaps even causing the festival to be abandoned. But it seems too far-fetched to regard it, with Kapelrud, as a 'liturgical text', either for annual Temple performance at some agricultural festival or on any occasion of visitation by locust plagues.

INTEGRITY

While the book draws heavily on older prophetic sources in the OT, the style is unified throughout and there is no reason to doubt the unity of the authorship on stylistic grounds. Nor indeed is there any marked sign of later editorial revision, and so the book may be assumed to be much as Joel composed it. When the question of authorship is raised, it is usually solely on the grounds of the break in subject-matter half-way through the book. Roughly speaking, 1:1 to 2:27 seem to deal with a practical problem of contemporary society, the locust plague. By contrast 2:28 – 3:21 pass into apocalyptic, dealing with the far distant future. The query is whether the same man could have written both sections. Kapelrud, for instance, sees in the second part an expansion and editing of Joel's earlier message by later Temple prophets. But if Kapelrud were prepared to allow a later date than 600 BC for Joel this problem would not exist. Robinson fairly represents the old school of biblical critics when he attributes the second half to various unknown hands. Pfeiffer, however, who would certainly not be reckoned as a conservative scholar, admits that the conjunction of the historic present with the apocalyptic future is typical of many prophets, and in no sense an argument against unity here.

The Hebrew text (divided into four chapters, instead of the three that appear in English) is good, and has no obvious signs of disruption.

THEOLOGY

This book is not a soul-stirring message in the style of Jeremiah, but it contains several noble calls to repentance (e.g. 1:13, 14) combined with an appreciation of the merciful nature of God (2:12–14). For all Joel's interest in priestly and Temple religion, he knows that repentance must be inward, not only outward. 'Rend your hearts and not your garments' (2:13) is a famous verse. Though it is often urged that he adopted an exclusivist attitude, reminiscent of Ezra and the days immediately following the return, and contrasting with the wider horizons of some other prophets, yet Joel does not believe in automatic salvation for all Israel. His strong doctrine of the remnant within Israel saves him from that (2:32). Thompson remarks that this exclusiveness may well have been a necessary stage in God's preparation for the inclusiveness of the gospel in New Testament times. Myers points out that salvation in Joel (since it is by calling on the name of the Lord) is salvation by faith and grace.

In addition the high point of the whole book should not be forgotten. This is the great promise of the universalized gift of the Spirit (2:28, 29). That the prophet's faith could rise to such heights amid the depressing conditions of the returned community is a remarkable testimony, and a supreme proof that this book came by the moving of the very Spirit of God of which it tells.

COMMENTARY

1:1 – 2:27 PROPHETIC HISTORY

1:1 Title of the book

The word of the Lord that came. Cf. the opening verse of Hosea, Micah and Zephaniah. Word (dāḇār) does not necessarily mean a spoken word; it can also mean 'matter, subject' in a general sense. Joel wishes to stress that the source of this revelation is God Himself; this alone will give Joel his authority (cf., in the NT, Mt. 7:29 and Jn. 7:17 with 1 Thes. 2:13). A similar phrase in v. 12, is nᵉ'um yhwh, translated 'says the Lord' in the RSV. Elsewhere in the Prophets kōh 'āmar yhwh, 'thus says the Lord', is a common expression (1 Sa. 2:27, etc.). All these underline the same truth; the very bearer of the message was the one most conscious that its source lay outside himself.

Joel, the son of Pethuel. At least a dozen other men are mentioned in the OT as bearing the name Joel (cf. 1 Sa. 8:2; 1 Ch. 4:35; 5:4, 12; 6:36; 7:3; 11:38; 15:7; 27:20; 2 Ch. 29:12; Ezr. 10:43; Ne. 11:9). These men came from different tribes and are of very different dates; the fact that most instances are recorded in the late book of Chronicles is simply because more genealogies are contained there than in any other book. If, as is likely, the name means 'Yahweh is God' (cf. names like Elijah, 'my God is Yahweh', and Elihu, 'He is my God') then the distribution of these references is significant evidence for the widespread worship of Yahweh within Israel. While a name like Joel is certainly very suitable for the bringer of such a message, there is no need to see it as a mere 'pen-name' to cover anonymous authorship (a similar suggestion has been made with reference to the name 'Malachi', which means 'my messenger').

The name Pethuel is unknown elsewhere in Hebrew. Perhaps because of this uniqueness, the LXX and the Syriac read 'Bethuel', which is a good patriarchal name (Gn. 22:22), but does not in itself help to date the author, especially as there was a revival of archaic names in Israel's later days.

1:2–20 Description of a locust plague

Most modern commentators have felt that Joel here describes a literal plague of locusts. The wealth of detail is that of an eyewitness and a countryman. Such plagues were the scourge of the Middle East until the introduction of international locust control in recent years. The Encyclopaedia Americana (under 'Locust') gives account of some specific 'plagues'. At a popular level see On the Banks of Plum Creek, by Laura Ingalls Wilder, chs. 25 and 32, for the impression produced on a child by a similar plague. As in all the prophets, historical fact, when interpreted, becomes God's revelation, and Joel proceeds to explain this locust plague as God's judgment on His sinful people, which may be averted by repentance and turning to Him. It is just as natural for an OT writer like him that this temporal judgment should be seen as a picture of the coming 'day of the Lord' (cf. 2:1–11) when God will judge all under heaven; and from this Joel passes easily into the eschatology of the last part of his book (2:28 – 3:21). As many commentators old and new have pointed out, this sort of transition is too characteristic of the OT to lead us to postulate two authors.

2, 3 are typically Hebraic in their call for 'hearing'; when the prophet has himself heard God's word, he must herald it to others. God's revelation is never for our selfish enjoyment; it brings with it a responsibility for others. Perhaps that is why in the NT so much stress is laid on oral confession of Jesus Christ (cf. Rom. 10:9). 2 By their appeal to the aged men, these verses lay stress on the severity of the plague; not within living or ancestral memory has such a thing happened (cf. Ex. 10:6). There may also be a reference to the 'elders' (v. 14), by whom Judah was ruled in post-exilic days (cf. Ezr. 8:1), though, of course, eldership was a very ancient institution (cf., e.g., 1 Sa. 30:26). The inhabitants of the land then represent the rest of the population. This locust plague is no ordinary occurrence; this, as Pharaoh's magicians confessed reluctantly, is the 'finger of God' (Ex. 8:19), God's power clearly seen at work. To the Jew, God is always at work in the universe which He has made; nowhere is this more clearly seen than in some of the great 'Nature Psalms', e.g. Ps. 104. What we call 'miracles' (Heb. nipl'ôt, 'wonders') are only instances more clear and obvious to our dull eyes. The famous 'plagues of Egypt' are one whole such series and Joel's hearers certainly would have remembered the locust plague recorded there (Ex. 10). But now God's people were being treated as God's foes; that is the peculiar sting. Israel has become like the Egyptians to God (cf. Am. 9:7). It was just such a locust plague that Amos foresaw, and against which he prayed (cf. Am. 7:1–3). Perhaps Joel's great confidence in the forgiving mercy of God comes from his knowledge that God spared Israel in the day of Amos, in answer to earnest prayer.

3 rounds off the section. Joel has heard God's word, so he must speak (cf. Am. 3:8). Now Israel has heard Joel's word and they must tell their children, and they in turn must tell the generations to come. Faith, trust in God, begins with hearing the message of what God is like (Rom. 10:14–17). We might say that faith is both begotten and nurtured by recounting the mighty acts of God. That is why Jewish and Christian religion involves so much 'recital', retelling the story of God's saving grace and, as Myers says, Joel regards the locust plague as comparable to any other mighty act of Israel's history.

4–7 describe the locust plague dramatically and poetically. 4 Four different words are used for locust: gāzām, 'arbeh, yeleq, ḥāsîl (cf. 2:25), but there is no need to assume four separate plagues. There are at least nine possible words for 'locust' in Hebrew; these four are doubtless chosen for poetic variety, and perhaps because they describe various stages of the locust's growth, and thus stages of the plague's onset. Arabic has a similarly rich vocabulary to describe locusts, as it has for 'lion', 'sword' and 'camel', to give a few other instances. Few commentators today would follow the older view that here we have a veiled picture of four foreign empires who would oppress Israel (usually Assyria, Babylon, Greece and Rome; cf. the visions of Daniel in Dn. 2.). This would involve an unduly 'apocalyptic' approach to an historical event. Hebrew often heaps up words, in order to stress the total nature of an event (e.g. Is. 3:1–3), and here means, so to say, a 'plague par excellence'. It well represents the completeness of the judgment of God; absolutely nothing can escape.

5 It is not certain why the drunkards are singled out; of course such locusts would strip the grape vines with other green things, and so there would be no sweet wine, i.e. 'new wine', that year. It is even possible that the swarm arrived just before grape gathering, and in that case the reference would have been even more appropriate. Perhaps the drunkards stand for the selfish members of an affluent society; as such they are often attacked in Amos (Am. 2:8) and Hosea (Ho. 4:11, 18). Parallel to drunkards in the verse is drinkers of wine, often synonymous with those who lead a luxurious life. It may be, however, that the stress is on awake. A sleepiness and unreality, like that of the half intoxicated man, has come over the whole nation, and God's call through Joel is to awaken them to reality (cf. Eph. 5:14; 1 Thes. 5:7, 8). Another reason may be found in the pithy Jewish saying 'without wine there is no joy'; all joy and gladness are to be taken away from Israel (cf. Joel 1:12c). There may be a further reference to the great agricultural festivals which were normally times of rejoicing in Israel, but which could not be celebrated in this year of disaster.

6, 7 are a vivid description of the ravages of the locusts; after the leaves have been eaten they attack the bark. Vine and fig, with olive oil and grain (v. 10), are the staple crops of Palestine. The locusts are called a nation (gôy) as ants are called 'am, 'a people', in Pr. 30:25, because of their numbers and apparent organization. In Joel 2:25 they are called ḥayil, an 'army' of God. This usage may also be the more suitable if they are not only literal locusts, but also represent a coming invasion by a Gentile (gôy) enemy from the north (cf. 2:20). Lions' teeth is a natural symbol, in view of the destruction of the locust. An Arab saying credits the locust with 'the chest of a lion', probably from its appearance, but perhaps also from its destructiveness. Many eyewitness accounts confirm the ghostly white of the barked trees after the passing of a locust swarm, and the bare, burnt appearance of the ground as though parched by drought.

8–20 intersperse descriptions of the plague with appeals to Israel for repentance. 8 The virgin girded with sackcloth is the supreme symbol of grief—the girl whose fiancé has been killed before her wedding day. As in many Eastern lands today, the formal engagement was as binding as the wedding in Israel; this explains Joseph's predicament in Mt. 1:18, 19. It was precisely to guard against this sorrow that, in Mosaic law, engaged men were exempt from military service until actually married (Dt. 24:5). Sackcloth, ashes and ceremonial wailing were traditional signs of grief.

9 shows us the little world of these 5th-century Jews after the return from Babylon. So severe is the drought that daily offerings in the Temple have ceased. This would not refer to the animal sacrifices—in such times, a farmer would gladly slaughter some of his herd—but to the 'cereal-' and the 'drink-offering' that should by right accompany such flesh sacrifice (cf. Ex. 29:38–42). Joel can imagine no greater calamity; for the tiny returned community, perhaps some 40,000 in all, living in and immediately around Jerusalem itself, their horizon was bounded by the Temple walls. The whole wellbeing and security of the nation was bound up with the wholehearted performance of Temple worship (cf. Hg. 1:7–11; 2:15–19), as a guarantee of the maintenance of the covenant and of right relationship with God. Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi likewise belong to this 'day of small things' (Zc. 4:10) as does Ezra, the scribe of the law. Yet God's purpose runs through small times and small men as it does through the great days of Moses, and Joel's concern that God should receive His due in worship is a deep and abiding spiritual principle (cf. Mal. 1:8). Further, the correct performance of such ordained sacrifice is only in order that God's covenant may be maintained and expressed; this at once transfers Joel's concern from the ritual to the moral and truly religious realm.

The phrase ministers of the Lord, as parallel to priests, is late Hebrew, and is another pointer to the date of the book; it is used here in poetic parallelism. Because of this interest in priests and Temple, some have felt that Joel was a priest himself. Others, however, have felt that, here and in v. 13, he clearly differentiates himself from the priestly body. The distinction is not important, for, as said above, the tiny settlement around Jerusalem was like a modern religious kibbutz in Israel—all members were vitally concerned with religious questions. If Joel is a 'Temple prophet' (see Introduction) then the interest is explicable. Some would go so far as to see this book, either wholly or in part, as a liturgy or religious drama performed at public worship in the Temple. Those who hold this view stress the alternation of persons in the book between first, second, and third; but the whole idea seems too far fetched. A place in Israel's religion Joel certainly had and recognized as a prophet of Yahweh he might be. It is very possible that, like Amos at Bethel or Jeremiah at Jerusalem, he delivered some or all of his words in the Temple; but that does not make his book part of a hypothetical New Year Festival ritual in Israel.

10–12, like many other places in the book, use assonance to produce a play on words in the Hebrew. This greatly adds to the sonorous roll of the prophecy, but is virtually impossible to reproduce in English, though Moffatt tries hard. In the returned community, agriculture and the Temple were the two main sources of employment, since trade and industry hardly existed. Tillers of the soil and vinedressers virtually represent the entire secular population. V. 12, with its catalogue of agricultural failure, is a striking contrast to the buoyancy of Hab. 3:17, 18 which certainly bears some literary kinship to this passage. In spite of even greater disaster, Habbakkuk will still rejoice in the Lord. But, for Joel, the withholding of fruitfulness is not a test of faith, but a punishment for sin. This accounts for the very different attitude towards the same calamity in the two prophets. The emphasis on words like withers may mean that, as often, the locust plague came in time of drought. It may also refer to the bleached appearance of the country after the passing of the swarm, when nothing but bare earth and whitened branches show.

13, 14 go further than v. 9. The priests are now summoning the people to solemn fast and prayer in the Temple, as was customary in days of national calamity. Such a day, for instance, was the annual observance of the fall of Solomon's Temple (cf. Zc. 7:5). Lv. 16:29 shows how fasting was associated with the forgiveness of sins, in connection with the Day of Atonement.

15 is most significant. Amid another play on words, it equates this local disaster with a premonition of the day of the Lord. If, according to the old view, Joel had prophesied under the boy king Joash, in the 9th century, then this would have been the first occurrence of day of the Lord in the OT. If, as is much more likely, Joel writes in the 5th century, then he is at the end of a long succession beginning with Amos (cf. Am. 5:18). For the day of the Lord see Jenni, in The Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible, 1962; Mowinckel, He that Cometh, 1956; NBD, p. 296b. In short, the phrase means God's clear vindication and manifestation of Himself in earthly history. In early popular eschatology, 'the Lord's day' meant the glorification of Israel and the punishment of her enemies; it was the task of men like Amos to show Israel that judgment began first with the house of God (cf. Am. 5:18–20; 1 Pet. 1:17) and that none was exempt. As always in the Bible, every act of God is at one and the same time judgment and salvation; so even in the midst of judgment, there is always a ray of hope for a humble and repentant people. To us in the new covenant 'the Lord's day' has become the weekly glad remembrance of His saving grace. In this plague, Joel sees the day as near (cf. Mk. 1:15, 'the kingdom of God is at hand'). One might say that the divine judgment has already begun; this disaster does not merely prefigure it—it is part of it. Older commentators seem wrong in saying that such disasters are only harbingers of 'the Day', ushering it in.

17–20 continue the vivid description. Those who have lived in a drought-stricken land like Australia will appreciate the imagery. The exact meaning of some terms in v. 17 is guesswork, but it seems to refer to the cracking of the ground in drought. The restless wandering and lowing of cattle is typical, as are the useless empty store-sheds. As for Paul in Rom. 8:19–22, all subhuman nature shares in the consequence of man's sin. Perhaps we can understand this more easily in our modern age; if there is atomic fall-out, beasts will die of leukaemia along with men. The psalter contains parallels to the sympathetic description of thirsty wild animals in v. 20 (cf. Ps. 104:11). God is the Lord of the wilderness as well as of the sown land, God of the bush as well of the city.

It is not certain whether Joel is describing an actual bush-fire here (always dreaded in dry Palestine; see 1 Ki. 19:12) or the effects of drought, or, as above, the barrenness left after the locust swarms. But in time of drought, or after the locusts, a bush-fire would be most destructive, and so perhaps a combination is meant. Earlier commentators have seen an allusion to the red wings and legs of some types of locusts. God has turned a fruitful land into a salt marsh (cf. Ps. 107:34) because of the sins of His people; that is why Joel passes easily into ch. 2, with its forebodings of worse judgments to come at the day of the Lord.

2:1–11 The day of the Lord

Joel returns to the thought of 1:15, the nearness of the day of the Lord. Now there is an urgency, as though doomsday has actually arrived. 1 Blow the trumpet. The opening verses suggest a military alarum sounded on the walls of Jerusalem; Nehemiah's men had worked with the trumpeters standing by, only a few years before, to build these walls (cf. Ne. 4:18). Perhaps Joel is thinking of 1:14, when the priests were called to 'sanctify' a fast. Such fasts were normally announced by the blowing of the šôpār or ramshorn (cf. Lv. 23:24), but military signals were also given in this way (cf. Jdg. 7:18). The eschatological phrase 'the last trumpet' ultimately belongs to this tradition (cf. 1 Cor. 15:52). 2 When Joel says the Lord's day is a day of darkness he is no doubt using the same metaphor as Amos (Am. 5:18); light is joy and salvation, while darkness is despair and judgment. It is possible that Joel remembers Ex. 10, where darkness follows the locust plague. But there may be a literal interpretation in the dark clouds of locusts, settling heavily on the hills around Jerusalem. The locusts are now pictured on a scale larger than life, and many commentators have understood them here as prefiguring some invading army from the north. If Joel had been written in early days, these could have been the Assyrians, while in later days they could be Persians or Greeks.

3 raises the same question as 1:19, 20, as to whether the fire is literal or not. Of course, any invading army would burn and ravage the countryside as it went. The reference to a garden of Eden is interesting. Is. 51:3 and Ezk. 36:35 have the same metaphor in reverse, for God will 'make her wilderness like Eden'. At an earlier stage in Israel's history, she was dominated by the thought of the Exodus and conquest (cf. Jdg. 6:8). In and after the Babylonian captivity it was the thought of God the Creator that sustained the exiles, for only such a God could re-create His shattered people. It is not therefore surprising that the material of the early chapters of Genesis, as well as the story of the call of Abraham, filled their minds (Is. 51:2, 3 joins both ideas, e.g.). 4 Many nations have noted the resemblance of locusts to horses, either because of the shape of their heads, or the action of their legs; Thompson compares their German name Heupferd, 'hay-horse', and the Italian diminutive cavaletta. Other commentators have referred to the Arabic saying 'In the locust, slight as it is, is the nature of ten of the larger animals—the face of the horse . . .', etc. As Israel's northern invaders were normally cavalry or chariotry, the simile is the more apt if used of an invading army.

5, with rumbling and crackling, describes the noise of the locusts' wings. Presumably the tops of the mountains are ridges immediately around Jerusalem. Either locusts or invading armies would have to spill over these crests before attacking the city itself. 6–9 Subsequent verses describe the remorseless advance of the locusts, crawling up the walls of Jerusalem, as they did in the famous plague of 1915, and pouring through every crack into the houses. On the Banks of Plum Creek, as quoted before, is the best commentary on the terror that this 'wave attack' inspires, and the helplessness of the farmers before it. The description would equally well fit the advance of a disciplined army, marching its assault troops against Jerusalem.

10 seems to pass beyond the bounds of mere description. As in Rev. 9, the locusts have become eschatological symbols, though probably, in Joel, still only symbolizing human invaders, not supernatural beings. The earthquake and eclipse are not to be literally interpreted, though such phenomena are associated with God and His coming among men; see Ex. 19:16–18. It is better to see them as descriptions of the awfulness of the last day. Such terms recur again and again in the OT, so that it is sometimes hard to decide the direction of literary dependence. Perhaps the true answer is that there was a common stockpile of eschatological imagery, used by all. These same terms will appear again in the NT, whether in the 'little Apocalypse' of Mk. 13 (e.g. vv. 24, 25), or in the wider range of the book of Revelation (e.g. Rev. 6:12; 8:12).

11 The locusts have been compared already to an army (ḥayil) in 2:5 (a common Semitic simile, found in reverse in Ugaritic literature). Here, they are called God's army and His host, (maḥᵃneh). This is Joel's way of reasserting that all nature is in the Creator's hand. In 3:11, however, 'thy warriors, O Lord' (where gibbôr is used for 'warrior'), the reference seems to be either to human or angelic soldiers, not to the locusts at all. Gibbôr properly means 'mighty one'.

2:12–17 Call to repentance

God's summons to judgment is, in the Bible, not normally a pronouncement of irrevocable doom, but an opportunity for repentance. All the temporal judgments of God are thus also manifestations of His grace, designed to lead us to a change of heart (cf. Rom. 2:1–4). Israel is always called to 'return', to 'turn back' to God because, as His people initially, she enjoyed a relationship which she has now lost. That is why, in the NT, the parable of the prodigal son (Lk. 15:11–32) had such point to a Jewish audience.

12 When the Bible says heart it means man's thinking powers, not his emotions. This turning back to God is thus a deliberate effort of will and an attitude of mind. Here, as in Dt. 11:13, the thought behind the phrase with all your heart is that of the totality of the response rather than its exact location. 13 In spite of Joel's preoccupation with the Temple and with priestly matters, the first clause of this verse shows that he belonged to the true prophetic succession: Rend your hearts and not your garments. The form of phrase is Semitic; he does not forbid or condemn the outward religious sign, but sets it in its true perspective. All prophets value the outward only as a sign of the presence of the inward reality. The description of God as gracious and merciful comes from God's self-revelation to Moses in Ex. 34:6, and is repeated in Jon. 4:2. Steadfast love is ḥeseḏ, the love that gave and maintained the covenant with Israel. It was for this sort of love in Israel that God looked (cf. Ho. 6:6), rather than for the ritual worship.

14 introduces (perhaps, on the basis of Am. 7:3) that hope fulfilled in vv. 18ff., where God promises to pour out His blessings on His people. Repent (cf. v. 13c 'repents of evil'), when applied to God, means that He will not carry out a threatened punishment, either in answer to intercessory prayer (cf. Am. 7:5) or because of a change of heart in the human involved, as here. Since God has willed that this should be, there is no conflict, nor limitation, nor inconsistency within God. Again, it is typical both of the smallness of Joel's world, and of his honest selflessness, that he first thinks of blessing in terms of ability to renew the interrupted daily offerings at the Temple, as an expression of an unclouded relationship with God. Dn. 8:11 shows how seriously post-exilic Jews viewed suspension of daily offerings in the Temple.

15, calling for a fast in Zion, repeats the thought, and much of the wording, of 1:14 and 2:1. 16 There are Ugaritic parallels to this list of various categories within a community—elders, children, infants, newly-wed, to indicate the total group. But in Ugarit, this is for war; here, it is for prayer. Dt. 24:5 shows that bridegrooms were normally exempt from military service, but necessity knows no law and the urgency for the need to repent is thus shown. For a bridal party to fast was, to the Hebrew, a contradiction in terms (see Mk. 2:19).

17 Those who, like Kapelrud, favour a liturgical interpretation of this book, interpret the words between the vestibule and the altar as a sort of 'Temple rubric', directing where the liturgy is to take place. As the phrase has exactly the same poetic rhythm as the message which follows, this is unlikely. It is better, with more literal-minded commentators, to see it as an injunction to mourn even within the inner priests' court (cf. 2 Ch. 4:9), for between the vestibule and the altar describes this area. The intercession of the priests for Israel in this verse is one of the noblest passages in Joel. It follows the tradition of the great intercessory prayers of the Bible, beginning with those of Abraham (Gn. 18:22–33) and Moses (Dt. 9:26–29). The Name, i.e. the revealed nature of God, is the basis of such prayer, along with the inalienable relationship that He has voluntarily established with His people. Where RSV has a byword among the nations, AV has 'that the heathen should rule over them'. The theological difference is not great, although the balance of linguistic probability is with the RSV. The last phrase, Where is their God? is an echo of Mi. 7:10 and Ps. 79:10. It finds its most poignant expression in the cry of Christ on the cross: 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?' (Mt. 27:46). 'He trusts in God; let God deliver him now', said the chief priests as they derided and mocked Him (Mt. 27:43). If Israel had been a byword, so was Israel's unrecognized Messiah, dying in apparent shame and weakness on the cross.

2:18–27 God's blessing restored

18 In this passage, Joel uses two parallel phrases to describe God, saying He became jealous and had pity; both describe the same reaction. Jealous would perhaps be better translated today as 'zealous', of which it is only a by-form in English. The concept as applied to God is as old as the explanation of the Ten Commandments in Ex. 20:5. It means that God is not cold or abstract or impersonal; He is love and He is the living God. In Bible thought qannā', 'zealous', denotes a living personal relationship, exclusive in the sense that it will not tolerate either deviation or rival. Because God is 'zealous', there are times when He must punish His people. Equally, because He is zealous, He will turn away from His anger and come down to save His undeserving people. Both these aspects of wrath and mercy are brought out in the Exodus passage. 19 As often in the OT, especially in very early or very late prophets, God's blessing is expressed in material ways, almost understood as a sacrament of His presence. Grain, wine and oil are the wealth of a farming community and thus the gift of God, as in Ho. 2:8 (cf. Am. 9:11–15).

V. 20, with its reference to the northerner, is a prophetic double entendre rather than a problem. Kapelrud discusses it as an eschatological symbol, and interprets this passage in the light of the last days. Thompson, however, points out that, in the past, locust plagues have frequently swept down from Jerusalem from the north, so that this verse could be quite literal. It is also true that Israel's main invaders (Aram, Assyria, Babylon, Persia, Greece, Rome) all attacked from the north; apart from Egypt, there was no major danger from other quarters. Thus the northerner, an army or king from the north (Je. 1:13; Dn. 11:6) could well be a picture of any invader. There is no need to look for special symbolism of points of the compass here; it was a sheer fact of geography for Israel, as a glance at a map will show. In English history the same is true; for centuries 'northmen' meant enemies or raiders, irrespective of their exact country of origin. To a Chinese, 'westerner' had much the same meaning. If then we take the verses literally, God will whirl the locusts from Jerusalem to the Negeb (a parched and desolate land), probably by a north or north-west wind; cf. God's use of wind in Ex. 10:13, 19. In that case the 'locust belt' would stretch from the Philistine coast (western sea) to the Dead Sea (eastern sea), and doubtless many would drown. As to the stench of drowned locusts there is much recorded in the commentators. Of course this could equally well remind Israel of the odour of thousands of unburied bodies on an old battlefield; cf. Is. 66:24. To our modern world, one of the most refreshing things about the Bible is its frankness; a bad smell is still a bad smell, even in Scripture.

21ff. There is a description of the quick restoration of a parched and ravaged countryside by the coming of good rains. 22 Those who have lived in a land liable to drought will appreciate how quickly the pastures of the wilderness are green. Over the brown dust and cracked clods there spreads a fresh blur of green, and the burnt branches push out fresh leaves. Animals and men alike share in God's bounty, as they had shared in the dearth before.

23 Joel likes to use the old name Zion, not just for Jerusalem (cf. 2:15) but for all Judah (cf. 2:23), probably because of its Davidic associations. It is not a meaningless archaism or an escapism into the past, but a confident looking into the Messianic future. Fruitfulness in Israel, as in Australia today, depend on winter rain. The early rain was October and November, at sowing time, and the even more precious latter rain was March–April, when the grain was swelling, before the fierce heat of the summer. The translation of hammôreh liṣᵉdāqâ as the early rain for your vindication (cf. AV, 'the former rain moderately') seems likely in view of Ho. 10:12 and Is. 45:8, both again with reference to rain. Presumably the thought is that, now Israel has repented, God sets His seal to their repentance by the gift of rain. The rain is, as it were, God's mark that they are justified or righteous. Thus God is now righteous to treat them so. But the word môreh, translated rain here can also mean 'teacher', and it is highly probable that the Essenes of the Qumran community derived their concept of the 'Teacher of Righteousness', or 'righteous teacher' from a typically Hebraic pun or Rabbinic exegesis of this verse. The Targum and Vulgate, not to mention some modern commentators, have preferred the translation 'the teacher', quite independently of the Dead Sea Scrolls. In that case the Essenes must have regarded the appearance of their teacher, whether historical or hypothetical, as a sign of the last days. 24, 25 Whatever the exact interpretation of v. 24, the main outline is clear; the land is flowing, not with milk and honey (that is the ideal of the nomad shepherd), but with grain, . . . wine and oil, the farmer's ideal. The years of the locust plague have vanished in years of plenty. This is still in the future for Joel's countrymen; but if they repent, it will surely follow. For the hard agricultural conditions after the return from Babylon, see Hg. 2:16.

26, 27 Then, in words very reminiscent of Deuteronomy (26:1–11), the prophet states God's goal in all this; God's people are to realize His love and power, and know that He is their God, in their very midst. Indeed v. 27 is as strong a statement of monotheism as anything in the second half of Isaiah, or anywhere else in the OT.

2:28 – 3:21 ESCHATOLOGY

2:28, 29 Universalized gift of the Spirit

The Hebrew Bible (which makes Joel four chapters) begins its third chapter at this point, thus emphasizing its importance. It is quite clear from the word afterward that, while the giving of fruitfulness lies in the near future, the universalized gift of the Spirit lies in the distant future from Joel's standpoint. It was therefore a true insight of Peter's in Acts 2:16ff. to apply this promise to the gift of the Spirit at Pentecost, a feast which in origin celebrated the fullness of the harvest, and was a thanksgiving to God for the fruits of the earth. 'In the latter days' is another common phrase used in the OT to introduce descriptions of the last things.

At the risk of over-simplification, it may be said that God gave His Spirit, in OT days, to special men on special occasions for special tasks. Indeed there was almost an 'aristocracy of the Spirit', for such leaders were few in number compared with the mass of the people. The responsibility of the people was not to receive special guidance themselves but to recognize and obey God's voice, as mediated to them through these Spirit-filled leaders, rather as a Christian must recognize in the voice of Christ, the voice of God (cf. Jn. 7:16, 17). Now the possession of the Spirit will be the universal hall-mark of God's children, though the Spirit will find outlet in various ways. The metaphor of 'pouring' the Spirit (cf. Is. 32:15) is no doubt derived from the deluge of winter rains in Palestine. Numerous other prophets have spoken of this new plan of God's in their own way (Ezekiel, with reference to the Spirit, Ezk. 37:1–14, and Jeremiah with reference to the new covenant, Je. 31:31–34) but none more clearly than Joel. Even he is only reproducing the noble wish of Moses in Nu. 11:19 that all the Lord's people might be prophets, voiced in answer to Joshua's protest.

In OT (cf. Ex. 31:3; 35:31) and New Testament alike (cf. 1 Cor. 12:4–11) the gift of the Spirit has numerous forms and outlets. Here prophesy, dream, and visions shows that Joel, in an age when prophecy is almost dead (cf. Zc. 13:4), is thinking mainly of the Spirit as revealing God's will. In the Mosaic age, though not apparently in Joel's day, prophecy had been ecstatic, accompanied by unusual physical phenomena. It was therefore natural that in Peter's day, surrounded by the phenomena of Pentecost (Acts 2:1–4) his mind should go back to this passage of Joel.

2:30–32 Signs of the last days

Nowadays we tend to separate these verses from those immediately above dealing with the gift of the Spirit, but it is noteworthy that Peter, in Acts 2:16–21, continues his quotation of Joel to the end of v. 32. He equates the gift of the Spirit with the dawning of the Messianic age, which was to usher in the final judgment. Theologically this is true: factually, we recognize that, while in one sense the final judgment is always in operation, in another sense its full manifestation is yet to come. No doubt Peter and the first generation expected this full manifestation in their own day, and this should be the constant attitude of the people of God. In the Hebrew Bible, 2:28–32 is bracketed together as a separate chapter, forming ch. 3.

30, 31 The various portents given are common to both OT and NT eschatology—blood, fire, smoke and darkness. All are natural symbols, drawn from vivid memories of invading armies. Whether v. 31 is to be understood as a literal solar eclipse (often held as symbol of disaster) or metaphorically, as the collapse of world powers, is uncertain. The latter seems to be the more likely interpretation in the 'little Apocalypse' of Mk. 13:24 as well as in Rev. 6:12, where the same symbol appears. 32 Peter in Acts 2:21 uses the concept of all who call upon the name of the Lord as Paul does in Rom. 10:13.

V. 32 is the clearest example in the whole book of quotation from another prophet. The words in Mount Sion . . . there shall be those who escape are borrowed directly from Ob. 17, and the quotation is acknowledged by Joel by the addition of as the Lord has said. It is, however, possible that both Obadiah and Joel are quoting some earlier anonymous prophetic saying: cf. the allusion made in Gn. 22:14, 'on the mount of the Lord it shall be provided'. When closely examined, the OT proves to be a nexus of quotation and natural dependence, reaching far deeper than such acknowledged dependence of the later prophets on their predecessors. Dn. 9:2, referring directly to Jeremiah, is an illustration of this, as is Zc. 1:4, with its general reference to 'the former prophets'. Jeremiah's life was saved only because it was remembered that, a century before, Micah had preached the same message unscathed (Je. 26:18). For a detailed discussion of the parallel passages in Joel and the other OT books, see Thompson in IB. There are over twenty places where identical words are used. In all cases where the direction of the dependence can be traced, it is Joel who has borrowed from the other prophets, and not vice versa. This simply indicates that Joel is writing fully in the prophetic tradition, and at the end of that tradition. As Paul would say, prophecy was already passing away (see 1 Cor. 13:8). This was fully realized both in OT (Zc. 13:4) and Apocryphal days (1 Macc. 4:46). Indeed, that was why the appearance of John the Baptist caused such excitement, as heralding the rebirth of the prophetic order (cf. Mal. 4:5).

It has been said that Joel, short book though it is, is yet a veritable compendium of OT eschatology. It contains five references to the day of the Lord (for a similar use of 'day' with a special significance, cf. 'D-day'), and every major eschatological topic except those of the Messiah, the resurrection and the inclusion of the Gentiles. Ezekiel, Isaiah and Zephaniah find many echoes throughout.

3:1–15 Judgment on the nations

1 Once again, as in Je. 33:15, in these days and at that time points to the distant and vague future. RSV with the general phrase restore the fortunes of Judah may be correct, but the AV 'bring again the captivity of Judah' is the literal translation. This does not necessarily prove Joel an exilic prophet; the vast majority of the exiles never came back, even in the days of Nehemiah and Ezra, but remained in Babylonia as 'captives'. This picture now becomes that of a vast assize with all the nations gathered before God the Judge (cf. Zp. 3:8). The metaphor may have been suggested by the oft-repeated sight of multi-racial foreign armies, lying camped around Jerusalem, in the numerous sieges of her troubled history. 2 It may be that the phrase valley of Jehoshaphat is chosen simply for the meaning of the name, 'the Lord has judged'. The play on the verb I will enter into judgment in the second half of the verse, suggests this explanation, as does the synonym 'valley of decision' in v. 14. But if a geographical location is sought, from the days of Eusebius onwards the Kidron Valley has been associated with this name. Perhaps we may cf. the term 'the King's Valley' of Gn. 14:17, also near Jerusalem. Obviously any attacker would have to occupy this valley after seizing the Mount of Olives, before he could attack the walls of Jerusalem. The whole area would then become a great natural amphitheatre, packed with troops. The mention of Jehoshaphat has sometimes been used as an argument for a 9th-century date for the book of Joel. But if this is only a place-name, no argument as to date can be based on it, except that the reference can hardly antedate the king of that name.

4–8 The list of the sins of the gôyîm, or non-Jewish nations, reminds us of the catalogue in Am. 1:1 – 2:3. They have been merciless to the defenceless, the prisoner of war and the refugee. At this late date, the wealthy slave-merchants of Phoenicia and Philistia are the culprits singled out. Even in the days of Am. 1:6, Philistine slave-dealers had been active, but now they were actually selling Jewish slaves to the sons of the Ionians (v. 6). That the Greeks are a great commercial power, but not yet world rulers, helps to date the book, as does the complete absence of reference to Assyria or Babylon. The lack of reference to Persia could be explained by setting the book in the days of the early Persian Empire, when the Persian yoke was still light. In the late 4th century, Persia became decadent and oppressive. In 345 BC, after a revolt, Sidon was attacked and enslaved and, in 332 BC Alexander treated Gaza in the same way. Here was a grim fulfilment of prophecy, for doubtless Jewish middlemen, who stood in high favour at the Persian court, as Nehemiah's career shows, and enjoyed Alexander's favour, as the Jewish quarter in Alexandria demonstrates, sold these slaves in the markets of South Arabia. For the Sabeans, see the article by Van Beek in The Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible; their importance continued into Roman days later.

Perhaps this cruelty of the Phoenicians and Philistines had taken place long before, at the time of the Babylonian sack of Jerusalem in 586 BC. We learn from Ezra and Nehemiah, however, that slavery for debt was not unknown even among the small community that returned from exile (cf. Ne. 5:5). We also know of Phoenician traders frequenting the Jerusalem markets in those days (cf. Ne. 13:16). But the reference to Temple robbing (v. 5) would fit the earlier period better. Again, there is a grim humour in v. 4. When the Phoenicians acted thus, they no doubt felt they were avenging themselves on the Lord (perhaps for the Phoenician massacres of Jehu's reign?) but now the Lord's vengeance will fall upon them. It is well to remember that in an age to which the doctrine of the resurrection had not as yet been clearly revealed, it was necessary that God should vindicate His character in this life, lest men should doubt His justice.

9–15 The RSV prints these verses as a new section, and in verse form. But the opening verses of the chapter are also poetry, and are printed as such in the Hebrew Bible. There is, however, a definite quickening of tempo, as the imaginary war token is sent to the nations. It may be that even the form of words in vv. 9, 10 is traditional on such occasions, for there are similarities in the Ugaritic texts that deal with the same subject. 10 has been called a parody of Is. 2:4 and Mi. 4:3 because it makes exactly the opposite demand, not that men 'beat swords into ploughshares' but that they beat ploughshares into swords. But perhaps Joel's was the original rallying call for Israel that went out along with the pieces of the slaughtered ox (or in darker days, pieces of a human body; cf. 1 Sa. 11:7; Jdg. 19:29). In that case it would be Isaiah and Micah who have altered the wording, not Joel. R. A. Stewart considers this possible, for other reasons.

11 The exact meaning of bring down thy warriors, O Lord is not clear. Thompson takes it as a reference to God's angelic armies. If so, we might compare Dn. 10:20 and Christ's words to His disciples in the garden of Gethsemane (Mt. 26:53). But perhaps it only means that God is leading these heathen hordes into a trap. 13 Supporting the first view would be the command to put in the sickle. Down to NT times, the eschatological harvesters are usually the angels; see Mt. 13:39; Rev. 14:14–19. Harvest and vintage, which come close together in Palestine, are natural symbols of the end of an age in any agricultural country that enjoys a seasonal climate. They are also fit symbols of the judgment because the true state of the crop is then and then only declared. Other factors that assist in the use of this image are, on one hand, the joy surrounding both harvest and grape-gathering and, on the other hand, the custom of treading out the grapes with bare feet, producing crimson stains like blood on feet and clothing. For a vivid application of this in a Messianic context see Is. 63:1. It is striking that, in the Lord's Supper, Christians still use bread and wine, the twin symbols of harvest and vintage, salvation and judgment.

3:16–21 Salvation for God's people

From now on the focus of the picture changes from God's enemies to God's people. Many features remind us of Amos, so much so that Joel may have been consciously reproducing some of the older prophet's ideas. Am. 1:2 has the simile of the Lord roaring like a lion, and Am. 9:13 supplies the picture of the mountains running with new wine, reproduced by Joel in v. 18. It may also be significant that Amos dates his prophecies by reference to an earthquake (Am. 1:1). From Mosaic days, earthquake was an outward symbol of theophany, and so in Joel the heavens and the earth shake when God speaks (v. 16). Here the goal of God's action is not only that His people may know Him for what He is, but also Jerusalem may be holy, and undefiled by outsiders. Contrast Dn. 8:13, where the tramp of foreign feet is continually to desecrate the Temple.

18 Beside the traditional pictures of agricultural fruitfulness, there is one which is typically Israelite—all the stream beds of Judah shall flow with water (v. 18). These are the dry wadis, the water-courses in the Negeb mentioned in Ps. 126:4. After heavy rain they become rushing torrents and, as long as they contain water, there is pasture even in the desert. The second half of the couplet, a fountain shall come forth from the house of the Lord, is certainly not to be taken literally, but in close connection with the symbolic river that is to flow from the Temple (cf. Ezk. 47:1–12; Zc. 14:8). Thompson suggests that the existence of sacred springs like Gihon in the valley below the Temple may at least have suggested the analogy. In that case the valley of Shittim ('Acacias') would be the lower area of the Kedron valley, where to this day there is a thin growth of acacias, although the area is very dry. But in view of Christ's use of this symbol of a spring in Jn. 4:14, and the symbolism of the 'river' in Rev. 22:1, 2 it is probably unnecessary to look for a temporal locale. Joel may well be thinking of the rivers of Paradise in Gn. 2:10–14; cf. Ps. 46:4. If Israel's history had been 'Paradise lost' then the Messianic age is 'Paradise regained'. Ever since Isaiah's day, 'the waters of Shiloah that flow gently' (Is. 8:6) have been a Messianic symbol, as opposed to the flood that signifies judgment.

19–21 In the closing verses, Joel turns momentarily from God's salvation to His judgment. Here are two pictures side by side. Judah has become a fruitful land instead of a wilderness, and Egypt and Edom have been turned into a wilderness from a fruitful land. This is the double aspect of God's work stressed in Ps. 107:33–36. For the threatened overthrow of Egypt, cf. Ezk. 29:1–12. The bitterness felt by the Jews towards Edom was very great, principally because of their siding with Babylon in the final attack on Jerusalem (cf. Ps. 137:7). The hatred towards Egypt may have been because, so often in the past, Egypt had proved a broken reed in time of trouble (cf. 2 Ki. 18:21).

No doubt Egypt shared in the general suffering and slaughter of late Persian rule, for she hailed Alexander gladly as a deliverer. Edom, though the Jews hated her for her occupation of Jewish Hebron and the Negeb, suffered far more severely herself. At this time, she lost all her old homeland (including the capital Sela, later Petra) to the new and aggressive Arab group, the Nabataeans. So soon was the 'word of the Lord' fulfilled on these lands, but Judah and Jerusalem remained, an abiding testimony to the faithfulness of God. With this triumphant assertion, the Lord dwells in Zion, the little book of Joel ends.

Amos

INTRODUCTION

THE TIMES OF AMOS

The precise date which the book of Amos supplies (1:1), 'two years before the earthquake', is unfortunately no longer ascertainable. Uzziah of Judah can be dated (767–740 BC), as can his contemporary, Jeroboam II of Israel (782–753 BC). The question remains at what point within these long reigns the internal evidence of the book makes most sense. A dating c. 760 BC is well agreed among students and suits the facts.

The reign of Jeroboam was exceedingly prosperous. Everything was conducive to Israelite expansion, and this energetic king was not slow to seize the opportunity. In 805 BC Adad-nirari III of Assyria crushed Damascus and thus disposed of Syria as a threat to the other Palestinian states. Assyria itself, however, subsequently lost momentum and made no serious attempt to exercise authority over the Mediterranean coastlands until the accession of Tiglath-pileser III in 745 BC.

Jeroboam extended the borders of his kingdom until they coincided with those of the days of Solomon, and it is very likely that Am. 6:13 (see Commentary) reflects national pride in his military prowess. Extended territory gave the nation extended control of trade routes, and this resulted in immense commercial prosperity and the establishment of a wealthy aristocracy, living in great luxury (e.g. 2:12, 15; 5:11; 6:6).
