Preface

The first edition of this commentary, edited by the late Professor F. Davidson with the assistance of the late Rev. A. M. Stibbs and the late Dr E. F. Kevan, was published in 1953. It was an immediate success. A further printing followed by a second edition appeared the following year. Since then it has been reprinted many times both in Great Britain and in the USA. There has been, however, considerable progress in biblical studies in recent years. This led the Publications Committee of the Inter-Varsity Fellowship to decide that the time had come to undertake a full-scale revision of the commentary. Although the demand for the original edition continued as strong as ever, it was clear that there were now many ways in which the book could be improved.

This volume contains twelve General Articles in addition to commentaries on each of the sixty-six books of the Bible. Five of the former and thirty-seven of the commentaries are entirely new contributions. All the other material has been revised, most of it very extensively.

The general aim of the commentary has remained the same—to provide for the serious student of the Bible a new and up-to-date treatment of the text which combines unqualified belief in its divine inspiration, essential historical trustworthiness and positive Christian usefulness with careful scholarship. Restriction on space has meant, of course, that authors had to curtail discussion of some speculative matters regarding dates and questions of authorship. Standard Introductions to the Old and New Testaments, such as those by Professor R. K. Harrison[1] and Dr Donald Guthrie,[2] should be consulted on these points, and also the relevant articles in the New Bible Dictionary.[3] It should also be borne in mind that a one-volume commentary cannot be expected to devote the same space even to matters of exegesis as is found in commentaries on single books of the Bible.[4] If the reader, therefore, finds some particular problem verse either given scanty notice or perhaps no notice at all, it is not because the author failed in his duty but because there had to be many a hard choice between priorities.

The most noticeable major alteration in this new edition is the use of the Revised Standard Version text as a basis for the commentary in place of the Authorized Version or King James Version. But thought has been given to the needs of those who will be using it in conjunction either with the Authorized Version or with other translations and many of the major differences between the versions are commented upon. A number of changes in format have also been introduced, all of which, it is hoped, will make the volume easier to use.

The Editors and Publishers are greatly indebted to the many contributors to this volume who have placed their talents, time and experience so wholeheartedly at their service. As will be seen from the list of names, they come from a wide range of church affiliation and are serving in universities, theological colleges and churches in many parts of the world. It is natural that they should differ among themselves in some matters of interpretation. It ought perhaps to be stressed, therefore, that each contributor is responsible only for the article or articles appearing over his name and neither he nor the Editors are to be regarded as necessarily endorsing everything that is written elsewhere in the book.

With the production of the new edition of this commentary the Universities and Colleges Christian Fellowship (formerly called the Inter-Varsity Fellowship) continues its work of providing material designed to promote more thorough Bible study. The study course Search the Scriptures[5] covers the whole Bible in approximately three years. The New Bible Dictionary in 2,300 articles provides background information on a great variety of biblical subjects, and makes an excellent reference work and useful companion to the present volume. With these and a good reference Bible, the average student will find himself well equipped with the basic Bible study aids he requires.

Considerable help in the preparation of this volume has been received from a wide circle of friends and advisers. It would be invidious to single out one or the other for special thanks, but mention must be made of the careful work in checking both manuscripts and proofs which has been carried out by Miss Mary Gladstone MA and Miss Clare Richards MA of the Publishers' editorial department. The Editors have benefited considerably at every stage from the help which they have given.

The original edition was sent out with the prayer that God would use it by His Spirit to help many to gain from the Scriptures a fresh and increasing understanding of His ways and of His will for men. We echo that prayer, knowing as we do that today it is as important as it has ever been to bring the whole of life to be tested and guided by the authoritative Word of God.

The authority of Scripture

THE BIBLICAL WITNESS

Our thinking concerning the authority and inspiration of Holy Scripture must start always from the fact that the Bible itself assumes everywhere that it is a message directly given by God Himself. In this first section it must be our main task to substantiate that fact and to discuss its implications. But one preliminary question must first be answered. When we assert the unique authority of the Bible, is it legitimate to appeal to the Bible's own testimony in support of that assertion? Is it not a most outrageous form of question-begging to make the Bible itself the first and final arbiter in its own case? Are we not guilty of presupposing the very thing which we are asked to substantiate?

The answer to this question is, of course, that we do not turn to the Bible for proof, but for information. Rational arguments may be advanced in favour of the unique authority of Scripture, but in the last analysis we accept that authority by faith. We accept it only in so far as the Bible itself requires it. In other words, it is only as the inspiration and authenticity of the record are a (necessary) part of the revelation that we confess the Bible as the supreme rule of faith and life. If the Bible did not make that claim, we should have no call to believe it. Nor could we have general confidence in the teaching of Scripture. But if the Bible stands before us as the authoritative Word of God, the Word which itself claims authority, then it is as such that we must reckon with it, receiving that Word and the authority of that Word, or resisting it.

Does the Bible make any such assertion of authority? If it does, what does that assertion imply? With regard to the first question, the answer is so vast that our main difficulty is that of compression. In the OT as in the NT the claim to a more than human authority is everywhere implicit, and in many places it finds direct and open expression. It is claimed, e.g., that Moses received from God both the moral law and also more detailed commandments, even extending to arrangements for the Tabernacle. The prophets maintained that they were not speaking their own words, but the message which God Himself had given to them. The Lord Jesus Christ spoke with authority because He was conscious of speaking not merely as the historical Teacher but as the eternal Son. The apostles had no doubt as to the authoritativeness of their pronouncements, whether they were quoting our Lord or developing the Christian message under the guidance of the outpoured Spirit.

It may be objected that in the majority of these cases the claim to authority is made only on behalf of the message delivered and not on behalf of the written record in which that message has been handed down to us. Thus it may well be true that the prophets or Jesus Christ spoke with divine authority, but sometimes we have their words only at second hand. The fact that inspiration is claimed for them does not mean that inspiration is claimed for those who compiled the record of their activity and teaching. If this is so there is no guarantee that what is written in the Bible is a verbatim or accurate account of the message actually delivered.

Against this objection we may set the fact that in the NT especially, and with reference to the OT, definite authority is claimed for the written word of the Bible. This point emerges clearly in many parts of the teaching of our Lord Himself. Thus He answers the tempter with the threefold 'It is written'. On the mount of transfiguration He tells His disciples that it is written of the Son of man that He should suffer many things and be set at naught. To the Jews who searched the Scriptures He gave counsel that 'it is they that bear witness to me'. After the resurrection He interpreted to the disciples in all the Scriptures the things concerning Himself, showing that all things must needs be fulfilled, which were 'written about me in the law of Moses and the prophets and the psalms'. These and similar statements make it quite plain that Jesus Himself accepted the inspiration and authority of the written Word, especially in so far as it gave prophetic witness to His own death and resurrection. It is also clear from verses like Jn. 14:26 and Jn. 16:13 that He expected and promised a similar inspiration in the case of the apostolic testimony yet to be made.

When we come to the apostles we find that their testimony to the divine authority of the Bible is equally clear. In all the Gospels great emphasis is laid upon the inspired foretelling of the work and Person of Christ. The apostle Paul quotes extensively from the OT, and his preaching to his own people is very largely an attempt to prove the Messiahship of Jesus from OT history and prophecy. The statement in 2 Tim. 3:16 sums up the whole attitude of Paul. Whatever translation we adopt it is plain from v. 15 that the apostle has the OT in mind and that he thinks of it as peculiarly inspired by God. The other apostolic writers quote just as frequently from the OT, and in 2 Peter open testimony is borne to the inspiration of the Bible in a way very similar to that in 2 Timothy. In 2 Pet. 1:21 the word of prophecy is traced back to its final author in God the Holy Spirit: 'Because no prophecy ever came by the impulse of man, but men moved by the Holy Spirit spoke from God.' Again, in 2 Pet. 3:16 there seems to be a further allusion to the written Bible as an authoritative word which must be approached with reverence and humility. The latter verse is particularly interesting in that it couples together the Epistles of Paul and the other scriptures, a fairly plain hint that the apostolic authors were conscious of adding to and completing the authoritative Canon of the OT.

Surveying the evidence, we may allow that the passages that treat directly of the inspiration of Scripture are few in number, and that there is no particular assertion of the status or authority of every individual book. On the other hand, we may note that, with the exception of Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther, Ecclesiastes, Song of Solomon, Obadiah, Nahum and Zephaniah, all the books of the OT are directly quoted in the NT; and when we take into account the attitude of the NT to such quotations there can be little doubt that the 'Thus says the Lord' of the prophets was taken to apply to the records of prophetic activity as well as to oral words delivered on this or that specific occasion. The written word was treated as the inspired and authoritative form in which the content of divine revelation had been expressed and handed down.

When we ask concerning the implications of this witness, several important points emerge. First, it may be noted that no specific theory of inspiration is introduced. From the two texts, Jn. 14:26 and 2 Pet. 1:21, it seems that there is a twofold activity: that of the human author on the one hand, and that of the inspiring and controlling Spirit on the other. Certainly there is no doubt as to the final initiative and supremacy of the Spirit. But there is also no suggestion of the obliteration of the personality and individuality of the human author. Again, we may notice that inspiration is seen particularly in the insight of the OT writers into the future activity of God. The prophet was a forthteller, no doubt; but the ultimate test of his prophecy was the correctness of his insight into the divinely-directed future, and that necessarily meant foretelling. Even in the OT itself the prophet who foretold incorrectly was discredited, and in the NT the main value of the OT is the prophetic witness to Jesus Christ. If it is true that that witness supports the Messianic claim of Jesus, it is also true that the Messianic work of Jesus vindicates the prophetic claim of the OT. A very large proportion of the OT citations are concerned with various forms of that prophetic witness.

A third point is that the historical setting of the OT is everywhere accepted as authentic. Our Lord, for instance, does not question the connection of Moses with the Law, or the Davidic authorship of Ps. 110. The apostles accept all the main events of OT history from Adam and the Fall (1 Tim. 2:13, 14) to the crossing of the Red Sea (1 Cor. 10:1), the Balaam incidents (2 Pet. 2:16), the fall of Jericho (Heb. 11:30), the deliverances under the judges (Heb. 11:32) and the miracles of Elijah (Jas. 5:17). In face of this clear testimony the suggestion has been made that our Lord and the apostles simply shared the common assumptions of their age and made use of the historical happenings only in illustration of their theology. It certainly cannot be denied, however, that, in the NT, belief in the authority of the OT does involve an acceptance of its historical as well as its religious or doctrinal truth. It is worth remembering, too, that if that acceptance means acceptance of the supernatural control and intervention of almighty God, nowhere do we have a clearer or more decisive instance of such intervention and control than in the central facts of the Christian gospel, the life and death and resurrection of Jesus Christ.

Attention is sometimes drawn to the apparent freedom, even arbitrariness, of the NT in its citation of the OT. On the one hand, a common use is made of the LXX Greek, and at times this involves quite extensive divergences from the Massoretic Hebrew. On the other, OT verses are often referred prophetically to Christ when their original application seems to be entirely different. The deduction is that this freedom suggests a far looser conception of inspiration than that traditionally associated with the Bible and its authors. But the following points must be remembered. With regard to the LXX, it is quite possible that in many cases the Greek translation gives a more faithful and coherent account of the original than the MT. Again, the main aim in a translation is to convey the true sense rather than to provide word-for-word equivalents. In view of the inevitable differences in linguistic structure and provenance, this means that a freer rendering is often more truly accurate than a literal. In the LXX the NT authors had a carefully-weighed and long-standing translation with which many of their readers were already familiar. A further point is that, in some cases, the Holy Spirit may have used the LXX to bring out new aspects of divine truth, or to make a more forceful application. Where necessary, of course, importance could be attached even to the minuter details of the original text (cf. Gal. 3:16).

The problem of the prophetic testimonies is no less serious, for here the whole meaning and application seems to have changed. Indeed, it is suggested that the verses have either consciously or unconsciously been misapplied in the search for detailed proofs from prophecy of the Messiahship of Christ. At a first glance, the suggestion looks reasonable enough, for in their original context many of the verses do not seem to have even the slightest Messianic reference. But although it is a collection of writings, the Bible is a single book, and that means that there is a larger as well as an immediate context. Ultimately, all the history of Israel is concentrated and fulfilled in that of the only true Israelite, and throughout that history the same patterns of divine activity may be observed. Behind the seemingly artificial reference to Rachel in Mt. 2, e.g., there stands a constantly-recurring movement of aggression, death and exile. Taken merely as proof texts, the citations might not be convincing, but in the wider context of the divine purpose and activity they introduce us to types and patterns of which the history of Jesus Christ is the true fulfilment.

We must be careful, of course, not to read into the self-attestation of Scripture more than is actually there. With regard to authorships and dates, e.g., tradition has often been vocal where the Bible itself is silent. The extent of the biblical silence is sometimes rather surprising. We know little about the compilation of the historical books of the OT. We are not told the exact date and circumstances of some prophetic writings (e.g. Malachi). We do not know who wrote many of the Psalms or the book of Job. We are not told that Hebrews was written by Paul. The text itself does not tell us that Luke wrote the Third Gospel and Acts, or that the apostle John wrote the Fourth Gospel, although the case for Luke and John rests on sound and legitimate inference. It is as well sometimes to remember that there is this line between a direct biblical testimony and even the reliable evidence of tradition. Otherwise we may easily identify the authority of Scripture with that of historical statements which are outside the scope of Scripture itself.

When all this is said, however, it must be said too that the Bible does lay serious claim to divine origin, status and authority. It states clearly that its message is of God. It traces back its authority through the human writings to the Holy Spirit. It accepts the supernatural both in prophetic utterances and in historical events. It makes no artificial distinction between the inward content of the Word of God and its outward form. By its self-authentication as God's Word written, the Bible challenges us directly either to faith or to unbelief. In our approach to the Bible other considerations may obtrude, but the basic challenge certainly cannot be ignored.

THE REFORMED DOCTRINE

It was upon the foundation of the self-witness of the Bible that the Reformers built their doctrine of Holy Scripture. They adopted this procedure because first and foremost their theology was a theology of faith, a revealed theology. Their starting-point was, therefore, the response of faith to the challenge of the biblical message. They accepted that message on its own terms, and in loyalty to it they tried to understand the Bible as the Bible understood itself. As we have already seen, the Reformed method is regarded as both illegitimate and futile by those who think that theology should be constructed upon purely rational foundations. But the Reformers themselves were theologians of faith, making use of reason only in response and obedience to the divine revelation. This meant that they were theologians who were pledged in faith to receive the testimony of the Word of God written, even in matters concerning its own nature and being.

The Reformers believed, then, that the Bible was given by God, and that it was inspired both in content and also in form. They did not take any radical step when they propounded this view. The mediaeval church had held a similar view. But they did take the step. Everywhere in their writings we find evidence of a whole-hearted acceptance of the inspiration and authority of the Bible. This is so in spite of the free comments which have led some modern scholars to regard Luther and Calvin as early critics, or at any rate as men who distinguished between the living content of Scripture and the detailed wording, in contrast to their supposedly more legalistic successors. In fact, however, both Luther and Calvin extolled the authority of the letter too. Their remarks on the minor problems should not blind us to the fact that for them Scripture was the divinely-authoritative record upon which all true theology must be founded. The special attitude of Luther to James is linked with his doubts as to its authentic canonicity, so that it does not affect his general understanding.

The Bible was inspired and authoritative, but it was also sole-sufficient in matters of faith and conduct. It would be an exaggeration to say that the Reformers set up the Bible as the only authority in the church. But it is no exaggeration to say that they regarded the Bible as the supreme authority from which all other authorities derived and to which they were all subject. Because it was itself from God, the Bible contained everything necessary both to salvation and to the Christian life. Nothing was to be believed or taught in the church unless it had the sanction either of the plain text of Scripture or of clear inferences from it. The Calvinists extended the direct rule of Scripture even to the details of church order and worship, and the Lutherans and Anglicans all ascribed a negative authority to the Bible in these spheres—i.e. they would not permit anything which was excluded by Scripture or repugnant to it.

The emphasis upon the supremacy and sole-sufficiency of the Bible was clearly designed to destroy the mediaeval assertion of an authority of tradition and of the church side by side and on an equality with that of Holy Scripture. A further step in the same direction was the insistence that the Bible must be understood only in its plain and literal sense and not according to the fourfold scheme of mediaeval exegesis. This did not mean that a symbolical or metaphorical sense could not be accorded to what was plainly symbol or metaphor. What it did mean was that a more than literal sense must not be introduced into the ordinary statements of Scripture except in cases where the Bible itself expressly sanctions it—e.g. in the understanding of the Red Sea crossing as a type of baptism, or the reference of the OT priesthood to Christ. Parallel types might be drawn for the purpose of spiritual edification, but they were not to be regarded as authoritative for Christian belief or conduct. Should difficulties of interpretation arise they were to be resolved by the comparison of scripture with scripture, the more luminous and straightforward passages being used to illuminate the more difficult and obscure. These exegetical rules were important for two reasons: they cleared away much of the confusion inevitably caused by the mediaeval scheme, thus making possible the erection of a genuine biblical theology; and they destroyed the authority of the official interpreters of Scripture who alone could manipulate successfully the complicated fourfold technique.

The Reformers accepted all parts of canonical Scripture as inspired and authoritative, although they did not accord an equal degree of importance and relevance to every part. The insistence that all canonical Scripture is inspired was directed against some of the Anabaptist groups who could not agree to the full inspiration of the OT. The Reformers saw clearly that the OT is a most important part of the divine witness to Jesus Christ and to saving truth. They argued that the moral teaching of the OT is eternally valid as an expression of God's will for His people. The theological principles underlying God's dealings with Israel are also the same as those underlying His dealings with Christians and the Christian church, thus providing further illustration and confirmation of divine truth. The OT and the NT belong together, the one as preparation, the other as fulfilment.

All parts of the Bible are inspired and authoritative, the Reformers taught, but not all parts are of equal importance. The Mosaic legislation in Leviticus had not the same spiritual or theological value as the Gospel of John, or even the Decalogue. In this respect the Bible is in some sense analogous to the church as the body of Christ. All the members constitute the body and are necessary to it. But although all the members are necessary they are not all of equal importance. Some members are more used than others, and some may be regarded as vital: without them the body would perish altogether. So it is with the Bible. We cannot mutilate the Bible without loss, but some parts are more dispensable than others. If the evangelical message is given, it is possible to be a Christian with only a fragment of Scripture; to be a full-grown Christian it is necessary to have the whole counsel of God.

A certain difficulty arises when the attempt is made to discriminate between the more and less relevant and important passages, for purely subjective considerations threaten to control and perhaps distort our judgment in this matter. Zwingli and Luther both gave helpful rules which are not so very different: the importance and relevance of a passage depend upon the measure in which it serves, first, to promote the glory of God and, second, to reveal and exalt the Lord Jesus Christ. It is because some parts of the Bible do this more directly and plainly than others that they are to be regarded as the more important passages of Scripture. But in the last resort all Scripture is in some way directed towards this twofold end.

The Reformers emphasized the importance of the letter of the Bible, but not at the expense of the sovereignty of the Holy Spirit in His use and application of the Bible message. In the thought of the Reformers the Holy Spirit was not merely the Author of Scripture; He also determined the application of Scripture to its twofold end, and gave to the believer an inward persuasion of the authority of its message as revealed truth. On the first of these further points it need only be added that, while the meaning of the Bible is plain, for an inward apprehension something more is needed than the ordinary rational intelligence. For genuine understanding there is required the illumination of the Holy Spirit which is for the individual the necessary complement of God's outward revelation.

Some modern theologians have seized upon this illumination as true inspiration according to the Reformed conception: i.e. the Bible is inspired only in so far as the Holy Spirit uses this or that passage to accomplish an inward enlightenment in the individual Christian. In the Reformers themselves, however, there seem to be few traces of the equation of the individual enlightenment with inspiration as such. The Bible is an inspired record of the divine self-revelation whether this or that individual receives its witness or not. The revelation and the recording of it in written form are both objective acts. Illumination by the Holy Spirit is the subjective complement of these acts within the individual and for the salvation of the individual. As it is God the Holy Spirit who gave the objective record, so it is God the Holy Spirit who effects the subjective illumination. The message and the application of the message are both of God.

The fact that there is that inward enlightenment is the final guarantee of the authenticity of the record, whether in its general teaching or in its self-attestation. Although the Reformers accepted the Bible in faith, they were not unaware of the rational problems involved. The problems were perhaps not so acute then as they are today, but they were sufficiently acute to call for some general answer. The Reformers could advance many reasons in favour of their acceptance of the Bible. They could point, as Calvin did, to those characteristics and qualities which mark it off as an inspired record: its literary quality, its antiquity, its combination of depth and simplicity, its preservation and historical power, its accuracy in the foretelling of the future. In the last analysis, however, the real reason for belief is the inward knowledge of the truth of Scripture which is necessarily present when the Holy Spirit applies that truth to the soul. To the self-attestation of the Bible there is added the inward testimony of the Holy Spirit. But the argument is a rational argument only for the believer. In other words, the truth of the Bible's claim cannot be made a matter simply of intellectual and academic debate. As a fundamental axiom it must be known by experience. It must be known from within. It must be known by faith. Like the Bible itself, this knowledge is given by the Holy Spirit.

With their emphasis on the Lordship of the Holy Spirit the Reformers safeguarded themselves against dead literalism and scholastic rationalism in their understanding of Holy Scripture. They yielded to none in their loyalty to the given form of the Bible. They had a high view both of the Bible itself and also of its inspiration. They believed that the Bible itself is inspired truth. They believed that it is the Word written, a Word given and applied by the Holy Spirit. They taught that the Word must always be respected and received and obeyed. Yet they remembered always that God is the Lord of Scripture and that it is His voice which must be heard if the Bible is to do its work. The Bible is not just an academic textbook of divine truth, the Euclid of the Christian faith. The text is indeed given by God, but it is always in the hands of God and always applied by God. The Bible must be respected and received and obeyed not because it is a fixed and static letter, but because under the Holy Spirit that letter is the living Word of the living God both to the individual and to the church.

MODERN TRENDS

The Roman Catholic view

There are three broad schools of thinking which today challenge what we believe to be the orthodox, scriptural, apostolic and Reformed position in relation to the authority and inspiration of Holy Scripture. First, and not least formidable, is the official Roman Catholic teaching. In one sense this is not a modern view, since the Roman position was fixed at the Council of Trent (1545–63), and for all the ferment in Roman Catholicism it has not yet been altered. In another sense, however, it is very modern, for the related issues are the basic issues of this and every age. The way in which they are settled, both inside and outside Roman Catholicism, might well be the most important single factor in shaping the future course of theology.

In respect of Scripture as the rule of faith, the Roman Catholic seems to adopt a position very much like the orthodox one. For him, the Word of God is an absolute rule. It displaces all private interpretations. It is inspired immediately by God. It is completely trustworthy, not only from the point of view of history, but also from that of doctrine. The value of textual studies is not questioned, since original texts correct errors in copying, give right readings, light up obscurities, and give force to the expressions used. The Roman Catholic church does not approve of destructive rational or historical criticism, though hand in hand with the new concentration on biblical studies greater freedom has recently been shown in this regard.

Thus far there could be no great quarrel with Roman Catholicism, but now three further questions arise. The first is: What is Scripture? The Roman answer is that Scripture consists of the Old and New Testaments, including the OT Apocrypha. Thus writings which cannot be included in the list of inspired and authoritative books have the same weight in doctrinal discussion as the truly canonical books. Moreover, on the plea that Jerome had access to old and purer texts, and that his work has the sanction of centuries of use, the Vulgate is accorded the rank of a fully-authoritative text. This means that doctrines may be grounded on the Latin text even where it obviously does not render the original correctly.

The second question is: Who is to interpret Scripture? The Roman answer is that Scripture is too obscure to be self-interpreting, and that there is need for a further authority to decide which is the right sense. In the OT the Law was interpreted by Moses and the priests. Today the interpretation of the Bible is in the hands of the church, speaking through ex cathedra pronouncements of the pope, the decisions of general councils and statements of the teaching office, together with the expositions of the Early Fathers. Truly, the Bible is the basic authority, but side by side with that basic authority there is the interpretative authority, to which all Christians must bow. The recent surge of biblical study has greatly modified this rule in practice, but the basic principle is still valid: the official Bible officially interpreted is the only legitimate norm, and the papacy is the ultimate interpretative authority.

There is a third question: Does the Bible as a rule of faith suffice, or is there a further and necessary rule side by side with and supplementing the Bible? The Roman answer is that the Bible is not enough. Before the written Word there was an oral tradition, and side by side with the written Word there is today a tradition (both of teaching and custom) derived directly from the apostles, and of equal rank with the Bible. Authoritative tradition consists of teachings universally accepted (e.g. the virginity of Mary), and customs practised by Roman Catholics (e.g. infant baptism), those manifestly ancient, although not demonstrably apostolic (e.g. the Lenten fast), those held by most doctors and not disputed by others (e.g. baptismal rites, or the cult of images), and those which are held by apostolic churches, of which Rome is the only one at the present time (e.g. the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception). In effect, this means that the appeal to Scripture is set aside in whole areas of life and thought, and, though some modern Roman Catholics, such as Küng, are prepared to argue that Scripture is primary, there is unfortunately no strong evidence that this view has been generally accepted by their communion.

The devastating effects of Roman teaching upon the Bible's authority are clear enough, both in theory and even more so in experience. It must not be forgotten, however, that genuine questions are posed which require precise and accurate handling if this erroneous understanding of biblical authority is to be met and avoided.

There is first the question of Canon and text. Why must the canonical books be given one authority, the Apocrypha another? What is the pure text, and to what extent, if any, can renderings be said to be inspired, or even to what extent can we rely on any text as being fully inspired?

There is, second, the doctrinal question: How is the doctrine of the Holy Spirit in Scripture interpretation to be correctly stated, so as to avoid dangers of ecclesiastical monopoly on the one side, and of fanatical individualism on the other? In what sense are the Scriptures of public interpretation? How far are the expositions of others, the Fathers, or the Reformers—men who manifestly worked with insight and prayer—to be taken into account in our own reading of the Bible?

Third, there are questions of order. To what extent is tradition permissible, if not in matters of faith, at any rate in those of order? Must church life be modelled exclusively upon the detailed practice of Scripture, in such a way that what is not in the Bible is necessarily excluded, or has the church the power to maintain ceremonies and traditions so long as they are in accordance with scriptural principles, and of value for Christian life?

All these questions demand full treatment and answer if a true doctrine of the Bible is to be maintained. Nor should it be forgotten that the error itself might have something to teach us in our answers, e.g. the danger of exalting one translation (Vulgate, or AV) into the infallible Word, or the undoubted worth of previous expositions, not of course as infallible authorities, but as useful guides. On the other hand, the primary task is undoubtedly the positive one of presenting the biblical doctrine of the authority of Scripture as the basis of all genuine theology.

Liberal Protestantism

A second unorthodox teaching is that of liberal Protestantism. This is a modern movement in every sense, for, though there are historical parallels, its development has been largely during the post-Reformation period, and it has provided a view of the Bible which, allowing for varieties of presentation, is still that of many Protestant theologians, ministers and laymen. Rome weakens the authority of the Bible, not by denying its divine origin and unique position, but by adding to it other authorities which rob it of its power. Historical liberalism knows nothing of these subtle methods of peaceful penetration. It attacks the Bible frontally, denying the absoluteness or divine nature of its authority, willing to grant it authority—a limited and relative authority—only on the human level.

A full analysis of this complex liberal movement, in which so many different forms of thought coalesced, is unfortunately quite impossible in this context. All that can be done is to outline the various thought-forms and to indicate the points at which they come into conflict with the orthodox doctrine. Five main movements combined, generally speaking, to produce this modern view of the Bible: 1. Rationalism, which at its best, as with the German Neology, sought to reduce revealed Christianity to the level of a religion of reason, and at its worst, as with Voltaire, sought to laugh Christianity out of court as contrary to reason. 2. Empiricism, or Historicism, which had as its main aim the study of Christianity and all its phenomena along the strict lines of historical observation. 3. Poeticism, which, as with Herder and many of the early critics, approached the Bible as a primitive poetry-book, in which religious truths—partly emotional, partly rational—are set out in aesthetic forms. 4. Emotional Pietism, the special and most important contribution of Schleiermacher, by which the doctrines of Christianity (including that of Holy Scripture) are reinterpreted in terms, not now of reason, or history, or poetry, but of emotional religious experience. 5. Philosophical Idealism, which, in its final form in Hegel, gave a new rational interpretation upon a different philosophical basis: a basis which has as its starting-point the individual thinking ego.

It is not to be supposed, of course, that there are not opposing tendencies in these movements, or that all of them are necessarily present, or present in equal proportions, in every liberal theologian; but generally speaking—and making full allowance for the many points of divergence —these are the movements which together constitute the liberal and humanistic challenge to the orthodox doctrine of Bible authority.

In what does that challenge consist? It consists first in the rejection of a transcendent Deity and of supernatural acts of God. This means that the Bible has to be explained as reason, or history, or poetry, or religion, but not as the Word of God. The Bible is reduced to the level of a human book, outstanding perhaps of its kind, but not above all other books. The Bible has to be studied comparatively, with other books of religion, poetry, history, or rational truth. It is inspired, but only in the same way as all other books are inspired, i.e. by the God immanent in all things. It is liable to error, because it is human, and all things human are equally liable to error. Thus the Bible ceases to be studied as a divine message, a Word of salvation; instead it comes to be studied as a product of the human spirit. In its investigation, questions of authorship, date, circumstances, style and development of thought replace the first and fundamental question, the question as to the content of the revelation of the Creator-Lord and Saviour.

The challenge of liberal Humanism to the orthodox view of the Bible consists also in the comprehension of the Bible within a world-scheme of human progress, although this scheme is in actual fact quite contrary to the teaching of the Bible itself. It is not our present concern to discuss the wider and deeper aspects of the doctrine of progress, important as these are. Our concern is to notice that, according to this doctrine, the thought of the Bible, the history which it records and the culture which it represents, are all approached from the human standpoint and forced into the universal humanistic scheme.

At two points this has serious consequences. First, it means that the sequence of the Bible history, as the Bible gives it, has to be rejected, because unfortunately it does not fit the evolutionary interpretation. The facts have to be sifted from the so-called additions of religious fancy and worked up into a new scheme. Second, it means that the message of the Bible has similarly to be treated and amended in order that a neat progression of religious thought may be observed. Even if it is granted that in the teaching of Jesus Christ the highest point of all religious thinking is reached, this teaching is still part of the development of the religious instincts and faculties of the race, and the Bible has no superior authority as such, only the authority of the highest human achievement in religion thus far. It will be seen that this is of a piece with the primary rejection of a transcendent God and a transcendent Word of God.

The challenge of liberal Humanism consists again in the individualistic subjectivism which it opposes to the objectivism of the orthodox doctrine of the Word of God. Outward authority is cast off and is replaced by the inward authority of the individual thought or experience. Reason here, emotion there, usurps the place of God. The thought or experience is valid and valuable, not because it accords with an external standard of divine truth, but because it is individual, a single manifestation of the divine spirit immanent in and working through all things. The thoughts and feelings of the great biblical figures have of course the same validity and value, possibly even the highest value, but only as similar manifestations of the same spirit. This means not only that the basic authority of the Bible is rejected, not only that all religion is approached comparatively and judged relatively, but that every individual becomes a law unto himself in religious matters. God is dethroned, humanity reigns, and in practice humanity means little more than individual man, the thinking or feeling self.

Some specific instances of OT and NT criticism might serve as illustrations. In the OT the first and most persistent theme was that Moses could not have been the author of the Pentateuch or the founder (under God) of the institutions and practices recorded therein. Instead, a theory of gradual literary and religious development was propounded which, instituted by Eichhorn, finally took shape in the Graf-Wellhausen hypothesis of the later 19th century. The heart of this view is that OT religion comes by evolution from below rather than by revelation from above. The documents are analysed, dissected, regrouped and redated (J, E, D and P in the Pentateuch) to provide the historical sequence of evidence for this view. More recently the documentary hypothesis has had to be considerably modified, but it has been replaced by similar concepts. The Sitz im Leben or Form-Criticism school (cf. Gunkel) attempts a thoroughgoing historical explanation of every passage of the OT by relating it to its known or conjectured historical setting. The Scandinavian school (e.g. Mowinckel), while prepared for an earlier dating of many passages, e.g. in the Psalms, attaches great significance to the background of myth and ritual. A principle of comparative religion is thus invoked to account for the specific development of religion and religious literature in Israel. The modern movement of lexical study and biblical theology is on the whole healthier, for its basic concern is to present rather than to explain. Even here, however, it might be presupposed that, e.g., the doctrine of the living, self-revealing God is only a Hebrew concept. Documentary and historical reshuffling can also be adopted as the basis of presentation. Thus quite unwittingly the presentation is controlled by beliefs alien to those which are in fact presented, with serious effects upon the alleged and intended objectivity.

In the NT field the triadic, Hegelian concept of historical development, which regarded conflict as the mark of authenticity and harmony as the sign of a post-apostolic age, produced the wild excesses of the Tübingen school, so that only a few Epistles remained to Paul. Strauss's Life of Jesus, with its attempt to sift the genuinely biographical material from legendary accretions, brought a first wave of demythologizing. Not unrelated was the Jesus of History school, which might lead on the one side to Harnack's reduction of the gospel to divine fatherhood and human brotherhood, and on the other side to Reitzenstein's derivation of Paul's Christology, not from revelation, but from Hellenistic myth and mystery. Schweitzer made an important contribution early in the 20th century with his appreciation of the eschatological character of Jesus' teaching, though he himself, regarding it as mistaken, substituted a not very biblical mysticism, while others, such as Dodd, evaded the issue by putting all the emphasis on realized eschatology. The impasse reached in Synoptic source-criticism combined with other factors to produce the form-critical theory that the Gospels are made up of oral traditions which evolved in the church according to set patterns and on the basis of widely-varying authenticity. An even more developed historical scepticism reappears in Bultmann's demythologizing, which presupposes a mythological form for an essentially existential kērygma. Linguistic statistics might seem to bring back a refreshing objectivity on questions of authorship. Unfortunately, however, the use of computers is no safeguard against controlling presuppositions, at least in the NT field. Nor can findings based on implicit rejection of biblical authority be expected to prove anything about this authority either one way or the other. The ultimate problem lies, not in the data, but in the positive or negative response to the self-understanding which is in its way a primary datum.

This, then, is the liberal Protestant challenge to the authority of Holy Scripture. Apart from the detailed work which it necessitates in biblical theology and religion, and in relation to the individual writings, it also raises fundamental issues on which careful thought, definition and statement are demanded. The whole question of an absolute and authoritative revelation has to be considered; the question of that revelation in its relation to history, to Israel, to Jesus Christ, to the Bible itself as a literary product; the question of that revelation in its relation to the world religions, or to so-called natural religion. Again, there is the question of the inspiration of the Bible; the question of that inspiration in its relation to the ordinary poetic inspiration of which literature speaks; the question of the special working of the Holy Spirit of God in its relation to the general working in those activities which can be considered as products of common grace.

These matters have been dealt with in the past, but the new challenge carries with it a call, not for the abandonment of the old doctrine, not for its amendment, but for a new, careful and solidly-grounded statement of it. In one respect, too, it may be asked whether there is not something to be learned from liberal Protestantism even though its presuppositions are unhesitatingly rejected. Has it not pressed the Reformed doctrine of liberal exegesis further and attempted a more thorough relating of the Bible's message to the historical circumstances and even the literary form? The Bible is first of all God's book, as Jesus Christ is first of all Son of God; but it is a human book too, God's book in the world, as Jesus is the Son of man, the Word made flesh. Naturally, no-one who truly accepts the Bible's authority as the Word of God will wish to study the historical setting at the expense of the revealed message, but may he not wish to investigate the historical setting as the means to a better understanding of that message? Can there not be a true and reverent criticism—in the constructive and not the destructive sense—even when hostile and rationalistic criticism is uncompromisingly opposed?

Neo-orthodoxy

A third unorthodox teaching, which has grown up in recent years, largely as a reaction against contemporary Humanism, is that associated with the theology of Karl Barth, or at any rate with the development which that theology has undergone at the hands of many of his looser disciples. It is not easy to make definite pronouncements with regard to this movement, for Barth himself in his definitive Church Dogmatics both disowns much of his dialectical stage and also differs plainly from what has commonly come to be called Neo-orthodoxy. Indeed, his discussion of the precise question of the authority of Scripture brings him very close to biblical and Reformed teaching. Hence the wisest course will be to take a broad view of the neo-orthodox movement and to discuss the tendencies within it which are obvious deviations from the orthodox doctrine of Holy Scripture.

These deviations fall into two distinct classes, the one relating to the form of scriptural revelation, the Bible as a book, the other to the content of scriptural revelation, the Bible as the Word of God. As concerns the form, Neo-orthodoxy is at pains to emphasize that the Bible is, outwardly considered, one human book among others. This means that the principle of errancy is accepted. If some theologians, such as Barth, hesitate to list specific errors, others, such as Bultmann, regard the whole scientific and historical side of Scripture as unreliable. God is not the author of Scripture in the sense that He bears responsibility for its detailed words and phrases or backs its information. The Bible is truth in so far as God works through it in self-revelation. It is not truth, however, in the sense that all its statements are true. If God works only through the Bible, as some among the Neo-orthodox allow, it is by the sovereign choice of God, not because there is anything different about the Bible itself. If God uses a fallible book as the agent of revealing grace, this is no contradiction; it is the putting of divine treasure in earthen vessels, the mystery of divine grace, which forces us, as Bultmann puts it, to believe even though we cannot see. Lawful mystery is thus replaced by sheer irrationality, for while it is no doubt a mystery that eternal truth is revealed in temporal events and presented in human words, it is sheer unreason to say that this truth is revealed in and through that which is erroneous.

The second deviation relates to the content of scriptural revelation, the Bible as Word of God. The essential point of Neo-orthodoxy is that the Bible becomes God's Word as the Holy Spirit illumines and applies it to the individual soul. Inspiration is thus identified with what the Reformers call illumination. The authority of the Bible is the authority, not of the abiding text, but of the living voice of Scripture in the here and now of a given situation. Revelation in or through the Bible is revelation as the act of God, God's present revealing of Himself, not the given objective reality of what God has already said and done. It is along these lines that Barth makes an important distinction between revelation or inspiration as an active present on the one side and revealedness or inspiredness as a past passive on the other side. The former is endorsed as the genuine biblical and Reformed view, whereas the latter is rejected. It is interesting that Barth, as distinct from the majority of the Neo-orthodox, displays an awareness that the objective historical reality of the Bible's testimony must be given its due and proper weight. Nevertheless, he does not withdraw the fundamental distinction.

Now within the limits that there can be no objective Word of God without also the application to individual souls, there is truth in this distinction, but beyond those limits it leads in a dangerous direction. Pressed too far it means that the Bible can be authoritative, not as an outward word, but only as the Bible in the individual ego, as an inward experience. Thus, even with insistence upon the fact that Christianity rests upon unique historical events, even with stress upon the transcendence of God, in the last analysis we may easily be left with a faith which depends upon a subjective experience, and with the substantial autonomy of the individual ego. It is only a step from the anthropocentricity of Schleiermacher to the existentialism of Bultmann which is the complement of his demythologizing.

The questions raised by this theology are, of course, the central questions of all thinking upon the authority of Holy Scripture. They bring us to the very heart of the problem. Neo-orthodoxy has at least performed a service by showing that the categories of a dead (as opposed to a living) orthodoxy simply will not do. An abstract objectivism, or a mechanical conception of revelation, is as far from the truth on the one side as is a pure subjectivism or a naturalistic view of revelation on the other. Thus the ultimate problem is that of the relationship of revelation to history on the one side and to the individual believer on the other. Ought we to think that the Bible is trustworthy merely because we can demonstrate its historical accuracy? Ought we to think it authoritative merely because we have come to know the truth of its message through the Holy Spirit, and irrespective of its historical reliability? Ought we not to seek the authority of the Bible in the balanced relationship of the history (the objective Word) and the preaching (the Word applied subjectively by the Holy Ghost)—the history as that which is preached, the preaching as the application of this history?

A COMPARISON WITH THE INCARNATION

It may be suggested in closing that a true doctrine of history and revelation in the Bible will be formulated only when the problem is studied in the light of the similar problem of the incarnation. Christ, the Word revealed, is both God and man, the eternal Son historically incarnate, two natures, one Person. Neither if one denies the deity nor if one ignores the humanity is the true Christ perceived and believed. The man Jesus, very man, is known, confessed and obeyed as the Lord Christ, very God. As there is no incongruity in the Person, for He was conceived of the Holy Spirit, so there is no irrationality in the confession, for it is made in and by the Holy Spirit. This Man has the authority of the Lord.

Similarly Holy Scripture, the Word written, which bears witness to Christ, is both divine revelation and human record, the divine message historically written, of twofold origin, yet one book. To ignore either the divine or the human authorship is to miss the true reality of the Bible and the full profit of its teaching and direction. As there is no incompatibility between the revelation and the human writing, for it is inspired of God, so there is no schizophrenia in reading and believing it as the divine Word, for it is illuminated and authenticated by the Spirit. This book has the authority of the divine Word and testimony.

The parallel must not be pressed too far. For Jesus Christ is Himself God, the Creator, Lord, Revealer and Reconciler, whereas Holy Scripture, even though what is read therein may be read with full persuasion of its authenticity and truth, is still the creature and instrument of God. Nevertheless, the incarnational analogy, properly apprehended and developed as such, may well be the best guide to an understanding which is fully biblical and orthodox and which safeguards the authority and integrity of Scripture both as message and also as history.

Revelation and inspiration

Christian theology as taught in the Bible is an organic unit, and should be studied as such. No part of it is properly understood except in relation to the whole. No single doctrine is mastered till one knows its place in the system. Our aim in this article is to formulate the view of revelation and inspiration which the Bible teaches and which underlies this Commentary. Accordingly, our first task must be to indicate the relation in which these topics stand to the rest of Christian truth. The doctrine of biblical inspiration, as we shall see, is a part of the general doctrine of revelation, which in its turn derives from, and must be constructed in terms of, the fundamental doctrines of creation and redemption. In the following exposition we shall try to exhibit these connections, and so to gain a fully biblical understanding of the subjects in question.

REVELATION

The English word 'revelation' may be taken either actively or passively. In the former sense it means that activity of God whereby He makes Himself known to men; in the latter, the knowledge thus imparted. The biblical idea of revelation must be elicited by means of a broad induction of evidence, of which the briefest outline must here suffice.

The Old Testament

The OT constantly affirms that Israel's existence and history as a nation, and her religion as a church, were wholly the result of divine revelation. God had revealed Himself in covenant to Abraham, as his God, and had pledged Himself to continue in covenant with Abraham's seed (Gn. 17). Accordingly, He had brought them out of captivity into the promised land, and made them a nation to serve Him (Ex. 6:2–8; 19:3–6; Ps. 105:43–45). He had given them His 'law' (tôrâ; lit. 'instruction'), and taught them how to worship Him. Throughout their history He raised up a succession of spokesmen to declare to them 'the word of the Lord'. Again and again at decisive moments He demonstrated His own complete control of circumstances by foretelling what He would do for them before the event (cf. Is. 48:3–7).

Israel was very conscious of the uniqueness of her relationship to God (Ps. 147:19, 20). True religion was, to her, precisely the knowledge of Yahweh, and presupposed Yahweh's self-disclosure in covenant. Lacking this, the Gentile world had fallen into idolatry. The revealed religion of Israel threw into relief the essential blasphemy of all other religion whatsoever. Hence, when God revealed Himself to other nations, with whom He had not entered into covenant, it was exclusively in judgment upon them for their sins (Ex. 7:5; Ezk. 25:11, 17; 28:22–24).

The OT verdict upon OT revelation was that it was not a complete whole, but preparatory for something greater. The prophets looked forward to a day when God would reveal Himself by mightier works than ever yet: He would raise up the Messiah, gather His scattered people and establish His kingdom among them. Heaven and earth would be made new (Is. 65:17–25); Israelite religion would be transformed (Je. 31:31–34); and all nations would see and acknowledge the glory of God in Israel as never before (Is. 60:1–14; Ezk. 36:23). On this forward-looking note the OT closes (Mal. 4).

The New Testament

The NT writers were convinced that the meaning of Jewish history and of the OT was to be found in Christ: that, in other words, the course of events in Israel from the very beginning and the composition of the OT over the centuries had been completely controlled by God with the incarnation in view. The implications of this claim led naturally to the fundamental theological idea in terms of which they expounded the subject of revelation. The idea is this: God, the sovereign Creator, who within His world 'accomplishes all things according to the counsel of his will' (Eph. 1:11), foresaw the ruin of the race through sin, determined to glorify Himself by saving a church, and appointed His Son to effect its salvation by His mediatorial ministry. World history has been to date, and will be to the end, nothing more nor less than God's execution of the plan which He then formed in order to compass His goal. After the Son had been raised, exalted and enthroned in His Messianic kingdom, He sent the Holy Spirit into the world in order both to complete the disclosure, which He had Himself commenced while on earth, of His Father's purposes for the church, and also to bring His people, through faith in Himself, into the possession and enjoyment of the salvation He won for them. The revelation of God's plan was duly completed by the Spirit, who made it known in full to the apostles; its performance will be completed by Christ at His 'appearing' (parousia), when the church will be made perfect.

This, in barest outline, is the dogmatic framework which underlies the NT teaching about revelation. It is most fully stated in Paul's Epistles (cf. Rom. 8:28–39; Eph. 1:3–14, etc.) and John's Gospel (cf. 6:37–45; 10:14–18, 27–29; 16:7–15; 17), but is more or less explicit everywhere. The main passages relating to revelation fall into three classes:

Passages concerning Christ's disclosure of God. The Son is the perfect image of the Father (2 Cor. 4:4; Col. 1:15; Heb. 1:3) and so is in Himself a perfect revelation of the Father to those who have eyes to see (Jn. 1:18; 14:7–11). All God's 'fullness' dwelt in the incarnate Son (Col. 1:19; 2:9). Those who understand the full significance of His life and death thereby understand the whole eternal purpose ('wisdom') of God for the church's salvation (Col. 2:2, 3; 1 Cor. 1:24 and 2:7–10; see also next section). None can apprehend any part of Christ's revelation of His Father without supernatural spiritual enlightenment (Jn. 3:3–12; 6:44, 45; Mt. 16:17; Gal. 1:16).

Passages concerning God's disclosure of His plan. God's comprehensive scheme for the salvation of His elect out of every nation, Jew and Gentile alike, was the 'mystery', the divine 'wisdom', which God conceived before creation but concealed until the apostolic age. Now it was revealed, and the full meaning of Israel's election and history and of the OT revelation for the first time became clear. All the time God's goal had been, not the salvation of one of the world's many nations, but the creation of a new nation, the members of which were to be drawn from every nation and to receive their spiritual nationality, not by natural, but by spiritual birth (cf. 1 Pet. 2:9, 10). The destiny of the regenerate was to be glorified, as their Head ('the first fruits' of the new race, 1 Cor. 15:20, 23) had been already; and His very presence in heaven, 'the man in the glory', was a pledge to them that they would some day share that glory with Him. Paul deals with the revelation of this mystery in several important passages which should be carefully studied (Eph. 1:8–12; 3:3–11; 1 Cor. 2:7–10; Rom. 16:25, 26; cf. 11:25–36; 2 Tim. 1:9–11). The source of this revelation is God; the mediator of it is Christ (Gal. 1:12; cf. Rev. 1:1); the agent in its communication is the Spirit (1 Cor. 2:10–12; 2 Cor. 3:15–18; cf. 4:6; Eph. 3:5). In order that it might be conveyed to the church intact, the Spirit inspired the words of apostolic testimony (1 Cor. 2:13), as He had inspired the words of Christ (Jn. 3:34; cf. 12:48–50). He caused the apostles to embody the revelation given to them in a 'standard of teaching', the 'pattern of the sound words' (Gk. typos, a 'pattern', 'standard'; see Rom. 6:17; cf. 2 Tim. 1:13). This is 'the sound doctrine' (1 Tim. 1:10; cf. 6:3; 2 Tim. 4:3; Tit. 1:9; 2:1), the apostolic 'tradition' (2 Thes. 2:15; 3:6), the test and norm for the faith and life of the churches.

Passages concerning God's performance of His plan. As was said, God discloses His purposes by what He does as well as in what He says; and any action which marks a further stage in His plan of redemptive history may be called 'revelation'. The NT knows two such acts of revelation yet to come: the appearing of antichrist (2 Thes. 2:3, 6, 8) and the parousia of Jesus (1 Cor. 1:7; 2 Thes. 1:7–10; 1 Pet. 1:7, 13). The latter concludes history and ushers in the day of judgment. Christ will then reveal by executive action God's eternal intentions with respect to the impenitent and the saints, wrath for the one and glory for the other (Rom. 2:5–10; 8:18; cf. 1 Pet. 1:5).

Such, in brief, is the biblical material from which the theological doctrine of revelation must be constructed. To this task we now turn.

The original revelation

The doctrine of revelation is grounded upon the fact that God made man in His own image, to know, love, worship, serve and so glorify Him. We saw that man's religion, if it is to be true, must be grounded on God's revelation; and God accordingly revealed Himself to Adam as fully as was necessary for Adam to live in fellowship with Him. Adam knew God, then, first through His works of creation. The world on which he looked out bore eloquent testimony to the power and wisdom of its Maker. The created order, though since involved in Adam's ruin (Gn. 3:18; Rom. 8:19–22), still proclaims God's glory (Ps. 19:1f.; Rom. 1:19, 20); much more must it have done so before. Adam knew God, too, by his knowledge of himself; as God's noblest creature, he was a part of God's revelation of His glory, as well as being its recipient. Again, God's works of providence brought him knowledge of his Maker's goodness. If, despite the chaos that has entered the world through sin, the course of events still bears this testimony (Acts 14:17), doubtless it did so far more clearly to Adam when he knew only the garden, the animals God had brought him to rule, and the wife He had made for him (Gn. 2:18–24). Finally, the testimony of God's works was supplemented by verbal revelation (how conveyed we do not know) as and when necessary (Gn. 2:16, 17).

Much of this is necessarily obscure to us. The knowledge of God that Adam enjoyed in Eden before the Fall is as far beyond our comprehension as is the knowledge of God which the church will enjoy in heaven after the resurrection. But the permanent characteristics of God's self-revealing activity are already here made plain, and it is worth our while to pause and note them.

The purpose of revelation. God makes Himself known to man so that man may attain the end of his creation, which is to know, love and worship Him. The transcendent Creator is inaccessible to His creatures until He discloses Himself, and man's knowledge of God, where it exists, is correlative to and consequent on God's prior self-revelation. Adam in Eden needed revelation if he was to live in fellowship with God.

The means of revelation. Revelation is God's personal self-disclosure to His rational creatures. The relationship which it initiates is compared in Scripture to that of husband and wife, father and son, friend and friend (cf. Je. 3; Ho. 11:1; Is. 41:8; Mt. 7:11; Jn. 15:15; Eph. 5:25–27). Such a relationship could not be created apart from personal address by God to man. God must open His mind; He must speak. Action out of the context of conversation, movement divorced from explanation, is a very limited medium for making oneself known to another. It was not enough for Adam to see God in His works; he needed to hear His word, to receive verbal or propositional revelation.

Of course, there is more to self-revelation than merely communicating information about oneself, just as there is more to faith than a mere 'notional' acquaintance with truths. In human relationships, personal attitudes, by their very nature, cannot be expressed in propositional form. Their existence can be indicated, and their nature to some extent suggested, by speech, but they can be expressed, and so fully manifested, only by action. So, when God reveals His love to men, the depths of meaning contained in the words in which He avows it to them become clear only in the light of their experience of what He does for them. God's personal attitudes towards men, therefore, require works as well as words for their revelation. But this does not affect our present contention, which is, simply, that without words such revelation could scarcely take place at all.

The effectiveness of revelation. An unfathomable mystery underlies the claim that the transcendent, infinite Creator makes His thoughts known to finite man. But we may not imagine that God is somehow hampered or thwarted in His self-revealing action by the limitations of man's mind. That man's knowledge of God on earth is now, and was before the Fall, imperfect, dim and inadequate to its object in very many ways, is not to be denied. But God made man's mind; and He made it as He did in order that man might be able to apprehend Him in a manner perfectly adequate for the ends of His self-disclosure—i.e. for the development of the religious relationship which was man's destiny. He made Adam's mind such that Adam could not but apprehend as much of God as was disclosed to him. And when God reveals Himself to sinful man, He restores to him his lost ability to recognize God's Word for what it is and receive it as such. The activity of trust which results from the exercise of this faculty is in Scripture termed faith; and in Heb. 11:3 the faculty itself is so denoted. It appears correct to say that, in this sense, Adam in Eden had faith, and that it is no more than a restoration to man of what he lost at the Fall when the Spirit implants the faculty of faith in those to whom God intends to make Himself known.

When man fell, he jeopardized his status and corrupted his nature. God therefore adapted His self-disclosing activity to the new situation, integrating it into the redemptive process which He had at once initiated in order to remedy sin's effects. But the three features of revelation noted above remained, and remain, constant.

God revealed as Redeemer

Through sin, man lost his ability to apprehend creation's witness to its God. The meaning and message of the book remained the same, but he could no longer read it; the heavens proclaimed God's glory into deaf ears. 'They did not see fit ('disdained', Moff.) to acknowledge God' (Rom. 1:28). Man had lost his natural inclination to love and serve his Creator; the idea of a life so spent was profoundly distasteful to him (Rom. 8:7). There remained in his heart an indelible sense of God, i.e. an awareness that there was something or someone greater than himself whom he should worship and serve, but he refused to let it lead him back to his Maker; for he was now under the sway of unbelief, which the Bible depicts as a positive, devilish thing, a passionate energy of blind denial, a resolute repudiation of the true God (cf. Rom. 1:21–32; Eph. 2:2, 3; 4:17–19).

In this situation, the insufficiency of God's self-revelation in creation and providence is manifest. God still shows Himself in His works (Rom. 1:19, 20); but men shut their eyes, and 'by their wickedness suppress the truth' (Rom. 1:18). Thus the continuance of the original revelation leads none to the knowledge of God and serves only to leave the world without excuse for its ignorance of Him. And, even supposing that fallen man succeeded in reading 'the book of the creatures' aright, what he read could only drive him to despair. For this general revelation (as it is best called) brings knowledge of a God who hates and punishes man's disobedience and ingratitude (Rom. 1:18), and says not a word about redeeming love. The good news that the God who is merciless to sin is at the same time merciful to sinners is made known only by special revelation, which centres upon Jesus Christ; and to this we now turn.

Since the Fall, the Creator has been making Himself known as Redeemer upon the stage of human history, working out the eternal purpose which, as we saw, constitutes the 'mystery' which the apostles declared. The whole plan hinged upon the earthly ministry of the incarnate Son. In the fact of Christ all the types, shadows and prophecies of the OT found their meaning, so that by it Israel's Scriptures were fulfilled (cf. Mt. 5:17; Lk. 24:27; Jn. 5:39; Acts 13:26–33; Heb. 7–10). Again, upon this ministry all subsequent redemptive activity is grounded. When He ascended, Christ entered upon the exercise of His heavenly ministry, whereby He conveys to His people by His Spirit the benefits which He secured for them while on earth, and this ministry will not be completed until He perfects His church at His return. And only when the whole church is made perfect, possessing and exhibiting in all its fullness the glory of God (Rev. 21:11), and appearing with its glorified Saviour in a new-created universe (Rev. 21:1–22:5), will God's resources and intentions in redemption be fully manifested, and His purpose of perfect self-display be finally accomplished. Meanwhile, every act of grace brings it one stage nearer completion. The new creation, therefore, no less than the old, God's works of special grace as well as those of common providence, are works of revelation, every one of which declares the glory of God.

Verbal revelation

In the redemptive process by which the church is saved, verbal revelation has an indispensable place. First of all, it was an integral element in the series of acts by which redemption was wrought out. Without verbal revelation, Abraham would never have entered Canaan, nor Moses led Israel from Egypt, nor Jesus' life been preserved in infancy (cf. Gn. 12:1–5; Ex. 3:1 – 6:13; Mt. 2:13–15). Secondly, verbal revelation has always been necessary as a ground for faith. Its importance from this point of view is seen when we consider the soteriological significance of faith. Not merely is faith, as an activity, the instrument whereby a sinner lays hold of Christ and so obtains all promised benefits, but also, as a faculty, faith is, as we saw, the organ of that knowledge of and fellowship with God from which man fell and to which redemption restores him.

Now, the object which brings this faculty into exercise is God's Word, as such (cf. 1 Thes. 2:13). Faith 'hears His voice' and responds to His Word of promise in trust and obedience. Without a word from God, faith cannot be (Rom. 10:17). The reason for this is clear. Without an explanatory word, God's redemptive action could not even be recognized for what it was. The creature, as we saw, cannot know the Creator's mind till He speaks. The case of the incarnation shows that the clearest revelation of God is nevertheless the most opaque to man. Christ, the personal Word of God, expressed and effected His Father's redemptive purpose completely. In Him, God fully manifested Himself in redemptive action; and, for that very reason, the fact of Christ utterly transcended man's powers of interpretation. 'It may be doubted', wrote B. B. Warfield, 'whether even the supreme revelation of God in Jesus Christ could have been known as such in the absence of preparatory, accompanying and succeeding explanatory revelation in words.' Even that is an understatement. How could man ever have learned the utterly paradoxical and eternally mysterious truth, that Jesus was God incarnate and put away the world's sins by dying on a cross, without being told? Accordingly, in order to make possible faith in Christ, God gave the world a verbal explanation of the fact of Christ. This was the gospel, the apostolic kērygma, which announces God's gift of the living Word and promises eternal life to those who receive Him. It thus appears that the giving of propositional revelations concerning God's redemptive action in history is no mere adjunct or appendage to that action, but is itself part of it, as essential a link in the chain as the events with which those revelations are concerned. For God's redemptive programme includes the conveyance as well as the procuring of salvation, and is not complete until sinners have been restored to faith and knowledge of God through the gospel.

In form and substance, the gospel promise has been one and the same throughout redemptive history, from the time of Adam and Abraham to the present day, namely, a covenant on God's part to be the God of the one to whom He speaks and to safeguard and reward him, both in this life and the next, if he will trust and obey. Saving faith, therefore, has been the same thing from Abel's time onwards (Heb. 11:4). In content, however, the promise grew richer as time went on; for, within the framework of His covenant pledge, God gradually disclosed both the particular blessings which it included and also the objective ground—His own redemptive action—upon which it was based. This revelatory process continued intermittently for centuries. It was thus progressive: not in the sense that each new revelation antiquated the last, but rather in the sense that from time to time God underlined and amplified what He had taught already and added to it further intimations of what He intended to do until He had completed the pattern of truth which was to be fulfilled in Christ. Then, at the appointed time, He sent His Son to achieve redemption and crowned the revelatory process with the unveiling of the gospel and the 'mystery'. From first to last, the progress of revelation had been closely interlocked with the unfolding of God's plan of redemptive history; and the interpretation of the fact of Christ, itself the complete disclosure in action of the Creator as Redeemer, completed it.

The means by which verbal revelation was given were many and varied. Sometimes an abnormal quality of experience was the vehicle of its reception. This was the case with visions, dreams, and prophetic inspiration, which seems to have ranged on occasion from the slow crystallizing of prolonged meditations at one extreme to the hurricane rapture of complete ecstasy at the other. Sometimes, again, God conveyed truth through His chosen organs of revelation merely by His divine concursus—by operating, that is, in and with them in the exercise of their own natural powers and so leading them to His truth through the normal processes of their own thought—historical research, exegesis of canonical Scripture, meditation and prayer, logical and theological reasoning. Much of the Wisdom literature, the OT historical books and all the NT writings save the Apocalypse appear to have resulted from revelation of this sort. Limitations of space preclude any discussion of these modes of revelation. But it is important to notice before we pass on that there is in Scripture no indication of any difference in the purity and reliability of revelations mediated through these various kinds of experience. All organs of revelation, however limited they may appear in themselves, become in the hands of the sovereign God completely effective to the end for which He employs them.

Biblical revelation

In order to ensure the safe preservation of what He had revealed, God 'inscripturated' it. The book which He thereby produced contains, not all the verbal revelations ever given (cf., e.g., the reference in 2 Ch. 9:29 to prophetic books which have not survived), but those which were relevant for the book's designed purpose; which was, not merely to provide a ground for personal faith and guidance for individual Christian living, but also to enable the world-wide church in every age to understand itself, to interpret its history, to reform and purify its life continually, and to rebuff all assaults made upon it, whether from within, by sin and heresy, or from without, by persecution and rival ideologies. All the problems that ever faced or will face the church are in principle covered and solved in this book. For the Christian Bible, though a very human book, recording much sin and error, reflecting in many places the weaknesses and limitations of its authors, is yet—and this is the fundamental truth about it—a divine product, whose auctor primarius is God.

The proof of this divine authorship of the Bible (i.e. the proper ground of faith in it) may here be indicated. It is twofold:

The testimony of Christ (the external proof). This proof comprises two propositions. First, Christ's authority demands the acceptance of the OT as divinely inspired. His witness concerning its character is unambiguous and emphatic. To Him, it was not a miscellany but a unity, 'scripture' (singular: Jn. 10:35), whose authority was permanent and absolute because of its divine origin (cf. Mt. 5:17–20; Lk. 16:17; Mt. 19:4–6). Arguments from Scripture, therefore, possessed for Him clinching force (Mt. 22:32, 41ff.; Jn. 10:34, 35, etc.). The emphatic 'it is written' was final, and settled matters. His whole ministry was one great testimony to His acceptance of the divine authority of the OT; for He preached and healed and died in obedience to what He found written (cf. Mt. 8:16, 17; 26:24, 54; Lk. 4:18–21; 18:31–33; 22:37). He, the teacher to whom the Christian church professes subjection, was Himself in everything subject to His Father's word in the OT Scriptures. The apostolic writers everywhere echo this witness (cf. 2 Tim. 3:16; 2 Pet. 1:20, 21, the phrase 'oracles of God' in Rom. 3:2, and the quotation of OT passages, spoken in their context by men, as words of God, or of the Holy Ghost, e.g. Mt. 19:4, 5; Acts 4:25, 26; 13:34, 35; Heb. 1:6ff.; 3:7).

Second, Christ's authority demands the acceptance of the NT as possessing the same character as the OT. Jesus taught His disciples to read the OT Christologically, as a prophetic revelation of the things concerning Himself (Lk. 24:24, 25, 44, 45; Jn. 5:39, 46). The apostles did so (cf. Acts 3:18, 24; 1 Pet. 1:10–12), claiming that it was written primarily for the guidance and benefit of Christian believers (cf. Rom. 4:23, 24; 15:4; 1 Cor. 9:10; 10:11; 2 Tim. 3:16), and that it could not be understood at all by those who would not read it in the light of Christ (2 Cor. 3:14–16).

Now, seeing that God had inscripturated His earlier, prophetic revelations so that they might be permanently accessible in an uncorrupted form for the benefit, not merely of old Israel, but of the church universal, it would have been an unaccountable departure from a way of working so well established, and so patently wise and desirable, had He done nothing similar when His crowning revelation was given to the world. The NT, therefore, was only to be expected. Against the background of this presumption, certain facts acquire unmistakable significance. i. Christ promised the Spirit to the apostles so that they might remember and understand what He had taught them already (Jn. 14:25, 26) and receive the further revelations concerning Himself which they could not as yet 'bear' (Jn. 16:12–14). So equipped, they were to be His authoritative witnesses and interpreters to the whole church, in all ages and all parts of the world (Jn. 17:20; cf. Mt. 28:19). How, we may ask, could Christ have envisaged this, unless He intended them to write their testimony? ii. The apostles claim that, in virtue of their possession of the Spirit, they teach and write the pure truth of God. They are verbally inspired (1 Cor. 2:13); and a genuinely 'spiritual' man recognizes this fact (1 Cor. 14:37; cf. Gal. 1:8; 2 Thes. 3:6, 14). These are unqualified affirmations; and there is no question but that by making them the apostles claimed, and intended to claim, an authority for their own sermons and letters no less absolute than that which they attributed to the OT. iii. Paul quotes Deuteronomy and Luke together, and Peter refers to Paul's Epistles as part of the Canon of Scripture (1 Tim. 5:18; 2 Pet. 3:16). iv. Centuries of Christian exegesis have demonstrated that, theologically, the two Testaments together form an organic unit, each complementing the other in a harmonious testimony to Christ, each bringing to light more and more of the contents and meaning of the other in an endlessly fruitful dialectic of foreshadowing and fulfilment.

We conclude, that, in the light of Christ's evident intention that His apostles should write their testimony and His promise to equip them for the task, the claims they made for themselves and each other, and the quality of what they produced, lead us irresistibly to acknowledge the NT as the expected and needed completion of the OT.

The testimony of the Spirit (the internal proof). We saw that it is by the use of the faculty of faith that we discern God's Word for what it is. Faith sees the real nature of that at which it looks. This has been the church's experience down the ages. Since it is the Spirit who implants faith and works in believers their acts of faith, the presence of this conviction is termed the Spirit's witness. (See further pp. 6f.)

The Bible, then, is the revealed Word of God, in the sense that in its pages God speaks His mind—all His mind—concerning His purpose for His people. To call the Bible a record of, or a witness to, a revelation made in history is insufficient. The Bible is all this, and more. It is not merely a report of what God said; it is what He says, here and now. It is itself a link in the chain of God's redemptive action. Its contents, heard or read, are the means whereby, on the grounds of the historical ministry of Christ which it records and explains, and through the regenerating action of the Spirit who works in and with the Word, sinners come to know the Father and the Son. It is not the Word of God in the sense that every separate sentence, including the words of evil men, expresses His mind or reflects His will. 'God's Word written' is the Bible as a whole, or, more accurately, the theology of the Bible, that organic unity which our fathers so happily and suggestively termed 'the body of divinity'. Here is the image of God's mind, the transcript of His thoughts, the declaration of His grace, the verbal embodiment of all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge that are hid in His Son. And here faith rests.

INSPIRATION

The meaning of inspiration

Inspiration is not itself a biblical word. It is usually, and most conveniently, defined as a supernatural influence of God's Spirit upon the biblical authors which ensured that what they wrote was precisely what God intended them to write for the communication of His truth, and hence could be truly termed 'inspired', Gk. theopneustos, lit. 'breathed out by God' (2 Tim. 3:16). We have already dealt with this subject in constructive statement (see p. 16), and confine ourselves here to the correction of some misconceptions.

The 'inspiration' which secured the infallible communication of revealed truth is something distinct from the 'inspiration' of the creative artist, which does not. The two things should not therefore be confused. Nor does inspiration always imply an abnormal state of mind in the writer, e.g. a trance-state, a vision, or the hearing of a voice; nor does it imply the obliteration of his personality. God in His providence prepared the human vehicles of inspiration for their task, and caused them in many, perhaps most, cases to perform it through the normal exercise of the powers He had given them. Many states of mind, as we saw, were compatible with inspiration. There is no reason to think that the authors were always aware that they were being inspired in the sense defined, i.e. that they were writing canonical Scripture. Nor is there any ground for asserting that an inspired document could not in God's providence have been compiled from sources by an ordinary process of historical composition, or passed through various editions and recensions before reaching its final form. All that is claimed is that the finished product is theopneustos, precisely what God intended for the communication of saving truth.

Since truth is communicated through words, and verbal inaccuracy misrepresents meaning, inspiration must be verbal in the nature of the case. And if the words of Scripture are 'God-breathed', it is almost blasphemy to deny that it is free from error in that which it is intended to teach and infallible in the guidance it gives. Inerrancy and infallibility cannot be proved (nor, let us note, disproved) by argument. Both are articles of faith; corollaries of the confession, which Christ's teaching demands and the Spirit's testimony evokes, that canonical Scripture was breathed out by the God who cannot lie. He who denies them thereby shows that he rejects the witness of Christ, the apostles and the historic Christian church concerning the nature of 'God's Word written', and either does not possess or has not understood the testimonium Spiritus Sancti internum.

The problems of inspiration

No Christian doctrine is free from problems; and that for a very good reason. God has put forward His truth as an object for faith, and the proper ground of faith is God's own authoritative testimony. Now, acceptance on grounds of another's authority and acceptance on grounds of rational demonstration are two distinct things. Man's original sin was a lust after self-sufficient knowledge, a craving to shake off all external authority and work things out for himself (cf. Gn. 3:5, 6); and God deliberately presents saving truth to sinners in such a way that their acceptance of it involves an act of intellectual repentance, whereby they humble themselves and submit once more to be taught by Him. Thus they renounce their calamitous search after a self-made wisdom (cf. Rom. 1:22; 1 Cor. 1:19–25) in order to regain the kind of knowledge for which they were made, that which comes from taking their Creator's word. So as to make this renunciation clear-cut, God has ensured that no single article of faith should be demonstrable as, say, a geometrical theorem is, nor free from unsolved mystery. Man must be content to know by faith, and to know, in this world at any rate, in part. We must not, therefore, expect to find the doctrine of biblical inspiration free from difficulties, any more than are the doctrines of the Trinity, incarnation, or atonement. Nor must we expect to be able to solve all its problems in this world. Nor must we wonder that Christians easily fall into heresy over this doctrine, as over others. It is worth while, however, briefly to indicate the right attitude for faith to adopt in face of some prevalent errors concerning it.

First, the doctrine is sometimes diluted by those who profess to be its friends. It is said that the Bible is the product of inspiration in some sense, but not of verbal inspiration. God revealed truth to the writers, but it was inevitable that, being sinful, fallible men, they should distort it in the course of reporting it. We must expect, therefore, to find error in Scripture. This, however, as we saw, was not the view of Christ and the apostles. It appears to be a mistaken inference from the admitted fact that not all the biblical books are on the same level of spiritual profundity and doctrinal finality; but it amounts to a flat denial that God in His sovereign providence could do what it was evidently desirable that He should do, and so prepare and control the human instruments through whom He caused Scripture to be written that they put down exactly what He intended, no more and no less. In other words, the Bible, on this view, is neither what God intended it should be, nor what Christ thought and taught that it was. Such a position is plainly intolerable.

Secondly, the doctrine is sometimes rejected on the grounds of the internal characteristics of the Bible. Such objections, however, invariably prove on examination to be grounded upon an a priori, man-made idea of what a verbally inspired Bible ought to be like, and the very act of bringing them forward as valid grounds for doubting what God says about His book is itself a sign of continued intellectual impenitence, unconscious, perhaps, but no less real for that. The believing method of approach is, rather, to start by accepting God's testimony that the Bible is verbally inspired and then to examine the internal characteristics of Scripture in order to find out what this verbally-inspired Bible is in fact like. The most cursory inspection shows that inspiration has completely accommodated itself to the thought-forms, literary methods, stylistic conventions and characteristic vocabulary of the writers. These are the media through which the inspired truth-content is conveyed, and unless we take pains to acquire a sympathetic understanding of them we shall be in danger of misinterpreting what God has said in terms of them, and thus manufacturing errors where none exist. We must be guided in biblical study by the principle—which is a certainty of faith—that Scripture nowhere misrepresents the truths it was inspired to teach and that every biblical fact has been recorded in the way best adapted for the communication of what the church is meant to learn from it. What that is, however, can be determined in each case only by examining the passage in the context of Scripture as a whole. This is a principle of fundamental importance for biblical interpretation. We must not lose sight of it through controversial preoccupations, nor allow our confidence in its truth to be shaken by difficulties which may confront us when we try to apply it.

One example of its application may be given here. It has sometimes been asserted that the occasional appearance in the OT of sub-Christian attitudes, actions and theological reflections is itself a refutation of the doctrine of an inspired Scripture. But this objection reveals a misunderstanding of the nature of the Bible. We stressed earlier that the Bible is not an aggregate of isolated texts, but an organism, no part of which can be rightly interpreted except in terms of its place and function in the whole. Now, God has included in His Word much exemplary material; and some of the examples He has recorded are bad examples. All is for our learning; but we must learn from different parts of Scripture in different ways. We learn from records of theological and practical error, not by supposing that, because they are included in Scripture, the words and deeds in question must have met with divine approval, but by detecting the mistakes in the light of Bible doctrine and taking warning. Principles of biblical theology must interpret, as they are in their turn illustrated by, facts of biblical history and biography. Scripture must interpret scripture. Once it is grasped that the Bible is an organic unity, that the Word of God is its doctrine as a whole, and that each passage must be understood in the light of, even as it throws light upon, the truth as it is in Jesus, the grounds for this kind of objection vanish.

Lack of space forbids any further development of these principles here. We would conclude by reiterating our fundamental contention, that faith's attitude to the doctrine of biblical inspiration, as to all other doctrines, is one of acceptance on God's testimony. Nothing, therefore, will shake faith's certainty here, for nothing can shake the testimony on which it rests. When faced by difficulties in and objections to the doctrine as he understands it, the believer will infer that the cause is his own failure to comprehend God's testimony rather than God's failure to make the truth plain, and will accordingly be driven back to a closer re-thinking of the matter in the light of a closer study of the biblical evidence. This is how all doctrinal advance has been made throughout the history of the church. And this is how a truer and fuller understanding of the doctrine of Holy Scripture as the inspired, and therefore infallible and inerrant, Word of God, can be reached in our own day.

The history of Israel

The history of Israel is not merely of academic interest: it is of vital importance because God chose to reveal Himself in the down-to-earth experience of a people. He proved Himself to be a God of action who acted in history so that His purposes in choosing Israel might be fulfilled. That is why the history books of the OT were called by the Jews the 'Former Prophets': the history revealed God's ways; when read in that light it will become full of meaning.

The patriarchs. Gn. 11:27 – 50:26

The nation descended from Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, with whom the history begins. This assertion would be questioned by many scholars, who think that later theological insights have so moulded Israel's early traditions that they cannot be read as straightforward history, and yet it can be supported by external evidence from a mass of material unearthed from the Ancient Near East. While the OT remains our only source of information about the patriarchs, the world in which they lived in the first half of the 2nd millennium BC has been documented in an astonishing way. From tablets found at Mari and Nuzi we know that individuals in Semitic tribes bore names such as we find in the patriarchal narratives; customs recorded in Genesis are referred to there; journeys made by the patriarchs were along routes now known to have been highways of commerce at that period; conditions in Transjordan and Palestine known from contemporary sources agree with the picture given in the biblical narrative. Such correspondences plainly support the historicity of the patriarchal narratives, for conditions changed during the 14th century BC, when a period of political upheavals began, and were never again reproduced.

Abraham's original home was Ur of the Chaldees, a city already ancient in his day. He migrated to Haran in northern Mesopotamia but subsequently moved into Canaan, where Isaac, Jacob and Jacob's twelve sons continued to live as semi-nomads. Jealousy of Joseph, the favourite son of his father, caused his elder brothers to sell him into slavery, and thus he arrived in Egypt, eventually to be exalted to the highest rank under the pharaoh, who most probably belonged to the Asiatic Hyksos dynasty which controlled Egypt c. 1710–1570 BC. God's providence in using Joseph to organize the food supplies in Egypt, and so to save his family from starvation, is clearly demonstrated. Once settled in Goshen (in the E Delta) Israel's descendants stayed there long after the famine had ended; their prosperity and fecundity made them a considerable proportion of the population, so that a 'king . . . who did not know Joseph' feared them and subjected them to slavery, till they longed and prayed to escape. The building operations described at the beginning of the book of Exodus are generally identified with those of Sethos I (1302–1290) and Rameses II (1290–1224), who re-established Egypt's capital in the NE Delta after a gap of more than 250 years.

Moses and the Exodus. Ex. 2:1 – 15:21

The account of the infancy and providential training of Moses is well known. His name (Heb. Mōšeh) means 'one who draws forth' (Ex. 2:10). The Egyptian name, found in compounds such as Tuthmosis, means 'child', and would be the obvious sound-equivalent. There is ample evidence that Semites permeated every stratum of Egyptian society in the New Kingdom, and that Moses would not have been the only foreigner being trained at court for a responsible post in the government. His rash murder of an Egyptian occasioned his flight eastwards to the Sinai peninsula, where he found a home with the Midianite Jethro/Reuel, and spent his days sheep-minding under the desert conditions to which he was later to return with the Israelites.

Only the insistent call of the God of his fathers at the burning bush could move Moses to return to Egypt to deliver Israel from the iron grip of the pharaoh. Disastrous plagues that ruined the economy and proved the impotence of Egypt's gods, the Nile, the frog, the sun, hardened the pharaoh's opposition until the death of the first-born forced him to yield. The whole sequence of events, beginning with the plagues and ending with the path across the Red Sea (most probably one of the modern Bitter Lakes), demonstrated unmistakably the intervention of God to redeem His people from slavery. Its full significance was made plain at Sinai: God had brought them out of Egypt to make them His own, and Moses acted as mediator in establishing the covenant between God and the people, who undertook to keep all God's will revealed in His law (Ex. 19:1–8; 24:1–11). Redeemed from slavery they were now to inherit a land of their own where they could live according to the religious and social pattern laid down for them.

That the Exodus is a historical event is no longer doubted. It is improbable that a background of slavery would be invented; prophets and psalmists refer constantly to the deliverance from Egypt and to the covenant made at Sinai, for their own message is based upon these events and the law then given. Most scholars agree that the Exodus took place in the 13th century BC because conditions in Egypt at that period best agree with the information given in the biblical accounts. According to a monument inscribed by Pharaoh Merenptah in 1220 BC, Israel was already in Canaan by that date. The Exodus is therefore dated c. 1280, and the entry into Canaan c. 1240, though it is not yet possible to reconcile every detail with these dates. For this reason some still hold a 15th-century date, while others would prefer one slightly later than 1280. For a fuller discussion see the Introduction to Exodus.

The conquest and occupation of Canaan. Joshua, Judges, 1 Sa. 1–7

Moses' leadership continued throughout the desert wanderings until his death on Mt. Nebo, within sight of the promised land. His successor, Joshua, had already been commissioned to take the Israelites across the river Jordan, to conquer and exterminate the inhabitants of the land, and to settle the tribes in their inheritance. According to the writer of Joshua events again proved the power of their covenant God working on their behalf: the Jordan in flood was dammed upstream, so enabling an easy crossing by the fords of Jericho (Jos. 3:1 – 4:24); the city of Jericho fell without a battle (Jos. 5:13 – 6:27); victory in the nearby hill country at Bethel-Ai, followed by Joshua's decisive defeat of first the southern and then the northern coalitions, forced the whole population to admit his supremacy (Jos. 7:1 – 12:24). Yet he did not leave an occupying army behind him. Throughout the campaigns his headquarters were at Gilgal in the Jordan valley, where the territory was divided between the tribes, each of which had to fight its own battles in occupying and possessing its land. This fact explains some apparent contradictions within Joshua-Judges. Some cities, defeated and destroyed once, would be rebuilt and repopulated, only to be taken again. Jabin king of Hazor was killed by Joshua (Jos. 11:1, 10), but was evidently succeeded by an heir of the same name (Jdg. 4:2). Jerusalem had a chequered career: cf. Jos. 15:63 with Jdg. 1:8, 21.

This general picture is confirmed by archaeological excavations. The sites of Bethel and Lachish show evidence of destruction in the latter half of the 13th century BC, while at Hazor the lower city was destroyed then, never to be inhabited again. The site of Ai is not certain, and nothing significant remains of the Jericho of Joshua's day. The massive walls, once thought to have belonged to the city Joshua destroyed, are now known to date from the Early Bronze Age, over 1,000 years earlier.

Some scholars assert that the presentation of the history given in Joshua is an over-simplification: that much of the Israel of the judges' period had not descended from those who experienced the Exodus, that the arrangement into twelve tribes was a later artificial imposition on the facts, and that the conquest of the land was a complex process, undertaken not as a united effort, but by individual tribes at different periods. A fuller discussion of these views is given in the commentary on Joshua and Judges.

Occupation was undoubtedly a slow process. Canaanites remaining in the land harassed the new settlers, especially in the north where Jabin 'king of Canaan' had iron-plated chariots. Sisera, his captain, pitched camp in the upper Kishon valley. Deborah and Barak attacked with an army drawn from five of the tribes, and from their vantage-point on Mt. Tabor routed the enemy, helped evidently by a providential storm that turned the little stream into a mighty river, and the valley into a quagmire in which chariots became a liability. Sisera's defeat marked the end of Canaanite domination (Jdg. 4–5).

There were also invasions. All the near neighbours tried to take advantage of the unsettled conditions. Judges tells in some detail about four invasions in order to recount the story of God's provision. Moab was driven out of the Jericho region by the cunning of Ehud (Jdg. 3:12–30). When for seven successive years bedouin had helped themselves to the harvest in the valley of Jezreel and on the coastal plain, Gideon, with a handful of men on Mt. Moreh, terrified them in the night so that they fled in panic, never to return (Jdg. 6–7). Jephthah's victory was over intruding Ammonites east of the Jordan (Jdg. 11), while Samson was meant to protect Dan's territory from the Philistines (Jdg. 13–16). These men were typical charismatic leaders or 'judges', with whom God's Spirit 'clothed himself' (Jdg. 6:34, RV mg.) to rescue His people in spite of their apostasy. The scanty records also suggest that there was continuous leadership at times by men who are also called 'judges', but of whom, apart from Jephthah, little is known save their names (Jdg. 10:1–5; 12:7–15).

The last five chapters of the book reveal disgracefully low moral standards and irregular religious practices, although the annual festival at Shiloh (Jdg. 21:19) and the mention of burnt-offerings and peace-offerings at Bethel (Jdg. 21:2–4) suggest some order. If Gideon's father had a Canaanite shrine and others protested at its destruction, we can infer that worship of fertility-gods was widespread at that period. Such apostasy accounted for continual defeat and oppression. The popular opinion, however, seems to have been that the continuous rule of a king would enable the country to avoid periods of decline. Thus, after his victory, Gideon was invited to rule (Jdg. 8:22), but he upheld the theocratic ideal and refused. Abimelech's limited and self-appointed kingship (Jdg. 9) need not be considered, but the demand for a king was to recur, and the refrain, 'In those days there was no king in Israel', implies that a king would have insisted on moral order and social justice. In the circumstances 'every man did what was right in his own eyes' (Jdg. 17:6; 21:25).

Eli's lead as priest-judge at Shiloh (1 Sa. 1–4) is referred to incidentally as background to the story of Samuel. Such improvement as there was during his time was rapidly counteracted by the unscrupulous and immoral behaviour of his sons. When they took the ark of the covenant into battle against the Philistines, hoping that its presence would ensure victory, not only was Israel defeated, but they themselves were killed and the ark captured; Eli died, and the God of Israel appeared to be impotent. Excavation of the site of Shiloh suggests that the primitive temple was violently destroyed c. 1050 BC, maybe on the occasion of this battle (cf. Je. 7:14; 26:6).

Samuel, the great prophet-judge, recalled Israel to loyalty to the Lord at Mizpah (1 Sa. 7:5–14); he enabled them not only to defeat and subdue the Philistines when they attacked unexpectedly, but also to recover lost territory. Apart from the fact that he lived at Ramah and judged Israel all his life, visiting Bethel, Gilgal and Mizpah annually (1 Sa. 7:15–17), little detail concerning his ministry is given till his old age, when the demand for a king was renewed.

Establishment of the monarchy: the reign of Saul. 1 Sa. 8:1 – 31:13

A people ambitious for national prestige could not tolerate the uncertainty over succession involved in the theocratic tradition. Differences of opinion about kingship, reflected in the text of 1 Sa. 8–12, are usually attributed to conflation of sources, but Samuel makes no secret of the fact that he prefers the charismatic tradition, of which he is a representative, though God has led him to anoint a king. The two view-points may, therefore, reflect Samuel's own conflict in accepting the innovation.

The reign of Saul vindicated Samuel's judgment. His valiant defence of Jabesh-gilead (1 Sa. 11:1–13), and his generous attitude to those who had opposed him promised well, but in the face of a Philistine army (1 Sa. 13) he presumed to take upon himself the offering of sacrifices in preparation for the battle, and so incurred the condemnation of Samuel as he did once more when, having been victorious over the Amalekites, he failed to carry out the extermination policy commanded by God before the battle (1 Sa. 15). He may have resented Samuel's authority over him, but whatever his motive he was rejected by God, his son was not to succeed him, and Samuel was sent secretly to anoint David in his stead (1 Sa. 16). Indecision, even schizophrenic behaviour, marked the last years of his reign, and he met his end on Mt. Gilboa at the hand of the Philistines, whom he had allowed to penetrate far into his territory (1 Sa. 31). What remained of his army was reassembled E of the Jordan under his captain, Abner, and, Jonathan having been killed, Ish-bosheth his brother became king in Gilead. Meanwhile David was king in Hebron over the tribe of Judah; skirmishes and intrigues during the next 2 years brought about the downfall, first of Ish-bosheth and then of Abner, so that eventually the northern tribes were prepared to acknowledge the leadership of David, and anointed him their king in Hebron (2 Sa. 2:1 – 5:3).

The reign of David. 2 Sa. 5:4 – 1 Ki. 2:11; 1 Ch. 11:1 – 29:30

Once he had control of all the tribes, David could begin to take the initiative. The first incident recorded is his seizing of Jerusalem by a ruse from the Jebusite inhabitants, and his establishment of the city as his capital, thus bridging what had been a gap between Judah and the northern tribes. Such consolidation was against the interests of the Philistines, who launched an attack in the valley of Rephaim, to the W of the city. David defeated them so decisively that they never again seriously menaced Israel (2 Sa. 5:17–25). Though David was not permitted to build the Temple (1 Sa. 7) he appointed the site and prepared the materials (1 Ch. 22; 28:11 – 29:9). The presence of the ark of the covenant within the city (2 Sa. 6) ensured the future of Jerusalem as the focal point of Israel's worship, while the renewed fortifications, the building of the royal palace (2 Sa. 5:11, 12), and the presence of the king and court provided a capital of which Israel could be proud.

Successful military exploits enabled David, with the help of his professional troops, to occupy the land 'from Dan to Beersheba'; Canaanite strongholds such as Dor (RSV 'Naphath-dor'), Megiddo, Taanach and Beth-shean evidently came to terms with Israel (1 Ki. 4:11, 12); other traditional enemies were subjugated (2 Sa. 8:1–15), thanks partly to the weakness of the great powers. Thus David's empire extended from the Egyptian border and the Gulf of Aqabah to the northern Euphrates, and tribute from Moab, Edom, Ammon, and Aramaean states to the NE enriched the treasury.

Though outwardly prosperous, David was to experience strife and division in his own family. The question of the succession was complicated by his preference for Solomon, son of Bathsheba, the unlawful wife of his later years (2 Sa. 11). It is not surprising that his older sons Absalom and Adonijah tried to usurp the throne (2 Sa. 15–18; 1 Ki. 1:5–7). Flight, exile, disloyalty and attempted revolt among the northern tribes marked the last years of a brilliant reign but, in spite of all, David evidently commanded the allegiance of the majority of Israelites, and none of the near neighbours was as yet prepared to challenge the kingdom in war, even though there had been good opportunities to do so.

The reign of David, despite all its shortcomings, was the most ideal that Israel ever knew. Under him the kingdom was united;

the empire was extensive; Jerusalem was established and promised to have a great future; the people had a mind to help make it great by building the Temple. David's best legacy to his successor was the unfinished task that gave purpose and drive to the early years of Solomon's reign. No less important was David's personal example, for he was 'a man after God's own heart'. Naturally gifted with powers of leadership, a warm outgoing disposition, courage, and a fine physique, David would have commanded respect in any community, but the Bible does not commend a man for his natural gifts. It is rather in his failures that the greatness of the man is seen. Where but in Israel would a king publicly admit to faults in his private life? David twice accepted the rebuke of a prophet (2 Sa. 12:1–15; 25:10–17), and through repentance experienced the wonder of forgiveness, while at the same time taking his punishment. He genuinely desired God's glory and appreciated the meaning of worship, as is evident from the psalms attributed to him; moreover he knew God in experience as his Rock and Shield and Deliverer, not only in victory, but even in defeat. Repentance, faith and worship had made him great.

The reign of Solomon. 1 Ki. 2:12 – 11:43; 2 Ch. 1–9

From the beginning it was clear that Solomon was not of the calibre of his father. A sense of insecurity drove him to liquidate his personal enemies, whereas David had been steadfast in waiting for God to vindicate him and so confirm his kingship. Once established on the throne he concentrated on the main tasks of his reign: consolidation of the empire, building projects, and organization of the administration. For all this the needed wisdom was promised. Expansion of trade brought unprecedented prosperity to Israel; widened horizons introduced foreign cultures, especially through the many marriage-alliances of the king; building operations demanded skilled workmen from Tyre, while the merchant navy based at Ezion-geber was dependent on Tyrian sailors to operate it (1 Ki. 9:26–28). Trade in horses and chariots involved regular journeys to Egypt, Syria, and countries of Asia Minor (1 Ki. 10:28, 29). Such cosmopolitanism may well have given rise in Israel to a renewed interest in wisdom literature. Solomon would have been well placed to collect and exchange the wise sayings attributed to him (1 Ki. 4:29–34). The mention of secretaries and a recorder (1 Ki. 4:3) suggests official records, and in the opinion of many, this was a time of literary renaissance, based on Israel's own background and historic tradition.

The story of 1 Kings concentrates on the wonder of the Temple buildings, with their carved cedarwood overlaid with gold, but points out that, whereas 7 years were spent on the Temple, 13 were needed to complete the royal palaces (6:38 – 7:1). Such projects involved vast labour forces, raised by conscription. Taxation was an added burden, made necessary by the size of the royal household and the increased number of officials. Moreover taxation in kind necessitated store-cities, which also had to be constructed and fortified. Little wonder that as time went on discontent increased. A wealthy king and court indulging their own pleasure at the expense of the poor was quite contrary to the traditions of Israel. Foreign gods were being worshipped by the king in blatant disregard for the law. Signs of decline were observable in the empire, for Edom and Damascus were ready for revolt, while at home Jeroboam had taken advantage of a responsible office to plan rebellion (1 Ki. 11). Solomon's death precipitated a crisis which resulted in the division of the kingdom (1 Ki. 12).

The young Rehoboam had not sensed the discontent of the people; in his immaturity he decided to assert his authority by threatening oppressive measures, and thereby lost all ten northern tribes. Jeroboam, back from exile in Egypt, was ready to step in as their leader, and became the first king of an apostate kingdom, which survived little more than 200 years.

The northern kingdom (Israel) c. 931–722 BC. 1 Ki. 12 – 2 Ki. 17

The history of the northern kingdom may be divided into four periods:

1. c. 931–880 BC. Egyptian raids early in Jeroboam's reign ceased owing to weakness at home. Throughout these years there was hostility between Israel and Judah. Jeroboam set up shrines in Bethel and Dan in order to consolidate his kingdom by preventing pilgrimages to Jerusalem, but no northern capital became permanent. The two reigns of Jeroboam (1 Ki. 12:25 – 14:20) and Baasha (1 Ki. 15:16–21; 15:33 – 16:7) each lasted about 20 years, only to be followed by a change of dynasty, the second leading on to civil war, from which Omri eventually emerged as leader (1 Ki. 16:8–22).

2. c. 880–841 BC. The dynasty of Omri was noted for cessation of hostilities between Israel and Judah, and for the establishment of the new city of Samaria as the capital (1 Ki. 16:23–28). Phoenician builders helped to plan the spacious palace where king and court could live in luxury. Alliance with Tyre was strengthened by the marriage of Omri's son Ahab to Jezebel, a Phoenician princess (1 Ki. 16:31). Israel gained international prestige and importance, for even Assyria was aware of Omri, as Shalmaneser's 'Black Obelisk' proves. Alliance between Israel and Judah made possible at least a temporary subjugation of Moab (2 Ki. 1:1) and Edom (2 Ki. 3:4ff.). Political and commercial success may well have been urged as an argument in favour of sensual Canaanite worship. Certainly Yahweh-worship was banned during Ahab's reign, while official status was given to the cult of Melkart of Tyre, until Elijah publicly demonstrated on Mt. Carmel the unique power of Yahweh, the living God (1 Ki. 18). Even then the battle with Jezebel was not over. Tyrian influence in social morality is seen in the episode concerning Naboth's vineyard, as a result of which Elijah pronounced the violent destruction of Omri's dynasty (1 Ki. 21).

Throughout the 9th century the Syrian state of Damascus harassed Israel's NE border, except for the short period culminating in the battle of Qarqar in 853 when Israel and Syria joined forces to defeat Assyria. It was in a battle against Syria for possession of Ramoth-gilead that Ahab lost his life (1 Ki. 22:1–40). Syrian pressure continued during the reigns of his sons Ahaziah and Jehoram and it was from Ramoth-gilead that Jehu was commissioned to exterminate the house of Omri (2 Ki. 9:1–3).

3. 841–752 BC. The dynasty of Jehu was the longest Israel knew. Jehu's revolt (2 Ki. 9:4 – 10:28) was instigated by the prophets, supported by the Rechabites and the army, and probably welcomed by the common people. His purge rid the land of Jehoram, Ahaziah of Judah, and Jezebel, of seventy direct descendants of Ahab in Samaria and of forty-two relatives of Ahaziah. He went on to wipe out a temple full of Baal-worshippers. Though he seemed to be a champion of the right, Jehu had no genuine concern that Yahweh should be honoured in his kingdom. The extermination of so many able-bodied men left Israel weak, and no match for Damascus, who annexed her territory E of Jordan (2 Ki. 10:32, 33) and even penetrated to the plain of Jezreel, occupying fertile areas to the W and southwards along the coast (2 Ki. 12:17). Recovery was made possible only because Damascus was invaded by the greater power Assyria in 803 BC. Thus Jeroboam II (2 Ki. 14:23–29), the fourth and greatest king of the dynasty, was able to regain lost territories, and restore the boundaries of Israel. He achieved unprecedented prosperity, enriching court, landowners and traders, but the common people, far from sharing the nation's wealth, were further impoverished. Such disregard for the Mosaic traditions, coupled though it was with punctilious religious observance, called forth the censure of Amos and Hosea. Social evils were an outward manifestation of the deep estrangement from Yahweh. There was still time for a change of heart, but war and captivity were the burden of the prophets' message. If Assyria had drawn the enemy from Israel's gates it was only a limited respite. Moreover Jehu's dynasty was insecure. Jeroboam's successor Zechariah was assassinated (2 Ki. 15:8–12).

4. The last 30 years 752–722 BC. 2 Ki. 15:13–31; 17. After only one month Shallum the usurper met his death at the hand of Menahem, who reigned 10 years. By paying tribute to Assyria he temporarily averted occupation. His son Pekahiah reigned 2 years, only to be assassinated in the palace by Pekah, son of Remaliah, who adopted an anti-Assyrian policy and tried to force Judah into coalition with Israel. Partly in response to an appeal from Judah (2 Ki. 16:5–8), Assyria invaded northern Israel, capturing several towns and taking prisoners. Hoshea slew Pekah and became the last king of the northern kingdom. When he refused tribute to Assyria, Samaria was besieged for 3 years, captured, and the population deported. The message of Amos and Hosea had been vindicated.

The southern kingdom (Judah) c. 931–587 BC. 1 Ki. 12:21 – 2 Ki. 25:21; 2 Ch. 11:1 – 36:21

Judah had the initial advantage of an established capital and a splendid Temple with an authorized cultus, upheld by a divinely-appointed line of kings. The southern kingdom, which was stripped of its treasures in Rehoboam's reign by Egypt (1 Ki. 14:21–31), was less prosperous, less accessible, and less attractive to would-be conquerors than Israel.

The third king, Asa (1 Ki. 15:9–24), was a reformer, who aimed at purifying worship. Politically he sought help from Syria against the northern kingdom, but during Jehoshaphat's reign that followed, alliance with Israel involved Judah in fighting her one-time allies. Though Jehoshaphat (1 Ki. 22:41–50) was a just and able ruler his son's marriage to Athaliah introduced the baneful influence of the northern kingdom (2 Ki. 8:18). At the time of Jehu's revolt, when David's line was threatened with extinction, one child was saved from Queen Athaliah's knife to perpetuate the dynasty. Jehoiada, supported by the army and the common people, succeeded in enthroning the young Joash and putting Athaliah to death (2 Ki. 11). The new reign began with repairs to the Temple and religious reforms, but this good start was not maintained. When Hazael of Syria threatened to attack Jerusalem he was bribed with Temple treasures to withdraw. Joash was assassinated in the palace c. 796 BC (2 Ki. 12).

During the 8th century the outstanding king was Uzziah, whose father Amaziah was also murdered (2 Ki. 14:17–20). Uzziah (2 Ki. 15:1–7; 2 Ch. 26), also called Azariah, strengthened the kingdom by subduing neighbouring peoples, building up his armies, and fortifying Jerusalem and other cities. In his time Judah experienced a prosperity unknown since Solomon's death. It was in the last year of his 52-year reign that Isaiah had a vision of the Holy One of Israel, and was called into His service (Is. 6). Together with Micah he was to have a message for Judah during the critical period of Assyria's encroachment, which began with the reign of Tiglath-pileser III in 745. When Israel and Syria made a coalition to oppose Assyria and threatened to force Judah to join (734), Ahaz refused Isaiah's advice (Is. 7) and appealed to Assyria for help, thus involving Judah in paying tribute. Assyrian forces were already in the W. In 732 Damascus fell and the N of Israel was annexed. Only 10 years afterwards, of the three kingdoms Judah alone survived. In spite of Assyria's victories plots were made by Egypt (e.g. Is. 30:1–7) and Ashdod (Is. 20) to rebel. Isaiah advised neutrality, but Judah was implicated, especially after 705. The result was a crushing Assyrian invasion, widespread destruction, and the survival only by a miracle of besieged Jerusalem, when King Hezekiah (715–686) responded to the preaching of Micah and Isaiah. So crucial was this event that it has been recorded three times: 2 Ki. 18:13 – 19:37; 2 Ch. 32:1–23; Is. 36–37. The state was spared for a further 100 years.

The reign of Manasseh (2 Ki. 21:1–18) reversed all that had been accomplished through Hezekiah. Assyrian ways, especially in religion, became the fashion, and any prophetic protests ended in bloodshed. Only after his death and that of his son was effective reformation attempted, in the reign of Josiah (639–609) (2 Ki. 22:1 – 23:30). The decline of Assyria enabled him to begin to reject foreign cults in his 8th and 12th years, spurred on by the haunting imagery of the prophet Zephaniah. In 626 Jeremiah responded to God's call to prophesy, and in 621 the discovery of the book of the law in the Temple gave further impetus towards reform. In spite of all the outward improvements Jeremiah could give no encouragement that judgment on Jerusalem would be averted again. Doom was inevitable. This unpopular message involved him in suffering and imprisonment. The prophet Habakkuk questioned the revelation he received that Yahweh would use Babylon to punish His people. Popular opinion was that the Temple was inviolable, and that its presence ensured the safety of Jerusalem, but Jeremiah in Jerusalem and Ezekiel in Babylon prophesied the downfall of both city and Temple.

Babylonian armies first marched through the land claiming allegiance in 605 BC (2 Ki. 24:1); Judah's disloyalty caused Nebuchadrezzar to seize Jerusalem in 597, when king Jehoiachin and leading citizens were taken as prisoners to Babylon (2 Ki. 24:8–17). The final sack of the city in 587, and the further deportations, brought Judah's national history to an end (2 Ki. 25). Its former territory became part of the province of Samaria after the murder of the governor Gedaliah, and the flight of Johanan and his company to Egypt. The fact that Edom supported the enemy, and later appropriated Judah's territory, completed Judah's humiliation, as the prophecy of Obadiah makes plain.

Exile and return. 2 Ch. 36:20–26; Ezr. 1–6

Both Jeremiah and Ezekiel had prepared the nation for complete collapse, and had insisted that any hope for the future must be centred in the exiles in Babylon (Je. 24; 29; Ezk. 11). Ezekiel continued his ministry, at least until 571 BC (Ezk. 29:17), but with a new message once the predicted fall of the city and its destruction had taken place (Ezk. 33:21). Then he could promise a new covenant, national resurrection, a new Jerusalem.

Prediction began to be worked out in history through Cyrus, king of Anshan, who rapidly established himself as the conqueror of the Near East; Babylon fell to him in 539 BC. As it was his policy to restore exiled peoples to their own lands and encourage them in their traditional worship, the Jews had their opportunity to return to Jerusalem. The opening chapters of Ezra describe how a nucleus did so, and laid the foundation of the new Temple without delay, but then discouragement, and opposition from the settled population of the province, with whom they refused to co-operate, brought the work to a standstill until 520, when the prophets Haggai and Zechariah, by rebuke and encouragement, caused a new start to be made. By 516 the new Temple was complete.

The prophecy of Malachi and the records concerning Ezra and Nehemiah (Ezr. 7–10; Nehemiah) shed some light on the rest of the Persian period. Opposition continued, and the little community lacked the leadership it needed. Thus it was that Ezra, the expert in the holy books, and Nehemiah, the personal courtier of the Persian king, perceived that they had a mission in Jerusalem. Nehemiah travelled there in 445 BC. By his astute handling of opposition, and realistic planning for the building of the city walls, he accomplished that task in 52 days (Ne. 6:15). After a gap of nearly 150 years Jerusalem was again a walled city. Its population was increased, and it became a more worthy capital of the little province of Judah. Legislation was passed by Nehemiah the governor to ensure the continuation of Temple worship, but it was Ezra who centred attention on the law of Moses and made its strict observance the responsibility of every Jew. There was no immediate hope of political freedom, nor of setting up a king, but law-keeping was within their power, and this became the steadfast aim of loyal Jews, in whatever country they lived. For a discussion of the date of Ezra's arrival in Jerusalem and of the relationship between him and Nehemiah, see the commentary on Ezra-Nehemiah.

The historical records of the OT go no further, but prophetic interpretation had established once and for all certain basic lessons to be drawn from them. First of all, the Lord was close at hand, fully aware of injustice, corruption and inhumanity in Israel's social and political life. If He was at the same time 'out there', afar off, filling heaven and earth, that only showed how impossible it was for a man to escape the judgment of His all-seeing eye. A man's routine choices in day-to-day living were of utmost importance, for they revealed his priorities. What the Lord demanded was clear: impartial law-courts, honest trade in the markets, just wages, generosity to the poor and defenceless, as well as sincere and loyal worship. Secondly, Israel was not the victim of some blind fate, but was responsible for the disasters that overtook her. Isaiah had made this plain: 'If you are willing and obedient you shall eat the good of the land; but if you refuse and rebel, you shall be devoured by the sword' (1:19, 20). That God meant what He said had been proved in Hezekiah's time, for when he obeyed and humbled himself to take the prophet's advice Jerusalem was spared. Thirdly, human responsibility did not conflict with the truth that God was in control of the affairs of men and nations. He was Lord of history, as well as creator of the universe. He could take the kings of Babylon or Persia and make them the unwitting tools of His purpose. It followed that Israel's disobedience could not thwart God's purposes. If her kings were faithless, He would provide a Davidic ruler who would fulfil all His will. If the terms of the old covenant had been broken, the Lord would make a new covenant, forgive Israel's sin and cause her to keep His laws. Far-reaching promises remained unfulfilled when prophecy ceased; centuries passed, yet the faithful in Israel never lost their conviction that, when the time was right, the Lord of history would break in and fulfil all He had promised. The world owes a teleological view of history to OT revelation.

J. G. BALDWIN

Old Testament theology

From the outset the OT offers itself to the reader as the story and description of a relationship: the relationship between God and the world. This relationship is, of course, asymmetrical. God is ever the transcendent One, and His rights and powers over the world do not imply reciprocal rights for the world over God.

Certainly it is this notion of relationship which dominates OT thinking, so that even if we consider the central revelation concerning the divine nature itself, that God is holy, this holiness is not considered in the abstract, nor even to any extent in or for itself, but rather as it impinges upon the world and man. Vriezen is surely right when he notes that 'the characteristic difference between the Old Testament teaching concerning God and the conception of God among the other oriental peoples is the absolute transcendence of God's Being' and when he immediately adds the qualification, 'a transcendence which nevertheless does not detract in any way from the communion between God and man' (An Outline of Old Testament Theology, 1958, p. 148).

Within the present brief compass, any treatment of OT theology is necessarily very selective, and much must be omitted. We must content ourselves with examining this truth as it appears in three interlocking circles of OT thought.

CREATION

The first and fundamental way in which the OT displays the relationship of the transcendent God with the world is the doctrine of creation. In starting here we do not in the least dissociate OT theology from either the history or the religion of Israel. To be sure, like every other doctrine, the doctrine of God the Creator was specially relevant to certain periods of Israel's life: it figures largely, for example, in the teaching of Isaiah (cf. 40:12–14, 25, 26; 42:5; 44:24; 45:18, etc.). But the time is long past when there is any justification for a late date for the origin of the doctrine of creation, whether inside Israel (cf. Vriezen, op. cit., p. 184; Albright, From Stone Age to Christianity, 1957, p. 260) or outside (cf. G. von Rad, The Problem of the Hexateuch and other Essays, 1966, ch. VI, 'The Theological Problem of the Old Testament Doctrine of Creation' (1936), esp. p. 142). The OT starts by stressing a truth which Israel always held, the truth of God the Creator, and thus it gives to all its teaching that world-wide perspective which reaches its climax and becomes effective in the Person and work of the Lord Jesus Christ.

The absolute Creator

Monotheism is basic and essential to Gn. 1. It belongs to the very fabric of the material and could certainly never have been achieved by some process of purging a polytheistic original of its offensive elements (cf. Y. Kaufmann, The Religion of Israel, 1961, p. 68; see further on the intrinsic monotheism of Israel's faith, e.g. M. H. Segal, The Pentateuch, Its composition and its authorship, 1967, pp. 125ff.). This monotheism is displayed, negatively, by the absence of reference to any other god, especially at those places where surrounding paganism would have insisted upon the introduction of this or that god to perform this or that individual function. Thus, for example, fertility of plants (Gn. 1:11) is not something achieved by the direct intervention of Baal, the supposed god of fertility, but is a natural capacity created into vegetable life by the Creator God. Again, the phrase 'without form and void' (Gn. 1:2) contains none of the features associated with the Babylonian Tiamat, the chaos-monster, the implacable foe of the creator, nor indeed any of the functions which the Greeks associated with the idea of Chaos. The Hebrew words tōhû waḇōhû do not signify 'the contrary of creation' (pace E. Jacob, Theology of the Old Testament, 1958, p. 144), nor do they admit von Rad's submission that 'it is hardly possible to conceive the idea of a created chaos, for what is created is not chaotic' (Old Testament Theology, Vol. 1, 1962, p. 144). In Je. 4:23 (cf. Is. 40:17, where tōhû is translated emptiness) the phrase clearly means a world reduced to its bare material substrate, a world from which order, purposeful existence and value have been withdrawn. Thus the tōhû waḇōhû of Gn. 1:2 does not contain the vestige of or even suggest any opposing divine being, but is (as indeed the order of the narrative implies) the opening move in the Creator's work, the creation of the material to which He subsequently gives order, form and life.

This continuing creative activity is attributed to the word of God (Gn. 1:3; cf. Pss. 33:6, 9; 148:5), which instances both the effortless ease with which the mammoth task was accomplished and also the immediate relationship between God and His world, leaving no room for the intrusion of any supposed god. Creation by the word of God finds its verbal co-ordinate in bārā, 'to create'. By an apparently conscious narrowing of its contemporary use outside Israel (cf. G. von Rad, Genesis, 1961, p. 47), the OT restricted this verb to divine creative activity, so that in its active use God is always its subject, and in its passive use His agency is presumed. It describes the sort of act which because of its greatness (e.g. Is. 45:8), or newness (e.g. Je. 31:22), or transcendence of man's capacity (e.g. Is. 4:5) requires the divine Agent. It is hardly correct to say that by etymology the verb expresses 'creation ex nihilo', but undoubtedly its usage (e.g. Gn. 1:1) involves this idea. On the other hand, each instance of the verb must be examined in its own right to decide whether the newness created by God is that of an absolutely new beginning or of giving a new turn or dimension to what was already there in embryo or in preliminary form (e.g. Is. 65:18; cf. commentary on Gn. 1:1, 20-23; NBD, art. 'Creation').

The creation of man

The supreme example of divine creative activity is man. Of the six instances of bārā in the creation narrative one describes the absolute origination of all things (Gn. 1:1), one is used compendiously to summarize the whole divine work (2:3), one marks the introduction of animal life (1:21) and the remaining three are concentrated on the creation of man in the divine image. This, quite apart from the careful structure of Gn. 1 in which verses 26, 27 are a clear and intended climax, displays man as the crown of creation.

From this we must insist that man is not the result of the operation of blind, self-originating and perpetuating forces. He is distinctively the work of God, whether we ultimately find this distinctiveness in an absolute act of creation whereby de novo man in the image of God entered the stage of earth, or whether the distinctiveness was the donation of the divine image as the crown of a divinely-superintended process of growth and development.

At all events, the emphasis in the creative act rests on the novelty that now for the first time the divine image is seen in a creature. The words used, image (ṣelem) and likeness (dᵉmûth), have an undoubted reference to outward form (e.g. 1 Sa. 6:5; 2 Ki. 16:10), and we must not resist the implication that while God is Spirit (Is. 31:3) and outward appearance does not belong to His essence, yet there is an outward appearance which is suitable to the invisible glory of God (e.g. Nu. 12:8) and in this likeness man was created. This affords a basis for the dignity which Scripture ever accords to the human body.

Ringgren, however, is undoubtedly to be heard when he reminds us (Israelite Religion, 1966, pp. 124f.) that Ancient Near Eastern rulers 'set up images and statues of themselves in places where they exercised or claimed to exercise authority. The images represented the ruler himself as symbols of his presence and authority'. This rightly focuses attention on the fact that it is in man's position, nature and functions that we are to see the image of God: his deputed rule of the world (Gn. 1:28–30), his moral capacity to live under law and promise (Gn. 2:16, 17), his intellectual awareness of his environment (Gn. 2:19), and, throughout, his communion with God. It is possible that the complex oneness of man and woman in marriage is also itself a reflection of the diversified unity of God which the OT reveals (cf. G. A. F. Knight, A Biblical Approach to the Doctrine of the Trinity, 1953, p. 17).

The nature of man is aptly summed up in the phrases dust from the ground and the breath of life, these two not remaining as isolated constituents but being blended together into the unity of a living being (Gn. 2:7). As aspects of human nature they are, of course, correctly distinguishable and separable for thought. Thus man is 'flesh' (bāśār), viewed externally (e.g. Ezk. 23:20, RSV members), or in his association with other living creatures (e.g. Gn. 6:17). He is also, psychologically considered, a 'person' (nepeš), i.e. an individual centre of conscious life, an ego with its distinctive emotions and desires (e.g. Jb. 16:4, 'you . . . my place'; Ex. 23:9, heart, i.e. 'feelings'); he possesses 'spirit' (rûaḥ), the motive power and energy of the person, which both stimulates him to act (cf. Ex. 35:21) and can be used to express the person himself considered as a source of action (cf. Dt. 2:30). Moving between these terms, the OT also uses words wherein what we call the physical and the psychological are fused. The 'heart' (lēḇ) denotes the person (or nepeš) as a centre of thought (e.g. Ps. 45:1), conscience (e.g. 1 Sa. 24:5) and emotion (e.g. Dt. 6:5; cf. 'kidneys', kᵉlayôt, RSV heart in, e.g., Pss. 7:9; 16:7; 73:21); the 'hand' (yaḏ) denotes the conative aspects of personality, man as doer (e.g. Dt. 2:7, 24; in Dt. 32:36 yaḏ is translated 'power'). The significance, however, of this use of 'heart' and 'hand' is that it stresses the unity of human nature: man is body, man is 'soul'—one person. (See further A. R. Johnson, The Vitality of the Individual in the Thought of Ancient Israel, 1949.)

God and history

The transcendence and immediacy of the Creator is nowhere more clearly delineated than in the 'world-view' of the OT. The Creator remains in immediate, executive, creatorial control of His world, whether considered as the sphere of human history (e.g. Is. 40:21–25) or in its intricate natural processes (e.g. Is. 40:26). It is this fact which gives rise to the linear view of time in the Bible: the 'recurring' features of experience are not governed by inner necessity or fate, but are freshly given to man by deliberate divine grace and faithfulness (Gn. 8:22; Je. 33:20, 25). This sovereign control and direction covers all experience, individual (e.g. Gn. 45:5–9; 50:20; Is. 54:16, 17), and national (e.g. Am. 9:7; Hab. 1:6; 2:16), catering even for the very details of events themselves (e.g. Is. 37:26–29; Am. 3:6).

In His world-government God is revealed as wise, powerful and holy (cf. Is. 40:12–14, 22–24, 25; Ps. 104, where vv. 1–9 display ordering power, vv. 10–24 wisdom, vv. 25–32 sustaining power, and vv. 33–35 holiness; cf. Ps. 93; see on Jb. 38–40). In the matter of theodicy, therefore, as in the concluding chapters of Job, there is no escape from the rigour of biblical theism. Human logic cannot justify its desire to explain experience by supposing that God can err, or fail, or pass false judgment.

Within these attributes of God, displayed in His world-rule, holiness predominates and qualifies all the others. This is, of course, equally true of the whole revelation of God given in Scripture. Seven out of every twelve references to the 'name' of God—i.e. His revealed nature—qualify it as 'holy'. Whether the root meaning of 'holy' (q-d-š) is 'separation' or 'brightness' (see Vriezen, op. cit., p. 149, for references to literature), the idea is that God is in Himself of such a positive nature that man cannot approach or behold Him. Constantly men are described as in terror of their lives if found in the presence of God (e.g. Ex. 33:20; Jdg. 6:22; 13:22), but as H. H. Rowley well remarks, 'what makes him tremble is not the consciousness of his humanity in the presence of divine power, but the consciousness of his sin in the presence of moral purity' (The Faith of Israel, 1956, p. 66). The ethical holiness of God, though decisively experienced and revealed in the case of Isaiah (6:3–5), did not originate there but is an unvarying feature of the OT understanding of God (e.g. Gn. 3:8, 24; Hab. 1:13).

Man's life on earth is automatically lived out under the scrutiny of this divine holiness, and this is seen in the realms of nature and history. As to the former, what we call the 'forces' of nature reflect the conditions prevailing between man and God, because natural forces derive their energies from God. Thus thorns and thistles follow on the first sin (Gn. 3:17f.). In the same way, the Israelite doctrine of prosperity differed diametrically from that of surrounding paganism. To the Canaanites, prosperity, defined in agricultural terms, depended on the capricious activity of Baal who could be enticed into action only by sympathetic magic. Consequently, Canaanite religion rested upon infamies such as 'sacred' prostitution in which the human act of fertility was designed as a broad hint to the god to function similarly. In Israel, prosperity found its collateral in obedience (e.g. Dt. 28; 29; Hg. 1:9–11; 2:15–19; Zc. 6:15). The moral holiness of God which rules the world requires the moral obedience of man. It is in line with this teaching that OT faith must needs assert the prosperity of the godly (Ps. 1), not because this was invariably so in experience but because revealed truth called for such a confidence that God would vindicate and reward His people. Ultimately the doctrine finds its climax in the unparalleled prosperity of the Messianic kingdom (Ho. 2:21–23; Am. 9:13–15), for the whole creation must burgeon with its proper splendour when at last God and man are at one and Eden is more than restored (e.g. Is. 11:1–9).

The government of history by a holy God is a topic which raises questions today, because it is clear that the OT appeals to the direct action of God in a way which offends modern modes of thought. The attack by Sennacherib on Jerusalem both raises problems and also offers characteristic biblical solutions. Sennacherib was designed by God to be His tool for punishing sinful Judah (Is. 10:5, 15), being spoken of as if he had no personal volition or responsibility in the matter but was a puppet under sovereign management. Yet, his work accomplished, he is to be punished for his pride in daring to attack Mt. Zion (Is. 10:12–14)! We are not here concerned with other aspects of the story of Sennacherib, as, for example, that the Lord's purpose was not in fact to deliver Jerusalem over to him, but rather to defend the city against him. It is simply that Isaiah's great poem on the Assyrian attack raises in an acute form the problem of the relationship between divine sovereignty and human responsibility. How can Sennacherib be, at one and the same time, the rod in the Lord's hand and also a culpable human aggressor? The solution of the dilemma appears to be this, that there were two reasons for the Assyrian attack. Had Sennacherib been asked, he would have replied in terms of personal pride and an assumed right to govern the earth. That is to say, he came for sinful reasons, meriting the punishment he ultimately received. But there was also a secret reason for his coming: the divine (and, to Sennacherib, undisclosed) will to punish a sinful city. The holy God neither excuses nor implicates Himself in nor originates the sinful motives of men, but He does rule and overrule them.

The Spirit of God

The rather mysterious reference (Gn. 1:2; cf. Jb. 33:4; Pss. 33:6; 104:30; Is. 40:7; 42:5) to the Spirit of God at creation, apparently acting as a mediator of the divine will, the executive link between the transcendent God. and His world, is filled out by subsequent references to the Spirit as accomplishing exactly this function in the rest of the OT, in which there is a remarkably full doctrine of the Spirit of God. The Spirit originates from God, being 'poured out' (Pr. 1:23; Is. 32:15; 44:3; Ezk. 39: 29; Joel 2:28f.) or 'falling' (Ezk. 11:5) on men. The Spirit 'rests' upon men (Nu. 11:25, 26, 29), or 'clothes himself' with them (Jdg. 6:34; 1 Ch. 12:18; 2 Ch. 24:20), indwelling them for specific tasks. He is actively present (Nu. 24:2; Jdg. 3:10; 11:29; 1 Sa. 19:20, 23; 2 Ch. 15:1; 20:14, in all of which the translation 'came upon' represents the verb h-y-h, 'to be actively present'), quickening or impelling (Jdg. 13:25), filling with power (Jdg.

14:6, 19; 15:14; 1 Sa. 10:6; 11:6; 16:13. The verb is ṣ-l-ḥ, which may mean 'to penetrate into' (cf. Vriezen, op. cit., p. 170) but more likely means 'to be strong'), and inspiring (2 Sa. 23:2; Ne. 9:20). In these references, the activity of the Spirit empowering mighty deeds possibly predominates, but this is by no means the only work accorded to Him. He endows the whole people of God (Is. 32:15; 44:3; 59:21; Ezk. 39:29; Joel 2:28f.), especially the great Messianic figures (Nu. 11:17; 27:18; 1 Sa. 16:13; Is. 11:2; 42:1; 48:16; 61:1). He is the agent in individual regeneration (Ezk. 36:27), and is characteristically associated with the work of the prophets (Nu. 11:29; 1 Sa. 10:6, 10; 2 Sa. 23:2; 1 Ki. 22:24; 1 Ch. 12:18; 2 Ch. 15:1; 20:14; 24:20; Ne. 9:20; Ezk. 11:5; Joel 2:28f.; Zc. 7:12). E. Jacob (op. cit., p. 125) correctly urges that 'it is clear that for all the prophets it is not the spirit but the word which qualifies them for their ministry. . . . But the word presupposes the spirit, the creative breath of life, and for the prophets there was such evidence of this that they thought it unnecessary to state it explicitly.' (Cf. A. B. Davidson, Old Testament Prophecy, 1904, p. 152.)

By virtue of the recurring title, Spirit of God, it is clear that we must speak of the Spirit as divine, but the evidence requires us to go further to speak of a divine Person. He possesses the divine attributes of holiness (Ps. 51:11; Is. 63:10), goodness (Ne. 9:20; Ps. 143:10) and wisdom (Gn. 41:38f.; Ex. 31:3; Is. 11:2; 40:13; Dn. 4:8, 9, 18; 5:11, 14); where He is present God is present (Ps. 139:7); He is vexed by sin as God is (Is. 63:10; cf. Zc. 6:8). 'The Spirit', says G. A. F. Knight, 'receives the personality and the very character of God Himself' (op. cit., pp. 54f.).

REVELATION

It is a short step from the notion of the Spirit of God as the inspirer of the prophets to the general topic of revelation in which, again, we see the basic truth that the transcendent God comes near to men. He comes near to make Himself known, an activity for which Hebrew typically uses reflexive verbs (e.g. Gn. 35:7; Ex. 6:3), for the initiative rests with God and 'there is no suggestion anywhere in the Old Testament that the reception of revelation is dependent on any particular predisposition in man, faith or anything else' (L. Koehler, Old Testament Theology, 1953, p. 100).

The angel of the Lord

The immediacy of God's approach to man is well seen in the activity of the angel of the Lord (Gn. 16:7ff.; 19; 21:17ff.; 22:11ff.; 31:11ff.; 48:15f.; Ex. 3:2ff.; 14:19–22 (with 13:21 and 14:24); 23:20f.; 32:34; Jdg. 2:1ff.; 6:11ff.; 13:2ff.; Is. 63:8f.; Ezk. 40–48, see 44:2; Ho. 12:4 (cf. Gn. 32:24ff.); Zc. 1–6, noting 1:12f. with 3:6–10; Mal. 3:1). The particular point at issue is clearly established by these references, namely that God takes the initiative to draw near to His people in self-revelation and direct communication. It is certainly not inappropriate to note how often the angel is both identified with the Lord (e.g. Gn. 22:11, 12) and distinguished from Him (e.g. Gn. 22:15, 16). E. Jacob (op. cit., p. 77) speaks of Him as 'the double of Yahweh', and yet the relationship is not one of simple identity (cf. J. Pedersen, Israel III and IV, 1953, pp. 496f.), for Ex. 33:1–3 says that the angel (in whom, none the less, is the 'name', the full nature of Yahweh, Ex. 23:21) will go with Israel lest, were Yahweh Himself to go, He would consume them for their provocation. The paradox of this divine angel was not solved until the revelation of Him who is both distinct from God and yet identical, who, without diluting the divine holiness yet kept company with sinners and who, without denying God's wrath, is yet the supreme outreaching of God's mercy, Jesus Christ our Lord.

Revelation in nature and history

God is known by His works. His activities in creation can be used to declare His omniscience (e.g. Ps. 94:8–11), His greatness (e.g. Ps. 95:3–5), His ability to meet with His people both in deliverance (e.g. Is. 50:2, 3) and judgment (e.g. Am. 4:12, 13). It is questionable, however, whether the mere contemplation of nature would expose these facets of the divine nature or whether Israel's existing knowledge of the Creator has prompted this illustrative use of His works. Certainly Ps. 19:1–6 appears to suggest that there is a knowledge of God preached by His created universe, and that this knowledge is available everywhere, but the passage itself contains a remarkable caveat couched in a paradox: granted that their words go out all over the world (v. 4), nevertheless there is no speech, nor are there words (v. 3). While Weiser holds the meaning to be that the message of nature is not restricted to any particular language but is heard by each man in his own tongue (The Psalms, 1962, 198f.), it is more likely that the emphasis rests on the inarticulate nature of the message (cf. A. F. Kirkpatrick, The Psalms, 1910, in loc.; J. H. Eaton, Psalms, 1967, in loc.): it is not couched in verbal terms. In nature each man hears what he says to himself. To some the appeal is the beauty of the world; to another there is the abhorrence of its cruelty and violence. Thus arises what William Temple so aptly called 'the hunger of natural religion' (Nature, Man and God, 1935, pp. 519f.)—the hunger being that no escape is offered from the self; no sure objective word is heard. It is no wonder, then, that Ps. 19:7ff. moves on to that sure testimony which God has spoken to His people. Nature is an uncertain guide. Man's sin has blighted its face with thorns and thistles; it holds its secrets back from a race in revolt against its God.

Turning to history, much the same is the case. All history is ultimately the work of God (e.g. Am. 9:7) but the OT registers no claim for a general revelation of God in history. Indeed, we are even assured that the search for God in His providential works is foredoomed to failure (Ec. 3:11), and experience teaches us that every man reads historical events in the light of his own presuppositions and makes selection among their lessons to suit his own taste.

Comparison of Gn. 15:7 with Ex. 20:2 uncovers a central OT truth concerning the revelation of God. The wording is almost identical: the Lord brought Abram from Ur and Israel from Egypt, yet, in context, the former is no more than a statement of fact whereas the latter is the summary of a revelation of God. In other words, while God is the supreme Agent in all history, chosen tracts or events of history are made the ground of special revelations of God to man by the attaching to them of an authorized interpreter. The fact that God brought Israel out of Egypt would signify nothing to us of the nature of God were it not for the presence and work of Moses as interpreter (cf. E. Jacob, op. cit., p. 184; P. K. Jewett, in Revelation and the Bible, edited by C. Henry, 1959, p. 48; A. Richardson, Christian Apologetics, 1947, pp. 140f.).

The God who speaks

By definition the word which God speaks is dynamic in power and cannot fail to accomplish its purpose. This was illustrated in creation (Gn. 1:3; Ps. 33:6). It is by the same powerful word that God governs nature (Pss. 147:15, 18; 148:8) and leads history to its determined goal (Is. 45:23). This irresistible word (Is. 55:11; cf. Gn. 24:50 where thing translates dabar, 'word') is superintended in its operation by God Himself (1 Sa. 3:19; Je. 1:12) and even partakes of the holiness of God, for to reject His word is to reject Him (1 Sa. 15:23; Is. 63:10). It is not inexact to speak, as Knight does (op. cit., p. 16), of the word of God as an 'alter ego of God'.

How is this word made available to man to teach him of God? The basic reply has already been stated: the revelation of God is made by means of events to which an authorized interpreter has been attached by God. But what is the relationship of the interpreter to the event? Our general consideration of the possibility of revelation in history has shown us that something more is needed than a mere attempt to be wise after the event.

The classic instance of the coinciding of history and interpretation is the work of Moses and the Exodus. It is quite clear that Moses was made wise before the event, and that the God who speaks precedes the God who acts. Before the divine act of deliverance Moses was already armed with an outline of the course of the events (Ex. 4:22f.), and, as interpretative clues to the coming acts of God, he had already been taught, by intelligible, verbal, propositional communication from God, the great truths of God's holiness (Ex. 3:5), His name (Ex. 3:14), His immutability (Ex. 3:15), His purpose to adopt Israel (Ex. 4:22), and to redeem His people in pursuance of His covenant (Ex. 6:6, 7). While, therefore, it is often asserted by OT specialists (cf. N. W. Porteous, 'The Theology of the Old Testament', in Peake's Commentary on the Bible (Eds. M. Black and H. H. Rowley), 1963, pp. 152f.) that revelation comes in the course of the sequence wherein the act is followed by the interpretation, this suffers from two grave defects. The first is that it is destructive of all certainty in the knowledge of God, for Moses' interpretation would in this case be merely first in time but could not exercise any other claim to precedence over alternative views of the Exodus. Far more important than this somewhat theoretical defect is its conflict with the only evidence we possess on the subject of divine revelation in the OT, namely, the OT itself. The personal divine confrontation and speech which we noted in studying the angel of the Lord continues to be the basic mode of revelation, except that from Moses onwards God made selection among men of those whom He would send with His word.

The uniform testimony of the prophets agrees with the position outlined in Ex. 4:16; 7:1, 2. The prophet is a person who speaks the very words of God (cf. Je. 1:9; 36:2, 4; Ezk. 2:7 – 3:3; see on Am. 1:1). There is mystery but no unreality when the prophets claim their words to be both their own and the Lord's. It is evident that their privilege of being verbally inspired did not devalue their personalities, for greater, more distinct and more colourful persons the world has yet to see. We need to remember that no prophet was ever a divine afterthought. In each case the man had long been prepared and set apart for the task (cf. Je. 1:5) so that by being himself he could be God's man for that time and his personality could impart to the word of God exactly those tints which God required (cf. B. B. Warfield, The Inspiration and Authority of the Bible, 1951, pp. 155f.; NBD, art. 'Prophecy, Prophets').

COVENANT

At the centre of the world-view of the OT and at the centre of what God has revealed about Himself lies the doctrine of the covenant. Ps. 103 is typical of this: the universality of vv. 6 and 19 brackets the special concern of God for Israel (vv. 7–18), and the preoccupation of this description of the chosen people is the covenant revelation (with v. 8, cf. Ex. 34:6). 'Covenant' is thus the very heart of OT theology, the central essence of what it teaches us about God.

Covenant terminology

The word 'covenant' (b^{e}rît) occurs first in Gn. 6:18, and thereafter it marks the main epochs of God's dealings with His people (cf. Gn. 15:18; 17:1f.; Ex. 2:24; 6:5; Dt. 4:13; Is. 54:10; Je. 31:31–34; Ezk. 37:26). There is some dispute as to its precise meaning, and advocates are found for the suggestions that its root is a verb 'to eat', pointing to the communal meal in which an agreement was sealed (cf.

Gn. 31:54; also the phrase 'covenant of salt', Nu. 18:19; see G. A. F. Knight, A Christian Theology of the Old Testament, 1959, p. 218); or that bᵉrîṯ comes from the Assyrian beritu, meaning 'bond' or 'fetter'; or, as suggested by M. Noth (The Laws of the Pentateuch and other Essays, 1966, p. 112), that an Akkadian preposition birît, 'between', developed into a noun 'mediation'. Any or all of these meanings corresponds well with the word as used in the OT. Confining ourselves to the covenant of God, the word signifies the bond of communion with Himself into which God, by sovereign action, brings the chosen people. A covenant among men, between equal parties, was a reciprocal arrangement, possibly even a bargain in which obligations were mutually balanced between the contracting parties. But the divine covenant was not between equals; it was imposed by God, acting, as we shall see, in sovereign grace. This aspect of the covenant has found useful illustration in the suzerainty treaties of the Hittite kings (cf. H. H. Guthrie, God and History in the Old Testament, 1961, pp. 42ff.; G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology, Vol. 1, 1962, pp. 132ff.).

The verbs used in connection with the covenant ought to be noticed. There are three mainly in use, each imparting a distinct significance. The verb kārat, 'to cut' (cf. Gn. 15:18), is used with reference to the solemn inauguration of a covenant according to the appropriate forms. It points to ceremonies such as Gn. 15:9, 10; Je. 34:18. Another verb, qûm, used in its causative formation, and translated 'to establish' (e.g. Gn. 6:18) signifies 'to bring into operation', or 'to fulfil (what was promised)'. The third verb, nāṯan, 'to place' or 'appoint' (translated 'make', Gn. 9:12; 17:2) points to the bond of the covenant as the abiding mode of relationship between the two parties concerned. It is important to keep these differing significances in mind, not least because in English translations 'make' is common to the first and third of the verbs, but to distinguish them enables us to see correctly, for example, that Gn. 17 is not a new departure but an elaboration of the relationship formally inaugurated in Gn. 15 (cf. M. H. Segal, The Pentateuch, Its composition and its authorship, 1967, p. 33).

God in the covenant

The delineation of God throughout the dealings with Noah, Abraham and Moses is very consistent. The idea of the divine holiness is not specified by name until Ex. 3:5, after which it dominates the Mosaic revelation: the whole story of the Exodus is contained between the fires of 3:2 and 19:18, which in each case (3:5; 19:20–24) are explained to mean the unapproachable holiness of God. But the same view of God is clearly implied in Gn. 6–9. The judgment of the Flood arises out of the provocation offered to the divine nature by universal sinfulness (Gn. 6:5–7), and even in the rather unclouded story of Abraham the darker shades are not absent (e.g. Gn. 15:12–14, 16), even though the total biblical emphasis on sin, repentance and judgment is missing in the patriarchal stories.

The partner of God's holiness is ever His law, His holy requirement among men. Just as the holiness of God becomes more clearly defined as the covenant process matures from Noah to Moses, so does the place and nature of law. The obligations laid on Noah are related only in general to his covenantal position (Gn. 9:1–7); in the case of Abraham, the obligation, vague as it is, lies clearly within the covenant (Gn. 17:1, 2). For Moses and Israel, the giving of the law of God, itemized and enforced, is the goal of the whole historical movement which began in Egypt (e.g. Ex. 3:12) and provides the substance of the covenant (e.g. Dt. 4:13).

Alongside these elements in the covenant-revelation of God lies His grace. This is first seen, and specifically mentioned, in the election of Noah to be the covenant-man (Gn. 6:8). The usage of the phrase '(Noah) found favour' (cf. Gn. 19:19; 47:25, where 'may it please' translates the phrase 'let us find grace in the sight of') can best be understood by reversing it, 'favour found (Noah)'. It always implies that something happens contrary to desert, something which originates in the graciousness of the giver and not in the merits or efforts of the recipient. Thus the whole covenant process is an outflow of divine grace, whereby, in the context of a deserved judgment, a man, and through him his descendants, was elected to mercy.

In the story of the Exodus, the same grace is at work to deliver the enslaved people. Of the three main features which reveal the grace of God to Israel, it must suffice here to mention two, and reserve for a moment the third. It is in the Exodus narrative that the verb 'to redeem' (gā'al, Ex. 6:6; cf. Is. 43:3) is used for the first time in its distinctive sense (L. Morris, The Apostolic Preaching of the Cross, 1955, pp. 9ff.), and it is in connection with this act of redemption, coupled as it is with the insistence on the divine holiness, that the meaning of the divine name, Yahweh, is first declared.

The significance of Yahweh (Ex. 3:13–15) as a verbal formation continues to be the subject of dispute (cf. J. A. Motyer, The Revelation of the Divine Name, 1959, esp. pp. 24ff.). Assuming its association with the verb h-y-h, 'to be', it is important to remember that this signifies not so much 'existence' as 'active reality'. Even granting, therefore, that the obscurity of the Name may in part be deliberate, indicating the hidden depths of the divine nature as yet undisclosed (cf. B. W. Anderson, The Living World of the Old Testament, 1958, p. 34), yet, as to what it does reveal, there is nothing substantial to choose between W. F. Albright's preference for 'I bring to pass what I bring to pass' (i.e. 'I do what I choose'; see op. cit., pp. 15f.), and that of most others (e.g. B. W. Anderson, op. cit., p. 34; U. E. Simon, A Theology of Salvation, 1953, p. 89), 'I will be what I will be' (i.e. 'I will be actively present as I choose'). In each case the Name is, as it were, a bracket in which certain truths will be set according as God confirms His word in coming events. In a word, the Exodus revelation of Yahweh, the covenant revelation, can be summarized by saying that He is the God who saves His people and judges His enemies: the God of holy redemption.

Sin and sacrifice

The third manifestation of divine grace to Israel, and one which is deeply rooted in the holiness of God and therefore stamped with the hall-mark of Exodus theology, was the fixing of the sacrificial system in its classical form. Sacrifice had, of course, been known from the earliest times, and, in particular, was associated with the epochs of the covenant. In the case of Noah, the offering of sacrifice is one of the features of man in covenant with God (Gn. 8:20–22); with Abram, sacrifice is made central to the inauguration of the covenant (Gn. 15:9, 10, 18) but its significance is not explained. At the Exodus we see why sacrifice is central to the covenant and exactly what it means.

It was the Passover which effected the deliverance of Israel from Egypt. Moses had been forewarned (Ex. 4:21ff.) that the 'plagues' would only increase bondage until the decisive issue of the firstborn was reached. This crisis came when at length Pharaoh broke off negotiations with Moses, and God said 'Yet one plague more' (Ex. 10:28 – 11:3). However, when that final plague came, it was the blood of the Passover lamb which proved decisive, for therein lay Israel's safety through that night of judgment.

The twin ideas of propitiation and substitution lie at the heart of Ex. 12. It is essential to the proper understanding of the meaning of 'blood' in the OT sacrifices (cf. A. M. Stibbs, The Meaning of the word 'Blood' in Scripture, 1954) to note that for some reason the blood beneath which the Israelites sheltered kept them safe from divine judgment (Ex. 12:13, 22, 23). When God looked upon the blood He found no reason to proceed further against those who were in that house.

It is difficult to see how the generally accepted view that 'blood' signifies 'life released' (cf. C. R. North, art. 'Sacrifice' in A. Richardson, A Theological Word-book of the Bible; Vriezen, op. cit., p. 292) can have any bearing on the Passover event. The force of the instructions given for the Passover is that every calculation is to be made so that the lamb, when dead, exactly matches the needs of the people (Ex. 12:3, 4) and that Israel is to enter into the death of the lamb by occupying the night in feeding upon it. The regulation that nothing shall remain underscores their preoccupation with its state of death (Ex. 12:10). The needs of the story, as well as the subsequent derivative legislation, are alone met by the assumption that the blood smeared on the door-posts proclaimed the death of the lamb, and if this is the case, then its death is necessarily an act of substitution, whereby the lamb, exactly assessed to match the people (Ex. 12:4), took the place of God's firstborn, Israel (Ex. 4:22), who thus survived the night wherein Pharaoh's firstborn perished. (See further J. A. Motyer, 'Priestly Sacrifices in the Old Testament' in J. I. Packer, Eucharistic Sacrifice, 1962.)

The Passover story says nothing more than that the blood delivered Israel from divine judgment. In the subsequent Mosaic legislation it became clear that the need to be thus delivered arose from man's state as sinner, and that without blood-shedding there was no remission. The once-for-all deliverance effected by the Passover sacrifice was prolonged for the enjoyment of the individual Israelite in fellowship with God by the continual blood-shedding associated with the burnt-offering, the peace-offering and the sin-offering. The whole rationale of this sacrificial system is crystallized in Lv. 17:11. In this key verse it is too readily assumed that because the life of the flesh is in the blood then the shedding of blood means the release of the life. But to hold this is to snatch a phrase out of its context. The shedding of blood must meet the requirements of the twice-repeated idea of 'making atonement' and, as L. Morris has shown decisively (op. cit.), this involves the idea of 'paying a price', an idea which is met only if the shedding of the blood terminates the life which it once fostered in the flesh of the animal. Again, the shedding of the blood must match the phrase 'I have given it to you'. Surely it is one of the strangest interpretations of the meaning of sacrifice to say that life is released as a gift to God (North, art. cit.) when the key explanatory verse insists that it is God's gift to man! Again it must be asked, does not this require the notion of the divinely provided substitute (cf. Gn. 22:7, 8, 13)? It is not out of place to note that the constant feature of sacrifices, the laying-on of the offerer's hand, is only satisfactorily explained as the designation of a substitute offering (Lv. 1:4; 3:2; 4:4; cf. 16:21).

The covenant Mediator

The OT is supremely the book of expectation. From the start, people are shown as living under hope of a promised deliverer (Gn. 4:1; 5:29; cf. NBD, art. 'Messiah'). This promise narrowed and clarified in the course of history. The promise was first concentrated in the seed of Abraham (Gn. 22:18, where RSV descendants translates 'seed', a word which may very well mean a single descendant, e.g. Gn. 4:25 where another child translates the same form of the same word). Then, later, the promise was associated with the royal house of David (e.g. 2 Sa. 7; Pss. 2; 72; etc.). Meantime, Moses himself linked the promise with the notion of a coming Prophet (Dt. 18:18f.; cf. NBD, art. 'Prophecy'). Thus, from many main angles of Israelite life, a 'Messianic' expectation came into focus (cf. H. L. Ellison, The Centrality of the Messianic Idea for the Old Testament, 1953). In particular, the expectation was given a covenant context in the hope of the perfect King (Is. 9:1–7; 11:1ff.; 55:3), the perfect Priest with the perfect Sacrifice (Is. 52:13 – 53:12; 54:10), the perfect Deliverer (Is. 59:16–21; 63:1–6), the perfect Lawgiver (Je. 31:31–34), and the perfect Mediator-Prince (Ezk. 45; 46; cf. 37:25–27).

It is at this point that OT theology comes full circle, for it is in the covenant-Messiah that the note of universality inherent in the doctrine of God the Creator finds its ultimate expression: in Him the call goes to the Gentile also (Is. 42:1–4; 49:6). In Him also that ground-truth, the transcendent God who meets with men, finds absolute expression, for the OT has this as its climax, a divine Messiah (cf. B. B. Warfield, Biblical and Theological Studies, IV, 'The Divine Messiah in the Old Testament', 1952; NBD, art. 'Messiah'), the God-man of Ps. 45:6, 7 (RV, not RSV), addressed as God, and yet acknowledging God, the 'arm of the Lord' (Is. 53:1; cf. Ex. 6:6), God Himself come down to effect salvation for the world.

J. A. MOTYER

History of the literary criticism of the Pentateuch

From the earliest Christian centuries hostile criticism of the Bible, and not least of the Pentateuch, has made its appearance (see E. J. Young, An Introduction to the Old Testament, 1958, pp. 108–117). It was, however, in the post-Reformation period that rationalistic criticism began to make its most distinctive appearance, and in the interests of space we must confine our attention to this. It may be seen, e.g., in the work of Masius (d. 1573), a Roman Catholic lawyer, who held that Ezra may have made certain interpolations in the books of Moses. Likewise the Spanish Jesuit, Benedict Pereira (c. 1535–1610), held that there were considerable later additions made to the Pentateuch.

Benedict Spinoza (1632–77) denied the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch, attributing it on the whole to a later compiler, probably Ezra. Certain parts, however, he did attribute to Moses. Quite possibly we should attribute the actual beginnings of the documentary hypothesis to Hans Witter (1711), who held that there were two parallel accounts of the creation which were to be distinguished by their usage of the divine names.

It is with Jean Astruc (1753) that the origins of the documentary hypothesis are usually associated. Astruc held that Moses had before him written documents which he employed in the composition of Genesis. These old memoirs contained the history of Moses' ancestors from the very creation of the world. According to their contents Moses divided these documents into pieces and then assembled them, one after another, thus forming the present book of Genesis. It will be noted that Astruc did not deny that Moses was the Pentateuch's author.

What led Astruc to do this was the presence of supposedly duplicate accounts of the same incidents, the different use of the divine names and the non-chronological order of certain events. Astruc placed in a column which he labelled A those passages in which the divine name Elohim (French, le Dieu) was employed and in another column B those which used the name Jehovah, or, more properly, Yahweh (l'Eternel). It was necessary, however, to postulate the presence of fragments of twelve documents in all before Astruc was satisfied with his accomplishment.

Astruc's work in itself apparently had little influence. Eichhorn asserted his independence of Astruc but performed essentially the same task, carrying it out far more thoroughly. He is probably the first to designate the two 'sources' by the initials J and E, standing for Jehovah (Yahweh) and Elohim. (Yahweh is the covenant name of God, and Elohim is the ordinary Hebrew word for God.) At first Eichhorn held that Moses himself had pieced together the sources, but later he maintained that they were put together by an unknown redactor.

In 1798 Karl David Ilgen made the suggestion, which was to have later influence, that there were two Elohists and one Yahwist. What was of particular significance was the fact that he assigned to his second Elohist passages in Gn. 1–11 which Astruc had regarded as belonging to the Yahwist. In other words, what formerly had been thought to belong to J was now seen to be more closely related to E, and thus it was becoming apparent that in themselves the divine names were not a sufficient criterion for the partition of Genesis into diverse documents. This work of Ilgen laid the foundation for the later writings of Hupfeld.

The view that there were two basic documents in Genesis was commonly known as the two document theory. De Wette carried the investigation further, however, by bringing Deuteronomy into the picture. In 1805 in his doctoral dissertation De Wette maintained that Deuteronomy was composed during the reign of Josiah (622 BC) and argued that, inasmuch as it is presupposed in the other Pentateuchal books, they must be later. Thus, there were actually three documents, labelled J, E and D (and according to Ilgen, E^2).

Not all scholars held to this position and there were various modifications which may briefly be mentioned. Several men held to what has been termed a 'fragmentary hypothesis', which essentially held that the Pentateuch consisted of a mass of fragments, pieced together by a later redactor. In opposition to this some men maintained that there was really only one basic document, and that this basic document had been supplemented with excerpts from another. The basic document was generally held to be E and the supplements were made from the J document. Not all advocates of this hypothesis, however, were in agreement upon this particular point. This view did not maintain the field very long. It was pointed out that the J passages which were inserted into E might very well contain allusions to the E passages, but why should the E passages, supposedly the basic document, contain any reflections upon material in the inserted J passages?

The modified documentary hypothesis

Precisely 100 years after Astruc produced his volume, the documentary hypothesis underwent a serious modification. Hints as to this modification were already present in the work of Ilgen. It remained for Hermann Hupfeld, however, to give the modification its impetus. Hupfeld took up the idea advanced already by Ilgen that the E document was not continuous, but consisted of two documents, one of which was closer to J than to the remainder of E. Thus, according to Hupfeld, there was a first Elohist and a second Elohist. In addition there was also the Yahwist document and Deuteronomy, and the order which Hupfeld assigned was E^1, E^2, J and D. In time the first Elohist became known as the priestly document because of its interest in priestly matters, which were quite arbitrarily seen as including genealogies, itineraries and even Gn. 1 which evidences no priestly associations whatsoever. Thus the four documents came to be labelled, P, J, E, D. Deuteronomy was considered to be latest of all.

There are certain difficulties in this partition which should be noted. Hupfeld's second E begins at Gn. 20, whereas the first E practically concludes at that point. Thus it would seem that one document had been broken into two. Furthermore, the second E apparently presupposes parts of the first E. The content of the first E is largely genealogical and statistical and such material is not the property of any one particular writer. Inasmuch as the documentary hypothesis involves so much difficulty, Hupfeld found it necessary to make rather full use of a redactor.

Hupfeld's work was a landmark in the history of OT negative criticism, and before proceeding to trace the development of such criticism further, we may point out a few of the difficulties which the documentary hypothesis creates. There are positive claims made in the Bible that the Law is from Moses. In the Pentateuch itself there are express statements to the effect that Moses did write what God had commanded him (cf. Ex. 17:14; 24:4–8; 34:27; Nu. 33:1, 2; Dt. 31:9), but even more telling is the observation that almost everything in Exodus to Deuteronomy at least makes an implicit claim to stem directly from Moses. The Mosaic claim belongs to the fabric of these books (see the introductions to the commentaries on these Pentateuchal books). Furthermore there is a unity in the Pentateuch which the documentary hypothesis does not satisfactorily explain. If the first five books of the Bible were put together in the manner which this hypothesis demands, it is difficult, if not impossible, to understand how the result could be the unity which the Pentateuch actually does exhibit. Such a manner of putting books together is unnatural; no other great work of literature (to say nothing of the question of the Bible's inspiration) was produced in the manner which this view demands.

The divine names clearly are not suitable nor sufficient criteria for partitioning the biblical books into documents in the manner presupposed by this view. Even Astruc had difficulty along this line. In at least five chapters of Genesis the Deity is not mentioned at all, and yet these chapters are divided among J, P (E^1) and E^2. Obviously criteria other than the divine names must be employed. In seventeen chapters of Genesis and in Exodus 1 and 2 the name Yahweh does not occur and yet it is asserted that portions of 'J' are found in each of these chapters. Likewise there are fifteen chapters in which the word Elohim is not to be found. It would appear then that the names are not adequately distributed throughout Genesis to form the basis for division or partition into documents. The distribution is most pronounced in Gn. 1 – 3 where the combined form Yahweh Elohim appears 20 times. Sometimes it is possible to explain these variations on theological grounds, but this is not always the case.

In Ex. 3, to take but one example, there would seem to be good warrant for assuming that the names are used on the basis of their theological significance. This becomes increasingly evident, when we consider what the purpose of the chapter is, namely to show that the Elohim whom the fathers had known is the Yahweh who will enter into covenant with His people. Hence, although the chapter begins with the use of Elohim, it soon introduces the term Yahweh. In v. 4, a stumbling-block for critical analysis, both names are used, for the transition between Elohim and Yahweh is not yet complete.

In v. 6 Yahweh introduces Himself, and not until the conclusion of His speech in v. 10 do we again meet the term Elohim (v. 11). The One to whom Moses speaks is Elohim, but in the speech of God to Moses, God designates Himself as Yahweh (e.g. vv. 15, 16, 18), for it is as the covenant God of redemption that He will send Moses to lead the Israelites from Egypt. Thus theological considerations may very well often form the reason why a particular designation of God is employed.

It should furthermore be noted that the designation Yahweh occurs in passages which are often attributed to P, and Elohim in those which are assigned to J. Too often, a redactor must be brought in to explain phenomena which conflict with the documentary analysis. (See further E. Nielsen, Oral Tradition, 1954, pp. 93ff.) Ex. 3:4 serves as a good example. Here, we read, 'When Yahweh saw that he turned aside to see, Elohim called to him out of the bush.' In thus piecing together different fragments of the various documents, the redactor tears in sunder what was originally a unified narrative. To take but one example: Gn. 1 (attributed to P) speaks of everything as very good. Gn. 5 (also attributed to P) stresses the great reign of death over mankind, broken only by the case of Enoch. What caused the change from 'very good' to 'and he died' in ch. 5? No explanation is found in the so-called P fragments. The explanation is given in what the 'critics' attribute to JE, namely chs. 2 and 3. Did the original P, then, have any explanation of the change, i.e. of the Fall of man? If it did, why did the redactor or compiler omit it?

Furthermore, this redactor (or redactors, or schools, or call them what one will) was often guilty of gross carelessness. The principal example is the placing together of Gn. 1 and 2, which we are told constitute two different accounts of creation, with differing outlooks. If this were the case, one may wonder why the redactors bungled so badly. Why place side by side two conflicting creation narratives? If the redactors did that, they can hardly have been men of greatness, and yet these bunglers produced the Pentateuch. Here is a psychological phenomenon which has not yet been explained by adherents of the documentary analysis. Actually, of course, there are not two accounts of creation in Genesis; ch. 1 is a creation account, but ch. 2 describes the preparation of the Garden of Eden for man. (See further, the commentary on Genesis, in loc.)

Another of the reasons alleged in favour of multiple authorship of the Pentateuch is, as we have seen, the existence of duplicate accounts of the same event, it being rightly thought unreasonable that a single author would do this. Thus we are told, e.g., that in Genesis there are two accounts of the expulsion of Hagar (16:4ff. and 21:9ff.). The former belongs to the J document, and the latter to E; they have been editorially harmonized by the invention of an angel who sent Hagar back after the first expulsion. Again, there are two accounts of the naming of Beer-sheba (21:31; 26:31ff.), and no less than three accounts of deceitful action in passing off a wife as a sister (12:10ff.; 20:1ff.; 26:6ff.).

From the point of view of the documentary theory the problem arises that 'duplications do not always occur in different documents—as, in theory, they ought to do—but in no inconsiderable number of cases fall within the limits of the same document. Thus E has a second visit to Bethel as well as P (Gn. 35:6, 7); J has two denials of wives (Gn. 12 and 26).... This suggests that even were the similarity of incidents as clear as is alleged, it would not necessarily prove different authorship' (J. Orr, The Problem of the Old Testament, 1908, pp. 236f.).

The matter can, of course, be settled only by detailed examination of the passages, and in the cases of the concealment of the wives' real status this shows how unnecessary the theory is. In the first place, Gn. 20:13 relates that we are here dealing with a general policy. If we take this statement seriously there is no inherent improbability in the similarity of the stories. But in fact the similarity is not great. E.g., Pharaoh acts with the peremptory authority of a great ruler (12:19–21), hustling Abram from Egypt, but Abimelech, a petty chieftain, comes to Abraham as to an equal, inviting him to settle in the land where he pleases (20:15); whereas Abraham goes to Gerar in the course of his wanderings, Isaac goes because of famine (20:1; 26:1); whereas Sarah is taken into Abimelech's household, Rebekah is not (20:2; 26:8); whereas Abraham was invited to remain, Isaac is asked to go (20:15; 26:16), but not, as in the case of Abram in Egypt, because of the deception he had practised, but because 'you are much mightier than we' (26:16). In other respects also the individual colouring of each story could be brought out so as to show that the overlapping is virtually confined to the single common fact that each is concerned with the attempt to pass a wife off as a sister, a practice which is said to have been, in Abraham's case, a general policy.

Each case of alleged duplication must be subjected to this sort of detailed examination, and, as in the present case, it can confidently be asserted that nothing will be found giving substantial ground for supposing this sort of multiplication of sources for the Pentateuch.

The development hypothesis

One thing can truthfully be asserted concerning the study of the documentary hypothesis: it was kaleidoscopic. As early as 1834 Eduard Reuss had suggested that the basic Elohistic document (i.e. P), instead of being the earliest, was really the latest. It was some time, however, before this idea began to take hold. Karl Heinrich Graf had studied the legislation of the Pentateuch and from this study came to the conclusion that the priestly document was in reality the latest. Julius Wellhausen in Die Komposition des Hexateuchs (1876–77) brought this position to dominance. His style of writing was clear and convincing, and he is really the man to whom the development hypothesis owes its existence.

The development hypothesis is built upon the documentary hypothesis and is, as its name suggests, a hypothesis to the effect that the religious institutions of Israel underwent a development from earliest beginnings until they attained their final form. Wellhausen began by asking whether the Law was the starting-point for the history of ancient Israel or for the later Judaism. A number of OT books, he held, did come from the period of the Exile; may it not have been that the Law also came from this period? Wellhausen tells of his early experiences in reading the OT and how he found it difficult to believe that the Law was earlier than the prophets.

We may perhaps best understand the nature of Wellhausen's development hypothesis if we consider one important aspect thereof, namely the question of the place of worship. In the NT, said Wellhausen, both Jews and Samaritans recognized that there was to be only one central place of worship. They differed as to where this was but agreed in acknowledging that there should be only one central place for worship. This belief, however, had not always been held in Israel but came into being only during a long process of time. Before the building of the Temple, there is no trace of any sanctuary which could claim exclusive legitimacy for worship. Instead there appears to have been a multiplicity of sanctuaries and this was probably a heritage from the Canaanites. When the Israelites entered Palestine, Wellhausen tells us, they took over many of the high places and sacred sanctuaries.

From the fact that, after the battle of Michmash, Saul erected an altar, we can see that altars might be built at any place whatsoever (cf. 1 Sa. 14:33ff.). The growth of the Solomonic Temple tended to bring about the idea of centralization of worship, as did the decrease of family sacrifices. Actually, said Wellhausen, the books of Kings give a false picture of the situation, for the land was considered to belong to Yahweh, and hence any spot was suitable for worship. With the fall of Samaria, however, a change began to appear. Amos and Hosea had declared that some of the former sanctuaries were an abomination to the Lord. Their zeal, however, was directed not so much against the sanctuaries themselves as against the cultic practices that were carried on there. When Samaria fell, Judah had a clear field, and Jerusalem soon became recognized as the legitimate centre of worship. Samaria had fallen, but Sennacherib could not take Jerusalem, and so this city gained in prestige and importance.

There are, asserts Wellhausen, three stages in the Law which correspond to the stages of history just outlined. In Ex. 20:24–26 a multiplicity of altars is assumed as a matter of course. Worship could occur wherever one wished. The patriarchs are pictured (although Wellhausen of course denied the historicity of the patriarchal period) as worshipping not at one central altar, but where they willed. In this period what was important was the theophany in and for itself; its occurrence might be at any particular place.

As the book of the covenant (i.e. Ex. 20:23 – 23:33) and the so-called document J represent the first period of Israel's history, so Deuteronomy represents the second. In Deuteronomy alone do we find an insistence upon restriction of worship to the one chosen place; here only does the demand make itself so felt in its aggressive novelty and dominate the whole tendency of the law-maker. Deuteronomy uses old material but shapes it to agree with this fundamental purpose. The writer now permits what formerly had been forbidden, and prohibits what previously had been allowed. Deuteronomy therefore was an outgrowth of the conditions of the times and must be assigned to the day of Josiah. The book, or at least a part of it, was written at this time for the purpose of bringing about a centralization of worship. It therefore was not the work of Moses, but really a forgery, for it purported to be words which God spoke to Moses, and throughout it gives the impression of having been delivered to those who have not yet entered the land of promise.

With respect to the 'priestly code', Wellhausen points out that, like Deuteronomy, it also claims a centrality of sacrifice. Whereas in Deuteronomy, however, this unity of the cult is commanded, in the 'priestly code' it is presupposed, and is regarded as a matter of course. Thus, there is a contrast between Deuteronomy and the 'priestly code'. The one is the centre of movement and conflict; the other proceeds as though everything has been settled for a long time. Deuteronomy gives the idea; the 'priestly code' gives the idea as history. It cannot think of religion without one sanctuary; it cannot imagine Israel without it, and in this light it has rewritten Israel's earlier history. Thus, to take but one example, the Tabernacle was really patterned after the Temple, and not vice versa. Coupled with this idea of development of the place of worship was also a development in the nature of sacrifice, of the sacred festivals, the priests and the Levites, the idea of God, etc. Here, undergirding all, was the theory of evolution, which Darwin had popularized.

The response to Wellhausen

That the position of Wellhausen held the field for a long time cannot be denied. The development hypothesis which Wellhausen presented has finally gone by the board, but not the underlying documentary hypothesis, which today is as widely held (in one form or another) as ever. Two factors led to the downfall of the development hypothesis. In the first place the inherent weaknesses of Wellhausen's position were soon pointed out, and secondly, the discoveries of archaeology showed that Wellhausen could not possibly be right. Other factors also have doubtless entered into the picture, but these two in particular led to the demise of the development hypothesis.

Almost immediately scholars began to indicate the logical fallacies of which the noted German had been guilty. It did not necessarily follow, to take but one example, that a law had not existed because people paid no attention to it. Men such as W. L. Baxter, William Henry Green, Geerhardus Vos, Wilhelm Möller and later Oswald T. Allis have given searching analyses of the development hypothesis and have cogently presented its weaknesses. In particular the hypothesis is so thoroughly unscriptural that it cannot be accepted by anyone who has a high regard for what Scripture teaches concerning the date and authorship of its own documents.

Even during Wellhausen's lifetime, archaeology began to speak with a powerful voice. Finally, with the discovery of the Nuzi tablets (1925) it became clear that the background of the patriarchs, given in the book of Genesis, far from being unreliable, was remarkably accurate. The light which archaeology has brought to bear upon this question seems constantly to be increasing, so that it is becoming increasingly uncommon for scholars to agree with Wellhausen's estimate of the historical value of Genesis. It has also become apparent that much of the material found in the so-called 'priestly code' is very ancient. In many other respects also, archaeology has spoken with compelling voice. Wellhausen's books today offer little more than antiquarian interest, a strange fact when one considers the dogmatism that accompanied his presentation.

The school of form-criticism

With the study of archaeology there also came to light new information about the cultures of the ancient world. Ancient religions were studied and compared with the Scriptures. Hermann Gunkel wrote a book which in some respects contained within it the seeds of overthrow for the development hypothesis. Gunkel's purpose was to show how the material of Genesis was taken over from other cultures and adapted to Israelitish needs, and also to point out what value it finally received in Israel. It is in this process of transformation (Umbildung) that, according to Gunkel, the characteristic of Israelitish religion appears. What is peculiar to Israelitish religion is the belief that God has revealed Himself in the history of Israel.

Hence Gn. 1 is not a free construction of the composers, for old traditions stand behind the priestly writing. The narratives or sagas of Genesis were the stories which the ancient Israelites told, stories which from generation to generation had been handed down until they finally took on a crystallized form. In the beginning these sagas had no particular relation one to another but as time went on they came to be attached to some favourite figure such as Abraham. Only at a later time did they become collected into larger units, namely the documents which were known as J, E, etc., and these were finally pieced together. The actual unit of investigation, however, according to Gunkel, is the individual saga or narrative, and the investigator's task is to determine the original form and as far as possible the historical situation that gave rise to the individual unit. Actually, such a procedure would destroy the unity of the supposed documents in which the units are now found.

The literary history of Israel, taught Gunkel, was really the history of the types. Every old literary type had originally its life-situation that called it into existence at a particular place. To discover the type, we must ask questions such as, Who speaks? Who listens? What voice determines the situation? What action is attempted? We must also study the history of the collection of the individual units.

Gunkel's work was carried out by others, notably Hugo Gressmann, who applied the same methods of study to the book of Exodus. In fact the entire OT was subjected to this particular approach in a series of four volumes known as The Writings of the Old Testament (Die Schriften des Alten Testaments, 1911). This approach to the OT became very influential and undergirds almost all 'critical' study of the present day.

In the approach of form-criticism there are certain considerations that must be taken into account. In itself there can be nothing objectionable in seeking to determine the form in which the Scripture appears. We must distinguish, to take the most common examples, between prose and poetry. It may also be that there were certain types of writing in which the authors of Scripture engaged. This method, as it is commonly employed, however, is extremely subjective. It seeks to discover the original unit, and in so doing is willing to pare away anything which it regards as a secondary or later accretion. At this point, the subjectivism enters. Who is to say what is original and what is later? That the procedure is indeed subjective appears when one considers how diverse are the studies that have been made by various individual form-critics. Particularly is this true in connection with the study of the prophetical books. Men do not agree, and the disagreements are serious. Furthermore, once the supposed original unit has been obtained, certain questions arise which really cannot be answered. What was the life-situation that gave rise to the unit? Usually we do not know, for the unit itself often says little or nothing about such matters. Unconsciously critics are influenced by the context of Scripture which they have cast away in their study. Furthermore, it is then often impossible to determine who the speaker was. It is, therefore, understandable that the late Ivan Engnell maintained that it was not possible to reach the very words (the ipsissima verba) of the prophets. Form-criticism, as it is often practised, leads to scepticism.

Certain recent developments

Not all scholars followed in the stream of Wellhausen and Gunkel. Some went their own way. In 1908 B. D. Eerdmans approached the question of the Pentateuchal problem in a manner quite different from that espoused by the majority of scholars. He found four differing stages of development, proceeding from the polytheistic to the monotheistic. The discovery of Deuteronomy brought about a monotheistic rewriting of earlier material, and further expansions came after the Exile.

In 1912 Rudolf Smend asserted that there were two Yahwists who paralleled one another side by side. In addition he held to the unity of the E document, but thought that D and P were the subject of many additions. In 1922 Otto Eissfeldt took up this theory, designating Smend's J^1 as L (for 'lay source'). Eissfeldt's argumentation is based primarily upon the presence of supposed duplicate accounts.

Deuteronomy became the subject of much research, some holding that it came from northern Israel and others dating it after the Exile or at least at the time of the Exile. In 1925 Möller wrote in defence of the Mosaic authorship of Deuteronomy, pointing out cogently that the book often reflects upon the first four books of the Law. In 1963 Meredith G. Kline sought to show that the book was composed in the general style of the suzerainty treaties of the Hittites. Inasmuch as the book contains a historical prologue, which, he argues, characterized the early treaties, it must be early, consonant with Mosaic date and authorship.

Gradually a time of disintegration began to set in. With the discoveries of archaeology many fixed notions had to be abandoned, and men were writing on specialized problems.

A leading representative of the so-called 'Leipzig School' (i.e. the school of OT studies founded by the late Albrecht Alt) is Martin Noth. Noth presented a particular variety of the documentary hypothesis, but his most significant work is probably his view of the early history of Israel.

Noth regards the Pentateuch as the product of a long process of growth which was influenced by various interests and tendencies. Traditions, originally oral, were written down and only later were collected into a large literary work. The so-called documents J and E, according to Noth, had a common basis. Noth distinguishes a Tetrateuch (the first four books of the Pentateuch) from the Deuteronomic work of which Deuteronomy forms the basis, the remaining books of the complex being Joshua, Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel and 1 and 2 Kings. Thus there are actually two great complexes of traditions represented in the Pentateuch and historical books (the 'Former Prophets') of the OT. Noth's presentation is very detailed and he deals with the history of the various themes found in the documents with great thoroughness.

In addition to the many arguments that can be advanced against the documentary analysis generally is the fact that Deuteronomy reflects upon, and gives the appearance of being based upon, the previous books of the Pentateuch, in particular upon the fact of the Exodus. This fact of the Exodus is the foundation of the history that follows. Why is it treated so basically in the book of Exodus, being described as though by a contemporary, whereas in Deuteronomy and subsequent books it appears as something that has happened in the past?

Noth is perhaps best known for his treatment of the early history of Israel. Heinrich Ewald (d. 1875) had maintained that in the description and enumeration of the tribes the number twelve was basic. Noth held that in early Israel there had been a sacral covenant or confederation of the twelve tribes after the nature of the amphictyonies of the Greek city-states. The heart of this amphictyony, which supposedly arose during the time of the judges, was the cult, situated at a central sanctuary. The laws were the ordinances of this religious arrangement.

Several considerations, however, make it very questionable whether Noth's interpretation of early Israelitish history is correct. In the first place the situation in Greece and Italy was quite different from what it was in Israel. In Greece the amphictyony served to protect and to unite already existing small city-states. The Philistine confederacy seems to have been closer to this arrangement. The Israelites, however, were tribes which had entered Palestine from the desert. They were not city-states.

Jos. 24, to which appeal is made for the establishment of the unity of the tribes, rather presupposes this unity as already in existence. Again, although the OT has words for many details of religious worship, there is no Hebrew word to denote an amphictyony. Nor does the OT mention any arrangement which might legitimately be designated an amphictyony. During the period of the judges the tribes were not united, as Noth's theory assumes, but were divided. When, under Samuel, they asked for a king, their request was political and not religious. Hence there actually is no evidence to support Noth's thesis.

The study of traditions

Of particular significance is the work of Gerhard von Rad, who takes his starting-point with Dt. 26:5b–11. This passage he regards as a cultic credo. What is of significance, he says, is the fact that there is no mention whatever of the events at Sinai. From this, and also from the consideration that he thinks this same phenomenon is present in other passages (e.g. Ex. 15; Ps. 136), he concludes that the Sinai traditions were originally separate from those of the Exodus and the conquest. Von Rad does not necessarily deny the historicity of the patriarchs as individuals, but holds that they held to the form of worship known as 'The God of the Fathers', each patriarch worshipping his own god. Not all of the tribes were in Egypt, but only the Rachel tribes.

These Rachel tribes entered the land of promise and there formed a loose association (amphictyony) with the Leah tribes which were already in the land. What united them was their common faith in their god Yahweh. Over the course of years, priests of the Yahweh congregations taught the people.

The Yahwistic editor, somewhere along the line, united the Sinai traditions with those of the Exodus and the conquest. Much of Israel's religious thought thus came to her through the Canaanites, although originally it may have gone back to the Babylonians. Von Rad's thesis is quite radical. It may be pointed out that in covenant documents the place of ratification of the covenant is often not mentioned, and hence, in the Deuteronomy passage one would not necessarily expect any mention of Sinai by name. Furthermore, his view proves too much. The Deuteronomy passage omits everything between the Exodus and the entrance into Palestine. If therefore the Sinai traditions are not a part of the original, neither is much else.

Conclusion

To trace the development of various approaches to the Pentateuch is interesting and instructive. When, however, the student departs from the direct claims of the Bible itself, he finds that he is involved in serious difficulty. None of the theories mentioned really does justice to the facts of Scripture. It is only when the claims of the Bible (including its claim that, in the ultimate and most real sense, God is its Author) are taken at face value that one can do justice to Scripture. What the future will bring forth, one cannot know. Nevertheless, the Word of our God will stand for ever; theories come and theories go, but the Scriptures will continue to bless mankind, for they are the Word of the eternal God.

EDWARD J. YOUNG

Moses and the Pentateuch

The Christian who tries to take the guidance of Christ in his understanding of the OT is not bound by tradition when it comes to such matters as authorship. Indeed he is warned not to put the traditions of men on a level with the Word of God (Mk. 7:13). He is, however, bound by everything that is specifically taught in the OT, since: 'To Christ the Old Testament was true, authoritative, inspired. To Him the God of the Old Testament was the living God, and the teaching of the Old Testament was the teaching of the living God. To Him, what Scripture said, God said' (see the author's Our Lord's View of the Old Testament, 1964, p. 40).

It may seem at first sight that a historian who approaches the Bible with the belief that its statements are true must be already so prejudiced that his conclusions can be of no value, for the true scholar, it is said, should be a man with an 'open' mind. Yet this plausible reasoning conceals a fallacy. For obviously no-one is fit for scholarly research unless his mind is already filled with many facts and many ideas, just as no-one is fit for scientific research unless he already has a good grasp of the facts and principles of his branch of science. A man's fitness for fruitful research depends upon his understanding of the basic principles of his subject. It is no help to a physicist to have an 'open' mind about the carefully-established laws of physics. A firm grasp of the known is the key to the exploration of the unknown. This does not mean that some laws may not be capable of more precise determination or of more satisfactory formulation; this is part of the function of research. But any scholar must build on the known, if he is to advance into the unknown.

The belief that Jesus is a dependable Teacher comes from the inner witness of God Himself, which causes the Christian to believe his Lord's claim: 'Heaven and earth will pass away, but my words will not pass away' (Mk. 13:31). 'Every one . . . who hears these words of mine and does them will be like a wise man who built his house upon the rock' (Mt. 7:24). He is thus predisposed to accept Christ's view of the OT. He believes that this will be the key to its understanding. And he is not disappointed.

The dominant theory of Pentateuchal criticism combines two strands, the documentary and the development theories, both of which are based on the supposition of large-scale internal contradictions in the OT. This theory has come under heavy fire (see 'History of the Literary Criticism of the Pentateuch', above, pp. 34ff.). Many of the supposed contradictions are obviously not contradictions, and all are fairly contestable. The door is wide open for those who believe that the contents of the OT, when rightly understood, form a harmonious and organic unity. If this belief is correct—if, in other words, it is a soundly grounded principle of theological science—there will be no need to fudge the answers. The established principle will help, not hinder, the finding of answers to the unsolved difficulties. The principle should engender great patience and great honesty when dealing with an intractable problem, and a preparedness to leave it unsolved, if no satisfactory solution can be discovered—for there is plainly no disgrace in admitting one's lack of omniscience, and quite certainly the truth of God can never be promoted by dishonest argument. Christ therefore bids us approach our problem holding fast to the truth of Scripture, but with minds completely open to all possibilities which do not conflict with the inspired utterances of the Spirit.

When we attempt to define with greater precision the biblical doctrine of Scripture (which we stated in general terms in our opening paragraph) we observe two points. First, the purpose of all God-breathed Scripture is 'for teaching, for reproof, for correction, and for training in righteousness, that the man of God may be complete, equipped for every good work' (2 Tim. 3:16). That is to say, the historical details of the Bible are not important for their own sake, but only for the part they play in making known God's ways to men. Thus it is that obscurities in the Bible have never been a bar to a man's understanding of the ways of God, provided he has been willing to know the truth. The central teaching of the Bible has always remained clear, even for those with a bad text and a bad translation. Small divergences in text and occasional divergences of meaning in the translations were of course well known in NT times, but they rightly caused no doubts as to the trustworthiness of the revelation contained in them.

Second, the description of Scripture as 'God-breathed' suggests that the proper basis for detailed, scholarly discussion is the Scriptures as they were originally given. The moment of 'inspiration' was the moment of utterance, when God 'breathed' the Word which was committed to writing. This means two things: first, that the best text is that closest to the original. (It is the textual critic's task to try to determine which of the small variants are most likely to have been original.) Second, that the text in the original language is to be preferred to that in the translations. A translation, ancient or modern, may of course be useful in bringing out some particular aspect of the original, and a modern expositor (like the writers of the NT) may quote from a translation without in any way impugning the ultimate authority of the original.

This then gives us three principles on which to approach the subject of the authorship of the Pentateuch. 1. We are not bound by tradition. 2. We are bound by the text of Scripture as originally given, in so far as this may be determined. 3. We are aware of a measure of corruption in the transmission of the text, which does not vitiate the revelation of the Pentateuch, but which must be taken into account when evaluating the evidence for authorship in detail.

The Pentateuch, when considered as a whole or as five distinct books, is in fact anonymous. Certain passages are said to have been originally written by Moses (Ex. 17:14; 24:4; 34:28; Nu. 33:2; Dt. 31:9, 22, 24), but nowhere is it said that Moses was the author of a complete book. We are not therefore bound by the ancient Jewish tradition, either in its more extreme form (espoused even by Josephus and Philo) which said that Moses wrote the whole Pentateuch, including a (prophetic) account of his own death and of the events immediately following; or in its more moderate form (mentioned in the Talmud) which said that Moses wrote everything except the concluding section of Deuteronomy, which was written by Joshua.

There seem in fact to be other post-Mosaic elements in the Pentateuch besides its ending. In this respect Deuteronomy stands somewhat apart from the other books. In Genesis–Numbers there is remarkably little that can be claimed with any assurance as even probably post-Mosaic, and less that can be regarded as demonstrably post-Mosaic; but there is enough to show that the traditional Jewish solution is somewhat too simple. In Gn. 14:14 there is mention of the city of Dan, which got its name from the Danites who later conquered it (Jos. 19:47; Jdg. 18:29). In Gn. 36:31ff. we are given a list of Edomite kings 'who reigned in the land of Edom, before any king reigned over the Israelites'. Ex. 16:35: 'The people of Israel ate the manna forty years, till they came to a habitable land; they ate the manna, till they came to the border of the land of Canaan' could have been added to the account of the early journeyings by Moses just before his death, but it looks more like an editorial comment. Then there is the noteworthy saying: 'The man Moses was very meek, more than all men that were on the face of the earth' (Nu. 12:3). It could be argued that this was the unself-conscious remark of a man of supreme humility, but to most people it looks like the remark of an editor. Probably the same could be said of Ex. 11:3: 'The man Moses was very great in the land of Egypt.'

The problem of the very large numbers poses a further question, but this concerns transmission of the text, rather than authorship. I have dealt with this matter at length in Tyndale Bulletin, 18, 1967, pp. 19ff., 'Large Numbers in the Old Testament'. I have there argued that figures in the tribal censuses in Nu. 1 and 26 are made up by the erroneous adding together of the number of 'allûpîm (fully-armed soldiers) and the number of mē'ôṯ (fighting units of roughly a hundred men). The former, wrongly vocalized as 'alāpîm (thousands), were added to the latter (which for the various tribes ranged between twelve and twenty-seven 'hundreds', i.e. one 'eleph two mē'ôṯ and two 'elāpîm seven mē'ôṯ), to give the present numbers. On this reckoning the Israelite fighting force would have numbered about 18,000 and the whole migration about 72,000. The census lists and a number of other numerical problems all presuppose a stage where the figures presented considerable difficulty to readers and where deliberate attempts were made to restore them to order. But such attempts at correction, though made long after the time of Moses, in no way point to a post-Mosaic original.

Some entirely committed conservatives like G. C. Aalders (A Short Introduction to the Pentateuch, 1949, p. 107) think that they can identify other post-Mosaic passages, such as Nu. 21:14f.; 32:34ff. These could be post-Mosaic, but they are too uncertain to have any evidential value in determining the date of authorship. At most their late date could be regarded as a reasonable possibility once a post-Mosaic date for the compilation of the book had been established on other grounds.

It is clear from this that there is not enough demonstrably late material in Genesis–Numbers to demand post-Mosaic authorship. With documents which were both national records and the tôrâ for religious instruction, it is only to be expected that in the course of 1,000 years there might be the modernizing of an archaic name, the bringing up to date of a genealogical list, the slipping in of an explanatory comment or the attempt to clear up textual obscurities. Aalders argued from Gn. 36:31 that the final revision of the Pentateuch must be dated in the monarchy, and from the evidence of the use of the Pentateuch in Jdg. 1–16 (which must be dated before the capture of Jerusalem; see Jdg. 1:21), not later than the seventh year of King David's reign. He is cautious as to how great a part was played by Moses and how great a part by later contributors, but he seems to incline to the view that the latter had an inspired and creative role, and that their additions were more than just interpretative glosses. But in fairness it needs to be recognized how few in fact are the demonstrably post-Mosaic elements, and how unwise it would be to build a weighty historical argument upon them.

When we turn to Deuteronomy, however, the case is somewhat different. There the claim is explicitly made that the bulk of the material was put into writing by Moses. 'When Moses had finished writing the words of this law in a book, to the very end' (31:24), he committed it to the care of the Levites, who were to keep it beside the ark of the covenant. His instructions, couched in 'I' and 'we' language, retain their original hortatory form. But in Deuteronomy, as we have it now, there is unquestionably post-Mosaic editing, notably in the concluding chapters and presumably in the introduction (1:1–5) and in some of the explanatory notes and remarks (2:10–12, 20–23; 3:9, 11; 4:45–49). It is indeed attractive to suppose that all (or almost all) of the passages where Moses is referred to in the third person are by an independent narrator, though there is nothing unusual about an author writing of himself in the third person. The narrator writes as one who actually observed the events he records and there is nothing said by him which need have been written long after Moses' death. Yet, in spite of the Talmudic tradition, he could hardly have been Joshua, since Joshua would probably not have described himself as 'full of the spirit of wisdom' (34:9).

If we are to do justice to the explicit statements of the OT, there are two main options open to us. We can place the writing up of the Mosaic and pre-Mosaic materials in the early monarchy. Apart from the numerical difficulties we can accept the Pentateuch virtually as it stands, without the intrusion of any glosses, as an anonymous work written in the days of Saul or David. Alternatively, we can regard Genesis–Numbers as the work of Moses which has undergone a tiny handful of minor modifications during the course of its transmission, and Deuteronomy as his farewell discourses, committed to writing by Moses himself, but written up by a narrator somewhat later, during the time of Joshua's leadership.

I should wish to argue for the latter, on the ground that Mosaic authorship best explains both its superlative qualities and its apparent deficiencies. No sense can be made of the history of the world unless Moses is recognized, not only as a historical figure, but as one of the greatest figures of all time. It can be safely said that the appearance in the world of the ethical monotheism of Judaism represents the most far-reaching influence in the whole history of mankind. Out of Judaism arose Christianity and Islam, and (indirectly) science and (pervertedly) Communism. This, the greatest effect in the life of man, demands a great cause. It demands a genius. It demands that we see Moses as perhaps the supreme genius of all time.

It is true that the other historical books of the Bible are great literature and that we have no certain knowledge of their authorship, but the Pentateuch—and Genesis in particular—is unique. With artless simplicity the foundation of the whole Judaeo-Christian biblical tradition is laid. As F. D. Kidner says: 'If its chief architect was not Moses, it was evidently a man of comparable stature' (Genesis, TOTC, 1967, p. 16). But where is a man of comparable stature to be found? Moses not only had immense natural gifts, but he was the one 'whom the Lord knew face to face' (Dt. 34:10). Living on the borderland between the sophisticated culture of Egypt and the profound simplicity of the Israelite faith, he had opportunities granted to no other man. In the furnace of affliction in Egypt, he meditated deeply on the medley of traditions which were current, either in literary or in oral form, among the Israelite people. He was able to sort true from false and relevant from irrelevant till there formed in his mind a crystal-clear picture of the one, true, living God, who had chosen Israel as His covenant people. Genesis represents the essence of Mosaic religion and the foundation of the religion of the whole Bible.

Mosaic authorship explains not only its content, but its style. In a thoughtful article, 'The Glosses in the Book of Genesis and the J E Theory' (Exp T, 67, 1956, p. 333), M. S. Seale tells how, in the course of translating Genesis into colloquial Arabic, he was struck by the frequent use of synonyms and glosses. Why? 'Out of sheer necessity. He is writing for a people and a nation plus a mixed multitude (Ex. 12:38 and Nu. 11:4); but the peoples are themselves a great mixture: they are of bedouin origin, Aramaean domicile, Egyptian upbringing, and Canaanite connections. Glosses and explanations, plus an extensive use of words taken from Arabic, Akkadian, Aramaic and Egyptian, are for such people an absolute necessity.'

Genesis is a unity, summarizing the divine revelation prior to the time of Moses. Leviticus, being essentially a handbook for the priests, is a unity. Deuteronomy, the Second Law, is also a unity. Exodus and Numbers, however, do not look like the work of a tidy-minded editor. They are made up of a somewhat heterogeneous collection of laws and history and do not betray the same obvious unity of conception. It is easier to see them as the virtually unedited memoirs of Moses, which later generations did not feel at liberty to tamper with, than to see them as a careful composition of the monarchy period. It is best to suppose that all the documents were committed to the care of the high priest, along with the Deuteronomic law, which was to be read to the assembled Israelites every 7 years (Dt. 31:9ff.). Perhaps, as G. T. Manley suggested (The Book of the Law, 1957, p. 162), it was the high priest Eleazar himself who prepared Deuteronomy for public reading. The discourses of Moses could not be read in the first person without explanation, and it would be very natural for the elderly leader in preparing his script to add his own comments and reminiscences. (How naturally would the strange parenthesis in Dt. 10:6–9 be accounted for.)

But these details are trivia. The towering figure of Moses is the key to the history and to the literature.

J. W. WENHAM

The poetry of the Old Testament

The poetry of the Bible is not restricted to those books which we usually distinguish as 'the poetical books'—Job, Psalms, the Song of Solomon and Lamentations, with the versified wisdom of Proverbs and Ecclesiastes. A great part of the books of the Prophets consists of prophetical oracles in poetic form; and here and there throughout the historical narrative we come upon longer or shorter passages of poetry. These are sometimes said to be derived from collections of poetry such as the 'Book of the Wars of Yahweh' (Nu. 21:14) or the 'Book of Jashar' (Jos. 10:13; 2 Sa. 1:18; 1 Ki. 8:12f., LXX). Some writers have gone further, like Eduard Sievers, who in his Metrische Studien (1901–7) traced the elements of an earlier poetical form beneath the prose narratives of such books as Genesis and Samuel (in a manner comparable to the attempt of some classical scholars to detect the elements of Saturnian metre beneath the earlier books of Livy's Roman History). But the results of such a study are too disputable to be included in this brief survey.

The NT, too, has a greater poetical element than is often realized. The five canticles of Luke's nativity narrative are well known, but the prologue of John is probably also based on a Christian hymn. The researches in particular of John Jebb, Bishop of Limerick (Sacred Literature, 1820), and C. F. Burney (The Poetry of our Lord, 1925) have shown how many of the sayings of Jesus were cast in the established forms of Hebrew poetry. Not only did this ensure their being easily memorized, but, 'since Jesus appeared to His contemporaries as a prophet, and prophets were accustomed to give oracles in verse, it is credible that we have here something approaching His ipsissima verba' (C. H. Dodd, History and the Gospel, 1938, pp. 89f.).

The NT Epistles, too, seem to contain some fragments of poetry: early Christian canticles probably underlie the Christological passages in Phil. 2:6ff. and Col. 1:15ff., the quotation Awake, O sleeper . . . in Eph. 5:14 (from a primitive baptismal hymn?) and the summary of the mystery of our religion in 1 Tim. 3:16, to mention no more. Then the last book of the NT is full of canticles, but there is no space here to discuss 'the metrics of Revelation—a fascinating subject which must be left to future investigators' (C. C. Torrey, Documents of the Primitive Church, 1941, p. 212).

Poetical forms

The two distinctive features of biblical poetry are rhythm of thought and rhythm of sound. Rhythm of sound we are familiar with in most European poetry, where it commonly appears in a regular pattern of accented and unaccented syllables in the line or group of lines, and also in the form of rhyme. In the poetry of biblical Hebrew, rhythm of sound depends almost entirely on the regular pattern of accented syllables. It is undecided whether the number of unaccented syllables in the line played any significant part in early Hebrew poetry (as it did in some other early Semitic poetry), and if so, what. 'The crucial question of Hebrew metrics is the problem of the number of permissible unstressed syllables' (A. Bentzen, Introduction to the Old Testament, i, 1948, p. 121). The sense of satisfaction, however, which our poetry affords by means of rhyme is largely produced in Hebrew poetry by another kind of rhythm altogether—what we have called rhythm of thought or sense. This sense-rhythm is usually known as parallelism, and it appears in early Egyptian, Mesopotamian and Canaanite poetry as well as in Hebrew poetry.

The credit for determining the characteristics of Hebrew poetry belongs largely to two Englishmen—Robert Lowth, Professor of Poetry at Oxford and later Bishop of London, whose epochal Academic Lectures on the Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews were published in Latin in 1753, and a later Oxford scholar, George Buchanan Gray, Professor of Hebrew in Mansfield College, whose work on The Forms of Hebrew Poetry appeared in 1905. More recently H. Kosmala has emphasized the importance of the sequence and balance of sense-units rather than stressed syllables for the rhythm and structure of Hebrew poetry ('Form and Structure in Ancient Hebrew Poetry', VT, XIV, 1964, pp. 423ff.).

Hebrew parallelism takes various forms, which can best be explained by means of actual examples. We have, first, complete parallelism, where a line or distich consists of two 'stichoi', each of which exactly balances the other. Such a distich is

Israel does-not know,
My-people does-not understand (Is. 1:3), where Israel balances my people and does not know balances does not understand. Because the two 'stichoi' are exactly synonymous with each other, each saying the same thing in different words, this form of parallelism is also known as identical parallelism. S. Gevirtz (Patterns in the Early Poetry of Israel, 1963) has shown how the Ugaritic and Hebrew poets had at their disposal a substantial corpus of conventionally-fixed pairs of words (comparable in a way to the permanent epithets of the Greek epic) on which they drew freely for purposes of parallelism.

Another form of complete parallelism is known as antithetic parallelism, because the one 'stichos' gives the obverse of the other. A good example is found in Pr. 15:20:

A-wise son makes-a-glad father but-a-foolish man despises his-mother.

Yet another kind of parallelism is that known as 'emblematic' parallelism, where one 'stichos' makes a statement in literal terms and the other repeats it in figurative terms. This can be done in various ways; a good example is Ps. 103:13:

As-a-father pities his-children,
So-Yahweh pities those-who-fear-him.

Here there are three accented syllables in each 'stichos'. It is apposite here to remark that much of the genius of Hebrew poetry lies in its employment of vivid and concrete similes or metaphors which (like parables, but more briefly) convey truth to the hearer pungently and effectively.

Occasionally the parallelism may be more elaborate, and take an introverted or chiastic form. Ps. 30:8–10 is commonly cited as an example of this:

To-thee, Yahweh, I-cry; and-to-Yahweh I-make-supplication.
What-profit (is there) in-my-blood if-I-go-down to-the-Pit?
Will-the-dust praise-thee? will-it-tell-of thy-faithfulness?
Hear, Yahweh, and-be-gracious-to-me; Yahweh, be a-helper to-me.

Here 'stichos' 1 is paralleled by 'stichos' 4, and 'stichos' 2 by 'stichos' 3, the accentual pattern being 5 : 4 : 4 : 5. A similar but not identical chiasmus appears in the sayings of Jesus, e.g. in Mt. 7:6:

Do not give dogs what is holy;
And do not throw your pearls before swine,
Lest they (the swine) trample them under foot
And they (the dogs) turn to attack you.

Thus far we have quoted examples of complete parallelism, where each unit of thought in one 'stichos' has its counterpart in the other 'stichos', and the parallel 'stichoi' have the same number of accented syllables. But we have also to reckon with incomplete parallelism, where, e.g., one of the units of thought in the former 'stichos' has no counterpart in the latter 'stichos'. Take, e.g., Ps. 1:5:

Therefore-the-wicked will-not-stand in-the-judgment,
Nor-sinners in-the-congregation of-the-righteous.

The verb 'will not stand' in the former 'stichos' has no counterpart in the second 'stichos'. But the number of accented syllables is kept even by the fact that 'judgment' (with one accented syllable) in 'stichos' 1 is balanced by 'congregation of the righteous' (with two accented syllables) in 'stichos' 2. Similarly in Is. 1:3a:

The-ox knows its-owner,
And-the-ass its-master's crib

there is nothing in 'stichos' 2 corresponding to 'knows' in 'stichos' 1, but compensation is made by having two accented syllables, 'its-master's crib', in the second as against one, 'its-owner', in the first. This phenomenon, called by Gray 'incomplete parallelism with compensation', is quite common in biblical poetry. Occasionally the parallelism is so incomplete that we are left with nothing but compensation, and then we have what Lowth called 'synthetic parallelism', but Gray, less ineptly, 'formal parallelism'. It is, in fact, not parallelism at all; there is only sound-rhythm and no thought-rhythm. An example is Ps. 27:6a:

And-now my-head shall-be-lifted-up
Above my-enemies round-about-me.

There we have three accented syllables in each 'stichos', but no parallelism of sense at all.

At other times when the parallelism is incomplete there is no compensation, and thus we get 'stichoi' of unequal length, which can be arranged in regular patterns. One such pattern corresponds roughly to our common metre, where we have alternating 'stichoi' of four and three beats. A good example of this 4 : 3 pattern in the OT is Jeremiah's description of Chaos-come-again (4:23–26):

I-looked-on the-earth, and-lo waste-and-void,
And-the-heavens, and-not their-light;
I-looked-on the-mountains, and-lo they-were-quaking,
And-all the-hills moved-to-and-fro.
I-looked and-lo there-was-no man,
And-all-birds of-the-air had-fled;
I-looked and-lo the-fruitful-land a-desert,
And-all-its-cities laid-in-ruins before-Yahweh.

But a much commoner form of 'incomplete parallelism without compensation' is the 3 : 2 pattern. This pattern has been called the qinâ or 'dirge' metre, ever since Karl Budde first identified it in the book of Lamentations. Compare La. 3:1:

I-am-the-man who-has-seen affliction
Under-the-rod of-his-wrath.

It is by no means confined to this kind of poetry, however; it may serve as the vehicle of joyful trust, as in Ps. 27:1:

Yahweh is-my-light and-my-salvation;
Whom shall-I-fear?
Yahweh is-the-stronghold of-my-life;
Of-whom shall-I-be-afraid?

And C. F. Burney (The Poetry of our Lord, pp. 137ff.) has traced it in several of the sayings of Jesus in the Gospels.

One form of parallelism which we have not mentioned yet is what is called step-parallelism or climactic parallelism; it is found 'where one member (or part of a member) in one line is repeated in the second, and made the starting-point for a fresh step' (T. H. Robinson, The Poetry of the Old Testament, 1947, p. 23). A good example is found in the opening 'stichoi' of Ps. 29, with the step-effect produced by the repeated 'Ascribe to Yahweh'; another is provided by Ps. 92:9—

For-lo, thy-enemies, Yahweh,
For-lo, thy-enemies shall-perish;
All-evildoers shall-be-scattered—which is of special interest because it shows so close a similarity in form to a passage from the Baal epic discovered among the Ras Shamra tablets (C. H. Gordon, Ugaritic Handbook, Text 68, lines 8f.):

Lo thy-enemies O-Baal,
Lo thy-enemies thou-shalt-slay,
Lo thou-shalt-destroy thy-foes.

W. F. Albright refers to this parallel in The Archaeology of Palestine, 1960, p. 232. On the same page he quotes a tristich from the Aqhat or Dan'el epic which in language rather than form reminds one of Ps. 21:4:

Ask-thou life Aqhat my-boy,
Ask-thou life and-I'll-give-it-thee,
Life-immortal and-I'll-grant-it-thee.

The passage from Ps. 92:9 is noteworthy not only as an example of step-parallelism but also because the pattern takes the form of a tristich and not a distich. The rhythmical scheme is 3 : 3 : 3. Another tristich pattern occurs in Ps. 24:7–10:

Lift-up, O-gates, your-heads,
And-lift-up, O-doors of-eternity,
And-shall-enter the-king of-glory . . .

Here we have a set of four tristichs, forming two short strophes.

The presence of strophes in biblical poetry has been much discussed, and certainly a strophic arrangement can be detected here and there. A repeated refrain is good evidence for a strophic arrangement. Such a refrain we get in Pss. 42 and 43 (originally one psalm), showing that the strophes end respectively at vv. 5 and 11 of Ps. 42 and v. 5 of Ps. 43. Another example is the oracle in Is. 9:8 – 10:4 (with Is. 5:25ff.), with its refrain: 'For all this his anger is not turned away and his hand is stretched out still.' Further examples of strophic arrangement have been recognized in the sayings of Jesus.

Strophic arrangement is also involved in the acrostic schemes sometimes found in biblical poetry; thus in a purely formal way Ps. 119 inevitably consists of twenty-two strophes of eight 'distichs' each.

Non-biblical parallels

We have already quoted parallels between certain poetical passages from the OT and passages from the Canaanite poems discovered at Ras Shamra. The decipherment and study of the Ras Shamra documents (which are dated c. 1400 BC) have thrown a great deal of light on the circumstances of early Semitic poetry. For one thing, these documents have completely falsified Gunkel's theory that the longer poetical passages in the Bible are relatively late, since (as he thought) a ballad period of considerable duration came first. The Baal epic discovered at Ras Shamra, e.g., had not less than 5,000 lines. That the Song of Deborah (Jdg. 5) is practically simultaneous with the incidents it celebrates (c. 1150 BC) has been generally agreed, but one can trace a tendency now, under the impact of the Ras Shamra evidence, to agree that other poems to which the Bible ascribes an early date do in fact belong to the period in which the Bible places them. Albright argues, e.g., that in their original forms such poems as the Song of Miriam in Ex. 15 and the oracles of Balaam in Nu. 23–24 may well have been composed in the 13th century BC. (The Archaeology of Palestine, 1960, pp. 232f.; 'The Oracles of Balaam', JBL, LXIII, 1944, pp. 207ff.).

Among other contacts between biblical and non-biblical poetry we should note in particular the numerous resemblances between Ps. 104 and the Egyptian king Akhnaton's Hymn to Aton (c. 1377–1360 BC). But alongside all these and other resemblances we must mark the divergences; the stamp of Israel's covenant-monotheism imparts a basic religious uniqueness to all the poetry (as to all the prose) of the OT.

Text and exegesis

Attempts are commonly made to emend the text of poetical parts of the OT to make them conform to some metrical scheme. In view of the wide variation of metrical arrangements which present themselves to us, however, this is a criterion for establishing the text which should be used with great caution. As it is, one scholar's emendations based on this principle rarely win the approval of other scholars. It may be conceded that where we have an almost complete alphabetic acrostic we can be reasonably sure that it was originally complete, but that in itself does not guarantee that any particular emendation aimed at restoring the complete acrostic is the right one. As for restoring the original text by regard to the number of accented syllables in the 'stichoi' of a poetical passage, we have given an example above of this procedure, in the citation from Je. 4:23–26. The closing words of the passage as we have it in the received text ('before his fierce anger') were omitted from our citation, as they could not be accommodated to the 4 : 3 metre and were therefore treated for the moment as a prose expansion. But there is no assurance that the passage did in fact originally conform entirely to the 4 : 3 pattern.

On the other hand, a recognition of the basic forms of biblical poetry, particularly the forms of parallelism, makes an important contribution to accurate interpretation. It wili prevent us, for example, from thinking that an author is making two separate statements when he is actually saying the same thing twice.

But what we should emphasize above everything else is that the study of these poetical forms, whatever its limitations may be, and into whatever other fields it may lead us, is primarily important because of such help as it can give us in understanding the text of Scripture better. 'After all', as T. H. Robinson reminds us in his study of this subject (The Poetry of the Old Testament, p. 46), 'it is sound exegesis which should be the final aim of all other branches of Biblical study'—and therefore of this branch too.

F. F. BRUCE

The wisdom literature of the Old Testament

The canonical wisdom literature of the OT consists of the books of Job, Proverbs and Ecclesiastes, together with a number of Psalms, e.g. Pss. 4; 10; 14; 19; 37; 49; 73; 90; 112 and the 'Prayer of Habakkuk' (Hab. 3). In the Apocrypha, wisdom literature is represented chiefly by the book of Ecclesiasticus (The Wisdom of Jesus ben-Sira, written in Hebrew c. 180 BC and translated into Greek by the author's grandson in 132 BC) and the book of Wisdom (probably written by an Alexandrian Jew early in the 1st century BC or AD). The book of Baruch (especially 3:9 – 4:4, where wisdom is identified with the law) and 4 Maccabees (which presents the Maccabean martyrdoms as examples of the triumph of right reason over human passsions) have also their contribution to make to the wisdom literature of the Apocrypha. In the NT the Epistle of James might well be classified as a 'wisdom book'.

The practical wisdom of the ancients takes the form first of popular proverbs (Heb. māšāl, plural mᵉšālîm) which express in pithy terms certain observed regularities, whether in the external world of nature or in human behaviour ('A red sky at night is the shepherd's delight'; 'There are none so deaf as those who will not hear', and the like). A more developed form is the riddle or parable. The riddle of Samson (Jdg. 14:12ff.), the fables of Jotham (Jdg. 9:7ff.) and Jehoash (2 Ki. 14:9) and the parables of Nathan (2 Sa. 12:1–4) and the wise woman of Tekoa (2 Sa. 14:4–7) come to mind as well-known examples; the parable, of course, reaches its perfection in the Gospels.

A further stage is reached when men begin to reflect upon the phenomena of nature and life, and come to realize that the popular generalizations are very often inadequate to cover all the facts. Problems like the suffering of the righteous and the meaning of life engage men's thoughts and are grappled with in such works as Job, Ecclesiastes and the Problem Psalms.

True wisdom (Heb. ḥokmâ) to the Hebrew thinkers was not simply intellectual speculation. It was practical in the best sense: it had a very real moral and religious content. 'The fear of Yahweh is the beginning of wisdom'; the truly wise man (Heb. ḥākām) is he who views all life in a spirit of reverence towards God. Contrariwise the fool (Heb. nābāl) is the man devoid of moral and religious sensibilities; when he says in his heart, 'There is no God', he is not being a 'free-thinker' but behaving as if there were no God.

The wisdom literature of the OT is not something by itself. It is rather the expression of a moral and intellectual movement dating very early in the history of Hebrew religion and paralleled outside Israel. The wisdom books tell the story of earnest seekers after truth, who wrestled with problems both old and new. In the quest after reality we are indebted to thinkers of all races. The OT bears ample witness to the pursuit of wisdom by Israel's neighbours. Thus in 1 Ki. 4:30f. Solomon's wisdom is said to have 'surpassed the wisdom of all the people of the east, and all the wisdom of Egypt. For he was wiser than all other men, wiser than Ethan the Ezrahite, and Heman, Calcol, and Darda, the sons of Mahol'. In Ob. 8 we have Yahweh's warning, 'Will I not on that day . . . destroy the wise men out of Edom, and understanding out of Mount Esau?', with which may be compared Je. 49:7: 'Is wisdom no more in Teman? Has counsel perished from the prudent? Has their wisdom vanished?'

There is nothing surprising in finding the observed generalizations of everyday experience repeated in the proverbial lore of many nations. 'Even a fool who keeps silent is considered wise; when he closes his lips, he is deemed intelligent' (Pr. 17:28). That is something which most people have observed, and we do not think of borrowing in either direction when we find the same proverb in Sanskrit literature in this form: 'Even a fool, covered with fine clothes, is fair in the assembly up to a point; yea a fool is fair so long as he utters no word.'

But it is not simply in these generalizations that we can trace similarities to biblical wisdom. We might profitably consider the significance of the fact that it is only in its wisdom literature that the Hebrew Bible canonizes the utterances of non-Israelites. Job and his friends are given an Edomite setting in birth and residence; and to the Israelite wisdom of Proverbs are appended collections of sayings by sages of Massa in N Arabia (Pr. 30:1 – 31:9).

Egypt, Mesopotamia and (at a later period) Greece provide us with further parallels. In Egypt, e.g., we have Imhotep—priest, physician and architect—famed as the author of proverbs as early as the opening years of the IIIrd Dynasty (c. 2700 BC), while two or three centuries later the maxims of Ptahhotep constitute, as J. H. Breasted put it, 'the earliest formulation of right conduct to be found in any literature' (The Dawn of Conscience, 1935, p. 129). The downfall of the Old Kingdom (c. 2200 BC) inspired other sages with a more pessimistic view of life, as they reflected on the vanity of material fortune; but one of these, Ipuwer, looks beyond the present evils to the advent of a righteous king who will bring rest to men as a shepherd to his sheep and who is described in terms not unlike those of Ps. 72 and some other Messianic passages of the OT (cf. E. J. Young, My Servants the Prophets, 1952, pp. 200ff.).

The closest approximation that Egypt shows to biblical wisdom literature, however, is in the sayings of Amenemope, a wise man of the XXIst Dynasty (c. 1150–930 BC). Amenemope was more or less contemporary with Solomon, and his Wisdom presents some remarkable parallels to the book of Proverbs, especially to Pr. 22:17 – 23:12. In one place, indeed, Amenemope's Wisdom has been thought to illuminate the text of the biblical book, namely in Pr. 22:20, where the Hebrew word š-l-šwm may be vocalized not šālîšîm ('excellent things', so AV and RV following Qᵉrē) nor šilšôm ('heretofore', so RV mg. following Kᵉṯîḇ), but šᵉlôšîm ('thirty', so RSV). Amenemope's Wisdom consists of thirty sections, and in one place it refers to them in the words: 'Consider these thirty chapters.' The verse in Proverbs is therefore held to be a parallel ('Have I not written for you thirty sayings of admonition and knowledge?'). But the amended vocalization is not certain, and in any case there are other ways of accounting for the undoubtedly striking parallels than by the supposition of direct borrowing either way.

To some of the other forms of wisdom literature in the Bible we find parallels more readily offered by Mesopotamia. The problem of the righteous sufferer, which finds classic expression in the book of Job, was treated in several Mesopotamian works, but notably in the composition called Ludlul bel nemeqi ('I will praise the lord of wisdom'). It describes the case of a man whose fortunes were very similar to Job's, although the treatment is much inferior to that of the Hebrew book. The pessimistic strain in Ecclesiastes, again, seems to echo passages from the Gilgamesh Epic and from the Dialogue of Pessimism in which a Babylonian master and his slave conclude that no values exist—in short, that all is vanity.

Such pessimism is not restricted to any one age or country; and some of the most striking parallels to Ecclesiastes are to be found in the writings of Greek thinkers like Theognis (c. 500 BC). Many of these parallels have been collected by H. Ranston in Ecclesiastes and the Early Greek Wisdom Literature, 1925, but here again we should not be too hasty in assuming that the very considerable similarity in thought and expression implies direct literary dependence. Like causes produce like effects all over the world. Wisdom lore, whether written or unwritten, is not only the fruit of experience but presupposes that experience is not illusory, but that it provides valid evidence enabling us to reach certain conclusions about human life and the world in general.

'The Wisdom Literature of both Egypt and Mesopotamia', wrote Sir Frederic Kenyon, 'goes back to much earlier periods than the corresponding Hebrew books. The Hebrew writers were engaging in a kind of literature common to Eastern countries, and were no doubt influenced by the productions current in the countries to east and west of them; but their writings are not direct copies. They are original compositions in the same vein, and in their best portions, such as the praise of Wisdom as the mouthpiece of God, they reach a higher plane of thought and of emotional expression than their neighbours and predecessors' (The Reading of the Bible, 1944, p. 52).

In spite of numerous similarities, the Hebrew wisdom literature bears unmistakable features which distinguish it from the wisdom literature of other nations. These distinctive features are the product of the unique revelatory character of Hebrew religion, with its emphasis on one living and true God. Wisdom in the biblical literature is divine wisdom; in the deepest things of human need the clearest and surest light comes from the nation to which God chose to make Himself known. The 'words of the wise' which correspond to the Wisdom of Amenemope are spoken or recorded in order 'that your trust may be in the Lord' (Pr. 22:19). OT wisdom, in fact, is closely related to other manifestations of Israel's covenant faith.

The OT knows a narrative form of wisdom literature (cf. Ec. 9:13–16) exemplified particularly in the motif of the loyal son of Israel who, banished from home through no fault of his own, succeeds by wisdom in attaining high honour in a foreign land in face of malice and envy. This motif appears as early as the story of Joseph, 'a man . . . in whom is the Spirit of God' (Gn. 41:38), and is specially common in the exilic and post-exilic age, as in the records of Daniel, in whom were found 'light and understanding and wisdom, like the wisdom of the gods' (Dn. 5:11), of Mordecai, whose careful forethought procured his advancement to be next in rank to Xerxes and who 'sought the welfare of his people and spoke peace to all his people' (Est. 10:3), and (outside the Hebrew Bible) of Tobit and Ahiqar. Daniel, in fact, belongs almost as much to wisdom literature as to apocalyptic; the close association between wisdom and apocalyptic which it displays (cf. 12:10, 'those who are wise shall understand') persists for long; cf. Rev. 13:18, where the decoding of the number of the beast 'calls for wisdom'.

The Hebrew wisdom movement was closely associated with Solomon, who became the royal patron of the school, and whose name continued to be attached to wisdom literature well into the Christian era (cf. the 2nd-century AD Odes of Solomon). 'Historical probability combines with trustworthy tradition in ascribing to the period of Solomon's reign a remarkable development of the national character. This was manifested in the various departments of commerce, art and literature, in all that we call civilization; and whatever the extent of Solomon's extant writings, over and above those Proverbs which "the men of Hezekiah, king of Judah", copied out, it is clear that it is from his time that the strain of teaching known by the specific name of "Wisdom" takes its rise and derives much of its character' (W. T. Davison, The Wisdom-Literature of the Old Testament, 1894, pp. 12f.). Thus Solomon may be called the father of Hebrew wisdom literature, although, as it has been said, there was no lack of non-literary Hebrew wisdom before his time.

The establishment of the united monarchy marked the beginning of an age of cultural 'enlightenment' in Israel. There were wise men at David's court, notably Ahithophel, whose counsel was 'as if one consulted the oracle of God' (2 Sa. 16:23), and Nathan, whose official designation is 'Nathan the prophet' but who admonishes David in the parabolic fashion of the sage (2 Sa. 12:1ff.). The genre of the 'court chronicle' at the courts of David and Solomon attained a distinction (2 Sa. 9–20) never to be surpassed in Hebrew literature. Solomon himself, over and above his practical shrewdness, is credited with a comprehensive knowledge of natural history and with the authorship of many wise sayings and songs; his reputation for 'wisdom' excited the curiosity of distant rulers and sages (1 Ki. 3:16ff.; 4:29ff.; 10:1ff.).

In addition to royal wisdom, there was a vigorous tradition of popular or 'clan' wisdom in Israel, reflections of which may be recognized here and there throughout the OT (cf. the proverbial reputation of the wisdom of the city of Abel, 2 Sa. 20:18), and especially in the prophets. The influence of such traditional wisdom in Amos has been pointed out by H. W. Wolff (Amos' geistige Heimat, 1964); Hosea, Isaiah, Jeremiah and Habakkuk provide further examples (cf. D. A. Hubbard, 'The Wisdom Movement and Israel's Covenant Faith', Tyndale Bulletin, 17, 1966, pp. 3ff.).

That the sage stood alongside the prophet and priest in popular estimation as a mediator of divine truth is suggested by the language of Jeremiah's enemies in Je. 18:18: 'the law shall not perish from the priest, nor counsel from the wise, nor the word from the prophet.' The wise men (Heb. ḥ^{a}ḵāmîm) transmitted their 'wisdom' from generation to generation; they had their schools, disciples, doctrines and collections of sayings (cf. Pr. 1:6; 24:23; Ec. 9:17; 12:11f.). But, while priest, sage and prophet had each his own function and method of communication, we should not erect impenetrable barriers between the three categories as though there could be no overlapping between them.

The practical relevance of wisdom for daily life is set forth in the various collections brought together in the book of Proverbs. God, it is insisted, is a righteous God; His world is a moral world, marked by temporal reward for righteousness and temporal retribution for wickedness or folly. The more poignant and intractable problems of life lie beyond the horizon of Proverbs. 'Proverbs seems to say, "Here are the rules for life; try them and find that they will work". Job and Ecclesiastes say, "We did, and they don't" ' (D. A. Hubbard, art. cit., p. 6).

The book of Job presents the climax of a long process of grappling with these pressing problems. Earlier products of this process are the Problem Psalms. Two types are discernible in these poems and are quite characteristic of the whole school. There is the calmer philosophical type (Pss. 14; 19; 90) which contemplates the godless world made by a good God, the glory of the cosmos and the conscience and the mystery of mortal yet immortal man. Here the soul of man stands naked in the presence of the great and grim realities of life. Again, there is the type where the sage wrestles with doubt, his pulse agitated by fear (Pss. 10; 37; 49; 73). As the psalmist considers the boastful wicked, he cries out in distress: 'Why dost thou stand afar off, O Lord? Why dost thou hide thyself in times of trouble?' The prosperity of the evil-doers and the adversity of the righteous are recurring themes in the ḥokmî literature. Nor are the problems left suspended in mid air. A good way is travelled towards solution. Ps. 37 answers, 'The prosperity of the wicked does not last.' Ps. 49 declares, 'Death brings the evildoer to condign punishment.' Ps. 73 concludes more positively that 'true prosperity belongs alone to the godly'.

The book of Job propounds two crucial questions: 1. Will a man serve God for God's sake alone? (i.e. is there such a thing as purely disinterested goodness?) and 2. Why should an innocent man suffer? The traditional answer to the second question is first given by Job's three friends, that sin and suffering are invariably wedded together. The divine principle of the moral government of the universe is retribution. Sin and suffering are without exception cause and effect. To repudiate this hard truth, not in its essence but in its inflexible incidence, Elihu is introduced into the argument. He advances with the solution that suffering is not penal but disciplinary, not given to punish but sent to profit. The teaching goes a stage further when Job comes into the divine presence and contents himself that the answer rests with God and all is well.

Qoheleth (Ecclesiastes, perhaps meaning 'the arguer') has the form of a 'royal testament'; it corrects in its doctrine the materialism, fatalism and pessimism of its age. The three ways essayed in its day and all down the generations are exposed in all their futility as answers to the problems of 'how to be happy in the world as it is'—the ways of knowledge, pleasure, and the power of money. The teaching of the book is that there is one way, the way of wisdom—albeit a cautious and unambitious wisdom which is content with the satisfaction of a day's work well done and the enjoyment of plain food and drink when one has thus acquired an appetite for them, together with the pleasures of family life. With these, one should be thankful for small mercies; the world is too full of injustice, the future too uncertain and death too final for a man to set his hopes too high, for all the 'eternity' that has been planted in his heart.

In all their attempts to deal with the most persistent problems of life, the wisdom books do not call in a new world to redress the balance of the old. The examination is restricted almost entirely within the limits of the present earthly life. Only when we come to the relatively late book of Wisdom do we find the doctrine of immortality freely invoked.

The concept of divine wisdom played no small part in preparing the way for the coming of Christ. In the Synoptic Gospels Jesus appears as a 'greater than Solomon' (Mt. 12:42; Lk. 11:31); in them, as also in the Fourth Gospel, He speaks on occasion in the role of wisdom (cf. Mt. 11:28ff. with Ecclus. 51:23–27, which is dependent in its turn on the invitation of wisdom in Pr. 8:4–21). Behind the Logos doctrine of the Johannine prologue we can see the personified wisdom of OT times, portrayed especially in the famous passage in Pr. 8:22ff. where wisdom sits as God's assessor at the creation of the world. In this and other ways the wisdom movement led on to the advent of Him 'whom God made our wisdom'. The wisdom books, when illuminated by the incarnation of Jesus Christ and viewed accordingly in the light of their end, may be accepted as setting the stage for the personal wisdom of God who declares 'I am the way, and the truth, and the life'—the final solution of the problems of man and the world.

The apocryphal and apocalyptic literature

THE TERM APOCRYPHA

The noun 'Apocrypha' normally designates those books which are contained in the Latin Vulgate but which are not in the Hebrew OT. Their presence in the Vulgate is due to their inclusion, with the exception of 2 Esdras, in the Greek translation of the OT, the Septuagint (LXX), which was the source of the Latin version of these books. It is commonly asserted that this fact shows that the Greek-speaking Jews of Alexandria gave them full canonicity, and that the primitive church, which took over the Greek Bible, did likewise. The books in question are largely of Palestinian origin and were mainly written in Hebrew or Aramaic; they were popular both in Palestine and in the Dispersion but seem to have been put on a different plane from the canonical Scriptures in all places. C. C. Torrey, accordingly, considers that the best equivalent of the term 'Apocrypha' is the 'outside' books.

Though this is a good equivalent it is not the literal meaning of apokryphos. The Greek term means 'hidden' and was applied to books which were kept from the public eye and allowed to be read only by a privileged circle. Far from being an opprobrious term, therefore, it connotes the special value of the books so described. It seems to have been so applied to the works of the Jewish seers who were especially active between the 2nd century BC and the 1st century AD. These writings were issued under the name of ancient heroes and prophets of Israel and were kept hidden until those days; even so, they were not for the public but for those worthy to read them. 2 Esdras 14 relates how Ezra dictated to five scribes ninety-four books, twenty-four of which were the OT writings (the Minor Prophets being considered as one book) and seventy being for 'the wise among your people. For in them is the spring of understanding, the fountain of wisdom, and the river of knowledge' (14:46, 47).

This shows not only that these books were valued 'above' the OT, but that the apocrypha here included much more than those books comprising our collection; they were rather the apocalyptic books of the same order as 2 Esdras itself.

Origen uses the term 'apocrypha' to designate the apocalyptic works, while he regarded our collection of 'apocrypha' as canonical. It was Jerome, in his Prologus Galeatus to 1 and 2 Samuel, who first used the term of those books which we commonly call 'apocryphal', i.e. those which other early Christian writers called ecclesiastical, or suitable for reading in church. The truth of the matter appears to be that the apocrypha, in the sense of the outside books, were at first regarded as constituting all sacred books not in the Canon; some were more popular than others, and the more popular ones have come down to us in the Latin Vulgate; but the so-called 'pseudepigrapha' (i.e. the books issued under the name of an ancient writer) were also highly valued in many circles and ought not to be regarded as apart from the others. For this reason it would almost seem desirable to let the term 'apocrypha' suffice to cover all the books which are included in the phrase 'Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha'. Torrey has adopted this procedure in his book The Apocryphal Literature, 1945.

THE BOOKS UNDER REVIEW

The following is a brief characterization of the books of the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha.

The Apocrypha proper

1 Esdras contains most of the material found in the canonical Ezra, but prefaces it by reproducing 2 Ch. 35:1 – 36:21 and adds the account of Ezra's reading of the law recorded in Ne. 8 (with the omission of Nehemiah's name). It is a variant Greek version of that part of the Chronicler's work which it covers—perhaps preserving the original LXX rendering. It includes the story of the three courtiers, one of whom is said to be Zerubbabel, at the feast of Darius—the original source of the proverb, 'Great is truth, and strongest of all!' (1 Esdras 4:41). 2 Esdras is a 1st-century AD apocalypse put into the mouth of Ezra, in some respects the most tragic of all apocalypses.

Tobit is a romantic story telling how his piety in burying the untended dead was rewarded in his latter days, and how his son Tobias gained a wife; it was probably written at the end of the 3rd century BC. Hebrew and Aramaic fragments have been found at Qumran. Judith is another piece of elevating fiction, narrating how she delivered her city from the Assyrian army; it may have come from the Maccabean age, c. 150 BC. The Additions to the Book of Esther consist of material which is supplemental to the canonical book, such as prayers and decrees mentioned during the story; they were meant to add a religious element to the book.

The Wisdom of Solomon is often felt to be the loftiest production of the intertestamental period; it is the work of a Greek-speaking Jew of Alexandria, a good example of Jewish wisdom-writing, and it especially dwells on the theme of retribution and the folly of idol-worship. The date of composition has been put variously between 150 BC and AD 40. Ecclesiasticus, often called 'The Wisdom of Jesus ben-Sira', is a similar work to the foregoing, but is a Sadducean writing and, despite the years of reflection and experience of the author, is of more slender spirituality than the former work; it was issued c. 180 BC in Hebrew, and translated into Greek by the author's grandson c. 132 BC.

Baruch, with The Letter of Jeremiah, is a composite book, mainly directed against idolatry. The former may have been composed in the 3rd century BC, the latter in the 2nd century BC. Of the additions to Daniel there are three, all later than the original work: The History of Susanna tells how the youth Daniel displayed his wisdom in vindicating an innocent woman who had been condemned to death (hence the proverb, 'A Daniel come to judgment'); The Prayer of Azariah and The Song of the Three Young Men are represented as having been uttered in the fiery furnace; Bel and the Dragon are two separate stories, narrating how Daniel discredited the priests of Bel and exploded the idea that the dragon was a god—and the dragon also! The Prayer of Manasseh is a prayer of repentance put into the mouth of the king of this name in the Bible, based on 2 Ch. 33:12f., 19, and may have been written in the 2nd century BC.

1 Maccabees is our chief primary account of the struggle of the Jews, led by the sons of Mattathias, against Antiochus Epiphanes and his successors. The author, who probably wrote under John Hyrcanus (135–104 BC), was an excellent historian, as objective as it was possible for a partisan of the Hasmonaeans to be. 2 Maccabees deals with a section of the period covered by the former book, notably with the exploits of Judas Maccabaeus, and is much more highly coloured than the earlier work. It is written from an early Pharisaic viewpoint, stressing the resurrection hope for the martyrs under Antiochus; it also shows a special interest in the Temple.

The Pseudepigrapha

The Book of Enoch (1 Enoch) is the most important apocalypse of this class of writings; it is certainly composite, though whether it comes from one period or is a gradual accumulation of traditions ascribed to Enoch from 200 BC to the mid-1st century AD is still being debated; its most important contribution is its conception of the heavenly Messiah, the Son of man, in the section called the 'Similitudes of Enoch' (1 Enoch 37–71). Fragments of all sections of the book but this have been identified in Aramaic among the Qumran texts.

The Book of Jubilees is a rewriting of Genesis, purporting to show that the law was observed from Eden, enjoining a purely solar calendar and dividing history into periods of 'jubilees', i.e. 49 years (7 weeks of years); it is often dated c. 100 BC. Hebrew fragments of the book have been found at Qumran. The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs perhaps was written at about the same time, and represents the last counsels and prophecies of each of the twelve sons of Jacob as they are about to die. While the Greek text of the Testaments represents a Christian recension, earlier recensions of two of the Testaments in Aramaic and Hebrew have been found at Qumran.

The Sibylline Oracles are Jewish books imitating the style of the pagan Sibylline oracles in order to propagate Jewish thought among Gentiles; they come from the 2nd century BC and onwards. The Assumption of Moses may have appeared during the lifetime of our Lord; it sets out to give a history of the world, under the guise of prophecy, from Moses to the end, which is of course the writer's own time. The Book of the Secrets of Enoch (2 Enoch) presupposes the former book of Enoch and is thought to have appeared in the mid-1st century AD, although some date it later by several centuries. It gives elaborate descriptions of the seven heavens and anticipates a 1,000-year kingdom of God on earth.

The Syriac Apocalypse of Baruch (2 Baruch) is almost certainly dependent on 2 Esdras and is a composite work, purporting to have come from the scribe of Jeremiah. It was written in the latter part of the 1st century AD. The Greek Apocalypse of Baruch (3 Baruch), while having affinities with the former work, is independent of it and is slightly later in date. The Psalms of Solomon are eighteen psalms written in the name of Solomon, but they come from the pen of a Pharisee or someone with a similar outlook. They are in the style of the canonical Psalms and were written in the latter half of the 1st century AD after the Roman conquest of Judea; they condemn the Hasmonaeans and look forward to the coming of the Messiah of David's line.

3 Maccabees tells of an attempt to massacre the Jews in the reign of Ptolemy Philopator (222–205 BC), which ends in the triumphant vindication of the holy people. 4 Maccabees is a philosophical treatise which uses the stories of Maccabean martyrs to illustrate the writer's thesis of the supremacy of right reason. The Letter of Aristeas describes the supposed circumstances of the translating of the Hebrew Scriptures into Greek. The Martyrdom of Isaiah, as the title indicates, tells of the sawing of Isaiah in two. Although Charles dates it in the 1st century of our era, there is reason to think that the book from which it comes, The Ascension of Isaiah, is as a whole a Christian product of later date, but it perhaps incorporates an earlier narrative of Jewish origin, showing affinities with the Qumran literature.

The Books of Adam and Eve give us a great deal of 'information' about the lives of the ancestors of the race and emanate from the 1st century AD. Pirqe Aboth, or 'The Sayings of the Fathers', is a collection of sayings of notable Rabbis, covering the period of the 3rd century BC to the 3rd century AD. The Story of Ahiqar is a legend written about the 5th century BC telling of the wisdom of this sage and was popular throughout this period we are considering (cf. Tobit 14:10). The Apocalypse of Abraham and The Testament of Abraham both come from the 1st century AD and are Jewish works with Christian interpolations. The Lives of the Prophets shows by its title what it contains; it comes from the same era as the former two books and has been similarly expanded by Christians. The Testament of Job has received little attention but is conjectured by some to have been written in the 1st century BC. The Zadokite Documents, two early mediaeval Hebrew manuscripts from the synagogue of Old Cairo, incomplete but to some extent complementary, are now known to belong to the literature of the Qumran community; other fragments from the Qumran caves suggest that the work dates from the beginning of the 1st century BC.

The discovery in 1947 and the following years of the (mostly fragmentary) remains of some 500 documents in eleven caves at Qumran, NW of the Dead Sea, has greatly increased the extant body of Jewish literature of the period with which this article deals. These documents appear to have formed part of the library of a separatist community which had its headquarters in that region for the two centuries from c. 130 BC to c. AD 70. This community, which exhibits some affinities with the Essenes described by writers of the 1st century AD, was characterized by a remnant mentality, eschatological convictions and a bold and creative system of biblical exegesis. By no means all the Qumran texts fall within the apocryphal and apocalyptic categories; in addition to biblical manuscripts and biblical commentaries they include material bearing on the life, beliefs and worship of the community.

Reference has already been made to some works previously known which, thanks to these discoveries, are now accessible in their original languages. In addition, there are portions of a 'Daniel' cycle which never gained admittance either to the canonical or to the deutero-canonical book of Daniel, including the Prayer of Nabonidus, an Aramaic text which tells how the last king of Babylon was sore afflicted for 7 years 'in the city of Teman' and, when he confessed his sins, received help from a Jewish exile. The Genesis Apocryphon, also in Aramaic, contains imaginative expansions of the patriarchal narratives. Other texts have such titles as The Sayings of Moses, The Psalms of Joshua, The Vision of Amram, The Book of Mysteries and (evidently a favourite, to judge from the number of copies) The Apocalypse of the New Jerusalem. When all these have been published and studied, they promise to add greatly to our understanding of the background of the NT.

THE TEACHING OF THE APOCRYPHAL LITERATURE

The doctrine of God

There is a tendency in all this literature, increasing as time goes by, to think of God in terms of His transcendence. There is a reluctance to mention the divine name, so that various circumlocutions are used instead. In 1 Maccabees God is not mentioned once directly, but is usually referred to as 'heaven'; e.g. 'It is not on the size of the army that victory in battle depends, but strength comes from Heaven' (1 Macc. 3:19). With this we may compare the way in which the Jewish writer Matthew in his Gospel constantly uses the phrase 'the kingdom of heaven' instead of 'kingdom of God' as in the other Gospels. The Rabbis often refer to God as 'the Holy One, blessed be He', as in the following example: 'You are to give just account and reckoning before the King of the kings of the kings, the Holy One, blessed be He' (Pirqe Aboth 4:29). For the same reason, the doctrine of angels developed much in this period, to avoid the necessity for God to interfere directly in the affairs of the world. In the OT the Lord is a 'man of war' who fights Israel's battles. In 2 Maccabees it is angels who fight for Israel, and in the Qumran Rule of War holy angels are present with the army of the 'sons of light'. In 1 Maccabees the process is still further accentuated in that neither God nor angels fight, but the good generalship of Judas gains the victory; the thought is that it is not fitting that God should actively intervene in matters of this order. Similarly the direct contact that God has with creation in the OT is replaced by multitudinous angels, some of which are appointed to look after the lightning, others after the snow, rain, clouds, darkness, heat, cold, frost, etc. On the other hand, the doctrine of demons naturally came into prominence, though here other causes were at work.

With such a view of God, the thought of His sovereignty was prominent. The consummation has not only been foreseen, it has been ordained, even to the precise hour. Individuals share in this process of predestination, but not to the exclusion of their freedom. The author of the Psalms of Solomon believed in God's complete sovereignty over man but also said, 'Our works are subjected to our own choice and power to do right or wrong in the works of our hands' (9:7). Similarly God's transcendence did not exclude altogether His relationship with men; increasingly His Fatherhood was recognized. The phrase, 'Your Father, who is in heaven' occurs in Pirqe Aboth 5:23. Cf. also, 'The Lord will rejoice in His children, and be well pleased in His beloved ones for ever' (Testament of Levi 18:13; 4:2; Sibylline Oracles 3:702; 3 Maccabees 6:28; Pirqe Aboth 3:19).

The law

The law is eternal and of supreme importance to man. In Jubilees it is said that all the righteous men of old observed the law, as indeed the angels of heaven, so that the work of Moses at Sinai was not to make it known for the first time but to re-promulgate it. It is the sum of the revelation of God. For most Jews, the law (Torah) included the oral tradition, which was claimed to have come down from Moses through the prophets and the men of the great synagogue. This tradition, as reduced to writing from c. AD 200 onwards, included multitudinous applications of the law to all possible circumstances (the Mishnah), together with further explanations of these explications (the Gemara), and they both formed the Talmud, of which there were two collections, the Jerusalem and the Babylonian. Our Lord's attitude to this mass of tradition is well known, but its observance was the life-blood of most orthodox Jews. Both Rabbis and apocalyptists agreed in teaching that one's only hope of obtaining the life of the world to come lay in obeying its precepts.

Wisdom

The attributes of wisdom as set forth in Pr. 8:22–31 were much thought on in this era, particularly as Greek thought made itself felt in Judaism. There is a long and beautiful description of wisdom in the Wisdom of Solomon (7:22 – 8:1), where it is said to be 'a breath of the power of God, and a pure emanation of the glory of the Almighty . . . For she is a reflection (Gk. apaugasma, cf. Heb. 1:3) of eternal light, a spotless mirror of the working of God, and an image of his goodness'. Both in the books of Wisdom and Ecclesiasticus there are set forth proverbs of practical wisdom.

At the same time speculation increased in the conception of 'the word of God'. Its activity is startlingly portrayed in Wisdom 18:15, 16: 'Thy all-powerful word leaped from heaven, from the royal throne, into the midst of the land that was doomed, a stern warrior carrying the sharp sword of thy authentic command, and stood and filled all things with death, and touched heaven while standing on the earth.' The reference is to the slaughter of the firstborn in Egypt. In this same book, 9:1, 2, the word is identified with wisdom: 'O God of my fathers . . . who hast made all things by thy word, and by thy wisdom hast formed man. . . .'

With this teaching should be compared the view that wisdom and the law are one and the same. This view constantly appears in these books, especially in Ecclesiasticus and Pirqe Aboth. E.g. Ben-Sira gives a lengthy description of wisdom in Ecclus. 24 and then says, 'All this is the book of the covenant of the Most High God, the law which Moses commanded us . . .' (Ecclus. 24:23). Likewise the law and the word are one, as in Pirqe Aboth 3:19, 'Beloved are Israel in that to them was given the instrument by which the world was created . . .' The importance of these developments for the student of the NT is clear; they provide the background against which the prologue to the Fourth Gospel may be studied. What the Jew claimed for wisdom, the word, the law, John claimed to be fulfilled in Jesus the Word incarnate.

Sin

The origin of sin was much discussed in these times. The answers given to the question varied, but they mostly tended to centre on the Fall. Sometimes it is Eve who is largely to blame (Ecclus. 25:24), sometimes Adam (2 Esdras 7:118), sometimes the devil (Wisdom 2:24) or even the fallen angels (1 Enoch 10:7, 8). On the other hand, the author of 2 Baruch would protest at the view that we may all lay the blame on our forbears: 'Though Adam first sinned and brought untimely death upon all, yet of those who were born from him, each one of them has prepared for his own soul torment to come, and again each one of them has chosen for himself glories to come . . . Adam is therefore not the cause, save only of his own soul, but each of us has been the Adam of his own soul' (2 Baruch 54:15, 19). With regard to atonement for sin, the sacrifices are the main means, as in the OT. But works are also efficacious to this end; cf. Ecclus. 3:3, 'Whoever honours his father atones for sins', and Tobit 12:9, 'Almsgiving delivers from death, and it will purge away every sin.' Against sentiments of this order Paul vehemently protested. The merits of saints were also pleaded (2 Esdras 8:28, 29) and in one book at least the martyrdom of faithful confessors is also regarded as making satisfaction for sins (4 Maccabees 6:28, 29).

Ethics

The chief end of man is to understand and obey the law. As one Rabbi put it, 'If you have practised much Torah, do not take credit for yourself, for you were created to do this' (Pirqe Aboth 2:9). In an age when the law was considered to be the sum of the revelation of God, this view was inevitable. Unfortunately, it led to the teaching of salvation by works in a crude fashion, as when Aqiba compared God to a shopkeeper who gives men credit when they keep the law and exacts payment for their debts when they fail (Pirqe Aboth 3:20).

Nevertheless, on the whole there is an advance in ethical conceptions in this literature as compared with some phases of the OT. Several times in the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs the exhortation is given, 'Love the Lord and your neighbour' (e.g. Testament of Issachar 5:2), a remarkable anticipation of our Lord's teaching. The same book has lofty teaching concerning forgiveness, as Testament of Gad 6:3–7: 'Love one another from the heart; and if a man sins against you, speak peaceably to him, and do not hold guile in your soul; and if he repents and confesses, forgive him. But if he denies it, do not get into a passion with him, lest catching the poison from you he takes to swearing and so you sin doubly. And even if he denies it and yet has a sense of shame when reproved, stop reproving him. For he who denies may repent so as not to wrong you again; yes, he may also honour you and be at peace with you. And if he is shameless and persists in his wrongdoing, even so forgive him from the heart, and leave to God the avenging.'

Such passages as this run so parallel to some of our Lord's instruction that Charles is inclined to consider that He was acquainted with the Testaments and used them. It may be so, though we cannot be sure. Moral maxims tend to be no-one's property in an atmosphere where preaching is the bread of life, as it was to the Jew of this time. Moreover, the fact that we have the Testaments in a Christian recension leaves open the possibility that the influence, if any, was exerted in the other direction.

Eschatology

It is in this subject where development is most marked in the intertestamental period. Advance is particularly noticeable in the conceptions of personal immortality, the kingdom of God, and the Messiah.

Personal immortality. As far as we can tell, even the earliest Israelites believed in man's survival of death. But it was to a colourless existence that they expected to go, in which one could not hope for fellowship with God. Ps. 88 is instructive in this respect; to the psalmist, the beyond is 'the land of forgetfulness', 'the dark', the place where the dead have no fellowship with God, for 'they are cut off from thy hand'. With such a conception of the afterlife as this, some considered it as all but nonexistence: 'Look away from me, that I may know gladness, before I depart and be no more!' (Ps. 39:13).

Clearer understanding was gained on this matter as the saints of God reflected more on their fellowship with God, and related that experience to the certainty of the coming of the kingdom of God. Job thus believes that he will see God's vindication of his innocence after death (Jb. 19:25–27), and the writer of Ps. 139 believed that even Sheol could not exclude God: 'If I make my bed in Sheol, thou art there' (v. 8). So also the writer of Ps. 73 looked forward to God's continuing His fellowship with him by welcoming him to glory after death (vv. 24, 25).

Such teaching is the exception, however, and it was not received by all. Ben-Sira, a Sadducee, wrote, 'Whether life is for ten or a hundred or a thousand years, there is no inquiry about it in Sheol' (Ecclus. 41:4), this statement being a plain denial of retribution by God after death.

It was left to the Hasids, the forbears of the Pharisees, to develop the teaching of the more spiritual sons of Israel. There is a remarkable parallel to our Lord's teaching on this matter in 4 Maccabees 7:18, 19: 'As many as with their whole heart make righteousness their first thought, these alone are able to master the weakness of the flesh, believing that unto God they do not die, as our patriarchs Abraham and Isaac and Jacob did not die, but that they live unto God.' We have travelled to the opposite pole of Ben-Sira's dictum in the words of the Rabbi who said, 'This world is like a porch before the world to come. Make yourself ready in the porch, that you may enter the banqueting hall' (Pirqe Aboth 4:21). Such is the constant viewpoint of the apocalyptists and it is they who made it so widespread in the Judaism of our Lord's day.

The kingdom of God. We may trace three stages of thought on this. In the OT the kingdom is anticipated to be earthly and eternally of the earth. The famous Messianic prophecy of Is. 11:1–9 is typical. The early apocalyptists dwelt much on such passages as these and produced some highly sensuous pictures of that time. 1 Enoch 10:17f. says that the righteous shall live to a good old age and beget thousands of children; their seed shall produce a thousandfold, every measure of olives shall yield ten presses of oil, etc. This is the source of Papias's well-known description of the millennium.

Is. 65:17–22 speaks of a renewed heaven and earth, but it is not clear to what extent this is meant to apply to the moral or physical realms. Certain apocalyptists, however, of the 1st centuries BC and AD put forward the view that the Messianic kingdom, though to be established on earth, is of temporary duration and will give place to an eternal kingdom of the heavens. In 2 Enoch this is linked with the notion that the history of the world is to last for 7,000 years, the last 1,000 being the millennial kingdom, after which the eternal kingdom will begin a new creation (2 Enoch 32:2 – 33:2). To this writer the temporary kingdom is clearly of great importance. But in 2 Esdras it has assumed a decreased significance, owing to the pessimism of the author as to this world; it is limited to 400 years in duration, at the end of which time the Messiah and all living will die (2 Esdras 7:29f.).

In view of the latter development, it is not surprising that some apocalyptists abandoned altogether the idea of a temporary Messianic kingdom, and looked only to the eternal kingdom in the new heavens. Such is the expectation of one line of tradition on which the author of 2 Baruch drew. He evidently felt this earth to be unworthy of the kingdom of God: 'Whatever is now is nothing, but that which will be is very great. For everything that is corruptible will pass away, and everything that dies will depart, and all the present time will be forgotten, nor will there be any remembrance of the present time, which is defiled with evils' (2 Baruch 44:8f.).

Whatever view is taken as to the nature of the kingdom, its coming is usually conceived to be 'catastrophic', as in the dream of Nebuchadrezzar in Dn. 2. In some books, however, we find the thought that the kingdom would come to its fullness only gradually, as in Jubilees 33 and 2 Baruch 73–74. In the former work, the kingdom is conceived to come in ever-increasing fullness as the law is more fully studied and obeyed.

Similarly, all the apocalyptists expected the kingdom to appear soon; they stand in the end of the days. Yet in several works it is stated that the great day would be hastened still further by repentance. 'On the day on which Israel repents, the kingdom of the enemy will be brought to an end' (Testament of Dan 6:4). In the Assumption of Moses 1:18, therefore, the last day is called 'the day of repentance in the visitation which the Lord will make in the consummation of the end of the days'.

These different aspects of the kingdom of God could not but affect their adherents' views on immortality. It had long been recognized that since the purpose of God was the establishment of the kingdom, that purpose embraced not merely the generation of the end-time but all the godly. Hence the doctrine of resurrection came into clear focus. In the OT, that doctrine appears in Is. 26:19 and Dn. 12:3. Now, however, modifications arose. If the resurrection anticipated is to a kingdom of earthly bliss, naturally the resurrection body is of the same nature as the present body; so we find in the Sibylline Oracles 3:179–192: 'God will fashion again the bones and the ashes of men and will raise up mortals once more as they were before.' Such a resurrection, of course, takes place at the commencement of the kingdom. But when the temporary kingdom is expected, the resurrection is postponed till the end of that kingdom; such is the case in the Book of the Secrets of Enoch where God tells Adam that He will take him from the earth 'at my second coming' (32:1), i.e. at the end of the 7,000 years of the earth's history. This writer seemed to conceive of the resurrection as being spiritual and not purely material; thus we read, 'The Lord said to Michael, "Go and take Enoch from out his earthly garments, and anoint him with my sweet ointment, and put him into the garments of my glory" ' (22:8). Such writers as the author of the Wisdom of Solomon, who expected no earthly realization of the kingdom, occasionally looked for resurrection to occur immediately on death; the author of Wisdom, indeed, shows the influence of Greek conceptions of immortality—at least for the righteous. This thought, however, does not appear to be native to Palestinian Judaism and it was not generally accepted.

The Messiah. The Messiah is not mentioned in a number of OT prophets (e.g. Amos, Zephaniah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Joel, ?Daniel). Similarly, He is absent from several apocryphal books (the four Maccabean books, Judith, Tobit, 1 Baruch, Wisdom, Assumption of Moses, 2 Enoch). Charles accordingly infers: 'It follows that in Jewish prophecy and apocalyptic the Messiah was no organic factor of the kingdom' (R. H. Charles, Religious Development between the Old and New Testaments, 1914, pp. 75, 76). Although it is a doubtful assumption that, in all the cases mentioned, the silence of the writers necessarily implies their rejection of the expectation of a Messiah, the statement of Charles is generally valid. The great difference between the eschatology of the OT and the NT is the relative importance of the Messiah; in the NT, eschatology is wholly bound up with the Person and work of Christ.

In those passages of the OT in which the Messiah takes a prominent position in the kingdom, it is to be noticed that normally He begins to play a part after the establishment of the kingdom; He Himself does not found it. Ps. 110:1 sums up the position: 'The Lord says to my lord: "Sit at my right hand, till I make your enemies your footstool." ' Similarly in most of the apocalypses, the Messiah does not commence His activity till the kingdom is founded. One of the most important exceptions is the Similitudes of Enoch, to which we shall return presently.

Again, in the apocalypses, the Messiah almost always comes from the seed of David, as in the OT. A puzzling conception meets us, however, in the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, where salvation is said to arise from Levi and Judah and not from Judah alone. Most commentators insist that the Messiah in this book is viewed as springing from Levi; that is certainly the case in Testament of Reuben 6:7–12. It is equally clear that in Testament of Judah 22 and 24 the Messiah is stated to arise from Judah. Moreover, the normal view of the Testaments is that salvation is to arise from Levi and Judah, and not from one tribe alone.

The only satisfactory interpretation seems to be that this writer expected two Messiahs and not one. The reason for such a startling view is not simply the heroic achievements of the Maccabean leaders, who were of the tribe of Levi, but because of the importance attached by this writer to the priesthood. Judah is made to say, 'To me the Lord gave the kingdom and to him (Levi) the priesthood, and he set the kingdom beneath the priesthood. . . . As the heaven is higher than the earth, so is the priesthood of God higher than the earthly dominion. . . .' (Testament of Judah 21:1f.). The importance of this development, taking place so close to the birth of our Lord, lies in the preparation it must have had among the Jews for the preaching of a Messiah whose great work was atonement.

When the Messiah appears in the singular in the Qumran texts, the Davidic Messiah is meant, but sometimes two Messiahs are mentioned, one priestly and the other lay ('the Messiahs of Aaron and Israel'); the priestly Messiah will be head of state in the new age and the lay Messiah will be subordinate to him, just as the Davidic 'prince' in Ezekiel's new commonwealth is to be subordinate to the priesthood. Along with these two anointed personages the Qumran community expected the prophet like Moses (Dt. 18:15ff.) to arise in the end-time.

Another great deviation from the traditional picture of the Messiah is that given in the Similitudes of Enoch (1 Enoch 37–71). No longer is the Messiah a merely human figure; He is a transcendent being, pre-existent and exalted above all creatures, and is to be manifested in the last times, not only to rule for God but to establish the kingdom. He is closely associated, if not identified, with the community of the righteous and chosen people of God, and can be individualized in someone who is outstandingly righteous—in 1 Enoch 71:14 he is individualized in Enoch, who is divinely appointed to pronounce judgment on the ungodly at the last assize.

According to Charles, here for the first time are applied to the coming Deliverer the titles of the Christ, the Righteous One, the Elect One, and the Son of man (see 1 Enoch 52:4; 38:2; 45:3, 4; 46:1–6, respectively), all of which appear in the NT. Many means were used by God to prepare the way of the Lord and to bring about that 'fullness of time' for the coming of His Son from heaven about which Scripture speaks. In this sense these writings, with their references to the coming Deliverer, were important, for they were part and parcel of the general historical situation which God overruled for His saving purpose.

Between the Testaments

The OT narrative comes to an end with the Persian Empire firmly in control of Western Asia. The last monarch whom it mentions by name is 'Darius the Persian' (Ne. 12:22)—either Darius II (423–404 BC) or Darius III (336–331 BC), the last king of Persia. When we open the NT another world power dominates the Near East and indeed the whole Mediterranean world. Luke connects the birth of Jesus with a decree issued by Caesar Augustus, the first Roman Emperor (27 BC – AD 14), 'that all the world should be enrolled' (Lk. 2:1), and dates the ministry of John the Baptist 'in the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Caesar' (AD 14–37), successor to Augustus (Lk. 3:1). It is by a Roman judge that Jesus is condemned to death and by a Roman form of execution that the death-sentence is carried out; it is by a Roman citizen that the Christian message is carried most vigorously into the Mediterranean area, and the NT ends with the power of Rome threatening to exterminate the church, yet destined to be overcome by it.

Between the last king of Persia and the establishment of the Roman presence in the Near East, this area was dominated by the Graeco-Macedonian régime of Alexander the Great and his successors. There are some apocalyptic allusions to this regime in Daniel and one or two other OT books; but even the apocryphal books tell us little of the Graeco-Macedonian rulers apart from the brief period in the 2nd century BC covered by the books of Maccabees. Yet apart from some acquaintance with the background of this 'intertestamental' period the NT itself cannot be properly understood.

The conquest of the Persian Empire by Alexander the Great (331 BC) brought no constitutional changes either to Samaria or to Judea. These provinces were now administered by Graeco-Macedonian governors in place of the former Persian governors, and tribute had to be paid to the new overlord in place of the old one. The Jewish Dispersion, which had been widespread under the Persian Empire, from Susa to Syene and Sardis (the Sepharad of Ob. 20), now found new centres, especially Alexandria and Cyrene. The influences of Greek culture inevitably began to give evidence of their presence among them. These Hellenistic influences were in some directions good: we may think in particular of the situation among the Greek-speaking Jews of Alexandria which necessitated the translation of the Pentateuch and other OT writings into Greek in the 3rd and 2nd centuries BC, and thus made the knowledge of Israel's God accessible to the Gentile world. On the other hand there was a tendency to imitate features of Hellenistic culture which were inextricably interwoven with paganism and which in other ways as well blurred the distinction between Yahweh's 'peculiar people' and their neighbours. How far a prominent Jewish family could go in unscrupulous assimilation to the unworthier aspects of life under the Hellenistic monarchies is illustrated by Josephus's account of the fortunes of the Tobiads, who enriched themselves as tax-collectors on behalf first of the Ptolemies and then of the Seleucids (Ant. xii. 160–222).

Among the dynasties which inherited Alexander's Empire, the two which chiefly affect the history of Israel are those of the Ptolemies in Egypt and of the Seleucids who dominated Syria and the lands beyond the Euphrates. From 323 to 198 BC the Ptolemies' rule extended from Egypt into Asia as far as the Lebanon range and the Phoenician coast, including Judea and Samaria. In 198 BC the Seleucid victory at Panion, near the sources of the Jordan, meant that Judea and Samaria were now tributary to Antioch instead of Alexandria. The defeat which the Seleucid king Antiochus III suffered at the hands of the Romans at Magnesia in 190 BC, and the heavy indemnity which they imposed on him, involved an enormous increase of taxation for his subjects, including the Jews. When his son, Antiochus IV, attempted to redress the situation by imposing his sovereignty over Egypt (in the two campaigns of 169 and 168 BC), the Romans forced him to relinquish these ambitions. Judea, on the SW frontier of his kingdom, now became a region of strategic importance, and he felt that there was grave reason for suspecting the loyalty of his Jewish subjects. On the advice of unwise counsellors, he decided to abolish their distinctive nationhood and religion, and the climax of this policy was the installation of a pagan cult—the worship of Zeus Olympios (punningly altered by the Jews into 'the abomination of desolation')—in the Temple at Jerusalem in December, 167 BC. The Samaritan temple on Gerizim was similarly diverted to the worship of Zeus Xenios.

Many pious Jews endured martyrdom at this time sooner than forswear their religion. Others took up arms against their Seleucid overlord. Among the latter were members of the priestly family of the Hasmonaeans, headed by Mattathias and his five sons. The outstanding son of the five, Judas Maccabaeus, was a born leader of men, who excelled in guerrilla warfare.

His initial successes against the royal forces brought many of his fellow-countrymen under his leadership, including a large number of the pious people in Israel, the *ḥ*ᵃ*sîḏîm*, who considered that passive resistance was not enough in face of the present threat to their national and religious existence. Larger armies were sent against them by the king, but they too were routed by the unexpected tactics of Judas and his men. It became clear to the king that his policy had misfired, and Judas was invited to send ambassadors to Antioch to discuss conditions of peace. Antiochus had military plans for the reconquest of seceding territories in the eastern part of his kingdom, and it was important to reach a settlement on his Egyptian frontier. The basic Jewish condition was, naturally, the complete abrogation of the ban on Jewish religious practice. This was conceded, and the Jews were free again to practise their ancestral religion. The concession was followed at once by the purification of the Temple from the idolatrous cult which had been installed in it, and its rededication to the age-long worship of the God of Israel. The dedication of the Temple at the end of 164 BC (ever afterwards commemorated in the Festival of Hanukkah; cf. Jn. 10:22) was probably not envisaged in the terms of peace, but in itself it might have been accepted as a fait accompli.

Judas and his brothers and followers, however, were not content with the regaining of religious liberty. Having won that success by force of arms, they continued their struggle in order to win political independence. The dedication of the Temple was followed by the fortification of the Temple hill, facing the citadel or Akra which was manned by a royal garrison. Judas sent armed bands to Galilee, Transjordan and other regions where there were isolated Jewish communities and brought them back to the safety of those parts of Judea which were controlled by his forces.

Such a succession of hostile acts could not be overlooked by the Seleucid government, and further armies were sent against Judas. Judas fell in battle in the spring of 160 BC, and for a time the cause which he had led seemed lost. But events played into the hands of his successors. In particular, the death of Antiochus IV in 163 BC was followed by a lengthy period of intermittent civil war in the Seleucid Empire, between rival claimants to the throne and their respective partisans. Jonathan, the brother of Judas who took his place as leader of the insurgent party, lay low until times were propitious, and then by diplomatic dealing won rapid and astounding advancement. In 152 BC Alexander Balas, who claimed the Seleucid throne on the doubtful ground that he was the son of Antiochus IV, authorized Jonathan to maintain his own military force in Judea and recognized him as high priest of the Jews, in return for Jonathan's promise to support his cause.

Antiochus IV had begun his intervention in Jewish religious affairs, which ultimately had brought about the Hasmonaean rising, by deposing the legitimate high priest of the house of Zadok, and appointing other high priests at his own discretion, in defiance of ancient custom. Now a Hasmonaean accepted the high priesthood from a man whose title to bestow it was based on his claim to be son and successor to Antiochus IV. So much for the high ideals with which the struggle had begun!

The pious groups who had lent their aid to the Hasmonaeans at a time when it seemed that only by Hasmonaean might could religious freedom be regained, were disposed to be content when that goal was attained, and grew increasingly critical of the Hasmonaeans' dynastic ambitions. But no feature of these ambitions displeased them more than the Hasmonaean assumption of the high priesthood. Some of them refused to recognize any high priesthood other than the Zadokite one, and held aloof from the Temple worship while it was controlled by an illegitimate hierarchy. These went down to the wilderness of Judea and formed the Qumran community (known to us in recent years from the Dead Sea Scrolls); they may be regarded as one among several 'Essene' groups of the period. One branch of the Zadokite family was permitted to found a Jewish temple at Leontopolis in Egypt and function in the high-priestly office there; but a temple outside the land of Israel could not be countenanced by those *ḥ*ᵃ*sîḏîm* who had any regard for the law.

In 143 BC Jonathan was trapped and put to death by one of the rival claimants for mastery of the Seleucid kingdom, but he was succeeded by his brother Simon, under whom the Jews achieved complete independence from the Gentile yoke. This independence was granted in a rescript from the Seleucid king Demetrius II in May, 142 BC, by which the Jews were released from the obligation to pay tribute. Simon followed up this diplomatic success by subduing the last vestiges of Seleucid ascendancy in Judea, the fortress of Gazara (Gezer) and the citadel in Jerusalem. Demetrius had embarked on an expedition against the Parthians, and could take no action against Simon, even had he so wished. Simon received signal honours from his grateful fellow-Jews for the freedom and peace which he had secured for them. At a meeting of the popular assembly of the Jews in September, 140 BC, it was decreed, in consideration of the patriotic achievements of Simon and his brothers before him, that he should be appointed ethnarch or governor of the nation, commander-in-chief of the army, and hereditary high priest. This triple authority he bequeathed to his descendants and successors.

Simon was assassinated at Jericho in 135 BC by his son-in-law Ptolemy, son of Abubus, who hoped to seize supreme power in Judea. But Simon's son, John Hyrcanus, thwarted the assassin's plans and secured his position as successor to his father.

The Seleucid king Antiochus VII, who had tried to reassert his authority over Judea during Simon's later years, succeeded in imposing tribute on John Hyrcanus for the first few years of his rule. But the death of Antiochus VII in battle with the Parthians in 129 BC brought Seleucid overlordship over Judea to a decisive end.

In the seventh year of John Hyrcanus, then, the independent state of Judea was firmly established, 40 years after Antiochus IV had abolished its old constitution as an autonomous temple-state within the Empire. The devotion of the ḥ^{a}sîḏîm, the military genius of Judas and the statesmanship of Simon, together with increasing division and weakness in the Seleucid government, had won for the Jews more (to all outward appearance) than they had lost at the hands of Antiochus IV. No wonder, then, that the early years of independence under John Hyrcanus were looked back to by later generations as a kind of golden age.

It was in the time of John Hyrcanus that the final breach between the majority of the ḥ^{a}sîḏîm and the Hasmonaean family came about. John was offended by their objections to his tenure of the high priesthood, and broke with them. From this time onward they appear in history as the party of the Pharisees, although it is not certain that they owed that name (Heb. p^{e}rûšîm, 'separated ones') to the fact of their withdrawal from their former alliance with the Hasmonaeans, as has frequently been supposed; they owed it rather to their avoidance of association with those who did not share their scrupulous regard for the laws of purification and tithing. They remained in opposition to the régime for 50 years. Those religious leaders who supported the régime and manned the national council appear about the same time with the name Sadducees. In the NT the wealthy chief-priestly families belong to the Sadducean party.

John Hyrcanus profited by the growing weakness of the Seleucid kingdom to extend his own power. One of his earliest actions after the establishment of Jewish independence was to invade Samaritan territory and besiege Samaria, which held out for a year but was then stormed and destroyed. Shechem was also captured and the schismatic Samaritan shrine on Mt. Gerizim, erected towards the end of the Persian Empire, was demolished. The Samaritans appealed to the Seleucid king for help, but the Romans warned him not to interfere. The Hasmonaeans, at an early stage in their struggle, had secured a treaty of alliance with the Romans, who lost no opportunity of weakening and insulting the Seleucids, and this treaty was renewed by John.

To the south of his kingdom John warred against the Idumaeans, conquered them and forced them to accept circumcision and adopt the Jewish religion. He subdued Greek cities in Transjordan and invaded Galilee.

His work in Galilee was continued by his son and successor Aristobulus I (104–103 BC), who forced the subjected Galilaeans to accept Judaism, as his father had done with the Idumaeans.

According to Josephus, Aristobulus assumed the title 'king' instead of that of 'ethnarch' with which his grandfather and (so far as we know) his father had been content, and wore a diadem in token of his royal estate. No doubt he hoped in this way to enjoy greater prestige among his Gentile neighbours, although his coins designate him, in language more congenial to his Jewish subjects, as 'Judah the high priest'.

Aristobulus died after a year's reign and was succeeded by his brother Alexander Jannaeus (103–76 BC), who married his widow Salome Alexandra. A more inappropriate high priest than Jannaeus could hardly be imagined. He did go through the motions of his sacred office on occasions of high ceremony—and did so in a way that deliberately offended the sentiments of many of his most religiously-minded subjects (especially the Pharisees). But the master-ambition of his reign was military conquest. His pursuit of this policy brought him many reverses, but by the end of his reign he had brought under his control practically all the territory that had been Israelite in the great days of the nation's history—at a ruinous cost to all that was of value in his people's spiritual heritage.

Greek cities on the Mediterranean seaboard and in Transjordan were his special targets for attack; one after another he besieged and conquered them, showing by his ruthless vandalism how little he cared for the true values of Hellenistic civilization. He modelled his way of life on that of the cruder Hellenistic princelings of Western Asia. Feeling against him on the part of many of his Jewish subjects reached such a pitch that, when he suffered a disastrous defeat at the hands of a Nabataean force in Transjordan in 94 BC, they revolted against him and even enlisted the aid of the Seleucid king, Demetrius III. But other Jewish subjects of Jannaeus, however much they disliked him, found the spectacle of a Seleucid king being called to help in a revolt against a member of the Hasmonaean family too much for their patriotism; they volunteered to support the cause of their hard-pressed king and enabled him to put down the revolt and send the Seleucid contingents packing. The barbarity of the revenge which Jannaeus took against the leaders of the revolt (who included some outstanding Pharisees) was long remembered with horror.

Jannaeus bequeathed his kingdom to his widow, Salome Alexandra, who ruled it as queen regnant for 9 years. She bestowed the high priesthood on her elder son, Hyrcanus II. In one important respect she reversed the policy of her predecessors; she befriended the Pharisees and paid attention to their counsel throughout her reign.

Her death in 67 BC was followed by civil war between the supporters of the claims of her two sons, Hyrcanus II and Aristobulus II, to succeed to supreme power in Judea. Aristobulus was a typical Hasmonaean prince, ambitious and aggressive; Hyrcanus was a nonentity, but was easily manipulated by those who supported his claims in their own interests, among whom the dominating personality was the Idumaean Antipater, whose father had been governor of Idumaea under Jannaeus.

The civil strife between the two brothers and their respective partisans was halted by the Romans in 63 BC, in circumstances which brought Judea's short-lived independence under the Hasmonaeans to an end.

In 66 BC the Roman senate and people sent their most brilliant general at that time, Pompey, to bring to a successful conclusion their 20-year-old war with Mithridates, king of Pontus, who had carved out an empire for himself in W Asia from the lands of the decadent Seleucid kingdom and neighbouring states. Pompey was not long in defeating Mithridates (who fled to Crimea and committed suicide there); but having done that he found himself faced with the necessity of reorganizing the political life of W Asia. In 64 BC he annexed Syria as a province of Rome, and was invited by various parties in the Jewish state to intervene in its affairs too and put an end to the civil war between the sons of Jannaeus.

Thanks to Antipater's shrewd appraisal of the situation, the party favouring Hyrcanus showed itself willing to co-operate with Rome, and Jerusalem opened its gates to Pompey in the spring of 63 BC. The Temple, however, which was separately fortified and was held by the partisans of Aristobulus, sustained a siege of three months before it was taken by Pompey's forces.

Judea now became tributary to Rome. She was deprived of the Greek cities which the Hasmonaean kings had conquered and annexed, and the Samaritans were liberated from Jewish control. Hyrcanus was confirmed in the high priesthood and leadership of the nations; but he had to be content with the title of 'ethnarch', for the Romans refused to recognize him as king. Antipater continued to support him, determined to exploit this new turn of events to his own advantage, which (it must be conceded) coincided largely with the advantage of Judea.

Aristobulus and his family endeavoured time after time to foment rebellion against Rome so as to secure power in Judea for themselves. For many years, however, these attempts proved abortive. Successive Roman governors kept a firm grip on Judea and Syria, because these provinces now lay on the eastern frontier of the Roman Empire, beyond which was the rival Empire of Parthia. The strategic importance of this area may be gauged by the number of dominant figures in Roman history who play a part in the history of Judea in these years: Pompey, who annexed it to the Empire; Crassus, who as governor of Syria in 54–53 BC plundered the Jerusalem Temple and also many Syrian temples while collecting resources for a war against the Parthians, but was defeated and killed by them at Carrhae in 53 BC; Julius Caesar, who became master of the Roman world after defeating Pompey at Pharsalus in Thessaly in 48 BC; Antony, who dominated the eastern provinces of the Empire after he and Octavian had defeated Caesar's assassins and their followers at Philippi in 42 BC; and then Octavian himself, who in 31 BC at Actium defeated Antony and Cleopatra (the last ruler of the Ptolemaic dynasty of Egypt) and thereafter (27 BC) ruled the Roman world alone as the Emperor Augustus. Throughout the vicissitudes of Roman civil and external war Antipater and his family made it their settled policy to support the chief representative of Roman power in the East at any one time, whoever he might be and whichever party in the Roman state he might belong to. Julius Caesar in particular had reason to be grateful for Antipater's support when he was besieged in Alexandria during the winter of 48–47 BC, and conferred special privileges not only on Antipater himself but on the Jews as well.

This confidence which the Romans learned to place in Antipater's family was manifested outstandingly in 40 BC, when the Parthians invaded Syria and Palestine and enabled Antigonus, the last surviving son of Aristobulus II, to regain the Hasmonaean throne and reign as king and high priest of the Jews. Hyrcanus II had his ears cropped to prevent him from ever functioning as high priest again. Antipater was now dead, but an attempt was made to seize and liquidate his family. One son, Phasael, was captured and killed, but Herod, the most gifted of Antipater's sons, escaped to Rome, where the senate nominated him king of Jews, at the instance of Antony and Octavian. It was his task now to recover Judea from Antigonus (who was left in peace by the Roman commander in Syria when the Parthian invaders were driven out) and to rule his kingdom in the interests of the Romans, as their 'friend and ally'. The task was not easy, and its successful completion in 37 BC, with the storming of Jerusalem after a siege of 3 months, secured for Herod a bitter ill-will on the part of his new subjects which no effort of his could remove. Antigonus was sent in chains to Antony, who ordered him to be executed. Herod tried to legitimize his position in Jewish eyes by marrying Mariamne, a Hasmonaean princess, but this marriage brought him more trouble than help.

Herod's position was precarious for the first 6 years of his reign. Although Antony was his friend and patron, Cleopatra longed to incorporate Judea in her kingdom, as her earlier Ptolemaic ancestors had done, and tried to exploit her ascendancy over Antony to this end. The overthow of Antony and Cleopatra in 31 BC, and Herod's confirmation in his kingdom by the conqueror, Octavian, brought him some relief externally, but domestic peace was denied him both in his family circle and in his relations with the Jewish people. Yet he governed Judea with a firm hand, serving the interests of Rome even better than a Roman governor could have done. He put down insurgency ruthlessly, and left as tangible memorials of his reign new cities such as Sebaste (on the site of the ancient Samaria) and Caesarea (a seaport with artificial harbour on the Mediterranean coast) and great buildings, the most illustrious of which was the renovated and enlarged Temple in Jerusalem.

When Herod died in 4 BC, his kingdom was divided between three of his surviving sons. Archelaus governed Judea and Samaria as ethnarch until AD 6; Antipas governed Galilee and Peraea as tetrarch until AD 39; Philip received as a tetrarchy the territory E and NE of the Sea of Galilee which his father had pacified in the emperor's interests, and ruled it until his death in AD 34.

Antipas ('Herod the tetrarch' of the Gospel story) inherited a full share of his father's political acumen, and continued the thankless task of promoting the Roman cause in Galilee and Peraea and the surrounding regions. Archelaus, however, had all his father's brutality without his genius, and soon drove his subjects to the point where they petitioned the Roman emperor to remove him so as to prevent a revolt from breaking out. Archelaus was accordingly deposed and banished, and his ethnarchy was reconstituted as a Roman province of the third grade. In order that its annual yield of tribute to the imperial exchequer might be assessed, the governor of Syria, Quirinius, held a census in Judea and Samaria. This census provoked the rising of Judas the Galilaean (Acts 5:37); while the rising was crushed, its ideals lived on in the party of the Zealots, who insisted that the payment of tribute to Caesar, or to any other pagan ruler, was an act of treason to Israel's God. The Zealots maintained resistance to Rome until the war of AD 66–73, and the destruction of Jerusalem.

After the census, Judea (as the province of Judea and Samaria was called) received a prefect or procurator as governor. This governor was appointed by the emperor, and was subject to the general supervision of the imperial legate of Syria. He was regularly drawn from the equestrian, not the senatorial, order, and had auxiliary, not legionary, troops under his command. The early Roman procurators (until AD 41) exercised the privilege of appointing the high priest of Israel—a privilege which, since the end of the Hasmonaean dynasty, had been exercised by Herod and Archelaus after him. The procurators sold the sacred office to the highest bidder, and its religious prestige was naturally very low. By virtue of his office the high priest presided over the Sanhedrin, or council of elders, which administered the internal affairs of the nation.

The Sanhedrin and the Roman government of Judea both have their parts to play in the Gospel account of the trial of Jesus. The Roman government convicted Him on the capital charge of claiming to be 'king of the Jews', and this was the indictment fixed to His cross, the translation into political terms of His claim, expressed or implied, to be the Messiah. When the high priest, presiding over the inquiry which preceded His appearance before Pilate, asked Him point-blank if He was the Messiah, He replied that henceforth the Son of man would be seen seated at the right hand of the Almighty and coming with the clouds of heaven. In these words He avoided the political implications of a Messiahship conceived in terms of David's royal heritage and indicated that His mission was bound up rather with that of the Son of man, manifested on earth in humiliation and suffering, but vindicated by God as the one through whom His good purpose would find a prosperous fulfilment.

These strands of 'Messianic' hope (if we use that adjective in its widest sense) can be traced back to the Law, the Prophets and the Writings, to the Prophet like Moses of Dt. 18:15, to the coming Prince of Gn. 49:10; Nu. 24:17, and several of the 'royal' psalms (especially Pss. 2 and 110), to the Servant of Yahweh in Is. 42:1 – 53:12 and to the 'one like a son of man' of Dn. 7:13f., to mention no more. How these concepts were variously developed in the intertestamental period, giving rise to the expectation which greeted Jesus as the one 'of whom Moses in the law and also the prophets wrote' (Jn. 1:45) is brought out in the article on 'The Apocryphal and Apocalyptic Literature' (pp. 57f.).

The fourfold Gospel

THE GOSPEL COLLECTION

We are accustomed to call the first books of the NT the Four Gospels. Before the 4th century, however, the whole fourfold collection was usually called 'the Gospel'—the one and only Gospel of Christ—and the four components of the collection were distinguished by the addition of the words 'according to Matthew', 'according to Mark', and so on. Behind the written gospel, recorded by the four Evangelists, was the spoken or oral gospel, the good news or euangelion proclaimed by Christ and His disciples. The Christian use of the word euangelion and its cognates goes back to the use of the verb euangelizomai in the LXX of such passages as Is. 40:9; 52:7; 61:1 (cf. Christ's application to Himself of the last scripture in Lk. 4:18).

Irenaeus, bishop of Lyons in Gaul, writing c. AD 180, regards the fourfold Gospel as one of the axiomatic facts of the universe. There are four quarters of the world, he says, and four winds, and thus it is natural that the church universal should rest upon four pillars, and these pillars are the four Gospels (Against Heresies iii. 11.8).

For Irenaeus to write thus confidently about the number of the Gospels, there must have been by his time general agreement in the churches throughout the world that these four were uniquely authoritative. And such a measure of agreement must have taken some time to materialize. In fact, we can trace a recognition of the fourfold Gospel back from the time of Irenaeus to the beginning of the 2nd century. The 'Muratorian Canon' is evidence of its recognition by the Roman church about the time of Irenaeus, as also is the composition of the anti-Marcionite Prologues to the Gospels a few years earlier. Tatian, an Assyrian Christian, c. AD 170, turned the fourfold Gospel into a continuous narrative or 'Harmony of the Gospels', known as the Diatessaron, which in a Syriac form remained for nearly 250 years the favourite, if not the official, version of the Gospels in the Assyrian church. (Here and there Tatian amplified the fourfold record by using a fifth source, the Gospel according to the Hebrews.)

Tatian was a pupil of Justin Martyr, in whose writings reference is made to 'the memoirs of the apostles'. Justin does not mention Matthew, Mark or Luke by name, nor does he refer to John as an Evangelist, but he fairly certainly makes use of all four Gospels, referring to Mark as Peter's memoirs, and if there are traces of Gospel material in his words which may come from the pseudonymous Gospels of Peter or Thomas, these traces are remarkably slight compared with the extent of his use of the Four.

About the same time as Justin was writing in Rome, there appeared in Asia Minor a work called The Epistle of the Apostles, which is also a witness to the fourfold Gospel.

In 1935 some papyrus fragments were published by the British Museum trustees (Fragments of an Unknown Gospel and other Early Christian Papyri, ed. H. I. Bell and T. C. Skeat), which appear to be the remnant of a manual designed to teach people the Gospel stories. Their importance for our present purpose is that they belong to the first half of the 2nd century and were certainly written by someone who had the fourfold Gospel before him and knew it well, for all four Gospels are drawn upon.

Also from the first half of the 2nd century comes the Docetic Gospel of Peter, written, according to E. J. Goodspeed, in Asia in the first decade of the 2nd century. This clearly indicates its author's acquaintance with the Synoptic Gospels and very probably also with the Fourth Gospel.

The Gospel of Truth, a treatise reflecting the outlook of the Valentinian school of Gnosticism, composed c. AD 140–50, possibly by Valentinus himself, shows agreement with the apostolic tradition on the Canon of the NT in general and the fourfold Gospel in particular: it is a meditation on the story told by the Gospels, especially Matthew and John.

In the early decades of the same century Papias, bishop of Phrygian Hierapolis, wrote his Expositions of the Oracles of the Lord, in which he referred by name to Mark's Gospel and Matthew's compilation of Logia, drew probably upon the writings of Luke, and, if we may believe the anti-Marcionite Prologue to the Fourth Gospel, told how John dictated his Gospel 'while still in the body' in order to give it to the churches. Eusebius, to whose quotations we owe nearly all our knowledge of this lost work of Papias, says nothing of any reference by Papias to John's Gospel, but he does say that Papias used 'testimonies' (proof-texts?) from John's first Epistle; and in view of the close connection between that Epistle and the Fourth Gospel, it is likely that Papias knew that Gospel.

Thus we can trace the existence and recognition of the four Gospels back to the early years of the 2nd century. The fourfold Gospel, as a single collection, dates from shortly after AD 100; in fact, from about the same period as saw the formation of the other great collection in the NT Canon, the Pauline corpus.

THE ORAL GOSPEL

But what of the history of these four Gospels in the 1st century? To examine this we must go back to the days immediately succeeding the great events of AD 30—the passion, resurrection and ascension of our Lord and the following Day of Pentecost. These days witnessed the beginnings of what has been called 'the gospel behind the Gospels'. True, the gospel had been proclaimed even earlier: Jesus and His apostles before His passion had announced 'the good news of the kingdom of God'; but the full significance of this good news could not be apparent until after the great salvation-bringing events had taken place. Jesus and the apostles announced that the kingdom of God had drawn near, as indeed it had in His own Person. But the manner and implications of its drawing near were fully unfolded only in His death and resurrection. 'The kingdom of God is conceived as coming in the events of the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus, and to proclaim these facts, in their proper setting, is to preach the gospel of the kingdom of God' (C. H. Dodd, The Apostolic Preaching and its Developments, 1936, pp. 46f.). There still remained the future consummation of the kingdom, associated with the appearance of Jesus as the Son of man 'with power and great glory' to exercise the universal authority and judgment received from His Father; this consummation (to be preceded by the world-wide proclamation of the good news) was but the last of a series of events of which the others were the saving facts just mentioned.

The God of the Bible is the God who reveals Himself in mighty acts; the God of the fathers, who had revealed Himself to Israel in the never-forgotten events of the Exodus and Eisodus, had now revealed Himself in mightier acts, by which a greater redemption had been wrought, in the Person of Christ. This was the burden of the earliest apostolic proclamation of the Christian message and it is to the records of that proclamation that we must turn to learn what the gospel behind the Gospels was.

Some idea of the outline of this proclamation, commonly referred to nowadays by its Greek name kērygma, can be gathered (1) from the Pauline and other NT Epistles and (2) from the reports of early Christian preaching in Acts.

The Pauline and other NT Epistles

The Pauline Epistles were written to people already familiar with the kērygma; any reference to it in them will therefore be incidental and reminiscent. There are two outstanding references in 1 Corinthians (AD 55). In 1 Cor. 15:3ff. Paul reminds his readers of the message whose proclamation had brought them salvation: 'that Christ died for our sins in accordance with the scriptures, that he was buried, that he was raised on the third day in accordance with the scriptures, and that he appeared to Cephas, then to the twelve. Then he appeared to more than five hundred brethren at one time, most of whom are still alive, though some have fallen asleep. Then he appeared to James, then to all the apostles . . .' The message thus summarized Paul says that he himself received from others (Gk. parelabon) before he handed it on in turn (paredōka) to the Corinthians. It is a fair guess in this connection that Paul made good use of the fortnight which he spent with Peter when he went up to Jerusalem to make inquiries of him (historēsai) c. AD 35 (Gal. 1:18).

This summary, brief as it is, contains more than a recital of the 'bare events' of a certain person's death, burial, rising again and appearing to a number of people who knew him. These events are interpreted: the person in question was the expected Messiah of the Jews ('Christ'), His death was in some sense endured for the sins of others, and both His death and resurrection were in accordance with the purpose of God revealed in the sacred scriptures of the Jewish people.

The other reference in this Epistle (1 Cor. 11:23ff.) is marked by the same two verbs—parelabon, 'I received by tradition' (a tradition going back to the Lord Himself), and paredōka, 'I handed on'. In it Paul reminds his readers of a single incident which occurred on the night of the betrayal of 'the Lord Jesus'—His institution of an act of breaking bread and drinking wine in memory of Himself, an act which, Paul says, was to be repeated by Christians, who would thus 'proclaim the Lord's death until he comes'. This last clause suggests that the story was not yet complete; at least one event remained to finish it off.

From incidental references in the same Epistle we learn that the Messiah's death took the form of crucifixion, a fact which proved a stumbling-block to many who heard the Gospel story. From other Epistles of Paul we gather that Jesus was born a Jew and lived under the Jewish law, that He was not only a descendant of Abraham but also a member of the royal house of David, that while His death was the Roman death by crucifixion, yet some responsibility for it rested with Jewish leaders. From 1 Tim. 6:13 we learn that He appeared before Pontius Pilate and 'made the good confession', although, according to 2 Tim. 4:1, He was Himself the divinely-appointed Judge of living and dead. At the time when Paul was writing, Christ was believed to be exalted at God's right hand (an expression going back to Ps. 110:1). As for His being appointed Judge, 'we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ' (2 Cor. 5:10). This judgment appears to be linked with the future appearance of Christ, an event to be accompanied by the rising of the believing dead and the receiving of immortality by those then living, at the sound of the last trumpet (1 Cor. 15:52f.; cf. 1 Thes. 4:16). That Paul's kērygma contained some account of this consummation of the divine redemption in the parousia of Christ is evident, e.g. when he writes to his Thessalonian converts, reminding them of their conversion, as follows: 'You turned to God from idols, to serve a living and true God, and to wait for his Son from heaven, whom he raised from the dead, Jesus who delivers us from the wrath to come' (1 Thes. 1:9f.). This eschatological element is as constant in the NT kērygma as it was dominant in the message of the OT prophets.

Paul insisted (1 Cor. 15:11) that the factual basis of his gospel was the same as that preached by the other apostles. It is not surprising, therefore, to find in 1 Peter the same facts presented as the foundation of the kērygma: the death and resurrection of Jesus the Messiah, His exaltation to God's right hand, His glory yet to be revealed—all presented as the fulfilment of OT prophecy and as basic for the receiving of salvation. The writer claims to have been a witness of Messiah's sufferings, and elaborates the saving events, especially the demeanour of Christ in His undeserved suffering and death, in such a way as to reproduce the thought, and perhaps in some places the very language, of the primitive apostolic preaching (cf. C. H. Dodd, op. cit., pp. 97f.).

A third NT writer, the author of Hebrews, assumes that his readers have a similar knowledge of the same fundamental facts.

In the earliest preaching, then, as reflected in the Pauline and other NT Epistles, we can distinguish the following elements:

a. God has visited and redeemed His people by sending His Son the Messiah, at the time of the fulfilment of His purpose revealed in OT scripture. b. Messiah came, as was prophesied, of Israel's race, of Judah's tribe, of David's royal seed, in the Person of Jesus of Nazareth. c. As the prophets had foretold, He died for men's sins upon a cross, was buried, and d. rose again the third day thereafter, as many eye-witnesses could testify (this note of personal ocular evidence is specially emphasized). e. He was exalted to God's right hand, whence f. He sent forth His Spirit to those who believed in Him, while g. He Himself was later to return to judge all men and consummate His redemptive work. h. On the basis of these facts remission of sins and 'the life of the age to come' were offered to all who repented and believed in the good news; and those who believed were baptized into Christ's name and formed into a new community, the Christian church.

Early Christian preaching

An examination of the speeches ascribed to Peter and Paul in the first half of Acts leads to the conclusion that they are not the free invention of the historian, but reliable summaries of the earliest Christian preaching. Of these speeches the most important are those delivered by Peter in Jerusalem on the Day of Pentecost (2:14–36) and in Caesarea in the house of Cornelius (10:34–43) and that delivered by Paul in the synagogue of Pisidian Antioch (13:16–41). Further fragments of the kērygma can be traced in 3:13–26; 4:10–12; 5:30–32; 8:32–35. In all these we find the same message as is reflected in the Epistles. The message itself is called the good news; it is announced as the fulfilment of OT prophecy; its subject is Jesus of Nazareth, a descendant of David, whose public life dated from the ministry of His forerunner John the Baptist and whose mission was divinely attested by His works of mercy and power, to which the early preachers bore personal witness. He was betrayed to His enemies, handed over to the Romans by the Jewish rulers, who despite Pilate's desire to release Him insisted on His death, preferring the release of a murderer. He was consequently crucified (a fact referred to more than once in language reminiscent of Dt. 21:23, 'A hanged man is accursed by God'), taken down from the cross and buried, raised by God the third day, the apostles constantly emphasizing their personal witness of His resurrection. By this, they claimed, God declared Him to be Lord and Messiah. Thereafter He ascended into heaven and took His seat at God's right hand, whence He sent forth His Spirit upon His followers; He was to return thence to assume His divinely-given office as judge of the living and the dead; meanwhile the call to those who heard the gospel was to repent, believe, be baptized and receive the remission of sins and the gift of the Holy Spirit.

The Acts and the Epistles tell the same story. The message in its essential outline was the same message every time. Stereotyped religious teaching was the regular practice throughout the world in those days and the gospel formed no exception.

The Markan outline

A similar outline of the kērygma has been discerned as the skeleton on which the body of Mark has been constructed. C. H. Dodd's exposition of this thesis ('The framework of the Gospel Narrative', ExpT, XLIII, 1931–2, pp. 396ff.), in spite of criticism to which it has been subjected (especially by D. E. Nineham, Studies in the Gospels . . . in memory of R. H. Lightfoot, 1955, pp. 223ff.), retains its cogency and is capable indeed of being amplified. Mark begins where the outlines of the kērygma begin, with the activity of John the Baptist, and ends with an account of the passion and resurrection of Christ which, as in the other Gospels, receives what might appear from a purely biographical viewpoint to be a disproportionately large amount of space. But this is one prominent feature of the kērygma in all the forms in which we can trace it. The passion narrative is generally recognized to have been told in considerable detail as a unity from the earliest days of apostolic preaching.

Mark consists chiefly of kērygma, of the message about Jesus. The primitive Christian preaching was concerned more with what Jesus did than with what He said. In fact, Mark gives us a wonderfully accurate idea of that early preaching. The outline which forms its skeleton connects a brief summary of the Baptist's ministry (1:1–13) to the passion narrative (14:1ff.) by links which, when joined together, correspond rather well to the outline reconstructed from other NT passages leading up to the passion narrative. In the actual preaching, the outline would have been expanded by means of illustrative matter, increasingly so as the gospel was proclaimed among people previously unacquainted with the story of Jesus. E.g., such a statement as that Jesus was 'a man attested to you by God with mighty works and wonders and signs which God did through him', or that He 'went about doing good and healing all that were oppressed by the devil' (Acts 2:22; 10:38), would be amplified in practice by instances of healings and of other works performed by Him.

The self-contained sections or pericopae which make up the bulk of Mark give us a good idea of the illustrations used in the primitive preaching. Some of these take the form of 'paradigms' (as M. Dibelius called them), examples cited in the early preaching, incidents which lead up to some notable utterance of Jesus, for the sake of which the incidents were remembered and related. These paradigms very often involved a controversial element, and the notable utterance to which they lead up is Jesus' answer to the objections raised against something which He or His disciples did or said. In Mark there are two outstanding groups of these controversial incidents—one of five in 2:1 – 3:6, and one of three in 12:13–34. These two groups probably existed as such in the oral stage before their incorporation into Mark; indeed, from the mention of a combination of Pharisees and Herodians in both 3:6 and 12:13, it has been suggested that they at one time formed one group, which was divided into two in order to be inserted in two different contexts in the Markan outline.

Form-criticism

The study of the 'forms' assumed by the various categories of the gospel tradition, especially in its oral, pre-literary phase, is called Gospel form-criticism. The German word Formgeschichte ('form history') suggests, as the English term does not, the study of the history of the tradition as revealed by the development of its 'forms'.

The main classification of the material distinguishes between narratives and sayings, though these two classes overlap, as when a narrative is related for the sake of the pointed utterance to which it leads up (hence sometimes called a 'pronouncement story'). Other outstanding narrative forms are miracle stories (especially those involving healing) and stories about Jesus (e.g. the baptism, temptation, transfiguration and resurrection narratives); outstanding 'sayings' forms are wisdom sayings, prophetic and apocalyptic sayings, community rules, 'I' sayings and parables. There are other ways of classifying the Gospel material, but no matter which schemes of classification and cross-classification are followed, a Messianic picture of Jesus is consistently yielded: 'we can find no alternative tradition, excavate as we will in the successive strata of the Gospels' (C. H. Dodd, History and the Gospel, 1938, p. 103).

But does this picture reflect the facts of the ministry or the faith of the early church? This question, which is raised insistently by many European form-critics and answered confidently in the latter sense, dēpends not so much on classification of forms as on two arguments: a. that the Gospel tradition in its earliest stages consisted mostly of isolated pericopae which were joined together by the Evangelists with transitional summaries devoid of historical content (an argument countered by C. H. Dodd's recognition, noted above, of a continuous kerygmatic outline in Mark's transitional summaries); b. that the life-setting of each pericopē should be sought in the experience and needs of the primitive church. That the preservation of various elements in the tradition and the form in which they were preserved are related to the life-setting in the primitive church need not be questioned, but this does not preclude an original life-setting in the ministry of Jesus. Although the possibility of establishing this original life-setting except in a handful of instances is widely denied, the situation is by no means hopeless; detailed study of the units in the tradition, and especially comparative scrutiny of the parallels in the Synoptic and Johannine records, yield an increasing total of positive results (see C. H. Dodd, Historic Tradition in the Fourth Gospel, 1963). There is no need to accept uncritically the argument that the historicity of all Gospel material is suspect which is paralleled in rabbinic tradition or can be accounted for in terms of the church's Easter faith, or the claim that in such cases the burden of proof lies on those who maintain the authenticity of the tradition.

The quest of the life-setting is of value for its help towards an appreciation of the situation in early church worship and witness within which the Gospel tradition was moulded and transmitted, and in so far as form-criticism makes it possible to move back from the setting of the Gospels in the 1st-century church to the original setting of their material in the ministry of Jesus it makes its peculiar contribution to the study of the NT and Christian beginnings.

THE WRITTEN GOSPELS

The four Gospels fall naturally into two groups, the first three on one side and John by itself on the other. The first three are commonly called the Synoptic Gospels, a name apparently given them first by J. J. Griesbach towards the end of the 18th century, because they have so much common material that they can be conveniently arranged in three parallel columns as a

'synopsis', a form in which they may be studied together.

Since Mark's record largely represents the pattern of the early kērygma and Peter appears in Acts as the chief preacher of this kērygma, we have some degree of confirmation of the tradition received and recorded by Papias, that Mark, having acted as Peter's interpreter, later committed to writing the preaching of Peter. We see, too, how little practical difference there is between the 19th-century view which attributed the matter common to all three Synoptists to a common dependence on the primitive oral preaching, and the view now generally held, first set on a firm basis by Lachmann in 1835, that Mark's record (or something very like it) is a major source of the First and Third Gospesl, since it incorporated that oral preaching committed to writing. We should expect that the oral preaching was delivered first in Aramaic and then in Greek, as the area of apostolic activity widened; considerable traces of the earlier stage are found in the Aramaisms underlying the Greek of our Gospels.

Even Mark, however, contains some account of the teaching of Jesus as well as of His works, and the other Gospels contain a much higher proportion of His teaching than Mark does. While the doings of Jesus formed the basis of the kērygma, His teaching (didachē) was not forgotten, but served as the basis for the instruction in righteousness imparted to those who had believed the good news. The NT Epistles consist of teaching rather than preaching, and the ethical instruction which they convey is in strict harmony with the teaching of Jesus recorded in the Gospels. We may compare, e.g., the ethical teaching of Paul in Rom. 12:1 – 15:6 with that of the Sermon on the Mount in Mt. 5–7.

Alongside the oral preaching or kērygma, then, there was the oral teaching or didachē, and these two both underlie our Gospel records. We may compare Luke's description of his Gospel in Acts 1:1 as the story of 'all that Jesus began to do (kērygma) and teach (didachē)'. One important corpus of the teaching has been discerned behind those passages common to Matthew and Luke which are not found in Mark. These passages (amounting to something over 200 verses) are usually indicated by the letter Q, and when viewed in isolation, especially in the order in which they appear in Luke, they present a striking measure of homogeneity and continuity, although to suppose that the source must be identical with such reconstructions as some scholars have made byisolating these verses and setting them in order is going beyond what is warranted. The Q passages were probably drawn from a collection of the sayings of Jesus set in a brief narrative framework, first composed in Aramaic and later circulating in more than one Greek version—very probably the compilation of the Lord's oracles which Papias ascribes to Matthew. Its contents have been viewed as comprising four main groupings, which have been entitled a. Jesus and John the Baptist, b. Jesus and His disciples, c. Jesus and His opponents, d. Jesus and the future.

The kērygma as recorded by Mark and the didachē as recorded in the Q-source are the two chief sources of the Synoptic tradition, but there are others. Chief among these should be reckoned the very valuable sources from which Luke drew much of his special information, conveniently denoted by L. A good part of this may have been derived from the circle of Philip at Caesarea (Acts 21:8). Luke's nativity narratives of the Baptist and Jesus represent what W. Sanday called 'the oldest evangelical fragment, or document, of the New Testament, and in any case the most archaic thing in the whole volume'. They may have been based on the memory of some members of the Jerusalem church which Luke visited in AD 57 (Acts 21:15ff.). A probable view envisages Luke as having amplified his collection of the sayings of Jesus (his Q-source) by means of the oral information which he could acquire at Antioch and Jerusalem and especially Caesarea; to this he added at a later time the information obtainable from Mark, perhaps during the period which found them both together in Paul's entourage in Rome (Col. 4:10, 14).

The eschatological discourse in Mk. 13 (reproduced in Mt. 24 and Lk. 21) perhaps circulated independently in written form—in part if not in whole—a considerable time before its incorporation in the Gospels, even as early as AD 40. Something like it formed the basis of the eschatological instruction which Paul gave at Thessalonica in AD 50 (cf. 2 Thes. 2:1–11, and especially v. 5). Probably the first Evangelist also drew independently on part of it for one section (vv. 17–23) of the mission charge in Mt. 10.

The First Gospel also has important material peculiar to itself, including a nativity narrative independent of Luke's, some narrative (especially centring on Peter) which was apparently preserved in 'Nazarene' or Jewish-Christian circles, and a body of teaching (M) on similar lines to that of Q, but with a more pronounced Jewish flavour. If Q represents the teaching tradition of the church of Antioch, M may represent that of the church of Jerusalem.

Luke arranges his sources in alternate blocks, apparently inserting blocks of Markan material into his other material (Q+L) which, as many scholars in this country hold, already existed in the form of 'Proto-Luke', while Matthew conflates his sources, i.e. selects portions from them which he shapes into new unities. A consideration of Matthew's arrangement of the sayings of Jesus has commonly led to the conclusion that he rearranged them according to their subject-matter into five great discourse-groups, each dealing with some aspect of the kingdom of heaven: discourse I (Mt. 5–7), the law of the kingdom; discourse II (Mt. 10), the proclamation of the kingdom; discourse III (Mt. 13), the growth of the kingdom; discourse IV (Mt. 18), the fellowship of the kingdom; discourse V (Mt. 24–25), the consummation of the kingdom. (The discourse of Mt. 23 is omitted from this pattern; this should provoke the question whether the fivefold arrangement is not imposed on Matthew rather than inherent in the Gospel itself.)

In the great sermon of Mt. 5–7, e.g., we find not only the substance of the parallel sermon in Lk. 6:20–49, but also many other 'Q' sayings found in other contexts in Luke, as well as some peculiar to Matthew. To be sure, we must not always assume that two fairly similar passages in Matthew and Luke must come from a common source; much that is reckoned to Q may have come to Luke from one of his special sources, especially where there is no real verbal identity with the Matthaean parallel. Even so, the likelihood remains strong that in Matthew the material has been regrouped in the manner indicated; and the narrative-sections (almost all Markan) which precede the various discourse-groups in Matthew have also had their matter rearranged to suit this topical order. Not that Luke also did not depart on occasion from the order of his sources; for instance, he puts our Lord's visit to Nazareth earlier than is chronologically warranted, probably so as to set the programme of His Messianic mission proclaimed in His synagogue sermon there in the forefront of his account of the ministry. Luke's choice and arrangement of his material also indicate that he had a much greater 'biographical' interest in Christ than had the other Evangelists; this is what we might expect in the one Greek among the NT writers.

It should be added that some scholars see no need to postulate a separate sayings-source, since they regard it as sufficient to suppose that Luke derived his Q-material from Matthew. This view raises greater difficulties than it removes; it would then, among other things, be very difficult to explain the principle of Luke's dispersal of this material throughout his work.

When, however, we have discovered (or think we have discovered) the oral or documentary sources of our Gospels, we must not think that we have sufficiently accounted for these Gospels. The questions treated in this article are mere prolegomena to the really important studies of the Gospels themselves which follow. Each of our Gospels is an individual work of literature, with an ethos and genius all its own; each emphasizes a particular aspect of the Person of Christ, and all three Synoptists together with the fourth Evangelist combine to present us with the portrait of the Christ whom we know.

The study of the special interests and emphases of the individual Evangelists has received fresh and welcome attention of late; it is commonly known by its German designation Redaktionsgeschichte (lit. 'history of redaction') and corrects the imbalance resulting from a one-sided concentration on form-criticism. Matthew—perhaps the spokesman of a school (cf. K. Stendahl, The School of St. Matthew, 1954)—is well described as a 'scribe . . . trained for the kingdom of heaven . . . who brings out of his treasure what is new and what is old' (Mt. 13:52); he arranges the teaching of Jesus according to subject-matter in discourses which would serve as a manual of instruction for catechists and catechumens in the church. His interest in the church as a community destined to endure from the time of Jesus to the 'consummation of the age' stands out clearly in his record. Mark brings out in a distinctive way the 'Messianic secret' the true nature of Jesus' Person and mission was largely veiled, even from the disciples, during the ministry, and not until His death on the cross is the veil removed—an event symbolized by the rending of the Temple veil and interpreted in the centurion's confession (Mk. 15:38f.). Luke views the ministry of Jesus as a continuation of the mighty works of God narrated in the OT, indeed as the consummation of those mighty works, and yet as something which in turn was to find its own continuation in the apostolic history. The saving act of God, as he saw it, was accomplished at the mid-point of time. John restates the essential gospel story without modifying its essence: here we see the incarnation on earth of the eternal Logos or self-expression of God, active in the new creation as earlier in the old creation; here, in the ministry and supremely in the death of Jesus, the glory of God is revealed for all who have eyes to see.

Only a small part of the sayings and doings of Jesus has been recorded by the four, but what they have recorded has been so selected that we know Him—even as a character in history, to say nothing of His living and abiding presence with His people—better than we know many about whom more details have been handed down to us. This selection forms no small element in that inspiration of the Gospels which helped to fulfil our Lord's promise to His disciples that the coming Spirit would bring to their remembrance the things that He Himself had taught them, and would reveal their significance.

The portrayal of Jesus as Messiah or Son of God pervades all the strata of our Gospel material, even the most primitive of them, no matter how it is classified and cross-divided. Even in the earliest forms of the Gospel tradition Jesus is one who makes total claims on men, who asserts His authority in forgiveness and judgment, and makes obedience to His own teaching the criterion of men's bliss or woe. One famous Q-logion, preserved in Mt. 11:27 and Lk. 10:22, has been called 'an aerolite from the Johannine heaven': 'All things have been delivered to me by my Father; and no one knows who the Son is except the Father, or who the Father is except the Son and any one to whom the Son chooses to reveal him.' This is the line of our Lord's teaching which is elaborated in the Fourth Gospel—and not there only, for traces of it are found in the writings of Paul and in Hebrews, as well as in the early 2nd-century hymn book called the Odes of Solomon, in the letters of Ignatius and in the Sayings of Jesus discovered among the Greek Oxyrhynchus papyri, and more fully in the Coptic version called the Gospel of Thomas. It has been argued with some probability that two of the great Christological passages in the NT (Phil. 2:4ff. and part of the prologue of John) were based on early Christian hymns; at any rate, the aspect of the Person of Christ which they present is no late development in Christian theology, but goes back to His own words. This is the aspect emphasized in the Fourth Gospel, but not at the expense of our Lord's real manhood; indeed, John is at pains to insist on His manhood as against Docetic tendencies. But despite the many differences between this Gospel and the other three, it is as faithful to the basic outline of the primitive kērygma as they are; beginning with the baptism of John, all the cardinal facts are here—the anointing of Jesus with the Holy Spirit and power, His mighty works of grace and authority, His ministry both in Galilee and in Jerusalem, His betrayal, arrest, trials before the high priest and Pilate, His crucifixion, burial and resurrection, His ascension, exaltation, and coming to raise the dead and judge the world.

Tradition from the 2nd century onwards has associated the composition of the Fourth Gospel with Ephesus, and recent attempts to find its origin in Alexandria or elsewhere have not been successful. It may be that each of the Gospels was at first associated with some single centre of Christian witness: e.g. Mark with Rome, Matthew with Antioch, John with Ephesus. Other Gospels had local and temporary vogue, but these four, because of their intrinsic worth and apostolic authority (direct or indirect), transcended local limitations and speedily became accepted as the fourfold Gospel by the church universal. For each of them coincided in its aim with the mission of the church in the world; the explicit object of the Fourth (Jn. 20:31) is equally applicable to all four: 'these are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing you may have life in his name.'

The Pauline Epistles

The importance of the Pauline Epistles within the NT cannot be exaggerated. From a chronological point of view these letters are generally acknowledged to have been written before the Gospels. For this reason the interpretation of the Gospels must in some measure be guided by the interpretation of the Epistles, always bearing in mind nevertheless that the teaching and work of Jesus is the basis for Pauline theology. These factors are important in any approach to Paul and his Epistles.

THE LETTERS IN THE LIFE OF THE CHURCH

Although these letters are known as epistles they differ from the general run of Greek epistles in that they were not designed for a literary audience. At the same time they must be distinguished from private letters in that they are designed for a semi-public purpose. In fact, they create a new category, unparalleled in contemporary literature. Their form is specially adapted to meet the practical and doctrinal needs of the early Christian communities. None of them was produced with a literary purpose, not even such an Epistle as Romans, which is of all the Epistles most like a theological treatise.

Because of their essentially practical purpose these letters throw considerable light upon the Christian churches during the primitive period. They reflect the struggle of Christianity against its pagan environment. They do not conceal that problems of a moral kind arose. Moreover, they make clear that some churches were so mixed in their understanding of Christian truth that it was easy for errors of doctrine to gain support. There was no uniformity among the churches in the matter of organization, and in one church (Corinth) considerable disorderliness seems to have crept in.

The letters must be viewed, therefore, as the work of a Christian missionary who was daily burdened with the care of the churches (cf. 2 Cor. 11:28). Some were produced during periods of intense activity, while others belong to times of enforced leisure, as for instance, the captivity Epistles. It cannot be supposed that the earlier Epistles were the result of long reflection. They represent, both in content and style, the spontaneous response of the apostles to situations demanding immediate action and advice. It is for this reason that the Epistles abound in digressions. It can readily be imagined that Paul wrote or dictated most of his letters with a variety of other concerns upon his mind. At the same time he is deeply conscious that he writes authoritatively. His letters never give the impression of being casual expressions of opinion. To Paul there was no doubt about the way Christian life and thought should develop and it was this conviction that gives such power and vitality to his letters.

THE COLLECTION OF PAUL'S LETTERS

The letters were at first sent to widely distributed centres, but at some period during the early history of the Christian church a collection of the letters was made. It is impossible to reconstruct the precise circumstances in which this occurred. In all probability it happened gradually. Paul himself advised the exchange of his letters among neighbouring churches (Col. 4:16), and it may reasonably be supposed that this practice was soon extended to include churches farther afield. It is certain that not only Paul but some of his closest associates kept in liaison with the Gentile churches. Such men as Timothy, Titus and Tychicus would carry news of Paul's activities from church to church and would awaken a desire to read other Epistles which Paul had produced. But our understanding of this whole process rests largely on conjecture. It is not until the second century that evidence for the actual emergence of an authorized collection of Paul's Epistles is found. This particular collection was also a heretical one, formulated by Marcion about AD 140. It contained all the Pauline Epistles except the Pastoral Epistles. Indeed, Marcion concentrated on Paul's Epistles to the exclusion of other NT books. Even in the Gospels Marcion admitted only a mutilated edition of Luke. Nevertheless, the evidence is valuable because it may be concluded that Marcion would not himself have formed a collection of Paul's Epistles if such a collection had not first existed in orthodox circles. It was the practice of pseudo-Christian leaders to imitate the orthodox literature. Tertullian, in dealing with such teachers' approach to the Scriptures, maintained the principle that truth must necessarily precede error. By about AD 180 the position in the orthodox churches may be ascertained not only from the testimony of such writers as Irenaeus, but also from such a list as the Muratorian Canon. This latter list ascribes to Paul the thirteen letters which claim his authorship in the NT.

At a much earlier date there is evidence of the use of some of the letters in the Apostolic Fathers, which at least implies a collection of some kind.

But it is impossible to be certain of its contents. The same may be said of the reference in 2 Pet. 3:16, where the difficulties in understanding Paul's Epistles are mentioned. The expression 'all his letters', which is there used, is not further defined and it is impossible to be sure what it embraced. But certainly some group of Paul's Epistles were already widely known at that time.

A recent theory has advocated that no collection of Paul's letters was made until about AD 90, but this theory is based on several doubtful assumptions, such as the existence of a period during which Paul suffered neglect, which was only dispelled when Acts was published. But this in turn presupposes a late date for Acts which is open to challenge. It is highly improbable that Paul's Epistles should lie stored in the archives of various churches for a period of 30 years, when so many people owed so much to his influence.

THE GROUPING OF PAUL'S LETTERS

There are thirteen Epistles in the NT which claim to be written by Paul. These fall naturally into four groups. The earliest letters were those to the church at Thessalonica, both of which were written from Corinth during Paul's second missionary journey. He had established the church there soon after arriving in Europe, subsequent to his work at Philippi. His movements during the period between establishing the church and writing the Epistles involved visits to Beroea and Athens.

The next group are sometimes described as the great evangelical Epistles, comprising 1 and 2 Corinthians, Romans and Galatians. The first three of these were certainly written on the third missionary journey and the last most probably was, although some date this as the earliest of all Paul's Epistles (see Introduction to Galatians). It was during his three years at Ephesus that he wrote first to the Corinthians. His stay there was nearly over, as 1 Cor. 16:8 shows. From there he moved to Troas, crossed over to Macedonia and spent three months in Greece. It was while he was in Macedonia that 2 Corinthians was written, after he had met Titus who had just visited Corinth. When Paul arrived in Greece he undoubtedly visited Corinth and it was while he was there that Romans was written. By this time his work in the East was finished and he was turning his face towards Spain. Before setting out for the West he determined to visit Jerusalem to take the collection for the poor Christians in Judea. This action led to his arrest, captivity and subsequent despatch to Rome.

The third group of Epistles, known as the captivity Epistles, are so called because in all of them Paul states himself to be a prisoner. These are Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians and Philemon. It has been traditionally believed that these Epistles were written during the period of Paul's imprisonment in Rome and there is much to be said for this opinion. But an alternative view is that Philippians and possibly the others also were sent from Ephesus. The difficulty with this alternative view is that there is no certain knowledge that Paul was ever imprisoned at Ephesus. At best it is no more than a conjecture, although it may be a true one. It is probably desirable to maintain the close connection between these Epistles, at least in the case of Ephesians, Colossians and Philemon, which are closely linked in content as well as in the historical circumstances of the writer. All four of these Epistles are reflective in tone and this is understandable if Paul is a prisoner. He has contact with various Christian companions, however, from whom he is able to learn details of the needs of the churches. These letters, with the possible exception of Ephesians, were sent as the earlier letters in response to various practical situations—the growth of heresy, the question of fellowship, material and spiritual, the needs of a runaway slave. It is probable, if the Roman theory of the origin of these letters be upheld, that Philippians was written first and then Ephesians, Colossians and Philemon all about the same time.

The fourth group is the Pastoral Epistles, comprising 1 and 2 Timothy and Titus. These three Epistles imply that Paul must have been released after the Roman imprisonment of Acts 28, for in 1 Timothy and Titus Paul is no longer a prisoner. By 2 Timothy, however, he is once more on trial for his life and it is clear that he thinks the end is near. This Epistle has been described as Paul's swan song. All these Epistles are similar in style and content and are well regarded as a separate group. In them are instructions about arrangements within the churches which have been invaluable in dealing with questions of church order. But they are also revealing in some aspects of the personality of Paul. They are a fitting conclusion to the literary labours of the great apostle, especially as they are addressed not to churches but to two of his most trusted co-workers.

THE TEACHING OF THE APOSTLE

In approaching the theology of Paul it must be remembered that our information is culled from a variety of different documents, none of which was designed to present a systematized body of doctrine. The various emphases in each Epistle are mainly dominated by immediate practical needs. This naturally leads to difficulties when attempts are made to discover the structure of Paul's thought. It is important to discern, for instance, what essential features make up the unity of Paul's theological approach. To do this it is necessary first to consider the background of that approach.

Influences upon the apostle

Jewish background. Paul leaves his readers in no doubt about the nature of his Jewish background. He was a Hebrew of the Hebrews (Phil. 3:5), and an adherent of the strictest sect, the Pharisees. This not only exercised a profound effect upon him, but was a matter of no small pride to him. He had been taught by the famous Gamaliel and had progressed further than most of his contemporaries in Judaism (Gal. 1:14).

Difficulties confront any attempt to define the precise nature of 1st-century Judaism as Paul knew it, for much of the available data is drawn from later sources. Rabbinic Judaism undoubtedly had many strong roots in the 1st century, but its more developed forms did not arise until later than the time of Paul. Moreover, within Judaism itself there were Hellenistic influences, particularly outside Judea. Even within Palestine itself tendencies were appearing which showed some syncretism between Jewish thought and Hellenism, as the Dead Sea Scrolls bear witness.

It is impossible to appreciate some of the dominant features of Pauline theology without reference to the tensions which existed in Paul's mind prior to his conversion. Judaism was essentially legalistic in its approach and the apostle's evident frustration under this system becomes clear when he refers to his past experience (cf. Rom. 4–7; Gal. 1–4). He knew justification by works to be impossible because he had experienced its impossibility. Yet Judaism was a quest for righteousness, and no religious system which did not offer an adequate means of attaining this would ever have satisfied the soul of Paul. It was perhaps this more than any other single concept which his Jewish background contributed in the development of Paul's theology.

Another feature of Paul's religious approach was the dominance of OT influence upon him. Although in most cases he uses the LXX version, he is essentially Jewish in his use of the OT Scriptures. In this he contrasts with Philo of Alexandria who allegorizes the history. But Paul sees the revelation of God in the acts of history.

As a Jew Paul was a firm believer in one true God. Moreover he had a convinced view of the holiness of God. In Judaism this led to transcendentalism, but in Paul's Christian theology there is no question of God being remote. He is brought near through Jesus Christ. But there can be no doubt that for his exalted conception of God Paul is mainly indebted to his Jewish heritage.

The notion of salvation which formed so cardinal a feature of Paul's theology was prepared for by Jewish thought and particularly the OT cultus. If the details of the cultus did not occupy much of his attention when he wrote his letters, as for instance it did for the writer to the Hebrews, the basic idea of man's need for a mediator was supported by Judaism. In the latter there developed a variety of mediators, but Paul saw at once that there could be only one.

Hellenistic background. It has already been pointed out that Hellenism had made some inroads upon Judaism, not only in the Diaspora but also in Palestine. Moreover, Paul himself was reared in a Hellenistic environment. Although he apparently spent part of his education in Jerusalem, he was nevertheless a native of Tarsus which had a reputation for its university.

Some scholars have traced evidences of the influence on Paul of Stoic rhetoric, such as the use of various technical terms, play on words, antitheses and the diatribe forms. But if such art forms were used, the content of Paul's thought shows no trace of indebtedness to Stoic philosophy. The Epistles of Paul are no examples of rhetorical exercises. They are rather practical expressions of a living faith.

Some scholars have made much of the possibility of orientalism influencing Paul's thought, especially that form of it which found expression in the mystery religions. So R. Reitzenstein and W. Bousset maintained that Paul's system of thought must be placed against the background of the mystery religions. The idea of a dying and rising god, of redemption through sacramental means, of knowledge as a practical fellowship, are all aspects of mystery religions for which parallels may be found in Paul. But those who belonged to this school of thought were mistaken in assuming that similarities indicate common origin, in failing to stress the fundamental distinctions, and in using evidences drawn from too late a period for Paul's time. Bultmann's theory of Gnostic influences suffers from the same defects.

Conversion experience. The profound effect of Paul's conversion clearly dominated his theology. It was an experience so evidently proceeding from divine revelation that it at once gave the apostle a high view of God and of His purposes for him. Central to this experience was the indisputable fact of the resurrection of Christ. On the Damascus road Paul encountered the risen Christ. There is no doubt that he accepted that encounter as a real event. It was not the product of his imagination. It formed the basis of his Christian assurance. He had had a revelation from God which no man could gainsay. The fact that in Acts Luke three times records Paul's conversion experience shows that others were not unmindful of the crucial place the experience had in the mind of the apostle.

In Pauline thought the resurrection of Christ is the key to the understanding of many major concepts. His view of the Person of Christ is directly determined by this event. In Rom. 1:4 he shows that Jesus was designated Son of God by the resurrection, by which he means that His divine character was then fully manifested. In Rom. 10:9 confession of Jesus as Lord is linked with belief in the resurrection. There can be no doubt that in this confession the early Christians were equating Jesus with God (cf. O. Cullmann, The Earliest Christian Confes- sions, 1949, pp. 58f.), and Paul has no hesitation in embracing the same confession. Furthermore, the Messianic status of Jesus is everywhere assumed by the apostle. Not only is this seen in the preponderance of the name Jesus Christ or Christ Jesus, but also in his basic presuppositions. He would understand Messiah in the Jewish sense of an official figure who would bring deliverance, but his concept of deliverance differed from the Jewish expectation in that it was wholly spiritual.

It was through the resurrection that Christ's work of redemption was vindicated (cf. Eph. 1:19ff.; Phil. 2:7ff.). In itself it supplies power to the believer (Gal. 1:1–4; Phil. 3:10). It is the basis of the believer's justification (Rom. 4:25). It is the guarantee of the believer's own resurrection (1 Cor. 15). No further evidence is necessary to demonstrate the overwhelming importance of the resurrection in Paul's theology. He speaks from personal experience of the risen Christ first encountered on the Damascus road.

The major themes

It is impossible in brief compass to do justice to the wide range of Paul's theology. This is not in fact our present intention. Rather it is to introduce the major themes so that the general reader can more readily trace these through the Epistles. Whereas Paul did not set out a systematic account of his theology, it is necessary to grasp something of the pattern behind the separate parts if the significance of the different Epistles is to be appreciated.

Teaching about God. Paul's view of God was deeply influenced by the OT and by consequent Jewish beliefs. It was, too, essentially the same as that found in the teaching of Jesus. His view of God was lofty, but he did not follow the mistake of his Jewish contemporaries in making God remote (transcendentalism). His conception of God was dominated by the idea of grace, by which he understood God's unmerited favour (cf. Rom. 1:5; 1 Cor. 15:9, 10). Paul could never get away from the thought that the whole process of salvation was initiated by God and did not depend on man's own efforts. He was deeply aware of the love of God in Christ and never tired of expressing it (cf. Eph. 3:18, 19). Yet with this aspect of God's love and mercy Paul believed passionately in the righteousness of God. This concept especially dominates the Epistle to the Romans (cf. 1:4, 17; 3:21f.). God is not only holy Himself, but demands that His creatures should be as holy as He is. It is this that for Paul explains men's universal need of the gospel. The sinfulness of all men does not arise from an arbitrary definition or tenet of theology. It is based on man's evident contrast with the nature of God.

Because holiness cannot regard sin as anything other than abhorrent, Paul's concept of God's righteousness is necessarily linked with his view of God's wrath. This comes out most clearly in Rom. 1:17, 18. The notion of wrath must not be watered down. It strongly expresses the divine displeasure with sin, although it is concurrent with God's love for the sinner (Rom. 5:8). It is only against this exalted view of God's character that Paul's doctrine of redemption can be grasped.

Teaching about Christ. It is evident even on a cursory reading of Paul's Epistles that he had a high view of Christ. It is equally evident that he was not much interested in the events of the life of Jesus. What is the explanation of this? It has already been pointed out that Paul's conversion experience had introduced him to the risen Christ. This was an experience independent of any knowledge of the human Jesus. Yet although Paul shows little interest in Jesus' human life, it would not be true to say that it had no relevance for him. He records such features as His human birth, His sinlessness, the institution of the Supper, His poverty and death and resurrection. These incidental references suggest that the apostle assumes more than he states. He was particularly concerned that faith should not be based on sight (cf. 2 Cor. 5:16). Yet he shows no consciousness of a dichotomy between the Christ of faith and the historical Jesus.

There are many facets to Paul's view of Christ. The part of Christ in creation is frequently stressed. He not only has created all but sustains all. But whenever the apostle draws attention to creatorship, the idea is always associated with what Christ has done in the sphere of salvation (cf. Col. 1:15ff.). At the same time there is no clear distinction between the creative works of God and those of Christ.

The pre-existence of Christ is assumed. 'God sent forth his Son' (Gal. 4:4). The incarnation is seen as a voluntary act of humiliation (2 Cor. 8:9). The clearest statement regarding the pre-existence is found in Phil. 2:6–11, where the voluntary character of Christ's setting aside His heavenly glory is specially brought out. The process of humiliation led to Lordship through suffering.

There are several figures of speech which are used by Paul to describe Christ. He is the last Adam (1 Cor. 15:45), the image of God and the first-born (Col. 1:15), the head of the body (Eph. 4:15; Col. 1:18), to mention a few. The apostle is certain that Christ holds the supreme position in both church and the created order. And yet one of his main themes is that believers can be 'in Christ'. He never ceased to marvel at the condescension of the glorified Christ in His relationship to believers.

Although there are some passages which seem to imply the subordination of Christ to God, there are others which can only mean that He was God. Of the former the most notable are Gal. 4:4; Rom. 8:32; Phil. 2:9; 1 Cor. 15:28. Of the latter, attention should particularly be drawn to Rom. 9:5 and Col. 2:9.

Aspects of the work of Christ. It was part of the primitive kērygma which Paul had received from others that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures (1 Cor. 15:3). These were the elements of fact and interpretation which formed the basis of early Christian theology. The apostle must have meditated long on the mystery of what Christ has done for man, for he uses a variety of different figures to convey something of the wealth of his reflections on this theme. Only the most important can be mentioned here, but the careful student of the Pauline Epistles will have no difficulty in adding others.

The idea of propitiation occurs in Rom. 3:25 in relation to man's sin and it is clear that Paul uses the word in a sacrificial sense. The idea is not, however, the placating of an angry deity. Rather, God Himself provides what is necessary to atone for sin. The apostle makes clear that only through faith can the benefit of this work of Christ be appropriated.

Another familiar Pauline figure is that of redemption. This is drawn from the contemporary practice of freeing slaves on payment of a ransom. Paul does not apply the metaphor in any strict commercial sense, but he was deeply conscious that Christ had done something to deliver him from the power of sin (cf. Rom. 3:24; Gal. 4:4f.; Eph. 1:7).

The idea of reconciliation arises from a consideration of man's alienation from God and this again is a recurring Pauline theme. He refers to our reconciliation to God by Christ's death (Rom. 5:10). He considers his mission is to beseech men to be reconciled to God (2 Cor. 5:18ff.), but he also refers to the cosmic idea of reconciliation. The latter idea comes in Col. 1:20, the reconciling to Himself of all things, whether on earth or in heaven. This opens a conception of reconciliation far broader than the idea of personal harmony.

Closely allied to the theme of reconciliation is that of adoption (cf. Rom. 8:15; Gal. 4:5, 6). Through Christ, believers become sons of God and by the Spirit cry, 'Abba! Father!' Such a new relationship requires a specific work of God in Christ to make it possible.

Undoubtedly a dominating theme of the apostle's is justification by faith, especially in Romans and Galatians. Paul sees no possibility of a man obtaining righteousness except through faith in what Christ has done. Hence any idea that a man may get right with God through his own efforts was unthinkable to him.

Teaching about the Spirit. Paul's doctrine is in full agreement with the references to the Spirit in the teaching of Jesus, especially in the Fourth Gospel. The Spirit's work is closely linked with that of Jesus. The Spirit rests upon Him, is concentrated in Him, is given out by Him and aims to glorify Him. The Spirit is the agency through whom God in Christ communicates with His people (cf. Rom. 5:5; 8:16; 15:19; 1 Cor. 2:10f.; Gal. 4:6; Phil. 1:19; 1 Thes. 1:5). It is through the Spirit that we realize our sonship and can cry, 'Abba! Father!' (Gal. 4:6). Moreover, our bodies have become the temple of the Spirit (1 Cor. 6:19). Paul's most concentrated teaching on the Spirit's activity is in Rom. 8, where the work of the Spirit in the believer is set in contrast to the work of the flesh. The apostle was undoubtedly a man of the Spirit.

Because of the close connection between the Spirit and the Father and the Son in Paul's Epistles it may be said that he adumbrates a doctrine of the Trinity, even if this is not systematically worked out.

Teaching about the church. In these Epistles there are two different ways in which the apostle uses the term ekklēsia, sometimes of local churches (e.g. 1 Thes. 2:14; 2 Thes. 1:4) and sometimes of the universal church (cf. the expression 'the church of God' in the Corinthian Epistles and the idea of Christ as Head of the church in the captivity Epistles).

The apostle uses three main figures of speech to describe the functions and relationships of the church: 1. The architectural metaphor. The idea of the church as a building may go back to Jesus' statement about building on the rock (referring to Peter's statement in his confession—Mt. 16:16f.). The foundation is Christ upon which Paul and others have built in their missionary work (1 Cor. 3:10–15). The local Christian community is conceived of as God's temple (1 Cor. 3:16). In Eph. 2:20f., the metaphor is applied more widely to the whole church, of which individuals and communities form parts and of which Christ is the corner-stone. In this Epistle the apostles and prophets are seen to be foundational to the church, no doubt viewed historically.

2. The metaphor of the human body. This figure occurs in four of the Epistles and may justly be regarded as particularly characteristic of Paul's thinking about the church. In Rom. 12:5 the emphasis lies on the variety within the unity of the body, the members all possessing different gifts. Very similarly in 1 Cor. 12:14ff., the variations within the whole are brought out, since each member is essential to the well-being of the whole. The Lord's Supper illustrates this essential oneness in the idea of one loaf and one body (1 Cor. 10:17). In Eph. 1:23; 4:12; 5:23, Christ is Head of the body and Saviour of His people. This is a development since the life and existence of the body is dependent on the Head. Apart from Christ the church cannot grow, indeed it cannot even exist. Similar ideas are expressed in Colossians (cf. 1:18, 24; 2:19).

3. The marital relationship. This imagery is used of a single local community in 1 Cor. 11:3. The same thought is applied to individual Christians in 1 Cor. 6:15ff. But again, in Eph. 5:22ff., the whole church is in mind under the imagery of the bride. The uniting of bride and Bridegroom serves as a remarkable illustration of the union of believers with Christ, which Paul himself recognizes as a mystery.

There are other considerations which show

Paul's approach. His emphasis on the need for love between brethren (cf. 1 Thes. 5:15; Gal. 5:14; 6:10; Rom. 12:12–21; Eph. 4:16) is integral to his thought. Moreover, God has given gifts (charismata) to the church and these are to be used for the edification of the whole.

Teaching about the future. There can be no doubt that Paul expected the parousia (or second coming of Christ). Most of his Epistles speak of this eschatological event. Its imminence, however, is more stressed in the earlier (e.g. 1 and 2 Thes.) than the later Epistles. The apostle came to recognize that the possibility of the parousia occurring in his lifetime was increasingly remote. But he never lost his sense of the certainty of the event. He does not give much attention to describing future events. He looks forward to being with Christ (Phil. 1:23), but is sufficiently conscious of his present responsibilities to be willing to continue as he is.

In his great discussion on the resurrection of the body in 1 Cor. 15, he shows the centrality of this belief for the Christian faith. If Christ is not risen faith is vain, and since Christ is risen so shall those who are in Christ be raised with a spiritual body. In this Paul departs from the current Greek idea of the immortality of the soul alone. (See 1 Cor. 15:44; 2 Cor. 5:1-3.)

Another of Paul's great eschatological concepts is the judgment seat of Christ, which had a moulding effect upon his ethical ideals. The thought that each would give account of his actions exerted a sobering influence (cf. 2 Cor. 5:6–10). He lived as a man ever mindful of his accountability to God.

PART TWO

The Old Testament

Genesis

INTRODUCTION

TITLE

Like the traditional names for the other Pentateuchal books, the title 'Genesis' is derived from the LXX. The Jews called the first book of the Law bᵉrēšît, 'in the beginning', according to the ancient practice of naming books after their opening word(s). 'Genesis' means 'origin', an apt designation for the book which as a whole is the prologue to the OT's history of Israel and which, in the creation record of its own prologue, traces the origins of all human history.

AUTHORSHIP

As part of the broader issue of Pentateuchal criticism the authorship of Genesis is discussed elsewhere in this volume in the General Articles 'Literary Criticism of the Pentateuch' and 'Moses and the Pentateuch'. For those who accept the claims to Mosaic authorship common to the other four books, particular importance attaches to two types of evidence for the Mosaic authorship of Genesis, a book in which explicit claims to such authorship are lacking.

First, there is the interpenetration of Genesis and the rest of the Pentateuch through numerous themes continued from the former into the latter, thus making the last four books dependent upon the first. Random illustrations of some of the varieties of such interrelationship are: the resumption of the genealogical line of Gn. 46 in Ex. 1:1ff. and 6:14ff.; the recalling of the narrative of the twin brothers, Esau and Jacob, and the blessing of Esau (Gn. 25ff.) as the justification of the instructions given to Israel concerning their encounter with Edom (Dt. 2:4ff.; cf. Nu. 20:14ff.); and the similarity of the end of Deuteronomy to that of Genesis. The supposition is hardly plausible that the second layer (Ex.–Dt.) was produced independently of and even by an earlier author than the foundational layer (Gn.).

Of special significance, secondly, is the NT's witness to the writing of the whole Law by Moses (see especially Jn. 1:45; 5:46f.). Quotations made by Jesus and His disciples from here and there in the Pentateuch and attributed to Moses indicate that our Lord accepted the then prevalent Jewish view that Moses wrote all five books of the Law. To argue that the inspired NT authors claim Mosaic authorship only for the particular passages they cite as Mosaic (judging also perhaps that no Genesis passages are thus cited) is to assume that they had deliberately engaged in a higher critical investigation leading them to a rejection of the current tradition of the Mosaic authorship of Genesis (and perhaps leading them to a rejection of Mosaic authorship of parts of Ex.–Dt.). Or else it is to assume that knowledge of this higher critical partitioning of the Pentateuch was imparted to the NT authors by special revelation. Neither of these assumptions appears to be acceptable. If that is so, the NT endorses the Jewish tradition of Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch, not excluding Genesis.

HISTORICITY AND LITERARY PARALLELS

Many are of the opinion that Gn. 12–50 is only to a limited and uncertain extent historical simply because it narrates events which took place long before they were recorded in writing and were known only through accounts received via oral transmission extending over centuries. And Gn. 1–11 is regarded as quite unhistorical, not merely because of the extreme remoteness of the ages described but even more because parallels to the material in Gn. 1–11 are known in the mythological literature of the Ancient Near East. Texts dealing with subjects like the creation of the world and the origin of human cultures, the Deluge, and pre- and post-diluvian dynastic genealogy are known to have existed in pre-Mosaic times, some of them corresponding to Gn. 1–11 even in the general combination and arrangement of these topics.

But it is gratuitous to conclude from the mere existence of parallels to Gn. 1–11 in mythological form that the biblical account must also be non-historical. One can also judge that the events of Gn. 1–11 are historical. That being the case, it would not then be at all surprising if the story concerning them should come to be mythologized in pagan traditions, while being preserved in authentically historical form within the stream of tradition of which Gn. 1–11 is the inspired deposit. To what extent special revelation was involved in the preservation of this historical record, both in its initiation and in subsequent renewal and refashioning (including the Genesis stage), we do not know exactly, but we must reckon with special revelation as a prominent factor in the process, the more so as it is recognized that that course of transmission continued over many thousands of years.

Decisively in favour of the judgment that Gn. 1–11 is not mythological but a genuine record of history is the testimony of the rest of the Bible. The material in these chapters is unquestionably interpreted by inspired writers elsewhere in Scripture as historical in the same sense that they understand Gn. 12–50 or Kings or the Gospels to be historical.

Literary analysis of Gn. 1–11 points to the same conclusion. These chapters cannot be identified as non-historical on the basis of any generally applicable literary criteria. Neither are they distinguishable from Gn. 12–50 by significant differences in their literary character. There is no great divide between Gn. 11 and Gn. 12. In fact, Gn. 11 interlocks with the preceding and following narratives. Through its genealogy of Shem it integrates the history of Abraham and the ensuing genealogical lines (Gn. 12 on into the NT) with the world map of Gn. 10, the oracle of Noah (Gn. 9), and the genealogy of Adam (Gn. 5). The genealogical nature of this link emphasizes that both the preceding and following narratives are concerned with everyday, earthly (even though at the same time redemptive) history.

Gn. 1–50 is history throughout, and when the writing of history is informed by divine inspiration the resultant product is a fully trustworthy historical record, however remote in time the human historian may have been from the events recorded. This position does not permit an easy side-stepping of questions raised by the inevitable comparison of the conclusions of modern research in the various sciences with the historical presentations in the early chapters of Genesis. All we can hope to do here, however, is to draw attention in the commentary to certain features of the narrative style of Genesis, such as the frequently topical rather than chronological arrangement of materials, recognition of which may help us to avoid some of the impasses into which a more wooden traditional exegesis has often led, and may even contribute to the discovery of new possibilities for a fruitful interrelating of special and general revelation. See the commentary also for references to archaeological data illuminative of the historical reliability of the patriarchal narratives.

If Moses, in composing Genesis, was not dependent on the Near Eastern literature that exhibits parallels to Genesis, neither did he ignore it. But it would seem that, where he deliberately develops the biblical account of an event so as to mirror features of the pagan version, it turns out to be for the polemical purpose of exposing and correcting the world's vain wisdom by the light of revealed theology. The elaboration of this is not possible here, but an illustrative case would be the treatment of the Babylonian epic account of creation, known (from its opening words) as Enuma Elish. Acquaintance with it is evidenced in the Genesis accounts of creation (ch. 1) and of Babel-building (ch. 11), but in both passages the epic's world-view is repudiated, even ridiculed, and most effectively so at the points of obvious formal correspondence.

LITERARY AND THEOLOGICAL STRUCTURE

The outline of the commentary below follows in its major headings the genealogical sections into which Genesis is formally structured and seeks in its sub-divisions to express the unfolding theological message of the book.

Beyond the prologue (1:1 – 2:3) Genesis is divided into ten sections, each introduced by a superscription embodying the formula 'ēlleh tôl^{e}ḏôṯ, 'these are the generations of' (slightly modified in 5:1). In five cases genealogical data constitute a large part or even the majority of the section (5:1ff.; 10:1ff.; 11:10ff.; 25:12ff.; and 36:1ff.). The placing of the entire Genesis narrative in this genealogical framework is a clear sign that the author intended the account to be understood throughout as a real life history of individual men, begotten and begetting. This genealogical line is resumed in subsequent biblical historiography, the Genesis lists being recapitulated and carried forward until the lineage of Adam has been traced to Jesus, the second Adam (cf. especially Lk. 3:23–38).

One of the major disservices of the documentary hypothesis, at least in its classical formulation, was to disrupt the unity of Genesis, and leave as a series of unrelated, overlapping and even contradictory fragments what ought rather to have been seen as the harmonious and coherent development of a single theme. Even though it understood the 'generations-formula' to be editorial sub-divisions inserted by the P-writer, yet it failed to treat them seriously. The following outline, however, and the commentary based on it, seek to show that Genesis possesses a natural unity, and that when it is seen in its unity the major positions of the documentary theorists neither accord with the facts nor are required as explanations.

The particular positioning of the several genealogical lists in Genesis was determined by the book's major thematic concern with the history of God's covenantal relationship to men. This covenant theme is traced in Genesis from the original relationship of God and man, the covenant broken by the Fall, through the redemptive re-establishment of fellowship, which eventually became concentrated in the Abrahamic covenant. At the close of the book we are on the eve of the Mosaic fulfilment of the Abrahamic covenant in the covenant at Sinai and the Israelite theocracy, which itself was the provisional prefiguration of the eternal kingdom of the new covenant. Those eras that did not witness epoch-making developments in covenant history, and especially those genealogical branches that were separated from the continuing covenant community, are covered in the briefer of the ten sections, consisting largely of genealogical data. Also, the separated genealogical lines are regularly surveyed and dismissed first, before the more ample presentation of the history of the elect remnant, the recipients and bearers of the accumulating covenant revelation and the line leading to Israel and the Messiah. The genealogical framework thus provided an altogether fitting structure for the historical treatment of the covenant theme, for God administers His covenant not in atomistically individual terms but to His servants together with their families, even to the thousandth generation of those who love Him.

COMMENTARY

1:1 – 2:3 PROLOGUE

The Genesis prologue presents those historical truths which are the necessary presuppositions for the valid pursuit of human knowledge. Among its normative disclosures are those of the divine act of absolute creation ex nihilo and of a specific, terminated creation era within which appeared all the significant variety of earth's hosts. The prologue's literary character, however, limits its use for constructing scientific models, for its language is that of simple observation and a poetic quality, reflected in the strophic structure, permeates its style. Exegesis indicates that the scheme of the creation week itself is a poetic figure and that the several pictures of creation history are set within the six work-day frames not chronologically but topically. In distinguishing simple description and poetic figure from what is definitively conceptual the only ultimate guide, here as always, is comparison with the rest of Scripture.

1:1–13 Creation's kingdoms

1:1–5 Day one. 1 The simple, chiselled, Hebrew style of this prologue favours regarding this verse as an independent declaration. If the beginning denotes the entire creation period, the verse could be a summary-heading. Ch. 1 would not then make a specific declaration about the world's absolute origins. Pr. 8:22f. and Jn. 1:1, however, support understanding the beginning as the commencement of the seven-day history. God created will then describe absolute creation ex nihilo. Consistently in the use of this verb (Heb. bārā') the activity is divine, the product extraordinary or wondrously new. On this interpretation, the heavens and the earth are viewed in their earliest, not perfected state, yet as a totality, this being the idiomatic force in Hebrew of such contrasted pairs. Cf. Ne. 9:6 for the possibility that hosts of angels are in the author's purview. 2 The earth, here seen in its deep-and-darkness stage (cf. Jb. 38:8ff.), was destined to be man's habitation (Is. 45:18; cf. Pr. 8:30f.). In so far as they furthered that purpose, various developments were called good (vv. 4, 10, 12, 18, 21, 25, 31). The presence of the Creator-Spirit was the earnest of the transformation of deep-and-darkness into distinct realms (the theme of the first triad of days). 3 God said: creative ordering proceeded by mere executive decree (cf. Heb. 11:3; Jn. 1:3). 4, 5 The phenomenon of daylight, according to God's purpose as revealed in the names He gave (cf. Jb. 38:12ff., 19), was introduced not to eliminate earth's darkness but to alternate with it in the goodly order of Day and Night (cf. Ps. 104:20–23).

1:6–8 Day two. 6 Firmament (Heb. rāqîa') designates the sky according to its appearance as a canopy, or vast tent, spread by God about His chambers (cf. Ps. 104:2; Pr. 8:27; Is. 40:22). Let it separate the waters from the waters. By this separation the atmospheric heaven and the waters on earth were distinguished, a first step in bounding the deep. 7 The waters below required further bounding (cf. v. 9). The waters above are the clouds (cf. Pr. 8:28, AV) or, poetically, the rain reservoirs in God's 'lofty abode' (Ps. 104:13).

1:9–13 Day three. 9 By a further ordering of the primaeval deep, dry land appeared as another earth-realm (cf. Pr. 8:25, 29; Ps. 104:7–9). 10 The realm of waters below (cf. vv. 6f.) now had the more precise character of land-bounded waters, or Seas. 11, 12 The natural means to support life having been made available (cf. 2:5), the divine Sower scattered the seed of His creative word and the earth at His feet broke forth into green growth. Each according to its kind. Establishment of the major lines of differentiation in life forms is attributed to the closed era of the six days (cf. vv. 21, 24f.). Plants and trees, the two kinds of vegetation specified, are mentioned again in the work of the sixth day (vv. 29f.), which in the poetic structure of the account matches day three. Cf. Ps. 104:13–18.

1:14–31 Creature-kings

1:14–19 Day four. The first triad having delineated major kingdom-spheres, the second triad recapitulates the series (with correspondence between the successive days of each triad), appointing kings over these realms. Thus, day one (beyond v. 1) dealt with the separation of light from the darkness (v. 4), producing the cycle of day and night (v. 5), and the topically parallel day four introduces the creatures God made to rule over the day and over the night, and to separate the light from the darkness. Day four supplements by describing the cosmic system through which the results described in day one were achieved. The expressions let there be and God made are used here, as elsewhere in this passage, for acts of origination. Chronologically, this making of the heavenly luminaries (the work of day four) began in the beginning when God created the heavens and it continued along with the further fashioning of the earth described in the first three day-stanzas. In pagan thought the divine stars control human destiny; in Genesis the luminaries minister to man as servants of God, regulating day and night, supplying signs by which man may order his life and labour (cf. Ps. 104:19ff.; Jb. 38:7, 31ff.).

1:20–23 Day five. Here appear the fish of the sea and the birds of the air (cf. vv. 26, 28, 30), the living creatures that dominate the realms surveyed in the parallel second day. Chronologically, the earliest part of day five's work preceded at least the latest developments depicted under day three. 'Let the waters swarm' (v. 20, RV mg.; cf. Ps. 104:25ff.) describes the teeming results, not the method of production. The sheer supernaturalism of the latter is suggested by the formula that follows, God created. God's blessing in v. 22 is embodied in the creative command imparting the capacity of reproduction.

1:24–31 Day six. The sixth day contains two works, each concluding with God's recognition of purpose fulfilled (vv. 25, 31; cf. vv. 9, 11). Corresponding to the dry land with its vegetation, the distinctively new sphere of the parallel third day, are the land creatures of day six, their dominion claiming earth's produce (see vv. 29, 30). 24 Let the earth bring forth (cf. v. 12) suggests the possibility that already existing earth material was used as a matrix within which God's act of creation was performed. 26 Let us make man in our image. The explanation of the first person plural forms is probably that the Creator speaks as heaven's King accompanied by His heavenly hosts. Where this usage appears elsewhere ministering spirits hover nearby (cf. 3:22, 24; 11:7 and 18:21 (cf. 18:2; 19:1); Is. 6:8). Men and the celestial spirits alike are personal-religious creatures involved in responsible, historical relationship to God. This divine image is neither losable nor reducible, but its ethical direction is reversible. It assumes its proper form, of course, in conformity to God's holy will. 28 Fill the earth and subdue it. The dominion of man, the God-like king, only begins with his natural realm, the dry land of day three, thence to be extended by cultural conquest over all the creation kingdoms of the first triad of days and over all the creature-kings of the second triad (cf. Ps. 8:5–8). 30 The subordination of both animal and plant kingdoms to man's royal service having been affirmed, the lesser rule of animals over vegetation is noted. 31a Cf. Pr. 8:30f.

2:1–3 Creator-King

2 God finished. This finishing of God's work assigned to day seven is not a further creating, for it is paralleled by God's resting. Both finishing and resting are viewed positively and characterize the seventh day as a distinct state of triumphant consummation for the Creator. This state had a temporal beginning but it has no end (note the absence of the concluding evening–morning formula). Yet it is called a 'day', so advising us that these days of the creation account are meant figuratively. 3 God blessed the seventh day. Man's history too was to lead from work begun to work completed and kingship perfected. God extended the promise of entrance into the divine sabbath (cf. Heb. 4:1ff.) by stamping the creation pattern of the seven days as a recurring symbolic cycle on man's daily existence. The sabbath day in particular was sanctified to be a constant source of blessing to man as the sign of his eternal hope. Also, by calling the royal image-bearer to follow in his Creator's way (cf. Ex. 20:8–11), the sabbath summons man to continual re-consecration of his servant-kingship to the glory of his Creator-King.

2:4 – 4:26 THE GENERATIONS OF HEAVEN AND EARTH

2:4 On these are the generations, see the Introduction above. Since the genitive in this formula is uniformly subjective, the reference is not to the origin of the heavens and the earth but the sequel thereof, particularly the early history of the earthlings. The first part of this verse, therefore, must be taken not with the preceding but the following account, which is not, then, presented as another version of creation. When they were created is literally 'in their being created'. This expression is used like the grammatically equivalent 'in their going forth from Egypt' (Dt. 4:45; 23:4; Jos. 5:4) and 'in your passing over the Jordan' (Dt. 27:4, 12) to denote an era according to its opening and formative event. Cf. also Gn. 33:18; 35:9. The reference in 2:4a (cf. the parallel in 4b) is evidently to the entire ante-diluvian period spanned in 2:4 – 4:25. The Lord God (Heb. yhwh 'ĕlōhîm). The combination of the generic 'ĕlōhîm, 'God', and proper name, Yahweh, is found repeatedly in Gn. 2 and 3. 'ĕlōhîm is used in Gn. 1 for God as Creator; it denotes God as He is known through His revelation in creation and general providence, including man's inward and intuitive knowledge of God. Yahweh is used alone beginning with Gn. 4; it is God's personal name describing Him as revealed through His historical–covenantal revelation as the Lord of eschatological purpose and sovereign fulfilment. The transitional combination, 'Yahweh God', in Gn. 2 and 3 serves to identify Yahweh, the covenant Lord, as God, the Creator. Such multiple designations of deity were common in the biblical world.

2:5–25 Man's original beatitude

2:5–8 Man in the garden of God. 5 Follow RV, 'and no plant of the field was yet in the earth'. AV obscures the Hebrew idiom for an emphatic negative. RSV would treat vv. 4b–7 like a long clumsy sentence, making Gn. 2 teach that man was created before vegetation. For the Lord God had not caused it to rain. During the creation era, punctuated though it was with acts of super-natural origination, the preservation of life was by natural means. Thus the Creator did not originate plant life before the availability of water, whether through a process of nature or through artificial irrigation devised by man.

6, 7 A mist went up (preferably, 'began to go up'). These verses describe the provision of the two things mentioned as missing in v. 5. The uncertain mist (Heb. 'ēd) probably refers to subterranean waters springing up over the ground. The Lord God formed man. Man's one-ness with the created world is brought out by the similarity of 'ādām (man) and 'ădāmâ (ground); the first man was of the earth, an earthling (cf. 1 Cor. 15:47). Man's first breath was the very breath of life which God breathed out; an intimacy of created mode is suggested that is consonant with the nature of man who, though an earthling, stands in image-relationship to God (cf. 1:27). The creature thus animated was not previously alive and it was nothing short of man, the image of God, that now by this immediate divine action first became a living being (cf. 1 Cor. 15:45). For man's eschatological potential see 1 Cor. 15:46ff. 8 'Had planted' would be a proper translation. Eden could be a Sumero-Akkadian loan-word meaning 'steppe', but appears to be a name here meaning 'delight'. As the garden of God (cf. Is. 51:3; Ezk. 28:13; 31:9), the garden was a holy place and man's position there involved priestly vocation. The preparation of the garden is developed in vv. 9–14; the assignment of man in the garden in vv. 15–17.

2:9–14 Source of life. 9 The garden of God, the Source of life, ministered abundantly to man's life, aesthetic and physical. The tree of life symbolized the prospect of a glorified life (cf. Rev. 2:7) to be attained according to the Lord's law of probation (cf. vv. 15–17). The tree of the knowledge of good and evil, like the tree of life, was named after the destiny to which it would lead. To know good and evil is to be seasoned in discriminating between opposites. The context indicates the sphere of discrimination, such as physical sensation (cf. 2 Sa. 19:35) or, as here, ethical-religious experience (cf. 1 Ki. 3:9; Heb. 5:14).

10 The river system which kept the garden well watered (cf. Gn. 13:10) perhaps exemplifies the mist ('ēd) phenomenon (cf. 2:6). 11–14 The narrative's concern with real earthly history is apparent in the geographical notes, especially the familiar Hiddekel (i.e. 'Tigris') and Euphrates (v. 14). Pishon ('Gusher') and Gihon ('Bubbler') are not known, and this suggests the possibility of vast changes in the terrain between Adam and Moses. Eden's fertility and its surrounding treasures fulfilled the promise of its name (cf. on v. 8) and manifested the favour of God.

2:15–17 Law of the Lord. 15 recapitulates v. 8, adding man's commission. Subjugation of the earth (cf. 1:28) began with cultivation of the garden. Keep it is perhaps a cultic charge, i.e. to guard the sanctity of God's dwelling; cf. the use of the same verb šāmar in 3:24; Ne. 13:22; Zc. 3:7. 16 Commanded the man. For true covenant servants the law of the Lord is a delight (cf. Ps. 1:2); it gave direction to man's original state of blessedness. 17 The tree of knowledge, as the focus of probation, stood in Adam's path to the tree of life, the sacramental seal of the proffered consummation of blessing. You shall die. Though probation's proper purpose was unto life, the law of God's covenant placed Adam, as it did Israel at a later day, before life and good, death and evil (cf. Dt. 30:15ff.).

2:18–25 A wife for the man. 18 It is not good. Only when man existed male and female could the work of the sixth day be called 'very good' (cf. 1:27, 31), for only then could the divinely-ordained cultural programme unfold to its genealogical fullness (cf. 1:28a). A helper. The woman was made for the man (cf. 1 Cor. 11:9), yet not as his slave-girl but his queen. Fit for him (Heb. k^{e}negdô) suggests primarily correspondence, likeness (cf. vv. 20, 23); as man is the image and glory of God, so the woman is the glory of the man (1 Cor. 11:7). 19 Read 'now . . . God had formed'; thus the Hebrew can and should be translated (cf. v. 8). 20 The man gave names. God's naming activity (1:5, 8, 10), by which He assigns to the creation kingdoms their meaning, was imitated by man in this process of giving the creatures name interpretations. A prophetic function is thus seen to be added to the royal and priestly aspects of man's role in God's kingdom. 21, 22 The deep sleep was not so much an anaesthetic for the man as a veil about the woman until she was prepared to be led as a bride to her wedding. Paul understood this record of the woman's origins as straightforward history, observing that 'man was not made from woman, but woman from man' (1 Cor. 11:8). Scripture itself thus provides us with the direction to be followed in our exegetical approach to the narrative materials of this chapter. Following that direction in our exegesis of the account of the origin of man in 2:7 particularly, we find ourselves pointed away from any theoretical reconstruction in which the creative act that produced Adam is attached organically to some prior life process evolving at a sub-human level. 23 Woman, because she was taken out of Man. The assonance of 'iš and 'iššâ (man and woman) reflects the original name interpretation of the woman as derivative from, and hence of a kind with, the man (cf. vv. 18b, 20). 24 They became one flesh. In their origins of the one flesh of Adam, and in their separation still male-female correlatives of one kind, they become one flesh in a new sense as God joins them in marriage (cf. Mt. 19:4ff.). This verse is a divine directive. 25 Cf. 3:7.

3:1–24 The entrance of sin

3:1–7 Transgression of the law. 1 The serpent. Unless the entire paradise-Fall account is regarded as an allegory or some other non-historical form, which the rest of Scripture does not support (see the Introduction), there is no suggestion in the context that the serpent is not to be interpreted literally. Indications of literal intent are the comparison with other actual creatures and the terms of the divine judgment (3:14). The serpent was the instrument of Satan, who turned man's God-given probationary opportunity into an avenue of temptation (cf. Mt. 13:38f.; Jn. 8:44; Rom. 16:20; 1 Jn. 3:8; Rev. 12:9). More subtle. The camouflaged, sinuous movement of the serpent made it symbolically suitable as a medium for the wiles of the devil. 2, 3 By engaging in apologetic discourse with the challenging serpent, the woman accepted Satan's violation of the law of God's kingdom whereby all things visible had been placed under man's rule. She thereby yielded to the usurped authority of Satan. She spoke in God's defence, not, however, as a faithful witness but as an autonomous judge. Though Eve had thus already stumbled, the complete Fall of man was to involve not just the deceiving of the woman but the transgression of the man (v. 6b). 4 You will not die. First, Satan had challenged the stipulations of covenant law, God's norm for the present; now he contradicts its sanctions, God's interpretation of the future.

5 God knows that . . . you will be like God. With one stroke Satan re-interpreted God as a devil, a liar possessed by jealous pride, and the way of the curse as the way to blessing. Diverting attention from the spiritual direction of man's likeness to God, the tempter reduced the issue to a merely formal, existential matter of ascent along a supposed scale of being towards god-hood. 6 She took . . . and ate. In expression of her new anti-faith and her consent to Satan's theology, the woman risked the divine threat. And she . . . gave. Cf. 1 Tim. 2:14. From apologete for God to devil's advocate! And he ate. By this disobedience of the one man sin entered into the world and death passed upon all men (cf. Rom. 5:12ff.). 7 They knew they were naked. The similarity of 'êrummîm ('naked'; cf. 'ārûmmîm, 2:25) and 'ārûm ('subtle', 3:1) suggests a word-play: the kind of God-likeness that resulted from following the serpent's counsel was religiously a devil-likeness. The sense of shame attaching to physical nakedness (cf. 2:25) manifested consciousness of inner nakedness, the stripping of the glory of holiness from the soul. Made themselves aprons. Sin had side-tracked human inventiveness down a frustratingly remedial road.

3:8–19 Judgment of God. The Lord of the covenant instituted His lawsuit against the unfaithful vassals. It began with interrogation (vv. 8–13), and proceeded at once to a verdict (vv. 14–19). Divine justice could not be denied, but there was the unique wonder of a triumph of mercy through justice (cf. v. 15).

8 God walking. Theophany in human form was evidently a mode of special revelation from the beginning. Hid themselves—as though the guilty could find refuge from God in the sanctuary of God! Their own terror condemned them, for in such an ordeal of confrontation with the divine Judge the heart's reaction reveals the truth and anticipates the verdict (cf. Rev. 6:15f.). 10 Because I was naked. This was an evasive half-truth. Adam's sense of nakedness was, like his fear, an evil consequence of his rebellion. 11, 12 When God cut through this subterfuge, exposing the act of disobedience as the root of evil (cf. v. 17), the sinner avoided confession of guilt only by the blasphemous expedient of virtually blaming God for his fall—the woman whom thou gavest. 13 The woman seeks to absolve herself from blame by pointing the finger at the subtle serpent. 14 Cursed are you. There is no trial for Satan, just the pronouncing of doom. Satan's instrument, slithering in the dust, subject to trampling, becomes a symbol of his humiliation and condemnation. Above (lit. 'from') has been understood by some to mean 'by being made separate from', but the regular use of this preposition to express the comparison 'more than' is preferable here. 15 I will put enmity between you and the woman. The allegiance recently transferred to Satan will be again reversed; God will sovereignly effect a reconciliation with Himself. Between your seed and her seed. Beyond the woman, the whole family of the true humanity, becoming her spiritual seed by faith, will stand in continuing conflict with those descendants of fallen Adam who obdurately manifest spiritual sonship to the devil (cf. Jn. 8:33, 44). The latter identify with the devil in the battle and so participate too in his ultimate perdition. He shall bruise your head, and you shall bruise his heel. The 'you' still contending in the remote future points past the mere serpent to Satan. This focusing on an individual from one side in connection with the eventual decisive encounter suggests that the he too is not the woman's seed collectively but their individual champion. Since this verse elaborates the declaration just made of Satan's doom, the point of the contrast between the wounding of head and heel is that the first is fatal, and the second is not. Clearly, however, the redemptive victory would involve suffering. The special redemptive programme would require as its field a general history of man. Hence the curse of the broken covenant (cf. 2:17) announced to the fallen pair as representative of the envisaged generality of mankind was modified (vv. 16–19) by the principle of common grace. 16 In pain. Travail would now characterize man's genealogical development and the reinstituted marriage relationship would be disturbed by sinful inclinations towards abuse of its authority structure (cf. 4:7 for the idiom). 17, 18 Cursed is the ground because of you. The cursing of the ground consisted not in the introduction of new features, like thistles, but in God's providential use of the ground, which hitherto had ministered to man's welfare (cf. 1:29), as a medium of His judgment-curse against him (cf. 8:21; Jb. 31:40; Rom. 8:20ff.). 19 To dust you shall return. Because the ground entered into the composition of man (cf. 2:7), the curse on the ground became a power unto death working in his very members (cf. Nu. 5:16ff.). Death, formerly present in nature in subservience to man, would now terrorize man the covenant-breaker as the wages of his sin.

3:20–24 Hope of restoration. 20 Eve. Man's generic designation became his proper name, Adam (cf. 3:17; 4:25); but the generic appellation of the woman was replaced by the proper name, ḥawwâ. The sound-play on ḥay, 'living', reflects Adam's faith as he gave this name to the woman, his reference probably being to her spiritual seed who should trample under foot the prince of death and so wrest life from the curse (cf. 3:15; 1 Tim. 2:15; Rom. 16:20). 21 The Lord . . . clothed them. This remedy for the obstacle to their approach to God (cf. 3:10) symbolized God's purpose to restore men to fellowship with Him. The sinners' shame, as a religious problem, could not be covered by their own efforts (cf. 3:7). Implied in God's provision is an act of animal sacrifice; what is explicit, however, is not the sacrificial mode but remedial result. 22 Like one of us; cf. above on 1:26. Through the probation–temptation man had come to experience the full dimension of the conflict of good and evil, as celestial creatures had previously known it. Eat, and live for ever. Punishment for such unworthy grasping of the sacrament of life would be to grant the coveted exclusion from physical death, and this would, paradoxically, make men's state of death and alienation permanent, since reconciliation could come only by a sacrificial dying (cf. 3:15, 21). 23 Although man's expulsion from the garden mercifully forestalled that possibility, the exile-judgment was of course a manifestation of God's displeasure with fallen man. 24 The cherubim, and a flaming sword . . . to guard the way. Protection of the sanctuary (cf. on 2:15) was now assigned to beings who elsewhere too are found as guardians of God's throne (cf. Ex. 25:18ff.; 1 Ki. 6:23ff.; Ezk. 10; 28:14ff.), while man was viewed as a potential intruder. Yet God preserved the sanctuary with its tree of life, so reaffirming the hope of a restoration from exile, even though the way of return led through the death-curse of God's judgment-sword.

4:1–26 Man in exile

4:1–16 Banishment of humanity's firstborn. 1 In Hebrew qayin (Cain) and qānîṯî (I have gotten) form a pun. For Eve the name was probably related authentically to the explanation. With the help of the Lord is better translated 'from the Lord', giving the preposition ('et) a meaning well attested elsewhere. Eve's explanation was a believing response to God's earlier revelation concerning both redemptive and common grace (cf. 3:15f.). 2 Abel (Heb. heḇel, 'breath, vanity'). Was this a posthumous naming (cf. 4:25c) or a reflection of earlier experience of the curse's frustration (cf. 5:29; Ec. 1:2ff.)? From 2b it is clear that the Scriptures disallow historical reconstructions locating the earliest phase of food production and animal domestication relatively late in man's cultural development. 3 In the course of time; possibly upwards of 130 years (cf. 4:25; 5:3). Whether any of the daughters of Adam and Eve (cf. 5:4) were born during this time and already had been given in marriage to one of the brothers is uncertain (cf. 4:17, 25). Offering. In both cases the offering is formally one of thankful homage. 4 An expiatory purpose is not explicitly indicated even for Abel's offering; the stress on firstlings and their fat portions suggests consecration. 5 How God's favour was registered in the case of Abel over against Cain is not stated; see, however, Lv. 9:24; Jdg. 6:21; 1 Ki. 18:38; 1 Ch. 21:26; 2 Ch. 7:1ff.; cf. Ex. 14:24. That acceptance depended on the offerer's spiritual standing is suggested by the reference to the persons along with their gifts (vv. 4b, 5a) and confirmed by Heb. 11:4. 7 Sin is couching at the door, or, 'sin is the demon at the door', rôḇēṣ ('couching') being rather regarded as the Akkadian word rābiṣum, an 'entrance demon', here used not to suggest such a being, but in illustration of temptation's assault on Cain and recalling the serpent of Gn. 3.

8 Cain said to Abel. RSV, following the versions, unnecessarily adds to the MT (cf. RSV mg.). Against his brother. In jealous reaction to the manifestation of God's favour (v. 4; cf. 3:15), sin exerts its divisive power. Not mere social disorder was involved but radical religious discord, the enmity of the serpent's seed against the seed of the woman. Jesus interpreted Cain's murder of Abel as the first shedding of martyr's blood (Mt. 23:35; Lk. 11:51). 9 Where is Abel? Cain's hiding of the evidence of sin exposed sin's continuing love of concealment (cf. 3:8ff.). I do not know. Cain was a liar like his father, the devil (cf. 3:4). Am I my brother's keeper? By a virtual confession of a sin of omission Cain sought to cover his violent sin of commission. 10 The voice of your brother's blood. Martyr blood invokes the vengeance of God as covenant Protector (cf. Mt. 23:35; Heb. 11:4; 12:24; Rev. 6:9ff.). 11 You are cursed from the ground. Cf. 3:14, 17. Whether 'from' is here separative or derivative, Cain's judgment actually included both the increased recalcitrance of the soil (12; cf. 3:18f.) and separation from Eden, not as an outpost but an outcast. 14 From thy face I shall be hidden. The irony of the sentence is that it dooms Cain to what he desired. Whoever finds me will slay me. This reference probably includes wild beasts (cf. the related 9:2ff.), but possibly envisages also the peopling of the earth in coming years. 15 Vengeance shall be taken on him. The human community had to expand before a special judicial institution was established. A mark on Cain. Taking our cue from 9:2ff. again, the 'sign' appointed to Cain may have been the dread of man instilled in beasts (cf. 35:5). 16 Cain went away from the presence of the Lord. The race's firstborn, crown prince of the earth, portrays the tragic direction of fallen man: into exile, without God, without hope in the world.

4:17–24 Cainite culture. In Genesis an account of side branches precedes the genealogy of the principal line leading to Israel; so here, Cainites come before Sethites. 17 His wife. She would be a daughter of Adam (cf. 5:4), whether born (and even married) before Cain's banishment is uncertain. A city; i.e. a settlement protected by structures of some sort from a threatening environment. The rise of cities prepares for the emergence of kingship. The narrative condenses passing centuries. Enoch means 'consecration'. Here begins the theme of man's passion to establish his own name in the earth. 18 Father of. The idiom allows for remote ancestry; very considerable stretches of time must be spanned in this verse. Father–son terminology was even used for the professional relationship of the head of a guild to other members (cf. v. 20). 19 Two wives. Lamech's abuse of the creation ordinance of marriage exemplifies the ungodly spirit of Cainite culture. 22 Metal-work in late pre-diluvian times need not surprise us in view of evidence before 6,000 BC (perhaps early post-diluvian) of its use; the iron was probably meteoric. Tubal-cain. Cain's name was preserved in his royal successors. 23 I have slain. The judicial office degenerated into a vengeful tyranny in this heir of the murderous spirit of the dynasty's founder. 24 Lamech seventy-seven fold. The divine protection which Cain was glad to receive, Lamech scorned. Cainite culture culminated in defiance of Him to whom it should have been dedicated.

4:25, 26 Cult of Yahweh. Though the section Gn. 2:4 – 4:26 is largely concerned with sin's entrance and escalation, it closes with a notice of the preservation of a people of God and their worship. 25 Eve, according to her explanation of his name, saw in Seth God's restoration of the second covenant generation after its disappearance in Abel's martyrdom and Cain's excommunication. 26 Call upon the name of the Lord. There had been individual worship, including external rites (cf., e.g., 4:2ff.). Now the religious worship of the community of faith was organized for their corporate covenantal consecration to the name of Yahweh.

5:1 – 6:8 THE GENERATIONS OF ADAM

The story now doubles back upon itself (cf. the recapitulation in the days of Gn. 1) to pick up the line of Adam through Seth, and thus to survey again the period of 'the world that then was', tracing it now to its very close. 1, 2 An introduction (vv. 1b, 2) added to the heading (v. 1a) grounds this section in the prologue-history (cf. 1:26ff.), as was the preceding section (cf. 2:4.) Named them Man. The generic use of 'ādām contrasts with Adam as proper name in this context.

5:3–32 Covenant genealogy: Adam to Noah

As 3 shows, the sons listed in a genealogy need not be firstborn (or descended therefrom) and the age figure need not indicate when the subject first became a father. In his own likeness; cf. v. 1 and 1:27. Man too reproduces according to his kind (cf. 1:11f.), the divine image being transmitted in the process, yet as misdirected in man's Fall. 4, 5 All the days that Adam lived. Mesopotamian traditions reflect the race's memory of remarkable longevity, especially in pre-diluvian times. Whatever the physiological explanation, a providential purpose was the preservation of mankind, still few in number, young in technology, and obliged to cope with a fractious environment. And he died. With this refrain each biographical strophe ends, each except the last (yet cf. 9:28) and one other (see v. 24). Only violent death was mentioned in the Cainite section. Gn. 5 records 'natural' death inflicted as God's common curse on all (cf. 3:19). 22-24 The expression walked with God is unusual (see 6:9; cf. Mal. 2:6; Zc. 3:7); the experience evidently involved special revelation received (cf. God's walking in 3:8) and proclaimed (Jude 14f.). He was not, for God took him. Exempted from death (Heb. 11:5; cf. 2 Ki. 2:3, 5, 9ff.), Enoch's bodily translation into 'heaven' was a sign during the long pre-diluvian sway of the curse that reconciliation with God ultimately includes victory over death. 29 Shall bring us relief; the Hebrew verb is in assonance with Noah. For out of read 'from' (Heb., lit.) the ground. In Hebrew the reference to the accursed ground stands last, explaining the burdensome character of human labour. RSV rearranges, suggesting that the ground will somehow be the source of relief. Believers' hope in the world of promise (cf. Heb. 11) intensifies their awareness of God's curse on present cultural endeavours; contrast Cainite Lamech (4:23f.). 32 Shem, Ham, and Japheth. Shem was the oldest (cf. 7:11; 11:10); Ham, the youngest (cf. 9:24).

The genealogies of Gn. 5 and 11:10ff. are selective, not complete. The genealogical terms they employ are frequently used for remote descent. Selective genealogies are common in Scripture and elsewhere. Moreover, the symmetrical structure, with partiality for conventional numbers, which often signalizes selective listings, is found in Gn. 5 and 11:10ff. If we follow LXX in 11:10ff., each series contains ten individuals, the tenth in each case having three sons. Cf. especially the triple fourteen form of the obviously selective genealogy of Mt. 1, the tenfold scheme of generations in Genesis, and the tenfold selective genealogy of Ru. 4:18–22. The antiquity of the race cannot, then, be determined even approximately from the data of Gn. 5 and 11:10ff. The concern of Gn. 5 is the continuance of the covenant community through the entire pre-diluvian age.

6:1–8 Cult of man

6:1–4 Deified sinners. The theme of titanic kingship is resumed from 4:24, with the royal wives and dynastic exploits. Here the pinnacle of abominations is reached, provoking divine vengeance. 2 The sons of God could be translated 'the sons of the gods'. Ancient texts attest to an ideology of divine kingship; human kings were called sons of various gods. This blasphemous cult was a culmination of the Cainite name-lust (cf. 4:17). As in v. 1, daughters of men are the daughters of men in general. By such of them as they chose, polygamy is meant (cf. 4:19), as practised in royal harems. 3 My spirit shall not abide in man for ever. The verb has also been translated 'act in', 'rule in', 'strive with', 'shield'; cf. perhaps Jas. 4:5. The point becomes clear in the contrast: not for ever . . . but a hundred and twenty years. Man was sealed unto judgment, waiting at the set limit of divine forbearance. Problematic for the interpretation of the offenders as angels is the concentration of God's judgment against man and flesh. If Jude 6 does associate angels with this episode, that aspect could be incorporated as a supplementary dimension into the above interpretation. 4 Nephilim . . . the mighty men. Giant stature may be involved (cf. Nu. 13:33), but political dominance is probably indicated by the mighty (cf. 10:8ff.). In the courts of the divine kings powerful princes arose, extending their fathers' sway by tyrannical injustice (cf. v. 11). V. 4 appears to be inexplicable if vv. 1f. are interpreted as religiously mixed marriages of Sethites and Cainites. For men of renown read literally 'men of a name'. This again is the motif of 4:17ff.

6:5–8 Repentant deity. 5 As sinners multiplied (cf. v. 1), so did sin. According to God's analysis, human depravity was total. 6 The Lord was sorry; cf. AV, 'it repented the Lord'. In the strange cult of man sinners are deified and God does the repenting! It was the unchangeableness of the divine purpose, threatened by the near extinction of the woman's seed, that paradoxically required the change in divine government, an intrusion of radical judgment interrupting the administration of common curse and grace (cf. 3:16ff.). 7 I will blot out is an adumbration of watery judgment. 8 Noah found favour. This section, like the preceding (cf. 4:25) concludes on a note of hope.

6:9 – 9:29 THE GENERATIONS OF NOAH

6:9a The heading-formula here applies not to the subject's descendants (for Noah's descendants see 10:1ff. and 11:10ff.), but to the historical developments of his life-time. The extended treatment is indicative of the Flood's epoch-making importance (cf. 2 Pet. 3:5ff.). Since the ark-occupants' horizon evidently limits the meaning of the geographical observations (see on 6:13ff.), the narrative does not directly affirm a universal flood; nor does it deny one. Neither a local nor a universal flood involves difficulties insuperable to supernatural intervention, and no view should be rejected solely because it involves such intervention. The relevance of alleged evidence of a catastrophic flood at one time or another is rendered uncertain by our ignorance of the date of the Flood (see comments on Gn. 5 and 11:10ff.). For the same reason deductions drawn from the assumption that all mankind was destroyed are precarious, for we cannot say what portions of the earth were populated at an unknown date. Nevertheless, the Flood stands out in Scripture as the most general judgment between creation–Fall and the final consummation. At the least the Flood severed the central trunk of human history, the ark-remnant excepted, so terminating the old world and justifying the NT's representation of it as universal in its significance and as marking the end of one epoch and the beginning of another in God's programme of redemption.

6:9b – 8:19 Diluvian covenant

6:9b – 7:10 Strategy for salvation. 6:9b Integrity (tāmîm, RSV blameless) marked Noah's allegiance to the Lord among his contemporaries (generation, a different Hebrew word from 'generations' in v. 9a). 13 God said to Noah. The time of God's first disclosure concerning the Flood probably marked the start of the 120-year count-down (cf. 6:3, 5ff.). If 6:13 dates that early it antedates the birth of Noah's sons (cf. 5:32; 7:6) and 6:13–21 then summarizes a series of directives reaching to near the close of the 120 years (cf. v. 18b). With ('et) the earth suggests that man's whole world will share in his judgment (cf. 6:7, 17). But the point is probably man's removal 'from the earth' as in 6:7; 7:4, 23 (on 'et, 'from', cf. on 4:1). Later (v. 17) the mode of removal is specified as a Flood.

Here, and repeatedly, universal terminology is used to describe the Flood's devastation (cf. 6:7, 13, 17; 7:4, 21ff.; 8:21; 9:11, 15). Such terminology is sometimes used, however, in a limited sense (cf., e.g., 41:56f.; Dn. 2:38; 4:22; 5:19). Moreover, the Flood history is manifestly related from the local perspective of the ark-occupants (cf. 7:18ff.). On the other hand, the range of nations arising from Noah's sons in the post-diluvian era (cf. Gn. 10, especially v. 32; cf. 9:19) points to extensive depopulation in parts at least of Asia, Africa, and Europe. This favours a more than local interpretation.

14–16 Ark translates tēbâ, 'box', found elsewhere only in Ex. 2:3, 5. This 'vessel', about $450 \times 75 \times 45$ feet was designed for steady floating—the course, knots, and destination were completely in the hands of God. Salvation is of the Lord, by faith (cf. Heb. 11:7). 18 My covenant. Rather than taking this verse as an anticipation of 9:9ff., this covenant should be understood as the relationship within which the Flood-salvation was effected; see on 8:1. Like the new covenant, it was confirmed not by an oath symbolizing judgment (cf. Gn. 15:17–21) but by a real passage through an actual divine judgment. 22 He did all that God commanded. Noah was mediator of the covenant. By obedience to the covenant law, i.e. to construct and enter the ark-kingdom, he became the saviour of the elect remnant. To the rest of his generation, disobedient to the last (cf. 1 Pet. 3:20; Mt. 24:37ff.; Lk. 17:26f.), he was a prophetic witness (cf. 2 Pet. 2:5).

7:1–10 The period of construction and forewarning completed (6:11–22), a week (v. 4) was allowed for embarkation. Supplementing the stipulation that one pair of each animal-kind enter (6:19f.; 7:2b, 9), seven pairs (7:2a, 3) were required for clean animals and birds. According to another view, clean animals were to enter 'by sevens'; against this are the repeated male-female pairing and the absence of specification concerning an odd seventh. The clean-unclean distinction was possibly along the lines of Lv. 11 and Dt. 14, but had reference to sacrifice (cf. 8:20) rather than eating (cf. 9:3).

7:11–24 Ordeal by water. The flood (Heb. mabbûl, 6:17; 7:6, 7, 10, 17) denotes the cataclysmic phenomena of the forty-day period (7:14, 17) dated in v. 11. Apparently mabbûl is also applied, in extension of the precise usage in the Flood record proper, to the year-long episode (9:11, 15, 28; 10:1, 32; 11:10). Its chief element was torrential rains (vv. 11b, 12), though a surge of terrestrial waters contributed to the inundation (v. 11). By these waters God subjected the old world to the ordeal of His judgment, with its dual verdicts of condemnation and (for the elect remnant) of justification (cf. 1 Pet. 3:20). 13 On the very same day. The completion of embarkation and the beginning of the deluge synchronized. 16 The Lord shut him in. This sealing of the elect unto vindication was also a closing of the door of the kingdom on those outside. The theme shifts from God's protection of Noah's family through the mabbûl (vv. 11–16) to the prevailing of the waters (vv. 17–24; cf. 8:4). Chronologically the narrative recapitulates, for the forty days of the mabbûl are the first forty of the 150 days of prevailing (cf. 7:11, 24; 8:4). The prevailing is concerned with the effects of the mabbûl, particularly on the ark, on the mountains, and thus on all land life outside the ark. The rising water level, though involved, is not the distinctive feature of the prevailing. 17–19 Each verse begins by stating with increasing intensity that the waters prevailed. They lifted the ark from its land moorings, carried it away, and covered the mountains. 20–24 Read v. 20 as in AV: 'Fifteen cubits upward did the waters prevail; and the mountains were covered.' This summarizes vv. 17–19. By rising 15 cubits, the draught of the ark, the waters bore it up. Continuing to rise, they covered all the mountains in sight (cf. 8:5), so removing all land refuge. The prevailing continued a hundred and fifty days, for although life outside the ark had perished even within the mabbûl period, other aspects of the prevailing (viz. the covering of the mountains and floating of the ark) continued longer (cf. 8:4).

8:1–19 Vindication in judgment. Again there is chronological recapitulation as the theme becomes the subsiding of the waters (vv. 1–12); for the subsiding began as soon as the forty-day mabbûl ended and continued through the last 110 days of prevailing. Then it continued almost another half year (cf. vv. 4, 13), being followed by the time of re-emergence (vv. 13–19).

1 God remembered Noah. God's faithfulness in fulfilling His covenant promise is characteristically expressed as a remembering of His covenant (cf., e.g., 9:15f.; Ex. 2:24; 6:5; Lk. 1:72) or the individual(s) to whom He made covenant promises (cf., e.g., 19:29; Ex. 32:13). God made a wind blow; cf. 1:2; Ex. 14:21. 3–5 Came to rest shows that a favourable verdict was rendered at the end of the ordeal. From this verb, nûaḥ, the name Noah may derive. Ararat was a land near Lake Van in Armenia, strategically central for post-diluvian emigration. The ark landed on the highest mountain within the view of its occupants, not necessarily the highest in Ararat. The computation in v. 3b and the date in v. 4a coincide. Hence, the statement that the waters had abated means they were lacking (ḥāsar, lit.) the 15 cubits necessary to prevail over (i.e. to float) the ark at its location. This lack resulted from a previous process of receding (v. 3a) that began when the mabbûl phenomena terminated (v. 2; cf. 7:11f., 17). According to 7:24, the date of the ark's grounding marked the end of the waters' prevailing. Therefore, the prevailing of the waters over the mountains (cf. 7:19ff.) must also have ended by then. The situation was probably that the peak of the mountain on which the ark landed had become visible above the waters even before the grounding (and will then have served as the gauge of the recession recorded in v. 3a), but the other mountains within the range of vision were not seen until later (v. 5). The complete subsiding, however, involved further this emergence of the surrounding mountains and later still the re-appearance of all the land observable from the now uncovered ark (v. 13). Evidently the limited perspective from the ark's opening (cf. 6:16) before the covering was removed, plus the contours of the terrain around the ark, prevented a view down onto the lower slopes and valleys.

6–12 The successive reconnoitring missions of the raven and dove(s) were well calculated to keep Noah informed on the progressive recession at these lower, unobservable elevations. 13 About a month after these bird episodes the Noahic exodus began. Like the Mosaic it was related to a beginning of months (cf. Ex. 12:2). Noah removed the covering. As he did so the light of God's new day streamed into the darkness of the ark-tomb, the beginning of a veritable resurrection after the passage through the sea of death. From the new vantage-point Noah could see that the waters were removed from even the lower areas. 14–19 More time was allowed for the ground to dry and perhaps for plants to grow. Then, one year and ten days after God had sealed the ark unto judgment (whether lunar or solar year is uncertain), He commanded the survivors to come forth, vindicated, to inherit the new world.

8:20 – 9:17 Post-diluvian covenant

8:20–22 Covenant protectorate. 20 The ark-builder built an altar; so his culture found its true goal in religious dedication to the Lord. 21 Noah's sacrifice also expressed propitiation (cf. the pleasing odour). From this redemptive work of special grace the blessings of common grace issue (vv. 21b ff.). The Lord said in his heart. The turning aside of God's wrath is underscored by repetition of the form (i.e. the divine musing) and language of His earlier judicial decree (cf. 6:5ff.). Curse the ground. The diluvian ground-cursing consisted in using nature to curse man, not in changing nature. For (Heb. kî). This might be translated 'though'. But this clause probably continues to quote the verdict of 6:5ff.; i.e. it explains what is meant by because of man. 22 Shall not cease. This covenant promise established the earth as a protectorate of heaven—until the final judgment.

9:1–7 Covenant mandate. Divine blessing and command combine as mankind is recommissioned to the kingdom programme assigned him at the beginning. The covenant is at once a revelation of God's law and grace, and in both a sovereign administration of His lordship. 1 Be fruitful (cf. 8:17). The post-diluvian covenant is one of life. Its stipulations deal with the propagation of life (vv. 1 and 7), life's protection and sanctity (vv. 2 and 5f.), and its sustenance (vv. 3f.; cf. 8:22). Implicit in these stipulations is the continuance of the creation ordinances of marriage and labour. 2,3 The dread of man was surely on beasts previously and man's eating of animal flesh may likewise be a renewal of a pre-diluvian appointment. 4 The prohibition of blood had its rationale in blood's sanctity as a symbol in altar sacrifice. 5, 6 That human life might be protected, God ordained the cutting off of every kind of man-slayer. Of every man's brother. The murder of man by man is always fratricide. By man shall his blood be shed. During Lamech's dynasty human life was in jeopardy as much through the tyranny of the royal judiciary (cf. 4:23f.) as through the violence of common criminals. This reaffirmation of the state's power of the sword regulates it by insisting that the punishment does not exceed, but matches the crime. For God made man in his own image. This could explain both the enormity of murder and the dignity of man that justified assigning him so grave a judicial responsibility.

9:8–17 Covenant sign. 9 I establish my covenant. God's covenants regulate an order of life under His suzerainty. A peculiarity of this one is that it is an interim arrangement without eschatological sanctions. 10, 11 It is a covenant of life but only of earthly life, subservient to God's redemptive covenant of eternal life. Another peculiarity is that it does not revolve around a personal relationship between God and a people, but is between me and the earth (v. 13), i.e. it embraces the impersonal creatures and the earth itself (as almost every verse reiterates). God's pledge to stabilize the natural order, not devastating the world again before the end-time, dominates the arrangement. 12–17 Agreeably, the sign of the covenant is a divine guarantee to man and a reminder to God of His commitments as world-Protector. My bow translates qešet, the usual meaning of which is the weapon. Thus, the recurring rainbow imposed on the retreating storm by the shining again of the sun is God's battle bow laid aside, a token of grace staying the lightning-shafts of wrath.

9:18–27 Covenant in prophecy

9:18–23 Community divided. 18 Ham was the father of Canaan. This anticipatively connects Ham's sin (v. 22) and the curse on Canaan (vv. 25ff.). 19b Cf. 10:1ff. 20 Translated literally this reads, 'Noah, the husbandman, began and planted a vineyard'. RSV here unnecessarily foists a contradiction upon the biblical record (cf., e.g., 4:2). 22 Ham saw . . . and told. This act of malicious disrespect, if it did not evidence a present encroachment of the serpent's seed within the remnant family, yet foreboded such. The exposure of nakedness recalls Satan's work (cf. Gn. 3); the covering of nakedness (v. 23) recalls the divine clothing of fallen man (3:21) and so bespeaks a spirit devoted to the imitation of God.

9:24-27 Patriarchal curse. 24 When Noah . . . knew what his youngest son had done. This introduction relating the pronouncement to the offence shows it is primarily a curse. To the same effect is the repetition of the curse on Canaan in connection with the blessings on Shem and Japheth. This utterance belongs to the series of personal curses which began with the primaeval curse against Satan (3:14) and continued with that against Cain (4:11). Its terms must not be secularized, but must be understood within the sacred history entailed in God's judgment against Satan. 25 Cursed be Canaan. In each case the curse (or blessing) does not apply to all the members of the ethnic groups represented by the individual named but rather finds an outstanding fulfilment in the history of the group. Thus, Shem and Japheth are blessed in their descendants just as Ham is cursed in his. The mention of Ham's son, Canaan, simply makes it more obvious in that case and points directly to the fulfilment in view. A slave of slaves shall he be to his brothers. The opposition between Canaan and the other two, who are identified with the covenant community, declares his reprobation. The subordination of Canaan signifies the defeat of Satan's seed; the woman's seed would crush their head. There is a pun on Canaan's name; kāna' is used for subjugation and indeed with reference to Israel's conquest of Canaan, the fulfilment of Noah's curse (Dt. 9:3; Jdg. 4:23). 26 Follow RSV mg., 'blessed be the Lord, the God of Shem'. The doxology contains the benediction. The curse on Satan (3:15) implied salvation for God's elect; so the curse on Canaan was the means of blessing to Shem-Israel. Israel possessed its promised kingdom by dispossessing Canaan. Shem means 'name'; the blessing was Shem's identification with God's covenant name, Yahweh, as seen particularly in the Abrahamic covenant. 27 God enlarge (yapt) Japheth (yepeṭ). The outstanding development in redemptive history that found Japhethites entering the Abrahamic covenant community was the NT's apostolic mission to the Gentiles.

28, 29 The section on the generations of Noah has the popular envelope form, beginning (6:9a) and closing with genealogical formulae. These verses complete 5:32. The computation perhaps reckons the mabbûl strictly, as only the first forty days.

10:1 – 11:9 THE GENERATIONS OF THE SONS OF NOAH

The multiplication of the race was attributable to the creative blessing of God (8:15ff.; 9:1, 7; cf. Acts 17:26). Yet this new dispersion (10:1ff.) must also be seen as a curse, a continuation of man's exile-history (cf. 3:23f.; 4:16). The affixed Babel episode (11:1ff.) accents that perspective.

10:1–32 Diaspora of the nations

The order is that of seniority except that the chosen Semite line comes last according to the usual pattern, even though they are here traced alongside rather than directly to Israel (11:10ff.). The descendants total a conventional seventy, an indication that exhaustive listing is not the purpose. Apart from obvious exceptions like Nimrod, the 'sons' are collective units, genealogically related to the Noahic branch to which they are assigned. Because of early intermarriages and later community interblending, certain groups could trace their lineage to more than one line. Within the three major divisions subgroupings were distinguishable by the geographical, linguistic, ethnological, and political differences cited in the colophons (vv. 5, 20, 31).

10:2–5 Sons of Japheth. According to generally-accepted identifications, the Japhethites occupied territory N and NW of the Fertile Crescent. Noah's oracle (9:27) prophesied their enlargement as the prelude to their grand-scale entrance into the covenant. Agreeably, they are here found stretching to the ends of the earth (with v. 5 cf. Is. 41:5), to the isles which would receive the summons to the Messianic kingdom (cf., e.g., Ps. 72:10; Is. 49:1ff.).

10:6–20 Sons of Ham. Their location was in general SW of the Fertile Crescent. 8 Read as in AV, 'he began to be a mighty one'. Nimrod's royal title recalls 6:4. 9 Prowess in hunting man-slaying beasts was an important and, in Mesopotamia, a peculiarly royal skill (cf. 9:5). 10 AV reads 'The beginning of his kingdom was Babel, and Erech, and Accad and Calneh, in the land of Shinar'. Shinar is Babylonia. 'Calneh' is not mentioned elsewhere; all of them (RSV) is obtained by a simple alteration of the vowels of the Hebrew word. 11 He went into Assyria (cf. Mi. 5:6); AV translates 'went forth Asshur'. Possibly Nimrod's activity at Babel is that described in 11:2ff.; if so, cf. 10:11 and 11:8f. 15–18 The Canaanite peoples anticipate the conquest lists of Israel that document the fulfilment of Noah's curse (cf. 9:25). 19 Similarly the delineation of Canaanite territory previews Israel's promised possession. Canaan's curse is also in view in the list of doomed cities of the plain (v. 19b).

10:21–31 Sons of Shem. 21 Father of all the children of Eber. Noah associated the covenant line with Shem (9:26). This was realized in Abraham, 'the Hebrew' (i.e. Eberite); cf. 11:10, 16, 26. The Semites occupied the area between the Japhethites and Hamites around the Arabian subcontinent. 25 Peleg . . . the earth was divided (niplᵉgâ). Does the pun refer to the bifurcating of the Eberites into the chosen line through Peleg (cf. 11:17ff.) and the Joktan line (10:26ff.), or was Peleg's family involved in the dispersion from Babel (11:1ff.)?

32 is the colophon for the entire chapter. On the earth translates 'ereṣ, a Hebrew word of variable scope, which here denotes the known world of the nations listed.

11:1–9 Dispersion from Babel

1, 2 The whole earth. If 'ereṣ is used as in 10:32, the linguistic observation applies to a situation not long after the Flood and this verse bridges a lengthy interval. If 'ereṣ refers to the land ('ereṣ) of Shinar the perspective of v. 1 is not universal; cf. v. 9. In either case, the migrating group of vv. 2ff. is only a part of mankind. Their pre-Babel migration belonged to the process of dispersion from Ararat already under way (cf. Gn. 10) and their own further dispersion from Babel (vv. 8f.) is recorded as a special judgment on their blatant embodiment of the ungodly spirit that again after the Flood characterized human civilization. 4 The city once more (cf. Gn. 4) becomes the cultural focus of mounting human arrogance. Tower (miḡdōl) could be a fortress; Dt. 1:28 and 9:1 speak of cities fortified up to heaven. Parallels to the account of the building of Babylon and its temple-tower (cf. the Babylonian epic Enuma Elish) suggest the miḡdōl was a prototype ziggurat or temple-mound, first found in classical form early in the third millennium BC. On the lust for a name, cf. 4:17, 22ff.; 6:4; 10:9.

5 The Lord came down to see. As in Ps. 2 God laughs at the counsel of kings, so here He ridicules and humbles the vanity of the tower-builders, for He must descend (so the anthropomorphism) to catch sight of their proud pinnacle far below. 7 Let us go down; cf. 1:27; 3:22; 18:2, 21; 19:1. Confuse their language. The confusion possibly resulted from a protracted natural process, but probably a supernatural intervention is intended, a strange miracle of confusion to be answered at Pentecost by another divine descent and a miracle of linguistic fusion. The text does not attribute all language differentiation to this event, nor even claim it as the first instance of such after the Flood, nor deny linguistic variations before the Flood. 8 Scattered them. What the Babelites thought to avert befell them more disruptively than was elsewhere transpiring naturally. 9 Babel, because there the Lord confused (bālal). Whatever its original meaning, the name meant 'gate-of-god', according to popular etymology in the Sumerian and Babylonian renderings. The satirical polemic of the Mosaic narrative appears in this Babel-bālal pun. Viewed through this interpretative episode, the dispersion movement of Gn. 10 appears as a curse, a centrifugal force separating men and retarding the subjugation of the earth (cf. v. 6b). Yet in sin's context this curse proved a blessing for it also retarded the ripening iniquity that accompanied civilization's progress (v. 6) and so it forestalled such judgment as would have interfered with the unfolding of redemption.

11:10-26 THE GENERATIONS OF SHEM

The era from the Flood to the age of Abraham surveyed in the preceding section is here recapitulated, the topic now being the lineal relation of Shem to Abraham. This was partially given in 10:21-25, but here the whole interval is spanned and the fuller genealogical pattern used for the covenant line in 5:1ff., with its additional statistics from the family register, is followed. Omitted, however, are the closing total of each individual's years and the statement of death. The evidence of cultural sequences in the empire centres and elsewhere for thousands of years before Abraham shows that this genealogy, if interpreted as complete, would be too brief for the over-all period of time involved, and so confirms the selective interpretation. Certainly also we ought not to suppose (as would be necessary if the list were complete) that Noah was alive in Abraham's day and that Shem and most of the others listed were alive at Abraham's call. Would Joshua then have been justified in describing Israel's fathers of Abraham's generation solely in terms of Terah's idolatry (Jos. 24:2)? Also problematic for that interpretation would be the progressive reduction of the life span from 600 years to some 200 years in the course of what would be ten contemporary generations within some 300 years. See comments on 5:1ff. for the significance of the symmetrical literary pattern. To obtain a total of ten names in 11:10ff., the name Cainan, found in LXX and Luke's genealogy (Lk. 3:36), must be included after Arpachshad. Gn. 11 affords no basis for dating the Flood, even to the nearest thousand years.

10 A hundred years old . . . two years after the flood. Consistency with the data in 5:32 and 7:11 is demonstrable given various combinations of the following possibilities: Shem was born (or even begotten) at the end of Noah's 500th year; the mabbûl (flood) is meant in its proper sense of the first forty days; the begetting of Arpachshad was in the second year (not necessarily at its close) after the mabbûl. Some of the names in this genealogy are attested in extra-biblical sources, all pre-Mosaic. It was not uncommon for the names of persons and places to be the same. The names of the following ancestors of Abraham have been found as place-names in NW Mesopotamia: 18 Peleg; 22 Serug; 24 Nahor (cf. v. 26); 26 Terah. The place-name Haran (v. 31; Assyr. ḫarrānu, 'main road') is not identical with that of Abram's brother Haran in v. 26. Evidently the homeland of the Eberites of Peleg's line was in the north.

11:27 - 25:11 THE GENERATIONS OF TERAH

Man's kingship under God had found expression in Noah's kingdom in the ark. Now the kingdom of God is given to Abram to be possessed in God's promises, by faith. The heavenly kingdom was to appear first in pre-Messianic typical form, then in the corresponding reality of Messianic fulfilment. The Abrahamic narrative is concerned throughout with the themes of the kingdom inheritance and the kingdom heir, with emphasis on the former in 11:27 - 15:21 and the latter from ch. 16 onwards. The appearance of Terah's (not Abram's) name in the 11:27a heading accords with the Genesis framework's concern with the genealogical origins of the twelve tribes of Israel, for they stemmed from Terah not only through Abram but through Sarai (20:12) and through Rebekah, Leah, and Rachel of the lineage of Nahor, son of Terah.

11:27 - 15:21 Abram's kingdom inheritance

11:27-32 Terah's migration. 28 Ur of the Chaldeans. The usual identification with Babylonian Ur is questioned since lower Mesopotamia was not called after the Chaldeans until a thousand years after Abraham. The evidence of personal and place-names (cf. 11:18ff.) and of social-legal traditions indicates ancestral associations with the north. Gn. 24:1-10 and Jos. 24:2 seem to assign a northern homeland to the Terahites. Hence the old identification of Ur with a northern site has been renewed, with appeal to the ancient 'Haldai' designation of that area to explain 'of the Chaldeans'. From such a location, but not from southern Ur, Haran would fall on the route to Canaan (cf. v. 31). 30 Sarai was barren. The theme of the heir is anticipated from the outset. 31 Together, Hebrew 'ittam, which AV translates 'with them', could also be 'from them', i.e. from Nahor's family (cf. v. 29).

12:1-9 Abram's summons to Canaan. Judging from Stephen's interpretation (Acts 7:2ff.; cf. Gn. 15:7; Ne. 9:7), Abram received God's call while still in Ur. The arrangement at 12:1 is then determined by the topic and not by chronology. Stephen also placed Abram's departure from Haran (v. 4) after Terah's death (11:32). In view of the age data in 11:26, 32 and 12:4, that would mean Abram was born when Terah was 130 and the reason Abram's name is listed first in 11:26 and 27 is not Abram's primogeniture but his importance. The Samaritan Pentateuch obviates this last problem by assigning 145 years to Terah, not 205.

1 The Lord said. The Abrahamic covenant was initiated by the word of God—imperative and promissory. It was a suzerainty covenant, establishing the Abrahamic community as a divine protectorate, with both stipulations and guarantees. Go from your country. Idolatrous allegiances of the Terahite household (cf. Jos.

24:2) must be forsaken and commitment given to the lordship of Yahweh. 2 A great nation; gôy ('nation') involves territory and people. Abram's faith perceived in this promise the city of God belonging to a better, heavenly country (cf. Heb. 11:10ff., 16), a heavenly Jerusalem that is the common destiny of all the woman's chosen seed from Abel to history's last witness to Jesus (cf. Heb. 11:4ff., 39f.; 12:22), the city-kingdom of which the Israelite kingdom in Canaan was a provisional foretaste until the Messianic age had come. For you will be a blessing read as in RV, 'be thou . . .'. It is a creative benediction, or fiat. The Abrahamic kingdom was a reinstituting of the creation kingdom (cf. 35:11), now to be attained through a redemptive process. 3 By you all the families of the earth will bless themselves. The NT's interpretative quotation of this, following LXX, indicates that the nations are actually blessed through the Abrahamic covenant (see Acts 3:25; Gal. 3:8). A reflexive translation in this verse is consistent with that, for those who bless themselves by Abram show they are prepared to relate to him in a brotherly fellowship of blessing, and God here promises that such will actually be blessed. The blessing is mediated through Abram and his seed (cf. 22:18; 26:4; 28:14), yet is God's blessing. These two aspects meet in the identification of the mediator-seed as Christ (cf. Gal. 3:16). Him who curses you I will curse. In God's becoming Abram's covenant Lord, the Noahic benediction on Shem was being fulfilled—with its corollary curse on Canaan (cf. 9:26).

4 So Abram went. Not all that is narrated of Abram's conduct is commendable, but there is a series of exemplary acts of obedience in faith that secured for him the title 'friend of God', i.e. one who manifests loyalty to God (cf. 2 Ch. 20:7; Is. 41:8; Jas. 2:23). Lot went with him. Lot's prominence may be due to the possibility he offered Abram of an heir. The common practice of adoption would readily suggest itself to Abram under the circumstances of Haran and Terah's deaths and Sarai's barrenness (cf. 11:28–30). 5 Canaan. Though not specifying Canaan as the promised land, God's summons (vv. 1ff.; cf. Heb. 11:8) evidently pointed Abram in that direction. 6 Canaanites were in the land (cf. 13:7). This statement, immediately preceding the designation of Canaan as God's territorial grant to Abram's descendants (v. 7), contrasts the actual situation to the ideal in the promise. 7, 8 An altar to the Lord. This altar, built at the site of Yahweh's theophany, expressed Abram's faith that this land was Yahweh's to give. So, too, a second altar was erected further south in the very shadow of Canaanite cities behind and before. 8b Cf. 4:26. 9 Journeyed on. Such was to be the pilgrim character of the patriarchs' lives in Canaan (cf. Heb. 11:9ff.). Negeb, literally 'dry', is the indefinite area of the highlands in the south. Archaeological evidence of settlements in the Negeb between the 21st and 19th centuries BC supports biblical chronological data placing the patriarchs' residence there in that same period.

12:10–20 Egyptian sojourn. 10 Down to Egypt. Reports of Egyptian border officials show that it had long been customary to grant refuge to Asiatics who came seeking relief from famine (cf. 26:1ff.; 43:1ff.). 13 The stratagem of passing off Sarai as my sister had been agreed upon when they left Terah's house (cf. 20:13). It involved a half-truth, for Sarai was Terah's daughter, though not by Abram's mother (cf. 20:12). Possibly there was a further element of truth in the deception. From the area of Abram's origins comes evidence of the legal institution of 'sistership', a status that could be secured by a wife. It afforded special privilege and would constitute superior credentials, as in a foreign court. In a fratriarchal society (cf. 24:29 and the prominence of Laban, Rebekah's brother), a woman given in marriage by a brother enjoyed a dual wife-sister status. The stratagem as employed by Abram (and later Isaac) was intended primarily to hide his identity as husband; but the sister status (if such it was) would have meant additional advantages. The patriarch's weakness gave occasion for a manifestation of the Lord's faithfulness as covenant-Protector, cursing those who were inimical to the fulfilment of the covenant-programme and preserving the appointed ancestress of Israel to bear the heir of promise (vv. 17ff.). 16 He dealt well with Abram. God's prospering of Abram out of Pharaoh's wealth did not mean approval of his subterfuge; it was a matter of grace. The inclusion of camels among Abram's expanding possessions is not anachronistic. There is clear evidence of domestication of the camel at the beginning of the 2nd millennium BC, even though their common use in caravans dates considerably later. 17 Great plagues. The whole pattern of Abraham's experience in Egypt forms a remarkable parallel to Israel's sojourn there.

13:1–18 Territorial grants and claims. 1 Though not mentioned in 12:10–20, Lot had been in Egypt, benefiting from Abram's favoured status (v. 5) and acquiring a taste for luxuriant valleys (cf. v. 10, 'like the land of Egypt'). 2 Very rich . . . in silver, and in gold. Even before Abram journeyed to Canaan his company and possessions had become substantial at Haran (cf. 12:5). The Terahites were perhaps merchants engaged in caravan trade. Was that the purpose of Terah's journeying from Ur and was it the business opportunities found at Haran, the caravan city, that curtailed the journey to Canaan? Abram may well have been trading along the known donkey-caravan routes of the Negeb during his years there. Cf. 20:1; 34:10; 42:34. His flocks and herds would be natural adjuncts of his commerce and the military contingent in his company (cf. 14:14) would be protection for his caravans. The patriarchs were certainly not desert nomads. The ass was their regular beast of burden. Their home stations were near urban centres but in the more sparsely populated hill country. They were resident aliens in their associations with cities. Isaac's agricultural enterprise (26:12) may represent a transition to a more settled state, but the generally transient mode of life accentuated their pilgrim-stranger position in the land.

5-7 Could not support both. Even his wealth tried Abram's faith by reminding him how limited was his liberty in the promised land; cf. v. 7b. 8–13 Yet within the scope of his prerogatives Abram displayed the generosity of faith. The way chosen by Lot betrayed impatience to secure the promised bounty of the land (v. 10) without due regard to the covenant's ethical demands (cf. v. 13). 14, 15 After Abram's land grant and Lot's claim came Yahweh's grant and Abram's claim. In its definition of the land this revelation was transitional between the vagueness of 12:7 and the precision of 15:17ff. 16 The 'great nation' promise of 12:2 was also elaborated. 17 Walk through the length and breadth. Cf. Jos. 24:3. This was probably a symbolic legal rite by which one staked claim to real estate. A walk of faith, indeed! 18 At Hebron. Abram settled more permanently here, entering into parity covenants with the local princes (cf. 14:13), yet building an altar, his third, in confession of Yahweh as great Overlord of the land and claiming it for Him.

14:1–24 Overlord of Canaan. 1, 2 The precise political situation envisaged in Gn. 14 and the particular kings have not yet been identified. Many of the names, however, are recognized as authentic types for the early second millennium BC. Characteristic of that period, too, were coalitions for political power. The equivalent of the name Arioch has been found in the Mari and Nuzi documents. Chedorlaomer consists of two elements in a typical Elamite name pattern and means 'servant of (the goddess) Lakamar'. Tidal corresponds to Tudhalia, a Hittite royal name. The once-favoured identification of Amraphel with Hammurabi is now known to be impossible on linguistic grounds, as well as on the ground that the famous Babylonian king lived centuries after Abram. Shinar stands first, perhaps, to give a Babelite ideological colouring to the enterprise of the four kings (cf. 11:2ff.). The identity of Ellasar is uncertain. Goiim (the Hebrew means 'nations') possibly designates a group of cities in Asia Minor federalized under Tidal. Elam, to the SE of Babylonia, dominated the coalition. There was a strong Elamite dynasty about 2000 BC. 3 Valley of Siddim (that is, the Salt Sea). In the centuries between Abram and Moses the plain to the S of the Lisan had become a shallow extension of the Dead Sea. 4 In the thirteenth year. Chedorlaomer's vassal treaty had been imposed shortly before Abram came to Canaan. 5 Came and subdued. Expeditions of comparable distance are attested for Mesopotamian kings even before 2000 BC. The invasion route followed the King's Highway, a caravan route running from the north southwards to the Gulf of Aqabah (by-passing the cities of the plain), and thence NW through the Negeb, circling back on the Valley of Siddim. The Transjordan area (like the Negeb) had extensive permanent settlements from about the 21st to the 19th centuries BC. This condition then abruptly ceased, but not necessarily as an immediate consequence of Chedorlaomer's invasion.

13 Abram the Hebrew. Like the other leaders in this context Abram is ethnically identified. He was a descendant of Eber ('ibrî, 'Eberite' or 'Hebrew'). Consistently in the OT the usage of 'ibrî is ethnic. The question arises whether Eberites appear in literature outside the Bible, and specifically whether the Habiru mentioned in texts from all over the Near East during the 2nd millennium are such. The Habiru were apparently professional militarists with perhaps an original ethnic unity. Theoretically, the originally ethnic term 'ibrî might have acquired a professional significance in connection with a branch of Eberites who became militarists (i.e. the Habiru), while the ethnic meaning was preserved in the OT for the Abrahamites. It would then be plausible to interpret the term in the professional (Habiru) sense even in Gn. 14:13. But the whole theory would require substantiation and the phonetic equation involved is highly problematic. Moreover, the section beginning at Gn. 14:13 finds its climax in a benediction-doxology (vv. 19f.) in series with Noah's (cf. 9:26), which suggests that Abram is here called the Hebrew to relate the Abrahamic fulfilment of Noah's covenant promise to Shem through the genealogical connection (cf. 10:21).

14 Led forth his trained men, or 'drew (as a sword) his retainers'. Vassal covenants stipulated that the vassal must dispatch forces to protect the overlord's interests at the report of trouble. Yahweh's peculiar territorial claims were impinged upon by Chedorlaomer's claims on Canaan, and therefore Abram acts. 15 Routed them. No supernatural assistance is implied. The total size of the confederate force (cf. vv. 13, 24) and other factors are not known. 17, 18 King's Valley. The location is uncertain but is conjectured to be near Jerusalem (cf. 2 Sa. 18:18). Neither is it altogether certain that the Melchizedek episode transpired there. The verb in v. 18 may be pluperfect 'had brought out'. Melchizedek. Cf. Ps. 110:4; Heb. 7:1ff. Salem is Jerusalem (cf. Ps. 76:2). God Most High (Heb. 'ēl 'elyôn); each word is used for a deity in Canaanite texts, but the One on whom Melchizedek called as 'ēl 'elyôn, confessing Him the Maker of heaven and earth, was identified by Abram as Yahweh, the Creator. It thus appears that during Abram's sojourning in Canaan a settled community of true faith existed under the priesthood of the king of Salem. Melchizedek was greater than Abram, but the Messianic seed of Abram would be a greater than Melchizedek.

19, 20 Blessed be Abram . . . enemies into your hand. The blessing of the elect again has as its corollary the cursing of those who would curse them (cf. 9:26; 12:2f.). A tenth. By this tribute payment Abram testified that, whatever authorities exercised control over Canaan, Yahweh was Overlord over all. 21–24 His oath was probably sworn before Melchizedek. Vassals were customarily allowed to retain the spoil of battles fought for their suzerains, but it was the latter's prerogative to stipulate this in their treaties. The king of Sodom apparently sought to assume that role but Abram rejected the relationship. Vassal treaties prohibited subordination to any other royal benefactors. Rejection of the king of Sodom's proposal was the consistent negative counterpart to Abram's positive oath of allegiance to Yahweh as his covenant Lord.

15:1–21 Yahweh's covenant oath. The covenant was ratified first by divine oath (Gn. 15), and afterwards by human oath (Gn. 17). The vassal-oath was characteristic at this time of extra-biblical covenants, but on occasion suzerains would also commit themselves by oath, particularly in connection with land grants (cf. vv. 18ff.).

1 In a vision. If this 'vision' covers the entire chapter, it apparently included a variety of psychological states from sleep-like trance (vv. 12ff.) to a waking state with supersensory awareness (vv. 5, 10f., 17; cf. 2 Ki. 6:17). If the narrative is arranged chronologically, a period of daylight (or a longer period) intervenes between vv. 5 and 12. If it is arranged topically, a plausible reconstruction would involve the following: v. 7 describes the episode's beginning; vv. 1b–4 belong to the trance of vv. 12ff. (note the appropriateness of God's fear not (v. 1) to Abram's dread (v. 12)); the waking experience of vv. 5f. belongs with that of vv. 17ff. Shield (Heb. māgēn); cf. Pss. 3:3; 28:7; 33:20. If, by altering the vowels, this word were read as mōgēn, the translation would be 'I am giving your reward'. 2–5 What wilt thou give me? Fulfilment of the kingdom promise depended on Abram having a dynasty to inherit it. 2b contains an obscure pun on 'Damascus' but 3 clarifies Abram's plaint. He had followed the Mesopotamian custom, well attested between 2000 and 1500 BC, whereby childless couples adopted an heir (in some cases a former slave). Adoption contracts stipulated that a natural son subsequently born would replace the adopted son as chief heir. That is the legal context of God's reassurance. 6 AV reads, 'he believed in the Lord'. The verb 'āman here expresses trust in God and therefore confident assent to His revelation of supernatural saving grace. This statement may refer to an actual 'Amen' spoken by Abram, for so vassals responded in covenant ceremonies to the proclamation of the associated rewards and penalties (cf. Dt. 27:15–26). 6b Cf. Rom. 4:3, 17ff.; Gal. 3:6ff.

The subject of the heir (vv. 1–6) is treated in subordination to the kingdom promise prominent in the verses that follow. 7 I am the Lord who brought you from Ur. This self-identification and reference to God's redemptive initiative corresponds to the standard opening sections of classic treaties, the preamble in which the royal covenant-maker proclaimed his style and title, followed by the historical prologue in which he recounted his mighty acts (cf. Ex. 20:2). 10 Cut them in two. The oath ritual for which Abram prepared was customary in treaty ratifications. From it derived various idioms for making a covenant, like the Hebrew 'cut a covenant' (so v. 18, lit.). The curse conditionally invoked in the oath was symbolized by this slaying and sundering of animals, signifying 'so may it be done to him who breaks this covenant' (cf. 1 Sa. 11:7). 11 The birds of prey portrayed the final act in the curse symbolism; cf. Je. 34:17–20. 12 A deep sleep; cf. 2:21. Great darkness. In this dread setting came the forewarning of Egyptian bondage.

The length of the sojourn in Egypt is stated in a round number (with v. 13 cf. Ex. 12:40) and as four 'generations', or better, 'lifetimes' (v. 16), calculated at about a century each (less than the patriarchs' own life spans). V. 15 shows that these four centuries did not include the 215 years spent by Abram, Isaac, and Jacob in Canaan, for the sojourn was to be experienced by Abram's descendants after his own death. 14 I will bring judgment. Long postponement would terminate in fulfilment of God's kingdom promises (cf. 12:3) at the provisional OT level through mighty acts of redemptive judgment (cf. Acts 7:17). The blessing of the Abrahamites would be accomplished through the cursing of the Egyptians and Amorites who cursed them (cf. 12:3). 16 The iniquity of the Amorites; cf. Lv. 18:24ff.; 20:22ff.; 1 Ki. 14:24. God's times (cf. Dn. 2:21) are not arbitrary, nor is His forbearance for ever (cf. 2 Pet. 3:9f.). 17 Smoking fire pot and a flaming torch. The theophany utilizes, as often elsewhere, the elements of fire and smoke to indicate God's presence; cf. especially Ex. 3:2ff.; 13:21f.; 19:18. By passing alone between the pieces God swore fidelity to His covenant promises, and took upon Himself all the curses symbolized by the carcasses. 18 The Lord made a covenant—such was the meaning of the strange ritual. From the river of Egypt to the great river. Cf. 1 Ki. 4:21. Several non-biblical treaties have geographical sections like this, listing the cities and defining the boundaries confirmed to the vassal. The land belongs to Abram's seed only within the terms of the covenant and thus only in the seed of Abram, Christ, in whom the land-promise is transfigured into its cosmic antitype (cf. Rom. 4:13) and the heirs of Abraham become the universal covenant community of the NT, there being neither Jew nor Greek in Christ.

16:1 – 22:19 Abraham's dynastic heir

16:1–15 Ishmael, son of the bondwoman. 1 The theme of the heir is reintroduced from the aspect of the natural obstacles challenging faith (cf. 11:30). In the ten years since the departure from Haran (see v. 16; cf. 12:4) the promise had been reiterated, but Sarai continued barren and alternate hopes focusing on Lot and Eliezer had been frustrated. 2 Sarai's suggestion that Abram take Hagar as a concubine was in keeping with the practice of that day as attested in legal code and marriage contract. The latter sometimes stipulated that a barren wife must acquire a slave-woman for her husband. Sometimes a wife received a personal maid as a marriage gift (cf. 29:29; 30:3); all legal rights over this maid's child belonged to the wife. 4 Laws governing this type of arrangement provided for precisely the contingency described in this verse by permitting the wife to reduce the maid to her former status but prohibiting her sale. 5 'My injustice upon you' is the literal translation of the Hebrew. Sarai appealed to Abram to enforce her legal rights. It was his responsibility to redress the wrong that was 'upon' him. 6 Hagar wins our sympathy but she was legally in the wrong.

7 Angel of the Lord. Cf. 21:17ff.; 22:11, 15; 24:7, 40; 31:11ff.; 48:16. Not form but function was primary in this mode of revelation, the theophany being usually of human appearance, but not always so (cf., e.g., Ex. 3:2). As the term mal'aḵ, 'messenger', itself suggests, the distinctive idea is that of being sent on a mission. This angel is sent by the Lord and even prays to the Lord (cf. Zc. 1:12f.), yet speaks as God and is otherwise identified as the Lord. Thereby intimations were afforded of personal distinctions within God, and, in particular, of the coming of the Son as One sent of the Father to fulfil the covenant (cf. Mal. 3:1). (See further the section on 'Theophany' in the Introduction to Exodus, p. 116—Ed.) Shur was perhaps the Egyptian frontier wall; in any case, Hagar fled towards her homeland (cf. 12:15f.). 8 Cf. 3:9; 4:9. 10 Cf. 13:16; 15:5. The universal blessing to come through Abram, though primarily redemptive, involved also the benefits of God's common grace, universally bestowed. Hagar's innumerable descendants (cf. 25:12ff.) would live in the guarantees of the post-diluvian covenant (cf. 8:20ff.) but not in the eternal order pledged to Abram's promised seed (cf. 17:18ff.). 11 Such annunciations are common in Canaanite epics of the 2nd millennium BC. Ishmael means 'God hears', i.e. He had heard the fugitive's cry. 12 The wild ass, a favourite creature in desert hunts, illustrated the proud nomad independence of the Ishmaelites. 13 The RSV rendering of Hagar's explanation of the name God of seeing is excessively free, but it is probably correct in centring the idea not on God's seeing her but her seeing God, and that without fatal consequence. 14 In line with this, Beer-lahai-roi would mean 'well of seeing-alive'. 15 Hagar bore Abram a son. On this son Abram's hope would now naturally be set, but this last resort to natural means to bring God's promise to pass will end in disappointment. In this matter of the crucial first heir, the redemptive covenant must be seen as realizable only through the supernaturalism of divine intervention.

17:1 – 18:15 Covenant ratification. 17:1 Ninety-nine; cf. 16:16; 17:17, 25. The thought of an heir by Sarai was now a laughing matter (cf. 17:17; 18:12). The Lord appeared; cf. v. 22; 12:7; 18:1. I am God Almighty. Suzerainty treaties thus began with the titles of the great king (cf. 15:7). The etymology of šadday is still uncertain but 'Almighty' conveys its evident sense; cf. 28:3; 35:11; 43:14; 48:3; Ex. 6:3; Ezk. 10:5. Be blameless; i.e. genuinely and unreservedly committed to God's service (cf. 6:9). 5 Abraham, a lengthened form of Abram ('the father is exalted'), is explained, by a sound-play, as father of a multitude (Heb. aḇ-hᵃmôn) of nations. The name's prophetic meaning should not be sought in the Abrahamic nations like the Ishmaelites and Edomites, for the same promise is made to Sarai (v. 16), but rather in the hosts of all nations who become Abraham's children by sharing his covenant faith (cf. Gal. 3:29). 6 Kings. The promised line was royal. From it, as to the flesh, came Christ, following His OT precursors, the kings of Israel. 7 An everlasting covenant. The covenant had a provisional phase, but in Abraham's Messianic seed (cf. Gal. 3:16) and His kingdom it stands for ever. 8 I will be their God. Yahweh creates a people and identifies Himself with them as their Lord.

9 You shall keep my covenant. The covenant is law as well as gospel (cf. 12:1; 17:1; 22:2). 10 Circumcised. The practice of circumcision found earlier among other peoples was adopted to serve as the sign of incorporation into the Abrahamic covenant. Its continuing significance is learned from the function it performed at its institution. Covenants were ratified by oaths, the oath-curses being dramatized in symbolic rites (cf. 15:9ff.). A characteristic curse was that of cutting off the vassal to destruction and cutting off his name and seed. Accompanying this was a knife rite. So circumcision was the knife rite by which the Abrahamic covenant was cut. 14 shows that it symbolized the curse of excision from the covenant community. More precisely, the circumcision of the male organ of generation symbolized the cutting off of descendants. Yet as the sign of an oath acknowledging God's lordship, circumcision also signified consecration (cf. Rom. 4:11). Ancient vassal covenants included with the vassal king his kingdom and descendants. Similarly, the Lord administered His covenant to Abraham not simply as an individual believer-confessor but as the head of a community, in this case a family household, including children and slaves (vv. 12f., 23ff.), and that through ongoing generations (vv. 9, 12).

15 Sarah is a variant of Sarai, 'princess', but strangely the meaning of the change is not intimated. Curiously, however, the names of both Abram and Sarai are changed by adding the same sound, 'ah-ah', as though God were laughing with the parents-to-be! Combining a pun with His promise He put laughter into their very names: the union of aged Abraham and Sarah will produce Laughter-Isaac (lit. 'he laughs'). 17 Then Abraham . . . laughed. The humour of it all did not escape him but, as his next request showed, his laughing was not yet in the free abandon of full faith. 18 That Ishmael might live. In covenantal terminology, the aspirant to a vassal throne was made to 'live' if the great king established him on the throne, particularly when he had been 'killed', i.e. rejected in his claims by rivals. Abram, staggered by God's great joke, would settle for Ishmael as the kingdom heir. 20 Father of twelve princes. God heard Abraham. Ishmael would receive dynastic status as patriarch over an amphictyonic league, though not over the twelve-tribe kingdom of God. 21 My covenant with Isaac. Legally, a natural son, even though born after the son of a slave-wife, became chief heir.

As to occasion, 18:1–15 is connected with 18:16ff. but in theme it is related to ch. 17. The promise of the heir is confirmed in the form found there (cf. 17:21 and 18:10, 14); the covenant ceremonies are evidently supplemented; and the laughter motif is continued and culminated in a remarkable word of God (18:14). 18:1 The Lord's new appearance was soon after the last. The approaching supernatural birth was heralded by repeated angelic visitations. Mamre; cf. 13:18; 14:13. 2 The expression behold, three men suggests sudden appearance. One of the three was the angel of the Lord (cf. vv. 13, 17; 16:7ff.). 3 Read as in AV, 'My Lord'. The Hebrew 'ᵃḏōnāy, reserved for reference to the divine Lord, is rejected by RSV in favour of 'ᵃḏōnî, a general polite form of address. But Abraham might be expected to recognize the angel of the Lord after only a brief interval. Does not such recognition explain his addressing this angel? Also the mention of Yahweh in v. 13 were otherwise too abrupt. 5–8 The meal may well have been the confirmation of the covenant relationship (cf. Ex. 24:9–11). Appropriately, then, it is followed by the word of confirmation.

10 At the tent door behind him. The Hebrew may also be translated: 'And she was behind it (i.e. the door)'. 12 In either case Sarah's thoughts were secret and her laughter (again the effect of the impossible annunciation) concealed within herself. As Jesus' disclosure of Nathanael's private doubts was evidence of greater things to be performed by Him, the Mediator of angelic visitation (Jn. 1:45–51), so Yahweh's manifestation of divine knowledge in the exposure of Sarah's inner incredulity was a sign that He who came with angel ministrants would perform the greater miracle of bringing life from Sarah's dead womb. 14 Is anything too hard for the Lord? His infinite wisdom makes the laughable believable. 15 On Sarah's faith in spite of this fearfully foolish reaction, see Heb. 11:11.

18:16 – 19:38 Lot's separated line. 18:16 A second stage of the heavenly mission (cf. 18:1ff.) began with the departure of Yahweh's two angel servants (recapitulated in v. 22), or better, with God's consultation with them (vv. 17–19) and His declaration to Abraham (vv. 20f.). 17 Shall I hide from Abraham. As God's friend (cf. on 12:4) Abraham might hear the secret counsel of His covenant (cf. Ps. 25:14). 19 Bring . . . what he has promised him. Abraham was singled out not that the Abrahamites should for ever enjoy greatness as an élite religious enclave, but that they might be the instrument for universalizing the fear of Yahweh with its attendant blessings (cf. v. 18b; 12:3b). Righteousness and justice as well as power and blessing characterize God's kingdom. 20, 21 The slight variation between zᵉ'āqâ and ṣᵉ'āqâ, both translated outcry, is brought out by the difference between 'outrage' and 'outcry'. The outcry is either the offence clamouring for punishment (cf. 4:10) or the plea of the oppressed seeking judicial protection. The legal proceedings began with a special investigation (cf. 11:7). The facts were fully known to the Judge and His verdict a foreknown conclusion (cf. 19:13) but the openness of the situation as described in v. 21 suggests that the Sodomites were receiving a final opportunity to repent. 22ff. God's tentative statement also created an opportunity for Abraham to engage in intercession.

25 Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right? Abraham's long faith-struggle with the disparity between historical reality and God's promises had led him to this solid conviction as a foundation for dealing with the problem of divine providence. Abraham was not pleading for individual rather than corporate judicial treatment in God's government of the world. Rather, he understood God's decree against Sodom as an in-breaking of ultimate covenant judgment (cf. Lk. 17:28f.; 2 Pet. 2:6), and such judgment must cut through the ambiguities of general historical associations, so that the community of the righteous is not destroyed with its wicked fellow-citizens. In the case of Sodom, the only way Abraham saw to avoid violating the radical justice required in such judgment was to turn God from His announced purpose. Hence Abraham sought to save Lot (cf. 19:29) by pleading that Sodom be spared. God answered that, if necessary, He would withhold His judgment in order to protect a righteous remnant; but the sequel shows it was not necessary. When God deems iniquity ripe for final judgment, He does not spare; but He does deliver His covenant people out of the judgment, whether they be fifty or ten or a smaller family (like Noah's or Lot's).

19:1 In the evening. Yahweh's messengers appeared at Sodom miraculously soon (cf. 18:22), commissioned to gather in the elect before the descent of doom (cf. Mt. 24:31; Mk. 13:27). 2,3 Lot, though lacking in Abraham's spiritual strength, was a righteous man, at odds with his ungodly environment (cf. 2 Pet. 2:7f.). On v. 2b, cf. Lk. 24:28f. 4 Outside Lot's family there was not one righteous in any quarter of the city; it was worse than Abraham had dared to suggest (cf. 18:32). 5 That we may know them; cf. Jdg. 19:22; Rom. 1:27. 8 The warp given to Lot's spiritual and moral perspective by his unhappy choice of Sodom had distorted his judgment, producing vacillation and shockingly confused compromise. 9 The Sodomites' perverse violence confirmed the 'outcry against Sodom' (18:20). 11 Blindness (cf. 2 Ki. 6:18) was not so much loss of sight as a sudden striking of the tormentors with a severe disorientation that frustrated their purpose. 12 Have you any one else here? The offer of deliverance in terms of family relatedness to Lot is the same as in the case of Noah at the Flood. 13 Cf. 18:21. 14 Who were to marry his daughters. The language also allows that the marriages had already taken place and that Lot, therefore, had daughters living with their husbands in addition to the two daughters with him. Jesting. Again we have the word ṣāḥaq and the idea of laughable divine announcements. Cf. Lk. 17:28f.

16 The Lord being merciful. The remnant's imperfections did not thwart the purpose of grace. 22, 23 Zoar. The name (ṣô'ar) is related to Lot's designation of it as a trifle (miṣ'ar). This city was evidently located to the S of the area destroyed. All these cities were situated in what is now the shallow southern extension of the Dead Sea. 24 Brimstone and fire. Deposits of sulphur (brimstone) and asphalt (cf. 'bitumen pits', 14:10) are found in the coastal area of the Dead Sea. It has been speculated that the ignition of natural gases by lightning, possibly in association with an earthquake disturbance in this rift valley, started the conflagration with its rain of sulphurous fire and the pall of asphalt smoke (v. 28). The destruction would nevertheless be supernatural, for the timing and extent of the fiery havoc were precisely ordered to fulfil the announced word of God and the discriminatory purpose of His judgment. 25 All the valley (cf. vv. 28f.). Admah and Zeboiim, as well as Sodom and Gomorrah, were overthrown (Dt. 29:23; Je. 49:18; 50:40; Ho. 11:8; cf. Is. 1:9f.; 13:19; Ezk. 16:46ff.). 26 A pillar of salt; cf. Lk. 17:32. The salt mass known as Gebel Usdum on the SW shore of the Dead Sea attests to the presence of the agent of encrustation. Archaeological light on the episode is afforded by the site Bab ed-Dra a few miles E of the plain cities and evidently a place of pilgrimage for their citizenry. Use of this site ceased in the 21st century BC. 28 Cf. 13:10. 29 Cf. 2 Pet. 2:9 and comments on 18:23ff. As warrior-prince Abraham had saved Lot earlier (Gn. 14); now he does so as prophetic covenant-mediator (cf. 8:1; 20:7). 30 Fear (perhaps of future seismic episodes) drove Lot into the mountain caves. 31–38 trace the separated line of Lot through his two Sodom-tainted daughters to the Moabites and Ammonites, who increasingly became objects of denunciation by Israel's prophets. Separation from Abraham was separation from the future of the covenant kingdom.

20:1–18 Protection of the royal family. The charming divine comedy of Isaac's birth links the laughter of the annunciation (Gn. 17ff.) with the joy of fulfilment (21:1ff.) by a smiling disclosure of Sarah's rejuvenation (the prelude to her conception of Isaac), intimated through the ludicrous episode of Abimelech's passion to include the ninety-year old damsel in his harem and sagacious old Abraham's bemused floundering in difficulties supposedly left behind in long-departed youth (vv. 5, 11ff.).

1 From there; cf. 18:1, 33. Some interpret between Kadesh and Shur as the caravan route Abraham plied as a merchant while his alien residency was in Gerar. 2 My sister. Cf. on 12:13ff. Abimelech. This Gerar dynasty was Philistine (cf. 21:32, 34; 26:1). The Philistines of the patriarchal age had settled into a Semitic way of life. Their relationship to the patriarchs in political covenant (21:22ff.; 26:26ff.) contrasts with the Israelite–Philistine hostility in the period of the judges. Cf. 10:13f.; Am. 9:7. Abimelech was apparently a worshipper of the true God (cf. vv. 3ff.). 3 A dead man. Cf. Is. 38:1. Abimelech, as well as his wife and harem, was victim of the sudden affliction (cf. vv. 7, 17). 4, 5 An innocent people. Abimelech raised a question similar to Abraham's (cf. 18: 23ff.), but in self-defence. He could plead an innocence of ignorance as to Sarah's married status, but he was nevertheless guiltily responsible for abuse of the marriage ordinance through his harem (cf. 4:19ff.; 6:1ff.). 6b, 7 See Ps. 105:15. A prophet. As mediator of God's covenant, Abraham received and communicated God's will and in this relationship had peculiar access for intercession (cf. Jb. 42:8). You shall surely die; cf. 2:17; 3:4. Abimelech's act threatened Abraham's promised dynasty and God's threat to Abimelech extended to his dynastic family (cf. on 17:18; Ps. 105:13f.). 9–13 Abraham's embarrassment before Abimelech and a certain similarity discernible between his treatment of Sarah and Lot's offer of his daughters remind us that the divine favour on Abraham too was of grace. 16 Vindication; lit. 'covering of eyes', i.e. a means of diverting attention from an offence. By his lavish gifts Abimelech would have Sarah forget her experience in his court. If v. 16d explains v. 16c, the point is that, in spite of indignity suffered, Sarah's honour was by the royal gift restored in the eyes of others.

21:1–34 Isaac, heir of the covenant. 1 Cf.

17:21; 18:10, 14. 3 Cf. 17:19. 4 By circumcising Isaac, Abraham consecrated to Yahweh the people of promise. 5 Cf. 17:17. 6, 7 God has made laughter. Sarah voiced her magnificat (cf. Ps. 113:9). She repeated the pun on 'Isaac' (cf. 17:17–19), mindful of the astounded laughter others would add to that of the parents. She anticipated that this congratulatory laughter would also be derisive, with herself the butt of the joke (cf. Ezk. 23:32). 8 The weaning feast would be in Isaac's second or third year. 9 Follow AV. The word ṣāḥaq, 'mocking', is used again with the overtones of vv. 6b, 7. Ishmael was making a laughing-stock of the royal family on the occasion that highlighted the absurdity Sarah had herself described (cf. v. 7). Paul interpreted this as a persecution of the son of promise (Gal. 4:28f.).

10 On Hagar's household status, see on 16:2ff. According to the law codes, Ishmael was entitled to an inheritance share, but Sarah was determined that Isaac should be sole heir. That could be legally achieved, for there was legal tradition stipulating that a son by a slave woman could forgo his inheritance claim in exchange for freedom. Cast out. Sarah would compel them to go free! 11–13 Abraham, though reluctant because of natural affection for Ishmael (cf. 17:18), acceded when so instructed by the Lord. 14–16 The child. Ishmael at his expulsion was about sixteen (cf. 16:16; 21:5). Hagar evidently sought for a while to support the fainting youth but his weight proved too much and she was forced to free herself. 17–19 God heard is a play on 'Ishmael' (cf. 16:11). By supernatural intervention Hagar was directed to life-saving water. This forestalled failure of God's promises concerning Ishmael made earlier (see 16:12; 17:20; 21:13). 20, 21 Ishmael's marriage to an Egyptian and his nomad rovings in the Sinai peninsula underscore the separation of the Ishmaelites from the Abrahamic covenant.

22–24 At that time. The Beer-sheba covenant is loosely related to the context; possibly it preceded even Isaac's birth. Pursuant to Abimelech's invitation (20:15), Abraham had settled on what was apparently the border of his jurisdiction. Abimelech, politically and militarily superior, was nevertheless impressed by the divine protection under which Abraham operated and proposed the formal establishment of brotherly relationship. Phicol is a Semitic name, meaning 'word of all (i.e. the gods)'. 25, 26 Abraham saw in Abimelech's friendly overtures an opportunity to broach the subject of a water source he had prepared but which was then, unknown to Abimelech, seized by his servants. 27–31 The parity covenant was ratified as usual by both parties taking the oath. Other regular features were the use of animals for the covenant cutting and the presence of witnesses. God Himself was the Witness. As a special witness to Abimelech that he had agreed to the special provision acknowledging Abraham's right to the well, Abraham gave him seven ewe lambs. 32 The name Beer-sheba reflects three features of the covenant. Be'ēr means 'well'; šeḇa', 'seven'; and nišba', 'swear'. 33 The tamarisk Abraham planted was probably regarded as another witness. Everlasting God. From God's revelation of His covenant as 'everlasting' (17:7f., 13, 19) Abraham learned to worship and trust Him as the immovable foundation of his hope (cf. 12:8; 13:4).

22:1–19 Death and resurrection of the heir. 1 God tested Abraham. The whole pilgrim way was a continual test, but this was a special test of focal significance (cf. v. 12).

2 Offer him. Abraham must go beyond circumcision's partial and symbolic cutting off. By an ultimate consecration of Isaac to God in death-judgment he must demonstrate the truth of his oath of allegiance. The demand laid on Isaac's life reaffirmed God's verdict on man as sinner and so proclaimed the need for deliverance; but it also seemed to cut off the possibility of that deliverance. For the death of the divinely designated seed of promise would terminate the programme of salvation and empty the promise of meaning. Abraham's faith overcame the conflict between obedience and hope by accounting Yahweh able to raise up the sacrificed one (cf. Heb. 11:17–19). Moriah; cf. 2 Ch. 3:1, where it is identified with Solomon's Temple site at Jerusalem. 8 God will provide does not imply foreknowledge of the outcome, for then there were no trial of faith. 13 Behold a ram. In the combination of God's Self-maledictory oath of Gn. 15 (see on 15:17) and this divinely-provided substitute, the vicarious curse-bearing of God's own unspared Son was prefigured (cf. Rom. 8:32). 14 The Lord will provide (yhwh yireh) refers to the event of v. 13 in the language of v. 8. It shall be provided, or '(Yahweh) is seen', i.e. Yahweh appears in order to provide. From the perspective of Isaac's succession rights as vassal king under the Suzerain Yahweh, his virtual death and resurrection (cf. Heb. 11:19) was a deposition and restoration. Interestingly, the figure of death and resurrection is used in ancient treaties to describe just this sort of thing. See on 17:18. 16 I have sworn, says the Lord. Cf. 24:7; Ex. 32:13. The remarkable combination of says the Lord (ne'um yhwh) with the divine oath reappears in Ps. 110:1 and 4, an oracle that also concerns royal appointment, here of God's Son, through whom the Gn. 22:15–18 oracle is fulfilled. Because you have done this. Cf. v. 18. It was not that by his obedience Abraham merited this blessing. God's rewards are as much acts of His grace as is His original choice of the recipients. Yet by virtue of the special guarantees God was pleased to affix to Abraham's supreme triumph of faith, it stood in a causal relation to the fulfilment of the Abrahamic covenant (cf. 26:3, 5, 24; Ps. 105:42). We are thus taught that Abraham's seed of Old and New Testaments inherit the world via the righteousness of faith (cf. Rom. 4). 17 Possess the gate of their enemies. Cf. 14:20.

22:20 - 25:11 Royal succession

22:20-24 Nahor's collateral line. Developments in the family of Abraham's northern kinsmen are presented not in formal genealogy but as news received and acted on (cf. 24:4ff.). Terah's son, Nahor, had married a daughter of Haran (cf. 11:27, 29). His grand-daughter Rebekah (cf. 24:15) and great grand-daughters Leah and Rachel became ancestral mothers of God's people Israel. Twelve sons of Nahor are mentioned but an amphictyonic league does not seem implied. The omission of Laban (cf. 24:29) centres attention on Rebekah and this focus on the Israelite ancestresses continues in Gn. 23 and 24.

23:1-20 Sepulchre for the royal family. 2-4 The reference to Canaan prepares for the thought thrust upon Abraham by the exigencies of Sarah's burial—he was still a sojourner in the promised land, not lord, not even a small property owner. He might have followed whatever burial procedure was allowed for aliens, but in the face of his family's dying without receiving the promises (Heb. 11:13) he desired to express his faith in their ultimate reception of the inheritance beyond death (cf. Heb. 11:19). A family sepulchre would not be a legal claim to the possession of Canaan, but it would be a prophetic sign. His request give me property does not mean give without payment. Abraham, though only a resident alien, was requesting the right to acquire property in perpetuity. Similarly, Ephron did not offer a free gift (v. 11). 5 These pre-patriarchal Hittites, one of the early complex of peoples in Canaan (cf. 10:15; 15:20; Dt. 7:1; Jdg. 3:5), were Semitized. If not related to the earlier Hattian people of Anatolia, these Hittites of S Palestine possibly represented a commercial penetration preceding the broader Hittite movement into Anatolia resulting in their Empire there in the mid-second millennium BC. 6 A mighty prince is literally 'a prince of God'. That the Abrahamic community was God's protectorate was commonly known (cf. 21:22); moreover, this community was sizeable and its leader very wealthy (cf. 24:1, 34).

9 Cave of Machpelah. According to provisions found in the Hittite law code and apparently more generally followed, a landholder continued to be responsible for the dues on a recognized unit of property unless he disposed of it in its entirety. Abraham would avoid transfer of these obligations to himself by purchasing only the cave at the end of his (Ephron's) field, while Ephron insisted on selling the entire unit—field and cave—as the conclusion repeatedly notes (vv. 17, 19, 20; cf. 49:29ff.). Thus, in becoming a property owner in Canaan, Abraham had to acknowledge more publicly than ever the currently more ultimate proprietorship over this land enjoyed by the Canaanite authorities, rendering to them now his land dues.

24:1-67 A queen for Abraham's co-regent. 1 Sarah's death and Abraham's own advanced years (cf. 17:17; 23:1; 25:20) suggested the timeliness of a final disposition, securing to Isaac the covenant blessings of land and descendants. 2 Under my thigh is an allusion to the genital organ. This oath gesture probably had reference to the malediction symbolized by circumcision. The charge given the servant contains the last recorded words of Abraham; this also points to its testamentary nature. 3 Not . . . from the daughters of the Canaanites. The inheritance of Canaan must come to Abraham's descendants, not as a natural development through intermarriage with the Canaanites, but as a supernatural gift through divine judgment on the Canaanites. In fact, intermarriage would frustrate the promised kingdom programme, for the Abrahamites, thus compromised and corrupted, would fall under judgment with the Canaanites. 6-8 Not take my son back. God had issued the summons to Canaan and there the covenant patriarchs must exercise their faith-reign unless God Himself ordained otherwise. Scripture's last quotation of Abraham is fittingly a word of faith in the Lord's faithfulness to His promises. 10 City of Nahor; i.e. Haran (cf. 29:4 and above on 11:26ff.). 14 The proposing of a sign to discover the elect mother of Israel belongs to an era of special revelation (cf. v. 7).

15ff. God's answer (vv. 15-25) surpassed the prayer (vv. 12-14), evoking doxology (vv. 26f.). With v. 15, cf. 22:20ff. Though the servant was not yet informed that Rebekah was of Abraham's kindred (vv. 23f.; cf. vv. 4, 38) she had fulfilled the prayer-sign, and his gifts (v. 21) marked a preliminary recognition of her as the appointed bride. Laban's prominence (v. 29; cf. v. 53; 25:20) and Bethuel's secondary role (cf. vv. 15, 24, 50) reflect a fratriarchal arrangement in which the jurisdiction over the brothers and sisters is given to one brother. 50, 51 Rebekah's family was impressed, like the Hebron Hittites and Abimelech, with the divine protectorate enjoyed by Abraham, and could not oppose this mission, even had the marriage not been so obviously favourable. 58 I will go. The sister's consent to a proposed marriage in a fratriarchal situation is attested in a marriage record from Nuzi. 60 The family's farewell blessing was formally similar to the blessing already promised to the Abrahamites by God (cf. 22:17). 62-67 The account of the conclusion of the mission, prospered by the Lord, concentrates on Isaac to the exclusion of Abraham and specifically depicts Rebekah as Sarah's successor (v. 67, AV). Isaac is thus portrayed as already patriarchal co-regent. Agreeably, the steward over all Abraham's household calls Isaac my master (v. 65; cf. v. 36).

25:1-11 Isaac's succession. The interest of this closing narrative of Abraham's life is on the clearing of Isaac's exclusive claim to covenant inheritance (vv. 1–6) and his succession as covenant patriarch (vv. 7–11).

1 The marriage with Keturah may have occurred during Sarah's lifetime, chronological sequence yielding again to topical arrangement. Since within three years of Sarah's death Abraham was reckoning seriously with the possibility that his own death was nigh (cf. 24:1ff.), the relationship described in vv. 1–6 is improbable after Sarah's death. Also, Keturah is called a 'concubine' (1 Ch. 1:32; cf. v. 6). 2–4 The Keturah tribes are traceable to NW Arabia; cf. above on 17:5. 6 Sons of his concubines; perhaps the plural is abstract, i.e. 'concubinage'. He sent them away. This dismissal may have occurred at Ishmael's expulsion or, more probably, when Isaac became co-patriarch with Abraham (v. 5, cf. above on 24:62–67). 8 Cf. 15:15; Heb. 11:13. Was gathered to his people. This is the sequel to death; it is not a reference to burial (cf. vv. 9f.; 35:29; 49:33 and 50:13). 11 God blessed Isaac. According to promise (17:21) the son born in Abraham's hundredth year was confirmed over the covenant inheritance in the hundredth year after Abraham entered the land.

25:12–18 THE GENERATIONS OF ISHMAEL

Ishmael had been the subject of particular divine promises made to Hagar (16:10ff.) and Abraham (17:20; 21:13). The fulfilment in Ishmael's descendants is noted before the history of the Abrahamic kingdom proceeds. In this control of mankind outside the line of promise it is again manifested that Yahweh, Lord of the Abrahamic covenant, is God of all the earth, directing all history by His sovereign providence. 16 By their villages and by their encampments. The more settled and the wandering Ishmaelites are thus distinguished. Twelve princes. This suggests a sacred-political confederation (cf. 17:20). 18 Their nomadic sphere was far-flung across the NW Arabian wilderness and was threateningly hostile (cf. 16:12), not least to the Israelites (Jdg. 6:33ff.; especially Jdg. 8:24; cf. Jdg. 7:12 with Gn. 25:18b; Ps. 83:6).

25:19 – 35:29 THE GENERATIONS OF ISAAC

25:19a This heading is joined to the subsequent narrative in the same way as the 11:27 heading. Also, just as the 'generations of Terah' centred at once on Abraham, so the 'generations of Isaac' focus upon Jacob. Isaac occupies a more significant position than Terah, however, who stood merely at the genealogical source, the notice of his death coming early in the section (11:32). Isaac, heir of Abraham, dwelling prosperously in Canaan afforded a picture of covenant fulfilment. Moreover, he stands as patriarchal head over the whole history of this era, the record of his death closing this section (35:29).

25:19b – 28:9 Isaac's inheritance and heir

25:19b–34 Election of Jacob. 20 Aramean of Paddan-aram. The line leading to Israel, though directly traced to Shem through Arpachshad rather than Aram, had become associated with Aramaeans (cf. Dt. 26:5). 21 The barrenness of Isaac's wife and most of the other recorded features of Isaac's life are similar to experiences of Abraham and served the same disciplinary purposes of faith. 22 Went to inquire. Rebekah, as perhaps Isaac too, had recourse to a sanctified place, probably one of the patriarchal altars, in her distressed calling on God. Why, she wondered, had God healed her barrenness, if the issue of her conception would be unhappy, as the inner struggle made her fear it would. 23 The elder shall serve the younger. Cf. 9:25–27. By divine pre-appointment a place in the Abraham–Isaac succession was conferred on the younger of the struggling twins. Prenatal appointment of the son of a particular bride to the official position of firstborn, in preference to sons by another wife and irrespective of actual primogeniture, is attested in the Ancient Near East. See Rom. 9:10–12. 25 Red ('admônî) anticipates the later play on Esau's other name, Edom (cf. v. 30). Hairy (śē'ār) is the basis of the name-pun, Esau ('ēśāw); cf. also Seir (śē'îr). 26 Heel ('āqēb) is used to explain Jacob (ya'aqōb), found also in contemporary extra-biblical sources and meaning 'he (God) protects'.

29–34 The divine oracle, confirmed by this birth-omen, began to be fulfilled in Esau's sale of his birthright to Jacob. The birthright regularly conveyed a double inheritance share. In this family the entire 'blessing of Abraham' (28:4), the covenant patriarchate, was involved. From Nuzi comes evidence of the transfer of a prospective inheritance share of real property from one brother to another in exchange for a few sheep. Perhaps it was only the double share that Jacob could thus secure by barter; for later both brothers sought Isaac's testamentary blessing, evidently to secure family headship and a generally prosperous prospect (Gn. 27). 34 Cf. Heb. 12:16. Esau's name Edom identifies him with his profane preference for the red stuff ('ādōm) in the pot. It could only have been in spite of Jacob's unworthy behaviour that he was the object of God's elective love (cf. Mal. 1:2f.).

26:1–33 Isaac under the Lord's protectorate. These episodes follow Abraham's death (see vv. 1, 15, 18) but the earlier of them possibly preceded the birthright exchange (cf. 25:29ff.). Their position between the two supplanting episodes suggests their purpose is to portray the inheritance Jacob coveted. 2–4 The prohibition, turning Isaac from trust in the arm of Egypt, compelled him to look alone unto the special providence of God, who confirmed to him the Abrahamic covenant (cf. v. 12). Here was the lesson needed by grasping young Jacob, too! 5 Cf. above on 22:16. 6–11 Cf. above on 12:13ff. and 20:1ff. Since Abimelech was evidently a Philistine dynastic title (cf. 1 Sa. 21:11 and the heading of Ps. 34), this need not be the individual Abraham encountered in Gerar decades before. He is of similar character, however, and the advanced age he would have reached would explain why Rebekah's jeopardy is related to the Gerarites, not to a royal harem. Abimelech's chance discovery of Isaac 'sporting' (v. 8; AV translation of m^{e}ṣaḥēq, the name-pun again) with Rebekah speaks anew of sovereign divine protection. 12–16 God's special oversight in the face of famine and Philistine harassment (see vv. 14, 15) resulted in such agricultural success and general prosperity that the pilgrim aliens overshadowed the native city-state (v. 16).

18–22 Cf. 21:25ff. The encampments at 'Contention' (Esek) and 'Enmity' (Sitnah) led to the spacious, fruitful peace of 'Room' (Rehoboth). 23 Again at Beer-sheba, where Abraham had dug a well and resided, Isaac's servants found new water sources (cf. vv. 25, 32). 24, 25 Here God renewed the covenant guarantees, prompting Isaac's special cultic acknowledgment of his Lord (cf. 21:33). 26 Concerning Phicol (cf. 21:22) the same possibilities of identity exist as for Abimelech (see above on v. 8). 27–31 The Abimelech–Isaac covenant renewed the Abimelech–Abraham covenant (cf. especially 21:23). Out of the mouths of the Philistines God brought a witness that His promise concerning Isaac in Philistine country (cf. v. 3) had been fulfilled. Having registered his complaint, Isaac suffered his visitors to gloss diplomatically over the border incidents and consented to the parity treaty, ratified by a covenant meal and a mutual oath. 33 Shibah is, like 'Shebah', a form of the number seven; thus Isaac confirmed the name given by Abraham. There is also in the context a word play on the oath-taking (nišba') of v. 31 (cf. v. 32, that same day). Thus out of the reluctant earth and disgruntled men the Lord had wrested for Isaac an earnest of paradise.

26:34 - 28:9 Isaac's testamentary blessings. Bracketing the account of Esau's loss of the firstborn's blessing are records of his marriage alliances outside the line of promise (26:34f. and 28:6–9). His first marriage possibly preceded some Isaac episodes which are described in Gn. 26.

27:2 Behold I am old. This was legal terminology for introducing final testaments. Isaac was 137 years old and lived forty years longer (cf. 35:28). Isaac's purpose to give Esau the blessing (vv. 1–4) and Rebekah's scheme to divert it to Jacob (vv. 5–17) stemmed from the spirit of favouritism (cf. 25:28).

20 The Lord . . . granted me success. The deceiver, vainly taking God's name, spoke more truth than he realized. 23 So he blessed him is the outcome; 24–29 supply the details. Rebekah's comprehensive deceit was directed to all Isaac's remaining senses, except hearing; but touch, taste and smell silenced his ears. Isaac's poetic blessing (vv. 27b–29) does not adhere to previous promise terminology. It is as though the ambiguity of the situation prevented a more forthright formulation. Yet the covenant blessing was encompassed in the headship over Isaac's household (cf. above on 25:23); other features included were the paradise land, nationhood with dominion and mediatorship of divine judgment. Cf. Heb. 11:20. 33 Yes, and he shall be blessed. Legal evidence from Nuzi shows that oral wills delivered by a dying father and cited in court were of decisive validity. They had an oath character (cf. v. 7, 'before the Lord'). Isaac was stunned by the recognition that in spite of his own purpose to the contrary the prenatal oracle (cf. 25:23) had been made effective through the inspired testament he had uttered in irreversible legal form. 34ff. Cf. Heb. 12:17. 36 Supplanted; from Hebrew 'āqaḇ, 'take by the heel'. Distraught Esau saw the event as a repetition of the birthright exchange, a fulfilment of the birth-omen, and an explanation of Jacob's name (cf. 25:26; Je. 9:4; Ho. 12:3). 39, 40 Away from the fatness. The preposition (min) means either 'of' (as in Jacob's blessing, v. 28) or 'away from'; the latter is required here by the context and by Edomite history (cf. too Mal. 1:3). Edom's mountains discouraged cultivation; their inhabitants were driven from the ploughshare to the sword (cf. 25:27). Israel dominated Edom, especially from the monarchy onward (cf. Nu. 24:18; 2 Sa. 8:14), but Edom was periodically successful in independence efforts.

41ff. The sins of all concerned in the business of the blessing began at once to take their toll. To deliver Jacob from Esau's vengeance (v. 41), Rebekah, expert at scheming, was obliged to deliver her favourite over to her similarly talented brother Laban (vv. 43ff.), and apparently died before it was propitious to recall Jacob (v. 45; cf. 49:31). 46 Her shrewd approaches to both Jacob and Isaac (cf. 26:34f.), appealing to their concern for her happiness, ironically led them to bring upon her precisely the evils from which they sought to spare her.

28:1ff. See on 24:3. 4 Blessing of Abraham. The atmosphere had sufficiently cleared by the time of this farewell confirmation of the testamentary blessing for Isaac to identify Jacob's blessing forthrightly as that which God bestowed in the Abrahamic covenant. The mission to secure a wife prompted an emphasis on the blessing of numerous progeny. The language echoes Gn. 17 especially, including the divine designation, 'ēl šadday (see on 17:1). On 4b, cf., e.g., 17:8a; 26:3 and contrast 27:28. 5 summarily anticipates 10ff. before this section on Isaac's patriarchal activities closes. 6–9 Esau's choice of an Ishmaelite wife (cf. 26:34f.; 36:3) showed regard for Isaac, yet underscored his separation from the Abrahamic inheritance.

28:10 – 35:29 Jacob's Syrian sojourn and return

28:10–22 God's covenant with Jacob. This era forms a circle from the ratification of God's covenant protectorship over Jacob at Bethel back to Bethel and the confirmation of that covenant (35:1–15). 10 Left Beersheba . . . toward Haran; cf. 26:23; 28:5. Jacob's actual enjoyment of the patriarchal office was long postponed. In his flight from Canaan, patriarchal history reverted to its beginnings among the idolatrous Terahites, necessitating a new summons to Canaan. So Jacob was rebuked for his supplanting tactics. 12 Ladder; better 'ramp' or 'staircase', like those on the artificial temple mounds or ziggurats leading from the god's dwelling at the top to men below. The Hebrew suggests that the ramp extended both towards earth and heaven, rather than that it was supported, like the Babel structure, upon the cursed earth. It anticipated the heavenly city that descends from above (cf. v. 17; Rev. 21:2, 10). Angels of God; cf. 11:7; 18:2; Ho. 12:4f. They ascended with the results of their earthly reconnaissance (cf. Zc. 1:11) and descended to execute God's will. 13, 14 'Beside him' (see RSV mg.; Heb. 'ālāyw) is better than above it (i.e. the staircase); cf. 35:13. The angel of the Lord stood there, sent by God, yet Himself God, revealed and present to Jacob; cf. Jn. 1:51. God's covenant disclosure contained the standard treaty features of preamble with identifying title and, in His Self-identification as God of Abraham and Isaac, a virtual historical prologue recalling His mercies to the patriarchal dynasty (v. 13b). The full-orbed covenant inheritance, already conveyed through Isaac's inspired blessing, was now directly confirmed by the Lord (vv. 13c, 14).

15 Wherever you go. The divine protectorate over Jacob extended, as did Yahweh's power, beyond the special domain of Canaan. The promise of guardianship during Jacob's sojourn, with guarantee of return, was the Lord's explanation of the dream symbolism. 19 Bethel, 'house of God' (cf. v. 17), the name Jacob gave to the revelation site, was extended afterwards to the nearby city of Luz (cf. Jos. 16:2; 18:13), already called Bethel, by way of anticipation, in Gn. 12:8 and 13:3. 20 Vow. Jacob ratified the covenant with a vow of allegiance pledging his tributary tithe. Cf. vv. 14, 20, 22. 21 The last clause is (contrary to RSV) part of Jacob's account of what God would do for him; Jacob's own promise begins in v. 22. 22 Pillar . . . God's house. Cf. v. 18. There is evidence outside the Bible also of pillars associated with covenants being called 'house of God'. See also 35:7, 15. This proved to be Jacob's Damascus road vision of the Lord. It turned the circumcised son of the covenant from seeking salvation by works to securing it through a faith-struggle that led to a new name.

29:1 – 30:24 Origins of the tribal fathers.

29:1–12 The circumstances of the origins of the twelve tribes advertise the purely gracious character of Israel's election. The special superintendence promised at Bethel led Jacob directly to the bride-to-be, Rachel (v. 6). Attraction to Rachel and eagerness to commend himself somehow to Laban (for he lacked the lavish credentials of the steward who came for Rebekah) inspired Jacob to impressive feats of gallantry (vv. 9f.) in defiance of local custom (vv. 3, 8). 13 The potential of service in such a man brought Laban running again (cf. 24:29ff.) 14 You are my bone and my flesh. This expression found in ancient adoption forms is one of the details suggesting that Laban adopted Jacob. At Jacob's arrival, sons of Laban are not mentioned; a daughter was tending the sheep. See further below on 30:25ff.; 31:1ff., 14ff., 19ff. 15 Whatever Jacob's technical status was, as exploited by Laban it became an oppressive servitude. Under pretence of generosity Laban modified the family relationship, in which an uncalculating generosity might be expected of him, by reducing Jacob to a hired labourer's condition.

18 Aware of Jacob's love for Rachel, Laban would forestall the request that she be given in marriage, as daughters sometimes were to adopted sons. He greedily anticipated the generous bridal present that love would offer. 21ff. Worse still, in crude disdain of holy ordinance, human dignity, and all natural feeling he contrived to double his bargain, making love pay its extravagant price twice. The Nuzi tablets (including texts dealing with adoption) attest the wedding gift of a handmaid to a daughter (cf. vv. 24, 29). 31 Rachel was barren. After Leah's wedding week but before the second seven years of his service, Jacob received Rachel as a second wife. 32–35 To Leah, the unloved bride of deception, the first of the tribal fathers were born amid family tensions and disharmony. Reuben; cf. ra'ā . . . b^{e}'onyī, '(the Lord) has looked upon my affliction'. Simeon; cf. šāma', '(the Lord) has heard'. Levi; cf. yillāweh, '(my husband) will be joined'. Judah; cf. 'ôdeh, 'I will praise'. From two of these sons of Leah arose the royal-Messianic and priestly tribes in Israel.

30:2 Am I in the place of God? Some budding sense of dependence on the covenant Lord emerges in Jacob's exasperated retort. 3 On concubinage as a customary practice in cases of a wife's barrenness, see above on 16:2. Upon my knees. Placing the infant on the knees (normally of the father, though here of the adoptive mother) signified acknowledgment. 6 Dan; cf. dānanni, '(God) has judged me', i.e. intervened as her defender. 8 Naphtali; cf. naptûlēy 'e^{lōhîm} niptaltī, lit. 'wrestlings of God I have wrestled'. The periods covered by 29:32–35 and 30:1–8 probably overlapped. The chronological relation of 30:9–13 (which, of course, follows 29:32–35) to 30:1–8 is uncertain. 9 So intense was the sisters' struggle for supremacy that Leah, though four times a mother, matched Rachel's strategy of concubinage. 11 Gad; cf. bāgād, 'with fortune'. 13 Asher; cf. bᵉ'ošrî, 'with my happiness' and 'iššᵉrûnî, 'they will call me happy'.

14ff. Mandrakes, known as an aphrodisiac, were Rachel's next strategem to overcome her barrenness, but proved ineffectual; in fact, her plan became the occasion of increasing her rival's advantage. 17 God hearkened to Leah. Again the record stresses the true source of life's blessing. 18 Issachar; cf. śᵉḵārî, 'my hire' and śāḵôr śᵉḵartîḵā (v. 16), 'I have hired you'. 20 Zebulun; cf. zᵉḇeḏ, 'gift' and yizbᵉlēnî, from a root of uncertain meaning. 21 Cf. 37:35; 46:7. 22 God hearkened to her. Rachel eventually sought the blessing aright. 24 Joseph; cf. 'āsāp, '(God) has removed' (v. 23) and yôsēp, 'may (the Lord) add' (v. 24). Chronologically, vv. 14–20 overlap part of vv. 10–13 and vv. 22–24 precede v. 21 and probably overlap vv. 19f.

30:25–43 Despoiling the oppressor. 25 When the fourteen years of bride payments were completed (cf. 31:41), Joseph's birth coinciding with this, Jacob desired to return to Canaan where his inheritance through Isaac awaited him. By now, natural sons had been born to Laban (cf. 31:1), replacing Jacob as chief heirs (cf. above on 15:4 and 29:14ff.), and Jacob's prospects of counter-balancing his deteriorated inheritance share by negotiating a favourable new contract with wily Laban were dim. 26 Let me go. Laban's permission was necessary for Jacob to leave with the family for which he had paid by his service. It resembled the case of a departing slave (cf. Ex. 21:2ff.). One explanation is that the service contracts were operating in subordination to an adoption relationship that made Jacob's independent proprietorship contingent on Laban's death (cf. 31:43). 27–33 At Laban's insistence Jacob suggested an arrangement for continued service. His wages would be the sports appearing among Laban's flocks. 34–36 Since these were relatively rare Laban readily agreed, immediately instituting measures that reduced further the odds of any dark, spotted lambs appearing among the normally white sheep or any kids with white markings among the normally dark goats. 37–43 Jacob's counter-measures accorded with the theory of prenatal conditioning by visual impressions. These verses condense six years' history (cf. 31:41) during which Laban repeatedly imposed changing stipulations (31:7f.) in a vain attempt to stem the tide of Jacob's wealth, mounting at his expense (vv. 42f.). The success of Jacob's strategy was attributable to the special providential favour of the God of Bethel (cf. 31:9ff.).

31:1–55 Exodus. Jacob's labours of the first fourteen years increased Laban's estate (cf. 30:27, 30), but their effect now was to diminish the inheritance of Laban's natural sons (vv. 1f.). Jacob's determination to leave, however, was not merely his reaction to his rivals' increasing hostility but his response to God's special directions (v. 3; cf. v. 13). His appeal to his wives (vv. 3ff.) referred apparently to an earlier dream revelation (vv. 10–12) and a more recent divine command (v. 13; cf. v. 3), though the two are not distinctly distinguished. Rachel and Leah accepted Jacob's explanation of his enrichment as the blessing of God (vv. 5, 7, 9, 11f., 16) and honoured his divine commissioning (v. 16), perhaps the more easily because of the congruence of God's command with plots that had crossed their own minds. For Laban had shown no disposition to bestow on them any part of the bridal price (i.e. the wealth that accrued to him through Jacob's services) as was normally done in that area (v. 14f.). Accordingly, they reckoned that what God was now taking from their father and giving to their husband was no more than their own (v. 16). It was Laban's own precaution (cf. 30:36; 31:19) that provided Jacob with his opportunity to lead his whole household away stealthily (vv. 17ff.).

19 Household gods. Rachel probably stole these 'teraphim' (RV) when Jacob sent for her (cf. v. 4), anticipating his plan. Since adoption tablets stipulated that the chief heir should receive the father's gods, possession of them conveyed some legal advantage in respect of inheritance. Adoption texts also stipulate that the gods belonged to real sons born subsequent to the adoption. In the contemptuous treatment given these figurines by the fugitives (cf. especially v. 34) Laban's gods were judged with him. 23 Laban's pursuit covered about 300 miles. Jacob's company had ten days to cover somewhat less than that, for he would have stationed his flocks strategically for departure. 24 The night before Laban overtook Jacob, God intervened decisively (cf. vv. 29, 42), warning the pursuer from pressing his enforceable legal claims against Jacob in any way whatsoever (cf. either good or bad). The Lord's role was thus that of Kinsman-Protector securing release for the virtual slave (cf. the 6 years, 31:41; Dt. 15:12). 32–35 The extreme penalty proposed and Laban's agitation show the great legal importance of the teraphim. Laban's futile attempt to prove his accusation created an excellent opportunity for the defence and Jacob pressed the advantage with a passionate statement of the moral case in his favour (vv. 36–42).

39 I bore the loss. According to Hammurabi's laws, a shepherd who presented the remnants as evidence was not liable for the losses Jacob describes. 42 Empty-handed. Laban would have dismissed Jacob, not with festive music (cf. v. 27), but with less consideration than was due to a slave (cf. Dt. 15:13f.). Jacob's self-vindication became a confession of his avenging God. 43–54 All . . . is mine. Laban stated the legal fact (cf. above on 30:26), but afraid to defy God's warning abandoned his case and under pretence of paternal magnanimity suggested a mutual non-aggression pact (vv. 44ff.). God was the real covenant Witness (vv. 49f., 53); the pillar and cairn (vv. 45–52), named by each of the apparently bilingual participants in his native tongue (vv. 47f.), were symbolic witnesses. Each man bound himself by oath (v. 52f.), Laban identifying Nahor's and Abraham's God in a Terahite syncretism (v. 53a; cf. 12:1), but Jacob invoking God by a name related distinctly to the Abrahamic covenant. The covenant meal (vv. 46, 54) sealed the arrangement. The stipulation against taking other wives (v. 50) is also found in extra-biblical marriage contracts. The invoking of divine oversight (v. 49) arose from mutual suspicion and sought protection not for the other but for themselves from the other's malice.

32:1 – 33:17 Victory in Transjordan. 32:1 Cf. 28:12ff. 2 The two armies referred to by the name Mahanaim (see also RSV mg.) are possibly the angels and Jacob's company. If 32:11ff. (Heb., 2f.) belongs chronologically within the course of events described in vv. 3ff., the two armies might be the angels and Esau's force (cf. 2 Ki. 6:15ff.). The site of Mahanaim might then closely adjoin Penuel. 3 On Esau as a threat, cf. 27:41ff. Esau had been establishing himself in Seir (cf. 36:6ff.). 6–8 The advance mission's report to Jacob was ominous enough to prompt immediate defensive tactics of a kind common to caravans. 9–12 Jacob's prayer with its self-effacement and reliance on God for the fulfilment of previous promises evidences the inner work of transformation that inevitably accompanies the election of grace. This Jordan. (Heb. Yardēn) may here have its generic meaning, 'river'. Two companies is a further play on 'Mahanaim'. 13–21 Improving on the preliminary arrangements (cf. vv. 7f.), Jacob sent ahead a generous present of cattle selected in proper proportions for breeding. 22 He then immediately forded the Jabbok. This verse is an opening summary, the details following in vv. 23ff. 23 Actually Jacob himself, after sending his family across, was to remain the night where he was (cf. v. 13). 24 Before entering the land of inheritance, he must undergo an experience that sealed him as a man of faith and pointed him by a mysterious sign to the ultimate source of saving blessings. A man. It was the captain of the Lord's hosts (cf. vv. 1f. and Jos. 5:13f.; Ho. 12:3). Wrestled (Heb. wayyē'āḥēq) puns on Jabbok. In the Near East law cases were sometimes settled by an ordeal or test (cf. Nu. 5:11–31). One mode of this was combat by wrestling. The encounter reveals the fundamental character of the quest for God's kingdom as a struggle by fallen men for justification. In this ordeal the outward course of the wrestling was a reflex of the concurrent spiritual encounter. 25, 26 He did not prevail against Jacob. The divine Adversary was also the electing-saving Lord who strengthened Jacob with grace to wrestle on against Himself lest he be overcome and condemned! So by persistence in believing supplication Jacob emerged from the ordeal with a blessing (cf. Ho. 12:4). He touched (Heb. nāga' b-) may signify 'smote' (cf. vv. 31f.). The justification was achieved through suffering. Since the thigh was regarded as the seat of the reproductive powers, the smiting of Jacob's thigh was a sign of the smiting of that descendant of Jacob who should be smitten of God (Is. 53:4) and by His sufferings and overcoming justify Jacob and all God's elect (Is. 53:11). The angel's desire to depart before daylight expressed God's concern lest Jacob perish through beholding His face unobscured by the darkness (cf. 16:13; Ex. 33:20; Jdg. 6:22f.; 13:22). With reference to this Jacob named the site Peniel, 'the face of God' (v. 30). 28 Israel. This name is found also in the Ugaritic texts. The divine element ('ēl, 'God') would normally be subject, i.e. 'God strives' (cf. RSV mg.) but a different sense is assigned here (i.e. 'He strives with God'). Jacob had prevailed over Esau; now, over God (cf. Ho. 12:3). 29, 30 In his new name, Israel, Jacob's query was already answered (cf. too Jdg. 13:17f.), as his response shows.

33:3 Sevenfold bowing was a widely attested form of homage, fit for a king. 4–9 By the blessing of Him in whose hand is even the heart of kings (cf. 31:34; Pr. 21:1) the dreaded meeting proved a reconciling reunion. Ignoring the servants' explanations (cf. 32:17ff.), Esau yet acknowledged Jacob's offer, so as to decline it (v. 9). 10, 11 Jacob urged him to accept, because Esau's acceptance of so substantial a gift would give formal expression to his acquiescence in Jacob's possession of the disputed inheritance, and would serve as a deterrent to any future rekindling of hostility. Like seeing the face of God. Jacob recognized through Esau's reconciled countenance that the God of Peniel was making His face shine upon him. 12–16 Hence he felt no need for the armed protection Esau offered; besides, he was unwilling to incur obligation to Esau. 17 Jacob continued in the Transjordan area for a possibly prolonged period; close to a decade must have elapsed between departure from Syria and the Shechem episode (cf. 34:1).

33:18 – 34:31 Entry into Canaan. 33:18 On his way from Paddan-aram (cf. 35:9). A long period is thus characterized by its opening act; cf. 'in their going forth from Egypt' (Dt. 4:45; 23:4; Jos. 5:4). Safely, or 'in peace'; not as an invader but according to agreement (cf. v. 19; 34:21). 19 For the faith involved in Jacob's purchase, see above on Abraham's purchase of Machpelah (Gn. 23). 20 Recognizing his return as fulfilment of covenant promise (cf. 28:15), Jacob erected an altar near Shechem, as had Abram on his arrival (12:7). Cf. Jos. 8:30. El-Elohe-Israel. Using his new name, Israel, Jacob confessed that El (cf. Isaac's use of this divine designation in blessing Jacob, 28:3) was his God (cf. 28:21).

34:1 Dinah must have been some 14 years old, but cannot have been more; she was born after Leah's four sons (cf. 30:21), and Joseph, who was about a year older than Dinah, was only seventeen at the later occasion recorded in 37:2. 2 Hivite; cf. 10:17. 5 The fratriarchal practices of Laban's household re-emerge when Jacob defers to Dinah's brothers (no doubt to Leah's sons particularly) in the handling of her abduction (vv. 5, 7, 13ff.). 7 In Israel. The author saw the nation budding in the expanding community of Jacob's household. 10 The privileges Hamor offered were the same as those which figure in directives regulating the activities of Hittite merchants in foreign lands. 13 Deceitfully. Though it was the brothers' duty to secure Dinah's release (cf. v. 26b), resort to the stratagems of war was not justifiable. 14–17 Reprehensible also was their demeaning of the covenant sign of circumcision. 20–24 Hamor's successfully diplomatic camouflage, persuading the Shechemite council to approve its own doom, viewed the proposed arrangements as a confederation whose level of prosperity would exceed that of the Shechemites by themselves (v. 23). 25–31 The vengeance exacted by Jacob's sons was a ruthless aggression in violation of the law of exact retribution for the crime, mercilessly multiplying the very offence (cf. especially v. 29b) alleged as their excuse (vv. 27b, 31). Jacob's reproof of the two instigators of the atrocity stressed the folly of imperilling their own households (v. 30), but how thoroughly he reprobated their deed appears in the curse he uttered in his final testament (cf. 49:5–7).

35:1–15 Covenant renewal. 1 In the crisis precipitated by the Shechem massacre (34:25ff.) Jacob's divine Protector intervened with directions and defence (cf. v. 5). He summoned Jacob back to Bethel, the site of His original covenant revelation to him, for the fulfilment of his vow (cf. 28:20ff.; 31:13). 2 Jacob said. Jacob's authority over his own covenant household continued even though the fratriarchal approach had been accommodated (cf. on 34:5). Put away the foreign gods. Exclusive devotion to the Suzerain was the covenant's first stipulation. Cf. 31:19. Purify. On the process of ritual sanctification, cf. Ex. 19:10. 4 Rings. These would be amulets with idolatrous significance. Near Shechem. At a later covenant renewal here, Joshua similarly demanded the removal of foreign gods, recalling the idolatry of Israel's ancestral household beyond Euphrates (Jos. 24:1ff., 23). 5 The terror from God, gripping Israel's foes with irrational paralysis or panic, was the work of the angel of the Lord, going before them (cf. Ex. 23:23, 27; Gn. 32:1ff.). 7 The altar, El-bethel, witnessed to the Lord's sovereign faithfulness. 8 Cf. 24:59. 9 The renewal of the covenant in vv. 9ff. made appropriate Jacob's renewal of the name of the site (v. 15; cf. 28:19). On the theophany (cf. v. 13), cf. 28:12ff. 10–12 God summarized His previous revelations to Jacob: the name-blessing, Israel, and the promise of royal nationhood in Abraham's land (cf. 17:1b, 4ff.; 28:13f.). The traditional elements of treaty-making are found here in God's words: His title, the stipulations and sanctions, the historical prologue (cf. the dominant motif: from Bethel to Bethel). Be fruitful and multiply. Incorporation of the creation mandate (cf. 1:28) in place of the usual promise of descendants indicates that the Abrahamic covenant was in continuation of the original, broadly human programme of the creation covenant. 14 The stone pillar was the customary covenant witness (cf. Jos. 24:26f.).

35:16–29 Dynastic succession. This closing section of 'the generations of Isaac' is concerned with matters affecting the family leadership, immediately and in the future. The account of Benjamin's birth (vv. 16ff.) rounds out the record of the twelve tribal leaders' origins. The twelve are then listed according to their mothers (vv. 23ff.) and thus according to legal rather than chronological priorities. A notice is inserted of Reuben's offence (v. 22) by which he forfeited the birthright (cf. v. 23; 49:4). Isaac's death (v. 29) meant Jacob's succession as covenant patriarch.

17b Cf. 30:24. 19 On the way to Ephrath. En route between the sojourn at Bethel and more prolonged sojourn near Bethlehem (vv. 21f.) Rachel died in childbirth and was buried. According to 1 Sa. 10:2 (cf. Je. 31:15) the place was possibly near, even north, of Jerusalem. 27 At Mamre. Since his return from Paddan-aram and before locating in the Hebron area (cf. 37:14), Jacob may well have visited Isaac there. 28 Isaac lived some twelve years after this reunion. 29 His burial found his twin sons at peace.

36:1 – 37:1 THE GENERATIONS OF ESAU

Before the history of the central line of Jacob proceeds, a brief survey of Esau's branch line is made. It displays the carrying forward of God's revealed purpose concerning Esau (cf. 25:23) and of Isaac's inspired blessing on him (cf. 27:39f.). Jacob's sons were listed individually in summary of their origins in Paddan-aram (35:23–26) and later are listed again as en route to Egypt with their nearer descendants who headed major divisions in Israel (see 46:8ff.; cf. Nu. 26:5ff.). Similarly, Esau's sons born in Canaan are listed (36:2–5), then again as relocated in Seir with their sons who were significant for national divisions (36:9–14), as is explained in the repetition of their names in the Edomite chieftain (Heb. 'allûp̄, also interpreted as 'clan') list (36:15–19).

The formula (36:1), which divides Genesis from 2:4 onwards into ten parts, marks the subdivision beginning at 36:9, which relates the Edomite phase of Esau's history. The explanation of Esau's departure (36:7) perhaps implies that Esau's presence in Seir at the time of Jacob's returning from Paddan-aram (cf. 32:3) was only preparatory to a later move there by his entire clan. With the shift of focus from the family of Esau to the nation of Edom, it was in order to consider the line of the Horite Seir (36:20–30), whom the Lord dispossessed before Esau (cf. Dt. 2:12, 22) and with whom Esau's descendants intermarried (cf. 36:2 and 24, 12 and 22). Remarkably, while the explicit promise of king and kingdom made to favoured Jacob (35:11; cf. 17:6; Nu. 24:7; Dt. 17:14ff.) was still unfulfilled, kingship emerged in Edom, the land of scarcely-blessed Esau (36:31). There is no need, therefore, to suggest that this reference to kings in Israel could have been made only after the establishment of the monarchy, and that this verse must be a much later insertion. Its reference is to the divine promise of kings, as indicated. The list of Edomite kings (36:32–39) indicates an elective, not dynastic, office, the importance of the chiefs appearing in the additional list arranged with special attention on geographical and administrative divisions (36:40–43). The inclusion of the transitional 37:1 within the Esau-Edom section (contrast 25:11) underscores the rejected and separated character of this Esau history.

37:2 – 50:26 THE GENERATIONS OF JACOB

This last genealogical division of Genesis covers the period of Jacob's patriarchal authority (37:2a), begun upon his return to Isaac in Canaan as a co-regency with his ageing father. Joseph is prominent in the narrative as he follows his special vocation as preserver of the covenant family, exercising authority over them by virtue of his eminence in Egypt. He represented a new type of leadership in Israel—one by special divine selection and charismatic endowment, Joseph's particular gift being wisdom. Nevertheless, he remained subordinate to Jacob within the covenant structure. In the broader history, this era was introductory to the great redemptive act of deliverance under Moses. Under divine compulsion Jacob led the covenant community out of the land of promise to sojourn in what would become a house of bondage. This development fulfilled God's ominous word to Abraham (15:13), but stood under the promise of restoration after 400 years (15:14, 16).

37:2 – 45:28 Jacob's kingdom-heirs

The spiritual transformation previously wrought in the elect individual, Jacob, is now multiplied. The whole family of Jacob is refashioned into an OT church-community of faith, united in filial and brotherly love under Israel, the servant of the Lord.

37:2–36 A house divided. 2 Early indications of Joseph's future pre-eminence made him the object of jealous hatred, especially, it seems, among the four sons of the handmaids, who ranked lowest (cf. 30:3–13; 33:2). Their sullen resentment led to slothful service, dutifully reported by the favourite. 3 Son of his old age. Except for Benjamin, all the sons were born during Jacob's second term of service, but Joseph was the son born to the beloved Rachel after her long barrenness. The brothers discerned in the special robe, whether ornamented, varicoloured, or long-sleeved, Jacob's intention to honour Joseph with the birthright forfeited by Reuben (cf. 35:22; 1 Ch. 5:1f.). 5–8 In Joseph's doubled dream they sensed a divine predestinating disclosure. Professional dream interpretation is attested in much Ancient Near Eastern literature, including reference works listing dream symbols and meanings. 9–11 The second dream extended Joseph's dominion beyond his brothers to the parental heads of the household. Jacob took offence, not knowing that Joseph's dominion over him would operate within the context of the family's enforced stay in Egypt, and would not involve a usurpation of his patriarchal authority.

12ff. The pastoral activity in the Shechem area without harassment from the outraged Canaanites (cf. 34:30) spoke of God's continuing providential protection. 18ff. The murder in the hearts of the brothers could not plead righteous indignation as an excuse this time (cf. 34:31) but only conceal itself with a cruel lie (vv. 31f.). Reuben's countersuggestion (vv. 21f.) was accepted only because it seemed still to entail eventual death for Joseph in the deep cistern. The plea for mercy proved ineffectual (cf. 42:21) until baited with the lure of extra profit (vv. 26f.) beyond Joseph's double inheritance share, lust for which was the root of all this evil. Judah's plan unwittingly thwarted Reuben's (vv. 22, 29f.) but did save Joseph from death.

28 The members of the Ishmaelite (vv. 25, 27, 28b) caravan who bought Joseph are called Midianites; those who sold him in Egypt, Medanites (v. 36, Heb.). Midian and Medan were two sons of Abraham by Keturah (cf. 25:2), but probably no distinction is intended in Gn. 37. The sellers are called Ishmaelites in 39:1. In Jdg. 8:24 also, certain 'Midianites' are identified as 'Ishmaelites'. The racial significance of 'Ishmaelite' possibly yields to a secondary meaning like 'traders'. This identity of Midian and Medan, and the use of Ishmaelite as a descriptive title covering both, removes the often-asserted need to divide this narrative between the putative sources in order to explain its alleged contradictions. Afar off, the approaching caravan was identified as that of 'traders' (v. 25), but when they passed by they were discovered to be Midianite. The return to the title 'traders' (v. 28b) serves to underline the callousness of the brothers' treatment of Joseph. In v. 28 the subject of drew Joseph up . . . is Joseph's brothers (cf. 45:4f.). Twenty shekels; cf. Ex. 21:32; Lv. 27:5.

31–36 The rankling robe (cf. vv. 3f.) became legal evidence to confirm the transfer of Joseph's inheritance to his rivals (cf. Ex. 22:13 and above on 31:39). Jacob, deceiver in his youth, was cruelly deceived (v. 33), but the Lord he now feared was already so overruling (v. 36) that the very son whose death Jacob mourned (vv. 34f.)

would yet mourn his death with all Egypt's honour (cf. 50:1ff.).

38:1-30 Alien alliances. 1 From his brothers. Judah's separation further illustrates the disunity of Jacob's community (cf. ch. 37). This must have occurred soon after Joseph's sale, for within the time from then to Jacob's descent into Egypt, slightly more than two decades, Judah married, had sons, and they also married. Ch. 38 spans the period to 42:1. Went down. Judah descended from Hebron in the mountains to the Philistine hill country. The move was downward by covenant standards too, for its outcome was fraternizing with the Canaanite Hirah and marriage to the Canaanite Shua (v. 2). Cf. above on 24:3ff. 7 The Lord slew him. In the sudden death of his firstborn, Judah was confronted with the rapid degeneration that had resulted from his intimate Canaanite alliances (cf. Gn. 19). 8 Offspring for your brother. Such levirate marriage was practised widely (cf. Hittite and Middle Assyrian law codes) and was later regulated for Israel by Moses (Dt. 25:5ff.). The firstborn of the new marriage was reckoned as heir of the deceased brother, continuing his name. Onan coveted the firstborn's portion for his own name. 9, 10 In his despicable refusal to perform his fraternal obligation and in God's judgment Judah received a monitory reminder of the brothers' sin against Joseph. 11 Yet he too conspired against Tamar's right and Er's name.

12ff. Tamar was eventually undeceived and schemed to obtain satisfaction from Judah, now a widower. This had legal precedent, for in some areas the deceased's father could take the widow. 18 Signet; a cylinder seal worn on a cord about the neck, a personal signature. Staff; these sometimes figured as symbols in concluding transactions. 21 Harlot. This term qᵉḏēšâ, 'cult prostitute, votary', used in reference to Tamar, reflects the abysmal corruption of Canaanite culture to which the covenant family was exposed particularly by moves like Judah's. In the Canaanite fertility cult men and women were set apart for sexual immorality as for a holy function (as the root meaning of qᵉḏēšâ signifies). 24 Burned. Though in sending Tamar back to her father's house (v. 11) Judah designed to be rid of her, he now asserted his patriarchal jurisdiction, seeing a way to be free of her and appear righteous at the same time. According to the later Mosaic legislation, burning, the severest penalty, was prescribed for certain extreme cases (cf. Lv. 20:14; 21:9), and stoning was the penalty for a case like Tamar's, as betrothed to Shelah (cf. Dt. 22:20ff.). 26 More righteous than I. Both had practised deception, but she to secure her legal rights and he to circumvent his legal-paternal obligations. 29 Perez; an ancestor of David's dynasty (cf. Ru. 4:18ff.; 1 Ch. 2:3–15; Mt. 1:3).

39:1 - 41:57 Preservation of the preserver. Going back some 20 years to the time of 37:36, the narrative at 39:1 turns to the providential developments in Joseph's career that were preparing for Jacob's household a way out of the increasingly dangerous conditions depicted in chs. 37 and 38.

39:1 Potiphar; probably an abbreviated form of the Egyptian name Potiphera (cf. 41:45), 'he whom the sun-god has given'. Captain of the guard; or 'chief steward' (cf. on 39:21). Slave lists from this period attest to the presence of many Asiatics on Egyptian estates, most of them war-captives but many, like Joseph, obtained through commercial importation. Pharaoh, being unnamed, has been variously identified as belonging to the Middle Kingdom (XIIth Dynasty 1991–1786 BC), the XIIIth (Egyptian) Dynasty, or the Hyksos era (c. 1720–1550 BC), not to mention the radical later chronology. 2 The Lord was with Joseph (and vv. 21, 23); cf. Ps. 105:17. 3 Cf. 30:27. 4 Joseph's title as overseer of his house reflects a common Egyptian title. Extra-biblical evidence for Semitic slaves in Egypt shows that some attained positions of domestic trust.

9 How . . . can I . . . sin against God? Joseph's persisting integrity exemplified the spiritual power of divine grace operative through the covenant. The world's influence might invade the chosen community (cf. Gn. 38) but a holy witness to God's name would also be carried from Israel into the nations. 12 His garment (and vv. 15, 18). For the second time a coat of Joseph is made to lie about him (cf. 37:31ff.). 14 A Hebrew (and v. 17); cf. above on 14:13. Gn. 39 – Ex. 10 forms one of three clusters in the OT where 'Hebrew' appears. Though a simple equation of Hebrews and Israelites sometimes seems in view (cf. Ex. 5:1–3), 'Hebrews' possibly denotes a broader group of Eberites in this section. Its derogatory flavour on Egyptian lips reflects Egyptian bias against Asiatics. 20 Into the prison; cf. Ps. 105:18. Death was the expected penalty for the crime charged. 21–23 The divine favour that secured the milder penalty continued in the prison, bringing to Joseph the esteem of Potiphar's (cf. 40:3 and 39:1) assistant there.

40:2 Chief butler, better 'cupbearer', corresponds to the title of an Egyptian officer, a confidant and adviser of Pharaoh. Chief baker, as an attendant on Pharaoh, was another high official. 4 Charged Joseph with them. Joseph's trust was over administrative affairs in the prison; superiority over the high-ranking prisoners was not implied (cf. 41:12). 5 Each dream with its own meaning. Cf. above on 37:5ff. The dream data were derived from the dreamer's familiar function and concern but were so shaped by God as to be prophetic. 8 Interpretations belong to God. Cf. 41:16, 25ff. The Egyptian officials were dismayed by their lack of access to their favourite dream interpreters but the Hebrew slave rejected such professionals as charlatans. 13 Lift up your head. Joseph used a key expression capable of opposite meanings to describe first the cupbearer's pardon and restoration to honour (cf. 2 Ki. 25:27, RV; RSV, 'graciously freed'), then the decapitation of the baker (v. 19).

The narrator accents the device by using the phrase in a third sense, i.e. 'to give attention to (the pending cases)', in his account of the fulfilment (v. 20). 14 So confident was Joseph of his divine gift of interpretation that he requested a return of kindness from the cupbearer. 15 Stolen out of the land. Basing his claim to pardon on his actual guiltlessness, Joseph correctly described his brothers' deed in stripping him of his rights, freedom, and inheritance for their own enrichment, as a theft. 19 Birds will eat the flesh. The impaling and devouring of the corpse was an extreme aggravation of the penalty and disgrace (cf. Dt. 21:22), particularly for an Egyptian courtier, for whom mummification and a splendid sepulchre were of paramount concern.

41:1 Pharaoh dreamed. The providential series of dreams concludes: the middle pair (40:5ff.) proved the means for involving Joseph in the third pair (cf. 41:9ff.) and this last pair served to fulfil the first pair (37:5ff.). The doubling of the dreams signified the certainty of the divine purpose revealed (41:32). 2–7 For supplementary details see vv. 17–24. The repetition of long sections is part of the Ancient Near Eastern story-telling art. 8 All its wise men. The accessibility of Pharoah's experts only compounded his frustration (cf. on 40:8). 9 I remember my faults, or 'remissness' (abstract plural); cf. 40:14, 23f. 14 Called Joseph. The de-Semitizing of Joseph's appearance began in deference to Egyptian custom and particularly court etiquette. Monument paintings of Egyptians depict clean-shaven faces and white linen dress. 16 It is not in me. Joseph engaged in this virtual wisdom contest forthrightly in the name of his God (cf. vv. 25, 28, 32; Dn. 2:27–30).

29–32 Seven years of famine would follow seven bumper crop years leaving no trace of their reserves (v. 31). The seven-year famine is known not only as a motif in ancient epics but as a reality in Egyptian historical records. 33–41 Joseph's prompt proposing of provident measures (vv. 33ff.) so heightened the impression made on Pharaoh's court that they were persuaded of his supernatural insight (v. 38; cf. Dn. 5:11ff.) and acknowledged him the man for the position he proposed (vv. 39ff.; cf. Ps. 105:21f.). Since Joseph was set as chief steward over Pharaoh's 'house' (v. 4), in command over all the land of Egypt (v. 41), directly responsible and subordinate only to Pharaoh (v. 40), his office may well have been that of grand vizier. Other Asiatics are known to have achieved similar eminence in Egypt's government in the 2nd millennium BC. 42 Joseph's investiture, with robes of honour and wide golden collar, was traditionally Egyptian. 43 Second chariot; or, chariot of the second-in-command. 45 Zaphenath-paneah is still of uncertain meaning. Asenath is a type of name attested in the early second millennium. On, or Heliopolis, was cultic centre of Re, the sun-god. Potiphera; cf. on 39:1. Joseph's entrance into the court with his change of name (cf. Dn. 1:7) and marriage to a priest's daughter completed his outward Egyptianization. His bold confession of the God of Israel would prevent his cultural adjustments being misunderstood as a religious capitulation.

46a Cf. 37:2. 50–52 Joseph's explanations of the names of Manasseh and Ephraim continued his witness to his God, with thanksgiving. He had forgotten the house of Jacob (v. 51) only in the sense that the hardship brought on him by his brothers was a thing of the past by virtue of the remarkable turn of providence. 53–57 The progressive fulfilment of Pharaoh's prophetic dreams set the stage for the final act in the fulfilment of Joseph's own dreams.

42:1 – 45:28 Remnant and reconciliation. 41:57 – 42:5 Cf. above on 12:10. For the chronology see 45:6. In the common emergency the whole family acted together under Jacob's authority. Benjamin now occupied the favourite's position, a circumstance on which Joseph's imminent testing of the ten would pivot.

42:6ff. Bowed themselves before him. Unawares they fulfilled the dreams they had gone to desperate lengths to defeat (cf. 37:5ff.; 42:9). Their failure to recognize Joseph is explained by his thorough Egyptianization, the incredible circumstances of the encounter, and Joseph's studious concealment of his identity. Evidently foreign grain distributions fell under Joseph's immediate supervision. Subsequent re-telling of the conversation of vv. 7ff. (see 43:7 and 44:19f.) indicates that Joseph elicited the family history (vv. 11ff.) by further questioning not recorded here. 15 You shall be tested. The real question was, of course, not whether they were spies, but whether they had had a change of heart. 17–20 He put them . . . in prison, then, showing leniency, released them in the name of his fear of God (cf. 20:11) to stir their consciences with the memory of how they enslaved without pity that brother they described as 'no more' (v. 13). Cf. vv. 21f. 21–26 He took Simeon (v. 24), the second oldest, as hostage after discovering the innocence of Reuben, the oldest (vv. 22f). The subtle correspondence between the treatment each brother received and his responsibility in the selling of Joseph (cf. too 43:33) intensified their guilty sense of a divine vengeance stalking them (v. 21). Perhaps too they wondered whether this uncanny Egyptian practised arts of divination (cf. 44:5, 15). Joseph put them in that old situation again of appearing before Jacob without one brother (cf. vv. 33f., 36).

27 As one of them opened his sack. According to this and v. 35, only one of them chanced to open his sack with the money at the lodging-place, the others discovering theirs at home. The abbreviated version of the homeward trip as reported to the steward in 43:21 telescopes the initial and later discoveries of the money bundles. Actually the whole picture is simplified, for to meet the needs of Jacob's clan and justify the trip by ten men, more than ten sacks of grain must have been brought back. 28 What is this that God has done? Joseph's strategy was working. Already under suspicion, they felt they could never clear themselves of the inevitable charge of theft. 29–36 It appears that they withheld this crushing fact from Jacob until the multiple discovery in his presence let the cat out of the bag (v. 35). 37 Reuben as eldest assumed responsibility, displaying again admirable qualities (cf. 37:21ff.; 42:22). 38 But Jacob, perhaps remembering Reuben's earlier offence (cf. 35:22), refused his offer of surety. Such was Jacob's partiality towards Benjamin that he repressed concern to deliver Simeon rather than part with Benjamin under ominous circumstances.

43:1–8 But the preservation of the lives of all in the midst of continuing famine demanded the perilous trip—with Benjamin. 9, 10 I will be surety for him. It was Judah who prevailed with Jacob, assuming full responsibility for Benjamin's safety under pain of the loss of Jacob's blessing and thus of disinheritance. By the transforming grace that produced the Jacob–Israel change a new spirit of solidarity and self-sacrifice had arisen in the house divided. 11–15 Sadly resigned (cf. v. 14b) to the second journey, Jacob made practical, propitiatory arrangements (cf. 32:13ff.), committing the matter to God, almighty in His providential government (v. 14).

16–34 Observing Benjamin's presence, Joseph put his now long-meditated plan into operation (16ff.) 23 The God of your fathers. The steward had been taken into Joseph's confidence and perhaps even accepted the faith of Joseph. His explanation explained far more than the brothers' immediate puzzle (vv. 21f.) and at a more profound level than they were thinking; but they were too nervously distracted to hear his broad hint. Indeed, they were so wary of the steward's unpredictable master that his very hospitality alarmed them (v. 18). At the dinner they failed to leap to the one logical explanation of his behaviour, with his concern for Jacob (v. 27), affectionate favouritism for Benjamin (vv. 29f., 34), and exact knowledge of the interlocking sequence of births of these sons of four mothers (v. 33). The Egyptians' eating scruples (v. 32) derived from ideas of ritual purity. The brothers' lack of resentment towards the highly preferred Benjamin (v. 34) suggested a heart-conversion but Joseph had a more positive, ultimate test prepared (44:1ff.).

44:1 Each man's money. The purpose of this feature, not subsequently mentioned again, was probably to enflame the brothers' smouldering sense that God was mysteriously dealing with them for their great sin, summoning to repentance (cf. 42:28; 43:23). It would also lend plausibility to a punishment based on communal responsibility, so making Joseph's insistence on isolating Benjamin for punishment more arresting. 2 The silver cup served to separate Benjamin as peculiarly guilty, while the sacred character attributed to it (cf. vv. 5, 15) made its theft a crime worthy of death (cf. 31:32). 4 A short distance. Apprehension of a thief in the act, or virtually so (as when his hot scent was followed and the loot discovered in his possession), resulted legally in peremptory and extreme punishment (cf. 31:22ff.; Jdg. 18:22ff.). The search of the overtaken suspect was regarded as a veritable ordeal, its outcome incontestable (cf. 31:36ff.). 5 By this that he divines. Divination by water was a widespread ancient practice. Joseph's alleged divining by the cup was certainly part of the contrived situation he fabricated with his steward's assistance. 9 The penalty the brothers pronounced before the search was that customary for the alleged crime (cf. vv. 2 and 4). 11–13 The search ordeal with its exposure of the money bundles (cf. on v. 1), the astounding correspondence of its sequence to the brothers' ages (cf. 43:33), and the shattering exposure of Benjamin, had the desired effect. 14–17 However innocent they may have known themselves to be in the present inexplicable instance, they were convinced that God was judging their ancient guilt (v. 16; cf. 42:21f.). Joseph's theatrical claim (v. 15) increased their alertness to the supernatural and prompted the confession voiced by Judah as group spokesman (cf. vv. 14, 16; 43:3ff.). Then Joseph increased the pressure by insisting that the ten return to Jacob—without Benjamin—in peace (v. 17)!

33 Let your servant remain instead of the lad. More than this Joseph could not hope for. God had so changed his brothers' hearts that Judah's plea and self-offer carries away our thoughts involuntarily to the Servant born of his tribe who offered Himself for the transgression of His people.

45:3, 4 Stunned silence followed the Egyptian's I am Joseph and in spite of all assurances (vv. 4ff.) a persistent uneasiness remained for many years (cf. 50:15). 5 God sent me. Though stressing the sovereign providence in absolute terms (cf. 'not you . . . but God', v. 8a), Joseph's intent was not to deny his brothers' guilty responsibility (his whole strategy had aimed at stirring their consciences). But now that a godly sorrow gripped them, Joseph would turn them from remorseful backward looks to thankful appropriation of the future God's mercy had provided (vv. 8b ff.). 6 Neither ploughing nor harvest; the two words express a compound idea, 'no yield from tilling'. 7 A remnant. God had been preserving a remnant people to bear His revelation from the Fall in Eden through the desolation of the Flood, and out of the idolatry that overwhelmed the nations. Joseph properly traced that Messianic strand in Israel's history in his own day. 8 Father to Pharaoh is the equivalent of a title held by Egyptian viziers. 10 Goshen was an Egyptian region (cf. 47:6, 27) in the E Delta area (cf. 47:11) and thus not far from the court at Memphis (whether in XIIth or XIIIth Dynasty, or in the Hyksos era). Yet as a place highly suitable for the cattle (47:4–6) disdained by Egyptians (cf. 46:34) it afforded relative seclusion. 11 It thus had advantages for the immediate emergency, since Joseph could conveniently provide for Israel there, and for the long-term sojourn that would ensue, for the isolation would make possible the preservation of Israel's distinctive convenant-culture under conditions favourable to their unity and growth. 17, 18 Pharaoh changed the form of Joseph's orders to Israel's household (cf. vv. 9ff.) into a personal invitation from himself. Joseph's specific intention of locating the family in Goshen he had kept private with his brothers, adroitly securing Pharaoh's consent to that only when the time came (cf. 46:31ff.). 19 Wagons; probably large two-wheeled carts such as are pictured in Egyptian scenes. 22 Five (or 'several') festal garments. Joseph no longer need have qualms about sending off Benjamin in his own old position among the sons of Jacob – not even with a favourite's robe! 24 His concern was only with the possibility of recriminations among the ten as they returned to Jacob and the dreaded necessity of confessing to him their great sin. 26, 27 Easily persuaded of Joseph's death, Jacob was a doubter concerning his 'resurrection', only persuaded by the evidence of his senses. 28 I will go. So spoke the man Israel, and Israel the nation was destined to emerge in a land not theirs, their return to Canaan requiring God's mighty acts in Exodus and conquest that stamped on Israel's possession of the kingdom the character of a sovereign grant from a divine Saviour.

46:1 – 47:27 Israel's descent into Egypt

46:1–27 Pilgrim house of Israel. Jacob discerned through the remarkable course of events, divinely disclosed beforehand in Joseph's dreams and afterwards prophetically interpreted by him (cf. 45:5ff.), that God had sent a man ahead and now purposed for Israel's household to go down to Egypt (cf. Ps. 105:17, 23). Cf. above on 24:8. 1a Consideration of God's warning to Abraham of a sojourn in a foreign land (15:13ff.) would make the departure from Canaan a challenge to the depths of Jacob's faith in the covenant's future. 1b He responded with renewal of commitment at Beer-sheba, patriarchal altar site on the borders of the land (cf. 21:33; 26:23–25). 2–4 Here also Jacob received the last in the series of special revelations that marked his pilgrim life, much like the first in its circumstances and reassurances (cf. 28:12–15). The Lord dispelled any lingering uncertainty concerning Jacob's duty (v. 3b); in Egypt itself the promises would begin to be fulfilled (v. 3c; cf. 12:2; Ps. 105:24). Bring you up again. As the last clause in v. 4 indicates, Jacob would have the joy of reunion with Joseph but would die in Egypt (cf. 45:28; 46:30). God's promise of restoration was meant, therefore, for Israel become a nation (cf. v. 3c; 15:14, 16).

8ff. These are the names of the descendants of Israel, who came into Egypt. Like the section on the generations of Esau (cf. 36:1ff.), that on the generations of Jacob (37:2ff.) distinguishes two geographical phases—in Canaan and removed from Canaan, the latter marked here by a new genealogical list supplementing that of 35:23ff. (cf. 36:9ff.). The epochal import of the emigration to Egypt for the history of Israel and the promises (cf. Dt. 10:22) called for a formal catalogue at this point. Stylistically the conventions of such lists are followed (cf. above on Gn. 5), particularly selectivity to achieve conventional totals, in this case seventy (v. 27; cf. Gn. 10; Ex. 1:5; 24: 9). As comparison with the later list in Nu. 26 shows, the selection was designed primarily to include besides the tribal heads the founders of the fathers' houses in Israel, the major tribal sub-divisions. Jacob and his sons (v. 8). This shows that Jacob is included in the seventy, as does the notation in vv. 26f., apparently meaning that without Jacob, Joseph, and his two sons the total is sixty-six. Hence Jacob is to be counted among the thirty-three in the Leah category (v. 15). So also is Dinah (cf. daughters, v. 15), Er and Onan being omitted (v. 12). Category descriptions in such lists refer to the general situation rather than dwell on the particular circumstances of each individual. Cf. 35:26b, where Benjamin is an exception. Note also here v. 18, where the 'sons' of Zilpah include Serah (v. 17). Similarly, the whole company is described as coming into Egypt (vv. 8, 26)—not necessarily with Jacob, hence Joseph is no problem—but chronological limitations prove that some of the descendants (besides Ephraim and Manasseh) were born in Egypt. Judah's son Perez (cf. 38:29) surely did not have the sons Hezron and Hamul (v. 12) before the departure; neither did Benjamin, not yet twenty-five, already have ten descendants including grandsons (v. 21; cf. Nu. 26:38ff.). Further, on Reuben's four sons (v. 9), cf. 42:37. Stephen (see Acts 7:14) follows a literary tradition (cf. LXX) which includes five additional descendants. The actual size of the clan with the wives and daughters, servants and their households (cf. 30:34) would be several or even many times seventy.

46:28 – 47:27 Israel, blessed and blessing. As Pharaoh opened the door of blessing to Israel (47:6), blessing was returned upon his house through the pronouncement of Jacob (47:7, 10) and Joseph's continuing wise administration (47:13ff.). Cf. 12:3. Later, a reversal of Egyptian policy towards Israel would bring God's judgments upon them.

46:28 Sent Judah before him. Judah's role as trusted negotiator had been established (cf. 43:3ff.; 44:18ff.). His mission was to arrange details of the rendezvous in Goshen. 29 He presented himself, lit. 'showed himself'. For this appearance of Jacob's son from the dead in the glory of Egypt, an expression is used hitherto reserved in the narrative for theophany (cf. 37:9f.). 31–34 Joseph's programme for Jacob's household was calculated to protect them from Egypt's pagan influences. But he skilfully effected this without offence to the Egyptians by arranging for Pharaoh to act to separate the Israelites out of regard for Egyptian prejudice (v. 34b). 47:1, 2 In both Joseph's preparatory audience with Pharaoh (v. 1; cf. 46:31f.) and that of his brothers (v. 2; cf. 46:33f.), their occupation as shepherds and their present location in the pastures of Goshen were so stressed as virtually to put the desired decision in Pharaoh's mouth (cf. vv. 5f., 11f.). 6 Pharaoh's favour extended to the appointment of capable Israelites to officialdom.

9 The years of my sojourning. Jacob's assessment of his life is not a complaint (cf. 48:16a) but a soberly accurate account. In common with Abraham and Isaac he was a stranger in Canaan, his life orientated to a future city of God (cf. Heb. 11:13ff.); but his alien residency in Canaan was even more troubled and his life-span (as he correctly anticipated, cf. v. 28) briefer than theirs (v. 9b). Moreover, he must die as a sojourner outside the promised land. 11 Land of Rameses; Goshen is thus given, by anticipation, its later name. 13 The land of Canaan. Joseph's wisdom brought blessing to the promised land, while contributing to the Egyptian overlordship there. 14ff. The economic measures instituted by Joseph were viewed by the Egyptians themselves as a favour, indeed, as their salvation (cf. v. 25) in the desperate famine emergency (vv. 13, 20). 18 The following (lit. 'second') year. The last of the seven famine years predicted had apparently passed, for Joseph now contemplates sowing and taxable harvests (cf. vv. 23ff.). 20 The land became Pharaoh's in fact, as it had been previously in theory. Egyptian evidence shows that the situation described here, including the priestly exemptions recorded in vv. 22, 26, existed by the New Empire period. 21 'Removed them to cities' (AV), i.e. for more efficient distribution—but why at this late stage? Perhaps translate, 'from the cities', i.e. where they had come to be near the granaries and in order now to sow their fields again (cf. v. 23). RSV's made slaves of them follows LXX tradition and suits the context before (v. 20) and after (vv. 23, 25). 27 Multiplied exceedingly; cf. above on 46:3.

47:28 – 50:26 Israel's hope of restoration

Dying in faith (cf. Heb. 11:13ff.), Jacob prophetically made testamentary disposition first concerning Joseph's family (ch. 48; cf. Heb. 11:21), then concerning all his sons (ch. 49). Further, he charged Joseph in his capacity as Egyptian lord (47:29ff.) and all the brothers as obedient sons of the covenant (49:29ff.) to bury him in the promised land. And Joseph, dying in faith, spoke of the Exodus of the Israelites (50:24ff.; cf. Heb. 11:22).

47:28 – 48:22 Joseph's commission and double inheritance. 47:29 The time drew near; cf. on 27:2. On the gesture accompanying the oath (vv. 29, 31a), cf. on 24:2. 30 'I will lie with my fathers' (AV). This should not be equated with burial (so RSV) but understood as an aspect of Jacob's dying, which was to be followed by the transporting of his body into Canaan and finally burial there. Jacob's insistence on burial at Machpelah expressed his attachment by faith to the Abrahamic covenant and his trust in God's promises of the kingdom to be established in Canaan (cf. on Gn. 23). 31 Appropriately, therefore, he worshipped (v. 31b). The 'staff' (LXX, for Heb. maṭṭeh, instead of bed, miṭṭâ) would be an identifying link with Canaan (cf. 32:10). For the legal testamentary character of the patriarchs' dying blessings (chs. 48 and 49), cf. on 27:33.

48:1 The relationship of 47:29ff. to 48:1ff. is uncertain. After this need not refer to the immediately preceding charge. In fact, Heb. 11:21b appends 47:31b to the ch. 48 episode (unless Heb. 11:21 refers to 48:12b). Joseph's two sons were about twenty years old. 3, 4 Jacob recognized the source of the blessings he was about to communicate in God and traced their content to the revelation at Bethel (cf. 28:13ff.; 35:10ff.). 5 Shall be mine. This was a declaration of intent to adopt the two grandsons, thus elevating them both to the status of tribal heads and thereby giving Joseph, according to his dreams (37:5ff.), the position of firstborn with a double representation among the tribes of Israel (1 Ch. 5:1f.; cf. Dt. 21:15ff.). 6 Joseph's additional sons would be subsumed under the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh. 7 The allusion to Rachel and her burial was prompted by the honouring of her son Joseph. Her sepulchre would be apart from Jacob's in ancestral Machpelah (cf. 47:30; 49:29ff.) but her name would be honourably remembered in Joseph's double inheritance.

8ff. The actual adoption is connected with the testamentary blessing of the two grandsons. 12 From his (i.e. Jacob's) knees; perhaps the legal rite formalizing adoption is implied. 14 Crossing his hands. Repeatedly the last became first (both Jacob and Joseph were examples), attesting that the covenant blessings are not secured by the course of nature but as sovereign gifts of God. 15, 16 He blessed Joseph; the sons who were being blessed now stood in Joseph's place among the tribal fathers. The angel who has redeemed me. Jacob knew the covenant as a living reality (v. 15) in which the Lord approached him in the sacramental visibility of the angel, assuming the role of nearest kinsman (as the verb 'redeemed' implies) to deliver Jacob from every threat to his life and liberty (see on 16:7). Bless the lads. Jacob blessed in that he effectively invoked God's blessing. 19, 20 Younger brother shall be greater. Both Ephraim and Manasseh entered tribally into the inheritance which God gave to His people (v. 16b), yet Ephraim attained greater prominence in Israel's history. 21 Jacob's hope of restoration would not be realized in Joseph's lifetime, and hence the prophecy would be repeated when Joseph was dying (cf. 50:24). 22 Mountain slope. Jacob punned on śᵉkem, 'shoulder', the name of the city of Shechem. For near it they had a possession (cf. 33:19f.) which was a pledge of the future conquest of Canaan here prophesied. I took; the tense is prophetic perfect, i.e. the past tense is used, as often in Hebrew, to express the certainty with which a future event would happen. Jacob and Joseph here represent their descendants. Joseph was buried at Shechem (Jos. 24:32; cf. Jn. 4:5). 'One . . . above thy brethren' (RV); as privilege of the firstborn. Cf. Jos. 17:14ff.

49:1–33 Jacob's prophetic testament. Cf. Dt. 33:1ff. These death-bed (v. 33) blessings (v. 28) of the original twelve were testamentary and prophetic. 1 'In the latter days' (RV). This testamentary vision looked beyond the Mosaic Exodus and restoration to the Messianic (see on vv. 10ff.). At the same time the general tribal characterizations here given received historical embodiment during the OT phase of God's kingdom. Leah's six sons are treated first (vv. 3–15), then the four sons of the handmaids (vv. 16–21), and Rachel's two last (vv. 22–27). The pre-eminence of the Judah and Joseph tribes in Israelite history is prophetically matched here by the prominence of their blessings. Reuben, Simeon, and Levi are included as tribes belonging to the future covenant nation and to that extent are blessed. Yet it is the shadow cast by their crimes over their blessing that receives all the notice (vv. 3–7), thereby providing a dark foil against which Judah's glory bursts forth (vv. 8ff.). 3, 4 Cf. 35:22; 37:3; 48:5; 1 Ch. 5:1f. 5, 6 Cf. 34:25ff. 7 I will divide them; this was a destiny opposite to the sentiment of Levi's name (cf. 29:34). Levi's cities were distributed among other tribes. For the later change of this curse into blessing see Dt. 33:8ff. 8, 9 Shall praise you; Hebrew yôdûka, a pun on yᵉhûdâ, Judah. Bow down before you. The charismatic leadership over Israel assigned to Joseph in his generation would take royal form (cf. v. 10) in Judah, in the dynasty of David, who by his military prowess and political sagacity triumphed over Israel's enemies on every side (vv. 8b, 9).

10 The sceptre shall not depart. The royal dignity of Judah attained in David was made permanent by the Davidic covenant (cf. 2 Sa. 7:16), fully realized in the Kingship of Jesus Christ. 'Until Shiloh come' (AV). The Hebrew text here contains the word šylh. The versions, however, apparently reflect a reading šlh. If we follow the lead given by the versions, we read the word as šellōh, equivalent in Hebrew to ʾašer lô, meaning 'that (which) to him'. One possibility then is to understand it to mean 'that which belongs to him (i.e. Judah)': Judah will continue to be the royal house until all that is rightfully his comes to him; or again (as RSV) 'he to whom it (i.e. the sceptre or kingship) belongs'. Ezekiel evidently treats the passage in this latter way (Ezk. 21:27; in the Hebrew Bible 21:32; cf. Ezk. 19), apparently in a Messianic sense; his treatment of š(y)lh could involve free punning. If the MT šîlōh is followed (as in AV), then the traditional understanding of it as a Messianic title meaning something like 'the establisher of peace' (cf. 1 Ch. 22:9), will deserve the preference over the interpretation of Shiloh as the Ephraimite city (e.g. 1 Sa. 1:3). In Christ, Lion of the tribe of Judah (Rev. 5:5; cf. Gn. 49:9) and Prince of peace (Is. 9:6), the turning-point was reached in the Davidic dynasty, not terminating it but introducing its final and complete expression. To Christ is the obedience of the peoples, i.e. of the nations universally (cf., e.g., Ps. 72:8–11; Is. 11:10), and only His reign produces the peace of ultimate and eternal paradise (vv. 11f.; cf., e.g., Ps. 72:15f.; Is. 11:6ff.). If the Hebrew consonantal text šylh is differently divided, one possibility is šay lôh, 'tribute-payment to him', the last two clauses of v. 10 then being parallel. Again it would be to Judah's Messianic Descendant that this international acknowledgment comes.

13 At the shore (Heb. lᵉḥôp̄). Is this another instance of the preposition's meaning 'from' ('apart from the shore'), for Zebulun's later tribal allocation was not maritime? 16 Dan shall judge (yādîn). Many of Jacob's blessings involve such Hebrew word-plays. 18 I wait for thy salvation, O Lord. This irrepressible 'Come quickly' may have been inspired by Jacob's apprehension of the trials to be faced or by his longing for the kingdom to be inherited. 22ff. Upon Joseph, separated to pre-eminence among his brethren (v. 26), Jacob pronounced blessings in peace (vv. 22, 25b) and war (vv. 23f.), tracing them all to God, whom he identified repeatedly as his own (cf. 'of Jacob', 'of Israel', 'of your father', vv. 24f.). MT in v. 26 reads: 'have prevailed above the blessings of my progenitors (hôray) unto (ʿad) the utmost bound (taʾᵃwaṯ) of the everlasting hills' (AV). RSV prefers harᵉrê ʿad, eternal mountains, and bounties for taʾᵃwaṯ; cf. Dt. 33:15; Hab. 3:6. 29 He charged them. The twelve as a group of equals were entrusted with the mission of faith already assigned to Joseph (cf. 47:29ff.). 33 Was gathered to his people; cf. 47:30.

50:1–26 Covenant guardianship. The era of the patriarchs was over and the covenant community and witness came under the guardianship of Joseph as the prototype of a new, charismatic leadership in Israel, one that would resume with Moses and culminate in Christ. 2 Embalmed Israel. The associated religious beliefs, particularly the Egyptian idea of immortality, were not adopted with the Egyptian art of mummification. It was rather utilized in the interests of Jacob's postponed burial in Canaan, itself a testimony to Israel's own distinctive hope. 4ff. Diplomatic considerations, or possibly disqualification from appearance in the royal court by reason of his mourning, explain Joseph's indirect approach to Pharaoh. 5 I hewed out; Jacob had prepared a place for his burial in the cave Abraham purchased (cf.

49:30; 50:13). 7–9 The exodus of Jacob according to Joseph's request amid the honour of Egypt was a pledge of Israel's later departure with Egypt's treasures, following Moses' negotiations with Pharaoh. 10 Similarly the entrance of Jacob into Canaan from across the Jordan in vv. 10ff. witnessed to and found its counterpart in Israel's conquest of the land under Joshua. 11 Abel-mizraim, 'meadow (or watercourse) of the Egyptians' puns on 'ēḇel, 'mourning'. Possibly the Egyptian escort remained here while Jacob's sons completed the mission that registered before the eyes of the Canaanites Israel's continuing claims in their land. 18 Fell down before him. Again Joseph's dreams were strikingly fulfilled and the reconciliation of Israel's house confirmed (v. 21). 19, 20 Cf. above on 45:5ff. 22 A hundred and ten years (and v. 26) was esteemed by Egyptians the ideal life-span. 24, 25 His brothers; Joseph's kinsmen in general may be meant. God will visit you. Joseph emulated Jacob's dying faith, confessing the covenant God and hope by prophetic word (v. 24; cf. 48:21; ch. 49) and commission (v. 25; cf. 47:29ff.; 49:29ff.). 26 On v. 26b, cf. on v. 2 and see Ex. 13:19; Jos. 24:32. So Joseph died, but Israel in Egypt continued under the covenant guardianship of the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob unto the day of redemption.

Exodus

INTRODUCTION

TITLE AND AUTHORSHIP

The Greek translation of the OT (the LXX) bestowed the title Exodus (Gk. exodos, 'a going out') on this book; in the Hebrew Bible it is named after its opening words, viz. 'and these are the names'. Moses has been denoted as its author by Hebrew tradition (Ecclus. 45:5), by the Lord Jesus Christ (Mk. 1:44) and by His disciples (Jn. 1:45). Besides this we have the testimony of the book itself in 17:14, and this is nowhere explicitly contradicted. For further examination of the subject, see the article on 'Moses and the Pentateuch' (p. 41), which gives the position adopted here.

THEME AND PURPOSE

The key verses to the understanding of the book are 19:3–6, and from them two main subjects arise: the judgment of the oppressors and the deliverance of the oppressed (19:4), and the constitution of the delivered as the people of God and their characteristics (19:5). The main body of the book deals with these two themes and is divisible on this basis: e.g. 1:8 – 19:2 deals with judgment and deliverance, and 19:7 – 40:38 deals with the new society thus brought into being. In addition, there are two link sections which, together with the above, serve to give consistency and harmony to the book. These are 1:1–7 which shows how the Israelites came to be in Egypt and which paves the way for 1:8 – 19:2, and 19:3–6 which shows how they came to be at Sinai and prepares the reader for 19:7 – 40:38.

The main events recorded in this book are related to these two locations, Egypt and Sinai, and they are the two foci of the book, the latter being viewed as the goal of the former. The intervening wandering in the wilderness is viewed as the consequence of the deliverance and the necessary prelude to the constitution of the Israelites as the people of God. The emerging outline is simple and clear. 1:1 – 19:2— how the Israelites came to be in Egypt and how they came from there to Sinai; 19:3 – 40:38— how they consequently became, and were to manifest themselves as, a distinct nation.

The title given to the book by the Greek version, as we noted above, embodies its central and inescapable theme, that of God's deliverance of slaves in bondage that they might become a people for His own possession, service and glory. This is the central act recorded in the book, but attention is given also to certain of the resultant privileges and responsibilities; this theme is concluded in Leviticus. All this foreshadows a greater exodus (deliverance) to come through the Lord Jesus Christ's death, and the emergence of those who were 'no people' as the people of God. The covenant He sealed by His blood creates the church; this the OT adumbrates and in it the OT believers participate.

THE DATE AND ROUTE OF THE EXODUS

The most helpful treatment of this subject is to be found in K. A. Kitchen's book Ancient Orient and Old Testament, 1966, pp. 57–75. Reference may also be made to the relevant section in the article 'Chronology of the Old Testament' in NBD.

Although there is no attestation of Israel's presence in Egypt in Egyptian records, there is no ground for denying or querying the biblical statement that twelve sons of Jacob went to Egypt (Ex. 1:1–5) and that their descendants came up from there (Ex. 24:4).

There is considerable debate, however, as to the date of the Exodus, and two main schemes of dating are advanced for the Exodus–conquest period. Neither is without some supporting internal evidence, but as yet neither is wholly free from objection. We shall list the more important data below and then tender a view for the purpose of this commentary, but the reader is referred also to the above-mentioned works, and in addition to the following: C. de Wit, The Date and Route of the Exodus, 1960, and M. F. Unger, Archaeology and the Old Testament, 1965. There are two suggested dates for the Exodus. The first is c. 1440 BC and the second c. 1290 BC.

Exodus c. 1440 BC (according to Prof. M. F. Unger)

1. 1 Ki. 6:1. The fourth year of Solomon's reign would be c. 961 BC and therefore the Exodus would be c. 1441 BC and the entry to Egypt c. 1870 BC, in accord with Ex. 12:40, 41. If this scheme is not accepted, then the Exodus-monarchy period has to be telescoped as a consequence. 2. Thutmosis III (1482–1450 BC) was a conqueror and renowned builder and is suited as the pharaoh of the oppression, and Amenhotep II as the pharaoh of the Exodus. 3. Events in Palestine, as they are reconstructed from archaeological finds, e.g. the mention of the invading Habiru in the Amarna letters and the fall of Jericho, confirm that the entry took place c. 1400 BC.

This view comes to grief in connection with Ex. 1:11, however, at the above point, and is a little naïve as regards the methods of OT chronology, assuming as it does that one has simply to add up the numbers given in the Bible in order to arrive at firm dates, whereas it is more likely that in many cases figures given represent a formal reckoning of so many years to a generation, rather than the exact passing of that number of calendar years.

Exodus c. 1290 BC (according to K. A. Kitchen)

1. For the building of the store-cities, Ex. 1:11 gives a date at the end of the oppression. Ra'amses was founded by Sethos I but built by Rameses II who acceded in 1304 or 1290 BC. 2. The stele which records Merenptah's victory over the Libyans c. 1220 BC mentions that Israel was subdued along with other peoples in Syria-Palestine. Thus Israel was in Palestine by c. 1220 BC. The 40 years' wandering in the wilderness is not a mere cipher, and so we have 1290 to 1260 for the Exodus and 1250 to 1220 for the invasion. 3. The presence of strong kingdoms in Edom and Moab was impossible before 1300 BC. 4. Excavations at sites in Palestine show that the invasion began in the second half of the 13th century. The evidence at Jericho needs careful scrutiny because during the time it was in ruins whole levels of the city were washed away, but Lachish, Bethel and Hazor fell about this time. The collapse of Ai defies dating, however. 5. The Habiru are not to be identified with the invading Israelites because they were a diverse people, native Canaanites, and are attested from the 18th to the 12th centuries. 6. As regards 1 Ki. 6:1 and the 480 years mentioned there, addition of the separate time-references in the Exodus—1 Kings corpus gives 553 years plus three unknown amounts. In connection with this the methods of Ancient Near Eastern historical writing need to be recalled, because here narratives are not synchronized with others by a system of cross-references but listed as successive rather than contemporaneous.

Such is the relatively indecisive state of the dating of the Exodus. It is the later date that we shall adopt for the purpose of this commentary. The route taken, with the tentative locations of the stopping-places mentioned, appears on the map below (p. 123). Reference should also be made to K. A. Kitchen's article 'Wilderness of Wandering' in NBD.

THEME STUDIES

The Self-disclosure of God: miracle and theophany

God manifests Himself by acts in the realm of human history (Ex. 6:7) but also by acts in the realm of nature, for He is Creator and Lord of all. He is always greater than nature and reveals Himself through it, but is never to be confounded with it. The OT witnesses to the order of nature (Gn. 8:22; Ps. 104:19, etc.) because of the character of the Creator who is wise, perfect and stable, but it also places on record the fact that God can throw nature into an upheaval (controlled by Him) in order to reveal His majesty, power and holiness. This is miracle, and it is seen in Exodus in the nature-miracles of the plagues, the Red Sea, the water from rock, the manna and quails, the pillars of cloud and of fire, and Sinai engulfed in a cloud and yet aflame.

Where these phenomena admit of a natural explanation, they are accorded a measure of acceptance by an age that still does not like to acknowledge supernatural incursions by God into His universe. But where no such explanation is forthcoming, this acceptance is completely wanting, particularly in connection with the truths revealed by God, or the messages uttered from Sinai in spoken and written words. Such phenomena are described as factual occurrences, invested with a significance intended by God, and interpreted by revelation to and through Moses, and ought to be accepted as such. The Creator is not only at liberty to transcend laws He has made for the universe, but also has the ability to do so, both in speech and action.

The angel of the Lord. He is of particular interest and point here. The ministry of angels was, until Moses, the distinctive means of divine revelation to the elect, but ceased to be so from the time of the Mosaic revelation, for these truths and institutions made angelic visitations less necessary. This is theophany. The following references and facts are to be studied in connection with the angel of the Lord, who is a 'man' and no winged creature.

1. Gn. 16:7ff. In v. 11 the Lord is spoken of in the third person, but in v. 13 the angel is spoken of as God. 2. Gn. 18. Among the three men who appeared to Abraham, one is distinguished as the Lord (vv. 20, 26) from the two others who are called 'angels' and are said (19:13) to be sent by the Lord. 3. Gn. 22:11ff. The angel of the Lord calls from heaven as if he were God Himself, and Abraham obeys as he would obey God. Yet in v. 16 the angel is distinguished from the Lord and obeys Him by giving the message. 4. Gn. 24:40. The angel is distinguished from the Lord once more, and does His bidding in leading. 5. Gn. 48:15, 16. Here there is complete identification between the angel and the Lord. 6. Ex. 3:2. The angel is identified with the Lord. 7. Ex. 13:21 compared with 14:19 seems to view the designations as being interchangeable. Yet cf. Nu. 20:16. 8. In Ex. 33:20 the two are distinguished, but this chapter is of special importance for it is because the Israelites cannot suffer God's own presence, following their apostasy, that the angel is sent. God can dwell with sinners through the angel without consuming them (33:3), but the angel cannot be trifled with or he will judge, being the manifestation of the holiness of God. Yet in 33:14 God's presence goes with them in the form of an angel; cf. Is. 63:9. Here is God accommodating Himself to sinners without diminishing His divinity. 9. Jos. 5:14. The prince of the Lord's army is distinct from the Lord, but then identifies himself with the angel who appeared to Moses (v. 15), and is identified with the Lord in 6:2.

From these factors it appears that the angel of the Lord was at times identified with the Lord Himself, and that the whole divine nature was present in him. The angel of the Lord is a form of the Lord's Self-manifestation. There are, however, other references where the angel is distinct from the Lord. This stresses that even in the OT there is some diversity within God, the one Subject, and it adumbrates the appearing of His eternal Son. 'It is now easy and inevitable to see in the Angel of the Lord the clearest Old Testament foreshadowing of the Second Person of the Trinity. Where else in Scripture is there One Who is identical with the Lord and yet distinct; Who, without abandoning His deity, yet kept company with sinners; Who walked as a man among men; and Who, without denying the wrath of God, yet represents the supreme outreach of mercy?' (J. A. Motyer, Introducing the Old Testament, 1960, p. 11). See further the General Article, 'Old Testament Theology', p. 29.

The glory of God. This is an important theme in the book and it appears in relation to the deliverance and wandering in the wilderness, the ratification of the covenant and the Tabernacle. The comment that follows here will bear a relation to all these contexts.

It could be concluded that a discussion on this theme should be related to a discussion on the being and attributes of God. In the OT, however, 'glory' is the visible and supernatural manifestation of the supreme and incomparable majesty of God. The Hebrew word for 'glory' (kāḇôḏ) means 'weight' or 'substance', and comes to mean the honour stemming from the manifestation of the sum total of God's attributes, and also from the awe which such a revelation inspires in those who behold it; cf. Ps. 96:5–9.

The face of God. The 'presence' of God is His 'face'; cf. Ex. 33:20. 'My face' and 'me' are interchangeable and so 'the face' stands for God's own presence. To see God as He is is possible only through a Self-disclosure which, though true and reliable, is not exhaustive. The presence of God was never a mere sense of the numinous, but always the presence of a known, personal and distinctive Deity.

The Name of God. Ex. 6:3 is important for the criticism of the Pentateuch (see the introductory article 'History of the Literary Criticism of the Pentateuch'; also J. A. Motyer, The Revelation of the Divine Name, 1959).

In Ex. 3:14, 'I AM WHO I AM' represents only one possible translation of the divine Name, for the verb could equally mean 'I was' or 'I will be'. It is used in this last sense in 3:12. It is undoubtedly correct to acknowledge that the Name is deliberately mysterious, preserving 'much of His nature hidden from curious and presumptuous enquiry' (J. C. Connell, NBC, 1953, in loc.). The Name, therefore, reflects the truth that God can be known only as He chooses to reveal Himself, and this, indeed, leads us to the central value of the otherwise enigmatic title which He chose. The verb used means 'to be an active, present reality'. Thus, for example, in the familiar phrase 'the word of the Lord came to . . .' (e.g. 2 Sa. 7:4) this same verb occurs, being customarily given in English the translation 'came', but really expressing the felt and active presence of the word. In exactly the same way, the God of Israel declares that His presence and power will be made known to His people in the events of the Exodus. It is not simply that He will engineer these events, but that they will constitute a visible declaration of His name; i.e. His character will be revealed in and by them.

It does not matter, therefore, whether we accept the translation 'I am' or 'I will be', or the other possible variant, advocated by Albright (From Stone Age to Christianity, 1957, pp. 15, 16), 'I bring to pass'. The meaning is the same: the events reveal the Person. It must be remembered, however, that Moses was not sent to these events as a mere observer, gleaning what he could by watching, but as an instructed and prepared interpreter. The essence of the revelation of God was given verbally, especially in the doctrines of holiness (e.g. Ex. 3:5) and redemption (e.g. Ex. 6:6, 7), and it is this primary propositional revelation (i.e. revelation by means of intelligible words and propositions, revealed truth) which enabled Moses to interpret the Exodus correctly and which gives his interpretation of the events the same divine authority as the events themselves in revealing God. Through Moses and the Exodus, therefore, the divine Name received its classical OT definition: 'Yahweh your God brought you out of the land of Egypt' (Ex. 20:2). When we recall that this redemption necessarily involved judgment upon Egypt, the full revelation can be stated in summary form: Yahweh (in RSV, 'the LORD') is the God who saves His people and judges His enemies (see on Am. 3:2, and see further J. A. Motyer, The Revelation of the Divine Name, pp. 21–24).

In Ex. 6:2, 3 the Name as such was not unknown but the significance was; cf. Je. 16:21 for an exact parallel. The Name is the Person active and revealed, and the use of the future tense in the verbs involved can be summed up by saying that a changeless God would ever meet the need of His people; the Name is dynamic rather than abstract. In Exodus the unfolding of the character of the Person thus named is in connection with His activity described in 6:4–9; cf. 33:19.

Covenant

Consult J. A. Thompson, The Ancient Near Eastern Treaties and the Old Testament, 1964 and J. Murray's article 'Covenant' in NBD. See also the General Article, 'Old Testament Theology', pp. 30ff., above.

The Hebrew word bᵉrîṯ ('covenant') has two possible etymological derivations. One is bārâ ('to eat'), referring to the cultic meal which usually accompanied covenant-making ceremonies; cf. Gn. 26:30. The phrase kārat bᵉrîṯ ('to make—lit. cut—a treaty') lends credence to this by pointing to the cutting (slaying) of animals for the covenant feast. The other one is to derive the noun from an Assyrian root, beritu, meaning 'bond' or 'fetter'. Vriezen (An Outline of Old Testament Theology, 1960, p. 141) translates it as 'a bond of communion' and so preserves both possible derivations.

Covenant types and patterns in the Ancient Near Eastern world. The idea of covenant was widespread in the Ancient Near East, and the OT contains a variety of covenants: personal, e.g. David and Jonathan, 1 Sa. 18:1–5; 20:1–16; parity, e.g. Abraham and Abimelech, Gn. 20:28ff. (tribes or descendants were involved here); suzerainty, e.g. God and Israel at Sinai, Ex. 19ff. It is this latter form in which we are interested because of the very close connection between this Ancient Near Eastern literary form and the actual pattern of the Sinai covenant. This pattern, used in Hittite suzerainty (or vassal) treaties, came to serve as the perfect literary vehicle for the expression of God's relationship with Israel. This pattern idea of covenant was in vogue from 1500 to 700 BC and was not a late development of Israel's religion under the insight and influence of the 8th-century prophets (as Wellhausen thought), but was the very source of it. The typical Hittite suzerainty covenant was set out as follows, and a pattern of this kind appears in Ex. 19:3–8; 20:1–17, and also in Deuteronomy and in Joshua.

1. Preamble: the names, titles and attributes of the great king are set out. 2. Historical prologue: the past relations of the parties are described, with emphasis on the benevolence of the king to the vassal; cf. Ex. 19:4. 3. Stipulations: obligations imposed on the vassal are here set out in detail; cf. Ex. 20:1–10. 4. Deposition of the covenant document: to be read annually to the people; cf. Ex. 24. 5. List of gods, both of the king and of the vassal, who acted as witnesses. 6. List of curses and blessings; cf. Dt. 27.

The significance of 'covenant'. In the OT it is not true to say that a covenant was merely a legal bond, although it was expressed in the language of current jurisprudence. What is more important is the prior election by God, and His deliverance, of those with whom such a bond is made. This combination of privilege and obligation leads us to the central significance of the covenant idea, which is the relationship between God and Israel. This relationship is not an agreement, nor a compact arrived at by discussion among equals. It is 'a sovereign administration of grace' (J. Murray) which results in communion between Israel and God. The covenant is sovereignly administered, and obligation ensues on the part of Israel.

The covenants and the Sinai covenant. In Gn. 9:9–17 the covenant with Noah is clearly established in love and forbearance by God with Noah as the fount of the new race to people the purged world. God plans, reveals, confirms ('my bow') and keeps this covenant irrespective of man's response.

In Gn. 15, in the covenant with Abraham the promises made are centred on salvation, and are particularistic (in excluding Ishmael and in not being to all flesh). The promises and blessings are such that by their very nature they demand consecration in the recipient.

The Sinai covenant is made with Israel in confirmation of the covenant with Abraham (Ex. 2:24; 3:16). It is not legalistic for it was made with a chosen, redeemed and already adopted people (Ex. 2:25; 4:22; 6:6–8). It is a spiritual relationship which occupies the central place here; cf. Ex. 6:7.

Seeing that the covenant cemented a relationship, the demands of God's holiness must be brought to bear upon the people by way of regulating the communion and conditioning the enjoyment of its blessings. 19:5, 6 and 24:7, 8 ought not to be understood in such a way as to cause the making of the covenant to depend on the promise of obedience forthcoming. The covenant is made; what is conditioned on obedience is the enjoyment of its blessings. Thus holiness (Lv. 19:2) is to be the result of the covenant relationship and hence arises the OT conception of law and ritual.

Law

Law, or Torah (Heb. tôrâ; cf. the article 'Law' in NBD), means a teaching or a decision given for a particular case, and in its extended significance stands for the whole body of rules governing man's relations with God and with other men. Since all the OT legislative codes are found in the Pentateuch, it is itself referred to as 'the Law' or tôrâ.

The great variety which exists within the law can be sampled by comparing together the 'codes', i.e. those sections of the Pentateuch which because of either their literary style or their distinctive content have suggested that they originated as individual statements of Israelite law. For example, there is the Decalogue (Ex. 20:2–17) with its high moral tone and its categorical (or apodictic) commands; there is the so-called 'book of the covenant' (Ex. 20:22 – 23:33), exemplifying Israelite casuistic or case-law, laws covering specific situations and couched in the form 'If . . . then . . .'; the Deuteronomic code (in its essence, Dt. 12–26; cf. G. T. Manley, The Book of the Law, 1957), while it covers many of the topics found in other codes, nevertheless has a marked literary style and flavour; or there is the law of holiness (Lv. 17–26) which so clearly influenced Ezekiel and the post-exilic situation but which, of course, need not itself be post-exilic in origin.

All these codes or types of law live against a background of jurisprudence extending far into pre-Mosaic history, and there is nothing in either their content or their extended form which requires a post-Mosaic date. Hittite treaties, Hammurabi's law code and the whole range of Sumerian law make it needless, on grounds of anachronism, to query the Mosaic origin of OT law. Equally, specific difficulties alleged against Mosaic authorship are often not impossible of solution. The ongoing work of scholarly research has left far behind the suggestion that the Decalogue expresses a morality too advanced for the Mosaic age and it is now commonplace for Moses to be acknowledged as the source of the 'ten words' (e.g. H. H. Rowley, 'Moses and the Decalogue', in Men of God, 1963, pp. 1–36; and for a fuller survey of opinion J. J. Stamm and M. E. Andrew, The Ten Commandments in Recent Research, 1967). The existence of slightly differing versions of the Decalogue in Exodus and Deuteronomy (5:6–21) is most easily explained on the presupposition of Deuteronomy itself, that Moses in his farewell speeches reviewed the words which God had spoken through him but in direct address took the liberty of small variation and adaptation.

Of more direct consequence for the book of Exodus is the argument that since the laws often envisage a settled community, frequently of an agricultural character (e.g. Ex. 20:22–26; 23:10, 14–17), they must stem from and reflect the actual existence of such a community. But the testimony of Exodus itself, and indeed more explicitly of Deuteronomy (e.g. Ex. 23:23–33; Dt. 6:1), is that these laws were given prospectively. Though spoken by divine inspiration in the desert they look towards the settled community which Moses envisaged throughout. Being well acquainted with the needs and forms of settled life he could without difficulty legislate for it. Thus the tribal federation seen in the assembly of Jos. 24 could well give a focus and reaffirmation to these laws, but is not required as their point of origin.

What are the distinctive features of Israelite law? (See W. Eichrodt, The Theology of the Old Testament, Vol. 1, 1961.) First, the entire law is ascribed to God. Not only the cultic law but also the civil law is invested with the authority of God, and any breach of it is open revolt against God. Thus the law is lifted above the world of human arbitrariness and relativism. It might be objected that in the Code of Hammurabi the authority of Shamash is invoked at the beginning and the end. The main body of the material, however, is linked with Hammurabi, the human lawgiver, the deputy of Shamash. In the Pentateuch the law is laid down by God, and to Him the human mediator is subservient. This law (see on 20:1ff.) covers the whole of the national and individual life, investing it with high spiritual significance. The striking and unique feature is the conjoining of moral precepts with religious commands.

Secondly, the law exhibits a higher view of human life, and a consequent abolition of gross brutality in punishment of the guilty. 'One crime—one punishment' is a unique feature of Israelite justice. Penalties could not be multiplied arbitrarily as in Assyria, nor was bodily mutilation practised to the same degree; it was, in fact, specifically curtailed (21:24). This is evidence of a feeling for humanity, but also of an insistence on equity. This latter part is important, for in Hittite law (c. 1250 BC) there is a relaxation of the old severe code, but at the expense of justice and morality; murder, e.g., is no longer punishable by death. In Israel, penalties are relaxed only when the nature of the crime demands it, and thus absolute standards are not undermined.

Thirdly, there is but one law for all. It is undeniable that the laws of Hammurabi, e.g., are weighted in favour of the ruling classes, but in the OT one is struck by the legal safeguards proposed for the defenceless, e.g. widows and orphans (Ex. 22:22), strangers (Heb. gerim, 'refugees', folk seeking political asylum, 23:9), debtors (21:1ff.) and slaves (23:12). In this matter also it is the divine origin of the law which gives rise to these humanitarian precepts. Israel is to reflect in conduct what God has done for them and what He is in Himself (22:21; 23:9; Dt. 10:17–20).

The Tabernacle: the environs, appearance, furnishings and significance

The Tabernacle occupied the centre of the camp (Nu. 1:50) and was surrounded on the sides by the tents of the Levites (Nu. 1:53), while Moses and the priests encamped in front of it (Nu. 3:38). Thus it appeared that God who was in the midst of His people was yet apart from them by reason of His holiness. The Tabernacle faced east (Ex. 27:13) and was enclosed by curtains of fine twined linen, hanging from pillars of brass with connecting silver rods. It was at one end of a court also enclosed by curtains; the entrance to this was at the centre of the eastern end and was marked by a hanging curtain (27:16) supported on four pillars of brass.

Passing behind the entrance curtain, then, the worshipper found himself in the court. Before him, and between him and the Tabernacle, was the bronze altar of sacrifice (27:1–8) signifying that all who entered were defiled by sin and could approach God only by way of sacrifice or shed blood (Lv. 17:11). This altar was tended by the priests. The worshipper might slay his offering, but the priest had to perform the sacrifice (Lv. 1–7). Within this sacred enclosure the sacrificial meal (peace-offering) was to be eaten. Near the altar stood the laver for the use of the priests who carried out the sacrifices (Ex. 30:17–21).

Directly behind the altar of sacrifice stood the Tabernacle, which only the priests were permitted to enter. Its dimensions were 10×30 cubits, and in all probability the entrance was at the exact centre of the court. The Tabernacle consisted of two parts. There was a wooden structure (Heb. miškān or 'dwelling') which took the form of three sides of a rectangle, at the front of which, instead of a fourth gilded board, was a curtain screen called the outer veil (Ex. 26:36f.). Beyond this veil there was a second which divided the interior into two rooms, the Holy Place and the Holy of Holies (26:31–33). This veil had cherubim embroidered on it to symbolize the immediate presence of God. The Holy of Holies was apparently a perfect cube of 10 cubits.

The miškān had no roof but coverings which were spread laterally over the top, sides and rear. The inner covering was exactly like the veil which separated the Holy Place from the Holy of Holies. Above this covering there was one of goats' hair, then one of rams' skins dyed red, and above it another of seal or porpoise skins. The entire front of the dwelling was concealed, and only the priests were permitted to pass behind to the Tabernacle in performance of their duties. When they did so, they found themselves in the Holy Place (26:33). It was lighted by the golden lampstand which had seven lamps (25:31–40) and which stood to the left; these lamps were to be fed with pure olive oil, and they were tended by the priests (Lv. 24:1–4). It burned from evening until morning (Ex. 27:20; cf. on Lv. 24:1–4) and not during the day. Its principal significance was undoubtedly symbolic, displaying Israel's 'relation to God as the possessor and reflector of the holy light that was in Him' (Fairbairn).

The table for the bread of the Presence (25:23–30; in older translations 'the shewbread') was on the right-hand side, and on it were twelve cakes of unleavened bread and cups probably containing wine or oil (v. 29). They were an offering and memorial of the daily food of the people which was returned to God as it came from Him. The loaves were changed every sabbath and, having been consecrated, were eaten by the priests in the Holy Place (Lv. 24:5–9). The placing of frankincense on the loaves connects the table with the altar of incense, and stresses the idea of an offering.

The altar of incense was the most important furnishing of the Holy Place, indicated by the fact that it stood before the veil which separated the Holy of Holies from the Holy Place. On it, morning and evening, the priest (Ex. 30:7ff.) placed a pot of incense, and the fire, kindled by God Himself, was never to be allowed to go out (Lv. 6:13). The incense symbolized the prayers of God's people.

The Holy of Holies was separated only by this veil, behind which none might pass save the high priest, and he only on one day in the entire year, the Day of Atonement (Lv. 16). In the Holy of Holies was only the ark of the covenant, containing the Ten Commandments. Above the ark was the mercy seat which was of pure gold and overshadowed by the cherubim. The ark was the throne of God, and there He spoke. The Holy of Holies was in complete darkness as far as natural light was concerned. It was filled with the brightness of the Shekinah, the light of God's presence. This light was seen in the pillar of cloud and of fire, which abode on the Tabernacle while Israel rested in their tents and which, when it was moved, guided the people on their journey (Nu. 10:34). This cloud, which represented the presence of the Lord and which had the appearance of fire by night (40:38), sent out fire to kindle the sacred, undying fire on the altar (Lv. 6:12, 13; 9:24), and also to punish the wicked and disobedient.

The whole pattern of the Tabernacle was designed to emphasize the fact that God dwelt amid but apart from His people. He is invisible and spiritual, exalted and unapproachable in holiness; His people are sinful and cannot enter His holy presence. His blessings had to be mediated by a priesthood through sacrifices, and could be received only by those who brought and offered blood sacrifices. All this has obvious relationships with the NT.

COMMENTARY

1:1 – 4:31 THE STAGE IS SET

1:1–7 A historical review

This condensed recapitulation of Gn. 46:8–27 serves as link material between these two books. This list concentrates on the immediate descendants of Jacob and includes twelve sons, his daughter Dinah, fifty-one grandsons, his granddaughter Serah and four great-grandsons, besides himself. To this number must be added the 'household', i.e. the wives and servants of each son and grandson—totalling more than seventy! In the genealogy, the sons of the legitimate wives are placed first and then those of the concubines.

5 The number 'seventy-five' in Acts 7:14 and in LXX of Gn. 46:27, compared with the seventy here, has been variously explained: by supposing that (a) though only seventy went down with Jacob, Joseph called for seventy-five, not knowing that three wives of Jacob and two sons of Judah had died; or that (b) Stephen, in addition to the sixty-six mentioned in Gn. 46:26, reckoned the twelve wives of Jacob's sons, omitting Judah's who was dead, and Joseph's who was in Egypt, as well as Joseph himself, for the same reason; or lastly (c) that in Gn. 46:20 the LXX adds the sons of Ephraim and Manasseh from the genealogy in 1 Ch. 7:14–21 while the Hebrew list omits them because they were not born until afterwards. In one of these three ways the variation of the LXX from the Hebrew may be readily accounted for. Stephen's adherence to the former is explicable on the basis that he quoted from the most current version without correction on a matter so small, and not that he was out to correct the Hebrew text.

7 The rapid increase and influence of the Israelite people was in accord with the covenantal promise in Gn. 17:2 and the land would be the territory of Goshen rather than the whole of Egypt.

1:8–22 The beginnings of the oppression

8 There is no compelling reason to regard this new king as the inaugurator of a new dynasty (as in the view which dates the Exodus in the 15th century) but simply as denoting a king who began a new policy toward the Israelites. In accord with the 13th-century dating of the Exodus (see Introduction, 'The Date and Route of the Exodus'), this would be Sethos I (1302–1290 BC) who was neither acquainted with Joseph, nor even aware of his services to Egypt, and thus cared little for Joseph's descendants. Sethos I was renowned for his building programme, and this accords with the measure taken in v. 11.

9, 10 The growth of the Israelite population posed an acute problem for Pharaoh in that, as they occupied border territory, their defection to the enemy in the event of an invasion would be a decisive factor in the fortunes, or even collapse, of the Egyptian Empire. 11–22 The Egyptians were unwilling to dismiss them, however, and to miss a chance of turning their presence to profit; Sethos I devised a plan to meet both needs. He sought to consolidate the area with two store-cities, which were towns housing arms and supplies for defence and attack, and also by controlling the increase in the Israelite population by forced labour and child slaughter. This latter move was thwarted through the covenant care of God and the bold defiance of the Hebrew midwives. These obeyed His will and they were blessed with families themselves (not 'houses' as in AV). This is the first presage of the triumph of God over Pharaoh, and it is from this initial victory that the great deliverer comes.

2:1 - 4:31 The first stages in God's purpose of judging and saving

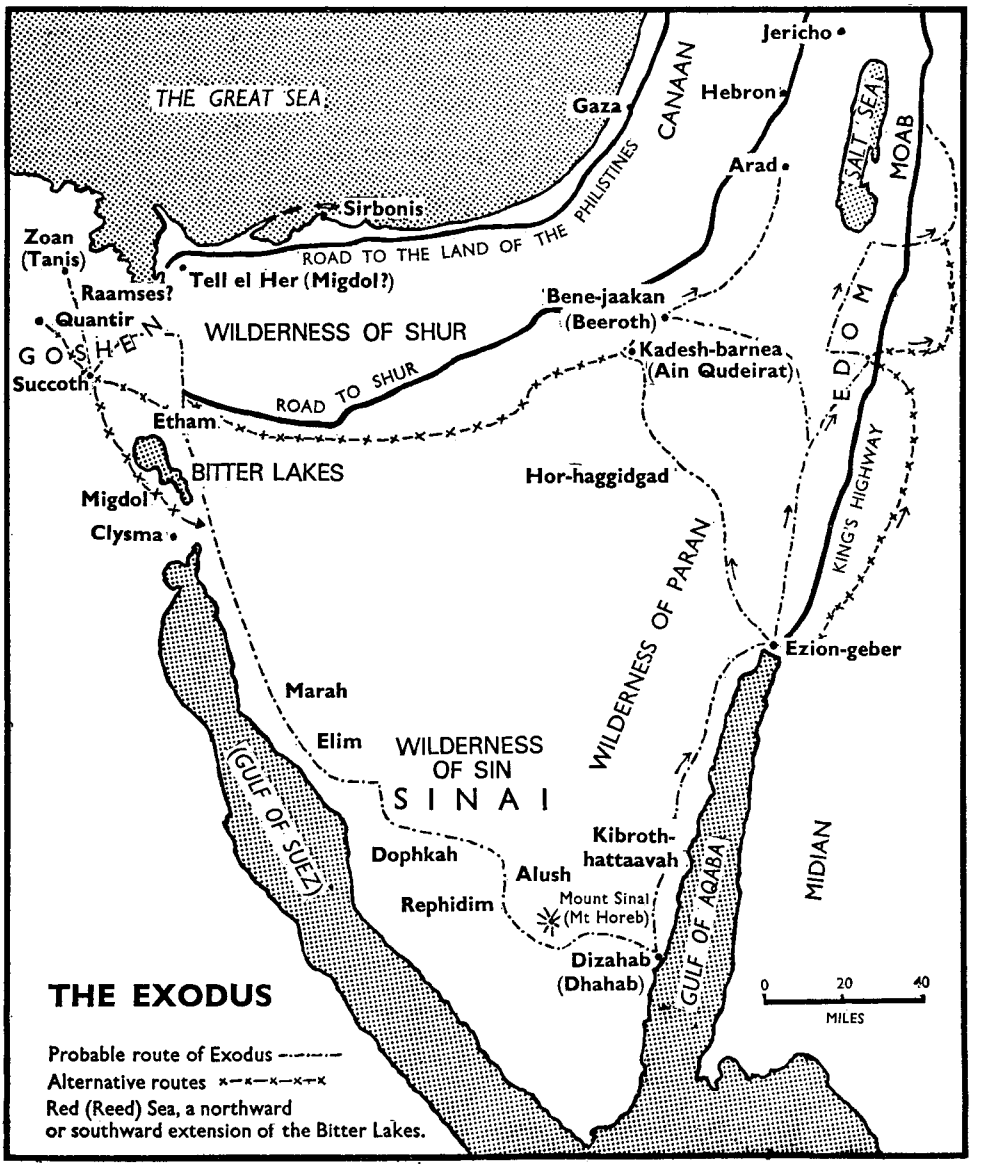
2:1–22 The instrument of the deliverance. 1–9 This is a stylized account of the birth and upbringing of Moses; it is therefore understandable that the names of the parents are omitted and that no reference is made to Aaron, who presumably was born before the edict of Pharaoh. The dark environmental background to Moses' birth serves to emphasize the sovereign activity of God. This male child was not only successfully concealed and then spared by Pharaoh's daughter herself as she was moved to compassion by his cries, but was even formally returned to his own mother to be weaned, for which she was paid. After that he was to be adopted by the royal princess—the daughter of Israel's oppressor. Thus Moses came to be learned in Egyptian lore (cf. Acts 7:22), and the faith of his parents was vindicated (cf. Heb. 11:23).

10 His name (see 'Moses' in NBD) reflects his double ancestry as the adopted son of Pharaoh's daughter and the actual son (as the princess herself acknowledged) of Hebrews. The Egyptian măsĕ (ms, 'child') represents the first thought of the adoptive mother, and this was hebraicized as mōšeh, from the verbal root māšâ meaning 'to draw out'. The actual form mōšeh is an active participle, 'one who draws out'. It may be that Pharaoh's daughter was persuaded to this form by reference to herself who became a mother by 'drawing out' the 'child', or that the form was the implied prayer of the actual mother, 'May the Lord draw out His people.'

11–14 Moses soon identifies himself with the oppressed rather than the oppressors (cf. Heb. 7:24ff.). By slaying the Egyptian he renounced his adoptive state, but his concern is not immediately obvious to his people. This act reveals that Moses as yet is not ready for the task, for it is by meek obedience to God (cf. Nu. 12:3; Jas. 1:20) and not unrighteous wrath, and by God's power, not his, that his people were to be delivered. This discipline in trust and obedience was to take 40 years.

15–17 Moses flees for safety, a fugitive from the law, and seeks refuge with the Midianites, a semi-nomadic people who were descended from Abraham by Keturah (cf. Gn. 25:1). The territory intended here was probably in the SE of the Sinai peninsula. Moses rests at a well, the centre of social life in the Ancient Near East. Here again he acts in defence of the downtrodden, suggestive of the fact that God is already secretly preparing him in character and temperament for his life's work of rescuing slaves. 16 Priest of Midian. Priestly offices were undertaken by heads of tribes or families. 18–22 Reuel ('Ragual' in AV Nu. 10:29 is the Gk. equivalent), or Jethro (see on Nu. 10:29ff.), becomes Moses' father-in-law in return for services rendered, and in time comes to worship the same true God as Moses; cf. ch. 18. Moses' son's name is composed of gēr ('stranger') and šām ('there').

2:23–25 The need for deliverance and its source. In accord with the dating scheme adopted, the Pharaoh whose death is mentioned here would be Sethos I (see on 1:8), who was succeeded by Rameses II (1290–1224 BC). The clear teaching of this brief but important passage is that God hears His people's cry and sees their need in tender compassion, but not as a helpless, saddened spectator. He is one who in sovereign love and power acts on the need He sees and the cry He hears, because He has taken a covenant oath upon Himself in respect of these people. God had begun to prepare a deliverer before His people had cried for deliverance, however, and with the death of Pharaoh the time arrived for the deliverer to return to Egypt. Thus plainly is the Lord of history a God of grace, and the God of grace is the Lord of history.



3:1 - 4:17 The call of Moses and his task described, with divine assurances of ultimate success. Mt. Horeb, or Mt. Sinai (the former usually denotes the mountain range and the latter the particular peak in question), has been identified in ancient tradition with Gebel Musa, located at the tip of the Sinai peninsula. This fits in with the tentatively plotted path of the Israelites in their wanderings (consult the map). Here, far from Egypt, the deliverer is finally prepared by God by being humbled in spirit (3:1–6), admitted into God's purposes (3:7–10) and assured of God's presence and power (3:11 - 4:17). Moses calls this 'the mountain of God' after his experiences there.

1–6 Moses' humbling before the presence of God. This is brought about by a Self-revelation of God as He is. The 'burning bush' is not in any way a symbol of Israel. God is living (the burning bush was not consumed and therefore the flame was self-maintaining), and holy (fire or flame was an emblem of the purity that constitutes a threat to sinners; cf. Gn. 3:24). This is not only a revelation of God Himself, but also a mirroring of what God was to become in the life of Moses, and of what was to be the source and mainspring of his ministry: not an inquisitiveness into the supernatural (v. 3), nor a mere compassionate defence of the down-trodden (2:11), but a concern for the glory of God in His covenant people. The angel of the Lord; see the note in the Introduction, p. 116.

7–10 Moses' initiation into the purposes of God. God's purpose is to prove that He knows the condition of His people and cares for them by manifestly condescending to their cry and need, and by bringing them from harsh bondage to possess a land at present occupied by others. Moses is told this, and is appointed as one chosen and sent to lead the people out of bondage. From poverty they were to enter a land of plenty and a land of some expanse; cf. Dt. 6:3. Thus the first movement of God towards Moses is to outline in words what He proposes to do. God does not simply act and then leave men to puzzle out the interpretation of what He has done. He starts by making Moses wise before the event, so that the activity of God, when it comes, confirms the word already spoken (cf. v. 12).

3:11 – 4:17 Moses is assured of the power of God. His old impulsive nature has been humbled and now his reluctance before the magnitude of the task is brought to light, and is overcome by suitable assurances. Four objections are advanced by Moses and each is answered by God. 11, 12 First, there is the problem of complete unfitness for the task described. This is met by a promise of constant accompaniment and thus complete provision, with added assurance that the liberated slaves (for the deliverance would come to pass) would join him in worship on the very mount on which he stood. The sign, in that it lacked a present fulfilment, was a further incentive to faith in the promises of God.

13–22 Second, Moses raises the obstacle of the people's ignorance of the character of God and hints that thereby they will not believe the message he brings. Moses is not here asking for the bare name of God which has not been made known to them, but rather for the inner significance of a name already known (cf. 3:6). I am who I am. The answer given to him amounts to this (see the Introduction on 'The Self-disclosure of God' for fuller details), that God will prove Himself to be ever dependable and sufficiently resourceful to meet every need of the people, and in this case will both outmatch Pharaoh in a contest of might, and also deliver and enrich His people. 18, 19 It might be concluded that this request amounts to an untruth and to an attempt to provide a way of escape under a religious pretext. About this, two things should be said. First of all, the animals used in sacrifice by the Hebrews would have been a source of offence to the Egyptians (cf. 8:26); secondly, this simple request was aimed to reveal Pharaoh's true character and so ultimately to magnify the power of Israel's God over so obdurate a foe. 21, 22 After the Egyptians have felt the power of God's hand they will be glad to be rid of their slaves and their profit-making labour, to such an extent that they will give their riches in response to a mere request (cf. 12:35, 36).

4:1–9 Third, though thus assured that God will reveal His name (character) in irresistible might and grace, Moses is still hesitant on the ground that he is unsure that the Hebrews will accredit his call and receive him as God's servant. Power to perform three confirming wonders is given to him to meet this contingency. The point about the nature of these wonders is that they will have weight with the Hebrews in their environment of Egyptian magic (cf. 7:8f.) and make no demands on their faith as in the case of Moses on the mount (cf. 3:12). It is foolish to judge them by modern standards.

10–17 Fourth, every argument of Moses is adequately answered, but he is reduced again to his inner sense of inability, and in particular he mentions his lack of eloquence. Confrontation by God and converse with Him have not altered matters in this respect. Moses is then made aware that he is pleading impotence before the Omnipotent who bestows and increases faculties and gifts as He wills, and he is promised that he will learn to speak by speaking what he is taught by God. Moses is unbelieving in this respect, and arouses God's holy displeasure by asking for a substitute to be sent. A helper is given to meet this need, namely Aaron who will be the mouthpiece (prophet) of Moses. But this is a double-edged provision (see ch. 32). Divine truth is to be made known to Moses, and to be declared by Aaron. 15, 16 perfectly exhibit the nature of revelation, that it is a verbal disclosure both of what God wishes to teach to the unknowing, and also of inspiration and communication, that this is sovereignly superintended by God so that what He chooses to reveal may be infallibly communicated.

4:18–31 The response of Moses and his reception by the people. 18–20 Moses prepares to return to Egypt with Jethro's approval and at God's command, now that the time has come, with a view to doing God's bidding, but he is forewarned again that immediate success will not be forthcoming. Even so he is commanded to confront Pharaoh with God's sovereign reality and His claim that His enslaved people should be freed in order to serve Him, and to add a warning of the consequences that will attend a refusal in the face of the continuing performance of the signs. 21 foreshadows the response of Pharaoh to this call (cf. 7:13, etc.) and God's response to this by way of judicial hardening (cf. 9:12; Rom. 1:24). 23 The contest is for the respective 'firstborn' (a relation of special endearment and honour). Both may survive, but both will not die. God will see to this. His own 'firstborn', the whole nation of Israel, will be delivered.

24 God is no respecter of persons, however, and 'special' servants must obey as well as perform their special task. Moses is to be punished by God for neglecting to circumcise his son. Gn. 17:14 was seriously intended, and now God rises up to enforce His requirements. 25, 26 Zipporah perceives the cause of Moses' affliction, and takes it upon herself to do what Moses should have done. She circumcises the boy and associates Moses with the act by touching him with the blood from the circumcision wound. A bridegroom of blood. To think of this remark as upbraiding is more than likely a by-product of the unfortunate AV translation. Her words are more probably of relief and gratitude that her marriage, threatened with termination in the death of Moses, is thus renewed. He has become her bridegroom once again thanks to the blood of the circumcision. The force of this little incident in the story of redemption cannot be exaggerated. Deeply ingrained now in Moses' heart is the truth that it is the wrath of God (not of Pharaoh) from which man needs protection, and that God has Himself supplied sufficient protective covering in His covenant of grace and its ordinances. It is this truth which is seen in its perfection on Passover night and in connection with the blood of the lamb.

27 Moses and Aaron meet at Horeb and Aaron becomes Moses' mouthpiece (prophet). 29–31 They are then received by the Israelites with their elders, and the stage is set for the ensuing conflict. Whose son is to die? Whose son is to be delivered? Cf. v. 23.

Notes. The hardening of Pharaoh's heart. Pharaoh's heart was already filled with blind pride and self-will when Moses appeared to him on the first occasion (5:1ff.; cf. 1:9, 10, 16; 3:19). His heart was hard already and for this he was responsible. God might have softened his heart and disposed him to allow the Israelites to depart, but He chose to act otherwise (9:16; cf. Rom. 9:17), and, by an outpouring of His just wrath, to bring to naught Pharaoh's inveterate and increasing opposition, and to judge him for it. This also applied to his subjects on the same ground (14:17). God is at perfect liberty to use His words and works to soften hearts, as in the case of Moses (3:6), or so to ordain it (Rom. 9:18) that they should be the means of throwing into marked relief the natural and deep-seated antipathy of others, as in the case of Pharaoh (5:1–10; 7:10–13, 22, 23, etc.). Pharaoh hardens his heart, i.e. resists God, when given a command or a temporary alleviation of chastisement (e.g. 9:34, 35). This is no chance happening, however, and it is itself the outworking of the wrath of God who 'gives men up' to the dominating power of their own innate desires as a present judgment on their sin (Rom. 1:24, 26, 28).

This is what is meant by the seemingly bold statements that the Lord hardened Pharaoh's heart. It does not mean that God bestows perversity to Pharaoh's heart by a direct internal act, as He bestows His grace, nor that He does something to Pharaoh against Pharaoh's will, but that what Pharaoh wants to be, viz. an opposer of God, God ordains that he shall be. Conversely, Pharaoh wants to be this, not because God ordains it, but because he so desires.

Circumcision. This was not unknown in the Ancient Near Eastern world, but what must be noted is the special significance attached to it in Israel. The distinctive feature about its observance in Israel is that it was performed in infancy, and as such it could not be a rite for initiation into manhood, nor a pre-marital rite. Gn. 17 shows it to be a spiritual sign, and only secondly a national sign. Primarily it was a seal of the covenant movement of God to man, in connection with which man responded to God in obedience. That it was principally a covenant seal is attested by the circumcising of the male infants to whom God could pledge His blessings within the covenant (cf. Gn. 17:7) but who could not at that stage respond in covenant obedience. Even in the OT, the rite was to symbolize the 'circumcising of the heart' (Dt. 30:6) by God's outworking of His gracious covenant within the household unit (Gn. 17:7).

5:1 – 15:21 JUDGMENTS AND DELIVERANCE

5:1 – 11:10 Preliminary judgments on Egypt

5:1 – 7:13 The first round of interviews. 5:1–5 The first interview with Pharaoh reveals him to be unmoved either by God's authority or by human compassion. 6–14 As a result the bondage is intensified instead of liberty being granted. 15–21 Likewise, the Hebrews are unbelieving in their complaining. Their lot was easier before the alleged deliverer came! 22, 23 Moses needs reassurance and turns to God (cf. 1 Sa. 8:21), as he does on similar occasions later. 6:1–9 The assurance he is graciously given is reminiscent of the original terms of his call. The Name was not unknown to the patriarchs, but the full significance of God's character thus designated was to be revealed to these afflicted and embittered slaves by a powerful, compassionate deliverance with positively enriching consequences. All this was in accord with the covenant made with their fathers. But it all falls on deaf ears and crushed spirits. See Introduction for notes on 'the Name of God' and 'covenant'.

10–13 Moses is being made bolder in the work he is called to do but is still prone to decide what God can or cannot do with him. Seeing that he is unsuccessful with his own people, how can he impress Pharaoh? Moses ought to know that eloquence cannot deliver, for what is needed is a 'heavenly charge' or command that emboldens and makes all other service or work impossible (cf. Acts 4:20). 12 Just such a heavenly charge is God's reply to Moses' confession of uncircumcised lips. He acknowledges that his powers of speech are no more than those which belong to the natural man, but that the lips needed for this mammoth task need the touch of divine grace and a gift of speech from God Himself. Thus, though he transfers the idea of circumcision from its primary setting, he retains the essential idea of an act of God marking and making a man His own.

14–25 The genealogy is inserted to pinpoint the lineage of Moses and Aaron, and data are omitted on a principle of conscious selection for this purpose. It is not, however, a needless intrusion. Like many of the genealogies in Scripture, its purpose is to show the steadily-unfolding plan of God. All through the Egyptian bondage, God was quietly and unobtrusively at work so that when the moment of deliverance came His instruments of deliverance were there to meet it. 26, 27 Consequently we read that these are the Aaron and Moses, i.e. the men thus born according to the faithfulness of God. But they go to their work, not as the descendants of the great ones of the past, but armed freshly with the word of God. 28–30 Lest this point should be missed, it is somewhat emphasized here. The reply to man's native inability (uncircumcision) is the gift of the very words of God.

7:1 sees the resumption of the narrative broken off at 6:13 and the scheme of God's immediate purpose is disclosed. 2–6 Pharaoh is again to be challenged in God's name, though his obduracy will increase in spite of the plagues that God will bring upon the land and the people. Mere plagues will not deliver, however, but another act of a special nature will, and Egypt will thus be convinced of the supremacy and Lordship of God alone. 8–13 In working within history, God condescends to people in their environment. The incident related here is evidence of this. But it is also evidence that God goes beyond the bounds of current custom or practice and so manifests His sovereignty. Snakes could be temporarily immobilized to correspond to rods and hence the imitation of the Egyptian magicians, but Aaron's serpent returning to a rod demonstrates the omnipotence of God. But still Pharaoh would not bow. See also the article 'Magic and Sorcery' in NBD.

7:14 - 11:10 The first nine plagues. The relevant article in NBD should be consulted. These plagues fulfil the promise in 3:19, 20 and are intended to reveal the superior power of Israel's God over the gods of the Egyptians. The nine plagues manifest natural phenomena which occur in the Nile valley, and the miraculous element in them is to be found in their timing, intensity and distribution. It has been shown that these occurrences can be connected with an unusually high inundation of the Nile from July or August to the following March. 'The excessive inundation may have brought with it microcosms known as flagellates which would redden the river and also cause conditions that would kill the fish. Decomposing fish floating inshore would drive the frogs ashore, having also infected them with Bacillus anthracis. The third plague would be mosquitoes, and the fourth a fly, Stomoxys calcitrans, both encouraged to breed freely in the conditions produced by the high inundation. The cattle disease of the fifth plague would be anthrax contracted from the dead frogs, and the 'blains' on man and beast (sixth plague) a skin anthrax from the Stomoxys fly of the fourth plague. Hail and thunderstorms in February would destroy flax and barley, but leave the wheat and spelt for the locusts whose swarming would be favoured by the same Abyssinian rains which had ultimately caused the high inundation. The thick darkness would be the masses of fine dust, Roterde (from mud deposited by the inundation) caught up by the khamsin wind in March' (K. A. Kitchen, Ancient Orient and Old Testament, 1966, pp. 157f.). The crucial point here is that it is the Nile, an object of worship in Egypt, which is turned to an instrument of judgment and havoc (cf. 12:12). God is in control even of His foes and can exalt Himself over them by means of natural disorders.

7:14–24 In the case of the first plague the sign is announced beforehand so that Pharaoh may realize why this is taking place, and the warning given is no idle threat. 22 The magicians may have obtained clear water, as in v. 24, to try to explain the occurrence in a different way. Black magic was rife in Egypt and counterfeits were far from being impossible! In connection with the magicians see 2 Tim. 3:8, a characteristic of the 'last days', i.e. the interval of time between the two comings of the Lord Jesus Christ.

7:25 - 8:15 The sign of the second plague is announced beforehand with the same purpose in mind, and when it takes place it is counterfeited. But only God can remove the frogs, and does so in response to prayer uttered on the basis of a show of penitence from Pharaoh. Temporary afflictions do not change the heart, however, and the profession of the lips can be unreliable.

8:16–19 The third plague is sent without any warning as a direct response to Pharaoh's duplicity, and for this reason the magicians cannot counterfeit it. The devil is bound when God wishes to manifest Himself conspicuously, as in this case. The confession of the magicians is evidence of this.

8:20–32 The fourth plague demonstrates the purposeful and discriminating activity of God which is behind all the plagues, in that the Hebrews were clearly exempted from this one. 24 The fly mentioned here would destroy property. 25 Again a superficial response is offered and the Israelites are permitted to sacrifice within the land. This is refused and while complete permission is given it is withdrawn as soon as the flies are removed by God in answer to Moses' prayer.

9:1–12 Again a division is made between the Egyptians and the Hebrews in the inflicting of the fifth plague (vv. 1–7). But as Pharaoh continues his stubborn resistance, the sixth plague (vv. 8–12) is sent without warning, and not only are the magicians unable to counterfeit it, but they are victims themselves. Now judicial hardness is set to work, and Pharaoh is given up to his own wicked heart.

9:13–35 Before inflicting the seventh plague, special explanations are given. 20 The Egyptians who believe the Lord's word are not to be smitten; 25 they save themselves and their cattle. Pharaoh is now to be the object of the manifestation of the justice and might of God against sin, and he is ripening for the final judgment. 27, 34, 35 reveal that he cannot repent in spite of what he knows. In all this, the Hebrews are unscathed.

10:1–20 The plague of locusts is now threatened. Pharaoh's servants have responded like their master (cf. 9:34) and so are to become monumental lessons to succeeding generations. 2 Made sport; better 'acted ruthlessly' or 'severely' (cf. 1 Sa. 31:4). It can have the bad meaning of immoral wantonness (cf. Jdg. 19:25), but here it pinpoints the sovereign power of the Lord before which the Egyptian Pharaoh and his servants are as mere playthings. It does not, of course, ascribe wantonness or thoughtless cruelty to God. 7 shows that some of Pharaoh's servants are not as hardened as their master; 10 but the bitter irony of Pharaoh is unabated. 16, 17 The locusts produce a temporary change and this is judged in the succeeding plague.

10:21–29 The ninth plague, darkness, is of special significance. Rē', the sun-god, was one of the chief deities of Egypt, and yet the Hebrews alone have light in their dwellings. Still Pharaoh is obdurate, and Moses will not take less than total liberty. To banish Moses is to say a final farewell to hope and peace.

11:1–10 The warning of the final plague is given but the time of its occurrence is not specified. 7 Sudden, overwhelming grief will be the portion of many families, but the Hebrews will be safe. 10 The significance of this must not be missed. It acts as a conclusion to the first section of the narrative of judgments and deliverance. A terminus has been reached. The acts of God, in which there is no redemption, but only sterner enslavement through the hardening of Pharaoh's heart, are over. The narrative as it were draws a line under them. They are distinct and separate from the work of redemption to which the Lord now proceeds.

12:1 – 14:31 The final judgment on Egypt and the ending of the bondage culminating at the Red Sea

The Jews' civil year began in the autumn, following the harvest, but here (12:1) is the institution of an ecclesiastical year beginning in the spring, and commemorating the deliverance.

The final judgment on Egypt was one of God's outpoured wrath, and the provision of the Passover sacrifice served to make an even more conspicuous division between the Egyptians and the Israelites, providing the latter with a means of peace in a day of wrath, and liberty from bondage issuing in pilgrimage. This, according to the NT, is a clear type of the death of the Lord Jesus Christ, of Christian salvation, and of the walk of faith that follows. Therefore the Passover sacrifice was to protect the Israelites, and to provide them with the deliverance which the earlier plagues could not procure.

12:1–28 The Passover. The characteristics of the sacrifice and God-given regulations for the use of its blood and body are full of meaning. The lamb or kid was to be a yearling, a male (costlier than the female) and without any physical blemish—perfect. Its death (blood) was to be a substitutionary atoning token to God for the Hebrew families. The roasting by fire of the whole and its complete consumption by eating or burning marked the complete consecration of the sacrifice to a holy purpose, and the partaking of it with holy awe and repentance (unleavened bread and bitter herbs, v. 8) indicated that what was thus offered to God was accepted by Him and in turn made the means of liberty and life to His people.

The blood is what God looked for (v. 13) and what provided safety (v. 23) for those who sheltered beneath it (v. 22). They were truly safe—against them 'not a dog shall growl' (11:7) on a night when death stalks abroad (12:12), because the death of the Passover sacrifice is the substitute for the 'first-born son', the nation (4:22, 23). The Feast of the Passover was to be observed perpetually because it enshrined this truth (12:26, 27) and in this sense it would be a memorial, to man and not to God. The Feast of Unleavened Bread marked the decisive suddenness of the deliverance (v. 39) and the dedication and redemption of the first-born proclaimed the fact that all Israel was God's ransomed firstborn, lest they forgot (13:2).

5, 6 In the evening; literally 'between the two evenings', i.e. either between the sun's decline and sunset, or between sunset and nightfall. According to Josephus, the lamb (it was invariably a lamb rather than a kid) was killed between the ninth and eleventh hour, i.e. three to five o'clock (cf. Mt. 27:45–50). 11 This applies only to this celebration but the point is of permanent relevance: the redeemed are committed to pilgrimage. 13 All was not given automatically to the Hebrews—commands had to be kept, promises received with trust and blood sprinkled before safety could be theirs. 15–20 This festival was to precede future observances of the Passover, and to be marked by an absence of leaven and a cessation from toil—spiritual, holy rest is to follow deliverance. 22 Hyssop; the shape of this plant was admirable for the purpose designated, and thus it came to be a symbol of purification (cf. Ps. 51:7). 24 This was a family ritual and the children were to look upon this past event as their past (cf. Pss. 44:1–3; 66:6).

12:29–51 The killing of the firstborn and the ending of the bondage. 31 Cf. 10:26. The arrogance of Pharaoh (10:28) contrasts strikingly with this belated acquiescence in what Moses there required. Truly 'all flesh is grass. . . . The grass withers . . . when the breath of the Lord blows upon it.' This plague fulfilled the terms of the original warning to Pharaoh (cf. 4:23). 32 The dismissal of the Hebrews is out of personal concern—bless me also. 36 The Egyptians give all that they are asked for, just to see the Hebrews departing, as the Lord had told them (cf. 3:20–22).

37 Six hundred thousand. This is a round figure doing service for the figure given in Nu. 1:46, and includes only adult males. 38 The mixed multitude included Egyptians by intermarriage, and other Semites who had entered Egypt. They were not to be dismissed, but neither was their presence to lead the Hebrews into any compromise, nor to result in the blurring or distorting of the distinctive covenantal elements of Hebrew faith, religion and life. On the contrary, every 'stranger' (v. 48) could participate in all the spiritual benefits the Hebrews enjoyed, provided that each one was circumcised, i.e. 'came near to the Lord'. (For the numbers of departing Hebrews, reference should be made to the relevant part of the article 'Wilderness of Wandering' in NBD.) 40, 41 This figure corresponds to the more general date in Gn. 15:13. This period of time began with the entry of Jacob into Egypt (Gn. 46:6, 7) and ends with the day of deliverance 430 years later.

13:1–16 The setting apart of the firstborn. 2 This is a command which calls for dedication of that which has been delivered, and while it would literally refer to the firstborn of man and beast, it is intended to symbolize and apply to the call to the whole nation (the firstborn) which has been redeemed (cf. Rom. 12:1). Sanctification follows, made possible by initial redemption. This vivid reminder within each family circle would be needed (Dt. 6:3–15). 8–10 Hebrew religion neither groped after the unknown, nor was incarcerated in formal ritual; the heart that remembered with joy and gratitude the saving act of the known God was the prime necessity in worship. This still remains true in the additional ritual of Leviticus. 9 The Egyptians had words written on strips of cloth which they wore as amulets. A similar custom came to be practised by Jews later when at prayer. Phylacteries (see NBD) bound on the head and the left hand contained handwritten copies of Ex. 13:1–10; 13:11–16; Dt. 6:4–9; 11:13–21. This became the custom in intertestamental times but here, and in v. 16, is pure metaphor, which stands as a further witness to the essential inwardness of true religion in the OT.

13 This command definitely prohibits infant sacrifice and is an expansion of v. 2; 22:29 is to be interpreted in agreement with it. The ass is taken as a representative of unclean animals, valuable as a beast of burden, and was to be redeemed or destroyed. These are the alternatives—dedication or destruction.

13:17–22 The beginning of the journey. 17 The direct route to Canaan was the way of the land of the Philistines (consult the map on p. 123). 18 These were a strong, warlike people and the Hebrews were unprepared for such a contingency in spite of their thoughts otherwise. But it was God's purpose to reveal Himself as the only warrior in the overthrow of Egypt and the invincible helper in the battle with Amalek. Easy escape was the prelude to the demanding discipline of trust and obedience. The apparently roundabout route was dictated by God's knowledge of the fickleness of the people whom He would bring safely home, and by His desire to guard them from trials which would prove too much for their faith (cf. 1 Cor. 10:13). This is one of the explanations of puzzling acts of God with His people.

19 The prediction of Joseph came true (cf. Gn. 50:25), and he who died in faith was carried to the homeland towards which he had looked (cf. Heb. 11:22). 21 These visible symbols of God's presence were their constant guide and accompaniment (cf. Nu. 10:33–36; Ex. 33:14, 15). See note on 'theophany' in the Introduction.

14:1–31 The 'Red Sea' crossing. This was at the same time ultimate judgment and irreversible deliverance and it brought the people to a national self-consciousness that was truly religious. It was so outstanding that it was never forgotten as a fact, though the demands of the covenant on which it was based often were. It was regarded as the conclusive proof of God's love and the just basis of His claim to their devotion (Je. 2:6; Ho. 12:13). Consult the map for the route to the crossing-place; it appears that this occurred at the Sea of Reeds ('Red Sea' is a mistranslation), near modern Qantarah.

2 The locations cannot be identified with certainty, but it appears that the Hebrews were led by visible emblems of God's presence into a cul-de-sac. They were hemmed in by the Bitter Lakes and a mountain range, with impassable water before them, and an intractable foe behind them. 3 Hence the taunt of the Egyptians is to some purpose; 11 and the rebellion of the Hebrews is the symptom of their faithless panic. In this situation, prior (vv. 1–4) and additional revelation (vv. 15, 16) emboldens Moses, convincing him that, contrary to appearances, the situation is entirely under God's control, having been brought about by Him that He may display, and Israel may see, the salvation of the Lord. The whole situation was to be overturned: the foes were not to be seen again, God would be glorified in judgment of sinners; the freed slaves were to fear pursuit no more, God would be glorified in deliverance of the hopeless and helpless.

19, 20 The people are defended by the Lord, and the cloud covers the Egyptians with darkness, but gives light to the Hebrews (RSV mg.; cf. 24:16, 17). See also the note on 'theophany' in the Introduction. The power is God's alone, but it is exercised through His appointed servant. The crossing is miraculous in the sense that God uses a natural agent (a strong east wind) with positively supernatural results (dividing the waters). 25 The acknowledgment of the Egyptians is the partial fulfilment of vv. 17, 18; the reaction of those who remained in Egypt would also come into the situation. The Hebrews, on the other hand, believe, fear (v. 24) and rejoice (15:1).

15:1–21 The song of the redeemed

The song of Moses is a poetical version of the prosaic account in the previous chapter, and this ought to be remembered in its interpretation. Moses' paean of praise is ascribed to the sovereign Lord (vv. 1–3) for what He has done against the arrogant Egyptians (vv. 4–12), and for what He will yet do against the inhabitants of Canaan (vv. 13–18). The evidence of God's irresistible and gracious power just given, forming the first part of His covenant promise (vv.

3, 16), is sufficient warrant for praising Him in anticipation for what remains to be done (vv. 13, 17). All this attests God's uniqueness and transcendence (v. 11). This one act of deliverance has revealed the very eternal depth of His character (cf. Introduction), but He was also the God who revealed Himself to this nation's forefathers (v. 2). This one act has revealed His power against His foes and love for His people; this is the foundation of His endless reign (v. 18; cf. Ps. 66:5–7). God purposes not only to deliver His people but to dwell with them (v. 13) and to be the object of their worship (v. 17) and the source of their blessing (v. 13). Cf. Rev. 15 and note the context and the theme of this endless song.

20, 21 Miriam, the prophetess, takes up the same theme and leads the women in praise and a solemn but spontaneous dance of joy.

15:22 – 19:2 FROM THE RED SEA TO SINAI

15:22 – 17:16 At Marah, Elim, the wilderness of Sin and Rephidim

This is a record of sinful complaints. At Marah, the cry is 'What shall we drink?'; in the wilderness of Sin they say, 'What shall we eat?' In spite of the suitable provisions which were miraculously provided in both cases and the gift of further water at Rephidim, they still ask, 'Is the Lord among us or not?' Such is the recalcitrance of this people, which increases in frequency and consequent seriousness after the covenant-making at Sinai (see the historical narratives of the book of Numbers). On account of this a whole generation dies in the wilderness.

The action of God's providence as shown in the miracle at Marah will be repeated in the characters of His people if they obey God's law (15:26). This test of obedience is implemented in the wilderness of Sin (see map) by the supernatural provision of manna. The people are thus without excuse should they forsake their Deliverer who provides for them and does not leave them to die in the wilderness (16:4). This manna has no known parallel and its daily continuance, sabbaths excepted, until they ate of the fruit of the land of Canaan (16:35; cf. Jos. 5:12) is nothing short of miraculous. The Lord tests Israel by this, but also manifests Himself to Israel by means of it. Some is to be kept as a memorial of how Israel was sustained in the wilderness (16:33). The sabbath is not new; it was a creation ordinance (Gn. 2:1–3), and is here introduced as a means of rest and benefit, commanded and provided for the people. God will provide for man on this day without his toiling for his food.

The testing and striving at Massah and Meribah does not go unpunished, though water is miraculously provided, for a foe comes against Israel. Amalek (cf. Gn. 36:12, 16) is overcome not by picked warriors and persistent combat, but by supplication and intercession. The curse and judgment that falls upon Amalek is by way of retribution for the abominations they had in common with the Canaanites and for their action against Israel (Dt. 25:17–19; 1 Sa. 15).

For the locations of Marah, Elim and Rephidim, see on Nu. 33:7–15.

15:22–27 At Marah and Elim. 22 In the wilderness of Shur (see map) the Israelites come to Marah after some 30 to 40 miles traversed, and here the Exodus motif is repeated, namely that realized dependence upon and crying to God precedes the solution He gives. This is a walk 'by faith, not by sight', and even those delivered depend on God for survival as much as they had to depend upon Him for deliverance. 25 That there might be a tree with natural properties for sweetening brackish water is not impossible, and if one takes this view the miracle would consist in the use of natural elements to a supernatural effect. The fact that God used a tree, planted long since and now grown to maturity, makes this incident an example of anticipatory providence. He had begun to prepare for their need long before the need arose. How out of place their complaints! Prayer was the only requirement. 27 The rest and refreshment of Elim with water in abundance was another evidence of God's care, but this was soon forgotten (see below, 17:1–16) at Rephidim.

16:1–36 In the wilderness of Sin. 2, 3 The people now prefer food to liberty, and even to life itself. What they petulantly require will be a further means of testing their faith, obedience and satisfaction with God alone. 4, 5 They are to use the bread from heaven in accord with His law and to keep none except on the sixth day. But in this they disobey (vv. 20, 28). 8 Their sin is not made light of; its constant repetition is being noted and is ripening for judgment (vv. 20, 27, 28).

13 The common quail migrated across the Red Sea in large numbers at this time and, faint after a long journey, could be caught with ease. The miraculous element consists in the time of their arrival. This was not a staple diet but a luxury; they came as a fulfilment of God's promises in v. 12 and give additional evidence that it was the Lord who brought them out from Egypt and that their murmuring was against Him, and not His servants (cf. v. 8). In addition, the quails could be a punishment when sought by those who despised the manna (Nu. 11:4–7, 31–35). 14 Each morning after the dew there was found on the ground a fine, flake-like thing like hoar-frost with a honey taste, which could be ground and used in cooking and baking. Several partial parallels to this are known to exist in the Sinai peninsula, e.g. honeydew-producing insects leaving sweet, light-coloured drops on tamarisk twigs. There is no complete parallel, however, and the mān known to the Israelites remains wholly in the realm of the supernatural. God suffered them to be hungry so that by providing manna He could teach them that 'man does not live by bread alone, but . . . by everything that proceeds out of the mouth of the Lord' (Dt. 8:3; cf. Dt. 8:16; Jn. 6:25–29; Rev. 2:17). The fact that it bred worms every day except the sabbath was to prove that trust for each day's needs and obedience regarding the sabbath would be rewarded.

18 Omer occurs only in this chapter. The word means a small bowl which according to v. 36 contained approximately 4 pints. 33, 34 This is an anticipation of the erection of the Tabernacle. The jar of manna was placed with the tables of the law in the ark.

17:1–16 At Rephidim. 1 Cf. Nu. 33:1–49 for a summary account of the journeys. 4 Moses is being victimized by open rebellion and so turns to the Lord. 6 Horeb here stands for some peak other than Sinai in the same mountain range. The miracle is further evidence of God's condescending care, but also of His remonstrating with such an obdurate people in spite of their religious protestations. 8 Amalek. The Amalekites were a branch of the Edomite race, descendants of Esau (Gn. 36:12, 16). They were a nomadic people and were especially hostile to Israel (cf. Dt. 25:17, 18). 10 Hur was the grandfather of the craftsman Bezalel (1 Ch. 2:19, 20). He shared the government with Aaron when Moses went up to Sinai. 11–13 This posture of prayer denotes supplication, but in that it was Moses who prayed, mediation is included. 16 A hand upon the banner of the Lord! The Hebrew literally rendered would be as in RV mg., 'a hand is lifted up upon (against) the throne of the Lord!' This was Amalek's sin, and the God who does not give His glory to another smote him.

18:1–27 The visit and counsel of Jethro

This visit affected for all time the constitutional history of Israel, for here is the separation (not divorce) of the legislative and judicial functions of the community. What had been happening was that cases requiring a legal decision had been brought to Moses to be settled. He would adjudicate, and his decisions (case-law) would become 'the statutes of God'. He does not give the settled code in detail but in principle (cf. Ex. 20:1-17), and here he is represented as pronouncing on cases as they arose. The decisions thus given, especially in difficult cases (v. 26), would form precedents for future cases (cf. 21:1). Collections of such laws are in 20:23 – 23:33. See further the notes in Introduction on 'law' in connection with ch. 20.

2–9 Moses' father-in-law, impressed by what he has heard of the deliverance, visits him and brings Moses' wife, Zipporah, and his sons. 10 Jethro is moved to praise God for all that He has done and proceeds to counsel Moses as to how he may lighten the burden of ruling the people. 11 Jethro the Midianite, though a descendant of Abraham, is not a pure monotheist, though he may be confessing more than the supremacy of the Lord over all other gods. 12 The sacrifice he offers is due to his position as head of a tribe and is of the 'sin-offering' kind, for sacrifice was not unknown before Sinai; cf. Gn. 4:4.

15, 16 Moses' answer is important for two reasons. Firstly, it shows that the people want a decision from God and that Moses can give it to them in connection with the immediate dispute, and secondly, that he can also impart moral statutes. 19–22 Jethro's answer does not abolish Moses' prime office, but makes provision for others to deal with minor cases. These men were to fear God rather than man, and were not to take bribes. 23, 24 This arrangement is submitted to Moses and not forced upon him, and the whole is submitted to God for approval.

Note. The 'Kenite hypothesis'. The origin of Yahweh-worship in Israel is traced by some to the influence of the Kenite clan, and of Jethro in particular. Holding that no knowledge of Yahweh existed in Israel prior to Moses, they urge that, while residing with Jethro, he learned of the storm-god of the Kenites, whose seat was on Mt. Sinai, and then introduced this deity to the Hebrews. Support for this is derived from the fact that Moses was living among the Kenites when Yahweh appeared to him at Sinai. The theory, of course, is maintained against the express testimony that the God of Sinai is none other than the God of the Hebrew patriarchs. The alleged summoning of Yahweh from Sinai by Deborah in her song (Jdg. 5:4) is interpreted in a grossly literalistic manner and in complete violation of the fact that Yahweh is with Israel in Canaan. In Nu. 10:29 Hobab the Kenite is invited to come with the Hebrews that they might do him good, and not vice versa. In Ex. 18 Jethro is the learner and not the teacher and his sacrifice (v. 12) follows his faith, testified in v. 11, which in turn follows on the report he heard of the deliverance wrought (v. 1). He is a convert.

There are, therefore, no real grounds for positing this hypothesis. See further 'Kenites' in NBD.

19:1, 2 At Sinai

The Israelites reached Sinai in the third month after they left Egypt, and they stayed there for nearly a year (Nu. 10:11). The wilderness of Sinai would be the open land before the mountain. On Sinai the cloud rested (cf. v. 9). The goal had been reached.

19:3 – 24:18 THE ESTABLISHING OF THE COVENANT

19:3–6 The purpose of God declared

3 In accordance with 3:12, Moses ascends the mount. 4 That the people have arrived thus far is entirely attributable to the power and care of God (cf. Dt. 32:10–12; Rev. 12:14), and is in accord with His covenant purpose for them (see Introduction). This purpose is stated here as follows: that they should be a unique people, chosen, prized and blessed in that they should be separated to God's will, each enjoying access to Him, and each employed in His worship and service. This is to be actualized in obedience to His law, and it is this purpose which must be declared to the people. To this purpose the Israelites were to feel the inner constraint by the memory of past and present mercies (cf. Rom. 12:1).

5 My own possession (Heb. śᵉgullâ, 'a special possession'); the truth of divine election underlies this. (Cf. Dt. 7:6. In Mal. 3:17 this term is referred to the faithful Israelites of the ideal future, and in 1 Pet. 2:9 and Tit. 2:14 it is referred to the church.) The justice of this election is based on God's right to do what He wills and to choose whom He wills, for all belong to Him by right of creation. 6 This is what Israelites (God's people) are to be in contradistinction to all others, viz. a kingdom whose citizens are all priests, each having the right of access, worship and devotion to God. In Is. 61:6 the Israelites of the ideal future are thus described, and the fulfilment in the church is seen in 1 Pet. 2:5–9. A holy nation is one separated from other nations and devoted to God. This privilege was also a duty and again is referred to the ideal Israel of the future (Is. 62:12) and to the church (1 Pet. 2:9).

19:7–25 The formal acceptance by the people and their preparation to hear the Lord's voice

The people take an oath of allegiance and submission to the Lord's purpose as to their lawful ruler and sovereign. The terms of the covenant call for the acceptance of the people, although the terms cannot be altered in any way, and once accepted they become legally binding. Having submitted themselves, the people are now to see the manifestation of the Lord's presence and to hear His voice, that they may be deeply affected by His majesty, the awesomeness of the bond to be made and the truth of what Moses will communicate to them as the Lord's demands.

In this way the biblical relationship of law and grace is given its abiding definition. Specifically in 3:12, but by implication throughout chs. 3 to 9, it is taught that Sinai is not a chance stopping-place on the journey to Canaan, but the very goal of the Exodus pilgrimage in its first stage. By the will of God His people, redeemed by the blood of the lamb (cf. 12:13), come not only under His general guidance (cf. 13:21, 22) and are separated from the world (cf. 14:27–31), but come also under His detailed requirements for their daily life and worship (cf. 20:1 – 24:8). The law of God, therefore, is not a ladder whereby the unsaved gain heaven, but a pattern of life whereby the saved display their sonship (cf. Dt. 14:1, 2) and their status as the redeemed (cf. Ex. 20:2).

The preparation to hear the Lord's voice involved them in a symbolic act of cleansing by washing their garments and in abstinence from sexual intercourse (v. 15). This latter demand is noteworthy in the light of facts from other contemporary Ancient Near Eastern religions in which sensuous orgies were incorporated into the ritual performed. Israel's religion was 'different', having a supernatural origin. The call of the trumpet is the prelude to the royal proclamation, and the accompanying supernatural manifestations with the natural elements in upheaval on Sinai are to impress the Israelites, to curb their sinful and persistent curiosity (cf. Ex. 3:3) and to reveal a holy yet gracious God.

9 God intends to accredit His messenger before His people. 12 Bounds; the mountain was fenced, for it became God's seat and even sanctified people were not to touch the mountain, on pain of immediate death by stones or arrows. 16 See the note on 'theophany' in the Introduction. 19 Here is an external voice to Moses, and not the processes of inner conscience and internal reflection on his part. The theophany is not a poetic accessory. This is important for our understanding of the fact of revelation. 'God spoke . . . to our fathers' (Heb. 1:1).

20:1 – 23:19 Laws to apply the demands of the covenant

20:1–20 The Ten Commandments. See introductory notes on 'covenant' and 'law'. The fact that the Decalogue was uttered by the voice of God Himself without any intermediary is a witness to its authority and enduring validity. This is further emphasized by the fact that the commandments were twice written by God and on stone tablets (31:18; 32:15, 16; 34:1, 28; cf. Dt. 10:4). The first pair were shattered by Moses to symbolize the effect of Israel's apostasy (32:19); the second pair were placed in the ark (25:16; cf. Dt. 10:5).

This law was intended to be the means whereby the demands of the theocratic covenant were made known and applied to the people. The principles of 20:2–17 are expanded in 20:22 – 23:33, and this is used to ratify the covenant in ch. 24. These principles embrace the whole order of life in its Godward and manward relationships, and comprise in summary form the whole law of God. The preponderantly negative form of the commands is God's protest against sin in the midst of His redeemed people, but is also a pointer to the triumph of grace in that this protest becomes the rule of life and not the instrument of death. The singular form of address, 'you' (AV 'thou'), while standing collectively for Israel, more particularly refers to each Israelite.

2 This is the equivalent to the historical prologue of a Hittite suzerainty treaty (see note on 'covenant' in the Introduction). This is not a commandment, but the basis on which they all rest, namely that God is personal and sovereign in His gracious dealings with His people who love and obey Him (v. 6). 3 This is the first command against polytheism, and by implication God's right to exclusive adoration and obedience is asserted. Before me; 'in my sight', i.e. where Israel lived and worshipped. 4 This is the fundamental tenet of the faith of Israel; cf. Dt. 6:4. This second command is directed against image-worship, and it is general in scope, including attempted representations of God or of any idols of creatures. Such things debase the Creator and the creature who worships them. At Sinai no form or similitude was seen: only a voice was heard. 5, 6 The command of the previous verse is here developed. God will not allow what is His just due in terms of reverence and obedience to be given to anything else. God's honour is tied in with the people's worshipful service. This is a manifestation of God's inflexible, righteous character. God does not punish the children for their fathers' sins except when they perpetuate them and when the sins committed involve certain social and physical consequences. The important thing is that those punished thus are those who 'hate' God. His mercy transcends His wrath, and His blessing upon those who love and obey Him reaches a thousand generations.

7 To take the name of God in vain is to use it with any idle, frivolous, blasphemous or insincere intent. This does not prohibit solemn or legal oaths, but it does forbid false swearing (cf. Lv. 19:12). To hold guiltless is to leave unpunished. 8–11 Remember; this is no new command. It goes back to Gn. 2:1–3. This could have been forgotten by the Israelites while in Egypt, and there are no references to it in patriarchal times. It was to be observed perpetually. Six days' labour entitled a man to one day's rest, but this day was the memorial of God's good work of creation for the benefit of man and as such offered an eminently suitable occasion for worship. It was made for man. It was either a weariness (cf. Am. 8:5) or a delight (cf. Is. 58:13). 12 This is our first duty manward, and the family unit is the foundation of social order and peace. The observance of it reveals a well-ruled character, and augurs well for the future security of individual and nation. God's blessing rests upon the observance of this to the effect described.

13 This refers to unauthorized killing, i.e. murder. This law is amplified with reference to accidental, and therefore excusable (21:13; Nu. 35) and justifiable (Ex. 22:2), homicide. Capital punishment is authorized killing (Gn. 9:6) and so is 'lawful' war (Dt. 20). 14 The purity of the married state is another foundation of social life and is to be maintained on pain of punishment (Lv. 20:10). 15 The right to own private property is to be respected, and the penalties for theft are given (Ex. 21:16; 22:1). 16 This prohibits false witness, particularly in a court of law (23:1), but not only there; defamation of character is forbidden. The penalties are given in Dt. 19:16–21. 17 Man's inward state, his thoughts and desires, are not hidden from God and come under His law. This lies at the root of the five commandments that precede. 18f. Love is the motive for keeping this law, but fear is also spiritually healthy lest love be debased.

20:21–26 The general form of worship. 22 We begin with the code (book) of the covenant (20:22 – 23:33; see note on 'law' in the Introduction) and the links between this body of law and the Decalogue we shall note as we proceed. 23 The first and second commandments are re-echoed, giving specific directions to enable the Israelites to worship God acceptably. 24 The altar of earth or unhewn stone was to emphasize the simplicity of true worship, and the access to God given to every Israelite. Steps up to the altar would involve the worshipper in immodest exposure of nakedness as he ascended in his ordinary dress (cf. 28:40–43). These altars were to be erected at places where God would reveal Himself, and where He would bless yet again.

Note. Ex. 20:24–26 and Dt. 12. It is maintained that this Exodus law, which allegedly grants unrestricted liberty in worship, must come from an earlier date than that prescribing worship at a single central sanctuary, with which it obviously disagrees. This alleged conflict is based on a mistaken exegesis of the Exodus passage, for in it there is neither the unrestricted liberty of worship, nor the unlimited number of sanctuaries which are claimed. To begin with, this law must be firmly connected with the preceding history; by 'the places where I record my name' are meant the plain of Moreh (Gn. 12:6), Mt. Moriah (Gn. 22:2), Beersheba (Gn. 26:23), Bethel (Gn. 35:1) and Rephidim (Ex. 17:8, 15). This description does not refer to places of worship co-existing simultaneously, but as denoted successively in the Self-disclosure of God in Exodus. This explains and legitimizes the instances of Gideon (Jdg. 6:25, 26), Manoah (Jdg. 13:16), David (2 Sa. 24:18), Solomon (1 Ki. 3:4, 5) and Elijah (1 Ki. 18:31ff.). There is nothing here which conflicts with Deuteronomy, for though Dt. 12 gives the general rule of worship at the central sanctuary, Dt. 27 gives directions for the building of an altar on Mt. Ebal precisely in the manner of Ex. 20:25.

21:1 – 23:13 Civil judgments. These were given as verdicts in cases that arose, and they became established precedents for the future; cf. Ex. 18:13ff.

21:2–11 gives the law of slavery relating to Hebrew slaves (the case of foreign slaves is dealt with in Lv. 25:44–46). A person could be sold into slavery by his parents, or he could be sold for theft (22:1) or insolvency (cf. Am. 2:6), or he might be obliged to sell himself (cf. Lv. 25:39). Also, he might be born a slave. 2, 3 In Israelite law the slave was not a mere chattel: he had rights, and could leave free in the seventh, or sabbatical, year in the state in which he entered bond-service, as single or married. This was the basis of the labour system. 4 If the slave married and reared a family while a slave, they remained the property of his master, presumably for a period of 6 years. 5 Provision was made for life service also, and the pierced ear was the mark of a devoted life-long servant. 6 To bring . . . to God; to perform this ceremony as in the presence of God before the judges, at the doorpost of the home in which the slave served. 7 The rights of the female slave were jealously guarded, though liberty was not given to her after a 6-year period of service. 8 She could not be sold to a non-Israelite, and if her master was displeased with her before taking her as his concubine her liberty could be bought. 9 If she was for his son then she became a daughter. 10 If another concubine was taken by the master, she was to be provided for. 11 If this was not forthcoming, liberty was to be given her.

21:12–17 The law relating to capital offences. For unpremeditated homicide the penalty was modified and cities of refuge were appointed later (cf. Dt. 19:1–13). 14 The horns of the altar were falsely regarded as offering protection (cf. 1 Ki. 1:50; 2:28ff.). This was a pagan practice and there is no divinely-given authorization for it in the OT. Cities of refuge were provided for those guilty of unpremeditated homicide, but for the murderer there was no shelter from the execution of the divine law. 15–17 Smiting or cursing a parent (cf. Ex. 20:12) and kidnapping were also capital offences.

21:18–36 The law relating to physical injuries as caused by humans (vv. 18–27), animals or sheer neglect (vv. 28–36). 18–27 In decreeing penalties, note that consideration was taken of the status and sex of the sufferer, the character of the injury and the consequences arising from it. 20, 21 The life of a slave was thought less of than that of a free man, though the slave was no mere chattel. 22 The loss of a child was to be compensated at the regulation of arbitrators, but if the woman died then the law of capital murder applied. 25 The law of exact retribution as stated here was commuted to a money fine even in Mosaic times (cf. Nu. 35:31) and not applied if a slave was injured, for the slave was given liberty; he could not be injured at will. 28–36 Animals also were slain for violating the sanctity of human life, and though the owner was not held responsible in the first instance, if he had been warned then he suffered death along with his animal. If the relatives of the dead man were willing to accept a money compensation, however, the owner escaped death. A master was to be compensated for the loss of a slave by such means. The patent justice of vv. 33–36 is worth noting.

22:1–15 Various laws relating to restitution of goods. 1–4 The law relating to theft of oxen or sheep and to burglary. When the stolen animals were slaughtered or sold, restitution was higher in the case of the more useful ox. If it had not been sold or killed, the animal appropriated was to be returned and a double sum repaid. A thief could be sold into slavery for his theft, or justly killed if he burgled at night. By daylight he could be recognized and apprehended and so he could not then justly be killed. 5, 6 The law respecting compensation for damage either by cattle or by fire. 7–13 The law relating to compensation for loss or damage in the case of deposited material. The judges, acting on God's guidance, were to decide whether the material or money had been misappropriated. 11 Solemn swearing was to be believed. 14, 15 Hired animals were the borrower's responsibility except when they were in the presence of the owner.

22:16 – 23:13 Various moral laws. 22:16, 17 The unbetrothed daughter was part of her father's property, and her value would be diminished by the loss of her virginity. Compensation had to be paid and the man had to marry her. Should the father refuse, the marriage price was still to be paid. 18 Consult the article 'Magic and Sorcery' in NBD. Sorcerers were utterly opposed to the whole religion and faith of Israel, and were to be destroyed. 19 Such debasement of man needed to be judged drastically and purged away. 20 The ban (Heb. ḥērem) referred to by the words utterly destroyed was the handing over to God, by extermination, of what could not be allowed to remain in His sight as it was so offensive (cf., e.g., Jos. 6:17–19). 23, 24 God's judgment is just retribution. 25ff. The poor were not to be at the mercy of the rich, and no essential article was to be kept as a pledge, such as a mantle which served as a cloak by day and a blanket by night. 28 Reverence is to be shown to God, and to those whom He has set in authority. 29–31 These laws are to symbolize the consecration of the nation to God.

23:1–3 Evidence in a court of law is to be true and to show no partiality (cf. 20:16). It must not be swayed by a majority decision, nor by pity. 4, 5 Even an enemy's beast is to be preserved. 6ff. The justice given must reflect God's justice, for He will not remain inactive. 9 Have pity on strangers, for you once were like them (cf. Mt. 7:12; Eph. 4:32). 10–13 The seventh year and the seventh day are to be honoured; the immediate reason is philanthropic and economic, but the command in v. 13 shows that the provident goodness of God is behind this too.

23:14–19 Ceremonial legislation. 14–17 The three annual festivals are dealt with at greater length in Lv. 23 and Dt. 16. The fact that they appear here in brief statement form is testimony that an experience of deliverance and reception of covenant were at the heart of Israelite religion. Consult the NBD article 'Feasts'. The feasts began with that of Unleavened Bread in which a hasty and effective deliverance was gratefully remembered, and in this a thank-offering was brought to the sanctuary. Then the goodness of the Provider was remembered at harvest time, and at ingathering. These commands were tokens that the wandering Israelites would one day be in Canaan according to God's promise. All able-bodied males were to participate as representatives of their families. The women were not obliged to come owing to other duties at home, but were not forbidden (cf. 1 Sa. 1:18). 18 This refers to the Passover, and the fat is the choice part of the sacrifice which was to be consumed by fire. 19 The first fruits are to be offered to God, for He gave them. The heathen practice referred to in 19b was a vain attempt to increase fertility and productivity by magical arts.

23:20–33 Summary of the principles of God's future dealings

If Israel is obedient to God's voice, then He will lead her, bring her in, destroy her foes, settle her in the land, expand her territory and influence. This purpose is one of the main themes of Deuteronomy and Joshua.

20 An angel; see the note on 'theophany' in the Introduction. To rebel against him is to rebel against God, and this will not be pardoned. 24 Pillars; idolatrous stones carved with some heathenish symbol. 25b, 26 These are the blessings that would fall upon Israel, and God's activity outworks the sum total of the blessings of the covenant. 28 Hornets; this is a metaphorical description of God's activity. 31 Israel will extend from the SE coast of the Mediterranean Sea to the Euphrates. 32, 33 To allow their foes to settle with them will not only be an enticement to sin but a route to destruction. Cf. the book of Judges.

24:1–18 The ratification of the covenant

Moses is still on the mount; having received all the laws and recounted them to the people, he returns at God's bidding with the people's submission and their divinely-chosen representatives, who have together sealed the covenant by sacrifice. Then Moses is called on by God to wait upon Him for the engraved laws on tablets of stone.

1 Nadab and Abihu are the two sons of Aaron; they and the seventy elders constitute the representatives and witnesses of the people. The people are to remain at the foot of Sinai; the representatives are to ascend part of the way, but Moses goes up to the clouded, fiery summit. 3, 4 He recounts and records the laws of the Lord, and to them and their Author they submit in a legal and formal, yet gracious and blessed, covenant. An altar is built surrounded by twelve pillars symbolizing the twelve tribes, and the covenant is ratified by blood sacrifice. Covenants were ratified in various ways; by eating salt together (Nu. 18:19), by partaking together of a sacrificial meal (Gn. 31:54; cf. v. 11), or by passing between the divided pieces of a slaughtered sacrifice (Gn. 15:10, 17; Je. 34:18f.), but especially by the use of blood.

5–8 Here God and the people are joined together by the sacrificial blood cast against the altar (representing God), and sprinkled on the people. The significance of blood is that of atoning death; see on the Passover which is the key to the whole sacrificial system of Israel. The blood is first sprinkled on the altar, for the primary need is always propitiation, the quieting of the wrath of God. When the people have committed themselves to a life of obedience, the blood is then sprinkled upon them, for it is in the context of their attempt to walk the way of holiness that God's people become aware of their need of the atoning blood. Cf. 1 Jn. 1:7 – 2:2. The burnt-offering is described in Lv. 1 and symbolizes the entire submission of the offerer to God in confession and consecration. The peace-offering emphasizes the same truth but includes the added feature of a feast of communion between God and man through sacrifice. 9–11 The elders eat the flesh of the peace-offerings and behold the inner brightness of what was, from without, the darkened cloud. They see the glory of God in the theophany (see Introduction) and, far from being consumed, feast in His presence in the glory of surpassing beauty. 12 Moses and the elders have probably returned to the people before this call summons Moses to the summit to receive the law. 13, 14 His servant Joshua accompanies him, but only so far, and he delegates his judicial authority to Aaron and Hur.

25:1 – 31:18 THE INSTITUTIONS OF THE COVENANT—THE TABERNACLE AND THE PRIESTHOOD

25:1 – 27:21 Free-will offerings for the ark, the bread of the Presence, golden lampstand and the Tabernacle, with the pattern for their construction

God is enthroned and manifested at Sinai, but Israel is not to stay at Sinai for ever. She must press on to Canaan, and God will go with her, and as she moves on He will dwell in the midst of His people.

25:8, 9 The sanctuary. This sanctuary and its furniture are to be constructed according to a divinely-given blueprint, but by the free-will offering of the people. Moses is given the pattern and to him the materials must be given. The Israelites came out of Egypt with spoil (12:36) and Amalek's conquest (v. 17) would have enriched them further. The sanctuary (Heb. miqdāš) is a holy place, but the Tabernacle (miškān) in v. 9 is a dwelling-place. The Tabernacle expresses certain truths, and it is safer to speak of it as a 'type' only in connection with those uses and things which actually symbolized something to the Israelites, and to which the NT explicitly attaches a symbolical meaning. We are on safe ground when we emphasize the significance of the names by which the Tabernacle was clearly known to the Israelites. It was a 'dwelling' to represent God's co-dwelling with His people; a 'tent of meeting' to express the truth that God does meet His people and reveal Himself to them; and it was a 'tent of the testimony' to remind the Israelite that within it, in the ark, was the law that was to regulate his life. We shall note the significance of other items as we proceed.

25:10–22 The ark of the covenant and the mercy seat. 10–17 The ark was a chest or coffer, the main purpose of which was to hold the two tables of the law, but in it were also stored the jar of manna (cf. 16:33, 34), and Aaron's rod. It was sited in the Holy of Holies, and became the symbol of God's presence. Such arks were common in Israel's environment, but this one was unique in that it housed the law and not an image; God is spiritual and holy. It was overlaid with pure gold, whereas its appurtenances were made of gold in which there was some measure of alloy. 17 The mercy seat was a rectangular plate on top of the ark of similar dimensions ($4 \times 2\frac{1}{2} \times 2\frac{1}{2}$ ft). The word for this (Heb. kappōreṯ) means 'to cover' but in the form used here it means to 'make atonement'. (See L. Morris, The Apostolic Preaching of The Cross, 1955.) It was not merely a covering lid, but a sacred object in itself. It was a single slab of solid gold. 18–20 It was overshadowed by two cherubim (winged creatures, representing celestial beings), which were to protect the mercy seat, the ark and its contents; their outstretched wings were to provide a throne for the invisible but present God. 22 At the place where sin is propitiated God was to be found and mercy bestowed.

25:23–40 The table and the lampstand. 23–30 The table of acacia wood. This was the same wood as was used for the ark. It measured $3 \times 1\frac{1}{2}$ ft and was 27 inches high. 30 The bread of the Presence (AV 'shewbread') consisted of twelve baked cakes, set out in two rows (cf. Lv. 24:6). Frankincense was placed on each row, and they were offered to the Lord by fire (Lv. 24:7). The significance of the bread is not plainly revealed, but it is probably a recognition that God is man's provider and sustainer, and it is man's duty to acknowledge this in worship. There is no suggestion that it is food for the deity.

31–40 The lampstand (AV 'candlestick'; see plate XIVa in NBD) was of pure gold, and consisted of three branches ending in flower-shaped lampholders on each side of the main stem which also supported a lampholder. Again the significance of this is not made plain, but it is obviously connected with light-bearing and witness through worship.

26:1 – 27:21 The Tabernacle. There is much repetition involved in the description of the Tabernacle and its furniture, and this evidences the importance with which it was regarded. First, the pattern shown to Moses is described (chs. 25–31), then the execution of the work is recorded (chs. 35–39), a concluding summary is added (39:33–43), and finally an account of its erection is given (40:1–33). We shall not comment on this each time it occurs. For a general description of the Tabernacle the reader is referred to the relevant article in NBD and to plate XIVa in the same book. See also the note in the Introduction.

26:31 The inner sanctuary was to be marked off by a single veil (curtain) embroidered with cherubim, the symbol of the divine Presence, and in this only the ark and mercy seat were housed. 27:1–8 The altar for the burnt-offering was to be made in accord with 20:21–26 and was presumably a hollow box filled with earth. The ornamental horns (v. 2) were regarded as its most sacred part, and it was to those that the sacrificial blood was applied, and to which criminals held in vain hope of refuge (cf. on 21:12–17). 9–21 give details of the court of the Tabernacle and the burning light. The court enclosed the Tabernacle, and within the court the altar and the laver were placed. The entrance was at the eastern end of the court, furthest from the Holy of Holies, and thus God was still distinct from, though He dwelt with, His people. The burning light, supplied by the people and tended by the priests, symbolized God's presence and the consequent realization of this on the part of the people.

28:1 – 29:46 The institution of the priesthood and the service of consecration

With the law given, the Tabernacle planned and the requirements for its use in worship outlined, the necessity arose for a priesthood to officiate in these matters and to bless and guide the people. The high priest and every other priest acted as intermediaries between the people and God for such purposes. This is made evident in the description of the garments of the priests, and particularly by the fact that the names of the tribes were to be engraved on the shoulder-pieces of the ephod, and on the stones of the breastplate of judgment (28:29, 30). Aaron was selected for this purpose because he was Moses' mouthpiece. The ministry of the high priest adumbrated that of the Lord Jesus Christ (Heb. 7:1 – 10:39).

28:6 Ephod; a short linen garment of the same material as the veil of the Tabernacle, joined at the shoulder, and the two open sides bound together by an embroidered girdle. 12 Cf. Is. 49:16. 31 The robe was the garment beneath the ephod. 35 The sound of the bells was an announcement of the continuation of the ministry of intercession. Lest he die; holy things are to be handled with due reverence and obedience. 37, 38 The turban (AV 'mitre') was itself crowned by the plate of gold which proclaimed Holy to the Lord. The remembrance of God's holiness was the chief characteristic of the Israelites' worship. Aaron was to secure God's acceptance of the people.

29:1–46 The service of consecration. The priesthood itself was not free from sin, and therefore there could be no consecration without atoning blood. As the priests were to serve before God in matters so essential for the people, all this had to be done according to God's requirements. It is significant of God's grace that He reveals and makes provision for the things He demands. The consecration of Aaron and his sons to the priesthood was completed by the following items: washing for purification (v. 4), investiture to office (vv. 5–9), putting on the official robes, anointing, sacrificing for atonement and consecration (vv. 10–21), and filling their hands to authorize them to sacrifice (vv. 22–28).

1 The bull was for the sin-offering (cf. vv. 10–14). Two rams. One was for a burnt-offering (cf. vv. 15–18), and the other was for consecration (cf. vv. 19–22). 10 The laying on of hands symbolizes the fact that this is no mere donation of the animal to God, but that the worshipper is intimately involved and represented in what happens to the victim which is his substitute (cf. Lv. 16:21). 12 The manipulation of sacrificial blood (see on the Passover) is important. Here it is smeared on the altar to symbolize its Godward significance, i.e. that it satisfies the justice of a holy God upon the sinner by providing proof of life laid down in death, and so meets the need of the sinner in the sight of God. 13 The best and choicest parts of the sacrifice are burned to symbolize Godward devotion to the uttermost. 14 When a sin-offering was offered for priests or for the whole community including the priest, the flesh was burnt (cf. Lv. 4:15, 21). This ram was to be offered as a burnt-offering (cf. Lv. 1) of utter submissive devotion to God. 19, 20 This was essentially a peace-offering (cf. Lv. 3), the special characteristic of which was that the flesh of the sacrifice was eaten by the worshippers (vv. 32–34). 20–25 This sacrifice is modified to suit the occasion. 20 The touching with blood of the organs of hearing, handling and walking is to represent the need for the priest to be cleansed in all these functions. 24 The priests are hereby authorized to present their first sacrifice by offering the most sacred parts of the animal to God. 25 Moses is to burn these on the altar. 26–28 Part of the ram of consecration is returned to Aaron and the priests as their perquisite. In this meal, signifying God's acceptance of all that has been done and the bestowal of His favour, the consecration of the priests is complete. 33 To make atonement is to satisfy the just demands of God upon the sinner by way of substitution, so that the sinner does not have to suffer himself. 35 This whole ceremony was to be repeated for seven days. 37 The altar was to be consecrated likewise, and to be most holy. 42 The call to continued devotion was to be symbolized by the daily burnt-offering. At the tent of meeting God would dwell with them. All is made holy not by any intrinsic 'material' worth, but by the spiritual presence of God, visibly displayed. 45, 46 This is an epitome of the covenant purpose and blessing.

30:1 - 31:11 The pattern and workmen for other data regarding the Tabernacle

30:1–10 The altar to burn incense stood before the veil which curtained off the Holy of Holies. It was closely associated with the ark and the Holy of Holies but was outside the veil as the priest officiated at it daily. 9 The altar was for incense only, and for incense prepared in the prescribed manner (cf. vv. 34 ff.; Nu. 3:4, 'unholy fire'). 11–16 Money for the service of the Tabernacle. This was no mere levy or tax. It was not only the means of providing for the worship of the Tabernacle, but rather the reminder that the whole populace was preserved by the mercy of God and that their sinful souls were forfeit to Him. The sum was so small that all could pay, and it thus became an act of worship; but also it was so small that it was a token of the fact that no sum of money could redeem the soul. In addition it reminded the rich and poor that all were in the same need before God, dependent on Him for redemption. Ex. 38:25–28 shows the use to which this money was put: it was for the very foundations of the Tabernacle. 17–21 The laver was for the priests to wash their hands and feet in before they offered sacrifice. Lest they die: this serving had to be done by cleansed servants (cf. on 28:35). 22–33 The anointing oil signified the bestowal of the Holy Spirit for special purposes. It was to be specially compounded and was not to be used for general purposes. All that was related to the worship in the Tabernacle was consecrated by it, and as such, if properly used, would be a means of grace and blessing to worshippers. 34–38 Similar care was to be taken with the holy incense.

31:1–11 The craftsmen to be employed. For such work not only skilled but spiritual men were needed, marked out by God for this work. In the OT the Holy Spirit was active in, among other things, endowing the agents of God's rule (cf. Jdg. 6:34; 1 Sa. 10:10).

31:12–18 The sign of the sabbath and the tables of the law

The sabbath was a distinguishing feature between Israel and the other nations. It marked Israel's faithfulness, and her observance of it was an instrument in God's hand for her sanctification. This is why the prophets took sabbath-keeping as a test of the true religious condition of their contemporaries (cf. Je. 17:19–27; Ezk. 20:12–24). 18 The promise of 24:12 is fulfilled, and the Ten Commandments are divinely recorded, as well as being divinely given.

32:1 - 34:35 THE COVENANT BROKEN AND RENEWED

It is striking that the very book which records and exults in God's glorious deliverances and provisions does not hide the grave sinfulness of the people thus dealt with. Their murmurings at the Red Sea, at Marah, in the wilderness of Sin and at Rephidim evidence their frailty. But at Sinai they entered into covenant with God, and had accepted the law, pledging their obedience to all of it. Their rebellion therefore is more serious than murmuring complaint – it is open apostasy.

32:1–10 The apostasy of the golden calf

Their only complaint is Moses' failure to reappear, although they had sent him to the mount to hearken to their God on their behalf. Scarcely six weeks have passed before the people thus blessed are clamouring, at the very foot of Sinai, for a replica of the gods they saw worshipped in Egypt. Moses, not God, is referred to as the one who brought them out of Egypt. Aaron gives way (cf. Pr. 25:26) and idolatry and polytheism follow at the foot of the mount from which the commandments were given. 4 The calf that Aaron makes is a throwback to life in Egypt. There living animals were regarded as sacred, and gods were represented as having animal heads and even animal bodies as well. Hence the cult of the bull, Apis, later called Serapis.

5, 6 Aaron adds to the people's sin by building an altar and holding a feast to God who is to be worshipped under the guise of this calf. In Egypt they had lapsed into idolatry (cf. Lv. 17:7; Jos. 24:14; Ezk. 20:8), and now an air of sanctity is given by the high priest to their identification of Yahweh with these monster-gods. The outcome of such worship was not true holiness but the play, or orgiastic dance, which characterized pagan religions (cf. 1 Cor. 10:6ff.). 7–10 Your people; seeing what they have done, God cannot refer to them as His in any real sense of the truth. They have turned aside quickly, and speedily would God avenge His name and justly pour out His wrath upon them. Even though the emergency has arisen, God's purpose will not be overthrown. Just as God began with Noah after the judgment of the Flood, so will He begin with Moses.

32:11 – 33:23 Interceding and purging

Moses is instantly moved to intercede. None of God's servants has ever sat idly back and failed to seek a stay of judgment or to urge the people to repent. Cf., e.g., Gn. 18:22ff.; Am. 7:1–3. This does not mean that they contend with God against His justice, but they cry, 'In wrath remember mercy' (Heb. 3:2).

32:11–14 Moses' prayer. 11 He refers to thy people, and the basis of his intercession and the ground of his hope is the honour of God (cf. Je. 14:8, 9, 19–22; Dn. 9:17ff.). He uses three arguments in prayer, on his settled conviction that God is a 'jealous' God. God's jealousy is His zeal for His own glory in His people, on account of which He will neither break His promises nor fail to execute His threats. Moses reminds God of what He has done; 12 of what His foes will say if He exterminates His people now; 13 that He has given promises to the forbears of these people which must be kept. 14 Repented; God does not need to repent as men do, for He does not err, nor is He baffled or overcome. But when He is said (by an anthropomorphic description) to repent, He changes not His purposes, but a course of events previously threatened, because the altered conduct of His people no longer calls forth what He had originally promised. It is a change in His dealings with people, not a change in His character or His purposes.

32:15–29 The people are punished. Though wrath may not be outpoured, sin is not excused or overlooked. Moses meets Joshua (cf. 24:13) and they return to camp together, with the tablets of the law. The law is shattered by Moses to illustrate to the people the meaning of their apostasy. His anger is not a fit of temper but the upsurge of righteous indignation. God will feed Israel, but Israel is made to feed upon the work of her own hands by way of judgment, and so it is with God's judgment of false religion in every age. When people must drink water fouled by their own religious leaders, God will judge them (cf. Ezk. 34:12ff.). Aaron's self-excusing is pathetic, as indeed is every attempt to exonerate oneself from sin. The people are blamed, but the calf allegedly made itself! Aaron should have stood against them. The people must be purged, and those who are on the Lord's side must do this. 16 The work of God is divinely revealed and recorded, and therefore possesses His authority, abiding reliability and truth. 21 Moses discerns that the people were the source of this evil, but he does not underestimate the responsibility of Aaron in giving way to them and of bringing guilt upon them by not opposing their wicked desires. 24 Aaron's excuses reveal his weakness before both the people and Moses. 25, 26 When restraints are removed, not only do the people suffer, but God's honour is corrupted, and consequently the people must be purged. 27 The Levites take up Moses' call and execute those who have worshipped the idol calf. 29 For this, they are rewarded with the priesthood. Cf. Nu. 25:10–13.

32:30 – 33:23 Moses again intercedes and is shown God's glory. 32:30 – 33:11 In his initial intercession, such is Moses' love for the people that he offers his own life as the means whereby their pardon and peace may be secured, but God does not accept such sacrifice for oneself or for another (cf. Ps. 49:7). Moses' prayer is no formal petition, but the yearning of a burdened spirit. Cf. Rom. 9:2, 3.

32:32 Blot me . . . out. This expression is borrowed from the practice of keeping registers of citizens. Ps. 69:28 and Is. 4:3 refer to those who persevere in faithfulness and are preserved in a time of judgment. 33, 34 God has mercy on the people, but will punish individuals within this mercy. The nation, however, is to be led by an angel, and not the unmediated presence of God (see note on 'theophany' in the Introduction). 33:1–3 God remains faithful and the promise made with their fathers is to be kept, but He cannot walk with such people without consuming them, and so an angel is sent instead. 4–6 The people show spontaneous signs of penitence, and submit to God's demand. This is a new departure. Repentance brings an immediate response from God. 7–10 This reference shows how the worship of God was carried out during the interval between the time of the Exodus, or Sinai, and the completion and dedication of the Tabernacle. Moses used to take (i.e. before the apostasy) . . . the tent of meeting, which later gave its name to the Tabernacle, outside the camp to commune with God, who though with His people was yet apart from them. There Moses was given communion with God to a degree shared by no other; others worshipped at their tent door. 11 Face to face. This expression is clearly to be understood in terms of the words that follow, as a man speaks to his friend. That is unrestricted communion in which nothing is withheld and nothing cloaked (cf. Nu. 12:8; Dt. 34:10).

33:12–23 The tempo of intercession is now increased. Moses has asked and now he is seeking (v. 13), then knocking (vv. 15, 18). God has promised to be with these people and to bring them into the promised land, but their sin, though it has not negated this promise (cf. v. 2), has restricted God's grace and favour (cf. v. 3). It is this attenuation of God's favour that urges Moses to pray not merely for a physical entry, but for the presence of God in glory amid the people. He does not want the land of promise without God (v. 14), and the land of promise is nothing to the people without the same Presence (v. 16). It is God's presence which bestows obvious favour and assurance on His people, and marks them out as His own, for His glory. Therefore Moses concludes on the basis of the covenant: God must come with us. Such praying is answered. God will accompany Moses and the people, and the rest of Canaan will be given to them (v. 14). Such an answer emboldens Moses to request even more, for he is now convinced that God's favour does rest upon him and that the people have been in principle restored to full covenant favour. He prays for a sight of God's glory (see Introduction for note on 'the glory of God'). He is yearning for a special disclosure of God—not physical sight, for he knows that no man can see God and live, but for a spiritual perception of who God is and what He will be and do for him and his people. God reveals Himself by His Name, and yet He will redeclare this to Moses by making all His 'goodness', i.e. comeliness or beauty, pass before him. Moses is to hear old truths but with a new splendour. A veil will momentarily be drawn back, and God will pass by.

17 To find favour in God's sight is not to earn it but to have it bestowed upon one, because God 'knows' us in His election and calling (cf. Ex. 3). 19 See the Introduction for the note on 'the Name of God'. This verse absolutely excludes all notion of earning or meriting the divine mercy. God is merciful to whom He will and not to all, in the sense mentioned here. Rom. 9:15, which teaches salvation by grace alone, bestowed in accord with sovereign election, expounds the true meaning of this verse. 23 Moses is to see the afterglow which is a reliable indication of what the full splendour is to be.

34:1–35 The covenant renewed

This promised vision of the covenant God is the basis of the renewal of the covenant which has been broken by idolatry. The covenant is renewed through the repromulgation of the law of the covenant. It is again written by God but Moses is to prepare the tablets on this occasion. There is no contradiction between vv. 1, 27 and 28. The situation is that in v. 27 Moses is commanded to write the contents of the preceding verses, 'these words'; in v. 28 God is the subject of the last verb and not Moses. The contents of this chapter are a selected abbreviation of the 'book of the covenant', with additional features of promise and warning justified by Israel's apostasy and the Canaanite situation with which she will soon be confronted.

3 The mountain is to be sacrosanct, for God will be present there. 6, 7 Luther called these verses 'the sermon on the Name'. Though inexhaustible in love, mercy and forgiveness for thousands upon whom He sets His love, He is just and righteous and though His anger is not impetuous it is real and the guilty will not be excused. 8 Moses' response of hasty obeisance is an inward recognition of the Lord. 9 Moses as mediator is penitent in supplication. 10 God reaccepts the people and promises them further wonders of deliverance in connection with their entry into and occupation of the land. 11 These laws are set out by way of commandments for Israel's future. Their foes will be driven out but Israel is to beware (cf. 23:24, 25, 32, 33). 12 Those in covenant with the one living God cannot align themselves with pagan beliefs or religious practices; they must exterminate them. The people of God must be pure. See the book of Judges for the record of the outworking of this warning. 13 Pillars and Asherim. The former were of stone and were identified with the deity, usually male; the latter were of wood and were devoted to the same purpose. 14–16 Religious syncretism was and is an offence to the holy and jealous God. Intermarriage with Canaanites was a constant source of woe among Israelites and their kings. 18–26 A repetition of 13:13, 14; 23:12, 15–19. See the comments in these places. 21 In ploughing time and in harvest. An additional warning of the temptation which would arise in an agricultural community. 24 This is an additional feature, with obvious reference to the time when they would be in Canaan. God would defend the land when the males were engaged in His worship. 29–35 Cf. 2 Cor. 3:7–18. Moses removed his veil when he spoke with God, or with the people in His name, but veiled his face in ordinary daily life.

35:1 – 40:38 THE CONSTRUCTION AND ERECTION OF THE TABERNACLE

These chapters narrate the execution of the commands given to Moses in chs. 25–31 and do so in the main by a verbatim repetition. See these chapters for details of the work involved.

35:1 – 39:43 The people offer willingly and the work is carried out according to pattern

35:1–3 Before any work is commenced the law of the sabbath is reiterated, for God's work must also be done in accord with His law. This corresponds to 31:12–17 in its position and content. Kindle no fire. This law is implied in 16:23. 4, 5 Gifts are acceptable to the Lord only when they are given gladly from the heart. This emphasis is repeated in vv. 21, 22, 29; cf. 25:2; 36:2; 1 Ch. 29:9; 2 Cor. 9:7. 10ff. All were to offer, but the actual work was open only to those with God-given ability and desire. God makes use of the people's different artistic abilities (see especially vv. 25, 26, 30; 36:1). 36:2–7 This was no spasmodic giving; there was a super-abundance of what was necessary, and the people had to be stopped.

36:8 – 39:43 The work is carried out. 38:8 The mirrors were made of polished bronze, and were used for sacred purposes because of the self-denial of the devoted women. 39:43 Moses supervised all the work, checked that it had been carried out according to divine plan and then blessed the people.

40:1–38 The Tabernacle is set up and the glory of the Lord comes down

1–33 The constituent parts and furnishings had been made, and now needed to be put together and the Tabernacle erected. Divine instructions were disclosed as to how and in what order this was to be done. In this, emphasis was placed on the anointing (consecrating) and washing and investiture of the priests (cleansing for officiating). See Introduction for the note on 'the Tabernacle: the environs, appearance, furnishings and significance'.

34–38 The cloud, the visible evidence of God's favour, now rested on the Tabernacle, the centre of Israel's life, as the place of worship and the source of law. God fills the Tabernacle, and while even Moses cannot enter, yet there is symbolized God's own presence, so that His people may have recourse to, pardon from, and communion with Him in accord with the appointed means. God is with His people, whom He redeemed from the hand of the enemy.

CONCLUSION

The purpose of God in electing and delivering these people is at last achieved, and it is that God might dwell with those whom He has brought to Himself by substitutionary blood and saving power. He tabernacles with those who, as a consequence of His grace to them, submit themselves to Him with grateful love, to live unto Him and His glory in accord with His law. Worship and obedience flow from renewed hearts, and the cloud of God's glory confirms and reveals God's favour towards and delight in them.

All that characterized their bondage which was so oppressive has been swept away. Their old foes they would never see again (14:13). Their servitude of toil, tears, affliction and woe had become a memory not attaching to bondage but to deliverance, and a cause for endless rejoicing (15:1–18). Their deliverer was King over all and for ever, and yet He dwelt with them, and they with Him.

A new estate and condition had come into being in which God glorified Himself by hearing, answering and blessing His people. Being set free and called to be God's own 'treasured possession' they confess joyfully and unitedly that they are His subjects: 'All the words which the Lord has spoken we will do' (24:3, 7). His service and presence is their blessing.

Are not these the essential lineaments of the 'exodus' our Lord accomplished at Jerusalem by His death (cf. Lk. 9:31)? Did He not come in order that 'we, being delivered from the hand of our enemies, might serve him without fear, in holiness and righteousness before him all the days of our life' (Lk. 1:74, 75)? Sin, guilt, condemnation, eternal woe and Satan's power are all brought to an end by the power of the blood of the substitutionary sacrifice of the Son of God, who bestows newness of life to those whom He delivers, and in whom He dwells by His Spirit.

But as yet we are not free from our foes and ills. The song of Moses (Ex. 15) will be joined by a song to the Lamb-King (Rev. 15:3) who governs, keeps and leads His quickened and obedient people to heaven. There all the former things attaching to our earthly, mortal, sinful bondage are done away. 'Death shall be no more, neither shall there be mourning nor crying nor pain any more, for the former things have passed away' (Rev. 21:4). In the heavenly, eternal Tabernacle we 'shall see his face', and shall 'reign for ever and ever' (Rev. 22:4, 5).

Leviticus

INTRODUCTION

TITLE AND CHARACTER

Leviticus is the third of the five books which compose the 'law' of Moses. It contains ten of the fifty-four pericopes or sections into which the Pentateuch was divided for the annual reading of the Law in the synagogue. The later Jews called it Wayyiqrā ('and called'), using the initial phrase of the first verse. The name Leviticus is derived from the Greek (LXX) version. It is appropriate in a general way, since the priests were, of course, Levites in the sense of being members of the tribe of Levi. But it is inexact and to that extent misleading.

The book is especially intended for the priests. Aaron and his sons are mentioned many times in it. The Levites are mentioned only in one short passage (25:32f.). But while the book is a manual for the priests, it is to be noted that many of the laws are introduced by the phrase, 'Speak to the children of Israel'. Obviously this is because these laws, many of which required the services and mediation of the priest, concerned the people directly and vitally and formed an important part of that law which it was to be the special responsibility of the priests to teach the people (Dt. 31:9; 33:10; Ne. 8). Leviticus is in no sense an esoteric book. The people were entitled and expected to know exactly what was required of them, and of their priests, in that service of the sanctuary which so deeply concerned every true Israelite.

BACKGROUND

The place and time at which these laws were first given is carefully defined as during the sojourn at Mt. Sinai (7:38; 25:1; 26:46; 27:34), which lasted until 'the second year, in the second month, on the twentieth day of the month' (Nu. 10:11). The statement of 1:1 presupposes the erection of the Tabernacle which has just been described in Ex. 40. The mention of the eighth day (9:1) must refer to the day following the seven days of consecration of Aaron and his sons (8:33), which are apparently to be counted from the setting up of the Tabernacle on the first day of the first month (Ex. 40:2). The sin of Nadab and Abihu followed at once (Lv. 10:1, 2). The words 'and he did as the Lord commanded Moses' (16:34, AV), which are added to the ritual of the Day of Atonement, are important because they add to the record of the law itself the record of its first observance, which took place nearly five months after Israel left Sinai. The mention of the ark in connection with the ritual for this day is a further evidence of the early date of Leviticus, since the ark, which is mentioned many times in the Pentateuch and in the historical books of the OT, disappeared at the time of the Babylonian captivity, as was foretold in Je. 3:16. There was no ark in the second Temple to which period some commentators assign Leviticus. Note also Lv. 23:44 which states that 'Moses declared to the people of Israel the appointed feasts of the Lord'. Finally, it is to be noted that the deliverance from Egypt is represented as an actual personal experience (cf. 11:45 and 18:3 with 26:45) and the possession of the land is represented as still future (14:34; 19:23; 23:10; 25:2). Such facts as these should be noted carefully by the reader of Leviticus, since they serve to show that the exilic or post-exilic date for the book which is asserted or assumed by many scholars (recently, e.g., by Bright, Eichrodt, Noth, Snaith) is not in accord with the express statements of Scripture itself.

AUTHORSHIP

Nothing is said in this book as to the writing down of the laws which it contains. But the fact that these laws were given through Moses is stated again and again. The phrase 'and the Lord said to Moses' occurs about 30 times. Twenty of the twenty-seven chapters begin in this way. Aaron's name is occasionally joined with that of Moses (11:1; 14:33; 15:1); but he is directly addressed only once (10:8). In view of the statements which occur in Exodus, Numbers and Deuteronomy regarding the writing down of the commandments given to Moses (e.g. Ex. 24:4, 7), we are entitled to assume that these instructions, which so vitally concerned the welfare of God's people, and many of which are so precise and even minute in their requirements as clearly to require careful recording, were committed to writing either by Moses himself or at his command and under his supervision.

(For notes on the problems raised by the documentary theories of the compilation of the Pentateuch see the General Articles, 'The History of the Literary Criticism of the Pentateuch' (p. 34) and 'Moses and the Pentateuch' (p. 41) —Ed.)

SOURCE

Leviticus consists almost entirely of laws uttered by God Himself. God spoke to Moses 'from the tent of meeting' (1:1; cf. Nu. 7:89), or on the Mount (Ex. 25:1), or 'at the door of the tent' (Nu. 12:5). Consequently these laws have a high and heavenly character which sets them apart from laws of man's devising. This is emphasized by the express command: 'You shall not do as they do in the land of Egypt, where you dwelt, and you shall not do as they do in the land of Canaan, to which I am bringing you. You shall not walk in their statutes. You shall do my ordinances and keep my statutes and walk in them. I am the Lord your God' (Lv. 18:3, 4).

This comprehensive statement is followed by many examples of heathen practices which the Israelites are to shun and which are stigmatized as 'abominations' (18:26ff.). The Sinai religion was monotheistic, spiritual and ethical. The cults of the neighbouring peoples were polytheistic, idolatrous and often highly immoral. The worship of goddesses as well as gods introduced an element of sensuality into their rites (orgies and religious prostitution), as illustrated by the sin of Shittim (Nu. 25) which corrupted the people instead of elevating them, and were contrary to the spirit and the letter of the law of Moses (cf. Ex. 19:15; 20:26). As in the case of many ethnic cults today, a man could be better than his religion. Molech-worship (Lv. 20:1-5) was one of the heathen practices particularly denounced.

In view of the emphasis which is placed today by many scholars on comparative religion with a view to exhibiting the similarities between the religion of Israel and the ethnic cults, and even to derive it from them, it is important to keep in mind that the consistent emphasis throughout the Bible, and nowhere more evident than in Leviticus, is on difference. The religion of Israel is unique and distinctive. The resemblances are of minor importance and may even be misleading if the fundamental differences are not kept carefully in mind. Cf., e.g., the bread of the Presence (AV 'shewbread') (pp. 163f.).

PURPOSE AND APPLICATION

The immediate purpose of this book is to set forth those laws and principles by which Israel is to live as the people of God. Their God is a holy God; they are to be a holy people. 'You shall be holy; for I the Lord your God am holy' is its emphatic demand. His sanctuary is in their midst; and when they worship there they stand 'before the Lord', a phrase which occurs about 60 times in this book. This means separation from uncleanness and sin, and since they are sinful and prone to sin, it necessitates atonement for sin and purification from it and from all uncleanness. Hence the law of sacrifice is placed impressively at the beginning. See the note on the significance of the sacrificial ritual at the end of the section on pp. 147f.

The laws of Leviticus are very varied. They are both general and specific; they are both ceremonial and moral; they are severe and also merciful. They separate Israel from the nations and set her apart for the service of the God who has made this people His own by delivering them from Egyptian bondage. In so far as these laws are purely ceremonial, they are temporary and binding only during the Mosaic dispensation to which they belong. They had immediate reference to Israel as a nation which was to be governed in every aspect of its national and individual life by the law of Moses. In this strictly historical sense this book has great interest for the Christian reader. It tells him how God dealt with Israel as a people 'under age' and in need of training and preparation. Furthermore, in the case of many of these laws, e.g. the dietary laws, hygienic principles may be involved which have perpetual value and significance. To eat pork, e.g., may be wholesome under certain conditions and unwholesome under others. For the NT application and interpretation see 1 Cor. 10:31; Rom. 14:20. In so far as these laws are moral, they are of perpetual obligation; and since the Christian is, like the Jew, prone to evil and constantly tempted to break the law of God as set forth in the Decalogue, they demand of him, as of the Israelite of old, perfect obedience to the moral law of God. See on Dt. 4:8. The insistent demand of Leviticus that Israel be holy because the God of Israel is holy is confirmed and strengthened in the NT (1 Pet. 1:15).

The book is particularly notable in that it brings together in blended harmony two elements which are regarded by many as quite distinct and even as incompatible. On the one hand, Leviticus is the most thoroughly legalistic of all the books of the OT. It seeks to govern either by broad principle or specific precept the whole of the life of the people of God. Its demands may be summed up in the words of the apostle 'whether you eat or drink, or whatever you do, do all to the glory of God' (1 Cor. 10:31). Its insistent challenge and persistent demand is, 'You shall be holy; for I the Lord your God am holy.' On the other hand, there is no book in the OT which more clearly sets forth the redemption which is in Christ than does Leviticus. It faces the question of Job, 'How can a man be just with God?', and answers it in such words as the following: 'He shall bring his offering . . ..' 'And he shall lay his hand on its head . . ..' 'And he shall confess the sin he has committed . . ..' 'And he shall slay it . . ..' 'And the priest shall sprinkle the blood . . ..' 'And he shall make atonement for him, and it shall be forgiven him.'

This is the NT gospel for sinners stated in OT terms and enshrined in the ritual of sacrifice; and it finds its fullest expression in the ritual of the Day of Atonement. 'For the like of the great day of atonement we look in vain in any other people. If every sacrifice pointed to Christ, this most luminously of all. What the fifty-third of Isaiah is to Messianic prophecy, that, we may truly say, is the sixteenth of Leviticus to the whole system of Mosaic types, the most consummate flower of the Messianic symbolism' (S. H. Kellogg). To understand Calvary, and to see it in its tragic glory, we must view it with all the light of sacred story centred upon it. With Isaiah, the 'evangelical' prophet of the old dispensation, and with the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews, we must turn to Leviticus and read of the great Day of Atonement, and of the explanation which is given of it there: 'For the life of the flesh is in the blood: and I have given it to you upon the altar to make an atonement for your souls: for it is the blood that maketh an atonement for the soul' (Lv. 17:11, AV). Thus we shall see the great drama of redemption unfolding before our eyes and, in the light of the type, begin to understand the Antitype.

OUTLINE OF CONTENTS

1:1 – 7:38 The sacrifices

1:2 – 6:7	The Lord's portion of the sacrifices
6:8 – 7:38	The portion of the priest and of the offerer
	The significance of the ritual

8:1 – 10:20 The consecration of Aaron and his sons

8:1–36	Aaron and his sons consecrated by Moses
9:1–24	Aaron takes up his office
10:1–20	Sacrilege and its consequences

11:1 – 15:33 Laws regarding uncleanness

11:1–47	Uncleanness due to animals
12:1–8	Uncleanness due to childbirth
13:1 – 14:57	Uncleanness due to leprosy
15:1–33	Uncleanness due to issues

16:1–34 The Day of Atonement

16:1–10	Aaron's preparation
16:11–14	The sin-offering for the priests
16:15–19	The people's sin-offering
16:20–22	The scapegoat
16:23–28	The offerings completed
16:29–34	Some further instructions

17:1–16 The place of sacrifice and the sanctity of blood

18:1 – 20:27 Sins against the moral law

18:1–30	Prohibited degrees and sensuality
19:1–37	A collection of sundry laws
20:1–27	Sundry laws regarding very heinous offences

21:1 – 22:33 Instructions for the priests

21:1–9	The priests must be holy
21:10–15	Special rules for the high priest
21:16–24	The effect of physical deformity
22:1–16	Defilement disqualifies the priest from touching holy things
22:17–33	Rules for the offering of sacrifices

23:1–44 The holy convocations

23:3	The sabbath
23:4–8	The Passover and the Feast of Unleavened Bread
23:9–14	The offering of firstfruits
23:15–22	The Feast of Weeks
23:23–44	The feasts of the seventh month

24:1–23 The holy oil, the bread of the Presence, the sin of blasphemy

24:1–4	The oil for the lampstand
24:5–9	The bread of the Presence
24:10–23	The sin of blasphemy and crimes of violence

25:1–55 The sabbatical year and the year of jubilee
25:1–7 The sabbatical year
25:8–55 The jubilee

26:1–46 Blessings and cursings
26:3–13 Blessings as a reward of obedience
26:14–45 The chastisements for disobedience

27:1–34 Vows and tithes

COMMENTARY

1:1 – 7:38 THE SACRIFICES

It is significant of its great importance that this manual of sacrifice, as we may call it, is placed first, that the laws regarding the sacrifices precede even the ordination of the priests who are to perform them. Similarly in Numbers the census of the tribes is placed before the celebration of the Passover which is stated to have preceded it in time (Nu. 1:1; 9:1).

1 This code is introduced impressively. The opening word 'and' (AV, RV) connects it directly with Ex. 40:34f. Called is a much stronger expression than spoke. It suggests a peremptory summons (cf. Ex. 24:16; Nu. 12:5) and an important communication (cf. Ex. 3:4). It is used of the proclaiming of the feasts (23:2, 4, 21, 37) and of the announcing of the Day of Atonement (25:10). Called . . . and spoke, instead of the usual spoke, increases the emphasis. From the tent of meeting is a better rendering than AV 'tabernacle of the congregation'. See on Ex. 25:9. RV and RSV use 'tabernacle' for the miškān, the structure formed of the gilded boards and covered by the linen covering embroidered with the cherubim (cf. Ex. 26:7), and 'tent' ('ōhel) for the tent composed of curtains which covered it or for the structure as a whole (cf. Ex. 40:19, 34). AV, by rendering 'ōhel both as 'tent' and as 'tabernacle', occasions confusion. The statement indicates definitely that the Tabernacle had already been erected and thus connects Leviticus with what immediately precedes in Exodus.

Before considering this section in detail, it will be well to note carefully several points with regard to it. First, the sacrifices are discussed twice and from different viewpoints: a. 1:2 – 6:7, the Lord's portion of the sacrifices, b. 6:8 – 7:36, the portion of the priest and of the offerer. Then the five kinds of offering (burnt, cereal, sin, guilt, peace) are discussed independently, without regard to any possible connection between them. In the third place, the description and inventory given here is not complete but is supplemented by other statements, both those previously made and others to follow (e.g. no mention is made of the drink-offering or of the bread of the Presence). Fourthly, the order of description varies here between the two viewpoints given above and is not the order of performance. (For a note on the significance of the sacrifices, see pp. 147f.)

1:2 – 6:7 The Lord's portion of the sacrifices

2 Speak to the people of Israel. These laws concern all the people. It is as important for the layman to understand his duties as for the priest to perform his correctly. Brings an offering (RV 'offereth an oblation'). The Hebrew word qorbān (cf. Mk. 7:11) is used of gifts as well as of sacrifices (e.g. Nu. 7:11). These offerings are now more precisely defined. Cattle would include such unclean animals as horses, asses and camels. Cf. Ex. 9:3, where Pharaoh's 'live stock' is stated to consist of horses, asses, camels, herds and flocks. Herd means the bovines, while flock includes sheep and goats. Only these domestic animals and certain birds could be offered in sacrifice.

1:3–17 The burnt-offering. (See also under 6:8–13.) 3 Burnt offering. So called because all the flesh was consumed on the altar. Hence it is occasionally called the whole burnt-offering (Dt. 33:10; Ps. 51:19). Cf. also Lv. 6:22f. The Hebrew word for 'burnt-offering' ('ôlâ) means 'that which goes up', either because all the offering ascended as a 'pleasing odour' to God (v. 17), or because the entire animal, and not simply part of it, was offered (went up) on the altar. This sacrifice is mentioned first, apparently, as being the most conspicuous, even if not the most important. Note that the great bronze (AV 'brasen') altar is called 'the altar of burnt offering' (Ex. 30:28; 31:9; Lv. 4:7, 10, 18). Cf. also the direction in 4:24, 33 'where they kill the burnt offering'. It is also noteworthy that the 'continual offering' (tāmîḏ) was a burnt-offering (Ex. 29:42; Nu. 28–29).

That the burnt-offering might be a voluntary offering is indicated by the contrast between 1:2; 2:2 and 4:2; 5:15. But this is not taught in 1:3, where that he may be accepted is a better rendering than AV 'of his own voluntary will'. The animal must be a male without blemish. This was also the case with the guilt-offering (cf. 5:15). 4–9 The ritual is carefully described. The offerer brings his animal to the door of the tent of meeting, places or presses his hand on its head, makes confession over it (16:21; cf. Dt. 26:13ff.), slays it before the Lord, flays it, divides it 'into his pieces' (AV), i.e. according to its joints (cf. Ex. 12:46; Nu. 9:12; Jn. 19:36), and washes the inwards and the legs. The priest collects the blood and sprinkles it round about upon the altar, and burns all the flesh on it. Note the emphatic phrase, Aaron's sons the priests (1:5, 8, 11; 2:2; 3:2). The rite of sacrifice is distinctly a priestly function. Neither priest nor offerer partakes of any part of the sacrifice. But the hide goes to the officiating priest (7:8).

In this sacrifice, in contrast with the sin- and trespass-offerings, the stress seems to be on the complete consecration and dedication of the offerer. This is made especially clear in Rom. 12:1, where the words 'your bodies' and 'a living sacrifice' indicate clearly that Paul had the burnt-offering in mind. But the words it shall be accepted for him to make atonement and the sprinkling of the blood around the altar make it quite clear that dedication must be preceded by confession and expiation (cf. 17:11). To make atonement is literally 'to cover over'. It implies the covering over of sin as something upon which the God of Israel who is holy cannot look (Hab. 1:13; cf. Pss. 51:1, 9; 103:12; Is. 43:25; 44:22; Mi. 7:19; also Heb. 10:1–4). Sin must be covered over with atoning blood. It is used both with reference to persons (as here, cf. 4:20) and to things (e.g. the altar, Ex. 29:36).

It is a burnt offering, an offering by fire, a pleasing odour to the Lord. Fire-offering is a term which is applied to all those sacrifices, any part of which was burned on the altar. Pleasing odour is used of most of them and probably applies to all. The words are an anthropomorphism which is not to be taken literally; it should be regarded as a human way of describing the satisfaction which the Lord takes in the offerings of His people. This applies also to the words 'bread of God' (food) which are used of the sacrifices as a whole (21:6, 8, 17, 22f.), and also of the peace-offerings (3:11, 16). Some take these statements literally and insist that they indicate a crude and primitive conception of the meaning of sacrifice. But such a view is forbidden by the larger context. The ignorant and carnal may have held this low view. But the fact that at this very time, when these laws were being given, Israel was being fed with manna at the hand of God, should have convinced them that the God who fed them did not need to be fed by them, but that it was His good pleasure to receive back from His children a portion of the good things which He had given them, as a sign of the recognition on their part that it was He who sustained their lives and gave them every blessing. Ps. 50 belongs to a much later date, but it expresses clearly and emphatically the Mosaic conception of the meaning of sacrifice.

10–13 The requirements in the case of the sacrifice of a sheep or a goat are the same as in that of the bull. The place of sacrifice is to be the north side of the altar. This is mentioned only here, but it applies to all of the sacrifices except the peace-offering. 14–17 When the offering consists of a bird, the ritual is much simpler, but follows the same general pattern. Birds were offered, either as the required and regular sacrifice (cf. 12:6) or as a substitute for the normal sacrifice, permitted and accepted because of the poverty of the offerer (cf. 5:7–10).

2:1–16 The cereal-offering. (See also under 6:14–18.) 1 Like the burnt-offering this oblation is described as voluntary: When any one ('soul' or 'person', as often in Leviticus) brings a cereal offering. It is here described independently but usually accompanied the animal sacrifices (cf. Nu. 15:1–16). The main ingredient was fine flour. Consequently cereal offering is preferable to AV 'meat offering'. The flour is usually mixed with oil (7:10; cf. 5:11) and may have oil poured on it (vv. 6, 15); frankincense is placed on it. It may be either uncooked or cooked. 2 The priest takes a handful to burn on the altar, which handful must contain all the frankincense. This portion is called the memorial (Heb. 'azkārâ), probably because the frankincense (lᵉḇônâ), being one of the four elements in the holy incense (Ex. 30:34) which was offered on the golden altar twice daily by the priest for all the people at the hour of prayer, was intended to serve the same purpose in the case of the individual worshipper and bring him into remembrance before God. Cf. the headings of Pss. 38 and 70, which indicate that they were to be recited at the time of the offering of this memorial.

3 The smallest cereal-offering, one-tenth of an ephah (6:20), was more than 3 quarts. Since a 'handful', which was the amount to be burnt on the altar as a fire-offering, would be a relatively small part of it, it is stated here that the remainder is most holy and is to be the portion of the priests. This means that the priest's portion was to be eaten only by male members of his family and in a holy place, i.e. within the court of the Tabernacle (6:16; cf. 10:12f.). This was also the rule for the sin-offering (6:25–29), and the guilt-offering (7:16), and the bread of the Presence (24:9). It did not apply to the burnt-offering for the obvious reason that that offering was wholly consumed on the altar. On the other hand, the peace-offering was holy. The entire family of the priest might eat of this portion, and most of the sacrifice became the portion of the offerer and was to be eaten by him, his family and his needy friends or dependents (Dt. 12:11–18). It must be eaten in a clean place, but not necessarily within the court of the Tabernacle.

11–16 Salt is to be used with all the sacrifices. Salt stands for permanence, for incorruption. Hence the expression, the salt of the covenant with your God (cf. Nu. 18:19; 2 Ch. 13:5). Leaven and honey may not be used with the fire-offerings; they may not be placed on the altar. But both may be offered as first fruits (cf. Ex. 23:16f.; 34:22f.; Lv. 23:17f.). This seems intended to guard against the inference that leaven and honey were unclean in themselves. Ex. 12:39 states definitely that the reason for eating unleavened bread when Israel went out of Egypt was that they went forth in haste and had no time to leaven it. The meal, the oil and the wine of the drink-offerings (which is not mentioned here, but frequently or usually accompanied the meal-offerings), were the three most important elements in the daily food of the people, frequently summarized in the phrase, 'grain, and wine, and oil' (e.g. Dt. 12:17). Consequently the cereal-offering and the oil which went with it and the accompanying drink-offering constituted an oblation of the daily food of the people. In offering it they recognized that they received their daily food from God. Oil, in view of its use in connection with the anointing of the priests and in the golden lampstand, symbolized also the gracious presence of the Holy Spirit in illumination and sanctification.

3:1–17 The peace-offering. (See also under 7:11–34.) 1 If a man's offering is. . . . Like the burnt-offering, the peace-offering may be voluntary. The animal may be male or female, and must be without blemish. Like all the other fire-offerings, it differs from the burnt-offerings in this respect that only part is burnt on the altar. This portion is carefully described. 3, 4 It consists of the fat which is upon the internal organs, together with the kidneys and the appendage of the liver. 9 In the case of the sheep, the fat tail is included. This was regarded as a luxury, and might weigh, in the case of the adult animals, 10–15 lb. or even more. These details are repeated in the case of the sin-offering (4:8f., 19, 26–35) and also apply to the guilt-offering (7:3f.).

16 The reason is that it is food offered by fire for a pleasing odour. All fat is the Lord's. 17 The solemn injunction is added that the prohibition of eating the fat or the blood is to be perpetually observed. A perpetual statute throughout your generations is an expression which occurs 17 times in Leviticus. Dt. 12:15f., 21–24, however, makes no mention of the fat but only of the blood. Nevertheless, it is not to be regarded as modifying this perpetual statute. The cases are quite distinct. The killing and eating described in Deuteronomy is not a peace-offering. It is not made at the altar, but within 'any of your towns' (Dt. 12:15). The blood is poured out on the ground and covered with earth. Finally, the 'unclean' (Dt. 12:15, 22) may eat of it as well as the 'clean', a permission which proves conclusively that Dt. 12 is not dealing with the peace-offering at all (cf. Lv. 7:20f.). Since the term 'peace-offering' apparently implies that the worshipper is in a state of reconciliation with God (otherwise he would not be permitted to eat of the flesh of his offering), it is to be noted that the laying on of hands is stressed (vv. 2, 8, 13) as well as the manipulation of the blood. All the fire-offerings were expiatory. The failure to provide for the substitution of a bird in the case of a poor man is noticeable. The reason is probably that since the rite was a sacred meal which the offerer was expected to share with his family and friends, especially the poor and needy, a bird would not be adequate for the purpose; and the poor man, who could not afford a sheep or goat, might and should be invited to partake of the peace-offerings presented by his well-to-do friends and neighbours.

4:1 – 5:13 The sin-offering. (See also under 6:24–30.) 4:2, 3 If any one sins . . . then let him offer (cf. 5:15). The sin- and guilt-offerings are obligatory as atonement for specific sins. The sins are sins of ignorance or error. The man has sinned unwittingly and has done something which the Lord has commanded not to be done (cf. vv. 13, 22, 27). The list of such sins given in 5:1–4 indicates that more than mere ignorance is involved. Such uncleanness as is described, e.g., in 11:24–28 (cf. 17:15f.) is removed simply by washing and abstaining from acts of worship (which involve presence at the Tabernacle) until sunset. But if a man has contracted such uncleanness without being aware of it (and 'it is hidden from him', 5:2) and has consequently failed to comply with the law of purification (11:27f.), then he has sinned and is guilty. When he comes to know it, then he must offer a sin-offering. Here the sin is clearly one of ignorance. But on the other hand, failure to come forward to testify to a crime when witnesses are publicly summoned may be due to any one of several reasons, as may also the case of the rash oath. These may be sins of infirmity or weakness, without being sins of defiance (the 'high hand') for which there is no remission.

In ch. 4 the sin-offering is considered with special reference to the status of the one whose sin is to be expiated: the anointed priest (i.e. the high priest, 8:12) (vv. 3–12); the whole congregation (vv. 13–21); a ruler (vv. 22–26); one of the common people (vv. 27–35). Guilt varies according to rank. 3 The anointed priest occupies a position of great importance. He is one of the people, but he represents all the people. Hence his sin brings guilt upon all of them. 5–7 Since he ministers in holy things and by virtue of his office is permitted to enter the Holy Place, his sin has profaned the Holy Place and atonement must be made in the Holy Place. Blood must be brought into the Holy Place and sprinkled toward the veil and placed on the horns of the gold altar. 13–21 The same ritual is to be performed when all the congregation sins, apparently because Israel, ideally considered, is a 'kingdom of priests' (Ex. 19:6), and the Lord dwells in her midst. In this case the laying on of hands must be performed by the elders as representing the people. In the case of the lay individual, whether a ruler (v. 22) or one of the common people (v. 27; RV mg. 'people of the land'), the blood is not brought into the Holy Place, but applied to the horns of the altar of burnt sacrifice and poured out beside it. The ruler offers a male goat, the common man a goat or a ewe-lamb. In all cases the fat is burnt on the altar as in the case of the peace-offerings (vv. 10, 31). But with regard to the rest of the sacrifice an important distinction is to be observed. In the case of the animals whose blood has been brought into the Holy Place, the rest of the flesh is to be burned outside the camp, in a clean place where the ashes of the sacrifices are poured out (v. 12). The principle involved is that the one for whom the sin-offering is presented must not partake of any of it (cf. 6:24–30). The priest may not do this when making atonement for his own sin, nor when he makes atonement for the whole congregation of which he is a member. Cf. Heb. 13:10–13.

5:1–6 specifies, as we have seen, certain sins as requiring a sin-offering: failure to come forward to testify when summoned, uncleanness through contact with the carcase of an unclean animal or with the uncleanness of a human being, or taking a rash oath. All of these being joined together by or may be regarded as forming a protasis, the apodosis of which begins with v. 5. They are treated as sins of ignorance (see 4:13; 5:2, 3, 4). So when he realizes his guilt, or it is brought to his attention, he is to confess it and bring his guilt offering . . . for the sin . . . for a sin offering. This rendering seems to identify the sin- and the guilt-offerings; and AV in its chapter summary treats 5:1–13 as relating to the guilt-offering. There is obviously a close connection between them. For the words 'and is guilty' ('āšēm) come from the same root as 'guilt-offering' ('āšām), and are used in 4:13, 22, 27 of sins which require a sin-offering, and in 5:17; 6:4 of those which require a guilt-offering. But since the difference seems to lie in the fact that the guilt-offering requires and must be preceded by restitution, and since restitution is not mentioned until 5:14f., it seems best to regard the description of the guilt-offering as beginning with 5:14. It is true, of course, that the mention of the guilt-offering already in 5:6 is somewhat confusing, if this special form of sin-offering is not discussed as such until 5:14f. But this may be intended to indicate the close connection between the two. The RV mg. rendering 'for his guilt' instead of his guilt offering is doubtful, to say the least.

7 Since the sin-offering is obligatory in such cases as have been stated, due allowance is made in the case of the poor who cannot afford a costly offering. Instead of the lamb the offerer may present two turtledoves or two young pigeons. One is to be offered as a sin-offering; the other as a burnt-offering. Since in the case of the sin-offering all the flesh except the fat became the portion of the priest (6:26), the explanation is probably correct, that because of the difficulty or impossibility of removing the fat in the case of the bird, the flesh of the one bird was wholly consumed on the altar as representing the Lord's portion of the sin-offering (but called a burnt-offering, because it was wholly consumed on the altar) and the other given to the priest as representing his portion of the sin-offering. This would account for the requirement that two birds be presented.

11 In the case of the extremely poor a further concession is made: a cereal-offering may be substituted for the animal sacrifice. Being a sin-offering it differed from the usual cereal-offering in an important respect: it was offered without oil and without frankincense. 12 Furthermore the handful which was offered as a memorial was burnt on the altar upon the offerings by fire to the Lord. This clearly gave it the value of a bloody sacrifice, by virtue of its being mingled with the fire-offerings which were on the altar. Hence it could be called a sin offering, and in offering it the priest made atonement for sin. In this way, what appears to be an exception to the principle that 'without the shedding of blood is no forgiveness of sins' (Heb. 9:22) really ceases to be an exception but rather serves to illustrate the principle of vicarious substitution which it is the main object of the ritual of sacrifice to illustrate and enforce.

5:14 – 6:7 The guilt-offering. (See also under 7:1–10.) The distinctive feature of the guilt-offering is, as we have seen, that it is made in the case of a sin which requires restitution, and restitution must precede the performing of the sacrifice. Two cases are specified.

5:15, 16 The first is the withholding of the holy things of the Lord, i.e. of such tithes, offerings, firstlings, etc. as belonged to God and must either be presented to the priest or redeemed. 17 The second case had to do with acts which the Lord has commanded not to be done. Since the same phrase is used here as in 4:2, 13, 22, 27, the difference must consist in the fact that the trespass requires restitution.

6:1–7 The next section deals with acts which involve injustice or injury to one's fellow-men. In all these cases the property withheld is to be restored with the addition of one-fifth of its value, a fine which both served to reimburse the rightful owner and to punish the guilty party. Cf. Nu. 5:6–8. The offering in every case is a ram (cf. 19:21f.), also called a 'male lamb' (14:12), 'a male lamb a year old' (Nu. 6:12). The trespass-offering formed part of the ritual for the cleansing of the leper (Lv. 14:12) and of the Nazirite (Nu. 6:12).

6:8 – 7:38 The portion of the priest and of the offerer

Up to this point, except in the case of the cereal-offering (2:10; cf. 5:13), attention has been focused on the Godward side of the sacrifices: the manipulation of the blood and the portions to be consumed upon the altar or burned outside the camp. A series of laws is now given which deal particularly with the portion of priest and offerer. This subject is introduced by the words Command Aaron and his sons (v. 9) and each topic commences with the words this is the law of (vv. 9, 14, 25, etc.). Each of the laws already discussed is now dealt with from this angle.

6:8–13 The burnt-offering. (See also under 1:3–17.) Since the entire animal is consumed on the altar, there are only two matters of importance: the disposal of the ashes and the tending of the altar-fire. This fire is never to be allowed to go out. It is the sacred fire kindled on the altar by God Himself. Furthermore the burnt-offering is to burn continually upon the altar as the token of Israel's consecration to

God. The statement that the burnt-offering shall burn during the night indicates that this law has the continual burnt-offering (Ex. 29:38–42) primarily in view.

6:14–18 The cereal-offering. (See also under 2:1–16.) 15 With the exception of the memorial, the entire offering goes to the officiating priest. 16 Like the sin- and guilt-offerings, it is most holy and must be eaten in a holy place, i.e. within the courts of the Tabernacle (cf. v. 26). 18 Follow AV, 'shall be holy'. Cf. 6:27, RSV. This apparently means that those who by virtue of their office are entitled to eat of the sacrifice are to remember that they may do so only if ceremonially clean. What applies to the laity (7:20) would be even more essential in the case of the priest and his sons. The eating of the priest's portion of the cereal-, sin- and guilt-offerings was restricted to males (6:18, 29; cf. 7:6; Nu. 18:8–10).

6:19–23 To the law of the cereal-offering of the people there is added a brief statement regarding the continual cereal-offering for the priests. It is to be offered by the anointed priest (Aaron or his successor in office) perpetually, morning and evening. It would seem to be a kind of priestly counterpart of the perpetual burnt-offering. Since it is offered for the priests, no part of it can be eaten by them; it is to be wholly burnt.

6:24–30 The sin-offering. (See also under 4:1 – 5:13.) In the case of this sacrifice, all the flesh except the fat became the portion of the officiating priest: 26 the priest who offers it for sin shall eat it. The holiness of this portion is particularly stressed. It is most holy and everything that touches it must be or becomes holy. This applies even to the vessel in which it is cooked. 27 Here, where the reference is to things, whatever is the preferable rendering, although RSV mg. gives 'whoever'. Shall be holy, i.e. be treated as holy and therefore withdrawn from common use. 28 It must be thoroughly washed or, if made of earthenware, be broken. 29 Every male of the priests may eat of the sin-offering. 30 But again it is pointed out that this is not permissible when the offering is made for the priest himself.

7:1–10 The guilt-offering. (See also under 5:14 – 6:7.) Since nothing has been said in the earlier passage about the Lord's portion in this sacrifice, the law as already stated for the peace-offering (3:3f.) and for the sin-offering (4:8–10), instead of simply being appealed to, as, e.g., in 4:26, is repeated in detail (7:2–5). It is then stated that the portion of the priest is the same in this offering as in the case of the sin-offering. Everything except the Lord's portion goes to the priest. The cereal-offerings referred to in this connection are the cereal-offerings which accompanied the animal sacrifices just mentioned.

7:11–34 The peace-offering. (See also under 3:1–17.) The peace-offering is the only one of the sacrifices (burnt, sin, guilt, peace) of which the offerer is permitted to partake. Consequently, the Lord's portion, the priest's portion and the offerer's portion are carefully distinguished. The Lord's portion is the fat, which is burned on the altar (vv. 22–25). The priest's portion (vv. 30–34) consists of the 'breast' and the 'thigh' (whether fore-leg or hind-leg is meant is not certain). The manipulation, waving and offering (AV 'heaving'), apparently signified that the offerer gave these portions to God through His priest, whose portion they thus became. All the rest of the flesh becomes the portion of the offerer, but with certain restrictions. 15, 16 If the offering is a vow or a free-will offering, any remainder may be eaten on the second day. But if it is for thanksgiving, it can be eaten only on the day of sacrifice. What is not eaten is to be burnt. One object of this requirement was clearly to encourage a generous and hospitable spirit, the inviting of friends or neighbours, especially the poor and needy, to share in this joyful occasion (Dt. 12:12).

With the sacrifice the offerer is to present cakes of several different kinds. 12 Some are made with or mingled with oil and are unleavened. 13 But he is also to offer cakes of leavened bread. 14 The words from each offering indicate that the priest is to receive both leavened and unleavened cakes as his portion, together with the manipulated offerings, which are his. Since the daily food of the people included leavened bread, this would indicate the hallowing and offering of a portion of their daily food to God in the person of His priest. But leavened bread could not of course be placed on the altar. It should be noted that these cakes are not a cereal-offering (minḥâ). No incense is placed on them and no portion is burnt on the altar. They simply accompany the peace-offering and are partaken of by both priest and people. The priest's portion is called an offering. It is particularly stressed that the waved and offered portions belonged to the priests by a perpetual statute. They are called the 'anointing-portion' (v. 35, RV) of the priests because these portions were assigned to them on the day of their consecration to the priesthood. While the peace-offering is holy, it is not 'most holy' (cf. 7:6). This is indicated by the fact that it is to be slain in the court (3:2), and can be partaken of by the offerer and by any 'clean' person. The idea which is most prominent in connection with this sacrifice is that of joyous communion with God, and of fellowship with one another in this act of worship.

7:35–38 The divine origin of the laws recalled. This is the portion. . . . This is the law. This elaborate treatment of the sacrifices is summed up in verses which draw attention to the fact that they are the divine perpetual provision for Aaron and his sons, and which stress the nature of their origin as being commanded by the Lord at Sinai.

The significance of the ritual

As we study these sacrifices we are impressed with the clearness with which they point forward to and have their fulfilment in the redemptive work of Christ. In the holy supper, the Christian remembers the death of Christ as his sin- and guilt-offering, a sacrifice made once for all at Calvary and in which he can neither participate nor share. He has communion with Christ as his Passover and peace-offering, as he partakes of the sacred symbols of His broken body and shed blood, even drinking of the cup, because the wine of the sacrament symbolizes the blood which was shed to atone for sin and which has become the source and fountain of life for every believer (Jn. 6:53). He dedicates himself anew to His service by presenting his own body a living sacrifice (the burnt-offering) to his Lord. And he looks forward to the coming forth of his great High Priest, from the heavenly Temple into which He has entered, to complete and crown His glorious redemption by receiving unto Himself His redeemed ones who are keeping the feast until He comes. See also the note on the NT interpretation of the Day of Atonement (pp. 156f.).

In view of the practical universality of some form of sacrifice among ancient peoples, the the question has naturally been often discussed as to a possible connection between the Mosaic cultus and the practices of the neighbouring peoples. That there should be certain resemblances is only to be expected. But these should be estimated in the light of such considerations as the following.

The Pentateuch represents the Mosaic ritual as a direct revelation from God: 'the Lord said to Moses'. It repeatedly warns the people against adopting the customs and practices of the Egyptians or of the Canaanites. Its antecedents, where they exist, are to be found in the practices of the ancestors of Israel, going back to the earliest times. There are differences which are so thoroughgoing that they far outweigh any surface resemblances. These differences are both negative and positive. On the negative side we may note that there is no connection with divination or augury; no religious frenzy, self-mutilations, or sacred prostitution, sensual and orgiastic fertility rites being utterly forbidden; no human sacrifices; no sacrifices for the dead; no appeal to quid pro quo motive. On this last point we may note further that the amount of the offering was immaterial. The law 'prescribes for the whole year not quite 1,300 animals as public sacrifices, or on the average three or four daily'. Hecatombs were of no avail (Mi. 6:7).

On the positive side the most important differences are the emphasis on the ethical—the sinfulness of sin and the necessity of atonement; the necessity of a right attitude on the part of the offerer, with the stress on repentance and loyal obedience to the law of God; the unique sacredness of the blood as representing the life of the animal accepted in substitution for the offerer as the propitiation for his sins. All these considerations taken together show that, whatever the resemblances, the Mosaic ritual breathes a quite different spirit from that of the cults of other nations, and is essentially unique.

8:1 – 10:20 THE CONSECRATION OF AARON AND HIS SONS

This narrative stands in close relation to that in Ex. 28, 29. We have seen that in Exodus the construction of the Tabernacle is dealt with three times. Chs. 25–30 deal mainly with its construction and furnishing but include instructions regarding the vestments of the priests and their consecration (chs. 28, 29); chs. 35–39 deal with the execution of the instructions regarding the Tabernacle, and ch. 40 with its erection and its acceptance by God. We might have expected that the account of the consecration of the priests would follow immediately, as the natural sequel of the dedication of the Tabernacle, and form a part of Exodus. But since the chief function of the priests is to offer sacrifice and also because the offering of sacrifice on their behalf formed an indispensable part of their own consecration, the manual of sacrifice given in Lv. 1–7 is very properly made to precede this important section.

2 The abruptness of the language, Take Aaron and his sons with him, and the garments, and the anointing oil, and the bull . . . and the two rams, and the basket of unleavened bread carries us back directly to Ex. 29:1–3 where all these things are enumerated. Hence the use of the definite article. That this rite is to be regarded as the conclusion of the consecration of the Tabernacle and a continuation of Ex. 29–40 is also indicated by the frequency of the phrase as the Lord commanded Moses or its equivalent (15 times) which runs like a refrain through those chapters. The unique position of Moses (cf. Ex. 28, 29), who was over the whole house of God as a servant (Nu. 12:7; Heb. 3:2, 5), is made clear. Thus Moses offers Aaron's sin-offering (8:14–17); and the wave breast of the offering of consecration, which would normally have been the portion of the officiating priest, becomes Moses' portion (v. 28; cf. Ex. 29:26).

3 The ritual of consecration to the priesthood and investiture with office was elaborate and impressive; and it was performed in the presence of all the congregation at the door of the tent of meeting. 5 Note the solemn introduction: This is the thing which the Lord has commanded to be done. 6–9 Aaron and his sons were first washed with water, and Aaron was then arrayed in his holy garments (cf. Ex. 28). 10–11 Then Moses anointed the Tabernacle, the altar and all its vessels, including the laver. 12 After that he poured oil on Aaron's head (cf. Ps. 133:2). The purpose was sanctification and consecration. 13 Having clothed Aaron's sons, 14–17 he proceeded to offer a sin-offering, 18–21 a burnt-offering, and 22–29 a consecration-offering. The latter is the only one not mentioned in the manual. The Hebrew term is millu'îm, literally 'fillings', because 'to fill the hand(s)' is the technical term for investing with office. 31 It resembled the peace-offering in that the ones for whom it was offered were permitted to partake of the flesh. But in this case the special portion of the priest, the waved breast and offered (AV 'heaved') thigh, could not be eaten by Aaron and his sons, because the offering was made on their behalf by Moses. So the former was assigned to Moses as his portion (v. 29), since he acted as priest, and the latter was burned on the altar (vv. 25, 28).

Aaron and his sons laid their hands upon the head of the sacrificial animal in the case of all of these offerings as a sign that they were offered on their behalf. But it is significant that the blood of the sin-offering was used to cleanse and sanctify the altar at which the priests were to minister. The placing of the blood of consecration on ear, thumb and toe (vv. 23, 24), the sprinkling of oil mingled with sacrificial blood on Aaron and his sons (v. 30) and the pouring of oil on Aaron's head (v. 12), symbolized the consecration and sanctification in varying degree to holy office and use. 33, 34 Aaron and his sons were not to go out from the door of the tent of meeting during the seven days of their consecrating, and the same sacrifices were to be repeated on each of the seven days. Consequently an exception was made to the rule regarding the eating of the peace-offerings which could be eaten on the day after they were offered (7:15–18). These were to be eaten the same day. During these seven days Moses performed the same sacrifices on each day, and Aaron and his sons remained in the court of the Tabernacle.

9:1–24 Aaron takes up his office

1 On the eighth day, i.e. the day which marked the end of their consecration, Moses called Aaron and his sons. Called suggests the solemnity of the occasion. Every act performed by Aaron is commanded by Moses. 5 The whole congregation is brought together to stand before the Lord so that the Lord may appear to them and manifest His glory (vv. 4, 6, 23f.) as a sign of His approval and ratification of everything that has been done (cf. Ex. 40:34f.).

7 The sacrifices which Aaron performed for himself and his sons and for the people—Aaron and his sons were Israelites first of all—were a sin-offering and a burnt-offering (vv. 2, 8, 12). Those which he performed for the people were a sin-, a burnt-, a cereal- and a peace-offering (vv. 3, 4). Since the ritual has already been described, detailed discussion is not needed. It is to be noted, however, that the order followed here is apparently the regular, and we may say the logical, order for the offerings—sin-, burnt-peace-offering. Thus the three basic ideas are emphasized: first, atonement for sin, then dedication and consecration of life, and finally communion with God in the eucharistic meal. In Lv. 14:10–20 the order of the offerings of the cleansed leper is guilt-offering (vv. 12–18), sin-offering (v. 19), burnt-offering and cereal-offering (v. 20). Cf. 14:21–32 where the same order is prescribed. This would indicate that the offering which involved restitution, if offered, came first of all, preceding even the sin-offering.

22 After all the sacrifices had been offered, Aaron blessed the people. He did this while still standing by the altar. The blessing was probably the formula of blessing given in Nu. 6:22f. 23 Then Moses and Aaron went into the tent of meeting. The reason for this is not stated. But it is proper to infer that at this time Moses placed Aaron in charge of the Holy Place, the lampstand, the table of the bread of the Presence and the altar of incense, and instructed him as to his duties, all of which Moses had performed from the day of setting up the Tabernacle (Ex. 40). Then they came forth and both blessed the people. And the glory of the Lord was manifested, as on the day of the setting up of the Tabernacle. 24 The fire which burnt up the sacrifices was the sacred fire which was not to be allowed to go out. The word shouted implies joy and rejoicing. But the joy was mingled with awe, for they fell on their faces in worship before the Lord.

10:1–20 Sacrilege and its consequences

In this historical section, the account of the consecration of Aaron and his four sons is followed at once by the record of the sacrilege which led to the tragic death of the two oldest who had beheld the glory of the Lord in the Mount (Ex. 24:1). 15 That this event followed immediately and is to be regarded as the sequel of the ceremony of consecration is indicated by the reference to the goat of the sin-offering. This must be the offering referred to already in 9:3,15.

17, 18 Its blood had not been carried into the Holy Place as was done with Aaron's own sin-offering. It was the sin-offering for the people and the flesh was the priests' portion. Consequently its flesh should have been eaten by the priests in the Holy Place. The reason given is very significant: It . . . has been given to you that you may bear (RV mg. 'take away') the iniquity of the congregation, to make atonement for them before the Lord. Cf. Ex. 28:12, 29, 30, 38. The function of the priests was one of mediation. This seems to mean that the priests by eating the sin-offering exhibited God's gracious acceptance of the sacrifice just as, by permitting the offerer to partake of his peace-offering, He indicated His acceptance of both gift and giver. Instead it had been burnt (whether on the altar or outside the camp is not stated). This may mean either that the surviving sons of Aaron could not eat of their portion under such terrible circumstances, or that they did not dare to do so because they felt themselves to be involved in, or contaminated by, the sin of their brethren, since all four were priests. They had therefore burnt the carcase of the goat which was the people's oblation, even as they had been required to burn the flesh of their own sin-offering, outside the camp (9:11).

That they erred in this is made clear by vv. 17f. 20 indicates that whether Aaron's scruples were primarily those of a father or those of a priest, the reason or excuse which he gave for the conduct of his surviving sons, and which apparently reflected his own attitude, was regarded by Moses as satisfactory. Mercy joined with judgment!

1 The exact nature of the sin of Nadab and Abihu is not fully explained. Note the words, Now Nadab and Abihu . . . took. Nothing has been said in chs. 8 and 9 about the offering of incense. They are represented as acting entirely on their own initiative and not at the command of Moses. Offered unholy fire (cf. Ex. 30:9); apparently fire not taken from the bronze altar. Both of them did it. The offering of incense on the golden altar was the duty of the high priest (Ex. 30:9) or of one of the priests (Lk. 1:9). For them to take precedence over their father in the first performance of this solemn function was an act of presumption. For the two of them to undertake it at the same time suggests rivalry and jealousy. Their act may also have been presumptuous because the time for offering incense (morning or evening) had not arrived. These and still other elements may have entered into this act of sacrilege. The occasion was so solemn and the ritual had been performed with such care, everything being done 'as the Lord commanded', that such impulsive and arbitrary departure from it as Nadab and Abihu were guilty of must have been highly presumptuous and sacrilegious.

8–11 Significant in this connection is the special revelation and prohibition which is made directly to Aaron and not through Moses. It is at least possible, though by no means certain, that we are to infer from the introduction at this point of this law prohibiting the use of wine or strong drink by the ministering priest (cf. Ezk. 44:21) that Nadab and Abihu acted as they did because they were under the influence of liquor. Whatever the explanation, the incident is a solemn warning against every sin of presumption, self-assertion and levity.

In view of the definite statements which are made in the manual regarding the portions of the animal and vegetable offerings which are to be given to the priest, it is rather remarkable that there is no corresponding statement about the drink-offering. It would be natural to infer that a portion of the drink-offering was poured out on or beside the altar and that the rest would be assigned to the priest as his portion to be drunk with his meat and his bread after his service at the altar was completed. The analogy of the Passover (cf. Mt. 26:29) would favour this. But according to Jewish tradition all the drink-offering was poured out; either on the altar of burnt sacrifice (Ex. 30:9 might imply this), or at the foot of the altar (Ecclus. 50:15), or perhaps part on the altar and the rest at its base. 10, 11 The reason for this perpetual rule is that the priests may be able to distinguish between the holy and the common, and between the unclean and the clean, i.e. observe carefully all the ritual and ceremonial requirements of the law, and that they may teach the people of Israel all the statutes of the law. See Dt. 17:11; 24:8; 33:10; cf. Mi. 3:11.

This whole tragic incident may properly be regarded as intended to impress on Israel, both priests and people, the holiness of their God and to warn them against any presumption or laxity in performance of the law of sacrifice which is so carefully stated in chs. 1–7. It also taught the important and needed lesson that no man is indispensable to God. Four priests were indeed very few to perform the service of a sanctuary which was to be the centre of worship for several million persons. Yet God put away half of their number at the very outset for disobedience. God is able of the 'stones to raise up children to Abraham'.

This terribly impressive event concludes what has been called 'the law of the sanctuary' and we pass on now to consider 'the law of daily life'.

11:1 – 15:33 LAWS REGARDING UNCLEANNESS

'Unclean' (defiled) is the conspicuous word in this group of chapters. It occurs more than 100 times. Almost equally noteworthy is the rare occurrence of the word 'sin' (evil, wickedness). This indicates that here the emphasis is on the ceremonial rather than on the ethical. Yet it does not follow that uncleanness is a matter of minor importance. Failure to do what God has commanded is sin, whether the act be ceremonial or moral. Unclean is the antithesis of holy. Everything which is inconsistent with God's holiness may be described as uncleanness. It may be purely ceremonial, as the touching of a dead body, or it may be crimes which are so shocking to the moral sense that it is a shame even to speak of them (18:20–25). In most cases the uncleanness is quite temporary, lasting only 'until the evening' (11:25), and in certain cases requires the washing of the garments or of the person in water. But it may cover a considerable period of time and require the presenting of a sin-offering. Ceremonial purity was indispensable for a holy people. The uncleannesses that are dealt with are of several kinds.

11:1–47 Uncleanness due to animals

This subject is discussed under two aspects, living animals as food and contact with dead animals.

11:1–23 The question considered from the standpoint of diet. Cf. on Dt. 14:1–21. These verses prescribe the flesh which may or may not be eaten. Four classes are distinguished:

2–8 Quadrupeds. Only those animals which divide the hoof completely and which chew the cud may be eaten. This rule is precisely stated and then four examples of animals which do not meet the requirements are given: camel, rock badger, hare and swine. The hare is not a ruminant, nor is the rock badger (AV 'coney', which is generally identified with the rock badger, Hyrax Syriacus). Both are rodents. But the fact that their jaws are constantly in motion gives the appearance of chewing the cud. This indicates clearly that the description is not intended to be strictly scientific, but simple and practical. The clean animals are not named here (cf. Gn. 7:2), but Dt. 14:4, in listing them, adds to the three domestic animals (ox, sheep and goat) seven of the wild animals which are also members of the ruminant family (the Pecora, according to present-day classification). For the average Israelite this restricted the meat diet largely to those domestic animals which were used in sacrifice.

9–12 Sea food. Only fish which have both fins and scales may be eaten. This rules out eels, shell-fish, lobster, crab, oyster, frog, etc.

13–19 Birds. This is stated entirely from the negative side. And these you shall have in abomination among the birds introduces a list of twenty, including several species. Dt. 14:11 states positively, but briefly, 'you may eat all clean birds' without naming them, and then gives a list almost identical with the one given here. The clean birds would include doves, pigeons, sparrows. No mention is made of eating eggs (cf. Dt. 22:6f.). Many of the prohibited birds are birds of prey. Birds which fed on carrion, like the kite and vulture, would be especially obnoxious.

20–23 Insects. These are defined as all winged insects that go upon all fours. The phrase 'that go upon all fours' (lit. 'upon four legs') must mean 'those which walk or crawl like a quadruped', since six legs are characteristic of the great class of Insecta. All are banned with the notable exception of four classes of the locust family which are distinguished by their long jumping legs. If the RSV rendering of v. 23 is followed then the phrase which have four feet cannot mean the same as v. 21 that go on all fours, i.e. it must be taken as referring to insects which do not have the large jumping legs. By inserting the word other in v. 23 AV and RSV assume the two phrases to be more or less synonymous. This is probably the correct meaning. The fact that a sweeping statement is made after a definite exception to it has been already given should not confuse the careful reader.

11:24–42 The question considered from the standpoint of physical contact. The words 'carcase' (11 times) and 'when they are dead' (twice) indicate that the reference is to dead animals. The AV renders v. 26 by 'the carcases of every beast' taking the position that contact with a living animal, such as the camel or the ass, which were unlawful for eating, did not render one ceremonially unclean. This became an issue between Pharisees and Sadducees in later times, the latter holding that contact even with the living animal produced uncleanness.

29–38 enlarge upon vv. 20–23, which have merely stated the general prohibition and the important exceptions in the case of winged creeping things. 29, 30 Here eight kinds of swarming things are particularly specified as abominable. Yet, as has been indicated, the emphasis seems to be on the contamination produced by their carcases. They are clearly unclean as food. 31 But also their dead bodies render unclean; whoever touches them when they are dead. . . . 35–37 The defilement extends to any part of their carcase. 41 The prohibition of the eating of the flesh of swarming things is sweeping and comprehensive. The law regarding uncleanness through contact with the carcases of any creeping thing may perhaps be regarded as singling out these eight animals for special mention because contact with their carcases was especially likely to take place. It is to be noted that in this chapter the rare word abomination (šeqeṣ) is used of the eating of sea animals (vv. 10–12), birds (v. 13), winged creeping things (vv. 20, 23), and creeping things (vv. 41, 43). This confirms the conclusion that vv. 24–38 refer to uncleanness occasioned by contact with dead animals, and that v. 41 resumes the discussion of dietary laws.

11:43–47 The people of God must be holy. This law regarding man's relation to the animal kingdom over which he has been given dominion is followed by a most impressive sanction. 44, 45 For I am the Lord your God; consecrate yourselves therefore, and be holy, for I am holy. . . . For I am the Lord who brought you up out of the land of Egypt, to be your God; you shall therefore be holy, for I am holy (cf. 1 Pet. 1:15–17). The necessity of holiness was first stressed in connection with the eating of those portions of the sacrifices which were for the priests and the people, and also in connection with the entire ritual of the consecration of Aaron and his sons. Now in this section the same command is most impressively applied to the daily life of the entire people. Cf. 19:2; 20:7, 8, 26; 21:6–8, 15, 23; 22:9, 16, 32 where the same or similar sanctions occur.

46, 47 This section then concludes with a summary, the closing words of which are important: to make a distinction between the unclean and the clean and between the living creature that may be eaten and the living creature that may not be eaten. Cf. 20:25, 26. The first part of this summary seems to refer to uncleanness through contact with that which is unclean, especially that which is rendered unclean by the fact of death, and the second part to those living things which are proper for food and those which are prohibited.

12:1–8 Uncleanness due to childbirth

The command to be fruitful is given in Gn. 1:28 and renewed to Noah after the Flood (Gn. 9:1). We are expressly told that it was obeyed by the post-diluvian ancestors of Abram (11:11, 13, etc.). The consistent attitude of the OT may be summarized in the words of Pss. 127:3; 128:3f.

Fruitfulness was a sign of divine favour; barrenness was regarded as a reproach (Gn. 30:24). Consequently, the laws given here and elsewhere regarding the marital relationship and parenthood are both impressive and significant. The only adequate explanation of the seeming anomaly presented by the command to be fruitful, the joy attending the realization of parenthood, and the uncleanness which is associated with it and which finds its most pronounced expression in the prolonged purification required of the mother after she has performed the high function of womanhood, must be found in the fact of the Fall and the curse pronounced on woman immediately after it. Pain and suffering were to be the accompaniment of motherhood (Gn. 3:16). Regarding Adam we read: 'When Adam had lived a hundred and thirty years, he became the father of a son in his own likeness after his image' (Gn. 5:3). When this took place Adam was a fallen and sinful being. He was under the curse pronounced by God, 'in the day that you eat of it you shall die' (Gn. 2:17). So of Adam, and of all but one (Enoch) of his descendants mentioned in Gn. 5, the last word spoken is 'and he died'.

From this it follows that, although the birth of a child is a joyous event, it is also a solemn one. For the birth of the child will inevitably be followed ultimately by its death, and by eternal death unless the child is made an heir of life through the redemption which is in Christ. It is in this sense that we must understand David's words, 'Behold, I was brought forth in iniquity and in sin did my mother conceive me' (Ps. 51:5). David is not here reflecting upon the virtue of his own mother; she may have been a paragon among women. He is thinking of that inherited taint, that original sin, which she had transmitted to him and which was the root cause of the grievous sin against womanhood of which he is so painfully conscious at the time of composing the Psalm. Consequently, according to the law, everything connected with parenthood is treated as unclean, and especially as rendering the person unfit for the performance of religious duties. In fact the strictness with which anything which suggests the sexual and sensual is banned from the worship of God (Ex. 19:15; 20:26; Lv. 15:16–18) is one of the most noteworthy characteristics of the religion of Israel and distinguishes it most sharply from the religions of the neighbouring peoples who worshipped gods who were male and female and even made orgiastic (fertility) rites a prominent feature in the worship of these gods.

2–4 In the case of the birth of a male child, the uncleanness of the mother as far as the home is concerned lasts until the eighth day, when the rite of circumcision is to be performed on her son (cf. Gn. 21:4). Then for thirty-three days she is still to be unclean as far as public religious duties are concerned. 5 In the case of the birth of a female child both periods are doubled. No reason is assigned. Since this is described as a period of uncleanness, the explanation is probably to be sought in connection with the considerations mentioned above. It does not seem probable that the reason is purely physical or biological. 6–8 At the termination of this period of forty or eighty days she is to bring a yearling lamb for a burnt-offering and a fowl for a sin-offering, or two fowls, if she cannot afford a lamb. Cf. Lk. 2:23. The specifying of the age of the lamb is exceptional (Ex. 12:5; 29:38; Lv. 9:3; 14:10, etc.), and is usually stated in the case of sacrifices for the feast days. The concluding words are impressive: and the priest shall make atonement for her, and she shall be clean.

For the Christian of today this ancient law has special significance. Christians should realize that marriage ought not to be contracted lightly, that they should marry 'in the Lord' (1 Cor. 7:39) in order that they may claim the promises and blessings of the covenant for their children (1 Cor. 7:14). They may not like to be told that their children are sinful and unclean. But they need to remember that this is so. The view is widely held today that children are born good, that they should be allowed to develop naturally, that self-expression should be encouraged, and discipline and restraint reduced to the minimum. Christian parents who realize the truth set forth here will pray earnestly that the children who have been born in sin may be 'born again', may be regenerated by the Holy Spirit. They pray that they as parents may be enabled to train up their children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. Guidance, restraint, discipline and religious instruction are quite as essential as self-expression, in most cases far more essential.

13:1 – 14:57 Uncleanness due to leprosy

As in the case of the two subjects last discussed, it is important to remember that leprosy is dealt with solely from the standpoint of the uncleanness which it occasions. It is most frequently called in AV, RV 'the plague' (lit. 'stroke') or 'the plague of leprosy' (e.g. 13:2, 3; RSV a leprous disease). The man who has it, or is suspected of having it, is unclean, so unclean that he must be shut up (mentioned 8 times), apparently outside the camp (14:3), while his case is being decided. Then, if the verdict is unfavourable, he must be removed from the camp until he is healed (13:45f.). The possibility of recovery is thus plainly included in the decree of banishment. But it is to be noted that, while elaborate rules are laid down for the recognition of leprosy and for distinguishing true leprosy from other diseases with which it might easily be confused, nothing is said about the treatment of the disease. This has led some to the conclusion that it was incurable, and even that it was not an ordinary disease, but a visitation from God. The cases of Miriam (Nu. 12:10–15), Gehazi (2 Ki. 5:27) and Uzziah (2 Ch. 26:19–23) are appealed to as proof of this. But were such the case it would seem as if the nature of the affliction and the cause of it would have been so plain that the elaborate rules for detecting it might have been dispensed with. Apparently we must distinguish between what we may call ordinary cases and such extraordinary cases as the ones just mentioned.

It is interesting to note that leprosy is not included in the diseases which the Lord threatens as a punishment for apostasy, regarding which it is said 'of which you cannot be healed' (Dt. 28:27, 35). The language of 14:2f., This shall be the law of the leper for the day of his cleansing and if the leprous disease is healed in the leper, seems to make it quite plain that leprosy was not incurable. Otherwise we would have to hold that leper here is to be understood to mean 'the man under suspicion of being a leper', or else that the elaborate ritual for the cleansing of the leper could be performed only in such a case as Miriam's when the hand of God was plainly manifested both in the smiting and the healing.

13:1–46 How leprosy is to be recognized. Detailed discussions of the rules laid down for the detection of the disease cannot be entered into here. It is clear that it was hard to distinguish from a number of other diseases which were common among the Israelites. None of the more frightful symptoms of what we know as leprosy is mentioned here. It may be that the disease differed somewhat from the leprosy of NT times and from the leprosy which became such a scourge in Europe in the Middle Ages. But it is to be remembered that these laws have to do with the detection of the disease in its early stages and also that Aaron's words in pleading with Moses on behalf of Miriam describe with terrible clearness the real nature of the disease and its terrible results: 'Let her not be as one dead, of whom the flesh is half consumed when he comes out of his mother's womb' (Nu. 12:12). And Moses' prayer that God will heal does not necessarily mean that direct supernatural intervention was the only hope for the leper.

13:47–59 Leprosy in garments. A closely related subject is now dealt with in this section. Leprosy in a garment is discussed in connection with leprosy of the body, apparently because it was an immediate concern of the people. Significant is the regard which is shown for the property rights of the people. The destruction of an entire garment might mean serious hardship, especially to the poor (Dt. 24:10–13). So only the corrupted part is to be destroyed (v. 56). Malignant leprosy (vv. 51f.; 14:44); the AV word 'fretting' seems to be used here in the sense of 'gnaw', i.e. make holes, to describe an infection that is not superficial but penetrating. The Hebrew word occurs only in these passages and in Ezk. 28:24, where the reference to briars and thorns favours such a meaning. The LXX and Vulgate render by 'persistent' Some have thought that the reference is to a form of mildew in the case of the garments, and to a form of dry rot in the case of the houses.

14:1–32 Cleansing and restoring the leper. The ritual for the cleansing of the leper is given in detail and is quite elaborate. In some respects it resembles the consecration of the priests (chs. 7–9) and the ritual for the Day of Atonement. It covers a period of seven days, with special rites on the first and eighth. 2–9 Cleansing is specially stressed and this involves shaving of the hair (cf. Nu. 8:7). Hyssop is used as at the Passover (14:4ff.; cf. Ex. 12:22), together with cedarwood and scarlet stuff which are also used in making the water of purification (Nu. 19). 7 The releasing of one of the birds into the open field suggests the sending away of the scapegoat (Lv. 16:21f.). But there may be no connection.

8 The ritual of the first day restores the leper to the camp but not to his home and the intimacies which were associated with it. Note that it was not sacrificial. The blood was not brought to the altar. The rite was one of purification. 10ff. On the eighth day the cleansed man is to offer three lambs in sacrifice: a male lamb for a guilt-offering, a ewe for a sin-offering, a male lamb for a burnt-offering. In the case of the poor, birds may be substituted for lambs as sin- and burnt-offerings. But apparently, as indicated by v. 21, the guilt-offering must be a ram. The ritual of the oil (vv. 15–18, 26–29) is particularly detailed and impressive. It is to be placed on the right ear, thumb and toe of the leper, on which the blood of the guilt-offering has already been placed, and to be sprinkled with the finger of the priest seven times before the Lord. Then the rest of the handful is to be poured out on his head (cf. 8:23f.). This apparently represents the consecration of the restored leper to the service of his covenant God. It suggests an analogy between the admission (in this case, the re-admission) of an unclean person (a Gentile) into the congregation of Israel, God's holy people, and the consecration of an Israelite to the special and peculiarly holy function of a priestly mediator between Israel and their God. Since the leper had for a time been debarred from the community and service of the sanctuary, which involved payment of tithes and offering of sacrifices, a guilt-offering is required to atone for his failure in these respects.

The order of the offering of the sacrifices is guilt-, sin-, burnt-offering. The fact that the offering for these three sacrifices is three tenth parts of fine flour justifies the conclusion that a cereal-offering was to be offered with each of the three sacrifices, since one-tenth was the regular cereal-offering with a lamb (Nu. 29:4; Ex. 29:40).

Although the leper is constantly described as 'unclean' and not as a sinner, despite the fact that the 'stroke' of leprosy may, as in the case of Miriam, be the punishment for grievous sin, it seems proper to see in the fact that leprosy is dealt with so elaborately an indication that this particularly loathsome and intractable disease is to be regarded as a type of that indwelling sin in which all the afflictions and ills of mankind have their cause and origin. If death is the curse pronounced by God upon sin, and contact with death is defiling, then disease which undermines health and is a stepping-stone to death carries with it a certain defilement whether it be infectious in the medical sense or not. We cannot affirm with certainty that the mention of hyssop in Ps. 51 ('Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean') contains an allusion to the cleansing of the leper and justifies the inference that David is thinking of himself as a moral leper. But it seems not improbable.

14:33–57 Leprous houses in the land of Canaan. The leprosy of a house is dealt with separately because it concerns the future. 34 When you come into the land of Canaan. Cf. 19:23; 23:10; 25:2, which also refer to this future time. Israel was at the moment dwelling in tents; and the leprosy of stone houses was a matter which did not yet concern them. The words and I put a leprous disease in a house are decidedly arresting. They suggest, and have been taken to imply, a special supernatural plague visited upon a house because of the sin of its builder (like leprosy in an individual). But it is to be remembered that the Bible frequently ignores secondary causes and agencies. We note here the same regard for property as in the case of the garment. The destruction is to be restricted as much as possible. It is also to be noted that the ritual for the cleansing of the house is the same as that prescribed for the first stage in the cleansing of the leper, that which restored him to the congregation of Israel.

15:1–33 Uncleanness due to issues

Since this chapter deals with matters of sex, it stands in close relation with ch. 12 and must be interpreted on the same general principles. The conditions which are dealt with are both normal and abnormal. But in either case they are treated as defiling. In the case of the former, the uncleanness usually lasts only until sunset and is removed by washing with water. In the latter case, the uncleanness continues for seven days after normal health has been restored. Then the man or the woman shall bring to the priest an offering consisting of two birds, one of which shall be offered as a sin-offering, the other as a burnt-offering (vv. 14f., 29f.; cf. 5:7–10). In both cases it is said that the priest shall make atonement by means of the sacrifices. Whatever the nature of the uncleanness, every person who comes in contact with the unclean person or thing shall bathe, wash his clothes and be unclean until the evening.

The law of Moses refers elsewhere to a number of diseases besides those dealt with here (cf. 26:16, 25; Dt. 28:22, 27f., 35). It is perhaps significant that it does not refer to them here in dealing with the subject of uncleanness. Abnormalities and deformities are dealt with in 21:16ff.; Dt. 23:1. Thus you shall keep the people of Israel separate refers primarily to the uncleannesses mentioned in ch. 15, as is indicated by the summary which follows (vv. 32f.). But it is applicable to all the defilements mentioned in chs. 11–15.

16:1–34 THE DAY OF ATONEMENT

The Day of Atonement (23:27f.; 25:9) is the most important of all the holy ordinances with which the book of Leviticus is concerned, for it was the day on which atonement was made for all the sins of all the congregation of Israel (see vv. 16f., 21f., 30, 33f.). In this respect it stands apart from all other private and public ordinances connected with the worship of Israel. It is also signalized by the fact that it is the only day in the year for which fasting is required: you shall afflict yourselves (vv. 29, 31; 23: 27, 32; Nu. 29:7). This phrase might also be rendered 'humble yourselves'. Arrogant self-sufficiency and self-will were characteristic of Israel from the beginning (cf. Dt. 8:2, 3, 16 where the same verb is used), and it was met with constant reproof and chastening. Fasting would be the outward expression of their sorrow and repentance. In this regard the Day of Atonement stands in marked contrast to the annaul feasts which were times of rejoicing, especially the Feast of Tabernacles (23:40; cf. Dt. 12:7, 12; 16:11, 14).

In view of this, its position in the book may properly be regarded as significant. The fact that the full description of its ritual is given here instead of in Lv. 23 which describes all the feasts, or in Nu. 28, 29, which prescribe the special offerings for each of them, seems to be intended to emphasize both its importance and its uniqueness. It stands by itself among all the public ordinances prescribed for Israel. On the other hand, like many of the other ordinances, it is given a definite occasion or historical setting, the death of Nadab and Abihu for sacrilege (v. 1). In fact some scholars regard the words after the death of the two sons of Aaron as implying so close a connection between this chapter and ch. 10 that they are inclined to regard chs. 11–15 as an insertion. Were this the case, it is difficult to understand why this insertion should consist only of these chapters and not include chs. 17–22 especially since it is in them that the moral element predominates over the ceremonial.

The chapter has both a backward and a forward reference. The one concerns especially Aaron and the priests (cf. Nu. 4:17f.) and is to warn them against sacrilege and the frightful danger which attends it. The other is the application to the people. The grace of God in providing an all-sufficient atonement for sins of ignorance and frailty is set forth before the more heinous transgressions are described. The sins for which there is no forgiveness, which are to be punished by excision or death (see especially ch. 20), stand out in all their moral hideousness in the light of the seven times repeated 'all' of this chapter. The implication is clear that such sins as those for which there is no forgiveness (sins of presumption, AV of the 'high hand') prove the perpetrator to be no true Israelite at all, but a moral leper unworthy of the covenanted mercies of the God of Abraham and Moses. The tendency in rabbinical Judaism has been to make this atonement all-inclusive. But such an interpretation is clearly excluded by the fact that the entire generation of wrath perished for disobedience in the wilderness (cf. Heb. 10:28). Whatever the explanation, the position of this chapter is certainly a significant one.

16:1–10 Aaron's preparation

2 Tell Aaron your brother. Cf. Ex. 28:1ff. It seems clear that the choice of Aaron for this high office was primarily due to his relationship to Moses (Ex. 4:14) as was his choice to be Moses' 'prophet'. It was Moses' intercession which saved Aaron after the sin of the golden calf (Dt. 9:20). The Bible both recognizes (Gn. 21:13) and ignores human relationships (Ex. 32:27). Since Aaron and his sons have been mentioned already about 60 times in Leviticus, the words Aaron your brother may suggest the loving care with which Moses is to impress this law upon him, lest he die. But cf. Ex. 28:1–4. It is this fact which made the attitude of Aaron and Miriam described in Nu. 12:1f. such a personal grief to Moses as well as so serious a challenge to the unique position assigned him by God Himself. The holy place means the Holy of Holies as is indicated by the words within the veil (cf. vv. 3, 16, 17, 20, 27). Every one of the sacrifices described or ordered in chs. 1–15 is included in this prohibition. Most of the ritual of sacrifices was conducted in the court. 3–5 Only exceptionally was the blood of the sacrifices brought into the Holy Place. Now the one occasion on which it may be brought 'within the veil' and into the Holy of Holies is dealt with in careful detail. When he does this, Aaron is to wash himself and then put on linen garments (the symbol of purity) instead of the usual ornate apparel distinctive of the high priest. The sacrifices he is to offer are of two kinds: for himself and his sons, a young bull for a sin offering and a ram for a burnt offering; for the people, two male goats for a sin offering, and one ram for a burnt-offering.

6–10 give a brief and partial summary of the procedure as regards the sin-offerings. The bull and the goats are both presented before the Lord and the lot is cast over the two goats.

16:11–14 The sin-offering for the priests

These verses describe the ritual for Aaron's bull which is presented before the Lord. 11 And shall make atonement for himself and for his house apparently refers to the laying on of hands, either by himself alone as representing also his sons, or by his sons also. 12 He is to fill the entire censer (lit. 'the fullness of the censer') with coals from the altar of burnt-offering and to take two handfuls (lit. 'the fullness of his (two) hands') of incense. 13 There is to be a great cloud of incense sufficient to cover the mercy seat lest he die. The blood is to be sprinkled with his finger upon the front of the mercy seat and before it, seven times.

16:15–19 The people's sin-offering

The ritual for the goat which is the sin-offering of the people is now described. Apparently the cloud of incense in the Holy of Holies suffices for both sin-offerings; and the blood is to be similarly manipulated. The reason for this is stated with great care. 16 Aaron is to make atonement for the holy place, because of the uncleannesses of the children of Israel, and because of their transgressions, all their sins. For their sins have defiled it. 20 Note that this cleansing is to include the entire tent of meeting and the altar of burnt-offering.

16:20–22 The scapegoat

20 The live goat has already been referred to in vv. 8–10. The AV rendering 'scapegoat' and the RV and RSV rendering Azazel in vv. 8 and 10 represent the principal interpretations of the meaning of this remarkable ritual. The former rendering is an ancient one, being supported by the LXX and the Vulgate. It is based on the assumption that the word 'azā'zēl comes from a root 'āzal meaning 'to remove' (such a reduplicated form would be rare, but not without analogy). The chief argument in its favour is that it is scriptural and appropriate. The thought of removal of guilt is closely related to that of atonement for sin. Ps. 103:12, 'As far as the east is from the west, so far does he remove our transgressions from us', perfectly expresses this idea. That this is the meaning is indicated by the emphasis which is placed on the words sent away or let . . . go (vv. 10, 21, 22), wilderness (vv. 10, 21, 22) and solitary land (v. 22; AV 'not inhabited'). The rendering 'Azazel' takes the word as a proper name. In its favour is the fact that 'for Azazel' (v. 10) seems to stand in contrast with 'for the Lord' (v. 9). But if it is the name of a well-known demon of the desert or a name of Satan, it is strange that it should occur only here in the entire Bible. And if the reference is to a demon whom Israel feared, who exerted a powerful influence upon them and needed to be appeased, it is hard to understand why emphasis should be placed on the remoteness of the abode of this menacing being, a remoteness which might increase as Israel journeyed to Palestine. Sin is not a remote but an ever-present factor in the life of man (Gn. 4:7). Furthermore the idea of atonement for sin as involving a ransom or sin-offering to Satan, or to an unknown demon of the desert (and still more the idea of the goat bearing to the demon the tidings that atonement for sin has been made), would involve the recognition of a hostile demonic power. This is expressly forbidden in 17:7. Certainly in a ritual which represented the holiest and most sacred rite of OT religion we should not expect to meet anything which was suggestive of demonism or polythe-

ism. (See article 'Azazel' in The International Standard Bible Encyclopaedia.)

16:23–28 The offerings completed

After Aaron has performed those duties which require him to enter the Holy of Holies, he is to lay aside his linen garments, bathe, and then put on the regular garb of the high priest, which is so fully described elsewhere, and which is stated to be 'for glory and for beauty' (Ex. 28:2). Then he is to come forth from the Holy Place and complete the ritual in the outer court, the offering of his burnt-offering and that for the people, also to burn the fat of the sin-offering since it is only the manipulation of the blood which has thus far been described. This is to be done in the usual manner.

16:29–34 Some further instructions

29 This special day is to be a statute . . . for ever. 34 The rite is to be observed once in the year on the tenth day of the seventh month, and it is to be comprehensive, for the sanctuary and the priests who minister there and for the children of Israel, because of all their sins. In v. 29, for the first time in Leviticus, the stranger (gēr) is mentioned. (See on Dt. 1:16.) While he has no part in this national rite, he is to conform to its requirements (cf. Ex. 12:19, 48f.). The Decalogue and the book of the covenant both recognize and provide for the presence of these 'strangers' in Israel. In view of the privileges which they enjoy they must conform to many of Israel's laws and customs (cf. 17:8, 10, 12, 13, 15).

34 Note that we are told that 'he did as the Lord commanded Moses' (AV; RSV mistranslates the Hebrew here: cf. 24:23 where the construction is the same. This must mean, as stated above, that the national apostasy at Kadesh did not take place until after the first observance of the Day of Atonement. That it could not have been observed subsequent to the apostasy and during the years of wandering is indicated by three facts. First, exclusion from the land was the punishment for refusal to take possession of it. This penalty was paid in full by the generation which transgressed: it was not remitted. Secondly, circumcision was not practised during the years of wandering (Jos. 5:1–9), although it was the indispensable sign and seal of the covenant (Gn. 17:9–14). Thirdly, Am. 5:25f. indicates that Israel fell away into idolatry during this period (cf. Acts 7:42f.).

In view of the singular importance which attaches to this day—the later Jews have called it 'the Day'—it is remarkable that no express reference to its observance is to be found anywhere in the OT (Is. 58:3 is too general to appeal to). This is hard to account for, especially since mention of it would seem to be natural and appropriate in connection with the events described in 1 Ki. 8:2, 65f.; Ezr. 3:1–6; Ne. 8, all of which were important events which took place in the seventh month at about the time of the Day of Atonement. It is to be noted, however, that the OT mentions only four Passovers (those of Joshua, Hezekiah, Josiah, Ezra) in treating of a period of about 1,000 years; also that from the time of the renewal of the covenant by Joshua no mention is made of the covenant rite of circumcision, except by implication (e.g. the Philistines are described as uncircumcised), or in a figurative sense (Je. 6:10; 9:26). The argument from silence, the inference that failure to mention a rite means that it had not yet been introduced, proves too much. It would place the date of the institution of this rite after the time of Ezra and Nehemiah. Furthermore it is to be noted that the sacrifices of this day are the only ones which are directly connected with the ark. The blood of the sin-offerings for Aaron and the people was to be sprinkled on or toward the mercy seat. The Hebrew word for 'mercy seat' is kappōreṯ ('covering' or 'expiation'). It was pre-eminently the place of atonement. Hence the name, yôm kippûr (Day of Atonement). Yet Jeremiah definitely foretells the time when the ark will be forgotten (3:16); and we know that after the Babylonian captivity the ark was not brought back with the other sacred vessels. There was no ark in Zerubbabel's Temple nor in that of Herod. Consequently this connection with the ark points to an early date for the introduction of this rite.

It is particularly to be stressed that while, as we have seen, the OT is practically silent with regard to the post-Mosaic celebration of this all-important rite, the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews represents it as that rite of the Mosaic covenant which most clearly sets forth the atoning work of Christ; both by way of resemblance and of contrast (Heb. 9, 10). The high priest alone could enter the Holy of Holies. He did this 'once a year' (9:7), and he offered sacrifices for himself and for the people, and then he came forth from the sanctuary. The Lord Jesus entered 'once' (9:12, 26; 10:12–14) into the heavenly sanctuary offering once for all His own blood, not for Himself, but only for the sins of others and, having purchased an eternal redemption by His blood, He will come again from the heavenly sanctuary to bless His saints whom He has redeemed. See also the notes on the significance of the sacrificial ritual at the end of the first section (pp. 147f.) and the Introduction (pp. 141f.).

Since the destruction of the Temple (by Nebuchadrezzar and again by Titus) and the loss of the ark made it quite impossible to carry out fully the ritual of sacrifice, which is the aspect particularly stressed both in this chapter in Leviticus and also in Hebrews, later Jews have been forced to regard 'afflicting themselves' (Lv. 16:29, 31), understood to mean repentance, restitution, good works, and suffering, as the only 'atonement' which God requires of the Jew for all his sins. Thus the words, 'without shedding of blood is no remission (Heb. 9:22, AV), which epitomize the meaning of the OT ritual of sacrifice—a ritual which, according to the law, finds its supreme illustration in the Day of Atonement and, according to the gospel, finds its fulfilment in the cross—become a dead letter to the modern Jew, as they do to the Unitarian, because the cross, of which the mercy seat of the ark is the type, is a stumbling-block and a mystery to him.

17:1–16 THE PLACE OF SACRIFICE AND THE SANCTITY OF BLOOD

It has been customary in critical circles for many years to treat chs. 17–26 as a distinct section and to call it 'the holiness code'. To do this destroys the close connection which clearly exists between chs. 16 and 17 and also between ch. 17 and the manual of sacrifice in chs. 1–7. Whatever may be said of chs. 18–26, ch. 17 belongs to what precedes. It may properly be regarded as supplementary, but a climactic supplement or conclusion to the first part of Leviticus.

Since the Day of Atonement exhibits in a superlative degree the significance of sacrifice in the life of the covenant people, and points out the unique sacredness of the blood in that on this one day the sacrificial blood is brought into the Holiest Place and sprinkled on the ark of the covenant itself, to obtain the remission of all the sins of all the people, it is appropriate that in this next chapter the two aspects of sacrifice which specially concern all the people should be particularly emphasized.

The introductory formula is specially impressive. Notice that it is all-inclusive as well as being very emphatic. 2 This is the thing which the Lord has commanded (cf. 8:5; 9:6). 3–7 If any man of the house of Israel. The universal application of the law now to be declared is specially emphasized (cf. vv. 8, 10, 13). Kills; the same word as occurs in 1:5, where it is used of the slaughtering of the animal which has been brought for sacrifice. The reference here is to the domestic animals which were regularly used for that purpose. They are to be brought to the door of the Tabernacle and offered as peace-offerings. This served both to gratify the desire of the people to eat flesh and also established the proprietary right of God, more particularly in those animals which were so often offered to Him in sacrifice. It had two further aims: to prevent eating blood (vv. 10ff.) and also to prevent the sacrificing of these animals in the open field; which is at once defined as offering them to 'he-goats' (RV) or satyrs, an act which was not only idolatry (19:4; 26:1, 30) but was accompanied by orgiastic rites (v. 7). Cf. Ex. 34:15f.; Lv. 20:5f. This indicates that such idolatrous practices were common among the Israelites at the time of the Exodus, having been learned by them in Egypt. The worship of Pan flourished, as we know, in ancient Greece and Rome. Consequently this law was not primarily a requirement that the Israelites sacrifice these animals to the Lord as peace-offerings instead of simply devouring them anywhere they pleased, but rather that they offer them to the Lord instead of sacrificing them to the 'satyrs'. It is the substitution of an act of true worship for one of idolatry and licence. And it shows plainly how deeply the sojourn in Egypt had influenced the life of Israel. This shall be a statute for ever. In its negative aspect, the prohibition of eating with the blood and of idolatrous practices, this statute was irrevocable under the Mosaic dispensation. On its positive side it was later modified by Moses to accord with the changed conditions which would result from settlement in the land (Dt. 12:20–24), changes which affected the letter without changing the spirit of the law. The difference between Leviticus and Deuteronomy here shows clearly that the former preceded the latter and not vice versa.

8, 9 refer more particularly to a 'killing' which is intended to be an act of worship. This is indicated by the specific reference to burnt-offering in addition to sacrifice (i.e. of peace-offerings; see v. 5), since no part of the burnt-offering was used as food.

10 I . . . will cut him off. Usually the passive is used (see vv. 4, 9, 14 and 7:20, 21, 27). Here, as in 20:3, 5, 6, the stronger form is used. This has been understood to mean that the cutting off is to be an act of God. The sacredness of the blood is taught very early. Although in other respects unlimited, the permission given to Noah regarding the eating of flesh was qualified by the words, 'Only you shall not eat flesh with its life, that is, its blood' (Gn. 9:4). Here the fact is repeated three times that the life of the animal is in the blood (vv. 11, 14); and it is to be regarded as sacred because God has made it the means of expiation for sin by requiring that it be presented upon His altar. 13 Consequently, even in the case of animals not suited for sacrifice, the blood must be treated reverently. It must be poured out upon the ground and covered with dust (cf. on Dt. 12:16). 15, 16 make a further exception. If a man eats flesh with the blood ignorantly, not realizing the way in which the animal had died (this must be the meaning), he shall bathe himself and be unclean until the evening.

It is noteworthy that while for the modern Jews the ritual of sacrifice has lost all meaning, they still adhere strictly to the requirement concerning eating with the blood. Blood is still sacred for them as the symbol of life and the sacredness of life, but not for the reason so emphatically stated in the OT—its connection with atonement for sin. A strict Jew will eat only kosher meat, i.e. meat 'rightly' and 'properly' prepared.

18:1 – 20:27 SINS AGAINST THE MORAL LAW

18:1–30 Prohibited degrees and sensuality

1–5 The introduction is very impressive. The Lord's people are to keep His commandments.

Their standards are not to be determined by the practices of Egypt where they were in bondage or of Canaan which they are to possess. The statutes and ordinances of their God are to be their sole standard of conduct; and the reward of obedience is life (cf. Dt. 30:15–20). 2 The sanction is: I am the Lord your God. That the 'abominations' about to be described were practised in Egypt, and even among other cultured nations of antiquity, is a well-known fact. Modern marriage laws are largely based on the limitations stated in this chapter. But they have not seldom been made more strict than the law requires.

6–18 6 The general principle involved is stated: None of you shall approach any one near of kin to him (lit. 'the flesh of his flesh'). Consanguinity or affinity is referred to repeatedly (vv. 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17; cf. 20:19); and it is stressed by such expressions as which is the nakedness of your mother, it is your father's nakedness, for their nakedness is your own nakedness. 18 That this phrase 'uncover the nakedness of' refers to actual marriage is made especially clear by the words while her sister is yet alive. Illicit intercourse would come under the general heading of adultery or harlotry and be condemned as such (Dt. 22:13–30). On the other hand the use of such an expression, instead of the usual phrase 'to take a wife', is probably intended to stress the fact that such unions as are condemned here and in ch. 20 cannot be true marriage, and that they are due to passion rather than natural and holy affection. No other reason is given for these prohibitions, however, except the fact of kinship. This may imply that the intimacies which result from near kinship or affinity are such as to render marriage unnatural or improper. But it also seems to be well established as a fact of experience that marriages between near relations are likely either to be barren or to result in unhealthy offspring. The prohibition which has occasioned the most discussion and controversy is marriage with the deceased wife's sister, and it is only comparatively recently that it has been made legal in England. Yet the meaning of the law seems to be clear. The words as a rival, AV 'to vex her', 'to be a secondary wife' (all three are possible renderings), taken in connection with the words while . . . yet alive, indicate that such a marriage is not barred on grounds of affinity; it is lawful, but only after the death of the wife. This is intended to prevent a man from divorcing his wife in order to marry her sister, a temptation which might easily result from the intimacies of family life. It is to be noted that only in one case is a moral judgment passed on these practices which are prohibited (v. 17).

19 apparently refers to the contracting and consummating of marriage. Cf. 20:18 and 15:24. 20–23 deal with particularly heinous sins. Adultery violates the sanctity of the home. It involves the breaking of two of the Ten Commandments (Ex. 20:14, 17). It undermines the foundations of human society. You shall not give any of your children to devote them by fire to Molech; better 'pass through the fire', as AV. Plainly this prohibition refers to the abhorrent practice of infant sacrifice and that this awful sin is the sin of the parent (cf. 20:2–5). For an Israelite to do this is to profane the name of his God. Other monstrous and unnatural sins are particularly denounced. They are abomination and perversion. Yet most, if not all, of them were widely practised among the cultured peoples of antiquity.

24–30 form a concluding summary. These things are heathen practices which Israel is particularly to avoid. The promise to dispossess the Canaanites is coupled with the solemn warning to Israel of similar treatment in case of similar conduct. The sequence of tenses is difficult. AV 'which I cast out' translates a participle and is better rendered which I am casting (or, 'going to cast') out. It refers to the (imminent) future. AV and RV render most of the verbs in vv. 25, 27 in the present tense. But the sequence of tenses would favour making them refer to the past as RSV, especially in view of their rendering of the last verb in v. 28, 'as it spued out (RV 'vomited out', as RSV) the nations (RV 'nation', as RSV) that were before you'. It is to be noted, therefore, that this verb is ambiguous. If accented on the penult, it is the perfect tense (AV, RV, RSV, LXX, Vulg., Syr.). If accented on the ultima (the Massoretes), it is a participle, and may, like the participle in v. 24, refer to the future. The former rendering seems definitely preferable. Unless the use of the past tense is regarded as proleptic, which is unlikely, we must then face the fact that past and premonitory judgments are here referred to.

We have very little information on this subject. The fact that ten nations occupied the land in the days of Abraham (Gn. 15:19ff.) may mean that it had been a bone of contention for centuries; and that these nations lived peaceably together seems highly improbable. Situated at the bridgehead between Asia and Africa, the land was singularly exposed to the ravages of invading armies. The words 'the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet complete' (Gn. 15:16) suggest that there may have been severe visitations of judgment in the past. Famine, pestilence, the sword, and evil beasts (Lv. 26; cf. Ezk. 14:21) may have already taken a heavy toll. There may be more truth in the evil report of the spies than we might be inclined to suppose: 'a land that devours its inhabitants' (Nu. 13:32). 'Devour' and 'vomit out' suggest disorders that would decimate the inhabitants of the land and drive many of them into exile. But however severe these former judgments may have been, and they must have been sufficiently severe and also recent to be referred to here, they are only a foretaste, so to speak, of the judgment which is about to fall on the Canaanites, and which surely will be visited on Israel also if she follows their example. Those who regard the command to exterminate the Canaanites as 'cruel' should consider carefully the reason which is given for it. The impressive sanction I am the Lord (your God) appears in vv. 2, 4, 5, 21, 30.

19:1–37 A collection of sundry laws

These laws are so various that it is difficult to classify them. 2 They are introduced by the solemn exhortation You shall be holy; for I the Lord your God am holy, and fifteen times the words I am the Lord (your God) are repeated in its thirty-seven verses. They are both ceremonial and ethical, and the latter belong to both of the tables of the Decalogue. Thus 3, 4, are covered by the fifth, fourth, and second commandments of the Decalogue. Reverence (AV 'fear') for parents, keeping of the sabbath, shunning of idolatry are placed first as particularly important. That 'fear' is sometimes used in the sense of 'revere' or 'reverence' is made clear by v. 30 where 'fear my sanctuary' appears as reverence in AV and RV. Cf. Dt. 6 where 'love the Lord' (v. 5) is preceded (v. 2) and followed (v. 13) by 'fear the Lord', and see on Dt. 9:19. 'Love' to God is not demanded in Leviticus and love to man only in 19:18, 34. But it is to be remembered that it is referred to in the Decalogue (Ex. 20:6) and quite frequently in Deuteronomy.

5–8 concerns the eating of the flesh of peace-offerings (cf. 7:15–18). 9, 10 The law regarding gleanings comes under the general summary of the second table of the Decalogue, which enjoins love of one's neighbour (cf. 23:22; Dt. 24:19–22). 11, 12 rest upon the eighth and third commandments. 13, 14 are closely related to the eighth commandment and the principle of humanity underlying it. 15, 16 are an exposition of the ninth commandment. 17, 18 stand in close relation to the tenth commandment and conclude with those words which represent the summary of the second table, you shall love your neighbour as yourself. 'Neighbour' seems here to refer to the fellow-Israelite. Note the words sons of your own people which immediately precede. Its use in Ex. 3:22 of the Egyptians does not prove a wider range for its ordinary use, since the conditions in Egypt were abnormal and Israel in Canaan was to be a separated people. But the broader meaning is indicated, or the meaning is broadened, by v. 34, where the law of love is extended to include the non-Israelite stranger (gēr). This fact is beautifully illustrated by Jesus' choice of the Samaritan to determine the meaning and scope of the word 'neighbour' (Lk. 10:29ff.). See Dt. 10:18 and cf. note on Lv. 25:35–55. In the case of vv. 19–37 which begin and conclude with an exhortation to obedience, it almost seems as if an element of contrast had been intentionally introduced to emphasize the fact that every department and phase of life is covered by the ordinances of God. 19 Thus the law of purity is to apply to the breeding of cattle, the sowing of seed and the texture of garments, and also to the planting of fruit-trees (vv. 23–25). Cf. Dt. 22:9–11. 20–22 But in between them is placed the law governing the guilt with a bondwoman. As regards the first of these prohibitions, since the word 'cattle' is broader than 'herd' and 'flock' and includes both clean and unclean animals, this law must be regarded as prohibiting the breeding of mules. Consequently, mules in the OT, first mentioned in David's time, are properly to be regarded as a foreign importation (cf. 1 Ki. 10:25). 26–28 may all be classed as heathen practices to be condemned as such. The same is true of v. 31. 29 Similarly the sin of prostitution is probably mentioned here for the same reason, as being a heathen practice. 30 On the other hand, this verse, enjoining reverence for the sabbath and the sanctuary, while referring back to v. 3 would seem to connect naturally with v. 32. 33, 34 The law of the stranger forms the counterpart of vv. 17, 18, expanding the scope of the law already given. 35, 36 further apply the eighth commandment; and the chapter concludes with the oft-repeated reminder I am the Lord your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt (cf. 11:45; 22:33; Dt. 5:15, etc.).

20:1–27 Sundry laws regarding very heinous offences

2 AV 'again' (RV 'moreover') is simply 'and' in Hebrew and joins this chapter closely with the preceding. Molech-worship has already been briefly denounced (18:21). But here, as in the rest of the chapter, severe penalties are pronounced on those who are guilty of some of the offences already described. Molech was the god of the Ammonites (1 Ki. 11:7). The name contains the same consonants as the word 'king' (Heb. melek) apparently combined with the vowels of the word meaning 'shame' (bōšet), to change the word from an honourable title to one of dishonour. It is always written with the article 'the Molech', as if an appelative. This form of idolatry was particularly repulsive because it involved human sacrifice, the offering of children or infants, to the idol. The exact nature of this horrible rite is not certainly known. It has been interpreted as an act of purgation which did not involve death; as a sacrifice which resembled animal sacrifices in this respect, that the victim was first slain and its body then burned as an offering to the idol (Ezk. 16:20f. hardly justifies this interpretation); as a sacrifice in which the victims were actually burned alive. That human sacrifice is meant seems to be clearly taught in Ps. 106:38; Je. 7:31; 19:4f.; Ezk. 23:37–39; Mi. 6:7. And it is quite possible that the Phoenician practice of placing living infants in the arms of the idol to perish in the flames burning within it is what is meant, which would account for the severity with which it is denounced. Dt. 12:31 implies that this awful practice was not confined to the worship of a single god, but was a prominent feature of Canaanite worship in general. This grievous sin is to be punished by stoning. 3 Note the words defiling my sanctuary and profaning my holy name which indicate that this act was not merely horrible in itself but a gratuitous and intentional defiance of the exclusive right of Yahweh, as the covenant God of Israel, to the worship of His people, and one which the Lord would not permit to go unpunished. 5 If the people ignore or condone it, He will not do so, but will cut off the man and those who participate with him.

6 The means by which Israel's neighbours sought to ascertain and if possible control the future are next condemned (cf. 19:31) and the penalty of excision is pronounced. Cf. v. 27 which orders the death of the medium, and see Ex. 22:18. The words playing the harlot apparently connect this sin closely with that of vv. 2–5. In Dt. 18:9–14 both are included among the means of ascertaining the future.

7, 8 contain a solemn exhortation to holiness (cf. 18:1–5; 19:1, 2) and to the keeping of the commandments of God, which has both a backward and a forward reference. That 9–21 deal with some of the most heinous of the sins already mentioned in chs. 18, 19 is indicated by comparing v. 9 with 19:3. Cursing of father or mother is a grievous violation of the fifth commandment. Adultery, incest, unnatural vice, bestiality are to be most severely punished. The fact that the phrase uncover the nakedness, which occurs frequently in ch. 18, also appears seven times in this chapter and nowhere else in the Pentateuch, indicates the close connection between these two passages. The penalties are variously described: shall be put to death (vv. 10, 12, 13, 15), stone him with stones (vv. 2, 27; cf. 24:14ff.), burned with fire (v. 14; cf. 21:9), cut off (vv. 5, 17, 18), bear iniquity (vv. 17, 19), bear their sin, they shall die childless (v. 20), they shall be childless (v. 21). Note also the words used to describe these crimes: committed incest (v. 12), committed an abomination (v. 13), wickedness (v. 14), impurity (v. 21).

22–26 remind the Israelites that the enormities just described are those of the people whose land they are to possess. It has 'vomited out' (cf. 18:25) its inhabitants for their abominations, and Israel will suffer the same fate if she practises them (cf. 18:28). Yet the land is their inheritance and it is a goodly land (Ex. 3:8, 17). The Lord has separated them. Note the fourfold use of this word in RV vv. 24–26. This section indicates quite clearly that a principal aim of the dietary laws of ch. 11 was to make and promote a definite separation between Israel and the Canaanites. Since eating and drinking were an important part of the daily life of the people, and since vv. 22–26 serve as a kind of conclusion to this great body of laws, ceremonial and moral, which the people are to observe, a reference back to ch. 11 with which it begins is entirely appropriate. That you should be mine. Here the whole aim of the law is briefly summarized. The Lord's people must keep His law if they are to be truly His.

27 is simply the further application of v. 6. The mediums who lead the people astray are to be punished by stoning (cf. v. 2; 24:14). By returning again to this subject, the heinousness of this sin (cf. Dt. 18:9–14) is particularly stressed. It is a sin of idolatry, and Israel must shun idolatry in every form.

21:1–9 The priests must be holy

If the people are to separate themselves from everything evil, how much more so the priests! They are not to defile themselves (21:1, 3, 4), nor to profane the name of their God (v. 6); they are to be holy to Him (v. 6, 7) and must be treated as such (v. 8). The reasons given are their high rank—a priest is a husband among his people (v. 4)—and they offer the offerings by fire to the Lord, the bread of their God (v. 6), a statement which makes it clear that the offering of sacrifice was their chief function. The bread (food) of their God is a phrase used frequently in this chapter (vv. 6, 8, 17, 21, 22; cf. 22:25, also 3:11, 16).

The particular matter first dealt with is defilement by contact with the dead. This they must avoid, except in the case of their next of kin. Death being the penalty of sin, contact with it was defiling. The failure to mention the wife when mother, father, son, daughter, and sister are specified must mean that the wife's position is unique. She is not his nearest of kin (v. 2) but 'one flesh' with him (Gn. 2:24); to mention her would be superfluous. The command to abstain from pagan practices is one which applies to priest and people alike (cf. Lv. 19:27f.; Dt. 14:1). A priest must obviously be exemplary in all his conduct. He will of course marry. But he must marry a virtuous woman and one who has not been divorced. Again the reason is repeated: he ministers in holy things (vv. 7, 8). For the daughter of a priest to become a harlot is especially heinous and to be most severely punished.

21:10–15 Special rules for the high priest

In view of the unique holiness of the high priest, the rules against defilement are more rigid than in the case of the ordinary priest. This is because the consecration of his God is upon him. The holy oil has been poured on his head and he wears the holy garments. He may not exhibit the usual tokens of grief and may not defile himself with any dead body, the exceptions made for the ordinary priest being definitely withdrawn. 12 The direction that he is not to leave the sanctuary probably means not to leave it in order to do honour to the dead, not that he was always to stay in the courts of the Tabernacle. 13 A further restriction is that he must marry a virgin of his own people. His wife must be a daughter of Israel. 15 That he may not profane his children, i.e. render them and himself unfit for holy office and for sharing in holy things, by an unworthy marriage such as that described in v. 14a.

21:16–24 The effect of physical deformity

Just as the animals offered in sacrifice must be without blemish, so must the priests be who offer them. But those who are debarred from serving at the altar are to be permitted to eat of the holy things which are the priest's portion. Mention is made of abnormalities both of deficiency and of excess, e.g. six fingers instead of five. Castration came under this head, and eunuchs were barred from the congregation (Dt. 23:1; cf. Is. 56:3ff.).

22:1–16 Defilement disqualifies the priest from touching holy things

While the priests are set apart to be holy ministers of the sanctuary, it is to be observed that they are liable to the same uncleannesses as are the laity. In addition to such abnormalities as have been mentioned above, a priest may become a leper, he may have an issue, or he may have come in contact with that which is unclean. This uncleanness makes him a source of pollution as long as it lasts and he must not touch any consecrated or holy thing lest he defile it. The principles laid down here have already been stated elsewhere. Cf. Heb. 5:2; 7:28. 10, 11 A distinction is drawn between the family of the priest and his slaves on the one hand and a sojourner or hireling. While the latter belong to the household of the priest, this does not entitle them to eat of the holy things. But a childless widow who returns to her father's house becomes once more a member of his family. A man who eats of the holy thing without being aware that he is doing so must replace it and as in the case of the guilt-offering he is to add one-fifth to it.

22:17–33 Rules for the offering of sacrifices

18, 19 They must be without blemish, a law which concerns both priests and people even including the strangers. See on Ex. 12:5. This is essential to be accepted (cf. on 1:3). 23 The only exception is the free-will offering. 24 refers to the gelding of animals. RV interprets this verse to mean that gelding was absolutely prohibited: 'Neither shall ye do this in your land.' This was the view of Josephus (Ant. iv. 8.40). AV and RSV understand it to apply only to animals intended for sacrifice (cf. RV mg.). 27 The requirement that the animal be seven days with its mother apparently means that not until then was it to be regarded as having an independent existence (cf. the law regarding circumcision, Gn. 17:12).

28 The law forbidding the slaying of the mother and her young on the same day suggests the thrice-repeated prohibition of the seething of a kid in its mother's milk (Ex. 23:19; 34:26; Dt. 14:21). Apparently both were designed to impress upon the Israelite the fact that the strong tie which binds the members of the human family together has its counterpart in the affection which the lower animals show toward their young, protecting them even at the cost of life, and so to prohibit wanton cruelty. Such acts might be required by, and pleasing to, a Chemosh or Molech, but not to the God of Israel. See also note on Dt. 14:21. 29, 30 stipulate that a sacrifice of thanksgiving must be eaten the same day. See 7:15. All of these commandments have the sanction, I am the Lord. To break them is to profane His holy name. By their very diversity they make it clear that the law of the Lord is to govern the life of Israel, priest and people, in all its aspects and in every detail.

23:1–44 THE HOLY CONVOCATIONS

1, 2 In this chapter we are given a list of those meetings (Heb. mô'ēḏ; the same word is used as in the phrase 'tent of meeting'), or 'appointed feasts' which were to be proclaimed as holy convocations. This word mô'ēḏ is rendered 'feast' in AV, as is also another word, ḥag. RV renders the former by 'set feast' with margin 'appointed season', the other by 'feast', with a view to distinguishing them. The emphasis in the case of the former word is apparently on the time. Hence a literal rendering of v. 4 would be: 'These are the meetings (appointed seasons) of the Lord, even holy convocations, which you shall proclaim in their appointed seasons.' The joyousness of most of these occasions is indicated by the fact that the word feasts (ḥag) is also used of them. They are called convocations because the people were called together by the blowing of the silver trumpets (Nu. 10:1–10).

23:3 The sabbath

God's resting on the seventh day is referred to in Gn. 2:3 and there are various indications of the keeping of a seven-day week (Gn. 29:27) and of the sacredness of the number seven (e.g. Nu. 23:1). But it is in connection with the giving of the manna that the sacredness of this day as a day of rest for Israel is first made clear (Ex. 16:5, 22–30). The giving of a double portion on the sixth day freed Israel from all necessity to work on that day; and God's resting on the seventh day from the providing of the manna was a reminder of His resting on that day from the work of creation. The same words, though not the same phrase, are used to describe it here as in Ex. 16: It is a sabbath of solemn rest (šabbāṯ šabbāṯôn). Here, as in Ex. 20:9 and Dt. 5:13, the command to work on the six days is coupled with the command to rest on the seventh. A man who works on weekdays is entitled to the rest of the Lord's day. The resting on this day is much more complete than in the case of the other set feasts which prohibit only laborious work (see vv. 7, 8, 21, 25, 35, 36), which apparently prohibits only the carrying on of one's ordinary business or the performance of manual labour, but not the preparation of food. Consequently, while the sabbath is a holy convocation, it differs from the other set feasts in this most important respect. It also differs in the fact that it is observed weekly while they are annual. In this we have also a definite indication that the regular, frequently occurring, weekly sabbath was intended to be a holier day than any of the set feasts. Yet in the history of the church there has been a strong tendency, as there is today, to stress the importance of special occasions and to minimize that of the Lord's day, the first day of the week which is the only holy day expressly sanctioned in the NT. See on Dt. 5:12ff.

23:4–8 The Passover and the Feast of Unleavened Bread

Since the sabbath differs from all other set feasts in several important respects it is separated from them by v. 4 which serves the place of a heading to introduce the annual feasts. See Ex. 23:14–17; Dt. 16. 5 First among the annual feasts is the Passover. No description is given since it has been fully described already in the account of its institution. See Ex. 12 and notes there. 6–8 The same is true of the Feast of Unleavened Bread which is so closely connected with it. Nu. 28:16–25 goes into much more detail with regard to the ritual for this feast.

This is the third of four laws (cf. 14:34; 19:23; 25:2) which apply to the future occupancy of the land. 10 The sheaf ('ōmer) of the first fruits (cf. Dt. 24:19; Ru. 2:7, 15) is to be presented as a 'wave-offering' (9:21; 14:12, 24). Since the same word is used of a dry measure (Ex. 16:16ff.), defined as the tenth part of an ephah (Ex. 16:36), the view is held that the sheaf must contain enough grain (barley, since barley ripens two or three weeks before wheat) to produce an omer of fine flour for a cereal-offering. 11 In the phrase the morrow after the sabbath, 'sabbath' has two possible meanings: it may refer to the regular weekly sabbath, which has just been mentioned, or to the Passover as the day of holy convocation, which was followed by the week of Unleavened Bread. The Pharisees took the one view, the Sadducees the other. 12 This offering of the sheaf was to be accompanied by a burnt-offering, with cereal- and drink-offerings. On this occasion the size of the cereal-offering is double the usual.

Here the drink-offering is mentioned for the first time in Leviticus. It has already been referred to in Ex. 29:38–42 in the law regarding the continual burnt-offering. Why there is no reference to it in Lv. 1–7 which deals particularly with the sacrifices is not clear. The fact that it is mentioned so frequently in connection with the offerings for the set feasts might suggest that it was not, or need not be, offered on ordinary occasions or in the case of private offerings. But Nu. 6:17 and 15:1–12 indicate that such an inference is unwarranted. It was apparently never an independent offering under the law, but accompanied the cereal-offering. This may be the reason why it is not mentioned in chs. 1–7. A further reason may be that it was not to be offered until Israel entered the land (23:10). But this reason did not apply to the continual burnt-offering, which is not mentioned in Leviticus but has already been described in Ex. 29:38–42.

The offering of the firstfruits symbolized the consecration of the entire harvest to God: and not until it was offered were the people permitted to partake of it (v. 14). This law has a definitely typical significance and is referred to in the NT. It is used of the Gentile Christians (Rom. 8:23), of the ancestors of the Jews (Rom. 11:16), of individual Christians (Rom. 16:5) and of Christ as the firstfruits from the grave (1 Cor. 15:20, 23). See also 1 Cor. 16:15; Jas. 1:18; Rev. 14:4.

23:15–22 The Feast of Weeks

The fact that this feast is not introduced by the words 'The Lord said to Moses' has led to the inference that Pentecost (šāḇu'ôṯ) is a continuation or complement of the Passover. In the Talmud it is called 'aṣārtâ (cf. 23:36 where this word is used of the eighth day of the Feast of Tabernacles and rendered 'a holy convocation'). Seven weeks are to be counted from the sabbath (see above) on which the wave-offering of the firstfruits was made. 17 Then a new cereal-offering in the form of two wave loaves is to be offered. They are to be of fine flour, baked with leaven and are described as the first fruits to the Lord. Since the daily bread of the Israelites was leavened, this naturally implies the consecration of the daily food of the people to God. The offerings consist of burnt-, sin- and peace-offerings. Since this marked the end of the harvest of wheat, it is appropriate that the law regarding gleaning should be repeated here (see 19:9). See on Dt. 16:9–12.

23:23–44 The feasts of the seventh month

In view of the sacredness of the number seven, it is natural that the seventh month should be made distinctive. It has three special occasions: the Feast of Trumpets, the Day of Atonement, the Feast of Tabernacles.

23:24, 25 The Feast of Trumpets. This is briefly described. The blowing of trumpets on the first day of the month directed special attention to this important season of the year, the completion of the agricultural season. It was to be marked by two of the great events of the year. It is described as a day of solemn rest, a memorial of blowing of trumpets, and as a holy convocation. According to Jewish tradition the trumpet used on this occasion was not the silver trumpet of Nu. 10:2–10, but the šôp̄ār, the ram's horn (yôḇēl) which was used on specially solemn occasions, notably to proclaim the year of jubilee (cf. also Jos. 6.). No servile work is to be done; and sacrifice is to be offered. This remembrance-blowing may be understood in two senses: God reminding the people of their duty to prepare themselves for the solemnities which this month has in store for them: and the people reminding God of His covenant and of His goodness to their fathers and to them. The word 'trumpet' does not occur in Hebrew. The word t^erû'â may denote either 'shouting' of people, or trumpet-'blast'. Perhaps both were included. This day, the first of Tishri, is called by the Jews rōš haššānâ, the beginning of the year. It is the beginning of the civil year, new year's day.

23:26–32 The Day of Atonement. This festival, which has been so fully described in ch. 16 as regards the duties of Aaron, the sacrifices to be performed and the way in which they are to be performed, is described here entirely from the standpoint of the duties of the people. It is to be a sabbath of solemn rest (v. 32; Heb. šabbāṯ šabbāṯôn). No work of any kind is to be done and fasting is to be observed; they are to afflict their souls. Disobedience will be most severely punished. Cf. Nu. 29:7–11, which deals especially with the offerings.

23:33–44 The Feast of Tabernacles. This resembles the Passover and the Feast of Unleavened Bread in several important respects. Both are primarily historical feasts, the one recalling the Exodus, the deliverance from Egypt and the circumstances of their flight, the other recalling the long sojourn in the wilderness. Both are of considerable length, extending over eight days. Both are closely connected with the daily life and happiness of the people, the one standing at the beginning, the other at the close of the agricultural year. A marked difference is that in the latter feast there is no prohibition of the use of leaven. Nu. 29:12–38 describes this feast in greater detail, listing the special offerings for each day. The total is remarkable. The burnt-offering consists of bulls, rams and lambs. The number of rams (two) and of lambs (fourteen) remains the same for each of the seven days, while the number of bulls begins with thirteen and is reduced gradually to seven, making a total of seventy bulls, or an average of ten a day. On the eighth day the offering is one bull, one ram and seven lambs. On each of the eight days there is a sin-offering consisting of one goat. It is carefully pointed out that each separate burnt-offering is to have its cereal-offering and its drink-offering. It is rather remarkable that the number of the bulls is decreased from day to day instead of increased.

The set feasts which have just been described are summed up in words very similar to v. 4. Then a further law is given with regard to the Feast of Tabernacles. The people are to live in booths for seven days that their generations may know that the Lord made the people of Israel dwell in booths (v. 43) when He brought them out of the land of Egypt. And the people are to rejoice before the Lord (v. 40). Thus the fasting of the Day of Atonement as a sign of sorrow for sins is speedily followed by the joy of this festival. It is remarkable that it is called the feast of booths (v. 34; AV 'tabernacles', Heb. sukkôṯ; cf. vv. 42, 43), since elsewhere in the Pentateuch, except for Gn. 33:17, the word 'booth' nowhere occurs, the Israelites being said to have dwelt in tents. The thought which is stressed is of course the frail and temporary character of the dwellings of the people during the wilderness sojourn. Thus Jerusalem is likened by Isaiah to a cottage (booth) in a vineyard (Is. 1:8), so frail and poverty-stricken has the abode of the daughter of Zion become. It should hardly be necessary to point out that the word 'tabernacles' has nothing at all in common with the word 'Tabernacle' as used of the sanctuary of the Lord. The words are entirely distinct. Cf. the references to this feast in 2 Ch. 8:13; Ezr. 3:4; Ne. 8:13–18; Zc. 14:16–19.

While these feasts were seasonal and suited to an agricultural people, the emphasis placed on historical events is clearly for the purpose of keeping alive in the minds of the people the great deliverance from Egypt in its most important aspects.

24:1–23 THE HOLY OIL, THE BREAD OF THE PRESENCE, THE SIN OF BLASPHEMY

24:1–4 The oil for the lampstand

Olive oil was used for illumination, for anointing, and in cooking as an article of food. All three were assigned a function in the service of the Tabernacle. Here only the first is referred to. The oil for the lamps of the golden lampstand was to be pure, beaten oil (Ex. 27:20). The oil for anointing was spiced (Ex. 25:6; 35:8). Oil was one of the free-will offerings of the people at the time of the construction of the Tabernacle and apparently was to continue to be so. The tending of the lamps is here assigned to Aaron, but in Ex. 27:21 his sons are included with him as qualified to perform this important duty. 3 From evening to morning . . . continually indicates that the lights burned throughout the night. 1 Sa. 3:3 would seem to mean that the lamps were given only sufficient oil to last until the morning. Cf. the distinction made in Ex. 30:7f. between trimming (lit. 'making good') the lamps in the morning and lighting (lit. 'causing them to ascend') in the evening. If this is the correct view, we may assume that the lamps were lighted in the evening with fire from the altar of burnt sacrifice. According to others, continually means that the lamps burned both day and night.

24:5–9 The bread of the Presence

In Ex. 25:23–30 the description of the table of the bread of the Presence is given. But the bread itself is simply mentioned. Here the details of the service are described. Each loaf is to consist of two-tenths of an ephah of flour (about 6 quarts), probably prepared with oil like the cereal-offering, though this is not stated. 6 They are to be placed in two rows, or 'arrangements' (hence the Hebrew expression 'bread of arrangement' for the bread of the Presence in Chronicles (e.g. 2 Ch. 2:4) and Nehemiah (Ne. 10:33)), which probably means in two piles of six cakes each. Beside (probably better than AV 'upon') each pile, frankincense was placed, either in a bowl or a spoon. As in the case of the cereal-offering, it was not baked with the cakes; but according to later tradition it was burned on the altar of burnt sacrifice, together with the offerings of oil and wine, at the end of the seven days when the bread was taken from before the Lord and eaten by the priests. Cf. Ex. 25:30; 35:13; 39:36. A possible reason for the placing of these two laws in between chs. 23 and 25, which seem to belong together, may be to direct attention to the important fact that permanent and unvarying rituals such as these are entirely independent of, and not affected by, the annual feasts and special days which have just been described.

This rite may suggest the lavish offerings of food which the Egyptians and Babylonians were accustomed to make to their gods. In Erech, e.g., 243 loaves were baked daily to supply the various temples of the city. The god Anu received thirty of them; and they were served in two morning and two evening meals. The object was to feed the god as human beings were fed. The fact that they were actually used to feed the priests who offered them was a hidden mystery, as is made strikingly evident by the apocryphal story of Bel and the Dragon. The bread of the Presence in Israel was quite different. The loaves represented the twelve tribes of Israel. After seven days the twelve were replaced by others and were then eaten by the priests and their families. This was required and it served to show that the rite was a symbolic one. Like the jar of manna (Ex. 16:33) which was to be kept as a perpetual memorial, the bread of the Presence was a daily confession by Israel and reminder to Israel that all her temporal blessings came from God. The idea of feeding the deity was an utterly pagan idea which was contrary to the teachings of both the Law and the Prophets, according to which it was Israel's God who supplied all the needs of His people. Cf., e.g., Ex. 16–17; Nu. 11; Ho. 2:8; Ps. 50:9–14, which has its echo in Paul's address on Mars Hill (Acts 17:25).

24:10–23 The sin of blasphemy and crimes of violence

The brief historical episode recorded in vv. 10–16 may have occurred between the revelations which precede and follow it. Cf. Dt. 4:41–49 and Nu. 15:32–36 for similar examples. The half-Israelite referred to probably belonged to the 'mixed multitude' of Ex. 12:38. 10 Went out (or 'came out') among the people of Israel hardly suggests that he was not living in the camp, but rather that he went abroad in the camp, engaged in a brawl with an Israelite, and became profane in his abuse of his opponent. When he is brought to trial, his mother's name and connections are briefly mentioned, probably because he owed his presence in the camp entirely to her. His father may have been dead; at any rate his name is not given. It is the principle, not the person, that concerns us. This was an obvious and flagrant breach of the third commandment. But that commandment did not assess the penalty, except that the guilty one would not be held 'guiltless' by God. 12 The problem was further complicated by the irregular status of the culprit. Hence he was put in custody, till the will of the Lord should be declared to them.

22 The answer (cf. Nu. 7:89) deals especially with the actual situation; but it also establishes the principle that no distinction is to be made between Israelite and non-Israelite in such matters. It is to be noted that blasphemy is here grouped with crimes of a violent nature such as murder, unlawful wounding, etc. This may indicate simply the enormity of this sin of the lips. It may also suggest that the strife of which the act of blasphemy formed the most serious part was a very violent one and threatened the life or limb of his opponent (cf. Ex. 21:22; Dt. 25:11). At least it is clear that these laws, which have already been given in Exodus (see 21:12, 23–36), are repeated here primarily for the purpose of making the law regarding blasphemy and other serious offences apply to the sojourner and stranger just as much as to the native-born Israelite.

With regard to this lex talionis, three things are to be noted. First, it was intended to be a law of exact justice, not of revenge. Secondly, it was not private vengeance, but public justice. Thirdly, by excluding murder from the crimes for which ransom is permissible (Nu. 35:31f.) it makes it probable that compensation for injuries was often or usually allowed to take the form of a fine. The claim that 'there is in Jewish history no instance of the law of retaliation ever having been carried out literally—eye for an eye, tooth for a tooth' may or may not be justified, although such mutilating of the body was contrary to the spirit of the Mosaic law. Yet for centuries in Christian lands, torture and mutilation was the customary punishment for crime, and often, contrary to both the spirit and the letter of the Mosaic law, it was utterly out of proportion to the offence. This incident serves to remind us of the grievousness of the sin of profanity, which is one of the great evils of today.

25:1–7 The sabbatical year

The principle of a regularly recurring day of rest has been dealt with in ch. 23 in connection with the annual feasts, and in a way which strongly emphasized the septadic principle. This principle is now carried still further, to the establishing of the sabbatical year and of the jubilee. In the law of the sabbath rest, the principle is applied to all human beings, whether free or bond, and also to the cattle (Ex. 20:10), to the ox, the ass, or any cattle, as beasts of burden (Dt. 5:14), as well as to the sojourner. Here it is extended to the land. 4 Every seventh year the land is to have a sabbath of solemn rest (šabbāṯ šabbāṯôn) from sowing and reaping. The land is to be left untilled and that which grows of itself, called in v. 6 the sabbath of the land (i.e. what the sabbath of the land produces of itself), is to be food for all alike, for the owner and the servant, for the sojourner and the cattle. It is not the product of human industry and it is to be free to all. Furthermore, the promise is given that the yield of the sixth year, being ordered and blessed by God, will be sufficient (vv. 18–22) for this period of rest. It is the law of the manna on a larger scale (Ex. 16:22). This at least suggests that the sabbath increase (vv. 6, 7), unlike the gleanings of the ordinary year which were assigned to the widow and orphan, will suffice for the actual needs of everyone (cf. Ex. 16:17f.). According to Dt. 31:10 this year is not to be spent in idleness, but to be used for the teaching and training of Israel in the law of God.

25:8–55 The jubilee

25:8–22 Rules for its observance. 8 The fiftieth year is carefully defined as the one following seven sabbatical years. 9 It is introduced by 'sending abroad' throughout the land the loud trumpet on the Day of Atonement of the fiftieth year. The trumpet (Heb. šôp̄ār) used was the horn (qeren) of the ram (cf. Jos. 6:4f.) and consequently, by abbreviation, yôḇēl (ram), from which the term 'jubilee' is derived, becomes synonymous with trumpet. Cf. Ex. 19:13, 19, where both words are used. This trumpet blast, which introduces the jubilee, is like the trumpet sound which prepared and summoned Israel to become the covenant people of their God. The same law regarding sowing and reaping applies to this year as to the sabbatical years which preceded it; and since it began in the autumn it seems clear that the sabbatical years did the same. 10, 13 It is a year of liberty, a year of return to possessions and to family. 14–17 This return to normality, as we may call it, is to be on a strictly equitable basis. Buying and selling are to be carried on with due regard to the approaching year of jubilee.

20 And if you say, 'What shall we eat in the seventh year?' This seems to imply that the hypothetical objectors have the sabbatical year only in mind. But the answer includes the larger problem as well, the case when the sabbatical year is followed by the jubilee. 21, 22 This is indicated by the mention of three years and of the eighth and ninth years. The answering of the greater difficulty includes, of course, the solution of the lesser.

25:23–34 The law of redemption. 23 The principle involved in the law of redemption is that the land belongs not to any man but to God. They are not owners but strangers and sojourners, tenants by courtesy of the land which God has given to them. They are tenants at will, the will of God. See Ex. 22:21 and on Dt. 10:19. 25–28 The reclaiming of land may be done by a kinsman, by the man himself, or it will take place automatically in the year of jubilee. 29 But this does not apply to a dwelling house in a walled city, which can be redeemed only within a year of its sale, apparently because this has no direct connection with the land and its cultivation. 31 On the other hand, houses in villages are covered by the provision probably because farmers and shepherds dwell in them. The Levites and their possessions come within a special class.

25:35–55 Treatment of the poor brother and of non-Israelites. 35 is difficult. As a stranger (RV 'sojourner') and AV 'though . . a sojourner' are both possible renderings. RSV and RV seem better because the laws given here make a clear distinction between Israelite and Gentile. Note the if your brother (vv. 25, 35, 39, 47) and your brethren the people of Israel (v. 46). Loving the stranger (see 19:34 and Dt. 10:18) does not mean that no distinction is to be made between him and the brother Israelite. Rather the status of the Israelite is shown to be completely different. Loans made to him must be without interest. On this question of usury see on Ex. 22:25; on Dt. 23:19. If he sells himself, he is to be treated as a hired servant and not as a slave; he is to be treated with leniency and is to go free at the jubilee should this come before the termination of his six years of service (Ex. 21:2–4; Dt. 15:12f.).

44–46 The law of release does not apply to the non-Israelites; they may be treated as slaves incapable of redemption. The principles of redemption are then extended to the case of a man who sells himself to a sojourner or stranger who, as indicated above, is required to obey the requirements of the law, or at least not to transgress them. 47–54 The Israelite in such a position may be redeemed or simply go out at the jubilee, and he must not be rigorously treated. 55 The reason for this difference is that the Israelites are the Lord's servants and He has freed them from bondage to men, notably the bondage of Egypt.

26:1–46 BLESSINGS AND CURSINGS

The immense importance which attaches to the keeping of the law, which has just been set before the people and the priests in such detail, is summed up by Moses in Dt. 30:15, in the words 'See, I have set before you this day life and good, death and evil'. Cf. Lv. 18:5. No reference is made to the solemn rite which is to be observed at Shechem (see Dt. 11:26–29; 27:4ff.; Jos. 8:30–35). But here, as on that solemn occasion, the issue and the choice are placed before Israel with the utmost plainness, all the more impressive in this case because the Lord, while speaking of course through Moses, addresses the people in the first person (note the frequently recurring 'I') and without any introductory phrase. Cf. Dt. 27, 28 where Moses speaks in the name of the Lord. 1, 2 Idolatry in any form is to be shunned, the sabbath is to be kept, and the sanctuary of the Lord is to be reverenced. These three matters are first singled out for special emphasis because of their importance and also because of all that is involved and implied in their observance.

26:3–13 Blessings as a reward of obedience

These blessings are only as it were an amplification of the promise given in Ex. 19:5f. They give an idyllic picture, such as Isaiah delights to paint, of the prosperity and peace which is the reward of obedience to God. The Lord will give rain and the earth will yield its bounty. The harvest and the ingathering will be so abundant that it will require months instead of days to gather it. And with plenty there shall be peace. Neither man nor beast will be able to injure them or stand before them. 9 The Lord will have regard (lit. 'turn') to them. 11 He will set His Tabernacle among them and will not abhor them. This last striking statement seems like an anticlimax, but is not. For Israel is a sinful people which deserves to be abhorred, and would be, were it not for the love and grace of their God. 12 And I will walk among you. We are reminded of Gn. 3:8. The land of Canaan will be like the garden of Eden, because the God of Eden will dwell there with His people. The Lord who will do all this is the One who delivered them from Egypt, the greatest proof of His love and almighty power. Again and again in the OT it is referred to as evidence of this love and of the fact that Israel belongs to God and owes Him allegiance. See, e.g., Jos. 24:17.

26:14–45 The chastisements for disobedience

26:14–33 The evils described. It is significant that the evils which are threatened are described much more fully than the blessings that are promised. Man being what he is, sinful and prone to evil, fear is, in many if not most cases, a stronger stimulant to the will than love. 14 But if you will not hearken to me. A sharp contrast is suggested by the one 'if' of obedience (v. 3) and the many 'ifs' or 'if nots' of disobedience (vv. 14, 15, 18, 21, 23, 27). The Hebrew verb translated 'hearken' has three main renderings in English: 'hear', 'hearken' and 'obey'. The old saying 'to hear is to obey' is especially applicable to Hebrew. Here obeying (hearing) is contrasted with despising, abhorring and disobeying which amount to breaking the covenant. Note especially the word contrary (used 7 times), which suggests Am. 3:3. The thought of reciprocity is stressed throughout. God will deal with Israel exactly as she deserves.

The evils which are threatened are in the main four: pestilence (vv. 16, 25), famine (v. 19), wild beasts (v. 22), and the sword as typifying war and the desolations which will result from it (vv. 25–39). The contrast with the rewards of obedience is made very glaring. Cf. vv. 7, 8 with vv. 17, 36–38. Four times the word sevenfold is used (vv. 18, 21, 24, 28). This rendering is better than AV 'seven times' since it is apparently the intensity rather than the duration that is referred to. It should not be connected with the prophetic 'times' of Daniel. But both Jeremiah and Ezekiel seem to have this chapter clearly in mind. Jeremiah speaks of four kinds of punishments (15:3f.). Cf. Ezk. 14:12–21. Both of these prophets refer especially to the sword. Dispersion is also definitely threatened here. Israel will be scattered among the nations.

26:34–39 The climax of desolation. 34 Then the land shall enjoy its sabbaths while Israel is in exile. Cf. 2 Ch. 36:21 where the same expression occurs with reference to the Babylonian captivity. This does not justify the inference that during the centuries between the conquest and the captivity exactly seventy sabbatical years (corresponding to the length of the captivity) had not been observed. But it does indicate that this Mosaic law requiring sabbath rest had been grievously abused and had been largely neglected. Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel reprove Israel for failure to keep the sabbath (cf., e.g., Je. 17:19–27). But they make no mention of the sabbatical year. Nor does Jeremiah represent the seventy years as a sabbath for the land (see Je. 25:8–11; 27:6–8; 29:10). 36, 37 The sword is described in v. 25 as executing the vengeance for the covenant, a terrible phrase which suggests 'the wrath of the lamb' (Rev. 6:16).

26:40–45 The result: confession and forgiveness. 40 Follow the RV, 'and they shall confess'. 41 The 'if' does not come till v. 41b, if then their uncircumcised heart is humbled. When punishment has finally resulted in confession, if the people who have been scattered among the nations humble themselves, knowing that it is God who has brought them into their evil state, and make amends for their iniquity (v. 42) then the Lord will remember His covenant with their fathers. The implication is that He will restore them to the land promised to their fathers, since its possession was an important element in the covenant promise. But it is noteworthy that this is here left to inference, quite different from Dt. 30:1–5, where return to the land is definitely promised on condition of repentance. 46 concludes this group of laws with the emphatic declaration that they were delivered to Israel through Moses at Sinai (cf. 7:38).

27:1–34 VOWS AND TITHES

The subject of vows and free-will offerings has been mentioned several times in this book in dealing with the subject of sacrifices (see 7:16; 22:18–23; 23:38). Here 'devoted' or 'sanctified' oblations (Heb. qorbān), which could not be offered in sacrifice, are discussed separately. The votive offerings here referred to consist of persons, animals, houses, fields. It is to be observed that in most cases no actual change in ownership takes place. The emphatic word is valuation, AV 'estimation', which occurs about twenty times. We have already met it in connection with the guilt-offering, which required the addition of one-fifth to the estimated value of the property which must be restored (5:15f.). Here it is used of the value to be assigned to a person or to property.

2–8 In the case of persons, the estimation varies according to sex and age. It apparently contemplates the possibility of a man's vowing (to give) himself or some person of his household to the Lord. The valuation varies between 50 shekels and 3 shekels. That it is expected that the person will be redeemed in money is made clear by v. 8. Thus, if a man valued at 50 shekels were not able to pay the full amount, the priest was to suit the estimate to the ability of the maker of the vow to make good his vow or pledge.

9–13 In the case of animals a distinction is made between clean beasts which could be used in sacrifice and unclean beasts. The former became the property of the Lord and could not be redeemed by the owner. The law was interpreted to mean that the priests might sell such animals to those who wished to offer a sacrifice, but not to the original owner. In the case of an unclean beast, the original owner might redeem it by paying a fifth more than the valuation.
14, 15 In the case of a house the same principle applied. If the owner wished to redeem it he must pay an additional one-fifth.

16–25 The case of the field was much more complicated, since it involved the question of the jubilee. But the owner could redeem it by adding one-fifth. The estimate was to be in terms of the sowing of the field, which was a relatively simple way of determining its value in an agricultural community. If he failed to redeem the field, which was his inheritance, or if he sold it (surreptitiously) after having devoted it, then he lost all claim to it when the year of jubilee came round. The field became the property of the priests. The value of a field which a man had purchased was to be reckoned in terms of the nearness of the jubilee, since it then returned to its original owner. Here (v. 25) and three times elsewhere in the Pentateuch (Ex. 30:13; Nu. 3:47; 18:16) it is stated that the shekel of the sanctuary contains 20 gerahs.

26, 27 Firstlings belonged to the Lord (cf. Ex. 13:2, 12; Dt. 15:19–23), so could not be dedicated. But the firstlings of unclean animals could be redeemed by paying the extra one-fifth. If not redeemed they could be sold (see Ex. 13:13).

28, 29 Devoted or 'banned' persons or things are an exception to the law regarding redemption. They cannot be redeemed and a banned person must be put to death. This must refer to the solemn and terrible ban (Heb. ḥērem) which was placed, e.g., on Amalek, on Jericho and on Achan, and not to the vows and acts of 'sanctifying' mentioned earlier in the chapter. See on Dt. 2:34. The placing of such a ban upon nation or individual was certainly not within the right of any private person, but must have been of the nature of an official sentence pronounced by God through Moses, or through the duly constituted leaders. Cf. Jos. 6:17–19.

30–33 deal with the question of tithes. One-tenth of the increase of the fields, of the trees, of the herd or flock is holy to the Lord. A man may redeem part of it by paying the usual one-fifth additional. But this exception does not apply to animals. On the tithes cf. Dt. 12 and 14. The apparent discrepancy between Leviticus and Deuteronomy was harmonized by the Rabbis by distinguishing three different tithes: the first, the second, and the third or 'poor' tithe.

34 The closing statement is briefer and less definite than that of 26:46. It may be regarded, therefore, as referring primarily to ch. 27 and not to the entire book. But however understood, this concluding statement is in accord with the total impression given by Leviticus, i.e. that it consists of laws given to Moses for Israel at Sinai.

Numbers

INTRODUCTION

TITLE

The title 'Numbers' is an English translation of the Latin Numeri, itself a translation of the Greek (LXX) Arithmoi. It was so named because of the considerable attention to numbers throughout the book, but especially in the early chapters and in ch. 26. The Hebrew title, bᵉmiḏbār, literally 'in the wilderness' (1:1), is a truer indication of the contents of the book, which traces the journey of Israel from Egypt to the plains of Moab.

AUTHORSHIP

Traditionally Numbers is one of the five books of Moses, and there is, in fact, a great deal about Moses in the book. He is the central character throughout, and it is repeatedly stated that the laws and regulations which it contains were given through the agency of Moses and Aaron (1:1; 3:44; 6:1; 8:1, et passim). The impression is certainly given that these laws and regulations go back to the time of the wandering in the wilderness (e.g. 9:1; 15:1f.; 15:32ff.), and that many of the incidents took place there too (e.g. 13:1f.; 20:1; 22:1, etc.). Although there is no formal statement in the book that Moses actually wrote it, 33:2 refers to his having kept a list of stopping places on the journey from Egypt, and, of course, the fact that Moses did write is referred to elsewhere in the Pentateuch (e.g. Dt. 31:9). (For further examination of the question of authorship, in which the basic Mosaic character of the material in the Pentateuch as a whole is stressed, see the General Article, 'Moses and the Pentateuch', pp. 41ff.).

The present writer believes, however, that to ascribe the book to Moses in its present form is to overlook several important facts. For example, throughout the book Moses is referred to in the third person, the typical style of a narrator (e.g. 1:1; 2:1; 3:1, 11, 14, et passim). Again, to ascribe every utterance of the book to Moses directly makes him the author of his own commendation as the meekest of men (12:3), which would hardly be the best evidence for the reality of the claim! Further, if it is claimed that Moses is the author not only of Numbers but of the whole Pentateuch, differences in details between the different books relating to sacrifices, festivals, etc. call for some explanation.

How then are we to decide the question of authorship? There is considerable agreement today between scholars of widely differing schools that Numbers, in common with the rest of the Pentateuch, received its present shape, and at least some of its present material, at some time later than that of Moses himself. While not all are agreed how much goes back to Moses himself or at least to his times, it is argued by many that a distinction must be made between the time of origin of the basic laws and narratives and the time when the book received its final form. There is no insuperable difficulty in holding that these laws and the narrative which accompanies them originated in their essential form in the days of Moses. How they were transmitted until they were committed to writing, whether orally or partly in written form, it is not possible to say. Perhaps the major features of the book were committed to writing in the early days of the monarchy, but the date of the final composition is quite unknown.

SOURCES AND THEIR TREATMENT

Clearly the final editor(s) must have drawn on source material, whether oral or written. Some of this material is demonstrably ancient. For example, there are several ancient poems (e.g. 21:14ff.), important items of ancient geography (e.g. 22:5), and pieces of historical information which are consistent with the known events of the 13th century BC, and which find supporting evidence in archaeological data. All these point to an early origin for at least some of the sources. These as well as the other material available to the editor(s) were gathered and arranged so as to make certain theological issues clear (the normal method of the men who wrote much of the OT).

Naturally some questions arise. Where speeches are reported, e.g., are the actual words of the speaker recorded or merely a summary, or is it a free rendering (cf. the problem of the words of Jesus in the Gospels)? Again, in references to ancient institutions and ceremonies, is it possible that the account in Numbers as we now have it is a description of what these became in later centuries—the same in spirit and in essence, but different in detail? Certainty about such questions is not always possible, but it cannot be ruled out that some such modifications may have taken place in the course of transmission and in the light of experience.

The so-called classical documentary hypothesis, which has held sway in OT studies for over a century now, provided a very neat, if somewhat artificial, analysis of Numbers into its various sources. On this theory Numbers was divided between the P (Priestly) source and the JE (Jahwist – Elohist) sources as follows: chs. 1:1 – 10:10; 15; 18–19; 28–31, and smaller portions of other chapters are assigned to P, while chs. 22:2 – 24:25 completely, and portions of 10:11 – 12:16; 13; 14; 16; 17; 20–21; 25–27; 32–36, are assigned to JE. It is now recognized that the scheme was much too artificial. It is quite impossible to define 'documents' P and JE with sufficient accuracy to make the analysis into these sources beyond question. Nevertheless, on this basis, Numbers was conceived as an early historical epic (JE), interwoven with later legislation and a priestly reinterpretation of the significance of the facts recorded (P) which would enable Israel to understand more clearly her divine origin, call and destiny. Such a view, despite its artificial character, has something to commend it provided that a considerable degree of flexibility is allowed in defining the nature of P and JE. If the JE material is regarded as a collection of ancient epic material, and if the P material is regarded as a collection of legal and cultic material, likewise of considerable age, indeed ultimately Mosaic in origin, then the theory is not very different from the view proposed in this commentary. The final editor undertook the task of welding all his material together into its present shape so as to suit his purpose. This view should not be thought of as implying that the final picture was so wide of the mark and so distorted from the original story that it bore little or no resemblance to what actually took place. Rather those who hold it believe that the editor, with authentic material at his disposal, arranged this so as to preserve in its broad outline the true course of events, and to represent the essence of ancient institutions and rituals, even though a degree of idealization may have taken place so that they appeared in the final work in the form they came to have after the experiences of the intervening centuries.

SOME SPECIAL PROBLEMS

The question of numbers

In the book of Numbers a special usage of the terms 'thousand' (Heb. 'elep̄) and 'hundred' (Heb. mē'â) is encountered in the census lists of chs. 1–4 and 26, and in the account of the Midianite war in ch. 31. The census lists represent an ancient tradition of tribal quotas of men available for war, so that the terms in question signify military units of some kind (cf. 1 Sa. 8:12; 22:7; 2 Sa. 18:1, etc.). The exact numerical value of the terms is unknown. Alternatively, by vocalizing the consonants '-l-p to read 'allup̄ we have the meaning 'leader' or 'captain'. Elsewhere again the term 'elep̄ denotes 'family' or 'tent-group' (e.g. Jdg. 6:15; 1 Sa. 10:19; Mi. 5:2). Assuming that the terms in Nu. 1–4; 26 and 31 are military in nature and that the lists were ancient and authentic, it is possible that a later compiler of ancient source material misunderstood the true meaning of the terms and, assuming them to be numbers, simply added them up and arrived at the total 603,550 in 1:46. Or alternatively the term 'allup̄, 'captain', may have been confused with 'elep̄, 'thousand', so that, e.g., in 1:39 the 62,700 men of Dan may have read originally '60 captains, 2,700 men', or even '60 captains, 27 mē'ōṯ'. The problem is thus complex and a variety of mathematical solutions has been offered (e.g. R. E. D. Clark, JTVI, 1955; G. E. Mendenhall, JBL, 1958, LXXVII, Part I; J. W. Wenham, Tyndale Bulletin, 18, 1967).

Laws relating to sacrifices, festivals, vows, etc.

A comparison of Numbers with other books which refer to sacrifices, festivals, vows, etc., e.g. Exodus, Leviticus, Deuteronomy, Ezekiel, shows that there are differences in detail between the prescriptions in the various books (see Commentary). In some cases it is, of course, possible to harmonize the evidence, and in others it might fairly be said that we simply lack the clues which were anciently available to make the story coherent. Another explanation is that, although these institutions had a basic form already in the days of Moses, and although they preserved the spirit and the essential elements of the early forms, there were modifications at various times during the centuries of use, and that the form set out in Numbers represents the usage at the time of the final compilation of the source materials. The words of W. F. Albright (The Biblical Period, 1963, p. 19) in reference to the so-called 'priestly code' are apposite: 'How much of this ritual goes back to Moses himself it would be idle to conjecture in the present state of our knowledge; the spirit and much of the detail may be considered as ante-dating the Conquest of Canaan—in other words, as going back to Mosaic origins.'

The general historicity of Numbers

There are few today who would deny that at least some genuine historical events lie behind the book of Numbers. Some, like Martin Noth, would argue that particular events had reference only to particular groups of people, but that when the many tribal elements were eventually welded together in Canaan to form Israel, their different tribal traditions, each of which may have had a basis in history, were streamlined to give a connected narrative with an 'all Israel orientation'. Such a view would allow that the group which was present at Sinai was not necessarily the same group that made the journey around Transjordan after a stay at Kadesh in order to enter Canaan from the east.

It is here proposed that the present literary shape is not secondary and artificial but that it results from the simple fact that the original events took place in the same sequence, or approximately so. There may be uncertainty about the identification of place-names, or about the exact itinerary, or about the exact numbers of people, or even about the exact nature of some of the events which seem to have been recorded in a symbolic form (e.g. ch. 31). Perhaps also the sequence of events does not follow in exact chronological order so as to satisfy the canons of modern historical criticism. Perhaps, again, the description of the sacrifices, festivals, etc. represents a later developed form. But despite all these possibilities, most of which are inherent in ancient literary methods, it is here argued that the narrative is based on contemporary evidence and is essentially true to the original facts. Archaeological evidence, although it does not establish this view, is not inconsistent with it.

By comparison with modern critical history writing, Numbers is seen to be of a different order, for it sets out to make clear the divine significance of events. Exact details of how and when events took place are often omitted and the exact nature of events is sometimes difficult to reconstruct. But the significance of the event is plainly declared. For the people of Israel this was more important. Of what profit was it to know the exact details of an event if the meaning of the event was not understood?

The ancient poems

The poems of Balaam in chs. 23, 24 have a number of unusual features. Their content and style are homogeneous and point to a period between the middle of the 13th and the end of the 12th century BC as the time of composition. Ancient poetic devices, ways of spelling and orthography may be discerned in the Hebrew text. The geographical and historical background to the poems is consistent with the period of the Sea Peoples of the early 12th century BC (see Commentary). Other poems in 21:14, 15 and 21:17, 18, 27–30 seem to have been taken from ancient sources like the Book of the Wars of Yahweh or the repertoire of ancient ballad singers (21:27).

Religious value

Like every other OT book, Numbers was a vehicle for conveying God's truth to the people. While the book as we have it today represents the work of an editor and compiler of ancient materials who selected and arranged his materials so as to set forth important religious truths, we ought not to conclude that these truths were unknown before the editor gave expression to them. Israel's faith was an ancient one and was woven into her very life. At its basis was the belief that Yahweh the God of Israel was a personal, living God who stood in a peculiar relation to the people whom He had chosen. The book of Numbers expounds several important aspects of the being and activity of Yahweh the God of Israel.

Yahweh's presence in Israel. He who brought Israel from Egypt and made a covenant with them at Sinai was in their midst always, caring for them and guiding them. This is illustrated by the cloud ever present among them (9:15–23); by the explicit declaration, 'I the Lord dwell in the midst of the people of Israel' (35:34); by His response to the physical needs of Israel on many occasions (e.g. 11:31f.; 20:2–13), despite their grumbling; by His deliverance of His people from their enemies, enabling them finally to occupy their lands (e.g. 21:1–3, 21–35; 31:1–54, etc.); and by His protection even from the sinister intentions of Balak, king of Moab (chs. 22–24).

Yahweh's discipline of Israel. Yahweh used the wilderness experiences for the discipline, training and nurture of His people. They were chastened for acts of rebellion either against Himself or against the leaders He had chosen for Israel, for grumbling, for acts of apostasy, and for presumptuous acts. Divine judgment fell on the people as a whole (11:1–3; 21:6; 25:1–5, 6–13), upon the tribal chiefs (14:36f.), upon the Levites (ch. 16), upon Miriam (12:10) and upon Moses and Aaron (20:12f.). Thereby Israel learned that Yahweh alone was Sovereign and that no act of rebellion and no attempt to share allegiance with another god would pass unjudged. It was, however, the discipline and chastisement of love.

Yahweh's purposes. Since Yahweh was the Lord of history, His promises to the patriarchs to give them a land and descendants would be fulfilled. These were part of His purpose both for His people and for the world. Having chosen Israel and taken them into a covenant relationship, He would never repudiate His people but would remain faithful to His covenant. Hence neither Israel's unfaithfulness, nor the attacks of the nations on Israel as she journeyed, nor the devices of a diviner could hinder the unfolding of Yahweh's purposes. He would have His people enter the land of Canaan despite every opposition.

Yahweh's holiness. Narratives and laws in Numbers combine to demonstrate that Yahweh is holy. He will not tolerate any attempt on Israel's part to share her allegiance to Him with another deity (25:1–18). Despite His holiness, however, He could be approached with proper reverence, with due regard for proper procedures, and when men had put away every uncleanness. The sanctuary, the system of priests and Levites, the sacrifices, the feasts and the various ritual observances all served both to preserve Yahweh's holiness and also to stress His sovereignty, which extended even to the details of Israel's common life and daily worship. There was always the possibility of having one's sins 'covered', for Yahweh was both the Judge and the One who abounded in steadfast love and forgiveness (14:18, 19).

These significant truths about the nature and the activity of Yahweh should have taught Israel that Yahweh required her allegiance, her loyalty, faithfulness to His covenant, confident trust in His promises, a proper acknowledgment of His sovereignty and holiness, dependence on Him in the hour of need and danger. Moreover, He required each individual Israelite to respect the life, the family and the property of his fellow-Israelite, to show concern for his less fortunate brother, to demonstrate a willingness to co-operate with his brother in significant ventures of national importance, and to reject any inclination to turn his brother aside from loyalty to Yahweh by persuading him to worship another god.

Clearly, such a noble picture of the ways of God with His people is significant for the modern believer. God is unchanging in His ways and His people are the subject of His loving concern in every age. He who draws them into the new covenant made with Him in the Lord Jesus Christ will care for them, guide them and deliver them no less carefully than He did in the case of Israel. His kindly discipline will be felt at times for He is ever a loving Father who chastens His children. He remains the Lord of history and His promises concerning the ultimate outcome of His purposes remain. The company of believers in the 20th century AD is caught up in His purposes too and no power in heaven or on earth can finally hinder the fulfilment of His purposes. He still requires utter loyalty from His people (Rom. 12:1). He has made a way of approach to Himself through His Son, the Lord Jesus (Heb. 7–10) in whom all the intention of the old covenant sacrificial system was fulfilled. Moreover, in the daily life of every single believer today He expects conduct which is consistent both with their high status as members of the covenant family, and with their profession about their life in Christ. In brief, all that we have stated above in reference to the religious value of Numbers for the ancient people of Israel may with equal relevance be claimed for the Christian.

1:1 – 10:10 THE PREPARATION FOR THE JOURNEY FROM SINAI TO CANAAN

The biblical narrative dealing with events at Sinai begins at Ex. 19 and continues on into Nu. 10. It then moves to the story of the onward journey to the promised land. The preparations for that journey are given in the first ten chapters of Numbers.

1:1–54 The first census

1:1–3 God commands the census to be taken. 1 The Hebrew name for the book, bᵉmiḏbār (lit. in the wilderness), is the fourth word in the Hebrew of v.1. LXX gave the book a descriptive title which, translated into Latin, lies at the basis of the English name. (See Introduction.) God's command to take a census came on the first day of the second month after Israel had left Egypt. It was in the wilderness of Sinai, the exact site of which is unknown. Traditionally Sinai is Gebel Mûsa, although it may have been Gebel Serbāl some 20 miles to the north-west, or even a mountain in the region of Kadesh. Fittingly, God spoke with Moses in the tent of meeting. 2, 3 The census concerned the males from 20 years old and upward in the whole congregation of Israel. The purpose was to determine military potential; so the use of the terms 'thousand' (Heb. 'elep̄) and 'hundred' (Heb. mē'â) should be understood in a military sense (cf. on 11:21, 22; and see Introduction).

1:4–16 The census officials. 4 Moses was to choose a man from each tribe who was the head of his fathers' house. These men are called 'leader' (Heb. nāśî') elsewhere (cf. 2:3–31; 7; 10:14–28), and were important figures in tribal life. 5–15 A list of the men chosen is now given. Apart from the Judahite names Nahshon and Amminadab (v. 7), none of these is known outside Numbers (cf. Ex. 6:23; Ru. 4:18–21). Most of the names are, however, theophoric, i.e. they contain the name of God, 'El' or 'Shaddai'. Other names contain the element 'āḇ ('father'), 'aḥ ('brother'), e.g. Abidan (v. 11; Heb. 'aḇîḏān, 'the divine father has judged'). in the manner of the West Semitic sentence-names common during the period 2000 to 1000 BC but which went out of use later. 16 Clans (AV 'thousands') here translates Hebrew 'elep̄, elsewhere in this passage a military unit (cf. on VV. 2, 3). That it can thus be used to denote a sub-clan also shows the versatility of the word and its tendency to depart from a merely numerical meaning.

1:17–46 The details of the census. 17–19 Moses and Aaron, assisted by the twelve leaders, proceeded to carry out the census. 20–46 The numbers given here at the beginning of the journey should be compared with those in ch. 26 for the end of the journey. In the following list the two are given, with the later number in brackets: Reuben, 46,500 (43,730); Simeon, 59,300 (22,200); Gad, 45,650 (40,500); Judah, 74,600 (76,500); Issachar, 54,400 (64,300); Zebulun, 57,400 (60,500); Ephraim, 40,500 (32,500); Manasseh, 32,200 (52,700); Benjamin, 35,400 (45,600); Dan, 62,700 (64,400); Asher, 41,500 (53,400); Naphtali, 53,400 (45,400). The order of this list differs somewhat from that in Gn. 29–30. The sons of Leah and Rachel are in the order of their birth but the sons of Bilhah, viz. Dan and Naphtali, and the sons of Zilpah, viz. Gad and Asher, are out of order. Further, while Simeon decreased greatly over the years, Manasseh increased greatly. The total number of the tribes that later comprised Israel outnumber the later Judah tribes by five or six to one. The numbers in any case create special problems of interpretation (see Introduction).

1:47–54 The duties of the Levites. 47–49 The Levites were not numbered by their ancestral tribe (cf. 3:21–39) since they were not required for military service. 50, 51 The task of the Levites was to care for the Tabernacle of the testimony and all its furnishings, to take it down, to carry it, to set it up and to tend it. This last verb (Heb. šāraṯ) is used for all kinds of noble service, but particularly of service associated with Israel's worship of Yahweh (cf. Ex. 28:35; Dt. 10:8; 17:12, etc.). The tabernacle of the testimony was so designated because it housed two stone tables on which were written the Ten Commandments (cf. Ex. 31:18; 40:20). The word 'testimony' could be translated 'covenant stipulations'. Unauthorized persons were forbidden to approach the sanctuary on pain of death. 52–54 Whereas the non-Levites pitched their tents around their own standard, the Levites pitched around the central sanctuary, thus protecting it and obviating any desecration of it which might incur the wrath of Yahweh (cf. 16:46; 1 Sa. 6:19, 20).

2:1–34 Position of the tribes in the camp and on the march

Some commentators have regarded this chapter as an idealization of what Israel actually did in the wilderness and have proposed that the chapter was influenced by Ezk. 48. That biblical writers used artificial literary devices at times need not be denied. Nor were they always as concerned with spatial and chronological precision as we are today (the temptations of Jesus, e.g., have a different order in Matthew and Luke).

But even if it be granted that the arrangement of the tribes is here idealized we ought not to conclude that there was no plan at all either for the march or for the encampment. Presumably there was a need for some orderly procedures, which is the essence of what is here depicted. The tent of meeting stood as the central feature of the whole arrangement whether Israel was in an encampment or on the march and symbolized the divine presence in Israel's midst at all times. It was no longer outside the camp (cf. Ex. 33:7f.) but in the very centre.

2:1–31 The order of the camps. 1, 2 Each tribal group was to camp beside the standard of the leader of its group of tribes. In addition the ensigns of the various ancestral houses were displayed. There were four tribal leaders, Judah, Reuben, Ephraim and Dan, and presumably twelve ancestral houses. Jewish tradition ascribes a lion to Judah, a human head to Reuben, an ox to Ephraim, and an eagle to Dan. Just how close the various encampments were to the central sanctuary is not clear. The Hebrew expression facing (Heb. minneged, literally 'away from', 'opposite') can also mean 'at a distance' (cf. Dt. 32:52, where it is translated 'before you'). Certainly in Jos. 3:4 the distance between the ark and the people was 2,000 cubits, i.e. about 1,000 yards. 3–9 The tribes were deployed in four groups. On the east side under Nahshon the leader of Judah were Judah, Issachar and Zebulun. 10–16 On the south side were the tribes Reuben, Simeon and Gad under the leadership of Elizur of Reuben. 17 The tent of meeting followed Reuben. Some difficulty is encountered with this verse. Comparison with 10:17–21 shows a different order of march: in 2:17 the three families of the Levites followed Reuben; in 10:17 the sons of Gershon and the sons of Merari who carried the Tabernacle went ahead of Reuben while the third Levitical family, the Kohathites, followed Reuben (cf. 10:17–21). This would seem to be a more natural order, as it allows time to elapse for the erection of the Tabernacle before the sacred objects, carried by the Kohathites, arrived. Evidently the expression in the midst of the camps ought not to be interpreted too literally. In fact the Levi tribes were both preceded by and followed by other tribes and so were 'in the midst'. 18–24 On the west side were Ephraim, Manasseh and Benjamin under the leadership of Elishama of Ephraim. 25–31 On the north side were Dan, Asher and Naphtali under the standard of Ahiezer of Dan. The leaders in each case were those who assisted in the census.

2:32–34 General summary. The grand total of fighting men given in 1:44–46 is here repeated. The number of Levites is given in 3:39 since no reference has yet been made to the census of the Levites.

3:1 - 4:49 The census and duties of the Levites

The Levites were not counted with the secular tribes and so were the subject of a special census (vv. 14–51). They were distinct from the priests of the sanctuary (vv. 1–4) and were their servants (vv. 5–13). A study of the Levites throughout the whole period of Israel's history shows that their status varied from time to time. Originally they were simply one of the secular tribes. Levi, a son of Leah (Gn. 29:34) gave rise to a family which was originally a non-priestly tribe (Gn. 34; 49:5–7). The Levitical ancestry of Moses is affirmed (cf. Ex. 2:1; 6:19f.; Nu. 26:59; 1 Ch. 6:1–3). In later times, however, as the number grew quite beyond the needs of the sanctuary at Jerusalem, there were many Levites who never came to Jerusalem. In practice only one group of the whole Levitical family functioned as priests. Yet theoretically all the tribe of Levi were priests (cf. Dt. 18:1, 'the Levitical priests, that is, all the tribe of Levi'). The later distinction made in Ezekiel confirmed what had been a de facto distinction much earlier (cf. Ezk. 44:6–31).

3:1–4 The descendants of Aaron. 1 These verses hark back to Ex. 6:23 and Lv. 10:1f. where the sons of Aaron are given. The expression generations (Heb. tôl^{e}dōṯ), common in Genesis (cf. Gn. 5:1; 6:9, etc.) where it provides the framework for the whole narrative, can sometimes be translated 'story', and so this verse could be translated: 'This is the story of Aaron and Moses at the time when Yahweh spoke with Moses on Mount Sinai.' 2, 3 Aaron's four sons are named, all of them anointed to act as priests. The term 'ordain' means literally 'fill the hand', i.e. 'entrust to the hands of'. Quite apart from any divine institution it would be altogether reasonable and in keeping with ancient custom for Moses, the promulgator of Yahwism, to give a leading role to his own tribe and family in the organization and protection of this new religious constitution given by Yahweh to His people (cf. Ex. 29:7–9; 40:15). 4 Nadab and Abihu, sons of Aaron, died without heirs when they introduced unauthorized fire into the sanctuary (cf. Lv. 10:1, 2), so that only Eleazar and Ithamar of Aaron's sons lived to function as priests in the lifetime of Aaron their father. Eleazar, as the elder son, took precedence but both branches were still serving in David's time (cf. 1 Ch. 24:1–4).

3:5–10 The Levites as servants of the priests. 5, 6a The Levites were first 'brought near', probably to Yahweh (cf. 8:16) and then set before Aaron. 6b–10 It was the duty and privilege of the whole tribe of Levi to serve the Lord. But there was a division of tasks within the tribe. Aaron and his sons attended to the priesthood and the rest of the tribe were at their service performing duties in the Tabernacle for the priests and for the whole congregation. Only Aaron and his descendants, Eleazar or Ithamar, Zadok or Abiathar, were authorized to perform priestly duties. Unauthorized priests were in danger of death.

3:11–13 The significance of the Levites. The Levites were representatives for the firstborn (cf. Ex. 22:29, 30; 34:19, 20). Instead of taking the firstborn for His service, Yahweh substituted the tribe of Levi (cf. Nu. 3:40–51).

3:14–39 The census of the Levites. 14–16 The census of the Levites proceeded as Yahweh commanded. It was a census of every male from a month old and upward (cf. 1:3). 17 The division of the Levites into three, Gershon and Kohath and Merari agrees with 26:57 and Ex.

6:16–19. 18–20 Gershon is further divided into two sub-groups, Kohath into four, and Merari into two. Cf. the division of the Levites into five families. Libni, Hebron, Mahli, Mushi, and Koran in 26:58. 21–26 The Gershonites, who numbered 7,500, camped west of the sanctuary under the leadership of Eliasaph. They had charge of all the coverings, curtains, cords, of the Tabernacle, the tent and the court (cf. 4:24–28). On the march they followed Reuben (cf. 10:17). 27–32 The Kohathites numbered 8,300, following the LXX. (The total of v. 39 requires a reduction of 300 in one of the tribes and the proposal to read the letters š-l-š meaning 'three' in place of š-š meaning 'six' is generally accepted.) This group encamped on the south side of the Tabernacle under the leadership of Elizaphan. They had the responsibility of the most sacred objects of the Tabernacle furniture, the ark, the table, the lampstand, the altars, the vessels . . . and the screen separating the Holy Place from the Holy of Holies. All these items were too holy to be transported in wagons but were carried (cf. 4:14, 15; 7:9). 33–37 The Merarites under the leadership of Zuriel camped on the north side of the Tabernacle and numbered 6,200. They had charge of the frames . . ., the bars, the pillars, the bases . . . pegs and cords (cf. 4:29–33). 38 Moses and Aaron and his sons occupied the fourth side of the square surrounding the sanctuary on the east. Their responsibility was the rites within the sanctuary, whatever had to be done for the people of Israel. 39 The total number of Levites from a month old and upward was 22,000.

3:40–51 The census of the firstborn in Israel. 40–43 A census of all the firstborn males in Israel from a month old and upward was taken. The count was 22,273. The Levites numbered 22,000. The difference of 273 required some compensation if Yahweh were to take the Levites instead of all the first-born among the people of Israel. 44–51 Compensation was achieved by the payment of five shekels of silver for each of the 273 Israelites not matched by a Levite, the shekel being reckoned by the shekel of the sanctuary. While this latter expression may reflect more settled times and show the hand of the editor, presumably even in Moses' day there was some official weight for the transaction of daily business. The silver so collected, referred to as redemption money, was given to Aaron and his sons. The term 'redemption' derives from the root p-d-y and can be translated 'ransom', a term from commercial law referring to money paid to liberate persons or things which have fallen into the possession of another. The number of firstborn, viz. 22,000, seems small in comparison with 1:46 where the males over twenty numbered 603,550. It is not clear on what basis the numbering was done, unless it was that the reference is to the firstborn of those in Egypt whose lives were spared and for whom the Levites were taken as a substitute (cf. v. 13). In any case the number in 1:46 is uncertain in view of the term 'thousand' (see Introduction).

4:1–49 The Levites: their numbers and duties. It is impossible to say how far the picture here represents the exact ancient practice, but there were cult objects in Moses' day and modern study suggests that the picture here is, at least in broad outline, a reflection of ancient practice.

1–20 The Kohathites. 1–3 The Kohathites whose duties were concerned with the furniture of the sanctuary are placed first (cf. 3:21–32 where the Gershonites are first). The present census is not concerned with the question of equating Levites with the firstborn (cf. 3:40–51) but with males from 30 to 50 years of age who can enter the service, to do the work in the tent of meeting. These age limits varied over the years (cf. 8:23–26; 1 Ch. 23:24, 27; 2 Ch. 31:17; Ezr. 3:8). The term service (Heb. ṣāḇā') is used of military service in 1:3 ('go forth to war') but elsewhere in the OT also for the trials of the Exile (cf. Is. 40:2 'warfare', but see RSV mg.), or for toil and trouble (cf. Jb. 7:1 'hard service'). The comparison with military service suggests that the Levites were as carefully organized for the service of Yahweh as the militia for battle (cf. 1 Tim. 1:18). 4 The sphere of service for the Kohathites was the most holy things, which seems to refer to the Holy of Holies (cf. Ex. 26:33). 5, 6 When the camp was struck, Aaron and his sons dismantled and packed the sacred objects of the sanctuary so that the Kohathites might not see them or touch them. The curtain or veil of the screen which hung before the Holy of Holies was used to cover the ark. Then a second covering of goatskin (or perhaps dolphin skin) and a third covering, a cloth . . . of blue (or bluish purple), were placed over the ark for protection from the elements and from prying eyes. The bluish-purple outer covering marked out the ark for all to see. Finally the poles, normally removed only for packing and unpacking, were placed in position (cf. Ex. 25:15). 7, 8 The table of the bread of the Presence was covered by a similar bluish-purple cloth and the plates ('deep-dishes', 'basins', Heb. qᵉ'ārâ; cf. Nu. 7:13), the dishes, small incense vessels (lit. 'hands'), the bowls, and the flagons used in the Tabernacle rituals were placed on it. A cloth of scarlet was spread over all these and finally a covering of goatskin (or dolphin skin) before the carrying poles were inserted. 9, 10 The seven-branched lampstand with its accompanying utensils, lamps, snuffers, (ash)trays (or incense receptacles; Heb. maḥtâ) and oil-vessels were all wrapped in the animal skin and laid on their carrying frame which was perhaps a pole or a flat board. 11 The golden altar (cf. Ex. 30:1, 3; and for its use Lv. 4:7) which stood before the inner veil was covered with a bluish-purple cloth and animal skin and its carrying poles were attached. 12 The vessels used in the sanctuary were also wrapped in bluish-purple cloth and animal skin. 13, 14 The ashes were removed from the large altar (cf. Ex. 27:1f.) and it was covered with a reddish-purple cloth. Finally the various utensils used at the altar were placed on it, the whole was covered and the carrying poles inserted. Firepans (Heb. maḥtâ), cf. v. 9; forks, perhaps three-pronged flesh-hooks (cf. 1 Sa. 2:13); basins were used for throwing blood against the corners of the altar. 15 When Aaron and his sons had covered all these sacred items they were committed to the Kohathites for carrying. 16 Eleazar, in addition to general responsibilities over the leaders of the Levites (cf. 3:32), had the charge of the oil for the light, the incense, and the regular cereal-offering, as well as the general care of the Tabernacle. 17–20 The work of the Kohathites was thus closely associated with that of the priests. Yet they were never to see or touch the vessels of the Holy of Holies. The expression even for a moment is a vivid one, literally 'as a swallowing', i.e. the time taken to swallow one's spittle.

21–28 The Gershonites. This group was responsible for the less holy furniture of the Tabernacle, the curtains, screens, ropes for the whole structure, the tent and its court (cf. Ex. 26:1–14). Wagons were provided to carry these burdens (cf. Nu. 7:7). The Gershonites were under the care of Ithamar, the younger of Aaron's surviving sons who was himself a Kohathite (cf. Ex. 6:16, 18, 20, 23). According to these verses Eleazar, son of Aaron, had more significant responsibilities than did Ithamar, suggesting that the Zadokite Levites as they were later known (cf. 1 Ch. 24:3, 6) had precedence over the Ithamar Levites.

29–33 The Merarites. The lowliest tasks of all, the care and transport of the frames and accessories (cf. Ex. 26:15–30) were committed to the descendants of Merari over whom Ithamar stood as overseer. They too were provided with wagons (cf. Nu. 7:8).

34–49 The census numbers for the Levites. 34–48 The numbers of males eligible for the service of the Tabernacle were Kohathites: 2,750, Gershonites: 2,630, and Merarites: 3,200, a total of 8,580. 49 is difficult to translate. One proposal is: 'It was on the command of Yahweh under the direction of Moses that they numbered them each one according to his task and according to what he had to carry. Thus they were numbered according as Yahweh commanded Moses.'

5:1 – 6:27 Regulations for the Nazirite and miscellaneous laws

5:1–31 Miscellaneous laws and regulations. Not all the laws in this section appear to have specific reference to a camp, although vv. 1–4 suit such an environment. The rest are of more general application and would apply wherever problems of human relationships arose.

1–4 The exclusion of the ritually unclean from the camp. The presence of the Tabernacle and the ark symbolized the presence of Yahweh in the camp which thus became a holy area from which every unclean thing was to be excluded including lepers (cf. Lv. 13; 14), men and women suffering from a discharge (cf. Lv. 15), or individuals who had touched a dead body (Heb. nepeš, 'spirit', used as widely as English uses the word 'person'; cf. Nu. 19:11f.). The seclusion of women in the camp at the time of menstruation was practised in the east until recent times.

5–10 Breach of trust and restitution of stolen property. 5, 6 This law is an extension of the law in Lv. 6:1–7. When someone caused harm or loss to his fellow Israelite it was tantamount to an offence against Yahweh. 7 Such men incurred guilt and were bound to confess their wrong and to make restitution (Heb. 'āšām) equal to 20 per cent of the value of the damage or loss. The term 'āšām is used in the OT both for the so-called 'guilt-offering' (cf. Lv. 6), and for the compensation payable. 8 Where there was no living relative or kinsman (Heb. gō'ēl) to whom restitution could be made, the compensation was given to the priest along with the ram of atonement to cover the man's evil deed. 9, 10 The priests received other offerings also. Offering (Heb. t'rûmâ, used, e.g., in Lv. 7:14, AV 'heave-offering') signifies the reserved portions lifted off from the sin-offering.

11–31 The law of jealousy. This law concerns the case of a man's wife who is found to be pregnant and the husband suspects he is not the father.

11, 12 When a man suspected his wife of unfaithfulness, provision was made for a strange trial by ordeal. The accusation is that the wife goes astray (Heb. śāṭâ, i.e. commits marital unfaithfulness) and acts unfaithfully (Heb. mā'al; cf. its use in Jos. 7:1, 'to break faith') towards her husband. 13 Sexual misconduct is clearly intended, for the verse reads literally 'a man lies with her with the emission of seed'. The act was without her husband's knowledge and without witnesses. 14, 15 Whether the husband had grounds for suspicion or not, once a jealous spirit possessed him he took his wife to the priest, bringing as a sacrificial gift on her behalf a tenth of an ephah of barley meal without oil or frankincense. The absence of these latter items suggests a sin-offering (cf. Lv. 5:11). The offering was called a cereal offering of jealousy, which brought the wrongdoing to mind. 16–18 The priest then set the woman before the Lord, i.e. at the entrance to the sanctuary, with her hair loosed (cf. Lv. 13:45) and the cereal-offering in her hands. Meantime he had taken holy water, presumably from the bronze laver, in an earthen vessel into which he had put dust from the floor of the Tabernacle. Then, holding the water of bitterness that brings the curse in his hand he required the woman to take an oath. The exact meaning of bitterness (Heb. mārîm) is not clear. It has been derived from roots meaning 'bitter', 'test', 'pass by'. Since the context is one of trial by ordeal we might translate 'waters of testing'. The expression that brings the curse is a single word in Hebrew and is probably a participle derived from the root '-r-r, 'curse' or 'cast a spell'. The water was regarded as a means of producing the result of vv. 21, 22, 27. 19–22 After the warning of vv. 19, 20 the priest made the woman take the oath of the curse, i.e. to declare the truth of the matter on pain of suffering the consequences if she spoke falsely. The consequences were expressed in severe terms. 'May the Lord make you a curse (an execration, Heb. 'ālâ) and an imprecation (an oath, Heb. šᵉḇû'â) among your people when the Lord causes your thigh to sag (fall away) and your belly to distend (your body swell); may this water that induces (brings) the curse enter your belly (body) causing the belly to distend (make your body swell) and the thigh to sag (your thigh fall away).' To this the woman was required to reply 'Amen, Amen'. Jewish tradition in the Mishnah Ṣotah argued that the sin started with the thigh and finished with the womb so that both were to suffer judgment.

23, 24 The final act of the ritual was to write the curses on a document, wipe them off into the water of bitterness, and make the woman drink the mixture. 25, 26 Then the cereal-offering of jealousy was taken from the woman, waved before the Lord, and brought to the altar where a handful of it was burned as a token portion. 27 Unfortunately it is not clear in the narrative precisely how the guilt or innocence of the woman was decided. Presumably the guilty woman suffered some ill effects, bitter pain, swelling of the body, the sagging of the thigh (was all this a picture of a miscarriage?), and subsequent reproach among her people as an adulteress. 28 The innocent woman, however, gave birth to the child and to others thereafter. It is probably quite unnecessary to see in the several references to the woman drinking (vv. 24, 26, 27) separate occasions of drinking. Ancient Hebrew writers did not follow western methods of expressing themselves, and v. 24 could be an anticipation of later verses. Only after the oath had been sworn and the offering presented did the woman drink. 29–31 The closing words of the chapter indicate that this law applied only to the case of an adulterous woman. Men in ancient Israel could marry more than one wife and have concubines too. Only in the case of another man's wife could he commit adultery.

Such trials by ordeal were common in the ancient world in cases of infidelity. The ceremony recorded here is notable for its leniency in comparison with the fierce ordeals prescribed in pagan circles, and also for the fact that it was more likely to result in a verdict of innocence whereas the others were certainly weighted in the direction of guilt. Strange as the whole circumstance and ritual may seem to us, it compares so favourably with non-Israelite practice that it may be taken as evidence of that generally considerate attitude of the law of Moses towards women.

6:1–21 Regulations for the Nazirite. The institution of the Nazirite vow could be observed by both men and women. It was designed to provide for the setting apart of a person by means of a vow in order to undertake some special service for Yahweh. The rules first define the character of the vow (vv. 1–8); then the procedure to be followed should the vow be broken (vv. 9–12); and finally, the special ceremonies to be observed once the vow was fulfilled (vv. 13–21).

1–8 The Nazirite vow. 1, 2 The Nazirite vow was one of a number of special vows that an Israelite might take (cf. Lv. 22:21; 27:2). The term, nāzîr, in Hebrew derives from the root n-z-r, 'to vow', its special significance being 'to withhold from wonted use'. It is a passive participle meaning 'one who has made a vow'. The same root occurs in the verb separate himself. 3, 4 The Nazirite was bound to abstain from alcohol or anything that might ferment and produce alcohol, such as wine, strong drink, grape juice, grapes fresh or dried. The terms translated seeds (Heb. ḥarṣannîm) and skins (Heb. zāg) are of uncertain meaning. 5 The hair and beard were to remain uncut during the period of the vow and the person was to remain holy or set apart. Cf. Samson, Jdg. 16:17, 22. Locks. The noun (Heb. pera') derives from the same root as is used in 5:18 to describe a woman's hair loose and flowing (cf. Jdg. 5:2 where 'the leaders took the lead' might probably be translated 'the flowing locks were loosed', a reference to a Nazirite vow undertaken for the purposes of a holy war against Sisera). 6–8 The Nazirite was forbidden to touch a dead body—even in the case of close relatives—because the mark of his Nazirite state (separation) was on his head.

9–12 Procedure following a broken vow. 9 If a Nazirite touched a dead body unwittingly or accidentally, as when a man died suddenly beside him, his vow must begin all over again. His consecrated head was to be shaved and he undertook seven days of purification, after which his head was shaved again. 10–12 On the eighth day the least expensive form of offering, two turtle doves or two young pigeons, were brought to the priest at the door of the tent of meeting, one for a burnt offering and one for a sin offering because his sin was unwitting. Thus covered he began anew his period of separation and offered a guilt-offering, possibly to compensate for his delay in fulfilling his vow.

13–21 Procedures following the fulfilment of the vow. 13a The Nazirite vow was not a permanent vow but was terminable. There were proper procedures to be observed and a variety of offerings to present. Cf. the offerings of the eighth day for the consecration of a priest (Lv. 9:1–22). 13b–17 The Nazirite was brought (or came, the text is obscure) to the door of the tent of meeting to offer a gift to Yahweh consisting of an unblemished male lamb in its first year for a burnt offering, an unblemished ewe lamb in its first year for a sin offering, and an unblemished ram as a peace offering along with the prescribed cereal-offerings and drink-offerings to be offered by the priest. 18 The Nazirite shaved his consecrated head at the door of the tent of meeting and burned the hair in the fire . . . under the sacrifice of the peace offering. The Lord's portion in this case was the fat, the kidneys and the liver (cf. Lv. 3:9–11). The hair belonged with these items as things that were holy (set apart) to Yahweh. Hair was especially significant not only in Israel, but in many other lands, perhaps because its rapid growth symbolized the divine strength that was given to men (cf. Samson, Jdg. 13–16). 19, 20 Presumably the officiating priest took the normal portions of the ram of the peace-offering, i.e. the thigh, while the priests took the breast as in Lv. 3:6–11; 7:28–34; 10:14, 15. In the Nazirite ceremony the priests received symbolically from the hand of the released Nazirite the shoulder of the ram after it had been boiled, and one of the wafers. These he waved before the Lord and then took them as his own holy portion together with the breast and the thigh. Since the peace-offering was normally one in which the offerer himself shared (cf. Lv. 7:11–21) it would seem that the conclusion of the Nazirite vow was celebrated with a family sacrificial meal and the drinking of wine. 21 The offerings prescribed were the minimum but it was open for the Nazirite to offer what else he can afford. The only proviso was that he must discharge the vow he promised.

6:22–27 The priestly benediction. 22, 23 Here is one of Israel's most beautiful benedictions expressed in three pairs of invocations addressed to Yahweh, Israel's God. 24 First, Yahweh is invited positively to bless the people (with crops, herds, flocks, good seasons, offspring, etc.), and negatively to keep them (from all evil, bad harvests, enemies, barren flocks and herds, childlessness). 25 Secondly, Yahweh is invited to turn towards His people in pleasurable acceptance of them (cf. Ps. 31:16) and to bestow His favour on them. 26 Thirdly, He is invited to lift up his countenance towards His people in recognition and approval and to give them peace, i.e. to grant them totality of well-being, wholeness and completeness in every way. 27 In the act of blessing the people the priest put the divine name on Israel, i.e. he declared that they belonged to God since His name connoted His person, and he who has God's name upon him is assured of God's blessing.

7:1 – 8:26 The offerings of the leaders and miscellaneous laws and regulations

7:1–89 The offerings of the leaders of the tribes. This chapter, perhaps the longest in the OT, is a monotonous repetition of one formula repeated twelve times with a change only in the name of the leader and the tribe. Such repetition emphasizes the very great generosity of the leaders as an example for future generations. The gifts provided for the equipment and transport of the Tabernacle and its furniture. The offerings of each leader were a silver plate weighing 130 shekels, a silver basin of 70 shekels, both full of fine flour mixed with oil for a cereal-offering, a golden dish of 10 shekels full of incense, one young bull, one ram, one male lamb a year old for a burnt-offering, one male goat for a sin-offering, and for the sacrifice of peace-offerings two oxen, five rams, five male goats, and five male lambs a year old. The gifts were brought 'on the day when Moses had finished setting up the tabernacle, and had anointed and consecrated it with all its furnishings, and had anointed the altar with its utensils' (v. 1). The Tabernacle had been set up on the first day of the first month in the second year after the Exodus (cf. Ex. 40:17). On the first day of the second month the census was ordered (cf. 1:1, 2). The events of ch. 7 must precede those of ch. 1; the order is not chronological. Possibly the information in this chapter was placed here because of references to the wagons and transport.

1–10 The wagons and the oxen. 2 The leaders are those of ch. 2 arranged in the same order. 3 They brought six covered wagons, one for every two leaders, and twelve oxen, one for each leader. The other gifts were brought on successive days, gold and silver vessels, and the various offerings for the dedication of the sanctuary and for the first offerings. The exact nature of the wagons (Heb. ṣāḇ, Akkad. ṣumbu) is not clear. In some traditions (Sifra and Targum Onkelos) these were covered wagons, in others (Symmachus) they were wagons for military service. In Is. 66:20 the word is translated 'litters'. The translation of the Jewish Publication Society of America is 'draught carts'. 4–8 The wagons and oxen were accepted by Moses and given to the Levites, two to the Gershonites, and four to the Merarites. 9 The Kohathites did not receive wagons since they had to carry the holiest of the Tabernacle furnishings on their shoulders. The expression holy things is singular in the Hebrew text and refers collectively to the sanctuary and all that was in it. 10 The term dedication (Heb. ḥᵃnukkâ) became popular in later times in Israel.

11–88 The gifts for the dedication of the altar. The rest of the chapter is devoted to a detailed listing of the gifts of the leaders according to a standard formula. Several types of offering are mentioned: cereal-offering, burnt-offering, sin-offering, peace-offerings. Incidentally, the sin-offering is not listed among the offerings at the dedication of the later sanctuaries, the first Temple (cf. 1 Ki. 8:64), or the second Temple (cf. 1 Macc. 4:53, 56). In the list of vessels the silver plates (Heb. qᵉʿārâ) were deep dishes weighing 130 shekels (c. 52 oz.), the silver basins or bowls (Heb. mizrāq) were used for tossing the blood on the altar and weighed 70 shekels (28 oz.), and the golden dishes (Heb. kap̄) were small vessels shaped like the palm of the hand and weighed ten shekels (c. 4 oz.). The grand total of all the offerings is carefully listed at the conclusion of the individual lists.

89 Moses in the tent of meeting. The concluding verse of the chapter makes the simple declaration that Yahweh spoke with Moses from between the two golden cherubim which rested on the mercy seat when Moses went into the tent of meeting (cf. Ex. 25:18–22; 37:7–9).

8:1–26 Miscellaneous laws and regulations. 1–4 The lighting of the lamps. 1–3 Instructions for the making of the lamps occur in Ex. 25:31–40; 37:17–24. The instruction here concerns the setting up of the lamps by Aaron (cf. Ex. 30:8; Lv. 24:2f.). His sons shared the responsibility (cf. Ex. 27:21). The lamps were to shed their light towards the front of the lampstand across to the table on the north side (cf. Ex. 40:22–25). 4 The lampstand was made of hammered (or beaten) . . . gold and was evidently beaten out both towards its base and towards its flower-shaped oil cups according to the pattern which the Lord had shown Moses (cf. Ex. 25:9, 40). It is idle to conjecture the exact manner in which Moses discovered the will of Yahweh in this matter.

5–22 The purification and presentation of the Levites to Yahweh. 5–7 There was an elaborate ritual for the purification of the Levites. 6 Cleanse. The verb is ṭihar; cf. the stronger verb qiddēš, 'to consecrate', used of the priests in Ex. 28:41; Lv. 8:12. First, water of expiation was sprinkled on them (cf. complete washing of priests, Lv. 8:6); then all the hair was shaved from their bodies and their clothes were washed (cf. new clothes of the priests, Lv. 8:13). 8, 9 Being thus cleansed they brought a young bull and its cereal offering as a burnt-offering, and another young bull for a sin offering. Moses presented the Levites at the tent of meeting where the whole congregation of the people of Israel was assembled to lay their hands on the Levites. 10 The laying on of the hands must have been done in some representative way, e.g. by the laying of the hands of the twelve tribal leaders upon representative Levites. 11 Similarly Aaron's offering the Levites before the Lord as a wave-offering was symbolic. As such they were allotted to the priests for the service of Yahweh. 12 Thus set apart, the Levites laid their hands on the animals they had brought and Aaron offered these as an atonement (covering). These verses are of considerable value as evidence for the meaning of the laying on of hands. In v. 10, the Levites are designated by this rite to act as substitutes for the nation, and, by equality of reasoning, the animals are thus appointed to substitute for the Levites. The same substitutionary significance of the rite is found in Lv. 16:21. 13 This verse does not suggest a second wave-offering but is merely repetitive, as so often in Hebrew. 14, 15 Thereafter the Levites were ready to commence their duties. 16, 17 Once again the representative character of the Levites is affirmed. They were a substitute for the firstborn of Israel (cf. 3:11–13) and they were wholly given to Yahweh (cf. 3:9). There is a backward reference here to the firstborn of Egypt which may indicate that the original comparison was made with the firstborn of Israel who were delivered in Egypt (see on 3:40–51). 18, 19 The Levites were to act as a cover or screen between the people and the Holy Place so that none of the common people might approach the sanctuary and risk sudden divine judgment (cf. 1:53). Atonement here takes its original sense of 'cover'. 20–22 The instructions were carried out according to the divine command. Purified themselves, literally 'to de-sin oneself', i.e. remove the defilement of sin.

23–26 Age limits for Levites. 23, 24 The lower age limit here is twenty-five (cf. thirty in 4:3, and twenty in 1 Ch. 23:24, 27, etc.). Evidently the age limit varied from time to time. The compiler of ancient records simply recorded the variant practices. 25, 26 Although the Levites retired from normal duties at fifty they could give voluntary service and assist their younger brethren.

9:1–14 The supplementary Passover

9:1–8 A new problem for Moses. 1–3 Normally the Passover was observed at the appointed time on the fourteenth day of the first month (Nisan) according to the statutes and ordinances laid down (cf. Ex. 12:24–27; Dt. 16:1–8). It was held in the evening (lit. 'between the two evenings', cf. Lv. 23:5). 4, 5 The story is here set immediately after the setting up of the Tabernacle and a month before the census was taken at Sinai. 6–8 When some of the people were prevented from observing the Passover because of defilement through touching a corpse they sought advice about their own observance of the feast. It was a new problem and required divine guidance which Moses sought.

9:9–14 The solution. 9, 10 After consulting Yahweh Moses made known generous provisions both for the ritually unclean and for absent Israelites. 11, 12 The Passover was still to be observed but it could be postponed until the fourteenth day of the second month. It is assumed that the absentee would return so that the exile is not in view. The law was thus neither rigid nor automatic as to time, although the observance of the feast was obligatory. The regulations in other respects were the same (cf. Ex. 12:8, 46). 13 This supplementary provision was not intended to encourage carelessness or abuse, however. All who were eligible and were at home and ritually clean were bound to keep the feast at the appointed time. Any man who absented himself was regarded as cut off from the people. Such a man was to bear his sin, i.e. to suffer the consequences of his sin. It is not clear what the expression 'cut off' denoted, whether excommunication or death, or whether the execution was to be human or divine. But in a close-knit covenant community neglect to commemorate with gratitude the great historic event which gave the nation birth was a heinous offence, and even ostracism and excommunication was 'death' of a kind. 14 Stranger, a resident alien or temporary sojourner (for whatever reason, cf. Gn. 15:13; Ex. 2:22; Dt. 10:19) who dwelt in Israel, shared its life and was subject to its laws (cf. Ex. 12:43–49). His sharing in the Passover feast did, of course, demonstrate Yahweh's concern for all underprivileged people, the fatherless, the widow and the resident alien alike (cf. Dt. 10:18).

9:15 - 10:10 The fiery cloud and the silver trumpets

9:15–23 The fiery cloud was both a symbol of the divine presence and a guide to the Israelites as they travelled (cf. Ex. 13:21, 22; 40:34–38). As they were about to leave Sinai the divine leadership was re-emphasized.

15, 16 Tent of the testimony (in the Pentateuch only here and in 17:7, 8; 18:2) is an alternative name for 'tent of meeting'. Whatever the nature of the cloud (and it is well-nigh useless to attempt an explanation, although some feasible ones have been offered), its brightness declared God's majesty and its darkness shrouded His glory (cf. 1 Ki. 8:12). The cloud was conceived as descending on the Tabernacle in order to show that Yahweh had taken up His abode there. (This was spoken of as the 'Shekinah' in later Jewish thought.) The cloud covered the Tabernacle by day (the phrase is lacking in the Hebrew but occurs in the main ancient versions; cf. RSV mg.), and by night it glowed. 17, 18 The movement of the cloud gave warning that the time had come to move camp. 19–23 The period during which the cloud remained over the camp varied from one day to a longer time (Heb. yāmîm, i.e. a year; cf. Lv. 25:29; Jdg. 17:10, etc.). The whole narrative, despite our uncertainty about the nature of the phenomenon, provides striking evidence of Israel's conviction that it was God who had led them by His providential care. They made camp, broke camp, and performed the service of God at the command of the Lord, literally 'at the mouth of Yahweh'.

10:1–10 The silver trumpets. 1, 2 So that Moses might have effective communication with the people and the leaders, either to summon them or to warn them that they were to break camp, two silver trumpets (Heb. ḥᵃṣōṣᵉrâ) were made of beaten silver. To judge from later representations on Jewish coins and on the arch of Titus in the Roman forum, these were long straight metal tubes with flaring ends, perhaps 3–4 feet long. They were distinct from the rams' horns (Heb. šôpār) or a second type of trumpet (Heb. yôḇēl). 3, 4 It is presumed that the trumpets sounded a different note. When one long blast on the two trumpets was blown all the congregation gathered at the entrance of the tent of meeting. If a long blast was blown on one trumpet only the leaders assembled. 5 A special kind of blast, an alarm, gave warning to the Judah camps on the east side to move. 6, 7 When the alarm was blown the second time the camps of Reuben on the south side were to move. LXX includes reference to similar alarms warning the Ephraim camps on the west and the Dan camps on the north. This alarm was evidently distinguishable from the trumpet blast which summoned the assembly and which was not an alarm. According to later tradition (Mishna Rosh Hashanah, 4:9) the alarm was a succession of short blasts and was distinct from the sustained blast. 8 It was the priests who blew the trumpets, thus symbolizing the divine control over the camp. 9 Two further uses of the trumpets envisage the more settled conditions in the land. In time of war, when Israel faced her adversaries, an alarm was sounded to bring the needs of Israel to Yahweh's remembrance and to ensure victory. 10 Then again, at joyous religious celebrations, at regular festivals, and at new moons, trumpets were to be blown over the burnt-offerings and peace-offerings to bring Israel to Yahweh's remembrance. The phrases that you may be remembered before the Lord and serve you for remembrance before your God do not imply that Yahweh had forgotten His people but rather that Israel would not presume upon Yahweh even though He might declare I am the Lord your God.

10:11 - 12:16 THE JOURNEY FROM SINAI TO PARAN

Eleven months after arriving at Sinai (cf. Ex. 19:1) the Israelites broke camp and moved on. The story of what happened in the wilderness between Sinai and Kadesh is now recounted.

10:11–36 The departure from Sinai

10:11–28 The Israelites break camp. 11–13 In the second year after leaving Egypt in the second month the cloud moved on. Israel had been at Sinai just under one year. The journey led by stages to the wilderness of Paran, the traditional home of Ishmael (cf. Gn. 21:21). The exact location is not known. It was west of the Arabah, south of the Negeb (cf. Nu. 13:17) and between Midian and Sinai (cf. 1 Ki. 11:18) and is sometimes identified with the desert of Et-tîh in the north-centre of the Sinai peninsula. 14–16 The three camps of Judah under Nahshon—Judah, Issachar and Zebulun—went first. 17–21 When the Tabernacle had been dismantled the Gershonites and Merarites followed Judah with the three camps of Reuben under Elizur—Reuben, Simeon and Gad—following behind them. The order differs from that in ch. 2, but, clearly, no contradiction is involved, for the Kohathites carrying the sanctuary (holy things, Heb. miqdāš) remained in the centre of the advance, and it was a matter of practical convenience that the Gershonites and Merarites should proceed in advance so that the Tabernacle might be set up in a new resting-place ready for the arrival of its sacred furniture. 22–28 Then came the three camps of Ephraim under Ammihud—Ephraim, Manasseh and Benjamin—and in the rear the three camps of Dan under Ahiezer—Dan, Asher and Naphtali.

10:29–32 Hobab plans to return home. Four separate problems, of varying complexity, centre on these verses. The first is that here Hobab is described as a Midianite, whereas in Jdg. 4:11 he is said to be a Kenite. It is possible that we have here simply an indication of the overlapping of the ancient tribes. Jdg. 8:22–24, e.g., speaks of Midianites who were Ishmaelites, and 1 Ch. 2:55 mentions Rechabite Kenites. The second problem is that here and in Ex. 2:18, Moses' father-in-law is named Reuel, but his name is given as Jethro in Ex. 3:1; 4:18; 18:1, 2. This problem is finally insoluble because we do not have the evidence which would lead to a solution. The double tradition of the name is most easily understood on the supposition that he possessed both names (cf. Jacob–Israel), though this does not explain why sometimes one was used and sometimes the other. (See NBD, art. 'Jethro'.) The third problem concerns the identity of the Hobab mentioned in this passage. Some commentators (e.g. A. E. Cundall, TOTC Judges, 1968, p. 56) identify Hobab with Jethro and regard Reuel as a remote ancestor. Those who identify Jethro with Reuel usually understand Hobab to be Moses' brother-in-law, a relationship which is made clear by alternative translation of the verses concerned (see Jdg. 4:11, RV). In the present passage we would suggest that the words Moses' father-in-law, or 'whose son-in-law Moses was', be understood to refer to Reuel the Midianite. Likewise in Jdg. 4:11 we ought to understand that the purpose of the verse is to tell us precisely to what branch of the Kenites Heber belonged, and that in fact the verse identifies the Kenites in question by two defining clauses: first that they were Hobab's branch of the clan, and secondly (as in Jdg. 1:16) that they were 'in-laws' of Moses. All these verses would then support the contention that Hobab was in fact Moses' brother-in-law. The fourth problem is whether Hobab consented to go with Moses or not. In the light of the subsequent presence of Kenites (Jdg. 1:16, etc.) with Israel, it is likely that Hobab acceded to Moses' request.

31 You know how we are to encamp. Some translators have proposed rendering this 'you know how to lead us' (reading hanḥōṯēnû for ḥ^{a}nōṯēnû), arguing that it makes a better parallel to serve as eyes for us. But clearly Moses wanted to provide a scouting service which in a hostile country would be needed just as much when they were in camp as when the people were on the move.

10:33–36 The ark and the people set out. 33, 34 The first stage of the journey from the mount of the Lord (the mountain where the law was given, Sinai) took three days. An alternative name for Sinai is Mount of God (cf. Ex. 3:1; 4:27; 18:5; 24:13, etc.) or Horeb. An apparent difficulty in this passage is that it appears that the ark preceded the Israelite column, whereas in vv. 13–28 and 2:17 the Tabernacle and its furniture, which might be presumed to include the ark, were set in the midst of the advancing Israelites. The present verse corrects our misapprehension and completes the picture: the ark preceded the advancing host to symbolize divine leadership on the journey (cf. Dt. 9:3; Jos. 3:3ff.). Nothing in v. 21 or in 2:17 would necessarily preclude this. The remainder of the sacred vessels followed the camp of Reuben. The central issue, that Yahweh guided His people on their journey, is quite clear. 35, 36 Two ancient ritual formulae close the chapter. They seem to be snatches from ancient poems which hold the motif of the holy war strongly. When the ark went forth to battle men cried,

> 'Arise, O Yahweh! Let thy enemies > be scattered;
> Let them that hate thee flee before thee.'

Cf. Pss. 68:1; 132:8. When the ark returned from battle men sang,

> 'Return, O Yahweh,
> To the countless hosts of Israel.'

The meaning is probably that after the victory Yahweh is invited to return to the midst of His people and to abide there. It is possible that Ps. 24 is a song of celebration when the ark returned after a victorious battle. Cf. also 1 Sa. 4:1–10.

11:1 – 12:16 Incidents between Sinai and Kadesh

The journey through the wilderness to Kadesh was marked by grumbling and acts of unfaithfulness in which Israel displayed deep ingratitude to God for His past mercies and well-nigh rejected the leadership of Moses. Chs. 11 and 12 deal with several motifs interwoven with one another, the flight of the quails, the manna, and the appointment of the seventy elders. The chapters provide an interesting illustration of the way Hebrew writers could hold several motifs together in one narrative.

11:1–3 Complaints at Taberah. 1 The people complained of their misfortunes. The verb complain (Heb. 'ānan) occurs only here and in La. 3:39. The Akkadian cognate means 'sigh'. No doubt they suffered real deprivations. But in the midst of their complaining some calamity befell them described as the fire of the Lord. No explanation is given. In any case Israel understood a great many natural phenomena as acts of God, which, of course, they are. One could think of a number of possibilities among people living under a scorching desert sun. Some destruction was done in the outlying parts of the camp. The people called on Moses to plead with Yahweh and the trouble passed. The place was called Taberah, literally 'burning' (Heb. root b-ʿ-r, 'burn'). The place cannot be identified with certainty.

11:4–9 Complaints about the manna. 4–6 The writer here blames the rabble for inciting the Israelites. These were probably the 'mixed multitude' of Ex. 12:38, the 'riff-raff', as the word has been translated. They had a strong craving for flesh and recalled the food they once enjoyed in Egypt, fish, cucumbers, leeks, onions, garlic, which contrasted with the plain food of the desert with its staple diet of manna. 7–9 An editorial note explains the reference to manna, what it was, how it was collected and prepared for eating. It was, no doubt, a divine provision, but none the less it may have been a natural substance. The Tamarix gallica mannifera, or tarfa tree, exudes a sweet, sticky, dark yellow substance by night which falls to the ground in small globules like the coriander seed, about the size of a peppercorn. As the day advances these melt in the sun. The season in the western Sinai peninsula begins at the end of May and continues into June and July, the time when the Israelites were in the desert (cf. 10:11). It resembles the resinous gum bdellium. The people asked 'What is it?' (Heb. man hû), hence the name man, or manna (cf. Ex. 16:15). It was collected early and ground up with simple handmills or mortars similar to those still used in the east. (See further on Ex. 16:1ff.)

11:10–15 Moses expostulates with God. 10, 11 The story of vv. 4–6 is now resumed. The complaint about food was only one of the many problems that confronted Moses and he expostulated with God. Why hast thou dealt ill with thy servant? His complaint, which was a lengthy one, gives a good picture of an overwrought leader for whom the sole responsibility for the people was too great a burden. 12 The pronouns I are emphatic. It was not Moses but God who brought this people to birth. But Moses had all the responsibility of them. 13–15 With a pathetic appeal to God the overwrought Moses confessed that the burden was too heavy for him to bear. If he must continue to carry the people, he requested, like others after him, that he might die (cf. Je. 20:14–18).

11:16–24a The divine response. 16, 17 Yahweh's reply was to instruct Moses to choose out seventy experienced elders and officers and take them to the door of the tent of meeting where he would meet them and endow them with a share of the spirit which Moses possessed. Clearly Moses' endowment was greater than theirs so that they were to be subordinate. The officers, as distinct from the elders, were originally scribes but acted as subordinate officials alongside the elders (cf. Ex. 4:29; 5:14. Clearly here the elders are the acknowledged leaders and the officers hold intermediate executive positions). 18 God, having remedied Moses' personal complaint, now dealt with the people. He promised them flesh, but since the meal they were about to eat was regarded as, in some sense, a sacred meal they were required to consecrate themselves, i.e. to make themselves ritually clean. 19, 20 The provision of flesh would be abundant but it would also be a judgment, for the people would eat gluttonously for a whole month until the flesh became loathsome and came out at their nostrils, a vivid metaphor of surfeiting. The fulfilment of their desire became their judgment. 21, 22 Moses, puzzled by the greatness of the promise, asked where such an abundance of flesh might come from for 600 'thousands' (military units) of fighting men, from flocks or herds, or from the sea. 23 Yahweh merely asked whether Moses imagined that His hand was shortened (cf. Is. 50:2; 59:1, etc.). The sequel comes in vv. 31–35 after the story of the elders has been concluded.

11:24b–30 The appointment of elders. 24b Following the instructions given to him, Moses gathered seventy elders. 25 Yahweh came down as at Sinai (cf. Ex. 19:9, 18) in a special visitation and bestowed some of the spirit (Heb. rûaḥ), or supra-human power which Moses possessed, upon the elders. It ought not to be concluded that the spirit was something physical or material. Up to that time Moses alone had had the divine enablement for the task of administration. If others joined him, clearly they must share in the same 'spirit'. But we ought not to press the idea of dividing up what Moses had among others, but rather that through him as mediator there was granted to others something of what God had given him. When the spirit rested upon these men they prophesied. The same verb is used elsewhere of some kind of ecstatic behaviour (cf. 1 Sa. 10:11; 19:20, 23; 1 Ch. 25:1–3; 2 Ki. 3:15). The experience in the case of these elders was only temporary and marked their entrance into their sacred office; they did so no more but returned with Moses to the camp. Intense emotional response resulting in physical reactions are not unknown even today on the occasion of a man's induction to a noble office. 26 That the bestowal of the spirit was not dependent on the elders being in the same place at the same time is clear from the fact that two men, Eldad and Medad, who had been selected among the seventy but had not left the camp, were also endowed with the spirit and prophesied in the camp. 27, 28 Even Joshua misunderstood when a young man reported that Eldad and Medad were prophesying in the camp and urged Moses to forbid them. 29, 30 Moses rebuked Joshua for becoming excited (the word jealous, Heb. qānā', denotes 'become excited either with zeal or jealousy'). Would that all the Lord's people were prophets, that the Lord would put his spirit upon them! was Moses' reply, for he recognized that the spirit enabling him was not his own, and therefore not motivated by any thought of self-glory, but the divine Spirit. (See further the General Article, 'Old Testament Theology' on the Person and work of the Holy Spirit in the OT.) The principle here enunciated by Moses is applicable to every age. Would that today all the Lord's people were prophets, i.e. spokesmen for God, and that the Lord would put His Spirit upon them.

11:31–35 The quails and God's judgment. 31 The outcome of the people's demand for flesh is now described. The Lord sent a wind which brought quails from the sea, probably the Gulf of Aqabah. This is a natural phenomenon and still today the quails migrate in the spring (March, April) from Africa and return in the autumn (September). They travel up the Red Sea and cross the Sinai Peninsula towards Palestine and often fall exhausted to be picked up by local inhabitants for eating or for sale.

In the present narrative the quails were distributed over a total width of two days' journey. And about two cubits. A very old interpretation understands this to refer to the flight of the birds about 3 feet above ground, so that they were easily caught in nets. It may be, of course, that we ought to understand let them fall in a more literal sense and that the quails came in such abundance that they covered the ground to a depth of 3 feet. Either way it is a miracle of divine timing and of divine abundance. 32 For two days and the intervening night the people collected the birds. The smallest catch was ten homers, over 100 bushels, surely an indication of gluttony. The Hebrew text occasions some difficulty. It appears to read, they spread them out for themselves all around the camp. The verb 'spread out' (Heb. šāṭaḥ) occurs in some MSS with the second and third consonants of the root transposed to give the verb šāḥaṭ, 'slaughter'. If this reading is accepted there is an easy transition to the next verse. 33 The birds freshly slaughtered were gluttonously devoured. The plague that broke out may have been some violent stomach upset. 34 Evidently numbers died, for the place was called Kibroth-hattaavah (lit. 'graves of craving'). The place cannot be identified with certainty. One possibility is Ruweis el-Ebeirig a few miles north-east of the traditional Sinai. 35 The next stopping-place was Hazeroth, possibly 'Ain Khudra a little further on.

12:1–16 The uniqueness of Moses. The heart of the present chapter is the challenge of Aaron and Miriam to the privileged position and uniqueness of Moses.

1, 2 Ostensibly Miriam and Aaron complained that Moses had married a Cushite woman. The verb, however, is third person feminine singular, suggesting that originally it was Miriam alone who spoke. Later, Miriam alone was punished (v. 10). The ostensible ground of the complaint appears to be that Moses married a foreign woman: the reference may even be to Zipporah, who was, of course, a Midianitess (Ex. 2:15), for Midian and Cushan are linked, e.g. in Hab. 3:7. But the real challenge was, Has the Lord indeed spoken only through Moses? Has he not spoken through us also? Miriam did have certain gifts. She is called a prophetess in Ex. 15:20 and is linked with Moses and Aaron in Mi. 6:4. 3 Whatever gifts and functions Miriam and Aaron might have had, however, Moses was unique. He was very meek, i.e. a humble man who was more concerned to be the servant of Yahweh than to advance his own status. 4, 5 God was concerned to vindicate His servant and summoned him and Miriam and Aaron to the tent of meeting, where He called Miriam and Aaron apart and declared His mind. 6–8 The utterance of God is given in poetic form in the standard 3:3 metre of Hebrew epic poetry. There are some textual difficulties. One possible solution is as follows:

'Hear my words: If there is a prophet among you
I the Lord make myself known to him in a vision: I speak with him in a dream;
Not so with my servant Moses: He is trusted throughout my house.
With him I speak mouth to mouth: plainly, and not in riddles: And he beholds the form of the Lord.
Why then do you not shrink: from speaking against my servant Moses?'

In substance God was saying that His communication with Moses was in the immediacy of personal contact, but with others by way of dreams and in riddles. The recognition of this unique status should have kept Miriam and Aaron from every jealous complaint. 9, 10 Divine judgment fell on Miriam and she became leprous, as white as snow. Her complaint was not, however, true leprosy, but a milder skin complaint (cf. v. 12; Lv. 13:10ff.). 11, 12 Aaron at once acknowledged Moses' supremacy saying, Oh, my lord, do not punish us because we have done foolishly and have sinned, or alternatively, 'Do not account to us the sin which we have committed in our folly' (Jewish Translation). 13 Moses, fearing that Miriam might become a true leper, asked the Lord to deliver her. 14, 15 Miriam was spared the full judgment of leprosy but had to suffer public shame by being excluded from the camp seven days. The argument is that even in a family dispute which resulted in the father administering such a strong rebuke (cf. Dt. 25:9; Is. 50:6) a seven-day period of shame would follow; how much more when God's authority is flouted! Nevertheless, the divine displeasure was tempered with restoring grace. The mercy of God towards sinful men in every age is a continuing wonder. He may chastise His children as a loving father, but even His judgment is tempered with mercy, as many a believer in this 20th century has discovered. 16 The next stage of the journey took the people to the wilderness of Paran.

13:1 – 20:13 THE SOJOURN AT KADESH IN THE WILDERNESS

The period which the Israelites spent around Kadesh was important and probably allowed time for consolidation after the experience at Sinai. It lasted a whole generation (14:34). Details are few. The period began in fear and lack of faith following the return of a reconnaissance party from the land of Canaan and it ended with a plan to enter Canaan from the east rather than from the south.

13:1–33 The mission and report of the reconnaissance party

13:1–17a The selection of the spies. 1–3 The reconnaissance party comprised a representative leader from each of the twelve tribes. 4–16 Apart from Joshua (Hoshea), son of Nun of the tribe of Ephraim, and Caleb, son of Jephunneh of the tribe of Judah, these men are not otherwise known, although several of the names are known simply as names. As usual, the names had meanings (see IB, Vol. II, pp. 204, 205).

13:17b–20 The commission of the spies. The task of the spies was defined. Information was required from both the Negeb (south country) and the mountain regions about the nature of the land, the strength and number of the people and the character of the cities, whether open encampments or walled towns. Moses encouraged the party and asked them to bring back samples of the fruit of the land. It was the season of the first ripe grapes, the end of July.

13:21–24 The reconnaissance in Canaan. 21 The reconnaissance extended from Zin in the south to Rehob in the north (probably Beth-rehob, 2 Sa. 10:6, near Laish-Dan, Jdg. 18:27–29). Near the entrance of Hamath may be the name of a place, Lebo-Hamath, in the Beqa' Valley between the Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon ranges. 22 The investigation began in the Negeb and extended to Hebron in its first phase. Hebron was known to the patriarchs under another name (cf. Gn. 23:2; 35:27) and Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Sarah, Rebekah and Leah were buried in the region. The town was founded 7 years before Zoan (Tanis or Avaris), the capital of the Hyksos rulers in Egypt (c. 1720–1570 BC). Descendants of a former mighty warrior Anak lived in Hebron. 23, 24 On their return the spies gathered grapes, pomegranates and figs in the Valley of Eshcol (lit. 'cluster').

13:25–33 The return and report of the spies. 25, 26 Forty days later the spies reported to Moses and Aaron and all the people at Kadesh and displayed the fruit they had brought. 27–29 Three features of the report are significant in the light of modern archaeological discovery. First, the reference to milk and honey is a traditional description of a fruitful land. The Egyptian Tale of Sinuhe (c. 2000 BC) uses this expression of the area north of Galilee. Secondly, the reference to fortified cities is factual. Numerous walled cities, 5 to 15 or 20 acres in size, were scattered over the land, e.g. Jericho, about 7 acres. Thirdly, the population was indeed a mixed one. Written records show the presence of Amorites, Hittites, Canaanites, Indo-Europeans, etc. The Amorites, who had come to Palestine in great numbers before 2000 BC, are known to have been in the mountains both E and W of the Jordan. The Hittites were offshoots of the powerful Hittite Empire in Asia Minor. The Canaanites inhabited the fertile areas of the Jordan Valley and the coastlands. The Amalekites were nomads. Other groups were probably ancient indigenous people. 30 Caleb and Joshua advised the immediate occupation of the land as being within the competence of the people. 31–33 The majority report betrayed fear and lack of faith and discouraged the people with a terrifying account of a land that devours its inhabitants and of the presence of giants and Nephilim, sons of the legendary Anak before whom Israel would be as grasshoppers. How typical of God's people in every age! Fear and lack of faith have often been the cause of stagnation and lack of advance towards victory, resulting in final defeat. The man of faith is assured of victory because, finally, the victory is the Lord's.

14:1–45 The reaction of the people and the judgment of God

14:1–10a The complaints and rebellion of the people. 1–3 The first reaction of the people was to cry aloud and to weep while they murmured against Moses and Aaron, declaring that it would have been better to remain in Egypt than to die by the sword in the wilderness and surrender their wives and children as spoil. 4 In an attitude of rebellion the people determined to choose a leader to take them back to Egypt. 5 Moses and Aaron prostrated themselves in earnest pleading before the people. 6–10a Caleb and Joshua rent their clothes and assured the people that the land was an exceedingly good land and that if the Lord were pleased to do so He would lead them there. Only they must not rebel against Him, nor fear the people of the land whom they would destroy with Yahweh's help. The only response of the people was to threaten to stone those who pleaded with them.

14:10b–19 The intercession of Moses. 10b–12 The glory of the Lord was presently displayed at the tent of meeting, and the Lord accused Israel of unbelief despite all the signs He had wrought among them. The signs were the miracles and wonders performed in Egypt. God now proposed to strike the people with pestilence and to disinherit them. In their place He would make of Moses a nation greater and mightier than they. 13–16 Moses' plea with God on behalf of the people is a moving one. Were the Egyptians to hear that God proposed to disinherit the people they would inform the inhabitants of the land who at present believed that Yahweh was in the midst of this people where He was to be seen face to face and whom He overshadowed by the pillar of cloud and the pillar of fire. If He were to destroy them the nations who knew His fame (reputation) would conclude that He lacked the power to bring His people into the land, with the result that He would be disgraced. 17–19 Moses now urged Yahweh to show His power and to display His character as One who was slow to anger, and abounding in steadfast love, forgiving iniquity and transgression, but will by no means clear the guilty, visiting the iniquity of fathers upon children, upon the third and upon the fourth generation. This formula, repeated from Ex. 34:6, 7, occurs in whole or in part in an almost liturgical fashion in several places in the OT (cf. Joel 2:13; Jon. 4:2). Steadfast love (Heb. ḥeseḏ) is a peculiarly significant word expressing the qualities of loyalty, faithfulness and steadfastness which are to be found in One who is true to His covenant and to His obligations. It occurs about 250 times in the OT with strong overtones of the loyalty and the commitment to one another of the parties to a covenant. Moses' plea was a strong appeal to God's gracious nature for He had forgiven this people, from Egypt even until now.

14:20–25 The divine answer. 20–23 God's answer was to pardon the people. He would not wipe them out in their entirety. But none of the rebels or doubters who had seen His glory or witnessed His acts of deliverance in Egypt and in the wilderness, and who had tested Him and disobeyed Him over and over again (lit. these ten times), would enter the land of promise. This declaration was made on oath: As I live, and as all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord, none of these men . . . shall see the land. 24 Caleb, however, who was controlled by a different spirit and had followed the Lord fully, would enter the land of promise and his descendants would possess it. 25 The final word from Yahweh was that Israel was to turn back southwards. The way north was cut off by the Amalekites and Canaanites who dwelt in the fertile valleys.

14:26–38 The death of a faithless generation. 26, 27 The complaints or murmurings of the Israelites referred to in previous chapters reached a climax with the outburst of 14:1–10. Three times in v. 27 their murmuring is mentioned. Now God declares His mind. 28–33 With an oath—As I live—God declared that all those above twenty who had murmured would perish in the wilderness, except Joshua and Caleb. The children for whose future the murmurers feared (cf. v. 3) would enter the land, albeit after a period of being shepherds in the wilderness. The verb swore in v. 30 is literally 'lift up the hand', a common gesture in oath-taking in many lands. 34, 35 According to the number of days the spies spent in reconnaissance, forty, would be the number of years spent in the wilderness. The number is probably a symbolic one denoting a generation. In a bold metaphor God expresses His displeasure (lit. 'alienation, enmity'). God had spoken; His word would come to pass. 36, 37 The passage seems to imply a sudden plague or calamity which carried off the offenders, although this is not certain. Their death may have occurred over a period of time. 38 Joshua and Caleb were spared according to the promise.

14:39–45 The presumption of the people and their defeat. 39, 40 Further evidence of Israel's rebellious attitude is now seen in their refusal to accept the command to turn back into the wilderness. Despite their fearful attitude when they first received the report of the spies, they now determined to press on with the conquest, seeking to cover that first offence with a glib confession, We have sinned. 41–43 Moses declared that the people were transgressing the command of the Lord and would not succeed but would fall before the Amalekites and Canaanites. In such a campaign, which was no holy war, the Lord would not be with them. 44, 45 The people presumed (lit. 'were headstrong, reckless') and were severely defeated and chased as far as Hormah, possibly Tell el-Mishash, 10 miles E of Beersheba. The name Hormah, derived from the root ḥ-r-m, means 'complete destruction'. The victory over the Canaanites was delayed for 'many days' (Dt. 1:46) or alternatively 'forty years' or a 'generation'. (See further on Nu. 21:3.)

15:1–41 Miscellaneous laws and regulations

Five sets of regulations have been grouped here by the editor(s). They were to apply to Israel, 'when you come into the land you are to inhabit'. Even if, in their present form, they represent the work of an editor, it ought not to be concluded that Moses was silent about what Israel should do under more settled circumstances.

15:1–16 The prescribed cereal- and drink-offerings. 1, 2 This legislation does not apply to the wilderness period, although it is not unlikely that similar provisions, albeit perhaps not so complex or so prescribed, were in force in the wilderness, e.g. the giving of a cereal-offering of some kind. 3–5 When an offering was made from the herd or flock a cereal-offering was to be associated with it. The term offering by fire is applied to any offering that was burned, whether completely like the whole burnt-offering, or partly burned like the peace-offering (cf. Lv. 3:3–5). When such sacrifices were offered either to fulfil a vow, or as a free-will offering, or as a regular appointed feast, a cereal-offering of flour mixed with oil, and wine for a drink-offering, were to accompany the sacrifice. For a lamb the quantity was one tenth of an ephah of fine flour, one fourth of a hin of oil and a fourth of a hin of wine. The ephah was a little under 5 gallons and the hin about 6½ pints. 6, 7 The prescriptions for a ram were two-tenths of an ephah of flour, a third of a hin of oil and a third of a hin of wine. 8, 9 The prescriptions for a bull were three-tenths of an ephah of flour, a half a hin of oil, and a half a hin of wine. The quantities increased with the size of the animal. Cf. Ezk. 46:4–15 where there is no drink-offering. Pleasing odour (vv. 3, 7, 10) is a metaphor in which God is pictured as taking pleasure in the smoke of the offerings which rose heavenwards. The way in which the drink-offering was used is not defined, but it was probably poured over the offering to provide a pleasing odour (cf. v. 7).

11–16 These regulations were to apply both to the native Israelite and to the stranger, the resident alien. Three different words are used in these verses to describe the legal provisions which governed Israel: law (tôrâ, v. 16), ordinance (mišpāṭ, v. 16) and statute (ḥuqqâ, v. 15). Law (lit. 'teaching') indicates that this material came by revelation, direct from the divine Teacher; statute (from the verb 'to engrave') indicates its abiding, unchangeable nature; and ordinance is the particular application of the divine will to specific topics and situations.

15:17–21 The offering of coarse grain. A portion of the first coarse meal was taken from the threshing-floor and made into a cake. Offering. The AV term 'heave offering' refers to the 'lifting up' or removal of a portion for Yahweh. The offering of the first of the grain symbolized the fact that all the grain had come from God and was His by right. The law was probably intended to mean that from each new batch of barley meal a token portion was extracted for the use of the priests.

15:22–31 The sin-offering for unknown sins. 22–26 Two classes of unwitting sin are in view here. The first is that of the community. Cf. Lv. 4 and 5 where two other classes are added. The ritual here is much simpler than that in Leviticus. Here, the congregation was required to offer one young bull for a burnt-offering, and one male goat for a sin-offering, together with the appropriate cereal- and drink-offering. The priest shall make an atonement for all the congregation of the people of Israel. Both they and the resident alien were then forgiven. 27–29 In the case of an individual who committed sin unwittingly the sin-offering was a female goat a year old. The same law applied to native Israelites or resident aliens. 30, 31 By contrast the man who acted with a high hand, i.e. wantonly or deliberately, whether Israelite or resident alien, was to be cut off from Israel and to bear the consequences of his iniquity. What this judgment implied is not clear (see on 9:13). On these categories of sin, cf. the General Article, 'Old Testament Theology'; and for the significance of these ancient cultic ceremonies for the modern man, read the section 'Religious value' in the Introduction, p. 170. See also comments on chs. 28, 29.

15:32–36 The sabbath breaker. 32, 33 An example of sinning with a high hand is now given. A man was found gathering sticks on the sabbath day. He was brought to Moses and Aaron and the whole congregation for judgment. 34, 35 The case was adjourned until Yahweh had made plain what should be done to him. The penalty was death by stoning (cf. Ex. 31:14f.; 35:2). 36 The fact that the whole congregation was to be involved in the stoning meant that the responsibility was distributed over everyone. The sentence was carried out outside the camp. Whether the law was applied in this exact fashion as a regular thing in Israel is doubtful.

15:37–41 The wearing of tassels. 37, 38 The people were commanded to make tassels (AV 'fringes') on the corners of their garments. The terms are variously interpreted. Possibly the fringe was continuous around all four edges of the garment. The threads of the fringe were twisted together in groups to form a fringe of tassels. At each corner there was to be a cord of blue. 39–41 The function of the tassels was to remind the people to obey the commandments of Yahweh and not to follow their own will. Obedience was the mark of a holy people. Some of the phrases in vv. 40 and 41 are reminiscent of Ex. 20:1f.; Lv. 19:36; 22:33; 26:13, etc. The recollection of the saving acts of Yahweh was a strong motive for obedience. The same motif appears in the secular treaties of Moses' time.

16:1–50 The rebellion of Korah and of Dathan and Abiram

The two struggles depicted here were, no doubt, typical of many such. One of these was a revolt led by Korah the Levite and the other was a revolt led by laymen Dathan and Abiram. In each case the rebels were challenged to put the matter to the test and in each case the authority of Moses and Aaron was upheld. The stories are interwoven in the present narrative and some difficulty is experienced in following the details of each. As in the books of Kings, the writer keeps both stories under consideration. There is no reason to deny that the two revolts occurred simultaneously.

16:1–11 The names of the rebels and the rebellion of Korah. 1 The names of the rebels and the genealogy are given. 2, 3 It would appear that with these verses the narrative turns to the rebellion of Korah. Took men. The Hebrew text is uncertain. The verb 'take' appears alone and the word 'men' is lacking. An alternative suggestion is that the root is not l-q-ḥ, 'take', but w-q-ḥ, 'act insolently'. In that case v. 2a simply states that the rebels listed acted insolently. Then the narrative begins, They rose up before Moses, with a number of the people of Israel, two hundred and fifty leaders of the congregation. These well-known men challenged Moses and Aaron: You have gone too far! It was a protest against the setting apart of the family of Aaron for the duties and privileges of the priesthood. 4–7 Moses prostrated himself in entreaty to God, for the offence was grievous. Then he bade Korah to prepare for a test. The mention of Korah here indicates that the passage is concerned with the rebellious Korahite group. The next day Korah and his group were to appear before the Lord with censers in which there was fire and incense and God would show who was holy (set apart), they or Aaron. Then Moses turned back their accusation against them, You have gone too far! 8–11 Moses then reminded the Levites of the privileged position they occupied. They had been set apart from all Israel for the service of the Tabernacle, no small thing. Would they seek the priesthood also? Their revolt was against Yahweh, for who was Aaron that they should murmur against him? It is clear that the rebelling group is a group of Levites. Either the 'leaders' of v. 2 were Levites, or supporting leaders who are neglected in the subsequent events (but cf. vv. 16, 17).

16:12–15 The rebellion of Dathan and Abiram. 12 The rebelling laymen are introduced. They were Reubenites. Moses summoned them before him but they refused to come. 13, 14 The nature of their rebellion is revealed in their reply to Moses. They held the view that Moses should have been content to lead the people out of Egypt. Why should he now act as a prince? In any case he had not led them to the promised land of milk and honey nor given them an inheritance of fields and vineyards. All that was a blind for his ambition. The Hebrew idiom put out the eyes is equivalent to 'throw dust in the eyes'. 15 Moses in anger asked the Lord not to receive their offerings. For his part his whole attitude had been one of the highest integrity, for he had never defrauded any man (cf. 1 Sa. 12:3).

16:16–24 The testing of Korah. 16, 17 The command given to Korah (vv. 6, 7) is repeated. It seems that the 250 men of v. 2 were Levites. In addition to this group Aaron would appear before the Lord with his censer. 18, 19 The challenge was accepted and next day the Levites appeared as commanded with the whole congregation. And the glory of the Lord appeared. 20, 21 Moses and Aaron were bidden to stand apart from the assembled company lest they were consumed with them. 22–24 Moses and Aaron, realizing the impending judgment, fell down and called on God, the God of the spirits of all flesh (cf. 27:16), i.e. the God who sustains the physical life of all creatures. Their plea was, 'When one man sins will You be wrathful with the whole community?' But the Lord commanded Moses to urge the people to withdraw from the dwellings of Korah, Dathan and Abiram. The two stories seem to overlap at this point and some commentators have asked whether the phrase in v. 24, dwelling of Korah . . ., might not have read originally 'the Tabernacle of Yahweh' since the noun miškān ('dwelling') is not normally used for the dwelling of individuals but commonly for the Tabernacle. Comparison with v. 32 indicates that Korah was included in the judgment of Dathan and Abiram. Perhaps the literary expression is a device for indicating that all the rebels were caught up finally in the divine judgment.

16:25–34 The testing of Dathan and Abiram. 25 The trial of Dathan and Abiram is next described. The elders of Israel were present. 26, 27a Once again the people were urged to stand apart from the tents of the rebels lest they were swept away. 27a, along with vv. 24 and 32, constitutes a special problem since these verses appear to be generalized statements in which the rebels of both groups are mentioned together. The present section is concerned with Dathan and Abiram. 27b–30 Dathan and Abiram appeared with their families at the door of their tents as Moses drew near. Moses declared the nature of the test. If the men were innocent no calamity would befall them but they would die a natural death in due course. But if the Lord did something spectacular (creates something new, lit. 'creates a creation') by opening up the ground and swallowing them and their families, it would be proof that they were guilty. It was a grim reminder of the doctrine of family solidarity. The doctrine, which has its positive value, expresses the view that a man's evil deeds may sometimes involve his family in judgment. 31–34 When Moses had finished speaking the ground opened and swallowed up the offenders and their families and goods. The people fled in terror lest the judgment should touch them also.

16:35–50 The judgment of Korah and the aftermath. 35 Resuming the story of the Korahite revolt from vv. 16–24 the narrator tells us that fire came forth from the Lord, and consumed the two hundred and fifty men offering the incense. 36–40 A question arose as to what should be done with the censers which had been used illegally. Their fire was to be scattered so that no-one might use this 'holy' fire since, even if it was used illegally, it had entered the sanctuary and so belonged to the Lord. The censers likewise were holy and could not be used for secular purposes. They were to be beaten into plates to cover the altar and to remain as a warning and a reminder of what would happen to others who followed Korah's example. Only priests might approach the sanctuary to offer incense before Yahweh. 41 The troubles were not yet over, for the next day the people blamed Moses and Aaron for the death of Korah's group. 42 In a hostile demonstration the people gathered at the tent of meeting. 43–45 When Moses and Aaron appeared, the Lord bade them withdraw from the people so that He might consume them in a moment. They both fell prostrate in intercession. 46–50 Moses commanded Aaron to run to the sanctuary to bring his censer which carried the legitimate fire and incense, so that he might provide an atonement (covering) for the people against the judgment (plague) that had broken out. The plague was stopped as Aaron stood between the dead and the living, a beautiful picture of a greater Aaron whose coming lay over 1,000 years in the future. Even so 14,700 people died (whatever the terms 'thousand' and 'hundred' mean here).

17:1–13 The story of Aaron's rod

The final demonstration of the privileged status of the Levites is now described. But whereas in ch. 16 negative proofs were offered in which contenders against the Levites were rejected and destroyed, the Levites are here approved by a positive test and are exalted over the other tribes.

1–5 Moses was directed to take a rod for each tribe (fathers' house, ancestral family) and to write the tribal name on it. Aaron's name was written on the rod of Levi. The rods were then placed in the tent of meeting before the ark of testimony. God would cause one of the rods to sprout and thus make clear for all time the question of privilege and authority and put an end to murmuring. 6, 7 The rods were gathered as commanded and placed before the Lord. 8, 9 Next day, Aaron's rod, i.e. the rod of Levi, had sprouted and produced blossoms and almonds whereas the other rods were as before. Israel acknowledged the evidence. 10, 11 The rod of Aaron was returned to the sanctuary to be kept as a sign for the rebels. 12, 13 The chapter closes with an acknowledgment by the people that death awaited all who approached the Tabernacle, except, of course, those authorized to do so, viz. the Levites.

18:1 – 19:22 Dues and duties of priests and Levites and regulations for purification

In logical sequence the editor(s) has arranged the material so as to have the duties and privileges of the tribe of Levi set out following the events of ch. 17. The Aaronites were thereby established in their priestly position and the Levites in their special sphere of service. Now the dues of the people to the priests and Levites, and of the Levites to the priests can be defined.

18:1–7 The duties of the Levites. 1 In order to avoid further disasters resulting from the approach of unauthorized persons to the sanctuary, the tribe of Levi was to have the responsibility. Aaron and his sons were to bear iniquity in connection with the sanctuary, as well as in connection with the priesthood, i.e. they were to take all the risks and undertake the penalty of approaching God in the sanctuary. 2–5 It was the task of the rest of the tribe of Levi to minister to Aaron while he and his sons officiated in the sanctuary. The Levites were not, however, to come near the altar or the holy vessels, under pain of death. 6, 7 I give your priesthood as a gift (lit. 'a service of a gift') means that the service was a gift or privilege granted by God Himself. The Levites were a gift to the priests from the Lord.

18:8–20 Revenue due to the priests from the people. 8 The maintenance of the priests came from the wide range of offerings and included whatever was kept back of the offerings made to God, all the consecrated things of the people. These were to be the portion of Aaron and his sons in perpetuity. 9, 10 In addition, whatever was not consumed on the altar fire (reserved from the fire), every offering, every cereal-offering, every sin-offering, every compensatory (guilt-) offering, all described as most holy things because they were never to leave the sanctuary, were to be eaten by the priests alone. 11–13 Further, every wave-offering, i.e. every portion 'lifted away' from an offering, was theirs. These included the firstfruits, the best of the oil, the wine, and the grain and were to be used for the support of the families of the priests who might eat them provided they were ritually clean. 14 All the devoted things, i.e. items banned from common use such as booty taken in war (cf. Jos. 6:17, 19), or things given as an offering, belonged to the priests (cf. Lv. 27:21). 15a The firstlings provided another source of support. 15b, 16 Firstlings of man and unclean beasts had to be redeemed (Heb. root p-d-h, 'to get by payment what was not originally one's own'). A standard redemption price (Heb. pᵉḏûyîm) of 5 shekels was payable (cf. Lv. 27:6) for children or beasts a month old. 17, 18 The firstborn of clean beasts, oxen, sheep and goats, could not be redeemed but were holy, i.e. they belonged to the Lord. These were slain, their blood sprinkled on the altar, their fat burned for a pleasing odour to God, and their flesh given to the priests in the same way as the breast and right thigh of other offerings (cf. Lv. 7:29–34). 19, 20 All the holy offerings were given to the priests as a perpetual due under a covenant of salt, i.e. a covenant which was never to be broken (cf. Lv. 2:13). This provision was made because the tribe of Levi had no inheritance among the people.

18:21–24 Revenues due to the Levites from the people. 21 The Levites were supported by the tithes of the people in return for their service at the tent of meeting. The nature of the tithe varied from time to time (cf. Dt. 14:22, 23; Lv. 27:30–33; 2 Ch. 31:6). 22, 23 In a sense, the people were under an obligation to the Levites who took upon themselves the risk of approaching the holy things and bore their iniquity, i.e. they accepted responsibility for the people and took the risk on their behalf (cf. v. 1). 24 Like the priests, the Levites had no inheritance but were supported by the tithes.

18:25–32 Revenues due to the priests from the Levites. 25–28 The Levites were required to pass on to the priests, as Yahweh's representatives, a tithe of the tithes which they received as an offering. This was to be regarded as the equivalent of the original tithe which was taken from the new grain on the threshing-floor or the new wine in the wine-press. 29 The Levites were to give the hallowed part of all the gifts to the Lord, which was really a contribution to the priests. It was to be the best (lit. 'fatness') of the gifts. 30, 31 The other nine-tenths of the tithe belonged to the Levites and was available to be eaten in any place by the families of the Levites. It was their due for service in the tent of meeting. 32 But these holy gifts were available to the Levites only after they had taken off the portion for the priests. Otherwise the Levites would have been just as guilty as would the ordinary citizen who ate any of his harvest before he had given a tithe to the Levites. They were forbidden to profane ('make common') the holy things on pain of death. But once they had presented the tithe of the tithes to the priests they need not bear . . . sin by reason of it, i.e. they were free from the evil consequences that attended the touching of holy things.

19:1–10 The ritual of the red heifer. Contact with dead bodies brought defilement and needed to be ritually cleansed. This was achieved by the ritual of the red heifer.

1, 2 When a man touched a dead body he was required to bring a red heifer without defect. The word really has the positive meaning 'perfect' or 'whole'. It is strengthened by the negative no blemish. Absolute perfection is thus demanded. It is never to have borne a yoke: i.e. it is to be wholly yielded to the Lord's sole service. Red is required, possibly as a reminder that blood alone can remove sin. 3 The heifer was presented to Eleazar, Aaron's son, and was then slain outside the camp. 4, 5 Some of her blood was sprinkled by Eleazar seven times toward the front of the tent of meeting and the corpse was burned under the supervision of Eleazar who cast into the fire cedar wood and hyssop and scarlet stuff. Each of these had a symbolic meaning (cf. Lv. 14 for the ritual for cleansing a leper). 7, 8 The ritual left both the priest and the man who burned the heifer unclean. Each was required to wash his clothes (the verb used in Ps. 51:2, 7; Je. 2:22, etc., of cleansing from sin), and to bathe (Heb. 'pour water over') their bodies but remained unclean until evening. 9, 10 The ashes of the heifer were gathered by a ritually clean man and deposited in a clean place outside the camp to be used for preparing water for impurity, i.e. water for the removal of ritual uncleanness. For the removal of sin (lit. 'it is a sin-offering') indicates that the red heifer, although not a sin-offering in the technical sense (cf. Lv. 4), served to remove sin (cf. v. 17 where it is called a burnt sin offering).

19:11–13 General rules for cleansing. 11, 12 Anyone who touched a corpse was unclean for seven days. He was required to cleanse himself (lit. 'un-sin himself') with the purifying water on the third and on the seventh day. The seven-day period emphasized the seriousness of the matter. 13 By neglecting to cleanse himself ('de-sin' or 'un-sin' himself) a man defiled the Tabernacle of the Lord and was to be cut off from Israel. Water . . . . . thrown upon him suggests a more violent action than sprinkling (cf. Lv. 1:5, 11; 3:2, etc. The word means 'dash').

19:14–22 Special rules for cleansing. 14 Special applications of the general rule are now discussed. First, everyone who entered the tent of a dead man was unclean. 15 Open vessels without a cover were unclean. 16 There was a variety of occasions when one might touch a corpse in the open field. Some are listed. For this reason tombs and graves were painted white in later times (cf. Mt. 23:27; Acts 23:3). 17–19 In all cases a clean person dipped a hyssop branch into the cleansing water made from running water to which some ashes of the burnt sin-offering had been added, and sprinkled the unclean man and all his property on the third and on the seventh day. Then on the seventh day the man would be cleansed (lit. 'de-sinned'). He could wash his clothes and bathe himself and be clean at evening. 20 Men who ignored this ritual were to be cut off from the assembly as those who defiled the sanctuary. 21 Finally, the man who sprinkled the cleansing water, or anyone who touched the water, was to be unclean till evening—the shortest time that ritual uncleanness could last. 22 Whatever the unclean person touched was unclean, and those who touched such objects were likewise unclean till evening.

20:1–13 Final events at Kadesh

20:1 Miriam's death. 1 The people arrived at Kadesh in the wilderness of Zin in the first month. No year is given but it was subsequent to the second year after the Exodus when the Israelites first arrived in Kadesh, and probably subsequent to their turning back along the road to the Red Sea after they rejected the advice of Joshua and Caleb to enter the land (cf. 14:25). Possibly Kadesh remained a centre during the long years of wandering. Miriam may have died at almost any time during their stay around Kadesh.

20:2–13 The waters of Meribah. 2–5 Once again there was a shortage of water (cf. Ex. 17:1–7) and once again the people contended with Moses as they craved for the abundance of Egypt (cf. Nu. 11:4–6) saying that it were better to die with their brethren (cf. 16:35, 49; 17:12f.). 6–9 Once again Moses and Aaron pleaded with the Lord to spare them, and once again the Lord commanded Moses to take his rod and to bring water from a rock. This rod appears several times in the story of Moses (cf. Ex. 7:20; 14:16, etc.). 10–13 The narrative is tantalizing at this point. Moses and Aaron were refused entry to the promised land but the exact nature of their offence is not clear. Many suggestions have been made, e.g. that Moses struck the rock twice, thus betraying anger; or that Moses made arrogant personal claims: Shall we bring forth water for you out of this rock?; or, following Ps. 106:32, 33, that the people provoked Moses to speak rash words; or that Moses and Aaron failed to lead the people after the report of the spies (cf. Dt. 1:37; 3:26; 4:21). But the record merely gives the Lord's words as: Because you did not believe in me, to sanctify me in the eyes of the people of Israel. It was an occasion when the Lord showed himself holy among them (Heb. qiddēš, a play on Kadesh; cf. Meribah, a play on rîḇ, 'to strive'). In some way Moses and Aaron offended Yahweh.

20:14 – 22:1 THE JOURNEY FROM KADESH TO THE PLAINS OF MOAB

Israel, frustrated in her attempt to enter the promised land from the south, determined after years of delay to gain entry from the east. The story of their journey to the plains of Moab is told in several places (cf. Dt. 2:1–15; Jdg. 11:17, 18).

20:14–21 Israel and Edom

14 Moses sent messengers to the king of Edom. His reference to Israel as your brother Israel recalled ancient tribal links between Jacob and Esau, now become Israel and Edom (cf. Gn. 25:20–34). 15, 16 Moses then recounted the adversity (AV 'travail') of Israel in Egypt as well as Yahweh's deliverance of His people through His agent (lit. 'angel' or 'messenger'; cf. Ex. 23:20). 17, 18 Hoping for some kindly response, Moses sought permission to traverse the King's Highway, promising not to turn aside like common invaders. This ancient road, little more than a track for caravans then, is marked today by ancient sites strung out along the Roman road and the modern road as well. Archaeological work has been undertaken at some of these and all have been surveyed. Despite Moses' pleas Edom refused passage. 19, 20 Further argument was ruled out when Edom made a hostile demonstration against Israel. A similar experience with Moab is reported in Jdg. 11:17, 18. We know today that both these kingdoms were ringed with fortresses the remains of which have been identified by archaeologists.

20:22 – 22:1 The death of Aaron and the defeat of opposing kingdoms

20:22–29 The death of Aaron. 22 Leaving Kadesh, Israel journeyed to Mount Hor on the borders of Edom. The traditional Gebel Naḇi' Hārûn near Petra is too far east and Gebel Maḏurah near Kadesh seems more likely. 23–28 On arrival at Mt. Hor Moses took Aaron and Eleazar his son to the mountain top where the high priestly garments of Aaron were removed from him and placed on Eleazar who was henceforth to be high priest. It was the hour of Aaron's death. 29 The people mourned for thirty days, the normal period of mourning (cf. Dt. 34:8, mourning for Moses).

21:1–3 Conflict with the king of Arad. 1 The Canaanite king of Arad in the Negeb area, hearing of the movement of Israel in the region of Atharim (possibly Tamar or Hazazon-tamar in the Arabah a few miles south of the Dead Sea), attacked them and took captives. Arad was an important site in biblical history (cf. 33:40; Jos. 12:14; Jdg. 1:16). There is a Tell Arad in the same general area at present under excavation but it is thought that this represents another town and that the Arad of the present narrative is Tell Malḥata some 7 miles southwest. 2, 3 Israel sought the Lord's help, and true to her promise that she would destroy completely (Heb. verb derived from ḥērem, 'ban') Arad and its villages if the Lord gave her the victory, she utterly destroyed them, calling the place Hormah (root ḥērem). It was a simple and unrefined application of the principle that all that opposed the will of God was under His judgment. The principle was correct. Its setting and application were within the context of the holy war (cf. on 31:1–54), and belong to the doctrine that Israel's God is the Lord of history, a holy God, hating sin, brooking no opposition and working out His moral purposes. The armies of Israel were mobilized in the interests of these purposes on more occasions than one. The practice of the holy war has, of course, no place whatever in Christian thought or action, though its principles remain true for our personal and corporate resistance to sin and to sinfulness. The place-name, Hormah, occurs more than once in the accounts of the wanderings and the conquest (especially Nu. 14:45; Dt. 1:44; Jdg. 1:17), and has sometimes been thought to indicate duplicate accounts of the same event and even to involve contradiction. It is simpler, however, to understand the name in Nu. 14:45 and Dt. 1:44 as Israel's private and painful recollection of the major military and spiritual catastrophe of the Mosaic period, and to treat Nu. 21:3 as an editorial note inserted later, referring to the victory recorded in Jdg. 1:17 by which the old name, Hormah, became significant of the victory God gives His people and became attached to the city formerly called Zephath.

21:4–9 The bronze serpent. This incident became significant in later centuries for Jews and Christians alike (cf. Wisdom 16:5–7; Jn. 3:14).

4 Leaving Mt. Hor, Israel travelled south by the way to the Red Sea (lit. 'Sea of Reeds', Heb. yam sûp̄) to skirt the western border of Edom. How far south they went on this road is not clear. On the way the people became impatient. 5, 6 They complained about the food, the water, and this worthless food, i.e. the manna. The AV 'light bread' takes the Heb. qᵉlōlēl to mean 'light' rather than 'worthless'. Fiery serpents. Divine judgment came in the form of desert snakes with a venomous, burning bite (hence they are called in Heb. śᵉrāp̄îm, fiery ones). Many people died. 7 The people confessed, We have sinned, for we have spoken against the Lord and against you. 8, 9 In answer to Moses' prayer God revealed that he should make a bronze (AV 'brass' is not strictly correct) representation of a serpent and set it on a post, commanding the people to look upon it and live. Thus was Israel taught that only in God was there deliverance. The simple invitation to look and live (cf. Is. 45:22) was a test of faith. Poisonous snakes could be rendered harmless only by the mercy of God.

21:10–20 The journey from Mt. Hor to the plains of Moab. 10–13 Identification of the sites is not certain. Oboth (lit. 'water skins') may be 'Ain el-Weiba, 15 miles south of the Dead Sea, west of Punon (mod. Feinan). Iye-abarim (lit. 'ruins of Abarim') is possibly Maḥay, bordering on Moab to the east (the sunrise). Such an itinerary would suggest a road leading east to the Arabah after a short southerly journey from Kadesh, then north along the Arabah skirting the western boundary of Edom to the Wadi Zered, thence east along the Zered valley, turning north around Moab's eastern boundary until the Wadi Arnon (mod. Wadi el-Mûjib) was crossed, the boundary between Moab and the Amorites. This itinerary would agree with that in Jdg. 11:16–18. 14, 15 A brief extract from the Book of the Wars of the Lord, an ancient collection of war songs, is quoted here because of its reference to valleys which ran into the Arnon. The text is difficult. The AV follows the Vulgate. 16–18 At Beer, unidentified, the people found water and sang another ancient song of which Israel must have had many. 19, 20 Finally, passing by places of uncertain identification (although Bamoth is possibly Khirbet el-Quweiqiyeh), Israel reached the valley in the region of Moab, at the peak of Pisgah, overlooking Jeshimon (Heb. yᵉšîmôn, lit. 'the wasteland' or desert). Pisgah was one of the high ranges of the Moabite plateau jutting out towards the Dead Sea with a fine view of Canaan to the west. The highest point of the range is Mt. Nebo.

21:21 - 22:1 The defeat of the Amorite kings. Fortresses surrounding the kingdoms of Edom, Moab, and of the Amorites made it impossible for Israel to reach the land of Canaan. They were frustrated by Edom and Moab but penetrated the line of fortresses of the Amorite kingdoms.

21–32 Sihon. When Moses sought passage for Israel through Sihon's territory in terms similar to those he spoke to Edom (cf. 20:14–21), Sihon not only refused but came out to attack Israel at Jahaz, possibly the modern Khirbet Umm el-Idhâm about 5 miles north of Dibon. 24 It gave Israel the opportunity to meet one of these kings in battle, overcome him, and penetrate his line of fortresses. Before long Israel had occupied Sihon's territory between the Arnon and Jabbok gorges and eastward to Jazer which stood at the western boundary of the Ammonites. It has been identified with Khirbet Jazzir near modern es-Salt, 12 miles south of the river Jabbok. 25, 26 Heshbon, Sihon's capital, was taken as well as the neighbouring towns in the area which formerly belonged to Moab but had been taken by the Amorites. The reference to cities in these areas is important in determining the date of the Exodus. There had been very few urban settlements in Transjordan for many centuries before about 1350–1300 BC. Hence the Exodus must have taken place at a date when Israel would find towns in this area. 27–30 An ancient ballad, formerly sung by the Amorites themselves to commemorate their victory over the Moabites, is here quoted to point up the change in the fortunes of Heshbon. The last section has suffered in transmission and is variously translated. The Jewish translation of v. 30 reads,

> 'Their dominion is at an end, from Heshbon to Dibon,
> And from Nashim to Nophah which is hard by Medeba.'

33–35 Og. The defeat of the Amorite kingdom north of the Jabbok followed soon after. Proceeding up the caravan route to Bashan, Israel met Og and defeated him at Edrei, possibly the modern Der'â 40 miles east of the Jordan. Og was slain and all his family. Thus Israel gained a foothold in Transjordan where she maintained a vital interest throughout the days of the kings and was often engaged in defensive wars to maintain her hold on the area.

22:1 The encampment opposite Jericho. The plains of Moab beyond Jordan at Jericho constituted something of a terminus, the last stopping-place before Israel crossed the Jordan. The area probably comprised the flat plain east of Jordan opposite Jericho (cf. Jos. 4:13; 5:10), a well-wooded and well-watered area north of the Dead Sea. A number of incidents took place here, the subject-matter of the next major section of Numbers.

22:2 - 32:42 EVENTS ON THE PLAINS OF MOAB

22:2 - 24:25 Balak and Balaam

In the following three chapters which contain some of the oldest poetry in the Bible, the story is told of how Balak, king of Moab, fearful of the advancing Israelites, hired a diviner from the land of Amaw both to divine and to curse (22:2–14). Reluctant to come (22:15–35), Balaam eventually arrived (22:36–40) and delivered four oracles (22:41 - 24:25) all of which depicted Israel as a nation that would prosper. Balak finally dismissed Balaam.

22:2–14 Balak's fear of Israel and the first invitation to Balaam. 2–4 The fearful Balak (lit. 'destroyer'), learning of the defeat of the Amorites, shared his misgivings with the elders of Midian. 5 He decided to send messengers to bring Balaam the diviner from Pethor (possibly the Pitru of Assyrian inscriptions) near the Euphrates (the River) in the land of Amaw. (AV 'his people' is incorrect. The land has now been identified in cuneiform documents.) The messengers told Balaam of the arrival of a people from Egypt and of Balak's intention to attack them. 6 Balaam was invited to come and curse this people (or 'cast a spell', the original meaning of the root). He was thought to have the power to bless or bind by a spell. 7, 8 The elders of Moab and Midian took the fees for divination with them, an essential part of the arrangement (cf. 1 Sa. 9:7f.). 9–14 However, a divine restraint was on Balaam as he became aware that this people was destined for blessing and he replied: The Lord has refused to let me go with you.

22:15–21 Balak's second invitation. 15–17 Balak, anxious for Balaam's help, sent a second, larger embassy with many honoured leaders (princes) and the promise of great honour. 18 Unmoved by these promises Balaam insisted that he could only do as Yahweh commanded. 19, 20 That night, perhaps in a dream, God made known to him that he was to go with the ambassadors of Moab and Midian. Such an apparent change in the divine purpose is not unknown elsewhere in the OT (cf. Je. 18:1–11). A change in the conditions could alter the divine purpose. That God should forbid Balaam to go (v. 12), then permit him (v. 20), then be angry with him for going (v. 22) may merely indicate that while it was not God's will for Balaam to curse Israel, He might nevertheless permit his going in order to demonstrate to Balaam the strength of divine restraints he did not understand, and to Balak the peculiar character of this people he feared. Even so, Balaam received one further warning of the divine displeasure at the whole incident. The words (v. 19) what more, however, are probably intended to underline the fatal flaw in Balaam's character. In the long run (cf. 2 Pet. 2:15; Jude 11) covetousness was his ruination (cf. Nu. 25:1ff.; 31:8; Rev. 2:14). If he really meant the high-sounding words of v. 18, then v. 19 is a non sequitur, for the Lord has already spoken. It is on this point that the story revolves. In v. 20 we see the fearful power of the human heart apparently to bend God to its own will, while feigning to concede the essence of what God wants (only what I bid you, that shall you do). The same principle is voiced in Ps. 106:15. 21 In the morning Balaam went off with the princes of Moab.

22:22–35 Balaam and his ass. 22–27 Balaam set out with his two servants, identified in the Palestinian Targum as Jannes and Jambres (cf. 2 Tim. 3:8). On the way the ass stubbornly halted and turned into a field. The angel of the Lord, some manifestation of God Himself (see Introduction to Exodus), confronted him as his adversary (Heb. śāṭān; cf. Jb. 1:6–9; Zc. 3:1). Balaam beat his ass (as commonly in the east) and it entered a narrow path between walls (probably low stone walls) with vineyards on either side. The appearance remained and the beast clung to one wall catching Balaam's foot. Again the diviner beat the animal. It rushed into a narrow space where it could not turn and finally crouched down beneath Balaam only to be beaten again. 28–30 At this point Balaam heard the ass complaining about his ill-treatment of a faithful servant. Although such a phenomenon is outside normal experience men have sometimes sensed that God's creatures spoke to them. 31–34 Then Balaam saw the angel of the Lord and understood the behaviour of the ass. It was one more warning to a man whose way was perverse (the Heb. text is obscure here). Balaam confessed I have sinned, for I did not know that thou didst stand in the road against me. He offered to return home. 35 But a divine purpose could yet be fulfilled and the Lord permitted him to go with the princes of Balak, but to speak under His constraint.

22:36–40 The meeting between Balak and Balaam. 36–39 The two men met on the frontier of Moab at the city of Moab (or Ar of Moab, cf. 21:28) and went to Kiriath-huzoth (lit. 'city of streets'). On the way Balaam declared that he would speak only what God gave him, a true view of prophecy. 40 Balak sacrificed oxen and sheep and sent the flesh to Balaam and his companions (called princes).

22:41 – 24:25 Balaam's oracles. In the course of the next few days Balaam uttered four oracles. The Hebrew of these, which are poetic in form, is of a very ancient kind, indicating that in their present form they are as old as the 10th century BC so that their original form could be older still.

22:41 – 23:12 The first oracle. 22:41 Balak first took Balaam up to Bamoth-baal (lit. 'high places of Baal') to view the nearest of the people (Heb. qāṣeh, 'extremity', could be either the near or the far extremity). 23:1–3 Balaam commanded Balak to build seven altars and provide seven bulls and seven rams (seven evidently being the approved number in such exercises). Then they offered on each altar a bull and a ram. Balaam bid Balak wait while he went away to a bare height to receive his oracle. 4–6 God met him and gave him His word which he then declared to Balak and his officials. 7, 8 The oracle declared that Balak had called Balaam from the land of Qedem (eastern mountain), i.e. Aram, to curse Israel. But this was not possible since God had not cursed this people. 9, 10 Looking down from the top of the mountain he saw Israel below as a group not to be reckoned among the nations and asked, Who can count the dust of Jacob, or number the fourth part of Israel? Fourth part is really parallel to 'dust' and the Heb. rōḇa' should be derived from the root r-b-', 'dust'. Balaam concluded, Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my end be like his! perhaps a kind of oath declaring that he was ready to die if his words were untrue. 11, 12 The oracle did not please Balak but Balaam declared he could speak only what Yahweh gave him.

23:13–26 The second oracle. 13, 14 Thinking that the result might be different if Balaam saw only a part of Israel, Balak took him to the field of Zophim, to the top of Pisgah. 15–17 The same ritual was performed and again Balaam went off to receive an oracle. 18–20 Another oracle was given in poetic form in a 3:3 metre which declared that God was not a man that He should lie or change His mind. It was His intention to bless His people. 21 Again, Balaam could discern no misfortune for this people since Yahweh was with them and a royal shout of triumph was among them. 22 God had brought this people from Egypt. Horns symbolizes strength (cf. Dt. 33:17; Zc. 1:18, 19). The strength is either the Lord's (see RV), or Israel's (RSV). 23 No divination and no enchantment could therefore succeed against them. 24 Here was a people that would act as a lion or a lioness, the double description, male and female, stressing the totality or completeness of mastery possessed by Israel. 24, 26 In anger Balak commanded Balaam neither to curse nor to bless.

23:27 – 24:9 The third oracle. 27, 28 Balak tried yet a third vantage-point, the top of Peor overlooking the desert. (There was a Beth-jeshimoth below the hills in the plains of Moab; cf. 33:49.) Balaam was still looking to the west. 29, 30 The same ritual was repeated. 24:1 But this time Balaam abandoned omens and simply looked down on Israel. 3 Then God's spirit came upon him and he declared his third oracle (Heb. nᵉ'ûm, a special term for 'a divine utterance', used here three times). 4 The names El (God) and Shaddai (Almighty), ancient names for God, appear in this verse. Balaam received the vision of God as he lay prostrate before God with his eyes uncovered, freed from all blurring hindrances. 5–9 All he could see was Israel's fair tents stretching like valleys (or perhaps palm trees) and gardens beside a river, or like noble aloe or cedar trees. Prosperity and an abundant population would be his lot while his dominion would be stronger than that of Agag (the first king to be destroyed by Israel; cf. 1 Sa. 15:32f.). El had delivered him from Egypt and was his strength so that he would overthrow nations as a lion devours prey. Balaam's final words to Israel were, Blessed be every one who blesses you, and cursed be every one who curses you.

24:10–25 The fourth oracle. 10 Balak's anger was aroused and he struck his hands together in contempt (cf. Jb. 27:23; Lam. 2:15). Hired to curse Israel, Balaam had blessed them three times. Balak ordered Balaam to return at once to his home. 11 Balak had promised to honour Balaam but Yahweh the God of Israel had prevented this. 12, 13 Balaam recalled that originally he had told Balak's messengers that he could speak only the word of Yahweh (cf. 22:18). 14 As he departed for his homeland he made a final pronouncement in which he referred to Israel, Amalek, the Kenites and perhaps others. 15, 16 After introductory words he declared that he had received a vision from the Almighty (Shaddai). 17, 18 He saw Israel in the future (not now . . . not nigh) when the stars of Jacob would arise and the tribes of Israel would crush Moab. The usual translation, A star shall come forth out of Jacob, and a sceptre shall rise out of Israel, has given rise to many Messianic speculations and even the men of the Dead Sea Scrolls community regarded this passage as Messianic. There is, however, some reason, in view of the archaic nature of these poems, to read the plurals 'stars' and 'tribes' and to take v. 17 as having reference rather to Israel's political progress in coming days. The sons of Sheth are probably the ancient inhabitants of Moab known as the 'Shutu people' in early Egyptian documents. 18 Edom too would be dispossessed and her capital Seir overthrown. 19 Thus would Israel hold dominion over those who had opposed her passage along the King's Highway, Edom and Moab. 20 Amalek too, an ancient nation, would perish. 21 The Kenite, secure in his mountain fastness, would likewise waste away. (There is a play on words here; Kenite, Heb. qēnî, is related to qēn, nest.) 21, 22 The closing verses of this oracle are difficult and very different translations are proposed. W. F. Albright proposes for vv. 21 and 22:

'Thy abode, O Smith (Kenite), is perennial:
And thy nest is set in the cliffs,
And yet they shall become fuel, Thy dwellers, even as I look.'

This rendering removes the reference to Asshur and enables us to keep the passage in its ancient setting. 23, 24 are also difficult. Albright, albeit with some emendations, translates:

'The isles shall be gathered from the north, and ships from the furthest sea,
And while I gaze they pass over—So he also shall perish for ever!'

It is not entirely clear which people are referred to in these verses but it is not unthinkable that vv. 23 and 24 refer to the invasion of the Sea Peoples along the Mediterranean coastlands in the 12th century BC. Contemporary Egyptian texts refer to 'foreigners of the north', from 'isles in the midst of the sea', making plundering incursions 'from their isles'. Broadly, however this fourth and last oracle proclaimed the overthrow of every enemy of the emergent nation visible on the plains below Moab's heights. 25 Little wonder that Balak dismissed so unprofitable a diviner. The two men parted and went their separate ways.

25:1–18 Apostasy at Peor

In the events of the previous three chapters Israel played no part. But two cases of immoral conduct with non-Israelite women which led to involvement in the worship of foreign gods are now described.

25:1–5 Immorality with Moabite women. 1–3 While Israel dwelt in Shittim the people began to play the harlot with the daughters of Moab (i.e. Moabite women). The act was both physical and religious (cf. Rev. 2:14). Shittim (lit. 'acacia tree'), probably Tell Kefrein, was the last stopping-place before crossing the Jordan (cf. Jos. 2:1; 3:1). Israel was invited to share in religious festivals of the local Baal at Peor and probably of Chemosh, the god of Moab. 4 Moses was commanded to punish the leaders publicly (lit. 'in the face of the sun'). The mode of punishment is not clear and a variety of translations for the Hebrew verb have been offered—'impale', 'expose', 'hang', 'cast down' (based on Arabic root). The latter method is known elsewhere in the OT (e.g. 2 Ch. 25:8–12; cf. Lk. 4:29). Possibly the men were slain and then cast over a cliff to lie unburied, exposed to the sun. Only thus could judgment on the whole people be averted. 5 It was the judges of Israel who undertook the execution.

25:6–18 Immorality with Midianite women. 6–9 In the second incident the people came weeping to the tent of meeting because of a plague that had broken out. An Israelite man had brought home a Midianite wife. Phinehas, son of Eleazar the high priest, followed the couple to their tent and slew them, halting the plague but not before twenty-four thousand (Heb. 'elep̄, exact sense not clear; see on 1:2, 3, etc.) had died. 10–13 For his zeal (jealousy), God made a covenant of peace with Eleazar. A vowel change in šālôm, 'peace', would yield šillûm, 'reward' (cf., however, Mal. 2:5), and the sense may be that the promise of perpetual priesthood to Eleazar and his descendants was the reward of his zeal. The later Zadokites traced their descent to Eleazar through Phinehas (cf. 1 Ch. 24:3). On that day Phinehas made an atonement or 'covering' for the people. 14, 15 The Israelite offender was Zimri, a Simeonite, and the Midianite woman was Cozbi (lit. 'deceiver'), the daughter of a Midianite chieftain. 16–18 Thereafter Israel was to harass the Midianites who are here blamed for both incidents in which Israel was beguiled.

26:1–65 The second census

Now that the journey was virtually over a new census was necessary, both in order to assess the military strength of Israel for invasion, and also for the purpose of allotting the territory of Canaan. The first census was taken by Moses and Aaron (ch. 1). Now, after a generation, Moses and Eleazar take a second census. There are some differences between the two.

26:1–4 Moses and Eleazar instructed to take a second census. 1–4 After the plague of ch. 25 Moses and Eleazar were instructed to take a second census (cf. 1:1). As previously, the men of twenty years and upward, i.e. the men of military age, were to be numbered. The opening words of v. 4 are lacking in Hebrew. The sentence begins from twenty years old and upward, suggesting the omission of some words from the text.

26:5–51 The census of the secular tribes. Comparison with the first census shows that the total number of adult males had decreased by 1,820. Seven tribes increased and five decreased in number. The order of the tribes is different. Here Reuben, Simeon and Gad are mentioned first and Judah, Issachar and Zebulun second, whereas the order is reversed in ch. 1. In the next block of names Manasseh precedes Ephraim (vv. 28, 35; cf. 1:32, 34).

5–11 The subdivisions of Reuben are the same as those set out in Gn. 46:9 and the numbers are 2,770 less than in Nu. 1:20. The editor has here inserted comments on Dathan and Abiram who were destroyed along with Korah (ch. 16). The comment in v. 11 agrees with the fact that there were Korahites in post-exilic times (cf. 1 Ch. 26:1–19). Evidently only some of the Korahites were involved in the incident of ch. 16. 12–14 The Simeonites were reduced by 37,100 (cf. 1:23). The subdivision of the tribe follows Gn. 46:10. 15–18 The tribe of Gad had 5,150 fewer males and some of the names of the subtribes vary slightly from those in Gn. 46:16. 19–22 Judah gained 1,900 (cf. 1:26). 23–25 Issachar gained 9,900 (cf. 1:29). 26, 27 Zebulun gained 3,100 (cf. 1:31). 28–37 The total Joseph family gained 2,500 although Ephraim lost 8,000 (37; cf. 1:33). 38–41 Benjamin increased by 10,200 (41; cf. 1:37). 42, 43 Dan increased by 1,700. 44–47 Asher increased by 11,900 (47; cf. 1:41). 48–50 Naphtali decreased by 8,000 (50; cf. 1:43). 51 The same problem arises here as in ch. 1 since the significance of the terms thousand and hundred is not clear, excepting that they denoted military units. Misunderstanding of the exact meaning of these terms and the assumption that they were simple numbers led the final editor to the mathematical calculation of v. 51 (cf. 1:46).

26:52–56 Two principles of land allotment. Two principles are enunciated: 52–54 first, that division of the land was to be made according to the number of people in the tribe; 55, 56 and secondly, the land was to be allocated by lot. These two principles might seem to be in conflict. Some commentators have suggested that the general locality was decided by lot while the exact limits of each tribal area was decided according to the size of the tribes. Another possibility is that even before the conquest the size and location of each inheritance area was decided. Inside that broad area the family units were to be decided by lot.

26:57–62 The census of the Levites. 57 As previously (cf. 1:47; 3:14–43) the Levites were numbered separately. 58 The method of describing the Levites is different. The three main families are Gershon, Kohath and Merari, but in place of eight subdivisions (cf. 3:17–20), only five are given here—Libni, Hebron, Mahli, Mushi and Korah. Four of these occur in 3:18–20 but Korah is new (cf. ch. 16; 26:11). 59 The descent of Aaron, Moses and Miriam through Amram and Kohath to Levi is traced. 60, 61 The sons of Aaron are given as Nadab and Abihu (see ch. 16), Eleazar and Ithamar.

26:63–65 An important observation on the census. The editor notes that only Caleb and Joshua are common to this census and the first census (cf. 14:30). The old Israel needed to be remade before the people could enter the land of promise.

27:1–11 The daughters of Zelophehad

In general, women in the Ancient Near East were not able to inherit property. The 'firstborn' of a man had special privileges (cf. Dt. 21:15–17) even if he was born of a secondary wife. If a man died without a son, levirate marriage was the rule, i.e. the dead man's brother was required to take his wife and raise up a son to him (cf. Dt. 25:5–10). The present arrangement permitted daughters to inherit.

1–4 When a certain Zelophehad, a man of Manasseh, died without a son, his five daughters came to Moses and Eleazar and the leaders to plead that although their father had died, he was not one of the rebels associated with Korah (cf. ch. 16), but his death was due to his sharing in the general sin of all who came out of Egypt. Why then should he lose his inheritance because he had no son? Should not the inheritance pass to his daughters? 5–7 Moses brought their case before the Lord and was directed to cause the inheritance of their father to pass to them. 8–11 A new law was enunciated. If a man died without a son the daughter could inherit; failing a daughter, the inheritance passed to his brother; failing a brother, the next of kin became the heir. The procedure seems to have been an alternative for levirate marriage. In either case the property was retained in the family. Some commentators interpret this incident as a symbolic way of expressing the claim of Manasseh to areas on the west of Jordan, i.e. an inheritance among their father's brethren. Be that as it may, the law is differently presented in 36:1–9 where it is modified so as to prevent the transfer of the inheritance should a woman marry.

27:12–23 Joshua appointed as Moses' successor

12–14 In view of Moses' impending death the Lord called him to go to the mountain of Abarim (defined as Mt. Nebo in Dt. 32:49, lit. 'the mountains of the other side'). Here he would see the land he was forbidden to enter because of his rebellion (cf. 20:12) and then he would be gathered to his people like his brother Aaron. 15–17 Moses called upon Yahweh the God of the spirits of all flesh (cf. 16:22), i.e. the God who gives physical life to all living creatures, to appoint a successor who would go out and come in before Israel (cf. Jos. 14:11; 1 Sa. 18:13, 16; 1 Ki. 3:7, etc.) lest the people be leaderless, as sheep which have no shepherd. 18–20 Moses was commanded to take Joshua, a man in whom the spirit dwelt, and lay his hand upon him in the presence of Eleazar and the people. This was not to endow him with the spirit which he already had, but visibly to mark him out as leader. He would be given his commission (lit. 'commanded') and invested with some of Moses' authority (Heb. hôd, 'honour', 'prestige'). 21 Thereafter he would seek the divine will through the Urim (the sacred lot) and exercise authority over the people. 22, 23 In the subsequent ceremony Eleazar played little part, although thereafter he would be God's spokesman to interpret God's will to Joshua.

28:1 – 30:16 Regulations for public worship and vows

These chapters, which give an elaborate and carefully-defined list of instructions concerning the offerings to be made in Israel, have sometimes been regarded as very late. But it is impossible to decide exactly how detailed the regulations were in Moses' day apart from this and similar passages (cf. Lv. 23). Even granting that the final editor brought ancient material up to date, it seems precarious to assign these chapters completely to the post-exilic period (the P document). There is great wisdom in the proposal of W. F. Albright (see Introduction, p. 169) that the spirit and much of the detail of the so-called 'priestly code' (of which much of Numbers forms a part) may be considered as ante-dating the conquest of Canaan, i.e. as going back to Mosaic origins.

The modern reader will sometimes ask whether such detailed prescriptions as are set out in these chapters are relevant to this modern age, since the prescriptions do not apply in the worship of the Christian church today. Clearly, the prescriptions for worship in one age do not necessarily apply in another and modifications are constantly being made to old forms of worship. What one needs to do in these cases is to recognize behind each expression of worship the great principles. These remain and find newer expressions in the course of time. The ancient Tabernacle and its rituals and feasts gave testimony to the belief that God was in the midst of His people, that He could be approached, and that with Him in the midst the people ought to order their lives in accordance with the fact that God the holy One dwelt among them. The whole system demonstrated to Israel, and to men of all ages, that sinful men may approach God through a consecrated mediatorial priesthood, that constant cleansing for sins was possible, that constant guidance for life was available and that great saving acts of God in centuries past could be remembered by noble festivals and feasts such as Passover and the Feast of Tabernacles.

With the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ the necessity for all the temporary forms, shadows of the true (cf. Heb. 10:1), was past. He was at once the sacrifice for all sins and the High Priest who offered the sacrifice. By His Spirit He guides His people today. His saving work wrought at the cross may be remembered each time men gather at the Lord's table 'to proclaim the Lord's death until he comes'. Yet the 'shadows' and 'symbols' of the OT system, if understood as pictures of the true, have much to teach the modern Christian and they should be studied for the light they give on the great underlying principles of God's ways with men.

28:1, 2 Introduction. God instructed Moses to tell the people to present God's offering, the food (or meat) for His fire-offerings, and His pleasing odour, each in their proper season. Offering is here collective, covering every offering that was burned and turned into smoke which could ascend heavenwards to God.

28:3–8 The daily offerings. 3–6 The fire-offering that constituted the regular offering was basic to the whole sacrificial system since it continued day after day (cf. Ex. 29:38–42; Lv. 6:19–23). The details varied from time to time (cf. 2 Ki. 16:15; Ezk. 46:13–15). Here the offering is one male lamb in the morning and one male lamb in the evening (lit. 'between the evenings'), along with a tenth of an ephah of fine flour for a cereal-offering mixed with a fourth of a hin of oil. The whole was burned as a fire-offering to Yahweh. 7 Accompanying each lamb was a drink-offering of a fourth of a hin to be poured out in the holy place, evidently the courtyard where the great altar stood. The drink-offering is here called an offering of strong drink but possibly the phrase denotes merely a drink-offering, since the word (Heb. šēḵār) may be a technical word related to the Akkadian šikaru. Elsewhere the term denotes an intoxicating drink. 8 The term minḥâ, here translated cereal offering, seems to include both the animal and the grain offerings, since the evening offering of a lamb is compared with the morning offering (cf. 1 Ki. 18:29).

28:9, 10 The sabbath offering. 9 On the sabbath two male lambs a year old, each with its grain, oil, and drink-offering were offered. 10 These were in addition to the regular offerings, so that on the sabbath the offerings were doubled (cf. Ezk. 46:4, 5).

28:11–15 The offerings for the new month. 11 At the beginning of each new month the burnt-offering was considerable—two young bulls, one ram, seven male lambs a year old as a burnt-offering. 12–14 The prescribed grain and drink-offering appropriate to each was also offered (cf. Ezk. 45:21, 22). 15 In addition a male goat was offered for a sin offering.

28:16–25 Offerings for the Feast of Unleavened Bread. 16 On the fourteenth day of the first month the Passover was kept. No offerings are mentioned, since offerings as such belong to the sanctuary and the Passover was a home festival (cf. Lv. 23:5–8). 17 On the fifteenth day the Feast of Unleavened Bread began and continued for seven days. These two feasts were originally different but were later joined together, as here. The unleavened bread was eaten for seven days. 18 The first and seventh days were days of holy convocation on which no laborious work was done (cf. v. 25). 19–21 Each day a considerable offering was made to Yahweh—two young bulls, a ram, seven male yearling lambs, all without blemish and each with its appropriate cereal-offering (cf. Ezk. 45:23, 24). 22 A male goat for a sin-offering was also offered each day. 23–25 All these were additional to the regular daily burnt-offering.

28:26–31 Offerings for the Feast of Weeks. This was a one-day feast, the details of which varied from time to time both as to the length of the feast and as to the animals offered (cf. Ex. 23:16; 34:22; Dt. 16:10, 11). The festival is called the Feast of Harvest in Ex. 23:16, and the Feast of Weeks in Ex. 34:22. The offerings are the same as for the feasts of New Moon and Unleavened Bread. The feast is not mentioned in Ezekiel.

26 On the day of the first fruits, i.e. the day when Israel brought the firstfruits of the ground to the Lord, an offering was made (minḥâ, see on v. 8) and a day of holy convocation was observed when no laborious work was done. 27–29 The burnt-offering, which was a pleasing odour to God, consisted of two young bulls, one ram, seven male lambs a year old with their cereal-offering and oil. 30 A male goat was also offered to make atonement for Israel. 31 All these were additional to the regular daily offering.

29:1–6 Offerings for the Feast of the Seventh Month, the Feast of Trumpets. 1 On the first day of the seventh month there was another day of holy convocation in which all work ceased. The day was a day of trumpet blowing. 2–5 A burnt offering, a pleasing odour to the Lord was offered comprising one young bull, one ram, seven male lambs a year old, each with the appropriate cereal-offering and oil, and a male goat for a sin-offering (cf. Lv. 23:23–25). 6 These offerings were additional to the offerings made normally at new moon, and the regular daily offerings (cf. 28:11–15). This day is not mentioned in Ezekiel.

29:7–11 Offerings for the Day of Atonement, the tenth day of the seventh month. 7 This was another day of holy convocation. But on this day the people were to afflict themselves, i.e. fast and refrain from all work. The day came to be known as the Day of Atonement (Heb. yôm kippûr, cf. Lv. 23:26–32). 8–10 The offering was a burnt-offering, consisting of a young bull, a ram, seven male yearling lambs, all of them without blemish and all accompanied by the appropriate cereal-offering and oil. 11 On the same day a male goat was offered for a sin-offering, besides the sin offering of atonement (Heb. haṭṭā't hakkippurîm), which consisted of a bullock (cf. Ex. 29:36; 30:10; Lv. 16:11), and the regular daily offering.

29:12–38 The offerings for the Feast of Booths. 12 The offerings on this occasion were the most numerous of the whole year. The feast began on the fifteenth day of the seventh month with a holy convocation and continued for seven more days. Cf. Lv. 23:33–36, 39–43. 13–16 On the first of the eight days of festival the maximum number of beasts was offered, thirteen young bulls, two rams, fourteen male lambs a year old, all without blemish, each accompanied by its cereal-offering and oil. In addition one male goat for a sin-offering, as well as the regular daily offering with its cereal- and drink-offering were offered. 17–34 On each succeeding day one less bull was offered until the seventh day, but the rest of the offerings remained the same. 35 On the eighth day there was a solemn assembly (Heb. 'aṣereṯ), or 'closing day'. 36–38 The offerings for the day were one bull, one ram, seven male lambs a year old, all without blemish, along with their cereal- and drink-offerings, as well as one male goat for a sin-offering, besides the regular daily offering. These offerings agree with those of the first and tenth days of the seventh month (vv. 1, 7). In Ex. 23:16; 34:22 no duration is given for the celebration of this feast. Dt. 16:13–15 appears to specify seven days only, but should probably be understood in the same sense as Ezk. 45:25 where we may well understand the regulation to mean the fifteenth day and the seven subsequent days, a total of eight in all, as in the present passage.

29:39, 40 General offerings. The chapter concludes with an important observation. The offerings referred to here are statutory and prescribed (appointed feasts). But there were also private votive offerings, freewill offerings, burnt offerings, cereal offerings, drink offerings, and peace offerings.

30:1–16 The law of vows, particularly women's vows. After a brief statement about the obligations of men in the matter of vows the major part of this chapter (vv. 3–16) is devoted to vows made by women.

1, 2 The vow of a man. Men in Israel were unconditionally bound by a vow of any kind. Two kinds of vows are referred to here, the vow to the Lord, a term with wide connotation, and an oath to bind oneself by a pledge (Heb. 'issar, from the root '-s-r, 'to bind'). The second of these vows seems to have reference to secular obligations, while the first is concerned with religious obligations. But the usage may have been a little more flexible. Vows are discussed elsewhere in the OT, in Nu. 6:2ff.; Lv. 5:4, 5; 27:1ff.; Dt. 23:21–23; Pss. 22:25; 50:14, etc. A complete section of the Jewish Mishnah is devoted to vows, the Nedarim. But more comprehensively a man was bound to do all that proceeds out of his mouth.

3–5 The vow of an unmarried daughter. 3 A young woman in her youth, and in her father's care (while within her father's house), could only undertake a vow or pledge with her father's approval. 4 If her father learned of the vow and did not repudiate it, the vow stood. 5 If the father disapproved the day he heard of it, the vow was invalid. The Lord would forgive her failure to fulfil her obligation because of her father's intervention.

6–15 The vows of married women. There are three cases: the betrothed woman who made a vow unknown to her father but discovered by her husband after marriage (vv. 6–8), the widow or divorced woman (v. 9), the married woman (vv. 10–15).

6–8 Where a woman is given in marriage while under her vows or any thoughtless utterance of her lips, the husband may repudiate these on the day he hears of them. If he learns of the obligations and does not repudiate them, they stand. No penalty attaches to the woman where her husband repudiates her vows. 9 The widow or divorced woman is completely responsible for every vow or pledge she takes. 10–15 If a woman enters into a vow or pledge when in her husband's house, the husband may make them null and void on the day he hears of them. In that case no penalty attaches to the woman for breaking her vow or pledge. But if the husband does not object, the woman is responsible to fulfil her vow or pledge. If the husband some time later seeks to make the vow or pledge null and void he shall bear the iniquity, i.e. he is held responsible for his wife's undertakings.

16 The law of vows summarized. The last verse is a simple summary of the law of vows in the two broad areas of a man and his wife, and a father and his daughter.

31:1–54 The holy war against Midian

The holy war featured prominently in the early history of Israel. In theory, since Yahweh is the Lord of history, He will work out His purposes despite opposition and will overthrow every opponent. Israel's task was to co-operate with Him. He was leader of Israel's armies and would assure them of victory, although not every war was a holy war. After the battle, captives and booty belonged to Yahweh and were either 'devoted' entirely to Him and destroyed, or preserved at His will in whole or in part. The present story concerns a campaign against Midian, or rather a part of Midian, since despite vv. 8–17 the Midianites remained a powerful group long after the days of Moses; cf., e.g., Jdg. 6–8. The passage gives a good picture of how the holy war was to be conducted, how warriors who participated were to be purified, and how the spoil was to be divided. The great numbers of people and animals are evidently symbolic rather than strictly mathematical.

31:1–6 The call-up. 1–3 Moses as Israel's leader was instructed to avenge Israel on the Midianites because of the incident of Peor (cf. ch. 25). 4 Each tribe had to provide one unit of men (Heb. 'elep̄; the translation thousand is incorrect). 5, 6 Twelve 'thousands' armed for war were selected and placed under the leadership of Phinehas (cf. 1 Ch. 9:20) who took with him the vessels of the sanctuary, possibly the ark (cf. Nu. 10:35f.; 14:44; 1 Sa. 4:4; 2 Ch. 5:5), and the trumpets for the alarm (*t*ᵉ*rû*ʿ*â*). See on 10:3ff. The word for 'alarm' probably refers to a number of short trumpet blasts.

31:7–12 The defeat of Midian. 7, 8 As in other holy wars, males were to be slain. Among these were five Midianite kings, called elsewhere 'elders' (22:4) or 'leaders' (Jos. 13:21). Balaam, the central figure of chs. 22–24, who evidently had eventually joined the Midianites, was also slain. 9–12 Women and children were taken captive, flocks, herds, and property were taken as booty, cities (permanent settlements) and encampments (nomad settlements) were burned, and the spoil was brought to Moses, Eleazar, and the people.

31:13–18 The destruction of the Midianites. 13–16 Moses met the returning army and at once expressed displeasure that the officers had spared the women who had caused Israel to sin at Peor (cf. 25:16–18). 14 provides a good example of the use of 'thousand' and 'hundred' as a military unit. 17, 18 The army was commanded to kill all male children as well as these offending women. The young virgins were to be taken by the warriors. The incident must have been a local one since Midianites are well known in later centuries.

31:19–24 The purification of the warriors. 19, 20 Contact with dead bodies in the war made the warriors and their captives unclean. Purification according to the ritual of ch. 19 was necessary. Those who were unclean had to remain outside the camp for seven days. On the third and seventh day they had to purify themselves (lit. 'de-sin') as well as their garments, etc. 21–24 A further ritual of purification by fire was required. Everything that can stand the fire, evidently all the metal objects, had to be first passed through the fire and then purified (lit. 'de-sinned') with the water of impurity (cf. 19:1–22). Objects that could not stand the fire had to be washed with the water. Finally, on the seventh day the men washed their clothes and returned to the camp.

31:25–54 The distribution of the spoil. 25–27 The spoil was divided equally between those who went to war and those who remained at home, a good illustration of tribal solidarity (cf. 1 Sa. 30:24, 25). 28 Yahweh received a tribute of one out of five hundred (one-fifth of 1%) of the persons and animals. 29 This was taken and given to

Eleazar as an offering to the Lord. 30, 31 The Levites received one drawn out of every fifty (2%) of the people's portion of persons and animals. 32 The booty remaining of the spoil that the men of war took is then listed. The exact definition of the booty remaining is not clear but presumably it covered what was left after the removal of the sheep and cattle eaten during the campaign, and the personal booty taken by the soldiers from the slain consisting of the items listed in v. 50. 33–47 The numbers appear to be excessive and are probably symbolic in some way, although, to be sure, the arithmetic is carefully worked out, e.g., v. 38. That 12,000 Israelites (v. 5) could overthrow a people among whom there were 32,000 virgins (v. 35) and bring back 800,000 animals without the loss of a single life (vv. 48, 49) suggests that we are dealing with a numerical scheme that is not normal. 48 The military usage of the terms 'thousand' and 'hundred' is clear in this verse. 49, 50 In gratitude for God's signal blessing the men brought the Lord's offering to the sanctuary to make an atonement (Heb. verb kipper, 'cover') before the Lord. Perhaps the verb had the connotation suggested by the noun kōper, 'ransom' (cf. Ex. 30:12). 51–54 The value of gold in the offering was 16,750 shekels, i.e. 6,700 oz. calculating at two-fifths of an ounce per shekel, an enormous quantity. Again, the number may be symbolic. This offering was taken to the tent of meeting by Moses and Eleazar as a memorial, a reminder to Israel of a remarkable incident in which they experienced the help and deliverance of Yahweh.

32:1–42 Settlement of two and a half tribes in Transjordan

The tribes of Reuben, Gad and half Manasseh were the first to be allotted their portion, but lest their withdrawal should discourage the rest Moses required them to help their brethren before they could actually exploit their land in Transjordan.

32:1–5 The request of Reuben and Gad. 1, 2 The area requested by Reuben and Gad was the land of Jazer and the land of Gilead, i.e. the area between the Arnon and the Jabbok rivers. It was a good place for animals. 3–5 Nine towns in the region are listed. Several can be identified. Ataroth is probably Khirbet ʿAṭṭarûs 8 miles north-west of Dibon; Dibon is modern Diban 4 miles north of the Arnon; Nimrah is in the vicinity of Tell Nimrin, well to the north; Heshbon is modern Ḥesbân, the capital of Sihon; Elealah is the modern el-ʿAl north-east of Heshbon; Beon may be Beth-baal-meon, the modern Maʿîn 10 miles south-south-west of Heshbon. Sebam and Nebo cannot be identified. It is of interest that the Moabite stone found at Dibon in 1868, dating to the middle of the 9th century BC, states that the men of Gad dwelt in Ataroth from of old (line 10). This monument refers to several of these names.

32:6–15 Moses' indignation. 6, 7 This proposal of Reuben and Gad angered Moses because it could possibly discourage the heart of the people of Israel from going over into the land which the Lord has given them. 8–13 Moses recalled the story of the spies when the ten discouraged the people who then turned back (cf. 13:31–33) with the result that only Caleb and Joshua would enter the land. 14, 15 The present action was reminiscent of that former one and a new brood of sinful men had arisen to provoke the Lord.

32:16–19 The promise of Reuben and Gad. 16 Clearly some protection was needed for the women and children of Reuben and Gad. The men would build sheepfolds (lit. 'walls for sheep'), and cities, probably fortified, for their families. 17–19 Then they would go armed with their fellows till they too had possessed an inheritance on the west side of Jordan. Cf. Jos. 1:12–18.

32:20–33 Moses' conditions. 20–22 The promise is now stated formally. Only after the Lord had driven out the enemies on the west side of Jordan were Reuben and Gad free of obligation to the Lord. 23 If they failed they would have sinned against the Lord: your sin will find you out, i.e. judgment would inevitably befall them. 24–27 Reuben and Gad formally accepted the conditions. 28–32 A public occasion is depicted in which Joshua and Eleazar and the tribal leaders were informed and in which the men of Reuben and Gad declared their intention to help their brethren on oath. 33 The area assigned to Reuben and Gad was that formerly occupied by Sihon and Og the Amorite kings (cf. 21:21–35). At this point in the narrative the half-tribe of Manasseh is joined with Reuben and Gad. See vv. 39–42.

32:34–38 Cities built by Reuben and Gad. 34–36 Some of these cities were mentioned in v. 3, viz. Dibon, Ataroth, and Beth-nimrah. Among the others Aroer is the modern ʿArâʿir, a fine site overlooking Wadi Arnon at present being excavated; Jogbehah is possibly Jubeihât 5 miles north of Amman; Beth-haran is south of Beth-nimrah on the eastern edge of the Jordan valley. 37, 38 The cities built by Reuben are mentioned in v. 3 except Kiriathaim, the modern Khirbet el-Qureiyât 3 miles north-west of Dibon, mentioned also on the Moabite stone.

32:39–42 The conquest of Gilead by clans from the tribe of Manasseh. 39 The explanation of the inclusion of the half-tribe of Manasseh among those who occupied Transjordan is now given. Three of the clans of Manasseh, Machir, Jair and Nobah, occupied this area which was the original territory of Manasseh. Later they had a share to the west of Jordan (cf. Jos. 17:14–18). 40–42 The distribution of the area between the three clans is shown here. It was the area formerly occupied by Og (cf. 21:31–35).

33:1 – 36:13 MISCELLANEOUS APPENDICES

The book of Numbers concludes with a number of appendices—an itinerary of the journey from Egypt to the plains of Moab (ch. 33), tribal boundaries (ch. 34), cities of refuge (ch. 35), and a concluding chapter on the inheritance of women (ch. 36).

33:1–56 The itinerary from Egypt to the plains of Moab reviewed

The whole journey from Egypt to the plains of Moab is now reviewed. Eleven stages are noted between Rameses and Sinai (vv. 1–15), twenty from Sinai to Ezion-geber (vv. 16–35), one to the wilderness of Sin, i.e. Kadesh (v. 36), and nine to the plains of Moab (vv. 37–49). Few of these can be identified today, and some of the notable places like Massah-Meribah and Taberah are not listed here. Probably the actual number of stopping-places was far more than those listed here. (See map in Exodus, p. 123.)

33:1–4 Introduction. 1, 2 Moses is recorded as having kept a log book of the various stages (Heb. massa', lit. 'a plucking up', i.e. the striking of the camp). The stages are described in terms of the starting-point. 3, 4 Rameses (cf. Ex. 1:11), the ancient Tanis, is probably modern Qanṭîr. Israel set out triumphantly (lit. 'with a raised hand') while the Egyptians were recovering from the tragic events of Passover night.

33:5–15 From Rameses to Sinai. 5, 6 The next stopping-place was Succoth, probably Tell el Maskhûṭah, and thence they went to Etham which some identify with an ancient fortress between the two Bitter Lakes (Egyptian ḥtm, 'fortress'). 7–15 The itinerary to Sinai thereafter follows Ex. 12:37 – 19:2. One proposal is that the way led west of the Bitter Lakes, crossed the shallow waters south of the Great Bitter Lake and followed the western arm of the Red Sea south for three days' journey (cf. Ex. 3:18; 15:22) to Marah, which on the view that Sinai lay in the peninsula may be 'Ain Ḥawâra, some 25 miles down the Gulf of Suez. Then Elim may be the oasis of Wadi Gharandel, Dophkah may be Serâbîṭ el-Khâdim, and Alush, Wadi el-'Eshsh. Rephidim was probably Wadi Refâyid (cf. Ex. 17:1; 19:2).

33:16–36 In the wilderness. 16 Twenty camping-places are noted from Sinai to Ezion-geber. Kibroth-hattaavah is possibly Ruweis el-Ebeirig a few miles north-east of Mt. Sinai. 17–34 The next twelve places cannot be identified. Moseroth, Bene-jaakan, Hor-haggidgad and Jotbathah occur in Dt. 10:6, 7 (where Moserah is Moserath and Gudgodah is Hor-haggidgad). 35, 36 Ezion-geber is at the head of the Gulf of Aqabah, probably the modern Tell el-Kheleifeh which has been excavated. It is some 50 miles from here to Kadesh.

33:37–49 From Kadesh to Moab. 37–39 Many years elapsed before Israel left Kadesh to travel on. At Mt. Hor Aaron died aged 123 years (cf. 20:22–29). 40 Only passing reference is made to conflict with Arad (cf. 21:1). 41–49 The itinerary then follows chs. 20, 21. Punon is possibly modern Fenian, a place where copper mines were worked. Iye-abarim along the Wadi Zered is possibly modern Maḥay (cf. 21:10–12). Dibon-gad is mentioned on the Moabite stone as Mesha's capital. Almon-diblathaim may be the Beth-diblathaim of Je. 48:22. Finally Beth-jeshimoth is possibly Tell el-'Azeimeh and Abel-shittim, Tell Kefrein, both in the Jordan Valley opposite Jericho, marking the last camping place on the plains of Moab before crossing the Jordan.

33:50–56 Final instructions before crossing the Jordan. 50, 51 Instructions about the treatment of the people west of Jordan follow. 52 Israel must drive out the Canaanites, etc. and destroy their cult objects, figured stones (i.e. carved statues in stone), molten images, and high places. 53, 54 The land of the dispossessed inhabitants was to be distributed by lot. 55, 56 By way of warning Israel was told that if the inhabitants were not driven out they would remain as pricks in your eyes and thorns in your sides. If Israel failed in this task, Yahweh would do to them what they thought to do to the inhabitants of Canaan.

34:1–29 The ideal boundaries of Israel

While Israel remained on the plains of Moab any boundaries on the west of Jordan could only be theoretical. Even after they crossed the river many years of warfare lay ahead. Indeed, only in the days of David and Solomon did Israel's boundaries ever approximate to the ideal. Yet the ideal remained through the centuries (cf. Jos. 15–19; Ezk. 47:13–23, etc.).

34:1–15 The boundaries fixed. 1, 2 The land of Canaan is defined as the land of Canaan in its full extent. 3–5 On the south the line ran from the southern end of the Salt Sea (Dead Sea), south-west along the border of Edom via the ascent of Akrabbim ('scorpions'; mod. Naqb eṣ-Ṣafâ), across the wilderness of Zin to Kadesh-barnea its most southerly point, then north-west through the unidentified Hazar-addar and Azmon to the Brook of Egypt (Wadi el-'Arîsh) and thence to the Mediterranean Sea. It may be remarked that this identification of the Brook of Egypt is not undisputed. See NBD, 'Egypt, River of', for fuller discussion. 6 The western boundary was the Great Sea (Mediterranean), although except for a brief occupation in Hezekiah's day (cf. 2 Ki. 18:8) this area was never in Israel's hands. 7–9 The northern boundary ran east from an unidentified point on the Mediterranean Sea to an unidentified Mt. Hor (clearly not the one of 20:22), and thence probably north-east to the entrance of Hamath (probably Lebo-hamath, at the head of the Orontes). The other places cannot be identified unless Hazar-enan (lit. 'enclosure of the spring') is Banias, although some identify it with Qaryatein, the last oasis before Palmyra. 10–12a The eastern boundary is identifiable once it touches the shoulder (ridge) of the sea of Chinnereth (lit. 'harp-shaped'; i.e. the Sea of Galilee). Thence it followed the Jordan to the Dead Sea. 12b, 13 This shall be your land with its boundaries all round refers merely to the area west of the Jordan since the area to the east has already been described. It was to be divided by lot among the nine and a half tribes. 14, 15 The area in Transjordan, eastward, toward the sunrise, was already occupied by two and a half tribes. The phrase beyond the Jordan . . . eastward might well be thought to betray the hand of one who wrote, later, on the west of the river. This is not, however, necessarily the case. The word translated beyond (Heb. 'ēḇer) probably really means 'in the region of', and consequently is often found with associated words like 'eastward' or 'westward' (e.g. Dt. 4:41; 11:30) so as to fix its precise reference. In references like Jos. 9:1 and 1 Ki. 4:24 (where RSV actually translates it 'west') it is used to refer to the west bank by a writer living on the west of the river. The expression in the present passage is therefore simply equivalent to 'on the east side of Jordan' and permits no conclusion to be drawn as to the location of the writer. (See further G. T. Manley, The Book of the Law, 1957, p. 49.)

34:16–29 The allotment officers. 16–18 The allocation of the land was committed to Eleazar, Joshua, and one leader from each tribe. 19–29 The leaders are named in order from south to north. At the time Dan was still in the south so that the time is prior to Jdg. 18. Only Caleb is known among the leaders. The names, however, provide interesting insight into Israel's name system, e.g. Shemuel, 'name of God'; Elidad, 'God has loved'; Hanniel, 'favour of God'; Elizaphan, 'my God protects'; Paltiel, 'God is my deliverance'; Pedahel, 'God has redeemed', etc.

35:1–34 The Levitical cities

35:1–8 The cities and pasture lands of the Levites. 1–3 The Levites, no longer a secular tribe, had no possession in the land. Since they could not all be occupied at the central sanctuary at one time they were allotted forty-eight cities in the areas of the secular tribes. In addition pasture lands were set apart around the cities for their flocks and herds. 4, 5 It is difficult to form a clear idea of the disposition of the pasture lands. They were to reach from the wall of the city outward a thousand cubits all round, i.e. 500 yards. Further, Israel was to measure outside the city 2,000 cubits (1,000 yards) on each side of the city. Many ingenious solutions have been offered, but one of the simplest is that on each side of the city there was an area, 500 yards outward from the city wall and 1,000 yards long, for the Levites. The rest of the land, if any, was for the people. But it is safest to treat the picture as symbolic. Cf. Ezk. 48:8–14 where the priests and Levites were allotted strips of territory across the middle of the land. 6–8 Of the forty-eight cities, six were reserved as cities of refuge (see vv. 9–15). The manner of allocation is described in Jos. 21. Whether the Levites owned these pasture lands personally is not clear. Some passages in the OT suggest that at times priests and Levites bought, sold, and owned land (cf. Lv. 25:32–34; Je. 32:7–12). The forty-eight cities were to be taken from the secular tribes according to the principle that the larger tribes gave more than the smaller ones (cf. 26:54; 33:54).

35:9–15 The cities of refuge. 9–12 According to ancient Semitic law, when one man killed another, whether deliberately or accidentally, the blood of the dead man was avenged by a kinsman according to the law: 'Whoever sheds the blood of man, by man shall his blood be shed' (Gn. 9:6). In this simple form the law was indiscriminate since there was a difference between accidental homicide and wilful murder. Among some peoples refuge from the avenger (Heb. gō'ēl) could be found at a sanctuary. In Israel six cities were set apart where a killer might shelter till he came before the congregation for judgment. 13–15 Three cities were situated beyond Jordan and three in Canaan. They were available to the people of Israel, to the resident alien, and to the temporary resident alike (cf. Dt. 4:41–43; Jos. 20:7, 8).

35:16–34 The definition of manslaughter and murder. 16–18 When one man struck another with a lethal weapon such as an iron instrument, a stone, or a wooden implement, murder might be suspected. 19 In such cases the avenger was at liberty to seek the killer's life. 20, 21 Again, previous hatred, or deliberate lying in wait, or enmity pointed to murder and the avenger was at liberty to slay the killer. 22–25 But there were many cases of accidental homicide where no harm was intended. In such cases the congregation declared the man's innocence and rescued him from the avenger and allowed him to live in one of the cities of refuge until the death of the high priest. 26–28 But if the man ventured beyond the bounds of the city and was caught by the avenger he might be slain. 29 Certain legal details are now given. 30 More than one witness to a murder was required. 31, 32 The payment of a ransom (Heb. kōp̄er) for the life of a murderer, or even for his safe return to his home in the case of accidental murder, was forbidden. 33 Killing of any kind was serious and proper penalties were required, for when a man's blood was shed Yahweh's land was polluted and could be purged only by the blood of the killer. 34 Israel was to avoid defiling the land at all costs. Evidently with the anointing of a new high priest the various cleansing and sanctifying rituals associated with his anointing freed the land where Yahweh dwelt among His people from the defilement caused even by accidental death.

36:1–13 The daughters of Zelophehad and the inheritance of women

When the question of the inheritance of the daughters of Zelophehad was first discussed (cf. 27:1–11) it was decreed that where a man had no sons his daughters might inherit their father's property. But a further question arose in the case of such heiresses as subsequently married.

1–4 The heads of some of the families of Manasseh expressed concern that the marriage of girls who inherited their father's property might remove to another tribe what had been allotted to Manasseh. 5–9 Moses sought the will of Yahweh and commanded that women should marry within the tribe of their father, thus preserving the total inheritance of a tribe for that tribe. 10–12 The daughters of Zelophehad subsequently married men of Manasseh. But the provision seems to have been a very special one since inheritance in Israel was normally through the male line. For this very reason levirate marriage was instituted (cf. Dt. 25:5–10). 13 The closing verse of Numbers is a subscription to the body of laws covered in the closing chapters, either chs. 22–36 or chs. 27–36 (cf. the closing verse of Leviticus).

Deuteronomy

INTRODUCTION

TITLE

Among the Jews the fifth book of the law was known by the name 'ēlleh haddᵉḇārîm ('these are the words'), or by the shorter form dᵉḇārîm ('words'), taken from Dt. 1:1. An alternative title, mišneh hattôrâ ('copy of this law'), was derived from Dt. 17:18, and this was sometimes shortened to mišneh. The English title was taken from the LXX Greek phrase to deuteronomion touto ('this second lawgiving') in Dt. 17:18, following the Vulgate rendering of deuteronomium. The idea of a 'second' or 'repeated' lawgiving is unfortunate, since the expression in Dt. 17:18 should be rendered 'a copy of this law'.

The LXX title was apparently given to the work because Deuteronomy consisted mostly of a recapitulation of enactments contained in the book of Exodus and sections of Leviticus and Numbers. However, the book was not simply a repetition of earlier material, but followed a specific treaty-pattern in its elaboration of the principles and responsibilities of the people of God as they stood in covenant with Him. It constituted a promulgation in untechnical language of the implications of the spiritual relationship established at Sinai, and had as its concern the assembled congregation of Israel rather than an exclusive group such as the priestly house of Aaron, whose needs were amply met in the more technical sections of Exodus and Leviticus. When Levitical priests were mentioned in Deuteronomy it was essentially from a lay standpoint. As a result, they were upheld as ministers and teachers of the law, who by their very position in the religious community claimed the loyalty and support of the people.

BACKGROUND

Deuteronomy contains the addresses delivered by Moses in the closing months of his life to the Israelites as they were assembled in the plains of Moab. The book perpetuates the traditions preserved in Exodus to the effect that Moses habitually recorded events, statutes and other material, and makes claim to be substantially the work of the great Hebrew lawgiver himself. The time and place of the discourses are specified carefully (1:1–5; 3:29; 4:46; 29:1), and need to be kept firmly in mind in attempting to establish the proper background of the book.

At the time the speeches were given, the Israelites were encamped in the plains of Moab. The area was a rather distinctive section of Moabite territory, whose core comprised the plateau E of the Dead Sea between the Wadis Arnon and Zared, but which for considerable periods of Moabite history extended well to the N of the Wadi Arnon. The plains of Moab consisted of a well watered, productive area along the River Jordan, stretching from the Dead Sea N to the Wadi Nimrin for a distance of some 8 miles. The Moabites appear to have occupied this territory at an early period in their history, since it was already known by the name found in the OT when the Amorite king Sihon drove the Moabites S to the Wadi Arnon.

For a generation the covenant people had been disciplined by life in the Sinai peninsula. Although they had spent some of that time at Kadesh-barnea, in the region of 'Ain Qudeis and 'Ain Qudeirat, they had been forged by the circumstances of their life into a homogeneous spiritual unit and made ready by divine grace for the occupation of the promised land. Now, as they paused in the lush pastures of the plains of Moab and looked W towards Jericho and the plain of the Jordan, their long-cherished objective was at last within reach. Territorial gains had already been made in the region E of the Jordan, and were being consolidated by the tribes of Reuben, Gad and the half-tribe of Manasseh. Now the remaining Israelites were at a critical point in their history, and though their general morale was high they were about to confront strong temptations and severe trials under the guidance of a new leader who as yet had to prove himself as a warrior and an administrator.

At this time Moses, who had been forewarned of his death, called the people together and in his addresses he reminded them of the mighty acts of God wrought on their behalf. Having regard to the future conquest of Canaan he outlined the divinely ordained constitution of the new theocracy which was to be established in the promised land. He encouraged the Israelites to faith and obedience, warned against the perils of idolatry and apostasy, foretold punishment for a nation which forsook the high ideals of the Sinai covenant, and at the same time promised blessings from God if Israel was faithful to her divine commission.

He repeated the 'ten words', first given 'from the midst of the fire', and expounded their significance. He then recapitulated laws received on various occasions, some of the enactments being of considerable antiquity and dating back in all probability to the patriarchal period; some revealed during the stay in the region of Horeb, and others being the result of divine revelation on differing occasions. The collection was cast into a treaty structure, and adapted in such a way as to provide guidance for Israel in the promised land. The laws are most aptly summarized in the words 'You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your strength, and with all your mind; and your neighbour as yourself', cited in Lk. 10:27 from Dt. 6:5, with the addition by Christ of the words, 'Do this, and you will live' (Lk. 10:28). The importance of Deuteronomy for Christ and the primitive Christian church can be judged from the fact that the NT contains over 80 citations from or references to this book, and these ought to be studied carefully if its meaning for the Christian is to be understood and its message received.

AUTHORSHIP AND DATE

Ancient Hebrew and Samaritan tradition was unanimous in attributing the authorship of Deuteronomy to Moses, and this is confirmed by Ne. 8:1. Whereas the Hebrew text made no specific claims concerning the transcription of Leviticus and Numbers, it stated distinctly that Deuteronomy was to be regarded substantially as the work of Moses. In Dt. 1:5 he was said to have 'explained' the law and subsequently to have written it in a book which was placed beside the ark of the covenant and delivered to the Levites for safe keeping (Dt. 31:9, 26). The reference to 'this law' (Dt. 17:18), a copy of which was to be made and given to future kings of the nation, was apparently to the particular enactment concerning the king and not to Deuteronomy as a whole. However, such a mention presupposes either that the people knew that Moses was recording his speeches day by day, or that he actually had the text of his address in front of him as he was delivering it. Further indications of an early date for the written form of much of Deuteronomy can be seen in the passages in Joshua which presuppose it. These are far too numerous and too closely integrated with surrounding material to enable them to be regarded as later insertions with any plausibility, and this points once more to an early date for Deuteronomy.

Liberal scholarship in the 18th and 19th centuries AD was virtually unanimous in rejecting any assertion of Mosaic authorship for the work, and assigned it with entirely unwarranted confidence to the activities of an unknown prophet who compiled it somewhat before 621 BC, the date of Josiah's reformation (2 Ki. 22;23). It was thought to have been written with the aim of promoting such reforms as were undertaken at that time, not the least of which was the centralization of cultic worship in Jerusalem. Wellhausen suggested that, to further his aims, the author concealed his work in the Temple fabric and permitted it to be 'discovered' when renovations to the building were being undertaken. This supposed relationship between the work of the 'Deuteronomist' and the reform movement under Josiah has long been central to the liberal view of Pentateuchal origins, since other documents were generally dated in relationship to Deuteronomy.

Some scholars went even further in that they favoured a post-exilic date for Deuteronomy, theorizing that the scroll recovered from the Temple fabric was the 'Holiness Code' (Lv. 17–26), and assigned the book to between 520 and 400 BC, the latter date being postulated by the Uppsala school. Certain 19th-century critics, however, dated Deuteronomy in either the reign of Hezekiah or that of Manasseh, while one or two writers regarded Samuel as the author. From a different standpoint von Rad held that Deuteronomy arose in circles of 'country Levites' who had access to the sacred literary traditions of the Israelites, and who were intensely concerned with the movement for national and military rehabilitation after the events of 701 BC, when the Assyrians had invaded Judah (Studies in Deuteronomy, 1953, pp. 60ff.). This view represented an interesting departure from that of classic German liberalism generally.

A more realistic solution to the problems of authorship and date has been provided recently by studies in the similarity between the Sinai covenant and the suzerainty or vassal type of international treaty current in the Near East from the 3rd millennium BC. Normal secular treaty documents contained the following elements: a. a preamble, identifying the author and giving his attributes; b. the historical prologue, usually stressing the suzerain's benevolence; c. the treaty stipulations, in both general and more specific terms; d. the divine witnesses and guarantors of the treaty; e. the blessings or curses which would occur according as the covenant was kept or violated. Provisions for a periodic public reading of the treaty provisions by the vassal were also generally included in such agreements.

This Near Eastern treaty pattern is applicable to several OT passages, including those recording the Sinai covenant (Ex. 19:3–8; 20:1–17), but it is particularly evident in the structure of Deuteronomy when the latter is viewed as a single literary unit. Following the above outline, Deuteronomy can be related to the treaty-formulation in these particular respects: a. preamble (1:1–5); b. historical prologue (1:6 – 4:49); c. stipulations (5:1 – 26:19); d. curses and blessings (27:1 – 30:20); succession arrangements and public reading (31:1 – 34:5). These remarkable parallels in form would indicate clearly that the book of Deuteronomy was compiled deliberately as a covenant-renewal document in the best traditions of the 2nd millennium BC.

The question of a date in the Mosaic age is important, since such international treaties occurred as late as the time of Esarhaddon (681–669 BC), and the suzerainty-treaty form as such does not therefore of necessity require a 2nd-millennium BC date for Deuteronomy. However, there appear to be certain decisive differences between 2nd- and 1st-millennium BC covenants, the most important being that the historical prologue was completely absent from treaties formulated after the end of the 2nd millennium BC. Form-critical studies of this kind recognize not merely the antiquity of isolated elements in Deuteronomy, but the early age of the Deuteronomic treaty in its entirety, and set it firmly against the background of the Mosaic age.

The critical view of Deuteronomy as a 'pious fraud' must now be abandoned, if only because there is no archaeological evidence whatever for documentary or literary fabrications in the 2nd millennium BC. The assertion that the centralization of worship in Jerusalem was one of the prime reasons for the compiling of Deuteronomy must be viewed with grave suspicion also. The book lays no stress on the claim of Jerusalem to be the sole place of worship, and contains no legislation to that effect. The real emphasis of Dt. 12 is not on the contrast between many altars of God and one, but between the pagan Canaanite altars and the place where God's name was to be revered.

As von Rad correctly observed, the command in Dt. 27:1–8 to erect an altar on Mt. Ebal and inscribe the law upon prepared stones raised a serious obstacle to the liberal theory of cultic centralization in Jerusalem (Studies in Deuteronomy, 1953, p. 68; see also G. T. Manley, The Book of the Law, 1957, pp. 20, 132, 134f.). The primitive character of the enactment in Dt. 27:1–8 is shown by the absence of words such as ba'al ('Baal') and bāmôṯ ('high places'), as well as by the indefinite nature of the topography. Clearly the Jebusite city of Jerusalem is the least likely claimant to such a responsible title as the sole place of Israelite worship. It should be noted that Jerusalem as a proper name does not occur in the Pentateuch, though found in the 14th-century BC Tell el-Amarna letters. The assumption that the 'Salem' of Gn. 14:18 is an abbreviated form of Jerusalem is gratuitous, since the reference is more probably to a site in the Jordan Valley S of Scythopolis, and may have been the Salim of Jn. 3:23. While Deuteronomy prescribed a central site, Mt. Ebal, for Israelite national and spiritual aspirations, it did not require the cultus as such to be centralized there. It is not without significance that the Samaritans, an ancient Jewish sect, have revered the Ebal-Gerizim area as the location where God chose to put His name, and they are undoubtedly right in their belief that the altar erected 'near' Mt. Gerizim is the only one built to the specifications of Moses.

The foregoing comments indicate that there are strong arguments for the essential Mosaicity of Deuteronomy. The freshness of the narrative gives the reader a sense of participation with the author in the crossing of the Wadi Zered (2:13), of halting at the wilderness of Kedemoth (2:26), turning on the road to Bashan, and halting at last in the valley over against Beth-peor (3:29). An abundance of rather incidental geographical details in the book points to a familiarity with the background of 2nd-millennium BC Moabite history and topography. The reminiscences of Moses often intrude with unexpected suddenness into his discourses (9:22), and even into the delivery of the laws themselves (24:9), reminding the reader of his private thoughts, emotions and prayers.

The character of Moses as revealed in the earlier books is also apparent in Deuteronomy. His ardent spirit (Ex. 2:12, 13) reveals itself in outbursts of fiery indignation (Dt. 9:21ff.) and emotional appeal (10:12–22). The effect of his early education (Acts 7:22) is shown in his skill as a leader, organizer and writer. This towering Israelite legislator confronted and surmounted difficulties during the wilderness period which would have defeated a lesser man. Though not a demagogue, he was able to communicate the will of God to his fellows with great effectiveness, and his prose and poetry are abiding monuments to his literary and spiritual genius. As the devoted 'servant of the Lord' (Dt. 34:5) the name of his God was continually on his lips, and his marshalling of personal spiritual resources in times of crisis marked him out as the greatest of all Hebrew leaders. The picture of Moses thus presented in Deuteronomy is completely consistent with what is found in the historical sections of Exodus and Numbers, and furnishes for the reader a realistic image of a mortal man as contrasted with the highly idealized depictions of later Judaism.

Ever since the Mosaic authorship of Deuteronomy was questioned on the ground that Moses could not have written the section recording his own death, the matter of post-Mosaic additions to Deuteronomy has been an important consideration. Whatever the nature of the book which Moses compiled, it most probably did not contain chs. 32–34, these doubtless being added shortly after Moses died so as to complete the narrative content. Joshua may have written the account of Moses' death, as Jewish tradition has maintained, or the concluding verses of the book could have been the work of Eleazar, but the actual facts of the situation are unknown.

Phrases such as 'beyond the Jordan' ('ēber hayyardēn) have been taken as indications of post-Mosaic authorship. Since the reference is generally to the E region of Gilead, Reuben and Gad, the standpoint of the author is assumed to have been that of a resident in Canaan, and as such would preclude Mosaic authorship. However, the expression also refers to the territory W of Jordan as well (3:20, 25; 11:30), so that in effect the phrase simply means 'Transjordania', a usage which was non-specific and went back to patriarchal times. Explanatory glosses such as the phrase 'as at this day' (kayyom hazzeh) in 2:30 present no difficulties either, since in antiquity, and particularly in Egypt, it was the practice for scribes to make regular revisions of earlier literary material and amend the text by such devices as more modern place-names, explanatory glosses and the like. The simplest and most probable account of the authorship of Deuteronomy is that Moses formulated the legislation himself according to previous treaty-patterns, adding the material from ch. 27 to ch. 31 at a later period. Of the remaining sections, the song (32:1–43) and blessing (33:1–29) would doubtless be delivered orally before being committed to writing.

DATE

The general background of the book is that of the last days of Moses, and there can be no doubt that it is in essential harmony with a date in the later part of the 2nd millennium BC. The more complex Israelite social organization of the settlement in Canaan was anticipated and legislated for, but it was clearly not yet a reality at the time of writing, for the topographical and geographical setting of Deuteronomy is a Transjordanian one. Of particular importance for the date is the treaty-pattern of the book, including a historical prologue, which was commonly found in later 2nd-millennium BC covenants but was consistently omitted in 1st-millennium BC suzerainty treaties. Other elements such as the final benediction have greater affinities with the patriarchal period than with the time of Josiah or the post-exilic era. The legislation of chs. 13 and 20 was applicable to the conquest period, and would have been anachronistic had it been written during the monarchy. All historical references are to events which occurred prior to the conquest, and the author betrays no knowledge of such notable occurrences as the division of the kingdom during the monarchy period, or even of earlier events such as the Philistine oppression as depicted in Judges. Archaeological excavations at the sites of Ai, Bethel, Lachish, Debir and Hazor have furnished positive evidence for their destruction in the second half of the 13th century BC, following the pattern of conquest depicted in Joshua. This accords with a date of about 1280 BC for the Exodus from Egypt. If the bulk of Deuteronomy is to be dated firmly within the lifetime of Moses, as the evidence indicates, the entire work was most probably in its final form during the next generation or two.

TEACHING

The dominant theme of Deuteronomy is a covenantal one, and in this respect the book is akin to Exodus and Joshua. The moral and religious implications of the Sinai agreement were expressed in a non-technical manner, as befitted the understanding of a people whose responsibility it was to comprehend clearly their obligations in the light of such a covenant. Characteristic of Deuteronomy is its monotheistic outlook, which, while establishing the supremacy of the God of Israel, was careful to recognize the dangers presented by the deities of pagan nations. The might of God formed the assured ground for the establishing of a covenant which, when viewed by Israel in the light of 2nd-millennium BC suzerainty treaties, was clear and definite in its implications. Thus Deuteronomy is concerned primarily with the over-all concept of the covenant relationship, in the realization that the future destiny of Israel as the people of God lay in a punctilious observance of the stipulations to which by common consent the Hebrews had become party.

In his hortatory discourses Moses promised Israel that the selfsame power which had wrought a miracle of deliverance at the time of the Exodus, and which had sustained the people through a generation of wilderness wanderings, would continue to undergird them in the promised land provided that the conditions attaching to the covenant agreement were honoured by the Israelites. To this end Deuteronomy contains positive assurances that God will be with His people continually, alike in prosperity and adversity, and will fight for them in battle as He did at the time of the Exodus from Egypt. The Israelites must never forget, in their newly-won freedom, that they were once in bondage in Egypt (5:15), and that it was divine power which rescued them from that hopeless situation (4:21). They must revere their God with their whole being (4:29; 5:10) because He had first loved them (4:37), and since they had promised allegiance to Him they must have no contact whatever with false gods worshipped by pagan peoples (7:24; 11:16).

Because the Sinai covenant disclosed God as a holy and moral being, any people bound to Him by solemn agreement must of necessity also manifest His ethical characteristics in their way of life. Thus the Israelites were required to be one people knowing the divine precepts (5:1), and above all must be a holy nation to the Lord (7:6; 14:2, 21). The profound humanitarian spirit which illumines the Pentateuch generally is evident in the stipulation that, because the Israelites are brothers, they must care for those who are less fortunate than themselves, including the alien, the orphan and the widow (10:18).

The prophetic character of Deuteronomy has long been recognized by liberal and conservative scholars alike, and consistent with this standpoint are the attitudes of optimism, faith and trust in the divine power which the author manifests. The positive, futuristic outlook of the book can be well illustrated by reference to the two most frequently occurring phrases in Deuteronomy, namely 'go in and possess', which is found 35 times, and 'the land which the Lord your God gives you', which occurs 34 times. In accordance with His promise to their ancestors God has provided a good land for the Israelites (1:25), that they might possess it for an inheritance (4:21). Promises of blessing are an important feature of Deuteronomy, and these (7:13) will be implemented when God gives His people respite from their enemies (3:20). Provided that the Israelites honour the covenant stipulations (5:1) they will enjoy prosperity (2:7; 4:40), will be blessed with a productive land (6:11; 12:15), and will lead long and fruitful lives (4:26).

But just as there are promises of blessing in Deuteronomy, so there are warnings against apostasy. The Israelites are told explicitly that 'curses' will overtake them if they disobey the commands of God (28:15), and they will be decimated by such scourges of the ancient world as 'fever, inflammation . . . drought, and with blasting, and with mildew' (28:22). All their highest aspirations will be confounded (28:29), foreign nations will oppress them (28:31ff.), and they will become 'a byword, among all the peoples' (28:37). If they persist in disobedience, these 'curses' will pursue them until they are completely destroyed (28:45). All 'sins' are condemned (15:9), particularly idolatry, which is an 'abomination' (7:25). So serious was the whole question of national sin that rulers were instructed to be rigorous in their punishment of major offences against covenant spirituality (13:8), so that the people might be deterred from iniquitous behaviour (13:5, 11). A central place of God's choosing (12:5, 11) would be established as a focal point for national aspirations, and there the Israelites would honour the name of God and worship before Him (12:7). However, they could not expect automatic and unvaried blessings just because they were in covenant relationship with God. Only as the stipulations were observed and the Sinai agreement was honoured in spirit would God prosper the fortunes of His people.

1:1–5 INTRODUCTION

1 The words that Moses spoke. Moses as an individual is mentioned 99 times in the NT, and all such references throw light on this book. This is the first of several statements to the effect that the pronouncements were first made in oral (4:45; 29:2; 31:30; 32:44) and subsequently in written (17:18; 31:9) form. The Ten Commandments provide a parallel (5:22; 9:10). The discourses were spoken during the last few months of the aged Hebrew leader's life. All Israel: a phrase characteristic of Deuteronomy. The trials, hardships and errors of the nation during the wilderness period had served to purify it and weld it into an integrated spiritual force ready to confront the tasks lying ahead in Canaan. The expression all Israel recurs in 11:6; 18:6; 21:21; 27:9; 31:11; 34:12. Beyond the (AV 'on this side') Jordan. This phrase occurs 18 times in Deuteronomy and Joshua. The former contains much geographical detail, particularly in the opening and closing chapters, and always views Palestine from the outside. Because the topography of Deuteronomy is usually general rather than specific, the phrase means nothing more than 'Transjordania'. It refers 12 times to the eastern, and 6 times to the western side of the Jordan, and AV varies the translation accordingly. The reference is sometimes made more specific by the addition of a qualifying phrase. Its use in Nu. 32:19; Jos. 12:1, 7; 1 Sa. 14:4 for each side alternately indicates that the expression in itself affords no conclusive evidence of the standpoint of the particular writer. The wilderness (Heb. miḏbār, 'pasturage', 'steppe-land', 'wilderness'). A term applicable to any uninhabited tract of land, whether fertile or barren. The Arabah (AV 'the plain'). When used with the definite article it applies generally to the rift valley extending from the Sea of Tiberias to the Gulf of Aqabah (cf. Dt. 3:17; 2:8). The plural form 'Araboth' usually described certain waste areas within the Arabah, especially near Jericho and in the wilderness of Moab. Suph (AV 'Red Sea'). Either a place-name (so RV, RSV) of uncertain location, or a shortened form of yam sûp̄, which AV understood as referring to the Gulf of Aqabah. However, yam sûp̄ is more correctly translated 'Reed Sea' than Red Sea. The relation between Suph and the Suph(ah) of Nu. 21:14 (RV, RSV) is uncertain. Tophel. This and the following sites correspond roughly with those in Nu. 33:18–20, which are on the route from Horeb to Kadesh-barnea. Perhaps some of the 'words' were first spoken in these areas.

2 Eleven days' journey. From the traditional site of Sinai to Dahab on the E coast of Sinai, up the coast and across to Kadesh-barnea ('Ain Qudeirat and vicinity) has recently been shown to take 11 days. Horeb (lit. 'dried up', 'desolate'; cf. Je. 44:2). An alternative OT name for Sinai, perhaps referring to the general area rather than the mount of God itself (Ex. 3:1). Kadesh-barnea was an important station during the wilderness wanderings to which the Hebrews apparently returned periodically. It was the first terminus of the journey of Israel from Sinai, from which the spies were dispatched to Canaan and to which they returned (Nu. 12:16; 13:26). While the designation Kadesh ('holy') was applied to several biblical sites, Kadesh-barnea is best located in the region of 'Ain Qudeis and 'Ain Qudeirat, some 50 miles SW of Beersheba. 4, 5 In the land of Moab. The fertile uplands of Moab provided the background for the addresses of Moses as recorded in Deuteronomy, not long before the actual entrance into Canaan. The first stage of conquest had been completed with the defeat of the Transjordanian kings Sihon and Og (Nu. 21:33–35; cf. Dt. 3:1–11), and the settlement of Reuben, Gad and the half-tribe of Manasseh (Nu. 32:1–33). Explain (AV 'declare'; lit. 'to engrave', 'to explain' and so 'to expound'). It recurs only in 27:8 and Hab. 2:2 with reference to writing. This law. Tôrâ, uniformly translated 'law', is probably derived from the Hebrew verb hôrâ, 'to direct', 'to teach', and so can be rendered 'instruction'. The scope is thus much wider than that of the English term 'law', since it embraces 'commandments, statutes and ordinances' (4:1, 2) as well as the whole range of divine revelation. Here tôrâ refers to the discourses which follow, and in Deuteronomy generally to the whole or part of Moses' teaching. Tôrâ was used of the instruction given by fathers, or the sages who addressed their pupils as 'son' (Pr. 3:1; 6:23; 7:2; 13:14), or by mothers (Pr. 1:8; 6:20; 31:26). Tôrâ is never used to describe ordinary direct communication between God and man, but of divinely revealed material through human intermediaries. In Deuteronomy the word occurred in the singular only, thus indicating an organized or integrated collection of material. In time the term tôrâ became the Hebrew name for the Pentateuch (Ezr. 7:6: Mt. 12:5), or for the entire OT (Jn. 10:34; 15:25). The rhythmical stress-patterns of Dt. 27:15–26 might imply that poetic form was being employed as an adjunct to learning and memory. In the NT the following uses of the corresponding Greek term nomos should be noted: the OT (Jn. 10:34); the Pentateuch (Lk. 24:44); the OT dispensation as a preparation for Christ's coming (Mt. 11:13); the moral law (Lk. 10:26); the Jewish administrative and ceremonial law or 'law of ordinances' (Eph. 2:15) which are not binding upon Christian people.

1:6 – 4:43 THE FIRST DISCOURSE

1:6 – 3:29 Historical prologue

In the 2nd-century BC Near Eastern suzerainty or vassal treaties the historical prologue surveyed in retrospect the previous relations between the two contracting parties, and pointed out that past benefactions by the suzerain formed the basis for the vassal's gratitude and future obedience.

1:6–18 Appointment of captains. Moses' first discourse (1:6 – 4:43) commences with a long retrospect of the events narrated in Nu. 10–32, for which the prospect of possessing 'the land' served as a climax. 7 In the hill country and in the lowland, and in the Negeb. Broadly speaking, Palestine can be divided into five distinct regions consisting of the coastal plains, the central hill-lands, the rift valley, the plateaus of Trans-jordania, and the desert areas. West of the Jordan, the 'vale' or Shephelah is a low hill-tract situated between the coastal plain and the central high ranges ('the hills'), the latter running N from Hebron and rising up to about 2,000 feet above sea-level, while the AV 'south' (Heb. negeḇ; lit. 'the dry') was an undefined region beginning to the S of the Gaza-Beersheba road and ultimately merging with the Sinai peninsula highlands. Amorites . . . Canaanites. In the 3rd-millennium BC Sumerian and Akkadian sources the Amorites were uncivilized desert nomads, who moved into Babylonia in strength c. 2000 BC and established dynasties there. Amorite settlers occupied the Lebanon region after 1900 BC, while others went further S and E into Transjordan. In the OT the Amorites were regarded as part of the Palestinian hill-country population (Nu. 13:29; Jos. 5:1; 11:3), but in a wider sense the term 'Amorite' was similar in usage to 'Canaanite'. Israel had to conquer 'Canaan' (Nu. 13:17–21), i.e. Palestine, and ultimately overcome all the people in the land of the Amorites (Jos. 24:15, 18). The Canaanites and Amorites were well settled in Syria by 2000 BC, and Canaanite culture reached its height under the Phoenicians, being revealed in modern times by excavations and discoveries at Ras Shamra (Ugarit). Properly speaking, the term 'Canaanite' describes the NW Semitic people and culture of W Syria and Palestine prior to the 12th century BC. 8 The Lord swore to your fathers. The promise to the fathers, confirmed by an oath (Gn. 22:16), is again referred to in 1:35; 4:31; 6:10, 18, 23; 7:8, 12; 8:1, 18; 9:5; 10:11; 11:9, 21; 13:17; 19:8; 26:3, 15; 28:11; 29:13; 30:20; 31:7, 20, 21, 23; 34:4. An inspired NT commentary can be read in Heb. 6:13–20. Moses constantly reminded the people that God's love for them was not the result of any intrinsic merit (Dt. 7:7; 9:4), but proceeded from divine grace alone (cf. Eph. 2:8) and God's promise to the patriarchs. The elements of that promise, namely the seed, the land and the widespread blessing, are all repeated here.

9 I am not able alone to bear. Here and in 12 Moses conceded his inability to handle the situation by himself, and 13 chose to delegate his authority. Your heads. Rulers, whose appointment was urged by Jethro (Ex. 18:19) and doubtless sanctioned by God, were now finding a place in the permanent legislation (Dt. 16:18). 15 Officers (Heb. šoṭᵉrîm). In Egypt (Ex. 5:6) such persons were scribes or organizing officers who worked under the foremen to keep count of the quota of bricks. In the rescued Hebrew society their function was to serve captains (commanders) and others as subordinates, no longer as slaves but as free men working for justice and victory (16:18; 20:5, 8, 9; 29:10; 31:28). 16 Judges. Their appointment and duties are further defined in 16:18; 17:9; 19:17, 18; 21:2; 25:1. They dispensed justice, punished the offender and vindicated the righteous, insisting upon scrupulous fairness and impartial justice (v. 17; 16:19, 20). The alien (AV 'stranger'; Heb. gēr, 'sojourner'). A settler among another people, as distinct from the foreigner, the length of stay of the latter being temporary only. In the tribal organization of Israel four units can be distinguished, namely the nation, the tribe, the clan, and the household or family (Jos. 7:16ff.). An alien could be adopted into the clan, although the zārîm of Is. 1:7; Je. 5:19; 51:51; Ezk. 7:21; 28:7, 10; Ob. 11 were virtually the same as enemies. The gēr had many privileges in Israel, and was required to be treated with love and respect (Ex. 22:21; Dt. 10:19; 24:19–21). The humanitarianism of the Mosaic law is one of its most notable civil elements as contrasted with the Babylonian Code of Hammurabi. Solicitude for all whose position might leave them open to exploitation and oppression is a marked feature of Deuteronomy.

1:19–46 Mission of the spies. 19 Great and terrible wilderness. See on 1:1. The barren and desolate nature of the terrain to the N of Sinai has impressed travellers for many centuries with its dreary and forbidding aspect. The rugged mountain peaks seem as though they had been burnt with fire, and the earth is covered with a layer of stones and sharp black flints. Yet there exist several oases with wells or springs, and there are a few upland plains at the feet of some of the eminences in the granite ridges of the Sinai region. These plains sustain a surprising degree of vegetation after the winter rainy season, and doubtless helped to support the Israelite flocks and herds during the wanderings. Five areas of the Sinai peninsula, namely Shur, Etham, Sin, Paran and Zin, were described in this connection as 'wilderness'. 21 Go up, take possession. This is a characteristic phrase relating to the Hebrew entry into the promised land. Israel's enemies will not be able to resist her (7:2). It is always necessary for God to encourage His people to 'possess' all that He has so graciously promised them. The Hebrew word yāraš means 'to subdue', 'take possession of', 'dispossess', and generally relates to land or property. Thus Israel would acquire claim to Canaan by casting out or supplanting its previous occupants, whether by conquest or inheritance. Yāraš occurs no fewer than 52 times in Deuteronomy, being found even in the legal sections (e.g. 19:2, 14; 23:20), and indicates that the whole complex of thought underlying its usage belongs essentially to the conquest period. Dismayed (AV 'discouraged').

The fear of the Lord should cast out the fear of man (3:2, 22; 20:3, 4; 31:6, 8; Jos. 1:9). 22 You came near. Although the younger members of the audience had been born after the spies were sent out, Moses nevertheless identified them with their elders who had been present in their youth. 24 Eshcol. A wadi situated a few miles N of Hebron and famed for its fertility, of which its grapes were characteristic (Nu. 13:23, 24; 32:9). 25 A good land. This factor is emphasized repeatedly by Moses (3:25; 4:21, 22; 6:18; 8:7, 10; 9:6; 11:17), along with the concept that it is a divine gift. Besides constituting a convincing demonstration of God's grace, these emphases furnish proper grounds for the respect of ancient boundaries (19:14) and for the sanctity of the soil (21:23). They are connected with promises of victory (27:2, 3), with blessing (15:4) and with warnings of judgment (28:52). The Hebrew word nāṯan, translated here and in some 60 other places as gives, is rendered 'set before' in 1:8, 21; 4:8.

28 Fortified up to heaven. Many walled cities of the Middle and Late Bronze Ages (1950–1200 BC) have been excavated in Palestine. Hyksos cities have been uncovered at Tell Beit Mirsim, Tell es-Sulṭān and Hazor, being characterized by large fortifications of beaten earth with a sloping revetment and a surrounding moat. The sons of the Anakim. The descendants of an eponymous ancestor Anak, whose original home may have been Hebron. Their gigantic stature was proverbial (Dt. 9:2), and they were thought to be descendants of the Nephilim. The high walls and the Anakim have their counterpart in the Christian life (Eph. 6:12). 29 Do not be in dread. Discouragement led 32 to the sin of unbelief, despite indications to the contrary, and so to inevitable judgment (cf. v. 34). With true historical insight Moses seeks to bring home to the rising generations the lessons of the past. 31 As a man bears his son. A beautiful simile, depicting a father carrying his young son when he is too weak or too tired to walk (cf. Ho. 11:1–3). Perhaps Paul had this in mind in Acts 13:18 (see RV mg. Cf. Ex. 19:4; Dt. 32:11, 12).

34 The Lord . . . was angered. The wrath of God is referred to in both OT and NT (see, e.g., Ps. 78:31; Jn. 3:36; Rom. 1:18), and all attempts to explain it away merely violate the integrity of the text. Divine wrath is one attribute of a God who 'maintains his rights' (Ex. 20:5, 'a jealous God'). 35 As exhibited here the punishment was one way of dealing with the rebellious spirit which would have brought early ruin to the nation. To avert this the task of conquest was assigned to the younger generation now addressed. 36 Caleb (lit. 'dog', i.e. 'slave of'). One of the spies sent by Moses to reconnoitre Canaan, and the subsequent conqueror of Hebron. He was particularly commended as God's 'servant' (Nu. 14:24). Moses is now concerned with two of his own contemporaries, namely Caleb and Joshua, who were faithful. The story of Caleb (Nu. 13; 14; Jos. 14:6–14; 15:13–19; Jdg. 1:12–15) is full of inspiration to all who have committed themselves wholly to the Lord. 37 Angry with me also on your account. Moses was never able to recall his own exclusion from the promised land without being reminded of the seriousness of disobedience. The whole concept of the covenant demanded complete obedience and surrender on the part of Israel to the revealed will of God. His own punishment for disobedience was an indication of the way in which the Israelites themselves would be excluded from future divine blessings if they were not completely surrendered in purpose and deed to the will of God. This latter attitude is an important element of the spirituality of the new covenant also. It is improper to argue from the expression 'on your account' to the conclusion that Moses thought of himself as dying outside the land as a substitute-offering for the people of Israel. The role of Moses was that of a leader, prophet and mediator of the divine revelation, and nowhere in the Pentateuch is there the slightest suggestion that he was ever to become a sacrificial victim, willingly or otherwise, for the failings of his people. The only atonement required for sin under the Sinai covenant was that which was provided for in the sacrificial legislation of the Torah. Although Moses had incurred God's anger by disobeying His command, it had taken place as a consequence of the people's action. The leader has always to share in the responsibility for failure on the part of his flock, however occasioned. Divine displeasure was recorded because it led up to the mention of Joshua as the successor of Moses. 38 Encourage him (lit. 'make him strong'). Exhortations or admonitions to 'be strong' are frequent in Scripture. Here Moses sets an example in encouragement. Inherit. This word, nāḥal, is also applied to the land. Its common meaning is seen in 12:12; 21:16, but its most frequent use is in connection with the divine gift of the land of Canaan. See 3:28; 4:21, 38; 12:9, 10; 15:4; 19:3, 14; 20:16; 21:23; 24:4; 25:19; 26:1; 29:8; 31:7. 39 No knowledge of good or evil. This technical construction, known as merismus, employs the opposite components of a situation to designate the totality of the situation itself, and is Sumerian in origin. Thus the entire sphere of 'morality' is in view here.

41 We . . . we . . . Abrupt emotional changes are typically Semitic. However, the enthusiasm of the Israelites for battle constituted no real atonement for earlier sin. 44 Amorites. In Nu. 14:43 they were called 'Canaanites', which was the wider use of 'Amorite'. See on 1:7. Hormah. A city of Simeon in the S of Judah near Ziklag (Jos. 15:30; 19:4), forming the limit of Canaanite pursuit through Seir towards Kadesh-barnea (Nu. 14:45). 46 Many days. While much of the wilderness sojourn was spent at Kadesh, part of it occurred in the neighbouring wastelands.

2:1–8 On the borders of Edom. 1 Mount Seir. After the repulse at Kadesh the Hebrews turned back towards the Reed Sea and skirted Mt. Seir, the Edomite mountain range, of which Seir is the typical summit. The mountains rise to the S and E of the Dead Sea, and in early times accommodated a Horite population until the descendants of Esau took over the territory (Gn. 14:6; 36:20). 3 Northward. By this time the Israelites had made their way along the SW border of Edom, and would then proceed along the SE border. 4 Your brethren the sons of Esau. The request from Kadesh seeking a passage through Edom along the King's Highway was refused (Nu. 20:14–21), but from Dt. 2:28, 29 it would appear that some Edomites were quite willing to sell food to the Israelites. Although the Edomites and Israelites were far from being kindly disposed to one another, the bitter enmity of a later period (Je. 49:7–22; Ob. 8ff.) was not yet in evidence. 5 Do not contend (AV 'meddle'). The Hebrews were forbidden to engage in battle with the Edomites. The friendliness shown also to Moab (Dt. 2:9) and Ammon (Dt. 2:19) as 'brethren' is characteristic of the patriarchal and Mosaic eras, and attests to the contemporary nature of the narrative. To Esau. As sovereign over the nations, God determines their boundaries. Though David fought against the descendants of Esau and subjugated them (2 Sa. 8:14), he did not dispossess them. 8 Elath. Most probably to be identified with Ezion-geber at the N end of the Gulf of Aqabah, and developed by Solomon as an ore refinery about 960 BC.

2:9–15 The approach to Moab. 9 Ar. The capital of Moab, situated on the frontier in the Wadi Arnon, but whose precise location is uncertain. Aspects of the early history of the city were known to the Israelites from the Book of the Wars of the Lord (Nu. 21:15) and from popular proverbs (Nu. 21:28). 10 The Emim. The 'dreaded ones' of Gn. 14:5, the early inhabitants of Moab conquered by Chedorlaomer. 11 They were considered to belong to the peoples known as the Rephaim (cf. Gn. 15:20), a name unknown in an ethnic sense outside the OT. At the time of the conquest of Canaan the Rephaim were probably spread over a wide area, and apparently known by different local names. In Moab they were called Emim, while in Ammon, where they preceded the later Ammonites, they were called Zamzummim (Dt. 2:20, 21). They were evidently people of great stature. 12 The Horites. The ancient inhabitants of Edom defeated by Chedorlaomer (Gn. 14:6), said to be descended from Seir the Horite (Gn. 36:20), and distinct as an ethnic group from the Rephaim. They were driven out by the sons of Esau, and probably joined other Horite groups in central Palestine (cf. Gn. 34:2). The non-Semitic Hurrians, known in the OT as Horites, formed part of the indigenous population of Alalakh (Syria) in the 18th century BC. 13 The brook Zered. A mountain-torrent (naḥal) or wadi crossed by the Israelites on their journey to Moab. In Nu. 21:12 it is mentioned as a camping-ground, which accords with the instructions here to rise up. These wadis are a distinctive feature of Transjordania, though the identification of the Wadi Zered is uncertain. Probably it is the modern Wadi el-Ḥesa, which runs into the Dead Sea from the SE. 14 Thirty-eight years. The 40 years in the wilderness (2:7; 8:2, 4; 29:5) include also the first year from the crossing of the yam sûp̄ to the departure from Sinai and the final year spent in conquering the eastern territories.

2:16–37 Victory over the Amorite kings. 18, 19 Moab ... Ammon. The Moabites and Ammonites, the descendants of Lot by an incestuous relationship (Gn. 19:37, 38), are to be treated as 'brethren', in contrast with the Amorites, an alien race sunk in idolatry (see on 2:5). 20 Rephaim. See on 2:11. These formidable pre-Israelite inhabitants of Palestine had settled in some strength in Ammon before the later Ammonites dispossessed them, and were known as Zamzummim. 21 Anakim. Descendants of an ancestor named Anak. This group also formed part of the pre-Israelite population of Palestine. Their huge stature and formidable appearance became proverbial, being taken as a standard of comparison to stress the size of the other peoples (Dt. 2:10; see on 1:28). They were met with principally in the highland country (cf. Jos. 11:21). 23 The Avvim (AV 'Avims') were an aboriginal Canaanite people, the Avites of Jos. 13:3; 2 Ki. 17:31, who lived near Gaza and were destroyed by the Caphtorim. Gaza, marking the southern limit of Canaan, was an important Philistine seaport, being mentioned often in Assyrian annals from the 8th century BC onwards. Caphtorim, probably to be identified with the kap-ta-ra mentioned in a 2nd-millennium BC school text from Assur, was the land from which the Philistines came, most probably Crete. This primitive unglossed terminology points to an early date for the passage. 25 This day I will begin. We learn from Nu. 21:4 that the Israelites were greatly discouraged, so that these new words of encouragement were timely. A fresh step forward was to be taken, and the Lord prepared the way before them. See v. 31 and cf. 11:25.

26 Wilderness of Kedemoth. The desert area around Kedemoth, probably the modern Qasr ez-Za 'feran, about 7 miles NE of Dibon. Cf. Jos. 13:18. Words of peace. The messengers carried proposals for a peaceful passage through the land, along with guarantees of payment for provisions purchased (cf. Nu. 21:21, 22). 27 Only by the road (Heb. badderek̲ badderek̲). The specified road and no other is to be followed. (Cf. Nu. 21:22, 'by the King's Highway'.) 29 The Moabites who live in Ar. With the inhabitants of Seir, these Moabites were an exception to the general unfriendliness of the Transjordanians. (See on 2:9.) 30 The Lord ... hardened his spirit. What in Nu. 21:23 is attributed to Sihon's unfriendliness is here seen as part of the divine purpose. The OT steadily refuses to see any inconsistency between human freedom and divine sovereignty. God is never spoken of as hardening the heart of a good man. The word spirit is used here in the sense of 'will', where the attitude of the individual becomes more and more resolutely opposed to the divine purpose. (Cf. Ex. 7:3, etc.) Because the ancient Hebrews ascribed all causality to God as the author of all created things, it was both natural and proper for them to see the response of Sihon in the light of the larger activity of God. 31 I have begun to give . . .; begin to take possession . . . occupy. See on 1:21. Hebrew yāraš here means both 'possess' and 'inherit'. Now that God has prepared the way, it is the responsibility of the Israelites to enter in by faith and possess the promised inheritance.

34 Utterly destroyed (Heb. 'treated as ḥērem'). The ḥērem was a ban of extermination, used in Deuteronomy in connection with persons (e.g. 20:17, 18) or objects (e.g. 7:26) dedicated to the worship of false gods. At a time when war was a sacred act, the ban, though ruthless in some respects, made chaotic looting impossible by devoting the spoils to the god of the victors, and by giving the enemy an opportunity to surrender their city without a struggle. For the Hebrews, persons and objects associated with pagan cultic rites were to be regarded with abhorrence, as sin should always be, as corrupt and corrupting, and as fit for nothing but complete destruction lest the 'ban' should subsequently fall upon those who had spared them. 36 Aroer. A Transjordanian city, mod. 'Ara'ir, on the N bank of the Arnon (Wadi Mojib), about 14 miles E of the Dead Sea. It was the southern limit both of the Amorite kingdom of Sihon and the tribal holdings of Reuben. 37 Cities of the hill country. The district surrounding the sources of the Jabbok near Amman, inhabited by the Ammonites and lying E of the tableland of 3:10. The description is such as a traveller would give who had first-hand information about the territory.

3:1–17 The conquest of Bashan. 1 Bashan. The fertile region E of Jordan and N of Gilead, separated from the latter by the river Yarmuk. The word Bashan means 'fertile'. (Cf. 32:14.) Edrei. An important stronghold in the Amorite kingdom of Og, overlooking the uplands between Gilead and Hermon, and identified with mod. Der'a. 2 Do not fear him. However formidable the opposition may appear, the true believer is commanded to go forward in faith, knowing that the issue is decided not by might, nor by power, but by the divine Spirit (Zc. 4:6). 4 Argob. A district of Transjordan containing 60 strongly fortified cities and some unwalled towns. Its exact location is uncertain, but in Dt. 3:14 its westward extent was given as the border of the small kingdoms of Geshur and Maacah. 9 Hermon . . . Sirion . . . Senir. Sirion ('glittering') was the Canaanite name for Mt. Hermon, known to the Amorites as Senir. Hermon is the southern peak of the Anti-Lebanon range, and Senir (AV 'Shenir') was probably a separate part of the ridge, though the name may have been applied loosely to the whole of the snow-capped range. 10 Cities of the tableland (AV 'plain'). The word mîšôr is generally used for an elevated plateau, as distinct from the 'ᵃrāḇâ or lowland plain. In this case the plateau of Moab is meant. Salecah, or Salcah, a city in the extreme E of Bashan which came within the territory occupied by Gad (1 Ch. 5:11). 11 A bedstead of iron. This rendering is dubious. The Aramaic form signifies a 'coffin', hence the view that in reality it was a black basalt sarcophagus, the Hebrew for which, however, is 'ᵃrôn. Perhaps the reference to the bed of Og was intended to indicate his huge size. The relic appears to have fallen into the hands of the Ammonites, and was kept in Rabbah, located 25 miles NE of the Dead Sea. Common cubit (Heb. 'cubit of a man'). A linear measure of about 18 inches.

12 Reubenites. Occupants of territory E of Jordan, where the grazing was suitable for a pastoral tribe. 13 Manasseh. Six of the seven families comprising the tribe of Manasseh occupied land in Gilead, the rugged hill country bounded on the west by the Jordan, on the north by the Yarmuk, and on the south by the valley of Heshbon. After the settlement in Canaan Joshua allowed eastern Manasseh to return to the conquered territory of Heshbon and Bashan. 14 Geshurites . . . Maacathites. Inhabitants respectively of Geshur, a small Syrian city to the NE of Bashan (Jos. 12:5; 13:2, 11), and Maacah, a small state SE of Mt. Hermon under Aramaean control. Havvoth-jair (Heb. 'the tent-villages of Jair'). Probably situated in the hill country between Mt. Gilead and the Yarmuk. Each tent-village was probably the homestead of a clan. 17 Chinnereth. The city (cf. Jos. 11:2) named after Gennesareth, the Sea of Galilee (cf. Nu. 34:11). The Salt Sea, i.e. the Dead Sea. The slopes of Pisgah. Wherever 'pisgah' occurs in the Hebrew it is accompanied by the definite article (happisgâ), showing that it is not meant to designate a single location, but is a common noun. The word thus describes any ridge crowning a hill or mountain, and which from a distance presents an irregular outline. Such ridges occur commonly in Transjordan, and in this case perhaps the southern slopes of Jebel Osha, overlooking the Dead Sea, are intended to be understood (see on 3:27).

3:18–29 Joshua appointed leader. 18 I commanded you. Moses addresses himself to the tribes of Reuben, Gad and the half-tribe of Manasseh. See Nu. 32:20–24. 20 Until the Lord gives rest. Rest is one of the foremost of blessings promised in the 'land', and is one of the privileges of God's people (Heb. 4:9). The word includes freedom from oppression by one's enemies, and peace of spirit, as well as the usual meanings, and is given its highest expression in Christ (Mt. 11:28). Beyond the Jordan. Unlike the expression in 1:1, the W side of the river is referred to here. 21 I commanded Joshua. The outline of the relationship between Moses and Joshua will repay study. Joshua is first seen as an army officer (Ex. 17:9), then as Moses' minister (Ex. 24:13) and devoted adherent (Nu.

11:28). Moses' love for Joshua appears in Dt. 1:38; 31:3; Nu. 27:18–23. This particular command is not mentioned in Nu. 32, since it is not relevant to the situation therein related.

23 I besought the Lord. The thought of his own exclusion arises in Moses' mind, and he recalls his prayer. His request was that he might go over and might see, the first part of which was forbidden and the second allowed. Other prayers of Moses are recalled in Dt. 9:20, 26. For the Israelites he sought and obtained pardon; for himself, the Lord's own presence and a vision of His glory. He also taught the people to pray (21:8; 26:5, 13). 24 What god is there . . .? A rhetorical question which had no bearing on any belief in the real existence of false gods. There can be no doubt about the genuine monotheism of Moses at this point. He is making clear his conviction of the supreme power of God as the one and only true deity, yet at the same time bearing in mind the fact that the worship of other gods is a possibility. The latter had certainly been demonstrated during the sojourn in Egypt, and on at least one notable occasion in the wilderness (Ex. 32:1ff.), showing that even the covenant people of God could be seduced to the worship of alien deities which were in fact nonentities. Cf. Dt. 5:7. 25 Let me go over. To W Palestine, not as leader but as a humble member of the community to whom the divine decree would still apply. 27 Pisgah. See on 3:17. This crest was carefully described in Dt. 34:1 as 'Mount Nebo, to the top of (the) Pisgah, which is opposite Jericho', and was most probably Jebel Osha. From this vantage-point can be seen snow-capped Hermon to the N, the Dead Sea, the Negeb, and other areas of W Palestine. 29 Beth-peor (lit. 'The house (temple) of Peor'). Here the people had committed grave sin (Nu. 25; Ps. 106:28–30), and nearby Moses was buried (Dt. 34:6). This verse concludes the historical review in the first discourse which began at 1:6.

4:1–40 A call to obedience

4:1–8 The purpose and value of the law. 1 O Israel, give heed. Moses now claims the attention of the people as he begins to expound the law of the Lord. The call to 'take heed', 'take to heart', and the need for implicit obedience to God's commands are frequently repeated. See, e.g., 4:39, 40; 8:20; 9:23; 13:4, 18; 15:5; 26:14, 17; 27:10; 28:1, 2, 15, 45, 62; 30:2, 8, 10, 20. Statutes. The word ḥuqqîm comes from a root meaning 'to engrave', and so refers to permanent rules of conduct prescribed by authority and recorded for the guidance of the individual or society. Ordinances (AV 'judgments'). Judicial decisions arrived at by authority or ancient custom which serve as future precedents for the guidance of judges in certain specified cases. The words 'statutes and ordinances' usually occur in this order in Deuteronomy to indicate the importance of unquestioning obedience to the divine will. The casuistic or 'case law' of Ex. 21:1 – 22:17, doubtless intended for judges, provides an example of the ordinance or mišpāṭ. The word is also used of the decisive acts of God, judging the wicked and vindicating the innocent. Hence 'statutes and ordinances' together cover all the laws and precepts. The two terms are again mentioned, sometimes in conjunction with 'commandments', in 4:5, 8, 14, 45; 5:1, 31; 6:1, 20; 7:11; 8:11; 11:1, 32; 12:1; 26:16, 17. 'Statutes' occurs alone in 4:6; 6:24; 16:12, and with 'commandments' in 4:40; 6:17; 10:13; 27:10; 28:15, 45; 30:10. That you may live. Every word of God is the 'bread of life' (8:3), and His words point the way to eternal life (Mt. 4:4; 19:17; Jn. 6:63). 2 You shall not add. Ancient suzerainty treaties frequently contained some such prohibition as this. Here the command creates a sharp distinction between the word of God and the word of man, a distinction also stressed by Christ (Mt. 5:17–19; 15:6). When the oracles of God were completed, a further warning of the same kind was added (Rev. 22:18, 19). This does not mean that no modifications could be made to the Mosaic enactments as circumstances required, but that no fundamental change of ethos should be entertained. Commandments. The term miṣwâ can be applied to any kind of command, whether temporary or permanent, general or particular. In 4:13 and 10:4 dāḇār ('word') rather than miṣwâ ('commandment') is used. 3 Your eyes have seen. Moses frequently appeals to the experience of his hearers in an attempt to gain their sympathies, reminding them of what they had seen (1:19; 3:21; 7:19; 11:7; 29:2, 3), heard (4:12; 5:23) and known (7:15). Baal-peor. The heathen deity worshipped in Peor (cf. 3:29) with abhorrent cultic rites (cf. Nu. 25:1, 2). Baal was the head of the Canaanite pantheon, and was worshipped under different names in varying localities. Canaanite worship was highly sensuous, immoral and depraved. (Cf. Ho. 9:10.)

5 That you should do them in the land. Much of the Mosaic law has an ethical timelessness about it which demands the observance of the Christian. For Israel, the law was a guide to the nature of God and the responsibilities of the covenant relationship as well as a means of organizing social life in the promised land. The legislation mentioned would be put into operation on a proper basis at a future time, namely when the wandering Israelites had crossed over into Canaan and occupied it. As such it has a prospective nature, and should not be taken to presuppose the developed social conditions normally occurring in a settled community. The ceremonial and judicial regulations of the Israelites served until the fuller revelation in Christ, so that these were merely transitory in nature and binding upon the Jews only, not the early Christians. Cf. Mt. 8:4; Lk. 11:42; Gal. 4:9; 5:1–6; Heb. 9:9, 10. 7 A god so near to it. This great privilege was the secret of the uniqueness of Hebrew religion, no intermediary being required to enable the worshipper to approach

God in prayer. 8 All this law. These words presumably refer to the bulk of Deuteronomy. What significance has the Mosaic law for the Christian reader? While the law exhibits some transitory elements not binding upon Christians, it also contains eternal principles of justice, holiness and truth, enshrined in the Decalogue and underlying all the legislation. These are binding upon all generations of Jews and Christians alike. Such laws are quoted as commandments in the NT with the words 'for it is written'. See Mt. 4:10; 5:17; Rom. 13:9; 1 Pet. 1:16. Again, as part of the inspired Scripture, the whole book is written for our learning (Rom. 15:4), and is 'profitable' (2 Tim. 3:16). Finally, the NT states explicitly that Moses wrote of Christ (Jn. 5:46). Jesus quoted Deuteronomy frequently, using it especially at His temptation (cf. Mt. 4:4 and Dt. 8:3; Mt. 4:7 and Dt. 6:16; Mt. 4:10 and Dt. 6:13).

4:9–24 The covenant of the Lord. 9 Take heed, and keep your soul. (Cf. 1 Tim. 4:16.) Moses was addressing a generation whose responsibility it was to transmit the revelation to future Israelites, hence the repeated emphasis upon 'teaching'. Soul means 'self' here, indicating that survival depended upon recollection of and loyalty to the Sinai covenant. Lest you forget. The basic principle to be borne in mind is the spirituality of God and His abhorrence of idolatry and apostasy. The duty of remembrance is stressed both positively and negatively (see 5:15; 7:18; 8:2, 18; 9:7; 15:15; 16:3, 12; 24:9, 18, 22; 25:17; 32:7 and 4:23, 31; 6:12; 8:11, 14, 19; 9:7; 25:19). This is supplemented by the command to teach and write, thus laying the foundation for a body of Holy Scripture. 10 At Horeb. Deuteronomy is full of Mosaic reminiscences. They fall into four groups relating, first, to Egypt and the journey to Sinai; second, to the giving of the law at Sinai; third, to the journey from Horeb to Kadesh; and finally, to the events of the last two years. Those of the second group occupy much of chs. 5, 6, 9 and 10, referring to the covenant, the Ten Commandments, the apostasy of the golden calf, the giving of the second tablets and the separation of the tribe of Levi. Learn to fear. Repeated in 14:23; 17:19; 31:13. Cf. 6:24; 8:6; 10:12; 28:58. Reverence towards God is as important in the worshipper as the sense of dutiful love. Both are emphasized as elements in the covenant relationship between God and His people. 11 In darkness. Cf. Ex. 19:18; 20:21; Ps. 97:2. The God who dwells in unapproachable light (1 Tim. 6:16) is hidden by darkness from the eyes of sinful men. 12 Out of the midst of the fire. This phrase occurs 10 times (4:12, 15, 33, 36; 5:4, 22, 24, 26; 9:10; 10:4. Cf. 32:22), showing the deep impression made on Moses, to whom God first revealed Himself in the burning bush and then in the fires of Sinai. Fire symbolizes the majesty of God and the mighty elemental forces under His control (Ps. 104:4), as well as the essential holiness of God (cf. Dt. 4:24). Christ will appear in the midst of fire at His second coming (2 Thes. 1:7, 8). 13 His covenant. This is the first of 27 recurrences in Deuteronomy of this important theme. The word bᵉrîṯ was used of a contractual agreement based upon conditions (cf. Gn. 21:32), and also of a binding relationship between God and man. Contracts of various forms were a prominent feature of Ancient Near Eastern life, and were ratified in various ways. Here the reference is to God's act of pure grace in taking Israel into a specified spiritual relationship at Sinai. The fact of ratification (Ex. 24:1–8) made the compact binding upon both parties, and it comprised the 'ten words of the covenant' (Ex. 34:28; cf. Dt. 9:9) together with the 'statutes and ordinances' which the Israelites promised to obey in the light of the covenant. Thus the 'promise' preceded the 'law' (Gal. 3:15ff.). He wrote them. An explicit statement twice repeated (5:22; 10:4) of the divine origin of the covenant commandments. Two tables of stone. Near Eastern suzerainty treaties were generally made in duplicate form, one copy of which was deposited with the vassal for periodic reference. The Sinai 'law' is thus properly a suzerainty treaty rather than a legal code as such, and is in accord with the ancient international treaties of the type used to formalize the relationship of a suzerain and a vassal. In covenant-renewal documents, of which Deuteronomy is a good biblical example, it was customary in the Ancient Near East for modification of the stipulations, particularly modernization, to be carried out. This fact explains the various differences between the Ex. 20 and Dt. 5 forms of the Decalogue. Thus Dt. 5:21 adds 'his field' because the imminent occupation of Canaan made land-ownership a matter of immediate relevance.

15 Take good heed. The fact that Israel saw no physical indications of deity was no warrant for formulating a material representation of God. The warning against idolatry was timely in view of pagan practices. 16 A graven image. Pottery figurines of pagan deities, many of them goddesses exhibiting crude and exaggerated sexual characteristics, have been unearthed from numerous sites in Canaan. The licentious rites of the Baal votaries stood in stark contrast to the moral purity demanded by the Mosaic law. 17, 18 The likeness of any beast . . . . A warning against totemistic worship. The Egyptian deity Anubis had the head of a jackal, while Thoth had the head of a hawk. 19 Sun . . . moon . . . host of heaven. Temples dedicated to the moon existed at Ur and Harran in the days of Abraham. The sun was worshipped at On (Heliopolis) in Egypt (Gn. 41:45), while astral worship was common in the Ancient Near East. 20 Iron furnace. One whose fire was strong enough to melt iron ore. His own possession. Cf. 9:26. A doubly inalienable relationship which Israel could not renounce any more than God could. 24 A devouring fire, consuming whatever arouses divine indignation. The fire which purifies precious metals also burns up whatever is worthless or corrupt, so that fire is symbolic of God's holiness and righteous judgment. Cf. Heb. 12:29. Jealous. Probably the best translation of qannā' here is 'one who maintains his rights', since God's zeal for holiness and equity demands such practical expression.

4:25–40 An appeal for fidelity. 26 Heaven and earth. The silent witnesses of all our vows and our general behaviour, outlasting all human vicissitudes (cf. 30:19; 31:28). The emphasis of the merismus here is that it constitutes an appeal to all creation. Live long. Length of life was one of the blessings often associated with obedience (5:16, 33; 6:2; 11:9; 17:20; 22:7; 25:15; 30:18, 20; 32:47. Cf. Ps. 21:4). 27 Scatter. If the Israelites prove unfaithful they will be disinherited (Nu. 14:12) and exiled from their promised territory. Yet if they repent they will, of God's mercy, be gathered in again from remote places (30:1–5; cf. Mt. 24:31). 28 Serve gods. . . . Bondage to pagan nations will humiliate the apostate servants of the living God by compelling them to revere inanimate objects fabricated by human beings. 29 All your heart . . . soul. The words are repeated (6:5; 10:12; 11:13; 13:3; 26:16; 30:2, 6, 10) so as to show the unreserved nature of the consecration which God expects from His servants. The heart is the 'will' or seat of emotional and purposive response, while the soul is the 'self' or personality. 30 Obey his voice. This injunction appears again in 8:20; 9:23; 13:4, 18; 15:5; 26:14, 17; 27:10; 28:1, 2, 15, 45, 62; 30:2, 8, 10, 20, and stresses an important part of the covenant stipulations. 31 Merciful (Heb. raḥûm). The word denotes 'compassion', and is so rendered in 13:17; 30:3. The devouring fire of the perversely wicked is the merciful and gracious God of the penitent sinner. The covenant. The basis of Israel's selection as the chosen of God.

32 The days that are past. An appeal to history to justify the divine claims, an attitude which is typically Mosaic. Moses refers particularly to the signs accompanying the Exodus, and the repeated allusions to Egypt are explicable only if he was the real author of the book. See 1:2, 7, 30; 4:20, 34, 37, 45, 46; 5:6, 15; 6:12, 21, 22; 7:8, 15, 18; 8:14; 9:7, 12, 26; 17:16; 20:1; 23:4; 24:9, 18, 22; 25:17; 26:5, 8; 28:27, 60, 68; 29:2, 16, 25; 34:11. To the miracle of the Exodus are added memories of God's mercies in the way to Mt. Sinai, the manna (8:3, 16), and the water from the rock (6:16; 8:15; 9:22; 33:8). 34 Trials (AV 'temptations', RV mg. 'evidences'). Such as the testing of Pharaoh's character or the proving of Israel. By a mighty hand and an outstretched arm. See also 5:15; 7:19; 11:2; 26:8. An expression symbolizing divine intervention in history. The Heb. 'āhaḇ, used of the electing love of God, corresponds to the Greek agapē of the NT. Such love is a spontaneous expression of grace, bestowed apart from any merit in its object (9:6). This appeal, based on God's love manifested to the patriarchs, is reiterated in 7:7, 8, 13; 10:15; 23:5. Moses can find no other ground than this for God's sovereign choice of Israel. Grace and election are thus linked at an early stage (cf. Rom. 8:28; 11:28, 29). Through Israel and the elect remnant God manifested Himself fully in Christ in the fullness of time (Gal. 4:4). Moses pleads with Israel to reciprocate God's love, another persistent theme of Deuteronomy. See 5:10; 6:5; 7:9; 10:12; 11:1, 13, 22; 13:3; 19:9; 30:6, 16, 20. 39, 40 This day. As Moses' life draws to a close he expresses himself with even greater urgency. See 6:6; 7:11; 8:1, 11. That it may go well. This theme recurs in 5:16, 33; 6:3, 18; 12:25, 28; 22:7. It is one of the results of obedience and, as with other material blessings, it emerges from the love which unites God with His people.

4:41–43 Transjordanian cities of refuge appointed

41 Three cities. These places of asylum were mentioned principally in Nu. 35:9–34 and Jos. 20:1–9, and were now located by Moses in the conquered territory. In Israel the responsibility for punishing a murderer rested upon the nearest male relative (gō'ēl). The unintentional murderer could find asylum in one of these three Levitical cities, thus preventing the extension of a blood feud. Dt. 19:1–13 also provided for three cities on the W side of the Jordan. Ancient Near Eastern peoples generally furnished absolute security for fugitives in the form of certain shrines or sacred precincts. The cities W of Jordan flourished during the united monarchy, so there is no reason to regard the Transjordanian cities of refuge as either unhistorical or non-Mosaic in provenance.

4:44 – 26:19 THE SECOND DISCOURSE

4:44–49 The covenant stipulations: historical prologue

This section, which in Ancient Near Eastern vassal treaties outlined the historical relations between the contracting parties, defined carefully the locale and time of the second discourse and prepared the way for the stipulations mentioned in 4:45 and presented in detail later on (12:1 – 26:19). The latter were given in full view of Beth-peor (46; see on 3:29), which added emphasis to their warnings. 45 Testimonies (Heb. 'ēḏôṯ) here means an 'exhortation' or 'reminder' of the covenant implications. In Ex. 25:21, 22 the Decalogue itself is described as the 'testimony', witnessing as it does to the basic elements of the covenant. 48 Sirion (AV 'Sion'). See on 3:9. The Canaanite name for Mt. Hermon, found here, 3:9 and Ps. 29:6 only. 49 Pisgah. See on 3:17.

5:1 – 11:32 BASIC COMMANDMENTS

5:1 – 6:25 Posterity to be instructed in the Horeb revelation

5:1–21 The Decalogue. The Ten Commandments constituted the essence of the law and the basis of God's covenant with Israel. They summarized the religious and social obligations of the Israelites, and constituted the revealed foundation for the new stipulations about to be promulgated. The Decalogue is binding upon the conduct of all believers, for when Christ instructed the young ruler to keep the commandments if he desired to 'enter life' (Mt. 19:17), He constituted them as in fact a rule of life. When He spoke of them as 'the commandment of God' as contrasted with human traditions (Mt. 15:3), He recognized their binding force. Only divine grace can enable men to keep them; yet it is for this very purpose that grace is given. Law and grace are thus bound together. 1 Hear, O Israel. Repeated in 4:1; 6:3, 4; 9:1; 20:3 and 27:9 to mark the beginning of a new appeal for obedience on the part of Israel. The statutes and the ordinances. See on 4:1. These detailed commandments follow in chs. 12–26, after chs. 5–11, which deal with the Decalogue and the exhortations based on them. Be careful (AV 'keep', RV 'observe'). A characteristic phrase repeated in 5:32; 6:3, 25; 7:11; 8:1; 11:22, 32; 12:1, 32; 15:5; 17:10; 19:9; 24:8; 28:1, 15, 58; 31:12; 32:46. Knowledge is a prerequisite to performance.

3 This covenant. The responsibility and privilege of the covenant is recalled by reference to the actual place, and the Hebrew idiom emphasizes that it was made 'not only with our fathers, but also with us'. 4 Spoke. One of the most important scriptural emphases is that God is One who communicates His revelation in intelligible words. 5 He said. What follows is practically a verbatim repetition of the Decalogue in Ex. 20:1–17. As a suzerainty treaty this latter can be analysed as follows: preamble (20:2a); historical prologue (20:2b); general commandments (20:3); specific stipulations (20:4a, 5a, 7a, 8, 12a, 13–17); curses (20:5b, 7b); blessings (20:6, 12b). The difference in Deuteronomy seems to be that, being part of an exhortation addressed to a new generation, Moses does not hesitate to amplify or even change the wording of the Exodus version slightly for better emphasis. Thus the narrative is more rhetorical and homiletical than its Exodus counterpart.

6 I am, or 'I the Lord am your God'. The assertion of that eternal power which governs human destiny prefaces the demands made by God upon man. Cf. Ex. 3:14 and Jn. 14:6. The covenant name (Ex. 6:2, 3) brings God into direct suzerainty relationship with His chosen people. This selfsame personal relationship between God and man in Jesus Christ is the basis of the Christian experience. The assertion of divine existence is followed by the recollection of God's saving power. 7 Before, or 'besides'. If 'before' means 'to my face', the Israelites are forbidden to provoke God by means of unreal idols. The meaning 'besides' contains a demand for absolute and sole worship of the God of Sinai. The stringent rules against worshipping false gods (13:1–18), the insistence upon the purity of worship (16:1–22) and the observance of the covenant (29:1–29) all illumine this first great commandment.

8 Graven image. A prohibition of the worship of the true God under an improper or false form. The deity cannot be venerated under an image such as that of the golden calf, a sin which Moses may well have had in mind in varying the text from its Exodus counterpart. God can be known truly only as He has revealed Himself, first, in words, and secondly, through the incarnate Christ. 9 Jealous. See on 4:24. God asserts His rights in the covenant relationship. The iniquity of the fathers. That the consequences of this are indeed visited upon the offspring is a fact of experience, 10 as is the validity of God's promise to show steadfast love. This latter term (ḥeseḏ) is untranslatable, but is here associated with covenanted mercies, as in Hosea. AV renders it by 'mercy', but this does not begin to exhaust the meaning of the word. Its etymological origin is uncertain, but it is always closely connected with the two concepts of covenant and faithfulness. It thus implies 'unfailing love grounded in a covenant', and is used both of God's attitude towards His people and of the response He desires from them (cf. 1 Jn. 4:11, 19), the latter occurring especially in Hosea.

11 In vain. The Hebrew lašāw' can mean 'for vanity' or 'for falsehood'. The Hebrews are forbidden to swear false oaths by the name of their God. In Hebrew thought the name is closely identified with the person who bears it with respect to his character (cf. Mt. 1:21) and authority. God's name is holy (Ps. 111:9; Lk. 1:49), glorious and fearful (Dt. 28:58), and its richness is revealed by Moses (Dt. 32:3), the prophets (Ps. 99:3; Is. 63:12, 14) and the Saviour Jesus (Jn. 17:6, 26). To keep this commandment we need divine grace, and therefore the Christian prays 'hallowed be thy name'.

12 Observe the sabbath day (Heb. šāmôr; in Ex. 20:8 it is zāḵôr, 'remember'). Moses used a stronger term here because he was exhorting the people to observe God's commands. This commandment provides for rest from labour by setting aside a definite time for divine service. It is a foreshadowing of the eternal sabbath rest (Heb. 4:9). To the nation of Israel it also constituted a token of their redemption from bondage and their entrance upon a new life of liberty. It was thus prophetic of the day of resurrection (Rom. 4:25), and so became 'the first day of the week' and 'the Lord's day' of John's vision (Rev. 1:10). There is no fundamental contradiction between the commandment here and its counterpart in Ex. 20:8–11. In the latter the sabbath belongs to the Lord as His special day, having been blessed and set apart for worship and rest. In Dt. 5:12, the people are commanded to observe the sabbath in the manner already commanded in Exodus, and the fact that the sabbath belongs to the Lord is once more mentioned. 14 The humanitarian emphasis of this verse is an additional reason for sabbath observance. There is no need to devise complicated explanations of the origin of such amplifications of the original commandment. They are exactly such as would arise naturally in the mind of a fluent speaker, especially in the light of years of experience of trying to guide his people in the proper observation and the extent of meaning of the fourth commandment. 15 Remember. This comment is a reminder that servitude in Egypt was uninterrupted by any form of sabbath. By observing a weekly rest in the promised land their labours would be differentiated from slavery.

16 Honour your father and your mother. This injunction deals with one of the closest of human relationships. To his parents the individual owes his very existence, and for this alone they demand due honour. Long life is promised as an incentive to obedience (cf. Eph. 6:2). Honour to parents is limited by the honour due to God, who is supreme. Both allegiances are perfectly combined in Christ (Mt. 10:37; 19:29; Lk. 2:49, 51; Jn. 19:26, 27).

17 You shall not kill. This commandment declares the sanctity of the life of those made in the divine image. All life proceeds from God, and must be treated with reverence (cf. Gn. 9:4–6). The life of animals meant for food can be taken with impunity, and where justice requires it, the life of murderers also. For the latter, God empowers judges and magistrates (see Dt. 17:2–7; 19:12; Rom. 13:4). The guilt of murder is incurred when man, for his own wicked ends, takes his brother's life which the Creator had bestowed for His own glory. Then his brother's blood cries out from the ground for justice (Gn. 4:10; cf. Dt. 21:1–9).

18 Neither . . . commit adultery. This injunction establishes the rule of a holy married life, and accounts for the detailed regulations for moral purity, the number and strictness of which testify to its importance (21:10–17; 22:1 - 23:18; 24:1–5; 25:11, 12). God instituted marriage (Gn. 1:28; 2:24; Mt. 19:4–6) and used it to signify His love to Israel (Ho. 2:14–20) and the union between Christ and His church (Mt. 9:15; Eph. 5:32). Adultery is used as a symbol of Hebrew unfaithfulness (Dt. 31:16) and of Christian apostasy (Jas. 4:4).

19 Neither . . . steal. As with his existence and his powers, so man's possessions are a divine gift (see Dt. 8:17; 1 Cor. 4:7). Man is therefore responsible to God for his attitude to material things, and improper or illegal acquisition of them, such as by stealing, is a sin.

20 Neither . . . bear false witness (Heb. 'vain'). See on 5:11. This embraces all forms of slander, defamation and misrepresentation, and deals with wrong inflicted orally as contrasted with the three previous injunctions dealing with the results of actual deeds. The Christian, like his Master, must bear witness to the truth (Jn. 18:37) as it is in Jesus (Eph. 4:21).

21 Neither . . . covet. This commandment is different from all others in that it relates to the state of the heart rather than to outward conduct. Therefore only God can see when it is broken. Negatively it precludes unlawful desire for others' possessions; positively it inculcates contentment and faith (Heb. 13:5, 6). The slight variation from Ex. 20:17 might suggest the period prior to the settlement in Canaan. Coveting might well have been far less of a temptation during the period of Israel's wanderings than would be the case following their entrance into the promised land, when the property or possessions of a neighbour might perhaps become an object of desire under conditions of sedentary life. (See also on 4:13.)

5:22–33 The commandments delivered. An exhortation to obedience recalls the circumstances under which the law was originally given. 22 No more. See on 4:13 and cf. Rev. 22:18. 24 His glory. See Ex. 33:18. 27 Hear. The people heard the thunder but Moses heard the words (cf. Jn. 12:29; Acts 9:7). Moses is here the mediator between God and the people (see Gal. 3:19), and so is a type of Christ. 29 Always. The Sinai experience was all too soon to be followed by the apostasy of the golden calf.

6:1–9 Exhortation to remember. Moses proceeds to instruct the people in the commandments as they in turn are to teach their children. The instruction will be partly written (Dt. 6:9) and partly oral. 2 You and your son. The frequent shift from the singular to the plural, i.e. from the individual to the nation, would be appropriate in a spoken address. 3 Milk and honey. Repeated in 11:9; 26:9, 15; 27:3; 31:20. 4 Hear, O Israel. See on 5:1. Moses proceeds to declare God's uniqueness and Israel's response in undivided loyalty. This verse begins the celebrated Hebrew Shema, consisting of Dt. 6:4–9; 11:13–21 and Nu. 15:37–41, which is recited in the liturgy twice daily by pious Jews. Christ added the phrase 'with all your mind', and described vv. 4 and 5 as 'the first and great commandment' (Mt. 22:37, 38; Mk. 12:29, 30; Lk. 10:27). One Lord. This phrase has several renderings (see RSV mg.). The meaning seems to be that God is 'the only God', so that participation in the covenant precludes the recognition of any other deity. 8 You shall bind them. Jews of a later age interpreted this literally by enclosing written portions of the law in small cases called phylacteries, and binding them on their hands and foreheads. (Cf. Mt. 23:5.) 9 You shall write. Writing is one of the most ancient of human arts. In the time of Moses there were several languages used for purposes of communication, in which scribes were required to be proficient. Writing would have formed part of Moses' general education in Egypt (cf. Acts 7:22).

6:10–19 Lessons from the past. From this section Christ quoted two verses at His temptation. In citing v. 13 He replaced (according to the Greek text of Mt. 4:10) the word fear by 'worship' in response to Satan's challenge. 12 Take heed. The dangers of forgetting their dependence on God's goodness are brought home to the Hebrews. 14 Other gods. Repeated in 7:4; 13:6, 13; 17:3; 28:36, 64; 29:26; 30:17; 31:20. For purposes of clarity the current phraseology concerning 'other gods' is used, but without endorsing their reality. They are 'the work of men's hands' (4:28). 16 Massah means 'testing' or 'proving' (see Ex. 17:7; Dt. 9:22). Man is forbidden to test God by questioning His power or protection. (See also Mt. 4:7; Lk. 4:12.)

6:20–25 Future generations are to be taught. 20 What is the meaning . . . ? The story of the deliverance from Egypt, acted out as a drama, will recall for subsequent generations God's power and grace. 23 He brought us out. Moses links divine grace in redemption with the way of life set before Israel. (Cf. Rom. 4:25.) 24 For our good. The prescribed statutes and ordinances are uniformly conducive to a clean, just and holy life. (Cf. 10:13.) 25 Righteousness. This is a key word in the OT, and should be studied as background for such NT passages as Rom. 3:21–26 and Phil. 3:6–9. Hebrew ṣedeq ('righteousness') involves normality; whatever is straight and upright; justice, both human and divine, and moral righteousness. Here, keeping God's commands will be accounted as meritorious.

7:1 – 11:32 Exhortations to fidelity and obedience

7:1–11 Israel's call to complete separation. 1 Clears away. For the nations mentioned here see Gn. 10:15–18; 15:19–21; Ex. 3:8, 17; 13:5. They were to be dispossessed before Israel could claim her promised abode. The Hittites mentioned here were probably the descendants of early migrants from Asia Minor, and were equivalent to native Canaanites. 2 Utterly destroy; i.e. consider them as hērem, and as such exterminate them. See on 2:34. 5 Pillars . . . Asherim. In Canaanite religion the pillar was identified with male deity, especially Baal, and as such was forbidden to Israel. Remains of Canaanite pillars have been found at Gezer, Byblos, Hazor and Ras Shamra. Asherim appear to have been some kind of wooden images. In AV the word 'Asherah' is consistently translated 'grove'. 6 A people holy. (Cf. Ex. 19:5, 6.) Owing to their divine calling Israel could not afford to be contaminated by corrupt cultic forms. For his own possession (AV 'special', RV 'peculiar'). The word s^{e}gullâ originally applied to ownership of property, and here to Israel as God's very own possession. (Cf. 14:2; 26:18; Tit. 2:14; 1 Pet. 2:9.) 8 Redeemed. Repeated in 9:26; 13:5; 15:15; 21:8; 24:18. The verb pāḏâ means 'to ransom', 'to redeem'. In ancient Israel both property and life could be redeemed by making the appropriate payment. In the NT, human redemption is achieved solely by the sacrificial death of Christ. (Cf. Mk. 10:45; Lk. 1:68; 1 Pet. 1:18, 19.) 9 Covenant and steadfast love. See on 4:13 and 5:10. Ḥeseḏ is frequently associated with the covenant (7:12), and is also used for the graciousness existing between friends as well as for divine mercy.

7:12–26 Blessings and encouragements. Having now explained God's purpose in choosing Israel, Moses promises blessings if the Hebrews keep His laws, and exhorts them to faith and courage. 13 Love. While the love is unconditional, the blessings are dependent upon obedience. Grain. National prosperity and health will be matched by an ample supply of the principal agricultural products of Canaan. 15 The evil diseases of Egypt. Another illustration from Egyptian life springs to mind. The Egyptian climate was far from healthy, and an ancient writer, Pliny, described the land as 'the mother of worst diseases'. 20 Hornets. Whether or not the use of ṣir'â is metaphorical, this particular wasp could inflict a sting which under certain conditions would prove fatal. 24 Make their name perish. This emphasis is repeated in 9:14; 12:3; 25:19 (cf. Rev. 3:5). The name of false gods should be obliterated from memory, but that of the Lord should remain at His sanctuary and with His people. 25 Abomination. Mentioned again, mainly in connection with idolatry or impurity, in 12:31; 13:14; 14:3; 17:1, 4; 18:12; 22:5; 23:18; 24:4; 25:16; 27:15; 32:16. 26 Accursed (Heb. ḥērem, 'devoted'). The 'ban' was classified under three headings: the war ban, the justice ban and the private ban, representing three different degrees of severity. See on 2:34.

8:1–20 Promises and exhortations. 1 The land. The wilderness experience had been intended to teach Israel trust in and reliance upon the divine promises and power. Now that the nation was about to occupy fertile Canaan, it was even more important to remember past guidance and provision. 2 These forty years. Moses' reminiscences include the experience in Egypt, the journey to Sinai and the giving of the law (9:7 – 10:11), and the final journey to Kadesh (1:1 – 2:14). With these were given accounts of such discouraging lapses as the leprosy of Miriam (Nu. 12:10; Dt. 24:9), the judgment upon Dathan and Abiram (Nu. 16:27; Dt. 11:6), and the incident at Meribah (Nu. 20:10–13; Dt. 1:37; 32:51). The way in which these incidents were described, and their correspondence with actual events most likely to impress Moses himself, furnish striking evidence of authenticity. 3 By bread alone. Spiritual as well as physical forces sustain human existence, as was recognized by Christ at His temptation (Mt. 4:4; Lk. 4:4). To deny the existence and reality of spiritual factors is to separate oneself from a fundamentally important area of reality. 4 Your clothing. A vivid way of demonstrating the sustaining power of God during the wilderness wanderings. 5 Disciplines his son. For the Semites, such conduct was intended to inculcate reformation and righteousness in the offspring. (Cf. Heb. 12:5–11; Dt. 1:31; 32:6.) 7 A good land. See on 1:25. The physical contrast between the arid wastes of the Sinai region and the rich areas of Palestine have impressed travellers for many centuries. These verses detail the most important physical aspects of the terrain to show its richness in natural resources. 9 Iron . . . copper. Iron was abundant in the Wadi Arabah region, and also near Mt. Carmel and Mt. Hermon. Copper (AV 'brass') ores were widespread in Sinai, Midian and Syria. The fact that both copper and iron could be mined near Ezion-geber was a literal fulfilment of this verse. 15 Flinty rock. On two occasions water was brought out of the rock, once in Horeb (Ex. 17:6) and again at Kadesh (Nu. 20:8), and the word for 'rock' is different in each case. In Ex. 17:6, as here, it is ṣûr, used in Dt. 32:4, 13, 15, 18, 30, 31 metaphorically of God as the believer's source of strength. In Nu. 20:8, sela', sometimes used to describe a crag or a fortress of stone, was employed. The phenomenon of water issuing from rock testifies to the water-retaining properties of Sinai limestone. 17 My power. Wealth comes from God's gift of the land by the use of time, ability and energy, which are also divine endowments.

9:1–29 The people reminded of their sins and shortcomings. Israelite victories over the inhabitants of Canaan are not due to intrinsic merit, but to the iniquity of the indigenous peoples, whom God has planned to root out and replace by a faithful Israel, bidden to 'possess' the land. 2 Anakim. See on 2:21. 5 The wickedness of these nations. From excavations at Ras Shamra (Ugarit) and elsewhere in Canaan it is now known that the native religion of the land was one of the most depraved, sensuous and corrupt of its kind in the Ancient Near East. That he may confirm the word. In establishing Israel in Canaan God is honouring His promise to the patriarchs. While the calling of Israel is unconditional and irrevocable, coming as it does from God's love (cf. Rom. 11:29), the blessings are contingent upon obedience. The promise is to Abraham's 'seed', namely Christ (Gal. 3:16) and to all who are 'in Him'. The blessings of the gospel demand obedience from Christ's followers also. 6 Stubborn (AV 'stiffnecked'). The figure is probably taken from a stubborn ox which refuses to submit to the yoke. Moses proceeds to substantiate his allegation. 10 The assembly. Any group or its representatives, intending organized communal action. In the LXX, Hebrew qāhāl is translated ekklēsia or 'church' (cf. Acts 7:38). Both terms imply a collection and an election. As Israel was called out of Egypt, so the Christian church is called by God out of the world. 15 I turned. In this historical review Moses condenses the narrative and does not follow the strict chronology of Ex. 32. 18 I lay prostrate. Better, 'I prostrated myself'. Here again the narrative is condensed and rearranged. 19 Afraid. Hebrew yāgar, a rare word for 'to fear', is used in this verse with reference to a premonition concerning future events. 20 I prayed for Aaron. Only Moses could have made this statement. Because of his special position in the community Aaron had to bear much of the responsibility for what had happened. 21 The calf. The destruction of that which had occasioned the sin must precede the removal of the guilt. The dust of it. A further condensation of the golden calf incident in Ex. 32. 22 Massah. See on 6:16. The provocation of Rephidim, where the name Massah first arose, occurred before the Israelites reached Mt. Sinai, the others taking place subsequently. The three names are descriptive of the events. 23 Did not believe. Unbelief was the cardinal sin in the old dispensation as well as the new (1:32. Cf. Jn. 16:9; Heb. 3:1 – 4:10).

10:1–11 The ark and the Levites. These verses conclude the retrospect of the events at Horeb. Moses allows his thoughts to travel from his repeated intercession back to the Decalogue and the tablets deposited in the ark of the covenant, still in their midst; to the death of Aaron, to Eleazar and to the Levites, who were most probably standing nearby as he spoke. 3 I made an ark. It was actually made by Bezalel (cf. Ex. 25:10–22; 35:30–34). Gold-covered wooden receptacles or portable shrines were used in the Ancient Near East in pre-Mosaic times. The ark of the covenant was unique as the repository of the stone tablets, the documents bearing the covenant stipulations. 6 From Beeroth. . . . Vv. 6–9 are probably a gloss added by Moses when he wrote down the discourse. In Nu. 33:31–33 the stations are named in a different order and with some change of designation, but since the presence of water (Beeroth means 'wells') is mentioned in connection with two of them, they may have been visited more than once. Eleazar. The office of high priest was thus perpetuated, and the choice of Eleazar suggests that Aaron's sin had been forgiven. 8 At that time; i.e. of the sin of the golden calf and its sequel. Set apart. One of the twelve tribes, the Levites, was specially chosen for service in the sanctuary, one of their duties being to carry the ark. To stand. To minister to God in the offering of sacrifice, a duty reserved for the priests alone (Nu. 3:10).

10:12–22 What God requires of His people. A final review of the reasons for, and the consequences of, obedience to the Lord. Cf. Dt. 6:5; Mt. 22:37, and the answer given by Micah to the question asked in v. 12 (Mi. 6:8). For Moses, reverential worship of God is fundamental to all religious expression. 15 Though God created the cosmos, He and He alone chose Israel above all peoples. Their response should be a degree of submission and love because of His firm promises. Cf. Rom. 2:29. 17 The lofty monotheism of this verse is typical of Deuteronomy. 18 Fatherless . . . sojourner. Cf. 14:29; 16:11, 14; 24:17, 19, 20, 21; 26:12, 13; 27:19. Pronounced social and humanitarian concerns are an important feature of the Mosaic legislation. The sojourner could not claim the protection of either family or clan, nor had he any inheritance in the land. Yet he was requested to keep the sabbath (5:14) and the national feasts (16:11, 14; cf. Acts 2:10), and was included in the covenant (Dt. 29:11, 12). He thus belonged to the Israelite fraternity, and was an object of special responsibility (cf. Mt. 25:35; Acts 14:27; Eph. 2:19). 19 Love the sojourner. This demand for Israel to love the alien is without parallel in Ancient Near Eastern legislation. While the Israelites were commanded to honour and fear their parents and to listen to the prophetic message, they were commanded also to enter into a relationship of affection with the sojourner as a reminder of God's love during the Egyptian captivity.

11:1-25 Motives to love and obedience. Personal experience of God's mighty acts should lead to love and submission. 1 Charge. Occurs only here in Deuteronomy, and means that which is to be guarded or observed in relation to God. In other Pentateuchal books the word is used frequently of the charge of the Tabernacle (e.g. Lv. 8:35). 2 His outstretched arm. See 4:34; Ex. 6:6. A graphic description of God's protecting care. 3 Signs . . . deeds. God reveals Himself by mighty acts as well as by words. (Cf. Mt. 11:4; Jn. 2:11.) The miracle of the Exodus is mentioned in Acts 7:36; Heb. 11:27–29. 6 Dathan and Abiram. God's miracles of judgment are also object-lessons. The omission of Korah here was probably a concession to the feelings of the Levites (10:8), among whom were some surviving Korahites. (Cf. Ps. 106:17.) 10 The land of Egypt. Irrigation was a permanent problem in ancient Egypt, consuming much time and labour. Egyptian fields had to be watered artificially, like a vegetable garden, and not naturally by rain. In Canaan, fertilization took place during the autumn rains, which fell providentially at the time of sowing, and the crops were helped towards maturity by the spring rains, ready for harvesting in May and June. With your feet. The reference is to a water-wheel and pump worked by the feet. 11 Hills and valleys. Hence, terrain with a larger rainfall than flat land. 18 Lay up. Moses again appeals to the will of the people, for with this the Lord must be sought (4:29), loved (6:5), and served (10:12). The will must be 'circumcised' (10:16), since wicked thoughts arise there (9:4; 15:9; cf. Mt. 15:18). Frontlets. See on 6:8. 19 Teach them. While Moses did not address the children directly, he imposed upon their parents the duty of seeing that they were instructed in the law. 20 Doorposts . . . gates. In the houses of orthodox Jews even today there can be seen on the exterior doorpost a mezzuzah (lit. 'doorpost'), a small receptacle containing a copy of Dt. 6:4–9, in compliance with the ancient custom. 21 Heavens . . . earth; i.e. as long as the cosmos endures. 24 The western sea (AV 'uttermost', RV 'hinder'). The Near Eastern peoples 'oriented' themselves by facing E, so that the S was on their right hand. The western sea is thus the Mediterranean.

11:26-32 A blessing and a curse. These seven verses sum up the second discourse, and at the same time form an introduction to the detailed commandments. There is a strict impartiality to the justice of God (Ezk. 18:25–29; 33:17–20), and the entire future of the nation depends on the right choice being made. 28 Other gods. See on 6:14. These are unfamiliar, though equally alien, deities. 29 Gerizim . . . Ebal. The two most prominent hills in the natural centre of Palestine, used to represent symbolically the blessing and the curse. These are cherished locations in Samaritan traditions. 30 Gilgal. The word means a 'circle' or 'cairn' of stones, and was used to designate several localities. One such 'gilgal' has been found near Shechem. Oak (mg. 'terebinths'). See Gn. 12:6.

12:1 - 26:19 DETAILED COMMANDMENTS

12:1 - 16:22 Statutes governing worship and a holy life

12:1–14 Idolatry to be destroyed. The specific stipulations of this section have their counterpart in Near Eastern international treaties, consisting of the obligations to be imposed upon and accepted by the vassal, including a prohibition against any foreign alliances. Here Moses lays down the regulations for the religious, civil, social and domestic life in Canaan, and adds encouragements and warnings. 1 In the land. The immediate entry of Israel into Canaan governs all that follows (cf. 12:10; 26:1). When Israel is settled in the land, sacrifices will be offered only at a specific location to be chosen by God. 2 Surely destroy. Better, 'completely destroy'. The land must be cleansed from all idolatry so that it can be holy to the Lord (cf. Lv. 11:44, 45). This duty is implicit in the first two commandments of the Decalogue. Hills. Worship at these places was accompanied by depraved rites. The places are designated by a general term (Heb. m^{e}qômôṯ), and are not the bāmôṯ ('high places') or local shrines. (Cf. 1 Ki. 15:14.) The fact that bāmôṯ does not occur in Dt. 12–26 is enough to dispose of the theory that the chief object of the legislation was to prohibit the use of 'high places'. 3 Pillars. See on 7:5. 5 The place, forming a rallying-point for the Israelites wherever they resided, without stipulating that the cultus should be centralized there. God designated various places periodically where offerings could be brought. In Dt. 27:5 an altar was ordered to be built on Mt. Ebal. Thereafter Shiloh was for some centuries the place of God's choice, but during the early settlement period Shechem was a recognized shrine (Jos. 8:30ff.; 24:1ff.). There is no suggestion that Jerusalem, which at that time was a Jebusite stronghold, should form the centre around which the Israelites could rally, or that it was the place of God's choosing. The location of the central sanctuary in Jerusalem was strictly a product of the early monarchy. (Cf. 2 Sa. 7:1ff.) The prophet Gad ordered David to build an altar on the threshing-floor of Araunah in Jerusalem (2 Sa. 24:18). Other instances occur in Jdg. 6:26; 13:6–20; 1 Ki. 18:32. Make his habitation (Heb. l^{e}šiḵnô). Expressing the same thought of the divine presence as the term Shekinah. 6 Burnt offerings. Regulations for these had already been given in Lv. 1–7. Tithes. See 14:22ff.; Lv. 27:30–33. The offering of tithes and firstlings was obligatory, the others voluntary. The offering that you present (AV 'heave offerings of your hand'). The Hebrew t^{e}rûmâ means 'a contribution for sacred uses', probably so called because it was taken from a larger portion. (Cf. Lv. 7:14, 32; Nu. 15:17–21.) The law of the firstlings is given in Dt. 15:19–23. 7 You shall eat. Chs. 12, 14 and 15 deal mainly with the food of the people eaten in various ways. The word you could refer either to the Levitical priests or to those persons bringing the sacrifices. The sanctuary, where the offering of the sacrifices occurred, was also a centre for the trial of difficult cases (17:8, 10). Thus the Tabernacle had already become a unifying centre of national worship. You shall rejoice. See 12:12, 18; 14:26; 16:11, 14; 26:11; 27:7. (Cf. Jn. 15:11; Phil. 3:1; 4:4.) Joy is an essential element of the Christian religion, and is a spiritual blessing distinguishable from happiness. 8 Whatever is right. The disruption of life caused by the Transjordanian campaigns had made orderly worship difficult. This verse may have been intended to prohibit the use of private altars for sacrifice. 11 Make his name dwell there. See 12:21; 14:23, 24; 16:2, 6, 11; 26:2. The Tabernacle was erected that God might be represented as dwelling in the midst of His people (Ex. 25:8; Jn. 1:14; Rev. 21:3). 12 The Levite . . . within your towns. As a tribe the Levites had no territorial holdings, but were to be scattered among the tribes, with certain cities and their environs about to be assigned to them (cf. Nu. 35:1–8). In the meantime, as a sojourner, the Levite was to be the object of special care (see 12:18, 19; 14:27).

12:15–32 The killing of animals for food and sacrifice. Meat was not a prominent part of the diet of most Israelites, being consumed mainly by the upper classes. Meat was eaten by all on occasions of sacrifice and feasting, and these verses require such celebrations to take place at the central point of assembly. The principles enunciated stress the sacredness of all life as the direct gift of God, and a distinction is made between 'holy things' (v. 26) to be offered in sacrifice or dedicated to a religious purpose, and that which is simply killed for food (vv. 15, 20, 21), the latter also being God's provision. 15 Gazelle . . . hart. Not being domestic animals they were not acceptable as sacrificial offerings, though 'clean' in other respects. These species of game were apparently plentiful at the time; subsequently, and in the city, they were regarded as a delicacy (1 Ki. 4:23). 16 The blood. See Lv. 17:11. Blood, as the vital element and symbol of life, is treated with great reverence in the OT (cf. Gn. 9:4–6), especially in connection with covenant and sacrifice, a noteworthy foreshadowing of Christ's atonement (see Lv. 16; Heb. 9:12–14; 1 Pet. 1:18, 19; 1 Jn. 1:7). 25 Do what is right. See 13:18; 21:9; and for the contrast see 4:25; 9:18; 17:2; 31:29. 27 The blood of your sacrifices. See on 12:16. 30 How did these nations serve . . .? The Hebrews were forbidden to enquire as to how the inhabitants of Canaan worshipped their deities, for if an alien cultic form influenced Hebrew devotions, a debauched and apostate practice would soon follow. 32 You shall not add. See on 4:2.

13:1–18 Enticements to idolatry. Moses warns against the dangers of religious seduction by false prophets, confused visionaries and base men. If the injunctions appear severe, it should be remembered that the purging of the land involved also the removal of any Israelites who were enticed into sin by Canaanite immorality. The NT is equally severe (see 2 Thes. 2:8; Rev. 14:9–11). 1 The false prophet is an all too familiar OT figure, and is seen in the NT as a minister of Satan, seducing to evil (Mt. 24:24; Rev. 19:20). It is important to note that the divine revelation through Moses was of a normative nature. The true prophet reflects the spirituality and ethos of the God who delivered the Israelites from Egypt with power, and all subsequent prophecy was to be judged as to its truth or falsity in the light of this definitive standard. A wonder, i.e. a portent, pointing to a future happening. 3 Testing you. That the prediction may be fulfilled is no necessary proof of validity, for the real test is of a different nature. 5 Purge the evil. These stringent measures were necessary during the Mosaic period, and are in full accord with the character of the contemporary situation. See also 17:7, 12; 19:13, 19; 21:9, 21; 22:22, 24; 24:7. 6 Your brother. Incitements to apostasy may be present even in the family circle. (Cf. Mt. 10:36.) 9 Your hand . . . first, in inflicting capital punishment. (Cf. 17:7.) In these extreme circumstances the convicting witness had to bear the initial responsibility of the act, regardless of his feelings. 11 All Israel shall hear, and fear. See 17:13; 19:20; 21:21; 31:12, 13. Punishment is to be administered publicly as a deterrent. 13 Base fellows (AV 'children of Belial'). A scriptural term for habitual criminals. Have gone out, with the set purpose of religious seduction. 14 Make search. A further important principle of justice is here enunciated, namely that the fullest investigation should precede punishment. Much of British common law can be traced to the Mosaic enactments. 17 Devoted. (Cf. Jos. 7:10–26.) The punishment of idolaters and apostates must not be a thing of material gain for Israel.

14:1–21 Clean and unclean meats. 1 Moses repeats (see Lv. 11) the rules of bodily health applicable to the sons of the Lord. They are no longer obligatory for the Christian, though they still enshrine important precepts of hygiene and preventive medicine. As such they deserve more than passing attention. Cut yourselves. As sons of God they must not deface His image (1 Cor. 3:17), as the heathen did in their cultic rites (1 Ki. 18:28). 2 A people holy. See on 7:6. 4 The animals you may eat. Clean species desirable for food (see Lv. 11:2–8). Domestic animals precede those of the chase. 5 Ibex, better 'antelope', and antelope, better 'wild ox'. 7 Hare . . . rock badger. These appear to chew the cud but do not do so actually. In any case they do not conform to the principle laid down in v. 6. 8 Swine. The pig is the intermediate host of several parasitic organisms, and even under the best of modern culinary conditions its flesh can transmit these unwholesome infestations which under some circumstances can cause death. 9 Fins and scales. See Lv. 11:9–12. There is an implied prohibition against those edible crustacea which feed upon garbage and putrefying matter. 12–18 The birds mentioned in these verses feed on carrion, and are also prohibited. 20 All clean winged things. Cf. Lv. 11:21, 22, where, as here, the reference is to edible locusts. 21 Dies of itself. Such meat is unsuitable for human consumption because of the toxins already present in it. The sale of meat from fallen animals is prohibited in most civilized countries. Boil a kid. Cf. Ex. 23:19; 34:26. This unnatural custom was practised superstitiously by the Canaanites, perhaps to promote fecundity.

14:22–29 Tithes. When Moses spoke these words the principle of tithing was already well accepted in Israel. Tithes were first given as a token of gratitude (Gn. 14:20) or devotion (Gn. 28:22). Man's wealth is a divine gift, and is held in trust for God (Dt. 8:18; Mt. 25:14). To mark the sacredness of the whole, a definite proportion is to be set aside and dedicated at the sanctuary. This is the so-called 'second tithe', as contrasted with that tithe of the produce given to maintain the Levites (see Nu. 18:26–28). 22 All the yield, including the 'grain', 'wine' and 'oil' of v. 23, with the tithe being computed separately on each year's produce. 23 Learn to fear, i.e. be filled with a sense of dependence upon God. 25 Turn it into money. Those who lived too far from the centrally appointed sanctuary could change their tithe into money and purchase whatever they needed for the festival of rejoicing. 28 All the tithe. This was due in the third and sixth years of the sabbatical period instead of the second tithe. In those years what would have been the second tithe was kept at home for the poor to eat.

15:1–18 The Lord's release. Every seventh year was to see the remission of all debts by divine command. 2 Not exact it, i.e. not press his neighbour for payment. The year of release for debtors and bondservants (v. 12) alike was probably the one in which rest was also decreed for the land (see Ex. 23:10, 11; Lv. 25:2, 3). The statute points to a future agricultural situation where each family would have its own holdings. The remission of the loan was absolute, thereby becoming a gift. 3 Foreigner (Heb. nokrî) as distinct from the gēr of 10:19. The foreigner was a trader, mainly Egyptian, and would be well able to pay. 4 There will be no poor. This would occur only if the condition of obedience in v. 5 was fulfilled. 7 Heart . . . hand. Charity should proceed from man's heart, as it does with God. Poor brother. Even today the Jew still feels a sense of responsibility in this matter. 9 Your eye be hostile. Thus refusing to assist him on the ground that the loan will not be refunded. 12 Sold. The release is extended to bondservant and bondmaid alike, thus enlarging the provisions of Ex. 21:1–6. A person could 'sell himself' into bondage and thus be devoid of resources. 14 Liberally. At the time of emancipation the master was required to furnish proper equipment to enable the servant to begin a new life, and this is a further indication of the humanitarian spirit of the Mosaic legislation. 15 Redeemed. See on 7:8. 17 Bondwoman. A servant rather than a concubine.

15:19–23 Firstlings. Follows 14:22–29 logically, and enunciates the principle that all firstborn creatures should be dedicated to God, since all life is His gift. 20 The offering must not be delayed beyond a year. 21 As with other sacrifices it must be without blemish. In the light of Lv. 27:26 and Nu. 18:17, 18, it would be obvious to the audience as to who had to eat the firstling.

16:1–17 Three pilgrimage feasts. See Ex. 23:14; 34:18; Lv. 23:4; Nu. 28:16. These were to be celebrated at the chosen place of assembly, and commemorated an historical event of national importance as well as marking the three seasons of the agricultural year. 1 Abib. Hebrew 'of the fresh ears of corn', the later Nisan. 2, 3 The passover feast was closely related to that of unleavened bread. For the former, a lamb was prescribed (Ex. 12:21) to be sacrificed in the evening; for the latter, a ram and bullocks from the herd (Nu. 28:19) were offered the following day. Remember. An important emphasis in Deuteronomy. The NT counterpart of the Passover is also a feast of remembrance (Lk. 22:19), to be celebrated with a putting-away of malicious and wicked 'leaven' (1 Cor. 5:7, 8). 8 A solemn assembly. On the seventh day of the Passover festival. This important feast was designed to help the Hebrews review their spiritual values and rededicate themselves to God's service. 10 The feast of weeks or 'seven weeks'. It is the 'feast of harvest' (Ex. 23:16) and the 'day of the first fruits' (Nu. 28:26). A freewill offering. Whereas the Passover offering was prescribed, that of the Feast of Weeks was left to the discretion of the worshipper. Since 50 days elapsed between the offering of the barley sheaf at the beginning of the Passover and the celebration of the Feast of Weeks, the latter became known as Pentecost (see LXX, Lv. 23:16). In NT times it was made significant for the Christian by the outpouring of the Holy Spirit (Acts 2:14–18). 13 The feast of booths. See Lv. 23:42. In Ex. 23:16; 34:22 it is called the 'feast of ingathering'. The 'feast of tabernacles' (AV) marked the end of the agricultural year after the harvesting of barley (v. 9) and wheat (v. 13), and after vintage (v. 13). It reminded Israel that her life rested upon divine redemption which ultimately involved forgiveness of sin (2 Ch. 30:22), and thus separated the feast from pagan harvest festivals.

16:18–20 Administration of justice. 18 Judges and officers. See on 1:15 and 1:16. Moses provides here for an ordered civil government by defining the status of officers in the Hebrew commonwealth. 19 Partiality. Cf. 1:17; 10:17; Acts 10:34; Jas. 2:9.

16:21, 22 Prohibition of heathen symbols. The authenticity of Deuteronomy is attested by the fact that only Canaanite cultic forms are legislated against, not those of surrounding countries from a later period. 21 Asherah. See on 7:5. 22 Pillar. A stone with sacred significance (Gn. 28:18), a witness to an agreement (Gn. 31:52), an obelisk (Is. 19:19), or, as here, a carved representation or symbol of a pagan deity.

17:1 – 26:15 Laws relating to specific domestic, moral and religious situations

17:1 The perfect offering. Blemish. See Ex. 12:5; Lv. 22:17–33. Sacrificing less than the best to God is a profanation of His service (cf. Mal. 1:8; Heb. 9:14).

17:2–13 Civil ordinances. 2 Man or woman. The eradication of idolatry was the duty of all who encountered it. 6 Two witnesses, of unquestioned veracity and unanimous opinion. No torture was to be applied in order to extract a confession, and the severe penalty was to be imposed only on the basis of irrefutable evidence. (Cf. Mt. 18:6; Jn. 8:17; 2 Cor. 13:1; Heb. 10:28.) 7 The evil. LXX reads 'evil man'. (Cf. Mt. 6:13, RV.) Hebrew thought tends to identify sin concretely with the sinner. 9 You shall consult them. The sanctuary court was intended to try those cases deemed too hard for local courts, and the judge would be the senior presiding officer at the sanctuary. 12 Presumptuously. Strict adherence to court decisions was essential for the well-being of the theocracy.

17:14–20 Law of the kingdom. The selection, duties and qualifications of a king are considered here, where the king replaces the supreme judge. Monarchy is permitted rather than appointed, and the ruler must himself be subject to the law. This section warns in advance against the dangers implicit in Ancient Near Eastern kingship. Because these were familiar to intelligent observers in the 2nd millennium BC, it is not necessary to suppose that this passage was written in retrospect long after the time of Moses, to recall the perils which the rule of Solomon had brought into Israelite life. 15 Will choose. A native Israelite will be selected by God (cf. 1 Sa. 10:24). Foreign rule would conflict with the covenant ideal. 16 Multiply horses. The king must not aspire to military greatness but must foster the objectives of the covenant. The warning was necessary at a time when Egypt had become proficient in the use of chariots and horses as military weapons, following Hyksos and Canaanite traditions. 17 Turn away. To idolatry, as did Solomon (cf. 1 Ki. 11:4, 5). 18 A copy of this law, i.e. of the enactment relating to the king and his duties. The phrase was incorrectly understood by the LXX to refer to all of the fifth book of Moses, hence the name Deuteronomy or 'second law' was given to it. Levitical priests, the custodians of the law (see 31:26). 20 He and his children. Hereditary or dynastic rule is entertained as a possibility here.

18:1–8 Revenues of priests and Levites. 1 Levitical priests. A special class, indicated by the fact that different portions are assigned to priests in 18:3–5 and to Levites in 18:6–8. Whereas some priests taught the law (31:9–13), the Levites had actual custody of the book (31:25, 26), which was kept near the ark of the covenant. 3 The priests' due. Further portions unmentioned in Numbers, consisting of parts of animals slaughtered for ordinary consumption. 8 Patrimony. Either proceeds from the sale of his estate (Lv. 25:33) or fees due to him.

18:9–14 Witchcraft. This section comprises stern admonitions against any indulgence in sorcery. 10 Burns his son. The worship of Moloch was notorious for human sacrifice. Divination. A general term covering the magical practices which follow. 11 Necromancer. Cf. 1 Sa. 28:7. 13 Blameless. Whole-hearted in the service of God.

18:15–22 The future prophet. In a Messianic section Moses announced a successor in his office as prophet. Peter (Acts 3:22) and Stephen (Acts 7:37) afterwards recognized the fulfilment of his words. Cf. Jn. 5:46; Heb. 3:2–6. Traditional Jewish exegesis thinks of a prophet arising in each generation, but this is untrue historically. 15 Like me. The expression specifically means 'like me at Horeb, mediating a fresh and normative revelation of God'. Moses was a type of Christ both in his life and office. Like Jesus his life was spared in infancy, he renounced a royal court to share in the conditions of life of his brethren, and he became a captain of salvation to Israel. He was faithful (Heb. 3:2), full of compassion and love (Nu. 27:17; Mt. 9:36), a powerful intercessor for his people (Dt. 9:18; Heb. 7:25) speaking with God face to face and reflecting the divine glory (2 Cor. 3:7). Like Christ he was a mighty prophet in word and deed (cf. Lk. 24:19), a revealer of God's will and purpose (Dt. 6:1; Rev. 1:1); a mediator of the covenant (Dt. 29:1; Heb. 8:6, 7) and a leader of the people (cf. Is. 55:4). 21 How may we know . . . ? True prophets can be distinguished from false. They must be God's prophets (Dt. 13:1–3), their word must be fulfilled (1 Ki. 22:28; Je. 28:9), and they will honour the written law (Is. 8:20). False prophets will continue to the end of the age (Mt. 24:11; 1 Jn. 4:1–3; Rev. 19:20).

19:1–13 Cities of refuge. See on 4:41. Having already separated three cities in Transjordan, Moses now provides for three more sanctuaries on the western side (cf. Nu. 35:14), and gives instructions concerning them. The rules regarding homicide, like some other laws in Deuteronomy, deal with customs still more ancient, confirming some and amending others. The legislation has elements in common with several Near Eastern codes, but the Mosaic law places a higher value on human life (cf. on 5:17), and sets a more elevated standard of love to God and to one's neighbour. 3 The roads. The Talmud says that the way was marked by signposts bearing the words 'To the City of Refuge'. 6 The avenger.

The nearest relative of the deceased (Nu. 35:12). Blood-revenge, still prevalent among Arab tribes, was thus curtailed. 9 Three other cities. To be added if Israel ultimately possessed all the land promised to Abraham (Gn. 15:18). No late author would have invented such a provision. 10 Upon you. If no cities of refuge existed, blood-guilt would rest upon the land. Cf. 21:1–9. 12 Elders. In a patriarchal society the senior members of the families, clans and tribes occupied a superior position, and formed a local authority for transacting judicial and other business (see 21:20; 27:1; 29:10; 31:28).

19:14 The landmark. These could be either of ancient native origin or those established by the Israelites themselves (see 27:17). Removal of such signs, once established, was equivalent to theft.

19:15–21 The law of witness. See on 5:20 and 17:6. Whereas in Jewish law intention to commit a crime was not a punishable offence, it was the opposite in the case of conspiring witnesses, whose very intention constituted the essence of their crime. In Jn. 5:31–46, Christ cites three witnesses to His own claims, and two witnesses testify to Him in Rev. 11. Cf. 2 Cor. 13:1. 17 The priests. It was their duty to search out the truth in judgment. In a later age their descendants sought false testimony against Jesus (Mt. 26:59–68). 21 Eye for eye. This lex talionis, or law of equal retaliation, occurred also in the Semitic Code of Hammurabi, whereas among the Hittites it was restitution which was emphasized. The rule is used here in connection with the punishment of a false witness. The words of Mt. 5:38–42 apply to personal conduct.

20:1–20 Laws of warfare. Even in wartime certain humanitarian principles apply. The reasonableness and mercy of these provisions stand in sharp contrast to the brutality of the later Assyrians. 1 You shall not be afraid. God's people need this encouragement constantly (1:29). The deliverance from Egypt, a constant inspiration to Moses, is used here to inculcate courage; elsewhere for complete dedication (4:20), for sabbath observance (5:15), for reverential fear (6:12), humility (8:4), penitence (9:7), kindness to strangers (10:19), obedience (11:2, 3), mercy to the poor (24:18, 22), and thanksgiving (26:5, 8). 2 The priest. In rabbinical times this special representative was designated as 'the priest anointed for the war'. 5–8 The exemptions here were of a compassionate nature. Nothing ought to distract from the objective of that victory which is the Lord's. (Cf. Lk. 14:18–20.) 6 Enjoyed its fruit. Only in the fifth year was the fruit of a tree permitted to be eaten (see Lv. 19:23–25). 10 Terms of peace. War was waged only as a last resort. There are two principles in operation here: God's proclamation of peace and goodwill on the one hand, and the inevitable judgment of evil on the other. These undergird both the covenant and the gospel. (Cf. Mt. 10:12, 13.) 17 Utterly destroy. See on 2:34. (Cf. Jos. 11:12–15.) The command in this extreme form is found only here. (Cf. Rev. 21:27.) 20 Not trees for food. Fruit-bearing trees were to be spared because of the life-principle within them, and for future use. This would act as a control over erosion of the soil.

21:1–9 Undetected homicide. 3 Slain man. One murdered in open country by an unidentified assailant (cf. v. 1). The elders and judges of the nearest settled community had to make atonement according to a specific prescription. 4 Shall break. The sacrifice was to take place in rough valley terrain where a flowing stream would remove the heifer's blood. Atonement and cleansing go together here, and point to Calvary (Heb. 9:13, 14). 8 Forgive. Spoken by the priests, implying that the local inhabitants had failed to make the roads safe for travellers. 9 Purge. Were the murderer to be discovered subsequently, he would suffer the extreme penalty of the law.

21:10–21 Domestic ordinances. The law for marriage with a captive woman displayed a remarkable respect for feminine individuality. 12 Shave her head. A common eastern rite of renunciation and purification. 13 A full month. To allow her to grieve properly and to accustom her to her new surroundings. The humanitarian tone of this legislation is unique in the ancient world. 14 No delight. If the captive becomes repulsive to her husband she is to be divorced, not reduced to the level of a bondwoman. 15 Disliked. A relative term only, expressing preference. Cf. Gn. 29:31; Mal. 1:2, 3. 16 First-born. This right was already ancient (Gn. 27:1, etc.) and is attested by archaeological discoveries from the patriarchal period. 18 Stubborn. To their children, parents are ideally God's representatives, hence obstinate rebellion is akin to repudiation of divine grace. Here the parents have an equality of function and responsibility, as in the fifth commandment. 19 Elders. The father is not despotic, and so both parents must bring the charge before the leaders appointed to arbitrate at the gate, the oriental forum.

21:22, 23 The curse of the tree. While stoning was the approved means of execution, hanging was imposed as an additional disgrace after death. According to Jewish tradition this regulation was never actually carried out, but remained on the statute-book as the strongest possible warning against disobedience to parents and the resultant entrance upon a life of crime. Cf. Gal. 3:13; Jn. 19:31.

22:1–30 Rules of charity and purity. The miscellaneous character of the precepts in vv. 1–12 has perplexed those who regard these chapters as a legal code, but it is natural enough in a spoken discourse. The first three verses recapitulate Ex. 23:4, 5, but with wider implications. 2 Restore. Failure to do so is theft. 5 Shall not wear. In a society where male and female dress was similar, proper sexual differentiation was an important protection against perversion, immodesty and immorality. 6 Nest. The sanctity of the parental relationship is stressed here, with the female bird being a surrogate for a mother. In view of the necessity for maintaining a 'balance of nature', this is a wise and humane provision. 8 Parapet. Necessary on the flat roof of an oriental house to prevent anyone on the roof from falling off. 9 Two kinds. Since God has made obvious distinctions in nature, it is unwise for man to obliterate them. The 'kinds' are of a mutually exclusive nature. 10 Ox . . . ass. It is cruel to yoke the weaker animal to the stronger. God's loving care extends to the whole of His creation (cf. Mt. 10:29). 11 Mingled. Static electricity in the mixture will cause discomfort to the wearer. 12 Tassels. A distinctive sign to the Israelites and others that they were the Lord's people. Cf. Nu. 15:37–41; Lk. 8:44. 13 Spurns her. He who falsely accuses his bride of unchaste behaviour prior to marrying him shall be fined and prohibited from divorcing her. The mere satisfaction of physical passion is a totally inadequate basis for marriage. 18 Whip him. According to the Talmud this comprised 'forty stripes save one'. 21 Folly (Heb. nᵉḇālâ). A euphemism for grave sin. 23 Betrothed. Betrothal was considered in the orient as equally binding with marriage, hence a betrothed woman was styled 'wife' (Mt. 1:20). 30 Uncover. Enforcing the prohibitions against certain degrees of sexual relationship in Lv. 18:6–13.

23:1–8 Membership in the congregation. Israelite community life has overtones of that found in the primitive Christian church, including its holiness and catholicity, its exclusiveness and inclusiveness, and its nature as the earthly representative and particular possession of the Lord. 1 Crushed. The exclusion of emasculated persons was a protest against heathen cultic practices, and forestalled their introduction in Israel. 2 Bastard. The offspring of an adulterous or incestuous relationship or marriage. 3 Ammonite . . . Moabite. The masculine forms indicate thatm ales were meant. Female proselytes could marry male Israelites, however, as with Ruth. 4 Balaam. This is a covenient place for Moses to summarize his reminiscences concerning the recent past. These include the unfriendly actions of Edom and Ammon (2:1–14), the victories over Sihon and Og (2:30 – 3:11; 29:7, 8; 31:4), the settlement of the two and a half tribes (3:12–22), the references to his own sin at Kadesh (1:37; 4:21; 31:2; 32:51; 34:4), the people's sin at Beth-peor (4:3), the plague of fiery serpents (8:15), and Balaam's exploits (Nu. 22:4 – 24:25).

23:9–25 Various social rules. 12 Outside the camp. Cleanliness in the camp is ordered both for health and for personal purity, consonant with the Lord's presence in their midst. 15 Escaped. A fugitive, non-Israelite slave seeking an asylum in Canaan from a harsh master. 17 Cult prostitute. One of the degrading aspects of Canaanite religion, involving both male and female prostitutes. 18 Dog. The Hebrew term for a sodomite. 19 Lend upon interest. Loans to foreigners were usually of a commercial nature, and thus an interest charge could be levied without objection. When the loan was from a rich man to his poor neighbour, the imposition of interest violated the law of brotherly love. Cf. Ex. 22:25; Lv. 25:36. 21 A vow. See Nu. 30:2ff.; Dt. 12:6, 26. 25 Standing grain. The fields in Palestine were open to the passer-by, and the yield was so plentiful that he could take whatever he wished. Cf. Mk. 2:23, 24, where the sabbath was violated by the action of rubbing the ears, an act which for the Pharisees was a form of threshing, and thus of manual work.

24:1–4 The bill of divorce. Cf. Mt. 5:31; 19:7. This is not a law instituting or regulating divorce, but a regulation concerning this ancient Semitic custom. A man must have a definite grievance, and a formal document must be issued. 1 Some indecency. The expression is vague, and no precise meaning is agreed for it. The later rabbinic school of Shammai allowed divorce only if the wife was guilty of unchastity, whereas that of Hillel thought of indecency in the broadest sense, implying that a wife could also be divorced for reasons other than unchastity. 3 Bill (lit. 'a writing of cutting off'). While the marriage bond was holy and inviolable, it could be terminated under certain conditions. Christ's teaching interprets this law correctly and sets it in right relationship to the primitive law.

24:5–22 Humane regulations. 5 Newly married. Public responsibilities are not to be imposed upon a bridegroom for one year. 6 In pledge. Removing one of the millstones would make the other useless, and so deprive the family of daily bread. The spirit of this legislation is reflected in Mt. 6:32; Lk. 12:30. 7 Stealing. For the Semites, man-stealing was the occasion for a blood feud. The Code of Hammurabi made it a capital offence. 8 Leprosy. The laws concerning ṣāraʿaṯ, a generic term, are found in Lv. 13 and 14. 9 Miriam. Every wilderness experience was to be regarded as a lesson illustrating God's will and purpose for His people. Cf. 25:17. 14 Not oppress. The most advanced modern social legislation cannot surpass the concerned humanitarian approach of these chapters. 15 On the day. The poor labourer must not be exploited. Cf. Lv. 19:13. 16 The fathers. Cf. Ezk. 18:4, 20.

25:1–19 Rules of justice, mercy and purity. 1 Condemning. Corporal punishment was not to be used to extract a confession, and was to be applied only after the suspect was found guilty. 3 Forty stripes. Even in punishment the dignity of the individual is to be respected. Justice is to be tempered with mercy, and chastisement must be distinguished from humiliation. The Jews kept the letter (2 Cor. 11:24) but not the spirit of this law. 4 Muzzle. Cf. Pr. 12:10. The claims of the lower aspects of creation upon human sympathies are typical of the Scriptures. While God cares for the oxen (1 Cor. 9:9), He cares more for human beings. 5 Her husband's brother. This custom, known as levirate marriage, goes back to patriarchal times (Gn. 38:8), and is here modified in certain particulars. It averted the calamity of the family name becoming extinct. Cf. Mk. 12:18–27. 9 Pull his sandal. To signify the transfer of property. See Ru. 4:7, 8. Spit in his face. Showing contempt for the person who refused to exercise the levirate (the Latin word levir means 'husband's brother') principle. 19 Blot out. Justice involves the punishment of the wicked as well as the care of the needy, and in this case it required the obliteration of the most savage and inhuman of the Canaanite peoples.

26:1–15 Firstfruits and tithes. See on 14:22. The forms for the presentation of firstfruits and tithes constitute a beautiful model of prayer and praise. The ceremony was to be an occasion of thanksgiving to God for His great mercies. 3 The priest. The high priest or his deputy. Declare, i.e. solemnly proclaim. 4 The basket. Its contents would demonstrate that Israel now possessed the land in accordance with the divine promise (Gn. 28:13). The firstfruits contain the promise of the harvest, which God will provide in due time. 5 Aramean (AV 'Syrian'). 5–10 This beautiful prayer is a brief epitome of Hebrew history, recalling the mighty deeds of God. The formula is strikingly Mosaic in style and content, referring to the hard bondage, the cry for deliverance, and the redeeming outstretched arm. 12 Finished paying. The festal character and generous method of distribution show that the 'second tithe' for the poor is intended here. Cf. 14:28. 13 Removed. It has not been retained secretly for personal use (cf. Acts 5:2), but all that is due to God has been paid. Cf. Mal. 3:10.

26:16–19 Concluding exhortation

This closing section reminds the Israelites of their obligations and privileges in the covenant relationship. 16 This day. Implementation of the pledges requires implicit obedience on the part of Israel. Cf. Heb. 4:7. 17 Declared. Perhaps a legal term, connected with the imposition of covenantal obligations, and possibly associated with some otherwise unrecorded token of assent by the people. 19 Above all nations. The signal reward of a loyal and obedient Israel. Cf. 28:10.

27:1 - 31:8 THE THIRD DISCOURSE

27:1–10 The law inscribed and obedience commanded

With the completion of chs. 5–26, the narrative form is resumed. Moses now gives a threefold directive about 'this law' just delivered, that it may be all the more deeply impressed upon the people. 1 The elders, who would be responsible for carrying out the injunctions after Moses had died (Jos. 8:33). 2 Large stones. Many such inscribed stelae have been found in the Near East, as with the Code of Hammurabi, the Merneptah stele, and others. Plaster. A coating of lime or cement, following Egyptian custom. 3 Shall write. Ancient inscriptions vary in length, of course, the one on the rockface at Behistun being about three times as long as Deuteronomy. All the words. The phrase suggests that a written document was either in existence or was in process of preparation, from which a copy could be made on the stones. The inscription might have contained the contents of the Second Discourse, or an abstract of it. 4 Ebal. The valley, flanked by the twin slopes of Ebal and Gerizim, formed a natural amphitheatre eminently suitable for the occasion. See on 11:29. 5 No iron tool. See Ex. 20:25. Prohibiting iron tools would avoid all attempts at making graven images. 6 Unhewn (Heb. 'whole', from the same root as 'peace'). The expiation of sin results in peace and the renewal of the personality. 8 The stones; i.e. those of v. 4, not the rough stones of the altar. The laws were to be inscribed very plainly, presumably in large, clear script so that the words of the law could be read and understood easily. This provision presupposed a moderate degree of literacy amongst the Israelites. Many examples of ancient scripts have been recovered from Canaan, particularly from the Amarna age and somewhat later. 9, 10 This day. The obligations of fulfilling the divine commandments are now imposed, to be followed by the consequences of obedience and disobedience.

27:11–26 Curses

This particular element was an important part of Near Eastern international treaties, since it reminded the vassal of his fate were he to repudiate the stipulations in any way. 12 These shall stand. The tribes chosen for blessing were all descended from Leah or Rachel. Jewish interpreters regard this ceremony as antiphonal in nature, 14 with the Levitical priests speaking the curse and 15ff. the people responding in assent with Amen, 'so be it', a solemn affirmation to a preceding statement. Cursed. The inevitable result of divine holiness as applied to a particular mode of behaviour. The curses are twelve in number, corresponding to the twelve tribes. The second, fifth and sixth commandments are quoted; the remaining curses relate to serious breaches of honesty or purity. 24 In secret. Presumably by calumny. The sins are all such as might be committed privately, hence all the people are called upon to repudiate them openly. 26 Confirm. A comprehensive summary, making the law binding on each individual Israelite. Thus the people bind themselves under a curse (cf. Acts 23:12) to keep the whole law. Cf. Ne. 10:29; Gal. 3:10. Christ took this curse upon Himself (Gal. 3:13), thus setting the believer free.

28:1–14 Blessings

As with the curses, this section was also prominent in suzerainty treaties of the 2nd and 1st millennia BC. It generally came towards the end of the document, and enumerated the benefits accruing to the vassal if the covenant was kept. Pagan deities were normally adduced as witnesses to this end among the Ancient Near Eastern peoples. 1 Obey. Blessing for Israel was always contingent upon obedience. On the lips of Moses these utterances were warnings given in mercy, which, if they had been heeded, would have saved the Hebrew people from great misery. 3ff. Blessed. The benedictions are pronounced on the nation, the family and the individual, and cover Israel's life in city and field, offspring, crops, cattle, produce and daily bread. 9 Establish you. 'Raise up' (cf. Mk. 5:41), as in Dt. 18:15, 18, denoting the establishing of something new and abiding. 10 Called by the name of the Lord. See on 5:11. Thus the Israelites are His people, living under His protection (Pr. 18:10). The name of Yahweh was placed upon the sanctuary (Dt. 12:5), and in that name the Israelites were to swear (6:13), to bless (10:8) and to prophesy (18:19). It is abundantly clear from this section that the Israelites entered the land of Canaan armed with a defence against the fertility cults which were in existence there. God had promised to meet all the material and spiritual needs of His people under the forthcoming conditions of sedentary life, and in consequence it was unnecessary for them to follow the practices of Canaanite cult-worship in order to experience prosperity. This passage indicates that the God of Sinai was in fact a genuine fertility deity, but of a vastly different order from that of the cultic impostors of Canaan. For the Israelites, moral obedience to the covenant deity would constitute the guarantee of fertility and productivity.

28:15–68 Solemn curses

These represent the immediate counterpart of the foregoing blessings, indicating that God's laws have both an obverse and a reverse side. 15 Will not obey. Complete surrender to the will of God is always a necessary prerequisite to blessing. Unwillingness to obey the divine precepts can only result in disaster. 21 Pestilence. Any epidemic outbreak. 22 Smite you, with five plagues on human beings and two on the crops. 24 Powder. The sandstorms caused by the sirocco. 27 Boils of Egypt (AV 'botch'). A staphylococcal infection. 31 Before your eyes. While you are completely unable to prevent it. 36 Bring you. A startling prediction of the Exile. Cf. 2 Ki. 24:12–16. 50 Stern countenance; i.e. having no regard for compassion or humane treatment. 52 Shall besiege. The gruesome scenes here predicted (vv. 52–57) were accomplished in the sieges of Samaria (2 Ki. 6:28) and Jerusalem (La. 2:19–22). 58 Awful name; i.e. of awe-inspiring character. The following names of God in Deuteronomy should be noted: 'the living God' (5:26); 'the Lord, the God of your fathers' (6:3); the 'God of gods and Lord of lords' (10:17; cf. Rev. 19:16); 'the Rock . . . a God of faithfulness' (32:4); 'the Most High' (32:8); 'the eternal God' (33:27). Most commonly He is called 'the Lord your God'. 64 Will scatter. These prophetic words have been fulfilled several times in Jewish history from 722 BC onwards, and not least in the present century. 68 In ships. At the destruction of Jerusalem the Romans consigned many Jews into slavery, transporting a large number to Egypt by ship. The irony of captivity in Egypt had once again overtaken them (cf. Ho. 8:13).

29:1 – 31:8 Stipulations

29:1–29 Renewal of the covenant. The argument of earlier discourses is summarized in the form of stipulations, the covenant theme being prominent throughout. 1 The covenant. The original agreement made at Sinai was quickly broken. Now, at the end of his life, Moses calls for a new commitment of the people. The curses of the law can be offset by the blessings of obedience in the promised land. 4 A mind to understand. They did not possess sufficient spiritual insight to appreciate properly the mercies of God. In attributing such incapabilities to God, the Hebrew lawgiver is merely following OT traditions generally in relating everything to Him as the ultimate source or ground of existence. 5 Led you. God is here the speaker. Cf. 8:2–4. These words are quoted in Am. 2:10. 6 The desert discipline was the pathway to the knowledge of the Lord, which is the highest good. 10 All of you. The covenant of grace is all-embracing, from heads and elders (see on 19:12) to 11 little children and the menial slaves. Cf. Acts 2:21. 12 Enter into . . . covenant. See Gn. 17:7, 8. 16 The nations. A reference to their contacts with Edom, Ammon and Moab. 17 Idols (lit. 'inanimate blocks'). Moses, like other OT authors, invariably spoke of idols with scorn and derision. It is important to notice that, seen through Israelite eyes, the deities of pagan nations were always inanimate things. This view stood in stark contrast to that held by the devotees of such gods (cf. 1 Ki. 18:26ff.), who superstitiously attributed many exaggerated functions to them. For Moses, the deadness of the pagan deities only served to enhance the monotheistic faith associated with the Sinai covenant. 18 Beware. An ellipsis, the full form of which should read, 'I adjure you to enter into this oath and covenant, lest there be . . .' 19 The sweeping away of moist and dry alike (AV 'to add drunkenness to thirst', RV 'to destroy the moist with the dry'). Evidently a proverb, denoting an all-embracing form of destruction. 21 Written. Another of the many references in Deuteronomy to literary activity amongst the Hebrews of the Mosaic age. The curses are not only a warning but a testimony to the sure judgment of God upon those who despise His Word (cf. Heb. 10:29). 23 Admah . . . Zeboiim. Two of the cities of the plain, whose destruction became a synonym for divine judgment. Their association with Gaza (Gn. 10:19) suggests an original location at the S end of the Dead Sea. Cf. Ho. 8:1. 26 Not allotted. Another reminder that contact with pagan deities was absolutely prohibited to the Hebrews. 29 Secret things. Certain matters of eternal significance belong to God alone, while others are revealed to men. The law has been given for the obedience of Israel, and if the kingdom is sought in this way, everything else needful will be added (cf. Mt. 6:33). The verse can be better translated, 'The secret things belong to the Lord our God as well as the revealed things; for us and for our children it is requisite to carry out always all the words of this law.'

30:1–14 The power of repentance. Knowing the sinfulness of human nature and its inevitable consequences, Moses calls for repentance. This is closely associated with the covenant ideal, for the title the Lord your God occurs no fewer than twelve times in vv. 1–10. Moses stresses the nearness of the divine word, and the simplicity of faith. 3 Restore your fortunes (AV 'turn thy captivity'). Cf. Ne. 1:9, where vv. 2 and 3 are quoted. Gather you. In announcing the second advent, Christ united this with other prophecies and promises of the old dispensation (Mk. 13:26, 27). 4 Fetch you. The return from Babylon was made possible by the decree of Cyrus in 538 BC, and began under Zerubbabel. Zechariah (2:6, 7) prophesied a further influx. 6 Circumcise. God will transform the wills of His repentant people, bringing them once again into line with the covenant ideals. Circumcision was the outward token of membership in the covenant nation of Israel, and in the Christian church it was replaced by baptism. 10 Written. Not the 'secret things' (29:29), but the revelation of God. Moses refers to the latter as the voice of the Lord your God (cf. v. 8), thereby attesting to its inspiration and authority. We can therefore speak of this book confidently as the Word of God. 11 This day. This note of immediacy occurs more than 60 times in Deuteronomy. Cf. Heb. 4:7. Not too hard (AV 'not hidden'). Vv. 11–14 should be compared carefully with Rom. 10:5–8, where Paul expounds them of Jesus Christ, the incarnate Word. Moses stated that the word did not remain inaccessible in heaven, but was given to men in simple speech which they could understand. 13 Beyond the sea. As the word was not above them, so it was not beyond the horizon over the W sea. Paul varies the metaphor slightly to suit his purposes, but the general meaning is the same. 14 Very near you. The appeal to the will and intelligence (heart) is a marked feature of Deuteronomy, the word occurring some 34 times. It is the 'heart' that matters (Mt. 15:18), and when that is obedient to God in surrender, the blessings of His grace follow. (See on 4:29.)

30:15–20 The choice between life and death. 18 Over the Jordan. As the end approaches, Moses refers more frequently to the crossing of the river, an act in which he would not participate (see 31:2, 13; 32:47). 19 Heaven and earth. The unchanging cosmos, which outlasts human vicissitudes. Cf. 4:26. Choose life. One of the most precious spiritual blessings results from free human choice. 20 To Abraham. See on 1:8.

31:1–8 Transfer of leadership. 2 No longer able. At an advanced age Moses announced the approaching end of his leadership, placing the Israelites in the care of Joshua (v. 3) and his teaching office in the hands of the priests (v. 9). 3 Joshua. Having long since been made leader of the army (Ex. 17:9) and recently invested with a degree of Moses' own authority (Nu. 27:18–23), Joshua is now to receive his commission directly from the Lord (cf. vv. 14, 23). 6, 7 Be strong. Moses first exhorts the people, and then Joshua. See Jos. 1:6, 9, and cf. Eph. 6:10. 8 Goes before you. God will lead His people as in earlier days, so Joshua must be confident of success.

31:9–30 DEPOSITION OF THE LAW

31:9–13, 24–26 Deposit of text

In Ancient Near Eastern suzerainty treaties there was invariably a clause which required that the treaty document should be in the deposit of the vassal, and should be read publicly at intervals to remind the vassal of his obligations. Here Moses, having committed the law to the care of the Levites, enjoins that it shall be read periodically to the assembled people. 9 Moses wrote. These words, and the phrase 'Moses wrote this song' in v. 22, are the only explicit statements in this book as to what Moses himself wrote (cf. Nu. 33:2). The phrases, 'these are the words' (1:1; 29:1), 'this is the law' (4:44), 'this is the blessing' (33:1), may be the work of a compiler who was attempting to arrange the source material, but there can be no certainty about this. While it may also be very difficult to decide precisely which words Moses did or did not write with his own hand, there can be absolutely no question whatever as to the essentially contemporary nature of the record, and thus of the basic Mosaicity of Deuteronomy. This law. All indications are that Moses intended in his own lifetime to make a record of divine law which should be permanent. Cf. the contrast between 'his writings' and 'my words' in Jn. 5:47.

24 The very end. The first command to Moses to write occurs in Ex. 17:14, and this is the last reference to his activity in this field. From early times Jewish tradition has included the whole Pentateuch in the 'book of the law'. 25 Levites. See on 18:1. 26 Put it. The whole law-code, containing the Sinai covenant and the covenant in the plains of Moab (29:1), was deposited beside the sacred ark, inside which were the tablets containing the foundation principles of the Sinai covenant.

31:14, 15 Joshua commissioned

14 The tent of meeting (AV 'tabernacle of the congregation'; Heb. 'ōhel mô'ēd). Used in Ex. 33:7 of a structure based on the pattern of a simple desert shrine which antedated the Tabernacle proper and was pitched outside the encampment with Joshua as its sole attendant (Ex. 33:11). The word miškān was commonly used for the Tabernacle as such. 15 Appeared. The cloudy pillar which had accompanied them through their wanderings (Ex. 33:9) now reappears as God speaks 'face to face' with Moses for the last time.

31:16–23, 27–30 Witnesses to the covenant

In secular international treaties the invocation of deities as witnesses to the treaty was an important element in the process of ratification. Here God commands that His witness to Himself shall be attested by means of a song which would perpetuate the covenant concepts and serve as a continuing witness. 16 Where they go. The people among whom the Hebrews were to live would beguile them by means of immoral pagan cultic practices. 19 Write this song. The verb is in the plural, since both Moses and Joshua were to write it (cf. 32:44). A witness. God has two witnesses to the covenant, i.e. the written law and the song. 21 I know the purposes. God's foreknowledge encompasses the evil tendencies of human nature. Cf. Gn. 6:5; Jn. 2:25. 22 The same day. In the Ancient Near East, anything of importance was committed to writing within a short period of its occurrence. This is an explicit claim to Mosaic authorship of the song. 29 In the days to come. Cf. Gn. 49:1; Nu. 24:14. Such apostasy became widespread in the judges' period (cf. Jdg. 2:11–16; 3:7). A similar prediction for the Christian church was made by Paul in 2 Tim. 3:1. 30 Finished. The commencement and ending of the writing, first of the book (v. 24) and then of the song (v. 30), are noted carefully.

32:1–43 MOSES' SONG AS A WITNESS TO THE COVENANT

At the crossing of the yam sûp̄, Moses sang to the Lord (Ex. 15:1), and he ended his ministry to God with another hymn of joy within sight of the promised land. Both compositions anticipate the glorious future consequent upon the wilderness experience. The theme of this song is the name of the Lord, His loving care for people, His righteousness and His mercy. These are contrasted with the ingratitude and faithlessness of Israel, and the nature of divine justice is emphasized throughout. 2 Gentle rain, needed by young grass for its steady growth. 3 I will proclaim. The revelation of the name and attributes of God to Moses at the time of his call (Ex. 3:13–15) fully accounts for his concern and enthusiasm for the name. 4 The Rock. This word is repeated in vv. 13, 15, 18, 30, 31, 37. Here it denotes God's eternal strength and stability as a refuge for frail men. A God of faithfulness. True to His own word and promise. Iniquity. Better, 'injustice'. 5 Blemish. The text presents some problems, and could read, '. . . . who are not His sons, but a disgrace'. The meaning seems to be that the iniquity of Israel is no necessary reflection upon the nature and quality of divine goodness. 6 Your father. While all men are God's creatures in a general sense, only the redeemed are true children of God (Jn. 1:12). 8 The peoples. The song recalls the teaching of Gn. 10 and 11. In Gn. 10, all nations were included in the covenant of grace, and their boundaries were assigned to them. In ch. 11, however, they were 'separated' as the result of pride. This dilemma was resolved when Israel was chosen to be the means of God's blessing to the world. Cf. Rom. 11:25; Eph. 2:11–18. 10 Found him. This and subsequent verses depict the tenderness of divine love for Israel. The apple of his eye, i.e. the pupil of the eye, upon which sight so greatly depends. 11 An eagle. A reference to the traditional solicitude of this bird for its young. The parent eagle, in teaching her young to fly, protects them and encourages them to imitate her own movements. Thus the calling, training and protection of Israel are all depicted in this figure of speech. 13 Honey out of the rock. Not the alcoholic drink known popularly amongst the ancients as 'honey', but the natural product of the bees. The countless fissures and crevices of the dry limestone rocks supported many small flowering plants well suited to the needs of bees. 15 Jeshurun. A poetical title honouring Israel, rendered 'beloved' in the LXX. 16 Strange gods. In view of Israel's calling to be a witness to Jehovah and His holy ways, her separation from idolatry was of vital importance. 17 Sacrificed to demons. Cf. Ps. 106:37; 1 Cor. 10:20. New gods. Upstart deities imported from pagan nations. 21 Stirred me to jealousy. Quoted in Rom. 10:19. The divine 'jealousy', like the divine 'provocation', always has as its aim to recall God's people to their Creator and Lord. No god. Lit. 'with a no-god . . . with a no-people'. The thought is repeated in Ho. 1:9. 31 Our Rock . . . our enemies. In vv. 28–33 Moses speaks in his own person and longs for Israel to consider and understand God's dealings with them. Their enemies are instruments which He uses to accomplish His purposes (cf. Is. 10:5). Constant victory is God's will for His people, and though He may be constrained to deliver them into the power of their enemies, He can also rescue and restore them. 32 The vine of Sodom. The heathen are compared to a vine whose stock comes from Sodom and Gomorrah, cities synonymous in antiquity with gross wickedness. 35 Vengeance is mine. Quoted in Rom. 12:19; Heb. 10:30. 39 I, even I. The song reaches a climax in its assertion of the absolute sovereignty of God. 40 I lift up my hand, betokening a solemn declaration (cf. Rev. 10:5). 43 Praise his people. This verse is quoted verbatim from the LXX in Rom. 15:10. The song, like the Apocalypse, uses the imagery of the battlefield to picture the awesomeness of divine judgment, but having done this it calls on the Gentiles to rejoice with His restored and pardoned people.

32:44 – 33:29 FINAL CHARGE AND FAREWELL

32:44–47 Last exhortation of Moses

44 This song. The antiquity of this composition is being recognized increasingly by modern scholarship. Joshua (AV, RV 'Hoshea', Heb. Hôšēa', 'salvation'). The original name of Joshua, which was changed by Moses (Nu. 13:8, 16). The occurrence of his original name in the Hebrew suggests that it was still the name by which he was commonly known. 46 Lay to heart. The duty of forthcoming generations to keep the covenant is again stressed. 47 This is no empty responsibility, but one of the greatest importance for the future welfare of the nation.

32:48–52 Moses warned of his impending death

The special notice of time (v. 48) and place (vv. 49–51) suggests a contemporary narrative. 49 The Abarim. The plural of a word meaning 'across' or 'beyond', referring to the mountainous range in NW Moab overlooking the N end of the Dead Sea. Cf. Nu. 21:11; 27:12. Nebo. The summit of the range known as Abarim; according to local Muslim tradition it can be identified with Jebel Osha. 51 Meribath-kadesh. There is a play on the root of kadesh, which means 'holy', and is reproduced in the word for revere (AV 'sanctify'). Moses is prepared to bear his share of the responsibility for the act of apostasy (Nu. 20:10–13; 27:14), even to the very end.

33:1–29 Final blessing

1 His death. Cf. Gn. 25:8; 49:33. The wording may imply that the verse was an editorial addition, perhaps written at the death of Moses or shortly thereafter, to introduce the content of the benediction. Archaeological discoveries in Mesopotamia have shown the authentic nature of the patriarchal blessings found in Genesis. While the Mosaic benediction is a prophetical utterance of prayer and praise, it follows the tradition of Jacob's blessing (Gn. 49:1–27) in declaring poetically the favour of God as bestowed upon each individual tribe. The omission of Simeon here may be deliberate (perhaps in an attempt to maintain the number of the tribes at twelve; but see on v. 6), but this is not a serious matter, since the Simeonites were gradually absorbed into the tribe of Judah. Whereas the song (ch. 32) is an admonition, the benediction foreshadows a bright and prosperous future for Israel. The man of God. Cf. Jos. 14:6; Ps. 90 (title). The title was occasionally applied to the prophets (e.g. 1 Sa. 9:6). Here it means 'the godly man'. 2 Shone forth. The giving of the law is likened to the fiery glow of an eastern sunrise, dispelling the darkness with its bright beams. Holy ones. Better, 'from the holy myriads'. The LXX reads 'angels' for 'holy ones'. Cf. Ps. 68:17; Acts 7:53. The rendering flaming fire is uncertain, and AV 'fiery law' gives a better sense. 3 They followed. The meaning of this word is uncertain. AV has 'sat down'. Perhaps the reference is to pupils seated at the feet of the teacher, ready to receive instruction. 4 Moses. Perhaps this phrase is an explanatory insertion, of the kind possibly represented by v. 1. Possession. Better, 'heritage'. 5 The Lord became king. A conjectural emendation of the Hebrew text. Better, 'there was a king over Jeshurun'. In this way God's kingdom of Israel has its true beginning, Jeshurun being a poetic name for the Israelites (see on 32:15; cf. Is. 44:2).

6 Reuben. In the order of the tribes the children of Leah and Rachel have precedence, followed by those of their handmaidens. There is a reference to the diminished number of this tribe through the rebellion of Dathan and Abiram (Nu. 16:1–30). Codex A of the LXX makes this verse read, 'Let Reuben live and not die, and Simeon, may he be many in number.'

7 Judah. It has been suggested that this verse may have come originally immediately after v. 10, and had become displaced in transmission. Aside from the fact that this would be rather unusual in a poetic composition of this kind, such a situation would imply that v. 11 also belonged to the blessing of Judah.

8 Levi. Moses' own tribe, hence the benediction is full and detailed. Thummim . . . Urim. These seem to have been objects kept in the high priest's breastplate (Ex. 28:30; Lv. 8:8), which was a pouch fastened to the ephod. By them the priest could declare God's will both to leader (Nu. 27:21) and to people (Dt. 33:8, 10). They were not mentioned after the early monarchy, and prophecy seemed to make them unnecessary. Once prophecy ceased, their use was revived (cf. Ezr. 2:63; Ne. 7:65). From the nature of the questions in 1 Sa. 23:9–12, it would appear that consulting the Urim and Thummim was a form of casting lots. This might well be the case if Urim was derived from 'ārar, 'to curse' (i.e. a negative reply) and Thummim from tāmam, 'to be perfect' (i.e. a positive response), but the facts of the matter are rather uncertain. 9 Of his father and mother. Family interests must not be allowed to sway the priest in the discharge of his religious duties (cf. Ex. 32:27–29). Observed thy word. The priests and Levites were charged with the preservation of the law and the instruction of the people (31:9). 11 Bless . . . his substance. See on v. 7. The loins. The locale of physical strength.

12 Benjamin. The meaning of this verse may be that Jehovah, like a shepherd, carried a favoured animal on His shoulders (cf. Lk. 15:5). Since this latter word was used in Jos. 15:8 to denote the side of the hill on which the Jebusite stronghold of Jerusalem was situated, it may here be an allusion to the fact that the permanent shrine of Israel was to be in Benjamite territory.

13 Joseph. The promise of 'choicest fruits' was fulfilled each spring in the fruit-laden valleys of Ephraim and Manasseh. 16 The favour of him that dwelt in the bush. The reference is to the burning bush of Ex. 3:2. Prince among his brothers. The idea of pre-eminence is strongly marked here. 17 Horns of a wild ox (AV 'unicorns'). A species of buffalo (rᵉ'ēm) now extinct, and used as a synonym of enormous strength (Jb. 39:9–11).

18 Zebulun is assured of success in his commercial dealings (going out). Issachar is promised prosperity in domestic and agricultural pursuits (in your tents).

20 Gad. Swiftness and strength were needed for this tribe of mountain-dwellers who lived in Transjordan in the former Amorite territory of Sihon. 21 A commander's portion (AV 'a portion of the lawgiver', RV mg. 'a ruler's portion'). Presumably a choice area of land worthy of a martial leader. He came, namely to the help of the western tribes in the battle for Canaan (Nu. 32:31, 32).

22 Dan. In Gn. 49:17 Dan was compared with a serpent for subtlety. Here he is spoken of as a young agile lion, and both images describe aptly the adventurous spirit characterizing the tribe of Dan. The land of Bashan was well known in antiquity for the size and strength of its cattle (Dt. 32:14).

23 Naphtali. To this tribe was assigned the beautiful and fertile land W and S of the Sea of Galilee.

24 Asher. The territory of Asher was famous for its olives, which grew in great profusion. 25 Your bars. Although Asher's territory was in the N, it would be given strong protection from its political enemies. As your days, so shall your strength be. This beautiful promise has brought comfort and blessing to every succeeding generation of believers (cf. Mt. 28:20).

26 None like God, O Jeshurun. The AV rendering, 'none like unto the God of Jeshurun', is to be preferred here, for God is being praised in His position as the God of Israel. He is above, beneath, before and around His people. The concept of a God who rides through the heavens is found in Ugaritic poetry also. 27 The eternal God. We too partake of eternal life as we find our permanent abode in Him. Underneath are the everlasting arms. Another promise of distinctive beauty, indicating the inexhaustible resources of God for the believer. 28 Dwelt in safety . . . alone. Once again the Hebrew people are reminded of their pastoral ideal of 'every man under his vine and under his fig tree' (Mi. 4:4; Zc. 3:10). 29 Your enemies shall come fawning (AV 'shall be found liars', AV mg. 'shall be subdued', RV 'shall submit themselves', RV mg. 'yield feigned obedience'). The general allusion seems to be to the insincere homage given by the vanquished to the victor. The final note is one of victory through the protective shield and conquering sword of the Lord. High places. The rendering 'backs' suits the context better. With these lofty sentiments Moses took formal leave of the Israelites, whose interests and aspirations he had nurtured for so long. Had the nation continued in this spirit of promise, its history and its influence in the world would have been very different.

34:1–8 DEATH OF MOSES

1 Moses went up. The writer records Moses' last act of obedience as he goes up to the appointed place on a rocky height (32:49). All but two of his own generation had passed away, and his mission was now accomplished. But before he dies, his prayer to see the land is granted. There is great beauty and pathos in this verse. Moses next appears in sacred history on another mountain, again speaking 'face to face' with his Lord (Mk. 9:2–4). Pisgah. The word denotes any jagged ridge, and would describe aptly the mountain's highest peak, Jebel Osha, as seen from beneath (see on 32:49). 1–3 All the land. The view seen from Jebel Osha on a clear day agrees exactly with this description in every detail, from snow-capped Hermon, Galilee, the Mount of Olives, Bethlehem, to the Dead Sea and beyond. 5 The servant of the Lord. Cf. Heb. 3:5. Moses was in many respects a model servant, in death as well as in life. Died there. God was true to His promise that Moses would never cross into the land of Canaan. 6 He buried him in the valley. In some depression on the mountain range close to the summit, according to Muslim tradition. As is the case with so many other important personages in Scripture, the actual location of the burial-place is unknown. The personality of the human servant is consistently effaced in order that the glory might be given to God (cf. Jn. 3:30). 7 A hundred and twenty. In Ancient Egypt the epitaph 'he died aged one hundred and ten' was the highest accolade which could be bestowed upon an individual of outstanding character and practical ability, whatever his precise chronological age at the time of death (cf. Gn. 50:26; Jos. 24:29; Jdg. 2:8). By these standards Moses had led an unusually rich, productive and beneficial life. 8 Thirty days. The same period of mourning as had been appointed for Aaron (Nu. 20:29).

34:9–12 CONCLUSION

This section is obviously post-Mosaic, and was probably the work of either Eleazar or Joshua himself. There seems little doubt that it was a proper part of Deuteronomy within a generation or two after the death of Moses at the very latest. 9 Full of the spirit of wisdom. Cf. Ex. 28:3. The Holy Spirit, who spoke by the prophets, was present in both Moses and Joshua. Moses had laid his hands upon him. Cf. Gn. 48:14; Nu. 27:18; Acts 13:3. Blessing, commissioning and the conferring of spiritual gifts were all symbolized by the imposition of hands. 10 There has not arisen a prophet since. Whatever prophets may have arisen before this phrase was written, none was equal to Moses in the ways specified, nor were there any afterwards until the coming of the One whom Moses foretold (18:15). As a prophet Moses led the people (Ho. 12:13), delivered to them the revelation committed to him (Dt. 29:29) and pointed them to their future Messiah (18:15). Face to face. See Ex. 33:11. 12 For all the mighty power. Not only in word did God work through Moses, but in deeds which were never to be forgotten. The signs and wonders wrought in Egypt constituted an important element in the larger stream of redemptive history for the most significant of all acts of deliverance accomplished by Christ on Calvary.

R. K. HARRISON

Joshua

INTRODUCTION

It has been said that the history of the world is the history of its great men. To be applied to history as a whole, that statement would require considerable qualification, but it can be set down as an accurate description of the kind of history to be found in the book of Joshua, which, quite literally, is Joshua's book. It begins with his divine call and commission, and it ends with the record of his death. It is his leadership under God that binds the story of Israel's conquest of Canaan into a coherent whole.

THE MAN AND HIS TASK

Many things marked Joshua out for leadership. He was of the house of Joseph, which commanded most authority at this stage in the history of Israel; his grandfather, Elishama, had led the tribe of Ephraim through the wilderness and possibly had had the care of the embalmed body of his great ancestor, Joseph, carried up for interment in the promised land. His contact with Egyptian civilization and culture—for he was born in Egypt and had taken part in the Exodus (Nu. 32:11f.)—also fitted him, as it had fitted Moses, for the task of forging his people into a nation. It is significant in this connection that one of his last appeals in his final message to the people reminded them how their fathers had served other gods in Egypt (Jos. 24:14). As Moses' personal attendant and colleague in closest contact with him in the leadership of the people, Joshua had been naturally marked out as his successor, and he must have learned much from his master and from his own experience during the years of wandering in the wilderness. As Moses' companion at Sinai (Ex. 24:13), and as superintendent of the tent of meeting (Ex. 33:11), his leadership had already been manifested and acknowledged.

His faith and courage had been amply revealed in the minority report submitted by Caleb and himself in favour of an invasion of Canaan from Kadesh, in contrast to the timid report of the other ten spies: 'If the Lord delights in us, he will bring us into this land and give it to us' (Nu. 14:8).

He had also already shown his prowess as a military commander in leading the forces of Israel which repelled the attack of the Amalekites at Rephidim, when they fell upon the rear of the Hebrew host, which was encumbered with women, children and baggage (Dt. 25:18). He won a decisive victory, and his generalship was the human channel through which came the answer to the prayers of Moses on the mountain-top (Ex. 17:8ff.). This was the man, so highly qualified by nature, by training and by experience, whom God raised up to lead the Hebrew tribes into Canaan. But his supreme qualification lay in the fact that all his gifts, training and experience were fused into a dynamic force by the touch of God. It was at the call of God that all his potentialities were called forth, and that call brought to the leadership of Israel a man assured of his divine commission; it summoned to the task a soldier who had put on the whole armour of God.

AUTHORSHIP AND AUTHENTICITY

Any consideration of the composition of the book of Joshua must take into account its position in the Hebrew Canon. From one point of view it looks back: the promise made to Abraham finds fulfilment in the conquest of Canaan, and Joshua marks the climax of all the history which has gone before. This viewpoint is reflected in the traditional criticism which sees Joshua as a continuation of the Pentateuch, and links the six books together as a Hexateuch. According to this view, the same basic sources, J, E, D, P, are found in Joshua as in the Pentateuch, with J, E and D found in chs. 1–12, and P in the latter half of the book, dealing with the delineation of the tribes. This traditional critical view has been modified in several directions, perhaps most significantly in a tendency to explain the alleged conflict between sources not by a long chronological evolution—this has been discredited by archaeology—but by the existence of various circles of oral tradition in different places and with different spheres of interest. E. J. Young (An Introduction to the Old Testament, 1958) gives compelling reasons for rejecting the concept of a Hexateuch: one of the most important of these is the clear distinction drawn in Hebrew tradition between the Pentateuch and the Early Prophets, at the head of which stands Joshua.

From a second point of view Joshua looks forward: the conquest marks not an end but a beginning, the beginning of the history of Israel in her national homeland. This viewpoint is reflected in the theory which sees the book as part of a great historical literary unit stretching from the time of Moses to the Babylonian Exile. Martin Noth, followed to a large extent by John Bright in IB and by many modern scholars, represents this assessment of the forward-looking nature of Joshua and maintains that not only Joshua but also Deuteronomy must be separated from the Pentateuch and the sources which have been identified in it, and linked with Judges – 2 Kings. Noth holds that this history, reflecting the prophetic insistence that continued national well-being depends on implicit obedience to the commands of God, was the work of a compiler who put together a mass of material from various sources. Among these was the Deuteronomic code (Dt. 4:44 – 30:20): this was the theological basis of the whole history, and, accordingly, the compiler has been called the Deuteronomic historian, D. Noth finds much material in Joshua that on his reckoning is pre-D, and is not JE. Jos. 1–12, e.g., consisted of a series of aetiological legends, i.e. legends which grew up to explain the origin of some landmark or custom, and a few hero-legends. This aetiological method has been justifiably criticized when it is unsupported by any external evidence. (See J. Bright, Early Israel in Recent History Writing, 1956.)

Noth's view has proved to be a healthy reaction against the traditional criticism. Particularly valuable is his insistence that chs. 13–21 are not P, the product of a post-exilic priestly idealization of the land allocation as it should have been. But his basic assumptions are no more acceptable than those of earlier criticism. While there was certainly editing of the sources used in the compilation of Joshua—one of these sources, the Book of Jashar, is named in Jos. 10:13—there is no evidence that the sources of this section of the OT have, as Noth supposes, been freely worked over by a Deuteronomic editor, who has recast the material to reflect the theological standpoint of the prophets. Further, like earlier criticism, his view takes no account of the traditional division of the Hebrew Bible and the distinction between the Law and the Early Prophets. Again, he seems to ignore the basic form of Deuteronomy, whose structure shows a remarkable resemblance to the literary pattern of the Ancient Near Eastern treaties or covenants of the mid-second millennium BC. This unmistakable resemblance confirms the early date of Deuteronomy, as against Noth's dating in the 6th century BC. (For the covenant pattern, see Jos. 8:30–35 and chs. 23, 24.)

Jewish tradition has consistently ascribed the bulk of the book of Joshua to Joshua himself, though the author is nowhere identified in the Bible. Some facts which suggest a date for the composition of the book nearly contemporary with Joshua are the following. a. The author was apparently an eyewitness of some of the events described. E.g., the text of 5:1, as in AV, reads 'until we were passed over'. This may not be decisive, since some MSS, the Massoretic editors and the versions read, as RSV, 'until they had passed over'. But there does not seem to be the same textual doubt in 5:6, which reads 'which the Lord had sworn to their fathers to give us'. The pronoun 'your' in 15:4 suggests autobiographical writing. b. The frequent use of the phrase 'to this day' and the context in which it occurs suggest an early date. Note 6:25, which suggests that Rahab was still alive, though the phrase may refer to her descendants rather than to her personally. But undoubtedly 15:63 points to a pre-Davidic date (cf. 2 Sa. 5:6f.), and 16:10 to a pre-Solomonic date (cf. 1 Ki. 9:16), though it can be argued that the language used would have been inappropriate before the monarchy had been established. c. There are internal evidences of an early date: references to 'Great Sidon' (Jos. 11:8; 19:28) alongside 'Tyre' and to the Phoenicians as 'Sidonians' (13:4–6) suggest a date earlier than the 12th century BC, when Tyre became the foremost Phoenician city; the use of a stone or a cairn of stones, like the stones commemorating the crossing of the Jordan, the cairn over Achan's body, and those at the graves of the kings of Ai and other towns, to mark outstanding events suggests an early period in Israel's history; the Philistines have obviously not yet become a major menace to the Israelites, as they did after 1200 BC, according to Egyptian records; in 11:22 it is the Anakim, not the Philistines, who inhabit cities that later were Philistine—Gaza, Gath and Ashdod; and the list of the inhabitants of the land in 12:8 does not include the Philistines.

There are, however, other references which suggest a date later than the time of Joshua, the most obvious being the reference to his death in 24:29, 30. There are also references to events which did not occur until after Joshua's death: e.g., the conquest of Hebron by Caleb (15:13, 14; cf. Jdg. 1:10, 20). It can be argued, however, that the phrase 'after the death of Joshua', in Jdg. 1:1, refers only to part of the chapter, vv. 1–9, 16–19, that the rest of the chapter is undated, and that, consequently, 1:10–15, 20 could belong to the time of Joshua. (See K. A. Kitchen, Ancient Orient and Old Testament, 1966, p. 66.) Similarly, while the capture of Debir by Othniel appears to be subsequent to the southern campaign of Joshua (Jos. 15:15–19; cf. Jdg. 1:11–15), it may be argued, as by Kitchen (ibid.), that 'Debir was smitten twice by the Hebrews; once during Joshua's flying campaign, and a second time by Caleb and the Judahites beginning a permanent settlement'.

The migration of the Danites to Laish, described in detail in Jdg. 17, 18, is summarized in Jos. 19:47, where Leshem stands instead of Laish. If this was due to pressure by the Philistines, as is generally supposed, it might be taken as indicating a later date for at least this part of Joshua, when the Philistines had become a threat to Israel. But the reference to Jonathan in Jdg. 18:30 as the grandson of Moses suggests that it may not have been so much later than Joshua's time after all.

On all the evidence, therefore, it seems that while nothing really definite can be said about the authorship and date of the book, there is considerable support for the view that the sources from which it is derived were contemporary with the events described, and that the book took its form at an early date. It is significant that recent writers are much more willing than were writers of an earlier day to accept the historical value of the materials to be found in Joshua. Archaeological research has done much to confirm the authenticity of the history that we have here. Excavations have established conclusively that several important cities of Canaan were destroyed in the latter half of the 13th century BC, the probable period of the Israelite conquest. The excavations at Bethel (mod. Beitin), Lachish (mod. Tell ed-Duweir), Eglon (mod. Tell el-Hesi?), Debir (mod. Tell Beit Mirsim), Hazor (mod. Tell el-Qedah) have provided evidence of violent conflagrations at this time. Heavy layers of ash tell something of the completeness of the devastation, and the location of the towns excavated, in the centre, the south and the north of the land, confirms the biblical account of Joshua's campaigns as striking fiercely in those areas. Further, archaeology's assessment of the age and historical significance of the lists of cities and boundaries in Jos. 13–21 would put their date very much earlier than writers of the Wellhausen school were prepared to do. W. F. Albright, e.g. (Archaeology of Palestine, 1949, p. 229), writes, 'A good case in point is the list of Levitic cities in Josh. xxi and 1 Chron. vi, which Wellhausen, followed by most subsequent critics, considered an artificial product of some post-exilic scribe's imagination. Careful examination of this list in the light of all known archaeological facts makes it quite certain that the list is much more ancient.' Basing his argument on the ground that not one of the cities in Jos. 21 was founded after 950 BC, Albright writes, 'A date between about 975 and about 950 BC may thus be fixed for the extant form of the list, which seems to have had a prehistory going back to the Conquest' (op. cit., p. 230). G. E. Wright confirms Albright's view, and is prepared to go further. 'In my opinion', he writes in an essay on 'Present State of Biblical Archaeology' in The Study of the Bible Today and Tomorrow (1947), 'the same can be held for the list of tribal cities and perhaps even for the boundaries in Jos. xv–xix. . . . If this is the case, then there is no reason whatsoever to ascribe these lists in Joshua to the priestly writers of the post-Exilic period.' It is clear that recent archaeological study is not prepared to accept these lists as an idealization produced by a post-exilic writer. It must be emphasized, however, that the truth of the Bible is not dependent on the confirmation of archaeological research. As Donald J. Wiseman has written (Revelation and the Bible, 1959, p. 316), 'Ultimately the truth or "confirmation" of the Old Testament rests in God and does not depend on the human science of archaeology, valuable though it is.'

THE DATE OF ISRAEL'S CONQUEST

It is now widely accepted that the Exodus took place c. 1280 BC, and that the conquest of Canaan was therefore c. 1240 BC, though it should be recognized that there is some difficulty in fitting all the data supplied by the biblical records and by archaeological research into a precise chronology.

Biblical data to be taken into account include the following. a. In Gn. 15:13 it was predicted to Abraham that his descendants should be sojourners in an alien land for 400 years. Similarly, Ex. 12:40 gives the time that Israel dwelt in Egypt as 430 years. The date of the patriarchs, however, can be no more than conjectural, though recent study of the patriarchal era in its context suggests c. 1700 BC as a likely date for Israel's going down into Egypt. This would give a date in the 13th century or thereabouts for the Exodus. b. In Jdg. 11:26 Jephthah speaks of Israel's dwelling in Transjordan for 300 years before his time. Jephthah's date, too, must be conjectural, though, coming late in the period of the judges, it has been set c. 1100 BC. This would give a date c. 1400 BC for the conquest. c. 1 Ki. 6:1 states specifically that the fourth year of Solomon's reign was the 480th year after the people of Israel came out of the land of Egypt. Since the fourth year of Solomon's reign was c. 960 BC, this gives a date of c. 1440 BC for the Exodus and c. 1400 for the conquest.

There are, however, other biblical figures which appear to give a period considerably less than the 480 years of 1 Ki. 6:1. A comparison of Nu. 1:7 and Ru. 4:20ff. suggests that Nahshon, who belonged to the period of the Exodus, was separated from Solomon by only six generations. It is probable that here we have an incomplete genealogy: this is borne out by the fact that 1 Ch. 6:3–8, 50–52 gives ten generations between Aaron and Zadok, who was high priest in Solomon's reign. But even ten generations could not span the period in 1 Ki. 6:1. Again, Gn. 36:31ff. gives a list of eight kings who reigned over Edom before the time of Saul, and one of these was reigning in the time of Moses (Nu. 20:14). The reigns of at most eight kings could not conceivably stretch to 480 years. Further, in the story of the migration of the Danites in Jdg. 18, Micah's priest, Jonathan, is described as the grandson of Moses, according to the true reading (RSV as against AV). If, as is generally supposed, the Danite migration was due to pressure by the Philistines, who were not aggressively active until about 1200 BC, this gives an approximate date for Moses again in the 13th century, and suggests that the period from Moses to Solomon could not have been more than about 300 years.

The biblical data seem to suggest two possible dates for the conquest—a date in the 15th century BC (supported by 1 Ki. 6:1 and possibly by Jephthah's 300 years) and a date in the 13th century (supported in the main by the other passages cited). It is partly on these grounds that H. H. Rowley (From Joseph to Joshua, 1950) makes a synthesis of both possibilities and argues for two entries into Canaan—one in the Amarna age and one at the time of Joshua. Involved in this theory is the supposition that some tribes were already in Palestine before the time of Joshua, and possibly some were never in Egypt at all. But the biblical evidence is entirely opposed to this view: there is nowhere in the Bible any explicit evidence of more than one Exodus or for any tribes not having been in Egypt. All the explicit evidence points the other way, and the book of Joshua adds its weight to the evidence that all of Jacob's sons entered Egypt and that all their descendants, the twelve tribes, shared in the Exodus and the conquest. The twelve stones of the memorials at the Jordan, and the allocation of the land among twelve tribes are eloquent testimony that it was a united people, composed of all the twelve tribes, who took possession of the land. K. A. Kitchen (op. cit., pp. 70f.) has shown conclusively that the evidence adduced from extra-biblical sources for Rowley's view is quite illusory, and that the placing of Simeon and Levi's attack on Shechem in the Amarna age is similarly contrary to fact. The chronological problems of the conquest cannot be solved by Rowley's synthesis.

Before attempting a synthesis of the biblical data, it may be helpful to summarize the archaeological evidence. This suggests for the most part that the conquest should be dated in the 13th century BC. The following findings are relevant. a. Ex. 1:8–11 records that the people of Israel were forced to labour in the building of Pithom and Ra'amses. The city of Ra'amses was rebuilt under the pharaohs Sethos I (c. 1302–1290 BC) and Rameses II (c. 1290–1224 BC), after whom it was named. The Exodus, therefore, is best dated after the accession of Rameses II. b. A stele of victory set up by Merenptah c. 1220 BC indicates that the Israelites were already in Palestine, though possibly not yet as a settled community. This would give a date for the conquest some years before 1220 BC. c. Nelson Glueck's explorations in Transjordan suggest that the Israelites could not have left Egypt before 1300 BC, since Nu. 20, 21 indicate that they encountered Edom and Moab in the wilderness, and neither of these two kingdoms was established before that time. d. Excavations have dated the destruction of Canaanite cities, e.g. Lachish, Debir, Bethel, Hazor, in the second half of the 13th century. Excavations at Jericho, which might have been expected to yield decisive information on the conquest, have proved inconclusive. John Garstang's work at Jericho had convinced him that Jericho fell c. 1400 BC, but more recent work by Kathleen Kenyon suggests that he was mistaken, and that the destruction which he associated with Joshua occurred several centuries earlier. Identification of the Hebrews with the Habiru of the Amarna letters, which had been taken to support an early date for the conquest, has been similarly discounted by more recent study.

It seems, therefore, that the present assessment of the archaeological data takes it as supporting a 13th-century date. The problem remaining is how to reconcile 1 Ki. 6:1 and the date derived from Jephthah with this, and, more urgently—for archaeology is neither inspired nor infallible—with the other biblical data referred to above, relating to the number of generations between the time of the Exodus and the reign of Solomon and between Moses and the migration of the Danites in Jdg. 18. Jephthah's 300 years, as suggested by K. A. Kitchen (op. cit., pp. 74f.), 'could . . . be an aggregate of partly concurrent periods', and, in any case, the dating of Jephthah c. 1100 is largely conjectural (see further TOTC Judges, 1968, pp. 28–34). 1 Ki. 6:1 provides a more difficult problem. There are the faintest of grounds for suspecting the text in this passage: some MSS of the LXX read 'four hundred and forty years'. This does not help in the computing of the dates, but it lends some credibility to the suggestion that at some stage 'four hundred and eighty years' was written for 'twelve generations'. There is evidence that 40 years came to be a conventional way of thinking of a generation: Israel spent 40 years in the wilderness until the generation that had left Egypt had died. If, then, the 480 years of 1 Ki. 6:1 can be taken as representing twelve generations, and if a generation (from the birth of father to the birth of son) can be taken more accurately as about 25 years, we are left with a period of 300 years for the interval between the conquest and Solomon, and arrive at a date for the conquest in the 13th century.

THE MORAL PROBLEM IN ISRAEL'S WARFARE

The indiscriminate extermination of the Canaanites recorded in the book of Joshua has proved a stumbling-block to many who accept the divine inspiration of the scriptural record. Can we believe that God really commanded the Israelites utterly to destroy the inhabitants of the land? If He did, is such a revelation of His character consistent with the revelation of the Father that Christ has given us?

Modern criticism has two ways of cutting the Gordian knot. Some maintain that the accounts of the extermination of the Canaanites were written long after the events which they profess to describe, and that they give an ideal picture of what later ages considered should have happened if the worship of Yahweh was to be kept pure. In other words, the atrocities described never really happened. Others assert that the revelation of God that we have in the early religious history of Israel is His revelation of Himself limited by the capacity of those who had to receive it, and that the conception of His commanding the destruction of the Canaanites represents a very primitive stage of religious development.

In our consideration of the authorship and authenticity of Joshua we have already given reasons for dismissing the former of these two explanations; the latter now demands some attention. The theory holds that the Israelites of this period mistakenly thought of Yahweh as their tribal God, who naturally commanded the destruction of His people's enemies. Later revelation (e.g. the book of Jonah) was to show that God had purposes of love and mercy for nations outside the commonwealth of Israel, and so the earlier revelation was transcended. But this theory, however inviting it may seem, does not really give a satisfying explanation of the problem. It is true that the knowledge of God had to grow more and more as His people were able to bear it, and that the OT at best could give but a partial revelation of Him; but we cannot believe that a later revelation should flatly contradict an earlier one. God may reveal Himself progressively, but He must reveal Himself consistently if we are to accept His revelation of Himself at all.

Can we then find an explanation which does honour both to the inspiration of the record and to the God whom it reveals? It is necessary at the outset to get a clear idea of what was involved in the devotion of the Canaanite cities to destruction. To take Jericho as an example, the city, its inhabitants and all that it contained were 'devoted' or 'put to the ban' (Heb. ḥērem; 6:17 'devoted to the Lord for destruction'; 6:18 'devoted to destruction'; 7:1 'devoted things'). This meant, as G. A. Cooke describes it, that 'anything which might endanger the religious life of the community was put out of harm's way by being prohibited to human use; to secure this effectively it must be utterly destroyed' ('Joshua', CBSC). It seems therefore that the ban had a religious and a prophylactic function: it was a religious service, and it was a protection for the religious life of Israel. It is along these two lines that a solution of our problem must be sought.

First, then, the destruction of the Canaanites was, as the record again and again proclaims it to be, a religious service. The people of Israel were the instrument by which God exercised judgment on the gross wickedness of the people of the land. Just as He had destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah for the same kind of unspeakable corruption, without the instrumentality of human hands, so He used the Israelites to punish and root out the cancerous depravity of the Canaanites. If there be a moral government of the world at all, such a dread possibility of judgment and divine surgery, however executed, cannot be excluded. Gn. 15:16 indicates that the Israelite invasion was, in fact, exactly timed to serve the moral purposes of God. Incidentally, it is noteworthy that the ban, being a religious service, imposed a moral restraint against the looting and excesses which were the normal, more terrible accompaniments of the warfare of the times. This was no lust for booty or for blood; it was a divine duty which must be performed.

The second function of the ban was prophylactic. If the religion of the Hebrews was to be kept pure and untainted, all possibility of infection by the abominations of the heathen must be removed. The means of removing the dread infection was a drastic one, but, in view of the revelation that the Hebrews were to transmit to the world, who will say that it was unjustified? It is significant that where there was failure in Israel's high task, the reason is seen in their failure to carry out the divine command of extermination. And so, for the sake of God's moral government of the world, for the sake of Israel, and for the sake of the message that Israel was to bring to the world, it was necessary that an evil nation should be utterly destroyed.

THE RELIGIOUS TEACHING OF THE BOOK

The criterion of the religious value of any book is, what does it tell us about God? What truth of God does it reveal? The book of Joshua throws light upon three aspects of God's relationship to man:

God's faithfulness

Long years before, the promise had been given that the people of Israel would possess the promised land (e.g. Gn. 15:7, 18–21; 26:2–5; 28:13, 14). It had seemed that that divine purpose had been thwarted by man's sin and disobedience; but God's plan could not finally be defeated, and this book gives the story of fulfilment in the conquest of Canaan. (See 11:23; 21:43–45; 23:14.)

God's holiness

This is seen in His judgment upon the original inhabitants of the land. The iniquity of the Amorites at last was full, and Israel became the instrument of His punishment (see 6:17; 10:40; 11:20; 23:3; cf. Lv. 18:24, 25). But God's holiness is seen no less in His insistence that His instrument of judgment must be holy. Again and again it is stressed that this is a holy war, and that Israel will succeed in the task committed to her only as every evil thing is put away from her (see 3:5; 7:11–13; 23:12, 13, 16; 24:19, 20).

God's salvation

The name Joshua means 'Yahweh is salvation', and the book of Joshua illustrates a most important aspect of the salvation which God gives. Exodus sees God's salvation basically as deliverance from bondage: Joshua goes on to teach that God's salvation involves victory and possession and rest (see 21:43, 44). The conquest of Canaan and Israel's possession of the land show God's acting on behalf of His people to fulfil His promise of a salvation that goes far beyond liberation from bondage.

The name Joshua is the Hebrew form of Jesus, the name that is above every name. Is it any wonder that Christian devotion has seen in Joshua a 'type' of Christ, and in this book a picture of the life of victory and possession that is ours in Him? Crossing the Jordan has often been thought of as symbolical of death; but it is much more helpful, and truer to the facts, to think of it as symbolizing the entrance into the life of fullness of blessing to which the Captain of the Lord's host brings us. Salvation for the Christian includes victory and possession and rest. 'Therefore, while the promise of entering his rest remains, let us fear lest any of you be judged to have failed to reach it' (Heb. 4:1).

1:1–9 JOSHUA'S COMMISSION

Joshua is divinely called to the task which he is to undertake as Moses' successor. Cf. Dt. 34:9.

1:1, 2 The continuity of the task

These opening verses bring Joshua on to the stage, and are a necessary prologue to the story of the conquest. In spite of the death of Moses, the work must go on: the continuity of the nation, of its task and of God's promises to it, is not broken by the change of leadership.

1 Moses' minister. Joshua's position as Moses' chief assistant is underlined here. The Hebrew word for 'minister', m^{e}šārēṯ, refers to official rather than menial service, and since it normally refers in the OT to Temple service, there is possibly a reference here to special religious service (cf. Ex. 33:11); Joshua's function from the very beginning was a religious one.

1:3–9 Promise and command

There is a promise to the people of the land which God is in process of giving to them (vv. 3, 4); and a promise to Joshua of divine authority, divine presence and divine faithfulness (v. 5). Then are given God's commands (vv. 6–9); this is always the biblical order: first the promise, then the command. Be strong, be courageous, be obedient to the law of God, and success will inevitably follow, for the cause is God's.

4 All the land of the Hittites refers not to the whole Hittite Empire, but to the part of it which lay between the Euphrates and the Mediterranean, i.e. N Syria. 5 I will not fail you; literally 'I will not drop you'. Cf. 10:6, where it is translated 'do not relax your hand'. 7, 8 The law which Moses my servant commanded you . . . This book of the law is the book referred to in Dt. 31:24, 26. Cf. Dt. 31:9, 11. This law must be the subject of constant mediation. Cf. Dt. 5:29–33; 6:4–9; Ps. 1:2, 3. 9 Have I not commanded you? The campaign upon which Joshua and the people are entering is unmistakably divine. Joshua is no bandit, no aggressor; he is simply a servant carrying out the commands of his superior. Cf. Dt. 31:1–8.

1:10 - 5:12 THE ENTRY INTO CANAAN

This section includes the mobilization of all the tribes, the sending out of the spies, the preparations for the crossing of the Jordan, the crossing and its commemoration, and the first encampment in the promised land.

1:10–18 Mobilization

1:10, 11 A disciplined people. The army which awaited the order to advance into Canaan was well organized and disciplined, a much more effective fighting force than the undisciplined mob which had come out of Egypt.

10 The officers of the people. The Hebrew literally reads 'those who write or record', originally the tally clerks in Egypt who kept the count of the bricks (Ex. 5:6), eventually becoming, as here, subordinate leaders of the people. 11 Within three days. It seems that the spies had already been sent out, though the account of their mission is not recorded until later; the record does not follow the chronological order of events. It may be, however, that 'three days' is a conventional expression for 'soon', without specifying an exact date (cf. 2:16).

1:12–18 A united people. At this supremely critical moment the tribes were happily a vital unity, and the Reubenites, the Gadites and the half-tribe of Manasseh, whose inheritance had already been allotted to them on the east of the Jordan (cf. Nu. 32), responded with alacrity to the reminder that they were committed to marching with their brethren against the western land. It was this unity with its definitely religious basis that made Israel a force to be reckoned with.

14 Beyond the Jordan. Literally 'across the Jordan', the side referred to being left to the understanding of the reader, though frequently it is defined more particularly, as in v. 15 'toward the sunrise', or in 5:1 'to the west'. The use of the phrase in 12:1, 7 and elsewhere for each side alternately shows that it gives no evidence for the geographical location of the writer. Armed; either 'in companies' from a word suggesting 'divided into five parts', or, as in Ex. 13:18, 'equipped for battle'. 'In battle array' might combine both senses. 16–18 The army's willingness to submit to Joshua's leadership is clearly related to his spiritual fitness for it. 17 Only may the Lord your God be with you, as he was with Moses! In early Israel the right to leadership was always related to possession of God's Spirit. Cf. 1 Sa. 10:6; 11:6.

2:1–24 The mission of the spies

The spies were sent to view the land and, particularly, to report on the strategically important city of Jericho which stood at the entrance of the mountain passes into the interior. The conquest was to be achieved by three crushing campaigns—against the centre, described in chs. 7–9, the south, ch. 10 and the north, ch. 11. The crossing of the Jordan, therefore, and the capture of Jericho, were the key to the whole campaign.

2:1 The spies sent out. Shittim has been identified by Nelson Glueck with Tell el-Hamman, in the foothills of the eastern edge of the Jordan valley. It was the site of the Israelites' last camp before advancing into Canaan. Cf. Nu. 33:49. This location, at some distance from the Jordan, supports the supposition (cf. 1:11) that the spies had been sent out from there before the Israelites moved to the edge of Jordan.

1 Secretly; literally 'silently'. Joshua's intention was probably concealed from the Israelites as well as from the Canaanites, lest an unfavourable report should again dishearten the people. A harlot whose name was Rahab. Attempts have often been made since the time of Josephus to represent Rahab merely as an innkeeper, but the Hebrew word used, the LXX translation and the NT references (Heb. 11:31; Jas. 2:25) confirm the accuracy of the ordinary translation.

2:2–7 The spies suspected and concealed. 2, 3 The uneasy suspicions of the king of Jericho confirm the panic in the city reported to the spies by Rahab (see vv. 9–11). The king of Jericho was no more than the ruler of a tiny city-state; these were characteristic of Canaan at this time, and their independence and lack of unity, except in a few cases when some of them combined to meet Israelite pressure, were contributory factors to Israel's success. 4, 5 We have here a very imperfect morality. The NT commends Rahab, not for her falsehood, but for her faith.

2:8–21 Rahab's faith and loyalty. 9–11 Into her dark and tragic life had come some faint glimmering of the truth that here in Israel there was a God above all the gods she had ever known. Stories of His great deeds and the success in war of His people had reached the city. Cf. Dt. 2:25; 7:23; 11:25. She was prepared to trust herself to the power and mercy of this supreme God, and it was that faith which saved her. 12 Dealt kindly . . . deal kindly. The Hebrew word is ḥeseḏ, applied generally to God's covenant love for His people, but also in relationships on the human level to the same kind of steadfast loyalty. Cf. 2 Sa. 10:2. 17 Guiltless; rather 'free from the oath'; cf. Gn. 24:8. 18, 19 Rahab's faith, immature though it may have been, was the saving of herself and her family, for she received from the spies the promise that when the city fell the house with the scarlet cord hanging from the window would be spared. Some identify this scarlet thread with the cord with which she let the spies down (v. 15), but the words are different.

2:22–24 The spies return and report. At Rahab's suggestion, the spies hid themselves for three days. The hills around Jericho are full of caves, and so would have given them ample cover.

They then returned to Joshua, probably by swimming the Jordan, with their report of the utter despondency and alarm of the Canaanites. 24 Fainthearted; the same word as 'melt away' in v. 9.

3:1–13 Preparations for a holy war

The people were given two reminders that this was a holy war on which they were entering —the leadership of the ark of the covenant (vv. 3, 4) and the necessity for consecrating themselves for the task (v. 5). The people were to be led across the Jordan by the ark, borne by the priests of the tribe of Levi. The ark served two purposes in the life and worship of the people of Israel: it was an outward symbol of the presence of God with His people, and it served as a receptacle for the two tablets of the Decalogue (cf. Ex. 25:12). Both these purposes were of great significance now at this vital point in Israel's history; the people had to be sure of the divine leadership, and they had to be sure of direction for the untrodden way that lay before them. (V. 11 may be translated, 'Behold, the ark of the covenant. The Lord of all the earth is passing over before you into Jordan.') The ark was the sign that God was going before His people, to lead them against their enemies.

4 The ark was further the symbol of the instruction that they would need for future guidance. This seems to be the significance of the distance between the people and the ark: not so much their necessary separateness from the holy God, as that they must stand back so as to view how wonderfully, miraculously and clearly God will lead them. 5 The cleansing of the people. Sanctify yourselves; this was necessary because God was about to work miraculously among them, giving evidence of His presence with Joshua no less than with Moses. The whole situation created an atmosphere of supernatural power waiting to be exercised; this is to be God's doing, not Israel's.

9–13 In Scripture, word and miracle go hand in hand, the former predicting and explaining, the latter confirming. So it was that God made Moses and all the prophets wise before the event, proving by fulfilment that the word they spoke was not theirs but His. And so here Joshua outlines and explains the coming events. The fulfilment then gives divine authentication of Joshua's leadership. 11 See note above.

3:14 – 4:18 The crossing of the Jordan

Commentators have suggested that two differing accounts of the crossing have been combined in this passage. Certainly if we read 4:5 as it is usually translated it gives the impression that the crossing had not yet been started, whereas we gather from 3:16, 17 and 4:1 that the people had already completed it. But 4:5 can be translated, 'Pass over to where the ark of the Lord your God is in the midst of Jordan.' With this reading it is possible to reconstruct the history without finding any breaks or discrepancies in the narrative. Those who have attempted to solve the intricacies of this narrative by appeal to differing accounts woven together have overlooked the fact that the story told here is intrinsically complex. The historian was faced with the task of relating three distinct and overlapping events: the story of the priests and the ark (3:14–17; 4:11–18), the story of the people crossing Jordan, and the story of the memorial stones, both those taken from the river (4:4–8) and those set up in the river (4:9). Thus when both at 3:17 and 4:10 he makes reference to the people crossing over, it is to show in the first case that the priests remained motionless throughout the crossing, and that the incident of the memorial stones took place while the crossing was still in progress. Identical features of narrative art are found in ch. 10 where the incidents of the overthrow of the confederate forces, the miracle of the 'sun standing still' and the flight of the kings have to be dovetailed into one vivid record. The sequence of events is then seen to be as follows:

3:14–17 The twelve tribes pass over Jordan. 15 The priests bearing the ark took up their stand on the brink of Jordan, which was brim-full at this time of the year, swollen by melting snows. 16 As they advanced to mid-channel the bed of the river was dried up before them; the stream was checked in its course far off, at Adam, the city that is beside Zarethan. This has been placed 16 miles up the river from Jericho, and it seems probable that a stretch of 20 or 30 miles of the river bed was left dry. An interesting parallel to the event recorded in this chapter has been found in the pages of an Arabic historian, describing how in AD 1266 near Tell ed-Dâmiyeh, which many experts have identified with Adam, the bed of the river was left dry for ten hours in consequence of a landslide. Other parallels have been quoted: in 1927 an earthquake caused the west bank to collapse near the location of Adam, and the Jordan was dammed up for more than twenty-one hours. These events may indicate a 'natural' explanation of what happened centuries earlier, but to accept that explanation does not detract in any way from the supernatural intervention which opened the way to Israel just at the moment when they needed to cross. The priests standing in the dry bed of the river as the whole nation passed over were the sign that this was the doing of the Lord.

4:1–9 The crossing commemorated. When the people had crossed, Joshua took the twelve men whom he had already chosen (cf. 3:12), and commanded them to go back to where the priests were standing with the ark, and to take out of the river twelve stones which were afterwards set up as a memorial at Gilgal. Joshua then set up twelve other stones in the midst of the Jordan where the feet of the priests had stood. 2–5 The two sets of twelve stones, according to the number of the tribes of the people of Israel, bore eloquent testimony to the fact that all twelve tribes were in the wilderness together and that all entered Canaan at the same time.

4:10–18 The crossing completed. The priests stood in their places until the memorial stones had been arranged for and all the people had hastened across. Then they crossed last of all and the river returned to its spate of full flood. 12–14 A note is inserted to stress the fact that the eastern tribes marched with their brethren across the Jordan, and to draw attention to the event as a fulfilment of the promise given to Joshua in 3:7. 15 This verse should be understood and translated as resuming the main thread of the narrative after the parenthetic vv. 12–14. 'So then, the Lord said to Joshua . . .', or even, 'For the Lord had said to Joshua . . .'

4:19 – 5:12 Encampment at Gilgal

4:19, 20 They encamped in Gilgal. Here the stones taken out of the Jordan were set up as a memorial, and here the camp of Israel was based for the campaign. The name Gilgal means 'circle' or 'rolling', from Hebrew gālal, 'to roll', and there may well have been a circle of stones already there. Jdg. 3:19, if it is the same Gilgal referred to there, speaks of 'sculptured stones near Gilgal'. But the name was now applied by Joshua to the rolling away of the reproach of Egypt when Israel renewed their acceptance of God's covenant in the renewed rite of circumcision; cf. 5:9.

4:21–24 The continuity of God's acts. Future generations were to be reminded that the God of their fathers was their God, the living God, the God who is constantly acting to redeem His people. 23, 24 The Lord your God dried up the waters of the Jordan for you . . . as the Lord your God did to the Red Sea . . . for us . . . This is an interesting substantiation of the testimony of the Pentateuch that a whole generation had perished in the wilderness leaving only Joshua and Caleb as survivors. Joshua was therefore one of a diminishing company who at this stage could say 'us' in connection with crossing the Red Sea.

5:1 Effect of the miraculous crossing. This note of the effect of the miracle on the surrounding nations (cf. 2:9–11) presupposes the passage of a length of time during which the news reached them. It is inserted here as an immediate fulfilment of the purpose of the miracle as given in 4:24 and to explain how it was now possible to engage undisturbed in the religious ceremonies of vv. 2–12. Amorites . . . Canaanites. From early times Palestine was known as the land of the Canaanites; the Amorites penetrated into Canaan from the north, and settled in the hilly district on both sides of the Jordan. There was no longer any spirit in them. This terror secured a breathing-space for Israel and gave opportunity for the renewal of the rite of circumcision.

5:2–12 A people restored to the covenant relationship. 2 Circumcise the people of Israel again. For nearly 40 years the rite of circumcision had been neglected, not because there had been lack of opportunity, but because the nation was under judgment (cf. Nu. 14:34). If the people had been circumcised during the years of wandering it would have seemed that all was well, and that the covenant had never been suspended. But now they are back to the old relationship again, and they can once more bear in their bodies the seal of the covenant. Flint knives. At this time, in the 13th century BC, bronze tools had largely replaced stone implements, and iron was soon to replace bronze, but in this religious observance of long standing the use of ancient materials and methods persisted. The second time means not that they had been circumcised already, but that they were returning to their former condition as a circumcised nation in covenant with God. 6 It was not the vicissitudes of the journey that caused the suspension of the rite of circumcision, but the gross disobedience of the generation which consequently perished in the wilderness. 9 The reproach of Egypt suggests that the years of wandering had given the Egyptians reason for taunting the Israelites with being forsaken by their God; the renewal of the miracle of the Red Sea at the Jordan (cf. 4:23) made it clear that they were Yahweh's people once again.

10 Since the people were now back on covenant ground, the next step was to keep the Passover. According to Ex. 12:43–49 no uncircumcised male could eat the Passover, but now all the men of Israel were qualified for the sacred feast of commemoration of deliverance. Involved in their remembrance of past deliverance was surely the confidence that God would once again give them the victory over the forces that threatened them. 11, 12 The people now took the first step of entering on their inheritance by eating the produce of the land which was theirs by covenant. The writer records the stopping of the divine provision of manna (cf. Ex. 16:35) now that it was no longer needed.

5:13 – 12:24 THE CONQUEST OF CANAAN

5:13–15 The divine Commander

As a prologue to the advance we have this most significant account of Joshua's encounter with 'a man . . . with his drawn sword in his hand'. This must have been a time of special anxiety and suspense for Joshua. The Jordan was crossed; there could be no going back now. The burden of leadership lay heavily upon his shoulders. But at the very moment when he was 'by Jericho' (v. 13), literally 'in Jericho', i.e. in the region of Jericho, anxiously reconnoitring the strong city which lay in Israel's path, there appeared to him the representative of Yahweh, who called himself 'commander of the army of the Lord' (v. 14). There can be no doubt that this was God Himself as seen in human form: ignoring the artificial break made by the beginning of a new chapter, it is correct to see 6:2 as following on from 5:15 in a continuous narrative, with 6:1 as a parenthesis. The visitant of 5:13 becomes 'the Lord' of 6:2. Cf. 'the angel of the Lord' frequently identified with God, e.g. in Gn. 16:7–11, compared with 16:13. This was none other than the pre-existent Son of God Himself. (See Introduction to Exodus, pp. 116f. and also 'Old Testament Theology', p. 29.)

13 Are you for us, or for our adversaries? Joshua had been thinking of the conflict as being between two sets of opposing forces, Israelite and Canaanite, and he was anxious to know if this armed warrior was to be his ally in the struggle. The answer was to the effect that he was not an ally, but a commander to whose leadership and control Joshua himself must submit. Thus he is reminded again that this is a holy war in which his position is that of a servant from whom obedience (v. 14) and reverence (v. 15) are due. 14 The position of I in the verse is emphatic: 'No, for I am commander of the army of the Lord. Now I have come.' The ultimate responsibility is borne not on the shoulders of a human leader but by God Himself. The army of the Lord includes the heavenly hosts, the forces of nature (cf. 10:11) and the army of Israel.

The story of the conquest which follows shows the divine Commander guiding and influencing and controlling human strategy. It may help to make the history more intelligible if we glance at the broad outline of that strategy. There were three stages in the conquest. The first consisted in the capture of Jericho and Ai (chs. 6–8), which opened up the passes into the interior of the country. A wedge was thus driven between the northern and southern sections of the country and the second and third stages in the campaign were the defeat of the southern confederacy (chs. 9, 10) and the northern confederacy (ch. 11) in turn.

6:1 – 8:35 The first stage in the campaign: Jericho and Ai

6:1–27 The capture of Jericho. Archaeological confirmation for the destruction of Jericho by Joshua is not nearly so conclusive as for other cities destroyed at this time. John Garstang, excavating in 1929–1936, thought he had discovered the walls which had fallen down in Joshua's day; but Kathleen Kenyon, excavating from 1952 to 1958, concluded that practically nothing of the city of Joshua's time was found by Garstang, and that most of the objects uncovered by him should have been dated much earlier, probably 300 years before Joshua's conquest. There is some evidence from the pottery recovered that a settlement did exist at Jericho in the 13th century BC, but remains from that period are very meagre. There have to be taken into account the thoroughness of Joshua's destruction of the city and the erosion of five centuries' exposure of the city until it was rebuilt in Ahab's reign (1 Ki. 16:34; 869 BC). 'The net result . . . is that a 13th-century Israelite conquest of Jericho cannot be formally proven on the present archaeological evidence, but neither is it precluded thereby' (K. A. Kitchen, art., 'Chronology of the Old Testament', NBD). And, as Kitchen says in his article on 'Jericho' (ibid.), 'The narrative of Jos. iii–viii within which the fall of Jericho is recounted is known to reflect faithfully conditions in, and topography of, the area.' The fact is that the capture of Jericho was the key to Joshua's whole campaign, and the biblical record must be accepted as authentic.

1–5 Divine commands for the attack. 1 Jericho was shut up from within and without; the Hebrew, as in AV mg. reads, 'did shut up and was shut up'. Cf. Paul in 2 Cor. 7:5, 'fighting without and fear within'! 4 Note the significance of the number seven—seven priests, seven trumpets, seven days, seven circuits of the walls on the seventh day—as indicating perfection, completeness, consummation. Trumpets of rams' horns; better as in RV mg., 'jubile trumpets'. The Hebrew, yôḇēl, is found outside the references to the year of jubilee (see Lv. 25:8ff.) only here and in Ex. 19:13, where there is a similar religious significance. This suggests that the trumpets carried by the priests had a ceremonial rather than a martial reference. This was a religious, not a military, undertaking.

6–27 The destruction of the city and the deliverance of Rahab. The angel of Yahweh had given explicit instructions for Jericho's capture, and these were carried out to the letter. Seven priests, bearing seven trumpets blown continually, and followed by the ark of the covenant, marched in solemn procession around the city for seven days, preceded and followed by the silent army. Each night they returned to the camp at Gilgal. On the seventh day the city was compassed seven times and then, amid the blast of the trumpets and the great shout of the people, 'the wall fell down flat' (Heb. 'in its place, where it stood'), 'so that they went up into the city, every man straight before him, and they took the city' (v. 20). Even if a secondary cause of the event, such as an earthquake, could be given, it cannot explain its miraculous occurrence just at the critical moment of Israel's advance. 'By faith the walls of Jericho fell down after they had been encircled for seven days' (Heb. 11:30). Certainly the narrative neither gives ground for, nor leaves room for, such anti-supernaturalist and minimizing views as that the marchers served to distract the attention of the watchers from Israelite sappers at work undermining the walls! (Cf. C. G. Howie, The Old Testament Story, 1967, p. 35.)

8 The constant blowing of the ceremonial trumpets served not only to remind the Israelites of the spiritual nature of their conflict but also to strike terror into the hearts of their adversaries; the awesome sound, persisting day after day, must have suggested supernatural power. 9 The position of the ark in the midst of the armed men of Israel is significant: God is in the midst of His people, and together they encompass the city. Cf. at the Jordan (3:4), where the ark was separated. Does this make a distinction between a miracle in which the people had a share, however passive, and one in which they had none?

17–21 Jericho was devoted to the Lord for destruction (Heb. ḥērem), i.e. its inhabitants and all that it contained were put under a special ban, which prohibited all contact between them and the people of Israel. In the case of the inhabitant (v. 21) and all other living things, this meant their destruction. It was both God's judgment on the sin of Jericho (cf. Gn. 15:16), and a safeguard of the purity of Israel from contamination. (Contrast Nu. 25, and see Introduction, pp. 233f.) 18 For lest when you have devoted them, read 'lest you covet . . .' as suggested by LXX (Heb. taḥmᵉḏû, for taḥᵃrimû). Cf. 7:21, 'I coveted them and took them'.

22, 23, 25 Cf. v. 17. In accordance with the covenant made with Rahab, she and her family were saved. Here we see the principle of the ban in reverse, the principle of saving faith and saving identification with the people of God (cf. on 7:24–26). They were set outside the camp of Israel because they were Gentiles and ceremonially unclean, but they were ultimately identified with the people of Israel. How well, then, does Rahab become an exemplar of true faith (Heb. 11:31; Jas. 2:25)! Cf. Eph. 3:6. 24 In the case of the wealth of Jericho, since any contact with a 'devoted' thing involved implication in its contagion and fate (cf. Jos. 7:1ff.), the treasures were taken for the Lord's house. 26, 27 The putting of Jericho to the ban included the pronouncing of a curse on anyone who should afterwards rebuild it as a fortified city. In the time of Ahab, 500 years later, this anathema was disregarded by Hiel the Bethelite at the cost of the lives of his two sons; cf. 1 Ki. 16:34. But a more immediate violation of the ban had much more disastrous consequences for Israel, when they went up against Ai.

7:1–26 Reverse at Ai and Achan's sin. Archaeological investigation into the site of Ai presents a very real difficulty. 'The peculiar problem of the conquest of Ai is more difficult for the modern exegete than it was for the children of Israel' (Burrows, What Mean These Stones? 1941, p. 272). The excavation of the site usually identified with Ai, Et-Tell, has shown that it was unoccupied from c. 2400 BC to 1200 BC, and lay in ruins all that time (hence presumably its name, Heb. hā'ay, 'the ruin'). On this evidence it was The Ruin before Joshua attacked it at all.

Four main explanations of the discrepancy between the biblical account and the findings of archaeology have been suggested. a. Later Israelites attributed the ruins of 2400 BC to Joshua, who was a legendary destroyer of Canaanite cities. This explanation is quite unacceptable, since it denies the historicity of the biblical account. b. The view of L. H. Vincent suggests that the inhabitants of Bethel, the neighbouring city, had established a military outpost at Ai to check the advance of the army of Israel against their own town: this outpost, set on the old ruins, was of such modest proportions and of such a temporary nature that it has left no 13th-century remains to betray its existence to the excavator. This view fails to explain the existence of a king of Ai (Jos. 8:29; 12:9). c. W. F. Albright suggests that the story of the fall of Ai is really the story of the capture of Bethel, and that the tradition represented by the account in Jos. 8 referred originally to Bethel. Support for this view is lent by the fact that there is no account of the capture of Bethel in the book of Joshua, though archaeologists have established that it suffered destruction at the same time as the neighbouring Canaanite cities, and Jos. 12:16 lists it among the cities and kings defeated. The difficulty is that the text of Jos. 8 makes a distinction between Bethel and Ai (e.g. v. 17). Whether this was a clear-cut distinction is perhaps open to question. It is significant that in Ezr. 2:28 and Ne. 7:32 Bethel and Ai are taken together, suggesting some kind of integration between them, and this may reflect an earlier assimilation of some kind. It is also noteworthy that the exact location or extent of Bethel seems in a little doubt: for the most part it is identified with Luz (Gn. 28:19; 35:6; Jos. 18:13); but in 16:1, 2 it is clearly distinguished from it: might it be that there was a clearly-defined Bethel, and a less clearly-defined Bethel-Ai? And that what we have in Jos. 8 is Bethel-Ai, or, perhaps better here, Ai–Bethel? It is significant that the successful attack on Ai involved precautions against a counter-attack from Bethel (8:12ff.), and that 8:17 specifically links the two cities together (cf. 12:9). This is largely speculation, however, and it is perhaps safest (d) to question the archaeological evidence: the identification of Ai with Et-Tell may be wrong. It has been suggested, e.g., by K. A. Kitchen (Ancient Orient, p. 63) that Et-Tell may be Beth-Aven. Other evidence may yet be forthcoming of the Ai of Joshua's day.

Whatever are the problems of the location of Ai, for Israel it marked the next obvious objective in their path. Situated on sharply rising ground to the west of Jericho, it was strategically located on the eastern edge of the central ridge, commanding the main route from Gilgal into the interior.

1–12 Reverse at Ai and its cause. The high hopes of the invaders received an unexpected setback. 1 anticipates by giving the reason for this reverse, and then the history proceeds. Broke faith; this was essentially a breach of the covenant. 2–5 On the advice of the spies which Joshua had sent forward to make a reconnaissance, only part of the army was sent to attack the city, though it is made clear later that this was not the cause of the repulse. It may have been that Israel's rash self-confidence was part of the outworking of the transgression of the ban. The garrison of Ai sallied out, and the Hebrews were driven in retreat down the steep descent towards Shebarim, or 'the stone quarries', leaving thirty-six of their number dead. 5 The hearts of the people melted: the expression used of their enemies in 2:11. The cause was not merely the defeat and the loss of fighting men, but a terrible misgiving that Yahweh's help had been withdrawn from them. 7 The chief element in Joshua's dejection was the thought that the defeat would mean renewed hope for the Canaanites and the dishonour of God's name.

10 God turns the thoughts of Joshua from the defeat and its implications to its moral cause and to the need for action. 11 The Lord advances from the general to the particular in framing the indictment, and the emphasis is heightened in the Hebrew by the repetition of the phrase 'and also' before each item of the charge. The sin of one member of the community was held to be that of the whole people. Israel was now a nation, and the sin of the individual was the sin of the nation until the nation repudiated it and expiation was made.

13–26 The transgressor identified, his sin acknowledged and punished. 13 Sanctify yourselves. Just as the breach of faith (v. 1) was specifically an act of disloyalty within the covenant, so Israel must assemble as the holy, or sanctified covenant people (cf. Ex. 19:10, 11) when the Lord comes among them as Judge. 14 The word translated brought near (cf. vv. 16ff.) has often a similar religious significance. 16–18 By the sacred lot, solemnly taken, Achan was identified as the one who had broken the ban. 19 Give glory to the Lord God of Israel by confessing the sin and confirming the accuracy of the divine identification of the sinner. 20, 21 Achan made confession that he had taken gold and silver and one beautiful mantle from Shinar and had hidden them beneath his tent, from which they were now fetched and poured out (rather than 'laid', v. 23) as an offering to the Lord. 24–26 Achan in touching 'devoted' objects had become contaminated, and therefore himself 'devoted' because he had wilfully identified himself with that which was under God's curse. Contrast the opposite experience of Rahab (2:3–6, 8–11, 21; 6:17, 25; cf. Mt. 1:5). The final scene in the valley of Achor (lit. 'troubling') saw the execution of the sentence when Achan was stoned to death and he and all that he had were burned with fire. Did Achan's family share in his destruction? It is difficult to be certain. 25 The plural them may refer only to his possessions, and 22:20 is not conclusive on the question since it can refer just as naturally to the thirty-six who died because of his sin. The law of Dt. 24:16 clearly prohibits the putting to death of an offender's relatives, unless, of course, their knowledge of his sin involved them in his guilt. Possibly, sharing his tent, they could not fail to be aware of his crime. By Achan's death the act of sacrilege was expiated, God's burning anger was turned away (cf. vv. 1, 26), and the scene of the tragedy, the valley of Achor, became a door of hope as the people set their faces once more to the advance.

8:1–29 Capture of Ai. 1, 2 Renewed encouragement. Now that the situation had been restored, God encouraged Joshua to go forward. All the fighting men; not because all were needed to gain the victory, but so that the morale of all might be restored. 2 It is noteworthy that this time all the spoil and the cattle were to be given to the Israelites; Achan might have waited for his booty.

3–22 Strategy of attack. Joshua made use of an ambush to take and destroy the city. The text provides two problems here, for there seems to be a discrepancy between vv. 3–9, which speak of 30,000 men being set in ambush on the west side of the city, and v. 12, which gives the number in the same position as 5,000. Numbers are notoriously subject to copyists' errors, and it may be that such a mistake has been made here, and that 5,000 should be read in both places. Another possible explanation is that 30,000 originally referred to the whole fighting force employed. But a much more satisfactory explanation is that there were two ambushes, one to deal with Ai and the other with a possible threat from Bethel. 17 tells that the men of Bethel—a city two miles from Ai, but hidden by intervening heights, and linked in some way politically with Ai (cf. 12:9)—joined in the pursuit after Israel; and it seems reasonable to assume that Joshua would make preparations to guard against such an attack from Bethel. (Though the men of Bethel were defeated at this time and their king slain, cf. 12:16, it is uncertain whether the city was actually occupied or destroyed. Its capture is recorded in Jdg. 1:22–26. Chronologically this may have preceded the death of Joshua, in spite of the reference to this event in Jdg. 1:1, for these verses precede the second mention of Joshua's death in Jdg. 2:8.) A second problem arises from the number of fighting men said to be involved in the first ambush: thirty thousand (v. 3) seems an impossibly large contingent for such a purpose. R. E. D. Clark ('The Large Numbers of the Old Testament', JTVI, 87, 1955, pp. 82ff.) has put forward the entirely plausible suggestion that the text should read 'thirty captains'. The Hebrew word 'elep̄, translated 'thousand' can also be translated 'captain'. With this translation, what we have here is a carefully-selected commando unit of thirty men, mighty men of valour, chosen for the critical and dangerous task. (See also J. W. Wenham, 'Large Numbers of the Old Testament', Tyndale Bulletin, 18, 1967, especially pp. 24–26, 41.) Their assignment was to enter the city and set it on fire after its defenders had sallied forth to chase Joshua and his men. Joshua's strategy therefore involved three groups—a small commando unit to enter Ai, 5,000 men to deal primarily with the men of Bethel, and the main army, led by Joshua himself, to decoy the men of Ai out of the city. Wenham, however, suggests that the 5,000 of v. 12 is a textual corruption of the 30,000 of v. 3, and thus that only two groups were involved.

13 RSV translation adapts the Hebrew to read

Joshua spent that night, instead of 'Joshua went that night' (Heb. wayyālen for wayyēlek); some commentators go further, and by the addition of one Hebrew consonant emend the last word of v. 9 to read, as in v. 13, in the valley. Neither emendation is necessary, and both serve only to support the contention that we have here two parallel accounts of the same incident. Vv. 3–9 describe the setting in motion of Joshua's plans: the first night the small unit of thirty men is sent off to its position, while Joshua remains with the rest of the people; next day (v. 10) Joshua and the people march the sixteen miles or so to the neighbourhood of Ai; that night (vv. 12, 13) the ambush (v. 13 'rear guard') of 5,000 men is set between Ai and Bethel, while Joshua and the main body of the army take up their positions in the lower ground in front of Ai. 18, 19 The javelin, Joshua's weapon, probably gave the signal to the men lying in ambush by reflecting the sun from its flat blade.

22–29 Victory and aftermath. The strategy proved entirely successful: the city was occupied and set on fire; the inhabitants, attacked in front and from the rear, were put to the sword. 28, 29 Ai was utterly destroyed, and became like its name, a heap of ruins; its king was slain and his body hanged on a tree until sunset (cf. Dt. 21:23) and then buried beneath a great heap of stones, a standing memorial to another milestone in Israel's advance.

8:30–35 Renewal of the covenant at Shechem. In a religious act of the utmost significance Joshua now reminded the Israelites of the true nature of their conquest. The goal of the pilgrimage was the mountains appointed by Moses for this solemn ceremony of covenant renewal (Dt. 11:29), but it is very likely that the ceremonies centred upon Shechem, which lay in the valley between the mountains and which was hallowed by association with the patriarchs. Shechem was the scene of a subsequent covenant ceremony (Jos. 24), but it is needless to say as some do (e.g. G. W. Anderson, 'Joshua', in Peake's Commentary on the Bible, 1962, in loc.), that these are duplicate accounts of the same incident. It is eminently reasonable that both at the entrance upon life in Canaan, and again when he sensed that his leadership was ending, Joshua should face the people with the inescapable challenge to covenant obedience. In accordance with the express command of Moses, he called them to renew their covenant allegiance to Yahweh and to hear the conditions on which they were to retain possession of the land. See on Dt. 11:29, 30; 27:1–26.

Several points call for comment. a. It is surprising that we are told nothing about the capture of Shechem, an ancient walled town. Yet the people have a service of dedication just outside its gates, here and again at the end of Joshua's life (cf. 24:1ff.). There are two possible explanations. One is that the book of Joshua does not profess to give an exhaustive account of the conquest of Canaan: the omission of any account of the capture of Shechem may have no significance. Another explanation is that the people of Shechem were not hostile to the Israelites. Gn. 34 describes how the city came into the hands of Jacob; the Amarna letters reveal that c. 1380 BC Labayu, the prince of Shechem, was in league with the Habiru, who may have had some link with the Hebrews. It is possible that Jacob had passed control of Shechem to a related group of Semitic peoples, who had some faith in Israel's God, and that when Israel entered Canaan they found in the inhabitants of Shechem a people who had some kinship with them. H. L. Ellison (Joshua–2 Samuel, Bible Study Books, Number 2, Scripture Union, 1967, p. 9) suggests that this would explain the language of Jdg. 9, where the citizens of Shechem are Israelites, but feel themselves superior to Israel.

It is significant, however, that they seem to have had a very imperfect and syncretistic form of faith in Yahweh, which seemed to allow them to worship one of the Canaanite Baals. See Jdg. 8:33; 9:4 for references to Baal-berith as the god of Shechem. There is, however, no direct evidence in the biblical record for any such link-up with Hebrews already in Canaan, though the assumption is not impossible. And there is certainly biblical evidence strongly opposed to the view of many modern scholars that it was at Shechem that tribes which had never been in Egypt or at Sinai joined those who had come out of Egypt in a complete amphictyony, or sacred union, of twelve tribes now brought together under the leadership of Joshua (cf. 4:1ff.).

b. The difficulty of a march through enemy territory to Shechem presents no real problem, for the country between was very sparsely populated, probably because of inadequate water supplies. Furthermore, there is ample testimony to the terror caused by the invasion, and the consequent paralysis of local opposition (e.g. 5:1; 9:24).

c. For the nature of the covenant here renewed and ratified, and its close resemblance to the suzerainty covenants of the late second millennium BC, see on Jos. 24, where details of a similar national covenant are given more fully. One feature here not explicitly referred to in Jos. 24 was the solemn ceremony involved (vv. 30, 31).

31ff. An altar of undressed stones was erected on Mt. Ebal, and solemn sacrifices were offered. A copy of the law of Moses was written upon plastered stones and read aloud to the vast multitude, and public proclamation was made of its blessings and cursings. Six tribes on Gerizim said 'Amen' to the blessings and six on Ebal said 'Amen' to the curses. 'History can furnish few scenes so impressive in moral grandeur as that of a nation thus solemnly embracing God's law as the rule of its life and the condition of its prosperity' (Fairweather, From the Exodus to the Monarchy). 33 Sojourner as well as homeborn included peoples like the Kenites who had joined with Israel in the wilderness, individuals like Rahab and her family, and, later, the Gibeonites.

9:1 – 10:43 The second stage: the campaign in the south

Israel's successes against Jericho and Ai had two contrasting consequences. On the one hand, opposition hardened and became more highly organized (9:1, 2; 10:1–43); on the other, some of the inhabitants of the land were prepared to make terms with the invaders (9:3–27).

9:1–27 Compromise with the Gibeonites. 1–3 The central part of the country was thrown wide open to the invaders by the defection of the Gibeonite cities: Gibeon, Chephirah, Beeroth and Kiriath-jearim; cf. v. 17. They are called 'Hivites' (cf. v. 7) though possibly this should read, as in LXX, 'Horites' (cf. Gn. 36:2, 21). 4, 5 By pretending that they were ambassadors from a far country and therefore constituted no mere threat to Israel's advance, their representatives induced the Israelites to form an alliance with them and to guarantee that their lives would be spared. Made ready provisions. This alters the Hebrew word by one consonant, making it conform to v. 12, but it is perhaps better to translate the unusual Hebrew verb in the original, as RV, 'made as if they had been ambassadors', or 'disguised themselves'. Their worn-out clothes, patched sandals, and obviously old provisions convinced the leaders of Israel that they had indeed come from a far country. 9, 10 The deception was strengthened by the pretence that they had apparently heard only of the exploits of Israel beyond Jordan and knew nothing of Jericho and Ai. 14, 15 A treaty was concluded before the deception was discovered: the men of Israel partook of their provisions, thereby pledging themselves to friendship; they did not ask direction from the Lord, but made a covenant-treaty with them. This may have been a full vassal treaty of the pattern of the time (see on Jos. 24); it certainly included, as events showed, protection against the vassals' enemies.

16–21 The deception discovered. The discovery of the fraud was made when Israel came to the cities of the Gibeonites; but the agreement was sacred and could not be annulled, despite the protests of some of the people. Justice was done by reducing the Gibeonites to the position of slaves of the sanctuary. 21 Drawers of water. Excavations have shown that the Gibeonites were experienced in drawing water; this is evident from a great pool in the heart of the city of Gibeon with an interior circular staircase leading down to the source of the water 80 ft. below.

22–27 A curse that became a blessing. 23 Now therefore you are cursed. They were doomed to perpetual slavery yet the curse that came upon them was a blessing. 'Blessed are those who dwell in thy house' (Ps. 84:4). 27 That was the curse that fell on the Gibeonites—to be attached for ever to the congregation and to the altar of the Lord, in the place which he should choose. Such is the grace of God. It was for the Gibeonites that He wrought the miracle of the battle of Beth-horon (cf. 10:7–15), and it was among them afterwards that He pitched His tent (cf. 2 Ch. 1:3); and in still later days, when priests and Levites failed, He made them take their places. Since Joshua made them . . . hewers of wood (Heb. nāṯan, lit. 'gave'), they came to be known as nᵉṯhînîm, or 'given ones', 'temple servants', Ezr. 2:43; 8:20.

The defection of the Gibeonites at this stage helped Joshua to drive a wedge still further into the central part of Canaan: this, and the possibility that he might use the resources of the great city Gibeon to intensify his attack against the whole land, explains the urgency with which the five kings of the Amorites now moved against Gibeon.

10:1–43 Defeat of the southern confederacy. 1–6 The confederacy united against Gibeon. The news of the treaty between Israel and the Gibeonites was the signal for war. Five kings of the Amorites resolved not only to punish their former allies for their treachery, but to crush Joshua at a point where defeat would be fatal to his plans. The confederacy was led by Adoni-zedek, king of Jerusalem (cf. Melchizedek in Gn. 14:18), which had for long been a city of great influence; the other members were kings of Hebron, Jarmuth, Lachish and Eglon. Their united forces laid siege to Gibeon, whose inhabitants urgently appealed for help, under the terms of their treaty with Israel. 6 Do not relax your hand, literally 'do not drop your hand'; cf. 1:5. All the kings of the Amorites that dwell in the hill country; not an exaggeration, for these five kings did represent all of this area.

7ff. Victory and the miracle of the sun's standing still. 8 Joshua, encouraged by a reminder of his original commission (cf. 1:5), made a forced march by night from Gilgal, and fell upon the allied force at Gibeon. 10, 11 The Lord threw them into a panic, and they broke and fled, past Upper and Lower Beth-horon, which were linked by a pass, the ascent of Beth-horon, running from the central hill country, where Gibeon lay, to the more rolling hill country bordering the coastal plain, where three of the allied cities, Libnah, Eglon and Lachish, were located. But they were not destined to escape, for the Lord intervened once again to help His people, and a great storm of hailstones killed multitudes of them and completed the rout.

12–15 There follows a quotation taken from the Book of Jashar, which seems to have been a collection of songs in praise of the heroes of Israel. It records Joshua's prayer: Sun, stand thou still at Gibeon, and thou Moon in the valley of Aijalon and asserts that in answer the sun stood still, and the moon stayed, until the nation took vengeance on their enemies. Two questions are raised by the passage. Where does the quotation begin and end? And how are we to explain the miracle here recorded? The quotation evidently begins at v. 12, and since Joshua did not return to Gilgal until after the utter defeat of the enemy—his return is narrated in v. 43—we must take it that the quotation goes on until the end of v. 15. The alternative is to follow the LXX reading, which omits v. 15; since it is identical with v. 43, and since vv. 14 and 42 have identical endings, it is possible that a copyist inserted it in error. In that case, vv. 13b and 14 can be taken as a prose repetition of the poetry of vv. 12b and 13.

A second question is, Did the sun stand still? One suggested explanation of the episode is that the narrator has taken what was merely a highly figurative poetical description of God's intervention on behalf of Israel as historical fact. But there is no reason to reject a more literal interpretation, though this passage has often been the butt of scientific scorn, much of which, it seems possible, may be based on a misunderstanding. It has usually been assumed that Joshua prayed for the day to be prolonged. But is it not possible that what Joshua needed even more, since, as is expressly stated in v. 9, he came upon the camp of the enemy by night, was that the darkness should continue and the night be prolonged for his surprise attack? That it was early morning when he made his request is evident from the position of the moon in the valley of Aijalon (to the west) and the position of the sun over Gibeon (to the east) (v. 12). The answer to his prayer came in a hailstorm which had the effect of prolonging the darkness. An investigation of the exact meaning of the Hebrew words used confirms this interpretation. The word translated stand still (Heb. dôm) means literally 'be silent' and frequently has the sense 'cease' or 'leave off' (cf. Ps. 35:15; La. 2:18). Similarly the word translated stayed (Heb. 'amad), stood still in v. 13b, has the sense of 'cease' (cf. 2 Ki. 4:6; Jon. 1:15). The basic meaning of the word translated 'go down' (Heb. bô') in the phrase did not hasten to go down is 'come', or 'go'. It is true that throughout the OT this word, when applied to the sun, normally means 'set', or 'go down', e.g. in Gn. 15:12, 17; 28:11; Ex. 17:12; 22:26; Jos. 8:29; 10:27, etc., and that the Hebrew words normally applied to sunrise are yāṣā', to go forth, or zaraḥ, to arise. But there is one instance, again significantly in a verse that is set in poetical form, where the verb bô', 'to come', is parallel to zaraḥ, 'to arise': Is. 60:1, 'Arise, shine; for your light is come, and the glory of the Lord has risen upon you.' 'Light' here admittedly is not the same as 'sun', but in Jb. 31:26 the word translated 'sun' is the word used here for 'light' (Heb. 'ôr). It is possible to argue, therefore, that the word bô' in a poetical setting, as here in Joshua, can apply to the coming of the light and the rising of the sun. The phrase for about a whole day can better be translated as 'when day is done' (Heb. k^{e}yôm tāmîm; cf. K. A. Kitchen, op. cit., p. 64). So 13b can be translated, 'The sun ceased shining in the midst of the sky, and did not hasten to come, (so that it was) as when day is done.' And so in the darkness of the storm the defeat of the enemy was complete. It should be noted that one is not disparaging the miraculous nature of the occurrence by suggesting that there was a less spectacular divine intervention than is postulated by the more customary interpretation, which takes it that the day was lengthened. It was still God who lengthened the night by a miraculous intervention on behalf of His people.

16–27 Death of the five kings. 16 The five kings had taken refuge in a cave at Makkedah, but the pursuers did not halt to deal with them. 22, 23 Afterwards, they were brought out; 24 when the captains of the Israelites had put their feet upon the necks of their prisoners to symbolize complete subjection, they were slain, their bodies hanged on trees until the evening and then entombed in the cave where they had fled for shelter. There are no grounds whatever for describing this, as Noth does, as an aetiological tale composed for the purpose of explaining the cave with its mouth blocked by great stones and the five notable trees. It is much more credible that the memorial was derived from the history of events that happened than that the history was fabricated to explain the memorial. John Bright (A History of Israel, 1960, p. 119) urges that the evidence for the factuality of this narrative is 'really very impressive', noting in particular that Debir (v. 38), and Lachish (v. 31) 'are known to have been destroyed in the latter part of the thirteenth century' and that 'the succeeding occupation is typical of early Israel'.

28–39 Completion of the southern campaign. The victory at Beth-horon inaugurated a campaign, which may have lasted for a considerable time, and the whole of the southern part of Canaan was finally brought under Israel's control. Joshua's strategy at this time seems to have consisted of a series of swift, devastating attacks against key Canaanite cities, to crush their inhabitants but not necessarily to occupy the cities themselves. As Yehezkel Kaufmann puts it, Joshua's campaigns were 'wars of destruction and extermination, not of occupation by immediate settlement' (Biblical Account of the Conquest of Palestine, 1953, p. 86).

40–43 Summary of the conquest. The area conquered is first defined according to its natural geographical divisions: 40 the whole land, i.e. the hill country and the Negeb and the lowland and the slopes. The hill country consists of the Judean highlands; the Negeb (Heb. negeb, 'the dry') of the semi-arid steppes that stretch away to the desert in the south; the lowland ('the Shephelah') of the foothills between the coastal plain and the central highlands; and the slopes, probably the territory sloping eastward to the Dead Sea (cf. 12:8). Some scholars (e.g. O. Eissfeldt, CAH II, revised edition, 1965, ch. 34, 'The Hebrew Kingdom', pp. 4ff.) have discounted the accuracy of the summary given in these verses, contrasting it with the more gradual conquest suggested by Jdg. 1. But archaeological investigation has confirmed that the cities of this area, e.g. Lachish, Eglon, Debir, suffered violent and complete destruction about this time, 1250–1200 BC. There is, therefore, no ground for doubting that Joshua did launch a series of devastating attacks on key Canaanite strongholds, that these attacks demoralized the Canaanites and gave the Israelites a firm foothold, though the land was not entirely subdued at this time; later passages (e.g. 11:13; 13:2–13; 15:63) show clearly that much remained to be done. He left none remaining, but utterly destroyed all that breathed has to be qualified as in v. 20: 'the remnant which remained of them had entered into the fortified cities'; the only survivors were those who managed to make their escape. As the Lord God of Israel commanded; cf. Dt. 20:16. 41 The record then defines the limits of the conquest from Kadesh-barnea to Gaza, and all the country of Goshen, as far as Gibeon. Goshen has not been definitely identified but obviously refers to an area in the south of Canaan. 42 The summary of the conquest makes it quite clear that this was the Lord's doing: the Lord God of Israel fought for Israel. Archaeological research has shown how strongly fortified the Canaanite cities were, and how advanced was their civilization; Israel's victory was nothing short of miraculous.

11:1–23 The third stage: the campaign in the north

11:1–15 Defeat of the northern confederacy. Joshua's successful campaign in the south aroused the alarm of the northern Canaanitish kings. Led by Jabin, king of Hazor (lit. 'the fortress'), they formed a huge confederacy against Israel. This included Jabin's nearest neighbours, but the call to arms was not confined to them; it included the kings in the hill country of the north and in the Arabah south of Chinneroth, an area northwest of the lake of Galilee, and also the remnants of the defeated armies of the south, Canaanites, Amorites, etc.

4 The strength of the confederacy depended not only on massive numbers; they had a strong force of horses and chariots. 5 They mustered at the waters of Merom, lying between Lake Huleh and Lake Tiberias, 10 miles west of Jordan, with copious springs flowing southward into the Sea of Galilee. 6 Joshua's understandable fear was answered by the assurance of the divine presence and of complete victory. He was commanded to burn the chariots and hamstring the horses of the enemy, so that they could not be used afterwards by the Canaanites or by the victorious Israelites, who might thus be tempted to put their trust in horses. A sudden attack, probably after a swift forced march, once again struck panic into the hearts of the Canaanites. 8 As promised, the Lord gave them into the hand of Israel, who smote them and pursued them in headlong flight.

10 Joshua turned back from the pursuit and destroyed the great city of Hazor. Excavations, made particularly by Y. Yadin since 1955, have shown that in the time of Joshua the site covered almost 200 acres, and was probably occupied by about 40,000 inhabitants. The city consisted of an upper city—the older part, dating back to the third millennium BC, and occupying about 25 acres—and a lower city to the north, added in the early part of the second millennium BC, and occupying about 150 acres. This latter area is so large that Garstang thought that it was only an enclosure for horses and chariots, but later investigation has shown that the area contained a well-built city. Yadin found conclusive evidence that Hazor was destroyed about the middle of the 13th century BC, and attributed this destruction to Joshua. Of special interest are the remains of Canaanite temples and objects of worship, which reveal that the religion of Hazor involved the worship of the sun-god in association with a bull. 13, 14 The utter destruction of Hazor was exceptional, perhaps because of its size and importance; other cities that stood on mounds (Heb. têl) were not destroyed. Perhaps now that the Israelites were established in the land these were no longer a danger, but rather an advantage to settlers. 15 Once again obedience to the commands of the Lord is seen to be the secret of success (cf. 1:8): as the Lord had commanded Moses his servant, so Moses commanded Joshua, and so Joshua did.

11:16–23 Summary of the conquest. The battles of Beth-horon and Merom and their aftermath were decisive, and the power of the Canaanites to resist the invaders was shattered. All organized resistance was broken down. 21 A special note is made of the defeat of the Anakim, perhaps because it had been they who had terrified the spies of Israel so disastrously over forty years before (Nu. 13:33). 23 The land had rest from war in the sense that no more pitched battles were required. But the completion of the campaign took 'a long time' (v. 18), and even at the end of Joshua's life there remained 'very much land to be possessed' (13:1). To deal with the parts of the country still unsubdued was now to be the responsibility of the individual tribes.

12:1–24 List of conquered Canaanite kings

This list may be regarded as an appendix to the history of the wars of Joshua, concluding the story of the conquest before going on to the division of the land. 1–6 deal with the conquests beyond the Jordan toward the sunrising, i.e. on the eastern side of the Jordan: these were gained under Moses. 7–24 The remainder of the chapter lists Joshua's successes in Canaan on the west side of the Jordan. It is remarkable that such a small country should contain so many kings; these had merely local authority, over city-states. The multiplicity of divisions was one factor that made the task of the Israelites easier than it might otherwise have been, though it should be noted that in face of an external threat the kings tended to combine their forces, as at Beth-horon in the south and Merom in the north. 23 Goiim in Galilee follows the LXX, and is probably correct. AV 'king of the nations of Gilgal' is unintelligible.

Probably Harosheth-ha-goiim (Jdg. 4:2) is meant.

13:1 - 22:34 THE DIVISION OF THE LAND

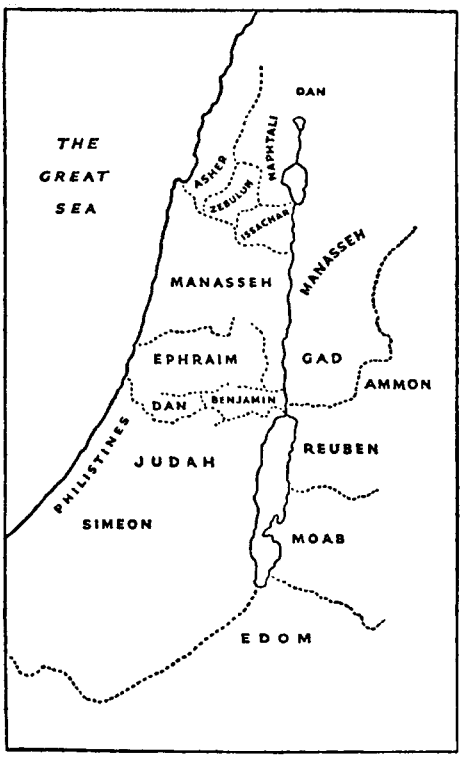
When we come to this section of the book of Joshua, with its detailed lists of boundaries and cities, one has a certain sympathy with Calvin when he wrote, 'I would not be very exact in delineating the site of places, and in discussing names, partly because I admit that I am not well acquainted with topographical or chorographic science, and partly because great labour would produce little fruit to the reader.' And yet it must not be forgotten that accurate and detailed descriptions of the boundaries and cities of the tribes were vital for the tribes themselves, for these were the title-deeds of their inheritance.

Considerable discussion has centred around the probable dates of the lists which we find here. Many modern scholars believe that these lists were of varied origins, that they were drawn up at various times and revised some time between the 11th and 7th centuries BC. Earlier criticism had attributed them to P, and had seen in them a post-exilic priestly writer's view of what the extent and distribution of Israel's inheritance should have been. But more recent criticism would date them much earlier. The list of cities, it is claimed, is grouped according to the later administrative districts of Judah, but scholars disagree about when this division into administrative districts was made. Alt's view is that the list of cities in Jos. 15 is based on a list of the twelve provinces of Josiah's kingdom. W. F. Albright maintains that Jos. 21 is a list of Levitical cities of David and Solomon's time, on the ground that no town in the list was founded after 950 BC. John Bright considers that these lists were probably set down in the reign of David but that they reflect premonarchical conditions. H. L. Ellison (op. cit., p. 15) suggests that 15:20–62 'is an appendix put in by a later editor giving the organization of Judah under the monarchy after the time of Solomon . . . . He divided the land into twelve portions, normally near the old divisions (1 Kings 4:7–19). . . . When the kingdom was split under Rehoboam, Judah was divided into twelve administrative districts to emphasize its claims to remain the true Israel.' The RSV paragraphing of Jos. 15 underlines this twelvefold partition.

Points which must be taken into consideration in a discussion of the dating of these lists are as follows. a. There certainly was detailed administrative organization in David's time (cf. 1 Ch. 23–27). It has been pointed out, however, by Albright (Archaeology and the Religion of Israel, 1953, p. 120), that David's administration was organized in part on Egyptian models: his division of functions between recorder and secretary (cf. 2 Sa. 8:16, 17, and his council of thirty (cf. 1 Ch. 27:6) are said to be derived from Egyptian official institutions. This might suggest that not only the officialdom but the civic organization of David's time had its roots in an earlier day nearer to the period of direct Egyptian influence on Israel. b. Since many of the Levitical cities, e.g. Gezer, Ibleam, Taanach, were not Israelite at all before David's time, it has been suggested that the actual allocation of these cities should be ascribed to him. It should be noted, however, that the lists in Joshua do not refer exclusively to towns which were then, or ever, in Israel's actual possession: this was an ideal allocation of the land as it might have been if Israel had been faithful and diligent in driving out the original inhabitants. (Cf. the Philistine towns listed in 15:45–47.) c. Some of the towns are given names which they formerly had, e.g. Baalah, later Kiriath-jearim (15:9), Kiriath-arba, later Hebron (15:54); the use of Debir, formerly Kiriath-sepher (15:15) suggests later editorial revision. d. John Rea in The Wycliffe Bible Commentary asserts that 'this method of delineating borders—proceeding in order by topographical landmarks, from town to mountain to town to river, etc.—is almost exactly paralleled at this same period in history in the agreement defining boundaries accorded by the Hittite king Suppiluliuma to Niqmadu of Uragit, ruler of a vassal city-state on the Syrian coast (Claude Schaeffer, Le Palais Royal d'Ugarit, IV, 10–18)'. This confirms the possibility of such detailed and accurate lists in Joshua's day. e. In 925 BC Shishak invaded Palestine and subdued Judah; a campaign list of his, discovered at Karnak, names many Palestinian towns. It is significant, however, that few of the names listed by him in the Negeb and neighbouring areas are found in the Joshua passages, whereas many of them appear as personal or clan names in the later genealogical lists of 1 Ch. 2 and 4. This suggests, as John Rea (op. cit.) points out, that 'the lists of towns in Joshua belong to a time before the descendants of Judah and Simeon began to occupy the Negeb and to give their names to new settlements that were in existence by the time of Shishak'. f. The possibility of copyists' errors in lists of unfamiliar names may explain some discrepancies, e.g. Jos. 15:32, where the total is given as 'twenty-nine cities', though thirty-six are listed.

On the evidence available it is difficult to come to any conclusion regarding the dating of the lists as we have them in these chapters, but it seems certain that, whatever later editing of them may have been done, their basic form dates back to the conquest. There is no reason to discount the care and accuracy with which the representatives of the tribes (cf. 18:4–9) did their work when they surveyed the land and recorded their findings. A similar land survey for the whole land might well lie behind the lists which we have in these chapters. And it can be argued that David (or Solomon or Josiah or Jehoshaphat) for the purposes of administration made use of much older physical divisions of the land.

Who made the allocation? 13:7 suggests that it was Joshua; 14:1 that it was Eleazar the priest and the heads of families; 14:5 that it was the people as a whole. These, however, are not mutually exclusive. The ultimate responsibility was Joshua's; lots, no doubt, were cast by Eleazar, assisted by the heads of families; and the people as a whole accepted the allocation that was made.



13:1 – 19:51 Allocations to the tribes

The necessarily detailed account of the settlement of the tribes given in these chapters may make it difficult to see the wood for the trees, and so it may be helpful to indicate in advance the broad outline of the allocation.

Reuben, Gad and the half-tribe of Manasseh already had their territory allotted to them on the east of Jordan; cf. Nu. 32:1–42. Their settlement is described in Jos. 13. Of the territory which was already in possession on the west of Jordan the main division was between the tribes of Judah and Joseph; the allotment made to the other tribes depended on this fundamental division. The tribe of Judah were given their possession in the south, the territory of the five kings (ch. 15); with them were associated Caleb (14:1–15; 15:13–19) and, in the later division of the land, the tribe of Simeon (19:1–9) because 'the portion of the tribe of Judah was too large for them' (19:9). The powerful house of Joseph, i.e. the tribes of Manasseh and Ephraim, received the rich inheritance of central Canaan (chs. 16, 17). They were handicapped, however, by the row of fortresses, Bethshean, Ibleam, Dor, Taanach and Megiddo (17:11, 12; cf. 16:10), which barred the road to the north, and complained of the inadequacy of their possession (17:14). Joshua challenged them to clear the forested areas of their mountain territory, and assured them that they should hew down its powerful inhabitants and finally dispossess the Canaanites, 'though they have chariots of iron, and though they are strong' (17:15–18). Joshua chose Timnath-serah for his own inheritance (19:49, 50).

Between these two powerful sections of the nation, Judah and Joseph, territory was later assigned to Benjamin (18:11–28), and, nearer the sea coast, to Dan (19:40–48); but the tribe of Dan had difficulty in maintaining themselves against the inhabitants of the coastal plain (cf. Jdg. 1:34, 35), and later migrated to the far north (Jdg. 18). The remaining tribes, Zebulun, Issachar, Asher and Naphtali, which, like Simeon, Benjamin and Dan, had not had their portion allotted to them in the first division of the land, were later established in the northern part of the country. See 19:10–39.

13:1–7 Command to divide the land. 1 Though there still remained very much land to be possessed, Joshua's age and growing frailty demanded that an allotment of the land, by anticipation if not by complete conquest, should be made. 3 may be an editorial note to explain that what was later the territory of the Philistines belonged in Joshua's day to the Canaanites. The lands still unconquered are listed roughly from south to north. The Shihor may be the lowest reaches of the easternmost branch of the Nile, or, possibly, the Wadi el-Arish, which flows into the Mediterranean about 90 miles east of Egypt and 50 miles west of Gaza. (See K. A. Kitchen, 'Egypt, River of', NBD.) 6 The command was given for a division of the whole land between the nine and a half tribes, since God's intervention made final victory assured.

13:8–33 Territory of the two and a half tribes. Reuben, Gad and the half-tribe of Manasseh had already been allotted their portion in eastern Palestine, and the boundaries of each of these tribes were now fixed, Reuben being placed in the south, Gad in the centre and Manasseh in the north. Cf. Nu. 32 and Dt. 3:12–17. 14 To the tribe of Levi alone Moses gave no inheritance. Moses had left instructions for the allocating of cities to the Levites (cf. Nu. 18:20–24; 35:1–8), but they were to have no tribal area. The appointing of their cities is dealt with later in ch. 21.

14:1 – 15:63 Territory of Caleb and Judah. 14:1–5 describes the method by which the allocation of the whole land of Canaan was made, and repeats the explanation of the separate treatment given to the two and a half tribes and the tribe of Levi. 6–15 Caleb now sought the fulfilment of the promise made to him in Dt. 1:36 (cf. Nu. 14:24, 30), and at his own request was given the strong city of Hebron for his inheritance out of the possession of Judah.

15:1–19 (cf. Jdg. 1:10–15, 20) describes how he claimed and enlarged this inheritance by conquest, aided by the valour of his kinsman Othniel who became his son-in-law. Harmonization of this passage with the account of Joshua's attack on Debir in 10:38, 39 is best achieved by the assumption that a second assault was necessary some time later than the lightning attack made by Joshua. Vv. 2–12 give the south, east, north, and west boundaries of the territory of Judah; 20–62 list the cities of Judah, comprising twelve districts in four geographical areas: 21 in the Negeb, the extreme South; 33 the Shephelah, the lowland; 48 the hill country; 61 the wilderness. According to the LXX a group of towns has dropped out after v. 59. If these are inserted, vv. 45–47 should be taken as one paragraph, thus still giving twelve districts. 63 indicates the failure of the tribe of Judah to dispossess the Jebusites of Jerusalem.

16:1 - 17:18 Territory of Ephraim and Manasseh. The territory of Ephraim and the remainder of the half-tribe of Manasseh in Canaan was, as we have seen, the central part of the country. Ephraim had the rich district north and south of Shechem (the southern portion), and Manasseh the northern part, fringed by the Canaanite fortresses that guarded the fertile plain of Esdraelon. Their inability to penetrate beyond these was a cause of complaint (17:14), but Joshua in effect told them that if they were the great people they claimed to be they could extend their territory by clearance and conquest. But the Israelite infantry were understandably afraid of the horses and iron-plated chariots of the Canaanite armies, which were most effective instruments of war on congenial terrain. 17:3–6 The daughters of Zelophehad claimed and received the possession promised to them by Moses under the stipulations for families without sons; cf. Nu. 27:1–11; 36:1–12. 11 The third is Naphath; probably an editorial note explaining that the third city on the list, Dor, is the Dor of Naphath-dor and not En-dor in the plain of Esdraelon.

18:1 - 19:51 Territory of the seven tribes. 18:1 It seems that the previous division of the land was carried out in Gilgal; but now the whole congregation removed to Shiloh, the earliest of the Hebrew sanctuaries, and set up the Tabernacle there (cf. 1 Sa. 1:3; Je. 7:12). 2–9 For the seven tribes who were still without defined inheritance a survey of the land was made by a commission of twenty-one members, three from each tribe. 5 stresses that the further allocation of the land must be made with due regard to the positions already occupied by Judah and Joseph. 10 The whole remaining territory was then divided up into seven portions for which lots were cast in Shiloh. 11–28 Benjamin's inheritance was allotted between that of Judah and Ephraim; 19:1–9 Simeon's was taken out of the possession of Judah, which had proved too large for them. Simeon was ultimately absorbed into Judah in literal fulfilment of the curse pronounced on Simeon and Levi (cf. Gn. 49:7).

10–39 The northern part of the country was allotted to Zebulun, Issachar, Asher and Naphtali. Issachar was settled on the northern border of Manasseh, separated from it by the line of Canaanite fortresses already mentioned. Zebulun had the area immediately north of Issachar, comprising the inland plain which was traversed by the most useful trade route of antiquity, the 'Way of the Sea', and extending to the sea coast. Asher and Naphtali divided the territory still farther north, Asher's possession lying along the coast and stretching to the great commercial city of Tyre, and Naphtali's to the east of it. 40–48 Dan's allotment was a small territory compressed into the narrow space between the north-western hills of Judah and the sea. 47 indicates that this territory was too small for them; and this is supplemented by Jdg. 1:34, which tells that the Amorites (the Philistines) forced them into the hills. The majority of the tribe accordingly migrated later to the far north and settled in Leshem (Laish); a full account of the migration is given in Jdg. 18, q.v. 49–51 After all the land had been allocated, Joshua chose his own inheritance in Timnath-serah in the territory of Ephraim.

20:1 - 21:45 Cities of refuge and cities of the Levites appointed

20:1–9 Cities of refuge appointed. According to the directions given in the law of Moses (Nu. 35:9–34; Dt. 19:1–10), the six cities of refuge were set apart and 'designated' (v. 9) for the asylum of those who had committed unintentional homicide. 1–6 The main points of the Mosaic regulations are summarized from Nu. 35:9–34; Dt. 19:1–10. 4, 5 Added to the Mosaic regulations is a note on the special responsibility of the elders of the city. 6 The regulations, until he has stood before the congregation for judgment and until the death of him who is high priest at the time, are to be interpreted, as is clearly seen from Nu. 35:24, 25, as meaning that the manslayer was to stay in the city of refuge until he had been taken back to his own city to be tried by the congregation: if proved guilty of murder, he would be handed over to the avenger of blood, but if proved innocent of intent to kill, he would be taken back to the city of refuge, there to remain until the death of the existing high priest. The death of the high priest, as the only regular national official at the time, marked the end of a definite period.

In Dt. 4:41–43 Moses set apart three cities east of Jordan. In Dt. 19:1–10 he ordered three more to be set apart when Israel took possession of the land, and provided for a third group of three if these should prove to be necessary, which they never did. 7–9 The six cities are now set apart and designated, three on each side of the Jordan, located strategically in the north, in the centre and in the south. Kedesh was in northern Galilee, Shechem in central Palestine, and Kiriath-arba (Hebron) in the hill country of Judah. On the other side of Jordan, the exact location of Bezer is unknown, though, being in the territory of Reuben, it must have been north-east of the Dead Sea; Ramoth in Gilead is in the territory of Gad in the centre; and Golan in Bashan is farther north.

21:1–45 Cities of the Levites appointed. When all the tribes had received their inheritance, the Levites claimed the cities which had been promised to them by Moses (cf. Nu. 35:1–8). As the representatives of the Hebrew faith and the ministers of its worship, it was necessary that they should be dispersed throughout the whole nation, and also that they should maintain their distinct position. To achieve both these purposes, they were given forty-eight cities out of all the tribes, along with the circle of pasture land around each of them. It may be that this pasture land, as distinct from agricultural land, was to be a reminder of the simple life which Israel had lived in the wilderness, and a constant recall to the simple religion with which that life was linked. Certainly the Levites were to be the custodians of the nation's spiritual life.

4–42 Levi's three sons gave their names to the three great branches of the Levites, the Kohathites, the Gershonites and the Merarites. The Kohathites were subdivided into the priests (Aaron's sons) and those who did not fill the priestly office. The Levitical cities were therefore divided among these four sections of the Levites. The Levites were not the exclusive possessors and inhabitants of the cities which were allocated to them. Debir, e.g., was the possession of Othniel, a non-Levite (cf. 15:15–19), though here (v. 15), it is listed as a Levitical city. The regulation meant that the Levites were given adequate room within the Levitical cities, and the right to the pasture lands around them.

43–45 This concludes the allocation of territory and cities, and the section ends with a passage extolling the faithfulness of God. Not one of all the good promises which the Lord had made to the house of Israel had failed; all came to pass.

22:1–34 Return of the eastern tribes and setting up of the altar of witness

The final incident of the settlement was the dismissal of the eastern tribes to their own inheritance on the other side of Jordan.

22:1–9 Farewell to the two and a half tribes. Having commended them warmly for their loyalty, Joshua sent them off with a solemn warning not to let their isolation make them forget their allegiance to Yahweh. 9 Their own land of which they had possessed themselves by command of the Lord through Moses seems to be an adequate answer to the frequently-expressed criticism of the two and a half tribes for taking their inheritance on the nearer side of Jordan.

22:10, 11 Erection of a memorial altar. Deeply conscious of the barrier presented by the Jordan, and anxious to denote their unity with the main body of Israel, the eastern tribes built a massive altar on the bank of the Jordan. It seems clear that the altar was built on the western side of the Jordan; the phrase on the side that belongs to the people of Israel in the report that came to the assembly of the people betrays the very attitude that the two and a half tribes feared, for it virtually disowned the tribes on the other side. It is significant that the two and a half tribes chose an altar as the symbol of their unity with the other tribes of Israel, recognizing that the basis of their unity was their common worship and their common faith. Modern study of the constitution of Israel has increasingly recognized this: until the time of the monarchy, the tribes of Israel were to a considerable extent independent units, but held together by their common loyalty to Yahweh, their covenant God. This spiritual unity found expression in worship at a common sanctuary. On this account, Israel's tribal constitution has come to be known as an amphictyony, the name given by the Greeks to similar units grouped around a central shrine. (See John Bright, A History of Israel, 1960, pp. 142ff.) In a sense, the altar at the Jordan was a symbol of the reality of the amphictyony.

22:12–20 Israel's protest against possible partition. The innocent act of the two and a half tribes was misconstrued by the western tribes as an attempt to set up a second altar of sacrifice, contrary to the Mosaic law (cf. Lv. 17:8, 9), and a deputation was sent from Shiloh, the site of the Tabernacle, the centre of Israel's worship, to investigate the alleged treachery of their brethren. Headed by Phinehas, who was noted for his zeal for the Lord and his opposition to pagan practices (cf. Nu. 25:6–18), the deputation reminded the eastern tribes of the disasters to the whole community that had followed previous acts of apostasy at Peor and Ai, and magnanimously suggested that if the land to the east of Jordan was unclean, in the sense of not being hallowed by the evident presence of Yahweh, the eastern tribes could take their possession in the west (v. 19).

22:21–29 Defence of the eastern tribes. The eastern tribes made their defence in the most solemn terms, swearing by the three names of their God (El, Elohim, Yahweh), twice repeated, the Mighty One, God, the Lord, that the altar which they had built was nothing more than a permanent monument to their kinship with the tribes across the river. Their action was motivated by a real fear lest their children should fail to realize their connection with the commonwealth of Israel.

22:30–34 Happy ending. Even a zealot for pure religion like Phinehas was satisfied. The explanation of the eastern tribes was promptly accepted and a happy reconciliation ensued: the altar itself became a perpetual witness of the episode.

23:1 - 24:33 JOSHUA'S LAST DAYS

The book of Joshua begins with his call to leadership; it ends with his farewell addresses and the account of his death. It has been suggested that chs. 23 and 24 are two accounts of the same event, since both addresses cover much of the same ground; but it seems best to consider ch. 23 as Joshua's informal address to the leaders of the people and ch. 24 as a formal, public renewal of the covenant.

23:1–16 First address

In ancient Israel and indeed among ancient nations in general, the parting words of national leaders and heads of families were very highly regarded (cf. Gn. 49; Dt. 32, 33), and Joshua's farewell address to the leaders of the people must have made a very deep impression. 2 It seems best to read Joshua summoned all Israel, i.e. their elders and heads, their judges and officers.

3–16 The address can be summarized under two main headings. The first is God's part (vv. 3, 5, 9, 10, 13–16). This consists of (a) what He has done (vv. 3, 4, 9, 10, 14). Joshua reminds his hearers of what they themselves have seen: how God has fought for them, given them an inheritance, driven out their enemies, enabling them to be victorious against impossible odds (v. 10 is a generalization, 'one of you can put a thousand to flight') and proving utterly faithful to His promises (v. 14). b. What He will do (vv. 5, 13, 15, 16). God's continuing help for Israel and Israel's continuing success are promised (v. 5). Vv. 13, 15, 16 indicate that this is contingent on Israel's faithfulness to the covenant. Apostasy would mean the turning of all the good they had known to terrible evil. The second main heading is man's part. Israel's responsibility included four things: obedience to God's law (v. 6), separation from the idolatrous nations of Canaan (v. 7; in v. 12 intermarriage is specifically forbidden), loyalty (v. 8) and, including everything else, love (v. 11).

24:1–28 Second address and renewal of the covenant

One of the most important landmarks in recent study of the Old Testament was the publication of George Mendenhall's 'Law and Covenant in Israel and the Ancient Near East' (BA, 17, 1954; reprinted separately, 1955). In this study he pointed out striking parallels in form between the covenant at Sinai and the formal treaties drawn up between the great king and his vassal states within the Hittite Empire in the period c. 1450–1200 BC. These suzerainty covenants followed a regular pattern; a preamble, in which the author of the covenant is identified; a historical prologue, in 'I—thou' form, describing past benevolent acts performed by the great king for the benefit of his vassal; stipulations, general and particular, indicating the obligations imposed upon and accepted by the vassal, including no dealings with the great king's enemies, good relationships with other vassals and active support for the king as required; a provision for the depositing of a copy of the covenant in the vassal's sanctuary and for its periodic public reading; a list of deities invoked as witnesses of the covenant; and blessings and curses as sanctions of the covenant.

It is quite clear that what we have in Jos. 24:1–28 is a renewal of the Sinaitic covenant, brought up to date, and that it follows closely the pattern of the classic suzerainty covenant. One of the features of that type of covenant was the necessity for its renewal from time to time. And that is exactly what we have at Shechem, where Joshua called the people of Israel together to confirm their covenant relationship with their God (cf. Dt. 31:9–13). The exposition of the chapter may usefully follow the divisions of the classic mid-second millennium BC covenant form.

2a Preamble: the Author of the covenant is identified as the Lord, the God of Israel. 2b–13 Historical prologue or retrospect: here Yahweh Himself recapitulates His past beneficence to His people: the call of Abraham (vv. 2–4) and the deliverance from Egypt (vv. 5–7) were evidences of his special relationship to His people. In their own experience, the defeat of the Amorites (v. 8) and the frustration of Balaam's evil designs (vv. 9, 10), the crossing of the Jordan and the capture of Jericho (v. 11), and the defeat of the nations of Canaan, brought the history of Yahweh's mighty acts on their behalf right up to date (vv. 12, 13). 12 The hornet; Garstang argued very persuasively for identifying this with Egyptian forces which had devastated the land before Israel moved in. The cogency of his argument depended to a large extent on his dating of the conquest, which is now generally rejected: in any case, there is no evidence that the Egyptian forces ever pillaged the territory of Og and Bashan, the two kings of the Amorites. It is most unlikely that a literal plague of hornets is referred to, and perhaps the best clue to the meaning of the vivid figure used is found in the parallel passage in Dt. 7:20–23: 'The Lord your God will send hornets among them. . . . The Lord your God will give them over to you, and throw them into great confusion, until they are destroyed.' Panic and wild confusion, like that caused by an invasion of hornets, were God's advance secret weapon, by the help of which Israel would conquer. What is stressed is that the victory was gained not by force of arms but by God's miraculous intervention, not by your sword or by your bow (cf. Ps. 44:1–3).

14, 15 The stipulations: the basic stipulation is exclusive loyalty; put away the gods which your fathers served beyond the River, and in Egypt. Joshua was wise enough to indicate that there were alternatives: whether the gods your fathers served in the region beyond the River, i.e. in Ur of the Chaldees, or the gods of the Amorites in whose land you dwell. These latter were to prove a constant temptation in Israel's later history. There were alternatives, but Joshua indicated his irrevocable choice: as for me and my house, we will serve the Lord.

16–18 gives the people's all too glib and ready acceptance of the stipulations of the covenant. It is significant that their response in vv. 17, 18 is based on their acceptance of the truth of the claims made by their divine Benefactor in vv. 5–12. They were virtually saying 'yes' to what God had said to them. Joshua therefore bound them in a renewed covenant in the most solemn way possible. 19, 20 Joshua reminds them that it was no slight thing which they were binding themselves to do: you cannot serve the Lord. He declared that Yahweh is a holy and jealous God and is therefore not to be worshipped or served lightly. When he solemnly asserted, He will not forgive your transgressions or your sins. he was not laying down a general rule regarding forgiveness (which is always promised to the repentant sinner), but was referring to the particular sin of blatant denial of God, as v. 20 clearly shows: if you forsake the Lord and serve foreign gods. . . . (Cf. Nu. 15:30, which also declares that there is no forgiveness for sin with a high hand.) There seems to be a parallel in this passage in Joshua to the teaching on the unpardonable sin of Mt. 12:31, 32, where there is no forgiveness for those who blatantly ascribe to the evil one (Baal-zebub or Be-elzebub) the deeds done by the mighty power of God. Joshua warned the people that to ascribe to the Baals of Canaan the power which belonged to Yahweh alone was a sin which, persisted in, could not be forgiven. 21 The people met Joshua's challenge and warning with the confident assertion, Nay; but we will serve the Lord. 22 The witnesses: there could be no appeal to pagan gods as witnesses, as in the Hittite treaties, but the people themselves are named as witnesses of the covenant. 23 Were there foreign gods among them? The Hebrew word translated among you can be translated 'within you'; the seeds of possible idolatry were in their hearts.

26 Depositing of the covenant: Joshua wrote these words in the book of the law of God, no doubt to be deposited, as in Dt. 31:26, 'by the side of the ark of the covenant'. 27 A great stone set up under the famous oak of Shechem was declared to be a witness to the people's solemn declaration. It is of interest to note that a great limestone pillar has been recovered by archaeologists excavating the site of Shechem. The normal blessings and cursings attached to such covenants are not explicitly inserted, as they are in Dt. 28, but they are implied in the warnings of this verse and of vv. 19, 20. Cf. the previous renewal of the covenant at Shechem in Jos. 8:30–35.

So the last public act of Joshua was to lead his people in a great act of covenant renewal.

24:29–33 Joshua's death and burial

Joshua died at a good old age, and the greatest tribute to his life was paid when the sacred historian wrote, And Israel served the Lord all the days of Joshua, and all the days of the elders who outlived Joshua.

The book closes with the account of the burying of the body of Joseph, carried through all the wanderings of the wilderness and at last laid to rest in the promised land, in the sacred ground of Shechem. It may be, as many commentators have maintained, that his burial took place long before the death of Joshua. But surely it was inspired editing which placed the account of it here, symbolizing at the close the message of the whole book of Joshua, the faithfulness of God.

HUGH J. BLAIR

Judges

INTRODUCTION

The book of Judges (Heb. šōp^{e}ṭîm) is so called from the successive figures who are depicted in it as raised up by Yahweh to deliver the tribes of Israel from their enemies and to 'judge' them—i.e. not necessarily to rule them, but to execute the judgment of God on their behalf. The word šōp^{e}ṭîm is cognate with the Phoenician word by which, according to Roman writers, the chief magistrates of Carthage were known 1,000 years later (suffetes). In the Samaritan records the judges are called 'kings'. In the Hebrew Bible Judges is the second book of the 'Former Prophets', following Joshua and preceding Samuel and Kings.

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

Judges deals with the first two or three centuries following the entry of the tribes of Israel into Canaan under Joshua (c. 1250–1200 BC). This period coincides with the beginning of the Iron Age in the Middle East. The Iron Age was inaugurated when an effective and economic process for smelting iron was devised. Iron is much commoner than copper and tin, the constituents of the metal which gave its name to the preceding Bronze Age, but not so easy to work.

To be sure, we have isolated examples of some wrought-iron implements several centuries earlier, frequently of meteoric iron; but not until the metal could be produced in bulk did its use begin to affect the course of civilization. When such a process was devised, the consequences were radical and far-reaching, for agriculture and industry as well as for warfare. The first place where it was devised was apparently in the district of Kizzuwatna, in eastern Asia Minor, in the territory of the Hittite Empire, c. 1400 BC. The Hebrew word for 'iron', barzel, is borrowed from Hittite barzillu. The kings of the Hittites and of the neighbouring Mitanni Empire adopted a policy of secrecy over the production, and controlled the output and export of iron. The Mitanni kings sent presents of iron objects to the Pharaohs, until Mitanni was conquered by the Hittites c. 1370 BC. Presents of this kind were cautiously rationed; when one monarch (perhaps a king of Assyria) wrote to ask the Hittite king Hattusilis III for a supply of iron c. 1260 BC, his royal 'brother' put him off on various pretexts and sent him only one dagger. Such a policy of secrecy, however, was no more successful in antiquity than today; and by c. 1200 BC the Bronze Age in the Middle East, with its great civilizations, passes out in the crashing of empires, and the Iron Age dawns amid barbaric invasions.

In the OT the advent of the Iron Age is reflected in the iron bedstead (or was it a basalt sarcophagus?) of Og king of Bashan, a museum-piece for later ages (Dt. 3:11); in the iron chariots of the Canaanites (Jos. 17:16), including Sisera's 900 chariots of iron (Jdg. 4:3); and in the Philistine retention of the monopoly of iron-working to the disadvantage of the Israelites (1 Sa. 13:19–22).

The Israelite entry into Canaan and settlement in the land was contemporary with a great movement of peoples in the Middle East (probably itself the result of large-scale 'folk-wanderings' in the Eurasian steppe-lands), which involved the downfall of the Minoan, Hittite and Mycenaean Empires. Canaan found itself the centre of a great movement of invading bands, both from the land and from the sea. Its connection with Egypt was close under the Asiatic Hyksos Dynasties (c. 1720–1580 BC); and the kings of the XVIIIth Dynasty (1580–1319), who expelled the Hyksos rulers, added Canaan to the Egyptian Empire. But towards the end of that Dynasty we find the cities of E Canaan attacked by people called the Ḫabiru, a name given to semi-nomadic groups whom we meet all over W Asia from the 18th to the 13th century BC. The word 'Ḫabiru' may be identical with 'Hebrews', the name of the group to which the Israelites belonged, though these Ḫabiru are probably not to be identified with the Israelites led by Joshua. The diplomatic correspondence of the reign of Akhnaton (1377–1360 BC), recorded on the tablets uncovered at Tell el-Amarna in 1887, contains despairing pleas from provincial governors in Canaan for help against the Ḫabiru—help which never came. (See F. F. Bruce, 'Tell el-Amarna', in Archaeology and OT Study, ed. D. W. Thomas, 1967.)

In the earlier years of the XIXth Dynasty (1319–1200) an attempt was made by the Egyptian kings to reconquer Canaan, in the course of which they came into conflict with the Hittite Empire N of Palestine. After the indecisive battle of Kadesh on the Upper Orontes in 1297, the two emperors struck a treaty (c. 1280) and agreed on the delimitation of their realms—wisely, because both had cause to look anxiously over their shoulders at menaces from fresh quarters. The Hittite king was threatened by the Assyrians on the E, while from the W the Aḫḫiyawa (Achaeans?) pressed him hard, themselves pushed by the force of folk-migrations farther inside Europe; as for Egypt, its coasts began to be attacked by raiders from the sea. These were repulsed by Merenptah (c. 1230 BC), as was also a second raiding coalition in the reign of Rameses III (c. 1194); but, unable to gain a footing in Egypt, some of them settled on the Canaanite coast. Of these the most notable were the Philistines, who speedily established and maintained their hegemony over great areas of Canaan until the reign of David (1010–970). It was they who gave to the country its name of Palestine, abridged from Greek Syria Palaistinē, i.e. 'Philistine Syria'.

ERA OF THE JUDGES

In this historical setting we must place the Israelites' entry into Canaan and the era of the judges. The events of Judges may be dated between 1250 and 1050 BC.

J. Garstang, who placed the entry into Canaan c. 1400 BC, in conformity with his dating of the destruction of Jericho, worked out in his book Joshua-Judges (1931) a system of coincidences of the chronology of Egypt and Israel in the period of the judges, by which he made it appear that the successive periods of 'rest' in Judges corresponded with those periods in which the Egyptian influence was dominant in Palestine. The periods of oppression then coincided with the years in which the Egyptian power was weaker and the peoples in and around Canaan could act with greater freedom. There are, however, grave difficulties in the way of dating the invasion of Canaan so early as Garstang does. It was not, apparently, until the 13th century BC that the Transjordanian kingdoms were founded, and they existed as kingdoms towards the end of the wilderness wanderings. Again, Garstang's scheme assumes all the judges to have been consecutive, whereas internal evidence indicates that some of them at least arose simultaneously in separate parts of the land.

Above all, Garstang's correlation of the archaeological date of the site of Jericho with the biblical record must be radically revised in the light of the expeditions led by K. M. Kenyon (1952–58). Of the last Late Bronze Age town (Joshua's Jericho) practically nothing remains, because of erosion; Garstang's identification of one of the lines of town walls as belonging to Joshua's Jericho proved to be mistaken. Archaeological evidence for dating Joshua's capture of Jericho is therefore lacking, but the Israelite destruction of other Canaanite strongholds is best dated archaeologically towards the end of the 13th century BC.

AUTHOR'S APPROACH TO HISTORY

The title 'Father of History' is traditionally, and with reason, accorded to Herodotus, the Greek historian, who wrote in the second half of the 5th century BC. His predecessors were mere annalists or chroniclers; but a historian must be something more. He must see the underlying operation of cause and effect; he will have a philosophy of history by which he can present the course of events as the expression of basic principles. In this respect Herodotus had predecessors in the historians of Israel. To them history was the story of God's dealing with His people and the other nations; they penetrated beneath the surface to find the root cause of events in the ways of God. The historians from Joshua to 2 Kings display the 'Deuteronomic' philosophy of history, so called because it finds clearest expression in Deuteronomy. The cause of prosperity is found in obedience to the will of God, and especially in avoidance of the native Baalism of Canaan, with its demoralizing fertility cults; adversity is the sure sequel to departure from this strait path. This attitude is plain in the framework of Judges. The people's lapsing from the worship of Yahweh and their serving of other gods is regularly followed by foreign oppression; then they cry to Yahweh in their affliction and He raises up a deliverer for them.

This picture of the history of the period is no pious fiction. When the tribes maintained their loyalty to Yahweh and the Sinaitic covenant, symbolized by the ark, they were united and strong; when they lapsed into Baalism their bond of union was lost and they were divided and weak. The times of deliverance were therefore generally accompanied by a return to the faith which they had learnt in the wilderness, in the strength of which, nomads as they were, they were able to overthrow the more highly civilized nations of Canaan.

DATE AND COMPOSITION

As for the date of the book in its present form, we have a few indications: the words 'as long as the house of God was at Shiloh' (18:31) imply a time later than the destruction of Shiloh in the days of Samuel; the repeated words 'In those days there was no king in Israel' (17:6; 18:1, etc.) suggest a date under the monarchy; the reference in 18:30, 'until the day of the captivity of the land', probably indicates the Assyrian captivity in the 8th century BC, i.e. the carrying away of the population of Galilee by Tiglath-pileser III in 732.

The author's 'philosophy of history' may suggest a date after Josiah's reformation (621 BC), which was based on the recovery of the Deuteronomic law-code. Indeed, the whole corpus of the 'Former Prophets' is widely regarded today as one continuous historical work, covering the period from the settlement in Canaan onwards, composed under the influence of Josiah's Deuteronomic reformation (with an appendix carrying the story on to the middle of the Babylonian exile, 562 BC). This view (propounded especially by M. Noth) has much more to be said in its favour than that of G. Hölscher and O. Eissfeldt which regards the 'Former Prophets' as being based on continuations of the main Pentateuchal sources. E.

Robertson, in The Old Testament Problem (1950, pp. 159ff.), finds internal evidence that Judges belongs to a time when the rivalry between Jews and Samaritans was keen. Jdg. 1:21, indeed, more naturally indicates a date earlier than David's capture of Jerusalem (c. 1003 BC), and Jdg. 1:29 must be earlier than the acquisition of Gezer by Solomon (c. 950). But such evidences of earlier date simply show that the component parts of Judges are mostly older than the finished book as it has come down to us. For the author had at his disposal much ancient material, the oldest being the Song of Deborah (5:2–31a), contemporary with the event it celebrates. Most of his materials he has arranged so as to bring out his philosophy of history. The main part of the book—the tale of repeated falling into idolatry, foreign oppression and deliverance—is put in a framework built up on a recurring form of this nature: 'And the children of Israel did evil in the sight of the Lord, and the Lord sold them into the hand of A, king of B, who oppressed them x years. And they cried to the Lord, and he raised up a deliverer for them, C the son of D, and he prevailed against A, king of B, and delivered Israel, and the land had rest y years (or: and he judged Israel y years).'

Into such a framework as this are fitted the oppressions of Cushan-rishathaim, Eglon, Jabin, Midian, Ammon, and the Philistines, with the corresponding deliverances wrought respectively by Othniel, Ehud, Deborah and Barak, Gideon, Jephthah and Samson. This main part of Judges (3–16), from which the book receives its name, contains also the incident of Shamgar (3:31), the story of Abimelech (9:1–57), and brief notes on the five minor judges, Tola and Jair, and Ibzan, Elon and Abdon (10:1–5; 12:8–15). Perhaps the author envisaged a total of twelve judges (comprising both major and minor); cf. the estimate in 1 Ki. 6:1 of the period from the Exodus to the foundation of Solomon's Temple as 480 years, i.e. twelve generations.

All this is preceded by an introductory section which includes a. a summary of the conquest of the land (1:1 – 2:10), drawn from one or more early sources, some parts of which are incorporated also in the narrative of Joshua, and b. a statement of the author's philosophy of history, explaining why so many of the Canaanite and other non-Israelite inhabitants were left in the land (2:11 – 3:4).

The book draws to a conclusion with two unattached narratives, chronologically referring to the earlier part of the period of the judges, which have not been incorporated into the author's framework: a. the northward migration of the tribe of Dan and the establishment of their sanctuary (17;18) and b. the war against Benjamin (19–21). Both of these narratives illustrate the unsettled conditions of a time when 'there was no king in Israel: every man did what was right in his own eyes'.

IMPORTANCE OF THE AGE OF THE JUDGES

The tribes of Israel in this period constituted an amphictyonic league—an expression borrowed from Greek history, denoting an association of cities or other groups sharing a common sanctuary and linked by their obligations to it. The common sanctuary shared by the tribes of Israel was that which housed the ark of the covenant, the palladium of the sacred bond which united them in the worship of Yahweh. Before the settlement in Canaan the ark was housed in a movable tent-shrine. After the settlement, Shiloh was chosen as the site for the ark and its shrine (cf. Jos. 18:1; Jdg. 18:31; 21:12ff.; 1 Sa. 1:3), although other sites appear to have been used from time to time, such as Gilgal (Jdg. 2:1), Mizpah (Jdg. 20:1) and Bethel (Jdg. 20:18); cf. 2 Sa. 7:6 where, as late as the reign of David, Yahweh says, 'I have not dwelt in a house since the day I brought up the people of Israel from Egypt to this day, but I have been moving about in a tent for my dwelling.'

This inter-tribal sanctuary, staffed by a priesthood which traced its lineage back to Aaron (Jdg. 20:28), was Israel's one cohesive institution before the establishment of the monarchy. Its unifying influence could operate only when the tribes' sense of covenant loyalty was strong. It survived the various vicissitudes recorded in Judges, but when it was destroyed by the Philistines and the ark was captured by them (1 Sa. 4; Je. 7:12ff.; 26:6, 9), only the personality and achievement of Samuel, and his inauguration of the monarchy, saved Israel's national identity.

The period of the judges, then—'Israel's iron age', as it has been called (in a spiritual, not economic, sense)—was a period of adaptation to the conditions of life in Canaan, a period of struggle for national survival. If we were restricted to the book of Judges, the struggle might appear foredoomed to defeat; how defeat was turned into victory is told in the sequel, in the books of Samuel.

Religiously, it is presented as a period during which the nation was being fashioned by its God in the furnace of affliction to be His chosen instrument for the furtherance of His purpose in the world. Unedifying as the details of many of the individual episodes may be thought, together they portray the God of Israel's unceasing faithfulness to His covenant with His people, in spite of their recurrent unfaithfulness, as He deals with them in mercy and judgment, showing them what is practically involved for them in being His people and having Him as their God.

Later generations looked back to the period of the judges as one during which God acted signally for the defence of His people. Thus Samuel, in his farewell address to Israel, reminds them how God delivered them from Egypt under Moses and Aaron 'and made them dwell in this place'. 'But', he goes on, 'they forgot the Lord their God; and he sold them into the hand of Sisera, commander of the army of Jabin king of Hazor, and into the hand of the Philistines, and into the hand of the king of Moab; and they fought against them. And they cried to the Lord, and said, "We have sinned, because we have forsaken the Lord, and have served the Baals and the Ashtaroth; but now deliver us out of the hand of our enemies, and we will serve thee." And the Lord sent Jerubbaal and Barak, and Jephthah, . . . and delivered you out of the hand of your enemies on every side; and you dwelt in safety' (1 Sa. 12:8–11). Other incidents in the period of the judges are referred to in 2 Sa. 11:21; Is. 9:4; 10:26. But the most outstanding tribute to the men of this period is paid in Heb. 11:32ff., where 'Gideon, Barak, Samson, Jephthah' are named among those who 'through faith conquered kingdoms, enforced justice, received promises, . . . escaped the edge of the sword, won strength out of weakness, became mighty in war, put foreign armies to flight'.

COMMENTARY

1:1 – 2:5 PARTIAL CONQUEST OF CANAAN BY ISRAEL

1:1–21 Conquest of south Canaan

1 After the death of Joshua. This is best regarded as an editorial note; the death of Joshua appears in its chronological setting at 2:8. Jdg. 1 is a collection of miscellaneous fragments: vv. 2–21, the conquest of S Canaan by Judah and affiliated groups; vv. 22–26, the capture of Bethel by the Joseph tribes; vv. 27–36, a list of cities from which the central and northern tribes could not drive out their Canaanite inhabitants. On the relation between these fragments and the narrative of Joshua see G. E. Wright, 'The Literary and Historical Problem of Joshua x and Judges i', Journal of Near Eastern Studies, 5, 1946, pp. 105–114 (with critique by H. H. Rowley, From Joseph to Joshua, 1950, pp. 100f.). Who shall go up first for us? Nu. 21:1–3 records an Israelite invasion from the south earlier than that from the east; cf. Jdg. 1:16, 17. 3 And Judah said to Simeon his brother. A tribe or nation is often spoken of in terms of its ancestor; this is obviously so here, but it is also found in places where it is not so obvious. Simeon ceased at an early date to be a separate tribe and was incorporated with Judah. 4 Then Judah went up. Part of this territory had been inhabited by Judah and his family before the descent into Egypt (Gn. 38). The Canaanites and the Perizzites. The Perizzites are obscure, but may have been an indigenous people of different race from the Canaanites. 5 They came upon Adoni-bezek at Bezek. This Bezek was presumably in the S of Canaan, but is otherwise unknown. The name of its king means 'lord of Bezek'. 6 Cut off his thumbs and his great toes. Probably to degrade him by mutilation, and not merely to disable him from the use of weapons. 7 They brought him to Jerusalem. The earliest city, on the hill Ophel, S of the Temple area, is shown by archaeological evidence to go back to c. 3000 BC. Jerusalem is mentioned in Egyptian texts c. 1900 BC, and is perhaps the Salem of Gn. 14:18. The Canaanite city was a mixed Hittite–Amorite foundation (Ezk. 16:3). It was one of the chief Canaanite city-states in the Amarna age (c. 1400–1360 BC).

8 And the men of Judah fought against Jerusalem, and took it. The book of Joshua records the killing of the king of Jerusalem (Jos. 10:22ff.; 12:10), but not the capture of his city. Proponents of the earlier chronology connect the present incident with the Ḫabiru threat to Jerusalem under its king Abdi-ḫiba in the reign of Akhnaton (c. 1370 BC); but the details of the two situations do not match. If Jerusalem here is the Jebusite capital, its capture can have been only an isolated incident in the conquest, followed immediately by its recapture by the Jebusites (cf. 1:21). But R. P. S. Hubbard ('The Topography of Ancient Jerusalem', PEQ, 98, 1966, p. 137) suggests that the Jerusalem captured by the Hebrews under Joshua was not the Jebusite capital on Ophel but a settlement on the SW hill. 10 Now the name of Hebron was formerly Kiriath-arba. Kiriath-arba means 'city of four', i.e. tetrapolis or fourfold city, pointing to an early 'confederacy', which is the meaning of the name Hebron. According to Nu. 13:22 Hebron was built 7 years before Tanis (Zoan) in Egypt. This probably refers to the Hyksos fortification of Tanis (Avaris), which dates the foundation of Hebron c. 1725 BC. Jdg. 1:10–15 is parallel to Jos. 15:14–19, where the capture of Hebron as well as of Debir is ascribed to Caleb. And they defeated Sheshai and Ahiman and Talmai. These are named as 'children of Anak' (meaning perhaps 'the long-necked people') in the narrative of the spies in Nu. 13:22. Cf. Jdg. 1:20.

11 From there they went against the inhabitants of Debir. The capture of Debir was easy after Hebron was taken. Its former name Kiriath-sepher (or Kiriath-sopher) means 'city of books' (or 'city of scribes'). The site (mod. Tell Beit Mirsim) has been excavated; the Late Bronze Age city is found to have been burnt c. 1230 BC, and thereupon rebuilt with thinner walls, a smaller population and a lower culture. 13 Othniel the son of Kenaz, Caleb's younger brother, took it. The 'sons of Kenaz' (Kenizzites), along with such other nomads as the Kenites (v. 16) and the Jerahmeelites, were fused with the tribe of Judah.

16 The descendants of the Kenite, Moses' father-in-law. RV renders 'Moses' brother in law', regarding the Kenite in question as Hobab (cf. 4:11). Hebrew ḥôṯēn (lit. 'circumciser'?) means father-in-law, but if vocalized ḥāṯān it might mean 'brother in law' (RV). But the normal meaning of ḥāṯān is 'son-in-law' or 'bridegroom' (cf. Ex. 4:25, 26), because at one time he was apparently circumcised by the father-in-law on the eve of marriage. Hence the translation should read 'whose son-in-law Moses was'. (See also on Nu. 10:29–32.) The Kenites (from Heb. qain, 'smith') were a nomad people, evidently travelling tinkers, inhabiting the Negeb and Arabah, neighbours of the Amalekites. The city of palms; i.e. date-palms. This expression usually denotes Jericho (cf. 3:13); but the reference here may be to Tamar ('palm'), 85 miles S of Arad. Which lies in the Negeb near Arad. Cf. the defeat of the king of Arad in Nu. 21:1–3. The Canaanite city of Arad is identified by Y. Aharoni with Tell el-Milḥ. 17 So the name of the city was called Hormah, i.e. 'devotion', in the sense of complete destruction. See Nu. 21:3 for another account, and cf. also Nu. 14:45; Dt. 1:44. Aharoni identifies Hormah with Tell el-Meshash, near Tell el-Milḥ; both sites have abundant water supplies quite near and were occupied in the Middle and Late Bronze Age periods. 18 Judah also took Gaza . . . Ashkelon . . . and Ekron. These cities, with Ashdod and Gath, were shortly afterwards (early in the 12th century) occupied by the Philistines. 19 He took possession of the hill country. The Canaanites continued to maintain their centres of civilization on the lower ground which their iron chariots enabled them to control. Their knowledge of the working of iron, which the Israelites did not acquire till two centuries later, was derived from the Hittites and Mitanni (see Introduction). 20 And Hebron was given to Caleb. Cf. Jos. 15:13. 21 But the people of Benjamin did not drive out the Jebusites who dwelt in Jerusalem. Cf. Jos. 15:63 where Judah is named instead of Benjamin. Cf. also Jos. 18:28. Jerusalem lay on the tribal border of Judah and Benjamin. The Jebusites were probably an Amorite group who settled on an earlier Hittite foundation in Jerusalem. The Jebusites have dwelt with the people of Benjamin in Jerusalem to this day. This suggests a date for this part of Judges earlier than c. 1003 BC, when David took the city, although the mixed Hittite–Amorite population continued to live there after that time; cf. Araunah the Jebusite (2 Sa. 24:16) whose name has been thought to be an Indo-European Hittite word for 'nobleman', or 'freeman' (arawanis).

1:22–26 Capture of Bethel

22 The house of Joseph also went up against Bethel. We turn now from southern to central Canaan. Bethel means 'the house of God' (cf. Gn. 12:8; 13:3, 4; 28:19; 31:13, etc.); the name suggests an ancient sanctuary. Excavations on the site (mod. Beitin) show that the Late Bronze Age city was attacked and burnt in the latter part of the 13th century BC. Here its capture is the first and most notable exploit of the house of Joseph. 26 And the man went to the land of the Hittites, i.e. into N Syria, beyond the upper Orontes, the boundary between the Hittite and Egyptian Empires. This may indicate that the man was himself a member of the immigrant Hittite population which had settled in the hill country of Judah. The new city of Luz which the man founded is unknown, though the place-name Lazi in the Alalaḫ tablets may be connected with it.

1:27–36 Cities which Israel could not take

27 Manasseh did not drive out . . . Beth-shean . . . Taanach . . . Dor . . . Ibleam . . . Megiddo. Vv. 27 and 28 are parallel to Jos. 17:11, 12. The cities named formed a line of Canaanite strongpoints across the plain of Esdraelon from E to W, separating the Joseph tribes in central Canaan from the northern tribes. Beth-shean was occupied by Egyptian garrisons until the reign of Rameses III (1198–1167 BC). Taanach, mod. Tell Ta'annek, c. 5 miles SE of Megiddo. Its 12th-century occupation ended c. 1125 BC in a violent destruction (cf. 5:19); see P. W. Lapp, 'Taanach by the Waters of Megiddo', The Biblical Archaeologist, 30, 1967, pp. 2ff. Early in the 12th century Dor was occupied by the Tjeker, one of the wandering sea-peoples. Ibleam, mod. Khirbet Bil'ameh, c. 10 miles SE of Megiddo. Megiddo was under Egyptian control during the first half of that century; it was destroyed about the same time as Taanach (cf. P. W. Lapp, loc. cit., p. 9).

29 And Ephraim did not drive out the Canaanites who dwelt in Gezer. This is parallel to Jos. 16:10. Gezer, in the SW of the territory of Ephraim, did not pass under Israelite control until c. 950 BC (cf. 1 Ki. 9:16). It was conquered by Egypt during the XVIIIth Dynasty and again during the XIXth, according to Merenptah's claim (c. 1230 BC). It occupied a strategic position on the road from the coastal plain to Jerusalem via the valley of Aijalon.

31 Asher did not drive out . . . Acco, or . . . Sidon. It was only along the Phoenician coast that the Canaanites maintained their independence, which they did until the 6th century BC. Acco (NT Ptolemais) was used as a port though it had no properly protected harbour. Sidon in the time of the judges was more prominent than its sister-city Tyre, which gained the ascendancy by the time of David. Cf. Jos. 19:28f. Sidon had been subject to Egypt under the XIXth Dynasty but defected under its ruler Zimri-ada in the Amarna age. It was raided by the Philistines c. 1150 BC, and its inhabitants fled to Tyre. 33 Naphtali did not drive out . . . Beth-shemesh, or . . . Beth-anath. These were two sanctuaries, the former dedicated to the worship of the sun-god, and identified by J. Garstang with Kedesh-Naphtali of 4:6; the latter dedicated to the worship of Anath, the Canaanite goddess of fertility who appears in the Ras Shamra tablets as the consort of Baal. 34 The Amorites pressed the Danites into the hill country. This pressure soon caused the Danites to migrate northwards (see ch. 18). The Amorites (i.e. 'westerners'—from the Akkadian viewpoint) were Semitic invaders from the Arabian desert who arrived in the Fertile Crescent c. 2000 BC. By 1750 they ruled the main cities from Syria to Babylon. 35 The Amorite cities formed a barrier between the Joseph tribes and Judah. 36 Their eastern border is given as the ascent of Akrabbim (i.e. 'scorpions') in SE Judah near the S of the Dead Sea, the district in which lay the Amorite Hazazon-tamar of Gn. 14:7.

2:1–5 The angel of the Lord at Bochim

1 Now the angel of the Lord went up from Gilgal to Bochim. The angel of Yahweh is the expression widely used in the OT to denote Yahweh Himself in His manifestation to men. Cf. Jdg. 6:11–24; 13:3–21. Gilgal (the name implies the presence of a circle, probably of standing stones) lies between the Jordan and Jericho, possibly on the site of mod. Khirbet el-Mefjir, 1½ miles NE of Jericho. For Bochim the original text seems to have had 'Bethel', a reading which is preserved in LXX. This may point to an early movement of the ark and its tent-shrine from Gilgal (Jos. 4:18f.) to Bethel (Jdg. 20:26f.). 2 You shall make no covenant with the inhabitants of this land. The words quoted in vv. 2, 3, are part of the terms of Yahweh's covenant with Israel (cf. Ex. 23:33; 34:12–16; Nu. 33:55; Dt. 7:2, 5, 16; 12:3). 5 They called the name of that place Bochim, i.e., 'weepers'. Some have seen a connection with the 'oak of weeping' below Bethel (Gn. 35:8).

2:6 – 3:6 WHY SOME GENTILE NATIONS WERE LEFT IN THE LAND

2:6–10 The death of Joshua and the elders

6 When Joshua dismissed the people. Cf. Jos. 24:28–31 for a parallel to vv. 6–9, with some variation in the sequence of sentences. 10 And there arose another generation after them, who did not know the Lord. Here begins the actual sequel to Joshua. For the language of this verse cf. Ex. 1:8.

2:11–13 The idolatry of the Israelites

11 And the people of Israel did what was evil in the sight of the Lord and served the Baals, i.e. the local varieties of the chief fertility-god of Canaan (see v. 13). 13 They forsook the Lord, and served the Baals and the Ashtaroth. Baal ('lord') was a familiar name for the storm-god Hadad, son of El in the Canaanite mythology. He personified the rain and fertility-forces of nature, and his cult, calculated to ensure the fertilization of the ground by regular rainfall, was marked by the 'sacred marriage' and orgiastic rites operating as a form of sympathetic magic. Ashtaroth is the plural of Ashtoreth or Ashtart (Gk. Astarte), the deity of the planet Venus, and in Palestine the consort of Baal. (In N Syria, his consort was Anath: see on 1:33.) There was a tendency to turn to Baal-worship in peace-time, as it was thought to ensure good harvests, but the pressure of invasion and war made Israel mindful of the God of their fathers who had led them to victory against all their foes.

2:14–19 Summary of the period of the judges

14 They could no longer withstand their enemies. In those periods when they exchanged the invigorating worship of Yahweh for the enervating Baal-worship, the sense of Israelite unity was lost because of the weakening of the covenant-bond which, in binding them to Yahweh, bound them also to each other; they thus presented a divided front to their assailants. 17 They played the harlot after other gods. Idolatry is regularly represented as spiritual adultery, as the covenant relation between Yahweh and Israel is conceived of in terms of a marriage.

2:20 – 3:6 The leaving of some nations to prove Israel

21 I will not henceforth drive out before them any of the nations that Joshua left when he died. Three reasons are given for Yahweh's allowing the Canaanites to remain in the land alongside Israel: to punish Israel for religious apostasy (2:3, 20, 21); to test Israel's fidelity to Yahweh (2:22; 3:4); to provide Israel with experience in warfare (3:2). Dt. 7:20–24 adds a fourth reason: to prevent the land from becoming a wilderness. 22 That by them I may test Israel. What we should express by a clause of result is here (as commonly in Hebrew) expressed by a clause of purpose.

3:1 That is, all . . . who had no experience of any war in Canaan, i.e. the generations following that which took part in the invasion and conquest. Here and in v. 2 the slowness of the conquest is represented as providential, to teach succeeding generations the art of war. Cf. Ex.

23:29, 30; Dt. 7:22. 3 The five lords of the Philistines, i.e. the rulers of the five chief city-states, Ashdod, Ashkelon, Ekron, Gaza and Gath. The word translated lord (Heb. seren) is not Semitic, but apparently a native Philistine word, taken by them from their Anatolian home. It appears to be cognate with the (pre-Hellenic) Greek koiranos or tyrannos; cf. hieroglyphic Hittite tarwana. The Philistines seem to have come from Caria in Asia Minor. The Philistine guards of the palace in Jerusalem are called 'Carites' (Heb. Kārîm) in 2 Sa. 20:23, RV mg.; 2 Ki. 11:4, 19. The other name, Cherethites, by which they are sometimes called (1 Sa. 30:14; 2 Sa. 8:18), indicates a connection with Crete in the course of their migration southwards (cf. Am. 9:7, where God brings up the Philistines from Caphtor, i.e. Crete). About 1190 BC they settled in Palestine in territory previously occupied by the Avvim (cf. Dt. 2:23). They later expanded N and E, conquering most of Palestine (see Jdg. 13:1). They are depicted on the monuments wearing helmets crowned with feathers, a head-dress which the ancients considered typically Carian. Their armour, as described in 1 Sa. 17:5–7, is reminiscent of that of the Homeric warriors. And all the Canaanites. Those mentioned in 1:27–33. And the Sidonians, i.e. the Phoenicians, so called because at this time their chief town was Sidon (see on 1:31). And the Hivites who dwelt on Mount Lebanon. These have not been identified with absolute certainty. The attempt by A. E. Cowley and A. H. Sayce to equate them with the Achaeans (comparing Heb. Ḥiwwî with Hitt. Aḫḫiyawa) has not commended itself. They are generally identified with the Horites; either they were a branch of the Horites, or else 'Hivite' wherever it occurs should be amended to 'Horite'. LXX reads 'Hittites' here. The Horites (or Hurrians) invaded northern Mesopotamia and Syria from the eastern highlands; by the 18th century BC they already formed part of the indigenous population in and around Alalaḫ (N Syria). About 1550 BC they established the kingdom of Mitanni in Upper Mesopotamia. Many of the patriarchal customs appear to be of Horite origin. In the 15th and 14th centuries they spread so rapidly in Canaan that one of the Egyptian words for Canaan is Ḫuru. In Joshua's day they occupied four cities NW of Jerusalem —the Gibeonite confederacy (Jos. 9:7, 17). From Mount Baal-hermon as far as the entrance of Hamath. Mt. Baal-hermon (later Mt. Hermon) is the more easterly range parallel to Lebanon, running SW from Damascus. For the entrance of Hamath read 'Labo of Hamath', identified with mod. Lebweh, 14 miles NNE of Baalbek. 4 They were for the testing of Israel. See on 2:22. 6 And they took their daughters to themselves for wives . . . This procedure was a breach of the early injunction laid down in the covenant of Ex. 34:10–16 (repeated in Dt. 7:1–5).

3:7–11 OPPRESSION UNDER CUSHAN-RISHATHAIM AND DELIVERANCE BY OTHNIEL

7 And the people of Israel did what was evil in the sight of the Lord. This section gives us the full formulation of the repeated pattern in which the main episodes of Judges are set, with the bare minimum of detail added: the name of the oppressor, the duration of the oppression, the name of the deliverer, and the length of the ensuing period of 'rest'. And serving the Baals and the Asheroth, the male and female vegetation-deities respectively. Asheroth is a rare plural of Asherah, a Canaanite goddess who is named in the Ras Shamra tablets as the consort of the supreme god El. Asherah is regularly mistranslated 'grove' in AV, an error which goes back to LXX. Elsewhere the female counterparts of the Baalim are the Ashtaroth (cf. 2:13), and Ashtaroth may be the original reading here too (so two Heb. MSS and the Vulg.), the more so as the normal plural of Asherah is Asherim. Cf. 6:25. 8 Cushan-rishathaim king of Mesopotamia (Heb. Aram-naharaim). Egyptian records mention a district called Qsnrm (Kushan-rom, 'high Cushan') in the land of Naharen, in N Syria. M. G. Kline suggests that Cushan-rishathaim was a Ḫabiru chief from this area, and that his overthrow by Othniel explains the disappearance of the Ḫabiru as a power to be reckoned with in W Asia (The Ḫa-BI-ru—Kin or Foe of Israel?, 1957). But it is strange that a monarch from the north should have been repelled by a hero of S Judah. Possibly a southern invader is intended, Cushan rosh Teman ('Cushan chief of Teman'), in which case Aram should be emended to Edom, as so often elsewhere in the OT. His name has been vocalized in Hebrew so as to give the sense 'Cushan of double-dyed wickedness'. 9 Othniel the son of Kenaz, Caleb's younger brother, i.e. the conqueror of Kiriath-sepher and son-in-law of Caleb (cf. 1:13). 10 The Spirit of the Lord came upon him. Similar language is used in Judges of Gideon (6:34), Jephthah (11:29) and Samson (13:25; 14:6, 19; 15:14); and in 1 Samuel of Saul (10:10; 11:6) and David (16:13). These leaders have therefore been called 'charismatic', since they owed their position to the special power which resulted from an outpouring of the divine grace.

3:12–30 OPPRESSION UNDER EGLON KING OF MOAB AND DELIVERANCE BY EHUD

3:12–14 Oppression under Eglon

12 And the Lord strengthened Eglon the king of Moab against Israel. The land of Moab lay E of the Dead Sea, having the Arnon as its northern boundary and the Zered as its southern. Eglon invaded Canaan by the same route as that which the Israelites had followed, crossing the Jordan and occupying the region of Jericho. It was natural, therefore, that his chief opponent, Ehud, should have been a Benjaminite (v. 15). According to N. Glueck, the kingdom of Moab, like the other Transjordanian kingdoms (Bashan, Heshbon, Ammon, Edom), was founded in the 13th century BC, their inhabitants having previously been nomadic. The Moabite capital was Kir-hareseth. 13 The Ammonites and the Amalekites. Ammon, the people most closely related to the Moabites, lived to the NE of them. The Amalekites were nomads (kinsmen of the Edomites) who were centred for long to the S of Canaan. They harassed Israel considerably during the wilderness journey. The city of palms, i.e. Jericho (cf. 1:16). There is no question of the rebuilding of Jericho, which lay derelict from its destruction under Joshua until the 9th century (1 Ki. 16:34); what is indicated is a temporary occupation of the oasis at 'Ain es-Sultan.

3:15–30 Deliverance under Ehud the Benjaminite

15 The Lord raised up for them a deliverer, Ehud, the son of Gera, the Benjaminite, a left-handed man. The last word is in Hebrew 'iṭṭēr yaḏ yemînô (lit. 'bound of his right hand'). Cf. the same phrase in 20:16, also with reference to Benjaminites. LXX and Vulg. render 'ambidextrous'. The people of Israel sent tribute by him to Eglon. Probably to Jericho, to judge by the reference to Gilgal in v. 19. 19 The sculptured stones near Gilgal. Hebrew pᵉsîlîm means lit. 'graven (images)' or 'carvings'—perhaps figures carved on the standing stones from which Gilgal received its name (see on 2:1). Silence. Hebrew hōs, an onomatopoeic word, like English 'Hush'.

20 As he was sitting alone in his cool roof chamber (lit. 'in his upper-chamber of coolness'), a room built on the flat roof, well aired by large windows (cf. the window through which Ahaziah fell in 2 Ki. 1:2). 22, 23 And the dirt came out (RV 'And it came out behind'). Better 'and he went out into the porch'. This clause in the Hebrew is so like the following one, Then Ehud went out into the vestibule, that they may well be two conflated variant readings of one and the same clause; but there is some doubt of the proper meaning of the two rare words translated 'porch' and 'vestibule'. 24 He is only relieving himself (lit. 'surely he is covering his feet'); cf. 1 Sa. 24:3. 25 They took the key and opened them. The key was a flat piece of wood furnished with pins corresponding to holes in a hollow bolt. The bolt was on the inside, shot into a socket in the doorpost and fastened by pins which fell into the holes in the bolt from an upright piece of wood (the lock) attached to the inside of the door. To unlock the door one put one's hand in by a hole in the door (cf. Ct. 5:4) and raised the pins in the bolt by means of the corresponding pins in the key. 27 He sounded the trumpet in the hill country of Ephraim, which lay N of the territory of Benjamin, and had probably also been invaded by Eglon.

3:31 EXPLOITS OF SHAMGAR BEN ANATH

31 Shamgar does not seem to have been an Israelite; the name (Hurrian šimiqari) is repeatedly attested in Nuzian texts. The words son of Anath may mean that he was a native of Beth-anath—probably in the south (cf. Jos. 15:59) rather than in Galilee (see on 1:33)—or some other place where Anath had a sanctuary. But even if he was a Canaanite, his attack on the Philistines delivered Israel. J. Garstang identified him with Ben Anath, a Syrian sea-captain, son-in-law of Rameses II (c. 1260 BC). In that case, the Philistines whom he attacked must have been an earlier vanguard of the main body which settled on the Palestinian coast fifty years later. (As for the oxgoad, Sir C. Marston suggested that that was the name of his ship!) But the identification is highly improbable for chronological and other reasons. Some LXX and other recensions repeat this verse at the end of Jdg. 16 in a more 'Philistine' context; but its present position is more chronologically apposite. That Shamgar was a man of considerable fame is evident from the way in which he is recalled in the Song of Deborah (Jdg. 5:6).

4:1–24 OPPRESSION UNDER JABIN KING OF CANAAN AND DELIVERANCE BY DEBORAH AND BARAK

4:1–3 Oppression under Jabin and Sisera

2 And the Lord sold them into the hand of Jabin king of Canaan, who reigned in Hazor. Hitherto the oppressors have come from the E and SE and overrun parts of southern and central Canaan; now we have a northern menace. Hazor (mod. Tell el-Qedah) lies some 4 miles SW of Lake Huleh and was the capital of a Canaanite kingdom which dominated its neighbours; cf. Jos. 11:10 ('Hazor . . . was the head of all those kingdoms'). Its site was identified by Garstang in 1927. It occupied a key position—a large protected camp-enclosure (ḥāṣôr) dating back to Hyksos times—and was connected with Sidon by a permanent road. The site was excavated in 1955–58 by the Israel Exploration Fund under Y. Yadin. The main tell (c. 25 acres) was occupied in the 3rd millennium BC; the large lower area to the north (c. 150 acres) was enclosed and occupied in the early 2nd millennium (probably by the Hyksos); the enlarged city could have accommodated nearly 40,000 inhabitants. The lower city was never reoccupied after its destruction in the 13th century BC—probably under Joshua (cf. Jos. 11:1ff.; v. 13 makes it plain that Joshua also destroyed the settlement on the tell, but that was reoccupied). The Jabin king of Hazor of Jos. 11 led a coalition which was defeated by Joshua at the Water of Merom, which flows into the Sea of Galilee from the NW; the Canaanite army of Jdg. 4 and 5 was defeated in the Kishon valley further W. It is commonly held that Jdg. 4 combines a victory over Jabin of Hazor by Zebulun and Naphtali with a victory over Sisera of Harosheth by a wider combination of tribes, celebrated in Jdg. 5. The Canaanites here are those mentioned in 1:27, 33 as dwelling among the Manassites and Naphtalites. The commander of his army was Sisera. Sisera is a non-Semitic (possibly Illyrian) name. Harosheth-ha-goiim, i.e. 'Harosheth of the nations', perhaps El-Haritiyeh, SE of Haifa, or rather the neighbouring Tell el-'Amr (so Albright); another suggestion is Tell el-Harbaj, overlooking the right bank of the Kishon. 3 For he had nine hundred chariots of iron. This force of armed vehicles made Sisera invincible until a situation arose in which, instead of being a source of strength, they became a hindrance. The mustering of the united tribes of Israel against him under Barak coincided with a storm in which the Kishon, normally a dry river-bed, rapidly became a raging torrent in which the chariotry was engulfed.

4:4–16 The battle of Kishon

5 She used to sit under the palm of Deborah. This should not be confused with the oak under which an earlier Deborah was buried 'below Bethel' (Gn. 35:8). The name Deborah means 'bee'. And the people of Israel came up to her for judgment. She was thus a šōpeṭeṭ in the normal and non-military sense, but the charismatic element was present in her too, as she was a prophetess. 6 Barak. The name means 'lightning'; cf. Carthaginian Barca. Kedesh in Naphtali. A sanctuary identified by Garstang with Beth-shemesh of 1:33. Mount Tabor. At the meeting-place of the tribal territories of Issachar, Zebulun and Naphtali. 7 The river Kishon. A wadi which quickly becomes an impetuous torrent in time of rain; it runs NW through the valley of Jezreel into the Mediterranean on the N side of Mt. Carmel. 11 Heber the Kenite . . . had separated from the Kenites. See on 1:16. Here we have a Kenite family separating itself from the main body in the S and coming as far N as the valley of Jezreel to live. If the Kenites still plied their trade as tinkers (denoted by the word qayin from which their name is derived), they were probably more mobile than other ethnic groups and neutral in the latter's quarrels. 15 And the Lord routed Sisera and all his chariots. The manner of the discomfiture is made plain in the older, poetical version of 5:20–22. A sudden and terrific rainstorm filled the wadi, making it impassable and bogging the chariots. The situation was repeated when Napoleon defeated the Turkish army at the Battle of Mount Tabor on 16 April, AD 1799.

4:17–24 The death of Sisera

18 She covered him with a rug. Properly 'with a fly-net' (Heb. *s*ᵉ*mîḵāh*). 19 She opened a skin of milk, i.e. curds (cf. 5:25), the modern 'lebben', which has a markedly soporific effect. 21 Jael the wife of Heber took a tent peg. For a more vivid description of his death see 5:26f. The mallet and tent-peg, for pitching the tent, were ready to her hand, as pitching the tent was a woman's work. As he was lying fast asleep from weariness. So he died. The RSV (following AV) is better than RV ('for he was in a deep sleep; so he swooned and died'); it depends, to be sure, on a change in the vocalization (wᵉyā'ēp̄ for wayya'ap̄), but 'he swooned' is not what we should naturally say of a man through whose temples a tent-peg had been driven. 24 Until they destroyed Jabin king of Canaan. The prose narrative is continued in 5:31b. The poetical version of Sisera's defeat intervenes.

5:1–31a THE SONG OF DEBORAH AND BARAK

1 Then sang Deborah and Barak. This song takes its place alongside other poetical records of episodes in the conquest of Canaan. It may have been preserved, like these, in some such collection as the Book of Jashar (cf. Jos. 10:13) or the Book of the Wars of Yahweh (cf. Nu. 21:14). These records are practically contemporary with the events they celebrate, and the Song of Deborah is the longest and most important of them. It is the oldest element in Judges, as is evident from its archaic language, some of which was unintelligible as early as the LXX translation of Judges. Attempts have been made by drastic emendation to restore the original form of the song, but few of these have been widely accepted. The song may be divided thus: vv. 2, 3: exordium of praise; 4, 5: invocation of Yahweh; 6–8: the desolation under the oppressors; 9–18: the mustering of the tribes; 19–23: the battle of Kishon; 24–27: the death of Sisera; 28–30: the mother of Sisera awaits his coming; 31a: epilogue.

2 That the leaders took the lead . . . The call to join battle in the spirit of their covenant unity went through the northern and central tribes; it was for the various communities, under their leaders, to decide whether to respond or not. The majority on this occasion responded. 4, 5 Lord, when thou didst go forth from Seir. The picture is of Yahweh in the midst of the storm-cloud coming to His people's defence from the region where He had first revealed Himself to them, by the region of Edom into Canaan. Cf. Dt. 33:2; Ps. 68:7ff.; Hab. 3:3ff. Yon Sinai. Heb. zeh sînai, here and in Ps. 68:8 probably a title of Yahweh, 'the One of Sinai'. 6 In the days of Shamgar, son of Anath, in the days of Jael. See on 3:31. We naturally think of Jael as the wife of Heber the Kenite, celebrated in 5:24, but it is strange to find her coupled with Shamgar in this way, and the allusion here may be to someone of an earlier generation, no longer known. 7 Until you arose, Deborah, arose as a mother in Israel. The old Hebrew qamtî may be second singular feminine as well as first singular, and possibly Deborah is here apostrophized as in v. 12, hence the RSV rendering as against the repeated 'I arose' of AV and RV. From the phrase a mother in Israel, which is used of a city in 2 Sa. 20:19, it has been inferred that the town of Daberath (Jos. 21:28; 1 Ch. 6:72), mod. Dabûriyeh, at the W foot of Tabor, was originally meant, but this is quite improbable. 8 When new gods were chosen, then war was in the gates. A significant sequence: see on 2:14. Was shield or spear to be seen among forty thousand in Israel? This reflects the unarmed state of the Israelites during their twenty years' oppression; cf. their disarmament under the Philistines in 1 Sa. 13:19ff. Notice the estimate of the contemporary Israelite manpower; thousand (Heb. 'elep̄) may denote a military division considerably less than a numerical thousand (see on 6:15 and 20:2). 10 You who ride on tawny asses. A mark of nobility; cf. 10:4; 12:14. 11 There they repeat the triumphs of the Lord. His triumphs (lit. 'His righteous acts' or 'righteousnesses') are those by which He intervenes for His people to give them salvation and victory. The co-operation of the northern and central tribes was due not only to the pressure of a common foe but also to a common memory of the covenant with Yahweh, which revived at such a time. The song regards all the tribes as worshippers of Yahweh. The word repeat or 'chant' (y^etannû) is an Aramaism, the presence of which in Hebrew of so early a date is noteworthy (cf. 11:40). The actual sense is 'sing responsively', and the reference is to the songs of victory sung by the maidens at the wells in the following times of peace. (The same verb probably occurs in Ps. 8:1, 'Thou whose glory above the heavens is chanted'.)

14 From Ephraim they set out thither into the valley. This rendering follows the A-text of LXX, which presupposes 'ēmeq ('valley') for 'amālēq; the Hebrew text is represented by RV 'Out of Ephraim came down they whose root is in Amalek'. Some of the Amalekite nomads from the S had, like Heber the Kenite (4:11), left their home and invaded central Canaan (cf. 3:13; 6:3f., 33; 12:15). Following you, Benjamin. This is probably the battle-cry of the tribe of Benjamin, to be rendered 'After you, Benjamin!' or 'Forward, Benjamin!' (cf. Ho. 5:8, RV mg., AV). From Machir. Usually E Manasseh; here, perhaps, E and W Manasseh combined. Those who bear the marshal's staff. Read with RV mg. 'the staff of the writer' (Heb. šēbeṭ sōp̄ēr). The staff was probably the scribe's wand of office. Reference at this date (c. 1125 BC) to a writer is no more surprising than the mention of 'the city of books' in 1:11. Writing, and alphabetic writing at that, had been practised for some centuries along the Syrian coast, from the primitive alphabet of Serabit in the Sinai peninsula (an early form of the original North Semitic alphabet from which the Phoenician and other Semitic alphabets were derived), to the cuneiform alphabet of Ras Shamra (an adaptation of the same North Semitic alphabet). Quantities of papyrus were exported from Egypt to Phoenicia c. 1100 BC. Cf. Jdg. 8:14. 17 Gilead stayed beyond the Jordan. This refers to the tribesmen of Gad who, like their Reubenite neighbours (v. 16), did not take part in the struggle. And Dan, why did he abide with the ships? Garstang suggests that the reference is to the later, northern home of the Danites and that the ships were on Lake Huleh; but it is more natural to think of their earlier home on the W coast of Canaan, and even if their northern migration had already taken place (cf. 18:1ff.), some of them certainly remained behind (cf. 13:2). Asher sat still at the coast of the sea. The territory of Asher was soon encroached upon by the Phoenicians.

19 At Taanach, by the waters of Megiddo, i.e. by the torrent of Kishon. For Taanach and Megiddo see on 1:27; both cities were destroyed c. 1125 BC, probably as a sequel to the victory celebrated in this song. 20 From heaven fought the stars, from their courses they fought against Sisera. The reference is to the cloud-burst which flooded Kishon and swept away Sisera's chariotry; for the language cf. that of the poetical fragment of Jos. 10:12ff. 23 Meroz has been (very tentatively) identified with Khirbet Marus, between Hazor and Kedesh in Naphtali. Meroz apparently played false to some special obligation resting upon it. (The A-text of LXX reads Mazōr, which resembles mod. el-Mazâr in the valley of Jezreel.)

24 Most blessed of women be Jael. The feminine hand has been discerned in the space allotted in the song to Jael's exploit, as also in the vivid depicting of Sisera's mother (vv. 28ff.). 25 She brought him curds (Heb. ḥem'āh); see on 4:19. 26 She put her hand to the tent peg. This was her left hand, as LXX and other versions say. It is not necessary to conclude that in the parallelism of this verse hand must be synonymous with right hand and tent peg with workmen's mallet: Burney aptly compares Pr. 3:16. She crushed his head. The verb (Heb. ḥālap̄) is used of piercing in Jb. 20:24.

28 The mother of Sisera gazed through the lattice. The closing scene of the song is unforgettably vivid and moving. The network of crossed laths which covered the window-opening (the lattice) may have been decorated outside in the Egyptian manner. 29 Nay, she gives answer to herself, as if to convince herself that all was well; but RV mg., 'Yet she repeateth her words unto herself', may be right; in spite of the ladies' reassuring confidence, her forebodings will not be stilled. 30 A maiden or two for every man. The word for maiden (Heb. raḥam) is found on Mesha's Moabite Stone (c. 850 BC) in the same rather contemptuous sense (like Eng. 'wench'). Dyed stuffs embroidered. The Hebrews excelled in the art of dyeing, as is evident from the description of the wilderness tent of meeting and the priestly robes. They may have acquired the art from the Egyptians. Excavation reveals that wool dyeing was a leading industry in Debir and Benjamite Mizpah. For my neck as spoil (lit. 'on the necks of the spoil', as RV). The changing of one vowel-point gives the more probable reading followed by RSV. 31a So perish all thine enemies, O Lord! The epilogue of the song, invoking a malison on Yahweh's enemies and blessing on His friends, is markedly parallel to Ps. 68:1–3; cf. also the war-chant which accompanied the ark's advance (Nu. 10:35).

5:31b – 8:32 OPPRESSION UNDER MIDIAN AND DELIVERANCE BY GIDEON

5:31b – 6:6 The Midianite oppression

31b And the land had rest for forty years. This is actually the conclusion of the prose narrative of Jabin's overthrow, following on from 4:24. 6:2 And the hand of Midian prevailed over Israel. The Midianites were nomads from the desert who for the first time were using domesticated camels on a large scale. This made long-distance raids easy. They probably came from their home round the head of the Gulf of Aqabah (cf. Ex. 2:15ff.) N through Transjordan, by the same route as that previously taken by the Israelites, crossing the Jordan and invading central Canaan, penetrating as far W as Gaza (v. 4). It may have been on their way through Transjordan, in the land of Moab, that they met the defeat at the hands of Hadad I, king of Edom, mentioned in Gn. 36:35. The people of Israel made for themselves the dens which are in the mountains, an explanation of the rock-dwellings in the hill country of Ephraim and Judah. 3 The Amalekites and the people of the East. These had attached themselves to the Midianites. For the Amalekites see on 3:13; they seem to have made a habit of joining invasions of Canaan from Transjordan. The people of the East (Heb. bᵉnê qeḏem) is a general description of the nomads in the Syrian desert. Cf. Gn. 29:1, where however, the expression is used of the pastoral people of Upper Mesopotamia. Cf. the Egyptian tale of Sinuhe who c. 1900 BC found refuge with an Amorite chieftain who lived a semi-nomadic life in the country of Qedem. 5 Like locusts for number. The simile is apt, for it suggests their destructiveness as well as their multitude.

6:7–10 The prophet

8 The Lord sent a prophet to the people of Israel. The message of the prophet is not unlike that of the angel at Bochim. The words in the latter half of v. 8 are reminiscent of the preamble to the Ten Commandments (Ex. 20:2). 9 I delivered you from the hand of the Egyptians. Some have seen here a reference to encounters with the Egyptians in Canaan, but this is not necessarily implied; the Exodus satisfies the reference. 10 I said to you. The following words summarize once more the injunctions of Ex. 34:10–16; Dt. 7:1ff. Cf. Jdg. 3:5, 6.

6:11–24 The angel of the Lord visits Gideon

11 The angel of the Lord. See on 2:1. Under the oak at Ophrah. For this kind of oak or 'terebinth' (Heb. 'ēlāh), a sacred tree, cf. Gn. 13:18; 14:13; 18:1; 35:8; Ho. 4:13. Ophrah is not certainly known; one suggested site is Et-taiyibeh, 8 miles NW of Beth-shan. Joash the Abiezrite. Abiezer was a sub-tribe of Manasseh, belonging to the western division of that tribe (cf. 5:14). His son Gideon was beating out wheat in the wine press. Probably with a staff or rod, a method sometimes used for small quantities of grain (cf. Ru. 2:17). 13 Where are all his wonderful deeds which our fathers recounted to us? For the language as well as the general sentiment, cf. Ps. 44:1ff. 14 And the Lord turned to him. This alternation between Yahweh's angel and Yahweh Himself is common in such theophanic narratives. 15 My clan, 'my 'elep̄' (as in Mi. 5:2); the same word as is usually translated 'thousand', though it may not always have this strict numerical sense (see on 5:8 and 20:2). 18 My present. Hebrew minḥāh is an unusual term for a meal, but natural if an offering to a divine being is intended. 20 Put them on this rock, and pour the broth over them. The surface of the rock served as an improvised altar. The broth may have been poured as a libation into one of the cup-shaped rock-hollows which are found in Palestine and England alike. 21 The angel of the Lord vanished from his sight. For the whole theophany, as for its closing scene, cf. Jdg. 13:3–21. 22 Alas, O Lord God! For the fear of death and divine reassurance cf. Jdg. 13:22f. Cf. also Ex. 33:20, 'man shall not see me and live'. 24 The Lord is peace. Heb. Yahweh šālôm, the name being here connected with the words Peace be to you (Heb. šālôm lᵉḵā) of v. 23.

6:25–32 Gideon overthrows the altar of Baal

25 Take your father's bull, the second bull seven years old. The evidence of the versions indicates šāmēn, 'fat' (cf. Lk. 15:23), instead of šēnî, 'second', as the original text here and in vv. 26, 28. The animal was probably reserved for sacrifice. Pull down the altar of Baal . . ., and cut down the Asherah that is beside it. For Baal and Asherah see on 2:13 and 3:7. We are here confronted by a situation in which Yahwism and Baalism have been syncretized, Yahweh being perhaps regarded as one of the Baalim. Joash has a name containing Yahweh ('Yahweh has given'), but he erects an altar to Baal and an image (or sacred pole) of Asherah, and calls his son Jerubbaal ('May Baal give increase') which, as a result of the present iconoclasm, is given the new significance 'Let Baal contend' (see on v. 32). 26 On the top of the stronghold here, with stones laid in due order. On the altar thus erected, in accordance with the directions of Ex. 20:25, was piled the wood of the Asherah which Gideon cut down, and on that the bullock was laid and consumed. 31 Shall be put to death by morning. It was perhaps evening before the demolition of Baal's altar was brought home to Gideon. Joash evidently held considerable authority in the community; probably he knew his neighbours well enough to realize that, if he gave a decisive lead, they would follow. Let him contend for himself. For the irony, cf. 11:24; also 1 Ki. 18:27. 32 He was called Jerubbaal. The name acquires a new sense, as the equivalent of 'Let Baal contend' (Heb. yāreḇ Ba'al). In 2 Sa. 11:21 it appears as Jerubbesheth, in accordance with the convention of replacing Baal by bešeṭ, bōšeṭ, 'shame' (as in Ishbosheth, Mephibosheth, etc.).

6:33–35 Gideon gathers an army

33 Crossing the Jordan they encamped in the Valley of Jezreel. It was probably at this time that the Midianites killed Gideon's brothers at Tabor (8:18). 34 But the Spirit of the Lord took possession of Gideon (lit. 'clothed himself with Gideon'). An expression repeated in 1 Ch. 12:18; 2 Ch. 24:20. It denotes complete possession; Gideon becomes the garment of the Spirit and thus enters the succession of Israel's charismatic leaders. 35 And they went up to meet them. Practically all northern Israel is indicated; the omission of Ephraim, the most powerful of the central tribes, is noteworthy in view of the sequel.

6:36–40 Gideon's fleece

39 Let me speak but this once. For the language cf. Gn. 18:32. Gideon may have reflected after the former sign that, as the rocky threshing-floor would in any case dry more quickly than the fleece, it was not really a 'sign'; the reverse result would be truly remarkable.

7:1–8 The reduction of Gideon's army

1 The spring of Harod, i.e. the spring of trembling, possibly referring to v. 3, Whoever is fearful and trembling (Heb. hārēḏ). It may be identified with 'Ain Jalud, which springs from the foot of Mt. Gilboa (probably the 'fountain' of 1 Sa. 29:1). The hill of Moreh ('the oracle-giver') may be Jebel Nebi Dahi to the N of Gilboa, across the valley of Jezreel. 3 'Let him return home.' And Gideon tested them. This last clause is based on a conjectural emendation. The Hebrew text is rendered in RV: 'Let him return and depart from mount Gilead.' The only Gilead known to us is in N Transjordan. Was there another Gilead in Naphtali? C. F. Burney reads 'Galud' ('coward'?) here; cf. mod. 'Ain Jalud. Another suggestion is to emend to 'Gilboa'. 4 I will test them for you there. The nature of the test is not quite clear in the MT; to lap with one's tongue like a dog (v. 5) cannot be done by putting one's hand to one's mouth (v. 6). Kneeling to drink and lapping might 'seem to amount to criminal carelessness in presence of the enemy' (Burney); the 300 who conveyed water from the spring to their mouths in their cupped hands would be able to keep a wary eye open for sudden attack. But we should bear in mind the possibility that the test was quite arbitrary: God might thus make trial of Gideon's unquestioning obedience and show him His power to use as His instruments any whom He pleased.

7:9–14 Gideon in the camp of Midian

12 Like locusts . . . as the sand. Cf. 6:5. The numerical analogies are typical oriental hyperbole. 13 A man was telling a dream to his comrade. Dreams were treated as of high importance; it is clear throughout the OT that a dream has an interpretation, though that cannot always be discovered. A cake of barley bread, i.e. a 'scone' or 'bannock'. Barley was the commonest cereal in Palestine and barley bread was the staple food of the poorer people.

7:15–25 Gideon's victory

16 He divided the three hundred men into three companies. The threefold division of forces appears elsewhere in the OT; cf. 1 Sa. 11:11; 2 Sa. 18:2. The surprise attack by night is also illustrated in 1 Sa. 11:11. Here the sudden appearance of the lights at close quarters, the sound of the trumpets, and the war-cry from 300 throats, 'For the Lord and for Gideon', struck panic into the Midianites. The trumpets were horns of cattle or of rams (Heb. šōp̄ārôṯ). The pitchers (empty jars) served the double purpose of guarding the torches from the wind and hiding the light until the critical moment. 19 The beginning of the middle watch. Implying a division into three watches, of about four hours each. The time therefore was about 10 p.m. 22 As far as Beth-shittah. The places mentioned cannot be certainly identified, but it is obvious that the Midianites fled towards Jordan, and crossed it (cf. v. 24) at points where their retreat could best be cut off by men of Ephraim. 23 For the tribes named cf. 6:35. 25 Oreb and Zeeb. Meaning 'raven' and 'wolf' respectively. 'The slaughter of Midian at the rock of Oreb' is remembered in Is. 10:26; cf. also the reference to 'the day of Midian' in Is. 9:4, alluding to this same rout. The sites of the rock of Oreb and the wine press of Zeeb are unknown. And they brought the heads of Oreb and Zeeb to Gideon beyond the Jordan, i.e. in Transjordan, where he had gone in pursuit of the Midianite kings Zebah and Zalmunna (8:4).

8:1–3 The Ephraimites' complaint

1 What is this that you have done to us . . .? The Ephraimites seem to have thought that the failure to enlist their aid at the outset was calculated to deprive them of the honour of a share in the victory; perhaps also they did not like the idea of a strong 'northern bloc' from which they were excluded. Gideon, however, speaks them fair and appeases their resentment. His treatment of them is in striking contrast to Jephthah's later on (12:1ff.).

8:4–21 Pursuit and capture of Zebah and Zalmunna

4 Faint yet pursuing. Possibly we should read with some of the versions 'faint and famished'. 5 The men of Succoth. This place (meaning 'booths') lay in Transjordan, N of the Jabbok. Zebah and Zalmunna, the kings of Midian, vocalized so as to mean 'sacrifice' and 'shelter withheld'. 7 I will flail your flesh, perhaps by laying them on a carpet of thorns and threshing them as corn is threshed. 8 Penuel. Some 5 miles E of Succoth (cf. Gn. 32:30f.), probably to be identified with the more easterly of the two mounds called Tulul edh-Dhahab. 9 I will break down this tower. The tower of Penuel was an Amorite fortification of c. 1700 BC (the same period as the Tower of Shechem, 9:6, 46ff.); it was rebuilt by Jeroboam I (1 Ki. 12:25). The site was strongly fortified, commanding the entrance into the Jordan valley from the Jabbok gorge.

10 Now Zebah and Zalmunna were in Karkor. The place is not known, but must have been near Nobah and Jogbehah (v. 11). The name of Jogbehah is preserved in mod. Jubeihât, 6 miles NW of Amman. The site of Nobah is identified with a 'tell' near Safut. 11 For the army was off its guard; cf. 18:7, 27. 12 Threw all the army into a panic (Heb. heḥ^{e}rîd). Burney (unnecessarily) emends to heḥ^{e}rîm ('devoted' or 'destroyed utterly'); so Josephus (Ant. v. 228), 'he destroyed all the enemy'. 13 By the ascent of Heres. Heres is a rare word for 'sun', hence AV 'before the sun was up'. The words may be a scribal doublet of the last clause of v. 12. 14 He wrote down for him the officials and elders of Succoth. The AV translation ' "described" has obscured to the English reader an important biblical item on the early diffusion of the alphabet' (J. A. Montgomery). It was the invention of alphabetic writing (see on 5:14) that enabled ordinary people like this chance captive to read and write. The older ideographic and syllabic scripts were by their very nature the preserve of a specialized class. The youth possibly wrote down a list of the chief men of Succoth on a piece of pottery. 16 And with them taught the men of Succoth, as though the verb had its usual sense 'caused to know' (hiph'il of yāḏa'); but D. W. Thomas points out an alternative meaning of this root: 'made quiet or submissive' (cf. Jdg. 16:9; 1 Sa. 14:12). 18 Where are the men whom you slew at Tabor? See on 6:33. 19 As the Lord lives, or 'by the life of Yahweh'; the form of oath implies belief in Yahweh as 'the living God'. 21 For as the man is, so is his strength. It would be an honour to die by the hand of a warrior like Gideon, who besides might be trusted to kill them at one blow, and not bungle the business as the boy might. The crescents that were on the necks of their camels. These 'little moons' (LXX) were probably threaded on necklaces and worn as amulets. They may indicate that these bedouin were moon-worshippers.

8:22–32 Gideon's rule over Israel

22 You and your son and your grandson. It is a hereditary monarchy that Gideon is invited to set up. 23 What is ostensibly Gideon's refusal might be an oblique acceptance (cf. Gn. 23:6, 11, 15); whichever his own attitude was, his son Abimelech attempted to perpetuate his father's ascendancy (9:1–6). The Lord will rule over you. For the idea of God as Israel's sole king cf. 1 Sa. 10:19. 24 Because they were Ishmaelites. Possibly trading nomads. This is a striking parallel to the interchange of the terms 'Midianites' and 'Ishmaelites' in the story of the sale of Joseph (Gn. 37:25ff.; 39:1). Both Ishmael and Midian are recorded as sons of Abraham. 26 One thousand seven hundred shekels of gold. About 42 lb avoirdupois. 27 And Gideon made an ephod. Possibly here and in 17:5 ephod means something different from the priestly vestment called by that name; in any case, an ephod of gold would scarcely be meant for wearing. Whatever it was, it was apparently used for divination. 31 His concubine who was in Shechem also bore him a son. The chief difference between his other seventy sons (v. 30) and Abimelech was probably that their descent was reckoned through the male line, and his through the female. They would belong to their father's clan of Abiezer, he to his mother's Shechemite family; i.e. he was the son of a ṣaḏîqa marriage (see on 14:1).

8:33 – 9:57 THE STORY OF ABIMELECH

33 As soon as Gideon died. In 8:33–35 the author gives an ethical summary of the following narrative. Baal-berith. See on 9:4 and 46. 9:1 Now Abimelech the son of Jerubbaal went to Shechem to his mother's kinsmen. If Gideon himself declined a hereditary monarchy, some of his family had other ideas; cf. v. 2 where Abimelech appears to envisage the possibility of the sons who belonged to the Abiezer clan exercising a condominium over that part of the country. Abimelech, however, who retained his mother's Shechemite citizenship, forestalled any possible attempt by his Abiezrite brothers by killing them; and he established a kingdom with its centre at Shechem. Shechem (mod. Balâtah) was first settled in the 4th millennium BC; the earliest inhabitants have left nothing but pottery comparable to the 'Neolithic B' pottery found at Jericho (although this was the Chalcolithic Age in N Syria and Mesopotamia). It was occupied continuously throughout the Middle and Late Bronze Age. At Shechem Abram built his first altar after arriving in Canaan (Gn. 12:6, 7). It was seized by the sons of Jacob before the descent into Egypt (Gn. 34:25ff.; cf. Gn. 48:22). In the Tell el-Amarna correspondence (c. 1370 BC) Shechem is allied with the Ḫabiru. Although there is no record of its being captured by Joshua, it figures as a religious centre after the conquest. The Israelites under Joshua possibly found it occupied by their kinsmen, and it entered the Israelite covenant-league as a separate city-state. Shechem appears in Jos. 20:7; 21:21 as a Levitical city and city of refuge; the blessings and cursings were recited on the hills Ebal and Gerizim which overlook it (Jos. 8:30–35); there Joshua gathered all Israel before his death (Jos. 24:1), and there Joseph's bones were buried (Jos. 24:32). The name of the place means 'shoulder', from its position on the saddle between Ebal and Gerizim. It is 'the natural capital of Canaan' (A. T. Olmstead), 'the uncrowned queen of Palestine' (A. Alt). Its importance continued to be observed by the Samaritans, who made it their holy city; it is at the adjacent Greek foundation of Neapolis (mod. Nablus) that the Samaritan community survives to this day. (See G. E. Wright, Shechem: The Biography of a Biblical City, 1965.) 4 The house of Baal-berith. The divine name (Baal or 'lord' of the covenant) refers to the confederacy in which Shechem was associated with her neighbours (cf. v. 46). The 'house' or temple is identified with G. E. Wright's 'Temple 2b', first located by E. Sellin in 1926, which was completely destroyed at the end of the Late Bronze Age. 5 Upon one stone. A mass public execution is implied. 6 Beth-millo, i.e., 'house of the fortress', probably the same as the Tower of Shechem in v. 46. (Millo is a fortress set upon a 'filling'; cf. 2 Sa. 5:9; 1 Ki. 9:15, 24; 11:27.) All Beth-millo in that case would be one group of all the citizens of Shechem. And made Abimelech king, by the oak of the pillar at Shechem. The oak or terebinth was no doubt a sacred tree (that of Gn. 12:6; 35:4?) associated with a standing-stone (that of Jos. 24:26?). The standing-stone was probably the large pillar (maṣṣēḇāh) which stood in the Temple court (two smaller ones stood on either side of the door). The kingdom of Abimelech was not an extensive one; it hardly extended beyond W Manasseh.

7 On the top of Mount Gerizim. The sacred mountain of the Samaritans (cf. Jn. 4:20f.) lay SW of the city. Cried aloud. By standing on one of the cliffs overhanging Shechem Jotham would make himself heard by the citizens. 8 The trees once went forth to anoint a king over them. For this type of fable cf. that of King Joash in 2 Ki. 14:9. The fable reflects a poor opinion of the value of kingship. The bramble (v. 15; 'briar'), which is good for nothing else, has the necessary leisure to become king of the trees, but it cannot afford them shelter, and is more likely to catch fire and involve them all in its ruin. Trees which perform some useful service (as Gideon had done) have no time to become king. This contempt for monarchy may well reflect an early date. The fable is cast in rhythmical form. 10 The fig tree. The commonest fruit-tree of Palestine. 13 My wine which cheers gods and men. It cheered gods by being offered to them in libations. 18 Abimelech, the son of his maid-servant. Jotham uses a word meaning 'slave-concubine', deliberately ascribing to her a status inferior to her real one, as implied in 8:31. 21 Went to Beer and dwelt there. Beer simply means 'well' and the name is therefore widespread; this one may be El-Bireh, between Shechem and Jerusalem.

23 The men of Shechem dealt treacherously with Abimelech. They broke their agreement with him by revolting against him and reverted 'to their Bronze Age, city-state pattern of government' (G. E. Wright). 25 And they robbed all who passed by them along that way. Thus depriving Abimelech of the dues which he exacted from merchants passing through his realm. 26 Gaal the son of Ebed. He offers himself as leader to the native Shechemites against Abimelech and his governor Zebul. 27 And they went out into the field. The time of grape-harvest is meant, when the grapes were gathered and trodden in the wine-vats—the Shechemite counterpart to the Israelite Feast of Ingathering or Tabernacles. The ensuing merry-making was chosen as an occasion for throwing off their allegiance to Abimelech. 28 Did not (better 'Should not') the son of Jerubbaal and Zebul his officer serve the men of Hamor the father of Shechem? In spite of the massacre of Gn. 34:25f., the Shechemites still maintain the connection with Hamor, the ancestor of their clan. Hamor means 'ass'; Albright points out that the sacrifice of an ass was an essential feature of a treaty among the Amorites in the 18th century BC, and compares the evidence of a Shechemite federal treaty in the name Baal-berith. 31 And he sent messengers to Abimelech at Arumah. It appears that Abimelech did not live in Shechem, but in Arumah (v. 41, sometimes identified with El 'Ormeh, between Shechem and Shiloh), and set Zebul over Shechem as his lieutenant-governor: this may partly account for the Shechemites' hostility to him. 34 Laid wait against Shechem in four companies. So the contingent in the city under Zebul was literally a 'fifth column'. 37 Look, men are coming down from the centre of the land. The centre (or 'navel') of the land is the round summit of Gerizim, regarded as the central eminence of the hill country of central Canaan. The Diviners' Oak or terebinth may be the 'oak (terebinth) of Moreh' (Gn. 12:6).

42 The men went out into the fields, where they were attacked and slaughtered by two of Abimelech's detachments, approaching from two directions, while the third detachment breached the city gate. 45 He razed the city and sowed it with salt. The destruction of Late Bronze Age Shechem is archaeologically attested late in the 12th century BC. The sowing with salt was a symbolic sentence of infertility as a punishment for the city's breach of covenant with Abimelech. It was rebuilt by Jeroboam I as his first capital after the disruption of the monarchy (1 Ki. 12:25). 46 The Tower of Shechem. This was probably the Beth-millo of v. 6. The narrative of vv. 46–49 might be a sequel to what precedes, or an incident in it; archaeological evidence favours the latter alternative. The tower or temple-fortress was situated on the acropolis of the city. What the people of the tower heard was probably Abimelech's breaching of the city gate and entrance into the SE quarter of the city. The stronghold of the house of El-berith was probably part of the Tower of Shechem or Beth-millo. El as a divine title is found widely distributed over Palestine at an early date. The supreme god bears this name in the Ras Shamra tablets and in the Phoenician historian Sanchuniathon. We gather that at Shechem it was El who was invoked as patron of the federal union, and who thus came to be called El-berith ('God of the covenant') or, as in v. 4, Baal-berith ('Lord of the covenant'). 48 Mount Zalmon. Its name means 'shaded', perhaps because of the woods which covered its slopes (cf. the Transjordanian Zalmon of Ps. 68:14). The present Zalmon cannot be certainly identified; it may have been a peak of Gerizim, or perhaps Jebel el-Kebir.

50 Then Abimelech went to Thebez. Mod. Ṭūbâs, c. 10 miles NE of Nablus, on the road to Beth-shan. This town, a dependency of Shechem, had joined in the revolt against Abimelech. 51 There was a strong tower within the city, which served as a place of refuge like that in Shechem. 53 A certain woman threw an upper millstone. Lit. 'a stone of riding' (Heb. pelaḥ reḵeḇ). Cf. 2 Sa. 11:21, where an allusion is made to this incident as a warning against going too near the wall of a besieged fort or city. 54 Draw your sword and kill me. Cf. Saul's request to his armour-bearer to prevent the Philistines from taking him alive (1 Sa. 31:4). 55 The men of Israel. The rebels were native Shechemites; the Israelite population perhaps supported Abimelech because of his relation to Gideon. 56 Thus God requited the crime of Abimelech. The author of Judges draws a moral after his fashion.

10:1–5 TOLA AND JAIR: MINOR JUDGES

1 There arose to deliver Israel Tola the son of Puah, son of Dodo, a man of Issachar. Tola was a tribal name; a son of Issachar is named Tola in Gn. 46:13, etc. Dodo ('beloved') is perhaps the same name as David. These minor judges (Tola and Jair in this chapter and Ibzan, Elon and Abdon in ch. 12) have no mighty deeds recorded of them, such as are told of the great judges. Their function may have been more purely judicial: Albright describes them as 'intertribal arbitrators'. We may compare Samuel, who later in the 11th century went in circuit from place to place judging Israel (1 Sa. 7:15–17). E. Robertson, less convincingly, calls them 'military leaders holding office at a time when no military activity was called for', and hazards the suggestion that they were appointed by the high priest of the time, a suggestion supported (for what it is worth) by Samaritan tradition. 3 Jair the Gileadite. Gilead in the tribal genealogies is the son of Machir, who was Manasseh's son by an Aramaean concubine. Jair is the same name as NT Jairus. 4 And he had thirty sons. That these should ride on ass-colts is intended as a mark of distinction; cf. what is said of Abdon's sons and grandsons in 12:14. Called Havvoth-jair, i.e. the tent-villages of Jair. In Nu. 32:41; Dt. 3:14 and 1 Ch. 2:23 Havvoth-jair is associated with Jair the grandson of Judah's grandson Hezron who married a daughter of Machir. 5 And was buried in Kamon. Probably Qamm in Gilead.

10:6 – 12:7 OPPRESSION UNDER AMMON AND DELIVERANCE BY JEPHTHAH

10:6–18 The Ammonite oppression

7 He sold them into the hand of the Philistines and into the hand of the Ammonites. The Philistines invaded the Israelite territory W of Jordan from the coastal plain where they had settled over a century before, while the Ammonites overran the Israelite territory in Transjordan. The Ammonite menace is dealt with first, as that was quickly crushed—for the present, at any rate—but we find a recrudescence of the Ammonite threat some decades later, at the beginning of Saul's reign (1 Sa. 11:1ff.). The Ammonites, like their Moabite kinsmen and other Transjordanian neighbours, appear to have organized themselves as a kingdom in the 13th century BC. In their present invasion of Israelite territory they were apparently accompanied by the Moabites (see on 11:15 and 24), as Eglon had been by the Ammonites (3:13). 11 And the Lord said to the people of Israel. Probably by the mouth of a prophet, as in 6:8ff. Did I not deliver you from the Egyptians and from the Amorites, from the Ammonites and from the Philistines? References respectively to the Exodus, the overthrow of Sihon (see on 11:13ff.), and the deliverance under Ehud (3:13) and Shamgar (3:31). 12 The Sidonians also, and the Amalekites, and the Maonites, oppressed you. There is no other reference to a Sidonian oppression; for Amalek cf. 3:13; 6:3. For Maonites LXX has 'Midianites'; the name may be associated with mod. Ma'an near Petra (cf. 1 Ch. 4:41; 2 Ch. 20:1; 26:7). 16 He became indignant . . . Lit. 'short', i.e. impatient.

17 And the people of Israel came together, and they encamped in Mizpah. Mizpah ('watch-tower') may be identical with the Mizpah where Jacob and Laban piled the 'cairn of witness' (Gn. 31:46ff.), and also with Ramath-Mizpeh or Ramoth-Gilead (Dt. 4:43; Jos. 13:26; 1 Ki. 4:13), c. 40 miles N of Amman.

11:1–11 Jephthah chosen as captain

1 Jephthah. Hebrew yiptāḥ, probably shortened from yiptaḥ-'Ēl, 'God opens (sc. the womb)' which is cited as a proper name in Sabean. The son of a harlot. Therefore, like Abimelech, he was half-Canaanite, and not acknowledged as a member of his father's clan. 3 The land of Tob. Probably to the N of the kingdom of Ammon, on the E of Transjordanian Manasseh. Worthless fellows collected round Jephthah. These 'empty men' were probably 'broken men', such as later gathered to David in the cave of Adullam, men for various reasons severed from their clans or other communities. And went raiding with him. Jephthah, in other words, was a brigand chief. 6 Come and be our leader. Hebrew qāṣîn, cognate with Arab qadi, one who gives a legal decision; LXX renders archēgos, applied to Christ four times in the NT. 11 And Jephthah spoke all his words before the Lord at Mizpah. A solemn compact was made at this sanctuary between Jephthah and the elders of Gilead, they confirming with an oath their undertaking to make him their ruler, and he similarly swearing a sort of 'coronation oath'.

11:12–28 Jephthah's protest to the king of Ammon

13 Because Israel . . . took away my land. The reference, as we gather from Jephthah's reply, is to the territory of Sihon, which (according to Nu. 21:26–30) Sihon had taken from the Moabites. From this and the mention of Chemosh in v. 24 it is commonly inferred that vv. 12–28 originally concerned a dispute with the Moabites, in which case or the land of the Ammonites (v. 15) would be an editorial addition. But if we take the text as it stands, it is plain that both Moab and Ammon were engaged in this dispute with Israel. From the Arnon to the Jabbok and to the Jordan. The southern, northern and western boundaries respectively of Sihon's kingdom, which was bounded on the east by Ammon. Sihon may well have carved out his kingdom at the expense of Ammon as well as of Moab. 15 Israel did not take away the land of Moab or the land of the Ammonites. Indicating (as has been said) a Moabite–Ammonite association at this time. 16 Went through the wilderness to the Red Sea, i.e. the yam sûp̄ ('sea of reeds'), here (as in Nu. 33:10f.) the Gulf of Aqabah. No mention is made here of the events at Sinai, as they were irrelevant for Jephthah's purpose. And came to Kadesh, i.e. Kadesh-barnea, to the S of the Negeb, on the border of the kingdom of Edom. 17 Israel then sent messengers to the king of Edom. Cf. Nu. 20:14–21. And they sent also to the king of Moab. This is not recorded in the Pentateuch. The Israelites accepted the unfavourable answer given by their kinsfolk the Edomites and Moabites, but took violent action against the Amorite Sihon when he did the same. 18 The wilderness, i.e. of Zin. And went around the land of Edom and the land of Moab, i.e. passing S and E of Edom and E of Moab, instead of following the 'king's high way' which ran from S to N through these kingdoms and the kingdoms of Sihon and Og. Cf. Nu. 21:4, 13. Strong fortresses barred the way on the frontiers of the kingdoms of Edom and of Moab. It must have been spring when Israel journeyed E of those territories, for only then could enough water and grazing have been found. The Arnon was the boundary of Moab. On the N, dividing it from Sihon's kingdom, and later from the territory of Reuben.

19 Israel then sent messengers to Sihon. Cf. Nu. 21:21ff. Heshbon. Mod. Hesbān, 16 miles E of Jordan and 24 miles N of Arnon. 20 Jahaz. This place (not yet identified) is mentioned on the Moabite Stone as an outpost of the king of Israel against Moab, and later taken by Mesha and added to Dibon, which was 4 miles N of Arnon. 22 From the Arnon to the Jabbok. In the division of the land the northern part of this territory went to Gad and the southern to Reuben. 24 Will you not possess what Chemosh your god gives you to possess? Chemosh was the god of the Moabites, the Ammonite deity being Milcom (1 Ki. 11:5). Jephthah's language does not necessarily mean that he himself regarded Chemosh and Yahweh as national deities on an equal footing, though it would not be surprising if a half-Canaanite like Jephthah did take this attitude. Mesha, on the Moabite Stone, ascribes his defeats and victories to the anger and favour of Chemosh. Jephthah argues that the two deities had shown their will—Yahweh by giving Israel victory over Sihon, and Chemosh by not enabling Moab to resist Sihon's earlier encroachments. In either case the divine will must be accepted as a fait accompli. The very fact that Yahweh had done more for Israel than Chemosh had been able to do for Moab proved the superior power of Yahweh. Certainly the author of Judges (and possibly even Jephthah himself) did not believe in the independent existence of Chemosh, but for the sake of the argument ironically took Chemosh at his worshippers' valuation and showed that, even so, he was not much of a god (cf. 6:31). The appeal to this passage as a 'parade example' against Israelite monotheism is inept: 'the objectivity of the approach ad hominem is entirely characteristic of Hebrew thought and literature before the Exile' (W. F. Albright, From the Stone Age to Christianity, 1946, p. 220). 25 Are you any better than Balak . . . ? The fact that the king of Moab at the time of the overthrow of Sihon made no attempt to reclaim the land won by Israel from Sihon, even if it had previously been Moabite territory, is a strong argument against the present claim. 26 Aroer. The southernmost 'city' of Sihon's kingdom, on the N bank of the Arnon. Three hundred years. An inclusive number indicating that they were now in the 3rd century since the events referred to; the actual interval may have been about 150 years.

11:29–40 Jephthah's victory and vow

29 Then the Spirit of the Lord came upon Jephthah, who thus enters the list of the charismatic leaders. And he passed through Gilead and Manasseh. Probably W as well as E Manasseh, to raise his army. And passed on to Mizpah of Gilead (reading Heb. 'el for 'et), where the Israelite camp was (10:17), from which he passed on to the Ammonites. 30 And Jephthah made a vow to the Lord. It is customary to cite the similar story told by Servius (Latin commentator on Virgil) about Idomeneus, king of Crete, who was caught in a storm while returning home from the Trojan War, and vowed to sacrifice to the gods in return for his safety whatever should first meet him on his arrival home. This proved to be his son. 33 And he smote them from Aroer to the neighbourhood of Minnith . . . and as far as Abel-keramim, i.e. 'the plain of vineyards'. Aroer is on the north bank of the Arnon, 4 miles SW of Dibon. The other two places, presumably in the same general area, are unidentified.

34 And behold, his daughter came out to meet him. The simple and moving narrative-style of this passage illustrates Hebrew story-telling at its best. It has sometimes been inferred from vv. 38–40 that Jephthah commuted his daughter's fate from burnt-offering to perpetual virginity, but this is hardly warranted by the narrative. The plain and restrained statement that he did with her according to his vow (v. 39) is best taken as implying her actual sacrifice. Although human sacrifice was strictly forbidden to Israelites, we need not be surprised at a man of Jephthah's half-Canaanite antecedents following Canaanite usage in this matter. The author of Judges does not approve of his action; he may well have regarded it as a symptom of the state of affairs at a time when 'every man did what was right in his own eyes' (cf. 17:6; 21:25). The closest biblical parallel is Mesha's sacrifice of his eldest son (2 Ki. 3:27). Cf. also the sacrifice of Iphigenia and Polyxena in Greek legend. The nobility of character shown by Jephthah's daughter has made her one of the world's great heroines; cf. stanzas 45–62 of Tennyson's 'Dream of Fair Women'. 37 Bewail my virginity. Dean Stanley compared Sophocles's picture of the Theban maiden Antigone bewailing her virginity before going to her living death as the price of obeying the call of sisterly duty. 40 The daughters of Israel went year by year to lament the daughter of Jephthah. The verb rendered lament, or rather 'celebrate' (RV) or 'chant', is the same as that rendered 'repeat' in Jdg. 5:11. The custom seems to have been a diversion to this particular purpose of a vegetation festival after the fashion of the annual wailing for Tammuz. Epiphanius says that in his day (4th century AD) Jephthah's daughter was honoured at Shechem by the Greek name Korē ('Maiden') —the name by which Persephone was honoured.

12:1–7 Jephthah's strife with Ephraim

1 The men of Ephraim were called to arms. This tribe now expresses resentment against Jephthah, as previously against Gideon. Probably they aimed at establishing their hegemony among the tribes; otherwise, as the Ammonites had crossed Jordan and attacked some of the western tribes, including Ephraim (10:9), it is strange that Ephraim did not accept Jephthah's invitation to join his forces against Ammon (v. 2). 4 Then Jephthah gathered all the men of Gilead and fought with Ephraim. Evidently Ephraim had crossed Jordan and invaded Gilead, to pursue their quarrel with Jephthah. The Ephraimite taunt, You are fugitives of Ephraim, you Gileadites, implied that these Transjordanians were deserters from the Joseph tribes. 5 And the Gileadites took the fords of the Jordan against the Ephraimites. The invaders of Transjordan, worsted, were making their way home again, when they found their retreat thus cut off by the Transjordanians. The linguistic test that followed shows that in the Ephraimite dialect, as in Amorite and Arabic, s took the place of sh. The word Shibboleth (šibbōleṯ) means 'a stream in flood'. Similarly, in the border wars between Scotland and England, a Northumbrian intruder in Scotland was immediately detected by his speech when he responded to the invitation to pronounce the word 'tree', and was summarily dealt with. 7 Was buried in his city in Gilead or 'in his city, Mizpeh of Gilead', a reading supported by some MSS of LXX.

12:8–15 IBZAN, ELON, ABDON: MINOR JUDGES

On the role of these minor judges see on 10:1. 14 Who rode on seventy asses. See on 10:4. 15 In the land of Ephraim, in the hill country of the Amalekites. Cf. 5:14 for Amalekites in central Canaan.

13:1 – 16:31 OPPRESSION UNDER THE PHILISTINES AND EXPLOITS OF SAMSON

13:1–25 Annunciation and birth of Samson

1 And the Lord gave them into the hand of the Philistines for forty years. Having dealt with the Ammonite invasion, the author now turns to the other invaders mentioned in 10:7. These forty years lasted at least until the second battle of Ebenezer (1 Sa. 7:10ff.), if not until the reign of Saul. At the end of Saul's reign (c. 1010 BC) we find that the Philistines have penetrated as far inland as Beth-shan (1 Sa. 31:10). 2 There was a certain man of Zorah, of the tribe of the Danites. Zorah (mod. Ṣar'a) lay on the boundary of the old Danite territory and that of Judah. The northward migration of the Danites (18:1ff.) had probably taken place by now; if so, a remnant must have remained in the old territory. And his wife was barren and had no children. The birth of the coming child was thus marked by such divine interposition as attended the births of Isaac, Samuel and John the Baptist; and was announced by an angel, as were the first and third of these. 3 The angel of the Lord appeared to the woman. As before, the angel of the Lord is Yahweh in manifestation; cf. Gn. 16:7, 13; Jdg. 2:1; 6:11, 12. 5 The boy shall be a Nazirite to God from birth. Therefore his mother, too, must observe some at least of the Nazirite precautions for the time being, especially those pertaining to food and drink (vv. 4, 14). On the Nazirite vow see Nu. 6:2ff. It might be undertaken for a stipulated period (cf. Acts 18:18; 21:23ff.) or, as here, for life. The word itself (Heb. nāzîr, hence 'Nazirite' is the preferable spelling) is a passive participle meaning 'consecrated' or 'dedicated'. The Nazirite abstention from strong drink is implied in Am. 2:12. And he shall begin to deliver Israel from the hand of the Philistines. This may mean 'he will be the first to save . . .'; the work was continued by Samuel, Saul and Jonathan, and completed by David.

15 Let us detain you, and prepare a kid for you. The narrative at this point becomes remarkably similar to 6:18ff., though there are differences, e.g. in the angel's response to the offer of a meal. 17 What is your name . . . ? Cf. Gn. 32:29. 18 Why do you ask my name, seeing it is wonderful?

For the angel's unwillingness to reveal his name, cf. Gn. 32:29. Hebrew pelî', rendered wonderful (AV 'secret'), is found again in Ps. 139:6, in the feminine p^{e}lî'āh. Cf. the noun pele' (from which this adjective is derived), rendered 'Wonderful' in Is. 9:6. 19 So Manoah took the kid with the cereal offering. Hebrew minḥāh (see on 6:18) is here used of something additional to the burnt-offering, hence in the sense 'cereal offering' as in the vegetable oblation of Lv. 2:1ff. And offerea it upon the rock to the Lord. 'To this day, the rock-stepped altar, covered with cup holes, is sprinkled with the blood of animals sacrificed by it' (A. T. Olmstead). To him who works wonders (Heb. maplî') shows how the divine visitor lived up to his 'wonderful' name. 20 The flame went up toward heaven from the altar. Cf. 6:21. 22 We shall surely die. Cf. 6:22f., with comment. For we have seen God. Lit. 'for it is a god that we have seen'. 23 If the Lord had meant to kill us. The woman's common sense prevails over her husband's numinous terror.

24 And the woman bore a son, and called his name Samson (Heb. šimšôn, derived from šemeš, 'sun'; cf. the neighbouring place-name Beth-shemesh). This name has been thought to fit in well with the view that the story of Samson, like the 'labours' of Gilgamesh and Heracles, is in origin a sun-myth. The arguments for this view are very slender, although it has been elaborated by several scholars. There is much more to be said for Burney's statement that the Samson narratives 'possess unique value as illustrating the village-life of the time, and the relations between Israelites and Philistines living in the border-country'. Twelve 'labours of Samson' have been reckoned: i. slaying the lion; ii. killing the Philistines at Ashkelon; iii. sending the foxes among the corn; iv. the slaughter near Etam; v. bursting the cords of the men of Judah; vi. the massacre with the jawbone; vii. carrying off the gates of Gaza; viii. quenching his thirst in Lehi; ix. breaking the seven bowstrings; x. bursting the new ropes; xi. tearing away the loom and web; xii. pulling down the pillars. This enumeration, however, does not lie on the surface, and other ways of counting the episodes are possible. It is unlikely that the quenching of his thirst in Lehi should be reckoned a 'labour'. In any case, we are not dealing with mythology here. (The Semitic kinship with šemeš is nevertheless more probable than the suggested derivation of his name from Hurrian Šapš.) 25 And the Spirit of the Lord began to stir him. Thus Samson too becomes a charismatic hero. His 'judging' does not seem to have had a judicial character, but to have consisted in the exploits by which he became his people's champion against the enemy. Mahaneh-dan. See 18:12 for the origin of the name ('Camp of Dan') and the location of the place. Between Zorah and Eshtaol. Eshtaol, in the lowlands of Judah, is frequently identified with Eshwa', 1½ miles NE of Zorah. The name (from Heb. šā'al, 'ask') may indicate the site of an ancient oracle.

14:1–20 The wedding of Samson

1 Samson went down to Timnah, which, like Zorah and Eshtaol, lay on the boundary between Judah and Dan (cf. Jos. 15:10; 19:43), but at this time seems to have been occupied by Philistines (mod. Khirbet-Tibneh, 3 miles SW of Beth-shemesh). 2 Now get her for me as my wife. The fathers of the prospective bridal pair arranged the details of an ordinary wedding, including the fixing of the bride-price. In the event, however, it seems that it was not the ordinary type of marriage that was concluded, in which case the bride would have come to live with Samson, but the ṣadîqa union (cf. 8:31) in which the bride remained with her own family, being visited by her husband from time to time, and any children would belong to their mother's family. 3 The uncircumcised Philistines. So the Philistines are distinctively called, for the other peoples whom the Israelites knew at this period, the Egyptians, Canaanites, etc., practised circumcision like the Israelites themselves. Get her for me. This time the pronoun her is emphatic; in answer to his parents' suggestion that he would do better to marry an Israelite wife, he says 'Get her and no other'. 5 A young lion roared against him. In OT times the lion was common in Palestine, especially in the 'jungle' of Jordan, but also in other parts of the country. 6 He tore the lion asunder as one tears a kid. The rushing of the divine power upon Samson enables him to act with strength above the ordinary (cf. v. 19; 15:14). The rending of the lion is paralleled in ancient art, where mighty figures (e.g. Enkidu, the comrade of Gilgamesh) are depicted rending a lion down the middle by tearing its hind legs apart. And he had nothing in his hand. So Heracles strangled the Nemean lion with his hands. Josephus, possibly under the influence of the Heracles story, says that Samson strangled the lion. 8 There was a swarm of bees in the body of the lion, and honey. The carcase was by now thoroughly dry. Herodotus has a comparable story of a swarm of bees and a honeycomb found in the skull of Onesilos. We should not see here an allusion to the ancient belief, attested by Virgil, that bees were generated in putrefying carcases; this belief may have arisen from observation of the drone-fly in such an environment, but would not explain the presence of the honey. 9 He scraped it out into his hands. This was a violation of the Nazirite code, which forbad contact with a corpse (Nu. 6:6), and may explain why he did not tell his parents that he had taken the honey out of the dead lion.

10 Samson made a feast there. The fact that the feast was held at the bride's home and that the bridegroom's companions were Philistines suggests that the marriage was of the second type referred to above (see on v. 1). The writer explains it as an ancient custom, implying that at the time of writing it had become obsolete. 11 When the people saw him. We may perhaps read 'because they feared him' (k^{e}yir'āṭām for kîr'ôṭām). Thirty companions. The 'sons of the bride-chamber' of Mk. 2:19 (RV). They may originally have been intended as a bodyguard for the bridegroom, but on this occasion they seem to have served as bodyguard for the others present against the bridegroom. 12 Thirty linen garments and thirty festal garments. The linen garments were large rectangular sheets which might be worn by day and slept in at night; the festal garments, as the phrase indicates, were suits for festive occasions. 14 Out of the eater . . . In Hebrew the riddle takes the form of a rhythmical couplet, the two lines having three beats each.

15 On the fourth day. The LXX and Syriac versions have fourth day, which agrees with the three days of v. 14; but the Hebrew text has 'seventh day' (so AV, RV). Even with the reading fourth day there is still a discrepancy with 17 the seven days; where exactly the corruption lies is not easy to determine now. 18 Before the sun went down. Or perhaps 'before he entered the bridal chamber'. What is sweeter than honey . . .? Again a rhythmical couplet, this time with two beats to the line. Samson's retort, If you had not ploughed with my heifer . . ., is a couplet of three beats to the line with rhyme as well as rhythm. Burney translates it well: 'If ye had not plowed with this heifer of mine, Ye would not have found out this riddle of mine.' 19 And he went down to Ashkelon, 23 miles away, on the coast, one of the cities of the Philistine pentapolis (cf. 1:18). In hot anger he went back to his father's house, without entering the bridal chamber. 20 His companion, who had been his best man. Cf. 'the friend of the bridegroom' in Jn. 3:29.

15:1 – 16:3 Other exploits of Samson

15:1 At the time of wheat harvest. This varied in Palestine according to the locality and climate, but fell about May (cf. the festival of Pentecost). Wheat was sown in November or December. Samson went to visit his wife with a kid, to appease her for his insult in leaving her so abruptly at the time of the wedding. But to take away the disgrace in which she was involved by Samson's desertion, her father had already given her in marriage to Samson's 'best man'. 2 He now offers Samson instead her younger sister. Cf. 1 Sa. 18:19ff., and for a less close parallel Gn. 29:23ff. 3 This time I shall be blameless . . . Render, with RV mg., 'This time shall I be quits with the Philistines'. 4 So Samson went and caught three hundred foxes. This is the proper meaning of Hebrew šû'āl, but it is often supposed that 'jackals' are meant here, as jackals are gregarious and easily caught, whereas the fox is solitary and more elusive. But foxes are probably intended all the same. The use to which Samson put them is very similar to the custom at the Roman feast of Ceres (the corn-goddess), when foxes with burning torches attached to their brushes were hunted in the circus. 6 Burned her and her father with fire. Several MSS and versions read 'burnt her and her father's house'. Cf. the threat in 14:15. 8 He smote them hip and thigh. Lit. 'leg upon thigh'; probably a wrestling term, like English 'cross-buttock'. The action is illustrated in Babylonian cylinder-seals where Gilgamesh is represented as using this device in wrestling. He went down and stayed in the cleft of the rock of Etam. Of proposed identifications of this 'cleft', that above the Wadi Isma'in, 2½ miles ESE of Zorah, is most probable.

9 Made a raid on Lehi. The place (meaning 'cheek', 'jawbone') may have been so called from the appearance of its crags, and can be identified with mod. Khirbet es-Siyyaj ('the ruin of Siyyaj'), where Siyyaj seems to be a loanword from Greek siagōn ('jawbone'), which is the rendering of Lehi found in Josephus and some Greek versions of the OT. Do you not know that the Philistines are rulers over us? The people of Judah are obviously well content with the Philistine domination, and resent the disturbance caused by Samson's feud with them. 15 And he found a fresh jawbone of an ass. Lit. 'a moist jawbone'; an old one would have been too brittle. J. G. Duncan mentions the possibility that jawbones fitted with three or four flint knives may have served as primitive weapons. 16 With the jawbone of an ass . . . Samson's exultant shout takes the form of a couplet with four beats to the line. For heaps upon heaps read perhaps 'I have heaped them in heaps'. It is not easy to reproduce in English the play on words in Hebrew between 'ass' and 'heap' (both ḥᵃmôr). Moffatt partly substitutes rhyme for word-play: 'With the jawbone of an ass I have piled them in a mass! With the jawbone of an ass I have assailed assailants!' This, however, loses sight of the thousand men. 17 He threw away the jawbone out of his hand; and that place was called Ramath-lehi, i.e. 'the height of Lehi'; but there is a word-play with rāmāh ('throw'), as if the name meant 'the throwing of the jawbone' (though rāmāh is not the word rendered 'he cast away'). 19 And God split open the hollow place that is at Lehi. Hebrew maḵtēš, rendered hollow place, is lit. 'mortar'; it was evidently a rock-depression containing a spring, the origin of which is thus accounted for. The misleading AV rendering ('God clave an hollow place that was in the jaw') is due to the fact that the Hebrew word for jaw (leḥî) is the same as that of the place; but the rendering is the more absurd because the narrator refers to the spring as existing in Lehi in his day. En-hakkore. Lit. 'spring of the caller' (this is the name of the partridge in biblical Hebrew, because of its distinctive call-note). 20 And he judged Israel in the days of the Philistines twenty years, c. 1070–1050 BC. There is no indication that in his case the word implies a judicial or military office; and the exploits are confined to the SW, especially the Philistine border.

16:1 Samson went to Gaza. Gaza was the most southerly city of the Philistine pentapolis. It was much older than the Philistine settlement; it is mentioned in the Tell el-Amarna tablets (14th century BC), and was temporarily captured by Judah (Jdg. 1:18) before its occupation by the Philistines. It is fanciful to see in this narrative support for the sun-myth interpretation of the Samson saga, as some do, by drawing an analogy with the sun coming forth as a bridegroom from his chamber and rejoicing as a giant to run his course (cf. Ps. 19:5). 2 And lay in wait for him all night at the gate of the city. They kept quiet all night. Kittel emends the first all night to 'all day'; the sense being that the men of Gaza watched the gates by day, but relaxed their vigilance at night, because the gates were closed then. 3 But thus they played into Samson's hands, for he rose by night and went out, lifting the barred gates with their posts and carrying them away on his shoulders, to the top of the hill that is before Hebron, i.e. on the E side of Hebron, where no doubt they were pointed out by later generations. Hebron (see 1:20) is some 38 miles E of Gaza.

16:4–31 Last exploits of Samson

4 He loved a woman in the valley of Sorek, whose name was Delilah. This place seems to have been the Wadi es-Sarar. A ruin N of the wadi, c. 2 miles from Zorah, still bears the name Surik. It is not clear whether Delilah was an Israelite or a Philistine, though the narrative suggests the latter. Her name is Semitic (meaning 'devotee'; possibly her full name included the name of the deity whose devotee she was). It recurs in the Greek text of 1 Ch. 4:19 in the genealogy of the tribe of Judah. But Semitic names are found among the Philistines not unnaturally, since the Philistine immigrants brought few women with them and must have intermarried with the people of Canaan. 5 The lords of the Philistines. See on 3:3. Eleven hundred pieces of silver, i.e. 1,100 shekels, nearly 30 lb weight. No convincing reason has been offered for the figure 1,100 rather than, say, the round number 1,000. Cf. 17:2. 7 If they bind me with seven fresh bowstrings, made of twisted gut. 9 The Philistines are upon you, Samson. We are to understand that they were in readiness in case Samson had told the truth; when his strength is proved they remain hid and he thinks that she is playing with him. So the secret of his strength was not known, or rather, 'his strength was not brought low'.

11 If they bind me with new ropes. Cf. his binding by the Judeans in 15:13. 13, 14 If you weave the seven locks of my head with the web. Delilah, we may understand, having the sleeping Samson's head in her lap (as in v. 19), weaves his hair into the warp and beats it up into the web with the pin, a flat piece of wood, so that his hair actually becomes part of the woven material. The loom would be the primitive type with two upright posts fixed in the ground, the one holding the yarn-beam and the other the cloth-beam. When Samson wakes up, he goes off, loom and all fixed to his hair, dragging the upright posts out of the ground.

19 And had him shave off the seven locks of his head. Cf. the Greek story of how Minos took Megara when the golden lock of Nisos its king was shorn. 20 I will go out as at other times, and shake myself free. This may imply that he was already bound as well as shaved. 21 And he ground at the mill in the prison. Lit. 'he was (continually) grinding', probably at a hand-mill with saddle-quern. It is doubtful if the large mill, which was normally turned by an ass, such as is called a mylos onikos in Mt. 18:6, was known as early as this. 22 The hair of his head began to grow again, implying a concurrent return of his strength.

23 Dagon their god. Dagon (cf. Heb. dāḡān, 'grain') was a Semitic corn-deity, a temple of whom has been found at the Amorite city of Mari on the Euphrates (18th century BC). He was introduced by the Amorites into Syria, and his name appears on the tablets of Ras Shamra, where also he had a temple. The Philistines evidently took over his cult. 24 Our god has given our enemy into our hand . . . Their chant of triumph is a rhymed quatrain with two beats to the line. 25 Call Samson, that he may make sport for us. Presumably he was to perform 'strong man acts'. They made him stand between the pillars. The character of the building is illustrated by discoveries at Gezer and Gaza. The roof was supported by wooden pillars set on stone bases. It was flat, consisting of logs of wood stretching from one wall to beams supported by the pillars and from these beams to other beams or to the opposite wall. The temple at Gezer had a forecourt leading into a paved inner chamber, separated from it by four circular stones, on which the wooden pillars stood. Samson probably stood between the two central pillars, if there were more than two. The Philistine lords and ladies were in the inner chamber; the crowd watched from the roof. 27 Samson made sport, in the forecourt, and then asked the boy to lead him to the central pillars to rest against them. Then, putting an arm round each, and bending forward so as to force them out of the perpendicular, he brought the roof down. The weight of people on the roof may have made the feat all the easier. 28 That I may be avenged upon the Philistines for one of my two eyes. A grim jest; another possibility is 'one vengeance for both my eyes'. 31 His brothers and his family came down. Manoah was evidently dead by this time, despite Milton's effective introduction of him in Samson Agonistes.

17:1 - 18:31 MICAH'S PRIEST AND THE DANITE MIGRATION

17:1–13 Micah's priest

2 The eleven hundred pieces of silver. See on 16:5. About which you uttered a curse. Or simply 'took an oath' (i.e. to dedicate the sum to religious purposes), which would involve a curse upon anyone who violated it. When Micah acknowledged that he had taken the money and restored it to the purpose to which his mother had dedicated it, she neutralized the curse by invoking a blessing on him. 4 His mother took two hundred pieces of silver. Perhaps, like Ananias and Sapphira, keeping back part of the sum originally dedicated. The graven image will have been one carved out of wood and overlaid with silver; the molten image would be entirely of silver. There are, however, indications in the text that only one image is meant; and it was (not 'they were', as in AV) in the house of Micah. We are not told what form the image(s) took, but that of a young bull is not unlikely. 5 And the man Micah had a shrine, lit. 'a house of god(s)', attached to his dwelling, to which people would come to ascertain the divine will. And he made an ephod and teraphim. For the divining ephod, cf. 8:27. Teraphim were probably images of household gods, also used for divination (cf. Gn. 31:19; 1 Sa. 19:13). Installed one of his sons, who became his priest. The term installed or 'consecrated' (Heb. millē' yād) means lit. 'filled his hand', i.e. with portions of a sacrifice (cf. Ex. 28:41, etc.). There were priests other than those of the family of Levi, who are distinguished as 'the Levitical priests' (as in Dt. 18:1). But it appears from this narrative that a member of the tribe of Levi was preferred when he was available. When the national worship was centralized at the Temple in Jerusalem under the monarchy, only the Aaronic priesthood was recognized. 6 Hence the explanatory remark of a writer who lived under very different conditions and was recording events of an earlier age: In those days there was no king in Israel; every man did what was right in his own eyes.

7 There was a young man of Bethlehem in Judah, of the family of Judah, who was a Levite. As he was Moses' grandson (18:30), he was a Levite by birth. Yet he is reckoned a member of the clan of Judah. The Levites, having no tribal territory of their own, depended on other tribes' hospitality (cf. 19:1), which explains why this one lived in Bethlehem and is reckoned in Judah. The Levites had a close connection with the southern tribes, especially with Judah. And he sojourned there. Hebrew gēr šām, which is identical with the name of the Levite's father (18:30); the original text here may have been 'and he was Jonathan the son of Gershom'. 10, 11 Be to me a father and a priest. For father used as a term of honour cf. Gn. 45:8; 2 Ki. 6:21; 13:14. In v. 11 exactly the opposite relationship is figuratively employed: the young man became to him like one of his sons. But there Micah's care of him is implied. Ten pieces of silver a year. About 4 oz. avoirdupois. 13 Because I have a Levite as priest. Quite obviously a Levite was regarded as possessing special priestly qualifications. Among the Minaeans of Arabia the cognate words lawi'u and its feminine lawi'atu appear with the sense 'person pledged for a vow or debt' (cf. Samuel).

18:1–31 The Danite migration

1 The tribe of the Danites was seeking for itself an inheritance to dwell in. According to 1:34 it was the Amorites (themselves no doubt pressed by the Philistines) who exercised pressure on the Danites. The story of their migration is summarized in Jos. 19:47, where Laish is called Leshem. 2 From Zorah and from Eshtaol. See on 13:25. 3 They recognized the voice of the young Levite. This suggests that they knew him before, when he lived in Bethlehem, the connection between the tribes of Judah and Dan being fairly close. Or they may simply have recognized by his voice that he came from their neighbourhood. 5 Inquire of God, we pray thee. This was the evident object of Micah's 'house of gods' (17:5, AV). (The retention of thee from AV and RV must be an accidental oversight in RSV.) 7 Came to Laish. Mod. Tell el-Qadi (Arab. qadi, 'judge'; cf. Heb. Dan), at one of the sources of Jordan. It is called Lus(i) in Egyptian texts of c. 1850–1825 BC. Had no dealings with any one. Perhaps we should read with some MSS of the Greek and Syrian versions, 'had no dealings with Syria' ('ᵃrām instead of 'āḏām). The district was isolated from Phoenicia by the Lebanon range and from Syria by Hermon and the Anti-Lebanon range. The account of the Laishites shows that it was not enough in ancient, any more than in modern, times for a people to live in quietness and neutrality if they wished to be secure against aggression. In this case it gave the Danites all the more reason to expropriate them, 10 especially as their land had no lack of any thing that is in the earth.

11 Six hundred men. The fewness of the men of war is a measure of the weakness of this tribe. 12 Encamped at Kiriath-jearim. A city of Judah, 8 miles W of Jerusalem, on the Benjaminite border. On this account that place is called Mahaneh-dan, i.e. 'Camp of Dan'; cf. 13:25. 16 Stood by the entrance of the gate, presumably leading into the courtyard of Micah's house. 19 Put your hand upon your mouth. For the idiom (denoting silence) cf. Jb. 21:5; 29:9; 40:4; Pr. 30:32; Mi. 7:16. Be to us a father and a priest. Cf. 17:10. 24 My gods which I made. We may trace here some irony on the writer's part similar to that expressed at greater length in Is. 44:9ff. 28 It was in the valley which belongs to Beth-rehob. The valley is El-Biqā', between Lebanon and Hermon. Beth-rehob, not the Rehob of 1:31, is unknown. 29 They named the city Dan. It became the northernmost point of the land of the twelve tribes: cf. the phrase 'from Dan to Beer-sheba'.

30 Jonathan the son of Gershom, son of Moses, and his sons were priests to the tribe of the Danites. For Gershom, cf. Ex. 2:22. The Massoretes, jealous for the reputation of Moses, inserted a suspended 'N' between the 'M' and the 'S', as though the name were Manasseh, not wishing to disguise the true sense, but implying that this idolatrous priest behaved in a way befitting a descendant of Manasseh—either the wicked king of that name (2 Ki. 21:1ff.; 2 Ch. 33:1ff.) or (more probably) the renegade Zadokite who founded the schismatic priesthood of the Gerizim sanctuary (Josephus, Ant. xi. 302ff.)—rather than of Moses. But the Rabbis knew and admitted that Moses was meant. If no generation is omitted in this man's genealogy, the Danite migration must have taken place at an early point in the early period of the judges. Probably some Danites remained behind in the southern territory (cf. 5:17; 13:2). The presence at Dan of a priesthood descended from Moses would give the place high prestige, which explains why Jeroboam I chose it as one of the two national shrines for the northern kingdom. Jeroboam's bull-calf at Dan may well have been the 'descendant' of Micah's graven image, which probably enough had the same form. It served as the visible pedestal for the invisible presence of the deity. Until the day of the captivity of the land, i.e. probably the captivity of the Galilaean population under Tiglath-pileser III in 733–732 BC (2 Ki. 15:29), which would put an effective end to the priesthood and cult at Dan. Houbigant, however (following a conjectural interpretation by D. Qimḥi), emended the captivity of the land to 'the captivity of the ark' (reading hā'ārôn for hā'āreṣ), taking the phrase as a duplicate of 'as long as the house of God was at Shiloh' (v. 31). But the effect of the Philistine victory at Aphek was hardly felt so far N as Dan. 31 The introduction of the note as long as the house of God was at Shiloh may have been intended to indicate that the Dan cult was of comparable antiquity to that of Shiloh. Shiloh is mod. Seilun, c. 19 miles N of Jerusalem and 12 miles S of Shechem. There the 'tent of meeting' was set up soon after the entry into Canaan, to serve as the central sanctuary for the amphictyonic league of the tribes of Israel (Jos. 18:1; cf. also Jos. 21:2; Jdg. 21:12, 19ff.). But the house of God at Shiloh in the early chapters of 1 Samuel was a more stable structure than simply a tent. The destruction of Shiloh is not mentioned in 1 Samuel, but we can infer that it was destroyed by the Philistines after the battle of Aphek (1 Sa. 4:10), and this is borne out by Je. 7:12ff.; 26:6, 9; Ps. 78:60ff. Danish excavations in 1926 and 1928 showed that there was an extensive settlement at Shiloh in the 12th and early 11th centuries BC until its destruction c. 1050 BC.

19:1 – 21:25 THE WAR AGAINST BENJAMIN

19:1–30 The outrage at Gibeah

1 A certain Levite was sojourning in the remote parts of the hill country of Ephraim. Either on the western or eastern flanks of the Ephraim highlands. Who took to himself a concubine from Bethlehem in Judah. Like the Levite of chs. 17 and 18, this Levite had connections both with the Ephraim highlands and with Bethlehem in Judah. 2 And his concubine became angry with him. So several versions in place of Hebrew text, 'played the harlot against him'. 3 To speak kindly to her. Lit. 'to speak to her heart' (as in Is. 40:2). 8 Tarry until the day declines. AV 'and they tarried until afternoon', though it depends on an emendation, is preferable, as the father-in-law in v. 9 gives the day's declining as a reason for their staying another night. 9 The day has waned toward evening. Lit. 'the encamping of day', i.e. the time to pitch camp for the night. Nomadic idioms survived even when the Israelites had become a settled population. Cf. 2 Sa. 20:1; 1 Ki. 12:16. 10 And arrived opposite Jebus (that is, Jerusalem). The city was still in the hands of the Jebusites. 12 For this reason the Levite refused to spend the night there, though in fact it could not have treated him less hospitably than Gibeah, a city of . . . the people of Israel. Jebus appears as a name for Jerusalem only here and in 1 Ch. 11:4, 5, and is probably derived from the name of the Amorite group (Jebusites) who settled there. See on 1:21. 13 At Gibeah. Mod. Tell el-Ful, 4 miles N of Jerusalem. It was a town of Benjamin, later known as 'Gibeah of Saul', because it was the home and capital of Saul (1 Sa. 11:4). Excavations at Tell el-Ful have shown that the first fortress of Gibeah was founded soon after the conquest and destroyed in the 12th century BC; the second fortress, that of Saul, has also been uncovered. Or at Ramah. Further N than Gibeah, on the way to Bethel. Cf. 4:5.

16 An old man . . . from the hill country of Ephraim. As the Levite himself was; but it adds point to the story that the one man in Gibeah to offer hospitality to the strangers was not a Benjaminite. 18 I am going to my home. So LXX, rightly, for 'the house of the Lord' (MT, AV); the pronominal suffix meaning 'my' has been misread as an abbreviation for Yahweh. 22 Base fellows. The Hebrew word is vocalized so as to mean 'worthless' (Heb. bᵉlî, 'without', and ya'al, 'worth'). 'Sons of Belial' (AV, RV) are then 'lewd fellows of the baser sort' (cf. Acts 17:5, AV). Other suggestions are that Belial means either 'the world of the dead' (a natural sense in 2 Sa. 22:5; Ps. 18:4; see RV mg.), lit. 'the place from which there is no coming up', or 'lord of night', or 'place of swallowing up'. In post-biblical Jewish writings Belial (Gk. Beliar) is the name of a person, the antichrist or incarnation of wickedness (cf. 2 Cor. 6:15). The unpleasant narrative of these verses (22–24) is strikingly similar to the tale of Sodom (Gn. 19:4–8). 23 Do not do this vile thing. The laws of hospitality here, as in Gn. 19, obviously took precedence over considerations of chivalry towards the female sex. 29 He took a knife . . . This dismemberment and distribution of a body as a call to national action is paralleled in 1 Sa. 11:7; there, however, a yoke of oxen is so used and the distribution is accompanied by a threat to do the same to the oxen of anyone who will not join against the enemy. The twelve pieces into which the woman's body was divided no doubt correspond to the number of the tribes of Israel. The practice plainly imposed a solemn obligation on those to whom the grisly tokens were sent, calling on all to act in the spirit of the national covenant. 30 From the day that the people of Israel came up out of the land of Egypt. The Exodus, marking the birth of the nation, provided a starting-point from which events might be reckoned (cf. 1 Ki. 6:1). The outrage at Gibeah stood out as a monument of wickedness for centuries to come (cf. Ho. 9:9; 10:9).

20:1–48 The destruction of Gibeah

1 The congregation assembled as one man. The Levite's summons had been effective; here all the tribes are gathered together—from N, S, and Transjordan—and they meet in Mizpah, 5 miles NW of Jerusalem (not the Transjordanian Mizpah of 10:17, although the meaning 'watch-tower' is the same). 2 Four hundred thousand men on foot that drew the sword. This figure is in keeping with the Pentateuchal censuses, but the word rendered 'thousand' here as there (Heb. 'elep̄) may denote a much smaller unit, 'practically, perhaps exactly, equivalent to the subdivision of the tribe which was technically known as a father's house; cf. Jdg. 6:15' (Westminster Bible Dictionary). See on 5:8. 6 For they have committed abomination and wantonness in Israel. The same word (Heb. n^{e}ḇālāh) as is translated 'vile thing' in 19:23, 24; for the whole phrase cf. Gn. 34:7; Dt. 22:21; Jos. 7:15; 2 Sa. 13:12f.

13 Put away evil from Israel. Cf. for the phrase Dt. 17:12. This dissociation of the community from wickedness committed within it is the basis of social punishment. 15 Twenty-six thousand. Most of the versions read '25,000', which accords better with the later statements in vv. 35 and 47. Benjamin was small in proportion to the other tribes; it numbered one-seventeenth of the whole. 16 Seven hundred picked men. If this figure has been repeated from v. 15 by dittography, as Vulg. suggests, then the men of Gibeah are the 700 skilful slingers. Left-handed. LXX and Vulg. 'ambidextrous'; see on 3:15, and cf. 1 Ch. 12:2. And not miss. The Hebrew verb is ḥāṭā', commonly used in the moral sense of 'sin'. 18 Went up to Bethel. This ancient sanctuary continued to be used as a religious centre throughout the northern monarchy. Here AV, following Vulg., renders 'the house of God', meaning Shiloh, from the mention of Phinehas and the ark in vv. 27, 28. But the ark did not always stay in the same place.

26 Burnt offerings and peace offerings, i.e. piacular sacrifices to expiate the cause of their defeat, followed by a communion sacrifice and feast. 28 Phinehas the son of Eleazar, son of Aaron, ministered before it in those days. This incident therefore belongs to the same generation as the migration of the Danites (cf. 18:30). Phinehas (Heb. pînḥās) is a word of Egyptian origin, meaning 'the Nubian' or 'the child of dark complexion' (cf. Nu. 25:1–13). Israelites with Egyptian names (cf. Moses) are found in the tribe of Levi. 29 So Israel set men in ambush round about Gibeah. The tactics are similar to those used against Ai (Jos. 8:12ff.). 31 One of which goes up to Bethel and the other to Gibeah. For Gibeah here we probably ought to read Gibeon—mod. El-jib, c. 6 miles NW of Jerusalem and 4 miles from Gibeah. 33 Baal-tamar. On the border of Judah and Benjamin. The name means 'lord of the palm' and the place may have been called after a Canaanite deity of that name. 35 The men of Israel destroyed twenty-five thousand one hundred men of Benjamin that day. Leaving as survivors only the 600 of v. 47; the original total being 25,700 (see on v. 15). See also comment on thousand in v. 2. The statement here is an anticipatory summary of the narrative of vv. 36–46. 38 The appointed signal. The word for 'signal', found also in Je. 6:1 and in the Lachish letters, means a torch-beacon. Cf. Jos. 8:20f. 40 The whole of the city went up in smoke to heaven. The destruction of Gibeah at this period is confirmed by excavations carried out by American archaeologists in 1922–23. 43 Trod them down from Nohah. Cf. 1 Ch. 8:2. Opposite Gibeah. Or Geba, on the direct route from Gibeah to Rimmon. Geba is c. 6 miles NNE of Jerusalem, and 47 the rock of Rimmon is about as far again in the same direction. The name survives in the mod. village Rammun. It is a detached limestone eminence, cut off by ravines on N, W and S, and containing caverns in which the fugitives could live.

21:1–25 Reconciliation

2, 4 And the people came to Bethel . . . and built there an altar. A strange action, as 20:26 makes it clear that there was an altar there already. It has been suggested (e.g. by Burney) that the original reference here was to the building of an altar at Mizpah. 5 They had taken a great oath. Lit. 'the great oath had been': the reference may be to some peculiarly solemn form of oath. 8 No one had come to the camp from Jabesh-gilead. This is believed to have stood on the site of mod. Tell Abu Kharaz, 9 miles SE of Beth-shan on the E of Jordan, on the N bank of the Wadi el-Yabis. 10 Twelve thousand of their bravest men. For thousand see on 20:2. 11 This is what you shall do. Cf. the policy adopted at Moses' instance with regard to the Midianite women (Nu. 31:15ff.). 12 And they found among the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead four hundred young virgins. To the marriage of these girls with the Benjaminite survivors may be due the close relationship of later days between Jabesh-gilead and the tribe of Benjamin (especially in the time of King Saul, a Benjaminite); cf. in particular Saul's action in defence of the Jabeshites against the Ammonites (1 Sa. 11), and the Jabeshites' rescue of Saul's body from the walls of Beth-shan (1 Sa. 31:11ff.). And in view of Saul's connection with Gibeah, was there some early tie which deterred the Jabeshites from joining the war of vengeance against that town? By the time of the incident of 1 Sa. 11 (c. 1025 BC), Jabesh was again quite populous. They brought them to the camp at Shiloh, which served as an inter-tribal centre (cf. 18:31; 21:19ff.).

19 So they said. Presumably to the Benjaminites, at least to the 200 who were still unprovided with wives. Hence the particularity with which the location of the feast is described. Behold, there is the yearly feast of the Lord at Shiloh. This feast (Heb. ḥag̃, lit. 'pilgrimage') was a local variety of the Feast of Tabernacles, here more particularly to celebrate the ingathering of the year's vintage (cf. 9:27). This may have been the feast which Elkanah and his family attended annually at Shiloh (1 Sa. 1:3ff.). The dancing of the maidens formed part of the 'harvest home' celebrations. 21 Seize each man his wife. A reversion to the practice of marriage by capture. The rape of the Sabines in Roman legend is a well-known parallel. 22 Grant them graciously to us. They adduce two reasons for the acquiescence of the men of Shiloh: they had not seized the maidens as an act of war; and they had thus delivered the Shilonites from the guilt of voluntarily handing over their daughters, which would have been a breach of the oath sworn at Mizpah (v. 1). 25 In those days . . . Quoted from 17:6; cf. also 18:1; 19:1; an appropriate note on which to end this narrative in particular, and the book of Judges in general.

Ruth

INTRODUCTION

It is not difficult to account for the wide appeal of this little book. From a literary standpoint alone it has outstanding merit: symmetry of form, convincing characterization, restraint, dignity, and a gently repetitive style which accords well with the speech of peasant people. The story moves smoothly from tragedy in Moab to a happy ending in Bethlehem without the slightest trace of moralizing, yet the characters are wholly praiseworthy, and selfless loyalty is rewarded.

NATURE AND AUTHOR

This short story with its pastoral setting may easily be sentimentalized by the modern reader. The 20th-century urban dweller has not had to experience the toil and weariness of harvesting by hand under a blazing sun, and he may take too sophisticated a view of the marriage of Ruth and Boaz, which was the culmination of consistent faithfulness and family loyalty. On the other hand, in an attempt to see the book in its Near-Eastern setting, some scholars have suggested that it had its origins in mythology, Babylonian or Egyptian, or in a cult-myth of ancient Bethlehem, though there is no convincing evidence for such theories. More widely accepted is the view that it is a historical novel. Evidence educed by R. H. Pfeiffer (Introduction to the Old Testament, 1952, p. 718) in favour of fiction and against historicity includes the following points: unpleasant features have been eliminated from the barbaric picture of the times given in Judges; the characters of Ruth, Naomi and Boaz are idealized; the names of some of the characters so fit their role in the story that the author must have coined them. For a note on the last point see the commentary on 1:2–4. The whole atmosphere of the book of Ruth is indeed different from that of Judges but it would be difficult to prove that it was less true to life. To be fair to the author it is obvious that account must be taken of his intentions as revealed in the text.

The opening formula, which is reproduced in the AV and RV as 'and it came to pass', is the accepted introduction to historical narrative (cf. AV Jos. 1:1; Jdg. 1:1), while the last verses link Ruth and Boaz with King David. No further evidence is needed to prove that the writer intended his book to be taken as historical, though it deals with an ordinary family and not with the exploits of the great. It is a true story beautifully related, through which the deep faith and spiritual insight of the unknown author are revealed.

PURPOSE

If his purpose was to tell a good story the author certainly achieved his aim, but he also had a keen interest in David, of whom no childhood story is given in the history, and, having access to this material, wanted at least to tell something of his ancestry. About the middle of the last century the view was promulgated in Germany and Holland that the book of Ruth was written as a protest against the rigorous measures of Ezra and Nehemiah in their attempt to combat mixed marriages. While it is true that the book would discourage Jewish exclusivism in favour of a missionary attitude to the surrounding nations, it is doubtful whether the author wrote with this as his conscious purpose. Propagandists make their points less subtly. The whole episode impressed the writer as an unforgettable example of God's providential care for those who put their trust in Him, irrespective of their race, and therefore he delighted to record the story with all the artistry of which he was capable.

Though the events are set in the time of the Judges, the necessity of explaining the shoe ceremony in 4:7 indicates that some time elapsed before they were recorded. In Dt. 25 the loosing of the shoe, the spitting and the pronouncement of the curse implied that the unwilling kinsman was blameworthy, whereas in Ru. 4 the handing over of the shoe seems only to symbolize the renunciation of a right. Its weakened significance in Ruth suggests that Deuteronomy is earlier. Certainly the nearer kinsman had not reckoned with the obligation of marrying Ruth, so it may well be that, although the custom of levirate marriage was remembered, it was already falling into disuse. Within as little as a generation or two the shoe ceremony might well have required explanation.

Scholars who hold that the book was a protest against the policy of Ezra and Nehemiah are committed to a post-exilic date in the 5th or 4th century BC. Others favour a post-exilic date for different reasons, such as the place of the book in the Hebrew Canon (see below), linguistic considerations, or a late date for Deuteronomy which pushes Ruth into the post-exilic period. An assessment of the date of the Hebrew has to take into account two undisputed factors: (1) the Hebrew is classical; (2) there are Aramaisms in the text. Scholars differ widely in the conclusions they draw from these facts. Some use the presence of Aramaisms to support a post-exilic dating, while others point out that in the time of Hezekiah the leaders in Jerusalem were well able to understand Aramaic (2 Ki. 18:26), that from the time of David there had been close links between Syrian Aram and Israel which might be expected to result in linguistic borrowing, and that in any case some so-called Aramaisms have proved to be early West-Semitic terms, which would be part of the ancestry of both languages. Nothing in the language, therefore, points specifically to a post-exilic date. On the contrary the general Hebrew style is markedly different from that of books known to be post-exilic, and S. R. Driver says it 'stands on a level with the best parts of Samuel' (LOT, p. 454). It may be argued that the writer adopted an archaic style in keeping with the period of which he was writing, but it seems more likely that he lived in the pre-exilic period, perhaps 100 years or so after the time of Ruth. Some have suggested the reign of Solomon, a period of literary production in Israel, as a likely date.

PLACE IN THE CANON

In our English Bibles the book of Ruth follows Judges, as it does in the LXX and Vulgate translations. In printed Hebrew Bibles, however, Ruth appears in the last section to be accepted as canonical, the Writings, where it is the second of the five scrolls which were used liturgically in the synagogue by the 6th century AD. Ruth was read at Pentecost. The Babylonian Talmud, which is older than the 6th century, began the Writings with Ruth, followed by Psalms. Other lists put Ruth as the first of the five scrolls because it belonged first chronologically. Evidently the book was first placed among the Writings and was later transferred to the place where it belongs historically, between Judges and Samuel.

THEOLOGY

Names of God

Each of the main characters bears testimony to a deep faith in the Lord, 'Yahweh', whose name occurs eighteen times in four short chapters. 'As the Lord lives' (3:13) underlines the conviction that He is near at hand, intimately aware of every individual life, and, though He disciplines through famine and bereavement, He turns barrenness into fertility, graciously recompenses those who trust Him, and is the source of all true blessing. The name Yahweh had been revealed supremely at the Exodus, when God delivered the Israelites from slavery, brought them to Sinai and entered into covenant with them; to use the name was to recall His gracious deliverance and the security of His covenant promise. In 1:16 and 2:12 the context requires the general name for God, 'Elohim'. The only other divine name which occurs, '(El) Shaddai', comes to Naomi's lips when, weary from her journey, she meets her one-time neighbours and nostalgically recalls her early married life in Bethlehem (1:20, 21). By avoiding the intimate name and using the more distant one Naomi was conveying her feeling of estrangement. Had not promised blessings been withheld from her? J. A. Motyer (The Revelation of the Divine Name, 1959, pp. 28, 29) has shown from the contexts in which this name occurs in Genesis that it underlined human powerlessness and spoke of the God who could transform situations of human helplessness. Naomi was painfully aware of her weakness and need. Though her faith was dim her use of the name 'Almighty' was a reminder of His power to do great things, and He did not fail her.

Redemption

The twenty occurrences of the verb 'to redeem' (Heb. gā'al) in so short a book are a reminder that the word was in common use in Israel. It belonged to the realm of family law: each member of the family had obligations to protect the other, and none should be lonely or destitute. The near relative who bought back family property (Lv. 25:25), or secured the freedom of an enslaved brother (Lv. 25:47–55), or avenged a murder (Nu. 35; Dt. 19:6), was known as the gō'ēl. The book of Ruth extends his duties to providing an heir for a relative who has died childless. The law of levirate marriage, outlined in Dt. 25:5–10, envisaged several brothers and their families sharing one home. If one brother died without having a son, the next brother was to take the widow and provide an heir for his dead brother. In the case of Ruth, who had no brothers-in-law, a more distant relative was expected to marry her. When the OT asserted that Yahweh was Israel's Gō'ēl it underlined His covenant promise, by which Israel became His own possession (Ex. 19:5). He dwelt among His people (Ex. 25:8) and was their divine Kinsman, ready to deliver and protect them. The special contribution of this book to the subject is to make clear that the gō'ēl alone possessed the right to redeem, and yet was under no obligation to do so. The willing, generous response of Boaz was, in a very small way, a foreshadowing of the great Gō'ēl, who was to descend from him.

Kindness

The Hebrew word ḥeseḏ, which occurs in 1:8, 2:20 and 3:10, is much richer in meaning than its English counterpart 'kindness' would suggest. Supremely it is the characteristic of God Himself: 'the Lord deal kindly with you' (1:8), '. . . the Lord, whose kindness has not forsaken the living or the dead!' (2:20). It is a word closely related to the covenant because it is in the covenant that the gracious approach of God to sinful human beings is most clearly seen. The song rejoicing in the deliverance from Egypt proclaims, 'Thou hast led in thy steadfast love (ḥeseḏ) the people whom thou hast redeemed' (Ex. 15:13). Deuteronomy shows the link very clearly: 'the Lord your God is God, the faithful God who keeps covenant and steadfast love . . .' (7:9). It is a word which includes the warmth of God's fellowship as well as the security of His faithfulness.

It follows that those who have experienced the Lord's ḥeseḏ should be transformed by it, and so show this quality of love to others. Both Naomi and Boaz do so, but it is Ruth the Moabitess who is said to have shown ḥeseḏ (3:10), where Boaz has particularly in mind moral uprightness, as well as selfless love and loyalty (2:11). Where such love and faithfulness is demonstrated in personal relationships the Lord is at work. In Ruth's case the moment of moral choice in showing ḥeseḏ to Naomi was the moment of her conversion, when she made Naomi's God her God, though no doubt the conviction had long been forming within her that Yahweh was the living God, whom she desired above all else. We are probably right in conjecturing that the lives of the Israelites with whom she had been so closely related had drawn her towards Him. This book, like the Psalms, shows us how joyous and satisfying Israel's religion was, and how attractive it became to others when God's people reflected His faithful love to them in their dealings with one another.

1:1–22 RETURN TO BETHLEHEM

1:1–5 Famine and bereavement

1 The days when the judges ruled are described in all their lawlessness in the book of Judges, but no precise information is given here to enable us to co-ordinate the two books. Perhaps it was during one of the periods when 'the land had rest forty years' (Jdg. 3:11; 5:31) that famine struck Bethlehem, whose name meant ironically 'house of bread'. Bethlehem in Judah distinguished the place from the northern Bethlehem (Jos. 19:15). The book of Judges bears independent testimony to the fact that moral standards in Bethlehem compared favourably with those in other places, notably Gibeah (Jdg. 19). Mention of the birth-place of David would capture the special interest of Jewish readers from the very beginning. When famine struck, one man of initiative took his family on a 50-mile journey to the eastern side of the Dead Sea valley to the country of Moab. The Hebrew word means literally 'field', but, as much of Moab is steep rocky hills, it probably refers to the fertile plateau, 2,000–3,000 ft high, south of the river Arnon. From the hills south of Bethlehem it would have been possible to see this plateau on the horizon to the south-east, across the Dead Sea.

2 The name Elimelech, meaning 'Melek is God' or 'God is king', occurs in the Amarna letters of the 14th century BC in the form Milkilu (DOTT, pp. 39–41), and is therefore ancient. Moreover, names compounded with melek are confined to the pre-exilic period. Naomi means 'my pleasant one' and is probably derived from a feminine form of naaman, an adjective used in the Ras Shamra texts of c. 1400 BC, and therefore ancient also. The suggested meanings of Mahlon, 'weakly' and Chilion, 'pining', are merely conjectural, but even if these meanings were accepted their appropriateness would not prove that the names were coined by the author. Ephrathites; Ephrath, the ancient name for Bethlehem (Gn. 35:19), persisted in the adjectival form. 4 Though many guesses have been made, the meaning of the names Orpah and Ruth is not known. They are Moabite and not Hebrew in form. Thus the names are entirely in keeping with the story. Ruth was the wife of Mahlon, as we know from 4:10. The marriage of the sons took place during their 10 years in Moab, where they had settled down. 5 Elimelech's death (v. 3), followed later by the death of Mahlon and Chilion, could have been the occasion for censure upon them for settling in an idolatrous land, but the author is content to state the facts as they concerned Naomi. The stress is on the anguish of her bereavement, especially as she was left without either means of livelihood or hope for the future.

1:6–18 Departure from Moab

6, 7 This interesting example of news reaching other lands of what was going on in Israel, shows how other nations observed Yahweh's dealings with His people and had opportunity to believe in Him. Naomi, reminded of the goodness of the Lord, longed once more for home, and for a share in His blessing. Orpah and Ruth set out with her, intending to go with her to Bethlehem, though they were under no obligation to do so. They seem to have been genuinely fond of their mother-in-law, and were reluctant to allow her to return alone. 8, 9 Naomi for her part thought only for their future; she wanted each of them to feel free to return to her mother's house, where they would find security in a second marriage. They had shown kindness to their husbands and to Naomi, and now she prayed that the Lord would show His kindness to them by blessing their future homes. For a note on the word 'kindness' see Introduction, 'Kindness'. 11–13 In reply to their protestations Naomi argued that in their case the law of levirate marriage (cf. Introduction, 'Redemption') could not possibly apply. She had no more sons and was unlikely to have any. Seeing therefore no likelihood of marriage for them in Judah, her sympathy went out to them, especially as their suffering was a result of the Lord's dealings with her. 14 Orpah found the argument persuasive and returned home. 15 Naomi did not blame her; in fact she urged Ruth to do the same, to go back to her own people and to Chemosh, the national god of Moab. 16, 17 It now became clear that Ruth no longer wished to serve Chemosh, but was determined to give her allegiance to the God of Israel, whom she had come to know through the life and witness of her husband and Naomi. The words recorded in vv. 16, 17 are the epitome of utter loyalty and selfless devotion. No ulterior motive influenced her decision. She identified herself with Naomi, and even bound herself by an oath to stand by her to death. The oath, May the Lord do so to me and more also . . . occurs elsewhere only in the books of Samuel and Kings.

1:19–22 Arrival in Bethlehem

19 All superfluous detail is omitted. As though silhouetted together against the skyline the two of them went on. Their arrival caused a stir of interest and excitement, especially amongst the women. Their question may suggest that they hardly recognized her because she was so changed, or that they were surprised and overjoyed to see her again. 20 Naomi quickly cut short any rejoicing by revealing the depth of her despair in a play on her name. Far from being one in whom the Lord delighted, she renamed herself Mara, 'bitter', in view of the trouble she had been through. For a note on the significance of the Almighty (Shaddai), see Introduction, 'Names of God'. When Naomi accused the Almighty of dealing hardly with her she was forgetful of the gracious power of the God she was complaining of; she had a wrong picture of both her God and her past. 21 Though she says she went away full, the famine had been a disaster at the time, and now in her 'emptiness' she had the opportunity to prove that the Lord could fill her need. The Lord has afflicted me. This RSV translation is an emended version of the Hebrew, following the LXX, Syriac and the Vulgate. The Massoretic text means 'the Lord hath testified against me', as in AV and RV, i.e. her sufferings are a sign of God's disapproval. The emendation both changes the construction by omitting the preposition and alters the form of the verb. 22 The story-teller recapitulates and repeats the refrain they came to Bethlehem, but he prepares us for the next episode by adding at the beginning of barley harvest, which was in April. An inscription known as the Gezer Calendar, dating from the time of Saul or David, divides the year according to the farmer's activities, and mentions 'Month of barley harvest' (DOTT, p. 201). Had the author been writing centuries later, he could easily have introduced an anachronism.

2:1–23 GOD'S GRACIOUS PROVISION

1 At this point the narrator skilfully introduces the fact that a relative of Elimelech was still living in Bethlehem, but the Hebrew avoids the term gō'ēl, which would have anticipated too much. Naomi knew of him but determined not to make use of him. By mentioning the fact in advance the author was able to show how wonderfully God over-ruled. Boaz, whose name probably meant 'in him is strength', was a man of wealth. The idea behind the Hebrew word is that he was gifted in every way. Perhaps Elimelech had once been described in similar terms. 2 Ruth, who knew nothing about Boaz, proposed to take advantage of the ancient law permitting the needy to glean in the fields at harvest time (cf. Lv. 19:9; 23:22; Dt. 24:19), so sparing Naomi the toil and humiliation such work involved. 3 Not knowing the place, she would follow other women to the harvest fields, where men would be cutting the grain with a sickle, women would be binding the sheaves, and anything left over would be the property of the gleaners. The author could see the hand of God at work in leading her to the part of the field belonging to Boaz. It is a surprise to read that wealthy Boaz owned only part of the field, but in the absence of hedges cultivable land was divided into strips, marked by boundary stones; one such strip is meant.

4, 5 The work was already in progress before Boaz arrived, for he had a servant in charge. The Lord be with you, words familiar from their liturgical use, are found only here in this precise form. The Lord was known and acknowledged in everyday work. Whose maiden is this? is a reminder that every woman belonged to someone in a tribal society; Boaz took a personal interest in those who worked on his land, and he did not recognize Ruth. 7 As a foreigner Ruth could not assume that she had a right to glean, but had been careful to ask permission. The second half of the verse has been translated from the LXX and Vulgate, as the RSV margin shows. The Hebrew, followed by the AV and RV, does not make easy sense. The Jerusalem Bible emends to, 'So she came and has been on her feet from morning till now.' Maybe she was resting when Boaz arrived, and the foreman wanted to vouch for her diligence.

8–10 Approving this testimonial, Boaz addressed himself to Ruth, urging her to remain in his fields, and promising her special protection. Evidently she could not assume that she would be respected, nor had she any right to the precious water, which had to be brought from the well, and was often in short supply. Contrary to custom, it is the young men here who draw the water. The generosity of Boaz overwhelmed Ruth. 11, 12 He explains that he had heard about her kindness to Naomi and that he wanted her to experience the reward which only the God of Israel could give. She had so recently come to trust Him, and Boaz wanted to encourage her faith. His lovely metaphor the God of Israel, under whose wings you have come to take refuge is taken up frequently in the Psalms, and by Jesus in Mt. 23:37. When a mother bird spreads her wings over her young to protect them with her life, the preying enemy cannot even see them. How much more concerned the Lord is to defend all those who take refuge in Him! 13 You are most gracious to me is more literally 'let me find grace', a turn of speech that expresses thanks by anticipating further favour.

14 The meal of bread and wine, i.e. vinegar mixed with oil, was supplemented with parched grain, in this case barley, roasted over a fire. Ruth sat with the reapers and was given her own portion of harvest fare, from which she kept back a share for Naomi. The RV 'she left thereof' gives better sense than the RSV. Her intention to share her food with Naomi may have prompted Boaz to tell the young men deliberately to increase the amount she could glean. 17, 18 The gleaner would not usually have much to show for a long day's work in the hot sun, but Ruth threshed out about an ephah of barley. The ephah was about the same as an English bushel, and a bushel of barley weighs about 50 pounds. In addition she brought to Naomi the parched corn she had saved. 19 Where have you worked? If this is the meaning of the second question it adds nothing to the first. Strictly the Hebrew conjunction means 'whither' and not 'where', and Prof. D. Winton Thomas has argued that the Hebrew verb 'āsāh used here means 'to turn' rather than 'to make' in this context (The Bible Translator, Oct. 1966, Vol. 17, No. 4). According to his translation, 'and whither didst thou turn?', Naomi is making her question more specific. 20 Naomi's delighted exclamation conveys her wonder at the Lord's over-ruling in leading Ruth to the field of Boaz. When she explains that he is one of their nearest kin she uses the word gō'ēl; already she foresees that the Lord may be permitting her to make some approach to him. 21–23 Ruth availed herself of the protection of Boaz until both barley and wheat harvests had ended. After this there would be no means of livelihood.

3:1–18 A CLAIM TO KINSHIP

1–6 Marriage was arranged by parents, and it was fitting that Naomi should take the initiative in providing a home and security for Ruth. The harvest had been gathered, and now winnowing of the barley was in progress. Naomi had laid her plans carefully, and had checked that Boaz would be spending the night at the threshing-floor, protecting his grain. Having washed and anointed herself with aromatic oils, Ruth was to put on her best clothes, or, more likely, her big outer garment, which would both provide warmth in the chill of the night, and enable her to remain incognito until the strategic moment came. Naomi's instructions are explicit; behind them may lie some accepted custom. The text emphasizes that Ruth did all she was told to do, and so makes it clear that Ruth was in no sense to be blamed for her intrusion into the threshing-floor; indeed it may have taken some courage on her part to obey her mother-in-law. After the traditional feasting at the end of the day of harvesting, Boaz might be expected to retire in good humour, and sleep soundly. By removing the cloak that acted as a blanket from the feet of Boaz, she would ensure that he would eventually wake up and notice her at his feet. She would then be able to put before him in privacy the claim she wished to make.

7–9 Nothing interfered with the out-working of the plan. The vivid detail he went to lie down at the end of the heap of grain is striking. The author must often have seen farmers protecting their harvest in this way. When Boaz suddenly awoke to find a woman there, his first concern was to identify her. Did he guess that Naomi might attempt to claim the rights of kinship? When Ruth asked him to spread his cloak over her she was speaking symbolically of marriage. The same figure of speech is found in Ezk. 16:8b. 10 Boaz not only put the best possible construction on Ruth's action, but went so far as to invoke a blessing upon her for all her acts of kindness. He implies that it would have been more natural for her to have married one of the young reapers than to make this appeal to him, for he probably belonged to her father-in-law's generation. Ruth's circumspect behaviour in the harvest fields, where friendships may often have been formed, had not escaped the notice of Boaz, nor of the community generally. 11–13 This fact enabled Boaz to comply with her request provided that a nearer kinsman relinquished his right to act as her gō'ēl. Boaz was legally bound to put the case to the nearer relative before he could take the responsibility on himself. If Naomi knew of the existence of this other relative, she must have decided that she would prefer Ruth to be under the protection of Boaz.

14 As soon as light began to dawn Boaz deemed that she should return home, in the safety of daylight, but unobserved by prying eyes. He wished to give no occasion for gossip. 15 The mantle may have been a corner of her large cloak or a headdress. The Hebrew word occurs elsewhere only in Is. 3:22. The six measures of barley were a tangible assurance of goodwill as well as a generous gift to Naomi. Though the type of measure is not specified, no doubt she was given as much as she could conveniently carry. 16 Naomi's question is translated literally in the AV, 'Who art thou, my daughter?', but the sense of the idiom is given in the RSV, How did you fare? 18 Ruth now had to stay patiently at home until the affair was settled. The dénouement is awaited with all the suspense of a drama.

4:1–17 THE KINSMAN-REDEEMER

The last scene is the open square at the city gate, where legal matters were decided and the business of the town transacted. 1, 2 Boaz lost no time in fulfilling his promise, but made his way to the gate as the most likely place to find his relative first thing in the morning, when business was beginning. Though this man remains anonymous in our story, Boaz would have hailed him by name. Clearly Boaz is a man with authority in the community, for he takes command of the situation, and the elders put themselves at his disposal as witnesses. This is a confirmation that he was no longer a young man. 3, 4 For the first time we learn that Naomi had land which she was offering for sale. So far as we know a widow had no right of inheritance, but she would be acting on behalf of her sons. By selling the field to the gō'ēl it would be kept in the family, and she would realize a little capital on it. The RSV retains from the AV the archaic parcel of land instead of adopting the more usual 'portion'. Boaz puts the option clearly, stating that if the nearer relative does not redeem it he will, but the reply comes, I will redeem it. 5, 6 Only now is the crucial subject broached. Elimelech had a right to an heir; Ruth his daughter-in-law was still living, and the man who bought the field had the duty of raising an heir for the dead. If a son was born the field would revert to him, and so the gō'ēl would have impaired his own inheritance because his sons would not inherit what he had bought. Moreover he would have another family to keep. In the light of this refusal the generosity of Boaz becomes the more apparent. Many of the laws of the OT involved willingness for material loss, and revealed maturity of faith in those who obeyed.

7–10 The elders heard the next-of-kin pass on to Boaz the right of redemption, but to complete the transaction the symbolic ceremony of handing over the sandal had to be performed (cf. Introduction, 'Date'). The sandal symbolized possession (cf. Jos. 1:3), and so the witnesses testified that Boaz was the legal heir of Elimelech, and therefore of Mahlon and Chilion. Ruth's first male child should be known as 'son of Elimelech', thus perpetuating the name of the dead. 11 Others besides the official witnesses had by this time gathered at the city gate to affirm the legality of the transaction, and to add their blessing to that of the elders. The blessing implies that more than one child was hoped for. Rachel and Leah, together with their handmaids, had borne Jacob twelve sons; Boaz would be rewarded if Ruth bore him many sons to add to his prestige and prosperity. 12 At first sight mention of the unsavoury story of Judah and Tamar (Gn. 38) seems a little out of place, but the author had two good reasons for introducing it. Firstly, it referred to levirate marriage, but, whereas Tamar had been tacitly refused, Boaz had honoured the obligation. Secondly, there was a special local interest. Perez, who was born to Tamar as a result of her strategem, was an ancestor of Boaz (v. 18), and doubtless of many others in the Bethlehem district, for the genealogies mention only three sons of Judah, from whom the whole tribe descended.

13, 14 The birth of a son to Ruth is attributed directly to the Lord's blessing, but the one congratulated is Naomi, because she is no longer desolate, but has a 'son' through whom Elimelech's name will be carried on. 15 The new-born child will give her a new lease of life, and be a comfort to her in her old age. Though a tribute is paid to Ruth, it is Naomi who is the central figure. 16, 17 By taking the baby on her knee Naomi was symbolizing the fact that she was adopting him, and the words of the neighbours reveal that they so interpreted her action. There is a difficulty in v. 17 which would be removed if gave him a name could be deleted, as in the Peshitto version, so that it read, 'The women of the neighbourhood said, "A son has been born to Naomi." They named him Obed.' As it stands there is no connection between the introductory words 'gave him a name' and the exclamation that follows. An early scribe may have inserted the verb twice by mistake. Obed is a short form of the name Obadiah, meaning 'servant of the Lord', a worthy name for the grandfather of great King David, mention of whom brings the story to its climax. 1 Sa. 22:3, 4 tells of David's visit to Moab; he may even have known Ruth. Some commentators think that the original story ended here.

4:18–22 CONCLUSION

The concluding genealogy, tracing the connection between Perez and David, may have come from the same source as 1 Ch. 2:4–15. The main reason for thinking that it was added later is that Elimelech's name does not occur, in spite of the insistence in the story that the first-born son should continue his family. Instead Obed is called son of Boaz. Hezron is named in the list of those who went down into Egypt with Jacob (Gn. 46:12). From Ex. 6:23 we know that Amminadab and Nashon were contemporary with Moses, but as only one generation separates Nashon from Boaz, the genealogy must be abbreviated. Salmon is another form of the name 'Salma' in 1 Ch. 2:11, but in v. 51, where Salma is called 'father of Bethlehem', another man, a descendant of Caleb, is meant.

Whether or not the genealogy was part of the original book, it makes a fitting ending to the story, by linking Ruth with the wider Bible history. The writer wanted us to know that future destinies were in the balance when Ruth made her apparently private decision to stand by Naomi and worship the God of Israel. More hung in the balance than even he could know, for this is not the last mention of her in the Bible. As the ancestress of David, Ruth had the honour to be among the forebears of Jesus Christ (Mt. 1:5).

1 and 2 Samuel

INTRODUCTION

In the Hebrew text the two books of Samuel formed one only. The present division is inconvenient, for it breaks up the story of David and the account of Saul's disaster on Gilboa. The authors of the Septuagint (LXX) took the books of Samuel and Kings as a complete history of the kingdom, and divided it into four sections called 'Books of the Kingdoms' (or 'Reigns'). The Latin Bible in due course altered this to 'Books of the Kings'; so that the books of Samuel were called the first and second 'Books of the Kings' respectively.

Since the 16th century, most Hebrew Bibles have followed the arrangement of dividing the original book of Samuel in two, and have called the parts the first and second books of Samuel. Most English versions adopt the same practice, but in the AV these books have, as sub-title, the first and second 'Book of the Kings', and 1 and 2 Kings have, as sub-title, third and fourth 'Book of the Kings', respectively.

DATE AND AUTHORSHIP

The name of Samuel is very appropriately used as a title for 1 and 2 Samuel, since he is the central figure of the first chapters, and also the man who anointed both Saul and David, the chief characters of the remainder of the two books. The title does not imply that he wrote the books; he could not possibly have done so, for his death is recorded as early as 1 Sa. 25:1. He may well have been the author of one of the source documents used by the final author; 1 Ch. 29:29 shows that Samuel was a writer. (On the sources, see Appendix 1.)

There can be no doubt that early and reliable sources were available to the author, but he himself cannot have lived (or, at least, written) before the death of Solomon, since the divided monarchy is alluded to in 1 Sa. 27:6, in terms which suggest that more than one king had succeeded Solomon. The earliest possible date for the whole work would thus be the end of the 10th century BC. The quality of the Hebrew and the absence of Aramaisms point to the early date of the sources, rather than to the early date of the completed work; it is generally agreed that the author provided a minimum of editorial addition and comment. Almost certainly the books of Samuel as we know them were formulated as part of a bigger historical work, namely Joshua–Judges–Samuel–Kings; if so, the final editing cannot have taken place before the Exile, since the books of Kings carry the story down to that era (6th century BC). But it seems likely that a first edition, so to speak, probably substantially the same as the final work, was written long before the Exile: 1 Sa. 27:6 must have been penned before the monarchy ended, but it is clearly an editorial comment, not drawn from a source document.

PURPOSE

The purpose of the books of Samuel, like the question of authorship, cannot be considered in isolation from the other historical books, Joshua, Judges and Kings. Israel's history, from the triumphant conquest of Canaan to the ignominious departure into Exile, is presented in terms of God's relationship with that nation, and in particular with its leaders. The function of the books of Samuel is to direct attention to the beginning of the monarchy, with all its high hopes and potentialities.

In the popular view, we may fairly assume that David will have been recalled with pride and nostalgia, Saul probably with rather mixed feelings, while Samuel was possibly remembered as a great prophet but a poor national leader, who had been unable to achieve much against the Philistines. The historical facts were given by the writer of 1 and 2 Samuel, not just to enlarge his public's acquaintance with its own history, but to put those facts in their proper religious perspective. Thus readers past and present learn why a change of national constitution came about, and why Saul failed to achieve true greatness; while from the history of David lessons are taught about the qualities, the character and the behaviour demanded from the man who aspires to lead the people of God, as also about the way God will deal with such a man, in one circumstance after another. For this reason, the Bathsheba episode is not shrugged off as the minor peccadillo of an otherwise great and good king, but shown to be the turning-point in his reign.

Through the narratives it is also revealed how God is ever present, in one way and another, with His people. While Israel suffered from time to time, often owing to the failure of her leaders, God was yet always providing 'some better thing' for them. And in this way the books of Samuel pointed forward, as they looked back, and provided inspiration for the dark days under a Manasseh or a Nebuchadrezzar.

DUPLICATE ACCOUNTS

A feature of the books of Samuel to which repeated attention has been drawn is the occurrence of a number of 'duplicate accounts', or, in other words, pairs of very similar narratives. The most obvious example is the pair of stories about David's sparing Saul's life (1 Sa. 24; 26), but it is by no means the only 'duplicate'. Twice the fall of Eli's house is foretold (1 Sa. 2:31–36; 3:11–14); twice Yahweh's rejection of Saul is announced (1 Sa. 13; 15); twice David is introduced to Saul's court (1 Sa. 16:17–22; 17:55 – 18:5); twice he flees to Achish king of Gath (1 Sa. 21; 27). Two or even three duplicate accounts have been found in the story of Saul's becoming king (1 Sa. 8–12); but that complex of events constitutes a special case, which is best treated separately (see Appendix 2).

There is rarely any historical difficulty in such twin narratives; if David spared Saul's life once, he may just as easily have done so twice. Some readers may feel that would be too great a coincidence; but it is clearly not impossible. The most difficult historical problem arises over the question of David's being introduced to Saul; for Saul's conversation with Abner recorded in 1 Sa. 17:55–58 does seem to imply that the young warrior was unknown to the king, in spite of David's earlier service as a royal musician and armour-bearer (1 Sa. 16:21–23). However, the difficulty is not insuperable (see commentary in loc.).

But the real answer is surely to be found in the purpose of the writer. Even if in each case one of the pair of 'duplicates' came from a separate source from its twin (which is very doubtful), the compiler and author must have used both quite deliberately. In effect, the repetition of similar incidents serves to give emphasis to certain points the writer wishes to make. In this fashion the author has stressed and underscored the fact that it was no accident that Eli's house was rejected, nor that Saul and his succession was put aside by God; it was no mere chance that brought David to Saul's court; nor was it a mere passing whim of David's that saved Saul's life. The divine hand and purpose in history are thus unmistakably shown to the reader.

Moreover, there is often a sequence in the paired episodes. This is particularly true of the accounts of David's arrival at court and of his flight to Gath (see commentary in loc.). Again, when the writer uses remarkably similar language in the second of a duplicate pair, we may be sure he is deliberately reminding the reader of the former incident; this applies especially to the twofold mention of the sneering proverb about Saul's 'prophetic' powers (1 Sa. 10:12; 19:24). Finally, the 'difficulty' is sometimes occasioned by the very art of the writer. He is no doubt giving only part of the conversation between Saul and Abner, following David's victory over Goliath, in 1 Sa. 17:55–58; but the purpose of what is recorded is to emphasize the minor and virtually unknown capacity in which David had served Saul in the past, in contrast with the position of eminence and prominence which he is now to occupy at the same court. (In this connection, it is to be observed that much of the direct speech in the Bible may well be abbreviation or paraphrase of the original statements or conversations.)

In short, to view two similar stories as mere duplicates of each other, divergent at that, is to lose much of the point and effect of the narrative.

THE TEXT

It is unfortunate that the Hebrew text, as we have it in the Massoretic Text, of the books of Samuel has been relatively poorly preserved. There are a few occasions where something has been lost altogether (cf. 1 Sa. 13:1), and quite a number where the MT offers poor sense, if any. As it happens, the LXX translation provides better sense in the majority of these instances, and it is almost inevitable that scholars should have made considerable use of the LXX to elucidate the Hebrew. Footnotes in the RSV will give some idea of the number of times that such procedure has been thought necessary; the Jerusalem Bible (JB) makes considerably greater use still of the LXX.

In general, it is not considered wise to emend the Hebrew text too readily on the basis of the LXX; one cannot often be sure what precise Hebrew text the LXX translators had in front of them (their Vorlage), especially since they were prepared to introduce considerable changes in wording and meaning if they felt it proper to do so. Even where the books of Samuel are concerned, therefore, too heavy a dependence on the LXX is to be discouraged. However, the value of the LXX for these books has been enhanced by the discovery among the Dead Sea Scrolls of some fragmentary MSS of Samuel which show marked Septuagintal affinities. This find suggests that the LXX Vorlage of Samuel was a different recension of the books from that which was the basis of the MT. Nevertheless, caution remains necessary, and decisions between variant readings will still have to be made on the basis of the scientific criteria used in textual criticism; sometimes the MT will be right, at other times the LXX.

The particular textual problems surrounding 1 Sa. 17; 18 are discussed separately, in Appendix 4.

In view of the number of uncertainties of text and translation, it is impossible in a brief commentary to treat each one in detail. The RSV has therefore been followed without comment (RSV mg. often draws attention to the uncertainties, in any case), except where there seem particularly strong reasons for either elaborating or disagreeing.

CHRONOLOGY

The dates of Samuel, Saul and David cannot be ascertained with precision, and different scholars hold rather different opinions on some points (notably the length of Saul's reign; see on 1 Sa. 13:1). Samuel's period of office may be tentatively assigned to the years 1075–1035 BC, the battle of Aphek having occurred not earlier than 1050. Saul's reigned overlapped with Samuel's career, and its beginning may be roughly dated at 1045. With a little more certainty the death of Saul can be assigned to c. 1010, and the reign of David c. 1010–970.

FURTHER READING

Attention is often drawn in the commentary to the works of two recent writers, namely H. W. Hertzberg (I & II Samuel: a Commentary, 1964) and W. McKane (I & II Samuel: Introduction and Commentary, 1963). For detailed notes these should be referred to; and the standard Introductions to the Old Testament and Bible Dictionaries will yield full bibliographies. To view the reigns of Saul and David in historical setting, readers should consult the relevant sections in J. Bright, History of Israel, 1960, or M. Noth, History of Israel[2], 1960.

A good Bible atlas is indispensable for a proper understanding of a number of passages in the books of Samuel. L. H. Grollenberg, Atlas of the Bible, 1965, or G. E. Wright and F. V. Filson, Westminster Historical Atlas to the Bible, 1953, may be recommended. On archaeological data relevant to the period, see J. A. Thompson, The Bible and Archaeology, 1962, ch. 6.

OUTLINE OF CONTENTS

(In this analysis the two books are treated as a whole)

1 SAMUEL

1:1 – 7:14 Samuel's early years

1 Sa. 1:1 – 7:14 SAMUEL'S EARLY YEARS

The historical situation presupposed at the start of the narrative of the books of Samuel is that of the end of the period of the judges; 1 Samuel is the sequel to the book of Judges. There are two recurring themes in the books of Samuel: the problem of the leadership of God's people, Israel; and the presence of God in their midst. The former motif means that the history of Israel is presented in terms of the lives of three outstanding individuals—Samuel, Saul and David—while the second motif involves frequent mention of shrine and ark. The two themes come together when the Lord is said to be 'with' one leader or another.

1:1 – 3:21 Samuel and Eli

The first section of 1 Samuel, accordingly, brings before us two successive spiritual leaders, Eli and Samuel; and the scene is the principal sanctuary of the Israelites during the period of the judges, Shiloh (cf. Jdg. 18:31). It was destroyed by the Philistines c. 1050 BC.

1:1–8 Elkanah and his two wives. Attention is first drawn to Samuel's parents, Elkanah and Hannah, a God-fearing couple who regularly visited Shiloh to worship. Yet Hannah was far from happy, due not only to her own barrenness but also to the unkind conduct of Elkanah's other wife. Polygamy was tolerated under the law of Moses (Dt. 21:15–17), but it was not the original divine intention (cf. Mt. 19:3–8), and could cause great misery. Barrenness was accounted a great disgrace for a Hebrew woman.

1 Ramathaim-zophim is a longer form of the usual Ramah (cf. v. 19); the second part of the name links it with Zuph (mentioned later in the verse), an ancestor of Elkanah descended from Levi via Kohath, according to 1 Ch. 6:22–38. Thus Ephraimite must refer to geographical location, not ancestry. 4, 5 The portions were of meat, part of a sacrificial meal. Hannah received only one, since she had no mouths but her own to feed, if RSV is correct; but a 'worthy' or 'double' portion (see AV, RV) is not impossible—the Hebrew text, though obscure, at least suggests it, and such an act by Elkanah would partly explain Peninnah's conduct.

1:9–18 Hannah's prayer and its answer. Hannah made a special plea to God for a son, which involved a vow that he should be dedicated to God from his earliest years. The passage makes clear that Samuel was the special provision of God, not of course only for Hannah, but for Israel as a whole; this was no natural birth.

9 Eli the priest was sitting where he could be consulted, while his sons saw to ritual tasks (see v. 3). 11 Samuel was to be a Nazirite, in fact. The regulations for Nazirites are given in Nu. 6, although there it is clear that the Nazirite vow was normally of temporary duration. (See NBD, art. 'Nazarite'.)

1:19–28 Samuel's birth and dedication to God. God's miraculous gift of a son, followed by the boy's total dedication to God, is epitomized in the phrases 'asked . . . of the Lord' (v. 20) and 'lent to the Lord' (v. 28). (In Heb. one verb, šā'al, provides both meanings.) There is irony here, and concealed theological significance, for the fact is (as any Hebrew reader would have known at once) that Saul's name, not Samuel's, means 'asked'. Samuel, in fact, was all that Saul was not.

20 The name Samuel means something like 'his name is God', or 'a godly name'; W. J. Martin has suggested that, in naming him, Hannah uttered some such sentence as 'I asked for him a godly name' (see NBD, art. 'Samuel'). 21 The yearly sacrifice. Evidently Elkanah's pilgrimage was an annual event (in spite of the injunction of Ex. 23:17). Most modern commentators hold that it was the Feast of Tabernacles.

2:1–10 The song of Hannah. Hannah's song is denied to her by most commentators, chiefly because of the specific reference to a king (v. 10). The song is not irrelevant to the situation, however: Israel had its adversaries, and God's agent in deliverance would be His anointed. We may therefore think of Hannah as specially inspired to see that Samuel's career would lead to Israel's salvation from the Philistine threat. On the other hand, v. 1 stands apart (see RSV), and is perhaps the only sentence attributed directly to Hannah (similarly, in Jn. 3, it is difficult to decide precisely what is direct speech). The narrator may have inserted at this point a well-known psalm (from the Feast of Tabernacles liturgy, conceivably), which he saw as particularly appropriate to the situation in Hannah's time. The song is comparable in many ways with the Magnificat (Lk. 1:46–55). 'The psalm puts the birth, and hence the life, of Samuel in the context of the all-powerful saving acts of God' (Hertzberg).

5 The barren has borne seven provides an adequate link with Hannah's personal situation; it is not to be taken literally, of course. 6 Sheol; i.e. the abode of the dead. 10 Anointed (in Heb. the word from which 'Messiah' is ultimately derived) is a common expression in the books of Samuel, with their constant theme of God's chosen leader.

2:11–26 The sanctuary at Shiloh. A contrast emerges between the serene godliness of the boy Samuel and the corrupt practices of Eli's sons; Eli seems to have been a helpless onlooker.

11 Elkanah went home, presumably taking the rest of his family with him. 13 The custom was plainly a bad one; the following verses indicate that Hophni and Phinehas took from the offerer what belonged to his own sacrificial feast; and they insulted God by demanding their portion before His was burnt on the altar (see Lv. 3:3–5; 7:29–34). 18, 19 The ephod was a priestly robe; the little robe was for more general use. 20 Loan . . . lent (or as RSV mg.) again picks up the theme of Samuel's name (cf. 1:20). 21 does more than tell us family news; it shows the blessing deriving from Samuel's office. 25 Who can intercede . . . ? I.e. there was no machinery for arbitrating between priests and God. The purposes of God for Eli's sons are here revealed in advance of the punishment meted out to them (4:11); but their disobedience was of their own volition. Yet 'the punishment of sin may consist in the sinner's loss of his freewill' (Eichrodt).

2:27–36 A prophecy about the priesthood. The prophecy is comprehensive, predicting not merely the death of Eli's sons, but also Samuel's succession to Eli himself, and the rise of the line of Zadok. The passage teaches that historical vicissitudes are both morally conditioned and very much under divine control. As with Hannah's song, we may choose to think that the original oracle has been amplified by the inspired writer to show in greater detail God's plans for the priestly leadership of His people; but it is an impossible task to set the limits of divine revelation to the prophets.

There are a number of textual obscurities in this passage.

31 Fulfilled in the Nob massacre (ch. 22). 35 makes explicit the proper harmony between priest and king, respectively cultic and political leaders of Israel. 36 predicts the menial tasks that await Eli's posterity.

3:1–21 The Lord appears to Samuel. In fulfilment of the prophecy of ch. 2, Eli begins to retire into the background, Samuel coming into prominence (cf. how the Gospels depict John the Baptist from the time of the baptism of Christ).

1 The word of the Lord was rare. This is both an introduction to the narrative that follows and a statement of Israel's sorry plight. Probably we are to assume that the faults of Eli's family had occasioned the rarity of the divine voice. 3 The lamp of God was not the seven-branched candlestick, as that was never allowed to go out (Lv. 24:2). Samuel was lying near the ark for the purpose of receiving any word from God, yet 7 he had never before experienced any such revelation; hence his first reactions to the voice of God.

10–14 rehearse, but in different words, the prophecy received by Eli (2:27–36). 10 As at other times: not to Samuel, but to his predecessors in attendance beside the ark. 19 Samuel shows predictive powers. 20 A prophet. As a priest, Samuel could function only at Shiloh, but as prophet his importance reached from Dan to Beer-sheba, i.e. as far as the most northerly and most southerly sanctuary-cities of Israel. He is thus depicted as a national figure and no longer a child (cf. 4:1).

4:1 – 7:14 War with the Philistines

The writer's attention now turns to the Philistine threat (last treated in Jdg. 13–16). But the presence of God is still the underlying theme; this section might be sub-titled 'the adventures of the ark' (L. H. Brockington).

4:1–10 Israel suffers defeat. The mention of Aphek, which lay due W of Shiloh, on the edge of the coastal plain, shows that the Philistines were making inroads into the hill country, having fully mastered the plain. The Israelites therefore mustered and endeavoured now to drive them out of the hills, but were routed.

1 The first part of the verse belongs in ch. 3, and appears there in several ancient versions. Ebenezer was later to be the scene of an Israelite victory (see on 7:12). 3, 4 The Israelites were making a fetish of the ark, for while they recognized that God was responsible for their defeat, they considered that the physical presence of the ark must inevitably bring victory. The ark was viewed as His throne; and since He was the Lord of hosts (lit. 'armies', but the hosts of heaven rather than of Israel), His presence would win the day for Israel. 5 The shout acclaimed the presence of God (cf. Ps. 47:5). 6–8 The Philistines were polytheists, and assumed that the Israelites were. 8 The Philistines apparently had a confused knowledge of Israel's previous history. 9 shows how far the Philistine aggression had gone.

4:11–22 The fall of Eli's house. The second, and much heavier, defeat led to the fulfilment of the prophecies of chs. 2, 3. Scripture does not dwell on the misery suffered in consequence by Israel, nor does it recount the subsequent sacking of Shiloh by the Philistines. Our knowledge of the latter disaster comes from archaeological excavations at Shiloh (together with hints in Je. 7:12; 26:6). It is the loss of the ark which is the real disaster in the narrator's eyes (see vv. 18–22).

18 Only here are we told that Eli was a judge, as well as a priest. The brief editorial note links the story with the book of Judges, and places it in the on-going scheme of history. 21 Ichabod. The second part to the name signifies 'glory', but the initial I is of uncertain meaning—'there is not', 'where is?', or 'alas for'. 22 Departed; lit. 'gone into exile'. Ps. 78:60f. briefly recalls the disasters of this chapter.

5:1–12 The ark in Philistine hands. We now follow the ark to the temple of Dagon in Ashdod. Dagon was a corn deity, whose cult extended from S Palestine to Mesopotamia; there was another temple to him at Ugarit, and the Ras Shamra tablets call Baal 'son of Dagon' (see IDB, art. 'Dagon'). But Dagon had neither defeated Israel nor captured the ark, which remained the property of Yahweh. His presence was by no means confined to the ark, but neither did He abandon it. If Israel had suffered defeat, He emerged victorious.

1 Ashdod was one of the five major Philistine cities, which are all listed in 6:17. Samson had destroyed the Dagon temple in Gaza (Jdg. 16). 4, 5 Threshold. Possibly the pedestal (podium) of the idol is meant. Zp. 1:9 is reminiscent of the custom here related. The threshold became taboo because it had been in direct contact with the idol. 6 Tumours. The mention of mice in 6:4f. (and also in this verse, in LXX) suggests bubonic plague, an epidemic spread by rodents, of which swollen lymph-glands in the groin are characteristic. 8 The lords of the Philistines were the rulers of the five cities, which were independent but capable of very efficient collective action. 11 Deathly panic; 'fatal' may be the sense, i.e. that the panic caused fatalities over and above the victims of the epidemic.

6:1–12 The return of the ark. The ark came back to Israelite soil without the slightest effort by the men of Israel to retrieve it and in spite of the Philistine resort to pagan soothsayers (probably the sense of 'priests', v. 2) and diviners. Thus the overruling hand of God is evident.

2 To its place (JB 'to where it belongs'). The Philistines may not even have known it had come from Shiloh. There is in effect a double question here—where shall we send it, and how? 3, 4 The guilt offering will not have been on the levitical pattern; the Philistines practised a form of sympathetic magic, patently. The number five here, and the mention of all five cities in v. 17, indicate that the plague had affected all of Philistia, not merely the three cities mentioned in ch. 5. 5 Your mice that ravage the land. Probably it was the depletion of food-stocks by the mice that concerned the Philistines, who can scarcely have understood that bubonic plague was carried by rodents. 5, 6 The diviners' suggestions were plainly in the nature of an experiment. They found themselves with no precedent to follow, but they relied on their knowledge (such as it was) of Egypt's plague experiences when in contact with the Israelites. 7 Milch cows would not normally be used to pull carts, and would therefore not be inclined to follow any particular route. Moreover, they, like the new cart, would never have served to carry anything profane. In other words, the Philistines observed every conceivable taboo. 9 Beth-shemesh was just in Israelite territory, a few miles SE of Ekron. Originally allotted to Dan ('Ir-shemesh', Jos. 19:41), it was later a Levitical city within the tribal holding of Judah (Jos. 21:16). 10–12 The cows might well have headed home to their calves, but instead they made straight for Beth-shemesh.

6:13–20 The ark at Beth-shemesh. In spite of the understandable Israelite joy to see the ark returned—a real boost to Israelite morale—events soon made it clear that the ark was not to be trifled with. Symbol of the divine presence, it was holy and therefore dangerous (a common concept in the ancient world); W. McKane has suggested that the distinctive concept expressed here is that the ark was equally dangerous to Israelite laymen (as opposed to the priesthood) as it was to the Philistines. (Cf. 2 Sa. 6:1–11.) All was well while the Levites (v. 15) handled it, but casual curiosity was punished (v. 19). God's presence among His people commands both reverent awe and also joy in His salvation.

14 Joshua was a common name in Israel; this Joshua was a local land-owner. The great stone was a natural landmark, utilized as an altar on this occasion, and it served for many years to remind Israel of the ark's history (see v. 18). 15 The Levites: one of the few references to Levites in Samuel and Kings. The frequently-made assertion that such a detail is unhistorical (deriving from the practices of a later date) is less compelling when one notes the very casual introduction of the Levites in this passage, whereas in 2 Sa. 6 there is no specific mention of them; one would have expected an editor rewriting such passages in the light of his own day to have mentioned Levites without fail in 2 Sa. 6, wherever else he omitted to do so. 16 The Philistines are satisfied; the ark has returned home and been received with due ceremonial. 18 The golden mice were five in number (see v. 4); the villages will have been reckoned with the cities for purposes of enumeration. This day; i.e. the date of the final composition of the book. 19 The men who died were guilty of breaking the law of Nu. 4:20. There were seventy who died; the additional 50,000 (cf. AV, RSV mg.) of most Hebrew MSS is difficult to account for, and a totally impossible figure.

6:21 – 7:2 The ark at Kiriath-jearim. Kiriath-jearim lay some 9 miles NE of Beth-shemesh, in the direction of Shiloh. The fact that Shiloh now lay in ruins explains both why the ark did not return to it and why Israel lamented. J. Bright and others have maintained that the Philistines, though glad to get rid of the ark, nevertheless would not let it out of their general supervision. This may be so; but on the other hand, they did not hinder its removal from Beth-shemesh, and later on Saul did nothing even when victorious to move it from Kiriath-jearim.

7:1 Abinadab and Eleazar are not otherwise known. 2 Twenty years. This period scarcely suffices to bring us to the events in David's reign recorded in 2 Sa. 6 (but see on 13:1). It may therefore relate to the national repentance of vv. 3, 4. Lamented is a doubtful word in the Hebrew, and perhaps Hertzberg is right to emend the text, producing the rendering 'departed from the Lord (to serve idols)', which neatly introduces v. 3.

7:3–14 Victory under Samuel's leadership. The ark rests now for twenty years, but the God of the ark is by no means inactive; He reveals Himself through Samuel, who now reappears, no longer as priest at Shiloh, but primarily as political leader. His advice to Israel makes it clear that idolatry was rife and that the Philistines had followed up their victory at Aphek (ch. 4). As a prelude to success in battle, turning from idolatry was essential; this theme is frequent in the book of Judges (see, e.g., Jdg. 2).

3, 4 Ashtaroth is the plural of Ashtoreth, a fertility goddess widely revered in the ancient Fertile Crescent, and frequently associated with Baal in the OT. The plural (of this word, and of Baal in v. 4) refers to the local manifestations of these deities. Baal was native to Canaan, but the implication here is that he was to be viewed as a foreign deity so far as Israel was concerned. 5 Mizpah lay approximately half-way between Jerusalem and Shiloh, though its exact site is disputed. It was an important city at various periods, and another sanctuary-city (where Samuel exercised judicial functions, v. 16). 6 Drew water . . .: not evidenced elsewhere, but, with fasting, it was no doubt a symbol of repentance. 9 Samuel acts as a priest, but at a different sanctuary, and indeed in a way that is unique in the OT; the sacrifice had atoning significance, at any rate. 10, 11 The Israelite victory can be attributed only to Yahweh; in any case, Israel had not the weapons to fight the well-armed Philistines (cf. 13:19–22). They could and did pursue, however. 12 Although the sites cannot be precisely identified, it is possible that the earlier Philistine victory (4:1f.) occurred near a different Ebenezer. If so, Samuel deliberately gave the name, in view of its meaning, to the new battle-site. 13, 14 Fidelity to Yahweh thus brings its military and political reward. The victory was only temporary and far from conclusive, and this is implicit here (the latter part of v. 13 shows that warfare was continuous). Samuel could accomplish no military masterstroke, and the Philistines established some garrisons in the Israelite hills before his death. But before we dismiss the picture here presented as idealized and unrealistic, we must remember that the narrator and his first readers were well aware that Saul was the first Israelite leader to achieve major successes against the Philistines. The writer carefully states, however, that he is describing the whole of Samuel's lifetime, not just the part of it that preceded Saul's becoming king; he is in fact tacitly placing Samuel above Saul, despite the latter's royal title, in the hierarchy of Israel. 14 From Ekron to Gath; i.e. the border territories. The Amorites were the non-Israelite inhabitants of Canaan, who often felt more kinship with the Philistines (who shared their religion, for instance); their peacefulness now is a sign of the Israelite success.

7:15 – 15:35 SAMUEL AND SAUL

This section portrays Samuel throughout as the divinely-appointed leader in Israel, even while it introduces us to the enigmatic figure of Saul, Israel's first king. If Saul was in different ways markedly inferior both to Samuel and David, nevertheless the institution of the monarchy was a significant milestone in the history of Israel, and it is not surprising that several chapters are devoted to the theme. For a study of the literary and historical problems of these chapters, see Appendix 2.

7:15 – 12:25 Saul becomes king

7:15 – 8:3 Samuel's position in Israel. Samuel, like Eli before him (4:18), was a judge in Israel, both in the special sense common in the book of Judges, i.e. a leader and deliverer raised up by God, and also in the sense more familiar to English readers. His life as a dispenser of justice revolved round a number of sanctuaries (vv. 16, 17). (On the function of such sanctuaries, see A. E. Cundall, 'Sanctuaries in pre-exilic Israel', Vox Evangelica, IV, 1965, pp. 4–27.) But despite his own high qualities, his sons gave rise to popular discontent.

7:16 Legal decisions were customarily given at sanctuaries. Since the ark of the covenant contained the Ten Commandments, one may reasonably infer that laws were referable at all the Israelite sanctuaries. 8:1 Judges in the juridical sense only. 2 Beer-sheba lies at the southern extremity of Palestine, and its mention draws attention to the extent of Samuel's influence. Josephus (Ant. vi.3.2) places one son at Bethel instead. 3 Cf. 2:12. The frequent unsuitability of human succession is a recurring theme of the OT historical books, from Gideon to the descendants of David.

8:4–9 The popular plea for a king. We can well understand the elders' demand, from a political point of view. Stability was what Israel lacked, as the vicissitudes depicted in Judges show. The tribal elders connected this with the lack of stable leadership. Philistine pressure, of course, lay behind their demand. But from the religious aspect, the demand (however sensible and far-sighted a move politically) was tantamout to rejecting Yahweh from being king. It must not be supposed that a human king would in some way take God's place, or place Him at a distance from His people. The judges, including Samuel, had been leaders who had demanded allegiance from the Israelites, with full divine approval. The chief difference between judge and king was simply that of continuity; kings establish dynasties. The theological point here is that judges had been individually appointed by Yahweh, at times of His choosing; Israel's defeats had been caused by their own sins, not by political incompetence by the judges. But instead of learning this lesson from their past national history, and showing repentance and trust in Yahweh as a result, the elders considered that a stable leadership would prevent the ups and downs of the past; this decision amounted to an attempt to bypass God, and in effect rejected His future leadership and power of choice, despite the willingness of the elders to allow Him (through Samuel) to select for them the first king.

5 Like all the nations. Many of Israel's neighbours had long-established monarchies; the desire to ape foreign peoples was in itself a sign of apostasy. 6 The demand was no compliment to Samuel. 7 The portrayal of God as king over His people is a common feature of OT and NT; but see especially Jdg. 8:22f. 8 The rejection of Yahweh is no more than the culmination of past apostasy. 9 If the elders are interested solely in political expediency, then the political implications of their request are to be put to them fairly and squarely.

8:10–22 Samuel's advice rejected. Samuel's speech paints no rosy picture of the side-effects of the inauguration of the monarchy: forced labour and conscription, heavy taxes, and finally sheer despotic tyranny. But once Israel has so chosen, there is no turning back. It has often been maintained that Solomon is the prototype of the description in these verses; but recently-discovered evidence (from Alalakh and Ugarit) makes it plain that 'the nations round about' long before Samuel's time had bitter experience of the cost of the privilege of having a monarchy. (See K. A. Kitchen, Ancient Orient and Old Testament, 1966, pp. 158f.) Naturally, however, the historian stressed those characteristics which his readers would recognize only too clearly; but to make the description relevant is not to make it unhistorical.

16 Cattle. There seems no strong reason to prefer this reading to the Hebrew 'young men' (cf. AV, RSV mg.). 18 Cf. 1 Ki. 12:4. 20 The elders again express their desire to be like other nations. Here they make it explicit that it is the immediate military problem that chiefly concerns them. 22 We are not to suppose that God's hand was forced. The situation did indeed need desperate measures, and the divine plan all along was to choose His anointed in His own good time. Dt. 17:14–20 gives the pattern for a king who would obtain divine approval.

9:1–14 Saul comes to Ramah. The scene shifts, with skilful dramatic effect, to the man who was soon to become Israel's first king. Saul's lack of personal ambition is emphasized by the narrative: he was merely looking for lost donkeys, with no thought in his head of political greatness; he did not even recognize Samuel when he met him (vv. 18,19)! Nevertheless, he came from a family of substance and his own personal appearance was kingly enough.

1 Perhaps 'a man of Gibeah of Benjamin' was the original reading; although neither the Hebrew MSS nor the ancient versions give the place-name, its inclusion has been favoured by many commentators. A man of wealth represents a Hebrew phrase often referring to valour (cf. AV 'a mighty man of power'); here wealth is certainly intended, but possibly valour too. 3–5 The route cannot be traced in full detail, but it was no straight road. The denouement took place in Ramah, Samuel's home-town, as the mention of the land of Zuph indicates (cf. 1:1). The name Ramah has probably been deliberately avoided, because the narrator, a very skilful raconteur, does not wish to give the game away too soon that a meeting with Samuel is imminent; similarly the name Samuel is avoided until v. 14. 6–8 The literary artistry continues: Saul is in Samuel's very home-town, and the great prophet-judge is looking for a king; yet Saul is virtually ignorant of Samuel, and is advised by a mere servant to seek him out, with a trivial request about donkeys! Saul even puts difficulties in the way; it is the unnamed servant who resolves them. It is quite improper, and totally ignores the writer's art and skill, to argue (as older commentators often did) from these verses that Samuel was an obscure village seer; it is perfectly credible that a young rustic like Saul should not have known Samuel or much about him, and it is the whole purpose of the narrative to depict Saul as an innocent abroad, not to demote Samuel. 6 The final clause must mean that Saul and his servant want to know about the goal of their journey; here again there is effective dramatic irony, for their imagined goal was a few donkeys, their real but quite unforeseen goal a throne and a kingdom. 9 See Appendix 3. 11–13 are entirely consonant with earlier statements about Samuel—he is neither merely 'local' nor only a 'seer'—but the narrator still as it were disguises him from the reader. The high place was the shrine itself.

9:15–25 Samuel entertains Saul. At last the future is disclosed: Saul is to be king and to defeat Israel's enemies. The divine purpose stands revealed: Yahweh has no interest in the rebellious elders' wish to ape other nations (8:20), but He will respond to the ordinary people's cry of distress for relief from the Philistines.

16 relates back to 7:3f. The word prince (Heb. nāgîd) is not the usual word for king, but in the context the use of the verb anoint makes it clear that kingship is meant. The word may mean 'designated', but M. Noth's view that its significance is 'king-designate' is not well supported by OT usage. M. Buber (cited by Hertzberg) has suggested, attractively, that the noun picks up the verb 'to tell' (Heb. n-g-d) used in verses 6, 8, 18, 19. 17 Similarly saw (Heb. rā'āh) picks up Samuel's function as a 'seer' (rō'eh). Rule is an unusual verb (lit. 'keep in check') and may imply the considerable powers of a king over his subjects (cf. 8:11–17). 18 Note once again the skilful narration: God has spoken, Samuel knows everything, but Saul is still ignorant even of Samuel's identity! 20 I.e. Saul can in future have as many donkeys as he likes, and anything else besides. All that is desirable in Israel (lit. 'the desire of Israel') may mean the kingship specifically. 21 Saul replies with becoming modesty, if with exaggerated humility; his family was by no means poor or uninfluential, although Benjamin was admittedly a small tribe. 22–24 find Saul treated with signal honour at the feast, but still without any explanation from Samuel. 24 The upper portion is obscure (cf. RSV mg.): lit. 'the-upon-it'. 'The sirloin' is a possibility (on the basis of Ugaritic parallels). At any rate, Saul was provided with a very large portion (cf. on 1:4, 5).

9:26 – 10:8 The private anointing of Saul. The first anointing of Saul, on the outskirts of Ramah, was a purely private affair; not even Saul's servant was permitted to witness it. In the same way David was privately anointed in the first place (1 Sa. 16). The nation had yet to 'choose' Saul by other means.

10:1 Anointing marked out a man set apart by God for kingly office. It was also the means by which kingly powers were granted. From this time on—even after his rejection—Saul was irrevocably the anointed of Yahweh (cf. 24:6). The kiss was no doubt part of the ritual. 2 Rachel's tomb is near Ramah, N of Jerusalem, here and in Je. 31:15. Traditionally the tomb is located near Bethlehem, S of Jerusalem, but all that Gn. 35:16, 19 indicates is that Rachel was somewhere between Bethel (N of Ramah) and Bethlehem when she died; to this Mt. 2:16ff. adds nothing. 3 The provisions were for sacrificial observance at the Bethel shrine. 4 A providential supply: cf. 9:7. 5 Gibeath-elohim (usually abbreviated to Gibeah, as in v. 10) was Saul's home, and lay half-way between Ramah and Jerusalem. The garrison reveals the extent of Philistine dominance. A band of prophets: evidently ecstatics, who acted in concert; these two characteristics may have distinguished them from the seers of the time (see Appendix 3). 6 The spirit of the Lord . . . ; i.e. Saul will be true successor to the judges, who were all thus directed by God's Spirit. 7 The three signs together free Saul from trivial concerns, indicate the goodwill of his future subjects, and assure him of his own fitness to rule Israel. 8 Gilgal is to be Saul's ultimate destination, and his place of failure (13:7–14); the text does not make it clear when he was to go there, but Samuel must obviously have discussed this with him; only the gist of the conversation is given by the narrator. Saul had already visited Gilgal before the events of ch. 13, according to 11:14f. The best solution to the problem seems to be that Samuel was referring to the mustering there for battle, whenever that might take place.

10:9–16 The signs fulfilled. Here again the narrative is abbreviated, and the fulfilment of the first two signs predicted by Samuel is taken for granted. The most important fact is related, that Samuel's choice of Saul as king had clear divine approval.

9 God gave him another heart, transforming him into a great leader and warrior. 11, 12 What should have been a hint to Saul's acquaintances of his imminent leadership aroused only surprise and unfavourable comment. The twin proverbs were plainly discourteous to Saul: what was he, a respectable local citizen, doing in the presence of these roaming madmen of unknown and dubious antecedents? (Hertzberg aptly cites Acts 2:13ff. as a comparable insult to Spirit-filled men.) These verses suggest something of the initial opposition to Saul. The proverb is repeated in 19:24 (on which see comment). 13 High place. LXX has 'Gibeah', more appropriately, in view of the family conversation that follows. 14–16 The story of the lost donkeys (begun in 9:3) is rounded off. It is not explained why Saul's uncle, rather than his father, questioned him about his dealings with Samuel. The brief narrative here is also concerned to show that Saul's kingship is still a secret, even from his own kin.

10:17–27 The public anointing of Saul. The nation as a whole now enters the picture again, as in ch. 8; vv. 18, 19 repeat the gist of Samuel's words recorded in that chapter. Mizpah is the stage for the next scene.

19 Thousands. The word in context scarcely seems to bear a numerical connotation, and JB, with more probability, renders it 'clans' (as indeed RSV does in Nu. 1:16). The twofold use of the Hebrew word ('elep̄) may explain some of the large numbers of the OT. 20, 21 Cf. Jos. 7:16ff. Saul hides himself away; the theme of the hidden king is maintained to the last. 22 They inquired again of the Lord implies that the preceding casting of lots was a religious, not a secular, ceremony and probably involved the use of Urim and Thummim. Cf. 14:41f.; see also NBD, art. 'Urim and Thummim'. 23–25 bring together the earlier themes, (a) that Saul was God's choice as leader, (b) that kingship as such was not an unalloyed blessing for Israel; the latter aspect is implicit in v. 25. The book may have been drawn from Deuteronomy, or at least incorporated Dt. 17:14–20. It was most probably the new constitution, since monarchy was an innovation in Israel. The document was preserved in the sanctuary at Mizpah. 27 Worthless fellows. While the doubts of some Israelites were only natural (kingship was a newfangled idea; and what qualifications did Saul have, in any case?), to refuse Saul allegiance was to defy the choice of God.

11:1–15 The Ammonite incident. The narrator switches suddenly to a new topic without divulging his purpose, which is to show how it came about that the initial opposition to Saul was won over, and how the king proved himself. It is clear from vv. 3, 4 that Saul had not yet asserted his authority.

1 Both Jabesh-gilead and the Ammonite people were located E of the Jordan. The distance between them itself shows the weakness of Israel; the Ammonites must have dominated Transjordan. The men of Jabesh were seeking a definition of their rights under the lordship of Nahash. 3 This old-world request reads oddly in our days of total warfare. Till relatively recent times, warfare was conducted according to a strict etiquette. 6, 7 Saul's experience of the spirit of God and his action in sending messengers made him another 'judge'; but his threat was regal enough, and perhaps for the first time since the conquest of Canaan, all the tribes obeyed the summons. The mention of Samuel is significant. 8 Bezek was W of the Jordan, but probably too far north for Philistine interference. The numbers seem too high (though in correct proportions); since LXX presents even greater numbers, the text must have suffered early corruption in transmission. 10 We will give ourselves up to you.

AV 'We will come out unto you' is more literal, and in fact better. This message must have been to the Ammonites, and while it was intended to mislead them, the verb is often used for going out to do battle, the real intention of the men of Jabesh. 12–15 tell us of a new ceremony, a natural sequel to the events of the previous chapter. Saul and all the men of Israel rejoiced greatly: a prelude to ch. 12, for Samuel had more sober thoughts.

12:1–15 Samuel's final address to Israel. 'Samuel's Farewell', as this passage is widely known, is really more of a defence of his administrative leadership, which he is now relinquishing to Saul; he is not yet laying down his priestly functions. In context, the locale must be Gilgal (11:15); but the passage is widely held to be connected with Mizpah, since the tenor of it is hostile to the monarchy, and it therefore links up with 10:20–24. (On this whole question, see Appendix 2.) The 'established legal formula' (McKane) of vv. 3 and 5, it is argued, makes the passage late (and so unhistorical). But such a view is by no means unavoidable, for such a set formula (if indeed it was: evidence is lacking) could well have figured in the new constitution (cf. 10:25). At the same time, since we have in this chapter direct speech, we may view the narrator as partly responsible for the actual wording (see on 2:1–10); he was after all using Samuel's address as a sermon to his own generation. But in view of Saul's later rejection, and the fact that Judah remembered him with little pleasure, or approval, it is noteworthy that the hostility expressed in this passage is towards monarchy as such, not to Saul himself. Historically, it is entirely plausible that Samuel should have resented Israel's partial rejection of him.

1–5 In effect, Samuel declares that he has kept the covenantal stipulations; on this topic, see J. Muilenburg, 'The form and structure of the covenantal formulations', VT, 9, 1959, pp. 360–364. 2 My sons. Their venality (8:3) is not under consideration; their mention is to illustrate Samuel's age and length of service to Israel. 6–12 Such historical retrospects were commonly part of covenant procedures in the Ancient Near East (and cf. Jos. 24); they laid a basis for the ensuing stipulations. Samuel's whole speech fits such a pattern and situation, as the whole nation (some for the first time) now adopts its new constitution, under which its primary obligations were to Yahweh, and only in the second place to the monarch. 11 All these judges appear in the book of Judges, except for Samuel, whose name reads oddly on his own lips; an attractive alternative found in some ancient versions is 'Samson'. 14, 15 Samuel makes plain to Israel that monarchy in itself will not save them from the ups and downs of the past (see on 8:7f.).

12:16–25 The conclusion of the ceremony. A sign from heaven ratified the renewal of the covenant, and confirmed the truth of Samuel's words. It also served to give the prophet an important function under the new constitution; it was the king, not the prophet, who was in danger of being swept away.

17, 18 Thunder recalled the covenant institution at Sinai (cf. Ex. 19:16); rain, virtually unknown in Palestine at this time of year, was a miraculous sign. 19 Note that there is no suggestion that the clock can be put back; Saul is in any case God's own choice as king. 21 Vain things; i.e. idols. 23 This statement opened the way for Samuel's successors in the prophetic office. It shows Samuel, too, as mediator of the covenant.

13:1 – 14:52 War with the Philistines

It was largely the Philistine threat which had brought Saul to the throne; it was to be his life's work now to combat their aggression. These two chapters recount his major victories over this powerful enemy.

13:1–7 The Israelites muster for battle. There are a number of difficulties in this chapter, which are discussed in some detail by McKane and Hertzberg. An initial problem is that of date: how soon after Saul's coronation did these battles take place? The strong probability is that they occurred early in his reign; the Philistines would scarcely have allowed him to reign long over Israel unmolested. Moreover, the link between this passage (note v. 8) and 10:8 makes it unlikely that any long period intervened. The difficulty is that Saul now has an adult son (Jonathan, v. 2), whereas he himself was a 'young man' (9:2) when he became king. However, early marriage was customary among the Hebrews, and Saul could have been in his middle thirties and still have had a son able to bear arms.

1 Clearly the original numerals have been lost in transmission. Acts 13:21 says that Saul reigned for forty years, probably a round number. This figure is much more likely, in view of the age of Ish-bosheth at Saul's death (cf. 2 Sa. 2:10), than the mere two years allowed him by M. Noth (History of Israel, p. 176). 2, 3 Gibeah and Geba are unfortunately very similar names, and the sites lay reasonably near each other; some confusion between them is possible in this passage. Geba lay to the N of Gibeah, just S of Michmash (v. 5), where the battle was to take place. 4 Gilgal lay further E, near the Jordan, and so provided a safer mustering-place. The garrison. The word could equally mean 'prefect', and is so translated by Hertzberg. 5 Thirty thousand: 'three thousand', read by Lucian's recension of the LXX, and by the Syriac, seems more credible. Beth-aven seems to be another name for either Bethel (cf. Ho. 4:15) or Ai. 6, 7 Israel's fears and cowardice explain the impatience Saul was now to exhibit.

13:8–15 Saul's first breach with Samuel. In disobeying Samuel's explicit instructions (10:8), Saul's real excuse was that sacrifice had to be offered to ensure success in battle. His men were already deserting, and to omit such an important act would have been disastrous to morale.

8, 9 The time appointed by Samuel. The passage can scarcely mean, as Hertzberg claims, that Saul in fact obeyed Samuel's instructions to the letter. Presumably Saul waited right up till the seventh day, but could not bring himself to wait until it was over. 13, 14 Samuel's rebuke denied Saul a dynastic succession; and David—though not by name—is for the first time brought before the reader. 15 According to the LXX, it was Saul, not Samuel, who made for Gibeah (Geba?). Six hundred men. Saul's forces had dwindled away to a fraction (cf. v. 2); Samuel's displeasure may well have caused further desertions.

13:16–23 The Philistine movements. The Israelite soldiers were not only much depleted but also inadequately armed (vv. 19–22). Hence the Philistines felt confident enough to dissipate their own forces to some extent by sending out raiding-parties.

19 The Philistines had a virtual monopoly of iron. 21 A pim was a weight (estimated at ⅔ oz). The Philistines naturally charged a high price for sharpening potential weapons. 23 The pass of Michmash. On the topography of the battle see especially S. R. Driver, Notes on the Hebrew text and the topography of the Books of Samuel, in loc.

14:1–15 Jonathan's exploit. An act of outstanding, even foolhardy, courage on the part of Jonathan brought a resounding and unexpected victory. But two signs demonstrated that it was God who gave the victory.

2 Gibeah. See the commentaries for discussion of the geographical difficulty. 3 prepares the way for v. 18; it also relates back to 4:19–22. Ahijah is the 'Ahimelech' of ch. 22. The ephod was a priestly vestment; see on v. 18. 4, 5 A narrow point of the pass hid Jonathan from both the opposing armies. 6 Uncircumcised. Such the Philistines were, unlike most of Israel's neighbours, but the term is in effect more religious than physical. This was indeed a holy war, as the rest of the verse emphasizes. 10 Hence Jonathan can confidently expect a sign from God. 11 Presumably the Philistines thought that the two lone individuals were deserting to them. 13 The precise details are not clear, but evidently the Philistines came to grief through utter surprise. The final part of 14 is difficult and perhaps corrupt; the intention seems to be to indicate the site of the skirmish. 15 The fall of the outpost guarding the pass has immense repercussions; observe that the raiding parties (cf. 13:17) were too scared to rejoin the main army. An earthquake adds to the Philistine panic: a sure sign of God's favour to Jonathan.

14:16–23 The resulting battle. The main Israelite force, under Saul's direct command, now took an interest, and routed the Philistine army.

16 Gibeah. As in v. 2, Geba may be intended (cf. JB). 18 The ark had been at Kiriath-jearim when last mentioned (7:2), but there is no reason why it should not have been brought, temporarily, to the battle-field (as in ch. 4). However, many commentators (and JB) prefer to accept the LXX reading 'ephod', perhaps rightly, in view of vv. 3 and 41. 19 In any case, Ahijah was about to consult the oracle of God, the Urim and Thummim, in accordance with Saul's wishes, when the latter abruptly changed his mind; there was no time to spare, battle must be joined. 20–22 At the sight of Saul victorious, deserters change sides again and fugitives return to the fray. 23 Beth-aven. Cf. 13:5. Lucian's reading 'Beth-horon' (cf. 13:18) is preferred by some commentators (R. de Vaux, together with JB, among modern writers). In either case, the Philistines were driven well to the west, and out of the hills. Aijalon (v. 31) is very near Beth-horon, and its mention supports that reading.

14:24–35 Two unfortunate incidents. Saul's oath may have been intended to make some reparation for his failure to wait for a priestly oracle (cf. vv. 18, 19). Jonathan's ignorance of the oath may well have been due to his absence from Saul's army during his exploit. The curse pronounced by Saul was well criticized by Jonathan (vv. 29, 30), for it not only weakened the Israelite pursuers but also occasioned breaches of cultic regulations, the soldiers being too weary and hungry to give them a thought.

25, 26 The forest. Since the Hebrew word can also mean 'honeycomb', it is possible that the statement here means that the people came upon honeycombs on the ground in the open country; cf. JB. 32, 33 For the regulations, see Lv. 17:10–14; Dt. 12:23. 34 Saul attempted by sacrifice to atone for the ritual breach. 35 Probably the altar was long known as Saul's altar, as Hertzberg suggests.

14:36–46 Consequences of Jonathan's error. Even in the account of the battle, the progressive estrangement between Saul and his God is evident. Saul's chief fault, in these early days of his reign, seems to have been impulsive and ill-considered action. The passage is intriguing: it shows an insecure king outvoted by his troops and it leaves unanswered the question as to the rectitude of the actions of Saul, Jonathan, and the people.

Assuming that RSV and most commentators (as against AV) are right to follow the LXX at v. 41, we find this passage the most instructive in the OT about the Urim and Thummim, the mysterious priestly oracle. It would seem that it consisted of some form of casting lots, and the answer could be one of two possibilities, 'Yes' or 'No'; it could also yield a neutral answer, evidently, and that is why Saul got no answer that day (v. 37). Ex. 28:30 tells us that the Urim and Thummim were carried in the breastpiece of the ephod or priestly robe. See NBD, art. 'Urim and Thummim'.

39 shows the folly of such rash oaths, with the dramatic irony that Saul even mentioned his son by name. The story is reminiscent of Jephthah's vow (Jdg. 11:30–40). 45 He has wrought with God. The soldiers cannot credit that God could both achieve victory through Jonathan and pronounce judgment on him. The vox populi prevailed, though it is not explained how Jonathan was ransomed; it was presumably by sacrifice of some kind (cf. v. 34). 46 marks the end of this first battle.

14:47–52 Outline of Saul's reign. During his reign, Saul achieved victories over enemies on all sides. Apart from the Philistines (the major foe), most of the hostile peoples were located E of the Jordan.

47 The Ammonites: cf. ch. 11. Zobah, an Aramaean kingdom, lay N of Damascus. 48 The Amalekites (to the S of Israel) are mentioned separately, since the next chapter is concerned with Saul's defeat of them. 49 Ishvi is better known as Ish-bosheth, a derogatory form of his name ('man of shame'). Jonathan, Malchishua, and another son not here named, died at Gilboa (31:2). 50 Saul's cousin Abner played a big part in Ish-bosheth's career too. 52 Saul gradually accumulated a standing army, a necessary innovation in Israel.

15:1–35 The defeat of Amalek

The Amalekite war is recounted in detail, because it led to the final breach between Saul and Samuel. The Amalekites were an ancient foe of Israel (cf. Ex. 17:8–16); they were hence under the divine curse (Dt. 25:17–19). The story now related undoubtedly presents a serious moral problem to the modern reader, although none will dispute that Amalek deserved signal punishment. It is their 'utter destruction' (v. 3) that is the difficulty. However, the very phrase, in Hebrew, means 'to devote to Yahweh'; i.e. their deaths were regarded not as an execution but as being in some sense sacrificial. Secondly, in a world much less individualistic than ours, there was little conception of singling out the guilty parties; misdeeds brought guilt on the whole community. From a historical standpoint, moreover, Saul's failure to deal more vigorously with the Amalekites left them free to harass S Judah for a further generation.

15:1–9 The attack on Amalek. That Saul must be obedient is stressed at the start of the narrative. His failure to do so was not prompted by any humanitarian motives. It is even possible that his disobedience was deliberate; as king, he may have determined to show himself independent of Samuel's authority. It is harder to interpret 13:8–12 in this way, however.

4 Telaim (probably the Telem of Jos. 15:24) can tentatively be located a few miles S of Beersheba. Judah naturally sent troops, in view of her proximity to Amalekite territory. The numbers in this verse seem too great; early textual corruption may be the reason. 5 City: more of a fortified village, in modern terms; the Amalekites were nomadic. 6 The Kenites, also nomads at an earlier period, had always been well-disposed towards the Israelites (cf. Nu. 10:29–32; Jdg. 1:16). 8, 9 Saul began to obey Samuel's command, but then changed his mind, perhaps again on impulse.

15:10–31 Samuel's intervention and Saul's rejection. Immutability is the theme of this passage (especially v. 29). In the previous chapter, Saul's oath had come to nothing, perhaps through no fault of his own; now he is fully to blame (despite his efforts to lay the blame elsewhere) for breaking his word to Yahweh, and punishment is inescapable: God does not act on impulse.

11 Repent here signifies grief, and a change of attitude; not a change of mind, as in v. 29. 'God is not slavishly bound by his own decisions' (Hertzberg). 12 Carmel: a place in S Judah (Jos. 15:55), not the mountain range of 1 Ki. 18. 13 Saul is confident (as in 13:11) that he has obeyed. 15 Ignoring the matter of Agag, Saul maintains that the animals are intended for sacrifice. But worshippers normally had a part in sacrifices, which had been expressly forbidden as regards these particular animals. 22 sums up the consistent prophetic approach to sacrifice and the cultic worship: cf. Am. 5:21–24. 23 Samuel announces the divine rejection of Saul; previously he had been denied a dynasty (13:13, 14), now his own office is spurned by Samuel in the name of Yahweh. 24, 25 Saul seeks to gain forgiveness, but perhaps with little sincerity, and certainly with a fresh attempt to allocate the blame elsewhere. Moreover, it looks as if he is specially interested in maintaining appearances, though it is possible that his words were motivated by genuine piety. 27, 28 The name Saul is supplied by RSV (contrast AV); the natural, and perhaps preferable (so McKane, at least), understanding of the verse is that it was Samuel himself who tore his robe. At any rate, Samuel swiftly interprets the action as a symbol of God's purposes. Note the fresh allusion to David. 29 The Glory of Israel is a unique term for Yahweh; the Hebrew word (nēṣaḥ) emphasizes the eternal nature of Yahweh, which is appropriate in this context of His immutability. 30 Again Saul pleads for Samuel's support, at least in outward appearance. His position owed much to Samuel's past support, after all.

15:32–35 Samuel's departure. This section of the book ends with the final parting of the ways. Saul remains the man in power, but no longer as the man of God's choice. Samuel, the earlier leader, now departs to anoint Saul's successor, and then quietly steps out of the picture.

32 Cheerfully, which offers reasonable sense (especially if his remark implies that he still thinks his life has been spared), is an unlikely interpretation of the Hebrew. An emendation, 'tottering', commends itself to Hertzberg. The JB has 'reluctantly', and then follows the LXX, making Agag say 'truly, death is a bitter thing'. 33 Despite Samuel's words, the execution was a ritual one, in fulfilment of the 'devotion' of Amalek to Yahweh, and not politically motivated. Nevertheless, justice is seen to be done.

35 Note that Samuel could not view Saul's failure with detachment.

16:1 – 31:13 SAUL AND DAVID

The remainder of Saul's reign is the story of his relationship with David, so far as the first book of Samuel is concerned. Saul has been rejected by the God of Israel, and Samuel is an old man; but God's man of the future is already on the scene, in the person of the youthful David. God has not left His people leaderless. The rest of 1 Samuel shows how God equipped David for his future career, watched over him through every danger, and exhibited him to the nation as the man of God's favour.

16:1 – 17:58 David reaches the royal court

David's proper place was at the royal court, but he would scarcely be welcome there as successor-designate to Saul. These two chapters describe how his own abilities brought him to Saul's side.

16:1–13 The anointing of David. This narrative is not unlike that of 9:1 – 10:1; in both cases Samuel anointed, privately, an unsuspecting young man to kingly office. Both were equally attractive individuals. The narrator thus demonstrates that David was in no respect Saul's inferior. Note the continuing narrative skill: not until the last moment is David's name revealed, although clues to his identity appear in vv. 1 and 11.

1, 2 Samuel appears as a human enough figure, both sorrowful over Saul's fall from grace and fearful of his power. Sacrifice at Bethlehem may well have been routine for Samuel, even though it is not listed in 7:16f. A major city of Judah, it lay 5 miles S of Jerusalem. If Saul hears it, he will kill me. We are given here the first hint of the suspicious and vindictive side of Saul's character. The route from Ramah to Bethlehem passed through Saul's capital, Gibeah. 4, 5 Peaceably. J. Skinner rendered the question (which may have had cultic or political reference), 'Is this an auspicious visit?' 6 Eliab: called Elihu in 1 Ch. 27:18. 7 A clear allusion to the rejected Saul (9:2); i.e. David is to be solely God's choice, whereas Saul had been to some extent a popular choice. 9 Shammah: various forms of the name are found (cf. 2 Sa. 13:3; 21:21; 1 Ch. 20:7). 10 1 Ch. 2:14, 15 names three other brothers, then David as the seventh. One brother remains unnamed in the OT. 11 We will not sit down (to the sacrificial meal): other renderings are possible, all of cultic reference. 13 In the midst. Hertzberg translates 'from the midst', thus making the anointing secret from David's brothers. David is now at last named, and recognized as being in the true line of succession to the judges and Saul, in view of the activity of God's Spirit in him.

16:14–23 David enters the royal service. As David receives the Spirit of God, so Saul loses it progressively, with concomitant loss of mental powers. One can well understand Saul's experience in psychological terms. His position was undermined by Samuel's defection, and his anxieties were not unnatural, especially since the Philistines never ceased their hostility. His earlier prophetic trances may have gradually led to emotional breakdown. But, ironically, it is Saul's very disturbance of mind that leads to David's coming to the court.

14 Saul's mental disturbance is envisaged as a punishment from God. 18 A man of war. Although David had not yet fully relinquished his pastoral duties, he already had some military experience, and had shown ability as a soldier. 21 Hence he was made an armour-bearer, not merely a court musician. 21, 22 may perhaps refer to a time after David had killed Goliath. The OT historians not infrequently pursue a theme to its ultimate consequences, then return to fill in the details. Saul loved him. Quite possibly Saul's liking was not very personal; simply admiration of his looks and his music.

On the textual and historical difficulties of chs. 17; 18, see Appendix 4.

17:1–11 The Philistine challenge. A Philistine army moved into the hills of W Judah, and Saul sent his own army to meet them. But instead of joining battle, the enemy decided on a fight between champions; such a practice was not uncommon in ancient warfare.

4 Goliath. His name is mentioned only here and in v. 23 (and cf. 21:9). De Vaux and Hertzberg view the name as a later insertion, in view of 2 Sa. 21:19 (see commentary in loc. and Appendix 5); such a possibility cannot be completely ruled out. His height was about ten feet. 5–7 The thoroughness of his protection, as much as the size and weight of the armour and weapons, is emphasized. 11 Even Saul shies away from such a challenge, as well he might.

17:12–30 David visits the Israelite army. It is now revealed that David was not at this particular time acting as Saul's armour-bearer (note v. 15). His arrival on the battle-scene was therefore due to divine overruling; the narrator does not need to make this fact explicit.

12 Ephrathite; i.e. from Ephratah, a district evidently adjoining Bethlehem (cf. Mi. 5:2). 13 As in 16:6–9, only the three eldest sons of Jesse are named. 25 prepares the way for David's advancement. JB renders the final clause 'and grant his father's House the freedom of Israel'. 26 David injects the first theological note into the narrative. 28–30 Eliab's reaction sounds like jealousy, and is reminiscent of the opposition to Joseph from his elder brothers.

17:31–40 Saul interviews David. Saul's approach to the issue of the day is purely military; David's reply, and his refusal of Saul's armour, underline the miraculous nature of the preservation of his life in dangers past and present. Note that there is no hint in the interview that Saul is unacquainted with David (see Appendix 4).

38, 39 Full armour was reserved for the very few in Israel (cf. 13:19, 22). 40 It is true that the picture of David here (as in vv. 34ff.) is pastoral, rather than of a trained armour-bearer. This fact may be due either to the chronology (see on 16:21), or simply to the narrator's intention to heighten the contrast between the unarmed, inexperienced stripling and the mighty giant warrior. The victory cannot but be God-given (note v. 47).

17:41–49 David kills Goliath. The discussion between David and his giant adversary will strike the modern reader as improbable, but this will again have been part of the etiquette of ancient battle.

45 Once again, David stresses that he is acting as champion not so much for Israel as for God Himself (cf. vv. 26, 36). In other words, the Philistines are throwing scorn on Yahweh, ultimately, not just on the Israelite army. 47 The Lord saves is the key-note not only of this story, but of the whole Bible. Modern scholars frequently term the history contained in the Scriptures as 'salvation-history' (in German, Heilsgeschichte).

17:50–58 The results of David's victory. The narrator is less interested in the Israelite rout of the Philistines than in the story of David's advancement. Previously he had come to the royal court in a minor capacity; now he was to come in his own right, as a man whom Saul could scarcely turn away. There is thus a dramatic sequence of events in chs. 16; 17 which is lost sight of when scholars find 'two divergent traditions' (see Introduction).

51–53 Gath and Ekron were the two nearest of the five Philistine cities. 54 This verse presents problems, since Jerusalem was not yet in Israelite hands: it fell to David himself when he had become king (2 Sa. 5); and since David had come straight from Bethlehem, to what does his tent refer? Moreover, we read later of Goliath's sword being at Nob (21:9). C. F. Keil, long ago, maintained that David left the giant's head in the Israelite part of Jerusalem (cf. Jdg. 1:8), outside the Jebusite fortress, and that by the tent David's home is meant. More recently, Hertzberg has suggested that the giant's skull was at a later date taken to Jerusalem and displayed there (it could even explain the NT name Golgotha); and by a slight emendation he makes his tent 'the tent of Yahweh', i.e. the sanctuary at Nob. It appears that Nob was very near Jerusalem (see on 21:1), and conceivably was later viewed as virtually part of the city. 55–58 is a passage (omitted by LXX^{B}) that certainly seems to imply Saul's ignorance of David's family, though not necessarily of himself. A. M. Renwick (in the first edition of this Commentary) suggested that chronologically 16:22 follows ch. 17, an explanation that would readily solve the dilemma. But the emphasis in the general context is that David is now to become more than a minor court functionary. Ch. 18 shows him taking a place in the royal family (cf. 17:25) and Saul's interest now in David's antecedents is quite natural. He was under the various obligations named in 17:25.

18:1 – 20:42 David and Jonathan

It is interesting that David's stay at Saul's court is told almost entirely in terms of his relationship with Jonathan. Theirs was indeed a matchless and proverbial friendship; but the narrator had a purpose in recounting it so fully. Apart from his interest in the whole question of succession, he is at pains to show that the very man whom David displaced in succession to the throne was his best friend. In other words, the descent of Saul itself acknowledged the legitimacy of David's rule.

18:1–9 David's honour and success. Jonathan's admiration and respect for David were as immediate as they were genuine. Everyone, in fact, hurried to acclaim David—everyone, that is, except Saul.

2 does not of course mean that visits to Bethlehem were forbidden to David; it is simply a mark of David's advancement that he becomes a permanent officer at court (cf. v. 5). 4 The outward marks of the covenant (v. 3), no doubt. Clothing possessed something of the wearer's personality, so that each man gave himself to the other, in effect. 5 Was successful: the verb denotes skill as well as success. 6–8 mark the start of Saul's jealousy. Observe also the dramatic irony at the end of v. 8. On the face of it, the singers seem to have been tactless, to say the least; yet probably this was a fixed parallelism, implying only David's equality with Saul—the Hebrew word translated ten thousands is rarely precise, and 'myriads' gives a better idea of the singers' meaning. But Saul's prematurely suspicious frame of mind is indicated by the fact that he chose to take the word in its precise sense. 9 Eyed: either 'kept his eyes on' (McKane) or 'turned a jealous eye on' (JB).

18:10–30 Saul's attempts on David's life. Saul's fears are intelligible, for his own position was largely based on prestige (or so he felt), and now David's reputation was beginning to outweigh his own. Had David been unscrupulously ambitious, indeed, Saul's fears would have been far from groundless. However, his early efforts to remove David misfired; the final scheme recounted in this chapter served only to increase David's fame and bring him right into the royal family! These events proved, as even Saul had to recognize, that 'the Lord was with David' (v. 28).

10 Raved: like an ecstatic prophet (cf. AV 'prophesied'). 11 Twice may refer forward to 19:9, 10. But the verb cast is rendered 'raised' in some versions—the difference is very slight in Hebrew—and this reading is quite possible (hence JB 'brandished') and would suggest a mere momentary impulse. 13, 16 He went out and came in. Note the technical term for military activity. 17 Saul's promise (only to be broken) was in fulfilment of 17:25. 18, 23 express typically oriental courteous humility. Nevertheless, it is clear that David had no money for a bride-price.

19:1–10 Jonathan's intervention fails. Jonathan's friendship now revealed itself in action, as he pleaded with his father.

1 Saul's jealousy now goes beyond reason; he is prepared to suborn murder. 2, 3 seem a trifle obscure; the drift of Jonathan's advice was that David would be able to see at a glance if Saul angrily refused Jonathan's pleas, and then be able to escape without delay; whereas if Saul was prepared to listen to reason, David could be called at once and put in the picture (as in fact happened). The secret place must have been somewhere where David could see but not overhear. 8–10 Fresh military successes by David arouse Saul's enmity once more, and history repeats itself (cf. 18:10, 11); this time the text is quite definite that Saul threw the spear, and that the impulse was no momentary whim.

19:11–24 David's flight. David's life is now saved by his wife Michal, Saul's daughter. Thus in this chapter two of Saul's children, one after the other, help to preserve the man who is to supplant their father as king.

13 An image. W. F. Albright understands the Hebrew word (t^{e}rāpîm) to mean 'old rags' here. Elsewhere, however, the word refers to household deities. Acceptance of such household gods was a very old custom (cf. Gn. 31:19, 30–35), and despite the prohibitions in the law of Moses, they were never fully eradicated before the Exile (cf. 2 Ki. 23:24). While Michal's love for David is emphasized, lies and idolatry patently marked her character, and some see this portrait as a tacit reproof of her father. 18 Naioth was some part of Ramah where 20 a school of prophets resided. Samuel headed this prophetic group. Evidently great prophets such as Samuel and Elijah (cf. 2 Ki. 2) saw the potentialities of the roaming bands (such as we met in ch. 10), and channelled their energies to good use. It may be that such schools transmitted much of the OT literature. 20–23 The spirit of prophecy is, as it were, infectious; Saul's messengers and even the king himself are forced to succumb to the power of the Spirit of God in this abode of the prophets, and they 'prophesy' despite themselves. 22 Secu is unknown and perhaps incorrect; LXX is quite different (see JB). 24 Saul lost all control of himself (cf. 18:10) and the sneering proverb of 10:10ff. was again levelled at him. This is not a duplicate (and hence conflicting) account of the origin of this taunt, but deliberate repetition to show how such characteristics mark Saul's whole career. 'Going too far' was his consistent failing.

20:1–11 David consults Jonathan. Many commentators feel that this story comes oddly after ch. 19, and must come from a distinct source. Certainly after the events of ch. 19 David can have been in no real doubt as to Saul's intentions; but this chapter does not in fact suggest that he had—rather to the contrary (v. 3). It was Jonathan who could not believe it of his father (v. 2). The point of the story is that David is still a court member and would be acting very improperly if he absented himself at the festival time (v. 5); so he consults with Jonathan, to try to get him to elicit from Saul a guarantee of David's safety (cf. v. 21). Saul's hostility might, after all, have passed for the moment, and David had no wish to offend him beyond recall by quitting the court without permission. Hence the plea regarding a festival at Bethlehem (v. 6); but even so in the upshot Saul was the more bitter against David.

5 Let me go. David had to ask permission, which presumably Jonathan was authorized to grant. The new moon was specially celebrated; cf. Nu. 10:10; 28:11–15. 7 Determined: a firm decision as opposed to a momentary impulse. 11 In going to the field, the two friends wished to plan the ploy of vv. 19ff., rather than to escape eavesdroppers.

20:12–23 David and Jonathan renew their covenant. In the course of laying plans and pledging loyalty, Jonathan takes friendship a step further: he recognizes explicitly that David will one day be king, and exhibits not the least jealousy or resentment.

14 The loyal love (Heb. ḥeseḏ) of the Lord; i.e. 'loving constancy such as Yahweh himself both desires and demonstrates' (Eichrodt). L. H. Brockington comments, 'Love and loyalty are the very essence of any relationship based on a personal covenant; in Hebrew these two aspects are bound together in the single word ḥesedh' (Peake's Commentary, 1962 edition, p. 327). 19 When the matter was in hand represents an obscure phrase (lit. 'on the day of the action (affair)'). The allusion may be to 19:2, otherwise to some unrecorded event. 23 Between you and me is a covenantal phrase, several times repeated in Gn. 31:44–54.

20:24–34 Jonathan divines Saul's intentions. Jonathan had previously pleaded for David with his father, and Michal had tricked the king; now for the first time Saul is openly challenged. Jonathan's covenant with David outweighed filial respect.

26, 27 Not clean; i.e. ritually impure due to something unforeseen, and so ineligible to take part in the sacrificial meal. Cf. Lv. 15:16; Dt. 23:10. But such impurity lasted only till nightfall, so on the following day it became clear to Saul that David's absence could not thus be explained. 30 Saul's anger expressed itself in the most offensive language. 31 Saul ignores the threat David posed to himself, and instead endeavours to arouse Jonathan to his own danger. 33 Cast. JB 'brandished' is almost certainly the correct rendering here. See on 18:11. 34 Disgraced: by publicly declaring David to be a traitor.

20:35–42 David and Jonathan part. Having been accused of disloyalty to the crown, Jonathan might have been spied on, and the reason for the ploy with the arrows becomes clear. As the two friends part, their covenant bond is again stressed.

38 Jonathan's words may have been intended to prevent the servant lad from exploring too diligently. But probably they contain a double entendre, and were equally meant for David's ears. 40 Jonathan may have feared that the youth might have been set to spy on him. 41 Note David's sign of respect for the crown prince; so too he later viewed Saul's person as sacrosanct (24:6; 26:9). 42 Jonathan went into the city. There is no suggestion that he should have accompanied David into exile. He was duty bound to stay beside his father.

21:1 – 26:25 David as a fugitive

David was now to enter on a long period as a fugitive, pursued implacably by Saul.

21:1–15 David at Nob and at Gath. This chapter illustrates the extremities to which David was driven; he visits the central shrine (since Shiloh's destruction), but dare not seek its sanctuary, and then pays a first visit to the Philistine city of Gath. At both places he finds himself compelled to lie and deceive. His behaviour at Nob in particular left much to be desired, but the narrator neither reproves nor commends him, since that is not the point; the writer's purpose is to show how far David was driven in order to remain alive.

1 Nob (if the same as that of Is. 10:32) was very near Jerusalem; Mt. Scopus is a tentative location for it. Ahimelech (see on 14:3) was the priest in charge, and Eli's grandson. In visiting him, David continued to demonstrate (as in 19:18) his good relations with cultic personnel, although on this occasion disaster was to result, for which David later expressed regret (22:22). 4, 6 Holy bread, bread of the Presence (AV 'shewbread'): cf. Ex. 25:30. 5 Vessels is euphemistic: we may translate 'bodies'. 6 Cf. Mk. 2:23–28. 7 Detained: i.e. Doeg was ritually unclean that day, and waiting to perform some religious obligation the next day. The chief of Saul's herdsmen: perhaps read 'the mightiest of Saul's runners' (McKane). 9, 10 See on 17:54. As Hertzberg points out, there is a touch of humour here, in that David should enter Philistine territory wearing Goliath's sword! 11 The king of the land is a rather premature designation; the Philistine populace apparently drew a false conclusion from the singers' words (cf. 18:7). 12–15 make it plain that we have here no duplicate nor anticipation of ch. 27. As yet the Philistines were unaware of the breach between Saul and David: naturally enough, since it was not even known yet at Nob.

22:1–5 David's continued wanderings. While David remained on the move, we now see him beginning to organize his affairs, so far as was possible.

1 Adullam was a city in the W Judean hills not so far from the Philistine border. The cave was presumably nearby. Modern Khirbet 'id al-ma is probably the site, with its many capacious caves. A slight alteration will give 'stronghold' for 'cave', perhaps rightly. 2 David was to weld this motley band into an effective military unit. 3, 4 Moab. As the book of Ruth tells us, David had Moabite blood in his veins. By his action now he saved his parents from Saul's vindictiveness. 5 Gad (whose mention shows that David was not without prophetic support) advises him to return to Judah. The forest of Hereth has been located a few miles E of Adullam.

22:6–23 The massacre at Nob. Saul's suspicions and vengeful nature were no longer directed solely at David. His own men felt the whiplash of his tongue, while the innocent priests of Nob were slaughtered.

6 Discovered reads a little oddly; a minor emendation gives 'had joined up'. Saul was sitting . . . : cf. Jdg. 4:5. 7 Benjaminites. Evidently Saul's immediate court was drawn from his own tribe only. 8 To lie in wait. Saul claims that David is no fugitive, but a revolutionary. His accusations against Jonathan were not followed up; Hertzberg suggests that Doeg's statement took the blame off Jonathan. 14, 15 Ahimelech's self-defence constitutes a noble defence of David, too. 20–23 While David does not emerge blameless for this tragedy, yet in him we see regret, and it is clear that Abiathar knew whom to trust and support. The writer is not seeking to whitewash David, rather to indicate how events turned to his profit. Abiathar's support may be judged to have been valuable; he carried the ephod, with which David could repeatedly enquire of Yahweh: one such occasion follows at once, in 23:2. With Zadok, Abiathar later officiated at David's Jerusalem shrine (cf. 2 Sa. 15:24).

23:1–14 David at Keilah. Not only was David subject to divine protection during this period (v. 14), he was also prompted by God to give real service to Israel (and in particular to his native Judah).

1 Keilah: a city of Judah a little S of Adullam. 3 I.e. why invite the anger of a second enemy? The argument of David's men was plausible enough. 6 explains the means (the Urim and Thummim: see on 14:41) by which David was able to inquire of the Lord (vv. 2, 4). 12, 13 The men of Keilah dared not shield David, in view of the fate of the priests of Nob. His willingness to save them from any reprisals on Saul's part will have given them a second reason for gratitude to him. 14 quietly underlines the insecurity of David's position; Ziph lay considerably farther south, in still less fertile country. Throughout this chapter David is seen moving steadily southwards, and deeper into wilderness terrain.

23:15–18 Jonathan visits David. There is dramatic irony here: Saul and his troops could not locate David (v. 14), but Jonathan had no difficulty in finding his friend. This was their last meeting; David (and the reader) received fresh assurance of the final outcome of the desperate situation.

17 I shall be next to you. This statement of Jonathan's intention of supporting David indicates that he had no premonition of his own fate. 18 The two men renew their covenant (cf. 18:3).

23:19–28 The Ziphite betrayal of David. Jonathan's assurances were well timed, immediately preceding David's most dangerous situation yet. It is evident how dependent he was on goodwill from his fellow Judeans.

22, 23 David had naturally acquainted himself with the terrain of the Judean hills. 24 The Arabah is the rift valley through which flows the Jordan and where lies the Dead Sea; it continues S to the Gulf of Aqabah. 27, 28 The unwitting human agents of David's deliverance are the Philistines! One can readily see that Saul's irrational determination to kill David played right into the Philistine hands.

23:29 – 24:7 The incident at En-gedi. Here David's dangerous situation is highlighted, and also his lofty view of the status of royalty. One can see an apologetic element in ch. 24: David never exhibited any animosity towards Saul, who in his rational moments went so far as to acknowledge David's right to the throne. A faction supporting the house of Saul may have had a long existence after Saul's death. (See also on ch. 26, where a similar incident is recorded.)

23:29 En-gedi, on the shores of the Dead Sea, has fresh water flowing through it, but lies in a very barren region. 24:4, 5 To touch Saul's clothing was tantamount to touching his person; see on 18:4. This concept explains David's immediate remorse.

24:8–22 David and Saul confer. The climax of the chapter is v. 20, which once again emphasizes that David will inevitably come to the throne, a position of inviolability (cf. v. 6).

8 describes a daring and courageous act, for David was heavily outnumbered (contrast 22:2 with 24:2). David bowed . . . : note David's courtesy and humility (cf. v. 14). 15 David places himself in God's hands rather than in Saul's. 17 again has a hint of the apologetic about it; David's 'overthrow' of Saul's dynasty may well have raised doubts about the legitimacy of his reign. 22 David swore this: an oath fulfilled in 2 Sa. 9 (though see 2 Sa. 21:1–14). The stronghold is probably Adullam again; cf. 22:1. Wisely, David placed little reliance on Saul's change of heart proving permanent.

25:1 Death of Samuel. This verse stands in isolation, and is presumably chronologically placed; cf. 28:3, where the ensuing narrative is linked with the fact of Samuel's death. Also, there may well be theological point in the death of Samuel so soon after Saul had at last acknowledged that David would be his successor (24:20).

Paran: JB and virtually all commentators follow the LXX reading, 'Maon' (cf. v. 2); Paran lay far to the SW.

25:2–13 Nabal's rebuff. While Nabal's behaviour towards David will not have been typical, this story well illustrates the difficulties David's band faced in none-too-fertile country, and makes it plain that local land-owners must have viewed him with mixed feelings, if not outright hostility. Hospitality to a group of six hundred men is a costly business.

2 Carmel of Judah, near Maon. 3 Nabal. There is deliberate irony in the description of him, for his very name means 'obstinate fool' (cf. v. 25). Calebite. This area, S of Hebron, was Calebite, but Hertzberg suggests a further irony here, since the name 'Caleb' means 'dog' (cf. 24:14). 4 Sheep-shearing was a festival time (cf. v. 8), an occasion for festivity and goodwill. 7, 8 David had been a good friend to Judah in defeating the Philistines at Keilah (23:1–5), but it is only hospitality, not reward, that he claims. 13 shows that David's men were increasing in number; cf. 22:2.

25:14–44 David and Abigail. From the factual point of view, the narrative relates how David became a property-owner in Judah, and tells us of the beginnings of the royal harem. Theologically, vv. 28–31 are the most significant.

14–17 Nabal's own men confirm David's claim (v. 7). Evidently Nabal was refusing to carry out accepted custom on either political or personal grounds. 26, 31 Abigail's counsel to avoid vindictiveness was wise (as David acknowledged, v. 33), and David followed it to the end of his career. These two verses also contain dramatic irony, since in fact Nabal is going to die and Abigail to become David's wife. 29 Life . . . shall be bound in the bundle of the living is a striking metaphor, to denote the watchful care God takes over David's life (cf. Mt. 6:25–34). 30 Prince: see on 9:16. 37, 38 Nabal's fate could be interpreted as a stroke. 43 Jezreel was nearby (cf. Jos. 15:55, 56), and like Carmel must be distinguished from the better-known northerly place-name. 44 recalls the reader to the situation (of Saul's unremitting hostility); the verse relates back to 19:11–17, forward to 2 Sa. 3.

26:1–16 David spares Saul's life again. Many commentators view this chapter as a divergent account of the incident related in ch. 24. However, the details are as different as the theme is alike; and the wealth of geographical description in both chapters suggests accurate knowledge of events, which in turn supports the historicity of both accounts. The first two verses are reminiscent of the earlier story, and this feature must be deliberate; possibly the author wished to convey that the event he is about to recount had actually occurred before the incident related in ch. 25.

2 Three thousand chosen men: cf. 24:2. 3–5 This time, however, it would appear that not all of them were present in Saul's encampment. 6 Zeruiah: David's sister (1 Ch. 2:16). Abishai: cf. 2 Sa. 23:18. 9 reiterates 24:6; 10 but this time David knows more of the future. His prediction came true (ch. 31). 12 A deep sleep. The same Hebrew word appears in Gn. 2:21. 13 David shows caution he had not exhibited on the earlier occasion (24:8). 16 You deserve to die contains a hint of Abner's fate in store (2 Sa. 3).

26:17–25 David and Saul confer again. As in 24:9–22, David protests that he is innocent of treason, and Saul temporarily comes to his senses, for the second time. In spite of the similarities, there is a new note struck here, anticipating the next chapter. Saul's unrelenting pursuit of David will drive him out of 'the heritage of the Lord' (v. 19), and Saul is cursed for it in advance.

18, 19 The cause of the quarrel, David says, can only be himself, Yahweh, or a third party; since the first two are innocent, the third party (tactfully anonymous) must shoulder the blame. 19 There were no sanctuaries to Yahweh outside Israelite territory, so to worship at all in Philistia would mean idolatry. Worship was much more tied to sanctuaries than was the NT worship (cf. Jn. 4:20–24). It is unnecessary to infer from this verse that David thought Yahweh to be 'operative' only in Israel; such a view is ruled out by 30:7, 8. 20 RSV mg. shows how in its transmission this verse became assimilated to 24:14. 21 Saul's invitation to David was no doubt genuine, but his emotions were so unstable that David would have been a fool to agree. 25 In the event, both parties separated once more. It is again impressed on the reader that David's future is certain, and that Saul knows it.

27:1 – 30:31 David in Philistine territory

Events now moved inexorably to their climax in the battle of Gilboa (ch. 31). These chapters are unusual in that the reader learns a good deal about the Philistine manoeuvres, but relatively little about the Israelite preparations for battle. The reason is that the narrative follows David, who spent this period among the Philistines, subordinate to them.

27:1 – 28:2 David as a Philistine vassal. Despite his earlier experience (cf. 21:10–15) David returned to Gath; he felt he had no choice. This time he was welcomed, no doubt because of the 600 men he commanded, and he was established as a Philistine vassal at Ziklag. Here his native wit enabled him to deceive his overlord, by attacking mutual enemies of Israel and Philistia while pretending to have raided his own people. The butchery and deceit here practised by David are indicative of the desperate situation in which he found himself.

6 Ziklag lay well south, only 12 miles N of Beer-sheba. Once a Simeonite city (cf. Jos. 19:5), it had been appropriated by the Philistines; as noted here, it was afterwards crown property in Judah (see also Introduction). 8 The Geshurites, Girzites and Amalekites were nomadic desert tribes who frequently raided the neighbouring settled populations. Saul, too, had attacked the Amalekites (ch. 15). 10 The Negeb is the sparsely-populated area lying between the more fertile hills of Judah to the north and the desert to the south. It is very dry, as its name in Hebrew testifies. Three specific districts of it are here mentioned. 12 Had David really attacked his people Israel, Achish's words would have been completely true. 28:1, 2 David was in a quandary, but could only comply. There is dramatic irony in Achish of Gath designating David and his men as his bodyguard, for not many years later Gittites were to provide David's bodyguard.

28:3–25 Saul consults a medium. The narrator's attention returns to Saul, who is shown to be at the end of his tether; only a medium can counsel and sustain him. His problem was that the Philistine armies were resorting to a new strategy; hitherto they had fought in the hills, where their more sophisticated weapons gave them little advantage, and where the Israelites were on familiar terrain. But now they marched into the plain of Jezreel, keeping to level ground, and threatened to cut off Saul from the northern group of tribes.

3 Cf. 25:1. Mediums . . . wizards. Necromancy was consistently attacked by OT laws and by the leaders of Israel, but it was evidently too popular to be totally eradicated. See Lv. 19:31; Dt. 18:9–14; 2 Ki. 21:6. 6 Urim: see on 14:41. 7, 8 Endor is situated N of Shunem, where the Philistine army lay, and Saul's journey from the Gilboa hills (S of the plain of Jezreel) was no doubt difficult and dangerous; that he embarked on it at all is a mark of his desperation. 12 It is not clear how it came about that the woman suddenly recognized Saul. A few LXX MSS read 'Saul' instead of Samuel, perhaps rightly; but Hertzberg attractively conjectures an emendation, 'When the woman heard the name Samuel . . .' 13 A god; i.e. a supernatural figure. 14, 15 The narrative strongly suggests that this really was Samuel, and not a mere apparition or hallucination. The foreknowledge and uncompromising statements attributed to him in the verses that follow also stamp him as being genuinely Samuel. 16–18 The denunciation of Saul pronounced in 15:26, 28 is still operative. 19 Saul learns his fate, in no uncertain terms, and 20, 21 he is brought to his lowest ebb.

29:1–11 David is sent back to Ziklag. One wonders if David had any thought of trying to sabotage the Philistine battle-plans; be that as it may, he was spared the necessity by the very natural suspicions of the Philistine leaders. Patently Achish had been completely fooled by David's words and actions.

1 Aphek. Unless this was some local town, to be distinguished from that of 4:1, we must conclude that the episode related in this chapter took place prior to the Philistine encampment at Shunem (28:4), since Aphek lay much farther south. Jezreel is at the foot of the Gilboa range. 2 Lords: a special term for the rulers of the five Philistine cities, of whom Achish was one. 5 Cf. 18:7; 21:11. The Philistines evidently knew this song at their expense only too well. 9 As an angel of God may have been a common saying; cf. 2 Sa. 14:20; 19:27. 11 I.e. the Philistines advanced on the Israelite army (cf. v. 1) to do battle.

30:1–31 David defeats the Amalekites. David's return to Ziklag proved opportune: indeed, he was only just in time. So the actions of the Philistine rulers in dismissing him enabled him not only to avoid fighting against fellow-Israelites, but also to retrieve the families of himself and his men and to earn fresh gratitude from the people of Judah (vv. 26–31). Note, too, the literary skill with which the narrator leaves the reader in suspense as regards the outcome of the battle of Gilboa; once again (as in ch. 28) he breaks off that major story to interpose a separate incident.

1 The Negeb: see on 27:10. 2 The Amalekites were planning to sell their captives as slaves. 7, 8 Cf. 22:20; 23:6, 9ff. Nomadic raiders are not easy to locate. 14 The Cherethites were kin to the Philistines. 16 shows that Ziklag had not been the only city to suffer from the Amalekite raid. 21–25 A quarrel among his men leads to David's first legal enactment. 31 All the places where David and his men had roamed. David thus repaid hospitality, and no doubt won over any potential Nabals (cf. ch. 25).

31:1–13 Defeat and death of Saul and Jonathan

31:1–7 The battle of Gilboa. Worsted in battle, the Israelite troops tried to escape into the safety of the hills, but many of them, including Saul and Jonathan, were overtaken by the pursuing Philistines.

1 Now the Philistines fought runs on from 29:11. 2 See on 14:49. Abinadab also appears in 1 Ch. 8:33. 4 Saul killed himself; an Amalekite told David a different story (2 Sa. 1:10; see commentary in loc.). 7 The valley: better, 'plain', i.e. of Jezreel. Israel is here reckoned as threefold: N of Jezreel, E of the river Jordan, and the main territory (S of the plain). The Philistines were able to enter each part of this territory, though their influence in Transjordan was limited, in fact.

31:8–13 The rescue of Saul's body. The first book of Samuel ends on a fitting note. Saul's first royal act had been to rescue Jabesh-gilead (ch. 11); its citizens now repaid him, posthumously.

9 RSV mg. may be preferable to the text. 10 Ashtaroth is the plural of Ashtoreth, which is probably the original reading here. She was the pan-Semitic goddess of war (and especially of fertility), known in Mesopotamia as Ishtar, by the Greeks as Astarte. Her temple is not here located; Ashkelon has been suggested. Beth-shan: a major city, E of the plain of Jezreel, near the Jordan. 12 Burnt is probably correct, although 'anointed with spices' has been put forward as the appropriate rendering here (e.g. Hertzberg). Burial was the Hebrew custom, but the fate of the bodies till this juncture may have been thought to require special treatment. Care was taken not to burn the bones, at any rate.

2 Sa. 1:1 – 8:18 THE EARLY YEARS OF DAVID'S REIGN

The time was ripe for David to succeed Saul to the throne of Israel; the king rejected by God was dead. But difficulties and obstacles still lay before David. Nevertheless, his rise to power continued to be marked by clear signs of the divine hand, and R. A. Carlson has characterized this period of David's life as 'David under the blessing', in contrast with his later years (see Carlson, David: the Chosen King, passim).

1:1–27 David's reaction to the news of Saul's death

The fall of Saul and his house was pre-ordained, and in one sense was but a necessary stage in David's rise to power; but on the other hand it was a tragedy for Israel, and David's reactions were consistent with his conception of the sanctity of the person of the Lord's anointed (cf. 1 Sa. 24:6; 26:11). David's regrets were undoubtedly genuine.

1:1–16 The Amalekite messenger. The messenger's story is basically the same as that of 1 Sa. 31, but with some differences, principally the claim that he had given Saul the coup de grâce, whereas in 1 Sa. 31:4 Saul's death was suicide. The stories are not irreconcilable; v. 9 is most naturally interpreted as implying that Saul was already wounded, and it is certainly possible that his own sword-wound (31:4) did not immediately have fatal effect. However, it may be best to view the Amalekite's tale as either exaggerated or partly untrue (with R. H. Pfeiffer, Hertzberg). Conceivably David's words in v. 16 contain a hint that he was not entirely convinced by the story; and see on 4:10. There can be no doubt that the Chronicler believed 1 Sa. 31, which he reproduced in 1 Ch. 10; he pays no attention to 2 Sa. 1.

2 The third day. It would have taken a messenger this long to travel the 100 miles from Gilboa to Ziklag. It is significant that the Amalekite reported to David, not to Saul's surviving son, Ish-bosheth; he viewed David now as king (did obeisance). 6 By chance. If the man was not one of Saul's retinue, he may have been looting the corpses. The Philistines did not discover Saul's body till the day after the battle (1 Sa. 31:8). 13 A sojourner; i.e. a foreigner now resident in Israel.

1:17–27 David's elegy. The beauty of the lament, its sincerity, and the correctness of its ascription to David are all widely recognized. The elegy may have been called 'the Song of the Bow', which would help to explain the problem of the Hebrew text of v. 18 (cf. RSV mg.).

18 Evidently the Book of Jashar was one source used by the author of the books of Samuel. Cf. Jos. 10:13. 21 Upsurging of the deep represents an emendation of the Hebrew; but, despite the parallel of sorts with dew or rain, it is not very convincing. 'Treacherous fields' (JB) follows a preferable emendation. 23 They were not divided. Some commentators have seen a certain pious hypocrisy in this remark, but it is after all true that Jonathan never left his father's side, in spite of their very different feelings towards David. 24 indicates how successful Saul had been against the Philistines. 27 The weapons of war is a metaphorical description of Saul and Jonathan.

2:1 – 4:12 David and Ish-bosheth

It is not surprising that Saul's surviving son, Ish-bosheth, should have attempted to succeed to the throne. It may seem surprising that the victorious Philistines should have permitted David to become king of Judah; but it is highly probable that he continued for the moment as their vassal. They were, after all, in alliance with several petty kings of Canaanite cities; and it would have served them well had David permanently divided the Israelites into two mutually hostile camps.

2:1–11 The rival kings. The willingness of the tribe of Judah to make David king and to break away from the northern tribes was by no means a foregone conclusion; hence David's fresh consultation of the sacred oracle. His message to Jabesh-gilead was a shrewd political move; Jabesh lay well N of Ish-bosheth's capital Mahanaim (v. 8). But we do not know how they responded.

1 Hebron: a major city of Judah, well S of David's native Bethlehem. 2 Cf. 1 Sa. 25:42f. 4 Cf. 1 Sa. 31:11ff. 7 A tacit invitation. 8 There is no doubt who had the real power. Mahanaim lay E of the Jordan: since the battle of Gilboa, the Philistines will have made an Israelite capital W of the river an impossibility. 9 The Ashurites: the Hebrew word normally refers to the Assyrians, a clear impossibility in this context. The Hebrew text has probably resulted from a scribal confusion of two names, the men of Geshur (an Aramaean state, N of Gilead) and the men of Asher. The Targum reads 'men of Asher', probably correctly, while the Syriac and Vulgate have Geshurites. Ish-bosheth's control over 'all Israel' must have been very much on paper, for 1 Sa. 31:7 has given the de facto situation. 10, 11 Two years: Hertzberg would prefer to read 'seven years', to conform with David's reign over Judah in Hebron. But probably v. 11 telescopes David's early reign; no doubt he reigned over Judah in Hebron two years, over all Israel in Hebron a further five and a half years, and then moved his capital to Jerusalem.

2:12–32 The battle of Gibeon. Of the 'long war' (3:1) between David and Ish-bosheth only this incident is related. The purpose of the narrative is to show how the blood-feud began which led to Abner's death. The battle seems to have commenced as a representative combat (like that of 1 Sa. 17), although the word 'play' (v. 14) is puzzling. Hertzberg took it that a mock duel somehow went wrong and led to disaster.

12 Gibeon was an important city of Benjamin, not far N of David's territory. 14 Play: the verb normally refers to general sporting behaviour. If it means here to hold serious combat (so JB), then the death of all 24 contestants made the representative battle inconclusive, and a general battle therefore followed. 18 Zeruiah: David's sister (cf. 1 Ch. 2:16). 23 Butt. The Hebrew noun is of uncertain meaning, but it appears possible that Abner did not intend to kill Asahel, merely to deter him. 24 Note the misprint 'Gideon' (for 'Gibeon') in some editions of the RSV. 25 Apparently Abner received reinforcements from the locality. 29 The Arabah: the Jordan valley, in this context. The whole forenoon: the Hebrew is obscure, and 'through a ravine' may be correct. (AV, RV 'Bithron', as a proper name, is still a possibility.)

3:1–5 David's family. The mention at this point of David's family provides a contrast with the insecurity of Ish-bosheth's position. Since becoming king, David had evidently married four additional wives, among them a princess of Geshur (Maacah, v. 3). This marriage probably cemented an alliance which helped to isolate Ish-bosheth, since Geshur was an Aramaean state lying to the N of Gilead.

2 At Hebron: i.e. before David moved his capital to Jerusalem, where other sons were born to him (cf. 5:13–16). Ahinoam: cf. 1 Sa. 25:43. 3 Chileab: the name is suspect, in view of LXX variations and 1 Ch. 3:1 ('Daniel'). Abigail: cf. 1 Sa. 25:42.

3:6–11 The rift between Ish-bosheth and Abner. To approach the royal concubines was tantamount to claiming the throne (cf. 16:20ff.), and without doubt Abner's action was treasonable. One wonders whether he really wished to supplant Ish-bosheth, or whether he merely wanted an excuse to desert to David's camp.

8 Am I a dog's head of Judah? i.e. a contemptible traitor. The phrase 'of Judah' does not appear in the LXX, and is perhaps to be omitted, since Ish-bosheth had not accused him of supporting David. 9 Abner now, like Saul and Jonathan at an earlier date, acknowledges explicitly that David is God's chosen king.

3:12–21 Abner defects to David. David refused any underhand negotiations with Abner; he may even have expected a refusal to return Michal to him. She was Saul's daughter, and as such would greatly strengthen David's claim to Saul's throne; the fact that Ish-bosheth meekly complied is significant.

14 Cf. 1 Sa. 18:20–27. 15, 16 Cf. 1 Sa. 25:44 ('Palti' is merely a shorter form of the name). One can sympathize with Paltiel, but the blame must be laid on Saul rather than David. 17–19 indicate that Ish-bosheth's cause was already lost, before his death. Even his own tribe, Benjamin, were ready to make David their king. 21 In peace; i.e. with no suspicion of his fate.

3:22–39 The assassination of Abner. Joab's hostility to Abner was natural enough, on account of the blood-feud between them, and secondly because Abner, with all his military experience, might well have replaced him as David's commander-in-chief. Whether he really believed in his accusations of treachery and espionage (v. 25) is hard to say. It is astonishing that David made no reply, but he can scarcely have tacitly supported Joab's subsequent actions, for the murder of Abner was an embarrassment to him.

28 David knew that divine retribution was inevitable. 29 Who holds a spindle: 'fit only for women's work' (L. H. Brockington), effeminate. 30 Evidently Abishai had some hand in the murder (cf. v. 39). 36 Clearly David succeeded in dissociating himself from complicity in the murder. 39 An unusual confession of weakness on David's part.

4:1–12 The assassination of Ish-bosheth. The death of Abner further demoralized Ish-bosheth's realm, and it fell apart, the murder of Ish-bosheth himself completing the process.

2, 3 Be-eroth is linked with Gibeon in Jos. 9:17, and its inhabitants may well have suffered along with the Gibeonites (cf. 21:1) at Saul's hands. This would well explain a basic hostility to Saul and his family in Be-erothites like Baanah and Rechab here. 4 Though it interrupts the narrative, this verse is not irrelevant, since it brings into the picture the nearest kin to Saul apart from Ish-bosheth, and lays a foundation for ch. 9. 6 RSV here follows the LXX, which provides better sense than the Hebrew (cf. AV). 7 The Arabah: cf. 2:29. 10 David recalls the events narrated in ch. 1; it may be noteworthy that he says nothing of the Amalekite's claim to have killed Saul. 12 contrasts honourable and dishonourable burial.

5:1–25 David defeats the Philistines

David's last rival had now fallen, but he had still to make himself king of the whole nation, and to defeat the Philistines. He wasted no time in either respect.

5:1–5 David becomes king of all Israel. There was no thought in anyone's mind that Mephibosheth, Saul's grandson, should reign; the situation demanded a warrior, not a cripple (4:4).

2 Two motives impelled the northern tribesmen to turn to David: his past reputation in battle, and the fact of Yahweh's promises to him. Shepherd was a term applied frequently to kings; see especially Ezk. 34. Prince: see on 1 Sa. 10:1. 3 The view put forward by A. Alt that the north and south were united in the person of the king, and not constitutionally, is widely held today. 5 summarizes David's reign, and leads on naturally to the story of Jerusalem's capture.

5:6–16 Jerusalem captured and made the capital. Jerusalem was already a very ancient city; at the time of the Israelite conquest of Canaan the Jebusites held on to it (Jdg. 1:21), though apparently the men of Judah conquered it, or part of it, at one time (see on Jdg. 1:8). It now lay in a Canaanite enclave, which tended to isolate Judah from Benjamin and Ephraim, and its capture was an important step in the consolidation of David's kingdom.

6 The Jebusites considered their fortress impregnable. 7 On the place-names, see NBD, art. 'Jerusalem'. 8 This verse in Hebrew in any case requires some emendation, and the word for water shaft is of uncertain meaning. Various other translations of it have been offered (e.g. '(scaling) hook', by W. F. Albright); the LXX reads 'dagger'; and the parallel passage in 1 Ch. 11:6 has no mention of the word. However, it is quite likely that Joab (see 1 Ch. 11:6) was able to penetrate the city's defences by means of a weak point in the system of water-supply. Hertzberg has suggested, attractively, that due to his exploit the spring En-rogel (on the E of the city) was originally named 'Joab's Well', later corrupted to 'Job's Well' (as it is known today). The house here quite possibly means the Temple (cf. JB). 9 The Millo: part of the city's defences, to which Solomon was to pay special attention (1 Ki. 9:15). 11, 12 'It becomes clear that David now draws foreign attention upon himself. He finds respect and recognition' (Hertzberg). The Lebanon region was noted for its building materials and skills. Observe that the exaltation of David is not for his own sake but for his people's: a democratic concept of kingship unusual in the ancient world. 13–16 continues the list of 3:2–5. Eliada appears as 'Beeliada' in 1 Ch. 14:7. Note how far down the list Solomon comes.

5:17–25 Philistine attacks repulsed. Once the whole of Israel was united behind David, the Philistines could view him no longer as an ally or vassal. Chronologically, the battles now recounted may well have preceded David's capture of Jerusalem.

17, 18 The stronghold: probably Adullam is meant (cf. 23:13, 14 and 1 Sa. 22:1), although the valley of Rephaim was quite near Jerusalem. The Philistine strategy was to isolate Judah from the northern Israelite tribes. 20 Baal-perazim, in view of the meaning of the name, was no doubt so called after the battle. The 'break-through' suggests a frontal assault, contrasting with the different tactics employed by David in the second battle (v. 23). 21 The Philistines had brought idols on to the battle-field, hoping to ensure victory (cf. 1 Sa. 4:3, 4). David later had them burnt (cf. 1 Ch. 14:12). 22 The Philistines saw no reason to change their strategy or tactics; 23–25 David, on the other hand, altered his tactics most successfully. 25 From Geba to Gezer; i.e. the Philistines were driven out of the hill country.

6:1 – 7:29 David, the ark, and the house of God

Saul had never shown any interest in the ark of the covenant, and he had offended both the prophets and the priests. David, the king of God's choice, reversed Saul's acts and policies completely, and emerged with yet greater promises of divine blessing.

6:1–23 The ark brought to Jerusalem. A more elaborate account is given in 1 Ch. 13 and 15. David thus transformed Jerusalem into the central sanctuary, as well as capital and royal city. This act inevitably brought the king into close contact with the cultus and the priesthood.

2 Baale-judah: called Kiriath-jearim in 1 Sa. 7:1. See on 1 Sa. 4:4. 3 A new cart: cf. 1 Sa. 6:7. Sons (a more general term in Hebrew than in English) probably means here 'grandsons', in view of the lapse of time and the omission of Eleazar's name (cf. 1 Sa. 7:1). 6 Nacon is an unlikely name; the 'Chidon' of 1 Ch. 13:9 seems preferable. 7 RSV follows 1 Ch. 13:10, since the Hebrew is here obscure; but 'for this crime' (JB) is a possible rendering. The punishment of Uzzah has often been objected to as excessive, especially as his intention was good; but the majesty of the Holy One was symbolized by the ark. It was necessary to teach the Israelites the infinite holiness of God, sometimes by 'terrible acts'. See Nu. 4:15. 10, 11 Obed-edom the Gittite: his name means 'worshipper of Edom' (i.e. a deity called Edom, in all probability); it is ironical that a Philistine and an idolater should become host to the ark, and be blessed! 12–15 A number of modern commentators hold that we have here a description of the annual re-enthronement of Yahweh, at a new year festival (the Feast of Tabernacles). Evidence for this is remarkably tenuous, and K. A. Kitchen has commented that 'it is ludicrous to force specific historical occasions like 2 Sa. 6 . . . into a New Year mould'. (See his Ancient Orient and Old Testament, pp. 102–106, and literature there cited.) 14 An ephod was a priestly garment, much shorter than the usual outer garment (cf. v. 20). 15 Shouting: a ritual cry; cf. Ps. 47:5. 19 Portion of meat is a guess; 'raisin cake' (JB) or the like is preferred by several commentators. 20 Michal's reaction may have resulted from her father's notoriety as a consequence of his actions at Naioth in Ramah (1 Sa. 19:24). 22, 23 may imply that David withdrew from her, but we cannot be sure.

7:1–17 Nathan's prophecy. This passage is in many ways the most important of the books of Samuel. David's noble wish to build a 'house' for his God was set aside, and instead God promised him a 'house' (i.e. a dynasty); God is no man's debtor. But more than that, the dynasty was to be 'for ever' (v. 16); this was the basis of the Messianic hope, fulfilled in the NT. Through David's house, too, God would provide salvation for Israel (vv. 10, 11). For a brief account of critical discussions of this chapter, see OTMS, p. 101 (and literature there cited).

1 The narrator here jumps, chronologically (further battles are mentioned in ch. 8), in order to conclude the story of the ark and the sanctuary. 2 Nathan, a worthy successor to Samuel, is here first mentioned. 6 Dwelling: the Hebrew word implies a place of temporary residence—in the Pentateuch, it is used of the Tabernacle. The structure at Shiloh had been in one sense a 'permanent' building, but it had suffered destruction. In the NT, cf. Jn. 4:21; Acts 7:48,49; 17:24. 7 God still moves at the head of His people. 8–13 Only when Israel achieves stability (under Solomon) will God permit Himself a permanent dwelling. 13 is elaborated in 1 Ch. 22:7–10. 14 I.e. unworthy kings will not affect the stability of the dynasty. The first part of this verse indicates a special relationship between God and the Davidic king (cf. Ps. 2:7). 15 My steadfast love represents a Hebrew word (hesed) bearing covenantal associations; cf. Is. 55:3.

7:18–29 David's prayer. David humbly accepts the unsolicited promise from God. It is interesting that he connected the divine promises to him with the earlier promises to the nation which he ruled; thus the 'Davidic covenant' and the Sinaitic covenant are linked together. The passage 'opens up perspectives which extend far beyond the history of Israel' (Hertzberg).

18 King David went in; i.e. into the temporary shrine for the ark. 19 There is a textual problem here (cf. RSV mg.), as elsewhere in this prayer. 23, 24 Cf. Ex. 19:3–6.

8:1–18 Further victories of David

8:1–14 Various campaigns. The divine promises of ch. 7 are exhibited to the reader as finding partial fulfilment immediately, although chronologically many of the campaigns here summarized took place before Nathan's prophecy (cf. 7:1). On the campaigns in Transjordan, see Bright, History of Israel, pp. 181f.

1 Metheg-ammah should mean 'bridle (? control) of the metropolis', and probably refers to Gath, a key Philistine city (cf. 1 Ch. 18:1). But a variety of interpretations is possible. 2 The violence to Moab suggests treachery on their part, in view of the earlier friendly relations (cf. 1 Sa. 22:3, 4). 3 Zobah was a small Aramaean kingdom near Damascus; 5 hence their kinsmen came to their aid. 6 The final clause, though theological, may reflect something of the surprise which David's victories caused. 8 Rather different forms of the place-names appear in 1 Ch. 18:8. 9 Hamath: another Aramaean state, lying over 100 miles N of Damascus. 12 Edom: the Hebrew reads 'Aram' (= Syria), probably rightly (cf. AV). 13 Edomites: here too the Hebrew refers to Syrians, but RSV is right to emend. The two place-names are scarcely distinguishable when the Hebrew script is written without the vowels (as it was for many centuries).

8:15–18 David's officials. David's territorial acquisitions will have necessitated a good deal of organization and administration, and this brief list of royal officials comes very appropriately at this point; 20:23–26 gives a later list. The passage also serves to introduce the chapters that follow, where attention centres on the royal court, instead of the battle-field.

15 Justice and equity; i.e. David himself was directly responsible for the judicial administration, a fact which later played into the hands of Absalom (cf. 15:3). 17 presents some textual problems and uncertainties. Presumably we should reverse the names Ahimelech and Abiathar, for a start (cf. 1 Sa. 22:20). According to biblical genealogies, both Zadok and Abiathar were descendants of an Ahitub (not necessarily the same man): cf. 1 Ch. 6:8; 1 Sa. 22:9. It has been widely conjectured, however, that Zadok was not even a Levite; he may in that case have been priest in Jerusalem to 'God Most High'

(Gn. 14:18) before David's capture of the city (as H. H. Rowley suggested). But an equally attractive possibility, which accepts the biblical genealogies, is that Saul had made Zadok high priest after the Nob slaughter. It seems considerably more likely that David should have tried to placate the followers of Saul, by uniting Saul's high priest with his own, than that he should have accepted the pre-Israelite (?Jebusite) priest of Jerusalem. One might add that since David himself seems to have become in some sense a priest-king, 'after the order of Melchizedek' (Ps. 110:4), there will scarcely have been any place in the hierarchy for an existing Jerusalem priest. 18 The Cherethites and the Pelethites were groups of 'sea-peoples' akin to (or part of) the Philistines. Indeed, the second name may well mean simply 'Philistines', to which it is very similar, by word-play to yield assonance with the first name. David's sons were priests is an interesting statement; Keil, with an eye on the different wording of 1 Ch. 18:17, rendered the Hebrew word, normally meaning 'priests', as 'confidants'. However, if as king in Jerusalem David did inherit some priestly functions from Melchizedek, he may well have delegated them, in whole or part, to his sons.

9:1 - 20:26 KING DAVID AND HIS COURT

This long section presents a scarcely-edited court history of David, which may well have come from a single literary source (see Appendix 1). The chapters do not recount a series of unconnected episodes, however; there is a clear theme, which might be entitled 'the man of God's choice'. In ch. 9 we find David showing covenant-kindness to the grandson of his enemy Saul; then, by contrast, we see him betraying and murdering a man loyal to him (ch. 11). David thus departed from the will of God. Yet this series of events led to the birth of Solomon, the man chosen by God to succeed David. The rest of the section shows how other sons of David by their misdeeds punished their father for his sins, and yet were prevented, by divine overruling, from wresting the throne from either David or Solomon. 'The narrative of the Succession' is therefore a title for 2 Sa. 9–20 (with 1 Ki. 1; 2) favoured by many modern writers.

9:1–13 David and Mephibosheth

This chapter provides a contrast with David's actions recounted in ch. 11; and it also lays a basis for the parts played by Mephibosheth and Ziba in the revolt of Absalom (16:1–4; 19:24–30).

9:1–8 Mephibosheth is summoned. The fears of Mephibosheth are readily explained when we consider that in the ancient world kings were accustomed to exterminate all members of a previous dynasty. It is also probable that the events recorded in 21:7–9 had already occurred. Hertzberg has pointed out, moreover, that David's opening remark, to suspicious ears, will have sounded remarkably like Herod's in Mt. 2:8.

1 For Jonathan's sake; i.e. David plans to fulfil his covenant with Jonathan (1 Sa. 20:42). 3 Cf. 4:4. 4 Machir was a rich land-owner (cf. 17:27–29). Lo-debar, though not identified, lay in N Gilead, not far from Jabesh, whose citizens had befriended Saul (1 Sa. 31:11ff.). 6 Mephibosheth is a later form of an original 'Merib-baal' (cf. 1 Ch. 8:34). 7 The land of Saul; i.e. his personal estates in Benjamin.

9:9–13 Mephibosheth at court. Mephibosheth was not only permitted life and property, he was given an honoured place at court; in this generosity David went beyond what his covenant with Jonathan had required—it was, in fact, 'the kindness of God' (v. 3).

10 appears a trifle self-contradictory. H. P. Smith explained it by commenting, 'Presence at court would rather increase than diminish his expenditure.' 12 Mica: through him Saul's line continued for no few generations (1 Ch. 9:41–44).

10:1 - 12:31 Warfare with Ammon and its consequences

The Ammonite war was the background to David's affair with Bathsheba and its sequel; the campaign not only gave David the opportunity for his adultery but also provided the means by which he encompassed the death of her soldier-husband, Uriah.

10:1–19 The defeat of Ammon and its allies. David was friendly disposed to Hanun because of some kindness received from his father, Nahash: perhaps when a refugee in the neighbouring country of Moab (1 Sa. 22:3, 4). Saul had attacked Nahash (1 Sa. 11), so it was not unnatural that the latter should afterwards befriend David when Saul was pursuing him. The warfare which now broke out between David and Hanun is interesting, since it led to one of the few conquests of David of which we know the causes. While Hanun provoked David to declare war, yet one can appreciate something of the suspicion with which neighbouring rulers must have viewed the powerful king of Israel.

5 Jericho lay on the road between Ammon and Jerusalem, and was a frontier city before David's conquest of Ammon. 6 It was natural for the Ammonites to look for allies in the Aramaean kingdoms to the north; cf. 8:3–12. 16–18 relate briefly a campaign very reminiscent of that recorded in 8:3ff. Since ch. 8 presents a summary of David's victories, we may well have here the same campaign under consideration, now set in its appropriate chronological and historical context. The only difficulty is that the numbers are different; but this is not conclusive evidence, since a comparison of this passage with 1 Ch. 19:16–19 suggests textual corruption.

11:1–13 David's relations with Bathsheba and Uriah. V. 1 provides the link between the campaign, E of the Jordan, and David's adultery with Bathsheba, in Jerusalem; the story of the campaign is resumed in 12:26.

1 The time when kings go forth: dramatic irony, since this is precisely what David did not do! Rabbah: Rabbath-ammon (modern Amman) was the Ammonite capital. 2 David's initial action was natural enough, but it is not really clear whether Bathsheba's was quite innocent of coquetry. Conceivably a sheer coincidence started the disastrous chain of events; at any rate, Bathsheba is nowhere treated as a guilty party. 3 Both Eliam and Uriah figured among David's outstanding warriors (cf. 23:34, 39). Though a Hittite, Uriah must have worshipped Yahweh, for his name means 'Yahweh is my light'. 4 Such an act would have been natural enough for many monarchs of the ancient world; Israel's views of the rights of the king were very different (cf. 1 Ki. 21:5–7, 19). 8 Wash your feet: an idiom of the time, put into clearer words in v. 11. 11 Booths. McKane suggests that the reference is to the Feast of Tabernacles rather than to ordinary soldiers' tents. Some time must have elapsed since the spring (v. 1), certainly, so possibly by now six months had passed. Evidently there was a prohibition of marital relations at such a time, at any rate. 13 Despite his drunken state, Uriah did not lapse; it is not impossible that a rumour of his wife's adultery had reached him.

11:14–27 The death of Uriah. David knew that Joab of all people would not object to becoming party to murder! Joab, indeed, took it upon himself to improve on David's scheme, and by doing so brought about the death of several good soldiers besides Uriah. David's plan would have caused only Uriah's death, but would have been too obvious.

20, 21 are a trifle odd, constituting a detailed anticipation of David's possible response to the news; even so, it is unnecessary to follow Hertzberg in rearranging the verses (with some LXX support) to put the words on David's lips. David was, after all, expecting to learn of the death of a single individual. Abimelech: see Jdg. 9:53. Jerubbesheth is a variation of the name 'Jerubbaal', i.e. Gideon (cf. Jdg. 7:1). 27 David exhibited indecent haste, which suggests that the mourning was a mere formality; of course, Bathsheba's pregnancy will have dictated expedition.

12:1–14 Nathan's denunciation. The deed had been done which was to change David's whole life, but some months passed (11:27) before any consequence followed. Nathan's previous prophetic message to David had been one of unlimited divine blessing (7:8–16), and it is evident that David had not the least suspicion that Nathan's visit to him now foreboded any ill for him. Nathan's parable was doubly clever: not only did it invite him to condemn himself (unawares), it also appealed to him as head of the judiciary (cf. 8:15).

1 David was not the only man in Israel who received direct guidance from God. 5, 6 The fourfold restoration was in accordance with the law (Ex. 22:1); the additional death penalty reveals the extent of David's anger at the unnamed wrongdoer. 8 Your master's wives. Nowhere else is it stated that David took over Saul's concubines, but such was common practice for an aspirant or claimant to the throne (cf. 3:7; 16:22). The point of this verse is that David already possessed a considerable harem, and his adultery was therefore the more inexcusable. 9 The sword of the Ammonites. Nathan's words are now contemptuous: David had sunk so low as to get his enemies to do his murderous work for him. 10–12 The punishment will fit the crime. The predictions were fulfilled in the violent deaths of Amnon and Absalom in David's own lifetime, not to mention the later bloodshed (like Athaliah's purge, 2 Ki. 11:1), and in Absalom's public appropriation of the royal concubines (16:22). 13 David's contrition was immediate and genuine (cf. Ps. 51, noting the title). He never called Nathan his enemy, as Ahab did Elijah (1 Ki. 21:20). Equally immediate was the pronouncement of forgiveness, for David should have died, by law and by his own verdict. It is to be noted that God's pardon and punishment are not necessarily mutually exclusive. 14 Utterly scorned the Lord. RSV mg. gives the literal sense of the Hebrew (which could be rendered as in AV); we have here a reverential circumlocution.

12:15–25 The child's death and the birth of Solomon. Nathan's final pronouncement was the first to find fulfilment: the child of the adulterous union must die. Here the sins of the father were certainly visited on the child. David's reactions to the boy's sickness and death led him to fly in the face of conventions of the time, and no doubt his courtiers were shocked as well as puzzled. Some commentators share their puzzlement, but David's reasoning seems perfectly intelligible.

23 I shall go to him. It is the inevitability and immutability of death that is the point; David is not here concerned with questions of the afterlife. 24 Solomon: the name may well be connected with the name of the city, Jerusalem; possibly Solomon was the eldest son to be born there, of a wife of David as opposed to a concubine (cf. 5:13, 14). 25 The second name, Jedidiah, 'beloved of the Lord', was a sign to David that this son would not die; whether or not David knew it at the time, it also marked out this boy as his successor to the throne.

12:26–31 The capture of the Ammonite capital. The campaign against Ammon had occasioned David's adultery and all that had resulted from it; the story of the warfare, interrupted at 11:1, is now brought to a conclusion. V. 26 is a summary of the rest of the paragraph.

27 The city of waters refers not to the whole city of Rabbah, but to the covered passage linking the city with its water-supply (comparable with the Siloam tunnel of Jerusalem at a later date). 30 Their king (Heb. malkām) was evidently understood by LXX as the name of the Ammonite deity Milcom (cf. Zp. 1:5). This may indeed be the correct interpretation of the word, and it is accepted by JB, for instance; but on the whole 'their king' seems preferable, despite the very considerable (but not impossible) weight of his crown. 31 Hard labour is the understanding of this verse favoured in RSV and most modern commentaries. The torture view (cf. AV) is, however, possible: a cruel fate indeed. The nature of the items listed supports the former interpretation, but a slight textual alteration is required (he'ĕḇîḏ, 'made . . . toil', for he'ĕḇîr, 'made . . . pass'). The use of conquered peoples in forced labour was common and natural.

13:1 – 18:33 David and his eldest sons

The central figure of the next few chapters is Absalom, David's third son (cf. 3:2, 3); Amnon, the eldest son, was murdered by him, and it seems likely that the second son must have died young, since he does not figure at all in the succession narratives. At any rate, by murdering Amnon, Absalom was free to make his own bid for the crown.

13:1–22 Amnon outrages his half-sister. We continue to trace the unhappy fortunes of David, brought about by his own misconduct with Bathsheba. It is noteworthy that the whole episode of Absalom's rebellion began with the same sins of which David had been guilty: sexual immorality leading to murder.

1 Tamar was the half-sister of Amnon and full sister of Absalom. 2 Impossible: prohibited by Lv. 18:11; Dt. 27:22; but Tamar suggested (v. 13) that a dispensation could be arranged (Abraham had married his half-sister, after all). But in the context the impossibility seems to have been a practical one, i.e. she was too carefully secluded. In any case, Amnon was bent on seduction, not marriage. 3 Shimeah: see on 1 Sa. 16:9. 6–11 The pains taken by Amnon make it plain that his action was no whim of the moment. 12 Tamar's reply would suggest that Israel's standards of morality were higher than those of surrounding peoples; Amnon's misconduct would leave a permanent social stigma upon her. This fact further explains her comment in v. 16. 18 A long robe with sleeves (AV 'a garment of divers colours'): see on Gn. 37:3. 19 Tamar's actions were those of a widow mourning for her husband. 21 David's anger led him to do nothing; some ancient versions append a statement that his inaction was due to his love for Amnon (cf. JB). 22 Absalom too did nothing, but with very different feelings and intentions.

13:23–39 Amnon's death and Absalom's flight. Absalom revealed himself no less skilful than his father had been in procuring a man's death (cf. ch. 11). At least it may be said for Absalom that his hatred of Amnon was not devoid of justification.

23 Baal-hazor. There are two possible sites, one 12 miles, the other only 4 miles, from Jerusalem. Sheepshearers: cf. 1 Sa. 25:4 (see commentary in loc.). 29–33 The uproar and confusion led to exaggerated rumours; Jonadab showed his 'craftiness' (v. 3) by divining the real situation and advising David of it. 34 But Absalom fled This statement interrupts the narrative at this point, whereas it is appropriate in v. 37; however, almost certainly the clause should be read as the final statement of Jonadab's speech: 'Amnon alone is dead, and Absalom has fled.' Cf. JB. 37 Absalom fled to his mother's family (cf. 3:3) in Geshur, NE of David's realm. 39 is a difficult verse; the sense must be that David gradually became resigned to Amnon's death and anxious to see Absalom again.

14:1–20 The woman from Tekoa. Joab's intervention may well have been motivated by a desire to put both parties, David and Absalom, in his debt. The skilful plan he devised made play of the fact that David was the man to whom law-suits were brought (cf. 8:15); Nathan had also cleverly taken advantage of this fact (12:1–6).

2 Tekoa lay 6 miles S of Bethlehem. 5–7 The problem posed by the woman was a realistic one, which would still ring true among bedouin today. The point (both in the story and its application) is that there are those only too ready to take over the heritage. 8–11 The woman, about to be dismissed, pleads for an immediate decision, and gets one. 9 The guilt: since any decision is bound to conflict with a sacred family duty. 11 The avenger of blood was the nearest kinsman to the dead man; his duties are outlined in Nu. 35; Dt. 19. 13 David could not fail to recognize Absalom in this statement. 14 We must all die . . . ; i.e. life is all too short. Possibly the woman was also thinking of Amnon's death ('he had to die some time'). But God will not take away . . .: here RSV accepts a slight emendation dating back to Ewald, and the sense is that God, in all His great mercy, will not punish the merciful man. In the Hebrew text as it stands, it is God who devises means (cf. AV); this reading is perfectly intelligible, inviting David to act as God Himself does, in mercy. David himself knew what it was to be an outcast, and had lived to see his life spared and to enjoy a triumphant home-coming. The LXX is different again; cf. JB. 17 David's abilities as a judge were God-given and God-like; Absalom's later complaint (15:4) was not levelled at David's lack of ability but at his lack of time to attend to his forensic duties. 18–20 David immediately revealed his skill and discernment, in recognizing Joab's hand.

14:21–33 Absalom's return. If it was Joab who engineered Absalom's return to Israelite soil, it was the latter himself who contrived his readmission to the royal court. This he did in a very arrogant fashion. It is apparent in this passage that neither father nor son was a man to forgive and forget.

26 sets the stage for the mode of Absalom's death (cf. 18:9, 14). The weight is computed as about 3½ or 4 lb. By the king's weight: the royal weight was a recognized standard (among others) in both Babylonia and Israel. 27 Three sons. 18:18 suggests that they must have predeceased their father. 33 The implication is that Absalom was now (but not hitherto) recognized by David as the crown prince. He was the eldest surviving son (if we may assume that Chileab, cf. 3:3, had died).

15:1–12 Absalom's conspiracy. Absalom could be patient and methodical. As he had waited two years before assassinating Amnon (13:23), so now he spent four years (v. 6) quietly laying plans for revolt. He used his personal charm to good effect, and he played upon the injustices which clearly were felt in the kingdom. He also displayed a clever technique of combining pomp and ceremony (v. 1) with the common touch (v. 5).

2, 6 Israel may refer to the northern tribes as opposed to Judah, as Hertzberg maintains. But if Absalom tried to play upon regional jealousies, it is remarkable that he raised the standard of revolt at Hebron, ex-capital of Judah (v. 10). On the whole, it seems preferable to take Israel in its wider sense. 8 One imagines David must have wondered why Absalom had been so slow to fulfil his vow. 11 implies that Absalom had scarcely any following in the capital itself. 12 We are not told why Ahithophel was prepared to join the conspiracy. Since he was Bathsheba's grandfather (cf. 11:3; 23:34), one would not have expected this of him, unless it was because he felt that David had tarnished his grand-daughter's reputation.

15:13–37 David's flight. David was taken unawares, but even so he was quick to assess the strategic situation; his years as a fugitive from Saul had given him valuable experience. He knew the best escape-route, and took it: he needed time, more than anything else. He spared his capital from attack (just as the Turkish and German forces did for Jerusalem in 1917, Hertzberg has observed). With him went his bodyguard, but not the ark. The ark had often accompanied Israelite troops into battle, and to many of David's men it could have seemed ill-omened to abandon it now. But David saw the matter differently, and had both a theological and a practical reason (vv. 25–28) for returning the ark to its shrine.

16 The king left ten concubines: they were taken over by Absalom (16:21, 22). 17, 18 The last house; i.e. on the road E out of Jerusalem, near the Kidron valley (cf. v. 23). Here David reviewed his forces. For the Cherethites and Pelethites, see on 8:18. 19–22 Ittai reacted much as Ruth did to Naomi (cf. Ru. 1:15ff.). David's calm acceptance of the situation, to the extent of calling Absalom 'king', is remarkable. 20 Steadfast love (Heb. ḥeseḏ) is a covenantal term, and its use to a non-Israelite here is noteworthy. 24 RSV has rearranged the verse (contrast AV), to bring the name of Abiathar to the fore. The phrase and Abiathar came up in the Hebrew text stands near the end of the verse, and could be translated 'and Abiathar offered up' (viz. 'sacrifices'). It seems best to follow the Hebrew in this way; Abiathar was the senior man of the two, but fell into disgrace at Solomon's accession (see especially 1 Ki. 2:35). If Abiathar was offering sacrifices at the shrine, inside the city, it would explain why Zadok is mentioned first and separately here, and why Abiathar's name is missing in v. 27 (cf. RSV mg.). (But if so, the phrase 'and Abiathar' in v. 29 would have to be viewed as a scribal addition, and deleted.) 30–37 The defection of Ahithophel was a bitter blow, but immediately God provided a counter-balance in the person of Hushai and David was able to form a sort of spy-ring to counteract the sagacity of Ahithophel. 37 reveals that David got away, and Hushai returned to the city, just in the nick of time.

16:1–14 Ziba and Shimei. This chapter cleverly presents two pairs of contrasts, as the king and the usurper encounter differing reactions to the new situation. As for Ziba, there can be no doubt that in bringing David provisions he had his eye on his own advantage, though it is of interest that he must have anticipated David's ultimate victory over Absalom. Shimei's violent hostility was due to his kinship with Saul; in view of his actions, David will have been the more ready to believe ill of Mephibosheth, who was even more closely related to Saul.

1 Ziba: cf. ch. 9. 3 Mephibosheth later denied Ziba's story (19:27). It is indeed difficult to suppose that Mephibosheth could have seen any advantage for himself in the situation, though he might well have decided to wait and see. 8 A man of blood. Shimei was no doubt thinking of Abner and Ish-bosheth, and probably too the progeny of Saul whose deaths are recounted in 21:7ff. 9 Abishai: Joab's brother (cf. 2:18; 18:2). 10 What have I to do with you? i.e. 'our attitudes are totally different'. 12 David felt that his present disasters were more than he deserved. The Hebrew text's 'iniquity' (RSV mg.) makes this even more explicit ('my iniquity' would mean 'the iniquity done to me'). 14 The Jordan (read by Lucian) has probably dropped out of the Hebrew text by accident. After a barren route, on which they were constantly harassed by Shimei, the waters of the river will have been more than acceptable.

16:15–23 Hushai and Ahithophel. Absalom similarly meets a contrast, in a false friend and a true; but in this case the difference is not self-evident, and Absalom is deceived. Hushai, naturally suspect, cleverly ingratiated himself; the (deliberate) flaw in his logic was to suggest that Absalom had been in any sense 'chosen' (v. 18).

19 So I will serve you; i.e. Absalom was crown prince, so would be king one day in any event; his claim to the throne was therefore legitimate, if premature. 21 Ahithophel advised a course of action, in an act of kingly prerogative (cf. 3:6), which would remove all possibility of a late reconciliation between David and his son. 22 The public deed was the greatest possible insult to David.

17:1–14 Ahithophel's plans thwarted. Ahithophel's sagacity was highly prized by both

David and Absalom (16:23), and his reputation was well deserved. He now proffered a second piece of brilliant advice to Absalom; speed of action was extremely important, and it was quite true that David's death was the only thing Absalom needed to achieve, for then his claim to the throne would be beyond dispute and David's supporters would flock to his standard, like a bride returning home after a casual tiff. Hushai's advice sounded equally plausible, designed though it was to buy time for David. It is interesting to observe the mechanics of his success in persuading Absalom: they were a. eloquence, b. the appeal to do things on a grandiose scale, c. flattery. The flattery consisted in the suggestion that Absalom should lead in person, whereas Ahithophel had planned to take command himself; thus Hushai's counsel contained a veiled disparagement of Ahithophel.

14 Hushai's success was above all due to God's overruling, for Absalom was not God's choice for king. Absalom was free to choose which plan he wished; but God can act within 'acts of personal freedom' (Eichrodt).

17:15–29 Events preceding the battle. While this passage is concerned with a variety of events which led up to the battle, it also reveals how things went David's way; he received intelligence of Absalom's movements, and adequate provisioning, while Absalom lost his best adviser and the most skilled general in Israel (v. 25).

16 Hushai was apparently not completely sure that Absalom would after all follow his advice rather than Ahithophel's. 17 En-rogel (later called 'Job's Well') lay in the valley SE of Jerusalem. 18 A well: perhaps a dry cistern in which two lads could easily hide, and the existence of which could readily be concealed. 23 Ahithophel already knew the outcome, if Absalom did not; his perception never deserted him. 24 Some time must have elapsed, for David has by now organized his forces, and moved well N to Ish-bosheth's former capital (cf. 2:8). Absalom too had had time to muster a large army, with which he now marched into Transjordan (keeping S of David's forces). 25 Nahash must be a scribal error for 'Jesse', David's father, which is read by Lucian (and cf. 1 Ch. 2:16, 17); the erroneous name derives from v. 27. Amasa was cousin both of Joab and Absalom. 27 Shobi was doubtless David's deputy in Ammon; his father Nahash had been its king (cf. 10:1). It is clear that Absalom had few supporters E of the Jordan, since both Shobi and Machir (formerly a friend of Saul's family, cf. 9:4) might well have been hostile to David. 28, 29 The provisions include neither perishables nor luxuries.

18:1–18 Absalom's defeat and death. When battle was finally joined, David's seasoned troops made good use of difficult, rocky and wooded terrain. The statement that 'the forest devoured more people that day than the sword' (v. 8) is well illustrated by the fate of Absalom himself. David appears in this story to have lost some of his native shrewdness, for he failed to appreciate fully that the death of either Absalom or himself would settle the issue, and render further strife pointless.

5 Deal gently . . . : a statement which combines both confidence and weakness. 13 The soldier knew well Joab's ruthlessness; and he probably remembered the fate of the assassins of Ish-bosheth (4:12). The reading 'at the risk of my life' (RSV mg.) would make his point more explicit. 14, 15 Heart may not be literal, in view of the statement that ten young men actually despatched Absalom; Joab's act may have been symbolical rather than deadly. The same Hebrew word is used a second time in v. 14 to signify the 'midst' (AV) of the oak. 16 Absalom's death means the end of the revolt, so Joab wisely brings the pursuit to a close. 18 It may be conjectured that Absalom had erected this monument upon the death of his three sons (cf. 14:27). The pillar will have been near Jerusalem, though it is certainly not the present-day structure named after him, in the Kidron valley.

18:19–33 David hears the news. Joab preferred to send a slave as a messenger, rather than Ahima-az, in case David reacted violently to the news of Absalom's death. Moreover, a dark-skinned Cushite (= Ethiopian) will have been a messenger of ill omen. This passage is superb literature, intensely dramatic, and so patently derives from an eyewitness that some have deduced that Ahima-az was the author (and thus probably the author of chs. 9–20 as a whole).

19 Tidings: the Hebrew word carries the implication of good news; Ahima-az was full of the victory, and unaware of the possibility that David might consider his news as tragic. 25 'If he is alone . . .'; i.e. a group of men running would indicate a rout. 27 It is not altogether clear why David should be so sure that Ahima-az must have good tidings. Hertzberg suggests that David would interpret a band of people as a rout, one man as the messenger of victory; McKane retorts that one man might as easily be a messenger requesting urgent reinforcements; this may be true enough, but we cannot expect David to have been too coldly analytical at such a critical moment. It seems simpler, nevertheless, to suppose that David knew Joab would send a messenger of ill omen, such as the Cushite, if the news were bad. 29 Ahima-az was prevaricating; Joab had told him explicitly that Absalom was dead (v. 20). 33 David's lamentation is deeply pathetic, the sincerity of it beyond any doubt. To such a pass had his own sins brought him (cf. 12:10).

19:1 – 20:26 David's return and Sheba's revolt

With the death of Absalom, further intrigues for the succession to David's throne seem to have ceased until the very end of his reign, when the struggle between Adonijah and Solomon took place (cf. 1 Ki. 1; 2). But Absalom's revolt produced its aftermath of disunity among the tribes of Israel, from which yet another revolt broke out. Ever since David's adultery with Bathsheba, trouble and unhappiness marked his reign.

19:1–15 Preparations for David's return. David's unrestrained grief could have led to political disaster, and Joab's brutal plain speaking was justified—and successful. Vv. 9–15 reveal not only the basic distrust between Judah and the northern tribes, but also the fact that David had lost much of the support of his own tribe. It may be that in trying to keep on good terms with the northern tribes, David had put himself at a distance from Judah.

9, 10 At strife (JB 'quarrelling'): this phrase makes it clear that the argument that follows was not everybody's opinion: cf. v. 40. The Philistines had been thrust back, and no doubt some Israelites would willingly have returned to the pre-monarchic constitution, or else perhaps sought a new king. 11 Zadok and Abiathar were the king's intimates, and he could trust them implicitly (cf. 15:35f.). 13 Amasa had been Absalom's military commander (17:25). In making him his own commander, David no doubt hoped to win over those adherents of Absalom who feared reprisals. At the same time, there can be no doubt that David took pleasure in dismissing Joab from his post; he never forgave Joab (cf. 1 Ki. 2:5f.). McKane maintains that the move was very foolish, since it punished loyalty and rewarded sedition, and will have given nobody any faith in David's powers of judgment. This seems true enough; events soon reversed David's decision, and the narrator may be hinting that David's old shrewdness was deserting him, in his bitter distress at his son's death. 15 David returns in state; no slinking home for him (contrast v. 3).

19:16–39 David is welcomed back. This passage is the dramatic reversal of 16:1–14. There we read how David encountered reviling and apparent disloyalty on his road E from Jerusalem; now as he returns triumphantly to the capital he is greeted very differently.

16 Shimei: cf. 16:5–8, 13. As a Benjaminite, he was well placed to make contact with David at the earliest possible moment, since Gilgal and the ford (v. 15) were in Benjaminite territory. 17 The same holds true for Ziba; cf. 16:1–4. 18 They crossed the ford: note the RSV mg., meaningless as it stands, but very probably the Hebrew word for 'ford' could also mean 'ferry' (as S. R. Driver first suggested). JB says that Ziba and his men 'worked manfully ferrying the king's family across'. 21, 22 Abishai still felt murderous towards Shimei, but David's peaceable attitude was unchanged (cf. 16:9–12). 23 The oath protected him only so long as David lived; cf. 1 Ki. 2:8f., 36–46. 24 Mephibosheth this time put in an appearance (contrast 16:1ff.); he had exhibited the conventional signs of mourning ever since David's departure from the court. (Note that son in Hebrew can also do duty for 'grandson'.) 26 It is clear from v. 24 that Mephibosheth was not completely immobilized by his lameness, but presumably he had been too late to get away from Jerusalem before Absalom's arrival there, in consequence of Ziba's deceit. Speed had been essential (see on 15:37). 27 Like the angel of God: so too had the woman of Tekoa described David's powers of judgment (14:17). If Mephibosheth was totally innocent (as he probably was, though the narrator never makes a judgment), we may feel that David's verdict (v. 29) was scarcely fair to him. However, Ziba had given David unambiguous and practical support at a critical juncture. 28 You set your servant . . .; i.e. David had already shown him unwarranted mercy and generosity. 29, 30 David's verdict is reminiscent of the proverbial judgment of Solomon, and Mephibosheth's response is not unlike the harlot's reply to Solomon (cf. 1 Ki. 3:25f.); but apparently David did not thereupon change his decision, as Solomon did. 31 Barzillai: cf. 17:27ff. 37 Presumably Chimham was his son.

19:40 – 20:3 Faction and revolt. The whole chapter so far has mentioned virtually nothing that would have marred the joy and triumph of David's return to power. But v. 40 immediately brings home to us the truth of the situation: only half of the northern Israelites had as yet decided to renew their support of David. It now appears that David's appeal to the men of his own tribe (vv. 11–14), and their response (v. 15), had caused no little offence to the rest of the nation, and bitter quarrelling broke out. Sheba was not slow to take advantage of this unhappy situation.

41 David's men: his personal troops. 42 The king is near of kin to us: this fact was indeed the whole source of the trouble, and such a reply was calculated only to increase jealousy and resentment. 43 Ten shares. Obviously Judah is the eleventh tribe, but who is the twelfth? After the disruption of the monarchy following Solomon's death, it was of course Benjamin; but McKane holds that it was probably Simeon in this context; its territory lay due S of Judah. The difficulty about taking Benjamin as the tribe here coupled with Judah is that the rebel, Sheba, was a Benjaminite. However, Ziba and Shimei and their Benjaminite followers (cf. vv. 16f.) were probably very prominent in the procession, and the other tribal representatives might readily have bracketed Benjamin with Judah. Undoubtedly the first readers of 2 Samuel would automatically have assumed that Benjamin was meant. The final sentence of the chapter suggests that the men of Judah got the better of the argument, but only annoyed the northerners the more thereby. At any rate, it was in this situation that Sheba saw his opportunity.

20:1 Sheba, as a Benjaminite, may have tried to pose as the true successor to Saul. 2 All the men of Israel: the very ease with which Sheba's revolt was quelled makes it clear that this rebellion was anything but unanimous. This phrase must therefore mean merely the dissident elements of all the tribes. 3 is a footnote to the Absalom episode (cf. 15:16; 16:22). Nobody in future must have sexual relations with the ten concubines. In a sense they were indeed in widowhood.

20:4–13 Joab and Amasa. Amasa's military record is not one to inspire confidence; as Absalom's commander, he had suffered a very heavy defeat, and now his slowness to carry out David's orders could have resulted in fresh disaster. Again it was the highly-trained royal bodyguard ('your lord's servants', v. 6) on whom David had to rely. David's continuing grudge against Joab is evident from the fact that Joab's brother Abishai was appointed to command the king's troops. But Joab nevertheless seized the opportunity to retrieve his lost position—even if it meant assassinating his own cousin.

6 Cause us trouble: the Targum (followed by RSV) has probably correctly interpreted a Hebrew idiom (cf. RSV mg.). 8 Amasa came to meet them must suggest that he was hurrying to catch them up, since he had been S, to Judah (v. 5), whereas Gibeon lay N of Jerusalem. It fell out; i.e. into Joab's hand, not on to the ground, 10 since Amasa failed to see it. Joab and Abishai: apparently Abishai had by now relinquished command to his brother. 11, 12 Joab posted a man to prevent Amasa's troops from dispersing (cf. v. 22).

20:14–22 The end of the revolt. It is soon evident what small support Sheba could command: Joab's speedy pursuit probably discouraged many who might otherwise have joined the rebel army. As it was, Sheba was finally pinned down in a city at the extreme north of Israel (very near Dan), with only his own clan, the Bichrites, fighting for him. In the event, the death of Sheba himself terminated the revolt.

18 Let them but ask counsel at Abel: the proverb is textually uncertain and somewhat obscure; it looks as if Abel of Beth-maacah had a long-standing reputation for sagacity and peaceful settlement of disputes. The LXX reading is to different effect, and is utilized by JB: 'Let them ask in Abel and in Dan if all is over with what Israel's faithful ones have laid down.' Equally obscure, this statement would make the two neighbouring cities true guardians of Israel's traditions. 21 The hill country of Ephraim: the N section of the mountainous range lying between the coastal plain and the Jordan valley; Sheba's tribe was Benjamin (cf. v. 1), which lay in this hilly area. 22 Joab returned to Jerusalem to the king, unconcerned by his earlier deposition and by the new murder he had committed. David could do no other than restore him to his earlier command (v. 23), but he did not forget or forgive. Possibly Joab extracted an oath from David as Shimei had done (19:23); only in his will did David attack either man (cf. 1 Ki. 2:5f., 8f.).

20:23–26 David's officers. The return of Joab to the capital, knowing that he was again commander-in-chief, leads on naturally to a list of David's officials in the later part of his reign. An earlier list appears in 8:15–18; naturally some names have changed over the years. See comment on the earlier passage.

24 Adoram (= Adoniram) continued in his unpopular office right through Solomon's reign, and was stoned to death at the beginning of Rehoboam's (1 Ki. 12:18). 25 Sheva: the name, possibly of Egyptian origin (see McKane, in loc.), appears in a variety of forms (in the versions, and at other points in the Hebrew text), and may just refer to the 'Seraiah' of 8:17. 26 Ira the Jairite is possibly the same man who appears in 23:38; if so, 'Ithrite' may be the preferable description of him, and this could make him a Levite, if 'Ithrite' means 'man of Jattir' (as the Syriac Peshitta suggests): cf. Jos. 21:14. If correct, Jairite links Ira with Gilead (cf. Nu. 32:40f.). In any case, the mention of Ira as David's priest is poignant, silently underlining the fact that no longer were 'David's sons' (8:18) in this favoured position. So this long section of 2 Samuel ends with the unspoken recognition that David had lost much that was near and dear to him, in consequence of his sins of adultery and murder.

21:1 – 24:25 DAVID'S REIGN: PROBLEMS AND PROSPECTS

These final four chapters are often referred to as an appendix to 2 Samuel; they offer a variety of material, drawn from widely different periods of David's life, and they interrupt the story of the succession struggles (resumed in 1 Ki. 1). There is nevertheless more unity of theme, and deliberate purpose on the part of writer, than is at first apparent. a. These chapters widen the scope of the problems David had to face, and describe famine, warfare and plague. b. They show how God provided guidance and loyal supporters for David in all these difficulties. c. They show how it was his very experience of the vicissitudes of life, and of the goodness of God, that made him 'the sweet psalmist of Israel'. d. Both in the psalms and the closing narrative, future perspectives are opened; the focus of the Bible historians is always the present and the future.

The six sections contained in these four chapters are arranged chiastically: natural disaster, military exploits, poem, poem, military exploits, natural disaster.

21:1–22 Famine and warfare

Hitherto David's troubles, as recorded in 2 Samuel, were largely those caused by intrigues in his own family, and revolts stemming from them. Other problems are now highlighted; the story of the famine also illustrates the legacy of ill-will from Saul's reign which David had to tackle.

21:1–14 The execution of Saul's family. Most commentators place this episode early in David's reign, and prior to his honouring Mephibosheth at court (see comment on ch. 9); possibly, however, v. 7 would suggest otherwise. Saul's attack on the Gibeonites had been in defiance of Joshua's covenant with them (Jos. 9:15), obtained by trickery though it was. National blood-guilt interfered with the course of nature, and famine ensued. The view of H. Cazelles (PEQ, 87, 1955, pp. 165–175) that this passage describes a fertility rite after the Canaanite manner is well answered by McKane, ad loc.

1 It is possible that David consulted the oracle at Gibeon (cf. 1 Ki. 3:4; 2 Ch. 1:3). 2 Saul had sought to slay them . . . : in trying to consolidate his kingdom, Saul's desire to outroot Canaanite enclaves was perfectly intelligible. We do not know, however, precisely how and when this episode occurred. 3 Only if the Gibeonites would pronounce a blessing would the course they had previously uttered be rendered void; cf. Jdg. 17:2. 6 Some ritual form of execution is intended; the exact manner of it is not clear in the Hebrew (hang is therefore too specific). 8 Merab: cf. 1 Sa. 18:19. The name 'Michal', read by most of the Hebrew MSS, is clearly wrong (cf. 6:23); probably an early scribe inserted the better-known name by error. 10 A period of up to six months, for summer rain is rare after the barley harvest (April or early May). However, the rain itself signalled the end of the drought which had occasioned the famine (v. 1), and was a sign of divine favour. 12–14 Cf. 1 Sa. 31:10–13. The sign of the rain, heralding the end of the famine, gave David freedom to honour the memory of Saul and Jonathan (and of the seven men recently executed too, if the LXX of v. 14 may be followed). By this deed David no doubt had a further motive, namely to avoid giving the impression that he had had these men executed out of a desire for revenge on Saul. 14 Zela is unknown as a proper name, and it could perhaps be a noun denoting a tomb-chamber; if so, the tomb was presumably at Gibeah, Saul's family home. God heeded supplications for the land; i.e. the rain in due course produced renewed fertility and food.

21:15–22 Incidents from the Philistine wars. The first episode here recounted marked the close of David's active military career, which thus ended as it had begun, in battle with a giant Philistine warrior. All four of the Philistines listed here were huge men, and we may see God's hand in the skill and courage given to the Israelites who overcame them. David was dependent on divine protection and on loyal human support.

15, 16 And David grew weary: this is the reading of the Hebrew, and it makes good sense; but the text of both verses is suspect. 17 Abishai: David's nephew, Joab's brother (cf. 2:18). The final sentence lays emphasis on 'the key position of the king in the community' (McKane); McKane considers the metaphor to be drawn from the Tabernacle ritual (cf. Ex. 27:20); cf. 1 Ki. 11:36. 19 Elhanan . . . slew Goliath: this statement appears plainly at variance with 1 Sa. 17. Various explanations and emendations are possible, such as that adopted by the AV. The problem is discussed fully in Appendix 5.

22:1 – 23:7 Two psalms of David

It is impossible to prove (or disprove) the Davidic authorship of these two sacred poems, but it is noteworthy that Hertzberg allows the traditional authorship of both. The first of them is identical (but for minor variations) with Ps. 18, and A. Weiser too, in his commentary on Psalms (in loc.), agrees that at least it was composed in the period of David. The two psalms together are reminiscent of the Song and the Blessing of Moses (Dt. 32; 33).

22:1–15 A song of David. For detailed notes on this psalm, see the commentary on Ps. 18. Its relevance at this point is clear; cf. especially vv. 1 and 51. 'A fitting epilogue to David's story' (L. H. Brockington), the poem looks both back and forward, reflecting on the victories God had already made possible and the promises He had offered for the future. The emphasis on moral behaviour in vv. 21–25 will have constituted a sermon worth heeding to David's descendants on the throne of Judah.

23:1–7 David's last words. It has been suggested that these were David's last words as an inspired author; and this may be so. There is, however, something of the nature of a last will and testament about these verses, comparable with Dt. 33. (More prosaic testamentary dispositions of David are given in 1 Ki. 2.) There are a number of difficulties of text and translation in the psalm.

1 The sweet psalmist of Israel: the reading of RSV mg. is possible (one could recall 1 Sa. 18:7), but the traditional rendering is to be preferred. Some scholars deny this psalm to David on the uncertain grounds that he would scarcely have described himself so. In any case, it is possible that the psalm proper begins at v. 3. 4 The comparison of justice in a king with the fruitfulness of rain and sun is skilful and effective; ch. 21 has shown the sad effects of lack of rainfall. Sprout: 'sparkle' (JB) is better, and gives more vivid imagery. 6, 7 Godless men . . . ; i.e. dangerous men require very careful handling, but there are nevertheless ways of dealing with them and destroying them.

23:8–39 David's mighty men

The remainder of the chapter consists of a catalogue of David's warriors (who enabled him to become king, according to 1 Ch. 11:10), with a brief account of a few of their valorous exploits. It is explicitly stated more than once that God Himself was responsible for their achievements.

23:8–23 Exploits of David's outstanding warriors. Evidently there were two 'orders of chivalry' among David's soldiers, the Three and the Thirty, the former group being the more notable. The similarity of the numbers 'three' and 'thirty' in Hebrew has given rise to textual errors and confusion here and there (as RSV mg. reveals); and some of the names appear in variant form in 1 Ch. 11. The historical context of vv. 8–17 is that of the Philistine wars.

13 Three of the thirty: to be distinguished from 'the Three'. Their names are not given; Hertzberg's suggestion that they were the three sons of Zeruiah—Joab, Abishai and Asahel—is improbable, largely because Joab's name does not stand in the list of the Thirty (vv. 24–39); presumably, as commander-in-chief, he stood outside and above the two groups. Adullam . . . the valley of Rephaim: these names indicate that this episode took place during the fighting described in 5:17–26. 16 He poured it out to the Lord; i.e. as a drink-offering. 18 Beside the three: since the Hebrew would more naturally mean 'among the three', it seems likely that the numeral should be altered, giving 'among the thirty' (so JB); cf. v. 23. 20 Ariels of Moab: the word 'ariel' should mean 'lion of God'; if so, then either Moabite lions of exceptional size or else Moabite warriors (cf. AV, JB), referred to metaphorically as lions, must be intended. Other possibilities exist. 23 Cf. 8:18.

23:24–39 'The Thirty'. There are two numerical problems here, arising from the fact that the chapter appears to list more than 30 warriors, but less than 37 (cf. v. 39). The first problem is the more easily explained: it would seem that 'the Thirty' was replenished from time to time, as one man was killed (e.g. Asahel) and another was employed elsewhere (like Benaiah). A group of constant size like this may have been formed on an Egyptian pattern (cf. J. Bright, History of Israel, p. 186). Additional names therefore appear; several more again are listed in 1 Ch. 11:41–47. As for the 'thirty-seven in all', the question is complicated by textual problems in the passage. As the list stands (in RSV), there are 31 individuals listed in vv. 24–39, to whom Abishai (v. 19) and Benaiah (v. 23) should be added; if the 'sons of Jashen' (v. 32) numbered 4, then we have a final count of 37. But probably Jashen himself, not his sons, stood in the original text, cf. JB; and 'Jonathan, Shammah' (vv. 32f.) should probably read 'Jonathan the son of Shammah'. Accepting these two alterations to the RSV list, we now have precisely 31 names in vv. 24–39; to reach 37, we may add the names of 'the Three' (vv. 8–12), Abishai and Benaiah, and then assume that the commander, Joab, completes the list (he is in fact named incidentally in v. 37).

24 Asahel died very early in David's reign (cf. 2:23), which suggests that 'the Thirty' were first organized while David was in Ziklag. 25 Elika: the omission of his name in the LXX and in 1 Ch. 11 must be accidental. 39 Hertzberg considers it intentional and significant that the last name is that of Uriah, who was to be betrayed by the very man he supported so nobly.

24:1–25 Census and plague

Despite its problems for the modern reader, this chapter neatly rounds off the books of Samuel and the story of David's reign. David had previously encountered warfare, revolt and famine; now pestilence brings fresh distress to Israel and the king. But God overruled in the whole matter, from beginning to end; the result was the acquisition of the very site on which was to stand Solomon's Temple, the majestic symbol of God's presence in the midst of His people. Thus the book ends on a note of deliverance and blessing, pointing forward into the indefinite future. Hertzberg, comparing the chapter with the Flood story of Genesis, comments: 'new blessing comes as a consequence of punishment and destruction.'

24:1–14 The census and its consequences. To the modern reader it is far from clear why it was sinful to hold a census; and if it was, it disturbs him afresh that God Himself should have prompted the sinful act. It must be allowed, first of all, that God's anger against Israel (v. 1) will not have been due to some arbitrary whim. God's reasons for action are not always revealed, but conceivably (as C. F. Keil suggested) the sin of rebellion (against David) was being punished. The sin in holding a census, it is generally held, was one of arrogance; it was God's prerogative to multiply the nation and to number it. Even Joab knew it to be a false move.

1 Again: the allusion is to the famine of ch. 21. The Lord . . . incited David. This writer recognizes the overruling hand of God, whereas the later historian was more interested in the mode of the incitement, namely Satanic tempting (cf. 1 Ch. 21:1). 2 From Dan to Beer-sheba; i.e. the census is to be a complete one. Indeed, it went beyond the traditional confines of Israel (cf. vv. 5–7). The purpose of the census will have been the reorganization of the tax, military service, and forced labour systems. 5 The areas named here lay in Transjordan. 6 Kadesh is more likely to be Kadesh-naphtali, in N Israel, than the old Hittite capital, Kadesh on the Orontes, far beyond the boundaries of Israel. In any case, the mention of Kadesh in the land of the Hittites is derived from Lucian, and we cannot be sure that it was the original reading. (See 'Kadesh (on the Orontes)' in C. F. Pfeiffer (ed.), The Biblical World, 1967.) The Hebrew has 'Tahtim-hodshi' (cf. AV), a name otherwise unknown. 7 All the cities of the Hivites and Canaanites lay on the coastal plain, between Tyre and Philistia. 9 The numbers seem astonishingly large, though the number credited to Israel is even greater in 1 Ch. 21:5. There is probably some basis for the figures, but early textual corruption cannot be ruled out. 10 It is not stated what led David to feel remorse; 1 Ch. 21:7, however, tells us that Israel began to suffer before David's change of heart. 11 David's seer: see Appendix 3. 13 The first two choices had already afflicted David and his kingdom (precisely three years of famine, cf. 21:1). The choices grow in severity, but by way of compensation diminish in duration.

24:15–25 The pestilence and its consequences. Even in punishment, the mercy of God was to be seen, and an altar was built at the place where the angel was observed to stay his hand. This site, hitherto a threshing-floor just N of David's capital, was the scene where God's presence was remembered, in all its terror and mercy, and here, very appropriately, Solomon's Temple was presently erected (cf. 1 Ch. 22:1; 2 Ch. 3:1). It may seem strange that no mention of the Temple is made in this passage, but it must be remembered that the earliest readers of 2 Samuel will have known perfectly well that Araunah's threshing-floor was the site of the Temple.

15 The appointed time refers to the time of the evening sacrifice on the same day. From Dan to Beer-sheba; i.e. throughout the whole territory where the census had been conducted (cf. v. 2). 16 The angel: the agent of God in both punishment and deliverance. Araunah appears to have been a Hittite name (a-raw-wan-ni, 'aristocrat'), unfamiliar in form to the Israelites, and so gradually pronounced in a more Hebraic fashion; hence the 'Ornan' of Chronicles. He may have been the previous ruler of Jerusalem (cf. C. H. Gordon, Ugaritic Manual, p. 234). 17 David's prayer, though it does him credit, was in fact too late; divine mercy was already at work. The fact that David was unaware of God's decision is insufficient to warrant finding a divergent account in vv. 17, 21, and 25; the narrator is clear that both the early cessation of the plague and the purchase of the threshing-floor were intended by God. 22–24 Araunah's offer and David's refusal of the gift are both reminiscent of Gn. 23:11ff. 25 The deliverance of Jerusalem is the note on which 2 Samuel ends; the kingdom and the Temple site remain intact and in God's hands, ready to be handed on to David's descendants.

Appendix 1
THE SOURCES OF THE BOOKS OF SAMUEL

There can be no doubt at all that the writer of the books of Samuel made use of some earlier documents, though it is impossible to know how many. No single individual lived right through the eras of Samuel, Saul and David; and statements incorporating the phrase 'to this day' (e.g. 1 Sa. 27:6) suggest a further lapse of time before the author's own date. Attempts have therefore been made to isolate the sources from which the author took his material; and a number of quite different schemes have resulted.

The simplest scheme is probably that associated with the name of K. Budde, and which is conveniently outlined, as adapted by Pfeiffer, in R. H. Pfeiffer, Introduction to the Old Testament. This is a two-document hypothesis; one source is labelled 'early', the other 'late', and Budde himself maintained that these sources were identical with those which had been found in the Pentateuch and known respectively as J and E. This precise link with the Pentateuch is denied by many scholars, however, and so this hypothesis about 1 and 2 Samuel does not necessarily stand or fall with the Wellhausenian documentary analysis of the Pentateuch.

While some attention is paid by scholars holding the two-document hypothesis to questions of language and style, the general approach is rather one of subjective historical criticism: the material in Samuel is first sorted into pairs of 'duplicate' or 'divergent' accounts, historical judgment is then passed on each incident, and finally the more 'reliable' material is credited to the 'early' source, the less reliable to the later conjectural document. Even where material is not duplicated, it can be assigned to one source or the other on the basis of its credibility. To quote Pfeiffer, 'In contrast with the lucid and objective presentation of historical events and personalities which characterizes the early source, the late source . . . is clouded with legends and distorted by theories' (p. 362). On such a basis, then, David's arrival at Saul's court as a harpist is early, whereas his victory over Goliath and arrival at court as a warrior is late (and unhistorical); David's sparing Saul's life in the Ziph wilderness is early, the similar incident at En-gedi is late; and so forth.

A number of modifications of the two-document view have been propounded: notably O. Eissfeldt's argument that in the books of Samuel, as in the Pentateuch, a 'Lay' source (L) must be found, in addition to J and E. It should be added that most scholars, including Budde, attribute a certain amount of material to a much later hand, often presumed to be that of the final redactor or the 'Deuteronomist' himself.

Various objections might be raised to the two-document hypothesis. It seems incredible, for one thing, that two documents should have existed of remarkably similar content, the one almost wholly reliable, the other almost totally worthless historically: and why, if they did exist, any writer should have thought it worth while to conflate them is past comprehension. It is clear, moreover, that if it can be shown that many of the 'duplicate' accounts are in fact of equal credibility, and are not mutually exclusive, the two-source hypothesis loses its whole basis. The so-called duplicates are of several quite different types, and to assess their historical value as Budde and his predecessors did is a drastic over-simplification.

A more complex documentary hypothesis was put forward over 60 years ago by A. R. S. Kennedy in his Century Bible commentary. His approach was much more reasonable, and continues to find favour, especially with British scholars (e.g. G. W. Anderson, in A Critical Introduction to the Old Testament; H. H. Rowley, in The Growth of the Old Testament). Kennedy found five distinct source documents: a history of Samuel's early years, a history of the ark of the covenant, a history of the monarchy favourable to it, a history of the monarchy hostile to it, and a court history of David. There is much to be said for the accuracy of this analysis; the most doubtful point is whether there really were two documents treating the institution of the monarchy in such different ways. If there were (and most scholars are convinced on the point), it may at least be averred that it is unnecessary to view the hostile account as late and unreliable (see Appendix 2). Kennedy also found material not deriving from any of these sources, such as that drawn from unwritten traditions.

Modifications of this hypothesis too are to be found, notably that of A. Weiser, who posits only four 'original independent fundamental literary units' (Introduction to the Old Testament, p. 162). But he lays much greater stress on traditions, and the gradual gathering of them, than Kennedy did.

One source used by the writer of the books of Samuel is named in 2 Sa. 1:18, 'the Book of Jashar'. Its contents (perhaps consisting entirely of poetry) can only be guessed at, however, so this reference will not help us greatly in the attempt to find sources. Otherwise, it is certain that biographical material must have been available to the author: the court history of David, perhaps composed by Ahima-az (see on 2 Sa. 18:19–33), certainly figured among such documents. 1 Ch. 29:29 makes reference to records written by (or associated with?) Samuel, Nathan and Gad, and these three documents alone could well have covered the whole period under discussion in the books of Samuel. The story of David's years as a fugitive might have been written by Abiathar. In addition to documents, no doubt some unwritten traditions were available to the final author, but what use he made of them is impossible to tell.

The author was not a mere compiler, and at times he must have paraphrased or expanded what he found in his sources; references to his own day, and an explanatory verse like 1 Sa. 9:9, render this fact beyond dispute. Most commentators believe that 2 Sa. 7, in particular, was considerably expanded by the author; we might make a comparison with Jn. 3, where it is very difficult to distinguish our Lord's words from those of the Evangelist. High literary skill is evident many times over in the books of Samuel. These various facts explain a certain literary heterogeneity within 1 and 2 Samuel, and also make it impossible to arrive at a completely satisfactory source analysis of these books.

THE INSTITUTION OF THE MONARCHY

It is generally held among scholars that the section of 1 Samuel recounting the institution of the monarchy derives from two, if not three, different documentary sources. The one account (appearing in 1 Sa. 8; 10:17–27; 12) is bitterly hostile to the monarchy, whereas the other (in 1 Sa. 9; 10:1–16; and continuing in ch. 13) recounts the story objectively, even favourably, with no hint of disapproval. Ch. 11 is often held to come from a third source, but to have been interwoven with the second strand; and for practical purposes it needs no separate treatment.

It appears to be the difference in tone from one passage to another which proves to be the most cogent argument for this division. But other conflicting elements in the narrative are often mentioned as additional proof. In one strand, Samuel is a minor local seer, in the other a great national figure; in one strand, Saul is chosen king by lot in a tribal assembly, in the other he is privately anointed by Samuel. And no fewer than three place-names are associated with Saul's becoming king: Ramah (9:5, by implication), Mizpah (10:17) and Gilgal (11:15).

Once it has been decided that two divergent accounts have been conflated in 1 Sa. 8–12, the question arises which story is correct and original. The answer has usually been that the strand hostile to the monarchy is the unhistorical one. 'We have in this document', wrote A. R. S. Kennedy, 'the bitter reflections of a member of the Deuteronomic school, who regarded the defections and excesses of the monarchy as largely responsible for the sins of the people, and the consequent destruction of the state' (in his Century Bible commentary, p. 18). For Kennedy and many other scholars, the idea of a theocracy was late—exilic or post-exilic; and therefore passages in 1 Samuel in any way critical of the monarchy were dismissed as idealistic and quite unhistorical.

Among some recent scholars, however, there has been a tendency to view the 'hostile' passages as considerably earlier and more reliable than was thought by Kennedy, for instance. As J. Bright has insisted, a step as drastic as the institution of the monarchy undoubtedly 'evoked opposition from the beginning' (History of Israel, p. 167). The idea of Yahweh as 'king' of Israel was a very old one (cf. Ex. 15:18), and opposition to human royalty had been expressed by Gideon (Jdg. 8:23)—unless that passage too be viewed as late and unhistorical (as is often done). Besides, the very fact that Israel existed so long without a monarchy, in a world where kings were the norm, reveals that there must have been some basic inhibitions against such an institution. Moreover, the faults and excesses of human rulers were no secret in Israel's world (see on 1 Sa. 8:11–17).

Once it is allowed that the material in the 'hostile' strand can be equally early, it becomes not only possible but indeed necessary to try to account for the differences between the two strands. In the first place, it is nothing short of a mistake to argue that Samuel is a minor local visionary of no political importance in 1 Sa. 9 (see commentary); as Bright says, 'That he (Samuel) took a leading role in the proceedings is witnessed by all the strands of the narrative' (ibid).

At first glance, it appears a more serious problem that there should have been no fewer than three 'coronation' ceremonies, at three different places; but this again is not really so improbable as it may seem. To begin with, the sequence is entirely plausible. Samuel chooses and anoints his man privately, in the first place. He then calls together a national assembly, and presides over a 'tribal election', where, however, the casting of lots was a religious ceremony, and in which Samuel was perfectly sure that the divine guidance would give the same answer as to him privately. That some should stand aloof is not surprising; and it took some effective military action on Saul's part to bring all Israel behind him. It is eminently reasonable that Samuel should now arrange a fresh ceremony, as it were of ratification, after Saul's triumph over Ammon. The three centres, Ramah, Mizpah and Gilgal, were moreover three of the four sanctuary-cities where Samuel had special responsibilities (cf. 1 Sa. 7:16).

It is often forgotten, in this connection, that David too was made king on three separate occasions: privately in Bethlehem (1 Sa. 16:13), over Judah at Hebron (2 Sa. 2:4), and over all Israel at Hebron (2 Sa. 5:3). Passing over Solomon's reign, we may further observe that his successor Rehoboam had to go to Shechem to be made king (1 Ki. 12:1), and it is beyond doubt that he had already been anointed king in his capital, Jerusalem.

The important issue is the historical one, and if the historical problems can be resolved, then it is of little consequence whether the material of 1 Sa. 8–12 derives from one source or a number. It must freely be admitted that the writer of the books of Samuel drew on a variety of sources (see Appendix 1). Even so, it is not fully established that there are two distinct strands discernible in these particular chapters. It may be observed that the 'hostile' passages never once express hostility to Saul himself (despite his later rejection), but only to rebellious elders, who were sternly advised of the dangers inherent in a monarchy. Secondly, the differing standpoint of different sections of the narrative often seems to be due to the literary skill of the writer; on this point, see especially the commentary on 1 Sa. 9.

'SEER AND PROPHET' (1 Sa. 9:9)

1 Sa. 9:9 is an explanatory editorial addition, a sort of footnote. The word 'seer' was evidently the word in the literary source here utilized by the compiler and author of the books of Samuel; and, moreover, the word was very appropriate in this passage, because Samuel is being portrayed as fulfilling that particular function ('seeing' where the lost donkeys were). However, it is also clear that later readers might in some way misunderstand the term, and so the biblical writer explained it for his own generation, as a word formerly equivalent to the word 'prophet'. Up to this point in the narrative, the wider term 'man of God' had been used for Samuel; while it was not a phrase, being much less precise, which would create any misconceptions, it would not have been adequate in 9:9, since the author wished to lay a foundation for the subsequent use of the word 'seer' (vv. 11, 18ff.).

One is free to imagine that the word 'seer' had something of an unfortunate connotation by the 8th century BC, if Mi. 3:7 yields a clue. The real point of distinction may be that the seer was a man who worked on his own (as opposed to prophets, who moved in small communal groups, cf. 1 Sa. 10:5) in Samuel's era, but was one of a professional group at a later date. Alternatively, the term may have become restricted, by the time of Micah, to those who practised divination of a pagan kind ('seeing' fate in the stars or in animals' livers, etc.): astronomy, hepatoscopy, and other similar practices. Divination of this type was sternly denounced in Dt. 18:9–14; it is clear that it must have been common among the Canaanites.

Whatever the case, it may be said that the 'seer' had an important local role in the time of Saul; and that the term is not in the least derogatory either to Samuel or to David's seer, Gad (2 Sa. 24:11).

See discussions by B. D. Napier in IDB (art. 'Prophet, Prophetism') and by J. A. Motyer in NBD (art. 'Prophecy, Prophets').

Appendix 4
PROBLEMS OF 1 SAMUEL 17;18

A very important MS of the LXX, namely Codex Vaticanus (LXX^B), is remarkably shorter than is the Hebrew text in 1 Sa. 17; 18. Such material as it contains it shares with the longer narrative, but it does not have two large sections of these chapters, namely 17:12–31 and 17:55 – 18:5. (Other lesser omissions are 17:41, 50; 18:10, 11, 17–19, 30; with parts of some other verses.) Thus Codex Vaticanus says nothing of Jesse's sending David with provisions for his brothers at the battle-front; nor of David's response to Goliath's challenge, and how he was brought to Saul; nor of Saul's enquiry about David's father's identity; nor of David's subsequent appointment in Saul's army; nor of Saul's first attempt, with a spear, on David's life.

The intriguing fact about these omissions is that despite them LXX^B presents a perfectly intelligible and coherent story in itself; thus the question inevitably arises, which version is original, the longer or the shorter? The shorter narrative, it must be admitted, raises fewer problems than the longer one. Since nothing is said of Jesse's sending David from Bethlehem, nor about David's being brought before Saul, the impression is given in LXX^B that David was at Saul's side throughout; this fits in well with 16:21ff. Moreover, the shorter version conveys no suggestion that David and/or his father were unknown to Saul; this fits in well with 16:17–21. Thirdly, another 'duplicate account' is done away with, since only one story of Saul's throwing a spear at David is recounted (19:9f.).

Older scholars (such as A. R. S. Kennedy) were inclined to view the shorter version, contained in LXX^B, as original, since it presented fewer difficulties. A basic canon of textual criticism, however, is that the more 'difficult' reading is the more likely to be original, and a modern scholar (McKane) states bluntly that he finds 'no adequate grounds for departing from MT' (i.e. the longer, Hebrew, text). Since the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls, it has been observed that a Hebrew recension of the books of Samuel akin to the LXX translation evidently existed in the last century or two BC, and it is often held that there will have been more than one recension of the Hebrew text available to the LXX translators. Such a possibility only throws the problem back a stage, however; the original compiler or author of 1 Samuel must have written down one version or the other, and it is still a fair question to ask which was the original.

It remains a possibility that the shorter account originated as an abbreviation of the narrative, omitting passages which were not absolutely essential to it, and which were in essence duplicated elsewhere. That is not necessarily to say that the abbreviator felt the 'difficulties' of modern critics—although he may well have done —but simply that since it was stated elsewhere in 1 Samuel that David came to Saul's notice and his court, entered his service as his armour-bearer, and was later nearly killed by Saul's spear, these details needed no repetition. But it is in fact a mark of this biblical author's technique to emphasize certain facts by recounting two similar incidents; and this fact alone supports the originality of the longer text.

One significant omission of LXX^B may serve to show the probability that its shorter narrative is an abbreviation. It omits the passage about Saul's promising his elder daughter Merab to David and then marrying her to another man (18:17ff.). There is no difficulty about this passage (even if a few scholars, such as H. P. Smith in the ICC series, have found one, an ancient author or translator would scarcely have done so), but nevertheless it is a story very similar to that of Michal, who did in fact marry David but was later forcibly married to another man. The recounting of two such stories is characteristic of the original author; the omission of one of them looks like a characteristic of the man responsible for the shorter version of 1 Sa. 17 and 18.

For attempted solutions of the historical problems, see the commentary; and on the whole question of 'duplicate accounts', see the Introduction to the books of Samuel.

Appendix 5
THE ELHANAN PROBLEM (2 Sa. 21:19)

The statement of 2 Sa. 21:19 (as it stands in the Hebrew text, and in the RSV) that Elhanan killed Goliath is apparently in flat contradiction with 1 Sa. 17, where we read the well-known story of David's victory over Goliath. The verse in 2 Sa. 21 must also be set against its parallel in 1 Ch. 20:5; such a comparison indicates clearly that some textual corruption has taken place in the transmission of the verse in either Samuel or Chronicles or both.

It may be helpful to set out in English and Hebrew (in transliteration) the relevant parts of both texts:

2 Sa. 21:19 . . . and Elhanan the son of Jaare-oregim, the Bethlehemite, slew Goliath . . .

1 Ch. 20:5 . . . and Elhanan the son of Jair slew Lahmi the brother of Goliath . . .

2 Sa. 21:19 wayyaḵ 'elḥānān ben ya'rê 'ōrᵉgîm bēṯ hallaḥmî 'ēṯ golyāṯ

1 Ch. 20:5 wayyaḵ 'elḥānān ben yā'îr 'eṯ laḥmî 'āḥî golyāṯ

It is universally agreed that the second part of Elhanan's father's name, as it appears in 2 Samuel, is to be deleted as a scribal error (of dittography); it means 'weavers', and appears again in its rightful place at the end of the same verse. The name of Elhanan's father, then, was either ya'rê or yā'îr; of the two, the latter is much preferable, and is found elsewhere as a proper name (e.g. Nu. 32:41). The form ya'rê is most unlikely as a proper name; but a reasonably slight change would transform the word into yišay, i.e. Jesse.

The 'Bethlehemite' of Samuel would seem more probable than the 'Lahmi' of Chronicles. But it is not easy (on purely textual and linguistic grounds) to decide between the simple 'Goliath' of Samuel and the 'brother of Goliath' of Chronicles. It has often been argued, however, that the relatively unknown Elhanan in fact killed Goliath, that the writer of 1 Samuel 17 transferred the deed to his hero David, and that the Chronicler deliberately interpolated the word 'brother' in 1 Ch. 20:5 in order to harmonize the variant accounts. However, in view of the certain textual corruption in 2 Sa. 21:19, and the fact that the Hebrew word for 'brother' is so very similar to the reading of Samuel, such an assertion is by no means unavoidable. Three other possibilities exist:

1. That Elhanan killed Goliath, and that David killed an unnamed Philistine giant. The name 'Goliath' could be a late scribal addition in 1 Sa. 17 in both its occurrences (and also in 1 Sa. 21:9).

2. That David killed Goliath, and that Elhanan killed his brother. In this case, the Chronicles text may be viewed as correct in all respects, although it would make no difference if 'Bethlehemite' were preferred to 'Lahmi'.

3. That Elhanan and David were different names for the same person, just as Solomon bore another name, Jedidiah (cf. 2 Sa. 12:24f.), which appears only in this one verse in the Bible. In that case, the name of the father must of course be corrected to 'Jesse'. Slight support for this view may be drawn from the statement of 2 Sa. 21:22 that 'these four . . . fell by the hand of David and by the hand of his servants', since David had no personal hand in killing any one of the four Philistines here listed unless he was in fact Elhanan.

In view of the textual problems, it is at any rate a precarious argument to insist that 2 Sa. 21:19 contradicts 1 Sa. 17.

1 and 2 Kings

INTRODUCTION

The book of Kings—for it is one book, and not two—is a sequel to the book of Samuel. Indeed, in LXX, where the division into two books is first found, Kings is entitled 'Of the Kingdoms, 3' and 'Of the Kingdoms, 4', with the two divisions of Samuel being the first and second books of the Kingdoms. In the English Bible, 1 and 2 Kings are considered to be 'history', but in the Hebrew Bible Kings is the fourth of the Former Prophets (Joshua, Judges and Samuel being the first three). The relative position of the books in the two Canons, however, is the same, and the term 'history' in the English Canon must be thought of as 'holy history' or 'prophetic history' (i.e. history seen through the prophet's eyes). 1 and 2 Kings tell the history of the people of Yahweh—the prophetic history, let us keep in mind—from the last days of David (possibly c. 970 BC) to the closing days of Jehoiachin in the Exile, at a time somewhat after 562 BC but prior to the return from Exile in 538 BC.

AUTHOR

The author of the work is not named in Scripture. Jewish tradition (Mishna Baba Bathra 15a) attributes Kings to Jeremiah. Since Jeremiah was contemporary with Josiah and the remaining kings of Judah down to the fall of Jerusalem, this would be a very attractive theory. Further, it would account for the otherwise inexplicable absence of Jeremiah in the book of Kings (the Jeremiah of 2 Ki. 23:31; 24:18, father of Hamutal, obviously was not the prophet, who was not married, Je. 16:1). However, Jeremiah was taken to Egypt by the pro-Egypt party (Je. 43:6, 7), whereas the ending of 2 Kings shows remarkable familiarity with the events in Babylon. We therefore conclude that Kings was written by an unidentified prophet in Babylon probably c. 550 BC.

To speak of an 'author' is perhaps a bit misleading, for the work indicates a number of sources that were obviously written by other authors. Further, there is an extended portion (2 Ki. 19:9 – 20:19) that is very closely related with a portion of Isaiah (37:9 – 39:8), some parts with exact verbal agreement, and there are portions closely paralleling Jeremiah and Chronicles. Moreover, there are clear stylistic differences (as, e.g., in the Elijah and Elisha cycles) that suggest other sources which have not been named. But there seems to be no compelling reason to fragment the work into L, J, E, the Davidic court narrative, the Elijah cycle, the Elisha cycle, the Ahab source, the Isaiah source, prophetic sources for stories of Ahijah, Shemaiah et al., the pre-Deuteronomic editor, and finally the Deuteronomic author, as various scholars have done. Rather, we may assume that there were various accounts, both oral and written, including some rather stilted court records and some fine prophetic messages, that were used by the creative mind of the author under the influence of the Holy Spirit.

THE DEUTERONOMIST

The relationship between the religious point of view of Kings and that of Deuteronomy is obvious. The basic problem to be solved is whether the book of Deuteronomy was the product of the closing period of Judah, written to establish the single sanctuary at Jerusalem, as is commonly held by a great many scholars today, or whether the book of Deuteronomy, essentially from Moses' time and recovered in the days of Josiah, was responsible for the 'Deuteronomic' reforms and, indeed, for the 'Deuteronomist' himself. If Deuteronomy was the product of the Josianic period, or of any period from the fall of Samaria to the fall of Jerusalem, and if it was written to establish the primacy of the Jerusalem sanctuary, then we are forced to explain not only the complete absence of the name Jerusalem from the book of Deuteronomy, but also the detailed knowledge of the wilderness period, the wilderness Sitz-im-Leben, and the Deuteronomic point of view of Joshua, Judges and Samuel, The trend of scholarship, of course, has been to attribute all of these to the Deuteronomist.

It is our conviction, and that will be evident in the commentary, that Deuteronomy is essentially Mosaic (with later additions and probably considerable editing), that the influence of Deuteronomy continued, in greater or lesser degree, at least to the time of Solomon (hence its influence on David and Solomon in planning and completing the Jerusalem sanctuary), and that the Deuteronomic reforms of Josiah as well as the Deuteronomic viewpoint of the author of Kings resulted from the finding of Deuteronomy in the Temple in the days of Josiah.

PURPOSE

It seems clear that the author was trying to convey a message, not merely to write history. The message is Deuteronomic, as a reading of Dt. 7 or 9 or 11 (particularly 11:26–28), or many other portions will clearly indicate. The purpose, in a word, is to show that Israel—the total nation —as the people of Yahweh is expected to keep the law of Yahweh, particularly the purity of worship of Yahweh, and that there is blessing in so doing, and punishment for failure to keep His law.

Since the king stands in the place of the nation, the author has chosen to proclaim his message principally by telling the story of the kings. It is noteworthy that each king's reign is judged not on political grounds but on religious grounds alone: he 'did what was evil in the sight of Yahweh', or 'he did what was right in the eyes of Yahweh'. Perhaps the most striking example of this is Omri of Israel, by political measure one of the greatest of the kings of Israel, who is dismissed with eight verses and summarized in the statement, 'Omri did what was evil in the sight of Yahweh, and did more evil than all who were before him.'

METHOD

The author uses the chronological method to tell his story. Since there are two simultaneous lines of kings through much of the period (from the division of the kingdom to the fall of Samaria), he interweaves them, almost without exception telling the complete story of one king's reign, and then going back to pick up the story of his contemporary or contemporaries in the other kingdom. An exception to this method is found in the case of Ahab, where the story is broken by a large portion of the 'Elijah cycle'. Another exception is the reign of Jehoram (Joram) of Israel, which is interwoven with the Elisha story. Further complicating this situation is the fact that the name of the 'king of Israel' in the Elisha cycle is regularly omitted. A third exception is the account of Jehoash of Israel which is interrupted by the closing events of the Elisha story and by the introduction of the reign of Amaziah of Judah.

For the kings of Israel the author usually gives an introductory statement consisting of a. the date of accession, synchronizing it with the king of Judah; b. the name of the capital where he reigned; c. the length of the king's reign; and d. a brief summary of his character (see 1 Ki. 15:33f.). For the kings of Judah, the introductory statement consists of a. the date of accession, synchronizing it with the king of Israel (omitted after the fall of the northern kingdom); b. age at accession; c. name of the queen-mother (except for Jehoram and Ahaz); and d. summary of the king's relation to the law and comparison with 'David his father' (see 1 Ki. 15:1–5). Two are given unqualified approval (Hezekiah and Josiah), six modified approval (Asa, Jehoshaphat, Jehoash, Amaziah, Uzziah, Jotham), and ten are severely criticized. For the kings of Israel and the kings of Judah alike, the author uses summary formulae consisting of a. reference to the Book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Israel or Judah as appropriate; b. the king's death and place of burial; and c. the name of the successor (see 1 Ki. 15:7, 8). (The formula is omitted in the cases of kings who were deposed or assassinated.) The Book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Israel is mentioned 17 times, and the Book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Judah is mentioned 15 times. These are not to be confused with the biblical books of Chronicles.

CHRONOLOGY

Since the lengths of the reigns of the kings are given, it should be a simple matter to total these figures and get a check. Unfortunately this does not work. Rehoboam of Judah and Jeroboam of Israel became kings at the same time, and Ahaziah of Judah and Joram of Israel died at the same time, but the total of the years in Judah is 95 and in Israel 98. Again, Athaliah of Judah and Jehu of Israel began to reign at the same time, while the fall of Samaria (Israel) is given as occurring in the 6th year of Hezekiah of Judah. The total for the northern kingdom during this period is 143 years, and for Judah 165 years. Obviously there are problems to be solved. If we introduce extra-biblical material, such as the dates of Egyptian pharaohs or Assyrian kings, we find the problems further complicated.

Part of the difficulty lies in the system of counting the length of a reign, for in some cases the accession year was not counted and the count begins with the next New Year, while in other cases the accession year was counted—and this is not indicated in the text. Further, there are a number of co-regencies, or periods during which the successor reigned simultaneously with the incumbent, and in some cases the length of a king's reign includes the years he ruled as co-regent—again the text does not indicate this, although the synchronism sometimes makes it obvious. When these difficulties are worked out, there remain a few problems that have not been solved, such as the 12/13-year discrepancy in the time of Jotham–Ahaz–Hezekiah of Judah and Pekah–Hoshea of Israel (Thiele's 'Pattern Twelve-thirteen'). NBD approaches this problem as a continuation of the system of co-regencies.

Biblical data will give us relative and synchronistic dating only. Astronomical observations and Assyrian limmu-lists, along with other data, enable us to attach calendar dates to certain events. The battle of Qarqar is thus firmly dated at 853 BC, and accordingly the death of Ahab of Israel. Likewise the accession of Jehu is firmly dated at 841 BC. A Babylonian tablet enables us to set the exact date of the capture of Jerusalem, 15/16 March 597 BC. From the fixed dates we work backward and forward, using the biblical data, to establish all other dates from the death of Solomon to the fall of Jerusalem in 587/6.

TEXT

A comparison of the MT with LXX and Vulg. will show that the text of Kings has been subject to some editorial alteration and dislocation. The text of LXX is often shorter, and the Lucianic recension of the Greek would appear to be more reliable in places. The Qumran text of Kings, although fragmentary, indicates that there was a Hebrew text that stood closer to LXX than does MT. This is further evidence that we must not blindly follow the present Hebrew text (= MT), but rather should make careful critical use of all existing evidence in order to try to get back to the original Hebrew text.

COMMENTARY

1:1 – 2:46 THE LAST DAYS OF DAVID AND THE ACCESSION OF SOLOMON

1:1–53 The struggle for succession

This seems to be a continuation of 2 Sa. 20:22, but after an interval of some years. We are not necessarily to suppose that these events took place in a short time just prior to David's death.

1:1–4 David's old age. 3 Shunammite, a person from Shunem (cf. 2 Ki. 4:8), a village in the plain of Jezreel (probably mod. Solem), not far from Nazareth. 4 The king knew her not in a marital relationship; there is no reason to assume that this was a test of the king's virility to determine whether he was any longer fit to be king. She was brought in as a nurse, but the request of Adonijah (2:17) and Solomon's reaction (2:23) suggest that Abishag was considered to be David's concubine.

1:5–10 Adonijah is proclaimed king. Adonijah, David's oldest living son (cf. 2 Sa. 3:2–4), is accepted as the heir by Joab and Abiathar and decides to take the throne. 5 Horsemen, perhaps 'horses'; mounted cavalry did not come into Israel until later. 6 Displeased: LXX 'punished' may make better sense. RSV changes AV 'bare him' to passive, was born, an inferior emendation. AV also adds 'his mother', necessary for the sense. 8 Shimei, and Rei: possibly 'Shimei the friend' following Josephus, since each of the other persons in the verse has a descriptive title. 9 Sacrificed. The word means 'to slaughter', usually for sacrificial purposes. En-rogel is the present Bir 'Ayyub near the village of Silwan. 10 He did not invite . . . : failure to invite Nathan and Benaiah, and particularly Solomon, may indicate that Adonijah was planning to exterminate them, since if he had invited them to a meal he would have been committed to preserve their lives.

1:11–14 Nathan's plot on behalf of Solomon. 11 Has become king does not accurately portray the situation; Adonijah had started the process, but he had not yet been crowned king. 12 Nathan's advice indicates clearly that Adonijah would have put both Solomon and his mother Bathsheba to death. 13 The words are in polite address. 14 Confirm; lit. 'I shall fill out your words'. There is no record that David made such a promise to Bathsheba, but there is no reason to suppose that Nathan has fabricated this from nothing.

1:15–21 Bathsheba before David. 15 An indication of the type of service Abishag was rendering to David is perhaps given by the fact that she was not dismissed from the room when Bathsheba entered. 16 What do you desire? Lit. 'What is with you?' 18 Adonijah is king: cf. v. 11, and note v. 20. 21 Offenders; lit. 'those who have missed the mark'; it often means 'sinners'. There can be little doubt that Adonijah, once he assumed the throne, would find some sufficient reason to put Solomon and Bathsheba to death.

1:22–27 Nathan before David. 24 Nathan refers to Adonijah's plot as though it were the result of David's promise. The criticism is not that David had no right to do this, but that he had brought reproach upon Nathan, Zadok and Benaiah. 25 Joab the commander of the army, based on LXX, probably the correct reading (cf. AV).

1:28–31 David vows to make Solomon king. 31 May my lord King David live for ever! The customary greeting to an oriental king.

1:32–37 David acts. He does not plan for the preliminary steps alone, but for the actual anointing and crowning of Solomon as king. This will, of course, anticipate Adonijah's coronation and put Adonijah in the position of having to overthrow the king if he wishes to press his claim. 33 Gihon: the present 'Ain Umm ed-Daraj in the upper part of the Kidron valley, the waters of which were later carried by Hezekiah's tunnel to the pool of Siloam (2 Ch. 32:30). Mounting Solomon on David's own mule probably symbolized the kingly claim.

1:38–40 Solomon is anointed as king. 38 Cherethites . . . Pelethites, probably Cretans and Philistines, the use of foreign mercenaries being one means of circumventing plots to assassinate the king (see also on 2 Sa. 8:18). 39 The horn of oil: a specific horn of olive oil used for anointing the king. Tent: the portable covering where the ark was kept, not necessarily the Tabernacle constructed in the wilderness several centuries earlier. 40 Playing on pipes: LXX 'danced with dances', which may be more reasonable. The earth was split by their noise: a figure of speech not to be pressed literally.

1:41–48 Adonijah is outmanoeuvred and his plot collapses. 41 The city; rather 'the citadel', or walled fortress of the city. 42 A worthy man. The term suggests a man of wealth, not one living on the king. 47 Congratulate (AV 'bless'); this was not merely a human congratulation but an invocation of divine blessing. 48 One of my offspring, based on LXX. The beginning of a dynasty was a new experience for Israel. Saul and David were 'charismatic' rulers. This is the first time a king's son has ascended the throne of Israel.

1:49–53 Solomon spares Adonijah. 50 Taking hold of the horns of the altar was to stay the hand of the avenger (cf. Ex. 21:14). 51 The altar was perhaps near the tent (v. 39). 52 If . . . a worthy man: Montgomery translates, 'If he behaves like a gentleman.' Solomon recognizes that Adonijah has taken refuge at the horns of the altar and therefore spares his life, but at the same time he obligates Adonijah to refrain from any further attempt upon the throne. 53 Go to your house: possibly house-arrest; at any rate it is retirement from public life.

2:1–12 David's final, twofold charge and death

2:1–4 The charge concerning Solomon. This may have occupied a number of years (cf. 1 Ch. 22:6 – 29:25). The passage has been described as 'Deuteronomic' and inserted by a later editor, but the king was responsible to know and to transmit the material in Deuteronomy (Dt. 17:18f.; cf. Jos. 1:1–9). See Introduction.

2:5–9 The charge concerning David's enemies. It has been suggested that these are not David's instructions, but decisions made by Solomon and ascribed to David. For the murder of Abner, cf. 2 Sa. 3:27 and for Amasa, 2 Sa. 20:8–10. Joab had murdered the two generals in a time of peace. Keil suggests that in each case David was unable to punish Joab, and therefore transmitted to Solomon the responsibility. 5 My loins, my feet: cf. RSV mg., Heb. 'his'. 6 Wisdom: here, practical intelligence, knowledge of the facts and discrimination in the use of them. In peace: Gray renders 'unscathed'. 7 Deal loyally (Heb. ḥeseḏ): action required by the terms of a covenant. With such loyalty they met me (Heb. 'thus they approached me'). Cf. 2 Sa. 17:27ff.; 19:32ff. 8 For the curse of Shimei, cf. 2 Sa. 16:5ff.; 19:16ff. The curse was thought to be still powerful and therefore had to be turned away. Cursing a ruler was a capital offence (Ex. 22:28).

2:10–12 David's death. 10 Slept with his fathers: a euphemism for 'died'. The city of David; i.e. Mt. Zion (cf. Acts 2:29). On the length of David's reign, generally dated 1010–971 BC, cf. 2 Sa. 5:4f. 12 This is an inclusive statement of what follows, more fully expanded in 1 Ch. 29:23–25. According to one Greek MS Solomon was 12 years old at the time of his accession; according to Josephus (Ant. viii.7.8) he was 14. Rehoboam was born about the time Solomon became king (14:21).

2:13–46 Solomon's purge

2:13–27 Adonijah asks for Abishag. Adonijah goes to Bathsheba and asks her to get Solomon to give him David's nurse Abishag. Solomon understands the request to be a claim on the throne (see on 2 Sa. 3:6–11), for according to the custom of the day, the appropriation of the royal harem was the right of the new king (cf. 2 Sa. 16:21f.). He therefore orders the execution of Adonijah. 15 Adonijah felt he had a legitimate claim to the throne. 19 The queen mother is seated at the right hand of the king, the place of honour and authority. 22 On his side are Abiathar . . . and Joab: RSV follows the versions. Abiathar was banished, since as a priest he was sacrosanct. 26 Anathoth (mod. Anata), about 3 miles NE of Jerusalem (cf. Je. 1:1).

2:28–35 The death of Joab. Apparently thinking not of the murders, but that he had supported Adonijah, Joab flees to the place of refuge. However, there is no sanctuary for a murderer, which Solomon judged Joab to be. 34 Buried in his own house: possibly buried under the floor of the house, although the land around it would also be called 'house'. Wilderness: 'steppe', low-quality grazing land in E Judea, usually too stony for cultivation. 35 Benaiah is given Joab's place and Zadok is made priest. The Qumran community of the Dead Sea Scrolls claimed to be the true descendants of Zadok. The priesthood was supposed to be hereditary and not subject to political appointment; Solomon, therefore, has introduced a principle of grave consequence.

2:36–46 Shimei's palace-arrest and death. Shimei, while not crossing the Kidron, violates the command not to go out of Jerusalem to any place whatever (v. 36). Solomon uses this as a reason to carry out David's command (1 Ki. 2:9; contrast 2 Sa. 19:23). 39 Gath: Gray identifies it as Libnah, 30 miles SW of Jerusalem. 45 King Solomon shall be blessed: the direct action to invalidate the curse of 2 Sa. 16 (cf. J. Gray, art. 'Blessing and Curse', HDB, rev. 1963, pp. 109f.). 46 The second part of the verse summarizes the preceding chapter, but is taken by some to be the introduction to the next section.

3:1 – 11:43 THE REIGN OF SOLOMON

Solomon's reign can be evaluated politically and spiritually. Politically, it is splendid. Spiritually, it deteriorates into idolatry. For some strange reason, Christian literature has idealized Solomon so that he hardly resembles the scriptural portrait.

3:1 – 4:34 Solomon's wisdom and splendour

3:1 Solomon's marriage-alliance. This section would seem to be without chronological intent. He took Pharaoh's daughter; i.e. 'he married'. The identity of this Pharaoh is not known; it probably was not Shishak (14:25) but one of the kings of the weak XXIst Dynasty. The marriage was obviously a political arrangement and according to 9:16 the dowry was Gezer (possibly to be amended to read Gerar). In LXX v. 1 is joined with 9:16, and both are placed after 4:34 (MT 5:14).

3:2–4 Worship at the high places. The 'high place' was a shrine in use in Canaan before the Israelites came into the land. Later the high places were used by the Israelites, often with opposition from the prophets. It is not necessary to suppose that v. 2 is an apology on the part of a later editor, who was excusing the people since there was no House of Yahweh in Jerusalem; it is entirely possible to assume that the author here at the beginning of the story is pointing out some of the weaknesses of Solomon's reign. On the other hand, we must recognize that the Lord always dealt with His people in the situation in which they were at the time, seeking to lead them on to something better. God was willing to meet the king in the great high place at Gibeon (v. 5), even though in another few generations the high places would become abominable; but then so would the sacrificial acts performed in accordance with the letter of the law of Moses but in violation of its spirit. 4 According to 2 Ch. 1:1–13 the sacrifice at Gibeon was an inaugural religious ceremony in lieu of the coronation (cf. 1 Ki. 1:39; 1 Ch. 29:22). Zadok was apparently priest of Gibeon (1 Ch. 16:39) and there may have been an Aaronite priesthood there from the time of Joshua (Jos. 9). This would explain why the Tabernacle and the brazen altar (2 Ch. 1:3, 5) were brought there, probably from Shiloh. Keil says the high places were consecrated to the worship of Yahweh and were essentially different from the high places of the Canaanites, which were consecrated to Baal, but this would be difficult to prove. Gibeon (mod. El-Jib), located 6 miles NW of Jerusalem. Solomon used to offer.

The Hebrew imperfect could mean that this was a regular act of Solomon, or it could indicate the total of Solomon's offerings on all of the occasions when he went to Gibeon. A thousand burnt offerings: not necessarily to be taken as a mathematical count, but possibly a figure of speech meaning a very large or very important offering.

3:5–15 Solomon's dream and Yahweh's reply. 6 Steadfast love (Heb. ḥesed, 'covenant love'). Both David and God had kept the covenant. 7 A little child. Not to be taken literally (as in the tradition that Solomon was only 12 or 14); it is an oriental figure of speech expressing humility: cf. the words following. I do not know how to go out or come in. A figure of speech indicating lack of experience in his new office (cf. Nu. 27:17). 9 Mind (AV 'heart'): the Hebrew word for 'heart' is perhaps closer to our word for 'mind'. It includes the emotions and the will and judgment to discern between good and evil. 11 Life: Hebrew nepeš is usually translated 'soul', but is closer to 'person' or 'life'. Understanding to discern what is right: lit. 'discernment to hear judgment' (Heb. mišpāṭ), which has the meaning not only of 'decision', but also the divine principles on which the decision is made. 15 If the ark had not yet been brought to Jerusalem, this verse has to be accepted as a later addition; or if this verse is to be taken at face value, it would indicate that the entire paragraph is in the nature of a summary before the story of Solomon is told in detail and includes the later period of his life after the ark had been taken to Jerusalem. The account in Chronicles omits this portion.

3:16–28 The two harlots and Solomon's decision. The wisdom which God had given Solomon is now described in a typical case. It is wisdom in the practical sense, but is nevertheless ascribed to God (v. 28). 16 Note the right of access on the part of common members of the kingdom to the king's presence. 22 This verse shows, as does the entire story, intimate details of the argument before the king. 26 Heart (AV 'bowels', Heb. could mean 'womb'). According to Hebrew psychology strong emotional feelings were located in the abdominal area. In our popular psychology we locate them in the heart. 28 Render justice (AV 'do judgment'). Again Heb. mišpāṭ is used, here specifically of the decision which resulted from the application of divinely-given wisdom.

4:1–6 Solomon's organizational ability. 2 High officials: better than AV 'princes'. 3 Secretaries (AV 'scribes'): in other references there is only one scribe or secretary. Montgomery translates 'Azariah the son of Zadok the priest (was) over the year, and Ahijah the son of Shisha, the secretary', reading Elihoreph as 'over the year'. But ḥōrep̄ regularly means 'autumn', and nowhere in Hebrew means 'year'. The suggestion, however, is worthy of serious consideration. 4 Abiathar, a reading very much suspect, since Abiathar had been demoted from the priesthood at the outset of Solomon's reign (2:35). 5 Priest and king's friend: probably better 'Zabud, son of Nathan, a priest, was the king's friend', a title used in the Tell el-Amarna letters of a regular petty-official, the duties of which we do not know. Hushai was 'the king's friend' in David's time (2 Sa. 15:37). However, Keil takes 'priest' to be equivalent to 'friend of the king', or 'privy councillor'. Nathan, probably the son of David mentioned in 2 Sa. 5:14, not the prophet. 6 In charge of the palace: AV 'over the household' is closer to the Hebrew. Forced labour (AV 'tribute'): the Hebrew word indicates the corvée which, strictly speaking, was forced labour. Adoniram; see on 2 Sa. 20:24 and cf. 1 Ki. 12:18.

4:7–19 Solomon's administrative districts. These districts probably followed the old tribal boundaries, and the officials are of high rank, two of them sons-in-law of Solomon (vv. 11, 15). 7 Officers: Heb. 'those appointed'. 8ff. Ben-hur, Ben-deker, Ben-hesed, etc. AV is correct in treating these as patronymics, the son of Hur, the son of Deker, etc., the proper names having been lost. Montgomery suggests that the original copy in the royal archives had the names in tabular form and that the edge of the document was damaged, which would account for the fact that in several cases the name is missing and only the son of remains. 16 Bealoth (AV 'in Aloth'), possibly 'Maaloth', with LXX. 19 Of Judah: not in the Hebrew text, but certainly correct.

4:20–28 Solomon's wisdom summarized. The author, in no apparent order, shows that Solomon's wisdom exceeds all known human wisdom. In LXX the order of verses is different. 21 (The beginning of ch. 5 in MT.) According to this verse, the extent of Solomon's kingdom was as great as the promise made to Abraham (cf. Gn. 13:14–17; 15:18); but Solomon lost control of Edom (11:22, LXX), and Rezon of Syria took over Damascus (11:24f.). 24 The region west of the Euphrates (AV 'on this side the river', Heb. simply 'in all the trans-river (trans-Euphrates) area'). It is not necessary to assume that the author lived E of the Euphrates to use such an expression; it was the standard term for the region, just as Transjordan was for a long period of time. According to Gray, the term Trans-Euphrates came into use first in the Assyrian records in the middle of the 7th century, which is three centuries later than this record. Tiphsah, later Thapsacus, an important crossing of the Euphrates river (mod. Qal'at Dibs). 25 Every man under his vine and under his fig tree: the idyllic conditions which the common man desired. From Dan to Beer-sheba: the traditional limits of Palestine (cf. Jdg. 20:1; 1 Sa. 3:20). 26 Stalls of horses: the meaning is indicated in 2 Ch. 32:28 and supported now by Akkadian, Aramaic, and Arabic cognates. Horsemen generally refers to mounted cavalry, only coming into use in Assyria at this time. Possibly the term was more general at this earlier date. Solomon's trust in horses is hinted at here. We know from other passages that he went in for horse trading. 27 The estimate has been made that 4,000–5,000 persons were cared for at Solomon's court. 28 Swift steeds (AV 'dromedaries'): RSV is clearly to be preferred.

4:29–34 Solomon's wisdom. Some scholars find evidence that this section is late, although possibly preserving an early tradition. But the type of wisdom ascribed to Solomon is nature-wisdom, and is of the kind found in Mesopotamia and Egypt at least a century before Solomon, and possibly as much as 2,000 years before Solomon (cf. Ptahhotep). 29 Largeness of mind (AV 'largeness of heart', CB 'breadth of mind'). The statement probably refers to Solomon's broad interests. 30 The people of the east (lit. 'the sons of the east'), a term generally applied to the Arabian and Edomite tribes SE of Palestine, the traditional home of wisdom (cf. Jb. 1:3). The word translated east, however, can also mean 'former time'. 31 Ethan . . . Heman, Calcol, and Darda: persons no longer known to us, but obviously connected with some tradition of wisdom. 32 Proverbs; i.e. figures of speech setting forth a truth in the form of simile or metaphor. Many of Solomon's proverbs have been preserved in the book of Proverbs. His songs have probably not been preserved, although some of them may be found in the Song of Solomon. 33 The reference to trees, beasts, birds, reptiles, and fish probably indicates the use of them in connection with his proverbs (see Pr. 30:25f. and cf. Jdg. 9:8–15).

5:1 – 7:51 The erection of the Temple

Cf. 2 Ch. 2:1 – 5:1; Josephus, Ant. viii.2.6–9. Solomon accomplishes what David dreamt about: to build a house for Yahweh. He draws on the skill and craft of the Tyrians (Phoenicians), the slave-labour of conquered peoples, and enforced labour of Israelites. He mortgages part of his kingdom. At last, he has a splendid Temple—and probably an even more splendid palace. But was it right? We assume that it was; yet God has been able to get along without a temple since AD 70, and even while it was standing Jesus indicated that it was unnecessary for true worship (Jn. 4:21–24). Moreover, it became a tempting attraction for foreign plunderers. But when we have admitted this much, we must add that God was pleased to use it, as He used the sacrificial system, until the 'better things' had come. This passage contains a number of unusual technical words as well as a number of textual corruptions, and should be studied in the light of a good, detailed commentary and dictionary articles on the Temple and its furnishings.

5:1–12 Solomon gets Hiram of Tyre to help. Cf. 2 Ch. 2:1–16. 1 5:15 in MT. Hiram: short form of 'Ahiram'. In Chronicles the form 'Huram' is found. Tyre: an important city-state on the coast in the north of Palestine that was coming into supremacy over the other Phoenician city-states. Hiram always loved David (AV 'ever a lover of David'); 'friend' would be a better translation (cf. Est. 5:10; Ps. 38:11; Je. 20:4; etc.). 3 With this reason given why David did not built the Temple, cf. 2 Sa. 7:12ff. and 1 Ch. 22:8ff.; 28:2ff. 4 Adversary (Heb. śāṭān): originally a common noun which later became the name for 'the Adversary' (cf. Nu. 22:22; 1 Sa. 29:4; etc.). 6 Sidonians: probably broader than 'the people of Sidon', and meaning those of the Phoenician city-states in general. 9 Rafts. The place where they were to be broken up is identified in 2 Ch. 2:16 as Jaffa, but the excavations of Maisler (Mazar) at Tell Qasileh at the mouth of the Yarkon river just N of Jaffa indicate that that may have been the place. 11 Cors of wheat: the 'cor' was a little less than 6 bushels. Twenty thousand cors of beaten oil: LXX reads 'twenty cors'. As a liquid measure the cor was something more than 50 gallons (US), or 48 gallons (British). Beaten oil is oil crushed with a pestle in a mortar, as distinguished from that which was crushed by a heavy roller in a press. 12 Treaty (AV 'league', Heb. 'covenant'): a solemn religious ritual.

5:13–18 The corvée in Israel. Cf. 1 Ki. 9:15, 20ff.; 2 Ch. 2:2, 17f.). The corvée, or levy of forced labour, was a type of taxation in the ancient world and had been begun in Israel by David (2 Sa. 20:24). It would seem that Solomon made the Canaanites permanent slave-labourers (cf. 9:20f.), whereas the Israelites were required to give 4 months out of the year in work (5:13f.; 2 Sa. 24:9). It is unnecessary to attempt to make Solomon a humanitarian. 14 In relays makes more sense than 'by courses' (AV); the Hebrew word suggests 'replacement'. 16 Three thousand three hundred chief officers indicates a ratio of about one officer to 15 men; 9:23 suggests 550 officers. 17 With dressed stones, i.e. stones cut so as to fit with each other in the building, so-called 'margin-drafted masonry', a feature of the Phoenician stone-masons' work. 18 The men of Gebal (AV 'the stonesquarers'): the Hebrew is quite difficult; it seems to read 'the Gebalites, the people of Byblos', but the Greek translator did not understand it this way.

6:1–10 The building of the Temple. Cf. 2 Ch. 3:1–14; Josephus, Ant. viii.3.1–3. The Temple was not intended to house a congregation, neither was it a private chapel for the king. It was built to house the ark and to symbolize the presence of Yahweh. Many scholars have worked over the details, and there are still many points of disagreement and uncertainty. In addition, there are many differences between LXX and MT.

1 Four hundred and eightieth year. This would put the Exodus about 1447 BC, which is not in keeping with other evidence, either biblical or extra-biblical. There are indications that this verse may be a late gloss in the text. It is inserted two verses earlier in LXX, and reads '440' instead of '480'. A different word for month is used from that found in the rest of the chapter, and the month of Ziv was the second month of the later Babylonian calendar, but the eighth month of the pre-exilic calendar. LXX omits in the month of Ziv. 2 The height and breadth of the Temple are exactly twice those of the Tabernacle. Cubit, normally 6 handbreadths, or 18 inches. According to 2 Ch. 3:3, these were the larger cubits of 7 handbreadths or about 21 inches. (See NBD, art. 'Weights and Measures', II. b and e.) In either event, the Temple was not a large building, being 90 ft to 100 ft long and 30 ft to 35 ft wide, interior dimensions. 3 The vestibule in front of the nave (AV 'porch before the temple'): it is difficult to determine exactly what is meant. The nave of the house (Heb. 'the temple of the house'): possibly 'the main hall of the house'. 4 Windows with recessed frames (AV 'windows of narrow lights'): Gray reads 'windows of close lattice-work'. 5 A structure against the wall of the house (AV 'chambers'): Gray suggests a platform around the nave and storeys. 6 The three storeys, each of which is wider than the one below it, suggest some kind of buttressing of the outer walls, with the use of the space above the stages or levels of the buttress. The total amount of rebatement of the wall is 3 cubits (c. 4½ ft), which may suggest the thickness of the wall at the bottom. 8 The lowest story (Heb. and AV 'middle story'); RSV is based on LXX and Targ. South side: the word for 'south' literally means 'right' (cf. AV), and the direction would be determined by the way a person is standing. By stairs (AV 'with winding stairs'): the Hebrew word is not found elsewhere in the OT; LXX and Vulg. 'spiral staircase'. A spiral staircase was found in an 18th-century palace excavated by Woolley at Tell Atchana. In later Hebrew the word means 'trapdoors'. 10 RSV adds each story, which makes better sense than 'the entire house was five cubits high'.

6:11–13 Yahweh's word concerning the Temple. Yahweh is more concerned with Solomon's 'walk'—his way of living—than with the details of the Temple. This section is not found in Chronicles. Some scholars think that it is a late insertion in Kings, too late to find a place in LXX.

6:14–22 The interior of the Temple. The passage is difficult, with repetition and little continuity. Montgomery thinks that there are two threads of the story. 15 From the floor of the house to the rafters of the ceiling follows LXX. 16 Twenty cubits of the rear of the house (AV 'on the sides of the house'); Gray, however, reads 'the innermost part of the shrine'. Again, from the floor to the rafters follows LXX. AV 'even for the oracle' is based on a misunderstanding of Hebrew d'ḇîr, 'sanctuary, Holy of Holies'. 17 The nave in front of the inner sanctuary. The word usually translated 'temple' seems to mean here, as in v. 3, the interior portion in front of the Holy of Holies. 18 In the form of gourds (AV 'with knops', Gray 'relief work'). This verse is omitted in LXX. 19 The inner sanctuary: see v. 16. The innermost part of the house; AV 'the house within' is better. 20 seems to belong with v. 17. The Hebrew makes little sense and RSV the inner sanctuary, based on Vulg., seems more likely. Since the Holy of Holies was a cube (30 ft each way), the assumption is often made that its floor was raised above the level of the floor of the main room before it. There is no statement to this effect, however. The height of the nave according to v. 2 was 30 cubits (45 ft). The last part of the verse contains two words that cannot be precisely defined; it may possibly mean 'he gilded it' [the holy place] with pure gold and 'he gilded an altar of cedar'; 21 similarly, 'Solomon gilded the inside of the house with pure gold'. The gilding could have been with liquid gold, but this is not proven. Chains of gold: the meaning is uncertain; Gray suggests 'the screen'. 22 is either repetitious, or perhaps a summary. The Hebrew reads literally, 'he gilded with gold until completion all the house, and all the altar which belongs to the Holy Place he gilded with gold'.

6:23–28 The cherubim. These cherubim are not to be confused with the cherubim of the mercy seat (Ex. 25:18–20). According to 2 Ch. 3:10–13 the cherubim were at the rear wall facing toward the curtain. Gray suggests that they may have stood diagonally at the inner corners facing out; but cf. v. 27. 23 It seems that v. 26 should be placed between the first and second parts of this verse. 26 The cherubim were 10 cubits (15 ft) high—in other words, half the height of the Holy of Holies—and the outstretched wings of the two cherubim spread from wall to wall and touched at the centre.

6:29–36 The interior walls, floor and entrance. 29 In the inner and outer rooms: the meaning is not certain. The Hebrew seems to say 'from the inside to the out', which would be more in agreement with AV 'within and without'. Open flowers: omitted in LXX; if it belongs here, the suggestion has been made that it might refer to garlands of flowers. 30 The floor of the house. Objection has been taken to the statement that the floor was covered with gold, but however unlikely it may seem, the Hebrew says clearly 'the floor of the house he gilded with gold within and without'. The latter part of the verse is even more difficult. RSV avoids the problem by reading in the inner and outer rooms. 31 The entrance to the Holy of Holies was fitted with doors of olivewood, lit. 'one of oil'. The second part of the sentence is incomprehensible: the lintel and the doorposts formed a pentagon (AV 'were a fifth part of the wall', MT 'a fifth'). It would appear that there was a curtain (2 Ch. 3:14) and the chains or screen (v. 21) as well as the door panels. 33 The entrance to the nave, or the room in front of the sanctuary, likewise was made of olivewood. In the form of a square: lit. 'from a fourth'. The two leaves of the one door were folding: the word means 'rolling', possibly on hinges, but more likely on some support that rolled on the floor to keep the doors from warping. If so, we are probably not to think of two folding-doors of two panels each, but of two large doors with two smaller doors inserted in them, or even two pairs of doors, an outer and an inner. 35 The doors likewise were gilded with gold evenly applied, whatever this may mean. The word translated evenly applied basically means 'made straight or even'. The suggestion has been made that the gold was inlaid, in other words, made even with the surface of the carved wood. Hezekiah cut off the gold to pay tribute to Sennacherib (2 Ki. 18:16). 36 Three courses of hewn stone and one course of cedar beams: probably to be understood, as Montgomery suggests, as the use of timbered masonry, which is used throughout the Middle East as protection against earthquake, the wooden beams serving to tie together the courses of masonry and to allow a bit of flexibility in the walls.

6:37 - 7:1 Summary of the time in building. 37 Month: the older word is used here, as it is the first time in v. 38. The second time a later word is used. Some scholars therefore feel that there has been an addition to v. 38. 38 In all its parts, and according to all its specifications: lit. 'in all its words and all its sentences', a graphic figure of speech. 7:1 House: probably referring to the entire complex of buildings to be described, occupying 13 years of building.

7:2–12 The House of the Forest of Lebanon and the other buildings. This section is not in 2 Chronicles. We must think of a large complex of buildings. To the N was the Temple and its court; S of the Temple, the royal palace and its court; behind it, the House of Pharaoh's daughter. S of the palace was the Hall of Pillars and the throne room, and farther S the House of the Forest of Lebanon. The whole area was enclosed within a great court surrounded by a wall of hewn stones and cedar beams.

2 The House of the Forest of Lebanon was obviously larger than the Temple (150 ft × 75 ft × 45 ft compared with 90 ft × 30 ft × 45 ft). It was built upon three rows of cedar pillars (Heb. 'four'); RSV follows LXX. 3 Above the chambers that were upon the forty-five pillars: it is not clear whether the Hebrew says 'forty-five pillars' or 'forty-five chambers'. 4 suggests that there may have been three rows of chambers. Window frames: possibly latticed, cf. 6:4. 5 Windows (Heb. 'posts'): possibly 'lintel'. 6 The Hall of Pillars. It is not clear just what is implied here; one suggestion is a vestibule portico. Canopy (AV 'thick beam'): possibly a cornice or some projection. 7 From floor to rafters: Heb. 'from floor to floor' makes little sense; AV reads 'from one side of the floor to the other'. The Hall apparently served for administering justice to those who came to the king in person. 8 His own house: mentioned only in passing. In the other court back of the hall: perhaps a parenthesis; Gray reads 'and his own house, where he was to dwell, the second court, was within the portico'. The hall for Pharaoh's daughter is mentioned but not further described. 9 Stones . . . sawed with saws: Palestinian limestone when first quarried is quite soft and hardens with exposure. From the court of the house of the Lord is reconstructed on the basis of v. 12; Heb. 'from the outside' makes little sense. 10 Stones of eight and ten cubits, probably referring to the length, 12 ft to 15 ft. Such huge stones are found from Herodian times in Jerusalem; I have also seen them at Taht-i-Suleiman, N of Pasargade, Iran. It is interesting that Solomon's name is connected with them, although they obviously were in a construction of a much later date. 12 Cf. 6:36.

7:13–47 The work of Hiram. Cf. 2 Ki. 25:13ff.; 2 Ch. 4:11–18. We do no wrong if we admit that the Israelites were not skilled craftsmen. To get the workmanship he wants Solomon engages Hiram of Tyre (not the king, but a craftsman of the same name).

7:13, 14 The description of Hiram. 13 Hiram: in 2 Ch. 2:12, 13 and 4:16 he is called 'Huram-abi', the son of a Tyrian father and Israelite mother. 14 Of the tribe of Naphtali: 2 Ch. 2:14 says 'Dan', which was just beside Naphtali. Wisdom, understanding, and skill: the last word is literally 'knowledge', but all three have a practical connotation applying to the craft of Hiram. Bronze (AV 'brass'): Heb. can mean either 'copper' or 'bronze', but brass had not yet been invented.

7:15–22 The bronze pillars. 15 RSV has drawn on LXX and Je. 52:21; Heb. 'he fashioned two columns of copper, eighteen cubits the height of the one column and a line of twelve cubits going around the second column'. AV is closer to the Hebrew but has still taken liberties in translating. The meaning of RSV is clear enough: each column was 27 ft high, 18 ft in circumference (about 6 ft in diameter), and the thickness of the metal was 3 in., the centre being hollow. The columns would be quite thick for their height, and would not have the gracefulness of Greek columns. In 2 Ch. 3:15 they are described as 35 cubits high, which seems clearly to be erroneous. The casting of them was an art in itself, possibly the 'lost wax' method (see LaSor, Daily Life in Bible Times, 1966, p. 96). The columns seem to have been free-standing, serving as ornamentation rather than support. The use of free-standing columns in front of the Temple is attested in coins which were found at Sidon and on the sculpture which tells that the pillars before the Baal temple at Tyre held a fire which glowed at night. It has been suggested that the pillars in front of Solomon's Temple may have contained a sacred fire reminding the Israelites of the pillar of cloud by day and the pillar of fire by night of the wilderness period; but all suggestions are largely speculative. 16 Molten bronze: 'cast bronze' would be clearer. The capital was 5 cubits (7½ ft) high, making the column and capital approximately 34½ ft, which would seem to be higher than the Temple itself. We are not told, however, the thickness of the Temple's roof. 17 Two nets of chequer work is based on LXX; the Hebrew is problematical. A net for the one capital, and a net for the other capital is based on LXX: Heb. 'seven for one and seven for the other' differs by only one letter. 18 Pomegranates: Heb. 'pillars'. Top of the pillar: Heb. 'the top of the pomegranates'; it seems obvious that these two words have been transposed in the Hebrew text.

AV has followed the Hebrew. 19 The pillars in the vestibule: these have not been mentioned previously, and some scholars believe the verse was added as an afterthought. In LXX, vv. 19, 20 follow 21, and 22 is missing. 20 AV makes practically no sense, and RSV has considerable rewording; Heb. 'and capitals on the two columns also above in connection with the belly (or bulbous part) which was beyond (or opposite) the chequer work; and the pomegranates two hundred rows about upon the second crown (capital)'. Some reconstruction is obviously required to make this clear and meaningful. 21 Jachin: 'he establishes'; Boaz: 'in him is strength'. Numerous suggestions have been made concerning these names, but there seems to be no compelling reason for refusing to take them in their simple form. 22 Lily-work. This may have been suggested by v. 19, or that in turn may have been drawn from this statement.

7:23–26 The bronze sea. Cf. 2 Ch. 4:2–6. 23 Molten sea: the only place in the OT where the word 'sea' is used in a figurative sense. 15 ft in diameter and 7½ ft high, it was cast of copper or bronze. The circumference is only approximate; LXX reads '33 cubits', which is mathematically more inaccurate than the Hebrew. The shape of the sea is not given, but its contents may help us estimate it. 24 Gourds (AV 'knots'): probably some kind of open bud. Thirty cubits (Heb. 'ten', AV 'ten in a cubit'): but the peculiar Hebrew construction (used in chs. 6, 7) probably means 'by the cubit'. 26 A handbreadth: approximately 3 in., a sixth of a cubit. Two thousand baths: the size of the 'bath' is not certain, but is generally taken to be about 4⅛ gallons, which would make the capacity just under 10,000 gallons. LXX transposes vv. 25 and 26.

7:27–37 The ten stands. 27 Ten stands of bronze is better than AV 'ten bases of brass'. Four cubits: each stand was about 6 ft square and 4½ ft high. Each of these stands had four wheels of about 27 in. in diameter (to judge from v. 32). For an illustration of the laver in bronze with wheels, see NBD, p. 1244, Fig. 205. This passage is full of highly technical details, and it seems to have been written by one who knew the craft well, but the explanation of each of these points is no longer clear. The movable lavers were for the distribution of water for purification (2 Ch. 4:6), and for cleaning the altar and the court.

7:38, 39 The ten lavers. The actual lavers are here described: each held 40 baths, or about 192 gallons—which is about three-quarters of a ton of water. Adding the weight of the bronze we can readily see that these lavers were not portable. If the lavers were semi-circular, 6 ft in diameter, fitting in the crown, on top of the stand which was already 4½ ft high, this would mean the stand and laver combination was about 7½ ft high. The height of the cast bronze sea, as well as the height of the lavers, was too great for anyone simply to walk up and use the water in them. We must therefore assume that there was some system, possibly a siphon, to get the water for use.

7:40–44 The pots, shovels, basins. The pots (AV 'lavers'): the Hebrew means 'lavers', except in 1 Sa. 2:14 where it refers to a cooking cauldron. LXX and Vulg., as well as 2 Ch. 4:11, indicate that the word used here originally was a cooking-pot.

7:45–47 The place of casting. 45 Burnished bronze: metal that has been scoured or polished to make it shine. 46 Recent excavations at Deir-'Allā, N of the river Jabbok (generally identified as Succoth), show that it was a centre of metallurgy; deposits of metal slag, furnaces, and part of a crucible with copper still in it have been found. The whole region extending N for several miles was a centre of metallurgy in the period of the Hebrew monarchy, probably because the clay was of the proper kind to make moulds and because the people through the generations had built up expertise in metallurgy. Charcoal could be made from the scrub oak growing in nearby Transjordan. The prevalent N wind down the Jordan valley would provide the proper draught for achieving the necessary temperature. The copper ore would have been brought from the hills E and W of the Arabah, in the S part of the Jordan rift.

7:48–50 The golden vessels. Cf. 2 Ch. 4:19 – 5:1. There is a noticeable contrast between the detail of the preceding section and the lack of detail in this. Other passages, such as 2 Ki. 12:13; 25:14ff.; Je. 52:18ff., do not indicate a quantity of gold such as is described here; nor are these vessels mentioned in the account of the gold furnishings in 1 Ki. 6:20ff. Hence many scholars are inclined to question whether this portion belongs with the original description. 48 The golden altar: not mentioned in 1 Ki. 6:20, unless the one made of cedar wood was covered with gold. It seems more likely that this was the altar of incense. The bread of the Presence (AV 'shew-bread'): i.e. bread that was placed before the Lord. 49 Lamp-stands: 'candelabra' might be more accurate. 2 Ch. 4:20 does not specify ten of these. 50 Cups (AV 'bowls'): either translation is possible. Dishes for incense is more meaningful than AV 'censers'. Sockets (AV 'hinges'); it seems unlikely that the door-sockets in the floor and lintel would be of gold, hence some other part of the door may be intended. The word used here does not occur elsewhere in the OT.

7:51 David's offering. Apparently David had begun consecrating gold, silver and vessels for the 'house' he wanted to build for Yahweh (cf. 2 Sa. 8:11).

8:1–66 The dedication of the Temple

Cf. 2 Ch. 5:2 – 7:22; Josephus, Ant. viii.4. This portion is the heart of the first part of 1 Kings. A number of scholars see a great amount of scholarly editing here, but see remarks in Introduction.

8:1–11 Bringing the ark into the Temple. This passage is in much shorter form in LXX. When the ark is in the Temple, the Temple is filled with the cloud, the visible evidence of the glory of Yahweh. 2 The month Ethanim: the seventh month of the calendar which began with the spring equinox; later it was called Tishri, which came around the autumn equinox, or in the latter half of September. The principal feast was the Feast of Ingathering, or Tabernacles. According to 1 Ki. 6:38 the building of the Temple had been completed in the 8th month, i.e. 11 months earlier. Many scholars feel that the dedication was delayed so that it might come at the time of the New Year. (According to the calendar still in use, the beginning of the year fell on the first day of Tishri.) Some scholars hold that this was the occasion of the great festival marking the Kingship of Yahweh, but if this was indeed such an outstanding festival for the Israelites Scripture is remarkably silent about it. 6 The inner sanctuary of the house: here identified as the Holy of Holies, or the Most Holy Place; cf. 6:16. 8 The ends of the poles were seen from the holy place: this suggests possibly that the ark was placed crossways (N–S) within the holiest place, and that the veil before it was at a slight distance inside of the opening so that the staves could be seen on each side extending beyond the area obscured by the veil. 9 There was nothing in the ark except the two tables of stone: according to Heb. 9:4 the ark also contained Aaron's rod and a pot of manna. Some scholars think that Hebrews contains the tradition of a later time when these other items were present. This however is not the only solution to the difficulty, but it is best to admit that we do not know the precise answer. 10 A cloud filled the house: the presence of the Lord is symbolized visually as in the days of the Exodus (Ex. 14:19, 20) and the Tabernacle (Ex. 33:9). It would not seem that this cloud remained perpetually, for it is not mentioned again until Ezekiel in a vision saw the glory of God departing from the Temple (Ezk. 9:3; 10:4; 11:23).

8:12–21 Solomon's address to the people. Cf. 2 Ch. 6:1–11. This is generally called 'Deuteronomic', meaning after the time of Josiah (621 BC). In any view, Deuteronomy was influential in the religious life of the nation. It is as reasonable in our opinion to suppose that Moses was the originator of this spiritual resource as it is to suppose that some unnamed prophet in the 7th century was responsible for it. We see no compelling reason to reject the traditional view that David and Solomon, as well as other kings, were strongly influenced by the Mosaic traditions, whether these were in the present written form at that time or not. The 'address' is based partly on historical fact and partly on theological thought to show that the house was not necessary for the existence of Yahweh in Israel, but was His way of symbolizing for all to see the truth of His actual presence. The original dedication, according to LXX, was a song taken from the Book of Jashar. 12 Hath set the sun in the heavens: taken from LXX; according to Gray LXX is clearly a literal translation from the Hebrew original. 13 An exalted house: some would take the original word here to mean 'prince' and read it 'a royal house'.

8:22–53 Solomon's prayer of dedication. Cf. 2 Ch. 6:12–42. This is more than a prayer of dedication; it includes a prayer for the royal family, for the true significance of the Temple, and for national problems, such as defeat, drought and other calamities. There is also a prayer for the proselyte who comes to the faith of Israel from the outside, for the time of war, for captivity, and a conclusion. 22 Stood: Solomon is described as standing in prayer. Art from the Ancient Near East always indicates the inferior standing and the superior seated. Thus kings are represented as standing before the sitting deity. Altar is mentioned here for the first time in the description of the Temple in Kings. See on 2 Ch. 4:1. 23 Steadfast love (AV 'mercy', Heb. ḥesed): a very important word which means the situation that exists as a result of a covenant that has been made, and the obligations of the parties to that covenant. 'Covenant love' is a very good translation; 'grace' or 'mercy' would be acceptable only if the term is being applied to the members of the covenant. 25 Here the covenant with David is clearly in view. 8:27–30 To hear this prayer and all prayers. 27 The concept of divine omnipresence is considered by some to be a later addition, but the idea had to start sometime and somewhere. 8:31, 32 To condemn the guilty and vindicate the righteous. 32 Righteousness: in the sense of conformity with the accepted custom. 8:33–40 For the people in time of national calamity. 33 National calamities are regarded as the result of sin, certainly the prophetic concept. 37 Blight: blasting, the drying out of plants as the result of the hot wind from E or S. Mildew: the result of too much moisture in the spring. Locust or caterpillar: the various kinds of locusts are a continual plague to farmers in the Middle East. 8:41–43 For the foreigner in the land. 41 Foreigner (AV 'stranger', Heb. nokrî): strictly those who are not Israelites who had come to worship Yahweh; the alien living in Israel was called gēr. 42 Great name, . . . mighty hand, . . . outstretched arm: obviously reminiscent of the deliverance from Egypt and Sinai (Dt. 4:34; etc.). 8:44, 45 For the people in war. This portion and the following are generally said to be exilic additions, but certainly the history of the Ancient Middle East is a history of continuous warfare—and Solomon was enough of a realist to know that. 8:46–53 For return from captivity. Again, an 'exilic addition'. But Hammurabi's law Code, among other documents that are much earlier than Solomon, speaks of redeeming captives and returning them to their own land. There is nothing in these verses so specifically exilic that we must date them in the Exile. 47 We have sinned, and have acted perversely and wickedly. Here are three Hebrew words for 'sin': the first, ḥāṭā', 'a failure, a missing of the mark'; the second, 'āwā, 'iniquity', or 'the result of deliberate action'; the third, rāšā', 'not conforming to what is true, straying from the accepted norm'. In v. 40 yet another word is used, peša',

'rebellion, revolt against God or His law'. 51 Here we see clearly the concept of ḥeseḏ, covenant love: even though these people have rebelled, Solomon presents them to God as thy people, and thy heritage, which thou didst bring out of Egypt, the people with whom God had entered into covenant by His grace. Therefore He was obligated to deal with them according to that gracious covenant. The NT equivalent is 'while we were yet helpless, at the right time Christ died for the ungodly'. 53 Thou didst separate them from among all the peoples of the earth, to be thy heritage: the election of the people of God, a theme which runs throughout the Bible and apart from which biblical theology is impossible. There is no reason whatever to say that here it means ritual separation.

8:54–61 The blessing. See on 2 Ch. 7:1 and cf. Josephus, Ant. viii.4.2, 3. Solomon blesses the assembly of Israel and calls on them to be wholly true to Yahweh. 54 Where he had knelt. We may assume that Solomon has fallen to his knees in the course of the intercessory prayer. At the beginning he was standing (v. 22). 59 As each day requires is better than AV 'as the matter shall require'; cf. 'Our daily bread' in the Lord's Prayer. 60 The purpose of election is clearly stated: That all the peoples of the earth may know that the Lord is God (cf. Gn. 12:3; 22:18).

8:62–64 The dedicatory sacrifice. Cf. 2 Ch. 7:4–10; Josephus, Ant. viii.4.4, 5. 63 Gray says, 'The numbers may be near the truth, though of course round numbers.' This was the beginning of the daily sacrifice which was offered for the sins of the nation as long as the Temple stood. It is replaced by the intercession of Christ which He makes daily for His people (Heb. 7:25).

8:65, 66 The feast. The seven-day feast was apparently held simultaneously throughout the kingdom, much as Passover is held today. 65 It was possibly the Feast of Tabernacles, often called the feast. Entrance of Hamath: at the S entrance to the valley between the Lebanon ranges, 100 miles N of Galilee, generally understood to be the Beqa' in what is now S Lebanon. Brook of Egypt: probably Wadi el-'arish in Sinai. Seven days: from LXX (Heb. 'seven days and seven days'); 66 indicates that LXX is correct.

9:1–28 Solomon's apogee

The description of Solomon is continued (cf. 3:1 – 4:34). The order is somewhat unstructured, and the story following of the visit of the queen of Sheba seems to interrupt the story of Solomon's commercial ventures.

9:1–9 Yahweh again appears to Solomon. Cf. 2 Ch. 7:11–22. The first appearance (3:3–14) was for Solomon; the second appearance is for Solomon's dynasty. The Davidic covenant is ever in view, and the kings will be known as 'David's sons', never as 'Solomon's sons'. 1 All that Solomon desired to build: AV 'all Solomon's desire' is, strictly speaking, closer to the Hebrew. The word ḥešeq is a strong word of physical attachment, affection, or love, and here would seem to refer to Solomon's love for the Lord. 3 I have consecrated. The separation between the 'holy' and the 'profane' is meaningless when man-made, and has true significance only when God Himself declares a place or a person 'holy'. 4, 5 If you will walk before me: the covenant is in sight again; but it is always considered the covenant with David, the throne is always looked upon as David's throne, and the king as David's son. 8 RSV and AV fail to translate the Hebrew, which says 'this house shall be high'. Scholars feel that Old Latin and Syriac indicate a better reading; therefore RSV translates will become a heap of ruins. (For textual discussion, see Gray, I and II Kings, 1963, pp. 220, 222.)

9:10–14 Dealings with Hiram of Tyre. Cf. 2 Ch. 8:1, 2; Josephus, Ant. viii.6.4. This passage has caused much difficulty, particularly in the light of the parallel in Chronicles. 11 Twenty cities: Solomon gave these to Hiram probably because he had used up the available wealth of the country, hence needed a loan (cf. v. 14). Galilee (Heb. 'circuit, region') probably was merely part of a longer name, such as 'Galilee of the Gentiles'. Other areas also are called Galilee. 13 The land of Cabul: possibly a village 8 miles from Acre and 5 miles NW of the site of Jotapata, which agrees with the statement in Josephus, Ant. viii.5.3. A popular etymology has been suggested meaning 'like nothing', but this once-accepted explanation is now questioned. According to 2 Ch. 8:2 Hiram gave the land to Solomon, interpreted by some to mean that Hiram was displeased with it and returned it. 14 Talent: a unit of weight equalling 3,000 shekels, later 3,600 shekels. If the shekel was 0·4 oz the talent of gold would be worth $42,000 at $35 per ounce, and the whole sum about $5,000,000 (or about £2,000,000). There are other ways of figuring this which yield different results.

9:15–23 Details of the corvée. Cf. 2 Ch. 8:3–10; Josephus, Ant. viii.6.4. Read 1 Ki. 5:13–18. The non-Israelites were pressed into slave labour; the part the Israelites were forced to take is problematical: cf. v. 22. 15 Account is better than AV 'reason'. Forced labour (AV 'levy'): the corvée. Millo: probably part of the defence work for Jerusalem (cf. 11:27); the root of the word means 'fill'. Hazor: excavation shows that it was one of the most significant fortresses in N Galilee. Megiddo: also one of the most important fortifications, this one controlling a pass between the plains of Jezreel (Esdraelon) and Sharon. At both sites the fortifications are well built. 16 Pharaoh: not identified; one suggestion is Psusennis (JB). Gezer: scholars are inclined to read this as 'Gerar' (see on 3:1). 17 Lower Beth-horon controls one of the approaches to Jerusalem. 18 Baalath: identified by Josephus with Baalath in Dan (Jos. 19:44), SW of Beth-horon (Jos. 15:11). Tamar in the wilderness: MT 'Tadmor', and so 2 Ch. 8:4, which would be Palmyra in the Syrian desert; however this is not otherwise indicated in the OT. If we associate Baalath with Tamar in the S, then it may be one of the Baalaths E of Beer-sheba (cf. Jos. 15:24–29). Tamar was one of the SE limits of the land (Ezk. 47:19; 48:28), possibly Hazazon-Tamar (Gn. 14:7) or the city of palms (Jdg. 1:16). The list follows geographical order if we take Baalath to be the one near Beth-horon and Tamar to be in the S. In the land of Judah: 'Judah' is added by RSV. 19 In Lebanon: some scholars feel these words have been inserted on the basis of 2 Ch. 8:6. 22 But of the people of Israel Solomon made no slaves: but cf. 5:13 and 11:28. Likewise the implication that they were the soldiers, the officials, etc., must be harmonized with the presence of foreign mercenaries that were the backbone of David's army. His captains (Heb. šālīš, 'third-man'); i.e. third in the chariot besides the warrior and the charioteer, ultimately a man quite close to the king (2 Ki. 7:2, 17, 19).

9:24 Pharaoh's daughter's house and the Millo. But Pharaoh's daughter . . .: possibly we should read 'then' or 'only then', cf. 3:1–4. Millo: cf. v. 15.

9:25 Solomon's offerings. In view of the daily sacrifices, it is possible that we are to understand that Solomon himself served as priest on these three occasions. Three times a year: possibly the Feast of Unleavened Bread, the Feast of Weeks (seven weeks later), and the Feast of Tabernacles (in the autumn). The altar: cf. 8:22.

9:26–28 The Red Sea fleet. Cf. 2 Ch. 8:17, 18; Josephus, Ant. viii.6.4. 26 King Solomon built: we assume that Phoenician shipbuilders actually constructed these ships (cf. v. 27). 28 Ophir: the location is not clearly identified. Possibilities are S Arabia, the coast of the Red Sea known as Punt, the ruins of Zimbabwe in E Africa, or possibly India. S Arabia is perhaps the favourite choice of scholars. Four hundred and twenty talents: by the method used in 9:14 this would be more than $17 million or £7,000,000 (LXX '120', and 2 Ch. 8:18 '450').

10:1–29 The visit of the queen of Sheba

Cf. 2 Ch. 9:1–9, 12; Josephus, Ant. viii.6.5f. Scholars now agree that the visit was probably historical. The Sabaean kingdom flourished from about 900 to 450 BC. A number of queens of the 8th and 7th centuries are listed in Assyrian inscriptions. It is not certain whether Sheba refers to the kingdom in the S part of the Arabian Peninsula or to some of its outposts in the N part of Arabia. A reasonable cause for the visit of the queen can be found in Solomon's control of the head of the Gulf of Aqabah (hence of the route that would cross from Arabia to Egypt) and in the sea trade that he had inaugurated, which would seriously threaten the caravan trade that had made the S Arabian kingdoms great. The excuse for her visit, of course, would be her desire to see the famous king.

10:1–5 The queen and her retinue. 1 Hard questions: probably riddles or tests of practical sagacity. 4 Wisdom: practical wisdom, administrative sagacity. 5 His burnt offerings which he offered (AV 'his ascent by which he went up'); the verse is difficult. Some scholars believe that this is a reference to the great royal processional. At any rate it was the climax of all of the other splendid things that she witnessed. There was no more spirit in her: Montgomery suggests 'she was left breathless'.

10:6–10 Her words and gifts to Solomon. 7 Your wisdom and prosperity surpass the report: lit. 'you have added wisdom and goodness to the fame that I heard'. 8 Happy are your wives (RSV, LXX, Syr.) seems to be the much more likely reading, particularly coming from a woman; cf. MT and AV 'happy are thy men'. 9 is an echo of the Davidic covenant, and is almost Messianic in its statement (cf. Pss. 2; 110; Is. 9:6, 7; 11:1–5). 10 A hundred and twenty talents: cf. 9:14. Spices: S Arabia is famous for these.

10:11, 12 The wealth brought by the fleet. Cf. 2 Ch. 9:10,11; Josephus, Ant. viii.7.1. This seems to break into the story of the visit of the queen of Sheba (in the parallel in Chronicles, exactly the same thing is found). 11 Almug wood, elsewhere in the OT 'algum' (cf. 2 Ch. 2:8): sandalwood is often suggested; other suggestions are pine, amber, and red coral. 12 It was made into supporting beams, lyres and harps. Supports: 'steps' is probably meant. In Chronicles it is terraces (AV).

10:13 Solomon's gifts to the queen. According to ancient tradition, the queen also took back with her a child begotten by Solomon from whom the emperor of Ethiopia traces his direct lineage, but of this Scripture knows nothing, recording only that he gave (lit., see RV mg.) 'according to the hand of king Solomon', i.e. in a way commensurate with the resources of such a king.

10:14–25 Solomon's great wealth. Cf. 2 Ch. 9:13–24; Josephus, Ant. viii. 7.2, 3. 14 Six hundred and sixty-six talents of gold: about $28 million or over £11,000,000 (cf. 9:14). Most commentators consider this to be incredibly high, and it does not include the revenue specified in v. 15. 15 Traders: LXX reads 'taxes of the merchants', which seems to be most likely, and requires only a very minor emendation of a Hebrew word. Taxation on goods passing through the country or through the trade-routes controlled by the country was always a large item. Pliny said that wares from India when they reached Rome were 100 times the original cost. The Aramaeans or Syrians in these states became strong and powerful because they dominated the desert trade-routes. Kings of Arabia: MT 'kings of mixed people' is probably to be emended with several versions and 2 Ch. 9:14. 16 Shields of beaten gold: the gold was either made into shields, or the shields were covered or inlaid with gold; in either case it was a sort of a royal treasury. Six hundred shekels of gold (MT omits 'shekels'): about 15 lb., or about $8,400 or £3,500 (cf. 2 Ch. 9:15, 16). 17 Shields: small shields, probably circular. Three minas: a mina was 60 shekels, about 24 oz; a shield weighed about 5 lb. and was worth about $2,500 or £1,000. 18 Ivory throne: probably made of wood with large ivory inlays; the gold was either inlaid in the ivory, or overlaid on the rest of the wood. 19 At the back of the throne was a calf's head: based on LXX with a change of vowels in the Hebrew word (AV 'the top of the throne was round behind'). For 'calf's head' 2 Ch. 9:18 has 'footstool', but this word differs only in one letter from a word meaning 'lamb'. Originally, therefore, both texts may have referred to the lamb or calf decoration. 22 Ships of Tarshish: usually identified with Tartessos, a Phoenician settlement in Spain. However, the suggestion has been made that this word is formed on the root rśś, 'to refine', and means something like 'metal refinery' (Albright), thus these would be ships that are connected with refineries and mines. At any rate the term indicates a type of ship and not its destination. There is no reason to suppose that the ships went through the Red Sea and circumnavigated Africa to reach Spain. (See NBD, art. 'Tarshish'.) Ivory: lit. 'elephant's tooth'. Apes, and peacocks: the suggestion that this should be translated 'apes and baboons' has merit. Josephus reads 'ivory, Ethiopians, and apes' (Ant. viii.7.2) which suggests that the Heb. was sukkiyyîm, 'negroes', rather than tukiyyîm, 'apes', but this has no support in the versions.

10:26–29 Solomon's commercial ventures. Cf. 2 Ch. 1:16; 9:25–28; Josephus, Ant. viii.7.3, 4. Solomon dealt in the import and export of horses and chariots, but the exact details are not clear. We assume that he served as a 'middleman'. 26 The figures are not incredible. Horsemen: probably to be read 'horses'. 28 Egypt: many scholars take this to refer to Musri, later Cappadocia, N of the Taurus mountains. Kue (AV 'linen yarn'): there seems to be no doubt that a place often mentioned in Assyrian records and elsewhere is intended, approximately the same as Cilicia, S of the Taurus mountains. Wood for the building of chariots also would be found on the slopes of the Taurus mountains, which makes the story self-consistent. 29 Egypt: again probably Musri; if so, Egypt is not mentioned here at all, but the account is limited to Syria and the Hittite territory. The end of v. 29 is rather meaningless in AV; Montgomery suggests 'making export through their agency', and Gray 'the kings of the Hittites and the kings of the Aramaeans got them by exports through them'.

11:1–43 Solomon's decline

Cf. Josephus, Ant. viii.7.5–8. This portion is omitted in Chronicles, which, according to some scholars, is due to the unwillingness of the Chronicler to tell anything unfavourable about the kings of Judah. LXX seems to be more objective than MT, but possibly this is due to editorial work.

11:1–8 Solomon's foreign wives and his idolatry. Many of Solomon's marriages were doubtless marriage-alliances, a type of foreign diplomacy practised in antiquity, and Solomon was obliged to honour the religious convictions of his wives and to provide for their various kinds of worship. 2 Foreign marriages seem to be the point of criticism rather than having many wives. 3 Seven hundred . . . three hundred: cf. Ct. 6:8, 'sixty queens and eighty concubines, and maidens without number'; many scholars think the figures in 1 Kings are hyperbole. David had 15 wives (1 Ch. 3:1ff.), Jeroboam had 18 wives and 60 concubines (2 Ch. 11:21), Abijah had 14 wives (2 Ch. 13:21). On the other hand, Chosroes II had between 3,000 and 12,000 concubines, and Sultan Mulay Ismail is reported to have had 2,000 wives and 800 concubines. 4 Wholly true to the Lord: Heb. probably 'at one with', or 'at peace with the Lord'. 5 Ashtoreth: deliberately misvocalized from 'Ashtart' on the basis of the word bōšeṯ, 'shame'. The Canaanite fertility goddess was Ashtart (Gk. Astarte). Milcom and Chemosh (v. 7) were the national gods of the Ammonites and Moabites, and we may assume that Ashtart was the female counterpart. Goddess: in OT there is no word for 'goddess'; MT says 'the god of the Sidonians'. 7 The abomination of Moab; LXX 'the god of Moab'; likewise, the god of the Ammonites. The mountain east of Jerusalem: the Mount of Olives; in 2 Ki. 23:13, 'the mount of corruption'; in 2 Ch. 28:3 this is located in the valley of Hinnom, which is S of Jerusalem.

11:9–13 Yahweh's judgment on Solomon. Again the covenant with David is brought into view. The kingdom is to be torn away from Solomon, 12 but not in his lifetime, 13 nor entirely. The Davidic dynasty and city will both continue. One tribe: the tribe of Judah, possibly absorbing Simeon; the OT always refers to ten tribes in the northern kingdom and one in the southern kingdom. Although Ahijah tore the cloak into twelve strips of which ten were to be for the northern kingdom, only one was to remain for the Davidic throne (see 11:32).

11:14–22 The revolt of Hadad of Edom. This is a summary statement not necessarily in chronological order. The revolt of Hadad occurred early in Solomon's reign (cf. v. 21). This passage has numerous difficulties, as the study of LXX will quickly show. 14 Adversary: Heb. śāṭān, which later becomes the name of the principal adversary (see on 5:4). On the use of Satan as a proper name, cf. 1 Ch. 21:1. Hadad the Edomite: Syria ('Aram') in v. 25 seems to be a mistake due to a miswritten letter. Some scholars find two sources, but ICC, following Kittel and Stade, rejects such source-analysis. For this name of an Edomite king, see Gn. 36:31–39. 15 There is no mention of this anywhere else in the OT. Every male in Edom: as usual with this type of expression this is hyperbole and not to be pressed literally, as the next verses indicate. In this passage the name is sometimes spelt 'Hadad' and sometimes 'Adad'; this is no reason for considering the original to be two different accounts of two different persons. 17 A little child: Heb. more like 'a young boy', or 'a little youth'. 18 Midian: if this was E of the Gulf of Aqabah it occasions a minor difficulty. We should work with the possibility that Midian was E of the head of the Gulf of Aqabah; in other words, E of Ezion-geber. Paran: sometimes identified with Wadi Feiran near Mt. Sinai (see Glueck in BASOR, 71, 1938, p. 7). 19 Tahpenes: believed to be an Egyptian title meaning 'the wife of the king', in which case 'the queen' is an attempted translation or explanation. Queen: Heb. 'lady'.

11:23–25 The revolt of Rezon of Damascus. Not only was the S part of the land stripped away by Hadad's revolt; the Aramaean region dominated by Damascus also rebelled. Solomon's kingdom is being whittled away. 23 Rezon: the rise of Rezon followed the defeat of Zobah (2 Sa. 8:3). 24 He became the head of a group of bandits, succeeded in capturing Damascus, and was a source of irritation and opposition during Solomon's reign. 25 Syria: 'Aram' is to be emended to 'Edom'. This verse would be a summary for both of the preceding accounts.

11:26–40 Jeroboam ben Nebat and Ahijah. There are numerous textual problems. Moreover, in order to account for the events that follow, we must assume that Jeroboam was involved in a serious plot that forced him to flee the country and at the same time gained him considerable reputation with the northern tribes, so that later they would turn to him for leadership. This may have been an attempt on his part to gain advantage for the northern tribes through the position that he occupied. 26 Son of Nebat: Nebat was deceased; Jeroboam's mother is described as a widow. Zeruah means 'leper'; names such as this were sometimes given to ward off evil spirits. 27 introduces the reason for the revolt as well as the time, which was after the building of the Millo, therefore 20 years or more after the beginning of Solomon's reign. 28 Very able (AV 'a mighty man of valour'): both miss the point. He was a man of property, doubtless inherited, and therefore had obligations to the crown. He was also energetic, or industrious; hence Solomon put him in charge of the public burdens (RSV forced labour, but not the corvée). The house of Joseph: this may refer to Ephraim and Manasseh rather than all of the northern tribes; Nebat was an Ephraimite. According to LXX, Jeroboam built a city in the hill country of Ephraim, raised a force of 300 chariots, fortified the city, and aspired to the kingdom. This would certainly fit the statement in v. 26. JB, however, translates: 'Solomon was building the Millo . . .; noticing how the young man set about his work, (he) put him in charge of all the forced labour of the House of Joseph.' 29 Ahijah the Shilonite: he was from Shiloh, where the ark had been (cf. 1 Sa. 4:3, 4). LXX adds 'he turned aside from the road'. 30 Tore it into twelve pieces: see on vv. 9–13. Gray thinks that Simeon remained with the northern tribes, indicated by a pilgrimage from the north to Beer-sheba (Am. 5:5) and by other shrines in Simeon (Am. 7:9), and that Benjamin adhered to Judah. Most of Benjamin, however, was in Israel. 32 One tribe: LXX and Vulg. read 'two', but this is obviously an attempt to make the total come out to twelve. The rule of 'the more difficult reading' supports MT at this point. 34 Ruler: AV 'prince' is better. Montgomery thinks that this is a limitation on the authority of Solomon who had already been the glorious king. Other scholars emend the text to agree with LXX 'I will forbear with him.' 37 King over Israel: 'Israel' is used here with reference to the northern tribes, since one tribe is to remain in the Davidic line at Jerusalem (v. 36). 38 If you will hearken: note the conditional covenant with Jeroboam. Will build you a sure house: but this was to be as discipline for the house of David, and not a replacement for it. 39 But not for ever: it was to be limited; the Davidic covenant was not. 40 Jeroboam arose, and fled: as a result of the attempted coup. Shishak: the first historical name that can be identified in the Bible. He is generally identified with Sheshonq I, founder of the Libyan XXIInd Dynasty, 945–924 BC.

11:41–43 The death of Solomon. The formula is introduced that will regularly be used of each of the kings. 41 The book of the acts of Solomon: otherwise unknown. It seems to stand in the series of official records later called by the general name 'the Book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Israel (or Judah)'. 42 Forty years: possibly a round number, but certainly not far from the actual length of reign. Solomon's reign is dated c. 970–931 BC. 43 Rehoboam: the form of this name comes from Greek rather than from Hebrew, hence the theory that 'Jeroboam' was a name deliberately made on the form of 'Rehoboam' carries no weight.

12:1 – 14:31 THE DIVISION OF THE KINGDOM

This period of history can be divided into three parts: a. from Jeroboam to Omri in the north and from Rehoboam to Asa in the south, a time of mutual hostility; b. under Ahab, Ahaziah, and Joram in Israel, and Jehoshaphat, Joram, and Ahaziah in Judah, a time of friendship due to a marriage-alliance; c. from Jehu of Israel and Joash of Judah to the fall of Samaria in Israel, a time of hostility.

12:1–24 Rehoboam succeeds Solomon

Cf. 2 Ch. 10; Josephus, Ant. viii.8.1–3. The text here is somewhat difficult and it offers a number of problems. It would seem that v. 2 should be read before v. 1, in agreement with the material in LXX, Vulg., and 2 Ch. 10:2. The plan throughout this section is to carry the story through the reign of one king to his death, and then return and pick up the story of his contemporary kings in the other kingdom (see Introduction).

12:1–5 Rehoboam seeks coronation by northern tribes. The purpose of going to Shechem was to be recognized as king by the northern tribes.

This deep-seated division of the kingdom is found in the days of Saul, who was chosen by lot from a northern tribe (1 Sa. 10:21) and, it would seem, chosen by both Israel and Judah at Gilgal (1 Sa. 11:15; cf. 11:8). Likewise David was chosen king of Judah (2 Sa. 2:4) and only after 7½ years did he become the leader of Israel (2 Sa. 5:3ff.). It would be unthinkable for Rehoboam to have been made king of Judah at Shechem, which subsequently became the first capital of the north (1 Ki. 12:25). Rehoboam was about 41 when he was crowned (cf. 1 Ki. 14:21). 2 Jeroboam returned from Egypt (RSV, LXX, Vulg., 2 Ch. 10:2), but MT, AV 'Jeroboam dwelt in Egypt'. 3 Jeroboam: the sentence makes better sense if this name is omitted. All the assembly of Israel: the northern tribes. Rehoboam would surely have been crowned at Jerusalem. 4 Yoke: used elsewhere concerning the subjugation of a foreign nation; the burden of taxation and enforced labour had been far more serious than we usually recognize. Rehoboam could still have held the north, probably, with wisdom such as the elders had given him.

12:6–11 Rehoboam accepts advice of young men rather than seeking the wisdom of the elders. 8 The young men who had grown up with him: men about his own age, around 40. The word translated 'young men' literally means 'children': probably a derogatory statement. 10 My little finger: LXX, Vulg. and Syriac, a good paraphrase; MT and 2 Ch. 10:10 'my littleness'. 11 Scorpions: a whip with barbed points.

12:12–15 Rehoboam's reply to the northern tribes. The reply is anything but diplomatic. It is difficult to understand his logic in this plan of action. At any rate, it fails utterly. 12 Jeroboam: some scholars would delete the name Jeroboam with LXX; Gray puts this verse between 13 and 14. 15 The religious interpretation of the event is added: the Lord makes use of such events to accomplish His will. Modern historians reject such attempts to probe into the divine mind—but this is the essence of faith.

12:16–20 The revolt of the northern tribes. Israel, feeling shut out of Rehoboam's planned government, withdraws. We get some idea of the extent of democracy that was present in the 'monarchy' of Israel. 16 To your tents: an idiom meaning 'Let's go home!'; the northern tribes are here withdrawing from the house of David (cf. 2 Sa. 20:1). 17, which is not in LXX, is difficult to understand. It may refer to Israelites who had preferred to move into Judah, or possibly—perhaps even more probably—Israelites of Benjamin who were therefore northerners but who lived in and around Jerusalem. 18 Adoram: probably the Adoniram of 1 Ki. 4:6 and 5:14 who had been in charge of forced labour and was therefore the worst possible representative that Rehoboam could have sent. 19 Has been in rebellion: a good illustration of the primary meaning of the word which is often used for 'sin' in the sense of rebellion against the known will of God (cf. Am. 1). To this day: this was written before the destruction of the northern kingdom, i.e. before 722 BC. 20 Made him king over all Israel: Jeroboam, it would seem, had just returned from Egypt and was called to the assembly and made king. There must have been sufficient antecedent events to account for such action. If vv. 3 and 12 are correct in MT, then Jeroboam was already in on the events at Shechem, but that makes v. 20 meaningless. The tribe of Judah only: LXX adds 'and Benjamin', but this would require reconstructing the last clause for the singular 'tribe', and the word 'only' would be out of place. The inclusion of Benjamin in v. 21 may indicate that Judah used force on the neighbour to the north, or the word may have been a later addition.

12:21–24 Rehoboam's plan for war averted. Cf. 2 Ch. 11:1–4. This paragraph will have to be understood against other clear-cut statements. According to these verses Rehoboam is going to attempt to force the northern tribes back into his kingdom by war, and the prophet Shemaiah talks him out of it. But according to 1 Ki. 14:30, there was continuous warfare between the north and the south through all of his reign. 21 A hundred and eighty thousand chosen warriors: this figure seems far too high and the emendation '18,000' has been suggested. LXX has '120,000', which would still be too high. 22 Shemaiah: appears only here and in 2 Ch. 11:1–4; 12:5–8, 15. 24 LXX has a long passage after this verse with no counterpart in MT, but with many statements that are parallel to other passages in MT.

12:25–33 Jeroboam consolidates the northern tribes

12:25 Jeroboam builds Shechem. He locates the first capital of the northern kingdom in a strategic place, geographically and religiously. Its religious ties, however, were not only with the patriarchs but also with the Canaanites, who had a cult shrine there before Abraham came to the place. Built: so MT; but actually he rebuilt it and fortified it to make it his capital. Shechem: just E of the modern town of Nablus, between Mt. Ebal and Mt. Gerizim. Ephraim: the whole region was known as 'Ephraim', although strictly Shechem was in the boundary of Manasseh. Penuel: in Transjordan at the ford of the Jabbok. This may have been an attempt to keep the Transjordan areas from Rehoboam, or it may have been connected with the invasion of Sheshonq (Shishak) who mentions Penuel on the inscription telling of this campaign, but there is no OT record of this.

12:26–28 Jeroboam's plan against Jerusalem. The motivation seems to have been political rather than religious. Jeroboam was not willing to give the people occasion to come under the influence of the Jerusalem kings. 28 Two calves of gold: Albright has argued that these were not representations of Yahweh but simply the pedestals upon which the invisible Yahweh stood, thus corresponding to the winged cherubim in Solomon's Temple. However, v. 28 seems to have a polytheistic view. The Hebrew word translated your gods could be translated in the singular as it is elsewhere, but the verb here is also plural. Some scholars take this statement to be the original and Ex. 32:4, 8 as a later account which changed the plural to singular. But the Exodus passage also has plural verbs. Albright's position therefore is not to be hastily rejected.

12:29–33 The golden calves in Bethel and Dan. Again we see strategy in Jeroboam's plan. In effect, he has 'sacralized' the borders of the country, and at the same time planted one shrine on the pilgrim's road to Jerusalem. 29 Bethel: 11 miles N of Jerusalem in Ephraim, on the main road of pilgrims going to Jerusalem. Dan, in the extreme N, at one of the sources of the Jordan river where there was already a Canaanite shrine. 30 RSV follows LXX; MT is translated in AV and is less meaningful. 31 High places: Jeroboam is also charged with establishing worship on high places and appointing priests who were not from the Levites. All the people (AV 'the lowest of the people'): more accurately 'the mass' or 'the whole range of the people'. 32 Eighth month: possibly Jeroboam also changed the date of the Feast of Ingathering from the seventh month. Some scholars, however, feel that Jeroboam was not the innovator, but that the religious innovations were made in Jerusalem (see the pertinent remarks of Montgomery in ICC, p. 256). Gray thinks the festival is the New Year's festival. He assumes that Rehoboam became king of Judah at the New Year's festival at Jerusalem and a day or two later appeared at Shechem for the same purpose, and that Jeroboam established the same festival a month later for his own coronation. But the OT says far less about the New Year's festival than the scholars do!

13:1–32 Jeroboam consecrates priests (cf. 12:31)

13:1–10 The man of God rejects Jeroboam. This is sometimes looked upon as a midrash from a later period inserted at this point. On the other hand the introduction of the miraculous fits the biblical pattern whereby the miraculous is part of a significant event at the beginning of a new period. 1 A man of God: the title used in this story for the prophet from Judea, whereas 'prophet' is used for the northern prophet. By the word of the Lord: lit. 'in the word of the Lord', the 'word' possibly being the compelling power. 2 Josiah by name: predictive prophecy in the OT is generally by principle and not by specific detail; only Josiah and Cyrus are mentioned by name. Therefore many scholars, including some staunch conservatives, insist that the names are later additions. Keil, seeking to get around this problem, suggests that the meaning of the name, 'he whom Yahweh supports', was the prophecy, and this was fulfilled afterwards in the name. His argument is less convincing when we apply it to the name Cyrus.

13:11–32 The old prophet in Bethel and the man of God. This is a difficult passage, and there is much disagreement among commentators. The 'prophet' who gives the 'man of God' a false message is later used by Yahweh to declare His word. The man of God is killed by a lion because he listened to the lying message of the prophet. 11 Sons: Hebrew is singular here, but plural in the following verse. 12 His sons showed him the way: MT 'his sons saw'; LXX and Vulg. suggest the reading found in RSV. 18 A prophet: the prophet includes the man of God in the prophetic title. But he lied to him: some feel this is a later addition to the story. Keil does not agree; on the other hand he refuses to look upon the old prophet as a false prophet. The prophet used sinful means and the false pretence that he had been directed by an angel in order to have a closer relation to the man of God in Judah. The story however centres on the man of God and his disobedience. Gray suggests that the local prophet sought to enhance his own prestige. 20 Table: at that period tables were found only in the houses of the very rich, or the royalty. Here it would probably be a leather mat spread on the ground. 21 Thus says the Lord: if we are to assume that the prophet was a false or lying prophet, then God has broken through to use him even as He did Balaam. 22 Your body shall not come to the tomb: meaning that he would die a violent death away from home and not be buried in the grave of his fathers. 23 Prophet: the only place in the story where this word is used with reference to the man of God except in the prophet's words (v. 18). The suggestion has been made that a prophet might be a false prophet, but a man of God is always a man of God. 24 Lion: lions of a small breed were known in the Middle East and did not become extinct until about the 12th century AD. 29 Brought it back to the city: RSV is based on LXX; MT 'he came to the city of the old prophet' makes sense but is awkward; AV mistranslates. 32 seems to have been added later when Samaria was the capital and the cities were known as cities of Samaria.

13:33 – 14:20 Conclusion of Jeroboam's reign

This resumes the story interrupted at 12:31.

13:33, 34 Jeroboam consecrates priests. 34 Sin: 'to miss the mark'; possibly 'failure' would be better here, but since it definitely involved Jeroboam's relationship to God 'sin' can be used.

14:1–18 The death of Jeroboam's son. Lacking in LXX, but fragments are found in the extra passage in LXX 12:24*a-n*. Abijah is seriously ill, and Jeroboam sends his wife to inquire from Ahijah the prophet whether the boy will live. The prophet foretells not only the death of the son, but also the end of Jeroboam's dynasty. 3 Some cakes (AV 'cracknels'): possibly cakes with seeds sprinkled on the top. 5 The punctuation at end of verse in RSV is better than in AV. 9 Provoking me to anger: an emotion often ascribed to God in the Bible, which modern scholars attempt to explain away. By way of reply Snaith (IB) says, 'This modern idea with its tendency toward deism does not do justice to the biblical idea of a definite and personal opposition to sin which is evident everywhere on the part of God.' 10 Every male: Hebrew literally translated in AV. Both bond and free: in Hebrew two words which are not precisely clear, but the general sense is conveyed better by RSV than by AV. Will utterly consume the house: RSV again carries the meaning better than AV. The prophecy foretells the end of the dynasty of Jeroboam which was fulfilled in the death of his son Nadab. The details of the prophecy indicate that there will be a violent overthrow of the dynasty. 14 And henceforth: the end of the verse is difficult. Keil supports AV. RSV, following a suggestion by Kittel, makes sense but has no MS or version support. 15 The Euphrates: lit. 'the river', but generally used of the Euphrates. Some scholars therefore assume that this was added to the text after the fall of Samaria. Asherim: wooden poles at a Canaanite shrine, not 'groves' (AV). 17 Tirzah: the first mention of this place, which became the capital of northern Israel in the time of Baasha (1 Ki. 15:21).

14:19, 20 Summary of the reign of Jeroboam I. For the stylized formula concerning the rest of his acts and reference to the Book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Israel, etc., see Introduction. Jeroboam's reign can be dated c. 931–910 BC.

14:21–31 Conclusion of Rehoboam's reign over Judah

Normally the author tells the story of a king from beginning to end, and then picks up his contemporaries in the opposite kingdom. Here, the story of Rehoboam, begun in 12:1–24, is interrupted by the story of Jeroboam, which also is interrupted. Rehoboam's reign can be dated c. 931–913 BC.

14:21–24 Judah's evil practices. Cf. 2 Ch. 11:5 – 12:16; Josephus, Ant. viii.10. 21 For the formula that will be used for each of the kings of Judah, see Introduction. 22 Judah: LXX 'Rehoboam', but 'like king like people'. 23 High places . . . pillars . . . Asherim: elements of Canaanite religion. 24 Male cult prostitutes: AV 'sodomites' misses the point. Heb. qᵉḏāšîm 'ones set apart' includes men and women set apart for religious cult prostitution. This is also the word for 'holy', meaning 'set apart (for Yahweh's service)'.

14:25–28 Shishak's invasion of Judah. Cf. 11:40. Shishak used the division into two kingdoms as an opportunity to move into the land. His inscription in Karnak lists about 150 places that he 'captured'—in most cases this word probably means that he took tribute from them. The tribute that he took from Rehoboam is mentioned in v. 26. Albright proposes 940–920 BC for Shishak's reign.

14:29–31 Summary of the reign of Rehoboam. 30 War: probably a state of cold war, with the building of border fortifications but without open warfare. 31 Abijam: the versions read 'Abijah'.

15:1 – 16:28 THE WARS BETWEEN ISRAEL AND JUDAH

This is a period of warfare between the two kingdoms, and then it degenerates into a series of civil wars in the northern kingdom. Five kings of Israel (and a sixth contender) are included, while in Judah there are only the brief reign of Abijam and the long reign of Asa.

15:1–8 Abijam of Judah

Cf. 2 Ch. 13; Josephus, Ant. viii.11.2, 3. Abijam is 'tolerated' for David's sake. This theme we shall find often, until there seem to be only two persons in view: David, and David's ideal son who is never realized until Jesus is born. 1 In the eighteenth year of King Jeroboam: the first of the synchronisms; every king is dated in similar fashion (see Introduction). Abijam's reign can be dated c. 913–910 BC. 2 Abishalom: usually identified with Absalom the son of David; hence Maacah was David's granddaughter. In 2 Ch. 13:2 she is called 'Micaiah the daughter of Uriel'. If we assume that 'Micaiah' is a mistaken reading for 'Maacah', then we may suppose that Tamar the daughter of Absalom married Uriel (so Josephus, Ant. viii.10.1). 3 True: Heb. šālēm, basically 'wholeness' or 'integrity' and then 'peace'. We might translate 'his heart was not at peace with the Lord his God' (cf. 11:4). 4 Notice again the reference to the Davidic covenant. 6 Rehoboam: cf. v. 7. V. 6 makes no sense in this account of Abijam. LXX omits the verse. 7 Book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Judah: this is not the canonical book of Chronicles, since the biblical book also quotes this book on the war between Jeroboam and Abijah (cf. 2 Ch. 13:3–20); see Introduction.

15:9–24 Asa of Judah

Cf. 2 Ch. 14–16; Josephus, Ant. viii.12. Asa is a reformer, removing the cult prostitutes and idols. He is also responsible for the introduction of a foreign alliance, bribing the king of Damascus to attack Israel which in turn causes Israel to take the pressure off Judah. It is possible that there had been a previous agreement between Judah and Syria, but Israel had moved her S boundary closer to Jerusalem.

15:9–15 Asa's reforms. Judah, as well as Israel, assimilated Canaanite cult practices, and had done so since the days of Solomon, at least. Probably there was a popular level of worship that was always inclined to accept such idolatries. Asa attempts to remove these from Judah. His reign can be dated c. 910–870 BC. 10 Maacah: Asa's mother's name is the same as that of Abijam's mother, hence some have supposed that he was Abijam's brother. Others suggest that Maacah was Asa's grandmother, the queen mother (v. 13). Asa instituted sweeping religious reforms including the removal of the queen mother. 12 Abominable image (lit. 'shocking', or 'frightful'); Vulg. takes this as a phallic symbol, but there is no other support for this view. 13 Queen mother (Heb. 'lady'). The word for 'queen' is used of the queen of Sheba, of Queen Esther, Queen Vashti, and twice in the plural (Ct. 6:8, 9); it is never used of the individual queens of Israel and Judah. Kidron: the valley between Jerusalem and the Mount of Olives. 14 The high places: Keil labours to show that these were not devoted to idols but were unlawful altars to Yahweh. In the prophets, however, we find the people carrying on idolatrous practices at the high places, so there is little point in trying to explain them away. Canaanite sin and idolatry pervaded all levels of the Israelite people except those few stalwart kings and prophets whom the Lord used for His purposes. Wholly true: see on 15:3.

15:16–22 War with Baasha of Israel. Cf. 2 Ch. 15:19 – 16:10. This is really a continuation of the war that had been started by Rehoboam against Jeroboam. It was often a 'cold war', but certainly at times it was more than that. Possibly Abijam had previously pushed north (2 Ch. 13:19), in which case Baasha is now regaining lost territory. He builds a fortress just N of Jerusalem, after persuading Ben-hadad of Damascus to break his treaty with Baasha and invade the northern part of Israel. This is the first time we meet the Aramaean city-states, which will play an important part in the history of Israel. Foreign allegiance will become the bane of kings as reflected in the prophets (cf. Is. 7:4–9; 8:6–8, etc.). 17 Ramah: about 4 miles N of Jerusalem. 18 Ben-hadad: Hadad was the chief god of the Aramaean pantheon, the Storm god, or Thunderer. Tabrimmon: Ramman or Rimmon is another name of the same god, and the compound name Hadad-Rimmon is also found (Zc. 12:11). Hezion: the suggestion that this should read 'Rezon' (11:23, 24) seems to be no longer valid (cf. Albright in BASOR, 87, 1942, pp. 23ff.). 20 Ijon, Dan, . . .: the places mentioned are all in the extreme north of Israel, principally in the upper Jordan valley. 21 Tirzah: several miles NE of Shechem, identified as Tell Fara', and apparently established as the capital by Baasha (v. 33). 22 Proclamation: an extraordinary levy or corvée in order to destroy the fortifications at Ramah and build others for King Asa at Geba. Geba: some believe this is Gibeah, but the name Geba (one of the forms of the word meaning 'hill') can be applied to a number of sites.

15:23, 24 Summary of the reign of Asa. 23 Diseased in his feet: some have supposed this was dropsy. 24 David his father: the use of 'father' and 'son' in connection with the name of David is to be noted.

15:25–32 Nadab of Israel

Cf. Josephus, Ant. viii.11.4. Nadab is noteworthy for destroying the house of Jeroboam. 25 Nadab actually reigned less than two years, as a comparison of vv. 24 and 33 will show. His reign may be dated c. 910–909 BC. According to one system of reckoning, if a king started to reign before the New Year and continued to reign into the new year, he reigned 'two years'.

15:27–30 Baasha's conspiracy. 27 Baasha the son of Ahijah: Ahijah is described as from the house of Issachar, distinguishing him from Ahijah the Shilonite (v. 29). Gibbethon: a Philistine city E of Ekron in the original territory of Dan; Nadab was strong enough to attempt to extend his borders westward. 29 He killed all the house of Jeroboam: the end of the first northern dynasty fulfils Ahijah's prophecy (14:10). 32 War between Asa and Baasha: cf. 14:30; 15:7, 16.

15:33 – 16:7 Baasha of Israel

Cf. Josephus, Ant. viii.12.3, 4. Asa and Baasha both had long and nearly simultaneous reigns, Asa's being about 14 years longer. Hence, most of the details of Baasha's reign have already been told in the account of Asa.

15:33, 34 Introductory statement. See Introduction for format. 33 In the third year: see on v. 25. The reign of Baasha may be dated c. 909–886 BC.

16:1–4 Yahweh's word to Jehu concerning Baasha. Jehu ben Hanani was an obscure prophet, cited as author of a history incorporated in 'the Book of the Kings of Israel' (2 Ch. 20:34) in the days of Jehoshaphat of Judah (2 Ch. 19:2), which would have been more than 50 years after the present oracle. His prophecy is remarkably like that which Ahijah uttered against Jeroboam (14:7–11), but this in itself is not sufficient reason to reject either account.

16:5–7 Summary of Baasha's reign. 7 seems superfluous; some scholars hold that vv. 2–4 are an editorial rewrite of the prophecy against Jeroboam and assume that v. 7 is the only original statement on the subject.

16:8–14 Elah of Israel

The record of Elah is interrupted by the account of Zimri's conspiracy. 8 Two years: the son of Baasha reigned less than two years, since he came to the throne in the 26th year of Asa (v. 8), and died in the 27th year of Asa (v. 10). The reign of Elah may be dated c. 886–885 BC. 9 Drinking himself drunk: it seems that Elah's reign was in trouble from the first. 10 Zimri, whose father's name is not even mentioned, was commander of half of the chariotry; this suggests a division in the military. 11 He did not leave him a single male of his kinsmen: according to Snaith (IB), this was to make it impossible for any male relative to act as the gō'ēl. 12, 13 This is taken as fulfilment of Jehu's prophecy against the house of Baasha.

16:15–20 Zimri of Israel

The state of affairs in Israel was very bad, and there were factions among the people as well as rivals for the throne, Zimri, Tibni and Omri being named. 15 Zimri reigned seven days: Israel was again engaged in war against Gibbethon (cf. 15:27) and when news came that Zimri had killed the king, troops in the field made Omri, the commander in the army, king over Israel. But there was also Tibni (v. 21). 17 They besieged Tirzah: Zimri had seized the capital and Omri marched against it at once. 18 He went into the citadel . . . and burned the king's house over him: Zimri must have recognized at once that he did not have power to take control, so he died by his own hand after 'reigning' 7 days. His reign was probably in 884 BC.

16:21–28 Omri of Israel

Omri was perhaps the most important of all the kings of Israel, from the standpoint of secular history: this should give us some idea of the viewpoint of 'holy history'. Omri's capital, Samaria, gave its name to the country for ever after. Omri is the only Israelite king named in the Mesha Inscription, which records afflictions by his sons, but names only Omri. Jehu the usurper was known to the Assyrians as 'the son of Omri' (see on 2 Ki. 9:2). A century after Omri's dynasty had fallen, some Assyrian inscriptions still referred to his land as 'the house of Omri'.

16:21, 22 The struggle with Tibni for the throne. Cf. Josephus, Ant. viii.12.5. The statement that all Israel made Omri king (v. 16), as is so often the case with statements including the word 'all', must be read in the light of other passages. 21 makes it clear that the people of Israel were not entirely behind Omri, half of them followed Tibni and wanted to make him king. 22 gives no indication of the time, and we might suppose that the struggle between the followers of Omri and the followers of Tibni was brief. Zimri, who reigned only 7 days, came to the throne in the 27th year of Asa (c. 884; v. 15) and Omri did not come to the throne until the 31st year of Asa (c. 880; v. 23). This suggests that there were 4 years of civil war. One MS of LXX states that 'Zimri reigned 7 years', but this does not fit the other chronology, nor does it fit the description in v. 17, which indicates a very quick end to Zimri's coup.

16:23, 24 The founding of Samaria. Omri moved the capital of Israel to Samaria, a hill about 8 miles NW of Shechem, rising about 300 ft above the surrounding plain. Excavations have uncovered the walls of his palace. 23 Reigned for twelve years: this must include the years of civil war, six years . . . in Tirzah (of which only two were truly regnal).

16:25–28 Summary of Omri's reign. Omri's reign may be dated c. 880–874 BC. 25 Did more evil than all who were before him: this is Scripture's measure of Omri. 26 Religiously, he was worse than Jeroboam, and other than the fact that he founded the capital at Samaria, that is about all that is told of him. The revolt of Mesha, king of Moab, is recorded in 2 Ki. 3:4ff., but there is nothing about the oppression of Moab by Omri and his sons, which lasted 40 years according to the Mesha Inscription. Micah refers to 'the statutes of Omri' (Mi. 6:16), suggesting that he must have had some kind of legal reform, but we know nothing further about them.

1 Ki. 16:29 – 2 Ki. 1:18 AHAB AND ELIJAH

The story of Ahab is broken up by the interweaving of the story of Elijah, and only concludes at 22:40. In some ways the conflict between Ahab and Jezebel on the one hand and Elijah on the other is the crucial hour for Yahwism. The king and queen would wipe it from the face of the earth; only Elijah is able to stem the tide.

16:29–34 Ahab of Israel

Cf. Josephus, Ant. viii.12.1 – 13.1. Ahab was guilty of two great sins: he walked in the sins of Jeroboam, and he married Jezebel the daughter of Ethbaal the king of Sidon and a very zealous promoter of Baal worship (v. 31). Their daughter Athaliah for a period usurped the throne of Judah. According to Josephus (Contra Apion i.18.8), the granddaughter of Ethbaal was Dido, who founded Carthage. Ethbaal is identified by Josephus as a priest of Astarte.

29 The thirty-eighth year of Asa: Ahab is the seventh king of Israel since Asa came to the throne of Judah. Ahab's reign can be dated c. 874–853 BC. 34 Hiel of Bethel: LXX 'Ahiel', probably the full form of the name. The meaning of this verse is much debated; according to the Targum, Hiel sacrificed his oldest son when he built the place and his younger son when he set up the doors. Some scholars look upon these as 'foundation sacrifices'; others reject this idea rather strenuously. It is possible that some simple tragedy happened to these two sons, but since there was a curse on the rebuilding of Jericho (Jos. 6:26) the deaths would be considered as the result of this curse. The formulaic conclusion of the record of the king's reign is not found until 22:39, 40. Most of the intervening chapters are given over to accounts of the prophet Elijah.

17:1 – 19:21 Introduction of the Elijah cycle

The term 'Elijah cycle' has no particular critical significance; it simply is a convenient way to refer to the portion of Kings that tells of Elijah the prophet. Elijah, who is to the prophets as Moses is to the law, is presented to us without introduction other than that he is called 'Elijah the Tishbite'. Yet it is obvious that there must have been quite a history of his activities before the event in 17:1. Ahab called him the 'troubler of Israel' (18:17). Obadiah, the household steward of Ahab, refers to the fact that they had sought out Elijah everywhere (18:10). The reputation of mysterious disappearances is hinted at in 18:12. Certainly there had to be an anterior reputation for Elijah to create such an effect upon Ahab, particularly for Ahab to take seriously the prophecy of drought in 17:1. It would seem that Elijah was connected in some way with the schools of the prophets which we find in Bethel, Jericho and Gilgal (2 Ki. 2:3–5; 4:38). One measure of his stature is to be found in the fact that he was the man raised up by God at the time that Baal worship threatened the very existence of the worship of Yahweh in Israel. His place in the NT also underscores his importance. The forerunner of the Christ was to come in the spirit and power of Elijah (Lk. 1:17). Moses and Elijah, as representatives of the law and the prophets, stood with Jesus on the Mount of Transfiguration (Mt. 17:3; Lk. 9:31). The description of the works of the two olive trees in Rev. 11:4ff. clearly relates them to Moses, who had the power to turn water into blood and to smite the earth with all kinds of plagues, and Elijah, who had the power to shut heaven that it rained not in the days of his prophecy. Skinner says of Elijah, 'He is to be ranked as the greatest religious personality that had been raised up since Moses' (CB, p. 222).

17:1–7 Elijah and the ravens. Miracles in the OT are not commonplace, and therefore they are not simply the product of the imagination. They occurred only at those extremely important periods of history when the very power of God was needed in order to maintain His people and their testimony: e.g., to deliver them from the bondage of Egypt, or to give them the land of Canaan, or to preserve the true faith in the presence of the efforts of Jezebel to destroy the knowledge of Yahweh.

1 Tishbe: based on LXX. The Hebrew consonants could be vocalized this way, but MT 'of the settlers' is followed by AV. Gilead: according to tradition Elijah came from Tishbe in Naphtali (Tobit 1:2) and settled in Gilead in Transjordan. If this tradition is true—it is almost unanimously rejected today—it is remarkable that in the days of Jesus those who searched the scriptures said 'out of Galilee arises no prophet'. Neither dew nor rain: Josephus (Ant. viii.13.2) records that according to Menander there was a full year's drought in the time of Ethbaal, father of Jezebel. 3 The brook Cherith: traditionally identified with Wadi Qelt near Jericho; but the following words indicate that it was in Transjordan. 4 Ravens: some scholars have attempted to read this as 'Arabians' (which has the same consonants as the Heb. word for 'ravens'), but the tendency today is to leave the story as it is and accept it as the faith of Israel, even if not the faith of modern rationalists. Gray accepts the reading 'Arabs', feeling it fits the context better since the second part of the story is in Phoenicia.

17:8–16 Elijah and the widow of Zarephath. Elijah is sent by Yahweh to Zarephath near Sidon, where he is fed by a widow. The request of Elijah that the widow take her last bit of meal and oil and give it to him for food is not an act of selfishness on Elijah's part, but a test of the woman's faith. To judge from her oath in v. 12 it would seem that she was a worshipper of Yahweh, even though a Gentile. 9 Sidon: one of the chief cities of Phoenicia, located on the coast N of Galilee, in what today is Lebanon. Elijah was keeping out of the territory of Ahab. Zarephath: identified with the modern Sarafand, some 8 or 9 miles S of Sidon on the Mediterranean coast. 12 Jar is certainly to be preferred to AV 'barrel'. 14 The miracle followed, in that the meal (flour) and oil never ran out for the 'many days' of the drought. Gray suggests that the generosity of the widow touched the conscience of her better-provided neighbours. Christ refers to this event in Lk. 4:25f.

17:17–24 Elijah raises the widow's son. 17 No breath left in him: it has been questioned whether the son was dead or merely near to death. He appeared to be dead to his mother (v. 18), and to Elijah (v. 20). The expression 'no breath left' in Hebrew would imply death. Modern medical ability to restore life after complete heart-stoppage makes us slow to give a positive answer, but we are dealing with a situation long before modern medical knowledge. 18 What have you against me: the Hebrew expression would appear to be the same as that used by Jesus to Mary at Cana (Jn. 2:4). The widow felt that the presence of the man of God had brought to light some sin of hers which was the reason for the death of her son. 19 Upper chamber: probably a room on the roof with an outside stairway. Gray says, 'Removal of the invalid was a matter of simple hygiene.' 21 He stretched himself upon the child three times. We miss the point if we feel that this manipulation of the son by Elijah was a means of resuscitating him; at the same time we recognize that the same technique is mentioned in two other cases (2 Ki. 4:34f.; Acts 20:10). The exact significance we do not understand. 22 The soul. We must be careful not to attempt to build a doctrine on this passage such as the idea that the soul leaves the body at death or the soul returns to the body at resuscitation. While this idea may be true, the Hebrew word means 'life' rather than 'soul'; the concept of the soul is not clearly found in the OT. 24 This is a remarkable statement of faith on the part of the woman, but we ask ourselves whether its value ended there. There is no indication that she spread this faith to her own people, and since she was not in Israel she could not convey it to the Israelites. The telling of the story by Elijah himself might lack conviction in the absence of witnesses. So perhaps its greatest value was in strengthening the faith of Elijah, who several times appears to need such spiritual help. The word of the Lord in your mouth is truth: better 'the word of the Lord is really in your mouth' (Moff.).

18:1–19 Elijah is sent to Ahab. 1 In the third year: according to the customary way of counting time this could have been at the end of two years; the NT, however, indicates a drought of 3½ years (Lk. 4:25; Jas. 5:17). It is possible that Keil is right in referring v. 1 to the period of time that Elijah was with the widow at Zarephath, to which would be added the length of time he was in the wadi Cherith. 3 Obadiah: not the prophet by that name, but the steward of Ahab's household (see on 1 Ki. 4:6), described as a God-fearing man who had protected the prophets of Yahweh when Jezebel was seeking to exterminate them. 4 Prophets of the Lord, possibly the 'sons of the prophets' or the 'school of prophets'; but we should be slow to accept many of the fantastic suggestions made about such men. They have little place in the OT and therefore little place in OT religion (cf. 1 Sa. 10:5–13; 2 Ki. 2:3–5). Cave: Montgomery says the word is generic and translates 'cave region'. Mt. Carmel abounds in caves, over 2,000 having been counted. 5 The horses: Shalmaneser III refers to 2,000 horses furnished by Ahab at the time of the Syrian coalition. We therefore can imagine the strain put on the resources of the land in time of famine.

7 Obadiah recognized him. There is no indication that they had met before and some have supposed that it was Elijah's dress or appearance that identified him. However, Obadiah's question seems to have been, 'Is it really you?' which would suggest a previous meeting. 9 Montgomery takes this as only a generous excuse: Obadiah was thinking of the prophet's safety. 12 Spirit: the Hebrew word can mean 'wind' or 'spirit'. We should be slow to insist that it means spiritual levitation. If Obadiah had in mind a strong wind he still thought of it as coming from the Lord; hence the miraculous element is still present. 13 Jezebel killed the prophets: obviously there were originally more than the 100 that Obadiah had saved. 15 The Lord of hosts: the first occurrence of this name in Kings. Various meanings have been suggested for 'hosts': the armies of heaven (planets, stars, etc.), the armies of angels, natural forces, the armies of Israel, or the limitless resources of the divine nature. Gray says the reference is undoubtedly to the armies of Israel, for the first occurrence is in the account of the Philistine wars (1 Sa. 17:45, which, he holds, was written before 1 Sa. 1:3). To Gray the title expresses the intimate link between the Lord and His people. The genitive of hosts is, however, strictly impossible as a translation of the Hebrew, which really requires either that Lord and hosts are nouns in apposition to each other, thus signifying that the Lord possesses in Himself every possible potency, or else that the expression is abbreviated from Lord (God of) hosts, with one of the above meanings. (See NBD, p. 480a, sect. h.)

17 You troubler of Israel: cf. Jos. 6:18; 7:24f. 18 Elijah throws the words back in Ahab's teeth. You have forsaken the commandments of the Lord: LXX omits 'the commandments', making this much stronger, 'You have forsaken Yahweh.' The Baals (AV 'Baalim', the Heb. plural of Baal). The local Baals were shrines, or manifestations of one Baal, and older works that spoke about 'many Baals' are now discredited. Baal was the principal god of the Canaanite religion, a nature-religion that used ritual prostitution as a kind of sympathetic magic to achieve the fertility of the ground. Heb. ba'al means 'master', or 'husband'; b'ûlāh applied to the land of Canaan was 'the land that was married'. In Canaanite eyes, Baal both owned and fertilized the land. Beulah, however, came to have a more glorious meaning (cf. Is. 62:4; see NBD, art. 'Beulah'). Carmel was one of the heights on which were located places of worship to Baal, and in choosing this Elijah moved into Baal's own home territory for the contest. 19 All Israel: obviously hyperbole. There would doubtless have been representatives from each of the tribes; but it is nothing short of folly to suppose that everyone left their homes and climbed Mt. Carmel for this event. Mount Carmel: a prominent mountain ridge rising to an elevation of about 1,800 ft and jutting into the Mediterranean just below the Bay of Haifa. There is a Carmelite monastery dedicated to Elijah and a grotto at the western end, but this cannot be the location of Elijah's miracle. Probably the ruins of El-Muḥraqa, which is one of the highest points of Mt. Carmel, and toward its SE end, is the location. Prophets of Baal: lit. 'the Baal', always used with a definite article in Hebrew, although this has not been preserved in English translation. Four hundred prophets of Asherah. Some scholars believe that this is an intrusion into the text, since they are not part of the account later. Keil suggests that they found a way of evading the command and simply did not show up. LXX interpolates this in v. 22, probably to harmonize it with v. 19. Since the sign of the definite direct object is lacking from the second clause it is tempting to suppose the text originally read 'the 450 prophets of Baal even 450 prophets of Asherah who eat at Jezebel's table'; the word 'fifty' is lacking in the second part of the sentence. Since Asherah was Baal's consort, as is clear from Ugaritic materials, this would not be an impossible statement.

18:20–40 Elijah and the prophets of Baal on Carmel. The contest with the prophets of Baal on Mt. Carmel is one of the most dramatic stories in the OT. Historically, we could say that it saved Yahweh-worship in Israel. In view of the subsequent marriage-alliance between Israel and Judah, we might even extend this to say that the knowledge of the Lord in both Israel and Judah could have been wiped out for ever if the Lord had not raised up Elijah at this moment. The contest was not to demonstrate which of two gods was greater, but to demonstrate which was the true God and the other no god at all.

20 Ahab sent to all the people: indicating the awe that he must have had for Elijah. 21 How long will you go limping with two different opinions? This was possibly a popular expression of the day, lost to us now. It seems to be literally, 'Till when are you hopping at two forks?' The sin of the people had been not in rejecting the worship of Yahweh, but in trying to combine it with the worship of Baal. Such syncretism is always considered to be broad-minded, whereas the other is narrow-minded. But Yahweh of Israel left no room for other gods. Elijah makes this clear: If Yahweh is God, follow him; but if Baal, then follow him. 26 From morning until noon. The scene seems to be rather calm up to this point, but there is no answer, and the prophets of Baal carry on their ritual around the altar. 27 This is rather strong language. Montgomery says, 'Elijah's satire in a nutshell is the raciest comment ever made on pagan mythology.' For he is a god: this is irony; if he is a god, he should be able to hear. Gone aside: a euphemism, 'He has left the room'. He is on a journey: Rashi takes this to mean 'to the privy'. For a nature god, these gross references to the natural are quite to the point, but it is better to retain 'journey' in the plain sense as a joke at a so-called god who was now here now there. 29 The time of the offering of the oblation: probably about 3 p.m. The prophets of Baal put on a frenzied ritual between noon and that time, but there was still no answer.

30 He repaired the altar of Yahweh that had been thrown down. Keil supposes that there had been an altar built by the worshippers of Yahweh on Carmel, but the author of Kings seems elsewhere to be opposed to altars on high places; and if indeed Elijah has moved into Baal's own territory here, then we must rethink this whole matter. In LXX, vv. 31, 32a are in the middle of v. 30. V. 32a and v. 30b seem to be mutually incompatible. The ritual that follows has no efficacy in itself. Possibly Elijah is mimicking the prophets of Baal. Certainly he is making it obvious that if Yahweh is to answer it must be a genuine miracle and not a false miracle. 32 Two measures of seed: about 5 gallons. If this refers to the capacity of the trench it is hardly enough. If it refers to the amount of ground that that amount of seed would sow, as older commentators suggested, it seems to be far too much. We are content to admit ignorance at this point. 33, 34 Obviously 12 jars of water were enough to soak the wood, wet the ground around the altar, and fill the trench.

36 At the time of the offering of the oblation: see on v. 29. It is possible that Elijah was already constructing the altar to Yahweh during the closing, frenzied part of the ritual of the Baal prophets. The subsequent events require sufficient time left in the day to slaughter the prophets of Baal, to go back to the top of Carmel and look for the cloud, and to rush down to the foot of the mountain and race about 17 miles to Ahab's summer capital at Jezreel. God of Abraham, Isaac, and Israel: it is interesting that Elijah used 'Israel' instead of 'Jacob', possibly implying a rebuke to the northern kingdom for considering itself to be Israel. 37 Elijah's prayer is in line with his original challenge, that they may know that Yahweh is the true God. Turned their hearts back: a debated statement, some believing that it means God restored their hearts to the original faith; others that He was the original one to turn their hearts away or harden them because of their own sins. This is not the place to solve this problem. 38 Then the fire of the Lord fell: the effect on the people, of course, was profound (v. 39). Saint Yves suggests that there was some pyrophoric preparation used in building the altar that reacted when water was poured on it to ignite the fire. A more common suggestion is that the response came by lightning. Gray says, 'We believe that what actually happened was that the clouds appeared and massed as a result of Elijah's prayer in vv. 36, 37, 42ff.; then the lightning, which ignited his sacrifice.' As Rowley points out, the sky was cloudless. He goes on to point out that no man could produce lightning at will from a cloudless sky or from any sky; no man can direct the fall of lightning to any object he wishes. The suggestion that Elijah poured naphtha, which he obtained from a nearby source, on the altar and that he used a magnifying lens to focus the sun's rays and ignite the fire, is clearly ridiculous, and is only the frenzied attempt to hold on to the Bible without having the faith to believe it. Rowley well says, 'That something remarkable happened is overwhelmingly sure. . . . If the story we are examining today is dismissed as a fabrication, then either the whole story of the reign of Ahab as well as the story of Elijah must be dismissed or the defeat of the prophets of Baal is left without explanation' ('Elijah on Mt. Carmel', BJRL, 43, 1961, pp. 269ff.). 40 And killed them. The slaughter of the prophets of Baal had possibly two significant meanings: it was retribution for Jezebel's attempt to slaughter the prophets of Yahweh; at the same time it was the fulfilment of the law which pronounced death on false prophets (Dt. 7:2f.; 13:13ff.).

18:41–46 Yahweh sends rain to end the drought. Having demonstrated conclusively that Yahweh and not Baal is God, Elijah is now ready to call upon God for the rain. Until this first effect is demonstrated there would of course remain the possibility that Baal was responsible for the rain. 43 Sending his servant to the top of Mt. Carmel seven times was probably not intended as a ritual, but simply a detail of the story. 44 Go up: this expression is difficult to understand. Possibly it is a figure of speech, recognizing the higher position of a king. Elijah's faith that the small cloud would develop into a great rainstorm is obvious in his words to Ahab. 46 Ran before Ahab. It has been suggested that this was the act of a loyal servant, the 'outrunner' (cf. 1 Ki. 1:5), and the public testimony that he was indeed the king's true servant, seeking not to oppose the king but to win the king to worship Yahweh. On the question of whether it would be possible to run that distance (about 17 miles), Paul W. Harrison reports that Arab runners in the desert can cover 100 miles in less than two days. The biblical text makes it clear that Elijah was able to do this because the hand of the Lord was on him; in other words, he was granted supernatural power and stamina.

19:1–3 Jezebel and Elijah. Immediately following his triumph over the prophets of Baal Elijah seems to fall into deep depression. Jezebel's threat on his life can hardly be the entire cause. 3 Then he was afraid follows LXX and Syr.; MT, with different vowels, reads 'when he saw' (so AV). Keil, refusing to admit that Elijah was afraid, reads 'when he saw how it was, he went for his life'. Keil takes this as not to save his life but to care for his soul. Both of these seem to avoid the obvious meaning that Elijah was just plain afraid. Beer-sheba: the S limit of Judah, where Elijah left his servant, possibly because he did not expect to return.

19:4–8 Elijah flees to Horeb. Utterly despondent, it would seem, Elijah asks Yahweh to end his life. 4 A broom tree: common to the wadis in the desert, sometimes growing to a height of 10 ft. It is enough: Keil supposes that Elijah was already of great age, but this is without textual warrant. 5 An angel: omitted in LXX, but without reason in the light of v. 7. 6 The meal seems to have been miraculous not only in its source but also in its sustaining power, for Elijah went on for 40 days and 40 nights. 7 The angel of the Lord: possibly the second Person of the Godhead is intended, as in the theophanies in Genesis (Gn. 16:7). However, the article may simply refer to the angel previously mentioned, and Keil apparently so takes it. 8 Horeb: traditionally another name for Sinai. Some scholars find two separate traditions and two separate places intended. The distance from Beer-sheba to Horeb is only 200 to 300 miles, depending on the route, and should not require 40 days. The figure may be symbolic, or it may be that Elijah was making no sustained march to Horeb.

19:9–18 The still small voice. 9 A cave: lit. 'the cave'. Since the story is reminiscent of Moses' experience at Sinai, it is possible that this means the identical 'hole in the rock' where Yahweh appeared to Moses (Ex. 33:21ff.). What are you doing here, Elijah? Is this a rebuke, or is Yahweh simply giving Elijah an occasion to express his feeling? If the latter, 10 his reply is one of despair, or possibly even a rebuke that Yahweh has allowed such things to happen. These verses occasion some difficulty and it has been suggested that the first part of v. 11 does not belong here, or possibly even that vv. 9a–11a should be omitted. If the first part of v. 11 is omitted, then we assume that Elijah was standing in the cave while the following events took place, and this is what v. 13 suggests. 11 The appearance of Yahweh is in part a reply to the unvoiced criticism of Elijah. The wind, the earthquake and the fire were modes that Yahweh used on occasion; certainly this was according to Elijah's nature, but on this occasion the Lord was not in them. 12 A still small voice: this expression is beautiful and has become classical. The Hebrew is even more picturesque: 'the sound of gentle quietness', or even 'gentle silence'. 13 Elijah of course covered his face at the presence of the Lord. Gray notes that although the significance of the still, small voice has been taken to be the revelation that the violent measures taken at Carmel were not the methods of Yahweh, the commission to anoint Hazael and Jehu to execute the purpose of Yahweh by violent means does not support this interpretation. Yahweh's word is stern, designed to overthrow kingdoms. 13b, 14 are a repetition of vv. 9b, 10, but this is probably intentional. 15 The wilderness of Damascus: the Syrian desert. Elijah's implied rebuke of Yahweh's inactivity is answered by the still, small voice and the events it foretells, specifically vv. 16, 17. God is slow to anger, but He does not contain His wrath for ever. 15, 16 Anoint Hazael . . . Jehu . . . Elisha. It has often been pointed out that these details were not carried out literally. Elijah did not anoint either Hazael or Jehu; these commands were carried out by Elisha and then only figuratively in the case of Hazael, and by secondary command in the case of Jehu (2 Ki. 9:1), nor did Elijah literally anoint Elisha. The term 'anoint' implies a call for a special purpose, whether there is an actual ceremony of anointing or not. It is unnecessary either to put the Horeb experience at the end of Elijah's life or to claim that the actual commission was a 'pious fiction' in order to justify the high-handed methods of Elisha. 17 Him who escapes . . . shall Elisha slay: again, the statement is not to be taken literally (cf. 2 Ki. 2:24). 18 I will leave: RSV is definitely to be preferred to AV 'I have left'. This was a statement concerning the future; after the punishments of v. 17 there would still be a remnant in Israel.

19:19–21 Elijah casts his mantle over Elisha. Elisha understood the act to mean that he was to follow Elijah. The response of Elijah probably is meant to indicate that the call is not from the prophet but from Yahweh. Elisha is identified only as 'the son of Shaphat'. The place is not indicated. 19 Ploughing with twelve yoke of oxen before him, and he was with the twelfth: probably to be understood to mean that his workmen were ploughing with the other eleven yoke (cf. Lk. 14:19). Cast his mantle upon him: instead of anointing him, Elijah performed this symbolic act, 20 the meaning of which must have been understood immediately by Elisha in the light of his reply. 21 Elisha served a farewell dinner and then became Elijah's servant. And ministered to him: cf. Ex. 24:13, where Joshua is called the minister (AV) or servant (RSV) of Moses. Elisha does not appear again until 2 Ki. 2:1.

20:1–43 Ahab's wars with Syria

Cf. Josephus, Ant. viii.14. We leave the Elijah cycle for a while and resume the story of Ahab. If this chapter is in chronological order we assume that Yahweh is manifesting His grace to Ahab for the sake of Israel. The dating of this chapter is a problem. The battle of Qarqar occurred in 853 BC; at that time Ahab was allied with Damascus and nine other Aramaean city-kingdoms against Shalmaneser III of Assyria. According to Shalmaneser's inscription (D. D. Luckenbill, Ancient Records of Assyria and Babylonia, 1927, I, §610f.) Ahab had 2,000 chariots and 10,000 infantry; the total forces of the allies were 3,940 chariots, 1,900 horsemen,

1,000 camels, 62,900 infantry. Ahab was fatally wounded fighting against the king of Damascus at Ramoth-gilead c. 852 BC. It would seem that the victories over Ben-hadad of Syria were several years earlier and that the treaty with Ben-hadad (20:34) was a step toward a coalition against the Assyrians. After the battle of Qarqar we assume that Israel and Damascus were again at war.

20:1–6 The demand of Ben-hadad. It is not clear just what is implied in this paragraph, but possibly the first statement is a declaration that Ahab is considered to be a vassal of Ben-hadad, and the second a demand for delivery of the persons and the wealth. 1 Ben-hadad: that this Ben-hadad is the same as the one who warred against Baasha (15:18ff.) is possible but unlikely. 'Ben-hadad' may of course have been a common title of the king who was a 'son of Hadad', their national god. King of Syria: the Syrians (or Aramaeans) never formed a great kingdom, but were a coalition of city-kingdoms, or city-states. Ben-hadad formed an alliance with 32 of these kings, a figure which is not unreasonable, as an inscription from Zinjirli, with a reference to 30 kings, shows. 3 Your silver and your gold . . . are mine: this might have been taken as de facto recognition 4 to which Ahab agreed, but 5, 6 were almost insulting and indicated unconditional surrender. 6 Nevertheless I will send my servants: possibly to be translated 'for if I have to send my servants tomorrow . . .'.

20:7–12 Ahab's reply. 7 The elders of the land: probably older men (heads of families) from all the tribal regions. I did not refuse him; perhaps 'should I not refuse him?' 10 The gods do so to me, and more also: a solemn vow; Ben-hadad vowed to level Samaria to the ground. 11 Let not him that girds . . .: Ahab's reply is proverbial; in Hebrew it consists of just four words. 12 In the booths: instead of tents, shelters were made of branches and leaves. Take your positions: lit. 'set', which is probably to be translated 'Attack!' And they took their positions: lit. 'and they set', i.e. they attacked.

20:13–21 Yahweh routs the Syrians. 13 A prophet: otherwise unidentified. The plan of battle he suggests to Ahab is to send out 232 servants of the governors of the districts at noon when Ben-hadad and his kings are drinking in their booths; and then when Ben-hadad's men come out, to send against them 7,000 trained soldiers (cf. v. 19). In the confusion the Aramaean kings flee, but their horses and chariots are captured. 15 All the people of Israel, seven thousand: of course the figure does not fit the statement. LXX suggests 'all the men of substance'. Otherwise we must understand 'all' to mean a representation of all tribes. 21 Captured: so LXX; MT 'smote'. Possibly the horses were used to further the rout of the Aramaeans.

20:22–30a The Syrians attack again and Yahweh smites them. 22 In the spring: Heb. 'the return (or cycle) of the year', which is generally taken as the spring equinox (see 2 Sa. 11:1). Snaith (IB) states that the kings of the Near East went to war in the autumn, after the harvest was in. This is questionable, for the rainy season followed shortly afterwards, and conducting a war in the rainy season was all but impossible. According to Gray, late spring and summer was the regular season for military expeditions. 23 Their gods are gods of the hills. Ben-hadad was convinced by his advisers that the Israelites had won because their God was a hill-god and they had fought on their own ground. 26 In the spring: see on v. 22. Aphek: at least five places are known by this name. This was probably a site in the plain of Esdraelon, but it may have been in the N part of the plain of Sharon, or possibly E of the Sea of Galilee commanding the pass on the road from Damascus, which would imply that the Israelites had taken back the region in Transjordan. Gray prefers el-Fiq, E of Lake Tiberias. 29 A hundred thousand foot soldiers: this figure seems hyperbolic. Notice that the combined forces of eleven kingdoms against Shalmaneser III totalled only 62,900 infantry. 30 The wall fell upon twenty-seven thousand men: again the figure raises questions. One suggestion is that the destruction of the city wall opened the way for the death of the soldiers who had fled into the city.

20:30b–34 Ahab spares Ben-hadad. Doubtless from fear of the power of Assyria, Ahab is only too willing to spare Ben-hadad, and at the slightest sign of leniency Ben-hadad's servants press the petition. 34 My father . . . your father: these terms need not be taken literally; they are often used of more remote ancestors. There is no record of any warfare with Omri, the father of Ahab. Specific towns in upper Galilee were taken from Israel in the time of Baasha (15:20), who might be said to be Ahab's 'father' in the sense of his predecessor. On the other hand, the reference to bazaars (not 'streets', as in AV) in Samaria would mean that this concession had been made in the days of Omri, since he established Samaria.

20:35–43 A prophet rebukes Ahab for sparing Ben-hadad. 35 The sons of the prophets: disciples of the prophets, appearing in the Bible in the time of Elijah and Elisha, but also mentioned by Amos (see on 18:4). 38 Bandage over his eyes: i.e. on his forehead. (AV 'ashes on his face' is to be rejected.) 40 So shall your judgment be: cf. Nathan and David (2 Sa. 12:1–7). The method was designed to bring the verdict from Ahab himself, which was immediately forthcoming. 42 Your life . . . for his life. It is folly to praise the lenient policy of Ahab and to condemn the harsh policy of the prophets; God was concerned with protecting His people Israel. Ben-hadad had already caused enough destruction and death to Israel. Ahab had denied trust in Yahweh by entering into foreign alliances. Ben-hadad had been delivered into Ahab's hand that he might punish him once and for all, and Ahab had failed to do that. The result would be untold suffering for the people.

21:1–29 Ahab and Naboth's vineyard

In LXX ch. 21 follows 19, then come 20 and 22.

21:1–4 Ahab's request and Naboth's refusal. 1 Naboth: no further identification except that he had a vineyard adjoining the summer palace of Ahab in Jezreel. 2 Give me your vineyard: Ahab's request may seem reasonable, offering to exchange or buy Naboth's property. 3 Naboth's refusal, however, is not only reasonable but religious. According to the Mosaic law, he had responsibility to his family, both past and future (Lv. 25:23–28; Nu. 36:7ff.). Similar rules of inheritance are found in other law codes of the Ancient Middle East. Gray points out that to have accepted Ahab's proposal would have relegated the family of Naboth to the status of royal dependants.

21:5–10 Jezebel's wicked plot against Naboth. 8 The fiction of communal justice is noteworthy. Ahab was personally influential, and the persons in the story had long been accustomed to follow the lead of Ahab. 10 Base fellows: lit. 'sons of Belial'. The meaning of the Hebrew word is not fully clear; it may be composed of the words for 'without' and 'profit'. Cursed: Heb. 'blessed', a euphemism, because it was considered blasphemy even to mention the cursing of God; wherever the expression comes up in Scripture or in Jewish religious writing, the word 'bless' is used instead of 'curse'. The king: cursing the king was a capital offence (Ex. 22:28). Stone him to death: cf. Lv. 24:16. For the requirement of two witnesses, cf. Dt. 17:6; 19:15. It is amazing how Jezebel is careful to follow Deuteronomic law—and if this is later 'Deuteronomic' redaction, then the story falls apart.

21:11–14 Naboth's death. 11–13 are repetitious; LXX abbreviates. According to 2 Ki. 9:26 Naboth's sons were put to death at the same time, perhaps to forestall any problems of inheritance. The legal basis probably was that sons would have been implicated in a plot against the king. However the text does not tell us this.

21:15, 16 Ahab possesses Naboth's vineyard. 15 Jezebel said: it is obvious that she was dominating each step of the plot.

21:17–26 Elijah's prophecy to Ahab. We return to some of the stories in the Elijah cycle at this point. 19 In the place where dogs licked up the blood of Naboth . . . : the prediction is not fulfilled literally, one of many instances in Scripture, showing that we must accommodate our view of prophecy to the inductive data of Scripture itself. Complete fulfilment does not necessarily involve literal fulfilment. (Cf. 2 Ki. 9:26.) 20b–26 include passages similar to 14:10f.; 16:3, 13. 20 You have sold yourself to do what is evil: a graphic way of expressing his choices in life. 21 I will . . . cut off from Ahab: a prophecy of the end of the dynasty. Every male: AV translates literally. In Israel: LXX omits. 22 refers to two previous dynasties, those of Jeroboam and Baasha. 23 Cf. 2 Ki. 9:36. 25, 26 sound like an editorial observation, the preceding portion having been drawn from an oral or written source.

21:27–29 Ahab's repentance. The repentance, while shallow, was apparently genuine, judging from the word of the Lord; therefore the evil prophecy was to be delayed to the day of his son.

22:1–40 Ahab's final Syrian war

Cf. 2 Ch. 18; Josephus, Ant. viii.15.3–6.

22:1–4 Alliance with Jehoshaphat of Judah. Jehoshaphat of Judah is obviously a vassal of Ahab of Israel, which may have been one of the reasons for the marriage-alliance between the two families. 3 Ramoth-gilead belongs to us: Ramoth-gilead had apparently not been handed back to Israel after the treaty of Aphek (20:34; cf. 2 Ki. 8:28). 4 I am as you are, my people . . . : Jehoshaphat agreed to participate in the campaign in words that sound like submission. The three years of peace between Syria and Israel (v. 1) may have been the period during which alliances were being made preparatory to the battle of Qarqar. Now that the Assyrian menace has withdrawn into the background, Ahab feels it is time to take back Ramoth-gilead, an important city because it was on or near the eastern caravan route, sometimes identified with the modern city of es-Salṭ. Glueck identifies it with Tell-Rāmith, 4½ miles SE of er-Ramtha; Gray suggests Ḥuṣn-'Ajlûn, SE of Irbid. On the marriage-alliance, cf. 2 Ch. 18:1; 2 Ki. 8:18.

22:5–12 Advice from the prophets. There are true prophets and false prophets, and there is only one difference between them: the true prophet speaks what Yahweh tells him to speak; the false prophet speaks what he is paid to say, what he thinks he should say, or in some cases what he is Satanically inspired to say. 5 Inquire first for the word of the Lord: Jehoshaphat wishes to know the will of the Lord before joining battle. The prophets . . . about four hundred men: obviously prophets of Yahweh and not of Baal, yet they were subsidized by the king and therefore said what he wanted to hear; they told him to go to war. 7 Is there not another prophet: Jehoshaphat doubts their prophecy, whereupon Anab refers to Micaiah ben Imlah. Gray points out that Jehoshaphat regarded a prophet as an instrument of the revelation of God's will to the community, not as an agent of the throne to influence God. 10 At the threshing floor: Gray translates 'public place'. The scene is sketched at the city gate where the two kings are sitting in their robes and on their thrones. 'The threshing floor' may have been the ancient name of the open space by the gate, but there is really no reason why a threshing-floor could not have been near the city gate. 11 Horns of iron: a prophet named Zedekiah graphically symbolizes the victory over the Syrians (cf. Zc. 1:18–21).

22:13–28 The prophecy of Micaiah. 15 Go up and triumph. His first answer is in the words that the king wants to hear; but the king immediately recognizes that this is false, whereupon he gives the true prophecy: Ahab would be killed and his army scattered. 20 Who will entice Ahab: the recognition of the true prophets and false prophets has always given difficulty. The explanation that Micaiah gives—a spirit from the Lord . . . a lying spirit—fails to satisfy many modern minds, but it is consistent with other passages of Scripture (cf. Jb. 1, 2; Zc. 3:1, 2). Basically it attributes the message of the false prophets to a lying spirit which ultimately comes from the Lord. This follows logically from monotheism and can be softened only to a degree by introducing the concept of the Satan, who is himself in the power of Yahweh even though he may instigate the false prophet. In this scene, as in others, the responsibility of the human being for his choice is not removed. Ahab has both the message of the lying prophets and the message of the prophet of Yahweh, and he fatally makes his decision to go against Ramoth-gilead. 24 How did the Spirit of the Lord go from me to speak to you? In other words, by what authority does Micaiah give a prophecy different from that of the other prophets? 26 Take him back to Amon . . . : possibly for safe custody; however see the following note. 27 In peace: victorious; Ahab chooses to believe the other prophets. 28 Micaiah's reply offers a test of false prophets.

22:29–36 The battle of Ramoth-gilead. 30 Your robes (LXX 'my robes'): to avoid the fulfilment of Micaiah's prophecy Ahab attempts to disguise himself by putting on Jehoshaphat's robes, and according to LXX, he has Jehoshaphat put on his, possibly to divert the prophecy to Jehoshaphat, or possibly (as Gray suggests) so his army would see what they took to be their king leading them. 31 Thirty-two captains: the number is not mentioned in Chronicles, and may be a scribal addition from 20:1. Only with the king of Israel: the king of Syria apparently is concerned not with the destruction of the Israelite army, but with the death of the king. This may have been strategic in view of the continuing Assyrian menace. 32 It is surely the king of Israel: Jehoshaphat is nearly seized through mistaken identity. 34 Between the scale armour and the breastplate: a chance shot strikes the king of Israel and, though he bravely remains in the chariot through the battle, in the evening he dies and the disheartened army returns home.

22:37–40 Summary of Ahab's reign. The better works of Ahab, 'the ivory house which he built, and all the cities that he built', are only hinted at. He was exceedingly evil (cf. 21:25, 26). 37 The king died: probably late in 853 BC. The battle of Qarqar took place in July or August of 853, according to Shalmaneser's record, and Ahab was involved there. Since Assyrian dates are controlled by the record of a solar eclipse (15 June 763 BC), this is a 'firm' date. 38 The dogs licked up his blood: partial fulfilment of Elijah's prophecy (cf. 21:21ff.). He was buried in Samaria, however; Naboth died in Jezreel. The harlots washed themselves in it follows the Hebrew; AV and some versions read 'they washed his armour'. Neither statement makes very much sense in the context. 39 The ivory house. Excavation of this palace brought to light many ivory carvings that were inlaid in the furniture and possibly in the walls also.

1 Ki. 22:41 – 2 Ki. 1:18 Conclusion of the Elijah cycle

Cf. 2 Ch. 20:31–34. When the original one-volume work was divided, '2 Kings' should have been indicated either at this point or at v. 51 (see Introduction).

22:41–50 Jehoshaphat of Judah. Cf. 2 Ch. 17–20; Josephus, Ant. ix.1–3. Most of the details of the reign of Jehoshaphat have already been told. Here are added: the unsuccessful attempt to open up the trade-route from Ezion-geber, and Jehoshaphat's refusal to enter into a trade-alliance with Ahaziah. Jehoshaphat is mentioned again in 2 Ki. 3:4ff. 41 Jehoshaphat: Abijam and Jehoshaphat are the only kings of Judah so far to have names compounded with the Yah-(Jeho-)/-yah (-ja or -jah) element (for Yahweh). Hereafter, except for Ahaz, Manasseh and Amon, all the kings of Judah will have such Yahwistic names. Ahaz may, however, be an abbreviation of Jeho-ahaz. In the fourth year of Ahab. There is a problem of chronology here, with a discrepancy of about 4 years; one solution is to assume a co-regency beginning in Asa's 39th year (cf. 2 Ch. 16:12), c. 873 BC, and to count Jehoshaphat's 25-year reign from that time. (For discussion, see E. R. Thiele, The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings, 1951, p. 65.) The reign of Jehoshaphat may be dated c. 870–848 BC. 43 He walked in all the way of Asa. In the summary, Jehoshaphat is praised for his manner of life, for making peace with Israel, and for getting rid of the remains of cult prostitution: he is criticized for not removing the high places. 48 Ships of Tarshish: see on 10:22.

22:51–53 Ahaziah of Israel. Cf. 2 Ch. 20:35 – 21:1; Josephus, Ant. ix.2. 51 He reigned two years. He began to reign in the 17th year of Jehoshaphat, and his successor began to reign in the 18th year (2 Ki. 3:1), hence one actual year is counted as two regnal years. The reign of Ahaziah may be dated c. 853–852 BC. 52 He did what was evil. Ahaziah is summarized in the worst possible way: he acted in the manner of Ahab, of Jezebel, and of Jeroboam; 53 he served Baal.

2 Ki. 1:1–4 Ahijah's injury and Elijah's mission. 1 Moab rebelled: cf. 3:4–27. The Mesha Inscription would put it in the 2nd year of Ahaziah. 2 The lattice: the details are not fully clear; probably there was a room built on the roof with a latticed window, partly for privacy and partly to keep out the strong light and to allow ventilation. Baal-zebub: lit. 'the fly-god', as LXX translates. From Ugaritic documents we conclude that his name was Baalzebul ('prince Baal' or 'Baal the prince'), similar to the form found in the NT. There was apparently a temple or centre of worship at Ekron, the Philistine city about 15 miles S of Joppa (Jos. 13:3). 3 The angel of the Lord said to Elijah: God sent Elijah to protest against this religious syncretism, and to foretell the death of Ahaziah.

1:5–8 Elijah's prophecy. 6 It is because there is no God in Israel. We fail to understand the religion of the OT if we do not understand the 'jealousy' of Yahweh. 8 A garment of haircloth: lit. 'a lord of hair', probably meaning that he owned a garment made of sheepskin, goatskin, or possibly camel-skin (cf. 1 Ki. 19:13; Zc. 13:4; Mt. 3:4). The king recognized Elijah from the description.

1:9–16 The captains and their fifties. Commentators find difficulty with this portion, for the action is not in keeping with the rest of the Elijah cycle. JB thinks it is an addition, traceable to the disciples of Elisha. Montgomery speaks of 'the preposterousness of the miraculous element' and its 'inhumanity with the destruction of the innocent fifties'. Keil points out that the demand was insolent, and he adds that the first two groups must have been guilty of some crime which they had to expiate with their death. This sounds like special pleading. We can agree with Keil that the double miracle was designed to show the authority which belonged to the prophet as the representative of God, but we can scarcely measure the morality of the act by NT standards. 13 The captain of a third fifty: the third captain saved his life and the life of his men by his entreaty, and then Elijah was instructed to go down with him.

1:17, 18 Summary of Ahaziah's reign. The conclusion of the account and the naming of his successor does not follow the standard formula (see Introduction). Moreover the chronology of 1:17, unless it follows a different system, is incompatible with the other references. In 3:1, Jehoram became king of Israel in the 18th year of Jehoshaphat who reigned 25 years (1 Ki. 22:42). This puts the accession of Jehoram from six to nine years earlier than the date in 1:17 (see on 22:42). Thiele suggests that Jehoram became co-regent in 3:1. 17 His brother: based on LXX and Syr. Hebrew does not include the word; but note the statement that Ahaziah had no son, and 3:1 where Jehoram is called 'the son of Ahab'.

2:1 - 10:36 THE ELISHA CYCLE

In this section are a number of stories about Elisha, including several miracles. Elisha's first miracle is the healing of the waters of the spring at Jericho, described in IB as 'the first of a series of wonder tales which are associated with the story of Elisha. They are unique in the O.T.'. We must frankly admit that the type of miracle generally performed by Elisha differs from other biblical miracles. In fact some of these miracles violate the first canon proposed to differentiate between true and spurious miracles, namely that there is a moral or ethical purpose in the true miracle, whereas the spurious miracle has no purpose other than to cause amazement. Once we have admitted this for the Elisha miracles, we are free to defend almost all of the remaining miracles in the Bible according to the canon of moral purpose. It remains therefore for us to discover a new purpose behind the miracles of Elisha.

2:1–25 Elijah is taken up and Elisha succeeds him

2:1–8 Elijah and Elisha go to the Jordan. 1 Gilgal: obviously not the one in the Jordan valley near Jericho, but another near Bethel, for they went down to Bethel (v. 2). Šanda supposes that it was near Baal-shalishah (4:42), either at Khirbet Sarisiyeh (14 miles N of Lydda) or Kefr Thulth (16 miles N of Lydda), and suggests that Gilgal was Jiljiliyeh, 6 miles W of Kefr Thulth. The story implies that the Lord has made known something of His plan not only to Elijah but also to Elisha and to the sons of the prophets (vv. 3, 5). 2 Tarry here: Elijah seems to want to face the experience alone; Elisha refuses to leave him. 3 The sons of the prophets: the word 'son' is used in the OT to mean a. a direct descendant, b. a distant descendant, and c. an apprentice in a guild. Obviously it is this last meaning that is used for the sons of the prophets, who were men who had attached themselves or were called to a prophet for training. By itself, the term would be capable of use for both true and false prophets. 5 At Jericho: there were sons of prophets in Bethel and in Jericho that we know of, and at least fifty of them (v. 7). 8 The water was parted: cf. Ex. 14:21.

2:9–12a Elisha's request and Elijah's departure. We are not specifically told that Elijah did not die, and his appearance with Moses on the Mount of Transfiguration certainly carries no such implication, since Moses according to Scripture had died and his body had been taken by the Lord (Dt. 34:6) or his angel (Jude 9). 9 Let me inherit a double share of your spirit: RSV hints at the correct meaning. False ideas have persisted: a. that Elisha had twice the gifts of the Spirit that Elijah had, which obviously is false in the light of Scripture (however, many who advocate this have done so in the name of Scripture); b. that Elisha received two-thirds of the portion of the Spirit that Elijah had. The figure—indeed the very expression—is taken from Dt. 21:17 where the double portion is the portion of the firstborn, or the heir. Elisha is asking to be recognized as the firstborn or heir of Elijah in relation to the other sons of the prophets. Elijah recognizes that this is not his to give, but that God can give it if He will. 11 A chariot of fire and horses of fire: note that it is not stated that Elijah was taken up in the chariot of fire. The chariot of fire separated Elijah and Elisha, and Elijah went up by a whirlwind. Not everyone was able to see the fiery chariot (cf. 6:17). Joash saw it on the occasion of Elisha's death (13:14). 12 The chariots of Israel and its horsemen! A cryptic statement, probably meaning that Elijah was of more value to Israel than all its horses and chariots.

2:12b–18 The spirit of Elijah rests on Elisha. 12 Rent them in two pieces, expressing grief. 14 And struck the water has no basis in either the Hebrew or the versions. Lucian and some MSS of Vulg. add 'and it was not divided'. English translations cover the fact that the phrase 'and he smote the waters' appears twice in this verse, by translating the second time to make it a dependent clause. The insertion of 'and they were not divided' after the first gives occasion for the question, 'Where is Yahweh, the God of Elijah, even He?' MT by its accents divides the verse differently, 'Even he, and he smote . . . ,' which makes little sense. 16 Let them go, and seek your master; the prophets who had followed saw Elisha with the mantle of Elijah, but how much more they had seen is not included. We are not told that they had seen the chariot of fire, or Elijah going up in the whirlwind. We are not even told that they had seen Elisha part the waters of the Jordan with Elijah's mantle. We can assume that Elisha told them something of what had happened, but obviously they did not fully believe the account and sent 50 men to search the mountains for him. After 3 days they reported that he had completely disappeared.

2:19–22 The curing of the spring at Jericho. This first miracle of Elisha's is among the 'least objectionable' of his miracles, for in this case the spring which was the source of life to the city had gone bad and, according to a popular view (superstitious or otherwise), its water was causing miscarriages. 19 The land is unfruitful, 'land' meaning the inhabitants, people and animals, although the verb used here refers only to human beings. 21 Threw salt in it. We do wrong to suppose that the salt corrected the cause, for Yahweh did it.

2:23–25 The disrespectful boys and the bears. This miracle presents more of a moral problem. It has been pointed out that Elisha was a prophet and no-one has a right to make fun of the Lord's prophets. But when this has been said, we must admit that there still is a far different spirit here than that of one who, when He was reviled, did not revile in return (1 Pet. 2:23). 23 Small boys: these were not 'little children' (AV). The Hebrew is 'youth' and is used also of older servants; 'little' may refer to character rather than age or size. You baldhead: Elisha probably had his head covered (which is a necessity in the Middle East because of the strength of the sun), and since he lived 50 years after this (13:14) it is unlikely that he was bald at this time. The term therefore was one of reproach.

3:1–27 The war with Moab

With this we should read the Moabite account in the Mesha Inscription (Moabite Stone).

3:1–3 Jehoram of Israel. The story of Jehoram needs the additional material of ch. 9 from which it has been separated by the material of the Elisha cycle. He removed the pillar of Baal but otherwise followed the sin of Jeroboam. His mother, Jezebel, was living throughout his whole reign (see 9:30). Jehu also destroyed a pillar of Baal (10:26), which raises the question whether there were two, and Jehoram destroyed only one. 2 The pillar of Baal: Gray points out that the Zenjirli Stele of Panammu has both an inscription and a relief of the god Hadad, likewise the stele by Ben-hadad to Baal-melqart has a low relief of the god. He suggests that this may be a similar stele with a carved image of Baal.

3:4–8 Rebellion of the king of Moab against Israel. 4 Sheep breeder. The word used here is found elsewhere in OT only in Am. 1. In a Ugaritic text a person appears as chief of the priests, chief of the sheepmasters or shepherds; hence the term is looked upon as an official office, but this can hardly be the case in Amos. Gray translates 'hepatoscopist' (a liver-reader), on the basis of UH 62, 54ff. Annually, based on the Targum. A hundred thousand lambs, and the wool of a hundred thousand rams: the payment seems to be rather high. LXX infers that it was a one-time payment, as indemnity. 8 The way of the wilderness of Edom would apparently mean by Wadi Ḥeṣi. This should have water in it throughout the year; but they found no water (v. 9).

3:9–12 The coalition of Israel, Judah, and Edom. Jehoram of Israel and Jehoshaphat of Judah are joined by the king of Edom. After a long march, Jehoshaphat asks for a prophet of Yahweh. Elisha is near by. We are not told whether he had been sent there by the Lord or whether he had accompanied the armies; Gray thinks they must have made a detour around to the head of the Wadi Ḥeṣi far to the east, since it took a week, and since the morning sun was on the water (v. 22). 11 Who poured water on the hands of Elijah: he ministered as the servant of Elijah.

3:13–20 Elisha prophesies deliverance. 13 What have I to do with you? Elisha's remark to Jehoram is rather trenchant, and the king's reply seems to be equally sarcastic, blaming their present predicament on the Lord. 15 Bring me a minstrel. For Jehoshaphat's sake Elisha agrees to seek the will of Yahweh, which he does by calling for the minstrel to play. Possibly we are to assume that Elisha had a minstrel with him for this purpose. It is too much, however, to assume that all prophets used music to induce some kind of ecstasy, for our only other indication of this is 1 Sa. 10:5ff. and this is not the same. 16 I will make (AV 'make'): MT has an infinitive which can serve as an imperative; but it also can serve as translated in RSV, which seems more likely in the context. Full of pools. Some interpreters have supposed that a storm in the mountains of Edom during the night brought water down into these pools. Others assume that the soldiers were ordered to dig and in this way they provided a place for ground water to gather. But everyone would have known about ground water; hence Gray thinks it was a flash-flood (cf. v. 20). 19 Every fortified city: Glueck discovered over 60 fortified settlements of the Iron Age in Moab.

Fell every good tree: in war this was banned (Dt. 20:19f.).

3:21–27 Partial victory over Moab. 21 Able to put on armour: instead of ages, descriptions are used; a boy fit for military service is called 'one wearing a girdle', as distinct from one running around with a loose shirt. Frontier, the S boundary. 22 Red as blood: from the red soil, or from the colour of the sunrise. 24 is somewhat difficult, but RSV seems to have the general sense. 25 Kir-hareseth is identified with Kerak, the southernmost fortress of Moab. Conquered, referring to Kir-hareseth, in the light of v. 26 is probably a poorer translation than AV 'smote it'. 26 When the king of Moab saw that the battle was going against him, he sacrificed his eldest son upon the wall, probably at Kir-hareseth, as a burnt-offering to Chemosh, the god of Moab. The king of Edom. One suggestion is that the king of Moab felt that his best chance to disrupt the coalition was to seek to get the king of Edom on his side. Other scholars, however, feel that this is a textual error for king of Aram: in other words the king of Moab was seeking to get an embassy through to get the help of the king of Aram. This hardly seems likely, but in any event it failed. The reading 'Aram' is actually found in the Old Latin text. 27 There came great wrath: the tide of battle suddenly turns and the Israelite coalition withdraws. Some scholars take the statement to mean that the sacrifice performed by the king of Moab was efficient and that Chemosh turned his anger against Israel—a highly unlikely suggestion. It is of course possible that the Israelites believed that the sacrifice to Chemosh was efficacious in his own land. The popular beliefs of the Israelites were often at variance with the revealed truth, or the views of the prophets.

4:1 – 8:15 Stories of Elisha

Cf. also ch. 9. This section includes a group of stories about Elisha, each story giving an account of some miraculous deed. These stories do not seem to be in chronological order.

4:1–7 Elisha and the widow's jar of oil. The widow of one of the sons of the prophets, identified in the Targum as the wife of Obadiah (1 Ki. 18:4), is faced with a debt and the creditor is going to take her two sons as slaves. When she appeals to Elisha for help he tells her to borrow vessels and fill them with oil from the small jar that she had. Snaith in IB makes the fine statement that 'the quantity of the oil was limited only by her faith in collecting empty vessels'. She sells the oil and uses the money to pay off the debt and to support her and her sons. Josephus adds (Ant. ix.4.2) that the money had been borrowed by Obadiah in order to feed the prophets. For the law on seizing the sons as slaves, see Ex. 21:7; Lv. 25:39; Am. 2:6; 8:6; etc. 2 Jar: an unusual word; it may refer to a very small vessel normally used for unguents.

4:8–37 Elisha and the Shunammite woman. (See also 8:1–6.) Shunem was a village a few miles N of Jezreel. 10 Lamp: not a 'candlestick' (AV), or a 'lampstand', but an ordinary pottery saucer-lamp with a pinched nozzle. 16 When the time comes round: AV 'according to the time of life' is probably better. Montgomery suggests 'according to the time of pregnancy'. It is quite similar to Gn. 18:10, 14. 21 Shut the door: to retain the nepeš or life-essence. 23 New moon . . . sabbath: these were already observed in Israel, but there is no support for the theory that on such days the people went to the prophet's house for religious service or instruction. It will be well: Heb. šālôm, which could simply be 'goodbye', terminating the discussion. The journey from Shunem to Carmel is about 25 miles. We assume that the servant was to walk beside the ass continually urging it on. 25 Elisha saw her coming and sent Gehazi to greet her, but obviously he had not been told her problem. 27 The Lord . . . has not told me. This does not imply that it was an unusual situation. We have no basis in Scripture to assume that prophets were omniscient; the Lord revealed to them only what He wanted them to know. 28 She rebukes him, pointing out that she had not asked for the son nor for the sorrow that followed. 31 No sound or sign of life: the child was really dead, which was not so clearly stated in the case of Elijah and the son of the widow at Zarephath (see on 1 Ki. 17:17). 35 He stretched himself upon him; the child sneezed seven times. In LXX 'the prophet stretched himself seven times upon the child', and there is no reference to sneezing. There are overtones of similarity between this miracle and the miracle that Elijah performed on the son of the widow at Zarephath (1 Ki. 17:17–24), but there are no other miracles in the OT having the slightest similarity to these.

4:38–41 Elisha and the poisoned pottage. As in the case of salt in the spring at Jericho (2:19–22), we are not to suppose that the meal in itself was effective. It was merely a prophetic act, and the miracle came from God. 38 A famine: probably that of 8:1. Sitting before him. It is sometimes assumed that they were there for instruction; a noun yeshiva from the verb 'to sit' later comes to mean 'school' (Ben Sira 51:29).

4:42–44 Elisha and the twenty loaves. There is no indication that this immediately follows the preceding miracle. As a matter of fact, it is likely that there is no famine at this time. We may assume that the men who were fed were members of Elisha's school of prophets. The offering of firstfruits should be made to the priests, but this does not prove that there were then no priests in Israel; we know that there were. It may be a private protest against the prophets of the crown at Samaria and a recognition that the true representative of God was Elisha. 42 Baal-shalishah, sometimes identified with a place about 14 miles N of Lydda in the Sharon plain (cf. 1 Sa. 9:4). If the 100 represent the school of prophets, we may notice that the figure 50 occurs in 2:7, 16, 17 and there were 100 prophets hidden by 50s in 1 Ki. 18:4. This is hardly enough to assume that such a school was formed normally of 50 or 100 prophets.

5:1–19a Elisha and Naaman the leper. At this time Israel seems to be a vassal of Syria—which may put it toward the end of the life of Elisha. The king's name is not given; it appears as Ben-hadad in 8:7. Likewise the name of the king of Israel is not given. 1 The Lord had given victory to Syria is in line with the views expressed in Am. 1. Leper is used for a number of different types of disease in the OT, but rarely if ever refers to Hansen's disease, commonly called 'leprosy'. 3 Prophet: Elisha here is not called 'man of God'. The verb cure means 'to heal', or 'cleanse'; used only here (3 times) in the OT. Gray suggests the Akkadian cognate asapu, 'to practise exorcism'. 5 Ten talents of silver: 30,000 shekels (about 12,000 oz; see on 1 Ki. 9:14). Six thousand shekels of gold: Heb. omits 'shekel'; AV adds 'pieces', but coinage had not yet been invented. A gift of 2,400 oz of gold would be lavish; together with the silver and 10 changes of garments, it is very much so.

11 Naaman was expecting some kind of a ritual of exorcism that would include calling on the name of Yahweh and waving the hand. 12 Abana and Pharpar: commonly identified with the Barada which flows through the centre of Damascus, and the Awaj, which flows farther S in the oasis of Damascus. 15 Present: Heb. lit. 'blessing', as in AV, but at least 6 times in the OT it means 'present' (cf. Gn. 33:11). 16 I will receive none. Elisha refused a gift. In a world of false prophets and wonder-workers, the true prophet of Yahweh could not afford to give the impression that he was living off his office, that he was prophesying for a morsel of bread or anything else. Neither could he give any indication that he was responsible for the ability to heal; this was the work of the Lord. 17 Earth: Naaman wanted to take soil from the holy land back to his home so he could continue to worship Yahweh. 18 He had one reservation, however; it would be necessary for him to accompany his king into the house of Rimmon (or Hadad), the god of Damascus, and whenever he did so he wanted to be pardoned by Yahweh. Leaning on my arm: a figure of speech indicating that he was the servant who was closest to the king. 19 Elisha's answer is non-committal, but it has given scholars all sorts of problems in former generations, and even led to establishing an artificial difference between true worship of the false god and joining in the ritual act without any faith in the act.

5:19b–27 Elisha and Gehazi. 21 He alighted: lit. 'he fell', but the Hebrew word means 'to get down suddenly' (Gn. 24:64; Am. 3:5), so we can translate 'he got down quickly'. 22 A talent of silver: 3,000 shekels (1,200 oz), no small amount. Naaman doubled this amount, putting the silver in two bags for two servants to carry. We assume that they had beasts of burden to haul such a weight of silver. 24 The hill: AV 'the tower', lit. 'theophel', but certainly not the one in Jerusalem. We assume that it was a part of the city where Elisha lived. LXX and Vulg. take it as 'evening darkness', misreading the Hebrew word. 25 Where have you been? 'I didn't go anywhere.' A very human touch in the story. 26 is somewhat difficult. Literally it is 'Did not my heart go with you when the man got down from his chariot to meet you? Is it a time to accept silver and to accept clothing, etc.?' Why the other items are added here is not clear. Targ., attempting to figure out the problem, inserted the words 'And thou hast thought in thy heart to buy olive orchards . . .'. 27 The severity of the punishment can be explained at least in part by the very serious negative effect the act of Gehazi would have on Naaman, resulting in the lowering of the reputation of the office of the true prophet of Yahweh.

6:1–7 The floating axe-head. This story seems to assume that we understand that the sons of the prophets lived in a common building (cf. 4:38). The place is often identified with Gilgal on the erroneous assumption that Gilgal is the one near Jericho, but see on 2:1. Possibly it was the school at Jericho. 4 Trees, such as willow, tamarisk, acacia and pine, used for light and not heavy timber (Gray). 5 Axe: lit. 'iron', but obviously an axe. It was borrowed: Heb. 'it was asked', or 'begged', suggesting that the sons of the prophets did not have funds to purchase such things. Keil says, 'The object of the miracle was similar to that of the stater in the fish's mouth (Mt. 17:27).'

6:8–23 The Syrian army captured. 8 Shall be my camp: probably meaning 'Let us make an ambush'. 9 Are going down there: probably to be translated 'have hidden themselves'. Montgomery rejects this suggestion, however, suggesting that the word may mean something like a military descent. 10 RSV attempts to get at the meaning by inserting he used to warn him. It indicates a close relationship between Elisha and the king of Israel. 12 It is assumed by some scholars that the reputation of Elisha's ministry to Naaman had gone before him; but the chronological sequence is certainly not clear. Gray thinks the very closeness between Hazael and Elisha might account for the allegation. 13 Dothan, about 10 miles N of Samaria and a very strategic location with a view of the roads N–S and E–W. 14 The size of the army is not indicated, but we get the impression that the king of Syria felt that the capture of Elisha would be difficult. 15 The servant of the man of God: Montgomery reads 'at dawn the man of God' but the rest of the verse is meaningless unless there was a servant who was filled with fear and whose eyes were opened to see the chariots of fire. 16 One of the great statements from Elisha's ministry. 19 This is not the way: the verse causes problems to those who feel that a man of God can under no circumstances speak a lie. However, we have to accept the statement in Scripture as it is. 21 My father: a rather unusual term of address by the king of Israel to Elisha. It would seem to belong to a different period from the next episode. See v. 31; cf. 8:9 and 13:14. 22 has caused much difficulty, and at least one version inserts the word 'not': 'Would you slay those whom you have not taken captive?' This is not found in other versions. The difficulty however is unresolved. JB says, 'Unless an anathema had been pronounced by Yahweh, and apart from individual cases, it was not Israelite custom to kill prisoners of war, cf. 1 Ki. 20:31.' Elisha pleads for them and they are feasted and then sent away. The result is probably indicated intentionally in the closing words, The Syrians came no more on raids into the land of Israel.

6:24–31 The siege of Samaria. It is not possible to date this event precisely. If this is the Ben-hadad who was assassinated in 844 BC the incident would fall in the reign of Jehoram. One thing is certain: there is no close connection in time between vv. 23 and 24. 24 Afterward: obviously not the event in v. 23. Ben-hadad: according to JB, Ben-hadad III of Damascus. Gray thinks it could only have been Ben-hadad III the son of Hazael. 25 An ass's head. The ass was unclean and therefore could not be eaten; but conditions had become unbearable. Eighty shekels: LXX '50 shekels', but even 50 shekels is almost $30.00 (over £12). The fourth part of a kab: 'kab' is not used elsewhere and there is no certainty of the quantity. Rabbinic sources indicate 2 quarts (see IDB, vol. 4, p. 835a). See, however, NBD, p. 1323. Dove's dung: it is suggested that this was the popular name of some weed. Five shekels: perhaps $3.00 (over £1). 26, 27 Help, . . . O king! The king's answer indicates the extremity of the situation. If the Lord will not help you: Montgomery prefers 'Not so! Yahweh save thee!' 28 In compassion the king asks the woman what her particular problem is. 29 The cannibalism described seems incredible to us, but all the details here can be paralleled from other historical writings. Cf. Dt. 28:56f.; La. 2:20; 4:10; Ezk. 5:10. Josephus cites cannibalism in the siege of Jerusalem (Wars vi.3.4), and likewise it appears in Ashurbanipal's siege of Babylon (D. D. Luckenbill, Ancient Records of Assyria and Babylonia, 2, §794). 30 The king was wearing sackcloth beneath his clothing, in secret but probably sincere penitence. 31 A bit difficult, but RSV certainly has the sense of it. We are not told the background or why the king blamed Elisha. We assume that Elisha had urged him to withstand the siege of the Syrians, promising deliverance. On the other hand the famine might have been the result of the 7-year drought which Elisha had prophesied (see 8:1).

6:32 – 7:2 Elisha's prophecy. 32 This murderer (Heb. 'son of a murderer'): AV translates literally, but the Hebrew idiom simply means that he belongs to the class of murderers. It is not necessary to apply this to Jehoram, son of Ahab. There may be some confusion in these verses because of the similarity of the Hebrew words for 'king' and 'messenger'. The king: Heb. 'he'. 33 The king: Heb. 'messenger'. V. 33 is difficult and does not seem to fit the king's purposes expressed in v. 31. It would make sense, however, if we assume that Elisha had previously told the king not to yield to Syria, but to withstand the siege and the Lord would deliver them. 7:1 Measure: a seah, a third of an ephah, about a bushel. 2 Captain (Heb. 'third man'; see on 1 Ki. 9:22): the king's aide on whose hand the king leaned.

7:3–15 The flight of the Syrians. 4 is quite complicated, but RSV has the meaning. 5 At twilight: in the evening (see v. 12). 6 The sound of chariots. The explanation of the flight of the Syrians is given. Gray thinks it was a 'rumour' rather than a sound. How this miracle was performed we are not told. The kings of the Hittites, the Syro-Hittites. The kings of Egypt: better 'Musri', for nowhere in Scripture or outside does the expression the kings of Egypt occur. Musri was Cappadocia, and neighbour to the Syro-Hittites (see on 1 Ki. 10:28f.). The Musri are known to have been in alliance with Damascus against Assyria in 853, 849, and 846 BC. However, it is unlikely these events are earlier than 842. Mention of Ben-hadad indicates a date after 797 BC, when Ben-hadad III came to the throne. 9 Punishment: Heb. 'evil', or its consequences; hence RSV is correct. The lepers were sure that if they did not let everyone in on the good news they would suffer some kind of punishment. 10 The report was incredible, and 12 the king suspected a plot. 13 One of his servants suggests that he risk five horses, which would be little risk since they would perish of starvation anyway. This is a very complex verse, but the meaning seems to be clear. 14 Two mounted men: there is no contradiction, since the mention of five was merely a suggestion.

7:16–20 The people of Samaria plunder the Syrian camp. 16 A measure of fine meal. IB makes this $1.50 a bushel; barley half that price. 18–20 are quite repetitious. Some scholars reject the portion as a doublet; others accept it as a moralizing summary of the writer. The captain, who had doubted Elisha's prophecy, does not live to see its fulfilment.

8:1–6 Sequel to the story of the Shunammite woman. This seems to be a continuation of the story in 4:8–37. Obviously the dates of the two parts of the story have to be placed on each side of the 7-year famine period, and the end of that period has to be placed prior to the healing of Naaman, at which time Gehazi became a leper (5:27). On the rights of possession, cf. Ex. 21:2; 23:10f. 3 Appeal to the king: lit. 'cry to the king', as in AV, the verb being a legal term; cf. Akkadian ragâmu, 'to cry out, make a claim'.

8:7–15 Elisha and Hazael of Syria. This incident is probably to be dated before that in 6:27 – 7:20, since the Ben-hadad of that episode was the son of Hazael. The passage obviously has several difficulties. The event took place between 846 and 842 BC, for in the Bull Inscription of 846 BC Shalmaneser III records victory over Ben-hadad, and in his Obelisk Inscription, 842

BC, he records a victory over Hazael in Damascus. In an undated inscription he says that Hazael, son of a nobody, seized the throne. This would have been during the reign of Jehoram of Judah and at most 3 years before Jehu seized the throne of Israel. We may possibly assume that Elisha had been sent to Damascus to anoint Hazael, since this had been part of the commission given to Elijah at Horeb (1 Ki. 19:15), which Elijah must certainly have transmitted to Elisha. We might suppose that the event is later than the healing of Naaman, which would account for Elisha's reputation at the court in Damascus.

9 All kinds of goods . . . , forty camel loads. Commentators have questioned this vast amount of material. It was customary to take a gift (cf. 1 Sa. 9:7; 1 Ki. 14:3; Ex. 23:15). 10 Say to him, You shall certainly recover. MT reads 'Say, you shall not recover', but in the light of the versions and 18 Heb. MSS, the reading 'to him' seems to be original, and the change to not (which involves but one letter in Hebrew and no change in pronunciation) seems an attempt of a later scribe to get rid of an embarrassing lie on the part of the man of God. This can be rationalized by supposing that the king would have recovered if he had not been smothered to death. The second problem that has bothered interpreters is the involvement of Elisha in the murder of the king. Did he put the idea in the mind of Hazael? V. 13 may suggest this. 11 also has difficulties. Who fixed his gaze, and stared at whom? Generally it is taken to mean that Elisha gazed at Hazael, and the suggestion has been made that he went into a trance at this point and received a vision of the horrors that Hazael would commit as king. Josephus, the Lucianic Greek version and a few modern scholars make the subject 'Hazael', because a new subject is introduced in the latter part of the verse, and the man of God wept. 12 The details seem to have originated in a vision which the Lord gave to Elisha. Cf. 2 Ki. 10:32f.; Am. 1:3–5. Then again, 2 Ki. 13:3–7; Ho. 10:14; 13:16 cast light on the prophecy. 13 Who is but a dog: a common cliché of humility, found in several documents of the Ancient Middle East. 15 Coverlet: a Hebrew word otherwise unknown. Gray suggests a 'net', woven of rough goat-hair and used as a tent cloth, a mosquito net, or, if soaked, an air conditioner. He thinks the point is that someone would come to take the netting away, wet it again, and hang it up, and they would notice that the king had died—supposedly (Gray doesn't say) an accidental death. This plays fast and loose with the text. The subject is not mentioned. JB adds, perhaps facetiously, 'Presumably this was how Hazael murdered Ben-hadad, not how Ben-hadad committed suicide.'

8:16–24 Jehoram of Judah

Cf. 2 Ch. 21:1–20 (much fuller); Josephus, Ant. ix.5. 16 In the fifth year: see 8:25 and 1 Ki. 22:42, 51; 2 Ki. 3:1. Jehoshaphat must have been co-regent with Asa, and the reigns of Ahaziah and Jehoram of Israel must be reckoned from the time when he was sole king. The reign of Joram of Judah may be dated c. 848–841 BC, with co-regency from c. 853. Joram, a shortened form of Jehoram. The two kings therefore had the same name, and the northern king is normally called 'Joram'. MT adds 'Jehoshaphat was king of Judah' after king of Israel, but this is omitted in LXX, some Heb. MSS, and RSV. 17 Eight years: the figure varies in the versions, apparently in an attempt to work out the chronology. 18 Daughter of Ahab: in v. 26 Athaliah is named as granddaughter of Omri. 19 His sons: MT 'before him', but many Heb. MSS and the major versions support RSV. 21 Zair, sometimes identified with Zoar of Gn. 13:10. Gray suggests it might be Zior of Jos. 15:54, 5 miles NE of Hebron. 22 Then Libnah revolted: nothing else is known about this revolt, and the site has not been positively identified.

8:25–29 Ahaziah of Judah

Cf. 2 Ch. 22:1–6; Josephus, Ant. ix.5. His reign is very brief, and can be dated in 841 BC. The author breaks into the record of Ahaziah to tell of Jehu king of Israel, and we read of Ahaziah's death in 9:27–29.

9:1 – 10:36 Jehu's revolution

9:1–10 The anointing of Jehu. Elisha sends one of his disciples to Ramoth-gilead to anoint Jehu. Joram had taken Jehu there to make war with Hazael (8:28), but Joram was wounded and returned to Jezreel and Ahaziah of Judah had gone to pay a visit to Joram. The anointing is carried out in secret, but as soon as Jehu's fellow-officers learn of it they proclaim him king. The secret anointing was similar to that of Saul and David (1 Sa. 10:1; 16:13). 2 Jehu was also the name of a prophet (1 Ki. 16:1). Nimshi: cf. v. 20 and 1 Ki. 19:16; he is otherwise unknown. In Assyrian inscriptions Jehu is called 'son of Omri', but obviously 'son of Omri' is used in a very loose sense. The Black Obelisk of Shalmaneser III recording the paying of tribute by Jehu, datable in 841 BC, is one of the fixed points in working out the chronology of the kings of the OT. Jehu's dynasty will be the longest in the history of Israel, but the name of Omri will continue to be used in foreign inscriptions. (For the Black Obelisk Inscription, see ANET, p. 281.) 3 Anoint: the verb in Hebrew is from the same root as the word for 'Messiah', which means 'the anointed'. 4 The young man, the prophet: MT repeats 'the young man' before the prophet. 5 In council. The suggestion has been made that Jehu and his commanders may have been hatching up a plot to overthrow the government. 7–10a Cf. 1 Ki. 17–19; 21:23; 14:10ff.

9:11–13 Jehu proclaimed king. 11 This mad fellow. It has been suggested that this word was regularly used for the prophets because of their ecstatic behaviour. Gray has a very good comment including the words 'certainly what impresses us is the sanity rather than the abnormality of these great figures . . . in our opinion, the truth is that ecstasy was indeed a characteristic of Hebrew poetry but that this varied in degree from the wild and often pointless behaviour and utterance of the "sons of the prophets" ' (p. 488). 12 That is not true: in Hebrew just one word, bluntly, 'lie'. They knew something important had happened and that Jehu was simply trying to stall, and they were not disappointed with the true report. 13 Bare steps: the meaning of the Hebrew word is not known, and many suggestions have been made, 'the landing at the top of the steps' being the most satisfactory guess. (Cf. Mt. 21:7.)

9:14–20 Jehu hastens to Jezreel. Jehu acts at once to keep the news from getting back to Jezreel ahead of him, for this would give the king a chance to mount resistance. 14, 15 repeat what was said in 8:28, 29 and sound like a scribal insertion at this point. Some scholars propose reading 'Jehu' for Joram in v. 14b which then would say that when Joram returned to Jezreel he left a guard at Ramoth-gilead under the command of Jehu. 17 He spied the company of Jehu (LXX 'he saw a dust cloud'), and at once sent a horseman to discover what it was. This was repeated when the first did not return, and by the time the second one had reached them the guard was able to discern Jehu's driving. 19 What have you to do with peace? Heb. idiom, 'What do you and peace have in common?' 20 Furiously: lit. 'madly', from the same root as 'mad fellow' in v. 11; Targ. and Josephus read 'quietly', but this does not fit the rest of the story.

9:21–26 Jehu, the reformer, slays Joram of Israel. 22 Harlotries, sorceries: these words are obviously used figuratively; yet the religious practices of Baal worship make the figures all too appropriate. 23 Joram sees that he is about to be assassinated and tries to flee and warn Ahaziah; Jehu is too fast for them.

9:27–29 The death of Ahaziah of Judah. 27 Beth-haggan: the proper name is better than AV 'the garden house'; it is generally identified with En-Gannim, modern Jenin, 7 miles S of Jezreel, and 1 mile N of Ibleam, mentioned later in the verse. And they shot him: RSV follows Syr. and Vulg., which makes good sense. 28 Cf. 2 Ch. 22:9, which seems likely to be a midrash. 29 Eleventh: cf. 8:25 'twelfth'; we assume that the reign was less than a year. The verse is out of place according to the usual scheme.

9:30–37 The death of Jezebel in fulfilment of Elijah's prophecies. 30 She painted her eyes: lit. 'put her eyes in antimony' or 'kohl'; it seems she wanted to die in all her beauty. 31 The height of sarcasm; better rendered, 'How are you, you Zimri, murderer of your master?' This refers to Zimri who wiped out the house of Baasha (1 Ki. 16:9–15), but who reigned only 7 days. 34 Gray sees here a typical Semitic communal meal serving to bind Jehu in the community, but there is no hint of this in the text. It seems rather that he was allowing occasion for fulfilment of the word of Elijah, 36 to which he refers. Cf. 1 Ki. 21:23.

10:1–11 The purge of Ahab's house. Jehu undertakes the destruction of every male in the royal line, to forestall a blood feud and to protect his own dynasty. His approach is clever. He subtly challenges them to put the successor on the throne, which they wisely refuse to do and bow before him, offering to meet his terms. His terms are the heads of the king's descendants, which they send. 1 Seventy sons. The figure may be symbolic, and the word 'son' does not necessarily mean direct sons (cf. Ex. 1:5). Letters, meaning 'a letter'. Rulers of the city: MT reads 'Jezreel'; RSV follows LXX and Vulg. We suggest that the actual letter might have begun with the words 'To the elder princes of Jezreel and to the guardians of [the line] of Ahab speak:' and then continued with v. 2. This is the standard opening of a letter, and it makes clear that Jehu is directing his remarks to the former line of Ahab which had been located at Jezreel. Saying: perhaps the equivalent of 'speak' found in documents of the period. 5 He who was over the palace, and he who was over the city: titles of offices. Guardians: the word that is used of Mordecai with reference to Esther; no doubt some of the house of Ahab were minors. 9 You are innocent. Probably a word of assurance that the blood-bath is over, or that no further revenge will be allowed. 11 suggests that Jehu wiped out not only the immediate male descendants, but all of the noblemen, close friends, and priests. For great men, or 'noblemen', however, Lucian reads 'all his kindred'.

10:12–14 The massacre of Ahaziah's kinsmen. Because Jezebel's daughter had married the king of Judah, the house of Ahaziah is also an abomination to Jehu, so he orders their death. 12 Beth-Eked: Eusebius identified it as Baitqad, about 3 miles NE of Jenin. Gray suggests that the place may have been a market centre. 13 It is not clear how the kinsmen of Ahaziah had failed to hear of the assassinations. 14 Forty-two: some scholars feel that this number has some kind of symbolism; if so, this figure is a round number (cf. 2:24).

10:15–28 The massacre of the Baal worshippers. 15 Jehonadab the son of Rechab: the Rechabites, who insisted on living in the old ways of their fathers, dwelling in tents, and having nothing to do with Canaanite customs, are mentioned only here and in Je. 35. For the genealogy of Rechab, cf. 1 Ch. 2:55; 4:11ff. Jehonadab was the 'father' or leader of the sect (Je. 35:6). According to Josephus (Ant. ix.6.6) Jehu and Jehonadab were friends of long standing. Jehu wants to know if Jehonadab is in agreement with his policy. He is. Is your heart true . . .? from LXX; Heb. 'Is it right with your heart as my heart is with your heart?' for which Montgomery suggests, 'Do we see straight and alike?' Jehu said is omitted in Hebrew but found in LXX and obviously necessary for the sense. 16 He had him ride: Heb. 'they'; LXX and versions read

'he' which is obviously correct. 18 Jehu may have been using a play on words: Heb. 'ābaḏ, 'served'; 'ăḇaḏ, 'destroyed'. To a person not paying close attention, the words would sound alike. Both words are used in the last sentence in v. 19. 19 All his worshippers. We may assume that in spite of Jehu's intent, some will slip through to worship Baal another day. Sacrifice: the Heb. word means both 'to sacrifice' and 'to slaughter'. With cunning: 'by subtlety'. 20 Sanctify: Syr. and Targ. read 'call'. The expression 'sanctify an assembly', however, is regularly used. Solemn assembly: an unusual Hebrew word, possibly a closing festival (Lv. 23:36; Dt. 16:8), in which case there would be a double meaning here. 22 Wardrobe: apparently special garments were used for the Baal service. 24 He went in, as LXX; Heb. 'they'. 25 The inner room of the house of Baal: Hebrew seems to say 'city of the house of Baal', which makes no sense; but the same or a similar Hebrew word is now known to mean 'altar' or 'inmost shrine', according to Ugaritic evidence. 26 The pillar . . . in the house of Baal: Heb. 'pillars'; but burned it supports the singular. The word usually refers to a stone image, possibly carved in low relief, but obviously this could not be burnt, so we must either assume a wooden pillar or emend the word burned to 'broke', which would fit v. 27. 27 To this day: i.e. to the time of the writing of this account.

10:29–31 The word of Yahweh to Jehu. In spite of his anti-Baal reforms, Jehu does not attempt to clean up the idolatry of Jeroboam, nor does he strive to walk in the law of the Lord. For his reform measures God promises him a dynasty that will last until the fourth generation.

10:32–36 Summary of Jehu's reign. 32 The weakness of Assyria made it possible for Hazael to take over all of the territory E of the Jordan, which was held until Adad-nirari III conquered Damascus in 805 BC. Thus Yahweh began to cut off parts of Jehu's kingdom. 33 Aroer: modern Ara'ir just N of the Wadi Mujib (Arnon) about 10 miles E of the Dead Sea. 36 The reign of Jehu may be dated 841–814 BC.

11:1 – 17:41 FROM JEHU'S REVOLT TO THE FALL OF THE NORTHERN KINGDOM

This is a hectic period for Israel, including Elisha's last message, war with Amaziah of Judah, a time of conspiracy and overthrow of rulers, the paying of heavy tribute to Assyria, and finally the siege and capture of the northern kingdom by Assyria. During the same period, Judah has her problems, beginning with the usurpation of the throne by Athaliah the daughter of Jezebel, and including both the reforms of Jehoash and the idolatries of Ahaz. But most of all, it is a period of increasing dependence upon foreign alliance, rather than trust in Yahweh. At this time, Yahweh sends His servants the prophets, notably Isaiah and Micah to Judah, and Amos and Hosea to Israel.

11:1–20 Athaliah of Judah

Cf. 2 Ch. 22:10–23; Josephus, Ant. ix.7. The reign of Athaliah may be dated 841–835 BC.

11:1–3 Athaliah usurps the throne, but Joash is placed in safe custody. 2 Jehosheba, the daughter of King Joram, according to 2 Ch. 22:11, was the wife of Jehoiada the high priest. About to be slain, a paraphrase; Heb. participle simply means 'being slain'. And his nurse: critics suggest that this is a gloss from Chronicles. Bedchamber: according to Josephus (Ant. ix.7.1), a room where mattresses and couches were stored. 3 In the house of the Lord: probably the priests' quarters, since Joash remained with the priest's wife.

11:4–16 The overthrow of Athaliah and crowning of Joash. 4 Jehoiada: see on v. 2. Captains of the Carites: probably the 'Cherethites' in 2 Sa. 20:23; in 2 Ch. 23:1–21 the Levites take the place of the Carites. 5–7 The passage is obscure; some scholars omit v. 6. In any event the coup was planned for the sabbath and if Skinner is correct, this was because two companies of the guard were in the Temple on the sabbath and only one company in the king's house. In any event, it seems that they immediately placed the young Joash under heavy guard and proclaimed him king. 12 Testimony: some scholars emend to read 'bracelets' (cf. 2 Sa. 1:10), but the word testimony is supported by all versions and according to Gray was the feature of the coronation ritual associated with the covenant of David, and signified the king's obligations in the covenant.

11:17–20 The covenant of the people. The Davidic dynasty had been broken temporarily by the reign of Athaliah. It is therefore appropriate that the covenant should be proclaimed once more. 18 Mattan: perhaps the full name was Mattan-Baal, 'the gift of Baal'; cf. Mattaniah, 'the gift of Yahweh'.

11:21 – 12:21 Jehoash (Joash) of Judah

Cf. 2 Ch. 24:1–14; Josephus, Ant. ix.8.2–4. Joash is a faithful king, but unable to accomplish reforms.

11:21 – 12:3 Introductory statement. Joash is only 7 when he comes to the throne, hence his reign is unusually long. 21 Jehoash: the longer form of the name, normally 'Joash'. In the Hebrew text this is 12:1. 1 Forty years: according to Gray this includes the 6 years' reign of Athaliah; however, Thiele is able to work out his chronology without this feature. The reign of Joash may be dated 835–796 BC. 2 All his days; in AV and the ancient versions this is taken to be modified by the following clause, which limits the faithfulness of Joash to the days during which he received instruction from Jehoiada. This would be in line with the statement in 2 Ch. 24:2.

12:4–16 Repairs to the Temple. There may be a hint of mishandling of money. At any rate Joash felt it necessary to undertake the refurbishing of the Temple, but after 23 years nothing has been done; therefore he takes firmer measures. We find it hard to praise him for waiting so long. The 'Joash chest', which has become the model for collections in some Christian churches, was originally designed to forestall the dishonesty of the priests, the money being counted by the king's secretary and the high priest. The men to whom they gave the money to pay the workmen were considered to be more honest than the priests who had been by-passed. 4 Each man is assessed: this follows LXX and seems to be a reasonable explanation of the Hebrew word used. It seems clear that there were two kinds of money involved—the tax and the voluntary offering. 5, 7 Acquaintances: a technical term which occurs in Ugaritic texts along with priests, temple prostitutes, and silver casters. The suggestion has been made that they were 'assessors', possibly to help the priests fix the costs or value of sacrificial animals and other offerings. Montgomery suggests a class of Temple tellers, similar to the money-changers of Mt. 21:12. There is no date given for this plan to repair the Temple. It might have been not many years before the 23rd year (v. 6), but this seems unlikely.

9 Beside the altar. This probably should be emended with Codex A of LXX to read 'pillar', which would put it by the door where the guardians of the threshold would have custody of it. The suggestion has been made that the breach between the king and Jehoiada the priest (2 Ch. 24:6–14) may have occurred at this time. Gray supposes that Jehoiada was old and incapable and there was neglect of the Temple, and Joash used this step as a means of freeing himself and his nation from priestly domination. The first step was to get rid of the assessors, or tellers, in the Temple; the second step was to relieve the priests of their responsibility; and the third step was to assert royal authority in the Temple by putting a royal fiscal officer alongside the chief priest in handling the funds. 10, 11 Money: coinage was not yet in existence. Metal was weighed out, and as early as the 9th century standard weights of metal were stamped with the mark of private tradesmen guaranteeing the purity and the weight—which was the first step toward coinage. It is possible that the assessor had the responsibility of evaluating metal that was brought to the Temple, and this became one of the functions of the king's secretary and the high priest when they counted and tied up in bags the money. The words used in the Hebrew here literally mean 'fashioned and counted', the first word possibly meaning 'to smelt into ingots' (cf. Je. 18:11; Zc. 11:13). In the light of this discussion we can see how money-changers had become a necessary part of the Temple. 13 These items had disappeared from the Temple in the looting and the various attempts to buy off foreign powers. Possibly this was another restriction on the priests to prevent them from manufacturing such items.

12:17, 18 Joash buys off Hazael of Syria. 17 Against Gath. To reach this point Hazael and the Syrian army had to come through much of Judah, probably with the consent, willing or otherwise, of Israel. Jerusalem was in serious danger and Joash bought time at the expense of the treasuries of the Temple and the palace.

12:19–21 Summary of Joash's reign. The perilous state of affairs is indicated by the fact that Joash's servants conspired to put him to death. According to 2 Ch. 24:25, 26, the assassination was in revenge for Joash's part in the death of Zechariah, son of Jehoiada. 20 The house of Millo: cf. Jdg. 9:6; Gray suggests the quarters of the garrison, or barracks.

13:1–9 Jehoahaz of Israel

This is a dark period in the history of the northern kingdom. The king did evil and the Lord gave the country into the hand of Hazael king of Syria and his son Ben-hadad. In response to the appeal of Jehoiada, Yahweh gave some relief in the days of Ben-hadad. 1 In the twenty-third year of Joash. The reign of Jehoahaz may be dated c. 814–796 BC. 7 An army of more than fifty horsemen and ten chariots and ten thousand footmen: cf. the size of Ahab's army according to the Assyrian record: 2,000 chariots and 10,000 footmen.

13:10–13 Jehoash of Israel

Cf. Josephus, Ant. ix.8.6, 7. Jehoash is also called Joash, which adds to the confusion with Jehoash (Joash) of Judah. His 16-year reign, which is dismissed with the evaluation in v. 11, may be dated 798–c. 782 BC. 10 Thirty-seventh year: according to 13:1 and 14:1 it should be the 39th year, hence we assume a co-regency of 2 years, 798–796 BC. 12 Cf. 14:11.

13:14–25 Closing events of the Elisha cycle

Elisha draws near to the close of a long ministry that extended over more than 60 years and six kings of Israel. His age is not told, but estimated to be between 80 and 90. His final prophecy is in symbolic action, and serves to rebuke the lack of faith of Joash of Israel.

13:14–19 Elisha's last message to Jehoash of Israel. 14 The words of Joash to him are reminiscent of Elisha's words to Elijah at the time of his translation. 16 Draw the bow: cf. Joshua stretching out the spear (Jos. 8:18). Some scholars believe this is sympathetic magic, but there is no indication of this in Scripture. It and the striking of the ground seem to be purely symbolic.

13:20, 21 Elisha's death. His bones are instrumental in yet one more miracle. The place is not identified. Since the Moabites regularly invaded the region it may have been Jericho. 20 The spring of the year: lit. 'the coming in of the year'; Snaith thinks it was autumn.

13:22–25 Victories over Syria. The symbolic prophecies of Elisha are fulfilled. About the time that Ben-hadad became king, Syria is turned back and Israel is given relief. Some scholars feel this was partly due to the fact that the Assyrian king Adad-nirari III subjected Damascus in 805, but this date does not fit the biblical chronology, nor does it supply a basis for altering the biblical chronology.

14:1–22 Amaziah of Judah

Cf. 2 Ch. 25; Josephus, Ant. ix.9. Amaziah is a strong king, putting to death the murderers of his father, defeating the Edomites possibly while trying to extend his kingdom to the Gulf of Aqabah (cf. v. 22), and attempting war with Jehoash of Israel. In this last phase he is defeated and Jerusalem is looted. The people revolt against Amaziah, pursue him to Lachish, and put him to death.

14:1–7 Introductory statement. Amaziah is a 'good' king, but he does not remove the high places. He avenges his father's death. He defeats the Edomites and takes Sela. 2 He reigned twenty-nine years: some scholars would reduce this figure to 9 years, but this would not agree with v. 17 which states he lived 15 years beyond Jehoash of Israel. Thiele assumes a co-regency with Azariah beginning in Amaziah's 6th year, which would be a 24-year co-regency, unusually long, but then so is Azariah's 52-year reign. The reign of Amaziah may be dated c. 796–767 BC, but possibly from 791 Azariah was co-regent. Cf. 14:21. Jehoaddin: so Q and versions; MT 'Jehoyadin'. 5 He killed his servants: he put to death those who had been responsible for the assassination of his father, but 6 he did not put to death the children: cf. Dt. 24:16. 7 Valley of Salt: the plain S of the Dead Sea. Sela is often identified with Petra (Jdg. 1:36: Is. 16:1); but here that would seem to be miles out of the way. According to Gray, Jdg. 1:36 locates Sela in the Arabah S of the Dead Sea, near the Ascent of Scorpions. That would fit the present text. Gray supposes that when the Aramaeans penetrated as far as Gath this gave the Edomites occasion to take over some Judean territory. The independence of Edom at this time is found in the Assyrian Inscriptions and also reflected by Am. 1:11, 12.

14:8–14 War with Jehoash of Israel. 9 The parable of the thistle and the cedar is almost an insult thrown at Amaziah by Jehoash. Amaziah is not frightened, so they engage in battle at Beth-shemesh with disastrous results. 10 Be content with your glory: this gets the meaning very well; the Hebrew is contemptuous: 'Be glorified and stay home!' 11 Beth-shemesh, W of Jerusalem; hence Jehoash was marching from the coastal region. With the temporary collapse of Syria, Israel must have taken over the territory adjacent to the Philistines. According to 2 Ch. 25:6ff., Amaziah had Israelites in his army but sent them back before invading Edom, creating bad blood between the two nations. 13 Four hundred cubits, about 600 ft. Ephraim Gate: generally taken to be in the N wall. Corner Gate: some place at the NE (or NW?) angle. The destruction of the wall could not have been very great, since Ahaziah repaired it and refortified it rather easily (2 Ch. 26:9). 14 Hostages: the only mention of hostages in the OT; possibly an effort to enforce peace.

14:15, 16 Summary of the reign of Jehoash of Israel. This is an unusual arrangement, for generally the author tells the story of one king to the end of his reign. Jehoash of Israel was introduced in 13:10, and Amaziah of Judah in 14:1. Their summaries are now given in the same order. See Introduction.

14:17–22 Summary of the reign of Amaziah of Judah. See note on previous section. 17 Fifteen years: this figure is rejected or altered by many scholars (cf. on 14:2). 19 Conspiracy: we are not told who was responsible and the reason for it. It is reasonable to assume that it was a reaction against his going to war with Israel. Lachish, identified with Tell ed-Duweir, c. 25 miles SW of Jerusalem. 21 All the people. Perhaps the conspiracy was an intrigue of just a small group, possibly some of the military. Azariah, also called 'Uzziah'. IB suggests that 'Uzziah' arose by the accidental omission of a letter from Hebrew 'Azariah', but we would have to assume that this had happened not only in Kings but also in Chronicles, Isaiah, Hosea, Amos and Zechariah. It is much better to assume that one form was the throne name and the other a personal name. Sixteen years old. There are serious chronological difficulties here. By reading the verse as past perfect, 'The people had taken Azariah when he was sixteen and made him king' (either as co-regent, or possibly even as a rival king of Amaziah), we avoid the difficulty, and at the same time can account for the position of this statement at this point in the text. Cf. 14:2. 22 Elath: the modern town of Aqabah at the NE corner of the Gulf of Aqabah, opposite the Israeli town which bears the name Elath today.

14:23–29 Jeroboam ben Joash (Jeroboam II) of Israel

Cf. Josephus, Ant. ix.10.1, 2. According to some scholars, Jeroboam II was the most successful of all the kings of Israel. The prosperity of the land in his days is reflected in Amos, Hosea and Is. 28. In reconstructing the chronology of the period, we conclude that he became co-regent c. 793 for a period of about 12 years before assuming the sole reign of the northern kingdom. 23 The fifteenth year of Amaziah: this must mark the beginning of the sole reign, while forty-one years would seem to include a co-regency of 12 years. The reign of Jeroboam II may be dated c. 782–753 with a co-regency from c. 793 BC. 25 The entrance of Hamath: see on 1 Ki. 8:65. The Sea of the Arabah: either the Dead Sea or the Gulf of Aqabah. Jonah the son of Amittai, the prophet: cf. Jon. 1:1. Gath-hepher: a town in Zebulun (Jos. 19:13). 26 None left, bond or free: see on 1 Ki. 14:10. 27 He saved them by the hand of Jeroboam: God used Jeroboam, in spite of what is said about him in v. 24. 28 Some scholars feel this should be reworded, possibly 'his might in war with Damascus, and how he turned away the wrath of Yahweh from Israel'. As the verse stands it is not clear.

15:1–7 Azariah (Uzziah) of Judah

Cf. 2 Ch. 26 (with a long addition); Josephus, Ant. ix.10.3, 4. Little is recorded of Azariah's reign except the fact that he was smitten with leprosy (cf. 2 Ch. 26:16–21). Jotham was acting king or co-regent for about 13 years. 1 Azariah. Montgomery assumes that Azariah was the throne name, Uzziah an adopted name. Much confusion has resulted from the appearance of the name 'Azriau of Yaudi' in the annals of Tiglath-pileser for the year 738 (D. D. Luckenbill, Ancient Records of Assyria and Babylonia, 1, §770, etc.). It is inconceivable that a king of Judah could have connections that far north at such a weak period of his history. It is equally difficult to believe that two kings of the same name could be occupying different territories of the same name, or very similar names; yet the solution offered by a number of scholars is that Azriau was king of the northern kingdom of Yaudi, later known as Sam'al in N Syria, modern Turkey. This is not the place to enter into a discussion of this very complex problem. We note that Montgomery in ICC subscribes to the northern Yaudi view. Thiele opts for the identification of Azriau of Yaudi with Azariah of Judah and gives some bibliography on the discussion (Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings, p. 78). 2 Sixteen . . . fifty-two: Azariah became co-regent at the age of 16, in the year 790. His accession in the twenty-seventh year of Jeroboam (v. 1), which would be 767, was when he became sole king. The twenty-seventh year includes the years of Jeroboam's co-regency; it was the 15th year of his sole reign. The reign of Azariah may be dated 767–740 BC, with co-regency from c. 790.

15:8–31 Internal collapse in Israel

The story at this point becomes almost chaotic, and there is every indication that Israel has almost collapsed as a nation. The instability of the time is seen in the fact that four kings occupied the throne and two kings were murdered in the years 753–752. Jeroboam II died, Zechariah was assassinated after a reign of 6 months, Shallum was assassinated after a reign of one month, Menahem seized the throne, and about the same time Pekah began to count the years of his reign, suggesting some incapacity or lack of authority on the part of Menahem. It seems highly probable that the chronological difficulties (e.g. Pekah's 20-year reign) are to be solved by assuming that rival kings claimed the throne during the same period.

15:8–12 Zechariah of Israel and Shallum's conspiracy. Cf. Josephus, Ant. ix.11.1. This is the end of the dynasty of Jehu; cf. the prophecy of 10:30. 8 Thirty-eighth year of Azariah, counting the co-regency, gives the date for the reign of Zechariah 753 BC. He reigned 6 months. 10 At Ibleam: by a slight change in the consonants, agreeing with the Lucianic Greek; Heb. 'before the people', which makes little sense. This emendation, which has no other support in the ancient versions, appeals to scholars because it was near Ibleam that Jehu had murdered the princes of the house of Judah when he usurped the throne of Israel (cf. 10:14); but this is not necessarily a good reason for accepting it.

15:13–15 Shallum of Israel. 13 Thirty-ninth year of Uzziah: cf. 15:8; the date for Shallum's reign is c. 752 BC. 14 The son of Jabesh: many scholars prefer to read this as 'a man of Yasib', a place not far from Tappuah, an emendation in v. 16 (where see note). In the Assyrian record Shallum is called 'son of nobody', which means he was a usurper.

15:16–22 Menahem of Israel. After a brief period of civil war, during which Menahem cruelly destroys the region around Tiphsah, he seizes the throne and reigns nominally for 10 years. Part of this time at least, he is able to maintain his reign by paying tribute to the Assyrian king Tiglath-pileser. 16 Tappuah, based on Lucian (Heb. 'Tiphsah'); scholars rejected this reading since Tiphsah was on the Euphrates —but this was on the surface ludicrous since there are other places by the same name, one of which at least (6 miles SW of Shechem) would fit the general description. We assume that the supporters of Shallum were hiding out there, or that Shallum had come from that region. Tappuah, on the other hand, was on the border between Manasseh and Ephraim near Yasib (Jos. 17:7); cf. on v. 14. 17 The thirty-ninth year of Azariah, from the beginning of his co-regency in 790, therefore 752. Thiele believes he has established it precisely in the month of Nisan 752 (Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings, p. 74). The reign of Menahem can be dated 752–742 BC. 19 Pul the king of Assyria; because of an unfortunate mistranslation of 1 Ch. 5:26, Pul and Tiglath-pileser (there spelt 'Tilgath-pilneser') were looked upon as two different persons, in spite of the fact that the verb is singular (see on 1 Ch. 5:26). The name 'Pul' occurs in the Babylonian king list, apparently the name which Tiglath-pileser took when he became king of Babylon in 729. In Ptolemy's chronology, this name is represented as Poros, an understandable pronunciation due to the inability of the Egyptian to pronounce the L-sound. A thousand talents of silver: 3 million shekels. 20 Fifty shekels from each man would indicate 60,000 taxable persons. Since these are called 'men of wealth', it gives us a sidelight on the size of the upper class denounced by the 8th-century prophets, Amos, Hosea and Isaiah. The tax was not great, about $25 (£10) from each.

15:23–26 Pekahiah of Israel. Little is recorded of this king. He reigns 2 years, does evil, and is assassinated in a plot led by his captain Pekah. 23 Fiftieth year of Azariah: cf. 15:8; the reign of Pekahiah can be dated 741–740 BC. 25 Hebrew adds the names 'Argob' and 'Arieh', generally taken to be personal names; Jerome understood them to be place-names. RSV has removed them, suggesting that they belong to the places listed in v. 29.

15:27–31 Pekah of Israel. Little is told of Pekah, other than the significant fact that during his reign the king of Assyria takes large portions of Galilee and Transjordan from the northern kingdom and carries a large number of the inhabitants into captivity. There are serious problems of chronology, and some scholars reduce his reign to 2 years. But it seems unlikely that he could have gained such importance as, e.g., that reflected in Is. 7 in such a short reign. Moreover several synchronisms in the OT are based on Pekah's reign, and it becomes difficult to explain these if he reigned only 2 years. Since Pekah was a usurper, we cannot fall back on a hypothetical co-regency. Yet he claims a reign of 20 years. Thiele makes the interesting suggestion that by counting his reign from the death of Shallum, Pekah may have hoped to blot out the dynasty of Menahem from the record (Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings, p. 115).

27 The fifty-second year of Azariah; cf. 15:8; the reign of Pekah can be dated 739–732 BC, with a reign as pretender from c. 751 BC. 29 He carried the people captive: the first mention of any captivity in the history of Israel (cf. Is. 9:1). The conspiracy of Pekah with Rezin of Damascus is described in Is. 7. The Assyrian invasions in 734 and 732 were probably the result of the appeal of Ahaz of Judah. 30 The conspiracy of Hoshea and the assassination of Pekah occurred in 732. Tiglath-pileser tells that he carried off the people of the land of Bit-Ḫumria ('the house of Omri') and their king Paqaḥa ('Pekah'), and placed Ausi ('Hoshea') over them as king. Whether Tiglath-pileser put Hoshea on the throne or whether it was a popular revolt, Hoshea became a tributary to the Assyrian king. Twentieth year of Jotham: it seems impossible to synchronize this with the statement that he reigned 16 years (v. 33; 2 Ch. 27:1, 8), unless we accept a period after his reign officially ended. Ahaz most certainly was king in 734–732 (Is. 7:1–17; 8:1–8), and Hoshea did not begin to reign until c. 732 BC. This would be the only example of a king's reign being counted as ended before his death or capture.

15:32–38 Jotham of Judah

Cf. 2 Ch. 27; Josephus, Ant. ix.11.2. Jotham, the son of Uzziah, or Azariah, came to the throne at the age of 25. In his days the Syro-Ephraimite coalition attempted an invasion of Judah. Chronicles tells of Jotham's extensive building operations and success over Ammon, which may have triggered the Syro-Ephraimite offensive. The chronological points present difficulty. If Jotham came to the throne in the 2nd year of Pekah, and reigned 16 years (v. 32), we find a problem in v. 30 which says that Pekah was slain in the 20th year of Jotham. It appears that Jotham not only had 12 years of co-regency with his father Azariah (Uzziah), but also that Ahaz became co-regent during the last 4 years of Jotham's reign. On this basis Jotham's sole reign is reduced to 4 actual years. The dates are 740–735 BC, with a co-regency from 751 BC. For the background of Jotham's reign, read Is. 2–5.

16:1–20 Ahaz of Judah

Cf. 2 Ch. 28:1–4; Josephus, Ant. ix.12.

16:1–4 Introductory statement. Ahaz introduces abominable idolatries into Judah. 1 The seventeenth year of Pekah: see on 15:27–31; this would be c. 735. Ahaz, a short form of Jehoahaz (in Tiglath-pileser's inscription 'Yauḥazi'). The dates of the reign of Ahaz are c. 732–716, with co-regency from 735 BC. 2 Twenty years old: according to one scholar this would make him 11 when his son Hezekiah was born; according to another scholar he was only one when Hezekiah was born! LXX and Syriac of 2 Ch. 28:1 read 'twenty-five' instead of 20. Thiele, by assuming co-regencies, arrives at the age of 14 or 15 for Ahaz when Hezekiah was born (op. cit., p. 19); this figure is not incredible. If Ahaz became co-regent in 735, Jotham would have been only 41, since he was 25 in 751 (15:33). We assume that Jotham was in weak health, and his death in 732 at the age of 43 would tend to confirm this (see on 15:27–31). 3 He even burned his son as an offering (lit. 'made him to pass through the fire'), not as a ritual but as an actual burnt-offering, or holocaust (so Josephus), perhaps occasioned by some crisis. According to Jeremiah it took place in the valley of Hinnom at a place named Tophet, which means 'burning'.

16:5, 6 The alliance of Rezin of Syria and Pekah of Israel. These kings attempt to force Ahaz to join them in a revolt against Assyria, or so it would seem from the way the story develops. 5 Rezin: according to Assyrian texts Raṣôn, or Raṣûn. They actually besieged Jerusalem; read Is. 7 in the light of this fact; read also 2 Ch. 26. According to 2 Ch. 28:6–15, Ahaz had heavy casualties, but the coalition of kings was unable to get him to go into battle with them. He secured his water supply (Is. 7:3), and then called for help from Tiglath-pileser. 6 RSV emends to omit the name 'Rezin', and to change 'Aram' to Edom the first two times it occurs; the third time, Heb. actually has 'Edomites'. These emendations almost certainly are right. It is highly unlikely that Rezin, who was having trouble with Assyria on the N, could have been engaged with Edom or the city of Elath in the far S. In Hebrew writing the change is a matter of a 'tittle'. AV has emended Edomites in the last case to 'Syrians', but Elath never belonged to Syria. Men of Judah, lit. 'Jews', the first use of the term for the subjects of the kingdom of Judah.

16:7–9 Ahaz appeals to Tiglath-pileser and thereby becomes a vassal. 7 The actual words of submission are included here: I am your servant and your son. Tiglath-pileser records the tribute of Jehoahaz of Judah (D. D. Luckenbill, Ancient Records of Assyria and Babylonia, 1, §800f.): this is the first mention of Judah in Assyrian inscriptions. 9 Kir: location not known; Gray takes it as a common noun, 'city'. (Cf. Am. 9:7.) The word is lacking in LXX.

16:10–18 Ahaz builds a new altar. Tiglath-pileser is subjugating Damascus and Ahaz goes there, probably to pay tribute. An altar catches his fancy, and he decides to have one like it built in Jerusalem. The altar was Assyrian and Ahaz was doing honour to the gods of Assyria (cf. Olmstead, History of Palestine and Syria, p. 452). 10 According to the inscription from Zenjirli, Panammuwa the father of Bar-Rekkab died in a camp of Tiglath-pileser, probably at Damascus, for the body was brought home from there. The date of the visit to Damascus was probably in 732. 13 The elements of Temple sacrifice are mentioned: the holocaust or whole burnt offering, the cereal offering, the drink offering or libation, and the peace offerings (see LaSor, Daily Life in Bible Times, pp. 67–69). The wine-offering or burnt-offering is mentioned in 2 Ki. 3:20; and the evening-offering or cereal-offering in 1 Ki. 18:29. 14, 15 According to Syr., Targ., and LXX, it would seem that Ahaz sacrificed his offering on the old altar and used the new altar for the purpose of oracles (to inquire by; cf. 1 Ki. 8:22, 54). 'For getting oracles' (so Calvin) would imply the introduction of the Babylonian custom of seeking omens in the sacrifice. 17, 18 Ahaz was breaking up the metal furniture, using the metal to pay tribute (cf. 1 Ki. 7:23ff.). 18 The covered way for the sabbath (LXX 'the foundation of the seat'): possibly 'the covering of the seat' was the original reading (IB). The palace: LXX and AV 'the house', probably the house of the Lord.

16:19, 20 Summary of the reign of Ahaz of Judah. From this time on, with the exception of two or three rebellions, Judah is a vassal state of Assyria—a fact usually overlooked by Bible students.

17:1–41 The end of the northern kingdom

In some ways, this is the heart of 2 Kings, completing the stage of history that was begun when Yahweh declared the division of Solomon's kingdom through Ahijah the prophet and by the agency of Jeroboam ben Nebat. The northern kingdom was to serve as an example to the house of David—although Judah learnt little from the experience of Israel, and had to go through the same judgment of destruction and exile. The author has set forth the divine viewpoint in 17:7–23.

17:1–6 Hoshea, the last king of Israel. Cf. 1 Ch. 5:26; Josephus, Ant. ix.14. Hoshea ascends the throne and reigns until the fall of Samaria. He is vassal of Assyria (in fact, Tiglath-pileser claims to have put him on the throne), but after a few years Hoshea withholds his tribute to Assyria and makes overtures to the king of Egypt. As a result Shalmaneser, who had come to the throne of Assyria, lays siege to Samaria and after 3 years captures the city and exiles the people.

1 Twelfth year of Ahaz: this is one of the dates that according to the thesis of Thiele has been shifted by 12 years; it was the 4th year of the co-regency or the first year of the reign of Ahaz, or 732. The reign of Hoshea can be dated 731–722 BC. 3 Shalmaneser: Shalmaneser V, who came to the throne in 727/6. Some scholars assume that Shalmaneser made two campaigns, the first to receive tribute and the second to punish Samaria; there is no record of this in the only one of Shalmaneser's annals which survives. Became his vassal: probably 'had become his vassal'; cf. 15:30. 4 So, king of Egypt. There are numerous difficulties here. No such king is known, and the word for 'Egypt' in Hebrew is capable of at least two other meanings. So has been identified with the Pharaohs Shabaka, the first king, and Shabataka, the second king, of the XXVth Dynasty. Sargon mentions Sibu, a 'Tartan' or general of Egypt whom he defeated at Raphia in 720. Therefore we should probably read 'Sewe'. We can assume that because of internal pressure Hoshea was forced to turn to Egypt for help against Assyria. Shalmaneser promptly moved in to punish him. If the action in v. 4 is identified with that of Sargon in 720, it of course is slightly out of place here chronologically. We consider the problem too difficult to solve with the existing information.

5 Invaded: no doubt Shalmaneser's invasion of 724, and the three years would be inclusive of the fall of Samaria in 722. This date is fairly well established. The ability of the city to withstand siege for that period of time is a tribute to the engineering skill of Omri and Ahab. Sargon II, who succeeded Shalmaneser V in 722, records for his first year that he besieged and took Samaria, carried away 27,290 inhabitants and other plunder, and settled people from other lands there. (Sargon is mentioned in Is. 20:1, but he is not mentioned here.) The biblical text would indicate on first reading that Shalmaneser actually conquered Samaria. The opinion of scholars is divided at this point; Olmstead is convinced that Shalmaneser actually conquered the city while Sargon took credit for it; Thiele suggests that Sargon may have been the general in charge of the siege when Samaria fell and therefore took credit for it. The relationship of Sargon to Shalmaneser is a debated point. According to one inscription he claims that he was the son of Tiglath-pileser and therefore a brother or half-brother of Shalmaneser, but there is no further confirmation of this. It is entirely possible that he was a usurper. The absence of records from Shalmaneser makes it impossible to discuss this point further.

6 Carried the Israelites away. It was standard procedure in the days of the Assyrians and the Babylonians to remove all who might be responsible for any kind of rebellion or treachery to other areas. In the case of the Assyrians, the plan was to put them in small groups so that they would lose their identity and mingle with the local populations. On the other hand the Babylonians transferred their captives to settlements where they could maintain their identity. Halah, possibly Ḥalaḥḥu, E of Haran, if a place-name (as AV); but LXX takes it to be a river, in which case it might be the Balikh river. Habor, taken to be a place in AV and a river in RSV, the Khabur. Gozan is a river further unidentified. The cities of the Medes: further identification impossible; some would read 'the mountains of the Medes'. One of Sargon's triumphs was the conquest of Media. We must remember that Galilee and Transjordan had already been taken into captivity by Tiglath-pileser III, therefore the number of exiles listed in Sargon's inscription represents only the people of Samaria and the surrounding region.

17:7–18 The reason for the fall of Samaria. The theological explanation of the historical event is set forth in considerable detail, hence we know more about the theology than the history of this critical period. 10, 11 Pillars and Asherim . . . high places: see on 1 Ki. 14:15; 18:17ff.; 2 Ki. 10:15–28. 16 Molten images were introduced by Ahaz; 17 likewise the divination and sorcery.

17:19–23 Summary of Israel's iniquity. As 'the way of David' is the ideal of Judah, so 'the sins which Jeroboam did' expresses the history of the northern kingdom. 19 Judah: often in the prophets Israel serves as a warning to Judah. 23 Until this day: evidence of a later point of view, but I see no reason to make this paragraph 'post-exilic'.
