Acknowledgements

The publisher of The NIV Bible Commentary wishes to thank the two editors who undertook the massive task of reducing eleven volumes of Bible commentaries into two: Richard Polcyn, who did the Old Testament, and Verlyn D. Verbrugge, who did the New Testament. Thanks also to Dr. Kenneth L. Barker and John R. Kohlenberger, III, who offered invaluable assistance as consulting editors.

The publisher also deeply appreciates the assistance of Neal and Joel Bierling, who served as consultants for, and provided, most of the pictures used in this two-volume commentary. Unless noted otherwise, all pictures are theirs. Finally, thanks to the Bible Department of Zondervan Publishing House for allowing us to use many of the charts and maps from their bestselling study Bibles.

Preface

The NIV Bible Commentary has been in the making for a long time. In 1976 the first volume of The Expositor's Bible Commentary (Volume 10) was released, containing commentaries on Romans to Galatians, under the general editorship of Frank E. Gaebelein. The final volume in this series was published in 1992, with commentaries on Deuteronomy to 2 Samuel.

Contributors for The Expositor's Bible Commentary were solicited from among the best evangelical scholars on both sides of the Atlantic. Each expositor was committed to the divine inspiration, complete trustworthiness, and full authority of Scripture as God's Word. Each author's work aimed to provide preachers, teachers, and students of the Bible with insights into the Scriptures that were scholarly yet practical to everyday life. The full text of the New International Version of the Bible was printed along with the commentary section. The units of discussion were often followed by technical notes of interest mainly to scholars.

The Expositor's Bible Commentary has fulfilled its goal admirably, judging from the positive reviews it has received, the awards it has earned, and the tens of thousands of sets that have been purchased. It was felt that this excellent series could serve well as the basis for a two-volume commentary set designed primarily for lay persons. Consequently, the commentaries from Genesis to Revelation in the Expositor's Bible Commentary have now been abridged, retaining all the important interpretative material of the larger set but without the text of the NIV and the detailed scholarly notes and discussions.

This two-volume commentary has two additional features not found in the original set. First, both volumes are replete with maps, charts, tables, and pictures that are relevant to the passages under discussion. Secondly, throughout the commentary, where specific biblical words are discussed at some length, the Goodrick-Kohlenberger numbers (abbreviated GK) have been added. These numbers, which appeared first in The NIV Exhaustive Concordance, are based on the numbering system for each Hebrew, Aramaic, and Greek word in the Bible developed by Edward W. Goodrick and John R. Kohlenberger III (a numbering system similar but superior to the ever-popular Strong's numbering system). An index of the words that are referred to is found in the back of each volume.

It is the hope of the publisher that just as The Expositor's Bible Commentary has served so well the needs of pastors and teachers, this two-volume commentary will serve the needs of average lay persons in the church who want to learn more about the Bible in their personal study or prepare themselves to lead a Bible lesson in a small group study.

The Bible is the greatest and most beautiful book of all time, the primary source of law and morality, the fountain of divine wisdom, the infallible guide to life, and above all, the inspired witness to Jesus Christ. May this work fulfill its function of expounding the Scriptures with grace and clarity, so that its users may find that both Old and New Testaments do indeed lead us to our Lord Jesus Christ, who alone could say, "I have come that they may have life, and have it to the full" (John 10:10).

INTRODUCTION

1. The Criticism of Matthew

Matthew, like Mark, Luke, and John, is a gospel, a unique literary form that has no true parallel in ancient writing (see the introduction to Mark, "Literary Form," for more on this topic). The earliest church fathers to mention the gospel of Matthew concur that the author was the disciple and apostle Matthew. Papias maintained that this apostle first wrote his gospel in Hebrew or Aramaic, and it was subsequently translated into Greek. Matthean priority was almost universally upheld; Mark was considered an abbreviation of Matthew and therefore somewhat inferior. For centuries Matthew held enormous influence and prestige in the church. With few exceptions these perspectives dominated gospel study till after the Reformation.

The consensus could not last. A. E. Lessing (1776, 1778) insisted that the only way to account for the parallels and seeming discrepancies among the Synoptic Gospels was to assume that they all derived independently from an Aramaic Gospel of the Nazarenes. The supposition of a "primal gospel," whether oral or literary, began to gain influence. Meanwhile J. J. Griesbach (1745–1812) argued for a two-source hypothesis, holding to the priority of both Matthew and Luke over Mark, which was taken to be a condensation of the other two.

In the latter half of the nineteenth century a new theory—the two-source theory—developed and, in various ways, still dominates. The gospels of Matthew and Luke were seen as to some extent dependent on Mark and Q (from the German word Quelle, meaning "source"; it designates the material that is common to Matthew and Luke but not in Mark). Streeter (in 1924) added M and L (material unique to Matthew and Luke respectively), creating a four-document theory. The form critics then assigned structure of each story in the Gospels to a particular Sitz im Leben ("life setting") in the church. The historical value of any pericope was then assessed against a number of criteria. The net result of this criticism was a stifling historical skepticism with respect to the material in the canonical gospels.

Following World War II, the age of redaction criticism began. Scholars sought to explain the differences in the Gospels as reflecting the theological agendas of the authors. This type of criticism offered one great advantage over form criticism: it saw the evangelists not as mere compilers of the church's oral traditions and organizers of stories preserved or created in various forms, but as theologians in their own right, shaping and adapting the material in order to make their own points.

Regarding Matthew, for example, the major redaction-critical studies have attempted to define the historical context in which the evangelist wrote and the community circumstances that called this gospel into being (as it was thought) between A.D. 80 and A.D. 100. Most pay little attention to the historical context of Jesus. Not all redaction critics interpret Matthew's reconstructed community the same way; indeed, the differences among them are often great. Moreover, several recent critics have argued that much more material in the Gospels (including Matthew's) is authentic than was recognized ten years ago.

Of all the theories regarding the origin and shape of the Gospels, redaction criticism seems the most firmly founded and offers the most possibility for interpretation to the reader. In God's providence we are able to compare the Synoptic Gospels with one another, and such study helps us better understand each of them. For example, Matthew's topical treatment of miracles (Mt 8–9), his chiastic arrangement of parables (ch. 13), and the differences he exhibits when closely compared with Mark help us identify his distinct emphases more precisely than would otherwise be possible. Thus no responsible modern commentary on the Synoptic Gospels can avoid using redaction criticism.

At the same time, any attempt to reconstruct a particular Christian community on the basis of comparisons made between Matthew and his supposed sources must be held tentatively at best. We must always remember the following: (1) What Matthew aims to write is a gospel telling us about Jesus, not a church circular addressing an independently known problem. (2) There is substantial evidence that the early church was interested in the historical Jesus and wanted to know what he taught and why. There is equally strong evidence that the Gospels constitute, at least in part, an essential element of the NT church's spreading ministry. (3) It is therefore methodologically wrong to read off some theme attributed by the evangelist to Jesus and conclude that what is actually being discussed is not the teaching of Jesus but an issue of A.D. 80. (4) Matthew's reasons for including or excluding this or that tradition, or for shaping his sources, must owe something to the circumstances he found himself in and the concerns of his own theology. But it is notoriously difficult to reconstruct such circumstances and commitments from a gospel about Jesus of Nazareth. Nor can we assume that all the changes in Matthew result from the theological agenda of Matthew's community. (5) Moreover, virtually all the themes isolated as reflections of A.D. 80 could in fact reflect interests of any decade from A.D. 30 to 100.

For more on the scholarly criticism of the Gospels, see EBC 1:437–58; 501–44.

In view of the weaknesses inherent in a radical use of redaction criticism and the uncertainties surrounding the two-source hypothesis, this commentary adopts a cautious stance. The two-source hypothesis is sufficiently credible that we do not hesitate to speak of Matthew's changes of, additions to, and omissions from Mark. In some instances it is apparent that Matthew used not only Mark but Q, probably other sources, and perhaps his own memory. Changes that Matthew has introduced may sometimes be motivated by other than theological concerns; but in any case the total content of any pericope in Matthew's gospel as a whole is a more reliable guide to determine distinct theological bent than the isolated change. The aim throughout has been to let Matthew speak as a theologian and historian independent of Mark, even if Mark was one of his most important sources.

2. Unity

The question of the unity of Matthew's gospel deals with how well the evangelist has integrated his material to form cohesive pericopes and a coherent whole. In sections very difficult to interpret (e.g., Mt 24), it is sometimes argued that the evangelist has sewn together diverse traditions that by nature are incapable of genuine coherence. Failing to understand the material, he simply passed it on without recognizing that some of his sources were mutually incompatible.

There are so many signs of high literary craftsmanship in this gospel that such skepticism is unjustified. It is more likely, not to say more humble, to suppose that in some instances we may not understand enough of the first-century setting to be able to grasp exactly what the text says.

3. Authorship

Nowhere does the first gospel name its author. The universal testimony of the early church beginning with Papias (c. A.D. 135) is that the apostle Matthew wrote it, and our earliest textual witnesses attribute it to him. If Papias is right, the theory of Matthew's authorship may receive gentle support from passages like 10:3, where on this theory the apostle refers to himself in a self-deprecating way not found in Mark or Luke.

Modern literary criticism offers many reasons for rejecting Matthew's authorship. For example, if the two-source hypothesis is correct, then (it is argued) it is unlikely that the eyewitness and apostle Matthew would depend so heavily on a document written by Mark, who was neither an apostle nor (for most events) an eyewitness. Others argue that the theology of the book and the Greek language it uses require a date later than the time of the apostle Matthew. Thus alternate proposals for the author of the first gospel have been made.

These arguments do not stand up under scrutiny. If Matthew, for example, thought Mark's account reliable and generally suited to his purposes (and he may also have known that Peter stood behind it; see introduction to Mark), there need be no objection to the view that an apostle depended on a nonapostolic document.

Furthermore, the charge that the Greek of the first gospel is too good to have come from a Galilean Jew overlooks the trilingual character of Galilee, the possibility that Matthew greatly improved his Greek as the church reached out to more and more Greek speakers (both Jews and Gentiles), and the suggestion that Matthew's training and vocation as a tax gatherer (9:9–13; 10:3) would have uniquely equipped him not only with the languages of Galilee but with an orderly mind and the habit of jotting down notes.

None of the arguments regarding Matthew's authorship is conclusive. Thus we cannot be entirely certain who the author of the first gospel is. But there are solid reasons in support of the early church's unanimous ascription of this book to Matthew, and on close inspection the objections do not appear substantial.

4. Date

During the first three centuries of the church, Matthew was the most highly revered and frequently quoted canonical gospel. The earliest extant documents referring to Matthew are the letters of Ignatius (c. A.D. 110–15). Thus the end of the first century or thereabouts is the latest date for the gospel of Matthew to have been written.

The earliest possible date is much more difficult to nail down because it depends on so many other disputed points, such as whether Luke used Matthew, Matthew used Mark or Mark used Matthew. Even so there are difficulties. For example, we do not know when Mark was written, though most estimates fall between A.D. 50 and 65 (see introduction to Mark). On this basis most critics think Matthew could not have been written until 75 or 80. But even if Mark is as late as 65, there is no reason based on literary dependence why Matthew could not be dated A.D. 66. As soon as a written source is circulated, it is available for copying. Furthermore, as suggested above, to suggest a date in the late first century on the basis of our knowledge of theological concerns and historical events between 80 and 100 is doubtful. In fact, a careful reading of Matthew suggests it was written well before the fall of Jerusalem. For example, Matthew records more warnings against Sadducees than all other NT writers combined; but after A.D. 70 the Sadducees no longer existed as a center of authority. This argues for a pre-70 date for this book.

5. Place of Composition and Destination

Most scholars take Antioch as the place of composition. Antioch was a Greek-speaking city with a substantial Jewish population; and the first clear evidence of anyone using the gospel of Matthew comes from Ignatius, bishop of Antioch at the beginning of the second century. This is as good a guess as any. Yet we must remember that Ignatius depends more on John's gospel and the Pauline letters than on Matthew, but this does not mean they were all written in Antioch.

We cannot be sure of the first gospel's place of composition. Still more uncertain is its destination. The usual assumption is that the evangelist wrote it to meet the needs of his own center—a not implausible view. But the evangelist may have been more itinerant than is usually assumed; and out of such a ministry he may have written his gospel to strengthen and inform a large number of followers and give them an evangelistic and apologetic tool. We simply do not know. The only reasonably certain conclusion is that the gospel was written somewhere in the Roman province of Syria.

6. Occasion and Purpose

Unlike many of Paul's letters or even John's gospel (20:30–31), Matthew writes nothing explicit about his purpose for his work. To some extent the gospel shows Matthew's purpose in the way it presents certain information about Jesus. But to go much beyond this and specify the kind of group(s) Matthew was addressing, the kind of problems they faced, and his own deep psychological and theological motivations, verges on speculation. Three restraints are necessary. (1) It is unwise to specify too precise an occasion and purpose, because the possibility of error and distortion increases as one becomes more and more specific. (2) It is unwise to specify only one purpose; reductionism cannot do justice to the diversity of Matthew's themes. (3) Great caution is needed in reconstructing the situation in the church of Matthew's time from material that speaks of the historical Jesus (see section 1). Matthew likely wrote his gospel to address his contemporaries, not just to satisfy someone's historical curiosity. But it does not necessarily follow that most of what he writes is a reflection of his own day rather than Jesus' day.

Nowhere are these restraints more important than in weighing recent discussion about the diverse emphases on evangelism in this gospel. On the one hand, the disciples are forbidden to preach to others than Jews (10:5–6); on the other, they are commanded to preach to all nations (28:18–20). Because of this bifurcation, some scholars have suggested that Matthew is preserving the traditions of two distinct communities—one that remained narrowly Jewish and the other that was more outward looking. Others think Matthew had to walk a tightrope between conflicting perspectives within his own community and therefore preserves both viewpoints—a sort of committee report that satisfied neither side. Such views of Matthew fail to recognize that the author himself makes distinctions between what Jesus demands during his earthly ministry and what he demands after his resurrection. Perhaps by mentioning the changed perspective effected by Jesus' resurrection, Matthew is encouraging Jewish Christians to evangelize beyond their own race. More generally, such reconstructions outstrip the evidence, fail to consider what other purposes Matthew may have had in mind, and frequently ignore the fact that he purports to talk about Jesus, not a Christian community in some particular decade of the first century.

At the broadest level we may say that Matthew's purpose is to demonstrate that (1) Jesus is the promised Messiah, the Son of David, the Son of God, the Son of Man, Immanuel; (2) many Jews, and especially the leaders, sinfully failed to perceive this during his ministry; (3) the messianic kingdom has already dawned, inaugurated by the life, ministry, death, resurrection, and exaltation of Jesus; (4) this messianic reign, characterized by obedience to Jesus and consummated by his return, is the fulfillment of OT prophetic hopes; (5) the church, the community of those, both Jew and Gentile, who bow unqualifiedly to Jesus' authority, constitutes the true locus of the people of God and the witness to the world of the "gospel of the kingdom"; (6) throughout this age Jesus' true disciples must overcome temptation, endure persecution from a hostile world, witness to the truth of the Gospel, and live in deeply rooted submission to Jesus' ethical demands.

Such a complex array of themes was doubtless designed to meet many needs: (1) to instruct and perhaps catechize; (2) to provide apologetic and evangelistic material, especially in winning Jews; (3) to encourage believers in their witness before a hostile world; and (4) to inspire deeper faith in Jesus the Messiah, along with a maturing understanding of his person, work, and unique place in the unfolding history of redemption.

7. Themes and Special Problems

We may consider Matthew's principal themes together with the special problems of this gospel, because so many of those themes have turned into foci for strenuous debate. To avoid needless repetition, the following paragraphs do not so much summarize the nine themes selected as sketch in the debate and then provide references to the places in the commentary where these things are discussed.

a. Christology. Matthew's view of Christ can, at least in part, be understood by an examination of the Christological titles he uses. These are rich and diverse. "Son of David" appears in the first verse, identifying Jesus as the promised Davidic Messiah; and then the title recurs, often on the lips of the needy and the ill, who anticipate relief from him who will bring in the Messianic Age (see comment on 9:27). Matthew uses kyrios ("Lord"; GK 3261) more often than Mark. While it is doubtful that anyone considered Jesus the divine Lord before his crucifixion, because kyrios is the most common LXX term for referring to God, the greater insight into Jesus' person and work afforded by the postresurrection perspective made the disciples see a deeper significance to their own use of kyrios than they could have intended at first. And, as we shall see, the term "Son of God" is also important in Matthew (see comments on 2:15; 3:17; 4:3; 8:29; 16:16; 17:5; 26:63).

b. Prophecy and fulfillment. One of Matthew's special characteristics is to show how Jesus fulfilled Scripture. Christians are prone to think of prophecy and fulfillment as something not very different from straightforward propositional prediction and fulfillment. A close reading of the NT reveals that prophecy is more complex than that (see comments on 2:15, 23; 27:9). Note also that a number of Matthew's OT quotations are introduced by the word "fulfilled" (GK 4444) and a text form rather more removed from the LXX than other OT quotations. Such problems have been extensively studied with very little agreement. Perspectives are given throughout the notes where applicable (e.g., see comments on 1:23; 2:15, 17–18, 23; 4:15–16; 5:17; et al.). Care in such formulations will help us perceive the deep ties that bind together the OT and NT.

c. Law. Few topics in the study of Matthew's gospel are more difficult than his attitude to the law and to the Pharisees and teachers of the law (see especially comments on 5:17–48). Doubtless we may link Matthew's treatment of the law with his handling of the OT prophecy. Matthew holds that Jesus taught that the law had a prophetic function pointing to himself. Its valid continuity lies in Jesus' own ministry, teaching, death, and resurrection. The unifying factor is Jesus himself, whose ministry and teaching stand with respect to the OT (including law) as fulfillment does to prophecy.

d. Church. The word ekklesia ("church"; GK 1711) occurs twice in Matthew (16:18; 18:17). Certain things stand out on this issue. First, Matthew insists that Jesus predicted the continuation of his small group of disciples in a distinct community, a holy and messianic people, a "church" (see comment on 16:18). Second, Jesus insists that obeying the ethical demands of the kingdom, far from being optional to those who make up the church, must characterize their lives. Their allegiance proves false wherever they do not do what Jesus teaches (e.g., 7:21–23). Third, a certain discipline must be imposed on the community (see comments on 16:18–19; 18:15–18), though Matthew describes this discipline in principles rather than in details.

e. Eschatology. Matthew consistently distinguishes among four time periods: (1) the period of revelation and history previous to Jesus; (2) the inauguration of something new in his coming and ministry; (3) the period beginning with his exaltation—from which point all of God's sovereignty is mediated through him and his followers proclaim the Gospel of the kingdom to all nations; (4) the consummation and beyond.

f. The Jewish leaders. Two areas need clarification for understanding Matthew's treatment of the Jewish leaders. The first is the identification of the "Pharisees" (GK 5757) at the time of Jesus. Two of their main contributions to society were to adapt the OT laws to the times and to lead first-century Judaism. The problem is that their minute regulations made ritual distinctions too difficult and morality too easy. The radical holiness demanded by the OT prophets became domesticated, preparing the way for Jesus' preaching that demanded a righteousness greater than that of the Pharisees (see comment on 5:20).

We hold that the Pharisees were a nonpriestly group of uncertain origin, generally learned, committed to the oral law, and concerned with developing Halakah (rules of conduct based on deductions from the law). Most "teachers of the law" were Pharisees; and the Sanhedrin included men from their number (see comment on 21:23), though the leadership of the Sanhedrin belonged to the priestly Sadducees. Matthew also often links the Sadducees together with the Pharisees, not because the views of these two groups were similar, but because they were united in their opposition to Jesus.

The second area needing clarification is the way Matthew refers to Jewish leaders. It is universally agreed that Matthew is quite strongly anti-Pharisaic. His denunciations of these Jewish leaders are not racially motivated; they are prompted by the response of people to Jesus. The denunciations equally extend to professing believers whose lives betray the falseness of their profession (7:21–23; 22:11–14) and to unbelieving Jews; the governing motives are concern for the perseverance of the Christian community and for the authoritative proclamation of the "gospel of the kingdom" to "all nations," Jew and Gentile alike, to bring everyone to submission to Jesus Messiah.

g. Mission. It has long been recognized that the closing pericope (28:16–20) is fully intended to be the climax toward which the entire gospel moves. By tying together some of Matthew's most dominant themes, these verses give them a new depth that reaches back and sheds light on the entire gospel. For instance, the Great Commission is perceived to be the result of God's providential ordering of history (1:1–17) to bring to a fallen world a Messiah who would save his people from their sins (1:21); but the universal significance of Jesus' birth, hinted at in 1:1 and repeatedly raised in the flow of the narrative (e.g., see comments on 2:1–12; 4:14–16, 25; 8:5–13; et al.) is now confirmed by the concluding lines.

h. Miracles. The biblical writers do not see miracles as divine interventions in an ordered and closed universe. Rather, God as Lord of the universe and of history sustains everything that takes place under his sovereignty. Sometimes, however, he does extraordinary things. Biblical writers preferred to call these events "signs," "wonders," or "powers."

Miracles in Matthew share certain characteristics with those in the other Synoptics. Jesus' miracles are bound up with the inbreaking of the promised kingdom (8:16–17; 12:22–30). They are part of his messianic work (4:23; 11:4–6) and therefore the dual evidence of the dawning of the kingdom and of the status of Jesus the King Messiah.

Matthew's miracles are distinctive for the brevity with which they are reported. He condenses introductions and conclusions, omits secondary characters and the like (see comments on 8:1–4). He shifts the balance of event and implication a little in order to stress the latter.

i. The disciples' understanding and faith. Like Mark, Matthew portrays the disciples as failing to understand Jesus' teachings about his coming death and resurrection, primarily because of their unique place in salvation history. They were unprepared before the events to accept the notion of a crucified and resurrected Messiah. Their perspective radically changed after the triumph of Jesus' resurrection. Matthew's readers, whether in the first century or today, may profit from studying the disciples' experience as he records it. We should look back on this witness to the divine self-disclosure, observing God's wisdom and care as through his Son he progressively revealed himself and his purposes to redeem a fallen and rebellious race. By feeding our faith and understanding on the combined testimony of the earliest witnesses who tell how they arrived by a unique historical sequence at their faith and understanding, we shall learn to focus our attention, not on the disciples, but on their Lord.

8. Structure

Matthew was a skilled literary craftsman and gave his gospel structure, form, and rhythm. No outline, however, should be taken too seriously, as if it exhausts the complexity of the author's work.

The best way to view the book is to see it centering on five main discourses (each preceded by a narrative section): 5:1–7:29; 10:5–11:1; 13:1–53; 18:1–19:2; 24:1–25:46. Each discourse begins by placing Jesus in a specific context and ends with a formula found nowhere else in the gospel (see comment on 7:28–29) and with a transitional pericope pointing forward and backward. These five discourses are sufficiently well-defined that it is hard to believe Matthew did not plan them as such. In this scheme the birth narrative functions as a prologue anticipating the opening of the gospel. Matthew 26–28 constitutes an exceptional sixth narrative section with the corresponding teaching section being laid on the shoulders of the disciples (28:18–20).

EXPOSITION

I. Prologue: The Origin and Birth of Jesus the Christ (1:1–2:23)

A. The Genealogy of Jesus (1:1–17)

In each gospel Jesus' earthly ministry is preceded by an account of John the Baptist's ministry. This formal similarity does not extend to the prologues to the Gospels. In Matthew the prologue (1:1–2:23) introduces such themes as the son of David, the fulfillment of prophecy, the supernatural origin of Jesus the Messiah, and the Father's sovereign protection of his Son in order to bring him to Nazareth and accomplish the divine plan of salvation from sin.

1 The first words of Matthew may be translated as "a [coherent and unified] record of the origins of Jesus Christ," thus serving as an opening statement of the first two chapters.

The designation "Jesus Christ the son of David, the son of Abraham" resonates with biblical nuances. (For comments regarding "Jesus," see comment on 1:21.). "Christ" is roughly the Greek equivalent to "Messiah" or "Anointed" (see comment on Mk 8:29). In Jesus' day Palestine was rife with messianic expectation. Not all of it was coherent, and many Jews expected two different "Messiahs." But Matthew's linking of "Christ" and "son of David" leaves no doubt of what he is claiming for Jesus. In the Gospels "Christ" almost always appears as a title ("the Messiah"). But it was natural for Christians after the Resurrection to use "Christ" as a name (e.g., "Jesus Christ"), though it is doubtful whether the titular force ever entirely disappears. In Matthew, only in vv.1, 16, 18 can "Christ" be defended as designating a name as well as a title of Jesus.

"Son of David" is an important designation in Matthew. Not only does David become a turning point in the genealogy (1:6, 17), but the title recurs throughout the gospel (9:27; 12:23; 15:22; 20:30–31; 21:9, 15; 22:42, 45). God swore covenant love to David (Ps 89:29) and promised that one of his immediate descendants would establish the kingdom—even more, that David's kingdom and throne would endure forever (2Sa 7:12–16). Isaiah foresaw that a "son" would be given, a son with the most extravagant titles who would reign on David's throne (Isa 9:6–7). In Jesus' day at least some branches of popular Judaism understood "son of David" to be messianic. In the minds of the early Christians, the tree of David, hacked off so that only a stump remained, was sprouting a new branch (Isa 11:1).

Jesus is also "son of Abraham." The covenant with the Jewish people had first been made with Abraham (Ge 12:1–3; 17:7; 22:18). More important, Ge 22:18 had promised that through Abraham's offspring "all nations" would be blessed; so with this allusion to Abraham, Matthew is preparing his readers for the final words of this offspring from Abraham—the commission to make disciples of "all nations" (28:19).

2–17 Matthew's chief aims in including the genealogy are hinted at in the first verse—namely, to show that Jesus Messiah is truly in the kingly line of David, heir to the messianic promises, the one who brings divine blessings to all nations. Therefore the genealogy focuses on King David (1:6) on the one hand, yet on the other hand includes Gentile women. Many entries would touch the hearts and stir the memories of biblically literate readers, though the principal thrust of Matthew's genealogy ties together promise and fulfillment.

The names in the first two-thirds of the genealogy are taken from the LXX (1Ch 1–3, esp. 2:1–15; 3:5–24; cf. Ru 4:12–22). After Zerubbabel, Matthew relies on extrabiblical sources of which we know nothing. But there is good evidence that records were kept at least till the end of the first century.

More difficult is the question of the relation of Matthew's genealogy to Luke's, in particular the part from David on (for a description of the differences between Mt 1:2–17 and Lk 3:23–31, as well as attempts at a solution, see comments on Lk 3:23–38).

2 Of the twelve sons of Jacob, Judah is singled out, as his tribe bears the scepter (Ge 49:10; cf. Heb 7:14). The words "and his brothers" indicate that the Messiah emerges within the matrix of the covenant people (cf. the twelve tribes of Israel). Neither the half-siblings of Isaac nor the descendants of Jacob's brother, Esau, qualify as the covenant people in the OT.

3–5 Probably Perez and Zerah (v.3) are both mentioned because they are twins (Ge 38:27). Tamar, wife of Judah's son Er, is the first of four women mentioned in the genealogy (see comment on v.6). Little is known of the next five names in the genealogy. Amminadab is associated with the desert wanderings in the time of Moses (Nu 1:7). Therefore approximately four hundred years (Ge 15:13; Ex 12:40) are covered by the four generations from Perez to Amminadab. Doubtless several names have been omitted: the Greek verb translated "was the father of" (GK 1164) does not require immediate relationship but often means "was the ancestor of." Similarly, the line between Amminadab and David is short: more names may have been omitted. For example, it is almost certain that the Rahab mentioned is the prostitute of Jos 2 and 5 (see comments on next verse) and was certainly not the biological mother of Boaz (see Ru 4:12, 18–22).

6 The word "King" with "David" would evoke profound nostalgia and arouse eschatological hope in first-century Jews. Matthew thus makes the royal theme explicit: King Messiah has appeared. David's royal authority, lost at the Exile, has now been regained and surpassed by "great David's greater son." David became the father of Solomon; but Solomon's mother "had been Uriah's wife" (cf. 2Sa 11:27; 12:4). Bathsheba thus becomes the fourth woman to be mentioned in this genealogy.

Inclusion of these four women in the Messiah's genealogy instead of an all-male listing, especially with the exclusion of names of such great matriarchs as Sarah, Rebekah, and Leah, shows that Matthew is conveying more than merely genealogical data. Tamar enticed her father-in-law into an incestuous relationship (Ge 38). The prostitute Rahab saved the spies and joined the Israelites (Jos 2, 5; cf. Heb 11:31; Jas 2:25). Ruth, Tamar, and Rahab were aliens. Bathsheba was taken into an adulterous union with David, who committed murder to cover it up. Matthew's peculiar way of referring to her, "Uriah's wife," may be an attempt to focus on the fact that Uriah was not an Israelite but a Hittite (2Sa 11:3; 23:39).

Several reasons have been suggested to explain the inclusion of these women, all of which are valid. (1) Some have pointed out that at least three were Gentiles. This goes well with the reference to Abraham (cf. on 1:1); the Jewish Messiah extends his blessings beyond Israel, even as Gentiles are included in his line. (2) Others have noted that three of the four were involved in gross sexual sin and that later in this same chapter Matthew introduces Jesus as the one who "will save his people from their sins" (1:21); this verse may imply a backward glance at some of the better-known sins of his own progenitors. (3) Still others hold that all four reveal something of the strange and unexpected workings of Providence in preparation for the Messiah and that as such they point to Mary's unexpected but providential conception of Jesus.

7–10 There is no obvious pattern to the kings mentioned here: wicked Rehoboam was the father of wicked Abijah, the father of the good king Asa. Asa was the father of another good king, Jehoshaphat, who sired the wicked king Joram. Good or evil, they were part of Messiah's line; for though grace does not run in the blood, God's providence cannot be deceived or outmaneuvered.

Three names have been omitted between Joram and Uzziah: Ahaziah, Joash, and Amaziah. The three omissions not only secure fourteen generations in this part of the genealogy (see comment on 1:17) but are dropped possibly because of their connection with Ahab and Jezebel, renowned for wickedness (2Ki 8:27), and because of their connection with wicked Athaliah (2Ki 8:26; 11:1–20). Manasseh (v.10), though notoriously evil, repented (2Ch 33:10–13), and he is included.

11 The Exile to Babylon marked the end of the reign of David's line, a momentous event in OT history. The locus of the people of God is thus traced from the patriarchs to the shame of the Exile, a theme to be developed later (see comment on 2:16–18).

12 The final list of "fourteen" (see comment on 1:17) begins with a further mention of the Exile. Jeconiah (Jehoiachin) was the father of Shealtiel. Matthew goes on to present Shealtiel as the father of Zerubbabel (cf. Ezr 3:2; 5:2), whereas 1Ch 3:19 presents Zerubbabel as the son of Pedaiah, a brother of Shealtiel. The best solution to this problem is the proposal of a levirate marriage (Dt 25:5–10; cf. Ge 38:8–9): Shealtiel died childless, and Pedaiah, his brother, married the widow (see also comment on Lk 3:23–31).

13–16 The nine names from Abiud to Jacob are otherwise unknown to us today. The wording in v.16 is precise. Joseph's royal line has been traced; Joseph is the husband of Mary; Mary is the mother of Jesus. The relationship between Joseph and Jesus is so far unstated. But this peculiar form of expression cries out for the explanation provided in the ensuing verses. Legally Jesus stands in line to the throne of David; physically he is born of a woman "found to be with child through the Holy Spirit" (1:18). Her son Jesus is the "Messiah" (see comment on v.1).

17 It was customary among Jewish writers to arrange genealogies according to some convenient scheme, possibly for mnemonic reasons. Matthew has grouped them according to fourteens, most likely a symbolic number. It is impossible to get the three fourteens without counting either David twice or Jeconiah twice.

Why "fourteen"? The simplest explanation—the one that best fits the context—observes that the numerical value of "David" in Hebrew is fourteen. That is, in the ancient world, letters served both to form words and to designate numbers. The numerical value of D+V+D is fourteen. By this symbolism Matthew stresses that the promised "son of David" (1:1), the Messiah, has come.

B. The Birth of Jesus (1:18–25)

Two matters call for initial remarks: the historicity of the Virgin Birth (more properly, virginal conception), and the theological emphases surrounding this theme in chs. 1–2 and its relation to the NT.

First, though many have questioned the historicity of the Virgin Birth, it is clear that both Matthew and Luke independently attest to its truth. Matthew's point in chs. 1–2 is surely that the Virgin Birth and attendant circumstances were most extraordinary, and that God was thoroughly involved in the event of bringing his Son into the world.

Second, the following theological considerations require mention. (1) The concept of "virginal conception" is thoroughly consistent with his "preexistence." Indeed, it is difficult to see how a divine being could become genuinely human without a birth of extraordinary means. (2) Undoubtedly during Jesus' lifetime, the disciples were not fully aware of Jesus' miraculous birth. Their understanding of Jesus naturally matured and deepened with time and further revelation, as did their thinking on other important topics. (3) Just because the Virgin Birth is not clearly outlined in the NT letters is no reason to claim it is a later creation of the church.

It is remarkable that the title "Son of God," important later in Matthew, is not found in chs. 1–2, though it may lurk behind 2:15. But these two chapters serve as a finely wrought prologue for every major theme in the gospel. We must therefore understand Matthew to be telling us that if Jesus is physically Mary's son and legally Joseph's son, at an even more fundamental level he is God's Son (cf. 1:18, 20); and in this Matthew agrees with Luke's statement (Lk 1:35). The dual paternity,the one legal and the other divine, is unambiguous.

18 The word translated "birth" (GK 1161; translated "genealogy" in v.1) refers to the beginnings of Jesus Messiah. A pledge to be married was legally binding. Only a divorce writ could break it, and infidelity at that stage was considered adultery (cf. Dt 22:23–24). Mary herself does not figure largely in Matthew.

"Before they came together" refers here to sexual intercourse, occurring at the formal marriage when the "wife" moved in with her "husband." Only then was this act proper. The phrase affirms that Mary's pregnancy was discovered while she was still betrothed, and the context presupposes that both Mary and Joseph had been chaste.

Mary's pregnancy came about through the Holy Spirit (even more prominent in Luke's birth narratives). The power of the Lord, manifest in the Holy Spirit who was expected to be active in the Messianic Age, miraculously brought about the conception.

19 Joseph did not know about the visit of an angel to Mary, but it eventually became obvious that she was pregnant. Because he was a righteous man, he could not in conscience marry Mary, who was now thought to be unfaithful. Such a marriage would have been a tacit admission of his own guilt. But because he was unwilling to expose her to the disgrace of public divorce, Joseph therefore chose a quieter form of divorce, before two witnesses, permitted by the law itself. It would leave both his righteousness (his conformity to the law) and his compassion intact.

20 Only when Joseph had made this decision did God intervene with a dream. Dreams as means of divine communication in the NT are concentrated in Matthew's prologue (1:20; 2:2, 13, 19, 22; elsewhere, possibly 27:19). An "angel of the Lord" calls to mind divine messengers in past ages (e.g., Ge 16:7–14; 22:11–18; Ex 3:2–4:16; et al.). The focus here is on God's gracious intervention and the messenger's private communication.

The angel's opening words, "Joseph son of David," tie this pericope to the preceding genealogy, maintain interest in the theme of the Davidic Messiah, and, from Joseph's perspective, alert him to the significance of the role he is to play. The prohibition, "Do not be afraid," confirms that Joseph had already decided on his course when God intervened. He was to "take" Mary home as his wife because Mary's pregnancy was the direct action of the Holy Spirit.

21 It was no doubt divine grace that solicited Mary's cooperation before the conception and Joseph's cooperation only after it. Here Joseph is drawn into the mystery of the Incarnation. In patriarchal times either a mother (Ge 4:25) or a father (Ge 4:26; 5:3) could name a child. According to Lk 1:31,

Mary was told Jesus' name; but Joseph was told both name and reason for it.

"Jesus" (GK 2652) is the Greek form of "Joshua," which means either "The LORD is salvation," or "The LORD saves." Mary's Son is the one who brings the Lord's promised eschatological salvation. Two Joshuas in the OT are used in the NT as types of Christ: Joshua, successor to Moses and the one who led the people into the Promised Land (cf. Heb 3–4), and Joshua the high priest, contemporary of Zerubbabel (Ezr 2:2; 3:2–9), "the Branch" who builds the temple of the Lord (Zec 6:11–13). But instead of referring to either of these, the angel explains the significance of the name by referring to Ps 130:8: "He [the LORD] himself will redeem Israel from all their sins."

There was much Jewish expectation of a Messiah who would redeem Israel from Roman tyranny and even purify his people. But no one expected that the Davidic Messiah would give his own life as a ransom (20:28) to save his people from their sins. The verb "save" (GK 5392) can refer to deliverance from physical danger (8:25), disease (9:21–22), or even death (24:22); but it focuses here on what is central, namely, salvation from sins. This verse therefore orients the reader to the fundamental purpose of Jesus' coming and the essential nature of the reign he inaugurates as King Messiah, heir of David's throne.

To Joseph "his people" (GK 3295) would be primarily the Jews, but Matthew has a broader view. He soon writes that both John the Baptist (3:9) and Jesus (8:11) picture Gentiles joining with the godly remnant to become disciples of the Messiah and members of "his people," i.e., "Messiah's people."

22 It is quite possible that the angel's comments continue through v.23 (cf. 26:56). After all, if Satan can cite Scripture (4:6–7), certainly it is not strange if a good angel does. Joseph needs to know at this stage that "all this took place to fulfill" Scripture. The last clause is phrased with exquisite care, literally, "the word spoken by the Lord through the prophet." The prepositions make a distinction between the mediate and the intermediate agent (see 2Pe 1:21).

Regarding the idea of prophecy and fulfillment, Matthew finds in the OT not only isolated predictions regarding the Messiah but also OT history and people as paradigms that, to those with eyes to see, point forward to the Messiah (see comment on 2:15).

23 This verse makes it quite clear that to Matthew, Mary is the virgin; Jesus is her son, Immanuel. But because of the quotation from Isa 7:14, complex issues are raised concerning Matthew's use of the OT.

The OT word for "virgin" used in Isa 7:14 is almah (GK 6625) and often means virgin (though sometimes a young woman of marriageable age). The LXX renders almah here as parthenos (GK 4221), which almost always means "virgin"—though even here there are exceptions, such as LXX of Ge 34:4. The overwhelming majority of occurrences of parthenos, however, in both biblical and nonbiblical Greek, require the rendering "virgin"; and the unambiguous context of Mt 1 (see vv.12, 16, 18, 20, 25) puts Matthew's intent beyond dispute.

The crucial question is how we are to understand Isa 7:14 in its relationship to Mt 1:23. Of critical concern is the fact that Isaiah uses v.14 to give a sign to King Ahaz about the Assyrian destruction of the kings of Israel and Syria (Aram), who were threatening Judah (see comment on Isa 7:14).

The most plausible view begins with a recognition that signs in the OT may function as a "present persuader" (e.g., Ex 4:8–9) or as "future confirmation" (e.g., Ex 3:12). Isa 7:14 falls in the latter case because Immanuel's birth comes too late to be a "present persuader." The "sign" (v.11; GK 253) points primarily to threat and foreboding. Ahaz has rejected the Lord's gracious offer (vv.10–12), and Isaiah responds in wrath (v.13). The "curds and honey" that Immanuel will eat (v.15) represent the only food left in the land on the day of wrath (vv.18–22). Immanuel's birth follows the coming events (it is a "future confirmation") and will take place when the Davidic dynasty has lost the throne.

Furthermore, some recent studies have demonstrated that Isa 7:1–9:7 must be read as a unit—i.e., 7:14 must not be treated in isolation. The promised Immanuel (7:14) will possess the land (8:8), thwart all opponents (8:10), and appear in Galilee of the Gentiles as a great light to those in the land of the shadow of death (9:1–2, quoted in Mt 4:12–16). He is the Child and Son called "Wonderful Counselor, Mighty God, Everlasting Father, Prince of Peace" in Isa 9:6, whose government and peace will never end as he reigns on David's throne forever (9:7).

According to this interpretation, Matthew has correctly understood Isaiah that the Immanuel figure of 7:14 is a messianic figure. And if this messianic figure's titles include "Mighty God" (9:6), there is reason to think that "Immanuel" refers to Jesus himself, that he is "God with us." Though "Immanuel" is not a name in the sense that "Jesus" is Messiah's name (1:21), in the OT Solomon was named "Jedidiah" ("Beloved of the Lord," 2Sa 12:25), even though he apparently was not called that. Similarly Immanuel is a "name" in the sense of title or description.

No greater blessing can be conceived than for God to dwell with his people (Isa 60:18–20; Eze 48:35; Rev 21:23). Jesus is the one called "God with us": the designation evokes Jn 1:14, 18. As if that were not enough, Jesus promises just before his ascension to be with us to the end of the age (Mt 28:20; cf. also 18:20).

24–25 When Joseph woke up (from his sleep, not his dream), he "took Mary home as his wife." Joseph's obedience and submission under these circumstances are scarcely less remarkable than Mary's (Lk 1:38). Matthew wants to make Jesus' virginal conception unambiguous, for he adds that Joseph had no sexual union with Mary until she gave birth to Jesus. The "until" clause most naturally means that Mary and Joseph enjoyed normal conjugal relations after Jesus' birth.

So the virgin-conceived Immanuel was born. And eight days later, when the time came for him to be circumcised (Lk 2:21), Joseph named him "Jesus."

C. The Visit of the Magi (2:1–12)

Few passages have received more diverse interpretations than this one. During the last hundred years or so, such diversity has sometimes sprung from a reluctance to accept either the supernatural details or the entire story as historically true and from an insistence that Matthew's real point is theological. The presupposed antithesis between theology and history is false. Matthew records history so as to bring out its theological significance and its relation to Scripture as prophecy-fulfillment; to establish God's providential and supernatural care of this virgin-born Son; to anticipate the hostilities, resentment, and suffering he would face; and to hint at the fact that Gentiles would be drawn into his reign. Matthew thus stresses early in his gospel that if Jesus had not been born in Bethlehem, this claim would have been challenged.

1 Bethlehem, the place near which Jacob buried Rachel (Ge 35:19) and Ruth met Boaz (Ru 1:22–2:6), was preeminently the town where David was born and reared. For Christians it has become the place where angelic hosts broke the silence and announced Messiah's birth (Lk 2:8–20).

Unlike Luke, Matthew offers no description of Jesus' birth or the shepherds' visit; he specifies the time of Jesus' birth as having occurred during the reign of King Herod the Great (see also Lk 1:5; ZPEB 3:126–38). Traditionally some have argued that Herod died in 4 B.C.; so Jesus must have been born before then. Though this has been challenged, most favor this date.

The "Magi" (GK 3407) cannot be identified with precision. By NT times, the term loosely covered a wide variety of men interested in dreams, astrology, magic, books thought to contain mysterious references to the future, and the like. Apparently these men came to Bethlehem spurred on by astrological calculations. But they had probably built up their expectation of a kingly figure by working through assorted Jewish books.

2 The Magi saw a star "when it rose" (see NIV note). What they saw remains uncertain, and no single suggestion has gained support. Matthew uses language almost certainly alluding to Nu 24:17: "A star will come out of Jacob; a scepter will rise out of Israel." This oracle, spoken by Balaam, who came "from the eastern mountains" (Nu 23:7), was widely regarded as messianic.

Matthew's main purpose in this story is to contrast the eagerness of the Magi to worship Jesus, despite their limited knowledge, with the apathy of the Jewish leaders and the hostility of Herod's court—all of whom had the Scriptures to inform them. Formal knowledge of the Scriptures, Matthew implies, does not in itself lead to knowing who Jesus is.

The Magi's question indicates that Jesus was born king of the Jews. His kingly status was not conferred on him later on; it was his from birth. Jesus' participation in the Davidic dynasty has already been established by the genealogy. The same title the Magi gave him was found over the cross (27:37).

"Worship" (GK 4686) probably means simply "do homage." Their own statement suggests homage paid to royalty rather than the worship of Deity. But Matthew, having already told of the virginal conception, doubtless expected his readers to discern that the Magi "worshiped" better than they knew.

3 In contrast with the Magi's desire to worship the King of the Jews, Herod was deeply troubled. In this "all Jerusalem" joined him, not because most of the people would have been sorry to see Herod replaced or because they were reluctant to see the coming of King Messiah, but because they well knew that any question like the Magi's would result in more cruelty from the ailing Herod, whose paranoia had already led him to murder his favorite wife and two sons.

4–5 All the chief priests and teachers of the law (i.e., those who served as leaders of the Jews) who were living in Jerusalem were quickly consulted. The majority of the teachers of the law were Pharisees; the priests were Sadducees. Since these two groups barely got along, Herod may have consulted each group separately. Herod's request of them implies that "the Christ" and "the king of the Jews" were recognized titles of the same expected person. The Jewish leaders answered the question by referring to what stands written in the OT, suggesting the authoritative and regulative force of the document referred to.

6 While expectation that the Messiah must come from Bethlehem occurs elsewhere, here it rests on Mic 5:2, to which are appended some words from 2Sa 5:2.

The addition of the shepherd language of 2Sa 5:2 makes it plain that the ruler in Mic 5:2 is none other than the one who fulfills the promises to David. Through these two OT texts, Matthew is hinting at a pair of contrasts (1) between the false shepherds of Israel who have provided sound answers but no leadership (cf. 23:2–7) and Jesus who is the true Shepherd of his people Israel, and (2) between a ruler like Herod and the one born to rule. Matthew also implies a contrast between the desires of the Gentile Magi to worship the Messiah and the apathy of the leaders who did not, apparently, take the trouble to go to Bethlehem.

7–10 The reason Herod wanted to learn, at his secret meeting with the Magi, the exact time the star appeared was that he had already schemed to kill the small boys of Bethlehem (cf. v.16). The entire story hangs together. Herod's hypocritical humility in v.8 deceived the Magi. Conscious of his success, Herod sent no escort with them. Herod could scarcely have been expected to foresee God's intervention (v.12).

Matthew does not say that the rising star the Magi had seen led them to Jerusalem. They went first to the capital city because they thought it the natural place for the King of the Jews to be born. But now the star reappeared ahead of them as they made their way to Bethlehem (it was not uncommon to travel at night). Taking this as confirming their purposes, the Magi were overjoyed. The Greek text does not imply that the star pointed out the house where Jesus was; it may simply have hovered over Bethlehem as the Magi approached it. They would then have found the exact house through discreet inquiry since (Lk 2:17–18) the shepherds who came to worship the newborn Jesus did not keep silent about what they saw.

11 This verse alludes to Ps 72:10–11 and Isa 60:6, passages that reinforce the emphasis on the Gentiles in this passage (cf. on v.6). Some time had elapsed since Jesus' birth (vv.7, 16), and the family was settled in a house. While the Magi saw both the child and his mother, their worship (cf. comment on v.2) was for him alone.

Bringing gifts was particularly important in the ancient East when approaching a superior (cf. Ge 43:11; 1Sa 9:7–8; 1Ki 10:2). Frankincense is a glittering, odorous gum obtained by making incisions in the bark of several trees; myrrh exudes from a tree found in Arabia and a few other places and was a much-valued spice and perfume used in embalming (Jn 19:39).

12 This second dream (cf. 1:20) mentions no angel. Perhaps Joseph and the Magi compared notes and saw their danger amid their fear and uncertainty; the dreams led them (vv.12–13) to flee. Which way the Magi went is unclear.

D. The Escape to Egypt (2:13–15)

13–14 The verb "had gone" (v.13) is the same as "returned" in the preceding verse, tying the two accounts together. This is the third dream in these two chapters, and for the second time an "angel of the Lord" is mentioned (cf. 1:20; 2:12). God was taking sovereign action to preserve his Messiah, his Son. Egypt was a natural place to which to flee. It was nearby, had a well-ordered Roman province outside Herod's jurisdiction, and had a population of about a million Jews. If Matthew was thinking of any particular OT parallel, probably Jacob and his family (Ge 46) fleeing the famine in Canaan was in his mind, since that is the trip that set the stage for the Exodus (cf. 2:15).

The angel's command was explicit. Joseph, Mary, and the Child must remain in Egypt, not only till Herod's death, but till given leave to return (cf. vv.19–20). The command was also urgent. Joseph left at once, setting out by night to begin the seventy-five mile journey to the border. The focus on God's protection of "the child" is unmistakable. Herod was going to try to kill him (v.13), and Joseph took "the child and his mother" (v.14—not the normal order) to Egypt.

15 The death of Herod brought relief to many. In Egypt, it made possible the return of the Child, Mary, and Joseph, who awaited a word from the Lord. Matthew goes on to point out that Jesus' exodus from Egypt fulfilled Scripture written long before.

The OT quotation almost certainly comes from Hos 11:1, which refers to Israel's exodus from Egypt. In what sense can Matthew mean that Jesus' return to the land of Israel "fulfilled" this text? Four observations clarify the issue.

(1) Jesus is often presented in the NT as the antitype of Israel, or better, the typological recapitulation of Israel. For example, Jesus' temptation after forty days of fasting recapitulated the forty years' trial of Israel (see comments on 4:1–11). Pharaoh had to let Israel go because Israel was the Lord's son (Ex 4:22–23). Thus it is only fitting that Jesus also come out of Egypt as God's Son, for already by this time he has been presented as the messianic "son of David" and, by the virginal conception, the Son of God (see also 3:17).

(2) The verb "to fulfill" (GK 4444) has broader significance than mere one-to-one prediction (see comments on 5:17). Not only in Matthew but elsewhere in the NT, the history and laws of the OT are perceived to have prophetic significance. Hebrews, for example, argues that the laws regarding the tabernacle and the sacrificial system were from the beginning designed to point toward the only Sacrifice that could really remove sin and toward the only Priest who could serve once and for all as the effective Mediator between God and humankind. "Fulfillment" must be understood against the background of such interlocking themes and their typological connections.

(3) It follows, therefore, that the NT writers do not think they are reading back into the OT things that are not already there germinally. Regarding v.15, Hos 11 pictures God's love for Israel. Although God threatens judgment and disaster, yet because he is God and not a man (11:9), he looks to a time when in compassion he will roar like a lion and his children will return to him (11:10–11). In short Hosea himself looks forward to a saving visitation by the Lord. The "son" language is part of this messianic matrix; insofar as that matrix points to Jesus the Messiah and insofar as Israel's history looks forward to one who sums it up, in that sense Hos 11:1 looks forward to Jesus the Messiah. The NT writers insist that the OT can be rightly interpreted only if the entire revelation is kept in perspective as it is historically unfolded (e.g., Gal 3:6–14).

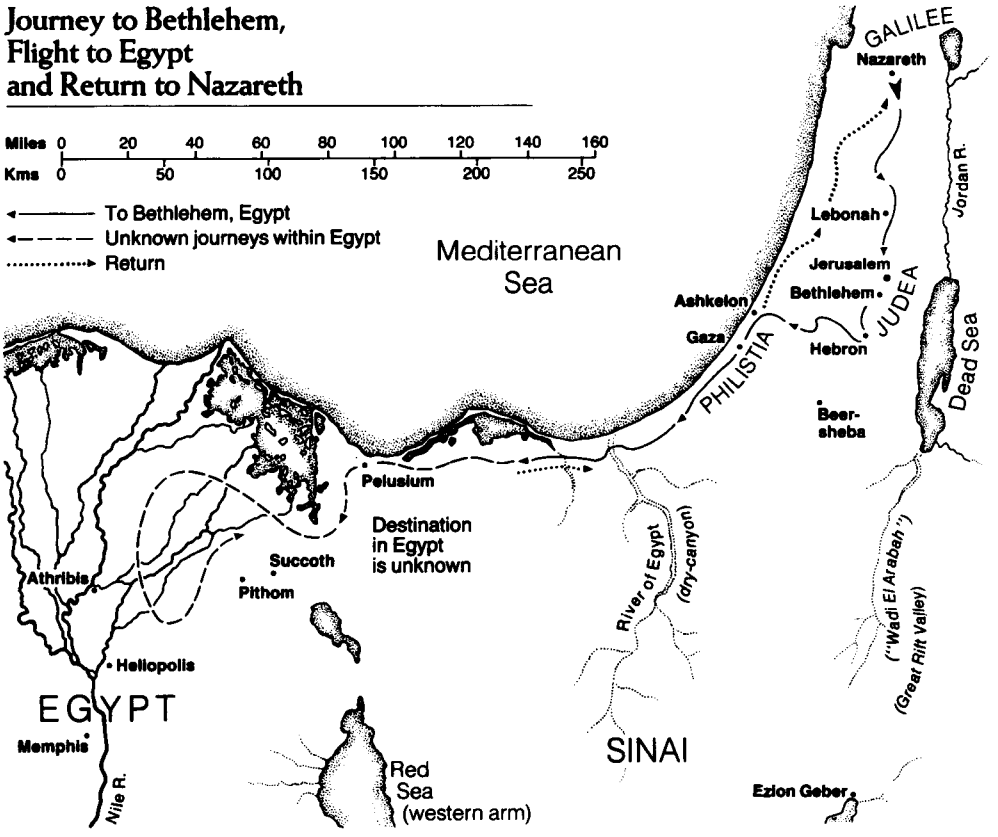
(4) If this interpretation of Mt 2:15 is correct, it follows that for Matthew Jesus himself is the locus of true Israel. This does not necessarily mean that God has no further purpose for racial Israel; but it does mean that the position of God's people in the Messianic Age is determined by reference to Jesus, not race.

E. The Massacre of Bethlehem's Boys (2:16–18)

Few sections of Mt 1–2 have been as widely criticized as this one. But this story is in perfect harmony with what we know of Herod's character in his last years. That there is no other historical confirmation is not surprising. The death of a few children (perhaps a dozen or so; Bethlehem's total population was small) would hardly have been recorded in such violent times.

16 It probably did not take long to carry out Herod's barbarous order. Bethlehem was only five miles from Jerusalem. The Magi had set out in the same evening (v.9) and may have left that same night after their dream (v.12); the same would be true of Joseph with Jesus and Mary (vv.13–15). By the next evening Herod's patience would have been exhausted. The two-years age limit was to prevent Jesus' escape; at the time he was between six and twenty months old. Herod, aiming to eliminate a potential king, restricted the massacre to boys. Furious at being deceived, he raged against the Lord and his Anointed One (Ps 2:2). Yet this was no narrow escape. The One enthroned in heaven laughs and scoffs at the Herods of this world (Ps 2:4).

17–18 To Matthew, the massacre fulfills Jer 31:15. This text probably refers to the deportation of Judah and Benjamin in 587–586 B.C. Nebuzaradan, commander of Nebuchadnezzar's imperial guard, gathered the captives at Ramah before taking them into exile in Babylon (Jer 40:1–2). Ramah lay north of Jerusalem on the way to Bethel; Rachel's tomb was at Zelzah in the same vicinity (1Sa 10:2). Jeremiah 31:15 depicts Rachel as crying out from her tomb because her "children," her descendants, are being removed from the land and are no longer a nation.



Why does Matthew refer to this OT passage? First, Jer 31:15 occurs in a setting of hope. Despite the tears, God says, the exiles will return; and now Matthew likewise suggests that, despite the tears of the Bethlehem mothers, there is hope because Messiah has escaped Herod and will ultimately reign.

But there may be a further reason, based on the differences between Matthew and the OT. Here Jesus does not, as in v.15, recapitulate an event from Israel's history. The Exile sent Israel into captivity and thereby called forth tears. But in Matthew the tears are not for him who goes into "exile" but because of the children who stay behind and are slaughtered. Why, then, refer to the Exile at all? If we look at the broader context of both Jeremiah and Matthew, Jer 31:9, 20 refers to Israel as God's dear son and goes on to introduce the new covenant (31:31–34) that the Lord will make with his people. Therefore the tears associated with Exile (31:15) will end. Matthew has already made the Exile a turning point in his thought (1:11–12), for at that time the Davidic line was dethroned. The tears of the Exile are now being "fulfilled"—i.e., the tears begun in Jeremiah's day are climaxed and ended by the tears of the mothers of Bethlehem. The heir to David's throne has come, the Exile is over, the true Son of God has arrived, and he will introduce the new covenant (26:28) that was promised by Jeremiah.

F. The Return to Nazareth (2:19–23)

19–21 This fourth dream and third mention of the "angel of the Lord" (v.19) continues the divine initiative in preserving and guiding the Child. Although the whole land was before Joseph and he apparently hoped to settle in Judea (perhaps in Bethlehem), he was forced to retire to despised Galilee.

22 Probably Joseph had expected Herod Antipas to reign over the entire kingdom; but Herod the Great made a late change in his will, dividing his kingdom into three parts. Archelaus, known for his ruthlessness, was given Judea, Samaria, and Idumea. Joseph, guided by the fifth and final dream, settled the family in Galilee.

23 The town Joseph chose was Nazareth, his former home and that of Mary (cf. 13:53–58; Lk 1:26–27; 2:39). This final quotation formula, like that of v.15, should probably be understood as taking place "in order to fulfill the prophets." Matthew's wording here suggests he had no specific OT quotation in mind; indeed, these words are found nowhere in the OT.

The interpretation of this verse has had numerous suggestions. The best one sees Matthew using "Nazarene" as an adjectival form meaning "from Nazareth," even though the Greek spelling is unusual. Nazareth was a despised place (Jn 7:42, 52), even to other Galileans (cf. Jn 1:46). Jesus grew up not in Bethlehem, with its Davidic overtones, but in Nazareth, with all the opprobrium of the sneer. When Christians were referred to in Acts as the "Nazarene sect" (24:5), the expression was meant to hurt. Matthew is therefore not saying that a particular OT prophet foretold that the Messiah would live in Nazareth; he is saying that the OT prophets foretold that the Messiah would be despised (cf. Pss 22:6–8, 13; 69:8, 20–21; Isa 11:1; 49:7; 53:2–3, 8; Da 9:26). The theme is repeatedly picked up by Matthew (e.g., Mt 8:20; 11:16–19; 15:7–8). In other words Matthew gives us the substance of several OT passages, not a direct quotation.

II. The Gospel of the Kingdom (3:1–7:29)

A. Narrative (3:1–4:25)

1. Foundational steps (3:1–4:11)

a. The ministry of John the Baptist (3:1–12)

All four Gospels preface the ministry of Jesus with that of John the Baptist. After four hundred silent years, God was speaking through a new prophet who called people to repentance and promised someone greater to come.

1 "John" had been a popular name among the Jews from the time of John Hyrcanus (died 106 B.C.). The John of this verse was soon designated "the Baptist," because baptism was so prominent in his ministry. He began his preaching in the "Desert of Judea," a vaguely defined area including the lower Jordan Valley north of the Dead Sea and the country immediately west of the Dead Sea. "Desert" had long had prophetic overtones (e.g., the Law had been given in the "desert"; cf. Ac 7:30, 36, 38).

2 John's preaching had two elements. The first was a call to "repent" (GK 3566). What is meant by this word is a radical transformation of the entire person, a fundamental turnaround involving mind and action and including overtones of grief; it results in "fruit in keeping with repentance." Of course, all this assumes that a person's actions are fundamentally off course and need radical change. John applies this repentance to the religious leaders of his day (3:7–8) with particular vehemence.

The second element in John's preaching was the nearness of the "kingdom of heaven," and this is given as the ground for repentance. Throughout the OT there was a rising expectation of a divine visitation that would establish justice, crush opposition, and renew the very universe.

The predominant meaning of "kingdom" (GK 993) in both the OT and NT is "reign": the term has dynamic force. In the first century there was little agreement among Jews as to what the messianic kingdom would be like. One popular assumption was that the Roman yoke would be shattered and there would be political peace and mounting prosperity for the people of God.

Except at 12:28; 19:24; 21:31, 43, Matthew always uses "kingdom of heaven" instead of "kingdom of God." His preferred expression certainly does not restrict God's reign to the heavens. The biblical goal is the manifest exercise of God's sovereignty, his "reign" on earth and among humans. There are enough parallels among the Synoptics to imply that "kingdom of God" and "kingdom of heaven" denote the same thing. The most common explanation why Matthew avoided "kingdom of God" was to remove unnecessary offense to Jews who often used circumlocutions like "heaven" to refer to God (e.g., Da 4:26). Matthew may also be subtly anticipating the extent of Christ's postresurrection authority: God's sovereignty in heaven and on earth is now mediated through him (28:18).

This kingdom, John preached, "is near" (GK 1581). The Messianic Age has now drawn near, the same message preached by Jesus (4:17) and his disciples (10:7). According to Matthew, the kingdom came with Jesus and his preaching and miracles, it came with his death and resurrection, and it will come at the end of the age. The Baptist's terminology, though veiled, necessarily aroused enormous excitement (v.5). But assorted apocalyptic and political expectations would have produced a profound misunderstanding of the kingdom being preached (see comment on Mk 1:44). Therefore Jesus himself purposely used veiled terminology when treating themes like this. Moreover, just as the angel's announcement to Joseph declared Jesus' primary purpose to be to save his people from their sins (1:21), so the first announcement of the kingdom is associated with repentance and confession of sin (3:6)—these themes are constantly intertwined in Matthew.

3 Matthew goes on to identify John the Baptist in an eschatological, prophecy-and-fulfillment framework with the one of whom Isaiah spoke. In Isa 40:3 (cf. John's own application of this verse in Jn 1:23) the way of the Lord is being "made straight" (a metaphor using road building to refer to repentance); in Mt 3:3 it is the way of Jesus. This sort of identification of Jesus with the Lord is common in the NT (e.g., Ex 13:21 and 1Co 10:4; Isa 6:1 and Jn 12:41) and confirms the kingdom as being equally the kingdom of God and the kingdom of Jesus. The deity of Christ is clearly implicit in such texts.

4–5 Clothes of camel's hair and a leather belt were not only the clothes of poor people but established links with Elijah (2Ki 1:8; cf. Mal 4:5). "Locusts" are large grasshoppers, still eaten in the East. Both Elijah and John had stern ministries in which austere garb and diet confirmed their message and condemned the idolatry of physical and spiritual softness. John's impact was enormous (v.5), and his crowds came from a wide area.

6 Confession of sin was commanded in the law, not only as part of a priest's duties (Lev 16:21), but as an individual responsibility for wrongs done (Lev 5:5; 26:40; Nu 5:6–7). In Israel's better days this was carried out (Ne 9:2–3; Ps 32:5). In the NT (cf. Ac 19:18; 1Jn 1:9) confession is scarcely less important. Since John was urging people to prepare for Messiah's coming by repenting and being baptized, we may surmise that open renunciation of sin was a precondition of his baptism.

The Jordan River is fast flowing. No doubt John stationed himself at one of the fords as he prepared the way for the Lord.

7 Representatives of the Sanhedrin (composed of Pharisees, Sadducees, and the elders) came to examine what John was doing (cf. Jn 1:19, 24). The question with which the Baptist confronted them has this sense: "Who suggested to you that you would escape the coming wrath?" Thus John's rhetorical question takes on a sarcastic nuance: "Who warned you to flee the coming wrath and come for baptism—when in fact you show no signs of repentance?"

John the Baptist stands squarely in the prophetic tradition—a tradition in which the Day of the Lord points much more to darkness than to light for those who think they have no sin (Am 2:4–8; 6:1–7). "You brood of vipers!" also belongs to the prophetic tradition (cf. Isa 14:29; 30:6; cf. Mt 12:34).

8–9 The coming of God's reign either demands repentance (v.2) or brings judgment. Repentance must be genuine: if we wish to escape the coming wrath (v.7), our lifestyle must be in harmony with our oral repentance (v.8). Merely being descendants of Abraham is not enough (v.9). In the OT God repeatedly cut off many Israelites and saved only a remnant. Verse 9 not only rebukes the self-righteousness of the leaders but implies that participation in the kingdom results from grace and extends beyond racial frontiers (cf. 8:11).

10 The ax is "already" at the root of the trees (for the idiom, cf. Isa 10:33–34; Jer 46:22). Just as the kingdom is dawning already (v.2), so also is the judgment; the two are inseparable. To preach the kingdom is to preach repentance; any tree, regardless of its roots, that does not bring forth good fruit will be destroyed.

11 With the phrase "for repentance" (GK 3567), John wants to contrast his baptism with that of the one who comes after him, who is more powerful, for he will baptize with the Holy Spirit and fire. This is not the normal order: usually the one who follows is the disciple, the lesser one (cf. Mt 16:24; Jn 13:16; 15:20). But because John's particular ministry is to announce the eschatological figure, he cannot do other than precede him.

Just as John's purpose was to prepare a way for the Lord by calling people to repentance, so his baptism pointed to the one who would bring the eschatological baptism in spirit and fire. John's baptism was "essentially preparatory." Jesus' baptism inaugurated the Messianic Age.

"Baptism in the Holy Spirit" is not a specialized term in the NT (see Eze 36:25–27; 39:29; Joel 2:28); Matthew and Luke add "and fire." This probably symbolizes a purifying agent along with the Holy Spirit (cf. Isa 1:25; Zec 13:9; Mal 3:2–3). The preposition "with" is not repeated; it governs both "Holy Spirit" and "fire," suggesting a unified concept. John's water baptism relates to repentance; but the one whose way he is preparing will administer a Spirit-fire baptism that will purify and refine. In a time when many Jews felt the Holy Spirit had been withdrawn till the Messianic Age, this announcement could only have been greeted with excited anticipation.

12 Messiah's coming will separate grain from chaff. A winnowing fork tossed both into the air. The wind blew the chaff away; the heavier grain fell, to be gathered up from the ground, while the scattered chaff was swept up and burned. The "unquenchable fire" signifies eschatological judgment (cf. Isa 34:10; 66:24; Jer 7:20), i.e., hell (cf. 5:29).

b. The baptism of Jesus (3:13–17)

13–14 During the time John the Baptist was preaching to the crowds and baptizing them, Jesus came from Galilee also to be baptized.

Verses 14–15 are peculiar to this gospel. John tried to deter Jesus from his baptism, insisting that he stood in need of baptism by Jesus. Earlier John had difficulty baptizing the Pharisees and Sadducees because they were not worthy of his baptism. Now he has trouble baptizing Jesus. Why? John's baptism signified repentance and confession of sin. Whether John knew Jesus well, we do not know. It is, however, inconceivable that his parents had not told him of Mary's visit to Elizabeth some three decades earlier (Lk 1:39–45). At the very least John must have recognized that Jesus, to whom he was related, whose birth was more marvelous than his own, and whose knowledge of Scripture was prodigious even as a child (Lk 2:41–52), outstripped him. John the Baptist was a humble man; conscious of his own sin, he could detect no sin Jesus needed to repent of and confess. So John thought that Jesus should baptize him.

15 John's consent was won because Jesus told him, "It is proper for us to fulfill all righteousness." What does this mean? John's baptism, it will be remembered, had two foci: repentance and its eschatological significance of the kingdom being near. Jesus affirms, in effect, that it is God's will ("all righteousness"; GK 1466) that John baptize him; and both John and Jesus "fulfill" that will by going through with it ("it is proper for us").

Within this framework we may recognize another theme. Jesus is seen as the Suffering Servant (Isa 42:1; cf. comment on Mt 3:17). But the Servant's first mark is obeying God: he "fulfills all righteousness" since he suffers and dies to accomplish redemption in obedience to the will of God. By his baptism Jesus affirms his determination to obey that will and to do his assigned work. Thus the "now" may be significant: Jesus is saying that John's objection to baptizing him is in principle valid. Yet he must "now," at this point in salvation history, baptize Jesus; for at this point Jesus must demonstrate his willingness to take on his servant role and identify himself with the sinful human race.

This interpretation assumes that Jesus knew of his Suffering-Servant role from the beginning of his ministry. This role was hinted at in 2:23; here it makes its first veiled appearance in Jesus' actions. The immediately following temptation narrative confirms it (4:1–11, see comments).

16 "As soon as" not only suggests that Jesus left the water immediately after his baptism but that the Spirit's witness was equally prompt. "He saw" most naturally refers to Jesus, not John, because Jesus is the focus of interest. But the voice was for John and possibly others, and it was stated in the third person.

"Heaven . . . opened" calls to mind OT visions (e.g. Isa 66:1; Eze 1:1). "The Spirit of God descending like a dove" simile could mean either that the manner of the Spirit's descent was like a dove's or that the Spirit appeared in a dove's form. Already in the OT, God promised that the Spirit would descend on his chosen Servant (Isa 42:1; see next comment).

17 The voice from heaven was God's own voice; it testified that God himself had broken silence and was again revealing himself to the human race—a clear sign of the dawning of the Messianic Age (cf. 17:5; Jn 12:28). The utterance from heaven reflects Isa 42:1, modified by Ps 2:7 (cf. Mt 12:18–21). The results are extraordinarily important.

(1) These words from heaven link Jesus with the Suffering Servant (cf. Isa 42:1) at the very beginning of his ministry and confirm our interpretation of v.15. (2) God refers to Jesus as "my Son"; implicitly the title "Son of God" is introduced and picked up immediately in the next chapter (4:3, 6). The reference to Ps 2:7 identifies Jesus as the royal, messianic Son of David. (3) Jesus has already been set forth as the true Israel to which actual Israel was pointing (see comment on 2:15); now the heavenly witness confirms the link. (4) At the same time the virginal conception suggests a more than titular or functional sonship: in this context there is the hint of an ontological sonship, made most explicit in the gospel of John.

These things are linked in the one utterance: at the very beginning of Jesus' public ministry, his Father presented him, in a veiled way, as the Davidic Messiah, the very Son of God, the representative of the people, and the Suffering Servant. Matthew will develop them further in his gospel.

c. The temptation of Jesus (4:1–11)

Both Matthew and Mark tie the temptations to Jesus' baptism. It is difficult to be certain exactly what happened or in what form Satan came to Jesus. Standing on a high mountain (v.8) would not itself provide a glimpse of "all the kingdoms of the world"; some supernatural vision is presupposed. But there is no reason to think the framework of the story is purely symbolic as opposed to visionary.

1 Jesus' three temptations tie into his baptism, not only by the references to sonship and the Spirit, but by the opening "Then." The same Spirit who engendered Jesus (1:20) and attested the Father's acknowledgment of his sonship (3:16–17) now leads him into the desert to be tempted by the devil. The "desert" (GK 2245) is not only the place associated with demonic activity (Isa 13:21; 34:14; Mt 12:43; Rev 18:2) but, in a context abounding with references to Dt 6–8, the place where Israel experienced her greatest early testings.

The "devil" (GK 1333) is the chief opposer of God, the archenemy who leads all the spiritual hosts of darkness (cf. Ge 3; Jn 8:37–40; 2Co 11:3; 12:7; et al.). In a day of rising occultism and open Satanism, it is easier to believe the Bible's plain witness to him than twenty years ago.

That Jesus should be led "by the Spirit" to be tempted "by the devil" is no stranger than Job 1:6–2:7. "To tempt" (GK 4279) can also mean "to test." Scripture "tempting" or "testing" can reveal or develop character (Ge 22:1; Ex 20:20; Jn 6:6; 2Co 13:5) as well as solicit to evil (1Co 7:5; 1Th 3:5; see comments on Lk 4:1–2). In Jesus' temptations God clearly intended to test him just as Israel was tested; Jesus' responses prove that he understood.

2 The parallels with historic Israel continue. Jesus' fast of forty days and nights reflected Israel's forty-year wandering (Dt 8:2). Both Israel's and Jesus' hunger taught a lesson (Dt 8:3); both spent time in the desert preparatory to their respective tasks. For both, God intended to prove their obedience and loyalty in preparation for their appointed work. The one "son" failed but pointed to the "Son" who would never fail (cf. comment on 2:15).

3–4 When the tempter came to Jesus, he did not challenge Jesus' sonship but assumed it and reflected on its meaning. Sonship of the living God, he suggested, surely means Jesus has the power and right to satisfy his own needs. Jesus' response is based solely on Scripture: "It is written" (followed by Dt 8:3). Everyone must recognize his or her utter dependence on God's word. Jesus' food is to do the will of his Father who sent him (Jn 4:34).

The point of each temptation must be determined by closely examining both the temptation and Jesus' response. This first one was a temptation for Jesus to use his sonship in a way inconsistent with his God-ordained mission. Satan's aim was to entice Jesus to use powers that were rightly his but which he had voluntarily abandoned to carry out the Father's mission (cf. 26:53–54; 27:40).

Reclaiming them for himself would deny the self-abasement implicit in his mission and in the Father's will. Israel demanded its bread but died in the wilderness; Jesus denied himself bread, retained his righteousness, and lived by faithful submission to God's word.

5–7 The second temptation (Luke's third) is set in the "holy city," on the highest point of the temple complex (see comment on Lk 4:9–12). Satan quoted Ps 91:11–12 from the LXX, omitting the words "to guard you in all your ways." His deceit lay not in omitting a few words but in misapplying his quotation into a temptation that easily traps the devout mind by apparently giving approval to what might otherwise be thought sinful. According to this passage, the angels will lift anyone who trusts in God (preeminently Jesus) up in their hands. Jesus is thereby tempted to test his sonship against God's pledge to protect his own.

Jesus replied with Dt 6:16. His hesitation came because Scripture forbids putting God to the test (see Ex 17:2–7, where the Israelites "put the Lord to the test" by demanding water). So Jesus was tempted by Satan to test God; but Jesus recognized Satan's testing as a sort of manipulative bribery expressly forbidden in the Scriptures. For both Israel and Jesus, demanding miraculous protection as proof of God's care was wrong; the appropriate attitude is trust and obedience (Dt 6:17).

8–10 Satan offers the kingdoms of the world and their "splendor" without showing their sin. Jesus, however, came to remove sin. Here was a temptation to achieve power by taking a shortcut to fullest messianic authority, sidestepping the Cross and introducing idolatry (see comment on Lk 4:5–8).

Jesus recognized that Satan's suggestion entailed depriving God of his exclusive claim to worship: neither God's "son" Israel nor God's "Son" Jesus may swerve from undivided allegiance to God himself (cf. Ex 23:20–33; Dt 6:13). So Jesus responded with a third "it is written" and banished Satan from his presence. In other words, Jesus had in mind from the very beginning of his earthly ministry the combination of royal kingship and suffering servanthood attested at his baptism (see comments on 3:15, 17).

11 The devil temporarily left Jesus (cf. 16:23). Though the conflict has barely begun, the pattern of obedience and trust has been established. He had learned to resist the devil (cf. Jas 4:7). The angelic help is not some passing blessing but a sustained one. Jesus had refused to relieve his hunger by miraculously turning stones to bread; now he is fed supernaturally. He had refused to throw himself off the temple heights in the hope of angelic help; now angels feed him. He had refused to take a shortcut to inherit the kingdom of the world; now he fulfills Scripture by beginning his ministry and announcing the kingdom in Galilee of the Gentiles (vv.12–17).

2. Jesus' early Galilean ministry (4:12–25)

12 John the Baptist's imprisonment (likely in the fortress of Machaerus) appears to have prompted Jesus to return to Galilee. Though Jesus began his ministry in Judea concurrent with John the Baptist (see Jn 1:19–3:21), the Synoptics start with his ministry in Galilee after John's imprisonment. Why the Judean ministry is ignored is unknown, though perhaps it was because the imprisonment marked the end of the forerunner's ministry. Furthermore, especially for Matthew, Galilee is of profound significance because it heralds the fulfillment of prophecy (vv.14–16) and points to the Gospel's extension to "all nations" (28:19).

13 Jesus moved from Nazareth to Capernaum (cf. Lk 4:31), a village on the northwest shore of Lake Galilee. This village enjoyed a fishing industry that probably demanded the presence of a tax collector's booth (9:9). Here, too, was Peter's house (8:14). But Matthew is interested in pointing out Capernaum's location with reference to the ancient tribal allotments of Zebulun and Naphtali (see vv.15–16).

14–16 Jesus' move fulfilled Isa 9:1–2, a prophecy that is part of a large structure looking to Immanuel's coming (see comment on 1:23). The point of the quotation is clear enough. In despised Galilee, the place where people live in darkness without the religious and cultic advantages of Jerusalem and Judea, where the darkness is most dense, here the light has dawned. This was God's prophesied plan; from of old the Messiah was promised to "Galilee of the Gentiles," a foreshadowing of the commission to "all nations" (28:19). Moreover, if the messianic light dawns on the darkest places, then Messiah's salvation can only be a bestowal of grace; Jesus came to call, not the righteous, but sinners (9:13).

17 "From that time on" marks an important turning point because it ties something new to what has just preceded it. The burden of Jesus' preaching so far is, in itself, identical to that of John the Baptist: "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is near" (see comments on 3:1–2). But John the Baptist had placed these words in an OT context that highlights his function as the forerunner who looks forward to the Messiah and his kingdom; when Jesus says the same words, they are linked (by "from that time") with an OT context that insists Jesus fulfills the promises of a light rising to shine on the Gentiles. With Jesus the kingdom has drawn so near that it has actually dawned. Therefore Jesus' hearers must repent—a demand made not only by the Baptist but by Jesus. The structure of the book thus sets up an implicit parallelism: Jesus is not so much a new Moses as a new Joshua, for as Moses did not enter the Promised Land but was succeeded by Joshua who did, so John the Baptist announced the kingdom and was followed by Jesus (Joshua) who leads his people into it (cf. comment on 1:21).

18–20 According to Jn 1:35–51 Peter and Andrew first followed Jesus at an earlier date, but then presumably took up fishing again. Perhaps this earlier event explains the speed with which they followed Jesus.

Simon was called "Peter" (meaning "rock"), but Matthew does not tell us how Peter received this name (cf. 16:18; Jn 1:42). Jesus called him and his brother Andrew to "follow me." This expression (along with several others) presupposes a physical "following" during Jesus' ministry. His "followers" were not just "hearers"; they actually followed their Master around (as students then did) and became, as it were, trainees. There is a straight line from this commission to the Great Commission (28:18–20). Jesus' followers are indeed to catch other people.

21–22 James and John may have been making repairs after a night's fishing. Jesus took the initiative and "called" (GK 2813) them. In the Synoptics, unlike Paul's letters (e.g., Ro 8:30), Jesus' call is not necessarily effectual. But in this instance it was immediately obeyed.

23–25 This section summarizes Jesus' spreading of the news of the kingdom. Summaries are common to narrative literature; but the one before us, with its parallel in 9:35–38, has distinctive features. (1) It does not just summarize what has gone before but shows the geographical extent and varied activity of Jesus' ministry. (2) It therefore sets the stage for the particular discourses and stories that follow and implies that the material presented is but a representative sampling of what was available. (3) It is not a mere chronicle but conveys theological substance.

Jesus' ministry included teaching, preaching, and healing. Galilee, the district covered, is small (approximately seventy by forty miles), but it had a population of up to three million and over two hundred cities and villages. Jesus "went around doing good" (Ac 10:38). The sheer physical drain must have been enormous. Above all we must recognize that Jesus was an itinerant preacher and teacher who necessarily repeated approximately the same material again and again and faced the same problems, illnesses, and needs again and again.

On Jesus' teaching in a synagogue, see comment on Mk 1:21. The message Jesus preached was the "good news" (GK 2295) concerning the kingdom, whose nearness had already been announced (3:2; 4:17) and which is the central subject of the Sermon on the Mount (5–7). God was breaking into history with his saving reign in the person of his Son. The healings of various diseases among the people further attest the kingdom's presence and advance (cf. 11:2–6; Isa 35:5–6).

The geographical extent of "Syria" is uncertain. From the perspective of Jesus in Galilee, Syria was to the north. From the Roman viewpoint Syria was a Roman province embracing all Palestine, Galilee excepted, since it was under the independent administration of Herod Antipas at this time. The term "Syria" reflects the extent of the excitement aroused by Jesus' ministry; if the Roman use of the term is here presumed, it shows his effect on people far beyond the borders of Israel. Two of the areas specifically mentioned (Decapolis and the region across the Jordan) were primarily Gentile areas, a theme Matthew has already been emphasizing (see comments on 1:6).

Jesus healed various types of sick people. In the NT sickness may result directly from a particular sin (e.g., Jn 5:14; 1Co 11:30) or it may not (e.g., Jn 9:2–3). But both Scripture and Jewish tradition take sickness as resulting from living in a fallen world (cf. on 8:17); the Messianic Age would end such grief (Isa 11:1–5; 35:5–6). Therefore Jesus' miracles, dealing with every kind of ailment, not only heralded the kingdom but showed that God had pledged himself to deal with sin at a basic level (cf. 1:21; 8:17).

B. First Discourse: The Sermon on the Mount (5:1–7:29)

This commentary on the Sermon on the Mount proceeds with the assumption that Matthew presents the real, historical setting for this discourse, though it recognizes that these chapters are condensed notes rather than the entire sermon verbatim. Thus we find Matthew's idiom selected and presented in accord with his own concerns. Lk 6:20–49 is a separate report of the same occasion, with a somewhat different selection of material (for more on this, see EBC 8:122–26).

The unifying theme of the sermon is the kingdom of heaven. It envelopes the Beatitudes (5:3, 10) and appears in 5:17–20, which details the relation between the OT and the kingdom. It returns at the heart of the Lord's Prayer (6:10), climaxes the section on kingdom perspectives (6:33), and is presented as what must finally be entered (7:21–23). Matthew places the sermon immediately after two verses insisting that the primary content of Jesus' preaching was the Gospel of the kingdom (4:17, 23). It provides ethical guidelines for life in the kingdom, but does so within an explanation of the place of the contemporary setting within redemption history and Jesus' relation to the OT (5:17–20). The community forming around him, his "disciples," is not yet so cohesive and committed a group that exhortations to "enter" (7:13–14) are irrelevant. The glimpse of kingdom life (horizontally and vertically) in these chapters anticipates not only the love commandments (22:34–40) but also grace (5:3; 6:12; 7:7–11; cf. 21:28–46).

Matthew does not record any controversies with Jewish teachers as to the OT law's meaning prior to this Sermon. This means that the antitheses in 5:17–48 ("You have heard . . . but I tell") should not be read as tokens of confrontation but in the light of the fulfillment themes richly set out in chs.1–4 and made again explicit in 5:17–20: Jesus comes "to fulfill" the Law and the Prophets (i.e., the OT Scriptures). Therefore his announcements concerning the kingdom must be read against that background. Whatever controversies occupied Jesus' attention, the burden of his kingdom proclamation always made the kingdom the goal of the Scriptures, the long-expected messianic reign foretold by the Law and the Prophets alike.

1. The Setting (5:1–2)

1 The "crowds" are those referred to in 4:23–25. Here Jesus stands at the height of his popularity. Although his ministry touched the masses, he saw the need to teach his "disciples" closely, though this word must not be restricted to the Twelve, whom Matthew has yet to mention (10:1–4). Those who especially wanted to attach themselves to him, Jesus takes aside to instruct. As such, they are paradigms for believers of any age.

At this point in his ministry, Jesus could not escape the mounting crowds; and by the end of his sermon (7:28–29), he was surrounded by yet larger crowds. This suggests that his teaching covered several days, not just an hour or two. The place of retreat Jesus chose was in the hill country (see comment on Lk 6:17). He "sat down" to teach. Sitting was the accepted posture of synagogue or school teachers (Lk 4:20).

2 Literally, this verse translates, "he opened his mouth and taught them," found elsewhere in the NT (13:35; Ac 8:35; 10:34; 18:14) and reflecting OT roots (Job 3:1; 33:2; Da 10:16). It is used in solemn or revelatory contexts.

2. The kingdom of heaven: its norms and witness (5:3–16)

a. The norms of the kingdom (5:3–12)

The Beatitudes (from the Latin beatus, "blessed") find their roots in wisdom literature and especially the Psalms. The OT never bunch more than two beatitudes together (e.g., Ps 84:4–5).

3 The Greek word for "blessed" (GK 3421) describes the person who is singularly favored by God and therefore in some sense "happy," though the word can also apply to God (1Ti 1:11; 6:15). The common factor between these two views is approval: humans

"bless" God, approving and praising him; God "blesses" humans, approving them in gracious condescension. In the eschatological setting of Matthew, "blessed" refers to a promised eschatological blessing, specified by the second clause of each beatitude.

Because Luke has "poor" (GK 4777) rather than "poor in spirit," many have concluded that he preserves the true teaching of the historical Jesus—concern for the economically destitute—while Matthew has "spiritualized" it by adding "in spirit." But already in the OT, "the poor" has religious overtones, i.e., those who because of sustained economic privation and social distress have confidence only in God (e.g., Pss 40:17; 69:32–33; Isa 61:1). Poverty itself is not the chief thing; it can be turned to advantage only if it fosters humility before God. In other words, to be poor in spirit is not to lack courage but to acknowledge one's spiritual bankruptcy and one's need to depend on God alone.

The "kingdom of heaven" (see comment on 3:2) belongs to such people; it is they who enjoy Messiah's reign and his blessings. They joyfully accept his rule and participate in the life of the kingdom (7:14). While the rewards of vv.4–9 are future ("they will be comforted," "will inherit," etc.), the first and last are present ("for theirs is the kingdom of heaven"). Yet one must not make too much of this, for the present tense can function as a future; and the future tense can emphasize certainty. There is little doubt that here the kingdom idea is primarily future, made explicit in v.12. However, though the full blessedness of those described in these beatitudes awaits the consummated kingdom, they already share in the kingdom's blessedness so far as it has been inaugurated (see comment on 4:17).

4 The godly remnant of Jesus' day weeps because of the humiliation of Israel, but they understand that it comes from personal and corporate sins. Weeping for sins can be deeply poignant (Ezr 10:6; Ps 51:4; Da 9:19–20) and can cover a global as well as personal view of sin and our participation in it.

"Comfort, comfort my people" (Isa 40:1) is God's response to human sin. These first two beatitudes deliberately allude to the messianic blessing of Isa 61:1–3. But these blessings, already realized partially but fully only at the consummation (Rev 7:17), depend on a Messiah who has come to save his people from their sins (1:21; cf. also 11:28–30).

5 The word "meek" (GK 4558) generally suggests gentleness (cf. 11:29; Jas 3:13) and the self-control it entails. To be meek toward others implies freedom from malice and a vengeful spirit. Jesus exemplifies it best (11:29; 21:5). We may acknowledge our own spiritual bankruptcy (v.3) and mourn (v.4). But to respond with meekness when others tell us of our bankruptcy is far more difficult. Meekness therefore requires such a true view about ourselves as will express itself even in our attitude toward others.

And the meek—not the strong, aggressive, harsh, tyrannical—will inherit the earth. The verb "inherit" (GK 3099) often relates to entrance into the Promised Land (e.g., Dt 4:1; 16:20). But the specific OT allusion here is Ps 37:9, 11, 29—a psalm recognized as messianic in Jesus' day. Entrance into the Promised Land ultimately became a pointer toward entrance into the new heaven and the new earth ("earth" is the same word as "land"; cf. Isa 66:22; Rev 21:1), the consummation of the messianic kingdom.

6 "Hunger and thirst" vividly expresses desire (cf. Pss 42:2; 63:1). It is best to take "righteousness" (GK 1466) here as simultaneously personal righteousness and justice in the broadest sense. These people desire not only that they may wholly do God's will from the heart, but also that justice may be done everywhere. All unrighteousness grieves them and makes them homesick for the new heaven and earth—the home of righteousness (2Pe 3:13). What they taste now whets their appetites for more. Ultimately they will be satisfied without qualification only when the kingdom is consummated.

7 This beatitude is akin to Ps 18:25. Mercy embraces both forgiveness for the guilty and compassion for the suffering and needy. No particular object of the demanded mercy is specified, because mercy is to be a function of Jesus' disciples, not of a particular situation. This theme is common in Matthew (e.g., 6:12–15; 9:13). The reward is not mercy shown by others but by God. This does not mean that our mercy is the causal ground of God's mercy but its occasional ground (see comment on 6:14–15).

8 "Pure [GK 2754] in heart" has two interrelated meanings. It means inner moral purity as opposed to merely external piety (cf. Dt 10:16; 1Sa 15:22; Ps 24:3–4; Mt 23:25–28); it also means singlemindedness, a heart free from deceit.

It is impossible to have one characteristic without the other. The one who is single-minded in commitment to the kingdom and its righteousness (6:33) will also be inwardly pure. Inward sham, deceit, and moral filth cannot coexist with sincere devotion to Christ. Either way, this beatitude excoriates hypocrisy (see comment on 6:1–18). The pure in heart will "see God"—now with the eyes of faith and finally in the dazzling brilliance of the beatific vision (cf. Heb 12:14; 1Jn 3:1–3; Rev 21:22–27).

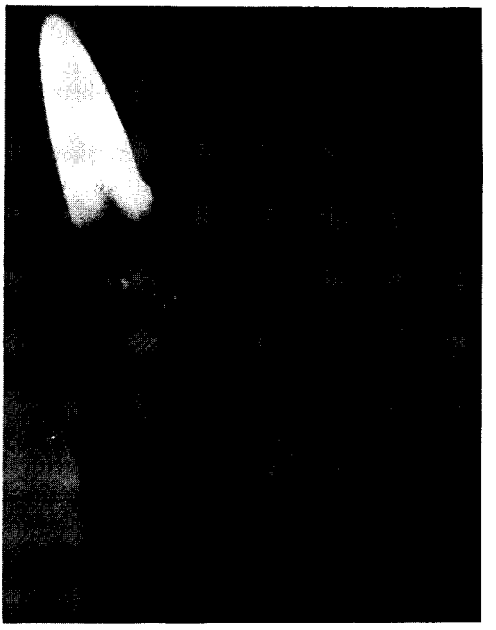
9 Jesus' concern in this beatitude is not with the peaceful but with the "peacemakers." "Peace" (GK 1645) is of constant concern in both OT and NT (e.g., Isa 52:7; Eph 2:11–22; Heb 12:14). The making of peace itself has messianic overtones (cf. "Prince of Peace" in Isa 9:6–7). Jesus does not limit the peacemaking to only one kind, and neither will his disciples. In the light of the Gospel, Jesus himself is the supreme peacemaker, making peace between God and us (Eph 2:15–17; Col 1:20) and among human beings. Our peacemaking will include the promulgation of that Gospel. It must also extend to seeking all kinds of reconciliation. Those who undertake this work are acknowledged as God's "sons" (GK 5626). In the OT, Israel has the title "sons" (Dt 14:1; Hos 1:10). Now it belongs to the heirs of the kingdom who are especially equipped for peacemaking and so reflect something of the character of their heavenly Father.

10 It is no accident that Jesus should pass from peacemaking to persecution, for the world enjoys its cherished hates and prejudices so much that the peacemaker is not always welcome. Opposition is a normal mark of being a disciple of Jesus (cf. Jn 15:18–25; 2Ti 3:12; 1Pe 4:13–14). The reward of these persecuted people is the same as the reward of the poor in spirit: the kingdom of heaven (see comment on 5:3).

11–12 These two verses, switching from third person to second, apply the force of the last beatitude to Jesus' disciples. Verse 11 extends the persecution of v.10 to include insult, persecution, and slander. The reason for the persecution in this verse is "because of me." It so identifies the disciples of Jesus with the practice of Jesus' righteousness that there is no place for professed allegiance to Jesus that is not full of righteousness. Moreover, this is an implicit Christological claim, for the prophets to whom the disciples are likened were persecuted for their faithfulness to God and the disciples for their faithfulness to Jesus. Not Jesus but the disciples are likened to the prophets; Jesus places himself on a par with God.

The appropriate response of the disciples is rejoicing. They are to rejoice under persecution because their heavenly reward will be great at the consummation of the kingdom. Opposition is sure, for the disciples are aligning themselves with the OT prophets who were persecuted before them (e.g., 2Chr 24:21; Ne 9:26; Jer 20:2). The "reward" (GK 3635) that Jesus promises is not earned or merited, but is entirely in keeping with the nature of the kingdom. Life lived under kingdom norms is inherently linked with the bliss of life in the consummated kingdom.

b. The witness of the kingdom (5:13–16)



13 In this verse and v.14, "You" is emphatic—"You, my followers and none others, are the salt of the earth." Salt was used in the ancient world to flavor foods and even in small doses as fertilizer. Above all, salt was used as a preservative. Rubbed into meat, a little salt would slow decay. Strictly speaking salt cannot lose its saltiness; sodium chloride is a stable compound. But most salt in the ancient world derived from salt marshes rather than by evaporation of salt water, and thus contained many impurities. The actual salt, being more soluble than the impurities, could be leached out, leaving a residue so dilute it was of little worth.

The question "How can it be made salty again?" is not meant to have an answer. The point is that if Jesus' disciples are to act as a preservative in the world by conforming to kingdom norms, they can discharge this function only by retaining their own virtue.

14–15 Though the Jews saw themselves as the light of the world (Ro 2:19), the true light is the Suffering Servant (Isa 42:6; 49:6), fulfilled in Jesus himself (Mt 4:16; cf. Jn 8:12; 1Jn 1:7).

Derivatively his disciples constitute the new light (cf. Eph 5:8–9; Php 2:15). In the OT as in the NT, light most frequently symbolizes purity as opposed to filth, truth as opposed to error, knowledge as opposed to ignorance, and divine revelation and presence as opposed to reprobation and abandonment by God.

The reference to the "city on a hill" is at one level fairly obvious. Often built of white limestone, ancient towns gleamed in the sun and could not easily be hidden. At night the inhabitants' oil lamps would shed some glow over the surrounding area. As such cities could not be hidden, so also it is unthinkable to light a lamp and hide it under a peck-measure. A lamp is put on a lampstand to illuminate all. The "city on a hill" saying may also refer to OT prophecies about the time when Jerusalem or the mountain of the Lord's house would be lifted up before the world and the nations would stream to it (e.g., Isa 2:2–5). Jesus' disciples constitute the true locus of the people of God and the means of witness to the world.

Ancient lamps found in archaeological digs in Palestine can still be filled with oil and lit.

16 Jesus drives the metaphor home. His disciples must show their "good works"—i.e., all righteousness, everything they are and do that reflects the mind and will of God. And others must see this light. It may provoke persecution (vv.10–12), but that is no reason for hiding the light by which others may come to glorify the Father. Witness includes not just words but deeds as well.

Thus the kingdom norms (vv.3–12) so work out in the lives of the kingdom's heirs as to produce the kingdom witness (vv.13–16). If salt (v.13) exercises the negative function of delaying decay and warns disciples of the danger of compromise and conformity to the world, then light (vv.14–16) speaks positively of illuminating a sin-darkened world and warns against a withdrawal from the world that does not lead others to glorify the Father in heaven.

3. The kingdom of heaven: its demands in relation to the OT (5:17–48)

a. Jesus and the kingdom as fulfillment of the OT (5:17–20)

The phrase "the Law and the Prophets" is repeated in 7:12. The two occurrences of this phrase mark the beginning and end of the body of Jesus' Sermon on the Mount and show that Jesus is taking pains to relate his teaching and place in the history of redemption to the OT Scriptures.

17 The formula "Do not think that" is a teaching device used by Jesus to clarify certain aspects of the kingdom and of his own mission and to set aside potential misunderstandings as to the nature of the kingdom (see also 10:34). Comparison with 10:34 shows that the antithesis may not be absolute. Few would want to argue that there is no sense in which Jesus came to bring peace (cf. comment on 5:9). Why then argue that there is no sense in which Jesus abolishes the law?

Jesus' mission was not "to abolish" (GK 2907; a term more frequently connected with the destruction of buildings [24:2; 26:61; 27:40]) "the Law or the Prophets," i.e., the Scriptures. The disjunctive "or" makes it clear that neither is to be abolished.

The nub of the problem lies in the verb "to fulfill" (GK 4444), for which a variety of interpretations have been offered. The best one says that Jesus fulfills the Law and the Prophets in that they point to him, and he is their fulfillment. Therefore we give "fulfill" exactly the same meaning as in the formula quotations, which in the prologue (chs. 1–2) have already laid great stress on the prophetic nature of the OT and the way it points to Jesus. Even OT events have this prophetic significance (see comment on 2:15). A little later Jesus insists that "all the Prophets and the Law prophesied" (11:13).

The manner of the prophetic foreshadowing varies. The Exodus, Matthew argues (2:15), foreshadows the calling out of Egypt of God's "son." The writer to the Hebrews argues that many cultic regulations of the OT pointed to Jesus and are now obsolete. In the light of the antitheses (vv.21–48), the passage before us insists that just as Jesus fulfilled OT prophecies by his person and actions, so he fulfilled OT law by his teaching. In no way does this "abolish" the OT as canon, any more than the obsolescence of the Levitical sacrificial system abolishes tabernacle ritual as canon. Instead, the OT's real and abiding authority must be understood through the person and teaching of him to whom it points and who so richly fulfills it.

The chief objection to this view is that the use of "to fulfill" in the fulfillment quotations is in the passive voice, whereas here the voice is active. But it is doubtful whether much can be made out of this distinction. Three conclusions are inevitable. (1) If the antitheses (vv.21–48) are understood in the light of this interpretation of vv.17–20, then Jesus is not primarily engaged there in extending, annulling, or intensifying OT law, but in showing the direction in which it points, on the basis of his own authority (to which, again, the OT points). (2) In vv.17–20 Jesus presents himself as the eschatological goal of the OT, and thereby its sole authoritative interpreter, the one through whom alone the OT finds its valid continuity and significance. (3) This approach eliminates the need to pit Matthew against Paul. Paul well understood that the Law and the Prophets pointed beyond themselves (e.g., Ro 3:21; Gal 3–4; cf. Ro 8:4) to Jesus, which is where, on the face of it, Matthew also intends the focus to be.

18 "I tell you the truth [amen; GK 297]" signals that the statement to follow is of the utmost importance; v.18 further explains and confirms the truth of v.17. The "jot" (KJV) refers to "the smallest letter" (NIV) of the Hebrew alphabet. "The least stroke of a pen" may refer to the small stroke that distinguishes several pairs of Hebrew letters. In any event Jesus here upholds the authority of the OT Scriptures right down to its individual letters. His is the highest possible view of the OT.

But vv.17–18 do not wrestle abstractly with OT authority but with the nature, extent, and duration of its validity and continuity. The nature of these has been set forth in v.17. The reference to "jot and tittle" (KJV) establishes its extent to the entire OT Scriptures, not just the Pentateuch or moral law. That leaves the duration of the OT's authority. The two "until" clauses answer this. The first—"until heaven and earth disappear"—simply means "until the end of the age." The second clause—"until everything is accomplished"—is more difficult, but "everything" is best understood as referring to everything in the OT, considered under its prophetic function. In other words, the entire divine purpose prophesied in Scripture must take place; not a single element will fail of its fulfillment (cf. 11:13). The OT reveals God's redemptive purposes and points to their fulfillment, their "accomplishment," in Jesus and the eschatological kingdom he is now introducing and will one day consummate.

19 The contrast between the least and the greatest in the kingdom probably supports gradation with kingdom ranks (as in 11:11; cf. 20:20–28; Lk 12:47–48). The one who breaks "one of the least of these commandments" is not excluded from the kingdom, but is very small or very unimportant in the kingdom. Distinctions are made not only according to the measure by which one keeps "the least of these commandments" but also according to the faithfulness with which one teaches them.

But what are "these commandments"? The expression most likely refers to the commandments of the OT Scriptures. The entire Law and the Prophets are not scrapped by Jesus' coming but fulfilled. Therefore the commandments of these Scriptures must be practiced. But the nature of the practicing has already been affected by vv.17–18. The law pointed forward to Jesus and his teaching; so it is properly obeyed by conforming to his word. As it points to him, so he, in fulfilling it, establishes the true direction to which it points and the way it is to be obeyed. Thus ranking in the kingdom turns on the degree of conformity to Jesus' teaching as that teaching fulfills OT revelation.

20 And that teaching, far from being more lenient, is nothing less than perfection (see comment on 5:48). The Pharisees and teachers of the law were among the most punctilious in the land. Jesus criticizes them because they domesticated the law and lost the radical demand for absolute holiness demanded by the Scriptures. What Jesus demands is the "righteousness" (GK 1466) to which the law truly points, exemplified in the antitheses that follow (vv.21–48). The verb "surpasses" suggests that the new righteousness outstrips the old both qualitatively and quantitatively.

b. Application: the antitheses (5:21–48)

Verses 21–48 are often called the six antitheses because all six sections begin with some variation of "you have heard it said . . . but I say." By this phrase, Jesus is not criticizing the OT but the understanding of the OT many of his hearers adopted (cf. esp. vv.22, 43, where part of what was "heard" certainly does not come from the OT).

The contrast between what the people had heard and what Jesus taught is not based on distinctions like outer legalism versus inner commitment or false interpretation versus true. Rather, in every case Jesus contrasts the people's misunderstanding of the law with the true direction in which the law points, according to his own authority as the law's "fulfiller" (in the sense established in v.17). Thus if certain antitheses revoke at least the letter of the law, they do so not because they are thereby affirming the law's true spirit, but because Jesus insists that his teaching on these matters is the direction in which the law actually points.

21–22 Jesus' contemporaries had heard that the law given their ancestors forbade murder and that the murderer must be brought to "judgment." But Jesus insists—the "I" is emphatic in each of the six antitheses—that the law really points to his own teaching: the root of murder is anger, and anger is murderous in principle. One has not conformed to the better righteousness of the kingdom simply by refraining from homicide. The angry person will be subject to God's "judgment" (GK 3213; for no human court tries cases of inner anger). To stoop to insult exposes one not merely to (God's) council but to the "fire of hell" (on this expression, see comment on Mk 9:43–48).

"Brother" (GK 81) cannot in this case be limited to male siblings but to one's fellow believers. The Christian habit of calling one another "brother" and "sister" goes back to Jesus' instruction as part and parcel of his training them to address God as Father (6:9). Among Christians anger must be eliminated.

23–24 Jesus gives two illustrations exposing the seriousness of anger, the first in a setting of temple worship (vv.23–24) and the second in a judicial setting (vv.25–26). The first concerns a "brother"; the second an "adversary." Remarkably neither illustration deals with "your" anger but with "your" offense that has prompted the brother's or the adversary's rancor. We are more likely to remember when we ourselves have something against others than when we have done something to offend others. If we are truly concerned about our anger and hate, we should be no less concerned when we engender them in others.

The "altar" is the one in the inner court. There amid solemn worship, recollection of a brother with something against one should in Christ's disciples prompt immediate efforts to be reconciled. Only then is formal worship acceptable.

25–26 Jesus again urges haste to settle matters with an offended adversary while still "with him on the way" to court. In the ancient world debtors were jailed till the debts were paid. Jesus insists on immediate action: malicious anger is so evil—and God's judgment so certain (v.22)—that we must do all in our power to end it (cf. Eph 4:26–27).

27–28 The OT command not to commit adultery (Ex 20:14; Dt 5:18) is often treated in Jewish sources not so much as a function of purity as of theft: it was to steal another's wife. Jesus insisted that the seventh commandment points in another direction—toward purity that refuses even to lust after any woman. Insofar as a man looks at the woman with a view to enticing her to lust, he is committing adultery with her; i.e., he makes her an adulteress.

29–30 The radical treatment of parts of the body that cause one to sin has led some (notoriously the church father Origen) to castrate themselves. But that is not radical enough, since lust is not thereby removed. The "eye" is the member of the body most commonly blamed for leading us astray, especially in sexual sins (cf. Nu 15:39; Pr 21:4; et al.); the "right eye" refers to one's better eye. But why the "right hand" in a context dealing with lust? More likely it is a euphemism for the male sexual organ.

Cutting off or gouging out the offending part is a way of saying that Jesus' disciples must deal radically with sin. Imagination is a God-given gift; but if it is fed dirt by the eye, it will be dirty. All sin, not least sexual sin, begins with the imagination. Therefore what feeds the imagination is of maximum importance in the pursuit of kingdom righteousness (compare Php 4:8). The alternative is sin and hell, sin's reward.

31–32 This two-verse unit carries further the argument of the preceding section. The OT not only points toward insisting that lust is the moral equivalent of adultery (vv.27–30) but that divorce is as well. This arises out of the fact that the divorced woman will in most circumstances remarry (esp. in first-century Palestine, where this would probably be her only means of support). That new marriage, whether from the perspective of the divorcee or the one marrying her, is adulterous.

The OT passage to which Jesus refers is Dt. 24:1–4, whose thrust is that if a man divorces his wife because of "something indecent" (not further defined) in her, he must give her a certificate of divorce; and if she then becomes another man's wife and is divorced again, the first man cannot remarry her. This double restriction in the OT—the certificate and the prohibition of remarriage—discouraged hasty divorces. Here Jesus does not go into the force of "something indecent." Instead he insists that the law was pointing to the sanctity of marriage.

The natural way to take the "except" clause is that divorce is wrong because it generates adultery except in the case of fornication. In that case, where sexual sin has already been committed, nothing is laid down, though it appears that divorce is then implicitly permitted, even if not mandated (cf. further discussion at 19:3–12).

33–36 Jesus now cites an antithesis on a new theme. What the people have heard is not given as direct OT quotation but as a summary statement accurately condensing the burden of Ex 20:7; Lev 19:12; Nu 30:2; and Dt 5:11; 6:3; 22:21–33. The Mosaic law forbade irreverent oaths, light use of the Lord's name, and broken vows. Once the Lord's name was invoked, the vow to which it was attached became a debt that had to be paid to the Lord (see comments on 23:16–22).

If oaths designed to encourage truthfulness become occasions for clever lies and casuistical deceit, Jesus will abolish oaths (v.34). For the direction in which the OT points is the fundamental importance of thorough and consistent truthfulness. If one does not swear at all, one does not swear falsely. Jesus insists that whatever anyone swears by is related to God in some way, and therefore every oath is implicitly in God's name—heaven, earth, Jerusalem, even the hairs of the head are all under God's sway and ownership (v.36; see also 23:18–22).

37 The Greek might better be translated "But let your word be, 'Yes, Yes; No, No.'" The doubling is probably part of Jesus' rhetoric. This saying is not, however, a ban on any and all oaths. God himself "swears" in Scripture (e.g., Ge 9:9–11; Lk 1:68, 73; Heb 6:17), the earliest Christians took oaths (cf. Ro 1:9; 2Co 1:23; et al.), and Jesus himself testified under oath (Mt 26:63–64). It must be frankly admitted that here Jesus formally contravenes OT law: what it permits or commands (Dt. 6:13), he forbids. But if his interpretation of the direction in which the law points is authoritative, then his teaching fulfills it.

38–39a The OT prescription of the lex talionis (Ex 21:24; Lev 24:19–20; Dt 19:21) was not given to foster vengeance; the law explicitly forbade that (Lev 19:18). Rather, it was given, as the OT context shows, to provide the nation's judicial system with a ready formula of punishment, not least because it would decisively terminate vendettas. The trouble is that a law designed to limit retaliation and punish fairly could be appealed to as justification for vindictiveness.

Jesus' disciple is not to "resist [GK 468] an evil person." In the context of lex talionis, the most natural way of understanding the resistance is "do not resist in a court of law." This interpretation is required in the next example (v.40). As in vv.33–37, therefore, Jesus' teaching formally contradicts the OT law. But in the context of vv.17–20, what Jesus is saying is reasonably clear: the OT, including the lex talionis, points forward to Jesus and his teaching. But like the OT laws permitting divorce, enacted because of the hardness of human hearts (19:3–12), the lex talionis was instituted to curb evil because of the hardness of the heart.

As this legal principle is overtaken by that toward which it pointed, so also is this hardness of heart. The OT prophets foretold a time when there would be a change of heart among God's people, living under a new covenant (Jer 31:31–34; Eze 36:26). Not only would the sins of the people be forgiven (Jer 31:34; Eze 36:25), but obedience to God would spring from the heart (Jer 31:33; Eze 36:27) as the new age dawned. Thus Jesus' instruction on these matters is grounded in eschatology. In Jesus and the kingdom, the eschatological age that the Law and Prophets had prophesied (11:13) has arrived; the prophecies that curbed evil while pointing forward to the eschaton are now superseded by the new age and the new hearts it brings.

39b–42 Four illustrations clarify Jesus' point and drive it home. In the first, a man strikes another on the cheek—not only a painful blow, but a gross insult (cf. 2Co 11:20). If a right-handed person strikes someone's right cheek, presumably it is a slap by the back of the hand, probably considered more insulting than a slap by the open palm. Instead of seeking recompense at law under the lex talionis, Jesus' disciples will gladly endure the insult again.

Although under Mosaic law the outer cloak was an inalienable possession (Ex 22:26; Dt 24:13), Jesus' disciples, if sued for their tunics (an inner garment like our suit but worn next to the skin), far from seeking satisfaction, will gladly part with what they may legally keep.

The third example refers to the Roman practice of commandeering civilians to carry the luggage of military personnel a prescribed distance, one Roman "mile." Impressment, like a lawsuit, evoked outrage; but the attitude of Jesus' disciples under such circumstances must not be spiteful or vengeful but helpful—willing to go a second mile.

The final illustration requires not only interest-free loans (Ex 22:25; Lev 25:37; Dt 23:19) but a generous spirit (cf. Dt 15:7–11; Pss 37:26; 112:5). These last two illustrations confirm our interpretation of vv.38–39, that the entire pericope deals with the heart's attitude, the better righteousness. For there is actually no legal recourse to the oppression in the third illustration, and in the fourth no harm that might lead to retaliation has been done.

While these four vignettes have powerful shock value, they were not meant to be new legal prescriptions. Verse 42 does not commit Jesus' disciples to giving endless amounts of money to everyone who seeks a "soft touch." Verse 40 is clearly hyperbolic: no first-century Jew would go home wearing only a loincloth. Nor does this pericope deal with the validity of a state police force. Yet the illustrations must not be diluted by endless equivocations; the only limit to the believer's response in these situations is what love and the Scriptures impose.

43 The command "Love your neighbor" is found in Lev 19:18; no OT Scripture adds "and hate your enemies," though this seems to be the result of popular reasoning. Such reasoning seems to have said that if God commands love for "neighbor," then hatred for "enemies" is implicitly conceded and perhaps even authorized.

44–47 Jesus allowed no casuistry. The real direction indicated by the law is love, rich and costly, and extended even to enemies. Many take the verb and the noun "love" (GK 26 & 27) as always signifying self-giving regardless of emotion, but such an interpretation is unwarranted. The content of Christian love is not based on a presupposed definition but on Jesus' teaching and example. To love one's enemies, though it must result in activities such as doing them good (Lk 6:32–33) and praying for them (Mt 5:44), cannot justly be restricted to activities devoid of any concern, sentiment, or emotion. There is no reason to think the verb here in Matthew does not include emotion as well as action.

The specific "enemy" referred to here is one's persecutors. Jesus himself repeatedly warns his disciples of impending persecution (e.g., vv.10–12; 10:16–23; 24:9–13). If Matthew's first readers were being persecuted for their faith, that was doubtless one application they made.

Jesus' disciples have as their example God himself, who loves so indiscriminately that he sends sun and rain on both the righteous and the unrighteous. Yet we must not thereby conclude that God's love toward people is in all respects without distinction, and that therefore all will be saved (see 25:31–46). Theologians call this love of God his "common grace" (i.e., the gracious favor God bestows "commonly," without distinction, on everyone).

God's example provides the incentive for Jesus' disciples to be "sons of [their] Father" (v.45). Ultimately this clause points to the necessity of pursuing a certain kind of sonship patterned after the Father's own character. Jesus' disciples must live and love in a way superior to the patterns around them. Jesus goes on to point out that even the despised tax collectors (see comment on Mk 2:14) love those who love them; Christian love must go beyond what naturally takes place.

48 It is best to understand v.48 as the conclusion to all the antitheses. The OT background to this verse is Lev 19:2, with "holy" displaced by "perfect" (GK 5455). Here for the first time perfection is predicated of God.

In the light of the preceding verses (vv.17–47), Jesus is saying that the true direction in which the law has always pointed is not toward mere judicial restraints, concessions arising out of the hardness of human hearts, still less casuistical perversions, nor even the "law of love." No, it pointed rather to all the perfection of God, exemplified by the authoritative interpretation of the law bound up in the preceding antitheses. This perfection Jesus' disciples must emulate if they are truly followers of him who fulfills the Law and the Prophets (v.17).

4. Religious hypocrisy: its description and overthrow (6:1–18).

a. The principle (6:1)

1 Jesus, having told his disciples of the superior righteousness expected of them, now warns them of the danger of hypocrisy. "Your righteousness" recurs here (cf. comment on 5:20), though the focus has changed from "righteousness" in a purely positive sense to "righteousness" in a formal, external sense.

Jesus is primarily concerned with the motives behind righteous living. To attempt to live according to the righteousness explained in vv.21–48 out of an eagerness for human applause is to prostitute that righteousness. For this there will be no reward (see comment on 5:12) from the heavenly Father. There is no contradiction with 5:14–16, where disciples are told to let their light shine before men so that they may see their good deeds; there the motive is for others to praise the heavenly Father. To trade the goal of pleasing the Father for the trivial and idolatrous goal of pleasing people will never do.

This verse introduces the three chief acts of Jewish piety (cf. vv.2–18)—almsgiving, prayer, and fasting. In each act the logical structure is the same: (1) a warning not to do the act to be praised by human beings, (2) a guarantee that those who ignore this warning will get what they want but no more, (3) instruction on how to perform the act of piety secretly, and (4) the assurance that the Father who sees in secret will reward openly.

b. Three examples (6:2–18)

2 While some in Jesus' day believed almsgiving earned merit, ostentation rather than merit theology is the point here. Jesus assumes his disciples will give alms: "When you give to the needy," he says, not "If you give to the needy."

The reference to trumpet announcements is difficult. It seems most likely that Jesus is referring to a practice of proclaiming public fasts by the sounding of trumpets. At such times prayers for rain were recited in the streets (cf. v.5), and it was widely thought that almsgiving insured the efficacy of the fasts and prayers. But these occasions afforded golden opportunities for ostentation, and that is precisely what "hypocrites" (GK 5695) were guilty of.

The form of hypocrisy mentioned here seems to be that of those who deceive themselves into thinking they are acting for the best interests of God and others and deceive onlookers as well. The needy are unlikely to complain when they receive large gifts, and their gratitude may flatter and thus bolster a giver's self-delusion.

The Pharisees' great weakness was that they loved praise from others more than God's praise (cf. Jn 5:44; 12:43). Those who give out of this attitude receive their reward in full. They win human plaudits, and that is all they get (cf. Ps 17:14).

3–4 The way to avoid hypocrisy is not to cease giving but to do so with such secrecy that we scarcely know what we have given.

Jesus' disciples must themselves be so given to God (cf. 2Co 8:5) that their giving is prompted by obeying God and having compassion on other people. Then their Father, who sees what is done in secret (Heb 4:13), will reward them (a reward received both in time and in eternity).

5 In his second example, Jesus assumes that his disciples will pray, but he forbids the prayers of "hypocrites" (see comment on v.2). Prayer had a prominent place in Jewish life and led to countless rabbinic decisions. To Jesus, the critical element was not the location or position of the one praying, but the motives ("to be seen by man"). And again there is the same reward (cf. v.2).

6 If Jesus were forbidding all public prayer, then clearly the early church did not understand him (e.g., 18:19–20; Ac 1:24; 3:1; 4:24–30). The public versus private antithesis is a good test of one's motives; those who pray more in public than in private reveal that they are less interested in God's approval than in human praise. Not piety but a reputation for piety is their concern. Far better to deal radically with this hypocrisy (cf. 5:29–30) and pray in a private "room." The Father, who sees in secret, will reward such disciples.

7–8 Matthew 6:7–15 digresses from the three chief acts of Jewish piety. Yet the content of these verses is certainly relevant to the issue of prayer. Prayer is central to a believer's life. So Jesus gives further warnings and a positive example.

Jesus labels all those who pray repetitiously, Jew or Gentile, as pagan! He is not condemning prayer any more than he is condemning almsgiving (v.2) or fasting (v.16). Nor is he forbidding all long prayers or all repetition. He himself prayed at length (Lk 6:12), repeated himself in prayer (Mt 26:44), and told a parable to show his disciples that "they should always pray and not give up" (Lk 18:1). His point is that his disciples should avoid meaningless, repetitive prayers offered under the misconception that mere length will make prayers efficacious. Essentially such babble is thoroughly pagan, for pagan gods allegedly thrive on incantation and repetition. But the personal Father to whom believers pray does not require information about our needs (v.8).

9 What follows now is commonly called "the Lord's Prayer," not so much his own prayer (Jn 17 is just that) as the model he gave his disciples ("This is how [not what] you should pray"). The first three petitions are cast in terms of God's glory, the rest in terms of our good.

The fatherhood of God is not a central theme in the OT. Where "father" does occur with respect to God, it is commonly by way of analogy, not direct address (Dt 32:6; Ps 103:13; Isa 63:16; Mal 2:10). Not till Jesus is it characteristic to address God as "Father" (GK 4252). Jesus himself addressed God as his own Father (Mk 14:36), and he teaches his disciples to do the same. Such an address to God could only appear familiar and presumptuous to opponents who were used to emphasizing God's transcendence.

Jesus' use of Abba ("Father" or "my Father"; Mk 14:36) was adopted by early Christians (Ro 8:15; Gal 4:6); and there is no evidence of anyone before Jesus using this term to address God. Throughout the prayer the reference is plural: "Our Father." In other words, Jesus teaches a prayer to be prayed in fellowship with other disciples (cf. 18:19), not in isolation (cf. Jn 20:17). We must pay attention to Jesus' use of pronouns with "Father." When forgiveness of sins is discussed, he speaks of "your Father" (6:14–15) and excludes himself. When he speaks of his unique sonship and authority, he speaks of "my Father" (e.g., 11:27) and excludes others. The "our Father" at the beginning of this model prayer is plural but does not include Jesus, since it is part of his instruction regarding how his disciples should pray.

This opening designation establishes the kind of God to whom prayer is offered: He is personal. That he is "our Father" establishes the relationship that exists between Jesus' disciples and God; in this sense he is not the Father of all people indiscriminately (see comment on 5:45). That he is "our Father in heaven" reminds us of his transcendence and sovereignty.

God's "name" is a reflection of who he is. Therefore to pray that God's name be "hallowed" (GK 39) is not to pray that God may become holy but that he may be treated as holy (cf. Ex 20:8; Lev 19:2; 1Pe 1:15) and that his name should not be despised (Mal 1:6) by the thoughts and conduct of those who have been created in his image.

10 As God is eternally holy, so he eternally reigns in absolute sovereignty. God's "kingdom" or "reign" (see comment on 3:2; 4:17) can refer to that aspect of God's sovereignty under which there is life. That kingdom is breaking in under Christ's ministry, but it is not consummated till the end of the age (28:20). To pray "your kingdom come" is therefore both to ask that God's saving, royal rule be extended now as people bow in submission to him and to cry for the consummation of the kingdom.

To pray that God's "will" (GK 2525), which is "good, pleasing and perfect" (Ro 12:2), be done on earth as in heaven is to use language broad enough to embrace three requests. (1) We pray that God's will may be done now on earth as it is now being accomplished in heaven. "Will" includes both God's righteous demands and his determination to bring about certain events in salvation history. So for that will to be "done" includes both moral obedience and the bringing to pass of certain events, such as the Cross. This prayer corresponds to asking for the present extension of the messianic kingdom. (2) We pray that God's will may ultimately be as fully accomplished on earth as it is now being accomplished in heaven. (3) We pray that God's will may ultimately be done on the earth in the same way as it is now being accomplished in heaven.

11 The last petitions explicitly request things for ourselves. The first is "bread" (GK 788), a term used to cover all food (cf. Pr 30:8; Mk 3:20; Ac 6:1; 2Th 3:12; Jas 2:15); it may further suggest all of our physical human needs.

We must pray for our needs, not our greeds. It is for one day at a time, reflecting the precarious lifestyle of many first-century workers who were paid one day at a time and for whom a few days' illness could spell tragedy. "Daily" is a difficult word to translate, most likely meaning "for the coming day." Jesus thus instructs his disciples to pray: "Give us today our bread for the coming day." This may sound redundant to Western readers, but it is an urgent petition to those who lived from hand to mouth.

The idea of God "giving" the food in no way diminishes responsibility to work (see vv.25–34) but presupposes not only that Jesus' disciples live one day at a time (cf. v.34) but that all good things, even our ability to work and earn our food, come from God's hand (cf. Dt 8:18; 1Co 4:7; Jas 1:17). It is a lesson easily forgotten when wealth multiplies and absolute self-sufficiency is portrayed as a virtue.

12 In addition to physical provisions, we also need forgiveness of sin and deliverance from temptation. The word "debt" (GK 4052) means "sin" or "transgression," here conceived as something owed God (cf. Lk 11:4).

Some have taken the second clause to mean that our forgiveness is the real cause of God's forgiveness, i.e., that God's forgiveness must be earned by our own. But we must distinguish between the concept of earning forgiveness (not taught here) and adopting an attitude that makes forgiveness possible. This thought is reinforced in vv.14–15 and 18:21–35 (see also comments on 5:5, 7).

13 The word used for "temptation" (GK 4280) rarely if ever before the writing of the NT means "temptation" in the sense of "enticement to sin" (see comments on 4:1; Lk 4:1–2); rather, it means testing. But testing can have various purposes and diverse results (e.g., greater purity, growth in faith, but also sin); the word can thus slide over into the entirely negative sense of "temptation" (see especially Jas 1:13–14). In the light of Jas 1:13–14, the word used here cannot easily mean "temptation," for that would be to pray that God would not do what in fact he cannot do.

But if the word means "testing," we face another problem. The NT everywhere insists that believers will face testing or trials of many kinds and that they should face them with joy (Jas 1:2). Thus, to pray for grace and endurance in trial is understandable; but to pray not to be brought to testings is strange. Yet perhaps this is not so strange. The NT tells us that this age will be characterized by wars and rumors of wars (24:6) but does not find it incongruous to urge us to pray for those in authority so "that we may live peaceful and quiet lives" (1Ti 2:2). While Jesus told his disciples to rejoice when persecuted (5:10–12), he nevertheless exhorted them to flee from it (10:23) and even to pray that their flight should not be too severe (24:20).

"Deliver" (GK 4861) can mean either "spare us from" or "deliver us out of." Both are spiritually relevant, and which way the verb is taken largely depends on how the preceding clause is understood. The words translated "the evil one" can either mean "evil" or refer specifically to the Devil. A reference to Satan is far more likely here for two reasons: (1) "deliver from" is an expression used predominantly of persons, and (2) Matthew's first mention of temptation (4:1–11) is unambiguously connected with the Devil. Thus the Lord's model prayer ends with a petition that, while implicitly recognizing our own helplessness before the Devil whom Jesus alone could vanquish (4:1–11), indicates trust in the heavenly Father for deliverance from the Devil's strength and wiles.

The doxology is theologically profound and contextually suitable, but it is best to leave out consideration of it as it is not part of Matthew's original work.

14–15 These verses reinforce the thought of the fifth petition (see comment on v.12). The repetition serves to stress the deep importance for the community of disciples to be a forgiving community if its prayers are to be effective (cf. Ps 66:18).

16 For fasting in the Bible, see comment on Mk 2:18 and ZPEB 2:501–4. In Jesus' day the Pharisees fasted twice a week (Lk 18:12). Some devout people, like Anna, fasted often (Lk 2:37). But such voluntary fasts provided marvelous opportunities for outward religious showmanship to gain a reputation for piety. The point is not that there was no genuine contrition but that these hypocrites were purposely drawing attention to themselves. They wanted the plaudits of other people and got them. And that's all they got.

17–18 Yet Jesus, far from banning fasting, assumes his disciples will fast as well as give alms and pray (vv.3, 6). What he condemns is ostentation in fasting. Moreover he forbids any sign at all that a fast has been undertaken, because the human heart is so mixed in its motives that the desire to seek God will be diluted by the desire for human praise, thus vitiating the fast.

Washing and anointing with oil (v.17) were merely normal steps in hygiene. The point of v.18 is not to draw attention to oneself, whether by somber mien or extravagant joy. Jesus desires reticence, not deception. And the Father, who sees in secret, will provide the reward (see comment on v.4).

5. Kingdom perspectives (6:19–34)

Having excoriated religious piety that is little more than ostentation, Jesus warns against the opposite sins of greed, materialism, and worry that stem from misplaced and worldly priorities. Instead, he demands unswerving loyalty to kingdom values (vv.19–24) and uncompromised trust (vv.25–34).

a. Metaphors for unswerving loyalty to kingdom values (6:19–24)

19 The prohibition of this verse could well be rendered "stop storing up treasures"; the time for a decisive break has come. The love of wealth is a great evil (1Ti 6:10), calling forth frequent warnings. For heirs of the kingdom to hoard riches in the last days (Jas 5:2–3) is particularly shortsighted. Yet as with many of Jesus' prohibitions in this sermon, it would be foolhardy so to absolutize this one that wealth itself becomes an evil. Elsewhere the Scriptures require a man to provide for his relatives (1Ti 5:8), commend work and provision for the future (Pr 6:6–8), and encourage us to enjoy the good things the Creator has given us (1Ti 4:3–4; 6:17). Jesus is concerned about selfishness; his disciples must not lay up treasures for themselves.

The "treasures on earth" might be clothing that could be attacked by moths. Fashions changed little, and garments could be passed on. They could also deteriorate. "Rust" refers not only to the corrosion of metals but to the destruction effected by rats, mildew, and the like. Less corruptible treasures could be stolen.

20–21 By contrast, treasures in heaven are forever exempt from decay and theft. They refer to whatever is of good and eternal significance that comes out of what is done on earth. Doing righteous deeds, suffering for Christ's sake, forgiving one another—all these have the promise of "reward" (see comments on 5:12; cf. 5:30, 46; 6:6, 15). Other deeds of kindness also store up treasures in heaven (10:42; 25:40), including willingness to share (1Ti 6:13–19).

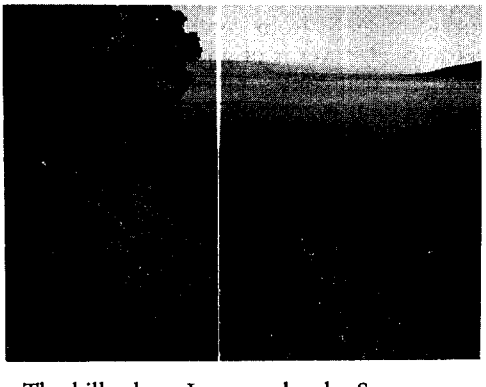
Jesus' point is that the things most highly treasured occupy the "heart" (GK 2840), the center of a personality that embraces mind, emotions, and will; thus the most cherished treasure subtly but infallibly controls one's whole direction and values.

22–23 Through the eye the body finds its way. The eye lets in light, and so the whole body is illuminated. But bad eyes let in no light, and the body is in darkness (v.23). The "light within you" is ironic; those with bad eyes, who walk in darkness, think they have light, but this light is in reality darkness. The darkness is all the more terrible for failure to recognize it for what it is (cf. Jn 9:41).

This fairly straightforward description has metaphorical implications. The "eye" can be equivalent to the "heart." The heart set on God so as to hold to his commands (Ps 119:10) is equivalent to the eye fastened on God's law (Ps 119:18, 148; cf. 119:36–37). Jesus similarly moves from "heart" (v.21) to "eye."

At the physical level the "whole body" is just that, a body, of which the eye is the part that provides "light." At the metaphorical level it represents the entire person who is plunged into moral darkness.

24 More basic than the choice between two treasures and two visions is the choice between two masters: God or Money. Both are portrayed, not as employers, but as slave-owners. Slavery involves ownership by one person and requires full-time service; a person cannot serve two slave-owners. Either God is served with a single-eyed devotion, or he is not served at all.



b. Uncompromised trust (6:25–34)

25 "Therefore," in the light of the alternatives set out (vv.19–24), Jesus instructs his disciples not to worry about the physical necessities, let alone the luxuries implied in the preceding verses. Far too often our entire existence focuses on such things. The argument goes from the greater to the lesser: if God has given us life and a body, both admittedly more important than food and clothing, will he not also give us the latter?

26 To worry about food and drink is to have learned nothing from the natural creation, which testifies to God's providence. The point is not that the disciples need not work—birds do not simply wait for God to drop food into their beaks—but that they need not fret. They may further strengthen their faith by remembering that God is in a special sense their Father and that they are worth far more than birds ("you" is emphatic). Here the argument is from the lesser to the greater.

27 Several options are available for translating this verse (see NIV note; see comment on Lk 12:25–26). Worry is more likely to shorten life than to prolong it, and ultimately such matters are in God's hands (cf. Lk 12:13–21). To trust him should be enough.

28–30 "Lilies of the field" (v.28) may be any of the wild flowers so abundant in Galilee. Jesus' point is a little different from the first illustration about birds; flowers neither toil nor spin. The point is not that Jesus' disciples may opt for laziness but that God's providence and care are so rich that he clothes the grass with wild flowers that are neither productive nor enduring. Even Solomon, the richest and most extravagant of Israel's monarchs, was not arrayed like one of these fields. Jesus closes with the thought that the root of anxiety is unbelief.

The hill where Jesus spoke the Sermon on the Mount is still covered with little flowers (possibily the lilies of 6:28) in the spring.

31–32 In the light of God's bountiful care, the questions posed in v.31 are unanswerable. Worse, they are essentially pagan. Jesus' disciples must live lives qualitatively different from those of people who have no trust in God's fatherly care and no fundamental goals beyond material things.

33 In view of vv.31–32, this verse makes it clear that Jesus' disciples are not simply to refrain from pursuing temporal things as their primary goal in order to differentiate themselves from pagans. Instead, they are to replace such pursuits with goals of far greater significance. To "seek first [God's] kingdom" (see comments on 3:2; 4:17) is to desire above all to enter into, submit to, and participate in spreading the news of the saving reign of God. It is to pursue the things already prayed for in the first three petitions of the Lord's Prayer (6:9–10).

To seek God's "righteousness" is not, in this context, to seek justification; rather, it is to pursue righteousness of life in full submission to the will of God, as prescribed by Jesus throughout this discourse (see comment on 6:1). For any other concern to dominate one's mind is to stoop to pagan fretting. Within such a framework of commitment, Jesus' disciples are assured that all the necessary things will be given them by their heavenly Father.

34 Worry over tomorrow's misfortunes is nonsensical, because today has enough to occupy our attention and because tomorrow's feared misfortunes may never happen. Furthermore, today's grace is sufficient only for today and should not be wasted on tomorrow. If tomorrow does bring new trouble, there will be new grace to meet it.

6. Balance and perfection (7:1–12)

a. The danger of being judgmental (7:1–5)

1 "Do not judge" (GK 3212) does not forbid all judging of any kind, for the moral distinctions drawn in the Sermon on the Mount require that decisive judgments be made. Jesus himself goes on to speak of some people as dogs and pigs (v.6) and to warn against false prophets (vv.15–20). Jesus' demand here is for his disciples not to be judgmental and censorious (see Ro 14:10–13). Those who judge like this will in turn be judged, not by other people (which would be of little consequence), but by God. Anyone who engages in such judgment usurps the place of God.

2 Using what was probably a proverbial saying, Jesus asserts that the judgmental person, by not being forgiving and loving, testifies to his own arrogance and impenitence, by which such individuals shut themselves out from God's forgiveness.

3–5 The "speck of sawdust" could be any bit of foreign matter. The "plank" is obviously colorful hyperbole. Jesus does not say it is wrong to help a fellow Christian remove the speck of dust in his eye, but it is wrong for a person with a "plank" in his eye to offer help. That is sheer hypocrisy (see comment on 6:2). But when a brother in a meek and self-judging spirit (cf. 1Co 11:31; Gal 6:1) removes the log in his own eye, he has the responsibility of helping his brother remove his speck (cf. 18:15–20).

b. The danger of being undiscerning (7:6)

6 The disciples, who have already been exhorted to love their enemies (5:43–47) and not to judge (v.1), might fail to consider the subtleties of the argument and become undiscerning simpletons. This verse guards against such a possibility.

"Pigs" and "dogs" serve together as a picture of what is vicious, unclean, and abominable (cf. 2Pe 2:22). The pigs trample the pearls under foot (perhaps out of animal disappointment that they are not morsels of food), and the dogs can be so disgusted that they turn on the giver. So the aphorism forbids proclaiming the "sacred" Gospel of the kingdom to certain persons designated as dogs and pigs. Rather than trampling the Gospel under foot, everything must be "sold" in pursuit of it (13:45–46).

This verse is not a directive against evangelizing the Gentiles, especially in a book full of various supports for this. "Dogs" and "pigs" refer to any persons who have given clear evidences of rejecting the Gospel with vicious scorn and hardened contempt.

c. Source and means of power (7:7–11)

7–8 Thus far the Sermon on the Mount lays down the righteousness, sincerity, humility, purity, and love expected of Jesus' followers; now it assures them such gifts are theirs if sought through prayer. In three imperatives ("ask," "seek," "knock") symmetrically repeated (v.8) and in the present tense to stress the persistence and sincerity required, Jesus assures his followers that, far from demanding the impossible, he is providing the means for the otherwise impossible. Far too often Christians do not have the marks of richly textured discipleship because they do not ask, or they ask with selfish motives (Jas 4:2–3). Like a human father, the heavenly Father seeks to teach his children courtesy, persistence, and diligence.

9–11 Using an argument similar in style to that in 6:25 (see comment), Jesus stresses that no parent would deceive a child asking for bread or fish by giving him a similar looking but inedible stone or a poisonous snake. His point is not merely the parents' willingness to give but their willingness to give good gifts—even though they themselves are evil. Jesus presupposes the sinfulness of human nature but implicitly acknowledges that that does not mean all human beings are as bad as they could be. How much more, then, will the heavenly Father, who is pure goodness without alloy, give good gifts to those who ask!

The blessings promised here as a result of prayer are not the blessings of common grace (see comment on 5:45) but of the kingdom. And though we must ask for them, it is not because God must be informed (6:8) but because this is the Father's way of training his family.

d. Balance and perfection (7:12)

12 The word "therefore" probably refers to the entire body of the sermon (5:17–7:12), for here there is a second reference to "the Law and the Prophets" (see comment on 5:17); Jesus stresses that he has taught about the true direction in which the OT law points, i.e., the Golden Rule. This rule sums up the Law and the Prophets (cf. Ro 13:9). In the context of fulfilling the Scriptures, it provides a handy summary of the righteousness to be displayed in the kingdom (cf. 5:20).

The verb translated "sums up" (lit., "is") might properly be translated "fulfills," as in Ac 2:16. In the deepest sense, therefore, the rule is the Law and the Prophets in the same way as the kingdom is the fulfillment of all that the Law and the Prophets foretold.

7. Conclusion: call to decision and commitment (7:13–27)

a. Two ways (7:13–14)

The Sermon on the Mount ends with four warnings, each offering paired contrasts: two ways (vv.13–14), two trees (vv.15–20), two claims (vv.21–23), and two builders (vv.24–27). They focus on eschatological judgment and so make it plain that the theme is still the kingdom of heaven. But if some will not enter it (vv.13–14, 21–23), the sole basis for such a tragedy is their response to Jesus' words.

13–14 The general picture here is clear enough: there are two gates, two roads, two crowds, two destinations. The "narrow" gate is clearly restrictive and does not permit entrance to what Jesus prohibits. The "wide" gate seems far more inviting. The "broad" road is spacious and accommodates the crowd and their baggage; the other road is "narrow" and restricting, because it is the way of persecution and opposition—a major theme in Matthew (see comment on 5:10–12; cf. Ac 14:22).

But the two roads are not ends in themselves. The narrow road leads to life, i.e., to the consummated kingdom (cf. vv.21–23); but the broad road leads to eternal death (cf. 25:34, 46; Jn 17:12; Ro 9:22; et al.). Democratic decisions do not determine truth and righteousness in the kingdom; the way that leads to life is exclusively by revelation.

It seems best to regard the gate as something entered in this life as one begins the path of discipleship. Entrance through the gate into the narrow way of persecution begins now but issues in the consummated kingdom at the other end of that way. In other words, even the beginning of this path to life is restrictive.

b. Two trees (7:15–20)

15 Jesus foresaw the continued existence of his newly formed community for a sustained period. He was doubtless steeped in the OT reports of earlier false prophets (Jer 6:13–15; 8:8–12; Eze 13; 22:27; Zep 3:4) and knew such people would infiltrate this new community. Warnings against false prophets are necessarily based on the conviction that not all prophets are true, that truth can be violated, and that the Gospel's enemies usually conceal their hostility and try to pass themselves off as fellow believers. At first glance they use orthodox language, show biblical piety, and are indistinguishable from true prophets (cf. 10:41). Thus it is vital to know how to distinguish sheep from wolves in sheep's clothing. Behind this saying is Jesus' view of himself as the true prophet (cf. 21:11, 46).

Neither the damage these false prophets do nor their brand of false teaching is stated; but the flow of the Sermon on the Mount as well as its OT background suggest that they do not acknowledge or teach the narrow way to life subject to persecution (vv.13–14; cf. Jer 8:11; Eze 13).

16–20 From a distance the little black berries on the buckthorn could be mistaken for grapes, and the flowers on certain thistles might deceive one into thinking figs were growing (v.16). But no one would be long deceived. So with people! One's "fruit" (GK 2843)—not just what one does, but all one says and does—will ultimately reveal what one is (cf. Jas 3:12). Living according to the kingdom can be feigned for a time, but what one is will eventually reveal itself in what one does. However guarded one's words, they will finally betray that person (cf. 12:33–37; Lk 6:45).

c. Two claims (7:21–23)

21–23 If vv.15–20 deal with false prophets, vv.21–23 deal with false followers. Their cry of "Lord, Lord" (v.21) reflects fervency. In Jesus' day it is doubtful whether "Lord" when used to address him meant more than "teacher" or "sir." But in the postresurrection period, it becomes an appellation of worship and a confession of Jesus' deity. Already here Jesus is implicitly claiming to be more than a mere teacher, since his name becomes the focus of kingdom activity; and he alone decrees who does or does not enter the kingdom (vv.22–23). Thus the warning and rebuke would take on added force when early Christians read the passage from their postresurrection perspective.

The determinative factor regarding who enters the kingdom is obedience to the Father's will (v.19; cf. 12:50). This is the first use of "my Father" in Matthew (cf. Lk 2:49; Jn 2:16); as such, it supports the truth that Jesus alone claims to be the authoritative Revealer of his Father's will.

"That day" is the Day of Judgment (cf. 25:31–46; 2Th 1:7–10; 2Ti 1:12; 4:8). The false claimants have prophesied in Jesus' name and by that name exorcised demons and performed miracles. There is no reason to judge their claims false; rather, their claims are insufficient.

Verse 23 presupposes an implicit Christology of the highest order. Jesus himself not only decides who enters the kingdom on the last day but also who will be banished from his presence. That he never knew these false claimants shows how close to spiritual reality one may come while knowing nothing of its fundamental reality (e.g., Judas Iscariot; cf. Heb 3:14; 1Jn 2:19).

d. Two builders (7:24–27)

24–27 Verses 21–23 contrast "saying" and "doing"; these verses contrast "hearing" and "doing" (cf. Jas 1:22–25). Moreover the will of the Father (v.21) now becomes definitive in what Jesus calls "these words of mine" (v.24): his teaching is definitive.

In the parable cited here, each house looks secure in good weather. But Palestine is known for torrential rains that can turn dry wadis into raging torrents. Only storms reveal the quality of the work of the two builders (cf. 13:21). The greatest storm is eschatological (cf. Isa 28:16–17; Eze 13:10–13), but Jesus' words about the two houses need not be thus restricted. The point is that the wise person builds to withstand anything.

What wisdom consists of is clear. A wise person represents those who put Jesus' words into practice; they too are building to withstand anything. Those who pretend to have faith, who have a merely intellectual commitment, or who enjoy Jesus in small doses are foolish builders. When the storms of life come, their structures fool no one, above all not God (cf. Eze 13:10–16).

The sermon ends with what has been implicit throughout it—the demand for radical submission to the exclusive lordship of Jesus, who fulfills the Law and the Prophets and warns the disobedient that the alternative to total obedience, true righteousness, and life in the kingdom is rebellion, a life that is self-centered, and eternal damnation.

8. Transitional conclusion: Jesus' authority (7:28–29)

28–29 This is the first of the five formulaic conclusions that terminate the discourses in this gospel (see also 11:1; 13:53; 19:1; 26:1). Matthew's formula is therefore a self-conscious stylistic device that establishes a structural turning point. In each case the conclusion prepares for the next section. Here mention of Jesus' authority leads into his authority in other spheres such as powerful and liberating miracles (8:1–17).

The crowds—probably a larger group than his disciples—are again pressing in on him (see comment on 5:1–2); they are amazed at both the content and the manner of his teaching, but such astonishment says nothing about their own commitment. Its cause is Jesus' "authority." In his authority Jesus differs from the "teachers of the law" (see comment on Mk 1:22).

The central point is this: Jesus' entire approach in the Sermon on the Mount is not only ethical but messianic. He is not an ordinary prophet who says, "Thus says the Lord!" Rather, he speaks in the first person and claims that his teaching fulfills the OT; that he determines who enters the messianic kingdom; that as the Divine Judge he pronounces banishment; that the true heirs of the kingdom will be persecuted for their allegiance to him; and that he alone fully knows the will of his Father.

III. The Kingdom Extended Under Jesus' Authority (8:1–11:1)

Several themes predominate in this section: faith, discipleship, the Gentile mission, and a diverse Christological pattern. At the same time these chapters prove that Jesus, whose mission in part was to preach, teach, and heal (4:23; 9:35), fulfilled the whole of it. Matthew has shown Jesus preaching the Gospel of the kingdom (4:17, 23) and teaching (chs. 5–7). Now he records some examples of his healing ministry.

A. Narrative (8:1–10:4)

1. Healing miracles (8:1–17)

a. A leper (8:1–4)

1 Jesus came down out of the hills (see on 5:1), where the Sermon on the Mount had been delivered; and the great crowds (4:23–25; 7:28–29) still pursued him.

2–3 Matthew now starts to elaborate on some specific miracles of Jesus, beginning with a leper (on leprosy, see comment on Mk 1:40). This man "knelt" (GK 4686) before Jesus, though this verb can also mean "worshiped." Clearly the former is meant in this historical setting. Yet as with the title "Lord" (see comment on 7:22–23), Christian readers of Matthew could not help concluding that this leper spoke and acted better than he knew. "If you are willing" reflects the leper's great faith, prompted by Jesus' healing activity throughout the district (4:24): he had no question about Jesus' healing power but feared only that he would be passed by. In affirming his willingness to heal, Jesus proved that his will is decisive. He already had the authority and power and only needed to decide and act. Jesus reached to touch the leper, probably because the leper did not dare come close to him.

By touching an unclean leper, Jesus would become ceremonially defiled himself (cf. Lev 13–14). But at Jesus' touch nothing remains defiled. Far from becoming unclean, Jesus makes the unclean clean. Both Jesus' word and touch (8:15; 9:20–21, 29; 14:36) are effective, possibly implying that authority is vested in his message as well as in his person.

4 Jesus' command for the leper to keep silent shows that Jesus is not presenting himself as a mere wonder-worker who can be pressured into messiahship by crowds whose messianic views are materialistic and political. His authority derives from God alone; he came to die, not to trounce the Romans. The people who disobeyed Jesus' injunctions to silence only made his mission more difficult.

Jesus commanded the cured man to follow the Mosaic prescriptions for lepers who claimed healing (cf. Lev 14). Why? Partly because Matthew wants to show that Jesus did submit himself to God's law. But the result is startling: the law achieves new relevance by pointing to Jesus. In conforming to the law, the cured leper becomes the occasion for the law to confirm Jesus' authority as the healer who needs but to will the deed for it to be done. Thus the supreme function of the "gift" Moses commanded is not as a guilt offering (Lev 14:10–18) but as a witness to others concerning Jesus.

b. The centurion's servant (8:5–13)

5 This is Matthew's second mention of Capernaum (cf. 4:13). In Jesus' day it was an important garrison town. No Roman legions were posted in Palestine, but there were auxiliaries under Herod Antipas, who had the right to levy troops. These were non-Jews, probably recruited from outside Galilee, perhaps from Lebanon and Syria. Centurions were the military backbone throughout the empire, maintaining discipline and executing orders. Matthew stresses this centurion's faith and race (vv.10–11).

6–7 On "Lord," see comment on 7:21–23. The servant of this centurion had a form of paralysis, though we do not know its precise nature. Jesus' response to the centurion's request for healing is likely a question: "Shall I [emphatic; i.e., I, a Jew] come and heal him?" (cf. 15:21–28). This response was based on Jesus' desire to find out exactly what the centurion was after and what degree of faith stood behind his ambiguous request (v.6).

8–9 Both here and in the story of the Canaanite woman (15:21–28), faith triumphs over the obstacle Jesus erects. The centurion's reply again opens with "Lord" (v.8), implying tenacity and deference. As John the Baptist felt unworthy to baptize Jesus, so this centurion felt unworthy to entertain him in his home. This feeling of unworthiness did not arise from an awareness that the centurion might render Jesus ceremonially defiled; rather, the man felt unworthy in the face of Jesus' authority. Here is someone who illustrates the truth of the first Beatitude (5:3).

The centurion's words presuppose an understanding of the Roman military system. All "authority" belonged to the emperor and was delegated. Therefore, because he was under the emperor's authority, when the centurion spoke, he spoke with the emperor's authority, and so his command was obeyed. A foot soldier who disobeyed would not be defying a mere centurion but the emperor, Rome itself, with all its imperial majesty and might. This self-understanding the centurion applied to Jesus. Precisely because Jesus was under God's authority, he was vested with God's authority, so that when Jesus spoke, God spoke. To defy Jesus was to defy God; and Jesus' word must therefore be vested with God's authority that is able to heal sickness. This analogy reveals an astonishing faith on the part of the centurion.

10 Jesus is astonished at the faith of the centurion and he addressed those following him (not necessarily his disciples; cf. 4:25; 8:1) with a solemn saying. Jesus commended the man's faith. The greatness of his faith did not rest in the mere fact that he believed Jesus could heal from a distance but in the degree to which he had penetrated the secret of Jesus' authority. That faith was the more surprising since the centurion was a Gentile and lacked the heritage of OT revelation to help him understand Jesus. But this Gentile penetrated more deeply into the nature of Jesus' person and authority than any Jew of his time. Matthew's words, therefore, underline the movement of the Gospel from the Jews to all people regardless of race—a movement prophesied in the OT, developed in Jesus' ministry (see comments on 1:1, 3–5; 2:1–12), and commanded by the Great Commission (28:18–20).

11–12 The picture in this follow-up saying of Jesus is that of the "messianic banquet," derived from such OT passages as Isa 25:6–9. Jesus here insists (contrary to most Jewish opinions) that many Gentiles will come from the four points of the compass and join the patriarchs at the banquet.

The "subjects of the kingdom" are the Jews, who see themselves as sons of Abraham (cf. 3:9–10), belonging to the kingdom by right. But Jesus reverses roles (cf. 21:43); and the sons of the kingdom are thrown aside, left out of the future messianic banquet, and consigned to darkness where there are tears and gnashing of teeth—elements common to descriptions of hell (i.e., gehenna; see comment on Mk 9:43–48).

Jesus goes on to describe the horror of the scene. Weeping suggests suffering and gnashing of teeth despair. The reversal is not absolute. The patriarchs themselves are Jews, as were the earliest disciples (Ro 11:1–5). But these verses affirm, in a way that could only shock Jesus' hearers, that the locus of the people of God would not always be the Jewish race. If these verses do not quite authorize the Gentile mission, they open the door to it and prepare for the Great Commission (28:18–20).

13 Regarding "just as," Jesus performed a miracle, not in proportion to the centurion's faith, nor because of the centurion's faith, but in content what was expected by the centurion's faith (cf. 15:28, where the emphasis is also on faith).

c. Peter's mother-in-law (8:14–15)

14–15 The main emphasis in this story is on Jesus' authority. Peter was married (1Co 9:5) and had moved with his brother Andrew from their home in Bethsaida (Jn 1:44) to Capernaum, possibly to remain near Jesus (Mt 4:13). His mother-in-law's fever may have been malarial; fever itself was considered a disease, not a symptom (cf. Jn 4:52; Acts 28:8). Jesus healed her with a touch, and she began to wait on him. Matthew mentions her service to make it clear that the miracle was effective and instantaneous (cf. v.26). Jesus' authority instantly accomplishes what he wills.

d. Many at evening (8:16–17)

16 Matthew mentions the evening to show the pace of Jesus' ministry. He focuses his attention on Jesus' power and on the scriptural witness to his person and ministry. He drives out "the spirits," evil beings that are often recognized in intertestamental literature as agents of disease (see comments on Mk 1:23–26, 34).

17 Matthew goes on to say that Isa 53:4 is being fulfilled in Jesus' healing ministry. What is the connection between these two? It is generally understood that when the NT quotes a brief OT passage, it often refers implicitly to the entire context of the quotation (which in this case is the entire "Servant Song" of Isa 52:13–53:12). Both Scripture and Jewish tradition understand that all sickness is caused, directly or indirectly, by sin (see comment on 4:24). But one main emphasis in the Servant Song is substitutionary atonement, whereby the servant bears the sicknesses of others through his suffering and death. Thus, Matthew suggests that Jesus' healing ministry is itself a function of his substitutionary death, by which he lays the foundation for destroying sickness.

That connection is supported by various collateral arguments. The prologue insists Jesus came to save his people from their sin, and this within the context of the coming of the kingdom. When Jesus began his ministry, he not only proclaimed the kingdom but healed the sick (see comment on 4:24). Healing and forgiveness are tied together, not only in a pericope like 9:1–8, but by the fact that the consummated kingdom, in which there is no sickness, is made possible by Jesus' death and the new covenant that his death enacted (26:27–29). Thus the healings during Jesus' ministry can be understood not only as the foretaste of the kingdom but also as the fruit of Jesus' death. In other words, for Matthew, Jesus' healing miracles pointed beyond themselves to the Cross.

Furthermore, the miracles in this chapter have been framed to emphasize Jesus' authority (see comment on vv. 8–9). This authority was never used to satisfy himself (cf. 4:1–10). He healed a despised leper (vv.1–4), a Gentile centurion's servant who was hopelessly ill (vv.5–13), and other sick people (vv.14–15), no matter how many (vv.16–17). Thus when he gave his life a ransom for many (20:28), it was nothing less than an extension of the same authority directed toward the good of others. Jesus' death reflected the intermingling of authority and servanthood already noted (e.g., 3:17) and now progressively developed.

It should be stated that this discussion cannot be used to justify healing on demand. This text and others clearly teach that there is healing in the Atonement; but there is also the promise of a resurrection body in the Atonement, even though believers do not inherit it until the Parousia. From the perspective of the NT writers, the Cross is the basis for all the benefits that accrue to believers; but this does not mean that all such benefits can be secured at the present time on demand, any more than we have the right and power to demand our resurrection bodies.

2. The cost of following Jesus (8:18–22)

18–19 Matthew now includes two brief stories that help show the nature of Jesus' ministry and the disciples he was seeking. Perhaps his imminent departure to the east side of the lake prompted certain people to beg him to include them in the circle of disciples going with him. Discipleship in the strict sense required close attachment to the master's person. All people, including "teachers of the law," divide around the absolute claims of Jesus and must be weighed according to their response to him.

20 Jesus' response shows that he identifies the teacher of the law as someone less than fully committed; he wanted to be a follower, not a full-fledged disciple. Jesus' reply was neither invitation nor rebuke but a pointed way of saying that true discipleship to the "Son of Man" is not comfortable and should not be undertaken without counting the cost (cf. Lk 14:25–33). In the immediate context of Jesus' ministry, the saying does not mean that Jesus was penniless but homeless; the nature of his mission kept him on the move and would keep his followers on the move.

The phrase "the Son of Man" could easily be replaced here by the word "I" (see comment on Mk 8:31). It occurs in a setting that stresses Jesus' humanity and may foreshadow his sufferings, a concept that was entirely incomprehensible to any Jew. Only after the Resurrection were the followers of Jesus able to understand the full message Jesus had in designating himself as "Son of Man."

21–22 If the scribe was too quick in promising, this "disciple" was too slow in performing. Palestinian piety, basing itself on the fifth commandment (Ex 20:12), expected sons to attend to the burial of their parents (cf. Ge 25:9; 35:29; 50:13). Jesus' reply used paradoxical language (as in 16:25): Let the (spiritually) dead bury the (physically) dead. These verses seem to be a powerful way of expressing the thought in 10:37—even closest family ties must not be set above allegiance to Jesus and the proclamation of the kingdom (Lk 9:60).

In actuality we may well question whether Jesus was really forbidding attendance at the father's funeral, any more than he was really advocating self-castration in 5:27–30. In this inquirer he detected insincerity, a qualified acceptance of Jesus' lordship. And that was not good enough. Commitment to Jesus must be without reservation. Such is the importance Jesus himself attached to his own person and mission.

3. Calming a storm (8:23–27)

Jesus' authority over nature is now displayed. He may have less shelter than the beasts and birds of nature, yet he is nature's master.

23–25 The narrative moves forward from v.18; the order to cross the lake to escape the crowd is now carried out. The "boat" here is doubtless a fishing boat, big enough for a dozen or more men and a good catch of fish, but not large, and without sails. The story that follows is primarily a miracle story with Christological implications (see comment on vv.26–27).

It is well known that violent squalls develop quickly on Lake Galilee. The surface is more than six hundred feet below sea level, and the rapidly rising hot air draws violent winds whose cold air churns up the water. Those among Jesus' contemporaries who really knew the OT would remember that in it God is presented as the one who controls and stills the seas (cf. Job 38:8–11; Pss 29:3–4, 10–11; 65:5–7; et al.).

26–27 That the disciples could cry to Jesus for help reveals that they believed, or hoped, he could do something. More than others they had witnessed his miracles and apparently believed he could rescue them. Jesus' calling them "you of little faith" is therefore not against skepticism of his ability, nor against the fear that the disciples might drown. Rather, Jesus rebukes their failure to see that the one so obviously raised up by God to accomplish the messianic work could not possibly have died in a storm while that work remained undone. They lacked faith, not so much in his ability to save them, as in Jesus the Messiah, whose life could not be lost in a storm, as if the elements were out of control and Jesus himself the pawn of chance. Jesus' sleep stems both from his exhaustion and from his awareness that his hour had not yet come.

The disciples expected Jesus to intervene. But just as a crowd expects a magician to do his trick, yet marvels when it is done, so the disciples are amazed when he stills the storm that there is a complete calm. What kind of man is this? Readers of this gospel know the answer—he is the virgin-born Messiah who has come to redeem his people from their sins and whose mission is to fulfill God's redemptive purposes. But the disciples did not yet understand these things. They saw that his authority extended over nature and were thus helped in their faith. Yet they did not grasp the profundity of his rebuke. Indeed, wherever "little faith" is used in Matthew (see 6:30; 14:31; 16:8), it signifies the failure to see beyond the mere surface of things. Thus this section is deeply Christological: themes of faith and discipleship are of secondary importance and point to the "kind of man" Jesus is.

4. Further demonstration of Jesus' authority (8:28–9:8)

a. Exorcising two men (8:28–34)

28 The locale of this miracle seems to have been in the district controlled by the town of Gadara, near the village of Gerasa, which lay about midpoint on the lake's eastern shore (see comment on Mk 5:1). Jesus has withdrawn here, not for ministry, but to avoid the crowds (v.18). Yet there can be no rest as long as the hosts of darkness oppose him.

Matthew mentions two men in this story; Mark and Luke (8:26–37) only one. Presumably Matthew had independent knowledge of the second man. The violence of these demoniacs is more fully described by Mark and Luke.

29 The demons stand in contrast to the disciples of v.27, for they know who Jesus is. In spite of this knowledge, they remained demons; to know Jesus yet to hate him is demonic. The question the demoniacs hurled at Jesus could be either harsh or gentle, depending on context (2Sa 16:10; Mk 1:24; Jn 2:4). Here it is hateful and tinged with fear. The title "Son of God" is probably to be taken in its richest sense: the demons recognized Jesus not solely in terms of his power but also in terms of his person. He was the Messiah, God's Son (see comment on 3:17).

The second question shows that there will be a time for demonic hosts to be tortured and rejected forever (cf. Jude 6; Rev 20:10). As the question is phrased, it recognizes that Jesus is the one who will discharge that judicial function at the "appointed time" (GK 2789); therefore it confirms the fullest meaning of "Son of God." That Jesus was in any sense circumscribing their activity before the appointed time already shows that Jesus' casting out of demons was an eschatological function, a sign that the kingdom was dawning (cf. 12:28).

The significance of "here" means "here on earth, where we have been given some freedom to trouble people before the end." This presupposes that Jesus has come to the earth before the End. It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that Jesus' preexistence is presupposed.

30–31 The request for the demons to enter into the pigs came probably because of a hatred of God's creatures, and most certainly because of a desire to stir up animosity against Jesus. The Gospels elsewhere show that exorcised evil spirits sometimes expressed their rage by visible acts of violence or mischief (e.g., 17:14–20).

32–34 The question as to why Jesus would grant the demons their desire and let them destroy the herd of pigs, the livelihood of their owners, is part of larger questions as to why human beings are possessed or why disease, misfortune, or calamity overtake us—questions only to be answered within the context of a broad theodicy outside the scope of this commentary. But the context offers some hints. He who is master of nature (vv.23–27) is also its ultimate owner (vv.28–34; cf. Ps. 50:10). The "appointed time" for full destruction of the demons' power has not yet arrived. The pigs' stampede dramatically proves that the former demoniacs had indeed been freed. But in the light of vv.33–34, the loss of the herd becomes a way of exposing the real values of the people in the vicinity. They prefer pigs to persons, swine to the Savior.

This ending of this story bears significantly on its total meaning. It shows once more that Jesus' ministry is not restricted to the Jews but foreshadows the mission to the Gentiles; it also shows that opposition to Jesus is not exclusively Jewish. To this extent it confirms earlier exegesis (see comment on 8:11–12) that showed that opponents in Matthew are not elected on the basis of race but according to their response to Jesus.

b. Healing a paralytic and forgiving his sins (9:1–8)

1 It is unclear whether this verse ties in more closely with 8:28–34 or with 9:2–8. The problem is not just academic, for the preceding pericope is almost certainly chronologically later (cf. Mk 5:1–20) than this one (cf. Mk 2:2–12); and a break more easily fits between 9:1 and 9:2 than between 8:34 and 9:1. Begged to leave (8:34), Jesus embarked in the boat he had so recently left and returned to "his own town," namely, Capernaum (4:13), on the western shore of the lake.

2 Mark (2:3–12) and Luke (5:8–26) inform us that this paralytic was brought to Jesus by lowering him through the roof. Jesus "saw their faith"—presumably that of the paralytic and those carrying him—exemplified in their coming, though he spoke only to the paralytic. Jesus' statement to him implies a close link between sin and sickness (see comment on 8:17)—perhaps in this case a direct one (cf. Jn 5:14; 1Co 11:29–30). It implies that of paralysis and sin, sin is the more basic problem.

3 Some teachers of the law muttered among themselves that Jesus was blaspheming. It is God alone who can forgive sin (Isa 43:25; 44:22), since it is against him only that people commit sin (Ps 51:4). Though in Jesus' day the precise definition of blasphemy was hotly disputed, the consensus seems to be that using the divine name was an essential element. Here the teachers of the law, in their whispered consultation, expanded blasphemy to include Jesus' claim to do something only God could do.

4 Jesus had seen the faith of the paralytic and his friends; now he saw the evil thoughts of some of the teachers of the law. Such discernment may have been supernatural, though not necessarily so. Jesus' charge probed beyond their talk of blasphemy to what they were thinking in their hearts. And what they were thinking was untrue, unbelieving, and blind to what was being revealed before their eyes.

5–7 Jesus responded to this situation according to the perspective of the teachers of the law—namely, that to say "Get up and walk" is easier since only God can forgive sins. Jesus claimed to do the more difficult thing. Thus v.6 is ironical—"All right, I'll also do the lesser deed." Yet if Jesus had blasphemed in pronouncing forgiveness, how could he now perform a miracle (cf. Jn 9:31)? But so that they might know that he had authority to forgive sin, he proceeded to the easier task. The healing therefore showed that Jesus as "Son of Man" truly had authority to forgive sins. This is the authority of Immanuel, "God with us" (1:23), sent to "save his people from their sins" (1:21). To sum up, the healing not only cured the paralytic (v.7), it also assured him that his sins were forgiven and thus refuted the charge of blasphemy.

8 People should "fear" (GK 5828; NIV "filled with awe") the one who has the authority to forgive sins. Indeed, they should fear whenever they are confronted by an open manifestation of God (cf. 17:6; 28:5, 10). The onlookers here simply saw a man exercising the authority of God, but readers recognize him as "God with us." God's gracious reign has come "on earth" (v.6); the kingdom of David's Son, who came to save his people from their sins, has dawned.

5. Calling Matthew (9:9)

9 The locale is probably the outskirts of Capernaum. Matthew was sitting "at the tax collector's booth," a customs and excise booth at the border between the territories of Philip and Herod Antipas (see comments on Mk 2:14). Having demonstrated his authority to forgive sins (vv.1–8), Jesus now calls to himself a man whose occupation made him a pariah—a sinner and an associate of sinners (cf. 1Ti 1:15).

Since Jews not uncommonly had two or more names, the simple equation of Levi (see Mk 2:14) and Matthew (a name likely meaning "gift of God") is the most obvious course to take. Some suggest that Matthew's work as a tax collector assured his fluency in Aramaic and Greek and that his accuracy in keeping records fitted him for note taking and later writing his gospel.

6. Eating with sinners (9:10–13)

10–11 According to most scholars, this dinner at Matthew's house likely occurred much later than his call in v.9. Jesus had said that even a tax collector has his friends (5:46), and Matthew's dinner substantiates this. "Sinners" (GK 283) may include common folk who did not share all the scruples of the Pharisees. But certainly it groups together those who broke Pharisaic rules of conduct—harlots, tax collectors, and other disreputable people. Though eating with them entailed dangers of ceremonial defilement, Jesus and his disciples did so. The Pharisees' question, put not to Jesus but to his disciples, was less a request for information than a charge; and they contemptuously lumped together "tax collectors and sinners" under one article. Jesus became known as "a friend of tax collectors and 'sinners'" (Mt 11:19).

12–13 These verses again connect Jesus' healing ministry with his "healing" of sinners (see comment on 8:17). The sick need a doctor and Jesus heals them; likewise the sinful need mercy and forgiveness, and Jesus heals them. The Pharisees were not so healthy as they thought (cf. 7:1–5); more important, they did not understand the purpose of Jesus' mission. Expecting a Messiah who would crush the sinful and support the righteous, they had little place for one who accepted and transformed the sinner and dismissed the "righteous" as hypocrites. Jesus explained his mission in terms reminiscent of 1:21.

Jesus challenges the Pharisees to "go and learn" from Hos 6:6. Use of this formula may be slightly sarcastic—that those who prided themselves in their knowledge of and conformity to Scripture needed to "go and learn" what it means.

The Hebrew word for "mercy" (GK 2876) is close in meaning to "faithful covenant love," which, according to Hosea, is more important than "sacrifice" (an aspect of ritual worship). As applied to the Pharisees by Jesus, therefore, the Hosea quotation was not simply telling them that they should be more sympathetic to outcasts and less concerned about ceremonial purity, but that they were being aligned with the apostates of ancient Israel in that they too were preserving the shell while losing the heart of the matter, as exemplified by their attitude to tax collectors and sinners. On Jesus' final statement, see comment on Mk 2:17.

7. Fasting and dawning of the messianic joy (9:14–17)

14 Probably while they were at dinner, some of John the Baptist's disciples showed up with criticism (possibly with some Pharisees; cf. 2:18–22). The Baptist himself showed a noble freedom from jealousy when Jesus' ministry began to supersede his own (cf. esp. Jn 3:26–31). But some of John's disciples felt differently now that he was in prison (4:12); and because they kept up their leader's asceticism (11:18), not heeding his strong witness to Jesus, they saw an occasion for criticism about the conduct of Jesus' disciples.

15 For his response Jesus used three illustrations. The first, about the "guests of the bridegroom," picks up a metaphor from the Baptist, who saw himself as the "best man" and Jesus as the groom (Jn 3:29). This metaphor would therefore be more effective with the audience confronting Jesus—Jesus is the groom and the disciples his "guests," who are so overjoyed at being with him that for them to fast is inappropriate.

In exonerating his disciples' eating, Jesus used messianic-eschatological terms. In the OT the bridegroom metaphor was repeatedly applied to God (Isa 54:5–6; 62:4–5; Hos 2:16–20); and Jews sometimes used it of marriage in connection with Messiah's coming or with the messianic banquet (cf. Mt 22:2; 25:1; 2Co 11:2; Eph 5:22–32; Rev 19:7, 9; 21:2). Thus Jesus' answer was implicitly Christological: he himself is the messianic bridegroom, and the Messianic Age has dawned.

16–17 The next illustration is about a piece of unshrunk cloth tightly sewed to old and well-shrunk cloth in order to repair a tear; it will cause a bigger tear. The final one is also a "slice of life" in the ancient world. Skin bottles for carrying various fluids were made by killing the chosen animal, cutting off its head and feet, skinning the carcass, and sewing up the skin, fur side out, to seal off all orifices but one (usually the neck). The skin was tanned with special care to minimize disagreeable taste. In time the skin became hard and brittle. If new wine, still fermenting, were put into such an old skin, the buildup of fermenting gases would split the brittle container and ruin both bottle and wine. New wine was placed only in new wineskins, still pliable and elastic enough to accommodate the pressure.

These illustrations show that the new situation introduced by Jesus could not simply be patched onto old Judaism or poured into the old wineskins of Judaism. New forms would have to accompany the kingdom that Jesus was now inaugurating; to try to domesticate him and incorporate him into the matrix of established Jewish religion and piety would only succeed in ruining both Judaism and Jesus' teaching.

8. A resurrection and more healings 9:18–34)

Jesus performs three new kinds of miracles: raising the dead and healing the blind and mute. By these examples of spheres over which Jesus has authority, Matthew is preparing us for Jesus' defense to the disciples of John the Baptist (11:2–5): the blind receive sight, the lame walk, those who have leprosy are cured, the deaf hear (usually associated with muteness), and the dead are raised. Jesus' messianic credentials are thus grouped together.

a. Raising a girl and healing a woman (9:18–26)

18–19 Matthew tightly links this narrative to the dinner in his house. A synagogue ruler, hence a Jew and a man of considerable influence in the lives of the people, "knelt before" (GK 4686) Jesus: the verb here suggests deep courtesy, a pleading homage before someone in a position to grant a favor. His daughter "has just died," and he requests Jesus to come and raise her. As usual, Jesus responded to faith, small or great, and got up from the table to leave.

20–22 The nature of the woman's hemorrhage is probably chronic bleeding from the womb, making her perpetually unclean (cf. Lev 15:25–33). Having heard of others who had been healed at Jesus' touch, this woman decided to touch even a tassel of Jesus' cloak. Moved in part by a superstitious view of Jesus, she struggled through the crowd, which, because of her "unclean" condition, she should have avoided.

Matthew's account is shorter than Mark's (Mk 5:22–43), keeping only what is of most interest to him. The woman was healed on touching Jesus' cloak. He turned to her and indicated that it was her faith that was effective, not the superstition mingled with it.

23–26 Flute players (v.23) were employed both on festive occasions (Rev 18:22) and at funerals. Matthew alone mentions them in the ruler's house, probably out of personal recollection. Jesus was about to reverse funeral symbolism of the finality of death (on funeral customs, see comments on Mk 5:38). His miracle not only brought a corpse to life but hope to despair.

The crowd mocked Jesus, not just because he had said, "The girl is not dead but asleep," but even more because they thought that this great healer had arrived too late. Now he was going too far; carried away by his own success, he would try his skill on a corpse and make a fool of himself. In such a situation Jesus' words became, in retrospect, all the more profound. Jesus touched the corpse; and the body, rather than defiling him, came to life. For Matthew the miracle showed that Jesus' authority as the Christ extended even over the dead.

b. Healing two blind men (9:27–31)

27–28 Apparently Jesus was returning from the ruler's house (v.23) either to his own house (4:13) or to that of Matthew (vv.10, 28). We should probably envisage a large crowd after the dramatic raising of the ruler's daughter. Attached to the crowd were two blind men who had faith enough to follow him indoors.

This is the first time Jesus is called "Son of David" (v.27), and there can be no doubt that the blind men were confessing Jesus as Messiah (see comment on 1:1). They may have been physically blind, but they really "saw" better than many others—further evidence that Jesus came to those who needed a doctor (vv.12–13). If Jesus were really the Messiah, they could expect to receive their sight (see Isa 35:5–6). So their need drove them to faith.

Jesus did not deal with the blind men until they were indoors. This may have been to dampen messianic expectations (see next comment) on a day marked by two highly public and dramatic miracles (v.26). It may also have been a device to increase their faith. The latter is suggested by his question (v.28), which accomplished two other things: (1) it revealed that their cries were not merely those of desperation but of faith; and (2) it showed that their faith was directed not to God alone but to Jesus' person and to his power and authority. Their title for Jesus was therefore right; he is truly the messianic Son of David.

29–31 Jesus' touching the blind men's eyes—perhaps no more than a compassionate gesture to encourage faith—was not the sole means of this healing: it also depended on Jesus' authoritative word. "According to your faith" means "since you believe, your request is granted" (cf. v.22). Jesus' stern warning not to tell anyone reveals his intense desire to avoid a falsely based acclaim that would not only impede but also endanger his true mission (see comment on 8:4). But the men whose faith brought them to Christ for healing did not stay with him to learn obedience. So the news spread throughout the region (cf. v.26).

c. Exorcising a mute man (9:32–34)

32–33 The man here may have been not only mute but a deaf mute. The NT frequently attributes various diseases to demonic activity; but since the same ailment mentioned here appears elsewhere without any suggestion of demonic activity (e.g., Mk 7:32–33), the connection between the two here presupposes a real ability Jesus had to distinguish between natural and demonic causes. The crowd's amazement (v.33) climaxes the earlier excitement (vv.26, 31). Nothing has ever been seen like this in Israel—and, by implication, if not among God's chosen people, then nowhere. But the same amazement ominously sets the stage for the Pharisees' cynical response (v.34).

34 This is not the first intimation of direct opposition to Jesus in Matthew (vv.3, 11, 14, 24; cf. 5:10–12, 44). But the tide of opposition, which later brought Jesus to the cross, now becomes an essential part of the background to the next discourse.

9. Spreading the news of the kingdom (9:35–10:4)

a. Praying for workers (9:35–38)

As 4:23–25 prepares for the first discourse (chs. 5–7), so vv.35–38 provide a report and summary that prepares for the second (10:5–42). A new note is added; not only are we told again of the extensiveness of Jesus' labors, but we learn that the work was so great that many workers were needed. This leads to the commissioning of 10:1–4 and to the related discourse of 10:5–42.

35–36 Verse 35 summarizes the heart of Jesus' Galilean ministry and prepares us for the new phase of mission via the Twelve (see comment on 4:23). Like the Lord in the OT (cf. Eze 34), Jesus showed compassion on the shepherdless crowds and judgment on the false leaders. The "sheep" Jesus sees are bullied and oppressed; and in the face of such problems, they are "helpless," unable to rescue themselves or escape their tormentors. Parallels with the OT (e.g., 1Ki 22:17; 2Ch 18:16; Isa 53:6) remind us not only of the theme's rich background but also that the shepherd can refer either to God or to the Davidic Messiah whom God promised to send (cf. 2:6; 10:6, 16; 15:24; 25:31–46; 26:31).

37–38 The metaphor changes from sheep farming to harvest (v.37), as Jesus seeks to awaken similar compassion in his disciples. Later on the harvest is the end of the age (13:49) and the judgment it brings—a common symbol (cf. Isa 17:11; Joel 3:13). It is possible to see this verse as a warning to Israel that judgment time is near.

Jesus is speaking here to "his disciples," which many take to refer to the Twelve. More likely, this phrase designates a larger group exhorted to "ask" that the Lord of the harvest will thrust laborers into his "harvest field." By contrast the Twelve are immediately commissioned as workers (10:1–4). This interpretation best fits 10:1: Jesus "called his twelve disciples to him."

b. Commissioning the Twelve (10:1–4)

1 He whose word (chs. 5–7) and deed (chs. 8–9) were characterized by authority now delegates something of that authority to twelve men. This is the first time Matthew has explicitly mentioned the Twelve, though his language suggests that the Twelve became a recognized group somewhat earlier. This commission was also a stage in the training and preparation of those who, after Pentecost, would lead the earliest thrust of the fledgling church. Twelve were chosen, probably on an analogy to the twelve tribes of Israel (see comment on Mk 3:13).

The authority the Twelve received enabled them to heal "every kind of disease and sickness" (cf. 4:23; 9:35) and to drive out "evil spirits"—spirits in rebellion against God, hostile to humans, and capable of inflicting mental, moral, and physical harm. This is the first mention in Matthew of such spirits (see also 12:43).

2–4 For the first and only time in Matthew, the Twelve are called "apostles" (GK 693). "Apostle," as used in NT documents, has narrower and wider meanings. It can mean merely "messenger" (Jn 13:16), refer to Jesus ("the apostle and high priest whom we confess," Heb 3:1), or denote a group of "missionaries"—i.e., a group larger than the Twelve and Paul (Ro 16:7; 2Co 8:23). Nevertheless, the usual meaning is a narrow one, referring to special authoritative representatives chosen by Christ (cf. 1Co 9:1–5; 15:7; Gal 1:17, 19; et al.). Paul usually used the term to refer to the Twelve plus himself (by special dispensation, 1Co 15:8–10). For discussion of the twelve men mentioned here, see comment on Mk 3:16–19.

B. Second Discourse: Mission and Martyrdom (10:5–11:1)

1. Setting (10:5a)

5a Many scholars have suggested that this speech of Jesus is a compilation of Matthew from various sayings of Jesus (e.g., those found in Mk 6:8–11; 13:11–13; Lk 12:2–17, 51–53). However, careful study of the discourse shows a remarkable unity to it rather than a selective collation. Many of the alleged discrepancies are artificial. There is no conflict, for instance, between the ready harvest of 9:37–38 and the resistance in 10:16–22. "The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church" is a valid principle; and many great awakenings, including the Whitefield and Wesleyan revivals, have shown afresh that the harvest is most plentiful when the workers reap in the teeth of opposition.

It is true that vv.17–23 go beyond the immediate mission of the Twelve and in at least two ways envision a mission to the Gentiles (in contrast to vv.5b–6). But these are not new themes (cf. 5:13–14; 7:13–14; 8:11–12). Therefore Jesus is here not only treating the short-term itinerary of his disciples but also using it as a paradigm for the longer mission stretching in the years ahead. The following exposition focuses on the meaning of the text as it stands.

2. The commission (10:5b–16)

5b–6 Jesus forbade the Twelve from taking the road to the Gentiles—presumably toward Tyre and Sidon in the north or the Decapolis in the east—and from visiting Samaritan towns in the south. They were to remain in Galilee, ministering to the people of Israel. Jews despised Samaritans, not only because they preserved a separate cult (cf. Jn 4:20), but also because they were a mixed race, made up partly of the poorest Jews who had been left in the land at the time of the Exile and partly of Gentile peoples transported into the territory and with whom the remaining Jews had intermingled, thereby succumbing to some syncretism (cf. 2Ki 17:24–28). The Twelve were to restrict themselves to "the lost sheep of Israel."

Why this restriction? Pragmatic considerations play a role. That Jesus felt it necessary to mention the Samaritans at all presupposes John 4. The disciples, happy in the exercise of their ability to perform miracles, might have been tempted to evangelize the Samaritans when they remembered Jesus' success there. Judging by Lk 9:52–56, however, the Twelve were still tempermentally ill-equipped to minister to Samaritans. And even after Pentecost, despite an explicit command from the risen Lord (Ac 1:8), the church moved only hesitantly toward the Samaritans (Ac 8).

The most important consideration, however, was not pragmatic but theological. Jesus stood at the nexus in salvation history where as a Jew and the Son of David he came in fulfillment of his people's history as their King and Redeemer. Yet his personal claims would offend so many of his own people that he would be rejected by all but a faithful remnant. Why increase the opposition by devoting time to Gentile ministry? His mission, as frequently noted above, was worldwide in its ultimate aim; and all along he had warned that being a Jew was not enough. But his own people must not be excluded because premature offense could be taken at such broad perspectives. Therefore Jesus restricted his own ministry primarily (15:24), though not exclusively (8:1–13; 15:21–39), to Jews. He himself was sent as their Messiah. The messianic people of God developed out of the Jewish remnant and eventually expanded to include Gentiles. The restriction of vv.5–6, therefore, depends on a particular understanding of salvation history that ultimately goes back to Jesus (see also Paul's statement in Ro 1:16 and his missionary practice as reflected in Ac 13:5, 44–48; 14:1; et al.).

7–8 The content of the disciples' message was much like that in 3:2; 4:17. "Repent" is not mentioned but is presupposed. The long-awaited kingdom was now "near" (see comment on 4:17), attested by miracles directed at demonism and at diseases.

Jesus expected the Twelve to be supported by those to whom they were to minister (cf. vv.9–13; 1Co 9:14), but they needed to understand that what they had received—the good news of the kingdom, Jesus' authority, and this commission—they had received "freely." Therefore it would be mercenary to charge others. The danger of profiteering is still among us (Mic 3:11; 2Co 2:17; 1Pe 5:2).

9–10 The imperative "Do not take along" (GK 3227) more likely means "Do not procure" (as in Ac 1:18; 8:20; 22:28). Neither were they to provide their belt with money when they started out.

Matthew's account forbids "procuring" even sandals or a walking stick (see Mk 6:8). Presumably this account assumes that the disciples already have certain things (one cloak, sandals, a walking stick) and forbids them from "procuring" anything more. The disciples needed to learn the principle that "the worker is worth his keep" (cf. 1Co 9:14; 1Ti 5:17–18) and to shun luxury while learning to rely on God's providence through the hospitality of those who would take them in overnight, thus obviating the need for a second cloak.

11–15 To settle into the house of a "worthy" (GK 545) person implies that the disciples were not to shop around for the most comfortable quarters. In this place "worthy" refers to someone willing and able to receive an apostle of Jesus and the Gospel of the kingdom. As the disciples entered the house, they were to give it their "greeting," "Peace to this house" (Lk 10:5). But if the home turned out to be "unworthy," they were to let their greeting of peace return to them (v.13); i.e., they were not to stay. The Twelve were emissaries of Jesus. Those who received them received him (cf. v.40). Their greeting was of real value because of their relationship to him. Loss of their greeting was loss of their presence and therefore loss of Jesus.

What was true for the home applied equally to the town (v.14). A pious Jew, on leaving Gentile territory, might remove from his feet and clothes all dust of the pagan land now being left behind, thus dissociating himself from the pollution of those lands and the judgment in store for them. For the disciples to do this to Jewish homes and towns would be a symbolic way of saying that the emissaries of Messiah now viewed those places as pagan, polluted, and liable to severe judgment. Sodom and Gomorrah faced catastrophic destruction because of their sin (Ge 19) and became bywords of loathsome corruption (Isa 1:9; Mt 11:22–24; 2Pe 2:6; Jude 7). Although there is still worse to come for them on the Day of Judgment, there is even more awful judgment for those who reject the word and the messengers of the Messiah (cf. Heb 2:1–3).

Once again the Christological claim, though implicit, is unambiguous. As in 7:21–23, Jesus here insists that one's eternal destiny turns on relationship to him or even to his emissaries. At the same time, even in this early ministry, Jesus' apostles were to face the certainty of opposition. That opposition pointed to the greater suffering still to come (vv.17ff.) and also aligned the disciples of Jesus with the prophets of old (5:10–12) and with Jesus himself (10:24–25). Thus the disciples began to learn that the advance of the kingdom was divisive (vv.34–35) and would meet with violent opposition (see on 11:11–12).

16 Jesus pictured his disciples, defenseless in themselves, located in a dangerous environment. This is where he was sending them. The shepherd in this metaphor sends his sheep into the wolf pack (cf. 7:15; Jn 10:12; Ac 20:29). Therefore they must be "shrewd" (GK 5861; i.e., prudent) as serpents. But prudence can easily degenerate into cheap cunning unless it goes with simplicity. The disciples must therefore be innocent as well, toward both God and outsiders.

In this light the dove image becomes clear. Doves are retiring but not astute; they are easily ensnared by the fowler. So Jesus' disciples, in their mission as sheep among wolves, must be "shrewd," avoiding conflicts and attacks where possible; but they must also be "innocent," i.e., not so cautious, suspicious, and cunning that circumspection degenerates into fear or elusiveness. The balance is difficult, but not a little of Jesus' teaching combines such poles of meaning (see comments on 7:1–6).

3. Warnings of future sufferings (10:17–25)

a. The Spirit's help (10:17–20)

In this section Jesus envisages an extended time of witness in the midst of persecution—in short, a witnessing and suffering church.

17 Those who will hand the disciples over must be Jews, as the context is the synagogue; and so the persecution here envisaged is Jewish persecution of Christians (unlike v.18). The "local councils" (civic or synagogal) were charged with preserving the peace. That "flogging" is used for punishment, rather than the broader term "beating," implies that the opposition is not mob violence but the result of judicial action. Moreover, Jesus sees a time before the absolute separation of church and synagogue has taken place, for synagogue floggings were most easily inflicted on synagogue members.

18 As the witness would extend at some future time beyond Galilee and the Jewish race to Gentiles, so also would the opposition (cf. "governors" and "kings"). As in 8:4 and 24:14, the "witness" (GK 3457) is not against people but to them; it becomes either the means by which they accept the truth or, when they reject it, a condemnation. The disciples would be harassed and persecuted, not on account of who they are but on account of who Christ is (see comment on 5:10–12).

19–20 The verb "arrest" (GK 4140) is better translated as "hand over." The subject is ambiguous: people, opponents, or Jewish leaders could be "handing over" the disciples to the Gentile authorities. Later on this happened to Paul and other Christians, who at first witnessed to their faith with relative impunity under the Roman laws granting exemptions from emperor worship to Jews, but fell victim to increasing Roman wrath as the Jews progressively denied any link between themselves and Christians.

Confronting a high Roman official would be far more terrifying to believers than confronting a synagogue council. But if Jesus warned his disciples of dangers, he also promised them help: the Spirit would speak through them when the time came; so they should not fret about their response. This promise is neither a sop for lazy preachers nor equivalent to the promises given the Twelve in the farewell discourse (Jn 14–16) that the Spirit would recall to their memory all they had heard from Jesus (Jn 14:16, 26). It is a pledge to believers who have been brought before tribunals because of their witness.

Unlike Luke, Matthew does not often mention the Spirit. But from other passages in his gospel, it is clear that he associates the Spirit with the kingdom's dramatic coming (3:11; 12:28, 31) and the church's witness (28:18–20). That same Spirit, "the Spirit of your Father," would provide Jesus' followers with the help they needed under persecution when facing hostile officials.

b. Endurance (10:21–23)

21–22 It is not enough for Jesus' disciples to be opposed by Jewish and Gentile officialdom; they will be hounded and betrayed by their own family members (v.21; see further vv.34–39). Here Jesus alludes to Mic 7:6 (quoted in vv.35–36). "All men" (v.22) does not mean "all men without exception," for then there would be no converts, but "all men without distinction"—all people irrespective of race, color, or creed. That the good news of the kingdom of God and his righteousness should elicit such intense and widespread hostility is a sad commentary on "all men." The hatred erupts, Jesus says, either because one bears the name "Christian" (cf. 1Pe 4:14) or, more likely, "on account of me" (see comment on 5:10–12).

The one who exercises patient endurance will be saved; but he or she must stand firm "to the end." This phrase is ambiguous, meaning either "to the end of one's life" or "to the end of the age." This is not to say that only martyrs will be saved; but if the opposition one of Jesus' disciples faces calls for the sacrifice of life itself, commitment to him must be so strong that the sacrifice is willingly made. Otherwise there is no salvation. Thus from earliest times Christians have been crucified, burned, impaled, drowned, starved, racked—for no other reason than that they belonged to Christ.

23 This verse is among the most difficult in the NT. The coming of the Son of Man has been interpreted as Jesus catching up with the disciples after their mission, as the public identification of Jesus as the Messiah through his resurrection and Pentecost, and as the Second Coming of Jesus (often with the "church dispensation" being seen as not in Jesus' mind here).

The best interpretation, however, sees the "coming of the Son of Man" as his coming in judgment against the Jews, culminating in the sack of Jerusalem and the destruction of the temple. The coming of the Son of Man refers to the same event as the coming of the kingdom, even though the two expressions are conceptually complementary. Thus the coming of the Son of Man brings in the consummated kingdom (see comments on 24:30–31; 25:31). But the kingdom, as we have seen, comes in stages (see comments on 4:17; 12:28). In one sense Jesus was born a king (2:2); in another he has all authority as a result of his passion and resurrection (28:18); and in yet another his kingdom awaits the end. Mingled with this theme of the coming of the kingdom are Jesus' repeated warnings to the Jews concerning the disaster they are courting by failing to recognize and receive him. His warnings are unique because he himself is the judge and because the messianic reign is now dawning in both blessing and wrath (8:11–12; 21:31–32).

Against this background the coming of the Son of Man in v.23 marks that stage in the coming of the kingdom in which the judgment repeatedly foretold falls on the Jews. With it the temple cultus disappears, and the new wine necessarily takes to new wineskins (see comment on 9:16–17). The age of the kingdom comes into its own, precisely because so many of the structured foreshadowings of the OT, bound up with the cultus and nation, disappear (see comments on 5:17–48).

Above all this interpretation makes contextual sense of v.23. The connection is not with v.22 alone but with vv.17–22, which picture the suffering witness of the church in the post-Pentecost period during a time when many of Jesus' disciples are still bound up with the synagogue. During that period, Jesus says in v.23, his disciples must not use the opposition to justify quitting or bravado. Far from it. When they face persecution, they must take it as no more than a signal for strategic withdrawal to the next city where witness must continue, for the time is short. They will not have finished evangelizing the cities of Israel before the Son of Man comes in judgment on Israel.

c. Inspiration (10:24–25)

24–25 Here Jesus forbids the disciples from being surprised when they suffer persecution. If they follow him, they should expect no less. The statement reveals something of Jesus' perception of the nature of his own ministry and of the way the "gospel of the kingdom" will advance in the world.

The insult "Beelzebub" has an uncertain derivation. It is often seen as coming from a Hebrew term meaning "lord of the flies," a mocking takeoff on "Prince Baal." However, a better view is to see it as a straightforward translation of oikodespotes (GK 3867; "head of the house"). Beelzeboul (see NIV note) is recognized in the NT as the prince of the demons and identified with Satan (12:24–27; Mk 3:22–26; Lk 11:18–19). Thus the real head of the house, Jesus, who heads the household of God, is being willfully confused with the head of the house of demons. The charge is shockingly vile—the Messiah himself rejected as Satan! If so, why should his disciples expect less?

4. Prohibition of fear (10:26–31)

a. The emergence of truth (10:26–27)

26–27 Consideration of how disciples must expect to face persecution makes it necessary to say something about how to handle fear (vv.26–31) and about the high standards of discipleship such a perspective presupposes.

"Them" refers to the persecutors (v.23). The word "so" (i.e., "therefore") suggests that in view of a master who suffers ahead of his disciples (v.24), therefore do not fear, etc. The truth must emerge; the Gospel and its outworkings in the disciples may not now be visible to all, but nothing will remain hidden forever. And if the truth will emerge at the End, how wise to declare it fully and boldly now. Flat rooftops of Palestinian houses provided excellent places for speakers. In a sense the apostles were to have more of a public ministry than Jesus himself. He told them things in private, some of which they did not even understand till after the Resurrection. But they were to teach them fully and publicly.

b. The nonfinality of death (10:28)

28 The second reason for learning not to fear other people emerges from the fact that the worst they can do does not match the worst God can do. Though Satan may have great power (6:13; 24:22), only God can destroy soul and body in "hell" (see comment on Mk 9:42–49). If God be truly feared, none other need be. Unavoidable in this context is the thought that hell is a place of torment for the whole person: there will be a resurrection of the unjust as well as of the just.

c. Continuing providence (10:29–31)

29–31 The third reason for not being afraid is an a fortiori argument (see comment on 6:26–30): If God's providence is so all-embracing that not even a sparrow drops from the sky apart from the will of God, cannot that same God be trusted to extend his providence over Jesus' disciples? "Your Father" adds a piquant touch: this God of all providence is the disciples' Father. God's sovereignty is not limited only to life-and-death issues; even the hairs of our heads are counted. Jesus' third argument against fear is thus the opposite of what is commonly advanced. Some say that God cares about the big things but not about little details. But Jesus says that God's sovereignty over the tiniest detail should give us confidence that he also superintends the larger matters.

5. Characteristics of discipleship (10:32–39)

a. Acknowledging Jesus (10:32–33)

32–33 In Mk 8:38, Jesus addressed words similar to these to the crowds, though he used the phrase "Son of Man." Here, however, Jesus is addressing his disciples in an intimate gathering, and he does not hesitate to use "I" instead of "Son of Man." This was one of the things Jesus said clearly to his disciples in secret and which they would one day shout from the housetops (v.27).

Though addressed to the Twelve (vv.1–5), like much of vv.17–42, this saying looks beyond the apostles to disciples at large (cf. "whoever"). A necessary criterion for being a disciple of Jesus is to acknowledge him publicly (cf. Ro 1:16; 10:9). This will vary in boldness, fluency, wisdom, sensitivity, and frequency from believer to believer, but consistently to "disown" Christ results in being disowned by Christ. Jesus now speaks not of "your Father" (as in v.29) but of "my Father." In view is his special filial relationship with the Father, by which the final destiny of all humanity depends solely on his word (see comment on 7:21–23).

b. Recognizing the Gospel (10:34–36)

34–36 Since many Jews in Jesus' day thought the coming of Messiah would bring them political peace and material prosperity, so today many in the church think that Jesus' presence will bring them a kind of tranquility. But Jesus insists that his mission entails strife and division. Prince of Peace though he is (see comment on 5:9), the world will so violently reject him and his reign that men and women will divide over him (cf. Lk 12:49–53). Before the consummation of the kingdom, even the peace Jesus bequeaths his disciples will have its setting in the midst of a hostile world (Jn 14:27; 16:33; cf. Jas 4:4).

The repeated statement "I have come" shows Jesus' awareness of being the Messiah. Earlier he warned his disciples of the world's hatred of his followers, a hatred extending even to close relatives (vv.21–22); now he ties this perspective to an OT analogy (Mic 7:6). Micah described the sinfulness and rebellion in the days of King Ahaz; but insofar as Jesus' disciples by following him align themselves with the prophets (5:10–12), the situation in Micah's time pointed to the greater division at Messiah's coming. Even today the situation has not greatly eased. In the "liberal" West people who have become Christians have occasionally been disowned and disinherited by their families and have lost their jobs. And under totalitarian regimes of the right or the left there has been and still is untold suffering for Christ.

c. Preferring Jesus (10:37–39)

37–39 A man must love his wife, family, friends, and even his enemies (cf. 5:44), but he must love Jesus supremely. Moreover, Jesus demands death to self. "Taking one's cross" does not mean putting up with some awkward or tragic situation in one's life but painfully dying to self. In that sense every disciple of Jesus bears the same cross. After Jesus' death and resurrection, the emotional impact of these sayings must have been greatly heightened; but even before those events, the reference to crucifixion would vividly call to mind the shame and pain of such a sacrifice.

The appeal is not to gloom but to discipleship. There is a strong paradox here. Those who "lose" (GK 660) their "life," whether in actual martyrdom or disciplined self-denial, will "find" (GK 2351) it in the age to come. Those who "find" it now by living for themselves and refusing to submit to the demands of Christian discipleship will "lose" it in the age to come (cf. 16:25).

6. Encouragement: response to the disciples and to Jesus (10:40–42)

The foregoing teaching about what it means to be a disciple of Jesus has its darker side. This final section of the discourse is more encouraging—it reverts again to the ultimate tie between the treatment of Jesus and that of his followers (see comment on vv.24–25); it turns our eyes to the future (v.28) and shows us that God is indebted to no one.

40–42 As the discourse, viewed as a whole, moves from the Twelve to all believers, so also does its conclusion. Verse 40 probably refers primarily to the apostles, and vv.41–42 move through "prophets" and "righteous men" down to "these little ones" (GK 3625)—i.e., the least in the kingdom, seen as persecuted witnesses in the latter part of the discourse. The classes mentioned are not mutually exclusive, since "these little ones" surely includes the apostles, prophets, and righteous men; they are all "little ones" because they are all targets of the world's enmity. To give a cup of cold, freshly drawn water, the least that courtesy demands, to the least disciple just because he is a disciple will be rewarded. "Prophets" refers to those who speak for God and for those with whom Jesus' followers are aligned (cf. 5:10–12); "righteous men" is a generic category that refers to all those who are righteous in Christ Jesus (cf. 5:20), including the righteous people of earlier generations.

Verse 42 makes it clear that the sole reason for rewarding those who treat Jesus' disciples well is not because they are prophets or righteous people—they are in fact "little ones"—but because they are Jesus' disciples. The prophet's reward and the righteous man's reward are therefore not disparate but kingdom rewards (see comment on 5:12) that are the fruit of discipleship. To receive a prophet because he is a prophet (as in 1Ki 17:9–24; 2Ki 4:8–37) presupposes, in the context of v.40, that he is Christ's prophet; the same came be said about the "righteous man." Thus the person who receives a prophet receives Christ, his word, his ways, and his Gospel, and he or she expresses solidarity with the people of God (these "little ones") by receiving them for Jesus' sake (cf. 2Jn 10–11; 3Jn 8). Jesus promises that no such persons will lose their reward.

7. Transitional conclusion: expanding ministry (11:1)

1 For the significance of the formulas that end Jesus' discourses, see comment on 7:28–29. Attention returns to Jesus' ministry, for he did not send out the apostles in order to relieve himself of work but in order to expand the proclamation of the kingdom (9:35–10:4).

IV. Teaching and Preaching the Gospel of the Kingdom: Rising Opposition (11:2–13:53)

Thematically chs. 11–13 are held together by the rising tide of disappointment in and opposition to the kingdom of God that was resulting from Jesus' ministry. He was not turning out to be the kind of Messiah the people had expected. Even John the Baptist had doubts (11:2–19), and the Galilean cities that were sites of most of Jesus' miracles hardened themselves in unbelief (11:20–24). The nature of Jesus' person and ministry was "hidden" (11:25; GK 3221) from the wise, despite the most open and compassionate of invitations (11:28–30). Conflicts with Jewish leaders began to intensify (12:45), while people still misunderstood the most basic elements of Jesus' teaching and authority (12:46–50). But does this mean that he had been checkmated or that the kingdom had not come after all? Matthew 13 is the answer—the kingdom of God was continuing its advance even though it was often contested and ignored.

A. Narrative (11:2–12:50)

1. Jesus and John the Baptist (11:2–19)

a. John's question and Jesus' response (11:2–6)

2–3 Apparently John had been held in prison by Herod during Jesus' extensive Galilean ministry (see comment on 4:12), perhaps as long as a year. The one to whom he had pointed, the one who would come in blessing and judgment (3:11–12), had brought healing to many but, so it seemed, judgment to none—not even to those who had immorally and unlawfully confined the Baptist in a cruel prison.

John "heard . . . what Christ was doing" (v.2). Matthew normally avoids using the name "Christ" (lit. here, "the Christ" or "the Messiah"). Why does he use it here? The entire gospel is written from the perspective of faith. The very first verse affirms Jesus as the Messiah, and the prologue (chs. 1–2) seeks to prove it. So at this point Matthew somewhat unusually refers to Jesus as "the Christ" in order to remind his readers who it was that John the Baptist was doubting. Though John doubted, from Matthew's perspective the time for doubt had passed. The phrase "what Christ was doing" (lit., "the works of Christ") embraces a triple allusion, not only to Jesus' miracles (chs. 8–9), but also to his teaching (chs. 5–7) and growing mission (ch. 10).

As a result of these reports, John sent a pointed question by some of his disciples. John's question was whether Jesus was "the coming one" (v.3), exactly the same expression John himself used (see 3:11). John was asking Jesus whether he was the Messiah.

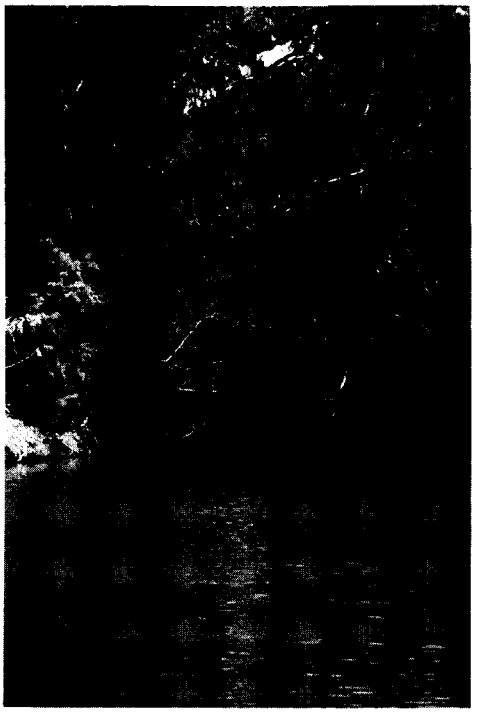
His question is understandable. Not only may he have become demoralized, like his namesake Elijah (cf. 1Ki 19), but he had preached in terms of imminent blessing and judgment. By contrast Jesus was preaching in veiled fulfillment terms and bringing much blessing but no real judgment; as a result the Baptist was having second thoughts.

4–6 Jesus' answer briefly summarized his own miracles and preaching, using the language of Isa 35:5–6; 61:1 (with possible further allusions to 26:19; 29:18–19). At one level the answer was straightforward: Isa 61:1 is an explicit messianic passage, and Isa 35:5–6, though it has no messianic figure, describes the return of God's people to Zion with accompanying blessings (e.g., restoration of sight). Jesus definitely claimed that his messianic visions were being fulfilled in the miracles he was performing, and that his preaching the Good News to the poor (see comment on 5:3) was fulfilling the messianic promises of Isa 61:1–2 (cf. Lk 4:17–21). The powers of darkness were being undermined; the kingdom was advancing (cf. v.12).

But there is a second, more subtle level to Jesus' response. All four Isaiah passages refer to judgment in their immediate context: e.g., "your God will come ... with vengeance; with divine retribution" (35:4); "the day of vengeance of our God" (Isa 61:2). Thus Jesus was allusively responding to the Baptist's question: the blessings promised for the end time have broken out and prove it is here, even though the judgments are delayed.

Verse 6 is then a gentle warning, applicable both to John and his disciples: "Blessed" (see comment on 5:3) is the one who does not find in Jesus and his ministry an obstacle to belief and therefore reject him. The miracles themselves were not irrefutable proof of who Jesus was (see comments on Mk 8:11–12); faith was still required to read the evidence against the background of Scripture and to hear in Jesus' claim the ring of truth.

b. Jesus' testimony to John (11:7–19)



(1). John in redemptive history (11:7–15)

John had often borne witness to Jesus; now Jesus bears witness to John. But, as we will see, the effect is to point back to himself as the sole figure who brings in the kingdom. Historically it was almost inevitable for Jesus to define the position of John the Baptist with respect to himself.

7–8 Jesus used this opportunity to speak to the crowd about John and to defend him. The rhetorical questions are a gently ironic way of eliminating obviously false answers in order to give the truth in vv.10–11. A "reed" (cane grass, found in abundance along the Jordan) swaying in the wind suggests a fickle person, tossed about in his judgment by the winds of public opinion or private misfortune. Certainly the people did not go out to witness such an ordinary spectacle. Nor did they go out into the desert to find a rich man dressed "in fine clothes" (see comment on 3:4–6). "Those who are ... in kings' palaces" is a sly cut at the man who was keeping John in prison.

Jesus was speaking in this way to disarm suspicion among the people that John's question (v.3) might betray signs of fickleness (v.7) or undisciplined weakness (v.8) in him. Not so, responds Jesus; the man the people went out to see was neither unstable nor faithless. His question arose not from personal weakness or failure but from misunderstanding about the nature of the Messiah, owing to John's place in salvation history (see comment on v.11).

9–11 What the people had flocked to the desert to see was a "prophet" (v.9), since it was commonly agreed that a true prophet had not appeared for centuries. Small wonder there was such excitement. Jesus confirms the crowd's judgment but goes beyond it—John was not only a prophet but more than a prophet. In what respect? Not only was he, like other OT prophets, a direct spokesman for God to call the nation to repentance, but he himself was also the subject of prophecy—the one who, according to Scripture, would announce the Day of the Lord (v.10).

This is the traditional spot along the Jordan River where tradition says that John the Baptist preached and baptized.

The primary passage being cited is Mal 3:1 (see comment on Mk 1:2–3). The messenger of Mal 3:1 ("Elijah" in Mal 4:5–6) prepares the way for the great and dreadful Day of the Lord. John is that forerunner prophesied in the OT, and Jesus himself is that one who is now bringing in the Day of the Lord. Verse 10 ties v.9 and v.11 together. By citing Malachi, Jesus has shown in what way John the Baptist is greater than a prophet: he is greater in that he alone of all the prophets was the forerunner who prepared the way for the Lord Jesus and personally pointed him out (see Jn 1:19, 26–27; 3:25–30). This is what makes John the greatest born of women (v.11; i.e., the greatest human being).

Thus far the argument flows coherently. But who is the "least in the kingdom of heaven," and how is he greater than John the Baptist? For one thing, Jesus is implying that with John the Baptist, the kingdom had not yet come. Parallels between John's and Jesus' preaching are readily explained (see comment on 4:17), and v.12 can best be taken that way as well (see below).

In what way, then, is the least in the kingdom greater than John the Baptist? The answer must not be in terms of mere privilege (i.e., the least are greater because they see the kingdom actually inaugurated) but in terms of the greatness established for John. He was the greatest of the prophets because he pointed most unambiguously to Jesus. Nevertheless even the least in the kingdom is even greater because, living after the crucial revelatory and eschatological events have occurred, he or she points to Jesus still more unambiguously than John the Baptist.

This interpretation accomplishes three things. (1) It continues a defense of John by showing that his question owes its origin to his still-veiled place in the redemptive history now unfolding. (2) By contrast it continues the theme of discipleship whose essential function is to acknowledge Jesus before others (10:32–33) and establishes that function as the disciples' essential greatness. Even the least in the kingdom points to Jesus Christ more clearly than all his predecessors, including John. For they either live through the tumultuous events of the ministry, Passion, and beyond, after which things are much clearer; or they enter the kingdom after these events, with the same clear understanding. Thus the ground is being laid for the Great Commission: clear witness to Christ before others is not only a requirement of the kingdom (10:32–33) and a command of the resurrected Lord (28:18–20) but the true greatness of the disciple (11:11). (3) At the same time, by explaining John's greatness and his place in salvation history, this verse points back to the preeminence of Jesus himself.

12 This enigmatic saying has called forth a host of interpretations. The following interpretation does justice both to the context and to the language. "From the days of John the Baptist until now" means "from the time of the activity of John the Baptist." This expression does not say that John inaugurates the kingdom but only that during his time of ministry it was inaugurated and attacked. The expression assumes that the crucial period of his ministry during which the kingdom was inaugurated lies in the past. That kingdom has now begun, in however preliminary a way, with Jesus' preaching and powerful works during "the days of John the Baptist," and it is continuing. Thus there is no reason why the Prophets and the Law should not prophesy "until John" in an inclusive sense (v.13).

The phrase "the kingdom of heaven has been forcefully advancing" suggests that the kingdom has come with holy power and magnificent energy that have been pushing back the frontiers of darkness. This is especially manifest in Jesus' miracles and ties in with Jesus' response to the Baptist (v.5). Some kind of compulsion even of people is presupposed elsewhere (Lk 14:23).

Regarding "and forceful men lay hold of it," Jesus seems to be suggesting that as the kingdom has been forcefully advancing, violent or rapacious people have been trying to plunder it. In other words, Jesus sets up the picture of a violent struggle being waged even as Jesus speaks. The kingdom inaugurated by Jesus has not swept all opposition away, as John expected (see comment on vv.2–4).

To summarize, simultaneous with the kingdom's advance have been the attacks of violent people on it That is the very point John could not grasp. Now Jesus expressly affirms it. The statement is general because it does not refer to just one kind of opposition. It includes Herod's imprisonment of John, the attacks by Jewish leaders now intensifying (9:34; 12:22–24), and the materialism that craved a political Messiah and the prosperity he would bring but not his righteousness (11:20–24). Already Jesus warned his disciples of persecution and suffering (10:16–42); the opposition was rising and would get worse. Meanwhile, not the aggressive zealots will find rest for their souls, but the weary and burdened children to whom the Father revealed truth (vv.25–30).

13 In view of the preceding, "until John" means up to and including John. John the Baptist belongs to the last stage of the divine economy before the inauguration of the kingdom. The entire OT has a prophetic function, a function it maintained up until, and including, John the Baptist.

In the twin settings of Matthew's "fulfillment" theme (see comments on 2:15; 5:17–20) and the role of John the Baptist (11:10), it is understood that now, after John the Baptist, that which the Prophets and Law prophesied has come to pass—the kingdom has dawned and Messiah has come. This establishes the primary function of the OT in Matthew's gospel: it points to Jesus and the kingdom—this confirms our interpretation of 5:17–20. And from the time of the inauguration of the kingdom, the kingdom itself has been forcefully advancing.

14–15 The argument returns to vv.9–10, stating explicitly what Jesus said there: John the Baptist was the prophesied "Elijah" (v.14). This locates his place and function in the history of redemption and affirms again that what Jesus was doing was bringing in the Day of the Lord. The clause "if you are willing to accept it" does not cast doubt on the truth of the identification; but, like v.15, it acknowledges how difficult it was to grasp it, especially before the Cross and the Resurrection. The formula in v.15 is both a metaphorical description of and a challenge to spiritual sensitivity to the claims of the Gospel.

(2). The unsatisfied generation (11:16–19)

16–17 "Comparison" stands at the heart of Jesus' parables (see introductory comment on Mk 4). Here Jesus uses an analogy to show his view of his generation in connection with their general rejection of himself as Messiah (see comment on Lk 7:29–35). This identification of "this generation" (GK 1155) is confirmed by the next pericope (vv.20–24).

18–19 "For" shows that Jesus now gives the reason why the behavior of "this generation" suggests the above comparison. John the Baptist lived ascetically, neither indulging in dinner parties (cf. 3:4) nor drinking alcohol (cf. Lk 1:15). Although he drew crowds (vv.7–8), yet the people as a whole rejected him, even charging him with demon possession. Jesus came eating and drinking (9:10–11) and was charged with gluttony, drunkenness, and bad associations. Like disgruntled children, "this generation" found it easier to whine their criticisms and voice their discontent than to "play the game" (see comment on Lk 7:29–35).

But the criticism runs at a still deeper level. If they had understood John, they would have understood Jesus, and vice versa; the thought has links with vv.7–15.

The closing proverb has provoked much debate because Luke has "all her children" (Lk 7:35) and Matthew "her actions." The proverb should be read in the light of the preceding parable: God's wisdom has been vindicated by the lifestyles of both John and Jesus, referred to in the previous verses. Wisdom in the OT is much concerned with right living. John and Jesus have both been criticized and rejected for the way they live. But wisdom, preeminently concerned about right living, has been vindicated by her actions: their respective lifestyles are both acknowledged.

2. The condemned and the accepted (11:20–30)

a. The condemned: woes on unrepentant cities (11:20–24)

The denunciation in the last section now becomes sharper. Structurally this section has e two series of warnings, each with the same sequence of warning, explanation, and comparison.

20 The verb "denounce" (GK 3943) is a strong verb, conveying indignation along with either insults (as in 5:11) or justifiable reproach. Jesus did not denounce these cities for vicious opposition but because, despite the fact that most of his miracles took place there—miracles that attested his messianic mission (vv.5–6)—they had not repented (see comments on 3:2; 4:17). The many miracles again remind us of the extent of Jesus' ministry and of the depth of responsibility imposed on those with more light.

21–22 The word translated "woe" (GK 4026) can mean doom or pity ("alas"); both are mingled here. Warnings have been given before; now woes are pronounced. Korazin may probably be identified with Kirbet Keraze, about two miles northwest of Capernaum. The Bethsaida in question was probably the home of Andrew, Peter, and Philip (Jn 1:44; 12:21) on the west side of Galilee. Tyre and Sidon were large Phoenician cities on the Mediterranean, not far away, and often denounced by OT prophets for their Baal worship (Isa 23; Eze 26–28; et al.). "Sackcloth" is a rough fabric made from the short hairs of camels and usually worn next to the skin to express grief or sorrow (2Sa 3:31; 1Ki 21:27; et al.).

Three theological propositions are presupposed by Jesus' insistence that on the Day of Judgment, things will go worse for the cities that have received so muchmore light than for the pagan cities. (1) The Judge has contingent knowledge; he knows what Tyre and Sidon would have done under such-and-such circumstances. (2) God does not owe revelation to anyone. (3) Punishment on the Day of Judgment takes into account opportunity. There are degrees of felicity in paradise and degrees of torment in hell (12:41; 23:13; cf. Lk 12:47–48), a point Paul well understood (Ro 1:20–2:16).

23–24 For Capernaum, see comment on 4:13. This city was not only Jesus' base (4:13), but he performed many specific miracles there (8:5–17; 9:2–8, 18–33). The favored city of Capernaum, like self-exalting Babylon (cf. Isa 14:15), will be brought down "to the depths" (i.e., Hades; GK 87; see comment on Mk 9:42–49). Hades must here be given rather sinister overtones. Capernaum's fate will be worse even than that of Sodom (see Ge 19). In the words "I tell you" (v.22), "you" is plural, probably implying the crowd (v.7), since the singular "you" is used for the city (vv.23–24).

b. The accepted (11:25–30)

If vv.20–24 describe those who are condemned, vv.25–30 describe those who are accepted.

25 "At that time" loosely joins this section with the immediate context. Matthew assumes that there has been some success in the mission of Jesus (and the disciples), but he draws a sharp antithesis between the recipients of such revelation and the "wise and learned" who, like the inhabitants of the cities just denounced, understand nothing.

Here Jesus addresses God as "Father" and "Lord of heaven and earth." These are particularly appropriate titles—the former indicating Jesus' sense of sonship (see comment on 6:9) and preparing for v.27, the latter recognizing God's sovereignty over the universe and preparing for vv.25–26. God is sovereign, free to conceal or reveal as he wills.

Many restrict the "wise and learned" to the Pharisees and teachers of the law, but the context implies something broader. Jesus has just finished pronouncing woes on "this generation" (v.16) and denouncing entire cities (vv.20–24). These are the ones from whom the real significance of Jesus' ministry is concealed. The contrast is between those who are self-sufficient and deem themselves wise and those who are dependent and love to be taught.

For revealing the riches of the good news of the kingdom to the one group and hiding it from the other, Jesus utters praise to his Father. We must not think of God's concealing and revealing as symmetrical activities arbitrarily exercised toward neutral human beings who are both innocent and helpless in the face of the divine decree. God is dealing with a race of sinners (cf. 1:21; 7:11) to whom he owes nothing. Thus to conceal "these things" is not an act of injustice but of judgment. The astonishing thing is that those who pride themselves in understanding divine things are judged, whereas those who understand nothing are taught. The predestination pattern is the counterpoint of grace.

26 Far from finding fault with his Father's revealing and concealing, Jesus delighted in it. Whatever pleases his Father pleases him. Jesus could simultaneously denounce the cities that did not repent and praise the God who does not reveal; for God's sovereignty in election is not mitigated by human stubbornness and sin, while human responsibility is in no way diminished by God's "good pleasure" that sovereignly reveals and conceals.

27 Like the term "Son of Man" (see comment on Mk 8:31), so with "Son of God," it appears that Jesus used this designation not firmly defined and open to several interpretations as part of his gradual self-disclosure—a revelation that could be fully grasped only after the Cross and Resurrection. Thus for Matthew there is no doubt of what Jesus is saying in v.27 because Matthew's "Son" or "Son of God" categories must be seen against the backdrop, not only of the prologue, but also of 3:17.

Verse 27 is a Christological claim of prime importance, fitting easily into the context. After vv.25–26, Jesus adds that he is the exclusive agent of the Father's revelation. The reciprocal knowledge of Son and Father, where the Father is God, presupposes a special sonship indeed. And this unique mutual knowledge guarantees that the revelation the Son gives is true. No mere mortal could honestly make the claim Jesus makes here. There is a self-enclosed world of Father and Son that is opened to others only by the revelation provided by the Son. The Son reveals the Father to those whom he, from time to time, wills (cf. Jn 3:35; 8:19; 10:15; 14:9). This text places enormous emphasis on Jesus' person and authority. What is made clear in this passage is that sonship and messiahship are not quite the same.

28 In the wake of v.27, the "me" of this verse is very important. Jesus invites to come to him, not "the wise and the learned" (v.25), but those who have become weary through heavy struggling and those who are overloaded like beasts of burden; and he (not the Father) will give them rest. There is an echo of Jer 31:25, where the Lord refreshes his people through the new covenant. It is impossible not to be reminded of the "heavy loads" the Pharisees put on people's shoulders (23:4). The "rest" (GK 399) is eschatological (cf. Rev 6:11; 14:13) but also a present reality—for the present world and the world to come.

29–30 The "yoke" (GK 2433), put on animals for pulling heavy loads, is a metaphor for the discipline of discipleship. If Jesus is not offering the yoke of the law, neither is he offering freedom from all constraints. The "yoke" is Jesus' yoke; discipleship must be to him. In view of v.27, the expression "learn from me" must mean "learn from the revelation that I alone impart."

The marvelous feature of this invitation is that out of his overwhelming authority (v.27) Jesus encourages the burdened to come to him because he is "gentle [GK 4558] and humble [GK 5424] in heart." Matthew stresses Jesus' gentleness (18:1–10; 19:13–15). Apparently the theme is connected with the messianic servant language (Isa 42:2–3; 53:1–2) that recurs in 12:15–21. Authoritative teacher that he is, Jesus approaches us with a true servant's gentleness.

The words "and you will find rest for your souls" (cf. v.28) are directly quoted from Jer 6:16. The entire verse is steeped in OT language; most likely this is a fulfillment passage, where Jesus is saying that "the ancient paths" and "the good way" of Jer 6:16 lie in taking on his yoke, because he is the one to whom the OT Scriptures point. The "rest" he promises is not only for the world to come but for this one as well. There is also irony here: Jesus offers real rest, while his opponents cannot do more than impose misguided standards of Sabbath rest (12:1ff.).

3. Sabbath conflicts (12:1–14)

a. Picking heads of grain (12:1–8)

Opposition to Jesus had already surfaced (9:3, 11, 14, 34; 10:25; 11:19). Now it erupts in a concrete issue that generates enough hatred to lead Jesus' enemies to contemplate murder (v.14).

1 The Jewish rules of conduct about the Sabbath were extremely detailed, though for many Jews of Jesus' day, the Sabbath was a joyful festival, a sign of the covenant, a reminder of divine creation in six days, and, provided the rules were obeyed, a means of gaining merit for Israel.

The point at issue in this section is burdensome Pharisaic regulations (cf. contrast to 11:28–30). The scene depicted here seems to be the disciples going on a Sabbath afternoon stroll within the permitted legal distance (a Sabbath day's journey); otherwise the Pharisees would not have been there. As they were doing so, they picked some grain along the path (see Dt 23:25).

2 The Pharisees' charge that the disciples were breaking the law was based, not on their picking grain in someone else's field, but on the fact that picking grain was one of thirty-nine kinds of work forbidden on the Sabbath under prevailing Jewish regulations. Though exceptions to these were granted in the case of temple service and where life was at stake, neither exception applied here.

3–4 The use of counterquestion and appeal to Scripture was common in rabbinic debates (cf. v.5; 19:4; 21:16, 42; 22:31). The account to which Jesus refers is from 1Sa 21:1–6. David entered the tabernacle at Nob, and he and his companions ate what should only have been eaten by the priests and did so after lying to the priest about their mission.

The argument takes a common rabbinical form, namely, the juxtaposition of two apparently contradictory statements from Scripture in order to draw a conclusion regarding regulations for conduct. On the one hand, David ate; on the other, it was unlawful for him to do so. Jesus' point is not simply that rules admit of exceptions but that the Scriptures themselves do not condemn David for his action; therefore the rigidity of the Pharisees' interpretation of the law is not in accord with Scripture itself, for they could not explain the incident of David.

How, then, does this apply to Jesus and his disciples? They were not desperate and famished, unlike David and his men. It is not even clear how they were breaking any OT law, where commandments about the Sabbath were aimed primarily at regular work. It seems that Jesus used the David incident not merely to question the Pharisees' view of the Sabbath; rather, he was questioning their approach to the law itself.

There is more. In the incident to which Jesus referred, regulations (even of the written law) were set aside for David "and his companions." Is there not therefore a case for setting aside regulations for Jesus and those with him? This analogy holds good only if Jesus is at least as special as David, and it is to this conclusion that the argument builds in the following verses.

5–6 Jesus' second appeal is from Nu 28:9–10. Formally speaking the Levitical priests "desecrate" the Sabbath every week, since the right worship of God in the temple required them to do some work (changing the consecrated bread [Lev 24:8] and offering the doubled burnt offering [Nu 28:9–10]). In reality, of course, the priests were guiltless; the law that established the Sabbath also established the right of the priests to "desecrate" it.

But how does this apply to Jesus and his disciples? The form of the argument is valid only if the "one greater than the temple" is truly greater. So the question is: Who (or what) is greater than the temple? The most likely answer is that the "something greater" is either Jesus himself (the more likely interpretation; cf. 26:61; Jn 2:20–21) or the kingdom. In fact, the two merge. If the kingdom, it is the kingdom Jesus is inaugurating; if Jesus, it is not only Jesus as a man but as Messiah, Son of David (vv.3–4), Son of Man (v.8), the one who ushers in the Messianic Age.

Jesus' argument, then, provides an instance from the law itself in which the Sabbath restrictions were superseded by the priests because their cultic responsibilities took precedence: the temple, as it were, was greater than the Sabbath. But now, Jesus claims, "something [NIV note] greater than the temple is here." And that, too, takes precedence over the Sabbath. This solution is entirely consistent with what we have seen as Jesus' attitude to the law in this gospel. The law points to him and finds its fulfillment in him (see comments on 5:17–48). Not only, then, have the Pharisees mishandled the law by their traditions (vv.3–4), but they have failed to perceive who Jesus is. The authority of the temple laws shielded the priests from guilt; the authority of Jesus shields his disciples from guilt.

7–8 Again (cf. v.3) Jesus rebuked the Pharisees for their failure to understand the Scriptures (cf. Jn 5:39), particularly Hos 6:6 (cf. 9:13). Jesus claims, in effect, that the Pharisees had not really grasped the significance of the law. The accusers stand accused; the disciples are explicitly declared "innocent," because the Son of Man is Lord of the Sabbath. This claim is implicitly messianic; it places the Son of Man in a position to handle the Sabbath law any way he wills, or to supersede it in the same way that the temple requirements superseded the normal Sabbath restrictions (see comment on vv. 5–6).

b. Healing a man with a shriveled hand (12:9–14)

In this incident, it is Jesus' activity that is in question, not that of his disciples; and his argument holds deeper implications. The first-century Jews discussed at length what was permitted in caring for the sick on the Sabbath. Jesus' attitude was more fundamental: it is lawful to do good on the Sabbath.

9–10 The action moves from the field to the synagogue. Matthew makes plain the malice in the Pharisees. The form of the their question in v.10 is general. The customary Jewish ruling was that healing was permitted on the Sabbath when life was in danger, which of course did not apply here.

11–13 For the third time in this gospel, Jesus' argument depends on a contrast between animals and people (cf. 6:26; 10:31) and presupposes the greater value of human beings based on their special creation: humans alone are made in the image of God (Ge 1–2). Jesus assumes that the Pharisees would not hesitate to lift an animal out of a pit on the Sabbath.

Jesus responds by arguing in a manner similar to vv.5–6. The question is simply one of doing good. Was the Sabbath a day for evil activity—like the intentions of the Pharisees in questioning him—or for the beneficent action, like the healing about to be done? His subsequent healing, like that in 9:1–8, comes after the shocking word and therefore serves to confirm that word. It also confirms Jesus' claim to lordship over the Sabbath, as his healing in 9:1–8 confirmed his authority to forgive sins.

14 The Pharisees now want to kill Jesus—not because of his ruling on the Sabbath, but because of the real issue involved here, Jesus' claim as Lord of the Sabbath. The Sabbath conflicts are merely the occasion of the plotting. Note that Sabbath disputes were not mentioned at Jesus' trials; in themselves they were never as much an issue as Jesus' claim to be Sabbath's Lord.

4. Jesus the prophesied Servant (12:15–21)

In this section, Matthew interprets Jesus' healing ministry in terms of the Lord's Suffering Servant (see also comment on 8:17). This section simultaneously contrasts the hatred of the Pharisees (v.14) with Jesus' tranquility (v.19) and gentleness (v.20) and prepares the way for themes in the rest of the chapter.

15–17 Jesus often withdrew when opposition became intense (cf. 4:12; 14:13; 15:21; 16:5); at least that was his custom until the appointed hour arrived (26:45). Thus his extensive ministry continued. Warnings to those healed to keep silent increased for the same reasons as before and with as little effect (cf. 8:4; 9:30). But Jesus' conduct under these pressures was nothing less than the fulfillment of the Scriptures. Though the Pharisees might plot to kill him (v.14), he would not quarrel or cry out (v.19). Matthew wants to separate himself from exclusively royal and militaristic interpretations of Messiah's role. He knows that the ministry of Jesus Messiah must also be understood as the fulfillment of the prophecies of the Suffering Servant.

18–21 This quotation from Isa 42:1–4 is the longest one in Matthew. Jesus is God's "chosen" (GK 1721) or elect Servant, the one on whom God has poured out his Spirit with a specific mission in view. The words "the one I love" carry overtones of Mt 3:17; 17:5, because love and election are closely connected. God's "delight" (GK 2305) in his servant and the mention of the Spirit God puts on him remind us of both Jesus' baptism and his transfiguration (3:16–17; 17:5).

This "servant" (GK 4090) will proclaim "justice" (GK 3213) to the nations—i.e., righteousness broadly conceived as the self-revelation of God's character for the good of the nations (cf. Isa 51:4), yet at the same time calling them to account. Concern for the Gentiles thus emerges again (cf. 1:1, 2:1–12; 3:9; 4:15–16; et al.) in anticipation of the Great Commission (28:18–20).

The servant "will not quarrel or cry out" or raise his voice in the streets (v.19). The picture is not one of utter silence (else how could he "proclaim" justice) but of gentleness and humility (11:29), and of quiet withdrawal (see comment on vv.15–17).

The double metaphor in the first two lines of v.20 breathes compassion: the servant does not advance his ministry with such callousness to the weak that he breaks the bruised reed or snuffs out the smoldering wick. This suggests, in the light of the last line of this verse, that he brings eschatological salvation to the "harassed and helpless" (9:36), the "weary and burdened" (11:28). What is pictured is a ministry so gentle and compassionate that the weak are not trampled on and crushed till the full righteousness of God triumphs. Small wonder that the Gentiles ("nations"; GK 1620) would put their hope in his name (cf. Isa 11:10; Ro 15:12).

5. Confrontation with the Pharisees (12:22–45)

a. The setting and accusation (12:22–24)

22 The demon possession was the likely cause of this man's blindness and muteness (see comment on 9:32). The healing itself is told with admirable brevity, for it is not so much the miracle itself that is captures the attention of Matthew but the confrontation with the Pharisees that follows.

23–24 The astonishment of the crowd prompted the question (v.23). Its form in Greek suggests the crowds were none too sure: "This couldn't be the Son of David [i.e., the Messiah], could it?" The Messiah was expected to perform miracles (cf. v.38), so the exorcism-healing stood in Jesus' favor. But perhaps his reticence, his nonregal sayings, and his servant ministry engendered doubt. On "Beelzebub" (v.24), see comment on 10:25.

b. Jesus' reply (12:25–37)

25–26 Knowing the thoughts of the Pharisees (v.26), Jesus points out that any kingdom, city, or household that develops internal strife will destroy itself; the same is true for Satan's "kingdom."

27 Jesus' argument here is ad hominem: he is saying "your sons" (either the Jews in general or people instructed by the Pharisees) cast out demons on occasion and their limited success must be due not to Beelzebub but to God's power. Jesus is even more successful and does even greater damage to Satan's kingdom. Surely, Jesus implies, this is also evidence of God's great power.

28 Jesus knows that his exorcisms, performed by the Spirit of God, prove that the kingdom age has already dawned. Of course, this also implies that Jesus is King Messiah without explicitly affirming it. This is one of only four places in Matthew where "kingdom of God" occurs instead of "kingdom of heaven" (see comment on 3:2).

29 Jesus now asks the Pharisees to look at this through a parable. Jewish expectation looked forward to the binding of Satan in the Messianic Age; under this metaphor Jesus is the one who ties up the strong man (Satan) and carries off his "possessions." The argument has thus advanced: if Jesus' exorcisms cannot be attributed to Satan (vv.25–26), then they reflect authority greater than that of Satan. By this greater power Jesus is binding "the strong man" and plundering his "house." So the kingdom of heaven is forcefully advancing (see comment on 11:12).

30 In our relationship to Jesus there can be no neutrality. Perhaps neutrality is possible and even wise regarding some issues and persons, but in life's great struggle (cf. vv.25–29), neutrality is impossible. The claims of the kingdom and the demands of Jesus are so exclusivistic that to be indifferent or apathetic to him is to be on the side of those who do not confess that he is the Messiah who brings in the kingdom of God (cf. 11:16–24). Jesus' claim implies a high Christology; he is the one who will harvest in the last days, a function that the OT regularly assigns to God.

31–32 "And so" ties the statements about blasphemy against the Spirit (v.31) to the preceding verse. But the transition cannot easily be readily grasped till vv.31–32 are understood. "Blasphemy" (GK 1060) is extreme slander, equivalent to "speaking against" (cf. v.32). Blasphemy against God was viewed by Jews with utmost gravity (26:65); but here Jesus makes a sharp distinction between blasphemy against the Son of Man, which is forgivable, and blasphemy against the Spirit, which is not.

His statement is remarkable because one of the glories of the biblical faith is the great emphasis Scripture lays on the graciousness and wideness of God's forgiveness (e.g., Ps 130:3–4; Isa 1:18; Mic 7:19; 1Jn 1:7). Among the many interpretations of this difficult saying, the best treats it in its setting during Jesus' life. The Pharisees have been attributing to Satan the work of the Spirit and have been doing so, as Jesus makes plain, in such a way as to reveal that they speak, not out of ignorance or unbelief, but out of a conscious disputing of what should never be disputed.

The distinction between blasphemy against the Son of Man and blasphemy against the Spirit is that the first sin is rejection of the truth of the Gospel (for which there may be repentance and forgiveness), whereas the second sin is rejection of the same truth in full awareness that that is exactly what one is doing—willfully, thoughtfully, and self-consciously rejecting the work of the Spirit even though there can be no other explanation of Jesus' exorcisms than that. For such a sin there is no forgiveness, "either in this age or the age to come" (cf. 13:22; 25:46)—a dramatic way of saying "never" (as in Mk 3:29). This interpretation can also apply to Heb 6:4–6; 10:26–31; and possibly 1Jn 5:16.

If this interpretation is correct, the distinction between Son of Man and Spirit is relatively incidental. After all, blasphemy against the Spirit is also a rejection of Jesus' own claims. Jesus charges that those who perceive that his ministry is empowered by the Spirit and then, for whatever reason—whether from spite, jealousy, or arrogance—ascribe it to Satan, have put themselves beyond the pale.

The significance of the transitional words "And so" now becomes plain. Neutrality to Jesus is actually opposition to him (v.30); and therefore Jesus gives this warning regarding those who blaspheme against the Spirit, since the self-professedly neutral person may not recognize the inherent danger of his position.

33–35 Jesus tells his hearers to make a tree good or bad, knowing that its fruit will be correspondingly good or bad, because a tree is recognized by its fruit. Then Jesus drives the point home. "You brood of vipers" was most likely addressed to the Pharisees in the crowd. Verse 35 makes a tight connection with v.33: what a person truly is determines what that person says and does. Out of the "heart" (GK 2840), the center of human personality, the "mouth speaks," revealing what is in the heart. How, then, can those who are evil say anything good? What is needed is a change of heart.

36–37 A person will be held accountable on the Day of Judgment for every seemingly insignificant word spoken insofar as it reveals what is in the heart. Every spoken word reflects the heart's overflow and is known to God. Therefore words are of critical importance (cf. Eph 5:3–4, 12; Col 3:17; Jas 1:19; 3:1–12).

c. Continued confrontation (12:38–42)

38 The Jewish leaders addressed Jesus respectfully ("Teacher") and asked for a "sign," not just for another miracle. A "sign" (GK 4956) was usually some miraculous token to be fulfilled quickly or at once, in order to confirm a prophecy. The Jews were not asking for just another miracle, since they had already persuaded themselves that at least some of those Jesus had performed were of demonic agency (12:24); they were asking for a "sign" performed on command to remove what seemed to them to be the ambiguity of Jesus' miracles.

39–40 The Pharisees and teachers of the law, in Jesus' view, represented this "wicked and adulterous generation" (v.39; cf. 11:16–24). "Adultery" was frequently used by OT prophets to describe the spiritual prostitution and wanton apostasy of Israel (Isa 50:1; Jer 3:8; Eze 16:15, 32, 35–42; et al.). Jesus applies this metaphor to his contemporaries. Although Israel had abandoned idolatry after the exile, Jesus insists that she was still adulterous in heart. In the past God had graciously granted "signs" to strengthen the faith of the timid (e.g., Abraham [Ge 15]; Gideon [Jdg 6:17–24]). Here, however, Jesus says that signs are denied, because they are never to be performed on demand or as a sop to unbelief (cf. 1Co 1:22). The sign Jesus does offer, the "sign of Jonah," is not a sign at all as Jesus' opponents understood the word. It becomes a sign only for those with eyes to see.

But what is "the sign of Jonah"? "Of Jonah" must be construed as an explanatory phrase. It is a sign that Jonah himself was, not the sign given him or presented by him. This interpretation accepts the view that the Ninevites learned what had happened to Jonah and how he got to their city. Jonah himself thus served as a "sign" to them, for he appeared to them as one who had been delivered from certain death. As Jonah was three days and three nights in the belly of the fish, so the Son of Man will be buried three days and three nights in the earth. That is to say, Jesus' preaching will be attested by a deliverance like Jonah's, only greater; therefore, there will be greater condemnation for those who reject the significance of Jesus' deliverance. Note that this explanation rightly assumes that Jesus knew long in advance about his death, burial, and resurrection, and saw his life moving toward that climax (see 16:21).

Jonah spent "three days and three nights" in the fish (Jnh 1:17). But if the normal sequence of Passion Week is correct (see comments on Mk 14:1–2, 12), Jesus was in the tomb only about thirty-six hours. Since they included parts of three days, by Jewish reckoning Jesus was buried "three days" or, to put it another way, he rose "on the third day" (16:21). But this does not cover more than two nights. Some advocate a Wednesday crucifixion date; but though that allows for "three days and three nights," it runs into difficulty with "on the third day." According to Jewish tradition, a day and a night make an onah, and a part of an onah is as the whole. Thus, "three days and three nights" need mean no more than "three days" or the combination of any part of three days.

41 The first point of comparison between Jonah and Jesus is that they were both delivered from death—a deliverance that attested to the trustworthiness of their preaching. The second point of comparison is the different responses of the hearers. The people of Nineveh repented; but even though one greater than Jonah is here (i.e., Jesus), people are not repenting. The Ninevites will rise to bear witness against this generation on the Day of Judgment. Thus Jesus' "sign" did not meet the Jews' demand for a special token (see comment on v.38), yet it was the only one he would provide. For his own followers, his authority will be grounded in his death and resurrection. And as for those who do not believe, they will only prove themselves more wicked than the Ninevites.

42 The queen of the South was the queen of Sheba (1Ki 10:1–13), who came to Jerusalem because of reports of Solomon's wisdom. But Jesus is "one greater than Solomon"; he is the Messiah. Thus the queen of Sheba will rise at the Judgment to join the Ninevites in condemning the unbelieving generation of Jesus' time.

d. The return of the evil spirit (12:43–45)

This story about the unclean spirit who after being driven out returns with seven wicked spirits is set in the context of Jesus' veiled messianic claims. Those who through the kingdom power of God experience exorcisms must beware of neutrality toward Jesus the Messiah, for neutrality opens the door to demons even worse than the one driven out. Commitment to Jesus is essential.

43 When an evil spirit leaves a person, it goes "through arid places" in search of rest. This conforms to the view that demons have an affinity for such places. Ultimately, however, they seek another body in order to do even more harm.

44–45 Verse 44 is essentially a conditional clause to v.45: "If the demon on his arrival finds the house unoccupied [etc.]," it reenters the person with seven more demons. That person is now in a far worse condition than before. Jesus' final statement here closes off the main part of this section by referring again to "this wicked generation" (cf. 12:39) and by stressing the danger of neutrality to the claims of Jesus.

6. Doing the Father's will (12:46–50)

These verses are not so much a confrontation between Jesus and his family (cf. comments on Mk 3:31–35) as a statement about what it really means to be a disciple of Jesus and to be totally committed to him. The way for us to be as close to Jesus as his nearest and dearest kin is to do the will of his Father.

46–47 Jesus is presumably inside the house. The "brothers" mentioned here refer most naturally to sons of Mary and Joseph and thus to brothers of Jesus on his mother's side (contrary to the later dogma of the perpetual virginity of Mary).

48–50 Jesus' searching question and its remarkable answer in no way diminish his mother and brothers but simply give the priority to his Father and doing his will. Henceforth the disciples are the only "family" Jesus recognizes. Yet we do not make ourselves Jesus' close relatives by doing the will of his heavenly Father; rather, doing that will identifies us as his mother and sisters and brothers (cf. 7:21). The doing of God's will turns on obedience to Jesus and his teaching, for it was Jesus who preeminently revealed the will of the Father (cf. 11:27). These verses are full of Christological implications, but they also establish the basic importance of the community now beginning to form around him.

B. Third Discourse: The Parables of the Kingdom (13:1–53)

1. The setting (13:1–3a)

1 Matthew links the discourse on parables to the preceding controversies (either 12:38–50 or 12:22–37) and ends it with a formulaic conclusion (13:53), which implies that all these parables were given on this occasion. Jesus "sat by the lake," taking the normal position of a teacher (see comments on 5:1–2). During his ministry his chosen role was that of a teacher who taught others about the kingdom so that they might teach others (see comments on vv.51–52).

2 This is the only one of the five major discourses in Matthew that is addressed to the crowds in general. Therefore Matthew includes in it two major digressions (vv.10–23, 36–43) to explain to his disciples the significance of parables and to interpret two of them. While these digressions doubtless took place after the public discourse, Matthew moves them back as parentheses so that the significance of the parables will not be lost to the reader.

3a Jesus told the crowd "many things in parables." For a brief description of "parable," see introductory comment on Mk 4.

Regarding this chapter, if v.52 is seen as a parable, then the discourse can be broken down into two parts of four parables each (vv.3–33, 44–52). The first four are addressed to the crowds, the last four to the disciples. Of the first four parables, the first stands apart from the other three with a different introduction, separated by discussion about the purpose of the parables (vv.10–17) and the interpretation of the parable (vv.18–23). The other three have similar beginnings. The second half begins with three parables with the same opening and is separated from the fourth, which has a different beginning and an explanation, followed by the question and answer about the disciples' understanding of parables. Between these two sets of four are vv.34–43, which explore the function of parables and expound one of them. This structure is called "chiastic."

2. To the crowds (13:3b–33)

a. The parable of the soils (13:3b–9)

3b–7 The focus of this parable is not the sower but the soils. The farmer scatters the seed, which falls in various places. Paths run through and around the unfenced fields, which are too hard to receive the seed; it is eaten by birds. "Rocky places" are those in which the limestone bedrock lies close to the surface; there is little depth of soil. As the rainy season ends and the sun's heat increases, the shallow soil heats up quickly. The seeds sprout and promise to be the best of the crop. But the unrelenting summer heat demands that plants send deep roots down for water, and the bedrock prevents this, so they wither. Like grass on rooftops, the young plants wither before they can grow (Ps 129:6). Other seed falls into hedges of thorns that deprive the plants of needed sun and nourishment.

8–9 But some seed falls on good soil and produces crops of various yields, which are well within ordinary expectations. The same seed produces no crop, some crop, or much crop—all according to the soil's character. The final exhortation (cf. 11:15) warns Jesus' hearers and Matthew's readers that the parable needs careful interpretation.

b. Interlude and interpretation (13:10–23)

Matthew's treatment of the reason for parables (vv.10–17) includes more OT Scripture than Mk 4:10–12 or Lk 8:9–10 and is structured with great care. The disciples' question evokes Jesus' basic answer, which is then applied in greater detail first to "them" (vv.13–15) and then to "you" (the disciples; vv.16–18).

10 "The disciples" approached Jesus, apparently in private (cf. Mk 4:10). If this occurred at the end of the discourse, the plural "parables" would be well accounted for. The focus of Jesus' reply (vv.11–17) is on the fact that the revelation is given to some and not to others and why this is so.

11–12 Jesus' answer cannot legitimately be softened: at least one of the functions of parables is to conceal the truth, or at least to present it in a veiled way. In fact, it is entirely possible that the first word in Jesus' response (left untranslated in NIV) is "because." The disciples ask, "Why do you speak, etc.?" and Jesus replies, "Because the secrets of the kingdom have been given to the disciples but not to the others listening to me."

"The secrets [lit., "mysteries"; GK 3696] of the kingdom" are divine plans or decrees, often passed on in veiled language, known only to the elect and usually relating to events of the end time. For these secrets to be "given to" the disciples suggests that to them certain eschatological realities are being revealed. What is revealed is not who Jesus is, the nature of God, or the power of love (all of which have been suggested); rather, Jesus is revealing that the kingdom of God, especially as foreseen in Daniel, has in fact entered the world and is working, although secretly, among humankind (see comment on Mk 4:11–12).

The antithesis of v.12 is proverbial and repeated elsewhere (25:29; cf. Mk 4:25; Lk 8:18). It warns against taking spiritual blessings for granted and serves to increase gratitude and a sense of privilege among those who continue to enjoy them. What is lost in the second part of the antithesis is one's standing as the expected subject of the kingdom (cf. 8:11–12).

13 Jesus now explicitly applies his answer of vv.11–12 to those who are not disciples. Whereas Mark introduces this quote from Isaiah with "so that" (see comment on Mk 4:12), Matthew introduces it with "because," which means that Jesus speaks in parables because the people are spiritually insensitive. Though they "see," they do not really "see."

In other words, in v.11–12 Jesus acknowledges that he has chosen his disciples to understand his mysteries. Now in v.13, he gives the human reason behind his election process: spiritual dullness on the part of the crowd. Jesus affirms that what is taking place in his ministry is, on the one hand, the decreed will of God and the result of biblical prophecy and, on the other hand, a terrible rebellion and chronic unbelief. This places the responsibility for the divine rejection of those who fail to become disciples on their own shoulders while guaranteeing that none of what is taking place stands outside God's control and plan. The same sort of pairing has already been expressed in 11:25–30.

This sheds much light on the parables. It is naive to say Jesus spoke them so that everyone might more easily grasp the truth, and it is simplistic to say that the sole function of parables to outsiders was to condemn them. If Jesus simply wished to hide the truth from the outsiders, he need never have spoken to them. His concern for mission (9:35–38; 10:1–10; 28:16–20) excludes that idea. So he must preach without casting his pearls before pigs (7:6). He does so in parables—i.e., in such a way as to harden and reject those who are hard of heart and to enlighten his disciples. His disciples, it must be remembered, are not just the Twelve but those who were following him (see comment on 5:1–12) and who, it is hoped, go on to do the will of the Father (12:50) and do not end up blaspheming the Spirit (12:30–32). Thus the parables spoken to the crowds do not simply convey information, nor mask it, but present the claims of the inaugurated kingdom and so challenge the hearers.

For example, the parables of the soils not only says that the kingdom advances slowly and with varied responses to the proclamation of that kingdom but implicitly challenges hearers to ask themselves what kinds of soil they are. Those whose hearts are hardened and who lose what little they have do not participate in the messianic kingdom they have been looking for, and for them the parable is a sentence of doom. Those who have ears to hear, to whom more is given, perceive and experience the dawning of the Messianic Age; and for them the parable conveys the mysteries of the kingdom.

14–15 Matthew goes on to give a "fulfillment formula" passage from Isa 6:9–10. The Messiah who comes to reveal the Father (11:25–27) succeeds only in dulling what little spiritual sense many of the people have, for they do not want to turn and be healed. The context of Isa 6:9–10 reveals that their dullness will continue "until the cities lie ruined . . . and the fields ruined and ravaged . . . and the land is utterly forsaken. . ." (Isa 6:11–13). The reference is to the Exile; but the events surrounding it are seen as a paradigm, the classic case of rejection of God and resulting judgment, repeated in Jesus' generation on a new level and so fulfilling the words of the prophecy.

The part of v.15 beginning with "Otherwise" expresses God's judgment: the people have closed their eyes as the result of divine judicial action, otherwise they might see and turn, etc. The thought then becomes similar to 2Th 2:11. Neither Jesus nor Matthew would see anything incongruous in God's judicial hardening (see comment on v.13).

16–17 For "blessed," see comment on 5:3. The disciples were blessed by God and privileged above the crowd because they saw and heard what "many prophets and righteous men" (v.17; 10:40–42) longed to see but did not. The reference is to OT prophets and others who were righteous before God—people who looked forward to the coming of the kingdom. Here one cannot help but include Simeon (Lk 2:25–35) and Anna (Lk 2:36–38). Just as the crowd in Jesus' day stands in the line of the willfully blind in the OT (vv.14–15), so Jesus' disciples stand in the line of the prophets (as in 5:11–12). The fulfillment motif is operating, showing that the division taking place with the coming of the kingdom stands in succession to the divisions already spelled out in the Scriptures.

18 Jesus now asks his disciples to listen to an explanation of the parable of the soils. The general point is that the "message about the kingdom" (v.19) receives a varied reception among various people, and that during this time of difficulty and frustration there is an implied delay while the seed produces in some soils its various yields. The interpretation therefore demands that each person examine how he or she "hears" (GK 201) the message.

19 Matthew plunges right into the significance of the various soils. The first soil (that which is "along the path") refers to those who hear the message about the kingdom, but, like hardened paths, do not let the truth penetrate their hearts (see comment on 5:8). Before they really understand it, the evil one (cf. 6:13; 12:45) or Satan (cf. Mk 4:15) has snatched it away. Close study of birds as symbols in the OT and especially in the literature of later Judaism shows that birds regularly symbolize evil and even demons or Satan (Rev 18:2).

20–21 The person who receives the message of the kingdom in a thoughtless way may show immediate signs of life and promise to be the best of the crop: he or she receives the truth "with joy." But without real root, there is no fruit; and external pressures, trouble, and persecution (cf. 24:9, 21, 29), like sun beating on a rootless plant, soon reveal the shallowness of this soil. Just as quickly such people fall away. Such temporary disciples are always numerous in times of revival and were so in Jesus' ministry (cf. comments on 12:32).

22 The seeds among thorns represent those who do not hear the word "with joy" (v.20) and never permit the message about the kingdom to control them: life has too many other commitments that slowly choke the struggling plant, so that it never matures and bears fruit. The competing "thorns" are summed up under two headings—the worries of this life (see comments on 6:25–34) and devotion to wealth (cf. 6:19–24; 1Ti 6:9). Such concerns snuff out spiritual life. "Deceitfulness" suggests that one may not be aware of the choking that is going on. This warning is timeless.

23 By contrast with the negative results of the preceding verses, we now come to the person who hears the word and understands it (thus reverting to the categories of Isa 6:9–10 used in vv.13–15, 19). The interpretation, like the parable itself, ends positively. And we must not fail to notice that the soil that produces only a small crop is nevertheless called "good" (cf. 25:22–23).

c. The parable of the weeds (13:24–30)

The parable of the soils shows that the kingdom will produce an abundant crop in spite of hard hearts, competing pressures, and even failure. But one might ask whether Messiah's people should immediately separate the crop from the weeds. This next parable answers that question negatively: there will be a delay in separation until the harvest. This parable also explains how it is possible for the kingdom to be present in the world while not wiping out all opposition.

24 Jesus "told them" (i.e., the people, not the disciples; cf. vv.34, 36) another parable. The kingdom of heaven "is like" the situation of "a man who sowed good seed in his field." The Greek tense used here implies that the kingdom has become like the situation of this man. What Jesus argues is both that the kingdom has come (see 4:17; 12:28) and that the Parousia is still delayed.

25–27 "Sleeping" does not imply that the servants were neglectful but that the enemy was stealthy and malicious. What he sowed in the field was almost certainly bearded darnel, which is botanically close to wheat and difficult to distinguish from it when the plants are young. The roots of the two plants entangle themselves around each other; but when the heads of grain appear on the wheat, there is no doubt which plant is which. As the growing takes place, the servants tell their master or the head of the house (see comment on 10:25) about the weeds.

28–30 The owner blames an enemy, but forbids his servants from attempting to separate weed from wheat till the harvest. Then, as the workers reap the field, only the wheat will be gathered; the weeds, apparently so plentiful they must first be gathered up and burned, contaminate the wheat no longer. "Harvest" is a common metaphor for the final judgment (see comment on 9:37–38).

d. The parable of the mustard seed (13:31–32)

31–32 The mustard seed is "the smallest of all your seeds," but it becomes a large tree—large in comparison with the tiny seed and large enough for birds to perch in its branches. The image recalls OT passages that picture a great kingdom as a large tree with birds flocking to its branches (Eze 17:22–24; 31:3–14; Dan 4:7–23). The point Jesus is making is that there is a basic connection between the small beginnings taking place under his ministry and the kingdom in its future glory. Though the initial appearance of the kingdom may seem inconsequential (and here is where the emphasis is), the tiny seed leads to the mature plant.

e. The parable of the yeast (13:33)

33 The general thrust of this parable is the same as that of the mustard seed. The kingdom produces ultimate consequences out of all proportion to its insignificant beginnings.

If there is a distinction between this parable and the last one, it is that the mustard seed suggests extensive growth and the yeast intensive transformation. The yeast doesn't grow, it permeates; and its inevitable effect, despite the small quantity used, recalls 5:13. In both parables it is clear that at present the kingdom of heaven operates, but quietly and from small beginnings.

3. Pause (13:34–43)

a. Parables as fulfillment of prophecy (13:34–35)

34 The first verb ("spoke") refers to the specific situation of Jesus speaking parables at that time; the second verb ("did not say") implies that this was Jesus' constant custom. This section does not mean that he told nothing but parables; rather, Matthew stresses that parables were an essential part of Jesus' spoken ministry.

35 Again Matthew introduces a fulfillment passage, quoting from Ps 78:2. In what sense can Jesus' ministry in parables be said to be a fulfillment of Asaph's psalm? Note especially that Ps 78 repeats Israel's well-known history, none of which is "mysterious" or "hidden." But Matthew presents Jesus as uttering hidden "secrets" (see comment on v.11). The point of Ps 78 is that though the history of the Jews is well known, the psalmist selects certain historical events and brings them together in such a way as to bring out things that have been riddles and enigmas "from of old." The pattern of history is not self-evident; but the psalmist shows what it is really all about. He enlarges on God's might at the time of the Exodus and at other major turning points, a might exercised on behalf of his people. With these events the psalmist juxtaposes the people's persistent rebellion, the result being a vivid portrayal of God's justice and mercy and the people's obtuseness, need, and privilege. The psalmist teaches all this by opening his mouth "in parables" (i.e., by comparing various things) and in so doing utters "things hidden from of old."

Jesus has adopted a similar pattern. He applies the second line of the quotation to himself as revealing things formerly hidden. This does not necessarily mean that he is teaching entirely new things any more than the psalmist was teaching new things. In both cases the patterns of redemptive history may be so stressed that when rightly interpreted they point toward new revelation—i.e., they are fulfilled (see comments on 2:15; 5:17–20). Jesus teaches these hitherto hidden things "in parables" (i.e., by comparing various things). The parables of this chapter are not exactly like the comparisons and wise sayings offered in Ps 78, yet the term "parable" can embrace both kinds of utterance.

But what are these "hidden things" (GK 3221) that Jesus is now revealing? They are the righteous acts of God in redemption taking place in his teaching, miracles, death, and resurrection. Matthew insists that the OT Scriptures prophesied these things. They are not novel. If in one sense they have not been known before, it is because they have not all been brought together in the same pattern before. Jesus' kingdom parables to the crowds bring together various pieces of previous revelation into new perspectives. Thus the Messiah is Son of David but also a Suffering Servant. Jesus is the royal King and Son of David foreseen in Scripture (21:4–11) but also the stricken Shepherd equally foreseen in Scripture (26:31). Who clearly foresaw that both streams would merge in one person?

Regarding the idea of fulfillment, Matthew understands that what the prophets say does not necessarily predict the future in simple predictive propositions; it may reveal hidden things. The entire OT Scripture, both Law and Prophets, comprehends certain patterns, types, predictions, and declarations, which cumulatively look forward to him who "fulfills" them (cf. comment on 11:13). As such, Ps 78 becomes part of the "Law and Prophets" that prophesy. If part of this sacred record interprets and brings new truth out of an earlier part, it establishes a pattern that looks to one who will interpret and bring new truth out of the whole. Jesus, Matthew claims, fulfills that role and is exercising it in his own parabolic teaching.

b. Interpretation of the parable of the weeds (13:36–43)

36 The house referred to is the one Jesus left in order to preach to the crowds (13:1) and was probably located in Capernaum. In Matthew's narrative the house provides the setting both for Jesus' private explanations (vv.37–43; cf. vv.10–23) and for the parables aimed at his disciples (vv.44–52). The disciples need explanations (cf. also 15:15–16). They are not distinguished from the crowds by their instant and intuitive understanding but by their persistence in seeking explanations (see comment on vv.10–13).

37–39 On "Son of Man," see comment on Mk 8:31. Jesus is the one who both sows the good seed and directs the harvest. One of the most significant details in the parables is the way key images that in the OT apply exclusively to God, or occasionally to God's Messiah, now stand for Jesus himself. These images include sower, director of the harvest, rock, shepherd, bridegroom, father, giver of forgiveness, vineyard owner, lord, and king.

"The field is the world" (not to be confused with the church). This brief statement presupposes a mission beyond Israel (cf. 10:16–18; 28:18–20) and confirms that the narrower command of 10:5–6 is related exclusively to the mission of the Twelve during the period of Jesus' earthly ministry (see comment on 10:5b–6).

In this parable and its interpretation, unlike the parable of the sower, the good seed stands for the "sons of the kingdom" (cf. comment on 5:9)—a healthy reminder that images can symbolize different things in different contexts. It refers to those who truly are the objects of messianic favor and participants in the messianic kingdom. For their sake the "weeds" are now preserved, and at the "harvest" for their sake the "weeds" will be destroyed. These weeds are "the sons of the evil one." The devil himself is the enemy (v.39); the harvest is the end of the age (see comment on 9:37); and the harvesters are angels (24:30–31; 25:31).

40–42 The identification of the actors is over, and the description of the action begins. As the weeds are "pulled up" and burned, so it is at the end. The kingdom we have known as the kingdom of heaven is also seen as the kingdom of the Son of Man, Jesus' kingdom (cf. 20:21; 25:31; cf. Da 2:35; Rev 11:15); his reign after the Resurrection extends to the farthest reaches of the universe (28:18). In that sense, "everything that causes sin and all who do evil" are weeded out of his kingdom (see 5:29; 7:23; cf. Zep 1:3) and, like the weeds, are thrown into the eternal fiery furnace (see comment on Mk 9:43–49), where there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth (see comment on Mt 8:12). What is clear is that Jesus ascribes to himself the role of eschatological Judge that the Lord assigns himself in the OT.

43 In contrast to the evildoers, "the righteous will shine like the sun in the kingdom of their Father" (an allusion to Da 12:3). These righteous people (see comments on 5:20, 45; 9:13; 10:41), once the light of the world (5:13–16), now radiate perfection and experience bliss in the consummation of their hopes.

The "kingdom of their Father" must not be set over against the kingdom of the Son of Man (v.41) on the supposed ground that the former alone is eternal, or that the Son of Man hands over the elect to him (1Co 15:24). The Son's postascension reign is a mediated reign. All God's kingly authority is given to Jesus (28:18) and mediated through him; and for all that time the kingdom can be called the kingdom of God or the kingdom of the Son of Man or, more generally, the kingdom of heaven.

4. To the disciples (13:44–52)

a. The parable of the hidden treasure (13:44)

The parables of the hidden treasure and the pearl are a pair; and pairing is not uncommon in Matthew (e.g., 5:14b–16; 6:26–30; 7:6; et al.), an excellent way of reinforcing a point. These two parables make the same general point but have significant individual emphases. They both deal with the superlative worth of the kingdom of heaven. Note, though, that the kingdom is not exclusively future here, but seen as already present (see comments on 4:17; 12:28).

44 The situation of the kingdom is like the situation of a treasure hidden in a field, which someone finds by chance. Under rabbinic law if a workman came on a treasure in a field and lifted it out, it would belong to his master, the field's owner; but here the man is careful not to lift the treasure out till he has bought the field. The focus of the parable, therefore, is on the value of the treasure, which is worth every sacrifice. When the man buys the field at such sacrifice, he possesses far more than the price paid (cf. 10:39). The kingdom of heaven is worth infinitely more than the cost of discipleship, and those who know where the treasure lies joyfully abandon everything else to secure it.

b. The parable of the expensive pearl (13:45–46)

45–46 The word "again" ties this parable closely to the preceding one. The connection is the supreme worth of the kingdom. But here we deal with a merchant whose business it is to seek pearls, and who chances on one of supreme value. Unlike the man in the last parable, he pays a full price. Although he is an expert in pearls, this single find so far surpasses any other pearl he has ever seen that he considers it a fair exchange for everything else he owns. Thus Jesus is saying that the person whose whole life has been bound up with "pearls"—the entire religious heritage of the Jews?—will, on comprehending the true value of the kingdom as Jesus presents it, gladly exchange all else to follow him.

c. The parable of the net (13:47–48)

47–48 Thematically and structurally, this parable is parallel to the parable of the weeds. But whereas the parable of the weeds focuses on the long period of the reign of God during which weeds coexist with wheat and the enemy has large powers, this parable simply describes the situation that exists when the Last Judgment takes place: the kingdom embraces "good" fish and "bad" fish, and only the final sweep of the net sorts them out.

d. Interlude and interpretation (13:49–51)

49–50 Jesus interprets the previous parable. Both the parable and its interpretation point to the Last Judgment (cf. vv.41–42). The focus here is on the state of the kingdom when the Judgment occurs. Though it includes both the righteous and the wicked, a thorough sorting out will certainly take place.

51 Jesus' question picks up the disciples' request for an explanation (v.36) but goes beyond it, since the question is introduced after three additional parables. "All these things" refers to the meaning of parables in general, to the meaning of unexplained parables, and to the "secrets of the kingdom" (v.11).

This is the only place in this chapter where the disciples themselves are explicitly said to understand, and they say it by themselves. Matthew portrays the disciples realistically. They certainly understood more than the crowds; on the other hand, they are shortly to be rebuked for their dullness (15:16).

e. The parable of the teacher of the law (13:52)

52 Interpretations of this difficult verse are legion. The problem in this parable is to discern the point of the comparison. There seem to be two comparisons. The emphasis in the first part is not that the teacher of the law has been instructed about the kingdom and therefore understands, but that he has become a disciple of the kingdom and therefore his allegiance has been transformed. Such a discipled person brings out of his storeroom (i.e., out of his heart, his very being) new things and old. We must not understand this saying to read (NIV) "new treasures as well as old," suggesting that new kingdom things have been added to the old Jewish ways. Rather, the Gospel of the kingdom, though new, takes precedence over the old revelation and is its fulfillment (cf. comments on 5:17–20). The new is not added to the old, but has renewed the old, which has thereby become new. Thus the OT promises of the Messiah and kingdom, as well as OT law and piety, have found their fulfillment in Jesus' person, teaching, and kingdom; and the teacher of the law who has become a disciple of the kingdom now brings out of himself deep understanding of these things and their transformed perspective affecting all life.

But there is a second point of comparison in the parable. The one who brings out these treasures is a "teacher of the law" (GK 1208). He is not bringing forth things new and old for purely personal reasons but in his capacity as teacher. Jesus' disciples claim to have understood what he has been teaching. "Therefore," he responds, discipled teachers of the Scriptures must themselves bring out of their storeroom the treasures now theirs so as to teach others (cf. ch.10; 28:18–20).

5. Transitional conclusion (13:53)

53 Once again, this section of Matthew closes with a typical formula (see comment on 7:28–29). Jesus' movement from Capernaum to "his hometown" (vv.53–54) turns out to be a further fulfillment of vv.14–15: these people will be ever hearing but never understanding.

V. The Glory and the Shadow: Progressive Polarization (13:54–19:2)

A. Narrative (13:54–17:27)

The principal themes of these chapters are clear. There is a progressive polarization along several axes. As Jesus extends his ministry, the opposition sharpens (15:1–9; 16:1–14). When he reveals himself to his disciples, they perceive some truth clearly and entirely reject other truth (16:13–22; 17:1–13). As Jesus is increasingly opposed by Jewish leaders, so his own disciples become increasingly important (18:1–10). And rising less ambiguously now is the shadow of the Cross (16:21–22; 17:22–23).

1. Rejected at Nazareth (13:54–58)

Placing this story immediately after the discourse on parables extends the hostility and rejection of the scribes and Pharisees even to Jesus' hometown (cf. Mk 6:1–6).

54 Jesus' "hometown" is Nazareth (cf. 2:23; 4:13). That Jesus taught extensively in the synagogues is certain (cf. 4:23; 12:9), but he did not limit himself to this environment. The people who gathered in the synagogue wondered about the source of Jesus' authority. Do Jesus' wisdom and powers—his teaching and miracles, both evidences of his authority—reflect God's authority or something else (cf. 12:24)?

55–57a Obviously some of the questioners' motivation sprang from a serious desire to know whence Jesus derived his authority rather than from personal pique that a hometown boy had outstripped them. The questions are understandable. They knew Jesus had no special breeding or education. Whence, then, his wisdom and miracles? But by their questions the people merely condemned themselves; they could not doubt the fact of his wisdom and miracles, yet they rejected his claims. "They took offense at him" means they found in him obstacles to faith, even though the biggest obstacles were in their own hearts. On the question of Jesus' brothers and sisters, see comment on 12:46–50.

57b–58 The proverb in v.57b is true: most often a person is better received at home than anywhere else; but if one enjoys an elevated position, the reverse is true. Jesus did not do miracles there because of the people's "lack of faith." This was a source of profound grief and frustration for Jesus rather than something that stripped him of power (see comment on Mk 6:5–6).

2. Herod and Jesus (14:1–12)

a. Herod's understanding of Jesus (14:1–2)

1–2 It seems likely that this event took place after the mission of the Twelve (see Mk 6:7ff). Certainly the multiplication of Jesus' influence through his disciples would upset Herod, one of whose motives in imprisoning the Baptist had been to thwart any threat to political stability (on Herod, see comment on Mk 6:14).

Jesus' ministry was taking place largely within Herod's jurisdiction. His conclusion that this was John the Baptist risen from the dead is of great interest. It reflects an eclectic set of beliefs, such as the Pharisaic understanding of resurrection. During his ministry John had performed no miracles (Jn 10:41); therefore Herod ascribes the miracles in Jesus' ministry, not to John, but to John "risen from the dead." Herod's guilty conscience apparently combined with a superstitious view of miracles to generate this theory.

b. Background: Herod's execution of John the Baptist (14:3–12)

3–5 Herod Antipas's first wife was the daughter of Aretas (cf. 2Co 11:32), Arabian king of the Nabateans, whose land adjoined Perea. To divorce her in favor of Herodias was politically explosive. She was married to Herod Philip, Herod's half-brother. John probably did not denounce him for divorcing his former wife, an action probably judged allowable, but for incestuously marrying his half-brother's wife (Lev 18:16; 20:21); and John probably kept on repeating his rebuke. This political criticism coupled with John's messianic message (3:1–12) made him a dangerous man to Herod's security.

6–8 At Herod's birthday feast, Herodias's daughter by her former marriage, Salome, a girl between twelve and fourteen years old, danced before the king and his lords. The dance may have been very sensual. She pleased Herod Antipas enough for him to put on the airs of a lavish and powerful emperor; petty ruler though he was, he imitated the grandiloquence of ancient Persian monarchs (Est 5:3, 6; 7:2). Still young enough to ask her mother's advice, Salome's dancing became the means for accomplishing Herodias's darkest desire—the death of the man whose only offense had been telling the truth.

9–11 Though grieving because of his oath and his loss of face before his guests if he were to renege on his vow, Herod gave the order. Decapitation was contrary to Jewish law, which also forbade execution without trial. So John died, the last of the OT prophets (11:9, 13) who through persecution became models for Jesus' disciples (5:11–12).

12 The report of John's death and burial to Jesus draws John and Jesus together against the opposition and suggests a positive response to Jesus by John and his disciples following 11:2–6.

3. The feeding of the five thousand (14:13–21)

The feeding of the five thousand is found in all four Gospels. There is probably an implicit anticipation of the messianic banquet (see comment on 8:11); but the text focuses more on Jesus' compassion (v.14), on the responsibility of the disciples to minister to the crowds (v.16), and on this miracle of creation.

13–14 Verse 13 picks up the story from vv.1–2: When Jesus heard about Herod's response to his preaching and miracles, he decided to withdraw. He had done so previously to escape the animosity of the Pharisees (12:15); he now does so to avoid Antipas. But it was usually impossible for Jesus to escape the crowds even when it was possible for him to leave a place.

They ran "on foot" around the top of the lake, presumably crossing the upper Jordan at a ford two miles north of where the river enters Galilee. They saw where Jesus was going and set out after him; but arriving first, they were already there when he landed with his tired disciples.

15–17 It was now late afternoon. On the face of it, the conversation between Jesus and his disciples is straightforward. They wanted him to send the crowds to the small, unwalled hamlets for food. Jesus' words "you give them something to eat" were not easy to understand; but whatever they meant, the disciples did not understand them. Their answer in v.17 not only reveals limited vision but also an approach to the problem betraying a lack of both understanding and faith.

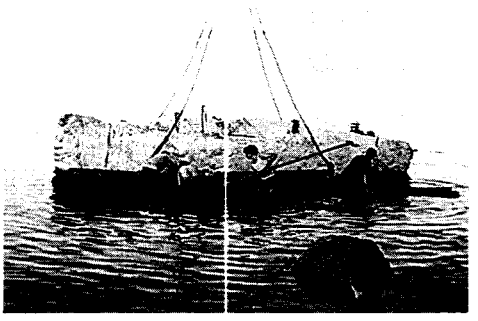
18–21 Jesus alone multiplies the loaves and fishes. He gives the orders, gives thanks, and breaks the loaves (vv.18–19). The actions—looking up to heaven, thanking God, and breaking the loaves—are normal for any head of a Jewish household in prayer (see comment on Mk 6:41).

The crowd was huge: fifteen or twenty thousand total, if there were five thousand "men," v.21. Yet all ate and were satisfied, and there were twelve baskets of leftovers. The "twelve basketfuls" may be significant (cf. twelve tribes and twelve apostles; 19:28). The best suggestion is that Messiah's supply is so lavish that even the scraps of his provision are enough to supply the needs of Israel, represented by the Twelve.

4. The walk on the water (14:22–33)

22 Jesus "made" (lit., "compelled"; GK 337) the disciples go on ahead of him, probably because (1) he wanted to be alone to pray (v.23); (2) he wanted to escape the crowd with his disciples to get some rest (Mk 6:31–32); and (3) he may even have wanted to tame a messianic uproar (Jn 6:15).

23–24 On the phrase "on a mountainside," see comment on 5:1–2. The burden of Jesus' prayer is not revealed; but it is possible that the crowd's attempts to make him king (Jn 6:15) prompted him to seek his Father's face. The boat was out toward the middle of the lake, and the wind was likely coming out of the west as they were trying to run toward that shore.



25–27 The Romans divided the night from sunset to sunrise into four watches (reflected here). Jesus' approach to the boat therefore occurred between 3:00 A.M. and 6:00 A.M. The disciples were terrified, thinking they were seeing an apparition or ghost. "Take courage!" and "Don't be afraid" bracket the central reason for his calming exhortations: "It is I." Although the Greek words for "It is I" ("I am") can have no more force than that, any Christian after the Resurrection and Ascension would also detect echoes of "I Am," the decisive self-disclosure of God (Ex 3:14; Isa 51:12; cf. Jn 8:58). Once again we find Jesus revealing himself in a veiled way that will prove especially rich to Christians after his resurrection (see comment on 8:20).

28–31 How far Peter got is unclear, but at Jesus' command he walked on the water. But his outlook changed: when he saw the storm, he began to sink. It was not that he lost faith in himself, but that his faith in Jesus, strong enough to get him out of the boat and walking on the water, was not strong enough to stand up to the storm. Therefore Jesus calls him a man "of little faith" (GK 3899; see comments on 6:30; 8:26), and his rhetorical question helps both Peter and the reader recognize that doubts and fears quickly disappear before a strict inquiry into their cause. Thus Peter here is both a good example and a bad example. His cry for help is natural, and Jesus' rescuing him is akin to God's salvation in the OT (Pss 18:16; 69:1–3; 144:7).

32–33 The climax of the story is not the stilling of the storm but the confession and worship of the disciples: "Truly you are the Son of God." This is the first time Jesus has been addressed by the disciples with this full title (cf. 16:16; 26:63; et al.). But it already lurks behind 3:17 ("my Son"), and the devil has used it of Jesus (see 4:3, 6). It is most likely abbreviated to "the Son" in Jesus' self-references in 11:25–27. Exactly what the disciples meant by this title is uncertain. They probably did not understand it in a genuine ontological sense (see comment on 3:17). They perhaps used the title in a messianic way, but still with superficial comprehension (see comment on 16:16). The final response of the disciples is to worship Jesus.

5. Transitional summary of constant and unavoidable ministry (14:34–36) instant recognition of Jesus showed the extent of his ministry; again, word-of-mouth reports led to crowds (cf. 4:24). Like the woman with the hemorrhage (9:20–22), the people were satisfied if only they could touch the edge of his cloak (v.36); even that degree of faith brought thorough healing.

This little section does three things: (1) it again stresses the sweeping extent of Jesus' public ministry (cf. 4:23–25; 8:16; 9:35–36); (2) it shows that Jesus' ministry extended to all the people, though his close disciples had special access to him and his more intimate instruction; and (3) because the stricter groups (e.g., the Pharisees and Essenes) counted it an abomination to rub shoulders in a crowd—one never knew what ceremonial uncleanness one might contract—Jesus' unconcern about such things neatly sets the stage for the confrontation over clean and unclean in 15:1–20.

6. Jesus and the tradition of the elders (15:1–20)

Controversies become sharper and more theological as Matthew's narrative moves on. This controversy is of great importance in grasping Jesus' understanding of the law.

1 The Pharisees and teachers of the law mentioned here came from Jerusalem and were probably held in special esteem. But from Matthew's perspective, they were a quasi-official deputation (cf. Jn 1:19) and a source of Jesus' most virulent opposition.

2 The attack on Jesus again comes through the behavior of his disciples (see 9:14; cf. Mk 7:3–4). The "tradition of the elders" (cf. Gal 1:14; Col 2:18) refers to the great corpus of oral teaching that commented on the law and interpreted it in detailed rules of conduct, often recording the diverse opinions of competing rabbis. This tradition in Jesus' time was largely oral, but the Pharisees viewed it as having authority very nearly equal to the canon. It was codified about A.D. 135–200 to form the Mishnah.

3–6 Jesus' words are less a response than a counterattack. He made a fundamental distinction between the authority of "the command of God" (as found in Scripture) and Jewish tradition, and he insisted that the Pharisees and teachers of the law were guilty of breaking the former for the sake of the latter.

The two texts cited are Ex 20:12 and 21:17, and their point is clear enough. In a broad sense, Jesus expects children to take responsibility for their aging parents. Greed could keep a son from discharging this duty by simply declaring the goods or money that might have gone to support his parents korban (Corban, Mk 7:11), a gift devoted to God (cf. Lev 27:9, 16) and set aside for the temple treasury. Such a vow could be annulled in various ways. It would not mean that one could use the goods or money in question but that he could withhold it from his parents.

7–9 This is the first recorded instance of Jesus' calling the Pharisees and teachers of the law "hypocrites" (GK 5695; see comment on 6:2). His charge was that, while they made a show of devotion to God, their religious traditions took precedence over God's will. Jesus saw their hypocrisy as a fulfillment of Isa 29:13. Yet Isa 29:13 is addressed to men of Isaiah's day. What then did Jesus mean? There were three points of contact: (1) in each case those warned were Jews, (2) from Jerusalem, (3) with a religion characterized by externals that sometimes vitiated principle. The Jews of Jesus' day thought of themselves as preserving ancient traditions; but Jesus said that what they were actually preserving was the spirit of those whom Isaiah criticized long before. They had displaced the true religion of the heart with a religion of form. Therefore their worship was vain and their teachings their own, with nothing of God's authority behind them.

10–11 Jesus' sharpest barb against the Pharisees and teachers of the law had been private. Now he teaches the crowd the same things. These two verses also answer the Pharisees' question of v.2 directly, not just by countercharge (as in vv.3–9). What Jesus says, the disciples call a "parable" (v.15). In presenting it to the crowd, he exhorts them to understand; for the parable was not meant to be cryptic, though only few seemed to have grasped it at the time, and even the disciples had trouble with it (vv.15–16; see comments on 13:10–17, 34–35). The form of Jesus' argument is from principle (vv.10–11, 17–19) to specific application.

12–14 These verses reflect what took place after Jesus and his disciples had retired from the crowd and entered the house. The disciples' question shows that the Pharisees understood enough of Jesus' parable to take offense. The disciples wanted to have the parable explained (v.15); since they held the Pharisees in high regard, they wanted to be certain of exactly what Jesus had said that had offended them so badly. Jesus must disillusion his disciples as to the reliability of the Pharisees and teachers of the law as spiritual guides, as well as explain the parable.

Jesus uses two images. The first predicts the rooting up of any plant the heavenly Father has not planted. Israel often saw herself as a plant God had planted (Ps 1:3; Isa 60:21), and the prophets turned the image against them (Isa 5:1–7). Jesus is saying here that the Pharisees, the leaders of the Jewish people, are not truly part of God's planting. This shocking idea has already been hinted at in 3:9; 8:11–12 and will recur.

The second image may depend on a title some Jewish leaders apparently took on themselves. They had the law, they reasoned, and therefore they were fit to serve as "guides of the blind" (Ro 2:19). This Jesus disputes; in his view they were "blind guides of the blind" (NIV note) and "both will fall into a pit." Though the Pharisees and teachers of the law had the Scriptures and interpreted them in the synagogues, this does not mean that they really understood them. On the contrary, they were blind and failed to comprehend them (cf. 23:16–17). Jesus' denunciation presupposes that anyone who truly understands the "word of God" (v.6) will discern who he is and follow him (cf. Jn 5:39–40). The Pharisees did not follow Jesus; so they did not understand and follow the Scriptures.

15–16 Peter speaks on behalf of the other disciples. Their failure to understand shocks Jesus. Dullness might be understandable in others, but in the disciples? Thus, Jesus asks in effect, "Are you still without understanding?"

17–20 "What goes into a man's mouth" (v.11) is merely food, which passes through the body and is excreted (lit., "is cast into a latrine"). But "what comes out of a man's mouth" and makes him unclean comes from his "heart" (see comment on 12:34–35). In other words, what a person truly is affects what he or she says and does. True religion must deal with the inner nature of a person and not with mere externals. Matthew ends this section by coming back to the specific question that precipitated Jesus' comments.

Jesus' teaching here opens up a fresh approach to the question of the law. It discounts the Pharisees' oral tradition while defending the law (vv.3–6); yet it insists that real "cleanness" is of the heart, so discounting some of the law's formal requirements.

Like 5:21–48, Jesus insists that the true direction in which the OT law points is precisely what he teaches, what he is, and what he inaugurates. He has fulfilled the law; therefore whatever prescriptive force it continues to have is determined by its relationship to him. It is within this framework that Jesus' teaching here theologically anticipates passages such as Ro 14:14–18 and 1Co 10:31. What concerned Jesus most was to see people transformed and their hearts renewed (cf. 6:1–33; 12:34–35), because he came to save his people from their sins (1:21).

7. More healings (15:21–31)

a. The Canaanite woman (15:21–28)

This miracle records Jesus' withdrawal from the opposition of the Pharisees and teachers of the law (cf. 14:13) and contrasts their approach to the Messiah with that of this Gentile woman (see comments on Mk 7:24–30).

21–22 Jesus now entered pagan territory, where a woman came to him. Matthew's use of the old term "Canaanite" shows that he cannot forget her ancestry: a descendant of Israel's ancient enemies comes to the Jewish Messiah for blessing. Her calling Jesus "Son of David" shows some recognition of Jesus as the Messiah who would heal the people (see comment on 9:27); "Lord" is ambiguous (see comment on 7:22–23).

23–24 Matthew's Jewish readers would be intensely interested in Jesus' doing a miracle to aid a Gentile, on Gentile territory. Jesus' silence does not quiet the woman; so his disciples beg him to stop her persistent cries, probably by meeting her request. Indeed only this interpretation makes sense, because v.24 gives a reason for Jesus' not helping her rather than for not sending her away.

Jesus' answer echoes 10:6, where the same language is used (see comment on 10:6). The phrase "the lost sheep of the house of Israel" means "the lost sheep who are the house of Israel"—i.e., all Israel, regarded as lost sheep. It appears, then, that Jesus wanted his disciples and the Canaanite woman to recognize that he was limiting his activities during his life on earth. The kingdom must first be offered to Jews.

25–26 The woman knelt before Jesus and cried, as only the mother of an afflicted child could, "Lord, help me!" Jesus made certain that she grasped the historic distinction between Jew and Gentile. Jesus' short aphorism supposes that the "children" are the people of Israel and the "dogs" are Gentiles. His concern is one of precedence: the children get fed first.

27–28 The woman's answer is masterly. Those two words "but even" reveal immense wisdom and faith. She does not argue that her needs make her an exception, or that she has a right to Israel's covenanted mercies, or that the mysterious ways of divine election and justice are unfair. She simply asks for help, hopeful that she may be allowed to receive a crumb from the kindness of the Lord. As Paul does in Ro 9–11, the woman preserves Israel's historical privilege over against all radical spiritualization of Christ's work; yet she perceives that grace is freely given to the Gentiles. A faith that simply seeks mercy is honored (v.28). Again Jesus speaks, this time with emotion; and the woman's daughter is healed "from that very hour."

b. The many (15:29–31)

Matthew now provides a summary of more extensive healings that take place in Gentile territory (the Decapolis). Lest anyone think the crumbs suggest a restricted blessing for Gentiles (15:21–28), Matthew records the blessing and then tells us of the feeding of four thousand Gentiles. The blessing meant for the Gentiles is beginning to dawn.

29–31 Mark 7:31 has Jesus traveling to the Decapolis on the southeastern side of the lake, still outside Herod's jurisdiction (cf. Mt 14:13), where he does many miracles. Matthew seems to assume the same location: (1) the clause "they praised the God of Israel" (v.31) could be naturally said only by Gentiles; (2) the remoteness of the place (v.33) suggests the eastern side of the lake; and (3) the number of "basketfuls of broken pieces" (v.37) left over avoids the symbolic "twelve" (cf. 14:20).

8. The feeding of the four thousand (15:32–39)

On the relationship of the story to the feeding of the five thousand, see comments on Mk 8:1–9. This feeding took place in Gentile territory (see comments on vv.29–31).

32–33 On Jesus' compassion, see comment on 9:36. It appears that Jesus' preaching and miracles so captivated the people (cf. v.31) that they refused to leave him till he hesitated to dismiss them, fearing that many of them would collapse for hunger on their way home (v.32). Some had come a long distance (Mk 8:3). The response of the disciples is not surprising. While they may have understood the feeding of the five thousand Jews as anticipating the messianic banquet, they were undoubtedly a long way from admitting that Gentiles could share in any anticipated messianic banquet. Furthermore, we must never lose sight of a human being's vast capacity for unbelief.

34–39 If the number of baskets of leftovers in 14:20 is symbolic, it is hard to see why the seven baskets here (v.37) are not symbolic. The number seven may be significant because it is not twelve and therefore not allusive to the twelve apostles or twelve tribes. As before, "those who ate" are all satisfied, and the men only are numbered. The whole crowd may have exceeded ten thousand.

The site of Magadan (v.39), where the following conflict with the Pharisees and Sadducees occurs, is unknown. If this occurred when Jesus and the disciples landed, it must have been on Jewish territory, probably on the western shores of Galilee.

9. Another demand for a sign (16:1–4)

Doubtless there were many requests for signs (see comment on 12:38–40). Jesus had barely returned to Jewish territory when the opposition of Jewish leaders again surfaced, prompting him to leave the area once more, to cross the lake, and to head far north to Caesarea Philippi (v.13). There in God's providence and in the heart of Gentile territory, Peter makes the great confession that Jesus is the Messiah (v.16).

1 The single article in the Greek for "the Pharisees and Sadducees" implies that they acted together. Perhaps they represent the Sanhedrin, which included both groups (cf. Ac 23:6); or else a common opponent transforms usual enemies into friends (cf. Lk 23:12; cf. Ps 2:2). These men came to Jesus to "test" him (see comment on 4:1), asking for "a sign [GK 4956] from heaven" (see comment on 12:38).

2–3 Jesus' point here is clear enough: the Pharisees and Sadducees can read the "signs" that predict weather, but they remain oblivious to the "signs of the times" already happening. These signs testify to Jesus and the kingdom now dawning (cf. 11:4–6; 12:28). The proof that they cannot discern the signs is simply that they ask for a sign (v.1)!

4 But if a definitive sign is demanded, none but the sign of Jonah will be given (see 12:38–42 for an exposition of the sign). Jesus then left his opponents and withdrew by boat to the other side of the lake (v.5). But his withdrawal is emotional and judicial as well as geographical.

10. The yeast of the Pharisees and Sadducees (16:5–12)

5–7 This is Jesus' last and most important withdrawal from Galilee before his final trip south (19:1). The setting for this conversation may be the boat in which Jesus and his disciples cross the lake. It reveals the contrasting attitudes of Jesus and his disciples; he is still thinking about the malignity of the Pharisees and Sadducees (vv.1–4), and the disciples are thinking about food (15:29–38) that they forgot to bring.

"Yeast" was a common symbol for evil and could therefore be applied to different kinds of wickedness (e.g., Lk 12:1; cf. Ex 34:25; Lev 2:11; 1Co 5:6–8), but always with the idea that a little of it could have a far-reaching and insidious effect. The disciples do not understand what Jesus is saying but find his words enigmatic and discuss them.

8–12 Because they were men of little faith (v.8; cf. 6:30; 8:26; 14:31), they came to an unimaginative conclusion. Jesus could not have been talking about bread because he had already shown his power to provide all the bread they needed. He had performed two "food" miracles, and there had been basketfuls of leftovers each time.

Jesus' charge against the disciples ran deep. He had already denounced the Pharisees and Sadducees for their particular "teaching" that demanded manipulative signs and for their unbelief in spite of the bountiful evidence already supplied. Now the disciples are perilously close to the same unbelief in Jesus' person and miracles. The miracles Jesus performs, unlike the signs the Pharisees demand, do not compel faith; but those with faith will perceive their significance.

Instead of explaining the meaning of his metaphor of the yeast, Jesus repeats it. Great teacher that he is, he is trying to train his disciples to think deeply about the revelation he is giving and is not content to keep on spoon-feeding them.

11. Peter's confession of Jesus and its aftermath (16:13–23)

a. The confession (16:13–20)

The Pharisees and Sadducees persistently refused to acknowledge Jesus as the Messiah (vv.1–4). Even the disciples struggled with questions of faith (vv.5–12), but increasingly they came to recognize him for who he was (see comment on 14:33). In this section, Peter recognizes Jesus as the Messiah by revelation, not by signs. That Jesus is the Messiah leads inexorably to his self-disclosure as the suffering Messiah (vv.21–23), a theme anticipated earlier (see comment on 8:17).

13 Caesarea Philippi was built by Herod Philip the tetrarch (cf. 2:20, 22), who enlarged a small town at the base of Mount Hermon. At that place, Jesus asks the disciples who he, the Son of Man (see comment on Mk 8:31), is.

14 Opinion on Jesus' identity was divided. Some thought he was John the Baptist risen from the dead—Herod Antipas's view (14:2). Those who thought he was Elijah saw him as forerunner to a Messiah still to come (see comment on 11:9–10). Only Matthew mentions Jeremiah, the largest of the major prophets in the Hebrew canon (cf. comment on 27:9). "One of the prophets" testifies to the diversity of eschatological expectations in Jesus' day, some of the people expecting a long series of prophetic forerunners. But no group was openly and thoughtfully confessing Jesus as Messiah.

15–16 The "you" is emphatic and plural (v.15). Therefore, at least in part, Peter serves as spokesman for the Twelve (as he often does: cf. 15:15–16; 19:25–28; 26:40). Peter confesses that Jesus is the Christ, i.e., the Messiah (see comment on 1:1).

The Synoptic Gospels show us that the disciples understand only by degrees (see comments on 14:33; 16:17). One of the marks of the gospel writers' fidelity to the historical development of the disciples' understanding of Christ lies precisely in this—that they show the disciples coming around to the same points again and again, each time with a deeper level of comprehension, but always with a mixture of apprehension.

17 Jesus calls Peter "blessed" (see comment on 5:3). Jesus is the "Son of the living God" (v.16); Peter is the "son of Jonah." Jesus' Father has revealed to Peter the truth he has just confessed. Indeed, no one knows the Son except the Father (11:27), who has now graciously revealed his identity to Peter. Such knowledge could not have originated in "flesh and blood"—a Jewish expression referring to a mortal human being (cf. 1Co 15:50).

On the other hand, we need not suppose that the idea that Jesus was Messiah entered the apostles' minds for the first time here (cf. 11:2–6). John's witness is surely sound: the disciples began following Jesus in the hope that he was the Messiah (Jn 1:41, 45, 49). But their understanding of the nature of his messiahship was hindered by their own expectations (see comments on v.22; Mk 1:44); and they did not come into a full "Christian" understanding until after Easter. This verse marks a crucial stage along that growth in understanding and faith. Partial as it was, Peter's firm grasp of the fact that Jesus is the Messiah set him apart from the uncertainty and confusion of the crowd and could only be the result of the Father's disclosure. Indeed, the depth of Peter's conviction was the very thing that simultaneously made talk of Jesus' suffering and death difficult to integrate and yet prevented more serious defection when the one confessed as Messiah went to his death on a Roman cross.

18 Peter was an accepted name in Jesus' day (see comment on 4:18; see also Jn 1:42), and Jesus makes a pun on the name. The word "Peter" (petros, meaning "rock"; GK 4377) is masculine, and in Jesus' follow-up statement he uses the feminine word petra (GK 4376). On the basis of this change, many have attempted to avoid identifying Peter as the rock on which Jesus builds his church. Yet if it were not for Protestant reactions against extremes of Roman Catholic interpretation, it is doubtful whether many would have taken "rock" to be anything or anyone other than Peter. If Jesus spoke Aramaic here, there is no distinction in "Cephas."

But none of this requires that conservative Roman Catholic views be endorsed. The text says nothing about Peter's successors, infallibility, or exclusive authority. What the NT does show is that Peter was the first to make this formal confession and that his prominence continued in the earliest years of the church (Ac 1–12). But he, with John, could be sent by other apostles (Ac 8:14); and he was held accountable for his actions by the Jerusalem church (Ac 11:1–18) and was rebuked by Paul (Gal 2:11–14). He was, in short, primus inter pares ("first among equals"); and on the foundation of such men (Eph 2:20), Jesus built his church. That is precisely why Jesus, toward the close of his earthly ministry, spent so much time with them. The honor was not earned but stemmed from divine revelation (v.17) and Jesus' building work (v.18).

The word "church" (ekklesia; GK 1711) occurs only here and at 18:17 in the Gospels.

It is derived from the verb ekkaleo ("to call out") and refers to those who are "called out." In the NT ekklesia usually refers to a Christian congregation or to all God's people redeemed by Christ (in Ac 7:38, it refers to God's OT people). Acknowledged as Messiah, Jesus responds that he will build his ekklesia, his people, his church. Implicitly, then, this verse embraces a claim to messiahship, for a Messiah without a messianic people is unthinkable to any Jew. They are the people of the "new covenant" (26:28).

19 The promise about the "keys of the kingdom" goes beyond the days of Jesus' earthly ministry. What Jesus' disciples thought this meant at the time is uncertain. Perhaps they hoped that when Jesus established his earthly reign and defeated the Romans, they would hold major posts under his reign. In the postresurrection period, however, the nature of this inaugurated kingdom became progressively clearer.

The metaphor changes from "church" to "kingdom." The person with "the keys" (GK 3090) has power to exclude or permit entrance (cf. Rev 9:1–6; 20:1–3). This is then linked with the idea of "binding" (GK 1313) and "loosing" (GK 3395). It is best to understand this concept by recognizing first that Peter, by proclaiming "the good news of the kingdom" (4:23), opens the kingdom to many and shuts it against many (e.g., Ac 2:14–39; 3:11–26). By this means the Lord adds to the church those who are being saved, or, otherwise put, Jesus builds his church (Mt 16:18). But the same Gospel proclamation alienates and excludes people, so we also find Peter shutting up the kingdom from some (Ac 4:11–12; 8:20–23). Peter is authoritative in binding and loosing only because heaven has acted first (cf. Ac 18:9–10). Those he ushers in or excludes have already been bound or loosed by God according to the Gospel already revealed, which Peter, by confessing Jesus as the Messiah, has most clearly grasped.

Does this promise apply to Peter only, to the apostolic band, or to the church at large? The disciples were called to be fishers of men (4:19), to be salt (5:13) and light (5:14–16), to preach the good news of the kingdom (10:6–42), and, after the Resurrection, to disciple the nations and teach them all that Jesus commanded (28:18–20). In one sense Peter stands with the other disciples as one who received the Great Commission (in v.20, Jesus warns all his disciples, not just Peter, to tell no one). In that sense the disciples stand as paradigms for all believers during this period of redemptive history. But this fact does not exclude a special role for Peter or the apostles (see comment on v.18). Peter was the foundation; he enjoyed this "salvation-historical primacy."

Confirmation that this is the way 16:19 is to be taken comes at 18:18. If the church has to exercise the ministry of the keys, if it must bind and loose, then clearly one aspect of that task will be the discipline of those who profess to constitute it. Thus the two passages are tightly joined: 18:18 is a special application of 16:19. If we may judge from Paul's ministry, this discipline is a special function of apostles, but also of elders and even of the whole church (1Co 5:1–13; 2Co 13:10; Tit 2:15; 3:10–11). The continuity of the church depends as much on discipline as on truth. Indeed, faithful promulgation of the latter both entails and presupposes the former.

20 Jesus' warning his disciples not to tell anyone that he was the Christ does not stem from personal reluctance to accept the title. Rather, it must be seen in the context that he steadily refused to make an explicit messianic claim and to bow to demands for a definitive sign (12:38–39; 16:4). The disciples are now charged with the same reticence. Having come to faith, they must go beyond the Master himself in the means and limitations of his self-disclosure (see comment on Mk 8:29–30).

b. The first passion prediction (16:21–23)

21 This is not the first time Jesus alludes to his death (see 9:15; 10:38; 12:40; cf. Jn 2:19; 3:14), but now he begins to discuss it openly with his disciples. The time for symbols and veiled language was largely over, now that they had recognized him as Messiah.

The prediction is remarkably detailed. Jesus must go to Jerusalem, though the "must" (GK 1256) of Jesus' suffering lies not in unqualified determinism, nor in heroic determination (though some of both are present), but in willing submission to his Father's will. At Jerusalem, the killer of prophets (23:37), he will suffer many things (more details specified in 20:19) at the hands of the elders, chief priests, and teachers of the law—the three groups that largely constituted the Sanhedrin (see comment on 3:7). There he would be killed and rise again the third day (see comment on 12:40).

How much of Jesus' sayings about his death did the disciples understand before the event? The Gospel evidence points in two complementary directions. On the one hand, the disciples understood perfectly well; otherwise, for instance, Peter could not possibly have rebuked Jesus (*v.*22). On the other hand, they could not believe that Messiah would really be killed because their conceptions of the Messiah did not allow for a Suffering Servant. Therefore Peter dared to rebuke Jesus, and the disciples began to think Jesus' predictions of his sufferings must be in some way nonliteral (Mk 9:10; Lk 9:45; see comment on Mt 17:4).

22 Peter's rebuke reveals how little he understood the kind of messiahship Jesus had in mind. He used strong language: "Never, Lord! This shall never happen to you!" Peter's strong will and warm heart linked to his ignorance produced a shocking bit of arrogance. He confessed that Jesus was the Messiah and then spoke in a way implying that he knew more of God's will than the Messiah did himself.

23 Jesus then turned toward Peter to rebuke him. The rebuke is made up of three parts. (1) "Get behind me, Satan!" (cf. 4:10) means not that Peter should get out of Jesus' sight, but out of Jesus' way. (2) A few moments earlier Jesus had called Peter a rock. Now he calls him a different kind of "rock," a "stumbling block" (GK 4998). As Satan offered Jesus kingship without suffering (4:8–9), so Peter does the same, adopting current expectations of victorious messianic conquest. Jesus recognizes the same diabolical source behind the same temptation. The notion of a suffering Messiah, misunderstood by Peter so that he became a stumbling block to Jesus, itself becomes, after the Resurrection, a stumbling block to other Jews (1Co 1:23). (3) Peter was not thinking God's thoughts (i.e., that Jesus must go to Jerusalem and die, v.21), but human thoughts (i.e., that he must not go). In vv.13–17 Peter, unlike other people, did think God's thoughts because divine revelation was given him. Here, however, he has switched sides.

In summary of vv.13–23, Peter both did and did not understand the truth about Jesus. Along with the other disciples, he understood much more than the crowds; yet even so he did not reach full understanding until after the Resurrection. The juxtaposition of vv.13–20 and vv.21–23 clearly shows the (at best) qualified understanding of Jesus' disciples at this point in salvation history.

12. The way of discipleship (16:24–28)

This section does two things: (1) after the passion prediction in vv.21–23, it demands the disciples' willingness to deny themselves absolutely, a kind of death to self; (2) yet it assures us that the consummated kingdom will at last come.

24 Though addressed to Jesus' "disciples" (see comment on 5:1–2), the thought is expressed in widest terms—"if anyone." As in 10:33, Jesus speaks of "disowning" or "renouncing" oneself. The Jews renounced the Messiah (Ac 3:14); his followers renounce themselves (cf. Ro 14:7–9; 15:2–3). They "take up their cross" (see comment on 10:38). Though Jesus does not explicitly mention the mode of his death until a few days before it takes place (20:19), the impact of this saying must have multiplied after Golgotha. Death to self is not so much a prerequisite of discipleship to Jesus as a continuing characteristic of it.

25–26 For the sense of v.25, see comment on 10:39. Verse 26 furthers the argument by asking twin rhetorical questions, showing the folly of possessing all created abundance and wealth at the expense of one's "soul." The focus is eschatological, and the loss of one's soul is the eternal loss of one's life or self.

27 Not only Jesus' example, but the judgment he will exercise is an incentive to take up one's cross and follow him. The Son of Man (see comment on Mk 8:31) will come "in his Father's glory"—the same glory God his Father enjoys (cf. Mt 26:64; Jn 17:1–5)—along with his angels. At that time he will reward each person "according to what he has done "(cf. Ps 62:12; see comment on 5:12).

28 For the interpretation of this verse, see comments on 10:23 and Mk 9:1. It seems best to take this verse as having a general reference to the manifestation of Christ's kingly reign exhibited after the Resurrection in a host of ways, not the least of them being the rapid multiplication of disciples and the mission to the Gentiles. Some of those standing there would live to see Jesus' Gospel proclaimed throughout the Roman Empire and a rich "harvest" (cf. 9:37–38) of converts reaped for Jesus Messiah. This interpretation best suits the flexibility of the "kingdom" concept in the Synoptic Gospels (see comment on 3:2; 12:28) and the present context. Thus v.28 does not refer to the same thing as 10:23. At this point in salvation history it is the power of the kingdom working through Jesus' disciples that calls the church into being (see comments on 13:36–43).

13. The Transfiguration (17:1–13)

a. Jesus transfigured (17:1–8)

The narrative of the Transfiguration is clearly a major turning point in Jesus' self-disclosure; we must understand this story without allegorizing the passage.

1 The "six days" probably indicates the time it took to travel from Caesarea Philippi (16:13) to the high mountains (17:1); that is, the Transfiguration took place within a few days of the prediction that Jesus must go to Jerusalem and be killed. The two passages must therefore be read together. On the identity of the mountain, see comments on Mk 9:2; Lk 9:28. Those Jesus "took with him" were Peter, James, and John, the inner circle of the Twelve.

2 Moses' face shone because it reflected something of God's glory (Ex 34:29–30). But Jesus himself was "transfigured" (GK 3565), a word that suggests a change of inmost nature that may be outwardly visible (as here) or quite invisible (Ro 12:2; 2Co 3:18). That Jesus was transfigured "before them" implies that it was largely for their sakes. As they would come to realize, they were being privileged to glimpse something of his preincarnate glory (Jn 1:14; 17:5; Php 2:6–7) and anticipate his coming exaltation (2Pe 1:16–18; Rev 1:16). Their confession of Jesus as Messiah and his insistence that he would be a suffering Messiah (16:13–21; 17:9) were confirmed. Therefore they had reason to hope that they would yet see the Son of Man coming in his kingdom (16:28).

3 On the significance of the appearance of Moses and Elijah, see comments on Mk 9:4; Lk 9:30–31. While both Moses and Elijah experienced God's glory (Ex 31:18; 1Ki 19:8–13), the glory here is Jesus' personal glory, for it is he who is transfigured and who radiates the glory of the Deity.

4 Peter, sensing something of the greatness of what he, James, and John are seeing, suggests building three "tabernacles" ("shelters"; GK 5008). While the word looks back to the tabernacle in the wilderness, the forerunner of the temple, the idea of building "tabernacles" also reflects the Feast of Tabernacles, when Jews built shelters for themselves and lived in them for seven days (cf. Lev 23:42–43). That feast had eschatological overtones. So Peter may have been saying that in gratitude for witnessing Jesus' transfiguration and recognizing the imminent dawn of the Messianic Age, he would build three "tabernacles"—one for Jesus, one for Moses, and one for Elijah.

The rebuke that follows is administered solely because what Peter blurted out compromised Jesus' uniqueness. Jesus was transfigured; they must bear witness concerning him (see also comments on Mk 9:5; Lk 9:33).

5 The "cloud" (GK 3749) signifies the presence of God, as it did in the OT (Ex 13:21–22; 40:34–38): it was also associated with the future (Isa 4:5; Eze 30:3; Zep 1:15). Jesus is now succeeding Moses as the coming prophet (Dt. 18:15, 18) and is the messianic King whose kingdom is dawning. What the Voice from the cloud says is largely a repetition of 3:17, an apparent mingling of Ps 2:7 and Isa 42:1, stressing that Jesus is both Son and Suffering Servant. This is the high point of the story.

The additional words "Listen to him"—an allusion to Dt 18:15—confirm Jesus is the Prophet like Moses (cf. Ac 3:22–23; 7:37). Jesus is not another prophet of Moses' stature but the eschatological Prophet patterned on Moses as a type. Jesus so far outstrips him that when Moses is put next to him, people must "listen" to Jesus. The climax of biblical revelation is Jesus, the Son and Servant God loves and with whom God is well pleased.

6–8 The effect of the Transfiguration on the disciples reminds us of Daniel (Da 10:7–9). The visible glory of Deity brings terror, but Jesus calms his disciples' fears (cf. 14:26–27).

Matthew alone tells us that at the divine splendor the disciples "fell facedown to the ground," a prelude to their seeing no one "except Jesus." These words are pregnant with meaning: compared with God's revelation through Christ, all other revelations pale.

b. The place of Elijah (17:9–13)

9 This is Jesus' fifth and last command in Matthew for the disciples to be silent (see comment on 8:4). This time Jesus permits his disciples to tell everything after the Son of Man "has been raised from the dead." Jesus could scarcely have attached this permission to earlier warnings to keep silent (16:20), since he had not yet spoken clearly about his sufferings and death. Nevertheless the same salvation-historical change—first silence, then proclamation—occurs as early as 10:27.

Why did Jesus command silence here? (1) The story would only stir up superficial political messianism, already a menace (see comment on Mk 1:44). (2) The strongest evidence for Jesus' messiahship would be his resurrection, by which he "was declared with power to be the Son of God" (Ro 1:4). Premature self-disclosure in a direct fashion, without the supreme "sign of Jonah," the Resurrection (see comment on 12:40), would not only foster false expectations but would also quickly disillusion those who held them. Thus Jesus knew it was better to wait till after the Resurrection before allowing Peter, James, and John to tell what they had seen.

10 Elijah was expected to restore all things—to bring about a state of justice and true worship (Mal 4:5). If that were so, how could it be that Messiah would be killed in such a restored environment—killed, Jesus had told them only a week before, by elders, chief priests, and teachers of the law (16:21)? Their confusion is not merely chronological, though that may be involved; it is their inability to find a framework in which they can believe that the Messiah could die.

11–12 Jesus answers the concerns of his disciples. On the one hand, Elijah comes first and "will restore all things"; John's mission was a success (3:5–6; 14:5). On the other hand, "restore all things" must not be taken absolutely. The Baptist (Elijah) did fulfill his mission, but he was killed doing it. "In the same way the Son of Man is going to suffer at their hands." If the Baptist's restoration of "all things" did not prevent his own death, why should Messiah be any better received?

13 Matthew again rounds off a section by returning to the question first raised (see comment on 15:20); they now understand that John the Baptist is Elijah. It is not at all clear, however, that they have understood much more about the death and resurrection of the Son of Man, and it becomes obvious during the passion narrative that they have not understood (cf. esp. 26:50–56). This section, therefore, marks another step, but a small one, in the understanding of Jesus' disciples.

14. The healing of an epileptic boy (17:14–20)

14–16 When Jesus returned to the other nine disciples he is approached by a man with an epileptic son. "Epilepsy" in this instance is associated with demon possession (see comment on 8:28). The disciples had not been able to heal him.

The disciples' failures are a recurring theme throughout this section (14:16–21, 26–27, 28–31; 15:16, 23, 33; 16:5, 22: 17:4, 10–11). This failure in their healing ministry at first seems strange, since Jesus had clearly given them power to heal and exorcise demons (10:1, 8). Yet it is part of the pattern of the disciples' advance and failure. In other situations they had shown lack of faith (14:26–27, 31; 15:5, 8)—a reminder that their power to do kingdom miracles was not their own but, unlike magic, was entirely derivative and related to their own walk of faith.

17–18 Jesus' response is reminiscent of Dt 32:5, 20. He notes that unbelief is characteristic of "this generation" (GK 1155)—a word that extends Jesus' excoriation beyond the disciples (cf. also 11:16; 12:39–42; 16:4; et al.). Juxtaposing "perverse" and "unbelieving" to this generation implies that the failure to believe stems from willful neglect or distortion of the evidence.

The rhetorical questions—"How long shall I stay with you? How long shall I put up with you?"—express not only Jesus' personal disappointment but also his consciousness of his heavenly origin and destiny. His disciples' perverse unbelief is actually painful to him; he must endure it. As for the miracle, Matthew describes it succinctly, leaving no doubt of Jesus' power to heal and exorcise demons (v.18). The boy is healed "from that moment."

19–20 The disciples who had tried and failed to drive out the demon (v.16) ask Jesus, in private (cf. also Mk 9:28), why they could not do the miracle. The reason, Jesus says, is because of their "little faith." The disciples had long been successful in doing miracles, and now they are surprised by their failure. But their faith is poor and shoddy. They are treating the authority given them (10:1, 8) like a gift of magic, a bestowed power that works ex opere operato. Poor faith is ineffectual (see also 6:30; 8:26; 14:31; 16:8). Removal of mountains was proverbial for overcoming great difficulties (cf. Isa 40:4; 49:11; 54:10; Mt 21:21–22; 1Co 13:2; et al.). Nothing would be impossible for them, and they could accomplish great works for the kingdom with sincere faith and prayer.

15. The second major passion prediction (17:22–23)

22–23 No sooner are all the disciples and Jesus together after the Transfiguration than Jesus for a second time takes up the theme he introduced to them earlier (see comments on 16:21–23). Jesus not only foresees the inevitability of his death but, precisely because he knows this to be the Father's will (26:39), recognizes it as an essential part of the divine plan. But that death issues in the Resurrection. On the word "betrayed" (GK 4140), see comment on Mk 9:31. The disciples are beginning to absorb the announcement of Jesus' death, and it grieves them. But of his resurrection they have no comprehension.

16. The temple tax (17:24–27)

24 "The two-drachma tax" was probably not a civil tax in support of Rome (cf. 22:15–22) but a Jewish "tax" of half a shekel levied on every male Jew between the ages of twenty and fifty in support of the tabernacle (later, the temple) and its services (cf. Ex 30:11–16). In Jesus' day two drachmas equaled half a shekel.

25–26 Peter's defense of Jesus is misguided. Once they are alone in the house, Jesus takes the initiative and asks Peter a provocative question about a civil tax. It is best to see these two verses as a parable. The point is that, just as royal sons are exempt from the taxes imposed by their fathers, so too Jesus is exempt from the "tax" imposed by his Father. In other words Jesus acknowledges the temple tax to be an obligation to God; but since he is uniquely God's Son, he is exempt. The focus of the section is thus supremely Christological.

27 Exempt though he is, Jesus will pay the tax so as not to offend. Thus he sets an example later followed by Paul (1Co 8:13; 9:12, 22). The plural "we" and the four-drachma coin to pay for Jesus and Peter at first sight makes the above interpretation seem difficult. In what sense are we to suppose that Peter's reason for paying the tax is akin to Jesus'? Part of the explanation may lie in the freedom Jesus extends to his disciples: e.g., he alone is Lord of the Sabbath, and this has implications for his disciples (see comments on 12:1–8). More important, Jesus here implicitly frees his followers from the temple tax on the grounds that they, too, will belong to the category of "sons," though derivatively.

The miraculous way of paying the tax is something only Jesus could do; it therefore suggests that though Jesus as the unique Son is free from the law's demands, he not only submits to them but makes provision, as only he can, for the demands on his disciples (cf. Gal 4:4–5)—and this right after a passion prediction (17:22–23)! Perhaps, too, we are reminded again of Jesus' humility: he who so controls nature and its powers that he stills storms and multiplies food now reminds Peter of that power by this miracle, while nevertheless remaining so humble that he would not needlessly cause offense (cf. 11:28–30; 12:20). This lesson in humility for Peter and the other disciples is about to be explained in some detail (18:1–35).

B. Fourth Discourse: Life Under Kingdom Authority (18:1–19:2)

1. Setting (18:1–2)

1–2 This fourth discourse, like the previous three, is bracketed by remarks suggesting that it was delivered on the occasion specified (see comments on 5:1; 7:28–29). When Jesus speaks again of his suffering and death, the disciples' grief (17:23) proves short-lived; and they busy themselves with arguing about who is greatest in the kingdom. Jesus has already said that there will be distinctions in the kingdom (5:19); and recently three of them have been specially favored (17:1–3), while Peter has been repeatedly singled out (14:28–29; 15:15; 16:16–18). Perhaps these things set off the dispute, which continues in the ambition of James, John, and their mother in the period right before the Cross (20:20–23) and which embraces the jealousy of the other ten (20:24). Substantial misunderstanding of Jesus by his disciples (see comment on 5:1–2) is presupposed throughout Jesus' entire earthly ministry.

2. Humility and greatness (18:3–4)

3–4 Jesus responds by warning his disciples that they must turn from their present conduct and attitudes and "become like little children"; for unless they do, they will "never enter the kingdom of heaven" (the consummated kingdom is in view here). The child is held up as an ideal, not of innocence, purity, or faith, but of humility and unconcern for social status. Jesus advocates humility of mind (v.4), not childishness of thought (cf. 10:16). With such humility comes childlike trust. The person who truly "humbles himself [GK 5427] like this child is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven": the expression completes a link with v.1. The thought is not far removed from 5:3 and vitiates any thought that the kingdom can be gained by personal merit or violent force (see comment on 11:12). It is to "little children" (GK 4086) that the Lord of heaven and earth reveals his truth (cf. 11:25).

3. The heinousness of causing believers to sin (18:5–9)

5–6 This promise-warning couplet advances the thought by turning attention from the self-humiliation of the true disciple (vv.3–4) to the way others receive such "little ones" (GK 3625). The opening clauses of v.5 and v.6 are roughly parallel. The one who welcomes "a little child like this in my name" is not welcoming literal children but "children" defined in the previous verses—those who humble themselves to become like children and are Jesus' true disciples (cf. "who believe in me" in v.6). They are not welcomed because they are great, wise, or mighty, but because they come in Jesus' name (v.5). These "little ones" can stumble, even the greatest of them (14:28–31; 26:30–35); but whoever causes them to stumble stands in grave peril. The people most subject to Jesus' judgment here are people of the world (cf. v.7).

The person who "welcomes" (GK 1312) one of these "little ones" welcomes Jesus himself (cf. 10:42). Presupposed here is the world's animosity. Mere hospitality is not in view but hospitality given because of the "little ones'" link with Jesus; and it is probably presupposed that hospitality motivated in this way would be shown only if the benefactor were already well disposed toward Jesus, or at least moving in that direction. The antithetic alternative, causing the "little ones" to stumble, does not mean that the "little ones" are led into apostasy. Rather, they are rejected or ignored, which causes them to stumble in their discipleship. It may lead to serious sin; but, as in 10:40–42 and 25:31–46, the really grave aspect of the rejection is that it signifies a rejection of Jesus.

Because such estimates signal both a rejection of Jesus and a damaging of his people, drowning at sea before the evil is committed is much preferable to eschatological judgment, the eternal fire of hell (vv. 8–9) that awaits the perpetrators (see comments on Mk 9:42–49).

7 Jesus proclaims judgment on the "world" (GK 3180), understood as the source of all stumbling. Jesus pronounces this woe "because of the things that cause" the stumbling already referred to in v.6. Such things must come; but this inevitability does not mitigate the responsibility of the perpetrators. The necessity does not spring from divine compulsion but, like all things, falls nonetheless within the sphere of his sovereignty, so that he may use those very things to accomplish his plan and perfect his people (cf. 24:10–13; 1Co 11:19). Thus, on the one hand the disciples are not to think such opposition strange, for Jesus himself has declared it must occur; on the other hand they are assured that justice will be done in the end (cf. 26:24).

8–9 Jesus now abandons denunciation of the world's causing his disciples to stumble and tells his disciples they may prove to be not only victims but aggressors. Certain attitudes nurtured by them toward other believers could also be sinful; thus, instead of being enticed to sin by outsiders, they would cause their own stumbling. Perhaps the particular believer-to-believer attitude that most needs rooting out is pride; thus vv.8–9 prepare for v.10.

4. The parable of the lost sheep (18:10–14)

10 This verse continues the note of humility struck at the discourse's beginning (vv.3–4) and the concern for "these little ones" (vv.5–9). Jesus is discussing here what will be normative when his passion and resurrection fully inaugurate the messianic community. Its members will be poor in spirit (5:3) and humble (18:3–4), and none will be admitted without these graces. If his disciples become like that, they will belong to the "little children"; if they look down on them, they will share in the woes (vv.8–9). The warning was not irrelevant: at least one disciple left Jesus.

Jesus says that those who believe in him must be treated with respect because "their angels in heaven" always see the face of the heavenly Father. These "angels" are best interpreted as the spirit of believers after death, and they always see the heavenly Father's face. Can the word "angel" (GK 34) be pressed into this interpretation? Yes, for Jesus teaches that God's people in the Resurrection "will be like the angels in heaven" as to marriage (22:30) and immortality (Lk 20:36).

12–13 Jesus now gives another reason not to despise these "little ones": the shepherd—the Father—is concerned for each sheep in his flock and seeks the one who strays. His concern for the one wandering sheep is so great that he rejoices more over its restoration than over the ninety-nine that do not stray. With a God like that, how dare anyone cause even one of these sheep to go astray?

14 Jesus drives the lesson home: the heavenly Father is unwilling for any of "these little ones" (see comment on vv.3–6) to be lost. If that is his will, why would anyone else seek to lead one of them astray? God loves each individual sheep, so that the flock as a whole may not lose a single one of its members. On God's preservation of his own, see comments on 12:32; 13:3–9, 18–23.

5. Treatment of a sinning brother (18:15–20)

15 Now the thought shifts. Jesus is looking at offenses within the messianic community from the opposite perspective—from the viewpoint of the brother against whom the sin is committed. The proper thing is to confront the brother privately and "show him his fault." The aim is not to score points over him but to win him over (GK 3045; cf. 1Co 9:19–22; 1Pe 3:1), for all discipline, even this private kind, must begin with redemptive purposes (cf. Lk 17:3–4; 2Th 3:14–15; Jas 5:19–20). Jesus assumes that the individual who personally confronts a brother will do so with true humility (vv.3–4; cf. Gal 6:1): if it is hard to accept a rebuke, even a private one, it is harder still to administer one in loving humility. Behind this verse stands Lev 19:17.

16 If private confrontation does not work, the next step (backed by regulation regarding civil cases in Dt 19:15) is to take two or three witnesses. Jesus perceives a link joining his messianic community with ancient Israel. The function of the witnesses is likely to provide witnesses to the confrontation if the case were to go before the whole church. By the united testimony of two or three witnesses, every matter "may be established."

17 Refusal to submit to the considered judgment of Messiah's people means that they are to treat the offender as "a pagan or a tax collector." The flow of the argument and the NT parallels (e.g., Ro 16:17; 2Th 3:14) show that Jesus has excommunication in mind. Since "you" is singular, Jesus is suggesting that each member of the church is to abide by the corporate judgment and reminds the disciple of the individual responsibility each believer has toward the others (cf. v.15).

18 For discussion of this verse, see comments on 16:19.

19–20 These two verses should not in this setting be taken as a promise regarding any prayer on which two or three believers agree. Scripture is rich in prayer promises (21:22; Jn 14:13–14; 15:7–8, 16); but if this passage deals with prayer at all, it is restricted by the phrase "about anything" (lit., "about any judicial matter"). Perhaps Jesus is also saying that if two individuals in the church come to agreement concerning any claim they are pursuing (presumably on the basis of the church's judgment, v.18), it will be allowed or ratified by their heavenly Father. This is because God's will and purpose stand behind the binding and loosing of v.18 and also because

(cf. "for," v.20) the presence of Jesus is assured with the two or three judges solemnly convened before the church and by the church to render a decision.

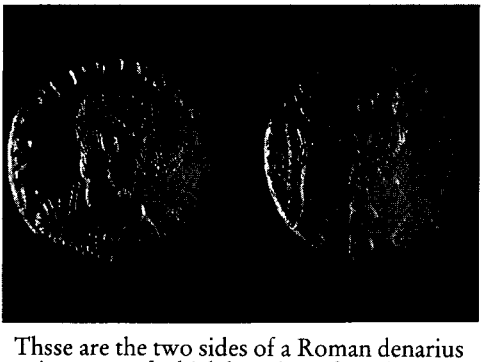
Here as elsewhere, Jesus takes God's place: he will be with the judges (cf. 28:20). Jesus implicitly points forward to a time when, as "God with us" (1:23), he will be spiritually present with the "two or three" and with all his followers; and he presupposes that this time will be of considerable duration (see comment on 24:1–3).

6. Forgiveness (18:21–35)

a. Repeated forgiveness (18:21–22)

21–22 The issue here is not the adjudication of the church, still less the absolute granting of forgiveness by the church (only God and Jesus can ultimately forgive sins), but personal forgiveness (cf. 6:14–15). In rabbinic discussion, the consensus was that a person might be forgiven a repeated sin three times; on the fourth, there was no forgiveness. Peter, thinking himself big-hearted, volunteers "seven times" in answer to his own question.

Jesus' response alludes to Ge 4:24: Lamech's revenge is transformed into a principle of forgiveness. Jesus is not saying that seventy-seven times is the upper limit, nor that the forgiveness is so unqualified that it vitiates the discipline and procedural step just taught (vv.15–20). Rather, he teaches that forgiveness of fellow members in his community of "little ones" (see comment on vv.5–6) cannot possibly be limited by frequency or quantity; for, as the ensuing parable shows (vv.23–35), all of them have been forgiven far more than they will ever forgive.



b. The parable of the unmerciful servant (18:23–35)

23 Since Jesus requires his followers to forgive, he goes on to tell a parable about the present kingdom. The reign of God establishes certain kinds of personal relationships, portrayed by this parable, whose point is spelled out in v.35. Jesus has just been discussing the question of repeated, personal forgiveness (vv.21–22) and the reasons for it. Those in the kingdom serve a great king who has invariably forgiven far more than they can ever forgive one another. Therefore failure to forgive excludes one from the kingdom, whose pattern is to forgive.

24–27 We glimpse some idea of the size of the indebtedness when we recall that David donated three thousand talents of gold and seven thousand talents of silver for the construction of the temple, and the princes provided five thousand talents of gold and ten thousand talents of silver (1Ch 29:4, 7). Such indebtedness could not possibly be covered by selling the family into slavery: top price for a slave fetched about one talent, and one-tenth that amount or less was more common. The practice of being sold for debt was sanctioned by the OT (Lev 25:39; 2Ki 4:1), though such slaves had to be freed in the year of Jubilee.

In this parable selling the slave and his family does not mean the debt is canceled but rather highlights the servant's desperate plight. With neither resources nor hope, he begs for time and promises to pay everything back (v.26)—an impossibility. So the master takes pity on him and cancels the indebtedness (v.27). The king mercifully then decides to look on the loss as a bad loan rather than embezzlement.

28–31 The servant's attitude is appalling. The amount owed him is not insignificant: though worth but a few dollars in terms of metal currency, it represented a hundred days' wages for a foot soldier or common laborer. Yet the amount is utterly trivial compared with what has already been forgiven him. The similarity of his fellow servant's plea (v.29) to his own (v.26) does not move this unforgiving man, and he has him thrown into a debtor's prison (v.30). Even an inexpensive slave sold for five hundred denarii, and it was illegal to sell a man for a sum greater than his debt. But the other servants

Thsse are the two sides of a Roman denarius coin, many of which have been found in Palestine.

(v.31), deeply distressed by the inequity, tell the master everything.

32–34 The king now calls the servant whom he had forgiven "wicked" (v.32) and, forgoing selling him, turns him over to the "torturers" (cf. vv.6, 8–9). He is to be tortured till he pays back all he owes (v.34), which he can never do.

35 Jesus sees no incongruity in the actions of a heavenly Father who forgives so bountifully and punishes so ruthlessly, and neither should we. Indeed, it is precisely because he is a God of such compassion and mercy that he cannot possibly accept as his those devoid of such compassion and mercy. This is not to say that the king's compassion can be earned: far from it, the servant was granted freedom only by virtue of the king's forgiveness. As in 6:12, 14–15, those who are forgiven must forgive, lest they show themselves incapable of receiving forgiveness.

7. Transitional conclusion: introduction to the Judean ministry (19:1–2)

1–2 As with Jesus' other discourses, Matthew concludes it with a formulaic saying (see comment on 7:28–29). Jesus "left" Galilee and began to make his way toward Jerusalem, most likely traveling by way of Perea, on the east side of the Jordan, thus avoiding Samaria.

The large crowds and the many healings show that Jesus did in Judea what he had already done in Galilee. But the summaries of his ministry in this gospel (cf. 4:23; 9:35; 14:14; 16:30), along with showing how busy Jesus was, clearly demonstrate that he engaged in both a word and a deed ministry; he was a prophet and a mighty healer.

VI. Opposition and Eschatology: The Triumph of Grace (19:3–26:5)

Certain themes in this section are crystallized. The opposition to Jesus becomes more heated and focused, and the stances of Jesus and the Jewish leaders become more irreconcilable. Jesus not only reveals more of himself and his mission to his disciples but centers more attention on the End, the consummation of the kingdom. Within these two poles, opposition and eschatology, the grace of God toward those under the kingdom becomes an increasingly dominant theme. Without ever using the word "grace," Matthew returns to this theme repeatedly (e.g., 19:21–22; 20:1–16). But grace does not mean there is no judgment (23:1–39). Rather, it means that despite the gross rejection of Jesus, the chronic unbelief of opponents, crowds, and disciples alike, and the judgment that threatens both within history and at the End, grace triumphs and calls out a messianic people who bow to Jesus' lordship and eagerly await his return.

A. Narrative (19:3–23:39)

1. Marriage and divorce (19:3–12)

3 This first section on divorce, always a burning issue in church and society, has produced much discussion among commentators.

Pharisees are often found in Matthew's gospel testing or opposing Jesus in some way (12:2, 14, 24; 15:1; 16:1; et al.). They hoped Jesus would say something to damage his reputation with the people or even seem to contradict Moses. Perhaps, too, they hoped that Jesus would say something that would entangle him in the Herod-Herodias affair so that he might meet the Baptist's fate (see 14:3–12).

The question whether it is right for a man to divorce his wife "for any and every reason" hides an enormous diversity of Jewish opinion. In Qumran community, divorce was judged illicit in all circumstances. Regarding mainstream Judaism, on any understanding of what Jesus says in the following verses, he did not agree completely with either the rabbinical school of Shammai or that of Hillel (see comments on v. 10; Mk 10:2).

The setting of the divorce question in this section is different from 5:31–32. There divorce is set in a discourse that gives the norms of the kingdom and the sanctity of marriage; here it is set in a theological disputation that raises the question of what divorces are allowed.

4–6 Jesus aligns himself with the prophet Malachi, who quotes the Lord as saying, "I hate divorce" (Mal 2:16), and also refers to the creation story. He cites Ge 1:27 and 2:24, implying that the two sexes should be united in marriage. The "one flesh" in every marriage between a man and a woman is a reenactment of and testimony to the very structure of humanity as God created it. Jesus concludes, then, that the husband and wife are no longer two but one, and that by God's doing (v.6). Divorce is therefore not only "unnatural" but rebellion against God.

Jesus' response sets forth two profound insights that must not be lost. (1) Although Jewish leaders tended to analyze adultery in terms, not of infidelity to one's spouse, but of taking someone else's wife, Jesus dealt with the sanctity of marriage by focusing on the God-ordained unity of the couple. (2) Jesus essentially appealed to the principle of Jewish exegesis: "The more original, the weightier." Since marriage is grounded in creation, in the way God has made us, then it cannot be reduced to a merely covenantal relationship that breaks down when the covenantal promises are broken. But the argument in this instance leaves unanswered the question of how the Mosaic law is to be taken; and therefore the stage is set for the Pharisees' next question.

7–8 The Pharisees refer to Dt 24:1–4, which they interpret to mean something like this: "If a man takes a wife . . . and she does not find favor in his eyes . . . he shall write a bill of divorce . . . and shall send her away from his house." But the Hebrew more naturally means something like this: "If a man takes a wife . . . and she does not find favor in his eyes . . . and he writes a bill of divorce . . . and he sends her away from his house . . . and her second husband does the same thing, then her first husband must not marry her again." In other words, Moses did not command divorce but permitted it, and the text is less concerned with explaining the nature of that indecency than with prohibiting remarriage of the twice-divorced woman to her first husband. Divorce and remarriage are therefore presupposed by Moses: i.e., he "permitted" them (v.8).

Jesus goes on to say that Moses' concession reflected not the true creation ordinance but the hardness of human hearts. Divorce is not part of the Creator's perfect design. If Moses permitted it, he did so because sin can be so vile that divorce is to be preferred to continued "indecency." This is not to say that the person who, according to what Moses said, divorced his spouse was actually committing sin in so doing; rather, that divorce could even be considered testified that there was already sin in the marriage. Therefore any view of divorce and remarriage (taught in either OT or NT) that sees the problem only in terms of what may or may not be done has already overlooked a basic fact—divorce is never to be thought of as a God-ordained, morally neutral option but as evidence of sin, of hardness of heart.

9 Jesus gives what is called his famous "exception clause" here. What is the meaning of porneia (NIV "marital unfaithfulness"; KJV "fornication"; GK 4518)? Some relate it to incest. Others have argued that it refers to premarital unchastity: if a man discovers his bride is not a virgin, he may divorce her. Still others hold that it means "adultery" here, no more and no less. Yet in Greek the normal word for adultery is moicheia (GK 3657). Matthew has already used moicheia and porneia in the same context (15:19), suggesting some distinction between the words.

It must be admitted that the word porneia itself is very broad. Occasionally it can refer to a specific kind of sexual sin, but only because the specific sexual sin belongs to the larger category of sexual immorality. Porneia covers the entire range of sexual sins and should not be restricted unless the context requires it.

Consequently, what Jesus seems to be saying is that divorce and remarriage always involve evil; but as Moses permitted it because of the hardness of human hearts, so also does he—but now on the sole grounds of porneia (sexual sin of any sort). Admittedly, Jesus would appear to be abrogating something of the Mosaic prescription; for whatever the general "something indecent" refers to in Dt 24:1, it can hardly refer to adultery, for which the prescribed punishment was death. But porneia includes adultery as a sexual sin, even if not restricted to it. Jesus' judgments on the matter are therefore both lighter (no capital punishment for adultery) and heavier (the sole exception being some form of sexual sin) than Moses.

In some ways, Jesus is doing the same thing here as he did in the Sermon on the Mount (5:21–48). He points out the true direction in which the Old Testament points (19:4–8), even though formally it may be abrogating a Mosaic command. It should also be noted that because marriage is referred to in sexual terms in Ge 2:24, sexual promiscuity is therefore a de facto exception. It may not necessitate divorce; but permission for divorce and remarriage under such circumstances, far from being inconsistent with Jesus' thought, is in perfect harmony with it.

10 The disciples were puzzled by Jesus' response (v.10) though they were not astonished (cf. v.25). Jesus, though not forbidding all divorce and remarriage, has come close to the school of Shammai on the grounds for exceptions, while taking a far more conservative stance than Shammai on who may remarry (Shammai permitted remarriage when the divorce was not in accordance with its own rules of conduct). In the light of the position, tacitly adopted by most Jews, that marriage was a duty, the disciples rather cynically conclude that such strictures surely make marriage unattractive. This makes the appeal of marriage contingent on liberal divorce and remarriage rights—a stance that fails miserably to understand what Jesus has said about the creation ordinance.

11–12 "This word" refers to the disciples' question in v.10 rather than Jesus' statements in vv.4–9. Jesus responds that not everyone can live by such a verdict, i.e., abstinence from marriage. But some do, namely, those to whom it is given—those born eunuchs, those made eunuchs by others, and those who have made themselves eunuchs because of the kingdom of God (i.e., those who have renounced marriage in light of the disciples' remark, "it is better not to marry"). Neither Jesus nor the apostles see celibacy as an intrinsically holier state than marriage (cf. 1Ti 4:1–3; Heb 13:4), nor as a condition for the top levels of ministry (Mt 8:14; 1Co 9:5), but as a special calling granted for greater usefulness in the kingdom (see 1Co 7:32–35). Those who impose this discipline on themselves must remember Paul's conclusion: it is better to marry than to burn with passion (1Co 7:9).

2. Blessing little children (19:13–15)

13 Children in Jesus' day were often brought to rabbis and elders to be blessed, customarily by placing hands on them (cf. Ge 48:14). The disciples rebuked the parents and others who were bringing their children. Why? Perhaps they were annoyed that Jesus was being delayed on his journey to Jerusalem, or they felt they were being interrupted in their important discussion. Although children in Judaism of the time were deeply cherished, they were thought in some ways to be negligible members of society: their place was to learn, to be respectful, and to listen.

14–15 Jesus did not want the little children prevented from coming to him, because the kingdom of heaven belongs to those like them. Jesus receives them because they are an excellent object lesson in the kind of humility and faith he finds acceptable (see 18:1–9). Furthermore, having just given an important lesson on the sanctity of marriage and family (vv.3–12), Jesus continues this by saying something important about children.

3. Wealth and the kingdom (19:16–30)

a. The rich young man (19:16–22)

16–17 A certain man—identified by all three evangelists as rich, by Matthew (v.20) as young, and by Luke (18:18) as a ruler—asks Jesus what he must do to inherit "eternal life." According to Matthew's version, the word "good" (GK 19) stands alone rather than modifies teacher (see Mk 10:17).

Irrespective of what "good" refers to, the man approaches Jesus with a question showing how far he is from the humble faith that characterizes all who belong to the kingdom (vv.13–15). He wants to earn eternal life; and in the light of v.20, he apparently thinks there are good things he can do, beyond the demands of the law, by which he can assure his salvation. Many Jews believed that a specific act of goodness could win eternal life; and this young man, assuming this opinion is correct, seeks Jesus' view as to what that act might be. Jesus responds by calling into question the man's inadequate understanding of goodness. In the absolute sense of goodness required to gain eternal life, only God is good (cf. Pss 106:1; 118:1, 29; et al.). Jesus will not allow anything other than God's will to determine what is good. This man reveals by his questions that he wants something beyond God's will (v.20) and that he misconstrues the absoluteness of God's goodness.

"If you want to enter life, obey the commandments" (v.17) does not mean that eternal life is earned by keeping God's laws. Jesus tells this man what good things he must do to gain eternal life precisely because he perceives this questioner does not understand the teaching that without a certain purity, one cannot inherit the kingdom (cf. 1Co 6:9–10). But that is still far from telling him that by doing these things he will earn eternal life.

18–20 Jesus lists the sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, and fifth commandments of Ex 20, in that order, and then adds, "Love your neighbor as yourself" (Lev 19:18). The man's impulsive reply is reflected by Paul (Php 3:6) on a certain understanding of the law; but the man's further words, "What do I still lack?" show his uncertainty and lack of assurance of ever being good enough for salvation, and they demonstrate his notion that certain "good works" are over and above the law.

21–22 Jesus answers the question in v.21. His basic thrust is not "Sell your possessions and give to the poor," but "Come, follow me." What Jesus suggests here is undivided loyalty and full-hearted obedience. This young man could not face that. He was willing to discipline himself to observe all the outward stipulations and even perform extra works; but because of his wealth, he had a divided heart. His money was competing with God; and what Jesus everywhere demands as a condition for eternal life is absolute, radical discipleship—the surrender of self.

Formally, of course, Jesus' demand goes beyond anything in OT law. Equally remarkable is the fact that the focus on God's will (vv.17–19) should culminate in following Jesus. The explanation of this is that Jesus is prophesied by the OT. The will of God, as revealed in Scripture, looks forward to the coming of Messiah (see comments on 2:15; 5:17–20; 11:11–13). Absolute allegiance to him, with the humility of a child, is essential to salvation. The condition Jesus now imposes not only reveals the man's attachment to money but shows that all his formal compliance with the law is worthless because none of it entails absolute self-surrender. What the man needs is the triumph of grace; for as the next verses show, for him entering the kingdom of heaven is impossible (v.26). God, with whom all things are possible, must work; the parable in 20:1–16 directly speaks to this issue. But the young man is deaf to it: he leaves because, if a choice must be made between money and Jesus, money wins (cf. 6:24).

b. Grace and reward in the kingdom (19:23–30)

23–24 Jesus is not saying that all poor people and none of the wealthy enter the kingdom of heaven. That would exclude Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, to say nothing of David, Solomon, and Joseph of Arimathea. The point of Jesus' teaching lies elsewhere. Most Jews expected the rich to inherit eternal life, not because their wealth could buy their way in, but because their wealth testified to the blessing of the Lord on their lives. Jesus' view is different and more sobering. The proverbial saying of v.24 refers to the absolutely impossible; the camel was the biggest animal in Palestine.

25–26 "Saved" (GK 5392) is equivalent to entering the kingdom of God (v.24) or obtaining eternal life (v.16). The disciples, reflecting the common Jewish view of the rich, are astonished and ask that if rich people, blessed of God, cannot be saved, then who can be? Jesus agrees: "With man this [the salvation of anyone] is impossible, but with God all things are possible" (v.26; cf. Ge 18:14; Job 42:2; Lk 1:37).

27–28 Peter, impressed by "impossible" and speaking for his fellow disciples, thinks Jesus' words are unfair to the Twelve. His statement suggests that he and the others are still thinking in terms of deserving or earning God's favor. Jesus does not castigate his disciples for being mercenary: they have made sacrifices and deserve an answer. But his statement that the blessing to come (whether belonging exclusively to the Twelve at the consummation of the kingdom [v.28] or to all believers now [vv.29–30]) far surpasses any sacrifice they might make, implies that Jesus is giving a gentle rebuke.

The remarkable feature of this verse is that the Twelve will "sit on twelve thrones," sharing judgment with the Son of Man. That believers will at the consummation have a part in judging is not uncommon in the NT (Lk 22:30; 1Co 6:2). Jesus' emphasis here, however, seems to be that the Twelve will someday judge the physical nation of Israel, presumably for its general rejection of Jesus Messiah.

29–30 Jesus now extends his encouragement to all his self-sacrificing disciples. The promise is not literal (one cannot have one hundred mothers). God is no one's debtor: if one of Jesus' disciples has, for Jesus' sake, left, say, a father, such a person will find within the messianic community a hundred who will be as a father to him or her—in addition to inheriting eternal life (v.29).

The proverbial saying of v.30 is one Jesus repeated on various occasions. Here he illustrates it by a parable (20:1–16), climaxed by the proverb in reverse form (20:16) as a closing bracket. It indicates something of the reversals that often occur in the kingdom of God. It sets forth God's grace over against all notions that the rich, powerful, great, and prominent will continue so in the kingdom. Those who approach God in childlike trust (vv.13–15) will be received and advanced in the kingdom beyond those who, from the world's perspective, enjoy prominence now.

4. The parable of the workers (20:1–16)

From this parable, we learn how "the last" person can become "first" (19:30)—by free grace. The parable begins with a typical scene and introduces atypical elements to surprise the reader and make a powerful point about the kingdom of heaven.

1–2 The normal working day was ten hours or so, not counting breaks. The landowner in the parable finds his first set of workers at about 6 A.M. and agrees to pay each one a denarius—the normal wage for a foot soldier or day laborer.

3–7 There were twelve "hours" from dawn to sundown. The third hour (v.3) would be about 9:00 A.M., the sixth about 12:00 noon., and the eleventh about 5:00 P.M. The marketplace would be the central square, where all kinds of business was done and casual labor hired. The third-hour workers are promised "whatever is right"; and, trusting the landowner's integrity, they work on that basis. The last group were standing around because no one had hired them.

8–12 Laborers were customarily paid at the end of each day (cf. Lev 19:13). The foreman is told to pay each worker the standard day-laborer's wage. Who gets paid first is crucial: it is only because the last hired receive a full day's wage that those first hired expect to get more than they bargained for. They "grumble against" the owner because he has been generous to others and merely just to them. They have borne "the heat of the day" (v.12, either direct sunlight or hot wind), which could drive workers from the field; and, though fairly paid, they feel unfairly treated because others who worked much less received what they did.

13–15 The landowner insists, in a mild rebuke, that he is not cheating anyone. He has paid the agreed wage. Should he want to pay others more, that is his business. Provided he has been just in all his dealings, does he not have the right to do what he wants with his money? These rhetorical questions (vv.13b–15) show that God's great gifts, simply because they are God's, are distributed, not because they are earned, but because he is gracious. In the kingdom of God, the driving force is not merit and ability (as in the world) but grace.

16 Jesus makes a final statement that God's grace makes some who are last first (see also comment on 19:30).

5. Third major passion prediction (20:17–19)

See comments on 16:21–23; 17:9, 22–23. Here there is the first mention of the mode of Jesus' death and of the Gentiles' part in it (only the Romans could crucify people). These three verses may look back to the preceding parable by implying the grounds of God's grace—i.e., what his Son did on the cross. Also, just as 19:13–15 sets the stage for 19:16–30, so 20:17–19 sets it for 20:20–28. While Jesus faces crucifixion, his disciples, still blind to the nature of his messiahship, squabble over their places in the kingdom.

17 Before setting out for Jerusalem, doubtless to attend the festival, Jesus took the Twelve aside from the throngs of pilgrims choking the roads to Jerusalem at such times. Only the Twelve were even remotely ready to hear this passion prediction.

18–19 Jerusalem was the focal point of Jewish worship. We are going there, Jesus says, because there the Son of Man will be betrayed and crucified. He will be "condemned"—his death will result from legal proceedings (v.18). Mention of the Resurrection is brief (v.19) and apparently not understood (cf. Lk 18:34)—though in Matthew the disciples' misunderstanding is not spelled out as in Luke but exemplified by the succeeding story (vv.20–28).

6. Suffering and service (20:20–28)

Again the question of rank returns (cf. 18:1–5). Despite Jesus' repeated predictions of his passion, two disciples and their mother are still thinking about privilege, status, and power.

20 The mother of James and John, along with her sons, approaches Jesus to ask a favor, with the mother as speaker. That the mother should be the one to approach Jesus becomes the more plausible if she is Jesus' aunt on his mother's side—not certain, but not unlikely (cf. 27:56; Jn 19:25). The "kneeling down" is not "worship" of Deity but may imply homage to the one increasingly recognized as King Messiah (see comment on 2:2).

21 The "right hand" and "left hand" suggest proximity to the King's person and so a share in his prestige and power. Such positions increase as the King is esteemed and has absolute power (cf. Pss 16:11; 45:9; 110:1; et al.). The kingdom here is the reign of Messiah at the consummation. The link with 19:28—a verse that speaks of both "throne" and "glory"—is unmistakable. What the sons of Zebedee want and their mother asks for is that they might share in the authority and preeminence of Jesus Messiah when his kingdom is fully consummated—something they think to be near at hand without the Cross or any interadvent period.

22 Jesus' answer is not severe but mingles firmness with probing. It is often ignorance that seeks leadership, power, and glory; the brothers do not now what they are asking. To ask to reign with Jesus is to ask to suffer with him; and not only do they not know what they are asking for (cf. 10:37–39), they have as yet no clear perceptions of Jesus' sufferings. To ask for worldly wealth and honor is often to ask for anxiety, temptation, disappointment, and envy; and in the spiritual arena to ask for great usefulness and reward is often to ask for great suffering (cf. 2Co 11:23–33; Col 1:24; Rev 1:9). On the word "cup," see comments on Mk 10:38; 14:35–37.

23 Jesus answers them first on their own terms before speaking of his own death as a ransom (v.28). In a sense they can and will drink from his cup of suffering. James would become the first apostolic martyr (Ac 12:2); and John (if it is the same one) would suffer exile (Rev 1:9). Yet it is not Jesus' role but his Father's to determine who sits on his right hand and his left. Here, as elsewhere (11:27; 24:36; 28:18), Jesus makes it clear that his authority is a derived authority.

24–27 The indignation of the ten doubtless sprang less from humility than jealousy plus the fear that they might lose out. These verses demonstrate that interest in egalitarianism may mask a jealousy whose deepest wellsprings are not concern for justice but "enlightened self-interest." The disciples revert to the squabbling of an earlier period (Mk 9:33–37; cf. Mt 18:1). Jesus calls them together and draws a contrast between greatness among "Gentiles" and greatness among heirs of the kingdom. Power and authority characterized the Roman empire. Greatness among Jesus' disciples is based on service. Anyone who wants to be great must become the "servant." In the pagan world humility was regarded as a vice. Imagine a slave being given leadership! Jesus' ethics of the leadership and power in his community of disciples is revolutionary.

28 At this point Jesus presents himself—the Son of Man (see comment on Mk 8:31)—as the supreme example of service to others. The verse is clearly important to our understanding of Jesus' view of his death.

It is natural to take "did not come" as presupposing at least a hint of Jesus' preexistence, though the language does not require it. He came not to be served, like a king dependent on countless courtiers and attendants, but to "serve" (GK 1354) others. The Son of Man had every right to expect to be served, but he served instead. Implicit is a self-conscious awareness of one who, because of his heavenly origin, possessed divine authority, but who humbled himself even to the point of undergoing an atoning death (cf. Php 2:6–9). The display of divine glory shines most brightly when it is set aside for the sake of redeeming humankind by a shameful death.

The Son of Man came "to give his life a ransom for many." The word "ransom" (GK 3389) was most commonly used as the purchase price for freeing slaves; and there is good evidence that the notion of "purchase price" is always implied in the NT use of this word, even though there is never any mention of the one to whom the price is paid. The preposition "for" denotes substitution or exchange; Jesus took our place.

The "many" (GK 4498) underlines the immeasurable effects of Jesus' solitary death: the one dies, the many find their lives "ransomed, healed, restored, forgiven"—a great host no one can number. But it should be remembered that "many" can refer, in Jewish literature, to the elect community. This suggests Jesus' substitutionary death is payment for and results in the eschatological people of God. This well suits the "many" of Isa 52:13–53:12 (a passage that seems to underlie this verse). Matthew has earlier explicitly related the "Servant Passage" of Isaiah to Jesus (see comments on 12:15–21).

7. Healing two blind men (20:29–34)

This miracle pictures Jesus still serving and again links his healing ministry with his death (v.28; see comment on 8:17). Moreover it reminds us that the one going up to Jerusalem to give his life as a ransom for many is the Messiah, the Son of David, whose great power, used mercifully (v.30) and compassionately (v.34), is not used to save himself.

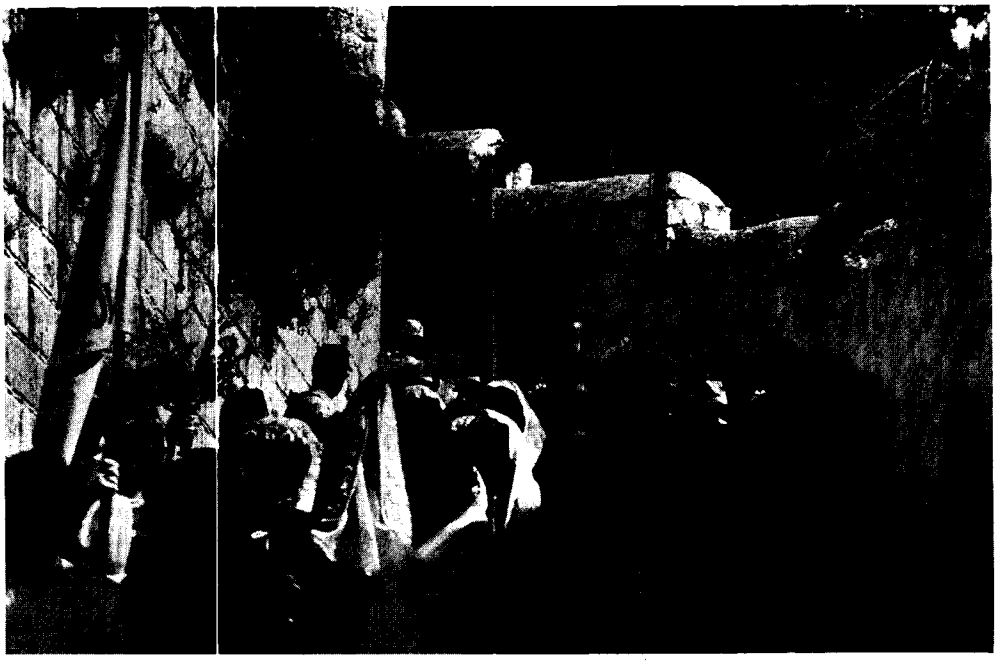
29 Jericho (see comment on Mk 10:46) was not only the home of Jesus' ancestor Rahab (1:5) but was also a day's journey from Jerusalem. The "large crowd" implies more than messianic excitement; it also reflects the multitudes of pilgrims from Galilee and elsewhere heading to Jerusalem for the feast.

30 The fact that Matthew refers to two blind men rather than one (cf. Mk 10:46–52; Lk 18:35–43) shows his personal knowledge of the events. There may have been many blind people in the Jericho area; for that region produced large quantities of balsam, believed to be beneficial for many eye defects. These two were sitting by the roadside, doubtless begging; and, hearing that Jesus was passing, cried out, "Lord, Son of David, have mercy on us!" On the relationship of the messianic "Son of David" to healing, see comment on 9:27.

31–34 Matthew's account is simple, stressing that Jesus mercifully healed the men despite the opposition of the crowds that, like the disciples (cf. 19:13–15), wanted to bask in his glory but not practice his compassion. After his healing, unlike 9:30 (see comment), there is no command to be silent. That point in Jesus' ministry has been reached when more public self-disclosure could not change the course of events. The two healed men joined the crowds following Jesus (v.34), pressing on to the Passover they expected and the Cross they did not.

8. Opening events of Passion Week (21:1–23:39)

a. The Triumphal Entry (21:1–11)



1–2 The Roman military road from Jericho to Jerusalem was about seventeen miles long and climbed three thousand feet. It passed through Bethany (where Jesus stayed six days before the Passover, Jn 12:1–10) and nearby Bethphage ("house of figs"), which lay on the southeast slope of the Mount of Olives, then crossed over the mount and the Kidron Valley and entered Jerusalem (v.1).

Jesus sent two disciples ahead to Bethphage to fetch the animals. The ride on a colt, because it was planned by Jesus, could only be an acted parable, a deliberate act of symbolic self-disclosure for those with eyes to see. Secrecy was being lifted.

3 The most natural way to take "Lord" here is Jesus' way of referring to himself. This step is not out of keeping with the authority he has already claimed for himself and fits this late period of his ministry, when he revealed himself with increasing clarity (see comment on Mk 11:3).

4–5 It is uncertain whether these are the words of Jesus or of Matthew (NIV chooses the latter). The quotation is from Zec 9:9. A donkey was sometimes ridden by rulers in times of peace (Jdg 5:10; 1Ki 1:33). Jews certainly understood Zec 9:9 to refer to the Messiah, often in terms of the Son of David. Therefore for those with eyes to see, Jesus was not only proclaiming his messiahship and his fulfillment of Scripture but showing the kind of peace-loving approach he was now making to the city.

Matthew alone of the four Gospels mentions two animals: a donkey and her colt (vv.2, 7). This reference is his way of highlighting what the other Synoptics affirm—the animal Jesus rode on was "a colt," thus fulfilling even this detail of Scripture. In the midst, then, of this excited crowd, an unbroken animal remains calm under the hands of the Messiah, who has nature in his control

Every year on Palm Sunday, Christain pilgrims make the journey from the Mount of Olives into Jerusalem carrying palm branches, reenacting Jesus' Triumphal Entry.

(8:23–27; 14:22–32). Thus the event points to the peace of the consummated kingdom (cf. Isa 11:1–10).

6–8 The two disciples returned from their errand (v.6) and put their outer garments on the beasts—both animals were in the procession (v.7). Jesus sat "on them" (probably the garments, not both animals). A "very large crowd" spread their cloaks on the road, acknowledging Jesus' kingship (cf. 2Ki 9:13). Still others "cut branches" and "spread them" on the road.

9 Crowds ahead and behind may be incidental confirmation of two other details. (1) John 12:12 speaks of crowds coming out of Jerusalem to meet Jesus. Apparently the Galilean pilgrims accompanying Jesus and the Jerusalem crowd coming out to meet him formed this procession of praise. (2) That the Jerusalem crowds knew he was approaching supports the stopover in Bethany (see comment on vv.1–2), which allows time for the news to spread. Messianic fervor was high, and perhaps this contributed to Jesus' desire to present himself as Prince of Peace.

The words of praise come primarily from Ps 118:25–26, a psalm that formed part of the "great Hallel" of the Passover. "Hosanna" (GK 6057) transliterates the Hebrew expression that originally was a cry for help: "Save!" In time it became an invocation of blessing and even an acclamation, the latter being the meaning here. "Son of David" is messianic and stresses the kingly role Messiah was to play. "He who comes in the name of the Lord" is cited by Jesus a little later (23:39; cf. 3:11; 11:3).

"Hosanna in the highest" is probably equivalent to "Glory to God in the highest" (Lk 2:14). The people praise God in the highest heavens for sending the Messiah and, if "Hosanna" retains some of its original force, also cry to him for deliverance.

10–11 Jesus probably entered Jerusalem through the north entrance to the outer court of the temple. As the city was stirred earlier (2:3), so here: news of Jesus' presence was inevitably disturbing. "Who is this?" does not mean that Jesus was virtually unknown in Jerusalem, but "Who really is this about whom there is so much excitement?" The answer of the crowds accurately reflects the historical setting: many of his contemporaries saw him as a prophet (cf. 16:14; 21:46)

"from Nazareth in Galilee"—his hometown and primary field of ministry respectively. The phrase probably also connotes surprise that a prophet should come from so unlikely a place (see comment on 2:23; cf. Jn 1:45–46).

b. Jesus at the temple (21:12–17)

This is now the second time that Jesus cleanses the temple (see Jn 2:13–22). The Synoptics do not record the earlier one because they do not tell anything about Jesus' early Judean ministry. This second cleansing as Passover drew near soon led to violent reaction by the authorities.

12 Temple service required provision to be made for getting what was needed from the sacrifices—animals, wood, oil, etc.—especially for pilgrims from afar. The money changers converted the standard Greek and Roman currency into temple currency, in which the half-shekel temple tax had to be paid (cf. 17:24–27). But letting these things go on at the temple site transformed a place of solemn worship into a market where the hum of trade mingled with the bleating and cooing of animals and birds. Moreover, especially on the great feasts, opportunities for extortion abounded. Jesus drove the lot out.

13 Jesus here refers to Scripture, much as he did when confronted by the devil (4:1–10). His first words are from Isa 56:7. Isaiah looked forward to a time when the temple would be called a house of prayer. But now, at the dawn of the Messianic Age, Jesus finds a "den of robbers." The words come from Jer 7:11, which warns against the futility of superstitious reverence for the temple compounded with wickedness that dishonors it. This suggests that the Greek word for "robbers" (GK 3334) should be given its normal meaning of "nationalist rebel" (see comment on 27:16). The temple was meant to be a house of prayer, but they had made it "a nationalist stronghold." It was not fulfilling its God-ordained role as witness to the nations but had become, like the first temple, the premier symbol of a superstitious belief that God would protect and rally his people irrespective of their conformity to his will.

The Lord whom the people see now comes to his temple (cf. Mal 3:1). Purification of Jerusalem and the temple was part of Jewish messianic expectation. So for those with eyes to see, Jesus' action was one of self-disclosure and an implicit claim to his authority over the Holy Place. That the purification would entail destruction and building a new temple (Jn 2:19–22) none but Jesus could yet foresee.

14 This last mention of Jesus' healing ministry takes place probably within the temple precincts in the Court of the Gentiles. It was not uncommon for the chronically ill to beg at the approaches to the temple (Ac 3:2); but the only place where the lame, blind, deaf, or otherwise handicapped could go in the temple area was the Court of the Gentiles.

Most Jewish authorities forbade any person lame, blind, deaf, or mute from offering a sacrifice or appearing before the Lord in his temple. But Jesus heals them, thus showing that "one greater than the temple is here" (12:6). He himself cannot be contaminated, and he heals and makes clean those who come into contact with him. These two actions—cleansing the temple and the healing miracles—jointly declare his superiority over the temple and raise the question of the source of his authority (v.23).

15–16 The "chief priests and teachers of the law" express indignation, not so much at what he has done, as at the acclamation he is receiving for it. The children cry out, "Hosanna to the Son of David"; and if Jesus is prepared to accept such praise, then "the wonderful things" he is doing must have messianic significance.

When challenged, Jesus supports the children by quoting Ps 8:2, introducing it with his "have you never read." Jesus' answer is a masterstroke and simultaneously accomplishes three things. (1) It provides some kind of biblical basis for letting the children go on with their exuberant praise and thus stifles, for the moment, the objections of the temple leaders. (2) Thoughtful persons, reflecting on the incident later (especially after the Resurrection), perceive that Jesus was saying much more. The children's "Hosannas" are not being directed to God but to the Son of David, the Messiah. Jesus is therefore not only acknowledging his messiahship but justifying the praise of the children by applying to himself a passage of Scripture applicable only to God (Ps 8 was not considered a messianic psalm). (3) The quotation confirms that the humble perceive spiritual truths more readily than the sophisticated (cf. 19:13–15).

17 During the festivals Jerusalem was crowded. So Jesus spent his last nights at Bethany, at the house of Mary, Martha, and Lazarus (see comment on 21:9).

c. The fig tree (21:18–22)

On the chronology of this event, see comment on Mk 11:20–21. Cursing the fig tree is an acted parable related to cleansing the temple and conveying a message about Israel. But when the next day the disciples see how quickly the fig tree has withered, their initial—and shallow—response is to wonder how it was done; and this leads to Jesus' remarks on faith. So this single historical event teaches two theological lessons.

18–19 Somewhere on the road between Bethany and Jerusalem, Jesus approached a fig tree in the hope of allaying his hunger, but found only leaves (see comment on Mk 11:13). Fig leaves appear about the same time as the fruit or a little after. That it was not the season for figs (Mk 11:13) explains why Jesus went to this particular tree, which stood out because it was in leaf. Its leaves advertised that it was bearing, but the advertisement was false. Jesus, unable to satisfy his hunger, saw the opportunity of teaching a memorable object lesson and cursed the tree, not because it was not bearing fruit, but because it made a show of life that promised fruit, yet was bearing none.

What is the meaning of the cursing of the fig tree? Jesus is cursing those who make a show of bearing much fruit but are spiritually barren. That is, he is directing his attack against the hypocrites among the Jewish people, a constant target in all four Gospels, but especially in Matthew (e.g., 6:2, 5, 16; 7:5; 15:7; 22:18; and we now approach 23:1–39!). Thus this story falls in line with the cleansing of the temple, which criticizes those who used the temple to make a large profit and those who stifled the children's praises of Messiah. These, like this leafy fig tree, Jesus finds full of advertised piety without any fruit; and them he curses.

The cursing of the fig tree is not so far out of character for Jesus as some have claimed. The same Jesus exorcised demons so that two thousand pigs were drowned (8:28–34), drove the animals and money changers out of the temple precincts with a whip, and says not a little about the torments of hell. Perhaps the fact that the two punitive miracles—the pigs and the fig tree—are not directed against people should teach us something of Jesus' compassion. He who came to save his people from their sin and its consequences resorts to prophetic actions not directed against his people, in order to warn them of the binding power of the devil (the destruction of the pigs) and of God's enmity against all hypocritical piety (the cursing of the fig tree).

20–22 Verse 20 may be read as either a question or an exclamation. The substance of Jesus' response has already been given in 17:20 (see comment). Here, however, attention shifts from concern about the amount of faith to the opposition of faith to doubt. The miracle Jesus selects to teach the power of faith—throwing a mountain into the sea (v.21)—is no more than a hyperbolic example of a miracle.

Jesus used the fig tree to teach the power of believing prayer. But belief in the NT is never reduced to forcing oneself to "believe" what one does not really believe. Instead, it is related to genuine trust in God and obedience to and discernment of his will. Such faith reposes on the will of God who acts.

d. The question of authority (21:23–27)

This long section from 21:23–22:46 is characterized by a number of controversies with various Jewish leaders, along with several parables that must be interpreted in the light of such controversies. It was customary to stop well-known teachers and ask them questions (cf. 22:16, 23, 35), and the crowds delighted in these exchanges. Eventually Jesus turned primarily to the crowds and addressed them without excluding the Pharisees and teachers of the law (ch. 23); and then, as evening fell, he retired to the Mount of Olives and gave his last "discourse" to his disciples (chs. 24–25).

23 Jesus' teaching takes place in the "temple courts," probably in one of the porticos surrounding the Court of the Gentiles. The chief priests and the elders were both members of the Sanhedrin, described here in terms of their clerical status rather than their theological positions (e.g., Sadducees and Pharisees). They approached Jesus and challenged his authority to cleanse the temple, to do the miraculous healings, and perhaps to teach the crowds. Their first question was therefore not narrowly theological but concerned Jesus' authority; yet their concern in asking who gave him this authority sprang less from a desire to identify him than from a desire to stifle and perhaps ensnare him.

24–26 Jesus' reply is masterly. He responds to their question with a question of his own (v.24), a common enough procedure in rabbinic debate. "John's baptism" is a way of referring to the Baptist's entire ministry. Jesus asks whether it was "from heaven, or from men." Jesus knows that if the religious authorities rightly answer it, they will already have the correct answer to their own question. If they respond, "From heaven," then they are morally bound to believe John—and John pointed to Jesus (see comment on 11:7–11); they will therefore have their answer about Jesus and his authority. If they respond, "From men" (v.26), they offer the wrong answer; but they will not dare utter it for fear of the people.

Far from avoiding the religious leaders' question, Jesus answers it so that the honest seeker of truth, unswayed by public opinion, will not fail to see who he is, while those interested only in snaring him with a captious question are blocked by a hurdle their own shallow pragmatism forbids them to cross. At the same time Jesus' question rather strongly hints to the rulers that their false step goes back to broader issues than Jesus' identity. If they cannot discern Jesus' authority, it is because their previous unbelief has blinded their minds to God's revelation.

27 The equivocation of the Jewish leaders gives Jesus a reason for refusing to answer their question. The Sanhedrin, of course, were required to check the credentials of those who spoke for God. Therefore, they raise the question of Jesus' authority; Jesus, however, raises the question of their competence to judge such an issue.

e. The parable of the two sons (21:28–32)

28 This is the first of three parables by which Jesus rebukes the Jewish leaders (vv.28–32, 33–46; 22:1–14). It is introduced without any preamble other than the question, "What do you think?" The normal way to take "first" and "second" in this context is "older" and "younger" son respectively.

29–31 In this parable, the older son says no, but repents and goes; the second son says yes, but does nothing. Who performs the Father's will? The first. The story is fairly straightforward. For the first time Jesus openly makes a solemn personal application of one of his parables to the Jewish leaders (v.31).

The shock value of Jesus' statement can only be appreciated when the low esteem in which tax collectors (see comment on Mk 2:14) were held, not to mention prostitutes, is taken into account. Jesus is saying that the scum of society, though they have said no to God, are repenting, performing the Father's will, and entering the kingdom; whereas the religious authorities have loudly said yes to God but never do what he says, and therefore they fail to enter. Their righteousness is not enough (cf. 5:20).

32 This verse links the parable to the preceding story, where the importance of believing John has already been established (vv.23–27). John preached God's will about what was right and pointed the way to the kingdom (11:12), which sinners are now entering (21:31). But he also pointed to Jesus and the kingdom's superior righteousness (cf. 3:2–3; 5:20). Yet the religious leaders did not believe John's witness, even after seeing society's vilest sinners repenting and believing him and his message.

f. The parable of the tenants (21:33–46)

On the face of it, this parable continues to make a statement against the Jewish religious authorities. The metaphorical equivalences are obvious: the landowner is God, the vineyard Israel, the tenants the leaders of the nation, the servants the prophets, and the son Jesus Messiah. That is, this parable has "allegorical" elements (see introductory comment on Mk 4).

33–34 This parable is probably addressed not only to Jewish rulers (v.2) but to the crowds in the temple courts (though not excluding the rulers; cf. Lk 20:9). "Another" links this parable with the last one. These verses clearly allude to Isa 5:1–7 and Ps 80:6–16; Jesus' parable is an old theme with new variations. The pains the landowner takes show his care for the vineyard. He builds a wall to keep out animals, a watchtower to guard against thieves and fire, and a winepress to squeeze the grapes right there. He is confident that his vineyard will bear fruit. The tenant farmers take care of the vineyard during the owner's absence and pay rent in kind. The "servants" are the owner's agents sent to collect some of his fruit.

35–37 The tenants mistreat some servants (cf. Jer 20:1–2), kill others (cf. 1Ki 18:4, 13; Jer 26:20–23), and stone others (cf. 2Ch 24:21–22; Mt 23:37). "Last of all" (v.37) the landowner sends his son—there is a note of pathos here—hoping the tenants will respect him. His forbearance with his wicked tenants (cf. Ro 2:4) eventually motivates the ultimate implacability of his wrath.

38–41 The action of the tenants is consistently callous. Precisely how it applies to Jesus is not entirely clear. True, their attitude was not, "This is the Messiah: come, let us kill him"; yet, in the light of the Scriptures, their rejection of him was no less culpable than if it had been that. Therefore, though all the parable's details may not be pressed, rejection of the son (v.39) by the leaders is the final straw that brings divine wrath on them.

Jesus elicits the self-condemning response (vv.40–41) of the hearers of the parable, thus concluding his teaching in this parable, instead of simply presenting it. Of course the conclusion remains his, regardless of how he gets it across.

42 Jesus' question in this verse, "Have you never read?" implies that the Scriptures point to him (Jn 5:39–40). The quotation is from Ps 118:22–23. "Stone" symbolism was important in the early church (Ac 4:11; Ro 9:33; 1Pe 2:6) to help Christians understand why Jesus was rejected by so many of his own people; and doubtless its effectiveness was enhanced by Jesus' use of it.

Jesus now turns to the image of a building. The "capstone" (lit., "head of the corner") is most probably the top stone of roof parapets, exterior staircases, and city walls. Psalm 118 concerns Israel. The nation was despised and threatened on all sides, but God made it the capstone. Jesus, who recapitulates Israel (see comment on 2:15) and is the true center of Israel, receives similar treatment from his opponents, but God vindicates him (cf. 23:39).

43–44 Jesus explains further the meaning of the parable. Up to this time the Jewish religious leaders were the principal means by which God exercised his reign over his people. But the leaders failed so badly in handling God's "vineyard" and rejecting God's Son that God was planning to give the responsibility to another people who would produce the kingdom's fruit (cf. 7:16–20). Strictly speaking, this verse does not speak of transferring the locus of the people of God from Jews to Gentiles, though it may hint at this; instead, it speaks of the ending of the role the Jewish religious leaders played in mediating God's authority.

A "capstone," if too low, could be tripped over by an unwary person, sending him over the parapet; if too insecurely fastened, leaning against it could dislodge it and send it crashing onto the head of some passerby. Jesus probably alludes to both Isa 8:14–15 and Da 2:35. This despised stone (v.42) is not only chosen by God and promoted to the premier place, it is also dangerous.

45–46 The two principal voices of authority in the Judaism of Jesus' day understood what this parable meant. The story ends with magnificent yet tragic irony (v.46). The religious leaders are told they will reject Jesus and be crushed (cf. v.44). But instead of taking the warning, they hunt for ways to arrest him, hindered only by fear of the people who accept Jesus as a prophet. Ironically, then, God foretells this very event; and these men, prompted by hatred, rush to bring it to pass.

g. The parable of the wedding banquet (22:1–14)

If the parable of the tenants exposes Israel's leaders' neglect of their covenanted duty, this one condemns the contempt with which Israel as a whole treated God's grace.

1–3 For "kingdom of heaven," see comment on 3:2. In this parable, the kingdom has already dawned; invitations to the banquet have gone out and are being refused. The son's wedding banquet doubtless hints at the messianic banquet; but this must not be pressed too hard, for when that final banquet comes, there will be no possibility of acceptance or refusal.

The king's son is clearly Messiah, not uncommonly represented as a bridegroom (9:15; 25:1; Jn 3:29; Eph 5:25–32; Rev 21:2, 9). Prospective guests to a major feast were invited in advance and then notified when the feast was ready, but at that time these guests persistently refuse.

4–5 The king not only graciously repeats his invitation but describes the feast's greatness in order to provide an incentive to attend it. Large wedding feasts went on for days in the ancient world; by v.13 the celebration is continuing at night. But those invited stay away for mundane and selfish reasons. They slight the king, whose invitation is both an honor and a command.

6–7 The scene turns violent. Some of those invited treat the king's messengers outrageously. Enraged, the king sends his army, destroys the murderers, and burns their city. In the light of 21:38–41 the violence of those invited and the response by the king are understandable.

8–10 The situation having gone beyond that at normal wedding banquets, these shocking developments make their points that much more effectively. The king sends his servant to the forks of the roads, where they would find many people. They extend the king's invitation to all and succeed in drawing in all kinds of people, "both good and bad." The superior righteousness (5:20) believers must attain to enter the kingdom is not merely rigorous obedience to law. After all, this gospel promises a Messiah who saves his people from their sins (1:21; 20:28).

11–13 Whether one is good or bad, there is an appropriate attire for this wedding feast. The guest without a special garment, though invited, did not prepare acceptably for the feast. His speechlessness proves he knows he is guilty, even though the king gently calls him "friend" (v.12; cf. 20:13). Thus, though the invitation is very broad, it does not follow that all who respond positively actually remain for the banquet. Some are cast out.

14 Jesus concludes with a pithy statement explaining the parable. Many are invited; but some refuse to come, and others who do come refuse to submit to the norms of the kingdom and are therefore rejected. Those who remain are called "chosen" (GK 1723), a word implicitly denying that the reversals in the parable in any way catch God unawares or remove sovereign grace from his control. At the same time it is clear from all three parables (21:28–22:14) that not the beginning but the end is crucial.

h. Paying taxes to Caesar (22:15–22)

Jesus now has a series of confrontations with his enemies. In each one he is confronted in an attempt to show he is no better than any other rabbi, or an attempt to ensnare him in serious difficulties. Not only does Jesus respond with superlative wisdom, but he ends the exchanges by challenging his opponents with a question of his own that they cannot answer (vv.41–46)—another bit of veiled self-disclosure. All this probably takes place in the temple courts on Tuesday of Passion Week.

15–16a After Jesus spoke the three parables of warning to the Jewish leaders, the Pharisees went out from the temple courts where Jesus was preaching (21:23), were joined by the Herodians (see comment on Mk 12:13), and "laid plans to trap him in his words." "Trap" reveals the motive: this is no dispassionate inquiry into a proper attitude to the Roman overlord. Paying the poll tax was the most obvious sign of submission to Rome. Zealots claimed the poll tax was a God-dishonoring badge of slavery to the pagans. The trap, then, put Jesus into the position where he would either alienate a major part of the population or else lay himself open to a charge of treason.

16b–17 The title "Teacher" (GK 1437) and the long preamble reflect flattery and pressure for Jesus to speak. If he does not reply after such an introduction, then he is not a man of integrity and is swayed by people. The question "Is it right?" is theological, as all legal questions inevitably were to a first-century Jew.

By NT times "Caesar," the family name of Julius Caesar, had become a title (cf. Lk 2:1; 3:1; Ac 17:7). The emperor at this time was Tiberius. The wording of the question, with its deft "or not," demands a yes or a no.

18–20 But Jesus will not be forced into a yes or no reply. He recognizes the duplicity of his opponents. Jesus chooses to answer them on his own terms and asks for the coin used for paying this tax. Such coins bore an image of the emperor's head, along with an offensive inscription ("Tiberius Caesar, son of the divine Augustus" on one side and "pontifex maximus"—which Jesus would understand as "high priest"—on the other), that would offend most Palestinian Jews. They hand

Jesus a denarius, and, as in 21:23–27, he asks his questioners a question—this time one they have to answer (v.20).

21–22 Superficially, Jesus' answer accords with Jewish teaching that people ought to pay taxes to their foreign overlords, since the great, even the pagan great, owe their position to God (cf. Pr 8:15; Da 2:21, 37–38). But Jesus' answer is more profound than that and can be fully understood only in the light of religion-state relations in first-century Rome. The Jews, with their theocratic heritage, were ill-equipped to formulate a theological rationale for paying tribute to foreign and pagan overlords, unless, like the Jews of the Exile, they interpreted their situation as one of divine judgment. But it was not only Jewish monotheism that linked religion and state. Paganism customarily insisted even more strongly on the unity of what we distinguish as civil and religious obligations. Indeed, some decades later Christians faced the wrath of Rome because they refused to participate in emperor worship—a refusal the state judged to be treason.

Seen in this light, Jesus' response is not some witty way of getting out of a predicament; rather, it shows his full awareness of a major development in redemption history. Jesus does not side with the Zealots or with any who expected his messiahship to bring instant political independence from Rome. The messianic community he determines to build (16:18) must render to whatever Caesar is in power whatever belongs to him, while never turning from its obligations to God. The lesson was learned by both Paul and Peter (Ro 13:1–7; 1Pe 2:13–17). Of course, Jesus' reply is not a legal statute resolving every issue. Where Caesar claims what is God's, the claims of God have priority (Ac 4:19; 5:29). Still, Jesus' pithy words not only answer his enemies but also lay down the basis for the proper relationship of his people to government. The profundity of his reply is amazing (v.22).

i. Marriage at the Resurrection (22:23–33)

The questioners' intent in this section is as malicious as in the last one. They hope to embroil Jesus in a theological debate where he must choose sides; but instead the exchange once again demonstrates his wisdom and authority.

23 This confrontation takes place in the same situation as the former one. Pharisees believed in a resurrection from the dead, basing their belief in part on Isa 26:19 and Da 12:2. But Sadducees did not believe in a resurrection: both body and soul, they held, perish at death (cf. Ac 23:8).

24–28 Like the Pharisees, the Sadducees approach Jesus with insincere respect ("Teacher"; cf. v.16). They begin by citing the Mosaic levirate law (Dt. 25:5–6), according to which, if a man dies without children, his younger brother must marry the widow and sire children who would legally be heirs of the deceased brother. Probably in Jesus' day the law was little observed.

Though the case brought by the Sadducees could have happened, it is most likely hypothetical, fabricated to confound Pharisees and others who believed in resurrection. Their question presupposes that resurrection life is an exact counterpart to earthly life; and if so, the resurrected woman must be guilty of incestuous marriages (see comment on 19:9) or arbitrarily designated the wife of one of the brothers. And if so, which one? Or—and this is the answer the Sadducees pressed for—the whole notion of resurrection is absurd.

29–30 In Jesus' mind the Sadducees were denying the clear teaching of Scripture on the subject (Isa 26:19; Da 12:2; cf. Job 19:25–27), assuming that if God raises the dead he must bring them back to an existence just like this one. In his response, Jesus insists that the Sadducees betrayed their ignorance of Scripture and of the power of God, who is capable of raising the dead to an existence quite unlike this present one. By God's power, the resurrection will bring about a change in sexual relationship; in this way we will be "like the angels in heaven." Jesus' use of angels contains a double thrust, since the Sadducees also denied their existence (cf. Ac 23:8).

31–32 Jesus now turns from the power of God to the word of Scripture (cf. v.29). He may have drawn the passage to which he appeals (Ex 3:6) from the Pentateuch, because the Sadducees prized the Pentateuch more highly than the rest of Scripture. "Have you not read?" (v.31) is a rebuke (see comment on 21:42).

If God is the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob even while he was addressing Moses hundreds of years after the first three patriarchs died, then they must be alive to him. God is the eternal God of the covenant, a fact especially stressed wherever reference is made to the patriarchs (e.g., Ge 24:12, 27, 48; 26:24; 28:13). He always loves and blesses his people; therefore it is inconceivable that his blessings cease when his people die (cf. Pss 16:10–11; 17:15; 49:14–15; 73:23–26).

At first glance Ex 3:6 is sufficient to prove immortality but not resurrection. But the Sadducees denied the existence of spirits as thoroughly as they denied the existence of angels (Ac 23:8). Their concern was not to choose between immortality and resurrection but between death as finality and life beyond death, whatever its mode. Jesus' point is that God will raise the dead as the one who always keeps his promise to be their God.

33 Matthew does not tell us that the Sadducees are convinced but that the crowds are astonished at Jesus' authority and incisive insight into biblical truth (cf. 7:28–29; 13:54; 22:22).

j. The greatest commandments (22:34–40)

The rabbis of Jesus' day were much exercised to find summary statements of OT laws and establish their relative importance; and in all probability the question arose enough times in Jesus' ministry that he developed a fairly standard response to the question.

34 Matthew portrays this confrontation as owing something to the machinations of the Pharisees, who saw how Jesus had silenced the Sadducees.

35–36 An expert in the interpretation of Scripture, perhaps especially the Pentateuch, as well as a vast complex of Jewish traditions, "tested" Jesus, asking which is the greatest commandment. The Jews quite commonly drew distinctions among the laws of Scripture—great and small, light and heavy (cf. 23:23).

37–39 Jesus first quotes Dt 6:5 and then Lev 19:18. From the viewpoint of biblical anthropology, "heart" (GK 2840), "soul" (GK 6034), and "mind" (GK 1379) are not mutually exclusive but overlapping categories, together demanding our love for God to come from our whole person, our every faculty and capacity. "First and greatest" means this command is primary because it is the greatest. The second also concerns love, this time toward one's "neighbor" (GK 4446), which in Lk 10:29–37 expands to anyone who needs our help.

40 This verse is distinctive though enigmatic. How do all the Law and the Prophets "hang on" (GK 3203) these two commandments?

First, the two commandments stand together. The first without the second is intrinsically impossible (cf. 1Jn 4:20), and the second cannot stand without the first—even theoretically—because disciplined altruism is not love. True love demands abandonment of self to God, and God alone is the adequate incentive for such abandonment.

Jesus also suggests that the basis of human love as beginning with the heart's sincere relationship with God is in keeping with the prophetic tradition of the OT (Dt 10:12; 1Sa 15:22; Isa 1:11–18; et al.). Sterile religion, no matter how disciplined, was never regarded as adequate.

The main point Jesus makes is the priority of love within the law. These two commandments are the greatest because all Scripture "hangs" on them; i.e., nothing in Scripture can cohere or be truly obeyed unless these two are observed. The entire biblical revelation demands heart religion marked by total allegiance to God, loving him and loving one's neighbor. Without these two commandments the Bible is sterile. This section therefore prepares the way for the denunciations of 23:1–36 and conforms fully to Jesus' teaching elsewhere.

k. The son of David (22:41–46)

After silencing the Jewish leaders, Jesus asks them a question. His purpose is not to win a debate but to elicit from them what the Scriptures themselves teach about the Messiah, thus helping people to recognize who he really is. The historical setting is the temple courts, where crowds and leaders mingled together and alternately listened to the teacher from Nazareth and fired questions at him (21:23–23:36). Matthew's details probably stem from his memory of the events.

41–42 Jesus' question focuses Christology, not on resurrection or taxes—the real issue that turned the authorities into his enemies.

The Messiah's identity according to the Scriptures must be determined. One way to do that is to ask whose son he is. The Pharisees gave the accepted reply: "the son of David" (cf. 2Sa 7:13–14; Isa 11:1, 10; Jer 23:5; see comments on 1:1; 9:27–28).

43–45 But this view, though not wrong, is too simple because, as Jesus points out, David called the Messiah his Lord. How then could Messiah be David's son? The force of Jesus' argument depends on his use of Ps 110, the most frequently quoted OT chapter in the NT. The Davidic authorship of the psalm is essential to his argument. The phrase "speaking by the Spirit" not only assumes that all Scripture is Spirit-inspired (cf. Ac 4:25; Heb 3:7; 9:8; 10:15, 2Pe 1:21) but here reinforces the truth of what David said.

How does Jesus use this psalm in his argument? We have already seen how Matthew portrays much prophecy and fulfillment as OT paradigms pointing forward to the Messiah, sometimes with the understanding of the OT writers, sometimes not (see comments on 2:15; 5:17; 8:16–17). David is regularly portrayed, even in the OT, as the model for the coming Anointed One; and David himself understood at least something of the messianic promise (2Sa 7:13–14).

The widely held, if not dominant, view of the Jewish community was that the coming Messiah would be the son of David. Jesus not only declares that view inadequate, but insists that the OT itself (e.g., Ps 110) tells us it is inadequate. But if Messiah is not David's son, whose son is he? The solution is given by the prologue to Matthew (chs. 1–2) and by the voice of God himself (3:17; 17:5): Jesus is the Son of God. Even the title "Son of Man" (see comment on Mk 8:31) offers a transcendent conception of messiahship. This does not mean, however, that Jesus (or Matthew) is denying that the Messiah is David's son. This gospel repeatedly recognizes that Jesus the Messiah is Son of David—by title (1:1; 9:27; et al.), by genealogy (1:2–16), and by portrayal of Jesus as King of the Jews (2:2; 27:11, 29; et al.). What Jesus does is to synthesize the concept of a human Messiah in David's line with the concept of a divine Messiah who transcends human limitations, even as Matthew elsewhere synthesizes kingship and the Suffering Servant. The OT itself looked forward to one who would be both the offshoot and the root of David (Isa 11:1, 10; cf. Rev 22:16).

46 Matthew uses the comment about the silence of Jesus' opponents in order to finish the entire section of confrontations (21:23–22:46). Many who were silenced were not saved; so Jesus' enemies went underground for a short time. Yet even their silence was a tribute. The teacher who never attended the right schools (Jn 7:15–18) confounds the greatest theologians in the land. And if his question (v.45) was unanswerable at this time, a young Pharisee, who may have been in Jerusalem at the time, was to answer it in due course (Ro 1:1–4; 9:5).

I. Warning to the crowd and the disciples (23:1–12)

Structurally, it is difficult to decide where this chapter belongs. It is not on a par with the five major discourses of Matthew, for it lacks the characteristic discourse ending (see comment on 7:28–29). From a thematic viewpoint, it is best perceived as the climax of the preceding confrontations.

The question "What do you think about Christ?" (v.42) stands at the heart of the Gospel. The failure of the Pharisees to recognize Jesus as the Messiah prophesied in Scripture is itself already an indictment, the more so since they "sit in Moses' seat" (see comment on v.2); and the woes that follow are therefore judicial and go some way toward explaining the prophesied destruction of Jerusalem in the Olivet Discourse (24:4–25:46). Thus the strong language Jesus uses here ("fools," "hypocrites," "blind guides," "son of hell") is the language of divine warning (cf. vv.37–39) and condemnation (cf. 7:21–23).

1 Perhaps a year earlier Jesus had begun to denounce the Pharisees (15:7). Subsequently he warned his disciples of the teaching of the Pharisees and Sadducees (16:5–12). Now his warning and denunciations are public. Matthew mentions both "crowds" and "disciples" because he sees that the essential thrust of Jesus' warnings is to compel people to follow either him, the Messiah as defined in 22:41–46, or the religious leaders. And those who do the latter will share their leaders' condemnation.

2–3 The "teachers of the law," most of whom were Pharisees in Matthew's time, were primarily responsible for teaching. They "sit in Moses' seat." Ancient synagogues had a stone seat at the front where the authoritative teacher sat. Moreover, "to sit on X's seat" often means "to succeed X" (1Ki 1:35, 46; 2Ki 15:12; Ps 132:12). This would imply that the "teachers of the law" were Moses' legal successors, possessing all his authority. Jesus goes on to assert they had astounding authority in all they taught, even if they did not live up to it.

4 This verse charges the leaders with putting "heavy loads" on "men's shoulders"—laying down irksome rules—and then refusing "to lift a finger" to help. This does not mean they were unwilling to obey burdensome rules themselves but that they refused to help those who collapsed under their rules. Thus the Pharisees are not like Jesus, whose burden is light and whose promises to give rest (11:28–30); by their teaching they are doing more harm than good.

This interpretation of this verse means that Jesus' words in vv.2–3a are an instance of biting irony, bordering on sarcasm. He is implying that the Jewish religious leaders have presumed to sit in Moses' seat. He therefore warns the crowds and his disciples in the sharpest way possible.

5–7 Jesus now illustrates some of the leaders' practices not to be copied (v.3b). He accuses them of being time-servers and applause-seekers (6:1–18). "Phylacteries" (v.5) were small leather or parchment boxes containing a piece of vellum inscribed with four texts from the law (Ex 13:2–10, 11–16; Dt 6:4–9; 11:13–21) and were worn on the arm or tied to the forehead (cf. Ex 13:9, 16; Dt 6:8; 11:18). To show their piety to the world, these leaders made large, showy phylacteries. The same ostentation affected the length of tassels, worn by all Jews (including Jesus, 9:20; 14:36) on the corners of the outer garment (cf. Nu 15:37–41; Dt 22:12).

Seeking a reputation for piety goes with seeking places of honor at great dinners or the most important seats—as close as possible to the law scrolls—in the synagogues. "Rabbi" means "my master" or "my teacher."

8–10 The "you" (v.8) is emphatic, and Jesus is probably speaking primarily to his disciples here, just as he later addresses the Pharisees directly (vv.13–36). A good preacher knows that forthright words about what is required of believers can be at the same time a powerful incentive to decision on the part of the sympathetic but uncommitted.

Unlike the religious authorities, Jesus' disciples are not to be called "Rabbi," for they have but one "Master" (or "Teacher"; GK 1437; cf. 22:24), Jesus himself (cf. v.10). This verse not only proscribes self-exaltation in teaching divine things but rejects the authority of the religious teachers of Jesus' day. Such authority has been taken from them (see comment on 21:43). Among those who follow Jesus, a brotherly relationship (see comment on 5:22–24) is required.

Verse 9 moves from "Rabbi" or "Teacher" to "Father." "The fathers" became a common way of referring to earlier teachers of the law, especially the great masters; that practice may have stretched back to the days of the prophets (cf. 2Ki 2:12). The only one they should call "Father" (GK 4252) is God himself. Jesus thus concludes this section by declaring that he himself is the only one qualified to sit in Moses' seat—to succeed him as authoritative Teacher of God's will and mind. Certainly we may conclude from this that the risen Christ is as displeased with those in his church who demand unquestioning submission to themselves and their opinions and confuse a reputation for showy piety with godly surrender to their teachings as he ever was with any Pharisee.

11–12 The substance of v.11 is in 20:26: Matthew often repeats Jesus' statements on humility. For instances of exalting oneself, see comments on 20:20–28; of humbling oneself, see comment on 18:4. The principle enunciated here reflects not natural law but kingdom law: the eschatological reward will humble the self-exalted and exalt the self-humbled (cf. Eze 21:26). What is commended are humility and service. The supreme example—the Messiah himself—makes this clear (20:26–28); for his astonishing humility and service to others were untainted by servility and were perfectly compatible with exercising the highest authority. Having done the greatest service, he has been most highly exalted.

m. Seven woes on the teachers of the law and the Pharisees (23:13–36)

Jesus now begins his seven woes against the Jewish leaders. They fit into a neat chiastic pattern:

A: First woe (v.13): failing to recognize Jesus as the Messiah
  B: Second woe (v.15): superficially zealous, yet doing more harm than good
    C: Third woe (vv.16–22): misguided use of the Scripture
      D: Fourth woe (vv.23–24): fundamental failure to discern the thrust of Scripture
    C′ Fifth woe (vv.25–26): misguided use of the Scripture
  B′ Sixth woe (vv.27–28): superficially zealous, yet doing more harm than good
A′ Seventh woe (vv.29–32): heirs of those who failed to recognize the prophets

What stands out is the centrality of rightly understanding the Scriptures—a theme that is reflected in all the preceding controversies and is no less related to Jesus' rejection of the claims of the teachers of the law.

13 A "woe" (GK 4026) can be a compassionate "alas!" (24:19), a strong condemnation (11:21), or a combination of the two (18:17; 26:24). In this chapter condemnation predominates; but it is neither vindictive nor spiteful so much as judicial. Jesus the Messiah pronounces judgment.

The first woe assumes that the messianic reign ("the kingdom of heaven"; see comment on 3:2) has begun. The teachers of the law and the Pharisees are "hypocrites" (see comment on 6:2), since they claim to teach God's way but refuse to enter the messianic kingdom and hinder those who try to do so. The personal conduct of the Pharisees is not in view here, however, only entrance into the kingdom. Though proper conduct is essential, it does not admit anyone into the kingdom.

The last controversy (22:41–46) revealed the real failure—the teachers of the law and the Pharisees do not enter the kingdom because they refuse to recognize who Jesus is. When the crowds begin to marvel at Jesus and suggest he may be the Messiah, the authorities do all they can to dissuade them (cf. 9:33–34; 11:19; 12:23–24; 21:15). The "woe" pronounced on the authorities is therefore of a piece with 18:6–7.

15 Many scholars have convincingly argued that the first century A.D. until the Fall of Jerusalem marks the most remarkable period of Jewish missionary zeal and corresponding success. Even in the Christian mission, no one seems to have opposed Paul's or anyone else's outreach to Gentiles: rather, what was disputed was the basis of admitting them to the people of God.

How much of the Pharisees' activity was aimed at converting to their views those who had already become loose adherents of Judaism, we cannot know for certain. But whether they were winning raw pagans or sympathizers of Judaism, they were winning them to their own position. The converts in view, therefore, are not converts to Judaism but to Pharisaism. They would travel extensively to make one "convert" (GK 4670)—a word used in the NT only here and in Ac 2:11; 6:5; 13:43 and one that at this time probably refers to those who had been circumcised and had pledged to submit to the full rigors of Jewish law, including the oral traditions of the Pharisees.

Jesus did not criticize the fact of the Pharisees' extensive missionary effort but its results: the "converts" became twice as much a "son of hell" (see comment on Mk 9:42–49) as the scribes and Pharisees who won them. That is, their converts "out-Phariseed" the Pharisees. Psychologically this is entirely possible, as every teacher of converts knows. As for these converts, the Pharisees' teaching locked them into a theological frame that left no room for Jesus the Messiah and therefore no possibility of entering the messianic kingdom.

16–22 See comments on 5:33–37 and 15:14 for the background and thrust of these verses.

While it may be true that the rabbis fought the abuses of oaths and vows among the unlearned masses, the way they fought them was by differentiating between what was binding and what was not. In that sense, wittingly or unwittingly they encouraged evasive oaths and therefore lying. Jesus cut through these complexities by insisting that people must tell the truth. He charges the teachers of the law and the Pharisees with mishandling the Scriptures they claimed to defend.

23–24 The OT law on tithing (Dt 14:22–29) specifies grain, wine, and oil, though Lev 27:30 is more comprehensive. Certainly in the first century there was debate about how far the law of tithing should extend. The consensus was to include greens and garden herbs (v.23). Jesus does not condemn scrupulous observance in these things, but insists that to fuss over them while neglecting the "more important matters of the law" (cf. 22:34–40)—justice, mercy, and faithfulness—is to strain out a gnat but swallow a camel, both unclean creatures.

Several points deserve notice. (1) The "more important" (GK 987) matters do not refer to the "more difficult" but to the "more central" or "more decisive" matters versus "peripheral" ones. (2) In essence Jesus accuses the teachers of the law and the Pharisees of a massive distortion of God's will as revealed in Scripture. At a fundamental level, they fail to focus on the thrust of Scripture (cf. 9:9–13; 12:1–14). (3) The chiastic structure of the "woes" centers on this fourth one, where the basic failure of the Pharisaic teachers is laid bare (see comments on 23:13–26). Jesus holds readers of the OT responsible for discerning its purpose and recognizing its most important emphases (see comment on 22:40).

25–26 Jesus begins with the metaphor of the cup and dish (v.25a), reveals his nonmetaphorical concerns at the end of v.25, then returns to his metaphor in v.26, now that its real purpose has been exposed. The Pharisees have been occupied with external religion instead of that of the inner person (cf. v.23). Within themselves they remain "full of greed and self-indulgence." In the metaphor, cleaning the inside is basic and guarantees cleanliness of the outside.

27–28 During the month of Adar, just before Passover, it was customary to whitewash with lime graves or gravesites that might not be instantly identified as such, in order to warn pilgrims to avoid ritual uncleanness from contact with corpses and so prevent participation in the Passover. But in that case whitewashed tombs would not have been objects of beauty but of disgust: they were places to be shunned. Why does Jesus, then, call them "beautiful"? Most likely the graves were beautiful because of their structure (cf. v.29), not their whitewash. Thus Jesus' mention of whitewashing is a further thrust at the Pharisees' distinctive preoccupation with avoiding ritual defilement. They are sources of uncleanness just as much as the whitewashed graves are.

In the context of ch. 23, the point Jesus is making is not that the scribes and Pharisees were deliberate and self-conscious hypocrites, but that in their scrupulous regulations they appeared magnificently virtuous but were actually contaminating the people. The supreme irony is that their preoccupation with their law left them steeped in "wickedness."

29–30 By erecting monuments the religious leaders thought themselves morally and spiritually above their forebears who had persecuted the prophets whose monuments they were building. They believed that they would not have joined their ancestors in murdering the prophets—just as many Christians today naively think they would have responded better to Jesus than the disciples or than the crowds that cried, "Crucify him!"

31 But the distinction the Jews draw in v.30 Jesus now denies. Their own saying testifies against them. They speak fondly of their ancestors and so acknowledge themselves to be the sons (NIV, "descendents") of those who shed the blood of the prophets. But Jesus sees further irony here, based on the ambiguity of "fathers" and "sons." The Jews think in terms of their physical descent. Jesus responds by saying in effect that they are sons all right—more than they realize. They show their paternity by resembling the actions of their fathers. While piously claiming to be different, they are already plotting ways to put an end to Jesus (21:38–39, 46).

32 The conclusion is defiant and ironical. The idea behind "the measure of the sin" is that God can only tolerate so much sin; then, when the measure is "filled up" (GK 4444) he must respond in wrath (cf. Ge 15:16; 1Th 2:14–16).

33 See comments on 3:7 and 12:34 for the epithets. The transition from the preceding verse is clear: if the teachers of the law and Pharisees are filling up the measure of the sin of their forefathers, how can they possibly escape the condemnation of hell (see comment on Mk 9:42–49)?

34 Because of the Jewish leaders' wicked reception of God's messengers, more messengers (i.e., Christian missionaries; cf. 5:10–12; 9:37–38; 28:18–20) will "therefore" be sent; and they will be treated the same way. This will fill up the full measure of iniquity, and judgment will fall. Regarding the word "crucify" (GK 5090), perhaps we have an echo of 10:24–25: the servant is not above his master. If Jesus is to be crucified, his servants may expect the same.

35–36 The very messengers who were beaten and killed for calling the people to repentance in the mystery of providence fill up the measure of the people's sins (v.32)—namely, shedding righteous blood of God's emissaries from Abel to Zechariah (see comment on Lk 12:51). Verse 35 anticipates 27:24–25: Pilate tries to evade responsibility for crucifying Jesus, and the Jews clamor for that same dreadful responsibility because of their skepticism about who Jesus is.

All along in this chapter, the teachers of the law and the Pharisees have been Jesus' primary target. Now the reference is to "this generation," because the leaders represent the people, and the people, despite Jesus' warnings, do not abandon their leaders for Jesus Messiah. This sets the stage for the concluding lament over Jerusalem (vv.37–39).

n. Lament over Jerusalem (23:37–39)

The effect of this laments is twofold. First, it tinges all the preceding woes with compassion. There is a change of number from Jerusalem to people of Jerusalem: "you [sing.] who kill ... sent to you [sing.] ... your [sing.] children ... your [pl.] house ... you [pl.] will not see." The effect is to move from the abstraction of the city to the concrete reality of people. Jesus' woes in ch. 23 therefore go far beyond personal frustrations; they are divine judgments that, though wrathful, never call in question the reality of divine love (see comment on 5:44–45).

Second, the Christological implications are unavoidable, for Jesus, identifying himself with God, claims to be the one who has longed to gather and protect this rebellious nation. Phrased in such terms, Jesus' longing can only belong to Israel's Savior, not to one of her prophets.

37 Verses 37–39 preserve Jesus' last recorded public words to Israel. Jerusalem, the city of David, the city where God revealed himself in his temple, had become known as the city that killed the prophets and stoned those sent to her. Throughout his earthly ministry, Jesus longed to gather and shelter Jerusalem (by metonymy, all Jews) as a hen gathers her chicks (cf. Dt 32:11; Ps 91:4); for despite the woes, Jesus, like the "Sovereign LORD" in Eze 18:32, took "no pleasure in the death of anyone."

38 This verse may allude to both Jer 12:7 and 22:5. "Your house" (GK 3875) in this context could refer to Jerusalem, to Israel, or to the temple in whose precincts Jesus was preaching (21:23; 24:1) and whose destruction was about to be predicted (24:2). Actually, all three are closely allied and rise and fall together. The "house" is left desolate either by God (as in Jer 12:7) or by Jesus, who is "Immanuel," "God with us" (1:23).

39 Here Jesus refers to his Parousia. When he returns, all will acknowledge him as Lord in the future consummation. The context strongly implies that the Parousia spells judgment (cf. 24:30–31; Php 2:9–11; Rev 1:7); but the quotation of Ps 118:26 here keeps open the way Jesus will be received—as a consuming Judge or a welcomed King. Jesus turns away, leaves the temple (24:1), and will not be seen again till the End.

B. Fifth Discourse: The Olivet Discourse (24:1–25:46)

Few chapters of the Bible have called forth more disagreement among interpreters than Mt 24 and its parallels in Mk 13 and Lk 21 (see comments on those chapters). The interpretation given here presupposes the authenticity of the discourse material in the Gospels and rejects the common notion that the "prophecy" of the Fall of Jerusalem must in reality be ex eventu (i.e., based on the event itself).

Our goal is to understand the most natural meaning of "the abomination that causes desolation" (v.15), the significance of "let the reader understand" (v.15), the reference to the "coming of the Son of Man" (vv. 27, 30), and the extent of "this generation" (v.34), limiting ourselves primarily to the text of Matthew.

As to overall approach, the view of Mt 24 finds clear breaks in the Olivet Discourse between the two topics discussed: the destruction of Jerusalem and the return of Jesus Christ. These breaks do not, however, occur at those places most commonly advocated by evangelical scholars.

In my understanding of the Olivet Discourse, the disciples think of Jerusalem's destruction and the eschatological end as a single complex web of events. This accounts for the form of their questions. Jesus warns that there will be delay before the End—a delay characterized by persecution and tribulation for his followers (vv.4–28), but with one particularly violent display of judgment in the Fall of Jerusalem (vv.15–21; Mk 13:14–20; Lk 21:20–24). Immediately after the days of that sustained persecution characterizing the interadvent period comes the Second Advent (vv.29–31). The warning in vv.32–35 describes the whole tribulation period, from the Ascension to the Second Advent. The tribulation period will certainly come, and the generation to which Jesus is speaking will experience all its features that point to the Lord's return. But the exact time of that return no one but the Father knows (vv.36–44). This structure works out in all three Synoptics (though with significant differences in emphasis), and the main themes developed have important ties with other NT books. The disciples' questions are answered, and the reader is exhorted both to look forward to the Lord's return and to live responsibly, faithfully, compassionately, and courageously while the Master is away (24:45–25:46).

Matthew links the Olivet Discourse closely to the "woes" in chapter 23. This does not mean that chs. 24–25 continue a single discourse—the setting, audience, and principal themes all change. But Matthew does tie the prediction of desolation (23:37–39) to the destruction of the temple (24:1–2).

1 As Jesus departs from the temple (see comment on 23:39), his disciples call his attention to its various structures. They show that they have underestimated or even misunderstood the force of Jesus' denunciations in ch. 23. They still focus on the temple, on which Jesus has pronounced doom, since the true center of the relation between God and humankind has shifted to himself.

2 The question of Jesus in this verse anticipates a "yes" answer; of course the disciples see the buildings! Jesus' forecast of the destruction of the temple complex is unambiguous, cast in OT language (cf. Jer 26:6, 18; Mic 3:12) and repeated variously elsewhere (23:38; 26:61; Lk 23:28–31).

3 The Mount of Olives (see comment on 21:1) is an appropriate site for a discourse dealing with the Parousia (cf. Zec 14:4). The disciples ask Jesus several questions privately (i.e., without the crowds around) about the temple's destruction and the signs that will presage it and about the end of the age and Jesus' return.

"The end of the age" is used six times in the NT (13:39, 40, 49; 24:3; 28:20; Heb 9:26), five of which are in Matthew and look to final judgment and the consummation of all things. Parousia ("coming"; GK 4242) is found twenty-four times in the NT, four of which are in Mt 24 (vv.3, 27, 37, 39). The term can refer to "presence," "arrival," or "coming"—the first stage of "presence"—and need not have eschatological overtones (2Co 7:6; 10:10). Yet the word is often closely tied with Jesus' glorious "appearing" or "coming" at the end of human history.

2. The birth pains (24:4–28)

a. General description of the birth pains (24:4–14)

The things referred to in vv.5–7 are signs that Jesus is coming back, and they all will be manifest before the generation Jesus was addressing had died. But though these things show that the End is near, none of them stipulates how near; and the tenor of the warning is that the delay will be substantial and that during this period Jesus' disciples must not be deceived by false messiahs.

4–5 One of the greatest temptations in times of difficulty is to follow blindly any self-proclaimed savior who promises help (i.e., false christs). Those who "come in my name" claim to be Christ himself. They come as if they were he. Would-be deliverers have appeared in every age, not least the first century (Ac 5:36).

6–8 "Birth pains" (GK 6047) stems from such OT passages as Isa 13:8; 26:17; Jer 4:31; 6:24; Mic 4:9–10. By this time it was almost a special term for "the birthpangs of the Messiah," the period of distress preceding the messianic Age. Jesus' followers should not be alarmed by the types of events referred to here. "Such things must happen"; yet the End is still to come. Why must they happen? The reason may be hidden in God's providence, but it may also be that during this time of inaugurated reign before the messianic Age attains its splendor, conflict is inevitable, precisely because the kingdom is only inaugurated. The conflict extends not only to families (10:34–37), but to nations and even nature (cf. Ro 8:20–21; Col 1:16, 20).

The effect of these verses, then, is not to curb enthusiasm for the Lord's return but to warn against false claimants and an expectation of a premature return based on misconstrued signs.

9–13 During the "birth pains" (v.8) Jesus' disciples will be persecuted and killed. "You" quite clearly extends beyond the immediate disciples and includes all the followers Jesus will have. Persecution broke out early (cf. Ac 4:1–30; 7:59–8:3; 12:1–5; Rev. 2:10, 12) and kept on during the "birth pains," against a background of hatred by the whole world (cf. Ac 28:22). Persecution is a characteristic of this age (vv.9, 21, 29)—a time when many will "turn away" from the faith and hate each other.

There is a certain parallelism between v.10 and vv.11–12. Those who turn away from the faith are deceived by false prophets, and those who hate each other do so because wickedness abounds and the love of most grows cold; only those who endure—in love (v.12) and despite persecution (vv.9–11; cf. Rev. 2:10)—will be saved (v.13). They must "stand firm to the end"; individual responsibility persists to the end of one's life, but corporate responsibility to the final consummation. Thus, part of the effect of this "tribulation" is to purify the body of professed disciples: those who endure are saved (cf. Da 11:32, 34–35).

The reasons for falling away may differ. In 13:21 the cause is persecution or tribulation; in 24:10–12 it is false prophets. But even here false prophecy finds some of its appeal in the matrix of trouble and persecution (vv.4–9) from which it emerges; and Matthew cares little whether faith is lost owing to fear of physical violence or to deception effected by false prophets. The result is the same and is to be expected throughout this age.

14 But none of this means that the Gospel of the kingdom of heaven (see comment on 4:23) is not preached or that its saving message does not spread throughout the world. Despite persecution—and often because of it (Ac 8:1, 4)—the Good News is "preached as a testimony to all nations." This expression is itself neutral (see comment on 8:4), and the Gospel will bring either salvation or a curse, depending on how it is received. Thus the theme of Gentile mission is again made explicit (see comments on 1:1, 2:1–12; 4:15–16; 28:18–20).

b. The sharp pain: the fall of Jerusalem (24:15–21)

15 Having characterized the entire age during which the Gospel of the kingdom is preached as a time of distress, Jesus goes on to talk about one part of it where there will be particularly "great distress" (v.21), centered around "the abomination that causes desolation" (GK 1007 & 2247).

This expression occurs four times in Daniel (8:13; 9:27; 11:31; 12:11). The third one clearly refers to the desecration under Antiochus Epiphanes (see comment on Da 11:31), who erected an altar to Zeus over the altar of burned offering, sacrificed a swine on it, and made the practice of Judaism a capital offense. The other references in Daniel are more disputed.

Jesus is identifying Da 9:27 and 12:11 with certain events about to take place; and the parenthetical "let the reader understand" is designed to draw the attention of the reader of Daniel to the passages' true meaning. This parenthetical aside comes from Jesus to draw the attention of his hearers who read Daniel to the importance of Daniel's words.

But to what event does Jesus make this text from Daniel refer? The obvious occasion, in general terms, is A.D. 70, though certain difficulties must be faced. For example, although "place" can refer to the city of Jerusalem, the normal meaning of "holy place" is the temple complex. But by the time the Romans had actually desecrated the temple in A.D. 70, it was too late for anyone in the city to flee.

In comparing the differences between this verse and Mk 13:14 and Lk 21:20, possibly Jesus said something ambiguous, such as Mark reports. Luke, writing for a Gentile audience less concerned with Daniel, emphasizes the aspect of warning. Matthew, believing the allusions to Daniel important for his Jewish audience because Jesus drew attention to them, makes explicit reference to "the abomination of desolation" and to "the holy place," since the setting up of the abomination in the holy place is the inevitable result of the pagan attack.

By the time the Roman military standards surrounded Jerusalem, the city had been defiled by the Zealot excesses that polluted the temple before A.D. 70 (including murder and the installation of a false high priest), when there was still time to flee. In any case, there is reasonably good tradition that Christians abandoned the city, perhaps in A.D. 68, about halfway through the siege of Jerusalem.

16–19 The instructions Jesus gives to his disciples about what to do in view of v.15 are so specific that they must be related to the Jewish War. The devastation would stretch far beyond the city; people all throughout the land of Judea should flee to the mountains and hide in caves. Most roofs were flat—pleasant places in the cool of the day. Verse 17 implies such haste that fugitives would not take time to run downstairs to take anything with them but would run from roof to roof to evacuate the city as quickly as possible. People in the fields would not have time to go home for their cloaks. It would be especially dreadful for pregnant women and nursing mothers.

20 Flight is obviously harder in winter. As for fleeing on the Sabbath, travel would become more difficult because few would help, and many would try to prevent traveling farther than a Sabbath day's journey. Jesus clearly expects these events to take place while the strict Sabbath law is in effect.

21 "For" introduces the reason for flight in vv.17–20: "great distress" (GK 3489 & 2568) and unprecedented suffering (cf. Da 12:1; Rev 7:14). The savagery, slaughter, disease, and famine would be monstrous, "unequaled from the beginning of the world until now," and, according to Jesus, "never to be equaled again." There have been greater numbers of deaths—six million in the Nazi death camps, mostly Jews, and an estimated twenty million under Stalin—but never so high a percentage of a great city's population so thoroughly and painfully exterminated and enslaved as during the Fall of Jerusalem. From such distress Jesus' followers were to flee.

Jesus' comment in v.21 that such "great distress" is never to be equaled implies that it cannot refer to the Tribulation at the end of the age; for if what happens next is the Millennium or the new heaven and the new earth, it seems inane to say that such "great distress" will not take place again. At the same time, by these remarks Jesus finishes his description of Jerusalem.

c. Warnings against false messiahs during the birth pains (24:22–28)

22 Many problems in interpreting the Olivet Discourse relate to the assumption that "those days" here refers to the period described in vv.15–21 and v.29. But there are excellent reasons for concluding that vv.22–28 refer to the general period of distress introduced by vv.4–14 and that therefore "those days" refers to the entire period of which vv.15–21 are only one part. (1) The term "elect" (GK 1723; in Matthew only at 22:14; 24:22, 24, 31; cf. 20:16) most naturally refers to all true believers, chosen by God; so it is reasonable to assume that it does so here. (2) Similarly, "no one" (lit. "all flesh") normally refers to all humankind and is more sweeping than "no one in Jerusalem." (3) The themes of the ensuing verses have already been taken up as characteristics of the entire age (vv.4–14), especially the warning against false christs (cf. vv.4–5). (4) It has already been shown that v.21 makes a suitable ending to vv.15–21.

If this interpretation is correct, then v.22 tells us that this age of evangelism and distress—wars, famines, persecution, hatred, false prophets—will become so bad that, if not checked, no one would survive. In a century that has seen two world wars and has had more Christian martyrs than in all the previous nineteen centuries put together, Jesus' prediction does not seem farfetched. But the age will not run its course; it will be cut short. Thus believers can look for God's sovereign, climactic intervention without predicting dates.

23–25 Empty-headed credulity is as great an enemy of true faith as chronic skepticism. Christian faith involves the sober responsibility of neither believing lies nor trusting impostors. As false christs and false prophets proliferate (v.24), so will their heralds (v.23). Jesus' disciples must not be deceived, even by spectacular signs and miracles. The impostor is perennial (Dt 13:1–4; Rev 13:13).

"If that were possible" refers to the intent of the deceivers: they intend to deceive, if possible, even the elect—though Jesus makes no comment on how ultimately successful such attacks will be. That Jesus tells these things in advance (v.25) not only warns and strengthens his followers (cf. Jn 16:4) but also authenticates him (cf. Dt 13:1–4; Jn 14:29).

26–27 It is pointless to look for Messiah's return in the desert or in inner rooms—whether in some desert monastic community or in some hidden, unrecognized enclave for insiders. Far from it! The coming of the Son of Man will be public and unquestionable, not confined to some little group of initiates. As the lightning comes out of the east but is everywhere visible, so also the coming of the Son of Man will be visible to all people everywhere.

28 Jesus quotes a proverb about a "vulture." The proverb itself is a difficult one. It is likely a colorful way of saying that things come to pass at just the right time; therefore, it applies here to the Parousia of the Son of Man which comes at just the right time. Concluding this broader section (vv.4–28) is this thought: Do not be too eager for Christ's coming, or you will be deceived by false claimants (vv.23, 26). When he comes, his coming will be unmistakable (v.27), in God's own time (v.28)—a time when the world will be ripe for divine judgment.

3. The coming of the Son of Man (24:29–31)

29 For general arguments that vv.29–31 refer to Jesus' Parousia, not the coming of the Son of Man in the events of A.D. 70, see comments on vv.1–3. The reference to "the distress of those days" goes back to vv.9, 22, not to the "great distress" of vv.15–21. Thus the celestial signs and the coming of the Son of Man do not immediately follow "the abomination that causes desolation" but "the distress of those days"—i.e., of the entire interadvent period of persecution and tribulation.

The cosmic portents (cf. esp. Isa 13:9–10; 34:4) are probably meant to be taken literally, because of the climactic nature of the Son of Man's final self-disclosure. Yet this is not certain, since in some political contexts similar expressions are used metaphorically (see comments on vv.1–13).

30 With regard to the "sign of the Son of Man," "sign" (GK 4956) commonly meant "ensign" or "standard," a word regularly associated with the final gathering of the people of God (cf. v.31; Isa 11:12; 18:3; 27:13; 49:22; Jer 4:21; 6:1; 51:27). Therefore "sign" has two different meanings in this chapter (vv.3, 30)—a phenomenon common enough in the NT. Theologically this means that the kingdom is being consummated. The standard, the banner of the Son of Man, unfurls in the heavens, as he himself returns in splendor and power.

The event will prompt "all the nations of the earth" to mourn, an allusion to Zec 12:10–12; in Zechariah the reference is to the tribes of Israel in the land, and the mourning is that of repentance. But we must probe for a deeper link. What we discover is an implicit a fortiori argument. In Zec 12, the Lord enables the house of David and Judah to crush its enemies; and as a result the Jews weep, apparently in contrition for their past sins in light of God's merciful deliverance and salvation. But it is the Gentile enemies who are crushed. If, then, the Jews face judgment and mourning (Mt 24:15–21), even though not only Jerusalem but also all nations (v.9) have hated Jesus' disciples, how much more will all the nations of the earth, to whom the Gospel has been preached (v.14), also mourn at the Parousia, when the lost opportunities and the persecution of Jesus through persecuting his disciples are seen as they truly are!

The next allusion in v.30 is to Da 7:13–14. In Daniel "one like a son of man" approaches God to receive all authority, glory, and sovereign power—"an everlasting dominion that will not pass away." In the framework of NT eschatology, we may imagine Jesus the Son of Man receiving the kingdom through his resurrection and ascension, so that now all authority is his (28:18). Yet it is equally possible to think of him receiving the kingdom at the consummation, when his reign or kingdom becomes direct and immediate, uncontested and universal. Christ's approaching God the Father to receive the kingdom is combined with his returning to earth to set up the consummated kingdom. This interpretation goes well with its vivid context.

The Son of Man, whose standard has been unfurled, comes "on the clouds of heaven" (cf. 26:64; Rev 14:14–16). The clouds symbolize God's presence (see comment on 17:5): Immanuel ("God with us") comes "with power and great glory." The latter phrase not only ensures that the coming is universally witnessed and unmistakably plain (cf. vv.26–28, 30) but may allude to Isa 11:10: the nations will rally to "the Root of Jesse," and his place of rest will be (lit.) "the Glory."

31 The sound of a loud trumpet (cf. Isa 27:13; 1Co 15:52; 1Th 4:16) is a common eschatological figure. This verse is related to 13:41. For comments on "his elect," see v.22. The "four winds" represent the four points of the compass (Eze 37:9; Da 8:8; 11:4): the elect are gathered from all over (cf. 8:11), from every place under the sky, since that is how far the Gospel of the kingdom will have been preached (v.14). Although all nations of the earth will mourn, nevertheless the elect are drawn from them.

4. The significance of the birth pains (24:32–35)

32–33 The "lesson" (lit., "parable"; GK 4130) of the fig tree (cf. 21:18–22) is based on the common observation that the twigs get tender before summer and arouse expectations of summer (v.32). It points to the relation between "all these things" and "it is near" (v.33). Though the antecedent of "it" is uncertain (the Parousia or Jesus), the nearness of the Second Advent is certainly in view. "All these things" is more problematic; most likely it refers to the distress of vv. 4–28—the tribulation that comes on believers throughout the period between Jesus' ascension and Parousia.

Having warned his disciples of the course of this age (vv.4–28) and told them of its climax in the Parousia (vv.29–31), Jesus now answers the part of his disciples' questions (v.3) dealing with timing. He makes two points. (1) "All these things" (vv.4–28) must happen; and then the Parousia is "near, right at the door"—"imminent." In other words the Parousia is the next major step in God's redemptive purposes. (2) This does not mean that the period of distress pinpoints the Parousia, for "no one knows about that day or hour" (vv.36–42).

34 "I tell you the truth" emphasizes the importance of what it introduces. "This generation" (GK 1155; see comments on 11:16; 12:41–42; 23:36) can only with the greatest difficulty be made to mean anything other than the generation living when Jesus spoke. Yet it does not follow that Jesus mistakenly thought the Parousia would occur within his hearers' lifetime. If our interpretation of this chapter is right, all that v.34 demands is that the distress of vv.4–28, including Jerusalem's fall, happened within the lifetime of the generation then living. This does not mean that the distress must end within that time but only that "all these things" must happen within it.

35 The authority and eternal validity of Jesus' words are nothing less than the authority and eternal validity of God's words (Ps 119:89–90; Isa 40:6–8).

5. The day and hour unknown: the need to be prepared (24:36–41)

36 Many commentators read v.36 with the preceding paragraph; but it goes much better with the following verses, which constitute an exhortation to vigilance precisely because, the day and the hour being unknown to humanity, life goes on as it always has. In the Greek, v.37 begins with the word "for."

The gist of v.36 is clear enough. Jesus' disciples are morally bound to repress all desires to know what no one knows but the Father—not even angels or the Son. If the Son himself does not know the time of the Parousia, we too should respect that ignorance and leave things in the Father's hands. On Jesus' self-confessed ignorance here, see comment on Mk 13:32.

37–39 That the coming of the Son of Man takes place at an unknown time can only be true if in fact life seems to be going on pretty much as usual—just as in the days before the Flood. People continue to follow their ordinary pursuits (v.38). Despite the distress, persecutions, and upheavals (vv.4–28), life goes on: people eat, drink, and marry. In the human condition massive distress and normal life patterns coexist. For the believer the former point to the end; the latter warn of its unexpectedness.

40–41 These two vignettes stress the unexpectedness of the event by means of the sudden cleavage between two people. Two men are working in a field; one is taken, the other left. Two women work their hand mill—one normally operated by two women squatting opposite each other with the mill between them, each woman in turn pulling the stone around 180 degrees. The two are apt to be sisters, mother and daughter, or two household slaves. Yet no matter how close their relationship, at the Parousia one is taken, the other left (cf. 10:35–36).

6. Parabolic teaching: variations on watchfulness (24:42–25:46)

a. The homeowner and the thief (24:42–44)

Each of the five parables in 24:42–25:46 deals with some aspect of watchfulness. But watchfulness is not always passive: duties and responsibilities must be discharged by Jesus' followers (24:45–51), and foresight and wisdom are important (25:1–13). Responsible living under Jesus' directives is rewarded in the end (25:4–46).

42–44 The first parable teaches both the unexpectedness of the return of "your Lord" and the church's willingness to call Jesus "the Lord," a religious title hitherto reserved by the Jews for God himself (1Co 12:3; 2Th 2:2; see comments on 7:22–23; 8:21). It might be better to take "understand" (GK 1182) as an indicative ("you know") rather than an imperative: the disciples know that an owner of a house would be awake and watching if he knew when a thief was coming. Since no one knows at what "watch" a thief might strike, constant vigilance is required. Similarly, we must also always be ready because in this one respect—the unexpectedness of his coming—the Son of Man resembles a thief.

b. The two servants (24:45–51)

The good servant is prepared for the Lord's return at any time, is faithful throughout his delay, and in the end is highly rewarded. The wicked servant is faithless in fulfilling responsibilities, abusive to fellow servants, and lax in waiting for the master's return; that servant ultimately earns the expected punishment.

45–47 The "servant" in this parable is the head over all the domestics. This, however, does not so much limit the application of the parable to leaders as establish that their responsibilities entail good personal relationships (v.49), requiring exemplary conduct and precluding harshness and lording it over others. The good servant is faithful and prudent, doing what is assigned him. When his master returns, he is "blessed" (see comment on 5:3) and promoted (v.47).

48–51 If the servant is wicked and lacks faithfulness and wisdom (v.45), he may convince himself that the master "is staying away a long time"—perhaps a subtle hint that the Parousia could be considerably delayed (cf. 25:19). The wicked servant uses the delay to abuse his fellow servants and carouse (v.49). But the wicked servant, surprised and unprepared for his master's return, is put with the "hypocrites." His lot is with the punishment given those most constantly held up as vile in this gospel (6:2, 5, 16; 16:3; 23:13–29). The master "will cut him to pieces" (cf. 1Sa 15:33; Heb 11:37)—a most severe and awful punishment—and he joins the hypocrites in weeping and grinding of teeth (cf. 8:12).

c. The ten virgins (25:1–13)

This parable has several comparative features (for discussion of parable and allegory, see introductory comment on Mk 4). The idea of Messiah as a bridegroom springs from such OT passages as Isa 54:4–6; 62:4–5; Eze 16:7–34; Hos 2:19. There the Lord is portrayed as the "husband" of his people. We have noted how readily Jesus in his parables places himself in the Lord's place (see comment on 13:37–39). Moreover, both John the Baptist (Jn 3:27–30) and Jesus himself (Mt 9:15; Mk 2:19–20) have already made the equation that Jesus = Messiah = bridegroom.

The plot in this parable turns on the bridegroom's delay (cf. the previous parable) and the need for preparedness for the Son of Man. The foolish virgins do not forget to bring oil; rather, the delay of the bridegroom shows they did not bring enough. The delay of the Parousia requires certain types of behavior (24:45–51; 25:14–30), especially in light of the unexpectedness of Jesus' return. Thus the parable of the virgins fits well into this sequence of parables and agrees with what we know Jesus taught. The first parable (24:42–44) warned of the unexpectedness of Messiah's coming. The second (24:45–51) showed that more than passive watchfulness is required: there must be behavior acceptable to the master, the discharge of allotted responsibilities. This third parable (25:1–13) now stresses the need for preparedness in the face of an unexpectedly long delay.

1 At the time of the return of the Son of Man, this parable will become relevant; the kingdom of heaven will become like the story of the ten virgins.

The setting is fairly clear from what we know of the marriage customs of the day. Normally the bridegroom with some close friends left his home to go to the bride's home, where there were various ceremonies, followed by a procession through the streets—after nightfall—to his home. The ten virgins may be bridesmaids who have been assisting the bride; and they expect to meet the groom as he comes from the bride's house. Everyone in the procession was expected to carry his or her own torch. Those without a torch would be assumed to be party crashers or even brigands. The festivities, which could last several days, would formally get under way at the groom's house.

Jesus refers to ten (a favorite round number; e.g., Ru 4:2; Lk 19:13) maidens who were invited to the wedding. The "lamps" are here either small oil-fed lamps or, more plausibly, torches whose rags would need periodic dowsing with oil to keep them burning. In either case the prudent would bring along a flask with an additional oil supply.

2–5 The "wise" (GK 5861) are called such because they are prepared for the bridegroom's delayed coming. Both wise and "foolish" (GK 3704) wait and doze; no praise or blame attaches to either group for this. The sole distinction between the two groups is this: the wise bring not only oil in their lamps but an extra supply in separate jars, while the foolish bring either no extra oil or no oil at all. The wise are prepared for delay; the foolish expect to meet the groom, but are either utterly unprepared or unprepared if he is delayed. And the bridegroom is a long time coming (24:48; 25:19).

6–9 At midnight (a symbol of the end of time) "the cry rang out." All the virgins wake up and trim their lamps; but the lamps of the foolish virgins quickly go out. The wise virgins cannot help them; that is, the foresight and preparedness of the wise virgins cannot benefit the foolish virgins when the eschatological crisis dawns (vv.8–9). Preparedness can neither be transferred nor shared.

10–13 The bridegroom comes, the wise virgins enter, and the door is shut. The intense cries of the ill-prepared and foolish latecomers are of no avail. Because this parable concerns the consummation, the refusal to recognize or admit the foolish virgins must not be construed as calloused rejection of their lifelong desire to enter the kingdom. Far from it: it is the rejection of those who, despite appearances, never made preparation for the coming of the kingdom. The final verse reiterates the main theme of the parable mentioned: Be prepared! "Keep watch[ing]"!

d. The talents (25:14–30)

This parable goes beyond the first three (24:42–25:13) in that it expects the watchfulness of the servants to manifest itself during the master's absence, not only in preparedness and performance of duty, even if there is a long delay, but in an improvement of the allotted "talents" until the day of reckoning.

14 The introduction to this parable is somewhat abrupt; probably it is so tightly associated with the last one that it shares its introduction. Servants (lit., "slaves"; GK 1528) in the ancient world could enjoy considerable responsibility and authority. The man going on a journey entrusts his cash assets to three of his slaves who are understood to be almost partners in his affairs and who may share some of his profits. The departure and the property are integral parts of the story and should not be allegorized to refer to the Ascension and the gifts of the Spirit.

15 Modern English uses the word "talent" for skills and mental powers God has entrusted to men; but in NT times the "talent" (GK 5419) was a unit of exchange. Estimates of its value vary enormously for several reasons. (1) A talent could be of gold, silver, or copper, each with its own value. (2) The talent was first a measure according to weight, between 58 and 80 pounds, and then a unit of coinage, with a one common value assigned it (e.g., 6,000 denarii). (3) Modern inflation continues to change the value of a talent. Thus it is more sensible to compare the talent with modern currency in terms of earning power. If a talent was worth 6,000 denarii, then it would take a day laborer twenty years to earn so much. So the sums are vast. Moreover the talents are distributed according to the master's evaluation of his servants' capacities. The parable, therefore, lays intrinsic emphasis on the principle, "from the one who has been entrusted with much, much more will be asked" (Lk 12:28).

16–18 "At once" relates to the good servants' promptness to put the money to work by setting up some business and working with the capital to make it grow. They felt the responsibility of their assignment and went to work without delay. But one servant, unwilling to work or take risks, merely dug a hole and buried the money. This was safer than the deposit systems of the time.

19–23 The accounting begins "after a long time," the implication being that the consummation of the kingdom will be long delayed (24:48; 25:5). "Settled accounts" is a standard commercial term. The first servant, who doubled his five talents, is praised especially for his faithfulness and is given two things: increased responsibility and a share in his master's "joy." Jesus suggests by this that the consummated kingdom will provide glorious new responsibilities and holy delight (cf. Ro 8:17).

The second servant has likewise been faithful with what had been given him; he hears the same words as the first servant and receives increased responsibility to the limits of his capacity.

24–25 The third servant accuses his master of grasping, exploiting the labor of others, and putting the servant in an invidious position. Should he take the risk of trying to increase the one talent entrusted to him, he would see little of the profit. If he failed and lost everything, he would incur the master's wrath. Perhaps, too, he is piqued at having been given much less than the other two; so, in a rather spiteful act, he returns to his master what belongs to him, no more and no less.

What this servant overlooks is his responsibility to his master and his obligation to discharge his assigned duties. Such failure betrays his lack of love for his master, which he masks by blaming his master and excusing himself. Only the wicked servant blames his master. Grace never condones irresponsibility; even those given less are obligated to use and develop what they have.

26–27 The master condemns the servant on the basis of the servant's own words, which prove his guilt. If the master really was so harsh and greedy, should not the servant at least have put the money where it would have been relatively safe, earned interest, and required no work?

The OT forbade Israelites from charging interest against one another (Ex 22:25; Lev 25:35–37; Dt 23:19), but interest on money loaned to Gentiles was permitted (Dt 23:20). By NT times Jewish scholars already distinguished between "lending at interest" and "usury." It is wrong to assume that Jesus is here either supporting the Jewish tradition or setting aside the OT law. The question does not arise, for Jesus' parables are so flexible that he sometimes uses examples of evil to make a point about good (e.g., Lk 16:1–9; 18:1–8).

28–30 The talent entrusted to this wicked servant is taken from him, and the relationship between master and servant is severed. The talent is given to the man who now has ten talents, following the kingdom rule Jesus had already taught in 13:12. The wicked servant is "worthless," for to fail to do good and use what God has entrusted to us is grievous sin, which results not only in the loss of neglected resources but in rejection by the master, banishment from his presence, and tears and grinding of teeth.

The parable insists that the watchfulness that must mark all Jesus' disciples may not lead to passivity but to doing one's duty, to growing and developing the resources God entrusts to us, until "after a long time" (v.19) the master returns and settles accounts.

e. The sheep and the goats (25:31–46)

Strictly speaking, this passage is not a parable. Its only parabolic elements are the shepherd, the sheep, the goats, and the actual separation. It clearly functions in this discourse somewhat as 10:40–42 (with which it has some connections) does in the second discourse.

While the majority of scholars understand "the least of these brothers of mine" (vv.40, 45) to refer to all who are hungry, distressed, and needy, it seems more in keeping with Matthew to see the phrase as referring to Jesus' disciples (12:48–49; 28:10; cf. 23:8). The fate of the nations will be determined by how they respond to Jesus' followers, who are charged with spreading the Gospel and who do so in the face of hunger, thirst, illness, and imprisonment. Good deeds done to them, even the least of them, are not only works of compassion and morality but reflect where people stand in relation to the kingdom and to Jesus himself. Jesus identifies himself with the fate of his followers and makes compassion for them equivalent to compassion for himself.

31 Nowhere in this discourse does Jesus explicitly identify the "Son of Man" with himself. But since this epithet is used in answer to the question "What will be the sign of your coming?" (24:3), the inference is inescapable. There are clear allusions to Zec 14:5; but the role of eschatological Judge is, like many other things (see comment on 13:37–39), transferred without hesitation from the Lord to Jesus. The Son of Man will come "in his heavenly glory" (cf. 16:27; 24:30; 1Th 4:16; 2Th 1:8). He sits on his throne, not only as Judge, but as King (see v.34); for all of divine authority is mediated through him (28:18; cf. 1Co 15:25; Heb 12:2). (On the role of the angels, see 13:41–42; 24:31; 2Th 1:7–8; Rev 14:17–20.)

32–33 Presupposed is the fulfillment of 24:14. "All the nations" means "all peoples." As the Gospel of the kingdom is preached to Gentiles as well as Jews, so also must all stand before the King.

In the countryside sheep and goats mingled during the day. At night they were often separated: sheep tolerated the cool air, but goats had to be herded together for warmth. The right hand is the place of power and honor.

34–40 The change from "Son of Man" (see comment on Mk 8:31) to "King" (vv.31, 34) is not at all unnatural; for the Son of Man in Da 7:13–14 approaches the Ancient of Days to receive "a kingdom," and here that kingdom is consummated (see comment on 24:30). The kingship motif has long since been hinted at or, on occasion, made fairly explicit to certain persons (see 3:2; 4:17; 16:28; 19:28). Yet Jesus still associates his work with his Father, something he loves to do (10:32–33; 11:25–27; et al.). He addresses the sheep, "Come, you who are blessed by my Father." They are "blessed" (GK 2328) inasmuch as they now receive their inheritance (Ro 8:17; Rev 21:7), which presupposes a relationship with him. That inheritance is the kingdom (comments on 3:2; 4:17). This glorious inheritance, the consummated kingdom, was the Father's plan for them from the beginning.

The reason they are invited to take their inheritance is that they have served the King's "brothers" (cf. Isa 58:7). The reason for admission to the kingdom in this parable is more evidential than causative, as is suggested by the surprise of the righteous (vv.37–39). When he is questioned, the King replies that doing the deeds mentioned to the least of his brothers is equivalent to doing it to him (v.40), and by implication to refuse help to the King's brothers is sacrilege.

41–45 The condemnation is even more awful than in 7:23. The "goats" are cursed: they are banished from the King's presence and sent to the eternal fire. Hell is here described in categories familiar to Jews (see 3:12; 5:22; 18:8; Jude 7; Rev 20:10–15; see comment on Mk 9:42–49). The kingdom was prepared for the righteous (v.34); hell was prepared for the Devil and his angels but also serves as the doom of those guilty of the sins of omission of which Jesus here speaks—refusing to show compassion to King Messiah through helping the least of his brothers. There is no significance in the fact that the "goats" address Jesus as "Lord," for at this point there is no exception whatever to confessing Jesus as Lord (cf. Php 2:11).

More important is the surprise of the sheep (vv.37–39) and the goats (v.44), a major part of the parable, though rarely discussed. Three things can be said with confidence. (1) Neither the sheep nor the goats are surprised at the place the King assigns them but rather at the reason given for this—i.e., that they are admitted or excluded on the basis of how they treated Jesus. (2) The surprise of the righteous makes it impossible to think that works of righteousness win salvation. The sheep did not show love to gain a final reward, not did the goats fail to show it to flout final retribution. (3) The parable therefore presents a test eliminating the possibility of hypocrisy. If the goats had thought that their treatment of Jesus' "brothers" would gain them the kingdom, they would doubtless have treated them compassionately. But Jesus is interested in a righteousness of the whole person, a righteousness that comes from the heart. As people respond to his disciples and align themselves with their distress and afflictions, they align themselves with the Messiah who identifies himself with them. True disciples will love one another and serve the least brother with compassion; in so doing they unconsciously serve Christ. Those who have little sympathy for the Gospel of the kingdom will remain indifferent and, in so doing, reject King Messiah (cf. Ac 9:5).

We must not think that the Bible is unconcerned for the poor and the oppressed (Dt 15:11; Mt 22:37–40; 26:11; Gal 2:10), but that is not the center of interest here.

46 The same word "eternal" (GK 173) modifies "punishment" and "life." This word refers to life or punishment in the age to come; it is "everlasting."

7. Transitional conclusion: fourth major passion prediction and the plot against Jesus (26:1–5)

1–2 For the other major passion predictions, see comments on 16:21; 17:22–23; 20:18–19. One last time Matthew uses the formula by which he brings all his discourses to a close (v.1; see comment on 7:28–29). In the narrative line of Matthew, this pericope is a masterpiece of irony. The Judge of the universe, King Messiah, the glorious Son of Man, is about to be judged.

The Passover began Thursday afternoon with the slaughter of the lamb. According to the tentative chronology, Jesus spoke these words on the Mount of Olives late Tuesday evening, which, by Jewish reckoning, would be the beginning of Wednesday (see comment on Mk 14:1–2, 12).

The "Son of Man" (see comment on Mk 8:31) is here both glorious and suffering: as often, the themes merge. The Passover is two days away; and it is during that festival that Jesus reveals for the first time that the Son of Man will be "handed over" (GK 4140) to be crucified. Thus Jesus provides a framework for his disciples to interpret his death correctly after it happens—a framework alluded to a little more clearly in the institution of the Lord's Supper (vv.17–29).

3–5 Opposition to Jesus had been rising for some time (cf. 12:14; 21:45–46). God, however, is in control of these events. The leaders may plot; but if Jesus dies, he dies as a voluntary Passover sacrifice (vv.53–54; Jn 10:18).

Caiaphas is called the high priest in Matthew and John (11:49); Luke (Lk 3:2; Ac 4:6) specifies Annas. There is no real conflict. Annas was deposed by the secular authorities in A.D. 15 and replaced by Caiaphas, who lived and ruled till his death in A.D. 36. But since according to the OT the high priest was not to be replaced till after his death, the transfer of power was illegal. Doubtless some continued to call either man "high priest." Certainly Annas, Caiaphas's father-in-law (Jn 18:13), continued to exercise great authority behind the scenes.

The combination of "assembled" and "plotted" in vv.3–4 strongly suggests an allusion to Ps 31:13 (cf. also Ps. 31:5; Lk 23:46). Earlier that day the leaders had wanted to arrest Jesus but dared not do so for fear of the people (21:46). Now they decide to do away with Jesus, recognizing that they must do this by stealth so as not to excite the crowds and start a riot (see comments on Mk 14:2, 10–11).

VII. The Passion and Resurrection of Jesus (26:6–28:20)

A. The Passion (26:6–27:66)

1. Anointed at Bethany (26:6–13)

This story begins the sixth narrative-and-teaching division of Matthew (26:6–28:20). with the teaching to be done by Jesus' disciples after his ascension (see 28:18–20 and the introduction, under "Structure"). From another viewpoint the Passion and Resurrection must, as in all the Gospels, be seen as the climax toward which the earlier narrative has been moving.

6–7 This is the second time Jesus was anointed, the first time being recorded in Lk 7:36–50 (on Bethany, see comment on 21:1–2). Matthew sets the scene in the home of "Simon the Leper," who was presumably cured—or else all there were violating Mosaic law. The action of the woman was not unprecedented: a distinguished rabbi might have been so honored. The evangelists stress the cost of the "perfume"; John suggests that it was worth approximately a year's salary for a working man (Jn 12:3). This perfume was possibly from the nard plant (native to India); it was extracted from the thin-necked alabaster flask by snapping off the neck.

8–9 With Judas as their spokesman (see Jn 12:4–5), the disciples fail to understand what is taking place, not only in the anointing, but also in who Jesus truly is and in the rush of redemptive events toward the Cross (see comments on 16:21–28; 17:22–23; 20:18–19). Doubtless there were thousands of poor people within a few miles of this anointing.

10–11 It is possible that Jesus' knowledge of the complaints is here supernatural; but perhaps they were whispered and came to Jesus' attention because they troubled the woman. Jesus begins his rebuke by accusing the disciples of "bothering" her. What they call waste, Jesus calls "a beautiful thing."

Jesus distinguishes between giving to the poor and the extravagance lavished on himself on the grounds that he will not always be physically present to receive it (cf. 28:20). His followers will always find poor people to help (cf. Dt 15:11). Implicitly, the distinction Jesus makes is a high Christological claim, for it not only shows that he foresees his impending departure but also that he himself, who is truly "gentle and humble in heart" (11:29), deserves this lavish outpouring of love and expense.

12–13 The anointing does not designate Jesus as Messiah but "prepares" him for his burial after dying the death of a criminal, for only in that circumstance would the customary anointing of the body be omitted. Jesus' defense of the woman does not necessarily mean that the woman understood what she was doing, though it allows this. Jesus may well be using the anointing to intimate again his impending crucifixion (cf. v.2). Jesus ends this incident by stating that the woman and her deed would be remembered wherever the Gospel of the kingdom is preached.

2. Judas's betrayal agreement (26:14–16)

All the Gospels speak of Judas's important role in Jesus' death but none explains what motives prompted his treachery. Like most human motives, his were mixed and doubtless included avarice and jealousy combined with profound disappointment that Jesus was not acting like the Messiah he had expected.

14–16 In Judas's view Jesus was acting less and less regal and more and more like a defeatist on his way to death. Judas may also have been smarting from Jesus' rebuke over the anointing of the woman as recorded in Jn 12:4–8. He therefore approaches the "chief priests" with an offer to hand Jesus over. They "counted out for him thirty silver coins," calling to mind Zec 11:12, to which Matthew will return in 27:3–10. In Zec 11, thirty pieces of silver is a paltry amount—the value of a slave accidentally gored to death by an ox (Ex 21:32). That Jesus is lightly esteemed is reflected not only in his betrayal

PASSION WEEK

1. ARRIVAL IN BETHANY — FRIDAY — Jn 12:1

Jesus arrived in Bethany six days before the Passover to spend some time with his friends, Mary, Martha and Lazarus. While here, Mary anointed his feet with costly perfume as an act of humility. This tender expression indicated Mary's devotion to Jesus and her willingness to serve him.

2. SABBATH — DAY OF REST — SATURDAY — Not mentioned in the Gospels

Since this day was the Sabbath, the Lord spent the day in traditional fashion with his friends.

3. THE TRIUMPHAL ENTRY — SUNDAY — Mt 21:1-11; Mk 11:1-11; Lk 19:28-44; Jn 12:12-19

On the first day of the week Jesus rode into Jerusalem on a donkey, fulfilling an ancient prophecy (Zec 9:9). The crowd welcomed him with "Hosanna" and the words of Ps 118:25-26, thus ascribing to him a Messianic title as the agent of the Lord, the coming King of Israel.

4. CLEARING OF THE TEMPLE — MONDAY — Mt 21:10-17; Mk 11:15-18; Lk 19:45-48

On this day he returned to the temple and found the court of the Gentiles full of traders and money changers making a large profit as they gave out Jewish coins in exchange for "pagan" money. Jesus drove them out and overturned their tables.

5. DAY OF CONTROVERSY AND PARABLES — TUESDAY — Mt 21:23–24:51; Mk 11:27–13:37; Lk 20:1–21:36

In Jerusalem - Jesus evaded the traps set by the priests.
On the Mount of Olives Overlooking Jerusalem - He taught in parables and warned the people against the Pharisees. He predicted the destruction of Herod's great temple and told his disciples about future events, including his own return.

6. DAY OF REST — WEDNESDAY — Not mentioned in the Gospels

The Scriptures do not mention this day, but the counting of the days (Mk 14:1; Jn 12:1) seems to indicate that there was another day concerning which the Gospels record nothing.

7. PASSOVER LAST SUPPER — THURSDAY — Mt 26:17-30; Mk 14:12-26; Lk 22:7-23; Jn 13:1-30

In an upper room Jesus prepared both himself and his disciples for his death. He gave the Passover meal a new meaning. The loaf of bread and cup of wine represented his body soon to be sacrificed and his blood soon to be shed. And so he instituted the "Lord's Supper." After singing a hymn they went to the Garden of Gethsemane, where Jesus prayed in agony, knowing what lay ahead for him.

8. CRUCIFIXION — FRIDAY — Mt 27:1-66; Mk 15:1-47; Lk 22:66–23:56; Jn 18:28–19:37

Following betrayal, arrest, desertion, false trials, denial, condemnation, beatings and mockery, Jesus was required to carry his cross to "The Place of the Skull," where he was crucified with two other prisoners.

9. IN THE TOMB — FRIDAY — Mt 27:57-61; Mk 15:42-47; Lk 23:50-56; Jn 19:38-42

Jesus' body was placed in the tomb before 6:00 P.M. Friday night, when the Sabbath began and all work stopped, and it lay in the tomb throughout the Sabbath.

10. RESURRECTION — SUNDAY — Mt 28:1-13; Mk 16:1-20; Lk 24:1-49; Jn 20:1-31

Early in the morning, women went to the tomb and found that the stone closing the tomb's entrance had been rolled back. An angel told them Jesus was alive and gave them a message. Jesus appeared to Mary Magdalene in the garden, to Peter, to two disciples on the road to Emmaus, and later that day to all the disciples but Thomas. His resurrection was established as a fact.

but also in the low sum agreed on by Judas and the chief priests.

For a brief discussion of the chronology here, see comments on Mk 14:1–2, 12, as well as EBC 8:528–32.

3. The Lord's Supper (26:17–30)

a. Preparations for the Passover (26:17–19)

17 Toward midafternoon of Thursday, 14 Nisan (see comment on Mk 14:1–2), the lambs (one per "household"—a convenient group of perhaps ten or twelve people) would be brought to the temple court where the priests sacrificed them. The priests took the blood and passed it in basins along a line till it was poured out at the foot of the altar. They also burned the lambs' fat on the altar of burnt offerings. The singing of the Hallel (Pss 113–18) accompanied these steps.

After sunset (i.e., now 15 Nisan), the "household" would gather in a home to eat the Passover lamb, which by this time would have been roasted with bitter herbs. The head of the household began the meal with the thanksgiving for that feast day and for the wine, praying over the first of four cups. A preliminary course of greens and bitter herbs was followed by the Passover haggadah—in which a boy would ask the meaning of all this, and the head of the household would explain the symbols in terms of the Exodus—and by the singing of the first part of the Hallel (Ps 113 or Pss 113–114). Though the precise order is disputed, apparently a second cup of wine introduced the main course, which was followed by a third cup, known as the "cup of blessing," accompanied by another prayer of thanksgiving. The participants then sang the rest of the Hallel (Pss 114–18 or 115–18) and probably drank a fourth cup of wine. Thus the preparations about which the disciples were asking were extensive.

18–19 The disciples (perhaps only two of them, Mk 14:13) are told to find an unnamed person, who would show them a room to prepare for Jesus' final Passover meal. His words "My appointed time is near" were probably purposely ambiguous. To the disciples and the owner of the house, they may have implied Jesus' timing for the Passover meal and prior arrangements for it. In the light of Easter, the words must refer to the now impending Crucifixion, the fulfillment of Jesus' mission.

The disciples do as Jesus has instructed them. He is quietly and consciously taking the necessary steps to complete his mission of tragedy and glory.

b. Prediction of the betrayal (26:20–25)

20–22 The Passover meal could not be eaten till after sundown; and for those living within Palestine, it had to be eaten inside Jerusalem or not at all. That is why we find Jesus reclining at a table in a room in the city "when evening came." Once the meal began Jesus solemnly says, "I tell you the truth, one of you will betray [GK 4140; cf. 26:2] me." The disciples respond uniformly: one after another, as the enormity of the charge sinks in, each man asks, "Surely not I, Lord?"

23 Jesus' point in this verse is that the betrayer is a friend, someone close, someone sharing the common dish, thus heightening the enormity of the betrayal. If the main course, the roast lamb, was being eaten, the "bowl" would contain herbs and a fruit puree, which would be scooped out with bread.

24 For "woe," see comment on 23:13; for "Son of Man," see comment on Mk 8:31. Here the Son of Man is simultaneously the glorious messianic figure who receives a kingdom and the Suffering Servant. No single OT verse explains "as it is written of him"; but one may think of passages such as Isa 53:7–9; Da 9:26, or else suppose that an entire prophetic typology (see comment on 2:15; 5:17–20) is in view, such as the Passover lamb.

The divine necessity for the sacrifice of the Son of Man does not excuse or mitigate the crime of betrayal. Divine sovereignty and human responsibility are both involved in Judas's treason, the one effecting salvation and bringing redemption history to its fulfillment, the other answering the promptings of an evil heart (cf. Ac 2:22–23; 4:27–28). The one results in salvation from sin for Messiah's people (1:21), the other in personal and eternal ruin.

25 This exchange magnifies Judas's effrontery. Doubtless Judas felt he had to speak up; silence at this stage might have given him away to the others. In contrast to the other disciples (v.22), he uses "Rabbi," a title for a respected teacher. As in v.22, the form of the question anticipates a negative answer, but the expected answer bears no necessary relation to the real answer. Jesus' response is affirmative but depends somewhat on spoken intonation for its full force. It could be taken to mean "You have said it, not I" (cf. NIV note); yet in fact it is enough of an affirmative to give Judas a jolt without removing all ambiguity from the ears of the other disciples.

c. The words of institution (26:26–30)

26 Matthew now records a second thing that takes place "while they were eating" (cf. v.21). Jesus takes an unleavened loaf (cf. Ex 12:15; 13:3, 7; Dt 16:3), gives thanks (see comment on Mk 6:41), breaks it, distributes it, and says, "Take and eat; this is my body."

Few clauses of four words have evoked more debate than the last one. But three things must be said. (1) The words "this is my body" had no place in the Passover ritual; as an innovation, they must have had stunning effect, an effect that would grow with the increased understanding gained after Easter. (2) Both the breaking and the distributing are probably significant. The sacrificial overtones are clearer in vv.27–28, but the unambiguous sacrificial language connected with Jesus' blood requires that v.26 be interpreted in a similar way. (3) Much of the debate on the force of "is" is anachronistic. The verb itself has a wide semantic range and proves very little. But what must be remembered is that this is a Passover meal. The new rite Jesus institutes has links with redemption history. As the bread has just been broken, so will Jesus' body be broken; and just as the people of Israel associated their deliverance from Egypt with eating the paschal meal prescribed as a divine ordinance, so also Messiah's people are to associate Jesus' redemptive death with eating this bread by Jesus' authority.

27 Assuming this is a Passover meal, this "cup" is probably the third, the "cup of blessing." Jesus again gives thanks (see comment on Lk 22:19–20). The wine was likely fermented grape juice, though it was customary to dilute the wine with a double or triple quantity of water. Matthew records the command: "Drink from it, all of you."

28 This verse is rich in allusions. "Blood" (GK 135) and "covenant" (GK 1347) are found together in only two OT passages (Ex 24:8; Zec 9:11). Once again, we can penetrate near the heart of Jesus' own understanding of his relation to the OT (see comment on 5:17–20; 9:16–17; 11:9–13). Jesus understands the violent and sacrificial death he is about to undergo (i.e., his "blood") as the ratification of the covenant he is inaugurating with his people, even as Moses in Ex 24:8 ratified the "covenant" of Sinai by the shedding of blood. Jer 31:31–34, with the word "new" before "covenant," must also have been in Jesus' mind. The event through which Messiah saves his people from their sins (1:21) is his sacrificial death; and the resulting relation between God and the messianic community is definable in terms of covenant, an agreement with stipulations—promises of blessing and sustenance and threats of cursing, all brought here into legal force by the shedding of blood.

The words "which is poured out for many" could not fail to be understood as a reference to the Passover sacrifice in which so much blood had just been "poured out." They also connote other sacrificial implications (e.g., Lev 1–7; 16), especially significant since at least Jesus' crucifixion did entail much bloodshed. The phrase "for the forgiveness of sins" alludes to Jer 31:31–34; Jesus' sacrifice provides the real basis for forgiveness (cf. 1:21).

One more OT allusion is worth emphasizing. Jesus is probably also portraying himself as Isaiah's Suffering Servant. This is based on three things: (1) "my blood of the covenant" calls to mind that the servant is twice presented as "a covenant for the people" (Isa 42:6; 49:8)—i.e., he will reestablish the covenant; (2) "poured out" may well reflect Isa 53:12; and (3) "for many" recalls the work of the Servant in Isa 52:13–53:12 (see comment on 20:28).

29 Just as the first Passover looked forward not only to deliverance but also to settlement in the land, so also the Lord's Supper looks forward to deliverance and life in the consummated kingdom. The disciples will keep this celebration till Jesus comes (cf. 1Co 11:26); but Jesus will not participate in it with them until the consummation, when he will sit down with them at the messianic banquet (Isa 25:6; see comment on Mt 8:11) in his Father's kingdom, which is equally Jesus' kingdom.

30 The "hymn" normally sung was the last part of the Hallel (Pss 114–18 or 115–18). It was sung antiphonally: Jesus as the leader would sing the lines, and his followers would respond with "Hallelujah!" Parts of it must have been deeply moving to the disciples when after the Resurrection they remembered that Jesus sang words pledging that he would keep his vows (Ps 116:12–13), ultimately triumph despite rejection (Ps 118), and call all nations to praise the Lord and his covenant love (Ps 117).

4. Prediction of abandonment and denial (26:31–35)

In laying out in advance much of the tragedy of the coming hours, this section shows that Jesus is not a blind victim of fate but a voluntary sacrifice; simultaneously he is preparing his disciples for their dark night of doubt.

31 "This very night" makes clear how soon the disciples' defection and Peter's denial will happen. The intimacy of the Last Supper is shortly to be replaced by disloyalty and cowardice. The disciples will find Jesus an obstacle to devotion and will forsake him. As the quotation from Zechariah makes clear, their falling away is related to the "striking" of the Shepherd. Jesus has repeatedly predicted his death and resurrection, but his disciples are still unable to grasp how such things could happen to the Messiah to whom they have been looking (16:21–23; 17:22–23).

Yet Jesus' words "for it is written" show that the disciples' defection, though tragic and irresponsible, does not fall outside God's sovereign plan. Zec 13:1–6 pictures a day when, owing to the prevailing apostasy, the Shepherd who is close to the Lord is cut down and the sheep scattered. In 13:8–9 most of the sheep perish; but one-third are left, after being refined, to become "my people"—those who will say, "The Lord is our God." If Jesus' quotation of Zechariah in the Gospels presupposes the full context of 13:7, then the disciples themselves join Israel, the sheep of God, in being scattered as the result of the "striking" of the Shepherd. Their falling away "this very night" continues to the Cross and beyond. But a purified remnant, a "third," will survive the refining and make up the people of God, "my people."

32 The prediction that the shepherd will be stricken and the sheep scattered might suggest that the disciples would return disconsolate to their homes in Galilee, leaving Jesus behind in a grave in Judea. But this new word promises that after Jesus has risen, he will arrive in Galilee before they get there: he will "go ahead of [them]."

33 Peter responds to Jesus' prediction about all the disciples falling away, not to Jesus' prediction of going to Galilee. Though Peter later followed Jesus into the courtyard, he initially joined the other disciples in fleeing (v.56); his later following was only "at a distance" (v.58), and then he denied Jesus. At the end of the day, all the sheep were scattered; all had fallen away.

34 Apparently it was usual for roosters in Palestine to crow about 12:30, 1:30, and 2:30 A.M., so the Romans gave the term "cock-crow" to the watch from 12:00 to 3:00 A.M. Despite Peter's claims of undeviating loyalty, Jesus says that Peter is within hours of "disowning" (GK 565; see also 16:4) him three times.

35 The language of Peter's protest shows that he does not really think that Jesus' death was likely; he still has visions of heroism. Nor is he alone in his brash protestations of loyalty—only quicker and more vehement than his peers.

5. Gethsemane (26:36–46)

Central in this section is the light shed on Jesus' perception of what he is about to do. The anguish in Gethsemane is not lightly to be passed over: three times Jesus prayed in deep emotional distress. He went to his death knowing that it was his Father's will that he face death completely alone (27:46) as the sacrificial Passover Lamb. As his death was unique, so also was his anguish; and our best response to it is hushed worship.

36–38 On "Gethsemane," see comment on Mk 14:32. Taking three of his disciples with him, Jesus now faces deep, inner distress. His words "My soul is overwhelmed with sorrow" reflect almost verbally the refrain of Pss 42–43. Jesus experiences a sorrow so deep it almost kills. Having revealed his deepest emotions and thus given his disciples the most compelling of reasons to do what he asks, he tells them to stay and "keep watch with me" while he goes a little farther on to pray alone. His words "with me" imply that he wanted them to keep awake and go on praying.

39 Jesus prays, prostrate in his intense anguish. He addresses God as "My Father" (see comment on 6:9). The "cup" (GK 4539) refers not only to suffering and death but, as often in the OT (Ps 75:7–8; Isa 51:19, 22; Jer 25:15–16; et al.), also to God's wrath; it anticipates 27:46.

In one sense all things are possible with God (see comments on 19:26; Mk 14:36); in another some things are impossible. Thus Jesus prays that, if it be morally consistent with the Father's redeeming purpose that his "cup" be taken from him, that is what he deeply desires. But more deeply still, Jesus desires to do his Father's will. His deep commitment to his Father's will cannot be doubted. But in this crisis, the worst since 4:1–11, Jesus is tempted to seek an alternative to sin-bearing suffering as the route by which to fulfill his Father's redemptive purposes. He prays in agony; and though he is supernaturally strengthened (Lk 22:43), he learns only that the Cross is unavoidable if he is to obey his Father's will.

40–41 Jesus returns to his disciples—i.e., the inner three—and finds them sleeping. Jesus' question is addressed to Peter but is in the plural and therefore includes all three (see comment on 16:16). On "watch and pray," see comment on Mk 14:38.

It is doubtful that "so that you will not fall into temptation" means only "so that you will stay awake and not fall into the temptation to sleep." Rather, he tells them that only urgent prayer will save them from falling into the coming "temptation" (GK 4280; see comments on 4:1; 6:13). Even in his own extremity, when he needs and seeks his Father's face, Jesus thinks of the impending but much lesser trial his followers will face. He speaks compassionately: "The spirit is willing, but the body is weak." Spiritual eagerness is often accompanied by carnal weakness—a danger amply experienced even by us today.

42–44 Jesus returns to pray "the same thing." As Jesus learned obedience (Heb 5:7–9), so he became the supreme model for his own teaching. In the first garden "Not your will but mine" changed Paradise to desert. Now "Not my will but yours" brings anguish to the man who prayed it but transforms the desert into the kingdom.

45–46 Jesus' words here form a gently ironic command. The hour of the Passion is near: it is too late to pray and gain strength for the temptations ahead. His disciples may as well sleep. He who is the resplendent, messianic King takes the path of suffering. Doubtless Jesus could see and hear the party approaching as it crossed the Kidron with torches and climbed up the path to Gethsemane. The sleepers for whom he would die have lost their opportunity to gain strength through prayer. By contrast Jesus has prayed in agony but now rises with poise and advances to meet his betrayer.

6. The arrest (26:47–56)

47 Judas Iscariot (see comment on 26:14–16) arrives with armed men. What he received payment for was probably information as to where Jesus could be arrested in a quiet setting with little danger of mob violence. He may have first led the "large crowd" to the Upper Room and, finding it empty, surmised where Jesus and his disciples had gone (cf. Jn 18:1–3). The "large crowd" was comprised of both temple police and a detachment of Roman soldiers. Especially during the feasts the Romans took extra pains to ensure public order, so a request for a small detachment from the cohort would not likely be turned down. Thus Pilate might have had some inkling of the plot from the beginning, and if he shared it with his wife, it might help explain her dream (27:19).

48–50 The need for pointing out the right man was especially acute, not only because it was dark, but because, in a time long before photography, the faces of even great celebrities would not be widely known. To identify Jesus, Judas chose the kiss, thereby turning it into a symbol of betrayal.

"Friend" is an open-hearted but not intimate greeting. The next words are either an imperative (as NIV), in which case Jesus has regained his poise and sovereignty, or a question (NIV note), which administers a rebuke steeped in the irony of professed ignorance that knows very well why Judas has come.

51–54 Peter's response is scarcely unexpected, especially in the light of his earlier protest of loyalty (vv.33–35). The crucial test of loyalty had arrived. He is magnificent and pathetic—magnificent because he rushes in to defend Jesus with characteristic courage and impetuousness, pathetic because his courage evaporates when Jesus undoes Peter's damage, forbids violence, and faces the Passion without resisting.

What of Jesus' response in v.52? The least we can say is that violence in defense of Christ is completely unjustified. Moreover, if Jesus wanted to use force, a simple request to his Father would bring twelve legions of angels to his assistance—perhaps one legion for Jesus and one for each of the Eleven. In addition, Jesus' stance regarding his own death is grounded on the fact the "Scriptures" must be fulfilled (see comments on vv.24, 31). Jesus is determined to obey his Father's will.

55–56 Every day for the preceding week, and presumably on earlier visits to the Holy City, Jesus had been teaching in the temple courts; yet the authorities had not arrested him. Why then do they seize him now as if he were a rebel (see comment on 27:16)? The implication is that there is no need to arrest him secretly and violently, except for reasons in their own minds that reveal more about themselves than about him. And then Jesus again referred to the fulfillment of prophetic Scripture.

All the disciples then fulfill one specific prophecy (v.31) and flee. Probably at this time Jesus is bound (Jn 18:12).

7. Jesus before the Sanhedrin (26:57–68)

In assessing blame for the crucifixion of Jesus, one must admit that, from a theological perspective every Christian is as guilty of putting Jesus on the cross as Caiaphas. Thoughtful believers will surely admit that their own guilt is the more basic of the two; for if we believe Matthew's witness, and Jesus could have escaped the clutches of Caiaphas (v.53), then what drove Jesus to the cross was his commitment to the Father's redemptive purposes.

Regarding the hour-by-hour procedure of Jesus' trial, see comment on Mk 14:53–65.

57–58 Well-to-do homes were often built in a square shape with an open, central courtyard. If Annas (cf. comment on v.3) lived in rooms on one wing of the court, then it is possible that he interviewed Jesus (Jn 18:14–16) in one wing while the Sanhedrin was assembling in another. Not much time would be required.

Peter followed Jesus "at a distance," midway between courage (v.51) and cowardice (v.70). He joined the servants (Jn 18:15–16) and temple police around the courtyard fire.

59–63a The Sanhedrin was composed of three groups: leading priests, teachers of the law, and elders. It had seventy members plus the high priest, but a mere twenty-three made a quorum. The "whole Sanhedrin" need not mean that everyone was present (cf. Lk 23:50–51). This group was looking "for false evidence" and obtained it from "false witnesses." Already convinced of Jesus' guilt, they went through the motions of securing evidence against him. When people hate, they readily accept false witness; and the Sanhedrin eventually heard and believed just what it wanted. Matthew knew that Jesus was not guilty, so he describes the evidence as "false."

The two men who came forward may or may not have been suborned. At least two witnesses were required in a capital case. Their witness had an element of truth but was evilly motivated, disregarding what Jesus meant in Jn 2:19–21 (see comment on these verses). Interpreted with crass literalism, Jesus' words might be taken as a threat to desecrate the temple, one of the pillars of Judaism. Desecration of sacred places was almost universally regarded as a capital offense in the ancient world, and in this Jews were not different from the pagans.

The high priest asks two questions in v.62. He probably hoped Jesus would incriminate himself. But, true to Isa 53:7, Jesus kept silent.

63b The high priest, frustrated by Jesus' silence, tried a bold stroke that cut to the central issue: Was Jesus the Messiah or was he not? The question had been raised before in one form or another (see comments on 12:38–42; 16:1–4). He boldly charged Jesus to answer "under oath by the living God."

The outcome is now inevitable. If Jesus refuses to answer, he breaks a legally imposed oath. If he denies he is the Messiah, the crisis is over—but so is his influence. If he affirms it, then, given the commitments of the court, Jesus must be false. After all, how could the true Messiah allow himself to be imprisoned and put in jeopardy? The Gospels' evidence suggests that the Sanhedrin was prepared to see Jesus' unequivocal claim to messiahship as meriting the death penalty, and their unbelief precluded them from allowing any other possibility.

64 The answer Jesus gives is affirmative, though reluctantly so (cf. comment on v.25). Certainly Caiaphas understood it as positive. Jesus' follow-up comment is a qualification, spoken because Caiaphas's understanding of "Messiah" and "Son of God" is fundamentally inadequate. Jesus is indeed the Messiah and so must answer affirmatively. But he is not quite the Messiah Caiaphas has in mind; so he must answer cautiously and with some explanation.

That explanation comes in allusions to two passages—Ps 110:1 (see comment on Mt 22:41–46) and Da 7:13 (see comment on Mk 8:31). Jesus is not to be primarily considered a political Messiah but as the one who, in receiving a kingdom, is exalted at God's right hand, the position of honor and power (cf. 16:27; 23:39; 24:30–31; 26:29). This is Jesus' climactic self-disclosure to the authorities, combining revelation with threat. He tells the members of the Sanhedrin that from then on they would not see him as he now stands before them but only in his capacity as undisputed King Messiah and sovereign Judge.

65–66 Rending garments was an expression of indignation or grief (cf. 2Ki 18:37; Ac 14:14). Whether the Sanhedrin thought Jesus was blaspheming because he claimed to be Messiah, because he put himself on the Mighty One's right hand, or because God had not especially attested who Jesus was is uncertain. The decision of the assembled members of the Sanhedrin appears to have been by acclamation. Jesus is "worthy" of the death penalty, mandated for "blasphemy" (GK 1059–1060; cf. Lev 24:16).

67–68 The messianic claims of the accused do not impress the Sanhedrin, and the indignities to which Jesus is now subjected are probably meant to deride his false pretensions. The true Messiah would vanquish all foes. But this man is spit on, punched, slapped, blindfolded (Mk 14:65), and taunted, without displaying any power. For "prophesy," see comment on Mk 14:65.

8. Peter's denial of Jesus (26:69–75)

69–70 The remark of the servant girl to Peter reflects both an accusation and her curiosity, and "Jesus of Galilee" is the kind of derogatory remark one might expect from a Jerusalemite convinced of her geographical and cultural superiority. Peter denies her words "before them all," implying that several people were listening and that some may have joined in the questioning.

71–72 Peter "went out" to the gateway, apparently retiring from the brighter light of the fire into the darkness of the forecourt. There he denies another accusation, invoking a solemn curse on himself if he is lying and professing his truthfulness by appealing to something sacred (see comment on 5:33–34).

73–75 A little more time elapses. In any age accent in speaking varies with geography, and Peter's speech shows him to be a Galilean. That one of those present at Peter's denial said that his accent proved him to be a disciple of Jesus shows how much Jesus' ministry had been in Galilee and how relatively few of his disciples were from Judea. Having lied twice, Peter finds himself forced to lie again, this time with more oaths. Immediately the rooster crows, a bitter reminder of Jesus' words (v.34). He who thought he could stand has fallen terribly (cf. 1Co 10:12).

9. Formal decision of the Sanhedrin (27:1–2)

1 Whether this formal decision was reached as a final stage of the first meeting or at a separate meeting held either in Caiaphas's house or the temple precincts, we cannot say with certainty. Luke 22:66 implies a meeting in the council chamber.

The religious authorities decided just how to present their case to Pilate. If their own concern was Jesus' "blasphemy" (26:65), they were nevertheless more likely to get Pilate to sentence him to death by stressing the royal side of messiahship rather than blasphemy, since to Pilate that would suggest treason.

2 Jesus is led to Pontius Pilate, prefect appointed by Tiberius Caesar in A.D. 26. Prefects held the power of life and death, apart from appeal to Caesar (see comment on Lk 23:1–5). Extrabiblical sources portray Pilate as a cruel, imperious, and insensitive ruler who hated his Jewish subjects and took few pains to understand them. He stole money to build an aqueduct; and when the population of Jerusalem rioted in protest, he sent in soldiers who killed many. He defiled Jerusalem more than once (cf. Lk 13:1).

Both the Sanhedrin trial and the trial before Pilate were necessary for capital punishment. Without the Sanhedrin, Pilate would never have taken action against Jesus unless he had become convinced Jesus was a dangerous Zealot leader; without Pilate the Sanhedrin might whip up mob violence against Jesus, but it would not be a legally binding death sentence.

10. The death of Judas (27:3–10)

Matthew's prime interest in recording Judas's death is to continue the fulfillment theme—not only regarding Jesus' death but also regarding the major events surrounding his crucifixion as prophesied in Scripture.

3–4 Verse 3 looks back to 26:14–16, 20–25. Judas's "remorse" is not necessarily repentance. He recognizes not only that he is guilty of betrayal but that Jesus whom he has betrayed is "innocent." The Jewish leaders' callous response condemns them, for Judas's comments should have meant something to them. He betrayed innocent blood; they condemned innocent blood.

5–8 Exactly where Judas threw the money is uncertain. He then went out and hanged himself. The chief priests refuse to allow the blood money to supplement the funds of the "treasury" (cf. Dt 23:18). Matthew again points out the propensity of the Jewish leaders for ceremonial probity even in the face of gross injustice (cf. 12:9–14; 15:1–9; 23:23; 28:12–13).

With this probity in view, the chief priests decide to buy the potter's field to meet a public need. This field, used for burying foreigners, probably did not belong to "the potter" but was a well-known place, perhaps the place where potters had long obtained their clay. If depleted, it might have been offered for sale. Regarding the relationship of this passage to Ac 1:18–19, see comments in Acts.

9–10 Three aspects of this complex quotation need discussion.

(1) The ascription to Jeremiah. On the face of it, the quotation is a rough rendering of Zec 11:12–13. The only obvious allusions to Jeremiah are 18:2–6; 32:6–15—Jeremiah did visit a potter and buy a field. It is difficult to imagine why Matthew mentioned Jeremiah instead of Zechariah, even though Jeremiah is important in this gospel (cf. 2:17; 16:14).

We should first note that no extant version of Zec 11 refers to a field; thus Matthew's attributing the quotation to Jeremiah suggests we ought to look to that book. Jeremiah 19:1–13 is the obvious candidate, where Jeremiah is told to purchase a potter's jar and take some elders and priests to the Valley of Ben Hinnom. There he is to warn of the destruction of Jerusalem for her sin, illustrated by smashing the jar. A further linguistic link is "innocent blood" (Jer 19:4); and thematic links include renaming a locality associated with potters (19:1) with a name ("Valley of Slaughter") denoting violence (19:6). The place will henceforth be used as a burial ground (19:11), as a token of God's judgment. In other words, the quotation appears to refer to Jer 19:1–13, along with phraseology drawn mostly from Zec 11:12–13. Such fusing of sources under one "quotation" is not unknown elsewhere in Scripture (e.g., Mk 1:2–3). Jeremiah alone is mentioned, perhaps because he is the more important of the two prophets, and perhaps also because Jer 19 is more important as to prophecy and fulfillment.

(2) Meaning. How did Matthew understand the OT texts he was quoting? The question is not easy, because the two OT passages themselves can be variously explained. It appears that in Zec 11 the "buyers" (v.5) and the three shepherds (vv.5, 8, 17) apparently represent Israel's leaders, who are slaughtering the sheep. God commands Zechariah to shepherd the "flock marked for slaughter" (v.7), and he tries to clean up the leadership by sacking the false shepherds. But he discovers that not only is the leadership corrupt, but the flock detests him (v.8). Thus Zechariah comes to understand the Lord's decision to have no more pity on the people of the land (v.6).

Zechariah decides to resign (11:9–10), exposing the flock to ravages. Because he has broken the contract, he cannot claim his pay (presumably from the "buyers"); but they pay him off with thirty pieces of silver (v.12). But now the Lord tells Zechariah to throw this "handsome price at which they priced me" (probably ironical) to the potter in the "house of the LORD."

The parallel between Zec 11 and Mt 26–27 is not exact. In Zechariah the money is paid to the good shepherd, in Matthew it is paid to Judas and returned to the Jewish leaders. In Zechariah the money goes directly to the "potter" in the temple; in Matthew, after being thrown into the temple, it purchases "the potter's field." Nevertheless the central parallel is stunning: in both instances the Lord's shepherd is rejected by the people of Israel and valued at the price of a slave. And in both instances the money is flung into the temple and ends up purchasing something that pollutes and points to the destruction of the nation (see comments on 15:7–9; 21:42).

(3) Fulfillment. In the light of these relationships between the events surrounding Jesus' death and the two key OT passages that make up Matthew's quotation, what does the evangelist mean by saying that the prophecy "was fulfilled"? As in 2:17, the form of this introductory formula shrinks from making Judas's horrible crime the immediate result of the Lord's word, while nevertheless insisting that all has taken place in fulfillment of Scripture (cf. 1:22 with 2:17). What we find in Matthew, including vv.9–10, is not identification of the text with an event but fulfillment of the text in an event, based on a broad typology governing how both Jesus and Matthew read the OT (see comments on 2:15; 8:17; 13:35; 26:28, 54). Because of this typological model, Matthew can introduce the commonly noticed changes: e.g., the one on whom a price is set is no longer the prophet ("me," Zec 11:13), but Jesus.

11. Jesus before Pilate (27:11–26)

The setting for Jesus' trial before Pilate is uncertain. It might be the Tower of Antonia, on the northwest corner of the temple area; but more probably it is Herod's old palace on the west side of the city near the Jaffa gate.

11 For information on Pilate, see comment on vv.1–2. Pilate's question, "Are you the king of the Jews?" presupposes the background of Lk 23:2 and Jn 18:28–33 (for the Jews' charge against Jesus, see comment on Lk 23:10). In Roman trials the magistrate normally heard the charges first, questioned the defendant and listened to his defense, sometimes permitted several such exchanges, and then retired with his advisors to decide on a verdict, which was then promptly carried out. The first step led to this particular formulation of Pilate's question to Jesus. Jesus answers, as in 26:64, in an affirmative but qualified way. He is indeed the king of the Jews, but not exactly in the sense Pilate might think (see Jn 18:34–37).

Verse 11 is important theologically as well as historically. It stands behind the inscription on the cross and prepares the way for Christianity, which rests on the conviction that Jesus of Nazareth, who rose from the dead, is indeed the promised Messiah, the King of the Jews—basic themes in Matthew even in the prologue. The vindicated Lord is the crucified Messiah.

12–14 Persistent charges by "the chief priests and the elders" evoke only silence from Jesus. If Jesus had said nothing at all, Pilate would be bound to condemn him, since in the Roman system the defense depended heavily on the defendant's response. But Jesus has spoken (v.11). Now, surrounded by unbelief and conscious that the hour has come, he makes no reply. Thus he continues to fulfill Isa 53:7 (see comment on 26:63). Pilate's "great amazement" appears to be mingled with respect for Jesus and antipathy for the Jewish leaders, and so he takes tentative steps to release the prisoner.

15 In Roman law an imperial magistrate could acquit a prisoner not yet condemned or pardon one already condemned; but the gospel accounts make this a regular custom, apparently associated with Judea alone.

16 Perhaps Barabbas was the son of a famous rabbi (his name literally means "son of the father"; see comment on 23:9). Barabbas was probably an insurrectionist, and a well-known one. Revolts and bloodshed fostered by guerrilla action were common, and Barabbas had been caught. In the eyes of many of the people he would not be a "notorious" villain but a hero.

It may be that the two who were crucified with Jesus were co-rebels with Barabbas, for Mt 27:38 uses the same word for their offense as for Barabbas. The fact that three crosses had been prepared strongly suggests that Pilate had already ordered that preparations be made for the execution of the three rebels. If so, Jesus the Messiah actually took the place of the rebel Barabbas because the people preferred the political rebel and nationalist hero to the Son of God.

17–18 The "crowd" was the crowd of those trying to influence the selection of the prisoner who would receive amnesty (cf. Mk 15:8). Pilate sized up the real motivation of the Jewish leaders. They had no special loyalty to Rome; so if they were accusing Jesus of being a traitor to Rome, he must have been disturbing them for other reasons; and they were simply using Pilate to eliminate Jesus' challenge to them. Pilate, with his network of spies and informers, would be aware of how much popularity Jesus enjoyed among the people at large. He could hardly have been unaware of the upsurge of acclaim the previous Sunday (21:1–16). He thought to administer a reversal to Sanhedrin policy by using the paschal amnesty to encourage the crowd to free Jesus; therefore he offered them a choice: Barabbas or Jesus.

19 If Roman troops were involved in Jesus' arrest (see comment on 26:47), Pilate and perhaps his wife would have been informed. The interruption of Pilate's wife further stresses Jesus' innocence and gives the chief priests and elders a few moments to influence the crowd.

20–23 The leaders helped persuade the crowd. Historically, the crowd's response is comprehensible. They have come to demand Barabbas's release. Confronted with the choice of Barabbas or Jesus, both of whom were widely popular, their momentary faltering is resolved by their leaders. If the crowd must choose between Pilate's choice and the Sanhedrin's, especially if the Sanhedrin members are circulating stories of Jesus' "blasphemy," then there can be little doubt whom they will choose. Jews often confronted the Roman authorities with a large and noisy delegation, and now mob mentality begins to take over.

Tactically Pilate has blundered. Trying to save face he asks more questions. The first offers the hope of a milder sentence, and the second attests Jesus' innocence. But mob psychology prevails. The people prefer a murderous, nationalistic guerrilla leader over their Messiah, who exhorted them to love their enemies and said he would die as a ransom for many.

24 To the best of our knowledge, this hand washing was not a Roman custom. After living several years among the Jews he detested, Pilate picked up one of their own customs (Dt 21:6; cf. Ps 26:6) and contemptuously used it against them. Whatever his motives, Pilate had been trying to release Jesus. He sent him to Herod (Lk 23:6–12), suggested that the paschal amnesty be applied to him, proposed a compromise with a scourging (Lk 23:16), tried to turn the case back to Jewish authorities (Jn 19:6), remonstrated before pronouncing sentence (Jn 19:12–14), and here washes his hands. Matthew gives us only two of these steps.

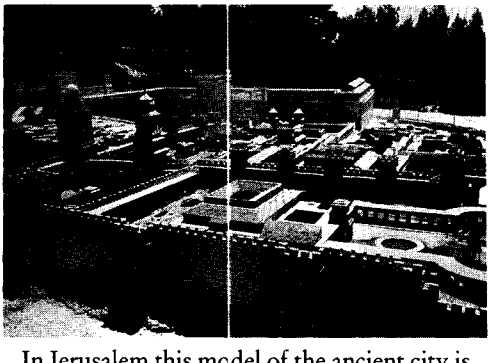
Regardless of what Pilate thought, Matthew does not think the hand washing exonerated Pilate. He insists that Pilate's action was not prompted by desire for justice but by political and moral cowardice and fear of a mob. The Romans expected their magistrates to maintain peace, and a possible uproar would intimidate a governor. So when Pilate says, "It is your responsibility," Matthew intends his readers to remember the same words spoken by the chief priests and elders to Judas (v.4).

25 To Pilate's words, "all the people" answer, "Let his blood be on us and on our children!" The idiom is familiar (2Sa 1:6; 3:28; Ac 18:6; 20:26). In the narrative this is a swift retort to Pilate's taunt and mob pressure for him to pronounce the verdict.

But it clearly is more than that. How much more? Many say that by "all the people" Matthew is saying that the Jews as a whole reject Jesus. To them v.25 becomes a prophecy of the destruction of Jerusalem and the nation; and a new people of God, the church, would take over. There is some truth in this view, but it needs qualification. Matthew certainly knows that all the first disciples were Jews. Thus the gospel's denunciations of the Jews are not more severe than those of many OT prophets, and in both instances it is understood that a faithful remnant remains. So what Matthew actually says cannot be judged as a general anti-Semitic comment, certainly not any more than Jeremiah's prediction of the destruction of Jerusalem and the Exile can.

26 On flogging, see comment on Mk 15:15. Jesus' flogging took place before the verdict and so was not repeated after the verdict.

Pilate, after further entreaty (Jn 19:1–16), "handed him over to be crucified."



12. The soldiers' treatment of Jesus (27:27–31)

27 That the governor's troops are the ones involved in these shameful actions belies any suggestion that Matthew exculpates Pilate (see comment on v 24). The "Praetorium" is probably the old palace of Herod; the soldiers take Jesus into the palace courtyard, where they fulfill Jesus' predictions in 20:17–20.

28–31 Here we have humanity at its worst—a scene of vicious mockery. The Jews have mocked Jesus as Messiah (26:67–68); here the Roman soldiers ridicule him as king. Matthew's readers recognize that the soldiers speak more truly than they know, for Jesus is both King and Suffering Servant. The "robe" is probably the short red cloak worn by Roman military and civilian officials.

For a crown, the soldiers plait a wreath of thorns from palm spines or acanthus and crush it down on Jesus' head in imitation of the circlet on the coins of Tiberius Caesar. The staff they put in his hand stands for a royal scepter; and the mocking "Hail, King of the Jews!" corresponds to the Roman acclamation "Ave, Caesar!" and caps the flamboyant kneeling. Not content with the ridicule and the torture of the thorns, they spit on him and use the staff, the symbol of his kingly authority, to hit him on the head "again and again."

Jesus is then led away by an execution squad of four soldiers, dragging the crosspiece to which his hands would be nailed (Jn 19:17, 23).

In Jerusalem this model of the ancient city is popular with tourists. In the foreground is the old palace of Herod (the Praetorium).

13. The Crucifixion and mocking (27:32–44)

Crucifixion was unspeakably painful and degrading. Whether tied or nailed to the cross, the victim endured countless paroxysms as he pulled with his arms and pushed with his legs to keep his chest cavity open for breathing and then collapsed in exhaustion until the demand for oxygen demanded renewed paroxysms. The scourging, the loss of blood, and the shock from the pain all produced agony that could go on for days, ending at last by suffocation, cardiac arrest, or loss of blood. When there was reason to hasten death, the execution squad would smash the victim's legs. Death followed almost immediately, either from shock or from collapse that cut off breath. Beyond the pain was the shame. In ancient sources crucifixion was universally viewed with horror. In Roman law it was reserved only for the worst criminals and lowest classes. No Roman citizen could be crucified without a direct edict from Caesar.

Among Jews the horror of the cross was greater still because of Dt 21:23: "Anyone who is hung on a tree is under God's curse." In Israelite law this meant the corpse of a judicially executed criminal was hung up for public exposure that branded him as cursed by God. These words were also applied in Jesus' day to anyone crucified, and therefore the Jews' demand that Jesus be crucified rather than banished was aimed at arousing maximum public revulsion toward him. But in Christian perspective the curse on Jesus at the cross fulfills all OT sacrifices: it is a curse that removes the curse from believers—the fusion of divine, royal prerogative and Suffering Servant, the heart of the Gospel, the inauguration of a new humanity, the supreme model for Christian ethics, the ratification of the new covenant, and the power of God (1Co 1:23–24; Gal 3:13; Col 2:14; 1Pe 2:18–25). The dominant note of this section is the continuing mockery, but mockery that by an awful irony reveals more than the mocker thinks—for Jesus is indeed King of the Jews (v.37), the new meeting place with God (v.40), the Savior of humanity (v.42), the King of Israel (v.42), and the Son of God (v.43).

32 Executions normally took place outside the city walls (Lev 24:14; Nu 15:35–36; 1Ki 21:13; Ac 7:58), symbolizing still further rejection (cf. Heb 13:13). Jesus, weak as he was, managed to carry the crossbeam as far as the city gates (cf. Jn 19:17). There, as they were "going out" of the city, the soldiers forced Simon to assume the load. He came from Cyrene, an old Greek settlement on the coast of North Africa.

33–34 On "Golgotha," see comment on Mk 15:22. Mark says they offered Jesus wine mingled with myrrh, and he refused it; Matthew, that they offered him wine mingled with gall, and he tasted it and then refused it. It seems likely that this gesture was not one of compassion but of torment. Myrrh was used with wine to strengthen the drink, but it tastes bitter; so a large dose of it mingled with wine would make the latter undrinkable. Thus, when the drink was offered to Jesus, it was so bitter he refused it, and the soldiers were amused. Mark keeps the word "myrrh" to describe the content; Matthew uses "gall" to describe the taste and to provide a link with Ps 69:12. For another view of this element of the crucifixion, see comment on Mk 15:23.

35 Jesus was nailed to the crossbeam, which was then hoisted to its place on the upright. His feet were then nailed to the upright. The Romans crucified their victims naked, and their clothes customarily became the perquisite of the executioners; here they divided them—probably an inner and outer garment, a belt, and a pair of sandals—among themselves by casting lots, oblivious to the OT lament in Ps 22:18 that Jn 19:23–24 says was now fulfilled.

36 The soldiers kept watch to prevent rescue (men were known to have lived after being taken down from a cross).

37–38 The statement of the crime was often written on a white tablet in red or black letters and displayed on the cross. The charge against Jesus, written in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin (Jn 19:19–22), wrote more of the truth than Pilate knew. On the two "robbers," see comment on v.16.

39–40 Crucifixion was always carried out publicly as a warning to others. A public execution provided opportunity for those walking by to "hurl insults" at Jesus. Shaking their heads, and so calling to mind the derision in Pss 22:7; 109:25; Lam 2:15, the passers-by threw up the charge in Mt 26:60–61 (they had likely witnessed the proceedings of the Sanhedrin or had some report of them). The second taunt, "If you are the Son of God," not only harks back to the trial (26:63), but for Matthew recalls a dramatic parallel (4:3, 6). Through the passers-by Satan was still trying to get Jesus to evade the Father's will and avoid further suffering.

41–44 All the principal groups of the Sanhedrin do not address Jesus directly but speak of him in the third person, in a stage whisper meant for his ears. "He saved others" is probably an oblique reference to Jesus' supernatural healing ministry. "But he can't save himself" is cutting because it questions that same supernatural power. But there is level on level of meaning. For the Christian reader "save" (GK 5392) has full eschatological overtones. And although Jesus could have saved himself (26:53), he could not have saved himself if he was to save others.

The second of the three taunts, "He's the king of Israel!" substitutes the covenant term Israel for "the Jews" in Pilate's words (v.11) and is in fact the normal Palestinian form of Jesus' claim. The words "Let him come down from the cross, and we will believe in him" have several levels of meaning. They constitute a malicious barb directed at Jesus' helplessness, while having the effrontery to suggest that the leaders' failure to believe was his fault. The taunt piously promises faith if Jesus will but step down from the cross; but the reader knows that, in the mystery of providence, if Jesus were to step down, there would be no "blood of the covenant for the forgiveness of sins" (26:26–29), no ransom (20:28), no salvation from sin (1:21), no Gospel of the kingdom to be proclaimed to nations everywhere (28:18–20), and no fulfillment of Scripture.

In an unconscious allusion to Ps 22:8, the religious leaders launch their third taunt: "He trusts in God." They recognize that Jesus' claim to be the "Son of God" was at least a claim to messiahship. So assuming that God must crown every effort of Messiah with success, they conclude that Jesus' hopeless condition is proof enough of the vanity of his pretensions. Again their malice masks the ironic redemptive purposes of God. On the one hand, as Christian readers know, God will indeed vindicate his Son at the Resurrection. On the other hand, the leaders are right: Jesus is now facing his most severe test, the loss of his Father's presence, leading to the heart-rending cry of the following verses.

The other two crucified with him join in the abuse (but see Lk 23:39–43).

14. The death of Jesus (27:45–50)

45 The darkness that "came over all the land" from noon till 3:00 P.M. was a sign of judgment and/or tragedy (cf. Am 8:9–10). The judgment is therefore a judgment on the land and its people. But it is also a judgment on Jesus; for out of this darkness comes his cry of desolation. The cosmic blackness hints at the deep judgment that was taking place (20:28; 26:26–29; Gal 3:13).

46 In what language did Jesus utter his cry of desolation, taken from Ps 22:1? It was most likely in Aramaic; and at least some of the variants (cf. NIV note) stem from the difficulty of transliterating a Semitic language into Greek.

What does this psalm quotation signify? It is best to take the words at face value: Jesus is conscious of being abandoned by his Father. For one who knew the intimacy of 11:27, such abandonment must have been agony. If we ask in what ontological sense the Father and the Son are here divided, the answer must be that we do not know because we are not told.

47 According to 2Ki 2:1–12, Elijah did not die but was taken alive to heaven in a whirlwind. Some Jewish tradition, perhaps as old as the first century, held that he would come and rescue the righteous in their distress.

48–49 See comment on v.34; the allusion is again Ps 69:21. What is not clear is whether the offer of a drink here is meant as a gesture of mercy or as mockery; its purpose may have been to prolong life and agony, while with false piety the onlookers say they will wait for Elijah to rescue him.

50 This loud cry reminds us once more of Jesus' hideous agony. That "he gave up his spirit" suggests Jesus' sovereignty over the exact time of his own death. It was at this moment, when he was experiencing the abyss of his alienation from the Father and was being cruelly mocked by those he came to serve, that he chose to yield up his life a "ransom for many "(see comment on 20:28).

15. Immediate impact of the death (27:51–56)

51a On the tearing of the temple veil, see comment on Mk 15:38. In accordance with Matthew's fulfillment themes (cf. comments on 5:17–20; 11:11–13), the tearing of the veil signifies the obsolescence of the temple ritual and the law governing it (cf. Heb 9:1–14). Jesus himself is the New Temple, the meeting place of God and humankind (see comment on Jn 2:19–21); the old is obsolete. At the same time, the rent veil serves as a sign of the temple's impending destruction—a destruction conceived not as a brute fact but as a theological necessity.

51b–53 Matthew implies that the earthquake (v.51b), itself a symbol of judgment and theophanic glory, was the means of tearing the veil as well as opening the tombs.

But the resurrection of the "holy people" (GK 41) remains difficult to understand. Perhaps the best explanation is to see a full stop after "broke open," so that the words that follow form a parenthesis in the flow of the narrative. The resurrection of "the holy people" then begins a new sentence that is linked only with Jesus' resurrection. Matthew does not intend his readers to think that these people were resurrected when Jesus died and then waited in their tombs till Easter Sunday before showing themselves. Instead, they were raised to life at the same time Jesus was. The language implies that these saints were certain well-known OT and intertestamental Jewish spiritual heroes and martyrs. If so, then Matthew is telling us that the resurrection of people who lived before Jesus Messiah is as dependent on Jesus' triumph as the resurrection of those who come after him.

54 "Son of God" is one of several major Christological titles in Matthew. But it is not certain what exactly the soldiers meant by "Son of God" (see comment on Mk 15:39). The darkness, the earthquake, and the cry of dereliction convinced the soldiers that this was no ordinary execution. The portents terrified them and probably led them to believe that these things testified to heaven's wrath at the perpetration of such a crime, in which the soldiers had participated. But this confession tells Matthew's readers that Jesus as the promised Messiah and unique Son of God is seen most clearly in his passion and death.

55–56 Along with the soldiers, certain women (generally not highly regarded in Jewish society) watched to the bitter end (see comment on Mk 15:40–41). They kept their distance (v.55), whether through timidity or modesty; and last at the cross, they were first at the tomb (28:1). Not only do they provide continuity to the narrative, but they prove that God has chosen the lowly and despised things of the world to shame the wise and strong (cf. 1Co 1:27–31).

16. The burial of Jesus (27:57–61)

Because of Dt 21:22–23, Jesus' body could not remain on the cross overnight. Romans customarily let bodies of crucified criminals hang in full view until they rotted away. If they were buried at all, it was only by express permission of the imperial magistrate. Such permission was usually granted to friends and relatives of the deceased who made application, but never in the case of high treason.

57 The approaching evening—about 6:00 P.M. at that time of year—would mark the end of Friday and the beginning of Sabbath. Matthew mentions that Joseph of Arimathea (see comments on Mk 15:42–43; Lk 23:50–54) was rich. This may direct attention to Isa 53:9–12: though Jesus was numbered with the transgressors, yet in his death he was with the rich. Joseph had become a disciple; he learned from Jesus and to some extent followed him, even if his discipleship was secret.

58–60 Joseph's initiative is remarkably courageous, and Pilate probably granted his request only because he was convinced that Jesus was not really guilty of high treason. Joseph had Nicodemus to assist him (cf. Jn 19:38–42). On the location of the tomb, see comment on Mk 15:46.

61 No mourning was permitted for those executed under Roman law. The women followed with broken but silent grief and watched the burial. That Jesus was actually buried became an integral part of Gospel proclamation (cf. 1Co 15:4)

17. The guard at the tomb (27:62–66)

This account of the guards at the tomb is needed in order to provide the background to 28:11–15.

62–64 On the Sabbath day, some members of the Sanhedrin paid a visit to Pilate, politely addressing him as "Sir" (GK 3261). For discussion on the phrase "after three days," see comment on 12:40. The enemies of Jesus certainly do not believe Jesus' prediction; they are merely afraid of fraud. Their fears were really unfounded, because the disciples themselves disbelieved Jesus' words about rising again, not because they could not understand the plain words, but because they had no frame of reference capable of integrating a dying and rising Messiah into their own messianic expectations. The only thing they knew was the terrible fact that their Messiah had been crucified.

65–66 The NIV's rendering "Take a guard" is better read, "You have a guard of soldiers." That is, Pilate refuses to use his troops but tells the Jewish authorities that they have the temple police at their disposal; and he grants the leaders permission to use them. This explains why, after the Resurrection, the guards report to the chief priests, not to Pilate (28:11). Pilate's answer in v.65 must therefore be construed as cynical. He is saying, "You were afraid of this man when he was alive; now he is dead, and you are still afraid! By all means secure the tomb as tightly as possible, if you think that will help; but use your own police." So guards are posted and the stone sealed with cord and an official wax seal.

B. The Resurrection (28:1–15)

1. The empty tomb (28:1–7)

Because the Resurrection is central to Christian theology, few subjects have received more attention. Its theological implications are not treated at length by the evangelists; but the theme constantly recurs in Paul (e.g., Ro 4:24–25; 6:4; 8:34; 10:9; 1Co 15; 2Co 5:1–10, 15; Php 3:10–11; Col 2:12–13; 3:1–4; 1Th 4:14).

1 "After the Sabbath" is a general time indicator; i.e., the women would not walk far during the Sabbath; so they waited until after the Sabbath. But by then Saturday night was drawing on; so early on the first day of the week they "went to look at the tomb."

2–4 The clause introduced by "for" either suggests that the violent earthquake came with the "angel of the Lord" or was the means the angel used to open the tomb. The stone was rolled back, the seal broken, and the soldiers made helpless—not to let the risen Messiah escape, but to let the first witnesses in.

5–7 The angel speaks words that allay the women's fears. While the empty tomb by itself is capable of several explanations, this explanatory word of revelation narrows the potential interpretations down to one: Jesus had risen from the dead (v.6), a truth to be confirmed by personal appearances. Matthew also ties in the Resurrection with Jesus' promises—"as he said" (cf. 16:21; 17:23; 20:18–19). The women are invited to see the place where Jesus lay and commanded to go "quickly" to give his disciples the joyous message. Jesus had promised to go ahead of his disciples into Galilee (see comment on 26:32); the angel now reminds them of this.

2. First encounter with the risen Christ (28:8–10)

8–9 With mingled fear and joy, the women run to tell their news to the disciples, when "suddenly" (GK 2627 & 2779) Jesus meets them and greets them with a traditional greeting. The women clasp his feet and "worship" (or "kneel before"; GK 4686) him. The same verb occurs in the only other resurrection appearance (v.17) and encourages the view that the "kneeling" has instinctively become worship (see comment on 8:2).

10 Like the angel (v.5), Jesus stills the women's fears and gives them a similar commission. "My brothers" probably does not refer only to the Eleven but to all those attached to his cause who were then in Jerusalem, most of whom had followed him from Galilee to Jerusalem as his "disciples" (see comments on 5:1–2; 28:17).

Why does Matthew record a resurrection appearance in Galilee? The answer surely lies in the combination of two themes that have permeated the entire gospel. (1) The Messiah emerges from a despised area (see comment on 2:23) and first sheds his light on a despised people (see comment on 4:15–16), for the kingdom of heaven belongs to the poor in spirit (5:3). For this reason, too, the risen Jesus first appears to women whose value as witnesses among Jews is worthless. (2) "Galilee of the Gentiles" (4:15) is compatible with the growing theme of Gentile mission in this gospel (see comment on 1:1; 2:1–12, et al.) and prepares for the Great Commission (28:18–20).

3. First fraudulent denials of Jesus' resurrection (28:11–15)

Matthew simply intends this paragraph to be an explanation of the stolen-corpse theology and an apologetic against it. He may also be drawing out a startling contrast: the chief priests use bribe money to commission the soldiers to spread lies, while the resurrected Jesus uses the promise of his presence to commission his followers to spread the truth of the Gospel (vv.16–20).

11–14 The guards reported to the chief priests (see comment on 27:65–66) the earthquake, the angel, and the empty tomb. It is very difficult to believe that soldiers of Pilate would admit falling asleep; that would be tantamount to suicide. But temple police could more easily be bribed, even though it took "a large sum of money," and could more easily be protected from Pilate's anger. Once again the instinctive concern of the Jewish leaders relates to expedience and the people's reaction, not to the truth.

15 Matthew offers this section as the origin of the "widely circulated" Jewish explanation for the empty tomb, still common in the days of Justin Martyr.

C. The Risen Messiah and His Disciples (28:16–20)

1. Jesus in Galilee (28:16–17)

These final verses of this gospel recapitulate many of Matthew's themes, tying up several loose ends.

16 The Eleven do what Jesus says and go to Galilee, to a specific mountain "where Jesus had told them to go." This verse presupposes the arrangements implicit in 26:32; 28:7, 10. Associating the Great Commission (vv.18–20) with Galilee not only has nuances with Jesus' humble background and the theme of Gentile mission (see comment on v.10) but also suggests the continuation of Jesus' ministry in Galilee.

17 Doubt about Jesus' resurrection is expressed elsewhere (Lk 24:10–11; Jn 20:24–29), but only by those who have heard reports of Jesus' resurrection without actually seeing him. This verse is therefore unique. Two difficulties must be considered.

(1) Does "some" refer to "some of the Eleven" or to "some others" in addition to the Eleven? The question is partly decided by one's interpretation of v.10 (see comment). If the verb translated "worship" (GK 4686) here means not merely "kneel" but "worship" (see comment on v.9), then the "eleven disciples" (v.16) and the "some" probably constitute two groups; for doubt about who Jesus is or about the reality of his resurrection does not seem appropriate for true worship.

(2) But why was there doubt at all? If others than the Eleven are the ones who doubt (lit., "hesitate"; GK 1491), this does not solve the problem; it merely shifts it from the Eleven to other followers of Jesus.

Several solutions have been proposed, none of them convincing. Perhaps it is best to conclude that the move from unbelief and fear to faith and joy on the part of the larger group was for them a "hesitant" one. The Eleven, who according to the other gospels had already seen the risen Jesus at least twice, respond instantly with worship on the occasion of this new appearance, but some (others) "hesitated"—without further specification as to their subsequent belief or doubt. That is, Jesus' resurrection did not instantly transform people of little faith and faltering understanding into spiritual giants. Another thing (not dealt with by Matthew) was necessary, namely, the enduement of the Spirit at Pentecost.

2. The Great Commission (28:18–20)

18 "All" (GK 4246) dominates vv.18–20 and ties these verses together: all authority, all nations, all things ("everything," NIV), all the days ("always," NIV). The authority of Jesus Messiah has already been heavily stressed in this gospel (e.g., 7:29; 10:1, 7–8; et al.). Therefore it is wrong to claim that the Resurrection conferred on Jesus an authority incomparably greater than what he enjoyed before his crucifixion. The truth is more subtle. After all, during his ministry his words, like God's words, cannot pass away (24:35); and he, like God, forgives sin (9:6). It is not Jesus' authority per se that becomes more absolute. Rather, the spheres in which he now exercises absolute authority are enlarged to include all heaven and earth, i.e., the entire universe. The Son becomes the one through whom all God's authority is mediated (cf. Php 2:5–11). It marks a turning point in redemptive history, for Messiah's "kingdom" has dawned in new power.

19 Two features tie the command in this verse to Jesus' universal authority. (1) The dawning of the new age of messianic authority impels his disciples forward to a universal ministry he himself never engaged in during the days of his flesh. His promotion to universal authority serves as an eschatological marker inaugurating the beginning of his universal mission. (2) Because of that authority, his followers may go in confidence that their Lord is in sovereign control of "everything in heaven and on earth" (cf. Ro 8:28).

The main emphasis in this verse is on the command to "make disciples" (GK 3411; the rest of the verb forms are participles, though they function like imperatives). To disciple a person to Christ is to bring that person to accept Christ as his or her teacher. Disciples are those who hear, understand, and obey Jesus' teaching (12:46–50). This injunction is given at least to the Eleven, but to the Eleven in their own role as disciples. Therefore they are paradigms for all disciples to make others what they themselves are—disciples of Jesus Christ.

With the words "all nations," Matthew's gospel returns to the theme introduced in the very first verse (see comment on 1:1)—that the blessings promised to Abraham and through him to all peoples on earth (Ge 12:3) are now to be fulfilled in Jesus the Messiah. The expression is comprehensive, including Gentiles and Jews. The aim of Jesus' disciples, therefore, is to make disciples of all people everywhere, without distinction.

"Baptizing" and "teaching" (v.20) are not the means of making disciples, but they characterize it. Envisaged is that proclamation of the Gospel that will result in repentance and faith, for making disciples entails both preaching and response. The response expected of new disciples is baptism and instruction.

Those who become disciples are to be baptized "into" (see NIV note) the name of the Trinity. The preposition "into" strongly suggests a coming-into-relationship-with or a coming-under-the-Lordship-of Jesus (for comments about baptism, see comment on 3:6, 11, 13–17). Baptism is a sign both of entrance into Messiah's covenant community and of pledged submission to his lordship. The triple formula containing Father (or God), Son (or Christ), and Spirit occurs frequently in the NT (cf. 1Co 12:4–6; 2Co 13:14; Eph 4:4–6; 2Th 2:13–14; 1Pe 1:2; Rev 1:4–6). Thus it becomes difficult to deny the presence of Trinitarian thought in the NT documents, as confirmed by (1) the frequency of the God-Christ-Spirit formulas, (2) their context and use in the NT, and, (3) the recognition by NT writers that the attributes of the Lord of the OT may be comprehensively applied to Jesus.

20 Those who are discipled must be taught. The content of this instruction is everything Jesus commanded the first disciples. Three things stand out. (1) The focus is on Jesus' commands, not OT law. Jesus' words, like the words of Scripture, are more enduring than heaven and earth (24:35); and the peculiar expression "everything I have commanded you" is reminiscent of the authority of the Lord (Ex 29:35; Dt 1:3, 41; 7:11; 12:11, 14). This confirms our exegesis of 5:17–20. (2) Remarkably, Jesus does not foresee a time when any part of his teaching will be rightly judged needless, outmoded, superseded, or untrue: everything he has commanded must be passed on "to the very end of the age." (3) What the disciples teach is not mere dogma steeped in abstract theorizing but content to be obeyed.

The gospel ends with the promise of Jesus' comforting presence, which, if not made explicitly conditional on the disciples' obedience to the Great Commission, is at least closely tied to it. He who is introduced to us in the prologue as Immanuel, "God with us" (1:23), is still God with us every day, to the end of history as we know it, when the kingdom will be consummated.

Matthew's gospel ends with the expectation of continued mission and teaching. The five preceding sections each conclude with a block of Jesus' teaching (3:1–26:5); but the passion and resurrection of Jesus end with a commission to his disciples to carry on that same ministry, in the light of the Cross, the empty tomb, and the triumphant vindication and exaltation of the risen Lord. In this sense the gospel of Matthew is not a closed book till the consummation. The final chapter is being written in the mission and teaching of Jesus' disciples (cf. 2Ti 2:2).

INTRODUCTION

1. Purpose

The gospel of Mark is a succinct, unadorned yet vivid account of the ministry, suffering, death, and resurrection of Jesus. Mark tells the Good News about Jesus Christ so simply that a child can understand it. Nevertheless his gospel is far deeper than it looks. Therefore one ought to approach the study of this book humbly and with due recognition of the need for wisdom from almighty God and enlightenment from the Holy Spirit.

2. The Place of Mark's Gospel in Biblical Studies

The gospel of Mark was early relegated to a position inferior to that of the other gospels. In old manuscripts of the Gospels, it rarely occupies the first position. Few early Christian writers quoted from it. The first commentary on Mark of which we have any record is the one by Victor of Antioch in the fifth century. From the time of Victor till the rise of modern biblical criticism, little attention was paid to Mark's gospel. It is not difficult to explain this. Mark was not written by an apostle (as were Matthew and John); its language was rough and ungrammatical; and it was generally believed to be an abridgement of Matthew.

In the nineteenth century a dramatic change took place. Modern Bible scholars concluded that Mark was the first gospel to be written, containing the uninterpreted facts about Jesus of Nazareth, and that both Matthew and Luke used Mark as a major source for writing their gospels, expanding and interpreting the stories of Jesus as recorded in Mark.

Since Mark, with its emphasis on the humanity of Jesus, lent itself in such a remarkable way to the preconceived christological notions of the nineteenth-century liberal theologians, they warmly embraced this gospel.

In the early twentieth century however, scholars began pointing out the kerygmatic nature of the Markan material (i.e., it contains essentially preaching rather than historical materials). Wrede (1901) argued that Mark had a theological axe to grind. Before the Resurrection, believing in Jesus as the Messiah never occurred to anyone. When, however, people began to believe in him, there was an attempt to read it back into the accounts of Jesus. The messianic secret in Mark is such an attempt. Wrede's work, while not accepted, succeeded in undermining the assumption that Mark was a straightforward historical account of the life of Jesus.

Form critics (1919–54) sought to divide the gospel into units, maintaining that these circulated orally before they were written down and that in the oral period these units were shaped by the Sitz im Leben (life setting) of the early Christian community. The gospel writers were essentially scissors-and-paste men. The Gospels are therefore more the products of the community than of individual authors, and they record the history of the church more than the history of Jesus. This approach to the Gospels ruled out the possibility of an account of Jesus in any truly historical sense.

With the emergence of redaction criticism, a more positive and constructive approach to the Gospels began. Scholars turned attention to the editorial role of the gospel writers; their chief concern was how the Evangelists handled the tradition, both oral and written, that came into their hands and how they shaped each gospel in order to fulfill a particular theological purpose or set of purposes. Thus this approach recognized a third life setting in the production of the Gospels. Not only is there (1) the life setting of Jesus and (2) that of the early church, but there is also (3) that of the Evangelist himself. The insights of redaction criticism offer creative interpretive possibilities within a context of the historical reliability of Mark's gospel. This hermeneutical approach is reflected in this commentary. (On redaction criticism, cf. also EBC 1:448–49.)

3. Authorship

a. Early tradition

Although the gospel of Mark is anonymous, there is a strong and clear early tradition that Mark was its author and that he was closely associated with the apostle Peter, from whom he obtained his information about Jesus. The earliest reference is found in the church historian Eusebius, who quoted from a lost work written by Papias, bishop of Hierapolis, about A.D. 140. The Papias tradition suggests several important points about Mark's gospel: (1) behind Mark is the eyewitness account and apostolic authority of Peter; (2) Mark did not write his account about Jesus in chronological sequence; (3) nevertheless Mark was careful to record accurately what Peter said. It also fits well with the possibility of Mark being a redactor of the received tradition. If the tradition he received from Peter was in the form of disconnected homilies, Mark had much work to do in transforming Peter's preaching into a gospel. This would allow him the freedom to impress on the received tradition his own theological concerns with a view to the special needs of the community to which he addressed his gospel.

Another early tradition (A.D. 160–80), also connecting Mark to Peter, adds two more items of information: (1) Mark wrote his gospel after the death of Peter, and (2) he wrote it in Italy.

Irenaeus of Lyons (c. A.D. 180) and the Muratorian Canon (c. A.D. 200) agree with this tradition. Thus at least three different church centers are represented: Hierapolis, Rome, and Lyons. The tradition is repeated later by Tertullian of North Africa and Clement of Alexandria.

b. John Mark in the biblical tradition

It is generally agreed that the Mark who is identified as the author of the gospel is also the John Mark of the NT. He is first mentioned in connection with his mother, who lived in the house in Jerusalem that Peter went to on his release from prison (Ac 12:25). Mark accompanied Paul and Barnabas (his cousin, Col 4:10) when they returned to Antioch from Jerusalem after the famine visit (Ac 12:25). Mark next appears as a "helper" to Paul and Barnabas on their first missionary journey (13:5).

Unfortunately Mark did not last long as a missionary helper. At Perga, he deserted to return to Jerusalem (Ac 13:13). When Barnabas proposed taking Mark on the second journey, Paul flatly refused, a refusal that caused Barnabas to separate from Paul (15:36–39). Barnabas took Mark and sailed for Cyprus. Later, however, Mark was with Paul at Rome (Col 4:10; Phm 24). Apparently at this point Mark was beginning to win his way back into Paul's confidence. By the end of Paul's life, Mark was back in full favor (see 2Ti 4:11). Peter also witnesses to Mark's presence in Rome about this time (1Pe 5:13).

In addition to what has been mentioned thus far, two other considerations point to the Markan authorship. (1) It seems unlikely that the church would have deliberately ascribed the authorship of this gospel to a person of secondary importance like Mark, unless there were strong historical reasons for doing this. (2) It may be that Luke's interest in Mark as contained in Acts came in part because Luke knew he was the author of one of the major sources for his own gospel (cf. Lk 1:1–4).

4. Date

It is not possible to date Mark's gospel with precision. The early tradition is divided, some saying it was written after the death of Peter, others claiming Peter was still alive. Evidence within the gospel seems to support a date for the gospel after Peter's death in A.D. 64. Mark is very frank in pointing out the failures of Peter—a frankness more easily understood if Peter had already been martyred and had achieved a leading place in the affection of the early church. No recitation of his past failures could then threaten his high position. It could, however, be used to encourage and strengthen a suffering church, itself facing martyrdom.

The latest likely date for Mark is A.D. 70 since the gospel makes no reference to the destruction of Jerusalem that year. In fact Mark says nothing at all of the Jewish War (A.D. 66–70), which was climaxed by the destruction of the Holy City.

Thus, the best estimate for dating the gospel is the last half of the decade A.D. 60–70. This date embraces the period immediately following the great fire of A.D. 64, when intense persecution began to be directed against Christians in Rome. There are good reasons to believe that the gospel of Mark was written to meet this crisis in the Roman church (see below).

5. Origin and Destination

Early church tradition locates the writing of the gospel either in Italy in general or specifically in Rome. This is consistent with (1) the historical likelihood that Peter was in Rome toward the end of his life and probably was martyred there, and (2) the biblical evidence that Mark too was in Rome about the same time and was closely associated with Peter (cf. 2Ti 4:11; 1Pe 5:13, "Babylon" probably symbolizes Rome).

All indicators point to Roman or at least to Gentile readers as Mark's primary audience. He explains Jewish customs that would be unfamiliar to Gentile readers (7:2–4; 15:42); he translates Aramaic words (3:17; 5:41; 7:11, 34; 15:22); he used Latinisms and Latin loan words (e.g., the word for "penny" in 12:42 and the word "Praetorium" in 15:16—the large number of such words, especially in comparison with Matthew and Luke, seems to suggest such readership); he reveals a special interest in persecution and martyrdom (8:34–38; 13:9–13), subjects particularly relevant to Christians in Rome; and, finally, the immediate acceptance and widespread influence of his gospel (Matthew and Luke built their gospels on it) suggest a powerful church behind it. No church better fits the description than Rome.

6. Life Setting

Since Mark's gospel is associated with Rome, it is in the Christian community there that we must look for its occasion and purpose. There are two suggestions as to the life setting of the gospel.

a. The persecutions of the Roman church in A.D. 65–67

In A.D. 64 a devastating fire broke out in Rome. More than half the city was destroyed; and strong rumors persisted, despite all attempts to quash them, that the emperor Nero had himself deliberately set it. The Roman historian Tacitus wrote that Nero, to squelch the rumor, sought to blame the Christians for the fire and instigated massive persecution against them. If that is so, and Mark wrote at precisely that time, he intended his book to help guide and support his fellow Christians in this time of crisis.

The way Mark prepares his Christian readers for suffering is by placing before them the passion experience of Jesus. Jesus' way was a via dolorosa. The way of discipleship for Christians is the same—the way of the Cross. About one-third of Mark's gospel is devoted to the death of Jesus. And not only in the passion of Jesus is the theme of suffering found. Many explicit and veiled references occur elsewhere in the life of Jesus in Mark: in the temptation experience—he was in the wilderness with wild beasts (1:12–13); in the misunderstanding of his family (3:21, 31–35) and people generally (3:22, 30); in his statements about the cost of discipleship (8:34–38); and in his references to persecutions (10:30, 33–34, 45; 13:8, 11–13). To Mark, faithfulness and obedience as a follower by Jesus Christ inevitably lead to suffering and perhaps even death.

b. The emergence of heretical theological teachings

More recent studies of Mark's gospel have focused on its theology and particularly on its Christology. Scholars such as Ralph Martin suggest that after Paul's death, some Christians began to exalt the divine-man status of Jesus at the expense of his true humanity. Thus in Mark we find an emphasis on Jesus' true humanity, underscored by his sufferings. This possible setting for the gospel has much to commend it. It recognizes the Christological concerns of the author as well as his more directly pastoral concerns for the people to whom he is writing. It is entirely possible that both increased persecutions and false Christological ideas in the Roman church constituted the life setting that gave rise to the writing of this first gospel about Jesus Christ, the Son of God.

7. Literary Form

The nature of the literary form of Mark's writing has stimulated much discussion among NT scholars in recent years. Mark starts out with the statement, "The beginning of the gospel about Jesus Christ." But what is a gospel?

Perhaps it is best to state first what a gospel is not. It is not a biography (i.e., an organized historical account of a person, beginning with his background and family and continuing through each significant period of his life). Mark has no genealogy or birth narrative, and says nothing of Jesus' boyhood or adolescence. Mark starts right out, after quoting from the OT, with Jesus as a full-grown man.

Mark seems to have created the category "gospel" (GK 2295) to describe the literary form of his work, a work that contains preaching material about God's saving work in Jesus of Nazareth. Mark selects certain key points in Jesus' career and aims at a credible account of these historical events. At the same time the material is organized so as to stress certain subjects and motifs. The writing is not "objective" but confessional.

This means that though the material found in Mark's gospel is rooted in what happened in Palestine during the first century of our era, it also bears the stamp of the man God chose to put it into its final form. Mark conveys God's good news of salvation by emphasizing Jesus' saving ministry. He also writes as a theologian, arranging and interpreting the tradition to meet the needs of his hearers.

8. Language and Style

The vocabulary of Mark's gospel is rather limited. He uses 1,270 different words, of which 80 are peculiar to him among the NT writers.

He is fond of transliterating Latin words (at least ten of them) into Greek, and occasionally his Greek shows an underlying Latin construction or expression.

A more important influence on Mark's language is Aramaic (e.g., the use of parataxis in preference to subordinating clauses and the introduction of direct speech with the participle "saying"). It reads as if it might have come from those who spoke Aramaic as their mother tongue.

Although Mark's facility with the Greek language is clearly inferior to that of Luke and other NT writers, he manages to achieve a remarkably forceful, fresh, and vigorous style. He uses the historical present over 150 times, and the adverb "immediately" occurs 41 times. Thus he gives his readers the impression of listening to an on-the-spot report. Intimate details, such as one would expect from an eyewitness, abound: e.g., the reaction of the crowds (1:27; 2:12), the emotional responses of Jesus (1:41, 43; 3:5; 7:34), and the reactions of the disciples (9:5–6, 10; 10:24, 32).

Another important feature of Mark's style is his vigorous interaction with his readers. He accomplishes this by (1) directly addressing them (cf. 2:10; 7:19); (2) addressing his readers through the words of Jesus (cf. 13:37); and (3) rhetorical questions addressed to them (cf. 4:41). Mark wants his readers to be participants, not mere observers. He wants them to respond to what he tells them about Jesus by saying of him, "He is the Christ, the Son of God."

EXPOSITION

I. Prologue (1:1–13)

A. Preparing the Way (1:1–8)

1 The first verse seems to be a title. It may refer to the entire gospel or only to the ministry of John the Baptist.

Since in Ac 1:22 the starting point of the Good News is stated to be "from John's baptism" (cf. also Mt 11:12; Lk 16:16; Jn 1:6), Mark may have this in mind here. Another possibility, however, is that by using "beginning" Mark is imitating Ge 1:1 and wants his readers to realize that his book is a new beginning in which God reveals the Good News of Jesus Christ. Taken in this way, the first verse is not only a title for the entire book but a claim to its divine origin.

The word "gospel" comes from the old English "god-spel" ("good news") and translates accurately the Greek *euangelion (*GK 2295). In the NT the Good News is that God has provided salvation for everyone through the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ. For Mark to convey this Good News, he has created a new literary genre—"a gospel."

This gospel is "about Jesus Christ." Mark intends to proclaim the gospel, already known and experienced by the Roman believers, by rooting it in the events of Jesus' life. There are indications that they had lost hold of these historical roots.

"Jesus" is the Greek form of the Hebrew "Joshua," which means "The LORD is salvation" or "salvation of the LORD," or "The LORD saves." This name was revealed by the angel to Joseph before Jesus was born and describes his mission of being Savior (Mt 1:21). "Christ" is the Greek word for "anointed" (see comments on 8:29 for a full discussion of the word). The last phrase, "the Son of God," is an important theme in Mark's gospel (cf. 1:11; 3:11; 5:7; 9:7; 12:6; 13:32; 14:36, 61; 15:39).

2–3 Mark cites the OT to show that any true understanding of the ministry of Jesus must be firmly grounded there. "It is written" underscores a strong belief in the unchanging authority of the Scriptures. The quotations that follow are from Mal 3:1 (though it differs in reading "your way" instead of "the way before me," allowing for a messianic interpretation of this passage) and Isa 40:3.

Mark brings together these OT texts in a striking way. He cites God's promise of a messenger "to guard you on the way and to bring you to the place I have prepared" (Ex 23:20), i.e., through the wilderness to the Promised Land. Isa 40:3 looks forward to the coming of another messenger "in the desert," who will go before the people of God in a second Exodus to prepare for the revelation of God's salvation in Christ.

4 Since Mark wants to highlight the saving facts of Jesus and their theological meaning for the Roman church, he does not include a nativity narrative. He immediately begins with the ministry of John the Baptist as the forerunner of the Messiah. This is precisely where Peter begins in his proclamation of the gospel in Ac 10:37.

John appeared suddenly, "baptizing in the desert region," the arid regions west of the Dead Sea. This general area was the abode of the Qumran sect. Though John likely came in contact with these people, it does not appear as if they exerted much influence on him, at least not as regards his baptismal practices or his great emphasis on ethical conduct and eschatological judgment.

John preached baptism as an indication that repentance either had already occurred or accompanied it. The end result is the forgiveness of sins. God's direct response to true repentance is forgiveness.

5 John's preaching caused great excitement, for many people kept going out to him. Although there is an element of hyperbole in Mark's report, it nevertheless implies that John's preaching aroused much interest and created a great stir. Jerusalem is at least twenty miles from the Jordan River and about four thousand feet above it. It was hard going down the rugged Judean hills to the Jordan and even harder coming back up. John preached the coming of the Messiah. This raised popular excitement to a fever pitch.

6 John is described as a typical "holy man" of the Near East. His clothing was woven of camel's hair and held in place by "a leather belt around his waist" (cf. 2Ki 1:8). His food consisted of locusts (cf. Lev 11:21–22) and wild honey.

7–8 In Mark's account John's message is brief, focusing on the coming of the Mighty One who will baptize with the Holy Spirit. So great is this Mighty One that John does not consider himself worthy even to untie his sandals for him. He contrasts his baptism with that of the Coming One: his baptism is water baptism, while that of the Coming One is Holy Spirit baptism. Again John emphasizes the superiority of the ministry of the Coming One to his own ministry. John's prophecy was fulfilled in a dramatic way at Pentecost (cf. Ac 1:5).

B. The Baptism and Temptation of Jesus (1:9–13)

9 Jesus probably began his public ministry about A.D. 27, when he was approximately thirty years old. Two events, however, immediately preceded the beginning of his ministry: his baptism by John and his temptation by the devil.

The baptism of Jesus by John must have been a problem to the early church. Why did Jesus submit himself to a baptism of repentance for the forgiveness of sins? Matthew recounts John's reluctance to baptize Jesus and Jesus' reply: "It is proper for us to do this to fulfill all righteousness" (Mt 3:14–15; see comment). Jesus had to identify himself with sinful humanity at the very outset of his ministry. This he did by submitting to baptism (cf. 2Co 5:21).

10 Mark seems to suggest that only Jesus saw "heaven being torn open and the Spirit descending," though he may have been so focusing on Jesus' experience that he says nothing of John's. Whatever else the descent of the Spirit on Jesus meant, it clearly indicated his anointing for ministry. Jesus himself claimed this anointing in the synagogue at Nazareth when he said, "The Spirit of the Lord is on me" (Lk 4:18).

11 God's response fuses the concept of the messianic King of the coronation Psalm (2:7) and that of the Lord's Servant of Isaiah (42:1). The main emphasis, however, is on the unique sonship of Jesus. Mark confesses Jesus as Son of God at the very outset of his gospel (1:1). Here God confesses Jesus as his Son and witnesses to his approval of his Son. He knows the unique mission he has given to his Son and states his confidence in him.

12 From his baptism Jesus goes "at once" (GK 2317, a characteristic of Mark) to his temptation. The humbling of Jesus by his identification with the failure and sin of humankind at the Baptism is continued by his subjection to the onslaughts of Satan. The same Holy Spirit who came on Jesus at his baptism drives him out into the desert.

13 Mark's account of the temptation is brief, recording no specific temptation and no victory over Satan. This emphasizes that Jesus' entire ministry was one continuous encounter with the devil and not limited to a few temptations in the desert. Indeed, in his gospel he vividly describes this continuing conflict.

The "forty days" recall the experiences of Moses (Ex 24:18) and Elijah (1Ki 19:8, 15) in the desert. Only Mark mentions the "wild animals"—a touch that heightens the fierceness of Jesus' entire temptation experience.

II. The Early Galilean Ministry (1:14–3:6)

A. Calling the First Disciples (1:14–20)

14–15 Jesus now begins his Galilean ministry. The opening of his public ministry is related to that of John the Baptist. Not until "after John was put in prison" (v. 14) and perhaps put to death did Jesus begin his ministry. John, the forerunner, had completed his God-appointed task. Mark may be hinting that just as John's ministry ended in death, so will the ministry of Jesus. The content of Jesus' preaching is "the good news of God." The Good News is both from God and about God. The gospel is the very best news ever to come to the hearing of humankind, because it contains the message of forgiveness, restoration, and new life in Christ Jesus (cf. 2Co 5:17).

Jesus witnesses to God's action for our salvation by saying, "The time has come." This is the decisive time for God's action. With the coming of Jesus, God was doing something special.

The concept of the "kingdom [GK 993] of God" is basic to the teaching of Jesus. It relates directly to the kingship of God described in the OT (e.g., Ex 15:18; Ps 29:10; Isa 43:15). The Lord's kingship is both a present reality (God is exercising his authority now) and a future hope (God will reign in the End, when he finally puts down all opposition to his reign).

The same tension between the kingdom of God as both present and future exists in the teaching of Jesus. Here Jesus proclaims, "The kingdom of God is near" (cf. Mt 12:28; Lk 11:20). In Jesus' actions God's rule has invaded this present world. But in other sayings the kingdom is spoken of as still future (e.g., Mt 8:11; 20:21). The solution to the dilemma of both a present and a future kingdom is not to be found in rejecting one or the other but in recognizing that both are true. The kingdom is present now, but there will be a full manifestation of it in the future.

In Mk 1:15 the kingdom is emphasized as having drawn near in the person of Jesus. The only appropriate response is repentance and faith. There is an urgency about the nearness of God's kingdom. Since it ushers in the End, it speaks of judgment.

16 Jesus must now gather around him a community whom he can teach so that they may become sharers in that message. He calls them in the midst of everyday life where they really live. God's reign does not operate in a void.

Jesus found Simon and his brother Andrew along the shore of the Sea of Galilee. (Much of Jesus' ministry took place near this lake.)

17–18 Mark says nothing of a previous encounter of these two disciples with Jesus (cf. Jn 1:35–42). Rather, Jesus called Simon and Andrew to the urgent task of rescuing people from the impending judgment that the coming of the kingdom in the person and work of Jesus presages. The urgency demands a response. "At once" the two fishermen left their nets and followed him (see comment on Mt 4:18–20).

19–20 The same call that was extended to Peter and Andrew was now extended to James and John, sons of Zebedee, and they too responded without any hesitation. In their case something of the price of discipleship is indicated by the breaking of family ties—the leaving of their father's business.

B. Jesus' First Healings—On a Sabbath (1:21–34)

21 The first Sabbath incident occurred in the synagogue in Capernaum. The synagogue originated in the Exile as the result of Jews meeting together for prayer and the study of the Torah. In NT times synagogues were found all over the Hellenistic world and were the center of Jewish religious and social life.

Capernaum was the home of Peter and became a kind of base of operations for Jesus' Galilean ministry. A Jewish custom permitted visiting teachers like Jesus to preach (based on the reading from the Law or Prophets) in the synagogue by invitation of its leaders.

22 While we are not told what Jesus said in the synagogue, the congregation reacted with amazement to his message. Jesus did not have to quote the authorities ("Rabbi so-and-so says such-and-such"); his authority came straight from God. His preaching stood in contrast to the teachers of the law, the scholars professionally trained in the interpretation and application of the law.

23 Suddenly the synagogue service was disrupted by the cry of a man "possessed by an evil spirit." Thus, early in his ministry Jesus came into conflict with Satan. This is significant, for Jesus came to destroy the power of the devil (1Jn 3:8). The NT accounts of demonism do not seem so bizarre as they once did. Reports of demon possession nowadays come not only from distant and remote mission fields but from the most sophisticated of our urban centers.

24 Although v.23 states that the man cried out, it was really the demon who had the man under his control who shouted. The "us" in his question shows that the demon was speaking for his fellow demons as well. They clearly seemed to recognize Jesus and his mission of judgment.

The utterance of the name of Jesus and his title "the Holy One of God" (cf. Lk 1:35) may have been an attempt by the demon to get control over Jesus, since it was widely believed that by uttering a person's name, one could gain magic power over him or her.

25–26 Jesus needed no magical formulas to exorcise the demon. He addressed it directly and ordered it, "Be quiet!" With this word of power the evil spirit convulsed the man "and came out of him with a shriek."

27–28 Mark again reports the reaction of the people (cf. v.22) as they asked themselves in amazement and alarm, "What is this?" Their answer stresses both the newness of Jesus' teaching and its authority. They had had no previous experience with this kind of teaching. Jesus' authority was inherent within himself; one command accomplished the exorcism of the demon. The inevitable result was that Jesus' fame began to spread "over the whole region of Galilee."

29–31 The eyewitness details of the next story suggest its origin with Peter, who, after all, had a special interest in what occurred. After Jesus left the synagogue, he went to the house of Simon and Andrew, where Peter's mother-in-law lay in bed with a fever. Jesus' healing of her is described simply, yet with interesting detail: "He went to her, took her hand and helped her up." The cure was instantaneous and complete, for she got out of bed and began to serve the needs of her guests.

32–34 The following day (since Sabbath ends at sundown), people could now bring, without breaking the law, their sick and demon-possessed to him. The exorcism of v.26 and the healing of v.31 were not isolated cases. Jesus extended his healing power to large numbers.

Again Jesus muzzled the demons, "because they knew who he was" (cf. Lk 4:46). His reluctance to have the demons reveal him as the Messiah is best explained by his desire to show by word and deed what kind of Messiah he was before he openly declared himself as the Messiah.

C. Leaving Capernaum (1:35–39)

35–37 Jesus, after a busy evening of healing and exorcisms, got up early the next morning and sought a quiet place to pray (cf. 6:46; 14:32–41). He was facing a crisis—the shallow and superficial response of the people who were only interested in what he could do to heal their physical afflictions. So he sought the strength that only communion and fellowship with the Father could provide.

The disciples did not understand Jesus or his need for communion with the Father, so they went to look for him. Apparently they thought Jesus would be pleased to know that everyone was looking for him (v.37). They did not understand that this popular and shallow reception of him was the very reason he withdrew to pray.

38–39 Jesus' reply shows that he feared his healings and exorcisms were hindrances to understanding who he really was. The people of Capernaum were interested in him only as popular miracle-worker. So Jesus suggested that they move on to other villages to preach. He knew that he came into the world primarily to proclaim God's Good News and all that was involved in discipleship and suffering. Healings and exorcisms had their place, but they were not to usurp this primary purpose. If Mark wrote his gospel to refute a christological heresy that placed too much emphasis on Jesus as a miracle-worker, the relevance of these verses is clear.

D. Healing a Leper (1:40–45)

40 This story serves to connect 1:21–29 and 2:1–3:6—two clearly identifiable units in Mark's gospel.

The word "leprosy" (GK 3320) was used in biblical times to designate a wide variety of serious skin diseases. It was not limited to what we know as leprosy (i.e., Hansen's disease). The law had specific requirements for a person with a skin disease (Lev 13:45–46). Instead of keeping his distance from Jesus, as the law demanded, the leper came directly to him and fell down on his knees to make his plea. Having no doubt that Jesus could heal him, he wondered only whether Jesus was willing. It is sometimes easier to believe in God's power than in his mercy.

41–42 "Filled with compassion" is probably better read as "being angered," a reading found in older, more reliable manuscripts. Why would Jesus be angry? The best answer is that Jesus recognized this foul disease as the work of the devil. His anger was focused neither on the man nor on the disease but on Satan whose work he came to destroy. This incident then becomes another example of the fierce conflict between Christ and Satan that plays such an important part in this gospel.

Jesus also expressed compassion. He reached out and touched the unclean leper, an act that, according to the Mosaic Law, incurred defilement. In doing so, Jesus demonstrated his decision to take our flesh upon himself so that he might cleanse us from sin. His touching of the leper not only resulted in his being cured but also revealed Jesus' attitude toward the ceremonial law. He boldly placed love and compassion over ritual and regulation.

43–44 "Sent him away" is from a word often used of driving out demons, and "with a strong warning" originally meant "to snort like a horse." In other words, an element of anger or indignation is contained in Jesus' warning. Why? Because Jesus knew that the man would disobey him. Jesus did not want to gain the reputation of just being another "miracle-worker," for this would thwart the essential spiritual purpose of his ministry by touching off a messianic insurrection. Instead, he instructed the leper to go to those whose job it was to rule whether he was clean or not and to offer sacrifices required by the Mosaic Law (Lev 14:2–31). "As a testimony to them" likely means as a testimony to the priest and the people of the reality of the cure.

45 The leper acted consistent with human nature. The prohibition against telling what had happened to him made him all the more eager to proclaim it everywhere. Jesus thus had to curtail his public ministry, avoiding the towns and choosing rather to stay in more isolated places. But even in his isolation, people managed to find him.

E. Conflict With the Religious Leaders (2:1–3:6)

Clearly 2:1–3:6 is a separate section in Mark's gospel. In it Jesus comes into conflict with the Jewish religious leadership in a series of five separate incidents. Mark brought these incidents together because they have a common theme: conflict with the religious authorities. Such stories were undoubtedly used by the church in its ongoing struggle with Judaism.

1. Healing a paralytic (2:1–12)

1–2 This passage shows the close relationship between the healing of the body and the forgiveness of sins. Jesus returns to Capernaum, a kind of base of operations for him in the northern part of the country, to the house of Peter and Andrew (cf. 1:29). His presence in town was soon discovered, so that even this place afforded him no privacy. The house filled with people, and the overflow was so great that the space outside the door was blocked. They no doubt wanted to see Jesus perform more miracles. But he was not working miracles inside the house; rather, he was preaching the gospel to the people.

3–4 To understand these verses, it is necessary to visualize the layout of a typical Palestinian peasant's house. It was usually a small, one-room structure with a flat roof, accessible by means of an outside stairway. The roof itself was usually made of wooden beams with thatch and compacted earth in order to shed the rain. Sometimes tiles were laid between the beams and the thatch.

The four men brought the paralytic to the house where Jesus was; but when they saw the size of the crowd, they realized it was impossible to enter by the door. So they carried the paralytic up the outside stairway to the roof, dug up the compacted thatch and earth, removed the tiles, and lowered the man through the now-exposed beams to the floor below.

5 Jesus recognized this ingenuity and persistence of the paralytic and his bearers as faith. But instead of healing the man of his lameness, Jesus forgave his sins. On the surface, this hardly seemed to be what the man needed. But Jesus was illustrating an OT claim that human suffering rests in separation from God. Thus forgivness is our deepest need.

6–7 Here the "teachers of the law" (cf. 1:22) become directly involved with Jesus. His statement about forgiveness gave them their opportunity to ensnare him on some theological point.

Their basic premise was that for anyone but God to claim to forgive sin was blasphemy. Since for them Jesus was not God, he was blaspheming. If they were right about who Jesus was, their reasoning was flawless. In Jewish teaching even the Messiah could not forgive sins. They failed to recognize who Jesus really was—the Son of God who does have authority to forgive sins.

8–9 The teachers of the law had not openly expressed their misgivings about Jesus' action, but Jesus knew their thoughts and challenged them with the question in v.9. As he meant his words, neither of the two was easier. To the teachers of the law, however, it was easier to make the statement about forgiveness because who could verify its fulfillment? But to say, "Get up and walk"—that could indeed be verified by an actual healing.

10–11 Jesus' statement in the first half of v.10 was addressed to the scribes. The words "he said to the paralytic" constitute a parenthesis to explain that the following words are addressed not to the teachers of the law but to the paralytic. Another possibility is to take the entire verse, with its early public use of the title "Son of Man," as addressed to Mark's readers (see comments on 8:31).

The subsequent healing verified the claim to grant forgiveness. As surely as actual healing followed Jesus' statement "Get up" (v.11), so actual forgiveness resulted from his "your sins are forgiven."

12 The man's cure was instantaneous; in full view of everyone there, he walked out. The crowd responded with amazement and gave praise to God for what had happened. Never before had they seen anything like this.

The emphasis in this story is not on Jesus' pity for a helpless cripple that moved him to heal, but on his power to forgive sins. In his act of forgiveness Jesus was also declaring the presence of God's kingdom among humans.

2. Eating with sinners (2:13–17)

13 This second conflict with the religious leaders is introduced by the story of the calling of Levi, the tax collector. The scene is the shore of the Sea of Galilee. Jesus' popularity with the crowds was still very evident.

Dotted lines leading to the timeline are meant to define sequence of events only. Exact dates, even year dates, are generally unknown.

14 Jesus seems to be doing his teaching on this occasion as rabbis often did theirs—"as he walked along." If so, his teaching was interrupted by his encounter with Levi (i.e., Matthew; see Mt 9:9) at the tax collector's booth. He was employed by Herod Antipas, the tetrarch of Galilee, as a tax collector. Tax collectors were despised by the Jews because they were considered traitors and because they often were extortioners.

Jesus called Levi to follow him. There was much at stake for him in accepting Jesus' challenge, for there would be little possibility of his returning to his occupation. Tax collecting jobs were greatly sought after as a sure way to get rich quickly (see comment on Lk 3:12–13).

15–16 The dinner held in Levi's house was either his farewell party or a time for his friends to have an opportunity to meet Jesus. The tax collectors and "sinners" having dinner with Jesus suggests that he, not Levi, was the host! By calling sinners into his messianic kingdom, Jesus was showing that the basis of entering this kingdom was forgiveness.

"Sinners" (GK 283) denotes those people who refused to follow the Mosaic Law as interpreted by the Pharisees. Jesus' close association with despised tax collectors and "sinners" was too much for the "teachers of the law" to keep quiet about. These particular teachers were Pharisees (the successors of the pious Jews who joined forces with Mattathias and his sons during the Maccabean period; see comment on Lk 18:9–14; cf. EBC 1:192).

Although many of them were doubtless pious and godly men, those Jesus came into conflict with represented some of the worst elements of traditional religion: jealousy, hypocrisy, and religious formalism. Jesus' consorting with people who openly refused to keep the requirements of the law prompted them to ask why a supposedly observant Jew would associate with them.

17 No statement of Jesus in this gospel is more profound than this one. A doctor ministers not to healthy persons but to those who are sick. So Jesus came not to call the "righteous" (GK 1465; here meaning the self-righteous) but "sinners" (i.e., those who are alienated from God in their lives). Jesus' call is to salvation; and, in order to share in it, there must be a recognition of need. A self-righteous person is incapable of recognizing that need, but a sinner can.

3. A question about fasting (2:18–22)

18 In the law the only required fast was on the Day of Atonement (Lev 16:29, 31; 23:27–32), but after the Exile four other annual fasts were observed by Jews (Zec 7:5; 8:19). In NT times the stricter Pharisees fasted twice a week (Monday and Thursday; cf. Lk 18:12). The phrase "the disciples of the Pharisees" (used only here in the NT) probably refers to people who were influenced by the teachings and practice of the Pharisees. Both they and John the Baptist's disciples were fasting.

Why they were doing this, Mark does not say, but their fasting was a sign of true piety. Therefore, some unidentified people asked why Jesus' disciples did not give evidence of true religious piety by fasting.

19–20 Jesus answers in a parable emphasizing the joy that the presence of Jesus makes possible. Therefore fasting, as a sign of mourning, is not appropriate. To fast during a wedding, a time of great joy and festivity, would be unthinkable. Jesus is the bridegroom (v.19) and his disciples the guests. While he remains with them they will rejoice, not fast. However, he will not always be with them. When he is taken away, fasting will be appropriate. This is probably a veiled reference to his death (the word used implies a violent removal that causes sorrow).

21–22 The two parables in these verses were probably spoken on different occasions but both deal with a single theme. Obviously they bear on the question of fasting, but beyond that they also bear on the forms of Judaism generally. In ancient times wine was kept in goatskins. New skins were soft and pliable and would stretch when wine that had not yet completed fermentation was put in them. However, old wineskins that had been stretched would become brittle. The gas from the fermenting wine burst them open, destroying both wine and wineskins. Putting new wine into old wineskins and patching an old garment with a new cloth are just as inappropriate as fasting at a wedding feast. A wedding, new wine, and a new garment are all symbols of the newness that the coming of Jesus brings. That newness cannot be confined to the old forms of Judaism.

4. The Lord of the Sabbath (2:23–3:6)

The next two stories of conflict center on the keeping of the Sabbath, something far more important in Judaism than the question of fasting.

23–24 The main point at issue here was not the act of harvesting the heads of grain in fields that did not belong to them. Such activity as Jesus and his disciples were involved in was explicitly allowed in the law (Dt 23:25). What the Pharisees objected to was doing this reaping and threshing on the Sabbath.

25–26 Jesus met the accusation of the Pharisees with a counterquestion about the time when David and his companions were hungry and ate the consecrated bread (1Sa 21:1–6; cf. Ex 25:30; 35:13; 39:36; Lev 24:5–9). Although the action of David was contrary to the law, he was not condemned for it. Jesus does not claim that the Sabbath law has not been technically broken but that such violations under certain conditions are warranted.

27–28 The follow-up pronouncement is preceded by the phrase "Then he said to them" (cf. 4:2b, 11, 21, 24, 26; 6:10; 7:9; 8:21; 9:1), suggesting an independent saying of Jesus that is relevant to the subject at hand. To Jesus the Sabbath was not created for its own sake; it was a gift of God to the human race. Its purpose was not to put humans in a kind of straightjacket. Rather, it was for their good—to provide rest from labor and opportunity for worship.

Is v.28 a statement of Mark about Jesus or of Jesus about himself? If v.27 is a separate saying of Jesus inserted by Mark to climax the teaching of Jesus about the Sabbath, then it seems best to regard this verse as Mark's comment to the church (cf. 2:10). In any case, Jesus has authority to determine the use of the Sabbath.

3:1 In the final conflict story, Mark again gives no details of time or geographical location. The story takes place in a synagogue where there is a man with a "shriveled hand." Apparently some sort of paralysis is meant.

2 Mark does not specifically identify the opposition here, though he clearly means Pharisees and the teachers of the law (cf. Lk 6:7). Since Jesus had already raised suspicions in their mind because of his unorthodox actions, these men were present in the synagogue to spy on Jesus, "looking for a reason to accuse" him. They were convinced of his power to perform miracles, but were wondering if he would break rabbinic law that allowed healing on the Sabbath only if that life was actually in danger.

3–4 Jesus was fully aware of the designs of the opposition. Instead of acting carefully, he commanded the man to stand up and come to "center stage" so that all in the synagogue could see what he was going to do to him.

Jesus knew what was racing through the religious leaders' minds. So he asked them, "Which is lawful on the Sabbath: to do good or to do evil, to save life or to kill?" Perhaps Jesus meant that there is little difference between manslaughter and refusing to be concerned about relieving a distressed person. Or perhaps Jesus was indicting the Pharisees who were already plotting to kill him (v.6). The Pharisees were silent, refusing to debate the issue with Jesus.

5 Anger is rarely directly attributed to Jesus (cf. comment on 1:41). When he was angry, it was never the expression of injured self-concern. It was more like "righteous indignation"—what a good person feels in the presence of stark evil. Such anger was particularly appropriate to this situation, for Jesus saw the stubborn, unfeeling hearts of his enemies. He ordered the man to stretch out his hand; the man obeyed, and it was instantly and completely restored.

6 The healing resulted in further enmity against Jesus. The Pharisees, joined now by the Herodians (probably influential Jews who were friends and backers of the Herodian family), began to plot Jesus' death. The Herodians joined in opposition to Jesus because they feared he might be an unsettling political influence in Palestine.

III. The Later Galilean Ministry (3:7–6:13)

A summary statement (3:7–12) begins this new section of Mark's gospel, which ends with the sending out of the Twelve (6:6b–13). In between are two obvious sections: parables about the kingdom (4:1–34) and miracles of Jesus' power over hostile forces (4:35–5:43). In addition there are several units that deal with hostility and rejection (3:20–30, 31–35; 6:1–6a), and there is a brief account of the selection of the Twelve (3:13–19).

A. Withdrawal to the Lake (3:7–12)

7 Jesus withdrew, probably because he knew the authorities were out to get him (cf. Mt 12:15). Since the time had not yet come for a serious confrontation, he went to the Lake of Genessaret. This withdrawal, however, did not separate him from the crowds.

8 The crowds that came to Jesus were not only from the regions in the vicinity of Capernaum but also from the south (Jerusalem, Idumea), the east (across the Jordan including Perea and the Decapolis), and the northwest (Tyre and Sidon). The fact that the renown of Jesus reached the Jerusalem authorities, who sent their representatives up to Galilee to observe what was going on, suggests an advanced stage in the ministry of Jesus.

9–10 Only Mark includes the detail about the boat. Its purpose was, of course, to provide escape for Jesus in case the crowd began to get unruly. Great numbers of people were pressing forward just to touch Jesus in the hope that they might be healed. Once again, the crowd seems to have had little interest in Jesus other than as a miracle-worker. Despite this, he graciously healed many of them.

11–12 Again Jesus came into conflict with the demonic. The evil spirits recognized who Jesus was—even if the crowds did not. By crying out "You are the Son of God," they were trying to control him and neutralize his power (in Bible times, knowledge of a person's name conferred power over that person). "Son of God" is a true designation of who Jesus is. Jesus silenced the outcries of the demons because the time for the clear revelation of who he was had not yet come.

B. Selection of the Twelve (3:13–19)

13 Jesus withdrew to the hill country of Galilee and called twelve disciples to be his special followers. The designation of the Twelve suggests the foundation of a new Israel, after the original Israel had rejected their Messiah. The Twelve came to him without delay (cf. 1:18, 20; 2:14).

14–15 The purpose for which the Twelve were appointed was twofold: (1) they were to be brought into close association with the Son of God, live with him, travel with him, converse with him, and learn from him; (2) the training was not an end in itself—they were to be sent out to preach the Good News and to drive out demons. These last two elements are closely associated. The salvation Jesus brings involves the defeat of Satan and his demons.

16–19 There are three other lists of the apostles in the NT (Mt 10:2–4; Lk 6:14–16; Ac 1:13). The names of the Twelve as given in these lists naturally divide into four parts. Peter heads the three other names in the first section; Philip heads the second section; James the Son of Alphaeus (called "the Less" in Matthew) the third; the last section consists of the name of Judas Iscariot (except in Acts). Simon's nickname, "the rock" (Peter), was given him by Jesus (see comment on Mt 16:18).

James and John, the sons of Zebedee, were nicknamed "Sons of Thunder." This probably describes their disposition; it had something of the thunderstorm in it. Since Bartholomew is not a personal name but a patronymic, meaning "son of Talmai," this disciple probably had another name (Nathanael? cf. Jn 1:45). Matthew is doubtless to be identified with Levi (2:14). Thaddaeus is probably the Judas son of James of Luke's lists (Lk 6:16; Ac 1:13). Simon is called "the Zealot" (GK 2421; likely a reference to his membership in the party of the Zealots, a Jewish sect bent on the overthrow at all costs of the Roman control of Palestine). Judas's surname is given as Iscariot, probably meaning "the man from the place called Karioth." He is further identified as the man who betrayed Jesus.

It was a strange group of men our Lord chose as his disciples. Four of them were fishermen, one a hated tax collector, another a member of a radical and violent political party. Of six of them we know practically nothing. All were laymen; none was a preacher or expert in the Scriptures. Yet it was with these men that Jesus established his church and disseminated his Good News to the ends of the earth.

C. Jesus, His Family, and the Beelzebub Controversy (3:20–35)

The historicity of the incident of Jesus' family can scarcely be denied. The church would not have invented stories that put them into such bad light.

An important feature of this section is the insertion of one incident (the Beelzebub controversy) into another (the story of the relationship between Jesus and his family). This is a frequent device in Mark's gospel (cf. 5:21–43; 6:7–30; 11:12–25; 14:1–11). Mark uses this literary device to heighten the suspense and to allow for the passage of time. The association of these two incidents also suggests that Jesus' family members are not unlike the scribes in their attitude to Jesus.

20–21 Jesus was again being pressed by the crowds, demanding his undivided attention. When Jesus' family heard that he was so engrossed by his work that he failed even to care for his physical needs, they decided to go to him and "take charge of him," fearing that overwork had affected him mentally. They were planning to take him back to Nazareth.

Jesus' family was located in Nazareth, while Jesus himself was probably in Capernaum. To allow time for travel, Mark fills in the gap with the Beelzebub controversy.

22 The teachers of the law had come down from Jerusalem, indicating that the word about Jesus was spreading and causing concern in high places. Their analysis of Jesus' condition was "he is possessed by Beelzebub!" (i.e., "the prince of demons," or Satan; see comment on Mt 10:25). They accused Jesus and Satan of being in collusion with each other.

23–27 Jesus replied to the charge by making a comparison. His argument is as follows: I have just cast out demons. Now if I am doing this by Satan's power, then Satan is actually working against himself. But that would be absurd. Just as a house or a kingdom cannot stand if it is divided against itself or opposes itself, so Satan will bring about his own destruction by working against himself. In essence, Jesus was saying two things: (1) he cannot be in collusion with Satan; and (2) he is actually destroying Satan's work, which means he is more powerful than Satan.

By the parable of v. 27, Jesus implies that he is tying up Satan in order to deliver from bondage those under Satan's control. That was, after all, one of his main tasks (see comment on 1:23).

28–30 Jesus follows this story with a solemn pronouncement: forgiveness is available for all the sins and blasphemies of humans except for blasphemy against the Holy Spirit. What is that sin? Verse 30 suggests an explanation. Jesus had done what any unprejudiced person would have acknowledged as a good thing. He had freed an unfortunate man from the power and bondage of evil through the power of the Holy Spirit, but the teachers of the law ascribed it to the power of Satan. To call light darkness or good evil or Jesus' work satanic because of prejudice in one's heart is the worst sin of all.

The words of v.29 have caused great anxiety and pain in the history of the church. Many have wondered whether they have committed the "unpardonable sin." Surely what Jesus is speaking of here is not an isolated act but a settled condition of the soul—the result of a long history of repeated and willful acts of sin through hardness of heart (cf. 3:5). On the other hand, any who are troubled about this sin give evidence that they have not committed it. If the person involved cannot be forgiven, it is not so much that God refuses to forgive as it is the sinner who refuses to allow him.

31 Mark now returns to the family of Jesus. They did not enter the place where he was, but stood outside and sent someone in to call him. Since only Jesus' mother and brothers are mentioned, Joseph was probably no longer alive.

32–34 When Jesus was told that his mother and his brothers were looking for him, he responded by asking, "Who are my mother and my brothers?" Then with a sweep of his eyes over those seated in a circle around him (including his disciples), he identified his true family. Those who had responded to his call to be with him were spiritually far closer than blood relatives.

35 Jesus' true family includes all who obey the will of God. It can easily be imagined what this statement meant to the original readers of Mark's gospel. Though many had broken family relations and were being persecuted, they had an intimate relationship with the Son of God.

D. Parables About the Kingdom of God (4:1–34)

The gospel of Mark has only two sections of sustained teaching by Jesus: this passage and chapter 13. Chapter 4 contains four of Jesus' parables: the sower, the lamp, the secretly growing seed, and the mustard seed. Parables are the most striking feature in the teaching of Jesus. Although he did not invent this form of teaching (parables are found both in the OT and in the writings of the rabbis), he used it in a way and to a degree unmatched before his time or since.

Many parables are stories taken out of ordinary life, used to drive home a spiritual or moral truth. But they are not always stories. Sometimes they are brief similes, comparisons (e.g., Mt 15:15), analogies, or even proverbial sayings (e.g., Lk 4:23). The Greek word parabole (GK 4130) includes all these meanings.

For centuries parables were interpreted allegorically; i.e., each element of the story was assigned a specific meaning. Thus Augustine found in the parable of the Good Samaritan references to Adam, Jerusalem, the Devil and his angels, the Law and the Prophets, and Christ and the church! Now we are more apt to look for the one main point that a parable teaches. Though some clearly have more than one point, the principle is generally valid.

Jesus' teaching in his parables is more than general religious truth. It is always related in a dynamic way to his message and mission. At the same time, like all Scripture, the parables contain truth relevant for God's people everywhere—throughout history.

1. Parable of the sower (4:1–9)

1–2 Jesus was teaching by the Lake of Galilee. The presence of the large crowd shows his popularity as a teacher. In fact, the crowd was so large that he found it convenient to use a small boat (cf. 3 9) pushed out from the shore as his lectern (actually he sat while teaching). What is contained in 4:1–34 is only part of Jesus' teaching in parables (v.2).

3–9 The parable of the sower begins and ends with a call for careful attention, suggesting that its meaning may not be self-evident. Alert minds are needed to comprehend its truth. The background of the parable is rural life in Palestine. Seed was sown in broadcast fashion (v.3). The sower deliberately sowed it on the path (v.4), in rocky places (v.5), and among the thorns (v.7) because sowing preceded plowing. However, if plowing was delayed for any time at all, the consequences Jesus mentioned inevitably resulted.

The great emphasis in the parable is on the act of sowing the seed (i.e., the kingdom of God breaking into the world through Jesus) rather than on the soils into which it is sown (i.e., the response to Jesus' preaching). Although difficulties face God's kingdom, it grows and ultimately produces an abundant harvest.

2. Secret of the kingdom of God (4:10–12)

10 The question about parables was directed toward their general purpose in Jesus' teaching. He had spoken other parables, and the disciples and other followers of Jesus were inquiring into their purpose. Jesus' teaching is not narrowly limited to the Twelve. He came to reveal the truth to all who were open to receive it.

11–12 These verses are among the most difficult in the entire gospel. It is important to look carefully at the terminology. The word translated "secret" (v.11) is mysterion (GK 3696, occuring only here and in Mt 3:11; Lk 8:10 in the Gospels). Paul uses it frequently in his epistles (see also Rev 1:20; 10:7; 17:5, 7). It does not mean something only for the initiated few; rather, it emphasizes God's disclosure to humans of what was previously unknown. It is proclaimed to all, but only those who have faith really understand. Here in Mark the mystery is the disclosure that the kingdom of God has drawn near in the person of Jesus Christ.

This secret has been given to the disciples because they have responded in faith, but to those hardened by unbelief (cf. ch. 3), the entire significance of Jesus' person and mission lies "in parables" (i.e., "riddles").

12 Mark follows up this saying of Jesus with a quotation from Isa 6:9–10 (using the LXX, the Greek translation of the OT), introduced with "so that." He omits the strong statements of the first part of v.10 and changes the LXX's "and I heal them" to "and be forgiven." In doing this, Mark follows the Targum (an Aramaic paraphrase of the OT)—an indication of the authenticity of that statement.

Taken at face value, the statement seems to be saying that the purpose of parables is that unbelievers may not receive the truth and be converted. That this statement was thought to be difficult theologically may be seen in Matthew's change of hina ("in order that"; GK 2671) to hoti ("with the result that"; GK 4022) and in Luke's dropping of the mēpote ("otherwise") clause.

Several recent attempts have been made to weaken the telic force of hina. (1) It is held that hina is used in the text to introduce a result clause (like Matthew's oti). (2) Mark has mistranslated the original Aramaic word de; it means "who," not "in order that." Thus the text should read, "The secret of the kingdom of God has been given to you. But to those on the outside who are ever seeing but never perceiving . . . everything is said in parables" (emphasis mine). (3) The purpose idea is not authentic with Jesus but represents Mark's theology. (4) Hina is an introductory formula to the free translation of Isa. 6:9–10 and is almost equivalent to "in order that it might be fulfilled."

All of these attempts have their defects. Although (1) and (2) alleviate the problem of hina, they do not address that of "otherwise" which also suggests purpose. Solution (3) drives a wedge between Jesus and Mark, while (4), clearly the best choice of the four, founders on the fact that Mark elsewhere does not use hina with this meaning.

Perhaps the best way to understand v. 12 is that it simply teaches that one reason Jesus taught in parables was to conceal the truth to persistent unbelievers. Jesus' parables were not always clear. The disciples themselves had difficulty understanding them (cf. 7:17). So Jesus taught in parables (at least on some occasions) so that his enemies might not be able to comprehend the full significance of his words and bring false accusations or charges against him. He knew that in some cases understanding would result in more sin and not in accepting the truth. Then, too, God does on occasion harden some people in order to carry out his sovereign purposes (cf. Ro 11:25–32). Indirectly, Jesus is challenging us to penetrate beneath the surface of the story and to grasp its real meaning.

3. Interpretation of the parable of the sower (4:13–20)

Many modern scholars reject this passage as authentic because it allegorizes the parable, and they assume that Jesus never allegorized. But there is no evidence that Jesus never used allegory, nor is there anything in the interpretation of the parable that is contrary to the teachings of Jesus.

13 There is a slight rebuke in Jesus' statement. He implies that the meaning of the parable of the sower is clear and understandable. If the disciples could not understand this clear parable, how would they understand more obscure ones?

14 The "farmer" is Christ himself; and the "word" is the word of the kingdom (cf. Mt 13:19), i.e., the coming of the reign of God in the person and work of Jesus. Whereas in the parable itself the emphasis is on the sowing of the word, in the interpretation it is on the kind of reception Jesus' word receives. Note that Jesus had already received negative responses to his proclamation (chs. 2–3).

15–20 The seeds sown on the hard-beaten path indicate those who have a shallow reception of the word. Satan snatches it from them before it has had an opportunity to take root.

The seeds sown on rocky places picture another hindrance to proper reception of the word: persecution and trials. This word of Jesus must have been particularly relevant to the Roman church and probably sounded a warning to any who, because of persecution and trials, may have been thinking of defecting from the faith; such people have no root in themselves.

The third group of hearers seem to make good progress, but the word is choked out by daily worries that distract them, by wealth that gives a false sense of security, and by anything else that might prevent the sown word from being productive.

Some seed does fall on good soil and is productive. Such people are open and receptive to the word of the kingdom. The message gets through to them and issues forth in a productive life. The parable therefore emphasizes our responsibility to listen to and obey Christ's message to us.

4. Parables of the lamp and the measure (4:21–25)

21–23 In the parable of the lamp (the Greek has "the lamp"), the lamp represents Jesus who has come. As the purpose of the lamp is to be put on a lampstand and not under a bowl or a bed, so the present hiddenness of Jesus will not always be, and God intends that one day Jesus will be manifested in all his glory (at the Parousia). But now he is hidden. It is therefore of utmost importance for us to be careful hearers, i.e., to have spiritual perception.

24–25 The parable of the measure begins with an exhortation to spiritual perception. The more one listens to the word of Jesus with spiritual perception and appropriates it, the more the truth about Jesus will be revealed. Furthermore, the more one appropriates the truth now, the more one will receive in the future. On the other hand, whoever does not lay hold of the word now, even the little spiritual perception that person has will be taken away.

5. Parable of the secretly growing seed (4:26–29)

26–29 This parable emphasizes the mysterious power of the seed to produce a crop. All the farmer can do is plant the seed on suitable ground; he cannot make the seed grow, nor does he understand how it grows. But it does grow and produces grain. In the same way, the hidden and somewhat ambiguous kingdom of God will some day burst out in its full glory. The harvest spoken of is the eschatological judgment (cf. Joel 3:13).

6. Parable of the mustard seed (4:30–32)

30–32 This is the third and last of the parables about the seed sown. The mustard seed was proverbial for its smallness but when grown, it becomes a huge treelike shrub.

The main point of the parable is that the kingdom of God has insignificant and weak beginnings, but a day will come when it will be great and powerful. We should not judge the significance of the kingdom by the size of its beginning.

7. Summary statement on parables (4:33–34)

33–34 Mark ends this section with a statement about Jesus' use of parables (see introduction to 4:1–34). He wanted to help the crowd understand by means of a veiled confrontation with the truth, stimulating their thinking and awakening their spiritual perception. The crowd was not ready for a direct revelation of the truth. In contrast, when Jesus was alone with his disciples, he spoke more directly with them; but even they needed his explanation to understand.

E. Triumph Over Hostile Powers (4:35–5:43)

1. Calming the storm (4:35–41)

The calming of the storm on the Lake of Galilee is a classic example of a nature miracle. Miracles of this kind seem to present the greatest problem to people today. The NT, however, makes clear that Jesus Christ is not only Lord over his church but also Lord of all creation (Col 1:16–17). It is completely inadequate to explain this miracle of the sovereign Lord by coincidence or to relegate it to myth or imagination. If Jesus was, as he claimed to be, the strong Son of God, a miracle of this kind is not inconsistent with that claim.

35–36 Mark includes many details in the story: the time of day, the reference to Jesus "just as he was" (v.36), the "other boats," the position of Jesus in the boat, the cushion, the sharp rebuke made by the disciples, and their terror and bewilderment. These suggest the report of an eyewitness.

Evening had come, so Jesus decided to go over to the other side of the lake in the boat he had been teaching from (v.1), perhaps wanting to escape the crowd and renew his strength. He did not want to delay his departure by first going on shore.

37 The geographic location of the Sea of Galilee makes it particularly susceptible to sudden, violent storms. It is situated in a basin surrounded by mountains. Though at night and in the early morning the sea is usually calm, when storms come at those times, they are all the more treacherous. The storm mentioned here drove the waves into the boat so that it was being swamped.

38 Jesus, tired from a long day's teaching, was in the stern of the boat, asleep on a cushion. This cushion was apparently the only one on board, and Jesus used it as a pillow for his head. This is the only place in the Gospels where Jesus is said to have slept; but he did, of course, get tired and needed sleep like any other man. He must have been very tired to have slept through such a violent storm.

The disciples' rebuke of Jesus indicates that they did not know who he really was.

Such a rebuke of the Son of God was entirely inappropriate.

39–40 Jesus rebuked the wind and spoke to the waves, and a great calm came. The sovereign Lord spoke and his creation immediately responded. Jesus then rebuked his disciples for their lack of faith. He had expected them by this time to have demonstrated more mature faith in God's saving power, the power that they had seen present and active in the person of Jesus (see 7:18; 8:17–18, 21, 32–33; 9:19 for other rebukes of the disciples).

41 A feeling of awe came over the disciples as a result of Jesus' mighty act. Something about him was revealed to them on this occasion that they had not experience before. Their rhetorical question implied the answer, "He is the strong Son of God." It is not difficult to imagine what effect this story had on the members of the persecuted Roman church Mark wrote his gospel for. It assured them that the strong Son of God would go with them into the storm of opposition and trial.

2. Healing the demon-possessed man (5:1–20)

1 Jesus now demonstrates his power over the forces of evil by casting out demons from a possessed man. Like the previous story, it reveals that Jesus is truly divine. "Across the lake" means on the eastern side, an area where the population was largely Gentile (cf. the presence of a large herd of pigs, animals considered unclean by Jews). In the area where this story probably took place, there was a cliff along with some old tombs.

2 Jesus was immediately confronted by the possessed man, who had seen Jesus from a distance and came running to him (v.6). Since it was already evening (cf. 4:35) when they started across the lake, it was probably dark by now.

3–5 The possessed man lived in the tombs. Often in Palestine people were buried in natural caves or in tombs cut out of the limestone rock. It was a natural place for a demon-possessed man to dwell because of the popular belief that tombs were a favorite haunt of demons. Efforts had been made to control this wretched man, but without success.

6 The man fell on his knees in front of Jesus (an act of homage, not worship). The demon showed respect because he recognized that he was confronted with one greatly superior to him.

7–8 The demon's address to Jesus admitted that he was in the presence of one who threatened his very existence. He used Jesus' personal name and his title "Son of the Most High God." His intent was to gain control over Jesus (see comment on 1:24). Fearing that he would be exorcised, he pleaded exemption from torment. This may be a reference to eschatological punishment. Verse 8 seems to be an explanatory statement by Mark to make clear why the demon was acting so excitedly. Jesus had ordered him to come out of the man.

9 When Jesus asked the demoniac's name, he replied, "Legion." The significance of this name is not clear. Perhaps he had had an unfortunate experience with a Roman legion and this had caused his madness. Or perhaps the many demons in him combined to form one aggregate force, thus the name "Legion." The demons so fully possessed the man that he seemed to be unable to act apart from them.

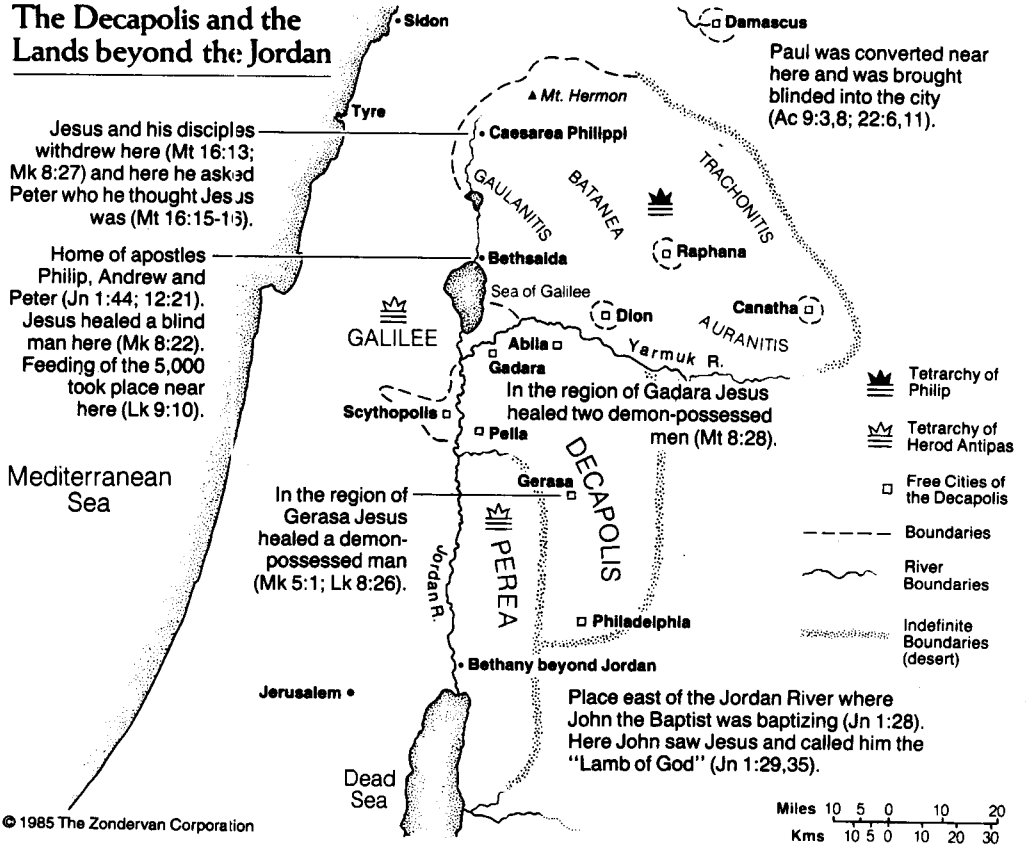
10 The demons, speaking through the demoniac, requested not to be sent "out of the area" (see comment on Lk 8:31).

11–13 What caused the stampede of the pigs was the entrance of the demons into them. They were bent on destruction. Not having been able to destroy the man, they destroyed the pigs. Demons are emissaries of Satan, the Destroyer. Why the sovereign Lord allowed this destruction is uncertain, but perhaps he wanted to give tangible evidence to the man and to the people that the demons had actually left him.

14–15 The result of the stampede and destruction of the pigs was the flight of the herdsmen to tell everyone in the area what had happened (v.14). This brought the people to the scene of the miracle. When they arrived, they could scarcely believe their eyes! The violent, demon-possessed man was now sitting quietly, dressed and in his right mind.

Only the Son of God can deliver us from the tyranny of the devil.

Instead of rejoicing, the people were terrified to be in the presence of one with power to perform such a miracle.



16–17 The people decided it was time for Jesus to leave their region. In fact, out of fear, ignorance, and selfishness, they pleaded with him to leave. If the mighty force at work in Jesus could destroy an entire herd of pigs, might not this power strike again with even more serious consequences? Jesus complied with their request, for he does not stay where he is not wanted.

18–19 Jesus decided to return to the west side of the lake. The man who had been possessed wanted to go with him (v.18)—a perfectly natural reaction. He was eager for Jesus' company, for no one had ever shown him such love and compassion. But our Lord did not allow it. Instead he gave him the much more difficult task of returning home to his family to bear testimony to what Jesus in his mercy had done for him (v.19). This contrasts with Jesus' command to the leper in 1:44. Since the demoniac was in Gentile territory, there would be little danger that popular messianic ideas about him might be circulated. Jesus realized that this man could be trusted to convey to others the real truth about him.

20 The man obeyed without argument and began to bear testimony of what "Jesus had done for him." The Decapolis was a league of ten originally free Greek cities located (except Scythopolis) east of the Sea of Galilee and the Jordan River. These cities heard the testimony of the former demoniac and responded with amazement.

3. Jairus's daughter and the woman with a hemorrhage (5:21–43)

Mark probably brought together these two stories with the story of the healing of the demoniac because they all have to do with ritual uncleanness. According to Jewish law contact with graves, blood, or death made one ceremonially unclean.

© 1985 The Zondervan Corporation

The account of the healing of the woman with a hemorrhage occurs within the story of the healing of Jairus's daughter. Once again, Mark sandwiches these two narratives to allow for the passage of time for Jairus's daughter to die or to heighten the suspense (see comment on 3:20–35). Both incidents read like eyewitness accounts.

21–24 On the west side of the lake again, Jesus was probably busy teaching when he was interrupted by the plea of someone who belonged to the Jewish group of "synagogue rulers" (GK 801). These were laymen whose responsibilities were administrative, not priestly, and included such things as looking after the building and supervising the worship. Jairus's need was so urgent that he jettisoned all dignity and pride, fell at Jesus' feet, and begged for help. He had apparently heard about Jesus and believed that he could heal his child. Jesus gives no oral reply; rather, he set out with Jairus to go to the child, followed by a large crowd of curiosity seekers.

25–26 At this point Mark inserts the story of the healing of the woman with a hemorrhage. The precise nature of the woman's ailment is not stated. Probably some sort of uterine disease caused the bleeding that had persisted for twelve years. Mark includes vivid details: she had suffered much, had been treated by many doctors, and had spent all she had. But her condition had gotten worse.

27–29 The woman's hearing about Jesus' healings and her belief that he could help her led her to come to him. She possibly also shared the superstition, common in her day, that the power of a person was transmitted to his clothing (see comment on Lk 8:42–46). So she went into the crowd and, because of her ceremonial uncleanness, approached Jesus surreptitiously from the rear. The moment she touched him, her faith was rewarded. The bleeding stopped, and she felt a soundness in her body that assured her that she had been healed.

30–32 Jesus too was aware that something had happened to him. Healing energy had gone out of him for someone's benefit, and he insisted on knowing who it was. To his disciples his question seemed stupid in view of the crush of the crowd all about him. The harsh reply of the disciples may have been caused by their concern to get Jesus to Jairus's daughter where a real emergency existed. But Jesus' spiritual sensitivity told him that someone had touched his clothes; he wanted to find her, not to rebuke her but to make personal contact with her. She needed to know that it was her faith, not her superstitious belief, that had caused God to heal her.

33–34 The woman, though "trembling with fear," came forward, prostrated herself before Jesus, and told him everything. This must have taken great courage, especially since she was regarded as ceremonially unclean (Lev 15:19–30). Jesus made clear to her that it was her faith that had healed her (the word "healed" [GK 5392] has both physical healing and theological salvation in mind; cf. 2:1–12).

- The phrase "Go in peace" is a traditional Jewish formula of leave-taking (Heb. shalom; GK 8934; cf. Jdg 18:6; 1Sa 1:17). The woman was complete, being now in a right relationship with God (cf. Ro 5:1).

35–37 While Jesus was still speaking to the woman, "some men" brought Jairus the news not to bother Jesus anymore since his daughter was dead. But Jesus ignored the messengers and encouraged Jairus to keep on believing. This word of assurance must have been just what he needed. He in no way tried to dissuade Jesus from resuming his journey to the child's bedside. At this point Jesus decided to separate himself from the crowd following him (v.37). A momentous miracle was about to take place, and he wanted to have only a chosen few witness it.

38 When Jesus arrived at Jairus's house, a great commotion was taking place. Professional mourners had been secured and were already at work. Since Jairus occupied a prominent position in the Jewish community, the number of professional mourners was large. So along with members of his family, they were making a great uproar.

39–40 On entering the house, Jesus asked why they were making such a commotion since the child was not dead but only asleep. On the surface this statement is enigmatic. It could mean that she had slipped into a comatose state, from which he would awaken her. Or it could be Jesus' way of indicating that he proposed to bring her back from the dead. Since her death was not final, he spoke of it as sleep.

The mourners misunderstood Jesus' reference to sleeping to mean that she was not really dead. So they laughed at him. Jesus did not want any noisy crowd present when he performed this stupendous miracle; so he put the mourners out. Their lack of sensitivity disqualified them from being present at such a beautiful event. Only Jesus' three most intimate disciples and the mother and father were allowed to enter the room where the dead child lay.

41 Jesus stood by the side of the child, took her hand, and spoke the Aramaic words "Talitha koum" (translated by Mark for his Gentile readers). Aramaic was the language of Palestine in the first century A.D. and was probably the language Jesus and his disciples normally spoke. However, since they came from Galilee, an area surrounded by Gentile Decapolis and by Syrian Phoenicia, it seems likely that they also knew Greek and on occasion spoke Greek.

42–43 The twelve-year-old girl responded immediately to Jesus' words. She not only stood up, she began to walk around. The five witnesses to the miracle were completely amazed. Death is an enemy (cf. 1Co 15:25–26), but it must give way to the power of the kingdom present in Jesus, the Messiah.

Jesus gave two orders to the witnesses. First, they were not to reveal the facts about the miracle. Jesus revealed his messianic dignity to those who could be entrusted with it, but it was veiled to those (like the raucous mourners) who could not. Jesus' second order was that they should give the girl something to eat—beautiful evidence of his concern for ordinary human needs.

F. Rejection at Nazareth (6:1–6:6a)

1 Jesus now traveled to his hometown of Nazareth. Even though he was born in Bethlehem, his family lived in Nazareth and he had been brought up there (Mt 2:1, 23; Lk 2:1–7, 39–40). Jesus came here as a rabbi accompanied by his disciples.

2 On the Sabbath, Jesus went into the synagogue and began to teach (see comment on 1:21). This probably was the first time his fellow townsmen had actually heard Jesus teach, and many of them were amazed. But with some of them, there was an undercurrent of doubt as they wondered about the source of his teaching and his miracles. They were either from God or from Satan. Which?

3 The hostility of Jesus' townspeople toward him came out more clearly in the rhetorical questions in this verse. In essence they were asking: Isn't he just a common ordinary fellow who makes his living with his hands like the rest of us? How is it that he is parading as a rabbi and miracle-worker? The question "Isn't this Mary's son?" seems also to be derogatory since it was not customary among Jews to describe a man as the son of his mother; behind this question may be the rumor, circulated during Jesus' lifetime, that he was illegitimate (cf. Jn 4:41; 9:29).

The brothers and sisters of Jesus mentioned here were probably children born to Mary and Joseph. James was likely the oldest and was certainly the best known of Jesus' brothers. He was closely identified with the church in Jerusalem (Ac 12:17; 15:13; 1Co 15:7; Gal 1:19) and was probably the author of the epistle of James (Jas 1:1). Jude was probably the author of the book of Jude. We know nothing of Joseph and Simon.

The townspeople of Nazareth were offended at Jesus, and they refused to believe in him or his word.

4 Jesus responded to the doubts raised about the legitimacy of his teaching and his miracles by a proverb that has parallels in both Jewish and Greek literature. The people of Nazareth were incapable of appreciating who Jesus was because, like Jesus' own family, they identified him so closely with themselves.

5–6a Verse 5 is a bold statement in that it refers to something Jesus could not do. He did, of course, have the power to do miracles in Nazareth. His inability was related to the moral situation. In the climate of unbelief he chose not to exercise his miraculous power. One of the great emphases of Mark's gospel is that Jesus performs his miracles in response to faith.

Jesus expressed amazement at their lack of faith. Apparently he did not expect such a response from his own townspeople.

G. Sending Out the Twelve (6:6b–13)

6b Verse 6b probably belongs with vv. 7–13. As a result of the village ministry, Jesus decided to send out the Twelve, presumably to increase his own ministry through them.

7 Jesus had already been preparing his disciples for this mission. He had called them with his promise, "I will make you fishers of men" (1:17). He had withdrawn on several occasions to give them special attention (3:7, 13; 4:10), and they had witnessed his mighty acts and listened to his wise words. Now it was time for them to be sent out (cf. 3:14–15). The word used here for "sending" (GK 690) carries with it the idea of official representation; their message and deeds were to be an extension of his own. He sent them out "two by two," apparently a Jewish custom (cf. 11:1; 14:13; Ac 13:2), so that the truthfulness of their testimony about Jesus might be established "on the testimony of two or three witnesses" (Dt 17:6). The Twelve were given power over evil spirits. Mark especially highlights Jesus' power to exorcise demons.

8–9 Inherent in the commission of the Twelve was absolute trust in God to supply all their needs, including their physical needs. They were to take only what they had on their backs. The only exception was a staff. They were to take no food or money. Clothing was to be minimal. Sandals were allowed and only one tunic. Jesus probably made this last prohibition because he wanted the disciples to trust God for the provision of hospitality for each night (an extra tunic was used as a night covering in the open air).

Jesus undoubtedly expected them to preach the same message as he did (see 1:15). He also calls us to self-dedication to him and his message.

10–11 Jesus wanted to protect the good reputation of the disciples. Whenever they accepted the hospitality of a home, they were to stay there until they left that town, even if more comfortable or attractive lodgings were offered them.

Jesus also knew that the mission of the Twelve would not always be accepted. So he instructed them how to act in such circumstances. By shaking dust off their feet (a Jewish custom as one entered Jewish territory), they would declare the place to be heathen and would make it clear that those who rejected the message must now answer for themselves. The disciples' message, like that of Jesus, brings judgment as well as salvation. This always happens when the Gospel is preached.

12–13 Mark now describes the actual mission of the Twelve. It was clearly patterned after Jesus' own ministry: (1) preaching repentance, (2) driving out demons, and (3) healing the sick. By these activities they were demonstrating that the kingdom of God had come with power. At this point, their mission is a mere extension of the ministry of Jesus. Their independent mission did not occur until after Jesus' resurrection.

IV. Withdrawal From Galilee (6:14–8:30)

This fourth section of Mark's gospel finds Jesus withdrawing from the territory of Galilee for the primary purpose of further instructing his disciples. Though one incident of public teaching occurs in the section 7:1–23, the focus of his teaching was now on the Twelve.

A. Popular Views of Jesus' Identity (6:14–16)

14–15 The Herod mentioned here is Antipas (son of Herod the Great and Malthace), tetrarch of Galilee and Perea. Mark may be using the title of "King" here ironically or as a reflection of local custom. The "this" of v.14 likely refers to the mighty works of Jesus, multiplied by the works of the disciples, especially since the entire discussion focuses on the question of Jesus' identity.

What follows are popular views of who Jesus was. That some thought Jesus to be John the Baptist raised from the dead shows that they knew nothing of Jesus prior to his ministry in Galilee. John the Baptist did not perform miracles while he was alive, but apparently his resurrection status was thought to give him that power.

Another popular view identified Jesus with Elijah. John the Baptist had spoken of Jesus as "the Coming One"; to anyone who knew the OT it could be no one else but Elijah (cf. Mal 3:1; 4:5).

A third view was that "he is a prophet, like one of the prophets of long ago." This seems to be a lower estimate of Jesus than the previously mentioned one.

16 Herod's view—that Jesus was John the Baptist raised from the dead—arose not so much from what he had heard about Jesus as from the proddings of a guilty conscience, since Herod had been directly responsible for John's death. The mention of the death of John causes Mark to interrupt the account of the mission of the Twelve in order to tell the story of John's murder.

B. Death of John the Baptist (6:17–29)

17–18 Mark's gospel has two "passion narratives": the passion of John and the passion of the Messiah. Mark devotes fourteen verses to the death of John but only five to his ministry (1:4–8).

John the Baptist had been arrested by Herod, who put him in prison because he had denounced Herod's adulterous union with Herodias, his brother Philip's wife and his own niece. The Mosaic Law prohibited marriage to one's brother's wife while the brother was still alive (cf. Lev 18:16).

Josephus (a Jewish historian of the first century) emphasizes the political motives behind the action of Herod against John. In order to marry Herodias, Herod had to rid himself of the daughter of King Aretas IV, whose kingdom lay just to the east of Perea. The situation there was already sensitive, and John's preaching had the potential to cause real trouble. Mark, on the other hand, emphasizes the moral considerations; John did not hesitate to incur the wrath of Herod in his service to God.

19–20 Herodias was infuriated by John and wanted to kill him. She was thwarted in her design because Herod protected John (motivated by fear and a recognition of John's righteous and holy character).

21–23 Herodias finally got the opportunity she was waiting for. At a banquet for Herod's birthday, attended by military and political leaders, Herodias's daughter went before the guests to dance. Likely Herodias sent her into the banquet hall to dance as part of her scheme to get rid of John the Baptist.

The dance was probably a lewd one. Herod and his dinner guests were pleased with her performance—so much so that Herod offered her virtually anything she wanted as a reward.

24–25 The girl left the banquet hall to seek the advice of her mother. Herodias's quick reply betrayed the premeditated nature of her homicidal plan. Mark does not mention any surprise on the daughter's part when her mother made the request. In fact, when she went to convey the request for the head of John the Baptist, the daughter added two things: she wanted John's head "right now" and she wanted it "on a platter."

26–28 Herod was in a quandary, but "because of his oaths and his dinner guests," he could hardly refuse the girl. Reluctantly he ordered an executioner to be sent to the prison to decapitate John. John's head was brought to Herod, who presented it to Salome, who gave it to her mother.

29 Mark ends the shocking story with John's disciples coming for the body to give it proper burial. Herod no doubt thought that he was now finished with the righteous prophet. But this was not to be. The ministry of Jesus stirred up Herod's memories of John, and his fears returned.

C. Feeding the Five Thousand (6:30–44)

The story of the feeding of the five thousand with a simple meal of bread and fish stands in marked contrast to the elaborate banquet of Herod (see also later comments on this miracle in 6:52; 8:17–21).

30 Mark resumes the account of the mission of the Twelve. The disciples, here called "apostles" (GK 693; related to GK 690) returned to Jesus with a report on their apostolic work of preaching, casting out demons, and healing.

31–32 Their activities had created much interest. So many people were coming and going that the disciples had no time even to eat. Since the disciples were doubtless tired from their missionary activities and from the demands of the crowds, Jesus decided to seek rest for them in a quiet and solitary place.

Jesus may have had another reason for going to a deserted area in addition to seeking rest. It was in the desert that God had given rest to his ancient people after their Exodus from Egypt. Prophets such as Isaiah (63:14) and Jeremiah (31:2) saw the Israelites in the desert as a type of a second rest promised to the new people of God in a second exodus.

Jesus and his disciples fulfill this promise. Jesus, not the pillar and the cloud, is God's presence, and the Bread (instead of the manna) is God's provision of sustenance.

33–34 The best way for Jesus and his disciples to get away from the crowds was by boat, going to the northeast side of the lake. But the crowd saw it and followed by land. Somehow they managed to walk around the lake and arrive at the landing place ahead of the boat (v.33).

Jesus had every right to be annoyed with the crowd. They had prevented him and his disciples from having a much needed rest. But instead of being irritated, he responded compassionately and in love (v.34), seeing them as "sheep without a shepherd" (cf. Nu 27:17; Eze 34:5). These two OT passages associate the shepherd theme with the desert. Jesus, like Moses, was leading his people into the desert and, like David (cf. Eze 34:23, 25), was providing rest for them.

35–36 Jesus' disciples became concerned for the crowd. It was late in the day; and in that distant place, there was little possibility of obtaining food. Out of concern for the crowd, the disciples suggested Jesus dismiss the crowd to get food in the nearby towns.

37 Jesus, however, ordered the disciples to supply food. He uses the emphatic personal pronoun: "You give them something to eat" (emphasis mine). The disciples were startled. They could only think of the impossible amount of money it would take to feed a crowd like this one. Not even eight months' wages would buy enough bread for all to eat.

38 Jesus was not thinking of bread bought in the neighboring villages. Before proceeding with his approach to the problem, he asked his disciples what the present status of the supply was. They found it to be meager: five small rolls and two fish—a mere pittance in view of the number of people to be fed.

39–40 At Jesus' direction the disciples arranged the crowd into groups of hundreds and fifties in order to facilitate the distribution of the food. This arrangement helps calculate the total number of men at five thousand (v.44; cf. Mt 14:21). The arrangement may also suggest the teacher-student relationship or even recall the Mosaic camp in the desert (Ex 18:21, 25; Dt 1:15). Thus the people are like the new people of God and Jesus like a second Moses who transforms them into a new Israel.

41 Jesus did what any pious Jew would have done before eating—he prayed. The usual form of the prayer was a thanksgiving or eucharist: "Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the Universe, who bringeth forth bread from the earth." As to how the miracle was performed, Mark does not give us so much as a hint. He simply says that Jesus broke the loaves, divided the fish, and gave them to the disciples to distribute among the people.

42–44 There can be no question but that Mark understood the actions of Jesus to have been miraculous. Not only were all the people fed and their hunger satisfied, but there was more left over at the end than there had been at the beginning—twelve small wicker baskets (see comment on Mt 14:21).

D. Walking on the Water (6:45–52)

45 Mark records no reaction of the crowd to the multiplication of the loaves and fish, but there must have been one. The hurried departure of the disciples to Bethsaida suggests that there was danger of a messianic uprising as a result of the miracle (cf. Jn 6:15). Jesus stayed to dismiss the crowd, no doubt to calm the people down.

46 Mark's mention of Jesus' praying is further evidence of the crisis nature of the situation. On three occasions in this gospel Jesus withdrew to pray, and each time some sort of crisis was involved (1:35; 6:46; 14:32–36). In each incident Jesus was tempted not to carry out God's mission for him—a mission that would ultimately bring suffering, rejection, and death. These crises increased in intensity, reaching their climax in the agony of Gethsemane.

47–48 The time of this incident was "evening," probably late at night. A boat in the middle of the Lake of Galilee could easily be seen at the time of the full moon.

Apparently the wind was blowing from the north or northeast and had blown the disciples off their course. They were facing a stiff headwind. Between 3–6 A.M. Jesus came to them "walking on the lake." The disciples in the boat thought that this ghostly figure was going to pass by them.

49–50 Although they did not recognize him at first, Jesus identified himself and calmed their fears with words of assurance: "Take courage! It is I. Don't be afraid."

51 When Jesus climbed into the boat, another miracle occurred as the wind ceased. The disciples were amazed as they realized unmistakenly some relationship between his getting into the boat and the calming of the wind.

E. Healings Near Gennesaret (6:53–56)

53–56 Jesus stayed with the disciples in the boat and crossed over with them to Gennesaret. Mark then summarizes the work of Jesus in Galilee before he withdrew to other regions (cf. 1:32–34 and 3:7–12). In this summary we see the widespread fame of Jesus as a healer. As a good Jew, he wore the fringes and tassels commanded by God (Nu 15:37–39; Dt 22:12). The faith of those who came to touch Jesus' clothes led to their healing (cf. 5:25–34).

F. Commands of God and Traditions of Men (7:1–13)

This incident is linked with the next section by the common theme of "cleanness." It is similar to the conflict stories found in 2:1–3:6 but functions here as an introduction to the extension of Jesus' ministry to the Gentiles (7:24–8:10).

1–2 Another delegation of fact-finding theologians came down from Jerusalem (cf. 3:22) to investigate the Galilean activities of Jesus. They discovered that Jesus' disciples did not wash their hands before eating. Their question was one of ceremonial purity versus ceremonial defilement, an important topic to devout Jews.

3–4 Mark felt it necessary to explain to his Gentile readers the Jewish custom of ceremonial handwashing, a custom based on the "tradition [GK 4142] of the elders," a great mass of oral tradition that had arisen about the law. Its purpose was to regulate a person's life completely, and it was passed on from one generation to the next one as binding regulations.

Mark gives an example of the custom. After being in the marketplace and coming into contact with Gentiles or even nonobservant Jews, the Pharisees would wash themselves to ensure their ritual cleanness.

5–7 To the question of why his disciples acted as they did, Jesus answered by quoting Isa 29:13, preceded by his own comment: "Isaiah was right when he prophesied about you hypocrites." A "hypocrite" (GK 5695) is someone whose worship is merely outward and not from the heart. Jesus did not mean that Isaiah had in mind the Pharisees and the teachers of the law when he originally wrote these words but that Isaiah's denunciation of the religious leaders of his day fitted those of Jesus' day. Their outward appearance of piety was a lie, because it was not accompanied by a life of total commitment to God. Jesus went on to equate neglect of true holiness with submission to rabbinic traditions made by humans.

8–9 Jesus then contrasted the "commands of God" with the "traditions of men." It is clear that the great body of Jewish tradition had failed to get to the heart of God's commands. It was supposed to fence in the law so that the people would not infringe on it. Actually, however, the tradition distorted and ossified the law (v.9) and even served as a means of getting around God's law.

10–13 Jesus cited a specific example of how the tradition could do this. He quoted (from LXX) Ex 20:12 and 21:16. In the latter the seriousness of failure to keep the fifth commandment is underscored—death is the penalty for anyone who curses his father or mother. But by means of the traditions of the Pharisees, the responsibility of children to their parents could be easily circumvented. A son need only declare that what he had intended to give his father and mother be considered "Corban," i.e., a gift devoted to God, and it could no longer be designated for his parents. By devoting the gift to God, a son did not necessarily promise it to the temple nor did he prevent its use for himself. What he did was to exclude legally his parents from benefiting from it (v.12). So the very purpose for which the fifth commandment had been given was being set aside ("nullified") by the tradition.

G. True Defilement (7:14–23)

The connection of these verses with what precedes is evident from Jesus' statement in v.15 that directly answers the question the Pharisees and teachers of the law had raised (v.5).

14–15 After speaking directly to the Pharisees and the teachers of the law, Jesus called the crowd around him because he wanted them to hear the crux of his teaching about what is clean. He prefaced his statement with a prophetic call to hear his words and then stated clearly what does and does not make a person unclean. What is external cannot defile a person. Food, for example, cannot do this—even if it is eaten with unwashed hands or declared unclean by kosher food laws. What really makes a person unclean comes from within, out of the heart and the will—what one thinks, says, desires, and does.

17–19 After leaving the crowd, Jesus entered a house and was teaching the disciples privately (cf. 9:28, 33; 10:10). Although the disciples had already spent considerable time with Jesus and belonged to the inner circle of his concern, they were slow to grasp the meaning of his teaching. Jesus expressed surprise that they still could not comprehend spiritual truth.

The reason nothing entering a person from the outside makes him or her "unclean" (GK 176) is because it enters into the stomach, not the heart (v.19). And the heart is the center of human personality that determines one's actions and inaction (cf. Pr 4:23; Isa 29:13).

In v.19b Mark explains for his readers the significance of Jesus' teaching about ceremonial purity. This statement relates to the situation in the Pauline mission churches about questions of clean and unclean foods (cf. Ac 10:9–16; 11:5–10; Ro 14:13ff.) and idol-meats (1Co 8–10). Mark is probably trying to publicize the charter of Gentile freedom by recording in the plainest terms possible Jesus' detachment from Jewish ceremonial laws and to spell out in clear tones the application of this principle to his readers.

20–23 The main force of this passage is the same as in v.15b: the source of uncleanness in anyone is the heart (Jer 17:9), for that is where the true issues of life lie. The list that follows has no parallel in any other known sayings of Jesus, but it is typically Jewish (cf. Ro 1:29–31; Gal 5:19–23). The list seems to move from overt sins to sinful attitudes or dispositions.

H. The Faith of the Syrophoenician Woman (7:24–30)

This incident seems to follow naturally the preceding incidents in which Jesus breaks with the Jewish oral law and particularly the law of ceremonial cleanness. Jews normally had no relationship with Gentiles because associations with them made them ritually unclean. Jesus now shows by example that those oral laws are invalid and deliberately associates himself with a Gentile woman. Mark also wants to emphasize the mission to the Gentiles. The Gospel of the kingdom is not limited to Israel, even though historically it came to her first (cf. v.27); the good news is for Mark's Gentile readers as it was for the Syrophoenician woman.

24 Jesus left where he was and traveled to Phoenicia (now Lebanon), in which the city of Tyre was located. Apparently Jesus did not go there for public ministry. He went into a house to get out of the public eye, perhaps to rest and to prepare himself spiritually for what he knew lay ahead of him. But once again (cf. 6:31–34) his hope for a time of quiet retirement was thwarted.

25–26 One of the persons who sought out Jesus was a Gentile woman. No doubt she had heard about his healing powers and came to him because her daughter was possessed by an evil spirit. By nationality the woman was a Syrophoenician (in those days Phoenicia belonged administratively to Syria).

27–28 Jesus probably conversed with this woman in Greek, not Aramaic. He replied by comparing the children of the household (the privileged position of Israel) and the little dogs that were kept as household pets (less privileged Gentiles). Israel was to have the first opportunity to hear the Gospel (cf. Ac 2–7); later would come the Gentiles' turn. So far as this woman was concerned, the "later" time had already come, because Jesus responded compassionately to her needs.

The reply of the woman was remarkable. She admitted her status but refused to believe she was thereby excluded from any benefits.

29–30 Jesus was pleased with the woman's reply. It revealed to him not only her wit but also her faith and humility, and he responded by declaring that her daughter had been healed (this is the only instance of healing at a distance found in Mark's gospel). The woman returned home and discovered the truth of what Jesus had said.

I. Healing a Deaf and Mute Man (7:31–37)

31 Mark includes this miracle in the Decapolis, a story unique to his gospel, because it connects with the previous story by giving an account of another healing on Gentile territory. The Decapolis (see comment on 5:20) was largely Gentile, but many Jews also lived there.

32 A man was brought to Jesus who was "deaf and could hardly talk" (perhaps a speech impediment). Mark must have had Isa 35:6 in mind, which is a poetical description of the messianic Age and where the same rare word for "mute" is used in the LXX. The people begged Jesus to lay his hands on the deaf mute, obviously wanting him to heal the man. "They begged" shows their concern for him, for the deaf mute could not make an intelligible request for himself. Jesus responded to their request.

33 In order to deal more personally with the mute, Jesus took him aside from the crowd. Here his actions seem to be done to help the man exercise faith—the fingers placed in his ears apparently indicate they were to be unblocked and the saliva on the tongue indicates it was going to be restored to normal use.

34–35 Jesus looked up to heaven in an attitude of prayer, thereby showing the man that God was the source of his power (cf. Jn 11:41; 17:1). Jesus' sigh should be seen as something that accompanied his inner communion with the Father.

Jesus' prayer consisted of only a single word—Ephphatha (an Aramaic word that Mark, as usual, explains). The effect of the command was instantaneous: the man's ears were opened, his tongue was loosed, and his speech impediment was gone.

36–37 Jesus again ordered the crowd not to divulge the miracle, but his command had no effect. The more he insisted on their not talking about it, the more they blazed the miracle abroad. His reason for enjoining silence here was probably the same as in 1:44 (see comment).

Also as a result of the healing the people were overwhelmed beyond measure. The statement "he has done everything well" reminds us of Ge 1:31: "God saw all that he made, and it was very good"; Mark goes on again to remind us of the messianic significance of this miracle by words that reflect Isa 35:5–6. Undoubtedly for Mark the significance of this miracle was the proclamation of the Gospel in the territory of the Gentiles, a sign of the messianic activity of Jesus.

J. Feeding the Four Thousand (8:1–10)

Interest in Mark as an author in his own right, not merely a scissors-and-paste editor of the tradition, has focused attention lately on the structural arrangement of his gospel. The section 8:1–30 reveals some important parallels with 6:31–7:37.

6:31–44	Feeding the Multitude	8:1–9
6:45–56	Crossing the Sea and Landing	8:10
7:1–23	Conflict With the Pharisees	8:11–13
7:24–30	Conversation About Bread	8:13–21
7:31–36	Healing	8:22–26
7:37	Confession of Faith	8:27–30

The motif that seems to be behind this arrangement of the tradition is spiritual understanding—or lack of it. Jesus sounds a call to spiritual understanding in 7:14–18, but the disciples fail to understand after each feeding miracle (6:52; 8:14–21). The miracles of healing—the opening of the ears of the deaf man (7:31–36) and the eyes of the blind man (8:22–26)—are symbolic of and prepare the way for the opening of the spiritual understanding of the disciples.

The striking similarity between this story and 6:34–44 raises the question whether there was one or two feedings of the multitude. The majority of scholars think there was only one and take 8:1–9 as a doublet of 6:34–44. Nonetheless there are strong reasons to support the view of two separate events. (1) The language in the two accounts has significant differences. (2) Jesus himself clearly refers to two feedings (8:18–21). (3) Verse 4 does not seem to be an insurmountable problem since it is presumptuous to assume that the disciples always expected Jesus to meet a crisis situation by performing a miracle.

(4) Mark clearly thought them to be two separate events.

1–3 Remaining in the Decapolis, Jesus taught a large crowd gathered there. After three days Jesus (not the disciples, as in 6:35–36) recognized the physical needs of the crowds. He was moved with compassion for them because they had not had anything to eat for three days, and he immediately dismissed the idea that the crowd should be sent away for food for fear they would collapse on the way.

4 The disciples' reply suggests they had completely forgotten the feeding of the five thousand. This is perhaps the strongest argument against the view that there were two separate feedings (would they have forgotten such an astounding event?). But the argument is not as strong as it appears. (1) A considerable period of time may have elapsed between the two events. (2) Even mature Christians (which the disciples were not), having experienced God's power and provision, have subsequently acted in unbelief. (3) The reluctance of Jesus to perform miracles must have so impressed itself on the disciples that they did not expect him to meet every crisis in that fashion. (4) The disciples responded by indicating the difficulty of finding enough food for such a huge crowd.

5–7 Only seven loaves (cf. 6:38) were available to feed the crowd of four thousand (v.9). The people were not ordered into groups, but simply were on the ground. Jesus gave thanks separately for the bread and the fish, and after each prayer the disciples distributed the food to the people.

8 As always Jesus' provision was sufficient. But it was not merely sufficient. Seven basketfuls of fragments were left over and collected by the disciples (cf. 6:43). The use of spyris (GK 5083) for "basket" here instead of kophinos (6:43; GK 3186) is striking and suggests two different occasions.

9–10 Jesus got into the boat with his disciples and headed to Dalmanutha (identity of this place is unknown).

K. Requesting a Sign From Heaven (8:11–13)

11 This paragraph seems quite separate from the one immediately preceding it. Mark probably placed it here to form a parallel in this section (8:1–30) with 7:1–23 in the previous section (6:31–7:37). Both incidents relate to conflict with the Pharisees.

The request for a sign by the Pharisees was not sincere; rather, it was to tempt Jesus. Jesus' temptation in the wilderness was not a once-for-all experience. The devil came back again and again to tempt him. Here the Pharisees were asking Jesus to provide indisputable outward compelling proof of divine authority, more proof than his miracles afforded. Jesus resolutely refused the request for such a sign because it arose out of unbelief.

12 Jesus responded to their request by sighing deeply, showing his grief and disappointment when faced with the unbelief of those who, because of their spiritual privileges, ought to have been more responsive to him. There is a note of impatience in his question of why the Jewish people were constantly asking for a sign. In truth, God would not give them any sign. Jesus' statement represents in Greek a shortened form of the Hebrew self-imprecation: "If I do such a thing, may I die."

For Mark and for Paul (cf. 1Co 1:18–2:6), the sign God gives is the ambiguity of the humiliated and crucified Lord (see also Mt 16:4; Lk 11:29–32). Faith can never find its grounds in spectacular signs. This teaching of Jesus was doubtless what the church in Rome needed to hear, especially if they had been too engrossed in an exalted-Lord Christology.

13 Having so emphatically made his point, Jesus left the Pharisees, got into the boat, and crossed over to the east side of the lake with his disciples (cf. v.14).

L. The Yeast of the Pharisees and Herod (8:14–21)

14 For some reason the disciples had forgotten to bring an adequate supply of bread with them for the trip across the lake. Their failure sets the stage for the teaching of our Lord. Some commentators see in the "one loaf" a symbolic reference to Jesus. The disciples have failed to see that the one loaf they had with them was none other than Jesus himself, and that was sufficient.

15 Jesus warned his disciples about the yeast of the Pharisees. Yeast is a symbol of evil; just as only a very small amount of it can leaven an entire loaf of bread, so evil has a permeating power. Here the yeast of the Pharisees clearly refers to their desire for a sign from God to validate the actions of Jesus (similarly, the yeast of Herod; see Lk 23:8). Jesus was appealing to his disciples to understand that the authority he possessed could not be proved by a sign. Only by faith could they recognize him as the bringer of God's salvation.

16 The meaning of v.16 turns on which reading is adopted. It seems best to translate it: "They discussed with one another why they had no bread." That is, the disciples were so concerned to find out who was to blame for not bringing more bread that they completely ignored Jesus' warning about the yeast of the Pharisees and of Herod. As elsewhere in Mark, the disciples lacked understanding.

17–21 Jesus rebuked his disciples for their lack of understanding. They were like those on the outside (cf. 4:11–12) who had eyes but did not see and ears but did not hear. They should not have been so concerned over the bread. They should have remembered how abundantly Jesus had provided for them on two occasions—so much so that on both occasions they had leftover bread to collect. He, the Provider, was with them in the boat. What else could they want or need?

M. Healing a Blind Man at Bethsaida (8:22–26)

22 This incident, recorded only in Mark, takes place at Bethsaida. "Some people" brought a blind man to Jesus for healing. The fact that the initiative seems to have come more from the people who brought him than from the man himself may account for the way Jesus dealt with him (cf. 7:32ff.).

23–24 Why did Jesus lead the blind man out of the village? Only on three occasions did Jesus withdraw from the people to heal: the raising of Jairus's daughter (5:35–43), where Jesus' motive is clearly to rid himself of the commotion caused by the professional mourners; the healing of the deaf mute (7:31–37), where Jesus wanted to establish a personal contact with the man to help his faith; and the present incident, where the motive seems to be the same as in the healing of the deaf mute.

Jesus performed a double action: he spit on the man's eyes and laid his hands on him. To Jesus' question "Do you see anything?" the answer of the blind man here in Mark is essentially "Yes, but not clearly" (v.24). Two things seem clear: (1) the man had probably not been born blind or else he would not have been able to identify trees as trees, and (2) the return of his sight was gradual. Jesus healed gradually in this case probably to prove that he had full liberty in how he healed and was not restricted to any fixed rule.

25–26 Jesus then ordered the man to go home directly without first going into the town of Bethsaida, perhaps because he did not want this man broadcasting his miraculous cure (cf. comment on 1:44).

The importance of this story for Mark is that it anticipates the opening of the eyes of understanding of the disciples. This is the second in a pair of incidents that only Mark records (the first one is 7:24–37) and that fulfill the OT messianic expectations of Isa 35:5–6. Mark uses both incidents to lead up to the full revelation of Jesus' messianic dignity to the disciples (8:27–30). Their eyes too were opened, not by human perception, but by the miracle of God's gracious revelation—which was as much a miracle as the opening of the blind man's eyes.

N. Recognizing Jesus as Messiah (8:27–30)

This incident is usually taken to mark the beginning of the second half of Mark's gospel. While it is true that 8:27–30 has a close connection with 8:31–9:1, its relationship to 8:22–26 is even closer. This may be seen by the remarkable parallelism in the two stories—a parallelism that may be set out like this:

8:22	Circumstances	8:27
8:23–24	Partial Sight—Partial Understanding	8:28
8:25	Sight—Understanding	8:29
8:26	Injunction to Silence	8:30

Where the parallelism breaks down is at the point of partial understanding (8:28), for this is a partial understanding on the part of the people, not the disciples. While Mark could have changed the story to force parallelism, that he did not do so supports the historicity of the account.

27 The first half of Mark's gospel mounts to a climax with the story of the disciples' recognition of Jesus' messiahship at Caesarea Philippi (at the foot of Mount Hermon). Jesus inquired of the disciples who people said he was, not simply to get information, but as preliminary to his second, more important question.

28 The answers that the disciples gave all reflect an inadequate view of Christ. John the Baptist, for example, had a preparatory role. He looked for another messenger far greater than himself (cf. 1:7–8; cf. also 6:14–15). "One of the prophets" reflects a lower view of Jesus, that he was merely one of many prophets who had come on the scene of Israel's history. It seems surprising that the disciples did not report that anyone called Jesus the Messiah, especially since the demons recognized who he was and said so publicly (1:24; 3:11; 5:7). But his messiahship was veiled from the crowd.

29–30 Jesus now directed the question at the disciples in an emphatic manner: "Who do you, my most intimate and trusted friends—in contrast to the other people who neither know me nor understand me—think I am?"

Peter, true to form, had a ready answer: "You are the Christ." He was the spokesman for the Twelve, and in his confession one of the themes of this gospel (cf. 1:1) is stated.

The Greek word Christos ("Christ"; GK 5986) translates the Hebrew mashiach ("Messiah"; 5431) and means the "Anointed One" of God. In the OT the word is used of anyone who was anointed with the holy oil, as, for example, the priests and kings of Israel (cf. Ex 29:7, 21; 1Sa 2:10, 10:1, 6; 16:13; 2Sa 1:14, 16). The word carries with it the idea of being chosen by God, consecrated to his service, and endued with his power to accomplish the task assigned. Toward the close of the OT period, the word "anointed one" assumed a special meaning, denoting the ideal king anointed and empowered by God to deliver his people and establish his righteous kingdom (Da 9:25–26). Jewish literature between the Testaments spoke of the coming rule as restoring David's kingdom to its former prosperity and greatness. The ideas that clustered around the title "Messiah" tended to be political and national in nature, which is why Jesus seldom used the term. Of its seven occurrences in Mark, only three of them are in sayings of Jesus (9:41; 12:35; 13:21); and in none of these does he use the title of himself (see also comment on Mt 1:1).

Because Jesus was reluctant to speak of himself as the Messiah does not mean that he did not believe himself to be the Messiah. In this passage (8:29) and in 14:60–62, he accepted it as used of him by others (cf. Jn 4:25–26). As Messiah, Jesus saw himself as the fulfillment of all those prophets, priests, and kings who were anointed in the OT; he was bringing into existence a new Israel.

Peter's confession revealed real insight into the nature of Christ's person and mission, but his concept of Jesus' messiahship was far from being perfect. He and the other disciples still had much to learn of Messiah's suffering, rejection, and death, as the immediately following incident reveals. He therefore told them to be quiet at this time about his role as Messiah. They still needed instruction about it before being given permission to proclaim it without restraint.

V. The Journey to Jerusalem (8:31–10:52)

A new section in Mark's gospel begins with 8:31. Its structure centers around three predictions Jesus makes of his passion (8:31; 9:31; 10:33–34). What had previously been veiled is now stated openly: the Son of Man must go up to Jerusalem, suffer and die, and on the third day be raised from the dead. This is the secret of Jesus' messiahship, and it is now revealed. Mark also stresses what this will mean for Jesus' followers. Throughout the section (cf. 8:34–38; 9:35; 10:29–30, 38–39) there are sayings about what true discipleship is, with the stress on suffering.

Another purpose of this middle section of Mark's gospel is to provide for Jesus' move from Galilee (where almost his entire ministry took place) to Jerusalem for the climactic events of his ministry. This section with its emphasis on the suffering of the Messiah and of those who follow him must have had special meaning for the persecuted Christians in Rome. Mark is reminding them that to follow Jesus is to follow the path of suffering and even death.

A. First Prediction of the Passion (8:31–33)

31 Having accepted Peter's ascription of his being "the Christ," Jesus now began to teach his disciples what messiahship really meant. Yet he did not refer to himself as Messiah but as the Son of Man, a theologically important title.

"Son of Man" occurs eighty-one times in the Gospels and, with the possible exceptions of Mk 2:10 and 28—where the title "Son of Man" seems to be part of Mark's editorial comments—only Jesus uses it about himself. Notice how in 8:38, Jesus parallels "of me" with "the Son of Man." Son of Man was the title Jesus preferred in referring to himself because, unlike "Messiah," it was not freighted with connotations that might prove harmful to his God-appointed mission (see comment on 1:43–44).

"Son of Man" occurs in the OT. In the Psalms it simply meant "human being" (cf. Pss 8:4; 80:17); and in Ezekiel, God addressed the prophet by this phrase. The most helpful text, however, is Da 7:13–14, which depicts the Son of Man as a heavenly figure who at the end time brings the kingdom to the oppressed on earth. This passage is especially reflected in the sayings of Jesus in Mark's gospel that speak of the coming of the Son of Man (8:38; 13:26; 14:62). The title has, however, been infused with additional meaning, especially in those passages that associate the Son of Man with suffering and death (8:31; 9:9; 12, 31; 10:33, 45; 14:21, 41). The combining of the motif of eschatological glory with that of suffering and death is what characterizes the Son-of-Man idea in the Synoptics.

The Son of Man "must" suffer. This necessity arises because of hostility from his enemies, because of the spiritual nature of Jesus' work (which did not allow him to use force), and because of God's revealed plan of redemption that required Jesus' death (see Isa 52:13–53:12).

Jesus predicted that the rejection of the Messiah would be by three groups: the elders (members of the Sanhedrin), the chief priests (members of the high priestly families), and the teachers of the law (professional scribes).

The death of the Son of Man would be followed by his vindication: after three days he would be raised from the dead. "After three days" occurs also in 9:31; 10:34. In Mt 16:21; 17:23; 20:19; Lk 9:22; 18:33, however, "on the third day" is used. The two expressions are identical in meaning. Contrary to English usage, in a Jewish context "after three days" can mean a period of less than seventy-two hours, as long as parts of three days are included.

Verse 31 is particularly important because it is the only explanation in Mark's gospel of "the messianic secret." Jesus did not want his messiahship to be disclosed because it involved suffering, rejection, and death. Popular expectations of messiahship would have hindered the accomplishment of his messianic mission.

32 The message got through to Peter, but he refused to accept it, for he followed the popular theological and political categories. A suffering Messiah? Unthinkable! The Messiah was a symbol of strength, not weakness. So Peter took Jesus aside and, amazingly, rebuked him (same word as used in 1:25; 3:12).

33 Jesus' words to Peter were not only severe, they were deliberately spoken in the presence of the other disciples, for they probably shared Peter's views and needed the same rebuke. Jesus recognized in Peter's attempt to dissuade him from going to the Cross the same temptation he had experienced from Satan at the outset of his ministry (cf. Mt 4:8–10). In both cases, Jesus rebuked the satanic option of using a different means to accomplish his mission.

B. Requirements of Discipleship (8:34–9:1)

The purpose of this section was to encourage and strengthen the Roman Christians, who were facing persecution and trials. Through sayings of Jesus, Mark is informing them that such experiences are normal in the life of discipleship.

34 Now Jesus addressed the crowd as well as his disciples. Two requirements of discipleship are (1) denial of self and (2) taking up one's cross and following Jesus. By denial of self, Jesus did not mean to deny oneself something, but to renounce self—to cease to make self the object of one's life and actions. God, not self, must be at the center of life. Cross bearing refers to the way of the cross. The picture is of a man, already condemned, required to carry his cross on the way to the place of execution, as Jesus was required to do (cf. Lk 23:26). Certainly the Christians in Rome were acquainted with this pattern. To bear the cross means suffering and possible death—a message especially relevant to the Roman Christians.

35 Sometimes Christians are faced with the alternatives of confessing Christ or denying him. Jesus warns that by denying him, one's physical life may be saved, but one's eternal life will be lost. Conversely, to lose one's physical life by remaining true to Christ assures one of salvation. Mark therefore sounded a warning to any who might be thinking of defecting under trial. "For me" stresses the absoluteness of Jesus' claim for allegiance, and "for the gospel" refers to the preaching of God's Good News for which people are to give their lives.

36–37 These two verses emphasize the incomparable worth of the "soul" (GK 6034) that which survives human death). Once a person has forfeited his or her share in eternal life (in this context, by a denial of Jesus), even the whole world cannot buy back eternal life.

38 Jesus climaxes his warning section by referring to those who are ashamed of him and his words. In the End, at the Judgment (cf. 2Th 1:7), the Son of Man will be ashamed of any who are ashamed of him.

9:1 This verse is probably an independent saying Mark has placed here, used in order to make a transition between the Transfiguration (9:2–8), a momentary manifestation of the glory and power of the kingdom, and the Parousia (8:38), the full manifestation of it. On this understanding the Transfiguration anticipates and guarantees the Parousia. To "taste death," refers to experiencing death for the sake of Jesus. Before that happens to some of them, they will (temporarily) see God's kingdom come in power.

C. The Transfiguration (9:2–8)

The purpose of the Transfiguration is directed toward the disciples (observe the expressions "before them" [vv. 2, 4], "enveloped them" [v.7], and a voice addressing them [v.7]). Mark places the Transfiguration here as a confirmation of the difficult teaching Jesus had given the disciples about his suffering and death (cf. 8:31–38). Peter, James, and John—and through them the rest of the Twelve—were commanded to heed that disclosure of Jesus.

2 "After six days" suggests that the Transfiguration is historical, connected with the previous event (see comment on Lk 9:28). The revelation was given to Peter, James, and John, the inner circle of the disciples (cf. 5:37–42; 14:33–42). The "high mountain" is most likely Mount Hermon (over 9,000 feet high), located near Caesarea Philippi, where the event Mark has just recorded took place. The word "transfigured" (GK 3565) describes Jesus' change into another form (see also Mt 17:2); the word is later used to denote the progressive change into the moral likeness of Christ (Ro 12:2; 2Co 3:18).

3 It is difficult to know exactly what happened at the Transfiguration. Jesus' clothes became "dazzling white." His appearnce was temporarily changed into that of a heavenly being (cf. Rev 1:13–14).

4 Why the appearance of Elijah and Moses? If what the disciples saw was a glimpse of Jesus' final state of glory, then Moses and Elijah's function is to announce the End. In Jewish expectation, Elijah clearly played that role (cf. Mal 4:5; Mk 9:11–12). But what of Moses? The possible reappearance of Moses just before the End developed later in Jewish thought. Or Moses and Elijah may have been at the scene as representatives of the Law and the Prophets—i.e., the OT, which was being fulfilled by Jesus.

5 True to form, Peter responded impulsively. His words show that he was greatly moved by the experience, yet did not understand it. He wanted to prolong it by erecting three shelters. But before Jesus could enter permanently into his glory and eternal rest he had to suffer and die. Peter again stumbled at the necessity of a suffering Messiah.

6 This endeavor to excuse Peter's inept remark shows Mark's sensitive concern for Peter. He was frightened and at a loss as to what to say. So he impulsively spoke, and what he said was not worth saying.

7–8 The OT background of v.7 lies in the passages where the cloud symbolized God's presence (Ex 16:10; 19:9, 24:15f.; 33:9; Lev 16:2; Nu 11:25); from it he spoke. At Jesus' baptism, the Voice had spoken to him (1:11); here the disciples were addressed. God assured them that in spite of Jesus' coming death, he loved his Son and accepted his mission.

"Listen" (GK 201) must be given its full sense of obedience. The only true listening known in the Bible is obedient listening (cf. Jas 1:22–24).

D. The Coming of Elijah (9:9–13)

9 On the way down the mountain, Jesus gave the three disciples orders to keep their experience of the Transfiguration secret till after the resurrection of the Son of Man. To proclaim his full glory before the Cross would have been too much in keeping with current popular ideas of messiahship. First must come suffering and death. Then after the Resurrection (in itself a manifestation of the glory of the Son of Man), divulging the Transfiguration experience would be appropriate. In Mark's gospel on numbers of occasions, especially after Jesus performed a miracle, he commanded those involved to keep the matter quiet (cf. 1:34, 43–44; 3:11–12; 5:43, 7:36; 8:30; see comment on 1:44).

10 The disciples obeyed Jesus' injunction. But they were puzzled by his statement about the resurrection of the Son of Man. As Jews they were familiar with the idea of a general resurrection of the dead (cf. Da 12:1–3; Jn 11:24). But this special resurrection of the Son of Man baffled them, as their discussion of it showed.

11 Apparently the disciples did not feel free to ask Jesus what he meant by his "rising from the dead" (v.10). Instead they asked him about Elijah. No doubt the fact that three of them had seen Elijah at the Transfiguration reminded them that he would come before the Messiah and restore all things (Mal 4:5–6). Restoring all things involved, among other things, leading the people to repentance. Now if Elijah comes first and does his preparatory work, how is it that when the Son of Man comes he finds people so unprepared for him that they completely reject him and, indeed, kill him? They were still perplexed by the idea of a suffering Messiah.

12 Jesus' answer is that the teachers of the law were right about Elijah, but that it did not preclude the suffering of the Son of Man. The Scriptures, Jesus said, predict it (probably a reference to Isa 52:13–53:12).

13 Jesus went on to say that Elijah already had come in the person of John the Baptist. Though John is not named here, the reference to him is obvious; he had been imprisoned and put to death. "Just as it is written about him" refers to what the OT said about Elijah in his relationship to Ahab and Jezebel (cf. 1Ki 19:1–2), two people who foreshadow Herod and Herodias. The eschatological ministry of Elijah in no way does away with the necessity for the Son of Man to suffer and die.

E. Healing a Boy With an Evil Spirit (9:14–29)

14 This last exorcism story in Mark's gospel occurred when Jesus, Peter, James, and John rejoined the other disciples after the experience of the Transfiguration. The disciples were engaged in a debate with the teachers of the law who were monitoring the teaching and preaching of Jesus.

15 Why were the people so amazed when they saw Jesus? It may have been because he arrived at an opportune time for meeting a critical need. Or perhaps it was simply because Jesus' very presence provoked wonder.

16–18 Jesus' inquiry as to what the other disciples and the crowd were arguing about brought a reply from a man who had brought his demon-possessed and epileptic son for healing. Doubtless the disciples had fully expected to be able to exorcise the demon. Had that not been a part of their commission (cf. 3:15), and had they not already been successful at it (cf. 6:13)?

19 It seems best to restrict the meaning of "unbelieving generation" to the disciples. Thus the cry of Jesus reveals his bitter disappointment with them; in the crucial moment they had failed because of their lack of faith during Jesus' absence.

In the face of such unbelief, Jesus longed for his heavenly Father. He was weary with his disciples' spiritual obtuseness. But in teaching them, Jesus never gave up. Mark seems particularly anxious to show him persisting in instructing them (9:30–31; 14:28; 16:7).

20–22 Here Mark describes the deadly conflict between Jesus and the demonic powers. The demon immediately threw the boy, who had been sick since childhood and had experienced numerous vicious attacks, into a convulsion and made him fall on the ground and foam at the mouth. Pathetically the father asked Jesus for help. When he left home to bring his son to Jesus' disciples, he apparently believed the boy would be healed. Now he was not sure and said, "If you can do anything."

23–24 Jesus immediately fixed on the father's "if" clause. The question was not whether Jesus had the power to heal the boy but whether the father had faith to believe Jesus could. The father responded with a declaration of faith, but he recognized that his faith was far from perfect. It was still mixed with unbelief. So in a beautiful display of honesty, he asked Jesus to help him overcome his unbelief.

25 The crowd "running to the scene" was probably additional to the one already present (v.14). Jesus, wanting to avoid as much as possible further publicity, spoke to the demon before additional people arrived on the scene, ordering him to come out and stay out for good.

26–27 The demon's exorcism was accompanied by cries and convulsions. The effect on the boy was so severe that he seemed to the crowd to be dead. Completely exhausted and looking like a corpse, the boy responded to the touch of Jesus. Any confrontation of Jesus with Satan results in the victory of life over death.

28–29 Mark answers why the nine disciples were powerless to act in behalf of this boy. In private they asked Jesus about their failure, especially since they had been given authority over evil spirits (6:7) and had successfully cast out many demons before this incident (6:13). Jesus' answer suggests that they had taken for granted the power given them or had come to believe that it was inherent in themselves. So they no longer depended prayerfully on God for it, and their failure showed their lack of prayer.

F. Second Prediction of the Passion (9:30–32)

30–31 Jesus was now focusing his teaching ministry on the Twelve, and he sought seclusion to do this, so that the disciples could concentrate on what Jesus was saying to them. Jesus continued to teach them about his coming passion because they by no means had understood his first prediction. This second prediction included the new element of betrayal.

By translating the Greek verb used here as "betrayed" (GK 4140), NIV opts for Judas as the implied subject of the action. The word literally means "to be delivered up" or "to be handed over." As early as Origen, it was interpreted to mean "delivered up by God," which is a better understanding of this verse. God took the initiative in providing salvation for the human race. His delivering up of Jesus was part of his plan for the world's redemption (cf. Ro 4:25; 8:32).

32 The disciples still did not understand. Mark does not soften this fact. Perhaps they were afraid of asking Jesus about what he had said because of their fear of facing a full disclosure of the suffering that lay ahead. Or they may have been fearful of being rebuked as Peter had been (8:33). Instead they chose to occupy themselves with arguing about who was the greatest among Jesus' disciples (cf. vv.33–34).

G. A Question About Greatness (9:33–37)

33–34 Jesus returned to Capernaum where his great Galilean ministry had begun (1:21) and where his headquarters in Galilee had been located. This time he did not linger there long, since his public ministry in the region had ended. He instructed his disciples privately, probably in the house belonging to Peter and Andrew (cf. 1:29).

The disciples must have been embarrassed and ashamed of their arguing among themselves about who was greatest because Jesus' question about it elicited only silence. And well might they have been ashamed. Instead of contemplating Jesus' passion and the suffering it would involve for both him and them, they had been occupied with self-centered arguments about greatness.

35 Jesus assumed the posture of a Jewish rabbi by sitting down (Mt 5:1; 13:1; Lk 5:3; Jn 8:2) and calling the Twelve to him. True greatness comes through service of others, as Jesus' own example demonstrated. This is a complete reversal of worldly values. How important this principle is can be seen by its repetition in the Gospels (cf. 10:31, 43–44; Mt 23:8–11; Lk 22:24–27; Jn 13:1–17). The kind of service Jesus was talking about here involved sacrifice.

36–37 To illustrate the principle in v.35, Jesus took a child, perhaps one from the family in whose house he was teaching, and first stood him by his side. Then Jesus took him into his arms (cf. 10:16). While all were watching, he indicated that true greatness entails caring about people—seemingly insignificant people like children—because Jesus himself was concerned about them. When one cares about such people, one is really "receiving" Jesus and God himself.

H. Driving Out Demons in Jesus' Name (9:38–42)

38 John's use of "we" shows that he was speaking for all the disciples. This is the only time Mark mentions John alone. The exorcist had been driving out demons in Jesus' name, i.e., with his authority. What irked the disciples was that, though he was not one of them, he was being successful at it! What made things even worse was that they doubtless remembered their own failure to exorcise the demon from the epileptic (cf. 9:14–18). The strange exorcist must have been a believer. Since he was not a part of the exclusive company of the Twelve, they took it on themselves to stop him.

39–40 Jesus did not have as restrictive a view of who could legitimately participate in his mission as his disciples did. The casting out of demons was done by God's power, and his power was not limited to the Twelve. So Jesus told his disciples not to stop the strange exorcist because such a man was not likely to speak badly of Jesus if he performed a miracle in his name (cf. Nu 11:26–29).

Casting out demons definitely demonstrated that the man was not against Jesus, and "whoever is not against us is for us." How does this relate to Mt 12:30, "he who is not with me is against me"? Jesus did not want to force people quickly into a decision about himself. He desired to give them plenty of time to decide, during which the principle in Mk 9:40 applies. But when the critical moment for decision arrives, then the principle laid down in Mt 12:30 takes over.

41 This verse seems to go best with v.37, before John's interruption. The giving of a cup of water is a very small act of hospitality. Yet if it is given to one who belongs to Christ, this act receives God's approval because it is the same as giving it to Christ.

42 This verse is probably better taken with what precedes it than with what follows. The warning points back to the disciples' attempt to prevent the unknown exorcist from doing his work in Jesus' name (v.38) or to prevent anyone from giving a cup of water in his name. "Little ones" refers to followers of Jesus, and "to sin" means to prevent them from acting in Jesus' name. The offense is so serious that it would have been better for one to be drowned than to commit it.

I. Demanding Requirements of Discipleship (9:43–50)

43–48 The main point of these verses is that it is so important to enter into eternal life that radical means must be taken to remove whatever can prevent it (i.e., sin). Here sin is connected with the physical self—the hand, foot, and eye. Jesus is not demanding the literal excision of our bodily members; he is rather demanding the cessation of the sinful activities of these members.

The word translated "hell" is gehenna (GK 1147), a Greek form of the Hebrew words ge hinnom ("Valley of Hinnom"). This was the valley along the south side of the city of Jerusalem, which was used in OT times for human sacrifices to the pagan god Molech (cf. Jer 7:31; 19:5–6; 32:35). King Josiah put a stop to this dreadful practice (2Ki 23:10), and the Valley of Hinnom came to be used as a place where human excrement and rubbish were disposed of and burned. The fire of gehenna never went out, and the worms never died. So it came to be used symbolically of the place of divine punishment.

49 This is admittedly one of the most difficult verses in Mark; it has over a dozen different interpretations. Of these, two commend themselves, both taking their clue from the insertion by a copyist of the words, "and every sacrifice shall be salted with salt" (an allusion to Lev 2:13).

One interpretation sees the sacrificial salt as a symbol of the covenant relationship that the children of Israel had with God. For every disciple of Jesus, the salt of the covenant is the Divine Fire, the Holy Spirit (cf. Mt 3:11). Every follower of Christ, in other words, will receive the Holy Spirit.

The other interpretation sees in the fire the trials and persecutions of the disciples of Jesus. In the previous verses the various members of the body must be sacrificed, if need be, to enter into the kingdom of God. Here in v.49 the total self is in mind. Every true disciple is to be a total sacrifice to God (cf. Ro 12:1); and as salt always accompanied the temple sacrifices, so fire—i.e., persecution, trials, and suffering—will accompany the true disciple's sacrifices (cf. 10:30; 1Pe 1:7; 4:12). If this is Mark's meaning, this saying must have had special meaning for the persecuted Roman church. It helped them understand that the purifying fires of persecution were not to be thought of as foreign to their vocation as Christians, because "everyone will be salted with fire."

50 In this verse salt must be understood in a domestic setting and not in a religious or ritual one as in v.49. Salt played an important role in the ancient world. It was necessary to life, and was also used as a preservative to keep food from spoiling. But salt could lose its saltiness. Jesus was warning his disciples not to lose that characteristic in them that brought life to the world and prevented its decay, that is, not to lose their spirit of devotion and self-sacrifice (cf. v.49) to Jesus Christ and the Gospel. Jesus' disciples could only be at peace with one another where that kind of devotion instead of self-interest prevailed (cf. v.34).

J. Teaching on Divorce (10:1–12)

1 Jesus was moving closer and closer to the ancient city of Jerusalem where the final acts of the redemptive drama were to take place. He set his face to the accomplishment of his divine mission. Since 9:30 Jesus had been directing his teaching ministry toward his disciples, but now again he was among the crowds and teaching them.

2 The question posed by the Pharisees was not a sincere one. They were testing him, trying to catch him in some statement about a subject on which they themselves had no agreement, and then to use it against him. Jesus was in Herod Antipas's territory, the ruler who had put John the Baptist to death because John had denounced Antipas's marriage to Herodias. Perhaps the Pharisees hoped that Jesus, by his statements on marriage and divorce, would get himself into trouble with Antipas and would suffer the same cruel fate as John.

On the question of the lawfulness of divorce, there was general unanimity among the Jews: divorce was allowed. The real difference of opinion centered in the grounds for divorce as cited in Dt. 24:1. The crucial words are "something indecent" (GK 6872). What did that include? The school of Shammai, the stricter of the schools, understood these words to mean something morally indecent, in particular, adultery. The school of Hillel interpreted the words much more freely. Just about anything in a wife that a husband did not find to his liking was suitable grounds for divorce—even if she burned his food! So where did Jesus stand in this? That was their question.

3–4 Jesus, as he often did when in controversy with the Jewish religious leaders, countered with a question of his own. Moses was their authority—what did he say? Jesus knew they would appeal to Moses. They admitted that a man could divorce his wife, but only after giving her a certificate of divorce, making the transaction permanent and legal.

5–8 Jesus did not question the law. But his answer reaches back to first principles. Moses' permission to divorce was an accommodation to human weakness. It was an attempt to bring some sort of order in a society that disregarded God's standards. But that is not what God intended in marriage. His original design in creating man and woman was that marriage should be an unbroken lifelong union (Ge 2:18–24). Marriage was not a temporary convenience that could be terminated at will.

9 A husband and wife are to work together in marriage as a team of oxen yoked together. Behind the indissolubility of their marriage is the authority of God himself. Anyone who instigates a divorce is tearing apart an intimate union that God has created.

10–12 Mark records no response of the Pharisees to Jesus' teaching about divorce. Instead he moves directly to Jesus' private teaching of the Twelve, who wanted a clarification of the teaching Jesus had just given. Jesus gave them a straightforward answer: divorce and remarriage by husband or wife is adultery. Jesus did what the rabbis refused to do: he recognized that a man could commit adultery against his wife. In rabbinic Judaism a woman by infidelity could commit adultery against her husband; and a man, by having sexual relations with another man's wife, could commit adultery against that other man. But a man could never commit adultery against his wife. Jesus, by putting the husband under the same moral obligation as the wife, raised the status and dignity of women.

Furthermore, Jesus went on to recognize the right of a woman to divorce her husband (v.12), a right not recognized in Judaism. Matthew, writing for Jews, omits v.12; but Mark, writing for Romans, includes it.

K. Blessing the Children (10:13–16)

13 This story has lost all details of time and place. Mark may have placed it at this point because a story about children is a fitting sequel to Jesus' teaching about marriage.

Mark does not identify those who were bringing the children to Jesus. In the Greek the subject of the verb is indefinite—"they." NIV translates it "people"—probably mothers, fathers, and even brothers and sisters. Among Jews, it was customary to bring children to great men to have them blessed (cf. Ge 48:13–20). The children referred to here were small children (Jesus took them into his arms; cf. Lk 18:15). Why the disciples wanted to prevent the children from coming to Jesus is not stated. Perhaps they wanted to protect his privacy and shield him from needless interruptions. Though their motives may have been commendable, they again showed lack of spiritual sensitivity.

14 Jesus was "indignant" (GK 24) when he realized that the disciples thought children were unimportant and bothersome. Mark never softens the human emotions of Jesus, nor is he less than candid about the failings of the disciples. Jesus wanted children to come to him and not to be hindered in their coming. After all, children in their receptivity and dependence exemplify the characteristics of those who possess God's kingdom.

15 This verse reiterates and expands the statement in v.14. The kingdom of God is to be received as a little child receives something, that is, without self-consciousness and in dependence on the giver. The kingdom is both a gift to be received and a realm to enter.

16 Jesus took the small children in his arms (cf. 9:36) and blessed them—a striking act showing his love for them. Apparently they were fairly small children. This was the overflowing of Jesus' divine love for children. It was this experience that the disciples in their insensitivity were preventing the children from having and Jesus from giving. No wonder Jesus was indignant!

L. Riches and the Kingdom of God (10:17–31)

This section is made up of three parts. The most satisfactory division is (1) vv.17–22, which describe Jesus' encounter with a rich man; (2) vv.23–27, a logion on the difficulty of a rich person entering the kingdom of God; and (3) vv.28–31, Peter's statement about leaving all to follow Jesus and Jesus' reply to it. These were probably separate sayings brought together by Mark because of their common theme.

This teaching on the impossibility of wealth as a means of gaining the kingdom and on Jesus' call to commitment links Jesus' teaching about the importance of childlikeness and the third prediction of the passion.

17 Jesus was continuing on his journey to Jerusalem. A man ran up to him, probably a member of some official council or court (see Lk 18:18). Matthew says he was "young" (19:20). He fell on his knees before Jesus and addressed him by the revered title of "good teacher," thus expressing his high regard for Jesus. His question indicates that he was thinking in terms of Jewish works of righteousness. He wanted to do something to merit eternal life, whereas Jesus taught that eternal life (the kingdom of God) is a gift to be received (cf. v.15).

18 Jesus' reply seems unnecessarily abrupt. But we must remember that he was calling attention to the man's unthinking use of language. Jesus was saying, as it were, "Before you address me with such a title, you had better think soberly about what the implications are, and especially what they are for you."

19–20 Jesus answered by giving the man a condensed summary of the second section of the law (cf. Ex 20:12–17). It was a firm Jewish belief, based on OT teaching, that anyone who kept the law would live (Dt 30:15–16). So Jesus began there.

The young man answered confidently. From boyhood (probably age thirteen) he had kept all the commandments Jesus cited. At that age a Jewish boy became responsible to live by God's commands. The man spoke sincerely because to him keeping the law was a matter of external conformity (cf. Php 3:6). That the law required an inner obedience, which no one can comply with, apparently escaped him.

21 Recognizing the young man's sincerity, Jesus responded in love. The one thing that prevented him from having eternal life was the security of his wealth. Jesus put his finger on the sensitive place by commanding him to go, sell all he had, give to the poor, and as his final instruction, "Come, follow me." For this man there could be no following of Jesus before he went, sold everything he had, and gave it away. His wealth and all it meant to him of position, status, comfort, and security prevented him from entering into eternal life. There is no indication, however, that Jesus' prescription was meant to be binding on all Christians (cf. Lk 19:8–9). What Jesus does tell us is that we must not be attached to material things. Since eternal life is a gift of God and cannot be earned, no saving merit must be attached to the action of giving all to the poor.

22 Mark describes the reactions of the man in vivid detail. His face fell. To obey Jesus was too great a risk for him to take, so the security of wealth kept him out of the kingdom of God.

23–26 The failure of the rich man to respond to the challenge led to one of Jesus' most striking pronouncements. He addressed it to the disciples, and it underscores the difficulty of a rich person's entering the kingdom of God.

The amazement of the disciples at Jesus' words reflects their Jewish background, which placed great emphasis on the privileged position of the rich. To be wealthy was believed to be sure evidence of having the blessing of God. But with his penetrating spiritual insight, Jesus saw how wealth could hinder one from putting his trust and dependence in God.

The second half of v.24 may begin a new section, the last section ending with the amazement of the disciples. NIV considers it (along with vv.25–27) a part of the incident that begins with v.23. The fact that Jesus' disciples "were even more amazed" (v.26) looks back to their initial amazement in v.24 and supports the translators' decision.

Jesus supports his statement in v.23 by the proverb about the camel and needle that created even greater amazement on the part of the disciples. For the rich to enter the kingdom of God simply because of their wealth is indeed impossible. The proverb was not lost on the disciples. As their question "Who then can be saved?" shows, they completely understood it.

27 Jesus then pointed to the solution. His answer makes clear that salvation is totally the work of God. Apart from the grace of God, it is impossible for anyone to enter God's kingdom. Humanly speaking no one can be saved by his or her own efforts; but what we can never do for ourselves, God does for us. In this story the concepts of "eternal life," "salvation," and "entrance into the kingdom" are all used synonymously.

28 This verse begins what is probably a new incident that Mark places here because it fits the theme. In contrast to the rich man who failed to give up what he had and to follow Jesus, Peter was wondering what reward was in store for them (cf. Mt 19:27).

29–30 Instead of rebuking Peter, Jesus made a threefold promise: No one who forsakes home, loved ones, or lands for Jesus' sake and the Gospel's will fail (1) to receive back in this life a hundredfold what he or she has lost; (2) to suffer persecutions (only Mark includes this); and (3) to have eternal life in the age to come. The hundredfold return in this life must be understood in the context of the new community into which believers in Jesus come. There they find a multiplication of relationships, often closer and more spiritually meaningful than blood ties.

Jesus is also realistic about the Christian life. There will be persecutions, but through them the new relationships as members of the Christian community develop and flourish. Jesus goes on to promise eternal life in "the age to come." Everything that happens in the present is an earnest of that far richer fulfillment when there will no longer be any persecutions.

31 This saying of Jesus refers to the future when God will evaluate the lives of people and when human values will be reversed. Those who have rank and position now will not have them, and those who do not have them now will have them then. This may be a kind of summary of Jesus' teaching in vv.17–31. In eternity the rich and the powerful will have the tables turned on them. Furthermore, Jesus emphasizes that discipleship entails suffering and service; it must be entered on because of love and commitment to Jesus, not because of what one hopes to get out of it either in this life or in the life to come.

M. Third Prediction of the Passion (10:32–34)

32 Jesus resumed his journey to Jerusalem, taking the lead (cf. Lk 9:51). Jerusalem is mentioned for the first time as his destination. The disciples were probably astonished because of the determination with which Jesus proceeded to his goal (cf. Isa 50:7). "Those who followed" were probably pilgrims on their way to the feast at Jerusalem. Jesus, as he so often does in Mark's gospel, separated the Twelve from the crowd for renewed instruction about his coming passion.

33–34 This is the third major prediction of the Passion (cf. 8:31; 9:31). It is more detailed and precise than the others, containing six details. Jesus is to be (1) betrayed; (2) sentenced to death; (3) handed over to the Gentiles; (4) mocked, spit on, and flogged; (5) executed; and (6) resurrected. To claim (as some do) that these verses are a post-resurrection church tradition put in the mouth of Jesus denies that Jesus, as the unique Son of God, could predict his passion in detail. That the events did not take place historically in the chronological sequence in which they are given in v.34 would tend to cast doubt on the thesis that the prediction was shaped by the passion narrative in chs. 14–16.

The climax of the passage is the prediction of the Resurrection. Mark does not record any response by the disciples to this startling statement. Luke (18:34), however, says, "The disciples did not understand any of this."

N. The Request of James and John (10:35–45)

Mark 10:35–45 parallels 9:30–37. Both contain discussions about true greatness, and both follow a prediction of Jesus' passion.

And in a woeful way both reveal how spiritually dense the disciples really were. It is not likely that the church created a story that cast such disrepute on the character of two of the best-known disciples.

35–37 The request made by James and John seems utterly preposterous. They vainly came to Jesus with a carte blanche request! When Jesus asked what that might be, their answer was that they might have the positions of highest honor in the messianic kingdom. The request reveals clearly that before the Crucifixion the disciples believed Jesus to be the Messiah; and since it was now clear that he was going up to Jerusalem, they expected his messianic glory to be revealed there. James and John wanted to be sure of a prominent place in this about-to-be-realized kingdom.

38 Jesus' answer is sharp and penetrating. The two disciples did not really know what they were asking. The way to privileged position in the messianic kingdom is not by grabbing for power but by relinquishing it through suffering and death. Jesus explained this to them by using the analogies of the cup and baptism. The cup, symbolizing trouble and suffering, is found in the OT (Ps 75:8; Isa 51:17; Jer 49:12; Eze 23:31–34 [see comment on 14:35–37]). Baptism is a symbol of a deluge of trouble (cf. Pss 18:16; 69:1–2).

39–40 With a confident "We can," the disciples answered Jesus' question about going through the suffering of his passion. How naive! James and John failed to understand what was involved in Jesus' sufferings, though they would indeed participate in them. But to grant them privileged positions in his kingdom was not within his authority. Jesus refused to usurp the authority of his Father.

41–44 Although Jesus had previously rebuked the spirit of ambition and jealousy among his disciples (cf. 9:35), it was still very much alive in them. The other ten were indignant with James and John. None of the disciples had yet in the least comprehended what Jesus had meant when he spoke of his passion. So Jesus had to give them another lesson in what greatness is. The Gentile rulers loved to be in charge. But this is not the way it should be among true followers of Jesus (v.43), where greatness is achieved by humble service (v.44). This is the great paradox of the kingdom of God.

45 The climax to this section (vv.35–45) comes in this verse. Even the Son of Man is not exempt from the rule of humble service in the kingdom. He is in fact par excellence the example of it, especially in his redemptive mission. He did not come as a potentate whose every personal whim was to be catered to by groveling servants, but he came as a servant, giving "his life as a ransom for many."

The word translated "ransom" (GK 3389) relates to "redemption" or "release" as a theological concept based on the experience of Israel's release from the slavery of Egypt. It may also contain an allusion to the Suffering Servant (see esp. Isa 53:6b).

The prepositional phrase "for many" is a clear indication of substitution. In his death, Jesus takes the place of the many. What should have happened to them happened to him instead. The expression "the many" (GK 4498) is not to be understood in the sense of "some but not all" but in the general sense of "many" as contrasted with the single life that is given for their ransom (cf. Isa 53:11–12).

O. Restoring Blind Bartimaeus's Sight (10:46–52)

46 This last of the healing miracles in Mark's gospel takes place near Jericho, a city located five miles west of the Jordan and about fifteen miles northeast of Jerusalem. There was an old Jericho and a new Jericho, built by Herod. It is possible that the miracle was done somewhere between the old Israelite city and the new city, for Luke records this miracle as Jesus went into the city and Mark, as he was leaving. Mark gives the name of the blind man—Bartimaeus ("son of Timai"). In the Middle East, a blind man sitting along the road begging is a common sight.

47–48 Bartimaeus must have heard of Jesus' reputation as a healer. When he discovered that Jesus was coming by, he seized the opportunity of approaching him. The title he used to address Jesus—"Son of David"—is messianic (cf. Isa 11:1, 10; Jer 23:5–6; Eze 34:23–24; cf. Mk 12:35). The pilgrims going up to Jerusalem for the Feast of Passover did not appreciate Bartimaeus's loud shouting and tried to silence him, but he shouted all the more.

Unlike the crowd, Jesus did not try to silence Bartimaeus. This implies that he did not reject the title "Son of David." Since Jesus was now close to the fulfillment of his messianic mission, it was no longer necessary to keep the secret (see comment on 1:43–44).

49–50 The loud cry stopped Jesus, and he called the beggar to him. The crowd then completely changed their attitude and encouraged the beggar. Bartimaeus's response was immediate. The cloak was his outer garment, which he had probably spread on the ground to receive the alms.

51–52 Before Jesus healed the beggar, he asked him a question to stimulate faith. Having done that, without any overt action or healing word on Jesus' part, he sent him away with the words "Go, . . . your faith has healed you." The cure was immediate, and the man joined the crowd going up to the feast.

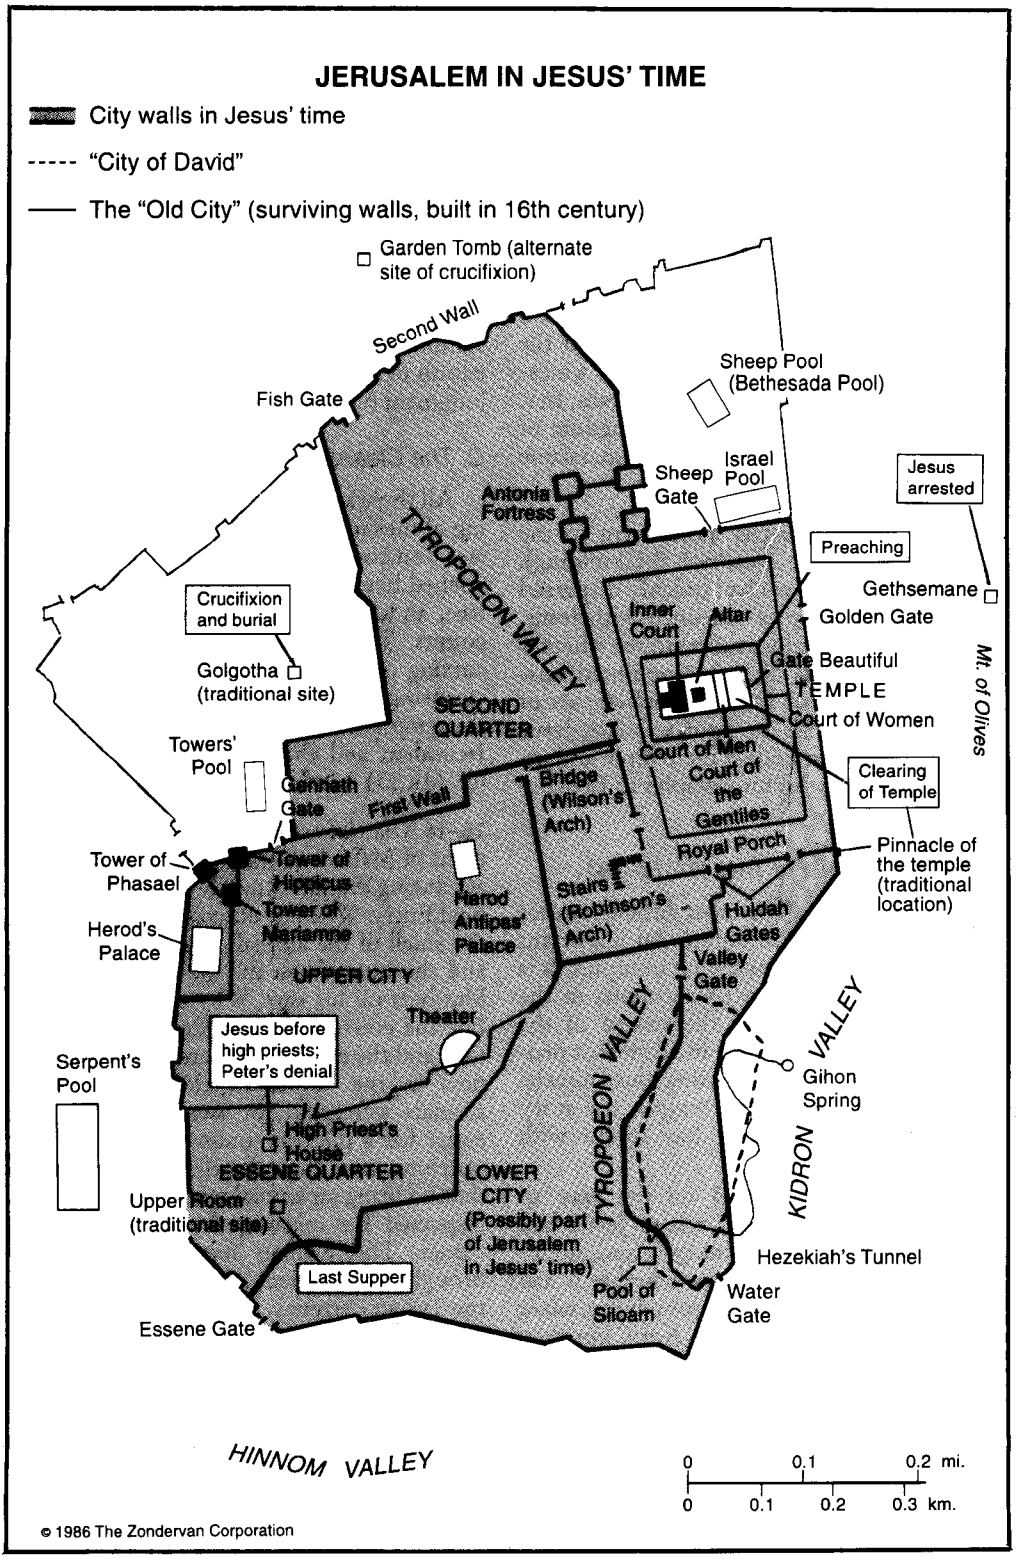
The close of chapter 10 sets the stage for the climax of the story. The journey to Jerusalem has ended. Jesus is about to enter the Holy City where the last acts of the drama of redemption will take place. His opening the eyes of the blind man stands in sharp contrast to the blindness of the religious leaders he is about to encounter there.

IV. The Jerusalem Ministry (11:1–13:37)

At this point a new section in the gospel of Mark begins. Jesus arrived in Jerusalem, and the rest of his ministry took place within the confines of the city. Traditionally this period, beginning with the Triumphal Entry on Sunday and ending with the Crucifixion and Resurrection seven days later, has been designated the Passion Week. But if we had only Mark's gospel, it would be possible to allow for a Jerusalem ministry longer than one week. Some scholars do in fact argue for an entrance into Jerusalem in the fall of the year at the time of the Feast of Tabernacles, extending Jesus' final ministry in the city to about six months. However, in view of Jn 12:1 and 12:12–15, which closely associate Jesus' final visit to Jerusalem with the Passover, a week-long ministry is more probable.

The section 11:1–13:37 is essentially made up of three parts: (1) the initial events of the entrance into the city and the cleansing of the temple (11:1–19); (2) instructions to his disciples (11:20–25; 12:35–44; 13:1–37); and (3) conflict with the religious leaders (11:27–12:34).

A. The Triumphal Entry (11:1–11)



1–2 The approach to Jerusalem was through Bethany and Bethphage. Bethphage ("house of figs") was a village close to Jerusalem; Bethany, located on the eastern slope of the Mount of Olives, was about two miles from Jerusalem (cf. Jn 11:18). The Mount of Olives is directly east of the city, rising to an elevation of about twenty-six hundred feet.

Jesus sent two of his disciples, probably to Bethphage, to get a donkey colt (cf. Mt 21:2; Jn 12:15). Because of the prophecy of Zec 9:9, the donkey was considered the beast of the Messiah. Jesus stipulated that the colt must be an unused one. Such animals were regarded as especially suitable for sacred purposes (cf. Nu 19:2; Dt 21:3; 1Sa 6:7).

3 Jesus anticipated that the actions of the disciples might be questioned, so he instructed them how to answer when asked why they were taking the colt. By capitalizing "Lord" (GK 3261), NIV has interpreted the passage to mean that Jesus was referring to himself—the other option is to translate the Greek word used here as "owner.." Jesus probably was well known by this time in the area around Bethany, and his authority as "Lord" was recognized.

4–6 The disciples found the colt as Jesus had told them and carried out his orders to the letter. The people (the owners? see Lk 19:33) did not object to the disciples' taking the colt because apparently they knew Jesus and recognized his authority.

7–8 The action of the crowd was completely spontaneous. The outer garments on the back of the donkey made a kind of saddle for Jesus to ride on. When he mounted the colt, others in the crowd spread their garments on the road (an act of royal homage; cf. 2Ki 9:13) and spread branches before him (John mentions "palm branches," 12:13). These could easily have been cut from the fields located nearby. By sitting on a donkey and entering Jerusalem in fulfillment of Zec 9:9, Jesus was implicitly declaring himself to be the Messiah. His kingdom, however, was not a political one, but a spiritual one—one centered on peace. No one could charge Jesus with political activism by the manner in which he declared his messiahship.

9–10 "Hosanna" (GK 6057) literally means "save now," but it had become simply an exclamation of praise. "Blessed is he who comes in the name of the Lord" is an accurate quotation of Ps 118:26, one of the Hallel Psalms (Pss 113–18), which were used liturgically at the feasts of Tabernacles and Passover. This quotation was a customary religious greeting or blessing pronounced on pilgrims who had come to Jerusalem for the feast. Mark, however, seems to imply a messianic fulfillment of this passage in Jesus. In v. 10, the kingdom blessed is the "kingdom of our father David," clearly the messianic kingdom promised to David's son.

11 On entering the city Jesus went to the temple (the temple area, not the building). Apparently the crowd had quickly dispersed and only the disciples remained with Jesus. Jesus examined the institution to see whether it was fulfilling its divinely appointed mission, thus preparing for the prophetic act of cleansing. But since the hour was late, Jesus delayed his action against the temple and instead withdrew with his disciples to Bethany for the night.

B. The Unfruitful Fig Tree (11:12–14)

12–13 This is one of the most difficult stories in Mark's gospel to interpret. An important consideration is the position it occupies. It is one of Mark's interrupted accounts, in the middle of which stands the record of the cleansing of the temple, an incident that provides the clue for interpreting this miracle. Like the cleansing of the temple, the story of the unfruitful fig tree has to do with judgment.

The incident occurred on the way to Jerusalem from Bethany, where Jesus had spent the night. He was hungry; and, noticing a fig tree, he went to see whether it had any figs on it. Fig trees around Jerusalem usually leaf out in March or April, but they do not produce figs till June. This tree was no exception. It was in full leaf, but there were no figs on it "because it was not the season for figs." It is this phrase that makes the story such a problem. It seems best to consider it Mark's own insertion to explain to people not familiar with the characteristics of a fig tree why one fully leafed out would not have fruit on it.

14 Jesus addressed the tree directly and by his words performed a miracle of destruction (the only such miracle in the Gospels). It is best seen as an acted-out parable. Jesus' hunger provides the occasion for his use of this teaching device. The fig tree represents Israel (cf. Hos 9:10; Mic 7:1–4; Na 3:12; Zec 10:2). The tree is fully leafed out, and in such a state one would normally expect to find fruit. This symbolizes the hypocrisy and sham of the nation of Israel, which made her ripe for the judgment of God.

C. The Cleansing of the Temple (11:15–19)

All three synoptic writers have the cleansing of the temple at the end of Jesus' ministry (see also comment on Jn 2:13–14). It is sandwiched between the two incidents of the fig tree, an arrangement meant to link the accounts. The judgment symbolized by the cursing of the fig tree is initiated by Jesus' cleansing of the temple, and the cleansing of the temple is prophetic of the destruction of Jerusalem and the eschatological judgment (cf. Mk 13).

15–16 The cleansing of the temple, in fulfillment of Mal 3:1–3, was Jesus' next messianic act during the Passion Week after the Triumphal Entry. When he entered the temple area, the smell of the animals entered his nostrils; and the noise from the moneychangers' tables beat on his ears. Why were they there? For the convenience of pilgrims, the cattlemen and the moneychangers had set up business in the Court of the Gentiles. The animals were sold for sacrifices. It was far easier for a pilgrim coming to Jerusalem to purchase one that was guaranteed kosher than to bring an animal with him and have it inspected for meeting the kosher requirements. The Roman money the pilgrims brought to Jerusalem had to be changed into the Tyrian currency, since the annual temple tax had to be paid in that currency. Exorbitant prices were often charged for changing the currency. By overturning the tables of the moneychangers and the benches of those selling doves, Jesus was directly and forcefully challenging the authority of the high priest, because they were there by his authorization.

Jesus also put a stop to casual use of the temple by those who used it as a shortcut between the city and the Mount of Olives (v.16).

17 The first passage quoted by Jesus is Isa 56:7, a prediction that non-Jews who worship God would be allowed to worship in the temple. By allowing the Court of the Gentiles, the only place in the temple area where Gentiles could worship God, to become a noisy, smelly public market, the Jewish religious leaders were preventing Gentiles from exercising the spiritual privilege promised them. How could a Gentile pray amid all that noise and stench? The second quotation (from Jer 7:11) emphasizes that instead of allowing the temple to be what it was meant to be, a place of prayer, they had allowed it to become a robbers' den. This is to be understood both in terms of the Jews' dishonest dealing with the pilgrims and expecially in terms of using all their merchandising activities to rob the Gentiles of their rightful claim to worship Israel's God.

Jesus' concern that Gentiles receive equal privileges with Jews to worship God would have been particularly meaningful for Mark's predominantly Gentile readers.

18–19 The Pharisees and Herodians in Galilee had decided that Jesus must be put out of the way (cf. 3:6). Now the chief priests and teachers of the law came to the same decision. Jesus' action had challenged their authority and no doubt cost them a good deal of money. So they went into action against him, but not openly, because they feared what the response of the people might be. Since Jesus was so popular with the people as a teacher, the power and authority of the chief priests and teachers of the law could easily be broken.

Again Jesus and his disciples withdrew from Jerusalem and spent the night in Bethany, perhaps because Jerusalem was not safe for him.

D. The Withered Fig Tree and Sayings on Faith and Prayer (11:20–25)

The first three verses of this section form the second part of the story of the fig tree (11:12–14) that surrounds the account of the cleansing of the temple. (For the theological significance of this, see the introductory paragraph to the exposition of 11:15–19.)

20–21 The next morning, on returning to Jerusalem from Bethany, Jesus and his disciples passed the fig tree again (see comments on 11:12–14), now totally destroyed. Peter, remembering what Jesus had said, called his attention to the withered tree. Jesus did not in any way interpret the event. Yet the meaning is obvious: Jesus' predicted judgment on the temple would come to pass as surely as his prediction of the withering of the fig tree (cf. 13:1–2).

22 The sayings found in vv.22–25 occur elsewhere in the Synoptic Gospels in various contexts (Mt 6:13–14; 7:7; 17:20; 18:19; Lk 11:9; 17:6). Jesus used the incident of the fig tree to teach incidentally some lessons on faith and prayer. The source of the power for performing the miracle was God. He must be the object of our faith.

23 Since Jesus was standing on the Mount of Olives, from which the Dead Sea can be seen on a clear day, he may have been referring specifically to this mountain. Of course Jesus was speaking figuratively, saying that the greatest possible difficulties can be removed when a person has faith (cf. Jas 1:6).

24 There is a close connection between the kind of faith Jesus speaks of here and prayer. Prayer is the source of the power of such faith. A strong faith is a praying faith dependent on God's power and will.

25 The transition between v.24 and v.25 is abrupt, but there is a connection. To be effective prayer must be offered in faith—faith in the all-powerful God who works miracles. But it must be offered in the spirit of forgiveness. Faith and the willingness to forgive are the two conditions of efficacious prayer.

E. The Question About Jesus' Authority (11:27–33)

27–28 Jesus and his disciples came to Jerusalem and entered the temple area—the focal point of his ministry while in the city. On this occasion he received opposition from three elements of the Jewish religious establishment: chief priests, teachers of the law, and elders. These groups made up the Sanhedrin, the high court of the Jews. They directed a question to him about the source of his authority "for doing these things" (a reference to his cleansing the temple), hoping that his answer would bring him into disrepute with the people and thereby clear the way for their arresting him.

29–30 As Jesus often did, he answered a question by asking another one: whether John's mission (expressed by the word "baptism") was from God ("heaven") or from humans. The question was particularly appropriate for the situation. John had clearly testified to the divine source of Jesus' mission. If they recognized the divine authority of John's mission, they would be forced to recognize Jesus' mission also and his cleansing of the temple as the legitimate exercise of his authority.

31–33 This question of Jesus proved too much for them. Either alternative—"from heaven" or "from men"—would place them in a difficult position. An admission of John's divine authority would compel them to believe in Jesus; a denial would place them in an unfavorable position with the people who accepted John as a true prophet. So to save face they pleaded ignorance, which was tantamount to a refusal to answer Jesus' question. Jesus' reply was that he too would refuse to answer their question—at least directly. He had given them a veiled answer in his counterquestion (cf. v.30)

F. The Parable of the Tenants (12:1–12)

Like the parable of the sower (cf. 4:13–20), this one also has strong allegorical features. While it is true that most of Jesus' parables have but one point to make and the details have no separate significance, Jesus did use allegory on occasion.

The vineyard is Israel; the owner is God; the tenants are the Jewish leaders; the servants are the prophets; and the only son and heir is Jesus. Other details of the parable, such as the wall, winepress, and tower, have no separate significance.

1 Mark does not identify who Jesus' hearers were, though they were probably the chief priests, the teachers of the law, and the elders (cf. 11:27). The description in v.1 reflects the language of Isa 5:1-2, where the vineyard symbolizes Israel (cf. Ps 80:8–16; Isa 5:7; Jer 2:21). The details mentioned here are known to anyone who has traveled in Israel.

When the vineyard had been completely prepared, its owner rented it to tenants and went on a journey. This detail reflects a condition that actually prevailed in Galilee in Jesus' time, namely, that much of the land was in the hands of absentee landowners who contracted with tenants on a crop-sharing basis.

2–5 When harvest time came, the absentee landlord sent one of his servants to collect what was due him from the tenants. The payment was to be made in produce of the land according to a previously arranged percentage. The landlord sent three servants in succession to collect the payment, but the tenants repudiated the agreement. Instead they beat up the first two servants and killed the third. By referring to "many others," Jesus was forcing his listeners to think beyond the parable to the history of Israel and the rejection of the prophets, God's sent servants (cf. Jer 7:25–26; 25:4; Am 3:7; Zec 1:6).

6–8 The sending of the owner's own son underscores the serious view he took of the situation. He assumed that they would respect this son. (This statement should not be allegorized since God knew beforehand that Jesus would be rejected; cf. Isa 53:4; Ac 2:23.) The owner's expectations were thwarted, for the tenants' greed led to outrageous action (v.7). They saw the coming of the son as a golden opportunity for seizing the property; they may have inferred from the son's coming that the owner had died. If they did away with his son, the property would be ownerless and therefore available to the first claimants. There was no question in the minds of Jesus' hearers that he was the son in the parable (see their reaction in v.12).

9 Jesus then drew out the meaning of the parable with a question and proceeded to answer it himself. His answer underscores the seriousness of the action of the wicked tenants. Their punishment would be capital (cf. Isa 5:5–7), and the vineyard would be let to other tenants. The killing of the tenants may be a not-so-veiled prophecy of the destruction of Jerusalem, and the "others" to which the vineyard would be given those who believe in Jesus.

10–11 The quotation is from Ps 118:22–23, the same psalm from which the joyful Hosanna cry came (cf. 11:9). In the OT context the reference to "the stone" is probably to the construction of Solomon's temple. One of the stones was rejected but became the "capstone," the key stone in the entire building (but see NIV note).

In the original context the rejected stone symbolized the Davidic king or perhaps Israel, despised by the pagan nations but, after her return from Exile, exalted to the status of nationhood. Jesus applied the psalm to himself. His "stoneship" was a familiar theme in early Christianity (see 4:11; 1Pe 2:7). There is probably a veiled reference here to the death and resurrection of Christ.

12 The application of the parable was obvious, but again the religious leaders did not harm Jesus because they feared the crowd (cf. 11:18, 32). It was getting close to the time of the feast, and more and more pilgrims from Galilee were arriving in Jerusalem. Many of these knew Jesus either by personal contact or by reputation. The religious leaders knew it would be unwise to make their move now; "so they left him and went away."

G. The Question About Paying Taxes to Caesar (12:13–17)

13 Again Jesus came into conflict with the religious leaders (it was probably Wednesday now). The Herodians were as obnoxious to the Pharisees on political grounds as the Sadducees were on theological grounds. Yet the two groups united in their opposition to Jesus. Collaboration in wickedness, as well as goodness, has great power. Their purpose was to trip Jesus up in his words so that he would lose the support of the people, leaving the way open for them to destroy him.

14–15a The question was prefaced with an obvious and, indeed, obnoxious piece of flattery (v.14). Moreover, it was thoroughly insincere. Jews were required by the Romans to pay tribute money into the fiscus, the emperor's treasury. Some Jews (e.g., the Zealots) flatly refused to pay it, because it was for them an admission of the Roman right to rule. The Pharisees disliked paying it but did not actively oppose it, whereas the Herodians had no objections to it. The intent of this question was to force Jesus to a direct answer, identifying himself either with the Zealots or with the Herodians.

15b–16 Jesus was not about to fall into their trap; he called their question "hypocrisy."So he asked them for a Roman denarius. In showing one to Jesus, they had already answered their own question. By using Caesar's coinage they were tacitly acknowledging Caesar's authority and thus their obligation to pay the tax.

17 Jesus' answer avoided the trap. Caesar has a legitimate claim and so does God. Give to each his rightful claim, for obedience to God does not abolish obedience to the state. Jesus did not, however, say that the claims of God and those of Caesar are the same. For a more complete doctrine of the relationship of Christians to the state, this statement of Jesus must be coupled with Ro 13:1–7; 1Ti 2:1–6; and 1Pe 2:13–17.

The reply was not what they expected. It was simple yet profound, and "they were amazed at him." But because he did not give a direct yes-or-no answer, they felt they had enough to charge him with opposition to paying taxes (cf. Lk 23:2).

H. The Question of Marriage at the Resurrection (12:18–27)

18 Reliable information about the Sadducees (mentioned only here in Mark) is difficult to obtain because no documents that are clearly Sadducean have been preserved. The word "Sadducee" (GK 4881) is usually traced to Zadok, the high priest during the time of David.

In the time of Jesus, the Sadducees were small numerically but exerted great influence politically and religiously. They were not, however, popular among the masses. They represented the urban, wealthy, sophisticated class and were centered in Jerusalem. When Jerusalem was destroyed in A.D. 70, they disappeared from history.

Mark identifies the Sadducees as those "who say there is no resurrection." They held this position because they accepted as Scripture primarily the first five books of the Bible and rejected all beliefs and practices not found there. Since they claimed to be unable to find clear teaching about the Resurrection in the books of Moses, they rejected the doctrine. This set them against the Pharisees, who considered the oral tradition as authoritative as the written Scriptures.

19–23 The address by the Sadducees to Jesus is ironic; although they addressed him with the honorific title "Teacher," they did not intend to learn from him. The case cited arose out of a provision in the Mosaic Law (Dt 25:5–6), which required that if a man died without children, his brother had to marry his widow. The purpose of the law was to protect the widow and guarantee the continuance of the family line. The Sadducees presented a hypothetical case in which one woman married seven brothers in turn, all of whom died childless. In the Resurrection whose wife of the seven would she be? The case is so ludicrous it may have been a well-known Sadducean joke that was used for poking fun at the Pharisees' doctrine of the Resurrection.

24–25 In his answer Jesus accused the Sadducees of ignorance of the Scriptures and the power of God. He then proceeded to take up the second accusation first. In the Resurrection there will be a new order of existence brought about by the power of God. Marriage will not exist as it does now, but all life will be like that of the angels. The basic characteristics of resurrection life will be service for and fellowship with God. The mention of angels in this context is significant because it served as a correction of another theological error of the Sadducees (cf. Ac 23:8). Also, since in heaven there will be no more death, the need for marriage and the propagation of the human race will not exist.

26–27 Jesus then turned to the cause of the Sadducees' erroneous thinking that he mentioned at first: ignorance of the teaching of the OT (cf. 2:25; 12:10). He directed them back to the story of Moses and the burning bush (v.26; Ex 3:6), a part of the OT that was considered particularly authoritative by the Sadducees. The quotation may be understood as follows: Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob had long since died when God made the statement to Moses at the burning bush. Nevertheless, God said, "I am [not 'I was'] the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob." Thus the patriarchs were still alive in Moses' time; and if they were alive then, we may be sure that in the Resurrection God will raise up their bodies to share in the blessedness of eternal life. God is faithful to his covenant promises.

I. The Question Concerning the Great Commandment (12:28–34)

28 Mark seems to suggest that this next question was a sincere one. A teacher of the law had been impressed by Jesus' answer to the previous question and so ventured one of his own. The rabbis counted 613 individual statutes in the law, 365 negative and 248 positive. Attempts were made to differentiate between the "great" and "little" commandments. The rabbis also made attempts to formulate great principles from which the rest of the law could be deduced.

29–30 In answer to this question, Jesus quoted two passages from the OT (Dt 6:4–5 and Lev 19:18). The first of these is a confession of faith that is recited by pious Jews every morning and evening. It basically affirms two things: (1) the unity of God and (2) the covenant relationship of God with the Jewish people. God is to be loved completely and totally because he alone is God and because he has made a covenant of love with his people. In the covenant God gives himself totally in love to his people; therefore he expects his people to give themselves totally in love to him.

31 Jesus brought Lev 19:18 together with Dt 6:5 to show that love of "neighbor" (GK 4446) is a natural and logical outgrowth of love for God. These two commandments belong together; they cannot be separated. Thus, although the teacher of the law had asked for the one most important commandment, Jesus gave him two. Though the Jews had a narrow view of who was a "neighbor" (fellow Jews and proselytes), Jesus redefined the term to mean anyone whom we deal with (see Lk 10:25–37 and comments).

32–34 Mark records the favorable response of the teacher of the law. In repeating the commandment he omitted the divine name "the Lord" in keeping with the practice of pious Jews of avoiding the pronunciation of God's name. The phrase "and there is no other but him" is an interpretive addition from Dt 4:35, which underscores the uniqueness of Israel's God. The statement by the teacher of the law that love of God and neighbor are "more important than all burnt offerings and sacrifices" is in keeping with the teachings of the OT prophets (1Sa 15:22; Hos 6:6), though not necessarily in keeping with NT Judaism, which set law and sacrifices side by side with love.

What Jesus said was getting through to the teacher of the law and elicited the statement by our Lord that he was close to the kingdom of God—a statement no doubt meant to stimulate and challenge him to further thoughtful reflection and decisive action.

Jesus had so forcefully demonstrated his ability to answer questions meant to trap him and to turn such questions back on his accusers that they stopped asking questions. In the next section, Jesus, not the religious leaders, asked a question.

J. The Question About David's Son (12:35–37)

35 Jesus was still in the temple courts. Up to this point he was being asked questions. Now he took the initiative and asked in what sense the Messiah is the son of David.

36–37 Rather than waiting for an answer, Jesus provided it himself with a quotation from Ps 110:1. Both the Davidic authorship of this psalm is assumed and David's inspiration in writing it. "Speaking by the Holy Spirit" is a typical rabbinic formula to describe inspired utterance. In his reply, Jesus presupposed the psalm's messianic usage.

David called the Messiah "my Lord" (GK 3261) in this psalm. How could he at the same time be David's son and David's Lord? To Jesus, even though the Messiah was a descendant of David, he is also the Son of God and therefore senior in rank to David (see comments on Mt 22:41–45).

Mark goes on to say that the crowd was delighted to listen to Jesus. Apparently they enjoyed seeing the so-called experts stumped!

K. The Warning About the Teachers of the Law (12:38–40)

38–39 Jesus continued his teaching in the temple courts (cf. 12:35). While not all teachers of the law were frauds, many of them were using their position and influence in a cruel and greedy manner. Jesus condemned them for their religious show with long white linen robes that were fringed and reached almost to the ground. They also received special respect by the majority of the people, being addressed by the honorific titles "Rabbi," "Father," and "Master." In the synagogue they occupied the prominent bench in front of the ark that contained the sacred scrolls of the Law and the Prophets. They were often invited to banquets because of their prestige and were given special places of honor. What Jesus condemned was their seeking such honor for themselves instead of for God whom they professed to serve.

40 Since the teachers of the law were not allowed to be paid for their services, they were dependent on the gifts of patrons for their livelihood. Such a system was vulnerable to abuses. Wealthy widows especially were preyed on by the greedy and unscrupulous among these men. Jesus particularly condemned the hypocrisy of their long prayers that were used as a mask for their greed. Jesus promised punishment to all such people—a reference to God's judgment in the Last Day.

L. The Widow's Offering (12:41–44)

41–42 This is the final incident in Jesus' public ministry. This story contrasts the greed of the teachers of the law with the liberality of the widow. It also serves as a transition to the story of how Jesus gave his all for humankind. The setting is the court of the women, into which both men and women were allowed to come, and where the temple treasury was located. Jesus sat down on a bench where he could watch the people bring their offerings and put them in one of the thirteen trumpet-shaped boxes used for that purpose. It was not the rich with their large gifts who caught Jesus' attention but a poor widow. She placed in the box two of the smallest coins in circulation in Palestine. That Mark felt it necessary to explain the value of this Jewish coin by using a Latin coin only known in the west suggests strongly that he was writing to Romans.

43–44 The disciples were not sitting with Jesus, so he called them to him. The lesson he wanted to teach them was important enough for them to be there, both to see for themselves and to hear what he had to say. The widow's offering was more than all the others in proportion and in the spirit in which she gave.

M. The Olivet Discourse (13:1–37)

This is the longest connected discourse in Mark's gospel, but also the most difficult. The three major questions that present themselves in the study of Mk 13 are: (1) What is the origin of the passage? (2) What is its purpose in Mark's gospel? and (3) What is its meaning?

While some scholars have argued for an insertion into Mark of a separate, independent Jewish (or Jewish-Christian) apocalypse (called the "Little Apocalypse Theory"), there are no compelling reasons for not accepting the discourse as substantially from Jesus. Whether he spoke its contents on a single occasion is another matter. Mark may have brought into the discourse material he felt was on the same theme (observe that Mk 13:9b–12 is not found in Mt 24 but in Mt 10:17–21 in the missionary discourse to the Twelve). This shaping and arranging was within the original intent and meaning of Jesus' words.

Second, why did Jesus speak these words and why were they included in Mark's gospel? The discourse is patently apocalyptic in nature. This kind of literature was well known in the first century, especially to Jews. Daniel in the OT and the Revelation in the NT are examples of books that are apocalyptic in nature or have large apocalyptic sections. Such books are full of fantastic imagery, are highly symbolical, and purport to reveal information about the End. Mark's apocalypse is no exception. It has all the above characteristics, but in addition it has a distinctive hortatory character. There are nineteen imperatives in vv.5–37. This makes it abundantly clear that the main purpose of the discourse is not to satisfy curiosity about the future but to give practical, ethical teaching. Jesus was preparing his disciples—and beyond them the church—to live and witness in a hostile world.

Likewise, Mark uses this material to give an answer to his readers about Jesus' power as Lord of history and about his promise to be with them through the Holy Spirit.

Third, what does this chapter mean? That meaning is closely tied in with the two major predictions in it: the destruction of the city of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 and the end of the age. While various solutions to the relationship between these two have been proposed in regard to this passage, the best solution is to see in vv.5–23 a shift back and forth between an immediate and a remote future. Some of the events even seem to have a dual fulfillment, one in the destruction of the city and the other in the end time. This shift from close to remote prediction may be due in part to Mark's arrangement of sayings of Jesus spoken on different occasions.

1. Prophecy of the destruction of the temple (13:1–2)

1 As Jesus was leaving the temple, one of his disciples, on looking at the temple in all its grandeur, uttered an exclamation over its beauty and massiveness. This chapter in Mark's gospel is Jesus' response.

The temple area, including the temple building itself, had been rebuilt by Herod the Great. The courtyard had been greatly enlarged (to about four hundred by five hundred yards) in order to accommodate the large throngs of Jews who came to Jerusalem for the festivals. To accomplish this enlargement, a huge platform had to be erected to compensate for the sharp falling off of the land to the southeast. An enormous retaining wall was built to hold the platform in place. The massive stones used in the construction of this wall may still be seen today. At the southeast corner the temple platform towered two hundred feet above the Kidron Valley.

In addition to the temple building itself, on the platform stood porticoes and cloistered courts flanked by beautiful colonnades. The temple area covered approximately one-sixth of the area of the city of Jerusalem. It was an architectural wonder, and its size and location dominated the ancient city.

2 Jesus' reply was startling. Great though the temple buildings were, they would be completely destroyed. This prophecy was fulfilled in A.D. 70, when Jerusalem and the temple were destroyed by the Roman general Titus. All the buildings on the temple platform, including the temple itself to which the prophecy refers, were utterly destroyed. So completely were they destroyed that no trace of them remains today. Even their exact location on the temple mount is disputed.

2. The disciples' twofold question (13:3–4)

3–4 Between v.2 and v.3 the location shifts. Jesus was now on the Mount of Olives. With him were the four disciples who had been the first to be called by him (cf. 1:16–20). From the top of the Mount they could clearly see the Kidron Valley running below the eastern wall of the city, and especially the temple mount.

The question the four disciples asked Jesus privately not only goes back to his statement made as they were leaving the temple area (cf. v.2) but actually expands it. The disciples wanted to know when the things Jesus predicted would take place. But they also wanted to know what the sign would be that the predicted events were "all about to be fulfilled." The disciples thought that the destruction of the temple would come at the end of the age (cf. Mt 24:3). Thus they wanted a sign, some sure way by which they might know that the destruction of the temple was about to occur and that the end of the age was approaching. But Jesus refused to give them eschatological signs. Throughout his discourse he was more concerned to prepare them by exhortation and warning for the trials that lay ahead than to give them dates and signs.

3. Warnings against deceivers and false signs of the End (13:5–8)

5–6 The first word of the discourse proper is "Watch out" (GK 1063), a word that recurs throughout the passage (vv.9, 23, 33, where it is translated as "be on your guard")—a clear indication that admonition is obviously one of Jesus' main concerns. He was warning against false claimants to messiahship. That Jesus said there would be many such false messiahs suggests that his statement should be understood broadly. Although before A.D. 70 few claimed to be the Messiah in the strictest sense, many claimed to have messianic authority. Furthermore, the reference may also look to the time preceding the End.

7–8 Wars and rumors of war must not be a cause for alarm, for these are within God's purposes. When they occur, they must not be mistaken as introducing the End; Jesus clearly states that the "end is still to come." What "end" he was talking about here is not clear, though he was likely referring to both the destruction of Jerusalem and the end of the age.

There will be other kinds of disturbances, too—international power struggles, earthquakes, and famine. These are indications of God's intervention in the historical process. Again, they must not be taken as marking the End. They are rather the beginnings of "birth pains" (the sufferings expected to occur in the period before the coming of the Messiah). In Jewish thought the messianic kingdom would emerge after a period of intense suffering. The word "beginning" suggests that there will be many more sufferings.

4. Warnings of persecution and strife and a call to steadfastness (13:9–13)

9 Again Jesus warned his disciples to be on their guard, because persecutions of various kinds awaited them. The "local councils" (GK 5284) to which they would be handed over are the religious courts, made up of the elders of the synagogues assembled for the purpose of exercising their disciplinary powers. From these courts, Jesus warned, they would be taken into the synagogues and publicly flogged. They would also be brought before secular authorities, most of whom were Gentiles. But persecution, whether by Jews or Gentiles, would be an opportunity for witness. This verse clearly anticipates fulfillment in the near future.

10 The word "must" (GK 1256) underscores the will of God, who has decreed that the Gospel be preached to "all nations" (or "all Gentiles"). This is Jesus' mandate to his disciples and through them to his church. "First" probably means before the End. Jesus seems to be saying here, "Instead of looking for signs of the end, get busy and spread the 'good news'! All nations must hear before the End comes."

11 Jesus went on to predict that the disciples would be hauled into court and would there be cross-examined by the authorities. He promised them, in that situation, strength and resources beyond their own through the Holy Spirit. The Spirit would reveal to them on the spot the appropriate words to speak (cf. Jer 1:9; Ac 6:10; 7:55).

12–13 The breaking of ties of natural affection would be another trial the disciples would have to face (cf. Mic 7:2–6; Lk 12:51–53). Only a fanatical hatred of the Gospel could bring about unnatural behavior such as these verses describe. That hatred will not be limited to relatives, but "all men will hate you" (v.13).

Testing will be another feature of the last times. Not all will stand the test, but he who endures to the end of his or her life will be saved. Jesus is not here setting forth a doctrine of salvation by works. He is rather emphasizing that genuine faith will issue in Christian living that will endure trial and persecution (cf. 2Ti 2:12). This section with its warning and encouragements, must have had special relevance for the life situation of the Roman church.

Since some of these verses occur elsewhere in Matthew (see 10:17–22) and Luke (12:11–12; 21:12–17), Jesus probably gave these sayings on more than one occasion, or possibly Mark collated various sayings of Jesus from other contexts here because of their relevance.

5. The abomination that causes desolation and the necessity of flight (13:14–23)

14a This is one of the most difficult verses in Mark's gospel if not in the entire NT. The key phrase is "abomination that causes desolation," an expression derived from Daniel (cf. Da 9:27; 11:31; 12:11). The first word of the phrase, "abomination" (GK 1007), suggests something repugnant to God, while "desolation" (GK 2247) suggests that because of the abomination the temple is left deserted. The holy and pious worshipers vacate it.

The primary fulfillment of Daniel's prophecy of the "abomination that causes desolation" is usually found in the profanation of the altar of burnt offering in the temple of Jerusalem by a representative of Antiochus IV, Epiphanes, in 167 B.C. (cf. 1 Macc 1:54–59; 6:7). The fact that Jesus used the same expression here makes it clear that its fulfillment was not restricted to the events of the time of the Maccabees. What it does refer to has been hotly debated. Some refer it to events surrounding the fall of Jerusalem, such as the military standards of the Romans brought into the temple (cf. Lk 21:20). Others see this prophecy as being fulfilled in the end times by the Antichrist (cf. Mt 24:29–30; 2Th 2:3–10).

The best solution, however, is to understand the abomination that causes desolation as having a multiple fulfillment in (1) the Maccabean period, (2) the events of A.D. 66–70, and (3) the end times.

The exhortation to "let the reader understand" is probably Mark's editorial comment.

14b–18 It is difficult to consign the admonitions of these verses to the end times, for no one will be able to flee from the judgment of God in that day. The warnings, however, make good sense in the context of the approach of the Roman army before the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. Two admonitions stress the urgency of the situation: (1) anyone on the roof of the house is not to go inside to get any belongings, and (2) anyone in the field is not to return to the house even to get an outer garment.

The outer garment was used at night to keep one warm; in the daytime it was taken off to allow more freedom of movement in working. Though the cloak would be especially useful in case of the necessity of fleeing to the mountains, where the night air is cold, the situation would be too urgent to allow one even to fetch it. A hurried flight to the mountains would be very hard for pregnant women and nursing mothers. And if the flight took place in winter it would be all the more difficult, since both the cold and rain-swollen wadis would present formidable hazards. These warnings and woes seem especially appropriate to what actually occurred at the time of the destruction of Jerusalem. The Christians in the city fled to the mountains—to Pella in Perea.

19–20 The primary temporal reference now shifts back to the End. The language here looks forward to the Great Tribulation that will precede the End. Mark uses language derived from Daniel's portrayal of the last days (Da 12:1; cf. Jer 30:7). Nowhere else does Scripture refer to the shortening of the time of tribulation. The "elect" (GK 1723) are the people of God generally.

21–23 The section (vv.5–23) ends as it began, with a warning against false Christs. A crisis like that of the fall of the city would be sure to produce many false pretenders; so will the crisis of the approaching End. These pretenders will wield supernatural power great enough to perform "signs and miracles." Yet they will not be able to deceive God's people; that is not possible, for God will guard his elect. Mark closes with another exhortation to remain alert and on guard; we must do our own part to resist the temptations of the false prophets.

6. The coming of the Son of Man (13:24–27)

24–25 Verses 24–27 form a unit and relate to the End. They are set off from the previous verses by the strong adversative alla ("but"; GK 247). Whereas the preceding verses (5–23) point to both the destruction of Jerusalem and the end times, vv.24–27 speak only of the end times. "In those days" is a common OT expression having eschatological associations (cf. Jer 3:16, 18; 31:29; 33:15–16; Joel 3:1; Zec 8:23).

The coming of the Son of Man will be associated with celestial phenomena. The imagery and language are derived from the OT descriptions of the Day of the Lord (cf. Isa 13:10; 24:23; 34:4; Eze 32:7–8; Joel 2:10, 30–31; 3:15; Am 8:9). It is difficult to know whether the poetic language here is to be understood literally or figuratively. The repeated assertion in Scripture that the end times will be accompanied by cosmic disturbances seems to imply that there will be unprecedented celestial disturbances of some sort that are literal (cf. 2Pe 3:10). The fallen world will share the same fate of judgment as sinful humans. But out of it, a new world will be born.

26–27 The celestial drama reaches a climax when the Son of Man comes in the clouds with "great power and glory." Jesus describes his coming in these verses almost entirely in the words of Scripture. The reference here is to Da 7:13, the first time our Lord definitely connects the title "Son of Man" with the Daniel prophecy (cf. Mk 14:62; see comment on 8:31).

The major emphasis of these verses is on disclosure and triumph. Whereas the Son of Man has been veiled in his first coming, now he is revealed. People will see him for who he really is, and he will come in triumph with great power and glory. His chief concern at his coming will be to bring together his people so that they may be with him. Therefore he sends forth his angels to gather the elect from all over the world.

7. The lesson of the fig tree (13:28–31)

28 In Palestine most trees remain green throughout the year, but the fig tree is an exception. In the fall it loses its leaves; and when in the spring the sap rises in its branches and the tree begins to leaf out, summer cannot be far off. This parable is essentially an antidote to despair. In contrast to the sufferings and persecutions promised in the previous verses, here the prospect of the coming of the Son of Man is offered.

29 The chief problem in this verse is the identification of "these things." Do they refer to the events surrounding the fall of the city of Jerusalem or to the events immediately preceding the end of the age? If (as seems likely) that phrase relates to "all these things" in v.30, then Jesus appears to be referring to the former; those listening to him would experience these signs in a special way when Jerusalem fell.

The next phrase may be translated either "it is near" (NIV) or "he is near." Those who interpret vv.28–31 to relate to the events surrounding the fall of Jerusalem usually identify the "it" with the "abomination that causes desolation" (cf. v.14) or the fall of the city itself. If, on the other hand, vv.28–31 are descriptive of the End, then "he is near" would be a more fitting translation, though "it" (referring to the Parousia) would also be suitable. Luke (21:31) has for "it" (or "he") the "kingdom of God."

30 Jesus' words in this verse are not to be taken lightly. Their interpretation hinges on the meaning of the expressions "this generation" and "all these things." A multiplicity of interpretations have been given to "this generation"—humankind in general, the Jewish people, Christians, unbelievers. It seems best, however, to understand it to mean Jesus' own generation. "All these things" then refers to the signs found in vv.5–23.

At the same time, however, since the Incarnation, Crucifixion, Resurrection, Ascension, and Parousia all belong essentially together, and since only God's desire that everyone repent is holding back the last stage (cf. 2Pe 3:9–10), it has always been true that the Parousia is at hand for every "this" generation. This type of thinking may be difficult for contemporary people, but seems consistent with the biblical material.

31 The certitude and absolute reliability of Jesus' words (esp. in v.30) are far greater than the apparent continuance of the entire universe (implied by the words "heaven and earth"). It will someday pass away, but Jesus' words will always have validity (cf. Ps 102:25–27; Isa 40:6–8; 51:6).

8. The necessity of watchfulness (13:32–37)

Jesus' call for vigilance pervades this paragraph—"Be on guard! Be alert!" (v.33); "Therefore keep watch" (v.35); "do not let him find you sleeping" (v.36); and "Watch!" (v.37).

32 "That day" clearly refers to the Parousia, the great eschatological day that will bring to an end "those days" (vv.17, 19, 24). Of the days that precede the time of the End, certain signs have been given; but of "that day" neither the angels of heaven nor Jesus himself knows the time. Only the Father knows that time. And Jesus, at his ascension, clearly said that it was not for the disciples "to know the times or dates the Father has set by his own authority" (Ac 1:7). A map of the future would be a hindrance, not a help, to faith. Their responsibility—and ours—is to get busy and do his work without being concerned about date setting.

Jesus' ignorance of the day or hour of his return must be understood in terms of the NT teaching concerning the Incarnation. A genuine Incarnation involved such lack of knowledge. Jesus purposely laid aside temporarily the exercise of his omniscience as part of what was involved in his becoming a human being.

33–36 God's people must remain on guard because they do not know when God's appointed time is. The Parousia could occur at any time.

The parable here has in it some of the features of that of the talents (Mt 25:14–30) and the pounds (Lk 19:12–27). Christians have both a privilege and a responsibility, though the parable does not develop these elements. Jesus applies the parable to the disciples. Like a doorkeeper who must watch because he does not know when the owner will return, they too must be on guard. Evening, midnight, rooster crowing, and dawn are the names of the four watches of the night the Romans used. "Suddenly" emphasizes that the Parousia will happen suddenly.

37 The key word of the discourse, right from the beginning (v.5), was the imperative "Watch." Now at the end it is repeated once more, but this time it is no longer addressed only to the four disciples but to "everyone." In this way Jesus shows his concern not only for the disciples but for the whole community—all his followers for whom he was about to die—and his message is "Watch!"

VII. The Passion and Resurrection Narrative (14:1–16:8 [9–20])

The conflict of Jesus with the religious leaders, which in Mark's gospel begins as early as 3:1, reaches its climax in the passion narrative and is followed by the triumph of the Resurrection on Easter morning. Since these events constitute the heart of the Christian Gospel (cf. 1Co 15:1–4), they seem to have been the first part of the story of Jesus to be written down and circulated as a continuous whole. Mark likely has incorporated this narrative into his gospel with little editorial revision.

The importance of the passion and resurrection of our Lord for the early church is evidenced by the relatively large amount of space the narrative takes in each of the Gospels and especially in Mark. Out of Mark's 661 verses, 128 are devoted to the passion and resurrection story, and a total of 242 are devoted to Jesus' last week (from the Triumphal Entry to the Resurrection). These events formed the basis of the church's witness and worship—the lifeblood of early Christianity. The witnessing church proclaimed a crucified and living Savior, and the worshiping church reflected on the meaning of these events for its inner life.

This section in Mark's gospel plays on two basic themes: suffering and triumph. The suffering of Jesus is highlighted by (1) his betrayal and denial (by Judas, Peter, and all the disciples); (2) his trial before the Sanhedrin and Pilate, with its injustice and mockery; and (3) his crucifixion with its brutality and shame. The triumph of Jesus comes through his glorious resurrection on the third day after his crucifixion.

A. The Plot to Arrest Jesus (14:1–2)

1–2 These verses introduce the passion and resurrection narrative. Passover is the Jewish festival commemorating the occasion when the angel of the Lord passed over the homes of the Hebrews on the night he killed all the firstborn sons of the Egyptians (cf. Ex 12:13, 23, 27). The lambs used in the feast were slain on the fourteenth of Nisan (March/April), and the meal was eaten that evening between sundown and midnight. According to Jewish reckoning, that would be the fifteenth of Nisan, since the Jewish day began at sundown. The Feast of Unleavened Bread followed Passover and lasted seven days (cf. Ex 12:15–20; 23:15; 34:18; Dt 16:1–8). Since the Last Supper was probably a Passover meal and took place on Thursday night, this decision to arrest Jesus must have taken place on Wednesday of Passion Week. The phrase "only two days away" is better translated as "on the second day," i.e., "tomorrow."

For a long time the religious authorities had been looking for a way to get rid of Jesus (cf. 3:6; 11:18; 12:12). Now they renewed and intensified their efforts. But it was necessary for them to proceed with the utmost caution. Since Passover (like Tabernacles and Pentecost) was one of the pilgrim feasts, great throngs of people invaded the Holy City to celebrate it. The chief priests and teachers of the law realized that it would be too risky to move in on Jesus with such a highly excitable crowd present. The possibility of a riot was too great. It would be wiser to wait for a more propitious moment—perhaps after the pilgrims had left the city to go home. God's purposes were otherwise, and this part of their plan miscarried. Perhaps the unexpected help from one of Jesus' disciples (14:10–11) changed their minds, and they decided to go through with their wicked scheme despite the presence of the Passover pilgrims.

B. The Anointing at Bethany (14:3–9)

3 This is the second time Jesus was anointed by a woman (see Lk 7:36–50). In order to highlight the contrast, Mark places this incident about the love and devotion of Mary between the hatred of the religious leaders (vv.1–2) and the betrayal of Judas (vv.10–11).

The incident took place in the home of Simon the Leper at Bethany. The occasion for the dinner is not specified. Simon was probably a leper who had been healed. The retention of the name "the Leper" would suggest this—indeed he was probably healed by Jesus. Perhaps the dinner was an expression of gratitude for this. Mark does not identify the woman who anointed Jesus, but we know from John's gospel (12:3) that she was Mary, the sister of Martha and Lazarus. The "nard" (perfume) was made from the root of a plant found chiefly in India and was very expensive. Mary took the bottle and broke the neck of the jar so that she could pour the ointment profusely over Jesus' head.

4–5 Matthew writes that it was the disciples who reacted so indignantly (Mt 26:8), while John says it was Judas Iscariot (Jn 12:4–5). Judas probably expressed the most vigorous dissent because he was the treasurer of the Twelve. Their chief concern was mercenary. The perfume had a value of more than the average value of wages for three hundred days. The mention of the poor is natural because it was customary for the Jews to give gifts to the poor on the evening of the Passover. The insensitivity of Jesus' disciples to this beautiful expression of love and devotion is amazing, especially since they had often enjoyed the generous hospitality of Mary, Martha, and Lazarus while in Bethany.

6–8 Jesus rushed to Mary's defense. Her action of anointing Jesus with a bottle of expensive perfume was a beautiful expression of her love and devotion to him, and she should not be berated. In addition he would not be with them very long, and time for such expression of love while he was still here was running out. In contrast, opportunities for helping the poor would continue. (Jesus often expressed concern for the needs of the poor: cf. Mt 5:3; 6:2–4; 19:21; Lk 6:20, 36–38; 21:1–4; Jn 13:29.)

Mary's act was also interpreted by Jesus as an anointing of his body beforehand in preparation for his burial. Was Mary aware of this aspect of what she was doing? Probably not, but it is possible that she had a greater sensitivity to what was about to happen to Jesus than the Twelve did (cf. her attention to Jesus in Lk 10:34). Jesus' statement serves as yet another prediction of his passion.

9 This pronouncement is preceded by the solemn "I tell you the truth." In an indirect way Jesus was here predicting his resurrection, because the preaching of the Gospel presupposes the Resurrection. The central message of the Good News is Jesus' defeat of sin, death, and hell by his resurrection. And anywhere in the world that Good News is preached, Mary's act of love and devotion will be remembered.

C. The Betrayal Plan of Judas (14:10–11)

10–11 These verses are connected with vv.1–2. The chief priests and teachers of the law were looking for "some sly way to arrest Jesus" (v.1), and Judas "watched for an opportunity to hand him over." Judas is identified specifically as "one of the Twelve." He had all the advantages of being in the inner circle, yet he betrayed Jesus. Spiritual privilege in itself is not enough for salvation. There must be the response of faith and love.

Judas's offer to betray Jesus was readily accepted by the chief priests and teachers of the law because, being on the inside, he could choose the most opportune time to hand Jesus over to them. In that way they could avoid what they feared most, a riot of the people. It was undoubtedly the offer of Judas that changed their minds about not arresting Jesus during the feast. This was a golden opportunity, and they were not about to lose it! Money was involved in the deal—thirty silver coins (Mt 26:15; cf. Zec 11:12–13).

What motivated Judas? Many guesses have been made—jealousy, greed, disappointment with Jesus' mission, to name a few. None of the Evangelists answers the question specifically.

D. The Lord's Supper (14:12–26)

12 Ordinarily "the first day of the Feast of Unleavened Bread" would mean the fifteenth of Nisan, the day following Passover. But the added description of the day—"when it was customary to sacrifice the Passover lamb"—makes it clear that the fourteenth of Nisan is meant (see comment on 14:1–2). The entire eight-day celebration, including Passover, was sometimes referred to as the Feast of Unleavened Bread.

The day of the week was Thursday. Jesus and his disciples were probably in Bethany (cf. v.13). Since the Passover had to be eaten within the walls of the city, the disciples asked Jesus where in Jerusalem they were to go to make preparation. There was no time to lose because the Passover meal had to be eaten between sundown and midnight.

13–16 Jesus gave explicit instructions to two of his disciples (Peter and John; cf. Lk 22:8). The "man carrying a jar of water" would easily be identified because customarily women, not men, carried water jars. He was to lead them to the house where the owner had a guest room. Jewish custom required that if a person had a room available, he must give it to any pilgrims who asked to stay in it, in order that they might have a place to celebrate the Passover. Jesus had probably made previous arrangements with the owner of the house. The upstairs room had what was necessary for the celebration: table, couches, cushions, etc. The disciples were told to get the food and prepare it, which they did.

17 Jesus and his disciples had probably spent the day in Bethany. In the evening they returned to Jerusalem. Peter and John, after making preparations, had likely returned to Bethany, a distance of only a couple of miles, and then accompanied Jesus when he went into the city in the evening. Jesus and his disciples went to the room prepared by Peter and John. Since the Jewish day began at sundown, it was now Thursday night, the fifteenth of Nisan.

18 The Passover meal was originally eaten standing (Ex 12:11). But in Jesus' time it had become customary to eat it in a reclining position.

Jesus then disclosed that one of the Twelve would betray him. "One of you!" It came like a bolt of lightning. It was almost unbelievable. But Jesus must be speaking the truth!

Jesus further identified the betrayer as "one who is eating with me." To betray a friend after eating a meal with him was, and still is, regarded as the worst kind of treachery in the Middle East (Jesus may have had in mind Ps 41:9; cf. Jn 13:18).

19 The response of the disciples to Jesus' startling disclosure was one of sadness and self-distrust. One by one, including Judas (Mt 26:25), they asked Jesus, "Surely not I?" It was an honest question coming from most of them, prompted by fear and lack of confidence in their own spiritual and moral strength. With Judas it was hypocritical and an attempt to cover his intent; for him not to have asked the question with the other disciples would have made him liable to suspicion.

20 Jesus had already given two clues as to the identity of the betrayer: he was the one of the Twelve and he was eating with them. Now Jesus gave a third clue: the betrayer was the "one who dips bread in the bowl with me" (i.e., dipping a piece of unleavened bread in the Passover sauce). This clue did not specifically reveal the betrayer but emphasized again that it was one who enjoyed the closest relationship with Jesus.

21 Behind Judas's action a divine purpose was being carried out. What was about to happen to the Son of Man would not be a chance occurrence. In all this the Scriptures (undoubtedly Isa 53; see comment on 8:31) were being fulfilled. The woe pronounced on the betrayer emphasizes the personal responsibility of Judas in his wicked deed.

The NT records four accounts of the Lord's Supper (Mt 26:26–30; Mk 14:22–26; Lk 22:19–20; 1Co 11:23–25). Matthew's account closely follows Mark's, while those of Luke and Paul have certain agreements. All four include the taking of the bread, the thanksgiving or blessing, the breaking of the bread, the saying "This is my body," and the taking of the cup. Paul and Luke add Jesus' command to continue to celebrate the Supper.

22 The bread Jesus took was the unleavened bread of the Passover meal. He first gave thanks. After that blessing, Jesus divided the bread and gave it to his disciples with the words, "This is my body." Since this saying of Jesus was separated from the cup-saying by the eating of the main part of the meal, it is best to understand it as separate from that saying. The significant action of Jesus was the distribution of the bread, not its breaking. The bread represented his body, i.e., his abiding presence, promised to the disciples on the eve of his crucifixion; and the words become a pledge of the real presence of Jesus wherever and whenever his followers celebrate the Supper. The wine (used later) symbolized his blood about to be shed.

That Jesus did not mean that the bread became his body is clear; it remained ordinary bread. Jesus often used symbolic language to speak of himself (cf. Jn 8:12; 10:11; 14:6; 15:1). What Christ wants us to do in the supper is lovingly to remember his sacrifice, to embrace him by faith, and to anticipate his glorious return.

23–24 The cup Jesus referred to is the third cup of the Passover meal, which was drunk after the meal was eaten. Again Jesus gave thanks (the verb is eucharisteo; GK 2373), from which "Eucharist" is derived). The meaning of the cup, unlike that of the bread, is clearly placed in a sacrificial context. The phrase "my blood of the covenant" echoes Ex 24:8. "Covenant" (GK 1347) signifies the relationship of God's love for us and our response of obedience, a relationship brought into existence by Christ's blood. Jesus' death inaugurated a new covenant, a new era. Jeremiah had prophesied of just such a new day (Jer 31:31–34). The blood that establishes the covenant would be "poured out" (a clear reference to Christ's death) for the entire human race (cf. Isa 53:12).

25–26 Solemnly Jesus declared that this would be his last festal meal with them till the dawn of the messianic kingdom (for the idea of the messianic banquet, cf. Isa 25:6; Mt 8:11; Lk 22:29–30). The vow of Jesus consecrated him for his sacrificial death; but it also held out the promise of victory and salvation, for he would drink the festal cup anew, i.e., with a new redeemed community, in the kingdom of God (cf. Lk 14:15; Rev 3:20–21; 19:6–9).

Assuming the meal to have been a Passover meal, it ended with the singing of the second part of the Hallel (Pss 115–118).

E. The Prediction of Peter's Denial (14:27–31)

27–28 The predictions recorded here were probably spoken by Jesus as he walked with his disciples from the Upper Room to the Mount of Olives. The verb "fall away" (GK 4997) suggests not that the disciples will lose their faith in Jesus, but that their courage will fail and they will forsake him. When the Shepherd (Jesus) is struck by God, the sheep (the disciples) will be scattered (Zec 13:7). The prediction was fulfilled. The disciples were afraid of being identified with Jesus in his trial and death, and that caused them to forsake him. This was especially true of Peter, whose actions are often representative of the rest of the disciples.

After the death of the Shepherd, however, Jesus predicted a glorious resurrection and a reunion of Shepherd and sheep in Galilee.

29–31 Jesus' prediction of failure on the part of the disciples was too much for Peter to accept, and he told Jesus that. But Jesus' reply emphasized the absolute certainty of Peter's denial. Not only did he use the "I tell you the truth" formula, but he also used the emphatic "today—yes, tonight." The denial was not only certain, it was imminent; and it would be in spite of being warned twice by a rooster crowing.

Jesus' explicit description of Peter's forthcoming denial was not convincing to him. He insisted on his willingness even to die with Jesus rather than deny him. But Peter did not know how weak he really was—nor did the rest of the disciples, for they quickly chimed in with him to declare their allegiance (cf. 14:50, 71–72).

F. The Agony of Gethsemane (14:32–42)

The story of Jesus in Gethsemane reveals his humanity with astonishing fidelity.

32–34 Gethsemane was a garden located somewhere on the lower slopes of the Mount of Olives, in which there were olive trees and olive presses. It was one of Jesus' favorite spots (cf. Lk 22:39; Jn 18:2), no doubt often used by him and his disciples as a place to be alone. Here he faced one of his most crucial tests.

Leaving the rest of the disciples behind, Jesus took with him the three of the inner circle—Peter, James, and John. He must have felt his need for their presence in this time of crisis. The two verbs used in v.33 describe an intense and deep agony in Jesus. He wanted his disciples to know something of the depths of suffering he was about to experience for the redemption of the world. Then he withdrew to be alone with his Father. Jesus' command to them to keep watch meant either that they were to stay awake and so to share in his agony or that they were to be on the lookout for those Jesus knew were on their way to arrest him. John (18:2) says that Judas knew the place where Jesus was accustomed to pray.

35–36 Jesus did not die serenely; he was the Lamb of God bearing the penalty for the sins of all humankind. The wrath of God was turned loose on him. Only this can adequately explain what happened in Gethsemane. The burden and agony were so great he could not stand up. His prayer, uttered in a prone position, was addressed to "Abba, Father." The word "Abba," is the Aramaic familiar form for father—a word the Jews did not use to address God because they thought it disrespectful. Since Jesus was the unique Son of God and on the most intimate terms with him, it was natural for him to use it. Jesus believed that with God anything was possible and therefore prayed for the cup of God's wrath to be removed from him (cf. 10:38–39). In the OT "cup" (GK 4539) is regularly used as a metaphor of punishment and judgment (cf. Isa 51:17; Jer 25:15–29; Rev 14:10; 16:19). Here it obviously refers to Jesus' death. Jesus desired the removal of the cup, but he willingly placed his will in submission to his Father's will.

37–38 Returning to his disciples, Jesus found them sleeping. They were doubtless very tired; the hour was late, probably past midnight, and they had experienced some exciting events during the long day. Nevertheless, it was a critical time, and they were expected to be awake. Jesus singled out Peter probably because he was the one who had boasted of his fidelity to Jesus (v.31), but he could not watch for even one hour.

The verbs "watch" and "pray" are both plural imperatives and are addressed to all three disciples, not just Peter. The conquest of temptation can only come through these two actions. The human spirit might be willing to do what is right, but the human body is weak (here its weakness refers to the inability of the disciples to stay awake).

39–40 Again, after having left his disciples to pray, Jesus returned to find them sleeping. When confronted by Jesus, they were speechless, probably because they were so embarrassed and ashamed. Even Peter had nothing to say on this occasion (cf. 9:6).

41 A third time Jesus left them to pray (cf. Mt 26:44) and on returning again found the disciples asleep. Once again Jesus expressed his hurt through a question. The next word (GK 600) is difficult to translate. NIV renders it "Enough!" apparently meaning "enough of sleep," i.e., it was time for the disciples to wake up. It can also mean "the account is closed" (i.e., the end has come) or "it is settled" (i.e., it was now clear to Jesus that it was God's will for him to go to the cross). Both of these are supported by Jesus' next statement, that the time of his betrayal and death had come. The "sinners" into whose hands the Son of Man was to be betrayed were the satanic agents who were to bring about his death.

42 The disciples apparently were still lying on the ground; so when Jesus heard the approach of the arresting party, he told the disciples to get on their feet. Jesus did not flee from Judas but went to meet him.

This story of the disciples in Gethsemane must have had a powerful meaning for the persecuted Christians at Rome. It helped establish the spirit that should shape their own martyrdom—to depend on God, to watch, and to pray.

G. The Betrayal and Arrest (14:43–52)

43 The fact that Judas is described as "one of the Twelve" (cf. v.20) keeps this tragic element of the story. Judas was accompanied by a crowd sent from the three constituent groups of the Sanhedrin: chief priests, teachers of the law, and elders. This was not a motley crowd, but consisted of a detachment of soldiers and some official attendants of the Sanhedrin (Jn 18:3). They came armed with swords and clubs, apparently expecting to meet with resistance.

44–46 The prearranged means of identifying Jesus was for Judas to kiss him with a lingering kiss. Perhaps since it was dark the arresting party wanted to be sure not to arrest the wrong person. Rabbis customarily were greeted by their disciples with a kiss. Thus Judas's act would not be suspected for what it really was. Judas's instructions to the crowd were designed to assure the successful accomplishment of the arrest. They were to lead Jesus away securely—with no chance of escape. Once having become involved in the wicked affair, Judas did not want to make a fiasco of it.

47 John tells us that it was Peter who wielded the sword and that the servant's name was Malchus (Jn 18:10). Apparently Peter aimed at his head; but Malchus sidestepped, and Peter only caught his ear. Jesus' rebuke to Peter (Mt 26:52) and the restoration of the ear (Lk 22:51) are not recorded by Mark.

48–50 Jesus protested against the manner of his arrest. The crowd sent from the Sanhedrin had come after him with swords and clubs, as if he were a dangerous criminal or insurrectionist of some kind. He had been teaching every day in the temple courts. They could have arrested him there. Why then had they come at night? And why had they chosen to arrest him outside the city? The obvious answer is that they feared the people's reaction to Jesus' arrest.

The circumstances of Jesus' arrest were a fulfillment of Scripture (Isa 53:12, or perhaps Zec 13:7; cf. Mk 14:27). The disciples failed to stand by Jesus and left him completely alone.

51–52 Only Mark records this mysterious episode. The "young man" is not identified, but many argue is that he is Mark. Why else would he insert such a trivial detail in so solemn a story? Was this Mark's way of saying, "I was there too"?

Ordinarily men wore an undergarment, but this young man had only an outer garment, made of linen, an expensive material worn only by the rich. He fled naked. The forsakenness of Jesus was total; even this youth forsook him.

H. Jesus Before the Sanhedrin (14:53–65)

The trial of Jesus took place in two stages: a religious trial followed by a civil one. Each had three episodes. The religious trial included (1) the preliminary hearing before Annas, the former high priest (reported only in Jn 18:12–14, 19–23); (2) the trial before Caiaphas, the current high priest, and the Sanhedrin (Mk 14:53–65); and (3) the trial before the same group just after daybreak (Mk 15:1). The three episodes of the civil trial were (1) the trial before Pilate; (2) the trial before Herod Antipas (recorded only in Lk 23:6–12); and (3) the trial before Pilate continued and concluded.

53 After a preliminary hearing before Annas (cf. Jn 18:12–14, 19–23), Jesus was taken to Caiaphas (Mark never mentions his name), with the Sanhedrin (a maximum of seventy members) present. The meeting took place in the palace of Caiaphas in an upstairs room (cf. v.66). This must have been a large room to accommodate the Sanhedrin, though Mark's use of "all" does not necessarily mean all seventy were present. Certainly there were enough of them there to constitute a quorum. Since the Sanhedrin usually met in one of the market halls, the use of Caiaphas's house may have been to ensure secrecy.

54 This verse, interrupting the flow of the narrative, prepares us for the full account of Peter's denial (vv.66–72) and indicates that the trial and denial were concurrent. Peter followed at a distance because he was afraid, but he did follow. Apparently he could not bring himself to desert Jesus completely.

Eventually he arrived at the high priest's palace. John's gospel informs us that there was "another disciple" with Peter (see comment on Jn 18:15–16). The palace was built around an open courtyard that was entered through an archway (cf. v.68). Spring nights are cool in Jerusalem, so Peter sat with the guards and warmed himself before a charcoal fire (cf. Jn 18:18). From where he was sitting, he could see the upstairs room where the Sanhedrin was meeting to decide Jesus' fate.

55–56 Just how rigged the trial of Jesus was is made clear by these verses. Though it was late at night, many false witnesses were available. But a problem developed—the witnesses could not agree with one another! According to the OT law (Nu 35:30; Dt 17:6; 19:15), it was necessary in cases that required the death penalty to have two witnesses. These witnesses must, however, give consistent evidence. The smallest inconsistency was sufficient to discredit them. As is always true when witnesses testify falsely, there was no consistency in their testimony; this fact frustrated the court's wicked intent.

57–59 Soon a definite charge was made. Jesus had said he would destroy this "man-made temple" and build another "not made by man" in three days (compare Jn 2:19 with Mk 13:2). The charge, however, proved invalid because again the testimony of the witnesses was inconsistent.

60–61 The situation had become extremely tense. There were plenty of witnesses, but they could not pass the test of Dt 17:6. Finally, in exasperation, the high priest stood up in the Sanhedrin to interrogate Jesus himself. Caiaphas apparently wanted Jesus to respond to the charges made against him in the hope of provoking an incriminating answer. But Jesus refused to give him that opportunity.

The silence of Jesus to the first questions prompted the high priest to ask him another, based on the fact that the religious authorities either knew or suspected that Jesus regarded himself as the Messiah. "Son of God" was understood by the Jews of Jesus' time solely in a messianic sense; and since the Messiah in Jewish expectations was to be a man, the question of the high priest was about Jesus' claim to messiahship and had nothing to do with deity. The question proved to be a stroke of genius. Blasphemy was a capital crime. Perhaps Jesus' own testimony about himself could effect an accusation.

62 Jesus replied with a straightforward "I am." Note the sharp contrast to his deliberate avoidance of calling himself the Messiah or having others proclaim his messiahship up to this point in his ministry. He clearly did this not because he had no consciousness of being the Messiah. Rather, he avoided the messianic claim because of the false concepts of messiahship that were popular in his day and with which he did not want to be identified (see comment on 1:43–44). Now, however, the time of veiledness had passed. He was ready to state unequivocally his messiahship.

Jesus' affirmation of messiahship is followed by a Son-of-Man saying that brings together Da 7:13 and Ps 110:1. The two main ideas are the enthronement of the Son of Man and his eschatological coming. Jesus was looking to the future, beyond the Crucifixion and the Resurrection, to the Ascension, when he would take his place at the right hand of God—the place of authority—and to his Parousia, when he will come again in judgment (Rev 1:7).

63–64 The tearing of one's clothes was originally a sign of great grief (cf. Ge 37:29; 2Ki 18:37). The action of the high priest showed that he had just heard a blasphemous statement. Blasphemy was considered not only the overt and definite reviling of the name of God (cf. Lev 24:10–23) but also any affront to the majesty and authority of God (cf. Mk 2:7; 3:28–29; Jn 5:18; 10:33). Caiaphas understood Jesus' claim in the latter sense and therefore considered it blasphemy. All the members of the Sanhedrin concurred with his judgment and condemned Jesus "as worthy of death" (cf. Lk 24:14; Mk 10:33).

65 The decision that Jesus deserved the death penalty was the signal for the Sanhedrin to release their pent-up hostilities against him. Spitting and hitting were traditional means of expressing rejection and repudiation (cf. Nu 12:14; Dt 25:9; Job 30:10; Isa 50:6). The demand to "prophesy" meant for Jesus to say who hit him (see Mt 26:88; Lk 22:64). This was their way of trying to make a mockery of Jesus' messianic claims because a rabbinic interpretation of Isa 11:2–4 stated that the Messiah could judge by smell and did not need sight. Jesus refused to respond to their vicious jests. When the Sanhedrin had had its fill of brutality and mockery, they turned Jesus over to the guards, who continued the beatings.

I. Peter's Denial of Jesus (14:66–72)

66–68 While all the mockery and beating werehappening, Peter remained below in the courtyard, waiting to see what would happen to Jesus. The fact that Peter was there at all indicates that he loved Jesus and was concerned about him, but his love did not stand the test of fear. As Peter stood in the light of the fire, warming himself, a servant girl recognized him as part of a group whose leader was Jesus. Her contempt for Jesus is revealed in the order of the words she used to speak about him—"that Nazarene, Jesus." Peter denied the charge by a denial formula common in rabbinical law. Fearful of being identified and apprehended, Peter retreated into the archway that led into the street. He was now anxious for his own safety. Yet he still could not bring himself to abandon Jesus completely.

69–72 Peter's retreat to safety was short-lived. The servant girl saw him slip into the entryway and reiterated her contention—this time to the guards and others in the pay of the high priest. Peter's second denial was not convincing. Then, not the servant girl, but the others, apparently having their suspicions aroused by her and detecting Peter's Galilean accent (Jesus was known to have come from Galilee), accused him. Peter was now like a cornered animal. He called down curses on himself if he was lying and swore that he did not know Jesus at all. The first two times Peter had denied being identified with Jesus. The last time he denied Jesus himself.

The third denial was followed by the second crowing of the rooster and a look from Jesus (Lk 22:61). The first time the rooster crowed, Peter's conscience was not awakened. This time he remembered what Jesus had said about his denial of him, and he burst into tears.

Through this story, Mark was warning the persecuted church in Rome for whom he was writing. If denial of Jesus Christ was possible for an apostle—and one of the leaders of the apostles at that—then they must be constantly on guard lest they too deny Jesus. The end of the story also provided assurance that if anyone did fail Jesus under the duress of persecution, there was always a way open for repentance, forgiveness, and restoration (cf. 16:7).

J. The Trial Before Pilate (15:1–15)

1 What seems to be spoken of here is not another gathering of the Sanhedrin but the final stages of the meeting that had begun late the night before. They now made a resolution to accuse Jesus before the civil authority, not of blasphemy, but of high treason. The Roman government would not have considered blasphemy a punishable crime. It had to do with the Jewish religion, and this was of little or no concern to the Roman authorities. But high treason was a crime they could not overlook. Note the irony of the situation. Jesus, who disappointed the crowds for failing to lead a political revolution, was now being charged with that very crime.

The members of the Sanhedrin then led Jesus away and handed him over to Pilate. The official residence of the Roman governors of Judea was at Caesarea on the Mediterranean coast. Whenever they came to Jerusalem, they occupied the palace of Herod, where the trial of Jesus before Pilate took place (the Praetorium of v.16). Early in the morning, because that is when Pilate held trials, Jesus was led to Herod's palace. This explains why the Sanhedrin held their session late at night and very early in the morning.

2 Pilate's first question to Jesus—"Are you the king of the Jews?"—shows that the charges against Jesus had already been made known to him. According to Luke, the Sanhedrin brought before Pilate three charges against Jesus: (1) he is "subverting our nation"; (2) he "opposes payment of taxes to Caesar"; and (3) he "claims to be Christ, a king" (Lk 23:2). Pilate was primarily interested in the third accusation. Jesus' answer to Pilate's question in effect said, "Yes, I am the king of the Jews; but your concept of what that means and mine are poles apart."

3–5 The chief priests were now taking the lead in the attack against Jesus. Jesus, however, in his majestic serenity, refused to defend himself. His composure in the face of vicious accusations completely amazed Pilate.

6 The custom referred to here of releasing a prisoner at the Passover Feast is unknown outside the Gospels. Other documents confirm, however, that it was a Roman custom elsewhere and could well have been a custom in Palestine.

7–8 There apparently had been an uprising in the city of Jerusalem (cf. Lk 23:19), and one of the insurrectionists was a man named Barabbas (his first name may have been Jesus). He and his fellow insurrectionists had been thrown in prison for revolution and murder. Barabbas was probably a member of the sect of the Zealots, who deeply resented the Roman occupation of Palestine. The crowd apparently came to Pilate's tribunal for the primary purpose of asking for Barabbas's release. It was Pilate who deliberately faced them with the choice between Jesus and Barabbas.

9–10 The question of Pilate implies that the crowd had asked for the release of Jesus (perhaps Jesus Barabbas?). It is possible that Pilate mistook the crowd's request for releasing Jesus Barabbas as a request for releasing Jesus of Nazareth. Pilate, of course, used the title "king of the Jews" contemptuously (as in 15:2). He was too shrewd a politician to believe that the chief priests had handed Jesus over to him out of loyalty to Caesar! He reasoned, and rightly so, that they envied Jesus' popularity and influence with the people.

11 Pilate had attempted to deflect the purpose of the crowd and substitute the release of Jesus instead of Barabbas. This was a serious threat to the murderous purposes of the chief priests. They were not about to allow Jesus to slip through their fingers through some Passover Feast clemency custom. No other alternative was open to them but to urge the crowd to force Pilate to carry out their original request—the release of Jesus Barabbas, not Jesus of Nazareth.

12–14 Pilate's question is surprising (v.12). Apparently he held out other options than crucifixion for Jesus. If Barabbas was to be released, what should he do with Jesus? Was he suggesting the possibility of releasing Jesus too? Whatever was going through his mind, it is clear that he was reluctant to carry out the murderous intent of the chief priests. But his attempt to change the mind of the crowd failed. The chief priests had stirred them up to a frenzy. "Crucify him!" they shouted. And when Pilate, in a final attempt to save Jesus, asked, "Why? What crime has he committed?" the crowd, now a mob, ignored his question. They had reached a stage where they were beyond reason. No death for Jesus but crucifixion would satisfy them.

15 Pilate saw that he could not change the mind of the mob. He would have to go through with Jesus' crucifixion. According to historical sources, his previous handling of matters relating to the Jews' religion had not endeared him to the people. To risk alienating them in this crisis would be too dangerous for him politically. His wife's message may have made him think more deeply about Jesus than he might otherwise have done (Mt 27:19). So to protect his own interests and placate the priests and the people, he released Barabbas and ordered Jesus flogged.

Since flogging did not necessarily precede crucifixion, Pilate was probably still hoping he could dissuade the crowd from their demand for Jesus' crucifixion (cf. Jn 19:1–7). Flogging was no light punishment. The Romans first stripped the victim and tied his hands to a post above his head. The whip was made of several pieces of leather with pieces of bone and lead embedded near the ends. Two men, one on each side of the victim, usually did the flogging. The Jews mercifully limited flogging to a maximum of forty stripes; the Romans had no such limitation. It is not surprising that victims of Roman floggings seldom survived.

Even that did not satisfy the crowd, so Jesus was handed over by Pilate to be crucified. The use of the phrase "handed over" (GK 4140) may be a deliberate attempt to identify Jesus with the Suffering Servant of Isa 53:6, 12, since these words are used there (in the LXX) of the Servant.

K. The Mocking of Jesus (15:16–20)

16 The scourging of Jesus took place out in front of the palace of Herod and in the presence of all the people. Afterward Jesus was taken by the soldiers into the "palace" ("the Praetorium"). "Praetorium" is a Latin loan word in Greek, here designating the Roman governor's official residence in Jerusalem (see comment on 15:1). The soldiers who led Jesus into the palace and then mocked and manhandled him were a part of the auxiliary troops Pilate had brought up to Jerusalem from Caesarea. They were non-Jews recruited from Palestine and other parts of the empire. Mark says the whole company took part in their perverted humor.

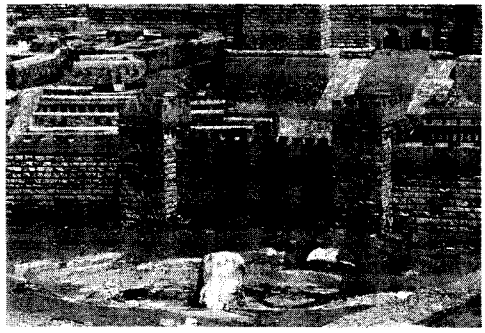
17–18 The soldiers thought it was a great joke that this gentle Jew claimed to be a king. So they took a purple robe, a symbol of royalty, and threw it across his shredded and bleeding back. The crown was made of some kind of prickly plant such as abounds in Palestine. This they pressed into his scalp. Again there must have been copious bleeding because the scalp is one of the most vascular areas of the body. They mocked him with a parody of "Hail, Emperor Caesar!"



19 The mocking was followed by further physical violence. The blows hitting his head from the staff drove the thorns more deeply into Jesus' scalp and caused even more profuse bleeding. They also kept spitting on him, and the climax came when they mockingly fell on their knees and paid homage to him. It is difficult to imagine a greater demonstration of insensitivity and cruelty.

20 At last, tiring of their sadism, the soldiers tore the robe from Jesus' back. The fabric had probably stuck to the clots of blood and serum in the wounds. Thus when it was callously ripped off him, it caused excruciating pain, just as when a bandage is carelessly removed. Jesus' own clothes were now put back on him.

In John's account Pilate makes one final appeal to the crowd by bringing the badly beaten Jesus out (see comments on Jn 19:4–5, 12–16). Perhaps he wanted to appeal to their sympathy. But Satan was controlling them. The scourging was not enough, so Pilate acquiesced to their bloodthirsty cries.

L. The Crucifixion (15:21–32)

21 Men condemned to die by crucifixion were customarily required to carry the heavy wooden crosspiece on which they were to be nailed to the place of execution. Jesus started out carrying his cross (Jn 19:17), but it proved too much for him. One can hardly imagine the pain caused by the rough heavy beam pressing into the lacerated skin and muscles of Jesus' shoulders. The scourging and loss of blood had so weakened him that he could not go on, so they randomly apprehended one Simon of Cyrene and forced him into service. Simon was no doubt a Jew and was on his way to the city of Jerusalem for the Passover celebration. Mark probably mentions Simon's two sons Alexander and Rufus because they were known to the Roman church (cf. Ro 16:13).

22 Both Roman and Jewish executions were customarily performed outside the city (cf. Jn 19:20). "Golgotha" is a slightly modified transliteration of the Aramaic word for skull, whereas the name "Calvary" is derived from calva, the Latin word for skull. How this site was named Golgotha is not known. The common conjecture is that the place looked like a skull. The traditional site is located inside the famous Church of the Holy Sepulchre, which is within the present walls of the city. Recent archaeological excavations tend to support the historicity of the traditional site by showing that it was once outside the city walls.

23 Someone offered Jesus wine mixed with myrrh when he arrived at the place of execution. It must have been needed to deaden the pain (see comment on Mt 27:33–34 for another explanation). Jesus refused the drink, choosing rather to experience the terrible sufferings of the Crucifixion with his senses intact.

24 Mark simply says, "And they crucified him." What incredible restraint! Especially when one considers that crucifixion was, as Cicero said, "the cruelest and most hideous punishment possible."

Death by crucifixion could come very slowly (see comment on Mt 27:32–44). If the victim was slow in dying, his legs would be broken by a club to hasten suffocation. Jesus had been so brutally beaten and lost so much blood that when the soldiers came to him to see whether they would have to break his legs, he was dead already (cf. Jn 19:31–33).

Jesus' clothes had been removed when he was nailed to the cross. They were now in the hands of the soldiers, who proceeded to while away their time by casting lots for them (cf. Ps 22:18).

25 Mark says that Jesus was crucified the third hour, i.e., 9:00 A.M. This conflicts with John's account, which says that the trial before Pilate was not quite over by the sixth hour, i.e., 12:00 noon, therefore implying that the Crucifixion took place later still.

Perhaps an early copyist has confused a Greek Γ—the letter that stands for three—with a F—the letter that stands for six. Or else v.25 may be a gloss; i.e., it was added by an early copyist. This is a possibility since both Matthew and Luke do not include this verse, and they ordinarily follow Mark's indications of time in the passion narrative (but see also comment on Jn 19:14–15).

26 A wooden board stating the specific charge against a condemned man was commonly fastened on the cross above his head. Over Jesus' head was placed the inscription "THE KING OF THE JEWS." The Gospels do not agree on the precise wording of the inscription, but they all assert that Jesus was crucified on the charge of claiming to be the King of the Jews. For the Romans, this was high treason.

27 The two criminals, probably insurrectionists (see comment on Mt 27:16), were crucified on either side of Jesus (cf. 15:7). They had probably been involved with Barabbas and had been sentenced at the same time as Jesus. His placement between the two criminals was probably to mock him as the insurrectionist par excellence.

29–30 The Crucifixion obviously took place in a public area, perhaps beside a thoroughfare where people were coming and going. As they passed by, they took the opportunity to vent their hostility on Jesus, using words that echo the OT (cf. Ps 22:7; La 2:15). They particularly remembered the charge made against him of destroying and rebuilding the temple (cf. 14:58), and they threw that into his teeth. Surely if he could destroy and rebuild the temple, he could save himself now!

31–32 The chief priests and teachers of the law were also there to add their mockery to that of those who passed by. This must have been especially difficult for Jesus to bear. As the spiritual leaders of the people, they should have championed Jesus' cause; instead, they had condemned him and demanded his crucifixion. Yet in their mockery, they unconsciously bore witness to his miraculous powers: "He saved others" —a reference to his healing miracles and perhaps the raising of Lazarus. Their statement "he can't save himself" is both false (he had the power to save himself) and true (if Jesus was to fulfill his messianic mission, he could not save himself).

The epithet "This Christ, this King of Israel" is full of derision. The religious leaders were mocking his claim to be the King of the people of God. And they tauntingly demanded a demonstration of his power—"come down from the cross, that we may see and believe." Jesus also had to bear the insults of the criminals who were crucified on either side of him (but see also Lk 23:39–43).

M. The Death of Jesus (15:33–41)

33 All three Synoptic Gospels report the darkness; none says what caused it. Perhaps it was dark clouds obscuring the sun or a black sirocco—a wind that comes in from the desert, not uncommon in Jerusalem in the month of April. Whatever its cause, it lasted for three hours (12:00 noon to 3:00 P.M.) and covered the entire land of Judah. There can be little doubt that Mark understood the darkness as God's supernatural act and associated it with his judgment.

34 This is the only one of Jesus' seven words from the cross Mark records (probably spoken in Hebrew). The meaning of the cry of agony "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" (Ps 22:1), lies beyond human comprehension. Some have felt that Jesus' cry of dereliction shows his utter agony in tasting for us the very essence of hell, which is separation from God. The cry undoubtedly reflects something of the depth of meaning of Paul's statement in 2Co 5:21: "God made him who had no sin to be sin for us."

35 The ignorant and heartless bystanders mistook the first words of Jesus' cry to be a cry for Elijah. Elijah, regarded as the forerunner and helper of the Messiah (see comments on 9:4, 11), was also regarded as a deliverer of those in trouble. So tauntingly they said, "Listen, he's calling Elijah."

36 Mark does not identify the person who went to get the wine vinegar, though most likely it was one of the soldiers. A sponge was filled with this wine vinegar, placed around the tip of a stick and held up to Jesus' lips so that he could suck the liquid from it. Apparently some of the bystanders wanted to prevent the soldier from giving the vinegar to Jesus (translating the first phrase as "Leave me alone"). He insisted on doing it, however, and then added his own taunt: "Let's see if Elijah comes to take him down."

37 After six hours of torture, Jesus cried out and died. Usually those who were crucified took much longer to die (cf. 15:44). The loud cry of Jesus is unusual because victims of crucifixion usually had no strength left, especially when near death. But Jesus' death was no ordinary one, nor was his shout the last gasp of a dying man. It was a shout of victory that anticipated the triumph of the Resurrection.

38 The curtain referred to was the one that separated the Holy Place from the Most Holy Place in the temple. It was torn from the top to the bottom. Mark must have regarded this as a supernatural act, though he does not assign theological significance to it (see Heb 9:1–14; 10:19–22). Since only the priests were permitted entrance into the Holy Place, this event probably became part of the tradition through the report of priests who were subsequently converted to Christianity (cf. Ac 6:7). Perhaps the experience of witnessing the tearing of the curtain in the temple prepared their hearts for receiving Jesus Christ as their Savior.

39 The Roman centurion in command of the detachment of soldiers at the cross had witnessed the scourging, mocking, spitting, crucifixion, and wagging of heads, and now he heard Jesus' last cry and watched him die. The soldier was deeply impressed. He had never seen anything like this before! He was deeply moved and drawn to the person of the Righteous Sufferer on the cross (cf. Lk 23:47). In view of Mark's opening affirmation of Jesus as "the Son of God" (1:1), the confession of the centurion at the climax of Jesus' passion takes on added significance. Whether or not the centurion realized the full import of his words, they were for Mark a profoundly true statement of the identity of the Man on the cross.

40–41 Women too were present at the Crucifixion, but they kept their distance. Mark identifies three of these women: Mary Magdalene, another Mary, and Salome. Mary Magdalene (i.e., Mary of Magdala) is mentioned only here in Mark (cf. Lk 8:2). The second Mary is designated as the "mother of James the younger and Joses." Although little is known about her, her sons were apparently well known in the early church. The third woman Mark mentions here is Salome, Zebedee's wife and the mother of James and John (cf. Mt 27:56). These three women had been with Jesus in Galilee and had served him there. They had come up to Jerusalem, along with many other women, especially to be with him and serve him.

N. The Burial of Jesus (15:42–47)

42–43 Preparation Day was the name given to the day before a festival or a Sabbath. Here it refers to the day before the Sabbath (as Mark explains for the benefit of his Gentile readers). It was now probably around 4:00 P.M., and there was not much time to take Jesus' body down from the cross. This is apparently what spurred Joseph of Arimathea into action.

Mark describes Joseph's request for the body of Jesus as a bold act, as indeed it was, because it would inevitably have identified him with Jesus and his followers. For a man in Joseph's position, a prominent member of the Sanhedrin, such an act could have serious consequences. But he was a pious man who had not consented in the decision and action of the council (Lk 23:51).

Ordinarily a relative or close friend would have requested the body, but apparently the mother of Jesus was so distraught that she was incapacitated; and all of Jesus' disciples but John had fled. There is no evidence that Jesus' brothers and sisters were in Jerusalem at the time of the Crucifixion.

44–45 Pilate was surprised to hear that Jesus had already died (see comment on 15:24). Only after he received confirmation of Jesus' death from the centurion was he willing to turn Jesus' body over to Joseph. For Pilate to release the body of a condemned criminal—especially one condemned of high treason—to someone other than a relative was highly unusual. It suggests that Pilate did not take seriously the charge of high treason against Jesus and had only pronounced sentence against him because of political expediency.

46 Mark does not mention anyone assisting Joseph in the actions described here. He must, however, have had help in removing the body from the cross, preparing it for burial, and carrying it to the place of burial in such a short time. Since he was rich (cf. Isa 53:9; Mt 27:51), he doubtless had servants to help him. Moreover, John says that Nicodemus helped Joseph and supplied some of the spices used in the preparation of the body for burial (Jn 19:39). After being properly prepared for burial (cf. Jn 19:40), it was placed in a new tomb, cut out of rock (cf. Mt 27:60; Jn 19:41).

The location of the tomb was in a garden very near the site of the Crucifixion (Jn 19:41), an area that has proven to be a cemetery during the first century A.D. Tombs cut out of the rock were closed by rolling a stone against the entrance.

47 The two Marys mention in v.40 as being witnesses of the Crucifixion were also present at Jesus' burial. Mark mentions this in anticipation of 16:1; the two women could identify the tomb on Sunday morning because they had been present at the burial.

O. The Resurrection (16:1–8)

The climax to Mark's gospel is the Resurrection. Without it the life and death of Jesus, though noble and admirable, are nonetheless overwhelmingly tragic events. With it Jesus was declared to be the Son of God with power (Ro 1:4), and the disciples were transformed from lethargic and defeated followers into the flaming witnesses of the book of Acts. The Good News about Jesus Christ is that God, by the resurrection of his Son Jesus, defeated sin, death, and hell. It was this message that lay at the heart of the apostolic preaching.

All four Gospels tell the story of the Resurrection and do so with the same dignity and restraint they use in telling the story of the Crucifixion. As the Crucifixion was a historical event—namely, something that actually happened at a specific time and place—so the tomb in which Jesus had been placed on Friday afternoon was actually found to be empty on the following Sunday morning. The explanation of this historical event, unavailable to us apart from divine revelation, was given by the young man (his white robe identifies him as an angelic being): "He has risen!" This word of revelation, the truth of the resurrection of Jesus, is the focal point in all four gospel accounts. Any claim that the Resurrection was a fabrication (cf. Mt 27:62–65) or a delusion is implicity denied.

1 When the Sabbath was over (about 6:00 P.M. Saturday evening), the three women mentioned at the Crucifixion (15:40), two of whom were also present at Jesus' burial (15:47), brought aromatic oils to anoint the body of Jesus. The anointing was not for the purpose of preserving the body (embalming was not practiced by the Jews) but was an act of love and devotion, probably meant to reduce the stench of the decomposing body. Palestine's hot climate causes corpses to decay rapidly.

2 Since it would have been too dark after the end of the Sabbath to go to the tomb, the women waited till Sunday morning, the period of time immediately after the sun rose.

3 As the women walked to the tomb, their chief concern was with the heavy stone they knew had been rolled in front of the opening of the tomb (cf. 15:46–47). Of the sealing of the tomb or the posting of the guard, they knew nothing (cf. Mt 27:62–66). Their concern with moving the stone was a real one because, no matter what kind of stone it was, it would have been difficult to move. A circular stone, though relatively easy to put in place since it was usually set in a sloped track, was very difficult to remove once established in place. It would either have to be rolled back up the incline or lifted out of the groove and then removed.

4–5 Mark makes no attempt to explain how the stone was removed. Once inside the tomb the women saw a young man dressed in a white robe; his dress suggests an angel (cf. Mt 28:2). No human eyes saw the resurrection, but angels, as witnesses of God's actions, could report what happened.

The reaction of the women to the angel was what one would expect: "They were alarmed."

6 The women's fright was calmed by words of reassurance: "Don't be alarmed." The angel knew whom they were seeking—Jesus of Nazareth. He then spoke the revelatory word, "He has risen!" and invited them to see the evidence of the empty tomb. An empty tomb, of course, invites the question, What happened to the body of Jesus? There had to be a word from God to interpret the meaning of the empty tomb, and the angel was God's gracious provision. The explanation is Resurrection! Across the centuries many other explanations have been proposed: the body of Jesus was stolen; the women came to the wrong tomb; Jesus did not actually die on the cross but walked out of the tomb; etc. Some of them have had success with skeptics. But the only adequate explanation is still what the angel said to the women who were at the tomb on the first Easter morning: "He has risen!"

7 "Go, tell his disciples and Peter" reveals how gracious was the provision God made for Peter's special need through the word of the angel. Peter is singled out because he had denied Jesus (14:66–72) and now needed reassurance that he was not excluded from the company of the disciples. Jesus had forgiven and restored him.

Jesus had predicted their regathering in Galilee (14:28). Why Galilee? Perhaps he wanted to meet not only with the disciples but also with the community of believers there to give them his last instructions before his ascension. Galilee would also be a fitting place for the launching of a Gentile mission.

8 The confrontation with the angel proved to be too much for the women. They fled "trembling and bewildered"—a natural and to-be-expected reaction. They were so frightened and confused that they were at first silent. After they had collected their wits, they did a lot of talking (cf. Mt 28:8; Lk 24:9).

If the gospel of Mark ends with 16:8, as some believe, Mark intentionally emphasizes the mystery and awesomeness of the Resurrection. The women were afraid because God's eschatological action in the resurrection of his Son had been revealed to them, an event Mark understood to be the climax of all God's saving acts and the inauguration of the time of the End.

P. The Longer Ending—The Appearances and Ascension of Jesus (16:9–20)

There are four sections of the Longer Ending: (1) the appearance to Mary Magdalene (vv.9–11); (2) the appearance to the two men (vv.12–13); (3) the appearance to the Eleven and the Great Commission (vv.14–18); and (4) the Ascension and session, and the disciples' response (vv.19–20). A discussion of the problem of the authenticity of this ending follows the commentary on vv.9–20.

9 The break in the continuity of the narrative seems to indicate that vv.9–20 were not originally a part of Mark's gospel but are rather a summary of post-resurrection appearances of Jesus composed independently. The Greek text of this verse has no subject (it is supplied for clarification by NIV), as if Jesus, not Mary, had just been mentioned. Also, since Mary Magdalene is mentioned for the fourth time (cf. 15:40, 47; 16:1), it is strange that the detail "out of whom he had driven seven demons" is for the first time mentioned here.

10–11 Mary carried out the command of the angel given in v.7. She found the disciples in a state of mourning (v.10)—but not for long. Her witness to them was that Jesus was alive, and she knew it to be so because she had seen him. The reluctance of the disciples to believe her is certainly understandable (v.11; cf. Mt 28:17; Lk 24:11). A resurrection is no ordinary event!

12–13 These verses are obviously a shortened account of the story of the two men on the way to Emmaus (cf. Lk 24:13–35). It adds nothing to Luke's account except the statement "but they did not believe them either" (v.13).

14 Again the account in Luke (24:36–44) is briefly summarized. The rebuke Jesus gave his disciples here is particularly severe—more severe, in fact, than any other rebuke elsewhere in the Gospels. One manuscript inserts a section here to tone down that rebuke.

15–16 In this rendition of the Great Commission (cf. Mt 28:18-20), the author gives an unusually wide scope for preaching (cf. 14:9). Belief and baptism are so closely associated that they are conceived of as virtually a single act. The inward reception (belief) is immediately followed by the external act or witness to that faith (baptism). The result is salvation. Refusal to believe results in judgment. One of the primary themes of this entire section (vv.9–20) is the importance of belief and the sinfulness of unbelief.

17–18 The promise of signs is not limited to the apostles, for they will accompany any who believe. The apostles' power to exorcise demons is to be shared by other believers. Speaking in tongues is not mentioned elsewhere in the Gospels and seems to reflect a post-Pentecost situation. Lk 10:19 speaks of trampling on snakes but not of picking them up with one's hands (v.18; cf. Ac 28:3–6). The drinking of poison without harm is unknown in the NT. Anointing the sick with oil is mentioned in 6:13, but no laying on of hands by the apostles occurs in the Gospels (cf. Ac 28:8).

19–20 "After the Lord Jesus had spoken to them" may refer to vv.15–18 or to some other occasion. The Ascension had been predicted by Jesus (cf. 14:7) and was witnessed by the apostles (cf. Ac 1:9); his sitting at God's right hand was a matter of faith but firmly believed and preached in the early church (cf. Ac 2:33–35; 7:56).

There is nothing like v.20 in any of the Gospels. It sounds more like a summary statement from the book of Acts of the activities of the apostles.

The Ending of the Gospel of Mark

The gospel of Mark has four different endings in the manuscript tradition, but only two have any significant claim to authenticity: (1) the ending that concludes the gospel with v.8 and (2) the so-called Longer Ending (vv.9–20).

1. External evidence

According to most contemporary scholars, the oldest and best attested manuscripts and versions, plus principles of textual criticism, tend in the direction of ending Mark with v.8. The external evidence seems to indicate that the Longer Ending was in circulation by the middle of the second century and was probably composed in the first half of the same century.

2. Internal evidence

a. Vocabulary. Of the 75 significant words in vv.9–20, 15 do not appear elsewhere in Mark and 11 others have a different meaning. In other words, more than a third of the words are non-Markan. The marked difference in vocabulary between 16:9–20 and the rest of Mark's gospel makes it difficult to believe that they both came from the same author.

b. Style. Here the argument against Markan authorship of vv.9–20 is even stronger. The connection between v.8 and vv.9–20 is abrupt and awkward. Verse 9 begins with the masculine nominative participle anastas, which demands for its antecedent "he," i.e., Jesus; but the subject of the last sentence of v.8 is the women, not Jesus. Mary Magdalene is referred to as if she had never been mentioned before; yet she appears three times in the crucifixion, burial, and resurrection narratives that immediately precede. The angel at the tomb spoke of a post-resurrection appearance in Galilee to the disciples, but Jesus' appearances in vv.9–20 are confined to Jerusalem and its immediate vicinity. All these factors weigh heavily against the Longer Ending.

3. Content

It is in the area of content that the most serious objections are found. The first has to do with the severe rebuke by Jesus of his disciples. Nothing like this is found in the rest of Mark's gospel (see commentary on v.14). The second relates to the "signs" of vv.17–18. Nowhere else do the Scriptures promise immunity from snakes and poisons, certainly not in the Gospels. It is doubtful that the Lord would have promised this unconditionally to all believers.

One final question arises: Did Mark actually intend to end his gospel at 16:8? Although some defend this view, it does not adequately explain (1) why the early church felt so strongly its lack of completion, witnessed by the insertion of both the Shorter and Longer endings; (2) why a book that purports to be the "good news about Jesus Christ" should end with the women being afraid; and (3) why it records no fulfillment of Jesus' promised resurrection appearances to Peter and the other disciples (cf. 16:7).

Thus the best solution seems to be that Mark did write an ending to his gospel but that it was lost in the early transmission of the text. The endings we now possess represent attempts by the church to supply what was obviously lacking.

Luke

INTRODUCTION

Had modern methods of book publishing been available in the first century, the books of Luke and Acts might have been found standing side by side in paperback editions on a bookseller's shelf as two books from the same author. Possibly they would have been bound together in one hardback volume. One can picture Gentile readers going from adventure to adventure, delighting in the story of Paul's shipwreck and learning something of the Gospel of Jesus Christ through reading the various speeches. Likewise the gospel of Luke contains narratives and sayings of Jesus cast in a variety of literary forms. They, in turn, would have interested their friends in reading Luke-Acts.

1. Authorship

The present work is called a gospel (for comments on this literary form, see the Introduction to Mark, "Literary Form." It has traditionally been attributed to Luke.

The unique relation of Luke to Acts sets the authorship of Luke apart from the problem of the authorship of the other gospels. The following facts point to a common author for both works: (1) Both Luke and Acts are addressed to an individual named Theophilus (Lk 1:3; Ac 1:1); (2) Acts refers to a previous work (1:1), presumably the gospel of Luke; (3) certain stylistic and structural characteristics are common to both books and point to a single author; and (4) not only do the two volumes have a number of themes in common, but some of them receive distinctive emphases in this third gospel that are not found elsewhere in the NT.

The author of this gospel indicated that he was a second-generation Christian who was investigating the traditions about Jesus. As for the book of Acts, the author associated himself with Paul in the well-known "we passages" (Ac 16:10–17; 20:5–15; 21:1–18; 27:1–28:16). The use of the first person plural in the "we passages" certainly does not prove that Luke was the author of Acts, but it does accord with other data that we know about Luke. Paul himself mentioned Luke as a companion in Col 4:14; Phm 24; and 2Ti 4:11.

The tradition of the early church is consistent in attributing the third gospel to Luke. Already in A.D. 135 Marcion acknowledged Luke as the author of the third gospel. This tradition was continued in the Muratorian Canon (c. A.D. 180) and was affirmed by Irenaeus (A.D. 180) and successive writers.

Such passages indicate that Luke was a physician, that only he was with Paul during his final imprisonment, and that he was likely a Gentile (cf. Col 4:10–11). The tradition also informs us that Luke came from Antioch in Syria. This is generally accepted, not on its own authority, but because of Luke's involvement with the church in Antioch.

2. Purpose

Why did Luke write this two-volumed work? The answer must be based on a consideration of the prologue to the gospel (1:1–4), of the apparent purposes of Acts (see introduction to Acts), of the major themes and theology of the gospel of Luke (see that section below), and of its life situation.

Luke probably had several purposes in his writing. Certainly one clear purpose, evident in Lk 1:1–4, is evangelism. Central to both Luke and Acts are the theme and theology of salvation and the frequent proclamation of Good News. Luke supports the message about Jesus with eyewitness accounts (e.g., Lk 1:;, Ac 10:39) and proofs from prophecy (Ac 10:43), hoping to confirm the faith of Theophilus.

Luke seems concerned with recording the early history of Christianity as a means of forwarding the Christian movement. One likely goal he had in mind was to defend Christianity as a religion set in the Roman Empire. Jews had certain legal rights under the Roman Empire, and Luke may have written to demonstrate that Christianity should also have the same rights as Pharisaism and the other sects of Judaism. For example, at his trials Paul tried to identify himself with Judaism, especially with Pharisaism. He himself called Christianity a "sect" in Ac 24:14, a term used in the accusation against him in v.5.

3. Intended Readership

Any conclusions as to the readership of the gospel must be drawn primarily from the prologue (1:1–4) and secondarily from analyzing the gospel itself. As to the first, see the commentary on 1:1–4 for remarks about Theophilus. The previous section indicates that while Luke-Acts had an appeal to the non-Christian, Luke expected and desired it to be read by Christians, especially new converts. It is plausible that he had the God-fearers in mind—Gentiles at home in secular society, interested in Judaism, monotheistic by conviction, and accustomed to hearing the Jewish Scriptures read in the synagogue.

4. Literary Characteristics

Luke's Greek is some of the finest and richest in the NT, though it is combined with certain features of a Semitic style. This includes expressions characteristic of Hebrew, Aramaic, or both, and Septuagintisms. These characteristics occur more often in Lk 1 and 2 and in Ac 1–15 than in the rest of the books. There are fewer of these features in the "we passages."

What probably accounts for this style is that Luke was a Gentile who had a long exposure to Semitic idioms and unconsciously adopted a Septuagintal style, possibly through association with Paul. At times he may have been using a source with a tradition that went back to a Semitic original.

5. Method of Composition

The first written gospel in the NT form was probably Mark (see the introduction to Mark). Matthew apparently had access to Mark as well as other traditions that contained sayings of Jesus. These other traditions are referred to by scholars as "Q" (see the introduction to Matthew and "The Synoptic Gospels" in EBC 1:501–14). In addition to Mark and Q, Luke also seems to have had his own special sources(s), containing material not found in the other gospels (e.g., 1:5–2:52).

In Luke's use of his sources, he undoubtedly made various changes in style and emphasis, but we must take care not to assume that he changed or slanted material that was not true to those sources. There is no question but that each of the Gospels contributes a distinctive perspective on the life and teachings of the Lord Jesus. It is to the enrichment of our total understanding of the person and work of Christ that we thoroughly investigate these distinct contributions. But extreme caution is needed lest we superimpose on the gospel the supposed conditions of the church communities at the time Luke wrote and claim that he altered what Jesus actually taught.

6. History and Geography

On the historical value of Luke's writing, the data collected by W. M. Ramsay in his well-known works and by A. N. Sherwin-White demonstrate by and large that where Luke can be checked historically, his accuracy has been validated. Furthermore, as indicated earlier, Luke's theological intentions should not be taken as invalidating his historical accuracy. Just because Luke had a theological agenda does not necessarily mean that he wrote with deliberate errors.

The terminology of Luke's prologue (1:1–4) certainly implies careful historical research. While such a claim does not prove accuracy, Luke's honesty as a writer in distinguishing himself from the eyewitnesses and the care he took to provide an orderly, accurate account cannot be overlooked. Historians in the ancient world were, contrary to what many have thought, interested in accurate reporting. Even where there seem to be historical inaccuracies, solutions are available to the problems presented (discussed in the commentary).

7. Date

The dating of Luke depends largely on three factors: (1) the date of Mark and Luke's relationship to it, (2) the date of Acts, and (3) the reference to the destruction of Jerusalem in ch.21.

First, the date of Mark is, of course, relevant only if Luke used Mark as one of his sources. That probability is strong enough to assume here. With rare exceptions, scholars today hold that Mark was written by about A.D. 70, probably probably as early as A.D. 60 (see the introduction to Mark).

Second, the issues surrounding the date of Acts are more complex (see the introduction to Acts). Presumably Luke completed his gospel before writing Acts. The main considerations in the dating of Acts relate to the time of Paul's imprisonment and the date of the Neronian persecution. Acts 28:30 takes leave of Paul with a reference to his two-year imprisonment at Rome. This is generally agreed to have taken place around A.D. 60 to 62; this is the earliest possible date for Acts. The fact that there is no record in Acts of the subsequent persecution under Nero in A.D. 65 and of Paul's death at about that time suggests that Luke wrote Acts before these events. There is no hint of further hostilities between the Jews and the Romans or of the climax in A.D. 70. One might have expected Luke to cite the destruction of Jerusalem in his attempt to show the innocence of Christianity and the culpability of the Jewish rulers. On the ground of these historical matters alone, Acts can be dated anywhere between A.D. 61 and 65, probably around A.D. 63 or 64, and the gospel of Luke just prior to that.

The fact that Luke includes specific details of the destruction of Jerusalem (occuring in A.D. 70) in Jesus' prophecy recorded in Lk 21 does not prove that it must have been written after the event. After all, through both works Luke stresses the importance and centrality of Jerusalem. His gospel opens with a scene in the temple in Jerusalem; Jesus is constantly pressing toward Jerusalem; and Luke includes a lament of Jesus over the city (19:41–44). It is natural that he would pick up any tradition of Jesus' words about the fate of that city, even before the event occurred.

8. Themes and Theology

While we may never impose a theology on Luke, it is appropriate to discover from within the text itself certain emphases and themes that are characteristic of Luke-Acts. Particularly helpful in our analysis are (1) specific words that appear more frequently in Luke than in the other gospels; (2) Jesus' first preaching at Nazareth (4:16–21), providing a programmatic statement regarding his ministry; (3) coherence of certain themes (such as the messiahship of Jesus and the kingdom of God) within the gospel itself; and (4) the way in which the central part of Luke (9:51–18:14) has Jesus orienting his thinking and ministry toward Jerusalem, the city of destiny where he would die and rise again.

The following are some of the more significant topics in Luke.

a. Christology

The gospel opens with a series of birth narratives, alternating between Jesus and John the Baptist. Among other purposes, these narratives effect a contrast between the two figures. From the beginning it is apparent that Jesus is also the Son of God, born of a virgin (1:26–33). The atmosphere of chapters 1–2 is that of the OT. In them Jesus is presented in terms of messiahship (cf. 1:32b–33, 68–75). Simeon and Anna give testimony to the baby Jesus in the temple and announce that God's day of redemption has dawned, since the coming of the Savior means light to the Gentiles and glory to Israel (2:25–38). At the age of twelve, Jesus expresses his filial consciousness—his unique awareness that God is his Father (2:49).

There are hints throughout the gospel that Jesus came as a "prophet" (e.g., 4:24; 13:33; 24:19). Luke effectively focuses on the messiahship of Jesus (unlike Mark) by taking the reader directly from the question of Herod to the messianic act of feeding the five thousand (9:10–17) and then immediately to Peter's affirmation that Jesus is "the Christ of God" (9:20).

Unlike the other gospels, Luke's narrative concludes with the ascension of Jesus. This marks both the conclusion of the gospel and the beginning of Acts and is thus also pivotal in the two-volume work. Moreover, Luke makes mention of the Ascension in 9:51, at the beginning of the central section of his gospel.

b. Doxology

The prominence of the Resurrection and Ascension in Luke contributes to his "theology of glory." The descriptive term "glory" (doxa; GK 1518) is also appropriate because there is a sense of doxology—i.e., of ascribing glory to God—throughout Luke's work. Those who observe or benefit from the healing power of Christ are filled with wonder and bring glory to God (e.g., Lk 5:25–26; Ac 3:8–10). Other examples of praising and blessing God in Luke are 1:46–55, 68–79; 2:13–14, 20, 28–32; 7:16; 10:21; 18:43; 19:37–38; 24:53.

c. Soteriology

If Luke has a theology of glory, this does not mean he lacks a theology of the Cross. While the Gospel as proclaimed in the first chapters of Acts does not feature the doctrine of the atonement as we find it in Paul, the Cross is central all the same. Even before the first passion prediction of Lk 9:22, there are foreshadowings of Jesus' sufferings (2:35; 5:35). Jesus is clearly moving toward the Cross in 13:33. His words instituting the Last Supper also give evidence of his understanding of the Cross (22:19–20).

d. Salvation

The central theme in Luke's writings is salvation, focusing on the person and the saving work of the Lord Jesus Christ. The verb "save" (GK 5392) occurs in 6:9; 7:50; 8:12, 36, 48, 50; 9:24; 13:23; 17:19; 18:26, 42; 19:10; 23:35, 37, 39; the noun "Savior" (GK 5400) in 1:47; 2:11; and the noun for "salvation" (GK 5401) in 1:69, 71, 77; 2:30; 3:6; 19:9. One of the key passages is 19:1–10, which concludes with the statement that the Son of Man "came to seek and to save what was lost." The entire gospel of Luke pictures Jesus as reaching out to the lost in forgiveness (see 7:36–50; 15:3–32). The Savior whom Luke presents is one who lived among people and cared about them. He lived among people; he was crucified and actually raised from the dead.

e. The Holy Spirit

The Holy Spirit receives considerable attention in Luke-Acts. It is through the overshadowing spirit and power of God that Mary conceives the one who will be called the Son of God (1:35). The same Spirit would fill John the Baptist (1:15) and his mother, Elizabeth (1:41). The Spirit was on Simeon, and through the Spirit he gave testimony to the Messiah (2:25–35). Jesus was full of the Spirit and was led by the Spirit at the time of his temptation (4:1). The great passage from Isaiah that Jesus quoted in the synagogue at Nazareth begins: "The Spirit of the Lord is on me" (4:18). Furthermore, Jesus promised the Holy Spirit both as an answer to prayer (11:13) and in anticipation of Pentecost (24:49; Ac 1:4). The Holy Spirit, of course, has a major place throughout Acts.

f. Prayer

Not only was prayer significant throughout Jesus' life and in the early church, but it seems to have been especially important in times of transition and crisis. Only Luke records that Jesus was praying at his baptism when the Holy Spirit descended on him (3:21). He prayed before choosing the twelve apostles (6:12) and just before being transfigured (9:29). Luke 11:1–13 and 18:1–8 contain his special teaching and parables on prayer (see also 5:16; 9:18; 11:1).

g. Sense of destiny

The word dei ("it is necessary"; GK 1256) is prominent in Luke and in Acts. Jesus "had to" be in his Father's house (2:49); he "must preach the good news of the kingdom of God," because that "is why I was sent" (4:43); he "must suffer" (9:22; cf. Mt 16:21; Mk 8:31); he must finish the way appointed to him, the way that culminated in the Cross (13:33); and it was necessary for the Son of Man to be betrayed and crucified, suffering first before entering his glory (24:7, 26, 44–47). In this way Jesus occupies the central place in salvation history, fulfilling the plan of God as prophesied in the OT (see 4:16–21; 26:25–27, 44; Ac 2:15–21; 4:11; et al.).

h. Eschatology

The continuity of the true people of God and the mission to the Gentiles are part of the plan of God that is a major theme in Luke. The opening chapters of Luke emphasize the messianic promises, especially through the songs of Mary (1:46–55) and Zechariah (1:68–79). The ultimate fulfillment of these still lies in the future. Luke, in common with the other Synoptic Gospels, contains teachings of Jesus about his return and about the glorification of the Son of Man. The author records Jesus' vivid warnings against coming judgment, an encouragement to watchfulness (e.g., 12:40), and the description of the coming of the Son of Man (17:22–37), but he also warns against misguided speculation (17:20–21). Faithfulness is needed during the time the Master is away (12:42–48; 19:11–27).

Along with this emphasis on the future is an emphasis on the present reality of God's work, using the word "today" eleven times: 2:11; 4:21; 5:26; 12:28; 13:32–33; 19:5–9; 22:34, 61; 23:43.

i. Discipleship and the Christian in the world

One topic common throughout Luke is his recording of Jesus' statements on wealth and poverty. A major question is whether Jesus required the sacrifice of material possessions for salvation or for discipleship, or whether he just presents it as an ideal for those who are especially devoted. The case of the rich ruler (18:18–30) is unique. Likewise those who want to be disciples should yield up all their possessions but not necessarily disperse them (see comment on 14:33). But if this is an ideal, it is an ideal strongly taught. Luke includes Jesus' woes as well as blessings (6:24–26), which speak strongly against the wealthy. He also addresses the matter of possessions in chapter 12 and in chapter 16. In addition Acts emphasizes the sacrificial giving of the early church (2:45; 3:6; 4:32–37; 5:1–11).

Luke also demonstrates the special concern Jesus had for social outcasts, such as women (8:1–3), Samaritans (10:30–37), those who were known as "sinners" (7:36–50), and tax collectors (19:1–10).

j. The word of God

This is a more important theme in Luke than is generally realized. The first appearance of logos ("word"; GK 3364) is in 1:2: "servants of the word." Luke emphasizes the graciousness and effectiveness of Jesus' word in 4:22, 32, 36. The term is prominent in the parable of the sower (8:14–15). It is those who hear the word, retain it, and by persevering produce a crop who are truly related to Jesus. We also learn from Luke not only that the word of God in the OT is fulfilled in the life of Jesus, but also that Jesus' own words are fulfilled (e.g., 19:32: "just as he had told them"). Thus we have in the gospel of Luke the prophetic word, the authoritative word of Jesus, and the inspired words in the gospel itself.

EXPOSITION

I. Introduction (1:1–4)

The introduction to Luke is one long, carefully constructed sentence in the tradition of the finest historical works in Greek literature. It was customary among the great Greek and Hellenistic historians, including the first-century Jewish writer Josephus, to explain and justify their work in a preface. Their object was to assure the reader of their capability, thorough research, and reliability.

1 Luke begins by indicating that there was considerable interest in data about Jesus and his ministry prior to the present work. Luke does not say he himself actually reproduced material from any of the existing accounts, though that could be assumed from this and subsequent evidence. Nor does Luke speak adversely about his predecessors as if their attempts had failed. "To draw up an account" means to write a report or narrative, relating events in an orderly way.

The contents of this work are the things that have been "fulfilled among us." The word used here speaks of the accomplishment of the purposes of God in the life and ministry of Jesus.

2 In this verse Luke stresses the validity of the tradition of Jesus' words and deeds (an emphasis that occurs elsewhere in the NT; see 1Co 11:23; 15:3). Although the "eyewitnesses [GK 898] and servants [GK 5677]" may have included some of the "many" (v.1), they are mostly to be distinguished from them because they were prior to them. Witnesses are important to Luke to establish the validity of his information. The words "from the first" (probably meaning from the early days of Jesus' ministry) are tied grammatically to the word "eyewitnesses" (primarily the apostles, whose authority Luke upholds throughout Luke-Acts). These were not passive observers but "servants of the word." "Word" (GK 3364) here means the message of the Gospel, especially as embodied in the words and deeds of Jesus. In Ac 1:1, Luke combines the words "do" and "teach" when he describes Jesus' ministry. In summary, v.2 makes a serious claim regarding careful historical research that has weighty implications for our estimate of the entire gospel.

3 Luke now describes his own work of investigation and writing. The word "everything" may partially explain how his work differed from that of the "many" (v.1) and also from that of Mark—namely, in its greater comprehensiveness. He plans to start from the beginning of Jesus' ministry and to record his research accurately and in an orderly manner.

We cannot determine from this preface alone whether Luke is referring to a chronological or to a thematic order.

The identity of Theophilus is unknown. The name ("friend of God") might be either a symbol or a substitute for the true name of Luke's addressee. Theophilus was, however, a proper name, and "most excellent" naturally suggests an actual person of some distinction. He may have been Luke's literary patron or publisher, after the custom of the times.

4 Though it is not clear whether Theophilus was a believer, he had doubtless received some instructions in the faith. He had learned of both the words and the deeds of Jesus. "Taught" (GK 2994) may refer to formal church teaching (Gal 6:6), but not necessarily. For some reason Theophilus needed assurance as to the truth of the things taught him. Possibly he was troubled by denials of the Resurrection and other historical foundations of the faith that incipient Gnostic speculation was challenging.

II. Birth and Childhood Narratives (1:5–2:52)

A. Anticipation of Two Births (1:5–56)

1. The Birth of John the Baptist foretold (1:5–25)

The birth and childhood narratives in Luke have no parallel in the other gospels. This section has several distinctive characteristics.

1. It has an atmosphere reminiscent of the OT, cast in a Semitic style. Luke is thereby connecting the OT and NT periods. He does not use the fulfillment formulas Matthew used but does show that OT predictions stand behind the events he describes, using the style and vocabulary of the LXX. He also takes pains to ground the Christian message in Jerusalem and in its temple.

2. To make a connection with the OT, Luke also uses a pattern of alternation, in which attention shifts back and forth between John the Baptist and Jesus. Luke clearly identifies John as a successor to the OT prophets. Through his alternating presentations, Luke links John and Jesus, whom Luke apparently also identifies as a prophet. Since he also sees in Jesus far more than a prophet, Luke's device of alternation goes beyond comparison to contrast, with Jesus presented as "Son of the Most High" and messianic Deliverer (1:32–33, 69, 76; 2:11, 30). The structure of the section then is (1) the announcement of John's coming birth, (2) the announcement of Jesus' coming birth, (3) Elizabeth's blessing of Mary, (4) Mary's praise to God, (5) John's birth (praised by his father Zechariah), and (6) Jesus' birth (praised by the angels in heaven and by saints in the temple).

3. The appearance of angels is likewise appropriate for an account that teaches that God has acted decisively in the history of his people to accomplish our salvation.

4. The theme of joy finds expression not only in the songs (1:48–55; 1:68–79, 2:14; 2:29–32) but also in the tone of the whole passage. The Gospel is always "good news of great joy" (2:10). At the same time, the passage realistically includes a reminder both of the pain of sin and of the cost of our deliverance (see 2:35).

5–6 As has already been said, the style of this section is different from the classical style of vv. 1–4. Likewise, the method of dating differs from that used later in 3:1, where Luke is interested in establishing a more precise point of historical reference. In this verse his only concern is to locate the events in the reign of Herod (king of Judea 37–4 B.C.).

Luke emphasizes the Jewish roots of Christianity by mentioning that, not only was Zechariah a priest, but his wife Elizabeth had also been born into the priestly line. They are a truly pious couple wholly devoted to God. Their childlessness clearly did not imply any sin.

7 To be childless brought sorrow and often shame. At her advanced age, Elizabeth could no longer entertain the hope of each Jewish woman to be the mother of the Messiah. While her situation and the subsequent intervention of God had its precedents in the OT (cf. Sarah, Ge 17:16–17; Hannah, 1Sa 1:5–11), no other woman had such a total reversal in fortune as to bear the forerunner of the Messiah.

8–9 The "division" (GK 2389) was one of twenty-four groups of priests divided by families and structured after the pattern of 1Ch 23 and 24 (cf. 1Ch 24:10 and Lk 1:5). The Exile had interrupted the original lines of descent; so the divisions were regrouped, most of them corresponding to the original in name only. Each of the twenty-four divisions served in the temple for one week, twice a year, as well as at the major festivals. An individual priest, however, could offer the incense at the daily sacrifice only once in his lifetime since there were so many priests. Therefore this was the climactic moment of Zechariah's priestly career, perhaps the most dramatic moment possible for the event described to have occurred. God was breaking into the ancient routine of Jewish ritual with the word of his decisive saving act.

10 Mention of the worshipers outside not only heightens the suspense but prepares the reader for vv.21–22. They were probably pious Jews who loved to be near the temple when sacrifices were offered.

11–12 The suddenness of the appearance of the angel in the Holy Place accords with other supernatural events in Luke (cf. 2:9, 13). Only a heavenly being had the right to appear in that place with the priest. Zechariah's startled and fearful reaction is not only a natural reaction to such an appearance but is also consistent with what the Gospels say about the response of the disciples and others to the presence of the supernatural (e.g., 1:38; 5:8–10).

13 This is the first indication of prayer on the part of Zechariah. The specific petition probably refers to both his lifelong prayer for a child (probably a son) and his just-offered prayer in the temple for the messianic redemption of Israel. Actually, the birth of his child was bound up with redemption in a way far beyond anything Zechariah expected. That the prayer included a petition for a son is substantiated by the further description of the child, beginning with his name "John" (meaning "The Lord [Yahweh] is gracious"). His being named before his birth stresses God's sovereignty in choosing him to be his servant.

14–15 The description of the child's mission has a counterpart in Gabriel's words to Mary (vv.32–33); this is part of the literary device that connects and compares the roles of Jesus and John.

The "joy" (v.14) so characteristic of the day of God's salvation and so prominent in Luke came first to the parents of the forerunner, then spread to many others (cf. v.16). Note the contrast between the promised joy and Zechariah's present fear (v.12). The child will be "great" (a word also used of Jesus in v.32) as the prophetic forerunner of the Messiah (v.15). Later some would find it hard to relinquish their devotion to John to follow Jesus. They would need to realize that while both were great, Jesus was the greater (3:16). "In the sight of the Lord" indicates divine choice and approval.

It is difficult to identify John with a particular religious group simply by this description or the description in Mk 1:6. Abstinence from wine suggests the Nazirite vow (Nu 6:1–12), but no mention is made of John's hair. Nazirites were to let their hair grow (Nu 6:5). Priests on duty were expected to abstain from strong drink (cf. Lev 10:8–9); this may identify John as a priestly figure calling the people to repentance. The Spirit's control of a person is contrasted with the control wine can have in a person (cf. Eph 5:18). In the life of Jesus, the Spirit's ministry will be even more prominent than in John's life.

16–17 The OT prophets were repeatedly concerned with turning the erring people back to God. In this work none was more prominent than Elijah on Mount Carmel (1Ki 18:20–40). Luke does not here identify John as a reincarnated Elijah but qualifies his statement with the words "in the spirit and power of Elijah" (v.17). Moreover Luke uses the language of Mal 4:5–6 (cf. Mal 3:1) to compare John's ministry with that of Elijah (see comment on 9:30).

"To turn the hearts of the fathers to their children" must be interpreted with reference to both the expanded form in Mal 4:6 and the next phrase in this verse. It probably means that when those who disobey heed wisdom and turn to the Lord, their Jewish ancestors would, if they knew of it, be pleased with them. In their OT context, the words "turn the hearts," etc., relate to averting divine wrath, a concept certainly basic in the ministry of John.

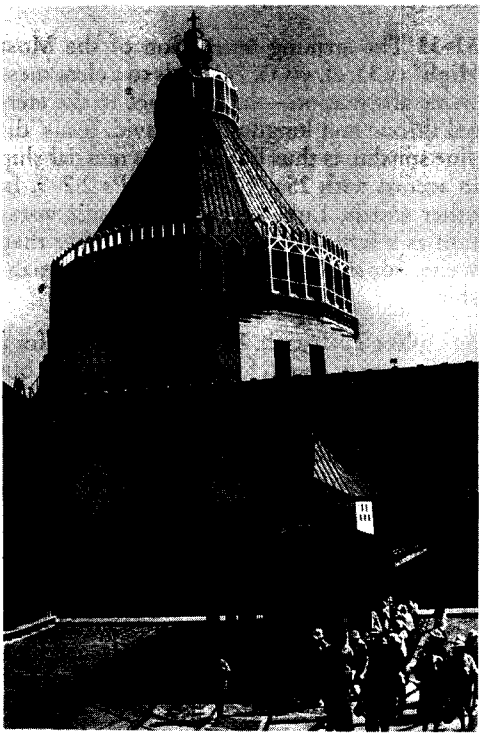
"People" (laos; GK 3295) is a significant word in Luke and usually refers to Israel as the elect nation of God. This suggestion accords with Luke's interest in Jewish origins of Christianity. The "people prepared for the Lord" ultimately includes, however, not only these initial Jewish hearers but also the Gentiles.

18–20 Zechariah's question (v.18) seems innocent, but v.20 reveals that it was asked in doubt. In contrast Mary's question—"How can this be?" (v.34)—arises from faith (v.45). Mary simply inquired as to the way God would work; Zechariah questioned the truth of the revelation. "How can I be sure of this?" apparently was a request for a sign. Though we are told that Zechariah was devout (v.6), his quest for confirmation was perilously close to the attitude described in 11:29. The Gospel requires a response of faith, and Zechariah, of all people, should have believed without question. The narrative gains solemnity by mentioning that Gabriel stood "in the presence of God." The "good news" will come to fulfillment in spite of human unbelief, but Zechariah must nevertheless bear the sign of his doubt.

21–22 The element of suspense during the unusually long prayer-time contributes to the vividness of Luke's narrative. The worshipers, who had been praying outside, now understood without anyone telling them that Zechariah had seen a vision.

23–25 As with the announcement to Mary, the word concerning Zechariah and Elizabeth's promised son was given before his conception. It is characteristic of Luke to mention Elizabeth's grateful acknowledgment of the Lord's grace in removing the stigma of her childlessness.

2. The birth of Jesus foretold (1:26–38)



Luke continues in the same style in which he has described Zechariah's encounter with the angel of the Lord. The account of Jesus' nativity rests theologically on the angel Gabriel's announcement to Mary. Luke presents the theology of the Incarnation in a holy way, congruent with OT sacred history.

Several themes are intertwined in this passage: (1) the divine sonship of Jesus (vv.32, 35); (2) his messianic role and reign over the kingdom (vv.32–33); (3) God as the "Most High" (vv.32, 35; cf. v.76); (4) the power of the Holy Spirit (v.35); and (5) the grace of God (vv.29–30, 34–35, 38).

26 The mention of Elizabeth's "sixth month" (cf. v.24, 36) establishes a link between Jesus and the prophet John the Baptist. Nazareth was a small town off the main trade routes. Its insignificant size contrasts with Jerusalem, where Gabriel's previous appearance had taken place. Jn 1:46 records the negative Judean opinion of Nazareth. Likewise, the region of Galilee contrasts with Judea. Surrounded as they were by Gentiles, the Galileans were not necessarily irreligious but many were somewhat lax regarding strict Jewish traditions.

27 The young virgin Mary contrasts with the old priest Zechariah, who was past the time for having children. The word "virgin" (GK 4221) refers here to one who had not yet had sexual relations. Since betrothal often took place soon after puberty, Mary may have just entered her teens. This relationship was legally binding, but intercourse was not permitted until marriage. Only divorce or death could sever betrothal.

Luke calls Joseph "a descendant of David." Even though the genealogy in 3:23–37 is often taken as showing Mary's line, this is never stated as such (see comments). We should probably assume that Luke considers Jesus a legitimate member of the royal line by what we today might call the right of adoption. This has an important bearing on the promise in v.32b.

28 Here Luke establishes another contrast with the preceding narrative, for Zechariah had received no such greeting as Mary did. Mary is "highly favored" because she is the recipient of God's grace (cf. Eph 1:6). Mary has "found favor with God" (v.30), and she can therefore say, "My spirit rejoices in God my Savior" (v.47).

"The Lord is with you" recalls the way the angel of the Lord addressed Gideon to assure him of God's help in the assignment he was about to receive (Jdg 6:12).

29–30 Zechariah had been "gripped with fear" (v.12) at the very appearance of the angel, but it was the angel's greeting that "greatly troubled" Mary. He responded first by assuring her that she had indeed "found favor" with God (v.30; cf. Ge 6:8). God's grace, like his love, banishes fear of his presence (cf. 1Jn 4:17–18).

32–33 The striking term "Son of the Most High" (v.33; cf. vv.35, 76) leads to a clear messianic affirmation—the reference to the eternal throne and kingdom of David. Jesus' divine sonship is thus linked to his messiahship in accord with 2Sa 7:12–14 and Ps 2:7–9. In other words, Luke sees the messianic vocation as a function of God's Son, rather than seeing sonship as just an aspect of messiahship.

34 Unlike Zechariah, Mary does not ask for a confirmatory sign (cf. comment on v.18) but only for light on how God will accomplish this wonder. Her question does not relate to the remarkable person and work of her promised Son but arises from the fact that she has not had sexual relations with a man.

Because she was betrothed, we may assume that Mary fully expected to have normal marital relations later. It is difficult, therefore, to know why she saw a problem in Gabriel's prediction. Luke's condensed account seems to suggest that Mary assumed an immediate fulfillment before marriage (perhaps related to Isa 7:14).

35 Once again (cf. v.15) Luke mentions the Holy Spirit, as he does six more times in his first two chapters (1:41, 67, 80; 2:25, 26, 27). The word for "overshadow" (GK 2173) carries the sense of the holy, powerful presence of God, as in the description of the cloud that covered the tabernacle (Ex 40:35). This word is used in all three accounts of the Transfiguration to describe the overshadowing of the cloud (Mt 17:5; Mk 9:7; Lk 9:34). Likewise, in each account the voice comes out of the cloud identifying Jesus as God's Son, a striking reminder of this verse where the life that results from the enveloping cloud is identified as "the Son of God."

The child is called "the holy one," both because of this connection with the Holy Spirit and because of Jesus' life of purity.

36–37 The angel cites the pregnancy of Elizabeth (v.36) as further evidence of God's marvelous power and concludes with the grand affirmation of v.37—surely one of the most reassuring statements in all Scripture.

38 Mary's exemplary attitude of servanthood recalls that of Hannah when she was praying for a son (1Sa 1:11). Her servanthood is not a cringing slavery but a submission to God that in OT times characterized genuine believers; it should also characterize believers today (cf. v.48). Mary's trusting submission at this point in her life may be compared with her attitude toward her Son later on (cf. Jn 2:5).

3. Mary's visit to Elizabeth (1:39–45)

At this point Luke deftly combines the two strands about Elizabeth and Mary; in it he stresses Jesus' superiority to John. Even so, the pattern of alternation continues, giving John his own important place as the prophet who goes before the Lord.

39–40 Mary apparently started on her journey as soon as possible (v.39). She probably traveled fifty to seventy miles from Nazareth to Zechariah's home in Judea, a major trip for Mary.

41–42 In this beautiful narrative, the stirring of the unborn child becomes a joyful prelude to Elizabeth's being filled by the Holy Spirit, who enlightened her about the identity of the child Mary was carrying.

43 Nowhere in the NT is Mary called "Mother of God." She was, however, the mother of Jesus the Messiah and Lord.

44–45 "Blessed" (GK 3421) describes the happy situation of those whom God favors. Elizabeth gave the blessing Zechariah's muteness prevented him from giving (see vv.68–74). In her blessing Elizabeth called attention to Mary's faith and God's faithfulness.

4. Mary's song: The Magnificat (1:46–56)

This song, commonly known as the Magnificat, has several striking features. First, it is saturated with OT concepts and phrases (especially Hannah's prayer in 1Sa 2:1–10).

Second, it shows Mary's deep piety and knowledge of Scripture. Such familiarity with the OT was not at that time unusual for a pious Jewess like Mary. Moreover, it reflects qualities suitable to the mother of the Lord.

Third, though it reveals a God who vindicates the downtrodden and ministers to the hungry, it also strikes a revolutionary note. If Hannah spoke of the poor being raised to sit with nobles (1Sa 2:8), Mary sees the nobles toppled from their places of power (Lk 1:52). Luke conveys a strong social message to us, one that is rooted in the OT and that, with cultural adaptations, is of continued meaning.

Fourth, Mary's Magnificat markedly transcends Hannah's song through its messianic element and implies Mary's consciousness of her own exalted role as the kingdom dawns (v.48).

This song can be divided into four strophes: (1) vv.46–48 praise God for what he has done for Mary, (2) vv.49–50 mention certain attributes of God—power, holiness, and mercy; (3) vv.51–53 show God's sovereign action in reversing certain social conditions; and (4), finally, vv.54–55 recall God's mercy to Israel.

46–48 The excitement of Elizabeth, who actually shouted her benediction (v.42), gives way to a restraint that is no less joyful. After an opening ascription of greatness to God, Mary acknowledges her dependence on God, her Savior. Indirectly, she acknowledged herself as a sinner needing salvation. Her words are comparable to those of Habakkuk, who came through his trials rejoicing in God his Savior (Hab 3:18). Mary's "humble state" probably refers to her lowly social position; the word does not usually convey the idea of "humiliated." For the meaning of "servant," see comments on v.38; for that of "blessed," see v.45 and 6:20.

49–50 Mary is in awe of the "Mighty One" whose great power has been exercised in her life. God's "name" is, according to the common ancient meaning, his whole reputation or character. "Mercy" (GK 1799) expresses an aspect of God's character sometimes overlooked when his power and holiness are stressed. "Fear" (GK 5828) means here, as often in Scripture, a pious reverence.

51–55 The main verbs in the next two strophes are in the past tense. They probably recall the specific times in the OT when God acted (vv.51–52). We must not, however, overlook the fact that Mary's references to the acts of God relate to the coming of the Messiah. Indeed, they may actually be predictive (as in Isa 53:1–9), though general in content.

Mary recalls God's covenant (vv.54–55). The words translated "forever" are really the final, climactic words of the song.

56 Luke gives no hint whether Mary's stay of "about three months" ended before or continued after the birth of John (cf. vv. 26, 36, 39).

B. Birth Narratives (1:57–2:20)

1. The Birth of John the Baptist (1:57–66)

57–61 These verses give the impression that no one in the neighborhood knew of Elizabeth's pregnancy. On one level, the "joy" is over Elizabeth's emergence from the shadow of childlessness; on another, it accords with the messianic joy of vv.44, 46.

Circumcision on the eighth day (v.59) was in accord with Ge 17:9–14. Luke offers no explanation as to why the child had not been publicly named at birth (perhaps it was a Hellenistic custom to wait a week). In any event there was obviously a considerable audience for the naming at the circumcision. To choose a name after a baby's grandfather or father, especially if one of them was highly esteemed, was natural (v.61). The objection from Elizabeth (v.60) was against custom and was apparently discounted, probably because she was a woman.

62–63 Luke's description of Zechariah here suggests he may have been deaf as well as mute. The relatives and neighbors made signs to which he responded on a waxed writing tablet (v.63). The present tense in the statement "His name is John" has the ring of deliberate emphasis.

64–66 His time of disability over, Zechariah's first words were words of praise. Luke goes on to stress the widespread response to the events surrounding the birth of John, just as he later stresses the fame of Jesus (e.g., 2:52). A child whose birth was attended by such marvelous circumstances would surely have an unusual destiny (v.66).

2. Zechariah's song: The Benedictus (1:67–80)

This song of Zechariah has two main parts: (1) praise to God for messianic deliverance (vv.68–75), and (2) celebration of the significant role John the Baptist will have in this work of deliverance. In both sections there is a strong emphasis on salvation, national and personal, and on the covenant and preparation that are about to be realized in their fulfillment. God's faithfulness to his covenant occupies a central position theologically in the song (vv.72–73). Once again Luke makes the connection between the Christian Gospel and its OT roots. At the end, salvation is extended beyond Israel in language taken from Isa 60.

67 Zechariah the priest now prophesies. As the Holy Spirit had filled Elizabeth (v.41), he now fills Zechariah. His previous doubt and his discipline through loss of speech did not mean the end of his spiritual ministry. Likewise, when a believer today has submitted to God's discipline, he or she may go on in Christ's service.

68 The word "blessed" (GK 2329) can refer both to a human being on whom God has showered his goodness (as in vv.42, 45) and to God, to whom we return thanks for that goodness. "Israel" is paralleled by "his people" in vv.68, 77 (see comment on 1:17).

The action is centered in two verbs: "has come"(GK 2170) and "has redeemed" (GK 4472 & 3391). The first is used for God "visiting" people in grace or in judgment (Ex 4:31; Zec 10:3; Lk 7:16). Tragically, Jerusalem did not recognize the day when God came to her (19:44). The second verb speaks of a theme that runs throughout Scripture, with the Exodus being the great OT example of rescue from enemies and captivity. Luke 24:21 shows the expectation Jesus' followers had that he would do a similar work of freeing God's people. Luke, though committed to the universal application of the Gospel, includes these words of redemption that apply especially to Israel (see esp. v.69). Not only does this reflect his emphasis on the Jewish roots of Christianity, it also underlines the political aspects of redemption foremost in the minds of Zechariah's contemporaries.

69–70 "Horn" is a common OT metaphor for power because of the great strength of the horned animals of the Near East. The word "salvation" (GK 5401) describes the kind of strength Zechariah had in mind. The power of salvation resides in the Savior. Again, the messianic theme occurs—this time in an allusion to Ps 132:17, where, in fulfilling the Davidic covenant, God "will make a horn grow for David." Later in Luke's writing, the verb "raised up" will assume great importance in relation to the resurrection of Christ (24:6, 34; Ac 3:7, 15; 4:10).

The messianic motif is further emphasized by a reference to the "house of . . . David." The mention of the "holy prophets of long ago" confirms the OT origin of and support for the messianic role of Jesus.

71–73 Zechariah cites three aspects of God's redeeming work: "salvation" (v.71), "mercy" (v.72), and the remembrance of God's "covenant." Mercy to the "fathers" seems to mean that God has not thwarted their hopes (cf. v.17). The "oath" (v.73) to Abraham in view here is recorded in Ge 22:16–18, where the Lord promised him both the subduing of his descendants' enemies and universal blessing as a result of his obedience. Therefore, the salvation in view here involves both political deliverance and spiritual blessing (cf. the next verses).

The words "covenant" and "oath" form the central point of the song, emphasizing the importance of God's covenant and his faithfulness to it. Not only does this serve as an important theme in Luke, but it also gives encouragement to us to trust the promises of God.

74–75 The fulfillment of God's promise does not mean passivity for Israel but a new opportunity for service—negatively, service

"without fear" (v.74) and, positively, "in holiness and righteousness" (v.75; cf. Mal 3:3).

76–77 The second part of Zechariah's hymn begins with a direct word to his son. The role of John derives its significance and greatness from God's purpose and, even more, from the greatness of the Person he served. Before addressing the theme of salvation, Zechariah speaks of the "Most High" and "the Lord" whom John represents.

Zechariah's description of John in v.76 clearly links him with Elijah (cf. Isa 40:3; Mal 3:1; 4:5), dispelling any doubts about the recognition of this link in Luke. While Luke does not forthrightly say that John was the prophesied Elijah, he clearly affirms that John came "in the spirit and power of Elijah" (1:17; see comment). If Elijah could still appear in recognizable form, as he did at the Transfiguration, Luke may have hesitated to include in his gospel anything about his apparent identification with John.

The theme of "salvation" (GK 5401) for God's people, expressed in political terms in v.71, now finds it spiritual identity through forgiveness. John will go on to preach "a baptism of repentance for the forgiveness of sins" (3:3).

78–79 NIV's "rising sun" (GK 424) has a dynamic quality that suits a word used in the LXX to translate the word "branch" in Jer 23:5; Zec 3:8; 6:12. Thus it has a messianic aspect and fits well with the "come" of v.68 (see comment). Verse 79 uses beautiful language from Isa 60:1–3 to carry forward the imagery of light (the sun) and to offer hope of peace to those who were then outside the faithful remnant of Judaism (cf. Eph 2:12).

80 This brief description of John's boyhood reflects Luke's interest in human beings and is paralleled by a similar statement on Jesus' personal developments (2:40, 52). John's becoming "strong in spirit" means the development of his moral character (but cf. Eph 3:16, where similar language describes a strengthening by God's Spirit).

3. The birth of Jesus (2:1–7)

In comparison with the complex narrative in chapter 1, the actual birth narrative of Jesus is brief. In it Luke stresses three things: (1) the political situation (to explain why Jesus' birth took place in Bethlehem); (2) that Bethlehem was the town of David (to stress Jesus' messianic claim); (3) the humble circumstances of Jesus' birth.

1–3 Luke clearly intends to secure the historical and chronological moorings of Jesus' birth (approximately 4 B.C.). Ironically, it is precisely this that has led some to question Luke's accuracy.

The mention of Caesar Augustus may not only be for historical background but also to contrast the human with the divine decrees. A mere Galilean peasant travels to Bethlehem ostensibly at the decree of the Roman emperor. Actually, it is in fulfillment of the divine King's plan, which, as noted passim, is reflected in Luke's frequent reference to what "must" be done.

The first census (i.e., enrollment prior to taxation) known to have occurred under the governorship of Quirinius took place later (i.e., A.D. 6) than usually reckoned as the time of Jesus' birth (cf. Ac 5:37). Many have supposed that Luke confused this census of A.D. 6 with one he thinks was taken earlier, but which lacks historical support. The most satisfactory solutions that have been proposed follow.

1. Quirinius had a government assignment in Syria about 4 B.C. and conducted a census in his official capacity. Details of this census may have been common knowledge in Luke's time but are now lost to us (cf. "Quirinius," ZPEB, 5:5–6).

2. The word translated "first" can also mean "former" or "prior." This makes the meaning of v.2, "This census was before that made when Quirinius was governor."

It was customary to return to one's original home for such a census. Herod's name is not mentioned because, powerful as he was, he was only a client king under Rome and, like others, was subject to orders for a census.

4–7 Luke does not say how long in advance of Jesus' birth Joseph left for Bethlehem nor why he took Mary with him. It is possible that he used the emperor's order as a means of removing Mary from possible gossip and emotional stress in her own village. He had already accepted her as his wife (Mt 1:24), but apparently they continued in betrothal till after the birth. The text neither affirms nor denies the popular image of the couple arriving in Bethlehem just as the baby was about to be born. Luke simply states that the birth took place "while they were there" (v.6).

The word usually translated "inn" (GK 2906) may mean a room (e.g., the "guest room" used for the Last Supper as in 22:11), a billet for soldiers, or any place for lodging, which would include inns. It is not, however, the usual Greek word for an inn.

Luke states the simple fact that when Mary's time came, the only available place for the little family was one usually occupied by animals. It may have been a cave, as tradition suggests, or some part of a house or inn. Even today in many places around the world farm animals and their fodder are often kept in the same building as the family quarters. The eating trough, or "manger," was ideal for use as a crib. Luke does not seem to be portraying a dismal situation with an unfeeling innkeeper as villain. Rather, he is establishing a contrast between the proper rights of the Messiah in his own "town of David" and the very ordinary and humble circumstances of his birth. For "cloths," see comment on v.12.

4. The announcement to the shepherds (2:8–20)

8 There may be several reasons for the special role of the shepherds in the events of this unique night. Among the occupations, shepherding had a lowly place. Shepherds were considered untrustworthy and their work made them ceremonially unclean. Thus the most obvious implication is that the Gospel first came to the social outcasts of Jesus' day. This would accord with a recurring emphasis in Luke. It may also be significant that the Lord reminded David, who was to become Messiah's royal ancestor, that he was called from the shepherd's life (2Sa 7:8). Finally, in both OT and NT shepherds symbolize all the ordinary people who have joyfully received the Gospel and have become in various ways pastors to others. As to the time of year of the nativity, Luke provides no clue.

9 First a single angel (cf. 1:11, 26) appears. The shepherds' terror recalls that of Zechariah (1:12), though theirs is related to the visible manifestation of the glory of God. Again, as in 1:13 and 1:30, the angel speaks reassuringly.

10–11 The angel's announcement includes several of the most frequently used words in Luke's gospel: "bring . . . good news," "joy," "today," "Savior," and "Lord." This shows the tremendous importance of the angelic pronouncement. It is a bold proclamation of the Gospel at the very hour of Jesus' birth. The time has come for the fulfillment of the prophetic expectation of Messiah's coming.

12 Babies were snugly wrapped in long strips of cloth, giving them warmth, protection of extremities, and a sense of security in their newborn existence. The combination of a newborn baby's wrappings and the use of the manger for a crib would be a distinctive "sign" (Gk 4958). Perhaps they also imply that in spite of seeming rejection, symbolized by the manger, the baby was the special object of his mother's care (compare this story with Eze 16:1–5). On the other hand, the "sign" might be only the strange circumstance of the newborn child being in the manger at all.

13 "Suddenly" often describes the unexpected nature of God's acts, especially the eschatological events. Malachi had predicted the sudden coming of the Lord to his temple (Mal 3:1). Now the angels suddenly announce his arrival at Bethlehem. The Spirit's coming at Pentecost was sudden (Ac 2:2), as was the appearance of the Lord to Saul on the road to Damascus (Ac 9:3).

The "heavenly host" refers here to an army or band of angels (cf. 1Ki 22:19).

14 The doxology "Glory to God in the highest" is the climax of the story. Its two parts relate to heaven and to earth respectively. In Luke's account of the Triumphal Entry, the crowds say, "Peace in heaven and glory in the highest" (19:38). Verse 14b is best translated as in the NIV: "on earth peace to men on whom his favor rests." Luke emphasizes the work of Christ on earth (cf. 5:24).

The "peace" (GK 1645) here is that which the Messiah brings to those on whom God bestows his grace (cf. 1:79). Those whom Jesus healed or forgave on the basis of their faith could "go in peace" (7:50; 8:48). Those on whom God's "favor" rests are the "little children" (10:21) to whom God reveals truth according to his "good pleasure."

15–16 Luke does not say that the angels disappeared but that they went "into heaven." The realization of God's promise is expressed both here and in v.29. In other words, Luke combines the phenomena of ancient (v.15) and recent (v.29) prophetic words, thus emphasizing the connection between the old and new ages, the Jewish orientation of the Gospel and the reality of the heavenly in the earthly.

With a heightened sense of excitement and determination, the shepherds rushed off to the baby's side.

17–18 Then they "spread the word" and became the first evangelists of the Christian era. Luke's observation that those who heard them "were amazed" is the first of his many comments on the enthusiastic response to the messianic proclamation (see vv.33, 47; 4:22; 8:25; et al.).

19–20 In contrast to the overreaction of the people, Mary meditates on the meaning of it all (cf. v.51). Just as the seventy-two disciples later returned with joy after their preaching mission (10:17), so the shepherds returned "glorifying and praising God" (v.20). It is clear that in Luke this spirit of doxology is the proper response to the mighty words of God (cf. 5:25–26; 7:16; 13:13; et al.).

C. Jesus' Early Years (2:21–52)

1. Presentation of Jesus in the temple (2:21–40)

21–24 It is important to understand the sequence and background of these events. According to Jewish law a woman became ceremonially unclean on the birth of a child. On the eighth day a male child was circumcised (cf. 1:59; Ge 17:12), after which the mother was unclean an additional thirty-three days (Lev 12:1–5). At the conclusion of this period, the mother offered a sacrifice, either a lamb or, if she was poor, two doves or two young pigeons (Lev 12:6–8). In addition, the first son was to be presented to the Lord and then, so to speak, bought back with an offering (Nu 18:15). Luke, conflating the performance of these OT obligations into this single narrative, shows how Jesus was reared in conformity with them. His parents obeyed the Lord (1:31) in naming him. The offering of birds instead of a lamb shows that he was born into a poor family. Perhaps this helped him identify with the poor of the land (cf. 6:20).

25 In vv.25–38 Luke presents two pious figures who testify to the significance of Jesus. Once again Luke assures us of the credentials of Jesus as Messiah, taking care to show that each witness is an authentic representative of Judaism.

The first of these, Simeon, is simply described as "righteous and devout" (cf. 1:6). He could be described as one of the believing remnant of Judaism, looking forward to the Messianic Age in its spiritual aspect. It is appropriate that the Spirit, who is the Consoler (cf. Jn 14:16), was upon one who awaited the consolation—the time when God would end Israel's suffering with the Advent of the Messiah (cf. Isa 49:13; 57:18; 61:2).

26–28 The same Spirit had revealed to Simeon that the Messiah would come before he died. This may imply that he was an old man.

Mary and Joseph are referred to as Jesus' "parents" (v.27) and as "the child's father and mother" (v.33). Jesus would have been considered Joseph's own son, so Luke's terminology is not inconsistent. In the genealogy, however, the particulars of the relationship had to be made more explicit (3:23). Luke notes the providential timing in that the Spirit brings Simeon to the temple courts at the same time as the family's arrival. In this touching scene, Luke again shows the presence of Jesus, now in Simeon's arms, as an occasion of praise to God.

29–32 Simeon's psalm begins by emphasizing the fact that the Messiah has indeed come. "Dismiss" here means "allow to die"; peace is again stressed (cf. 2:14). On "as you promised," see comment on v.15.

Simeon does not say that he has seen the Messiah but rather that his eyes have seen God's salvation. To see Jesus is to see salvation embodied in him, a theme already noted as prominent in Luke (cf. 1:69, 71, 77; 19:9). Luke's concern for the universal application of the Gospel finds support in the words "in the sight of all people" (cf. Ps 98:3; Isa 52:10). In v.32, not only are Gentiles and Jews put in contrast, but the same light (Isa 49:6) that brings "revelation" to pagans (cf. 1:78–79) brings "glory" to Israel (cf. 1:77).

33–35 In spite of what they already know, Joseph and Mary are amazed (v.33; cf. comment on v.17) at Simeon's song. Moreover, Simeon adds a solemn note by predicting that because of the child "many in Israel" would be brought to moral decision, some to a point of collapse and others to what can well be called a resurrection (anastasis; GK 414; NIV, "rising"). But there will be a cost to Jesus; he will be vulnerable to the hostility of unbelievers, who reject not only him but the whole of God's revelation (v.35; cf. Jn 5:45–47). This clash will inevitably wound Jesus' mother.

36–38 Luke's attention to the renewal of prophecy through Zechariah and Simeon at the coming of the Messianic Age continues with the introduction of Anna as a "prophetess." Prophetesses functioned in both OT and NT times (Ex 15:20; Jdg 4:4; 2Ki 22:14; Ac 2:17; 21:9). Apparently Anna could trace her genealogy; and, though the tribe of Asher was not outstanding (Ge 30:12–13; 35:26), Luke considered it important to show her true Jewishness. She was a familiar figure at the temple. Possibly she lived as a widow in one of the rooms surrounding the temple precinct. Once more Luke points out the providential timing. Anna, like Simeon, had been expecting the Messianic kingdom, and like the shepherds, she spread the news about Jesus.

39–40 Luke takes another opportunity to mention the fidelity of Jesus' parents to the Jewish law. He omits mention of the flight to Egypt (an event important to Matthew because it provided him with another example of fulfilled prophecy: see Mt 2:13–15). What is significant is that Jesus' parents were faithful to the Jewish law and that the child grew normally, the object of God's grace (v.40; cf. v.52).

2. The boy Jesus at the temple (2:41–52)

This section provides the only biblical account of Jesus' boyhood. The focal point is not his precocious wisdom, noteworthy as that was. Rather, Luke leads us to the real climax, Jesus' reference to God as "my Father" (v.49). This is the first recorded instance of Jesus' awareness that in a unique way he was the Son of God.

41–42 Luke takes yet another opportunity to emphasize the fidelity of Jesus' family to Judaism. Adults were supposed to attend the three major feasts in Jerusalem annually—Passover, Pentecost, and Tabernacles. For many this was impossible, but an effort was made to go at least to Passover. With puberty, a boy became a "son of the covenant," a custom continued in the present bar-mitzvah ceremony. It was considered helpful for a boy to attend the Jerusalem festivals for one or two years before becoming a son of the covenant so that he would realize what his new relationship involved.

43–47 At this intermediate age, Jesus might have been either with the women and children or with the men and older boys, the way the families were probably grouped. Each parent might have supposed he was with the other. After a day of travel Mary and Joseph missed Jesus; another day would have been required for the trip back, and on the next day ("after three days," v.46) the successful search was made.

The questions Jesus put to the teachers were probably not merely boyish inquiries but the kind of probing questions used in ancient academies and similar discussions. He also gave answers, some of which amazed the teachers.

48 Luke vividly describes the parents' emotions, the first of which is astonishment and awe (cf. v.33). His mother's natural concern then issues very humanly in a hint of scolding. Next she indicates their anxious pain as they hunted for him.

49–50 Jesus' answer, "Why were you searching for me?", pointedly prepares the hearer for a significant statement that is then understood as being theologically inevitable (cf. also 24:5–6). The importance of Jesus' use of the phrase "my Father," with its implied designation of himself as the unique Son of the Father, is heightened not only by the preceding question but by the subsequent statement of v.50, which underlines the awesome mystery of Jesus' statement of filial consciousness.

51 Luke hurries on to assure us also of Jesus' perfect humanity by noting his obedience to his parents. Once more Mary reflects inwardly on the significance of it all (cf. v.19; Ge 37:11).

52 Jesus' growth was entirely normal. His growth in wisdom does not detract from his deity, for Jesus willingly gave up the full use of his divine powers (Php 2:7). "Stature" likely refers to his personal development, i.e., maturity.

III. Preparation for Jesus' Ministry (3:1–4:13)

A. The Ministry of John the Baptist (3:1–20)

This narrative, like the foregoing, bears Palestinian Jewish characteristics in its language, themes, and setting. Verse 2 reflects the opening words of the OT prophets (e.g., Isa 1:1; Jer 1:1–3; Hos 1:1; Am 1:1). At this point in history, after a long silence, the prophetic word was again being heard.

1 The dating provided in this verse was useful to Luke's first-century readers to place the ministry of John. Since Luke was probably using the normal Roman method of reckoning, the date indicated would be from August, A.D. 28, to August, A.D. 29.

"Herod" is Herod Antipas, son of Herod the Great, who ruled Galilee and Perea 4 B.C.–A.D. 39 (cf. Lk 3:19–20; 13:31; 23:7). Philip, another son of Herod the Great, ruled a group of territories to the northeast of Palestine (4 B.C.-A.D. 33/34). Lysanias is unknown except through inscriptions. Pontius Pilate was governor of Judea A.D. 26–36.

2 The official high priesthood of Annas had ended in A.D. 15, but his influence was so great, especially during the high priesthood of his son-in-law Caiaphas (A.D. 18–36; cf. Jn 18:13), that his name is naturally mentioned along with that of Caiaphas. With the reference to the high priests, we move from the secular world to the religious and are ready for the introduction of the prophet John. He is in the desert, a place that held memories for the Jews as the locale of the post-Exodus wanderings of Israel. Luke's interest is not only in the coming of John, but in the message he brought from God.

3 Luke suggests that John had an itinerant ministry. Apparently he not only preached in the desert but followed the Dead Sea coast to the Jordan River and then a distance away from there. John's baptism was "of repentance" (GK 3567), that is, it required sorrow for sin and a moral change on the part of those being baptized (vv.8–14; see also 5:32; 15:7; 24:47 for Luke's use of this word). Repentance is an ancient prophetic theme (e.g., Eze 18:21, 30). The result of the repentance shown in baptism was forgiveness.

4–6 Luke found a clear prophecy of the ministry of John the Baptist in Isa 40:3. He includes more of the quotation than Matthew and Mark do. First he cites the extraordinary way in which, on the analogy of preparations made for a royal visitor, even the seemingly immovable must be removed to make way for the Lord (vv.4–5). What needs removal is the sin of the people.

Luke concludes the Isaiah quotation with words that aptly describe his own evangelistic and theological conviction: everyone will see God's salvation. Luke finds here (following the LXX version of Isa 40:5) a biblical basis for his own universal concern and his central theme of salvation.

7 The word "crowds" (GK 4063) represents an unidentified, assorted group of people who came out to the desert to see him (cf. Mt 3:7, where Matthew identifies them as Pharisees and Sadducees).

John's language is strong, as was that of OT prophets who preceded him. He refers to God's anger (cf. Ro 2:5; 1Th 1:10), not God's kingdom, as Jesus did (Lk 4:43). His question suggests that while their "coming out to be baptized by him" was the proper thing to do, their motives were in question.

8–9 The language is picturesque. Two images are presented. First, a tree that does not produce fruit should be chopped down and removed to make way for one that will (cf. 6:43–45; 13:6–9). The imagery may be intended to call to mind the figure of Israel as a fig tree or vine (cf. Isa 5:1–7). The second image, the ax "at the root," symbolizes an impending radical action, the destruction of the whole tree.

Mere physical descent from Abraham is not important (cf. Jn 8:31–43; Ro 9:6–8; Gal 3:6–9); God can create his own children out of stones, just as he can cause inanimate stones to praise his Son if humans remain silent (19:40). The threat of judgment is heightened through the imagery of fire, a theme reintroduced in the reference to Jesus' ministry (vv.16–17).

10–11 John's prophetic word of judgment elicits a response, first from the crowd in general, then from the unpopular and greedy tax collectors (v.12), and finally from the soldiers (v.14). The conversations, which are unique to Luke, provide opportunity for some clear statements about social justice and responsibility.

The crowd (v.7) is told to share clothing and food with the needy as evidence of repentance. The "tunic" was the short garment worn under the longer robe. One might have an extra tunic for warmth or as a change of clothes.

12–13 The "tax collectors" (v.12) were part of a despised system (cf. 5:27; 15:1). Of the three groups mentioned, they would have been considered most in need of repentance. The chief tax collectors, such as Zacchaeus (19:2), bid money for their position. Their profit came from collecting more than they paid the Romans. They then hired other tax collectors to work for them. Because their work and associations rendered them ritually unclean and because they regularly extorted money, they were alienated from Jewish society and linked with "sinners" (cf. Mk 2:15–16). While John shows social concern, he does not advocate overthrowing the system but rather reforming the abuses.

14 The "soldiers" were probably Jewish, assigned to internal affairs (cf. comment on 22:4). The very nature of their work gave them opportunity to commit the sins specified, for they could use threats of reprisal to extort money from the people. Here again John stresses ministering to the needs of others over against personal greed.

15–17 The question naturally arose whether such a radical prophet as John might be the Messiah (cf. Jn 1:19–25). John responds in several ways. The Messiah is "more powerful" than he is (v.16). The Messiah is worthy of such reverence that even the task of tying his sandals is more than John feels worthy of (cf. Jn 3:30).

The Messiah will baptize, not with water in a preparatory way, as John was doing, but actually "with the Holy Spirit and with fire" (v.16). That is, the coming of the Spirit is to have the effect of fire. John uses an agricultural image to explain this. When grain is tossed in the air with a "winnowing fork," the lighter and heavier elements are separated, with the heavier grain falling on the "threshing floor" and being stored for use. The "chaff," on the other hand, is burned up.

Fire is an ancient symbol of judgment, refinement, and purification (cf. Ge 19:26; Am 7:4; Mal 3:2). John is thus portraying the Holy Spirit as being active in saving, purifying, and judging. The Spirit had definitely, though not frequently, been associated with the Messiah (Isa 11:1–2), whose coming would mean also the availability of the Spirit's ministry.

18 That John not only "exhorted" the people but "preached the good news" (GK 2294) shows that grace accompanied the warning to flee from judgment. It is noteworthy that Luke uses the word "people" (GK 3295) here, a term usually reserved for a potentially responsive group. They apparently stayed on to hear more of John's message and heard the further proclamation of "good news."

19–20 "Herod" is Herod Antipas, mentioned in v.1. His wife, Herodias, had left his brother Philip to marry Herod. That marriage was one of his many sins, and the climactic sin "added" to this sordid series was his imprisonment of John (cf. the story of his death in 9:7–9). Luke underscores both the boldness of John and the sickness of the society he called to account. Verse 20 also indicates that John's ministry was completed before that of Jesus began.

B. The Baptism of Jesus (3:21–22)

21 As in the birth narratives, there is at Jesus' baptism a supernatural attestation. Many see in this event his "call" to his mission. His baptism comes as the climax of the baptism of "all the people."

Jesus was baptized, not because he was a sinner in need of repentance, but as a way of identifying himself with those he came to save (see comment on Mk 1:9). This is the first of several important events in Luke that took place when Jesus prayed (cf. esp. 6:12; 9:18, 29; 22:41). Luke's description of the opening of the heavens makes clear that Jesus had a true vision of the Deity (cf. Eze 1:1; Ac 7:56; 10:11).

22 God had appeared in OT times through various theophanies. Now the Spirit appears in bodily form as a dove. Luke does not say that anyone other than Jesus was aware of the Holy Spirit. Perhaps others present saw only a dove without realizing its significance. This was followed by a voice, designating Jesus as the unique Son of God. The words, like those heard at the Transfiguration (9:35; see comments), blend two OT christological passages (Ps 2:7; Isa 42:1). The concept of divine son-ship in Jewish thought was not only applicable to angels (Job 1:6; 2:1) and to the nation of Israel and her kings (Ex 4:22; 2Sa 7:14; Hos 11:1), but it was also coming into use as a designation for the Messiah (cf. Lk 1:32). The words "love" (GK 28) and "well pleased" (Gk 2305) convey the idea of choice and special relationship. Jesus has now received his commission.

C. Jesus' Genealogy (3:23–38)

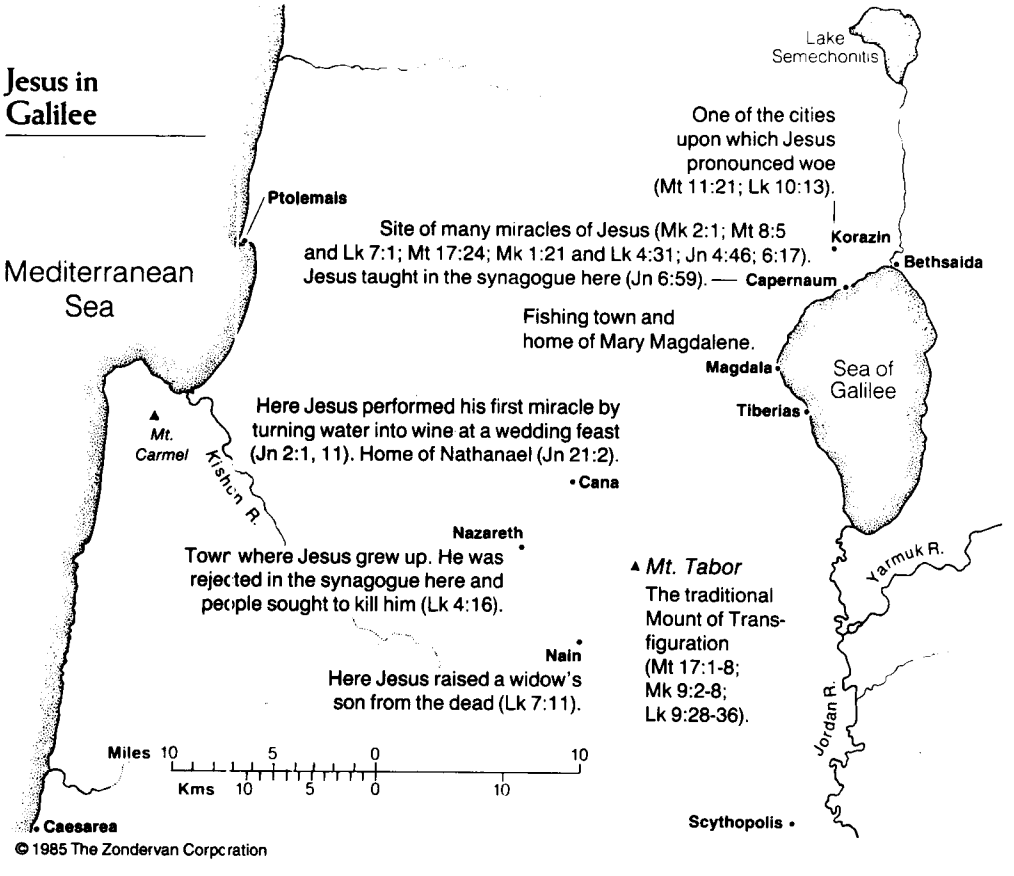
23–38 The age of Jesus is given in approximate terms. He might have been in his mid-thirties. "Thirty" might also indicate that, like the priests who began their service at that age, he was ready to devote himself to God's work.

Both Matthew and Luke recognize the importance of establishing a genealogy for Jesus, in accordance with the care given such matters in ancient Israel. In their handling of Jesus' genealogy, Matthew and Luke differ in several ways. (1) Matthew begins his gospel with the genealogy, thereby establishing an immediate connection with the OT and with Israel. Luke waits till the significant part of the ministry of John the Baptist is completed and Jesus stands alone as the designated Son of God. (2) Matthew begins with Abraham, stressing Jesus' Jewish ancestry; Luke, in reverse order, goes back to Adam, probably with the intention of stressing the identification of Jesus with the entire human race. (3) Matthew groups his names symmetrically; Luke simply lists them. (4) Both trace the lineage back through ancestral lines that diverge for a number of generations from each other, though both meet at the generation of David. (5) Matthew includes the names of several women (a feature one might have expected in Luke because of his understanding and respect for women).

The significance of the genealogy in Luke probably lies in the emphasis on Jesus as a member of the human race. He implicitly contrasts the obedient second Adam, the true Son of God, with the disobedient first Adam.

The differences outlined above, as well as some problems of detail, are perhaps best explained, at least in part, by the assumption that the legal line of Jesus is traced in Matthew, the actual line of descent in Luke. The widow of a childless man could marry his brother so that a child of the second marriage could legally be considered as the son of the deceased man in order to perpetuate his name. In a genealogy the child could be listed under his natural or his legal father. Joseph is listed as the son of Heli in Luke but as the son of Jacob in Matthew. On the levirate marriage theory, Heli and Jacob may have been half-brothers, with the same mother but fathers of different names. Perhaps Heli died and Jacob married his widow. Or alternately, it is possible that Jacob died without leaving any children of his own and thus his nephew, a son of his brother Heli (i.e., Joseph), became his heir.

D. The Temptation of Jesus (4:1–13)



This vivid narrative (vv. 1–13) contains an important blend of theological themes—the divine sonship and messiahship of Jesus, the warfare between Christ and Satan, OT theology, and principles of obedience to the divine Word.

1–2 Jesus is in the desert for a period of forty days. This probably parallels Israel's experience in the desert after the exodus; it may also allude to Moses' forty days without food on the mountain (Dt 9:9). The parallel with Israel becomes stronger if it is meant as a comparison between Israel as God's "son" (Ex 4:22–23; Hos 11:1), who failed when tested, and Jesus as his unique Son, who conquered temptation. God led Israel into the desert; likewise the Spirit led Jesus. In the former case, God tested his people; now God allows the devil to tempt his Son.

It is important here to distinguish between three kinds of tempting. (1) Satan tempts people, i.e., lures them to do evil. God never does this nor can he himself be tempted in this way (Jas 1:13). (2) People may tempt (test) God in the sense of provoking him through unreasonable demands contrary to faith. This is what Israel did in the desert (cf. v.12). (3) God tests (but does not tempt) his people, as he did in the desert (Ex 16:4; Dt 8:2).

In this temptation by the devil, the Lord Jesus shows the validity of what God had just said of him: "With you I am well pleased" (3:22).

In this section we see several contrasts. Israel failed God's test, while Jesus fully obeyed his Father. John also contrasts Jesus, who is both filled with and led by the Spirit (note Luke's emphasis on the Spirit), and the devil, who opposes both Christ and the Spirit. Finally, Luke implies a contrast between Jesus as "hungry," i.e., physically empty, and yet as "full of the Spirit." Our own experience is usually the reverse.

3–4 The "devil" (GK 1333) has several names in the Bible: notably the OT name "Satan" (e.g., 4:8; 10:18; 11:18). He opposes God and God's servants (1Ch 21:1; Job 1:6–12; 2:1–7; Zec 3:1–2). He may seem to be ubiquitous but is not omnipresent. Sometimes he works indirectly through the evil spirits who form his domain (cf. 11:14–20). The devil begins his temptation by picking up on the declaration of Jesus' sonship in 3:22.

The reference to bread is probably a temptation for Jesus to satisfy his own need and gratify himself. But since bread is not inherently evil (cf. 11:3), the main issue is not one of allurement to perverted self-gratification (as in Jas 1:14–15), but a challenge to act apart from faithful dependence on God.

Jesus' reply is brief, a partial quotation of Dt 8:2, where Moses was reminding Israel of God's testing of them for forty years. The next verse (Dt 8:3) specifically refers to hunger and the provision of manna, which the Lord gave Israel so that the people might know that humans need not merely bread but the sustaining word of God.

Thus, while he is being "tempted" (GK 4279) by the devil, Jesus is also proving faithful to God, in contrast to Israel's response when they were "tested" by God in the desert. Jesus is dependent on God and obedient to his word.

5–8 The second temptation involves similar issues. In a vision, the devil takes Jesus to a "high place" and offers him the world. Once again, what the devil offered was legitimate in itself. The Messiah would one day rule all the world, possessing all "authority and splendor." In this temptation the devil claims to possess the world, a claim that Jesus neither challenges nor acknowledges.

Had Jesus accepted the devil's offer, our salvation would have been impossible. First, Jesus would have sinned by giving worship to the devil and thus could not have offered himself a perfect sacrifice for our sins. Second, Scripture teaches that the Messiah should first suffer and only then "enter his glory" (24:26). Had Jesus listened, he would have been avoiding the Cross.

By quoting Dt 6:13, Jesus responded as the perfect human being should respond, worshiping and serving God alone. Both of the OT texts Jesus quoted so far (vv.4, 8) are more than weapons against the devil; they apply to Jesus himself.

9–12 Luke records this temptation in the last rather than second place (cf. Mt 4:5–7). The essence of this temptation is that of presuming on God and displaying before others one's special favor with him. In this instance the devil quotes a passage of Scripture (Ps 91:11–12) out of context—the mere use of Bible words does not necessarily convey the will of God (v.10). The rabbinic tradition that the Messiah would appear on top of the temple may provide a background that accounts for the form of this temptation, even though the idea of jumping down from the temple is absent.

Again Jesus responds with Scripture (v.12), this time quoting Dt 6:16. Jesus applies the words to his own refusal to tempt God. That is, he will not repeat the sin that Israel committed in the desert by putting God to the test. To do that would be to provoke God in unbelief by making inappropriate demands for a divine sign to be used for display.

13 The devil leaves only temporarily until a more opportune time (cf. 22:53; 23:35, 37, 39).

IV. The Galilean Ministry (4:14–9:50)

A. Initial Phase (4:14–6:16)

1. First approach and rejection at Nazareth (4:14–30)

14–15 Once again, as Jesus enters a new phase of his experience, Luke mentions the special activity of the Holy Spirit. So far we have seen the Spirit's activity at Jesus' conception (1:35), baptism (3:22), and temptation (4:1). The "news" that spread about Jesus and the fact that "everyone praised him" are the first of several observations Luke makes about public response to Jesus' ministry (cf. vv.22, 28, 32, 36–37).

This passage (vv.16–30) has an important place in the Lukan presentation, for it marks the beginning of Luke's record of Jesus' ministry. The setting is Nazareth, the place of Jesus' childhood. A lengthy quotation from Isaiah (vv.18–19) issues in a proclamation of immediate fulfillment. Jesus also implies the selection of Gentiles for divine favor (vv.24–27). Since Luke places this event so early in Jesus' ministry (cf. Mk 6:1–6), he obviously considers it of prime importance (whether there were two "rejections at Nazareth" is impossible to say with certainty). Also, a pattern appears here that is unveiled more clearly later on in Luke-Acts: (1) the presentation of the Gospel to Jews in their synagogues, (2) rejection, and (3) turning to the wider Gentile world (cf. Ac 13:46).

16–17 Luke emphasizes that Jesus was in the town in which he grew up and stresses Jesus' Jewish piety by referring to his custom of synagogue attendance. This strengthens the contrast with his rejection. Jesus stood up to read the Scriptures; the passage chosen for that particular Sabbath was Isa 61:1–2, with the words "to release the oppressed" taken from Isa 58:6. The variation from the usual wording may simply reflect the interpretive translation in use at that time.

18–19 The quotation has significance both as our Lord's statement of his call to his saving ministry and as Luke's affirmation of this ministry as thematic in his gospel. Jesus identifies himself as the subject of Isaiah's prophetic word. Three elements are emphasized here. (1) Jesus is the bearer of the Spirit received at his baptism (3:22–23; cf. comment on 4:14). His ministry will be uniquely marked by the presence of the Spirit as prophetically foretold. (2) Jesus is an eschatological prophet, a role intertwined with that of John the Baptist as prophetic forerunner (see comments on 1:17 and 7:28). Jesus, not John, was the prophet predicted in Dt 18:18 (cf. Jn 1:19–24). Luke gives special attention to Jesus as a prophet in a number of ways (v.24; 7:16, 39; 13:33; 24:19; Ac 3:22; 7:37, 52). In the present passage, the prophetic mission described by Isaiah, a mission of proclamation of "good news," is accepted by Jesus. (3) The prophetic role of Jesus overlaps his role as Messiah. His ministry of deliverance for the oppressed is messianic in character. This assumption probably lay behind the doubts in John's mind when his release from prison was not forthcoming (7:18–19).

The "good news" (v.18; GK 2294) Jesus was to proclaim recalls both the joyful announcement in 1:19 and the message of the angel in 2:10–11. It also builds on Isa 40:9; 41:27; 52:7. The "poor," like the "prisoners," the "blind," and the "oppressed," are not only the unfortunate of this world but those who have special need of dependence on God (cf. comment on 6:20). Luke 7:22 cites some ways Jesus fulfilled this mission.

The "year of the Lord's favor" is reminiscent of the Jubilee (one year in every fifty) when debts were forgiven and slaves set free (Lev 25:8–17). It defines the time in history when God in sovereign grace brings freedom from the guilt and effects of sin. The inclusion of this quotation is consistent with Luke's stress on the dawning of the new age of salvation.

The omission of the next phrase in Isa 61:2—"the day of vengeance of our God"—is also significant. Jesus' audience would suppose that the day of their salvation would be the day of judgment on their pagan enemies, but the delay of judgment means that this time of the Lord's favor benefits the Gentiles also. Jesus affirms (vv.24–27) that Gentiles are also recipients of God's grace, even when Jews were not so blessed.

20 We now have a description of the synagogue procedure. Jesus hands back the scroll to the "attendant," who had the sacred duty of handling the revered scroll. After this was replaced in its cabinet or ark, the reader took the customary sitting position for instructive comments on the passage. Luke begins to record the response of the congregation, which is at first intense attention and ultimately hostility. The phrase "eyes . . . were fastened" denotes intense emotion (cf. Ac 1:10; 7:55).

21 The only comment of Jesus that Luke records is short but of the highest importance. He announces the fulfillment of the reading from Isaiah concerning the subject of the prophecy (Jesus) and the time of God's gracious work ("today"; GK 4958).

The term "fulfilled" (GK 4444) is not as prominent in Luke as it is in Matthew. Only here and in the Emmaus conversation (24:44) does Luke use the word in relation to the fulfillment of OT prophecy (see comment on 7:1). In other words, these two references to prophetic fulfillment stand out at the beginning and end of Jesus' public appearances, emphasizing the fulfillment of God's eternal purpose in Christ's ministry.

22 The audience appears to have responded first with a positive attitude to Jesus' words. They "were amazed," an expression that does not indicate clearly either favor or disfavor. The cause of their amazement was the kind and wise manner of Jesus' speech or of what he said about the grace of God (cf. Ac 14:3). Certainly Luke appreciates and conveys the gracious nature of Jesus' ministry. But at some point, here or shortly after, the hostility of the audience begins. Their question "Isn't this Joseph's son?" seems to express perplexity and irritation at this man who grew up in the home of a fellow Nazarene and is now making such impressive claims.

23 Jesus' response is not intended to reassure his audience but rather to draw out their subconscious attitudes. Since Jesus had already had a wide teaching ministry (4:15), his phrase "you will quote" probably expresses the reply he would expect the people to make in response to his message in the synagogue—namely, that they would challenge him to fulfill Isaiah's prophecy by doing miracles in the presence of those who heard him. Throughout his ministry Jesus would be challenged to do miraculous signs (e.g., 11:16, 29) to prove his claims.

24 "I tell you the truth" is used six times in Luke to introduce a solemn assertion. This expression shows the authority with which Jesus spoke and is clearly an authentic word of Jesus. This introductory formula appears often in Mark and even more frequently in Matthew. The statement so solemnly introduced anticipates Jesus' rejection. The word "accepted" (GK 1283) is the same one used in v.19 to describe "the year of the Lord's favor." The double use of this word in this context may be intended to show that, though God desires to accept the people, they are not responding by accepting the prophet who tells them of God's grace. Jesus quotes a common adage that whoever achieves greatness is never fully trusted back home. But here its meaning is the deeper one that Jesus stands in the line of the prophets who were rejected by their own people.

25–27 Jesus does not state here that the prophets Elijah (v.26) and Elisha (v.27) went to Gentiles because they were rejected by the Jews; rather, they went because they were sent there by God. Jesus' audience, however, is becoming more and more enraged as they realize that they will receive no special favors from him and that he considers himself above home ties and tradition.

28–30 Nazareth lay among the ridges of the southern slopes of the Galilean hills. Jesus allowed the crowds to drive him out of the town (as he later did on going to the place of crucifixion). But it was not yet his time to die, and by some unexplained means he made his way out.

2. Driving out an evil spirit (4:31–37)

31–32 Luke has already mentioned Capernaum (v.23), a town on the northwest shore of the Sea of Galilee, as a center of miraculous activity in the ministry of Jesus. The expression "went down" reflects the descent necessary from the elevated situation of Nazareth to the coastal plain.

As was his custom, Jesus attended the synagogue (v.33) and began to teach there. The people listening to him, like those in Nazareth, were amazed, especially because this teacher, who in their eyes was not even a rabbi, taught with authority. The majority of rabbis would base their teaching on the chain of tradition, citing the opinions of their predecessors. Jesus' teaching, however, had authority inherent in his message (cf. v.36).

33–35 While Jesus was speaking, he was interrupted by a demon-possessed man. Demon possession is too frequent and integral to the gospel narratives to minimize or, worse, to discard as Hellenistic superstition. The good news preached by Jesus (vv.18, 43) signaled an attack on the forces of evil. A holy war was being launched and the demons knew it. This war would be carried on by Jesus' disciples (9:1–2; 10:8–9, 17).

The "demon" (GK 1228) is further described as an "evil [or unclean; GK 176] spirit." An evil spirit is unclean in contrast to the holiness of God and may well cause both moral and physical filth in a possessed human (cf. ZPEB, 2:92–101). The possessed man shrieked, uttered an expression of surprise, and asked a questions that means, "What do we have to do with each other?" The demon, perhaps exemplifying James's comment that "the demons believe and shudder" (Jas 2:19), sensed the purpose of Jesus' presence. In keeping with the pattern in the Gospels, testimony to the truth about Christ comes from a number of different and unexpected sources. The term "the Holy One of God" contrasts strongly with the remark that this was an unclean demon.

Jesus responded sternly with a command to be silent. In this action we may see the beginning of a pattern of prohibiting the premature proclamation of his identity. Throughout the Gospels Jesus guards the fact of his messiahship, probably (1) to prevent a misinterpretation that would draw to him revolutionary-minded dissidents seeking a leader against Rome (see comment on Mk 1:44); (2) to allow his messianic works themselves to establish his authority among true believers (cf. Lk 7:18–23; see also comment on 5:14); and (3) possibly to avoid an inappropriate self-proclamation as Messiah (some studies suggest that the Jews felt that the true Messiah would allow others to proclaim him as such, rather than doing so himself).

What follows is not technically an exorcism, because Jesus does not use an incantation or invoke the authority of another. Instead he speaks a simple word of command on his own authority. Luke, always interested as a physician in the physical condition of people, observes that the demon came out violently but without hurting the man.

36–37 Once again Luke notes the amazement of the people—this time not only at his teaching and authority but also at his power. Luke's theme of the spread of the Gospel finds expression in the conclusion of the narrative.

3. Healing many (4:38–44)

38–39 Jesus' healing ministry continues in a more private setting, in the home of Peter's mother-in-law (this is the first time Peter is mentioned in this gospel). Both this passage and 1Co 9:5 inform us that Peter was married. A crisis of serious illness in the family gives occasion for Jesus to help. Jesus "rebukes" the impersonal fever, as he had earlier rebuked the demon; perhaps a personal evil force had caused the fever (cf. 13:16), or the fever is simply personified, or Luke is emphasizing the active force of Jesus' word. The woman immediately rises, and, doubtless in keeping with her character, begins to serve the group.

40–41 One of the most beautiful scenes in Scripture now follows. The crowds have apparently waited till evening, after the Sabbath was over. In the remaining hours of diminishing light, they perform the labor of love they could not do on the Sabbath, carrying the sick to Jesus. It is noteworthy that Jesus himself has not yet ventured out on the Sabbath to perform healings publicly (see 6:1–11). Luke carefully distinguishes between those who were just sick and those who were demon-possessed. This warns us not to assume that the gospel writers thought all disease was caused by demons. Luke mentions that Jesus laid his hands on the people who came to him, showing that Jesus was the source of the healing power and that he had a personal concern. The demons called Jesus "the Son of God" (see comment on v.34). Jesus' command for them to be silent is here amplified from v.35.

42–44 Shifting quickly from dusk to dawn, Luke portrays Jesus in a sharply contrasted setting. He is alone. Surprisingly, in view of his special attention to prayer (cf. 5:16), Luke does not tell us that Jesus is praying (cf. Mk 1:35). But Luke does strongly affirm why Jesus refused to linger at Capernaum. He felt an urgent need ("must"; GK 1256) to preach the kingdom of God throughout all "the land of the Jews" (see NIV note). That is why God sent him into the world.

Here, then, Luke has provided representative incidents from the ministry of Jesus. It is the kind of activity summarized in Ac 10:38 as "doing good and healing all who were under the power of the devil."

4. Calling the first disciples (5:1–11)

In contrast to Mt 4:18–22 and Mk 1:16–20, Luke's account of the call of the disciples is much more complete, containing the unique encounter between Jesus and Peter. Luke also stresses the sovereignty and holiness of Jesus and mentions the total abandonment of the disciples' possessions as an act of discipleship (cf. 14:33). In all these gospels the climax is a call to "catch men," followed by the obedience of the disciples.

1–3 Luke begins this story mentioning the pressure of the crowds, as he occasionally does elsewhere (8:42, 45; 19:3). Their attention is on the "word of God" spoken by Jesus. The shore of the lake provided an excellent, acoustically serviceable amphitheater. Luke, being observant of detail, draws our attention to two boats, and then singles out Simon as the owner of one of them. Jesus gets into the boat and again teaches, his voice carrying across the water to the crowds.

4–5 The sharp contrast between the expert but unsuccessful fisherman and Jesus needs no comment. Jesus' command must have seemed unreasonable to them after their failure during the night. Peter, here called by his original name, Simon, demurs; but he does what Jesus says.

6–11 Luke now moves quickly to three focal points in his narrative. (1) He describes the gathering of the fish. The details of the breaking nets and loaded boats help give the narrative the ring of truth. (2) The miracle moves Peter, overcome by awe, to abase himself before Jesus. He is gripped not merely by a sense of his inferiority to the "Lord," but by his own sinfulness (in spite of his being a law-abiding Jew) (cf. Isa 6:5). Luke's reason for including this incident may be not only to portray the confrontation of human sinfulness with Jesus but also to show that to receive the saving grace of Christ a "sinful" person must repent. (3) Peter obeys Jesus in letting down the net, and Jesus follows this up by declaring that he will "catch men" from then on (v.10b). In view of Luke's emphasis on the kindness of God reaching out to embrace all humankind, this phrase signifies a beneficent ingathering of human fish. It presages the widening horizons of both Luke and Acts, culminating, in a sense, in Peter's vision symbolizing the reception of Gentiles into the church and his subsequent witness to the Gentile Cornelius (Ac 10:9–48, esp. vv.34–35).

The disciples then leave everything and follow Jesus, underscoring the condition of discipleship Jesus taught later on (14:33; cf. 18:22).

5. The man with leprosy (5:12–16)

12 Leprosy is a general term in Scripture for certain skin diseases. Though not necessarily equivalent to what we know as Hansen's disease (see ZPEB 2:138), they were repulsive and resulted in physical, social, and psychological isolation of their victims (cf. Lev 13, esp. v.45). Luke is once again careful to note the nature and extent of a disease ("covered with leprosy"). The assumption is that the man has some knowledge of Jesus' prior miracles. Just as Peter fell at Jesus' feet for shame at his sinfulness (v.8), this man falls face downward for shame at his uncleanness. The appellation "Lord" (GK 3261) doubtless has less meaning than on Peter's lips (v.8), meaning here little more than "Sir." The condition "if you are willing" may express a sense of unworthiness rather than doubt as to Jesus' ability or kindness.

13 The very act of touching is significant, especially since lepers were always kept at a distance. Perhaps our contemporary society, having rediscovered the significance of touching as a means of communicating concern, can identify with Jesus' kindness in touching the leper. Such contact also symbolized the transfer of healing power (cf. 8:44). Jesus' "I am willing" meets the man's need of reassurance; he was healed "immediately."

14 The command to silence follows Jesus' pattern (see comments on 4:35, 41). Jesus wanted first to do the works of the Messiah and to fulfill his basic mission of sacrificial suffering before being publicly proclaimed as Messiah.

For the cleansed leper to show himself to the priest was essential, both to observe the ritual prescribed in Lev 14 and to demonstrate the messianic act of healing "as a testimony to them" (see comments on 7:21–23).

15–16 If the command to silence is part of a pattern in the Gospels, so is the failure to obey it. The immediate effect of the healing is Jesus' increased popularity. Though this popularity leads others to come and be healed (v.15), Jesus is forced to withdraw to deserted areas in order to seek quiet. Once again Luke speaks of Jesus' habit of prayer (cf. comment on 3:21).

6. Healing a paralytic (5:17–26)

Jesus' activities inevitably brought him into confrontation with the religious authorities. The Gospels actually focus on several such occasions. Luke is especially concerned in his gospel and in Acts to clarify the original relationship between Christianity and Judaism and to show the reasons why the Gospel had to break out of the confines of Judaism. Here he stresses the authority of Jesus once more. In 4:32 Jesus' teaching was authoritative; 4:36 shows his authority over demons; 5:24 shows his authority to forgive sins.

17 Jesus was teaching over a period of some time, and this event occurred on one of those days. It seems that Jesus' reputation had aroused the attention of the Jewish religious authorities, who considered it important to hear what he was teaching. By doing this Luke lays stress on the crucial nature of the religious issues soon to be raised. This is his first mention of the "Pharisees and teachers of the law."

The "Pharisees" (GK 5757) had, earlier in their history, helped the Jews maintain the purity of their religion by teaching how the Mosaic Law and the traditions that grew up alongside it ought to be applied in daily life. Many of them became rigid, imbalanced, and hypocritical (see comments on 11:37–54).

The "teachers of the law" (GK 3791), most of whom were Pharisees, had expert knowledge of the details of the Jewish legal tradition and so would be expected to form an opinion about the correctness of Jesus' teaching.

Luke then turns from Jesus' teaching ministry to that of healing. These two elements, doctrine and healing power, serve as a climax to this narrative.

18–19 The friends of the paralytic were motivated by earnestness and faith. The typical flat roof could be reached by an outside stairway. Roofing materials were separable without being damaged.

20 Two declarations form the focal point of this narrative. The first is a declaration of forgiveness, the second an affirmation of Jesus' authority to make that declaration. The plural reference in the term "their faith" is to the faith of the four who brought the paralytic man, though we may assume from his subsequent forgiveness that he also believed. God responds to the intercession of others regarding a person in need. Those who brought the paralytic to Jesus believed that Jesus would save him, though the paralytic's salvation was an intensely personal matter between him and Jesus.

Jesus' declaration of the forgiveness of the paralytic's sin does not imply that sin was the immediate cause of his disease (see also Jn 9:2; 1Co 11:29–30).

21 In Jewish law conviction of blasphemy (an overt defilement of the divine name) was a capital crime penalized by stoning. Pharisees and teachers of the law were convinced that Jesus had crossed over the line.

22–23 Luke indicates that Jesus exercised extraordinary knowledge by having insight into one's inner thoughts. He placed his challengers in a hypothetical dilemma (v.23; cf. 6:9; 20:3–44). Obviously while Jesus' two options are in one sense equally easy to say (and equally impossible to do), in another sense it is easier to say that which cannot be proved or disproved: "Your sins are forgiven."

24 The structure of this sentence is broken by the redirecting of Jesus' comments from the leaders to the man. Thus a focus is maintained both on Jesus' running controversy with the religious leaders and on his ministry to the paralytic.

Here is the first appearance of the term "Son of Man" in Luke (see comment on Mk 8:31). It occurs in connection with the right to pronounce forgiveness rather than with the themes of suffering and glory that characterize its specific use in the other passages where it is used.

25–26 The healing validates the declaration of forgiveness. The command to the paralyzed man is impossible of fulfillment—except for the power of God. To respond took an act of obedience based on faith, and he stood up "immediately." The result is the glorification of God (see comment on 2:20), both by the man and by the crowd. The onlookers were also filled with awe at the powerful demonstration of God's word (cf. Ac 2:12). The final word is "today." Its use in this particular position, at the very end of the passage, strikingly recalls its occurrence as the first word said by Jesus after reading the Isaiah passage in Nazareth (4:21). By including it here Luke assures the reader that this indeed is the awaited eschatological "today."

7. Calling Levi (5:27–32)

The succession of people on whom the Lord bestows his favor continues. We have seen his grace to a demoniac, a leper, and a paralytic; and now we see it given to a tax collector. So Jesus liberates those suffering from malign spirits, physical handicap, and social disfavor. The antagonists, the Pharisees and teachers of the law (who were merely named in the preceding narrative), are again on the scene.

27–28 Levi (i.e., Matthew; see comment on Mt 9:9) was a tax collector (see comment on Lk 3:12); he obviously was treated by the Pharisees as a religious outcast.

The direct command of Jesus to follow him results in Levi's immediate and total obedience. Luke notes both the negative aspect (leaving everything) and the positive one (following Jesus) of what Levi did (see 9:23–25 for Jesus' comments on this pattern).

29–30 A banquet in the NT symbolizes joy and often hints at the eschatological banquet (see comments on Mk 14:25; Lk 13:28–30). Jesus is the guest of honor; but Levi does not limit the guest list to his new Christian friends, the disciples of Jesus. Instead of immediately cutting off his old associates, Levi invites them into his home, probably to bring them also into contact with Jesus. Luke mentions "others," who turn out to be "sinners," as far as the Pharisees are concerned. The joy of the participants is now opposed by the dour criticism of the religious leaders.

The complaint of the Pharisees is based on their dedication to upholding the purity of Jewish faith and life. Implicit in their teachings was strict adherence to both law and tradition, including necessary rites of purification and separation from all whose moral or ritual purity might be in question.

Their complaint against Jesus is specifically directed to his acceptance of these despised people sitting down in table fellowship with them. No act, apart from participation in the actual sinful deeds of the guests, could have broken the wall of separation more dramatically. Yet the Pharisees are not yet ready to argue with Jesus himself, so they direct their question to Jesus' disciples and also charge them with this unacceptable conduct.

31–32 Jesus not only originated certain proverbs and parables but also made wise use of current ones. So, citing a self-evident proverb of his day, he described his mission in terms that he would go on to amplify in the parables in chapter 15. Since no one is truly "righteous," Jesus used the word here either in a relative sense or with a touch of sarcasm. Jesus implies that the Pharisees only thought that they were righteous; his point is that they must first acknowledge themselves to be sinners before they can truly respond to the call "to repentance." With this word, Luke introduces a topic of major importance. While the Gospel of grace and forgiveness is for everyone (2:10), repentance is a prerequisite to its reception (cf. 18:11–14).

8. The question about fasting (5:33–39)

Levi's banquet leads to further questions about religious practices, particularly fasting and prayer. These practices were considered significant indications of religious devotion. Fasting was actually only prescribed for one day in the year but was practiced as a religious exercise at least twice a week by the Pharisees (cf. 18:12). In contrast to the two previous incidents (vv.21, 30), this time the leaders challenge Jesus directly.

33–35 By stating a fact about the disciples of John and of the Pharisees, the disciples are now criticized, not only for eating with sinners, but for having a lifestyle in contrast to proper religious decorum. Jesus' answer is indeed remarkable. The first part of the saying is clear. Jesus compares the situation to a wedding (cf. Eph 5:25–33; Rev 19:6–9), which naturally calls for joy. But to think at a wedding of the possibility of the groom's death is highly unusual. Jesus seems to anticipate already here his rejection and his death at the hands of his enemies.

36 The context provides opportunity for Jesus to state a basic principle in a series of parabolic figures. His mission involves a radical break with common religious practices. He teaches that he has not come merely to add devotional routines to those already practiced, for what he brings is not a patch but a whole new garment. Merely to "patch things up"—i.e., to have a dinner celebration in place of fasting —would fail for two reasons. (1) It would ruin the rest of the new garment from which it is taken. (2) Just one new patch will not help preserve the old garment but will in fact be conspicuously incongruous.

37–39 The second illustration suggests that Jesus' teaching is like fermenting wine, wine that seems to have almost inherent vigor and cannot be contained within an old rigid system, just as such wine cannot be contained in old wineskins that have lost elasticity. Jesus concludes by emphasizing that people tend to want the old and to reject the new, assuming (wrongly in this case) that the old is better.

9. Sabbath controversies (6:1–11)

The uneasy tension between Jesus and the Pharisees described in chapter 5 hardens into controversy over one of the main institutions of Judaism, the Sabbath.

Keeping the Sabbath provided an appropriate issue for debate because it (1) had roots both in the creation account and in the Ten Commandments, (2) involved every seventh day and consequently called for many decisions about what was permitted or forbidden on that day, and (3) afforded a public disclosure of one's observance or nonobservance of the day.

1–2 Luke centers attention on the disciples (v.1), though in accordance with custom their teacher was held responsible. To glean by hand in someone's field was permitted by law (Dt 23:25). But to do this and to rub the heads of grain was considered to be threshing. Jewish tradition forbad threshing on the Sabbath.

3–4 Jesus' response (v.3) centers in an analogy from Scripture (1Sa 21:1–6). He calls to mind an instance in which the infringement of a rule to meet human need received no condemnation. Note too that the Scriptural analogy and the present incident involve a Davidic figure and his companions. The point is that ceremonial rites must give way to a higher moral law.

5 Following this analogy, on which the Pharisees offer no comment, Jesus lays claim to unique authority and takes the argument of vv.3–4 a step further (see comment on Mk 2:27–28).

6–8 The second Sabbath controversy involves basically the same issue as the first—human need versus ceremonial law. Jesus is teaching in the synagogue, and when he sees the man with the atrophied and useless hand, Jesus takes the initiative. As in 5:17, the "Pharisees and teachers of the law" (v.7) are present, scrutinizing Jesus' every action to find fault. Now, after the first Sabbath controversy, they think they have a case against him. Jesus is aware of their thoughts (v.8) and in the light of that knowledge performs the healing. He has the man stand in front of the people so that all will see what follows.

9 Jesus' question in this verse implies that if any illness is left unattended when healing can be provided, evil is done by default. Jesus is not breaking the Sabbath; he is using it to do good to a human being in need.

10–11 Here Jesus commanded the impossible. Presumably the man exercised obedience born of faith, and Jesus healed the withered hand completely. The response is violent; the opposition to Jesus mounts in a crescendo of fury more intense than that after the previous miracle. So now, near the very start of Jesus' ministry, a plot against him is beginning to form.

10. Choosing the twelve apostles (6:12–16)

12 Jesus spent an entire night in prayer, a sure indication that the circumstances were pressing: the preceding controversy, the resultant threatening atmosphere, and the selection to be made of the twelve apostles. How many of us Christians today have ever spent a whole night in prayer? In his prayer life, as in all else, the Lord Jesus stands far above even the best of us whose words about prayer need to be matched by the consistent practice of it.

13–16 The "disciples" (v.13; GK 3412) up to this time were a group of followers interested in attaching themselves to Jesus the teacher. From among this group, Jesus chose the Twelve. Luke alone tells us in this context that Jesus gave them the designation "apostles." That Luke does this accords with his regard for apostolic authority (see comment on Mt 10:12).

Jesus probably chose twelve apostles to correspond with the number of tribes of Israel, thereby indicating that a new people of God was coming into existence (see comment on Mk 3:13; on the names of the Twelve, see comments on Mk 3:16–19).

B. Jesus' Great Sermon (6:17–49)

1. Blessings and woes (6:17–26)

Jesus' "Sermon on the Plain" here (and his similar "Sermon on the Mount" in Mt 5–7) was something like a "keynote" address. It was a basic affirmation of the kingdom message, beginning with beatitudes and ending with a parable about builders. Within this framework Matthew and Luke present samples or selections of Jesus' teachings that differ at points. Luke's version has five main points, discussed below.

17–19 The "level place" is probably a flat area or plateau on the "mountainside" mentioned in Mt 5:1. Luke mentions a "large crowd" of Jesus' disciples plus "a great number of people" who came to listen to Jesus. The people came to be healed and to have demons cast out (see comment on 4:40–41), as well as to listen to his teaching. Although Jesus directed his comments to the disciples (v.20), he was surely conscious of his larger audience.

20–23 Luke's version of the blessings (or "Beatitudes") is shorter than Matthew's and is different in some particulars; he also includes a negative form in the woes. Both blessings and woes are familiar forms in the OT (e.g., Ps 1; Isa 5:8–23). The entire theme of reversal of fortune has already been encountered in Lk 1:51–55. It is also implicit in the attention Luke gives to social and religious outcasts throughout his gospel.

"Blessed" (vv.20–22; GK 3421), as elsewhere in the NT, refers to the religious joy that one receives from sharing in the salvation of the kingdom. The poor are those who are utterly dependent on God. They are the special recipients of the "good news" Jesus came to preach (4:18). Often the economically destitute sense their need of God more than others. To inherit the kingdom of God is the antithesis of poverty. Note the emphatic sense of assurance that the present tense gives: "yours is" (emphasis mine). Jesus suggests there are some aspects of the coming kingdom of God that are already present. In other words, the poor can rejoice even in the midst of their destitution because they are already able to partake of some of the kingdom blessings.

"Hunger" is presented in its reality without spiritualization (v.21; cf. Mt 5:6). Those who "weep" may be those who carry the burden not only of personal grief but of a hurting society. Both parts of v.21 stress the contrast between the situation "now" and the future blessing.

The idea of laughter is vividly carried forward in the next section on persecution (vv.22–26). Persecution is described in some detail, and "rejoice" and "leap for joy" stand out all the more (v.23). Note the progression from hate (v.22) to exclusion to insult to defamation of their name. Those who share the rejection of the "Son of Man" relive the experience of the prophets (cf. comments on 20:9–12).The promise of "reward in heaven" (v.23) does not suggest that the disciples are to work for some future gain but that there will be personal vindication for those who wait on God and appropriate recognition and blessing from the Lord.

24–26 The woes in both structure and content form a direct contrast to the blessings. This again follows the pattern of Mary's song in 1:53.

Jesus pronounces woe to the "rich," not simply because they are wealthy, but (1) because they have chosen present gratification over future blessing; (2) because rich people criticized in Luke disregard spiritual realities (e.g., 12:15–21); and (3) perhaps because, as was generally assumed, the wealthy became so at the expense of others (cf. Ja 2:6–7).

The word "all" in the clause "when all men speak well of you" (v.26) should be emphasized, lest we distort the basic concepts of honor and praise. False prophets plagued God's people in OT times; they were a threat in Jesus' day (Mt 7:15–23), in Paul's day (Ac 13:6; cf. 20:29–30), and on into the church age (cf. 1 Jn 4:1).

2. Love for enemies (6:27–36)

In place of the five antitheses of Mt 5:21–48, Luke selects one theme and enlarges on it. As might be expected from his basic concern for people, he chooses the theme of love. He does not present the teaching of Jesus over against the prevalent distortion of the OT (cf. Mt 5:43–44). Instead he conveys only the positive command.

27–31 "You who hear me" means those who are taking in what Jesus is saying. The word "love" must be understood in its classic Christian sense of agape (GK 27), having a genuine concern for someone irrespective of his or her attractiveness or of the likelihood of any reciprocation in kind. Jesus spells out the specifics. In the first instance (v.28), apparently no physical harm has been done; so the response also is not physical but to "bless" and to "pray." The next situations involve action that must be met by some physical response. Being struck on the cheek probably refers to an insult slap or to a hand blow to the jaw. The injunction is directed to individuals who desire to live as "sons of the Most High" (v.35). Note too that Jesus is not advocating the suspension of normal civil judicial procedures.

"If someone takes your cloak" may refer to a street robbery, though the passage implies that the person has a need or thinks he does. The teaching of the passage as a whole relates not so much to passivity in the face of evil as to concern for another person. Inevitably, to refrain from doing evil often means suffering evil. This was the path of the Lord Jesus (cf. 1Pe 2:20–24), who prayed for his enemies (Lk 23:34) and died for them (Ro 5:10).

32–36 At this point we have a remarkable series of comparisons between the courtesies of believers and those of worldly people. Even "sinners" act decently to others when kindnesses are reciprocated.

Loving is augmented by doing good, which, in turn, is expressed in lending. "Expecting to be repaid in full" probably implies some kind of reciprocal treatment in return rather than the simple repayment of the loan. One should benefit the helpless as well as one's friends.

Believers are to be like what they really are, "sons of the Most High" (v.35), and as such will have recognition. Jesus is not teaching that one earns sonship (cf. Jn 1:12–13). Rather, the day will come when the world will recognize God's children (Ro 8:19, 23). "Be merciful" (v.36) singles out that area of life in which, given the preceding examples, one is likely to come short. The pattern for our kindness to others is God's kindness to us.

3. Judging others (6:37–42)

37–38 These verses further describe the kind of mercy expected of the Lord's disciples. "Do not judge" (GK 3212) must not be understood as ruling out any ethical evaluation at all; rather, it is defined by the parallel "Do not condemn." Just as God will give a suitable reward to the merciful (vv.32–36), so v.37 implies that he will bring appropriate judgment on the unmerciful. Those who are generous, Jesus goes on to say, will be abundantly repaid for their kindness.

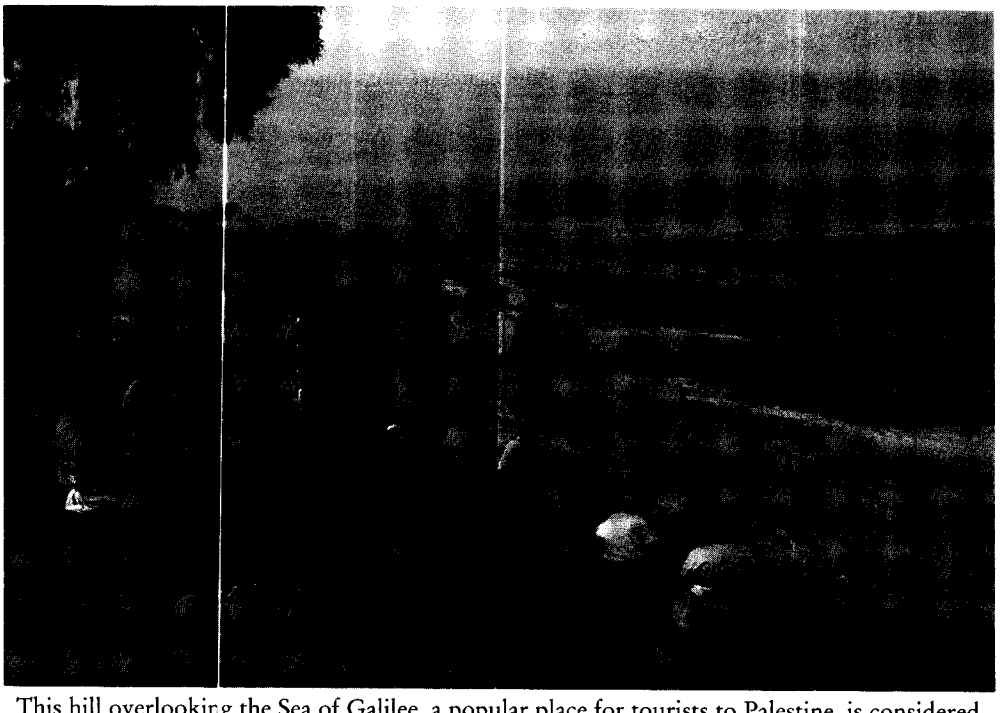
39–40 Assuming that v.39 and v.40 belong together, Jesus' thought in addressing the disciples runs like this: The disciple of a rabbi dedicates himself to his master's teachings and way of life. Thus he cannot be expected to be different from, or better than, his master. If the rabbi lacks a proper view of life, his student will also be misled. The criticism and hostility already apparent in the Pharisees (cf. 6:11) may unfortunately crop up in their disciples, but they must never find a place among Jesus' disciples.

41–42 The humorous illustration of the "speck" and the "plank" hits the mark with force when the person who casually calls the person he is criticizing "brother" suddenly hears himself being called "hypocrite" by the Lord.

4. A tree and its fruit (6:43–45)

43–45 The thought of v.40 continues—like teacher, like student; like tree, like fruit. Throughout the preceding section and this one, the idea is that of consistency between source and product.



5. The wise and foolish builders (6:46–49)

46–49 If Jesus' audience was relaxing in the assumption that the preceding teachings were directed only at the Pharisees and their followers, they could not dodge the direct force of this challenge. It is specifically directed to those who profess to follow Jesus as "Lord." It is not mere words, nor even generally ethical behavior or religious practice, that mark true believers, but whether they "do" what Jesus says (cf. Jas 1:22–25).

C. Ministry to Various Human Needs (7:1–9:17)

1. The faith of the centurion (7:1–10)

This incident marks a pivotal point in the progress of the word of the Lord from its original Jewish context to the Gentile world. The Jews' appreciation of a pious Gentile

This hill overlooking the Sea of Galilee, a popular place for tourists to Palestine, is considered to be one on which Jesus taught the crowds. During the spring, this hill is green and lush with wildflowers (see picture at Mt 6:25ff.); in the summer it is dry and dusty.

(the centurion) is an important theme in Luke, a book written partly to show the compatibility of early Christianity with Judaism. At the same time, Jesus compares the Gentile's faith more than favorably with that of the Jews, which serves Luke's desire to justify the prominence of Gentiles in the church.

This incident is paralleled by the conversion of Cornelius (Ac 10), which itself marks a historic transition from a purely Jewish church to one including Gentiles. Luke is careful to speak well of each centurion and his religious concern. Note too the progression of "faith" in Luke, from Mary (1:45) to the four Jewish men who brought the paralyzed man (5:20) to this Gentile (7:9).

1–5 The introductory words provide more than just a transition from the preceding sermon. They suggest another step in the mission Jesus came to fulfill (1:1); the word "finished" (GK 4444) is the same word translated "fulfilled" in 4:21 (see comment). Matthew uses a different word for "finished" (GK 5464) after a collection of Jesus' sayings (see Mt 7:28 and comment). "In the hearing of the people" echoes "you who hear me" (6:27).

On behalf of his seriously ill "servant," the centurion (who was probably in command of Jewish soldiers, not Roman ones) sent some of the leaders of the community to Jesus (v.3). Luke shows great interest in the character and importance of the centurion, more so than Matthew (Mt 8:5–13). In v.4 we learn why the village elders were willing to intercede for the centurion. They were genuinely indebted to him for his generosity (v.5).

6–8 It seems strange that at this point, having invited Jesus to come, the centurion now sends a second group of "friends" to express his sense of unworthiness and to stop Jesus short of entering. Indeed, one wonders why at this point the centurion did not simply come out and speak for himself (cf. Mt 8:5–6). Luke, however, apparently wishes to stress the humility of the man and possibly also his concern, on second thought, that Jesus might be criticized for entering a Gentile's house.

The focal point of the section is the centurion's concept of Jesus' authority (v.8). He compares Jesus' relationship to God with his own to his superiors. The position of responsibility implies "authority" to command others. Therefore he has faith that Jesus' authoritative "word" will accomplish the healing.

9–10 Jesus is not criticizing the faith he has found among Jews but rather says that not even in Israel has he found such faith as in this centurion. The Jews would be expected to have faith, considering their possession of God's revelation in their Scriptures (cf. Ro 3:1–2). "But not all the Israelites accepted the good news" (Ro 10:16). Their failure to respond to their privileges was ending in Jesus' day, and the response of the centurion stood out in welcome contrast.

2. Raising a widow's son (7:11–17)

Jesus is now about to perform the ultimate kind of miracle that will certify him as the Messiah and will be reported to John the Baptist ("the dead are raised," v.22). Luke also wants his readers to understand that while John the Baptist came in the spirit and power of Elijah, it is Jesus himself who is the great prophet of the end time. This miracle bears significant resemblance, as we shall note, to one performed by Elijah. Luke has already included a reference to the widow to whom Elijah ministered (4:25–26).

11 Nain lay a few miles to the southeast of Jesus' hometown, Nazareth. Luke typically notes the "large crowd" (e.g., 5:15, 29; 6:17; 8:4).

12–13 The cortege has already gone through the town and is on the way to the place of burial, customarily outside the town. The deceased was the "only son" of his mother. The compassion of the Lord Jesus goes out to the woman. As a widow without a man in her family, she would probably become destitute, unable in that society to earn a living. Our Lord's words are deeply human: "Don't cry," but only he could say that and at the same time remove the cause of the tears.

14–15 Jesus risked ritual defilement by touching the coffin. He then did what would seem useless—he spoke to a dead person. When the young man returned to life, Jesus "gave him back to his mother," words similar to those in 1Ki 17:23 regarding Elijah and the widow.

16–17 Once more Luke records the response of the people, noting that they "praised" (GK 1519) God (cf. 5:26; 18:43; 23:47; see comment on 2:20). They recognized in Jesus a prophet and echoed an OT expression: "God has come to help his people" (e.g., Ru 1:6). For the significance of "come," see comment on 1:68. Once again Luke emphasizes the spread of the "news" about Jesus.

3. Jesus and John the Baptist (7:18–35)

In Lk 3:16–17, John had described the one who would come as one who would baptize with the Holy Spirit and with fire. Then Jesus was baptized, receiving divine approval and anointing for his work. In 4:16–21 Jesus assumed the task prophesied in Isa 61:1–2. Now, after a cycle of teachings and healings, the validity of his messianic calling is once more under consideration; and John the Baptist is the other central figure.

18–20 The healings and presumably also the raising of the widow's son apparently have not sufficed to convince John of Jesus' messiahship. This reluctance seems strange, considering John's role in announcing the Coming One and in baptizing Jesus. There are several reasons why John needed further confirmation. He was in prison (3:20). This could lead to depression and, in turn, doubt. Further, he might wonder why, if the Messiah was to release prisoners (Isa 61:1) and if Jesus was the object of that prediction (Lk 4:18), he had not freed John. Also, though he had received reports of Jesus' ministry, John himself had apparently not witnessed spectacular messianic miracles such as he might have expected; nor had he heard Jesus claim outright that he was the Messiah. John still had "disciples" (vv.18, 20), but this need not mean he had been continuing a separate movement because of uncertainty about the Messiah.

21–23 Jesus responds by listing the messianic works that he has accomplished. It was understood in those days that the true Messiah would not proclaim himself such but would first do appropriate messianic works that would lead to public acknowledgment of his identity. The works Jesus cites echo not only Isa 61, but other passages from Isaiah (e.g., 35:5–6; 62:7). Jesus pronounces a blessing (v.23) on the person who accepts his credentials rather than being trapped because of a false evaluation of Jesus.

24–28 The topic now changes from the role of Jesus to that of John. Through some gently ironic questions that expect obviously negative answers, Jesus stresses the inflexibility and austerity of John. He calls John a "prophet" and adds the role of "messenger" from Mal 3:1. If John is the messenger, obviously this forcefully implies the significance of Jesus' own role.

Jesus now puts John into historical perspective. John came in advance of the kingdom, which has now become a reality (16:16). Great as John was (v.28), it is greater to participate in the kingdom than to announce it. We should not conclude from this, however, that John himself is excluded. Lk 13:28 says that all the prophets will be in the kingdom.

29–35 Attention now turns to the contrast between the response of the people (cf. comment on 1:17) and of their hostile leaders to John and Jesus. The tax collectors and the people stood ready to believe Jesus and thereby to "acknowledge that God's way was right." The issue is not only the role of Jesus and John but especially the entire counsel of God, whose "purpose for themselves" the "Pharisees and experts in the law" rejected.

John's baptism was one of the symbols they chose to reject. Their obdurate opposition to each of God's messengers is described as the ficklesness of children, who become annoyed when others won't play their game. Jesus and John, when in confrontation with the Jewish leaders, refused to "play their game" and so are the object of their taunts. The people not only criticize but exaggerate the habits both of John (v.33), calling his asceticism demonic, and of Jesus (v.34), calling his normal habits of food and drink gluttony and drunkenness. The concluding saying probably means that those who respond to wisdom prove its rightness.

4. Anointed by a sinful woman (7:36–50)

The criticism Jesus has received (v.34) does not preclude Luke from setting down another example of Jesus' concern for sinners. The story contrasts a sinful woman (perhaps a prostitute) and a Pharisee (cf. Mt 26:6–13; Mk 14:3–9; Jn 12:1–8).

36–38 Since Jesus accepted an invitation from this Pharisee named Simon, Jesus cannot be accused of spurning the Pharisees socially.

The woman took advantage of the social customs that permitted needy people to visit such a banquet to receive some of the leftovers, but she came specifically to see Jesus, bringing a jar or little bottle of perfume. Since Jesus was reclining at the table according to custom (v.36), she prepared to pour the perfume on his feet, a humble act (cf. 3:16). A flow of tears preceded the outpouring of the perfume; so she wiped his feet lovingly with her hair and, perhaps impulsively, kissed them before using the perfume. Jesus allows her to proceed without shunning her.

39–43 In this masterly narrative, Luke now directs attention to the Pharisee, who in mulling over the matter reaches three conclusions: (1) If Jesus were a prophet, he would know what kind of woman was anointing his feet; (2) if he knew what kind of a woman she was, he would not let her do it; and (3) since he does let her anoint his feet, he is no prophet and should not be acknowledged as such. Jesus responds, however, by showing that he does have unique insight into the human heart, for he knows what the Pharisee is thinking. When Jesus tells Simon that he has something to say to him (v.40), Simon replies perfunctorily, "Tell me, teacher." Jesus then responds with a clear message in a brief parable. Simon is made to give the conclusion that will condemn him. His "I suppose" probably implies an uneasy reluctance.

44–50 Again the woman is the focal point of the narrative. Surprisingly, Jesus first contrasts her acts of devotion with a lack of special attention on Simon's part as host. The main point is reached swiftly. Jesus can declare that her sins (which he does not hesitate to say were "many," showing Simon he did have insight into the woman) have been forgiven, not because of her act of love (v.47), but because of her faith (v.50).

The episode ends with Jesus pronouncing the woman forgiven. Then he becomes the object of another discussion because he presumes to absolve her from her sins (v.49; cf. 5:21). The woman then receives Jesus' pronouncement of salvation—and a traditional benediction, "Go in peace" (though it now has a deeper meaning for her).

5. Parable of the sower (8:1–15)

1–3 The opening verses provide a summary of yet another preaching tour (cf. 4:44). Luke states Jesus' mission both in that passage and here as announcing the "good news of the kingdom of God." Luke is careful to mention "the Twelve" here, as they will serve as witnesses and authorities in the days following Jesus' ascension.

What is new is the mention of several women who not only accompany Jesus but share in his support. Jesus' relationship with them is morally pure. Some of these women had a great debt of love to Jesus, such as Mary Magdalene, who was an object of the grace and power of God in being released from seven demons. "Joanna the wife of Chuza" is otherwise unknown, but she was probably present at the Crucifixion (cf. 23:49, 55; 24:10), showing her faithfulness. She is the first person connected with the Herodian household to be mentioned in this gospel. These women were industrious and helped in the support not only of Jesus but of the Twelve (v.3).

4 Teaching by using parables was common among the rabbis of Jesus' day (see comment on Mk 4:1–34). The sequence in vv.4–15 is (1) the parable of the sower, (2) Jesus' reason for using parables, and (3) the interpretation of the parable of the sower. Each part deals with the mixed response Jesus was receiving from his audiences. Jesus explains the present parable and his reasons for using the parabolic form—both to warn those who neglect the word they hear and to encourage his disciples when that word is not fully accepted.

Luke begins with an observation on the size of the crowds and adds a comment about those who were coming to Jesus from "town after town." The effect is to help the reader visualize a large mixed group of people who represent the various types of "soil" in the parable.

5–8 This particular parable reflects a situation well known to the audience, and its details would have immediately been grasped by the hearers. The very fact that circumstances so familiar needed still further comment before the spiritual meaning was clear underlines the paradox presented in v.10—namely, that those who see and hear do not understand.

The focal point of the parable has been variously interpreted. In none of the Gospels is the sower the center of attention. Nor is particular stress laid on the seed, though it does represent the word of God (v.11); and the whole act of sowing the seed is proclaiming the Gospel of the kingdom.

What does catch attention is the variety of soils. The sower himself is not immediately concerned about the kind of soil. Since plowing followed sowing; in Jesus' culture, the trampled ground where people crossed the field might later be plowed under with seed; so it is not excluded from the sowing. The same could be true of young thorn bushes (v.7). Furthermore, the rocky subsoil (v.6) might not be visible at the time of sowing. The low yield from the poor soil is overshadowed by the very large yield from the good soil (v.8)—an encouragement for Jesus' disciples to realize that the ultimate greatness of the kingdom will make all their efforts worthwhile.

9–10 Here in Luke the disciples' question refers only to this parable, not to Jesus' larger ministry (cf. Mt 13:10; Mk 4:10). Jesus refers to the "secrets" of the kingdom (the only time this word is used in the teachings of Jesus). Elsewhere in the NT "secret" (mysterion; GK 3696) refers to the purpose and plan of God, which he works out phase by phase in human history and through the church. The issues of the problem of evil, suffering, and the delay of vindication will be resolved when God finally reveals his "secret." The "mystery or "secret" is only revealed by God's sovereign grace to his people.

Regarding "others" (those outside the kingdom; see Mk 4:11), Jesus quotes from Isa 6:9 and utters a teaching in accord with the consistent principle in Scripture that those who fail to respond to a saving word from God will find that they are not only under judgment for rejecting what they have heard, but that they are unable to understand further truth (cf. Jn 3:17–19; 9:39–41; Ac 28:26–27; Ro 9:17–18). For such, the very parable that reveals truth to some hides it from them.

While "so that" (v.10) may be understood as indicating result, it more normally indicates purpose (see comment on Mk 4:12).

11–12 Jesus now returns to the parable, explaining why the proclaimed word of God fails to bring a uniform response of faith. Luke's inclusion of the clause "so that they may not believe and be saved" reflects his intense concern regarding salvation; the devil intends to do everything possible to keep us from salvation.

13–14 In the next two types of soils there is an initial response, though it is superficial. For some, "in the time of testing" they "fall away" (GK 923; a word related to "apostasy"), for they cannot endure adversity.

The third soil has to do, not with adversity, but with distractions of this world, like those Jesus warned against in 11:34–36; 12:22–32; 16:13. These distractions prohibit a person's faith from maturing. (That this matter of being fruitful is not simply a matter of the quality of one's Christian life but of whether one has life at all is suggested by Jesus' parallel teaching on wealth in Mt 6:19–34.) The unresponsive people described in this part of the parable apparently lack the necessary essentials to true saving faith.

15 Luke stresses the character of the individual by describing that person as "noble and good" (a Christian adaptation of an ancient Greek phrase). The word "heart" (GK 2840) means the spiritual, intellectual, and volitional center of a person's being, i.e., the whole person. This person is marked by singleness of purpose and is the kind of person who does persevere until an abundant crop is produced.

6. Parable of the lamp (8:16–18)

16–17 The theme of these verses is the same as that of vv.11–15—namely, that what is genuine can and will be tested for its authenticity. If what is "hidden" is evil, this saying affirms that God's judgment on those referred to in v.10 and in vv.12–15 will be just. Furthermore, God's truth, now partially hidden from those who reject it, will one day be publicly vindicated. The absurdity of lighting a lamp only to hide it reinforces the point.

18 Those who accept the message of the kingdom will also be given the knowledge of the "secret," but those who reject it will lose even the opportunity of hearing more teaching (cf. Mt 13:11).

7. Jesus' true family (8:19–21)

19–21 Luke turns at this point to the story of Jesus and his relationship to his family.

Jesus does not, of course, dishonor his family (vv.19–20) but honors those who obey God (v.21). Most Christians would probably say that we come closest to Jesus through prayer and reading the Bible. But with searching practicality Jesus says that the way to be close to him—even as close as his own family—is through being receptive to ("hearing") God's word and then doing it. Hours of praying and reading the Bible will not bring disobedient Christians as close to the Lord as doing his truth brings even the simplest believer.

8. Calming the storm (8:22–25)

Luke continues illustrating the powerful, authoritative word of Jesus (notice esp. 8:25, 29, 32, 54; cf. 4:36). Jesus exercises his power against natural forces, demons, illness, and death. Then he delegates this power to his disciples.

This story itself is noteworthy for its vividness and its portrayal of the Lord Jesus in complete control of himself and his environment. The climax comes not with the miracle itself but with the question of the disciples (v.25) concerning the identity of the Master. It is a nature miracle, marking the first time in Luke that Jesus applied his power to a nonliving object. Jesus is affirming his sovereignty over storm and sea as God did in the Exodus.

22–23 Jesus' words "Let us go over to the other side of the lake" (v.22) should have assured the disciples that they would indeed complete their trip across the water. Luke mentions the fury of the wind three times (vv.23, 24, 25; see comment on Mk 4:37). Luke mentions earlier in the narrative than do Matthew and Mark that Jesus was asleep. This placement heightens the contrast between the turmoil of the storm and Jesus' peaceful rest.

24–25 The fear and unbelief of the disciples are in contrast not only to the calm of their Master but also to the endurance they themselves should have had in "the time of test" (cf. v.13). The double "Master, Master" expresses both respect and terror. The fear of being lost at sea is a common human fear and typical of helplessness in the immensity of life (cf. Ps 107:23–31).

The question of the disciples, "Who is this?" serves to show not only their amazement but also the slowness of their apprehension of the "Master's" true identity. This question not only marks the climax of this story but is a key question in Luke (see comment on 9:9).

9. Healing a demon-possessed man (8:26–39)

This narrative provides the strongest expression yet of the power of Jesus against the forces of evil. Luke provides a lively, forceful picture of the destructive effects of demon possession. If a raging sea is a threat, demonic force is much worse. Not only the power of the kingdom (11:20), but also the power of the Messiah to release the captives of the kingdom of darkness move against this demonic force. The very narrative that describes this power of Jesus grips the reader. First, there are several progressive levels of action, involving the demoniac, the demons, the swine, the townspeople, and finally the demoniac after his healing. Second, Luke by his literary skill has inserted part of the description of the demoniac's past life in between the lines of dialogue to heighten the readers' awareness of the man's helplessness under demoniac control.

26–29 "They sailed" connects this episode with the previous one, suggesting the accomplishment of the goal stated in v.22. If the purpose of the trip across the lake was to liberate the demoniac (no other activity is recorded in the region of the Gerasenes), it is possible to understand the storm at sea as the deliberate attempt of evil forces to prevent Jesus' arrival.

The miracle in this section took place in Gentile territory (see comment on Mk 5:1), a fact especially important to Luke as validating the Christian mission to Gentiles. Verse 27 implies that the man was right by the shore when Jesus arrived.

In vv.27 and 29 we have a classic description of demon possession. The symptoms of such possession are like those of certain psychic illnesses known today, but Luke does not confuse illness with demon possession (cf. 4:40–41). Certain effects of demon possession cited in this passage are (1) disregard for personal dignity (nakedness), (2) social isolation, (3) retreat to the simplest kind of shelter (caves, often containing tombs), (4) demons' recognition of Jesus' deity, (5) demonic control of speech, (6) shouting, and (7) extraordinary strength. The basic tragedy of the demoniac lay in his being controlled by powers totally antithetical to God and his kingdom.

The term "Most High God" is used here as a general term for deity apart from worship (contrast 1:32, 35, 76 with Ac 16:17). The words "fell at his feet" do not indicate worship: the plea "I beg you, don't torture me!" along with the dialogue in vv.30–31 make it clear that the man's words and actions are not his own. The "torture" is presumably that of being cast into the "Abyss" (cf. Rev 20:1–3).

30–31 Jesus was not actually an exorcist (see comment on 4:33–35). Therefore his asking the demoniac's name should not be interpreted as an attempt to control the demons through knowing their host's name. Moreover, it is not clear whether Jesus asked the name of the man or of the demons, though the response comes from the latter. "Legion" implies that there were many demons. As for "Abyss," see ZPEB 1:30–31 for a wide range of meanings.

32–39 When the demons entered the swine, they were carried into the lake. In ancient thought, the water of the sea or a large lake was one form of the Abyss, though that may not be Luke's intention here.

The episode of the pigs is integral to the present narrative in two ways. Theologically, it completes the cycle just described (see comment on 8:22–25). Psychologically, it is essential for understanding the complex response of the townspeople. The report of what happened to the swine first triggered the people's fear, which merged into overwhelming awe on seeing the former demoniac "dressed and in his right mind."

But what about the ethical aspect of the pigs' destruction? Obviously the good of the man was more important than that of the pigs. Moreover, the demons themselves insisted on entering the pigs; Jesus permitted them to do this but did not actively send them there. Inevitably the discussion moves from exegesis to theology and the problem of evil—why it exists and why God in his wisdom, power, and love permits evil in this world.

Once the demons are off the scene, attention centers on the man and Jesus. Now healed and a new man, the former demoniac is commissioned by Jesus, not to go with him as a disciple, but to be a witness where he lived. Jesus has different ways for different believers to serve him (cf. Jn 21:21–22).

10. Jesus' power to heal and restore life (8:40–56)

The third part of the section on Jesus' power is composed of two intertwined stories. In both, the power and compassion of Jesus are notably displayed. Also, in both we see the importance of faith. Another point of comparison may be that Jairus's daughter was twelve years old, while the woman had suffered a hemorrhage during the same period of time. Note also the tension created for Jesus and his disciples by the two pressing needs: prevention of impending death, and helping a pathetic woman whose illness had isolated her from normal life and relationships.

40–46 The "crowds" (see comment on 3:7), now an integral part of the narrative, cover the woman's furtive approach to Jesus. Luke does not specify the nature of the "bleeding" (v.43), which is usually taken to have been a gynecological problem. The restrictions imposed by Lev 15:25–33 and by Jewish custom would have radically affected the woman's life. But her primary problem was the discomfort and embarrassment of her prolonged malady.

More serious questions are raised by (1) the woman's touching his cloak as though magical power could be transferred, and (2) Jesus' awareness of the transfer of power apparently without knowledge of who had done this. As to the first, the intrusion of Hellenistic ideas and superstitions may indeed have influenced her action; but Jesus did not quench the "smoldering wick" (Mt 12:20) of her faith; instead, he fanned it into flame.

Regarding the second issue, Jesus' question need not imply ignorance of the woman's identity but only his intention of singling her out. Yet the dialogue suggests that he knew only the fact that power had been transferred. While at times Jesus chose to heal people who had not expressed any faith, the reverse seems to be true here—namely, that someone with faith in him drew on his power without his conscious selection of that person. God may have extended his healing power through his Son without Jesus' yet being aware of the woman's identity.

47–48 The woman had desired to go unnoticed, possibly because of the embarrassment of her illness or because of her audacity in breaking her ritual isolation to touch Jesus' cloak. Her public confession of faith seems to indicate why Jesus asked who touched him. Jesus prefaced his traditional words of benediction (v.48) by words of grace (see comment on 7:50).

49–50 The episode of the sick woman delayed Jesus until word of the death of Jairus's daughter reached him. Yet the woman's healing also paved the way for Jesus' words in v.50.

51–56 Occasionally Jesus selected Peter, James, and John alone to be with him—e.g., at the Transfiguration (9:28) and in Gethsemane (Mk 14:33). The secrecy involved and the command to silence fits in with Jesus' frequent desire to avoid publicity to prevent premature or misguided declarations of his messiahship from being made (see comment on Mk 1:44). Of course, it would be hard to keep silent about the girl's restoration to active life; but the use of the word "asleep" may suggest that the crowd assumed that she had, after all, only been in a coma. But the words "her spirit returned" plainly imply that the child actually was dead. The secrecy of this miracle is in contrast with the public nature of the raising of the young man from Nain (7:16–17).

11. Sending out the Twelve (9:1–6)

The differences among the various gospels on the instructions to the disciples may be the result of an intertwining of traditions; but Jesus may also have given similar instructions on different occasions. What is described in these "sending" passages in the Gospels is not appointment to a permanent office but commissioning for an immediate task. Such an appointment could therefore be repeated using words essentially similar, though varying in detail. The common theme in all such passages, including 3Jn 5–7, is that the servants of Christ should go forth, not seeking support from unbelievers but trusting God completely to supply their needs through his people.

1–2 The "Twelve" receive both the "power" (GK 1539) and the "authority" (GK 2026) to do works of the sort that Jesus has performed in the episodes Luke has thus far reported. Signs and wonders are important to Luke, especially as the validation of the Gospel by, among other means, the apostles' miraculous power as God's messengers. Since others were claiming supernatural power (cf. Ac 13:6–10; 19:13), it was necessary for Jesus' disciples to have both "authority" and "power." This principle appears in a different context in 5:24. The connection between casting out demons and the coming of the kingdom is not as clear there as in 11:20; but the double mention of the ministry of healing here in 9:1–2 suggests that relationship.

3 The instructions indicate the urgency of the task. The severely limited provisions Jesus allowed the Twelve to take with them may be intended to express their dependence on God alone for food, protection, and shelter. Without bread or money they would need to be given daily food.

4–5 The disciples should receive hospitality graciously. Hospitality was important as well as necessary in days of difficult travel conditions and poor accommodations at inns. The disciples were not to move about from house to house, a practice that might gain them more support but would insult their hosts.

They would also encounter those who refused them a welcome. As a solemn symbol of judgment, the disciples were to shake the dust of an unresponsive town off their feet (see comment on Mk 6:10–11).

6 Luke concludes this section with a summary of the mission of the Twelve, including another reference to preaching and healing. Their instructions had not included any limitation of scope; they went everywhere.

12. Herod's perplexity (9:7–9)

Jesus has come to the end of his great Galilean ministry. The subsequent events take place to the north and east of Galilee and culminate in the confession of Jesus' messiahship, followed by the first passion prediction (vv. 19–27; cf. Mk 6:30–8:26). Prior to the narrative about the feeding of the five thousand, Luke states that Herod "was perplexed" about Jesus. This is of great importance in the sequence of Luke's gospel because it introduces the question "Who then is this. . . ?" (v.9; cf. comment on 8:25).

This all-important question is picked up again in vv.18–20.

7–9 "All that was going on" probably refers to the activities of both Jesus and the disciples on their mission. Herod (see comment on 3:1) heard about Jesus' miracles (see Mk 6:14) and had his questions about him. The questions of Jesus' identity and also of the reappearance of a dead prophet are reintroduced in vv.18–19. John the Baptist is naturally on Herod's mind (and doubtless also on his conscience). Herod was not able to see Jesus (v.9) but had his curiosity satisfied when Pilate sent Jesus to him (23:8–11).

13. Feeding the five thousand (9:10–17)

The fact that this miracle is in all four gospels indicates its importance. Luke's account is sparse and straightforward.

10–11 The return of the disciples is the occasion for Jesus' withdrawal to Bethsaida (perhaps to rest, see Mk 6:31). This town was on the northeast side of the lake outside Herod's territory. But crowds followed him to that place, and Jesus "welcomed" all who came, telling them about the kingdom (cf. 4:43) and healing many.

12–13 Each of the Synoptics records both the disciples' unimaginative suggestion that the crowds be sent away to find their own food and Jesus' response, "You give them something to eat," putting the responsibility back on them. The loaves were a basic food, often eaten with fish from the Sea of Galilee.

14–17 The crowd was much greater than five thousand, since there were that many men, plus women and children (Mt 14:21). Luke briefly summarizes the miracle, showing the orderliness of the distribution, Jesus' thanks (providing a lasting example for Christians), and the adequacy of the food.

D. Climax of Jesus' Galilean Ministry (9:18–50)

1. Peter's confession of Christ (9:18–21)

Luke moves directly and naturally from the miracle of multiplying the loaves and fishes, which pointed to Jesus' messiahship, to Peter's confession of that messiahship. From there Luke moves directly to the transfiguration narrative through the natural transition of v.28.

Theologically, this is the most important statement that Luke has written thus far. It is the first time a disciple refers to Jesus as Messiah (cf. 2:11, 26; 3:15; 4:41). Immediately after Peter's great declaration, Jesus predicts his rejection, death, and resurrection (v.22), thus shedding light on the implications of his messiahship.

18–19 Regarding this episode, Luke omits a reference to Caesarea Philippi and inserts a reference to Jesus at prayer (v.18). Luke apparently disconnects Peter's confession from time and space in order to emphasize the link between the miraculous feeding and Jesus' intimate fellowship with God, as exemplified in his praying. This is one of the insights Luke gives us into Jesus' prayer life (cf. 3:21; 6:12; 11:1). Jesus asks for the opinion of the "crowds" as to who he is. The responses echo the rumors expressed in vv.7–8.

20 Peter called Jesus "the Christ" (see comment on Mk 8:29–30). The additional words "of God" in this verse emphasize Jesus' divine commission.

21 The command not to tell others (cf. comment on 8:51–56) probably stems from two circumstances: (1) the Jewish people, chafing under the domination of Rome, were all too ready to join a messianic revolutionary; and (2) there was apparently an understanding that one should not claim messiahship for himself but should first do the works of the Messiah and then be acclaimed as such by others (see comment on 7:21–23).

2. The suffering and glory of the Son of Man (9:22–27)

22 This statement is known as the first passion prediction. Although there had been foreshadowings of a dark fate for Jesus—Simeon's prediction (2:35) and Jesus' statement about the bridegroom (5:35)—here in Jesus' words is the first explicit recitation in Luke of the sequence of events at the close of his life. The entire following teaching on discipleship requires some basic understanding of the Passion and, indeed, of the Crucifixion, since Jesus mentions the Cross (v.23). The use of the term "Son of Man" in vv.22, 26 is understandable, assuming (1) that Jesus used it frequently, (2) that he used it especially in connection with his passion (see comment on Mk 8:31), and (3) that the occurrence of the term in Mt 16:14 is not editorial but reflects Jesus' actual use of it in his initial question to the disciples.

23 Those who want to be Jesus' disciples can only truly be said to "follow" (GK 199) him when they have implemented a radical decision to "deny" (GK 766) themselves. This verb functions as a polar opposite to the verb "confess" (GK 3933) which has the sense of acknowledging a thing or a person. We should therefore on the one hand "confess" Christ, i.e., acknowledge him and identify ourselves with him, and, on the other hand, not set our desires and our will against the right Christ has to our lives. It does not mean cultivating a weak, nonassertive personality or merely denying ourselves certain pleasures; rather, it means we must live for Christ. The next words about the daily cross explain and intensify this principle. To take up the cross daily is to live each day, not for self, but for Christ.

24–26 These two statements (vv.24–25) show the futility of clinging to one's "life," because that, paradoxically, results in losing the very self one wants to preserve. In contrast, the person who invests his or her life for God finds that such a life is not lost after all. Jesus then goes on to emphasize his point. The world the disciple are willing to forfeit is to be succeeded by the new order when the Son of Man comes in glory (v.26). The one who seeks gain by letting the world's view of Christ make him or her ashamed of the Lord rightly draws a corresponding response from the glorified Son of Man.

27 This is a perplexing verse. "Some who are standing here" refers either to the disciples as a group as opposed to the crowd, or to some of the disciples as opposed to the rest of the disciples.

There have been a number of different proposals as to what specific experience Jesus had in mind when he said these words. He may have meant Pentecost, for the coming of the Spirit brought the dynamic of the kingdom. More likely, however, he meant the Transfiguration, which Luke is about to discuss. That event focuses even more sharply on the kingdom and is, among other things, a preview of the Parousia, which event is clearly connected with the reign of Christ (see comment on vv.28–36; see 2Pe 1:16–18). If Jesus was referring to the Transfiguration here, then the "some" who would not die before seeing the kingdom were Peter, James, and John, who saw Jesus transfigured. Why Jesus said they would "not taste death" before participating in an event only days away is perplexing. But he may have chosen those words because most people despaired of seeing the glory of the kingdom in their lifetime.

3. The Transfiguration (9:28–36)

This glorious transformation of the appearance of Christ is the most significant event between his birth and passion. Both the transformation itself and the divine commentary expressed in the Voice from heaven declare Jesus Christ to be the beloved Son of God. Luke emphasizes a further dimension of the event—the suffering that lay ahead of God's chosen Servant (see comments on vv.30–31, 35). In addition to the main elements of the Transfiguration itself and the words from heaven, the narrative contains several motifs of deep significance: the eight-day interlude, the mountain, Moses and Elijah, Jesus' impending "departure," the shelters, and the cloud.

Two frames of reference, one past and one future, will help us understand these motifs. One is the Exodus of the people of Israel from Egypt with the events at Mount Sinai, especially Moses' experience on the mount (Ex 24). The other is the second coming of Christ, the "Parousia" (cf. v.26).

28 The Transfiguration occurred about a week after Peter's confession of Jesus. There may be a connection here with the amount of time Moses spent on Mount Sinai before God spoke to him (see Ex 24:15–16; Mk 9:2).

Peter, James, and John had been taken into Jesus' confidence elsewhere (8:5). Luke uses the definite article with "mountain." It may be Mount Meron, the highest mountain within Israel, northwest of the Sea of Galilee (see also comment on Mk 9:2). On the other hand, Luke may be using "mountain" symbolically. Symbolism is not infrequent in references to mountains, regardless of whether a historical mountain is referred to. If we think of the Exodus as a frame of reference, then Sinai is symbolically in mind; if the Parousia, then the Mount of Olives may be symbolized (Zec 14:4; Ac 1:10–12).

Once again Luke mentions that Jesus is at prayer.

29 Luke omits the actual word "transfigured," possibly to avoid a term that might have suggested Hellenistic ideas of an epiphany, the appearance of a god. Instead he describes the remarkable alteration of Jesus' face and the dazzling whiteness of his clothing.

30–31 Moses and Elijah also appear in this scene of supernatural glory, though Luke describes them as ordinary "men" (see comment on 24:4). Why these two? Moses had a mountaintop experience at Sinai; his face shone (Ex 34:30; 2Co 3:7); he was both a lawgiver and a prophet—indeed the prototype of Jesus (Dt 18:18). Elijah was not only a prophet but was also related to the law of Moses as symbolizing the one who would one day turn people's hearts back to the covenant (Mal 4:4–6). In other words, Moses is a typological figure who reminds us of the past (the Exodus), while Elijah is an eschatological figure who points to the future as a precursor of the Messiah. Each man was among the most highly respected OT figures; both had one distinctive thing in common—their strange departure from this world (see Dt 34:6; 2Ki 2:11). In summary, the presence of Moses and Elijah on the Mount of Transfiguration draws attention (1) to the place of Jesus in continuing the redemptive work of God from the Exodus to the future eschatological consummation; (2) to the appropriateness of Jesus' association with heavenly figures; and (3) to the superiority of Jesus over even these great and divinely favored heroes of Israel's past.

The conversation is about Jesus' "departure" (lit., his "exodus"; GK 2016). It points to Jesus' death and recalls the redemptive work of God in the Exodus from Egypt. Jesus' coming death was one that he would deliberately accomplish. Luke portrays Jesus as moving unhurriedly toward the accomplishment of his goals. He specifies Jerusalem as the city of destiny for Jesus (see comments on 13:31–35).

32 The writers of the Gospels use fear and sleepiness to indicate the slowness of the disciples to understand and believe. They were far from alert during the conversation with Moses and Elijah about Jesus' approaching passion; and the spectacular scene aroused them thoroughly.

33 Peter's suggestion to make three shelters implies that he wanted to keep Moses and Elijah from leaving. But Luke points out that Peter's suggestion was highly inappropriate. The idea of three shelters is the main problem. These would have been temporary shelters, such as were used at the Feast of Tabernacles. Peter's proposal of three, presumably equal, shelters may have implied a leveling perspective, putting Jesus on a par with the others. More than that, it connotes an intention to perpetuate the situation as though there were no "departure" for Jesus to accomplish. He still failed to grasp the significance of the passion prediction of v.22 and its confirmation in v.31.

34 The cloud, like other elements in this narrative, can symbolize more than one thing, among them the cloud in the desert after the Exodus (Ex 13:21–22; 16:10; 24:16; 40:34–38). But clouds are also associated with the future coming of the Son of Man (Da 7:13; cf. Mk 14:62) and with the two prophets in Rev 11:12. There may be a possible reference to the Parousia here or to the cloud that will appear during a future time of rest under the Messiah (cf. Isa 4:5). But above all the cloud symbolizes the glorious presence of God (cf. Ex 19:16). Though the disciples enter the cloud, a sense of the transcendence of God is retained as the Voice comes "from" the cloud (v.35).

35 The Voice speaking from the cloud is the awesome Voice of God the Father himself. The message expressed by the Voice is so clear that any uncertainty about the meaning of some of the other aspects of this great scene become comparatively unimportant. The focus throughout the Transfiguration is on the supreme person and glory of the Lord Jesus Christ. And now he is expressly declared to be God's Son—a declaration similar to that spoken by the Voice at Jesus' baptism (cf. 3:22) and later just before his passion (Jn 12:28–30). It affirms that Jesus is the one who is sent by God and who has God's authority. These words spoken by the Voice on these three occasions affirm that Jesus is the Son of God, is obedient to him, and possesses divine authority for his mission. The words "this is my Son" recall Ps 2:7; "chosen" (GK 1721) points us to Isa 42:1 and the concept of the Suffering Servant found in the broader context of Isaiah (esp. 52:13–53:12).

"Listen [GK 201] to him" is not only a command; it is a correction of the human tendency to substitute human opinion for divine revelation. The words also fulfill Dt 18:15, which predicts the coming of the prophet God would raise up and commands, "You must listen to him." Jesus alone is the True Prophet, the Chosen Servant, and the Son of God.

36 The scene ends with Jesus alone as the center of his disciples' attention. They remain silent about this event (see comment on Mk 9:9–10).

4. Healing a boy with an evil spirit (9:37–45)

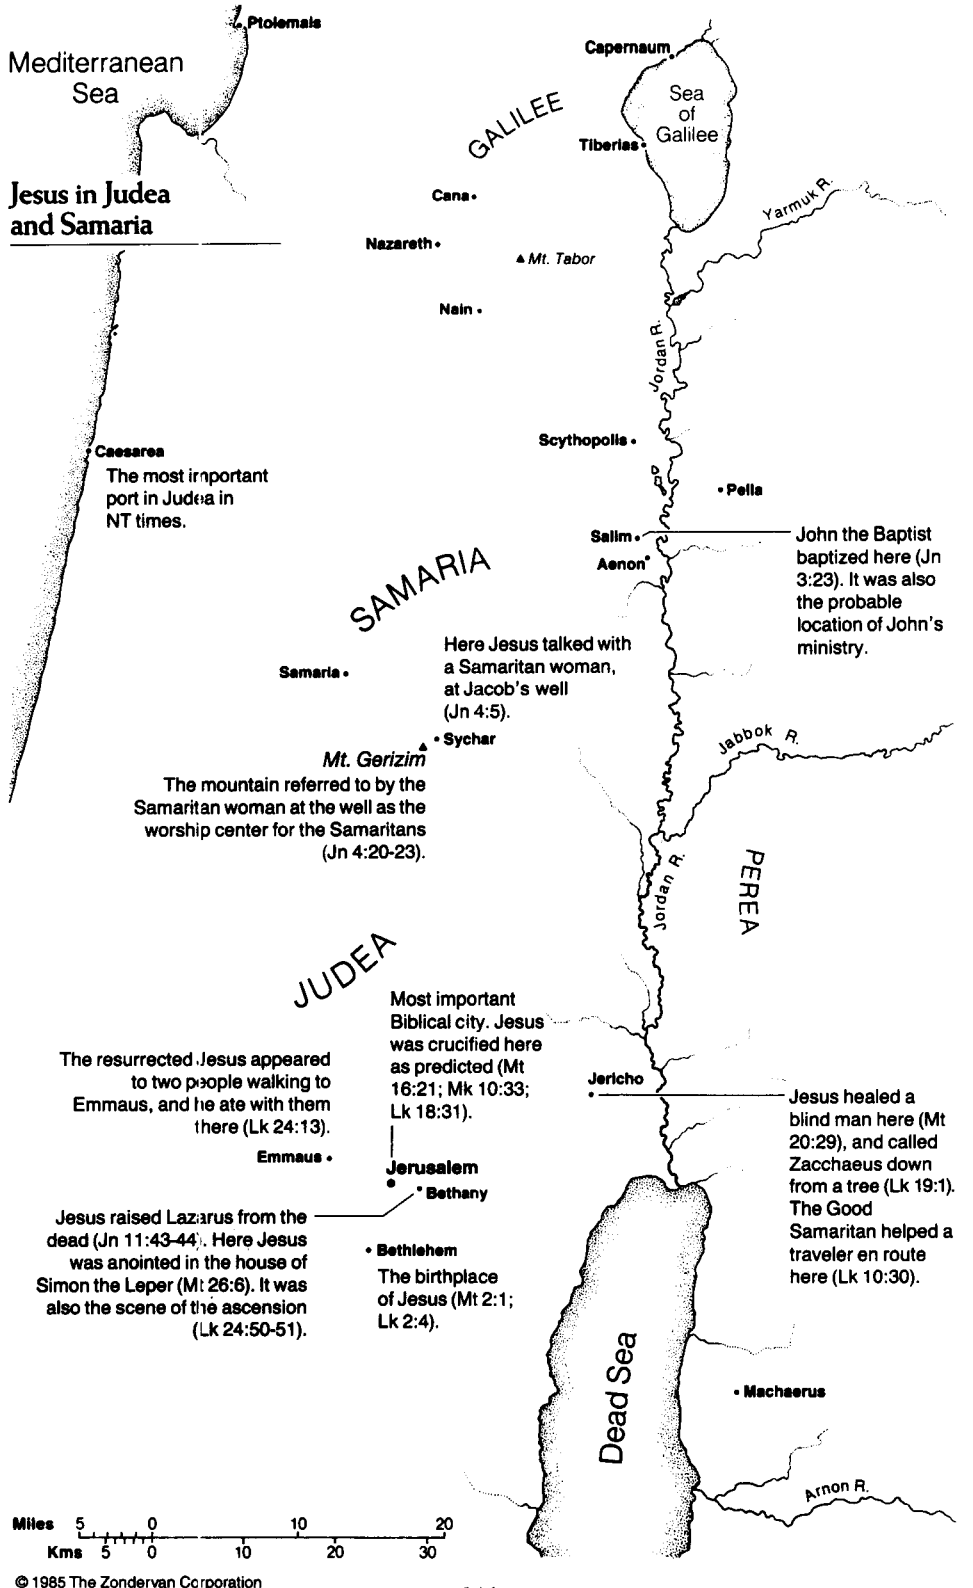
This healing is another significant example of the power of God over demons. It also implies Jesus' strong censure of the disciples for not performing the exorcism.

37–42 "The next day" may imply that the Transfiguration happened at night. If so, then that great event would have been even more striking. The descent of Jesus and the disciples "from the mountain" meant a descent into the earthly world of illness, evil, and unbelief. A "large crowd" had gathered around a demon-possessed boy. The physical manifestations were similar to those of epilepsy and the boy experienced continual debilitating oppression. While three of the disciples were witnessing the Transfiguration, the others were helpless in the face of demonic power (v.40). Jesus rebuked the spirit and cast it out.

43a Luke concludes his account of the boy's healing by speaking of the greatness of God and the reaction of those who observed the healing. Elsewhere Luke speaks similarly of people giving God glory (5:25; 7:16).

43b–45 This repetition of the prediction of Jesus' passion (cf. comments on 9:22) might be considered as a separate section, had not Luke connected it closely with the preceding incident by the marveling of the crowd. The passion prediction serves to emphasize that Jesus' ultimate purpose went beyond such miracles. This time Jesus includes a reference to his betrayal. The people, however, failed to understand (cf. Mt 16:22), and they were not granted understanding of the meaning of Jesus' words. Luke does imply, however, that had they asked Jesus for help in understanding his words, they might have been given it.

5. Two cases of rivalry (9:46–50)



46–48 This passage naturally follows the preceding two verses. The disciples did not understand Jesus' role as the Suffering Servant and so could not grasp its implications for them as his disciples. They were still thinking of the Messiah only in terms of triumph, assuming, quite naturally, that their position was important. The issue was not whether there would be rank in the kingdom but the nature and qualifications of such rank (v.46). Jesus' reference to the "little child" refers to receiving for the sake of Christ a person who has no status. This is consistent with Jesus' (and Luke's) concern for neglected people. The meaning, then, is that instead of seeking status for ourselves (out of pride as an associate of the Messiah), we Christians should, as Jesus did, identify ourselves with those who have no status at all, welcoming them to join us in the kingdom. By ministering to a child one ministers, without realizing it, to Christ himself.

49 The next episode reveals the apostles' attitude of rivalry. The issue is not orthodoxy but association. The man referred to here had actually been "driving out demons" through Jesus' name.

50 This verse is proverbial in form. The man was not against Jesus. Apparently he had not yet joined the group of Jesus' disciples but was probably "on the way" to joining; he should be welcomed rather than repulsed.

V. Teaching and Travels Toward Jerusalem (9:51–19:44)

This extensive section has no counterpart in Matthew or Mark, though much of its material is found in other contexts in those gospels. Luke 9:51 implies that Jesus was setting out on a journey that one would expect to be described in the succeeding chapters. Yet these chapters say comparatively little about Jesus' traveling from one place to another, though we do occasionally find clues showing that Jesus is moving toward Jerusalem (e.g., 9:52; 10:38; 13:22, 32–33; 17:11; 19:28, 41). In 18:31, Luke notes Jesus' words: "We are going up to Jerusalem" (see 18:35; 19:1); he arrives near Jerusalem in 19:28–29. It is clear from all this that Jesus is now heading toward Jerusalem, not Galilee.

However, he did not make one continuous journey from Galilee to Jerusalem. Jesus' ministry has entered a new phase and has taken on some new characteristics. He follows routes that bring him away from Galilee and nearer to Jerusalem than his former itineraries did. During this period Jesus is no longer committed to the locale of his former ministry but is looking toward Jerusalem and the Cross. Much of his teaching at this time is directed to the disciples. Warnings to the rich and complacent are prominent, as well as words aimed at the Pharisees. On several occasions he actually visits Jerusalem, where he proclaims the truth about himself and enters into controversy with those who oppose his claim. Even at times when he may have traveled north again, his ultimate goal was Jerusalem. This also accords with the prominence of Jerusalem in the gospel of Luke (see comments on 13:33–34; 19:28, 41).

A. The New Direction in Jesus' Ministry (9:51–10:24)

1. Travel south through Samaria (9:51–56)

51 As just observed, there is now a major change in Jesus' orientation; he is heading to Jerusalem where he would die. At this significant turning point, Luke once again uses a word expressing fulfillment (unfortunately translated "approached" in NIV; GK 5230, a compound of GK 4444). God's plan is another step nearer fulfillment. The approaching goal is not only Christ's death and resurrection but especially his ascension (see introductory note on ch. 26). Now that Jesus faces the Cross, Luke mentions the exaltation that would follow his "exodus" (see v.31).

52 Jesus "sent messengers on ahead" (cf. 10:1–16), who were not told to preach but simply to "get things ready for him."

53–54 The residents of the Samaritan village reciprocated the hostile attitude of the Jews (cf. Jn 4:9). They were especially negative because they knew that Jesus was going to Jerusalem, which they refused to acknowledge as a valid center of worship (cf. Jn 4:20).

The history of the Samaritans is uncertain. Many hold that they were a mixed race since the fall of the northern kingdom of Israel. The king of Assyria deported the leaders of Israel, among them the religious teachers, and replaced them with foreigners (2Ki 17:6, 24–26). From that time on, the inhabitants of the northern kingdom received no further prophetic instruction, nor did they recognize God's revelation to the southern kingdom. The Samaritans were a fringe segment of the Jewish world for which Jesus, and Luke, had a concern (see 10:30–37; 17:11–19). James and John may have thought that Jesus would respond as Elijah had (v.54; 2Ki 1:9–12).

55–56 Jesus strongly disapproved the suggestion of James and John by rebuking them (cf. 4:35, 41; 8:24). If the Samaritans were consciously rejecting Christ by rejecting his disciples, one would have expected that Jesus' instruction in 9:5 would apply—a mild reaction compared to that of James and John. But Jesus' messengers were rejected merely because they were Jews going to Jerusalem.

2. The cost of following Jesus (9:57–62)

This is the second major treatment of discipleship in Luke (cf. v.23). The structure of this passage is noteworthy. The familiar "rule of three" is employed by Luke in recording three conversations. There is an interchange of order: in the first conversation the inquirer initiates the conversation and Jesus states the objection; in the second order this is reversed; in the third the man both initiates the dialogue and raises the objection, with Jesus adding a comment. Each dialogue contains some theological language: "Son of Man" (v.58), "proclaim the kingdom of God" (v.60), "service in the kingdom of God" (v.62). Discipleship is not simply following Jesus in one's lifestyle but is involvement in the important work of the kingdom.

57–58 Using the terminology of discipleship ("follow"), the first man amplifies it with a sweeping promise. Jesus' reply is in accord with his prior definition of discipleship in v.23 and constitutes a comment on the man's "wherever you go." Since most people do have homes, "Son of Man" must refer specifically to Jesus. The idea of the rejection—if not his actual suffering—of the Son of Man is implied in Jesus' words.

59–60 Since it was a religious, social, and family obligation to provide a decent funeral for one's father, Jesus' refusal to permit this is a striking example of the radical transfer of loyalty he demanded (see 14:25–27). "The dead" who are to perform the burial are usually thought to be the spiritually dead who do not follow Jesus but remain at home.

61–62 Although saying good-by is not at all the emotional equivalent of a funeral, it still represents a family duty that must be forsaken for service to Jesus. Some see here an allusion to the call of Elisha while plowing and his request to say good-by to his family (1Ki 19:19–21). It was important for an ancient plowman to concentrate on the furrow before him, guiding the light plow with his left hand while goading the oxen with the right. Looking away would result in a crooked furrow.

3. Sending out the seventy-two (10:1–24)

Luke's account of Jesus' commissioning of the seventy-two fits the immediate context well. It continues the procedure of sending messengers ahead during Jesus' journey (9:52). At the same time, the obedient response of the seventy-two provides a contrast to the three men (9:57–62) whose excuses disqualified them from discipleship. The instructions prescribed by Jesus were undoubtedly repeated frequently by Jesus and in the early church (see comments on 9:1–6).

1 The title "Lord" (GK 3261) emphasized the serious dominical aspect of the instructions—namely, that they came from the Lord Jesus himself. Not only does the commissioning of the seventy-two lack any restriction to Jewish hearers (as in Mt 10:5–6), but the number of missionaries sent out parallels the number of nations thought to exist in the world (see Ge 10, LXX) and so suggests the deliberate inclusion of Gentiles.

Sending messengers "two by two" was common among the early Christians and the Jews (see comment on Mk 6:7). The seventy-two were to go everywhere Jesus was going. The extent of this mission underscores the mission of the church: to reach the plentiful harvest. It may also look toward the conclusion of the church's mission at Jesus' return (cf. Mt 10:23).

2–3 Although the harvest imagery in Scripture usually refers to God's intervention in history through gathering his people together (cf. Mt 13:37–43), here it applies to the urgent missionary task of the present age (cf. Mt 9:37–38; Jn 4:35). The imperative "go" anticipates the difficulties of the journey. Wolves are natural enemies of sheep. The disciples are like "lambs"—defenseless and dependent on God alone.

4 The limitations on what the seventy-two may take with them increase their vulnerability (see comment on 9:3). They must also be single-minded, even to the extent of not becoming involved in time-consuming greetings (cf. 2Ki 4:29).

5–6 Greetings are to be reserved for the hosts of the seventy-two. "Peace" (GK 1645), so familiar in Jewish salutations, has a rich connotation here. If the host has a proper attitude toward God, he will receive the blessings of the kingdom (v.9). But this promised peace would leave those hosts who were not receptive to the kingdom's message.

7 Like the Twelve (9:4), the seventy-two are to remain with their original hosts. As the Lord's servants, they are deserving of support by the Lord's people (see 1Co 9:3–18; 1Ti 5:18; 3 Jn 5–8).

8–9 It is not clear whether the messengers feared being offered food prohibited to Jews. These words may have been preserved because of their appropriateness to later situations (cf. Ac 10:9–16; 1Co 10:27).

10–11 Rejecting the kingdom message has consequences: a Day of Judgment. Luke includes such warnings of it in 6:24–26; 12:46–48; 16:23–24; 21:22.

12 Sodom, destroyed along with Gomorrah (Ge 19:24–29), represents the consequences of ignoring God's warning to repent (cf. Mt 10:15; 11:20–24). "More bearable" probably relates not so much to the degree of punishment as to the degree of culpability. If Sodom cannot escape judgment, what hope does a city that rejects the Lord Jesus have?

13–14 Korazin and Bethsaida are located at the north end of the Sea of Galilee (see comment on Mt 11:21–22), where Jesus concentrated his ministry. The comparison with the Phoenician towns of Tyre and Sidon suggests utter rebellion against the Lord, for those two ancient pagan towns suffered drastic judgment for their proud opposition to God and his people (Isa 23:1–18; Jer 25:22; 47:4; et al.).

"Sackcloth," a coarse, black material, was worn as a sign of mourning or repentance (cf. 1Ki 21:27). "Ashes" could also symbolize repentance or contrition (e.g., Job 42:6).

15–16 Capernaum had the high privilege of hearing Jesus preach there frequently, but this privilege guaranteed neither its fame nor its survival. On the contrary, in language like that of Isaiah 14:12–15, Jesus graphically portrays Capernaum's fall. He goes on to iterate that reception or rejection of his messengers demonstrates one's attitude to the Lord himself (cf. Mt 25:31–46).

17 The messengers returned to Jesus filled with joy. The power of the kingdom was effective against demons just as it was in the ministry of Christ (11:20). Exorcism must be done in the name of Christ; that is, on his authority (contrast Ac 19:13–16).

18 This verse falls back on the taunt-song describing the fall of the king of Babylon (Isa 14:4–11). When the disciples exorcise demons, the forces of evil are shaken, symbolizing the defeat of Satan himself.

19 To have authority "to trample on snakes and scorpions" relates to the victorious work of Christ, who, according to the first promise of the Gospel in Ge 3:15, was to bruise the head of the Serpent, the devil. The ultimate implication of overcoming "all the power of the enemy" is to be victorious over the one through whose temptation sin entered into humanity.

20 This call to rejoicing in the supreme blessing of assurance of heaven is one of Jesus' great sayings, though the disciples may also rejoice in spiritual victories (cf. v.17). The idea of the names of God's faithful people being written down in heaven in a book is common in biblical writings (e.g., Ex 32:32–33; Ps 69:28; Da 12:1; Mal 3:16; Rev 20:12–15).

21–22 The emphasis on joy combines with another subject of Luke's special interest—the Holy Spirit in the life of Christ. These verses show (1) God's sovereignty in imparting revelation, (2) the relationship between the Father and the Son, and (3) the privilege the disciples had of participating in this instance of messianic revelation and salvation.

Jesus' words relate to the time in which the power of the kingdom is revealed. Jesus himself participates in the joy that characterizes the day of God's salvation, a theme established at the beginning of Luke's gospel (e.g., 1:44). He combines joy with thanksgiving on the occasion of God's mighty saving work. A remarkable thing stressed by Jesus is not that the wise do not understand God's revelation but that the simple do. The "children" are those whose open, trusting attitude makes them receptive to God's word.

The knowledge God gives is "committed" (GK 4140) directly to the Son. This explains why Jesus spoke with authority (4:32) in contrast to the scribes (Mk 1:22), who received their ideas through tradition, passed on from rabbi to rabbi. Jesus' sayings confirm other teachings in the Synoptics and in John about the fatherhood of God and the unique sonship of Christ.

23–24 Jesus congratulates the disciples privately on participating in this revelation. The woes that Jesus pronounced earlier on those whose pride will be broken (vv.13–15) are balanced by the blessings of those granted salvation (cf. 1:52–55; 6:20–26).

B. Teachings (10:25–11:13)

1. Parable of the Good Samaritan (10:25–37)

This parable requires the utmost care in its interpretation. It must neither be overallegorized, as it was by the early church fathers, nor reduced to a simplistic meaning hardly worthy of Jesus' teaching. Above all, it must be understood in its context.

25 The expertise of the man in this incident lay in details of the Jewish religion. The fact that he wanted to "test" Jesus may, but does not necessarily, indicate hostility. He addressed Jesus as "teacher" and asked him about eternal life. Questions about achieving eternal life and about the essence of the law were common in Judaism; note his assumption of human responsibility in the attainment of eternal life. "Eternal life" here means the life of the kingdom.

26 Jesus' counterquestion does not constitute an affirmation of the assumption behind the question but directs the questioner back to the commandments of the OT, which are not only his special field but also the ultimate source of religious knowledge.

27 The expert on the law answers Jesus' question by quoting a commandment (cf. Mt 22:37–40). The answer is satisfactory so far as it goes, for it is based on the OT (Dt 6:5; Lev 19:18). The words "as yourself" will provide the crucial means of evaluating one's love of neighbor. The ultimate evaluation will have to be based on deeds, not words, as the parable shows.

28 Jesus affirms that the man has answered correctly. This does not mean that the inquirer has grasped the full meaning of the law, nor does it endorse the idea held by many Pharisees that by keeping the law a person can earn eternal life.

29 The only way to justify oneself is to limit the extent of the law's demand and consequently limit one's own responsibility (see comment on Mk 12:31). This maneuver not only fails but has an opposite effect. Jesus will change the man's very words ("Who is my neighbor?") from a passive to an active sense (v.36).

30 The characters of the story must have the same significance they had to the original hearers. The two religious persons act contrary to love, though not contrary to expectation. The priest, returning from Jerusalem, has been observing the Law, though studious readers will recognize the neglect of mercy (cf. Mic 6:8; Lk 6:36). Then a third character appears, but unexpectedly he is not just a layman (in contrast to the clerical characters) but a Samaritan (in contrast to the Jewish victim).

The distance from Jerusalem to Jericho is about seventeen miles, descending sharply toward the Jordan River just north of the Dead Sea. The road curved through rugged, rocky terrain where robbers could easily hide. It was considered especially dangerous.

31–32 Priests served in the temple; their highest duty was to offer sacrifices. Levites assisted in the maintenance of the temple services and order. We are not told why the priest and Levite refused to help, but the point of the story seems to require that the priest and the Levite have no legitimate excuse.

The terrain from Jerusalem to Jericho is rugged and isolated. In Bible times, robbers would hide in the hills and caves.

33–36 "Took pity" (GK 5072) implies a deep feeling of sympathy, a striking response that stands in contrast not only to the attitude of the priest and the Levite, but also to the usual feelings of hostility between Jew and Samaritan. This pity is translated into sacrificial action. The Samaritan probably used pieces of his own clothing to make the bandages (v.34); he used his own wine as a disinfectant and his own oil as a soothing lotion. He put the man on "his own donkey" and paid the innkeeper out of his own pocket, with a promise to pay more if needed.

The NT parables aim to lead one to a decision; Jesus' question in v.36 forces the "expert in the law" to voice his decision. In his question, Jesus focuses on the person who loved, the Samaritan who made himself a neighbor. This reversal of the "expert's" question (v.29) provides in itself the key to the meaning of the parable and to Jesus' teaching on love. Love should not be limited by its object; its extent and quality are in the control of its subject. Furthermore, love is demonstrated in action, in this case in an act of mercy, and it may be costly. There is a striking reversal of roles here. The Jewish "expert" would have thought of the Jewish victim as a good person and the Samaritan as an evil one. To a Jew there was no such person as a "good" Samaritan.

37 The "expert" cannot avoid the thrust of the parable, though he apparently finds it impossible to say the word "Samaritan" in his reply. Jesus now refers back to the original question, "What must I do?" by saying, "Go and do likewise." God does not bestow the life of the kingdom on people who reject the command to love (see also 18:18–25). Such rejection shows that they have not truly recognized how much they need the love of God themselves (see 7:36–50).

2. The home of Martha and Mary (10:38–42)

In 8:1–3 Luke mentioned several women who traveled with Jesus and the disciples and contributed to their support. Now he tells about a woman who entered into discipleship. Once again Luke portrays the way Jesus transcended the prejudices of his day.

38–40 The unnamed "village" was undoubtedly Bethany (Jn 11:1), a town close to Jerusalem. Possibly Luke wants to reserve mention of Jesus' ministry in Jerusalem and its environs till later. The way Martha is mentioned seems to give her the role of hostess. It is Mary, however, who takes the place of a disciple by sitting at the feet of the teacher (v.39). It was unusual for a woman in first-century Judaism to be accepted by a teacher as a disciple. Notice that Jesus is called "Lord" throughout this passage. Martha, on the other hand, was "distracted" (v.40); she had to work alone rather than sit at Jesus' feet.

41–42 The Lord shows concern for Martha's anxiety, but the precise meaning of his saying (v.42) is difficult to ascertain. There is no explanation of "what is better," though the best interpretation is the kingdom of God. In comparison with the kingdom, household duties should have a radically diminishing demand on Martha. The word of the Lord has first claim, and for the disciple an attitude of learning and obedience should take first place.

The preceding narrative and parable establish the importance of priorities in the Christian life—i.e., heeding the commands to love God and one's neighbor. Martha must now learn to give the Lord and his word priority even over loving service. There are important human needs, whether of the victim in vv.30–35 or of Jesus himself. But what is most "needed" goes beyond even these.

3. Teaching on prayer (11:1–13)

The Lord's Prayer in Luke appears in connection with Jesus' own practice and teaching on prayer (see also comments on Mt 6:9–13). Luke offers a basic prayer to say what is characteristic of Jesus' teaching.

1–4 Once more Luke speaks of Jesus at prayer (cf. 3:21; 6:12; 9:28). His exemplary practice introduces the exemplary prayer. Since prayer inevitably expresses one's theology, the prayers of the Jewish sects in the first century were distinctive. This was true of John the Baptist (v.1). Jesus responds to the request from "one of the disciples" with a model that provides words his disciples can use with the confidence that they express Jesus' own teachings. The words "when you pray" (v.2) imply frequent repetition of the actual prayer.

The word "Father" (GK 4252) expresses the essence of Jesus' message and the effect of his atoning work on our relationship with God. Through the use of this intimate but respectful term of address, the Son of God expresses his own unique relationship to God. Through his atoning death on the cross, the Savior has brought about reconciliation with God, making it possible for us to become his spiritual children through the new birth. While we cannot use the term "Father" (Abba) on an equal basis with Jesus, there is a sense in which both he and we may address God as such (Ro 8:14–17).

The petitions that follow are two kinds—the first two petitions relate to God, the last three to us. "Hallowed [GK 39] be your name" is an ascription of worship basic to all prayer and is found in various forms in the OT (e.g., Ps 111:9) and in ancient Jewish prayers. It means "let your name be regarded as holy." It is not so much a petition as an act of worship; the speaker, by his words, exalts the holiness of God. God's people were told in the OT to keep his name holy (Lev 22:32; cf. Ps 79:9; Isa 29:33).

In the next petition, Jesus prays that the glory and reign of God may be realized soon; Jesus came to announce and bring in the kingdom. Though its consummation is still future, in his ministry the kingdom was inaugurated in power.

The three petitions that follow are closely connected with the "Father" and give a more distinctive character to the prayer as a whole.

The first of the three petitions relating to us is for "bread," representing food in general. The meaning of the word translated

"daily" (GK 2157) is obscure, so the context of the word becomes crucial. The petition can be paraphrased in the Greek word order as follows: "Our bread, the daily, keep giving to us each day." "Each day" is in an emphatic position at the end of the clause. The word "daily" may mean "for tomorrow," i.e., the next day. This would be appropriate if it were an evening prayer. It could also signify the eschatological bread, that is, God's abundant provision at the consummation of the kingdom. If that is the meaning, then Jesus asks us to pray for the provision of this aspect of the future feast in our own lives now. Finally, the word "daily" may also mean "sufficient." This meaning fits in with Luke's stress on depending on God for present needs. To trust God for sufficient food day by day was important to people in Jesus' time, for many were hired only a day at a time (cf. Mt 20:1–5). When the people of Israel were in the wilderness, they had to learn to trust God for manna day by day (Ex 16:4; Dt 8:6).

"Forgive us our sins" describes a petition that must be repeated as needed. Those who call God "Father" are believers, already justified and without guilt through the death of Christ. Therefore the forgiveness they must extend to others is not the basis of their salvation but a prerequisite for daily fellowship with the Father (see 1Jn 1:5-10). Conversely, one who does not forgive others may actually be revealing that he or she has not really known God's forgiveness (cf. Lk 7:47).

"Lead us not into temptation [GK 4280]" does not imply that God might otherwise entice us to do evil (see Ja 1:1–15). God does, however, allow his people to be tested as to their faithfulness (see comments on 4:1–12). Thus "testing" is a better translation than "temptation," though severe testing may be the occasion for one to sin. The request is clearly for the Father to keep his children from falling away in the hour of trial, with a possible allusion to the temptation and fidelity of Christ.

5–6 Jesus' teaching on prayer continues (vv.5–13) with a parable unique to Luke. The scene is that of a Palestinian home in which the family are all asleep in one room—perhaps the only room in the house—and probably all on one mat. The father could not get over to the door and slide back the heavy bolt that bars it without waking up his family. In such a situation no one would be happy to respond, especially in the middle of the night. Nevertheless the man does respond to his friend at the door. A host in first-century society would be expected to provide a welcome to a guest regardless of when he arrived.

7–8 The point of the parable depends partly on the context and partly on the meaning of the word "persistence" or "boldness" (NIV, NASB; GK 357) or "importunity" (RSV, KJV). If it means the former, the parable would seem to teach that if we persist long enough, God will finally answer our prayers. But since the Bible refers frequently to God's eagerness to grant our requests, "boldness" is a more likely translation. This parable then presents a contrast to the way God answers prayer. If in human circumstances one will respond to a request, even though reluctantly, if pressed hard enough, surely God will answer and do so far more graciously (cf. 18:1–8).

9–10 In threefold poetic form, Jesus teaches that "everyone who asks"—not simply the persistent—will receive from God.

11–13 The bizarre examples in vv.11–12 reinforce the point that God will respond to our petitions only in kindness. There are two steps in the argument: (1) God is our heavenly Father (v.13) and will do no less for his children than would an earthly father; (2) God is perfect and will do "much more" than a sinful person would. While Mt 7:11 has the general term "good gifts," Luke specifically mentions the Holy Spirit, who was "promised" (cf. 24:49; Ac 1:4).

C. Growing Opposition (11:14–54)

1. Jesus and Beelzebub (11:14–28)

This event shows the real nature of the increasing opposition Jesus faced. The Beelzebub controversy leads to the sign of Jonah, continues with the woes against the unbelieving religious leaders, and concludes with a comment regarding Jesus' mother, together with a statement that obedience to God's word is more important than even the closest human ties to Jesus.

As in Matthew and Mark, this incident shows that Jesus' hearers must choose between good (Jesus, the Spirit, and God's kingdom) and evil (Satan and his demons).

The issue is nothing less than the source of Jesus' authority and power. This is especially important for Luke, who is deeply aware of the importance of the supernatural as a testimony that Jesus is the promised Messiah (cf. Ac 2:22, 43; 4:30; et al.). The climax of the passage comes in v.20 (see comment).

14–16 The setting of this account of the Beelzebub controversy is the healing of a deaf mute. Such a healing was among the signs of his messiahship that Jesus had reminded John the Baptist of (7:22). Once more (cf. 4:36 et al.) the crowds are amazed at Jesus' power over demons. The crowd is divided, however, between those who either oppose him outrightly by attributing his power to the head demon, "Beelzebub," a euphemism for Satan (see comment on Mt 10:25), or taunt him to give them an even more dramatic sign (which constitutes a "testing" or provocation; see comment on vv.29–30).

17–20 Jesus "knew their thoughts" (cf. 5:22; 7:39–47) and responded. The head of any army would hardly work with the enemy against his own troops. Moreover, if demons are exorcised by the power of their own leader, how do the Jews explain the power their own exorcists (cf. Ac 19:13–14) are supposed to have? Jesus' illustration shows the drastic antithesis between the powers of evil, darkness, and Satan on the one hand and the power of God, the Holy Spirit, and the kingdom of light (cf. Col 1:12–13) on the other hand. When the magicians in Egypt were unable to duplicate all the miracles Moses did before the Exodus, they said to Pharaoh, "This is the finger of God" (Ex 8:19). So here Jesus is affirming that the source of his power is "the finger of God" (v.20), i.e., God himself. If this is true, then Jesus' driving out demons is a messianic sign and the kingdom of God has arrived.

21–23 In the parable of the strong man guarding his own house, we have a principal reference to Jesus' tactics in his war against Satan. The ultimate and actual means of Jesus' victory is the Cross. The critical place in Jesus' ministry of his victory over Satan means that we also must take a stand for or against Jesus as the one who brings the kingdom (v.23). Whoever does not "gather" the sheep "scatters" them by default and thus works counter to Jesus (cf. Jn 10:11–13).

24–26 "Evil spirit" means "demon." In these verses a spiritual renewal has taken place, but without the indwelling of the Spirit and the power of Christ's kingdom (perhaps this refers to the work of the Jewish exorcists mentioned in v.19). The evil spirit wanders in the desert and seeks a human body. In order to repossess its previous abode, it enlists the aid of seven demons even worse than itself (contrast the "seven spirits" before the throne in Rev 1:4). The demons settle down there (the same verb is used in Eph 3:17 of Christ's full indwelling).

27–28 This saying provides another instance of Luke's identification of Jesus' sayings as the "word of God." It must not be taken as reflecting unfavorably on Mary.

2. The sign of Jonah (11:29–32)

In this passage Jesus responded to those who were prodding him for a "sign from heaven" beyond the miracles he performed (cf. Jn 2:11; 20:30). Some people resisted the testimony already obvious in his messianic works (cf. vv.14–16). The Synoptics oppose an inordinate demand for extraordinary miracles beyond those needed for a witness to Jesus' authority.

29–30 The "sign" Jesus provided to those who wanted one (cf. v.16) is the sign of Jonah himself, whose presence and brief message (cf. v.32), though more minimal compared with the preaching of Jesus, triggered immediate and widespread repentance. The preaching of Jesus carried its own authority, especially when affirmed by the power of God in miracles (e.g., 4:32, 36; see also Mt 12:40).

31–32 The inclusion of the Queen of Sheba (cf. 1Ki 10:1–13) fortifies the judgment on Jesus' generation, because she traveled a great distance to hear the wisdom of Solomon. A double contrast is implied in these two examples: (1) the response of the audience, and (2) the greatness of the preacher. The "one greater" (v.32) than Solomon and Jonah is, of course, Jesus.

3. The lamp of the body (11:33–36)

33 Hearing Jesus' message lays a responsibility on the hearer. The metaphors of light, signs, and judgment (cf. vv.29–32) are akin to what we have in John (e.g., 3:19–21; 9:39–41) and elsewhere in the NT (e.g., Ac 26:18; 2Co 6:14–15; Eph 5:5–14).

34–35 Good eyes admit light, bad ones do not. Jesus implies that the individual is responsible for receiving light. The eye is thus a "lamp," not in the sense that it emits light, but that through it the body receives light. The real source of light is outside the body; if we think we can generate our own light, we must beware lest that inner "light" prove to be darkness.

36 The body is only completely lighted when a lamp shines on it from the outside (cf. Eph 5:13–14a). That is, full illumination only comes when one is willing to receive light from the lamp of God's truth.

4. Six woes (11:37–54)

37–38 In a way typical of his use of material, Luke puts the major discourse in the setting of a dinner (cf. 14:1–24) that Jesus himself attended. Having accepted table fellowship with a Pharisee, Jesus offended his host by omitting the customary ritual washing prior to eating (cf. Mk 7:1–4). Luke gives us a concise selection of the indictments that Matthew records in Mt 23. These point up some of the most common of the sins that characterize strict religious persons: hypocrisy (vv.39–41), imbalance (v.42), ostentation (v.43), impossible demands (v.46), intolerance (vv.47–51), and exclusiveness (v.52).

39–44 In Jesus' estimation, the "Pharisees" (see comment on Mk 2:15–16) had lost the heart of their religion. In vv.41–42b Jesus offers a positive corrective that clearly shows he did not oppose strict attention to religious duties but rather the neglect of caring about people (cf. 10:25–37). Jesus implies that in their "greed and wickedness" (v.39) the Pharisees were depriving the poor of the very food and drink that were "inside" their own carefully washed dishes (v.40). Likewise (v.42) they apparently were tithing possessions that they should have shared with the needy. The vivid simile in v.44 is an example of Jesus' use of irony (see comments on Mt 23:23–24). Though the Pharisees avoided touching a grave for fear of ritual defilement, they themselves, through their own unrecognized corruption, were defiling those who came into contact with them.

45–46 Jesus now directs words against the "experts in the law," many of whom were Pharisees. Their religious legalism explains v.46. They could interpret the OT and the traditions built on it in such a way as to leave little room for personal moral decisions. As "experts," they could, of course, find ways of circumventing the rules themselves.

47–48 Some lavish tombs were built for royalty and others before and during the time of Christ. It was all very well for the experts in the law to build new tombs for prophets long since martyred by the experts' ancestors. Yet this very act ironically symbolized approval of their ancestors' crimes against God's messengers. They may even have been seeking to atone for the sins of their ancestors by the elaborate tombs.

49–51 These verses relate the grim truth behind the parable of the tenants (see comments on 20:9–19). God's "wisdom" (v.49) most likely refers to his sovereign wisdom that allows evil people to prosper and good ones to suffer. The Zechariah mentioned here may be either the one mentioned in 2Ch 24:20–25 or the minor prophet (Zec 1:1; see Mt 23:35), though we have no knowledge of the latter one being martyred.

52–54 Jesus directed his final woe against the experts in the law for their sin of taking away not just physical but eternal life, a dereliction of their most important duty. Those who should have opened the meaning of the OT with their "key" not only declined to use it themselves but prevented others from "entering." The implied subject of "knowledge" is probably the kingdom of God, which people were seeking to enter (cf. Mt 16:19).

Jesus' series of woes here made the violent hostility against him described in vv.53–54 inevitable. His opponents followed him out of the house and fired at him a barrage of difficult questions (v.53). Because he had challenged those who professed to be the expert biblical teachers, they were out to defend their reputation by discrediting his.

D. Teachings on Times of Crisis and Judgment (12:1–13:35)

1. Warnings and encouragements (12:1–12)

The crisis in Jesus' relationship with the teachers of the law at the end of chapter 11 gives rise to a series of strong statements about the eternal issues involved. Jesus' audience must choose sides. He gives promises and warnings, appropriate to each hearer's circumstance.

1–3 Again Luke notes the crowds, emphasizing the extremely large size of this one. Jesus addresses the disciples "first"; the crowds received his words later (vv.13–21, 54–59). The key word "hypocrisy" (GK 5694) was triggered by the charges in ch. 11. Jesus compares the insidious way this attitude can influence others to the action of "yeast." His next words about concealment and disclosure seem at first to be a warning that what hypocrites try to cover up will be revealed (v.2). But vv.3–4 have a positive thrust. Verse 3 is much like Mt 10:26–27, where the disciples are encouraged not to be afraid but to declare publicly what they have heard privately from Jesus (cf. 8:17; Mk 4:22).

4–7 "Friends" is an expression of confidence (Jn 15:14–15), one that is antithetical to the hostility of the Pharisees (v.4). Jesus does not guarantee protection from death but affirms that (1) God alone controls our final destiny, and people should "fear" him rather than those who can merely inflict physical death; and that (2) God is intimately aware of all that befalls us. "Hell" (mentioned only here in Luke) is clearly a place of torment (Mt 5:22; 18:8–9; see comment on Mk 9:43–48).

Sparrows and hairs are so insignificant that this kind of argument (from lesser to greater) points up the supreme worth of the disciples in God's eyes.

8–9 Jesus underscores the seriousness of the issues by referring to the ultimate issue—whether or not one sides with him. The cruciality of the present situation calls for its restatement (cf. 9:26). Jesus' third-person reference to the "Son of Man" (see comment on Mk 8:31) is consistent with his guarded use of titles. Not until his trial does he publicly combine the terms "Son of Man," "Son of God," and "Messiah" in an eschatological context (22:67–70). "Acknowledge" and "disown" are opposites. The reference is apparently to a future scene when the Lord Jesus, having achieved victory and honor, acknowledges those who have supported him and disowns those who repudiated him during the present age. He does this publicly before God the Father (see Mt 10:32–33) and the assembled angels.

10 Jesus' final warning relates to the "unpardonable sin." In Luke it occupies a climactic place in the continued buildup of hostility between Jesus and the teachers of the law. It is difficult, however, to determine its meaning without the contextual explanations in Mt 12:25–36; Mk 3:23–30.

Those passages make it clear that the blasphemy against the Holy Spirit is the attribution of the works of Jesus to the very prince of demons. According to Luke, therefore, if dishonoring the Son of Man is such a serious matter (vv.8–9), then total rejection of God by insinuating that his "holy" Spirit is "evil" is so much the worse. One may reject Christ and later, by God's grace, accept him; but there is no remedy for absolute and complete denial of the one holy God—Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. This is what "blaspheme" (GK 1059) seems to mean here.

11–12 The foregoing series of warnings and encouragements concludes with this striking contrast to the blasphemy against the Holy Spirit. Far from committing that sin of speaking against him, believers find that the Spirit speaks through them (cf. Mt 10:19–20; Lk 21:14–15). The circumstance in which the Spirit speaks through believers is not preaching but persecution; in that context preparation of an adequate defense is hardly possible.

2. Parable of the rich fool (12:13–21)

The change in topic seems abrupt, though a comparison with ch. 16 shows a similar placement of controversy with Pharisees alongside teaching about worldly wealth. There the words "the Pharisees, who loved money" (v.14) serve to link the two subjects. Chapters 12 and 16 have much in common. The topic of wealth is prominent in Luke's writing. Here Jesus turns a question into an opportunity for ministering to an individual's underlying need.

13–14 A person who recognized Jesus as a "teacher" would naturally expect him to have the ability to render a judgment in ethical matters. Rabbis were often consulted in this manner. Jesus' refusal to answer is not a denial of his right or ability to answer, nor of his concern for social and ethical matters.

Rather, he turns directly to an area in which others have no right to judge (cf. Mt 7:1)—namely, the question of motivation.

15 Jesus' audience is probably now the whole crowd, not just the two brothers. The issue revolves around the very nature of "life." Greed seeks worldly things, which must not be equated with true "living." In fact, material possessions become a substitute for the proper object of a person's search and worship—God. Therefore, "greed . . . is idolatry" (Col 3:5).

16–21 Since this is a parable, Jesus can heighten certain elements that illustrate his point, even to the point of having God speak directly to the rich man. The man expresses in his words (vv.17–19) the attitude Jesus discerns not only in the inquirer but in others (cf. v.21). The word "fool" is used in the OT sense of one who rejects the knowledge and precepts of God as a basis for life. God addresses the man on his own pragmatic terms, dealing not with matters of the kingdom or of life beyond death but with the question of the disposition of his possessions. This underscores the fact that he will have to "leave it all" (cf. Ecc 2:18–19).

Verse 21, using the contrasting words "for himself" and "toward God," ends powerfully with the participle "rich" as the final word (see also Mt 6:19).

3. Anxiety over possessions (12:22–34)

This section is virtually identical to Mt 6:25–33. Both passages are connected with sayings against "storing up" things for oneself. The passage ends (v.34) with a saying about one's "treasure" (cf. Mt 6:21). What was implied in the warning parable of vv.16–20 is explicitly commanded here (note the "therefore" of v.22) Believers should not act like the "pagan world," represented by the rich fool of the parable.

22–23 After a brief address to the crowd in vv.13–21, Jesus again turns to his disciples (cf. v.1). Observe the parallelism between v.22 and v.23: a comment on food comes first in each verse, followed by one on clothing. Verse 23 provides the support for the exhortation in v.22: there is more to life than these. The exhortation "do not worry" stands alongside the implied "do not covet" in this passage and the preceding one (cf. v.15); both rich and poor can be guilty of these sins.

24–26 The thrust of the comparison "how much more valuable?" is similar to the argument from the lesser to the greater in vv.6–7. There the sparrows represent birds of little value. Here the ravens may represent birds that were considered unclean (Lev 11:13–20, esp. v.15) and therefore presumably unworthy of God's care. Jesus assures us that the God who cares for such birds surely will care for us. Verses 25–26 constitute still another argument from the lesser (adding minutes of life, or possible inches to height) to the greater (totality of life and its needs). If it is futile to worry about small matters we cannot control, it is even more futile to worry about the larger matters that lies further beyond our control.

27–28 Jesus gives two final examples of the lesser to greater argument. He contrasts (1) the grandeur of Solomon, who could afford the finest clothing, to common flowers, which can do nothing toward making clothes; and (2) the limited life-span of flowers to the (implied) eternal life that lies before the disciples. God's meticulous and lavish care for mere perishing flowers assures us of his unfailing care for his own people. In view of this, the disciples' "little faith" is all the more shameful.

29 Jesus repeats the prohibition against worry (cf. v.22), though a different verb is used (lit., it means "be in suspense" or "be up in the air").

30–31 Jesus now contrasts the pagan Gentiles with believers with regard to their relation to material possessions (cf. Mt 5:47; 6:7, 32). Pagans do not have the same relationship believers have with a loving, caring, providing heavenly Father. To know that he knows their needs is sufficient assurance for all believers. Secure in that knowledge, his disciples can turn all their attention to the kingdom Jesus commands them to seek.

32 "Do not be afraid" introduces another contrast. The "little flock," which now needs to be fed and defended, will one day inherit the kingdom, possessing its benefits and authority. The fatherhood of God and its connection with the giving of the kingdom are themes especially characteristic of Matthew.

This encouragement not to fear is appropriate in view of the hostility of the "experts in the law" who, instead of opening the way to the kingdom and its truth (11:52), stand in the way of those who seek it.

33 The injunction to "sell your possessions" concludes Jesus' exhortation on the "treasure" theme. It is difficult to know whether the reason for this exhortation is to benefit the poor or to rid the disciples of encumbering possessions. The contrast point of the passage, however, seems to be the total dependence of Jesus' disciples on God.

The word "all" is neither present nor implied before the word "possessions." As we have seen, the point of Jesus' teaching on treasures is that they are not to be hoarded for one's own selfish pleasure (cf. v.21; Mt 6:19). Nevertheless, the interpreter must be careful not to blunt Jesus' strong teaching regarding a life of abandonment and giving (cf. 6:27–36; 14:26, 33). One should live on such a modest level of subsistence that the only "purses" needed are those one needs for heavenly "treasure." By their nature, such purses are never moth-eaten nor stolen.

34 This verse shows the essential thrust of Jesus' teaching. It is not the extent but the place of one's possessions that is emphasized, because it is the direction of one's "heart," heavenward or earthward, that is important.

4. Readiness for the coming of the Son of Man (12:35–48)

Jesus goes on to contrast the attitude of the alert Christian to that of the pagans (v.30), who seek only the things of this present world. The word "watching" (v.37; GK 1213) expresses the theme of this passage. The scene in vv.36–37 and the parable in v.39 point clearly to the necessity of being ready for the Son of Man (v.40). In this section Luke concentrates much of the Lord's teaching on the implications of his sudden return.

35–38 In Jesus' time, a person "dressed ready for service" tucked his flowing outer robe under his belt or sash. This was done to prepare for travel, fighting (Eph 6:14), or work (cf. 1Pe 1:13).

Jesus pictures servants waiting for their masters with burning lamps (cf. Mt 25:1–13). When the master does arrive, there is a striking reversal of roles as he dresses himself to serve and waits on the servants (but cf. also 17:7–10 and comments). If the return is late in the night or toward morning, the alertness of the servants is even more commendable.

39–40 The image now changes to one of burglary. Jesus seems to be using a recent incident known to his audience. Iit is unusual, but not impossible, for an evil character, such as a thief, to represent a good person (see also 18:1–8). It is the story as a whole, not the individual characters in it, that provides the comparison here. The focal point is the concluding exhortation to "be ready," because the time of the Son of Man's coming is unknown.

41–44 Peter responds, in his accustomed role as spokesman for the apostles, with a question about the extent of their responsibility. Jesus answers, as often, with a counterquestion. Although he says elsewhere that exhortations to "watch" apply to everyone (Mk 13:37), in this case the parable that follows (vv.42–46) shows that the apostles have a special responsibility. Jesus emphasizes the importance of faithfulness in doing the will of the master, especially for one who has others placed under his leadership.

45–46 These verses clearly imply that Jesus himself would not return immediately but that there would be an interval of waiting and serving (cf. 18:7; 19:12). The attitude of the manager in v.45 is contrary to that commanded in v.40, for he stops expecting the master's return and begins beating the servants under his care (cf. Ac 20:29–30, which warns against false leaders who ravage the congregation). "Cut in pieces" probably refers metaphorically to the person's being cut off from the sons of light and going to the place where unbelievers end up.

47–48 Jesus concludes this section by explaining God's principle of judgment. The servants here represent those who sin willingly and knowingly (cf. Nu 15:30–31; Ps 19:13) and those who sin unwittingly (cf. Nu 15:27–29; Ps 19:12). In both cases there is some definite personal responsibility and therefore judgment, because the servant should have made it his business to know his master's will. All have some knowledge of God (Ro 1:20), and God judges according to individual levels of responsibility (Ro 2:12–13). The closing statement (v.48) would apply especially to the apostles and church leaders throughout the successive centuries.

5. Division over Jesus (12:49–53)

49–50 The previous section leads into this paragraph about the personal crises Christ precipitates. It is difficult to determine the precise meaning of "fire" (v.49) because the word can signify either judgment or purification. The immediate context suggests judgment; while Jesus came to bring salvation rather than judgment (Lk 4:19; Jn 3:17), his coming also meant judgment (Jn 9:39). But it may also signify purification. John the Baptist promised that Jesus would "baptize . . . with the Holy Spirit and fire" (see comments on 3:16). Since 3:16 links fire with the Holy Spirit, it is possible that this fire was to be "kindled" by the baptism of the Spirit (Ac 2:1–4), something that could only occur after his own "baptism" of death (v.50), the thought of which distressed him greatly.

51–53 Although the Messiah was to bring peace (cf. 2:14), this was not his only mission, nor, in the political sense, his immediate one. Isa 11:1–9 shows that even in the final period of peace, the Messiah, enabled by the Spirit, will exercise judgment. Already in his earthly ministry, there is a division. The expression "from now on" stresses the element of crisis, both immediately and at the Lord's return. During this time his disciples must be prepared for a break in their family relationships if others do not concur with their decision to follow Christ (vv.52–53; cf. 14:26). The wording of v.53 is probably from Mic 7:6).

6. Interpreting the times (12:54–59)

54–56 Jesus now turns from his disciples (v.22) to the crowd with a message on the element of crisis. The words "interpret this present time" imply a crisis by comparing the observation of changing weather with God's "time" of opportunity and responsibility (cf. also 19:41–44). The word "hypocrites" shows that the people Jesus was speaking to were not sincere in their professed inability to "interpret this present time."

57–59 Jesus now appeals to human judgment regarding a time of personal decision (cf. Mt 5:25–26). In human affairs one resolves a crisis situation wisely to avoid penalty. This is a secular illustration, and v.59 should be applied only in its basic application of reconciliation with God before the Day of Judgment.

7. A call to repentance (13:1–9)

At this point, a dialogue about the problem of human suffering and evil introduces a parable that, like Jesus' teaching in ch. 12, deals with crisis and judgment.

1–5 We cannot be certain as to the exact incident referred to in v.1. The social tension made revolutionary activity in those days possible at any time. Galileans were especially susceptible to revolt (see also comment on 1:26). Any attack by Pilate or any other governor against Jews who had come to offer sacrifices was horrendous whatever its reason. Jesus refuses to attribute tragedy or accident directly to one's sin as the Jews did (cf. Jn 9:1–3). On the contrary, he affirms the sinfulness of all people. Whereas the victims of the two calamities referred to in vv.1–5 perished physically, all who do not repent face spiritual death.

6–9 Once more Jesus alludes to Mic 7 (see comment on 12:53), this time to Mic 7:1, with its lament over unproductive fig trees. The symbolism applies to Israel (cf. Isa 5:1–7). Jesus' mention of both a fig tree and a vineyard makes the figure doubly clear. The tree is not immediately destroyed but is given an extra year of grace, even beyond the three years its owner had already waited. Israel, however, failed to recognize her season of opportunity.

8. Healing a woman on the Sabbath (13:10–17)

The Sabbath issue, a major cause of dissension earlier (6:1–11), now reappears. Jesus is again teaching in a synagogue. This incident, like the others in this chapter, shows that despite the failure of the religious leaders to acknowledge the time of God's working, the kingdom is still being manifested.

10–13 As Jesus was speaking, he suddenly became aware of a crippled woman. Any activity by a demon is ultimately Satan's responsibility (v.16; cf. comments on 11:14–20). Most important to Luke is the woman's instant healing and its direct attribution to God. This, of course, shows that Jesus was truly acting with God's authority. "Praised God" reflects Luke's special interest in the glory of God (cf. 5:26; see comments on 2:20; 7:16–17).

14–17 The controversy over Jesus' Sabbath activities now comes to the fore as the synagogue ruler speaks to the people on the ground of Ex 20:9–10. He avoids addressing Jesus directly. There was ample evidence of rabbinic precedent for helping animals in emergencies on the Sabbath. So Jesus used a lesser-to-greater argument to move from helping animals to helping human beings (cf. 12:6–7, 24–28). "A daughter of Abraham" means a Jewess. In keeping with Luke's purpose, this designation highlights the priority of the Jews in the program of the Gospel. As he often does, Luke gives us the crowd's reaction to Jesus' response (v.17; cf. 4:15, 22, 32, 36–37; 5:26).

9. Parables of the mustard seed and the yeast (13:18–21)

18–21 Luke uses two parables to add support to the account of the miraculous healing just described. In Jesus' teaching the "mustard seed" represents that which is tiny but effective (cf. 17:6; see ZPEB, 4:324–25), for the tree sprouting from that seed is large enough for birds to settle in its branches. The point of the parable is the power inherent in the seed. This power is implicit in the kingdom, as Jesus' healing of the woman has just demonstrated. Likewise the point of Jesus' simile of the yeast and the kingdom is not that yeast penetrates the dough but that it has the inherent power to do this (cf. also Mk 4:26–29).

10. Entering the kingdom (13:22–30)

22–23 Jesus' teaching now turns to personal responsibility. Luke first reminds us that Jesus is on his way to Jerusalem (see comments on (9:51–19:44; 19:28). Like the question on divorce (Mt 19:3), this one about whether few or many people will be saved (v.23) was occasioned by differing opinions among the rabbis.

24–27 Jesus' reply to the question posed to him emphasizes not "how many?" but "who?" The saved are those who seize their opportunity now (cf. 4:19). Once the time for decision has passed (v.25), attempts to enter into salvation afterward will be futile. The "narrow door" limits the opportunities a person has to enter (v.25); thus people should act now! Based on other Scripture references, the phrase "But he will reply" (v.27) indicates that the "owner" is Jesus, the Son of Man (cf. Mt 25:12, 31–46). The repetition of "I don't know you or where you come from" denotes total rejection. In other words, familiarity with Jesus will be of no benefit after the time to repent is past.

28–30 The contrast is heightened between those inside and those outside the door, i.e., outside the kingdom. Every Jew expected to sit with the patriarchs at the messianic banquet. The concept of such a feast in heaven as a celebration with the Messiah is alluded to throughout the OT (cf. 16:15). The tragedy would not only be that of looking at the patriarchs from the outside but also that of seeing Gentiles inside with them. Verse 30 clearly means the exclusion from future blessings of those who thought they were first in line for them. This exclusion will result in a terrifying sense of doom (cf. Mt 8:12; 22:13; 25:30).

11. Concern over Jerusalem (13:31–35)

This is the main passage in Luke in which Jesus expresses a strong sense of destiny in his final journey to Jerusalem. It marks a stage in Jesus' progress to Jerusalem and prepares the reader for the next chapter. Note the sense of divine purpose expressed by such characteristic Lukan words as "today" and "must."

31 Some Pharisees choose this time to warn Jesus of Herod's designs on his life. Luke attributes no evil motive to those who are warning Jesus; apparently these Pharisees have Jesus' safety at heart.

32–33 In Luke's last mention of him (9:7–9) Herod was troubled at the reports of Jesus' miracles. By having John the Baptist beheaded, Herod thought he had done away with prophetic opposition. But Jesus, far from being threatened by Herod, called him "that fox." Today foxes connote cleverness; in Jesus' day they also connoted insignificance (cf. Ne 4:3; SS 2:15). Jesus intended to continue his ministry and to manifest the power of the kingdom, but not indefinitely. That time was short. Since "today and tomorrow" are not literal days, the same goes for the "third day," which must have reminded Luke's readers of the day of Jesus' resurrection. The "goal" of v.32, however, undoubtedly meant his death (cf. the parallel expression "die [in] Jerusalem" in v.33).

The programmatic statement of Jesus' purpose and progress continues in v.33 with two additions: the specific reference to suffering ("die") and the word "must" (GK 1256). Luke strongly conveys Jesus' sense of purpose and necessity (see comment on 4:43). The way Jesus was traveling was leading him to the cross and on to glory (cf. v. 34; 11:50; Ac 7:52).

34–35 Luke draws the reader's attention to Jerusalem, that city of destiny, both as the place of our Lord's passion and as the pathetic, unwilling object of his love. The "house," perhaps specifically the temple, will now lose him till Ps 118:26 is fulfilled. The substance of this quotation is recorded by all four gospels in their account of the Triumphal Entry; but the words are said, not by the Jerusalemites, but by Jesus' supporters (19:37–38).

E. Further Teaching on Urgent Issues (14:1–18:30)

1. Jesus at a Pharisee's house (14:1–14)

Luke 14 incorporates several elements—healing, conversations, and a parable—all tied together in dinner-table conversation. The conversation revolves around the response and behavior of dinner guests. This leads into a discussion of the responses of would-be followers of Jesus and to a discussion on the cost of discipleship.

1–4 Since this is the fourth time Luke records a controversy over the Sabbath (v.1), it is obvious that this was a major issue between Jesus and the religious leaders (cf. 6:1–5, 6:11; 13:10–17). The host was one of the "ruling" Pharisees, possibly a member of the Sanhedrin. Luke pictures the Pharisees as watchdogs of the faith as they waited for some theological flaw to appear in Jesus' teaching (vv.1–3; cf. 5:17; 6:7). The man who enters the scene was possibly planted there to test Jesus. "Dropsy" (see ZPEB, 2:134) may have popularly been considered a curse for sin (Nu 5:11–27). As in 6:9, Jesus took the initiative with a question designed to shift the burden of proof to the opposition (v.3). During the silence of the "Pharisees and experts in the law," Jesus met the man's need. His condition could have waited another day, but Jesus was concerned to establish a principle. This may be why he dismissed the man without including him further in the conversation.

5–6 Jesus now turns to the Pharisees and draws them into his illustration (cf. 11:5, 11; 12:25; 14:28). "Immediately" stresses the urgency of meeting the need, a pointed reference back to the man with dropsy. The principle exampled in the case of a beast is fully in accord with the OT and rabbinic law. In the face of this, the silence of Jesus' opponents was no longer by choice but of necessity; they "had nothing to say."

7–11 Jesus continued to take the initiative (v.7). In his time the guests at a formal dinner reclined on couches, several on each one, leaning on their left elbows. The seating was according to status. The "head of the table" was the couch at one end with other couches extending from it and facing each other like the arms of a "U." The important places were those nearest the head couch position. If an important guest came late, someone might have to be displaced to make room for him. Jesus' practical advice illustrates the spiritual principle he stated in v.11 (cf. 18:9–14). In keeping with the Jewish custom of his day, Luke avoids direct reference to God by using the passive voice, though God is the one who does the humbling or exalting at the final judgment.

12–14 Having addressed the Pharisee's guests, Jesus turns to his host and speaks words resembling 6:32–36 (see comments). In view of one's ultimate reward from God, one should do good to those who cannot repay it, and without expecting a reward (cf. 6:35). Also, v.13 recalls Luke's report of Jesus' own concern for the poor and oppressed (cf. 4:18; 6:20–21).

2. Parable of the great banquet (14:15–24)

Jesus continues the figure of the banquet with a striking parable about the "feast in the kingdom of God" (v.15—the so-called eschatological banquet; see also comments on 13:28–30).

15 The concept of future celebration in the kingdom is certainly biblical. Jesus addressed the presumption by some present, perhaps

JEWISH SECTS

PHARISEES

Their roots can be traced to the second century B.C. — to the Hasidim.

1. Along with the Torah, they accepted as equally inspired and authoritative, all material contained within the oral tradition.
2. On free will and determination, they held to a mediating view that made it impossible for either free will or the sovereignty of God to cancel out the other.
3. They accepted a rather developed hierarchy of angels and demons.
4. They taught that there was a future for the dead.
5. They believed in the immortality of the soul and in reward and retribution after death.
6. They were champions of human equality.
7. The emphasis of their teaching was ethical rather than theological.

SADDUCEES

They probably had their beginning during the Hasmonean period (166-63 B.C.). Their demise occurred c. A.D. 70 with the fall of Jerusalem.

1. They denied that the oral law was authoritative and binding.
2. They interpreted Mosaic law more literally than did the Pharisees.
3. They were very exacting in Levitical purity.
4. They attributed all to free will.
5. They argued there is neither resurrection of the dead nor a future life.
6. They rejected a belief in angels and demons.
7. They rejected the idea of a spiritual world.
8. Only the books of Moses were canonical Scripture.

ESSENES

They probably originated among the Hasidim, along with the Pharisees, from whom they later separated (I Maccabees 2:42; 7:13). They were a group of very strict and zealous Jews who took part with the Maccabeans in a revolt against the Syrians, c. 165-155 B.C.

1. They followed a strict observance of the purity laws of the Torah.
2. They were notable for their communal ownership of property.
3. They had a strong sense of mutual responsibility.
4. Daily worship was an important feature along with a daily study of their sacred scriptures.
5. Solemn oaths of piety and obedience had to be taken.
6. Sacrifices were offered on holy days and during sacred seasons.
7. Marriage was not condemned in principle but was avoided.
8. They attributed all that happened to fate.

ZEALOTS

They originated during the reign of Herod the Great c. 6 B.C. and ceased to exist in A.D. 73 at Masada.

1. They opposed payment of tribute for taxes to a pagan emperor, saying that allegiance was due only to God.
2. They held a fierce loyalty to the Jewish traditions.
3. They were opposed to the use of the Greek language in Palestine.
4. They prophesied the coming of the time of salvation.

including the speaker in v.1, that they would inevitably participate.

16–17 The invited guests were waiting either for the second invitation (customary in fashionable circles) or else were being reminded that it was time to come.

18–20 The striking thing is that "all" of them declined. Their excuses are weak. One man "must" go to see a purchased field he probably had seen before he bought it. Contrast his urgent attention to material things with Jesus' healing a man on the Sabbath (vv.2–4). The second excuse is as worthless as the first; would anyone have bought oxen without examining them? In both instances materialism got in the way of honoring an invitation already extended and presumably accepted.

The third excuse has more validity in the light of Dt 24:5. Also, only men were invited to banquets. Yet marriage was not, especially in that society, an abrupt decision and could hardly have been an unexpected factor that intervened between the first and second invitations. With his superb narrative art, Jesus used these three excuses to show that just as a host may be snubbed, so God's gracious invitation may be flouted.

21–24 The host "became angry" because the rejections were a personal insult. The "streets" were those roads traveled by a wide variety of people, whereas the "alleys" were small lanes or side paths likely to harbor the loitering outcasts of society. Those brought from these places were precisely the same unfortunates Jesus had told his host to invite in v.13 (see comment). With room still available (v.22), the servant is to go outside the town and search even the "country lanes" (v.23). To "make them come in" is not compulsion but "an insistent hospitality."

Although Jesus does not interpret the parable, we may link it with 13:28–30 and find in it an allusion of the extension of the Gospel to the Gentiles. Those who had the benefit of the original invitation are the Jews with all their heritage and spiritual advantages (see Ro 9:4–5). "Not one" (v.24) refers to the parable and stresses the seriousness of the consequences of rejecting God's invitation.

3. The cost of being a disciple (14:25–35)

25–27 The serious tone of the preceding parable continues as attention now turns to those who profess allegiance to Jesus. Luke again points out Jesus' popularity (see comment on 4:15) and his continuing journey toward Jerusalem (see comment on 13:22). "Hate" (v.26; GK 3631) is not an absolute but a relative term. To neglect social customs pertaining to family loyalties would probably have been interpreted as hate. Jesus is not contravening the commandment to honor one's father and mother. It is important to understand the ancient Near Eastern expression without blunting its force. (For the meaning of v.27, see comment on 9:23.)

28–32 Jesus uses two different circumstances to illustrate his basic point: discipleship requires a conscious advance commitment, made with a realistic estimate of the ultimate personal cost. The practical nature of the circumstances Jesus so vividly pictures underlines the fact that Christian discipleship is not some theoretical abstract ideal but hard reality.

33 This is clearly a crucial verse. But does it mean that it is impossible to retain any possessions at all if one wants to be a true disciple? In contrast to the cares of the rich young ruler (18:22), Jesus does not say a disciple should sell all his possessions and give everything away. His thought probably is that of a continual abandonment of things, yielding up the right of ownership or the desire to cling to things, rather than outright disposal of them. The disciple of Jesus may be given the use of things in trust, as a stewardship, but they are no longer his or her own. This understanding is therefore consistent with the command to use our possessions wisely (cf. 16:1–12).

34–35 This saying poses two questions: Why does it occur here? and, How does salt lose its saltiness? Its place here is due to the common element it shares with the preceding illustrations—the consistent quality of life that Jesus expects of his disciples. The reference to salt may be to adulteration either by impurities in the beds by the Dead Sea from which salt slabs were taken or by inert fillers introduced by unscrupulous dealers. The point is that tasteless salt is useless. Those who have ears are expected to apply this lesson to themselves.

4. Parables of joy (15:1–32)

a. The lost sheep (15:1–7)

This section begins what Manson has called the "Gospel of the Outcast." The large body of material in chapters 15–19 is unique to Luke and dramatically shows Jesus' concern for the social outcasts of his day. The twin parables (vv.3–7, 8–10), along with the longer one about the lost son (vv.11–32), depend for their interpretation on vv.1–2.

1 "Tax collectors" were among those ostracized because their work was considered dishonest or immoral (see comment on Mk 2:14). NIV appropriately puts "sinners" in quotation marks to show that this was not Luke's designation; it was the way others, i.e., the Pharisees, thought of them (see comments on 5:29–30). "All" signifies that a large proportion of "sinners" was usually among the crowds who came to hear Jesus.

2 In OT times it was taken for granted that God's people did not consort with sinners (cf. Ps 1), but the Pharisees extended this beyond the biblical intent. To go so far as to "welcome" them and especially to "eat" with them, implying table fellowship, was unthinkable to them. The parables that follow show that the return of "sinners" to God should be a cause for joy to the religious leaders, just as it was to God.

3–7 For the phrase "suppose one of you," see comment on 14:5. The situation Jesus describes was a common one. One hundred sheep was a normal-sized flock. A count was taken nightly. The "open country" was a safe place to leave the sheep, though they would have to be left in someone's care. The frightened, confused, and perhaps injured sheep would have to be carried.

Two things are striking. First, in the obvious analogy to the search for the sheep, Jesus takes the initiative in seeking out lost people—a major theme in Luke (cf. 19:10). Second, the climax of the story is not only the return of the sheep but the triumphant rejoicing in its rescue. Jesus is stressing, both by parable and by direct statement, that his seeking and receiving sinners pleases God. The future rejoicing (v.7) may include a future of gathering and feasting in God's kingdom (see comment on 13:24). There is none who is inherently righteous (cf. Ro 3:10); thus, the "righteous persons" referred to in v.7 are probably devout people (cf. 1:6) who have no gross, open sins to repent of.

b. The lost coin (15:8–10)

8–10 This parable is clearly linked to the preceding one. The "coins" are "drachmas," each worth about a day's wages (see NIV note). The mention of ten coins implies that they were all she had. "A lamp" was needed because the house would have had at best a few small windows or only a low doorway. She would "sweep" the hard earthen floor to find the coin by the sound of its clinking. As in v.6, the extent of the joy expressed is striking. Considering the neighborly feelings in a small village, such joy is understandable, especially if the coin represented a tenth of the woman's savings. Jesus' final comment reinforces that joy. This parable, like that of the lost sheep, justifies Jesus' welcome of sinners (v.2).

2. The lost son (15:11–32)

The great parable of the lost son speaks even more eloquently and vividly than its predecessors to the situation set forth in vv.1–2. The first part (vv.11–24) conveys the same sense of joy when the lost is found; in contrast, the second part deals with the sour attitude of the elder brother. Like the Pharisees, he could not comprehend the meaning of forgiveness. The positions of the two sons would be considered binary opposites; the lost son rises and the elder brother falls in moral state. The central figure, the father, remains constant in his love for both. By telling the story Jesus identifies himself with God in his loving attitude to the lost. He represents God in his mission, the accomplishment of which should elicit joy from those who share the Father's compassion.

11–12 The "share of the estate" that a younger son would receive on the death of the father would be one-third, because the older son received two-thirds, a "double portion" (Dt 21:17). If the property were given, as in this case, while the father lived, the heirs would have use of it (cf. v.31).

13–16 NIV captures the vivid wording of the account, including "squandered his wealth" and "wild living." The famine made employment and food even harder than usual to get. The "distant country" was apparently outside strictly Jewish territory, and the wayward son found himself with the demeaning job of feeding pigs, unclean animals for the Jews. He would even have eaten "pods," seeds of the carob tree used for pigs' food. He had fallen so low and had become so insignificant that "no one gave him anything."

17–20 "Came to his senses" seems to carry the Semitic idea of repentance. Certainly repentance lies at the heart of the words that the son prepared to tell his father. The motivation for his return was hunger, but it was specifically to his "father" that he wanted to return. He admitted that his sins were ultimately against God ("heaven"). The father in the story portrays the characteristics and attitudes of a loving heavenly Father, as Jesus' listeners would recognize (Ps 103:13). The son knew he had no right to return as a son, having taken and squandered his inheritance. He therefore planned to earn his room and board.

The description of his return and welcome is as vivid as that of his departure, with several beautiful touches. Jesus portrays the father as waiting for his son, perhaps daily searching the distant road hoping for his appearance. The father's "compassion" assumes some knowledge of the son's pitiable condition, perhaps from reports, and his warm embrace and kissing add to the impact of the story. Jesus used every literary means to heighten the contrast between the father's attitude and that of the elder brother.

21–24 The son's speech was never completed (v.21). Instead the father more than reversed the unspoken part about becoming a "hired man" (v.19). What he gave his son signified more than sonship: the robe was a ceremonial one such as a guest of honor would be given, the ring signified authority, and the sandals were those only a free man would wear. The calf was apparently being "fattened" for some special occasion. Note the parallel between "dead" and "alive" and "lost" and "found"—terms that also apply to one's state before and after conversion to Christ (Eph 2:1–5). As in the parables of the lost sheep and the lost coin, it was time to "celebrate."

25–32 It may seem strange that the older son was not there when the celebration began, but Jesus' parables are a fictional way of teaching enduring truth. Verse 28 contrasts sharply the older son with the father. The son became angry; but the father "went out," as he had for the younger brother, and "pleaded" rather than scolded. The older son's abrupt beginning—"Look!" (v.29)—betrays a disrespectful attitude toward his father. Likewise, "slaving" is hardly descriptive of a warm attitude to his father. "You never gave me," whether true or not, shows a long smoldering discontent. By saying "this son of yours," the elder brother avoids acknowledging that the prodigal is his own brother, a disclaimer the father corrects by the words "this brother of yours" (v.32). The older brother's charges include sharp criticism of both father and brother.

The father's response is nevertheless tender: "My son" is followed by words of affirmation, not weakness (v.31). "We had to celebrate" suggests that the elder brother should have joined in the celebration. The words "had to" introduce once more the necessity and urgency so prominent in Luke (see comment on 4:43).

5. Parable of the shrewd manager (16:1–18)

Chapter 16 follows the pattern characteristic of this part of Luke—namely, a combination of parables and sayings pointing again and again to the need for decision. In chapter 16, in spite of obvious diversity, one theme occurs several times: that of Jesus' teaching about material possessions—first in the parable of the shrewd manager, then in the comment about the Pharisees "who loved money" (v.14), and finally in the parable of the rich man and Lazarus.

The interpretation of the parable of the shrewd manager is notoriously difficult. Prior to any overall interpretation and application of it is a series of decisions regarding vv.8–13. Several interdependent questions face the expositor. (1) Is the "master" in v.8 the "master" in the parable (vv.3, 5) or the Lord Jesus (in Greek, kyrios [GK 3261] means "master" and "Lord")? (2) Why did the "master" commend a dishonest manager?—a question that becomes more acute if the "master" is the Lord Jesus. (3) Where does the parable end, before v.8, in the middle of v.8, or at the end of v.8? (4) Finally, are vv.10–12 and 13 part of the same unit or do they represent a separate tradition?

The most likely interpretation couples v.8a with the parable, so that the rich master in the story is the one who commends the dishonest steward. (1) This would not be an unusual secular use of the word kyrios; (2) the religious terminology of v.8b (e.g., "people of the light") seems to refer to real people (in contrast to the characters of the secular illustration) and therefore sounds like the beginning of Jesus' explanation; (3) v.8a seems to form a better conclusion to the parable than v.7.

But even if we are right that the "master" of v.8 is the one in the story, the Lord Jesus seems to agree with the commendation; so we are left with the second question in either case: Why was a dishonest manager commended? The answer on the surface is "because he had acted shrewdly" (v.8). But was his shrewd act not dishonest? The text does not say that the manager's action in writing off the debts was dishonest. Rather, the word "dishonest" may be referring back to his initial act of mishandling the master's funds. In other words, even one who had acted so dishonestly could do something commendable.

He had at last learned how one's worldly wealth can be wisely given away to do good. Some have suggested that the amount taken off the bills in vv.5–7 was not part of the debt owed the master but rather represented the interest the manager himself was charging. The bill to be repaid would be written in terms of the commodity rather than in monetary figures, with the interest hidden in the total. By law a master could not be held accountable for illegal acts of an employee. So the master in the parable was in a position to view the manager's activities objectively. If this explanation is correct, the manager's transaction was not illegal. In any event, the master would lose no money if the amount forfeited was simply the interest the manager would have personally gained. Furthermore, such a forgiveness of debts would probably have helped the master's own reputation. Therefore, the master admired the manager's shrewdness. For his part, the manager knew his job and reputation were gone because of his previous mishandling of funds. He needed friends; and, by foregoing the customary interest, he won friends among the creditors. Jesus then uses this story to show that the "people of the light" could also accomplish much by wisely giving up some of their "worldly wealth."

Some commentators see this parable as an exhortation to act decisively in time of eschatological crisis, just as the manager acted in his personal crisis. This interpretation, while possible, ignores the fact that the predominant issue here is the prudent use of material wealth.

Regarding vv.10–13, as they stand in the text, they provide an integrated sequence of teachings structured around the ideas of dishonesty and responsibility.

1–4 "Manager" is a broad term for an employee or agent who was entrusted with the management of funds or property. Mismanagement was possible because strict accounts were not always kept. When word came from others (v.2), he had to "give an account." The manager's plight (v.3) was that he had a respectable "desk job" but could do little else. His decision, therefore, is made with a view to his personal security after his dismissal.

5–8a As already noted, the bills may have been written in terms of commodities rather than cash, perhaps in order to hide the actual amount of interest. The amounts owed were large; the wheat is said to be equal to the yield of about one hundred acres. The actual value of the reduction in each case has been computed to equal about sixteen month's wages for a day laborer. The meaning of v.8a, as noted above, is not that a manager is commended for an act of dishonesty but that a dishonest manager is commended for an act of prudence.

8b–9 The contrast between those who belong to this age and those who belong to the light (v.8b) is a familiar one (cf. Eph 5:8; 1Th 5:5; 1Jn 1:5–7). Christians do not belong to this evil age, but they can nevertheless make responsible use of "worldly wealth" (v.9). The "friends" may not refer to any particular people but simply be part of the parable's imagery. Usually they have been understood as being poor people, for whom Jesus had a deep concern and to whom we are here urged to give alms (cf. 12:33). "Worldly wealth" should not be stored up for oneself (cf. 12:21), since one day it will be "gone."

10–13 The theme of stewardship is now discussed in terms of trustworthiness as over against dishonesty. "Worldly wealth" (v.11)

appears for the second time (cf. v.9). The property here is "someone else's," presumably God's, in contrast to the parable's imagery in which the amount forgiven was the manager's own commission. Verse 13 (cf. Mt 6:24) is also appropriate to the context (the Greek word earlier translated "worldly wealth" is now translated "money"; GK 3440). Though one may have both God and money, we cannot serve them both.

14–15 Money links the next verses with the preceding. The charge that the Pharisees do not have a proper sense of values leads to the saying about the value of the kingdom and the law (vv.16–17). In turn, the reference to the permanence of the law becomes the occasion for a specific example of a contested moral standard, divorce and remarriage (v.18).

Regarding v.14, Jewish teachers in Hellenistic society were aware that philosophers often taught for fees. Rabbis in the first centuries of our era often had secular jobs. The Pharisees would not have been immune to desires for remuneration commensurate with their own sense of importance. Note Paul's desire not to be charged with greed (1Th 2:5; cf. 1Co 9:12). Self-justification (v.15) is a temptation for religious people (cf. Mt 5:20; 6:1).

16–17 The Pharisees had the truth of the "Law" of Moses (Genesis to Deuteronomy) and the "Prophets" (v.16, here representing the rest of the OT). They failed to respond not only to the good news of the kingdom but even to their own Scriptures (cf. Mk 7:8–9; see also comment on Lk 16:29; for the relationship of John the Baptist to the kingdom, see comment on 7:28).

The last part of v.16 is difficult to interpret (see comments on Mt 11:12–13). It seems best to see it as an expression of one's enthusiastic drive to enter the kingdom (cf. 13:24). In any case, it is clear that the Pharisees had missed what was really of value (v.15), while all around them were people whose values were in order and who were energetically seeking the kingdom (cf. Mt 13:44–46; for Lk 16:17, see comments on Mt 5:17–20).

18 This brief excerpt from Jesus' teaching on divorce and remarriage is included as an example of one aspect of the law that the Pharisees tended to minimize. The teaching is essentially the same as in Mt 5:32 (see comments), except that Luke (1) omits the phrase "except for marital unfaithfulness," (2) says that the remarried man commits adultery rather than that he causes his first wife to do so, and (3) includes a comment about a man who marries a divorced woman.

6. The rich man and Lazarus (16:19–31)

Despite not having an introduction as most parables do, this section is best seen as a parable. It is set in a series of encounters with the Pharisees (cf. 15:1–2; 16:14) and must be understood in that context. The Pharisees did not follow their own Scriptures, the "Law and the Prophets" (v.16); so they were no better than the rich man's brothers who "have Moses and the Prophets" (v.29). The Pharisees professed belief in a future life and in future judgment. They did not live in conformity with that belief, however, but in the pursuit of wealth (v.14), just like the rich man of the parable.

While the parable does contain a few doctrinal implications, the expositor must keep in mind that one cannot build a complete eschatology upon it. To do that will result in an anachronism, for Rev 20:14 places the throwing of death and Hades into the lake of fire at the end of history. What the story does emphasize about the last things is (1) the future reversal of the human condition (cf. 6:20–26), (2) the reality of future judgment based on one's decisions in this life, and (3) the futility of even a resurrection to persuade those who persist in rejecting God's revealed word.

19–20 This paragraph vividly pictures the earthly state of the two people and prepares us for the reversal in vv.22–24, though this is not in itself the main feature of the story. The fact that Jesus named the "beggar" (v.20) but not the "rich man" (v.19) suggests that the former was ultimately more important (characters in parables are not usually given names).

"Purple" (v.19) was a dyed cloth worn by the wealthy (cf. Mk 15:17, 20). In a vivid contrast to the rich man, Jesus depicts Lazarus as neglected and subjected to insult even by "the dogs" (v.20).

21–24 After his death, Lazarus is escorted by "the angels," in contrast to the rich man who is merely "buried" (v.22). "Abraham's side" may picture reclining at a banquet, like the "feast in the kingdom of God" at which Abraham will be present (13:28–29). If so, it may contrast with vv.20–21, where the rich man sits at the table while Lazarus longs for the scraps. Or else it is a symbol of reunion with Abraham and the other patriarchs at death. "Hell" is "Hades" (GK 87), the word used in the OT to translate "Sheol" (GK 8619), the realm of the dead. In the NT Hades is never used of the destiny of the believer; neither is it identified with Gehenna (see comment on Mk 9:43–48). In this story, Hades stands in contrast to the place and state of Lazarus's blessing.

25–26 By calling the rich man "son" (cf. 15:31), Abraham conveys something of the compassion God himself shows even to those who spurn him. In a masterly summary Jesus contrasts the previous states of the rich man and Lazarus with the "now" and "here" of their situations after death. Verse 26 shows the utter and unchangeable finality of their decision.

27–31 This unchangeability comes from a hardness not only toward Christ but also toward "Moses and the Prophets" (cf. Jn 5:46). Not even a spectacular "sign," like one returning from the dead, can change those whose hearts are set against God's word, as the response of many to the resurrection of Jesus was to show.

7. Sin, faith, duty (17:1–10)

As the heading indicates, this unit contains various brief teachings that Luke brings together. The common unifying theme is attitudes in the Christian community.

1–3a Jesus has been addressing the Pharisees since 16:14. Now he resumes his conversation with the disciples, warning them about "things that cause people to sin." "Woe" recalls 6:24–26. A "millstone" was a stone of sufficient weight to crush grain as it was being rotated in a mill. The "little ones" would seem to be either young or new believers (cf. Mt 18:1–6) or people whom the world takes little notice of. Since there is no antecedent for "these," it seems best to take it as referring to people who were actually standing there with Jesus.

3b–4 Both units of v.3b must be given equal weight. Rebuke of the sinner and forgiveness of the penitent are equally Christian duties. Verse 4 does not, of course, establish a specific number of times for forgiveness but rather shows the principle of being generous in forgiving others (cf. Mt 6:12). This is the only right response for those who have themselves been forgiven (cf. Mt 18:21–35).

5–6 The apostles may have felt that this kind of forgiveness would demand more faith than they had. The black mulberry tree grew quite large, to a height of some thirty-five feet, and would be difficult to uproot. The mustard seed is proverbially small, a suitable metaphor for the amount of faith needed to do the seemingly impossible (cf Mt 17:20; Mk 11:23). Jesus' answer to the request for additional faith seems to be that they should use the faith they had to petition God.

7–10 Luke here presents Jesus' teaching about the ideal of servanthood. The world's idea of success is to lord it over others; Jesus' way is the reverse—namely, servanthood—which is actually the way to true greatness. The circumstances that Jesus describes here were normal in that society and the point is obvious (cf. 12:35–37, where Jesus highlights God's grace by a reversal of this normal procedure). Through this parable Jesus emphasizes the proper servant attitude. He does not intend to demean servants but to make their duty clear.

8. Ten healed of leprosy (17:11–19)

This narrative stresses several characteristically Lukan themes. Jerusalem is the goal of Jesus' journey (cf. 9:51; 13:33); Jesus has mercy on social outcasts; he conforms to Jewish norms by requiring that the lepers go for the required priestly declaration of health (cf. Lev 14); faith and healing should bring praise to God (cf. 18:43; Ac 3:8–9); and the grace of God extends beyond Judaism, with Samaritans receiving special attention (cf. 10:25–37).

11–13 Though we do not know exactly where this miracle occurred, what Luke does consider important is Jesus' progress toward Jerusalem. The "village" lies somewhere in the border territory between Galilee and Samaria; so Jewish and Samaritan lepers share their common misery at its edge. The lepers maintain their proper distance, calling out to Jesus and asking only for pity without specifying any request.

14–19 Jesus' command required obedience based on some faith in his healing ability (cf. Mt 12:13; Mk 3:5; Lk 6:10). On their way to the priests, the lepers are "cleansed." Jesus, however, uses the more comprehensive word "made well" (v.19; GK 5392) when he speaks to the Samaritan who returned to give thanks. The stress in this story is on the openly expressed gratitude of the Samaritan, who alone brought praise to God (vv.15–16).

9. The coming of the kingdom of God (17:20–37)

Luke contains two major discourses about the future, the present passage and 21:5–33 (see comments on that passage). Both have close parallels in Mt 24 and Mk 13. Luke 17 stresses God's acts directly from heaven (in contrast to the besieging armies of 21:20). Also the prohibition against lingering is stronger and more urgent here than in chapter 21.

The Pharisees' question about the kingdom initiates this new cycle of Jesus' teachings. This includes (1) a saying about the coming of the kingdom that is unique to Luke's gospel (vv.20–21), (2) the discourse on the coming of the Son of Man (vv.22–37), and (3) a parable of encouragement for those who wait for vindication when the Son of Man comes (18:1–8).

20–21 The time of the coming of the kingdom was important both to the Pharisees and to the Christians of Luke's day, though for different reasons (cf. 2Th 2:1–2; 2Pe 3:3–4 for concerns that Christians had). Jesus had already made it clear that the kingdom was already present (see 11:20); he will shortly indicate by a parable that the full expression of the kingdom does not take place in the immediate future (19:11–27). The present passage is therefore important as a further definition of the nature of the kingdom.

In answer to the question "When?" (v.20), Jesus says that the kingdom will not come as an observable process; that is, it will come suddenly. The NIV "within you" is a questionable translation, for Jesus would hardly tell Pharisees, most of whom (especially those who interrogated him) were unbelievers, that the kingdom was within them. The NIV margin ("among you") is surely right.

Luke's presentation of the kingdom in Jesus' teaching is dynamic rather than psychological (see 11:20). The idea behind "'Here it is' or 'There it is'" is that of the kingdom's authoritative presence. Jesus is thus saying that people are the subjects, not the timekeepers, of God's kingdom.

22–25 Jesus continues the emphasis on the suddenness of the kingdom's coming. "One of the days" probably refers to the initiation of the reign of the coming Son of Man (i.e., "his day" in v.24, or "the Day of the Lord"; cf. Am 8:11, 13 for similar interchange of "days" and "day"). When that day arrives, his coming will be obvious, "like the lightning"; thus rumors of seeing him in various places cannot be true.

The inclusion of the passion prediction (v.25) is natural in Luke, who stresses the order of suffering before glory (cf. 24:26, 46; Ac 17:3). "This generation" may obliquely refer back to the Pharisees. More broadly it refers to Jesus' contemporaries, elsewhere called by him "unbelieving and perverse" (9:41) and "wicked" (11:29).

26–29 Jesus' references to Noah and Lot serve to illustrate the suddenness of the revelation of the Son of Man. The words "eating, drinking," etc., describe the usual round of life's activities that were taking place when unexpected destruction came as a judgment during the time of Noah and Lot. God will similarly interrupt human affairs at the consummation of history, indeed, of the kingdom of God itself, when he reveals the Son of Man.

30–36 The sudden coming of the Son of Man leaves no time even for a quick gathering of possessions from one's home. This theme of imminency blends into a call for decision between eternal values and present possessions. Lot's wife, reluctant to leave her old life, looked back to Sodom (Ge 19:26). This leads to the saying in v.33 regarding discipleship (Mt 10:39), used here with a very concrete application.

The solemn words "I tell you" (v.34) introduce a warning that the return of the Lord reveals ultimate destinies. Even those closely associated (in bed and at work) are separated, one taken into fellowship with God, the other abandoned to judgment. The two illustrations reflect activities selected to show that the Son of Man could come at any time, day or night.

37 The Pharisees had asked "When?" (v.20); the disciples asked "Where?" For us Jesus' reply is somewhat obscure. The hovering "vultures" may symbolize judgment on the spiritually dead. Also they may merely represent the place of carnage.

10. Parable of the persistent widow (18:1–8)

1 This parable must be interpreted with reference to the theme of the return of our Lord in chapter 17, as v.8b makes clear. The story is not intended to apply to prayer in general, as though one needed to pester God for every need until he reluctantly responds (cf. 11:5–10). The theme is that of the vindication of God's misunderstood and suffering people. God's people in OT days needed to "wait" on God as he worked out justice with apparent slowness (see Ps 25:2–3). In the final days the martyrs wait for vindication (Rev 6:9–11). Meanwhile we wrestle with the problem of evil and with issues of theodicy. Under these circumstances we should "always pray and not give up."

2–3 The designation "unjust judge" is similar to the idiom in 16:8, "the dishonest manager." Therefore we should probably understand the judge to be a "man of the world," who, though crooked, prided himself on shrewd judicial decisions. The judge is typical of a local Gentile judge known throughout the Hellenistic world. Being easily accessible and having the authority to make quick decisions, he would naturally be besieged by people such as the widow of the story (v.3).

4–6 The words "wear me out" (lit., "to give a black eye to") probably relate to the common idiom in eastern countries, where to have one's face blackened means to suffer shame. In this parable the reputation of the one being petitioned is at stake. Therefore, though God is not compared to a crooked judge, there is a partial basis of comparison in that God will also guard his reputation and vindicate himself.

7 "Chosen ones" (GK 1723) is a term used throughout Scripture to describe those who, at the end of history, are marked out as on the victorious side (Mt 24:31; Mk 13:27; Rev 17:14). The point of the verse is that God patiently listens to his chosen ones as they pray in their continuing distress, waiting for the proper time to act on their behalf.

8 Help is on the way, and the delay will prove shorter than it seems from our perspective. True believers who persistently wait with patient trust will seem few when the Son of Man comes (cf. vv.24–25).

11. Parable of the Pharisee and the tax collector (18:9–14)

In this parable we see the characteristics of recipients and rejecters of the kingdom most sharply defined. The Pharisee shows an attitude of pride and self-vindication (see Mt 23:5–7; Mk 7:6; Php 3:4–6). His words imply a contractual relationship with God whereby he would accept the Pharisee's merit in exchange for justification. Actually not only this parable but the two following stories (vv.15–17, 18–30) deal with conditions for entering the kingdom. Each stresses human inability.

9–12 Elements of this parable need little interpretation, only careful observation. The characters in this story represent extremes, but the sketches are true to life. The Pharisee follows custom in praying in the temple and in standing while praying. His prayer expresses the essence of Pharisaism—separation from others. This in itself was not reprehensible, because at the inception of Pharisaism there was a need for a distinctive group who would maintain a piety that stood in contrast to the encroaching pagan Hellenism (see comment on Mk 2:16). This initial good hardened into obnoxious self-righteousness on the part of many (not all) Pharisees (cf. Mt 23; Mk 7). Pharisees did tithe and fast (see comment on Mk 2:18), though fasting twice in the week was more than necessary and was only practiced by the most pious. The problem was that this Pharisee's prayer was a farce, being created only in himself; he mentioned God only in the beginning of his prayer.

13–14 The description speaks for itself. The tax collector (see comment on Mk 2:14) was one of the social outcasts so prominent in Luke as recipients of God's grace (e.g., 5:12, 27; 7:34, 37; 15:1–2; 16:20). Contrary to what people in Jesus' day would expect, he received immediate justification, granted by God in contrast to the self-justification that the Pharisee was futilely caught up in. Verse 14b states the principle that is further illustrated in vv.15–17.

12. The little children and Jesus (18:15–17)

15–17 Jesus' words about little children provide Luke's second example of the attitude essential for receiving God's grace. It is not age per se that is in view but childlike qualities such as trust, openness, and the absence of holier-than-thou attitudes. Jesus had compassion even on infants too young to understand the difference between right and wrong. In recent years we have begun to understand formally the importance of communication through touching.

13. The rich ruler (18:18–30)

Like the previous two stories, this one also illustrates the need for human receptiveness if one is to experience God's grace. Then, lest it be thought that this response lies within human power, Jesus points out that only by God's power is anyone saved (vv.25–27). The story thus emphasizes the responsibility and helplessness of humankind.

18 "Ruler" (only in Luke) is too broad a term to permit precise identification of the man's background (see comment on Mk 10:17). The appellation "Good teacher" is not a common one and calls for a comment by Jesus. "What must I do?" indicates a desire by this young man to discover if any deed has been overlooked in qualifying for eternal life.

19 Jesus replies by asking the ruler a question that has puzzled many. Perhaps he is subtly urging the ruler to see that if Jesus is good and if it is also true that only God is good, then there is a clear conclusion to be drawn as to his true identity. His more obvious purpose in this question is to establish a standard of goodness infinitely higher than the ruler supposes it to be (cf. Mt 5:20, 48).

20–21 Jesus now addresses this standard of righteousness. The first step is a summary of several of the Ten Commandments, omitting the first few that relate to God and the final one about covetousness. The man, like Paul (Php 3:6), has kept the letter of the law.

22 Jesus now moves to the heart of the tenth commandment by leading the ruler to face his attitude toward his possessions. Paul himself recognized his sinfulness when he became aware of the thrust of the command against covetousness (Ro 7:7–8). Jesus goes on to say what is still needed to produce righteous perfection. By the act of giving away his goods, the ruler would have shown himself rid of the sin of greed, and by following Jesus, he would have indicated his allegiance to God.

The command to sell everything (cf. 14:33) and give to the poor is difficult to interpret as well as to apply. This does not seem to be a universal requirement; it seems rather to be designed particularly for this man to shatter his covetousness. Such an act would also benefit others, as his wealth would be dispensed among poor people (cf. 6:30–31). Even this is insufficient, however, unless the ruler truly follows Jesus.

23–25 The ruler's sorrow over the decision about his wealth recalls the far deeper sorrow rich people who have incurred Jesus' "woe" will experience (6:24). Jesus' intense focus on the man as he spoke to him about the problem of wealth limits the application of v.24 to the kind of attitude the ruler had. The vivid hyperbole about the camel makes the point unforgettable (see comment on Mk 10:25).

26–30 If wealth is such a hindrance in respect to salvation, the situation for the rich seems hopeless. Jesus' reply about God's power (v.27) provides the assurance the audience needed and evokes an enthusiastic outburst from Peter, who feels that the disciples have done what the ruler did not do. Jesus acknowledges this by assuring his disciples who have left everything to follow him of abundant recompense, not only in the future age, but also in the present.

F. Final Approach to Jerusalem (18:31–19:44)

1. A further prediction of Jesus' passion (18:31–34)

31 Luke has already preserved various sayings that predict or foreshadow Jesus' death (5:35; 9:22, 44; 12:50; 13:32; 17:25). Once again Luke picks up words that stress the fulfillment of prophecy (cf. 2:25–38; 22:37; 24:27, 44).

32–34 In this prediction, Jesus for the first time mentions the Gentiles as his executors. Luke attributes the ignorance of the disciples (a theme much emphasized by Mark) to what is apparently a supernatural withholding of understanding (v.34; 24:16).

2. Healing a blind beggar (18:35–43)

This incident shows that Jesus, who was on his way to the royal city of Jerusalem, was actually the "Son of David" (vv.38–39; cf. 1:32), i.e., the Messiah. It also allows Luke to point again to Jesus' concern for the needy and especially to show his healing of the blind as a messianic work (cf. 4:18). In addition, this miracle emphasizes the importance of faith (v.42) and the glory that God receives through the ministry of Jesus.

35–36 Jesus' final approach to Jerusalem is under way, moving from outside Jericho (v.35) to inside Jericho (19:1–10), and thence to the triumphal entry into Jerusalem, his city of destiny (19:11, 28). Luke refers to the crowds here (v.36) to explain how the blind beggar knew that something special was happening (v.37).

38–43 The description of the man's insistent calling draws attention to his faith, which was based on the messiahship of Jesus, the "Son of David." So does Jesus' question in v.41, which allows the man to voice his request. Only Luke speaks of the praise that both the man who had been blind and the people gave to God after the miracle (cf. 5:26; 17:18; Ac 2:47; 3:9).

3. Zacchaeus the tax collector (19:1–10)

This narrative contains what may well be considered the "key verse" of Luke—19:10. The incident contains several teachings. Luke emphasizes the universal appeal of the Gospel (vv.2–4); the ethical problem of wealth (v.2); the call of a "sinner" who was in social disfavor (v.7); the sense of God's present work (vv.5, 9); the feeling of urgency (v.5), of necessity (v.5), and of joy (v.6); restitution, with goods distributed to the poor (v.8); and, above all, salvation (vv.9–10).

1–4 Zacchaeus was a "chief tax collector," holding a higher office in the Roman tax system than Levi did (5:27–30). This system, under which an officer gained his income by extorting more money from the people than he had contracted to pay the Roman government, had evidently worked well for Zacchaeus. His location in the major customs center of Jericho was ideal. Observe the proximity of this story to that of the rich ruler, whose attitude toward wealth kept him from the Lord (18:27). Zacchaeus's desire to see Jesus was surpassed by the fact that Jesus wanted to see him.

5–6 Not only did he want to see Zacchaeus, Jesus had to stay with him ("must" in v.5); this type of divine necessity is stressed in Luke (see comment on 4:43). The reciprocity of the divine, sovereign call and the human response is striking (v.6; cf. v.10).

7 Earlier Luke gave us three parables Jesus used to answer the "Pharisees and teachers of the law" who opposed his eating with tax collectors and "sinners" (15:1–2). Now "all the people" complain that Jesus was consorting with a sinner (cf. 5:29–30). In each case table fellowship was involved—something that had a far deeper significance than our dinner parties (see comment on 5:29–30).

This sycamore tree in the city of Jericho is similar to the one that Zacchaeus climed in order to see Jesus pass by.

8 Zacchaeus's announcement sounds abrupt and is probably intended to seem so. After all, Luke (following Jesus) stresses the use of possessions as a major indicator of one's spiritual condition (cf. 14:33; 18:22). Restoring stolen funds "four times the amount" was far more than what the OT specified for restitution (Lev 5:16; Nu 5:7). His offer was unusually generous and was the sort of "fruit in keeping with repentance" earlier sought by John the Baptist (3:8).

9–10 Salvation did not "come to this house" because Zacchaeus finally did a good deed but because he was "a son of Abraham" (v.9), which probably means he was a believer and thus a spiritual descendant of Abraham (cf. Ro 4:11–17; Gal 3:6–9).

Verse 10 could well be considered the "key verse" of Luke, for it expresses the heart of Jesus' ministry as presented by Luke—both his work of salvation ("save"; GK 5392) and his quest for the lost. Luke has portrayed the "lost" (GK 660) throughout his gospel, from Jesus' own statements (e.g., 4:18–19) to the disdainful comments of the self-righteous (e.g., in 18:11). This whole incident is the epitome of the messianic mission described in Luke 4.

4. Parable of the ten minas (19:11–27)

This parable fulfills four important functions: (1) it clarifies the time of the appearance of the kingdom of God; (2) it realistically portrays the coming rejection and future return of the Lord; (3) it delineates the role of a disciple in the time between the Lord's departure and his return; and (4) it makes a unique contribution at this point in Luke's narrative.

11 This verse connects the parable of the ten minas with the pericope about Zacchaeus in two complementary ways. The emphasis on salvation today (v.9) does not mean that there is no future coming of the Son of Man and judgment. Second, the "Son of Man" in v.10 is related to the "kingdom of God" in v.11. The one who has the right to reign is precisely the same Son of Man who came to seek lost sheep (v.10).

This parable also furthers Jesus' teaching about the future in general, the present and future aspects of the kingdom, and the consummation of God's purposes in history. It teaches that Jesus predicted an interval of time between his ascension and return.

12–14 The historical background for the parable was the visit of Archelaus, son of Herod the Great, to Rome to secure permission to reign as a so-called client king over a Roman territory. This petition was opposed by a delegation of Archelaus's own subjects. Similarly, Jesus has gone to the heavenly seat of authority till the time for his return. In the meantime, he has been rejected by those who should serve him as his subjects (v.14).

The money each servant received was worth about three months' wages. Their responsibility was to "put this money to work" in business, in trading, or by investment.

15–19 Jesus singles out three of the ten servants as examples. The first two did well, one so well as to receive a special commendation for being "trustworthy." The test was "small," not because the amount itself was so small, but because of its relative insignificance in comparison to the cities awarded the trustworthy servants.

20–23 Our focus of attention should be on the last of the three examples. This servant allowed his fear of the nobleman's anger to prevent him from fulfilling his responsibility of putting the money given him to work (v.20). To be sure, its investment was risky. But he had been specifically charged to take the risk of investing the money. In his case conservatism was born of fear and was wrong.

24–27 The principle of taking from one who has little and giving to one who has much may strike us today as strange and unfair, though a person will probably want to have only a skilled investor entrusted with more money (v.25).

The nobleman's anger (vv.26–27) is not intended to attribute such behavior to Jesus himself. Rather, it does picture the kind of response one might have expected in Jesus' day, especially from the Herodians. It also reveals the seriousness of flouting the orders of the King whom God has appointed Judge.

5. The Triumphal Entry (19:28–44)

Luke does not mention Jesus' actual entry into Jerusalem—the Triumphal Entry. Instead, he shows us Jesus only as approaching Jerusalem (v.11), and after the crowd's welcome he is still "approaching" Jerusalem (v.41).

The story comes to its climax, not in Jesus' entering Jerusalem, but in his lamenting over the city (vv.41–44). Therefore, while Jesus deserves a triumphal entry as "king" (v.38), Luke emphasizes that he is moving instead to the place of his rejection (see 13:33). From Matthew and Mark we learn that Jesus did enter the city (cf. Mt 21:10; Mk 11:11).

28–34 By linking Jesus' approach to the city with the parable of the ten minas by means of "After Jesus said this," Luke denies an immediate appearance of the kingdom and portrays the rejection of its ruler. Luke's mention of Bethphage and Bethany locates where Jesus went. Bethany was, of course, important as the home of Mary, Martha, and Lazarus. The Mount of Olives had a significant place in prophecy as the place of the coming Messiah's appearance (Zec 14:4). Luke also stresses the dependability of the prophetic word (v.32; cf. 2:15, 20, 29).

35–38 Luke shows us the humble king as he portrays Jesus riding on the colt. For the custom of spreading cloaks along the path, see 2Ki 9:13. The reference to praising God for Jesus' miracles is common throughout Luke (cf. comments on 5:25–26; 18:43). Luke stresses the messianic theme of this event with the word "king" (v.38). The word "comes" reminds us of the designation "the coming one" for the Messiah. Luke also gives us the words about peace and glory, reminiscent of the angels' proclamation at the Nativity (2:14).

39–40 This saying of Jesus is a fitting prelude to vv.41–45.

41–44 Jesus is still outside the city of Jerusalem as he utters this lament. Once more Luke focuses on Jesus' concern for the city (cf. 13:34) and adds his prediction of its destruction, a prediction not given in 13:34. The day of peace has finally arrived, but the city, whose very name means "peace," has failed to recognize it. For a further description of Jerusalem's fate, see 21:20–24. "God's coming" has here the sense of a "visitation" that brings good or ill—in this case, either salvation or judgment.

VI. Concluding Events (19:45–24:53)

A. Teaching in the Temple Area (19:45–21:38)

1. Jesus at the temple (19:45–48)

45–48 Jesus is now in the temple area, where he drives out those buying and selling (see Mt 21:12–13; Mk 11:15–17 for more vivid accounts). Luke mentions the importance of the temple as a house of prayer (prayer is an important theme in Luke). Verses 47–48 emphasize Jesus' teaching ministry (cf. comment on 20:1). This is appropriate because Luke has consistently portrayed Jesus as a teacher, especially since the beginning of the central section of the gospel (9:51–19:44). "The leaders among the people," along with the chief priests and teachers of the law, are trying to kill Jesus, though "the people" (GK 3295) as a whole are not hostile to him. On the contrary, they "hung on his words." Once again Luke distinguishes "people" from "crowd," thus demonstrating that Christianity is properly seen as a continuation of true Judaism (see comments on 1:17, 68; 2:29–32).

2. Jesus' authority questioned (20:1–8)

With this controversy Luke initiates a series of dialogues (20:1–21:3). They include the familiar form in which a question is answered by another question designed to catch the interrogators in their own inconsistency. The controversies are typical examples of the kind of challenges thrown at Jesus by the various opponents he had. These dialogues sharpen the issues so that the reader sees the hostility and the theological errors of the leaders of the people.

1–2 Jesus' authority is of paramount importance, and his work as teacher and prophet requires validation. It is therefore appropriate that the controversy section begins with this question about his authority as teacher and preacher. "One day" is indefinite. As in 19:47, Luke also emphasizes the people's (GK 3295) receptiveness to his teaching (cf. comment on 19:45–48).

3–8 The implication of Jesus' question is clear: Jesus refuses to give more light to those who refuse to accept the light they have (v.8) and make a decision concerning it (vv.5–7). They choose to stay on a worldly level of thinking. The word "heaven" (GK 4041) is a surrogate for God in vv.3, 5.

3. Parable of the tenants (20:9–19)

The refusal of the leaders to accept Jesus' authority (vv.1–8) leads to this parable that not only clearly affirms that authority but also alludes to Jesus' death and his subsequent vindication. The parable draws its imagery from the Song of the Vineyard (Isa 5:1–7). This story tends more toward allegory than Jesus' parables usually do. The vineyard may be compared to Israel; the owner represents God; the son, Jesus; the tenants, the religious leaders charged with cultivating the religious life of Israel (as they acknowledge in v.19); and the servants correspond to the prophets.

9–12 The circumstances in this story were not such as to provoke a violent reaction. Only part of the fruit was requested, and in the early years of a vineyard's existence, the tenants would own little if anything.

13 The owner ponders what steps he should take. The expression "whom I love" (GK 28) must be understood with respect to its meaning in ancient Near Eastern family relationships. As a synonym for "only and only," it defines the unique status of the person as a beloved only child (cf. Lk 7:12). The idea expressed here is the same as is used by Abraham and Isaac (Ge 22:2), by God at Jesus' baptism (3:22), and by God at the Transfiguration (Mt 17:15).

14–16 These verses contain the heart of the story. The vivid description of the son's murder and the father's vengeance (v.16; cf. 19:43–44) evoked from the people who heard the parable a strong "May this never be!" They sensed the horror of the story and its drastic application, even though they may have understood its details imperfectly.

17–19 Jesus follows up the people's exclamation by quoting from Ps 118:22 (cf. the quote in 19:38, from the same psalm). Not only will God vindicate his Son, who is the "stone" (v.17), but those who oppose him will meet destruction. This point is tacitly acknowledged in the reaction of the leaders (v.19). This carries forward the hostile scheming against Jesus referred to in 19:47.

4. Paying taxes to Caesar (20:20–26)

20–22 Luke's readers would certainly know about the various forms of heavy Roman taxation. These totaled over one-third of a person's income and included a poll tax, customs, and various indirect taxes.

23–26 The portrait on the coin represented submission to Rome. Jesus' statement may seem ordinary to us, as we have become so used to the saying. But it was an unexpected and telling response to the question. Jesus' questioners were sure his answer would alienate either the government officials or the pious people and zealots who opposed foreign domination. Actually Jesus appealed neither to those who preached revolution nor to the political compromisers. He stated a principle, not an accommodation or a compromise (cf. Ro 13:1–7). To give what the government requires is part of one's religious duty. In spite of Jesus' balanced position, he was later accused at his trial of promoting an insurrection against Rome.

5. The Resurrection and marriage (20:27–40)

27 This controversy section continues with still another group challenging Jesus. The Sadducees, who tended to be more conservative than the Pharisees, did not accept what they considered theological accretions to their beliefs. The OT has little specific to say about the future state of the individual after death. The Pharisees leaned toward a belief in resurrection that owed more to Greek ideas than to the OT. However, the Sadducees refused even to face the clear implications of OT teaching about the future state.

28–33 This hypothetical case of a woman who had successively had seven husbands rests on the Jewish law described in Dt 25:5–6. It provided for the remarriage of a widow to the brother of a husband who died childless, the purpose of the remarriage being to provide descendants to carry on the deceased husband's name. The Sadducees assumed that the idea of resurrection involves sexual reunion with one's earthly partner(s).

34–40 Jesus responded along these lines: It is not legitimate to project earthly conditions into the future state (vv.34–35). Eternal life is actually the life of the age to come (v.36). The believer already participates in that life (vv.37–38); but its full expression, involving the resurrection of the body, must wait till the new age has fully come.

Though in the coming age believers do not become angels (or gods), they do share certain characteristics of angels, such as marriage. The Greek syntax places the comment about angels nearer to "no longer die" than to "neither marry." This moves the emphasis from the issue of marriage to that of the nature of the Resurrection. God's children are children characterized by the Resurrection. Invoking, so to speak, the authority of Moses, whom the Sadducees revered, Jesus shows that Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob are also going to "rise." Therefore their existence does not lie only in the past but in the future as well; and God is called, in contemporary terms, their God.

Jesus' answer is approved by some of the teachers of the law, who are happy to see the Sadducees lose their argument. Jesus' wisdom has silenced all his questioners.

6. The sonship of Christ (20:41–47)

The opponents silenced, the controversy section concludes with a rhetorical question Jesus puts to his questioners—one that is designed to clarify from Scripture who the Christ is.

41–43 The term "Christ" is, of course, used here, not as a proper name, but as a title, "the Messiah" (see comment on Mk 8:29–30). The Messiah was commonly understood by the Jewish people to be a Son. If this is so, the question is why David calls his messianic descendant his "Lord" in Ps 110:1. Although the rabbis of the first Christian centuries did not interpret "to my Lord" as referring to the Messiah, that is the only meaning that makes sense here.

44 Jesus' question is not intended to suggest that there could not be a descendant of David who was also "Lord," but that the seemingly irreconcilable has meaning only if he is more than just a human descendant. Paul expressed the complete answer to the question in Ro 1:3–4, which says that Jesus was a descendant of David as to his human nature but declared Son of God by his resurrection.

45–47 Having responded with such authority to his opponents' controversial questions, Jesus now comments on those who sought to disprove his authority (cf. 11:37–52). Here he stresses their pride and ostentation, as well as accuses them of taking advantage of widows. Apparently they misused their responsibility as legal arbiters (see comment on 12:13).

7. The widow's offering (21:1–4)

1–4 The comment on how teachers of the law victimized widows (20:47) leads to a story on how a poor widow set an example of acceptable giving. The "temple treasury" was either a room in the temple or a "contribution box." The widow's "two very small copper coins" were each worth only a small fraction of a day's wage. Proportionate to her total financial worth, however, the woman's gift was far more valuable than the gifts of the wealthy.

8. Signs of the end of the age (21:5–38)

Jesus concludes his teaching ministry (apart from the Upper Room Discourse in Jn 14–16) with this discourse on the end times. It is immediately followed in Luke by the conspiracy by Judas.

Jesus' teachings in this discourse provide both a realistic warning about future events and a strong encouragement to persevere. They entail some notable difficulties of interpretation and literary analysis. But if the expositor concentrates on the series of exhortations in the discourse, then the supporting teachings along with the problems of interpretation will come into focus. These exhortations are ninefold.

1. Do not follow false leaders (v.8).

2. Do not be frightened by the awesome events associated with the end times (vv.9–11).

3. Do not worry about your legal defense when you are persecuted and face legal charges because of your Christian witness (vv.12–16).

4. When all turn against you, persevere and take a firm stand (vv.17–19).

5. Flee Jerusalem when it is besieged (vv.20–24).

6. When the final apocalyptic events (the portents in heaven and on earth) do take place, take heart at your coming redemption when the Son of Man returns (vv.25–28).

7. Recognize also that these things point to the approach of the kingdom of God (vv.29–31).

8. Be assured that throughout the apocalyptic period the Lord's words endure (vv.32–33).

9. Be watchful and pray so that you will come through all these things in a way the Son of Man will approve of (vv.34–36).

5–11 Warning against deception. The opening of the discourse resembles, with several exceptions, that in Mt 24 and Mk 13. Luke does not mention that Jesus himself was at the temple (though the mention of its architectural details and the "gifts" shows that Jesus and his disciples were on the premises, v.5). For the temple to be totally destroyed was unthinkable. Its sanctuary and surrounding structure were huge, solid, and glistening, a symbol of Jewish religion and Herodian splendor. The disciples do ask for a "sign" (v.7), not because they are doubting but because they need a clue as to when the end will come.

The word "deceived" (v.8; GK 4414) was frequently used to describe the activities of heretics and false prophets (e.g., 2Jn 7; Rev 2:20). Certain frightening events (vv.9–11) are typically linked with the end times (e.g., Isa 13:10, 13; 34:4; Eze 14:21; 32:7–8; Hag 2:6; et al.). Jesus is teaching that, while such things are indeed to take place as history moves toward its climax, Christians should not be terrified by them (v.9). The reason is that wars, revolutions, and natural calamities are not a signal that the end of history is to come immediately.

12–19 Encouragement during persecution. In its content this section bears some similarity to Mk 13:9–13 and also the account of the sending out of the Twelve (Mt 10:17–22). (1) Luke omits the preaching of the Gospel to the Gentiles (Mt 10:18) and around the world (Mk 13:10). (2) He gives a promise of wisdom in time of persecution, though there is no reference to the Holy Spirit. (3) Unique to Luke is the phrase "not a hair of your head" (v.18). (4) Luke stresses that those who persevere, even if they lose physical life, will preserve spiritual life (v.19).

20–24 The destruction of Jerusalem. The reference to Jerusalem (v.20) need not be construed as a vaticinium ex eventu (a prophecy put in the mouth of Jesus after the event has occurred). If Luke were doing this, one would expect more precise details than the ones included here. The description of the siege of Jerusalem, a protracted event, contrasts with the sudden events in Luke's earlier apocalyptic passage (17:22–37). There the one on the roof will not even have time to reenter his house. But here those out in the country are warned not to try to get back into the city during the siege (v.21). The vivid description is painful to read. Jesus' predictions seem to incorporate two phases: (1) the events of A.D. 70 involving the temple and (2) those in the distant future, described in more apocalyptic terms. Since he has already elaborated on the latter (17:20–37), he can here concentrate on a prophetic oracle on Jerusalem.

In v.24, Luke again shows his interest in the Gentiles. This verse implies that an extended period of time is needed for its fulfillment—an idea consistent with Luke's twofold emphasis on a period of waiting along with an expectation of Christ's imminent return. It also implies an end to the period when Gentiles are prominent in God's plan (cf. Ro 11:11–27).

25–28 Future events. Jesus now speaks of apocalyptic signs of the end time. The "roaring . . . of the sea" is reminiscent of Isa 17:12; in biblical prophecy the sea often symbolizes chaos or stands for a source of fear. Daniel 7:13 is the main OT source for v.27 and the NT concept of the glorified "Son of Man." "Power," "coming," and "glory" are terms appropriate to Christ as Son of Man and King (cf. Mt 16:27–28; Mk 9:1; Lk 9:26–27; 2Pe 1:16–17). This section concludes with Jesus' words of encouragement in expectation of redemption (v.28).

29–38 Assurances concerning these events. The illustration of the fig tree is clear. "Generation" (v.32; GK 1155) can refer here to a span of time or to a class or race of people. In the former sense, it may mean the decades following Jesus' lifetime. If this whole passage therefore refers to the destruction of Jerusalem, the heavenly portents must be understood figuratively. But "generation" as a span of time may also refer to the period of time following the initial events of the end time. In that case, it indicates that once the sequence begins, it will be brought through to conclusion without delay.

The other major alternative, "generation" as a class or race of people, makes most sense if it is understood as meaning the Jewish people. The point then is that the Jewish people will be preserved throughout the ages until the consummation of history at Christ's return. (For a different approach, see comments on Mt 24:34.)

The conclusion of the discourse again emphasizes faithfulness, with warnings not only against carousing but against the "anxieties of life" (v.34; cf. 8:14; 12:22–26).

Luke ends the chapter by disclosing that Jesus taught in the temple by day but spent each night outside Jerusalem on the Mount of Olives (v.37). He is also careful to tell us, just as he did in his earlier narratives of Jesus' ministry (4:14–15, 22, 32, 37, 42; 5:19, 26, 29), just how popular Jesus was among the "people" (GK 3295), the responsive group who came to hear his teaching "early in the morning" (v.38; see comment on 19:45–48).

B. The Passion of Our Lord (22:1–23:56)

1. The agreement to betray Jesus (22:1–6)

Luke's passion narrative begins ominously with a description of Judas's plot. Luke says that "Satan entered Judas" (cf. Jn 13:27). In other words, Satanic opposition now starts to heighten.

1–2 The "Feast of Unleavened Bread," immediately following the Passover, lasted seven days (Ex 12:15–20). Earlier the Pharisees were prominent in opposing Jesus (cf. comment on 5:17). Now the "chief priests and teachers of the law" were taking the initiative against him. In that society the priests were not only religious leaders, but they also wielded great political power. The teachers of the law were involved undoubtedly because their legal expertise would be useful in building a case against Jesus. "The people," on the other hand, were a deterrent to the schemes of the leaders.

3–6 Luke mentions the presence of the "officers of the temple guard," whose soldiers probably captured Jesus (Jn 18:3). Municipalities had their own officers and so did the Jerusalem religious establishment. Luke also mentions that, in betraying Jesus, Judas sought to avoid the crowds.

2. The Last Supper (22:7–38)

7–13 Luke now sharpens his chronology, clearly stating it was the day of sacrifice—normally Nisan 14. The actual Passover meal was celebrated after sundown (i.e., Nisan 15; see comments on Mk 14:1–2, 12).

Jesus initiated plans for the Passover arrangements. His instructions guaranteed privacy, indeed, secrecy, perhaps to avoid his premature arrest. Verses 10–12 show his supernatural knowledge. The disciples were to follow a man carrying a water jar. Ordinarily only women carried jars; men used leather skins for water.

The "large upper room" was on the second story under a flat roof, accessible by an outside stairway. It was "furnished" with the couches for reclining at a Passover meal and with necessary utensils. The disciples found things "just as Jesus told them."

14–18 Luke forges a strong link between the Passover and the concept of redemption. This passage also exhibits the strong orientation to the future that characterizes Luke's gospel.

Both of Jesus' opening sentences are strongly worded: "I have eagerly desired" (lit., "with desire I have desired") and an emphatic future negative: "I will not eat" (cf. v.18). Together these sentences convey the depth of Jesus' feelings at this time and the immense significance of what is taking place. Jesus did partake of the meal when, as the host, he "took" the cup and the bread (vv.17, 19, 20). But he goes on to indicate that he will not eat the lamb (probably) till the coming of the kingdom.

Unlike the other accounts of the Last Supper, Luke mentions a cup before (v.17), as well as after (v.20), the bread. Luke has apparently combined his data from various sources to describe both the Passover setting of the supper (vv.7–18) and the institution of the Lord's Supper (vv.19–20). If so, the cup of v.17 may be the first of the traditional four cups taken during the Passover meal, and Jesus' comments come at the beginning of that meal (see comment on Mt 26:17). This cup was followed by part of the Passover meal and the singing of Pss 113 and 114. Alternately, the cup of v.17 may be the third cup, mentioned here in connection with the Passover setting and again in connection with its place in the Eucharist, on which Luke focuses (v.20).

Jesus' words in vv.14–18 are significant. The meal is a turning point. Jesus anticipated it; and he likewise anticipates the next genuine meal of its kind that he will eat sometime in the future when the longed-for kingdom finally comes, or, in Luke's characteristic vocabulary, "finds fulfillment." The believer in the present age observes the Lord's Supper "until he comes" (1Co 11:26).

19–20 The words of institution in these verses bear remarkable similarity to the rendition of Paul in 1Co 11:24–25. This supports the reliability of Luke's research (1:1–4). The suffering motif is consistent with Jesus' understanding of his mission as the Suffering Servant.

The "bread" was the thick unleavened bread used in the Passover. "Gave thanks" translates the verb eucharisteo (GK 2373), the source of the beautiful word "Eucharist," often used to signify the Lord's Supper. Luke alone has "given for you" in the saying over the bread, as well as "poured out for you" in the cup saying.

"In remembrance of me" directs our attention primarily to the person of Christ and not merely to the benefits we receive from taking the bread and cup. The final cup taken during the Passover signifies the "new Covenant" in Jesus' blood. The disciples would have been reminded in the Passover of the "blood of the covenant" (Ex 24:8), i.e., the blood used ceremonially to confirm the covenant. The new covenant (cf. Jer 31:31–34) carried with it assurance of forgiveness through Jesus' blood shed on the cross and the inner work of the Holy Spirit in motivating us and enabling us to fulfill our covenantal responsibility.

21–23 Because this saying follows the Last Supper, it is correct to assume that Judas was present at the institution of the Lord's Supper (cf. also Jn 13:21–27). By mentioning the "hand" of Judas (v.21), Luke draws attention to his participation in this special event, thus heightening the tragedy that one of Jesus' own disciples will betray him.

The use of "decreed" (GK 3988) emphasizes divine sovereignty, a theme dominant in Luke. Divine sovereignty is always balanced by human responsibility, so Jesus pronounces a "woe" on the betrayer (cf. Ac 2:23). Luke also records (v.23) both the disciples' concern and the secrecy that still surrounded Judas's treachery.

24–27 Their questions about this treachery leads immediately to the disciples' argument—shocking on this solemn occasion—about precedence (see also Mt 20:17–28; Mk 10:32–45). The word "considered" (GK 1506) in v.24 is well chosen since status has to do with self-perception and with how one desires to be perceived by others. Jesus replies by reminding the disciples of two objectionable characteristics of secular rulers. First, they "lord it over" others, an attitude Peter later warns elders of (1Pe 5:3). Second, they are given the title "Benefactor." In Mt 23:7, Jesus disapproved of a similar kind of status seeking. Actually he himself is the true "Benefactor" (a similar word is used of Jesus in Ac 10:38).

In v.26 "but you" is emphatic. Jesus makes two points about true greatness. First, one should not seek the veneration given aged people in ancient Near Eastern society but be content with the lower place younger people had. Second, one should not seek the position of the person sitting at a dinner table who had a higher social position than the waiter, who was often a slave. This illustration recalls the example of the Lord Jesus, who washed his disciples' feet as they reclined at the table of the Last Supper (Jn 13:12–17).

28–30 Verse 28 shows that Jesus' trials continued between his temptation by Satan (ch. 4) and the passion events. It also recognizes the faithfulness of the disciples during this time, though fidelity of one of them is about to be tested severely (v.31). This theme of testing and faithfulness is prominent in Luke, as we have seen. Jesus goes on to confer on his disciples a kingdom, just as he himself had received a kingdom (Jn 20:21). The picture here is not just that of a commission but of a conferral similar to a testament. The idea of a messianic banquet is reflected in v.30 (cf. 13:28–30 and comments). On the role of the Son of Man and the saints in judgment, see Dan 7:9–18.

31–34 Just after Jesus commended the disciples for their faithfulness and promised them a kingdom, he goes on to predict Peter's defection, which he attributes to the direct activity of Satan. The juxtaposition of these two sayings makes a strong contrast. The repetition of Simon's name adds weight to the warning. The metaphor of sifting implies separating what is desirable from what is undesirable. Here the thought is that Satan wants to prove that at least some of the disciples will fail under severe testing. The first occurrence of "you" in v.31 is in the plural, referring to all the disciples in contrast to Peter, who is addressed (v.32) by the singular "you."

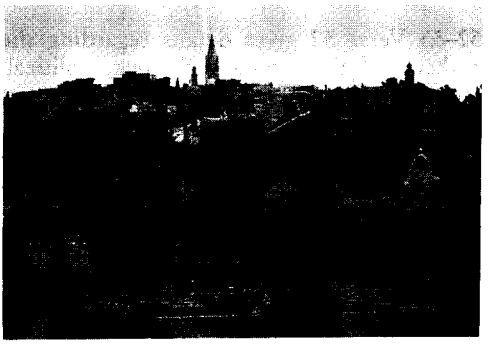
Jesus' prayer that Simon's faith would not fail (v.32) has occasioned discussion over whether it was or was not answered. The phrase "may not fail" probably means "may not disappear completely" (as the sun in a total eclipse). If this is correct, then Jesus' prayer was certainly answered. Peter's denial, though serious and symptomatic of a low level of faith, did not mean that he had ceased, within himself, to believe in the Lord. Nevertheless his denial was so contrary to his former spiritual state that he would need to "return" to Christ. The whole experience, far from disqualifying Peter from Christian service, would actually result in a responsibility for him to strengthen his brothers. Peter's overconfident reply (v.33), which includes a reference to his willingness to die, is found among the four gospels only here and in Jn 13:37. Jesus then becomes specific and predicts Peter's denial.

35–38 This short passage is difficult to interpret, with two problems in particular: (1) the problem of Jesus' apparent support for using weapons, which is hard to reconcile with his words to Peter when the latter used the sword (Mt 26:52); and (2) the seeming reversal of the instructions Jesus gave the Twelve and the seventy-two on their missions (9:1–3; 10:1–3). Thus there is a question as to which principle regarding the use of force is normative for the church.

While some solve their problems by taking Jesus' words as ironical, this is not the best solution. Any approach to a solution must take into account the fact that later, when the disciples were armed with these swords, Jesus opposed their use (vv.49–51). Moreover, the tone of v.52 is nonmilitant. Verse 36 clearly refers back to 10:4, the sending of the seventy-two. In v.35 there seems to be an affirmation of the principle of nonmilitance in the question "Did you lack anything?" Yet a contrast is also clearly intended. What Jesus seems to be doing is making an exception for this time of crisis. Since he told them not to buy more swords than they had (v.38), and since two were hardly enough to defend the group, the swords may simply be a vivid symbol of impending crisis, not intended for actual use.

Verse 37a is one of several clear quotations of Isa 53 in the NT.



3. Prayer on the Mount of Olives (22:39–46)

In contrast to Matthew and Mark, Luke does not specify the location as being Gethsemane, and he alone includes at the beginning an exhortation to the disciples to ward off temptation by means of prayer.

39–42 Luke focuses his attention here on Jesus, who went to the Mount of Olives "as usual" (cf. 21:37). He did not change his habits to elude Judas.

Jesus begins with a general warning to his disciples not to fall into temptation. This is not surprising, for the themes of prayer and temptation are common in Luke (cf. v.46). Kneeling in prayer (v.41) was not customary in Jesus' time (standing was the normal posture). But this scene is one of intense emotional strain. Matthew and Mark say that Jesus fell to the ground (Mt 26:39; Mk 14:35). Luke, who throughout his gospel stresses Jesus' conscious fulfillment of the purposes of God, emphasizes Jesus' concern for the will of God.

Jesus uses the "cup" as a metaphor of his imminent passion (see comments on Mk 10:38; 14:35–36). In the OT the wrath of God expressed against sin was sometimes referred to by the metaphor of a cup (e.g., Ps 75:8; Isa 51:17; Jer 25:15–17).

This is a contemporary view of Mount of Olives, seen from the old city of Jerusalem. Between these two is the Kidron Valley.

43–44 Luke has already mentioned angels many times—in the Nativity narrative and elsewhere, e.g., 9:26; 12:8–9; 15:10; 16:22. So the appearance of an angel here in Gethsemane is not strange. Luke describes Jesus' agony in physical terms, as we might expect a physician to do. The sweating was apparently so profuse that it looked like blood dripping from a wound.

45–46 Luke does not dwell on the weakness of the disciples, nor does he describe in further detail Jesus' agony. He does explain the disciples' sleep as coming through exhaustion from sorrow. Jesus repeats the injunction for the disciples to pray lest they fall into temptation (see comment on Mt 26:41).

4. Jesus' Arrest (22:47–53)

47–48 While Jesus was still speaking to his disciples, Judas and the crowd make a sudden intrusion into the somber scene in Gethsemane. Note the word "crowd" (GK 4063), often used in Luke to designate an unfeeling, perhaps even hostile, group of people. From the crowd attention moves to "the man who was called Judas." This designation is a dramatic way of isolating Judas—holding him off at a distance for a derogatory look and comment, i.e., "this Judas person." The betrayal was accomplished with a kiss in order to identify Jesus in the darkness of the night. But in the high drama of the actual situation, it was cruelly hypocritical.

49–51 (See comments on vv.33–38 for the background to this incident.) Jn 18:10 tells us that it was Peter who drew the sword; Luke alone tells us about Jesus' healing of the ear of the high priest's servant.

52–53 Verse 52 gives details regarding the makeup of the crowd—religious, political, and military leaders. These details suggest Luke's emphasis that it was not the believing Jews who brought about Jesus' crucifixion but their arrogant leaders. Jesus' comment shows the underhanded nature of their act. The word "hour" (GK 6052) here designates a time of opportunity or destiny. The verb "reigns" represents the noun exousia ("power," "authority"; GK 2026). Satan had previously offered Jesus exousia in the Temptation (4:6); but Jesus, who after obediently going to the cross would receive "all authority" (exousia) from the Father (Mt 28:18), was willing to have Satan exercise his authority for a time under God's plan of salvation.

5. Peter's denial (22:54–62)

Throughout this and the succeeding sections, dramatic tension mounts. A contributing feature is the simultaneous action taking place in the house of the high priest with Jesus (v.54) and in the courtyard with Peter (v.55). Luke separates the two sequences of events, enabling the reader to follow Peter's experience and then Jesus' trial separately. Luke does not tell us anything about a night session of the trial but allows for it in v.54 (cf. vv.63–65). The story of Peter's denial presents a sober and utterly real picture of the prominent apostle; and, along with vv.31–32, it offers a deep spiritual lesson about humility and spiritual conflict.

54–57 Jesus' first trial took place in the high priest's house (v.54)—possibly the house of Annas, father-in-law of the high priest Caiaphas (cf. Jn 18:13)—though this meeting seems also to have been a trial before the entire Sanhedrin (cf. comments on Mt 26:59; Mk 14:55).

Though he followed Jesus at a distance, Peter is the only disciple who, so far as we know, followed him at all. The fire in the courtyard was needed because the evenings are cool in springtime in Jerusalem. The denial had three phases. The first speaker was a servant girl. Who she was and what she said were relatively harmless and did not deserve a drastic response. Peter's response is called a denial. The word "deny" (GK 766) is used in the NT as the polar opposite of the word "confess." We are to confess (i.e., acknowledge) Christ but deny ourselves (i.e., disown our private interests for the sake of Christ; cf. comment on 9:23). Peter here does the reverse. He denies Christ in order to serve his own interests.

58 After a brief time, someone else, a man this time, made another charge. In none of these dialogues does Jesus' name actually appear. The assumption is that the recent events in Jesus' life were already known to the group in the courtyard.

59–60 The third speaker then makes a definite assertion about Peter's association with Jesus. Luke does not record Peter's oath as Matthew and Mark do, but he does record

Peter's claim to ignorance about Jesus. At about this time, just as Jesus had predicted, the rooster crowed.

61–62 In telling how the Lord looked at Peter (v.61), Luke uses the same word John used (Jn 1:42) to describe the way Jesus looked at Peter when they first met. It was a look of love and concern. Peter's feelings (v.62) need no further comment.

6. The mocking of Jesus (22:63–65)

63–65 This incident of Jesus' being mocked and beaten is put in a position of sharp contrast between Jesus' sufferings and Peter's attempt to avoid any identification with Jesus. Also, the soldiers' hitting Jesus while he was blindfolded, taunting him about prophesying, contrasts with Luke's clear portrayal in his gospel of Jesus as a prophet.

7. Trial before the Jewish leaders (22:66–71)

The probable order of Jesus' trial appearances in all four gospels is (1) before Annas (John), (2) before Caiaphas and the Sanhedrin (Synoptics), (3) before Pilate (Synoptics, John), (4) before Herod Antipas (Luke), and (5) before Pilate (Luke). The charges before Caiaphas and the Sanhedrin were (1) threatening to destroy the temple and (2) blasphemy. The charges before Pilate were (1) subverting the Jewish nation, (2) opposing the payment of taxes to Caesar, (3) claiming to be king, and (4) sedition ("stirs up the people," 23:5).

66–69 Luke has already indicated that Jesus was arrested during the night (v.47) and has implied that he was confronted by the authorities while in the house of the high priest (v.54). Following that was an "official" trial early in the morning. Luke summarizes the crucial exchange between Jesus and the leaders and adds a time note that it was becoming day (v.66). Matthew and Mark refer to the same time of day when the religious authorities reached a decision (Mk 15:1). Luke's way of reporting the questioning separates the questions regarding messiahship and regarding the Son of God.

The word "Christ" (v.67) at this time had not yet become a proper name, so the question Jesus was asked is whether he was claiming to be the Messiah. Jesus answered by saying that they would not believe him even if he did answer them. He also said that if he were to question them, they would not answer (cf. 20:1–8).

Jesus continues with an assertion concerning the exaltation of the Son of Man (who must be identified with Jesus here or the saying is irrelevant); it vindicates Jesus and proves who he is. This saying in Luke stresses the fact that from that very time in Jesus' appearance before the council, he was to be exalted (note Luke's emphasis on "now," the present reality of events that have their main significance in the future). Luke is concerned with the present vindication of Jesus.

70–71 Standing independent of and subsequent to the question about messiahship is the question in v.70, which serves to emphasize that Jesus is himself the Son of God and is not merely called such as an honorific title because of his role as Messiah. Jesus' reply, while not a direct affirmation (cf. comments on Mt 26:25, 64), was taken as such, as v.71 shows. The nature of this reply is understandable in the light of Jesus' remarks in vv.67b–68.

8. Trial before Pilate and Herod (23:1–25)

The trial now moves into its Roman phase (see comment on 22:66–71). While there was doubtless more interrogation in front of Pilate than is reported here before he declared he found no basis for a charge against Jesus (v.4), it obviously did not take Pilate long to determine Jesus' innocence. The larger part of this section deals, not with the trial as such, but with the difficulty the Jewish authorities had in trying to convict an innocent man.

1–5 Verse 1 links the Jewish and Roman trials. The "whole assembly" is the Sanhedrin. Pilate was Roman governor (procurator) of the province of Judah. His official residence was at Caesarea, a magnificent city boasting Roman culture, where Pilate would no doubt have preferred to be at the time of Jesus' trial, were it not the Passover season (when special precautions were needed in Jerusalem against civil disturbances).

The Sanhedrin's accusation contains three distinct charges. The first (subverting the Jewish nation) would have been of concern to Pilate, who wanted no internal strife among the Jewish people. But it was not a matter for Roman jurisprudence. The second (opposing payment of taxes to Caesar) and third (claiming to be king) were more to the point. Luke has already shown (20:20–26) that the second charge was untrue. The third one became the key issue. Jesus' responses to the questions asked him by his Jewish interrogators had been understood as being clearly affirmative (22:66–71). It is also clear that the word Christ, or Messiah (v.2), was deliberately used to imply to Pilate that Jesus was a political activist and a threat to Roman sovereignty (note "king" in apposition to "Messiah").

In Luke's gospel, Pilate clearly declares Jesus' innocence (v.4). This point is especially important for Luke, who seeks throughout his gospel and Acts to vindicate Christianity through vindicating both Jesus and Paul in their appearances in court. The response from the Sanhedrin is clever. It implies seditious actions by saying that the people are being stirred up by Jesus' (unspecified) teaching.

6–12 Only Luke records Jesus' appearance before Herod; he had more interest in politics than Matthew or Mark (cf. 3:1; 9:7–9; 13:31). Herod had a more intimate experience with Jewish politics and religion than Pilate had. For a long time he had desired to learn more about Jesus (cf. 9:7–9). Like Pilate, Herod was probably in Jerusalem because of the Passover. (For Jesus' attitude toward him, see 13:31–35.) Herod's territory, as a local king under the authority of Rome, was Galilee and Perea. Verse 11 probably reflects a certain frustration on his part. He apparently had no legal accusation to make; so he vented his anger by echoing the hostility of the priests and teachers and by putting someone's fine clothes on him.

13–16 Once again Pilate protests Jesus' innocence, this time in front of the people as well. Luke seems to be making a significant point by mentioning their presence. Throughout his gospel, Luke has been careful to distinguish the "people" (GK 3295) from the "crowd" (GK 4063). The people appear again in v.27, following Jesus to the place of crucifixion, and then in v.35, watching Jesus die. Once more (24:19) Luke mentions them as witnesses of Jesus' mighty works. At their first mention in Acts, Luke refers to the "people" as approving the young Jerusalem church (2:47).

In order to placate the Jewish leaders Pilate (knowing Jesus' innocence) offered to scourge Jesus and then to release him. As a Roman official, he wanted to treat Jesus as fairly as possible. This would fit in with one of Luke's apparent goals in writing the gospel and Acts—namely, to show that Christianity deserved to be favorably treated by Rome.

18–22 Luke provides only a brief statement about Barabbas and his crimes. "For the third time" Pilate protests Jesus' innocence. Again, we see Luke's concern to vindicate Jesus (and Christianity) to his readers.

23–25 In vivid Greek, Luke brings the crowd's action to a climax. He shifts attention from Pilate to the people by ending the Greek sentence in v.23 not with the verb but with a reference to the shouting of the crowd.

Luke then proceeds directly to Pilate's action, who had acted in accord with the crowd's wishes. Having emphasized God's plan and will throughout his gospel, Luke now notes the human factor: Jesus is delivered to the "demand" of the crowd (cf. Ac 2:23).

9. The Crucifixion (23:26–43)

In their accounts of Jesus' crucifixion, the four gospels relate essentially the same series of events, but with varied selection of details and of Jesus' words. None of them portray the physical agony of crucifixion in the shocking details that might have been given. The stark facts are there but are presented with sober restraint. What was most important was the inner reality of Jesus' atoning death and his spiritual anguish in being identified with the sins of the world.

26 Jesus was required, like others condemned to crucifixion, to carry the cross-bar. The wood was heavy, and Jesus was weakened by the maltreatment. The soldiers could press civilians such as Simon into service. Cyrene is a port in North Africa.

27–31 As Jesus heads to Calvary, Luke records an incident that expresses Jesus' concern for the fate of Jerusalem (cf. 19:41–44; 21:20–24). Jewish women had always considered barrenness a misfortune and children a blessing. In the day of Jerusalem's destruction, however, women would have the horror of seeing their children suffer and would wish they could have been spared that agony. The words Jesus quotes from Hos 10:8 are a plea for protection, not for quick death. Fire spreads much more rapidly through a dry forest than through a wet one; so Jesus' words in v.31 warn of a future situation that is even worse than the events surrounding his crucifixion.

32–34 The presence of two criminals with Jesus emphasizes the humiliation of his execution and perhaps also his identification with sinners in his death as well as in his life. Luke's narrative is concise and effective in presenting the brutal facts. Nor is it surprising that he, who constantly portrayed Jesus both as offering God's grace and forgiveness to sinners (e.g., 7:40–43) and as praying, is the only one who records his prayer for the forgiveness of his executors (v.34; cf. Ac 7:60).

35 Luke's wording here suggests that the "people" (see comment on vv.13–16) are still passive rather than hostile, while everyone else, "even" the rulers, sneered. The word "saved" does not mean that the rulers believed in the claim of Jesus to forgive people but alludes to his reputation for restoring the sick and disturbed. For Christ as "the Chosen One," see comment on 9:35.

36–37 The taunts continue, this time from the soldiers. Although in the other gospels the offering of wine vinegar (v.36) seems to be an act of kindness (the drink being a thirst quencher carried by soldiers), Luke connects it with their mockery of Christ. It may have been a compassionate act done in the midst of taunts.

38 Luke's record of the superscription over the cross shows the issue as Pilate, Jesus' Roman judge, saw it. The word "this" is at the end of the sentence, conveying the emphatic idea: "The King of the Jews, this one!"

39–43 This conversation, unique to Luke's account, reinforces two characteristics of his gospel. One is the innocence of Jesus (v.41; see comments on vv.4, 22). The other is the immediate ("today") realization of God's saving grace through Christ (cf. comment on 4:21).

As elsewhere (cf. 5:1–11), Luke focuses on one person in a group. One of the criminals hurled insults at Jesus. The criminal's taunt, "Aren't you the Christ?" should probably be seen as sarcastic.

The other criminal recognizes that Jesus is no mere pretender and that he will reign as king. Jesus' response assures him that he need not wait for any future event but that he would have an immediate joyful experience of fellowship with Jesus "in paradise" (GK 4137). This Persian word, taken over into Greek, symbolizes a place of beauty and delight. It was used to refer to the Garden of Eden in Ge 2:8 (LXX) and to the future bliss that the garden symbolizes (Isa 51:3; cf. 2Co 12:4; Rev 2:7).

10. Jesus' death (23:44–49)

44–46 Luke refrains from giving a precise time but does imply by the word "now" that the preceding events had filled the morning. There was darkness from about noon to three o'clock. The whole "land" could refer to all the "land" of Israel or, possibly, to the local area only. Luke does not say what caused the sun's light to fail, nor does he say what significance should be given this fact. Certainly it emphasized the somberness of the event; it may also be linked with Jesus' experiencing God's judgment, for elsewhere the Scriptures link it with God's judgment (e.g., Am 5:8–10; Zep 1:4–15).

Luke states that the temple curtain was torn apart— doubtless the one separating the Holy Place from the inner Most Holy Place (Ex 26:31–33). Access to the most holy God is now open through the death of Christ (cf. Heb 10:19–22).

Normally a person in the last stages of crucifixion would not have the strength to speak beyond a weak groan, but Jesus is able to cry out with a "loud voice" (v.46) words from Ps 31:5. To the Christian reader who knows that Jesus' death was a voluntary act, they are beautifully appropriate. All four gospels describe Jesus' moment of death in terse, restrained words.

47–49 After Jesus' death, Luke calls on the centurion as a witness to Jesus' uniqueness. His words in his gospel emphasize, as in the trial scene, the innocence of Jesus (cf. comments on vv.4, 22). The crowd standing around was deeply affected, as were Jesus' own followers, who endured their inexpressible grief standing at a distance. Luke gave the names of some of these women from Galilee in 8:3.

11. Jesus' burial (23:50–56)

50–54 Luke assures his readers of the credentials of the man who offered to bury Jesus. Here again he presents someone qualified to affirm by word or action that Jesus was a just and innocent man; by inference, therefore, the claims of Christianity are valid. Joseph was a righteous Jew, "waiting for the kingdom of God" (v.51), and so joins others in Luke whose piety and expectation of the Messiah validate their testimony (e.g., Simeon and Anna, 2:25–38). He was a member of the Council (the Sanhedrin) but had disagreed with their decision against Jesus.

Joseph laid the body in a tomb "cut in the rock." We can still see such tombs today in rocky hillsides in Palestine. We learn in v.54 that it was Friday, and the Sabbath was about to begin at sundown.

55–56 Luke goes on to note the women's careful preparation of the spices in advance of Easter morning. The women did not do this on the Sabbath, even though Jewish tradition apparently would have allowed care for the dead on a Sabbath. In this way Luke stresses one more time the fidelity of Jesus and his followers to Jewish laws.

C. The Resurrection and Ascension (24:1–53)

1. The Resurrection (24:1–12)

Luke 24 not only presents the climactic event of the Resurrection, but it includes a recapitulation of the saving mission of Christ (vv.6–7, 19–27, 45–47). The Ascension, with which the chapter and the book conclude, is the final goal of Jesus' earthly ministry (cf. comment on 9:51). It also sets the scene for the church's ministry as recorded in Acts. The first section narrates events at the empty tomb; it contains elements that Luke uses to further his unique theological perspective.

1–3 All four gospels specify the first day of the week (v.1) as the day of the Resurrection. This became the day of Christian worship (cf. Ac 20:7). The change from the traditional and biblical Sabbath is in itself a strong evidence of the Resurrection because it shows the strength of the disciples' conviction about what happened on that day. Luke refers to the time of day by the general statement that it was "very early." When the women arrived at the tomb, they found the stone rolled away, and Luke specifically states that the body of the Lord was not there.

4–5 Once again, Luke describes someone pondering a remarkable event (e.g., 1:29, 66; 2:19). Luke speaks of "two men" in the tomb who address the women; this mention of two men seems consistent with his other references to witnesses to Jesus (cf. Simeon and Anna, 2:25–38; and esp. 24:48). Two witnesses are the minimum number required for validation (Dt 17:6; 19:15). That Luke understands that the two "men" were angels is evident from what he says of them in v.23 and from his description of their clothes as gleaming like lightning. Not only were the women frightened, but in their fear they bowed facedown to the ground (fear is a typical response in the presence of a supernatural visitation; e.g., 1:12; 2:9; 9:34). "The living" stresses the factual aspect of the Resurrection.

6–8 The angels show the meaning of the empty tomb by repeating the essence of the three passion predictions (9:22, 43–45; 18:31–33). They begin with the words "Remember how he told you," perhaps implying that what the women should have understood earlier the Resurrection has now clarified. The third prediction (18:31–33) was followed by a statement that the saying was obscure, hidden from them (18:34; cf. also 24:16). The Resurrection is the time for revelation and understanding (v.8). Luke centers the rest of his attention on Jesus' appearances in the vicinity of Jerusalem, the city of destiny in Luke (see comments on 13:32–35).

Luke's frequent use of "must" (GK 1256) and other expressions of divine purpose have already been noted throughout this commentary (e.g., 2:49; 4:43; 19:5). It occurs in the first passion prediction (9:22), and in 13:33; 17:25; 22:37. Chapter 24 contains two more references to the inevitable sequence of Jesus' death and resurrection (vv.25–27, 44–46). Luke's stress on God's plan and providence continues throughout Acts.

9–12 At this point Luke reports the names of the women (cf. 8:1–3). While the witness of women was not acceptable in those days, nevertheless Luke records their testimony. The apostles, in their incredulity, were unable to comprehend the reality the women were trying to convey (v.11; see also vv.12, 22–24). This reluctance to believe has an important relation to the evidences for the Resurrection. The disciples were not expecting that event. Thus they cannot be called fit subjects for hallucination, as some would have them be.

The strips of linen in the tomb used in the burial of Jesus bear their silent but eloquent testimony to the absence of Jesus' body. Peter leaves, "wondering" to himself about this (cf. v.4).

2. On the Emmaus road (24:13–35)

The Emmaus story is a literary and spiritual jewel. It is at once a moving story, a testimony to the Resurrection, an explanation of the empty tomb, and an occasion for Luke to summarize several of his major themes.

13–16 The opening words of v.13 link this story with the entire Easter event. As two travelers are talking together, they experience the presence of Jesus; thus a valid witness is provided (see comment on vv.4–5). The words "of them" (v.13) do not clearly identify who the two are. They are not two of the Eleven (v.9; cf. v.33). Probably they are two of the followers of Jesus who had come to Jerusalem for the Passover. So they had been among the "disciples" who lauded Jesus on his triumphal entry to the city (19:39) and were now returning home.

The fact that this event occurs when the two disciples "were going" continues the travel theme prominent in Luke, especially in his unique central section (9:51–19:44). That section began as Jesus "resolutely set out" for Jerusalem (9:51); now these two are leaving that same city. Shortly after the earlier journey to Jerusalem began, a man had approached Jesus regarding discipleship "as they were walking" (9:57); after the Resurrection, Jesus approaches two disheartened followers as they are walking. Acts continues the theme of Jesus' disciples traveling, going from Jerusalem to Rome and ultimately to the ends of the earth as "witnesses" (1:8). As for the identity of Emmaus, this is uncertain, though it is a village near Jerusalem.

The two were talking about events surrounding Jesus' resurrection. Between the lines of their dialogue, Luke shows their bewilderment. Luke introduces Jesus into the story with the emphatic "Jesus himself" and comments that Jesus "walked along with" them. Their being kept "from recognizing him" (v.16) may be a "divine passive," i.e., a means of connoting that an action is actually the work of God.

17–18 Jesus, without them recognizing him, suddenly asks the two men a question about their conversation. It is striking that when Jesus addressed them, the two travelers stopped short and "stood still." Their attitude at that point was gloomy, perhaps even sullen. Only one of the two (Cleopas) is named, probably because he was known to at least some of Luke's readers.

19–24 What follows constitutes an affirmation about the person and work of Christ that is of great significance for our understanding of Jesus and of Luke's perception of him as recorded elsewhere (e.g., 4:14; Ac 19:38–39). The importance of the affirmation of the two disciples here in 24:19 must not in any way be underestimated. It is integral to Luke's theology and purpose.

"He was a prophet" recalls the passage in chapter 4 where Jesus clearly identified himself with the prophets (4:24). While in Luke's narrative Jesus is perceived as a prophet (e.g., 7:16), the Resurrection affirmed him to be much more, as the two on the Emmaus road are soon to learn.

The "chief priests and our rulers" (v.20) stand in contrast to the receptive "people" (v.19). It was they who "handed him over" for crucifixion. In v.21 the words "but we" provide still another contrast. Unlike the rulers, they "hoped" that Jesus would bring deliverance. The past tense used here is, under the present circumstances, a pathetic reminder of their inability to recognize Jesus or to believe the report of the empty tomb. Their expectation that he would "redeem Israel" recalls the words of Zechariah in 1:68 (cf. 2:38; 21:28). In view of v.46 and the passion predictions, the term "third day" had a significance to Luke's readers. What should have been the day of hope realized was for them the day of hope extinguished.

The final incomprehensible element in the travelers' report was the report of the empty tomb (v.22). The mention of "angels" shows that this is what Luke meant by "men" in v.4.

Verse 24 recalls v.12. The empty tomb without the appearance of Jesus himself was inadequate. It ironically becomes the last sad part of their confused response to Jesus' question, "What things?" (v.19).

25–27 Jesus himself now speaks, though still unrecognized. He, who in his transfiguration was superior to Moses and Elijah (9:28–36), now invokes Moses and the Prophets to substantiate the divine plan of his path from suffering to glory (v.27). The word "all" (v.25) is a warning not to treat the Scriptures selectively. Such selectivity could lead to the omission of the Messiah's suffering (v.26). But "the Christ" (Messiah) did "have to" suffer ("had to" or "must" is one of Luke's key ideas; cf. 2:49; 4:43; 9:22; 13:16, 33; 15:32; 18:1; 19:5; 21:9; 22:7, 37; 24: 7, 44). The future glory of the Christ (v.26) was mentioned in the context of the passion prediction, ascribed there to the "Son of Man" (9:26; cf. 21:27). Here it refers to the honor anticipated in the OT for the Messiah, including the Resurrection. Paul quoted the OT to prove the necessity of both the suffering and the resurrection of the Messiah (Ac 17:2–3).

For several reasons vv.25–27 are vitally important. With great clarity they show that the sufferings of Christ, as well as his glory, were predicted in the OT and that all the OT Scriptures are important. They also show that the way the writers of the NT used the OT had its origin, not in their own creativity, but in the postresurrection teachings of Jesus, of which this passage is a paradigm. The passage also exemplifies the role of the OT in Luke's own theology. Although he does not directly quote the OT Scriptures as many times as Matthew does, nevertheless he alludes frequently to the OT, demonstrating that what God has promised must take place and employing a "proof-from-prophecy" apologetic for the truth of the Gospel.

28–32 The invitation for Jesus to stay with the two follows the ancient custom of hospitality. As the afternoon drew on and suppertime approached, the stranger would need food and lodging. Jesus had "acted as if" he were going to continue his journey. Such a gesture would, like the invitation itself, be appropriate in the custom of those days. This polite action seems intended to draw out a very strong response from Cleopas and his companion, who indeed then "urged him strongly" to stay (v.29).

The recognition scene is one of the high points in this story. Once again we find a table scene characteristic in Luke (cf. 5:29; 7:36; 14:1, 7, 12, 15–16). What is remarkable is that Jesus took the role of the host and broke the bread, giving thanks (v.30). This recalls the feeding of the five thousand (9:10–17) as well as the Last Supper (22:19), though it was not a celebration of the latter.

As to whether it was through the actual breaking of bread or through divine intervention that the moment of truth came and the two disciples recognized Jesus, the answer must be that it was through both. Whether or not the two noticed the nail scars, Jesus acting as host led to the recognition. At the same time, the passive verb "were opened" implies divine action (v.31; cf. comment on v.16). God is the revealer of the risen Christ. Note the repetition of Jesus' opening "the Scriptures" (v.32) and later "their minds" (v.45).

The narrative ends abruptly as Jesus disappeared and Cleopas and his companion reflected on their feelings of intense inner warmth. The specific occasion of these feelings is the presence of the Lord and his expounding the OT.

33–35 The words "at once" continue the chronology of the resurrection day (cf. v.13). The reunion with the Eleven brought assurance to all, as the two disciples fulfilled their role as witnesses (vv.34–35). They especially spoke of recognizing Jesus when he broke bread with them (v.35).

3. The appearance to the disciples (24:36–49)

This is the third Easter narrative in Luke. In the first Jesus is not seen; in the second he appears to two disciples; this time he appears to the Eleven. The events Luke tells us of here provide the substance for his apologetic for Jesus' bodily resurrection in Ac 1:3–4 and Peter's witness to Cornelius (Ac 10:40–43). In this story it is not Jesus' resurrection as such that is being proved but the fact that the sudden visitor was indeed Jesus, present in a tangible body.

36 Once again Luke carefully connects the events after the Crucifixion chronologically (23:54, 56; 24:1, 9, 13, 33) with the words

"While they were still talking about this." Suddenly Jesus himself "stood among them" (cf. Jn 20:19) and greeted them with a typical Semitic greeting, "Peace" (GK 1645; cf. shalom, GK 8934).

37–39 Luke's gospel opened with a terrified Zechariah in the unexpected presence of an angel (1:12). Now, near its end, Luke describes the fright of the disciples at the unexpected appearance of the risen Christ (v.37). One might have thought they would not respond this way, since they had just been hearing about Jesus' appearance on the Emmaus road. But whereas in that case Jesus had walked up to Cleopas and his companion as any traveler might, this time he appeared suddenly. Equally surprising to the reader are their doubts (v.38). These are significant for any who think that the disciples were expecting the Resurrection and therefore projected their hopes into a hallucination.

Jesus identified himself very emphatically (v.39): "It is I myself." The methods of crucifixion varied slightly, but Jesus apparently had nails in his hands and feet. Seeing and touching would convince the disciples. As in vv.3, 23, where Luke mentions the body of Jesus, here he again draws attention to the physical aspect of the Resurrection.

40–43 Verse 41a is a beautifully human touch. Jesus provides further evidence of his physical presence by eating (vv.42–43).

44–49 From time to time Luke has taken care to show that whatever the Lord has said unfailingly takes place (e.g., 2:20, 26; 19:32; 22:13, 37). That implication is perhaps present in the words "This is what I told you." Luke has a double emphasis in these verses, for not only had Jesus predicted the events that had happened, but the OT had also. The clause "while I was still with you" is a way of distinguishing between the days of Jesus' earthly ministry and his temporary postresurrection ministry before Ascension. "Law ... Prophets ... Psalms" expands

"Moses and all the Prophets" in v.27 by adding the Psalms as a major component of the OT, the third division called the Writings.

In v.31 the eyes of the two on the way to Emmaus were "opened." Now Jesus has "opened" the disciples' minds (v.45) to the "Scriptures." The formula "on the third day" (cf. v.7) goes back to the first passion prediction (9:22). Even the widespread preaching of repentance and forgiveness was predicted in the OT (cf. Ac 26:23). Such Scriptures as Isa 42:6; 60:3 may underlie v.47 here (cf. Ac 13:47). The fulfillment began in Ac 2:38: "Repent . . . for the forgiveness of sins." Gentiles heard these words in Ac 10:43 and 17:30 (cf. Paul's commission, Ac 26:17–18). The idea of reaching the Gentiles is certainly prominent in Luke (see comment on 10:1). Also, the place of Jerusalem as the base of the mission accords with Luke's constant featuring of that city. Likewise Luke has stressed the place of "witnesses" (GK 3459) and will continue to do so in Acts (e.g., 1:8). Therefore, v.48 supports his emphasis. What the Father "promised" (v.49) is the Holy Spirit (Ac 1:4–5; 2:16–17), who is indeed the promised "power" (Ac 1:8). This "power from on high" has been known in Luke from the very beginning of his narrative, for the Son of God was conceived in Mary when the Holy Spirit came upon her and she was overshadowed by the "power of the Most High." Luke concludes where he began.

4. The Ascension (24:50–53)

The Ascension is more than the last event in Luke's narrative sequence or a postscript to the Resurrection. He had already mentioned it as Jesus' ultimate goal in his great journey toward Jerusalem (cf. comment on 9:51). The Ascension also has significance in the opening verses of Acts. The brevity of the account here at the close of Luke's gospel is not the measure of Luke's estimate of its importance. This brevity may also imply a telescoping of the entire closing narrative. Perhaps the author already had in mind an expanded version of the Ascension at the beginning of Acts. His words here, though few, are weighty with theological significance and very much in character with the entire book. Of the gospel authors, only Luke records the Ascension.

50–51 The vicinity of Bethany includes the Mount of Olives (Ac 1:12). Jesus' action in lifting up his hands and blessing the disciples (v.51) was priestly. The word "bless" (GK 2328) was significant at the opening of Luke. Zechariah the priest was rendered speechless in the temple, so that he was unable to pronounce the priestly blessing on the people when he came out (1:22). Such a blessing now concludes the book. Elizabeth blessed Mary and her child (1:42); Zechariah blessed God (NIV, "praising") when, on his declaration of John's name, his speech was restored (1:64); he then blessed (NIV, "praise") God again in his song (1:68); Simeon blessed (NIV, "praised") God in the temple on seeing Jesus (2:28) and then blessed his parents (2:34). This word does not appear again in Luke till Jesus blessed the bread at Emmaus (24:30). Luke then uses the word again in v.51 and in v.53. Thus he places Jesus clearly within the spiritual setting of the temple and priesthood. As the resurrected Messiah, Jesus has the authority to bless.

This imagery forms an important part of the letter to the Hebrews, which describes the high priestly intercession of Christ after his ascension into heaven (e.g., Heb 1:3, 4:14; 6:19–20; 7:23–25; cf. Ro 8:34; Eph 1:20). Jesus is also the Prophet of God, and we are again reminded of the prophet Elijah (who was "taken up" to heaven; 2Ki 2:11). Luke's conclusion, therefore, points to Jesus as prophet, priest, and Messiah.

52–53 Jesus is also the Son of God, and so his disciples "worshiped him" (v.52). This beautiful gospel closes with the theme of "joy" restated in v.52 and with the city of Jerusalem and its temple again presented as the true home of Christianity—the origin of the Christian Gospel and the Christian church (cf. introductory comment on 9:51–19:44; comments on 13:31–35; 19:41–44). Luke's theme of doxology reappears at the very end, as the disciples were last seen "blessing" (NIV, "praising"; GK 2328) God in response to Christ's blessing them (vv.50–51). This is both an appropriate conclusion to Luke's gospel and a reminder to us to live a life of praise as we wait for the return of the ascended Lord.

John

INTRODUCTION

1. Background

The gospel of John was probably the last of the Gospels to be written and circulated, though it definitely belongs to the first century. Its action took place between A.D. 27 and 36, when Pontius Pilate was removed from office by the order of Tiberius Caesar.

This gospel was probably written at a time when the church was composed of second- and third-generation Christians who needed more detailed instruction about Jesus and new defenses for the apologetic problems raised by apostasy within the church and growing opposition outside. The understanding of the person of Christ that had depended on the testimony of his contemporaries was becoming a philosophical and theological problem. Doctrinal variations had begun to appear, and some of the assertions of the basic Christian truths had been challenged. A new presentation was necessary to meet the questions of the changing times (see 20:31).

The gospel of John is, therefore, more theological and in some respects more cosmopolitan than the Synoptics. While it is not necessarily less Jewish, it has a wider appeal to growing Christian experience and to an enlarging Gentile constituency than the others. John presents Jesus as the Lord of the maturing and questioning believer.

This gospel contains little information about general historical events. It does refer to the ministry of John the Baptist (1:19–37; 3:22–36; 4:1); Herod's rebuilding of the temple (2:20); the high priesthood of Annas and Caiaphas (18:13–14); and the person of Pontius Pilate (18:28–19:16,38), prefect of Judea. The Roman domination of Palestine is implied but not featured. There is almost no direct allusion to current political affairs and no mention of the church by name. The author seems to be concerned less with time than with eternity.

2. Unity

The combination of intricacy and simplicity in the structure of the gospel of John conveys the unavoidable impression that it is the product of one mind. Its consistency of structure, distinctive vocabulary, uniformity of style, and directness of purpose can best be explained by ascribing it to a single author.

The main criterion of unity lies in the purpose of the work. It reads as a compact whole and is united by several distinct themes. The different topics it deals with—such as the "signs," the "I am's," the debates and personal interviews, and the discourses to the disciples—may not all appear in uniform sequence; nevertheless, there is complete unity in their teaching. All of them focus on the purpose expressed in the author's final note (20:30–31) and give the impression that they are just the sort of thing a friend of Jesus would remember about him.

3. Authorship

a. External evidence

The earliest tradition of the church ascribes the fourth gospel to John the son of Zebedee, one of the first of Jesus' disciples, and one who was closest to him. Irenaeus (c. 180) stated plainly that the disciple John had published a gospel when he lived in Ephesus. Irenaeus's testimony has been corroborated by other writers, such as Tatian (c. 150), who included it in his Diatesseron, a harmony of the Gospels; Theophilus of Antioch (c. 165); Clement of Alexandria (c. 220), who quoted from almost every chapter; and Tertullian (also c. 220). Likewise, Eusebius, the famous church historian of the fourth century, attributed the gospel to John.

b. Internal evidence

Internal evidence also testifies to likelihood of John as the single author of this gospel. The epilogue closes by focusing on "the disciple whom Jesus loved" as the witness and writer of the content of the gospel (21:20–24). The preceding chapters couple this disciple with Peter in the events on the morning of the Resurrection (20:2–8) and also identify him as the one Jesus committed his mother to at the Crucifixion (19:25–27). He was present at the Last Supper, where he reclined next to Jesus and was questioned by Peter (13:23–24).

Furthermore, the author was aware of the thinking of the disciples, and apparently he shared their interests and hopes. He reported the private discourses of Jesus at some length. He even shows knowledge of Jesus' inner consciousness, something that would have been possible only to a close associate (6:6, 61, 64; 13:1–3, 11; 18:4). Undoubtedly, therefore, he belonged to the Twelve, and he was probably a member of the inner circle. Obviously he was not Peter, nor is it likely that he was one of the others mentioned in the third person in the main body of the gospel (John himself is never mentioned by name). Nor could the author have been James, John's brother, for he was executed by Herod Agrippa I prior to A.D. 44 (Ac 12:2). Presumably, therefore, he was John, Peter's closest associate after the Resurrection (Ac 3:1–11; 4:13–20; Gal 2:9).

Second, this gospel was almost certainly written by a Jew. The author was acquainted with Jewish opinions and learning and with the details of Jewish customs. His vocabulary and general style are Semitic, even though the gospel was written in Greek. The OT is frequently quoted, and the necessity of prophetic fulfillment is emphasized (cf. 13:18; 15:25).

Furthermore, the author was a Palestinian Jew, not a member of the Diaspora. His knowledge of Palestinian topography was accurate. He distinguished between Bethany, the suburb of Jerusalem where Mary and Martha lived (11: 1), and "Bethany on the other side of the Jordan," where John the Baptist preached (1:28). Some of the sites he alluded to, such as Aenon (3:23) and Ephraim (11:54), are not described elsewhere; but, obviously, they were actual places well known to him. His description of the features of Jerusalem, such as the pool by the "Sheep Gate" (5:2), "the pool of Siloam" (9:7), the "Stone Pavement" (19:13), the place of execution called "Golgotha" (Aram. for "skull"; 19:17), the garden of Joseph where Jesus' body was buried (19:41), and the varied references to the temple (2:14–16 8:20; 10:23), shows that he was familiar with the city before its destruction. Archaeological investigations have confirmed the accuracy of many of the author's allusions, though complete data are presently unattainable.

A third deduction from the internal evidence of the gospel is that the author personally witnessed the events he described. He spoke easily and familiarly of the disciples and associates of Jesus (6:5–7; 12:21; 13:36; 14:5, 8, 22) and knew the background of those with whom Jesus had only casual contact, such as Nicodemus (3:1) or Annas (18:13). Small details appear frequently, such as the barley bread used at the feeding of the five thousand (6:9), the fragrance of the ointment Mary poured on Jesus (12:3), or the time at which Judas left the Last Supper (13:30). These are not the creation of literary imagination, but they are the natural touches that come from personal memory.

Although the author never names himself, it seems that his identity was well known to his contemporaries. Just why he or his colleagues who wrote the final chapter should have left the gospel anonymous is not clear—though, as a matter of fact, none of the Gospels mentions the name of its author. If it were written during a period of persecution, the writer possibly would have preferred to remain unidentified, though some of the recipients must have known who produced it.

4. Date

Much of Jerusalem was destroyed by the Roman suppression of the Jewish revolt of A.D. 66–70. As mentioned above, the detailed references in this gospel to many of the ancient landmarks indicate that the author was acquainted with them and that he must have been in Jerusalem before A.D. 70.

The date of the gospel has been variously estimated at almost any point between A.D. 45, shortly after the dispersion of Christians from Jerusalem following the persecution under Saul (Ac 8:1–4), and the middle of the second century. The explanation in ch. 21 concerning Jesus' words "If I want him to remain alive until I return, what is that to you?" (v.22) seemingly implies that "the disciple whom Jesus loved" must have attained a great age and must have been a contemporary of the second-generation church. Most conservative scholars suggest a date around 85 to 90, when the author had achieved advanced age but was still in full possession of his memory and active in ministry, though it may have been composed earlier.

5. Recipients

The intended recipients of John's gospel are not clearly identified. From the writer's habit of explaining Jewish usages, translating Jewish names, and locating Palestinian sites, it would seem that he was probably writing for a Gentile church outside Palestine. If the reading "believe" in John 20:31 is in the present tense, it would imply that the gospel was written to Christians who needed encouragement and deepening of their faith. If "believe" is in the aorist tense, it would suggest that the gospel was addressed, at least in part, to a pagan constituency to bring them to belief in Jesus as Christ and Son of God. The content of the gospel does not give overwhelming support to either possibility.

Probably it will not be too wrong to suggest that the gospel of John was written for Gentile Christians who had already acquired a basic knowledge of the life and works of Jesus but who needed further confirmation of their faith. By the use of personal reminiscences interpreted in the light of a long life of devotion to Christ and by numerous episodes that generally had not been used in the gospel tradition, John created a new and different approach to understanding Jesus' person.

If the Johannine letters (whose style is similar to this gospel) are any guide, the writer must have been a highly respected elder within the structure of the church. John considered himself responsible for its welfare and did not hesitate to assert his authority (2Jn 1, 4, 8; 3Jn 9–10). The doctrinal digressions implied by the counsel given in these letters indicate that the church was being imperiled, if not actually deceived, by false teachers who came in the guise of itinerant preachers. Many of these were followers of Cerinthus, a teacher who contended that Jesus was merely a human personality who was possessed by the Christ-spirit at his baptism and who relinquished this spirit on the cross. Contrary to this teaching, the gospel asserts that the Word became flesh (1:14) and that the descent of the Holy Spirit on Jesus at the baptism was the proof of his mission, not the origin of it (1:32–34). The Cross did not terminate his ministry; it simply marked the end of one stage of it. The Son returned to the Father in person; he did not cease to be the Son by death. The stress on sonship throughout the gospel conveys the idea that it was a live issue in the church; and that impression is strengthened by the warning in the first letter of John: "Such a man is the antichrist—he denies the Father and the Son. No one who denies the Son has the Father; whoever acknowledges the Son has the Father also" (1Jn 2:22–23).

6. Purpose

John wrote this gospel to meet the spiritual need of a church that had little background in the OT and that may have been endangered by the plausible contention of Cerinthus or men like him. John's intention is stated with perfect clarity: "These [signs] are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that by believing you may have life in his name" (20:31). The total thesis of the gospel is belief in the Son who came from the Father.

The gospel gives an initial impression of discontinuity. Many of its episodes have little direct chronological or logical connection with one another. Nevertheless, they show a remarkable unity built on the one purpose of convincing the reader that Jesus was supernatural in his origin, powers, and goal. He was the Logos who had come into the world from another sphere (1:14). He performed miracles, or "signs," that illustrated his many-faceted powers, especially applied to human need. He died an unusual death, but he rose from the dead to send his disciples out on a universal mission. The last sentences of the gospel imply the promise of his return. An entirely new revelation of the plan and power of God is latent in this gospel (1:18).

7. Literary Form and Structure

The gospel of John is a narrative composed of various individual scenes from the career of Jesus; it is not a complete biography. The chronological gaps leave an impression of incompleteness for those expecting a complete chronicle of Jesus' career. Because the gospel has an apologetic or possibly polemic purpose, it utilizes only the episodes that will best illustrate its presentation of Jesus as the object of faith.

Throughout this gospel, certain personal interviews between Jesus and others are given at length. The author emphasizes dialogue and discourse between Jesus and his disciples. Miracles are few and are selected for individual illustrative purpose. The vocabulary is distinctive and is limited to major ideas such as those expressed by the words believe, witness, love, abide, the Father, the Son, the Counselor, light, life, darkness, Word, glorify, true, and others. Most of these are used metaphorically and represent the leading ideas of the gospel. It is almost impossible to read a single paragraph in the fourth gospel that does not identify itself as Johannine by at least one word or phrase.

The structure of this gospel may be analyzed from various viewpoints. The author uses at least five different approaches to his subject: (1) the central theme of "belief," (2) the phases of the ministry of Jesus, (3) a chronological sequence, (4) a geographic allocation of activity between Galilee and Jerusalem, and (5) the personal interviews.

a. Theme

The first of these criteria concerns the central theme of "belief." The varied episodes and teachings of the gospel all help develop this concept. The Prologue introduces the ministry of John the Baptist by stating that "he came as a witness . . . so that through him all men might believe" (1:7). The closing words of the main narrative that precedes the Epilogue (ch. 21) declare that "these [things] are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God" (20:31). The word "believe" (GK 4409) appears ninety-eight times in the gospel. All the signs, teachings, and events in the gospel are used to stimulate faith in Christ and are so ordered that they mark growth in this faith on the part of his disciples. Growth was not always uniform, as Simon Peter's experience shows, and generally was countered by a growth of unbelief, as seen in the conduct of Jesus' enemies. The conflict between belief and unbelief, exemplified in the actions and utterances of the main characters, forms the plot.

The development of "belief "in John's work affords one key to its interpretation and marks its progressive evangelistic appeal. The following outline shows its general progress: (1) The Prologue: The Proposal for Belief (1:1–18); (2) The Presentation for Belief (1:19–4:54); (3) The Reactions of Belief and Unbelief (5:1–6:71); (4) The Crystallization of Belief and Unbelief (7:1–11:53); (5) The Crisis of Belief and Unbelief (11:54–12:50); (6) The Assurance for Belief (13:1–17:26); (7) The Rejection by Unbelief (18:1–19:42); (8) The Vindication of Belief (20:1–31); (9) Epilogue: The Dedication of Belief (21:1–25). In this scheme, the author is not so much concerned with a regular sequence of events as with the creation of a relationship. His main purpose is to involve his readers in an active faith in Jesus as the Christ, the Son of God.

b. Phases of ministry

The previous approach to the ministry of Jesus is topical rather than biographical. Nevertheless, the gospel is still strongly biographical. The phases of the ministry of Jesus follow a definite progression from the initial questioning of his authority down to its ultimate repudiation by his enemies. The outline used in this commentary notes five major divisions: (1) The Prologue, which states the basic preparation for understanding the ministry of Jesus (1:1–18); (2) the ministry of John the Baptist and the ministry of Jesus, which ultimately led to his rejection by the Jewish people (1:18–12:50); (3) the Farewell Discourse in the Upper Room, where Jesus prepares his disciples for his coming death (chs. 13–17); (4) the story of Jesus' death and resurrection, which is much shorter in John than in the Synoptic Gospels (chs. 18–20); and (5) the Epilogue, possibly added as a postscript to the main body of the gospel (ch. 21).

c. The chronological framework

The chronological framework of the gospel is loose. The segment from 1:19 to 2:11 represents the consecutive events of a few days, which are well marked by the phrase "the next day" (1:29, 35, 43), or some related expression. The major divisions of action following the initial sign (ch. 2) are indicated by the occurrences of feasts (2:13; 5:1; 6:4; 7:2, 14; 10:22; 12:1), though the chief reason for mentioning the feasts seems to be social, not chronological. Notwithstanding the difficulty of placing the events of this gospel in a fixed chronological order, it is still true that John seems to have had a knowledge of such an order and that he adhered to it, allowing for gaps at those places where he chose to be silent. The order of the last week begins with John 12, "six days before the Passover" (12:1), and ends with Jesus' crucifixion just prior to Friday evening, the beginning of the Sabbath. The tomb was found to be empty on "the first day of the week" (20:1), and in the afternoon of the same day Jesus appeared to the disciples in the Upper Room (v.19).

d. Geographical structure

The gospel's structure by location does not seem to follow any particular design, except that it emphasizes Jesus' activity in Jerusalem. There are only three allusions to his ministry in Galilee—Capernaum in 2:12, Capernaum again in 4:43–54, and Bethsaida on the Sea of Galilee (6:1–15), followed by the address in the synagogue at Capernaum (vv.25–70)—plus a brief visit in Samaria (4:1–42) and in Ephraim (11:54). This emphasis on Jerusalem stands to reason, since John wants to show, against the background of his opposition, who Jesus was. Since opposition seemed to come largely from the leaders of the Jewish hierarchy whose headquarters were in Jerusalem, the main scene is laid where the sharpest theological debates occurred and where the closing scenes of Jesus' life took place. (On the relationship of this to the Synoptics, see the last section of this introduction.)

e. Personal interviews

One marked feature of John's gospel is the partiality to personal interviews. The Synoptics emphasize Jesus' public ministry as he talked to the crowds, though they do lay considerable emphasis on the training of the disciples. While John does on several occasions say that many believed in him in response to his public actions or appeals (2:23; 4:39; 7:31; 8:30; 10:42; 11:45; 12:11, 42), it records fewer of his general discourses. The personal interviews are rather widely distributed through the earlier part of the gospel: Nicodemus in Jerusalem (3:1–15), the woman of Samaria (4:1–26), the nobleman of Cana (4:43–53), the paralytic in Jerusalem (5:1–15), the blind man (9:1–38), and Mary and Martha in Bethany (11:17–40). These interviews represent different classes of society, occur at different times during Jesus' career, and have different occasions followed by varying appeals. All of them, however, whether implicitly or explicitly, illustrate the nature and consequences of belief. All of the interviews depict Jesus' personal concern for people.

The general interviews with groups are similar in content and teaching. In time and place they approximately parallel the individual interviews. "Many" listened to him in Jerusalem (2:23); "many of the Samaritans" received him willingly after his conversation with the woman (4:39); a crowd gathered to hear him in Capernaum after the feeding of the five thousand (6:24–40; see also 12:12, 17, 29–36). Likewise, John gives a great deal of attention to Jesus' personal ministry to the disciples: Andrew (1:40; 6:8), Peter (1:42; 6:68; et al.), Philip (1:43–44; 6:5; et al.), Nathanael (1:47–51; 21:2), Thomas (11:16; 14:5; 20:26–29), and Judas Iscariot (12:4–8; 13:26–30).

In contrast, John records interviews with hostile persons. At least six conflicts with "the Jews" are mentioned (2:18–20; 5:16–47; 6:41–59; 7:15–44; 8:31–58; 10:22–39). The title "The Jews" apparently is not given solely for the purpose of distinguishing their nationality from Samaritans or Gentiles but to identify Jesus' opponents (i.e., the Jewish leadership; cf. 7:13; 9:22; 20:19). Each of these instances indicates the progress of unbelief that leads to the climax of the Cross. The interview with Pilate is the only instance of a hostile individual confrontation in this gospel, and Pilate's hostility is due more to his political dilemma than to personal enmity.

These personal interviews, while not in themselves constituting a consistent basis for outlining the progressive development of the gospel, do illustrate it. Thus they serve much the same purpose as pictures in a book. The interviews clearly relate to the main theme and forcibly convey the revelation given through Christ and the effects of the power he exercised.

8. Theological Values

The gospel of John is predominantly theological. Although all four gospels present the person of Jesus from a theological viewpoint, John emphasizes it most strongly. His initial assertion in 1:1, 14, 18 declares that Jesus was no ordinary person; he was the incarnation of the eternal God, who chose that means of revealing himself perfectly to humankind. Throughout the gospel the essential deity of the Lord Jesus Christ is stressed.

A second theological aspect is the concept of atonement. Jesus was introduced by John the Baptist as the sacrificial "Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world" (1:29). Jesus told Nicodemus that "just as Moses lifted up the snake in the desert, so the Son of Man must be lifted up, that everyone who believes in him may have eternal life" (3:14–15). He spoke of his flesh, which he would "give for the life of the world" (6:51), and called himself "the good shepherd [who] lays down his life for the sheep" (10:11).

Another prominent theme is eternal life. Life in the sum of its total expression is a major subject of the Prologue (1:4). His gift to believers is eternal life (3:15–16; 10:10; 20:31), bestowed on those who commit themselves to him (3:36; 4:13; 5:21, 24; 8:12).

An important body of teaching on the person and functions of the Holy Spirit appears in Jesus' farewell discourse to the disciples (14:25–26; 15:26; 16:7–15). His intermediary relation between Christ and the believer and his functional relation to God, the believer, and the world are plainly defined.

Perhaps the greatest theological contribution of the gospel is a full discussion and demonstration of the nature of belief. Both by definition and by example its essence is described. Belief is equated with receiving (1:12), following (1:40), drinking (4:13), responding (4:51), eating (6:57), accepting (6:60, lit., "hear"), worship (9:38), obeying (11:39–41), and commitment (12:1–11). The lives of those who "believed" show both the method and result of their faith.

9. The Relation of John to the Synoptics

Since both the gospel of John and the three other gospels deal with narratives of the life of Jesus, the question of interrelationship naturally occurs. Matthew, Mark, and Luke distinctly resemble one another, not only in general subject and order of narrative but also in many instances of extended discourse. The text of John, on the other hand, differs radically in its form and content from the other gospels.

With respect to its general order, the gospel of John parallels the others. It begins with the ministry of John the Baptist, narrates the early contacts with disciples, contains accounts of Jesus' conflicts with the scribes and Pharisees, and places the feeding of the five thousand and the walking on the water at the turning point of his ministry. The story of the Passion Week begins with the entry into Jerusalem and terminates with the Crucifixion and the Resurrection.

On the other hand, John the Baptist's introduction of Jesus to his disciples is highlighted rather than his general preaching of repentance. Jesus' initial contact with the disciples is quite different from the calling of the first four disciples as reported elsewhere. The discourses of Jesus in John are mainly apologetic and theological rather than ethical and practical, as in the Sermon on the Mount. Only seven miracles are recounted, and of these only two duplicate those of the Synoptic Gospels. The chronological order is different, for John places a cleansing of the temple early in Jesus' ministry, whereas the Synoptics locate it in Passion Week. The events of the Last Supper, the betrayal, the hearing before Pilate, and the Crucifixion are reported quite differently from the other three gospels; and the Resurrection account has only slight resemblance to the others.

The best conclusion to be drawn is that John wrote independently of the others, not simply because he used different sources, but because he had a different purpose in organizing his material. He wrote as a first-hand witness making a special presentation of Jesus. John possessed knowledge of many facts of Jesus' life mentioned in the Synoptics, but he also knew much they did not record. He utilized this material in a different way and shaped it for a different purpose.

At the same time, there is a sense in which the fourth gospel complements the other three. It often seems to begin its narrative at a point where the others have stopped or to assume a knowledge they would supply. For example, in the account of the Last Supper John tells how the disciples reclined for the meal without the customary footwashing as they entered the room and how Jesus himself felt obligated to supply the lack of service (John 13:2–14). Luke tells us how on that occasion the disciples were bickering with one another for the highest place in the coming kingdom (Luke 22:24). If their attitude toward one another was rivalry for the best position in the coming rule of Jesus, it explains why no one was ready to wash the feet of the others.

Contrasts Between the Synoptics and John

The Synoptics	The Gospel of John
Chiefly concerned with Jesus' ministry in the north, around Galilee	Gives more coverage to Jesus' ministry in the south, around Judea
Much emphasis on the kingdom	More emphasis on the person of Jesus
Jesus as Son of David, Son of Man	Jesus especially as Son of God
Anticipation of the church and references to the infant church	Gospel of the maturing church
The earthly story	The heavenly meaning
Jesus' sayings generally short (e.g., parables)	More of the long discourses of Jesus
Comparatively little commentary by the gospel writers	Much commentary by John
Only one mention of a Passover	Mention of three, possibly four, Passovers

Adapted from Irving Jensen, John (Chicago: Moody, 1970), by permission.

The bulk of the teaching recorded in the first three gospels was delivered to crowds that gathered to hear his words of wisdom or to opponents who contended with him. The larger part of the teaching in the fourth gospel (e.g., chs. 14–17) was intended for the ears of his disciples only. But a short passage in Matthew and another in Luke (Mt 11:25–30; Lk 10:21–22) are similar in style to John's gospel. Although these two passages are brief, they are sufficient to show that Jesus could, and undoubtedly did, use both approaches in dealing with his contemporaries.

EXPOSITION

I. Prologue: Revelation of the Word (1:1–18)

A. The Preincarnate Word (1:1–5)

1 "In the beginning" recalls the opening words of Genesis 1:1: "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." The expression does not refer to a particular moment of time but assumes a timeless eternity. "Word" (logos; GK 3364) has several meanings. Ordinarily it refers to a spoken word, with emphasis on the meaning conveyed. Logos, therefore, is an expression of personality in communication. Scripture also tells us that it is creative in its power: "By the word of the LORD were the heavens made, their starry host by the breath of his mouth" (Ps 33:6). To the Hebrew "the word of God" was the self-assertion of the divine personality; to the Greek the formula denoted the rational mind that ruled the universe. John is asserting that the "Word" is the source of all that is visible and antedates the totality of the material world.

The use of logos implies that John was endeavoring to bring out the full significance of the Incarnation to the Gentile world as well as to the Jewish people. While not adopting the Greek concept in its entirety, he indicates that Jesus had universal rather than local significance and that he spoke with ultimate authority. He was preexistent, involved in the act of creation, and therefore superior to all created beings. This presentation lifts Christ above the materialistic, pagan concept of deities just as the Incarnation brings the Hebrew concept of God into everyday life.

The preposition "with" (GK 4639) in the phrase "the Word was with God" indicates both equality and distinction of identity along with association. The phrase can be rendered "face to face with." It therefore suggests personality and coexistence with the Creator, and yet is an expression of his creative being.

The three statements of v.1 bring out three different aspects of the nature of the Word. The first speaks of his preexistence, the second of his distinctiveness, and the third of his deity.

2 John succinctly reemphasizes the great truths of v.1. The Word's preexistence, distinctiveness, and deity are brought out in the statement "he was with God in the beginning."

3 The word "made" (GK 1181) means "became" rather than "constructed." The visible universe with all its complexity owes its origin to the creative mind and power of God. Apart from his Word, existence is impossible (see also Col 1:16; Heb 1:2).

4 The term "life" (GK 2437, occurring thirty-six times in John) is uniformly used throughout the gospel. Wherever it appears, it refers either to the principle of physical life or, more often, to spiritual life. Frequently it is coupled with the adjective "eternal" (GK 173) to denote the quality and power of the believer's life. The life was embodied in Christ, who demonstrated perfectly what eternal life is by his career (cf. 14:6; 17:3). Christ is the "life" that is the "light of men." In him God's purpose and power are made available to human beings. He is their ultimate hope.

5 The metaphorical contrast between light and darkness as representing the powers of good and evil was common in John's day. A better translation of v.5b here is "The darkness did not overcome it" (see NIV note; cf. the use of this same verb in 12:35).

B. The Prophetic Announcement (1:6–8, 15)

6 In vv.6–8 the human agent for introducing the Word to people is presented. As the Word came to bring the heavenly light to humanity, so John came to speak from a human level and to awaken people to their need of God's revelation. This gospel stresses the function of John the Baptist rather than his origin or character (cf. Lk 1:5–24, 57–80). The author takes for granted that the reader knows the Baptist, and he emphasizes John's subordinate role (cf. Jn 3:22–30) and the fact that he was "sent"—a word that refers to the authority that commissioned him. John's function is defined in v.7.

7–8 "Witness" (GK 3456) is distinctly a Johannine word. It is especially pertinent in this gospel, which attempts to establish by adequate testimony the claims of Jesus as the Son of God (see comment on 1:19). The preaching of John the Baptist was preparatory to the coming of the Christ (cf. Mt 3:11–12; Mk 1:1–8; Lk 1:17; 3:15–17). He told the crowds listening to him that he was only the forerunner of another who would confer on them the Holy Spirit and that they must repent, or change their attitude, in anticipation of meeting him. The author was careful to specify that John the Baptist was not the genuine light but that he came to attest it.

15 The author reverts to the witness of John the Baptist to explain further the Baptist's position as to Christ. The manifestation of Jesus came after John's appearance, but in importance Jesus took precedence over him. Jesus surpassed John because he was intrinsically greater.

C. The Reception of the Word (1:9–13)

9 Christ is the real or genuine light of humanity who was about to enter the world. His function would be to give the light of truth to all whom his ministry would affect, whether in greater or lesser degree.

10 "World" (GK 3180) refers to the current organization or culture in which people live, whether applied to the natural environment (16:21) or to the present order as contrasted with the spiritual order (6:14; 9:39; 11:27; et al). Here it plainly refers to the total environment that the Word created (1:3). The second part of the verse places the emphasis on the ancient world of men and women who did not recognize him. There was no flash of awareness concerning his real person.

11 In the phrase "he came to that which was his own, but his own did not receive him," the former "own" (neuter in Greek) refers to things; and the phrase may mean "his own property" or "his home" (as in 19:27). The latter "own" (masculine in Greek) refers to "his own people," the nation he belonged to. Jesus came to the place he had created and had a right to possess. Those who inhabited it turned him away in rejection.

12–13 Just as there is a sharp antithesis in vv.4–5 between darkness and light, so here is an equally direct contrast between rejection and reception. In spite of the many who rejected the Word, there were some who received him. This provides the initial definition of "believe" (GK 4409) by equating it with "receive." When we receive a gift, we demonstrate our confidence in its reality and trustworthiness. We make it part of our own possessions. By being so received, Jesus gives to those who receive him a right to membership in the family of God.

"Become" indicates clearly that people are not the spiritual children of God by natural birth, for we cannot become what we already are. This verb implies a change of nature. "Not of natural descent" excludes a purely physical process; "nor of human decision" rules out the result of any biological urge; "or a husband's will" shows that this kind of birth is not merely the outcome of a legal marriage. The relation is spiritual, not biological. There is a connection with the concept of the new birth as elaborated in Jesus' conversation with Nicodemus (see comments on 3:3–8).

D. The Incarnation of the Word (1:14, 16–18)

14 Verse 14 marks the fourth statement about the Word. Note the contrast between vv.1 and 14. Verse 1 states that the Word "was," referring to his permanent condition or state, while v.14 states that the Word "became" flesh, involving a change in state. This is the basic statement of the Incarnation, for Christ entered into a new dimension of existence through the gateway of human birth and took up his residence among human beings. The verb translated "made his dwelling" (GK 5012) means "to pitch a tent, to dwell temporarily." He left his usual place and accepted the conditions of human life and environment, with the attendant temporal limitations that all humans experience (cf. also 3:17; 6:38–42, 51; 7:29; 8:23; 9:5; 10:36; 16:28).

John's presentation of Christ as the Word is not primarily metaphysical but practical (cf. comment in v.1). As the preexistent Son of God, he was the Creator of the world and the Executor of the will of the Father. As the incarnate Son of God, he exercised in his human existence these same powers and revealed effectively the person of the Father. "We have seen his glory" implies a personal observation of a new reality. Probably there is an allusion to the Transfiguration (Mt 17:2–8; Mk 9:2–8; Lk 9:28–36). His incarnation was the full manifestation of grace and truth because it was the greatest possible expression of God's compassion for people and the most perfect way of conveying the truth to their understanding.

The "one and only [GK 3666] Son" emphasizes the fact that Jesus is the unique Son of God; he has no equal and is able fully to reveal the Father. God's personal revelation of himself in Christ has no parallel elsewhere, nor has it ever been repeated.

16 Verse 15 has already been discussed as part of the section concerning John the Baptist. Verse 16 connects directly with v.14; it says that the Son was full of the grace and truth of the Father. The writer reminds his readers that they have already experienced that grace in increasing measure. When one supply of grace is exhausted, another is available.

17 The contrast between law and grace as methods of God's dealing with humans is expressed here as plainly as in the Pauline writings (see Ro 5:20–21; Eph 2:8). The law represented God's standard of righteousness; grace exhibited his attitude to human beings who found that they could not keep the law. Compare this verse with the words of Jesus in the Sermon on the Mount: "You have heard that it was said. . . . But I tell you" (Mt 5:21–22, 27–28, 33–34, 30–39, 43–44).

18 The noun "God" has no article in the Greek text, which indicates that the author is presenting God in his nature of being rather than as a person. "Deity" might be a more accurate rendering. The meaning is that no human has ever seen the essence of deity. God is invisible, not because he is unreal, but because physical eyes are incapable of detecting him. Deity as a being is known only through spiritual means that are able to receive its (his) communications. "God the one and only" is as strong an affirmation of the deity of Christ as is v.1.

"At the Father's side" is substantially the same expression as that used in 13:23 concerning "the disciple whom Jesus loved," who "was reclining next to him." It shows intimate association, which presupposes close fellowship. As the confidant of the Father, Jesus is uniquely qualified to act as the intermediary who can carry the knowledge of God to humans.

The phrase "has made him known" (GK 2007) means to "explain" or "interpret." The being and nature of God, which cannot be perceived directly by ordinary senses, have been adequately presented to us by the Incarnation. The life and words of Jesus are more than an announcement; they are an explanation of God's attitude toward humans and of his purpose for them.

II. The Public Ministry of the Word (1:19–12:50)

Having introduced the figure of the incarnate Word by the Prologue, and having identified the forerunner by his name and by his mission, the author proceeds to present the ministry of the Word in some detail. Broadly, the book can be divided into two sections: the public and the private ministries of Christ. The former occupies the larger chronological section; the latter is brief and is closely related to the Passion, which concludes the narrative.

A. The Beginning Ministry (1:19–4:54)

1. The witness of John the Baptist (1:19–34)

19 The miracle of the Incarnation called for witnesses to substantiate its reality. First in order is that of John the Baptist. His preaching attracted such large crowds that the Jewish hierarchy in Jerusalem sent priests (the theological authorities of the nation) and Levites (those concerned with the ritual and service of the temple) to investigate him. John did not seem to fit into any category familiar to the Jewish authorities, and his unusual success demanded an explanation.

20 "Christ" (GK 5986) is the Greek equivalent of the Hebrew "Messiah," meaning "Anointed" (see comments on Mk 3:29–30). It was the title of the prophesied deliverer, who would bring renewal and political freedom to Israel (cf. 4:25). John the Baptist disclaimed the title because he was not the Messiah and because it had political implications that would have made him appear to the Romans as a potential insurrectionist.

21–22 The suggestion that John the Baptist might be identified with Elijah reflected the Jewish expectation that the return of Elijah would precede the advent of the Messiah (see Mal 4:5–6). Because John's rough exterior and ascetic tendencies corresponded to Elijah's type of personality (cf. Mk 6:14), some identified him with the stormy prophet who had challenged Ahab (1Ki 17–19). John rejected the suggestion and denied that he was Elijah raised from the dead.

Again they asked, "Are you the Prophet?" referring probably to God's word to Moses in Dt 18:15 (see also comment on 7:40, where some people thought Jesus might be the Prophet). When John disclaimed identity with all these persons, the delegation demanded in exasperation, "Who are you?"

23 The reference to Isaiah uses the figure of preparing a road for the king through open and uneven territory so that he may travel over a smooth highway. John the Baptist here called himself the "roadbuilder" for one greater than he who would follow him with a fuller revelation. Isaiah went on to say that "the glory of the LORD will be revealed, and all mankind together will see it" (Isa 40:5). This "glory" was revealed in the person of Jesus, of whom the writer of the gospel has already said, "We have seen his glory" (1:14).

24–25 The Pharisees represented the strict interpreters of the Law and were particularly interested in examining the credentials of any new religious teacher in Judaism. This gospel does not show unvarying hostility toward them. Nicodemus was a Pharisee and was apparently a sincere if unenlightened person (see 3:1–21). As a class, however, they were hostile toward Jesus because he did not observe traditional rules and because he openly rebuked their superficial and often hypocritical religiosity. These Pharisees challenged John's right to baptize.

26–27 John suggested that he did not profess to speak with ultimate authority. He was, after all, preaching repentance (Lk 3:3) and was calling for baptism as a confession of repentance in expectation of the greater person who was yet to appear. It seems likely that John's baptism followed the pattern of proselyte baptism, which required a renunciation of all evil, complete immersion in water, and then reclothing as a member of the holy community of law-keepers.

John drew his reference to untying the sandals of his successor from the practice of using the lowest slave of a household to remove the sandals and wash the feet of guests. John's witness, therefore, reflected the exalted nature of Jesus and placed the latter far above himself.

28 "Bethany on the other side of Jordan" was so named to distinguish it from the Bethany near Jerusalem (see 12:1). Its exact site is unknown.

29 The chronological scheme of this section is indicated by the reference to successive days: the first day, when the delegation from Jerusalem questioned John (1:19–28); the "next" (second) day, when John saw Jesus approaching (1:29–34); the "next" (third) day, when John pointed out Jesus to his disciples and when they visited him (1:35–42); and the "next" (fourth) day, when Jesus "decided to leave for Galilee" (1:43–50).

The witness of John the Baptist was positive as well as negative and focused on Jesus rather than on himself. Verses 29–34 contain his presentation of the person of Jesus. Two aspects stand out in the titles by which he introduced Jesus. "The Lamb [GK 303] of God" reflects the sacrificial character of Christ's mission, probably alluding to Isa 53:7 (cf. v.36; Ac 8:32; 1Pe 1:19). The sacrifice of a lamb as a substitute or as an atonement for sin appears frequently in the OT, beginning with Abraham in Ge 22:2–8. In Lev 14:10–25, a lamb was prescribed as a guilt offering. The book of Revelation also refers to "the Lamb" (GK 768; Rev 5:6–13; 6:1–3,5,7; et al.), though it employs this title as a triumphal title, memorializing the completion of Christ's sacrificial work. The title "Lamb of God" here in Jn 1:29 therefore refers to the atoning work of Christ, who by one final sacrifice of himself removed the guilt of our sins and opened the way to God. John the Baptist limited his own function to introducing Jesus and declared that only the latter could take away sin.

30 This verse is essentially a restatement of v.15, with one significant addition. John calls Jesus "a man who comes after me." The Greek word for "man" in the verse is the word for "male." It intimates the headship of Christ over his followers in the sense of the man-woman relationship in marriage.

31 The identity of the Messiah was unknown to John the Baptist. This does not mean that John did not know Jesus personally, for, after all, they were relatives (Lk 1:36). John's ministry was twofold: he was to lead his hearers to repentance (Mk 1:4) and to reveal the Messiah to Israel. Somehow John understood that the revelation of Messiah would take place in conjunction with his baptizing ministry; therefore, he remained faithful to his calling. However, even after Messiah had been revealed to Israel at the baptism of Jesus, John continued the other aspect of his ministry.

32–34 The second aspect of John's witness to Jesus (see comment on v.29) concerned the title "Son of God." This aspect was related to the work of the Holy Spirit, who both authenticated the mission of Jesus and was the seal of his work in individual lives. John announced that Jesus would impart the Holy Spirit to his followers. To "baptize with the Holy Spirit" means that just as the common experience of baptism in water signified repentance and confession of sin, so the indwelling of the Holy Spirit is the seal and dynamic of the new life. Repentance and confession are the conditions on which the believer receives the gift of the Spirit (cf. Ac 2:38; Gal 3:2; 5:16–25). The manifestation of the presence of the Spirit in Jesus' case was visible (see Lk 3:21–22), though this gospel records the Baptist's later reflection on that event.

John the Baptist's solemn avowal that he had seen the descent of the Spirit on Jesus and that he is "the Son of God" is the climax of his testimony. The significance of the title can be best understood in the light of 1:18 (see comment). John's emphatic declaration was the reason why the disciples left him to follow Jesus.

2. The first disciples (1:35–51)

35–36 The section immediately following John's testimony gives the response of Jesus' first disciples, who came to him largely because of John's influence. The whole section is tied together by a chronological framework (see comment on v.29), so that the entire episode of John's introduction of Jesus and the opening of his public ministry is treated as a unit. The previous section dealt with John's preparatory statement; this second one deals with the initial meeting between Jesus and his potential disciples; and the third one deals with the sign that demonstrated his power and confirmed their faith (2:1–11). The repeated allusion to the Lamb of God focused the attention of John's disciples on Jesus as the basis for the divine forgiveness of sin and for the assurance that their repentance would be accepted. It stirred their interest and prompted them to investigate who Jesus was.

37–39 As John's disciples followed him, Jesus turned to challenge their motives by asking, "What do you want?" He probed them to find out whether they were motivated by idle curiosity or by a real desire to know him. Their reply was not merely an inquiry for his address but a courteous request for an interview. "Rabbi" was a term of respect accorded Jewish teachers (cf. 1:49; 3:26). Jesus encouraged the two disciples to become acquainted with him and to spend time with him. "The tenth hour" probably means about four o'clock in the afternoon, since Jewish time was ordinarily reckoned from sunrise. They likely remained with Jesus overnight.

40 Of the two disciples who heard John, only Andrew is named; the other one may well have been John (the author) himself. Throughout the gospel he had an interest in Simon Peter. On this occasion he wanted to explain the origin of Simon's association with Jesus.

41 Andrew's testimony shows that the interview of the preceding hours was related to Jewish hopes and to Jesus' character. The statement "We have found the Messiah" does not necessarily imply an explicit claim by Jesus, but it does indicate that Andrew regarded Jesus as the candidate for that title. The expectation of a national deliverer was widespread in Judaism in the first third of the first century A.D. Probably all the disciples expected that Jesus would fulfill their hopes for an independent kingdom; those who joined him anticipated they would have political power (cf. Mk 10:28, 35–45).

42 The introduction of Peter to Jesus was brief but direct. The simple pronouncement Jesus made in this verse was really a diagnosis of Peter's personality. Simon, or Simeon (cf. Ac 15:14), was the name of Jacob's second oldest son (Ge 29:33), who, with his brother Levi (29:34), had ruthlessly avenged the violation of their sister by one of the Canaanite princes (34:25–31). The rash and impulsive character of Simeon was mirrored in Simon (cf. Jn 18:10). Jesus accepted Simon as he was but promised that he should become "Cephas," an Aramaic name, which, like the Greek "Peter," means "a rock."

43–45 Whereas the first disciples were introduced to Jesus by John the Baptist or by one of the other disciples, Jesus took the initiative in calling Philip. He, like Andrew and Peter, was a Galilean and quite likely a fisherman. The name Bethsaida, his hometown, means "house of fishing." Like Andrew, Philip found another person, Nathanael, and by his witness brought him to Jesus. The identity of Nathanael is uncertain. Some have equated him with Bartholomew, others with Matthew (see comment on Mk 3:16–19). This man seems to have been a student of the Law, for Philip appealed to him on the basis of the prediction in the Law and the Prophets. Jesus' phrase "under the fig tree" (v.48) was used in rabbinic literature to describe meditation on the Law.

46 Nathanael's response indicates that Nazareth did not enjoy a good reputation in Galilee. Perhaps Nathanael, who came from Bethsaida, looked down on Nazareth as a rival village, either poorer or morally worse than his own.

47–51 Jesus' comment on Nathanael suggests that the latter had been reading of Jacob's experience at Bethel (Ge 28:1–17). Jacob was filled with guile and had been forced to leave home because he had lied to his father and had swindled his brother. If under these circumstances Jacob was eligible for a revelation from God., would not Nathanael be even more worthy of such a blessing? Jesus said that Nathanael was free from "guile" (KJV) and then used the imagery of Jacob's dream to describe the greater revelation he would give to Nathanael. Jesus implied that he himself would be the medium of that revelation, and his order of the angels' procedure implies that they rose from earth to heaven with their inquiries and then returned to earth with the answers. His mission is to answer human need and to make sure that the answers are proclaimed. The term "Son of Man" is used here for the first time in John's gospel (see comments on Mk 8:31).

3. The first sign (2:1–11)

1 The wedding at Cana is linked to the preceding text by a chronological tie: "on the third day," a phrase that probably means

"after three days." Cana was a village in the hills of Galilee. Its exact location is disputed, but the best site seems to be that of Khirbet Qana, about nine miles north of Nazareth.

2–3 A wedding is always a gala occasion, and in a village like Cana it would be a community celebration. "Refreshments" were provided for all guests. Of these, wine was very important. To fail in providing adequately for the guests would involve social disgrace. In the closely knit communities of Jesus' day, such an error would never be forgotten and would haunt the newly married couple all their lives. The situation prompted Mary's urgency when she informed Jesus of the emergency.

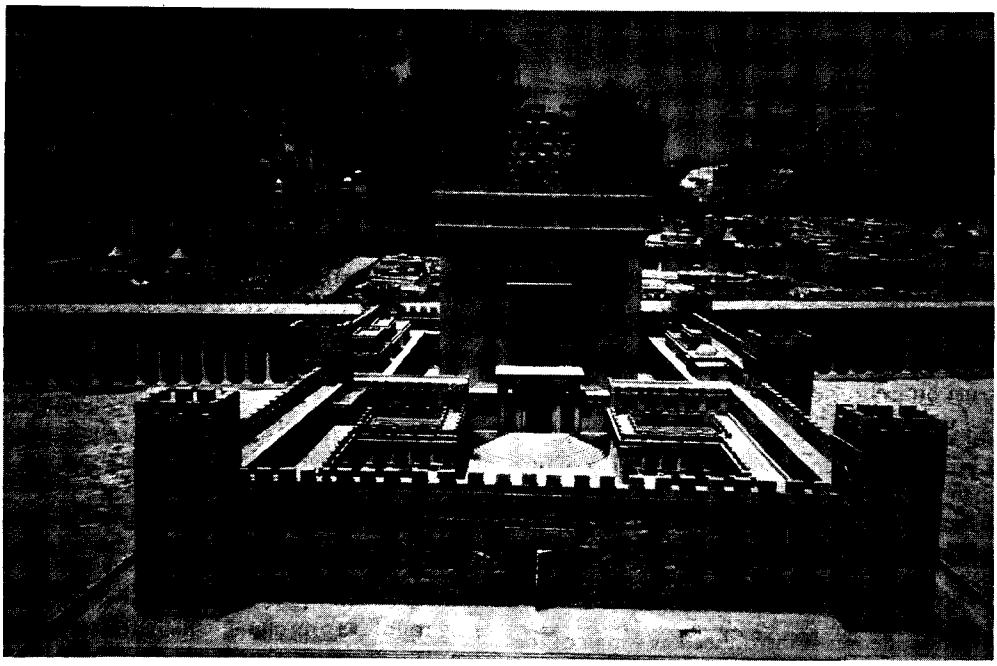
4–5 Jesus' reply to Mary was not so abrupt as it seems, for "woman" was a polite form of address (see also 19:26; 20:15). His statement probably means, "What business is that of ours?" Mary acknowledged that Jesus should act independently, and she confidently told the servants to follow his orders, fully expecting that he would take appropriate action. Jesus indicated that he was no longer under her authority but that he was living by a new pattern timed by the purpose of God. He would begin his miracles according to the purpose of his heavenly Father. The "time" (GK 6052) refers to the first hour when he manifested the real reason for which he came (see 17:1).

6–7 The stone jars were large, containing about twenty gallons apiece. By the social rules of the day, all the guests were expected to wash their hands before eating, and a considerable amount of water would be needed for this. At the lowest estimate, 120 gallons of water would be available. If made into wine, it would supply approximately two thousand four-ounce glasses; and if, as was frequently customary, the wine was further diluted by three parts of water to one of wine, there would have been enough to last for several days.

8–10 The "master of the banquet" was not the host, but a headwaiter or toastmaster called in to take care of the distribution of food and drink at a large social occasion. He was astounded by the high quality of the wine, since generally a poorer quality was served once the taste of the guests became dulled.

11 The purpose of Jesus' first miracle after entering Galilee is not stated, but the nature of the miracle is very plain. Jesus had come to bring about conversion: water to wine, sinners to saints. And this latter miracle of transformation occurs in almost complete obscurity. Few know when or how it happens, but they know that it does happen.

The effect of this miracle is noteworthy. It marked the beginning of a ministry accompanied by supernatural power; and it proved so convincing to the new disciples that they "put their faith in him." That is, the deed helped confirm the conclusion they had drawn from their previous interviews with him: Jesus must be the Messiah.



4. The interlude at Capernaum (2:12)

12 This verse covers an unspecified period of time. Since the Synoptic Gospels seem to imply that he had an early ministry in Galilee, it may fit at this point. The allusion to Jesus' brothers probably refers to younger children of Joseph and Mary, born after Jesus (see Mt 1:24–25; Mk 6:3).

5. The cleansing of the temple (2:13–22)

13–14 About the time of the Passover, Jesus went up to Jerusalem from Galilee for the annual feast. The narrative poses a chronological puzzle, for the Synoptic Gospels unitedly attach Jesus' cleansing of the temple to his last visit to Jerusalem at the time of his death (see Mt 21:10–17; Mk 11:15–19; Lk 19:45–46). It is best to acknowledge that there were two such occasions, one of which was recorded by John and the other by the Synoptics, especially since there are some significant differences between this account and those in the Synoptics (see EBC, 8:44). It is not at all improbable that Jesus may have cleansed the temple twice, two Passovers apart, and that the second so enraged the hierarchy that their animosity toward him exploded into drastic action.

The sale of cattle and doves and the privilege of exchanging money were permitted in the temple court as a convenience for pilgrims who would need animals for sacrifice and temple shekels for their dues. Under the chief priests, however, the concessions had become merely a means of making money and had debased the temple into a commercial venture.

The temple from which Jesus cast out the money changers and the those selling animals had recently been lavishly remodelled by King Herod. This model, located in Jerusalem, is a reconstruction of what that temple must have looked like.

15–16 Jesus' action precipitated wild confusion. The animals would be bawling and running about aimlessly; the money changers would be scrambling for their coins in the dust and debris on the floor of the court; the officials would be arguing with Jesus about the rights of the case. Jesus' expression "my Father's house" reveals his feeling toward God. The merchandising of privilege was an insult to God and a desecration of the Father's house.

17 Jesus' vehemence revealed his inward passion for the Father and his jealous guardianship of the Father's interests. The Scripture brought to the disciples' minds is Ps 69:9, from which other passages have been applied to Christ (e.g., Ps 69:1–4 in Jn 15:25; Ps 69:21 in Jn 19:29).

18–21 The Jews' demand for a sign is quite in agreement with their general attitude toward Jesus during his lifetime (see Mt 12:38; 16:1; Mk 8:11; Lk 11:16). On this particular occasion, Jesus answered enigmatically, "Destroy this temple, and I will raise it in three days." His critics assumed that he was speaking of Herod's temple, which had been in process of construction for forty–six years and was still incomplete. Jesus, says the author, really meant the temple of his body, which he would raise up in three days' time.

22 The author's comment indicates that from the first of his ministry Jesus had the end of it in view. One can hardly escape the conviction that the fourth gospel depicts the career of Jesus as a voluntary progress toward a predetermined goal. The allusions to the destruction of the temple of his body (2:22), to the elevation on a cross (3:14; 12:32–33), to the giving of his flesh for the life of the world (6:51), to his burial (12:7), and to the announcement of his betrayal and death to his disciples (13:19, 21), attest to his consciousness of the fate that awaited him in Jerusalem. Though the disciples did not comprehend the situation during Jesus' career, the Resurrection placed the memory of his sayings in a new perspective.

6. The interview with Nicodemus (2:23–3:21)

a. Prelude (2:23–25)

These verses introduce three typical interviews in chs. 3 and 4: Nicodemus the Pharisee, the Samaritan woman, and the royal official at Cana (probably a Gentile). In other words, these three persons represented the Jews, the Samaritans, and the Gentiles—in short, the world he came to save.

23–24 Jesus had already begun performing miraculous works. These signs attracted the attention of the crowd and brought many to a stage of belief parallel to that of the disciples (2:11). They reasoned that since Jesus possessed such power, he must have the favor of God (cf. 9:30–33). Jesus, however, was not satisfied with a superficial faith. He did not trust himself to those who had professed belief only on the basis of his miracles.

25 Jesus had a thorough understanding of human nature. He could read people more accurately than a doctor can read physical symptoms in diagnosing an illness.

b. Nicodemus's visit (3:1–15)

1–2 Nicodemus is introduced as a man of the upper class, conservative in his beliefs, and definitely interested in Jesus' teaching. As a Pharisee he belonged to the strict religious sect of Judaism in contrast to the Sadducees, who were less rigid in their beliefs and were more politically minded. As a member of the "ruling council" or Sanhedrin, he was sensitive to the prevailing doctrinal trends of the time. His interest in Jesus had been prompted by the miracles he had witnessed, and he came for an interview to obtain more information. His approach shows that he was cautious, open-minded, and ready to receive a new revelation from God if he was sure of its genuineness.

The fact that he came by night does not necessarily mean that he was timid, though in the light of the later references to him in this gospel, he does not seem to have been aggressive in his discipleship (7:45–52; 19:38–42). His salutation was courteous, and he showed no sign of hostility.

3 Jesus' reply to Nicodemus's opening statement was cryptic and abrupt. He informed Nicodemus that no one could even see the kingdom of God without a spiritual rebirth. Birth is our mode of entrance into the world. To be "born again [GK 540]" (or "born from above," the preferable translation; see NIV note) means the transformation of a person so that he or she is able to enter another world and adapt to its conditions. To belong to the heavenly kingdom, one must be born into it.

4 Nicodemus's reply may be interpreted in two ways. At first sight he appears to be quite materialistic in his attitude, thinking that Jesus was advocating what was impossible—a second physical birth. On the other hand, perhaps he meant, "How can a man whose habits and ways of thinking have been fixed by age expect to change radically?" Physical rebirth is impossible, but is spiritual change any more feasible?

5 In response, Jesus repeated his solemn assertion and expanded on it with reference to water and Spirit. What did Jesus mean by "water" and "Spirit"? Since he wanted to clarify his teaching for Nicodemus, he would naturally use familiar terms. Furthermore, since his ministry came shortly after that of John the Baptist, Jesus was probably referring to John's preaching, which dealt with the baptism of water (signifying repentance) and with the coming messenger of God who would endow humans with the Holy Spirit (1:31–33). The new birth is conditioned on the repentance and confession of the individual in response to the appeal of God and by the transformation of life by the gift of the Holy Spirit.

6–8 Jesus asserted that the entrance into the kingdom of God that Nicodemus desired could not be achieved by legalism or outward conformity. It requires an inner change and is given only by the direct act of God. Just as the origin and the destination of the wind are unknown to the one who feels it, similarly the new life of one born of the Spirit is unexplainable by ordinary reasoning; and its outcome is unpredictable, though its actuality is undeniable.

9 Nicodemus's question "How can this be?" should not be interpreted as an exclamation expressing incredulity. Rather, it is a plea for direction. He wanted to know how this experience could become his. Nothing in the Judaism he knew offered anything like this. The answer of Jesus accords with the words of Ezekiel in Eze 36:25–28.

Proselytes to Judaism were washed completely, issued new clothing, and then received into the commonwealth of the people of God; but Israelites were regarded as sons of Abraham and children of God by covenant from birth. In effect, Jesus was telling Nicodemus that his descent from Abraham was not adequate ground for salvation. He would have to repent and begin a new life in the Spirit if he expected to enter the kingdom of God (cf. 8:37–44).

Jesus illustrated his point by a play on words applicable both in Hebrew and Greek. The word translated "spirit" also means "wind" (GK 4460). Verse 8 could be rendered "The Spirit breathes where he wills." NIV and other translations are undoubtedly correct in using "wind," for the allusion to sound in the second sentence would not make much sense in sequence with "spirit." Possibly Nicodemus called on Jesus at the time when the evening wind was blowing through the city, so that it was a ready illustration.

10 The Greek text uses the definite article with "teacher": "Are you the teacher of Israel?" (lit. tr.). Nicodemus's exact position in the theological circles of Israel is not defined, but the language suggests that he was an important person. Jesus implies that he should have been familiar with the teaching of the new birth. Evidently Jesus felt that since the OT contained this teaching in principle, those who read the Scriptures were responsible for knowing and believing the truth.

11 No doubt Nicodemus thought Jesus to be presumptuous when he said, "We speak of what we know." Jesus spoke with an air of authority (see comment on Mk 1:22). Jesus' use of "we" is unusual. Perhaps his disciples were present and he was including them. Or Jesus may have been speaking as the earthly representative of the godhead. Throughout the years God's "people" had rejected his instruction as ministered through the prophets and the Scriptures. And things were no different now.

12–13 The "earthly things" (GK 2103) Jesus alluded to were probably the phenomena he used for illustrations, such as the wind. If Nicodemus was unable to grasp the meaning of spiritual truth as conveyed by concrete analogy, how would he do so if it were couched in an abstract statement? No one had ever entered into heaven to experience its realities directly except Jesus himself, the Son of Man, who had come from heaven. Revelation, not discovery, is the basis for faith.

14–15 The reference to a story in the Pentateuch (Nu 21:4–9) would have been familiar to Nicodemus, for the Jewish scholars spent the larger part of each day in the study of Scripture and often memorized not only the Pentateuch but the entire OT. Although Jesus did not elaborate the details of this allusion, it has several aspects applicable to the present situation. (1) The ancient Israelites were guilty of disobedience and a grumbling and unthankful spirit. (2) They were under the condemnation of God and were being punished for their sin. (3) The object elevated before them was the emblem of their judgment. (4) They were unable to rescue themselves. (5) The poison of the serpents was deadly, and there was no antidote for it. (6) They were urged to look at the serpent in order to receive life.

Jesus insisted that he would be "lifted up" (GK 5738), a word used elsewhere for crucifixion (8:28; 12:32–33). He was summoning people to receive him as God's provision for the cure of sin and to place complete confidence in him for the future. Such confidence or belief would ensure partaking in the life of the age to come.

c. The author's comment (3:16–21)

16 Commentators are divided as to whether vv.16–21 are a direct continuation of the conversation between Jesus and Nicodemus or represent only the author's comment on Jesus' words. In either case, they express the most important message of the Gospel, emphasized elsewhere in many ways, that salvation is a gift received only by believing God for it. The nature of belief is implied in the illustration of Moses lifting up the serpent in the wilderness (v.14). It consists of accepting something, not doing something. The result of belief is that one is freed from condemnation, receives eternal life, and lives in a relation of total honesty with God.

"Eternal" (GK 173) refers not only to the duration of existence but also to the quality of life as contrasted with futility. Eternal life is a deepening and growing experience. It can never be exhausted in any measurable span of time, but it introduces a totally new quality of life. The verb "perish" (GK 660) depicts the opposite of salvation. It means to fail completely of fulfilling God's purpose and consequently to be excluded forever from his fellowship. Its use here clearly implies that those without God are hopelessly confused in purpose, alienated from him in their affections, and futile in their efforts.

The presentation of the good news of God's love offers only two options: to believe or to perish. Eternal life, which is accepted by believing, is a gift of God and brings with it the fullest blessings God can bestow. To perish does not mean to cease to exist; it means to experience utter failure, futility, and loss of all that makes existence worthwhile.

17–18 Notwithstanding this gloomy picture of "lost" or "perish," God's purpose toward humankind is positive; it is an attitude of love. He is not seeking an excuse to condemn human beings but is rather endeavoring to save them. His purpose in sending Jesus into the world was to show his love and to draw people to himself. If they are lost, it is because they have not committed themselves to God, the only source of life. Beginning at this point in this gospel, the contrast between belief and unbelief is increasingly exemplified. John has here defined the crux of belief and unbelief and has indicated the effects of each. The progress of both in the characters of those associated with Jesus becomes increasingly evident as the drama of this gospel unfolds.

19–21 The difference between believers and unbelievers does not lie in the guilt or innocence of either; it lies in the different attitudes they take toward the "light." Unbelievers shrink from the light because it exposes their sin; believers willingly come to the light so that their real motives may be revealed (see also 1Jn 1:8–9). Furthermore, darkness (defined as love of evil deeds) keeps people from responding to the light (1Jn 1:5). All of us are held accountable for our actions, and the choice is ours: evil deeds or truth.

7. Further testimony of John the Baptist (3:22–36)

22–24 This period of Jesus' ministry in Judea is not paralleled by any account in the Synoptic Gospels (cf. Mt 4:12–21; Mk 1:14). It occurred before the arrest and imprisonment of John the Baptist, for he and Jesus were preaching and baptizing simultaneously. Both were exercising a rural rather than urban ministry at this time. Jesus and his disciples remained in the Judean country; John was preaching farther north.

23 The exact location of Aenon is uncertain, though it is probably a site south of Beth-shan, where there were numerous springs. In this region John would have been in the territory of the Greek city of Scythopolis, outside the domain of Herod Antipas.

25–26 The argument between a Jewish inquirer and the disciples of John indicates that there must have been confusion over the respective merits of Jesus and John. If both were baptizing, whose baptism was valid? By popular acclaim Jesus' influence was growing and John's was waning. John's interrogators felt that their friend and teacher had been eclipsed by Jesus' sudden popularity, and they wanted an explanation.

27–30 John showed no jealousy whatever; on the contrary, he reaffirmed his subordinate position (cf. 1:29–31). He would not claim for himself final authority but avowed that he had been sent in preparation for the Messiah. As the bridegroom is more important than the best man or "friend" of the bridegroom, so he would be content to act as an assistant to Jesus.

Just how far the simile of bride and bridegroom should be pressed here is questionable. Should the bride represent Israel, to whom the Messiah came, or the church? The imagery is applied to both (cf. Hos 2:19–20; Eph 5:32), but the focus of this passage is on the bridegroom, not the bride. The emphasis is on the relation of Jesus and John rather than on the relation of Jesus to Israel or to the church.

31–36 This paragraph, like vv.16–21, is likely the author's reflection on what he has just written. Its phraseology accords better with the style of vv.16–21 than with that of John the Baptist. John declares in no uncertain terms (1) that Jesus came from heaven and spoke with a higher authority than that of earth; (2) that he spoke from observation, not from theory; (3) that he spoke the words of God; (4) that the Father's love had caused him to endow the Son with complete authority to execute his purpose. These qualities made Jesus superior in every way to John the Baptist, though the latter had an important and divinely authorized message. John spoke as one "from the earth." The Son, however, was not merely the messenger of God; he was the revealed object of faith. Once again the dividing line is affirmed. The believer in the Son has eternal life; the unbeliever will never possess that life, for he is already under condemnation. The wrath of God remains on him.

This is the only passage in this gospel and John's letters in which "wrath" (GK 3973) is mentioned. This word does not mean a sudden gust of passion or a burst of temper. Rather, it is the settled displeasure of God against sin. God is neither easily angered nor vindictive. But by his very nature he is unalterably committed to opposing and judging all disobedience. The moral laws of the universe are as unvarying and unchangeable as its physical laws, and God cannot set aside either without violating his own nature.

8. The Samaritan ministry (4:1–42)

a. The woman at the well (4:1–26)

1–3 Jesus' early ministry in the region of Judea was gaining attention, especially by the Pharisees, who constituted the ruling religious class. The growth of any messianic movement could easily be interpreted as having political overtones, and Jesus did not want to become involved in any outward conflict with the state, whether Jewish or Roman. In order to avoid a direct clash, he left Judea and journeyed northward to Galilee.

4–5 The shortest route from Jerusalem to Galilee lay on the high road straight through Samaritan territory. Many Jews would not travel by that road, for they regarded any contact with Samaritans as defiling (on the Samaritans, see comment on Lk 9:53–54). By the time of Jesus a strong rivalry and hatred between Jews and Samaritans prevailed. The words "had to" translate an expression of necessity. As the Savior of all humanity, Jesus felt he had to confront the smoldering suspicion and enmity between Jews and Samaritans by ministering to his enemies.

Sychar was a small village near Shechem, about half a mile from Jacob's well, which is located in the modern Shechem or Nablus.

6 The well of Jacob lies at the foot of Mount Gerizim, the center of Samaritan worship. The "sixth hour" would probably have been about noon, reckoning from daybreak. It was an unusual time for a woman to come to a village well for water. Perhaps the Samaritan woman had a sudden need, or perhaps she did not care to meet the other women of the community, who may have shunned her because of her general character.

7–8 Undoubtedly the woman was surprised to find a man sitting by the well. Jesus' initial approach was a simple request for water, which would presuppose a favorable response. One would hardly refuse a drink of cold water to a thirsty traveler in the heat of the day. The request did have a surprising element, however, for no Jewish rabbi would have volunteered to carry on a public conversation with a woman, nor would he have deigned to drink from a Samaritan's cup, as she implied by her answer.

9–10 There was a trace of sarcasm in the woman's reply, as if she meant, "We Samaritans are the dirt under your feet until you want something; then we are good enough!" Jesus paid no attention to her flippancy or to her bitterness. He was more interested in winning the woman than in winning an argument. He appealed to her curiosity by the phrase "If you knew," implying that because of the nature of his person he could bestow on her a gift of God that would be greater than any ordinary water. His allusion was intended to lift her level of thinking from that of material need to spiritual realities.

11 The woman heard his words but missed his meaning. "Living water" meant to her fresh spring water such as the well supplied. She could not understand how he could provide this water without having any means of drawing it from the well (the well was over seventy-five feet deep).

12 The woman's reference to "our father Jacob" was perhaps designed to bolster the importance of the Samaritans in the eyes of a Jewish rabbi. She was well aware of the low esteem the Jews had of her people.

13–15 Jesus' second reply emphasized the contrast between the water in the well and what he intended to give. The material water would allay thirst only temporarily; the spiritual water would quench the inner thirst forever. The water in the well had to be drawn up with hard labor; the spiritual water would bubble up from within. Because of her non-spiritual perspective, the woman's interests were selfish.

16–17 Jesus' request to call her husband was both proper and strategic—proper because it was not regarded as good etiquette for a woman to talk with a man unless her husband were present; strategic because it placed her in a dilemma from which she could not free herself without admitting her need. She had no husband, and she would not want to confess her sexual irregularities to a stranger. The abruptness of her reply shows that she was at last emotionally touched.

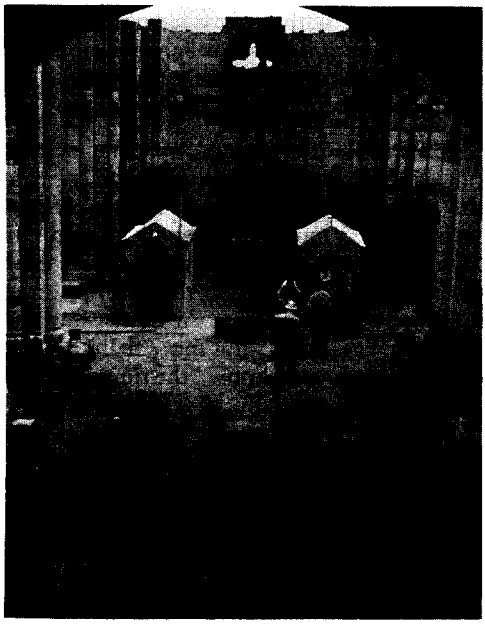
18 Jesus shocked the woman when he lifted the curtain on her past life. The conversation had passed from the small-talk stage to the personal. Her evil deeds were being exposed by the light, but was she willing to acknowledge the truth?

19–20 Realizing his superhuman knowledge, the woman called him a prophet; but then she tried to divert him. Since his probing was becoming uncomfortably personal, she began to argue a religious issue. She raised the old controversy between Jews and Samaritans, whether worship should be offered on Mount Gerizim, at the foot of which they stood, or at Jerusalem, where Solomon's temple had been built.

The Samaritans founded their claim on the historic fact that when Moses instructed the people concerning the entrance into the Promised Land, he commanded that they set up an altar on Mount Ebal and that the tribes should be divided, half on Ebal and half on Gerizim. As the Levites read the Law, the people responded antiphonally (Dt 27:1–28:68). The Jews held that since Solomon had been commissioned to build the temple in Jerusalem, the center of worship should be located there. The controversy was endless, and Jesus did not intend to allow himself to be drawn into a futile discussion.

21–23 Jesus avoided the argument by elevating the issue above mere location. He made no concessions and intimated that the Samaritans' worship was confused: "You Samaritans worship what you do not know." Probably he was alluding to the error of the woman's ancestors, who had accepted a syncretism of foreign deities with the ancestral God of the Jewish faith. To Jesus, true worship is that of the spirit, which means that the worshiper must deal honestly and openly with God. She, on the contrary, had been furtive and unwilling to open her heart to God.

24 "God is spirit" carries one of the four noun descriptions of God found in the NT (the other three are "God is light" [1Jn 1:5]; "God is love" [1Jn 4:8, 16]; and "God is a consuming fire" [Heb 12:29]). Jesus was endeavoring to convey to the woman that God cannot be confined to one place nor conceived of as a material being. Only "the Word become flesh" (cf. 1:14) could represent him adequately.



25 Mystified by Jesus' words, the woman finally confessed her ignorance and at the same time expressed her longing for the Messiah. It was the one nebulous hope that she had of finding God, for she expected that the coming Messiah would explain the mysteries of life. There was a Samaritan tradition that the prophet predicted by Moses in Dt 18:15 would come to teach God's people all things. On this sincere though vague hope Jesus founded his appeal to her spiritual consciousness.

26 This is the one occasion when Jesus voluntarily declared his messiahship. In the Synoptic Gospels, normally he did not make such a public claim; on the contrary, he urged his disciples to silence (Mt 16:20; Mk 8:29–30; Lk 9:20–21). In Galilee, where there were many would-be messiahs and a constant unrest based on the messianic hope, such a claim would have been dangerous. In Samaria the concept would probably have been regarded more as religious than political and would have elicited a ready hearing for his teaching rather than a subversive revolt.

b. The return of the disciples (4:27–38)

27 The disciples had left Jesus at the well. He was tired, and there would have been no need for him to have accompanied them into the town to buy food. They were surprised to find him talking with a woman—an apparent violation of custom—but they respected him too highly to question his behavior.

28–29 As the disciples approached, the woman made her way back to Sychar to report the interview to her fellow villagers. She was so excited that she forgot her water pot. At the village she was bold enough to suggest that perhaps the new person she had met might be the Messiah. "You don't suppose this could be the Messiah, do you?" would be a fair translation of her words.

30 The elders of Sychar would probably not accept theological information from a woman of her reputation, and she did not venture to make a dogmatic pronouncement. Nevertheless, her manner was so sincere and her invitation so urgent that they immediately proceeded to the well to investigate.

31–34 The disciples were mainly interested in Jesus' physical welfare. He must have been exhausted by the travel of the morning. They were amazed that he was not hungry and wondered whether somebody else had given him food. He tried to tell them that the satisfaction of completing the work the Father had entrusted to him was greater than any food he might have been given (cf. Dt 8:3; Mt 4:4).

35 "Four months more and then the harvest" is probably a quotation of a current proverb. Having once sowed the grain, all the farmer needed to do was wait for it to ripen. Jesus was pointing out that the spiritual harvest is always ready and must be reaped before it spoils. As he was speaking, the Samaritans were leaving the town and coming across the fields toward him (v.30), like grain ready for harvesting.

36–38 The disciples would not have to wait indefinitely for the result of their mission; the sowing and reaping could go on together. Jesus implied that they had already received a commission to reap for him and that they could benefit from the preparation he and the prophets had made. The reaping of people for the granary of God is not the task of any one group, nor is it confined to one era. Each reaps the benefit of its forerunners, and succeeding generations in turn gain from the accomplishments of their predecessors (see 1Co 3:6). Perhaps v.38 is an allusion to the preaching of John the Baptist, whose message of repentance had prepared the way for the disciples' preaching about Jesus.

c. The faith of the Samaritans (4:39–42)

39–42 These few verses indicate two necessary and interrelated bases for belief: (1) the testimony of others and (2) personal contact with Jesus. This woman's witness opened the way to him for the villagers. If he could penetrate the shell of her materialism and present a message that would transform her, the Samaritans also could believe that he might be the Messiah. That stage of belief was only introductory, however. The second stage was hearing him for themselves, and it brought them to the settled conviction expressed in "we know" (v.42). They had progressed from a faith built on the witness of another to a faith built on their own experience.

9. The interview with the nobleman (4:43–54)

43–44 The progress to Galilee is closely connected with the episode at Samaria. For the parenthesis of v.44, see Mt 13:57; Mk 6:4. Did Jesus intend to apply the principle stated in this verse to Judea or to Galilee? In the light of his comment to the nobleman in v.48, it seems likely that John was simply stating that Jesus had already been rebuffed in Galilee (cf. Lk 4:24–29) and that he was questioning the motives of the nobleman in the light of past experience. At this time the Galileans were somewhat more receptive because of the miracles they had witnessed at the Passover in Jerusalem. John says little in this gospel about Jesus' Galilean activities, though he shows knowledge of them (2:1–11; 4:43–54; 6:1–7:13).

45 The Galileans hoped Jesus would duplicate the signs they had witnessed in Jerusalem while they were attending the Passover. They were disappointed to discover that he had no intention of exhibiting his powers simply to satisfy their curiosity.

46 Jesus revisits Cana, where he had performed his first miracle (2:1–11). The royal official may have been a member of Herod's court and possibly a Gentile (see comment on 2:23–25). His son had been ill for some time and was not recovering from his sickness. Therefore, the father felt compelled to seek further aid.

47 The report that Jesus had healed people in Jerusalem must have reached this man's ears. Learning that Jesus had returned to Galilee, the official immediately sought Jesus out and strongly pleaded with him to heal his son, who was dangerously ill.

48 Jesus' reply seems like a heartless rejection. He seemed to insinuate that the official, like the rest of the Galileans, was merely attempting to elicit a miracle from him. On the other hand, Jesus' words may express a genuine hope. He desired a belief characterized by dedication rather than amazement, and as the second half of the episode shows, his aim was to inculcate a commitment rather than merely to perform a cure (cf. 20:30–31).

49 The genuine distress of the father is demonstrated by his words: "Sir, come down at once before my little boy dies!" (lit. tr.). The words used indicate that the case was desperate.

50 Jesus' response still seems somewhat impersonal and casual. By dismissing the official with the statement that his son was alive, Jesus created a dilemma of faith. If the father refused to return to Capernaum without taking Jesus with him, he would show that he did not believe Jesus' word and would consequently receive no benefit because of his distrust. On the other hand, if he followed Jesus' order, he would be returning to the dying boy without any outward assurance that the lad would recover. He was forced to make the difficult choice between insisting on evidence and thus showing disbelief or exercising faith without any tangible proof to encourage him. The official chose the second horn of the dilemma; he "took Jesus at his word" and set out on his return journey.

51–52 People are amazed by coincidences, but generally they do not attribute them to the direct activity of God. As the official went home, a miraculous report greeted him "while he was still on the way." There is an interesting progression in the description of the boy's condition. First the news came that "his boy was living." But more than that, the man was curious to know "the time when his son got better." Finally, he was told, "The fever left him yesterday at the seventh hour."

53–54 When the father considered the details of his meeting with Jesus and the good news concerning his son's recovery, he was convinced that more than coincidence was at work. The timing was miraculous, and the boy's recovery was more than circumstantial. "So he and all his household believed."

The notation in v.54 should probably be read in the light of John's footnote in v.44. The convincing character of the two signs recorded here and the forceful demonstration of God's response to faith afforded by the second provided cogent illustrations for the main theme of belief.

B. The Rise of Controversy (5:1–47)

1. The healing of the paralytic (5:1–15)

1 The words "some time later" mark a break in chronological sequence. Comparison with the Synoptic accounts shows that a measurable amount of time may have elapsed between the healing of the son of the royal official at Capernaum and the episode of the paralytic at the Pool of Bethesda. The reference to the feast does not define the time since the feast is unnamed.

2–4 Excavations have located this pool in the northwest corner of old Jerusalem. It was surrounded by a colonnade on all four sides and down the middle of the pool. People gathered at the water's edge, hoping to be cured of their ailments, when the water was agitated. The explanation of the moving of the water (v. 4; see NIV note) was probably added to the text of John later.

5–6 Jesus selected for his attention the person who seemed most needy. Confinement to a bed for thirty-eight years would leave the sufferer so weak that he would be unable to walk or even stand for any length of time. Jesus' question must have seemed rather naive to this invalid. Who would not want to be healed from utter helplessness? Yet the question also implies an appeal to the will, which the long years of discouragement may have paralyzed. Jesus thus was challenging the man's will to be cured.

7 The invalid's reply shows that he had lost his independent determination. He was waiting for somebody to assist him. Such efforts as he had been able to make had proved futile, and he was despairing of success.

8 The healing was not a response to a request, nor did it presuppose an expression of faith on the part of the man. Jesus asked him to do the impossible—to stand on his feet, pick up his bedroll, and go his way. Renewed by the miraculous influx of new power, the man responded at once and did so. Jesus supplied even the will to be cured!

9–10 The outcome of the miracle was twofold: the paralytic was healed and a controversy broke out. Since the healing took place on the Sabbath, it brought Jesus directly into conflict with the religious authorities, whose traditions regarding the Sabbath were more rigid than the Law itself. Jesus' healing on the Sabbath was one factor that brought him into disfavor with the religious leaders in Jerusalem (see also Mt 12:1–14; Mk 2:23–3:6; Lk 6:1–6; 13:10–16; 14:1–6; Jn 9:1–14).

11–12 The paralytic seems to have felt no particular gratitude to Jesus for his healing. He took no responsibility for the action on the Sabbath; and after Jesus had dealt with him the second time, he immediately informed the Jewish leaders who it was that had transgressed the Sabbath law. It seems unlikely that he would have been ignorant of the reason for their inquiry.

13 John indicates that on at least four occasions Jesus quietly withdrew from a scene of controversy. Each of these occurred after an argument with the Jews over his claims (see also 8:59; 10:39; 12:36). All these reinforce the concept of the fourth gospel that Jesus was immune to danger until the hour of his passion arrived (7:30; 8:20).

14–15 Jesus' interest in the man is implied in the word "found." Apparently Jesus searched for him out of a concern for his spiritual state as well as for his physical illness. The command to "stop sinning" presupposes the possibility that the man's affliction was caused by his own sin (but cf. comment on 9:2–3). There is no indication that this encounter strengthened the man's faith and attachment to Jesus; in fact, the contrary could easily be inferred. But he did confess Jesus as his healer.

2. Jesus' defense of his sonship (5:16–47)

a. The prerogatives of sonship (5:16–30)

16 This verse introduces the element of controversy between Jesus and his opponents. The immediate cause was his healing on the Sabbath, which they interpreted as a violation of the fourth commandment (Ex 20:8–11; see comment on Jn 5:9–10). Jesus contended that allaying human need was no violation of God's Law (cf. Lk 14:5).

17 Jesus' argument for healing on the Sabbath was that God does not suspend his activities on the Sabbath. The laws of nature take no holiday. But more important to the Jews, Jesus identified his activities with those of the Father; he claimed to be continuing the creative work of God.

18 The Jews were angry because of Jesus' violation of the Sabbath, but they were furious when he was so presumptuous as to claim equality with the Father. This claim of Jesus widened the breach between his critics and himself, for they understood that by it he was asserting his deity. His explanation shows that he did not claim identity with the Father as one person, but he asserted his unity with the Father in a relationship that could be described as sonship. This sonship has many facets, as shown in vv.19–24.

19 The Son is dependent on the Father; he does not act apart from the Father's will and purpose. Throughout this gospel Jesus continually asserts that his work was to do the will of the Father (4:34; 5:30; 8:28; 12:50; 15:10). John presents Jesus as the Son, not as the slave, of God, yet as the perfect agent of the divine purpose and the complete revelation of the divine nature.

20 The Son is loved by the Father. Their relationship is that of a Father and a Son who are united by love. The Father has revealed to the Son the purpose and plan of his activity, much as the head of a family discusses with the others the plan he wishes to follow.

21 The Son is empowered by the Father. God is the source of life, who alone has power to reverse the processes of the material world and to bring life out of death. This supreme power he has conferred on the Son. Later Jesus demonstrates this power in the raising of Lazarus (11:41–44).

22–23 The Son has been entrusted with the power of judgment. He possesses equal dignity with the Father and shares with him judicial as well as executive authority. Conversely, since the Son is equal in authority, he can rightly claim equal honor with God.

24 The Son is the arbiter of destiny. The determination of this destiny is immediate, as the present tense in this verse implies. Eternal life becomes the possession of the believer at the moment of acceptance; the future judgment will only confirm what has already taken place.

25 The phrase "and has now come" may refer to the present era that will terminate in the return of Christ and the resurrection of the dead, or it may refer to the power Jesus had to raise the dead during his lifetime, as in the case of Lazarus. There is another sense in which our Lord's words are true. As the source of life, he was promising to those who were spiritually dead, like the woman at the well, a new and eternal life if they would listen to his voice.

26 We do not have inherent life within ourselves, for our life is derived from others. Again Jesus claimed deity by saying he was not dependent on another for life, just as the Father derived his life from no one. Jesus possesses inherent life, the power to create and the power to renew life that has been extinguished.

27 The title "Son of Man" has appeared twice previously in this gospel (1:51; 3:14). As the Son of Man Jesus is qualified to judge humanity because he belongs to it and can understand the needs and viewpoints of humans (cf. Heb 2:17).

28–29 This passage contains one of the few references to eschatology in John's gospel. No chronological distinction is drawn here between the resurrection of the righteous and that of the wicked, nor is any such distinction excluded. John says little about a program, but he does emphasize the fact that Jesus will be the door to the eternal world.

The double resurrection assumes that both the righteous and the wicked will receive bodies in the future life and that presumably each body will express the character of the person who is resurrected. Some commentators claim that the resurrection of v.25 is wholly spiritual while that of vv.29–30 is physical and future. There seems to be an unnecessary distinction here (see comment on v. 25), though these two verses are explicitly future. Obviously spiritual resurrection from being dead in transgressions and sins (Eph 2:1) must precede physical resurrection.

30 This verse marks a transition from self-affirmation to testimony. Jesus spoke with the confidence of being commissioned by the Father, not with the arrogance of self-assertion. Twenty-five times in this gospel he asserts that he has been sent by the Father, a reference to his commission for the ministry, which distinguishes him as the Son of God.

b. The witnesses to his authority (5:31–47)

31 Because the authority of Jesus was questioned by his critics, he summoned witnesses to vouch for him. "Witness" or "testimony," whether verb (GK 3455) or noun (GK 3456), is a common word in this gospel, occurring thirty-three times. This term is used to describe the attestation of Jesus' character and power. Jesus gives five specific sources of testimony about himself.

Jesus discounts his own witness here, admitting that it is "not valid" (because under Jewish law the self-testimony of any person was not accepted in court). On another occasion, however, he said, "Even if I testify on my own behalf, my testimony is valid, for I know where I came from and where I am going" (8:14). The apparent contradiction can be resolved because the statement in ch. 5 is based on legal grounds whereas that in ch. 8 is based on personal knowledge. In consideration of Jesus' essential truthfulness, his witness concerning himself is sound, though in legal process it would not be admitted.

32 "There is another who testifies in my favor" could refer either to the Father or to John the Baptist, both of whom are mentioned in the context. The latter is the more likely here, since the witness of John the Baptist follows immediately in v.33 and seems to be the elaboration of the statement in v.32.

33–35 "You have sent to John" is obviously a reference to the delegation sent from the Jewish rulers to John the Baptist when he was preaching in the Judean wilderness (1:19). The fact that they had already asked him for an explanation bound them to give proper consideration to his testimony. John himself had refused the title of Messiah but had predicted the coming of Jesus and had identified him at his appearance as the Lamb of God and the Messiah (1:29–36). Possibly by this time John had been imprisoned. Jesus' main point is that the Jews could not consistently accept John's preaching and reject Jesus.

36 Another witness is that of the works Jesus was doing, i.e., those deeds that revealed his divine nature. As the quality of one's deeds shows one's moral standards, skill, and personal competence, so Jesus' works marked him as superhuman in both his compassion and his power (cf. 3:19–21; 10:25; 14:11). Although Jesus never performed miracles for the purpose of drawing attention to himself, he regarded them as valid proofs of his claims.

The gospel lists seven of these works: (1) The turning of water into wine (2:1–11); (2) the healing of the official's son (4:43–54); (3) the healing of a paralytic (5:1–15); (4) the feeding of the multitude (6:1–14); (5) the walking on the water (6:16–21); (6) the cure of the blind man (9:1–41); and (7) the raising of Lazarus (11:1–44). Each of these miracles demonstrated Jesus' power in a different area of human experience. They are called "signs" (GK 4956) because they point to something beyond themselves. In most cases, these signs were followed by a confession of belief on the part of many of the spectators (2:11; 4:53; 6:66, 69; 9:38; 11:45).

37–38 The fourth witness is that of the Father. The allusion seems somewhat obscure, especially since Jesus disclaimed any visible or audible communication from God to the crowd in general. Nevertheless there were occasions on which a voice from heaven spoke, expressing approval of Jesus and affirming his Sonship (see Mt 3:17; 17:5; Mk 1:11; 9:7; Lk 3:22; 9:35; Jn 12:28). To a Jew, the voice from heaven would have meant the approval of God; yet this seems to have had little effect on the multitude. Jesus implies that his hearers had not apprehended the revelation of God because they had not believed him whom the Father had sent.

39–40 Jesus' final witness is the Scriptures. After the destruction of the temple of Solomon in 586 B.C., the Jewish scholars of the Exile substituted the study of the Law for the observance of the temple ritual and sacrifices. They pored over the OT, trying to extract the fullest possible meaning from its words, because they believed that the very study itself would bring them life. By so doing they missed the chief subject of the OT revelation. Jesus claimed the Law, the Prophets, and the Psalms (Writings) as witnesses to his person and claims (Lk 24:44). For example, they prefigured his sacrifice (Jn 3:14–15) and marked some of the events of the Passion (12:14–15; 18:9; 19:24, 28, 36). He rebuked his hearers for their inconsistency in studying the Scriptures so diligently while rejecting his claims.

41–42 The people were incapable of both interpreting and applying the Scriptures, for as students of the Scriptures they should have known that they spoke of him. Because the Jews did not give "praise" (or "glory"; GK 1518) to Jesus, it was evident that they were spiritually unable to make the connection between the Scriptures and the Savior. But this came as no surprise to Jesus.

43–44 Jesus expressed disappointment because the people would not accept his credentials, though they would accept the personal claims of others who acted solely on their own authority. Compare, for example, the choice of Barabbas over Jesus at the final trial (Lk 23:18–23). Verse 44 rebukes those students of the Scriptures who are more interested in establishing their competitive reputations for scholarship than in obeying the revelation of God so as to bring his approval.

45–47 Moses, who wrote the Law, was highly revered by the Jewish nation. They would not knowingly do anything contrary to his teaching. Their obedience to him was a source of pride. In fact, their very hope in securing God's favor and blessing lay in their relationship to Moses. Jesus told the people that the law of Moses would condemn them in their rejection of him because their failure to believe in him was essentially a rejection of Moses since Moses had prefigured him (cf. Lk 16:29–31).

C. The Beginning of Conflict (6:1–8:11)

Chapter 6 of John marks the watershed of Jesus' career. Up to this point his popularity had been increasing, in spite of the opposition of the leaders and the occasional grumbling of disaffected hearers or disciples. The interview with the disciples at Caesarea Philippi and the Transfiguration, which occurred shortly afterward, called for a new commitment on the part of the disciples and was followed by a new program on the part of Jesus. He openly declared to them that he would proceed to Jerusalem, where he would be delivered up to death (Mt 16:13–17:13; Mk 8:27–32; Lk 9:18–36). John does not narrate these incidents, but his account parallels them to some degree. The feeding of the multitude is identical, there is an allusion to his impending death (Jn 6:51), from that point the number of his disciples diminished (6:66), and the controversy with the Pharisees grew increasingly bitter.

1. The feeding of the five thousand (6:1–15)

1–4 This miracle of Jesus is the only one mentioned in all the Gospels. This fact alone should alert us to its significance. It took place in the spring shortly before the Passover (v.4). Jesus was well known because of the miracles ("signs") he had performed on sick people (see comment on 5:36). On the reasons why Jesus chose at this time to retreat to the north shore of the Sea of Galilee, see comments on Mt 14:13–14; Mk 6:31–32.

5–6 John's interest concentrates mainly on the relation of this occasion to the disciples. The crowd had come unbidden, prompted by curiosity and eagerness to share in Jesus' teaching and healing power. As the day declined, Jesus recognized that they were hungry. Desirous of involving the disciples in the responsibility for ministry, Jesus turned to Philip, asking, "Where shall we buy bread for these people to eat?" Jesus was not at a loss for a solution to the problem; he wished to educate the disciples by calling their attention to their responsibilities and by leading them to propose some plan of action.

7 Philip's reply shows that while he had a practical turn of mind, he was rather unimaginative. His calculation of "eight months' wages," however accurate, were futile, for he could only produce statistics to show what could not be done. No doubt none of the disciples would have enough money to purchase food for this crowd of approximately ten thousand persons, including women and children (Mt 14:21).

8–9 In contrast to Philip's pessimism, Andrew was more hopeful. He made the positive presentation of a boy's lunch: five small, flat barley cakes, made of the cheapest grain available, and the two small fish. But Andrew doubted the value of his own suggestion.

10 The action of Jesus reveals both his natural wisdom and supernatural power. His order to have the people sit down was necessary to stabilize the crowd so that there would not be a rush for the food. It also served to organize them in groups to facilitate serving.

11 The multiplication of the food was obviously not done with great fanfare. As the disciples distributed it, Jesus seems to have increased it by breaking it indefinitely until all were satisfied.

12–13 In spite of the miraculous power that effectively produced the ample supply, Jesus permitted no waste. Twelve large baskets full of remnants were salvaged—possibly one for each of the disciples—and carried back to Capernaum. The detail of collecting the remaining fragments of bread and fish may have been introduced to emphasize the ample sufficiency that Jesus provided, or it may indicate that he combined generosity with economy.

14 The miracle excited the wonder of the people and compelled them to recognize that Jesus was an unusual person. The allusion to "the Prophet" is probably a reflection of the promised prophet of Dt 18:15 (see comment on 7:40–41). Since Moses had provided food and water in the desert (Ex 16:11–36; 17:1–6; Nu 11:1–33; 20:2–11), the people likely expected that the Prophet like Moses would do likewise.

15 The desire of the multitude to make Jesus king marks both the height of his popularity and the moment of decision for him. They wanted someone to rule them who would feed them and guarantee their security; they had no comprehension of his spiritual mission or purpose. He, on the other hand, refused to become a political opportunist. He would not promote his kingdom by organizing a revolt against the existing political powers or by promising a dole to all who would join his banner.

2. The walking on the water (6:16–21)

16–17 "Evening" could be any time in the afternoon shortly before sunset. The disciples probably hoped to cover the short distance between Bethsaida and Capernaum while daylight lasted, but darkness had already fallen before they actually began to cross the lake. The fact that "Jesus had not yet joined them" may imply that they half-expected him to do so and waited until the last minute, hoping that he would come.

18 The Sea of Galilee is six hundred feet below sea level, in a cuplike depression among the hills. When the sun sets, the air cools; and as the cooler air from the west rushes down over the hillside, the resultant wind churns the lake. Since the disciples were rowing toward Capernaum, they were heading into the wind; consequently, they made little progress.

19–21 The disciples were still a considerable distance from the shore at Capernaum (cf. Mk 6:47). As they looked back, they were terrified to see a human form coming toward them across the water. Jesus calmed their fears by speaking to them. When they recognized his voice, they were willing to take him into the boat. As the multiplication of the loaves and fishes showed his power over matter, so the walking on the water revealed his divine power over the forces of nature. It was one more step in the education of the disciples' faith.

3. The address in the synagogue (6:22–59)

22–25 The people knew that the disciples had used the only boat that was available and that Jesus had not departed with the disciples. They were interested in seeing him again, but did not know where to find him. When boats became available (v.23), they went to Capernaum to look for Jesus (v.24). They were surprised to find Jesus with the disciples once again, so they asked, "When did you get here?" (v.25). Apparently Jesus' miracle of walking on the water was only for his disciples, for he did not tell the people how he had arrived at Capernaum.

26–27 Jesus was not flattered by the attention of the crowds, but immediately he began his instruction. The several answers he gave to their questions are mostly corrections of their opinions. The first was a reply to materialism, similar to the reply given to the woman at the well (see comments on 4:11–15). Jesus knew they were looking for him only because they ate; his reply was for them to search for "food that endures to eternal life," which he would give. That food is himself, as the later mystical utterance in v.54 states.

28–29 The second question implies both desire and a sense of self-sufficiency. The people seemed sure that if they wished to do so, they were capable of doing the works of God (i.e., works that God requires of those who seek to please him). To Jewish questioners, obtaining eternal life consisted in finding the right formula for performing works to please God. Jesus directed them to the gift of God that could be obtained only by faith in him (cf. 4:10), contradicting directly the presuppositions of his interrogators.

30–31 The third question about requesting a miraculous sign seems incredible. They seem to have forgotten that the Lord had just provided one in the feeding of the five thousand. The crowd went on to reveal their attempt to evaluate him by the ministry of Moses, who had provided manna for their ancestors in the desert.

32–33 Jesus informed the people that Moses had not given them the genuine spiritual bread. He did not mean that the manna had no food value; rather, it was not the means of sustaining spiritual life. Jesus himself claimed to be the only true source of spiritual nourishment (he may have had Dt 8:3 in mind here). As physical food is necessary for physical life, so spiritual food is necessary for spiritual life.

34–36 The request that Jesus should give the people the "bread [GK 788] of life" parallels the request of the Samaritan woman for the water of life (see comment on 4:15). Jesus had already startled the people by saying that Moses did not give them real bread from heaven. Now he shocked them a second time by announcing that he was the bread the Father had given. Jesus was claiming to be the only permanent satisfaction for the human desire for life. The attainment of this satisfaction hinges on belief. The definition of this term varies between the people's use of it (v.30) and Jesus' use (v.35). To them "belief" meant acceptance of his competence on the basis of miracles; to him it meant commitment, not on the basis of the miracles, but on trust in his person.

The assertion "I am the bread of life" is the first in a series of such declarations that are peculiar to this gospel (8:12; 10:7, 11; 11:25; 14:6; 15:1). Each represents a particular relationship of Jesus to the spiritual needs of humans: their light in darkness, their entrance into security and fellowship, their guide and protector in life, their hope in death, their certainty in perplexity, and their source of vitality for productiveness. He desired that people should receive him, not simply for what he might give them, but for what he might be to them. Jesus was talking about the bread that gives eternal life; but this was beyond their comprehension, just as the miracles Jesus had performed in their sight did not lead them to believe in him.

37 The Father has put everything under Jesus' control (cf. 5:19–27), including the people who are his. The paradox latent in this text has puzzled many. How can you be sure that the Father has really given you to Christ? In answer, Jesus made plain that human salvation is no surprise to God. He summons people to himself by his Word and by his Spirit. The invitation, however, is not restricted to any particular time or place, nor is it exclusively for any one nation, race, or culture. God will not refuse anyone. Nevertheless, a superficial attachment to God is not enough, for if the desire for salvation is not inspired by God, true salvation will not result.

38–40 Six times in this immediate context Jesus says that he "came down from heaven" (vv.33, 38, 41, 50, 51, 58). His claim to heavenly origin is unmistakable. Jesus also repeatedly affirmed that he had come to do his Father's will. That will is made clear here: Jesus will "lose none of all that he has given" him (v.39). Furthermore, Jesus' keeping ministry applies not only to this life, but also to the next. His constant allusion to the Father who gave him the believers, who sent him to give eternal life, and who draws believers to him indicates his close relationship with the Father—that of a Son who fulfills the Father's purpose (v.40). His prerogative of resurrection is the final proof of his authority.

41–42 "The Jews" in John usually represent those who are opposed to Jesus, especially those in leadership positions, not simply the people of Jewish origin (cf. 2:18, 20; 5:16). They might be called "the opposition party." Here they are probably local persons, for they show some acquaintance with Jesus' family. They took for granted that he was the son of Joseph and Mary, both well known to them. To them his claim of heavenly origin was incredible.

43–45 Jesus rebuked the people for their grumbling and told them that they would never come to him unless the Father initiated the action. He again spoke of the promise of resurrection for those who belonged to him (cf. v.39). Verse 45 indicates that God will do his drawing through the Scriptures and that those who are obedient to God's will as revealed in the Scriptures will come to Jesus.

46 Jesus' statement here is the foundation for the assertion in 1:18. Jesus claimed authoritative knowledge of God such as a son can claim concerning his own father.

47 As emphatically as he can, Jesus states that the one who believes in him "has everlasting life." The particular Greek construction used here indicates that the person's entire life is characterized by belief in Jesus.

48–50 Again Jesus says, "I am the bread of life" (cf. v.35). Previously, he linked this statement with the supplying of basic human needs. This time he links the statement to life itself. When the Jews ate the heavenly bread ("manna") in the desert, their physical needs were met. However, they eventually died (v.49). But Jesus said that he "is the bread that comes down from heaven, which a man may eat and not die" (v.50).

51 The key to a genuine experience with God lies in the sequence of statements in this verse. It is vested in the person of Christ, who descended from heaven to provide for humans what their nature requires. To eat of this bread means to appropriate Christ as one's life. It is a figure of speech for believing, for no one will eat what he or she cannot trust as edible. Eating a meal implies that it is wholesome, nourishing, and real. This verse also introduces the concept of Jesus' vicarious death, the sacrifice of his body for the sins of the world.

52–54 The last reaction of Jesus' opponents was prompted by the apparent impossibility of his statement. They took literally the figure of eating his flesh. Jesus responded by making himself perfectly clear. He repeated the statement with this added emphasis: "I tell you the truth." And with that, he added another aspect that was even more repulsive to the Jews: "Unless you eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood" (italics mine). If what Jesus said before was nonsense, this latter statement bordered on gross sin, for the law of Moses expressly forbade any drinking of blood (Lev 17:10–14).

Three times in vv.51–54 Jesus refers to the importance of eating his flesh and drinking his blood. His progression in thought is significant. First, Christ said he gives his flesh "for the life of the world" (v.51). Then he says whoever has not partaken of his flesh and blood has "no life" in him (v.53). And then whoever eats his flesh and drinks his blood does have "eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day" (v.54). There could be no mistaking what he meant now.

55–57 Jesus now explains what he means by his flesh and blood. First of all, what he is talking about is as real to him as are the physical counterparts that his opponents had in mind. It is a real food and a real drink that produces a real life. To partake of the elements that Christ offers brings one into an abiding relationship with him. The reality of the Christ-imparted life has been attested to by the myriads of Christians throughout the age who have partaken of Christ's body and blood, in sweet communion with him. Jesus then likened the intimate relationship that believers sustain with him to the intimacy existing between the Father and himself.

58–59 Jesus climaxed his discourse by once more referring to the "bread that came down from heaven," the forefathers who ate it in the wilderness and died, and the promise of everlasting life to those who received him (see comments on vv.31–36). Jesus is far greater than Moses, for what he provides satisfies throughout all eternity. Ironically, this conversation took place at "the synagogue in Capernaum." What better place to promise eternal life than where people gather to seek that very thing through their religion!

4. The division among the disciples (6:60–71)

60 The enigmatic words of Jesus puzzled some of the disciples just as much as they did the mixed crowd. "Disciples" (GK 3412) here refers to the total group of adherents who had attached themselves to Jesus, however loosely, not solely to the Twelve. Any who could not understand him or were unwilling to trust him completely withdrew. They lacked the spiritual perception to grasp his meaning.

61 Jesus' inward knowledge of the disciples enabled him to detect their attitude (cf. 2:25). His questions revealed his surprise that they were mystified. If they could not understand the meaning of eating his flesh and drinking his blood, how would they be able to interpret his resurrection (implied) and his ascension? If they were bewildered by his language, how much more difficult would they find the final event that would lead to his return to God?

62 This reference to the Ascension is one of several in the gospel (3:13; 8:21; 14:3; 16:10; 17:11; 20:17), though the act itself is not recorded. The disciples had complained that the concept of Jesus' being the true bread that comes down from heaven was incomprehensible. He intimated here that if they witnessed his ascension, as he apparently expected, they would be even more astonished.

63 Jesus insists that the Holy Spirit is the one who imparts life to the believer; it is not transmitted by the process of physical eating. Jesus was saddened by the dullness of some of his disciples that prevented their truly believing in him.

64 Jesus' reference to those who did not believe is explained by his later allusion to Judas (v.70). Jesus had given ample opportunity for faith to all those who followed him; yet from the beginning his spiritual discernment made him aware of those whose faith was genuine and those whose attachment was only superficial.

65 Jesus strongly implied that faith is the result of God's enabling. Unbelief is natural to those who are selfish and alienated from God and who cannot accept the idea that he can do the impossible. The Holy Spirit must awaken a selfish heart and empower it to believe. This does not destroy the voluntary character of faith; it is rather in accord with the cry of the man who said to Jesus, "I do believe; help me overcome my unbelief" (Mk 9:24).

66 "Because of this [utterance]" (rather than "from this time") the attitude of the disciples had changed. Either it was too difficult to comprehend or it offended their sense of self-sufficiency.

67 Our Lord ever wishes to encourage faith that is weak, and he had a great deal of concern and love for his disciples. That is why he asked a question that expects a negative answer: "You do not want to leave too, do you?"

68 These words of Peter parallel those in the Great Confession given in Mt 16:16; Mk 8:29; Lk 9:20, spoken as the representative of the Twelve. He declared that nobody else had the life-giving message of Jesus and that there was no other source that would satisfy them. In spite of all his usual awkwardness, Simon's faith in Jesus was genuine, and he evidenced true spiritual sensitivity. His statement represents the spiritual discernment that the disciples had developed during their association with Jesus.

69 The emphatic use of the first personal plural pronoun implies a contrast between the Twelve and those who had deserted Jesus: "We believe" (italics mine). The Greek tense used here indicates that Peter is affirming that they have reached a final, firm conviction that Jesus is indeed "the Holy One [GK 41] of God." This term for Jesus closely resembles the expression "the Holy One of Israel" (see Isa 41:14; 43:3; 47:4; et al.).

70 Jesus indicated that his choice of the Twelve was conscious and deliberate; yet he included one whom he knew would be a traitor. Judas had no less opportunity than any of the others to know and serve Jesus; nor was he a victim of discrimination, for he was given a prominent place among them as treasurer of the group (12:6). Yet he chose to be dishonest in his financial administration and selfish in his attitude; he also chose to betray Christ.

71 This verse reads like a footnote. Although the Gospels never indulge in lengthy denunciation of Judas, almost invariably his name is followed by the phrase "who betrayed him [Jesus]" (see Mt 10:4; Mk 3:19; Lk 6:16; Jn 12:4). On "Iscariot," see comment on Mk 3:16–19.

5. The visit to Jerusalem (7:1–52)

a. The journey (7:1–13)

1 Although the writer evidently knew of Jesus' later Galilean ministry, he chose not to record it. He shows that Jesus did not return to Judea at once after the feeding of the multitude, because his life would be in danger. Ever since the healing of the paralytic in Jerusalem, his opponents had been attempting to kill him (5:18); and as time progressed, their hatred increased (7:19, 30, 32, 44; 8:59; 10:39; 11:8,53) until they finally accomplished his death. From this point the opposition to Jesus becomes increasingly prominent in this gospel.

2 The Feast of Tabernacles was celebrated in the autumn (Lev 23:33–36; Dt 16:13–14), beginning five days after the Day of Atonement (Yom Kippur) and lasting eight days. Each family constructed a temporary shelter of branches to live in for the period of the feast. This typified the years of wandering in the desert before the people entered the Promised Land. The feast itself was a joyful time of thanksgiving for the harvest they now enjoyed. It was one of the three annual feasts at which attendance was required of all Jewish men (Dt 16:16).

3–5 Because the gathering in Jerusalem brought together pilgrims from every section of Palestine, Jesus' brothers saw an excellent opportunity for him to acquire some publicity, especially since he seemed to have such miraculous powers. They advised him to join the crowds in Jerusalem so that he might enhance his reputation and gain more followers, though their suggestion may have been more sarcastic than serious, since they did not believe in him (v.5). In other words, they may have been suggesting he abandon the idealism of teaching multitudes in obscurity and of risking death.

6 Jesus' reply strongly resembles the one he gave his mother at the wedding in Cana of Galilee (2:4). He did not live by the chance of casual opportunity but by a divine calendar predetermined by the Father. For this reason the world did not understand his action, and the difference in standards created both misunderstanding and hostility.

7 Again Jesus asserted that he did not belong to this world. The world regarded him as an alien and an antagonist because he condemned its evil works (see also 15:18–21; 17:14, 16).

8–11 Jesus did not plan to go immediately to Jerusalem; he would wait until "the right time." His brothers may have intended to make a show of his arrival (cf. v.4), and Jesus wanted to avoid this. Therefore, his secret departure for Jerusalem was not an act of deception. It was an attempt to avoid unwelcome publicity. Jesus' enemies were watching for him, obviously for the purpose of arresting him (cf. v.1).

12–13 Public opinion was divided. The people who favored him were intimidated by the religious hierarchy, which was hostile toward Jesus. The atmosphere was tense, and Jesus did not wish to precipitate a crisis at this time.

b. The popular debate (7:14–36)

14 Jesus remained in seclusion until the feast was half completed and then appeared in the temple court to teach. His absence during the first half of the week had aroused the curiosity of the pilgrims who had expected that he would come in order to take advantage of the eager crowds (see comments on 6:14–15). But Jesus had passed the apex of his popular ministry, and many of his disciples had turned from him (6:66–67).

15 Even Jesus' critics admitted his acumen and learning. They could not comprehend how he could have acquired such knowledge without engaging in formal rabbinical study (cf. Mk 1:22).

16 Jesus insisted that his teaching did not originate with himself but came from God. As the perfect man and messenger of God, he gave all credit to the Father who had "sent" him (see comment on 5:30).

17–18 "If any one chooses to do God's will" means there must be a definite act of the human will in order to do God's will—a settled, determined purpose to fulfill it. Spiritual understanding is not produced solely by learning facts or procedures; rather, it depends on obedience to known truth. Obedience to God's known will develops discernment between falsehood and truth.

19 Jesus accepted the fact that Moses transmitted the Law to Israel and acknowledged the authority of that Law. He accused his opponents, who claimed to be champions of the Law, of failing to keep it. His charge that they were plotting to kill him should be interpreted in the light of Jesus' own teaching on the sixth commandment that the sin of hatred and anger is essentially murder (Mt 5:21–22; cf. Jn 7:44–45).

20 The response of the crowd to Jesus' accusation shows that the decision of the rulers had not been widely publicized. The people were bewildered by his statement. Curiously, the only allusions in John to demonic activity are accusations made against Jesus (8:48–52; 10:20; cf. Mt 9:34; Mk 3:22; Lk 11:5).

21–22 Jesus is not saying that he did only "one miracle," for he had performed several by this time; but these were of little interest to the "Jews." The reference to circumcision on the Sabbath shows that the issue of healing on the Sabbath (vv.23–24) was central to Jesus' controversy with the Jewish rulers. Thus, the "one miracle" refers to the healing of the paralyzed man at the Pool of Bethesda (5:1–18).

23–24 Circumcision was initiated by Abraham (Ge 17:9–14) and explicitly commanded in the law of Moses (Lev 12:3). Because it had to be observed on the eighth day after birth, it was allowable on the Sabbath. Jesus argued that if a rite symbolizing purification were permitted on one member of the body, why should he not be allowed to make the entire person whole and clean on the Sabbath? "Stop judging" implies that his enemies should cease making superficial pronouncements on his work and that they should evaluate it objectively.

25–27 The people were confused about the conflict between Jesus and the religious authorities. They wondered why he wasn't censored if he was such a threat to the nation. The reason the authorities did not promptly have him arrested was that they were uncertain of the sentiments of the people and that an arrest could cause an uprising that would most assuredly bring disciplinary action from the Romans (cf. Mt 26:3–5).

The people themselves were uncertain of Jesus' real identity. They knew the authorities sought to kill him, but their reluctance to act led the people to conclude that perhaps there was some validity to Jesus' messianic claim. What further confused them, however, was that they believed the Messiah would rise up out of total obscurity, that no one would "know where he is from." Such an attitude reflected an ignorance of the prophetic Scriptures (see Mic 5:2; Mt 2:5).

28–29 In the midst of all this confusion, Jesus replied positively. His first statement may be ironic—"So you know me and where I am from, do you?" The people must have been aware of his boyhood in Nazareth and no doubt considered him to be the son of Joseph and Mary (6:42). Jesus' reply was a renewed affirmation of his origin in God and his divine commission. His assertion evoked the dual response of belief and unbelief (cf. vv.41–44).

30 Jesus' enemies attempted to seize him, but they failed because the hour of crisis had not come. Not only did "the time" restrain him from sudden independent action (2:4), but it assured him of divine protection until the moment for action came (cf. Lk 22:53).

31 The response of many was belief, though it was hesitant. They did not affirm his messiahship but cautiously suggested that the Messiah would perform no more miracles than Jesus did. Consequently they tended to believe that he might be the promised leader they anticipated.

32 The favorable reaction of those who believed prompted the chief priests and Pharisees to action. To delay longer might result in more people turning to Jesus. The attempted arrest was official since the temple guards constituted the arresting party.

33–35 Jesus' reply to the action gave a hint of his coming death. The declaration that he would go where he could neither be followed nor found excited the curiosity of the crowd. They surmised that he expected to leave Palestine and to minister among the Dispersion and the Gentiles.

36 The perplexity of the crowd over Jesus' answer was echoed later by Simon Peter, who, upon hearing him speak similar words, said, "Lord, why can't I follow you now? I will lay down my life for you" (13:37). The crowd could not follow Jesus because of their ignorance of his true identity and purpose; Simon was incapable because he lacked the necessary courage.

c. The climactic appeal (7:37–44)

37 The climax of the controversy came "on the last and greatest day of the Feast" of Tabernacles. According to the law, the feast was held for seven days, followed by an eighth day of spiritual observance, including an offering to God (on this feast, see comments on Lev 23:33–44). Whether the "last day" was the seventh or the eighth day is not clear. If it refers to the eighth day, it makes the appeal of Jesus in this section all the more meaningful. He took the opportunity to make a public announcement concerning himself and his claims.

38 The celebration of the Feast of Tabernacles included a daily procession of priests from the temple to the Pool of Siloam, from which they drew water that was poured out as a libation at the altar, accompanied by a recitation of Isa 12:3: "With joy you will draw water from the wells of salvation." This offering of water memorialized God's provision for the thirsty people in the wilderness, but the water had been poured out and had left them unsatisfied. Now Jesus appeals to the individual: "Whoever believes in me." He was requiring an individual response of faith rather than a collective observance of a ritual. In the light of v.39, which connects the manifestation of the Spirit with the believer, it seems most likely that "from within him" refers to the believer, rather than to Christ.

If "as the Scripture has said" refers to a particular OT passage, it is impossible to locate it. The OT has numerous allusions to water, but none accords exactly with this utterance. Certainly Isa 12:3, quoted above, is a possibility; similar imagery with reference to "the pouring out" of the Holy Spirit occurs in Isa 32:15; 44:3; Eze 39:29; Joel 2:28–32. Jesus took the symbolism of the OT and applied it to the gift he intended to bestow on the disciples after his passion was completed (cf. Jn 14:16–17, 25–26; 15:26; 16:12–15).

39 John's statement shows that the passion of Christ was the important aspect of Jesus' revelation about the Holy Spirit, for it divided the era of law from that of the Spirit (1:17). The prophecy of Ezekiel (36:26–27) concurs with this.

This is the first use of "glorified" (GK 1519) in John, a distinctly Johannine verb, occurring twenty-three times. Often it refers to establishing status or enhancing a reputation (8:54; 12:28; 13:32; 14:13; 15:8; 16:14; 17:1, 4, 5, 10; 21:19). In this particular context it refers to Jesus' death, which, despite all appearances, would be the entrance to glory for him (7:39; 11:4; 12:16, 23; 13:31; cf. Php 2:8–9).

40–41 "The Prophet" (GK 4737) is presumably an allusion to the prediction of Moses that after him another prophet would appear who would command the attention of the people and who would bring them a further revelation from God (Dt 18:15). Moses explained that the prophet would not be accompanied by the frightening manifestations of Sinai, the great voice and the fire. He would rather be a fellow countryman, familiar to them, and one on their own level. Some regarded Jesus as this Prophet, hoping at the same time that he would lead them in a new Exodus and overcome their enemies; others suggested that he might be the Messiah.

42–44 The ignorance of the crowd in Jerusalem concerning Jesus is revealed by their uncertainty about his origin. On the basis of Scripture, they decided that Jesus could not be the Messiah since Mic 5:2 said the Messiah would come from Bethlehem and Jesus came from Nazareth. The confusion was such that no decision was made concerning his person and no action was taken to arrest him. Perhaps this is another illustration of Johannine irony, for Jesus was born in Bethlehem. The very passage that convinced his critics that he could not be the Messiah was one of the strongest to prove that he was.

d. The rejection by the leaders (7:45–52)

45 This text indicates that the chief priests and Pharisees had sent an arresting party, who failed in their mission. Since the high priest belonged to the Sadducean party, the coalition of the Pharisees and Sadducees was significant. These two groups were strongly opposed to each other in doctrine (Ac 23:7), but their common animosity toward Jesus induced them to combine for action against him.

46 The report of the guards sent to arrest Jesus showed that he had a strong influence on all who listened to him. His teaching had so overawed them that they could not carry out their orders. Their statement to the Jewish leaders implied that Jesus must be more than an ordinary human being.

47–49 The Pharisees were irate when the guards returned without Jesus. Their question implied a negative answer: "No one of the Pharisees has believed in him, has he?" And their other statements reveal their religious snobbishness. They assumed that nobody could be right except themselves. If they did not believe in Jesus, he must be unreliable and his claims must be fraudulent.

50–51 Nicodemus reappears in the gospel at this point (cf. ch. 3). His tentative question, "Does our law condemn a man without first hearing him to find out what he is doing?" was not an open declaration of faith in Jesus. Rather, it was a protest raised on a legal technicality. Nicodemus may have felt that if he championed Jesus' cause unequivocally, he would lose his case; but if he raised a legitimate legal objection, he might prevent drastic action.

52 The scornful and snobbish reply "Are you from Galilee, too?" intimates that Nicodemus was taking the stand of the crude and ignorant Galileans who were gullible enough to trust in the wandering prophet, Jesus. The statement "a prophet does not come out of Galilee" seems inconsistent with the fact that some of the OT prophets, like Jonah, did originate from northern Israel.

6. The woman taken in adultery (7:53–8:11)

Although this narrative is included in the sequence of the outline, it can hardly have belonged to the original text of this gospel. It is absent from most of the oldest copies of the gospel that precede the sixth century and from the works of the earliest commentators. But this does not mean that it is unhistorical. Its coherence and spirit show that it was preserved from a very early time, and it accords well with the known character of Jesus.

7:53–8:1 Presumably an unknown group of people who had gathered in Jerusalem to listen to Jesus now dispersed, while Jesus went to the Mount of Olives, where he spent the night. This does not fit well with the preceding text because Jesus was not present at the meeting of the Sanhedrin mentioned in 7:45–52.

2–5 The present episode took place in the temple court at dawn. The entire affair had the appearance of trickery, a trap specially prepared to catch Jesus. The Sanhedrin forced their way into the center of the group and interrupted Jesus' teaching by bringing a woman before him. The guilt of the woman was indisputable; she had been "caught in the act of adultery," and Jesus did not challenge the charge. The dilemma that the scribes and Pharisees posed was this: According to the law, she should be put to death (see Lev 20:10; Dt 22:22–24). If, then, Jesus refused to confirm the death penalty, he could be charged with contradicting the law of God and would himself be liable to condemnation. If, on the other hand, he confirmed the verdict of the Pharisees, he would lose his reputation for compassion; and possibly he could have been reported to the Romans as inciting the Sanhedrin to independent exercise of the death penalty.

6–8 The Pharisees' question was emphatic: "You, there! What do you say?" Jesus made no reply but "bent down and started to write on the ground with his finger." It was, incidentally, the only occasion on record that refers to his writing; what he wrote is impossible to say. When his questioners kept pressing him for an answer, Jesus replied by putting the dilemma back on them. For this particular offense there would normally be no witnesses, since its nature would demand privacy. Either the witnesses became such by accident, which would be unusual; or they were present purposely to create the trap for Jesus, in which case they themselves were guilty; or they condoned the deed, and this would make them partners in it. Since Jewish law required the witnesses in any case of capital punishment to begin the stoning, each one of the accusers would either have to admit that he was guilty or else refrain from demanding the woman's death.

9 The accusers "began to go away one at a time, the older ones first." The older ones either had more sins for which they were answerable or else had more sense than to make an impossible profession of righteousness. Finally the woman was left alone.

10 Jesus' address to the woman was respectful (cf. 2:4; 20:13). Her accusers, more interested in destroying Jesus than in saving her, had made her the bait for a trap. Their vicious hatred of him was as bad as her immorality. His rebuke had prevented their pronouncing sentence on her; Jesus did not pronounce sentence either. But neither did he proclaim her to be innocent.

11 Jesus dismissed the woman by saying, "Go now and leave your life of sin." Meeting a man who was interested in saving rather than exploiting and in forgiving rather than condemning must have been a new experience for her. Jesus' attitude provided both the motivation and the assurance she needed. Forgiveness demands a clean break with sin. That Jesus refrained from condemning her was a guarantee that he would support her.

John's Testimony to Jesus

A. The Seven Miracles of Jesus

"Jesus did many other miraculous signs in the presence of his disciples which are not recorded in this book. But these are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that by believing you may have life in his name." John 30:20–31

Turning water into wine at Capernaum	John 2:1–11
Healing the official's son at Capernaum	John 4:46–51
Healing the sick man at the pool of Bethesda	John 5:1–9
Feeding the five thousand in Galilee	John 6:5–13
Walking on the stormy Sea of Galilee	John 6:19–21
Healing the man born blind in Jerusalem	John 9:1–7
Raising Lazarus from the dead in Bethany	John 11:1–44

B. The Seven Great "I Am's of Jesus

"'You are not yet fifty years old,' the Jews said to him, 'and you have seen Abraham!' 'I tell you the truth,' Jesus answered, 'before Abraham was, I am!'" John 6:57–58

"I am the bread of life."	John 6:35, 48; cf. v.51
"I am the light of the world."	John 8:12; 9:5
"I am the gate for the sheep."	John 10:7, 9
"I am the good shepherd."	John 10:11, 14
"I am the resurrection and the life."	John 11:25
"I am the way and the truth and the life."	John 14:6
"I am the true vine."	John 15:1, 5

C. The Seven "Greater Than's" of Jesus

"To this John [the Baptist] replied. 'A man can receive only what is given him from heaven. . . . He [Jesus] must become greater; I must become less." John 3:27, 30

Jesus is greater than the angels.	John 1:51
Jesus is greater than Abraham.	John 8:56–58
Jesus is greater than Jacob.	John 4:11–14
Jesus is greater than Moses.	John 6:49–51
Jesus is greater than the law.	John 1:17; cf. 8:1–11
Jesus is greater than the Sabbath.	John 7:21–23; cf. 5:8–15; 9:14–33
Jesus is greater than the temple.	John 2:18–21

D. The Intensification of Controversy (8:12–59)

1. Teaching in the temple area (8:12–30)

12 Precisely at what time during Jesus' visit to Jerusalem this segment took place, John does not say. It may have been shortly after the close of the Feast of Tabernacles, while Jesus was still in the city. His claim to be the "light" (GK 5890) of the world is the second of the great "I am's" of Jesus (see comment on 6:34–36) and recalls 1:4–5. Perhaps Jesus drew his illustration from the Menorah that burned during the Feast. Jesus professes to be not only the inexhaustible source of spiritual nourishment, but also the genuine light by which truth and falsehood can be distinguished and by which direction can be established.

13–14 As usual, the Pharisees challenged Jesus' claims. Legally a testimony concerning oneself would be unacceptable because it would presumably be biased (see comment on 5:31). Here Jesus protested vigorously that his self-testimony is valid, for no one knew more about his own nature and experience than Jesus himself. He possessed knowledge concerning both where he came from and where he was going (see 13:3). The testimony about himself was therefore more accurate than that of his opponents, for they had no idea of either his origin or destiny (cf. 7:25–44).

15–18 Jesus argued further that the Pharisees were not qualified to render a verdict on the validity of his witness because they were using the wrong criterion of "human standards." He, on the other hand, is not measurable by such standards. He appealed to the rule of the OT law that prescribed two witnesses for an acceptable proposition (Dt 17:6). He would be qualified as one of the witnesses (for no human witness can authenticate a divine origin) and his Father, who sent him, as the other (cf. 5:23–21,37).

19 Whether the Pharisees' question here is a bewildered inquiry or an intentional insult is hard to determine, though in Eastern culture, to question a man's paternity is a definite slur on his legitimacy. It may be unwise to read into this question more hostility than is necessary (but see also v.41). Jesus was referring to God, and the Pharisees were unwilling to admit that he had so intimate a relation with God. Jesus asserted that the knowledge of the Father depended on knowing him. As the one whom the Father had sent (v.18), Jesus claimed to be an adequate and authoritative representative.

20 The second part of this verse is a footnote John adds that relates to the program of Jesus' life (see 2:4; 7:6, 30; 12:23, 27; 17:1). Jesus lived a protected life until his work was completed.

21–24 The following discourse marks the dual destiny of Jesus and his opponents: he would return to the Father, and they would die in their sins. Jesus claimed that he belonged to a totally different world from that of his questioners. To him the difference was natural; to them it was unnatural—something they could explain only by assuming that he belonged to the realm of the dead. But Jesus had come from the presence of God, and he asserted that only by faith could they attain his level. An insurmountable barrier separated them—unbelief (v.23). Not only did they repudiate his claims, they completely rejected his person.

25 The question asked by the Pharisees shows their exasperation with Jesus' hints and seemingly extravagant claims. The crowd had ventured many guesses about his identity (see 7:40–41). The longer his explanation, the less satisfying it seemed to be. Jesus avoided making a direct claim to deity, but he relied on his works and character to speak for themselves (see 5:36–38). They witnessed to the fact that he had come from another world, that he was different from humanity in general, and that he had a unique mission to fulfill.

26 Jesus certainly had enough accusations that he could have mustered to bring judgment on his accusers. The remainder of the verse implies that such judgment is tied to their unwillingness to acknowledge Jesus' relationship to the Father. Because he was speaking what the Father told him, the Father's judgment would come on them, too.

27–28 Jesus' questioners did not understand that he was speaking to them of God, so they missed the point of his peculiar relationship to the Father. He asserted that when they had lifted him up, they would recognize him for what he was. Jesus' reference to "lifted up" (GK 5738; see comment on 3:14) refers to the cross, but the verb also means "to exalt." It may carry an additional meaning: that Jesus would be glorified by the cross (see 12:23, 32). Another important phrase is Jesus' use of "I am" in "then you will know that I am." It occurs three times in this discourse (vv.24, 28, 58). It may be translated as in v.24, "I am [the one I claim to be]," referring to himself as the Son of Man. But it may also be related to God's revelation of himself to Moses as the "I AM" (Ex 3:14) and to Isaiah's theistic proclamations (Isa 41:4; 43:11–13; et al.). The Jews recognized "I AM" as a term for deity (cf. Mk 14:61–62). The term predicates self-existence and eternal being. Along with this claim to divine nature, Jesus reaffirmed his subordination to the Father as the bearer of his message. Both his nature and his message have come from God.

29 Four times in this discourse Jesus affirmed that he had been sent by the Father (vv. 16, 18, 26, 29). His message was not original; he was simply conveying the truth of the one who had sent him and was carrying out his orders. His whole purpose was to please the Father, and his utter devotion produced a life of complete holiness. This revelation forms a contrasting background to the slavery of sin that follows.

30 The validity of the belief referred to here seems questionable. The people's lack of perception and shallowness of commitment are reflected in the following paragraphs, which begin with proud resentment on the part of the Jews and conclude with an attempted stoning.

2. The discourse to professed believers (8:31–47)

31 Jesus now addressed those Jews who had expressed a measure of faith in him. He began his discourse with the assumption that they would proceed to a further commitment on the basis of his teaching, which would mark them as genuine disciples and lead them into a deeper experience of truth. Jesus did not, of course, wish to extinguish a smoldering wick of faith (cf. Mt 12:20), but he felt the necessity of making perfectly clear the conditions of discipleship.

32–33 The freedom Jesus spoke of was spiritual freedom from sin and its effects, as the following context shows. The Jews' response indicates that they were thinking of political freedom, since they spoke of being enslaved to persons (v.33). Their protest was ill-founded, for they were forgetting the slavery of Egypt, the oppressions at the time of the Judges, the Exile in Babylon, and the current Roman domination of their land. Because they were descendants of Abraham, with whom God had established a permanent covenant (Ge 12:1–3; 15:1–21; 17:1–14, 19; 22:15–18), they considered themselves exempt from any spiritual danger.

34 Jesus' reply dealt with the spiritual aspect of freedom. Sin enslaves because every act of disobedience to God creates an atmosphere of alienation and a trend to further disobedience that inevitably makes escape impossible. An act of sin can possibly be overcome, but the attitude and habit of sin are inescapable.

35–36 A slave has no security, for he can claim no family ties that entail an obligation toward him. The son of a family has permanent status within it. Jesus enlarged this analogy by stating that while a son is rightfully a partaker of family privileges, the Son can confer such privileges. The hope for real freedom does not lie in the ancestry of Abraham but in the action of Christ.

37–38 The contrast between the attitude of Abraham and that of his self-styled descendants was proof that they were falsely claiming him as their spiritual ancestor. They were murderous in intent and impervious to revelation. Jesus had brought a message from the Father, and, unlike Abraham, they would not receive it (cf. Lk 3:8). Jesus' contrast of what he had "seen" and what they had "heard" reinforces the concept of authority implicit in his repeated claim to have been "sent" by the Father (8:29). He spoke from firsthand knowledge; they were acting on misinformation. They had been misled by Satan himself.

39–41 Jesus insisted that the Jews were not the true children of Abraham. Their hatred of Jesus, refusal to listen to truth, and lack of simple faith belied their profession. The Jews' insistence that they were children of Abraham implied that they regarded their relationship to God as secure because of their lineal descent from the man with whom God had confirmed his covenant. While the covenant had not been abrogated, Jesus made it plain that his hearers needed to exercise individual faith to participate in it. His words give substance to his teaching on the new birth and are paralleled by Paul's explanation of Abraham's faith in Gal 3:1–29.

The Jews' insistence that they were true descendants of Abraham brought Jesus' flat denial of their spiritual claims, and he attributed their attitude to another source. Their protest, "We are not illegitimate children," may carry the implication of a sneer: "We are not illegitimate children—but you are!" While John does not speak directly of the virgin birth, there are hints in his gospel of a mystery surrounding his birth. In any case, the Jews were unwilling to listen to Jesus' claims; yet, at the same time, they were insisting that they came from God.

42 Jesus gave another evidence of the Jews' hypocrisy. If they truly loved God, they would evidence that love by showing love to his Son. Love for God is a family affair; it involves loving all whom the Father has sent, especially the Son, his most beloved representative.

43–44 The people might have been confused as to why they did not love Jesus if he was indeed sent from the Father. Jesus spoke to that point with a rhetorical question: "Why don't you know what I am saying?" Then he went on to give the reason: their family association was wrong; they belonged to their father, the devil. And because of this family tie, they were inclined to carry out their father's desire, just as Jesus carried out his Father's desire. The devil seeks to deprive life and distort truth. The Jews were merely demonstrating the truth of the adage, "Like father, like son.'

45 "Truth" (GK 237) is an abstract that is difficult for people to know and appreciate (cf. 18:38). Jesus told the Jews that because they were children of their father, they didn't know what truth was. They were living in a world of lies, distortion, and falseness.

46 Jesus' challenge "Can any of you prove me guilty of sin?" would have been impossible for anyone else to utter (cf. 8:7). No human being could risk making that challenge without many flaws in one's character being revealed. Had Jesus not been sinless, someone in the hostile crowd would eagerly have charged him with at least one sin.

47 Jesus closed the argument by repeating that the Jews refused to hear him because they did not belong to God. Their bitterness toward him and their obtuseness toward his teaching contradicted their spiritual claims.

3. The response of the unbelievers (8:48–59)

48 The hardened opposition to Jesus' claims appears in an accusation apparently leveled at him frequently that he was "a Samaritan and demon-possessed." The Samaritans held many beliefs in common with the Jews, for they also relied on the Pentateuch as the supreme authority for their faith. They differed, however, in their interpretation and were much more lax in their attitude toward other religious influences. Since Jesus did not agree with all the traditional interpretations of the Law, the Jews may have classed him with the Samaritans as a heretic. According to John, demon-possession was attributed to Jesus on three occasions (7:20; 8:52; 10:20). In this context it is the equivalent of calling a man crazy.

49–50 Jesus denied the allegations and placed the burden of proof back on his adversaries. His aim was to honor the Father; theirs, to bring Jesus into disgrace. He disclaimed all selfish desire for prestige and relegated the final evaluation of his works to the judgment of God.

51 With a solemn affirmation, Jesus declared that anyone who receives his message will not experience death. This is a negative version of the positive principle declared later by Jesus (see 10:10). It summarizes his mission, for he came "to destroy the devil's work" (1Jn 3:8) and to undo the penalty for sin that was pronounced in Eden (Ge 2:17). A fuller statement of this principle appears in Jesus' promise to Martha (Jn 11:25).

52 To receive eternal life by keeping Jesus' word seemed to the Jews the height of absurdity. They felt that their charge of demon-possession was confirmed. If their ancestor Abraham and the OT prophets as God's accredited messengers died, how could this obscure Galilean claim to have the power of life and death?

53 A better translation of this question would be, "You are not greater than our father Abraham, are you?" A negative answer is assumed. While Jesus' opponents frequently charged him with making himself divine (5:18; 10:33; 19:7), Jesus himself seldom asserted his deity, but preferred to live and act in such a way that others would observe his divine nature and confess it spontaneously (cf. Mt 16:13–17).

54 Again Jesus referred his defense to the Father, for God was responsible for Jesus' message and vindication. He reminded them that the God they claimed to be theirs was his own personal Father. Their relation to God was formal; his was familial.

55 By using two different Greek words for "know" (GK 1182 & 3857) Jesus seems to be saying: "You have not really attained an experience of God; I have a full consciousness of him." Jesus could not deny his intimate knowledge of God without making himself a liar.

56 Jesus claimed that Abraham had a preview of his ministry and had rejoiced in it. This probably refers to the promise God gave to Abraham that his seed would become the channel of divine blessing to all the nations (Ge 12:3). By "my day" Jesus was likely referring to his redemptive work, which would summarize his career. Isaac represented to Abraham the "seed" through which God would fulfill his promise. The miraculous birth of Isaac, his unquestioning trust in his father, his willingness to become a sacrifice to fulfill the command of God, and his deliverance from certain death all seem to point forward to the coming incarnation, death, and resurrection of the promised Seed, Jesus (see Ge 22:1–18; Heb 11:17–19).

57 The Jews' retort that Jesus was "not yet fifty years old" affords an interesting sidelight on Jesus' age. Fifty years was the limit observers would assign to him on the basis of appearance. If, as many think, Jesus was born between 6 and 4 B.C., and if the Crucifixion took place in A.D. 33, Jesus would not have been older than his late thirties. Perhaps the tensions of his life had aged him prematurely, yet he was obviously less than fifty years of age (see also Lk 3:23).

58 The rejoinder of Jesus, "Before Abraham was born, I am" could only mean a claim to deity. "Was born" (or "came into being") implies the event of entering into a new state or condition of existence (the same verb is used in 1:14 to denote the Incarnation). "I am" (GK 1609 & 1639) implies continuous existence, including existence when Abraham appeared. Jesus was, therefore, asserting that at the time of Abraham's birth, he existed (see also comments on 8:28 for a discussion of "I AM"). "I AM" was recognized by the Jews as a title of deity.

59 The crowd unmistakably understood Jesus' words as a blasphemous claim and immediately prepared to stone him. He did not protest their action as a mistake of judgment; he simply withdrew. How he managed to escape their wrath is not explained, though he had done so on previous occasions (7:30; cf. Lk 4:30).

E. The Manifestation of Opposition (9:1–11:57)

The widening rift between belief and unbelief, which had become clearly apparent at the time of the feeding of the five thousand and was accentuated at the Feast of Tabernacles, now became an open breach. Not only had many of Jesus' disciples abandoned his cause (6:66), but the religious authorities also were becoming actively hostile (7:32). The last few months of Jesus' life were filled with controversy and with attempts by the priests and scribes to trap him by his words or actions. Jesus, however, being fully aware of their designs, maintained his usual ministry and became bolder in his resistance.

1. The healing of the blind man (9:1–41)

a. The healing (9:1–12)

The cure of the blind man probably occurred shortly after the Feast of Tabernacles, while Jesus was still in Jerusalem. The episode is a unit by itself, used as an illustration of Jesus' utterance recorded in 8:12: "I am the light of the world. Whoever follows me will never walk in darkness, but will have the light of life." The healing was not only a sample of Jesus' ability to restore sight to a man who was congenitally blind; but it also represented, figuratively, and for the blind man, experientially the dawning of spiritual light. Furthermore, the healing brought new light to the disciples on one of the mysteries of life that had bewildered them.

1 Although Jesus had healed blind persons on other occasions (Mt 9:27–31; 12:22; 15:30; 21:14; et al.), this "sign" (GK 4958) was an outstanding case because (1) the man had been born blind; (2) the sign was related to the issue of fate, raised by the disciples; and (3) it illustrates the origination and development of faith, a theme of this gospel. The encounter of Jesus and the blind man seems to have been a casual one. Since blind beggars had little opportunity for employment, they were dependent on charity for their sustenance.

2–3 The interest of the disciples was prompted by theological curiosity rather than compassion. For them the blind man was an unsolved riddle rather than a sufferer to be relieved. Their question was based on Ex 34:7, which the Jews construed to mean that if a person suffered from any ailment, it must have been because his parents or grandparents had committed some sin against God. To this they added the thought that perhaps he might have sinned before birth (either as an embryo or in a preexistent state); such a concept appears in the rabbinical writings. Jesus refused to accept either alternative. He looked on the man's plight as an opportunity to do God's work, not as a punishment or as a matter of irrational chance.

4–5 The growing pressure of hostility rising from unbelief warned Jesus that his time was short; the darkness would soon fall. As all the Gospels show, Jesus was working under the shadow of the coming cross (Mt 16:21; Mk 8:31; Lk 9:22). While he had the opportunity, he must let his light shine on the darkness around him by healing both bodies and minds. The use of "we" shows that he included his disciples in his ministry. They also would pass through perils and opposition, but they would have the support of the Father who had sent him. "I am the light of the world" repeats 8:12; the healing of the blind man illustrates the positive and practical application of that principle.

6–7 To make known his intention to the blind man, Jesus made clay from dust and spittle and placed it on the sightless eyes. The touch of a friendly hand would be reassuring. The weight of the clay would indicate to the blind man that something had been done to him, and it would induce obedience to Jesus' command. Certainly he would not want to continue sitting by the roadside with mud smeared over his eyes. Though his lifelong affliction may have made him apathetic, he now had at least one motive for obeying.

The Pool of Siloam was probably a considerable distance from the place where the blind man was. His trip must have been a venture of faith. Jesus had not even told him that he would be healed but had merely commanded him to wash. If the man had overheard Jesus' conversation with the disciples, he would have expected something to happen. Yet so extraordinary a miracle as giving sight to a man born blind would have seemed impossible.

8–9 The man's recovery of his sight created a genuine sensation. The effects of the miracle are described vividly by the responses of four groups or individuals: (1) the neighbors, (2) the Pharisees, (3) the parents, and (4) the man himself. The neighbors and acquaintances knew very well the man they had supported by their charity. To see him walking with normal sight was so incredible that they thought it must be a case of mistaken identity. He quickly settled the dispute by avowing that he was the man they had known.

10–12 The curiosity of the neighbors demanded an explanation. The man replied in matter-of-fact fashion, narrating the event just as it happened. His reply, however, indicates the first stage of faith: he accepted the fact. He made no attempt to evaluate Jesus' person but spoke of him simply as "the man they call Jesus."

b. The consequences (9:13–41)

13–15 The case was so mysterious that the neighbors took the man to the religious authorities, the Pharisees, who supposedly would be able to offer an explanation. Since the day on which the miracle was performed was a Sabbath, the Sabbath law was involved. The Pharisees inquired how the man received his sight, and he repeated the story he had given first to the neighbors.

There are both parallels and contrasts between the healing in ch. 9 and that in ch. 5. Both occurred at a public pool; both concerned apparently incurable cases; and both occurred on the Sabbath, which precipitated the question of the Sabbath law. In the previous instance, however, the man healed reported voluntarily to the Pharisees and identified Jesus afterward. In this instance the man had no knowledge of Jesus' whereabouts, nor did he report the matter to the authorities. Furthermore, Jesus implied that the former man had sinned and adjured him to cease doing so (5:14); of the man in this chapter he stated that his condition was not the result of sin (9:3).

16 The response of the Pharisees revealed reasoning from prejudice: "This man is not from God, for he does not keep the Sabbath." For the Pharisees there could be no other conclusion. Others, however, were hesitant and asked how a sinner could have the power to perform such miracles. The use of the plural "miraculous signs" suggests that they knew other miracles of Jesus comparable to this one. The contrast between these responses brings into focus an important principle of interpretation: Should Jesus be judged by an a priori application of the law or by an a posteriori consideration of his works?

The division among the Pharisees shows that there must have been at least a small minority who were not hostile to Jesus (perhaps including Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathea). Their question, "How can a sinner do such miraculous signs?" sounds much like Nicodemus's opening words to Jesus in 3:2.

17 Again the man himself was questioned to help bring a decision in the dispute. His verdict was more definite than the preceding one: "He is a prophet." The prophets were agents of God, and in some instances they performed miracles (e.g, Elisha, 2Ki 2:19–22; 4:18–44; 5:1–14). If, then, Jesus had performed an indisputable miracle, it was indisputable evidence that he must have a divine commission. As an emissary of God, he could be empowered to heal on the Sabbath, if necessary.

18–23 The evidence was still insufficient to remove the objections of "the Jews" (a phrase here synonymous with "the Pharisees"). They proceeded to query whether the man really had been born blind; for if he had not been blind from birth, the miracle could be disputed. They also interrogated his parents, who, fearing excommunication from the synagogue, evaded the issue by stating that their son was an adult capable of answering for himself.

24 To the Jews there was only one solution. The Law forbade working on the Sabbath; Jesus had healed on the Sabbath; therefore, Jesus was a sinner. So they commanded the man to "give glory to God" for his healing.

25–27 The ensuing argument between the previously blind man and the Pharisees was a duel between an obvious fact and a legal syllogism. The fact of the healing was undeniable and was admitted by the blind man's opponents. Their incessant questioning exhausted his patience, and he indulged in some sarcasm by insinuating that their repeated inquiries showed an interest in becoming disciples of Jesus.

28–29 Such a response to learned rabbis on the part of an illiterate man was surely considered insulting. The Jews quickly retorted that they were abiding by the authority of Moses, whose law had been the standard of Israel's religion. Jesus they rejected as a vagrant prophet who did not keep the law.

30–33 Again the blind man pressed the pragmatic argument, and he also employed an argument of his own. Since, according to the assumption of the Jews, "God does not listen to sinners" (cf. Ps 66:18; Pr 28:9; Isa 1:15), how could Jesus have performed this miracle if he were under divine condemnation? Rather, the man reasoned, the healing should be ample evidence that Jesus came from God.

34 To this argument the Jews had no real answer, so they attacked the man by character assassination and made him feel unworthy to answer. Then they excommunicated him, thus isolating him from his family and friends and debarring him from employment (cf. v.22).

35–36 In contrast to the negative result of rejection is the positive result of Jesus' response. "Found" implies that Jesus looked for the man so that he might confirm his faith. The question "Do you believe in the Son of Man?" is a summons to commitment, demanding a personal decision in the face of opposition or rejection. Since the healing of the man occurred after Jesus' first interview, he would not have recognized Jesus by sight; and the question, couched in the third person, would not instantly identify the questioner as the object of faith.

37–38 When Jesus said that the "Son of Man" was the person speaking, the man instantly responded by worshiping Jesus. He was ready to believe on the one who had healed him. The progress in his spiritual understanding of Christ is marked by progressive descriptions: "The man they call Jesus" (v.11); "he is a prophet" (v.17); "from God" (v.33); "Son of Man" (v.35); and, lastly, "Lord" (v.38). This progression illustrates the man's movement from darkness to light, both physically and spiritually.

39–41 The negative result is illustrated by the Pharisees' response. Jesus' remark in v. 39 makes him the pivot on which human destiny turns. The Pharisees, assuming that they could "see" without his intervention, asked in resentment, "Are we blind too?" Jesus' reply indicated that if they had acknowledged blindness, they could be freed from sin; but since they were asserting that they could see when they were really blind, there was no remedy for them. Deliberate rejection of light means that "the light within . . . is darkness" (Mt 6:23).

2. The Good Shepherd discourse (10:1–21)

Chapter 10 opens a new topic, the discourse on the Good Shepherd. It is seemingly unrelated to the previous narrative, though the reference in v.21 to opening the eyes of the blind shows that the author connects it with the preceding text. This discourse in some respects resembles parables in the Synoptics (e.g., the parable of the lost sheep in Mt 18:12–14; Lk 15:3–7). The Johannine presentation, however, is not concentrated on one point but utilizes the allegory with a wider meaning. The teaching is based on the practice of shepherding, and several aspects are utilized to create a picture of the relation of Christ to his people.

1–2 Jesus introduces this section with a solemn affirmation ("I tell you the truth"), emphasizing the importance of the teaching that the allegory contains, particularly regarding the ministry of Jesus himself. The imagery of the first two paragraphs is based on the concept of the "sheep pen." It was usually a rough stone or mud-brick structure, only partially roofed, or a cave in the hills. It had a single opening through which the sheep passed when they came in for the night. The pen served to protect them against thieves, robbers, and wild beasts.

Thieves, who would have no right of access by the gate, used other means to gain entrance. The shepherd entered by the gate, the lawful method of entry. Jesus was contrasting himself with the false messiahs who by pretense or violence were attempting to gain control of the people. He came as the legitimate heir of the chosen seed and claimed to be the fulfillment of the OT revelation.

3 The "watchman" (GK 2601) cannot be identified with any particular person; rather, the word illustrates Jesus' coming at the right time and in the right way. He alone has the right to spiritual leadership of his people, and the sheep listen to him. The Oriental shepherd usually named his sheep and could summon them by calling them.

4–6 A pen frequently held several flocks; and when the time came to go out in the morning pasture, each shepherd separated his sheep from the others by his peculiar call. Instead of driving them, he led them so that they followed him as a unit. Wherever they went, the shepherd preceded them, guiding them to adequate pasture and guarding against possible danger. The sheep refused to follow a stranger because his voice was unfamiliar. In fact, if a stranger should use the shepherd's call and imitate his tone, the flock would instantly detect the difference and would scatter in panic.

In view of the fact that shepherds and sheep were so common in Palestine, it seems incredible that Jesus' metaphor was not understood. His hearers, however, failed to comprehend his meaning because of their spiritual deadness. If they would not recognize his claims, they would not accept him as a shepherd; and their assumption that they were God's flock because they were descendants of Abraham (8:39) would eliminate the necessity of personal faith in Jesus for salvation.

7 The sudden shift of metaphor from shepherd to gate seems rather strange to us, but in reality it is not. When the sheep returned to the fold at night after a day of grazing, the shepherd stood in the doorway of the pen and inspected each one as it entered. He anointed any who were scratched or wounded and gave water to those who were thirsty. After all the sheep had been counted and brought into the pen, the shepherd lay down across the doorway so that no intruder—human being or beast—could enter without his knowledge. The shepherd became the door, the sole determiner of who entered the fold and who was excluded (cf. 14:6).

8 The "thieves and robbers" refer to the false messiahs and supposed deliverers of the people who had appeared in the period following the restoration from the Exile and especially in the century before Jesus' advent, or possibly to the religious leaders of the Jews. After the death of Herod the Great in 4 B.C., many factions were contending for the leadership of the nation and attempting by violence to throw off the Roman yoke. But Jesus' purpose was not political, as the emphasis of the discourse shows.

9–10 Jesus' main purpose was the salvation (health) of the sheep, which he defined as free access to pasture and fullness of life. Under his protection and by his gift they can experience the best life can offer. In the context of John's emphasis on eternal life, this statement takes on new significance. Jesus can give a whole new meaning to living because he provides full satisfaction and perfect guidance (cf. Eze 34:15).

11 The concept of a divine shepherd goes back to the OT (e.g., Ps 23; Jer 23:1–3; Eze 34:12, 15). To the disciples the figure would have been specially apt since shepherding was one of the major occupations in Palestine. It involved both a protective concern and a sacrificial attitude. This latter is expressed in the words "the good shepherd lays down his life for the sheep." This phrase, unique to the Johannine writings, means a voluntary sacrificial death (10:11, 17, 18; 13:37–38; 15:13; 1Jn 3:16). "Life" (GK 6034) implies more than physical existence; it involves personality and is more frequently translated "soul." The good shepherd stands ready to sacrifice his total self for the sake of the sheep.

12–13 Jesus' statement about the hired hand indicates the differences between himself and the religious leaders of the day. The main concern of the hired hand is his pay (cf. 1Pe 5:2–3), not the welfare of the sheep. When the flock is attacked by a wolf, he deserts them, for he will not endanger himself for them. Without proper and courageous leadership, the sheep will be dispersed and easily become the victims of their enemies.

14–15 The reaffirmation "I am the good shepherd" is based on knowledge of the sheep. "Know" (GK 1182) implies a relationship of trust and intimacy. The definitive analogy given here is drawn from Jesus' relation to the Father. The Shepherd is concerned for the sheep because they are his property and because he loves them individually.

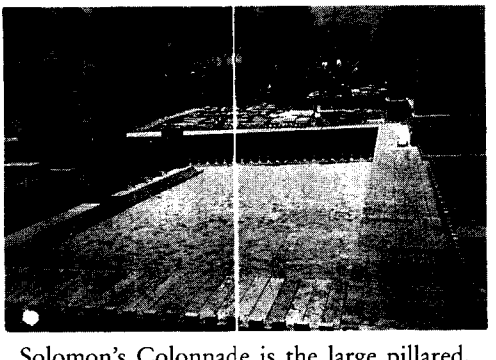
16 The sheep "not of this sheep pen" probably refers to the Gentiles to whom Jesus sent his disciples (Mt 28:19; Lk 24:47; Ac 1:8) and whom he planned to include in his salvation. He also stresses this idea of unity in his farewell prayer (17:20).

17 The thrice-repeated allusion to laying down his life (10:11, 15, 17) gives the basis for Jesus' sacrifice as the means of our reconciliation both to God and to one another (see 1Jn 3:16).

18 Two important aspects of Jesus' death are clarified by his authority. (1) His death was wholly voluntary. His power was such that no human hand could have touched him had he not permitted it. The gospel has already made clear that Jesus avoided capture or execution (5:18; 7:44–45; 8:20, 59; cf. 10:39; 11:53–54). Only when he declared that "the hour has come" (12:23) was it possible for his enemies to arrest him. (2) Jesus had authority both to lay down his life and to take it up again. The death of Jesus was part of a plan to submit to death and then emerge from it victoriously alive. Anyone can lay down one's life, if that means simply the termination of physical existence; but only the Son of God could at will resume his existence. This entire plan was motivated by his love for the Father and his readiness to carry out his Father's purpose.

19–21 The reaction of the populace was divided. To Jesus' enemies, his claims seemed so exaggerated and so contradictory to the popular understanding of the unity of God that they could be attributed only to the irrational and blasphemous utterance of a demoniac (cf. 7:20; 8:48). On the other hand, many of the crowd regarded Jesus as thoroughly sane. After all, demoniacs do not cure the blind. The reference to the miracle narrated in ch. 9 shows that it must have left a strong impression in Jerusalem.

3. The debate in Solomon's Colonnade (10:22–42)



22–23 The Feast of Dedication, now known as Hanukkah, was established as a memorial to the purification and rededication of the temple by Judas Maccabeus in 165 B.C., after its profanation three years earlier by Antiochus IV Epiphanes. Antiochus, the king of Syria, had captured Jerusalem, plundered the temple treasury, and sacrificed a sow to Jupiter on the temple altar. His attempt to hellenize Judea resulted in the Maccabean revolt, which was successful in defeating the Syrian armies and liberating the Jewish people. Solomon's Colonnade (or Porch) was a long walkway covered by a roof supported on pillars on the east side of the temple, overlooking the Kidron Valley. Jesus used it as a center for informal teaching and preaching, since there were almost always some people present for worship at the temple.

24 The Jews encircled Jesus and demanded him to make a categorical statement of his identity, to dispel an illusion and/or to enlist their allegiance. Was he the Messiah or not? If so, they wanted him to fulfill his calling by achieving independence for the nation; if he was not the Messiah, they would look elsewhere. They could not escape the fact that his miracles exceeded the powers of any ordinary person and that his teachings carried an authority greater than that of the established religious leaders. On the other hand, he had not formally presented himself as the Messiah, nor had he evinced any political ambitions.

25–26 Jesus' reply placed the burden of proof on his questioners. He reminded them that his previous sayings and works should be sufficient to establish his messianic mission (cf. 5:16–47; 6:32–59; 7:14–30), but they were refusing that evidence. The reason they did not believe was that they were not his sheep. In saying that, Jesus implied that the main criterion of salvation is not descent from the chosen line, but whether or not people follow him. His immediate hearers refused to believe and thus cut themselves off from further revelation.

27–28 The sheep that are given by the Father to the Son belong to his flock and are characterized by obedience, recognition of the shepherd, and allegiance to him. They, in turn, are guaranteed eternal life and permanent protection. All the resources of God are committed to their preservation.

Solomon's Colonnade is the large pillared, covered walkway that surrounded the courtyard of the temple on three side.

29 The gift of the Father to the Son is the "sheep" viewed collectively. He assures their destiny, for nobody can wrest them from his hand. Throughout the discourse, Jesus has been stressing his relationship with the Father, his intimate knowledge of the Father (v.15), the love of the Father for him (v.17), and his works done in the Father's name (v.25).

30 "I and the Father" preserves the separate individuality of the two Persons in the Godhead; the word "one" (GK 1651) asserts unity of nature or equality (cf. 1Co 3:8). The Jews were quick to apprehend this statement and reacted by preparing to stone Jesus for blasphemy because he, a man, had asserted that he was one with God. For them Jesus' language did not mean simply agreement of thought or purpose but carried a metaphysical implication of deity.

31 The verb translated "picked up" literally means "to carry." It is doubtful whether there were any loose stones in the paved courtyard of Solomon's Colonnade. But not far off was the temple that was in the process of being built, and certainly stones would have been readily available there. Stoning was the punishment prescribed for blasphemy in the law of Moses (Lev 24:16), and the opponents of Jesus were preparing for just such an execution.

32 Jesus' question challenged the people's action on the ground that he had performed only helpful deeds. They should take stock of what he had done, and then they would see that stoning was incongruous with his actions.

33 The Jews replied that the issue was not the quality of his works but his blasphemous claim to be God. Had Jesus not meant to convey a claim to deity, he undoubtedly would have protested the action of the Jews by declaring that they had misunderstood him.

34–35 On the contrary, Jesus introduced an a fortiori argument from the Psalms to strengthen his statement. Psalm 82:6 represents God as addressing a group of beings whom he calls "gods" and "sons of the Most High." If, then, these terms can be applied to ordinary mortals or even angels, how could Jesus be accused of blasphemy when he applied them to himself, the One whom the Father set apart and sent into the world on a special mission? Jesus was not offering a false claim; he was merely asserting what he was by right.

The parenthetic statement "and the Scripture cannot be broken" illustrates the high regard Jesus had for the OT. Throughout this gospel the constant assumption is that Scripture is the revelation of God, setting the timing, content, and character of Jesus' ministry (see 1:45; 2:22; 3:14–15; 5:39; et al.). Such passages presuppose a confidence in the authority and trustworthiness of Scripture that is in keeping with Jesus' attitude.

36 Jesus unmistakably refers to himself as "God's Son [GK 5626]" To him it was not a strained assertion but a logical statement, for he was fully aware of his relation to the Father and to the responsibility the Father had committed to him. The accusation of blasphemy seems to be utterly unreasonable in the light of that relationship.

37–39 Jesus' appeal to his opponents summed up the attitude and method of his argument. He took his position, not on the basis of his personal authority, but on the attestation of his "miracles." If they showed that he was demonstrating divine compassion and exercising divine authority over people and matter, he was divinely accredited. Those miracles were peculiarly expressive of his nature and revealed his personality and mission. For those predisposed not to believe in him, he offered pragmatic proof of his special relationship with God: "The Father is in me, and I in the Father." The appeal failed; and once again "they tried to seize him, but he escaped their grasp."

40–42 Having eluded their attempt to capture him, Jesus retreated to Perea, on the east side of the Jordan, which was the domain of Herod Antipas and where the rulers in Jerusalem had no authority. There he would be comparatively safe from arrest. There also he found a better reception, for "many believed on him." The Jews' allusion to the testimony of John the Baptist indicates that his ministry had enduring influence, and they accepted Jesus on that basis. As in the case of the woman of Samaria, faith in Christ was preceded by the witness of another.

4. The miracle at Bethany (11:1–44)

a. The announcement of death (11:1–16)

The account of the raising of Lazarus is the climactic sign in the gospel of John. Each of Jesus' seven signs illustrates some particular aspect of his divine authority (cf. comment on 5:36), but this one exemplifies his power over the last and most irresistible enemy of humanity—death. For this reason it is given a prominent place in the gospel. It is also significant because it precipitated the decision of Jesus' enemies to do away with him. Furthermore, this episode contains a strong personal command to believe in Jesus in a crisis, when such belief would be most difficult. All that preceded in John is preparatory; all that follows it is the unfolding of a well-marked plot.

1–2 At this point Lazarus is introduced, though Mary and Martha are mentioned in Luke (10:38–42). Apparently Jesus was frequently a guest in their home when he visited Jerusalem (cf. Mk 11:11). Of Lazarus, however, nothing is known apart from John. The identification of Mary by the action recorded later in this gospel (12:1–10) is unusual, unless the author presupposed some knowledge of her action on the reader's part. John mentions it in order to identify Lazarus and to indicate Jesus' relations with the family.

3 Knowing Jesus' interest in them and the power of God to heal the sick, the sisters sent for him when Lazarus became ill. The malady must have been serious, for they were sufficiently alarmed to call Jesus back to the area where a price had been set on his head. The appeal was on the basis of love, and they felt confident that he would be prompt.

4–6 Jesus' reaction was optimistic and purposeful. He gave assurance to the disciples that Lazarus's illness would not terminate in death, and stated that Lazarus's illness would be an important aspect of his own glorification. Having said that, he deliberately stayed in Perea two more days. His action may have appeared to the disciples, and almost certainly to the sisters, as unfeeling and selfish. Since he had the power to heal Lazarus, why should he not reply instantly (cf. Lk 7:11–16; 8:41–42, 49–56)? Perhaps the disciples were not particularly puzzled, for their subsequent remarks indicated that they were well aware of the danger that threatened him in Jerusalem.

7–8 His proposal to the disciples that they should return to Judea was not welcomed with enthusiasm. They remembered the previous conflicts with the rulers and feared for Jesus' life, and possibly for their own as well.

9–10 Jesus countered the disciples' objection with this most enigmatic statement. That expression may have been a current proverb, perhaps similar to his remark in 9:4. In both instances, Jesus was thinking of his obligation to perform the work the Father had committed to him. Realizing that he was acting in accord with that purpose, Jesus resolutely decided to return to Jerusalem in spite of the peril. To digress from God's purpose is to walk in darkness; to remain in fellowship with God is to walk in the light (cf. 1Jn 1:6).

11–13 In order to explain his action, Jesus decided to educate his disciples by informing them that Lazarus was asleep and that he intended to wake him. Their interest and loyalty were plainly revealed by their willingness to listen to him and to move back into the area of danger if he so desired. The disciples, however, lacked imagination and took literally Jesus' announcement that Lazarus had fallen asleep. Assuming that "sleep" would mean that the fever had passed its crisis, they expressed their hope for Lazarus's recovery. But Jesus was using the word "sleep" (GK 5678) in a figurative sense, meaning "death." This does not mean that the dead are in a state of total unconsciousness, for Jesus' illustration of the rich man and the beggar predicates consciousness after death (Lk 16:19–31). It does show that Jesus looked on the death of Lazarus as a parenthesis after which there would be an awakening, not as a permanent removal from life.

14–15 Jesus' rejoinder to the disciples' comment made Lazarus's state unmistakable: "Lazarus is dead, and for your sake I am glad I was not there, so that you may believe." These words seem strange. Why should Jesus be glad that he was not present to save Lazarus from death or to comfort the sisters, and why should Lazarus's death bring any benefit to the disciples? Jesus considered this an opportunity for a supreme demonstration of power that would certify the Father's accreditation of him as the Son and confirm the faith of the sisters and the disciples. He was certain of the outcome.

16 Thomas's comment marks his first appearance in this book. John's gospel does not contain a complete list of the Twelve, though they are mentioned as a group on two occasions (6:67, 70–71; 20:24). Generally they are presented only as individuals and once in the Epilogue as a smaller group (21:1–2). Thomas appears four times: here, once in the discourse in the upper room (14:5), once after the Resurrection (20:24–29), and finally with the group described in the Epilogue (21:1). His attitude here is paradoxical: "Let us also go, that we may die with him [Jesus]." Thomas expected that Jesus would be seized and executed and that his disciples would suffer with him. Notwithstanding this unhappy prospect, Thomas's loyalty is revealed by his readiness to share Jesus' peril. The skepticism that he later evinced regarding the Resurrection was probably prompted by grief over Jesus' death rather than by disillusionment because of apparent failure.

b. The conversation with Martha and Mary (11:17–37)

17–18 The time between Lazarus's death and Jesus' arrival at Bethany was four days. Two full days had intervened between the arrival of the messengers and Jesus' departure for Bethany (v.6). The trip to Bethany would have taken at least a day, since Bethany was more than twenty miles distant from Jesus' refuge in Perea (10:40–42). So the death of Lazarus must have occurred not long after Jesus was first informed of his illness. After three days all hope of resuscitation from a coma would be abandoned; and in the hot Palestinian climate, decay would have begun.

19 The family at Bethany must have been well known in Jerusalem, since many "Jews" came to comfort Martha and Mary over the loss of Lazarus. A procession composed of relatives, friends, and sometimes hired mourners accompanied a body to the grave; and mourning usually lasted for several days afterward.

20 Martha, the more aggressive sister, went to meet Jesus, while quiet and contemplative

Mary stayed home. This portrayal of the sisters agrees with that found in Lk 10:38–42.

21–22 The words Martha addressed to Jesus express both a repressed reproach and a persistent faith. She was disappointed that Jesus had not responded to the first news of Lazarus's illness, but that did not lead her to break her relationship with him. Despite her remorse, she was confident that God would grant Jesus' desire in this matter.

23–26 Martha interpreted Jesus' promise (v.23) that her brother would rise again in terms of the expectation of a general resurrection. She may have taken his words as a conventional expression of comfort; he intended them to describe what he would do. In his reply, Jesus turned Martha's acceptance of a dogma into faith in his person. In what is surely one of his most majestic and comforting utterances, Jesus said that he embodied the vital power to bring the dead to life (vv.25–26). The one who believes in Christ has eternal life that transcends physical death. Those who live and believe will never die but will make an instant transition from the old life to the new life (cf. 1Th 4:16–17). On this basis, he asked her directly whether she believed.

27 Martha's commitment reveals a firm belief that Jesus was the Messiah, the Son of God, as preached by John the Baptist (1:34) and accepted by the disciples (1:49; 6:68), and the deliverer foretold by the prophets. Her language is emphatic.

29–30 Martha told Mary that Jesus was asking for her. To Mary, this was equivalent to a command to come. Her subsequent actions, though less assertive, reveal a trust in Jesus similar to Martha's. Jesus was waiting for her outside the town.

31 The Jews knew something was afoot when Mary left so hastily. Since they had come to mourn with the sisters, they thought it only fitting to follow her, supposing that she was going to the tomb.

32–35 Mary's greeting to Jesus was similar to Martha's. The response of Jesus to this calamity illustrates his human and divine natures. Up to this point he had been perfectly calm, assuring Martha that her brother would rise and asserting that he was the resurrection and the life. He was completely in command of the situation and challenged Martha's faith. But when Mary appeared, crushed with sorrow and accompanied by the waiting mourners, Jesus was moved with deep emotion.

His feeling is expressed by three words: "deeply moved" (GK 1839), "troubled" (v.33; GK 5435), and "wept" (v.35). The first of these connotes anger. Perhaps Jesus was expressing his resentment against the ravages of death that had entered the human world because of sin. The second word expresses agitation. That is, Jesus was not apathetic or unnerved by the prevailing mood of sorrow. Lazarus had been a beloved friend, and Jesus shared in the common feeling of grief over his death. Overcome by emotion, he spontaneously burst into tears.

36–37 Jesus' true humanity was emphasized by the response of the people at Lazarus's tomb. Some were impressed by Jesus' open show of emotion and took it as an evident token of his love for Lazarus. Others, perhaps not so lovingly, wondered why Jesus had not prevented Lazarus's death by one of his miracles. The reference to the healing of the blind man again (cf. 10:21) shows that it must have created a sensation in Jerusalem since it was remembered several months after it had occurred.

c. The raising of Lazarus (11:38–44)

38 The repetition of "deeply moved" from v.33 shows that Jesus was still under the same emotional tension that his first contact with the mourners had aroused. He planned to fulfill his prediction to the disciples that the outcome of Lazarus's death would be to the glory of God, as well as keep his promise to Martha that her brother would rise again. The burial place was a chamber cut in limestone rock and closed by a stone laid over the entrance.

39–40 Having challenged Martha's faith, Jesus now faced a challenge of his own. He ordered the covering stone to be removed. Martha's protest was natural, for it would seem improper to expose a decaying corpse. Such an act would demonstrate her faith and remove her uncertainty and hesitancy so that the glory of God might be revealed to her and all present. To Jesus the raising of Lazarus presented no problem.

41–42 When Martha met his condition, which was the last step of faith she could take, Jesus took the next step. He did not ask God to raise Lazarus; he thanked him for having already answered his prayer. So great was Jesus' faith in the Father that he assumed that this miracle, so necessary to his mission, was as good as done. His main reason for raising Lazarus was to convince the assembled people that he had been sent by the Father.

43–44 Having uttered this prayer, Jesus addressed the dead man. He had said on a previous occasion that a time would come when all who were in their graves would hear his voice (5:28). This occasion was a remarkable demonstration of that authority. The words spoken were brief and direct, and can be paraphrased, "Lazarus! This way out!" as if Jesus were directing someone lost in a gloomy dungeon. The creative power of God reversed the process of corruption and quickened the corpse into life. The effect was startling. The dead man appeared at the entrance to the tomb, still bound by his graveclothes. Jesus then ordered that he be released from the wrappings and returned to normal life. It was a supreme demonstration of the power of eternal life that triumphed over death, corruption, and hopelessness.

5. The decision to kill Jesus (11:45–57)

45–46 The response to the sign was twofold. "Many" of the Jews believed on the basis of the evidence they had seen, for the fact of Lazarus's restoration was incontrovertible. In contrast, others went to inform the religious leaders of Jesus' action, apparently as a gesture of disapproval. It seems unlikely that any of the believing Jews made up the delegation that went to the Pharisees.

47–48 As a result of Jesus' miracle in Bethany, a meeting of the Sanhedrin was called. The council expressed not only disapproval but also frustration. They anticipated that the miracles of Jesus would bring such a wave of popular support that the Romans, fearing a revolution, would intervene by seizing complete authority, thus displacing the Jewish government and destroying the national identity. Their fears revealed a complete misunderstanding of the motives of Jesus, who had no political ambitions whatever. He had already indicated by his refusal to be made king that he had no intention of organizing a revolt against Rome (cf. 6:15).

49–50 Caiaphas, the high priest, was the son-in-law of Annas, who is mentioned later in the account of Jesus' trial (18:12–14). Annas had been high priest from A.D. 7 to 14 and was succeeded by three of his sons and finally by Caiaphas from A.D. 18 to 36. The utterance of Caiaphas reveals his cynicism and duplicity. He was contemptuous of the indecisive attitude of the Pharisees and recommended the elimination of Jesus rather than risking the possibility of a long contest with Rome.

51–52 John takes Caiaphas's statement as a kind of double entendre, an unconscious and involuntary prophecy that Jesus would become the sacrifice for the nation so that it might not perish. The irony of the statement is paralleled by the record of the rulers' mockery of Jesus at the Crucifixion (see Mk 15:31). In both instances a sneering remark expressed an unintended truth. The statement of Caiaphas is applied by the author not only to the nation of Israel, but also to the "children of God" who have been scattered throughout the world. These words might apply to the Jews of the Dispersion. But in the light of the universalism of this gospel, they probably refer to the future ingathering of the Gentiles, who become the children of God when they acknowledge Jesus as Savior (1:12; 10:16).

53 The growing hostility of the Pharisaic party and of the Sadducean priesthood had developed into a settled decision to do away with Jesus. Although the hierarchy feared a popular uprising in his support, they were resolute that he should die.

54 For this reason Jesus left Bethany, where danger threatened him, and removed to Ephraim, a village north of Jerusalem. This town was on the edge of the Judean desert, into which Jesus could flee if necessary.

55–56 Just before the Passover, pilgrims from distant parts of the country began to assemble in Jerusalem. Ceremonial cleansing would take considerable time when a large crowd was involved, and the people wanted to be ready to participate in the sacred feast. Jesus had been present in Jerusalem at the Feasts of Tabernacles and Dedication and had been regularly engaged in teaching. Since the Passover would bring an even larger crowd to Jerusalem, the populace expected that Jesus would be there also. His previous visits had been accompanied by much controversy, and there had been several futile attempts to arrest or stone him (cf. 5:18; 7:30, 44; 8:20, 59; 10:38). On each occasion, however, he had eluded his enemies, for "his time had not come."

57 The high council of Judaism had issued a warrant for Jesus' arrest and had ordered that anyone who knew of his whereabouts should declare it. In the light of this situation, one can conclude that Judas was a messianist loyal to his nation and that his loyalty to the ruling priesthood took precedence over his personal loyalty to Jesus.

F. The Crisis of the Ministry (12:1–50)

Chapter 12 of John is devoted to the crisis of Jesus' ministry that preceded its conclusion. As previously noted, the hostility of the religious authorities had been increasing and had intensified because they had been unable to entangle Jesus in any compromising dilemma or defeat him in public debate. In spite of a decline in his popularity because he refused to become involved in a political coup (6:15) and because some of his teaching was obscure to his listeners (6:52–66), he still retained a loyal group of disciples; and a large segment of the populace still regarded him with awe. They hoped that he might still decide to use his miraculous powers on their behalf and establish a new political and economic order that would make Israel dominant among the nations.

For Jesus himself, the period was critical because the forces for and against him were crystallizing, and he had to make a decision as to which way he should turn. He had been living by a program that had been established by the Father and was outlined progressively by Scripture and experience. No doubt the temptation to deviate from it for considerations of power or safety was always with him (Lk 4:13). Now, as the moment for the fulfillment of the divine purpose approached, the tension increased.

1. The dinner at Bethany (12:1–11)

1–2 At this point Jesus' time schedule becomes more definite than previously in this gospel. Martha and Mary gave a dinner for Jesus. The notation that Lazarus was among the guests seems unnecessary at first reading. If the dinner was an expression of gratitude for the restoration of Lazarus (ch. 11), he would naturally be expected to attend it. Perhaps the writer is suggesting that after Lazarus's restoration to life he retired from any public appearance since he did not want to be an object of curiosity (cf. v.9). On this occasion he may have come out of seclusion to honor Jesus.

3 The anointing of Jesus' feet by Mary was not difficult because of the custom of reclining to eat instead of sitting at a table. Guests usually reclined on divans with their heads near the table. They leaned on cushions with one arm and ate with the other. Mary could easily have slipped from her couch, walked around the other couches, and poured the ointment on Jesus' feet.

Spices and ointments were quite costly because they had to be imported. Mary's offering was valued at approximately a year's wages for an ordinary working person. She presented it as an offering of love and gratitude, prompted by Jesus' restoration of her brother to the family circle. Wiping his feet with her hair was a gesture of utmost devotion and reverence. The penetrating fragrance of the ointment that filled the house told all present of her sacrificial gift.

4–6 Judas Iscariot reappears here (cf. 6:70–71, the only previous mention of him in this gospel). Jesus knew Judas's tendencies and was well aware of his coming defection. Whereas many of Jesus' disciples had deserted him (6:66), Judas remained to betray him. He was determined to make Jesus serve his purpose—by treachery if necessary.

Judas had been appointed treasurer of the band of disciples, but he had been using his office for his own enrichment. His remonstrance over Mary's gift revealed that he had a sharp sense of financial values and no appreciation of human values.

7–8 Mary seems to have been the only one who was sensitive to the impending death of Jesus and who was willing to give a material expression of her esteem for him. Jesus' reply shows his appreciation of her act of devotion. His words disclose also the current of his thought, for he was anticipating death. His comment on the poor was not a justification for tolerating unnecessary poverty; but it was a hint to Judas that if he were really concerned about the poor, he would never lack opportunity to aid them. Mary and Judas stand in sharp contrast to each other.

9–11 The response of the crowds to Jesus brought another crisis to his enemies. So many were becoming his followers that the priestly party was sure that their fears as expressed by Caiaphas were justified. Their resolution to destroy Jesus was strengthened, and in their wild madness of unbelief they even contemplated the possibility of removing Lazarus, since his restoration to life was an undeniable witness to Jesus' power.

2. The entry into Jerusalem (12:12–19)

12 This story is one that also appears in the Synoptic Gospels (Mt 21:1–11; Mk 11:1–10; Lk 19:28–40). John identifies two distinct multitudes: the larger one was composed of the "great crowd" of pilgrims who had come to Jerusalem for the Passover and were already there (v.12); the other one was those who were traveling with Jesus and had witnessed the raising of Lazarus (v.17).

13 If the former crowd came from Galilee, they would be well aware of Jesus' works there; a number of them had probably wished for a long time that he would declare himself as the expected Messiah. They applied to him the words of Ps 118:25–26, a song customarily sung by Passover pilgrims on their way to Jerusalem. These words ascribed to him a messianic title as the agent of the Lord, the coming king of Israel.

14–15 The entry into Jerusalem was Jesus' announcement that his hour had come and that he was ready for action, though not according to the expectation of the people. He did not come as a conqueror but as a messenger of peace. He rode on a common donkey, not a royal steed. John couples this entry with a prophecy of Zechariah (9:9), who announced that the king of Israel would appear in humility without pomp and ceremony. The pilgrims who had come to Jerusalem to attend the feast went out to greet Jesus; the other crowd gathered in his train. "Hosanna" is a Hebrew expression meaning literally "Save now!" (see comment on Mk 11:9). It may be interpreted as a plea for immediate action on the part of the king (cf. v.13). "Daughter of Zion" is a personification of the city of Jerusalem; it occurs frequently in the OT, especially in the later prophets (Isa 1:8; 52:2; Jer 4:31; Mic 4:8; Zec 2:10; et al.).

16 This parenthetical statement by the author states that the disciples did not then understand the situation but that they later comprehended it (cf. 2:17, 22). His comments demonstrate that the gospel must have been written when he and the others had attained a spiritual perception they did not possess in the years of their travels with Jesus. The Passion and the Resurrection were keys in unlocking the mystery of Jesus' person.

17–18 The second group in this account consists of those who were following Jesus, some of whom had witnessed the raising of Lazarus in Bethany. These people continued to publicize Jesus' miracle and aroused the curiosity of many in the city. These, in turn, joined the crowd that was on the way to meet Jesus as he neared Jerusalem.

19 The convergence of the pilgrims from a distance with Jesus' enthusiastic supporters from Jerusalem made a popular following that caused the rulers to become apprehensive. They felt that their attempts to stop Jesus were too few and too late.

3. The response to the Greeks (12:20–36)

20 Another element that contributed to the crisis was the request of the Greeks to see Jesus. They were probably Gentile Greeks who had joined the Jewish pilgrims to Jerusalem—inquirers, possibly from Galilee or the Decapolis, who had become interested in the Jewish faith but had not become full proselytes.

21–22 Just why these Greeks approached Philip rather than one of the other disciples is not stated. Philip in turn referred them to Andrew, and both of them carried the request to Jesus himself.

23 Curiously enough, John never writes whether Jesus either gave these Greeks an audience or sent a reply back to them. Nevertheless, Jesus' action itself is an answer to their inquiry, because he announced openly that the great hour of his life had arrived. He felt the pressure of the Gentile world and realized that the time had come to open the way to God for the Gentiles and to fuse Jewish and Gentile believers into one body. To accomplish this objective, he had to sacrifice himself (cf. 10:16).

24 The likeness of the grain of wheat that is buried in the cold soil only to rise again multiplied for harvest is applicable to all believers in Christ. Until the seed is planted in the ground and dies, it bears no fruit; and if it is sacrificed, it produces a large crop. This also served as a metaphor for Jesus' own life's plan.

25 The man who attempts to preserve his life will lose it, while the man who readily sacrifices his life will keep it for eternal life. The two words translated "life" are different (GK 6034 & 2437) . The first is generally rendered "soul" and denotes the individual personality, with all its related experiences and achievements. The second is usually coupled with the adjective "eternal" in John and means the spiritual vitality that is the experience of God (17:3; cf. Mt 10:39; Mk 8:36; Lk 14:26).

The expression "who hates his life" is a hyperbolic expression which means that one is to base one's priorities on that which is outside oneself. In this instance, it is to make Christ the Master of one's life.

26 In this verse, Jesus explained what hating one's life means. The impending Cross would involve the disciples in the same way it would involve Jesus, and he was informing them that he was the model for them to follow (cf. his discourse on the Good Shepherd; 10:4). "Going ahead of them" implies that he does first what he asks them to do and that he confronts the dangers before they encounter them. Jesus went on to promise that wherever he might go, his servants would be privileged to accompany him and share his glory (cf. 17:24).

27–28a Turning from how the crisis would affect the disciples, Jesus revealed how it affected him. His dilemma here corresponds to what happened in Gethsemane as recorded in Mt 26:36–46; Mk 14:32–42; Lk 22:40–46. John reveals that that struggle, which he does not record, was the culmination of an earlier struggle. In these words spoken publicly in the period of crisis, Jesus indicates that he is breaking under the strain of the crisis; its dangers and irrationality are overwhelming him. Should he ask the Father to spare him from the cataclysm that was so rapidly approaching? Had he done so, he might have averted seeming disaster at the price of failing to achieve his redemptive purpose. But Jesus adhered boldly to his original purpose of completing the mission God had entrusted to him. His resolution was final. He wanted the Father's name to be glorified, no matter what the cost!

28b–30 The voice from heaven is the third and final instance recorded in the gospel narratives, and the only one in John (cf. the voice at his baptism, Mt 3:17; Mk 1: 11; Lk 3:21–22; and at his transfiguration, Mt 17:5; Mk 9:7; Lk 9:35). On each occasion it was a public acknowledgment of the sonship and authority of Jesus and an endorsement of his work by the Father. John asserts unmistakably that the voice was a genuine, audible sound, though the crowd did not understand it. Jesus explained that the voice from heaven was intended to encourage the disciples and to inform the crowd, not to encourage him.

31 Jesus recognized and announced unmistakably that the final crisis had arrived. Both the disciples and the more sympathetic segment of the crowd were uncertain of what his fate would be (see 6:60–66; 7:25–27, 40–44; 10:19–24; 11:55–56). Now he declared that a decisive action must follow. God's purpose is to glorify him. The hour for judgment has come, and the prince of the world must be exposed for what he is. "Judgment" (GK 3213) does not imply that the final day of judgment has come or that only now is retribution for sin exercised. Jesus conveyed the meaning that God, having now made his final revelation, must hold people responsible for their obedience or disobedience (cf. also Ac 17:30–31). The revelation of God in Christ is itself a disclosure of sin and a judgment on it.

"The prince of this world" can be none other than Satan (cf. 14:30; 16:11; similarly in 2Co 4:4; Eph 2:2; 6:12). The Cross and the Resurrection spelled Satan's defeat and marked the glorification of all Satan renounced and the reversal of all he sought to attain. Satan was motivated by self-will; Jesus, by the will of the Father. Satan's power brought destruction and death; Jesus' power imparted renewal and life. Though Satan is still active, his action is only the desperation of futility (cf. Rev 12:12).

32–33 The preposition "from" (GK 1666) means "out from" rather than "away from." It connotes not only being lifted or suspended above the earth, as on a cross, but also being brought up out of the earth. Jesus had in mind not only the fact that he would be elevated on the cross but also that he would be exalted by the Resurrection (see also 3:14; 8:28; 12:32, 34). Elsewhere in the NT the verb "lifted up" does mean "exalt" (GK 5738; see comment on 3:14). Thus, it lends itself well to the double meaning of the method of death as specifically stated here and the exaltation to spiritual sovereignty as described in apostolic preaching (Ac 2:33; 5:31; Php 2:9).

"All men" does not imply that everyone will ultimately be saved; instead, it means that Christ draws people to himself indiscriminately, without regard to nationality, race, or status. Jesus' utterance was prompted by the presence of the Greek Gentiles (v.20) and should be evaluated in that context. Note that there is a clear differentiation between believers and unbelievers, between the saved and the lost, in John's writings (cf. 1:11; 3:18, 36; 5:29; et al.; 1Jn 3:10, 15; 5:12).

34 The crowd was puzzled by Jesus' prediction of his death. According to their understanding, the Messiah would be a supernatural person who would inaugurate his final and eternal reign as God's Anointed, the Son of David. In the OT (expressed by the word "Law" here), God promised to David that his descendants would reign "forever" (2Sa 7:12–13, 16; cf. Ps 89:26–29, 35–36). The people were confused by Jesus' reference to the "Son of Man" and wanted to know who he was.

Although John 12:32 uses the first person pronoun "I" rather than "Son of Man," Jesus undoubtedly was speaking of himself by this title (see comment on Mk 8:31). The query of the crowd, "Who is this 'Son of Man'?" implies that his concept of its meaning was different from theirs. To them, the apocalyptic Son of Man (cf. Da 7:13–14) would not die. Jesus was enlarging the concept of "Son of Man" by applying it to the whole of his work: his true humanity, his suffering, his exaltation, and his judicial work.

35–36 Jesus spoke with urgency. The light would not always be available (cf. 9:4). If his hearers wished to walk with certainty, they should act at once, for after his departure they might find themselves in the darkness. "Put your trust" implies a persistent faith, not solely a momentary decision (cf. 14:1).

4. The response to unbelief (12:37–50)

Verses 37–50 are the author's explanation of the significance of his narrative up to this point. They focus on the conflict of belief and unbelief and include Jesus' final appeal for decision. The historical crisis must be resolved by immediate action that reveals either the belief or unbelief of those involved. The spiritual crisis that occurs when one confronts Christ is resolved through personal decision.

37–38 The author expresses surprise and regret that in spite of Jesus' numerous "signs" the people still obstinately refused to believe in him. Unbelief was rapidly approaching the climax attained in the rejection and crucifixion of Jesus. John connected this with the prophecy of Isaiah, thus plainly affirming that Jesus was the subject of the passage on the Suffering Servant (Isa 52:13–53:12; John quotes 53:1). Parts of this prophecy are quoted repeatedly in the NT (Mt 8:17; Lk 22:37; Ac 8:32–33; Ro 10:16; 15:21; 1Pe 2:22, 24–25), and it is an important basis for the doctrine of the Atonement. Prophecy repeatedly played a large part in apostolic preaching (e.g., Ac 2:17–35; 3:18, 21, 24).

39–40 Not only did prophecy describe unbelief, it also explained it. Why should the hearers of Jesus not believe in him when the signs so unmistakably accredited his claims? John quotes from Isa 6 (the story of Isaiah's commission) to show that unbelief is the result of the rejection of light, which act, by the sovereign law of God, gradually makes belief impossible. God warned the prophet in advance that his mission would not be successful, for the hearts of those who heard him would be hardened. John interprets this prophecy by its effect rather than by its intention. It was not God's desire to alienate his people; but without the offer of faith and repentance, they would never turn to him anyway. The cumulative effect of unbelief is a hardened attitude that becomes more impenetrable as time progresses.

41 The implication in this verse is startling. Isaiah 6 opens by Isaiah saying that he saw the Lord (Isa 6:1, 5). John now claims that Isaiah saw Jesus and spoke of him. In other words, he identified Jesus with the Lord (Heb. "Yahweh"; GK 3378) of the OT.

42–43 John notes that many of the leaders believed (including probably Joseph of Arimathea and Nicodemus; cf. 19:38–39; Mk 15:43; Lk 23:50–51). Possibly John learned of this movement among the national leaders through his acquaintance with Nicodemus. Since the attitude of the council as a whole would call for the excommunication of any avowed believers in Jesus (Jn 9:22), these people remained silent.

44–46 Jesus equated belief in him with belief in God (cf. John 14:1; 1Jn 2:23). The Father and the Son are inseparable; though they are two personalities, they work as one being. Jesus spoke of the Father as the one who had sent him, and he claimed to be the light that illumines the darkness of those who are without God.

47–50 Judgment on unbelief is not arbitrary but inevitable. The message of Christ will become the condemnation in the last days of any who refuse it, since nobody who refused it can plead ignorance. Jesus' emphasis, however, is positive. His mission was intended to evoke belief and to rescue humans from darkness. The Father's sovereign purpose is to lift people out of helplessness and death and give them eternal life. Because Jesus speaks the message the Father commanded him to speak, he is the Word of God.

At this point John closes the account of Jesus' public ministry of teaching. Subsequently he taught only the disciples and prepared them for the final act of his life.

III. The Private Ministry of the Word (13:1–17:26)

A. The Last Supper (13:1–30)

1. The washing of feet (13:1–20)

1 The full Johannine account of the Passion begins at this point. John alludes to the nearness of the Passover as if to remind his reader that Jesus had been introduced by John the Baptist as the "Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world" (1:29). As the first Passover had been the turning point in the redemption of the people of God, so the Cross would be the opening of a new era for believers. John connects this with the manifestation of Jesus' love for "his own" (i.e., his disciples), a love that has no limits. Jesus had accepted the responsibility for them and was obliged to instruct and protect them (17:6–12).

2 Whether this meal was the actual Passover or not has been warmly debated. It seems to have occurred on the same night as the arrest and betrayal. If so, it was presumably Thursday night, and the Crucifixion occurred on Friday. John stated later (18:28) that the Jewish delegates could not enter Pilate's hall on Friday morning because they would be defiled and unable to eat the Passover. In that case, the Last Supper must have preceded the Passover by twenty-four hours. If, then, the Passover began on Friday night, the meal that took place on Thursday night would not have been the standard Passover Feast. The question is complicated by the fact, however, that the Synoptics imply that Jesus did intend to eat the Passover with his disciples (Mt 26:17–20; Mk 14:12–17; Lk 22:7–14). No mention is made of the Passover lamb, however.

Of all the suggestions regarding this problem, two are plausible. (1) Two calendars were in simultaneous use: one national group, using one calendar, ate the Passover on Thursday night whereas the other group, using the other calendar, ate the Passover on Friday night. (2) Jesus, having been repudiated by the priesthood and consequently considered apostate, would not have been allowed to obtain a lamb for sacrifice and would have been compelled to celebrate the feast at a different time. Whatever solution may be accepted, it seems clear that Jesus did celebrate the meal with his disciples on Thursday night, that the hearing before Pilate and the Crucifixion took place on Friday when the other Passover lambs were being sacrificed, and that his body was placed in the tomb before sunset late that afternoon.

The focus of action in this section lies in Jesus' washing the feet of the disciples. By this time, Judas had already determined to betray Jesus. His specific motive is not stated, and the impulse is attributed to satanic suggestion. In other words, the conflict was basically actuated by a rebellion against God. It is possible that Judas, realizing that Jesus' enemies were implacably hostile and were politically powerful, concluded that Jesus was doomed to lose in the struggle and so decided that he might as well gain immunity from sharing Jesus' fate. Furthermore, he could compensate himself by claiming the reward for betrayal. His act, however, was more serious than an incidental piece of treachery; he sold himself to the power of evil (cf. v.27).

3–5 John emphasizes the fact that Jesus was not the innocent victim of a plot, unaware of what was transpiring around him. Rather, he was fully aware of his authority, his divine origin, and his destiny. John says much more about the inner consciousness of Jesus than the Synoptics do, either because he was more observant or because Jesus confided in him.

The immediate situation was that they had come to the banquet room directly from the street. Ordinarily on such an occasion the host would have delegated a servant to the menial task of removing the sandals of the guests and washing their feet. Since the meeting was obviously intended to be secret, no servants were present. None of the disciples was ready to volunteer for such a task, for each would have considered it an admission of inferiority to all the others (cf. 1:27).

Sometime during the meal Jesus rose, removed his outer cloak, tied a towel around his waist, and began to perform the work of the servant who was not present. It was a voluntary humiliation that rebuked the pride of the disciples. Perhaps it accentuated the tension of the situation, because Luke notes that when the disciples entered the room, they were arguing about who among them would be the greatest in the kingdom of heaven (Lk 22:24).

6–8a The response of Simon Peter may have been representative of the common feeling that Jesus ought not to demean himself by washing their feet. He reveals both the impetuousness of his disposition and the high regard he had for Jesus.

8b Jesus' rejoinder expresses the necessity, not only for the cleansing of Peter's feet to make him socially acceptable for the dinner, but also for the cleansing of his personality to make him fit for the kingdom of God. The external washing was intended to be a picture of spiritual cleansing from evil.

9–10 Peter, mistaking Jesus' veiled figure for the literal act, expressed his devotion by asking for a bath. Separation from Jesus was abhorrent to him. Jesus reminded him that a person once bathed needed to wash only his feet. "You are clean, though not every one of you" gives the clue to the interpretation of this action. One of the disciples had consistently refused Jesus' spiritual ministration. The others, who had been loyal though sometimes slow to understand, needed only occasional correction.

11 This gospel emphasizes strongly the self-consciousness of Jesus concerning himself and his work. From the beginning of his ministry he had supernatural discernment of the potentialities of his disciples (1:42, 47–48, 51). He predicted his death and resurrection (2:19; 3:14; 6:51; 8:28; 10:18; 12:32). He claimed a peculiar relationship with God (5:19, 26; 10:38). Now, at the close of his ministry, the gospel emphasizes even more strongly his supernatural awareness of the significance of what was occurring. Jesus realized that the time had come to leave his disciples (13:1), that the Father had committed all action to his authority (v.3), that the betrayer was already at hand (vv.10–11), that the identity of the chosen believers was settled (v.18), that the outcome of the existing situation was fixed (v.19; cf. 18:4), and, finally, that the moment of consummation had come (v.21; cf. 19:28).

12–14 A second lesson Jesus wished to impart to the disciples by this act was one of love and humble service. His question, "Do you understand what I have done for you?" contrasts with his remonstrance of Peter in v.7. The discernment of the disciples developed slowly. It took them a long time to begin to comprehend the intensity of Jesus' love for them and the nature of his humility in dealing with them. "Teacher" and "Lord" are both titles of respect that placed Jesus on a level above the disciples. Jesus went on to emphasize the fact that his actions as their leader should set the pattern for dedicated living (see also Mt 10:24; Lk 6:40; Jn 15:20). The concept of the servant-master relationship appears frequently in Jesus' teaching.

15 The "example" does not necessarily imply the perpetuation of footwashing as an ordinance in the church. Rather, Jesus put his emphasis on the inner attitude of humble and voluntary service for others (see the fuller explanation of this in Php 2:4–8).

16–17 The recurrence of "sent" (GK 4287) here is a reminder that Jesus was constantly conscious of being commissioned by the Father. Jesus included his disciples both in his commission and in his action of servanthood. The true nature of Christian living was serving one another. And for those who would be willing to take this role on themselves, Jesus said there would be blessings.

18 Jesus' reason for washing the disciples' feet was not solely good manners and sanitation. The imminence of the betrayal was pressing in on him, and the resultant anguish was tearing at his heart. He knew that the disciples would fail at the crucial moment, but he despaired of none except Judas. The psalm Jesus quoted is attributed to David, who was lamenting the defection of a trusted confidant (Ps 41:9). This likely refers to Ahithophel, who had been David's counselor and diplomatic advisor but deserted him in Absalom's rebellion (2Sa 15:12; 16:15–23; 17:4, 14, 23). Again this is an example of prophecy by parallelism.

19–20 Jesus was not merely asking for personal loyalty but for belief that he was the One sent by God (cf. 8:24, 28, 58). He wanted the disciples to commit themselves to his claims before other events would seemingly invalidate them and before the Resurrection would confirm them (cf. 2:22). He went on to say that accepting the messenger whom he sent was equivalent to receiving him and that receiving him involved also receiving God. The language implies a close connection between the disciple and the master and an equally close connection between Jesus and God.

2. The prediction of the betrayal (13:21–30)

21 Jesus was not surprised that Judas would betray him. He had announced it to the disciples at least a year earlier (6:70). Nevertheless, it "troubled" him immensely (the same verb is used of Jesus' agitation in 11:33 and 12:27). As "the hour" approached, the bitterness of the betrayal Jesus anticipated became known.

22 The announcement startled the disciples. Although Jesus had previously mentioned the betrayal, they had not taken it to heart. Now, realizing the hostility of the authorities in Jerusalem and knowing that Jesus' death might be imminent, the act that had seemed remote became an immediate possibility.

23–25 Peter signaled to the disciple who occupied the place next to Jesus and "whom Jesus loved" (presumably John), asking him to inquire who the traitor might be. His inquiry demonstrated not only a persistent trait of curiosity but also Peter's loyalty. He may have contemplated preventive action; for if he could know in advance who the person might be, he could intervene.

26 Jesus gave no specific identification. He simply indicated that the offender would be the one to whom he would give the special morsel he had dipped into the dish. For the host to select a tidbit from the main dish and give it to a guest would be a mark of courtesy and esteem. The disciples, seeing this, would conclude only that Jesus regarded Judas as a close friend. While Jesus' reply would answer the question for the beloved disciple, he could scarcely have communicated his knowledge to Peter at that moment without disturbing the peace of the group.

27a "Satan entered into him." This moment was Judas's last opportunity to renounce his treachery. If the other disciples were ignorant of Judas's intentions, he could change the course of his action without explanation, and none but Jesus would know. Once Judas left the room to seal his bargain with the priests, he would pass the point of no return.

27b–28 Conscious that the time had come for his sacrifice (13:1), Jesus wished Judas to get on with his plot and leave. Once he was gone, Jesus would be able to continue his intimate ministry with his disciples in the upper room.

29 The reference to making a purchase for the Passover may corroborate the view that this Last Supper was held on the night preceding the Passover (cf. comment on v.2). Jesus would hardly have waited until this moment to obtain a lamb if they were at the Passover at that moment; and the text says that the disciples didn't know the reason for Jesus' statement to Judas, which would hardly be the case if the lamb was missing.

30 The repetition of the phrase "As soon as Judas had taken the bread" (cf. v.27) indicates that Satan's control of Judas and Judas's departure from the group must have been simultaneous. As Judas left, it was dark outside. John's comment about "night" corresponds to Jesus' statement when Judas betrayed him: "This is your hour—when darkness reigns" (Lk 22:53). It also heightens the implication that Jesus' life was one of conflict. The opposition of darkness and light is announced in the Prologue (1:5) and is illustrated by the growing hostility between Jesus and his enemies. As the conflict becomes more marked, Jesus said it reflected the contrast between what he had seen with his Father and what they had heard from their father (8:38, 42–44). John notes the continuing progress of the spiritual conflict in 13:27; 14:30; 17:15.

B. The Last Discourse (13:31–16:33)

With the departure of Judas, Jesus commenced the long farewell discourse to his disciples. The dialogue comprising the first section (13:31–14:31) should not be broken at 14:1.

1. Questions and answers (13:31–14:31)

a. The new commandment (13:31–35)

31 The title "Son of Man" appears twelve times in the gospel of John, of which this is the last occurrence (see comment on Mk 8:31). As the "Son of Man," Jesus reveals divine truth (1:51); he has a supernatural origin (3:13; 6:62); his death by being "lifted up" achieves salvation for humans (3:14; 8:28; 12:34); he exercises the prerogative of final judgment (5:27); he provides spiritual nourishment (6:27); and he will be "glorified" (cf. 12:23), which John applies specifically to Jesus' death and resurrection (7:39; 10:16). In general, "Son of Man" is the title of the incarnate Christ who is the representative of humanity before God and the representative of deity in human life.

32 The Johannine use of "glorify" (GK 1519) is peculiar. This word occurs five times in vv.31–32 in what seems to be unnecessary repetition. Intrinsically the word means "exaltation." But as Jesus used it, it relates to his death (see comment on 12:32–33). The Cross would become the supreme glory of God because the Son would completely obey the will of the Father. The meaning of "exalt" or "magnify" seems to fit better the last two uses in this verse. This dual dimension of "glorify" appears also in the prayer of ch. 17 (see comments on 17:4–5; see also Php 2:4–11). In this concept the Cross and the Resurrection are united as phases of a single redemptive event by which the purpose of God is completed and his righteousness vindicated.

33 "My children [GK 5448]" is expressive of Jesus' love and concern for the Eleven, who must have seemed to him to be weak and immature (cf. John's use of the same term to introduce admonitions in 1Jn 2:1, 12, 28; 3:7, 18; 4:4; 5:21). Jesus recalled to their memory his words to the Jews: "Where I go, you cannot come" (8:21). To the disciples he was speaking of the fact that they were now unprepared to follow him, though they would rejoin him later (see 14:3). To the Jews he made no such promise; instead, he predicted that they would die in their sins.

34–35 The most important instruction that Jesus left for the Eleven was this fresh, "new commandment"— to love one another. If their motive in following him had been to obtain a high place in the messianic kingdom (1:40, 49), Jesus knew that the spirit of rivalry would disrupt their fellowship before they could accomplish his commission to them. The attitude of love would be the bond that would keep them united and would be the convincing demonstration that they had partaken of his own spirit and purpose. He had loved them without reservation and without limit (13:1–5) and expected them to do the same.

b. The question of Peter (13:36–14:4)

The structure of this dialogue offers a contrast between the attempt of Jesus to present some consecutive teaching in preparation for his departure and the nervous unrest of the disciples, who were disconcerted by the awareness of impending danger. As usual, Simon Peter was the first to speak.

36 Peter's question ("Where are you going?") expresses bewilderment and perhaps slight exasperation. Jesus had previously spoken publicly of going away (8:21). On that occasion his enemies were mystified and wondered whether he was contemplating suicide. Now, in the intimacy of his inner circle, the disciples are equally puzzled, though conceivably less critical. Jesus' promise, "You will follow later," implies that Peter had asked the question so that he might go with him. His affection for Jesus, though often expressed clumsily, was undeniably genuine.

37–38 Peter was impatient and avowed that he was ready to lay down his life. Jesus, who understood the situation as Peter did not and who knew Peter's inner weakness, was gently incredulous. His answer about Peter's denial reveals his estimate of this disciple. The crowing of the rooster was reckoned as the watch between twelve midnight and three o'clock in the morning, when the light of dawn began to glimmer on the eastern horizon. When Peter heard this word, he must have been completely baffled. He would not question Jesus' authority. Yet he was so sure of his own devotion that he could not imagine such a failure.

14:1 Furthermore, the other disciples must have been equally perturbed, for Jesus added, "Do not let your [plural] hearts be troubled." The way in which Jesus phrases this implies that they should "stop being troubled" (i.e., they should set their hearts at ease). He then urged them to maintain both their trust in God and in himself. Their uncertainty and discouragement had weakened them, and he wanted to strengthen them against complete collapse in the imminent tragedy.

2 In spite of the threatening circumstances, Jesus spoke with calm assurance of the divine provision for them and took for granted that they would have a place in the eternal world. Jesus never speculated about a future life; he spoke as one who was as familiar with eternity as one is with his hometown. The imagery of a dwelling place ("rooms") is taken from the oriental house in which the sons and daughters have apartments under the same roof as their parents. The purpose of his departure was to make ready the place where he could welcome them permanently. Certainly he would not go to prepare a room for his friends unless he expected that they would also eventually arrive.

3 "I will come back" is one of the few allusions in this gospel to Jesus' return. He was not speaking of a general resurrection but of his personal concern for his own disciples. Though he did not elaborate on the promise, the guarantee is unmistakable. His return is as certain as his departure, and he would take them with him to his Father's house.

4 Verses 1–4 not only contain Jesus' answer to Peter's question but also indicate Jesus' attempt to return to the theme of the discourse he had first begun. He assumed that they knew the way to their destination; all they would need to do would be to follow the road. His sheep would follow him and find "the house of the LORD" at the end of their journey (Ps 23:6; Jn 10:27–28).

c. The question of Thomas (14:5–7)

5 Thomas's abrupt question, like Peter's questions (13:6, 36–37), was characteristic of its proponent. Thomas was utterly honest, pessimistic, and uninhibited. He did not suppress his feelings but voiced his despair (cf. 11:16). He was confused by life and felt that its riddles were unsolvable. But he was not ready to accept a state of permanent bewilderment.

6 Jesus' reply is the ultimate foundation for a satisfactory philosophy of life. First, it is personal. He did not claim merely to know the way, the truth, and the life as a formula he could impart to the ignorant; but he actually claimed to be the answer to human problems. That is, Jesus' solution to perplexity is not a recipe; it is a relationship with him. Second, Jesus responded with an authoritative assertion as the master of life. He is the way to the Father because only he has an intimate knowledge of God, unmarred by sin. He is the truth because he has the perfect power of making life one coherent experience irrespective of its ups and downs. He is the life because he was not subject to death but made it subject to him. He died to demonstrate the power and continuity of his life. Because he is the way, the truth, and the life, he is the only means of reaching the Father (cf. 1:18). Jesus is the only authorized revelation of God in human form, and he is the only authorized representative of humanity to God.

7 The first part of this verse could be better rendered, "If you have attained an experiential realization of who I am, you will know my Father also." Jesus declared that he had adequately presented the Father in his own person (cf. Paul's teaching in Col 1:15). To the extent that the disciples had come to a satisfactory understanding of Jesus, they had a comprehension of the being of God.

d. The request of Philip (14:8–15)

8 If Thomas was a skeptic, Philip was a realist. Having determined in his thinking that the Father of whom Jesus spoke must be the Ultimate Absolute, Philip demanded that he and his associates might see him. Philip was also materialistic; abstractions meant little to him. Nevertheless he had a deep desire to experience God for himself. If he and the other disciples could only apprehend God with at least one of their senses, they would be satisfied. Perhaps Philip wanted to have an experience such as Jacob (Ge 32:24, 30), Samson's parents (Jdg 13:3–22), and Moses (Ex 34:4–8) had had.

9 Jesus was both pleased and saddened by Philip's request: pleased by his earnestness and saddened by his obtuseness. His union with the Father was so natural that he was astonished that Philip had not observed it. "I am in the Father, and . . . the Father is in me" (v.10) was his description of the relationship both in instructing the public and in his final prayer to the Father (cf. 10:38; 14:20; 17:21). For this reason he could say, "Anyone who has seen me has seen the Father." No material image or likeness can adequately depict God. Only a person can give knowledge of him since personality cannot be represented by an impersonal object.

10–11 Furthermore, if a personality must be employed to represent God, that personality cannot be less than God and do him justice, nor can it be so far above humanity that it cannot communicate God perfectly to humans. The way Jesus made known the character and reality of the Father was by his words and works. The truth of God filled Jesus' words; the power of God produced his works.

12 Jesus again slowly resumed the main current of his teaching. He wanted to impress on the disciples that he was not disbanding them in anticipation of his departure; rather, he was expecting them to continue his work and do even greater things than he had accomplished. Such an expectation seems impossible in the light of his character and power; yet, through the power of the Spirit whom Jesus sent after his ascension, there were more converts after the initial sermon of Peter at Pentecost than are recorded for Jesus during his entire career (see Ac 1:15; 2:41). The influence of the infant church covered the Roman world, whereas Jesus during his lifetime never traveled outside the boundaries of Palestine. Through the disciples Jesus multiplied his ministry after his departure.

13–15 The power of the disciples originated in prayer. Jesus could hardly have made more emphatic the declaration that whatever they should ask in his name, he would do. The phrase "in my name," however, is not a magical charm like an Aladdin's lamp. It was both a guarantee, like the endorsement on a check, and a limitation on the petition; for he would grant only such petitions as could be presented in a manner consistent with his character and purpose. In prayer we call on him to work out his purpose, not simply to gratify our whims. The answer is promised so that the Son may bring glory to the Father. The disciples' obedience to him will be the test of their love.

e. The promise of the Spirit (14:16–21)

16–17 With the preceding words, Jesus returned from the answer to Philip's question to the more general theme of preparation for his departure. His absence would make more difficult the realization of the person of the Father whom he represented. In his place, however, he promised to send the Holy Spirit, the "Counselor" (parakletos; GK 4156; lit., "a person summoned to one's aid"). The Spirit's function is to represent God to the believer as Jesus did in his incarnate state. The concept of the Holy Spirit was not new, for the Spirit of God had been active in the OT (see Ge 1:2; 6:3; Jdg 3:10; 13:24–25; 14:6, 19; 15:14; Zec 7:12). John the Baptist had predicted that Jesus would baptize with the Holy Spirit (Mt 3:11; Mk 1:8; Lk 3:16; Jn 1:33). In his discussion of the new birth, Jesus had already spoken to Nicodemus of the work of the Holy Spirit (Jn 3:5). The ministry of the Spirit, however, would be directed primarily to the disciples. He would direct their decisions, counsel them continually, and remain with them forever. The world would not understand the Spirit since it would not recognize him. His presence was already with the disciples insofar as they were under his influence. Later, after Jesus departed, he would indwell them. This indwelling of the Spirit is the specific privilege of the Christian believer (see 7:39).

26. Makes us yearn for Christ's return	Ro 8:23; Rev 22:20
27. Gives life to our mortal bodies	Ro 8:11

18–19 Jesus' allusion to a return may refer to his reappearances after the Resurrection (chs. 20–21). But he did not remain visible for long, nor were there any public manifestations. The motive for these appearances was the need to reassure the disciples, who felt left as helpless orphans in an unfriendly world. Jesus knew that they, as spiritual children (13:33), would need the strong protection and guidance of a parent in order to survive. The resurrection of Jesus would also be the guarantee of life for the disciples. The eternal life that he would demonstrate is the same eternal life he promised to them.

20 The coming of the Spirit to indwell believers would bring the realization that the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are united in purpose and operation and that there would be a new intimate relationship between them and believers (see also 15:26).

21 Jesus reiterated the statement of v.15 because of its importance. Love is the basis of our relationship with God. His love has been manifested in the gift of Jesus (1Jn 4:9–10), and our love for him is manifested in obedience (1Jn 5:3). Those who obey his commands and show their love for him will reap great benefits. The Father will love the obedient disciples, Jesus himself will love them, and Jesus will make himself known to them.

f. The question of Judas, not Iscariot (14:22–24)

22 The last question in this impromptu dialogue was posed by Judas (not Iscariot). Nothing is known of him beyond his name (cf. Lk 6:16; Ac 1:13), unless he can be identified with Thaddaeus (Mt 10:3; Mk 3:18). Judas could not understand how Jesus would appear to the disciples without being at the same time subject to public scrutiny. Either Jesus would be visible or he would not; for Judas there was no possibility of both.

23 In his reply, Jesus did not focus on his postresurrection appearances, but on the broader revelation that would come to them through obedience to his known teaching and through the work of the Holy Spirit. The reality of Jesus' and the Father's presence would be conditioned on obedience, an obedience that resulted from their love for God. Obedience is not, however, the condition of God's love for humans but the proof of their realization of his love and of their love for him.

24 Being obedient to Jesus' words extends beyond keeping the charges he personally delivered. Jesus equated his teaching with the Father's will. Thus, loving Jesus is demonstrated by one's obedience to the revealed will of God, the Bible.

g. Parting comfort (14:25–31)

25–26 Jesus now resumed his teaching on the Holy Spirit because Judas's question evoked it. Through the Spirit Jesus' presence would be perpetuated among them. The phrase "in my name [GK 3950]" (cf. vv.13, 14) means that the Spirit would be Jesus' officially delegated representative to act in his behalf. Just as Jesus himself demonstrated the personality and character of God to others, so after his departure the Holy Spirit would make the living Christ real to his followers. The function of the Spirit is teaching. He instructs from within and recalls to the memory what Jesus taught. The Spirit will, therefore, impress the commandments of Jesus on the minds of his disciples and thus prompt them to obedience.

27 The peace Jesus spoke of could not be exemption from conflict and trial. Jesus himself had been "troubled" by the impending Crucifixion (12:27). The peace he spoke of here is the calmness of confidence in God. Jesus had this peace because he was sure of the Father's love and approval. He could therefore move forward to meet the crisis without fear or hesitation. The world can give only false peace, which mostly comes from the ignorance of peril or self-reliance. With his promise of peace, he repeated the words of comfort he had spoken in reply to Peter's earlier question (cf. v.1). The disciples must have continued to show their dismay as they contemplated Jesus' departure.

28 In concluding this discourse, Jesus reminded them that he was about to return to the Father and that he had forewarned them so that their faith might not be disrupted by his removal. The statement "the Father is greater than I" refers to position rather than essence; Jesus was speaking from the standpoint of his humanity (cf. 5:19). The numerous statements in this gospel that the Father had sent him confirm that Jesus was acting under authority and was obligated to fulfill the Father's commands.

29 Throughout the gospel the necessity of believing is emphasized (1:50; 3:12, 15–16; 4:21, 41; et al.). Jesus insisted that acceptance of his person is pivotal to spiritual experience. The particular form of "believe" used here by Jesus indicates the beginning of an action, not its continuation. After the previous statements that the disciples had believed (1:50; 2:11; 6:69), such a construction seems inconsistent. Nevertheless the final arrest and death that they would soon witness would undoubtedly shake their faith to its foundations, and Jesus wished to prepare them for the strain this crisis would place on them.

30–31 "The prince of this world" refers to Satan. Jesus was constantly aware of Satan's hostile presence and was preparing for his last attack. Satan first afflicted Jesus at his temptation (Mt 4:1–11; Mk 1:12; Lk 4:1–13). Luke, however, indicates that there would be other times when the devil would tempt Jesus (Lk 4:13). One of those times was certainly now. The betrayal by Judas, the frustration of human hopes, the disappointment of apparent failure, the agony of death—these would make him especially susceptible to suggestion or temptation. But Jesus did not fear Satan because Satan had no claim on him. There was nothing in his character or action that could be used against him. His obedience had been perfect, and he intended to complete the Father's purpose irrespective of what it might cost him.

At this point Jesus proposed leaving the upper room. Whether chs. 15–17 were spoken en route to Gethsemane or he and the disciples lingered while he finished the discussion is not plain; but in either case the words conclude the open dialogue.

2. The discourse on relations (15:1–27)

In this section of the Farewell Discourse, Jesus dealt with three relationships that involve the disciples: (1) their relationship with him, (2) their relationship with one another, and (3) their relationship with the world around them. Jesus knew his disciples would soon constitute a distinct community with a definite function, and he wished to prepare them for the change his departure would make in their manner of living. Viewed from the standpoint of the writer and his time, this section previews the church and its development in the postresurrection period.

a. The relation of the disciples to Christ (15:1–11)

The first of these relationships is primary, for the very existence of the group depends on the union of each individual with Christ. To illustrate it, Jesus uses the analogy (or parable) of the vine and vineyard, a common feature of Palestinian life that would have been familiar to the disciples. This symbolism has its precedent in the OT (e.g., Ps 80; Isa 5:1–2, 7).

1 Using the vine metaphor, Jesus expands its scope to all believers and individualizes its application. He stresses certain features. The first is that there is a genuine stock. One must plant the right kind of vine or tree in order to assure the proper quality of fruit, for no fruit can be better than the vine that produces it. Jesus said, "I am the true vine" (see comment on 6:34–36). Unless the believer is vitally connected with him, the quality of his fruitfulness will be unacceptable. There may be many branches, but if they are to bear the right kind of fruit, they must be a part of the real vine.

The second feature is that God the Father is the gardener. Success in raising any crop depends largely on the skill of the farmer or gardener. The relation of the believer to God is that of the vine to the owner of the vineyard. He tends it, waters it, and endeavors to protect it and cultivate it so that it will produce its maximum yield.

2 A third emphasis is on pruning. Two aspects are noted: the removal of dead wood and the trimming of live wood so that its potential for fruitbearing will be improved. Pruning is necessary for any vine. Dead wood is worse than fruitlessness, for dead wood can harbor disease and decay. An untrimmed vine will develop long rambling branches that produce little fruit because most of the strength of the vine is given to growing wood. The gardener is concerned that the vine be healthy and productive. This caring process is a picture of God's dealings with humans. He removes the dead wood from his church and disciplines the lives of believers so that they are directed into fruitful activity.

3 "Clean" (GK 2754) recalls Jesus' statement to the disciples at the footwashing (13:10), where he singled out Judas as one who was not clean. "Clean" should not be equated with "perfect" but with sincere devotion that unites others to Jesus as branches are united to the vine. Judas was an example of a branch that was cut off.

The means by which pruning or cleaning is done is the Word of God. It condemns sin; it inspires holiness; it promotes growth. As Jesus applies the words God gave him to the lives of the disciples, they undergo a pruning process that removes evil from them and conditions them for further service.

4 Continued production depends on constant union with the source of fruitfulness. Branches that are severed from the parent stock may produce leaves temporarily, but inevitably they will wither because there is no source of life to sustain them; and they will never bear fruit. The effectiveness of believers depends on their receiving the constant flow of life from Christ.

5 Fruitbearing is not only possible but certain if the branch remains in union with the vine, though uniformity of quantity and quality is not promised. But if the life of Christ permeates a disciple, fruit will be inevitable.

6 Failure to maintain a vital connection brings its own penalty—rejection and uselessness. Since the Greek text literally reads "the branch," there may be a reference here to Judas Iscariot (cf. 17:12). In any case, Jesus intends to show that fruitfulness is normal for believers. An absolutely fruitless life is prima facie evidence that one is not a believer. Jesus leaves no place among his followers for fruitless disciples. The only option for such people is to be thrown away and burned.

7 The connection is maintained by obedience and prayer. To remain in Christ and to allow his words to remain in oneself means a conscious acceptance of the authority of his word and a constant contact with him by prayer. The prayer request itself must be related to a definite need and must be for an object Jesus himself would desire (see comment on 14:14). Jesus never promises to gratify every chance whim believers may have. But as long as they are seeking the Lord's will for their lives, Jesus promises to grant every request that will help accomplish this end.

8 The proof of discipleship is fruitbearing (see also Mt 7:20; Lk 6:43–44). Just as Jesus glorified God by his life, so his disciples will glorify God by theirs.

9–11 Love unites the disciples to Christ as branches are united to a vine. Two results stem from this relationship: obedience and joy. Obedience marks the cause of their fruitfulness; joy is its result. Jesus intends his disciples to be both spontaneous and happy rather than burdensome and boring. Obedience in carrying out his purpose guarantees success, for Jesus never plans failure for his disciples. Joy logically follows when the disciples realize that the life of Christ in them is bringing fruit—something they could never produce in their own strength.

b The relation of the disciples to one another (15:12–17)

12–13 Jesus repeats his command to "love each other" (cf. 13:34) because he knows that the future of the disciples' work among others depends on their attitude toward one another. His stress on love had been underscored earlier in this discourse (14:15, 21, 23, 28). Unity instead of rivalry, trust instead of suspicion, and obedience instead of self-assertion must rule the disciples' common labors. The measure of their love for one another is his love for them (cf. 13:34), which would soon be demonstrated by his forthcoming sacrifice (see also 1Jn 3:16).

14–15 Again Jesus defines friendship in terms of obedience. Christian friendship is more than a casual acquaintance; it is a partnership of mutual esteem and affection (14:21). Jesus elevates the disciples above mere tools and makes them partners in his work. A slave is never given a reason for the work assigned to him; he must perform it because he has no other choice. The friend, however, is a confidant who shares the knowledge of his superior's purpose and voluntarily adopts it as his own. Jesus declares that he has revealed to the disciples all that the Father has given to him. The disclosure of the mind of God concerning his career and theirs will give them assurance that they are engaged in the right task and that God will ultimately bring it to a successful conclusion.

16–17 The disciples had not followed Jesus by some chance impulse; they had been chosen. He had invited them to interview him (1:39), he had promised to reshape them to his requirements (v.42), and he had summoned them to follow him (v.43). His miracles had clinched their original faith (2:11), and he had solicitously pleaded with them not to forsake him when many had departed from him (6:66–67). At that time he said that he had chosen them (v.70). He claimed them as his special flock (10:27) and asserted that they would never perish (v.28). He now expects that they will fulfill his purpose for them and that their work will be enduring. For this reason he urges them to maintain the relationship of love for one another that will facilitate the fulfillment of his hopes. Again he emphasizes the need of prayer for the continuation of their mission (cf. 14:26). The effectiveness of prayer is linked to fruitbearing, which, in turn, is linked to obedience (vv.10, 14). He repeats the command to love one another, for in seeking to be obedient to the Lord and to be fruitful, it is possible to forget the brothers and sisters.

c. The relation of the disciples to the world (15:18–27)

18 The term "world" (GK 3180) has several uses in John's writings: the universe as the object of creation (1:10), the materialistic order that allures humans from God (1Jn 2:15–16), and humankind in general as the object of God's love (3:16). Here it refers to the mass of unbelievers who are indifferent or hostile to God and his people. Jesus reminds the disciples that in spite of the fact that he has come on an errand of love, the world at large hates him, a fixed attitude that carries over to his disciples as well. The world assumes this attitude because it rejects all who do not conform to its lifestyle.

19–20 Jesus' choice of the disciples has set them apart for a different kind of life and for a different purpose. Therefore, the world will exclude them. Jesus' choice is also the guarantee that the lives of his disciples will have permanent value, but it does not guarantee immunity from attack. Jesus can promise them nothing more than what he himself had received (cf. 13:16).

21–22 There are two reasons for the obstinate attitude of the world. The first is ignorance: the world does not have a proper concept of God. Consequently, it cannot evaluate adequately the messenger whom he sent (cf. Ro 1:28). This ignorance is both intellectual and spiritual. The second reason is resentment of Jesus' claims and standards. By his life and words he rebukes human sin and condemns it. He uncovers the inner corruption and hypocrisy of people, and they react violently to the disclosure. He strips away all excuses and exposes their selfishness and rebellion against God.

23 The connection between Jesus and the Father appears as strongly in this passage as it did in the argument of ch. 5. He and the Father belong in the same category; neither can be accepted or rejected without the other.

24–25 The sin of Jesus' enemies was both deliberate and inexcusable. Accredited by the miracles that he had performed and the words he had spoken, he condemns them (cf. 9:30–33, 39–41). Consequently, their reaction against him cannot be attributed to ignorance of his words or to lack of evidence substantiating them. To further explain his position, Jesus quotes from Ps 69:4. The irony of this quotation is clear: those who posed as the champions of the Law were fulfilling the prophecy concerning the enemies of God's servant.

26–27 In response to this attitude of hatred, there must be a continuing witness to the love and grace of Christ. The last two verses of this chapter define the expected action of the disciples, who will maintain the testimony of Jesus after he has left the earth. He now completes the list of witnesses of 5:31–40 by adding the witness of the Holy Spirit, whose ministry he had already partially described (14:16–17, 26), and also the witness of the disciples themselves. They must "testify" concerning Christ.

"From the beginning" probably refers to the beginning of Jesus' public ministry. Later, when the disciples felt that it was necessary to choose a successor for Judas Iscariot, one requirement was that of having belonged to the company of disciples during his entire ministry (Ac 1:21–22). In order to witness to Jesus and his message, one must have complete experiential knowledge of his person. The coupling of the witness of the Spirit with that of the disciples defines their reciprocal relationship. Without the testify of the Spirit, the disciples' witness will be powerless; without the disciples' witness, the Spirit will be restricted in his means of expression.

3. The discourse on revelation (16:1–33)

a. The revelation of rejection (16:1–4)

1–2 In ch. 16, Jesus reveals to his disciples what they must know to prepare them for their coming mission. He links it with the preceding section of his final discourse by sharpening the warning he has already given them concerning the hatred of the world. He applies this revelation particularly to their local conditions and predicts that they will suffer excommunication from the synagogue and even death (cf. the blind man in 9:22, 34; Lazarus in 12:10). While Jesus was with the disciples, he could shelter and direct them. They must realize, however, that even his resurrection will not be sufficient to convince his enemies to remove the hatred that exists between them and Jesus' followers.

3 Jesus attributes the action of his foes to ignorance—not the ignorance of intellectual knowledge, but the lack of a personal experience of God and Christ (see comment on 15:21–22). Their attitude is determined by who they think Jesus is and by who they think God is, rather than by actual contact with either. So warped has that attitude become that their contact with Jesus has generated hate for both himself and the Father (15:24; cf. Mt 6:23).

4 It may well be that this particular utterance of Jesus was reported by John because of the pressing need for courage in the church of his day. The Apocalypse indicates a wide break between the church and the synagogue at the end of the first century (Rev 2:9; 3:9); those who professed faith in Jesus were completely disowned by their Jewish compatriots.

b. The revelation of the Holy Spirit (16:5–15)

The time has come for a new revelation. Previously Jesus had been with the disciples to counsel them and answer their questions. Now, in view of his imminent removal, they need someone to take his place. Thus he reveals to them the coming of the Holy Spirit, whom he has already mentioned in the general discourse (14:16–17, 26; 15:26).

5–6 The statement "none of you asks me, 'Where are you going?'" seems incongruous in the context of Peter's question in the earlier part of the discourse (13:36). At that point Peter's question was casual, and neither he nor the other disciples pressed the issue to ascertain what Jesus' plans really were. The same thing is true here. There is little concern about Jesus' future; they are interested mainly in their own future. They are sorrowful because they will lose him, so they make no inquiry about the reasons for his departure nor about the objectives he might wish to attain.

7 Jesus tells the disciples that his separation from them is in their best interest. As long as he is with them in person, his work is localized; once he leaves, it will be impossible to communicate with them equally at all times and in all places. The coming of the "Counselor" (see comment on 14:16–17), therefore, will equip them for a wider and more potent ministry.

8–9 Three major aspects of the ministry of the Holy Spirit are described in vv.8–15: (1) to the world—conviction of sin, righteousness, and judgment (vv.8–11); (2) to the disciples—direction and truth (vv.12–13); (3) to Jesus—revealing him more perfectly to and through those who represent him (vv.14–15).

(1) The key to this first aspect is the word "convict" (GK 1794). The word is a legal term that means to pronounce a judicial verdict by which the guilt of the culprit is defined and fixed. The Spirit not only accuses people of sin, he brings to them an inescapable sense of guilt so that they realize their shame and helplessness before God. This conviction applies to three particular areas: (a) sin, (b) righteousness, and (c) judgment.

(a) The Spirit is the prosecuting attorney who presents God's case against humanity. He creates an inescapable awareness of sin so that it cannot be dismissed with an excuse or evaded by taking refuge in the fact that "everybody is doing it." The Spirit's function is like that of Nathan the prophet, who said to David, "You are the man" (2Sa 12:7), and convicted him of his misdeeds. David acknowledged his sin in a state of complete penitence (2Sa 12:15; Ps 51:4).

The essence of sin is unbelief (v.9), which is not simply a difference of opinion; rather, it is a total rejection of God's messenger and message. A court can convict a person of murder, but only the Spirit can convict him or her of unbelief. Jesus insists that sin is fundamentally repudiation of his message and his mission.

10 (b) The second area in which the Spirit convicts people is "righteousness" (GK 1466). He enforces the absolute standard of God's character, to which all thought and action must be compared. Apart from a standard of righteousness, there can be no sin; and there must be an awareness of the holiness of God before a person will realize his or her own deficiency—an infinite gap that humans cannot bridge. The first step toward salvation is the awareness that a divine mediatorship is necessary.

The connection between righteousness and Jesus' return to the Father is not immediately clear. It should probably be interpreted as meaning that his return to the right hand of God was a complete vindication of all he had done and consequently established him as the standard for all human righteousness. Apostolic preaching conveyed this concept (see Ac 3:14–15). Whereas righteousness had previously been defined by precepts, it now has been revealed in the incarnate Son, who exemplified it perfectly in all his relationships (cf. 1Jn 3:5).

11 (c) Judgment always occurs when an act or thought is evaluated by an absolute principle. When human sin is confronted by the righteousness of Christ, its condemnation is self-evident. In this context "judgment" (GK 3213) refers to the condemnation of satanic self-will and rebellion through the obedience and love exhibited by Jesus toward the Father. The Cross utterly condemned and defeated the "prince of this world." Satan is already under judgment; the sentence is fixed and permanent. (For discussion of "the prince of this world," see comments on 14:30.)

12–13 (2) Jesus tells his disciples directly that his revelation to date is incomplete. They are not sufficiently mature to understand all he wishes to impart. A second function of the Holy Spirit, therefore, will be to "lead" (GK 3842) them into the full comprehension of all he wants them to know. The Spirit will not present an independent message, differing from what they had already learned from him. Rather, they will be led further into the realization of his person and into the development of the principles he has already laid down. They will also be enlightened about coming events. In this promise lies the germinal authority of the apostolic writings, which transmit the revelation of Christ through his disciples by the work of the Holy Spirit.

14–15 (3) The third function of the Spirit is to "glorify"(GK 1519) Christ. His chief purpose is not to make himself prominent but to magnify the person of Jesus. The Spirit interprets and applies the character and teaching of Jesus to the disciples and by so doing makes him central to their thinking and real in their lives.

c. The revelation of Jesus' reappearance (16:16–24)

16 Jesus' remark in this verse was obscure to his disciples and is still enigmatic to us. His prediction of disappearance refers to his death, but to what does the second appearance refer? It cannot refer to his coming in the person of the Holy Spirit because he has emphasized the distinction between himself and the Spirit and between their respective ministries. The disciples are confused by his language, both by the concept of his going to the Father and by the time element involved. The best solution seems to be that he was referring to the Resurrection, which would take place "a little while" after he had left them.

17–18 The two problems that vex the disciples are the prediction of disappearance and then reappearance after a short interval, and the concept of "going to the Father" (for the second one, see 14:28). The disciples have not yet established the mental perspective Jesus wishes them to have and are thinking only in terms of the present situation. They therefore hold a consultation among themselves about it; the discourse, in other words, does not proceed as an uninterrupted lecture. Apparently it is a casual conversation with periods of silence on Jesus' part.

19–22 The subsequent narrative develops the postresurrection period as a time in which the disciples' fears are quelled, their doubts dispelled, and their commission confirmed. Jesus compares their coming parting to the painful birth of a child, which, when fully accomplished, brings joy. The disciples are disappointed because the kingdom has not come; and they are distressed because of the calamity that is about to overtake Jesus. The "world" will rejoice that he has been removed and will pride itself in a victory, but the disciples will mourn the untimely loss of their leader. In Jesus' resurrection, however, the conditions will be reversed, and their lamentations will be transformed into joy because he will return to them.

23–24 The verb "ask" (GK 2263) in the phrase "in that day you will no longer ask me anything" means "to ask a question" rather than "to request a favor." Jesus seems to mean that at his reappearance after the Resurrection the truth of his claims and the status of his person will be self-evident. At that time the disciples will no longer question him as one of their number but will present their petitions to the Father in his name (cf. 14:13) and will be eligible for the Father's response to their needs.

d. The revelation of the Father (16:25–33)

25 Jesus had used figurative or parabolic language to the disciples because of their spiritual immaturity. After the Resurrection, however, he will be at liberty to speak plainly about the Father. Little is said in the Gospels concerning the instruction Jesus imparted to the disciples during the forty days between his resurrection and his ascension. However, it is probable that during this period he gave them much of the teaching that was reflected in their later preaching and writing (see Ac 1:3).

26–27 It will be unnecessary for Jesus to make requests on their behalf, for they will be able to present their own petitions. The phrase "in my name [GK 3950]" recurs frequently in this farewell discourse (14:13–14, 26; 16:23–24, 26) and indicates Jesus' sponsorship of the disciples. Their standing with God will depend on his merits. Because of his work and their relationship to him by faith, they will be able to approach the Father directly with their petitions.

28–30 Jesus' declaration that he has come from the Father and is about to return to the Father satisfies their inquiry. They feel that he is no longer talking in riddles. Their response to Jesus' straightforward declaration is a further confession of faith. Their questions have been occasioned by their bewilderment over his figurative language. The direct statement he has just made clarifies their understanding and eliminates the need for further questioning. In the light of that understanding they reaffirm their belief that he has come from God.

31–32 Jesus is skeptical of the firmness of the disciples' avowed belief, for he knows about their impending failure (already expressed about Simon Peter in 13:37; cf. Mt 26:33–35; Mk 14:29–31; Lk 22:33–34). "You will leave me all alone" reveals Jesus' disappointment and emotional tension. The sympathy and support of these men, imperfect as they are, means much to him. Nevertheless, his chief resource is the Father, whose purpose he has come to fulfill and by whose power he is able to execute it.

33 Jesus imparts to his disciples the information concerning his death and his provision for them that they might be calm and confident in the face of disillusionment and apparent disaster. "Peace" (GK 1645) reiterates his statement in 14:27. Even in the hour of his greatest suffering he has an unshakable confidence in the victorious purpose of God. Jesus does not overlook the trial that will affect them as well as himself, for that is inevitable in a world alienated from God. He does, however, proclaim victory over it.

C. The Last Prayer (17:1–26)

The prayer of Jesus recorded in this chapter is not identical with the prayer in Gethsemane reported in the Synoptic Gospels (Mt 26:36–45; Mk 14:32–41; Lk 22:39–46). Its content is closely linked to that of the preceding chapters in John, especially those spoken in the upper room. The vocabulary, containing such familiar terms in John as "glory," "glorify," "sent," "believe," "world," and "love," connects its content with the same topics in preceding sections. And Jesus' concern for his disciples makes more lucid his attitude toward them on previous occasions. The prayer is intended to summarize in Jesus' own words his relationship with the Father and the relationship he wishes his disciples to maintain with him and the Father.

The prayer can be divided into three parts: (1) Jesus' prayer concerning himself (vv.1–5), (2) his prayer for the disciples (vv.6–19), and (3) his prayer for all believers present and future (vv.20–26). The prayer was spoken either just before the small company left the room where they had eaten together or as they were making their way out of the city to Gethsemane (see comment on 14:31).

1. The prayer concerning himself (17:1–5)

1 John records even the gesture of Jesus: "He lifted up his eyes" (lit. tr.). This was a typical Jewish gesture of prayer, whether offered to God or to idols (Ps 121:1; 123:1; Eze 33:25; Da 4:34; Jn 11:41). The prayer begins with the announcement "The time has come." Jesus' consciousness of living by a "calendar" has been manifest from the beginning of the gospel (see 2:4; 7:8; 7:30; 8:20); but now he acknowledges that the time of crisis has arrived (cf. 12:23; 13:1). This announcement enhances the significance of the prayer because it becomes Jesus' evaluation of the purpose of his life, death, resurrection, and ascension.

Jesus petitions the Father to glorify him. The word "glorify" (GK 1519) should be applied to the total complex of these events as the climax of the Incarnation. The Son glorified the Father by revealing God's sovereignty over evil, his compassion for humans, and the finality of redemption for believers. His entire career was focused on fulfilling the Father's purpose and on delivering the Father's message (see also v.5).

2–3 The two sentences following the initial petition are parenthetical and explanatory. The first (v.2) indicates the scope of the authority Christ exercised in his incarnate state. He was empowered to impart eternal life to those who had been given to him. This gospel is replete with assertions that life is in Christ (see 1:4; 3:15–16; 4:14; 5:21, 26; 6:33, 54; 10:10; 11:25; 14:6). These words emphatically express the central purpose of Jesus: to glorify the Father by imparting life to humans.

The second sentence (v.3) defines the nature of eternal life. It is not described in chronological terms but by a relationship. Life is active involvement with environment. The highest kind of life is involvement with the highest kind of environment. A worm is content to live in soil; we need not only the wider environment of earth, sea, and sky but also contact with other human beings. For the complete fulfillment of our being, we must know God. This, said Jesus, constitutes eternal life. Not only is it endless, since the knowledge of God requires an eternity to develop fully, but qualitatively it must exist in an eternal dimension. As Jesus said further on in this prayer, eternal life will ultimately bring his disciples to a lasting association with him in his divine glory (v.24).

4–5 Although the final act of his career remains to be performed, Jesus asserts that he has completed his task. He takes for granted that the last step will be taken (cf. 12:27–28). Though aware that he has the option of refusing the Cross and so escaping death, he has resolved irrevocably to complete the work for which he has been sent. To all intents and purposes it is already done. In spite of many obstacles, Jesus never once faltered from doing the Father's will. He now has one main petition: that the Father will receive him back to the glory he relinquished to accomplish his task (see 1:18). This petition for a return to his pristine glory implies unmistakably his preexistence and equality with the Father, confirming 10:30.

2. The prayer concerning the disciples (17:6–19)

By far the largest part of Jesus' prayer relates to the disciples. He is much more concerned about them than about himself. He is sure of his own victory. The disciples, however, are a variable quantity; in themselves they are likely to fail, as he has already predicted (Mt 26:31; Jn 16:32). Nevertheless, he prays for them with confidence that they will be kept by the Father's power and presented for a future ministry. Jesus gives the reasons for his confidence in the next three verses.

6–8 The disciples have been given to Jesus by the Father. The gift was irrevocable and the Father was able to guarantee it. Jesus has no doubt of the final outcome. The disciples were obedient; they have accepted the message Jesus gave them. In spite of much misunderstanding on their part, those who were with Jesus in the upper room did not reject or doubt the truth he imparted to them, though they may not have comprehended it instantly (see 2:22; 20:9). They recognize that Jesus' message comes from God, and they accept him as a messenger of God (cf. 16:30). From the outset of his ministry, the disciples have received him as the Messiah, and their conviction of his messiahship has grown progressively during the period of association with him. Now as the supreme test of their faith is impending, Jesus prays that they might be preserved against the persecution that can separate them from him and from one another.

9 At this point, Jesus' intercession is confined to the Eleven who are present with him. He reminds the Father that these men are under his special care. As in his prayer at Lazarus's grave, Jesus takes for granted the concern of the Father for the immediate need and the provision he has already made in order to meet it.

10 This verse assumes Jesus' equality with the Father. Each has full title to the possessions of the other; they share the same interests and responsibilities. Jesus' words are a sample of the continued intercession that constitutes his present ministry (Ro 8:34).

11 Jesus asks for the continuation of the Father's protection of the disciples in the period of danger that lay ahead of them. The title "Holy Father" (like "Righteous Father" in v.25) is unique and occurs only in this prayer. The holiness of God contrasts with the selfishness and evil of the world that confronts the disciples. On the basis of the holiness of God's character, Jesus requests the Father to preserve his disciples. The verb "protect" (GK 5498) here has the sense of "preserve," with an implication of defense. "Name" (GK 3950) stands for the power of God manifested in his person (cf. 5:43; 10:25; 12:28; 17:6, 26), for a name represents authoritatively the person it describes.

The unity mentioned here is not simply a unity achieved by legislation. It is a unity of nature because it is comparable to that of the Son and the Father. The unity of the church must spring from the common life that is imparted to all believers by the new birth; and it is manifested in their common love for Christ and for one another as they face a hostile world. The unity of the Son and the Father is manifested in the deep love that each sustains for the other and by the perfect obedience of the Son to the Father and the perfect response of the Father to the Son.

12 Jesus' request for the protection of the disciples is occasioned by the prospect of his leaving the world. They will still remain in it, exposed to its temptations and hostility. In reviewing his care of them to date, he uses two different words: "protected" (see comment in v.11) and "kept them safe" (i.e., "guarded them against external attack"). Jesus has kept safely all the disciples except Judas, "the one doomed to destruction" (a phrase applied to the Antichrist in 2Th 2:3). This Semitic phrase denotes an abandoned character, one utterly lost and given over to evil. The language does not imply that Judas was a helpless victim who was destined to perdition against his will. Rather, it implies that, having made his decision, he had passed the point of no return; and, by so doing, he carried out what the Scriptures had indicated would happen (perhaps Ps 69:25; 109:6–8).

13 Jesus prays not only for the safety of the disciples but also that they may have joy in spite of the coming conflict (cf. 15:11; 16:22, 24). There will be nothing in the attitude of the world to promote their joy; but, as with Jesus, their awareness of the Father's approval and the consciousness of a task accomplished and the expectancy of glory will create true joy for them.

14 The very fact that the disciples received the message of God from Jesus differentiates them from the world at large. They have a different nature and a different affiliation. Such a radical contrast draws the hatred of the world, which always demands conformity to its viewpoint and practices. Having taken their stand with Jesus, they will be susceptible to the same rejection he experienced.

15–16 Jesus does not, however, ask that they be removed from a disagreeable and dangerous environment. Like him, they have a mission to discharge and must remain to fulfill it, however perilous it might be; but he does ask for protection for them from the evil one. The declaration that "they are not of the world" gives the negative aspect of the previous prayer that they may be one as Jesus and the Father are one. The disciples' unity binds them to Christ and at the same time separates them from the world. John stresses the separation that results from difference of nature (cf. 1Jn 2:19). The separation is inherent, not artificial.

17 "Sanctify" (GK 39) means "to set apart," usually for some specially good purpose or use; its derivative meaning thus becomes "dedicate" or "consecrate." Believers are so changed by the working of God's Word in their lives that they are separated from evil and to God. This new devotion, which results in separation from evil, produces purification of life and consecration to God's service. Since the Word of God is truth, it provides the unchanging standard for the course and character of life. The form of the expression "your word" raises the possibility that Jesus may be referring to himself. He has said that he is "the truth" (14:6); as the Logos of God he embodies truth in its totality.

18 "Sent" (GK 690, related to the word "apostle") implies equipment for a definite mission. Jesus unites the disciples with himself in the work he began and expects them to continue. Just as the Father has sent him with authority, so he gives them authority (cf. Mt 28:18–20); as he has come with a message of God's love and forgiveness, so they must proclaim the same; as he has come into danger and peril of death, so they will encounter the same problems; and as the Father has sent him to the victory of the Resurrection, so they can expect the same. His words include warning, commission, and encouragement.

19 In keeping with his words in v.17, Jesus does not intend to make himself more holy than he already is. Rather, he is devoting himself to God in the interest of his work for the disciples. His example of dedication to the will of the Father, demonstrated in his unswerving acceptance of the Cross, will be the standard for their sanctification.

The petitions of Jesus' prayer for the disciples define certain aspects of eternal life. The first is the authentic revelation of the Father in contrast to erroneous information or delusive myth. Jesus reinforces his claim to be the authorized revealer of the true God (v.6; cf. 1:18; 14:9–11). As his revelation was accepted, the disciples progressed to a knowledge of the Father and to a solid faith (v.8; cf. 16:25). This faith united them with Jesus so that they came under his protection and now experience security that eternal life imparts (v.12; cf. 10:29–29). Eternal life also implies sanctification—being set apart for the service of God.

3. The prayer concerning future believers (17:20–26)

20 The last section of Jesus' prayer shows that he expects the failure of the disciples to be only temporary. The entire tone of the farewell discourse is built on the assumption that after the Resurrection they will renew their faith and carry on a new ministry in the power of the Holy Spirit. The provisions and warnings in chs. 13–16 presuppose the continuation of Jesus' work through these men (cf. Mt 16:18). He expects the ministry of the Spirit in the disciples to result in adding more believers to their number. So his prayer includes all believers in all ages.

21 At this point, the burden of the prayer is for unity (cf. "one"; GK 1651). Jesus has already stressed the need for mutual love that will bind them together for their common task. Now, foreseeing the addition of many more who will increase the diversity of temperaments, backgrounds, and interests, he makes a special plea that all may be one. The standard is not an institutional but a personal unity.

Nor is he calling for uniformity, since he and the Father are distinct from each other and have different functions. He predicates that the unity will be one of nature; for he and the Father, while distinguishable in person, are one being. The new birth brings believers into the single family of God by spiritual generation (1:12–13; cf. 15:1–7; 1Co 12:12–13). The purpose of this unity is the maintenance of a convincing testimony before the world to the revelation of God in Christ and to his love for the disciples. Through the common witness and experience of the disciples, Jesus wishes to establish the fact of his divine origin and of the love of God for humankind.

22–23 The "glory" (GK 1518) the Father has given Jesus is the triumphant task of redeeming the human race to God (cf. Heb 2:9–10). By sharing in his calling, they participate in his glory and are united with him and with one another. God and humankind are together involved in bringing the new creation into being. The effect of this united testimony is a confirmation of the divine mission of Jesus and of God's love for believers.

24 The final aspect of eternal life relates to ultimate destiny. The final attainment is to be with Christ (cf. 14:3) and to observe his glory. The disciples have witnessed his incarnate life, which was a humiliation, voluntarily accepted for their sakes. Its process was epitomized by Jesus' action at the Last Supper, when he took the place of a servant to wash the disciples' feet (13:1–15). Now, on the eve of being "glorified," he desires the disciples to see him as he really is (see also 1Jn 3:2). "Before the creation of the world" is a further assertion of Christ's preexistence. This shows that the binding power of unity in the Triune God is love.

25–26 The entire prayer is based on the righteousness of God (see comment on v.11), who will vindicate the Son by glorifying him. Jesus' revelation of God is founded on personal knowledge and personal communion. The essence of the revelation lies in the love of God, which Jesus exhibits toward the disciples. His purpose is to perfect his union with them, that they in turn may know the Father. Jesus wants to include them in the inner fellowship of the Triune God.

IV. The Passion of the Word (18:1–20:31)

A. The Arrest in Gethsemane (18:1–11)

1–2 Jesus and the disciples left the room where they had convened, descended from the city, crossed the Kidron Valley, and made their way up the lower slope of the Mount of Olives, to the Garden of Gethsemane (the name assigned to the olive grove on the side of the mountain, meaning "oil press"). Jesus often used this place to meet with his disciples (cf. Lk 22:39). The city was filled with visitors at the Passover season and would have had little room for lodging within its walls. Neither Jesus nor the disciples were wealthy; so they probably camped outdoors during their visit to the temple for the Passover Week. Judas, probably having attempted to find Jesus at the house where he and the others ate the Last Supper, went to Gethsemane, expecting to locate him there.

3 The Greek word for "detachment of soldiers" technically denotes a tenth of a legion, or about six hundred men—probably the detachment of soldiers connected with the Castle of Antonia, the Roman barracks in Jerusalem (see also Mt 26:47; Mk 14:43; Lk 22:52). Possibly the hysterical alarm of the priests caused them to ask aid from Pilate in arresting Jesus, since the temple police had failed on a previous occasion (Jn 7:32, 45–47). The torches and the lanterns were needed, since the arrest took place at night and required a search in the darkness of the olive grove.

4–6 The author has emphasized Jesus' consciousness of surrounding circumstances and his own destiny (cf. Jn 6:64; 13: 1, 3, 11, 18). He was not taken unwillingly or by surprise. For a long time he had been aware of the plot against his life and, had he wished, he could have escaped (cf. 10:40; 11:54). Now "the time" had come (cf. 17:1). He did not wait to be apprehended but voluntarily confronted his enemies.

In the darkness of the garden they were not sure which man they wanted. So in answer to his question they replied, "Jesus of Nazareth." John omits the signal of Judas and mentions only Jesus' own statement for the identification. That reply startled the arresting party by its openness and readiness and possibly because it was like the claim he had made previously: "I am" (8:24, 28, 58). If it were intended as an assertion of deity, his calm demeanor and commanding presence temporarily unnerved his captors.

7–9 Jesus' chief intent seems not to have been to advance a claim but to shield the disciples. In a sense, he sacrificed himself for their safety. He had promised the Father that he would protect them (17:12), and he fulfilled his guarantee in the voluntary surrender of his life. The utterance in v.8 is a graphic illustration of the principle of substitutionary atonement that pervades this gospel (cf. 1:29; 3:14–16; 10:11, 15–18; 12:32; 17:19).

10 The action of Peter illustrates the curious combination of loyalty and obtuseness that characterized him. Realizing that Jesus was endangered, Peter was courageous enough to come to his defense and risk his own safety. To this extent he justified his boastful promise that if all others should forsake Jesus, he would not (13:37; cf. Mk 14:29–31). In his excitement, Peter began swinging his sword, cutting off the right ear of Malchus, probably the special deputy of the high priest. The recollection of this particular man's name suggests that this account in John rests on an eyewitness testimony.

11 Jesus' command to Peter declared his disapproval of Peter's sudden and violent intervention. Had Jesus desired defense, he could have summoned angelic aid (cf. Mt 26:52–53). "Shall I not drink the cup the Father has given me?" expresses both the necessity of his suffering and his absolute commitment to fulfilling his Father's purpose. The word "cup" connects this statement with the prayer in Gethsemane, which the other three gospels record (Mt 26:42; Mk 14:36; Lk 22:42). Though the writer must have known of Jesus' struggle, he recorded only the outcome. Jesus accepted the Father's will and calmly moved on to its fulfillment.

B. The Hearing Before Annas (18:12–14, 19–24)

12–14 With the willing surrender of Jesus, the arrest was complete. The "commander" was the officer in charge, possibly the executive of the Roman garrison in Jerusalem (cf. the use of the same term in Ac 22:24–28; 23:17, 19, 22). Jesus was taken at once to the residence of the high priest. Annas had served as high priest from A.D. 6 to 15, when he was deposed by the Roman procurator, Valerius Gratus. Four of Annas's sons were among those who succeeded him. His son-in-law, Caiaphas, held office from A.D. 18 until 36, during the time of Jesus' active ministry. Although others held the priestly office, Annas seems to have been the elder statesman and "the power behind the throne," particularly for Caiaphas. He was regarded with great respect by his contemporaries and must have been considered an expert in religious matters.

John's gospel alone takes note of Christ's appearance before Annas, which was probably a preliminary hearing to evaluate the case, prior to the main hearing that followed in the early hours of the morning before the members of the Jewish tribunal.

19–21 The questioning focused on Jesus' disciples and his teaching. The number and activity of the former would be important if the authorities suspected subversion, and the teaching would be scrutinized for possible revolutionary elements. This interrogation by Annas was unnecessary because Jesus had nothing to hide. He had so frequently and openly declared the principles of his kingdom that there would be many witnesses who could narrate in detail what he had taught.

22–24 Jesus' answer impressed one of the captors as disrespectful to the high priest, and he struck Jesus in the face. The act was illegal. No sentence had been passed, and a prisoner was not subject to abuse, especially when uncondemned. In spite of Jesus' protest, nothing was done; and he was sent bound to Caiaphas (possibly to another room in the same building). John writes nothing about the hearing before Caiaphas (see Mt 26:57–68; Mk 14:53–65; Lk 22:66–71).

C. The Denial by Peter (18:15–18, 25–27)

15–16 Peter and an unnamed disciple (possibly John, cf. 13:23–24; 20:2–3) had traced Jesus and his captors back from Gethsemane over the Kidron Valley to the residence of the high priest in Jerusalem. This anonymous disciple was known to the household of the high priest and readily obtained access for himself and Peter; there is evidence that John may have been distantly related to that family. Peter was in the "courtyard," standing with servants and retainers by a fire (v.18).

17 Apparently Peter's first statement of denial accompanied his admittance to the courtyard; the last occurred somewhat later, perhaps just as Jesus was about to be taken to the council chamber. While there are minor differences in all four accounts of the denial (see Mt 26:69–75; Mk 14:66–72; Lk 22:55–62), in general they agree. The first denial was a reply to a question asked by the girl who tended the gate and granted access to Peter and the other disciple. She recognized both the unnamed disciple and Peter as followers of Jesus.

18 Jerusalem is 2,600 feet above sea level, and on a spring night the air is chilly. The servants had lighted a charcoal fire, which would warm only those near it and would not give off a great deal of light. Peter must have edged toward it, hoping to absorb some warmth, yet not wishing to make himself visible. He certainly did not want to be recognized again!

25 The focus of attention on Peter is interrupted by the author's reversion to the interrogation of Jesus by the high priest (vv.19–24). Then Peter was asked a second time about his association with Jesus. Like the first question, this one called for a negative answer. Peter's answer drew him into a position he could not escape from, causing him to make an emphatic denial: "I am not."

26–27 The third question was raised by a relative of Malchus and was worded in such a way as to expect an affirmative answer. He was sure that he had seen Peter in the olive grove. As the questioning proceeded from suspicion to reasonable certainty, Peter became more nervous. With increasing vehemence he disavowed any connection with Jesus, and on this third occasion the rooster crowed (cf. 13:38). The author adds no further comment at this point, but the fact that he records the denial implies that it was a turning point in Peter's experience. It was a revelation of his own weakness that he could not escape. Peter's final response, however, was the opposite of Judas: Judas in his failure fell into despair; Peter returned to Christ.

D. The Trial Before Pilate (18:28–19:16)

This account of Jesus' trial before Pilate is the longest in the four gospels. Whereas the other three accounts deal largely with the legal charges, John's narrative places more importance on Jesus' concern with Pilate and on Pilate's shifting attitude. Its psychological portrait of Pilate is comparable to that of the Samaritan woman at the well of Sychar (ch. 4) or that of the blind man (ch. 9). The Johannine presentation makes it more of an interview than a trial.

28 John does not describe the early morning session of the council, with Caiaphas as presiding officer (see Mk 14:53–65 and comments). There Jesus was condemned to death; but because the high priest had no authority to execute a death sentence, it was necessary to transfer the case to the Roman prefect, Pontius Pilate, who was in Jerusalem during Passover Week in order to keep close control of the city. Jesus was moved to Pilate's residence about seven or eight o'clock. The Jewish delegation did not enter into the courtroom because entering a Gentile home or business room entailed seven days' defilement. Inasmuch as the Passover was imminent, they did not wish to be excluded from the feast for ceremonial uncleanness.

29–30 Pilate's initial question was the normal opening inquiry for a trial under Roman law: "What charges are you bringing against this man?" He would not automatically pronounce a sentence without knowing the alleged crime. The answer was elusive. The high priest no doubt knew that Jesus was not guilty of any crime under Roman law.

31 Pilate took much the same position Gallio later did at Paul's arrest in Corinth (Ac 18:12–16). An argument about the ceremonial requirements of Jewish law had no standing in a Roman court, and Pilate was ready to dismiss the case. The Jews' admission that they could not execute the prisoner was a confession of their intention. Pilate was shrewd enough to realize that their motive was not a sincere desire to remove a dangerous revolutionary (see Mt 27:18).

32 The introduction of Roman action at this point ensured death by crucifixion, if the Jews could persuade Pilate to render a verdict against Jesus. Jewish capital punishment was inflicted by stoning; but a Roman crucifixion would place Jesus under the curse of God (Dt 21:22–23; cf. Gal 3:13). His messianic claims would be discredited, and the rejection would be justified. The manner of death is explicitly connected with Jesus' own prophecy (Jn 3:14; 12:32–33). Ironically, the death that the Jewish hierarchy regarded as a final negation of Jesus' claims became the means of justification apart from the law (Gal 3:13).

33 Puzzled by the Jewish attitude, Pilate withdrew to the audience chamber within the building and summoned Jesus. His question to Jesus was emphatic: "Are you the king of the Jews?" (italics mine), as if he were asking for a straightforward answer because he did not trust the priests. Pilate may also have been expressing his surprise that Jesus did not look like a pretender to the vacant throne of Judaism. He had expected to meet a sullen or belligerent rebel and met instead the calm majesty of confident superiority. He could not reconcile the character of the prisoner with the charge brought against him.

34 Since he had shown sufficient interest in Jesus to confer with him personally, Jesus began to probe him to ascertain how sincere that interest might be. Was Pilate asking for information on his own initiative, or was he merely following a legal procedure at the instigation of the Jewish hierarchy?

35 Jesus' reply to Pilate's question irritated him, for he was accustomed to receiving answers to his questions, not challenges. His question expected a negative answer: "I am not a Jew, am I?" He insisted that he was merely endeavoring to find the key to the puzzling case the Jewish leaders had brought before him. He had not originated the accusation, but he wanted to know what Jesus had done to arouse their hatred.

36 Jesus asserted that his "kingdom" (GK 993) was not of this world because he had no military support and did not relate to any geographic locality. He did not, however, deny that "king" (GK 995) could be his proper title. He affirmed that his kingdom had a different origin and a different character from any that Pilate knew. Had he been an ordinary revolutionary, he would have offered armed resistance to those who took him captive.

37 Jesus' answer bewildered Pilate. Without attempting to argue about an abstraction that must have seemed irrational to him, Pilate came back to the central question: "So you are a king, then, aren't you?" (my translation). Jesus assented by confirming Pilate's conclusion. Then he declared that his purpose was to bear testimony to truth, and he intimated that anyone who was devoted to truth would listen to him. The obvious inference from his words was that he came into the world from another realm, that whoever did not listen to him would not be characterized by truth, and that if Pilate really wanted to know what truth was, he would give Jesus his earnest attention. As in Jesus' other interviews in this gospel, his focus was not on himself but on reaching the heart of the person he addressed. He appealed to Pilate, not for acquittal or mercy, but for recognition of truth.

The combined statement, "For this reason I was born, and for this I came into the world," can be linked with ch. 1 and reinforces Jesus' statement elsewhere in this gospel that he was fully aware of both his origin and destiny (cf. 8:14).

38 Pilate's reply, "What is truth?" is difficult to interpret. Was it facetious, scornful, impatient, despairing, or sincere? Even from the context it is not possible to be sure what he meant. Pilate's immediate response was to declare Jesus innocent of any crime that would have made him liable to punishment. He may have regarded him as a harmless philosopher or as an impractical dreamer. Certainly he did not look on Jesus as a dangerous subversive.

39 Aware, however, that there were political overtones in the situation that called for some sort of action, Pilate groped for a solution that would be satisfactory to all concerned. Although no other record of it can be found, there must have been the custom of releasing one prisoner at every Passover as a means of placating the Jewish population. Pilate seized on the opportunity to appeal to the masses and suggested that he would release Jesus if they demanded it. His proposal assumed that Jesus was popular with the general crowd, who did not always favor the hierarchy. Pilate may also have been indulging in finely honed sarcasm when he referred to Jesus as "the king of the Jews." If Jesus were not released, the people would be guilty of the death of the one they called their king.

40 Pilate miscalculated the attitude of the crowd at this point. They had been instructed by the priests to ask for the death of Jesus; so instead of his release, they demanded that of a brigand named Barabbas (a guerrilla "resistance fighter" who was being held for execution). In the eyes of the people, he was considered a champion of a free Israel and possibly something of a hero.

19:1 The flogging of Jesus (see comment on Mk 15:15) was the usual accompaniment of crucifixion. Evidently Pilate intended to make an appeal to the sympathy of the mob, hoping that by scourging Jesus, they would call for his release.

2–3 The legionnaires who had administered the scourging amused themselves by a crude joke. Knowing that Jesus was called "king of the Jews," they threw a scarlet cloak about his shoulders, twisted a crown from a thorny vine that grew in the vicinity, and mocked him with the salutation "Hail, king of the Jews!" as they slapped his face.

4–5 As the soldiers brought him out to the view of the crowd, Pilate, having once more declared Jesus' innocence, said, "Here is the man!" Pilate may have thought that the ironic spectacle of a king whose crown was thorns, whose robe a cast-off cloak, and whose status a prisoner would change their attitude. If so, he was speedily disillusioned.

6–7 The Jewish officials demanded crucifixion for no good reason that Pilate could determine. In disgust he told them to crucify him themselves, for no charge could be brought against him. Pilate obviously realized that the Sanhedrin could not execute the sentence; his apparent relegation of Jesus to them was an act of sarcasm. The Jews knew this and made a new approach to Pilate, claiming that by their law Jesus was worthy of death for blasphemy (cf. Lev 24:16), because he claimed to be the Son of God (see comments on 10:34–38).

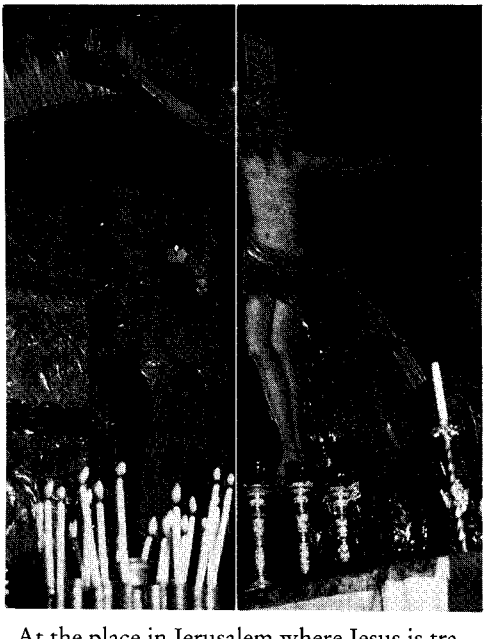
8–9 To the Jews, Jesus' claim was the height of sacrilege. For Pilate, however, it had a different meaning. In pagan mythology the Olympian deities frequently consorted with men and women, and their semi-divine offspring, such as Hercules, had appeared on the earth and performed miraculous deeds. Hardened as he was, Pilate feared lest he should offend one of these visitors. Thus he questioned Jesus further, in an attempt to ascertain who Jesus was. If he really was a supernatural being, Pilate did not wish to be responsible for mistreating him, for that would make him liable to divine judgment. The silence of Jesus, like his silence in the presence of Herod (Lk 23:6–11), meant that he could accomplish nothing with a trifler. Pilate had already pronounced Jesus innocent; so the case resolved itself to the alternative of release or a gross perversion of justice.

10 Jesus' refusal to answer him angered Pilate, whose conceit and arrogance were shown by his question: "Don't you realize I have power either to free you or to crucify you?" He was insulted because Jesus had not shown him more deference. Pilate's assertion of authority seems almost ridiculous in contrast with the weakness and indecision he exhibited in this case. Jesus, who could view the situation in its true light, knew that though Pilate had the legal authority of which he boasted, he was really hampered by political pressures.

11 Jesus looked on Pilate as simply an instrument in God's purpose. The real guilt lay with those who had delivered Jesus to Pilate in the first place (i.e., Caiaphas and the Jewish hierarchy).

12 Jesus' penetrating analysis of the situation made Pilate more eager than ever to release him. But the popular pressure was too strong. The cry "If you let this man go, you are no friend of Caesar" carried the day. The phrase "a friend of Caesar" usually denoted a supporter or associate of the emperor, a member of the important inner circle. The cry was a veiled threat: if Pilate exonerated Jesus, the high priest would report to Rome that Pilate had refused to bring a rival pretender to justice and was perhaps plotting to establish a new political alliance of his own. Tiberius, the reigning emperor, was notoriously bitter and suspicious of rivals. If such a report were sent to him, he would instantly end Pilate's political career and probably his life.

13 Jesus' analysis of Pilate's situation accentuated the dilemma he found himself entangled in. If he condemned Jesus to satisfy the Jewish hierarchy, he would be making a travesty of Roman justice. If he released Jesus, he would add to his contention with the hierarchy and would endanger his already shaky political future. But the decision could no longer be deferred.



14–15 The time in view here depends on the method of reckoning "the sixth hour." If it were reckoned from midnight, it would be about six o'clock in the morning; if from sunrise, which accords better with John's general procedure, it would be about noon. But Mark states that the Crucifixion took place at "the third hour" (Mk 15:25). Perhaps Mark indicates that the trial came early and that the execution occurred at mid-morning, while John stresses the fact that it was accomplished before noon.

Pilate presented the bleeding, disheveled figure to the crowd with these words: "Here is your king." In their bitter irony, these words show Pilate's contempt for the Jews. As the people clamored for Jesus' crucifixion, Pilate scornfully asked, "Shall I crucify your king?" The reply of the chief priests is astonishing: "We have no king but Caesar." The official heads of the nation, who would gladly have welcomed independence, put themselves on record as subjects of the pagan emperor. Even allowing for the fact that the Sadducean priesthood was willing to compromise with the Romans for the sake of political advantage, nothing revealed their lack of spiritual principles so vividly as this act of betrayal. It was the final step in the process initially described in 7:11.

16 Realizing that the priests were implacable and that resisting them would only endanger his career, Pilate finally gave in and ordered the Crucifixion. Certain features of Pilate's examination of Jesus are significant. His behavior shows that he was apprehensive of trouble. He oscillated between public confrontation with the Jewish mob and private interrogation of Jesus. Seven times in this brief narrative the author says or implies that Pilate "went out" or "went in" (18:29, 33, 38; 19:1, 4, 9, 13). Beneath his arrogant manner, there was an uncertainty that came from the conflict between Pilate the Roman judge and Pilate the politician. He finally succumbed to expediency.

From the standpoint of Jesus, Pilate was a person in need; and Jesus gave him the opportunity of receiving truth if he would have it. Jesus made a greater effort to penetrate Pilate's mind than to defend himself. When Pilate asked, "What is truth?" (18:38), he was near to the kingdom of God because incarnate truth was standing before him (14:6). Pilate sacrificed truth for what he thought was security and lost both.

At the place in Jerusalem where Jesus is traditionally considered to have been crucified stands the Church of the Holy Sepulchre.

E. The Crucifixion (19:17–27)

17 Under Pilate's orders, Jesus was turned over to an execution squad, which normally consisted of four legionnaires and a centurion (cf. v.23). A condemned person customarily wore a placard (v.20) giving his name and the nature of his crime and carried the transverse beam of his cross. The procession moved from Pilate's judgment seat to a place outside the city called Golgotha, "The Place of the Skull" (see comment on Mk 15:22).

18 Apart from this simple statement, the writer makes no attempt to describe the process of crucifixion, probably because it was well known to the readers and he did not want to dwell on the physical horror of the Cross. At the place of execution, the condemned man was affixed to the cross by nails driven through the hands or wrists and through the feet. Generally, a rope was tied around the chest knotted between the shoulders, and then tied to the wooden stake behind the body to prevent its falling forward as fatigue weakened the muscles. A peg was set in the upright stake to act as a supporting seat. The victim was stripped of his clothing and left shamefully naked, exposed to the mocking people, the heat of the sun by day, and the chill and dampness of night (on death by crucifixion, see comment on Mk 15:24). A crucified man might live as long as thirty-six hours, or even longer, in an increasing agony. Crucifixion was probably the most diabolical form of death ever invented. Paul, in writing of the humiliation of Christ, says, "He humbled himself and became obedient to [the point of] death—even death on a cross" (Php 2:8, italics mine), a statement that reveals his feeling toward death by this method.

John gives no details concerning the two others crucified with Jesus (see comments on Mt 27:16; Mk 15:27).

19–22 The placard (see comment on v.17) was written in three languages, in order to make the inscription plain to all: Aramaic, for the local inhabitants; Latin, for the officials; Greek, the lingua franca of the eastern Mediterranean world. Its content was Pilate's psychological revenge on the Jewish hierarchy for forcing his decision. It proclaimed loudly to all passersby that Rome had crucified the king of the Jews as a common criminal. Stung by the insult, the priests remonstrated, asking that Pilate make clear that it was only Jesus' claim to be king of the Jews. Having succeeded by his unjust compromise in removing any possible ground of accusation that he was derelict in his duty to the Roman state, Pilate resumed his haughty attitude and refused to change the wording. "What I have written, I have written" means essentially, "Take it and like it!"

23–24 Usually the clothing of a crucified man became the property of the executioners. Jesus' simple wardrobe was composed of five items: a turban or headdress; an outer robe; a sash or girdle, the folds of which would provide pockets; sandals; and a fairly long tunic woven in one piece, that was an undergarment. The first four were easily divided among the four legionnaires, but the fifth would be of no value if cut into four parts. Gambling was well-known in the Roman army, so the tunic was awarded to one of them at the cast of the dice. John's reason for mentioning this episode was its fulfillment of the prophecy of Ps 22. This psalm is a startling picture of the Crucifixion, which begins with Christ's fourth word from the cross: "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" (Mt 27:46; Mk 15:34). If Pilate's inscription shows that he exploited Jesus' crucifixion as a means of psychological vengeance, the gambling of the legionnaires shows their callous and mercenary attitude.

25–27 The harsh brutality of the scene is softened by the allusion to Jesus' care for his mother. Four women are mentioned here: Mary, the wife of Clopas; Mary Magdalene; Mary, the mother of Jesus; and his mother's sister, who was presumably Salome, the mother of James and John (cf. Mt 27:56; Mk 10:35; 15:40). The identity of Mary of Clopas is uncertain. Mary of Magdala (a town on the western side of the Sea of Galilee) appears in Luke's list of those who helped support Jesus by their contributions (Lk 8:2). Nothing in the NT implies that she was of loose moral character.

The anguish and terror of Jesus' mother at the Crucifixion must have been indescribable. His tender concern for her in the hour of his mortal agony illustrates his true humanity and compassion. On the assumption that John was "the disciple whom he loved," it could well be that Jesus consigned his mother to John's care because none of his brothers was present and because John was the nearest available relative. Apparently John removed Mary from the scene at once and took her to his home in Jerusalem. His temporary absence may account for the omission of some of the details found in the Synoptic Gospels, including Jesus' dialogue with the criminals who were crucified with him. Mary must have remained in Jerusalem for a time since she was present at the session of prayer that preceded Pentecost.

F. The Death of Jesus (19:28–37)

28 The phrases in John preceding Jesus' last request (his sixth word from the cross) show that he was consciously fulfilling the program the Father had set for him. "Knowing that all was now completed" accords with what he had said earlier in his prayer (17:4). Unerringly and methodically Jesus carried out the commission the Father had assigned to him. The phrase "I am thirsty" recalls Ps 69:21. Jesus' loss of blood, his nervous tension, and his exposure to the weather had generated a raging thirst.

29 The "vinegar" was probably the cheap sour wine that the legionnaires drank. Though it provided some refreshment, it was a strong astringent that could contract the throat muscles and prevent the condemned victim from crying out with pain. Just what is meant by "hyssop" is uncertain. The word may describe more than one plant. Perhaps it was the Capparis sicula, a plant that grows on the walls of Jerusalem (see ZPEB, 3:235). The thirst consummated Jesus' physical suffering. Having passed that stage, he had completed his work and was ready to end his mission.

30 The phrase "It is finished" (GK 5464) signifies the completion of Jesus' work and the establishment of a basis for faith. Nothing further needed to be done. His act was voluntary and confident, for he had discharged perfectly the Father's purpose and was triumphantly leaving the scene of his human struggle. This expression is almost certainly a shout of victory. John makes it the final report of Jesus to the Father, who would now exalt him to glory. Having said this, Jesus "laid his head to rest and dismissed his spirit"

(lit. tr.). He retained consciousness and command of himself till the very end.

31–32 Jesus died on the day preceding the Sabbath, hence, on Friday, "the day of Preparation" (cf. Mk 15:42). The day began at sunset on Thursday and ended at sunset on Friday. The meal Jesus and his disciples ate must have been on Thursday night, which would actually fall on the Passover since the Jewish day began in the evening (see comments on Jn 13:2). The removal of bodies from the cross was a concession to Jewish religious scruples. The Romans usually left the bodies of criminals on their crosses as a warning to potential offenders, much as pirates in the eighteenth century were hung in chains so that passing ships might see their fate. The Jewish law forbade leaving hanged bodies on a gallows overnight (Dt 21:22–23; Jos 8:29). The soldiers broke the legs of the living victims to hasten death. The only way a crucified man could obtain a full breath of air was to raise himself by means of his legs to ease the tension on his arms and chest muscles. If his legs were broken, he could not possibly do so; and death would follow shortly because of lack of oxygen.

33 The execution squad was well acquainted with the signs of death. Consequently, not fracturing Jesus' legs shows that they considered him to be already dead. His swift death undoubtedly indicates a voluntary ending of his life because his work was ended (v.30; cf. Lk 23:46). He had said of himself that he could lay down his life that he might take it again (10:17).

34–37 One of the soldiers pierced Jesus' side with his spear, probably to see whether there would be any reaction. The flow of "blood and water" has been variously explained. Ordinarily dead bodies do not bleed because there is no action of the heart to produce arterial pressure. One suggestion is that since the body was erect, the flow was due to gravity and that the crassamentum (the heavy, red corpuscles) and the serum (the yellowish white aqueous part) of the blood had already begun to separate. Another is that either the stomach or the lungs contained water that flowed with the blood. The author places great importance on this fact, emphasizing that he had witnessed it for himself and that he was telling the truth. He connects the fact that no bones were broken with Ex 12:46; Ps 34:20 and the pierced side with Zec 12:10 (where that fact is related to the final manifestation of the Lord to Israel). Verses 35–37 are a footnote giving the author's viewpoint in the third person, a usage in keeping with his practice throughout the gospel.

G. The Burial of Jesus (19:38–42)

38 Burial in the Middle East usually takes place within twenty-four hours after death. Normally, the body of Jesus would have been flung into a common pit with the bodies of the two other victims, but two of his friends intervened. Jesus had no estate of his own from which to pay for a proper burial, and his relatives were either too poor or too afraid of the authorities to assume responsibility for it. Joseph of Arimathea stepped forward (see comments on Mk 15:42–43; Lk 23:50–54) and asked Pilate for permission to remove the body. His action was courageous, for his petition was a tacit admission that he was a friend of Jesus and consequently an associate in whatever supposed subversion Jesus might have advocated. He was now openly confessing his faith, for up to this time he had been a secret believer.

39 Nicodemus, another distinguished member of the Jewish aristocracy, shared the responsibility for receiving Jesus' body with Joseph. This marks his third appearance in the gospel (see 3:1–15; 7:45–52). Like Joseph, Nicodemus was a secret disciple whose faith grew slowly. As a member of the Sanhedrin, he had more at stake than the Galilean fishermen who had become followers of Jesus early in his career. His cooperation with Joseph in the burial shows that his faith had finally matured. Neither of these men appears in the Jewish records or traditions of the time, presumably because as traitors to Judaism, their names were erased from the records.

The mixture of spices that Nicodemus provided was a large quantity. Spices were generally imported and were very expensive. Myrrh is a gum exuded by a tree that grows in Arabia and is prized for its perfume. It was one of the gifts of the wise men to Jesus (Mt 2:11). Aloes are derived from the pulp in the leaves of a plant that belongs to the lily family. This spice is fragrant and bitter to the taste. Used with myrrh, it acts as a drying agent; and the fragrance would counteract the odor of decaying flesh. The quantity of one hundred Roman pounds (about 75 lbs.) reveals both Nicodemus's wealth and his appreciation of Jesus.

40 The burial of the body was hasty and had to be completed before sundown. The process is uncertain. The spices, being of somewhat gummy character, may have been laid in the folds of the cloth to provide a rigid casing for the body, or, more likely, they were ground and mixed with oil to form an ointment to rub on the body. "Strips of linen" refers to graveclothes, the sort that in the case of Lazarus were wrapped around him in such a way that he had to be released after he was raised (11:44–45).

41 The place of burial was a private garden, probably Joseph's own rock-hewn tomb (Mt 27:60). The privacy of this garden allowed the women to visit the tomb. No doubt they would have been hesitant to enter a public cemetery at any time—especially before daylight. The location was near the place of execution and was probably just outside the Second North Wall of the city.

42 The allusion to "the Jewish day of Preparation" creates the impression that the burial was hasty, though the amount of spices suggests that as far as Joseph and Nicodemus were concerned, it was final (though they may not have completed all they wished to do). The women observed the place of the entombment. Consequently they knew where to go in order to fulfill their desire for a part in the burial of Jesus.

H. The Resurrection (20:1–29)

If the narrative of John had ended with ch. 19, it would not have been exceptional; all human biographies end with death. The picture of Jesus would have been that of a man of exceptional character, who made extraordinary claims, and whose sincerity could not be reasonably doubted. Nevertheless, the main narrative would have been closed with a sense of frustration. His claims would have been negated, his aspirations would have been unrealized, and his teaching would have seemed too lofty to be true. The major difference between the life and teachings of Jesus and those of any other great religious leader lies in the fact that Jesus rose from the dead and the others did not, however persistent their influence may be.

In presenting the evidence for Jesus' resurrection, John deals more with its effect on human personality than with the material proofs that the Western mind would prefer. He assumes the fact and then shows how it influenced certain disciples in such a way that its reality becomes indisputable.

1. The witness of Peter and John (20:1–9)

1 "The first day of the week" was the day after the Sabbath. In the Jewish method of reckoning time, it began with sundown on Saturday and continued until sundown on Sunday. The text indicates that the visit of the women to the tomb occurred early on that Sunday morning. Only Mary Magdalene is mentioned by name, but others are listed in the Synoptic Gospels (Mt 28:1; Mk 16:1; Lk 24:10). Likely Mary Magdalene, noticing that the stone had been rolled away from the door of the tomb, ran to warn the disciples while the others investigated further.

2 Mary hastened to find Peter and "the other disciple, the one Jesus loved" (likely John), the leaders of the Twelve, and announced that the body was missing from the tomb: "They have taken the Lord." No identification is given for "they." Either the word is an impersonal plural or else, as is more likely, it is an oblique reference to the Jewish hierarchy who had designed Jesus' death. Obviously Mary thought the body had been secretly removed by Jesus' enemies.

3 The quick response of Peter and John shows that the disciples were not responsible for removing the body. Had they been aware of an official removal, or had some of their own number been involved in a conspiracy, they would not have been so concerned.

4–5 Both Peter and John "ran" to the tomb (cf. the women "running" in Mt 28:6). Their running shows they were activated by a powerful emotion, possibly either consternation, as in the case of Mary, or joy, as with the women. Peter, perhaps being the older and heavier of the two, was unable to maintain as swift a pace as his companion. John arrived first but did not venture to enter the tomb. Having seen that the graveclothes were still within, he probably concluded that the body was also there and so refrained from entering.

Either he felt that he should not enter the tomb out of respect for the dead, or he feared the ceremonial defilement of touching a corpse.

6–7 Peter, who by this time had arrived, had no such inhibitions and entered directly into the tomb. He also saw the graveclothes and observed that the headcloth was not lying with the other pieces but was rolled up in a place by itself. This means the headcloth still retained the shape that the contour of Jesus' head had given it and that it was still separated from the other wrappings by a space that suggested the distance between the neck of the deceased and the upper chest, where the wrappings of the body would have begun. Peter must have been wondering why the graveclothes were left in this position if the body had been stolen. A robber would not have left them in good order. He would have stripped the body completely, leaving the clothing in a disorderly heap; or he would have taken the body, graveclothes and all.

8 At this point, the "other disciple" summoned up courage to enter the tomb, perhaps wondering what had reduced Peter to silence. He saw the meaning of the empty graveclothes and "believed." The unique phenomenon of the graveclothes looking as if the body were in them when no body was there undoubtedly recalled Jesus' previous words (cf. 2:22; 11:25; 16:22).

9 The teaching of Scripture, however, was not yet clear to the disciples, and they required fuller explanation by Jesus (cf. Lk 24:25–27, 44–47). To what "Scripture" does this passage refer? There is a parallel in Jn 2:21, which asserts that the disciples understood Jesus' statement about raising the temple of his body in connection with Scripture. The gospel of John contains no specific text that might be interpreted as a prediction of the Resurrection. Perhaps Ps 16:10, quoted by Peter in Ac 2:24–31, is the "Scripture" being suggested.

For these two key disciples, the realization of the truth of the Resurrection began with material evidence, the significance of which dawned on them slowly. Their eagerness to visit the tomb showed their concern for Jesus. Had they dismissed him from their consciousness after his death, they would not have exerted themselves by running to Joseph's garden early in the morning. Their understanding, however, was slow in spite of Jesus' repeated predictions of his passion and resurrection.

2. The appearance to Mary Magdalene (20:10–18)

10 Puzzled but convinced that something unusual had occurred at the tomb, Peter and John returned to their lodgings in Jerusalem (possibly the "upper room") or perhaps to the same place that John took Mary at the time of the Crucifixion.

11 Mary Magdalene had returned to the tomb and stood outside, wailing for the loss of Jesus. On looking into the tomb, she saw two figures in white seated on the shelf where the body of Jesus had been lying, one at the foot and the other at the head. The tomb was a horizontal chamber cut through the soft limestone rock on which Jerusalem was built. Usually such tombs had a small antechamber into which the low entrance opened and from which the burial chambers radiated. This tomb seems to have been large enough to accommodate several living persons in addition to the burial cells.

12 No description is given of the angels, except that they were clothed in white (cf. Ac 1:10). When angels appear in the Bible, they are usually recognized by their powers rather than by any significant difference from human form. Mary did not respond to them in any unusual way, possibly because her eyes were clouded with tears or because she was preoccupied with the loss of Jesus' body.

13 The question the angels asked Mary brought from her only an expression of grief and frustration. The death of Jesus, which she had witnessed, was in itself distressing and unnerving; the disappearance of the body from the place of burial added apprehension and mystery to her grief. She had hoped for the sad consolation of completing the burial, and even that had now been taken from her.

14 As Mary turned back toward the outside of the tomb, she saw a person standing there whom she took for the keeper of the garden. She was aware of his presence, but paid scant attention to him because of her overwhelming concern for the body of Jesus.

15 The person addressed her first as a stranger, using the polite salutation "Woman" and asking the reason for her grief. From her lamentations one would conclude that she had lost some possession or some person. Thinking that Jesus was the keeper of the garden, she assumed that he would know she was looking for a body. So she requested that if he had removed it, he would tell her where she might find it that she might take it for final burial. Her words reveal her devotion. She never paused to consider how she would carry the corpse of a full-grown man or how she would explain her possession of it.

16 Only one thing was necessary to establish Jesus' identity—his uttering her name. One of the strange commonplaces of life is that the most penetrating utterance one can understand, no matter by whom spoken, is one's personal name. Furthermore, the way it is spoken often identifies the speaker. No gardener would ever have known her name, and no one else would pronounce it the way Jesus did. Turning again for a second look, she addressed him in Aramaic as "Rabboni" (a term by which one addressed a teacher). In this ecstatic moment of recognition, Mary must have prostrated herself before Jesus and clasped his feet, as the other women had done (see Mt 28:9).

17 In reply to her action, Jesus said, "Do not hold onto me." He was not refusing to be touched but was making clear that she did not need to detain him, for he had not yet ascended to the Father. He planned to remain with the disciples for a little while; she need not fear that he would vanish immediately. Ultimately he would return to God, and he urged her to tell the disciples that he would do so. The word "brothers" (GK 81) includes more than the members of his immediate family. It placed the disciples on a new plane of relationship with himself. Having passed through death and resurrection, Jesus had become the representative man, the Lord from heaven, who "is not ashamed to call them brothers" (Heb 2:11; cf. also Mk 3:33–34).

The way Jesus stated his destination is illuminating: "I am returning to my Father and your Father, to my God and your God." Nowhere in the Gospels did Jesus personally address God as "our Father" or "our God." The reason for the distinction in his word to Mary was not, of course, that there were two gods, but that her relationship with God was different from his. He is the eternal Son of the Father; she, as well as all the disciples, had become a member of the family by receiving him (cf. 1:12). Both relationships concerned only one God.

18 Mary's announcement to the disciples that she had seen the Lord was an additional confirmation of the belief that rested on inference from material evidence. The beloved disciple had believed, but he had not yet personally seen the risen Lord Jesus. Mary brought the witness of her experience to corroborate his deduction.

3. The appearance to the disciples (20:19–23)

19–20 The third episode came in the evening of the first day. John does not cite the appearances to Simon and to the travelers on the road to Emmaus (see Lk 24:13–35). This appearance came to the collective group in order to allay their fears. They had narrowly escaped arrest with Jesus in Gethsemane; they realized that as the disciples of one who was regarded as a dangerous agitator they would be under suspicion; and they were probably consulting together on how best to withdraw from the city without attracting the notice of the temple police or the Roman authorities. The doors were locked for fear that the Jews would send an arresting detachment for them as they had for Jesus.

The appearance of Jesus in the room resulted in both amazement and fear. The implication is clear that Jesus was not impeded by locked doors. The resurrection body has properties different from the body of flesh; yet it is not ethereal. There was a definite continuity between the physical body of Jesus' earthly career and the new body since his hands and side still showed the scars that identified him. His greeting of "Peace" and the assurance of his identity calmed their fears and demonstrated by unmistakable proof that he was alive. They were overjoyed, not only to see him again, but also to realize that he was undefeated by death and that his claims were validated.

21 The repetition of the common greeting "Peace" reassured the disciples of his real presence. Not only did his appearance renew their devotion and their hopes, but it also renewed their commission as disciples. Had there been no Resurrection, there would have been little motive for them to undertake a mission in his name. But since he had risen, the old commitment was even more compelling. "As the Father has sent me," he said, "I am sending you." He had come into the world to fulfill the Father's purpose—to speak his words, to do his works, and to lay down his life for the salvation of humans; now he expected them to continue his work in his absence by delivering his message (15:27), doing greater works than he had done (14:12), and giving their lives in his service. They would have all the privileges, all the protection, and all the responsibilities that he had during his ministry.

22–23 For this ministry Jesus provided the Holy Spirit and the commission to proclaim the forgiveness of sins. These are linked together for a new ministry. This was the initial announcement of which Pentecost was the historic fulfillment. The descent of the Spirit on the church at Pentecost brought the proclamation by Peter to his hearers: "Repent and be baptized, every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ so that your sins may be forgiven" (Ac 2:38). The words of Jesus emphasize that the Holy Spirit is not bestowed on the church as an ornament but to empower an effective application of the work of Christ to the entire human race.

The commission to forgive sins is phrased in an unusual construction. Literally, it is: "Those whose sins you forgive have already been forgiven; those whose sins you do not forgive have not been forgiven" (similarly also Mt 16:19; see comments). God does not forgive people's sins because we decide to do so, nor does he withhold forgiveness because we will not grant it. We announce it; we do not create it. This is the essence of salvation. And all who proclaim the Gospel are in effect forgiving or not forgiving sins, depending on whether the hearer accepts or rejects the Lord Jesus as the Sin-Bearer.

4. The confession of Thomas (20:24–29)

24 Thomas is singled out for special treatment because his confession provides a climactic illustration of the triumph of belief. "Thomas" is Aramaic for "twin," of which Didymus is the Greek equivalent (cf. Jn 11:16; 21:2). In 11:16 and 14:5 Thomas appears as a loyal, outspoken, and rather pessimistic person who was uncertain of the future but closely attached to Jesus. Much the same picture emerges from this episode. He was absent from the gathering on the first day of the week, though he must have been in contact with the rest of the disciples afterwards.

25 In spite of the repeated assurances of his colleagues that Jesus had risen, Thomas was obstinate. So certain was he of the death of Jesus that he insisted he would not believe unless he could actually touch Jesus' body. Thomas would be satisfied by nothing less than material evidence. His incredulity is testimony to the fact that the resurrection appearances were not illusions induced by wishful thinking.

26 A week later, also on Sunday evening, Thomas was with the disciples, who had remained in Jerusalem. He must have recovered somewhat from the original shock of Jesus' death and was willing to rejoin his old associates. The reappearance of Jesus took place under the same conditions as the previous appearance, which the disciples had described to Thomas. Therefore, he could not charge them with having fabricated their report when Jesus greeted them in the same manner as before.

27 Jesus' appeal to Thomas shows that he knew what Thomas had said to his colleagues when they told him of the first appearance. Since Jesus had not been visibly present to hear his reaction to their report, Thomas must have been startled to hear Jesus quote his very words. Jesus did not immediately upbraid him for his doubts, but he challenged him to perform the test that he had suggested. Jesus' words can be translated "Stop becoming an unbeliever and become a believer." Jesus halted Thomas on the road to a despairing unbelief and offered him the positive evidence on which he could build an enduring faith.

28 Thomas was disposed to believe in Jesus by his personal attachment to him, as he demonstrated previously by his resolute adherence in impending danger (11:16). Now, having been challenged to make a personal test of Jesus' reality, Thomas expressed fullest faith in him. For a Jew to call another human associate "my Lord and my God" is incredible. The Jewish law was strictly monotheistic; so the deification of any man would be regarded as blasphemy (10:33). Thomas, in the light of the Resurrection, applied to Jesus two titles of deity.

29 Jesus' commendation of Thomas is extended to all others who, like Thomas, place a final faith in him but who, unlike Thomas, have no opportunity to see him in his post-resurrection form. Thomas's declaration is the last assertion of personal faith recorded in this gospel. It marks the climax of the book because it presents Christ as the risen Lord, victorious over sin, sorrow, doubt, and death. It also presents the faith that accepts not only the truth of what Jesus said but also the actuality of who he is—the Son of God. In the experience of Thomas, the writer has shown how belief comes to maturity and how it changes the entire direction of an individual life.

I. Statement of Purpose (20:30–31)

30–31 The last two verses of this chapter are really the conclusion of the gospel. They summarize its strategy, subject, and purpose. The strategy is to use selected works of Jesus as "signs" (GK 4958) that illustrate his character, demonstrate his power, and relate him to human need. Seven of these signs have been narrated, exclusive of the final sign, the Resurrection. Each one involved a human personality and showed how the power of Jesus can be applied to human emergencies. These signs were performed in the presence of the disciples so that they were attested by sympathetic and competent witnesses as well as by those who happened to be present at the time, whether friendly or hostile to Jesus. The criteria for selection seem to be magnitude, varied individual significance, and effect on both the disciples and the public.

The signs, however, are not of primary intrinsic importance. The chief subject of the gospel is the Lord Jesus Christ, whom the author desires to present as the Christ (Messiah or Anointed One; see comments on Mt 1:1; Mk 8:29–30), the Son of God. Jesus was given this title "Messiah" by the earliest disciples (1:41), but it seldom appears in this gospel (cf. 4:25–26); and Jesus did not use it concerning himself because of its political overtones. This title also represented the deliverer from sin promised in the Old Testament as the fulfillment of the covenants with the patriarchs and David, the one who would consummate God's purpose for the nation and the world. At that time the Jewish nation was still looking for the Messiah; John asserts that he had already come.

The title "Son of God" appears at intervals in the text of this gospel. John the Baptist introduced Jesus by this title (1:34); Nathanael applied it to him (1:49); and on several occasions Jesus applied it to himself (e.g., 5:25; 10:36; 11:4). This title would appeal to the Gentile world rather than to the Jew, for the Gentiles did not have the same reservations about it as the Jews did. The title does not, of course, imply biological descent like that of the Greco-Roman demigods; but the metaphor of sonship expresses the unity of nature, close fellowship, and unique intimacy between Jesus and the Father. To believe that Jesus is the Christ and the Son of God involves the total acceptance of the revelation of God that he offers, the acknowledgment of his divine authority, and the fulfillment of the commission he entrusted to his disciples.

The total purpose of this belief is eternal life, a new and enduring experience of God by the believer. This conclusion ties together the three persistent themes of the gospel: the "signs" that demonstrate Christ's nature and power; the response of "belief" that is exemplified in the crises and growth in the lives of the disciples; and the new "life" that is found in the relationship with Christ.

V. The Epilogue (21:1–25)

Chapter 21 of John is a postscript to the main development of the book. It is not irrelevant to the preceding text; in fact, it completes it by illustrating the result of belief. It reads like a reminiscence that the author might have added subsequent to the composition of the first part by dictation to an assistant or scribe. The language bears a strong likeness both to the Synoptics and to other sections of John. The miracle of the catch of fish resembles the initial episode related to the call of the disciples (Lk 5: 1–11); the action of Simon Peter is completely in character with other representations of his tendency toward impulsive speech or action (Mt 16:21–23; 26:33–35; John 13:36–38; et al.); the allusion to "sheep" follows the figure of 10:1–18; and v.19 uses phraseology concerning Peter that is applied to Jesus in 12:33. Apart from its relation to the themes and language of the main body of this gospel, it owes its origin to the need for dispelling a false legend that had become current concerning Jesus' supposed prediction that the author of John would not die before Jesus' return.

A. The Appearance at the Sea (21:1–14)

1 "Afterward" implies an indefinite lapse of time (cf.2:12; 3:22; et al.), but not always a long time. Since this event is categorized as Jesus' third appearance to the disciples after the Resurrection (v.14), it must have taken place between the beginning of the second week and the Ascension outside Jerusalem near Bethany (Lk 24:50–53; cf. Ac 1:1–12).

This appearance took place in Galilee. John is the only NT writer to use the name "Sea of Tiberias" for the Sea of Galilee (see Mt 4:18; 15:29; Mk 1:16; 7:31) or the Lake of Gennesaret (see Lk 5 1). John speaks once of the "Sea of Galilee" but qualifies it: "that is, the Sea of Tiberias" (6:1).

"Appeared" (GK 5746), translated by "happened" at its second occurrence in this verse, is a characteristic word in John. It was most frequently used to denote the self-revelation of Christ (1:31; 2:11; 9:3). It occurs three times in the epilogue (21:1 [twice], 14) in preparation for the final revelation of Jesus regarding the commissioning of Peter for his coming ministry. John also uses the term in his first letter, concerning both the incarnate Christ (1Jn 1:2; 3:5, 8; 4:9) and his return (2:28; 3:2). Not only was this occasion an appearance of Christ after his resurrection, but it was also a disclosure of his purpose for the disciples.

2 The seven disciples who were present include several previously named in this gospel: Simon Peter (1:40–42, 44; et al.); Thomas (11:16; 14:5–6; 20:24–29); Nathanael (1:45–50); the sons of Zebedee, who are not mentioned directly in this gospel; and two others, possibly Philip (1:43–46; et al.) and Andrew (1:40–42, 44; 6:8; 12:22). The reason for the disciples' return to Galilee may have been to escape scrutiny and criticism by the mob in Jerusalem or to obey the command of Jesus (Mt 28:7, 10; Mk 16:6). Or perhaps they were discouraged by Jesus' death and decided to return to their old occupation of fishing. The kingdom had not arrived, and they had to make a living.

3 The leadership of Simon Peter is apparent at this point, and the others assented to Peter's proposal; so they embarked in a boat that was available for a night of fishing (possibly Peter's; cf. "the boat"). Their enthusiasm ended in frustration, for no fish were caught.

4–5 Jesus appeared in the early morning, just as day was breaking. The fishermen no doubt were cold, wet with the dampness and spray of the lake, and discouraged by their lack of success. They failed to recognize Jesus, perhaps because they were preoccupied with their failure, or because they could not see him clearly through the morning mist on the lake. Jesus asked the disciples whether they had caught any fish. The construction of the question implies that he knew they had caught nothing. This was confirmed by their dispirited answer: "No."

6–7 By commanding them to cast the net on the right side of the ship, Jesus was either testing their faith by recommending a procedure the Galilean fishermen never used, or he could discern the presence of a school of fish from the more advantageous viewpoint of the shore. Whatever the reason for the suggestion, the disciples evidently felt that one more attempt at casting the net could be no more futile than their nightlong efforts had been; and it might be worthwhile. The resultant catch was so great that they could not load it into the boat. The similarities between this episode and the one recorded in Lk 5:1–11 prompted the disciples' recognition of Jesus. "The disciple whom Jesus loved" was the first one to recognize the mysterious stranger on the shore as none other than the Lord Jesus himself.

Peter's quick reaction revealed his real feeling toward Jesus. Grasping his outer cloak, which he had laid aside to give him more freedom in working, he wrapped it around himself and dived overboard. His eagerness to see Jesus was consistent with his former profession of loyalty, which he had intended to keep but had not. This was probably not the moment of reconciliation, however, for Luke states that Jesus had met Peter personally on the first day of the Resurrection (Lk 24:35), as well as at the locked-door episodes (Jn 20:19–29).

8 A net full of live fish swimming toward the depths rather than toward the shore would be difficult to manage. The disciples in the ship pulled the net into shallow water where they could disembark and then sort out the fish.

9–10 Jesus had breakfast ready for the disciples, but he suggested that they bring some of the fish they had caught. Earlier, in the miraculous feedings of the multitudes with the fish and the loaves (see 6:1–14), the Lord had taken what the disciples had provided, multiplied it, and used it to supply the needs of many. Here he showed that he would continue to multiply and bless their efforts. However, they were yet to be told what direction those efforts were to take.

11 Simon Peter returned to the boat and pulled the net to land. If he did this by himself, he must have possessed unusual strength. One hundred and fifty-three fish plus a wet net would probably weigh as much as three hundred pounds. The observation of the exact number of the fish and the fact that the net did not break reflect both an eyewitness account and a fisherman's perspective. John was impressed by the numerical size of the catch and the preservation of the net under the stress. These fish were probably sorted and distributed among the disciples.

12–14 When the catch had been safely brought to land and presumably sorted, Jesus invited the men to eat with him. Their attitude was peculiar. They desired to ask his identity, but they dared not do so because somehow they "knew" he was the Lord. He had appeared in their beloved Galilee and had repeated the same kind of miracle by which they first had been called to him. In spite of an apparent change in his outward appearance, the disciples' spiritual instinct confirmed his identity. His action in serving them with the bread and fish must have recalled the Last Supper, when he offered them bread and wine. There was, however, no sacramental overtone to this occasion.

The text states that this was Jesus' "third" appearance to the disciples as a group since his resurrection (see 20:19–23, 24–29).

B. The Reinstatement of Peter (21:15–23)

15–17 The chief reason for the narration of this episode seems to be to let Peter know that the Lord still loved him and had not cast him out (cf. 15:6). The three questions Jesus addressed to Peter stand in contrast to Peter's three denials. The disciples were no doubt aware of Peter's denial of Jesus, and the commission that Jesus renewed with him in their presence would reassure them of Peter's place among them. The wording of the first question, "Do you truly love me more than these?" contains an ambiguity. There are three possible solutions:

1. Do you love me more than these other men do?
2. Do you love me more than you love these men?
3. Do you love me more than these things—the boats, the fish, etc.?

In view of Peter's earlier boastful promise that whatever the others did he would not fail, the first option seems most likely.

The words translated "love" have also raised considerable debate. Two different terms are used: agapao (GK 26) is used in Jesus' first two questions and phileo (GK 5797) is used in Jesus' third question and in Peter's three replies. The former is the same word "love" that appears in 3:16; it is used of divine love and usually carries the connotation of will or purpose as well as that of affection. Phileo implies affinity, friendship, and fondness. Both words represent a high aspect of love, for both are used of God (3:16; 5:20) and of humans (14:21; 16:27) in this gospel. Some maintain that these words here are interchangeable. On the other hand, a good case can be made for a difference in Jesus' emphasis. There was less doubt concerning Peter's attachment to Jesus than there was concerning his will to love at all costs; and the change of term in Jesus' third question makes his probing of Peter even deeper. If the latter alternative is adopted, it explains better Peter's distress when questioned a third time, since Jesus would not only be challenging his love but would be implying that it was superficial.

Peter's affirmative answer to each question is substantially the same. The verb "know" (GK 1182) used in the first two responses is a word that implies the intellectual knowledge of a fact. In his third reply, however, Peter strengthened his statement by a word that denotes knowledge gained through experience.

Jesus' commands to Peter also contain fine distinctions:

1. "Feed [pasture] my lambs" (v.15).
2. "Take care of [shepherd] my sheep" (v.16).
3. "Feed [pasture] my sheep" (v.17).

The first and third imply only taking the sheep to pasture where they are fed; the second implies the total guardianship a shepherd exercises. This threefold injunction does not necessarily give Peter the sole responsibility for the oversight of Christ's followers; all of his spiritually mature disciples are called to be shepherds (cf. 1Pe 5:2). This challenge to Peter demanded a total renewal of his loyalty and reaffirmed his responsibilities.

18–19 The introduction of v.18 by "I tell you the truth" makes the statement of Jesus solemn and important. The author goes on to add an explanation of Jesus' enigmatic words. They predicted Peter's career: a new responsibility, a new danger, and violent death. Jesus placed Peter in a category with himself—a life spent for God and ultimately sacrificed to glorify God (cf. 12:27–32; 13:31). The command "Follow me" literally means "Keep on following me." Jesus showed Peter that if he were to fulfill his promise of loyalty, he would have to follow him to his own cross.

20–21 Peter's question concerning John reflects curiosity and possibly uneasiness. Peter had been given an important commission, but what would his friend be expected to do? Would he share equally in both the responsibilities and the perils of the same task?

22–23 Jesus' reply indicated that even if he intended that "the disciple whom Jesus loved" should outlive Peter, Peter's main concern should not be a comparison of his lot with that of his friend; rather, Peter's concern should be the fulfillment of Jesus' purpose. In Jesus' final comment, "You must follow me" (italics mine, reflecting the Greek), he was urging Peter to take his attention off his colleague and focus it on Jesus himself.

Jesus' reference to his return is one of the few clear references to the Second Coming in this gospel. The use here is hyperbolic, for it marks the utmost point to which the beloved disciple could survive and remain active. This utterance was remembered in the church and formed the basis of the rumor that Jesus had promised John that he would live until Jesus returned. As a matter of fact, Jesus had offered a supposition, not a promise. The author's explanation of Jesus' announcement may be taken as evidence that the disciple was still living at the time this gospel was written and that he was the source of its content.

C. The Colophon (21:24–25)

24 The epilogue contains a number of parenthetic statements that are likely the author's explanatory notes on the scene at the Sea of Galilee (vv.7, 12, 19, 20, 23). At the same time, they leave the impression that the account was written for a second generation of believers who were historically remote from the original events. This impression is corroborated by the last two verses, which are the endorsement of the narrative. Although v.24 is in the first person plural ("we know"), as if it were being certified by the testimony of a group, a different division on one word would make it a first person singular. In that case the author (or scribe) would be saying, "And I for my part know that his testimony is valid."

25 The tremendous content of Jesus' teaching and deeds is acknowledged again by the writer (cf. 20:30). This gospel must have been written at a period when Christian literature was beginning to multiply and the church was becoming conscious of it. The letters of Paul were collected and circulated before the turn of the century, and the Gospels or writings like them were already known in the church (cf. Lk 1:1). Though John admits that what he recorded is only a fraction of what Jesus said and did, the content of this gospel is one of the most valuable assets the church possesses.

The Acts of the Apostles

INTRODUCTION

"The Acts of the Apostles" is the name given to the second part of a two-volume work traditionally identified as having been written by Luke, a companion of the apostle Paul. Originally the two volumes circulated together as two parts of one complete writing. But during the late first or early second century, the first volume became associated with the Gospels identified with Matthew, Mark, and John, thus forming the fourfold Gospel. Luke's second volume was left to go its own way. It was at this time, it seems, that the second volume received its present title, with the word "Acts" evidently meant to suggest both movement in the advance of the Gospel and heroic exploits by the apostles. The reference to "the Apostles," however, is somewhat misleading, because the work deals almost exclusively with Peter and Paul and the persons and events associated with their ministries. Yet if we did not have Acts, we would know nothing of the earliest days of the Christian movement except for bits of data gathered from the letters of Paul or inferred by looking back from later developments. Acts is the third longest of the NT writings, being about one-tenth shorter than its companion volume Luke (the longest NT book) and almost exactly the length of Matthew. Together Luke-Acts comprises almost 30 percent of the material in the NT, exceeding both the Pauline and the Johannine writings in size.

1. Historical Writing in Antiquity

This book falls in line with ancient historical writing. The concern of classical Greek historians was not the mere chronicling of events, but was the conviction that the actions and words of distinctive people in their respective periods represent more adequately the situation than any comments by the historian. That is, the "acts" of the subjects, understood in terms of both their actions and their words, were the building blocks for the historians and biographers of antiquity. What these historians and biographers were primarily interested in were illuminating vignettes that gave insight into the ethos of a period or of a person's character. One of the main ways in which to portray both these factors was through speeches, of which Acts has many. These speeches are, of course, not verbatim accounts but summaries of the original, more lengthy delivery (as poor Eutyches undoubtedly could testify! Ac 20:7–12).

Furthermore, in writing their histories the ancients frequently grouped their material in a topical manner, without always specifying chronological relationships. While the ancients were interested in what actually happened, it must also be insisted that history was written by the ancients for moral, ethical, and polemical purposes and not just to inform or entertain. This is true for Acts, for Luke certainly did not write for money, literary recognition, or only to add to human knowledge. He wrote, rather, as he tells us in the Prologue to his two-volume work, to proclaim the certainty of what his audience had been taught (Lk 1:1–4). In other words, Luke's Acts, like the historiography of the OT, traces the activity of God in various historical events as viewed from a particular perspective.

In the process of writing this history, the author of Acts has his own interests, theological viewpoint, and purposes in writing (see next section). And to a considerable extent these have affected his selection, arrangement, and shaping of the particular units of material that he incorporates, though that does not mean that his narrative must be viewed as historically suspect (see the introduction to Luke for comments on Luke's historical and geographical accuracy).

2. Luke's Purposes in Writing Acts

Basic to every evaluation of Acts is the question of the purpose or purposes of its author. Luke himself states that his purpose in writing his two-volume work was "so that you may know the certainty of the things you have been taught" (Lk 1:4). The "most excellent Theophilus" (Lk 1:3; cf. Ac 1:1) to whom Luke addressed his work seems to have been a man who, though receptive to the Gospel and perhaps even convinced by its claims, had many questions about Christianity as he knew it. From the way Luke writes to him, we may surmise that Theophilus was concerned about how the Christian faith related to Jesus' ministry, to Jews and the world of Judaism, to the lifestyle of certain scrupulous Jewish Christians, to the more universalistic outlook of Gentiles, and to the sanctions of Roman law. Also, he was undoubtedly interested in how the Gospel had been received and what success it had met in the various centers of influence known to him in the eastern part of the empire, from Jerusalem to Rome.

Certainly when receiving his first instruction in the Gospel, Theophilus had been told of Jesus' death and resurrection. But, judging from Luke's gospel, apparently the meaning and implications of that death and resurrection were not quite clear to him; and a number of references to persons and events associated with the ministry of Jesus baffled him. Likewise, the subsequent experiences of the early Christians seem to have been somewhat vague to him. The advent and activity of the Holy Spirit, the early ministries of the disciples, the conversion of Paul and his relation to the Jerusalem apostles, the nature and extent of Paul's ministry—and probably more—were all things that Theophilus had questions about. So Luke writes to deal with his friend's uncertainties and the queries of others like him who will read his account.

a. Kerygmatic purpose

Acts, therefore, like many another work, was probably written with multiple purposes in view. Primary among the reasons for its composition was undoubtedly a kerygmatic purpose (kerygmatic is from the Greek word kerygma (GK 3060, which means "preaching" or "proclamation"). It proclaims the continued confrontation of men and women by the Word of God through the church and shows (1) how that Gospel is related to the course of redemptive history, (2) how it is rooted in and interacts with secular history, (3) how it is universal in character, (4) how it has been freed from the Jewish law, and (5) how behind the proclamation of the Word of God stand the power and activity of the Holy Spirit.

In his first volume, Luke shows how men and women were confronted by the Word of God in the earthly ministry of Jesus (cf. Lk 5:1;8:11, 21; 11:28). In Acts Luke seeks to show how men and women continue to be confronted by that same Word through the ministry of the church (cf. Ac 4:29, 31; 6:2, 4, 7; et al.). Luke's stress on the Word of God is rooted inextricably in the confessions of the earliest believers and the consciousness of Jesus himself. For Luke the message of salvation in Jesus proclaimed by the church is in direct continuity with the ministry and teaching of Jesus. That is why Luke wrote a sequel to his gospel, thus making explicit what was presupposed in the earliest Christian preaching.

Furthermore, this Word of God is firmly fixed in the context of world history. It began with the miraculous births that took place "in the time of Herod king of Judea" (Lk 1:5) and during the reign of Caesar Augustus, "while Quirinius was governor of Syria" (2:1–2; see also 3:1–2; 23:1–25). And it spread throughout the Roman world principally during the reign of the emperor Claudius (Ac 11:28; 18:2), when Gallio was proconsul of Achaia (18:12–17), when Felix and Festus ruled in Judea and Ananias was the high priest in Jerusalem (chs. 24–25), and between the times of the Jewish kings Herod Agrippa I (12:1–23) and Herod Agrippa II (25:13–26:32).

In addition, this Word regarding salvation in Jesus has permeated the Jewish homeland of Palestine-Syria and has been received with a measure of acceptance in the main centers of the eastern part of the Roman Empire, finally entering the capital city itself "without hindrance" (the final word of Luke's two-volume work). It is a universal message. It began in Jerusalem among Jews and spread "to the ends of the earth" (as promised by Jesus himself, Ac 1:8) to include all kinds of people. It is a message that by means of a process under the Spirit's direction, finally and inevitably freed itself from the shackles of Jewish legalism and a Jewish lifestyle. It is a Word of God that affected the lives of many through the power and activity of the Holy Spirit, that selfsame Spirit who came upon Jesus at his baptism and through whom he accomplished his mission.

b. Apologetic purpose

There is also inherent throughout the presentation of Acts an apologetic purpose. Its author seeks to demonstrate that Christianity is not a political threat to the empire, as its Jewish opponents asserted, but rather that it is the culmination of Israel's hope and the true daughter of Jewish religion—and, therefore, should be treated by Roman authorities as a religio licita (a "legal religion") along with Judaism (see introduction to Luke). He notes, for example, that no Roman official in the first century ever accepted the charge the Christianity was an illegal new religion in the empire (cf. Lk 23:4, 14, 22; Ac 13:6–12; 16:35–39; 18:12–17; et al.).

c. Conciliatory purpose

A third purpose for writing Acts seems to have been a conciliatory purpose to the type of conflict depicted in 1Co 1:12. Acts presents the careers of Peter (chs. 1–12) and Paul (chs. 13–28) in strikingly parallel fashion (see introductory comments to 2:42–12:24). Likewise, Acts presents Paul as conceding primacy in the church to Peter and apostleship to the Twelve based on their earthly companionship with Jesus; whereas Peter and the Jerusalem authorities, in turn, concede to Paul another mode of apostolic authority and accept Peter's initiative in the law-free outreach to Gentiles.

d. Catechetical purpose

Finally, Luke may well have written Acts with a catechetical purpose in mind. Luke probably wrote his treatise to Theophilus with the expectation that it could also be used within various churches for instructional purposes, to show how Christianity moved out from its origins in Palestine to become a movement of God's Spirit in the Roman Empire. Thus Luke portrays in dramatic vignettes drawn from the early church's history the essence of early Christian preaching, the activity of the Holy Spirit in applying and spreading the message, the Gospel's power, its transforming quality, its type of adherents, their sacrifices and triumphs, and the ultimate entrance of the Christian proclamation into the city of Rome itself. Undoubtedly, such a catechetical purpose met a vital need among scattered congregations only recently formed—a need for instruction about the nature of the faith and the church's early history. Also, this instructional material helped draw believers together spiritually.

3. The Sources of Acts

It seems likely that, as with the gospel of Luke (see Lk 1:1–4), some basic source or sources, either written or oral, underlie the substructure of the first half of the book. The language of Ac 1–15 has a Semitic flavor, different from the Greek of the second half of the book. Many scholars have posited Aramaic writings as sources used by Luke.

As for possible source materials underlying the writing of Acts 16–28, attention has always been directed first of all to four passages in the narrative where the writer uses the pronoun "we"—16:10–17; 20:5–15; 21:1–18; 27:1–28:16. The most likely explanation for these passages is that the author of Acts had from time to time been a companion of Paul in his travels and discreetly indicated this by using "we" in those places in the narrative where he tells of events at which he had been present. The different styles in the speeches of Paul in chs. 13–28 suggest that Luke was using various sources for his accounts of Paul's sermons and defenses, even though Luke's thorough reworking of these sources prevents us from identifying or recreating them.

4. The Structure of Acts

The Acts of the Apostles was originally written as the second part of a two-volume work, and its inseparable relation to Luke's gospel must be kept in mind if we are to understand the work. The Prologue to the two-volume work (Lk 1:1–4) suggests, in fact, that the author's intention was to write "an account of the things that have been fulfilled among us"—things that stretched from the birth of John the Baptist to the entrance of the Good News into Rome. And his use of the emphatic verb "began" as he commences his second volume (Ac 1:1) sets up the parallel between "all that Jesus began to do and to teach [italics mine]" as recorded in his gospel and what he continued to do and to teach through his church as is shown in Acts.

Luke has taken pains to construct his second volume with an eye to the first; he sets up numerous parallels in the portrayal of events in the two volumes and repeatedly stresses features in the second that fulfill anticipations expressed in the first. The geographical movement of Jesus in the gospel from Galilee to Jerusalem, for example, is paralleled in Acts by the geographical advance of the Gospel from Jerusalem to Rome. The importance of the Holy Spirit in the birth narratives, in the Spirit's descent on Jesus at his baptism, and in the Spirit constantly undergirding his ministry (cf. Jesus' declaration of this fact found only in Luke 4:18–19) is paralleled in Acts by the Spirit's coming upon the disciples at Pentecost and the repeated emphasis upon the Spirit as the source of the church's power and progress.

On the other hand, Acts is not simply a parallel to the gospel, ending at Rome as the gospel ended at Jerusalem. If it were, it would be the less important part of Luke's two-volume work—something like a shadow of the original. But Acts is important in its own right as the logical and geographical completion of Jesus' journey to Jerusalem.The author presents the apostolic ministry as the necessary extension of the redemption effected by Christ. He views both the accomplishment of salvation and the spread of the Good News as inseparable units in the climactic activity of God's redemption of humankind—a truth probably picked up from Paul (cf. Ro 8:17; Phil 3:10–11; Col 1:24). The Gospel had reached its culmination when it reached Rome, the capital of the Gentile world. And with that victory accomplished, Luke felt free to lay down his pen.

The structure for Acts as used in this commentary sees an introduction (1:1–2:41) and six panels, three for the Christian mission to the Jewish world (2:42–12:24) and three for the Christian mission to the Gentile world (12:25–28:31). Each of these panels concludes in a similar manner (see 6:7; 9:51; 12:24; 16:5; 19:20; 28:31).

5. Date of Composition

Various dates in the first and second century have been proposed for Luke's writing of his two-volume work. The best choice among those suggested is approximately A.D. 64. Acts contains a number of features that point to an earlier date than A.D. 70 for its composition. Chief among these is the portrayal of the situation of the Jews. They are represented as being both a spiritual and political power who had influence with the Roman courts and whose damaging testimony against the Christians must be countered. The Jews would likely not be depicted in this manner after their destruction as a nation in the war of A.D. 66–70. Nor would Luke have attempted in such a context to argue before a Gentile audience that Christianity should be accepted as a religio licita ("legal religion") because of its relation to Judaism. In the eyes of the Roman world Palestinian Judaism was largely defunct after A.D. 70, and Diaspora Judaism undoubtedly came under something of a cloud as a result. Luke's apologetic, however, is built upon the dual premises that (1) the Jewish leaders throughout the Diaspora and particularly the Jewish authorities at Jerusalem are at the time an important voice before Roman courts of law, even the imperial court at Rome; and (2) Judaism both in the Diaspora and at Jerusalem is accepted by Rome as a religio licita.

Likewise, the estimation of Roman justice implicit in Acts argues for its early composition. Acts expresses a generally hopeful outlook regarding Christianity's acceptance in the Gentile world and its recognition by Roman authorities. This could hardly have been the case after the Neronian persecution of Christians that began in A.D. 65 and resulted in the martyrdom of Paul and Peter, along with that of many other Christians (cf. 28:31, where Paul was able to preach "without hindrance" in Rome).

Finally, there is the surprising fact that Acts reflects no knowledge of Paul's letters, either in what is said or what is assumed on the part of its readers (cf. especially Paul's statements in 2Co 1–2; 11–12; Gal 1–2). This phenomenon may, of course, be interpreted as evidence for the personal aloofness and the chronological distance of the author of Acts from his hero. On the other hand, it may also suggest a very early date for Acts—namely, that it was before the significance of the Pauline correspondence was appreciated and before copies began to be distributed throughout the churches.

6. Authorship

Two observations from Acts itself must govern the discussion of its authorship. (1) Stylistically and structurally the gospel of Luke and the Acts of the Apostles are so closely related that they have to be assigned to the same author (see the introduction to Luke). (2) Luke-Acts claims to have been written by one who reports firsthand some of the events he records. In the Prologue (Lk 1:1–4) to his two-volume work, the author's use of the expression "among us" should probably be taken to imply his contemporary status with some of the events he purposes to narrate.

Furthermore, we have the evidence of the "we" sections in Acts (see above). Accepting the author as a traveling companion of Paul during some of his missionary journeys explains quite adequately two rather peculiar features about the plan of Acts: (1) the author devotes more than three-fifths of its space to Paul; (2) in the author's presentation of Paul, the first mission is narrated with great brevity while certain parts of the second and third missionary journeys, Paul's five defenses, and the journey to Rome are described in great detail. No writer who was altogether a stranger to apostolic times or working entirely from sources would have devoted so much space to the latter part of Paul's ministry. His work would have been more symmetrically planned.

Traditionally, the author of the third gospel has been identified as Luke, the companion of Paul mentioned in Col 4:14; Phm 24; 2Ti 4:11. Nor has tradition ever considered any author other than Luke. His authorship was accepted by Marcion (c. A.D. 135), was included in the Anti-Marcionite Prologue to the third gospel (c. A.D. 170), and was taken for granted by the compiler of the Muratorian Canon (c. A.D. 180–200). Furthermore, with Luke-Acts being originally one work in two volumes, which sometime during the last part of the first century or very early in the second began to circulate as two separate works, what is said regarding the one as to authorship must apply equally well to the other (see the introduction to Luke).

EXPOSITION

Introduction: The Constitutive Events of the Christian Mission (1:1–2:41)

The structural parallelism between Luke's gospel and his Acts is immediately seen in the comparative size of the two books and the time spans they cover. Each would have filled an almost equal-sized papyrus roll; each covers approximately thirty-three years. The parallelism is also evident in the plan and purpose of the opening chapters of each book. Luke 1:5–2:52 (after the Prologue of 1:1–4) is essentially a preparation for 3:1–4:13, and together these two sections constitute material introductory to the narrative of Jesus' ministry that begins with the pericope of 4:14–30. So, too, Ac 1:5–26 (after its preface of 1:1–4) serves to prepare for 2:1–41, and together these two chapters comprise an introduction to the ministry of the church that commences with the thesis paragraph 2:42–47 and continues by means of a series of illustrative vignettes beginning at 3:1.

A. A Resumptive Preface (1:1–5)

The Prologue to Luke-Acts is really Lk 1:1–4. Here, however, Luke begins his second book with what may be called a "resumptive preface," which serves to link the two books and anticipates the features he wants to stress as being constitutive for the Christian mission.

1 Luke calls his gospel "my former book." He uses the word logos (GK 3364; usually translated "word" or "message" in the NT) in the technical sense of a section of a work that covers more than one papyrus roll. The subject of his first volume is "all that Jesus began to do and teach" up to his ascension. The word "began" stresses Luke's intent to show in Acts what Jesus continued to do and to teach through his church. And like the gospel, Acts is addressed to Theophilus (see comment on Lk 1:3).

2 Through a certain awkwardness in the Greek of this verse, Luke highlights four important introductory matters in approximately the same order in which he sets them out in his first two chapters and according to his priorities throughout Acts. Luke gives first place to Jesus' mandate to witness. The instructions he has in mind are undoubtedly those already set out in Lk 24:48–49 as the climax of Jesus' earthly teaching (quoted in slightly revised form in Ac 1:4-5 and developed in 1:6–8 as the theme of Acts). This mandate to witness was given to the apostles, who acted through the power of the Holy Spirit, whose coming was a direct result of our Lord's ascension.

3 Having stated the relation of his present book to its predecessor and shown his interest in the four factors named above, Luke turns back to the time before the Ascension. He recapitulates and expands upon certain features in Jesus' ministry crucial to the advance of the Gospel as he will present it in Acts. Like Paul in 1Co 15:5–7, his emphasis is on the living Christ, who "after his suffering . . . showed himself . . . alive" and demonstrated his resurrection by "many convincing proofs," such as the events in Lk 24:13ff. "Over a period of forty days" implies that during that time, the risen Lord showed himself at intervals, not continuously. When he did so, he "spoke about the kingdom of God."

The theme of "the kingdom [GK 993] of God" is a common one in the OT and NT. Primarily it refers to God's sovereign rule in human life and the affairs of history, and secondarily to the realm where that rule reigns. God's sovereignty is universal (cf. Ps 103:19). But it was specially manifested in the life of the nation of Israel and among Jesus' disciples; it is expressed progressively in the church and through the lives of Christians; and it will be fully revealed throughout eternity. In the Gospels the kingdom is presented as having been inaugurated in time and space by Jesus' presence and ministry (see comment on Mk 1:15). In Acts the phrase "the kingdom of God" usually appears as a convenient way of summarizing the early Christian proclamation (cf. 8:12; 19:8; 20:25; 28:23, 31). Jesus is explicitly identified as its subject (cf. 8:12; 28:23, 31).

We may infer that Jesus' teaching during the "forty days" dealt in essence with (1) the validation and nature of his messiahship, (2) the interpretation of the OT from the perspective of his resurrection, and (3) the responsibility of his disciples to bear witness to what had happened among them in fulfillment of Israel's hope (see Lk 24:25–27, 44–49). This is what Acts elaborates in the chapters that follow.

4 In vv. 4–5 Luke parallels his emphasis on the living Christ by stressing the coming and baptism of the Holy Spirit as essential to the advance of the Gospel. Luke gives us a specific occasion on which Jesus and his disciples ate together and he commanded them not to leave Jerusalem but to wait for the coming of the gift of the Holy Spirit, who had been promised by God the Father and spoken of by Jesus (repeated from Lk 24:49). This promise Jesus had made on behalf of the Father (see Jn 14:16–21, 26; 15:26–27; 16:7–15).

5 The statement appears to come from Mk 1:8 (see also Mt 3:11; Lk 3:16), where it is part of the message of John the Baptist. One could take v.5 as an explanatory comment on Luke's part, but its parallel in Ac 11:16, where it is given as the word of the Lord Jesus, suggests that here too it should be understood as being attributed to Jesus.

B. The Mandate to Witness (1:6–8)

Though vv.6–8 is usually treated either as the last part of the Preface (1:1–8) or as an introduction to the Ascension narrative (1:6–11), in reality it serves as the theme, setting the stage for all that follows in Acts: "You will be my witnesses in Jerusalem, and in all Judea and Samaria, and to the ends of the earth" (v.8). The concept of "witness" (GK 3459) is so prominent in Acts (the word in its various forms appears some thirty-nine times) that everything else in the book, including the early preaching, should probably be seen as subsumed under it. So as Luke begins his second book, he highlights this witness theme and insists it comes from the mandate of Jesus himself.

6 The question the disciples asked reflects the embers of a once blazing hope for a political theocracy in which they would be leaders (cf. Mk 9:33–34; 10:35–41; Lk 22:24). Now the embers are fanned by Jesus' talk of the coming Holy Spirit. In Jewish expectations, the restoration of Israel's fortunes would be marked by the revived activity of God's Spirit, which had been withheld since the last of the prophets. But though his words about the Spirit's coming rekindled in the disciples their old nationalistic hopes, Jesus had something else in mind.

7 Jesus' answer to his disciples' misguided question is not a denial of any place for the nation of Israel in God's future purposes (cf. Ro 9–11, which speaks not only of a remnant within Israel responding to God but also of the nation of Israel still being involved in some way in God's redemptive program). Rather, it stresses the fact that the disciples were to revise their thinking about the divine program, leaving to God the matters that are his concern and taking up the things entrusted to them.

Jesus' insistence that "it is not for you to know" echoes his teaching in Mt 24:36 and Mk 13:32. The "times" (GK 5989) and "dates" (GK 2789) refer to the character of the ages preceding the final consummation of God's redemptive program and to the particular critical stages of these ages as they draw to a climax (cf. 1Th 5:1). These "the Father has set by his own authority"; they must not be the subject of speculation by believers—a teaching that, sadly, has been all too frequently disregarded.

8 The mandate to witness stands as the theme for the whole of Acts. It comes directly from Jesus himself—in fact, it is his final and conclusive word to his disciples before his ascension. All that follows in Acts is the result of Jesus' own intent and the fulfillment of his express word. This commission lays an obligation on all Christians and comes to us as a gift with a promise. It concerns a person, a power, and a program—the person of Jesus, on whose authority the church acts and who is the object of its witness; the power of the Holy Spirit, which is essential for the mission; and a program that begins at Jerusalem (cf. 2:42–8:3), moves out to "all Judea and Samaria" (cf. 8:4–12:24), and progresses until it finally reached the imperial capital city of Rome (12:25–28:31). The Christian church, according to Acts, is a missionary church that responds obediently to Jesus' commission, acts on Jesus' behalf in the extension of his ministry, focuses its proclamation of the kingdom of God in its witness to Jesus, is guided and empowered by the selfsame Spirit that directed and supported Jesus' ministry, and follows a program whose guidelines for outreach have been set by Jesus himself.

C. The Ascension (1:9–11)

Luke next speaks of the second constitutive factor of the Christian mission, the church's ascended Lord. The Greek of v.2 includes this as a fourth element in its listing of constitutive factors, but here Luke is proceeding more chronologically. So he speaks of the Ascension before mentioning the full complement of apostles and the coming of the Holy Spirit. The important thing about this account of the Ascension (cf. Lk 24:5–51) is the attention focused on (1) the fact of Jesus' ascension and entrance "into heaven" and (2) on the angel's message that rebukes the disciples for their lack of understanding and assures them of their Lord's return. Luke's point is that the missionary activity of the early church rested not only on Jesus' mandate but also on his living presence in heaven and the sure promise of his return.

Many modern scholars have asserted that looking for the Jesus' return paralyzes missionary activity and inhibits Christian social action by diverting attention away from present needs to the "sweet by and by." Luke, however, insists here that Christian mission must be based on the ascended and living Lord who directs his church from heaven and who will return to consummate what he has begun.

9 For Jesus' ascension Luke simply says that he "was taken up." He tells us very little else about it except that it occurred after Jesus had given his mandate to witness and while the disciples were watching. Not even the place where the Ascension occurred is mentioned in v.9, though in v.12 Luke says it took place on the Mount of Olives. More important for Luke than the description of the Ascension is its significance, and this he gives us in saying that "a cloud hid him from their sight."

The cloud undoubtedly symbolizes the shekinah (see comment on Ex 24:16–17), the visible manifestation of the divine presence and glory. Such a cloud hovered above the tabernacle in the wilderness as a visible token of the glory of God that dwelt within the tabernacle (cf. Ex 40:34); it also enveloped Jesus and three of his disciples on the Mount of Transfiguration as a visible sign of God's presence there and his approval of his Son (cf. Mk 9:7–11). Something similar is presented here: Jesus as the ascended Lord is enveloped by the shekinah cloud, the visible manifestation of God's presence, glory, and approval.

10–11 Luke describes the disciples as "looking intently up [a favorite word of Luke] into the sky as he was going." They were soon challenged by a double message from two angels "dressed in white." (1) The Jesus whom the disciples had known now had a heavenly existence (cf. the double use of the phrase "into heaven"). (2) The same Jesus they had known would return also enveloped in the cloud of the divine presence and glory (cf. Mt 24:30; 26:64; Mk 13:26; 14:62; Lk 21:27).

D. The Full Complement of Apostles 1:12-26)

Luke's third factor (cf. comment on 1:2) underlying the rise and expansion of the early Christian mission is the centrality of the apostles and their ministry. His interest in the apostles was evident already in Lk 6, where he adds that the disciples whom Jesus chose were also "designated apostles" (Lk 6:13). Now he resumes that interest, telling how under God's direction the apostolic band regained its full number after the defection of Judas Iscariot.

1. In the upper room (1:12–14)

12 The disciples had been instructed by Jesus to "stay in the city [of Jerusalem] until you have been clothed with power from on high" (Lk 24:49; cf. Ac 1:4) and to begin their ministry from that city (Lk 24:47; Ac 1:8). So they returned to Jerusalem from the Mount of Olives, a distance of "a Sabbath day's walk from the city" (about two-thirds of a mile).

13 Upper rooms in Palestinian cities were usually the choicest rooms because they were above the tumult of the crowded streets and beyond the prying eyes of passersby. For the wealthy, the upper room was the living room. Sometimes upper rooms were rented out. Often they served as places of assembly, study, and prayer. On their return to Jerusalem, the disciples "went upstairs to the room where they were staying," a room that presumably was well known to the early Christians—perhaps the room where Jesus and his disciples kept the Passover just before his crucifixion (Mk 14:12–16). Perhaps it was also the room where he appeared to some of them after he rose from the dead (Lk 24:33–43; cf. Jn 20:19, 26).

Luke has already listed the names of the Twelve in his gospel (6:14–16). Now he lists them again—though without Judas Iscariot, pointing out the incompleteness of the apostolic band and setting the stage for the account of its rectification through the choosing of Matthias. All this prepares for the coming of the Holy Spirit and the beginning of the apostolic ministry. In obedience to their Lord and in anticipation of what is to follow, the apostles have returned to Jerusalem—only they lack the full complement needed for their witness within Jewry.

14 In addition to the Eleven, also present in the upper room were "the women and Mary the mother of Jesus, and his brothers." They fill out the nucleus of the early church and in some way are to be included in the apostolic witness. The women Luke refers to are undoubtedly those mentioned in Lk 8:2–3; 23:49; 23:55–24:10, who followed Jesus throughout his ministry—even to his death—and contributed out of their personal incomes to support him and his followers. This mention of women fully accords with Luke's attitude toward women as portrayed in his gospel and the consciousness within the church of the implications of the Gospel proclamation.

The reference here to "Mary the mother of Jesus" continues Luke's interest in Mary begun in Lk 1, though this is the last occasion where she is recorded as being involved in the redemptive history of the NT. The reference to Jesus' "brothers" is particularly interesting because during his ministry they thought him to be "out of his mind" (Mk 3:21–35), perhaps even demon possessed, and because Jn 7:2–10 presupposes their disbelief. Paul, however, recounts an appearance of the risen Christ to James (cf. 1Co 15:7), and we may infer that Joses (or Joseph), Judas (or Jude), and Simon (cf. Mt 13:55–56; Mk 6:3) likewise came to believe in Jesus and attached themselves to the congregation of early Christians. These all are depicted as being assiduous in prayer (cf. Ac 2:42; 6:4). There must also have been others who were at various times assembled with these people, for 1:15 speaks of the total number of believers at the selection of Matthias as being "about a hundred and twenty."

2. Matthias chosen to replace Judas Iscariot (1:15–26)

15 In keeping with his character portrayal of Peter throughout his gospel, Luke here presents Peter as taking the lead among the apostles. The word "believers" here is usually "brothers" (GK 81), a term that Luke frequently uses for Christian believers but also has just used for the blood "brothers" of Jesus.

16–17 The Greek literally reads "Men, brothers," a type of formal address found within first-century synagogues (cf. 2:29, 37; 7:2; 13:15, 26, 38; et al.). Peter's words in v.16, and again later in v.21, speak of the "necessity" (cf. "had to"; GK 1256) of Scripture being fulfilled in relation to Judas's defection and the choice of another to replace him. Luke frequently stresses the compulsion inherent in the divine plan—a stress usually accompanied by an emphasis on human inability to comprehend God's workings. At times that divine necessity is explained in terms of the fulfillment of specific Scripture passages (as here; see also Lk 22:37; 24:26, 44), but more often that is not the case (e.g., Lk 2:49; 4:43; 9:22; et al.). This suggests that the concept of "divine necessity" is broader than just "the fulfillment of Scripture." We should therefore not say that the "necessity" here and in v.21 concerns only certain prophecies of Scripture. The understanding is rather (1) that God is doing something necessarily involved in his divine plan; (2) that the disciples' lack of comprehension of God's plan is profound, especially with respect to Judas; and (3) that an explicit way of understanding what has been going on under God's direction is through a Christian understanding of two psalms that speak of false companions and wicked men generally, and which by means of exegetical rules used in that day could be applied to the false disciple and wicked man par excellence, Judas Iscariot.

18–19 Luke now adds a parenthesis concerning the awful fate of Judas, presenting the tradition he has received (cf. v.6) and emphasizing the awfulness of Judas's fate, thus suggesting a basis for the disciples' perplexity in trying to comprehend the plan of God.

The difficulty of reconciling 1:18–19 with Mt 27:3–10 is well known and often considered the most intractable contradiction in the NT. The problem chiefly concerns how Judas died. But it also involves such questions as Who bought the field? and Why was it called "Field of Blood"? These latter matters are perhaps not too difficult. Probably the common explanation suffices: The chief priests bought the potter's field in Judas's name with the thirty silver coins belonging to him, and the local Jerusalemites (particularly Christians) nicknamed it "Field of Blood" because they felt it had been purchased with "blood money."

The major question as to how Judas died, however, is not so easily answered. Had he "hanged himself" (Mt 27:5)? Or was it that "he fell headlong, his body burst open and all his intestines spilled out" (Ac 1:18)? We shall probably never know the exact answer. But though the precise solution seems imponderable, the problem is not very different from many other differences among the evangelists in presenting the words and activity of Jesus. If, as seems likely, each writer wrote from the standpoint of his own theological purposes to the specific interests and appreciation of his audience, it is not too difficult to believe that in the context of Matthew's fulfillment theme it was sufficient for him and his readers to portray Judas's awful end with the terse expression "he hanged himself." But this would hardly suffice for Luke, Theophilus, and others in the Gentile world. Gentiles under Stoic influence generally looked on suicide as morally neutral. In order, therefore, to stress the awfulness of Judas's situation in a way that would grip his readers, Luke spelled out the gory details of Judas's suicide. He also highlights that what had happened to Judas was a divine necessity.

20 The OT passages Luke uses to support the divine necessity manifest in Judas's defection and replacement are Ps 69:25 and 109:8. These psalms speak of false companions and wicked men who have become enemies of God's righteous servant. They lament over his condition and give us his prayers for deliverance and his desire for retribution. Psalm 69 was applied variously within the early church to Jesus the Christ, the Servant of the Lord and Righteous Sufferer par excellence (v.9 is quoted in Jn 2:17 and Ro 15:3; vv. 22–23 in Ro 11:9–10). So here in v.20 we have another example of the Christian use of this block of messianic material, to which, using the commonly accepted exegetical principle of analogous subject, Peter added the ominous words of Ps 109:8 in order to defend the legitimacy of replacing a member of the apostolic band.

We need not insist that the early Christians believed that the primary reference of these two psalms was to Judas, as if no one could have understood them prior to the betrayal. What they seem to be saying, however, is that just as the psalmist's portrayals of "The Servant of the Lord and the Righteous Sufferer" can on the basis of the Semitic concept of corporate solidarity be applied to God's Messiah, Jesus, the Servant and Righteous Sufferer, so the retribution spoken of as coming upon false companions and wicked men in general is especially applicable to Judas, who above all other men was false.

21–22 A twelvefold apostolic witness was required if early Jewish Christianity was to represent itself to the Jewish nation as the culmination of Israel's hope and the true people of Israel's Messiah (cf. Mt 19:28; Lk 22:30; Rev 21:10, 12, 14). The "remnant theology" of Late Judaism made it mandatory that any group that presented itself as "the righteous remnant" of the nation and had the responsibility of calling the nation to repentance and permeating it for God's glory, must represent itself as the true Israel, not only in its proclamation, but also in its symbolism. The Qumran community, for example, had twelve leaders heading up their community. Consequently, the early church found itself required to replace the defector Judas so as to have a full complement of twelve in its apostolic ranks.

For a candidate to succeed Judas among the apostles, Peter laid down two qualifications. The first was that the successor had to have familiar and unhindered association with Jesus from John's baptism to Jesus' ascension. Perhaps not all the Eleven themselves could claim association with Jesus from the days of John the Baptist (Jn 1:35–51 suggests that about half could). But they evidently wanted to make quite sure that there would be no deficiency on this first point. The second qualification was that of having been a witness to Christ's resurrection. From these two verses we may derive a strict definition of the term "apostle" (GK 693) and one that determines much of what Luke presents in the remainder of Acts (though, of course, Luke also uses the word "apostle" more broadly; cf. 14:14). An apostle was a guarantor of the Gospel tradition because he had been a companion of the earthly Jesus and a witness to the reality of his resurrection through an encounter with the risen Lord.

23 The eleven apostles together "proposed" two men: Joseph, who was called by Aramaic-speaking Jews "Barsabbas" and was also known by his Roman cognomen Justus, and Matthias. While more were perhaps considered (cf. v.21), only two had the necessary qualifications.

24–25 It was not enough to possess the qualifications that other apostles had. Judas's successor must also be appointed by the same Lord who appointed the Eleven. Likewise, though the church could not represent itself as the righteous remnant of Israel with one apostle lacking, it could hardly symbolize its consciousness as being the true Israel of God with one apostle too many. Therefore, prayer was offered to the Lord for his selection between the two candidates.

While it is not clear linguistically whether God the Father or Jesus is here being addressed in prayer by the vocative "Lord" (GK 3261), it is most natural to understand the same referent for the title here as in v.21: "the Lord Jesus." Furthermore, Luke seems to drawn the parallel consciously by using the verb "to choose" for those selected by Jesus in 1:2 and for this replacement of Judas.

26 After determining qualifications and praying, they "cast lots, and the lot fell to Matthias." Determining God's will in this manner (likely by casting down marked objects) was common within Israel and the ancient world (cf. Pr 16:33). So by the appointment of Christ himself, the full complement of apostles was restored and the church was ready for the coming of the Holy Spirit and the beginning of its mission.

This pericope on the selection of Matthias has a number of significant implications. In the first place, it shows the necessity of a hermeneutical methodology that is able to distinguish between normative principles and culturally restricted practices in the progressive revelation of the Bible. We are exhorted as Christians to "search the Scriptures" and to "know what is the will of the Lord"—exhortations that are normative. But the early church's method for interpreting the OT (e.g., Ps 69) and the practice of casting lots in order to determine God's will need not bind believers today. Second, the pericope suggests that a Christian decision regarding vocation entails (1) evaluating personal qualifications, (2) earnest prayer, and (3) appointment by Christ himself—an appointment that may come in some culturally related fashion, but in a way clear to those who seek guidance.

In addition, it should be noted that it was Judas's defection and not simply the fact of his death that required his replacement. While the NT lays great stress on the apostolic message and faith and while Luke stresses the importance of the apostles themselves, this pericope gives no justification for the theological necessity of an apostolic succession of office, as is sometimes claimed for it. According to vv.21–22, the task of the twelve apostles was unique: to be guarantors of the Gospel tradition because of their companionship with Jesus in his earthly ministry and to be witnesses to the reality of his resurrection because they had seen the risen Christ. Such criteria cannot be transmitted from generation to generation. Thus when James the son of Zebedee was executed by Herod Agrippa I in A.D. 44 (cf. 12:1–2), the church took no action to replace him.

Finally, and contrary to an oft-heard claim that the apostles were wrong in selecting Matthias and should have awaited God's choice of Paul to fill the vacancy, it should be pointed out (1) that Paul had not been with Jesus during his earthly ministry—in fact, he acknowledges his dependence upon others with respect to the Gospel tradition (e.g., 1Co 15:3–5); (2) that the necessity of having exactly twelve apostles in the early church sprang largely from the need for Jewish Christians ministering within the Jewish nation to maintain this symbolic number, and, while Paul could appreciate this, he did not feel its necessity for his primarily Gentile ministry; and (3) that Paul himself recognized the special nature of his apostleship—namely, it was in line with that of the Twelve, but it also rested on a somewhat different base (cf. his reference to himself as an apostle "abnormally born" in 1Co 15:7–8). Paul's background, ministry, and call were in many ways different from those of the Twelve. Yet he insisted on the equality of his apostleship with that of the other apostles.

E. The Coming of the Holy Spirit (2:1–41)

Luke's fourth constitutive factor (see comment on 1:2) that undergirds the expansion of the early Christian mission is the coming of the Holy Spirit upon the assembled believers at Pentecost. To this the other three factors have pointed. And now Luke gives us an extended account of it that includes the baptism of the Spirit on the Day of Pentecost and Peter's sermon to the multitude and welds these separate incidents into a unified whole.

Matthew and Luke have preserved John the Baptist's distinction between his baptism with water and the baptism by the one who is to come, the "one more powerful" than he was (Mt 3:11; Lk 3:16). Luke goes on to connect the Baptist's prophecy of a baptism "with the Holy Spirit and with fire" with the miracle at Pentecost (Ac 1:5; 11:16). So Luke brings John's baptism of Jesus in the Jordan and the Spirit's baptism of assembled believers at Pentecost into a parallel in which each event is seen as the final constitutive factor for all that follows—for the ministry of Jesus in Luke's gospel and for the mission of the early church in Acts.

1. The miracle of Pentecost (2:1–13)

1 Luke describes the miracle of the coming of the Holy Spirit, with its accompanying signs, in four short verses, remarkable for their nuances. The miracle occurred on the festival known as Pentecost, which was celebrated on the fiftieth day after Passover (Lev 23:15–16; Dt 16:9–12). It was originally the Festival of the Firstfruits of the grain harvest (Ex 23:16; Lev 23:17–22; Nu 28:26–31); it was called the Feast of Weeks because it came after a period of seven weeks of harvesting that began with the offering of the first barley sheaf during the Passover celebration. By the time of the first century A.D., however, it was considered the anniversary of the giving of the law at Mount Sinai and was a time for the annual renewal of the Mosaic covenant; it was therefore looked upon as one of the three great pilgrim festivals of Judaism (along with Passover and Tabernacles).

Now no one who had been a companion of the apostle Paul could have failed to have been impressed by the fact that it was on the Jewish festival of Pentecost that the Spirit came so dramatically upon the early believers in Jerusalem. It is this significance that Luke emphasizes as he begins his Pentecost narrative; namely, that whereas Pentecost was for Judaism the day of the giving of the law, for Christians it is the day of the coming of the Holy Spirit. So for Luke the coming of the Spirit upon the early Christians at Pentecost is not only a parallel to the Spirit's coming upon Jesus at his baptism, it also shows that the mission of the Christian church, as was the ministry of Jesus, is dependent upon the Holy Spirit. And by his stress on Pentecost as the day when the miracle took place, he is also suggesting (1) that the Spirit's coming is in continuity with God's purposes in giving the law, and yet (2) that the Spirit's coming signals the essential difference between the Jewish faith and commitment to Jesus, for whereas the former is Torah-centered and Torah-directed, the latter is Christ-centered and Spirit-directed—all of which sounds very much like Paul.

As to just where the believers were when they experienced the coming of the Spirit, Luke is somewhat vague. His emphasis is on the "when"; all he tells us about "where" is that "they were all together in one place," in a "house" (v.2.). Most likely Luke is referring to the same upper room as in 1:12–26 as the setting for the miracle of the Spirit's coming and the place from where the disciples first went out to proclaim the Gospel.

2 There is, of course, nothing necessarily sensory about the Holy Spirit. Yet God in his providence often accompanies his Spirit's working by visible and audible signs—particularly at certain crises in redemptive history. This he does to assure his people of his presence. In vv.2–4 three signs of the Spirit's coming are reported to have appeared, each of them—wind, fire, and inspired speech—being considered in Jewish tradition as a sign of God's presence.

Wind as a sign of God's Spirit is rooted linguistically in the fact that both the Hebrew word ruah (GK 8120) and the Greek word pneuma (GK 4460) mean either "wind" or "spirit," depending on the context, and this allows a rather free association of the two ideas (cf. Jn 3:8). Ezekiel had prophesied of the wind as the breath of God blowing over the dry bones in the valley of his vision and filling them with new life (Eze 37:9–14), and it was this wind of God's Spirit that Judaism looked forward to as ushering in the final Messianic Age. Thus Luke tells us that one sign of the Spirit's coming upon the early followers of Jesus was "a sound like the blowing of a violent wind." Just why he emphasized the "sound" of the blowing of the "wind" is difficult to say. This sound "came from heaven" and "filled the whole house," symbolizing to all present the presence of God's Spirit among them in a way more intimate, personal, and powerful than they had ever before experienced.

3 Fire as a symbol of the divine presence was well known among first-century Jews (cf. the burning bush [Ex 3:2–5], the pillar of fire that guided Israel by night through the desert [Ex 13:21], the consuming fire on Mount Sinai [Ex 24:17], and the fire that hovered over the wilderness tabernacle [Ex 40:38]). John the Baptist explicitly linked the coming of the Spirit with fire (cf. Mt 3:11; Lk 3:16). The "tongues of fire" here are probably not to be equated with the "other tongues" of v.4 but should be taken as visible representations of the overshadowing presence of the Spirit of God.

Also significant is Luke's statement that these tokens of the Spirit's presence "separated and came to rest on each of them." This seems to suggest that, though under the old covenant the divine presence rested on Israel as a corporate entity and upon many of its leaders for special purposes, under the new covenant, as established by Jesus and inaugurated at Pentecost, the Spirit now rests upon each believer individually. In other words, though the corporate and individual aspects of redemption cannot actually be separated, the emphasis in the proclamation of redemption from Pentecost onward is on the personal relationship of God to the believer through the Spirit, with all corporate relationships resulting from this.

4 In OT times prophetic utterances were regularly associated with the Spirit's coming upon particular persons for special purposes (cf. Nu 11:26–29; 1Sa 10:6–12; et al.). In Judaism, however, the belief arose that with the passing of the last of the writing prophets in the early postexilic period, the spirit of prophecy had ceased in Israel, and God now spoke to his people only through the Torah as interpreted by the teachers. But Judaism also expected that with the coming of the Messianic Age there would be a special outpouring of God's Spirit, in fulfillment of Eze 37, and that prophecy would once again flourish. This is exactly what Luke portrays as having taken place at Pentecost among the followers of Jesus.

The "tongues" (GK 1185) here are often identified with ecstatic utterances of the sort Paul discusses in 1Co 12–14. This identification is made largely (1) because in both instances the expression "other tongues" is used, and (2) because the verb translated "enabled" (or "gave utterance"; GK 1443 & 710) is frequently used in the OT and other Greek literature in connection with ecstatics (cf. Mic 5:12; Zec 10:2). But the words spoken at Pentecost under the Spirit's direction were immediately recognized by those who heard them as being languages then current, while at Corinth no one could understand what was said until someone present received a gift of interpretation. And the above-mentioned verb appears in contexts that stress clarity of speech and understanding (see 2:14; 26:25). Therefore, the tongues in 2:4 are best understood as "languages" (see NIV note).

The coming of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost was of utmost significance both theologically and practically for the early church. Was Pentecost the birthday of the Christian church? A great deal depends upon what one means by the term "church" (GK 1711) in the NT. One meaning is "the body of Christ" as the redeemed of all ages. For this meaning, it can hardly be said that the church had its beginning only at Pentecost. What Luke seems to be stressing is (1) that the relationship of the Spirit to the members of the body of Christ became much more intimate and personal at Pentecost, in fulfillment of Jesus' promise that the Spirit who "lives with you . . . will be in you" (Jn 14:17), and (2) that at Pentecost a new model of divine redemption was established as characteristic for life in the new covenant—one that, while incorporating both individual and corporate redemption, begins with the former in order to include the latter.

A second meaning of "church" is "an instrument of service" (distinguishable from the nation Israel) used by God for his redemptive purposes. It has been called by God to take up the mission formerly entrusted to Israel. In this sense, Luke is certainly presenting the coming of the Spirit at Pentecost as the church's birthday. Neither Jesus' ministry nor the mission of the early church would have been possible apart from the Spirit's empowering. So Luke emphasizes Jesus' explicit command to the disciples to stay in Jerusalem till they were empowered from on high by the Spirit (Lk 24:49; Ac 1:4–5, 8).

5–6 Certain "God-fearing Jews" who were residing in Jerusalem from many parts of the Diaspora, together with a number of Jews and proselytes who had returned to Jerusalem as pilgrims for the Pentecost festival, were "in bewilderment," "utterly amazed," and "perplexed" by the miraculous coming of the Spirit (vv.6–7, 12). Others, however, mocked (v.13). What drew the crowd and caused its bewilderment? Commentators differ as to whether it was the sound of the wind or the disciples' speaking in various languages. But if we break the sentence with some kind of punctuation after to "crowd" rather than (as is usually done) after "bewilderment," we have two coordinate sentences with two separate yet complementary ideas: "When they heard this sound, a crowd came together. And they were bewildered because each one heard them speaking in his own language." On this reading, "this sound" refers back to the "sound" of v.2 and conjures up a picture of people rushing to the source of the noise to see what is going on. When they get there, they become bewildered on hearing Galileans speaking in their own native languages.

7–8 Galileans had difficulty pronouncing gutturals and had the habit of swallowing syllables when speaking; so they were looked down upon by the people of Jerusalem as being provincial (cf. Mk 14:70). Therefore, since the disciples who were speaking were Galileans, it bewildered those who heard because the disciples could not by themselves have learned so many different languages.

9–11 Why these fifteen countries and no others are named here and why they are cited in this order are questions without ready solutions. Presumably Luke is using a current literary convention to illustrate his more prosaic statement of v.5: "from every nation under heaven." The list includes both ancient kingdoms and current political entities, moving generally from east to west and in its middle section naming first the northern and then the southern lands.

The appearance of "Judea" in the listing is, admittedly, strange because (1) it hardly ranks being sandwiched between Mesopotamia to the east and Cappadocia to the north; and (2) it involves the curious anomaly of inhabitants of Judea being amazed to hear the apostles speak in their own language. Perhaps the most cogent solution involves viewing "Judea" here in a wider prophetic sense, wherein the reference is to "the land of the Jews" that was held to stretch from the Euphrates to the Egyptian border. This would explain its sequence in the list and the omission of Syria from the list, and it would allow for a variety of dialects different from the one that was native to Jerusalem. The inclusion of "Cretans and Arabs" probably refers to seafaring peoples and to Nabatean Arabs, whose kingdom traditionally extended from the Euphrates to the Red Sea.

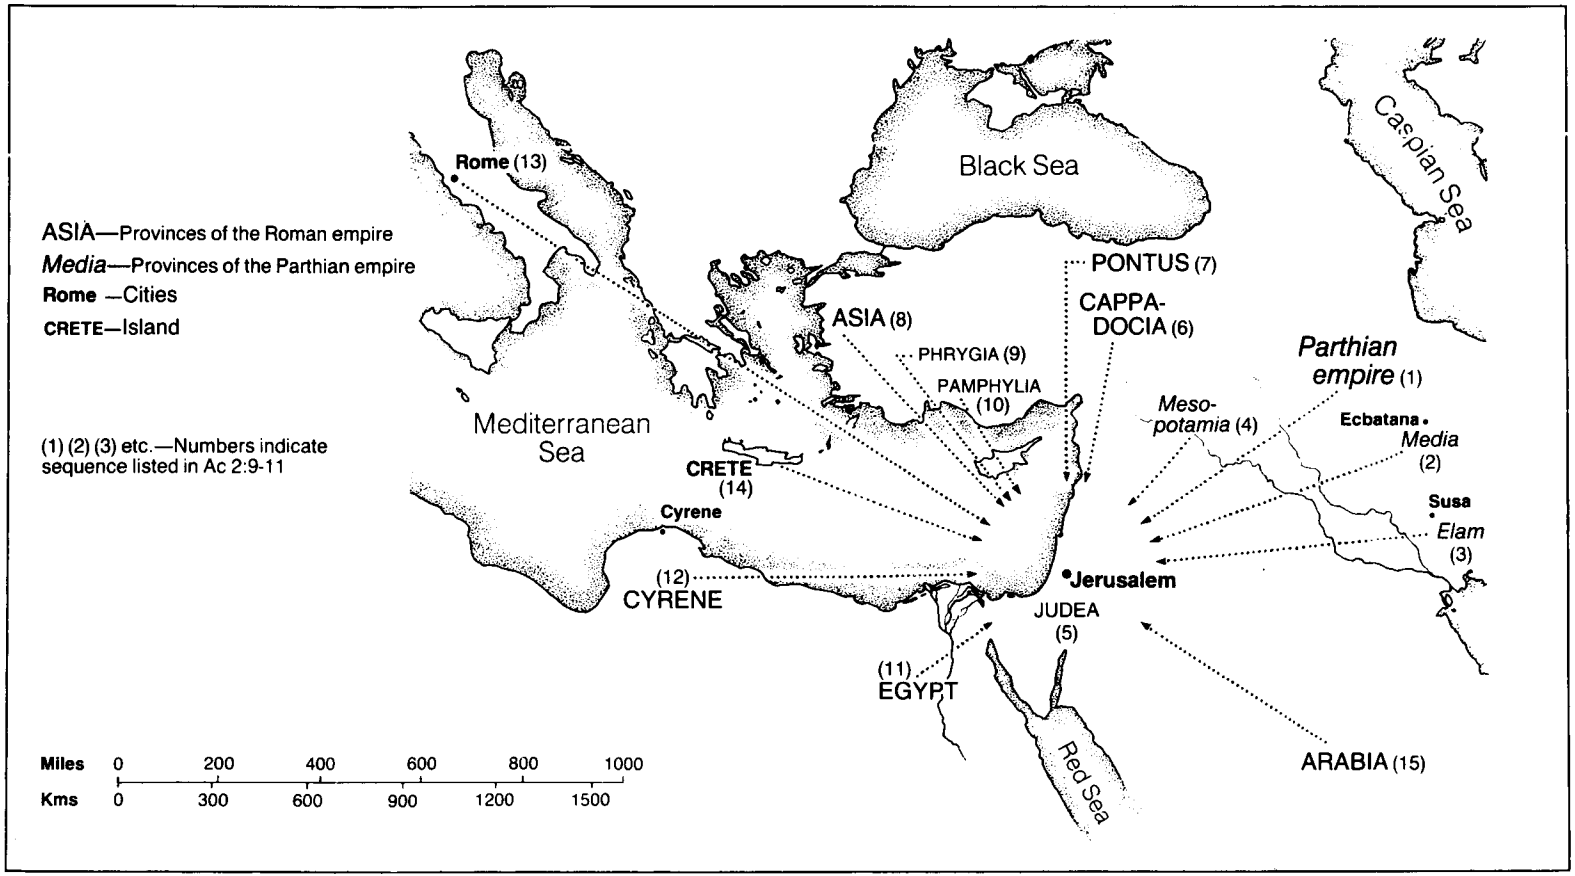
Each area and country named had a considerable Jewish population within its borders. Some of these had returned to Jerusalem to take up residence there. One group, however, is singled out as being religious pilgrims to the city: Jews and proselytes to Judaism from Rome. Undoubtedly there were other festival pilgrims in the crowd (just as there must have been other Diaspora Jews in attendance who were residents of Jerusalem), but Luke's interest in Acts is in the Gospel reaching out even to Rome, the capital of the empire. So he singles out this pilgrim contingent for special mention. It may be that some of these "visitors" from Rome returned there and formed the nucleus of the church in that city.

12–13 The miraculous does not inevitably and uniformly convince. There must also be the preparation of the heart and the proclamation of the message if miracles are to accomplish their full purpose. This was true even for the miracle of the Spirit's coming at Pentecost. All of the "God-fearing Jews" (v.5) whose attention had been arrested by the signs at Pentecost and whose own religious heritage gave them at least some appreciation of them were amazed and asked, "What does this mean?" Others, however, being spiritually insensitive, only mocked, attributing such phenomena to drunkenness. All this prepares the reader for Peter's sermon, which is the initial proclamation of the Gospel message to a prepared people.

2. Peter's sermon at Pentecost (2:14–41)

Peter's sermon at Pentecost consists of (1) an explanation of the occurrence of the phenomena (vv.14–21), (2) a proclamation of the apostolic message in its most elemental form (vv.22–36), and (3) a call to repentance with a promise of blessing (vv.37–41). The sermon is headed by a brief introductory statement and followed by two summary sentences dealing with Peter's further preaching and the people's response. It was probably delivered in the outer court of the temple.

a. Explanation section (2:14–21)



14 The first section of Peter's sermon is addressed to the "fellow Jews" and "all . . . [who are] in Jerusalem." Later on these two groups are combined under the captions "Men of Israel" (v.22) and "Brothers" (v.29), for it is natural for them to be classed together. But here Peter apparently wanted to include particularly those most bewildered by the multiplicity of the languages spoken, namely, the Diaspora contingent, who most appreciated the incongruity of the situation and wanted an explanation.

15 Peter begins negatively by arguing that the apostles could not be drunk, for it was only "nine in the morning." Unfortunately, this argument was more telling in antiquity than today.

16–21 Positively, Peter explains the phenomena taking place among the early Christians at Pentecost as fulfilling Joel 2:28–32. His use of the Joel passage employs a then-current method of OT interpretation that lays all emphasis on the fulfillment motif without attempting to exegete the details of the biblical prophecy it "interprets." The note of fulfillment is heightened by Peter's alteration of the OT's "afterwards" to "in the last days" and by his interruption of the quotation to insert the words "and they will prophesy" (v.18), thus highlighting the restoration of prophecy. The solemnity and importance of the words are emphasized by the addition of "God says" at the beginning (v.18).

The way Peter uses Joel 2:28–32 is of great significance for an appreciation of early Christian exegetical practices and doctrinal commitments and as a pattern for our own treatment of the OT. For Peter, we should note, what Joel said is what God says. And while what God said may have been somewhat enigmatic when first uttered, in the light of what has just happened it is clarified. Thus Peter can proclaim from the perspective of the Messiah's resurrection and living presence with his people (1) that "this" that he and the infant church were experiencing in the outpouring of God's Spirit "is that" prophesied by Joel, (2) that these are the long-awaited "last days" of God's redemptive program, and (3) that the validation of all this is the fact of the return of prophesying. By including the prophet Joel's call for response (v.21), Peter is also suggesting that a prophetic message of salvation and a call for repentance will go out from Jerusalem.

How Peter and the earliest followers of Jesus understood the more spectacular physical signs of Joel's prophecy (i.e., "blood and fire and billows of smoke"; "the sun will be turned to darkness and the moon to blood") has been debated (see EBC 1:103–26). What is important to note is that Peter's quotes the entire prophecy in Joel 2:28–32 because of its traditional messianic significance and because of its final sentence ("And everyone who calls on the name of the Lord will be saved"), which leads logically into the proclamation section of his sermon.

b. Proclamation section (2:22–36)

Many scholars, beginning with C. H. Dodd, identify six themes that appear repeatedly in Peter's sermons in Acts 2–4:

1. The age of fulfillment has dawned.
2. This has come about through the ministry, death and resurrection of Jesus (a brief account is given, with proof from Scripture).
3. Jesus was raised from the dead and is now exalted at God's right hand.
4. The presence of the Holy Spirit is the sign of Christ's power and glory.
5. The Messianic Age will soon end in the return of Christ.
6. The preaching always ends by an appeal for repentance, the offer of forgiveness and of the Holy Spirit, and the promise of salvation to those who enter the elect community.

With the exception of the return of Christ (which appears in these early sermons only at 3:20–21), all these themes are in Peter's Pentecost sermon. The early church was interested in the life and character of Jesus. Its preaching about Jesus was principally functional in nature rather than philosophical and stressed ultimate causality more than secondary causes or means. Peter therefore proclaims our Lord as "Jesus of Nazareth," "a man accredited," "handed over," put "to death," and raised "from the dead." God was the true author of Jesus' miracles, the ultimate agent in Jesus' death, and the only cause for Jesus' resurrection. There is, to be sure, some allusion to means in the statement "and you, with the help of wicked men, put him to death by nailing him to the cross" (v.23b). Yet the primary emphasis here is focused on Jesus, including Peter's closing declaration (v.36) and his call to repentance (v.38).

22 Peter begins his proclamation section with an inclusive form of address: "Men of Israel," which he parallels with the synonymous vocative "Brothers" (v.29). His topic concerns "Jesus of Nazareth"—a common title used of Jesus throughout Luke's writings (cf. Lk 18:37; Ac 3:6; 4:10; et al.) and one by which early Christians themselves were at times called (cf. 24:5). The ministry of Jesus is characterized by "miracles, wonders and signs" that God did among the people through Jesus.

23 The death of Jesus is presented as resulting from the interplay of divine necessity and human freedom. Nowhere in the NT is the paradox of a Christian understanding of history put more sharply than in this earliest proclamation of the death of Jesus the Messiah: God's purpose and foreknowledge stand as the necessary factors behind whatever happens; yet whatever happens occurs through the instrumentality of wicked people expressing their own human freedom. It is a paradox without ready solution. To deny it, however, is to go counter to the plain teaching of Scripture in both the OT and NT and to ignore the testimony of personal experience. "With the help of wicked men" points to the Roman authorities in Palestine, who carried out what had been instigated by the Jewish authorities.

24 Here the resurrection of Jesus is attributed directly to God, apart from any human action or even Jesus himself—just as elsewhere in the NT it is so attributed in quotations from early Christian hymns and catechisms (e.g., 1Co 15:4; Php 2:9). The imagery is of "death pangs" and their awful clutches (cf. 2Sa 22:6; Pss 18:4–6; 116:3), from which God is "freeing" Jesus "because it was impossible for death to keep its hold on him."

25–35 Here Peter quotes from Ps 16:8–11 and Ps 110:1 in support of what he has just said about Jesus in v.24. Peter once again uses a principle of the interpretation of Scripture that was acceptable in his day, which said that the same words appearing in two separate passages can be brought together. Both quotations have "at my right hand" and thus are deliberately treated together (cf. v.33).

During this period, both Ps 16 and Ps 110 were considered by Jewish interpreters to be somewhat enigmatic and were therefore understood in various ways. There was no problem with the confidence expressed in Ps 16:8–9, 11, for it was appropriate for the psalmist to whom God's love had been pledged and who had experienced God's covenant-keeping lovingkindness. But how could the psalmist have expected God to keep him from the grave and from undergoing decay, as in v.10? And Ps 110 was even more difficult, for who is this "my Lord" to whom "the LORD" has said, "Sit at my right hand until I make your enemies a footstool for your feet" (v.34)? Some early rabbis linked the psalm with Abraham, others with David, and some even with Hezekiah; but there is no clearly attested messianic understanding of Ps 110 in rabbinic literature until about A.D. 260.

Nevertheless, Jesus is reported in all three Synoptic Gospels as having interpreted Ps 110:1 as a messianic passage and as applying it to himself (Mt 22:41–46; Mk 12:35–37; Lk 20:41–44). And it was probably Jesus' own treatment of this verse that (1) furnished the exegetical key for the early church's understanding of their risen Lord, (2) served as the pattern for their interpretation of similar enigmatic OT passages (e.g., Paul's combining 2Sa 7:6–16 with Ps 2:7 and Isa 55:3 with Ps 16:10 in his Antioch address of Ac 13:16–41), and (3) anchored all other passages as could be brought together on a "verbal analogy basis" (e.g., the passages listed in Heb 1:5–13).

Therefore working from Ps 110:1 as an accepted messianic passage and viewing Ps 16:8–11 as legitimately related to it, Peter proclaims that Ps 16:10 refers to Israel's promised Messiah and no other. Furthermore, Peter insists, David could not have been speaking about himself, for he did indeed die, was buried, and suffered decay—as the presence of his tomb in the city eloquently testifies (v.29). Nor did he ascend into heaven. Therefore, David must have been prophesying about the resurrection of the Messiah in Ps 16:10 and about his exaltation in Ps 110:1. And with God's raising of Jesus from the dead, these formerly enigmatic passages are clarified and the pouring out of the Spirit explained.

36 With the proclamation of Jesus as Lord and Messiah, Peter reaches the climax and conclusion of his sermon. The initial "therefore" shows that God's resurrection and exaltation of Jesus accredit him as humankind's Lord and Israel's Messiah. And Peter calls upon "all Israel" to know with certainty that "God has made this Jesus, whom you crucified, both Lord and Christ." Jesus was acknowledged and proclaimed Lord and Christ both after his resurrection and because of his resurrection. In Jewish thought, no one had a right to the title Messiah till he had accomplished the work of the Messiah. During his earthly ministry, as that ministry is portrayed in all the Gospels, Jesus was distinctly reluctant to accept the acclaim of Lord and Messiah, probably because his understanding of messiahship had to do with suffering and because his concept of lordship had to do with vindication and exaltation by God. But now that Jesus has accomplished his messianic mission in life and death and has been raised by God and exalted "at his right hand," the titles Lord and Christ are legitimately his. This theme of function and accomplishment as the basis for titular acclaim is a recurring note in the christological statements elsewhere in the NT (cf. Ro 1:4; Php 2:9–11; Heb 2:14; 1Jn 5:6). The resurrection of Jesus from the dead is God's open avowal that the messianic work has been accomplished and that Jesus now has the full right to assume the messianic title.

In the twelve instances in Acts where the word "Christ" (GK 5986; see comment on Mk 8:29–30) appears singly (2:31, 36; 3:18; 4:26; 8:5; 9:22; 17:3a, 26:23) and where "Christ" is in apposition to "Jesus" but still "used" singly (3:20; 5:42; 18:5, 28), it is used as a title, "Messiah." And in all these instances, it is addressed to a Jewish audience (only 8:5 and 26:23 are possible exceptions, though both the Samaritans and Agrippa II possessed something of a Jewish background and understanding). Apparently, therefore, the messiahship of Jesus was the distinctive feature of the church's witness within Jewish circles, signifying, as it does, his fulfillment of Israel's hopes and his culmination of God's redemptive purposes.

The title "Lord" (GK 3261) was also proclaimed christologically in Jewish circles, with evident intent to apply to Jesus all that was said of God in the OT (cf. the Christological use of Isa 45:23 in Php 2:10). But "Lord" came to have particular relevance to the church's witness to Gentiles just as "Messiah" was more relevant to the Jewish world. So in Acts Luke reports the proclamation of Jesus as "the Christ" before Jewish audiences both in Palestine and among the Diaspora, whereas Paul in his letters to Gentile churches generally uses Christ as a proper name and proclaims Christ Jesus as "the Lord."

c. A call to repentance and a promise of blessing (2:37–41)

37 Peter's preaching had been effective. The people were "cut to the heart" at the awful realization that in crucifying their long-awaited Messiah they had rejected their only hope of salvation. So with deep anguish they cried out, "Brothers, what shall we do?" The phrase "cut to the heart" may have been drawn from Ps 109:16, the same psalm Luke had earlier applied to Judas (see comment on 1:20). There it is a vivid phrase for those who stand with God's servant in opposing the wicked men: "those who have been cut to the heart" or those who are "the humble of heart" because they realize their need and are open to God's working.

The Kerygma of the Early Church

1. The promises by God made in the OT have now been fulfilled with the coming of Jesus the Messiah (Ac 2:30; 3:19, 24, 10:43; 26:6–7, 22; Ro 1:2–4; 1Ti 3:16; Heb 1:1–2; 1Pe 1:10–12; 2Pe 1:18–19).

2. Jesus was anointed by God at his baptism as Messiah (Ac 10:38).

3. Jesus began his ministry in Galilee after his baptism (Ac 10:37).

4. He conducted a beneficient ministry, doing good and performing mighty works by the power of God (Mk 10:45; Ac 2:22; 10:38)

5. The Messiah was crucified according to the purpose of God (Mk 10:45; Jn 3:16; Ac 2:23; 3:13–15, 18; 4:11; 10:39; 26:23; Ro 8:34; 1Co 1:17–18; 15:3; Gal 1:4; Heb 1:3; 1Pe 1:2, 19; 3:18; 1Jn 4:10).

6. He was raised from the dead and appeared to his disciples (Ac 2:24, 31–32; 3:15, 26; 10:40–41; 17:31; 26:23; Ro 8:34; 10:9; 1Co 15:4–7, 12ff.; 1Th 1:10; 1Ti 3:16; 1Pe 1:2, 21; 3:18, 21).

7. Jesus was exalted by God and given the name "Lord" (Ac 2:25–29, 33–36; 3:13; 10:36; Ro 8:34; 10:9; 1Ti 3:16; Heb 1:3; 1Pe 3:22).

8. He gave the Holy Spirit to form the new community of God (Ac 1:8; 2:14–18, 33, 38-39; 10:44–47; 1Pe 1:12).

9. He will come again for judgment and the restoration of all things (Ac 3:20–21; 10:42; 17:31; 1Co 15:20–28; 1Th 1:10).

10. All who hear the message should repent and be baptized (Ac 2:21, 38; 3:19; 10:43, 47–48; 17:30; 26:20; Ro 1:17; 10:9; 1Pe 3:21).

This schema served as the essential proclamation of the early church, though different authors of the NT may leave out a portion or vary in emphasis on particulars in the kerygma. Compare the entire gospel of Mark, which closely follows the Petrine aspect of the kerygma.

38 Peter's answer to the people's anguished cry presents interpreters with a set of complex theological problems that are often looked upon only as grist for differing theological mills. But Peter's words came to his hearers as the best news they had ever heard—far better, indeed, than they could have hoped for. So today these words remain the best of good news and should be read as the proclamation of that news and not as just a set of theological problems.

Peter calls on his hearers to "repent" (GK 3566). This word implies a complete change of heart, beginning with the confession of sin. With this he couples the call to "be baptized," thus linking both repentance and baptism with the forgiveness of sins. So far this sounds familiar, for John the Baptist had proclaimed a "baptism of repentance for the forgiveness of sins" (Mk 1:4); and Jesus made repentance central in his preaching (cf. Mt 4:17; Mk 1:15) and baptized (cf. Jn 3:22, 26; 4:1–2). Judaism also had repentance at the core of its message and emphasized baptism (at least for proselytes). But while there is much that appears traditional in Peter's exhortation, there is also much that is new and distinctive—particularly in three ways.

In the first place, Peter calls on "every one" of his audience to repent and be baptized. Jews thought corporately and generally viewed the rite of baptism as appropriate only for proselytes (though some sects within Judaism baptized Jews). But like John the Baptist and probably Jesus, Peter calls for an individual response on the part of his hearers. So he set aside family and corporate relationships as having any final saving significance and stressed the response of the individual person—not, however, denying the necessity and value of corporate relationships, but placing them in a "new covenant" perspective.

Second, Peter identifies the repentance and baptism he is speaking of as being specifically Christian in that it is done "in the name of Jesus Christ." What that means, it seems, is that a person in repenting and being baptized calls upon the name of Jesus (cf. 22:16) and thereby avows his or her intention to be committed to and identified with Jesus.

A third feature in Peter's preaching at this point is the relation of the gift of the Holy Spirit to repentance and baptism. "The gift of the Holy Spirit" is another way of describing what the disciples had experienced in "the coming of the Holy Spirit," which Jesus called "the baptism of the Holy Spirit" (cf. 1:4–5, 8). We must distinguish between "the gift" (GK 1562) of the Holy Spirit and what Paul called "the gifts" (GK 5922; 1Co 12:1; 14:1) of that selfsame Spirit. "The gift" is the Spirit himself given to minister the saving benefits of Christ's redemption to the believer, while "the gifts" are those spiritual abilities the Spirit gives variously to believers "for the common good" and sovereignly, "just as he determines" (1Co 12:7, 11). Peter's promise of the "gift of the Holy Spirit" is a logical outcome of repentance and baptism. This primary gift includes a variety of spiritual gifts for the advancement of the Gospel and the welfare of God's people. But first of all, it has to do with what God's Spirit does for every Christian in applying and working out the benefits of Christ's redemptive work.

In trying to deal with the various elements in this passage, some interpreters have stressed the command to be baptized so as to link the forgiveness of sins exclusively with baptism. But it runs contrary to all biblical religion to assume that outward rites have any value apart from true repentance and an inward change. The Jewish mind, indeed, could not divorce inward spirituality from its outward expression. Wherever the Gospel was proclaimed in a Jewish milieu, the rite of baptism was taken for granted as being inevitably involved (cf. 2:41; 8:12 ,36–38; 9:18; 10:47–48; 18:8; 19:5; also Heb 10:22; 1Pe 3:18–21). But Peter's sermon in Solomon's Colonnade (cf. 3:12–26) stresses only repentance and turning to God "so that your sins may be wiped out" (v.19) and makes no mention of baptism. This shows that for Luke at least, and probably also for Peter, while baptism with water was the expected symbol for conversion, it was not an indispensable criterion for salvation.

A few commentators have set Peter's words in v.38 in opposition to those of John the Baptist in Mk 1:8 and those of Jesus in Ac 1:5, where the baptism of the Holy Spirit is distinguished from John's baptism and appears to supersede it. But neither the Baptist's prophecy nor Jesus' promise necessarily implies that the baptism of the Spirit would set aside water baptism. Certainly the early church did not take it that way. They continued to practice water baptism as the external symbol by which those who believed the Gospel, repented of their sins, and acknowledged Jesus as their Lord publicly bore witness to their new life, which had been received through the baptism of the Holy Spirit. In line, then, with the Baptist's prophecy and Jesus' promise, baptism with the Holy Spirit is distinguished from baptism with water. But baptism with the Holy Spirit did not replace baptism with water; rather, the latter was given a richer significance because of the saving work of Christ and the coming of the Spirit.

Again, some have observed that there is no mention in this passage, either in the report of Peter's preaching (vv.38–40) or in the summary of the people's response (v.41), of any speaking in tongues, as at Pentecost, or of laying on of hands, as in Samaria (8:17). From this various implications have been drawn. In a Jewish context, however, it would not have been surprising if both occurred; in fact, one is probably justified in being surprised had they not occurred. Nevertheless, that they are not mentioned implies (as with the omission of baptism in 3:19) that speaking in tongues and laying on of hands were not considered prerequisites for receiving the Spirit.

A more difficult problem arises when we try to correlate Peter's words here with the accounts of the Spirit's baptism in 8:15–17 (at Samaria), 10:44–46 (in the house of Cornelius), and 19:6 (at Ephesus). In v.38 the baptism of the Spirit is the logical outcome of repentance and water baptism; but in 8:15–17; 10:44–46; and 19:6 it appears to be temporally separated from conversion and water baptism—either following them (as at Samaria and Ephesus) or preceding them (as with Cornelius). Catholic sacramentalists take this as a biblical basis for separating baptism and confirmation; and Charismatics of various kinds see it as justification for a doctrine of the baptism of the Spirit as a second work of grace after conversion. But lest too much be made of this difference theologically, we ought first to attempt to understand the historical situation of vv.37–41 and to explain matters more circumstantially. Assuming for the moment that Luke shared Paul's view of the indissoluble connection between conversion, water baptism, and the baptism of the Holy Spirit (cf. Ro 8:9; 1Co 6:11), the following question may be asked: What if the Pentecost experience, particularly in regard to the sequence and temporal relations of conversion, water baptism, and Holy Spirit baptism, had been fully present in each of these latter three instances?

Take the Samaritans (8:4–8, 14–17), for example, who were converted through the instrumentality of Philip, one of the Hellenists expelled from Jerusalem at the time of Stephen's martyrdom. Samaritans had always been considered second-class citizens of Palestine by the Jerusalem Jews who kept them at arm's length. What if it had been the apostles residing at Jerusalem who had been the missioners to Samaria? Probably they would have been rebuffed, just as they were earlier when the Samaritans associated them with the city of Jerusalem (cf. Lk 9:51–56). But God providentially used Philip to bring them the Gospel—Philip, who had also (though for different reasons) been rebuffed at Jerusalem. The Samaritans received him and believed his message. But what if the Spirit had come upon them at their baptism by Philip? Undoubtedly what feelings some of the Christians at Jerusalem had against Philip and the Hellenists would have rubbed off on the Samaritan believers and they would have been doubly under suspicion. But God providentially withheld the gift of the Holy Spirit till Peter and John laid their hands on the Samaritans—Peter and John, two leading Jerusalem apostles who at that time would have been accepted by the new converts of Samaria. So in this first advance of the Gospel outside Jerusalem, God worked in ways conducive both to the reception of the Good News in Samaria and the acceptance of these new converts at Jerusalem—ways that promoted both the outreach of the Gospel and the unity of the church.

Or take the conversion of Cornelius (10:34–48). What if, in Peter's ministry to this Gentile, the order of events Peter had set down after his sermon at Pentecost had occurred (2:38–39), namely, repentance, baptism, forgiveness of sins, reception of the gift of the Holy Spirit? Some at Jerusalem might have accused Peter of manipulating the occasion for his own ends (as his lengthy defense before the Jerusalem congregation in 11:1–18 takes pains to deny). But God in his providence gave the gift of his Spirit, coupled with such signs as would convince both Peter and his possible critics at Jerusalem, even before

Cornelius's baptism, so that all would attribute his conversion entirely to God rather than let their prejudices make Cornelius a second-class Christian. (Regarding 19:1–4, see comments on that passage.)

39 The "promise" (GK 2039) of which Peter speaks includes both the forgiveness of sins and the gift of the Holy Spirit. Both are logically and indissolubly united in applying Christ's redemptive work to the believer, and they were only separated chronologically, it seems, for what could be called circumstantial reasons. The promise, Peter declares, is not only for his immediate hearers ("for you") but also for succeeding generations ("for your children") and for all in distant places ("for all who are far off"). It is a promise, Peter concludes, that is sure; for it has been given by God and rests upon the prophetic word of Joel 2:32: "And everyone who calls on the name of the Lord will be saved."

Two issues need to be discussed regarding the expression "for all who are far off." (1) Some prefer to see this as a temporal reference to future Jewish generations, paralleling the phrase "for your children." But the word "far off" (GK 3426) in Greek is used exclusively as a spatial rather than as a temporal word in the NT. (2) Does it refer only to Diaspora Jews or also to Gentiles? The two OT passages alluded to here (Isa 57:19; Joel 2:32) are probably referring to Diaspora Jews. But this is one of those situations where a narrator like Luke has read into what the speaker said more than was originally there and so implied that the speaker spoke better than he knew. Peter himself was probably thinking of Jewish remnant theology, of God's call to a scattered but repentant Jewish remnant. But Luke's desire is to show how an originally Jewish gospel penetrated the Gentile world so extensively that it came to enter "without hindrance" (cf. 28:31) into the capital of the Roman Empire. Very likely, therefore, in recounting Peter's words here in Acts, Luke meant them to be read as having Gentiles in mind (see also 22:21).

40–41 Two summary statements conclude Luke's report of Peter's Pentecost sermon. (1) Peter spoke earnest, solemn words, connoted by the verbs "warned" and "pleaded." His characterization of this age as a "corrupt generation" has its parallel in Jesus' words (cf. Mt 16:4; 17:17) and in Paul's (cf. Php 2:15). What we have here is the vision of an evangelist—a vision that is all too often lost as the Gospel is acclimated to the world and the world to the church. The Jews generally looked on baptism as a rite only for Gentile converts (i.e., proselytes), not for one born a Jew, and it symbolized the break with one's Gentile past and the washing away of all defilement. So when Jews accepted baptism in the name of Jesus on hearing Peter's message, it was traumatic and significant for them in a way we in our mildly christianized culture have difficulty understanding. (2) Yet, as a result of Peter's preaching, "about" three thousand took the revolutionary step of baptism. Thus, the congregation of believers in Jesus came into being at Jerusalem—a congregation made up of the original 120 (1:15) and progressively augmented by about three thousand others.

Part I. The Christian Mission to the Jewish World (2:42–12:24)

Luke gives us the theme of Acts in Jesus' words: "You will be my witnesses in Jerusalem, and in all Judea and Samaria, and to the ends of the earth" (1:8). Behind them stands Dt 19:15, with its requirement that every matter be established by two or three witnesses. In his gospel Luke has frequently highlighted such matters as (1) the witness of the Scriptures coupled with the ministry of Jesus and the witness of the Spirit, (2) the pairings of the disciples in their journeys on behalf of Jesus (cf. 10:1), and (3) the two angels at the tomb. In his organization of the common tradition in his gospel, he set up a number of parallels between our Lord's ministry in Galilee (Lk 4:14–9:50) and his ministry in the regions of Perea and Judea (Lk 9:51–19:27). So in Acts Luke continues his pairings of apostolic men in their ministries (e.g., Peter and John in Ac 3:1, 3–4, 11; 4:13, 19; 8:14; Barnabas and Saul in 11:25–26; 12:25; 13:2; Paul and Barnabas in 13:43, 46, 50; 15:2, 12, 22, 35; Judas and Silas in 15:32; Barnabas and Mark in 15:39; Paul and Silas in 15:40; 16:19, 25; 17:4, 10; and Silas and Timothy in 17:14–15; 18:5). Luke also sets up a number of parallels between the ministry of Peter in the first half of his work and the ministry of Paul in the last half: both heal a lame man (3:2–8; 14:8–10); both do miracles at some distance (5:15; 19:12); both exorcise evil spirits (5:16; 16:18); both defeat sorcerers

(8:18–24; 13:6–11); both raise the dead (9:36–43; 20:9–12); both defend themselves against Jewish authorities (4:8–12; 5:27–32; 22:3–21; 23:1–6; 28:25–28); both receive heavenly visions (10:9–16; 16:9); both are involved in bestowing the Holy Spirit on new converts (8:14–17; 19:1–7); and both are miraculously released from prison (5:19; 12:7–11; 16:25–27). More importantly, both proclaim the same message and even use to some extent the same set of proof texts (e.g., Ps 16:10; cf. 2:27; 13:35).

It is, then, from Jesus' declaration about the apostles' witness (1:8) that Luke derives the framework for his narrative of Acts. First he portrays the mission of the Jerusalem apostles and their colleagues within the Jewish world; next he portrays the mission of Paul and his companions within the Gentile world. Luke presents this material in six blocks or panels—three of them are given to the mission to the Jews, three to the mission to the Gentiles.

Panel 1—The Earliest Days of the Church at Jerusalem (2:42–6:7)

Acts 2:42–6:7 describes the earliest days of the church at Jerusalem and covers the first three to five years of the new messianic movement (i.e., from A.D. 30 to the mid-thirties). Luke deals with the events of this period by means of a thesis paragraph followed by a series of vignettes that illustrate that paragraph. These portrayals of representative situations are drawn from many experiences within the early church and thus present his material succinctly. In this way help his readers feel the nature of what God was doing by his Spirit through the witness of the apostles.

A. A Thesis Paragraph on the State of the Early Church (2:42–47)

In addition to the six summary statements (6:7; 9:31; 12:24; 16:5; 19:20; 28:31) that conclude each of the six panels, Acts also has in its first panel three short summary-like paragraphs (2:42–47; 4:32–35; and 5:12–16). The latter two each introduce the block of material that immediately follows it, with the specific details in that material directly related to the respective introductory paragraph. But the first of the three paragraphs (2:42–47) is longer than the others and introduces the entire first panel of material. The rest of the first panel explicates, by means of a series of vignettes, the various points made in this first thesis paragraph.

42 Luke begins describing the early church by telling us that the believers in it were distinguished by their devotion to the apostles' teaching, to fellowship with one another, to "breaking of bread," and "to prayer." The verb translated "devoted" (GK 4674) connotes a steadfast and single-minded fidelity to a certain course of action (cf. its use in 1:14 regarding devotion to prayer by the 120 in the upper room and in 6:4 regarding the apostles' resolve, in the context of the Hellenistic widows, to center their attention on prayer and the ministry of the word).

"The apostles' teaching [GK 1439]" refers to a body of material considered authoritative because it was the message about Jesus of Nazareth proclaimed by accredited apostles. It undoubtedly included a compilation of the words of Jesus (cf. 20:35), some account of his earthly ministry, passion, and resurrection (cf. 2:22–24), and a declaration of what all this meant for humanity's redemption (cf. 1Co 15:3–5)—all of which was thought of in terms of a Christian "tradition" that could be passed on to others (cf. 1Co 11:2; 1Th 2:13; 2Th 2:15; 3:6). The number of references to teachers, teaching, and tradition within Acts and the letters to the churches (cf. Ro 6:17; 12:7; 16:17; 1Co 11:2; 14:26; 2Th 2:15; 3:6; Jas 3:1), and the frequent linking of prophets and teachers in the NT (cf. Ac 13:1; 1Co 12:28; 14:6; Eph 4:11), suggest that the creative role of prophecy in the early church was balanced by the conserving role of teaching. Undoubtedly the early congregation at Jerusalem, amid differences of perspective and along with a lively eschatological expectation, had a general "sense of center" provided by the teaching of the apostles.

Luke's reference to "the fellowship" (GK 3126) implies that there was something distinctive in the gatherings of the early believers. With the influx of three thousand on the Day of Pentecost and with daily increases to their number after that (cf. 2:47), they must have had some externally recognizable identity. Perhaps in those early days others thought of them as a "Synagogue of Nazarenes" and gave them a place among other such groups within the mosaic of Judaism. But the Christian community was not just a sect of Judaism, even though they continued to observe Jewish rites and customs and had no intention of breaking with the nation or its institutions. They held to the centrality of Jesus of Nazareth in the redemptive program of God and in their worship. Their proclamation of Jesus as Israel's promised Messiah and the Lord of the human race set them apart in Jerusalem as a distinguishable entity.

Just what is meant by "the breaking [GK 3082] of bread" in v.42 has been vigorously debated. Suggestions are a type of Jewish fellowship meal, a paschal commemoration of Christ's death, or an agape feast that emphasized the joy of communion with the risen Lord and of fellowship with one another. Here and in 20:7 Luke may well have had in mind the full Pauline understanding (1Co 10:16; 11:24), but elsewhere he uses this term for an ordinary meal (cf. Lk 24:30, 35; Ac 20:11; 27:35; likely also 2:46). Yet it is difficult to believe that Luke had in mind here only an ordinary meal, since he places the expression between two such religiously loaded terms as "the fellowship" and "prayer." Undoubtedly "the breaking of bread" was an occasion for joy, love, and praise because it was connected with Jesus. Probably it should also be understood as subtly connoting the passion of Christ, even though the full theology as described by Paul had not yet come into focus.

References to "prayer" (GK 4666) are frequent both in the summary statements and the narrative of Acts (see 1:14, 24; 4:24–31; 6:4, 6; et al.). Just as Luke has set up in Luke-Acts the parallelism between the Spirit's work in relation to Jesus and the Spirit's work in the church, so he also sets up the parallelism between prayer in the life of Jesus and prayer in the life of the church. His use here of both the definite article and the plural in "the prayers" suggest formal prayers, probably both Jewish and Christian. The earliest believers not only viewed the old forms as filled with new content, but also in their enthusiasm they fashioned new vehicles for their praise.

43 Furthermore, Luke tells us that a lingering sense of awe rested on many who did not take their stand with the Christians and that miraculous things were done by the apostles. "Everyone," in contradistinction to "all the believers" of v.44, refers hyperbolically to nonbelievers in Jerusalem who knew of the events of Pentecost and were observing the life of the early congregation. In the expression "wonders and miraculous signs," Luke picks up the phraseology of Joel's prophecy (cf. 2:19) and of Peter's characterization of Jesus' ministry (cf. 2:22). Luke probably used it to suggest that the miracles that the apostles did give evidence of the presence of God with his people, just as throughout his ministry, Jesus performed miracles to show that God was with him. These miracles continued to happen during those early days.

44–45 Within the Christian congregation at Jerusalem, the believers' sense of spiritual unity expressed itself in communal living and sharing with the needy members of their group. While Acts implies that overt persecution of Christians came somewhat later, in certain instances economic and social sanctions were undoubtedly imposed on the early believers. Thus the communal life described in vv.44–45 should be understood, at least in part, as a response to these pressures. Such treatment of minority groups is not uncommon, as both ancient and contemporary history shows. The practice of holding possessions in community was a common feature of some Jewish sects of NT times (e.g., the group at Qumran). The sharing of the early Christians involved both what we would call their real estate ("possessions") and their personal possessions ("goods").

46–47a The favorite meeting place of the early believers was in the temple (cf. Lk 24:53), at the eastern edge of the outer court called Solomon's Colonnade (cf. 3:11; 5:12). There, in typically Semitic fashion, they carried on their discussions and offered praise to God. As Jews who were Christians and also Christians who were Jews, they not only considered Jerusalem to be their city but continued to regard the temple as their sanctuary and the Law as their law. Evidently they thought of themselves as the faithful remnant within Israel for whose sake all the institutions and customs of the nation existed. As such, their refocused eschatological hopes (cf. Mal 3:1) and all their desires to influence their own people were associated with the city of Jerusalem, the Jerusalem temple, and the Mosaic law.

But while they met formally for discussion and worship in the temple precincts, they ate their meals together in their own homes, doing so with gladness and sincerity of heart. They also found a large measure of favor among the people. In Luke's writings, "the people" (GK 3295) usually refers to Israel as the elect nation to whom the message of redemption is initially directed and for whom (together with the Gentiles) it is ultimately intended (e.g., 3:9; 4:10; 5:13). Later in the narrative of Acts, the attitude of "the people" becomes more and more antagonistic to the Christian Gospel and its missioners. But in this first panel the response of the people (excluding their leaders) is largely favorable toward the early Christians and their manner of life. Luke shows that early Christianity was the fulfillment of all that is truly Jewish and that it directed its mission first to the Jewish world—themes stressed throughout this book.

47b Luke's thesis paragraph on the state of the early church at Jerusalem concludes with the triumphant note that as people were being saved, they were added to the growing number or Christians—a note that runs throughout this first panel but is not confined to it. Note that it is the Lord himself who adds to his church.

B. A Crippled Beggar Healed (3:1–26)

In 2:42–47, Luke has spoken of the early Christians' continued attendance at the temple, the wonders and miracles the apostles did, the awe that many of the Jews felt, and the apostles' teaching. Now he gives us a vignette illustrating these things. Much like the synoptic tradition that selected the healing of a leper as "Exhibit A" to represent the nature of Jesus' early ministry in Galilee (cf. Mk 1:40–45), or John's use of the healing of a Capernaum official's son for the same purpose (cf. Jn 4:46, 54), Luke now singles out this episode in the history of the early Jerusalem congregation to bring the reader into the picture. No doubt the episode at the time was well known and frequently recounted in the early church long before Luke wrote of it.

1. The healing (3:1–10)

1 The story of the healing of the crippled beggar begins with the straightforward statement that Peter and John went up to the temple at the time of prayer. That the apostles had been living in Jerusalem immediately after Jesus' ascension was in accord with his instructions that they stay in the city until the outpouring of the Holy Spirit (Lk 24:49; Ac 1:4) and begin their mission there (Ac 1:8; cf. Lk 24:47). But what kept these Galilean disciples in Jerusalem after Pentecost, and why did Jewish Christianity become centered in Jerusalem rather than Galilee? While there were Christians in Galilee who formed themselves into congregations there (cf. 9:31), the earliest extant Christian writings, the Pauline letters, take into account only the Jerusalem community and associate the Galilean apostles directly with that (cf. Gal 1:18–2:10; 1Th 2:14). In other words, as God's righteous remnant within Israel and as members of the Messiah's eschatological community, the apostles centered their activities in Jerusalem, the central city of Judaism. Along with that went their continued adherence to Israel's institutions and forms of worship.

Peter and John are presented as "going up to the temple at the time of prayer—at three in the afternoon." The stated times for prayer in Judaism were (1) early in the morning, in connection with the morning sacrifice; (2) at the ninth hour of the day (about three o'clock), in connection with the evening sacrifice; and (3) at sunset. The verb "going up" conveys a vivid visual impression of the apostles' movement toward Jerusalem. Going to the temple is always spoken of in terms of "going up"—principally out of reverential respect, though also because of location (Lk 18:10; Jn 7:14; Ac 11:2; cf. 15:2; 18:22).

2–3 The man is described as "crippled from birth" and having to be carried daily "to the temple gate called Beautiful" to beg for his living. Since almsgiving was classed in Judaism as a meritorious act, this man was placed at the gate so that those coming to the temple could gain merit by giving him a coin.

Just which gate is referred to as "Beautiful" is not easy to determine. Neither Josephus nor the Talmud refers to such a temple gate. We do not know whether it had to do with the outer court or one of the inner courts. Most scholars today believe it is the Nicanor Gate, which led from the eastern part of the outer court (Court of the Gentiles) into the first of the inner courts (Court of the Women).

4–6 In response to the beggar's request for money, Peter fixed his eyes on him and said,

"Look at us!" Thinking he had a benefactor, the beggar looked up expectantly. To his astonishment he heard the words: "In the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, walk." In Semitic thought, a "name" (GK 3950) does not just identify or distinguish a person; it expresses the very nature of his being. Hence the power of the person is present and available in the name of the person. Peter, therefore, does not just ask the risen Jesus to heal but pronounces over the crippled beggar the name of Jesus, thereby releasing the power of Jesus (cf. 3:16; 4:10). And the power of the risen Jesus, coupled with the man's response of faith (cf. 3:16), effects the healing.

7–10 The healing is described as an instantaneous one, accomplishing in a moment what God in his providence through the normal healing processes usually takes months to do. The effect on the man was traumatic; he began walking about and jumping and praising God. As for the people, they were "filled with wonder and amazement." What was taking place was but a token, to those who had eyes to see, of the presence of the Messianic Age, of which the prophet had long ago predicted: "Then will the lame leap like a deer" (Isa 35:6).

2. Peter's sermon in Solomon's Colonnade (3:11–26)

Peter's sermon in Solomon's Colonnade is in many ways similar to his sermon at Pentecost (2:14–41). Structurally, both move from proclamation to a call for repentance. The Pentecost sermon, however, is finished and polished, whereas this one is comparatively rough-hewn. Thematically, both focus on the denial and vindication of Jesus of Nazareth. But the Colonnade sermon expresses more of a remnant theology than the one at Pentecost. It shows a more generous attitude toward Israel, coupled with a greater stress on the nation's responsibility for the Messiah's death, than does the Pentecost sermon; and it makes explicit the necessity of receiving God's grace by faith. Christologically, Peter's sermon here (like his defense in 4:8–12) incorporates a number of archaic and primitive titles used of Jesus within early Jewish Christianity.

It seems strange, at first glance, that Luke would place two such similar sermons of Peter so close together. But his putting the Pentecost sermon in the introductory section of Acts was evidently meant to be a kind of paradigm of early apostolic preaching—a paradigm Luke seems to have polished for greater literary effectiveness. As for the Colonnade sermon, Luke seems to have included it as an example of how the early congregation in Jerusalem proclaimed the message of Jesus to the people of Israel as a whole. Probably the story and the sermon came to Luke from one of his sources as something of a self-contained unit (see the introduction to Acts), and he left it basically unchanged.

11 We are not given many of the "stage directions" for Peter's Colonnade sermon. What we are told, however, is significant: (1) the healed cripple "held on to" Peter and John so as not to let them get away; (2) "the people" came running to them in Solomon's Colonnade; and (3) they were "astonished" at what had happened. Solomon's Colonnade was a covered portico that ran the entire length of the eastern portion of the outer court of the temple precincts, along and just inside the eastern wall of the temple (cf. 5:12; Jn 10:23).

12–16 The proclamation section of the sermon is an exposition on "the name of Jesus" (twice repeated in v.16). The sermon begins by denying that it was through the apostles' "own power or godliness" that the cripple was healed. Rather, "the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob" brought about this healing that glorified Jesus. Just as Peter earlier spoke of God as the true author of Jesus' miracles (cf. 2:22), so here he attributes solely to God such wonders as occurred in the apostles' ministries. And just as Jesus' miracles were done by God to accredit him before the people (cf. again 2:22), so miracles continued to be done through the apostles in order for God to glorify Jesus.

The sermon focuses on God's Servant, Jesus, whom Israel disowned and killed but God raised from the dead. It is through his name and the faith that comes through him that the healing of the crippled beggar occurred. In speaking of Jesus, Peter uses a number of early christological titles. (1) The sermon begins and ends by ascribing to Jesus the title "God's Servant" (vv.13, 26), which echoes the Servant theme of Isaiah 42–53 (cf. Isa 52:13). (2) Peter uses the theme of Moses as prophet (Dt 18:15, 18–19) and applies it to Jesus (vv.22–23). (3) He includes the titles "the Holy One" and "the Righteous One" (v.14) and the ascription "the author of life" (v.15). (4) And Peter stresses "the name of Jesus" as the powerful agent in the miracle (see comment on 3:4–6)—a significant fact since "the Name" was a pious Jewish surrogate for God and connoted his divine presence and power.

17–18 What strikes the reader immediately in the call-to-repentance section of Peter's sermon is its attitude toward Israel, which in its hopeful outlook is unmatched in the rest of the NT (except for certain features in Paul's discussion of Ro 9–11). In v.12 Peter addressed his audience as "Men of Israel" and in v.13 spoke of God as "the God of our fathers." And though he had emphasized Israel's part in crucifying Jesus (vv.13–15), he now magnanimously says that they had acted "in ignorance" and, somewhat surprisingly, includes their leaders in this. Then he mitigates their guilt still further by saying that God himself had willed it in order to fulfill the words of the prophets.

19–21 Even more positively, Peter goes on to say that if his hearers repent, their repentance will have a part in ushering in the great events of the end time. Evidently Luke wants us to understand Peter's call to repentance here as being set within the context of a remnant theology and as being quite unlike Stephen's attitude (cf. ch. 7). Not only so, but he also wants us to view the earliest proclamation of the Gospel in the Jewish world as a kind of intramural effort, with a self-conscious, righteous remnant issuing prophetic denunciations of Israel's part in the crucifixion of their Messiah and appealing to the people to turn to God in repentance for the remission of their sins.

The call to repentance itself is tersely stated. Then it is elaborated in words unique in the NT and reflective of Jewish remnant theology. "Repent, then, and turn to God," says Peter, "so that your sins may be wiped out"—and, further, so that there may be brought about the promised "times of refreshing" and so that with the coming of God's appointed Messiah, he may "restore everything" (the verbal form [GK 635] of the noun "restoration" [used here; GK 640] is often used in the LXX [Greek version of the OT] for the eschatological restoration of Israel; e.g., Jer 15:19; 16:15; Eze 16:55; Hos 11:11).

22–26 No group within Israel that considered itself to be God's righteous remnant in the inauguration of the final eschatological days could expect to win a hearing among Jews without attempting to define its position vis-à-vis Israel's great leaders of the past—particularly Abraham, Moses, and David. And that is precisely what Luke shows Peter doing as he concludes his call for repentance. Peter first refers to Moses, quoting his words in Dt 18:15, 18–19. This was a widely accepted messianic proof text of the time, one that emphasized the command to "listen to him" by the addition of the phrase "in everything he tells you." Peter's argument here, though not stated, is implicitly twofold: (1) true belief in Moses will lead to a belief in Jesus, and (2) belief in Jesus places one in true continuity with Moses.

In v.24 Peter defines Jesus' position with respect to David by alluding to Samuel and all the prophets who followed him and by insisting that they too "foretold these days." Now it is certainly difficult to find any prophecy of Samuel that could be applied to Jesus as explicitly as the words of Moses just quoted. But Samuel was the prophet who anointed David to be king and spoke of the establishment of his kingdom (cf. 1Sa 16:13; see also 13:14; 15:28; 28:17). Furthermore, Nathan's prophecy regarding the establishment of David's "offspring" as recorded in 2Sa 7:12–16 was accepted in certain quarters within Judaism as having messianic relevance and was taken by Christians as having been most completely fulfilled in Jesus (cf. 13:22–23, 34; Heb 1:5).

Finally, in v.25 Peter goes on to identify commitment to Jesus as Messiah with the promise God made to Abraham in Ge 22:18 and 26:4: "Through your offspring all nations on earth will be blessed." What exegetically ties this portion together with what has preceded it is the word "offspring," which appears in 2Sa 7:12 in reference to David's descendants and in Ge 22:18 and 26:4 in reference to the descendants of Abraham (see comments on 2:25–35 for this principle of Jewish interpretation of the OT). In this way, Peter proclaims that the promise to Abraham also has its ultimate fulfillment in Christ.

Peter's call to repentance in this sermon is an expression of the remnant theology of the earliest Christian believers at Jerusalem. He addresses his hearers as "heirs of the prophets and of the covenant." And he concludes with an offer of blessing that is extended first to individuals of the nation Israel (v.26; cf. Ro 1:16; 2:9–10). Luke wants his readers to appreciate something of how the earliest Christian preaching began within a Jewish milieu. From this he will go on to tell how this preaching developed through the various representative sermons that he later includes.

C. Peter and John Before the Sanhedrin (4:1–31)

As a direct outcome of the healing of the crippled beggar and as a further illustration of the thesis paragraph (2:42–47), Luke now presents a vignette concerning the arrest, trial, and witness of Peter and John. There is a connection of this arrest and trial with the second one in 5:17ff. Jewish law held that a person must be aware of the consequences of his crime before being punished for it. This meant that in noncapital cases the common people—as distinguished from those with rabbinic training, who, presumably, would know the law—had to be given a legal admonition before witnesses and could only be punished for an offense when they relapsed into a crime after due warning. Acts 4:1ff., therefore, presents the Sanhedrin as judging that the apostles were "unschooled, ordinary men" (v.13) and tells how they were given a legal warning not to speak anymore in the name of Jesus (v.17). But Acts 5:17ff. tells how the Sanhedrin reminded the apostles of its first warning (v.28) and turned them over to be flogged because they had persisted in their "sectarian" ways (v.40).

1. The arrest of Peter and John (4:1–7)

1 In vv.1–4 Luke both concludes the narrative of the crippled beggar's healing (by the phrase "while they were speaking") and introduces the first appearance of Peter and John before the Sanhedrin (cf. "the next day" in vv. 3, 5).

Luke shows that the early opposition against preaching the Gospel arose chiefly from priestly and Sadducean ranks—i.e., "the priests and the captain of the temple guard and the Sadducees." "The captain of the temple guard" was the commanding officer of the temple police force. He was considered inferior in rank only to the high priest and had the responsibility of maintaining order in the temple precincts (cf. 5:24, 26). The "Sadducees" (GK 4881) were descendants of the Hasmoneans, who looked to Mattathias, Judas, Jonathan, and Simon Maccabeus (168–134 B.C.) as having inaugurated the Messianic Age and saw themselves as perpetuating what their fathers had begun. As priests from the tribe of Levi, they claimed to represent ancient orthodoxy and were uninterested in innovations. Thus they opposed any developments in biblical law (i.e., the "Oral Law"), speculations about angels or demons, and the doctrine of the resurrection (cf. 23:8; Mk 12:18, 11). Likewise, they rejected what they considered to be vain hopes for God's heavenly intervention into the life of the nation and for a coming Messiah, since, as they believed, the age of God's promise had begun with the Maccabean heroes and was continuing on under their supervision. For them, the Messiah was an ideal, not a person, and the Messianic Age was a process, not a cataclysmic or even datable event. Furthermore, as political rulers and dominant landlords, to whom a grateful nation had turned over all political and economic powers during the time of the Maccabean supremacy, for entirely practical reasons they stressed cooperation with Rome and maintenance of the status quo. Most of the priests were of Sadducean persuasion; the temple police force was composed entirely of Levites; the captain of the temple guard was always a high-caste Sadducee, and so were each of the high priests.

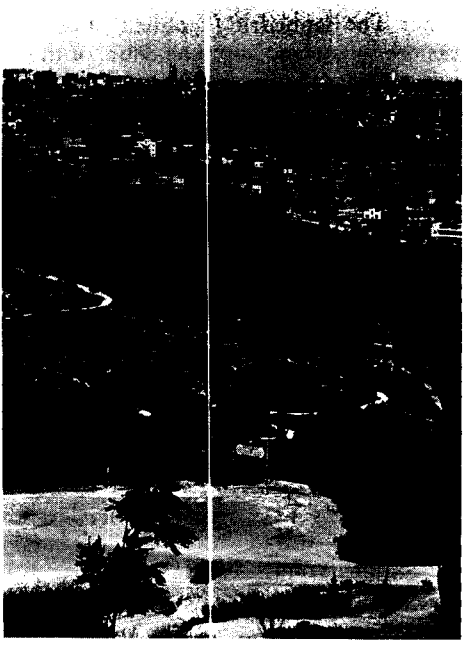
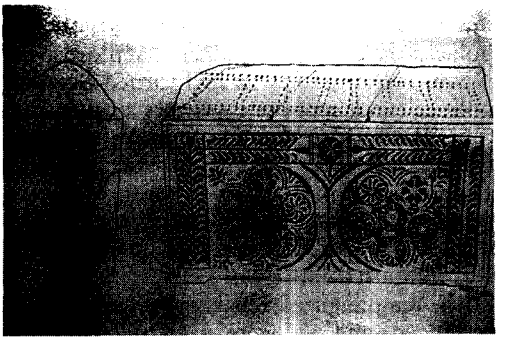
2–3 The priests and Sadducees were "greatly disturbed" about two matters. First, the apostles were "teaching the people," an activity that those of the Sadducean ranks saw as a threat to the status quo. Like Jesus, Peter and John were rallying popular support and acting unofficially in such a way as to disrupt established authority—an authority vested in their hands. Second, Peter and John were annoying the Sadducees because they were "proclaiming in Jesus the resurrection of the dead." This probably means they were attempting to prove from the fact of Jesus' resurrection the doctrine of the resurrection (cf. 17:31–32; 23:6–8), which the Sadducees denied. So Peter and John were taken into custody by the temple guard and, since it was evening, put into prison until the Sanhedrin could be called together the next morning to judge their case.

4 Not everyone agreed with the Sadducees' view of the activities and message of the apostles. Later in Acts, Luke will speak of the general tolerance of the people, the moderation of the Pharisees, and the desire of Rome for peace in the land as each having a part in restraining the Sadducees from doing all they might have wanted to do to oppose the Gospel and its early missioners. Many who heard the message believed, with the result that the Jerusalem congregation grew to a total of about five thousand.



5 Though the Sadducees had among them the nation's titular rulers, they were actually a minority party and could govern only through the Sanhedrin. Thus on the next day, this seventy-member group, composed of "the rulers" or "the high priests" (cf. 23:5), the "elders," and the "teachers of the law" (most of whom were Pharisees) came together. The Sanhedrin ("council"; GK 5284) was the senate and supreme court of the nation, which had jurisdiction in all noncapital cases—though it also advised the Roman governors in capital cases—and in one case, namely, that of Gentiles trespassing beyond the posted barriers into the inner courts of the temple, could on its own sentence even a Roman citizen to death (see comment on 21:27–29). The high priest was president of the Sanhedrin. It met in a hall adjoining the southwest part of the temple area.



6 The early opposition to Christianity arose principally from among the Sadducees, for Luke stresses that the Sadducean element was especially well represented in this first trial of the apostles: "Annas the high priest was there, and so were Caiaphas, John, Alexander and the other men of the high priest's family" (see comment on Jn 18:12–14). Just who John and Alexander were, we do not know, though possibly the first was Annas's son Jonathan, who replaced Caiaphas in A.D. 36.

7 It was before such an assembly, which probably arranged itself in a semicircular fashion, that Peter and John were brought. The man who had been healed was also there (cf. v.14), though Luke does not say whether he had also been imprisoned or had been called in as a witness. The apostles were called on to account for their actions, and they used the occasion for an aggressive evangelistic witness.

2. Peter's defense and witness (4:8–12)

8 In a context of a prophetic description of national calamities and cosmic turmoil, Luke earlier quoted Jesus as saying: "But before all this, they will lay hands on you and persecute you. They will deliver you to synagogues and prisons, and you will be brought before kings and governors, and all on account of my name. But make up your mind not to worry beforehand how you will defend yourselves. For I will give you words and wisdom that none of your adversaries will be able to resist or contradict" (Lk 21:12–15). Undoubtedly Luke was thinking of many incidents of opposition to the Gospel message when he wrote down these words. Indeed, he records a number of such happenings in Acts. But certainly when he wrote about Peter's first defense before the Jewish Sanhedrin (and also about the apostles' second appearance While constructing a road on the Mount of Olives (see picture on left), the Israelis recently found a gravesite that proved to be that of the family of Caiaphas (cf. 4:6). before the Sanhedrin in 5:17ff.), these words were ringing in his ears. For almost every item of Jesus' oracle is exemplified in Luke's account of Peter's situation, attitude, and message here in Acts, beginning with his being "filled with the Holy Spirit." Peter receives a special moment of inspiration that brings to a functional focus the person and ministry of God's Spirit.

9–10 Peter's defense focuses on the healing of the crippled man as being (1) "an act of kindness," which (2) was effected "by the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, whom you crucified but whom God raised from the dead." His message is specifically addressed to the "rulers and elders of the people," though it also has "everyone else in Israel" in mind.

11–12 The double use of the verb "to be saved" (GK 5392) to mean "restoration to health" physically and "preservation from eternal death" spiritually allows Peter to move easily from the healing of the cripple to the salvation of humankind and, therefore, from a defensive to an aggressive witness. And in his proclamation he uses two early Christological motifs.

The first is that of "the rejected stone," which has become 'the capstone" of the building. In Judaism there was a frequent wordplay between the words for "stone" (Heb. 'eben; GK 74) and "son" (Heb. ben; GK 1201)—rooted generally in the OT (cf. Ex 28:9; Jos 4:6–8, 20–21; Isa 54:11–13; et al.)—which attained messianic expression in the combination of the stone and the Son of Man imagery in Da 2:34–35 and 7:13–14. It was for this reason, evidently, that Jesus concluded his parable of the vineyard and the rejected son (Mk 12:1–12) with the quotation of Ps 118:22–23: "The stone the builders rejected has become the capstone; the Lord has done this, and it is marvelous in our eyes." Peter picks up this motif here in his quotation of Ps 118:22, also building on the associations of "stone" and "son." While elsewhere in the NT (cf. Lk 20:18; Ro 9:33; 1Co 3:11; 1Pe 2:4–8) the ideas of a "foundation stone" and a "stumbling stone" were based respectively on Isa 28:16 and 8:14, here the thought is of Jesus as the rejected stone that becomes the capstone and completes the edifice.

The second early Christological motif in Peter's proclamation is "salvation" (GK 5401) In some Jewish documents of the first century, "God's Salvation" and "Salvation" appear as designations of the expected Davidic Messiah. Luke has already stressed this motif in Zechariah's hymn of praise (Lk 1:69, "a horn of salvation"), in Simeon's prayer (2:30, "your salvation"), and in his comments on the ministry of John the Baptist (3:6, "God's salvation"). Now in addressing the Sanhedrin, to whom such a messianic designation was doubtless well known, Peter proclaims, "Salvation is found in no one else [than in 'Jesus Christ of Nazareth, whom you crucified but whom God raised from the dead,' (v.10)], for there is no other name under heaven given to men by which we must be saved" (v.12). There is nothing of compromise or accommodation in Peter's preaching. As this magnificent declaration shows, he was wholly committed to the uniqueness of Jesus as the only Savior. Peter and the other apostles never watered down the fact that apart from Jesus there is no salvation for anyone.

3. The apostles warned and released (4:13–22)

13–14 While literacy was high among Jews of the first century, theological disputations required rabbinic training. Since the common people had not had such training, they were thought to be incapable of carrying on sustained theological discussion. But here were Peter and John, whom the Sanhedrin observed to be "unschooled, ordinary men," speaking fearlessly and confidently before the Jewish supreme court and senate. Their judges could not but wonder at such ordinary men having such a mastery of biblical argumentation. So they had to fall back on the only possible explanation—"these men had been with Jesus," who, despite his lack of rabbinic training, taught "as one who had authority" (Mk 1:22). Furthermore, just as Jesus' teaching was coupled with demonstrations of miraculous powers, which thus reinforced among the people the impression of authority (cf. Mk 1:23–28; 2:1–12; et al.), now Peter and John were beginning to do the same. There was no denying that the man had been healed. There he stood before them, physically regenerated at an age when regenerative cures do not occur of themselves (cf. v.22,). But even the miraculous is not self-authenticating apart from an openness of heart and mind; and the Sadducees' preoccupation with protecting their vested interests shut them off from really seeing the miracle that occurred.

15–17 Just how Luke knew what went on among the members of the Sanhedrin in closed session has often been debated, though we cannot know for sure. Perhaps Saul (Paul) was a member of the council at that time and he later told Luke. Or maybe Paul heard the gist of the discussion from his teacher Gamaliel and then told it to Luke. Or there may have been secret sympathizers of the apostles in the council who "leaked" to them what was said and from whom Luke picked it up. Most probable is the suggestion that the substance of the discussion was inferred from what was said to Peter and John when they were brought back to the meeting. What is certain about the council's response is that (1) they would have denied the miracle if they could, (2) they had no disposition to be convinced either by what had happened or by the apostles' arguments, and (3) they felt the need of stopping the apostles' activity and teaching and therefore proposed to take the measures allowed them by Jewish law.

18–20 The Sanhedrin decided to impose a ban on the apostles, both to warn them and to provide a legal basis for further action should such be needed (cf. 5:28; see initial comment on 4:1–31). So they called in the apostles and warned them "not to speak or teach at all in the name of Jesus." But the council had before it men whose lives had been transformed by association with Jesus, by God's having raised him from the dead, and by the coming of the Holy Spirit. As with the prophets of old, God's word was in the heart of Peter and John like a burning fire; and they could neither contain it nor be restrained from speaking it (cf. Jer 20:9). They had been witnesses of Jesus' earthly ministry and resurrection (cf. Ac 10:39–41) and had been commanded by their risen Lord to proclaim his name to the people (cf. 1:8; 10:42). When faced with this ban, their response was never in doubt; they would continue to speak about what they had seen and heard. Where the Jewish established authority stood in opposition to God's authority, thus becoming in effect demonic, the early believers knew where their priorities lay and judged all religious forms and functions from a Christocentric perspective.

21–22 The Sanhedrin had given its warning. And after stressing its nature and what would happen if it went unheeded, they let them go. The moderation of the people prevented them from doing more, for "all the people were praising God for what had happened." Yet a legal precedent had been set that would enable the council to take, if necessary, more drastic action in the future.

4. The church's praise and petition (4:23–31)

23-30 The church's response to the apostles' release was a spontaneous outburst of praise, psalmody, and petition. It begins (v.24) by addressing God as "Sovereign Lord" (GK 1305), a common title in the Greek world for rulers and one that appears occasionally in Jewish circles as an address to God (cf. Lk 2:29; Rev 6:10). It is especially appropriate here in conjunction with the "servant" (GK 4090) names used of David (v.25), Jesus (vv.27, 30), and believers themselves (v.29). Structurally, the church's response includes an ascription to God drawn from Hezekiah's prayer in Isa 37:16–20 (v.24b), a quotation of Ps 2:1–2 (vv.25–26), the reference to Jesus' passion in terms of the psalm just cited (vv.27–28), and a petition for divine enablement in the Christians' present circumstances (vv.29–30).

In the prayer of the church two matters of theological interest stand out. First, using a common Jewish method of interpreting the OT (cf. comments on 2:16), these Christians saw in Ps 2 the persons and groups involved in Jesus' crucifixion: "the kings of the earth" corresponds to King Herod, "the rulers" to the Roman governor Pontius Pilate, "the nations" to the Gentile authorities, and "the people" with "the people of Israel." Sometime just prior to the Christian period, Ps 2 was beginning to be used within some Jewish circles as a messianic psalm, and the early Jewish Christians knew of this usage, approved it, and applied it to Jesus of Nazareth (cf. also the use of Ps 2:7 in Ac 13:33; Heb 1:5; 5:5; and Ps 2:9 in Rev 2:27; 12:5; 19:15).

Second, in the church's prayer the sufferings of Christian believers are related directly to the sufferings of Christ and inferentially to the sufferings of God's righteous servants in the OT. This theme of the union of the sufferings of Christ and those of his own people is a theme that is developed in many ways throughout the NT (cf. esp. Mk 8–10; Ac 9:4–5; Ro 8:17; Col 1:24; 1Pe 2:20–25; 3:14–4:2; 4:12–13). It reaches its loftiest expression in Paul's metaphor of the body of Christ.

Most significant is the fact that these early Christians were not praying for relief from oppression or judgment on their oppressors but for enablement "to speak your word with great boldness" amid oppression and for God to act in mighty power "through the name of your holy servant Jesus" (v.30). Their concern was for God's word to go forth and for Christ's name to be glorified, leaving to God himself their own circumstances. With such prayer surely God is well pleased. Luke has evidently taken pains to give us this prayer so that it might serve as something of a pattern to be followed in our own praying.

31 As a sign of God's approval, Luke informs us that "the place where they were meeting was shaken" (cf. Ex 19:18; Isa 6:4) and "they were all filled with the Holy Spirit" (cf. comments on v.8). And with such motivation and divine enablement, their prayer was answered: they "spoke the word of God boldly" (i.e., with confidence).

D. Christian Concern Expressed in Sharing (4:32–5:11)

Going back to one of the themes of his thesis paragraph of 2:42–47, Luke now illustrates the nature and extent of the early believers' commitment to one another in social concern. This he does by a summary statement, then by an example of genuine Christian concern, and finally by an example of disastrous deceit. For Luke as well as for the early Christians, being filled with the Holy Spirit not only concerned proclaiming the Word of God but also sharing possessions with the needy because of believers' oneness in Christ.

1. Believers share their possessions (4:32–35)

In this section, v.32 speaks of a customary practice in the early church of believers retaining their personal possessions and property and sharing them among the believers; vv. 34–35 speak of an extraordinary response to special needs by some selling their property and possessions and distributing them to the needy. In other words, Luke here emphasizes that both continuous and extraordinary acts of Christian social concern were occurring in the early church, and he ties these acts into the apostolic proclamation of the Resurrection. Because of such acts and the recognition that they must always be an inextricable part of the Christian ministry, God's blessing rested upon the early church.

32 The whole congregation was united to one another in their allegiance to Jesus. This sense of oneness extended to sharing their personal possessions with others in need (cf. 2:45). Theologically, the early believers considered themselves the righteous remnant within Israel. So Dt 15:4 was undoubtedly in their mind, that if they wanted God to bless them, there should be no poor among them. Other Jewish groups that thought of themselves in terms of a remnant theology expressed their spiritual oneness by sharing their goods, and the Jerusalem church seems to have done likewise. Practically, they had many occasions for such sharing. With the economic situation in Palestine steadily deteriorating because of famine and political unrest, employment was limited—not only for Galileans and others who had left their fishing and farming for living in the city, but also for the regular residents of Jerusalem who now faced economic and social sanctions because of their new messianic faith. Experientially, the spiritual oneness the believers found to be a living reality through their common allegiance to Jesus must, they realized, be expressed in caring for the physical needs of their Christian brothers and sisters. Indeed, their integrity as a community of faith depended on their doing this.

Here, then, is Luke's illustration of his thesis statement in 2:44–45 regarding the way the believers practiced communal living. They were not monastics, for the Jerusalem apostles, the brothers of Jesus, and many of the other believers were married (cf. 5:1–11; 1Co 9:5). Nor did the believers form a closed society like Qumran. They lived in their own homes (cf. 2:46; 12:12) and had their own possessions as any household would. But they did not consider them private possessions to be held exclusively for their own use and enjoyment. Rather, they shared what they had and so expressed their corporate life.

33 Because of its juxtaposition with v.32, we must understand that the "great power" accompanying the apostles' witness "to the resurrection of the Lord Jesus" refers not just to rhetorical, homiletical, or even miraculous power but to the power of a new life in the believing community—a new life manifest in sharing possessions to meet the needs of others. It was this kind of power Jesus had in mind when he said, "All men will know that you are my disciples if you love one another" (Jn 13:35). In view of such a combination of social concern and proclamation of the Word, it is no wonder that Luke goes on to say, "And much grace was upon them all" (cf. Lk 2:40).

34–35 The acts Luke alludes to here were extraordinary and voluntary acts of Christian concern that were done "from time to time" in response to special needs among the believers, and they involved both sharing possessions and selling real estate. By separating these actions from those described in v.32, Luke suggests that they were exceptional and were not meant to be normative for the church. The church at Jerusalem—even in its earliest days—was neither a monastic nor semimonastic community. Nevertheless, such acts were highly regarded as expressions of a common social concern, though as with any noble deed they could be done either sincerely or hypocritically.

2. The generosity of Barnabas (4:36–37)

36 Luke uses the generosity of Barnabas as "Exhibit A" to illustrate the type of extraordinary social concern mentioned in v.34. Joseph was this man's Hebrew name, used at home, in the synagogue, and among Jews generally. To this the apostles added the descriptive nickname Barnabas, which means "Son of Encouragement," in order to distinguish him from others of the same name (cf. 1:23). His family came from Cyprus, and he may have had ancestral property there. John Mark was his cousin (cf. Col 4:10).

37 Barnabas is an important figure in Luke's account of the church's expansion from Jerusalem to Rome; he appears a number of times as a kind of hinge between the mission to the Jewish world and that to the Gentiles (cf. 9:27; 11:22–30; 13:1–14:28; 15:2–4,12, 22, 36–41; see also 1Co 9:6). Here, however, he is introduced as one who sold a field and gave the money to the apostles for distribution among those in need. We are not told whether the property he sold was in Cyprus or Palestine. Nor are we told how the biblical prohibition against Levites owning real estate applied in Barnabas's case (cf. Nu 18:20; Dt 10:9); such a regulation seems not always to have been observed (cf. Jer 32:7–44). What we are told, however, is that Barnabas gave a practical demonstration of Christian social concern, undoubtedly under no compulsion of either precedent or rule (cf. 5:4).

3. The deceit of Ananias and Sapphira (5:1–11)

The case of Ananias and Sapphira is opposite that of Barnabas, though it was meant to look the same. No doubt the story circulated within the church as a warning of the awfulness of deceit, for at times of great enthusiasm such a warning is especially necessary. And though Luke has taken evident pleasure in reporting the progress of the Gospel and the vitality of faith during these early days of the church in Jerusalem, he does not omit this most distressing event. This situation must have lain heavily on the hearts of the early Christians, and it is a message that needs to be constantly kept in mind by Christians today.

1–2 The details of the conspiracy are concisely stated. A certain Christian man named Ananias (meaning "God is gracious" in Hebrew) and his wife, Sapphira (meaning "beautiful" in Aramaic), wanted to enjoy the acclaim of the church as Barnabas had, but without making a genuine sacrifice. So they too sold a piece of real estate and pretended to give the full price to the apostles for distribution to the needy, though they conspired to keep back part of the money for themselves. Luke's language here seems to draw a parallel between the sin of Achan just as the Israelites began their conquest of Canaan (see Jos 7) and the sin of Ananias and Sapphira as the church began its mission; both incidents come under the immediate and drastic judgment of God and teach the people a sobering lesson. This is very likely how the early church saw the incident as well.

3–4 Probably no account in Acts has provoked more wrath from critics than this one has. Commentators have complained about the difficulty of accepting the death of both husband and wife under such circumstances and have questioned Peter's ethics in not giving them an opportunity for repentance and in not telling Sapphira of her husband's death. Even more difficult for many is the way the story portrays Peter, who appears to be without the compassion or restraint of his Lord. Jesus' relations even with Judas, whose sin was a thousand times more odious, certainly were not on this level. But note that Peter did not view the action of Ananias and Sapphira as merely incidental. He spoke of it as inspired by Satan and as a lie to both the Holy Spirit and God. It was a case of deceit and was an affront, not just on the community level, but primarily before God. Deceit is spiritually disastrous—a sin, whatever its supposed justification, that sours every personal relationship. Where there is even the suspicion of conscious misrepresentation and deception, trust is completely violated.

Ananias and Sapphira were severely dealt with because their act of pretended piety (cf. v.4) was done voluntarily and because the greater freedom permitted in the church at Jerusalem made the individual Christian more responsible to be honest and more culpable when dishonest. In addition, the way Ananias and Sapphira attempted to reach their goals was so diametrically opposed to the whole thrust of the Gospel that to allow it to go unchallenged would have set the entire mission of the church off course. Like the act of Achan, this episode was pivotal in the life and mission of God's people, for the whole enterprise was threatened at its start. And while we may be thankful that judgment on deceit in the church is not now so swift and drastic, this incident stands as an indelible warning regarding the heinousness in God's sight of deception in spiritual and personal matters.

5 The psychological explanations of Ananias's sudden death attribute his fatal collapse to the shock and shame of being found out. The verb Luke uses for his death, however, appears in the NT only in contexts where someone is struck down by divine judgment (5:5, 10; 12:23). Whatever were the psychological and physical factors involved, Luke's emphasis is on God as the ultimate cause of Ananias's death. This is the light in which he means his readers to understand his further comment: "And great fear seized all who heard what had happened."

6 The expression "the young men" (cf. v.10) refers to certain younger men in the Christian community. Whether they covered Ananias with a shroud and carried him away or wrapped him up in some manner and then carried him away or simply picked him up from the floor and took him off for burial is impossible to say. It is understandable that burial in hot climates takes place soon after death. We have no explanation why Ananias was buried so quickly and his wife was not told about it.

7–11 "About three hours later" the tragic episode was repeated with Sapphira. Just as Ananias and his wife were united in their conspiracy, so they were united in the judgment that came upon them. It may seem redundant that Luke closes his account of Ananias and Sapphira's deception with the statement "Great fear seized the whole church and all who heard about these events." However, this is a vignette of warning; and in concluding it Luke wants to stress this note of reverent fear—as he expressly did in v.5 and implicitly does throughout his account.

This is the first time in Acts that the word "church" (GK 1711) appears, though it is the regular word for both the church universal and local congregations elsewhere in the book (cf. 7:38; 8:1; 9:31; 11:22; 13:1; 14:23; 15:22, 41; 16:5; 19:32, 40; 20:28) and throughout the NT letters (cf. also Mt 16:18; 18:17).

E. The Apostles Again Before the Sanhedrin (5:12–42)

Luke now gives the second account of the apostles' arraignment before the Sanhedrin. Whether he clearly grasped or fully appreciated the rationale in Jewish jurisprudence for two such appearances is debatable (cf. introductory comments on 4:1–31). Nevertheless, in this account of the second appearance, he emphasizes the development of attitudes in these earliest days of the Christian mission in Jerusalem: the reverential fear on the part of the church and the people (cf. 5:5, 11), the deepening jealousy and antagonism of the Sadducees (cf. 5:17–33), the moderation of the Pharisees (5:33–40), and the increasing joy and confidence of the Christians (cf. 5:41–42). In so doing, Luke continues the elaboration of his thesis paragraph (2:42–47).

1. Miraculous signs and wonders (5:12–16)

This paragraph, like 2:42–47 and 4:32–35, is a Lukan summary introducing the material that follows. It includes some statements that reach back to what has been narrated before—principally vv.12–14, which recall the Christians' practice of meeting in Solomon's Colonnade, the reverential fear aroused by the awful end of Ananias and Sapphira, and the increasing number of people who believed. In the main, however, the paragraph introduces the story of the apostles' second appearance before the Sanhedrin by giving a reason for the Sadducees' jealousy and for their second inquisition of the apostles, namely, the continued success of the Christian mission at Jerusalem.

12a As with his summary paragraph of 4:32–35, Luke puts his thesis statement at the very beginning of his treatment. The Sadducees called the apostles to appear a second time before the Jewish Sanhedrin because, in defiance of the council's orders, they were continuing their ministry among the people, with "many miraculous signs and wonders" being performed.

12b–14 Luke now speaks resumptively of three groups of people and their response to the Sanhedrin's warning and to the fear engendered by Ananias and Sapphira's fate: (1) the Christians continued meeting together in Solomon's Colonnade; (2) the unbelieving Jews ("no one else") were reluctant to associate too closely with the Christians; and (3) some of the Jews ("the people") responded to and honored the Christians—in fact, many men and women from this group came to believe in the Lord and were added to the number of Christian believers. Thematically, the resumé serves to support the thesis statement of v.12a.

15–16 The material in these two verses is structurally much like that of 4:34–35, for in both cases there is a logical and linguistic connection with each thesis statement. In both instances special and extraordinary expressions of the respective thesis statements are detailed. Just as healing virtue had flowed from Jesus by touching in faith the edge of his cloak (cf. Mk 5:25–34,), so even Peter's shadow was used by God to effect a cure (cf. 19:11–12). And whereas the healing of the crippled beggar had originally aroused the Sadducees' antagonism, now, Luke tells us, such miracles were being repeated numerous times in the apostles' ministry. Thus crowds from the outlying districts around Jerusalem thronged the apostles. No wonder the Sadducees' jealousy erupted anew!

2. The arrest and trial of the apostles (5:17–33)

17–18 As in 4:1–31, Luke has the early opposition to Christianity arising principally from the Sadducees. Pharisees were undoubtedly present in the Sanhedrin (cf. comments on "the full assembly of the elders of Israel," v.21), but their presence in these earliest days of the church's existence (at least until ch. 7) is depicted as exerting a moderating influence on the antagonism of the Sadducees. Thus the high priest and members of the party of the Sadducees take official action a second time against the apostles by arresting them and putting them "in the public jail."

19–21a This is one of three "opening of the prison doors" stories in the book of Acts (cf. 12:6–11; 16:26–29). The "angel of the Lord" is the NT term for the OT "Angel of the LORD," which denotes God himself in his dealings with humans (cf. Ex 3:2, 4, 7; at al.). Here "angel" (GK 34) denotes the presence or agency of God himself (cf. 8:26; 12:7, 23; cf. also Mt 1:20, 24; 2:13, 19; 28:2; Lk 1:11; 2:9). By divine intervention, then, the apostles were released from the public jail and told by God to go back to the temple and persist in preaching the message of new life to "the people" (i.e., the nation of Israel), in spite of the Sanhedrin's attempt to silence it. The focus of their message is on "this new life"—with "life" (GK 2437) and "salvation" (GK 5401) understood in the NT as synonymous. And since the apostles had been miraculously released and divinely commissioned, that is exactly what they began to do.

21b–27 Having (as they thought) confined the apostles in the public jail for the night, "the high priest and his associates" called together the members of the Sanhedrin in the morning in order to make some judgment and take some action about the disturbances the Christians were causing. Luke adds "the full assembly of the elders of Israel" here, probably to make clear that the Pharisees were well represented in the council at this time; though they may not have been at the first trial, they did become vocal through Gamaliel at the second one (cf. vv.34–40). So the Sanhedrin sent for their prisoners—but did not find them. "The captain of the temple guard and the chief priests were puzzled," probably concluding that the escape was aided by members of the temple guard. But when they heard that the apostles were teaching the people in the temple courts, "the captain" took command of his temple police and brought the apostles in before the council to be interrogated (v.26a). No violence was used in the arrest because the captain and his guard feared the reaction of the people (v.26b). This says something about the early Christians' response to Jesus' example of nonviolence and nonretaliation during his own arrest (cf. Mk 14:43–50), for they might have begun a riot and thus extricated themselves. It also continues the theme of "the favor of all the people" in 2:42–47.

28 As the apostles stood before the Sanhedrin, the high priest (the president) began the interrogation by reminding the apostles of the council's order for them to be silent, which obviously had not been complied with. It is uncertain whether Luke had in mind Annas or Caiaphas as leading the interrogation; while the latter was officially the high priest at the time, the former is assumed in the NT to be the real power behind the throne and continues to be called the high priest (cf. Lk 3:2; Jn 18:13–24). Formally, the high priest's interrogation contains no questions but only points up the apostles' refusal to obey the Sanhedrin's earlier order (i.e., a charge of "contempt of court"). He also objects to their insistence on blaming the council for Jesus' death (cf. 4:10). For the Sadducean leadership of the council, the uncontested charge of contempt of court was sufficient legal warrant for taking action against the apostles. With their vested interests, the Sadducees wanted only to preserve their own authority and put an end to the rising disturbance among the people. They evidently had no interest in determining the truth or falsity of the Christians' claims. Their hardened attitude is manifest in their refusal to mention the name of Jesus (compare v.28 with 4:18) and in their spitting out the epithet "this man" when they had to refer directly to him.

29–32 By saying "Peter and the other apostles replied," Luke suggests that Peter was the spokesman for the group of apostles on trial, with the others in some way indicating their agreement. Their response is hardly a reasoned defense but simply a reaffirmation of their position. As at the first trial (4:19), here they voice even more succinctly their noble principle, "We must obey God rather than men." Also as at the first trial, the focus is on Jesus. "By hanging him on a tree" is a locution for crucifixion that stems from Dt 21:22–23 (cf. Ac 10:39; 13:29; Gal 3:13 [quoting Dt 21:23]; 1Pe 2:24). The titles "Prince" and "Savior" are Christological ascriptions rooted in the confessions of the early church and particularly associated with the NT themes of exaltation and Lordship.

33 As far as the Sadducees were concerned, the charge of contempt of court was not only uncontested but repeated. On hearing the apostles reaffirm what to them could only be considered intolerable obstinacy, the Sadducees were furious and wanted to destroy them. While the Sanhedrin did not have authority under Roman jurisdiction to inflict capital punishment, undoubtedly they would have found some pretext for handing these men over to the Romans for such action—as they did with Jesus himself—had it not been for the intervention of the Pharisees, as represented particularly by Gamaliel.

3. Gamaliel's wise counsel of moderation (5:34–40)

The portrayal of Gamaliel's counsel is the high point of Luke's account of the apostles' second appearance before the Sanhedrin and the main reason why he included the whole vignette. His purpose here is to contrast the developed antagonism of the Sadducees with the moderation of Gamaliel as spokesman for the Pharisees.

34–35 The "Pharisees" (GK 5757) represent the continuation of the ancient Hasidim, that group of "pious ones" in Israel who, during the Seleucid oppressions, joined the Hasmoneans (the Maccabees; see comment on 4:1) in the struggle for religious freedom but later opposed the Maccabean rulers in their political and territorial claims. They came from diverse family, occupational, and economic backgrounds and gave themselves to studying the Law (Torah) in both its written and oral forms, to expounding the Law in terms of its contemporary relevance, and to preparing the people for the coming of the Messianic Age by means of education in Scripture and the oral tradition. The name "Pharisee" probably comes from the Aramaic verb meaning "to separate" (thus they are "the separated ones" or "holy ones dedicated entirely to God"). In the period before the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, they were in the minority in the Sanhedrin. But their support by the people was so great that all matters of life and ceremony were guided by their interpretations, and Sadducean magistrates had to profess adherence to their principles in order to hold the formal allegiance of the populace.

Theologically, the Pharisees looked for a Messianic Age and a personal Messiah; they accepted a doctrine of the resurrection of the dead (though they understood such a doctrine to mean either the immortality of the soul or the resuscitation of the body); they believed in the presence and activity of angels and demons; they held in balance the tenets of God's eternal decrees and human freedom of will; and they tried to live a life of simple piety apart from needless wealth and luxury.

The first-century Pharisee Gamaliel I, who was either the son or grandson of the famous Hillel, was one of the most highly esteemed Pharisees. Here in Acts he is portrayed as having taken charge at a certain point in the council meeting and as having gained the acquiescence of those present—not through any vested authority but through personal forcefulness and respect for what he represented. And he addresses the council members with the traditional designation "Men of Israel" (cf. 2:22).

36–37 Many have seen a problem in Gamaliel's reference to the Jewish revolutionaries Theudas and Judas the Galilean in this speech. According to Josephus, the Jewish historian of the first century, Judas's rebellion occurred about A.D. 6 and Theudas's about A.D. 44, thus making Luke's chronology wrong (cf. "after him" in v.37). Furthermore, this scene before the Sanhedrin occurred about A.D. 34, well before the rebellion of Theudas. In answer to these problems, it seemly most likely that the Theudas that Gamaliel referred to was one of the many insurgent leaders who arose in Palestine at the time of Herod the Great's death in 4 B.C., not the Theudas who led the Jewish uprising of A.D. 44. Our problem with these verses, therefore, may result just as much from our own ignorance of the situation as from what we believe we know as based on Josephus.

38–39 It has frequently been claimed that the words of Gamaliel here are "an historical mistake," for they are not in character with what we know of Pharisaism. But Josephus himself informs us that whereas the Sadducees were rather boorish in their behavior, the Pharisees were affectionate, interested in harmonious relations among the Jews, and often lenient in matters of punishment. Many of them were content to allow history to be the final judge of whether something was of God or not.

Of course, later on in Acts (cf. 8:1, 3; 9:1–2), Saul of Tarsus, who was trained under Gamaliel I (cf. 22:3), takes a very different attitude toward the Christians, joining with the Sadducees and obtaining the high priest's authorization to track them down and imprison them. But between Gamaliel's advice in Ac 5 and Saul's action in Ac 8–9, there arose from the depths of Christian conviction what the Pharisees as well as the Sadducees could only have considered to be a threat of Jewish apostasy. Before Gamaliel's counsel of moderation, the central issues of the church's proclamation had been the messiahship, lordship, and saviorhood of Jesus of Nazareth—his heaven-ordained death, his victorious resurrection, and his present status as exalted Redeemer. To the Sadducees who instigated the early suppressions, such teaching not only upset orderly rule but, more importantly, impinged upon their authority. To the more noble of the Pharisees, however, the Jerusalem Christians were yet within the scope of Judaism and not to be treated as heretics. The divine claims for Jesus as yet lay in the subconsciousness of the church, and those who were his followers showed no tendency to relax their observance of the Mosaic law because of their new beliefs.

Between Gamaliel's advice and Saul's action, however, there arose within Christian preaching something that could only be viewed within Jerusalem as a real threat of Jewish apostasy. In Ac 6–7 Stephen began to apply the doctrines of Jesus' messiahship and lordship to traditional Jewish views regarding the land, the law, and the temple. Moreover, he is seen as beginning to reach conclusions that related to the primacy of Jesus' messiahship and lordship and the secondary nature of Jewish views about the land, the law, and the temple (see comments on ch. 7). For Stephen this was a dangerous path to tread, particularly in Jerusalem—a path even the apostles seemed unwilling to take at that time. Stephen's message was indeed Jewish apostasy. Had Rabbi Gamaliel the Elder faced this feature of Christian proclamation in the second Sanhedrin trial of the Jerusalem apostles, his attitude would undoubtedly have been different.

40 Gamaliel's wise counsel here prevailed to some extent among his Sanhedrin colleagues and held back the worst of Sadducean intentions, though it did not entirely divert their wrath. Thus the apostles were flogged (probably with the severe beating of thirty-nine stripes), were warned that the ban against teaching in the name of Jesus was still in effect, and were then released.

4. The apostles' rejoicing and continued ministry (5:41–42)

Luke ends his account of the apostles' second appearance before the Sanhedrin with a brief summary that speaks of their rejoicing and continued ministry. It is a statement that has nuances of defiance, confidence, and victory; and in many ways it gathers together all Luke has set forth from 2:42 on.

41 Luke stresses the fact that just as the apostles performed miracles through the power of the name of Jesus (cf. 3:6) and proclaimed that name before the people and the council (cf. 3:16; 4:10, 12), so they rejoiced when "counted worthy of suffering disgrace for the Name."

42 Furthermore, Luke tells us that "they never stopped teaching and proclaiming the good news that Jesus is the Christ." In this somewhat formal statement, which comes close to concluding our author's whole first panel of material, there is both a correlation with the thesis paragraph of Acts (2:42–47)—explicitly in the phrases "in the temple courts and from house to house" (cf. 2:46), though also inferentially in the note of continuance that is sounded—and an anticipation of the final words of Luke's sixth panel at the very end of Acts: "boldly and without hindrance" (28:31).

F. The Hellenists' Presence and Problem in the Church (6:1–6)

In this last section before the beginning of the second panel of Part I of Acts (the second panel focuses on three individuals—Stephen, Philip, and Saul of Tarsus—and their ministry among the Greek-speaking Jews, i.e., the Hellenists), Luke finds it necessary to tell his readers something about this Hellenist element in the church. He might have started his second panel with discussing the presence of the Hellenistic Christians in Jerusalem, for that would have provided a good thematic introduction for the panel. To have done so, however, would have separated them from their roots in the early church and would have damaged his theme of continuity amid diversity and development. Thus he chose to include the portrayal of the Hellenists in the Jerusalem congregation in his first panel and before the summary statement (6:7) that concludes that panel.

1 This verse is not only one of the most important in Acts, it is also one of the most complicated and discussed verses in the entire book. What one concludes regarding the identity of "the Grecian Jews," their relation to "the Aramaic-speaking community," and their circumstances within the church largely affects how one understands the material in Luke's second panel (6:8–9:31) and the whole course of events within the Jerusalem church. It is important, therefore, to understand as precisely as possible what Luke says and implies in describing "the Grecian Jews" (i.e, the Hellenists) within the early church, a group he introduces by the phrases "in those days" and "when the number of disciples was increasing."

As for differentiating the Hellenists from the believers of Hebrew background, scholars have made various suggestions: the Hellenists are (1) Greek-speaking Jews of the Diaspora who settled in Jerusalem among the native-born and Aramaic-speaking populace, (2) Jewish proselytes from a Gentile background, (3) Jews who were related in some manner to the Essene movement in Palestine, (4) the Samaritans, and (5) Jews (whether by birth or as proselytes) who spoke only Greek and no Semitic language such as Hebrew or Aramaic. Of these choices, the last one seems the best. It hurdles the difficulty of how Paul could call himself a Hebraic Jew even though he was from the Diaspora (Php 3:5), it provides an explanation as to why Hellenistic synagogues were required in Jerusalem, and it offers an insight into the problem of why two of the seven men chosen in 6:5 (Stephen and Philip) appear almost immediately thereafter as evangelists within their own circle when they had actually been appointed to supervise more mundane concerns.

Probably, therefore, "the Grecian Jews" in Acts 6 were originally Hellenized Jews who had come from the Diaspora but who were now living in Jerusalem and had come under some suspicion (by reason of their place of birth, their speech, or both) of being more Grecian than Hebraic in their attitudes and outlook. Many of them, no doubt, had originally returned to the homeland out of religious ardor and today would be called Zionists. Perhaps they tended to group together because of their similar backgrounds and common language, as the many Hellenistic synagogues in Jerusalem would seem to indicate. Since coming to Jerusalem, they had become Christians. But since attitudes and prejudices formed before conversion are often carried over into Christian life—too often the unworthy more than the worthy ones—some of the problems between the Hebraic Jews and the Hellenistic Jews in the church must be related back to such earlier differences and prejudices.

In 6:1–6, Luke tells us that the Hellenists' "widows were being overlooked in the daily distribution of food." Judaism had a system for the distribution of food and supplies to the poor, both to the wandering pauper and to those living in Jerusalem itself. The early Christian community at Jerusalem likewise expressed its spiritual unity in communal sharing of possessions and in charitable acts (cf. 2:44–45; 4:32–5:11). Apparently with the "increasing" number of believers and with the passing of time, the number of Hellenistic widows dependent on relief from the church became disproportionately large. Many pious Jews of the Diaspora had moved to Jerusalem in their later years in order to be buried near it, and their widows would have had no relatives near at hand to care for them as would the widows of the longtime residents. Nor as they became Christians would the "poor baskets" of the national system of relief be readily available to them. So the problem facing the church became acute.

The issue about the distribution of food may not have been all that disrupted the fellowship. It is likely that it was only the symptom of a larger tension between the two groups, opening up earlier prejudices. If the Hellenists spoke mostly in Greek, they may have required separate meetings within the Christian community, and these too could have brought back old resentments.

2–4 The apostles' response in this matter was to call the Christians together and suggest a solution. It is significant that the apostles were not prepared simply to ignore the problem; they seem to have realized that spiritual and material concerns are so intimately related in Christian experience that one always affects the other for better or worse. Similarly, there was no attempt to assign blame or to act in any paternalistic fashion. Rather, they suggested that seven men "full of the Spirit and wisdom" be chosen from among the congregation (perhaps only from among the Hellenists) who could take responsibility in the affair. The apostles would give their attention exclusively "to prayer and the ministry of the word."

The reference to the apostles as "the Twelve" occurs only here in Acts (cf. 1Co 15:5), though earlier Luke has spoken of "the Eleven" in such an absolute and corporate manner (cf. Lk 24:9, 33; Ac 2:14). Likewise, the references to Christians as "the disciples" here and in v.1 are the first instances of this usage in Acts, though in the remainder of the book it occurs fairly often. In using both these terms, Luke has gone back to the language of the earliest Christians and tried to make idiomatic use of it. The words "full of the Spirit and wisdom" evidently refer to guidance by the Holy Spirit and skill in administration and business, which, singly and together, are so necessary in Christian service. While Christian ministers wish such qualities were more characteristic of their own boards and councils, it is only fair to say that boards and councils often wish their ministers were given more "to prayer and the ministry of the word"! A pattern is set here for both lay leaders and clergy, and God's work will move ahead more efficiently if it is followed carefully.

5–6 The apostles made a proposal, but the church, the community of God's Spirit, made the decision. The apostles therefore laid their hands on the Seven and appointed them to be responsible for the daily distribution of food. The laying on of hands recalls Moses' commissioning of Joshua in Nu 27:18–23, where through this act some of Moses' authority was conferred on Joshua. That is evidently what the laying on of hands was meant to symbolize here, with the apostles delegating their authority to the seven selected by the church (cf. also 8:17; 9:17; 13:3; 19:6).

All seven men have Greek names; one of them is singled out as having been a Gentile convert to Judaism (i.e., a "proselyte"). But it is impossible to be sure simply from the names whether all seven were Hellenists, for at that time many Palestinian Jews also had Greek names. Nevertheless, the fact that Luke gives only Greek names suggests that all seven were in fact from the Hellenistic group within the church. Furthermore, Luke does not directly call these seven by the ecclesiastical title "deacon" (diakonos; GK 1356), even though he uses the cognate noun diakonia ("distribution"; GK 1355) in v.1 and the verb diakoneo ("wait on"; GK 1354) in v.2 for what they were to do. Yet the ministry to which the seven were appointed was functionally equivalent to what Paul covered in the title "deacon" (cf. 1Ti 3:8–13); in the NT ministry was a function long before it became an office.

Acts 6:1–6 is particularly instructive as something of a pattern for church life today. In the first place, the early church took seriously the combination of spiritual and material concerns in carrying out its God-given ministry. In doing so, it stressed prayer and the proclamation of the Word, but never to the exclusion of helping the poor and correcting injustices. And even when the church found it necessary to divide internal responsibilities and assign different functions, the early believers saw these as varying aspects of one total ministry.

Second, the early church seems to have been prepared to adjust its procedures, alter its organizational structure, and develop new posts of responsibility in response to existing needs and for the sake of the ongoing proclamation of the Word of God. Throughout the years various so-called restorationist movements in the church have attempted to reach back and recapture the explicit forms and practices of the earliest Christians and have tried to reproduce them as far as possible in their pristine forms, believing that in doing so they are more truly biblical than other church groups. But Luke's narrative here suggests that to be fully biblical is to be constantly engaged in adapting traditional methods and structures to meet existing situations, both for the sake of the welfare of the whole church and for the outreach of the Gospel.

Finally, Luke's account suggests certain restraining attitudes that could well be incorporated into contemporary churchmanship. Among these are (1) refusing to get involved in the practice of assigning blame where things have gone wrong, preferring rather to expend the energies of God's people on correcting injustices, praying, and proclaiming the Word, and (2) refusing to become paternalistic in solving problems, which implies a willingness to turn the necessary authority for working out solutions over to others—even, as was possibly the case here, to those who feel the problem most acutely and may therefore be best able to solve it.

G. A Summary Statement (6:7)

7 Luke concludes his first panel of material on the earliest days of the church in Jerusalem with this summary statement, which is very much in line with his thesis paragraph (2:42–47) and his summary paragraphs (4:32–35; 5:12–16) that head their respective units of material. His focus in this first panel has been on the advances of the Gospel and the responses of the people. Therefore he concludes by saying that "the word of God spread" and "the number of disciples in Jerusalem increased rapidly."

Before he leaves his first panel of material, however, Luke—almost, it seems, as an afterthought—inserts the comment that "a large number of priests became obedient to the faith." At first glance this is, to say the least, somewhat perplexing because, in view of 4:1ff. and 5:17ff., it seems extremely difficult to believe that priests in any numbers would have become Christians. Nevertheless, there were perhaps as many as eight thousand "ordinary" priests and ten thousand Levites, divided into twenty-four weekly courses, serving at the Jerusalem temple during the period of a year, whose social position was distinctly inferior to that of the high priestly families and whose piety in many cases could well have inclined them to an acceptance of the Christian message. Luke indicates that a great number of persons calling themselves priests became believers in Jesus and were numbered with the Christians in the Jerusalem church.

Panel 2—Critical Events in the Lives of Three Pivotal Figures (6:8–9:31)

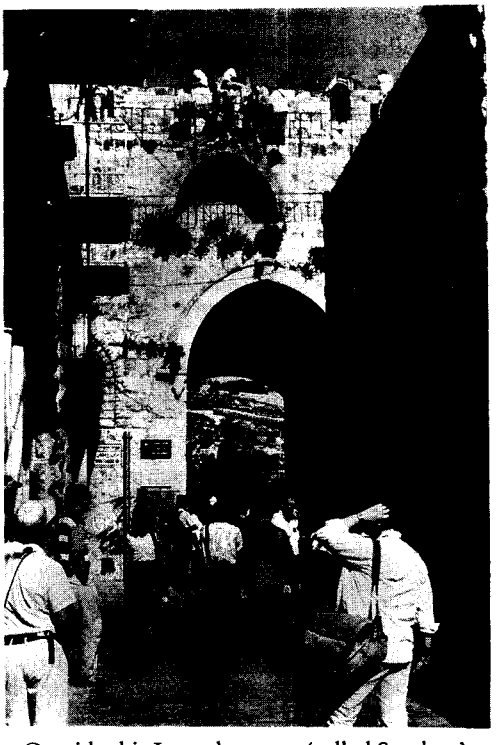
Luke now turns to three key events in the advance of the Gospel beyond its strictly Jewish confines: the martyrdom of Stephen, the early ministries of Philip, and the conversion of Saul of Tarsus. Luke's presentation is largely biographical. This is the type of material that would have circulated widely among the dispossessed Hellenistic Christians, including Stephen's argument before the Sanhedrin. Furthermore, Luke may have heard Philip and Paul speak together about these matters either during Paul's stay for "a number of days" at Philip's home in Caesarea (cf. 21:8–10) or during Paul's imprisonment at Caesarea (cf. 25:27).

No doubt Stephen's martyrdom was imprinted on Philip's memory, and accounts of his defense had probably become the raison d'être for the Hellenists' continued ministry. Likewise, Philip must have made a lasting impression on Luke as an important figure in the advance of the Christian mission, just as he was an important person in the Christian community at Caesarea (cf. 8:40; 21:8–9). And Paul was of such immense significance for Luke's narrative that an account of his conversion was inevitable—particularly because of its miraculous circumstances.

Just when the events of Luke's second panel took place depends largely on the dates for Paul's conversion and ministry. Since Stephen's death occurred before the conversion of Saul of Tarsus (cf. 7:58; 8:1), and since Luke presents Philip's ministries in Samaria and to the Ethiopian eunuch as following on the heels of the persecution that arose with Stephen's martyrdom, the accounts of these two Hellenistic spokesmen are historically tied to the conversion of Saul. For the chronological issues associated with Paul, see the comments on 9:1-30 and other succeeding passages. As for this second panel, it is sufficient to say that the events Luke presents in it took place somewhere in the mid-thirties, possibly as early as A.D. 33 or as late as A.D. 37.

A. The Martyrdom of Stephen (6:8–8:3)

1. Opposition to Stephen's ministry 6:8–7:1)



8 Stephen has earlier been described as being "full of the Spirit and wisdom" (6:3) and "full of faith and of the Holy Spirit" (6:5). Now

Luke says he was "full of God's grace and power." The three descriptions are complementary. The word "grace" was previously used by Luke to characterize both Jesus (Lk 4:22) and the early church (Ac 4:33) and connotes "spiritual charm" or "winsomeness." "Power" has already appeared in Acts in conjunction with "wonders and signs" (2:22) and "grace" (4:33) and connotes divine power expressed in mighty works.

Like Jesus and the apostles (cf. 2:22, 43; 5:12), Stephen is portrayed as having done "great wonders and miraculous signs among the people." Just what these were, Luke does not say, though we are undoubtedly to think of them as being of the same nature as those done by Jesus and the apostles. Nor does Luke tell us just when these manifestations of divine power began in Stephen's ministry. Perhaps they were a direct result of the laying on of the apostles' hands (cf. 6:6).

9–10 Stephen soon began preaching among his Hellenistic compatriots. Many commentators have found this to be a major problem in the narrative because Stephen was appointed to supervise relief for the poor, not to perform the apostolic function of preaching. But if we posit (1) the continuation, to some extent, of old tensions between Hebraic Jews and Hellenistic Jews in the Jerusalem church and (2) occasional separate meetings for the Aramaic-speaking and Greek-speaking believers (cf. comments on 6:1), several difficulties in the historical reconstruction of this period are partially explained. While not minimizing the importance of the apostles to the whole church, we can say that in some way Stephen, Philip, and perhaps others of the appointed seven may well have been to the Hellenistic Christians what the apostles were to the those born in Palestine. Philip seems to have performed such a function later on at Caesarea. And in the early church, where ministry was a function long before it became an office, such preaching was evidently looked upon with approval.

Opposition to Stephen arose from certain members within the Hellenistic community. Opinion differs widely as to just how many Hellenistic synagogues are in view in v.9. Many have insisted that there are five, though more likely the singular form of "synagogue" in the passage and the epexegetical nature of the last four designations posit only one synagogue, the synagogue of the Freedmen, made up of Jews from Cyrene, Alexandria, Cilicia, and Asia (cf. NIV text). The word "Freedmen" probably refers to Jewish freedmen and the sons of such freedmen.

Outside this Jerusalem gate (called Stephen's Gate or Lion's Gate) is the traditional place where Stephen's stoning is remembered.

We have no account of the content of Stephen's preaching that so antagonized his Hellenistic compatriots. Luke labels the accusations against him (vv.11–14) as false—though, to judge by his response of ch. 7, they seem to have been false more in nuance and degree than in kind. From the accusations and from his defense, it is clear that Stephen had begun to apply his Christian convictions regarding the centrality of Jesus of Nazareth as the Messiah in God's redemptive program to such issues as the significance of the land, the law, and the temple for Jewish Christians. This, however, was a dangerous path to tread, particularly for Hellenistic Jewish Christians! It was one that the apostles themselves seem to have been unwilling to explore. And it was a path that Jews who had lately returned to Jerusalem from the Diaspora would view with reticence.

Having originally immigrated to their homeland out of a desire to be more faithful Jews, and having come under some suspicion of an inbred liberalism by the native-born populace, the Hellenistic Jewish community in Jerusalem undoubtedly had a vested interest in keeping deviations among its members to a minimum, or else exposing them as outside its own commitments, lest its synagogues fall under further suspicion. Thus the Hellenistic members of the Synagogue of the Freedmen were probably quite eager to bait Stephen in order to root out such a threat from their midst—though it is evident from the record that Stephen welcomed the challenge. But as Luke tells us, "they could not stand up against his wisdom or the Spirit by which he spoke." This fulfills Jesus' promise of the gift of "words and wisdom" in the time of persecution (cf. Lk 21:15).

11–14 Four things are said about certain members of the synagogue of the Freedman: (1) "they secretly persuaded some men to say" that Stephen had spoken "blasphemy" (GK 1060); (2) "they stirred up the people and the elders and the teachers of the law" on their trumped-up charge against Stephen; (3) "they seized Stephen and brought him before the Sanhedrin"; and (4) "they produced false witnesses" at his trial.

The rumors had to do with Stephen's being "against Moses and against God"—"against Moses" because his arguments appeared to challenge the eternal validity of the Mosaic law, and "against God" because he appeared to be setting aside that which was taken to be the foundation and focus of national worship—the Jerusalem temple. In so doing, the rumors struck at the heart of both Pharisaic and Sadducean interests. In the first century, "blasphemy" was broadly interpreted along the lines of Nu 15:30: "Anyone who sins defiantly, whether native-born or alien, blasphemes the LORD, and that person must be cut off from his people."

The testimony of witnesses who repeated what they had heard a defendant say was part of Jewish court procedure in a trial for blasphemy. But the testimony against Stephen (v.14), according to Luke, was false (cf. the testimony against Jesus, Mt 26:61; Mk 14:58). Its falseness lay not so much in its wholesale fabrication but in its subtle and deadly misrepresentation of what was intended. Undoubtedly, Stephen spoke regarding a recasting of Jewish life in terms of the supremacy of Jesus the Messiah and expressed in his manner and message something of the subsidiary significance of the Jerusalem temple and the Mosaic law, as did Jesus before him (e.g., Mk 2:23–28; 3:1–6; 7:14–15; 10:5–9; cf. Jn 2:19–22). But that is not the same as advocating the destruction of the temple or the changing of the law—though on such matters we must allow Stephen to speak for himself in Acts 7.

6:15–7:1 The members of the council "looked intently" at Stephen as he was brought before them and saw one whose appearance was "like the face of an angel." Luke probably wants us to understand that Stephen, being filled with the Holy Spirit (6:3, 5) and possessing a genuine spiritual winsomeness (6:8), radiated a presence marked by confidence, serenity, and courage. And with the question of the high priest—"Are these charges true?"—the stage is set for Stephen's defense.

2. Stephen's defense before the Sanhedrin (7:2–53)

The defense of Stephen before the Sanhedrin is hardly a defense in the sense of an explanation or apology calculated to win an acquittal. Rather, it is a proclamation of the Christian message in terms of the popular Judaism of the day and an indictment of the Jewish leaders for their failure to recognize Jesus of Nazareth as their Messiah or to appreciate the salvation provided in him. Before the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, the three great pillars in the religious faith of the vast majority of Jews were the land, the law, and the temple. It is this type of thought that Stephen confronts here, as the writer of Hebrews also did later.

a. On the land (7:2–36)

Declarations of faith within a Jewish milieu were often tied into a recital of God's intervention in the life of Israel, for God is the God who is known by his redemptive activity on behalf of his people in history. So by beginning his defense with a resumé of Israel's history, Stephen is speaking in accord with Jewish form. But while Jewish in form, the content of his address runs counter to much of the popular piety of the day. He argues that God's significant activity has usually taken place outside the confines of Palestine, that wherever God meets his people can be called "holy ground," that God is the God who calls his own to move forward in their religious experience, and that therefore dwelling in the land of promise requires a pilgrim lifestyle in which the land may be appreciated but never venerated.

In the OT the important concepts of "rest" (GK 4957) and "remnant" (GK 8642) are frequently associated closely with the land. For example, Dt 12:9–10 reads: "You have not yet reached the resting place [GK 4957] and the inheritance the LORD your God is giving you. But you will cross the Jordan and settle in the land the LORD your God is giving you as an inheritance, and he will give you rest from all your enemies around you so that you will live in safety" (cf. Dt 3:20; Jos 1:13; Joel 2:32b; Mic 4:6–7). Facing much the same problem and with much the same purpose as the writer of Hebrews (cf. Heb 4:1–13; 11:8–16), though with a difference of method and structure in his argument, Stephen argues against a veneration of the Holy Land that leaves no room for God's further saving activity in Jesus of Nazareth, Israel's Messiah. Stephen is not renouncing Israel's possession of the land; he makes no attempt to deny or avoid mentioning God's promise that Abraham's descendants would inherit Palestine. He is rather delivering a polemic against a veneration of the land that misses God's further redemptive work. And while his message relates to his time and situation, it also has great relevance for us. For we Christians today are constantly tempted to assert that our nation and our possessions are God-given rather than to confess our dependence on a God who is not limited by anything he has bestowed and to affirm our readiness to move forward with him at all cost.

2–8 Stephen begins by addressing the council in a somewhat formal yet fraternal manner: "Men, brothers and fathers" (cf. 22:1). Then he launches into his message, taking up first the situation of Abraham. "The God of glory," Stephen says, "appeared to our father Abraham while he was still in Mesopotamia, before he lived in Haran [italics mine]." God's word to him was to move forward into the possession of a land that was promised to him and his descendants. But though he entered into his promised inheritance, he did not live in it as if living in it was the consummation of God's purposes for him. Rather, he cherished as most important the covenantal and personal relationship that God had established with him, whatever his place of residence—a relationship of which circumcision was the God-given sign.

There are a number of difficulties as to chronological sequence, historical numbers, and the use of biblical quotations in Stephen's address that have led to the most strenuous exercise of ingenuity on the part of commentators in their attempts to reconcile them. Four of these difficulties appear in vv.2–8. Verse 3 quotes the words of God to Abraham given in Ge 12:1 and implies by its juxtaposition with v.2 that this message came to Abraham when he was still in Mesopotamia, whereas the context of Ge 12:1 suggests that it came to him in Haran. Verse 4 says that he left Haran after the death of his father, whereas the chronological data of Ge 11:26–12:4 suggests that Terah's death took place after Abraham's departure from Haran. Verse 5 uses the words of Dt 2:5 as a suitable description of Abraham's situation in Palestine, whereas their OT context relates to God's prohibition to Israel not to dwell in Mount Seir because it had been given to Esau. And v.6 speaks of 400 years of slavery in Egypt, whereas Ex 12:40 says 430.

We need not, however, get so disturbed over such things as, on the one hand, to pounce on them to disprove a "high view" of biblical inspiration or, on the other hand, to attempt to harmonize them so as to support such a view. These matters are paralleled in other popular writings of the day, whether overtly Hellenistic or simply more nonconformist in the broadest sense of that term. The Jewish philosopher Philo, for example, explained Abraham's departure from Ur of the Chaldees by referring to Ge 12:1, even though he elsewhere wrote that Ge 12:1–5 is in the context of leaving Haran. The Jewish historian Josephus spoke of Abraham's being seventy-five years old when he left Chaldea (contra Ge 12:4, which says he was seventy-five when he left Haran). Likewise, Philo placed the departure of Abraham from Haran after his father's death. And undoubtedly the round figure of four hundred years for Israel's slavery in Egypt—a figure that stems from the statement credited to God in Ge 15:13—was used in popular expressions of religious piety in first-century Judaism.

There is a remarkable psychological or emotional truth in Luke's report of Stephen's address. With his life at stake, Stephen was speaking under intense emotion and with God-given eloquence. With remarkable verisimilitude Luke shows him using commonly understood language in vivid terms and with burning eloquence as he refers to Israel's history. Stephen's speech was not a scholarly historical survey; it was a powerful portrayal of God's dealing with Israel, and it mounted inexorably to a climax that unmasked the obstinacy and disobedience of Israel and of their leaders in Stephen's time. Church history knows of few, if any, greater displays of moral courage than Stephen showed in this speech. And to dissect it on precisionist grounds shows lack of understanding of its basic truth.

9–16 Stephen's address next turns to the sons of Jacob, or "the twelve patriarchs" as they were known more popularly. Here Stephen's point is that God was with Joseph and his brothers in Egypt (the name itself is repeated six times in vv. 9–16), even though the only portion of the Holy Land that they possessed was the family tomb in Palestine, to which their bones were brought back later for final burial.

This section has two further difficulties of the type noted in vv.2–6: (1) v. 14 gives the number seventy-five as the total number who originally went down to Egypt, whereas Ge 46:27 sets the figure at seventy, and (2) v.16 confuses Abraham's tomb at Hebron, in the cave of Machpelah, which he bought from Ephron the Hittite (cf. Ge 23:3–20) and wherein Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were buried (cf. Ge 49:29–33; 50:13), with the burial plot purchased by Jacob at Shechem from the sons of Hamor (Ge 33:19), wherein Joseph and his descendants were buried (cf. Jos 24:32). Again, these are but further examples of the conflations and inexactitudes of Jewish popular religion, which, it seems, Luke simply recorded from his sources in his attempt to be faithful to what Stephen actually said in his portrayal. And again, they can in large measure be paralleled elsewhere.

17–36 Still on the subject of "the land," Stephen recounts the life of Moses. Incorporated into this section, largely by way of anticipation, is a Moses-rejection theme in vv.23–29 and 35, which will later be highlighted in vv.39–43 and then driven home in the scathing indictment of vv.51–53. But here Stephen's primary emphasis is on God's providential and redemptive action for his people apart from and outside of the land of Palestine, of which Stephen's hearers made so much: (1) God's raising up of the deliverer Moses in Egypt (vv.17–22); (2) his provision for the rejected Moses in Midian (v.29); (3) his commissioning of Moses in the desert near Mount Sinai—the place God himself identified as being "holy ground," for wherever God meets with his people is holy ground though it possesses no sanctity of its own (vv.30–34); and (4) Moses' resultant action in delivering God's people and doing "wonders and miraculous signs" for forty years in Egypt, at the Red Sea, and in the desert. This narration of events in Moses' life is not given just to introduce the Second Moses theme that follows in vv.37–43, though it certainly does that. Its primary purpose seems rather to be that of making the vital point, contrary to the popular piety of the day in its veneration of "the Holy Land," that no place on earth—even though given as an inheritance by God himself—can be claimed to possess such sanctity or be esteemed in such a way as to preempt God's further working on behalf of his people. By this method Stephen was attempting to clear the way for the proclamation of the centrality of Jesus in the nation's worship, life, and thought.

b. On the law (7:37–43)

Involved inevitably with the Jews' exaltation of the law were veneration of Moses the Law-giver and idealization of Israel's days in the desert. All parties within Judaism of the first century A.D.—whether Sadducees, Pharisees, Essenes, Zealots, Apocalypticists, Hellenists, Samaritans, or the so-called People of the Land—were united in this veneration and idealization. So in meeting the accusation that he was speaking blasphemous words "against Moses" (6:11) and "against the law" (6:13), Stephen argues two points clearly and a third inferentially: (1) Moses himself spoke of God's later raising up "a prophet like me" from among his people and for his people, which means therefore that Israel cannot limit the revelation and redemption of God to Moses' precepts (vv.37–38); (2) Moses had been rejected by his own people, even though he was God's appointed redeemer—which parallels the way Jesus of Nazareth was treated and explains why the majority within the nation refused him, even though he was God's promised Messiah (vv.39–40); and (3) even though Moses was with them and they had the living words of the law and the sacrificial system, the people fell gross idolatry and actually opposed God (vv.41–43).

37–38 Tension is now beginning to build up in Stephen's speech. Starting from the rather placid historical narrative of vv.2–34 and moving to the more strident conclusion in vv.35–36, the speech peaks with a passionate treatment of the Moses testimonium passage in Dt 18:15 and of the significance of Moses himself there. This probably reflects a method of interpreting Scripture common to nonconformist Jews in general (cf. comments on 2:16) and points to the crux of Stephen's argument.

Stephen in no way disparages Moses. Indeed, in referring to Moses as being "in the congregation in the wilderness, with our fathers and with the angel who spoke to him on Mount Sinai," he was speaking in a complimentary way. Likewise, Moses received "living words" that he passed on—an expression that implies the opposite of any disparagement of the Mosaic law. But Stephen's point is that in Dt 18:15 Moses pointed beyond himself and beyond the instruction that came through him to another whom God would raise up in the future and to whom Israel must give heed; therefore, Israel cannot limit divine revelation and redemption to the confines of the Mosaic law.

In the first century A.D., Judaism was generally looking for a Messiah who would in some way be "like Moses." Numerous contemporary Jewish documents suggested a parallel between Israel's first redeemer Moses and Israel's expected Messiah-Redeemer, who would be like Moses. Stephen's argument from Dt 18:15–18, therefore, was generally in accord with Jewish eschatological expectations. And he evidently used it, as Peter did before him (cf. 3:22–23), expecting it to be convincing.

39–40 But while Peter and Stephen agree in seeing Christological significance in Dt 18:15–18 and in considering it an important testimonium passage for a Jewish audience, their attitudes toward Israel are very different. For Peter, his hearers are the sons of the prophets who should hear the new Moses (cf. 3:22–26); whereas for Stephen, his hearers are the sons of those who rejected Moses and killed the prophets (cf. 7:35–40, 51–53). In vv.39–40 Stephen specifies his rejection-of-Moses theme by picking up the awful words of Nu 14:3, "Their hearts turned back to Egypt" (v.39) and citing almost verbatim the people's defiance of Ex 32:1: "Make us gods who will go before us. As for this fellow Moses who led us out of Egypt—we don't know what has happened to him!" (v.40).

The Jewish Talmud also speaks of the people's rebellion in making the golden calf and generally views it as Israel's first, ultimate, and most heinous sin. But there is a decided difference between the way they treat the people's rebellion and the way Stephen does. The rabbis do not take this episode as the people's rejection of Moses, but emphasize Moses' successful intercession for Israel. Stephen, however, lays all his emphasis on Israel's rejection of their deliverer, implicitly drawing the parallel between their treatment of Moses and their treatment of Jesus—a parallel he will broaden and drive home in his scathing indictment of vv.51–53.

41–43 Stephen emphasizes that the golden calf incident was the time when the Israelites "brought sacrifices to it and held a celebration in honor of what their hands had made." So detestable to God was this episode in Israel's experience in the desert that Stephen calls it a time when "God turned away and gave them over to the worship of the heavenly bodies" (cf. Ro 1:24, 26, 28 for the expression "God gave them over"). The inescapable inference from Stephen's words is that Israel's shameful behavior and God's drastic response to it find their counterparts in the nation's rejection of Jesus.

To support his assertion that Israel's idolatry caused God to give them over to the worship of heavenly bodies, Stephen quotes Am 5:25–27 (following closely the Greek translation of the OT). In applying this passage, Stephen emphasizes that rejection of God's activity in the eschatological day of salvation brings God's judgment, despite all the sacrifices and offerings that may be offered, just as Israel's idolatry of the golden calf eventuated in Israel's exile "beyond Babylon."

c. On the temple (7:44–50)

Stephen has met the accusation of blasphemy against the law by reassessing Moses' place in redemptive history and by countercharging his accusers with both rejecting the one Moses spoke of and turning to idolatry in their refusal of Jesus the Messiah. Stephen now proceeds to meet the charge of blasphemy against the temple in the same way. In form, this section of the address recalls the more placid manner of vv.2–34. In tone and content, however, it carries on the strident and passionate appeal of vv.35–43, which amounts to a vigorous denunciation of the Jerusalem temple and the type of mentality that would hold to it as the apex of revealed religion.

44–46 Stephen's assessment of Israel's worship experience lays all the emphasis on the tabernacle, which he eulogistically calls "the tabernacle of Testimony." It was with our forefathers, he says, during that period in the desert, which so many consider exemplary. It was made according to the exact pattern God gave Moses and was central in the life of the nation during the conquest of Canaan under the leadership of Joshua. And it was the focus of national worship through the time of David, who found favor in God's sight. So significant was it in Israel's experience, in fact, that David asked to be allowed to provide a permanent type of "dwelling place" for God in Jerusalem. (Here Ps 132:5 is quoted and 2Sa 6:17; 1Ch 15:1 are alluded to.)

Like the writer to the Hebrews (cf. Heb 8:2, 5; 9:1–5, 11, 24), and probably like many other nonconformist Jews of his time, Stephen seems to have viewed the epitome of Jewish worship in terms of the tabernacle, not the temple. This was likely because he felt the mobility of the tabernacle was a restraint on the status quo mentality that had grown up around the temple. Furthermore, also like the writer to the Hebrews, Stephen attempts to lift his compatriots' vision to something far superior to even the wilderness tabernacle—namely, to the dwelling of God with humans in Jesus of Nazareth and as expressed through the new covenant.

47 "But it was Solomon," Stephen tersely says, "who built the house for him." This brevity shows something of Stephen's pejorative attitude toward the temple. And his contrast between the tabernacle (vv. 44–46) and the temple (v.47) expresses his disapproval. Probably Stephen had in mind 2Sa 7:5–16 (cf. 1Ch 17:4–14). There God spoke through the prophet Nathan of his satisfaction with his "nomadic" situation and declined David's offer to build a house for his divine presence; but he went on to announce that David's son would build such a house and promised to build a "house" (lineage) for David. Certainly 2Sa 7:5–16 was a foundational passage for much of early Christian thought (cf. Lk 1:32–33, alluding to 2Sa 7:12–16; Ac 13:17–22 to 7:6–16; Heb 1:5b to 7:14; and, possibly, 2 Cor 6:18 to 7:14). Obviously Stephen did not consider Solomon's temple to be the final fulfillment of God's words to David in 2Sa 7. Probably he understood the announcement of a temple to be a concession on God's part and laid greater emphasis on the promise of the establishment of David's seed and kingdom (cf. 2Sa 7:12–16).

48–50 Stephen reaches the climax of his antitemple polemic by insisting that "the Most High does not live in houses made by men"—a concept he supports by citing Isa 66:1–2a. Judaism never taught that God actually lived in the temple or was confined to its environs but spoke of his "Name" and presence as being there. In practice, however, this concept was often denied. This would especially appear so to Stephen, when further divine activity in Jesus Christ was refused out-of-hand by the people in their preference for God's past revelation and redemption as symbolized in the existence of the temple.

As a Hellenist, Stephen seems to have had a tendency to view things in a more "spiritual"' manner than most Jews (i.e., in more inward and nonmaterial terms)—a tendency with both good and bad features. As a Christian, he could have been aware of the contrast in the early oral instruction of converts between what is "made with hands" and what is "not made with hands" (cf. esp. Mk 14:58; Heb 8:2; 9:24). But whatever its source, Stephen's main assertion is that neither the tabernacle nor the temple was intended to be such an institutionalized feature in Israel's religion as to prohibit God's further redemptive activity or to halt the advance of God's plan for his people. The response Stephen wants from his hearers was what God declared as his desire for his people in Is 66:2b (this text follows the passage Stephen cites): "This is the one I esteem: he who is humble and contrite in spirit, and trembles at my word." To those who desired to localize God's presence and confine his working, however, Stephen repeated the denunciation of Isa 66:1–2a, leaving the appeal in Isa 66:2b to be inferred.

d. The indictment (7.51–53)

The most striking feature of Stephen's speech and the one that sets it off most sharply from Peter's temple sermon of Ac 3 is its strong polemical stance toward Israel. As Stephen recounts the history of Israel, he sees a litany of sin, rebellion, and rejection of God's purposes and emphasizes the unworthiness and continual rebelliousness of the Jews. Some have supposed that the suddenness and harshness of the indictment were occasioned by an angry outburst in the court, to which vv.51–53 are a kind of "kneejerk" response. But there is little reason to assume that to be the case. Stephen's address has led naturally up to the invective; and after his quotation of Isa 66:1–2a, there was really nothing to add.

51 Stephen's description of his accusers is loaded with pejorative theological nuances. The phrase "stiff-necked" was fixed in Israel's memory as God's own characterization of the nation when it rebelled against Moses and worshiped the golden calf (cf. Ex 33:5; Dt 9:13). And the expression "with uncircumcised hearts and ears" recalls God's judgment on the apostates among his people as being "uncircumcised in heart" (cf. Lev 26:41; Dt 10:16; Jer 4:4; 9:26). And now, says Stephen, speaking like a prophet of old, God's indictment rests upon you just as it did on your idolatrous and apostate ancestors.

52 Israel's persecution and killing of her prophets is a recurrent theme in Jewish literature. The OT not only speaks of the sufferings of individual prophets but also has a number of general statements about how the nation had persecuted and killed the prophets of God (cf. 2Ch 36:15–16; Ne 9:26; Jer 2:30). Various writings from this period of Judaism elaborated on this theme, particularly as a result of the idealization of martyrdom that arose in Maccabean time. Even the Talmud speaks frequently about Israel's persecuting and killing her prophets. All such statements, though, were for the council well-learned lessons from the past. Stephen's accusation, however, was that they had learned nothing from the past since an even more horrendous crime had been committed in the present—the betrayal and murder of "the Righteous One"—by the very ones who were so smug about Israel's past failures.

53 Stephen's address began with the fraternal greeting "Men, brothers and fathers." It affirmed throughout his deep respect for such distinctly Jewish phenomena as the Abrahamic covenant (vv.3–8), circumcision (v.8), and the tabernacle (vv.44–46). He repeatedly referred to "our father Abraham" and "our fathers" in such a way as to stress his ready acceptance of his Israelite heritage (vv.2, 11–12, 15, 19, 39, 44–45). Yet his repeated use of the second person plural pronoun in vv.51–53 shows his desire to disassociate himself from the nation in its recurrent refusal of God throughout its history. Consequently, taking the offensive, Stephen drives home his point: "Your fathers always resisted the Holy Spirit.... Your fathers persecuted the prophets.... You received the law put into effect through angels, but you have not obeyed it." Perhaps he jabbed with a finger at his accusers—though even a blind man would have felt his verbal blows.

3. The stoning of Stephen (7:54–8:1a)

54 To interpret Stephen's address as an absolute renunciation of the land, the law, or the sacrificial system is an exaggeration. Indeed, Stephen saw worship in terms of the tabernacle, not the temple, to be the ideal of Israel's worship. But that is not to say he rejected the worship of the temple, particularly as it continued the pattern of worship instituted by God in giving the tabernacle. Nor can it be said that Stephen was proclaiming a law-free and universal Gospel or suggesting the futility of a Christian mission to Israel. Instead, his desire, it seems, was to raise a prophetic voice within Israel, pleading with his hearers to make Jesus, not their traditional holy things, the center of their worship and thought. Certainly Stephen was more daring than the Jerusalem apostles, more ready to explore the logical consequences of commitment to Jesus than they were, and more ready to attribute Israel's rejection of its Messiah to a perpetual callousness of heart.

Nonetheless, Stephen's message was, for his hearers, flagrant apostasy—in both its content and its tone. While his purpose was to denounce the status quo mentality that had grown up around the land, the law, and the temple, thereby clearing a path for a positive response to Jesus as Israel's Messiah, this was undoubtedly taken as a frontal attack against the Jewish religion in its official and popular forms. And in the council's eyes, its assumed prophetic stance together with its obnoxious liberal spirit must have represented the worst of both Jewish Hellenism and the beginning Christian movement. So, Luke tells us, "they were furious and gnashed their teeth at him."

55–56 While the content and tone of his address infuriated the council, Stephen's follow-up solemn pronouncement raised again the specter of blasphemy and brought his hearers to a frenzied pitch: "Look, I see heaven open and the Son of Man standing at the right hand of God." Only a few years before, Jesus had stood before this same tribunal and had been condemned for answering affirmatively the high priest's question as to his being Israel's Messiah and for saying of himself: "And you will see the Son of Man sitting at the right hand of the Mighty One and coming on the clouds of heaven" (Mk 14:62). Now Stephen was saying, in effect, that his vision confirmed Jesus' claim and condemned the council for having rejected him. Unless the council members were prepared to repent and admit their awful error, they had no option but to find Stephen also guilty of blasphemy. Had he been judged only an impertinent apostate (cf. 5:40), the thirty-nine lashes of Jewish punishment would have been appropriate. But to be openly blasphemous before the council as well was a matter demanding death.

Luke's description of Stephen as "full of the Holy Spirit" is in line with his characterizations of him in 6:3, 5, 8, 15. The identification of Jesus as "the Son of Man" is used outside the Gospels only here and at Rev 1:13; 14:14 (also at Heb 2:6, though as a locution for a human being in line with Ps 8:4). In the Gospels except for Lk 24:7; Jn 12:34, Jesus alone used "Son of Man" in referring to himself (see comment on Mk 8:31). The title was generally not attributed to Jesus by the church between the time when his sufferings were completed and when he would assume his full glory. Here, however, an anticipation of Christ's full glory is set within a martyr context (as also at Rev 1:13; 14:14), and, therefore, "Son of Man" is fully appropriate.

In Stephen's vision the juxtaposition of "the glory [GK 1518] of God" and the name of Jesus—together with his saying that he sees "heaven open and the Son of Man standing at the right hand of God"—is Christologically significant. The OT viewed "the glory of God" as the revelation of the nature of God or even as the divine mode of being itself. By bringing together of "the glory of God" and the name of Jesus, therefore, Luke suggests that Jesus manifested the divine nature and the divine mode of being. Likewise, inasmuch as God dwells in the highest heaven, the open heaven with Christ at God's right hand suggests something about his work as providing access into the very presence of God.

Stephen's reference to Jesus "standing" at the right hand of God, which differs from the "sitting" of Ps 110:1 (the passage alluded to here), has been variously understood. Most commentators have interpreted the "standing" to suggest Jesus' welcome of his martyred follower, who, like the repentant criminal of Lk 23:43, was received into heaven the moment he died. Dispensational commentators have taken Stephen's reference to Jesus' "standing" as supporting their view that the distinctive redemptive message for this age was not proclaimed till the Pauline gospel; and, therefore, in the transitional period between Israel and the church, Jesus is represented as not yet having taken his seat at God's right hand. Still others speak of Jesus as "standing" in order to enter his messianic office on earth or depict him as "standing" in line with the common representation of angels standing in the presence of God.

Regardless of what position ones takes, we should emphasize the idea of "witness" as being connoted in Jesus' "standing." Stephen has been acknowledging Christ before the council, and now he sees Christ acknowledging his servant before God (cf. Mt 10:32). The proper posture for a witness is standing. Stephen has been condemned by an earthly court and appeals for vindication to a heavenly court.

57–58 There is a progression in Luke's portrayals of the trial scenes of 4:1ff., 5:17ff., and here, with the first ending in threatenings (4:17, 21), the second with flogging (5:40), and the third with stoning (7:58–60). Moreover, the historical interplay of divergent ideological factors gave rise to Judaism's united stance against the Hellenists.

The message of Stephen, it seems, served as a kind of catalyst to unite Sadducees, Pharisees, and the common people against the early Christians. Had Gamaliel been confronted by this type of Christian preaching earlier, his attitude as reported in 5:34–39 would surely have been different. The Pharisees could tolerate Palestinian Jewish believers in Jesus because their messianic beliefs, though undoubtedly judged terribly misguided, effected no change in their practice of the Mosaic law: the Pharisaic and priestly devotees of the new movement continued their scrupulous observance of the law, and the Hebraic Christians continued to live in accordance with at least its minimal requirements. But the Hellenistic Christians, who had probably entered Palestine avowing their desire to become stricter in their religious practice, were now beginning to question the centrality of Israel's traditional forms of religious expression and to propagate within Jerusalem itself a type of religious liberalism that, from a Pharisaic perspective, would eventually undercut the basis for the Jewish religion itself. They might have been able to do little about such liberalism as it existed throughout the Diaspora and in certain quarters within Palestine. But they were determined to preserve the Holy City from further contamination by such outside elements and thus, as they saw it, best prepare the way for the coming of the Messianic Age.

It is not easy to determine whether the stoning of Stephen was only the result of mob action or whether it was carried out by the Sanhedrin in excess of its jurisdiction. The reference to "the witnesses" in v.58, whose grisly duty it was to knock the offender down and throw the first stones, suggests an official execution. If, as we believe, Stephen's martyrdom occurred sometime in the mid-thirties and during the final years of Pilate's governorship over Judea (A.D. 26–36), and if, as we have argued, the Pharisees were not prepared to come to his defense in the council, conditions may well have been at a stage where the Sanhedrin felt free to overstep its legal authority. Pontius Pilate normally resided at Caesarea, and the later years of his governorship were beset by increasing troubles that tended to divert his attention.

"The witnesses," Luke tells us, in preparing for their onerous work of knocking Stephen down and throwing the first stones, "laid their clothes at the feet of a young man named Saul." This suggests that Saul had some official part in the execution. "Young man" generally refers to someone from about twenty-four to forty years old. Some have argued from the action of the witnesses and from Saul's age that he was a member of the Jewish Sanhedrin at the time (see comment on 8:1a), though he may also have been exercising only delegated authority.

59–60 As Stephen was being stoned, he cried out, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit," and, "Lord, do not hold this sin against them." The cries are reminiscent of Jesus' own words from the cross in Lk 23:34, 46, though the parallelism of sequence and wording is not exact. While it is probably going too far to say that Luke meant Stephen's execution to be a reenactment of the first great martyrdom, that of Jesus, the parallelism here is certainly not just inadvertent; and it was probably included to show that the same spirit of commitment and forgiveness that characterized Jesus' life and death was true of his earliest followers. The expression "fall asleep" (GK 3121) is a common biblical way of referring to the death of God's own (cf. Jn 11:11; Ac 13:36; 1Co 7:39; 11:30; 2Pe 3:4), and the word "sleep" suggests something as to the nature of personal existence during that period of time theologians call "the intermediate state."

8:1a Again, as in 7:58, Luke makes the point that Saul was present at Stephen's death and approved of it. Because the verb "to give approval" (GK 5306) is also used in 26:10, some have taken the reference here to be to Saul's official vote as a member of the Sanhedrin. But that is not necessarily implied. All Luke wants to do here is provide a transition in his account of the developing Christian mission.

4. The immediate aftermath (8:1b–3)

1b Taken in the broader context of Luke's presentation, we should probably understand the persecution recorded here as directed primarily against the Hellenistic Christians of Jerusalem rather than chiefly against the whole church. A certain stigma must also have fallen on the native-born and more scrupulous Jewish Christians, and they probably became as inconspicuous as possible in the countryside and towns around Jerusalem. The Hellenistic Jews of the city had already been able to disassociate themselves from the Hellenistic Jewish Christians among them. Probably the Jewish leaders made a somewhat similar distinction between the Hellenistic and the more Hebraic Christians within the Jerusalem church, though not nearly so sharply. We are told by Luke in a somewhat sweeping statement that "all" the Christians of Jerusalem "except the apostles were scattered throughout Judea and Samaria." Apparently, however, only the Hellenistic believers felt it inadvisable to return.

As a result of the persecution that began with the martyrdom of Stephen, the Gospel was carried beyond the confines of Jerusalem, in initial fulfillment of Jesus' directive in 1:8. From this time onward, the Jerusalem church seems to have been largely, if not entirely, devoid of Hellenistic believers. With the martyrdom of Stephen, the Christians of Jerusalem learned the bitter lesson that to espouse a changed relationship to the land, the law, and the temple was (1) to give up the peace of the church and (2) to abandon the Christian mission to Israel. The issues and events connected with Stephen's death and the expulsion of those who shared his concerns would stand as a warning to the Jerusalem congregation throughout its brief and turbulent history and would exert mental pressure upon Christians in the city to be more circumspect in their future activities within Judea.

2–3 Luke has already used "godly men" to describe the Jews at Pentecost who were receptive to the working of God's Spirit (2:5). He has also used the adjective "devout" of the aged Simeon in the temple (cf. Lk 2:25), and he will use it of Ananias of Damascus (cf. Ac 22:12). Therefore, when Luke says that "godly men" buried Stephen," he apparently means that certain devout Jews who were open to his Christian message volunteered to ask for Stephen's body and bury him, much as Joseph of Arimathea did for Jesus (cf. Lk 23:50–53). Luke also tells us that those who buried Stephen "mourned deeply for him," which may well be Luke's way of suggesting their repentance toward God as well as their sorrow for Stephen.

Saul, who had had some official capacity at Stephen's stoning, now began a campaign to destroy the church (cf. also 9:1–30; 22:1–21; 26:2–23).

B. The Early Ministries of Philip (8:4–40)

The accounts of Philip's ministries in Samaria and to the Ethiopian minister of finance are placed in Acts between the Hellenists' expulsion from Jerusalem and the outreach of the Gospel to Gentiles—an outreach prepared for in Saul's conversion and first effected through the preaching of Peter to Cornelius. As such, Luke uses these accounts of Philip's ministries as a kind of bridge in depicting the advance of the church. Each account represents a further development in proclaiming the Gospel within a Jewish milieu: the first, an outreach to a dispossessed group within Palestine who were often considered by Jerusalem Jews as "half-breeds," both racially and religiously; the second, an outreach to a proselyte or near-proselyte from another land.

1. The evangelization of Samaria (8:4–25)

Historically, the movement of the Gospel into Samaria following directly on the heels of the persecution of Hellenistic Jewish Christians in Jerusalem makes a great deal of sense. Doubtless a feeling of kinship was established between the formerly dispossessed Samaritans (see comment on Lk 9:53–54) and the recently dispossessed Christian Hellenists because of Stephen's opposition to the mentality of mainstream Judaism and its veneration of the Jerusalem temple—an opposition that would have facilitated a favorable response to Philip and his message in Samaria.

4 Luke records the mission to Samaria as inaugurated by Philip and carried on by Peter and John as "Exhibit A" for his thesis that "those who had been scattered preached the word wherever they went." Luke does this because in the mission to Samaria he sees in retrospect a significant advance in the outreach of the Gospel.

5 Philip, the second of the seven enumerated in 6:5 (cf. 21:8) and one of the Hellenistic believers expelled from Jerusalem in the persecution directed against Hellenistic Christians, traveled to the north and proclaimed "the Christ" to Samaritans. The text is uncertain as to which city of Samaria he preached in, for every direction from Jerusalem is "down." Luke was evidently not interested in giving a precise geographical identification for that city.

6–8 In the highly fluid and syncretistic atmosphere of first-century Palestine a number of parallels of outlook and ideology existed between various nonconformist groups generally looked upon as being Jewish. Stephen, the covenanters of Qumran, and the Samaritans, for example, all had an antitemple polemic, which, at least superficially, could have drawn them together (though, in actuality, their positions were each based on quite different rationales). In addition, as the antagonism of Jerusalem Jews was focused upon the Hellenistic Christians, these lately dispossessed Jewish believers undoubtedly found something of a welcome among the Samaritans, who had felt themselves the objects of a similar animosity for so long.

In Philip's preaching of Jesus as the Christ (v.5, 12), he undoubtedly used Dt 18:15, 18–19 as a major testimonium passage in his preaching, just as Peter and Stephen had done (3:22; 7:37). With the Pentateuch as their Scriptures, and looking for the coming of a Mosaic Messiah, the Samaritans were open to Philip's message. Furthermore, God backed up his preaching by many "miraculous signs," with many demoniacs, paralytics, and cripples healed. Thus Luke summarizes the response of these Samaritans to Philip's ministry by saying, "So there was great joy in that city."

9–13 Simon the sorcerer, or Simon Magus as he is called in postapostolic Christian writings, was a leading heretic in the early church. Justin Martyr (died c. 165), who was himself a Samaritan, says that nearly all his countrymen revered Simon as the highest god, and many legends grew up around him. Just exactly how Simon of Ac 8 is related to Simon Magus of later legend is not clear. Luke's statement about the Samaritans' veneration of Simon (they said, "The man is the divine power known as the Great Power") seems to support the identification of these two. Likewise, what exactly is meant by the title "the Great Power" (v.10) is uncertain; it may mean that Simon was acclaimed to be God Almighty. At any rate, he claimed to be some exceedingly great person and supported his claim by many acts of magic.

Nevertheless, as the Gospel advanced into Samaria, Simon believed and was baptized. His conversion must have greatly impressed the Samaritans, and their evangelist Philip must have long remembered it. But Simon himself, to judge by the narrative that follows, was more interested in the great acts of power accompanying Philip's preaching than God's reign in his life or the proclamation of Jesus' messiahship. Simon's belief in Jesus seems to have been like that spoken of in Jn 2:23–25—i.e., based only on miraculous signs and thus inferior to true commitment to Jesus.

14 For the early church the evangelization of Samaria was not just a matter of an evangelist's proclamation and people's response. It also involved the acceptance of these new converts by the mother church in Jerusalem. So Luke takes pains to point out here (see also his account of Cornelius's conversion in 10:1–11:18) that the Jerusalem church sought to satisfy itself as to the genuineness of Philip's converts and that they did this by sending Peter and John to Samaria. Along with his thesis about development and advance in the outreach of the Gospel, Luke is also interested in establishing lines of continuity and highlighting aspects of essential unity within the church. Therefore, in his account of Philip's mission in Samaria, he tells also of the visit of Peter and John. Instead of minimizing Philip's success in Samaria, as some have proposed, it is more likely that Luke wants us to understand Peter and John's ministry in Samaria as confirming and extending Philip's ministry.

Just as in Ro 15:26 and 2Co 9:2, where a whole province is regarded as acting in a Christian manner when represented by only one or two congregations located there, so Luke here speaks sweepingly of the Jerusalem church hearing "that Samaria had accepted the word of God," even though in v.25 he refers to further evangelistic activity in other Samaritan villages.

15–17 When Peter and John arrived, they prayed for the Samaritan converts, laid their hands on them, and "they received the Holy Spirit." Before this, Luke tells us, "The Holy Spirit had not yet come upon any of them; they had simply been baptized into the name of the Lord Jesus." We are not told just how the coming of the Holy Spirit upon these new converts was expressed in their lives, but the context suggests that his presence was attended by such external signs as marked his coming on the earliest Christians at Pentecost—probably by some form of glossolalia. On the temporal separation of the baptism of the Spirit from commitment to Jesus and water baptism, see comment on 2:38. In effect, in this first advance of the Gospel outside the confines of Jerusalem, God worked in ways that were conducive not only to the reception of the Good News in Samaria but also to the acceptance of these new converts by believers at Jerusalem.

18–24 Simon's response to the presence of God's Spirit and the evidences of God's power is one of those tragic stories that accompany every advance of the Gospel. Whenever and wherever God is at work among people, there are not only genuine responses but also counterfeit ones. Simon "believed" and "was baptized," Luke has reported. Evidently Simon was included among those on whom Peter and John laid their hands. But the NT frequently reports incidents and events from a phenomenal perspective without always giving the divine or heavenly perspective. For this reason the verb "believe" (GK 4409) is used in the NT to cover a wide range of responses to God and to Christ (e.g., Jn 2:23; Jas 2:19). Neither baptism nor the laying on of hands conveys any status or power of itself, though Simon with his shallow spiritual perception thought they could.

Simon's offer to pay for the ability to confer the Holy Spirit through the laying on of hands evoked Peter's consignment of Simon and his money to hell. Simon regarded the bestowal of the Spirit as a specially effective bit of magic, and he had no idea of the spiritual issues at stake. Peter's analysis of the situation, however, is that Simon's heart was "not right before God" because it was still "full of bitterness and captive to sin." So Peter urges him, "Repent of this wickedness and pray to the Lord. Perhaps he will forgive you for having such a thought in your heart." But Simon, preoccupied with external consequences and physical effects, asks only and rather lamely, "Pray to the Lord for me so that nothing you have said may happen to me." Luke expresses a sobering truth here: It is all too often possible to make a counterfeit response to the presence and activity of God's Spirit.

25 Luke closes his account of the evangelization of Samaria with a transitional sentence that tells us that on the apostles' return journey to Jerusalem, further evangelization of Samaria took place. The "they" of this verse refers primarily to Peter and John, but it may also refer to Philip for part of the journey, as they evangelized together in the southern regions of Samaria.

2. An Ethiopian eunuch converted (8:26–40)

This account of Philip's ministry to a high-ranking Ethiopian government official represents a further step in the advance of the Gospel from its strictly Jewish confines to a full-fledged Gentile mission. Though a Gentile, the official was probably a Jewish proselyte or near-proselyte (a so-called Proselyte of the Gate) and was therefore viewed by Luke as still within a Jewish religious milieu. He had been to Jerusalem to worship, was studying the prophecy of Isaiah, and was open to further instruction from a Jew. Here was a notable instance of providential working that carried the development of the Gospel proclamation ever beyond Samaria.

26 Luke does not tell us just where Philip was when he received his divine directive to go south to the road from Jerusalem to Gaza. He highlights instead the fact that Philip's ministry to the Ethiopian eunuch was especially arranged by God and providentially worked out in all its details.

When Luke desires to stress the special presence and activity of God in his narrative, he frequently uses the expression "the angel of the Lord" (cf. Lk 1:11; 2:6; Ac 12:7, 23) for the more normal reference to "the Spirit of the Lord." Here Luke begins in just such a way and with such a purpose, telling us that "an angel of the Lord" began the action by giving instructions to Philip—and also sustains it throughout, though the more usual "the Spirit" and "the Spirit of the Lord" are used in vv.29, 39. Gaza was the southernmost of the five chief Philistine cities in southwest Palestine and the last settlement before the desert waste stretching away to Egypt. The fifty-mile journey from Jerusalem to Gaza trailed off at its southwestern terminus into patches of desert.

27–28 It is difficult to determine from the text itself how Luke wanted his readers to understand the Ethiopian eunuch's relation to Judaism. It is also uncertain how first-century Judaism would have viewed a eunuch coming to worship at Jerusalem. While Dt 23:1 explicitly stipulates that no emasculated male could be included within the Jewish religious community, Isa 56:3–5 speaks of eunuchs being accepted by the God of boundless lovingkindness. Nor is it clear what the Ethiopian's physical condition was, for the word "eunuch" (GK 2336) frequently appears in the LXX and in secular Greek writings as a euphemism for high military and political officials, without necessarily suggesting emasculation. Therefore, we are probably justified in taking this eunuch as a governmental officer in an Oriental kingdom and in emphasizing two facts when considering his relation to Judaism: (1) he had been on a religious pilgrimage to Jerusalem, and (2) he was returning with a copy of the prophecy of Isaiah in his possession, which would have been difficult for a non-Jew to get.

The ancient kingdom of Ethiopia lay between Aswan and Khartoum. It was ruled by a queen mother who had the dynastic title Candace and ruled on behalf of her son the king, since the king was regarded as the child of the sun and therefore too holy to become involved in the secular functions of the state. The minister of finance in the Ethiopian government had become either a full proselyte or a Proselyte of the Gate and had gone to Jerusalem to worship at one of the Jewish festivals. He was now returning home reading Isaiah; possibly Isa 56:3–5, the passage that refers to God's lovingkindness to eunuchs, first caught his attention and caused him to return to Isaiah again and again. But whatever got him into Isaiah's prophecy, the interpretation of the Servant passage of Isa 52:13–53:12 troubled him.

29–30 Having been directed to the desert road on the way to Gaza, Philip is again directed by the Spirit to the carriage that the Ethiopian minister of finance is traveling in. As Philip approaches, he hears the man reading aloud from Isaiah (the normal practice in the ancient world). So while running along beside the Ethiopian's carriage, Philip asks, "Do you understand what you are reading?"

31–34 The Ethiopian, being open to instruction from a Jew, invites Philip into his carriage to explain Isa 53:7–8 to him. His problem, it seems, concerns the references to suffering and humiliation: "Who is the prophet talking about, himself or someone else?" Perhaps he had heard an official explanation of this passage at Jerusalem, but he still had questions about its meaning.

While in Judaism at this time the concept of God's Servant carried messianic connotations in certain contexts and among certain groups, there is no evidence that anyone in pre-Christian Judaism ever thought of the Messiah in terms of a Suffering Servant. What rabbinic interpretations are available relate the suffering either to the nation Israel (at 52:14; 53:2, 4, 10) or to the wicked Gentile nations (at 53:3, 7–9, 11). Though it is true that the certain Jewish elements were in the process of forming the concept of a suffering Messiah (such as at Qumran), a doctrine of a suffering Messiah was generally considered unthinkable.

35 At a time when only what Christians call the OT was Scripture, what better book was there to use in proclaiming the nature of divine redemption than Isaiah, and what better passage could be found than Isa 52:13–53:12? Thus Philip began with the very passage the Ethiopian was reading and proclaimed to him "the good news about Jesus," explaining from Isa 53:7–8 and its context a suffering messianology. Matthew and John applied Isa 53 to Jesus' ministry of healing (cf. Mt 8:17 on Isa 53:4; Jn 12:38 on Isa 53:1), but Luke portrays Jesus quoting Isa 53 as being fulfilled in his passion (Lk 22:37 quotes Isa 53:12). Luke, therefore, sets up a parallel between Jesus' use of Isa 53 and Philip's preaching based on this chapter and implies in that parallel that the latter was dependent on the former (cf. also 1Pe 2:22–25 on Isa 53:4–6, 9, 12). After beginning his preaching about Jesus with Isa 53, Philip probably went on to include other passages from that early Christian block of testimonium material that has been dubbed "Scriptures of the Servant of the Lord and the Righteous Sufferer" (i.e., Isa 42:1–44:5; 49:1–13; 50:4–11; and Pss 22, 34, 69, 118).

36–38 The eunuch responded to Philip by asking for baptism. As a Jewish proselyte or near-proselyte, he probably knew that water baptism was the expected external symbol for a Gentile's repentance and conversion to the religion of Israel. Therefore, it would have been quite natural for him to view baptism as the appropriate expression for his commitment to Jesus, whom he had come to accept as the fulfillment of Israel's hope and promised Messiah. Or perhaps Philip closed his exposition with an appeal similar to Peter's at Pentecost (cf. 2:38) and his own in Samaria (cf. 8:12). However the subject of baptism arose, Philip baptized the eunuch. That is the climax Luke has been building up to.

39–40 The account of the Ethiopian's conversion ends as it began—with a stress on the special presence of God and his direct intervention. We are told that the Spirit of the Lord "suddenly took" Philip from the scene. This verb connotes both a forceful and sudden action by the Spirit and a lack of resistance from Philip.

With our Western interest in cause-and-effect relations and our modern understanding of historiography, we would like to know more about what exactly happened between the eunuch and Philip and about their subsequent lives. Irenaeus writes that the eunuch became a missionary to the Ethiopians, though we have no way of knowing whether this is true. All that Luke tells us about the eunuch is that his conversion was a significant episode in the advance of the Gospel and that he "went on his way rejoicing." Likewise, all Luke tells us about Philip is that his early ministries in Samaria and to the eunuch were important features in the development of the Christian mission from its strictly Jewish confines to its Gentile outreach. He refers to further evangelistic activity on the part of Philip in the maritime plain of Palestine and to a final ministry at Caesarea. Later he mentions Philip and his four prophetess daughters at Caesarea in connection with Paul's last visit to Jerusalem (cf. 21:8–9). Beyond these meager references, Luke tells us nothing because he is interested in the advances of the Gospel proclamation and not in what happened after that.

C. The Conversion of Saul of Tarsus (9:1–30)

There are three accounts of Paul's conversion in Acts: the first here in ch. 9 and two more in Paul's defenses in chs. 22 and 26. Luke uses such repetitions to indicate that something is extremely important.

The major charge Paul faced in his life was his willingness to carry the Gospel directly to Gentiles, refusing to be confined to a mission to the Jews. All three accounts stress that Christ himself brought about this change in the strategy of divine redemption. It was not a strategy Paul thought up or a program given to him by another; it was a compelling call that came directly from Christ himself, and he had no choice but to obey. Luke, therefore, climaxes his portrayals of three pivotal figures in the advance of the Gospel to the Gentile world (the theme of this panel) by recording the conversion of Saul of Tarsus, emphasizing the supernatural nature of the call and the miraculous circumstances of the conversion. With these emphases, though with inevitable variations in detail, Paul himself was in full agreement (cf. Gal 1:1–24).

1. The Christ encounter on the Damascus road (9:1–9)

1–2 The account of Saul's conversion opens with the picture of him "still breathing out murderous threats against the Lord's disciples" (cf. 8:3). Even after the death of Stephen and the expulsion of the Hellenistic Christians from Jerusalem, Saul felt it was necessary to continue the persecution in places outside the Sanhedrin's jurisdiction.

The past generation of commentators, particularly those of the English-speaking world, often read into such passages as Ro 7:14–25, Gal 1:13–14, Php 3:4–6 and the portrayals of Ac 9, 22, and 26 a mental and spiritual struggle on the part of Saul that was, either consciously or unconsciously, fighting fervently against the logic of the early Christians' preaching, the dynamic quality of their lives, and their fortitude under oppression. Therefore his "breathing out murderous threats" was taken as his attempt to slay externally the dragons of doubt he could not silence within his own heart. But the day of the psychological interpretation of Paul's conversion experience appears to be over, and deservedly so. Indeed, Luke connects historically the martyrdom of Stephen, the persecution of the Hellenistic Jewish Christians, and the conversion of Saul. But the argument for a logical connection is not as certain.

It is, of course, impossible to speak with certainty about what was going on in Saul's subconscious mind at the time, for psychoanalysis two millennia later is hardly a fruitful exercise. His own references as a Christian to this earlier time in his life do not require us to view him as struggling with uncertainty, doubt, and guilt before becoming a Christian. They rather suggest that humanly speaking, he was immune to the Christian proclamation and immensely satisfied with his own ancestral faith. While he looked forward to the full realization of the hope of Israel, Paul seems from his reminiscences of those earlier days to have been thoroughly satisfied with the revelation of God that was given through Moses and to have counted it his chief delight to worship God through those revealed forms. Nor need we suppose that the logic of the early Christian preachers greatly affected Paul. His later references to "the offense of the cross" show that for him the cross was the great stumbling block to any acknowledgment of Jesus of Nazareth as Israel's Messiah—a stumbling block no amount of logic or verbal gymnastics could remove (cf. 1Co 1:23; Gal 5:11).

It is probable that Saul took up his brutal task of persecution with full knowledge of the earnestness of his opponents, the stamina of the martyrs, and the agony he would necessarily cause. Fanaticism was not so foreign to Palestine in his day as to leave him unaware of these things, and it is quite possible that he was prepared for the emotional strain involved in persecuting those he believed to be dangerous schismatics within Israel.

More important, however, in days when the rabbis viewed the keeping of the Mosaic law as the vitally important prerequisite for the coming of the Messianic Age, Paul could validate his actions against the Christians by reference to such godly precedents as (1) Moses' slaying of the immoral Israelites at Baal Peor (cf. Nu 25:1–5); (2) Phinehas's slaying of the Israelite man and Midianite woman in the plains of Moab (cf. Nu 25:6–15); and (3) the actions of the Maccabees and the Hasidim in rooting out apostasy among the people. With such precedents and parallels, coupled with the rising tide of messianic expectation within Israel, Saul could very well have felt justified in mounting a further persecution against the Christians. Probably he felt that the nation must be faithful in its obedience to the law and kept from schism or going astray if their messianic hopes were to be fulfilled. In his task, he doubtless expected to receive God's commendation.

The Sadducean high priests of Jerusalem were, it seems, recognized by Rome as the titular rulers of their people in most internal matters; and evidently they retained the right of extradition in strictly religious situations. Therefore Saul, seeking the return of Jewish Christians, went to the high priest and asked him for written permission to take any Christian men and women as prisoners to Jerusalem (cf. 22:5; 26:12).

Damascus was a large and thriving commercial center at the foot of the Anti-Lebanon mountain range. Since 64 B.C. it had been part of the Roman province of Syria and was granted certain civic rights by Rome as one of the ten cities of eastern Syria and the Transjordan called the Decapolis (cf. Mk 5:20; 7:31). It had a large Jewish population. It was to this city that Saul went with the authority of the Jewish Sanhedrin, seeking to return to Jerusalem those Christians who had fled the city—chiefly the Hellenistic Jewish Christians—in order to contain its spread.

While we have spoken repeatedly of the early believers in Jesus as Christians, the term "Christian" was first coined at Antioch of Syria (see comment on 11:26). Before then and during the early existence of the church, those who accepted Jesus' messiahship and claimed him as their Lord called themselves those of "the Way" (see also 19:9, 23; 22:4; 24:14, 22), while their opponents spoke of them as members of "the sect of the Nazarenes" (cf. 24:5, 14; 28:22). The origin of "the Way" (GK 3847) as a term for Christians is uncertain, though it surely had something to do with the early believers' consciousness of walking in the true path of God's salvation and moving forward to accomplish his purposes. In the vignette of 9:1–30, it is synonymous with such self-designations as "the disciples of the Lord" (vv.2, 10, 19), "saints" (v.13), "all who call on your [Jesus'] name" (v.14), and "brothers" (vv.17, 30).

3–6 As he approached Damascus, Saul saw a light from heaven and heard a voice from heaven. In 9:3 the light is described as simply "a light from heaven," while both 22:6 and 26:13 emphasize its brightness. Likewise, in 9:4 Luke reports that Saul heard the voice and in v.7 that his companions also heard the voice, whereas both 22:9 and 26:14 state that only Saul heard the voice. Since the Greek noun used here (GK 5889) means both "sound" in the sense of any tone or voice and "articulated speech" in the sense of language, undoubtedly while the whole group traveling to Damascus heard the sound from heaven, only Saul understood the spoken words.

As Saul fell to the ground, the voice from heaven intoned his name in solemn repetition: "Saul, Saul." It was common in antiquity for a person in a formal setting to be addressed by the repetition of his name (cf. Ge 22:11; 46:2; Ex 3:4; Lk 10:41; et al.). Saul understood the voice to be a message from God himself, for to the rabbis to hear a voice from heaven connoted a rebuke or a word of instruction from God. Therefore when the voice went on to ask the question "Why do you persecute me?" Saul was without doubt thoroughly confused. He was not persecuting God! Rather, he was defending God and his laws!

Some have translated Saul's reply in v.5 as "Who are you, sir?" since the Greek title kyrios (GK 3261) was used in the ancient world not only as an ascription of worshipful acclaim but also as a form of polite address and since the context indicates that Saul did not know whom he was speaking to. But he did know that he had been struck down by a light from heaven and had been addressed by a voice from heaven, both of which signaled the divine presence. So his use of the term "Lord" was probably meant in a worshipful manner—even though he was thoroughly confused as to how he could be rebuked by God for doing the will and service. Unable even to articulate his confusion, though realizing the need for some response in the presence of the divine, he cries out in stumbling fashion, "Who are you, Lord?"

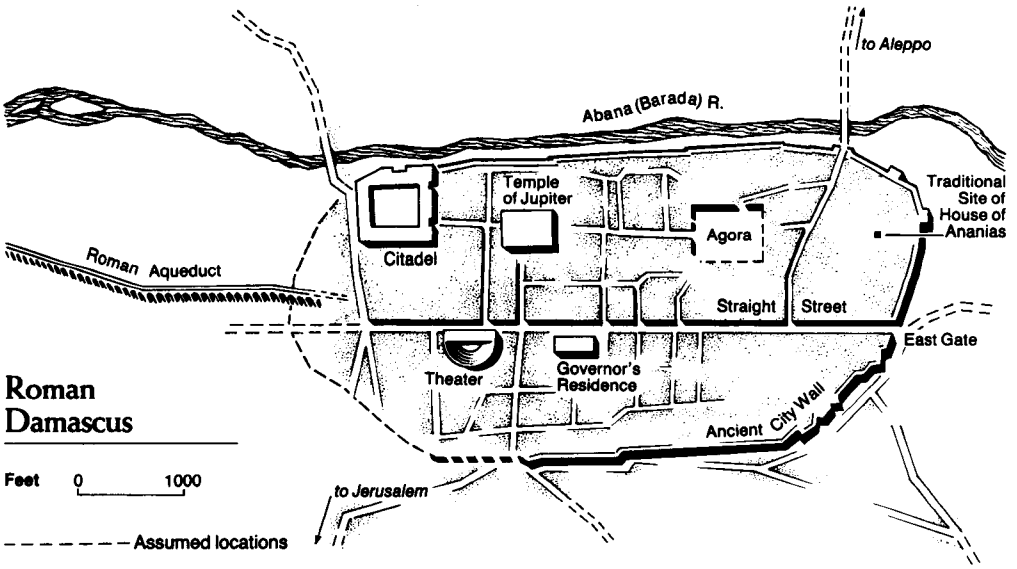
In what must have been for Saul almost total disbelief, he hears the following reply: "I am Jesus, whom you are persecuting." Then in a manner that throws him entirely upon the guidance of Jesus, apart from anything he could do or work out for himself, the voice continues: "Now get up and go into the city, and you will be told what you must do." Such a confrontation and such a rebuke must have been traumatic for Saul. Time would be needed to heal his emotions and work out the implications of his experience, and both Acts and Paul's later Christian letters reveal something of the process of development throughout the rest of his life. But in this supreme revelational encounter, Saul received a new perspective on divine redemption, a new agenda for his life, and the embryonic elements of his new Christian theology.

Once Saul had been encountered by Christ on the Damascus road, a number of realizations must have begun to press in upon his consciousness—each of which was to receive further explication in his thought and life as time went on. First, Saul began to understand that despite his zeal and his sense of doing God's will, his previous life and activities in Judaism lay under God's rebuke. A voice from heaven had corrected him, and there was nothing more to be said.

Second, Saul could not escape the fact that the Jesus whose followers he had been persecuting was alive, exalted, and in some manner to be associated with God the Father, whom Israel worshiped. He, therefore, had to revise his whole estimate of the life, teaching, and death of the Nazarene because God had beyond any question vindicated him. Thus he came to agree with the Christians that Jesus' death on the cross, rather than discrediting him as an impostor, fulfilled prophecy and was really God's provision for the sin of humankind and that Jesus' resurrection confirmed him as being the nation's Messiah and the world's Lord.

Third, Saul came to appreciate that if Jesus is the nation's Messiah and the fulfillment of Israel's ancient hope, then traditional eschatology, rather than merely dwelling on the future, must be restructured to emphasize the realized and inaugurated factors associated with Jesus of Nazareth and focus on the personal and transcendent dimensions instead of just the historical.



Fourth, in the question "Why do you persecute me?" Saul came to realize something of the organic and indissoluble unity that exists between Christ and his own. For although he believed he was only persecuting the followers of Jesus, the heavenly interpretation of his action was that he was persecuting the risen Christ himself.

Fifth (though hardly final), Saul came to understand that he had a mission to carry out for Christ. Its details, to be sure, were first given in general terms by Ananias of Damascus (vv.15–16) and only later set forth more fully by various visions and providential circumstances (cf. comments on chs. 13–28). But though it was not till later that Saul understood that his mission involved the equality of both Jews and Gentiles before God and the legitimacy of a direct approach to the Gentile world, it was his constant habit to relate his Gentile commission firmly and directly to his encounter with Christ on the Damascus road.

7–9 The effect on Saul's traveling companions of his encounter with Christ was dramatic. Acts 26 says that they fell to the ground at the flash of heavenly light. Here we are told that after getting up they "stood there speechless." Evidently they were able to regain a semblance of composure and thus lead Saul into Damascus. For Saul, however, for whom the spoken message was even more traumatic than the light, the experience was overpowering. Physically, as his system reacted to the emotional shock, he became blind for three days, during which time he neither ate nor drank while waiting for further instructions.

2. Ananias's ministry to Saul (9:10–19a)

10–16 Ananias was a Jew of Damascus and a believer in Jesus. Here (v.10) he is called a "disciple" and presented as one who immediately recognizes the Lord Christ and who speaks to him in a vision, while in 22:12 he is called "a devout observer of the law and highly respected by all the Jews." From his

Damascus represented much more to Saul, the strict Pharisee, than another stop on his campaign of repression. It was the hub of a vast commercial network with far-flung lines of caravan trade reaching into north Syria, Mesopotamia, Anatolia, Persia and Arabia. If the new "Way" of Christianity flourished in Damascus, it would quickly reach all these places. From the viewpoint of the Sanhedrin and of Saul, the arch-persecutor, it had to be stopped in Damascus.

The city itself was a veritable oasis, situated in a plain watered by the Biblical rivers Abana and Pharpar. Roman architecture overlaid the Hellenistic town plan with a great temple to Jupiter and a mile-long colonnaded street, the "Straight Street" of Ac 9:11. The city gates and a section of the town wall may still be seen today, as well as the lengthy bazaar that runs along the line of the ancient street.

The dominant political figure at the time of Paul's escape from Damascus (2 Co 11:32-33) was Aretas IV, king of the Nabateans (9 B.C.-A.D. 40), though normally the Decapolis cities were attached to the province of Syria and were thus under the influence of Rome.

statement that he had heard reports about Saul's persecutions in Jerusalem (v.13), it may be inferred that he was not one of the Hellenistic Christians who had formerly lived in Jerusalem but that he lived in Damascus. We are not told anything about how he became a Christian.

The Lord Jesus directed Ananias: "Go to the house of Judas on Straight Street and ask for a man from Tarsus named Saul, for he is praying." Straight Street was an east-west street and is still one of the main thoroughfares of Damascus. Jesus' words identified Saul as one who was praying. For Luke, his hero Paul was a man of prayer (cf. 16:25; 20:36; 22:17), as was Jesus in his earthly ministry (cf. Lk 3:21; 6:12; 9:18, 28; 11:1; 22:41). Probably in the religious experience of Paul, his devotion to prayer was the most important link between his life as a Pharisee and as a Christian.

It takes no great imaginative power to appreciate the reasons for Ananias's hesitation in going at once to meet Saul. Even the prophets of old had doubts about the appropriateness of what they understood to be God's will, particularly when it seemed so contrary to what might be expected. But Luke lays emphasis on Ananias's hesitancy, not just to humanize his narrative, but also to impress on his readers the magnitude of the change in Saul's life and to highlight the heaven-ordained nature of his later Christian mission: (1) instead of a persecutor, he is Christ's "chosen instrument"; (2) instead of a concern for Israel alone, his mission is "to carry my [Jesus'] name before the Gentiles and their kings and before the people of Israel"; and (3) instead of prominence and glory, it is necessary for him "to suffer for my [Jesus'] name." In highlighting these three features, Luke has, in effect, given a theological précis of all he will portray historically in chs. 13–28—a précis that also summarizes the self-consciousness of Paul himself as reflected in his own letters.

17–19a Ananias was obedient to his Lord and followed the directions given in the vision. He was undoubtedly comforted by knowing that Saul too had been given a vision about his coming (v.12), though he must have proceeded with some trepidation. Going to the house of Judas on Straight Street, he entered, laid his hands on Saul, and greeted him with the fraternal greeting "brother"—believing, it seems, that whomever Jesus had accepted was his brother. He spoke about Jesus, who had appeared to Saul on the Damascus Road, and about the restoration of Saul's sight and his being filled with the Holy Spirit. And "immediately," Luke tells us, "something like scales fell from Saul's eyes, and he could see again. He got up and was baptized, and after taking some food, he regained his strength."

We would like to know more about the persons and details of this event, but this is all Luke records. What he says, however, is significant. As the Gospel advanced to the Gentiles, the main missioner was converted to Christ and given his commission in a manner that fully showed the heaven-ordained nature of his conversion and call—a manner that did not make him dependent on the Jerusalem church for either his conversion or call, yet brought him into essential unity with all those who are Christ's.

3. Saul's conversion evidenced in Damascus (9:19b–25)

It may seem strange for Luke to include in his account of Saul's conversion a sketchy report of his preaching Christ in Damascus and his unceremonious exit from the city. But Luke wants to emphasize the unprecedented nature of Saul's about-face and the genuineness of his conversion. In clarifying his purpose, Luke (1) presents Saul as proclaiming Jesus as both "Son of God" and "Messiah," (2) depicts his hearers as being so astonished that they had to ask themselves if this was indeed the same man who had been persecuting Christians, and (3) highlights the fact that the persecution he once headed was now directed against him.

Of more importance, however, is the fact that the purposes of Paul in Gal 1:15–24 and Luke here are different, with these purposes affecting both the selection and shaping of each writer's presentation. Thus in his desire to assert the revelational nature of his Gentile ministry, Paul emphasized in Galatians that he was not dependent upon "any man" (Gal 1:16) for his distinctive gospel, and particularly not upon the Jerusalem apostles. Luke, however, while also interested in depicting the heaven-ordained nature of Paul's conversion and commission, is concerned here to stress the genuineness of Saul's conversion and call. This he does by speaking of the new convert's distinctly Christian proclamation in the synagogues of Damascus and his persecution by the Jews of the city because of his preaching (neither these are ruled out by Gal 1:15–24).

A likely historical reconstruction is as follows: (1) Saul's conversion and commission (9:1–19a); (2) his preaching in the synagogues of Damascus for a time immediately following his conversion (9:19b–22); (3) his prolonged residence in Arabia (Gal 1:17); (4) his return to Damascus (9:23–25); and (5) his first visit to Jerusalem as a Christian some three years after his conversion, with his subsequent travel to Caesarea, Syria, and Cilicia (9:26–30; Gal 1:18–24).

The content of Saul's preaching in the Damascus synagogues focused on Jesus: "Jesus is the Son of God" (v.20) and "Jesus is the Christ" (v.22), i.e., the "Messiah." That Saul could preach such a message immediately after his conversion is not impossible because the certainty of Jesus' messiahship was deeply implanted in his soul by his experience on the Damascus road. And while he had much to understand about the implications of commitment to Jesus as Israel's Messiah, he was certainly in a position to proclaim Jesus' messianic status with conviction and enthusiasm.

Nor is it surprising that Saul also spoke of Jesus as "the Son of God," though this is the only occurrence in Acts of this Christological title. In a number of NT passages the titles "Messiah" and "Son of God" are brought together (cf. Mt 16:16; 26:63; Lk 4:41; Jn 11:27; 20:31), for the Anointed One par excellence expressed uniquely that loving obedience inherent in the Hebraic understanding of sonship. That is how Paul used the titles "Son" and "Son of God" some fifteen times later in his own letters (e.g., Ro 1:3–4, 9; 1Co 1:9; 2Co 1:19; Gal 1:16; et. al).

Those who heard Saul preach, Luke says, were "astonished" and "baffled." But with his interest in advance and growth (cf. Lk 2:52), Luke also says that "Saul grew more and more powerful," suggesting both a growth in his understanding of the meaning of commitment to Jesus as Messiah and Son of God and an increasing ability to demonstrate the validity of his proclamation.

23–25 Luke's expression "after many days had gone by" probably means three years later (see Gal 1:18). Paul himself refers to his escape from Damascus in 2Co 11:32–33. Both Luke and Paul clearly state that Saul's preaching stirred such opposition that plans were laid to kill him. The persecutor became the persecuted, but rather ingeniously, he was able to elude his opponents' designs.

Acts uses "disciple" (GK 3412) almost exclusively to denote the members of the Christian community (e.g., 6:1–2, 7; 9:19; 11:26; 13:52). The one exception to the normal usage in Acts is here in v.25, where this word is translated and used of "followers" of Saul; it suggests that his proclamation of Jesus had a favorable response among at least some. One of these converts, it seems, had a home situated on the city wall, from whose window Saul was let down in a basket outside the wall, thus eluding his opponents. From there, he evidently made his way directly to Jerusalem.

4. Saul's reception at Jerusalem (9:26–30)

As in the narrative concerning the evangelization of Samaria (8:4–25) and the later accounts of the conversion of Cornelius (10:1–11:18) and the founding of the church at Antioch of Syria (11:19–30)—in which not only are features of advance and development stressed but also continuity with the mother church at Jerusalem—Luke ends his account of the conversion of Saul of Tarsus by telling of his reception by the Christians at Jerusalem. As in Luke's depiction of Saul's preaching in Damascus (vv.19b–25), here the material, when compared with Paul's own account in Gal 1:18–24 of his first visit to Jerusalem as a Christian, entails a number of problems relating to historical correlations—probably for much the same reasons as in vv.19b–25, though heightened here by Paul's purpose in Galatians to stress his lack of dependence upon the Jerusalem church whereas Luke's purpose is to trace out lines of continuity.

26–28 Saul's arrival at Jerusalem as a Christian was three years after his conversion (Gal 1:18). Being persona non grata among his former associates and suspected by Christians, he probably stayed at his sister's home in the city (cf. 23:16). We can understand why his reception by his former colleagues might have been less than welcome. But that the apostles and other Christians in Jerusalem were leery of him does raise questions. Certainly they must have heard of his conversion and his preaching in Damascus. Yet, it seems, they never knew him personally, either as a persecutor or as a Christian; and stories about his motives and activities during a three-year period might well have become distorted. Many might, in fact, have asked why, if Saul had really become a Christian, he remained aloof from the Twelve and the Jerusalem congregation for such a long time. We may wish, and might even have expected, that there had been more openness toward Saul the convert on the part of the Jerusalem Christians. History, however, has shown that minority movements under persecution frequently become defensive and suspicious of news that sounds too good.

It was Barnabas, Luke says, who was willing to risk accepting Saul as a genuine believer and who built a bridge of trust between him and the Jerusalem apostles. This is certainly in character with what is said about him elsewhere in Acts (cf. 4:36–37; 11:22–30; 13:1–14:28; 15:2–4, 12, 22). In presenting Saul to the apostles, Barnabas told what Saul had seen and heard on the road and that he was now preaching "in the name of Jesus" in Damascus itself—thus summarizing Luke's account of Saul's conversion and explicitly using his activity in Damascus to support the genuineness of his conversion. So with Barnabas's help, Saul and the Jerusalem apostles were brought into fellowship.

In light of Paul's own insistence in Gal 1:18–20 that he saw only Peter and James on this first Jerusalem visit, Luke's use of the term "apostles" must be considered a generalizing plural to be taken more broadly than "the Twelve." Likewise, in view of Paul's statement in Gal 1:18 that he stayed with Peter for fifteen days, Luke's claim that he "stayed with them and moved about freely in Jerusalem" must be seen as somewhat overstated. Probably we are not far wrong in reconstructing the situation as follows: Saul resided with his sister's family on his first visit to Jerusalem as a Christian; through the aid of Barnabas he came to visit with Peter for fifteen days and to meet James as well; broadly speaking, his reception by the Christians he met was cordial, though there undoubtedly still existed some fears about him within the Christian congregation.

29–30 At Jerusalem Saul took up a ministry to Jews in the Hellenistic synagogues there. It was a ministry that had been neglected, it appears, since Stephen's death and the expulsion of the Hellenistic Jewish Christians. But it was one that Saul may have felt himself particularly suited to, coming as he did from Tarsus in Cilicia and having probably carried on such a ministry at Damascus. In so doing, however, he soon faced the same opposition Stephen had faced, and he seems to have gotten into the same difficulty Stephen did. The Jerusalem church apparently did not care to go through again the same kind of thing that followed Stephen's preaching. So when they realized what was taking place in Saul's newly begun ministry in Jerusalem, "they took him down to Caesarea and sent him off to Tarsus." Saul took it as by divine approval, for in his defense in Ac 22 he speaks of having received a vision in the Jerusalem temple that not only confirmed his apostleship to the Gentiles but also warned him to flee Jerusalem (22:17–21).

Saul is not mentioned in the period between these experiences in Jerusalem and his ministry at Antioch (11:25–30), though from his words in Gal 1:21–24 it seems fairly certain that he continued his witness to Diaspora Jews in Caesarea and his hometown of Tarsus. The cordiality of the Christians in Caesarea at the end of his third missionary journey may imply that Saul had an earlier association with Philip and the believers there. Many of the hardships and trials he enumerates in 2Co 11:23–27 may stem from situations in Caesarea and Tarsus during those days, and perhaps also the ecstatic experience of 2Co 12:1–4.

D. A Summary Statement (9:31)

31 Luke's second panel of material on the martyrdom of Stephen, the early ministries of Philip, and the conversion of Saul ends with a summary statement that speaks of the church throughout Judea, Galilee, and Samaria (an expression for all of the Jewish homeland of Palestine) enjoying a time of peace after the turbulence resulting from what happened to these three pivotal figures. Here also he insists that the church in the homeland, instead of being torn apart, "was strengthened; and encouraged by the Holy Spirit, it grew in numbers, living in the fear of the Lord."

Panel 3—Advances of the Gospel in Palestine-Syria (9:32–12:24)

In his portrayal of the gradual widening of the Christian mission from its strictly Jewish beginnings to its ultimate Gentile outreach, Luke presents in this third panel three episodes of the Gospel's advance: (1) the ministry of Peter in the maritime plain of Palestine (9:32–43), (2) the conversion of a Roman centurion and his friends at Caesarea (10:1–11:18), and (3) the founding of the church at Antioch of Syria (11:19–30). Two notes are sounded in these episodes of advance. (1) The Gospel was now spreading into areas more distant from Jerusalem than before. (2) The second, and undoubtedly the more important, has to do with the attitude of the converts and that of the missioners. Then, before moving on to speak of the distinctive advances of the Gospel within the Gentile world through the ministry of his hero Paul, Luke again returns to an account of the circumstances at Jerusalem and gives two vignettes of God's continued working on behalf of his people there (12:1–23). Luke seems to be trying to make the point that though his interest is in tracing the movement of the early Christian mission from Jerusalem to Rome, his readers are not to assume that God was finished with Jerusalem Christianity or that his divine activity within the Jewish world had come to an end—a point all too often ignored by Christians since then. Finally, Luke summarizes the material in this third panel with the following statement: "But the word of God continued to increase and spread" (12:24).

A. The Ministry of Peter in the Maritime Plain of Palestine (9:32–43)

Luke's rationale for the inclusion of Peter's miracles at Lydda and Joppa has often been debated. Most likely he had two goals in mind. (1) The vignettes of the healing of Aeneas and the raising of Dorcas shift the focus of Luke's narrative from Jerusalem to the west country of Palestine, thereby setting the stage for the conversion of Cornelius at Caesarea. (2) Luke may also be suggesting that with Peter's ministry in the maritime plain, the evangelization of Palestine was completed and it was therefore time to look farther afield.

1. Aeneas healed at Lydda (9:32–35)

32 Lydda was located twenty-five miles northwest of Jerusalem, at the crucial intersection of the highways from Egypt to Syria and from coastal Joppa to Jerusalem. At this time Peter was engaged in an itinerant ministry in the western part of Palestine, somewhat like his earlier preaching in Samaria (cf. 8:25). In the course of his travels, he visited "the saints" in the important commercial center of Lydda. However they came to commit themselves to Jesus as God's Messiah, Peter viewed them as within the sphere of his ministry—even though many of them were probably less scrupulous in keeping the Mosaic law than Jews of the capital city.

33 At Lydda Peter came upon Aeneas, a paralytic who had been bedridden for eight years. Luke does not say that Aeneas was a Jew nationally or a Christian by profession, though presumably he was both. It would hardly have been consistent with Luke's purpose to show Peter ministering to a Gentile before his encounter with Cornelius, and the "there" of the sentence has as its antecedent the community of saints at Lydda and not just the city itself.

34–35 Peter's words, "Jesus Christ heals you. Get up and take care of your mat," express in Greek the idea that "this moment Jesus Christ heals you." Aeneas responded immediately to Peter's command. News of his healing spread throughout Lydda and northward into the Plain of Sharon (the largest of the maritime plains of northern Palestine, stretching from Joppa to Mount Carmel). Rather hyperbolically Luke says that "all those who lived in Lydda and Sharon saw him and turned to the Lord." So, Luke tells us, there was a further widening of the Christian mission within the Jewish nation, preparing the way geographically and ideologically for the accounts of Peter's ministry at Joppa in 9:36–43 and at Caesarea in 10:1–48.

2. Dorcas raised at Joppa (9:36–43)

36–39 Joppa (modern Jaffa) was the ancient seaport for Jerusalem. Situated on the coast thirty-five miles northwest of the capital city and ten miles beyond Lydda, it possesses the only natural harbor on the Mediterranean between Egypt and Ptolemais (see 2Ch 2:16; Jnh 1:3). Its rival in NT times was Caesarea, thirty miles to the north, which Herod the Great, because the people of Joppa hated him, built into a magnificent new port city and provincial capital. At Joppa lived a woman called Tabitha (Heb.) or Dorcas (Gk.); both names mean "gazelle." She was a "disciple" and "was always doing good and helping the poor," particularly destitute widows. When she died, the Christians at Joppa sent this message to Peter at Lydda: "Please come at once." Luke does not say what they expected from him or asked him to do. But since (1) Tabitha's body was washed but not anointed for burial and (2) her good deeds were told to Peter when he arrived, they apparently wanted him to restore her to life. Having heard of Aeneas's healing, they seem to have thought it merely a slight extension of divine power to raise the dead.

40–42 Peter had been instrumental in a number of physical healings (cf. 3:1–10; 5:12–16; 9:32–35) and even pronounced the death sentence on Ananias and Sapphira (cf. 5:1–11). Yet raising people from the dead was hardly a common feature of his ministry. Nevertheless, knowing himself to be an apostle of Jesus empowered by the Holy Spirit—and probably remembering his Lord's raising of Jairus's daughter (cf. Mk 5:21–24, 35–43)—Peter responded to the urgent call. As he had seen Jesus do in the case of Jairus's daughter, he ordered the mourners out of the room, prayed, and then spoke these words: "Tabitha, get up" (cf. Mk 5:41). When she opened her eyes and sat up, he took her by the hand, helped her to her feet, and presented her alive to the Christians who stood by. It was an exceptional exhibit of God's mercy and the Spirit's power, and "many people believed in the Lord."

43 This verse serves as a geographical and ideological hinge between the accounts of Peter's miracles in the maritime plain and the account of Cornelius's conversion at Caesarea. Instead of returning ten miles to Lydda, Peter remained at Joppa "for some time" (cf. 8:11), where the messengers from Cornelius later found him. Of greater significance, however, is the fact that Peter stayed there with a man called Simon, a tanner who was presumably working in his own home. Luke's stress on this feature of Peter's lifestyle provides a preface to 10:1–11:18.

B. The Conversion of Cornelius at Caesarea (10:1–11:18)

With the range of the Christian mission steadily broadening, the time had come for the Gospel to cross the barrier that separated Jews from Gentiles and to be presented directly to Gentiles. Thus Luke takes up the story of the conversion of Cornelius, the importance of which in his eyes can be judged in part by the space he devotes to it—sixty-six verses in all.

Four matters in the account of Cornelius's conversion receive special emphasis and in turn provide insight into Luke's purpose for presenting this material. (1) The early church resisted the idea of Gentiles being either directly evangelized or accepted into the Christian fellowship apart from any relationship to Judaism (cf. 10:14, 28; 11:2–3, 8). (2) God himself was the one who introduced the Gentiles into the church and miraculously showed his approval (cf. 10:3, 11–16, 19–20, 22b, 30–33, 44–46; 11:5–10, 13, 15–17). (3) Peter, the leader of the Jerusalem apostles, not Paul, was the human instrument in opening the door to the Gentiles (cf. 10:23, 34–43, 47–48; 11:15–17). (4) The Jerusalem church subsequently accepted a Gentile's conversion to Jesus the Messiah, apart from any allegiance to Judaism, for God had so obviously validated it (cf. 11:18).

1. Cornelius's vision (10:1–8)

1 Caesarea is in the center of the coastal Plain of Sharon in northern Palestine, on the shores of the Mediterranean, some sixty-five miles northwest of Jerusalem. It was named in honor of Augustus Caesar (cf. Lk 2:1). Herod the Great made the harbor into a magnificent seaport and the village into his provincial capital. He deepened the harbor, built a breakwater against the southern gales, constructed an imposing city with an amphitheater and a temple in honor of Rome and Augustus, brought in fresh water through an aqueduct that ran over stately brick arches, and established a garrison of soldiers to protect not only the harbor and city but also the fresh water supply.

The name Cornelius was common in the Roman world from 82 B.C. onwards, when Cornelius Sulla liberated ten thousand slaves, all of whom took their patron's name as they established themselves in Roman society. Probably, therefore, the Cornelius of this story was a descendant of one of these freedmen. He is identified as a centurion of the Italian cohort, i.e., a noncommissioned officer who had worked his way up through the ranks to take command of a group of soldiers within a Roman legion. A cohort numbered anywhere from three hundred to six hundred men in size, being officially always the latter.

2 Cornelius was "devout [GK 2356] and God-fearing"—characteristics also attributed to his entire household (a "household" included both one's immediate family and one's personal servants). Perhaps we are to understand by "God-fearing" that Cornelius was a near-proselyte to Judaism or a so-called Proselyte of the Gate (cf. comments on 8:27–28), though more likely it simply means something like "a religious man," especially in view of Luke's addition of "devout" and "righteous" in v.22. From his report of Peter's use of this expression for Cornelius in v.35 ("men from every nation who fear him [God] and do what is right"), it seems that Cornelius was a Gentile who, having realized the bankruptcy of paganism, sought to worship a monotheistic God, practice a form of prayer, and lead a moral life, apart from any necessary association with Judaism. It was, then, to such a spiritually minded Gentile, Luke tells us, that God first reached out his hand in the advance of the Christian mission.

3–4 "One day about three in the afternoon," an angel of God appeared to Cornelius in a vision and called him by name. The time element here emphasizes that the vision happened in broad daylight. In response, Cornelius "stared in fear" and could only blurt out the words "What is it, Lord?" While the Greek title kyrios ("Lord"; GK 3261) was used in antiquity for everything from polite address to worshipful acclamation (see comment on 9:3–6), Cornelius undoubtedly meant it in some sense of worshipful acclaim—even though he might not have had any firm idea of whom he was addressing (cf. 9:5). In his consternation he heard the reassuring words that his prayers and alms had arisen as a memorial before God (cf. Lev 2:2; Php 4:18; Heb 13:15–16), a biblical and traditional way of saying that he was commended before God and that God was attentive to his situation.

5–6 Cornelius was told to send to Joppa for Simon Peter. The surname Peter distinguishes the apostle from his host Simon the tanner, whose house was by the sea. No indication is given as to why Peter was to be summoned. Instead, the emphasis is on the fact that Cornelius was prepared to respond to God.

7–8 Cornelius's response was immediate. Calling two of his household servants and one of his soldiers and telling them what had occurred and what he had been told to do, he sent them to Joppa to bring back Peter. The servants were probably two of those already mentioned in v.2 as part of Cornelius's household; and the soldier is identified as being also "devout," one to whom the full characterization of v.2 (also vv.22 and 35) also applied.

2. Peter's vision (10:9–16)

9–13 Though Peter was not by training or inclination an overly scrupulous Jew, and though as a Christian his inherited prejudices were wearing thin, he was not prepared to go so far as to minister directly to Gentiles. A special revelation was necessary for that, and Luke now tells how God took the initiative in overcoming Peter's reluctance.

The revelation came to him on the day following Cornelius's vision, as the three from Caesarea were approaching Joppa. About noon Peter went to the roof of the tanner's house to pray, apparently looking not only for solitude but also for shade under an awning and a cooling breeze from the sea. While in prayer, Peter became very hungry and, it seems, somewhat drowsy. As he was waiting for food, he fell into a trance and saw a vision (cf. 10:17, 19; 11:5) of "something like a large sheet being let down to earth by its four corners," on which were "all kinds of four-footed animals, as well as reptiles of the earth and birds of the air." Then he heard a voice say, "Get up, Peter. Kill and eat." Psychologically, the details of the vision may be explained in terms of (1) Peter's increasing perplexity about Jewish-Gentile relations within various Christian congregations of the maritime plain, (2) the flapping awning over him (or perhaps, the full sail of a boat out on the sea), and (3) his gnawing hunger. God frequently reveals himself not only in but also by means of our human situations. And Peter took what the voice said as a message from God—a message in the form of an almost inscrutable riddle, but one soon to be clarified by both word and event.

14 Peter's shock and repugnance are expressed in his words: "Surely not, Lord"—a response like that of the prophet Ezekiel when called upon by God to eat unclean food among the Gentiles (Eze 4:14). While not overly scrupulous, Peter nonetheless had always observed the basic dietary restrictions of Lev 11, which distinguished clean and unclean animals. And while clean animals were represented in the sheet, Peter was scandalized by the unholy mixture of clean and unclean and by the fact that no distinctions were made in the command to "kill and eat." Indeed, it was a command given him by one he acclaimed as "Lord"—perhaps recognizable to him as the voice of Jesus. But that did not leave him any less repelled by the idea.

15–16 The voice told Peter, "Do not call anything impure that God has made clean." The particular application had to do with nullifying Jewish dietary laws for Christians in accord with Jesus' remarks on the subject in Mk 7:17–23. But Peter was soon to learn that the range of the vision's message extended much more widely, touching directly on Jewish-Gentile relations as he had known them and on those relations in ways he could never have anticipated. Three times this interchange took place, and three times the message was indelibly impressed on Peter's subconscious. Luke then says, "The sheet was taken back to heaven."

3. Messengers from Cornelius arrive at Joppa (10:17–23a)

17–18 While Peter was recovering from the shock of the vision and its message, the men from Cornelius had found the tanner's house. It had immediate access from the street through a gateway or vestibule. Thus at the gate the messengers shouted out their inquiry for anyone within earshot to hear: "Is Simon who is known as Peter staying here?"

19–20 But on the roof of the tanner's house, Peter was still so deep in thought about the vision that even their shouting and calling out his name failed to rouse him. Rather, the Spirit told him of the messengers' presence and then urged him to go with them. "For I have sent them," he said. A question naturally arises about the relation of the "angel of God" that appeared to Cornelius (10:3–6, 22, 30; 11:13), "the voice" that spoke to Peter (10:13–15; 11:7–9), and "the Spirit" who urges him to go with the messengers from Cornelius. But the question, though legitimate, is almost unanswerable because it is by the Holy Spirit that the ascended Christ manifests his presence to his own. That is, we cannot draw any sharp lines between the angel of God, the Holy Spirit, and the ascended Christ (cf. also 8:26, 29, 39; 16:6–7). It appears in even such closely reasoned didactic statements on the relation of Christ and the Spirit as Ro 8:9–11 and 2Co 3:17–18.

21–23a In response to the Spirit's urging, and probably by means of an outside stairway, Peter went down to meet the messengers. After he identified himself and asked why they had come, they told him of their master, Cornelius, of the angel's visitation, and of their mission to bring Peter back so that he might tell their master what he had to say. In their response they characterized Cornelius as not only "a righteous and God-fearing man" (cf. comments on 10:2) but also as one whose personal qualities were witnessed to "by all the Jewish people." Then Peter, in obedience to the command of the vision, received these Gentiles into the house as his guests, acting (no doubt with the tanner's permission) more as a host than a lodger.

4. Peter's reception by Cornelius (10:23b–33)

23b–24 The conversation in the tanner's house that evening must have been a lively one, with many of the Joppa believers joining in the discussion of the strange visions. Six of the Joppa believers accompanied Peter to Caesarea the next day (cf. 11:12), a wise action in view of the questions that would later be raised at Jerusalem. So the party of ten set out for Caesarea. It apparently took them longer to cover the thirty miles than the messengers had taken earlier because they did not get to Caesarea till the following day. Cornelius was expecting them and had drawn together a group of relatives and close friends to hear Peter.

25–26 As Peter was brought into the centurion's home past the gatehouse and then into the courtyard, Cornelius came from his living quarters to meet him. He fell at Peter's feet and offered him "reverence" (GK 4686)—doubtless an expression of his belief that there was something supernatural about Peter. But Peter, not only unaccustomed to such honors but brought up to consider them blasphemous, ordered him to stand up and assured him: "I am only a man myself" (cf. 14:14–15; Rev 19:10; 22:8–9).

27–29 In Cornelius's living quarters Peter found a large group waiting to hear what he had to say. Perhaps self-consciously, he began by saying that Jewish law prohibited a Jew from associating with Gentiles. Admittedly, this was an ideal representation of the Jewish position, for Jewish ethical law contained a number of provisions for Jewish-Gentile business partnerships. But such contacts made a Jew ceremonially unclean, as did entering Gentiles' buildings or touching their possessions. Above all, it was forbidden to accept the hospitality of Gentiles and eat with them, particularly because Gentiles did not tithe. But, Peter said, God had taught him in a vision not to call anyone impure or unclean; so now he was associating with them without traditional scruples. Then he asked, "May I ask why you sent for me?"

30–33 Cornelius told all about his vision, described how he sent for Peter, and invited him to relate "everything the Lord has commanded you to tell us." Few preachers have ever had a more receptive audience than Peter had on this occasion.

5. Peter's sermon in Cornelius's house (10:34–43)

Peter's sermon in Cornelius's house is a précis of the apostolic kerygma. It is similar structurally and in content to his earlier sermons in 2:14–40 and 3:11–26, though it contains more information about Jesus' precrucifixion ministry than those two sermons (cf. also 4:8–12; 5:29–32). Peter told more about Jesus' earthly ministry because a Gentile audience, even though knowing something about Jesus of Nazareth from living in Palestine, would require more details of Jesus' life and work than a Palestinian Jewish audience would.

34–35 The sermon is prefaced by the words, "Opening his mouth, Peter said" (lit. tr.). This is one way to introduce a weighty utterance (cf. Mt 5:2; 13:35; Ac 8:35); and in Luke's eyes, what Peter was about to say was indeed momentous in sweeping away centuries of racial prejudice. It begins by Peter's statement that God does not show racial "favoritism" (cf. Ro 2:11; Eph 6:9; Col 3:25; Jas 2:1; 1Pe 1:17) "but accepts men from every nation who fear him and do what is right." While some consciousness of this may be implicit in Israel's history and at times may have been expressed by her prophets (cf. Am 9:7; Mic 6:8), it was only by means of a revelational clarification of what had earlier been considered highly enigmatic (a "mystery"; cf. Eph 3:4–6) that Peter came to appreciate the racial challenge of the Gospel.

36 The Greek of vv.36–38 is syntactically awkward, probably stemming from Peter himself as he spoke before his Gentile audience in somewhat "broken" Greek. The apostle captions his sermon as "the message God sent to the people of Israel, telling the good news of peace through Jesus Christ, who is Lord of all." This caption contains three emphases that set the tone for what follows. (1) It is a divine revelation, a message from God. (2) Peter emphasizes the proclamation of the Gospel "to the people of Israel," its immediate recipients. (3) His third emphasis relates the bringing of that Gospel to the Gentile world in terms comprehensible to Gentiles, characterized by the expression "Lord of all" (both Jews and Gentiles). This phrase was a pagan title for deity, but it was rebaptized by the early Christians to become an appropriate christological title (cf. Col 1:15–20).

37–41 Peter begins his sermon with a resumé of Jesus' life and work during his earthly ministry. Though Peter assumes that his hearers already know something about this ministry through living in Palestine, he proceeds to summarize it in greater detail than anywhere else in his recorded preaching. In scope and emphasis, the account is much like the portrayal of Jesus' ministry in Mark's gospel. It begins with John the Baptist, moves on to Jesus' anointing with the Holy Spirit, refers to Jesus' many acts of divine power in Galilee, alludes to his continued ministry throughout Palestine and in Jerusalem, stresses his crucifixion, and concludes with a declaration of his resurrection and its verification by his appearances to chosen followers.

As it stands before us, the sermon is only a summary of what Peter actually said at the time. Originally it may have contained a number of examples of Jesus' acts of kindness and healing, such as those recorded in the Synoptic Gospels. In addition, as a summary of what Peter said, it shows several interests of Luke who put the sermon into its present form: (1) the influence of Isa 61:1 in v.38, an OT passage Luke highlighted in his theme paragraph of Lk 4:14–30 at the start of his two-volume writing; (2) the importance of the apostolic witness in establishing the Christian tradition (see vv.39–41); (3) Luke's interest in Jesus' postresurrection eating and drinking with his disciples (cf. Lk 24:41–43; Ac 1:4)) as a convincing proof of his physical presence.

42–43 Peter ends his sermon by stating that the risen Christ has commanded his apostles to preach "to the people" and to testify about his divine appointment as "judge of the living and the dead." The word "people" probably refers to "the Jewish people." And until then the early church knew no other mission. But then Peter went on to speak of the OT prophets testifying about this risen Lord and saying that "everyone who believes in him receives forgiveness of sins through his name." It was this reference to "everyone who believes in him" that seems to have broken through the traditional barrier between Jews and Gentiles (see next comment).

6. Gentiles receive the Holy Spirit (10:44–48)

44 As Peter was "speaking these words, the Holy Spirit came on all who heard the message." Most likely "these words" refer back to "everyone who believes in him receives forgiveness of sins through his name." Luke suggests that it was this phrase that struck like a thunderbolt into the consciousness of the assembled Gentiles, releasing their pent-up emotions and emboldening them to think that they could believe and so receive the blessings promised to Israel. With their reception of that inclusive message, the Holy Spirit came upon the Gentile congregation gathered there, just as he had come upon the disciples at Pentecost.

45–46 The six Jewish believers who were there with Peter were astonished at what they saw and heard. For in accepting these Gentiles and bestowing his Holy Spirit on them, God had providentially attested his action by the same sign of tongues as at Pentecost. This gift at Pentecost should probably be understood as distinguishable languages, because the tongues were immediately recognized as dialects then current (cf. comment on 2:4). Here, however, an outburst of foreign languages would have fallen on untuned ears and failed to be convincing. So we should probably view "the tongues" (GK 1185) here as being the ecstatic utterances that Paul later describes in 1Co 12–14. Undoubtedly the sign of tongues was given primarily for the sake of the Jewish believers right there in Cornelius's house. But it was also given for Jerusalem believers, who would later hear of what happened, so that all would see the conversion of these Gentiles as being entirely of God and none would revert to their old prejudices and relegate these new converts to the role of second-class Christians.

47–48 Peter may not have been much of an abstract thinker. But to his great credit he was ready to follow the divine initiative, if only he could be sure that God was really at work. So, convinced by God and consistent with his conviction about the logical connections between Christian conversion, water baptism, and the baptism of the Holy Spirit (cf. comments on 2:38), Peter calls for the Gentiles who have received the baptism of the Spirit to be baptized with water "in the name of Jesus Christ." While Acts 2 and 8 indicate that water baptism does not take the place of the Spirit's baptism but that the two go hand-in-hand with conversion, so vv.47–48 speak of the baptism of the Holy Spirit not as supplanting baptism with water but rather as being the spiritual reality to which water baptism testifies. Thus the baptism of these Gentile converts pointed to a new spiritual reality in their lives. But it also had immense significance for Peter and his six companions. For in baptizing these Gentiles, Peter and those with him confessed that God in his sovereignty does bring Gentiles directly into relationship with Jesus Christ, apart from any prior relationship with Judaism. Peter may have remained uncertain as to just how Cornelius's new-found faith should be expressed in worship and service and how it would be related to the Roman social order and to Judaism. But now that God had broken down the traditional barriers between them, Peter was content to stay with them in Caesarea "for a few days."

7. The response of the Jerusalem church (11:1–18)

The conversion of Cornelius was a landmark in the history of the Gospel's advance from its strictly Jewish beginnings to its penetration of the Roman Empire. True, it did not settle any of the issues relating to Jewish-Gentile relations within the church, nor did Jewish believers take it as a precedent for a direct outreach to Gentiles. But it did show that the sovereign God was not confined to the traditional forms of Judaism and that he could bring a Gentile directly into relationship with himself through Jesus Christ, apart from any prior commitment to distinctive Jewish beliefs or lifestyle. Cornelius's conversion is important to Luke not only because of the Gospel's advance but also because of the response of the Christians in Jerusalem to it. Amid his thesis of development and advance, Luke is interested in emphasizing lines of continuity and areas of agreement within the early church. So he takes pains to point out here, as in his account of the conversion of the Samaritans (cf. 8:14–25), that the leadership of the Jerusalem church accepted the validity of Cornelius's conversion. And that acceptance was of as great importance in validating a later Gentile mission as the event itself.

1–3 News of Peter's direct approach to Gentiles at Caesarea and his acceptance of them apart from the strictures of Judaism reached Jerusalem and the believers there before Peter himself did. This news caused great alarm both within the church and among the Jewish populace generally. The Hellenistic believers had stirred up much antagonism by their liberal attitudes toward the tenets of Jewish popular piety (cf. 6:8–7:56). The immediate consequences were the martyrdom of Stephen and the expulsion of the believers from areas under Sanhedrin control (cf. 7:57–8:3). Now if it were really true that Peter, the leading member of the apostolic band, had gone further in disregarding the traditional laws of Judaism in favor of a direct association with Gentiles, what goodwill still remained toward believers in Jerusalem would be quickly dissipated. The practical implications for the existence and the mission of the Christian church in Jerusalem were grave, and such practical considerations undoubtedly led to principial questions. Peter's return to Jerusalem, therefore, was like lighting a match in highly combustible air. "The circumcised believers" (i.e, "Jewish Christians") immediately confronted Peter and charged, "You went into the house of uncircumcised men and ate with them." This charge, while traditionally worded, was tantamount to saying that Peter had set aside Christianity's Jewish features and thereby seriously endangered its relation with the nation.

4–17 Peter defended his actions by recounting his experiences at Joppa and Caesarea, with an emphasis on (1) the divine initiative in all that transpired and (2) his inability to withstand God. Thus he recounts the details of the vision that came to him at Joppa (vv.5–10), of his reception by Cornelius (vv.11–14), and of the Spirit's coming upon the group gathered in Cornelius's house (vv.15–17). It was the Lord, insisted Peter, who gave him the vision and who explained its meaning. It was the Spirit who told him to have "no hesitation" to go with the messengers to Caesarea and enter Cornelius's house. And it was God who took the initiative by baptizing Cornelius and his companions with the Holy Spirit. Therefore, concluded Peter, "Who was I to think that I could oppose God?"

By giving a second witness to this story of the Gospel reaching out to Gentiles (cf. introductory comments on 2:42–12:24), likely taken from a different source than ch. 10, Luke is providing greater support for his theme of the legitimacy of a mission to Gentiles.

18 On hearing about Peter's experiences, the Christians at Jerusalem "remained silent" and "praised God." This probably means that his critics, at least for the moment, were silenced, while those more receptive to God's working acknowledged that Peter was right and credited God rather than human ingenuity for what had happened. In view of what Peter reported, the Jerusalem church could come to no other conclusion than that "God has even granted the Gentiles repentance unto life."

This was a response of momentous importance by the church at Jerusalem, and Luke meant his readers to appreciate it as being as significant in validating a later Gentile mission as Cornelius's conversion itself. But while of vital significance for the acceptance of Gentiles, it said nothing about the many related questions that soon were bound to arise. For example, what lifestyle was appropriate for Gentiles coming to Christ directly out of paganism? How should they relate themselves as Christians to Jewish Christians and to Jews, both of whom followed a Jewish lifestyle? And how should the Jerusalem church relate itself in practice to these new Gentile believers that it had in theory accepted? These are matters the Jerusalem church did not address itself to in ch. 11. Yet such matters were logically involved in its response and were to be taken up again later (cf. 15:1–35).

And just as there were ideological issues left unresolved in the response of the church in ch. 11, so there are also a number of historical matters about which Luke gives us no information, though we would like very much to know. For example, whatever happened to Cornelius and his fellow Gentile Christians after Peter left them? Did they join with Philip and his converts in Caesarea (cf. 8:40) to form a worshiping community there? Or did they somehow inaugurate a distinctive form of Gentile Christian worship? Or, being doubtless all associated in one way or another with the Roman army and the Roman administration in Palestine, were these Gentile believers in Jesus transferred to other posts in the empire by Rome, either through due course or because of their recent alignment with a minority group within Palestine? Luke does not tell us.

Neither does Luke tell us how such a response affected the Jerusalem church itself. Did it lose some goodwill among its Jewish compatriots because it accepted Cornelius? Were there believers within its ranks who felt badly about this decision and who expressed their dissatisfaction—now or later—in ways disruptive for a further Gentile outreach? Was this one reason why the church soon found it appropriate to have as its leader the Pharisaically trained and legally scrupulous James the Just rather than one or more of the apostles (cf. comments on 12:2)? Again, Luke does not tell us, though some of these matters will come to the fore later in Acts.

C. The Church at Antioch of Syria (11:19–30)

Antioch of Syria was founded about 300 B.C. by Seleucus I Nicator, who named it after either his father or his son, both of whom bore the name Antiochus. It was situated on the Orontes River about three hundred miles north of Jerusalem and twenty miles east of the Mediterranean, at the joining of the Lebanon and Taurus mountain ranges where the Orontes breaks through and flows down to the sea. To distinguish it from some fifteen other Asiatic cities built by Seleucus and also named Antioch, it was frequently called "Antioch-on-the-Orontes." During the first Christian century, it was, after Rome and Alexandria, the third largest city in the empire, having a population of more than 500,000. It was a melting pot of Western and Eastern cultures, where Greek and Roman traditions mingled with Semitic, Arab, and Persian influences. The Jewish population is estimated to have been about one-seventh of the total population and had vested rights to follow its own laws within its three or more settlements in and around the city. During the reign of Caligula (A.D. 37–41), however, many Jews were killed; and during the tumultuous period of the middle and late 60s, Jewish acceptance and prosperity in Antioch came to an end.

In Christian history, apart from Jerusalem, no other city of the Roman Empire played as large a part in the early life and fortunes of the church as Antioch of Syria. It was the birthplace of foreign missions (13:2) and the home base for Paul's outreach to the eastern half of the empire. It was the place where those of "the Way" (9:2) were first called "Christians" (11:26) and where the question as to the necessity for Gentile converts to submit to the rite of circumcision first arose (15:1–2; cf. Gal 2:11–21). It had among its earliest teachers such illustrious persons as Barnabas, Paul, and Peter (cf. Gal 2:11–13). In the light of its great importance for the early church, it is surprising that Luke's account of the founding of the church at Syrian Antioch and of the progress of the Gospel there is so compressed.

1. The founding of the church (11:19–26)

19 Luke opens his account of the Gospel's proclamation at Antioch of Syria with the same words with which he began the story of the mission to Samaria in 8:4—a fact that suggests he wants to reach behind his accounts of Peter's ministries at Lydda, Joppa, and Caesarea and start a new strand of history that began with the death of Stephen. From such an opening we should probably understand that the Hellenistic Christians' outreach to Phoenicia, Cyprus, and Antioch was (1) logically parallel to that in Samaria, rather than a continuation of Peter's outreach at Lydda, Joppa, and Caesarea, and (2) chronologically parallel, at least in its early stages, to the accounts in 8:4–11:18. Phoenicia, Cyprus, and Antioch had large Jewish populations; and Syria, like Babylonia, was often considered an integral part of the Jewish homeland because of the many scrupulous Jews living there. Thus since this mission to the north was carried on within areas roughly considered to be Jewish terrain, was mounted by Hellenistic Jewish believers in Jesus, and was directed, at least at first, "only to Jews," Luke presents it here as still being part of the Christian witness to the Jewish world, even though the account speaks of a time when the categories "Jew" and "Gentile" were beginning to break down.

20–21 At Antioch, some of the Hellenistic Jewish Christians "began to speak to Greeks also." Did Luke have in mind Gentiles who had no affiliation whatever with Judaism, or did he have in mind Gentiles who had some kind of relationship with Judaism—perhaps "Proselytes of the Gate," or something like that? Usually Luke speaks of such near-proselytes as "God-fearers" (GK 4936; cf. 13:50; 16:14; 17:4, 17; 18:7). Yet judging by his evident purpose in Acts to present Paul as the first to inaugurate a deliberate policy of a direct approach to Gentiles, one should probably not view these Greeks apart from some contact with Judaism. Peter's activity in Caesarea was indeed a direct approach to Gentiles, but it set no precedent and established no policy for such an outreach. With the merging of cultures and blurring of distinctives that was taking place in Antioch generally, perhaps even Judaism itself faced some problems in drawing a sharp line between Gentiles who had some minimal relationship with the synagogue and those who were considered near-proselytes.

Whatever their exact status, it seems fair to say that Luke did not look on the Greeks in v.20 as simply Gentiles unaffected by the influence of Judaism and that he did not view the Hellenistic Christians' approach to them as preempting the uniqueness of Paul's later Gentile policy. All we are told about the identity of the Jewish-Christian missioners to Antioch is that they were from Cyprus and Cyrene. Perhaps Simeon Niger and Lucius of Cyrene were two of them (cf. 13:1), though Barnabas of Cyprus was not. But Luke does say that the missioners' proclamation of "the good news about the Lord Jesus" led to a significant response, so that "a great number of people believed and turned to the Lord." And since among that "great number" were both Jews and Gentiles, the Antioch church took on a decidedly different complexion from that of other early Christian congregations spoken of thus far. It was a mixed body of Jews and uncircumcised Gentiles meeting together for worship and fellowship in common allegiance to Jesus of Nazareth (cf. Gal 2:12).

22–24 News of the situation at Antioch was of definite concern to believers in Jerusalem. With the conversion of Samaritans, the conversion of some Gentiles in Caesarea, and now the report of a mixed congregation in Syrian Antioch, many in Jerusalem were doubtless fearful that the Christian mission was moving ahead so rapidly as to be out of control. The Jerusalem church, therefore, as in the case of the Samaritan conversions, decided to send a delegate to Antioch, probably in order to regularize whatever had gone awry and report back to the mother church. The man chosen for this task was Barnabas, a Jew from Cyprus who had gained an outstanding reputation for piety and generosity among the believers at Jerusalem (cf.4:36–37). In all likelihood, Barnabas's position as both a Diaspora and "Zionistic" Jew and his piety and generosity qualified him in the eyes of the Jerusalem church for this mission to Antioch. In addition, the high esteem in which he was held made it certain that both his counsel and his report would be received with all seriousness.

The Jerusalem church could hardly have selected a better delegate. His generous spirit was gladdened by what he saw of the grace of God at work among the believers at Antioch, and, true to his nickname "Son of Encouragement" (cf. 4:36), he "encouraged them all to remain true to the Lord with all their hearts." Here was a crisis point in the history of the early church, for much depended on Barnabas's reaction, counsel, and report—not only at Antioch itself, but also at Jerusalem and in the later advance of the Gospel through Paul's missions. With evident feeling, therefore, Luke says of him, "He was a good man, full of the Holy Spirit and faith." And as a result of his response, the work that was started at Antioch was enabled to go on, with many being brought to Christ.

25–26 Sometime after reaching Antioch, Barnabas went to Tarsus to find Saul to help him in the ministry back in Syria. We have no record of what Saul was doing between the time when he left Jerusalem and when Barnabas found him in Tarsus, though he was probably ministering to Gentiles (see comments on 9:30). Barnabas was the one who had supported Saul when there was suspicion at Jerusalem about his conversion (cf. 9:27). And now, knowing of Saul's God-given commission to minister to the Gentiles, recalling his testimony at Jerusalem, and needing help for the work among the Gentiles, Barnabas involved Saul in the ministry at Antioch where they served together "for a whole year" and taught "a great crowd of people."

In joining Barnabas at Antioch, Saul may have thought he was carrying out the mandate received at his conversion to take the message of the risen Christ to Gentiles. Most likely, however, the Antioch mission in those days was confined to the synagogue, so that there was little thought of the propriety of appealing more widely and directly to Gentiles. All the early believers at Antioch, whether Jews or Gentiles, may well have been related in some way to the synagogue. Thus in the eyes of many Jewish Christians, the conversion of Gentiles who had to some extent come under the ministry of Judaism before they believed in Jesus would not have been thought exceptional.

But others within the city—evidently the nonbelievers who were more perceptive in this matter than the church itself—nicknamed this group of Jewish and Gentile believers "Christians." (GK 5985; i.e., "Christ followers," or "those of the household of Christ"). They saw that the ministry to Gentiles and the fellowship of Jews with Gentiles went beyond the bounds of what was usually permitted within Judaism. They also voiced an insight that the Christians themselves only saw clearly later on: Christianity is no mere variant of Judaism. The new name doubtless helped develop the self-consciousness of the early Christians, despite its having first been given in derision. Later the early Christians accepted it and used it of themselves (cf. 26:28; 1Pe 4:16) along with their earlier self-designation of "the Way" (see comment on 9:2; cf. 19:9, 23). But the use of the name "Christian" posed two great problems for the church. For one thing, Christians began to risk losing the protection that Rome gave to a religio licita (i.e., a legal religion; cf. "Luke's Purposes in Writing Acts" in the introduction to Acts), which they had enjoyed when considered only a sect within Judaism. Furthermore, being now in some way differentiated from Judaism, Christians were faced with how to understand their continuity with the hope of Israel and the promises of the Jewish Scriptures. As we shall see, these problems were to loom large as the Christian mission moved onto Gentile soil.

2. The famine relief for Jerusalem (11:27–30)

27–28 Here Luke uses the connective "in those days" just as he did at 1:15 and 6:1, to link parts of his narrative. Now he tells of certain "prophets" who "came down from Jerusalem to Antioch." Among them was Agabus, with his dire prediction of impending famine in Jerusalem (cf. 21:10). The Jews believed that with the last of the writing prophets, the spirit of prophecy had ceased in Israel; but the coming Messianic Age would bring an outpouring of God's Spirit, and prophecy would again flourish. The early Christians, having experienced the inauguration of the Messianic Age, not only proclaimed Jesus to be the Mosaic eschatological prophet (cf. 3:22; 7:37) but also saw prophecy as a living phenomenon within the church (cf. also 13:1; 15:32; 21:9–10) and ranked it among God's gifts to his people next to that of being an apostle (cf. 1Co 12:28; Eph 4:11).

Agabus's prediction was of a "severe famine" affecting "the entire Roman world," which took place, Luke notes, during the reign of the emperor Claudius (A.D. 41–54). Although there is no record of a single famine that ravaged the whole empire in the time of Claudius, various Roman historians referred to a series of bad harvests and famine conditions during his reign. One of them, the Jewish historian Josephus, refers to famine relief sent from northern Mesopotamia to Jerusalem.

29–30 Similarly, the Christians at Antioch, in response to Agabus's prophecy, decided to provide help for their fellow believers at Jerusalem, whose plight as a minority group within the nation would be particularly difficult at such a time. We are not given any details as to how the relief was collected, how it was administered, or when it was delivered. All we know from the text is that it was an expression of Christian concern by the Antioch church "for the brothers living in Judea" and was taken by Barnabas and Saul "to the elders" (i.e., the leaders) of the Jerusalem church.

The "famine visit" of Barnabas and Saul to Jerusalem of 11:27–30 should probably be dated about A.D. 46. That date, even though tentative and general, presents commentators with their first real date for working out a Pauline chronology (cf. comments on the reign of Herod Agrippa I at 12:1–23, the Edict of Claudius at 18:2, and Gallio's proconsulate at 18:12). But as to how we are to reconcile this date with what Paul tells us in his letters and how we are to fit it into an overall chronology depends largely on the answer to the conundrum of the relation of Paul's two Jerusalem visits mentioned in Galatians to his three Jerusalem visits reported in Acts. While most accept the correlation of Gal 1:18–20 with Ac 9:26–29 and count that as the first visit, many feel that Gal 2:1–10 should be identified with the Jerusalem Council of Ac 15. But this appears to make Ac 11:27–30 either a fabrication on Luke's part or a doublet of the Ac 15 material placed here by Luke for his own purposes.

The issues are complex and have far-reaching consequences. (See comments on Ac 15 in the context of 12:25–16:5.) Here it is sufficient to say that the simplest solution, one that provides the most satisfactory and convincing reconstruction and leaves the fewest loose ends, is that Gal 2:1–10 corresponds to the famine visit of Ac 11:27–30. On such an understanding, and taking the temporal conjunctions "then" of Gal 1:18 and 2:1 as referring back to Saul's conversion (A.D. 33, allowing some flexibility in rounding off the years), his first visit to Jerusalem can be dated about 36, and his famine visit some fourteen years after his conversion about 46. On such a basis, the reference in Gal 2:2 to Saul's having gone to Jerusalem "in response to a revelation" should probably be related to Agabus's prophecy of Ac 11:28.

D. Divine Intervention on Behalf of the Jerusalem Church (12:1–23)

With its acceptance of the conversion of "half-Jews" in Samaria, a Gentile centurion and his friends at Caesarea, and Gentiles who were only loosely associated with the synagogue at Antioch of Syria, the Jerusalem church was straining the forms and commitments of Judaism almost to the breaking point. There is hardly any further room for expansion within the traditions of Judaism, and soon the Christian mission would break out of those limits to embrace a direct mission to the Gentile world. In fact, the preparation for this had begun with Saul's conversion and with his early attempts to carry on a Christian ministry, even though not till later would he formally espouse and explicitly carry out a direct mission to Gentiles.

But before Luke turns to his portrayal of the Christian mission to the Gentile world, he takes the opportunity of presenting two further glimpses of God's working on behalf of the believers at Jerusalem. Just as his mentor Paul, while arguing for the legitimacy of a direct outreach to Gentiles, continued to characterize Jewish Christianity as "the church of God" (Gal 1:13; cf. 1Th 2:14) and to respect God's ongoing activity within the Jewish world (cf. Ro 9-11), so Luke seems desirous of making the point that, though he is about to portray the advances of the Gospel within the Gentile world, it should not be assumed that God was finished with Jerusalem Christianity or that his activity within the Jewish world was finished. Luke has portrayed the Christian mission to the Jewish world that had its center at Jerusalem. Now he prepares to present the Christian mission to the Gentiles as a kind of ellipse emanating from that same center.

Before doing so, however, Luke gives us two further vignettes relating to God's intervention on behalf of the Jerusalem church so that his readers might more fully appreciate the fact that while the Christian mission within the Jewish world and the Christian mission to the Gentiles differed, in many ways they possessed a common focus, had many similarities, and were complementary. Divine activity on behalf of the Gentiles, Luke appears to be insisting, does not mean divine inactivity on behalf of Jewish Christians or unconcern for Jews—which is a heresy that has often afflicted Gentile Christians and resulted in horrendous calamities.

1. The deliverance of Peter (12:1–19a)

1–4 The narrative of Peter's miraculous deliverance from prison and death really begins at v.5. The narrative is introduced as having taken place "about this time," which refers to the events of the famine visit to Jerusalem of 11:27–30. But if the famine visit occurred about A.D. 46 and Herod Agrippa I died in A.D. 44 (as will be seen below), 11:27–30 and the material of 12:1–23 are chronologically reversed. Yet we must remember that ancient historians frequently grouped their materials without always being concerned about chronology (see introduction). So Luke, having begun his account of Christianity in Antioch by speaking of the founding of the church, tied into that narrative a further vignette about the famine relief Antiochean believers sent to Jerusalem. As a result, his full account of the church at Antioch (11:19–30) reaches back behind Peter's ministries at Lydda, Joppa, and Caesarea at its start (cf. 11:19) and goes beyond the accounts of Peter's deliverance and Herod Agrippa I's death at its close (the events of ch. 12 coming between those of 11:19–26 and 11:27–30). Luke seems to have wanted to close his portrayals of the Christian mission within the Jewish world (2:42–12:24) with two vignettes having to do with God's continued activity on behalf of the Jerusalem church.

The Herod of Ac 12 is Agrippa I (born in 10 B.C.), the grandson of Herod the Great and the son of Aristobulus. After his father's execution in 7 B.C., he was sent with his mother Bernice to Rome, where he grew up on intimate terms with the imperial family. In his youth he was something of a playboy, and in A.D. 23 he went so heavily into debt that he had to flee to Idumea to escape his creditors. Later he received asylum at Tiberias and a pension from his uncle Herod Antipas, with whom, however, he eventually quarreled. In 36 he returned to Rome but offended the emperor Tiberius and was imprisoned. At the death of Tiberius in 37, he was released by the new emperor Caligula and received from him the northernmost Palestinian tetrarchies of Philip and Lysanius (cf. Lk 3:1) and the title of king. When Herod Antipas was banished in 39, Agrippa received his tetrarchy as well. And at the death of Caligula in 41, Claudius, who succeeded Caligula and was Agrippa's friend from youth, added Judea and Samaria to his territory, thus reconstituting for him the entire kingdom of his grandfather Herod the Great, over which he ruled till his death in 44.

Knowing how profoundly the masses hated his family, Herod Agrippa I took every opportunity during his administration in Palestine to win their affection. When in Rome he was a cosmopolitan Roman. But when in Jerusalem, he acted the part of an observant Jew. In A.D. 40 Agrippa cajoled Caligula not to carry out his insane plan of erecting a statue to himself as a god in the Jerusalem temple and intervened on behalf of the Jews in Alexandria for their more humane treatment. When Judea came under his jurisdiction, he moved the seat of government from Caesarea to Jerusalem. This established the holy city in Jewish eyes as the political capital of the country. He also began to rebuild the city's northern wall and fortifications, thus enhancing both its security and its prestige. Many Jews viewed these days as the inauguration of a better era—perhaps even the Messianic Age. Agrippa himself, however, seems to have been primarily interested in a successful reign through the cooperation of loyal subjects, and his expressions of concern for the people and their religion were probably more pragmatically based than sincere.

Agrippa's policy was preserving the Roman peace through preserving the status quo. He supported the majority within the land and ruthlessly suppressed minorities when they became disruptive. He viewed Jewish Christians as divisive and felt their activities could only disturb the people and inflame antagonisms. So he arrested some of the believers in Jesus and had James, one of Jesus' original disciples, beheaded by the sword (a form of execution supported by Jewish tradition). Finding that this pleased the Jewish leaders, he then took Peter during Passover Week and imprisoned him till he could bring him out for public trial after the Jewish holy days. While in prison, the apostle was guarded by "four squads of four soldiers each," with two soldiers chained to him on either side and two standing guard at the inner entrance to the prison (cf. v.6). Evidently Agrippa planned to make of Peter a spectacle and warning at a forthcoming show trial. And he did not want to be embarrassed by Peter's escape.

5 Peter was likely imprisoned somewhere within the Fortress of Antonia, which overlooked the temple area to the north and had entrances to both the temple courts and the city. More important to Luke, for whom prayer is the natural atmosphere of God's people and the normal context for divine activity (cf. 1:14, 24; 2:42; 4:24–31; 6:4, 6; 9:40; et al.), is the fact that "the church was earnestly praying to God for him [Peter]."

6–9 On the night before Agrippa's show trial, "an angel of the Lord" appeared in the apostle's cell and began to take charge of affairs. The "angel of the Lord" signifies God himself in his dealings with people (cf. Ex 3:2, 7;

Mt 1:20, 24; Lk 1:11; 2:9; Ac 5:19; 8:26; 12:23; et al.). The angel awoke Peter, and as he stirred, the chains by which he was bound fell from his wrists. Then the angel, like a parent with a child awakened from sound sleep, carefully instructed the groggy apostle to get dressed. Then he ordered Peter to follow him, and they left the cell. But Peter, too sleepy to grasp the reality of what was happening, thought he was dreaming.

Herod Agrippa I had planned to try Peter as the leader of the divisive minority in Palestine that identified itself with the crucified Jesus of Nazareth and then execute him as a warning to other followers of Jesus to stop their activities. Usually a prisoner was chained to only one guard, but in view of Agrippa's intentions, the guard was doubled. The Christians in Jerusalem understood Agrippa's intentions because he had earlier imprisoned some of them and killed James the son of Zebedee. Neither Peter nor his fellow believers were in any doubt about what the king had in mind. It was a crisis of great magnitude for the life of the early Christian community at Jerusalem. But while God does not promise deliverance from persecution and death, at crucial times he often steps in to act for the honor of his name and the benefit of his people. This was what now happened. Peter's deliverance must be ascribed entirely to God, for it was in no way due to the apostle's own efforts or those of the Christian community—apart, of course, from their prayers.

10–11 Passing the two guards at the inner entrance to the prison, Peter and the angel came to the main iron gate, which opened automatically as they approached. Then the angel left Peter a block away from the prison. For Peter, standing there alone in the street and brought to his senses by the cool night air, there was no doubt that "the Lord sent his angel and rescued me [Peter] from Herod's clutches and from everything the Jewish people were anticipating."

12 Realizing where he was and the danger he faced if Herod's soldiers should find him there, Peter went to one of the meeting places of the early Jerusalem Christians, the home of Mary, John Mark's mother. A number of people were praying there. Luke's identification of Mary by her son implies that her son's name was better known to his readers than hers. It also suggests that the John Mark referred to here was the one who was with Paul and Barnabas on a portion of the first missionary journey (Ac 13:5, 13)—namely, a cousin of Barnabas and the likely writer of the second gospel (cf. Ac 15:37–39; Col 4:10; Phm 24; 1Pe 5:13).

13–16 Mary's house must have been of some size, with a vestibule opening onto the street, a courtyard, and rear living quarters—not only were "many people gathered" there, but Peter was knocking at the door of the vestibule, and Rhoda the servant girl was rushing back and forth for joy. The unfolding scene is one of confusion and joyful humor, which must have led to hilarity every time it was repeated among the early believers. There was Peter's knocking, becoming more and more urgent as he beat on the door; Rhoda's losing her wits for joy and forgetting to open the door; the Christians' refusal to believe it was Peter, even though they had just been praying for him; their belittling of Rhoda and of her insistence she had heard Peter's voice at the door; Rhoda's frantic persistence; and their utter astonishment when they finally opened the door and let him in.

17 On entering, Peter "motioned with his hand for them to be quiet." This was not the time for celebration. After all, Herod's soldiers would soon be prowling on the streets to look for him. Peter had to get moving to escape being recaptured. So he gave them a quick summary of "how the Lord had brought him out of prison" and instructed them to tell James and the other brothers what had happened. And with that, Luke tells us, Peter left "for another place."

The James mentioned here is, of course, James the Lord's brother, not James the brother of John and son of Zebedee who was earlier beheaded by Herod Agrippa I (cf. v.2). Undoubtedly Peter was the leader of the first Christian community at Jerusalem, as the early chapters of Acts presuppose. But from the mid-thirties through the mid-forties James seems also to have exercised administrative leadership along with Peter and the apostles (cf. Gal 1:19; 2:9), and he presided at the Jerusalem Council of A.D. 49 (cf. 15:13–21). Later still Luke refers to him as head of the Jerusalem church (cf. 21:18). He was likely martyred in 62. Luke does not state how or why the shift in leadership of the church from Peter to James came about, nor what qualified James for such a position. Apparently it had to do with (1) external pressures on the Jerusalem congregation to demonstrate its Jewishness, and (2) the need within the church for someone who could lead the growing number of scrupulously minded converts drawn from Pharisaic and priestly backgrounds (cf. comments on 6:7).

After the expulsion of the Hellenists, both the Jews and the Jewish Christians in Jerusalem felt the need for the community of believers in Jesus to demonstrate more actively their continued respect for the traditions of Israel. Peter and his fellow apostles would hardly have been the best ones to head such an endeavor—in fact, Peter's association with the Samaritans and Cornelius may have made him particularly suspect in certain quarters. It is, therefore, not improbable the Jerusalem church found it advantageous to be represented in its leadership by one whose legal as well as spiritual qualifications were above reproach. Such a person was James, the Lord's brother, who seems to have been a devout Pharisee and who was not only physically related to Jesus but also had seen the risen Jesus (1Co 15:7).

Furthermore, the missionary activities of Peter and the apostles would require some kind of arrangement for the continuance of administrative authority at Jerusalem. That the apostles considered themselves to be something other than ecclesiastical functionaries has already been shown in Ac 6:2–6. And it is not too difficult to imagine that with the dispersion of the Hellenists and the Seven who were appointed to supervise the distribution of food within the community, the church turned to James for administrative leadership—not only, to demonstrate its Jewishness, but also to free the apostles for their "ministry of the word" (cf. 1Co 9:5).

The mention of "another place" to which Peter went after his miraculous deliverance has led to various suggestions. Roman Catholics have frequently suggested Rome, though most now agree it is unlikely. If 12:1–19 precedes 9:32–11:18 chronologically (see comments on 12:1), this other place may refer to the maritime plain of Palestine, with its cities of Lydda, Joppa, and Caesarea. But such a region was still within Herod Agrippa's jurisdiction. More likely Antioch of Syria is the place Luke had in mind—a place where Peter had fellowship with a mixed body of Jewish and Gentile believers till "certain men came from James," and where he suffered the rebuke of Paul (cf. Gal 2:11–21). Later on Peter appears at Jerusalem in connection with the Jerusalem Council (cf. 15:7–11, 14), though presumably only in transit.

18–19a In Roman law, a guard who allowed his prisoner to escape was subject to the same penalty the escaped prisoner would have suffered. No wonder that in the morning when Peter's escape was discovered, "there was a great commotion among the soldiers." When Herod heard of Peter's escape, he instituted a search and cross-examined the guards. Frustrated by his lack of success, he ordered the guards to be taken out to execution.

2. The death of Herod Agrippa I (12b:19–23)

Peter had been miraculously delivered from prison and death, but the tyrant Herod Agrippa was still at large, continuing his oppression of the church. Therefore Luke gives us a second scene in his account of God's intervention on behalf of the Jerusalem church. He does this not only to show how far-reaching this intervention was but also to reinforce by a second witness the theme of God's continued interest in Jewish Christianity (cf. the introductory comments on 2:42–12:24).

19b–20 The situation Luke describes in these verses is not entirely clear. Caesarea, with its excellent man-made harbor (see comments on 10:1), was still nominally the provincial capital of Palestine. Though we have no other record of conflict between Herod and Tyre and Sidon, Herod became enraged with the people of these two cities; and they, in turn, sent a delegation to ask for peace, using in some way the good offices of Blastus, King Agrippa's personal servant, for their purposes. Agrippa appears to have left Jerusalem for Caesarea shortly after the Jewish Passover, perhaps because of frustration over Peter's escape.

21–23 Luke's account of Agrippa's death is paralleled by a story in Josephus, the Jewish historian of the first century. Both accounts differ from each other in significant ways, but they are so similar in outline that we may assume that we know in general how Herod Agrippa I died in A.D. 44. Both Luke and Josephus attribute his death to the king's impiety and God's judgment. Moreover, Luke sees it as part of God's activity on behalf of the Jerusalem church. Luke's reference to worms suggests an infection by intestinal roundworms, which grow as long as ten to sixteen inches and feed on the nutrient fluids in the intestines. Bunches of roundworms can obstruct the intestines, causing severe pain, copious vomiting of worms, and death.

In this outdoor theater in Caesarea, the Lord struck down King Herod. The person is standing where Herod's throne would have been placed.

E. A Summary Statement (12:24)

24 Luke's third panel on the Christian mission within the Jewish world ends with a summary statement comparable to the summaries that conclude the two preceding panels (cf. 6:7; 9:31). In its context, v.24 contrasts the progress of the Gospel to the awful end of the church's persecutor Herod Agrippa I. More broadly, it implies that though in the remainder of Acts Luke's attention will be focused on the advances of the Gospel to Gentiles, within the Jewish world "the word of God continued to increase and spread." In other words, God was still at work on behalf of the Jerusalem church and its ministry and was still concerned for his ancient people Israel.

Part II. The Christian Mission to the Gentile World (12:25–28:31)

In the Nazareth pericope (Lk 4:14–30), Luke set the main themes for all that follows in Luke-Acts. Two features of particular relevance stand out in those verses. (1) Luke presents Jesus' reading of Isa 61 as ending in mid-sentence at Isa 61:2a, thereby emphasizing grace ("to proclaim the year of the Lord's favor") without sounding the note of judgment ("and the day of vengeance of our God"). The omission of the judgment theme underscores the fact that the period of the Gospel is a time characterized by grace, when the offer of deliverance is freely extended. To such a message of salvation, the residents of Nazareth responded positively. They failed to see any other implication in a message of free grace than God's messianic blessings poured out on Israel. So they spoke well of Jesus and commented favorably about his "gracious words" (Lk 4:22). (2) Next, Luke shows Jesus as indicating that the blessings of the Messianic Age were not intended for Israel alone but were for Gentiles as well—with the blessings of God's grace extending even to a Phoenician widow and a Syrian leper. Here was a repudiation of the Jewish concept of exclusive election. Jesus' townsmen were furious, drove Jesus out of the synagogue, and tried to kill him.

Jesus' own earthly ministry was, of course, limited almost entirely to Jews. Luke's gospel depicts only one healing of a centurion's servant (7:1–10) and two brief contacts with Samaritans (9:52–55; 17:11–19). Moreover, it even omits the story about the Syro-Phoenician woman of Mk 7:24–30 (cf. Mt 15:21–28), though it contains several intimations of a later inclusion of Gentiles (cf. Lk 2:30–32; 3:6; 11:31; 13:29; 14:16–24). Also, in the first half of Acts, Luke has presented the Jerusalem church's ministry as focused primarily on the Jewish world, with such outreaches as Samaria, Caesarea, and Syrian Antioch being understood in some ways as exceptional. In effect, then, Luke has reserved for Paul the mission to the Gentiles that Jesus saw as inherent in Isa 61. Now as Luke turns to a portrayal of how the Gospel advanced among the Gentiles, he also concludes his two-volume work by explicating Jesus' promise of the universal extension of God's grace. This he does (1) by building on what Jesus accomplished in his earthly ministry, death, and resurrection, as presented in his gospel, and (2) by paralleling in its Gentile advances many features of the extension of God's grace within the Jewish world, as presented in the first half of Acts.

Panel 4—The First Missionary Journey and the Jerusalem Council (12:25–16:5)

Luke's fourth panel, the first of his three on the Christian mission to the Gentile world, embodies both Paul's first missionary journey and the Jerusalem Council. It concludes by telling how believers in Syria, Cilicia, and Galatia received the decisions of the council. Luke presents his material more thematically than geographically. Therefore, before closing with the summary in 16:5, he draws together several matters: (1) a report of events on the first missionary journey that led up to the Jerusalem Council; (2) an account of the debate and decisions reached at the council; and (3) a précis of how those decisions were received in areas of Gentile outreach.

In his first missionary journey, Paul began a radically new policy for proclaiming the Gospel and making converts: namely, he approaches the Gentile world apart from any prior commitments to Judaism on the part of the converts or any Jewish stance on the part of the missioners; on their part, the Gentile Christians express their faith in Jesus apart from a Jewish lifestyle and distinctive Jewish practices (cf. 14:27b; 15:3). For the early church with its Jewish roots, such a policy was revolutionary. It had enormous significance and many implications for the Christian movement that required a full discussion and decision at the Jerusalem Council.

A. The Missioners Sent Out (12:25–13:3)

25 This verse reaches back behind the events of ch. 12 to connect 13:1–3 with the account of the Antioch church in 11:19–30. Luke uses it as a kind of bridge statement before turning to the missionary journey itself. Thus he shifts his readers' attention from Jerusalem to Antioch of Syria and tells of John Mark's return with his cousin Barnabas (Col 4:10) and with Saul from Jerusalem to Antioch.

13:1 At Antioch there were five "prophets and teachers" in the church. The Greek suggests that Barnabas, Simeon, and Lucius were prophets, and Manaen and Saul were teachers—with prophecy here understood to include "forthtelling" as well as "foretelling" and teaching having to do with showing OT relationships and implications.

We know Barnabas was a Levite from Cyprus who resided in Jerusalem and became a leading figure in the Jerusalem church (4:36–37; 9:27; 11:22–30). He was, as Luke tells us, "a good man, full of the Holy Spirit and faith" (11:24) and undoubtedly served as a channel for the truth of the Gospel direct from the Jerusalem congregation. Simeon Niger (meaning "black") may have come from Africa; he was possibly the Simon from Cyrene of Lk 23:26. As for Lucius and Manaen, we know nothing certain apart from this verse. Lucius of Cyrene was frequently identified in the postapostolic period with Luke the evangelist and author of Acts; but this is not likely, for Luke refrains from identifying himself with Paul's missionary journeys, except through the occasional use of the pronoun "we." Manaen is identified as one "who had been brought up with" (GK 5343; lit., a "foster brother" or "intimate friend") Herod the Tetrarch. This suggests that he had been raised as an adopted brother or close companion of Herod Antipas. As for Saul, we know him from 7:58–8:3; 9:1–30; and 11:25–30.

2–3 While Barnabas and Saul were carrying out their activities at Antioch, the Holy Spirit directed that they should be set apart for a special ministry. Luke does not tell us how the Spirit made his will known, though it was probably through a revelation given to one of the believers. Neither does he tell us the nature of the special ministry the two were set apart for, though from what follows it is obvious that we are meant to understand that it was to be a mission to Gentiles. The whole congregation, together with its leaders, was involved in attesting the validity of the revelation received, laid hands on the missioners, and sent them out (cf. 14:27, where the missioners reported back to the whole church). Ultimately, though, Luke insists that Barnabas and Saul were "sent on their way by the Holy Spirit" (v.4).

B. The Mission on Cyprus and John Mark's Departure (13:4–13)

The first major outreach of the Gospel from Antioch soon encountered the false prophet Bar-Jesus in Cyprus, just as the first major outreach from Jerusalem ran afoul of Simon the sorcerer in Samaria (cf. 8:9–24). By the manner in which he narrates both events, Luke apparently wanted his readers to see the parallel. Moreover, not only does Luke seem to have been interested in this parallel between these two episodes, he was also interested in showing how great a step forward the mission on Cyprus really was—with its revolutionary implications for the Christian mission to Gentiles and its radical effect on the missioners themselves.

4 Luke now begins the account of the missioners' outreach to Cyprus, Pamphylia, and the southern portion of Galatia. While the church confirms in its own experience the divine will, identifies itself with God's purposes and those whom he has called for specific tasks, and releases them from their duties for wider service (cf. v.3), it is God who by his Spirit is in charge of events and sends out his missioners. Thus, being "sent on their way by the Holy Spirit," they went down to Seleucia on the Mediterranean and sailed from there to the island of Cyprus. Just why they thought of going to Cyprus first in carrying out their mandate we don't know. But Barnabas was from Cyprus (4:36); and knowing generally the will of God, he and Saul were ready to move from the known to the unknown.

Seleucia was the port city of Antioch of Syria, some sixteen miles west of Antioch and four or five miles northeast of the mouth of the Orontes River. It was founded by Seleucus I Nicator, the first king of the Seleucid dynasty, about 300 B.C. in conjunction with the founding of Antioch. Cyprus was an island of great importance from very early times, being situated on the shipping lanes between Syria, Asia Minor, and Greece. In 57 B.C. it was annexed by Rome from Egypt and in 55 B.C. incorporated into the province of Cilicia. In 27 B.C. it became a separate province governed on behalf of the emperor Augustus by an imperial legate. In 22 B.C. Augustus relinquished its control to the senate, and, like other senatorial provinces, it was administered by a proconsul.

5 Leaving the mainland of Syria, the missionary party sailed to Salamis on the eastern coast of Cyprus, about 130 miles from Seleucia. Salamis was the most important city of the island and the administrative center for its eastern half, though the provincial capital was 90 miles southwest at Paphos. The population of Cyprus was dominantly Greek, but many Jews lived there as well. Thus Barnabas and Saul began their mission in the synagogues of the city, and John Mark was with them as their helper.

6–11 From Salamis, Barnabas and Saul traveled throughout the island of Cyprus, continuing to preach within the Jewish synagogues to both Jews and "God-fearing" Gentiles. But when they reached Paphos—or, more exactly, New Paphos, the Roman provincial capital seven miles northwest of the old Phoenician city of Paphos—their ministry definitely changed. At Paphos the Roman proconsul Sergius Paulus asked them to present their message before him. This was probably meant to be an official inquiry into the nature of what the missioners were proclaiming in the synagogues so that the proconsul might know how to deal with charges already laid against these wandering Jewish evangelists and head off any further disruptions within the Jewish communities. The invitation could not have been refused. But neither the proconsul nor the missioners could have anticipated what actually happened at the inquiry.

Luke describes Sergius Paulus as a man of discernment, which he proved to be in accepting the Christian message. Within his court at Paphos was a certain Jewish sorcerer and false prophet named Bar-Jesus. In assuming himself as the Jewish spokesman in opposition to these Christian evangelists, this man probably wanted to enhance his own reputation. While sorcery and magic were officially banned in Judaism, there were still Jews who practiced it, both under the guise of Jewish orthodoxy and as renegades (cf. Lk 11:19; Ac 19:13–16). Bar-Jesus is also called Elymas (a name meaning "sorcerer," "magician," "fortune-teller").

In all of Saul's activities thus far, nothing had happened to suggest that he was anything but "a Hebrew born of Hebrew parents" (cf. Php 3:5). He was interested in an outreach to Gentiles but made no special appeal to them directly. Nor did he approach them as being on an equal footing with Jews or apart from the synagogue. Though his preaching aroused strong feelings within certain Jewish communities, it engendered no more ill will than had been directed against the other apostles before him. Here in the hall of the proconsul, however, Saul was in new surroundings as he presented his message before a leading member of the Roman world, a world of which he himself was a member. As a Jew, he proudly bore the name of Israel's first king, Saul. As a Roman citizen (cf. 16:37–38; 25:10–12), he undoubtedly had two Roman names, a praenomen and a nomen, though neither is used of him in the NT. But as a Jew of the Diaspora, who must necessarily rub shoulders with the Gentile world at large, he also bore the Greek name Paul, which became his cognomen in the empire and was used in Gentile contexts. So at this point in his narrative Luke speaks of "Saul, who was also called Paul," and hereafter refers to him only by this name.

As the Gospel was being proclaimed to Sergius Paulus, Bar-Jesus tried to divert the proconsul from the faith. But Paul turned on the sorcerer and pronounced a curse upon him. In highly biblical language, he denounced Bar-Jesus as "a child of the devil," "an enemy of everything that is right," one "full of all kinds of deceit and trickery," always "perverting the right ways of the Lord," and pronounced a curse of temporary blindness on him. "Immediately," Luke tells us, "mist and darkness came over him, and he groped about, seeking someone to lead him by the hand."

12 The nature of the proconsul's response has often been debated, chiefly because the text says nothing about his being baptized when he believed. But the statement that Sergius Paulus believed can hardly be taken with any less significance than Luke's use of the same word in 14:1; 17:34; and 19:18, where baptism is also not mentioned yet where we might well assume it was performed.

The conversion of Sergius Paulus was, in fact, a turning point in Paul's whole ministry and inaugurated a new policy in the mission to Gentiles—namely, the legitimacy of a direct approach to and full acceptance of Gentiles apart from any distinctive Jewish stance. This is what Luke clearly sets forth as the great innovative development of this first missionary journey (14:27; 15:3). Earlier Cornelius had been converted apart from any prior commitment to Judaism, and the Jerusalem church had accepted his conversion to Christ. But the Jerusalem church never took Cornelius's conversion as a precedent for the Christian mission and apparently preferred not to dwell on its ramifications. Paul, however, whose mandate was to Gentiles, saw in the conversion of Sergius Paulus further aspects of what a mission to Gentiles involved and was prepared to take this conversion as a precedent fraught with far-reaching implications for his ministry. It is significant that from this point on, except for 14:14; 15:12; and 15:25 (situations where Barnabas was more prominent), Luke always emphasizes Paul's leadership by listing him first when naming the missioners.

13 Verse 13 has puzzled many commentators. Pamphylia was a geographically small and economically poor province on the southern coast of Asia Minor, with the mountains of Lycia to the west, the foothills of Pisidia to the north, and the Taurus range to the east. It contained a mixed population and seems to have been as open to the Gospel as any other province. Yet Luke gives us no account of evangelization in Perga or its environs at this time, though he expressly states later that the missioners "preached the word in Perga" on their return to Syrian Antioch (14:25). And it was at Perga that John Mark left the group to return to Jerusalem.

The usual explanation for the missioners' initially bypassing Perga and moving on to Antioch of Pisidia is that Paul may have been ill with a case of malaria and that this forced redirecting the mission to gain the higher ground to the north. As for John Mark's departure, it is usually explained as a combination of homesickness, the rigors of travel, dissatisfaction with Paul's assuming leadership over Mark's cousin Barnabas, and unhappiness at leaving Cyprus so soon. But discussion among the missioners after Paphos and during their stay at Perga may very well have focused on the implications of Sergius Paulus's conversion for their ministry. And it can plausibly be argued that (1) the lack of preaching in Perga at this time was due primarily to uncertainty within the missionary party itself about the validity of a direct approach to and full acceptance of Gentiles, and (2) John Mark left because he disagreed with Paul and was concerned about the effect the news of a direct Christian mission to Gentiles would have in Jerusalem. His return to the Christian community in Jerusalem may originally have stirred the "Judaizers" in the church to action. In any case, Paul's strong opposition to Mark in 15:37–39 suggests that his departure on this first missionary journey was for reasons more than merely personal.

C. At Antioch of Pisidia (13:14–52)

At Pisidian Antioch the typical pattern of the Pauline ministry was established: an initial proclamation in the synagogue to Jews and Gentile adherents and then, when refused an audience in the synagogue, a direct ministry to Gentiles. This pattern is reproduced in every city visited by Paul with a sizable Jewish population—except Athens. As he later declares in Romans, there is no difference between Jews and Gentiles in condemnation (Ro 2:1–3:20) or in access to God (Ro 3:21–31); so his ministry at Pisidian Antioch began to express this equality. While the synagogues were appropriate for beginning his ministry in the various cities, offering as they did an audience of both Jews and Gentiles theologically prepared for his message, they were not the exclusive sphere of Paul's activity. Since Jews and Gentiles stood before God on an equal footing, they could be appealed to separately if need be.

This understanding of the validity of a direct approach to Gentiles and their full acceptance as Christians is what Paul speaks of as "my gospel" (Ro 16:25; cf. Gal 1:11–2:10). It was a gospel not different in content from the earliest gospel (1Co 15:1–11) but a gospel distinct in strategy and broader in scope. The nature of Paul's ministry had been given to him by revelation (see Eph 3:2–6); by providential action at the beginning of his first missionary journey, its specifics were spelled out.

1. A welcome extended at Antioch (13:14–15)

14a Pisidian Antioch was founded by Seleucus I Nicator about 281 B.C. (see comment on 11:19–30). It was situated a hundred miles north of Perga on a lake-studded plateau some thirty-six hundred feet above sea level. The foothills between Perga and Pisidian Antioch largely ruled out any extensive east-west traffic until one reached the plateau area, but following the river valleys one could move northward from the Pamphylia area. On the plateau Antioch stood astride the Via Sebaste, the Roman road from Ephesus to the Euphrates. The city had been incorporated into the expanded Roman province of Galatia in 25 B.C. by Augustus, who at that time imported into it some three thousand army veterans and their families from Italy and gave it the title of Colonia Caesarea. Antioch was the most important city of southern Galatia and included a rich amalgam of Greek, Roman, Oriental, and Phrygian traditions. Acts tells us that it also had a sizable Jewish population.

14b–15 Arriving at Pisidian Antioch, Paul and Barnabas entered the synagogue on the Sabbath. A typical first-century synagogue service would have included the shema (see comments on Dt 6:4–5), the liturgy of "The Eighteen Benedictions," a reading from the Law, a reading from one of the prophets, a free address given by any competent Jew in attendance, and a closing blessing. The leader of the synagogue, usually one of the elders of the congregation, took charge of the building and made arrangements for the services (Lk 8:41, 49). This office was sometimes held for life and passed on within a family. Perhaps Paul's dress proclaimed him a Pharisee and thereby opened the way for an invitation to speak.

2. Paul's synagogue sermon at Antioch (13:16–41)

Three missionary sermons of Paul are presented in Acts: the first here before the synagogue at Antioch of Pisidia, the second to Lystrans assembled outside the city gates (14:15–17), and the third before the Council of Ares at Athens (17:22–31). Each sermon as we have it is only a précis of what was said, for the longest in its present form takes no more than three minutes to deliver and the shortest can be read in thirty seconds or less. But there is enough in each account to suggest that whereas Paul preached the same gospel wherever he went, he altered the form of his message according to the circumstances he encountered.

16 When Jesus addressed the congregation at Nazareth, he read the lesson standing and then sat down to speak (cf. Lk 4:16, 20). Luke, however, portrays Paul as "standing" to address the synagogue worshipers at Pisidian Antioch. Paul's speech at Pisidian Antioch was probably an exhortation not arising from the passages read that day from the Law or the Prophets. In Paul's audience were both Jews and "God-fearing" Gentiles. So he addressed both groups: "Men of Israel and you Gentiles who worship God." With a gesture of his hand and with his words, he invited them to listen to him.

17–22 Paul's exhortation begins with a review of Israel's history that emphasizes the pattern of God's redemptive activity from Abraham to David. It is an approach in line with Jewish interests and practices and can be paralleled by Stephen's defense before the Sanhedrin, by the argument of the Letter to the Hebrews, and by the underlying structure of Matthew's gospel.

Highlighted is a four-point confessional summary that for Jews epitomized the essence of their faith: (1) God is the God of the people of Israel; (2) he chose the patriarchs for himself; (3) he redeemed his people from Egypt, leading them through the desert; and (4) he gave them the land of Palestine as an inheritance. To such a confessional recital, Jews often added God's choice of David to be king and the promises made to him and his descendants (cf. Pss 78:67–72; 89:3–4, 19–37). Paul proclaims these great confessional truths of Israel's faith, which speak of God's redemptive concern for his people and undergird the Christian message.

Of importance also is the fact that underlying Paul's treatment of David is 2Sa 7:6–16, the passage that speaks of David's descendant as God's "son." By anchoring Israel's kerygma in the messianically relevant "son" passage of 2Sa 7, Paul has begun to build a textual bridge for the Christian kerygma, which he will root in the messianic "son" passage of Ps 2:7. And by drawing these two passages together, he will draw together Israel's confession and the church's confession, thereby demonstrating both continuity and fulfillment.

23 Paul's Christian proclamation begins by announcing that God has brought forth the messianic Deliverer from David's line in the person of Jesus. The promise Paul alludes to is in Isa 11:1–16, a messianic passage of special importance for Judaism because it speaks of the Messiah's descent from David, of his righteous rule, of his victories, and of the establishment of his kingdom.

24–25 The announcement of Jesus as the Messiah is put in the usual form of the apostolic proclamation, beginning with John the Baptist and his ministry (cf. Mk 1:2–8). John's preaching and baptism of repentance paved the way for the public ministry of Jesus. John was the forerunner of the Messiah, as he himself confessed (cf. Lk 3:15–18).

26–31 As Paul comes to the heart of his sermon, he appeals respectfully and urgently to both the Jews and the God-fearing Gentiles for a hearing. Then he presents a four-point Christian confession like that in 1Co 15:3–5: (1) Jesus was crucified; (2) they "laid him in a tomb"; (3) "God raised him from the dead"; and (4) "for many days he was seen by those who had traveled with him from Galilee to Jerusalem," who are "now his witnesses to our people." Also significant is the clear note of fulfillment explicitly sounded in v.27 and implied throughout the whole presentation.

32–37 To support this four-point confession and to demonstrate the fulfillment of what God has promised, Paul cites three OT passages fraught with messianic meaning for Christians and also for some Jews. The first is Ps 2:7, which Paul uses to bind together Judaism's confession and Christianity's confession by juxtaposing it with 2Sa 7:6–16 (the text underlying vv.17-22). Both 2Sa 7:14 and Ps 2:7 portray God as speaking of his "son." Linking passages on the basis of their verbal analogies was common in Judaism (see comment on 2:25–35). In doing this Paul does two things: (1) he brings these two "son" passages together as the substructure of his argument in this synagogue, and (2) he joins OT redemptive history and the history of Jesus, understanding both as having messianic significance.

Paul then quotes Isa 55:3 and Ps 16:10, joining his OT passages again on the interpretative principle of verbal similarities between "the holy blessings" and "the Holy One." The messianic treatment of Ps 16:10 stems from the earliest Christian preaching at Pentecost (cf. 2:27).

38–41 Paul now uses the simple appellation "Men, brothers" (cf. vv.16, 26) as he applies his message and calls the people to repentance. Through Jesus, Paul declares, are "forgiveness of sins" and justification for "everyone who believes." What we have here are his distinctive themes of "forgiveness [GK 912] of sins," "justification" (GK 1467; cf. 1466), and "faith" (GK 4409; cf. 4411)—themes that resound in his first address in Acts just as they do throughout his extant letters.

The call to repentance is cast in terms of Hab 1:5. In effect, Paul concludes by warning the congregation that Habakkuk's words apply to all who reject God's working in Jesus' ministry and who refuse Jesus as the divinely appointed Messiah.

3. Varying responses to the sermon (13:42–45)

42–43 Those who heard Paul's sermon requested Paul and Barnabas "to speak further about these things on the next Sabbath." More than likely the synagogue authorities took a less favorable view of the sermon. But "many of the Jews and devout converts to Judaism" were interested and after the service followed the apostles to hear more. And "some" of those who did this were "persuaded" (NIV "urged") by the apostles "to continue in the grace of God"—which, to judge by Paul's usual understanding of grace, must connote continuance in the Good News about salvation through Jesus.

44–45 "Almost the whole city," Luke says rather hyperbolically, gathered on the following Sabbath to hear "the word of the Lord"—an expression suggesting the Christological content of Paul's preaching. But "when the Jews saw the crowds," their initial interest turned to antagonism. Not only was the synagogue being flooded by Gentiles as though it were a common theater or town hall, but, even more, it became clear that Paul and Barnabas were ready to speak directly to Gentiles without first relating them in some way to Judaism. The majority of the Jews, including their leaders, were apparently unwilling to countenance a salvation as open to Gentiles as it was to Jews. So in their opposition "they blasphemed" (NIV: "talked abusively"; GK 1059), because from Luke's perspective opposition to the Gospel is directed not so much against the messengers as against the content of the message—Jesus himself (cf. 26:11).

4. To the Jews first, but also to the Gentiles (13:46–52)

46–47 In response to the Jews' abuse and blasphemy, Paul and Barnabas asserted their new policy—"To the Jews first, but also to the Gentiles"—a policy that had begun with the conversion of Sergius Paulus and had evidently been discussed by the missioners on the way from Paphos to Pisidian Antioch (see comment on v.13). There is evidence from the fifth century Latin commentator Jerome that this policy of preaching first to Jews and then to Gentiles, though initiated on Paul's first missionary journey and not in Jerusalem, was acknowledged very early even among certain Jewish Christians at Jerusalem.

As Paul and Barnabas saw it, the Jews of Pisidian Antioch in their exclusiveness had rejected the very thing they were looking for—"eternal life." Now, however, the Gospel must be directed to the Gentiles, for included in its mandate is the promise of Isa 49:6, that God's servant will be "a light for the Gentiles" and a bringer of salvation" to the ends of the earth" (cf. Lk 2:28–32). It was, of course, Jesus of Nazareth who was uniquely God's Servant and who was at work through his Spirit in the church, completing what he had begun and also making the missioners God's servants and inheritors of the promise in Isa 49:6.

48–49 Many of the Gentiles responded with thanks for the apostles' ministry and with openness to their message. "All who were appointed [GK 5435] for eternal life believed" suggests that belief in Christ is not just a matter of one's faith but primarily involves divine appointment. And through the conversion of many of the Gentiles, who brought the message of salvation to others, "the word of the Lord spread through the whole region." This spreading of the word, along with the apostles' own outreach to the cities named in chs. 13 and 14, probably led to the agitation of the so-called Judaizers that resulted in the problem Paul dealt with in Galatians.

50 Unable to confine the ministry of Paul and Barnabas to the synagogue, the Jews stirred up trouble against them and brought pressure on the city's magistrates through their "God-fearing" wives. Since Luke speaks of the persecution as expulsion rather than mob action, it probably took the form of a charge that Christianity, being disowned by the local Jewish community, was not a religio licita in Rome's eyes and therefore must be considered a disturbance to the Pax Romana. Later in Acts, Luke will show how the agitation against the Gospel usually arose from within the Jewish community, not from the Roman authorities, and that the charge was that Paul was preaching an illegal religion (cf. 16:20–21; 17:7; 18:13)—a charge Luke insists was unfounded. This is part of the fabric of why he wrote Acts (see Introduction: Luke's Purposes in Writing Acts).

51–52 Having been expelled from Pisidian Antioch, Paul and Barnabas "shook the dust from their feet in protest against them"—a Jewish gesture of scorn and disassociation, which was directed at the city's magistrates and the Jewish leaders. Then they went southeast on the Via Sebaste, heading for Iconium some eighty miles away. The new "disciples" left behind at Pisidian Antioch, far from being discouraged at this turn of events, were "filled with joy and with the Holy Spirit."

D. At Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe and the Return to Antioch (14:1–28)

The Via Sebaste, the great Roman road from Ephesus to the Euphrates, became two roads at Pisidian Antioch. One went north through mountainous terrain to the Roman colony of Comana about 122 miles away. The other moved southeast across rolling country, past the snow-capped peaks of Sultan Dag, to the important Greek city of Iconium, some eighty miles distant from Antioch, and from there to the Roman colony of Lystra. As Paul and Barnabas left Pisidian Antioch, therefore, they were faced with a choice as to the future direction of their mission. Choosing the southeastern route, they headed off to what would become a ministry to people of three very different types of cities in the southern portion of the Roman province of Galatia.

1. The ministry at Iconium (14:1–7)

1–2 Iconium, an ancient Phrygian town, had been transformed by the Greeks into a city-state. Situated in the heart of the high and healthy plateau of south-central Asia Minor, it was surrounded by fertile plains and verdant forests, with mountains to its north and east. With Augustus's reorganization of provinces in 25 B.C., Iconium became part of Galatia. But while Rome chose Antioch of Pisidia and Lystra as bastions of its authority in the area, Iconium remained largely Greek in temper and somewhat resistant to Roman influence. Greek was the language of its public documents, and during the NT period it attempted to retain the ethos of the old city-state. The name "Iconium" is probably Phrygian, but a myth was invented to give it a Greek meaning. According to the myth, Prometheus and Athena recreated humankind in the area after a devastating flood by making images of people from the mud and breathing life into them. The Greek for "image" is eikon, hence the name Iconium.

Entering Iconium, Paul and Barnabas went to the Jewish synagogue, following the same pattern as they had at Pisidian Antioch. As they proclaimed the Gospel, a great number of both Jews and Gentiles believed. Opposition to the Gospel soon arose, but since this city was governed by Greek jurisprudence, this opposition did not follow the same pattern as in Antioch. Paul and Barnabas were able to stay there for some time.

3 Luke tells us that the apostles ministered for a "considerable time" in the city and preached boldly "for the Lord," with God confirming "the message of his grace" by "miraculous signs and wonders." The mention of "the Lord" undoubtedly refers to Jesus the Lord, thus showing the Christocentric nature of the missioners' preaching. And the couplet "miraculous signs and wonders" (cf. 15:12) places the ministry of Paul and Barnabas directly in line with that of Jesus (cf. 2:22) and the early church (cf. 2:43; 4:30; 5:12; 6:8; 7:36) in fulfillment of prophecy (cf. 2:19). Later when writing his Galatian converts (assuming a "South Galatian" origin for the letter), Paul appeals to these mighty works performed by the Spirit as evidence that the Gospel as he preached it and as they received it was fully approved by God (cf. Gal 3:4–5).

4–5 There was a division among "the people" (GK 4436) of the city regarding the apostles and their message, some siding with the Jews and others with the apostles. Interpreted broadly, "the people" denotes no more than the populace of the city, though it may denote an assembly of prominent citizens that met to conduct the business of a Greek city-state. While no official action seems to have been taken against them, there was a "plot" brewing among some of the Gentiles and Jews to mistreat and stone them.

Significant here is Luke's lumping Barnabas together with Paul in the phrase "with the apostles" (GK 693), While Barnabas was neither one of the Twelve nor a claimant to any special revelation, he was probably one of the 120 (cf. 1:15) and may have been a witness of Jesus' resurrection. Yet as with most titles of the NT, Luke, like Paul himself (cf. 2Co 8:23; Gal 1:19; Php 2:25), not only used "apostle" in the restricted sense of a small group of highly honored believers who had a special function within the church but also in the broader sense of messengers of the Gospel.

6–7 The opposition to the ministry of Paul and Barnabas must have grown to sizable proportions, for they took it seriously enough to leave Iconium and travel to Lystra and Derbe. By referring to Lystra and Derbe as "Lycaonian cities," Luke implies that Iconium belonged to a different region from Lystra and Derbe. All three, of course, were part of the Roman province of Galatia. But in the administration of so large a province, the Romans subdivided Galatia into various regions, four of which have come down to us by name: Isauria, Pisidia, Phrygia, and Lycaonia. In fleeing to Lystra and Derbe, therefore, Paul and Barnabas were leaving one political region to start afresh in another. Thus in the Lycaonian region they continued preaching the Gospel, both in the cities of Lystra and Derbe and in the surrounding countryside.

2. The ministry at Lystra (14:8–20)

8–10 Lystra was an ancient Lycaonian village whose origins are unknown. Caesar Augustus turned it into a Roman colony in 6 B.C., and, by bringing army veterans and their families into it, made it the most eastern of the fortified cities of Galatia. Jews also lived there (16:1–3), but their influence seems to have been minimal. The Via Sebaste joined this city with Iconium (see comment on 14:1–28).

That Paul began the ministry at Lystra by preaching to a crowd may imply that no synagogue was available for him to preach in. While he was speaking, Paul saw "a man crippled in his feet, who was lame from birth and had never walked" and who was listening to him attentively. Seeing "that he had faith to be healed," Paul commanded him to stand up, and the man jumped up and walked about. Luke undoubtedly wanted his readers to recognize the parallel between the healing of this crippled man and the healing of another one by Peter (cf. 3:1–8). But the sequel to the healing of the crippled man here differs significantly from that of Peter's miracle.

11–13 The healing amazed and excited the crowd, and they shouted out in Lycaonian: "The gods have come down to us in human form!" (cf. 28:6). Barnabas they identified as Zeus, the chief of the Greek pantheon, probably because of his more dignified bearing. Paul they identified as Hermes, Zeus's son by Maia and the spokesman for the gods, since "he was the chief speaker." Archaeological findings have confirmed that both Zeus and Hermes were worshiped in Lycaonian Galatia.

Approximately half a century before Paul's first missionary journey, the Roman poet Ovid retold an ancient legend that may have been well known in southern Galatia and helps explain the wildly emotional response of the people to Paul and Barnabas. According to the legend, Zeus and Hermes once came to "the Phrygian hill country" disguised as mortals seeking lodging. Though they asked at a thousand homes, none took them in. Finally, at a humble cottage of straw and reeds, an elderly couple, Philemon and Baucis, freely welcomed them with a banquet that strained their poor resources. In appreciation, the gods transformed the cottage into a temple with a golden roof and marble columns. Philemon and Baucis they appointed priest and priestess of the temple, who, instead of dying, became an oak and a linden tree. As for the inhospitable people, the gods destroyed their houses. Seeing the healing of the crippled man and remembering the legend, the people of Lystra believed that Zeus and Hermes had returned, and they wanted to pay them homage lest they again incur the gods' wrath.

That the people shouted in Lycaonian explains why the apostles were so slow to understand what was afoot until the preparations to honor them as gods were well advanced. But when the priest of Zeus joined the crowd and began to do them homage, Paul and Barnabas realized what was about to happen. We can visualize the priest of Zeus bringing out sacrificial oxen draped in woolen "wreaths" and preparing to sacrifice at an altar that stood in front of the Temple of Zeus, hard by the city gates. And as the idolatrous worship proceeded, Paul and Barnabas began to see that they were the object of it.

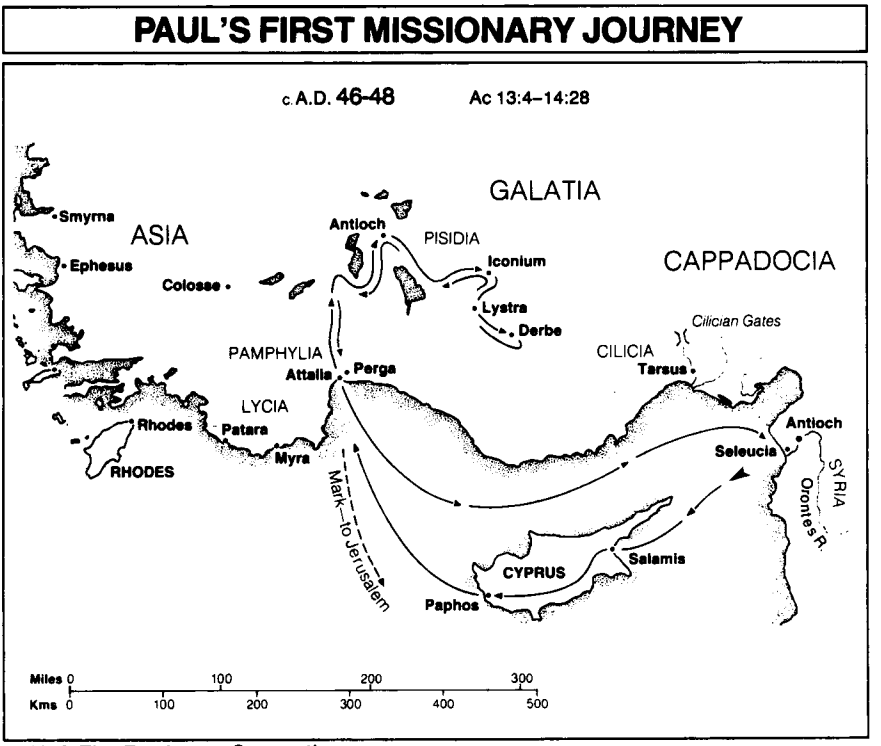
14–18 When they finally realized what was going on, Paul and Barnabas tore their clothes in horror at such blasphemy and rushed out into the crowd—shouting their objections and trying to make the people understand them. There is no reason to think that the majority of the Lystrans knew anything of Jewish history or of the Jewish Scriptures, or that they had been vitally affected by Athenian philosophies. Culturally, they were probably peasants living in the hinterland of Greco-Roman civilization, with all of the lack of advantages of people in their situation. Such is the context of Paul's second missionary sermon. By far the briefest of the three (cf. 13:16–41; 17:22–31), its brevity reflects its confused setting.

Negatively, Paul's sermon at Lystra has to do with the futility of idolatry; positively, it is a proclamation of the one true and living God. Its language, particularly in its denunciation of paganism, is biblical. But its argument is suited to its hearers. And despite the brevity with which Luke reports it, two features stand out in the development of Paul's argument. First, his demonstration of the interest and goodness of God is drawn neither from Scripture (as at Pisidian Antioch) nor from philosophy (as later at Athens) but from nature: "He has shown kindness by giving you rain from heaven and crops in their seasons, he provides you with plenty of food. . . ." It is an approach to theism that peasants would understand.

Second, Paul preached that "in the past, he [God] let all nations go their own way," which suggests that at Lystra Paul preached about a progressive unfolding of divine redemption. While the sermon does not explicitly refer to salvation through Christ, it is hard to believe that it was not meant to point to Jesus Christ and his work as the divine climax of history. "We too are only men, human like you," Paul and Barnabas insisted. But, they went on to say, "we are bringing you good news"—the best news possible—of the unity and character of the one true God and of redemption through the person and work of Jesus his Son. Yet for most of the Lystrans, the message fell on deaf ears, and they tried to carry on the sacrifices in honor of the visitors.

19–20 Later on certain Jews from Pisidian Antioch and Iconium, disaffected with Paul and Barnabas, came to Lystra to spread their views. Complaining first among the Jewish residents of the city, they managed to gain a hearing with the people. The fickle Lystrans, thinking that if the apostles were not gods they were impostors, then stoned Paul and dragged him outside the city for dead. But with the aid of those who had accepted the Gospel, he revived; and, with great courage, he returned that evening to the city where he had almost been killed. The next day, Paul and Barnabas left for the border town of Derbe.

Some months later, when Paul wrote the believers in Galatia (again, we assume a "South Galatian" destination for the letter), he closed by saying, "Finally, let no one cause me trouble, for I bear on my body the marks of Jesus" (Gal 6:17). Some of the marks may well have been scars caused by the stoning at Lystra. And when still later he wrote the Corinthians of his being stoned (2Co 11:25), it was Lystra he had in mind (cf. also 2Ti 3:11).



3. The ministry at Derbe and the return to Antioch (14:21–28)

21a Derbe was situated in the southeastern part of the Lycaonian region of Galatia, about sixty miles southeast of Lystra. In 25 B.C. Augustus incorporated it into the province of Galatia, making it a provincial border town on the eastern edge of the southern Galatian plateau. Luke's account of the ministry at Derbe is brief. All he says is that the apostles "preached the good news" there and "won a large number of disciples." Luke spends more time talking about the larger and more influential churches in Antioch and Iconium, though the congregations in the smaller and more rural towns seem to have contributed more young men as candidates for the missionary endeavor (e.g., Timothy from Lystra [16:1–3; 20:4]; Gaius from Derbe [20:4])—a pattern not altogether different from today, where the larger churches often capture the headlines and the smaller congregations provide much of the personnel.

21b–23 Having preached at Derbe, Paul and Barnabas returned to Lystra, Iconium, and Pisidian Antioch. Why they did not push instead further east through the passes of the Taurus range into Cilicia, Luke does not tell us. Perhaps Cilicia was considered already evangelized through Paul's earlier efforts (cf. comment on 9:30); this would also explain why the apostles began their missionary outreach on Cyprus and not in Cilicia (cf. 13:4). Undoubtedly their concern for the new converts in the Galatian cities led them to return by the same road. In returning to Lystra, Iconium, and Pisidian Antioch, they probably confined their ministries to those already converted, and thus did not stir up any further opposition (cf. 16:6; 18:23; 20:3–6).

While returning through the Galatian cities, Paul and Barnabas tried to strengthen their converts personally and corporately. They encouraged them to remain in the faith, telling them that many persecutions must necessarily be the lot of Christians in order to enter into the kingdom of God—that is, that the same pattern of suffering and glory exemplified in Jesus' life must be theirs as well if they are to know the full measure of the reign of God in their lives (cf. Mk 8:31–10:52; Ro 8:17; Php 3:10–11; Col 1:24). And "they appointed elders for them in each church," thus leaving them with suitable spiritual guides and an embryonic ecclesiastical administration. In the early Gentile churches (as also undoubtedly at Jerusalem), the terms "elders" (GK 4565) and "bishops" (or "overseers"; GK 2176) were used somewhat interchangeably and functionally rather than as titles (cf. 20:17, 28).

24–25 Directly south of Phrygia was the region of Pisidia and south of that the province of Pamphylia. In Pamphylia the apostles preached at Perga, the chief city of the province, thus beginning the kind of witness in Perga they had been unable to begin on their first visit (cf. comment on 13:13). Of its results we know nothing, nor do we know the nature of their visit to the port of Attalia, some eight miles further south on the Mediterranean coast, from where they embarked on a boat for the voyage back to Syria.

26–28 On returning to Antioch of Syria and to the congregation that had sent them out, Paul and Barnabas "reported all that God had done through them and how he had opened the door of faith to the Gentiles." They had gone out under divine ordination, and their report stressed the fact that God himself had brought about the new policy for evangelizing the Gentiles, which was inaugurated at Paphos and followed throughout the cities of southern Galatia—a claim that was called into question by some believers in Jerusalem and was soon to be tested at the Jerusalem Council. So having returned from a missionary journey that occupied the best part of a year, the apostles remained at Syrian Antioch, ministering in the church there for approximately another year.

E. The Jerusalem Council (15:1–29)

The convening of the council of apostles and Christian leaders at Jerusalem in approximately A.D. 49 was an event of greatest importance for the early church. That Gentiles were to share in the promises to Israel is a recurring theme of the OT (cf. Ge 22:18; 26:4; 28:14; Isa 49:6; 55:5–7; Zep 3:9–10; Zec 8:22). It was the underlying presupposition for Jewish proselytizing and was implicit in the sermons of Peter at Pentecost (Ac 2:39) and in the house of Cornelius (10:35). But the correlative conviction of Judaism was that Israel was God's appointed agent for the administration of these blessings—that only through the nation and its institutions could Gentiles ever have a part in God's redemption and share in his favor. There seems to have been no expectation on the part of Christians at Jerusalem that this program would be materially altered, though they did insist that in these "last days" God was at work in and through Jewish Christians as the faithful remnant within the nation.

In the experience of the church, all Gentiles—with one exception—who had come to acknowledge Jesus as Messiah had been either full proselytes or near proselytes ("God-fearers"). Only Cornelius's conversion did not fit into the pattern (cf. 10:1–11:18). But this event was viewed as exceptional and not an occasion for changing policy. The practice of preaching directly to Gentiles begun by Paul in his mission on Cyprus and throughout southern Asia Minor, however, was a matter of far-reaching concern at Jerusalem, especially in view of the tensions that arose within Palestine after the death of Herod Agrippa I in A.D. 44.

As the faithful remnant, the Jerusalem church naturally expected the Christian mission to proceed along lines God laid down long ago. It could point to the fact that, with few exceptions, commitment to Jesus as Israel's Messiah did not make Jews less Jewish. Indeed, it sometimes brought Gentiles who were only loosely associated with the synagogues into greater conformity with Jewish ethics. The Christian movement had always insisted on its integral relation to the religion and nation of Israel, even though this relation contained some unresolved ambiguities and was defined in various ways within the movement. But Paul's new policy for reaching Gentiles, despite his claim of the authority of revelation and of providence for it, seemed to many Jewish Christians to undercut the basis of the ministry of the Jerusalem church. It seemed to give the lie to the stance of Jerusalem Christianity—particularly if condoned by believers of Jerusalem.

A word should be said here about Pauline chronology (for full discussion, see EBC 9:440–42; also 10:417–20), particularly the thorny question of the relation of Paul s "second visit" to Jerusalem (Gal 2:1–10) to the Jerusalem Council (Ac 15). The literary and historical issues are complex (cf. comments on 11:29–30). But one point drawn from the polemic in Galatians needs to be made here: Paul's silence in Galatians as to the decision of the Jerusalem Council forces the irreconcilable dilemma of saying either (1) that Luke's account in Ac 15 of a decision reached in Paul's favor at Jerusalem is pure fabrication or (2) that Galatians was written before the Jerusalem Council. It is the opinion of this commentary that the second option is the more likely.

Accepting Galatians, then, as having been written before the Jerusalem Council, we have some idea from Paul himself concerning repercussions in Jerusalem in regard to his Gentile ministry, both as it was carried on in the synagogues at Antioch of Syria and as it was further developed in Cyprus and southern Asia Minor. On his second visit to Jerusalem after his conversion (cf. 11:27–30 and comments on 11:29–30), the issue came to a head in the case of the uncircumcised Titus who accompanied Paul and Barnabas to Jerusalem. In spite of pressures and some uncertainty, the Jerusalem apostles stood with Paul on the validity of a Gentile mission and the inappropriateness of making circumcision a requirement for Gentiles—though probably neither Paul nor they at that time saw a massive direct ministry to Gentiles in the offing. Paul's account of the Antioch episode in Gal 2:11–21 clearly shows that the Gentile ministry was causing repercussions at Jerusalem and that the Jerusalem congregation was exerting pressure. The passage also suggests that the rationale for separating Jewish and Gentile believers was based on expediency rather than on principle. And it was this issue of expediency versus theological principle that required clarification in the early church and lent urgency to the Jerusalem Council.

1. The delegation from Syrian Antioch (15:1–4)

1 The immediate occasion for the Jerusalem Council was the visit to Syrian Antioch of some Jewish Christians from Jerusalem and their teaching that on principle, circumcision was essential to salvation. These became known as "Judaizers," and their comrades were promoting similar teaching among Paul's converts in Galatia. They may have been incited by the return of John Mark and his unfavorable report (cf. comment on 13:13). Both James and Peter (cf. Gal 2:9) were interested in minimizing conflicts between Judaism and Jewish Christianity. Yet neither was prepared to sacrifice the principles of the Gospel to expediency when the implications of doing this became plain. Undoubtedly the Judaizers thought of themselves as acting conscientiously and on sound theological principles (cf. comment on v.5 below). But as Paul saw it, they sought "a good impression outwardly . . . to avoid being persecuted for the cross of Christ" (Gal 6:12).

2 With the issues highlighted by the "sharp dispute and debate" that followed, Paul and Barnabas were appointed, along with certain others from the Antioch congregation, to go up to Jerusalem to meet with "the apostles and elders" about the matter. It was probably the entire congregation at Antioch and its leaders that appointed these men to discuss the issue (cf. 13:3). Antioch Christians were desirous for the relation between the Jerusalem church's policy of cautious expediency and the Judaizers' argument founded on theological principle to be clarified. The Jerusalem Christians, for their part, undoubtedly welcomed an opportunity to air their concerns—particularly the impasse created for them by Paul and Barnabas through their Gentile policy. For while there may have been general agreement on the validity of evangelizing Gentiles (cf. Gal 2:7–10), recent events opened that agreement for reconsideration.

3–4 As the delegation from Antioch journeyed to Jerusalem, they told the believers in Phoenicia and Samaria the news of "the conversion of the Gentiles." The Phoenician and Samaritan Christians, being themselves converts of the Hellenists' mission after Stephen's martyrdom (cf. 8:4–25; 11:19), probably took a broader view than that which prevailed at Jerusalem and rejoiced at the news. Believers at Jerusalem also were interested, but their interest by no means involved whole-hearted approval.

2. The nature and course of the debate (15:5–12)

5 In the ensuing debate among believers in general and in the council itself, some Christian Pharisees, in support of the Judaizers, insisted that it was necessary for Gentile Christians to "be circumcised and required to obey the law of Moses." And by this necessity they meant that these things were not only expedient but required by the revealed will of God. In their thinking, they read that the prophets spoke of the salvation of the Gentiles as an event of the last days (cf. Isa 2:2; 11:10; 25:8–9; Zec 8:23) through the witness of a restored Israel (cf. Isa 2:3; 60:2–3; Zec

8:23). Thus they could hardly oppose reaching Gentiles through the ministry of the church. But they felt that the outreach to Gentiles should come from within their group and follow a proselyte model, not come from outside their group and be apart from the law. After all, in the last days, all nations were to flow to the house of the Lord at Jerusalem (cf. Isa 2:2–3; 25:6–8; 56:7; 60:3–22; Zec 8:21–23), not depart from it.

6 While Luke says only that the apostles and elders met to consider these questions, his mention of "the whole assembly" in v.12 and "the whole church" in v.22 shows that other members of the congregation were also present. The discussion was undoubtedly heated, but Luke centers on its Pauline aspect.

7–11 Peter was no longer the chief figure of the Jerusalem church, for James had now assumed that role (cf. comment on 12:17). But Peter was dominant in the Jewish Christian mission and responsible to the Jerusalem church. And it is as a missionary, not an administrator, that he spoke up and reminded the council that God had chosen to have the Gentiles hear the Gospel from him and accept it. He argued that since God had established such a precedent within the Jewish Christian mission some ten years earlier—though it had not been recognized by the church as such—God has already indicated his approval of a direct Gentile outreach. Thus Paul's approach to the Gentiles could not be branded as a deviation from the divine will. Peter had evidently completely recovered from his temporary lapse at Syrian Antioch. Now he saw matters more clearly and was ready to agree with Paul's position that there is "no difference" between Jews and Gentiles and that the Mosaic law was a "yoke."

12 Luke's reference to the silence of the assembly after Peter spoke implies that the turning point had come. Though resisted at Jerusalem for almost a decade, the precedent of Cornelius's conversion had opened the way for Barnabas and Paul's report of God's validation of their missionary policy through "miraculous signs and wonders." It was a report not of their successes but of how God had acted, and its implication was that by his acts God had revealed his will. Barnabas is mentioned first here (cf. v.25), probably because he enjoyed greater confidence at Jerusalem.

3. The summing up by James (15:13–21)

13 James, the Lord's brother, presided at the Jerusalem Council (cf. comment on 12:17). He was ascetic and scrupulous in keeping the law. The Judaizers within the church looked to him for support, knowing both his legal qualifications and his personal qualities. But while rigorous and scrupulous in his personal practice of the faith, James was more broad-minded than many of his followers. After calling the council to order by using the formal mode of address "Men, brothers," he went on to sum up the emerging view of the council in a way that linked it to what had already been said.

14 In summing up, James made no reference to Paul and Barnabas's report, probably more for political reasons than any of principle. After all, it was the work of Paul and Barnabas that was on trial, and James wanted to win his entire audience to the position he believed to be right without causing needless offense. Therefore, he began by reminding the council of Peter's testimony and went on to show how he felt about the question at issue by speaking of believing Gentiles as a "people" (GK 3295) whom God had taken "for himself"—thus (1) applying to Gentile Christians a designation formerly used of Israel alone, and (2) agreeing with Peter that in the conversion of Cornelius God himself had taken the initiative for a direct Gentile ministry.

15–17 James's major contribution to the decision of the council was to shift the discussion of the conversion of Gentiles from a proselyte model to an eschatological one. Isaiah had expected Gentile converts to come to Jerusalem to learn God's ways so that they might walk in them. But Isaiah also spoke of the Gentiles' persistence as nations whose salvation did not destroy their national identities (cf. Isa 2:4; 25:6–7). Likewise, Am 9:11–12 (in the LXX version) spoke of "the remnant of people" in the last days when "David's fallen tent" would be rebuilt as being "all the Gentiles who bear my name" and whose continuance as Gentiles was understood. In the end times, James is saying, God's people will consist of two concentric groups. At their core will be restored Israel (i.e., David's rebuilt tent); gathered around them will be a group of Gentiles (i.e., "the remnant of people") who will share in the messianic blessings but will persist as Gentiles without necessarily becoming Jewish proselytes. It is this understanding of Amos's message, James insisted, that Peter's testimony has affirmed, the result being that the conversion of Gentiles in the last days should be seen not as proselytizing but in an eschatological context.

18 The interpretation of v.18 is notoriously difficult. Many (such as NIV) understand the clause as part of a conflated biblical citation that extends from v.16 through v.18, probably alluding to Isa 45:21. It seems better, however, to interpret the words here as a comment by James to this effect: We cannot be in opposition to the express will of God, as evidenced by Peter's testimony and the prophets' words—but only God himself knows for certain how everything fits together and is to be fully understood!

19 On the basic issue that brought the members of the first ecumenical council together—that of the necessity of relating Gentiles to Judaism in the Christian mission—James refused to side with the Judaizers. He may not have been prepared to endorse openly all the details of Paul's Gentile policy. Certainly there is no indication that he expected the Jerusalem church to do that. But he could not be in opposition to the express will of God, and therefore his advice was that Jewish Christianity should not take any stance against the promotion of the Gentile mission. In so concluding, he swept aside the obstacles that had arisen to Paul's Gentile mission among believers at Jerusalem and left it free for further advances within the empire.

20–21 On the practical question that troubled many Christians in Jerusalem and that originally gave rise to the Judaizers' assertion—namely, the question of fellowship between Jews and Gentiles in the church and of tolerance for the scruples of others—James's advice was that a letter be written to the Gentile Christians. This letter should request them to abstain "from food polluted by idols, from sexual immorality, from the meat of strangled animals and from blood." These prohibitions have often been viewed as a compromise between two warring parties, which nullified the effect of James's earlier words and made the decision of the Jerusalem Council unacceptable to Paul. But in reality they should be viewed not as dealing with the principial issue of the council but as meeting certain practical concerns. They were not primarily theological but more sociological in nature—concessions to the scruples of others for the sake of harmony within the church and the continuance of the Jewish Christian mission. Therefore James added the rationale of v.21, suggesting that since Jewish communities are found in every city, their scruples are to be respected by Gentile believers.

To sum up, we may say that two types of "necessary" questions were raised at the Jerusalem Council. The first had to do with the theological necessity of circumcision and the Jewish law for salvation, and that was rejected. The second had to do with the practical necessity of Gentile Christians to abstain from certain practices for the sake of Jewish-Gentile fellowship in the church and the Jewish Christian mission throughout the Diaspora, and that was approved.

4. The decision and letter of the Council (15:22–29)

22 With James's judgment "the apostles and elders, with the whole church," agreed, deciding to send their decision back to Antioch of Syria not only by Paul and Barnabas but also by two leaders of the Jerusalem congregation, Judas Barsabbas and Silas, whose presence would assure reception of the decision and who could interpret the feelings of the council from a Jerusalem perspective. It seems clear that within the Jerusalem church, the congregation was involved in the deliberations of its leaders.

When one considers the situation of the Jerusalem church in A.D. 49, the decision reached by the Jerusalem Christians must be considered one of the boldest and most magnanimous in the annals of church history. While still attempting to minister exclusively to the Jewish nation, the council refused to impede the progress of that other branch of the Christian mission whose success meant further difficulty for them from within their own nation. Undoubtedly there was some uncertainty among the council's leaders about details of the decision. Certainly they reached it only after much agonizing. Likewise, there probably remained in the Jerusalem church a recalcitrant group that continued to predict ominous consequences. But the decision was made and the malcontents silenced—at least for a time.

The effects of the council's decision were far-reaching. (1) It freed the Gospel from any necessary entanglement with Judaism and Israelite institutions, though without renouncing the legitimacy of continued Christian activity within them. Thus both Paul's mission to the Gentiles and the various Jewish Christian missions were enabled to progress side-by-side without conflict. (2) Attitudes to Paul within Jewish Christianity were clarified. While some of the Jewish believers probably became even more opposed to Paul, others (e.g., John Mark, see vv.37–39) seem to have become more reconciled to him. Also, some felt happier in a Gentile ministry than at Jerusalem (e.g., Silas; see v.40). (3) The decision of the council had the effect of permanently antagonizing many Jews. From this time onward, the Christian mission within the nation—particularly in and around Jerusalem—faced rough sledding (cf. Ro 11:28). When coupled with the zealotism within the nation during the next two decades, this antagonism proved fatal to the life and ministry of the Jerusalem church.

23–29 With Judas, Silas, Paul, and Barnabas, who were going to Antioch, the Jerusalem church sent a letter, recorded here in Ac 15. The placing of "brothers" in apposition to "the apostles and elders" in the salutation is unusual. But it should probably be understood as reflecting a form of expression used within the Jerusalem congregation, similar to "Men, brothers" (cf. 1:16; 2:29, 37; 15:7, 13; et al.). Likewise, the address "to the Gentile believers in Antioch, Syria and Cilicia" is surprising, for though Paul refers to spending some time in Syria and Cilicia, Luke has not spoken of any mission outside of Antioch in these areas. Yet vv.36, 41 assume that churches were established in these areas with Paul's assistance. And 16:4 shows that the content of the letter from the council was meant not only for congregations in the areas listed in 15:23 but that it applied to Gentile believers generally (cf. 15:19; 21:25).

The body of the letter encapsulates the problem confronted by the churches because of the Judaizers' claims and the Jerusalem Council's reaction to them, commending to the churches Barnabas and Paul (cf. comments on 14:14 and 15:12 for this order of their names) and the Jerusalem emissaries Judas and Silas. On the fundamental matter of the theological necessity of circumcision and a Jewish lifestyle for Gentile Christians, the letter rebukes the Judaizers for going beyond their authority and assures the churches that there are no such requirements for salvation. On the practical issues of fellowship between Jewish and Gentile believers in the churches and of preventing needless offense to Jews throughout the empire, the letter asks Gentile Christians to abstain from the four prohibitions mentioned in v.20. The letter closed in a way typical of many contemporary nonliterary papyri.

F. The Reception of the Council's Decision and of the Letter (15:30–16:4)

Luke describes the aftermath of the Jerusalem Council in three vignettes that all relate to the reception of the council's decision and letter in three localities of earlier Gentile outreach: Antioch of Syria (15:30–35), Syria and Cilicia (15:36–41), and the southern part of Galatia (16:1–4). Other items of information are also included, as Luke uses these final scenes of his fourth panel of material to prepare for the extensive outreach of the Gospel through Paul's second and third missionary journeys.

1. At Antioch of Syria (15:30–35)

30–32 At Antioch of Syria the delegation on returning from Jerusalem "gathered the church together and delivered the letter," with Judas and Silas saying "much to encourage and strengthen the brothers." And the believers, Luke tells us, "were glad." Having gained a decided victory in the principial matter of circumcision, Paul and the existing Gentile churches were prepared to accept the four decrees as a modus operandi for reducing friction between two groups of people drawn from two different ways of life. Such an attitude is quite in accord with what Paul himself wrote later in 1Co 9:19–23.

33–35 After some time, Judas and Silas returned to Jerusalem with the commendation of the Antioch believers. Paul and Barnabas, however, remained at Syrian Antioch and joined others in carrying on the ministry there. Later Paul appears to have sent for Silas to accompany him on his missionary journeys (v.40).

2. Disagreement and two missionary teams (15:36–41)

36 Luke now presents Paul as taking the initiative for another missionary journey. To Paul, of course, it was not intended as a new outreach but only a revisiting of believers converted on the first missionary journey. Nevertheless, God was to bring a second missionary journey out of it. This section provides something of a bridge between the completion of the advances reported in panel 4 and the beginning of those reported in panel 5.

37–39 John Mark, Barnabas's cousin (cf. Col 4:10), probably became convinced of the appropriateness of Paul's Gentile policy by the action of the Jerusalem Council, despite earlier qualms about it (see comment on 13:13). Barnabas had evidently called him back to Syrian Antioch to minister in the church there. Barnabas's earlier involvement in the dispute at Antioch showed that his natural sympathies lay principally with Jewish Christians (cf. Gal 2:13), and it was also natural for him to want to take Mark with them in revisiting the churches. Paul, however, for what seem to have been reasons of principle rather than personal ones, did not want to have so unreliable a man with them day after day. The scar tissue of the wounds Paul suffered in establishing his missionary policy was still too tender for him to look favorably on Mark's being with them—particularly if, as we have assumed, Mark was in some way responsible for inciting the Judaizers to action.

The fact that Luke does not gloss over the quarrel between Paul and Barnabas shows his honesty. Yet far from letting the disagreement harm the outreach of the Gospel, God providentially used it to double the missionary force, with Barnabas taking Mark and returning to Cyprus (cf. 13:4–12). Acts tells us nothing more about the mission to Cyprus or the missioners there, though Paul later refers in cordial terms to both Barnabas (cf. 1Co 9:6) and John Mark (cf. Col 4:10; 2Ti 4:11; Phm 24).

40–41 Paul's selection of Silas (or "Silvanus," as he is referred to more formally by his Latinized name in 2Co 1:19; 1Th 1:1; 2Th 1:1; 1Pe 5:12) to accompany him on his return visit to the churches was wise. He had evidently come to appreciate Silas in their contacts at Jerusalem and Syrian Antioch and concluded that he would make a congenial colleague. More than that, Silas was a leader in the Jerusalem congregation (15:22) and was explicitly identified in the Jerusalem letter as one who could speak with authority on the attitude of the Jerusalem church (v.27). He was also, it seems, a Roman citizen who could claim, if need be, the privileges of such citizenship along with Paul (16:37). This was not true of Barnabas. Likewise, Silas was a prophet (15:32), who appears to have been fluent in Greek (15:22, 32) and a helpful amanuensis (1Th 1:1; 2Th 1:1; 1Pe 5:12). Thus Paul and Silas set out with the blessing of the Antioch congregation. The churches in Syria and Cilicia that they revisited and strengthened were presumably founded through the efforts of Paul (15:23, 36). As such, they would be receptive to the decision and letter of the Jerusalem Council.

3. Paul adds Timothy to the team in Galatia (16:1–4)

1–2 Pushing on through the Cilician Gates in the Taurus mountains, Paul and Silas came to the Galatian border town of Derbe and then moved on to Lystra. At Lystra he found a young man who was highly spoken of by believers in both Lystra and the neighboring city of Iconium. The Jewish community at Lystra seems to have been small and without influence (cf. comments on 14:8–10). Probably for that reason Timothy's mother, a Jewess, was allowed to marry a Greek. Timothy, however, had never been circumcised. In Jewish law, a child takes the religion of its mother; so Timothy should have been circumcised and raised a Jew. But in Greek law the father dominates in the home. Apparently the Jewish community at Lystra was too weak or lax to interfere with Greek custom. In 2Ti 1:5 Paul speaks of the sincere Jewish faith of Timothy's grandmother Lois and of his mother, Eunice, and 2Ti 3:15 speaks of Timothy's early instruction in the Hebrew Scriptures. Here Eunice is identified as a Jewess as well as a Christian believer, who had probably been converted during the first visit of Paul and Barnabas to Lystra. The Greek implies that her husband was now dead. From Paul's reference to Timothy in 1Co 4:17 as his "son," we may assume that Timothy's conversion to Christ also dates from the proclamation of the Gospel on that first missionary journey.

3–4 Why, after all the discussion in Jerusalem, would Paul circumcise Timothy? Some commentators even question whether Paul actually did this. But while Paul stoutly resisted any imposition of circumcision and the Jewish law upon his Gentile converts (e.g., Titus; see Gal 2:1–5), he himself continued to live as an observant Jew and urged his converts to express their Christian faith through the cultural forms they had inherited (cf. 1Co 7:17–24). As for Timothy, because of his Jewish mother, he was a Jew in the eyes of the Jewish world. Therefore, it was both proper and expedient for Paul to circumcise him. As Paul saw it, being a good Christian did not mean being a bad Jew. Rather, it meant being a fulfilled Jew. Paul had no desire to flout Jewish scruples in his endeavor to bring both Jews and Gentiles to salvation in Christ. Similarly, there is no reason to think he would have refused to deliver the decision of the Jerusalem Council to his Galatian converts and every reason to believe he would—particularly if he had written Galatians to them earlier and was now able to say that the Jerusalem leaders supported his position.

G. A Summary Statement (16:5)

5 This summary statement, concluding a crucial phase of Luke's narrative, is comparable to the summary statements of 6:7; 9:31; 12:24 that culminate their respective panels (cf. also 19:20 and 28:31 later). It stresses the strengthening and growth of the churches as a result of Paul's missionary policy and the response of the Jerusalem church to it.

Panel 5—Wide Outreach Through Two Missionary Journeys (16:6–19:20)

Panel 5 presents the wide outreach of the Christian mission through two further missionary journeys of Paul in the eastern part of the empire. Having described the gradual extension of the Gospel to new groups of people and through a new missionary policy, Luke now shows its entrance into new areas. Notable in this panel are Luke's emphases upon (1) God's direction in and supervision of the Gospel's outreach, (2) Christianity's right to be considered a religio licita (see Introduction: Luke's Purposes in Writing Acts), and (3) Paul's circumstantial preaching in terms of proclamation and persuasion. Also of interest is the fact that the missionary outreach was confined to the major cities of the Aegean coastline connected by the main Roman roads, and that at the beginning of this panel we have our first "we" section (16:10–17; cf. 20:5–15; 21:1–18; 27:1–28:16). Temporal references in the panel are fairly general, and even when datable—e.g., the Edict of Claudius (18:2) and Gallio's proconsulate (18:12)—they leave some margin for dispute. Generally, however, the material given here covers the years A.D. 49–56, with the journey into Macedonia and Achaia taking place about 49–52 and the one centered in Ephesus during 53–56.

A. Providential Direction for the Mission (16:6–10)

6 The missionary journeys of Paul reveal an extraordinary combination of strategic planning and sensitivity to the guidance of the Holy Spirit in working out the details of the main goals. This is especially noticeable here. Having revisited the churches at Derbe, Lystra, Iconium, and Pisidian Antioch, Paul evidently expected to follow the Via Sebaste westward to the important coastal city and capital of the Roman province of Asia, Ephesus. But he was "kept by the Holy Spirit" from entering Asia and so continued to travel throughout "the region of Phrygia and Galatia." There is some uncertainty as to what Luke meant by this region. Some think that Paul journeyed into northern Galatia, but there is no linguistic support here for a so-called North Galatian theory. Rather, the juxtaposition of "Phrygia" and "Galatia" must be understood either (1) politically, meaning not the entire province of Galatia but only its Phrygic region, or, possibly, (2) ethnologically and popularly, meaning a district adjoining the region of Phrygia in the southern portion of the Roman province of Galatia where both Phrygian and Celtic dialects could be heard.

The heightening of terminology in vv.6–10 from "the Holy Spirit" to "the Spirit of Jesus" to "God" is not just stylistic but an unconscious expression of the early church's embryonic trinitarian faith. All three terms refer to God by his Spirit giving direction to the mission. But just how the Holy Spirit revealed his will we are not told. Perhaps in one or more instances Silas had a part, for he was a prophet (15:32).

7–8 Mysia was a region in northwest Asia Minor that lacked precise boundaries because it never was an independent political entity. It was generally considered to be bounded by the Aegean Sea on the west; the Hellespont (or Dardanelles), Propontis (or Sea of Marmara), and Bithynia along its northern extremities from west to east; Galatia on the east and southeast; Phrygia to the south; and the area of Lydia to the southwest. It included the historic Aegean seaport of Troas and the site of ancient Troy some ten miles inland.

As Paul's party moved northwest along the borders of Mysian territory, they decided to go on into the Thracian area of Bithynia in order to evangelize the strategic cities and important Black Sea ports there, all of which were interconnected by an elaborate Roman road system. But, Luke tells us, "the Spirit of Jesus would not allow them to" (v.7). Later, Christians in Bithynia were included in the salutation of 1Pe 1:1. But Paul was not directed by God to evangelize there. Instead, the missionary party turned westward again, traveling through Mysia till they reached Troas on the Aegean coast.

9–10 Troas became an important Greek port about 300 B.C. and was named Alexandria Troas. After the break-up of Alexander the Great's short-lived empire, Troas was ruled for a time by the Seleucids from Syrian Antioch, but it soon became an independent city-state. At the mouth of the Dardanelles, it was the pivotal port between the land masses of Europe and Asia Minor and the great waterways of the Aegean and Black Seas.

At Troas Paul received a vision of a Macedonian asking for help. He took this as a divine call to evangelize Macedonia. Many commentators have suggested that Paul met Luke at Troas, perhaps initially for medical reasons, and that Luke impressed upon him during their conversations the need for the preaching of the Gospel in Macedonia—an encounter God used in a vision to direct Paul and his colleagues to Macedonia. Whatever secondary means God may have used, Paul and his party responded to it at once by making preparations to leave for Macedonia. Such preparations would have required finding passage on a ship sailing for Neapolis.

Authentic turning points in history are few. But surely among them that of the Macedonian vision ranks high. Because of Paul's obedience at this point, the Gospel went westward; and ultimately Europe and the Western world were evangelized. Christian response to the call of God is never a trivial thing. Indeed, as in this instance, great issues and untold blessings may depend on it.

It is at Troas that the first of the "we" sections of Acts appears (16:10–17). Because (1) this "we" section stops at Philippi, (2) the second "we" section (20:5–15) begins when the missionaries revisit Philippi after the third missionary journey, and (3) the ministry at Philippi receives the greatest attention (thirty verses) in this fifth panel, we may reasonably suppose the narrator implied in "we" was Luke and that he was a resident of Philippi who traveled from Troas to Philippi with Paul and Silas.

B. At Philippi (16:11–40)

Luke devotes more space to Paul's mission in Philippi than he does to any other city on his second and third missionary journeys—and he does this despite the brief stay there. To judge from the "we" sections that end in 16:10–17 and begin again in 20:5–15, it may be that Luke had some part in the founding and growth of the church there.

1. Arrival in the city (1:11–12)

11 Samothrace is an island in the northeastern part of the Aegean Sea, lying between Troas and Philippi. It is the most conspicuous landmark in the North Aegean, for its mountains reach up 5,577 feet. It was a stopover for ships plying their trade in the North Aegean. Neapolis on the northern coast of the Aegean was the port for Philippi, which lay ten miles further inland. Neapolis was on the Via Egnatia, which ran east to Byzantium and west to Philippi, then to Thessalonica, and finally across the Balkan peninsula to the Adriatic coast.

Since Luke was on board, we have a port-by-port description of the voyage, with specific mention of the time it took—as we do in the other "we" sections (see comment on 16:6–19:20). The wind at this crossing must have favored the travelers, for it took only two days to sail the 156 miles to Neapolis, though the trip in the other direction after the third missionary journey took five days (cf. 20:5).

12 Philippi was situated on a plain bounded by Mount Pangaeus to the north and northeast, with the rivers Strymon and Nestos on either side. Its fame in earlier days came from its fertile plain and gold in the mountains to the north. Philip II of Macedon recognized the city's importance, and in 356 B.C. he established a large Greek colony there. With the subjugation of the Macedonians by Rome in 167 B.C., Philippi became part of the Roman Empire. In 146 B.C. it was included within the reorganized province of Macedonia, whose capital was at Thessalonica. In 42 B.C., the city was designated a Roman colony, meaning that its government was responsible directly to the emperor and not to the provincial administration. Philippi's importance during the NT period, therefore, resulted from its agriculture, its strategic commercial location on both sea and land routes, its still functioning gold mines, and its status as a Roman colony. In addition, it had a famous school of medicine with graduates throughout the then-known world.

Luke's reference to Philippi as "the leading [or first] city of that district of Macedonia" is somewhat confusing. Actually, Amphipolis, the early district capital between 167–146 B.C., and Thessalonica, the provincial capital after that, had a more valid claim to that title. Luke's designation of Philippi in this manner probably expresses his pride in his city (though the expression might also mean that is was the leading city only in that particular part of Macedonia).

2. The conversion of Lydia (16:13–15)

13 In Jewish law, a synagogue congregation could be formed only if there were at least ten male heads of households. Failing this, a place of prayer under the open sky and near a river or the sea was to be arranged for. Philippi apparently did not have the quorum and so was without a synagogue. On the Sabbath, therefore, Paul and his companions walked outside the city in search of a Jewish place of prayer, probably heading toward the Gangites River about a mile and a half west of the city. There they found some women gathered for informal worship (see comment on 13:14b–15). The most they could hope for was to hear from a traveling Jewish teacher an exposition or exhortation from Scripture and receive a blessing. Paul and his companions sat down with these women and began to speak to them.
