12 Paul announces his plans for the future as they concern Titus. Another worker will be sent to replace Titus in Crete; the latter's assignment to Crete was not permanent. At the time of writing, however, neither the time nor the final selection of the replacement has been determined. Nothing further is known of Artemas. Tychicus was a trusted co-worker who on several occasions appears as traveling with or for Paul (Ac 20:4; Eph 6:21–22; Col 4:7–8; 2Ti 4:12). As soon as a replacement arrives, Titus must proceed as quickly as possible to Nicopolis, apparently the city in Epirus on the west coast of Greece. Paul plans to spend the winter there, presumably making it a base of operation for work in Dalmatia. "There" shows that Paul is not yet there. The place of writing is unknown, but it may have been Corinth.

13 Zenas and Apollos are almost certainly the bearers of this letter. Zenas's name is Greek, but he may have been a convert from Judaism. If he was of Jewish origin, "lawyer" means that he had been an expert in the Mosaic law; if a Gentile, it means he had been a Roman jurist. Apollos is the well-known Alexandrian Jew who, having been fully instructed at Ephesus, effectively worked in the Corinthian church (Ac 18:24–28; 19:1; 1Co 1:12; 3:4–6; 4:6; 16:12). Their journey will take Zenas and Apollos through Crete, and Titus must diligently assist them by seeing that their further needs are supplied. Such generous material assistance for Christian workers on their journeys characterized the early church (Ac 15:3; Ro15:24; 1Co 16:6; 2Co 1:16; 3Jn 5–8).

14 Titus need not carry the burden alone. By appealing to the churches for further funds, he has an opportunity to train them in the practice of "doing what is good" (cf. 3:8). It will further the Gospel and develop their own Christian lives. This situation gives Paul a final opportunity to stress the theme that Christians must be characterized by the practice of noble deeds, thus assuring that their lives will not be "unproductive." Noble deeds are the fruit of the tree of salvation.

B. The Personal Greetings (3:15a)

15a All the workers with Paul join in sending their greetings. They are left unnamed, since Zenas and Apollos will orally identify them. Titus is to pass on these greetings to the believers in Crete, who are filled with affection for Paul and his assistants "in the faith." "Faith" probably refers to the sphere where their affection is operative.

C. The Closing Benediction (3:15b)

15b The "you" is plural, including all those to whom Titus is to convey Paul's greetings. It suggests that Paul expects the letter to be read in the various churches.

Philemon

INTRODUCTION

1. Authorship, Date, and Place of Origin

Few, if any, dispute that Philemon was written by the apostle Paul. Those who claim it is non-Pauline on the basis of its similarity in final greetings with Colossians are making an unwarranted conclusion concerning Colossians (see introduction to Colossians). This letter appeared early as a letter of Paul in the Muratorian Fragment and in Marcion's canon.

Those who hold that Colossians and Philemon were written at about the same time, while Paul was in prison at Rome, date it c. A.D. 58–60. If it was written from Ephesus (see introduction to Philippians), a date c. A.D. 56 would be likely. Since runaway slaves were apt to seek asylum almost anywhere, either Rome or Ephesus is possible. The question of date cannot be firmly settled.

2. Destination

The traditional view is that the letter was written to Philemon, a slave owner and resident of the Lycus Valley (most likely in Colosse) in Asia Minor. Some have suggested that this is the lost letter to the Laodiceans (Col 4:16), but it cannot be shown that Philemon was really a letter to the church rather than to an individual. Also addressed is Archippus (v.1), who is told in Col 4:17 to "complete the work," an instruction that may refer to Paul's request in behalf of Onesimus.

3. Occasion and Purpose

In this letter, Paul intercedes in behalf of Philemon's runaway slave, Onesimus. His suggestions for handling the matter are difficult to determine because of his obscure and deferential words. At a minimum he asks that Onesimus be reconciled to the household without harsh punishment. He also strongly hints that the slave would be useful to him in the work of evangelism. Nowhere does Paul openly state that Philemon should set Onesimus free. Nor is it necessary to assume that Onesimus would be freed if he were to join Paul in his missionary work.

Brief and intensely personal, the letter is addressed to one person, Philemon, but other interested parties are mentioned in the salutation. Apphia, his wife, would have had daily responsibility over the slaves of the household. Archippus, perhaps Philemon's son and possibly also a local pastor ("fellow soldier"), would look after the interests of the church, which is also mentioned in the salutation. No doubt the church at Colosse would find significant the reconciliation of a runaway slave on the intercession of no less a person than the apostle Paul.

Some of the events that led to the writing of the letter can be stated without qualification. On the other hand, many of the tantalizing details are lost to us. Onesimus came in contact with Paul while the latter was in prison, most likely in Rome, and was converted. Presumably the authorities in charge of Paul were unaware of the personal status of Onesimus. Paul intimates that he had robbed his master in some way, but oddly he does not mention the details.

The traditional interpretation has been that Paul sent Onesimus back with this letter and with Tychicus at the same time as the writing of the letter to the Colossians, to a city in the Lycus Valley. The names in the greetings at the end of both letters are similar—Epaphras, Mark, Demas, and Luke appear in both.

It seems possible, however, to understand that Philemon was composed at a time prior to Colossians. The evidence for this is striking. According to Col 4:7–9, Tychicus and Onesimus were returning to Colosse together and would "tell all that is happening here." It is usually assumed that this is the return of the runaway slave Onesimus. But if so, why is he described as a "faithful . . . brother"? Paul usually reserved the word "faithful" (GK 4412) for fellow workers who showed great determination and endurance in the work of the Gospel, not for people who have run away from and stolen from their master.

Furthermore, Phm 22 states clearly that Paul expects to be in Colosse soon. But in writing Colossians the apostle says, "Pray for us, too, that God may open a door for our message." If he had expected to be released from imprisonment soon, he would almost certainly have mentioned this to the Colossians as well.

Finally, Paul writes in Colossians that Onesimus is accompanying Tychicus, but Tychicus is nowhere mentioned in Philemon. That Tychicus accompanied Onesimus when the latter returned as a runaway is only an assumption.

4. Literary Form

The letter is unique in the Pauline corpus because it is a personal letter of commendation and recommendation. There are innumerable examples of similar letters, both pagan and Christian, from the Greco-Roman world. Among these, Philemon belongs to the kind of letter written to intercede for a delinquent slave. It begins with a salutation and is followed by expressions of thanks and petition, the principal subject matter, a conclusion, and greetings. Most of the Pauline letters follow this format, even when they are more like theological treatises.

5. Theological Values

Paul, Philemon, and Onesimus are persons in a real-life drama of profound social significance. Each has heard the claims of Christianity from totally different backgrounds. Paul was once a rigorous Jew of the Dispersion who advanced in Judaism beyond all his contemporaries. Philemon was a wealthy Asiatic Gentile. Onesimus was the most despicable of all creatures, a runaway slave. They find themselves united in the Gospel of Christ. Here is a living example of Paul's statement that "there is neither Jew nor Greek, slave nor free, male nor female, for you are all one in Christ Jesus" (Gal 3:28). It was in this oneness that Paul sought a solution to the problem presented by the relationship of Onesimus to Philemon.

Neither Paul nor the other authors of the NT ever call for the abolition of slavery. For a new religion to do so would have been suicidal in the ancient world. Paul's main concern is that Philemon not act out of obligation to the apostle; rather, he is to be motivated by the love of Christ within himself. Out of that should come more than mere reconciliation (v.21). Freedom of slaves, like all freedom, must come from the heart of Christ-inspired people. Under this compulsion, slavery will ultimately wilt and die. While all ethical behavior for Christians should arise out of love rather than regulation or constraint, yet it takes fully committed disciples to put it into practice.

EXPOSITION

I. Salutation (1–3)

1–3 The salutation is significant for its departures from Paul's other salutations. The letter is in the form of an ancient letter of commendation, and Paul's opening words are calculated to suggest that his appeal for Onesimus should be favorably received.

Paul is a "prisoner of Jesus Christ" and therefore suffers for the sake of the Gospel. His suffering is a mark of his apostleship, which in turn lends weight to any suggestion he might make. Furthermore, Timothy, a well-recognized young steward of the Gospel, joins him in the appeal. Finally, Paul not only greets Philemon, the owner of Onesimus, but also his wife Apphia. She is as much a party to the decision as her husband, because according to the custom of the time, she had day-to-day responsibility for the slaves.

As for Archippus and the church, Paul includes them in the salutation with good reason. Archippus, one of the leading figures in the community (perhaps a pastor), and the church will bring appropriate pressure to bear on Philemon should he fail to fulfill the great apostle's request. Philemon would have had to have been a very strong-minded individual to resist the plea of Paul and his protégé Timothy.

II. Thanksgiving and Prayer (4–7)

4–5 In both pagan and Christian letters of the first centuries of the Christian era, the salutation was often followed by an expression of thanksgiving and a prayer. Paul here tells when he gives thanks—"always . . . in my prayers"—and also tells why he does so—

"because I hear about your love and faith" (cf. Ro 1:8–10; 1Th 1:2–11; Php 1:3–11; Col 1:3–8). The "you" in "I remember you" is singular, suggesting that the recipient of the letter is primarily Philemon.

6 At this point, Paul's prayer begins. It is not easy to translate, but he is most likely praying that Philemon's active participation in the faith will be made effective because of his understanding of God's goodness to both of them. As Paul repeatedly suggests, true knowledge of the faith precedes good works (cf. Col 1:9–10).

7 Paul has been repeatedly impressed by the expressions of Philemon's love; they have brought him much joy and comfort. This verse justifies Paul's expansive use of the phrases "full understanding" and "every good thing" in v.6. That is, he is praying for great Christian maturity in his brother. The implication is that this maturity will find expression in Philemon's treatment of Onesimus.

III. Plea for Onesimus (8–22)

The situation of both Paul and Onesimus is all-important to the understanding of this section of the letter. Paul's circumstances are just as significant as those of Onesimus—a fact often overlooked by commentators. Because he is in prison, he cannot do the things a free man might do to help the slave. He can do little more than write a letter asking for clemency for his new-found brother, and he can suggest that he hopes to visit the Lycus Valley soon to put additional pressure on Philemon. Under more usual circumstances, a free man could have assumed custody of a runaway slave after he had given guarantees of his return to the public officials, and he could have suggested that the slave be formally assigned to him for a time. This was not uncommon in the Greco-Roman world.

Onesimus's status was the lowest that one could reach in the ancient world. Because he was a runaway slave, he was protected by no laws and he was subject to all manner of abuse. Fugitive slaves usually went to large cities, remote parts of the Roman state, or into unsettled areas. Their capture and return was largely an informal arrangement between the owner and a provincial administrator. They were frequently beaten unmercifully or put to tasks in which their life expectancy was very short.

Paul must have put Philemon in a precarious position indeed. In pleading for forgiveness and restitution for Onesimus without a punishment that was obvious to all, he was confronting the social and economic order head-on. While he does not ask for manumission, even his request for clemency for Onesimus and hint of his assignment to Paul defied Roman tradition. By this plea Paul is also giving new dignity to the slave class.

8 Paul first reminds Philemon of his apostolic authority. "Bold" (GK 4244) has the idea of "freedom" or "boldness." Here it implies "right" or "authority"—hence, "I could be bold and order you." The suggestion of authority was probably enough, coupled as it was with the appeals to love, old age, and imprisonment in v.9.

9 Part of Paul's appeal is based on his being an "old man" (GK 4566), which usually implied authority (in antiquity, wisdom and authority were assumed to go with old age). Here, however, the stress is on the apostle's aged and feeble condition.

10 The imagery in this verse is very strong. The figure of the father and child was often used in Judaism as an illustration of the relationship of teacher and student or of leader and convert. Paul is here pleading on behalf of his spiritual son.

11–12 There is a double play on words here. "Onesimus" was a common slave name; it meant "useful" or "profitable." This is also the meaning of another Greek word chrestos, which appears here in achrestos ("useless"; GK 947) and euchrestos ("useful"; GK 2378). Chrestos in turn sounded much like Christos (the Greek word for "Christ"; GK 5986). An ancient reader would have thought this play on words much more clever and humorous than we would. That Paul uses it at the beginning of his plea for Onesimus shows us something of his exquisite sensitivity and tact. It is as if, realizing the radical nature of what he was about to ask of Philemon, Paul deliberately introduces this bit of humor.

In v.12, Paul again stresses how very dear to him Onesimus is. He is not simply the one "I am sending back"; he is "my very heart."

13 This is the culmination of the appeal. Onesimus has been serving in place of Philemon, already described as a man of great spiritual advancement (vv.6–7).

14 Paul has been speaking as an urbane, deferential, educated man of the classical world. But now, after he has cited a number of reasons for allowing Onesimus to remain with him, he goes further and urges Philemon to make his decision out of Christian love rather than obligation. How could Philemon refuse Paul's plea for him?

15 The contrast between "for a time" and "forever" shows Paul's conviction that the hand of God was at work in the whole situation. It also shows his tact: instead of bluntly referring to Onesimus as a runaway, he speaks of his temporary separation from Philemon as a prelude to permanent reunion with him.

16 In similar fashion he contrasts "slave" (GK 1528)—a temporal and demeaning condition—with "brother" (GK 278)—an eternal relationship in the Lord. The innate problem of the slavery of human beings troubled the ancients. In many of the ancient religions and in Greek and Roman law insofar as religion was concerned, Onesimus would have been treated as an equal. But Paul is claiming the enabling power of the love of Christ to break the economic and social barriers between people. Ancient pagan religions never claimed that they loved the gods or were loved by them as the motive for people to love one another. But to Paul, Philemon will love Onesimus all the more because of both long-standing human ties and their common faith.

Here, where Paul so sensitively suggests that Philemon take Onesimus back "no longer as a slave, but better than a slave" (cf. also v. 17), it almost seems as if emancipation is implied.

17 Now Paul uses a term from the business world. "Partner" (GK 3128; related to the NT word "fellowship," GK 3126) here has the sense of "business partner." No doubt Paul meant for the word to imply "fellowship" in the work of the risen Christ. Philemon is to "welcome" (GK 4689) Onesimus as he would welcome Paul himself (this word always has a positive meaning).

18 The wonderfully gracious offer to assume the financial obligation of Onesimus is an altogether astonishing statement. We can only speculate how Paul came to have such warm feelings toward him. Yet we cannot be certain the slave had robbed his master, though this was a common act of runaway slaves. The loss may have been the result of the departure of a highly skilled slave from whose activities Philemon derived great income. In fact, slave prices in the Greco-Roman world were directly proportional to the skill and economic value of the slave. A common drudge brought only 500 denarii (a denarius was a laborer's ordinary daily wage), but skilled teachers, physicians, and actors were purchased for a hundred times as much.

Paul uses another accountant's word ("charge"; GK 1823) to maintain the business imagery. Observe Paul's tact in not saying that Onesimus had stolen, but he leaves that possibility open by his use of "if he has done you any wrong and owes you anything."

19 The subject is still the indebtedness of Onesimus. Paul is now writing these words himself. As in our own society, handwritten statements of obligation carried great weight and legal validity. So Paul gives Philemon what amounts to a promissory note.

Then in v.19b he shifts abruptly to another thought—namely, "not to mention that you owe me your very self." In Paul's view, Philemon's spiritual indebtedness to him should easily cover all of Onesimus's wrongdoing. Again Paul's hint can hardly be missed: "I will repay it. Charge it to the bank of heaven." What Paul did for Onesimus reflects the infinitely greater intercession and redemptive act of Christ for us, who because of our sin are all indebted to God in a way we cannot ourselves repay.

20 Paul now expresses another wish, using the same word in "I do wish . . . some benefit" (GK 3949) as is in the root of the name Onesimus. Paul then returns to the vocabulary of v.7, where he told Philemon that he had refreshed the hearts of many. How, then, can he do less than that for the apostle to the Gentiles? In its relationship to v.7 this sentence is an excellent example of literary reinforcement.

21 Paul has avoided giving any commands to Philemon (cf. v.8), but he nonetheless expects "obedience" (GK 5633). To what? Perhaps the love of Christ (cf. Eph 6:9). "Even more than I ask" may be an intimation that Paul would like Onesimus set free from enslavement. He has hinted that Onesimus be loaned to him (cf. v.13); only emancipation could be beyond that. Paul never directly assaults the social and economic institutions of his day. Yet he clearly perceives in Christianity an ethic that reaches beyond human social institutions.

22 Here the suggestion of an imminent visit lends more weight to Paul's hints and requests. The hope expressed in these words seems to imply that the apostle is nearby. He expects to be released soon and to see the outcome of his letter at first hand.

IV. Greetings and Benediction (23–25)

23–24 These five co-workers who send greetings to Philemon are also mentioned in Col 4:10–14 (Jesus Justus is a sixth coworker). The question remains as to why the same greetings were given in two letters that were sent at the same time. Some see the unity of the greetings as evidence that the letters were written at the same time to the same place, while Paul was in the company of the same co-workers. One should not discount the possibility, however, that Philemon preceded Colossians (see the introduction).

25 With his apostolic "grace" (GK 5921), Paul ends this brief but unusually beautiful letter in which he reveals so much of himself.

Hebrews

INTRODUCTION

This book is unlike any other in the NT, though not without resemblance to 1 John. In subject matter it is distinctive, and its picture of Jesus as our great High Priest is its own. It is not easy to see who wrote it, to whom it was written or why. It lacks an epistolary opening but has an epistolary conclusion. The profundity of its thought gives it a significant place in the NT.

1. Literary Form

Though we usually call Hebrews a letter, important epistolary features are lacking for this book. But if we cannot straightforwardly label it a letter, there are at least indications that it was meant for a restricted circle of readers, not for the general public or even the general Christian public. The recipients are a group who ought to be teachers (5:12). The writer knows them and looks forward to visiting them (13:19, 23). He has a good opinion of them (6:9). He can ask for their prayers (13:18) and give them news of their mutual friend Timothy (13:23). The writer recalls "earlier days" (10:32) and remembers persecutions that his friends had endured (10:32; 12:4), their generosity to other believers (6:10), and their cheerful attitude when their property had been confiscated (10:32–34). He knows their present attitude toward their leaders (13:17). In the light of such statements, it is plain that the writer is addressing a definite, known group, and a small one at that (not many Christians would qualify for the position of teacher).

Moreover, the intended recipients were a group whose needs the writer knew. He wanted them to advance to the level of being teachers (5:12) and to avoid apostasy (6:4ff.). There is a homiletic air about much that he writes; so it is not surprising that many have considered the book a sermon—one the author had preached earlier or one he was now composing for the benefit of his friends. He himself calls his work "my word of exhortation" (13:22; cf. Ac 13:15). It has oratorical touches, and the style makes it not unlikely that a sermon stands behind it. But as we now have it, we may call it a letter, written to correct some specific erroneous tendencies the author sees in the recipients.

2. Recipients

The title "To the Hebrews" is in the oldest manuscripts, though this may be a later addition (we have no knowledge of any other title). If the title is accurate, then it follows that the letter was written to a group of Jews. However, it still remains to be determined whether they were Jewish Christians or non-Christian Jews. The traditional view is that the recipients were Christians from a Jewish background.

Yet some scholars argue for Gentile Christians rather than Jewish Christians. One significant passage for them is the author's appeal to basic Christian doctrines in ch. 6. The "elementary teachings" are listed as "repentance from acts that lead to death . . . faith in God, instruction about baptisms, the laying on of hands, the resurrection of the dead, and eternal judgment" (6:1–2). But while Gentiles had to be taught these doctrines, it would also have been necessary to teach Jews elementary truths, such as that Jesus is the Christ and that God is present in the Holy Spirit.

From the first the OT was the Bible of both Gentile Christians and Jewish Christians. The church saw itself as the true Israel, as the heir of the promises of the OT. While the author makes a good deal of the Jewish priesthood and Jewish practices, it must be borne in mind that he does not take his information and symbolism from the temple that existed in the first century. Rather, he refers to the much earlier tabernacle, about which all the available information is in the OT.

The most persuasive argument for Jewish recipients is the way the book moves so consistently within the orbit of the OT Scriptures and Jewish liturgy. The writer has much to say about the worship of the tabernacle, the priests and the kind of sacrifices they offered, the covenant that meant so much to the Jews, and Jewish worthies like Abraham, Moses, Joshua, and a host of others mentioned in ch. 11. Topics like the sufferings of the Messiah and the replacement of the Levitical priesthood by a priesthood after the order of Melchizedek would interest Jews. The argument that Jesus is superior to Moses (3:1ff.) would have more weight with Jews than with anyone else.

Furthermore, if Gentiles were falling away from the faith, the OT would lose its authority for them. But it always remained authoritative for Jewish readers (whether Christians or not). One of the author's cogent arguments is that apostasy is pictured in the Israelites' rejecting Moses' leadership and their rebelling against God (3:16ff.), again suggesting a Jewish background.

On the whole, more can be said for Hebrews having been written for Jewish rather than Gentile Christians. It is hard to think that a writing that moves so much in the area of Jewish ritual was in the first instance intended for non-Jews, however readily they may have embraced the OT. While absolute certainty is impossible, the most likely possibility is a group of able Jewish Christians who were hesitant about cutting themselves off decisively from the Jewish religion (which was tolerated by the Romans) in favor of the Christian way (which was not).

There also seem to be more reasons for seeing the letter directed to Christians living in Rome than in any other place. The greeting "Those from Italy send you their greetings" (13:24) is most naturally understood of a group of Italian origin now living elsewhere and sending greetings back home. Also, there was more hesitation at Rome to regard this book as canonical than anywhere else, and a large factor in this hesitation was doubt that Paul wrote the letter. Presumably the Romans knew who wrote it, and they knew that the author was not Paul (see next section).

3. Authorship

The earliest reference to authorship is a statement of Clement of Alexandria that Paul wrote this work in Hebrew and that Luke translated it into Greek. When it was accepted as part of the NT, this was partly because contemporaries held Paul to be the author. This view, however, appears to rest on no reliable evidence but rather is a deduction from the facts that Paul was a prolific writer of letters and that Hebrews is a noble writing that must have had a distinguished author. But both the language and thought forms are unlike those of Paul. The Greek is polished; Paul's is rugged, though vigorous. This book moves in the context of Levitical symbolism, about which Paul elsewhere says nothing.

No early writer who cites the letter mentions its author. Nor does internal evidence help us much. The author was plainly a teacher, a second generation Christian (2:3). Its style is unlike that of any other NT document; consequently, we can only conjecture who the author was. Many suggestions have been made, of which the most prominent are Barnabas (he was a Levite, and this would account for the emphasis on Levitical ritual), Apollos (he was an eloquent man, who had "a thorough knowledge of the Scriptures"; Ac 18:24), and Priscilla (a male-dominated world would naturally have suppressed her name, though the masculine form of the Greek participle translated "to tell" in 11:32 would seem to eliminate her from consideration). In the end, however, we must agree that we have no certain evidence about the authorship of Hebrews. As Origen said, "Who wrote the letter, God only knows the truth."

4. The Use of the Old Testament in Hebrews

There are some interesting features of the author's use of the OT. To begin with, he uses the LXX (the Septuagint, the Greek translation of the OT) almost exclusively. Now and then he bases his argument on the LXX where that differs from the Hebrew (e.g., 10:5–7). The author's favorite sources are the Pentateuch and the Psalms. Twenty-three out of twenty-nine quotations come from these two sections of the OT. It is curious that there is so little from the Prophets, especially in view of the author's attitude toward the sacrifices. One would think he would have found much in the Prophets that was applicable to his purpose.

The author has an unusual method of citation; he almost always neglects the human author of his quotations (exceptions are 4:7; 9:19–20), though throughout the rest of the NT the human author is often noted. He normally ascribes the passage he quotes to God, except, of course, where God is addressed, as in 2:6. Twice he attributes words in the OT to Christ (2:11–12; 10:5ff.) and twice to the Holy Spirit (3:7; 10:15). No other NT writer shares this way of quoting the OT. Elsewhere in the NT words from Scripture are usually ascribed to God only when God is the actual speaker. Thus the author emphasizes the divine authorship of the whole OT.

Moreover, the author sees Scripture as pointing to Jesus. What the ancient writings say is fulfilled in him. This means more than that specific prophecies are fulfilled in Jesus. Rather, the thrust of the entire OT is such that it leads inescapably to him. The author writes of Christianity as the final religion, not because he regards the faith of the OT as mistaken, but because he sees it as God's way of pointing us to Jesus. Judaism is not so much abrogated by Christianity as brought to its climax. The fuller meaning of the OT is to be seen in the person and work of Jesus. Only in Jesus are we able to discern its true meaning.

5. Date

The mention of Timothy (13:23) shows that the writing must be early, though since we know nothing about the dates of Timothy's birth and death, this reference only narrows our search to the second half of the first century. The words "you have not yet resisted to the point of shedding your blood" (12:4) points to a date before severe persecutions began, or at least before any lives of the recipients were lost. Once again we have an indication of an early date, but one we cannot narrowly tie down.

The principal indication of the date is that the letter says nothing about the destruction of the temple but leaves the impression that the Jewish sacrificial system, with its ministry of priests and all that that involved, was a continuing reality (cf. 9:6–9). The author is arguing that Judaism is superseded by Christianity and specifically that the sacrifices of the old system are of no avail now that the sacrifice of Jesus has been offered. It would have been a convincing climax had the author been able to point out that the temple and all that went with it had ceased to exist. The author's failure to mention this surely means that it had not yet occurred.

This seems about as far as we can go. A date before A.D. 70 is indicated, but how much before that we cannot say. Some passages in the letter gain in force if we think of a time not long before, when there was a compelling call to loyal Jews to cast in their lot with those fighting against Rome. So perhaps we should think of a date near or even during the war of A.D. 66–70.

EXPOSITION

I. Introduction (1:1–4)

The author begins with a magnificent introduction in which he brings out something of the greatness of Jesus and his saving work. He goes on to point out that Jesus is superior to the angels and thus leads into the first main section of the letter. In the Greek these four verses are a single, powerful sentence that shows the difference between the old revelation, which is fragmentary and spoken through prophets, and the new, which is complete and comes from one who has all the dignity of being Son of God.

1 It is significant that the subject of the first verb is "God," for God is constantly before the author (used sixty-eight times in the letter). Right at the beginning, then, we are confronted with the reality of God and the fact that he has been active. The first divine activity commented on is that God has spoken in a variety of ways. He spoke to Moses in the burning bush (Ex 3:2ff.), to Elijah in a still, small voice (1Ki 19:12ff.), to Isaiah in a vision in the temple (Isa 6:1ff.), to Hosea in his family circumstances (Hos 1:2), and to Amos in a basket of summer fruit (Am 8:1). God at times conveyed his message through visions and dreams, through angels, through Urim and Thummim, through symbols, through natural events, etc. He appeared in various locations, such as Ur of the Chaldees, Haran, Canaan, Egypt, and Babylon. Revelation was never monotonous activity that took place in the same way. God used variety.

The revelation the writer is speaking of has its roots deep "in the past" (GK 4093). He is referring to what God did in days of old, in the time of "our forefathers." This expression is usually translated "fathers" and is normally used in the NT of the patriarchs, but here the contrast to "us" in v.2 shows that the term "forefathers" is a shorthand way of referring to OT believers in general. "Through [lit., in] the prophets" uses the Greek preposition en; this suggests that God was "in" the prophets as his interpreters. They were God's messengers, inspired by his Spirit. The construction used here is parallel to that in v.2: God was in Christ and before that he was in the prophets, using them as his voice. The "prophets" here probably means more than the canonical prophets and may include people like Abraham.

2 "In these last days" is more literally "on the last of these days"—an expression that often refers in some way to the days of the Messiah (e.g., Nu 24:14). Here it means that in Jesus the Messianic Age has appeared. Jesus is more than simply the last in a long line of prophets. He has inaugurated a new age altogether.

In Jesus there is both continuity and discontinuity. The continuity comes out when we are told that God "has spoken to us by his Son." The verb "spoken" (GK 3281) is the same one used in v.1 of the prophets. The earlier revelation is continuous with the later revelation; the same God has spoken in both. The old prepares the way for the new, a truth that will be brought out again and again in this letter.

The discontinuity is seen in the reference to the Son. It is noteworthy that in the Greek there is no article with "Son" (i.e., there is nothing corresponding to NIV's "his"). In essence the writer is saying God has spoken "in one who has the quality of being Son." It is the Son's essential nature that is stressed. This stands in contrast to "the prophets" in the preceding verse. The consummation of the revelatory process took place when God spoke not in the prophets but in his very Son. Throughout the letter we shall often meet such thoughts, as the writer shows that in Jesus Christ we have such a divine person and such divine activity that there can be no going back from him.

This emphasis on the Son leads to a series of seven propositions about him. First, God "appointed" him "heir of all things." The verb "appointed" (GK 5502) is somewhat unexpected. We should have anticipated that the Son would simply "be" heir. Perhaps there is a stress on the divine will as active. In the term "heir" (GK 3101) there is no thought of entering into possession through the death of a testator. In the NT this word and its cognates are often used in a sense much like "get possession of," without reference to any specific way of acquiring the property in question. "Heir of all things," then, is a title of dignity and shows that Christ has the supreme place in all the mighty universe. His exaltation to the highest place in heaven after his work on earth was done did not mark some new dignity but his reentry to his rightful place (cf. Php 2:6–11).

The second truth about the Son is that "through" him God "made the universe." God is the Creator, but as is said elsewhere in the NT, he performed the work of creation through the Son (cf. Jn 1:3; 1Co 8:6; Col 1:16). "The universe" (lit., "the ages"; GK 172) has a temporal sense. While the universe may well be in mind as that which was "made," it is the universe as the sum of the periods of time. This word may be hinting at the temporal nature of all things material.

3 The third proposition about the Son is that he is "the radiance of God's glory." The word translated "radiance" (GK 575), meaning a shining forth because of brightness within, may also mean "reflection," a shining forth because of brightness from without. Jesus is thus spoken of either as the outshining of the brightness of God's glory, or as the reflection of that glory. In both cases we see the glory of God in Jesus, and we see it as it really is. "Glory" (GK 1518), sometimes used of literal brightness (cf. Ac 22:11), is more commonly used in the NT of the radiance associated with God and with heavenly beings in general. It sometimes indicates the presence of God (e.g., Eze 1:28; 11:23), and, to the extent that human beings are able to apprehend it, the revelation of God's majesty.

"The exact representation of his being" is the fourth of the statements about the Son. "Exact representation" (GK 5917) originally denoted an instrument for engraving and then a mark stamped on that instrument. Hence it came to be used of the impress of a die and of the impression on coins. It could also be used figuratively (e.g., of God as making us in his own image). Here the writer is saying that the Son is an exact representation of God. The word "being" (GK 5712) suggests that the Son is such a revelation of the Father that when we see Jesus, we see what God's real being is.

"Sustaining" (GK 5770), the fifth characteristic of the Son, does not picture Christ as holding up the universe like the Greek god Atlas, but as carrying it along and bearing it onward toward the fulfillment of the divine plan. The concept is dynamic, not static. "All things" is the totality, the universe considered as a whole. Nothing is excluded from the scope of the Son's sustaining activity. And he does this "by his powerful word." "Word" (GK 4839) is thought of as active and powerful—the same word that created the universe (11:3); "powerful" (GK 1539) is often used to describe literal physical power.

With the sixth statement about the Son (his having effected purification of sins), the author comes to what is for him the heart of the matter. The thing that gripped him most was that the very Son of God had come to deal with the problem of human sin. The author sees him as a priest, who offers up the sacrifice that really put sin away. The author has an unusual number of ways of referring to what Christ has done for us (e.g., see 2:17; 8:12; 9:15, 26, 28; 10:12, 17–18). From such passages it is clear that the author sees Jesus as having accomplished a many-sided salvation. Whatever had to be done about sin he has done.

The word "purification" (GK 2752) is most often used in the NT of ritual cleansing (e.g., Mk 1:44), but here it refers to the removal of sin (cf. also 2Pe 1:9) with its defiling aspect. Sin stains, but Christ has effected a complete cleansing of sin at Calvary. In this letter sin appears as the power that deceives people and leads them to destruction. Only the sacrifice of Jesus Christ could remove it. In him and him alone are sins really dealt with.

The seventh in the series of statements about the Son is that when his work of purification was ended, "he sat down at the right hand of the Majesty in heaven." Sitting is the posture of rest, and the right-hand position is the place of honor. Sitting at God's right hand, then, is a way of saying that Christ's saving work is done and that he is now in the place of highest honor. "Majesty" (GK 3448) means "greatness" and thus came to signify "majesty." Here it is obviously a title for God himself, who dwells in heaven (cf. Eph 4:10; Php 2:9).

4 "He became" is again somewhat unexpected (cf. "appointed," v.2). The writer has made some strong statements about the excellence of Christ's person, and so we should expect him to describe Christ as eternally superior to the angels rather than as "becoming" superior to them. But the writer says it this way because he was thinking of what the Son did in becoming human and putting away the sins of humanity. Of course, the Son was also eternally superior to the angels. That, however, is not what is in mind here. It was because he had put away sins that he sat down on the throne in the place of highest honor, and it is in this aspect that he is seen as greater than any angel.

"Superior" (usually rendered "better"; GK 3202) is one of the author's favorite words (see 6:9; 7:7, 19, 22; 8:6; 9:23; 10:34; 11:16, 35, 40; 12:24). This strong emphasis on what is "better" arises from the author's deep conviction that Jesus Christ is "better" and that he has accomplished something "better" than anyone or anything else.

Another word that appears frequently in this letter is "angel" (GK 34). While the term can be used of a human messenger (Lk 9:52), sometimes sent by God (Mk 1:2), in the overwhelming number of cases it means a spirit being from the other world. In many cases the idea of a messenger remains. Sometimes, however, the thought is simply that of beings intermediate between God and human beings. It also may be used of evil beings, but references to good angels are much more common.

In antiquity "the name" (GK 3950) meant much more than it does today. We use a name as little more than a distinguishing mark or label to differentiate one person from other people. But in the world of the NT the name concisely sums up all that a person is. One's whole character was somehow implied in the name. Opinions differ as to what is meant here by "the name." Some take this to mean that in his whole character and personality Christ was superior to any angel. Others think the reference is simply to the name "Son," which is a better name than "angel" because it denotes superiority in character and personality. Either interpretation is possible.

The word "superior" (GK 1427; a different word from earlier in v.4) as applied to "the name" has a derived sense, "excellent";

the name of the Son is "more excellent" than that of any angel. "Inherited" (GK 3099) as used here denotes entering into possession of an inheritance without regard to the means. So here we should think of Christ as obtaining the more excellent name as the result of his atoning work. The main idea is that of an abiding possession in Christ's capacity as heir (see comments on v.2).

II. The Excellence of the Christ (1:5–3:6)

In the introduction the author has drawn attention to the excellence of the Christ; now he dwells on the point by emphasizing that Christ has a greater dignity than any other being—so great indeed that he must be classed with God rather than with human beings. Without weakening the doctrine of the Incarnation, this letter has as high a Christology as is conceivable. Nobody insists on the limitations of Jesus' human frame as does the writer of Hebrews. But he unites with this the thought that Jesus is exalted far above all creation.

A. Superior to Angels (1:5–14)

The discussion of the excellence of the Son begins with a series of seven quotations from the OT, five being from the Psalms, all of which stress the superiority of Christ to the angels.

5 The opening question, "For to which of the angels did God ever say," implies that Christ is to be seen in all the Scriptures because there is no explicit reference to him in the passage cited. In the OT angels are sometimes called "sons of God" (cf. NIV note on Job 1:6; 2:1); and the term was applied to Israel (Ex 4:22; Hos 11:1) and Solomon (2 Sa 7:14; 1Ch 28:6). But none of the angels nor anyone else was ever singled out and given the kind of status this passage gives to Christ. The first quotation comes from Ps 2:7. Among the rabbis, the "Son" is variously identified as Aaron, David, the people of Israel in the messianic period, or the Messiah himself. Our writer is clearly taking the psalm as messianic and sees it as conferring great dignity on Jesus.

The second quotation comes from 2Sa 7:14 (= 1Ch 17:13). Though the words were originally used of Solomon, the writer of Hebrews applies them to the Messiah. There was a widespread expectation that the Messiah would be a descendant of David. The quotation points to the father-son relationship as the fundamental relationship between God and Christ. No angel can claim such a relationship. This and 12:9 are the only passages in Hebrews in which the term "Father" is applied to God.

6 This verse is the only place in the NT where "firstborn" (GK 4758) is used absolutely of Christ. Elsewhere it is linked with Jesus' birth (Lk 2:7), many brothers (Ro 8:29), all creation (Col 1:15), or the church (Col 1:18; Rev 1:5), where it represents Christ in his relationship to others and gives the word a social significance. Here, however, it signifies that he has the status with God that a human firstborn son has with his father (cf. reference to "heir" in v.2). Christ is exalted and enthroned as sovereign over the inhabited world, including the angels.

The quotation is from the LXX of Dt 32:43; it is absent from our Hebrew text. The LXX reads "sons of God" where this quotation has "God's angels," but "angels" occurs later in the verse and again in a similar context in Ps 97:7. "All" shows that this is no small, hole-in-the-corner affair but one in which the worship of all heaven is offered to the Son. The one the angels worship is clearly superior by far to them.

7 The Hebrew of Ps 104:4 can mean either that God makes the winds his messengers and the flames his servants or that he makes his messengers (angels) into winds and his servants into flames. The LXX, which the author quotes, takes the latter view, though this does not suggest any downgrading of the angels. But if the angels are immeasurably superior to human beings, the Son is immeasurably superior to the angels. Whereas he has sonship, they are reducible to nothing more than the elemental forces of wind and fire. This passage also seems to imply that the angels are temporary in contrast to the Son, who is eternal.

8–9 The quotation here is from Ps 45:6–7, which refers to the Son, who is then addressed as "God." His royal state is brought out by the references to the "throne," "scepter," and "kingdom" and by his moral concern for the "righteousness" that is supreme where he reigns. This concern continues with his loving righteousness and hating "wickedness" (lit., "lawlessness"; GK 490), which lead to the divine anointing. We should perhaps take the first occurrence of the word "God" in v.9 as another vocative: "Therefore, O God, your God has set you." Anointing was usually a rite of consecration to some sacred function (e.g., Ex 28:41; 1Sa 10:1; 1Ki 19:16). This is in view here as the Son is set above his companions, who are probably the "brothers" of 2:11.

10–12 The author next quotes from Ps 102:25–27 to bring out the Son's eternality and supremacy over creation. In the OT these words are applied to God. Here, however, they apply to Christ without qualification or any need for justification. Christ was God's agent in creation, the one who laid the earth's foundations and constructed heaven. All these will in due course perish, but not their Maker. The metaphor of clothing has a twofold reference: the created things will wear out (the process is slow but certain); and the Son deals with them as with clothing, rolling them up and changing them. He began the universe and he will finish it. Clearly the final transformation of all things is in mind (cf. Isa 66:22; Rev 6:14; 21:1)—their replacement by a totally new heaven and earth. But through it all the Son remains unchanged. Our years come to an end, but his will never do so.

13 The quotation from Ps 110:1 is introduced with a formula that stresses its inapplicability to angels (see comment on 1:4). This psalm is accepted by the NT writers as messianic. It is repeatedly applied to Christ; and apparently even Jesus' opponents accepted it as messianic (Mk 12:35–37), though, of course, they would not apply it to Jesus. Since the angels stand before God (Lk 1:19; Rev 8:2; cf. Da 7:10), it is a mark of superior dignity that the Son sits. And the statement that God discharges the task of a servant in preparing a footstool for the Son is a striking piece of imagery. The angels are God's servants. How great then is he whom God deigns to serve! To make the enemies a footstool means to subject them utterly. Consequently, God will render all Christ's enemies utterly powerless.

14 The angels are now contrasted with the Son of God. He sits in royal state; "all" of them, however, are no more than servants—servants of saved people. "Spirits" preserves their place of dignity, but their function is "to serve" (GK 1355). The word used here is the usual NT term for the service Christians render to God and other people, but nowhere else is it used of the service angels render. "Inherit" (GK 3099) is often used in the NT in senses other than the strict one of obtaining something by a will. It is used of possessing the earth (Mt 5:5), the kingdom of God (1Co 6:9–10), eternal life (Mk 10:17), the promises (Heb 6:12), incorruption (1Co 15:50), blessing (Heb 12:17), and a more excellent name (see comment on v.4).

"Salvation" (GK 5401) is a general word, but among first-century Christians it was used of salvation in Christ, either in its present or, as here, future aspect. This word is used seven times in Hebrews, the most of any NT book, so the concept clearly matters to the author. His use of it here without qualification shows that it was already accepted by the readers as well as the author as a technical term for the salvation Christ brought.

B. Author of "Such a Great Salvation" (2:1–9)

The second step in the argument for Jesus' superiority shows him to be infinitely great because of the nature of the salvation he won. He who brought about a salvation that involved tasting death "for everyone" (v.9) cannot but be greater by far than any angel. The author precedes the development of this thought with a brief section in which he typically exhorts his readers to attend to what has been said (cf. also 3:7–11; 5:11–14).

1 "Therefore" most likely refers to the whole argument of 1:5–14. Since the Son is so far superior to the angels and his message is superior to theirs, we should "pay more careful attention" (GK 4668) to it. This verb means not only to turn the mind to a thing but also to act upon what one perceives. Inaction in spiritual things is fatal. The author does not explain what he means by "what we have heard," but we need not doubt that the whole Christian Gospel is in mind. By the word "we" the author puts himself in the same class as his readers, i.e., dependent on others for the message. He was not one of the original disciples.

The danger is that we might "drift away" (GK 4184). This verb is used of such things as a ring slipping off a finger; it is a vivid figure for the person who lets himself or herself drift away from the haven of the Gospel. One need not be violently opposed to the message to suffer loss; one need only drift away from it (see comment on v.3).

2 "Message" (Gk. logos; GK 3364) means in the first place a word spoken (as opposed to a deed) and then a series of words or a statement. What the statement is varies with the context. It can mean a message from God, a revelation, and so the Christian Gospel (Ac 4:4; 8:4). The final revelation is, of course, Christ. He himself is "the Word" (Jn 1:1). In Hebrews the "word" is usually God's word (e.g., 2:2; 4:2, 12), though it can also be the writer's own word (5:11) or the word the Israelites did not wish to hear (12:19). Here in v.2 it is the divinely given law.

"By angels" is literally "through angels," which stresses the important truth that the law came from God. The OT does not speak of angels in connection with the giving of the law; but their presence is mentioned in other NT passages (Ac 7:53; Gal 3:19) and in the LXX of Dt 33:2. The author is appealing to this accepted view for his "how shall we?" argument (v.3). If the law came through angels, how much more should respect be given the message that came, not through angels, but through the Son! The law was "binding" (GK 1010), i.e., fully valid. And it had provision for the proper punishment of wrongdoers so that every transgression was dealt with in the proper way.

3 The just penalties meted out under the law show that where God is concerned, strict standards apply. This makes it imperative that those to whom a great salvation is offered do something about the offer. The disaster that threatens is brought on by nothing more than mere neglect. It is not necessary to disobey any specific injunction. This is the first of a number of warnings to the readers not to surrender their Christian profession.

The writer is determined to guard against the possibility of losing salvation. This salvation is distinguished from the many other kinds of salvation offered in the ancient world by calling it "such a great salvation" and then by telling us three things about it (see comment on 1:14). In the first place, it was "announced by the Lord." The salvation originates with the Father. The author's use of "announced" (GK 3281) makes a point of contact with the gospel of Luke, for there only does Jesus announce salvation (Lk 19:9; cf. also 1:69, 71, 77; 2:11).

The second point about salvation is that it "was confirmed to us by those who heard him." The author is here again appealing to the first hearers as those to whom the authentic Gospel was entrusted (cf. Lk 1:2). Any later preaching must agree with theirs. If it does not, then it will stand convicted of being an innovation instead of the genuine thing. For this writer, as for his readers, the message was "confirmed" (GK 1011) by the original disciples. This verb is used as a legal technical term to designate properly guaranteed security; the certainty of the message is guaranteed to us, and there cannot be the slightest doubt about the genuineness of the offer of salvation.

4 The third and clinching point about our "great salvation" is that God himself has also "testified" to it. Preachers are not left to bear their witness alone. No less a one than God himself has shared in this. In John's gospel we have the bold thought that God has borne witness to Christ (Jn 5:37). Since anyone who bears witness commits himself by that very act, God has gone on record, so to speak, that he too is a witness to the great salvation of his Son.

Here, however, we have an even bolder thought: God has been pleased to commit himself through the original disciples. He gave the "signs" (GK 4956) or miracles that attested their preaching. The Gospel is not a human creation, and the early hearers were not left in doubt as to its origin. They actually saw the miraculous way God attested it. Miracles were not pointless displays of power but they pointed beyond themselves to the message of salvation. "Wonders" (GK 5469) emphasizes the marvelous aspect of the signs. They were such that no mere person could produce them, nor were they explicable on merely human premises. It is this wonder-producing aspect that comes spontaneously to mind when we think of miracles. "Miracles" (GK 1539) is properly "mighty works" and is the term usually employed in the Synoptic Gospels. It brings out the truth that in Christ's miracles there is superhuman power. They prove something about the Gospel because they are not of human origin and thus show that the Gospel they attest is not human either.

It is not clear whether "gifts of the Holy Spirit" refers to gifts that the Holy Spirit gives (cf. 1Co 12:11) or the gift of the Holy Spirit himself (cf. Gal 3:5). Either way, there were manifestations of the Holy Spirit in believers, and the author sees these as confirming the Gospel. Most likely the author is speaking about God as giving people the gift (and the gifts) of the Holy Spirit. The supreme God does this as he wills.

5 Having looked at "such a great salvation" that Christ won for his own, the author goes on to the further point that the subjection of the world to the human race spoken of in Ps 8 is to be seen in Christ, not in humanity at large. "Not to angels" implies that the subjection was made to someone other than the angels. "The world" (GK 3876) is a term that normally denotes the inhabited earth (a term used by both Greeks and Romans for the spheres of their earthly influence). It is unusual to have it employed of the Messianic Age.

6 A quotation from Ps 8:4–6 is introduced by the unusual verb "testified" (GK 1371). Only here in the NT does it introduce a quotation from Scripture. More often the word means to "testify solemnly" and shows that the words following it are to be taken with full seriousness. The author tells us neither the place where the words are found nor who said them. Consistently he regards all that is in his Bible as coming from God and puts no emphasis on the human author. He quotes the passage exactly, and his whole letter shows that he was very familiar with the Psalms. His quotation is exact, with one line omitted.

The psalmist is concerned with both the insignificance and the greatness of the human race. There is, of course, no difference in meaning between "man" and "son of man" in this verse. The parallelism of Hebrew poetry requires that the two be taken in much the same sense; and in any case it is quite common in Hebrew idiom for "the son of" to denote quality, as, for example, "the son of strength" means "the strong man." So "son of man" means one who has the quality of being a human being (this is different from Jesus' self-title in the gospels, "Son of Man"). God is said to be "mindful of" (GK 3630) and to "care for" (GK 2170) people. "Mindful" has the sense of remembering with a view to helping. It includes total dedication to God, concern for the brethren, and true self-judgment (cf. 13:3). The psalmist goes on to ask what there is about humankind that the great God should stoop to help them.

7 Having asked the rhetorical questions that pinpoint human insignificance, the psalmist goes on to the greatness of human beings. God has given them an outstanding position, one but a little lower than that of the angels. The author follows the LXX here again (the Hebrew can mean "lower than God"). Human dignity, then, is such that human beings are placed in God's order of creation only a short way below the angels, and this seems to set them above all else in creation, an impression that the rest of the passage confirms. God "crowned him with glory and honor." "Glory" (GK 1518) denotes brightness or splendor and is used of the splendor of God as well as of the glory of earthly potentates. "Honor" (GK 5507) is frequently linked with "glory," and the combination stresses the supreme place of humankind in creation.

8 The dignity of a human being is further brought out by the fact that God has "put everything under his feet." The human race is supreme among the beings of this created world. "Under his feet" shows that humans have complete supremacy.

After completing the quotation, the writer goes on to draw out an important implication. In putting all things in subjection to humankind, God left nothing unsubjected. It is a picture of a divinely instituted order in which humanity is sovereign over all creation. A few commentators see "him" as referring in this place to Christ, to whom alone all things are rightly subjected. But grammatically there is no reason for this. The passage is describing the place of humankind in God's order, and we do not come to Christ's place until v.9. While in one sense everything is subject to Christ, there is another sense in which human beings have their rightful place of supremacy over the created order.

From this ideal picture the writer turns his attention to current reality. As things are now, we do not see the subjection of all things to human beings, but one day this subjection will be fully realized. While the human race has power and dignity, there are many limitations. It is part of the frustration of life that in every part of it there are the equivalents of the "thorns and thistles" (Ge 3:18) that make life so hard for the tiller of the soil. We all know what it is like to chafe under limitations while we glimpse the vision of what will someday be realized.

9 But if we do not see the fulfillment of this passage from Scripture in the way we might have expected, we do see a fulfillment in another way. We see it fulfilled in Jesus. He has gone through the experience of living out this earthly life, and he is now "crowned . . . with glory and honor" (the very words of the psalm) because of his saving work for humanity. The writer calls the Savior by his human name, Jesus—a usage we find nine times in this letter (here; 3:1; 4:14; 6:20; 7:22; 10:19; 12:2, 24; 13:12); on each occasion he seems to place emphasis on the humanity of our Lord. That Jesus was true man meant a good deal to the writer of Hebrews. We do not see the psalm fulfilled in the human race at large, but we do see it fulfilled in the man Jesus. He had a genuine incarnation because he "was made a little lower than the angels." But we do not now see him in this lowly place, for he is now crowned with glory and honor. He is in the place of supremacy that the psalmist envisaged. And he is there because of his saving work, "because he suffered death."

"So that" looks back to the reference to suffering rather than to "crowned"; the clause it introduces shows the purpose of the death of Jesus. This is one of several places in the NT where someone is said to "taste" (GK 1174) death (also Mt 16:28; Mk 9:1; Lk 9:27; Jn 8:52). The verb means "to taste with the mouth," from which the metaphorical sense "come to know" develops. It means here that Jesus died, with all that that entails. By God's "grace" (GK 5921), Christ's saving work was accomplished. Grace is one of the great Christian words, and it is not surprising to find it connected with the doctrine of the atonement here.

C. True Man (2:10–18)

The author has argued that Jesus was greater than the angels and that his greatness is to be seen in the salvation he obtained for us. But he lived on earth as an ordinary man. There was nothing about the Teacher from Nazareth to show that he was greater than the angels. Indeed, the reverse was true, for he had undergone humiliating sufferings, culminating in a felon's death. The author proceeds to show, however, that, far from this being an objection to his greatness, this was part of it. This was the way he would save us. He would be made like those he saves.

10 Usually we do not speak of things as being "fitting" for God, but here the word is appropriate. The way of salvation is not arbitrary but befitting the character of the God we know, the God "for whom and through whom everything exists" (i.e., he is the goal and the creator of all that is). The words show that the sufferings of Jesus did not take place by chance; they had their place in God's great eternal purpose. "Many sons" is an unusual expression for the total number of the saved. But sonship is important and so is the fact that the number of the saved will not be few. "Glory" points to the grand splendor of salvation.

Christ is "the author of their salvation." "Author" (GK 795) can denote a leader, a ruler, or the originator or founder. Here the thought of origination is stressed, but the choice of word enables the writer to see Jesus as one who walked this earthly way before us as he established the way of salvation.

The idea of being made "perfect" (GK 5457) is at first sight a startling one to apply to Jesus, but it is one the author repeats (he uses this verb nine times). He suggests that there is a perfection that results from actually having suffered and that this is different from the perfection of being ready to suffer. The bud may be perfect, but there is a difference between its perfection and that of the flower. There is, of course, no thought of perfecting what was morally imperfect; no imperfection is implied (cf. 4:15).

11 The writer now emphasizes the link between Jesus and those whom he saves. He "who makes men holy [GK 39]" is, of course, Jesus. He makes them into God's people by his offering of himself (10:10). The passive, "those who are made holy" (coming from the same verb), puts some emphasis on the unity of Christ and his own. But the writer does not say they are one; he says they are "of the same family" (lit., "of one"). Since the thrust of the passage refers to earthly descent, this "one" is most likely Adam (as in Ac 17:26). The thought, then, is that Jesus is qualified to be our Priest and Savior because he shares our nature, i.e., because he is not some remote being but truly "one of us." He shares with us a descent from Adam; this enables him to call us "brothers."

Those who follow Christ are often called "brothers"; rarely, however, are they called his brothers in the NT. Indeed, sometimes the two are differentiated, as when Jesus says, "You have only one Master and you are all brothers" (Mt 23:8). Mostly Jesus' "brothers" refers to those in his immediate family (e.g., Mt 12:46–48; Lk 8:19–20; Jn 2:12), though occasionally the word is used in a spiritual sense when linking people to Christ (Mt 12:49–50; Mk 3:33–35; Lk 8:21; Ro 8:29). Thus this passage in Hebrews is not unparalleled. There is a sense in which Jesus is brother to all who call God "Father." That is why it is important to identify the "them" in "Jesus is not ashamed to call them brothers." It is not all people he calls brothers but only those who are sanctified.

12 The writer clarifies the point of spiritual brotherhood with an appeal to Ps 22, a psalm that was regarded as messianic in the early church. As he hung on the cross, Jesus quoted its opening words: "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" (Mk 15:34). And the words about dividing garments (Ps 22:18) are seen as fulfilled in what the soldiers did as they crucified Jesus (Jn 19:24). It was thus the most natural thing in the world for the writer of Hebrews to see Jesus as the speaker in this psalm.

He will declare his name to his brothers. In antiquity "name" generally stood for the whole character. So in this psalm the writer sees Jesus as saying that he will proclaim God's character as he has revealed himself, not simply that he will declare the name of God. The important thing in this quotation is that Jesus will do this "to [his] brothers." Jesus recognizes them as kin. The parallel statement in the next line reinforces the idea.

The word "congregation" (ekklesia; GK 1711) can mean a properly summoned political group (Ac 19:39) or an assembly of almost any kind, including the rioting Ephesians (Ac 19:32, 41). But it is also used of the congregation of ancient Israel (Ac 7:38). In the NT it became the characteristic word for the "church," the gatherings of Christians. Now he who sings God's praises in the midst of God's people is by that very fact showing that he is one of them, their spokesman. The "brothers" are the church.

13 Two further citations from Scripture underscore the point—the first is from Isa 8:17, the second from Isa 8:18. The reason for the first passage is not obvious. The context in Isaiah, however, speaks of difficulties, and the thought may be that just as Isaiah had to trust God to see him through, so was it with Jesus. In this he was brother to all God's troubled saints. The second quotation continues the first, but it is introduced here with "and again he says," because it makes a new point. The author now sees believers as "the children [GK 4086] God has given" Christ. This word is normally used of literal children, but this is the one place where it is used of "children" of Christ. These children are "given" by God as the disciples were given to Jesus (Jn 17:6).

All three quotations from the OT, then, place the speaker in the same group as God's children. The actual word "brothers" occurs only in the first, but they all locate Christ among people. He had a real community of nature with those he came to save.

14–15 The author now develops the thought of community of nature. Jesus shared "blood and flesh" (the proper order in Greek) with the children. He really came where they are, in order to nullify the power of the devil—who is described as the one "who holds the power of death." This raises a problem because it is God alone who controls the issues of life and death (Job 2:6; Lk 12:5). But it was through Adam's sin, brought about by the temptation of the devil, that death entered the world (Ge 2:17; 3:19; Ro 5:12). From this it is logical to assume that the devil exercises his power in the realm of death. But through his own death, Christ destroyed the power of the devil.

The author does not explain how Christ's death does this but contents himself with the fact that it does. In doing so, he stresses the note of victory that we find throughout the NT (e.g., 1Co 15:54–57). The defeat of the devil means the setting free of those he had held sway over, i.e., those who had been gripped by fear of death. Fear is an inhibiting and enslaving thing; and when people are gripped by the ultimate fear—the fear of death—they are in cruel bondage. In the first century this was very real. The philosophers urged people to be calm in the face of death, and some of them managed to do so. But to most people this brought no relief. One of the many wonderful things about the Christian Gospel is that it delivers men and women from the fear of death (cf. Rev 1:18). They are saved with a sure hope of life eternal, a life whose best lies beyond the grave.

16 The writer now makes a strong affirmation and appeals to information shared by the reader. There is a problem about the verb rendered "helps" (GK 2138). It means "to take hold of for a purpose," "to take by the hand." The author does have in mind that Jesus came to rescue people (cf. v.17), but it is another question whether this is all contained in the verb. On the whole, it seems better to see this statement as pointing to the fact of the Incarnation rather than to its purpose. "Abraham's descendants" particularizes the manner of the Incarnation and makes it harder to see the meaning of the verb as "helps," for Jesus helps many more than Jews. But he did become incarnate as a Jew. He did not descend to the level of the angels and become one of them. He descended to the level of humankind and became a Jew.

17 The purpose of salvation involved a genuine incarnation. "He had to" means "he owed it" (GK 4053; the verb can be used of financial debts). There is the sense of moral obligation here. The nature of the work Jesus came to accomplish demanded the Incarnation. This Incarnation was not aimless; it was for the specific purpose of Jesus' becoming a high priest, another way of saying that it was to save people. Our great High Priest is one who is first and foremost "merciful" (GK 1798), and he is also "faithful" (GK 4412). This latter adjective can refer to the faith that relies on someone or something or that on which one can rely, i.e., "relying" or "reliable." Jesus is, of course, both. But here the emphasis is on his relationship to God the Father, and so the first meaning is more probable (cf. Rev. 1:5; 3:14; 19:11).

Only in Hebrews is the term "high priest" applied to Jesus in the NT. This is the first example of its use, but the author does not explain it. He may want us to see Jesus as superior to all other priests. Or he may be using the term because he sees Jesus' saving work as fulfilling all that is signified by the ceremonies of the Day of Atonement, for which the high priest's ministry was indispensable.

"In service to God" (lit., "with respect to the things of God") shows where Christ's high priestly work is carried out. Some of the service of the high priest was directed toward the people, but this is not in view here. The service Christ was to render was in order "that he might make atonement for the sins of the people." "Make atonement" (GK 2661) is better rendered "propitiate"; it relates to putting away the divine wrath (see NIV note). When people sin, they arouse the wrath of God (Ro 1:18) and become his enemies (Ro 5:10). One aspect of salvation deals with this wrath, and it is to this that the author is directing attention at this point. Christ saves us in a way that takes account of and appeases the divine wrath against every evil thing. "The people" means the people of God—those for whom Christ died.

18 The sufferings Jesus endured enable him to help others. Contrary to what might have been expected, he suffered—not only on the cross, but throughout his earthly life. Being what he is, temptation must have been far more distasteful for him than it is for us. "Tempted" (GK 4279) sometimes means "tested," but the verb is more often used in the sense of "tempt." Jesus can help those who are tempted because he has perfect sympathy with them. He too was tempted and knows what temptation is. Only one who suffers can help in this way. Jesus went all the way for us. He was not only ready to suffer, but he actually did suffer.

D. Superior to Moses (3:1–6)

The author steadily develops his argument that Jesus is supremely great. He is greater than the angels (1:4), the author of a great salvation (2:3), and great enough to become human to accomplish it (2:9–18). Now he turns his attention to Moses, regarded by the Jews as the greatest person of all. They could even think of him as greater than angels. Perhaps then he was superior to Jesus? The writer does nothing to belittle Moses. Nor does he criticize him. He accepts Moses' greatness but shows that as great as he was, Jesus was greater by far.

1 The address "holy brothers" combines affection and consecration. These people are members of the Christian family and are dear

The "Greater-Thans" in Hebrews

One of the author's main points in Hebrews is that Jesus is greater than all those things associated with the Jewish religion and way of life. Sometimes he actually uses the word "greater than"; sometimes he does not. But in all cases the theme is clear.

Theme	Passage in Hebrews
Jesus is greater than the prophets	1:1–3
Jesus is greater than the angels	1:4–14; 2:5
Jesus is greater than Moses	3:1–6
Jesus is greater than Joshua	4:6–11
Jesus is greater than the high priest	5:1–10; 7:26–8:2
Jesus is greater than the Levitical priests	6:20–7:25
Jesus as the high priest after Melchizedek is greater than Abraham	7:1–10
Jesus' ministry is greater than the tabernacle ministry	8:3–6; 9:1–28
Jesus' new covenant is greater than the old covenant	8:7–13
Jesus' sacrifice is greater than OT sacrifices	10:1–14
Experiencing Jesus is greater than the experience on Mount Sinai	12:18–24

to the writer. They are also people who have been set apart for the service of God. The reference to "the heavenly calling" shows that the initiative of this service comes from God. "Therefore" links this section to the preceding. Because Christ has taken our nature and can help us, therefore we are invited to consider him in his capacities as apostle and high priest.

"Apostle" (GK 693) is applied to Jesus only here in the NT, but the idea that God "sent" him with a mission is more frequent, especially in John. "High priest" emphasizes the sacrificial nature of that mission. Though "Jesus" is the most glorious of beings, his name draws attention to his humanity. It is as a human being that his work as apostle and high priest is accomplished.

2 The point could have been made that there were times when Moses was not as faithful as he might have been. But the writer makes no criticism of the man held in such honor by the Jews. He prefers to accept Moses as "faithful." Yet he sees Jesus' faithfulness as much more comprehensive. Moses was no more than part of the "house," but Jesus made the house. Again, Jesus as Son was over the house, whereas Moses was a servant in it. The "house," of course, is the household of God, the people of God. Moses was a member of that house and proved faithful there (see Nu 12:7). The adjective "all" may point to a concern both Moses and Jesus had for the whole house. Others, such as prophets, kings, or priests, dealt with restricted areas.

3 The first point of comparison pronounces Jesus as "worthy of greater honor than Moses" because he was builder of the house rather than part of it. "Honor" (lit., "glory"; GK 1518) belonged to Moses, but his glory did not measure up to that of Christ. The one who makes a house is worthy of more honor than the house itself, glorious though it may be. Moses was at all times a member of the people of God, that and no more. He had great honor among the people, but there was no way for him to be any other than one of them. Not so Jesus! He was more. The author of Hebrews has just made the point that Jesus became true human and could truly call people "brothers." But that does not alter his conviction that Christ is also more than a man. He is the founder of the church, and the church was continuous with the OT people of God. The author will come back to this thought in v.6.

4 Parenthetically, this verse makes the point that God is over all—a fact that the author does not want us to lose sight of. So he uses the analogy that the very existence of a house is an argument for a builder. Thus everything that exists argues for God. At the same time, God cannot be put on a level with any builder of a house.

5 Having made his point that God transcends everyone, the writer returns to Moses. He repeats his statement that Moses was faithful in God's house (cf. v.2). Now he makes a further point: Whereas Moses was no more than a servant, Jesus was greater, for he was Son over the house. The thought is still that of Moses' faithfulness. There is no criticism of him, but his faithfulness consisted in his discharge of his role as servant.

The word for "servant" (GK 2544) is found only here in the NT. It denotes an honored servant, one who is far above a slave but is still a servant. The emphasis is on the subordinate, if honorable, capacity. The writer goes on to say that Moses' faithfulness did not relate to his own day only. He was "testifying to what would be said in the future"—implying that there would be revelations to others. This letter began with a reference to such revelations and to the importance of what God said (cf. 1:1; 2:3).

6 The name "Christ" (GK 5986) is used here for the first time in this letter, without the article (as in 9:11, 24). Here, where a name of dignity is called for, it is a proper name. Christ is contrasted with Moses "as a son over God's house." Moses was no more than a member—though a very distinguished member—of the house. He was essentially one with all the others. But Christ has an innate superiority. He is the Son and as such is "over" the household.

The author adds a most important explanation as to the composition of this house. One might easily suppose that he was referring to the Jews or at least to the Jews of the OT. They were, of course, in mind. But he is not thinking of the Jews as a race nor of a group of historical figures. He is thinking of the people of God. In OT days this had been the people Israel. But Israel had rejected the Son of God when he came, and now the people of God is the church. Perseverance is one of the marks of being a Christian. Without it we are not Christ's. The teaching about final perseverance implies that the saints are the people who persevere.

We must hold on to "our courage [GK 4244]." The word used here has the feeling of being quite at home when words flow freely and so means "confidence" or "courage." "The hope of which we boast [GK 3017]" brings out the truth that membership in God's household is something of which we may be proud. Instead of being ashamed of this gift, we should glory in it. "Boast" is connected with "hope" (GK 1828), a word that in the NT usually refers to the certainty that God will carry out his promises, especially those in the Gospel. The Christian looks forward eagerly, expecting God's triumph. To be God's house, then, means to persevere in quiet confidence, knowing that one has matter for pride in the Christian hope.

III. The Promised Rest (3:7–4:13)

The comparison between Christ and Moses leads to one between their followers. The writer uses the conduct of the Israelites as a means of challenging his readers to a closer walk with God. There was a promise in the OT that God's people would enter into rest. The writer sees this promise as fulfilled—not in anything in the OT—but in Christ. In drawing attention to this, he shows from another angle that Christ is God's final word to humankind (cf. 1:2).

A. Scriptural Basis (3:7–11)

The writer begins this section with a quotation from Ps 95:7–11. Israel did not walk in fellowship with God but disobeyed and provoked him. Therefore they did not enter his rest. Judaism is not the way of entry into God's promised rest.

7 The author's intent is to instruct his readers not to repeat the mistake the Israelites made. The quotation from Ps 95 is ascribed directly to the Holy Spirit (cf. 9:8; 10:15; Ac 28:25; the human author is mentioned in 4:7). The author is fond of the word "today," using it eight times. Here its prominent position gives it emphasis. Immediate action is imperative. The voice of God is sounding now. It must not be neglected.

8 To "harden" (GK 5020) the heart is to disobey the voice of God and act in accordance with one's own desires. This is what Israel did in the wilderness. The psalmist refers to the incident when there was no water and the Israelites "put the Lord to the test" (Ex 17:1–7). In the LXX the place names "Massah" and "Meribah" are always translated by words such as "rebellion" and "testing." Through lack of faith and failure to appreciate God's purposes of grace, the people of Israel put him to the test.

9 The thought of "testing" God continues. The Israelites ought to have proceeded in faith. Since God had done so much for them, they should have trusted him where they could not see. Instead, they tested his works where they could see. This faithlessness was no passing phase but something that went on for forty years. Possibly when this letter to Hebrews was written, it was the fourth decade since Jesus' crucifixion. The Israelites had rejected God for forty years, and it was now nearly forty years since their descendants had rejected Jesus—a reason for serious concern.

10 We should not miss the reference to the anger of God. The Lord is not impassive or indifferent in the face of human sin. He is a "consuming fire" (12:29), and his inevitable reaction to sin is wrath. "Generation" refers to all the Israelites living at a particular time. They showed constancy in error, "always going astray." "Heart" (GK 2840) as used in the Bible does not stand for the emotions as with us but for the whole inner being—thoughts, feelings, and will. Often the emphasis is on the mind. Thus the writer is stressing that Israel went wholly astray; their inner state was not right with God. The last line of the verse implies that if people really knew the ways of God, they would walk in them. But these people did not know. Their ignorance was culpable, not innocent. They were not blamed simply for not knowing but for not knowing things they ought to have known and acted on.

11 The seriousness with which God viewed Israel's sin is shown by the divine oath; this points to an unshakable determination. The form of the oath in the Hebrew, reflected in the LXX, is "If they shall enter"; i.e., "If they shall enter into my rest . . . then my name is not God!" The oath refers to the time when the spies had returned from their survey of the Promised Land (Nu 14:21ff.).

The psalmist has brought together two incidents in Israel's history to make the impressive point that the Israelites of old consistently provoked God. God swore the oath in his "anger" (lit., "wrath"; GK 3973; a different word from "angry" in v.10). This word points to the passionate and settled opposition of God's holy nature to all that is evil and to his concern for what is right. God is not passive in the face of wrongdoing; he actively opposes it.

God did not allow the sinning Israelites to enter his rest. "Rest" (GK 2923) must be taken in a spiritual sense; it points to a place of blessing where there is no more striving but only relaxation in the presence of God. The wilderness generation would have no part in the world to come; their disobedience had cut them off from this blessing.

B. Some Did Not Enter the Rest (3:12–19)

Having shown that Scripture looks for a rest for God's people, the author proceeds to show that Israel of old did not enter that rest. The implication is that it is still available for others. And there is also a warning here. When God opens up an opportunity, that does not necessarily mean that those who have that opportunity will take it.

12 The writer has a tender concern for every one of his readers. He exhorts them to beware lest any of them fall away. The "sinful, unbelieving heart" stands in marked contrast to the faithfulness ascribed to both Jesus and Moses (v.2). The author stresses the heinousness of this sin by speaking of it as turning away from or rebelling against "the living God" (cf. 9:14; 10:31; 12:22). The rebellion he warns against consists of departing from a living, dynamic person, not from some dead doctrine. Jews might retort that they served the same God as the Christians, so that they would not be departing from God if they went back to Judaism. But to reject God's highest revelation (Jesus Christ) is to depart from God, no matter how many preliminary revelations are retained. A true faith is impossible with such a rejection.

13 Contrariwise, the Hebrew Christians must encourage one another constantly and urgently. The author sees Christian fellowship as very important. It can build people up in the faith and form a strong bulwark against sin and apostasy (cf. 10:25; Mt 18:15–17). "Daily" means that encouragement should be habitual. "As long as it is called Today" adds a touch of urgency, for "Today" does not last forever. The aim of the swift action desired by the writer is that not a single one of his readers be "hardened" (GK 5020). This verb refers not only to "the heart" but is general. One's whole life may be hard, and in that case one is no candidate for spiritual progress. What hardens a person is "sin's deceitfulness." The readers were being tempted to go back to Judaism in the belief that by doing so they would be better off. But sin deceives those who think like this. Temporal and physical safety will be bought only at the price of spiritual disaster.

14 True believers "share in Christ" (cf. 1:9). The author here is stressing the privilege we have in being Christians. He suggests the two sides of a paradox appear in the phrases, "we have come" and "if we hold firmly." What God has done God has done. But it is important that believers hold firmly to what God has given them (cf. v.6). When the addressees first became believers, they had "confidence" (GK 5712); i.e., they had no doubts then, nor should they have any now. "Till the end" may point to the end of the age or the end of the believer's life.

15 The construction is uncertain. This verse may be taken with the preceding one (cf. NIV) or with what follows. Some link the words with v.13 and regard v.14 as a parenthesis: "Exhort one another while it is called Today . . . while it is said. . . ." The question is not an easy one, but it seems best to take things in order, as NIV does. The words, of course, have already been quoted (see comments on vv.7–8).

16 The author presses home his point by three questions that emphasize that the psalmist of Ps 95 is thinking about the people who were in a position of spiritual privilege and yet sinned grievously. The first question asks, "Who were they who heard and rebelled?" The verb "rebelled" (GK 4176) means "embitter" or "make angry," and is a strong expression for the rebellious attitude that characterized the Exodus generation.

The writer answers his question with another, this one phrased so as to expect a yes answer. "All those Moses led out of Egypt" is comprehensive, but that Joshua and Caleb are not mentioned does not invalidate the argument. The nation was characterized by unbelief, and the faithfulness of two men does not alter this. NIV says that Moses "led" the people out of Egypt; but, more literally, the author said that they "came out through Moses"—implying that they acted of their own volition and made a good start.

17 The second question refers to those with whom God was angry for forty years (see comments on vv.10–11). In the earlier treatment of the incident (vv.7–8), the forty years referred to testing God and seeing his works. Here it refers to the continuing wrath of God. This wrath was not something transitory and easily avoided. It lasted throughout the "desert" period, as the Israelites wandered in the Sinai wilderness. The question is phrased in such a way as to leave no doubt whatever that God was angry with the sinners in question. Their punishment is mentioned in words reminiscent of Nu 14:29, 32. Those who sinned against God had been destroyed, just as he had prophesied through Moses.

18 The third question refers to those to whom the oath was sworn (cf. v.11). Those who would not enter God's rest were "those who disobeyed" (GK 578). This verb usually means "disobey," though some accept the meaning "disbelieve" (cf. NIV note). This translation is possible since for the early Christians the supreme disobedience was refusing to believe the Gospel. God did much for these people. Yet in the end they went their own way and refused to obey him.

19 The depressing conclusion sums up what has gone before. The author does not say that they did not enter but that they "were not able to enter" the land of Canaan. Sin is self-defeating and prevents people from entering God's rest. This is not an arbitrary penalty imposed by a despotic God. It is the inevitable outcome of "unbelief." The warning to the people of the writer's day is clear. To slip back from their Christian profession into unbelief would be fatal.

C. Christians Enter the Rest (4:1–10)

The author argues that the purposes of God are not frustrated because Israel of old disobeyed him and failed to enter the rest he had promised his people. The promise remains. If ancient Israel did not enter God's rest, then someone else will; namely, the Christians. But this should not lead to complacency on their part. If the Israelites of an earlier day, with all their advantages, failed to enter the rest, Christians ought not to think there will be automatic acceptance for them. They must take care lest they, too, fail to enter the blessing.

1 "Let us be careful" is more strictly "let us fear"; the writer does not want his readers to grow complacent, for there is real danger. God's promises mean much to the writer. The particular promise in question "still stands." That is to say, though it has not been fulfilled, neither has it been revoked. In one sense, of course, there was a fulfillment, for the generation after the people who died in the wilderness entered Canaan. But throughout this section it is basic to the argument that physical entry into Canaan did not constitute the ultimate fulfillment of the promise. God had promised "rest" and that meant more than living in Canaan.

There is a problem about the word translated "be found" (GK 1506). It can mean either "think" or "seem." If "think" is chosen, the writer is reassuring fearful Christians who thought they might miss out on the rest. If "seem" is chosen, these words constitute a soft warning to the readers to take care lest they miss the promised rest. A decision is not easy, but on the whole it seems that this second interpretation fits the context better. The author, then, is reminding his readers that there was a generation to whom the rest was promised and who missed it. They should beware lest they make the same mistake.

2 "We have had the gospel preached to us" (GK 2294) uses the verb that became the technical term for preaching the Gospel (though the word can also mean simply "heard good news"). Israel of old, like Christians in the author's day, heard the Gospel. The first half of the verse makes it clear that on the score of hearing God's Good News, there was not much difference between the wilderness generation and the readers. The stress is on the readers. They have the message, and they must act on it, in contrast to the Israelites of old who did not.

"The message they heard" brought them no profit. The last part of this verse can be taken in either of two ways (see NIV note for the second option). The meaning is either "It [the word] was not mixed with faith in them that heard," or, "They were not united by faith with them that heard" (i.e., with real believers, men like Caleb and Joshua). The main thrust is plain enough: It is not enough to hear the message; it must be acted on in faith.

This is the writer's first use of "faith" (GK 4411), a term he will employ frequently. This word means "faithfulness" as well as "faith," but the latter preponderates in the NT. Sometimes faith in God is meant and sometimes faith in Christ. In this letter it is often the former (see comment on 6:1). Here the term points to the right response to the Christian message—the attitude of trusting God wholeheartedly. The writer speaks of "those who heard" without specifying what it was they heard. But there can be no doubt that he is looking for a right response to what God had done and to what God had made known.

3 "We who have believed" (GK 4409) once more stresses the necessity of faith. It is believers who enter God's rest, not members of physical Israel, and they do so through a right relationship to God, with an attitude of trust. Characteristically, the writer supports his position by an appeal to Scripture.

There is nothing in the Greek to correspond to "God" in "God has said." Yet this is a correct interpretation because the writer habitually regards God as the author of Scripture. The verb tense used in "has said" (GK 3306) emphasizes permanence. What God has spoken stands. The quotation is from Ps 95:11 (already cited in 3:11; see comments). Its point appears to be that those to whom the promise was originally made could not enter the rest because of the divine oath. This does not mean any inadequacy on God's part, for he had completed his works from the time of Creation. God's rest was thus available from the time Creation was completed, and his "rest" was the rest he himself enjoyed. The earthly rest in Canaan was no more than a type or symbol of this.

4 The writer does not precisely locate his quotation (Ge 2:2) but contents himself with the general "somewhere." Nor does he say who the speaker is, though once again it must be God, the author of all Scripture. Locating a passage precisely was not easy when scrolls were used; and unless it was important, there was a tendency not to look it up. The important thing is that God said these words. The passage speaks of God as resting from his work on the seventh day.

It is worth noticing that in the creation story each of the first six days is marked by the refrain "And there was evening, and there was morning." However, this is lacking in the account of the seventh day. There we simply read that God rested from all his work. This does not mean that God entered a state of idleness, for there is a sense in which he is continually at work (Jn 5:17). But the completion of creation marks the end of a magnificent whole. There was nothing to add to what God had done, and he entered a rest from creating, a rest marked by the knowledge that everything that he had made was very good (Ge 1:31). So we should think of the rest as something like the satisfaction that comes from accomplishment, from the completion of a task.

5 The writer again adds Ps 95:11, which is central to his argument at this point. As here, he often uses "again" where a further quotation is added to a preceding one (e.g., 1:5; 2:13; 10:30). In this case, however, it does more than reinforce his idea; it introduces a second point in the argument. The first passage said that God rested (and by implication that the rest was open to those who would enter it); the second passage said that the Israelites did not enter that rest because God's judgment fell on them. So the way is prepared for later steps in the argument.

6–7 The argument moves along in logical sequence. Some will enter that rest because it is unthinkable that God's plan should fail of fulfillment. If God prepared a rest for humanity to enter into, then they will enter into it. Perhaps those originally invited will not do so, for there is often something conditional about God's promises. It is precisely the force of the present argument that nothing can stop the promises from being kept, but they must always be appropriated by faith. So if one does not approach the promises by faith, one does not obtain what God offers and the offer is made to others. Some, then, must enter God's rest, though the first recipients of the Good News (cf. v.2) did not.

The writer concentrates on two generations only: the wilderness generation and his contemporaries. There had been other generations who might have appropriated the promise. But the focus is on the first generation who set the pattern of unbelief and then on the writer's generation, who alone at that time had the opportunity of responding to God's invitation. The intervening generations were not germaine to his argument.

The reason the first group did not enter God's rest was "their disobedience" (GK 577). This word is always used in the NT of disobeying God, often with the thought of the Gospel in mind; so it comes close to the meaning disbelief (cf. v.11; Ro 11:30). Because the first generation had passed the opportunity by, God set another day. The idea that the wilderness generation was finally rejected was one the rabbis found hard to accept. Thus they expressed a conviction that somehow those Israelites would be saved. The author, however, has no such reservations about that generation. They disobeyed God and forfeited their place. Psalm 95 was written long after the Israelites in the desert had failed to use their opportunity and had perished. Its use of the term "Today" shows that the promise had never been claimed and was still open. The voice of God still called. A day of opportunity remained, even though the fate of the wilderness generation stood as an impressive witness to the possibility of spiritual disaster.

8 This sentence expresses a contrary-to-fact condition: "If Joshua had given them rest [as he did not], God would not have spoken later about another day [as he did]." The name "Joshua" is the Hebrew form of the Greek name "Jesus." "Joshua" is a good way of rendering the text, as it makes clear to the English reader who is in mind. The Greek text, however, says "Jesus"; and both the writer and his original readers would have been mindful of the connection with the name of Christ, even though the emphasis in the passage lies elsewhere. There had been a "Jesus" who could not lead his people into the rest of God, just as there was another "Jesus" who could.

9 This verse expresses the logical consequence of what precedes. The Greek word used for "Sabbath-rest" (GK 4878) is most likely a word made up by the author. There were various kinds of "rest." There was, for example, the kind of rest Israel was to get in its own land when it had rest from wars (Dt 25:19). When the psalmist wrote Ps 95, he knew firsthand what this kind of rest in Palestine meant, and he was still looking for "rest." Thus rest from war is not the kind of rest that the author of Hebrews had in mind. Jesus spoke of quite another kind of rest—rest for the souls of people (Mt 11:28–30). This is nearer to what the author means. He links rest with the original Sabbath, with what God did when he finished Creation and what Christians are called into. This, then, is a highly original view. The author sees the rest as for "the people of God" (cf. 11:2; 1Pe 2:10). In the OT "the people of God" is the nation of Israel, but in the NT it signifies believers. The rest the author writes about is for such people. Those who shut themselves out by disobedience and unbelief cannot enter into it.

10 We now have a description of at least part of what the rest means. The writer reverts to the word for "rest" that he has been using earlier instead of the "Sabbath-rest" of v.9. To "enter God's rest" means for a believer to cease from one's own work, just as God ceased from his.

The main question that arises is whether the rest takes place here and now, or after death, as seen in Rev 14:13: "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord . . . they will rest from their labor." It is best to see this rest as an experience in which they live here and now by faith, but the rest they know here is not the full story. That will be revealed in the hereafter. There is a sense in which to enter Christian salvation means to cease from one's works and to rest securely on what Christ has done. And there is a sense in which the works of the believer, works done in Christ, have about them that completeness and sense of fulfillment that may fitly be classed with the rest in question.

D. Exhortation to Enter the Rest (4:11–13)

The idea of the rest of God is not simply a piece of curious information not readily accessible to the rank and file of Christians. It is a spur to action. So the writer proceeds to exhort his readers to make that rest their own.

11 It is possible that this verse should be attached to the preceding paragraph, but it seems preferable to see it as introducing an exhortation based on the penetrating power of the Word of God. The writer includes himself with his readers in urging a quick and serious effort to enter the rest "so that no one will fall by following their example of disobedience." Paul refers to the same generation to hammer home a similar lesson, and he regards the wilderness happenings as types (1Co 10:1–12). These earlier people had perished. Let the readers beware!

12 "The word of God" means anything that God utters—particularly the word that came through Jesus Christ. "Living and active" shows that there is a dynamic quality about God's revelation. It does things. Specifically, it penetrates and, in this capacity, is likened to a "double-edged sword" (cf. Isa 49:2; Eph 6:17; Rev 1:16; 2:12; 19:15).

The Word of God is unique. No sword can penetrate as it can. We should not take the reference to "soul" and "spirit" as indicating a "dichotomist" over against a "trichotomist" view of a human being (but see comments on 1Th 5:23), nor the reference to "dividing" to indicate that the writer envisaged a sword as slipping between them. Nor should we think of the sword as splitting off "joints" and "marrow." What the author is saying is that God's Word can reach to the innermost recesses of our being. We must not think that we can bluff our way out of anything, for no secrets are hidden from God. We cannot keep our thoughts to ourselves. There may also be the thought that the whole of human nature, however we divide it, physical as well as nonmaterial, is open to God.

With "judges" we move to legal terminology. The Word of God passes judgment on our feelings and thoughts. Nothing evades the scope of this Word. What people hold as most secret they find subject to its scrutiny and judgment.

13 The same truth is now expressed in different imagery. This time the impossibility of hiding anything from God is illustrated by the thought of nakedness. "Nothing in all creation" (or "no created being") remains invisible to God. "Uncovered" (GK 1218) here means that all things are truly naked before God. "Laid bare" (GK 5548) is an unusual word, sometimes used of wrestlers who had a hold that involved gripping the neck and brought victory. So the term can mean "to prostrate" or "overthrow." Most scholars, however, think a meaning like "exposed" is required. Yet it is not easy to see how this meaning is to be obtained. It has been suggested that the wrestler exposed the face or neck of his foe by his grip. While this may be so, it entails reading something into the situation. Another suggestion is the bending back of the head of a sacrificial victim to expose the throat. Unfortunately, no example of the word used in this way is attested. In the end we must probably remain unsatisfied. Clearly the author is saying that no one can keep anything hidden from God, but the metaphor by which he brings out this truth is not clear.

The verse contains yet another difficulty, namely, the precise meaning of its closing words. The expression is used of accounting, and it seems likely that the translation "him to whom we must give account" is correct. Nothing is hidden from God, and in the end we must give account of ourselves to him. The combination makes a powerful reason for heeding the exhortation and entering into the rest by our obedience.

IV. A Great High Priest (4:14–5:11)

One of the major insights of this letter is that Jesus is our great High Priest. The author proceeds to reinforce his exhortation to enter the rest with a reminder of the character of our High Priest. Jesus is one with his people, and for them he offers the perfect sacrifice. This is seen largely in terms of the Day of Atonement ceremonies in which the role of the high priest (and not simply any priest) was central.

A. Our Confidence (4:14–16)

The first point is that Jesus knows our human condition. It is not something he has heard about, so to speak, but something he knows; for he, too, was human. We may approach him confidently because he knows our weakness.

14 Our confidence rests on Jesus. He is "a great high priest," a title that suggests his superiority to the Levitical priests. He has "gone through the heavens." The Jews sometimes thought of a plurality of heavens (cf. Paul's reference to "the third heaven" in 2Co 12:2 or other Jewish references to seven heavens). Jesus has gone right through to the supreme place. His greatness is further emphasized by the title "Son of God." All this is the basis for an exhortation to hold firmly to our profession.

15 Our High Priest has entered into our weakness and so can sympathize meaningfully with us. He "has been tempted . . . just as we are" may mean "in the same way as we are tempted" or "by reason of his likeness to us"; both are true. There is another ambiguity at the end of the verse where the Greek means "apart from sin." This may mean that Jesus was tempted just as we are except that we sin and he did not. But it may also mean that he had a knowledge of every kind of temptation except that which comes from actually having sinned. Perhaps the writer was not trying to differentiate between the two. At any rate his words can profitably be taken either way. The main point is that, though Jesus did not sin, we must not infer that life was easy for him. His sinlessness was, at least in part, an earned sinlessness as he gained victory after victory in the constant battle with temptation that life in this world entails. In fact, the Sinless One knows the force of temptation in a way that we who sin do not. We give in before the temptation has fully spent itself; only he who does not yield knows its full force.

16 Having this High Priest gives "confidence." So the writer exhorts his readers to approach God boldly. The word "us" does away with the mediation of earthly priests. We can approach God's "throne of grace" directly. This expression for God's throne points both to the sovereignty of God and to God's love to people. The rabbis sometimes spoke of a "throne of mercy" to which God goes from "the throne of judgment" when he spares people. The idea here is not dissimilar, all the more so since the writer goes on to speak of receiving "mercy" (GK 1799). We need mercy because we have failed so often, and we need grace because service awaits us in which we need God's help. And help is what the writer says we get—the help that is appropriate to the time, i.e., "timely help."

Christians should not be tentative because they have the great High Priest in whom they can be confident. His successful traverse of the heavens points to his power to help, and his fellow-feeling with our weakness points to his sympathy with our needs. In the light of this, what can hold us back?

B. The Qualities Required in High Priests (5:1–4)

The author now directs his readers to the qualities required in the well-known institution of high priests, though he confines his attention to the Aaronic priesthood in the OT and does not consider contemporary Jewish priests who fell far short of the ideal. He shows that the necessary qualifications include oneness with the people, compassion, and appointment by God. Then the author goes on to show that Christ had all these qualifications.

1 The author proposes to explore something of the nature of high priesthood and begins by showing that it has both a humanward and a Godward reference. It is of the essence of priesthood that the priest has community of nature with those he represents. But his work is "in matters related to God," specifically in offering "gifts and sacrifices for sins." The writer is summarizing the priestly function of offering.

2 "Deal gently with" (GK 3584) is not easy to translate; it refers to taking the middle course between apathy and anger. A true high priest is not indifferent to moral lapses, but neither is he harsh. He "is able" to take this position only because he himself shares in the same "weakness" (GK 819) as the sinners on whom he has compassion. This word may denote physical or moral frailty, and the following words show that in the case of the usual run of high priests the latter is included. The earthly high priest is at one with his people in their need for atonement and forgiveness.

3 The high priest is required to make offerings for himself just as for his people. For the Day of Atonement it was prescribed that the high priest present a bull "for his own sin offering" (Lev 16:11). Only then was he able to minister on behalf of the people. In the matter of sins and of sacrifices the priest must regard himself in exactly the same way he regards the people. His case is identical with theirs.

4 The negative statement immediately refutes any thought that a man can take the initiative in being made high priest. It is an honor to be a high priest, and this can happen only by divine appointment; the appointment of Aaron sets the pattern (Ex 28:1–3). In point of fact, no other call to be high priest is recorded in Scripture, though we might reason that the call to Aaron was not simply personal but also included his family and descendants. At any rate, the Bible records disasters that befell those who took it upon themselves to perform high priestly duties, as in the cases of Korah (Nu 16), Saul (1Sa 13:8ff.), and Uzziah (2Ch 26:16ff.).

C. Christ's Qualifications as High Priest (5:5–11)

Having made clear what is required in high priests, the author shows that Christ has these qualifications. Moreover, Christ is both Priest and King, which goes beyond the view expressed in some Jewish writings that there will be two messiahs, one of Aaron and another of David. No other NT writer speaks of Jesus as a high priest. It is a highly original way of looking at him.

5–6 Christ has the qualification of being called by God. There is perhaps a hint at his obedience in the use of the term "the Christ" rather than the human name "Jesus." He who was God's own Christ did not take the glory on himself (cf. Jn 8:54). The writer cites two passages, the first being Ps 2:7 (cf. Heb 1:5). He will later argue that Jesus ministers in the heavenly sanctuary. Accordingly, it is important that Jesus be seen to be the Son, one who has rights in heaven.

The second citation is from Ps 110:4. The first verse of this psalm is often applied to Jesus (e.g., Heb 1:13), but this is the first time the Melchizedek passage is used in this way. The psalm says, "You are a priest forever," which is the first use of the term "priest" (GK 2636) in this letter (used fourteen times). The author uses it of priests generally (7:14; 8:4), of the Levitical priests (7:20, etc.), of Melchizedek (7:1, 3), and of Christ (5:6; 7:11, 15, 17, 21; 10:21). When it is used of Christ, it seems to differ little from "high priest." It is a powerful way of bringing out certain aspects of Christ's saving work for the human race. All that a priest does in offering sacrifice for people Christ does. But whereas priests do it only symbolically, he really effects atonement.

"Forever" is another contrast. Other priests have their day and pass away. Not Christ! His priesthood abides. He has no successor (a fact that will be brought out later). He is a priest "of the same kind as Melchizedek" (a better translation than "of the order of Melchizedek," for there was no succession of priests from Melchizedek). Jesus was a priest of this kind—not like Aaron and his successors.

7 The author turns to the second qualification—Jesus' oneness with humankind. In realistic language he brings out the genuineness of Jesus' humanity. Commentators agree that the writer is referring to the agony in Gethsemane, though his language does not fit into any of our accounts. It seems that he may have had access to some unrecorded facts. It is also possible that he wants us to see that there were other incidents in Jesus' life that fit into this general pattern. "Prayers and petitions" points to dependence on God, who alone can save from death.

There are difficulties at the end of v.7. The word "heard" (GK 1653) is usually taken to mean that the prayer was answered, not simply noted. Most interpreters agree. But they also contend that the prayer must have been answered in the terms in which it was asked. The problem, then, is that Jesus prayed, "Take this cup from me" (Mk 14:36); but he still died. Various solutions have been proposed. All in all, it seems best to remember that Jesus' prayer was not simply a petition that he should not die, because he immediately said, "Yet not what I will, but what you will." The important thing about answered prayer is that God does what brings about the end aimed at, not what corresponds exactly to the words of the petitioner. In this case the prayer was that the will of God be done, and this has precedence over the passing of the cup from Jesus. Since the cup had to be drunk, it was drunk! But the significant point is that the Son was strengthened to do the will of the Father.

8 We should take these words in the sense of "son though he was" rather than "although he was a son." It is the quality of sonship that is emphasized. Jesus' stature was such that one would not have expected him to suffer. But he did suffer, and in the process he learned obedience. This, startling though it is, does not mean that Jesus passed from disobedience to obedience. Rather, he learned obedience by actually obeying. There is a certain quality involved when one has performed a required action—a quality that is lacking when there is only a readiness to act. Innocence differs from virtue.

9 Here we must make a similar comment about Jesus' being "made perfect." This does not mean that he was imperfect and that out of his imperfection he became perfect. There is a perfection that results from having actually suffered; it is different from the perfection that is ready to suffer. "He became" indicates a change of relationship that follows the perfecting. The suffering that led to the perfecting did something—Jesus became "the source of eternal salvation." "Eternal" (GK 173) means "pertaining to an age." Normally the word refers to the age to come and so means "without end," though it can also be used of what is without beginning or end (9:14) or simply of what is without beginning (Ro 16:25). It is used of what does not end in connection with redemption (Heb 9:12), covenant (13:20), judgment (6:2), and inheritance (9:15). Jesus will bring people a salvation that is eternal in its scope and efficacy, a salvation that brings them into the life of the world to come. It is a nice touch that he who learned to obey brought salvation to those who obey.

10 The writer has forcefully made his point that Jesus shared our human life. He was qualified to be high priest because of his common nature with us and his compassion. Now the writer returns to the thought that Jesus was made high priest by God. What is to become his characteristic designation throughout this letter is a title not given by people, nor assumed by himself, but conferred on him by God the Father.

11 Although NIV takes this to be the opening of a new paragraph, it seems better to take it as completing the preceding paragraph. The writer points out that there is a good deal that could be said about his subject. It is "hard to explain," not because of some defect in the writer or the intrinsic difficulty of the subject, but because of the slowness of the learners. This leads to a new train of thought that is pursued throughout ch. 6 (we come back to Melchizedek in ch. 7). "This" refers to the way Melchizedek prefigures Christ. "Are" should really be "have become"; it is an acquired state, not a natural one. "Slow" (GK 3821) means "sluggish" or "slothful." His readers ought to have been in a different condition, but they had allowed themselves to get lazy.

V. The Danger of Apostasy (5:12–6:20)

Obviously the author was much concerned lest his readers slip back from their present state into something that amounts to a denial of Christianity. So he utters a strong warning about the dangers of apostasy. He wants his friends to be in no doubt about the seriousness of falling into it.

A. Failure to Progress in the Faith (5:12–14)

This little section is of special interest because it shows that the recipients of the letter were people of whom better things might have been expected. They should have been mature Christians. Since they had evidently been converted for quite some time, they ought to have made more progress in the faith than they in fact had. The author is troubled by their immaturity.

12 The readers had been Christians for long enough to qualify as teachers. This does not necessarily mean that the letter was written to a group of teachers, for the emphasis is on progress in the faith. Those addressed had failed to go on, though they had been believers long enough to know more. Christians who have really progressed in the faith ought to be able to instruct others (see 1Pe1 3:15; cf. Ro 2:21). But, far from this being the case, they still needed instruction, and that in elementary truths.

"Someone to teach you" stands over against "teachers" and points up the contrast. Their knowledge of the faith is minimal when it ought to have been advanced. "The elementary truths" renders an expression that is equivalent to our "ABC." It points to the real beginnings. The Greek actually means something like "the ABC of the beginning of the oracles of God." There can be no doubt as to the elementary nature of the teaching in question. But it is not quite clear what "God's word [lit., oracles; GK 3359]" is. Quite possibly the OT is meant, though some think it is the entire Jewish system. Since the expression is quite general, it seems better to take it of all that God has spoken—i.e., the divine revelation in general.

The verse ends with another strong statement about the plight of the readers. "You need milk" renders an expression that literally means "you have become having need of milk," an expression in which "you have become" is important (cf. 5:11). Once again the writer is drawing attention to the fact that his readers have moved their position. Always in the Christian life, one either moves forward or slips back. It is almost impossible to stand still. These people had not advanced; so the result was that they had gone back and had "become" beginners. The contrast between milk and solid food is found elsewhere (cf. 1Co 3:2). "Milk" stands for elementary instruction in the Christian way; "solid food" is, of course, more advanced instruction, the kind of teaching beginners cannot make much of but which is invaluable to those who have made some progress. What is appropriate at the early stages of the Christian life may cease to be suitable as time goes on.

13 The author now explains his reference to milk and solid food. "Anyone" is inclusive; in other words, the author is saying, "This is the way it is." Christians occupied with elementary truths are spiritually still infants and must be treated as such. They are without experience in "the teaching about righteousness." It is uncertain what "righteousness" (GK 1466) means, for it may be taken in more ways than one. Most likely it means the right conduct God expects believers to follow, but which the readers of this letter have not been following.

14 With "but" the author contrasts infants in v.13. Mature people (GK 5455), who have "trained themselves," need solid food. The NT makes considerable use of metaphors from athletics, as our writer does here. Mature Christians constantly exercise themselves in spiritual perception, and the result is manifest. They can "distinguish good from evil" and, therefore, the implication runs, will not be in danger of doing the wrong thing to which the readers find themselves attracted. Lacking this perception, Christian service will always be immature and partial.

B. Exhortation to Progress (6:1–3)

Since the readers were still in need of milk, we anticipate that this is what the writer will provide. Instead, he says he will leave elementary things and go on to "maturity." We expect him to introduce this with "despite your condition" or the like. Instead, we get "therefore." The reason for this may lie in the nature of what he calls "the elementary teachings." Almost every item in his list had a place in an orthodox Jewish community. He may have felt that to concentrate on this area would be of no help to those slipping back into Judaism. Therefore he goes on to "solid food."

1 The writer links himself with his readers in his exhortation to leave elementary things behind and go forward. He sees "repentance from acts that lead to death" as basic. "Repentance" (GK 3567) was the first thing required in the preaching of John the Baptist, Jesus, and the apostles; and it remains basic. Repentance is "from dead works," a phrase that has been understood to mean legalistic adherence to Jewish ways (works that could never bring life) or genuinely evil actions (actions that belong to death and not life). The latter seems preferable. Linked with this is the positive attitude of "faith in God." Faith matters immensely to the author (see comment on 4:2). As used here it means more than a conviction that there is a God; it means trusting in that God in a personal relationship. And it is not so different from faith in Christ as some suggest, because it is basic Christian teaching that God was in Christ (cf. 2Co 5:19).

2 "Instruction" is in apposition to "foundation" and introduces a fresh group of subjects. "Baptisms" is a word usually used of purification ceremonies other than Christian baptism (9:10; Mk 7:4), and it is plural (which would be unusual for baptism). Thus it is likely that the word refers to something other than Christian baptism. There were such purification ceremonies, or lustrations, in the Jewish religion as in most other religions of the day. Sometimes there was confusion over ritual washings (Jn 3:25ff.; Ac 19:1–5). It would thus be one of the elementary items of instruction that converts be taught the right approach to the various "baptisms" they would encounter.

The "laying on of hands" was a widespread practice in antiquity. Among Christians, hands were laid on new converts (Ac 8:17), on Timothy by the presbyterate (1Ti 4:14), and on Timothy by Paul (2Ti 1:6). This action was sometimes associated with commissioning for ministry and sometimes with the beginnings of Christian service. It seems to have been connected with the gift of the Spirit at least on some occasions (e. g., Ac 8:17–19). It is Christian beginnings, perhaps with the thought of God's gift of the Holy Spirit, that are in mind here.

"The resurrection of the dead . . . and eternal judgment" were topics that went together and were important for Jews and Christians alike. They form a reminder that this life is not everything. We are responsible people, and one day we shall rise from the dead and give account of ourselves to God. This must have been of importance to new converts in a time when many people thought of death as the end of everything.

3 This verse expresses not only a resolute determination to go ahead on these lines but also a recognition that it is only with the help of God that this can be done. We should take these words as coming out of the author's realization that without divine aid the plan he was suggesting was impossible.

C. No Second Beginning (6:4–8)

The writer proceeds to underline the seriousness of apostasy from the Christian faith and, indeed, of any failure to make progress. He does this by pointing to the impossibility of making a second beginning. It is impossible for Christians to stand still. They either progress in the faith or slip back. And slipping back is serious; it can mean cutting oneself off from the blessings God offers. The writer is not questioning the perseverance of the saints. As he has done before, he is insisting that only those who continue in the Christian way are the saints.

4 This verse indicates the reasonableness of what follows: Had his readers really fallen away, there would be no point in talking to them. The word "enlightened" (GK 5894) affirms that those who are admitted to the Christian faith are brought to that light that is "the light of the world" (Jn 8:12; cf. 2Co 4:6; 2Pe 1:19). To abandon the Gospel would be to sin against the light they had received.

"The heavenly gift" is not closely defined. The thought is of God's good gift, and we cannot be more precise than this. The Holy Spirit is active among all believers and for that matter to some extent beyond the church, in his work of "common grace." It is clear that some activity of the Spirit is in mind. Yet once more our author does not define it closely.

5 The people in question have "tasted the goodness of the word of God." While some limit this to the Gospel, there seems to be no need to do this. Any word that God has spoken is a good gift to people, and those the writer has in mind here have come to hear something of God's word to the human race. They have also experienced something of "the powers of the coming age." The "age to come" is normally the Messianic Age; powers proper to the coming Messianic Age are in some sense realized now for God's people. "Powers" (GK 1539) indicates that that age puts at people's disposal powers they do not have of themselves.

6 "If they fall away" clearly means "fall away from Christianity." The writer is envisaging people who have been numbered among the followers of Christ but now leave that company. Such cannot be brought back to repentance. The author does not say "cannot be forgiven" or "cannot be restored to salvation" or the like. It is repentance that is in mind, and the writer says that it is impossible for these people to repent. Most likely this refers to a repentance that means leaving the backsliding into which the person has fallen. Such a person cannot bring himself or herself to this repentance.

It is probable that we should take the verb rendered "are crucifying . . . all over again" (GK 416) simply as "crucifying." The author is saying that those who deny Christ in this way are really taking their stand among those who crucified Jesus. In heart and mind they make themselves one with those who put him to death on the cross at Calvary.

There has been much discussion of the significance of this passage. Some think that the author is speaking about genuine Christians who fall away and that he denies that they may ever come back. This view sets the writer of the letter in contradiction with other NT writers for whom it is clear that the perseverance of the saints is something that comes from God and not from our own best efforts (e.g., Jn 6:37; 10:27–29). Others think that the case is purely hypothetical. Because the writer does not say that this has ever happened, they infer that it never could really happen and that to put it this way makes the warning more impressive. But unless the writer is speaking of something that could really happen, it is not a warning about anything. Granted, he does not say that anyone has apostatized in this way; nevertheless, he surely means that someone could, and he does not want his readers to do so. A third possibility is that the writer is talking about what looks very much like the real thing but lacks something. The case of Simon Magus springs to mind. He is said to have believed, to have been baptized, and to have continued with Philip (Ac 8:13). Presumably he shared in the laying on of hands and the gift given by it. Yet after all this Peter could say to him, "Your heart is not right before God. . . . you are full of bitterness and captive to sin" (Ac 8:21–23). The writer is saying that when people have entered into the Christian experience far enough to know what it is all about and have then turned away, then, as far as they themselves are concerned, they are crucifying Christ. In that state they cannot repent.

7 This process is now illustrated from agriculture. Land drinks in rain and as a result brings forth a crop. The rain comes first. The land does not produce the crop of itself. The spiritual parallel should not be overlooked. The word translated "a crop" (GK 1083) is a general term for herbage; it does not mean any specific crop. "Useful to those for whom it is farmed" means that the beneficiaries are people in general and not only those who actually work on the farm. This land, then, receives God's blessing.

8 We should not miss the point that this is the same land as in v.7. We should probably place a comma at the end of v. 7 and proceed thus: "but if it produces . . .," or, "but when it produces. . . ." The reference to producing "thorns and thistles" reminds us inevitably of the curse of Ge 3:17ff.—a curse on that very creation of which it had been said, "God saw all that he had made, and it was very good" (Ge 1:31). This land then, producing only what is worthless, awaits the curse. "Is in danger of being cursed" might give the impression that the land came close to being cursed but just escaped. The author seems rather to be saying that at the moment of which he speaks the curse has not yet fallen, certain though it is. Such a field in the end "will be burned." Some commentators think the writer knew little of agriculture, for the burning of the field was not a curse but rather a source of blessing as it got rid of the weeds and so prepared for a good crop. But whatever his knowledge of farming, he had a valid point. Land that produced nothing but weeds faced nothing but fire. The warning to professing Christians whose lives produce only the equivalent of weeds is plain.

D. Exhortation to Perseverance (6:9–12)

The preceding sections have contained salutary warnings about the dangers of apostasy. The readers have had it made clear to them that they must make progress along the Christian way or suffer disaster. There are no other possibilities. Now the writer indicates that he has confidence in his correspondents. He has felt it necessary to warn them, but he does not really think they will fall away. So he speaks encouragingly and warmly, at the same time using the occasion to exhort them to go forward.

The author of Hebrews pictures vibrant Christians as productive land. Notice the abundant dates on this date palm in Israel.

9 For the only time in this letter the writer addresses the readers as "dear friends" (GK 28). He has a tender concern for his correspondents, even though he has had to say some critical things about them. "We are confident" carries a note of certainty ("we" is a plural of authorship and means "I"). He is sure that there are "better" things about them than the kind of disaster he has been speaking about (the writer is fond of the word "better"; see comment on 1:4). He does not say what these good things are better than, but it is clearly implied that it is the cursing and the like that he has been speaking of. He does not think that in the end they will be caught in the condemnation he has referred to. He goes on with "And having salvation." This unusual expression might mean "things that lead to salvation" or "things that follow from salvation." Perhaps we should leave it general as NIV: "things that accompany salvation."

10 This verse begins with the Greek word meaning "for" and introduces the grounds for his confidence—a confidence that rests basically on God's constancy. In a masterly understatement the writer refers to God as "not unjust." It is the character of God as the perfectly just judge of all that gives rise to the author's confidence. This God will not forget what the readers have done. The statement is not an intrusion of a doctrine of salvation by works. Rather, the Christian profession of the readers had been more than formal, and they had shown in changed lives what that profession meant. This, the writer is saying, would not go unnoticed with God. He adds, "And the love you have shown him." The following words show that it is deeds of kindness to people that are in mind. Such deeds, proceeding from loving hearts as they do, demonstrate that the doers have a real affection for God. Showing love to others is proof for a real love for God (cf. 1Jn 4:19–21). These Christians have served God's people in the past, and they continue with this kind of service.

11 "We want" (GK 2121) refers to strong desire. The writer was passionately concerned for his friends (see v. 9), and we see it again in his desire for "each" of them. No one is excluded. He calls on them to show "this same diligence." The past had set a standard, and he looks for it to be maintained "to the very end," bringing before them the importance of perseverance. "In order to make your hope sure" renders a somewhat unusual expression (lit., "to the fullness [GK 4443] of the hope"). This phrase suggests the full development of the hope. In these verses we have love (v. 10) and faith (v. 12) as well as hope. These three are often joined in the NT (Ro 5:2–5; 1 Cor 13:13; 1Th 1:3; 5:8; Heb 10:22–24; et al.). In the twentieth century we would easily think of faith and love. But hope? Clearly it had a greater significance for the early church than it has for us. Hope is important, for no movement ever grips the hearts of people if it does not give them hope.

12 The writer continues with the purpose behind his instruction: he does not want them to "become lazy." The readers are to "imitate" those who get the promises—"imitate" (GK 3629) and not simply "follow." It is uncertain whether he is alluding to the great ones of the past (see on 11) or to outstanding contemporaries. Perhaps the present tense in "inherit" tips the scale in favor of those then living. The readers had good examples. "Faith" in God is important throughout this letter, and it is not surprising to have it included here as an important part of the Christian life. "Patience" (GK 3429) points to a quality of being undismayed in difficulties. Faith has a steadfastness about it that sees it through whatever difficulties present themselves. The verb "inherit" (GK 3099; see comment on 1:14) here means "to have sure possession of" without specifying the means.

E. God's Promise Is Sure (6:13–20)

Abraham is a splendid example of what the author has in mind. Though that patriarch had God's promise, he had to live for many years in patient expectation with nothing to go on except that God had promised. But that was enough. God is utterly reliable. What he has promised he will certainly perform. But we must wait patiently, for he does it all in his own good time, not in ours.

13 The author is fond of Abraham, whom he refers to ten times. He is the supreme example of one who continued to trust God and to obey him even though the circumstances were adverse and gave little support to faith. The NT often speaks of God's promise in connection with this man (Ac 3:25; 7:17; Ro 4:13; Gal 3:8, 14, 16, 18). His greatness and the frequency with which God's promise was linked with his name made him a natural example for the author. It is the fact of the promise rather than its content that the author appeals to—especially in that God confirmed it with an oath. The oath in itself implies delay in fulfilling the promise. If God had been about to fulfill it immediately, there would have been no place for an oath. So from the first Abraham was faced with the prospect of waiting in hope and faith. God swore the oath by himself, for there was no one greater to swear by—a point that is significant to the author.

14 The quotation is from Ge 22:17. "I will surely bless you" conveys the ideas of emphasis and certainty (the first of seven occurrences of "bless" [GK 2328] in this letter). Sometimes it is used of people, meaning "to invoke blessings on." But where God is the subject, the meaning is "prosper." Here the blessing refers to Abraham's descendants who would form a great nation, possess the land, and in due course be the source of blessing to others.

15 "So" should not be taken too closely with "waiting patiently." It is not so much "waiting thus" as "thus [confident in God's promise], he waited patiently." Abraham was content to await God's time for the fulfillment of the promise. This meant real patience, because Isaac was not born till twenty-five years after the promise was first given (Ge 12:4; 21:5) and long after Sarah could have been expected to bear children. Abraham's grandchildren were not born for another sixty years (Ge 25:26), only fifteen years before his death (Ge 25:7). The complete fulfillment of the promise, of course, could not take place within his lifetime (a nation cannot be born so quickly). But enough happened for the writer to say, "Abraham received what was promised."

We should possibly also bear in mind Jn 8:56: "Abraham rejoiced at the thought of seeing my day; he saw it and was glad." In that sense Abraham did see the fuller working out of the promise. But the important thing in the present context is that Abraham had to be patient if he was to see anything in the way of fulfillment. He was patient and he did see it. So the readers are encouraged to be patient and await God's action. He does not go back on his promises; he is completely reliable. But he works in his own way and time, not ours.

16 The importance of the oath is now brought out. When one swears an oath, one makes a solemn affirmation of the truth of his or her words before a greater being, who presumably will punish any misuse of his name if a false statement is made. Thus an oath "puts an end to all argument." It is an authoritative word guaranteed by the highest authority.

17 We now turn from human oaths to the oath God swore to Abraham. God had no need to swear an oath. Nevertheless, he did it to make absolutely clear to his servant that his promise would be fulfilled. The operation of God's will is stressed and is further brought out by the reference to "the unchanging nature of his purpose." God's will does not change. He has his purpose and he works it out. That was what the oath said.

The word rendered "confirmed" (GK 3541) has the idea of "stand as guarantor." God appears, so to speak, in two characters: the giver of the promise and then its guarantor. God is one of the parties of his promise. But with his oath, he puts himself on neutral ground and pledges the fulfillment of that promise. We should not miss the reference to "the heirs." The promise was not confined to Abraham or even to him and his immediate family. Since he was to have a mighty multitude of heirs, it was to all those who follow him, including not merely physical Israel but also his spiritual descendants (Gal 3:7). The readers of the letter must number themselves among those to whom the oath referred.

18 God's swearing the oath gave us "two unchangeable things," the promise and the oath. Once God had spoken, it was inconceivable that either should alter. It is impossible for God to lie. "So that" introduces the purpose God had in mind. This purpose may be as NIV has it, or we can understand it as "so that . . . we who have fled may have strong encouragement to lay hold on the hope." The writer does not specify what we have "fled" from, but the context makes it clear that he is thinking of some aspect of life in a sinful world. So far from clinging to that, he and his readers "take hold of the hope offered." Once again we see the importance of hope, the very antithesis of the despair that might grip us if we saw no more than a sinful world. But we do see more. We look forward to the consummation of God's great work of salvation. The word translated "offered" (GK 4618) pictures hope lying before us, spread out like some inviting prospect; and we are encouraged to go in to it.

19 While the metaphor of the anchor is widely used in antiquity, it occurs only here in the NT. A ship firmly anchored is safe from idle drifting. Its position and safety are sure. So hope is a stabilizing force for the Christian. "Soul" (GK 6034) is a general word that probably means the "life" of a human being. The author is not saying simply that hope secures the "spiritual" aspect of a person; he is affirming that hope forms an anchor for the whole of life. Those with a living hope have a steadying anchor in all they do, giving them a solid footing and security.

And there is something more: hope "enters the inner sanctuary." The imagery takes us back to the tabernacle, with its "curtain" shutting off the Most Holy Place. That little room symbolized the very presence of God, but people were not allowed to enter it. But hope can, says the author. The Christian hope is not exhausted by what it sees of earthly possibilities. It reaches into the very presence of God.

20 We return to the imagery of the Day of Atonement, when the high priest entered the Most Holy Place on behalf of the people. Our forerunner, Jesus, has entered the holiest of all for us—something more than the Levitical high priest could do. Though he entered the Most Holy Place to make atonement on behalf of the people, at the end he and they were still outside. But to call Jesus our "forerunner" implies that we will follow in due course.

"On our behalf" indicates that Jesus did something for us. He not only showed the way but also atoned for us. So we come to the thought that he has become "a high priest forever, in the order of Melchizedek." The thought had been introduced in 5:6, and the author will now proceed to develop it.

VI. Melchizedek (7:1–28)

The writer has mentioned Melchizedek before and has spoken of Jesus as a priest of the Melchizedekian kind, but he has done no more than glance at the theme. Now he develops it. This is an understanding of Christ's work that is peculiar to this letter, and in the author's hands it is very effective. He uses it to show something of the uniqueness of Christ and of the greatness of the work he accomplished for humanity. For the Jews of his day, it would have been axiomatic that there was no priesthood other than the Aaronic. We are now shown that the Law itself proves that there is a higher priesthood than that.

A. The Greatness of Melchizedek (7:1–10)

The writer begins with a brief notice of the incident recorded about Melchizedek, namely his meeting with Abraham as the patriarch returned from the slaughter of the five kings (Ge 14:18–20; Melchizedek is mentioned again only in Ps 110:4). He draws attention to what is known of this man and reaches some important conclusions for Christians. He sees several reasons for regarding Melchizedek as superior: he received tithes from Abraham (and through him, from Levi, the ancestor of the Levitical priests); he blessed Abraham; he was "without beginning of days or end of life" (v.3); he "is declared to be living" (v.8, in contrast to the Aaronic priests who die).

1 The writer begins his explanation of the significance of Melchizedek by referring to Ge 14:17–20. Melchizedek is "king of Salem," which may mean "king of Jerusalem" ("Salem" is another name for Jerusalem in Ps 76:2). But it is curious that if the writer thought that Jerusalem was in fact where Melchizedek ministered, he does not mention the fact that Jesus suffered there (cf. 13:12). Perhaps he saw Salem as some other place; the LXX of Ge 33:18 seems to identify Shechem with Salem.

Melchizedek was not only a king but a "priest of God Most High." It was not uncommon for one person to combine the roles of priest and king in antiquity. It is, however, the special characteristics of this man rather than the dual offices that are noteworthy. The author ignores the fact that the king of Sodom, who had suffered defeat at the hands of the kings Abraham had just routed, went out to meet the triumphant patriarch, and that Melchizedek brought out bread and wine. Instead, he focuses on what will help him make the points he has in mind about the work of Christ. The first of them is that he "blessed him," a point to which he will return in v.7.

2 Abraham gave Melchizedek "a tenth of everything," i. e., of the spoils from the battle (cf. vv.4ff.). So far the author is simply identifying Melchizedek with his reference to the incident after the battle. Now he goes on to the significance of Melchizedek's name and title: "king of righteousness" and "king of Salem" respectively. The place name "Salem" comes from the same root as shalom (Hebrew for "peace"—GK 8934), and it may accordingly be translated in this way. This word means more than absence of war; it signifies the presence of positive blessing. In the NT "peace" (GK 1645) means the result of Christ's work for us (cf. Ro 5:1). We are reminded of the promised Messiah as "Prince of Peace" (Isa 9:6; cf. also "righteousness" in v.7, another distinctive aspect of Christ's saving work).

3 The terms "without father" and "without mother" were often used for waifs of unknown parentage, for illegitimate children, for people who came from unimportant families, and sometimes for deities who were supposed to take their origin from one sex only. Some scholars hold that Melchizedek is viewed in the last mentioned way and is being pictured as an angelic being. But it seems more likely that the author is assuming that the silences of Scripture are as much due to inspiration as are its statements. When nothing is recorded of the parentage of this man, it need not be assumed that he had no parents but simply that the absence of the record is significant. Melchizedek is also "without genealogy." Taken together, the three aspects are striking, for in antiquity a priest's genealogy was considered all-important. After the Exile, certain priests whose genealogy could not be established "were excluded from the priesthood as unclean" (Ne 7:64). Moreover, the priesthood of Melchizedek is without any end.

What was true of Melchizedek simply as a matter of record was true of Christ historically, but they also have significant spiritual dimensions in a fuller sense. The writer is, of course, speaking of the Son's eternal nature, not of his appearance in the Incarnation. He uses the official title of Jesus—"Son of God"—as in 4:14; 6:6; 10:29 (cf. 1:5; 5:5). Since the writer does not use this often, we may sense an emphasis on the high dignity of the Son of God. Moreover, it is the Son of God who is the standard, not the ancient priest-king. The writer says that Melchizedek is "made like" the Son of God, not that the Son of God is like Melchizedek. Thus it is not that Melchizedek sets the pattern and Jesus follows it. Rather, the record about Melchizedek is so arranged that it brings out certain truths that apply far more fully to Jesus than they do to Melchizedek.

4 The author proceeds to bring out the greatness of Melchizedek with an argument that the modern mind may find rather curious but which would have been compelling to his contemporaries. In the ancient world, it was generally recognized that there was an obligation to pay tithes to important religious functionaries. This implies a certain subjection on the part of those paying. So it was significant that Abraham paid to Melchizedek "a tenth of the plunder." From the spoils of victory an offering would often be made to the gods as a thanksgiving. Abraham gave a tenth of the very best to Melchizedek.

5–6a Here the meaning of the payment of the tithe is spelled out. Not only was such a payment widely customary, but the law required it to be made. The writer speaks of "the descendants of Levi who become priests" as "collecting a tenth from the people." In the law it was provided that the people were to pay tithes to the Levites (Nu 18:21, 24). But the Levites similarly paid tithes to the priests (Nu 18:26ff.); so it could well be said that the people paid tithes to the priests (and in the first century it seems that the priests themselves carried out the whole tithing operation).

The writer is strongly interested in "the law" (GK 3795), which he mentions fourteen times. Here it means the law of Moses. The law required tithes to be taken from people of whom the priests were "brothers." There is a sense in which the priests had no inherent superiority, for they were related to those who gave tithes to them. They owed their ability to collect tithes to the provision made in the law and not to any natural superiority. But with Melchizedek it was different. He "did not trace his descent from Levi." Melchizedek was not simply one among a host of brothers. He was a solitary figure of grandeur. And he exacted tithes not simply from his brothers but from Abraham. His greatness stands out.

6b–7 Not only did Melchizedek exact tithes from Abraham, but he also blessed him. The giving of a blessing was a significant act in antiquity. As used here, it is an official pronouncement given by an authorized person. When that happens, there is no denying that it proceeds from a superior: "The lesser person is blessed by the greater."

In the Genesis account Melchizedek makes no claims, nor does Abraham concede anything in words. But both Abraham's giving of tithes and his receiving a blessing from Melchizedek implicitly acknowledge the superior place of Melchizedek. The situation is clear to all parties. The author is simply drawing attention to what the narrative clearly suggests about the superior status of Melchizedek. Even when Abraham is seen as the one "who had the promises," Melchizedek is superior.

8 In the Levitical system, those who receive tithes eventually die. But in the Melchizedek episode, tithes are received by one who is "living." Melchizedek is in strong contrast to the Aaronic priests. The writer does not say that Melchizedek lives on but that the testimony about him is that he lives. Once more he is emphasizing the silence of Scripture to bring out his point, for Scripture records nothing about the death of Melchizedek (v.3). This must be borne in mind when estimating the significance of the incident and the way the priest-king prefigures Christ.

9–10 The expression "one might even say" often introduces a statement that startles a reader and requires one to be careful against misinterpretation. The characteristic of Levi (and his descendants after him) was not that of paying but of receiving tithes. Of course, there is something of the "in-a-manner-of-speaking" about Levi's collecting of tithes, just as there is in his paying of them, because he collects them not in person but through his descendants. But the startling thing is that he should be said to pay tithes at all.

In other words, when Abraham paid Melchizedek a tithe, the author sees Levi as paying it, for "Levi was still in the body of his ancestor." This is a way of speaking we find here and there in the Bible when the ancestor includes the descendants. For example, it was said to Rebekah that not two children but "two nations are in your womb" (Ge 25:23). Levi and all subsequent priests were thus included in the payment of the tithe. The author wants his readers to be in no doubt about the superiority of Christ to any other priests, and he sees the mysterious figure of Melchizedek as powerfully illustrating this superiority.

B. The Royal Priesthood of Melchizedek and of Christ (7:11–14)

For the Jew there was an air of finality about the law; it was God's definitive word to his people. Also, the Jews felt that the Aaronic priesthood was superior to that of Melchizedek, for the law came later than Melchizedek and thus replaced all previous priesthoods. But the author points out that the priesthood of Melchizedek was spoken of in Ps 110, long after the giving of the law. That God spoke through David about the Melchizedekian priesthood while the Aaronic priesthood was still a going concern, shows that the priests of the line of Aaron could not accomplish what a priesthood truly aimed at. And because the priesthood and the law went together, a change in priesthood also meant a change in the law. The author sees it as significant that Jesus did not come from the priestly tribe of Levi but from the royal tribe of Judah. This fits in with the fact that Jesus' priesthood is of the order of Melchizedek and that he was king as well as priest.

11 Here "perfection" (GK 5459) means the condition in which people are acceptable to God. The work of the priests of the line of Levi aimed at bringing about this acceptability, but our author tells us that they failed. That the writer of Ps 110 speaks of another priest shows that the Levitical priests had not accomplished what they aimed at. The words in parentheses show that the law and the priesthood were closely connected.

We ought not to think of the law and the priesthood as two separate things that happened to be operative at the same time among the same people. The priesthood was the very basis of the law. Without that priesthood it would be impossible for the law to operate in its fullness. Thus the declaration by the psalmist (v.17) that there would be another priest was devastating. He looked for a priest "in the order of Melchizedek, not in the order of Aaron." The Aaronic priesthood was not succeeding and thus had to be replaced by a more effective priesthood.

12 The link between the priesthood and the law meant that a change in the one involved a change in the other. The author is speaking of a change from one kind of priesthood to another. Priesthood like that of Melchizedek differs fundamentally from that after the order of Aaron. Christ is not another Aaron; he replaces Aaron with a priesthood that is both different and better. And with the Aaronic priesthood went the law that had been erected with that priesthood as its basis. So the author says there must be a change of law.

13 The change in the law is seen in that Jesus did not belong to the tribe recognized by the law as the priestly tribe. His tribe was "different," which may mean no more than that it was another than the priestly tribe or that the tribe was of a different nature. It was a nonpriestly tribe. In fact, it was a royal tribe. From this tribe no one "has ever served at the altar," and Jesus has a permanent share in that tribe.

But what about David and Solomon, who were of the tribe of Judah and who offered sacrifices (2Sa 6:12–13, 17–18; 24:25; 1Ki 3:4; 8:62ff.)? Two things should be said about this. (1) It is possible that these kings did not do the actual ceremony. (It is unlikely that Solomon personally offered 22,000 oxen and 120,000 sheep.) David and Solomon may have "offered" in the sense that they provided the sacrificial victims, leaving priests to perform the liturgical function. (2) Even if these kings did sometimes perform the actual offering, this was occasional and not their regular function. The author's concern is the regular ministrations of a priest at the altar, which belonged to Aaron and his sons during the OT period.

14 "For" introduces the explanation of the preceding. The author calls Jesus "our Lord" (GK 3261) again only in 13:20 (a title usually reserved for the Father). His verb "descended" (GK 422) is unusual here. It means "rise" or "spring up," and it can be used of the rising of a star or of the springing up of a shoot from the roots of a plant. The author may have in mind the rising of a star or, more likely, the OT prophecies about the Messiah being a shoot from the root of David (see Isa 11:1; Jer 23:5). Here Jesus is said to come "from Judah," a tribe for which Moses had nothing to say about priests; the law did not envisage priests from any tribe other than Levi. That is what made a priesthood like Melchizedek's so unusual.

C. Christ's Priesthood Superior (7:15–28)

The author pursues his theme of the superiority of Christ—superior because of his life, the divine oath, the permanence of his priesthood, and his sacrifice.

1. Because of his life (7:15–19)

15 What it is that is "even more clear" is not said (there is nothing in the Greek equivalent to NIV's "what we have said"). Most likely the expression is meant to include both the ineffectiveness of the Levitical priesthood and the abrogation of the law. It is the appearance of a priest "like Melchizedek" that is the decisive factor.

16 This priest is distinguished by the quality of his life. "A regulation as to his ancestry" renders an expression that is literally "a law of a fleshly commandment." This phrase includes this new priest's ancestry, but it may well be wider—including all that is "fleshly" about the law. Christ's priesthood is not based on this type of law, but it depends on "the power of an indestructible life." There is a special quality about the life of Christ. It does not end, nor can it end.

17 "For" introduces the clinching testimony of Scripture, giving the reason for the foregoing. It is quoted verbatim as in 5:6 (see comments) and establishes the special character of Christ's priesthood, because of no other priest could it be said that his life was "indestructible." Though it could be said that the Aaronic priesthood was "a priesthood that will continue for all generations" (Ex 40:15), no individual priest is "forever."

18 "Regulation" refers, as in v.16, to the whole law. The Levitical system in its entirety is "set aside" and annulled by Christ's coming and work. At the same time, there is a connection (implied by the word "former"). The Levitical system was not simply earlier in time; it also prepared the way for the coming of Christ. But it had to give way because it was "weak and useless." It could not give people strength to meet all the needs of life. It could not bring salvation.

19 The parenthesis underlines the defects of the law. The writer does not explain what he means by "made perfect" (see comments on 2:10), but clearly he has in mind something like "made fit for God." The law did not give people complete and lasting access to the presence of God. It had its merits, but it did not satisfy their deepest needs. For the writer's use of "better," see comments on 1:4; and for his use of "hope," see comments on 3:6; 6:11. The thought of what is "better" is characteristic of Hebrews, and "hope" is central to the Christian way. Law and Gospel stand in contrast. The Gospel is "better" because it enables people to "draw near to God." It was this that the old way could not bring about, but the new way can.

2. Because of the divine oath (7:20–22)

The argument is now developed with reference to the oath (cf. Ps 110:4) that established the Melchizedekian priesthood. There was no such oath when the Aaronic priesthood was set up, which means that this priesthood lacks the permanence so characteristic of the other priesthood. There was always something conditional about Aaron's priesthood.

20–21 The oath declares the purpose of God in an absolute fashion. It allows of no qualification on account of human weakness or sinfulness or anything else. So the writer contrasts the priesthood that has the security of the divine oath to that which lacked it. Christ is contrasted with the Levitical priests, and the importance of the oath is stressed. It was not simply that an oath was sworn at the same time as he was made priest but that the oath was the very essence of what was done. That is the point of the argument. Psalm 110 is quoted once more, this time beginning a little earlier to include the reference to the swearing of the oath and the assurance that the Lord will not change his mind. The new priesthood is permanent. There is no question of its ever being done away.

22 "Guarantee" (GK 1583) brings before us an unusual idea. The old covenant was established with a mediator (Gal 3:19) but with no one to guarantee that the people would fulfill their undertaking. But Jesus stands as a continuing guarantor and that in two directions. He guarantees to the people that God will fulfill his covenant of forgiveness, and he guarantees to God that those who are in him are acceptable.

This is the writer's first use of the term "covenant" (GK 1347), an important word he uses seventeen times. In nonbiblical Greek this word denotes a last will and testament, but in the LXX it is the normal rendering of the Hebrew berit ("covenant"; GK 1382). In the NT it usually means "covenant," though now and then the meaning "testament" is not out of mind (e.g., 9:16). There is something absolute about a will. One cannot dicker with the testator. And in like manner, humans cannot bargain with God; he lays down the terms.

3. Because of its permanence (7:23–25)

It matters to the author that Christ's life was different in quality from other lives. He has emphasized this in vv.15ff., and he comes back to it with the thought that the permanence of Christ's priesthood makes it superior to the Levitical priesthood. His life is such that there is no need and no place for a successor.

23–24 Once more the Levitical priests are set in contrast to Christ. They had to be numerous because like all people they died, and successors were needed to keep the priesthood functioning. The death of the Aaronic priests meant the cessation of their exercise of the high priesthood. But with Christ it is different. He remains forever and thus his priesthood never has to be continued by another. The word rendered "permanent" (GK 563), found only here in the NT, is often understood to mean "without a successor," but this meaning is not justified. The word means "that cannot be transgressed," or, "inviolable, and so unchangeable." Christ lives through eternity, and his priesthood lives with him. The quality of his life means a quality of priesthood that cannot be matched by the Levitical priests.

25 From Christ's unchanging priesthood the author draws an important conclusion about the salvation Christ accomplishes. The verb "to save" (GK 5392) is used absolutely, which means that Christ will save in the most comprehensive sense; he saves from all that humanity needs saving from. The expression rendered "completely" is an unusual one; it signifies that Christ's salvation is a complete deliverance, no matter what the need of the sinner. It may also have a temporal sense and mean "forever" or "always." The verb "is able" (GK 1538) refers to power. Christ's inviolable and permanent priesthood means that he has the capacity (as others have not) of bringing a complete salvation to all who approach God through him.

The author then mentions that Christ lives "to intercede" (GK 1961) for those who come to him (cf. Ro 8:34). He is supreme, and his very presence in heaven, seated at God's right hand, as the one who died for the human race and rose again is itself an intercession. We should not infer from this verse that our Lord has to maintain a kind of continuous liturgical action in heaven for our benefit.

4. Because of his better sacrifice (7:26–28)

This section is rounded off with a glowing description of Christ as our High Priest, better qualified than the Levitical priests, and as One who offered a better sacrifice than they did.

26 This verse (beginning in Greek with the word "for") gives the basis for the preceding verse. Because Christ is what he is, he intercedes as he does. "Meets our need" implies that even our human sense of the fitness of things is able to recognize Christ's suitability for his saving work.

"Holy" (GK 4008) signifies the character involved in the separation of human beings from God. Christ is also "blameless" (GK 179) and "pure" (GK 299). "Pure" contains the thought of being undefiled, and there may be a contrast between the ritual purity that the Levitical high priest must be careful to maintain and the complete moral purity of Jesus.

There is probably another contrast in the words "set apart from sinners," for Jewish tradition prescribed that the Levitical high priest was required to leave his home seven days before the Day of Atonement and live in such a manner as to ensure that he avoided ritual defilement. But Jesus' separation was not ritual. While these words refer to his spotless character and his contrast with sinful human beings, it is more likely that they should be taken closely with the following. His work on earth is done. He has accomplished his sacrifice. He has been "exalted above the heavens." This makes him the perfect intercessor.

27 There is a problem in the reference to offering sacrifices "day after day" for, while there were daily sacrifices in the temple, the high priest was not required to offer them personally; and the sacrifices that did demand his personal action, those on the Day of Atonement, took place once a year, a fact the author well knows (9:7, 25; 10:1). Perhaps what he had in mind was that it was always possible for the high priest, as for anyone, to commit inadvertent sin, which required the offering of a sin offering (Lev 4:2–3), and that thus the high priest needed to offer daily (to ensure his own fitness for ministry). We should also bear in mind that Leviticus requires the high priest to offer the grain offering each day (Lev 6:19–23). This came to be regarded as expiatory.

Jesus stands in contrast to the earthly priests. He has no need to offer for his own sins because he has none (4:15). And he has no need to keep offering for the sins of the people, for his one sacrifice has perfectly accomplished this. Earthly priests were sinful people who had to provide for the putting away of their own sin before they were in a fit condition to do anything about the sins of the people. What they did for themselves they then proceeded to do for others. But Christ's offering is different. There is none for himself. And he offered "once for all" (GK 2384). There is an air of utter finality about this expression. Characteristically, the author introduces the thought of Christ's sacrifice but does not elaborate. He will return to the thought later and develop it.

28 Here the contrast between human beings with all their infirmities and the Son with his eternal perfection is further brought out. "The law" brings us back to the law of Moses, the law of divine origin indeed, but the law that necessarily operates among people who are "weak" (GK 819). And when the law appoints high priests, they must be limited, for they are not made from some super race but from ordinary people, with all their human frailty.

"But" introduces the contrast; "the oath" makes all the difference. This oath, we are reminded, "came after the law" and so cannot be thought of as superseded by it. And the oath "appointed the Son." Actually Ps 110, which speaks of the oath, does not mention the Son, who is referred to in Ps 2:7. But the author sees both psalms as referring to Jesus (cf. 1:5); so he has no difficulty in applying terminology taken from the one to a situation relating to the other. And the Son "has been made perfect forever." He has been made perfect through those sufferings (2:10) that bring people to God.

VII. A New and Better Covenant (8:1–10:39)

Throughout the OT period the relationship of God's people to their God was characteristically viewed in terms of covenant, which was fundamental to their thinking and outlook. It is accordingly something radically new and daring to maintain that this whole system has been done away and replaced by a new covenant. Central to the new covenant is the death of Jesus, the sacrifice that established the new covenant. The demonstration of what all this means spells out the end of the Mosaic system.

A. Christ's "More Excellent" Ministry (8:1–7)

The author leads on from his treatment of the priesthood after the order of Melchizedek to emphasize that Christ's ministry far surpasses that of the Levitical priests. The readers of the letter would be familiar with this priesthood, and the writer makes it clear that Jesus has a ministry far excelling it.

1 In this opening verse the author picks out his principal "point" (GK 3049) and proceeds to develop it. We have, he says, a high priest who is so great that he took his seat at God's right hand. "The Majesty in heaven" is a reverent way of referring to God, and to be at his right hand is to be in the place of highest honor (see comment on 1:3). The posture of sitting suggests a completed work. "Heaven" can be used in a variety of ways, but here it clearly means the dwelling place of God.

2 Christ is one "who serves" (GK 3313) in "the sanctuary" (lit., "the holy things"; GK 41). The former word is actually a noun, used of one who performed a variety of forms of public service. In the Bible, it is confined to the service of God, whether by angels (1:7) or by people (Ro 15:16; Php 2:25). It can even include what is done by pagan officials (Ro 13:6). It speaks of Christ in his capacity as servant, which is striking, as it immediately follows the reference to his high place in heaven.

The "tabernacle" (GK 5008) takes us back to the wilderness days. The word means no more than "tent" and could be used of tents that people lived in. But it was also used of the tent used for worship during the wilderness wanderings (e.g., Ex 27:21). That earthly tent corresponds to a heavenly reality, and it is in this heavenly reality that Christ's ministry is exercised. "True" (GK 240) means authentic, insofar as the reality is possessed only by the archetype and not by its copies. This is further brought out with the statement that "the Lord" pitched the tabernacle, "not man." Sin is dealt with in the way and place determined by God.

3 Earlier, the author said that high priests are appointed to offer sacrifices (5:1). Now we see Christ as high priest ministering in the real tabernacle (v.2). Thus it is "necessary" that Christ have something to offer. As he has already indicated, the author has in mind the one offering made once for all (see 7:27), not a continuous offering always being made in heaven. Even though Christ is eternally High Priest, he is not eternally offering up a sacrifice. Characteristically, he does not say at this point what is offered; that subject he will explain more fully later (9:14).

4 We must be clear that Christ's priesthood is not one of this earth (even though his offering of himself took place here). There are divinely appointed earthly priests, but Jesus has no place among them. On earth he was a layman, who performed no priestly functions in any earthly sanctuary. Those functions were performed by the priests to whom God had entrusted them. Christ's priestly functions must obviously, then, be exercised elsewhere, in the true sanctuary in heaven.

5 The earthly priests serve in a sanctuary they value highly, though it is no more than "a copy and shadow of what is in heaven." There has been much discussion as to how "Platonic" this idea is. Some remind us that Plato thought of heavenly "ideas" as the archetypes of all things earthly; they argue that the author has used the idea of an earthly sanctuary as the imperfect actualization of a Platonic heavenly sanctuary. Much can be said for the idea that his language is that of the Alexandrian modification of Platonism. But this means only that he is using popular terminology. His main thought accords with the OT, though he has added to his thinking the idea that the earthly is imperfect and the heavenly is real. Inevitably the ministry of the Levitical priests was defective; they could serve only the "copy and shadow." So we are reminded of the Lord's words to Moses that he must make everything "according to the pattern shown [him] on the mountain" (Ex 25:40).

6 The ministry of priests in a sanctuary made according to the heavenly pattern is obviously one of great dignity. But the author's point is that Jesus' ministry in the heavenly archetype is of incomparably greater dignity and worth. He chooses to bring this out by using a comparison of the two covenants. Jesus is the mediator of a "superior" covenant. "Mediator" (GK 3542) is a legal term for one who arbitrates between two parties. Christ mediates between people and God; it is he who establishes the new covenant (see comment on 7:22). This new covenant is better than the old because it is "founded on better promises"—it concentrates on spiritual things (e.g., the forgiveness of sins) and is unconditional in nature.

7 The author brings out the superiority of the new covenant by referring to the supersession of the old one. If there had been "nothing wrong" with the old covenant, there would have been no place for the new. That the new covenant has now been established is itself evidence that the old one was not adequate (cf. 7:11ff.). The old covenant was lacking not so much in what its terms spelled out as in the fact that it was weak and unable to bring people to the Lord (cf. 7:18–19; Ro 7:10–11).

B. The Old Covenant Superseded (8:8–13)

This long quotation from Jer 31:31–34 makes the point that the old covenant under which Israel has had its religious experience is now superseded by a new covenant under which forgiveness of sins is brought about. As soon as he comes to the words about forgiveness, he breaks off his quotation.

8 The writer proceeds to show that a place was indeed sought for a new covenant. God found fault with the people of old, he reminds us, and this thought leads to the quotation from Jer 31:31–34. As usual, he suggests that what is found in Scripture was written by God (lit., it reads, "he . . . said"). "I will make" (GK 5334) is not the usual word for making a covenant but means something like "I will bring a new covenant to accomplishment." The author implies that the "covenant" (GK 1347; cf. comments on 7:22) is all of God. Human beings do not bargain with God and come to an acceptable compromise. Rather, God is the one who lays down the terms. Jeremiah looks for the unification of "the house of Israel" and "the house of Judah." They had long been separated when he wrote, but his vision was large enough to take in both and to look for the day when they would be one.

9 The new covenant is contrasted with the old one. Jeremiah does not say that God will simply patch up the old covenant and give it new life, but will make a completely new covenant, with four significant differences (see vv.10–12). But first the kindness and the love of God are brought out by the reference to taking the people "by the hand" to bring them out of Egypt. The metaphor is that of a father or mother taking a little child by the hand to lead him safely to the place where he is going (cf. Hos 11:1–4). Egypt had been a place of slavery. Yet God had brought Israel out of it to set up the old covenant. But the Israelites lacked perseverance. They refused to remain faithful and found that accordingly God was ranged against them.

10 From the failures of the past, Jeremiah turns his vision to the future. Again he sees a united people as he thinks of the covenant being made with "the house of Israel." It will be made "after that time," which clearly refers to the future, though he does not locate it with any precision. The repeated "declares the Lord" keeps before the reader the truth that a divine and not a human act is in mind. The first point is that the new covenant is inward and dynamic: it is written on the hearts and minds of the people. A defect in the old had been its outwardness. Although it had divinely given laws, it was written on tablets of stone (Ex 32:15–16). The people had not been able to live up to what they knew was the word from God. Jeremiah looked for a time when people would not simply obey an external code but would be so transformed that God's own laws would be written in their inmost beings. We should not distinguish too sharply between "minds" and "hearts" (note the poetic parallelism).

The second point in the new covenant is that there will be a close relationship between the God who will be "their God" and the people who, he says, will be "my people." There is nothing really new in the terms of this promise, for in connection with the old way it was said, "I will take you as my own people, and I will be your God" (Ex 6:7). But "I will be your God" acquires fuller meaning in the light of Jesus Christ. His life, death, resurrection, and ascension mean that God has acted decisively to save a people. The God who saves people in Christ is the God of his redeemed in a new and definitive way. And when people have been saved at the awful cost of Calvary, they are the people of God in a way never before known.

11 The third significant feature of the new covenant is that all who enter it will have knowledge of God; there will be no need for anyone to instruct his or her "neighbor" (lit., "citizen"; GK 4489). Jeremiah then moves from the wider relationship in the community to the narrower relationship in the family ("brother") and says that in neither case will there be the need for exhorting anyone to know God. For "from the least of them to the greatest," all will "know the Lord." There will always, of course, be the need for those who have advanced in the Christian way to pass on to others the benefit of their knowledge. But this knowledge of God will not be confined to a privileged few. Everyone in the new covenant will have his or her own intimate and personal knowledge of God.

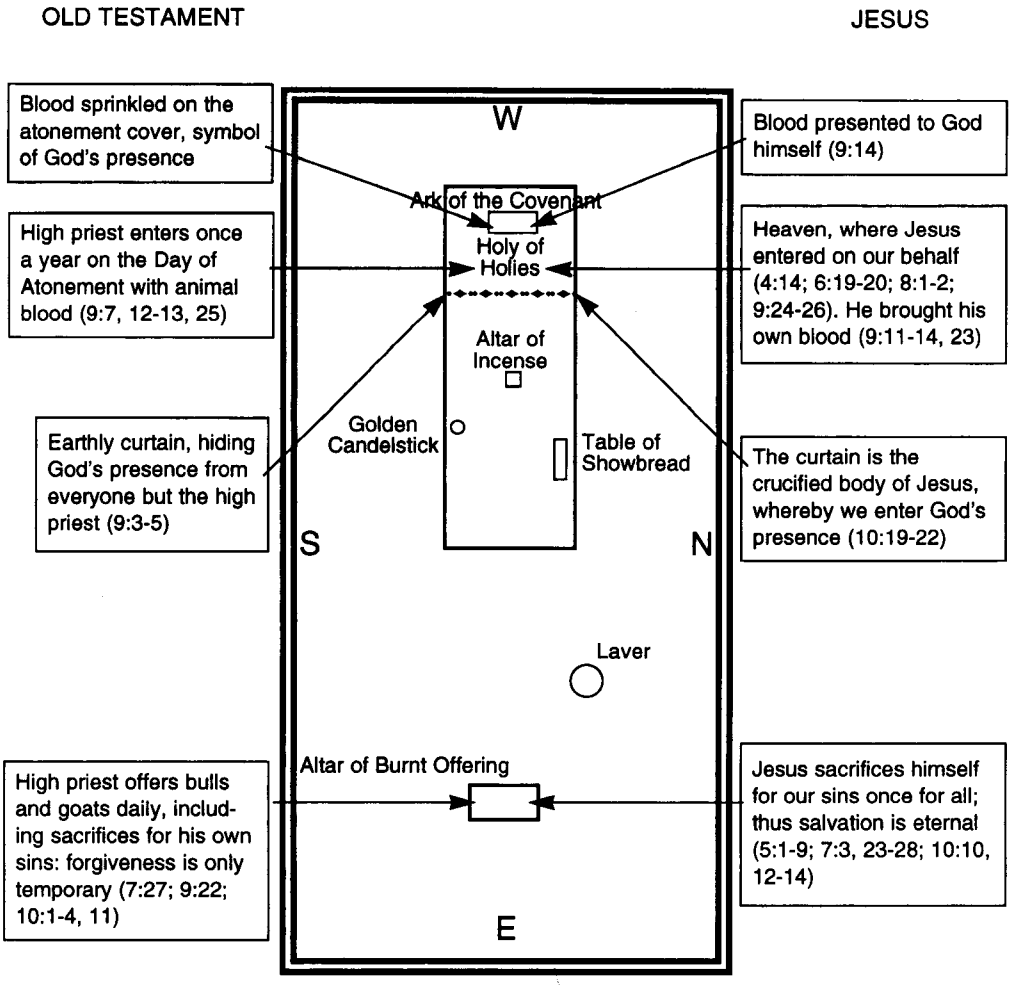
12 The fourth significant thing about the new covenant is that in it sins are forgiven. "For" shows how important this point is: God's forgiveness is the basis of what has just been mentioned. It is because sins are really dealt with that the blessings enumerated earlier become possible. God's wrath no longer rests on sinners and God does not bear their sins in mind. They are completely forgotten, because of the once-for-all sacrifice of Jesus on the cross. Sin has been completely and finally dealt with.

13 The author picks out the word "new" (cf. v. 8; GK 2785) and sees it as making his essential point. It implies that something else is "old" and that the old has to be replaced. When God speaks of a "new" covenant, then, it means that the old one is "obsolete" and ineffective, unable to meet people's needs. And that in turn means that it is close to disappearing. It is not something people should go back to with nostalgia.

The idea of the "new covenant" is not confined to this letter. It is implied in the narratives of the institution of the Lord's Supper in Mt 26:27–28; Mk 14:23–24, and it is explicit in Lk 22:20; 1Co 11:25. Paul also saw Christian ministers as "ministers of a new covenant" (2Co 3:6). The new covenant is thus one of the strands in the NT teaching about what Christ has done for us. While it emphasizes radical novelty, we should not overlook the fact that it also points to continuity. The new arrangement retains the term "covenant," and it is established on the basis of sacrifice. In other words, it fulfills the old covenant rather than stands in outright opposition to it.

C. The Old Sanctuary and Its Ritual (9:1–10)

The author now proceeds to bring out the superiority of the new covenant by pointing to the significance of the way of worship in the old one. He concentrates his attention not on the temple but on the long-vanished tabernacle, which would have had a wider appeal to Jews than the temple had. The temple was accessible only to those in Jerusalem; but wherever Jews were, their Scriptures told them all about the tabernacle. Furthermore, it was the synagogue rather than the temple that was the center of worship for most Jews. Thus, the tabernacle was held in greater esteem by many Jews. It is also significant that the account of the setting up of the old covenant in Ex 24 is followed by the description of the tabernacle in the next chapter. So when the author wants to show the greatness of the new covenant, he naturally draws attention to the ineffectiveness of the old as reflected in the way the tabernacle was set up and used.



1 The writer has no noun with his adjective "first," but NIV is certainly correct in inserting "covenant." The author is contrasting two whole ways of approach to God—the old covenant that has been superseded and the new one that Jesus has now established. The old one had been set up with a full set of regulations for worship, prescribed directly by God. Thus the new covenant, also established by God, is its fulfillment, not its contradiction.

The old way not only had regulations but also a sanctuary described as "earthly" (GK 3176). This sanctuary belonged to this world in contrast to the heavenly sanctuary where Jesus ministers (v.11). The first covenant, then, was established with its due regulations for worship and its holy place of this earth where worship could be carried on. The author will go on to stress the "earthly" nature of it all.

2 The tabernacle was a tent with two compartments. The term rendered "was set up" (GK 2941) is not the usual word for the pitching of a tent but has rather the meaning of "prepare." It may be used not only of the erection of a building but also of its furnishings and equipment. This is in mind here as is shown by the list of furnishings that follows. In the first tent there was "the lampstand," i.e., the seven-branched lampstand (Ex 25:31ff.; 37:17ff.). It also had "the table and the consecrated bread" (a hendiadys for "the table of the consecrated bread"). There were twelve loaves, each baked from two-tenths of an ephah of fine flour, arranged in two rows of six, pure frankincense being put with each row. Every Sabbath day Aaron had to set them up, and it was prescribed that they were to be eaten only by the priests (Lev 24:5–9). The loaves were called "the continual bread" (cf. Nu 4:7), a name that brings out the fact that there were always to be such loaves in the Holy Place, put on a table specially constructed for the purpose (Ex 25:23–30; 37:10–

The Tabernacle Fulfilled in Jesus Christ

According to the writer to the Hebrews, the Old Testament tabernacle was a shadow pointing to the real thing, Jesus Christ (8:6; 9:23; 10:1). This chart depicts in detail how the various parts of the tabernacle are fulfilled in Jesus Christ.

16). The tent in which these objects were placed was called "the Holy Place."

3 Then there was a "second curtain" (cf. Ex 26:31–33; 36:35–36; Lev 24:3); it is called the "second" to distinguish it from the curtain between the outer court and the Holy Place (Ex 26:36–37; 36:37–38). Behind this curtain was a tent called the "Most Holy Place," the very special place where God dwelt between the cherubim. As the author will presently emphasize, it was never to be entered by anyone other than the high priest, and by him only on the Day of Atonement.

4 The author now says some things about the furnishings of the Most Holy Place, beginning with the golden "altar of incense" (GK 2593). There is a problem in that the author seems to locate this altar inside the Most Holy Place, though its place was really "in front of the curtain" (Ex 30:6). Indeed, it had to be outside the Most Holy Place, for it was used daily (Ex 30:7–8). Most likely he has in mind the intimate connection of the incense altar with the Most Holy Place; it "belonged to the inner sanctuary" (1Ki 6:22), as is shown by its situation "in front of the curtain that is before the ark of the testimony—before the atonement cover [mercy seat] that is over the Testimony" (Ex 30:6). The writer does not say that this altar was "in" the Most Holy Place but only that that Place "had" it. It is true that the same verb covers the ark that was undoubtedly inside the veil, but the indefinite term may be significant.

On the Day of Atonement, the high priest offered incense, using coals of fire from this altar, "so that he will not die" (Lev 16:12–13). The incense was indeed important.

There is no question that the "gold-covered ark of the covenant" was in the Most Holy Place of the tabernacle (Ex 25:10ff.; 26:33; 40:21). The ark contained "the golden jar of manna" (cf. Ex 16:33–34) and Aaron's rod that had budded (Nu 17:1–11). Neither of these is said in the OT to be "in" the ark; rather, they were "in front of" it (Ex 16:34; Nu 17:10). We are told in 1Ki 8:9 that in Solomon's temple there was nothing in the ark but the tablets of stone. But the author is not concerned with the temple. He is writing about the tabernacle, and it is possible that a different arrangement held there. Also in the ark were "the stone tablets of the covenant" (cf. Ex 25:16; 31:18; Dt 9:9ff.; 10:3ff.). They represented the permanent record of the terms of the old covenant and were kept in the most sacred place.

5 Above the ark were "the cherubim of the Glory." The exact form of these is not known, but most interpreters hold that they had bodies of animals; they were certainly winged (Ex 25:18–20; 37:7–9). Moreover, they were especially associated with the presence of God (Ps 80:1; 99:1), which is why they are here called the cherubim "of the Glory." They overshadowed the lid of the ark, which is here called "the place of atonement." The justification for this translation is that on the Day of Atonement this object was sprinkled with the blood of the sin offering, whereby sins were atoned for. Doubtless the writer would have been glad to dwell on the significance of all these objects. He points out, however, that it is not the time for him to do this. His argument proceeds on other lines.

6 From the sanctuary the author moves to the ritual, notably what was done on the Day of Atonement. He uses the limitations attached to the high priest's entry into the Most Holy Place to bring home the inferiority of the whole Levitical system. But he begins with the ministry of the lower priests. When the tabernacle system was established, the priests did their work in "the first tent" (NIV "outer room"). This included such things as burning incense (Ex 30:7–8), setting out the holy loaves (Lev 24:8–9), and trimming the lamps (Ex 27:20–21; Lev 24:3–4). There was a sharp distinction between the duties of the priests and those of the Levites (Nu 18:1–7).

7 "But" marks the contrast. We move from the priests to the high priest and from ministry in the Holy Place to that in the Most Holy Place. Into "the inner room" (i.e., "second tent," v.3) only the high priest might go and he "only once a year." The reference is to the ceremonies of the Day of Atonement (Lev 16). We should understand "once" to mean "on one day," because the high priest made two and perhaps even three entrances into the room beyond the curtain (see Lev 16:12–15).

To go into the Most Holy Place was dangerous; so the high priest had to safeguard himself by offering blood in the prescribed manner. His offering was "for himself and for the sins the people had committed in ignorance." Being a sinner himself, he had to atone for himself before he could minister on behalf of others. The sins "committed in ignorance" point to the truth that ignorance can be culpable. Sins of this kind do matter, and we should be on our guard against minimizing their seriousness.

8 The Holy Spirit used the pattern of the OT tabernacle to teach important truths. The limited access into the Most Holy Place was meant to bring home the fact that ordinary people had no direct access to the presence of God. Now, however, people do have such access through the finished work of Christ.

9 "This is an illustration [GK 4130] for the present time." That is, the real meaning of the tabernacle can now be understood. The writer is contrasting the limited access that was all that could be obtained in OT days with the free access to the presence of God that Christ has made possible for his people. The trouble with the sacrificial offerings of the old covenant was that they could not "clear the conscience of the worshiper." The reference to "conscience" (GK 5287) is significant. The ordinances of the old covenant had been external. They had not been able to come to grips with the real problem, that of the troubled conscience. This does not mean, of course, that OT saints never had a clear conscience, but they did not obtain it by the sacrifices as such.

10 The externality of the old way is brought out from another viewpoint. It concerned only matters like "food and drink and various ceremonial washings." There is no problem about the mention of food, for the OT had some strict food laws (Lev 11). But drink is not so prominent. Priests were to abstain from alcoholic drinks while engaged in their ministry (Lev 10:8–9), and there were limitations on the Nazirites (Nu 6:2–3). No one was allowed to drink from an unclean vessel (Lev 11:33–34). And, of course, there were libations accompanying some of the sacrifices (e.g., Nu 6:15, 17; 28:7–8), several ceremonial lustrations (such as those performed by the priests in their ministry; Ex 30:20), and a variety of washings for defiled people (Lev 15:4–27; 17:15–16; Nu 19:7–13). All such things the author dismisses as "external regulations." They have their place, but only "until the time of the new order." The new covenant Christ brought has replaced all the merely external regulations of the old way.

D. The Blood of Christ (9:11–14)

The argument moves to a further stage as the author turns specifically to what Christ has done. The sacrifices of the old covenant were ineffectual. In strong contrast Christ made an offering that secures a redemption valid for all eternity. In the sacrifices, a good deal pertained to the use of blood. So in accord with this, the author considers the significance of the blood of animals and that of Christ.

11–12 The author does not specifically explain what the "good things that are already here" are, but the expression is evidently a comprehensive way of summing up the blessings Christ has won for his people. The past tense in "came" points us to the Cross and all it means, though the author well knows that there is more to come than we now see. Yet the full realization of what this means is yet to come.

There is a difficult problem in the meaning of the "greater and more perfect tabernacle" (v.11) and with it the meaning of "through" (GK 1328), which relates to this tabernacle. Also, this same Greek word (translated "by means of" in v. 12) relates negatively to the blood of animals and positively to the blood of Christ. Many commentators see a reference to heaven in "a greater and more perfect tabernacle"; others think of Christ's flesh, his glorified body, or his people (cf. 3:6). Some suggestions seem negated by the words "not man-made, that is to say, not a part of this creation" (v. 11). We should take notice of the similar expression in v.24, where the author says that it was by means of the heavenly sanctuary, and by means of Christ's own blood (not that of animals), that Christ entered the holiest of all, into the presence of God. This is an emphatic way of saying that he has won for his people an effective salvation and that this has nothing to do with earthly sacrifices.

Some suggest that Christ took his blood into heaven, implying that Christ's atoning work was not completed on the cross but that he still had to do some atoning act in heaven, just like the earthly high priest who took the blood into the Most Holy Place on the Day of Atonement. This is unwarranted. In this letter, what Christ did on the cross was final and needed no supplement. "Once for all" (GK 2384) underlines the decisive character of his saving work. There can be no repetition. "Redemption" (GK 3391) is the process of setting free by the payment of a ransom price, in this case the death of Jesus.

13 The author turns again to the Levitical sacrifices. In them he finds the power to effect an external purification, a cleansing from ritual defilement. He refers to the blood "of goats and bulls," which means much the same as that of "goats and calves" in v. 12. "The ashes of a heifer" point to the ceremony for purification described in Nu 19:1–10. A red heifer was killed, the carcass was burned, and the ashes used "in the water of cleansing; it is for purification from sin." When anyone was ceremonially unclean because of contact with a dead body or even by entering a tent where a dead body lay (Nu 19:14), he was made clean by the use of these ashes. The verb "sanctify" (GK 39), often used of the moral and spiritual process of "sanctification," here refers to a ritual matter. The Levitical system is not dismissed as useless. It had its values and was effective within its limits. But those limits were concerned with what is outward.

14 The "how much more" argument stresses the incomparable greatness of Christ and his work for us. "The blood of Christ" means Christ's death regarded as a sacrifice to God for sin. Atonement must be seen in the light of God's demand for uprightness in a world where people sin constantly. No view of atonement can be satisfactory that does not regard the divine demand. "Unblemished" (GK 320) is the word used technically of animals approved for sacrifice, animals without defect of any kind.

There is a problem in the way we should understand "the eternal Spirit." It may refer to the Holy Spirit, but the Holy Spirit is nowhere else referred to in this way. Thus many commentators prefer to see the "spirit" as Christ's own spirit. But perhaps we ought to see the "Servant of the Lord" imagery behind this whole passage, who is introduced in Isaiah with "I will put my Spirit on him" (Isa 42:1). Just as the prophet sees the Servant as accomplishing his entire ministry in the power of the divine Spirit, so we should see Christ as winning our salvation by a mighty act performed in the power of the Spirit of God. There is, in other words, an allusion to the Trinity here. Christ's own spirit was indeed involved in his voluntary sacrifice, but so is the divine Spirit. The writer seems to have chosen this unusual way of referring to the Holy Spirit to bring out the truth that there is an eternal aspect to Christ's saving work.

Christ, then, offered himself in sacrifice, the aim being "to cleanse our consciences." His saving work operates on quite a different level from that of the Levitical sacrifices. These latter were external and material, as the author repeatedly emphasizes. But Christ was concerned with the sins that trouble the human conscience (see comment on v.9). Thus, his sacrifice was directed to cleansing the conscience, something that the OT sacrifices could never do (cf. 10:2). This cleansing is "from acts that lead to death," and the final result of those purified by Christ is that they "serve the living God" (see comment on 3:12). The Christian way is positive, not negative.

E. The Mediator of a New Covenant (9:15–22)

Having introduced the thought of the death of Christ, the author proceeds to develop it. This death is the means of redeeming people from the plight in which they found themselves as the result of sin. It brings them an eternal inheritance. With a play on the double meaning of diatheke (both "a covenant" and "a last will and testament"; GK 1347), the author brings out the necessity for the death of Christ just as the death of the testator is required if a will is to come into force.

15 "For this reason" may refer to the preceding: because Christ really cleanses us from dead works by his blood, he mediates the new covenant. But it is also possible that the words look forward: Christ mediates the new covenant so that the called might receive the inheritance. The passive voice in "those who are called" (GK 2813) preserves the divine initiative, as does "promised" (GK 2039). Both expressions remind us of the freeness of salvation and of God's will to bless his people. "Inheritance" (GK 3100; see comment on 1:14) originally denoted a possession received through the will of someone who died; then it came to denote anything firmly possessed regardless of how it was obtained. "Eternal" (GK 173) stresses that the believer's possession is no transitory affair. The salvation Christ won is forever.

Christ's death is viewed, then, as "a ransom" (GK 667), the price paid to set free a slave or a prisoner or a person under sentence of death. While the idea of redemption was widespread in the ancient world, the word used here (the most common one in the NT) is rare—suggesting that the redemption Christians know is not simply another redemption among many. It is unique. And it avails for those who sinned under the old covenant as well as for those who are embraced in the new covenant. The author insists that the sacrifices offered under the old covenant cannot take away sins. So it is left to Christ to offer the sacrifice that really effects what the old offerings pointed to.

16 The argument is not easy to follow in English because we have no single word that is the precise equivalent of diatheke (GK 1347). This Greek word is the normal word for a "last will and testament," but it was also used to refer to any "covenant" God makes with people. These are not the result of a process of negotiation in which God talks things over with people and they come to a mutually acceptable arrangement. God lays down the terms. The result is a covenant characterized by the same kind of finality we see in a testament. (One cannot dicker with a testator!) The author therefore moves easily from the idea of covenant to that of testament. It might help us follow him if we render the first clause in v. 15 as "he is the mediator of a new covenant, or testament." This gives two translations for the one Greek word but helps us retain something of the continuity of thought. The death of the testator is necessary for a will or testament to come into effect. The will may be perfectly valid, but it does not operate till death takes place.

17–18 The author uses a technical legal term to indicate that the will (diatheke) is "in force only" when a death occurs. "It never takes effect" is another legal term. Only the death of the testator brings the provisions of a will into force. From this the author reasons to the necessity for Christ's death, since he is bringing into force a new covenant (diatheke). It was not, so to speak, an option God happened to prefer. (The author later shows the same theme from the Law, that for sin to be forgiven blood had to be shed; i.e., Jesus had to die.)

19 When the first covenant was made (Ex 24), Moses did two things. First, he "proclaimed every commandment of the law to all the people." That is to say, he set out the terms and conditions of the covenant; he explained the requirements the covenant laid on the people, so they were left in no doubt as to what covenant membership demanded of them. Since they were now God's people, they had to obey God's laws.

Second, Moses performed certain ritual actions. In what follows the author includes some details not mentioned in Ex 24. There Moses threw blood on the altar and on the people and read the book to the people. But there is no mention of the water, scarlet wool, hyssop, or the sprinkling of the book. Water, scarlet cloth, and hyssop were used in the rite of cleansing healed lepers (Lev 14:4–6; cf. 49–51). Hyssop is mentioned also in connection with the Passover (Ex 12:22) and the cleansing rites associated with the ashes of the red heifer (Nu 19:6, 18; see also Ps 51:7). The sprinkled book was written by humans, and thus it had to be cleansed of any defilement conveyed to it.

20 "This is the blood of the covenant" (a quotation from Ex 24:8) is also reminiscent of the words used by Jesus at the Last Supper (Mk 14:24). The phrase "which God has commanded" is highly suitable in the case of a covenant where God lays down the terms. This is no negotiated instrument.

21 "In the same way" does not imply "at the same time," for when the covenant was made, the tabernacle had not been constructed. But the cleansing with blood that marked the solemn inauguration of the covenant marked also the solemn inauguration of the place of worship (according to Josephus, Aaron's garments, Aaron himself, and the tabernacle and its vessels were all sprinkled with blood). Under the old covenant sprinkling with blood was the accepted way of cleansing. Perhaps the dedication of the tabernacle should be seen as a kind of renewal of the covenant.

22 Cleansing, then, meant blood, though the qualification "nearly everything" shows that the author is well aware that there were exceptions. Thus the worshiper who was too poor to offer even little birds might instead make a cereal offering (Lev 5:11–13). Some purification could be effected with water (e.g., Lev 15:10), and there might be purification of metal objects by fire and "the water of impurity" (Nu 31:22–23). On one occasion gold made atonement for the warriors (Nu 31:50), while on another occasion incense atoned (Nu 16:46). But such ceremonies were all exceptional. As a whole the Levitical system looks constantly for blood as the means of putting away sin and impurity.

F. The Perfect Sacrifice (9:23–28)

From the sanctuary and what is needed to purify it, the author turns to the sacrifice that perfectly cleanses, a sacrifice that was offered once and for all. That one sacrifice has effectively put away sin. And the author looks forward briefly to the time when our Lord will come back again, this time not to do anything in connection with sin but to bring final salvation.

23 "It was necessary" points to something more than expediency or the selection of one among a number of possible actions. There was no other way, because "without the shedding of blood there is no forgiveness" (v.22). This cannot be ignored as merely Jewish, for the Mosaic system was set up by divine command.

It is true, the author reasons, that the Mosaic system was concerned only with "the copies of the heavenly things"; it was taken up with the external. But the fact that God commanded that system to be set up means that there must be something analogous in it to the way true forgiveness of sin was brought about. Where atonement really matters—i.e., in the heavenly sphere—better sacrifices are needed than were provided under the old system.

There is a problem in understanding in what sense things in heaven—where God is (v.24)—need purification. Some deny outright that they need it, regarding the expression as a way of referring to God's people. After all, the author tells us repeatedly that it is people's consciences that need to be cleansed, that the needed cleansing is spiritual and not material. The difficulty with such interpretations is that, while what they say is true, "the heavenly things themselves" is a strange way of referring to men and women here on earth. Other commentators see here a reference to Satan's rebellion and think of that as somehow defiling heaven so that heaven itself needs cleansing. Still others think of purification as used here meaning not so much the removal of impurity as a process of consecration. Akin to that is the view that the earthly sanctuary needed cleansing, not so much because it was unclean, but because it was the place where sinners were restored. So with heaven.

On the whole, it seems best to recall that in the NT there are references to "the spiritual forces of evil in the heavenly realms" (Eph 6:12); the "rulers of this age" (1Co 2:8); the "powers" like "height" and "depth" (Ro 8:38–39), as well as "angels" and "demons." Such references seem to indicate wickedness beyond this earth. And when Christ performed his atoning work, he "disarmed the powers and authorities . . . triumphing over them by the cross" (Col 2:15). It was God's will "through him to reconcile to himself all things, whether things on earth or things in heaven, by making peace through his blood, shed on the cross" (Col 1:20). This strand of teaching is not prominent in Hebrews. Nevertheless, the language used here seems to accord with it better than with other views.

The author is fond of the word "better" (see comment on 1:4), but it is unexpected for him to use the plural "sacrifices" (GK 2602), since he is insistent that there was but one sacrifice and that Christ suffered "once for all" (v.26). Probably we should take "sacrifices" as the generic plural that lays down the principle fulfilled in the one sacrifice.

24 "For" introduces an explanation of what precedes. Christ's work for humankind was done where it really counted. We have already had the idea that Christ's ministry was not in a sanctuary that is "man-made" (v.11), and here we come back to it. Not in such sanctuaries can the atonement be made that really deals with sin. A "man-made" sanctuary is a "copy" (GK 531) of the true one. This word as used here means that the tabernacle is the shadow of the real thing; the earthly antitype points us to the heavenly reality, "the true one."

What Christ entered is "heaven itself," which is regarded as the true sanctuary. "Now" points to present activity. After his atoning work was done once for all, Christ now appears before God. We ourselves are not fit to stand before God and plead our case, and in any event we are on earth and not in God's heaven. But Christ is there in our stead and in his capacity as the one who died as a better sacrifice (v.23) for sins.

25 "Nor" carries on the negative idea at the beginning of v.24: "Christ did not enter a man-made sanctuary . . . nor did he . . . offer himself again and again." The author wants in this verse to repudiate the idea that Christ might have made an offering from time to time in the manner of the high priests. It was basic to their ministry to offer sacrifices repeatedly, just as it was basic to Christ's ministry that he did not do so. The reference here to entering "the Most Holy Place every year" shows that the sacrifices mainly in mind are those of the Day of Atonement.

The author clearly implies that only Christ's offering can put away sin. Even the sins of those who lived in old times were dealt with by Christ's one offering. If that offering had not been sufficient, Christ would have had to offer himself "again and again." Moreover, when the high priest entered the Most Holy Place, he did so "with blood that is not his own." The superiority of Christ's offering is also seen in that he does not press into service some external means, like the blood of some noncooperative, noncomprehending animal. He uses his own blood and with it makes the one sufficient offering.

26 Again the author emphasizes that there is no other way of dealing with sin than Christ's own offering of himself. If his one offering was not enough, he would have had to "suffer" (GK 4248) death over and over. The reference to "creation" carries the idea right back to the beginning.

"But now" introduces the real situation after the contrary-to-fact clause. Again the author emphasizes the decisive quality of Christ's sacrifice with the word "once for all" (GK 562). It matters a great deal to him that Christ made the definitive offering and that now that it has been made, there is no place for another. We should probably understand "the end of the ages" to mean "the climax of history." The first coming of Christ—and more particularly his offering of himself on the cross—ushered in the final state of affairs in human history. It is a common thought of the NT writers that God's decisive action in Christ has altered things radically. The Messianic Age has come—the age that all the preceding ages have led up to.

The purpose of Christ's coming was "to do away with sin," an expression that signifies the total annulment of sin. Sin is rendered completely inoperative by Christ's "sacrifice of himself." The self-offering of Christ is the decisive thing.

27 This phase of the argument is rounded off with a reference to the one death people die and the one death Christ died. There is a finality about both, but with very different consequences. Human beings are "destined to die once." This is not something within their control. A condition of life here on earth is that it ends in death. There is a finality about it that is not to be disputed. But it is not the complete and final end. Death is more serious than that because it is followed by "judgment." People are accountable, and after death they will render account to God.

28 "So" introduces a correspondence with the "just as" at the beginning of the previous verse. The passive "was sacrificed" is interesting because it is much more usual for the author to say that Christ offered himself (cf. v.26). Some see the thought here that Christ's enemies were in a sense responsible for his death, but it seems more likely that the passive voice hints at the divine purpose in that death. Once more we have the adverb "once-for-all" (GK 562) applied to the death of Christ.

"To bear sin" is a concept found in the NT only here and in 1Pe 2:24, but it is quite frequent in the OT, where it plainly means "to bear the penalty of sin." For example, the Israelites were condemned to wander in the wilderness for forty years as the penalty for their failure to go up into the land of Canaan: "For forty years—one year for each of the forty days you explored the land—you will suffer for your sins" (Nu 14:34; cf. Eze 18:20; et al.). Many see here an echo of the fourth Servant Song: "He will bear their iniquities" (Isa 53:11); "he bore the sin of many" (Isa 53:12). So the author is saying that Christ took upon himself the consequences of the sins of the many (cf. Mk 10:45).

But this is not the whole story. Christ will come back a second time, and then he will not be concerned with sin. In other words, sin was dealt with finally at his first coming, and there is nothing more that he needs to do. The second time he will come "to bring salvation." In one sense, salvation was brought about by Christ's death. But there is another sense in which it will be brought to its consummation when he returns. Nothing is said about unbelievers. At this point the writer is concerned only with those who are Christ's.

They "are waiting for" (GK 587) him, eagerly looking for the Lord's coming.

G. The Law a Shadow (10:1–4)

The preceding sections have brought out the efficacy of the blood of Jesus as a prevailing sacrifice; now stress is laid on the once-for-all character of that sacrifice. First, the author contrasts the substance and the shadow. He sees the ancient system that meant so much to the Jews as no more than a shadowy affair. The real thing is in Christ. To leave Christ in favor of Judaism would be to forsake the substance for the shadow. The sacrificial system practiced by the Jews could not deal effectually with sin.

1 "The law" as used here stands for the whole OT, with particular reference to the sacrificial system. This is dismissed as no more than "a shadow" (GK 5014; see comment on 8:5). It points to something unsubstantial in opposition to what is real. The law is a foreshadowing of what is to come. Perhaps those exegetes are right who see a metaphor from painting. The "shadow" then is the preliminary outline that an artist may make before he gets to his colors, and the "reality" (GK 1635) is the finished portrait. Thus the law is no more than a preliminary sketch. It shows the shape of things to come, but the solid reality is not there. It is in Christ. The "good things that are coming" are not defined, but this general term is sufficient to show that the law pointed forward to something well worthwhile.

In the second half of this verse, the expression translated "endlessly" can go with what precedes it in the Greek (as NIV) or with what follows, meaning that the law can never bring worshipers to perfection "for all time." The latter interpretation is preferable. The author is saying, then, that the Levitical sacrifices continue year by year, but they are quite unable to bring the worshipers into a permanent or endless state of perfection. The yearly sacrifices mark another reference to the ceremonies of the Day of Atonement—ceremonies of which the author makes a good deal of use. "Can never" points to an inherent weakness of the old system: the animal sacrifices are quite unable to effect the putting away of sin. The yearly repetition repeats the failure. The same rites that were unavailing last year are all that the law can offer this year. There is an inbuilt limitation in animal sacrifice.

2 The rhetorical question here emphasizes the truth that the very continuity of the sacrifices witnesses to their ineffectiveness. Had the sacrifices really dealt with sins, the author reasons, the worshipers would have been cleansed and that would have been that. There would have been no need for repeating them (cf. 9:9). The necessity for repetition shows that the desired cleansing and atonement have not been effected. The translation "would no longer have felt guilty for their sins" obscures the reference made here to "conscience," noted so often in this letter (see also 9:9, 14; 10:22; 13:18). A really effectual atonement would mean the permanent removal of the worshipers' sins and eliminate the need for the annual Day of Atonement.

3 The author now contrasts false estimates of what sacrifices might do. "Reminder" (lit., "remembrance"; GK 390) is a word that usually involves action. When people remember sins, they either repent (Dt 9:7) or persist in sin (Eze 23:19). When God remembers sin, he usually punishes it (1Ki 17:18; Rev 16:19); when he pardons, he no longer remembers sin (Ps 25:7). This verse uses an expression that recalls what Jesus said, "Do this in remembrance of me" (Lk 22:19), as he established a covenant in which the central thing is that God says, "[I] will remember their sins no more" (Jer 31:34). The Day of Atonement ceremonies each year reminded people of the fact that something had to be done about sin. But the ceremonies did no more than that.

4 The yearly ceremonies were ineffective because "it is impossible for the blood of bulls and goats to take away sins." The word "impossible" (GK 105) is a strong one. There is no way forward through the blood of animals. "Take away" (GK 904) is used of a literal taking off, as of Peter's cutting off the ear of the high priest's slave (Lk 22:50), or metaphorically as of the removal of reproach (Lk 1:25). It signifies the complete removal of sin so that it is no longer a factor in the situation. That is what is needed and that is what the sacrifices could not provide.

H. One Sacrifice for Sins (10:5–18)

Again the author rounds off and clinches his argument by appealing to Scripture as proof of the correctness of the position he has advocated. Animal sacrifices could not take away the sins of the people. But it was the will of God that sin be atoned for. Christ's perfect sacrifice of himself fulfills God's will as animal sacrifices could never do. This the author sees foretold in Ps 40. Then, as he goes on to bring out something of the utter finality of the offering of Christ, he returns to the quotation from Jeremiah he had used in ch. 8 to initiate his discussion of the new covenant. His argument up till now has been the negative one that the animal sacrifices of the old covenant were unavailing. Now he says positively that Christ's sacrifice, which established the new covenant, was effectual. It really put away sin.

5–7 "Therefore" introduces the next stage of the argument. Because the Levitical sacrifices were powerless to deal with sin, another provision had to be made. The writer then quotes from Ps 40:6–8, words that he sees as coming from Christ and as giving the reason for the Incarnation. The preexistence of Christ is assumed here. This psalm is not quoted elsewhere in the NT, and this reminds us once more that the writer of this letter has his own style of writing and his own way of viewing Holy Writ.

In the passage quoted, the LXX reads "a body you prepared for me," whereas the Hebrew has "ears you have dug for me." Most likely the LXX gives an interpretative translation of the original Hebrew. It may be expressing the view that the body is the instrument through which the divine command, received by the ear, is carried out. Or it may be taking a part of the body (the "ears") as meaning the whole body.

The words "sacrifice" and "offering" (v.5) are both general and might apply to any sacrificial offering, whereas the "burnt offerings" and the "sin offerings" (v.6) are both specific. The four terms taken together are probably meant as a summary of the main kinds of Levitical sacrifices under the old covenant.

The psalmist says that God did not "will" (NIV "desire"; GK 2527) or "take pleasure in" such offerings. This does not mean that the offerings were against God's will or that God was displeased with them. Rather, considered in themselves as a series of liturgical actions, the offerings did not bring God pleasure. They might have done so if they had been offered in the right spirit, by penitent people expressing their state of heart. But the thrust of the quotation emphasizes the importance of the will.

"Then" (v.7) means "in those circumstances" rather than "at that time." Since sacrifice as such did not avail before God, other action had to be taken. That action means that Christ came to do God's will. In his case, there was no question of a dumb animal being offered up quite irrespective of any desires it might have. He came specifically to do the will of the Father, and his sacrifice was the offering of one fully committed to doing that will.

The reference to the "scroll" (GK 1046) is not completely clear, but probably the psalmist meant that he was fulfilling what was written in the law. The author of Hebrews sees the words as emphasizing that Christ came "to do" what was written in Scripture. The words that immediately follow in the psalm ("your law is within my heart") show what this expression implies. The author uses the word "will" (GK 2525) five times, always of the will of God. It was important to him that what God wills is done. Christ came to do nothing other than the will of God.

8 It is not clear why the references to sacrifices are all plural here, while at least two of them ("sacrifice" and "offering" in v.5) are singular. Probably all we can say is that the plural makes it all very general. Multiply sacrifices and offerings how you will and characterize them how you will, God still takes no pleasure in them. Indeed, this is so even though the law requires them to be offered and the law is from God.

We should see this latter statement as another illustration of the attitude consistently maintained by the author that the OT system is divinely inspired but preliminary. He holds it to be effective but only within its own limited scope. The sacrifices were commanded in God's law and therefore must be offered. But they were not God's final will nor God's answer to the problem of sin. They were partial and they pointed the way to the final answer.

9 The words that Christ spoke through the psalmist about doing God's will are there for all time and express what Christ did. The verb "sets aside" (GK 359) means "takes away" and is used sometimes in the sense of taking away by killing, i.e., murdering; it is therefore a strong word that points to the total abolition of the former way. By contrast the second way is "established" or "made firm." The way of the Levitical sacrifices and the way of the sacrifice of Christ are being set over against each other. These are not complementary systems that may exist side by side. The one excludes the other. No compromise is possible between them.

10 "By that will" may also be translated as "in that will." It may be that our author sees the sanctified as "in" the will of God. That will is large enough and deep enough to find a place for them all. We should point out a difference between the way this author uses the verb "made holy" (lit., "sanctify"; GK 39) and the way Paul uses it. For the apostle, sanctification is a process whereby the believer grows progressively in Christian qualities and character. In Hebrews the same terminology is used of the process by which a person becomes a Christian and is therefore "set apart" for God. There is no contradiction between these two; both are necessary for the fully developed Christian life. But we must be on our guard lest we read this letter with Pauline terminology in mind. The sanctification meant here is one brought about by the death of Christ. It has to do with making people Christians by the offering of Christ's body on the cross, not with developing Christian character.

The offering of Jesus' body was made "once for all" (GK 2384). It matters immensely that this one offering avails for all people at all times. This contrasts sharply with the sacrifices under the old covenant, as the author has been emphasizing. But it contrasts also with other religions. No other religion speaks of one great event that brings salvation through the centuries and through the world. This is the distinctive doctrine of Christianity.

11 The author now brings out the finality of Jesus' sacrifice from another angle as he considers once more the continuing activity of particularly the Levitical priests. He does not actually confine the continual activity to those priests, for he uses the quite general expression "every priest." A priest normally stands and ministers day by day, and keeps offering sacrifices that can never take sins away. Standing is the posture appropriate to priestly service, and in the tabernacle or temple the priests of Aaron's line never sat during the course of their ministry in the sanctuary.

The word translated "performs his religious duties" (GK 3310) is related to the word "serves" in 8:2 (see comments). The Bible uses it only for service of a religious character. Here it clearly applies to all the services a priest performs. Yet despite all their religious activity, priests cannot deal with the basic problem—that of removing sin.

12 Jesus' work is contrasted to that of priests. He offered one sacrifice—just one alone. Then he "sat down." The author mentioned this before (e.g., 1:3; 8:1), but he put no emphasis on it. Now he stresses Jesus' posture, contrasting it to that of the Levitical priests, and the contrast brings out an important point for understanding the work of Christ. Levitical priests stand, for their work is never done but goes on. Christ sits, for his atoning work is done; there is nothing to be added to it.

Furthermore, to be seated at God's right hand is to be in the place of highest honor. Not even angels are said to have attained to this, for they stand in God's presence (Lk 1:19). When Jesus claimed this place for himself, the high priest tore his robe at what he regarded as blasphemy (Mk 14:62–63). The author is combining with the thought of a finished work the idea that our Lord is a being of the highest dignity and honor.

13 His work accomplished, the Lord now "waits" (GK 1683). The author then quotes from Ps 110:1, with slight alterations to fit the grammatical context. The "enemies" are not defined, but the meaning appears to be that Christ rests until in God's good time all evil is overthrown. Other parts of the NT refer to God's enemies being defeated at the end time (notably Revelation), but this is not a feature in Hebrews; and we have no means of knowing precisely what enemies he has in mind. There is possibly a hint of warning to the readers—i.e., they should take care that they are not numbered among these enemies.

14 "Because" introduces the reason for the statement in v.13. Again the writer emphasizes that Christ has offered "one" offering that perfects the saints. So important is this for him that he comes back to this theme over and over. The writer does not say that Christ's sacrifice perfects the people but that Christ does this. His salvation is essentially personal. We have seen a number of times that the author is fond of the idea of making "perfect" (GK 5457). He applies it to Christ (see comment on 2:10) and also to his people. The process of salvation takes people who are far from perfect and makes them fit to be in God's presence forever. It is not temporary improvement that he is speaking of but improvement that is never ending.

As in v.10, the author uses the concept of sanctifying, or making holy (GK 39), to characterize the saved. The present tense in "those being made holy" poses a small problem. Some see it as timeless; others think of it as indicating a continuing process of adding to the number of the saved; still others claim that it refers to those who in the present are experiencing the process of being made holy. The last-mentioned view is not likely to be correct because, as we have noticed (see comment on v.10), the idea of sanctification as a continuing process does not seem to appear in Hebrews. But either of the other two views is possible. Those Christ saves are set apart forever for the service of God. The writer, then, is contemplating a "great salvation" (2:3), brought about by one magnificent offering that cannot and need not be repeated—an offering that is eternal in its efficacy and that makes perfect the people it sanctifies.

15–17 The writer consistently regards God as the author of Scripture and, as we have seen, ascribes to God words uttered by Moses and others. He does not often speak of the Holy Spirit as responsible for what is written (see also 3:7; 9:8); but this is consistent with the writer's general approach, and we should not be surprised at it here. The Spirit, he says, "testifies" (GK 3455), a word that implies that there is excellent testimony behind what he has been saying about Christ. Once more he quotes from Jer 31:31–34 (see Heb 8:8–12), citing enough of the passage to show that it is the "new covenant" passage he has in mind; he then goes straight to the words about forgiveness, omitting everything else that does not directly apply. The author therefore emphasizes the fact that Christ has established the new covenant and that he has done so by providing for the forgiveness of sins.

18 This short verse emphatically conveys the utter finality of Christ's offering and the sheer impossibility of anything further. Where sins have been effectively dealt with, there can be no additional offering for sin. The author sees this as established by Scripture, and this is consistent with his normal use of the OT. Since the new covenant has been established as a reality, the prophetic word allows no further sacrifice for sin.

I. The Sequel—The Right Way (10:19–25)

We have now concluded the solid doctrinal section that constitutes the main section of the letter. As Paul often does, the writer of Hebrews exhorts his readers on the basis of the doctrine he has made so clear. Because the great teachings he has set forth are true, it follows that those who profess them should live in a manner befitting them. There are resemblances between the exhortation in this paragraph and that in 4:14–16. But we must not forget that the intervening discussion has made clear what Christ's high priestly work has done for his people. On the basis of Christ's sacrifice, the writer exhorts his readers to make the utmost use of the blessing that has been won for them.

19 The address "brothers" is affectionate, and the writer exhorts them on the basis of the saving events. "Therefore" links the exhortation with all that has preceded it. These saving events give the Christian a new attitude toward the presence of God. Nadab and Abihu died while offering incense (Lev 10:2), and it had become the custom for the high priest not to linger in the Most Holy Place on the Day of Atonement lest people be terrified. But Christians approach God confidently, completely at home in the situation created by Christ's saving work. They enter "the Most Holy Place," which, of course, is no physical sanctuary but is, in truth, the presence of God. And they enter it "by the blood of Jesus," i.e., on the basis of his saving death.

20 The way to God is both "new" and "living." It is "new" (GK 4710) because what Jesus has done has created a completely new situation; it is "living" (GK 2409) because that way is indissolubly bound up with the living Lord Jesus. The writer does not say, as John does, that Jesus is "the way" (Jn 14:6), but this is close to his meaning. This is not the way of the dead animals of the old covenant; rather, it is the way of the living Lord. This way to God he "opened" (GK 1590; this word is the same one used in 9:18 of putting into effect the old covenant with blood), which hints again at his sacrifice of himself. The "curtain" goes back once more to the imagery of the tabernacle, for it was through the curtain that hung before the Most Holy Place that the high priest passed into the very presence of God.

There is a problem as to whether we take "that is, his flesh" (NIV, "body"; GK 4922) with "curtain," which is the more natural way of taking the Greek, or with "way." The difficulty in taking it with "curtain" is that it seems to make the flesh of Christ that which veils God from human beings. There is a sense, however, in which Christians have always recognized this, even if in another sense they see Christ's body as revealing God. As a well-known hymn puts it, "Veiled in flesh the Godhead see." The value of this way of looking at the imagery of the curtain is that it was by the rending of the veil—the flesh being torn on the cross—that the way to God was opened. The author is saying in his own way what the writers of the Synoptic Gospels said when they spoke of the curtain of the temple as being torn when Christ died (Mt 27:51; Mk 15:38; Lk 23:45). The "body" ("flesh") here is the correlate of the "blood" in v.19.

21 The term "great priest" is a literal rendering of the Hebrew title we know as "high priest" (see, e.g., Nu 35:25, 28; Zec 6:11). We have had references to Jesus as "a son over God's house" (3:6) and as a high priest. Now these two thoughts are brought together. The author does not forget Jesus' high place. He has taken a lowly place (cf. the reference to his flesh, v.20), and he has died to make a way to God for us. But this assumption of the role of a servant should not blind us to the fact that Jesus is "over" God's household. Once again we have the highest Christology combined with the recognition that Jesus rendered lowly service.

22 Now come three exhortations: "Let us draw near," "Let us hold unswervingly" (v.23), and "Let us consider" (v.24). The contemplation of what Christ has done should stir his people into action. First, we are to draw near to God "with a sincere heart." The "heart" (GK 2840) stands for the whole of our inner life; and it is important that as God's people approach him, they be right inwardly. It is the "pure in heart" who see God (Mt 5:8). Furthermore, in view of what Christ has done for us, we should approach God in deep sincerity. The "full assurance of faith" stresses that it is only by trusting in Christ, who has performed for us the high priestly work that gives access to God, that we can draw near at all.

The references to the "sprinkled" hearts and the "washed" bodies should be taken together. The washing of the body with pure water is surely a reference to baptism. But the thing that distinguished Christian baptism from the multiplicity of lustrations that were practiced in the religions of the ancient world was that it was more than an outward rite cleansing the body from ritual defilement. Baptism is the outward sign of an inward cleansing, and it was the latter that was the more important. So here it is mentioned first. The sprinkling of the hearts signifies the effect of the blood of Christ on the inmost being. Christians are cleansed within by his shed blood (cf. the sprinkling of the priests, Ex 29:21; Lev 8:30).

23 The second exhortation is to "hold" (GK 2988) fast to the profession of hope. The author has already used this verb in urging his readers to "hold on to" their confidence and their glorying in hope (3:6, 14). He also has told them to "hold firmly" (GK 3195) to the confession (4:14). Now he wants them to retain a firm grasp on "the hope we profess." This is an unusual expression, and we might have expected "faith" rather than "hope." But there is point in referring to hope, which has already been described as an "anchor for the soul" (6:19). Christians can expect that the promises God has made will be fulfilled because behind them is a God in whom they can have full confidence. God can be thoroughly relied on. When he makes a promise, that promise will be infallibly kept.

24 The third exhortation is to "consider" (GK 2917) one another. The author is speaking of a mutual activity, one in which believers encourage one another rather than one where leaders direct the rest. The word rendered "spur" (GK 4237) is actually a noun, which usually has a meaning like "irritation" or "exasperation." It is unusual to have it used in a good sense, and the choice of the unusual word makes the exhortation more striking.

Christians are to spur one another to "love" (GK 27). This is the characteristic NT term for a love that is not self-seeking, a love whose paradigm is the Cross (1Jn 4:10). This is a most important Christian obligation, and believers are to help one another attain it. It is interesting that this kind of love is thus a product of community activity, for it is a virtue that requires others for its exercise. One may practice faith or hope alone, but not love (see also comment on 6:11). The readers are to urge one another to "good deeds" as well as to love. The contemplation of the saving work of Christ leads on to good works in the lives of believers. The expression is left general, but the writer selects as especially important love and the gathering together of believers (v.25)—an interesting combination.

25 The exhortation in this verse belongs grammatically with v.24, rather than functions as an independent exhortation. Some believers were giving up "meeting together." We have no way of knowing who these abstainers were; we know no more than that the early church had its problems with people who stayed away from church. It was a dangerous practice for any early Christian to try to live without the support of the community. Perhaps these abstainers saw Christianity as just another religion to be patronized or left alone. They had missed the finality on which the author lays such stress.

The writer goes on to suggest that Christians ought to be exhorting one another, and all the more as they see "the Day" getting near. Most certainly this Day is the Day of Judgment. The main thing is that the writer is stressing the accountability of his readers. They must act toward their fellow believers as those who will give account of themselves to God.

J. The Sequel—the Wrong Way (10:26–31)

The issues are serious. While the writer continues to express confidence that his friends will do the right thing, he leaves them in no doubt as to the gravity of their situation and the terrible consequences of failing to respond to God's saving act in Christ. God is a God of love. But he is implacably opposed to all that is evil. Those who persist in wrong face judgment.

26 The writer clearly has apostasy in mind here. He is referring to people who "have received the knowledge of the truth," with "truth" (GK 237) standing for the content of Christianity as the absolute truth. They know, then, what God has done in Christ. If they revert to an attitude of rejection and of continual sin, there remains no sacrifice for sins. Such people have rejected the sacrifice of Christ, and the author has earlier shown that there is no other. If they revert to the Jewish sacrificial system, they go back to sacrifices that cannot put away sin (v.4). The writer adopts no pose of superiority, but his "we" puts him in the same class as his readers.

27 Far from any sacrifice to put away the sins of the apostates, "only a fearful expectation of judgment" awaits such evil people. The precise nature of this expectation is not defined, and the fact that their fate is left indefinite makes the warning all the more impressive. "Fearful" (GK 5829) conveys the idea of "frightening." The writer describes the judgment as "raging fire" (possibly borrowed from Isa 26:11). The word "enemies" (GK 5641) shows that the apostates were not regarded as holding a neutral position. They have become the adversaries of God.

28–29 An argument from the greater to the lesser brings out the seriousness of the situation. To despise the law of Moses was a serious matter, but this is more serious still. The law of Moses was held by Jews to be divinely given: anyone who rejected it rejected God's direction. When this happened, no discretion was allowed: the person had to be executed. In a serious matter the charge had to be proved beyond doubt. Thus the testimony of one witness was not sufficient: there had to be two or three. But when there were the required witnesses to say what the person had done, justice took over. There was no place for mercy. He had to be executed (Dt 17:6; 19:15).

The writer invites the readers to work out for themselves how much more serious is the punishment of the one who apostatizes from

Christ. It must be more severe than under the old way because Jesus is greater than Moses (3:1ff.), and the new covenant is better than the old, founded on better promises (8:6) and established by a better sacrifice (9:23).

There are three counts in the indictment of those who are apostate. (1) They have "trampled the Son of God under foot." "To trample under foot" is a strong expression for disdain. It implies not only rejecting Christ but also despising him—him who is no less than "the Son of God."

(2) They take lightly the solemn shedding of covenant blood. "The blood of the covenant" is an expression used of the blood that established the old covenant (Ex 24:8; cf. Heb 9:20) and also of the blood of Jesus that established the new covenant (Mt 26:28; Mk 14:24; cf. also Lk 22:20; 1Co 11:25). The author regards it as a dreadful thing to take lightly the shedding of the blood of one who is so high and holy and whose blood moreover is the means of establishing the new covenant that alone can bring people near to God. The apostates regard that blood as "an unholy thing" (lit., "common"; GK 3123); i.e., they treat the death of Jesus as just like the death of anyone else. The idea of "unholy" stands out all the more sharply when it is remembered that that blood has "sanctified" (GK 39) them—i.e., set them apart for God through Christ's death. As elsewhere in this letter, sanctification refers to the initial act of being set apart for God, not progressive growth in grace (see comment on 10:10).

(3) The apostates have "insulted the Spirit of grace." The author does not often refer to the Holy Spirit, being occupied for the most part with the person and work of the Son. Nevertheless, he esteems the person of the Spirit highly. This phrase also implies that he saw the Spirit as a person, not an influence or a thing, for only a person can be insulted. In the NT there is a variety of ways of referring to the Spirit, but only here is he called "the Spirit of grace" (cf. Zec 12:10); the expression may mean "the gracious Spirit of God" or "the Spirit through whom God's grace is manifested." Willful sin is an insult to the Spirit, who brings the grace of God to us.

30 The expression "we know" reminds us of Paul, who is fond of appealing to his readers' understanding. The author calls God the One who spoke the words of Scripture to humankind. The first quotation here is from Dt 32:35 (also quoted in Ro 12:19). It mentions that vengeance is a divine prerogative; it is not for us to take it into our own hands. But the emphasis is on the certainty that the Lord will act. The wrongdoer cannot hope to go unpunished because avenging wrong is in the hands of none less than God. The second quotation (from Dt 32:36; see also Ps 135:14) leaves no doubt whatever about the Lord's intervention, for he is named and so is his activity.

The word "judge" (GK 3212) may mean "give a favorable judgment" as well as "condemn." In both Dt 32:36 and Ps 135:14, it is deliverance that is in mind. But in the OT God does not vindicate his people if they have sinned. Vindication implies that they have been faithful in their service. But where they have not, that same principle of impartial judgment according to right demands that intervention bring punishment. This is what the author has in mind. That one claims to be a member of God's people does not exempt one from judgment. God judges all.

31 The sinner should not regard the judgment of God calmly. It is "a dreadful thing" (GK 5829; cf. v.27) to fall into God's hands. David chose to fall into God's hands (2Sa 24:14; 1Ch 21:13). But David was a man of faith; he committed himself in trust to God, not other people. It is different with those who have rejected God's way. They must realize that they will one day fall into the hands of an all-powerful deity. Such a fate is a daunting prospect.

K. Choose the Right (10:32–39)

After a section containing stern warnings, the author expresses his confidence in his readers and encourages them to take the right way (cf. ch. 6). He reminds them of the early days of their Christian experience, when they had experienced some form of persecution and had come through it triumphantly. This should teach them that in Christ they had blessings of a kind they could never have had if they had given way to persecution.

32 The author does not class his friends among those who go back on their Christian profession. He begins by inviting them to contemplate the days just after they had become Christians. The verb translated "received the light" (GK 5894) means the enlightenment the Gospel brought. This had resulted in some form of persecution that the readers had endured in the right spirit. There should be no going back on that kind of perseverance now. "Contest" (GK 124) is a word used of athletic competition. It became widely used of the Christian as a spiritual athlete and so points to the strenuous nature of Christian service. On this occasion, the athletic performance had been elicited by a period of suffering they had steadfastly endured.

The Christian community addressed in Hebrews had experienced persecution for their faith. Many Chrstians in the first centuries lived in the Catacombs because of persecution, where they painted biblical scenes—such as this scene of Samson with the jawbone of a donkey (Jdg 15).

33–34 This suffering is further explained. "Sometimes . . . at other times" is often taken to mean that the one group of people had two experiences. But it seems more likely that it means two groups: "Some of you . . . others of you." The first group had been subjected to verbal attack ("insult") and other forms of "persecution" (GK 2568). The readers had been made a public spectacle by being exposed to insult and injury.

The second group had suffered by being associates of the former group. This is explained as sympathizing with prisoners. In the world of the first century the lot of prisoners was difficult. They were to be punished, not pampered. Little provision was made for them, and they were dependent on friends for their supplies. For Christians to visit prisoners was a meritorious act (Mt 25:36). But there was some risk, for the visitors became identified with the visited. Yet the readers of the letter had not shrunk from this. They had endured being lumped with the prisoners. Precisely which persecution is meant here we have no way of knowing.

In addition to identifying with prisoners, the readers had had the right attitude to property. There is a question whether the word rendered "confiscation" (GK 771) means official action by which the state took over their goods, or whether it points rather to mob violence. On the whole, the latter seems more likely. The readers had taken this in the right spirit. It would not be a surprise if they endured all this with fortitude, but that they accepted it "joyfully" is another thing altogether. So firmly had their interest been fixed on heavenly possessions that they could take the loss of earthly goods with exhilaration.

The reason for their cheerful attitude is unclear; they knew they "themselves had a better and lasting possession" in Christ, or they "had themselves as a better and lasting possession" (similar to Lk 21:19). Whichever way we take it, the "possession" (GK 5638; the word is singular) was both better and longer lasting. The possession in Christ cannot be stolen; it is an abiding possession.

35 "So" indicates that what precedes provides a reason for the conduct now suggested. "Throw away" (GK 610) seems to convey the thought of a reckless rejection of what is valuable. Their earlier conduct showed that they knew the value of their possession in Christ; thus the writer can appeal to them not to discard it. As Christians they had a confidence that was based firmly on Christ's saving work, and that would be the height of folly to throw away. What they had endured for Christ's sake entitled them to a reward. Let them not throw it away. The NT does not reject the notion that Christians will receive rewards, though, of course, that is never the prime motive for service.

36 Christians "need [GK 5970, a word denoting absolute necessity] to persevere"; Christianity is no flash in the pan. This leads to the thought that doing the will of God has its recompense. The author earlier spoke of Christ as doing the will of God (vv.7ff.). Now he makes the point that Christ's people must similarly be occupied in doing that will. As a result, they will "receive" God's promise. This safeguards against any doctrine of salvation by works. God's good gift is in mind, and it is secured, though not merited, by their persevering to the end.

37–38 Now the writer encourages his readers with passages in Scripture that point to the coming of God's Messiah in due course. The "very little while" (cf. Isa 26:20) points to a quite short period. The argument is that the readers ought not let the "very little while" rob them of their heavenly reward.

The author goes on to quote from Hab 2:3–4, which he interprets as referring to the coming of the Messiah (cf. Mt 11:3; 21:9; Jn 11:27). He reverses the order of the clauses from Habakkuk, finishing with the words about shrinking back; this enables him to apply them immediately to his readers. By using the LXX, the author is able to interpret Hab 2:3 as the prophet waiting for a deliverer to come. Christ will come in due course. In the meantime, the readers must patiently await him.

The words about the "righteous one" living by faith are used again in Ro 1:17; Gal 3:11. In those passages the emphasis is on what happens to those who have faith (they will be declared righteous), whereas here the author conveys the meaning that the person whom God accepts as righteous will live by faith. Paul is concerned with the way someone comes to be accepted by God, while the author here is concerned with the importance of holding fast to one's faith in the face of temptations to abandon it.

Mention of "faith" (GK 4411) leads us into the most sustained treatment of this subject in the NT. The term is mentioned again in v.39 and then throughout ch. 11. The first point made is that faith and shrinking back are opposed to each other. The passage does not say from what the shrinking back is. In the context, however, it must relate to proceeding along the way of faith and salvation. The quotation from Habakkuk makes it clear that God is not at all pleased with those who draw back. It is important to go forward in the path of faith.

39 The chapter closes with a ringing affirmation of confidence in which the writer identifies himself with his readers. He takes no position of superiority but sees himself as one with them. He sees only two possibilities: drawing back and being destroyed, and persevering in faith to final salvation. The end result of shrinking back is to be "destroyed" (GK 724). But that will not be the fate of his readers; they will go on in faith and be saved.

VIII. Faith (11:1–40)

The subject of faith is now continued in one of the classic treatments of the topic. In a passage of great eloquence and power, the author unfolds some of his thoughts on this most important subject for Christians. While he does not have the same warm personal faith in Jesus Christ that meant so much to Paul, what he says is both true and important in its own right. The writer does not contrast faith with works as Paul sometimes does, nor does he treat it as the means of receiving justification. Instead, he treats faith with reference to the future. It is that trust in God that enables believers to press on steadfastly whatever the future holds for them. They know that they can rely on God. So the writer's method is to select some of the great people in the history of God's people and to show briefly how faith motivated all of them and led them forward, no matter how difficult the circumstances. The result is a great passage that not only encouraged his readers but also has encouraged hosts of Christians through the ages.

A. The Meaning of Faith (11:1–3)

The chapter begins with some general observations on the nature of faith. They do not constitute a formal definition; rather, the writer is calling attention to some significant features of faith. Then he proceeds to show how faith works out in practice.

1 Faith is a present and continuing reality, not simply a virtue sometimes practiced in antiquity. It is a living thing, a way of life the writer wishes to see continued in the practice of his readers. Faith, he tells us, is a "being sure" (GK 5712) of things hoped for. The word used here sometimes has a subjective meaning, as NIV translates it (cf. also "confidence" in 3:14). But it may also be used more objectively ("substance"), though this does not seem to be what the writer is saying. There are realities for which we have no material evidence, though they are not the less real for that. Faith enables us to know that they exist and, while we have no certainty apart from faith, faith does give us genuine certainty. Faith is the basis, the substructure of all that the Christian life means, all that the Christian hopes for.

There is a further ambiguity about the word translated "certain" (GK 1793), which usually signifies a "proof" or "test." Some take it here as "test" and some see its legal use, while many prefer to understand it in much the same sense as the preceding expression (e.g., NIV). If we were to adopt the meaning "test," then the author is saying that faith, in addition to being the basis of all that we hope for, is that by which we test things unseen. We have no material way of assessing the significance of the immaterial. But Christians are not helpless. We have faith and by this we test all things. "What we do not see" excludes the entire range of visible phenomena which here stand for all things earthly. Faith extends beyond what we learn from our senses. Its tests are not those of the senses, which yield uncertainty.

2 "The ancients" (lit., "the elders"; GK 4565), a term that may be used of age or dignity, refers to the religious leaders of past days and means much the same as "the forefathers" in 1:1. These men had witness borne to them on account of their faith. As this chapter unfolds, the writer will go on to bring out some of that testimony and link the heroes of old specifically with faith. This chapter in Hebrews is distinguished from all others by its consistent and single-minded emphasis on faith.

3 "By faith" runs through the chapter with compelling emphasis. For the most part it is attached to the deeds of the great ones of previous generations. Here, however, the writer and his readers are involved in the "we." Faith is a present reality, not exclusively the property of past heroes. Faith gives us convictions about creation. Belief in the existence of the world is not faith, nor is it faith when people hold that the world was made out of some preexisting "stuff." But when we understand that it was the Word of God that produced all things, that is faith. The emphasis on God's word agrees with Ge 1, with its repeated "And God said." The point is emphasized with the explicit statement that the visible did not originate from the visible. For the author the visible universe is not sufficient to account for itself. But it is faith, not something material, that assures him that it originated with God. This world is God's world, and faith assures him that God originated it.

B. The Faith of the People Before the Flood (11:4–7)

The author proceeds to demonstrate the universality of faith in those whom God approves. He selects a number of men and women universally regarded among the Jews as especially outstanding. He begins by looking to remote antiquity and shows that faith was manifested in the lives of certain great people who lived before the Flood.

4 The first example of faith is Abel, who brought God a more acceptable sacrifice than did his brother Cain (Ge 4:3–7). Scripture never says there was anything inherently superior in Abel's offering. Some passages refer to Abel as being a righteous man (Mt 23:35; 1Jn 3:12), while the author of Hebrews insists on the importance of Abel's faith. Abel was right with God, and his offering was a demonstration of his faith.

The passive voice in "was commended" (lit., "it was testified"; GK 3455) implies that God is the subject; he bore witness to Abel's offerings. This indicates the importance that the author attached to Abel's sacrifice offered in faith, for rarely is God said to have borne witness. The meaning may be either that on the basis of Abel's sacrifice God testified to his servant or that God bore witness about the gifts Abel offered. The author then stresses that Abel is not to be thought of as one long-since dead and of no present account. He is dead, but his faith is a living voice.

5 The NT refers to Enoch only in Lk 3:37, Jude 14, and here. The Hebrew OT says nothing of the manner of his departure from this life, only that God "took" him (Ge 5:24). But our author follows LXX in speaking of him as "transferred," which indicates that he did not die, a truth made explicit in the words "he did not experience death." God "had taken him away" (GK 3572). On "was commended," see comment on previous verse. Testimony was borne to him, the content of the testimony being that he was "one who pleased God" (cf. Ge 5:22, 24).

6 Though the OT does not say that Enoch had faith, the author goes on to explain why he can speak of it so confidently. It is impossible to please God without faith, and Enoch pleased God. Therefore, it is clear that he must have had faith. The author lays it down with the greatest of emphasis that faith is absolutely necessary. He does not say simply that without faith it is difficult to please God; he says that without faith it is impossible (GK 105) to please him! There is no substitute for faith. He goes on to lay down two things required in the worshiper. First, he must believe that God exists. This is basic. Without it there is no possibility of faith at all. But it is not enough of itself. After all, the demons can know that sort of faith (Jas 2:19). There must also be a conviction about God's moral character, belief "that he rewards those who earnestly seek him." Without that deep conviction, faith in the biblical sense is not a possibility.

7 Attention moves to Noah. He was "warned" (GK 5976; a verb used frequently of divine communications) by God himself; he was not acting on a hunch or on merely human advice. The warning concerned events of which there was no present indication. At the time Noah received his message from God, there was no sign of the Flood and related events. His action was therefore motivated solely by faith, not by probability.

In the expression "holy fear" (GK 2326), some put the emphasis on "holy" and some on "fear." While it is true that this word may convey the notion of fear, it does not do so here. The author is not telling us that Noah was a timid type but that he was a man of faith. He acted out of reverence for God and God's command and "built" an ark, in order "to save his family" (lit., "for the salvation of his house"). In the NT the noun "salvation" (GK 5401) usually refers to salvation in Christ. Here, however, as in a few other places, it is the more general idea of salvation from danger—deliverance from disaster—that is in mind. "By his faith" (or possibly through the ark as the outward expression of faith) Noah's entire household was preserved during the Flood. His faith in action condemned the people of his day who failed to respond to the example of that godly man and presumably to the reasons he gave for his conduct. Noah undoubtedly told them why he was doing such an extraordinary thing as building an ark on dry land (cf. 2Pe 2:5). Upright conduct will always condemn wickedness (cf. Mt 12:41–42; Lk 11:31–32; 1Jn 3:12).

"The world" signifies the totality of humankind of that day who did not obey God. "Heir" (GK 3101) is used in the sense of "possessor," not strictly of one who enters a possession as a result of a will. Here we have the author's one use of the term "righteousness" (GK 1466) in the Pauline sense of the righteousness that is ours by faith. Noah was the first man to be called righteous (Ge 6:9). He was right with God because he took God at his word and acted on it.

C. The Faith of Abraham and Sarah (11:8–19)

The great progenitor of the Jewish people and his wife are now singled out as examples of faith. The Jews prided themselves on their descent from Abraham, and the great patriarch is mentioned a number of times in the NT as one who had faith and who acted on his faith (Ac 7:2–8; Ro 4:3; Gal 3:6; Jas 2:23).

In line with this the author gives more space to Abraham than to any other individual on his list. Abraham is an excellent example of what he has in mind, for his faith accepted God's promises and acted on them even though there was nothing to indicate that they would be fulfilled. This faith is seen in his acceptance of the promise of a child when Sarah was old and even more in his readiness to sacrifice that child—the one through whom the promise was to be fulfilled—when God commanded.

8 Abraham is mentioned ten times in Hebrews. The author shows a strong interest in this patriarch. He obeyed God's call the moment it came. His prompt obedience took him out to a region as yet unknown to him but which he would later receive "as his inheritance" (GK 3100). The last half of this verse is a classical statement of the obedience of faith. People like to know where they are going and to choose their way. But the way forward can be obscure. Abraham was one who could go out, knowing that it was right to do so, but not knowing where it would all lead. God told him to go "to the land that I will show you" (Ge 12:1). Yet it was not till some time after he reached Canaan that he was informed that this was the land God would give his descendants (Ge 12:7; later on Abraham himself was included in the same promise, Ge 13:15). To leave the certainties one knows and go out into what is quite unknown—relying on nothing other than the Word of God—is the essence of faith.

9 Paradoxically, when he got to "the promised land" of Canaan, Abraham lived in it, not as its owner, but as though "in a foreign country." This earthly Canaan was a foretaste of God's heavenly country (cf. v.10). He had no rights here. He and his household "lived" (GK 2997) "in tents," i.e., in temporary dwellings. Right to the end of his life the only piece of the country he owned was the field he purchased as Sarah's burial place (Ge 23). God "gave him no inheritance here, not even a foot of ground" (Ac 7:5).

Nor was it any better with Isaac and Jacob. They shared the same promises as the descendants through whom God's purpose would be worked out. But all their lifetimes they had no more share in Canaan than Abraham did. Toward the end of Jacob's life the clan went down to Egypt, and when they came back many years later, it was not as sojourners but as a mighty people who made the land their own. The lives of the three patriarchs thus cover the whole time of the temporary dwelling in the land.

10 The reason for Abraham's patient acceptance of his lot was his forward look in faith to "the city with foundations." To people in the first century, the city was the highest form of civilized society. Nothing served so well as the pattern for the ideal community. Since it is difficult to see God as the literal "architect and builder" of the earthly Jerusalem, the ultimate reference here is to "the heavenly Jerusalem" (cf. v.16; 12:22; 13:14; also Php 3:20; Rev 3:12; 21:10; et al.). The "foundations" are not anything literal (cf. Rev 21:19–20); the expression probably means that the city is well based—i.e., a city with permanent foundations. It is eternal, more lasting than earth's ephemeral edifices.

The city owes everything to God, who is its "architect [GK 5493] and builder [GK 1321]." The first of these words means a craftsman or designer. As applied to a city, it may point to what we would call a "city planner." The second word points to one who does the actual work. God built the city as well as designed it; it owes nothing to any inferior being. The thought of this verse shows clearly that more than Canaan was in Abraham's mind when he went out in faith. God is not the "architect and builder" of Canaan any more than he is of any other land.

11 This verse presents us with a difficult problem. On the face of it, the verse in Greek ascribes to Sarah an activity possible only to males, that she deposited seed for children. Two of the best suggested interpretations are: (1) To see the words "Sarah herself" as dative and not nominative. The meaning would then be "By faith he, together with Sarah herself, received power. . . ." Abraham then had faith in connection with the birth of Isaac, and Sarah is linked with him. (2) To take the words about Sarah as a parenthesis, as NIV does. This translation also inserts "Abraham" into the text and makes the rest of the verse refer unambiguously to a male.

There is a further problem in that in Genesis Sarah was anything but an example of faith, for she laughed incredulously at the suggestion that she should bear a son in her old age (Ge 18:9ff.). The author appears to mean that, despite her initial skepticism, Sarah came to share Abraham's faith (otherwise she would not have cooperated with her husband to secure the birth of the boy). The aged couple lacked the physical ability to cause birth, but faith introduced them to the power that brought about the birth of Isaac. "Past age" draws attention to the area in which faith had to operate. On the human level, there was no hope, but for Abraham there was hope. He knew that God had made a promise and that he is "faithful" (GK 4412) to his promises (cf. 10:23). Faithfulness to his word is a characteristic of God.

12 "And so" introduces the inevitable result. Because God promised and Abraham believed him, the consequence necessarily followed. The smallness of the beginning is brought out: Abraham was but "one man." Moreover, he was not one from whom a numerous progeny might be anticipated because he was "as good as dead" (an expression referring to his capacity for begetting offspring, not to his general state). By contrast his descendants would be as numerous as the stars in the sky or the sand on the seashore (cf. Ge 15:5; 22:17; Ex 32:13; Dt 1:10; 10:22). Both the stars and the sand were proverbial for multitude; so the general meaning is that Abraham's descendants would be too many to count. God's blessing is beyond human calculation.

13 The author breaks off his treatment of Abraham for a moment to engage in some general remarks about "all these people," i.e., those he has dealt with thus far. They died still exercising faith without having possessed what was promised. "All" allows no exceptions; what is said applies to every one of them. They knew that God had promised certain blessings, but they did not receive them. We must be careful how we understand this, for the author has already said that Abraham "received what was promised" (6:15). Humanly speaking, when there was no hope of having a son, he saw Isaac born. God's promise to Abraham, however, meant far more than that; it is the fullness of the blessing that is in mind in v.13. The best that happened to the saints of old was that they had glimpses of what God had in store for them.

The patriarchs did no more than "see" the equivalent of the Promised Land (cf. Moses in Dt 3:26–28; 34:1–4). "See" can be used of various kinds of sight. Here it is plainly an operation of faith that is in mind, for the word points to an inner awareness of what the promises meant. In their attitude, the patriarchs showed that they knew themselves to be no more than "aliens and strangers [GK 4215]." This latter term means those living in a country they do not belong to, i.e., resident aliens.

The combination "aliens and strangers" reminds us of Abraham's description of himself as "an alien and a stranger" (Ge 23:4) and Jacob's words to Pharaoh (Ge 47:9). The psalmist could also describe himself as "an alien, a stranger," and add, "as all my fathers were" (Ps 39:12). It is true that Isaac once sowed "crops" (Ge 26:12), and Jacob at one time "built a place for himself" (Ge 33:17). But neither really settled down in the land, and to the end of their lives they were pilgrims rather than residents. The author sees that it was faith that enabled all these great men of old to recognize their true position as citizens of heaven and thus as aliens everywhere on earth.

14–15 To acknowledge the things stated in v.13 has further implications; namely, that the kind of people spoken of are looking for "a country of their own." If they had regarded themselves only as earthlings, they would not have retained the vision of faith with their attention squarely fixed on what is beyond this earth. The patriarchs could have gone back to Mesopotamia, had they so chosen. There was nothing physical to stop them. But their attitude excluded the possibility.

The Bedouin still live in tents as nomads, just as Abraham did in the land to which God called him (vv.8–9).

When Abraham wanted a wife for Isaac, he wanted her to be from his homeland. But he did not go back there himself. Instead, he sent a servant to get the bride and said to him, "Make sure that you do not take my son back there" (Ge 24:6). After Jacob had spent twenty years in Mesopotamia, he still regarded Canaan as "my own homeland" (Ge 30:25); and he heard God say, "Go back to the land of your fathers" (Ge 31:3). Abraham buried Sarah in Canaan, not Mesopotamia, and in due course he was buried there himself (Ge 23:19; 25:9–10), as were Isaac (Ge 35:27–29) and Jacob (Ge 49:29–33; 50:13), Jacob being brought up from Egypt for the purpose. Joseph commanded that the same be done for him (Ge 50:24–26; cf. Ex 13:19; Jos 24:32). All these men wholeheartedly accepted God's word. Since they were not earthly minded, they set their hearts by faith on a heavenly home, and they did not go back to an earthly homeland.

16 "Instead" contrasts the actuality with what might have been. The people's longing was for the heavenly country. The adjective "heavenly" (GK 2230) connects country with God and with all it means to belong to God. So firm was their commitment to their heavenly calling that God was not ashamed of them. Indeed, he is spoken of again and again as "the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob." Sometimes God uses these very words of himself (Ex 3:6, 15–16), and Jesus used the same expression to show the truth that the patriarchs are still alive (Mk 12:26–27). Not only is God not ashamed of those servants of his, but he honored their faith by preparing a city for them (see comments on v.10). The use of the past tense here should not be overlooked. It is not that God will one day prepare their city but that he has already done so.

17–18 The writer returns from the patriarchs in general (vv.13–16) to Abraham in particular. He now brings out something of the significance of the greatest trial that this great man had to endure: the sacrifice of his son Isaac. We are apt to see this as a conflict between Abraham's love for his son and his duty to God. But for the author the problem was Abraham's difficulty in reconciling the different revelations made to him. God had promised him a numerous posterity through Isaac; yet now he called on him to offer Isaac as a sacrifice. How, then, could the promise be fulfilled? Though he did not understand, Abraham knew how to obey. His faith told him that God would work out his purpose, even if he himself could not see how that could be. So he "offered Isaac as a sacrifice." That is, in will and purpose he did offer his son. He held nothing back. At the same time, however, God did not require him to slay his "one and only" (GK 3666) son. While it is true that Abraham had other sons (Ge 25:1–2, 5–6), he had no other born in the way Isaac was and bearing the kind of promises that were made about Isaac. Abraham's faith is highlighted here. He was not passive; he took the responsibility of being the man through whom God would work out his promise. Yet he was ready to offer the required sacrifice. His dilemma is brought out with the quotation of God's promise from Ge 21:12—a promise that was to be fulfilled in Isaac alone.

19 Now the author explains why Abraham, who believed that God was going to fulfill his promises through Isaac, was nevertheless ready to offer up his son. He "reasoned" (GK 3357) that God could raise the dead. This fits in with the Genesis narrative, for as Abraham went off with the boy to sacrifice him, he said to the servants, "Stay here with the donkey while I and the boy go over there. We will worship and then we will come back to you" (Ge 22:5).

"And figuratively speaking, he did receive Isaac back from death." Abraham had reconciled himself to the death of the son in whom he had thought the promises of God would be realized. To have Isaac alive was like getting someone back from the dead. Abraham's unswerving faith in God was vindicated.

D. The Faith of the Patriarchs (11:20–22)

What impresses the author about these patriarchs was that they had a faith that looked beyond death. It was when he thought he was near death that Isaac blessed Jacob and Esau (Ge 27:2, 4), Jacob blessed Joseph's sons, and Joseph gave instructions concerning himself after he died. With all three the significant thing was their firm conviction that death cannot frustrate God's purposes. Their faith, being stronger than death, in a way overcame death, for their words were fulfilled.

20 Just as Abraham acted in view of things to come, so did Isaac. He blessed his two sons in terms that looked into the distant future (Ge 27:27–29, 39–40). The author says nothing about Jacob's deception of his old father. Perhaps one might object that the words Isaac spoke to Jacob he thought he was speaking to Esau, so that what he said did not really apply and was not an example of soundly based faith. But Isaac quickly recognized that the blessing belonged to Jacob (Ge 27:33), and later he did bless Jacob with full knowledge of what he was doing (Ge 28:1–4). In any case, the author is not interested in such details; it is enough that both blessings concerned "their future." His concern is with the faith that undergirded the patriarch's blessing. On each occasion Isaac spoke out of a firm conviction that a blessing given in accordance with God's future purposes could not possibly fail. Fittingly, the sons are listed in the order in which they received the blessings, not that of their birth.

21 Jacob's claim for inclusion in the list rests on his blessing of his grandsons Ephraim and Manasseh (Ge 48). As with Isaac, the blessing went against the natural order of birth. In fact, when Jacob was dying, Joseph tried to have the major blessing given to Manasseh, the firstborn. But Jacob crossed his hands to pick out Ephraim as the greater. God is not bound by human rules like those that give pride and benefit of place to the firstborn. This incident, like the preceding one, again illustrates the theme of the patriarchal blessing with its fulfillment far distant. At the time the words were spoken, fulfillment could be known only by faith.

The author then adds a reference to a previous incident in which Jacob "worshiped as he leaned on the top of his staff" (see Ge 47:31). He speaks of Jacob as adopting a worshipful attitude as he blessed the sons of Joseph.

22 Joseph's faith, like that of the others, looked beyond death, though his words referred to nothing more than his burial arrangements. But the charge to carry his bones to Canaan (Ge 50:24–25; Ex 13:19; Jos 24:32) gives evidence of his deep conviction that in due course God would send the people back to that land. Joseph's wish to be buried in Canaan is all the more striking when we remember that, apart from his first seventeen years, he spent all his life in Egypt. But Canaan was the land for the people of God, so he wanted to be buried there. His speaking about the "exodus" of the Israelites from Egypt and his concern about the proper disposal of his bones reflect his high faith that in due course God would act.

E. The Faith of Moses (11:23–28)

No OT character ranked higher in popular Jewish estimation than Moses. He was the great lawgiver, and the law was central to Jewish life. Many astonishing feats were attributed to him in Jewish legends. Moses is highly honored in the NT, but the references to him there are more sober than Jewish tradition (e.g., Ac 7:20–44). The author has a just appreciation for the greatness of Moses but shows none of the extravagances so typical of the Judaism of his time. Both Christians and Jews honored Abraham and Moses; but whereas the Jews tended to put Moses in the higher place and to see Abraham as one who kept the law before Moses, the Christians preferred to put Abraham in the more exalted place and see Moses as one who followed in the steps of Abraham's faith. The author is certainly interested in the way Moses exercised faith, and he gives five instances of faith in connection with the great lawgiver.

23 Like the others in this chapter, Moses lived by faith. But the reference to him begins with the faith exercised when he was too young to know what was going on—the faith of his parents. In the account in Exodus the role of Moses' mother receives all the attention, his father not being mentioned. In the LXX, however, the plural verbs in Ex 2:2–3 show that both parents were involved. In any case, the mother could not have hidden the child without the father's agreement. So both parents were necessarily involved.

NIV says both parents hid Moses "because they saw he was no ordinary child." However, the Greek word that is used here means "beautiful" (GK 842) or perhaps "well-pleasing"; the meaning appears to be that the child was so exceptionally beautiful that his parents believed that God had some special plan for him. The king's edict was for every male Hebrew child to be thrown into the Nile (Ex 1:22). Presumably anyone who disobeyed would be severely punished. But Moses' parents were people of faith. They hid their beautiful baby for three months, trusting God rather than fearing Pharaoh.

24 Passing over the putting of the baby in the ark of bulrushes, the finding of the child by Pharaoh's daughter, and the rearing of Moses in Pharaoh's house, the author comes at once to Moses' faith as a grown man. Stephen tells us that Moses was about forty years old when the incident in this verse occurred (Ac 7:23); the author of Hebrews writes that the decision Moses reached was that of a mature man. In full knowledge of what he was doing, Moses "refused to be known as the son of Pharaoh's daughter," which must have seemed an act of folly by worldly standards. He had open to him a place of great prestige and could have lived comfortably among the Egyptian aristocracy. But he gave it all up.

25 Moses' decision involved the ready acceptance of oppression as he cast in his lot with God's people instead of with the pleasures he could have had at the court. He was fully committed to "the people of God." Moses is seen not as a revolutionary but as a man of faith deliberately aligning himself with God's own people, even though doing that meant ill treatment. "The pleasures of sin" implies that once he saw where God's call lay, it would have been sin for him to turn away from it and align himself with the Egyptians. There would have been pleasures, but they would have been enjoyed only at the expense of disobeying God. Moreover, they would have been purely temporary. Moses had a sense of true values.

26 Here the point made in v.25 is seen from another angle. While Moses knew what "the treasures of Egypt" were worth, he counted "the disgrace for the sake of Christ" as great riches. Most likely the author thought of Christ as identified in some way with the people of God in OT times (cf. 1Co 10:4). Isaiah could say of God, "In all their distress he too was distressed" (Isa 53:9). Similarly, Christ could be said to be involved with the people.

When Moses suffered, he suffered with Christ—the same Christ whom the writer is encouraging his readers to identify with. It no doubt carried great weight with them to realize that they were being called to participate in the same kind of experiences and attitudes the great Moses had. Moses looked forward to the "reward" (GK 3632). He was not deceived by the glitter of the Egyptian court and the security of worldly safety. History, of course, has vindicated him. The choice Moses made has resulted in his influence still being felt.

27 This verse poses a problem because Moses left Egypt on two occasions: he fled to Midian after he had slain the Egyptian oppressor (Ex 2:11–15), and he went out with the rest of the Israelites at the Exodus. There would be little doubt that the former is meant here were it not for the fact that it was fear that led Moses to flee to Midian after killing the Egyptian (Ex 2:14), whereas this verse says he did not fear "the king's anger." In spite of this problem, the author seems to have Moses' flight to Midian in mind for the following reasons: (1) The order of events. The Passover is mentioned in v.28; therefore, Moses' flight seems to have preceded this event. (2) "He" left Egypt seems a strange way of referring to the Exodus of an entire nation. (3) The Exodus was the result of Pharaoh's request (Ex 12:31–32), not his "anger."

The author goes on to give the reason for Moses' perseverance in a fine paradox: "He saw him who is invisible." The OT has a good deal to say about Moses' close relationship with God: "The Lord would speak to Moses face to face, as a man speaks with his friend" (Ex 33:11; cf. Nu 12:7–8). This close walk with God sustained Moses through all the difficult days.

28 The final example of faith in connection with Moses concerns the Passover. The verb "kept" (GK 4472) can also be translated "instituted." Whichever translation we prefer, the striking thing is Moses' provision for its continuance: "For the generations to come you shall celebrate it as a festival to the Lord—a lasting ordinance" (Ex 12: 14). The author of Hebrews adds a reference to "the sprinkling of blood" (cf. Ex 12:7), which is a further illustration of faith. Nothing in the previous experience of either Moses or the Israelites justified putting blood above the doors, but their faith was vindicated when "the destroyer of the firstborn" passed over them. Moses had nothing to go on but the conviction that God had directed him. Clearly, faith triumphed.

F. The Faith of the Exodus Generation (11:29–31)

The author moves naturally enough from Moses to those associated with him. For some reason he does not mention Joshua, nor does he recount any example of faith during the wanderings in the wilderness. Since the wilderness generation was not noteworthy for faith (though there were some conspicuous exceptions), their omission is understandable. But the omission of Joshua is puzzling. Perhaps we should think of him in connection with the destruction of Jericho.

29 Some of those who went out of Egypt with Moses were anything but shining examples of faith. But they must have had some faith to follow Moses through the sea, and it is on this that attention is focused. The crossing of the Red Sea is attributed to God (Ex 14:14) and to the east wind that God sent (Ex 14:21); but the author prefers to concentrate on the faith that enabled the people to respond to what God had done. That their faith and not merely their courage was important is shown by the fate of the Egyptians. The Egyptians were just as courageous as the Israelites, for they attempted to cross in the same way. But they lacked faith, and the result was disaster. Their fate shows that the faith of Moses and his followers was real and not just a formality.

30 That the falling of the walls of Jericho should be ascribed to faith is not surprising (see Jos 6:1–21). What else could account for it? The author does not say whose faith he discerned in the story, though it was probably that of both Joshua and those who followed him. The taking of Jericho is a striking example of the power of faith. Apart from the conviction that God would act, nothing could have been more pointless than the behavior of those warriors. Rather than attack, they simply walked around the city once a day for six days and then seven times on the seventh. But once more faith was vindicated, for the walls tumbled down.

31 Rahab the prostitute seems at first sight an unlikely example of faith. But she was highly regarded among both Jews and Christians. According to Jewish tradition, she married Joshua and became the ancestress of eight priests. Among Christians, she is mentioned favorably in Jas 2:25 and is listed in the genealogy of the Lord as the wife of Salmon (Mt 1:5). She came from outside Israel and was one who might not be expected to believe in the Lord, but she acted decisively out of her deep convictions. She put her life at risk, for she would undoubtedly have been destroyed by her countrymen had they known what she was doing. So Rahab did exercise a faith that might have been very costly (Jos 2:1–21). She is contrasted to the "disobedient" (GK 578), which appears to be a general term for those who do not walk in God's ways. Rahab "welcomed" the spies; she did not act in the spirit of a combatant but looked after the Lord's men. It is significant that a woman from an immoral background could become an example of faith.

G. The Faith of Other Servants of God (11:32–38)

From particular cases the author moves to generalities. To continue in such detail would require writing at great length, and the author has no time for that. On the other hand, there are many shining examples of faith, and it would be a pity not to notice them in some way. So the author names a few outstanding people of faith without detailing what their faith led them to do and then goes on to mention certain groups of the faithful.

32 With a neat rhetorical flourish, the author shows that his subject is far from exhausted. Not having time to go through all the ones on his list, he lists a half dozen faithful men: Gideon, Barak, Samson, Jephthah, David, and Samuel. The first four of these are mentioned only here in the NT. Samuel is mentioned only twice elsewhere in the NT. David, of course, is mentioned frequently. The reason for the order of these names is not clear. It is not chronological. If we arrange them in pairs, the second of the two in each case is the earlier in time. Samuel might well be placed last as heading up the prophets who came after him, but we can only guess at the reasons for the way the rest are placed.

The writer does not go into detail about these men. The OT indicates that each one battled against overwhelming odds so that, humanly speaking, there was little chance of his coming out on top. For people in such positions faith in God was not a formality. It meant definite trust when the odds seemed to be stacked against them. They set worthy examples for the readers in their difficult circumstances. It is true that in the first four, there were serious defects in their faith. Nevertheless, even imperfect and incomplete faith receives God's approval.

33 In the list of vv.33–34, there are three groups of three. We may see them as indicating: (1) the broad results of the believers' faith: material victory, moral success in government, spiritual reward; (2) forms of personal deliverance: from wild beasts, from physical forces, from human tyranny; (3) the attainment of personal gifts: strength, the exercise of strength, and the triumph of strength. In each case it is possible to see OT examples.

There are those who "conquered kingdoms" (as did Joshua and others) and "administered justice"; the reference seems to be to people like the judges. The next group may be, as in NIV, those who "gained what was promised," or those who obtained words of promise from God. Either way they were people of faith. In the OT a number of men can be said to have "shut the mouths of lions," notably Daniel (Da 6:17–22). David also was delivered from a lion (1Sa 17:34–37), and Benaiah killed one in a pit on a snowy day (1Ch 11:22; cf. also Samson, Jdg 14:5–6).

34 When he speaks of those who "quenched the fury of the flames," the writer probably has in mind the three Jews whom Nebuchadnezzar had cast into the furnace and who then emerged unharmed (Da 3:23–27). Those who "escaped the edge of the sword" may refer to people who ran away successfully when forced to flee, or to people who emerged unscathed from battle. Probably the writer is thinking of people like Elijah, who was not killed by Jezebel (1Ki 19:2ff.). The OT contains many examples of those "whose weakness was turned to strength," such as Gideon, who also "became powerful in battle and routed foreign armies." It might fairly be said that the typical deliverance of Israel in OT times came about when a small number of Israelites (like Gideon's three hundred [Jdg 7:7] or the tiny armies of Israel "like two little flocks of goats" [1Ki 20:27]) fought at God's direction against vastly superior forces and defeated them. It was God's power that prevailed; he made these puny forces strong enough to defeat mighty enemies.

35–36 A number of women in Scripture "received back their dead" as living: Elijah's hostess (1Ki 17:17–24), the Shunammite who befriended Elisha (2Ki 4:18–37), the son of the widow of Nain (Luke 7:11–14), Lazarus (Jn 11), and Dorcas, the friend of widows (Ac 9:36–41). Sometimes, however, faith worked in another way. Some accepted torture rather than release in order that "they might gain a better resurrection," i.e., be raised to the life of the age to come with God and not simply be restored to the life of this age. A "better resurrection" perhaps implies that all will be raised; it is better to endure suffering and even torture now in order that the resurrection may be joyous. Other forms of torture were severe mockery, floggings, chains, and imprisonment.

37 Stoning was a characteristic Jewish form of execution. Some people of faith suffered at the hands of their fellow-countrymen. To be "sawed in two" was a most unusual form of killing. According to tradition this was the way the prophet Isaiah was killed. The statement that some were put to death "by the sword" is important, lest it be deduced from v.34 that people of faith were inevitably safe from this fate. While God delivered some from it, his purpose for other believers was to be slain in this way. They trusted God and knew that, whether in life or death, all would ultimately be well.

From the various ways people of faith died, the writer turns to consider the hardships they had to endure in their lives. Their clothing had been the simplest. Apparently the prophets sometimes wore sheepskins (cf. Elijah's "garment of hair," 2Ki 1:8). The reference here is not, however, so much to a definite class (like the prophets) as it is to people of faith in general who were roughly clad. That they were "destitute" is in accord with this, for the author is speaking of those without earthly resources. Misery pressed on them as they were "persecuted and mistreated."

38 To all outward appearance, these people of faith were insignificant and unimportant. But in truth they were worth more than all the rest of humanity put together, though they lacked everything. Their description is rounded off with the reminder that they had no settled homes. They wandered in lonely places, and their shelters were "caves and holes in the ground." The heroes of the faith had no mansions; they cared for other things than their own comfort.

H. The Promise (11:39–40)

The author rounds off this section with a reminder of the great privilege Christians have. The giants of the faith had done great things for God in their times, and there is no question regarding God's approval of them. Nevertheless, they would not be "made perfect" apart from the humble followers of Jesus.

39 "These" refers to the preceding heroes of the faith; "all" omits none of them. God never forgets any of his faithful servants. All of them "were commended" (lit., "had witness borne to them"; GK 3455) on account of their faith. The importance of faith, which has been stressed throughout the chapter, continues to the end. But for all the blessing God gave them, these heroes of the faith did not receive "the promise." Verse 33 tells us that they "gained what was promised." Indeed, Abraham was cited as an example of that as far back as 6:15. But here it is not a question of "the promises" but of "the promise." God made many promises to his people and kept them. But the ultimate blessing (which the author characteristically sees in terms of "promise") was not given under the old dispensation. God kept that until Jesus came.

40 God's plan provided for "something better for us." The precise nature of the blessing is left undefined. The important thing is not exactly what it is but that God has not imparted it prematurely. "Us" means "us Christians"; we who are Christ's have our place in God's plan. And that plan provides that the heroes of the faith throughout the ages should not "be made perfect" (GK 5457) apart from Christians. Salvation is social; it concerns the whole people of God. We can experience it only as part of the whole people of God. As long as the believers in OT times were without those who are in Christ, it was impossible for them to experience the fullness of salvation. Furthermore, it is what Christ has done that opens the way into the very presence of God for them as well as for us. Only the work of Christ brings those of OT times and those of the new and living way alike into the presence of God.

IX. Christian Living (12:1–13:19)

The last main section of the letter is largely devoted to the practical business of living out the Christian faith.

A. Christ Our Example (12:1–3)

The writer begins by pointing to what Christ has done for us. In one of the great, moving passages of the NT, he points to the Cross as the stimulus that nerves Christ's people to serious and concentrated endeavor as they face the difficulties involved in living out their faith.

1 "We" links the writer to his readers. He is a competitor in the race as well as they and writes as one who is as much caught up in the contest as they are. The word "cloud" may be used of a mass of clouds in the sky, but it is also used of a throng of people. The witnesses are a vast host.

There is a question whether we should understand "witnesses" (GK 3459) as those who have witnessed to the faith or those who are spectators witnessing the present generation of Christians. Normally the word is used in the former sense, and it is doubtful whether it ever means simply "a spectator." Still it is difficult to rid the word of this idea in 1Ti 6:12 (perhaps also in Heb 10:28), and the imagery of the present passage favors it. The writer pictures athletes in a footrace, running for the winning post and urged on by the crowd. Yet they are "surrounded," which makes it hard to think of them as looking to the "witnesses"—and all the more so since they are exhorted to keep their eyes on Jesus (v.2). Both ideas may be present. Perhaps we should think of something like a relay race where those who have finished their course and handed in their baton are watching and encouraging their successors.

With the great gallery of witnesses about us, it is important for us to run well. So we are exhorted to "throw off everything that hinders." "Hinders" (GK 3839) is really a noun that means any kind of weight. It is sometimes used of superfluous bodily weight that the athlete sheds during training. Here, however, it seems to be the race rather than the training that is in view. Athletes carried nothing with them in a race (they ran naked), and the writer is suggesting that the Christian should "travel light." He is not referring to sin (see the next clause). Some things that are not wrong in themselves hinder us in putting forward our best effort. So the writer tells us to get rid of them.

Christians must also put off every "sin that so easily entangles." Sin forms a crippling hindrance to good running. We must lay aside all that can hinder us in our race and "run with perseverance." The author is not thinking of a short, sharp sprint but of a race that requires endurance and persistence—a long-distance race that demands sustained effort by the runner, who keeps on with great determination. That is what the heroes of faith did in their day, and it is that to which we are called.

2 We are to run this race with no eyes for any one or anything except Jesus. He is the one toward whom we run with undivided attention. The "author and perfecter of [the] faith" may mean that Jesus walked the way of faith first and brought it to completion. Or it may mean that he originated his people's faith and will bring it to its perfection. Both ideas may be involved, but since it is not easy to think of the faith by which Jesus lived as essentially the same as our own, the emphasis seems to fall on what he does in his followers. As the heroes of faith in ch. 11 are OT characters, the thought is that Jesus led all the people of faith, even from the earliest days.

The expression rendered "for the joy set before him" is problematic. The preposition translated "for" (GK 505) strictly means "in the place of." Accordingly, the meaning may be that in place of the joy he might have had, Jesus accepted the cross. The "joy" is then the heavenly bliss that the preincarnate Christ surrendered in order to take the way of the Cross. He replaced joy with the Cross. But this preposition sometimes has the meaning "for the sake of," which is preferable here. With this understanding of the term, Jesus went to the Cross because of the joy it would bring. He looked right through the Cross to the coming joy, the joy of bringing salvation to those whom he loves. For this joy, then, Jesus "endured the cross."

The "cross" is not as common a way of referring to the death of Jesus as we might have expected. This is the one occurrence of the word outside the gospels and Pauline letters. If one "scorns" a thing, one normally has nothing to do with it; but "scorning its shame" means rather that Jesus thought so little of the pain and shame involved that he refused to avoid it; instead, he endured it. Then, having completed his work of redemption, he "sat down at the right hand of the throne of God" (see comment on 1:3).

3 "Consider" (GK 382) is a word used in calculations. The readers are invited to "take account of" Jesus, the one who "endured" [GK 5702] opposition from sinful men." He was thus in the same kind of position the readers found themselves in, and he served as the example for them. They were not being called upon to put up with something their Master had not first endured. The two verbs "grow weary" (GK 2827) and "lose [GK 1725] heart" are sometimes used of runners who relax and collapse after they have passed the finishing post. The readers were still in the race. They must not give way prematurely, nor allow themselves to faint and collapse through weariness. Once again there is the call to perseverance in the face of hardship.

B. Discipline (12:4–11)

Suffering comes to all; it is part of life, but it is not easy to bear. Yet it is not quite so bad if it can be seen as meaningful. The author has just pointed out that Christ endured his suffering on the cross on account of the joy set before him. His suffering had meaning. Thus, for Christians all suffering is transformed. The writer points to the importance of discipline and proceeds to show that for Christians, suffering is rightly understood only when seen as God's fatherly discipline, correcting and directing us. Suffering is evidence, not that God does not love us, but that he does. We are God's children and are treated as such.

4 The "struggle [GK 497, retaining the imagery of athletic games] against sin" does not seem to refer to sin that the readers might be tempted to commit but to the sin of oppressors who were trying to terrorize them into abandoning their faith. Shedding blood does not normally accompany temptation, but it was a very real possibility for those facing persecution. Jesus had been killed, and many of those honored in ch. 11 had likewise been killed for their faithfulness to God. The words "not yet" show that there was real danger and that the readers must be ready for difficult days. But they had not had to die for their faith. They were evidently concerned at the prospect facing them, and he points out that their experience is not nearly so difficult as that of others.

5–6 They had forgotten an important point: Scripture links suffering and sonship, as Pr 3:11–12 shows. The address "My son" is normal for a writer of proverbs who assumes a superior but caring position. This author, however, sees a fuller meaning in these words than that, for they are words from God to his people. When God speaks of discipline and rebuke, it is sons whom he addresses. This warning is called "that word of encouragement." The certainty of suffering encourages believers rather than dismays them because they know that it is God's discipline for them. It seems not improbable that the words should perhaps be taken as a question: "Have you forgotten?"

The word for "discipline" (GK 4082) combines the thoughts of chastening and education. It points to sufferings that teach us something. In v.4 the striving was against sin, but somehow the hand of God was in it, too. No circumstances are beyond God's control, and there are none he cannot use to carry out his purpose. So believers are not to belittle the significance of their sufferings nor lose heart in the face of God's correction. God disciplines the people he loves, not those he is indifferent to. The readers should see the sufferings they were experiencing as a sign of God's love, as Scripture already assured them.

In the ancient world it was universally accepted that bringing up children involved disciplining them. The Roman father possessed absolute authority. When a child was born, he decided whether to keep or discard it. Throughout its life he could punish it as he chose. He could even execute a child and, while this was rarely done, the right to do it was there. Discipline was to be expected.

7 It is not as misery, accident, or the like that Christians should understand suffering but "as discipline." God uses it to teach important lessons; he "is treating you as sons." The author's rhetorical question appeals to the universality of fatherly discipline. It was unthinkable to the writer and his readers that a father would not discipline his children. Perhaps we should notice in passing that while the author clearly sees believers as children of God, he does not specifically call God a father (except in a quotation in 1:5; cf. also "the Father of our spirits," 12:9).

8 The hypothetical possibility of being without chastisement is looked at and a devastating conclusion drawn. It is the universal experience of children that life means discipline. If anyone does not receive discipline, then, the author says, that child is "illegitimate" (GK 3785). This word is used of one born of a slave or a concubine, or of illegitimate children in general. The point is that such children are not heirs, not members of the family. For them the father feels no responsibility. Their freedom from discipline is not evidence of a privileged position. Rather, the reverse is true.

9 The writer appeals to the practice and result of discipline exercised in the human family. He and his readers experienced discipline from their fathers, who are seen in their capacity as trainers of their children by punishing them when they go wrong. The effect of such paternal chastisement is to arouse respect, not resentment. How much more, then, should believers submit to God's discipline! "The Father of our spirits" means something like "our spiritual Father." The verb "live" (GK 2409) as used here probably refers to the life to come. When people accept life's sufferings as discipline from God's fatherly hand, they enter the life that alone is worthy of the name.

10 There is a difference in the quality of the discipline we have received from our earthly fathers and that which comes from God. They disciplined us "for a little while," i. e., the comparatively brief days of childhood; and they did their best (the phrase implies that they made mistakes). But God's discipline is always "for our good"; its aim is "that we may share in his holiness." The word "holiness" (GK 42) points to God's holy character. The aim of his chastisement of his people is to produce in them a character like his own.

11 At the time it takes place, chastisement is never a happy affair. On the contrary, sorrow goes with it. But while it does not "seem pleasant," it does produce a result the writer calls a "harvest of righteousness and peace." Suffering can easily render people irritable and impatient with one another's faults. Therefore, it is important that suffering be accepted in the right spirit in order to produce the right result. So the author goes on to speak of those who have been "trained" (GK 1214; another athletic word) by it, meaning those who have continued to exercise themselves in godly discipline. It is not a matter of accepting a minor chastisement or two with good grace; it is the habit of life that is meant. When that is present, the peaceable fruit follows.

C. Exhortation to the Christian Life (12:12–17)

From the acceptance of life's discipline in general, the writer turns to the way this discipline is applied in Christian experience. It is important that God's people live as God's people. They are not to take their standards from the ungodly.

12 "Therefore" links this exhortation to what has gone before. Because of what they now know of God's loving discipline, they must put forward their best effort. The "hands" (not "arms" as NIV) are pictured as "limp" and thus useless. They accomplish nothing. The knees are "weak" (see Isa 35:3, from where the writer may have taken his imagery). "Strengthen" (GK 494) presents the picture of someone whose hands and legs are for some reason out of action but are put right. The exhortation implies that the readers are acting as though they are spiritually paralyzed. They are urged to put things right and get moving.

13 A quotation from Pr 4:26 is added. The idea is to put the paths into better shape in order to facilitate travel, specifically for the lame. The writer is mindful of the fact that Christians belong together. They must have consideration for the weak among their members, i.e., the "lame"; they must not "be disabled" (lit., "be turned away"; GK 1762). By caring for the defective members of the congregation, the stronger members can help them along the way and revitalize them.

14 The NT contains a number of exhortations to believers to be at "peace" (GK 1645), either with one another or with people in general (cf. Mt 5:9; Mk 9:50; Ro 12:18). People are often selfish and abrasive, but this is not the way Christians should be. For them peace is imperative, and they must put forth "every effort" to attain it. Commentators differ as to whether "all men" is to be taken in its widest sense or whether the writer means "all fellow believers." Granted that it is especially important for Christians to live in harmony with one another, there seems to be no reason for taking "all" in anything other than its normal meaning. The readers should make every effort to live peaceably with all people. While the writer is especially interested in harmony in the Christian community, he has so worded his exhortation as to cover all relations, not only those among believers.

Coupled with peace is "to be holy" (lit., "holiness"; GK 40). Holiness means being set apart for God. It is characteristic of believers to live differently from and separate from the world. Their standards are not the world's standards. Without this readiness to belong to God, no one will see God (cf. Mt 5:8).

15 The verb rendered "see to it" (GK 2174) is an unusual one. It conveys the idea of oversight (the verb is connected with the noun we translate as "overseer"). In this context the thought is that believers must have care for one another. The writer speaks of three things in particular that the readers must avoid. (1) They must not come short of God's grace. Paul could speak of receiving God's grace in vain (2Co 6:1) and of falling from grace (Gal 5:4). Something like this is intended here. God is not niggardly in offering grace. Accordingly, it is important for people not to fail to make use of their opportunities.

(2) They must guard against the springing up of a "bitter root." This is a root that bears bitter fruit, a metaphor taken from the growth of plants. Such growth is slow, but what is in the plant will surely come out in time. So it is possible for a seed of bitterness to be sown in a community and, though nothing is immediately apparent, in due time the fruit will appear. It will certainly "cause trouble" and possibly poison a whole community. "Defile" (GK 3620) often refers to ceremonial defilement (Jn 18:28), but it is also used of moral defilement. Bitterness defiles people and makes them unfit to stand before God.

16–17 (3) The final warning begins with a reference to the "sexually immoral" (GK 4521), a warning that occurs frequently in Scripture. With this is coupled the warning not to be "godless" ("unhallowed" or "profane"; GK 1013) like Esau. Esau was not spiritually minded but rather taken up with the things of the here and now. This is apparent in the incident referred to, when Esau for a single meal bargained away "his inheritance rights as the oldest son" (cf. Ge 25:29–34). He could not recognize its true value. His insistence on the gratification of his immediate needs led him to overlook what was of infinitely greater worth, his rights as the firstborn. So with the apostates.

Continuing his reflection on Esau, the author appeals to knowledge common to his readers and himself. Nothing is known about Esau's change of mind other than what we read here. It appears that in due course Esau came to realize he had made a mistake. He wanted to go back but found he could not. There is often a finality about what we do. This is not a question of forgiveness. God's forgiveness is always open to the penitent. Esau could have come back to God. But he could not undo his act.

D. Mount Sinai and Mount Zion (12:18–24)

The writer proceeds to contrast the Jewish and Christian ways by contrasting the terrors associated with the giving of the law on Mount Sinai with the joys and the glory associated with Mount Zion. He sounds the note of warning that great privilege means great responsibility.

18–19 Though the word "mountain" is not in the original Greek, there is no doubt that the events on Sinai are in mind. The writer chooses to refer to what the mountain represented—the outward, the physical, and the material. The phenomena listed are all associated with the Sinai event (see Dt 4:11). Elsewhere they are linked with the presence of God: fire (Jdg 13:20; 1Ki 18:38), darkness (1Ki 8:12), and tempest (Na 1:3); the trumpet (v.19) is associated with the end time when God will manifest himself (Mt 24:31; 1Co 15:52; 1Th 4:16).

The trumpet is spoken of repeatedly in connection with Sinai (Ex 19:16, 19; 20:18), and on that occasion the people heard the voice of God (Dt 5:24). But the effect of it all was to terrify them, and they asked that they should hear God's voice no more (Ex 20:19; Dt 5:25–27). They were overcome with awe and wanted no further part in the wonderful events.

20 The fearfulness of the giving of the law on Sinai is brought out with reference to one of the commands laid on the people, namely, that neither humans nor animals should even touch the mountain under penalty of death (see Ex 19:13). The command that nothing touch it indicates the holiness and separateness of the mountain. Killing by stoning (or by arrows) was prescribed so that those taking part would not touch the mountain themselves.

21 This verse cites a further indication of the awesomeness of the experience at Mount Sinai. At the time of the giving of the law, Moses was the leader of the people. He was known as one who had an especially close relationship with God (Ex 33:11). Yet even he was terrified. The words quoted are not found in the Sinai narrative but do occur at the time of the golden calf (Dt 9:19). The author may have had access to a tradition that recorded these words on this occasion. Or he may be including Moses in the general fear spoken of in Ex 20:18. Or possibly he is taking words spoken on one occasion and applying them to another. At any rate, he is picturing an awe-inspiring occasion, one that affected all the people and terrified even Moses, the man of God.

22 "But" is a strong word that introduces a marked contrast. It is not a Sinai-type experience that has befallen Christians. They "have come" to Mount Zion. This is one of the hills on which the city of Jerusalem was built. It sometimes stands for that city (Mt 21:5) and stands here, of course, for that city as the home of God's people. It is also called "the heavenly Jerusalem" and "the city of the living God." Elsewhere in the NT there is the thought of the Jerusalem above (Gal 4:26, where again there is a contrast with Mount Sinai; cf. also Rev 3:12; 21:2, 10).

The author has already spoken of "the city with foundations, whose architect and builder is God" (11:10). He is bringing out the thought of the ideal, heavenly city. His mention of "the living God" (see comment on 3:12) emphasizes that this city is no static affair; it is the city of a vital, dynamic, living Being, one who is doing things. For angels at Sinai, see Dt 33:2; the heavenly city is certainly not deficient on this score.

The expression "joyful assembly" (GK 4108) most likely belongs with angels rather than with the next verse. The word meant originally a national festive assembly to honor a god, then more generally any festal assembly.

23 "The church [GK 1711] of the firstborn" is a difficult expression. Does it mean the angels just spoken of? They are not usually called a "church," but the word basically means "assembly" and so could be applied to angels. If it refers to people, it is not easy to see it as the church triumphant because that is the same as "the spirits of righteous men made perfect" at the end of the verse. Nor is it easier to see it of the church here and now, for (1) the readers would be included and would be "coming" to themselves, and (2) it would give a strange sequence—angels, the church on earth, God, the departed. Nor are angels normally described as having their "names . . . written in heaven," whereas there are references to the recording of the names of the saved (e.g., Lk 10:20; Rev 21:27). Perhaps the best solution is to see a reference to the whole communion of saints, the church on earth and in heaven. Believers not only come to it but into it. This would follow naturally on the reference to angels, after which there is the thought of God as Judge.

In the next part of the sentence, then, the author is concerned with the Judge (i.e., God), who has rewarded "the spirits of righteous men." It is unusual to have the departed referred to as "spirits." It is probably used here to give emphasis to the spiritual nature of the new order that the righteous find themselves in. There is a sense in which they are not made perfect without Christians (11:40). But there is also a sense in which they have been brought to the end for which they were made.

24 The climax is reached with the reference to Jesus, seen here as "the mediator of a new covenant" (see comment on 8:6). The covenant involves "sprinkled blood" (cf. 9:19–22), which reminds us of the cost of the covenant. The idea of blood speaking is not common, and there is undoubtedly a reference to Ge 4:10, where Abel's blood cried from the ground for vengeance on his killer. But Jesus' blood speaks "a better word" than that. His blood opens up for us a way into the Most Holy Place (10:19), whereas Abel's blood sought to shut out the wicked person.

E. A Kingdom That Cannot Be Shaken (12:25–29)

Earthly, material things (i.e., things that can be "shaken") will not last forever. By contrast, God's kingdom is unshakable, and the author uses the contrast as an exhortation to right conduct. He has made it plain that God will not trifle with wrongdoing. The persistent sinner can count on severe judgment. God will bring all things present to an end. Accordingly, the readers should serve him faithfully.

25 Several times in this letter Judaism and Christianity have been contrasted, and here the contrast concerns the way God speaks. Some feel there is a contrast between Moses and Christ. This may be so, but the basic contrast is between the way God spoke of old and the way he now speaks. Israel of old "refused" him, which means that in their manner of life they rejected what God said and failed to live up to what he commanded (cf. Dt 5:29). This warning was "on earth" because it was connected with the revelation at Sinai. If, then, the Israelites of old did not escape the consequences of their refusal of a voice on earth, the readers ought not to expect to escape far worse consequences if they "turn away from him who warns us from heaven" (cf. 2:2–4).

26 The solemnity of Sinai is recalled. Repeatedly we are told that then the earth shook (Ex 19:18; Jdg 5:4–5; Pss 68:8; 77:18; 114:4, 7). The writer has already spoken of the awe-inspiring nature of what happened when the law was given. Now the reference to the shaking of the earth brings it all back. At the same time it enables him to go on to speak of a promise that involved a further shaking, the one recorded in Hag 2:6. The prophet looked forward to something much grander than Sinai, a day when God would shake "not only the earth but also the heavens." The reference to heaven and earth may hint at the concept of the new heaven and the new earth (Isa 66:22). At any rate, it points to the decisive intervention that God will make at the last time.

27 The writer picks out the expression "once more" to point out the decisive significance of the things of which he is writing. There is an air of finality about it all. "The removing" (GK 3557) of what can be shaken will occur in the final day. This physical creation can be shaken, and it is set in contrast to what cannot be shaken—the things that really matter. The author does not go into detail about the precise nature of the ultimate rest. But whatever it may be, it will separate the things that last forever from those that do not. "So that" introduces a clause of purpose. It is God's will for this final differentiation to be made so that only what cannot be shaken will remain.

28 The "kingdom" is not a frequent subject in this letter (cf. 1:8; 11:33). This is in contrast to the Synoptic Gospels where the "kingdom" frequently occurs in the teaching of Jesus (see comment on Mk 1:15). But this passage shows that the author understood ultimate reality in terms of God's sovereignty, in contrast with earthly systems. They can be shaken and in due course will be shaken. Not so God's kingdom! The author does not simply say that it will not be shaken but that it cannot be shaken. The kingdom is something we "receive." It is not earned or created by believers; it is God's gift.

It is not quite certain how we should understand the expression "let us be thankful" (lit., "let us have grace [charis; GK 5921]"). Since elsewhere in this letter charis signifies "grace," this phrase more likely means, "Let us hold on to God's grace." The writer appears to be saying that we must appropriate the grace God offers and not let it go, because only by grace can we serve as we should. "Worship" (GK 3302) is a word that is used of service of various kinds. Whether the meaning is service in general or worship in particular, it must be done "with reverence and awe." The combination stresses the greatness of God and the lowly place his people should take in relation to him.

29 In an expression apparently taken from Dt 4:24, the writer emphasizes that God is not to be trifled with. We can be so taken up with the love and compassion of God that we overlook his implacable opposition to all evil. The wrath of God is not a popular subject today, but it looms large in biblical teaching. We overlook this wrath only at our peril.

F. Love (13:1–6)

The first twelve chapters of Hebrews form a closely knit argument. In ch. 13 we come to something of an appendix, dealing with a number of practical points. Christians are to be concerned for the needs of others. Christianity is faith in action and that means love at work. So the writer draws attention to something of what it means to live in love.

1 "Loving each other as brothers" (GK 5789) is a most important virtue in the NT. Those who are linked in the common bond of having been saved by the death of Jesus cannot but have warm feelings toward one another (cf. Ro 12:10; 1Th 4:9; 1Pe 1:22; 2Pe 1:7; see also Ps 133:1).

2 To brotherly love the author adds "entertaining strangers" (lit., "love of strangers"; GK 5810). Entertaining "angels without knowing it" reminds us of Abraham (Ge 18:1ff.) and Lot (Ge 19:1ff.). The writer is not advocating hospitality on the off chance that one might happen to receive an angel as guest but rather because God is pleased when believers are hospitable. Sometimes unexpectedly happy results follow acts of hospitality. Hospitality was highly esteemed in the ancient world, and it was certainly important for Christians. Accommodation at inns was expensive, and in many cases inns had a bad reputation. But as Christian preachers traveled around, believers gave them lodging and so facilitated their mission. Without that, the spread of the faith would have been much more difficult.

3 The writer turns his attention to prisoners. Guests may come unbidden, but prisoners must be actively sought out (see comment on 10:34). Some people withheld help from prisoners for fear of suffering a similar punishment. But Christians should have compassion on those in prison "as if you were their fellow prisoners." "If one part suffers, every part suffers with it," wrote Paul (1Co 12:26); there is something of the same thought here. Believers should feel so much for their friends in prison and for "those who are mistreated" that they become one with them. Compassion is an essential part of Christian living.

4 From love for the badly treated the author turns to love within the marriage bond. The opening expression implies an imperative: "Let marriage be held in honor." "By all" probably means "in all circumstances." Some ascetics held marriage in low esteem, but the author of Hebrews rejects this position.

"The marriage bed" is a euphemism for sexual intercourse. He considers the physical side of marriage important and "pure." Contrary to the views of some thinkers in the ancient world, there is nothing defiling about it. Over against honorable marriage he sets the "sexually immoral" (GK 4521) and the "adulterer" (GK 3659; a word used for a violation of the marriage bond).

All forms of sexual sin come under the judgment of God. This was a novel view to many in the first century. For them chastity was an unreasonable demand to make. It is one of the unrecognized miracles that Christians were able not only to make this demand but to make it stick. Sexual sinners are likely to go their way, careless of all others. But in the end they will be judged by none less than God.

5 Sins of impurity and "love of money" are linked elsewhere in the NT (e.g., 1Co 5:10–11; Eph 4:19; 5:3–5; 1Th 4:3–6). A covetous person pursues selfish aims, whether sexual or financial, without regard to the rights of others. So the writer warns against this sin and urges contentment with what one has. Covetousness is needless, for believers have the promise that God will never leave them nor forsake them. The origin of this quotation is not clear; the words do not correspond exactly to any OT passage, though there are several statements that are rather like it (e.g., Ge 28:15; Dt 31:6, 8; Jos 1:5; 1Ch 28:20; Isa 41:17). The words point to the complete reliability of God and his promises. God's people are secure no matter what comes, because he is with them.

6 Despondency is foreign to Christians. They can speak "with confidence" (GK 2509), i.e., with an attitude of courage and trust. "We" once more links the writer with his readers; he sees his lot as bound up with theirs. The quotation from Ps 118:6 has three points in this confidence. (1) The Lord is the psalmist's (and our) "helper." This carries on the argument of the previous verse, sharpening a little the thought of the assistance that the believer may count on. (2) There is the ringing declaration of confidence as the psalmist renounces fear. With the Helper at his side, there is no reason to "be afraid." (3) The rhetorical question underlies one's insignificance. The question is "What will man do to me?" not "What can man do to me?" The psalmist is not thinking theoretically but of what will happen. No one will succeed in anything he or she attempts to do against one who trusts in God.

G. Christian Leadership (13:7–8)

The concluding section of the letter contains a number of small, disconnected units. From love the writer passes to a few thoughts about Christian leaders. This is important, for there is not much in the NT about the way Christians should treat their leaders (there is more about how leaders should behave).

7 "Leaders" (GK 2451; cf. also vv.17, 24) is a general term, used of leaders of religious bodies as well as of princes, military commanders, etc. This makes it difficult to say precisely who these leaders were. They may have been "elders," but that word is not used of them and so we cannot be sure about this. They "spoke the word of God," so that one of their principal functions was preaching or teaching. The specific tense used may point to the original proclamation of the Gospel to these readers (cf. 2:3). "The word of God" is the totality of the Christian message, and the expression reminds the readers that this word is no human invention but one of divine origin.

The word translated "outcome" (GK 1676) may mean death, and thus it seems as though past leaders were in mind. They are held up as examples to be imitated; specifically, their faith is singled out. Faith is the important thing, and the readers were being tempted to unbelief in falling back from the Christian way. They should instead follow these good examples of faith.

8 In this profound and wonderfully succinct verse, the writer's thoughts turn again to Christ. Earthly leaders come and go, but one is always there. The full name "Jesus Christ" (cf. 10:10; 13:21) adds solemnity to this pronouncement. "Yesterday" refers not to Christ's preexistence or the Incarnation, but to the past as a whole; it is part of an expression taking up past, present, and future into an impressive statement of Christ's unchanging nature. The readers need not fear that Christ is different now or will ever be different from what he has been in the past. "Forever" takes the continuity as far into the future as it will go. No matter what ages lie ahead, Christ will be unchanged through them. Christian conduct is based on this certainty.

H. Christian Sacrifice (13:9–16)

The writer has put strong emphasis on the centrality of Christ's sacrifice and keeps this steadily in view as he approaches the end of his letter. He has some erroneous teaching in mind, but we cannot define it with precision. He and his readers both knew what it was; so there was no need for him to be specific. Whatever it was, the unchangeability of Christ should inspire them to refuse its curious diversities and novel teaching.

The writer again uses the ceremonies of the Day of Atonement as the basis for his argument. Some may have thought the Christian way impoverished, lacking the sacrifices that were central to religion in the ancient world. But Christians do have sacrifices—real ones, though they are spiritual and not material.

9 The writer warns against being carried away by "all kinds of strange teachings." Since this phrase points to a great variety of teaching, it is difficult to identify specifically what is in mind. "Strange" (GK 3828) means foreign to the Gospel. The readers should know better than to go after such teachings, for they have known the "grace" of God. The heart, as often, stands for the whole of the inner life; and this is sustained, not by anything material, such as food, but by grace. God is the source of a believer's strength as he or she lives out the Christian life.

Most religions of that day had food regulations, including the Jews; usually this meant that some foods were regarded as "unclean." So it seems likely that the author has in mind some sacrificial meal that the worshipers took to have beneficial effects. The author denies it. A Christian's real life is not sustained on the level of things to eat. It requires the grace of God.

10 Some see the "altar" as the communion table (from which Christians, but not others, eat). But this is an odd way of interpreting the passage in the light of the point just made. This would simply be substituting one material thing for another, and the whole argument would fall to the ground. Instead, the writer is saying that the cross is distinctive to the Christian way. It was on a cross that the Christian sacrifice was offered. Thus it may not properly be spoken of as an "altar." In a Christian context the sacrifice must be on the cross, as the author has made abundantly clear in a number of places. "Those who minister at the tabernacle" are Jewish worshipers in general. Such people have no rights in the altar of the cross; the crucified Savior means nothing to them. The writer is again pointing his readers to the privilege Christians have and warning them against losing it.

11–12 The author moves from the general idea of serving the altar to a specific example, one most likely taken from the Day of Atonement ceremonies. On that Day the high priest brought the blood of the victims into the Most Holy Place (Lev 16:14–15), but the bodies of the animals were totally burned outside the Israelite camp (Lev 16:27). "And so" introduces an inference. The Day of Atonement typologically foreshadowed the atoning work of Jesus. The author apparently is reasoning that because the type (the sacrificial victim in Lev 16) involved an activity "outside the camp," there will be an equivalent with the antitype (Jesus). But the parallel is not complete, because in the case of the sin offerings the animal was actually killed inside the camp and only the carcass disposed of outside the camp. The human name "Jesus" brings before us the picture of the Man, suffering for us. His suffering was not aimless but was designed "to make his people holy" (GK 39). This verb means "to set aside for God"; and it is applied both to things used for ritual purposes and to people who are thus taken out of the circle of the merely worldly and brought into the number of the people of God.

This process was effected "through his own blood." This expression puts some emphasis on the fact that Christ did not need an external victim (as did the high priests) but brought about the sanctification in question by the sacrifice of himself. "Blood" clearly signifies "death," as is commonly the case in the Bible. "People" can mean people in general; but more characteristically it means "the people of God," a meaning that suits this passage. To make people holy, then, Jesus suffered "outside the gate." Though not stated elsewhere in the NT, this is implied in Jn 19:17; and, anyway, crucifixions normally took place outside cities.

13 This leads to an appeal to the readers to "go to him outside the camp." Christ is outside the camp of Judaism, and the readers are encouraged to go to him where he is. To remain within the camp of Judaism would be to be separated from him. Here there may be an allusion to Moses' pitching "the tent of meeting" outside the camp and to the people's going out to it (Ex 33:7). But in the case of Christ, there was a price to pay—that of sharing in the rejection he had undergone, "bearing the disgrace he bore." In 11:26 Moses was said to have accepted "disgrace for the sake of Christ." To align oneself with Christ is to subject oneself to scorn, reproach, and perhaps more. But consistently throughout this letter the writer has argued that it is well worth it. The Jews held that the way Christ died proved him to be accursed (Dt 21:23; Gal 3:13). The readers must be ready to stand with Christ who bore that curse for them.

14 The writer reinforces his appeal to go to Jesus by reminding Christians that they have no stake in any earthly city, Jewish or otherwise. For people with such an outlook it is no great matter to be "outside the camp." As in 11:10 (see comments), the "city" stands for the highest and best in community life, the heavenly city; it is not to be found "here" on earth. No earthly city is "enduring." But Christians are looking for a city to come. People love to look for earthly security, but the best earthly security is insecure. The readers should pursue that which is really lasting and strive for the abiding city, letting go of any earthly one.

15 The verse begins with an emphatic "through him." It is through Jesus and not the Jewish priests (or any other priests) that people "offer" (GK 429) to God acceptable sacrifices. "Offer" is a technical word for the offering of sacrifices of animals and the like. The author uses it of the only sacrifices Christians offer—spiritual sacrifices (cf. Ro 12:1; Jas 1:27). So he urges them to offer "a sacrifice of praise," i.e., a sacrifice consisting of praise. This sacrifice is to be offered "continually." In systems like Judaism sacrifices were offered at set times, but for Christians praise goes up all the time. Since a loving God is working out his purposes all the time, there are no circumstances in which praise should not be offered (cf. 1Th 5:18). The sacrifice is further explained in an expression from Hos 14:2 (cf. Pr 18:20), "the fruit of lips that confess his name." In the light of the Cross, there is no room for sacrifices such as those the Jews offered. Now believers offer the sacrifice of praise and acknowledge Christ.

16 The writer gives two more examples of the sacrifices Christians offer. "To do good" (GK 2343) is a general term, while "to share with others" (GK 3126) is more specific. The latter signifies sharing with others such things as we have: money, goods, and, of course, those intangibles that make up "fellowship." Even though Christians had no animals to sacrifice, this did not mean they had nothing to offer. They had their sacrifices, and it is "with such sacrifices" that God is well pleased. Christ's suffering "outside the camp" has altered everything. Now God looks to people to take Christ's way. And that means they offer no animals but make their response to what Christ has done for them in praise, good deeds, and works of love and charity.

I. Christian Obedience (13:17)

The author is mindful of the responsibility of the Christian leaders to whom he has already referred (v.7). In due course they must give account to God for their flock. So he urges his readers to keep this in mind and not make things hard for their leaders.

17 The readers must obey their leaders. In v.7 the leaders were men who had died. Here, however, those alive and currently in positions of authority are meant. The reason for their submission is that the leaders "keep watch" (lit., "keep oneself awake"; GK 70). The imagery is of the leaders keeping awake at nights in their concern for their people. "Over you" translates "for your souls [GK 6034]." This word may be simply a periphrasis for "you," but it seems preferable to see it as a reference to one's spiritual life and spiritual well-being. The leaders are concerned for the deep needs of their people, not simply for what lies on the surface, because they must render "account." The writer pleads with the readers to act in such a way that keeping watch will be a thing of joy for the leaders (cf. Php 2:16; 1Th 2:20; 3Jn 4). The alternative is for them to do it as "a burden" (lit., "with groaning"; GK 5100), which would be "of no advantage" for the readers.

J. Prayer (13:18–19)

A short appeal for prayer reveals both the writer's conviction that prayer is a powerful force and his hope that he will soon see his correspondents again.

18 The imperative "Pray" (GK 4667) implies a continuous activity, one that they had already been doing. "Keep praying for us" is its force. It seems that the plural "us" is an epistolary plural, meaning "me" (cf. 5:11; 6:9, 11).

The writer has rebuked his readers from time to time; he has warned them of the dangers in their conduct and exhorted them. But he depends on them, too, and looks to them now to support him with their prayers. At the same time there is a problem arising from the way he puts his request. He says (literal translation), "Pray for us, for we are persuaded that we have a good conscience." Having a good conscience is a most unusual reason for requesting prayer. We could understand it if the writer spoke of his difficulties or the like. Lacking knowledge of the circumstances, we cannot be sure why he phrases it this way. Perhaps the readers have been accusing the writer of some fault. They may have attributed his absence from them to unworthy motives. The writer protests that he has a clear conscience and that this is a reason for asking for their fellowship in prayer.

The writer himself is not aware of having committed any sin. He goes on to affirm his determination ("desire" is too weak a translation for GK 2527) "to live honorably in every way." He allows no exceptions but expresses wholeheartedness.

19 The author underlines the importance of the readers' doing as he asks. He "urges" (GK 4151) them "strongly" or "more abundantly" (NIV "particularly"; GK 4359). It seems as though he had at one time been a leader in the group, for he desired to "be restored" to them. What was preventing him from this restoration is not said, but evidently the obstacle was considerable. Some have suggested that he had been imprisoned for his faith. We know too little of the circumstances to rule this out, but there is nothing to indicate it. The language suggests that it was something outside the writer's control and that it needed a good deal of prayer.

X. Conclusion (13:20–25)

The writer has finished what he has to say. It remains for him only to round off his letter, and he does so with a magnificent doxology and a few greetings.

A. Doxology (13:20–21)

This doxology gathers up a number of the themes that have meant so much as the argument of the letter has unfolded: the blood, the eternal covenant, the lordship of Jesus, and the importance of doing his will. But it also introduces some things not yet dealt with. This is the only place in the letter, for example, where Jesus is seen as our Shepherd or where his resurrection is specifically referred to. The whole forms a superb doxology that has meant much to Christians throughout the centuries.

20 God is called "the God of peace" a number of times in the Pauline writings (Ro 15:33; 16:20; 2Co 13:11; Php 4:9; 1Th 5:23). "Peace" (GK 1645) connotes the fullest prosperity of the whole man, taking up as it does the OT concept of the Hebrew shalom (GK 8934; see comments on 7:2). Here it reminds us that all our prosperity is centered in God and that a well-rounded life depends on him. The expression is especially suitable in view of what the letter discloses of the condition of the readers. They have had to cope with some form of persecution and were still not free from opposition. They were tempted to leave Christianity and have had to be warned of the dangers of apostasy. They may have had doubts about who their true leaders were. It is well for them to be reminded that real peace is in God.

The doxology goes on to characterize God in terms of the Resurrection. In the NT, Jesus is occasionally said to have risen. It is, however, much more common in the NT for the Resurrection to be ascribed to God, as here. The one whom God brought up from the dead is now described as "the great Shepherd of the sheep" (see Isa 63:11; Jn 10:1–18; 1Pe 2:25; cf. also Mt 26:31; Mk 14:27). It is a piece of imagery that stresses the care of our Lord for his own, for sheep are helpless without their shepherd. But an aspect we in modern times sometimes miss is that the shepherd has absolute sovereignty over his flock (cf. Rev 2:27; 12:5; 19:15; in each case the verb rendered "rule" in NIV means "to shepherd"). The adjective "great" (GK 3489) is used because Christ is not to be ranked with other shepherds. He stands out.

The Resurrection is linked with "the blood of the eternal covenant" (cf. Isa 55:3; Zec 9:11). It is interesting to see how the thought of covenant, one of the major themes of this letter, persists to the end. "Eternal" again brings out the point that this covenant will never be replaced by another as it replaced the old covenant. And it was established by "blood." The author never forgets that. For him the death of Jesus is central. At the same time, his linking it with the Resurrection shows that he did not have in mind a dead Christ but one who, though he shed his blood to establish the covenant, lives forever. The expression "our Lord Jesus" is unusual outside of Acts, where it occurs a number of times. It combines the lordship of Christ and his real humanity, two themes of continuing importance.

21 The prayer is that God will "equip" (GK 2936) the readers "with everything good for doing his will." "Equip" in this context means to supply one with what one needs to live the Christian life. "Everything good" is comprehensive; the writer wants nothing to be lacking. Notice the emphasis on doing the will of God, a thought we have had before in this letter.

It is also interesting to notice the juxtaposition of "doing his will" and "may he work in us." From one point of view any deed is the deed of a human being, but from another it is God working in and through his servant. We should not overlook the significance of the word "us," by which the writer again links himself with his readers. He looks for God to do his perfect work in them and in him alike. He needs the grace of God as much as they do. He wants God to do in us "what is pleasing [GK 2298] to him," a word that usually refers to people being acceptable to God. We can do what is acceptable only through Jesus Christ.

Whether "to whom" refers to the Father or to Christ poses a problem. Grammatically it could be either, and a good case can be made for either. Perhaps the writer himself was not making a sharp distinction.

The doxology concludes with "for ever and ever. Amen." It is curious that doxologies should include "Amen," as this one does, for the word was normally the response of a congregation. Perhaps initially a doxology was spoken by the leader of a congregation, and the people responded with their "Amen." In time the response was added to the doxology as being the normal thing. In any case, the "Amen" makes a satisfying close.

B. Final Exhortations (13:22–25)

The author now rounds off the whole letter with a final appeal and a brief section of greetings. The greetings show that the letter was being sent to a definite, known group of Christians with whom the author had ties.

22 "I urge" (GK 4151) seems to mean something more like "I beg you." There is appeal in it, but also encouragement. The letter has had its share of rebukes and warnings, and the writer now softens the impact a little with this appeal and with the affectionate address "Brothers." He calls his letter the "word of exhortation" (cf. Ac 13:15, where this phrase clearly means a homily). So the point here may be that this letter is rather like a written sermon with lots of "exhortation" (GK 4155).

The author goes on to say that he has written only briefly. This letter is short, considering the subject matter. Some of the subjects could have been dealt with at much greater length (cf. 11:32). There has been some straight speaking. So before he finishes, the writer adds this brief section inviting the readers to take it in the right spirit.

23 The writer is giving new information in this verse. Timothy is no doubt the companion of Paul (no other Timothy is known to us from those times), and he seems to have had some ties with both the readers and the writer. Otherwise we would expect a general expression instead of "our brother Timothy." It is not clear what "released" (GK 668) means, for the word can refer to starting off on a journey (as in Ac 13:3; 28:25) or making other beginnings. It is possible that Timothy started on a journey or he had been released from some obligation. But it seems most likely that the term, used absolutely as it is here, means that he had been released from imprisonment. All that we can say for certain is that Timothy had left the place where he was. The writer now expects Timothy to come to where he is and hopes that then the two of them can go on to visit the readers. But evidently he intends moving fairly soon, whether or not Timothy comes.

24 For the third time in this chapter, the "leaders" come to our attention (see comment on v.7). That they are to be greeted by the recipients of the letter makes it clear that they were not the recipients and, furthermore, that the letter was not sent to the whole church. That greetings were to be sent shows that the recipients were on good terms with the leaders. The words "and all" may be significant—namely, there are no exceptions. "God's people" (lit., "the saints"; GK 41) means those consecrated to God, set apart to do him service. The greeting from "those from Italy" can mean either Italians living abroad (cf. Ac 21:27) or living in their own country (cf. Ac 10:23).

25 The NT letters normally end with a prayer for "grace" for the recipients. Grace is a fitting note on which to end a letter like this one, so full of what God has done for people in Christ. The author then closes by praying sfor God's grace for all his friends. He omits no one from his concern or from God's.

The Old Testament in the New

NT Text	OT Text	Subject
Heb 1:5	Ps 2:7	You are my Son
Heb 1:5	2Sa 7:14; 1Ch 17:13	Father and son
Heb 1:6	Dt 32:43	Rejoice, O nations
Heb 1:7	Ps 104:4	Angels and winds
Heb 1:8	Ps 45:6–7	God's eternal throne
Heb 1:10–12	Ps 102:25–27	The unchangeable God
Heb 1:13	Ps 110:1	At God's right hand
Heb 2:6–8	Ps 8:4–6	Lower than the angels
Heb 2:12	Ps 22:22	Declaring God's name
Heb 2:13	Isa 8:17	Trust in God
Heb 2:13	Isa 8:18	God's children
Heb 3:2, 5	Nu 12:7	Faithful Moses
Heb 3:7–11, 15	Ps 95:7–11	No rest for the wicked
Heb 4:3, 5, 7	Ps 95:7–11	No rest for the wicked
Heb 4:4	Ge 2:2	God rested the seventh day
Heb 5:5	Ps 2:7	You are my Son
Heb 5:6	Ps 110:4	Melchizedek
Heb 6:14	Ge 22:17	God's oath to Abraham
Heb 7:17, 21	Ps 110:4	Melchizedek
Heb 8:5	Ex 25:40	Pattern of the tabernacle
Heb 8:8–12	Jer 31:31–34	The new covenant
Heb 9:20	Ex 24:8	The blood of the covenant
Heb 10:5–9	Ps 40:6–8	Offerings and obedience
Heb 10:16–17	Jer 31:33–34	The new covenant
Heb 10:28	Dt 17:6	Two or three witnesses
Heb 10:30	Dt 32:35	God avenges sins
Heb 10:30	Dt 32:36; Ps 135:14	God judges his people
Heb 10:37–38	Hab 2:3–4	Persevere in faith
Heb 11:18	Ge 21:12	God's choice of Isaac

The Old Testament in the New

NT Text	OT Text	Subject
Heb 12:5–6	Pr 3:11–12	Love and discipline
Heb 12:13	Pr 4:26	Level paths for your feet
Heb 12:15	Dt 29:18	No root of bitterness
Heb 12:20	Ex 19:12–13	Not touching the mountain
Heb 12:21	Dt 9:19	Moses' fear
Heb 12:26	Hag 2:6	One more shaking
Heb 12:29	Dt 4:24	God is a consuming fire
Heb 13:5	Dt 31:6	Faithfulness of God
Heb 13:6	Ps 118:6–7	The Lord is my helper

James

INTRODUCTION

1. Authorship

Even though this letter names its author, it does not specify his actual identity. James was a common name in the first century. There are in the NT four men called James. Of these, only two have ever been seriously suggested as possible authors of this letter. A few scholars have understood the writer to be James the son of Zebedee, one of the twelve apostles. Most scholars, however, have recognized that he was martyred too early (A.D. 44) to have written this letter (Ac 12:1–2).

Since at least the third century, the most prominent view has been that James, the Lord's brother (Mk 6:3), wrote the book. This was the belief of Origen (c. A.D. 185–253), Eusebius (c. 265–340), and Jerome (c. 340–420). The evidence of the letter itself favors this traditional view. The characteristics of this James as seen in Ac 21:11–25 and Gal 2:12, and the description of "James the Just" by Hegesippus, are in harmony with this letter's heavy emphasis on genuine religious practice and ethical conduct. The vocabulary of James's speech and letter in Ac 15:13–29 reveals significant similarity to this letter, and the authoritative tone of the letter (forty-six imperatives) agrees well with the authority exercised by James in Ac 15:13ff.; 21:18.

2. Date

If the Lord's brother is identified as author, the book must have originated prior to A.D. 62, when, according to Josephus, James was martyred. There are two general opinions as to when it was written. Some insist that the letter was written before A.D. 50; others argue for a date near the end of James's life, perhaps in the early sixties. If the earlier date is correct, James may have been the first NT book written.

Several considerations make it probable that James wrote between A.D. 45 and 50. (1) The Jewish orientation of the letter fits the earlier period more naturally than the later. That the author does not refer to Gentiles or related subjects may well point to the time in the history of the early church when Gentiles were only beginning to be reached with the Gospel. (2) The absence of any reference to the controversy concerning the Judaizers and their insistence on Gentile circumcision is best explained by the earlier date. (3) The close affinity of the teaching of James to that of the OT and Christ suggests a time before other NT letters were written. (4) The evidence of a simple church order favors the early date. The leaders are "teachers" (3:1) and "elders" (5:11). (5) Finally, the use of the Greek term synagoge (GK 5252; NIV, "meeting") to describe the church assembly or meeting place (2:2) points to the early period when Christianity was largely confined to Jewish circles.

3. Destination

The letter is addressed to "the twelve tribes scattered among the nations" (1:1). Although this is indefinite, it does reveal that the recipients were clearly Jewish. The description of their congregation or meeting place as a synagoge (2:2) also supports this interpretation. Moreover, the recipients were used to the Hebrew title "Lord Almighty" (5:4; lit., "Lord of hosts").

The author further limits his intended readership by statements that assume the recipients are Christians (see especially 2:1, where James assumes his readers are followers of Christ; see also 5:7–8, about the Lord's coming being near). It would seem, then, that the letter was addressed to Jewish believers in Jesus as Messiah.

The geographical location of these Jewish Christians is not specifically identified. They are merely described as "scattered among the nations" (1:1), which means they were not centered in one locality. Possibly they were the believers who were forced to leave Jerusalem during the persecution that followed Stephen's death. These Jewish Christians spread out over Judea and Samaria (Ac 8:1) and even as far as Phoenicia, Cyprus, and Syrian Antioch (Ac 11:19). James, the leading elder of the Jerusalem church, felt responsible for these former "parishioners" and attempted to instruct them somewhat as he would have done had they still been under his care in Jerusalem. The letter reveals his intimate knowledge of their circumstances and characteristics. And he writes with the note of authority expected of one who had been recognized as a spiritual leader in the Jerusalem church.

4. Occasion and Purpose

If we are correct that James wrote this letter to believers who had been dispersed from Jerusalem in the persecution following Stephen's death, the occasion for writing is fairly clear. These Jewish Christians no longer had contact with the apostles, nor was James among them to instruct and exhort them. Yet difficulties—perhaps persecutions—were confronting them (1:2–4); the ungodly rich were oppressing them (5:1–6); the religion of some was becoming a superficial formality (1:22–27; 2:14–26); discriminatory practices revealed a lack of love (2:1–13); and bitterness in speech (3:1–12) and attitude (3:13–4:3) marred their fellowship. Apparently reports of such problems among the scattered brothers had reached James in Jerusalem. In response, he wrote as pastor in absentia to urge his people to make the needed changes in their lives and in their corporate relationships.

5. Canonicity

The letter was not readily received into the collection of writings considered as authoritative Scripture. It was rejected by some as late as the time of Eusebius (c. 265–340). Few early Christian writers refer to it.

Such negative evidence could be taken as a basis for doubting the authority of the book, were it not that, after a period of questioning, the churches finally granted unanimous recognition to it as canonical. Furthermore, there are reasonable explanations for the late acceptance of the letter. Eusebius himself explained that denials of the book's canonicity came not because of any fault in the book itself, but merely because it had not been widely used. There are reasons why this condition existed, such as its untheological nature, its brevity, the question of James's identity, the fact that it was not written by one of the twelve apostles, and its general address (sent to no specific person or church).

In due time, such authorities as Eusebius and Jerome (c. 340–420) placed their stamp of approval on the book, and the Council of Carthage (397) recognized its canonicity. Ultimately, churches everywhere were reading it as authoritative Scripture.

6. Relation to Other Writings

Many attempts have been made to trace a connection between the letter of James and numerous biblical and extrabiblical writings. In two areas the literary relationships seem relatively well defined and significant. The similarity between this letter and the teachings of Jesus in the Sermon on the Mount has often been noted. A clear example of this almost verbal connection is seen between Jas 5:12 and the words of Jesus recorded in Mt 5:34–37. Other related statements include Jas 2:5 (Lk 6:20), Jas 3:10–12 (Mt 7:16–20), and Jas 3:18 (Mt 5:9). From such parallels we may conclude that James reflects the thoughts and often the very words of Christ.

Another possible literary relationship is between James and OT wisdom writings such as Proverbs. While this letter was not written in the same style as Proverbs, the two do have noteworthy affinities. For example, the pithy, proverbial style of James should be noted (1:8, 22; 4:17), as well as the juxtaposition of good and evil (3:13–18). Also, James's use of the word "wisdom" is significant (see 1:5; 3:13–17). The book of Proverbs abounds with references to wisdom, always viewing it as the kind of understanding that produces a sensible and an upright life. In Proverbs, as in James, wisdom has its source in God. James even quotes from Proverbs (see Jas 4:6 and Pr 3:34) and also alludes to it (cf. Jas 1:5 with Pr 2:6; 1:19 with Pr 29:20; 3:18 with Pr 11:30; 4:13–16 with Pr 27:1; 5:20 with Pr 10:12).

7. Theological Values

The letter of James is one of the least theological NT books. In fact, one of the reasons for the delay in canonical recognition of the letter was its lack of theological content. Having recognized this, however, one must hasten to insist that the book is not without theological value. The practical emphases of James rest on a solid theological foundation,

James and the Sayings of Jesus

James shows a remarkable familiarity with the words spoken by Jesus in the gospels, especially in the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5–7). This chart depicts the many parallels between James and Jesus that scholars have noted—both parallels in words and in themes.

Theme	James	Gospels
Joy in persecution	1:2	Mt 5:11–12; Lk 6:22–23
A person's goal of being perfect and mature	1:4	Mt 5:48
Asking and receiving from God	1:5	Mt 7:7; Lk 11:19
Asking in faith and not doubting	1:6	Mt 21:21–22; Mk 11:22–24
Reversal of proud and humble	1:9–10; 4:6, 10	Mt 23:12; Lk 14:11; 18:14
Sun scorching plants and they wither	1:11	Mt 13:6; Mk 4:7
Blessings for perseverance under trial	1:12	Mt 5:11–12
God as the giver of gifts	1:17	Mt 7:11; Lk 11:13
Not only listen to, but do the Word of God	1:22; 2:14, 17	Mt 7:21–27; Lk 6:46–49
Compassion for those who are needy and hurting	1:27; 2:15	Mt 25:34–36
The poor to inherit the kingdom	2:5	Mt 5:3; Lk 6:20
"Love your neighbor as yourself"	2:8	Mt 22:39; Mk 12:31
Not breaking the least commandment	2:10	Mt 5:19
Judgment on those who show no mercy	2:13	Mt 18:23–34; 25:41–46
Through obedience becoming friends of God	2:23	Jn 15:13–15
Teachers judged more strictly	3:1	Mk 9:38, 40; Lk 20:45, 47
We are judged by what we say	3:2	Mt 12:37
What corrupts is what comes out of our mouths	3:6	Mt 15:11, 18; Mk 7:15, 20; Lk 6:45
Same source cannot produce good and evil	3:11–12	Mt 7:16–18; Lk 6:43–44
Peacemakers blessed by God	3:18	Mt 5:9
A (spiritually) adulterous people	4:4	Mt 12:39; Mk 8:38
Friendship with the world means enmity with God (or vice versa)	4:4	Jn 15:18–21
Laughter to be turned into mourning	4:6	Lk 6:25
Not judging others	4:11–12; 5:9	Mt 7:1–2
God can both save and destroy	4:12	Mt 10:28
Foolishness of planning the future apart from God	4:13–14	Lk 12:18–20
Punishment for those who know God's will but refuse to do it	4:17	Lk 12:47
Woe to the rich	5:1	Lk 6:24
Wealth removed by moth and corrosion	5:2–3	Mt 6:19–20
Self-indulgence with no concern for the poor	5:5	Lk 16:19–20, 25
Returning Judge is at the door	5:9	Mt 24:33; Mk 13:39
Persecution of prophets	5:10	Mt 5:10–12
Do not swear oaths	5:12	Mt 5:33–37
Restoring an erring brother or sister	5:19–29	Mt 18:15

which is often explicitly revealed and perhaps more often assumed or implied.

Three doctrines often surface. (1) The most prominent one is the doctrine of God. He is seen as being generous (1:5) and holy (1:13), the unchanging source of good (1:17). He is the one and only God (2:19), the Father of his people and the one in whose likeness people were created (3:9). Furthermore he is sovereign (4:15) and just (5:4), filled with pity and tender mercy (5:11).

(2) In keeping with the ethical nature of the letter is the repeated stress on the doctrine of sin. James views sin as universal (3:2), indwelling all persons (1:14–15) and resulting in death (1:15). It expresses itself in anger (1:20), moral filth (1:21), blasphemy (2:7), discrimination (2:9–11), bitterness and lust (4:1–3), intimate ties with the evil world (4:4), pride (4:6), and theft and oppression (5:4).

(3) The third prominent theological theme is eschatology. James sees the end time as the day of rewards (1:12), when God's kingdom will be introduced (2:5), the day of judgment will come (2:12; 3:1), and the Lord will return (5:7–8).

Several other doctrines receive limited mention: Christ as Lord (1:1; 2:1); regeneration (1:18); salvation (1:21); justification (2:21–25); and forgiveness of sins (5:15). James discusses the relation of saving faith and resultant good deeds (2:14–26).

EXPOSITION

I. Salutation (1:1)

1 James is most likely the brother of Jesus (see introduction). More specifically, since Jesus was virgin born, James was his half brother. In Acts this same James appears as the leader of the Jerusalem church (Ac 15:13ff.; 21:18). He describes himself as "a servant [GK 1528] of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ." This word designates a slave, the rightful property of one's master, though it does not necessarily carry the degrading connotation attached to the word today. James was proud to belong—body and soul—to God and to Jesus Christ.

The letter is addressed to "the twelve tribes," a designation intended to identify the readers as Jews. They were not residents of Palestine but were "scattered among the nations" as part of the Jewish Dispersion. James's later designation of his readers as "believers in our glorious Lord Jesus Christ" (2:1) makes it clear that he means Christian Jews. It is probable that the recipients were the members of the Jerusalem church who had been driven out of Jerusalem at the time of Stephen's martyrdom (Ac 8:1, 4; 11:19–20). If so, James had formerly been their spiritual leader and he was writing them with rightful spiritual authority and with full knowledge of their needs.

II. Trials and Temptations (1:2–18)

1. The Testing of Faith (1:2–12)

2 In vv.2–4 James explains that trials are a reason for rejoicing because of the wholesome effects they produce. The word "trials" (GK 4280) describes things that put a person to the test. They may be difficulties that come from without, such as persecution (see vv.2–4), or they may be inner moral tests, such as temptations to sin (see vv.13–18). An outward trial, rather than being a reason for unhappiness, can be a ground for "pure joy." And it is not merely the coming of a single trial that is described; James speaks of "trials of many kinds." "Face" (GK 4346) suggests that one is surrounded by people, objects, or circumstances that try one's faith.

3 Why can trials be considered grounds for genuine rejoicing? If a person has truth faith, those trials are capable of developing "perseverance" (GK 5705). This word denotes tenacity and stick-to-it-iveness. It is the quality that enables a person to stand on one's feet facing the storm. In struggling against difficulty and opposition, spiritual stamina is developed.

4 If perseverance is to "finish its work," faith must persist and not falter or give up. The goal in view is that believers "may be mature [GK 5455] and complete [GK 3908]." Perseverance in facing trials develops maturity of character and a balance of all the graces and strengths needed for the Christian life.

5 Verses 5–8 contain God's offer of help for those who are facing trials. The repetition of the word "lack" shows that James is still discussing the subject of trials. In v.4 he assures his readers that when perseverance has finished its work, the believer will lack none of the needed virtues and strengths. In v.5, however, James speaks of the period of testing before perseverance has completed its work. During such testing, if anyone lacks "wisdom" (GK 5053), he or she may have it by asking. People facing trials often do lack wisdom. What they need is not the speculative wisdom of a philosophical system, but the kind of wisdom that plays such a large part in the book of Proverbs (1:2–4; 2:10–15; 4:5–9). It is God-given understanding that enables a person to avoid the paths of wickedness and to live a life of righteousness. In this context wisdom is understanding the nature and purpose of trials and knowing how to meet them victoriously. Such wisdom is available to the one who will "ask God" for it, not once only, but repeatedly; the promise is that wisdom "will be given to him." It is God's practice to give "generously" and "without finding fault." He does not scold his children for asking or berate them for their deficiency.

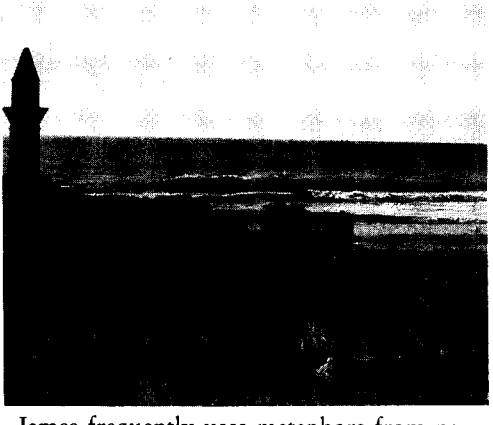
6 Although nothing in God prevents him from giving wisdom to his people, a barrier may exist in them. When they ask, they "must believe and not doubt." Their faith must be more than mere acceptance of a creed. To believe is to be confident that God will give what is requested. The extent of faith that God looks for is emphasized by the words "not doubt" (GK 1359). "Doubt" describes one who is divided in the mind and who wavers between two opinions. One moment he voices the yes of faith; the next moment it is the no of disbelief. Such an attitude is graphically illustrated by "a wave of the sea." Completely lacking in stability, it is "blown and tossed by the wind." First there is the crest, then the trough. Instead, prayer that moves God to respond must be marked by the constancy of unwavering faith.



The reference to the sea is the first of James's illustrations from nature (see also 1:10–11, 17–18, 26; 3:3–5, 7, 11–12; 5:7, 17–18. As Jesus drew numerous illustrations from life around him, so James revealed his love for nature by his repeated use of it for illustrative purposes.

7–8 "That man" is a somewhat derogatory reference to the doubter, whom James has just compared to the tossing wave. Here he is further characterized as "double-minded" (lit., "double-souled"; GK 1500). It is as though one soul declares, "I believe," and the other in turn shouts, "I don't!" This sort of instability is not only apparent when the person prays, it marks "all he does." In one's personal life, business life, social life, as well as spiritual life, indecisiveness negates all effectiveness. A person like this will not "receive anything from the Lord."

But one may wonder how this man is different from the anguished father who cried, "I do believe; help me overcome my unbelief!" (Mk 9:24). This father was not oscillating between belief and unbelief. He desired to believe—and even asserted his belief—but because he felt keenly the inadequacy of his faith, he asked for help in believing. He was not facing both directions at the same time like the "double-minded man" of Jas 1:8. In spite of his conscious weakness, he had set his heart to believe. And Christ responded to his faith and healed his son (Mk 9:25–27). In response to this kind of faith, God will give wisdom to those who ask for it and enable them to persevere in times of trial.

9 Verses 9–11 appear to continue the same subject (cf. the continuation of the subject of persevering "under trial" in v.12). Trials erase any superficial distinctions that one may think separates the rich brother from the poor one.

"Brother" (GK 81) shows that James is referring to a believer. To describe the "circumstances" of this brother, the author uses the word "humble" (GK 5424), which has the basic meaning of "lowly," "insignificant," or "poor." In view of the contrast with the James frequently uses metaphors from nature. These waves on the Mediterranean Sea (picture taken at Caesarea) remind him of the instability of a doubter (1:6).

"rich" in v.10, it is best to understand that the person in v.9 is one who is financially poor and thus "in humble circumstances." The "high position" in which such people are to take pride refers first of all to their position in Christ. In saving them, God lifts them up and gives them new dignity and worth. James also has in mind the privilege of "suffering disgrace for the Name [Jesus]" (Ac 5:41). To endure persecution for Christ's sake lifts believers to a position of honor that more than offsets their poverty.

10 The text does not explicitly state that "the one who is rich" is a believer, and for that reason some have insisted that he is unsaved. It would seem most natural, however, for James to omit the word "brother" in v.10 and assume that it would be carried over from v.9. The wealthy believer, then, is exhorted to glory "in his low position." Since the context deals with trials, the low position may describe the humbling experience of suffering persecution for Christ's sake. The very same treatment that exalts the poor and gives them a new sense of worth also humbles the rich. Suffering shows the rich that, instead of having a lasting lease on life on this earth, their lives are no more permanent than "a wild flower" (cf. Isa 40:6–8). Suffering and persecution reveal how tentative and short life really is.

11 The phenomenon James speaks of was a familiar one. Green grass and plants do not last long under the "scorching heat" of the Palestinian summer sun. More specifically, the reference may be to the sudden coming of a hot, searing wind known as the sirocco, which quickly withers and burns the vegetation. The withering of the plant and falling of its blossom are taken almost verbatim from Isa 40:7. It may be that the "beauty" of the blossom is suggestive of the fine clothes that the rich wear. As impressive and attractive as the garments may be, they soon fade and wear out. And, what is even more important, "the rich man" himself "will fade away, even while he goes about his business." Unexpectedly, in the midst of a busy life, the end comes. These are sobering thoughts that tend to reduce the rich to the level of human beings in general, just as the privilege of suffering for Christ lifts the poor person to a new plane of dignity and worth.

12 James concludes his discussion of the testing of faith with a promise of the reward to be given to the one who successfully stands the test. This verse is to be related to the preceding verses on the subject of trials (cf. the repetition of "trials" from v.2; "testing" and "perseverance" from v.3). The expression "Blessed is the man" reveals the author's familiarity with the language of the OT (cf. Pss 1:1; 32:2; 34:8; 84:12; Pr 8:34; Isa 56:2; Jer 17:7) and the beatitudes of Jesus (Mt 5:3–11). "Blessed" (GK 3421) speaks of the distinctive religious joy that is a benefit of salvation. This word describes the enviable state of the person who does not give up when confronted with trying circumstances but remains strong in faith and devotion to God. "Stood the test" suggests the process of successfully testing precious metals and coins and their consequent approval as genuine. Perseverance under trial results in approval, and approval results in "the crown [GK 5109] of life." Although "crown" may designate a kingly crown, it more often refers to the crown given to a victorious athlete—a wreath of laurel, oak, or even celery. For James, this word refers to the reward given to believers who are victorious in their struggles against trials. This life "that God has promised" is more than the eternal life given to every believer at the time of hisor her salvation (Jn 5:24). Since it is a reward for an accomplishment subsequent to initial faith, it must refer to a still higher quality of life.

2. The Source of Temptation (1:13–18)

No one should assume that enticement to sin comes from God (v.13a); James then proceeds to give a series of reasons for his assertion (vv.13b–18).

13–14 The word "temptation" here is the same as "trials" in v.2 (see comment on v.2); here, however, it obviously means temptation (see the words "evil" in v.13; "evil desire" in v.14; "sin" in v.15). Temptation does not come from God because God himself cannot be successfully tempted by evil. His omnipotent, holy will fully resists any invitation to sin. Furthermore, in him there is not the slightest moral depravity to which temptation may appeal. Therefore, it is inconsistent to think that God could be the author of temptation.

Instead, the source of temptation lies within a person. One is tempted "by his own evil desire." James personifies a person's sinful desire and identifies it, rather than some external person or object, as the efficient cause of temptation. By one's own sinful nature a person is "dragged away and enticed." James pictures a person's "evil desire," first, as attracting his attention and persuading him to approach the forbidden thing and, second, as luring him by means of bait to yield to the temptation.

15 James changes his figure from a snare to conception and birth to describe the experience of yielding to sin. The genealogy of evil desire is traced for three generations, as it were. First, temptation comes (v.14); then desire, like a human mother, conceives and "gives birth to sin." Then sin, the child of evil desire, develops till it "is full-grown" and ready to produce its own offspring. When it conceives, it "gives birth to death." James is not suggesting that only when sin has reached its full development does it result in death. The penalty of sin of any kind or extent is spiritual death. The details of the illustration must not be pressed too far; the author's intention is simply to trace the results of temptation when one yields to it.

16 "Don't be deceived" normally introduces a significant statement (see 1Co 6:9; 15:33; Gal 6:7; cf. also 1Jn 3:7). The author warns against being deceived into thinking that God is the author of temptation. In fact, the specific Greek construction used here may imply that the addressees have been engaging in the practice being prohibited. In that case James would be saying, "Stop being deceived."

17 Here follows the significant statement that the prohibition of the previous verse was intended to introduce. Instead of sending temptation, God is the giver of "every good and perfect gift." The concept of God's goodness rules out the possibility that he would send an influence as destructive as temptation. His gifts are marked by kindness and helpfulness, not destructiveness. They are "perfect" (GK 5455), which in this context excludes any possibility of moral evil as coming from God.

Here God is designated as "the Father of the heavenly lights'—presumably the stars and planets. "Father" probably has a twofold significance, pointing to God as the creator of the lights and to his continuing sovereignty over them.

Unlike the "shifting shadows" that are caused by the sun, moon, and stars, God "does not change." With him there is no variation at all. The shadows cast by the sun are minimal at noon, but just before sunset they stretch out for yards across the landscape. God is not like that. He does not change. He is always the giver of good gifts, never a sadistic being who would entice his creatures to destroy themselves in sin.

18 James advances his final reason for denying that God is the author of temptation. Rather than acting destructively, God acts constructively. "He chose to give us birth." Seeing that this birth is "through the word of truth" (i.e., through the Gospel), this birth must be spiritual rather than natural. God accomplishes this action by his own deliberate choice. His purpose in regeneration is "that we might be a kind of firstfruits." The figure the author has in mind is drawn from such OT passages as Ex 34:22 and Lev 23:10. "Firstfruits" refers to the first portion of the harvest given to God, a foretaste of that which was to come. So it was that the early Christians were a preliminary indication of the great host of people who through subsequent centuries would be born again.

III. The Practice of the Word (1:19–27)

Verses 19–21 may seem at first glance to be an isolated section of miscellaneous exhortations. Further examination, however, reveals significant links to the preceding and following contexts. The term "word" (GK 3364) is found in vv.18, 21–25 and refers to the Scriptures, the Word of God. Verse 18 indicates that regeneration comes through the instrumentality of the Word; v.21 contains a call to receive the Word; and vv.22–25 discuss the doing of the Word. Thus vv.19–21 emphasize listening to and receiving the Word, while vv.22–25 stress the doing of the Word.

19 In vv.19–21a, James is attempting to clear the way for the reception of God's truth (v.21b). He begins by calling for the readers' attention: "Take note of this." The reception of the Word demands a readiness "to listen" (GK 201). Reluctance at this point will block the acceptance of truth. It also demands restrained speech. A continual talker cannot hear what anyone else is saying and by the same token will not hear when God speaks. Finally, the restraint of anger is demanded, for anger closes the mind to God's truth. A fiercely argumentative attitude is not conducive to the humble reception of truth.

20 "For" indicates that this verse gives the reasoning that lies behind the last exhortation. One's anger does not produce "the righteous life that God desires." An angry attitude is not the atmosphere in which righteousness flourishes. James stresses this from the positive side when he later says, "Peacemakers who sow in peace raise a harvest of righteousness" (3:18).

21 In further preparation for the reception of the Word, one must "get rid of all moral filth." The word translated "get rid of" (GK 700) was primarily used of taking off garments (cf. Heb 12:1, which speaks of throwing off any excessive weight to make ready for the race of faith). The "moral filth and the evil" that are so abundant must be stripped off like dirty clothes in preparation for "accept[ing] the word." The reception of truth must of necessity be marked by humility or meekness (GK 4559). This is not to be construed as spineless weakness. Instead, it is the quality of a strong man that makes him docile and submissive rather than haughty and rebellious. Only in such a spirit can one fully receive God's truth. That the Word is described as "planted in you" suggests that the readers were believers who already possessed the truth. The phrase "which can save you" simply describes the truth as saving truth. James is not calling for an initial acceptance of that message, but for a full appropriation of the truth as the Christian grows in spiritual understanding.

22 The author next discusses putting the Word into practice. It is not enough merely to "listen to the word" or, by the same token, merely to read it. Those who congratulate themselves on being hearers of the truth are deceiving themselves. If they assume that this is all that is needed to earn them a position of special favor with God, they are sadly mistaken. In reality, the responsibility of those who hear is far greater than that of those who have never heard. If they do not combine doing with hearing, they put themselves in a most vulnerable position. The call to "do what it says" lies at the center of all that James teaches and sums up the whole book: Put into practice what you profess to believe.

23–24 The author proceeds to explain why people should do more than merely listen to the truth, using the illustration of a man who "looks at his face in a mirror." "Looks at" (GK 2917) means careful observation; the man carefully studies his face and becomes thoroughly familiar with its features. Those who listen to the Word do so attentively and at length, so that they understand what they hear. They know what God expects them to do. Any failure to respond cannot be blamed on lack of understanding.

James further explains that upon going away, the man "immediately forgets what he looks like." For him it is "out of sight, out of mind." This is, of course, ludicrous, but no less ludicrous are believers who listen carefully to God's truth and do not remember to put into practice what they have heard. Listening to truth is not an end in itself any more than gazing at one's face in a mirror is an end in itself. The purpose of listening to truth is to act upon it. Theoretical knowledge of spiritual truth is never commended in Scripture. Knowledge is inseparably tied to experience. Believers gain knowledge through experience, and such knowledge is intended to affect subsequent experience.

25 In contrast to those who listen to the Word but do not do what it says, James now describes one who both listens and puts into practice what has been heard. "He will be blessed in what he does." The reason for this blessing is fourfold. (1) He "looks intently" (GK 4160) into God's truth, a verb that described John's act of stooping and peering into the tomb of Jesus (Jn 20:5). Here it is as though a person stoops over the Scripture, zealously searching for its message. (2) "He continues to do this." He is the blessed man of Ps 1 who meditates on God's law day and night. (3) He does not forget "what he has heard." (4) Most important, he puts the truth into practice.

James's term "the perfect law of liberty" (literal translation) deserves special attention. The word "law" (GK 3795) reveals his Jewish orientation and that of his readers. But he qualifies this word to make sure that his readers do not misunderstand, describing it as "perfect" (GK 5455) and as characterized by "freedom" (GK 1800). It is not merely the OT law, nor is it the Mosaic law perverted to become a legalistic system for earning salvation by good works. When James calls it the "perfect law," he has in mind the sum total of God's revealed truth—not merely the preliminary portion found in the OT, but also the final revelation made through Christ and his apostles that was soon to be inscripturated in the NT. Thus it is complete, in contrast to that which is preliminary and preparatory. Furthermore, it is a law that does not enslave. Instead, it is freely accepted and fulfilled with glad devotion under the enablement of the Spirit of God (Gal 5:22–23; see Jas 2:8, 12 for more on this concept of law).

26 Verses 26–27 point out three specific areas where truth should be put into practice. (1) The first is speech. James introduces a hypothetical case. The person involved "considers himself religious" (GK 2580). This word describes a person who performs the external acts of religion, such as public worship, fasting, or giving to the needy, but he exerts no controlling restraint on his speech. Exactly how his speech offends is not indicated, whether it be by the cutting criticism of others, by uncleanness, by dishonesty, or by other ways. His uncontrolled tongue reveals that "his religion" is external sham. In living like this, "he deceives himself" (cf. v.22).

27 (2) The kind of "religion that God our Father accepts" is the kind that exerts a positive influence on one's life. This verse does not give us a definition of religion. Instead, it presents a concrete way of insisting that genuine religion is a life-changing force. One's religion should be more than external; it must spring from an inner spiritual reality that expresses itself in love to others and holiness before God. James then describes a specific example of love—the care of "orphans and widows." "Look after" (GK 2170) also appears in Mt 25:36, 43 with reference to visiting the sick; it is not merely making a social call, but caring deeply for their needs. This is "faith expressing itself through love" (Gal 5:6).

(3) One whose religion is genuine will also avoid "being polluted by the world." "World" (GK 3180) here describes the total system of evil that pervades every sphere of human existence and is set in opposition to God and to righteousness.

To summarize, vv.22–27 insist that a person's religion must consist of more than superficial acts. It is not enough to listen to the statement of spiritual truth (vv.22–25), nor is it sufficient to engage in formal religious activity (v.26). The person whose religious experience is genuine will put spiritual truth into practice, and one's life will be marked by love for others and holiness before God.

IV. The Condemnation of Partiality (2:1–13)

In 1:19–27 James has shown the importance of putting spiritual truth into practice. In each of the following sections he discusses at some length the application of the Word of truth to a specific aspect of life. In 2:1–13 he shows how partiality or discrimination violates the standard of God's truth.

1 James begins his discussion of partiality by a prohibition: "Don't show favoritism" (lit., "stop showing favoritism"). That the recipients of this letter were guilty of practicing discrimination is apparent from v.6. Partiality is inconsistent with faith "in our glorious Lord Jesus Christ." To say that practicing favoritism contradicts one's profession of faith is another way of saying that one's action does not measure up to the truth one professes to believe. The stress on Christ as "glorious" heightens the gross inconsistency of allowing favoritism and discrimination to be associated with faith in such an exalted person as Christ.

2 A hypothetical illustration follows: "Suppose a man comes into your meeting." The word translated "meeting" is synagoge (GK 5252), which had primary reference to the Jewish synagogue. The term need not be taken literally, however, as an indication that the Jewish Christians were still meeting in synagogue buildings. Even after leaving the synagogue, Jewish Christians no doubt continued to refer to their church meeting as a synagoge.

James pictures two men entering this early assembly. The first one is "wearing a gold ring and fine clothes"—the clothing of a rich person or a dignitary. In sharp contrast are the "shabby [lit., filthy; GK 4865] clothes" of the "poor man" (GK 4777). Inasmuch as this poor man is in reality a beggar, it seems most natural that his clothes should be described as filthy.

3 The rich man is shown "special attention" (GK 2098), a word that means "to look with favor on" someone and so to give assistance (cf. its use in Lk 9:38). This rich man is the object of solicitous attention as he is shown to "a good seat." In contrast, "the poor man" is abruptly told to "stand there," perhaps in the back of the assembly or in some other out-of-the-way place; his other alternative is to "sit on the floor by my feet" (lit., "sit by my footstool"). The contrast between the speaker who has a stool for his feet and the beggar who must sit on the floor heightens the discrimination.

4 The expressed condemnation of this practice is put in question form, but in a question that expects the readers to agree with the conclusion: "Have you not discriminated?" The practice illustrated in vv.2–3 rests on an unjustified distinction. The basis for showing favor is wrong. Those acting in this way "become judges with evil thoughts." Here the play on words in the Greek is not apparent in the English translation. The word translated "discriminated" (GK 1359) is built on the same root as the word for "judges" (GK 3216). In so judging between people, the readers had become unjust judges.

5 Verses 5–11 advance two arguments against the practice of favoritism. The first may be called the social argument (vv.5–7). The importance the author attaches to these arguments is seen in the imperative "Listen, my dear brothers." The early church was not drawn from the wealthy or ruling classes. It was largely made up of poorer people, those who were "poor in the eyes of the world" (cf. Mt 11:5; 1Co 1:26–29). By saying that the believers' poverty is poverty "in the eyes of the world," James suggests that they are not really poor. They are "rich in faith" and heirs of the kingdom. The aspect of the kingdom James has in mind is future. It is the eternal kingdom that Christ equated with eternal life (Mt 25:34, 46). The social snobbery of the world is short-sighted and superficial. And the favoritism James's readers practiced was based on this same shallow kind of evaluation.

James's concept of the blessed poor may be misunderstood. He does not say that all poor people are "rich in faith," nor does he exclude the rich from the ranks of the saved. Furthermore, God's choice of the poor must not be taken as based on any merit inherent in poverty. One reason God "has chosen those who are poor" may be seen in the account of the rich young ruler (Mk 10:17–27). There Jesus indicated that those who have riches find it exceedingly difficult to enter God's kingdom (vv.23–25), apparently because their wealth stands in the way. God blesses those who willingly recognize their spiritual bankruptcy (Mt 5:3). A second reason why God chooses the poor is explicitly stated in 1Co 1:26–29. God selects those who have nothing or are nothing in themselves "so that no one may boast before him" (v.29).

6–7 In sharp contrast to God's choice of the poor (v.5) is the way James's readers had treated them. God had chosen them, but they had "insulted" them! The incongruity of such treatment is dramatized by three pointed questions. (1) The rich are the ones "who are exploiting you" (GK 2872), are they not? "Exploiting" is a strong term describing the brutal and tyrannical deprivation of one's rights (cf. its use in the LXX of Eze 22:29; Zec 7:10).

(2) Is it not the rich "who are dragging you into court?" The picture presented here is the act of forcibly dragging a person before a court of law (cf. Ac 16:19; 21:30)—perhaps being literally done by the rich themselves.

(3) The rich "are slandering [lit., blaspheming; GK 1059] the noble name" of Christ, aren't they? They are speaking irreverently and disrespectfully of Deity. Christ's name is described as "noble," "excellent," or "honorable" (GK 2819), a word that refers to what is kind or morally good. This "noble name" is the name of "him to whom you belong" (lit., "the noble name that was called upon you"). This expression clearly reveals its OT background (Dt 28:10; 2Ch 7:14; Am 9:12). A person was dedicated to God by calling God's name over him or her. That act indicated that the individual belonged to God. So Christians bear the worthy name of Christ as indication that they are his people. To show favoritism to those who blaspheme that wonderful name is the greatest incongruity of all.

8 James now proceeds to his moral argument in refutation of the practice of showing favoritism (vv.8–11). Here it is not a question of mere incongruity but of the rightness or wrongness of showing partiality. The commandment to love one's neighbor as oneself (Lev 19:18) is not described as the "royal" (GK 997) law simply because of its lofty character. Rather, it is because it is the supreme law to which all other laws governing human relationships are subordinate. It is the summation of all such laws (Mt 22:36–40). The one who keeps this supreme law is "doing right." The right course of action is to show favor to everyone, whether one is rich or poor. Love overlooks such superficial distinctions as wealth and quality of clothing. It shows kindness to a person in spite of any distasteful qualities he or she may have.

9 Whereas v.8 depicts the positive example of one who fully keeps the law, v.9 sets forth the negative example of one who breaks it. To "show favoritism" is not merely to be guilty of an insignificant fault or social impropriety; it is "sin." Such a conclusion is based on solid legal ground rather than general human opinion. Those engaging in partiality "are convicted by the law as lawbreakers." Having just cited the "royal law" in v.8, James says that anyone who shows favoritism breaks the supreme law of love for one's neighbor, the law that comprehends all laws governing one's relationships to one's fellow human beings.

10 "For" indicates that James is going to explain how an act of favoritism makes a person a "lawbreaker" (v.9). It is obvious that he has set up a hypothetical case when he speaks of someone who "keeps the whole law" except for "one point," for in 3:2 he insists that "we all stumble in many ways." However, for the sake of his argument, he imagines a person who "stumbles" (GK 4760) or sins at just one point. His reasoning is that to break one commandment makes a person "guilty of breaking" the whole law.

11 This verse also opens with "for," showing that the author is continuing his explanation. He does so with a simple illustration based on the unity of law. Although God's law has many facets, it is essentially one, being the expression of the character and will of God himself. To violate the law at any one point is not to violate one commandment only; it is to violate the will of God and to contradict the character of God. The same God who said, "Do not commit adultery," also said "Do not murder." It is also the same God who gave the royal law of love for one's neighbor. The person who breaks just one of these laws has "become a lawbreaker." Although only one commandment is broken, the entire law of God has been flouted. When viewed like this, an act of favoritism is far from insignificant.

12 The section (2:1–13) concludes with an urgent exhortation and a warning (vv.12–13). The commands "Speak and act" are stronger in the Greek text than in the English. Literally, James says, "So speak and so act." The double "so" serves to distribute the emphasis equally between the two verbs. James would have his readers continue to speak and act in light of the fact that they "are going to be judged." Since he is speaking to believers, the judgment to which he refers must be their judgment at "the judgment seat of Christ" (2Co 5:10). The standard of judgment will be "the law that gives freedom," not the enslaving legalistic system developed by some of the scribes and Pharisees. It is the royal law of love (v.8), which the believer is enabled to keep by the Holy Spirit (Gal 5:22–23).

13 The reason for responding to the exhortation of v.12 is that "judgment without mercy" will be the lot of the unmerciful. No doubt "mercy" is singled out because James has the poor man of v.2 in mind. Instead of the mercy the man needed, he received cruel discrimination—and that at the hands of professing Christians. The basic principle that underlies v.12a was stated by Christ himself in Mt 18:33: The recipient of mercy should likewise be merciful. Mercy should be the mark of the regenerated person. If it is present in the believer's life, he or she will have nothing to fear at the judgment. It is in this sense that "mercy triumphs over judgment." The believer will be able to smile triumphantly in the time of judgment (cf. also 1Jn 4:17).

V. The Relation of Faith and Action (2:14–26)

This section has sometimes been misunderstood as conflicting with Paul's doctrine of justification by faith alone. No less a scholar than Martin Luther thought he saw an inconsistency between the teachings of James and Paul. However, careful study reveals that there is no disagreement between a Pauline statement like Eph 2:8–10 and the declaration of Jas 2:24.

The passage at hand (2:14–26) divides itself into three sections: the proposition (vv.16–17); the argument (vv.18–25); and the concluding statement (v.26). Here the author makes another application of the bedrock principle set forth in 1:19–27, that hearing must be accompanied by doing. This letter leaves no place for a religion that is mere mental acceptance of truth.

14 James first states his proposition in two questions, both of which declare that faith not accompanied by good deeds is of no saving value. The two questions set up the hypothetical case of a person who "claims to have" genuine saving faith. James does not say that the person actually has faith. The question "Can such faith save him?" is so structured in the Greek text that it expects a negative answer: "This faith [i.e., faith not accompanied by deeds] can't save him, can it?" Faith that saves requires faith that proves itself in the deeds it produces. These deeds do not earn merit before God; rather, genuine faith is a concomitant of regeneration and therefore affects the believer's behavior. Faith that does not issue in regenerate actions is superficial and spurious.

15–16 The proposition is now illustrated by a supposition bordering on the ludicrous. It is the case of a fellow-believer who is in dire need of clothes and food. The statement "Go, I wish you well" is a modern idiom used to represent James's "Go in peace" (a standard Hebrew farewell). The translation "keep warm and well fed" may be somewhat misleading in suggesting that the person is already warm and fed, which is not the case. The form of these two verbs either suggests that it is someone else's responsibility to clothe and feed the unfortunate person ("Be warmed and fed by someone else"), or it means, "Get yourself some warm clothes and some food," without defining the source. The preposterousness of such a command is no doubt intentional. "What good is it?" James asks. Its seeming concern for the welfare of the poor person is a worthless facade.

17 James states the proposition he intends to demonstrate in the following verses: "Faith . . . not accompanied by action is dead." Action is the proper fruit of living faith. Because life is dynamic and productive, faith that lives will surely produce the fruit of good deeds. Therefore, if no deeds are forthcoming, it is proof that the professed faith is dead. James does not deny that it is faith. He simply indicates that it is not the right kind of faith. It is not living faith, nor can it save.

18 James next proceeds to develop the argument in support of his proposition. His first point is that deeds are necessary to prove that a person has faith. The problem of identifying the persons referred to by the pronouns "you" and "I" is not easily resolved. Perhaps it is best to paraphrase the quotation as follows: "One person has faith; another has deeds." The statement then becomes an assertion that faith and works are not necessarily related to each other and that it is possible to have either one without the other. To this assertion James responds with a challenge: "Show me your faith without deeds." He implies that faith cannot be demonstrated apart from action. It is an attitude of the inner person, and it can only be seen as it influences the actions of the one who possesses it. Mere profession of faith proves nothing as to its reality. Hence James declares, "I will show you my faith by what I do."

19 The second argument offered in support of the proposition stated in v.17 concerns the nature of saving faith. All faithful Jews believed the creed known as the Shema found in Dt 6:4: "Hear, O Israel: The LORD our God, the LORD is one." James commends his Jewish Christian readers for believing "that there is one God." This is "good!" But such acceptance of a creed is not enough to save a person. To prove his point, James declares that "even demons believe" the Shema. They know that there is but one God, and as a result they "shudder" (GK 5857) from fear. That the demons are afraid of God is evidence that their belief is a thorough conviction. However, their response is also evidence that their faith is not saving faith. Their belief has not brought them peace with God. Saving faith, then, is not mere intellectual acceptance of a theological proposition. It goes much deeper, involving one's whole inner being and expressing itself outwardly in a changed life.

20 James introduces the next argument in support of his proposition (v.17) with the question "Do you want evidence?" His manner of addressing his imagined opponent is blunt. The Greek adjective translated "foolish" (GK 3031) means "empty." It refers to a deficiency that is intellectual, but in the theological and moral context of the NT the term also has a moral and spiritual flavor. So James addresses his opponent as one who has no comprehension of spiritual truth, one who does not see "that faith without deeds is useless [GK 734]." In v.1, such faith is called "dead"; here it is described as something that does not work. The evidence he offers his opponent is found in vv.21–25 and consists of two OT examples—Abraham and Rahab.

21 The designation of Abraham as "our ancestor" (lit., "father"; GK 4252) agrees with evidence found elsewhere in the letter (e.g., 1:1) that James wrote for a Jewish readership. "Considered righteous" (GK 1467; can also be translated "justified") is a forensic term; it never refers to making a person subjectively righteous, but always describes the act of declaring a person righteous. To James, Abraham was declared righteous "for what he did." It was a pronouncement that found its source in Abraham's obedient offering of his son (Ge 22:1–14), as the following verses explain.

22 James now makes it clear that he is not talking about works as the sole source of Abraham's justification, as v.21 taken out of its context might lead one to believe. Instead, Abraham's "faith and his actions were working together." Faith and works are inseparable. It is not possible for one person to have valid faith without works and for another to have genuine works without faith, as James's opponent argued in v.18.

But this may sound as if Abraham's justification resulted from a mixture of faith and works, each being equally efficacious. If this is what James meant, he is in conflict with Paul, who insists that faith is the only means of justification. However, it is not necessary to take James's statement in this way. James, assuming that a person is justified by faith alone, declares that this justifying faith has a certain quality, a vitality that makes it the producer of good deeds. It is an action-producing faith, the same type of faith Paul described when he wrote about "faith expressing itself through love" (Gal 5:6). In this sense Abraham's faith was validated by his deeds. If there had been no good deeds following, faith would have been incomplete (v.22), dead (v.17), and useless (v.20). In this sense also Abraham was "considered righteous for what he did." If there had been no good deeds forthcoming, his faith would not have been genuine; and therefore it could not have been counted to him for righteousness.

23 "The scripture" that James considers "fulfilled" is Ge 15:6; the account of the offering of Isaac on the altar appears in Ge 22:1-14 (cf. v.21). Thirty years may have intervened between the events of these two chapters. In the former passage Abraham's faith was "credited to him as righteousness"; the obedient offering of Isaac in Ge 22 "fulfilled" that former statement. This should not be understood as the fulfillment of a prophecy. Rather, it is fulfillment in the sense of completion (cf. v.22). God's act of crediting Abraham with righteousness because of his faith was vindicated by his act of obedience in offering his son. James adds, as a parallel description of Abraham's standing with God, that "he was called God's friend" (see 2Ch 20:7; Isa 41:8). This is another way of saying that he was right with God. He acted as a friend of God should act and thus showed that he was in reality God's friend.

24 In this summary statement James assumes that a person is justified by faith but "not by faith alone." It is by faith and "by what he does." Taken by itself, this declaration may seem blatantly contradictory to such Pauline statements as Eph 2:8–9. If both passages are studied in context, however, the seeming contradiction disappears. James has indicated that deeds complete faith (v.22). Thus deeds are the evidence that saving faith is present in a person's life (v.18). He was combating a superficial faith that had no wholesome effect in the life of the professed believer. Paul, on the other hand, was combating legalism—the belief that one may earn saving merit before God by one's good deeds. Consequently he insisted that salvation is not by works but by faith alone. However, the following context in Eph 2:10 reveals that Paul did not depreciate good works. He declared, "We are God's workmanship, created in Christ Jesus to do good works." In Paul, therefore, as well as in James, good deeds are the product of genuine faith. In both writers faith that produces no good deeds is incapable of saving a person.

25 The second OT person cited as an example of genuine faith is "Rahab the prostitute." She too was "considered righteous for what she did." Although her faith was like that of Abraham, she was unlike the patriarch in almost every other way. She was a pagan, a woman, and a prostitute. Nevertheless, she chose to become identified with the people of Israel, a decision based on faith (cf. Jos 2:8–13; Heb 11:31). Far from being dead or worthless, her faith moved her to risk her life to protect the spies. As a result, she was declared righteous. James does not give approval to Rahab's former life; it is her living faith, seen against the background of her previous immorality, that he commends.

26 The argument of vv.18–25 concludes with a statement that cites the human body as an illustration. "The body without the spirit" is nothing but a corpse. "Faith without deeds" is as dead as a corpse and equally useless. James does not imply that deeds are the actual life principle that gives life to faith, but only that faith and deeds are inseparable.

VI. The Control of the Tongue (3:1–12)

In this section the author picks up a subject first mentioned in 1:19 and reiterated in 1:26. Genuine religion should exert a controlling influence over a person's tongue. James's treatment of the topic may be broken into three subdivisions: the weighty responsibility of teachers (vv.1–2); the powerful influence of the tongue (vv.3–6); and the perversity of the tongue (vv.7–12).

1 James's first concern in this passage has to do with those who desired to be "teachers" in the scattered Jewish Christian congregations (cf. 1Ti 1:7). It seems to have been a common practice for many of the readers to seek to become teachers. So James warns that they should stop becoming teachers in such large numbers. No doubt many who were not qualified by natural ability or spiritual gift were coveting the prestige of teaching. They are warned that teachers "will be judged more strictly." It is apparent from the words "we who teach" that James includes himself as a teacher. The judgment of teachers will be especially strict because greater responsibility rests on them. The reason for this is that the teacher's essential instrument, the tongue, has such great influence.

2 James gives the basis for what he has just said in v.1: The tongue is the most difficult member of the body to control. To say that "we all stumble" (GK 4760) is not merely to declare that everyone makes mistakes. This word is used figuratively to refer to acts of sin (cf. 2:10). Thus the author declares the universality of sin, even among believers. The person who "is never at fault" in his speech (i.e., never commits sins of speech) "is a perfect man." If anyone could be found who never sins with the tongue, that person would never sin in any other way, either. Since sins of the tongue are hardest to avoid, anyone who can control the tongue is surely able to "keep his whole body" from being used as an instrument of sin.

3 James illustrates the powerful influence of the tongue by the practice of putting "bits into the mouths of horses to make them obey us." A small bit "can turn the whole animal." So a person who controls the tongue can control his or her whole being.

4 The next illustration on the influence of the tongue is the rudder of a ship. Three factors made ships of that day difficult to control: they were "so large"; they were "driven by strong winds"; and they were "steered by a very small rudder." The rudder was a small blade on the end of a tiller, extending through a form of oarlock from the rear of the ship. Compared to the size of the vessel and the power of the gale, the rudder was but a minute part; yet it guided the ship "wherever the pilot want[ed] to go."

5 With the words "likewise the tongue," the application of the two preceding verses is introduced. Like bits (v.3) and rudders (v.4), the tongue also is a small item. Yet, also like them, it exerts a powerful influence. "It makes great boasts," and these are not empty claims. The tongue is able to sway multitudes. It can alter the destinies of nations. The destructive potential of the tongue is graphically pictured by a forest fire. Thousands of acres of valuable timber may be devastated by a "small spark." In the first two illustrations, animals and ships are controlled by small objects; in this last illustration, a huge forest is destroyed by a tiny spark. The tongue likewise can either control or destroy.

6 So, James says, "The tongue also is a fire." The inflammatory tongue has turned brother against brother, neighbor against neighbor, nation against nation. The tongue is also "a world of evil." It is as though all the wickedness in the whole world were wrapped up in that little piece of flesh. There are few sins people commit in which the tongue is not involved.

James describes the tongue's influence as both destructive and as corrupting the whole "person" (lit., "body"; GK 5393). Since the person resides in the body and uses the body as his or her instrument, James seems to use "body" to refer to the entire person. In reality, he is not referring to the tongue of flesh but to the intelligent, communicating mind that uses the tongue as its instrument. So the mind corrupts the whole person. But the corrupting influence of the tongue reaches out in widening circles, for it "sets the whole course of his life on fire." James is referring to the effect the tongue has on the whole of human existence. Finally, he traces the inflaming nature of the tongue back to its source. It is "set on fire by hell [GK 1147]" (see comment on Mk 9:43–48); this is James's way of saying that it comes from the devil.

7 James shifts almost unnoticeably from discussing the power of the tongue (vv.3–6) to a discussion of its perversity (vv.7–12). According to vv.7–8, one's inability to tame the tongue shows the perversity of the tongue. At creation God gave human beings the dominion over the animals that they have exercised ever since (Ge 1:28). "All kinds" of creatures of land, sea, and air have been subdued by them. To emphasize the continuing aspect of that dominance over the animals, James uses both the present and the perfect tenses—"are being tamed and have been tamed."

8 But even though humanity has retained dominion over all kinds of animals, because of the fall they have lost dominion over themselves. When James says, "No man can tame the tongue," he is stating that no one by himself or herself can subdue the tongue. This is not to say that God cannot bring it under control, for the tongue of the regenerate person can be controlled by the indwelling Holy Spirit. In its natural state the tongue "is a restless evil," like a ferocious beast that will not be subdued. It is "full of deadly poison," like a serpent ready to inject venom into its victim.

9 Here James speaks of inconsistency as an aspect of the tongue's perversity (vv.9–12). We can use the same instrument to "praise our Lord and Father" and to "curse men." But praising God and cursing people is tantamount to praising and cursing the same person, for in v.9 James describes a human being as "made in God's likeness" (cf. Ge 1:26–27). Although marred by sin, that image is still very much a reality; and human intellect, emotion, and will show that people still bear God's likeness. Obviously, James is not referring to such curses as those that Paul invoked on anyone who perverts the Gospel (Gal 1:6–9). Instead, it is the cursing that grows out of bitterness and hatred that he speaks of.

10 Again, James stresses the inconsistency of the tongue in that it is the source of such direct opposites as "praise and cursing." He does not have only the unsaved in mind because he introduces his rebuke with the words "my brothers," the term used throughout the letter to address believers (1:2, 16, 19; 2:1, 5, 14; 3:1; et al.). Although believers have in the indwelling Holy Spirit the potential for controlling the tongue, they may not be appropriating this potential. Hence, James insists that "this should not be." The mouth should be used consistently to praise God and to express love and kindness to other people.

11 James again turns to nature for his illustrations. He asks, "Can both fresh water and salt water flow from the same spring?" The water is sweet (NIV "fresh"; GK 1184) and bitter (NIV, "salt"; GK 4395). The former describes fresh water that is good for drinking; the latter refers to water so brackish or even salty as to be unfit for drinking. James may have had the Dead Sea in mind.

12 James concludes his discussion of the tongue by going behind the physical organ to the real source of speech. He asks, "Can a fig tree bear olives?" A plant produces according to its nature, whether figs, grapes, or any other fruit. So with "a salt spring." It cannot "produce fresh water" because it is not a fresh water spring. Therefore, out of the mouth of a good person come good words, and out of the mouth of a sinful person come sinful words.

VII. Two Kinds of Wisdom (3:13–18)

This passage is a natural outgrowth of the discussion of the tongue. The six verses divide into three sections: an exhortation (v.13); earthly wisdom (vv.14–16); and wisdom from heaven (vv.17–18).

13 James addresses the person who is "wise [GK 5055] and understanding [GK 2184]." The former word was a technical term among the Jews for the teacher, the scribe, and the rabbi. James is still speaking to those who would be teachers (cf. 3:1); here it is not what they say that he is concerned with, but rather how they live. "Understanding" describes one who is an expert, who has special knowledge or training. Thus anyone who would be a teacher, who claims to be an expert with special understanding, is under obligation to "show it by his good life." He should possess "know how" and be skilled in applying God's truth to practical, everyday living.

The particular characteristic stressed in this verse is "humility that comes from wisdom." "Humility" (GK 4559) is perhaps better translated "gentleness," but even this does not adequately render the Greek word (see comment on 1:21). It is not a passive gentleness growing out of weakness or resignation; rather, it is an active attitude of deliberate acceptance. The word was used to describe a horse that had been broken and trained to submit to the bridle. So this gentleness is strength under control, the control of the Spirit of God (Gal 5:22–23). It is a gentleness that is characteristic of "wisdom" (GK 50 53; see comment on 1:5). James does not have in mind the Greek concept of speculative or theoretical wisdom but the Hebrew idea of practical wisdom that enables one to live a life of godliness.

14 The specific form of "if" used here suggests that some of James's readers were harboring "bitter envy and selfish ambition" in their hearts. "Selfish ambition" (GK 2249) is a self-seeking attitude bent on gaining advantage and prestige for oneself or one's group. This forceful term colors the word "envy" (GK 2419), so that it here means "selfish zeal." The word is often used to describe fanatical zeal for a cause (1Ki 19:10; Ps 69:9; Isa 9:7), in either a good or a bad sense. James makes it clear by the adjective "bitter" (GK 4395) that he is referring to a sinful zeal. Because this condition existed among his readers, he insists that they must "not boast about [bitter zeal and selfish ambition] or deny the truth." James's readers may have been priding themselves in their partisan defense of the truth—a defense that was to their own advantage and advancement. Through such bitter and partisan defense, they were in reality denying the very truth they were attempting to defend.

15 Though James refers to the attitude described in v.14 as "wisdom," he obviously does not mean that it is genuine wisdom. On the contrary, it is the wisdom claimed by the would-be teachers of v.14, whose lives contradict their claims. Such "wisdom" evaluates everything by worldly standards and makes personal gain life's highest goal. Yet even this spurious use of the term reflects the Hebrew concept of wisdom as practical rather than theoretical. God is the source of genuine wisdom (1:5; cf. Pr 2:6), but this pseudo-wisdom is not from him, because, as James declares, "such 'wisdom' does not come down from heaven." Instead, it is "earthly" in source as well as kind. It views life from the limited viewpoint of this world rather than from heaven's vantage point. Its mind is set on earthly things (Php 3:19). James also calls this wisdom "unspiritual" (GK 6035; cf. 1Co 2:14–15, where this word is contrasted with "spiritual," GK 4461). The "spiritual" person has received the Spirit of God (1Co 2:12), but the "unspiritual" person does not have the Spirit (Jude 19). Thus "wisdom" that is "unspiritual" characterizes unregenerate human nature. Furthermore, it is "of the devil."

16 The conjunction "for" indicates that bitter zeal and selfish ambition always result in "disorder and every evil practice." "Disorder" (GK 189) is a common word for anarchy and political turmoil (Luke uses it to refer to political uprisings in Lk 21:9). James is no doubt speaking of disturbance and turmoil in the church. The "evil practice" refers specifically to worthless activity, to deeds that are bad because they are good for nothing and cannot produce any real benefit. Selfish zeal and ambition, then, always tend to destroy spiritual life and work.

17 In contrast to the denial of v.15, James turns to a description of "the wisdom that comes from heaven." Its basic characteristic is "pure" (GK 54). The reference is not to sexual purity but to the absence of any sinful attitude or motive. It is the opposite of the self-seeking attitude of vv.14–16. From this inner quality flow the outward manifestations given in the rest of the verse.

James goes on to describe this wisdom as "peace-loving" (GK 1646), in contrast to the bitter spirit of competitiveness and selfish ambition described in v.14. Next, it is "considerate" (GK 2117). In the LXX this word is used mostly of God's disposition as King. He is gentle and kind, although in reality he has every reason to be stern and punitive toward people in their sin. God's people also are to be marked by this godlike quality, not insisting on their legal rights but exercising love's leniency instead.

Likewise, godly wisdom is "submissive" (GK 2340). This quality is the opposite of obstinacy and self-seeking; it is a readiness to yield. Furthermore, it is "full of mercy and good fruit." That is, it is compassionate and always ready to help those who are in need. It is "impartial" (GK 88), showing no favoritism, and discriminating against no one. Finally, this wisdom is "sincere" (lit., "without hypocrisy"; GK 537). Far from being theoretical and speculative, James's concept of wisdom is thoroughly practical. It is the understanding and attitude that result in true piety and godliness.

18 James concludes his discussion of "the wisdom that comes from heaven" by reiterating the second quality listed in v.17. To "raise a harvest of righteousness" demands a certain kind of climate. A crop of righteousness cannot be produced in the climate of bitterness and self-seeking. Righteousness will grow only in a climate of peace; thus it must be sown and cultivated by the "peacemakers." Such persons not only love peace and live in peace but also strive to create conditions of peace.

VIII. The Worldly Attitude (4:1–10)

In 3:14–16 James has discussed a philosophy of life that is characteristic of the unregenerate mind and is a major ingredient of worldliness. Now he examines this worldly attitude in greater detail. First he identifies the source of worldly antagonisms (vv.1–3); next, he reproves spiritual unfaithfulness (vv.4–6); finally, he pleads for submission to God (vv.7–10).

1 Instead of the climate of peace necessary for the production of righteousness (3:18), James's readers were living in an atmosphere of constant "fights and quarrels." These two nouns were normally used of national warfare, but they had also become common, forceful expressions for any kind of open antagonism. James answers his question about the cause of fights and quarrels with an answer with which he expects his reader to agree: "Don't they come from your desires [GK 2454]?" The Greek word for "desires" is the source of the English word "hedonism," the designation of the philosophy that views pleasure as the chief goal of life. James pictures these pleasures as residing within his readers as the overriding desires of their lives. Nothing will be allowed to stand in the way of their realization.

2 "You want something" (GK 2121) is not quite forceful enough to fit the context or to represent the Greek verb, which expresses anxious longing and eager desire. So strong is the desire that "you kill and covet." This last statement has aroused much discussion. First, it is difficult to believe that James's readers, whom he elsewhere addresses as Christians (2:1), were actually guilty of murder. Some, insisting that the word must be taken literally, say that James is not referring to any specific occurrences but is indicating what generally happens when people desire pleasure rather than God. This interpretation, however, does not do justice to the pointed accusation "You kill." In the context of "wars and battles," it seems best to take "you kill" as hyperbole for hatred (equivalent to murder in Mt 5:21–22; 1Jn 3:15). This also resolves the problem of seeming anticlimactic word order. To say "You hate and covet" is a much more natural order than to say "You murder and covet." James then repeats his assertion that, with all their consuming desire and bitter antagonism, his readers were not able to obtain what they wanted, because they were going after it in the wrong way. They did "not ask God" for it. They were lusting and fighting rather than praying.

3 Even when James's readers did ask God for things, they did "not receive" what they requested. Why? They asked "with wrong motives." Their purpose was to "spend" what they got for "pleasures" (same word as "desires" in v.1). The prodigal son exemplifies one who spent his money in this way (Lk 15:14). It was the desire of James's readers for pleasures that was battling within them for satisfaction (v.1) and even leading them to try to use prayer as a means of gratification. They wanted to gratify themselves rather than help others and please God.

4 Having identified the source of the bitter fighting as being the desire for pleasure, James next rebukes his readers for spiritual unfaithfulness. "Adulterous people" renders "adulteresses" (GK 3655). The people of God in the OT are considered the wife of the Lord (Jer 31:32), and in the NT, the bride of Christ (Eph 5:23–32). It is reasonable, therefore, to understand "adulteress" as a figure of speech for spiritual unfaithfulness. It is a blunt and shocking word, intended to jar the readers and awaken them to their true spiritual condition. The concept of spiritual adultery was no doubt taken from the OT (cf. Hos 2:2–5; 3:1–5; 9:1).

For believers, however, there are two possible objects for affection: the world and God, and these two are direct opposites. James uses "world" (GK 3180) to refer to the system of evil controlled by Satan. It includes all that is wicked and opposed to God on this earth. James is thinking especially of pleasures that lure people's hearts from God. By its very nature, "friendship with the world is hatred toward God." To have a warm, familiar attitude toward this evil world is to be on good terms with God's enemy. It is to adopt the world's set of values and to want what the world wants. The person who deliberately "chooses [GK 1089] to be a friend of the world becomes an enemy of God."

5 This verse is one of the most difficult in the letter. Various translations have been suggested, but there is good reason to believe that the first translation given in the NIV footnote for the last part of the verse is correct and fits the context better: "God jealously longs for the spirit that he made to live in us." Verse 4 indicates that believers who are friends of the world are guilty of spiritual adultery. Although their love and devotion belong to God, they have fallen in love with the world. It is natural, therefore, to expect v.5 (closely tied to v.4 by "or") to speak of God's jealous longing for his people's love, not the people's own envious spirit (cf. Ex 20:5; 34:14, which refer to God as jealously desiring the devotion of his people).

A second reason for preferring the NIV footnote rendering is that it more accurately represents the Greek text. The Greek words representing "envies" form an idiom meaning "jealously." Together with GK 2160 (translated "intensely"), it means "longs jealously for." In v.4 James has accused his readers of spiritual unfaithfulness. If they are not willing to accept this indictment, he asks in v.5 what they think about the OT passages dealing with God's jealous longing for his people. This is the significance of the introductory conjunction "or." Do they think Scripture speaks "without reason"? Of course they don't think this. Consequently, it is necessary to believe that friendship with the world is enmity toward God, and thus it is spiritual unfaithfulness.

6 The words "he gives us more grace" are taken from Pr 3:34, quoted later in this verse. The meaning of vv. 4–6 is that God has set a high standard for wholehearted love and devotion on the part of his people as they resist the appeal of the world, but he gives grace that is greater than the rigorous demand he has made. This assurance is documented from Proverbs, the point of which is in the second clause. The reference to "the humble" (GK 5424) constitutes the theme for vv.7–10, where James pleads for submission to God. They should be the people who willingly submit to God's desire for them rather than proudly insist on satisfying their own desires for pleasure (cf. vv.1–3).

7 James issues a series of ten commands in vv.7–10. In each one the specific Greek form used calls for immediate response. It is a pointed and forceful way to demand action. The command to "submit" (GK 5718) to God is the logical response to the quotation from Pr 3:34 (cf. "then," which has the inferential meaning of "therefore"). Since "God opposes the proud" but helps "the humble," believers should submit to him. Submission is not the same as obedience. Instead, it is the surrender of one's will, which in turn leads to obedience.

Rather than resisting God's will for us, we should "resist the devil." James appears to suggest that the spiritual unfaithfulness of v.4 was the result of the devil's influence. The promise "he will flee from you" gives assurance that, as powerful as he may be, Satan can be resisted.

8 The series of imperatives continues with the command to "come near to God." In setting their hearts on pleasure, James's readers had drifted away from God. Though still his people, they had become estranged from him. But the assurance that God will welcome them back accompanies the command to return. God jealously yearns for their devotion (v.5). The call to "wash your hands" is a command to make one's conduct pure. Similarly, the call to "purify your hearts" insists on purity of thoughts and motives. The eager quest for pleasure (vv.1–5) had resulted in sins of heart and hand. So James bluntly addresses them as "you sinners," a strong term, showing the extent of their involvement in worldly attitudes and actions. The designation "double-minded" is used somewhat differently than in 1:8. Here it describes the attempt of the readers to love God and the pleasures of the world at the same time.

9 Four of the ten imperatives of vv.7–10 occur in this verse, and all four are calls to repentance. "Grieve" (GK 5415) is a strong word meaning "to be miserable or wretched." In contrast to the worldly pleasures they had sought so eagerly, James's readers are to repent in misery. They also are commanded to "mourn" (GK 4291), a verb depicting passionate grief that cannot be hidden. Similar outward grief is called for in the verb "wail" (GK 3081). In the past, when the readers had pursued pleasure, their lives had been marked by "laughter" and "joy"; but now they are to change their "laughter to mourning" and their "joy to gloom." Some have imagined that the attitude expressed in this verse is to be the constant characteristic of the Christian. Such an interpretation, however, overlooks the situation that gave rise to these commands. It was the burning desire for pleasures that led James to issue this powerful call to all-out repentance.

10 James now returns to the text quoted from the OT in v.6. God graciously gives aid to the humble; therefore "humble yourselves" (GK 5427). Here the specific form of humbling is that of repentance for the sin of transferring affections from God to the pleasures of the world. However, the principle stated is much more comprehensive in its application. That God lifts up those who humble themselves is a consistent biblical principle (cf. Mt 23:12; Lk 14:11; 18:14; Php 2:5–11; 1Pe 5:6).

IX. Faultfinding (4:11–12)

11 The prohibition introducing this verse is more accurately translated "Do not speak against one another" rather than "Do not slander" (GK 2895). To slander is to make false charges or misrepresentations that damage the reputation of another person; the verb used here, however, refers to any form of speaking against someone else. What is said may be true in its content but harsh and unkind in the manner of its presentation. The specific grammatical construction used here usually forbids the continuation of a practice already in progress. James's readers had fallen into the habit of criticizing one another, and so he says, "Stop speaking against one another."

The reason he gives is that the one who criticizes or judges a fellow-Christian "speaks against the law and judges it." The law referred to is probably the command of Lev 19:18: "Love your neighbor as yourself." To speak against your neighbor is to violate this law. Those who do so place themselves above the law and, by their actions, declare that law to be a bad or unnecessary statute. Rather than submitting to it and "keeping it," they pass judgment on its validity and set it aside.

12 In passing judgment, this critic of a fellow-Christian has usurped a position of authority that is reserved for God alone. God is the "one Lawgiver and Judge." Since he gave the law, he is qualified to judge those who are responsible to keep it. That he is "able to save and destroy" is proof that he is in a position to enforce the law, rewarding those who keep it and punishing those who violate it. "But you—who are you?" catches James's full force here. With shattering bluntness, he crushes any right his readers may have claimed to sit in judgment over others. This is not to rule out civil courts and judges, but it does root out the harsh, unkind, critical spirit that continually finds fault with others.

X. Arrogant Self-Sufficiency (4:13–17)

13 This section gives another example of the "wisdom" that characterizes the world (cf. 3:15). James addresses businessmen, probably Christians, since v.17 seems to suggest that the readers know that their practice is wrong. He begs them to pay careful attention to the seriousness of what follows. The form of the word "say" suggests that the situation under consideration was something that occurred frequently. Business travel in the first century was common, and Jews especially traveled widely for business purposes (cf. Aquila and Priscilla in Ac 18:2, 18; Ro 16:3; Lydia in Ac 16:14). Notice the well-laid plan: (1) "go to this or that city," (2) "spend a year there," (3) "carry on business," and (4) "make money." The starting time is arranged ("today or tomorrow"); the city has been selected; but God has no place in the plans.

14 No allowance is made for unforeseen circumstances. These businessmen are confident that they will be able to carry their plans through to completion. Thus James points out their fallacy. They "do not even know what will happen tomorrow," to say nothing about a year from now. They have been planning as if they know exactly what the future holds or even as if they can control the future. Not only is their knowledge limited, but their lives are uncertain. To point up the transitory nature of life, James employs another illustration from nature—"You are a mist." In the morning it covers the countryside; before noon it is gone. But some of James's readers had been planning as if they were going to be here forever!

15 Instead of saying v.13, the Christian businessman "ought to say, 'If it is the Lord's will.'" No Christian can live independently of God. For believers to leave God out of their plans is an arrogant assumption of self-sufficiency, a tacit declaration of independence from God. It also overlooks reality. Whether people recognize it or not, they "will live and do this or that" only "if it is the Lord's will." A study of the use of this conditional clause in the NT makes it clear that we are not to repeat it mechanically in connection with every statement of future plans. Paul, for example, employs it in Ac 18:21 and 1Co 4:19, but he does not use it in Ac 19:21; Ro 15:28; or 1Co 16:5, 8. Yet it is obvious that whether Paul explicitly stated it or not, he always conditioned his plans on the will of God.

16 Some of James's readers, however, rather than subjecting their plans to God's will, were making it their practice to "boast and brag." To make plans without considering God's plan is the same thing as arrogantly claiming to be in full command of the future. The word translated "brag" (GK 224) refers to proud confidence in one's own knowledge or cleverness (i.e., arrogance). The businessmen addressed by James were proud of their arrogant assumption that they could foresee and control the future. "Such boasting," says James, "is evil." It not only lacks the quality of being good, it is aggressively and viciously wicked.

17 Although this statement may apply to any number of situations, James intends it to refer to the immediately preceding context. Perhaps this is a maxim that means something like "You have been fully warned," as if James were saying, "Now that I have pointed the matter out to you, you have no excuse." Knowing what should be done obligates a person to do it.

XI. Denunciation of the Wicked Rich (5:1–6)

In these six verses James first declares the fact of coming judgment (v.1) and then lists the crimes against which this judgment will be meted out: hoarded wealth (vv.2–3); unpaid wages (v.4); luxury and self-indulgence (v.5); and the murder of innocent people (v.6).

There is good reason to believe that the persons referred to in this section are not believers. It might be argued that they are personally addressed in the same way as other groups (cf. 3:1; 4:13). Since the letter in general is written to Christians, it might be assumed that the rich of 5:1–6 are Christians just as the rich of 1:9–11 are. However, there are significant differences between 5:1–6 and the rest of the letter. These individuals are not addressed as "brothers" (cf. 1:2, 16, 19; et al.). Furthermore, they are not called on to repent and change their ways but only to "weep and wail" because of the judgment they are going to undergo. It is, therefore, more reasonable to understand this section as similar to OT prophetic declarations of coming judgment against pagan nations, which are interspersed among sections addressed to God's people (e.g., Isa 13–21, 23; Eze 25–32).

1 That this verse begins a new section is indicated by the repeated call for attention, "Now listen" (cf. 4:13). The rich are to "weep [GK 3081] and wail (GK 3909]." While the first word may describe audible weeping, the second term most certainly does. It is an onomatopoeic word that sounds like howling. In 4:9 James's readers are commanded to make themselves miserable in all-out repentance. But here in 5:1 the rich are told that God will send the miseries of judgment upon them.

2 The first crime charged against the wicked rich is that of hoarding various forms of wealth. They have so much wealth stored up that it "has rotted"; their clothes also are moth eaten. Wealth in those days consisted of both money and such commodities as grain, oil, and costly garments. Evidence that costly garments were stored as wealth and used as payment for services rendered occurs in such passages as 2Ki 5:5, 22; Mt 6:19. Thus what rotted were the commodities and what had been invaded by moths were the stored garments. There is no reason to take these happenings as figurative or as predictive of the future. The tragic fact was that the rich had hoarded so much food and clothing that it was going to waste. Their crime was uncontrolled greed that resulted in oppression of the poor (v.4).

3 An obvious form of wealth was "gold and silver," and this is said to have become "corroded." Since gold and silver do not rust or even corrode, James must refer to tarnished metal, the tarnish indicating how long the hoarded wealth had lain idle. He warns the rich, "Their corrosion will testify against you." It witnessed to the greed and selfishness of these wicked men, who had far more than they could ever use, while their workers were deprived of their wages. The idea that the corrosion will eat the flesh of the rich "like fire" is a graphic way of declaring that their greed will result in their own destruction, as if the corrosion that ate their riches actually will eat their very flesh.

James's statement that the rich had "hoarded wealth in the last days" shows that he had the future judgment in mind. The NT regards the whole period between Christ's first and second comings as the last time or "last days" (cf. Heb 1:1–2; 1Jn 2:18). In comparison with the preparatory days of the OT, this is the last period before Christ comes to set up his kingdom and to judge all people. It was even in the last hour, as it were, before Christ comes to judge, that the rich "hoarded wealth."

4 The second crime the rich are charged with is that they "failed to pay the workmen" who harvested their crops. Here James vividly pictures the unpaid wages, still in the possession of the unscrupulous rich farmers, as continually accusing them of their dishonesty. It was as though the very coins cried out the guilt. The harvesters complained about their treatment, and their complaints "reached the ears of the Lord Almighty." God heard their cries, as he always hears the voice of his suffering people (cf. Ex 3:7). The designation "the Lord Almighty" represents a Hebrew expression that means "Lord of hosts [GK 7372 & 4877]" or "Lord of the armies." In 1Sa 17:45 this word refers to the armies of Israel, but in 2Ch 18:18 it refers to God's angels and in Dt 4:19 to all the stars. God is Lord of the armies of earth, of the angelic armies, and of all the starry host. He is almighty, and he will vindicate his suffering people in due time.

5 The third charge against the rich is that they have lived "in luxury [GK 5587] and self-indulgence [GK 5059]." These two words are synonyms, though there is a shade of difference between them. The first refers to a soft, enervating luxury that tends to demoralize; the second word describes extravagant and wasteful self-indulgence. Both have immoral associations. In their unrestrained indulgence, the rich had "fattened" themselves for "the day of slaughter"—a designation of the day of judgment (Jer 12:3). James uses graphic imagery to indicate that the rich are on the brink of judgment. They were like cattle completely unaware of their impending destruction.

6 The final crime of the wicked rich was that they had "murdered innocent men." In 2:6 the rich are accused of dragging believers into court; here they are charged with murder. This is not to be taken figuratively but literally. Examples are Christ, Stephen, James the son of Zebedee, and, later, the author himself.

By "innocent" (lit., "righteous"; GK 1465) James has in mind that class of people known as "the righteous," i.e., believers, who came largely from the ranks of the poor (cf. 2:5–7). "Who were not opposing you" misses the bluntness of James's indictment. The Greek text abruptly declares, "He does not oppose you." The rich were guilty of attacking not merely a righteous person but a person who was defenseless or who refused to fight back.

XII. Miscellaneous Exhortations (5:7–20)

1. Concerning Patience (5:7–11)

This exhortation concerning patience is built around three illustrations: the farmer (vv.7-9); the prophets (v.10); and Job (v.11).

7 This exhortation is addressed to the "brothers," indicating that James is turning his attention from the unbelieving rich back to the believing Jewish Christians to whom the letter was sent. The word "then" suggests that the oppression of the righteous poor described in vv.1–6 is what gives rise to the message of vv.7–11. James has just warned the oppressing rich of coming judgment; now he encourages the oppressed poor to "be patient" (GK 3428). This verb describes the attitude of self-restraint that does not try to get even for a wrong that has been done. It usually represents long-suffering patience toward persons rather than things. So James calls for a patience toward the rich oppressors that will last "until the Lord's coming." "Coming" (parousia; GK 4242) was a common term used to describe the visit of a king to a city or province of his kingdom and thus depicts Christ as a royal personage.

The first illustration of patience is that of the farmer who waits patiently "for the fall and spring rains." In Palestine the early rains came in October and November soon after the grain was sown, and the latter rains came in April and May as the grain was maturing. Both rainy seasons were necessary for a successful crop. Knowing this, the farmer was willing to wait patiently until both rains came and provided the needed moisture.

8 With the words "You too, be patient," James applies the illustration of the patient farmer. In addition, he urges his readers to "stand firm" (lit., "strengthen your hearts"). This expression has the idea of providing solid support, of establishing a person, and thus of enabling one to stand unmoved by trouble. The reason given for standing firm is again that "the Lord's coming is near." The day when things will be set right is imminent. This confident expectation will make the faint heart strong.

9 The believers must be patient toward both outsiders who oppress them and insiders who irritate them. Christians are not to "grumble [GK 5100] against each other." This verb, often meaning "sigh" or "groan," speaks of inner distress rather than open complaint. What is forbidden here is not the loud and bitter denunciation of others but the unexpressed feeling of bitterness or the smothered resentment that may express itself in a groan or a sigh. For them to continue that hateful practice would result in judgment. And the Judge is represented as "standing at the door," as if his hand is on the latch, ready to enter at any time.

10 The second illustration of patience is that of "the prophets who spoke in the name of the Lord." In their position as God's representatives, they experienced affliction and responded to it with long-suffering patience. Although James refers to "the prophets" as a group, Jeremiah certainly stands out as one who endured mistreatment with patience. He was put in the stocks (Jer 20:2), thrown into prison (32:2), and lowered into a miry dungeon (38:6); yet he persisted in his ministry without bitterness or recrimination. Such men constitute an "example" for believers who are oppressed and mistreated.

11 The third illustration is Job. "Those who have persevered" are considered blessed. No doubt James has in mind his words in 1:12, where he points out the enviable joy of the person who does not cave in under trial. In 5:7–10 the plea is for patience, for self-restraint that does not retaliate; but here in 5:11 he is referring to perseverance in difficult circumstances. It is significant that James speaks of Job's "perseverance" (GK 5705), not his patience, for despite the popular phrase "the patience of Job," he hardly exemplified that quality (cf. Job 12:2; 13:3–4; 16:2). He was, however, an outstanding example of perseverance in the most trying situations (cf. Job 1:21–22; 2:10; 13:15; 19:25–27). His experience also was proof that "the Lord is full of compassion and mercy," as we see in "what the Lord finally brought about" for him: God gave him "twice as much as he had before" (Job 42:10–17). To sum up, in vv.7-11 James is urging his readers not to fight back but to exercise long-suffering patience toward the rich who oppress them; and he is calling for stout-hearted perseverance in the trying circumstances that confront them.

2. Concerning Oaths (5:12)

12 James next places special emphasis on the prohibition of oaths: "Above all . . . do not swear." As in v.9, the grammatical construction shows that the use of oaths was an existing practice that ought to be discontinued. James is echoing the words of Jesus in Mt 5:34–37, which forbid swearing altogether. It should be obvious that what is referred to in Matthew and James is the light, casual use of oaths in informal conversation—not formal oaths in such places as courts of law. God himself is said to have taken an oath (Ps 110:4), and Paul sometimes called God to witness (2Co 1:21; Gal 1:20). Rather than employing an oath to convince people that a statement is true, Christians should let their "'Yes' be yes," and their "'No,' no." That is, they should be honest in all their speech so that when they make an affirmation or denial, people will know it is unquestionably the truth. In the careless use of oaths people are in danger of taking God's name in vain, for which they will come under judgment (cf. Ex 20:7).

3. Concerning Prayer (5:13–18)

This passage on prayer falls into two sections. Verses 13–16 constitute a call for prayer in every circumstance of life; vv.17–18 illustrate the effectiveness of sincere prayer.

13 One circumstance that calls for prayer is the experience of being "in trouble" (GK 2802). When such an experience comes, Christians need patience. They are not to grumble in bitter disgust (v.9), nor are they to expresses themselves in oaths (v.12). Instead, they "should pray." Patience comes from God, and prayer is an effective way to obtain it. James also urges anyone who is in good spirits to "sing songs of praise." This too is prayer.

14 Sickness is another circumstance where prayer is needed, and concerning such prayer James gives detailed instructions. The sick person "should call for the elders of the church" (cf. Tit 1:5, 7; Ac 20:17, 28). In Ac 20:28 the elders are instructed to shepherd the church of God, i.e., to do the work of a pastor (cf. also 1Pe 5:1–4). Thus, the sick person is to call the pastors of the church "to pray over him and anoint him with oil." Prayer is the more significant of the two ministries performed by the elders, for the overall emphasis of the paragraph belongs on prayer. There are a number of reasons for understanding the application of oil as medicinal rather than sacramental. The word "anoint" (GK 230) is not the usual word for sacramental or ritualistic anointing. Furthermore, it is a well-documented fact that oil was one of the most common medicines of biblical times (see Isa 1:6; Lk 10:34). Josephus reports that during his last illness Herod the Great was given a bath in oil in hopes of effecting a cure. It is evident, then, that James is prescribing prayer and medicine.

15 The assurance is given that prayer "will make the sick person well." In the final analysis, this is what effects the healing. In answer to "the prayer offered in faith," God uses the medicine to cure the malady. The statement "the Lord will raise him up" means that the sick man will be enabled to get up from his sick bed. If it was sin that occasioned his sickness, "he will be forgiven." This suggests the possibility that, because of persistence in sin, God sent sickness as a disciplinary agent (cf. 1Co 11:30). The conditional "if he has sinned," however, makes it clear that not all sickness is the result of sin.

16 From the promise of v.15 James draws an inference. Since confession of sin and the prayer of faith bring healing, Christians should confess their "sins to each other and pray for each other." It is not merely the elders who are told to pray here, but Christians in general. If a person has sinned against a fellow-Christian, he or she should confess the sin to that person. This will no doubt result in mutual confession—"to each other." Then the two believers should "pray for each other." If the sin has caused sickness, healing will follow confession and prayer. James proceeds to add the assurance that prayer "is powerful and effective." The "righteous man" here referred to is the one whose sins have been confessed and forgiven. His prayer is fully able to secure results, such as healing of the sick.

17–18 James now offers illustrative proof that a righteous man's prayer is "powerful and effective." "Elijah," he says, "was a man just like us." He had no superhuman powers; he was by nature a human being and nothing more. However, when he prayed "that it would not rain . . . it did not rain" (cf. 1Ki 17:1; 18:42–45). The explanation of his power in prayer is twofold: he was a righteous man, and "he prayed earnestly." So James assures his readers that such answers to prayer are within the reach of any believer. It is true that 1Ki 17–18 does not explicitly say that Elijah prayed, but this may be assumed from 17:1 and especially from 18:42. The three and one-half years is a round number based on 18:1.

4. Concerning the Wanderer (5:19–20)

19–20 It is clear from the words "my brothers" that James addresses this last exhortation to believers. It is also apparent that he speaks of the possibility that one of them may "wander from the truth." Verse 20 gives reason to believe that the truth from which the wanderer turns is the saving truth of the Gospel. James's purpose in these closing verses is to encourage Christians to make an effort to bring the wanderer back. Two worthy results of such an accomplishment are cited. First, it will "save him from death." That this cannot be physical death may be inferred from the literal translation of the Greek text: it "will save his soul from death"; thus, it would seem that spiritual death is in view. Since Scripture teaches that once a person is regenerated he or she can never be lost, it may be assumed that his hypothetical wanderer is not a genuine believer. He is one who has been among the believers and has made a profession of faith, but his profession has been superficial. To bring him to genuine faith in the truth saves his soul from eternal death and covers his "many sins"; the wanderer's sins will never be held against him again. As difficult as it may be to win such a person to saving faith, the eternal results make it infinitely worthwhile (see also Heb 6:4–8).

The Old Testament in the New

NT Text	OT Text	Subject
Jas 2:8	Lev 19:18	Love your neighbor as yourself
Jas 2:11	Ex 20:14; Dt 5:18	Seventh commandment
Jas 2:11	Ex 20:13; Dt 5:17	Sixth commandment
Jas 2:23	Ge 15:6	Faith in Abraham
Jas 4:6	Pr 3:34	Grace for the humble

1 Peter

INTRODUCTION

1. Simon Peter

According to the four gospels, Peter was the leader and spokesman for the early disciples (Mt 15:15; 18:21; Mk 1:36–37; 8:29; 9:5–6; Lk 12:41; Jn 6:68). His original name in Hebrew was "Simeon" (cf. Ac 15:14; 2Pe 1:1). The Greek name "Simon," however, is applied to Peter forty-nine times in the NT. A third name, "Cephas," is a Greek transliteration of the Aramaic word kepa' ("rock"), which means the same as "Peter" (Greek Petros, "rock"). The NT, therefore, has four names for Peter. The phrase "Simon who was known as Peter" (Ac 10:18) indicates that his new name (Peter) became his common designation.

Simon was one of the first disciples called into the service of Jesus (Mk 1:16–18). He was a fisherman from Bethsaida (Jn 1:44), in a portion of the Transjordan immediately east of Galilee. Peter had a home in Capernaum (Mk 1:21, 29), which was across the Jordan, about three miles west of Bethsaida, in Galilee. He was married (Mt 8:14; Mk 1:30; Lk 4:38) and took his wife on journeys to churches (1Co 9:5). His strong north-country accent marked him as a Galilean (Mk 14:70). Doubtless he was influenced by the preaching of John the Baptist; his brother Andrew was one of the Baptist's disciples (Jn 1:35–42).

Andrew introduced Peter to Jesus (Jn 1:42). Peter quickly became the leader of the twelve disciples, and his name stands first in lists of them in the Synoptics. Peter was one of the inner three disciples (along with James and John) closest to Jesus (Mk 5:37; 9:2; 14:33). His preaching in the early days of the church (Ac 1–10) shows his great ability. The risen Lord appeared especially to him (1Co 15:5) and gave him a special commission (Jn 21:15–19).

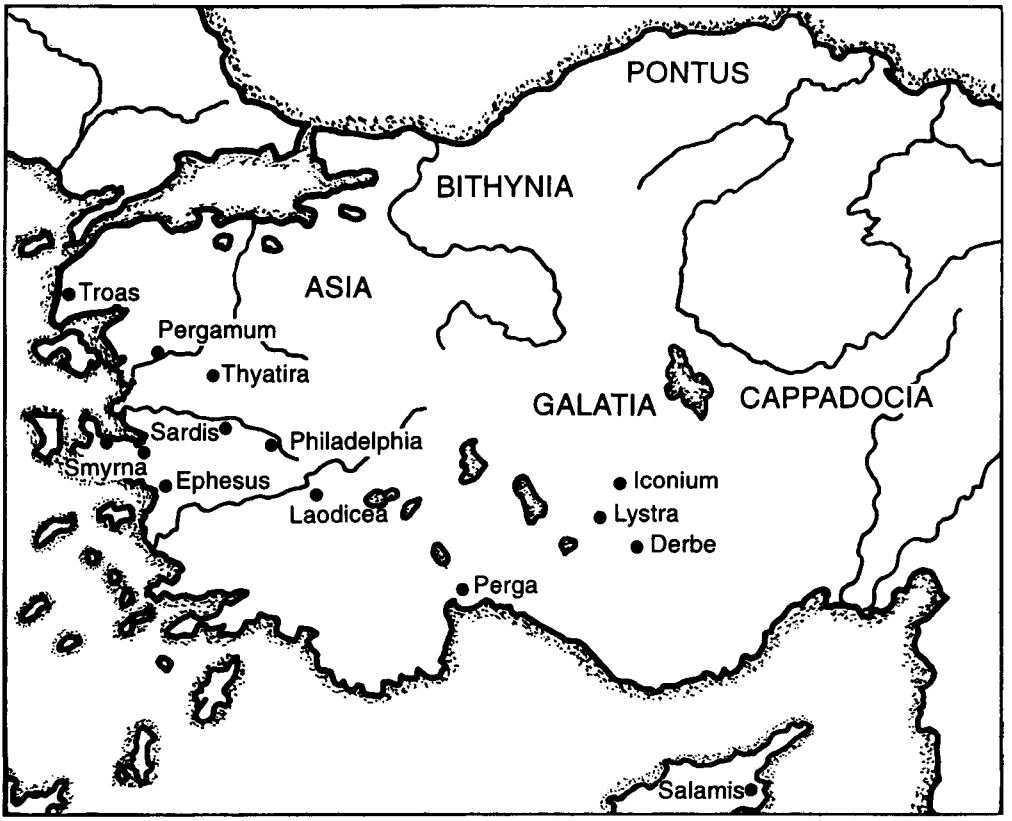
Peter's leadership in the early church is not matched by his literary output. The NT contains only two letters that bear his name. According to tradition, Mark became the interpreter of Peter and transmitted into writing the things preached by Peter (see introduction to Mark).

2. Authorship

This first letter claims to be from "Peter, an apostle of Jesus Christ" (1:1), who says he was "a witness of Christ's sufferings" (5:1). In addition, it states that he wrote it "with the help of Silas . . . a faithful brother" (5:12)—undoubtedly the "Silas" of Ac 15:22 and 1Th 1:1. Also, the "Mark" mentioned in 1Pe 5:13 appears to be the same man mentioned in Ac 12:12. These two references and the strong, early reception of the letter by the church led to the almost universal acceptance of this letter as from Peter.

Many modern scholars, however, have denied that this letter could have been written by the apostle Peter. The positive case for Peter's authorship, however, rests on these considerations: (1) The self-witness of the book is clear in claiming Peter as author. (2) The alternative of a pseudonymous letter by someone using Peter's name has serious credibility problems. (3) The church's early and strong reception of the letter as Peter's cannot be overlooked. (4) The letter reveals none of the telltale marks of a later writing in which the author ascribed his work to one of the apostles. (5) The letter makes good sense when taken at face value as by Peter; the content and tone are fully consistent with apostolic times.

3. Date and Place of Origin



First Clement 5:4-7 names Peter and Paul as victims of persecution. The common understanding is that the passage refers to the persecution by Nero at Rome, which began after the disastrous fire in the city of Rome on July 19, A.D. 64. First Peter is written from "Babylon" (5:13; most likely a code word for "Rome"; see comment on 5:13), probably shortly before Nero's great persecution—i.e., in A.D. 62–64.

4. Destination

This letter is addressed to "God's elect, strangers in the world, scattered throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia and Bithynia" (1:1—these are all places in northern Asia Minor or modern Turkey). Peter may have evangelized the northern region of Asia Minor while Paul founded churches in the southern and western areas of Asia Minor. Silas too may have ministered in these northern provinces. The churches were no doubt composed of Christians from both Jewish and Gentile backgrounds, though a majority of the Christians in this area had been converted out of paganism rather than out of Judaism (4:3-4; see comment). Jewish blindness to the Gospel was a common phenomenon (cf. Ac 4:17–18; 28:25–28; Ro 10–11; 2Co 3:13–15).

5. Occasion and Purpose

The tone of 1 Peter is a warm pastoral one, full of encouragement. The exhortations are addressed to Christians who are scattered over a wide area. They shared a common faith with Christians everywhere and faced common problems. Their basic problem was to live for God in the midst of a society ignorant of the true God. Because they were Christians, they were misunderstood and subjected to cruel treatment. Peter's pastoral purpose was to help these early believers see their temporary sufferings in the full light of the coming eternal glory. In the midst of all their discouragements, the sovereign God would keep them and enable them by faith to have joy. Jesus Christ by his patient suffering and glorious future destiny had given them the pattern to follow and also a living hope. Life in a pagan society was difficult and required humility and submission. The immediate future for the church was an increase in the conflict with the world (4:7–18). But God would provide the grace to enable the community of the faithful to grow into maturity. They must help one another and show loving concern lest the members of God's flock be injured (4:8, 10; 5:1–2).

6. Literary Form

First Peter is a letter, written in the normal letter form of the NT world. Many scholars have worked to isolate or identify creedal or hymnic fragments in 1 Peter. It has been viewed as a sermon or homily, a paschal liturgy, or even an early Christian catechesis. The rhetorical and didactic nature of the letter may reflect the fact that it was intended to be read aloud to congregations (cf. Col 4:16; 1Th 5:27; Rev 1:3). This commentary takes the view that while Peter may have used material that existed in other forms, these materials now form a letter that is intelligible apart from the knowledge of previously existing forms.

7. Theological Values

Although it is not a theological treatise, 1 Peter abounds with valuable theological implications. It presupposes a biblical world view based on God's sovereignty. This is God's world; yet the devil "prowls around like a roaring lion looking for someone to devour" (5:8). People who live in this world are subject to evil desires, ignorance, false gods, and all forms of sinful living (1:14; 4:3–4). God allows people time to repent of their sins, but the time for repentance is limited. He is gracious (5:2, 10), but he is also a righteous and holy Judge, who will visit all people, living and dead, with their just deserts (1:17; 2:12, 23; 4:5–6, 17–19).

In common with the rest of the NT, 1 Peter presents a new perspective on the end times. With the coming of Jesus as Messiah, the age-old plan of God is on the way to its consummation (1:20). The writings of the prophets have found fulfillment in the death and resurrection of Jesus (1:11–12). Two major themes of prophetic teaching in 1 Peter are the messianic sufferings and the subsequent messianic glory. The first phase of the messianic times has already occurred! Jesus is the Suffering One who has died and has now been raised. The time is short, and Jesus must soon enter into his full glory. Already God has glorified him in heaven (1:21). All that remains is the final manifestation of the glorious Lord from heaven (1:7, 13; 4:13).

Christians are God's chosen people in an ignorant and rebellious world. In God's grace, the Triune God (1:2) is accomplishing in history a plan of redemption (1:20). The Father's role is extensive (1:1–3, 5, 15, 20–21; et al.) and is neither impersonal nor remote. The Spirit's participation in the salvation of humanity is also shown (1:2, 11–12; 4:14).

Peter regularly speaks of Jesus as "Jesus Christ," indicating his confession and that of the church (cf. Mt 16:16ff.). He also calls Jesus "Lord" (see 1:3; 2:13; 3:15) and recognizes the exaltation of Jesus (cf. Ac 2:36). He declares that the Spirit of Christ inspired the prophets (1:11); as the Messiah, he was "foreknown" before the creation of the world (1:20). Peter implies the deity of Christ (see comments on 2:3; 5:11). Jesus is also called "lamb" (1:19), "living Stone" (2:4), "Shepherd and Overseer of your souls" (2:25), and "Chief Shepherd" (5:4).

In his sufferings, Jesus fulfills the OT Scriptures in types and prophecies. He is the spotless Passover lamb of Exodus (1:16–21), the Suffering Servant of Isa 53 (2:24–25), and the scapegoat of Leviticus (2:24a). He carries away the sins of people, takes the punishment on himself, and provides a new life of righteousness. Not only is his death a substitutionary atonement (2:24), but it also provides a pattern for Christian living. Since Jesus was the Suffering Servant, his followers must suffer (2:21).

Peter emphasizes the godly life of submission and good deeds in the midst of suffering. By their noble deeds, Christians may glorify God in difficulties (2:12). The sovereign Lord sustains them in adversity and has all power (5:10–11). Thus faith, submission, and trust provide the basis for Christian living. With a distinctively pastoral tone and a strong emphasis on godly behavior in suffering, this letter is of great value for Christians today, who are still in a hostile world and many of whom in certain lands are suffering for Christ. A faithful witness to him can be costly, not only under repressive regimes but also in our more open society.

8. Canonicity

In his letter to the Philippians, Polycarp (c.70–150/166) unmistakably refers to 1 Peter. Following him, the Church Father Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, and Origen all attest Peter's authorship of the letter. It was accepted by the church because it universally recognized its worth and authority. No book of the NT has earlier, better, or stronger attestation.

EXPOSITION

I. Salutation (1:1–2)

1 Peter begins by using his name in its most common NT form (see introduction for more on his name). "An apostle [GK 693] of Jesus Christ" indicates the dignity and authority of someone selected by Jesus and given unique responsibilities of ministry in the establishment of the Christian church (Mt 16:18–19; Mk 1:16–17; 3:16; Jn 1:42; 21:15–19).

As is common in Greek letters of the NT era, the writer first identifies himself, then identifies the recipient, and finally gives a word of greeting. Peter designates those he is writing to as "God's elect" (GK 1723). In biblical teaching, election is a central theme and the foundation of spiritual blessing (cf. Dt 4:37; 7:6; 14:2; Ps 105:6, 43; Isa 15:4; Eph 1:4–5). No believer should ever feel threatened by the doctrine of election, because it is always presented in Scripture as the ground of comfort. So here the designation "elect" reminds the scattered Christians in danger of persecution that God's purposes for them are certain and gracious. "Strangers in the world" points to the fact that Christians are pilgrims who do not reside permanently on earth. They belong to the heavenly realm (cf. Eph 2:19; Php 3:20; Heb 11:13–16). The destination of the letter is "Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia and Bithynia." These were the Roman provinces north of the Taurus Mountains in what is today Turkey.

2 Peter next announces some basic themes of his letter that will later be expanded and developed. He reminds his readers of their Triune faith and of the work of the Triune God. The "foreknowledge [GK 4590] of God" is more than God's simply knowing what will take place in the future, for it includes God's special relations with humankind even before creation (cf. 1:20; Am 3:2; Ac 2:23; Ro 8:29–30; 11:2). The "sanctifying" (GK 40) work of the Spirit is his operation of applying the work of redemption to Christians, purifying them and setting them to tasks of service. The goal of election and redemption is "obedience" (GK 5633) to Jesus Christ, who shed his blood on Calvary (cf. Ro 1:5). The salutation closes with the wish for the multiplication of God's "grace and peace" to the believers.

II. The Privileges and Responsibilities of Salvation (1:3–2:10)

The first major section of Peter's letter concerns "salvation" (GK 5401), the key term of this unit (see 1:5, 9–10: 2:2); it occurs nowhere else in the book. Its basic meaning is "deliverance, preservation, or salvation." The section closes with an OT quotation, as does the next major division (cf. 3:10–12).

A. God's Plan of Salvation (1:3–12)

1. The praise of God for salvation (1:3–9)

3–4 The nature of this salvation as a new birth according to the mercy of God evokes praise to God the Father, who is the source of salvation. The new birth is the work of the Holy Spirit (see Jn 3:3–8). The Christian has a "living hope" because Jesus has been raised by the Father (cf. Tit 2:13). This hope is further described in v.4 as an "inheritance [GK 3100] that can never perish, spoil or fade." The concept of inheritance is one of the major Bible themes and stresses family connection and gift (see Gal 3:18; cf. also Mt 5:5; 19: 29; 25:34; 1Pe 3:9). The inheritance "is kept" (GK 5498) or reserved in heaven by God for his people.

5 God's people are described as those who are being "shielded" (lit., "guarded"; GK 5864). This stresses the continued activity of God in their lives, while the phrase "through faith" stresses the believers' activity. The divine protection and the final salvation are only for believers. The salvation "ready to be revealed in the last time" looks at the final realization of what Christians already have and enjoy.

6 "In this" probably refers to anticipation of the future deliverance. As Christians long for their inheritance, they can "rejoice." Peter goes on to emphasize that their suffering is brief, for the present time, and necessary (cf. "have had to"). That Peter uses "trials" (GK 4280) instead of "persecutions" (GK 1501) or "tribulations" (GK 2568) is significant. He is thinking in terms of the broadest category of the pagans' attitude toward Christians rather than of specific actions.

7 When gold is refined, its impurities are removed by a fiery process. Though extremely durable, it belongs to the perishing world-order. Faith, which is more valuable than gold because it lasts longer and reaches beyond this temporal order, is purified in the tests of life. Gold, not faith, is presently highly valued by people. But God will set his stamp of approval on faith that has been tested and will show this when Christ is revealed. Then believers will openly share in the praise, glory, and honor of God.

8 Faith is directed toward Jesus Christ and produces love and joy in Christians. Without seeing Jesus (either because they were second-generation believers or because they were geographically removed), Peter's readers have come to love Jesus because they believe he loved them enough to die for them. Christians do not rejoice with inexpressible joy because of sufferings but because of the glorious expectation of their future with Christ.

9 "For you are receiving" gives the reason for the paradoxical joy, while stressing that the anticipated salvation is even now in the process of realization. The "goal" (GK 5465) or consummation of faith is "the salvation of your souls." No soul-and-body dichotomy of Greek thought is implied. The "soul" (GK 6034) is used in the Semitic biblical sense of "self" or "person." Therefore the thought of this section closes with the believers' total enjoyment in this present age of their future salvation.

2. The prophecy of salvation (1:10–12)

10–11 This salvation was the subject of the OT prophecies of the messianic sufferings and glories. The prophets not only spoke to the situation of their contemporaries, but they also spoke of the longed-for messianic times. In predicting the future, they did not always understand their utterances (the clearest example is Daniel and his visions [8:27; 12:8] and his study of other prophets [9:2ff.]). The prophets longed to see the messianic time and so searched into what they could know of it (cf. Lk 10:24).

The motivating force in prophecy is not the human will but the Holy Spirit of God (cf. 2Sa 23:2; 2Pe 1:21). The content of the prophecies embraced both the "sufferings" (GK 4077) and the "glories" (GK 1518) of Christ (cf. Lk 24:26). Both words are plural. The gospels list various aspects of the predicted sufferings of Christ—e.g., hatred by his people, betrayal by his friend, being forsaken by his flock, his scourging and crucifixion, etc. His glories include his transfiguration (2Pe 1:17), his resurrection (1:21), his glorious return, and his final reign.

12 Through revelation the prophets learned that some of their utterances related to future generations. Their writings contain both "near" and "far" aspects. Yet the prophets were often unable to understand the time significance of their prophecies or to understand fully the relation of the sufferings of the Messiah to his glory. The word translated "serving" (GK 1354) is significant, for it points to the fact that the writings of the OT are of service to the new community—the church. The unity of the OT and NT writings centers in Christ and his salvation. This message of salvation has come to humanity through people under the power of the Holy Spirit, who has come from heaven.

The last statement of v.12 is especially significant—"even angels long to look into these things." The Scriptures reveal that the angels have intense interest in human salvation. They observed Jesus in his early life (1Ti 3:16); they rejoice at the conversion of a sinner (Lk 15:10); they will rejoice in songs of praise at the completion of redemption (Rev 5:11–14). The expression to "long [GK 2121] to look" means "to stoop over to look" (cf. Lk 24:12; Jn 20:5, 11; Jas 1:25). It implies a willingness to exert or inconvenience oneself to obtain a better perspective. The specific tense used means continuous regard rather than a quick look. The Bible says nothing about salvation for angels. On the contrary, they learn about it from the church (Eph 3:10); and they serve the church (Heb 1:14).

B. The Lifestyle of Salvation (1:13–25)

1. A life of hope and holiness (1:13–16)

13 "Therefore" relates this section to the previous one, which gives the basis of the commands in these verses; the reception of salvation must result in a life of holiness, reverence, and love. Moreover, since the prophets and the angels take great interest in this salvation, how much more should Christians pay careful attention to its results! Peter here changes to the imperative, citing commands that give specific direction to his readers.

"Prepare your minds for action" presents the figure of a man gathering the folds of his long garment and tucking it into his belt so that he can move freely and quickly (cf. 1Ki 18:46: Jer 1:17; Lk 17:8). "Be self-controlled" (GK 3768) originally meant abstaining from excessive use of wine. In the NT its sense broadens to "live soberly"—a meaning that embraces sound judgment in all areas of life.

The main emphasis of v.13 is on putting one's hope wholly in the final consummation of the grace of God in Jesus Christ. At the present time, we enjoy only a beginning of that grace (cf. 1Jn 3:2–3). This longing for the unveiling of Jesus at his second coming permeates the NT (cf. Ac 1:11; Ro 11:26. 1Co 15:51; 1Th 4:13ff.; Heb 9:28; Jas 5:8; 2Pe 3:12–13; Rev 1:7; et al.)

14 The Christians' lifestyle is not to conform to the base desires that formerly dominated them and kept them from God. Christians must not allow the world to squeeze them into its sinful mold (cf. Ro 12:2). Peter exhorts Christians to control their desires rather than to be controlled by them. Formerly Christians were in ignorance; now they have come to know God and his will. They are to be "children of obedience"—an expression describing not only their quality but also their nature.

15–16 God is first described as the one who "called" (GK 2813) them. This verb implies the divine calling or what theologians term "efficacious grace." God is described as "holy" (GK 41). Holiness embraces purity and moral integrity. Those called to be God's children are to be like him; Peter reinforces this command by citing Leviticus (cf. 11:44–45; 19:2; 20:7). The basic idea of holiness in the Bible is that of separation from all that is profane. The developed sense of holiness includes various meanings translated into English as "purify," "sanctify," "separate from," "dedicate," etc. The simplest definition of holiness is that of conformity to God's commands and to his Son (cf. 1Jn 2:4–6).

2. A life of reverence before God (1:17–21)

17 This verse carries on the call to a lifestyle that is different from that of non-Christians. Peter reminds Christians that they invoke God as "Father" and that as his children (v.14) they should indeed call on him constantly in prayer. But God is Judge as well as Father, and those who call on his name must remember that he is impartial in judgment. Simply because some people call themselves Christians does not mean that all will be well for them in the Judgment. Sinners "will not stand in the judgment" (Ps 1:5–6); at the Last Judgment the unregenerate will be doomed. Those who have been saved by grace must walk in good works as the evidence of grace (Eph 2:10). They too will have their lives evaluated by God (Ro 14:10–12; 1Co 3:13–17; 2Co 5:10) and will receive according to what they have done. Yet justified persons cannot be condemned (Ro 8:1, 34); only the Lord who knows the hearts knows who the justified are.

Since judgment is certain, Christians must live in reverential awe of God—yet not in terror, for peace is one of their prerogatives (1Pe 1:2). The Christian life is a temporary stay on this earth (cf. comment on 1:1). So the brief time granted us should be used carefully.

18–19 The logic of this verse is "Live . . . because you know!" That is, the Christian life is lived out of knowledge of the redemption that Christ has accomplished. What do Christians know? Peter reminds his readers of the cost of redemption, based on the value of the Person of the righteous Messiah himself.

The Greek word for "redeem" (GK 3390) goes back to the institution of slavery in ancient Rome. Any representative first-century church would have three kinds of members: slaves, freemen, and freed men. People became slaves in various ways—through war, bankruptcy, sale by themselves, sale by parents, or by birth. Slaves normally could look forward to freedom after a certain period of service and often after the payment of a price. Money to buy one's freedom could be earned by the slave in his spare time or by doing more than his owner required. Often the price would be provided by someone else, who purchased a person's freedom from servitude. A freed man was a person who formerly had been a slave but was now set free. Jesus also described his ministry in this picture taken from slavery (cf. Mk 10:45).

The redemption of Christians is from the "empty" (GK 3469) lifestyle of their ancestors. This implies Peter's readers had come from a pagan lifestyle rather than a Jewish one, for the NT stresses the emptiness of paganism (cf. Ro 1:21; Eph 4:17).

Verse 19 stresses the value of the purchase price of redemption and at the same time identifies the blood as that of a spotless lamb—the Messiah. When Israel was in bondage in Egypt, the Passover lamb was killed and its blood provided release from slavery and judgment. Because Jesus is without sin, he is unique and his life is of infinite value as the Sacrificial Lamb of the Passover (cf. Ex 12:46; Jn 19:36; 1Co 5:7).

20 Jesus "was chosen before the creation of the world." "Chosen" (lit., "known before"; GK 4589) means more than "foresight," for why would Peter at this point make the obvious statement that God knew before about Jesus and his death? Rather, "chosen" connotes purpose (cf. Ro 11:2), giving the idea of predestination. That is, redemption was in God's plan before the time of creation (cf. Eph 1:3–4). And now this redemption has been "revealed" in Jesus of Nazareth "in these last times." With the coming of Jesus, the last age has come (cf., e.g., Ac 2:17; Heb 1:2; 9:26). Salvation in Christ, purposed from eternity, is now made plain, Peter tells his readers, "for your sake." He personalizes it so as to spur them to a life of response to God.

21 The section closes with a statement about the believers' faith in God. That faith comes through the work of Jesus because he is the one who reveals the Father (Jn 1:18) and because he is the means of reconciliation (2Co 5:19). Peter identifies the Father (v.17) as the God who raised Jesus and glorified him, with the result that believers have faith and hope in God. Jesus' resurrection is the foundation of our faith, and his glorification is the pledge of the hope of our new future (cf. Ro 8:17–30; 1Co 15:1–11; Heb 2:10).

3. A life of love (1:22–25)

22 In the third subdivision of this section on the Christian way of life, Peter adds to the command to be holy and to reverence God, the command to "love" (GK 26). He also gives two reasons for Christians to love one another. The first is that they have "purified" (GK 49) themselves, a word that is not common in the NT but denotes the moral purity that comes to Christians through the Gospel.

The means of this purification is "by obeying the truth" of the Gospel (cf. Ac 15:9; Ro 10:16; 2Th 1:8). The Good News carries with it a command to repent and believe. In the early church, this was commonly tied to baptism. Not that the church believed that baptism itself saved; rather, it was the focal point of decision (cf. Ac 2:38). Being purified from sin enables Christians to show genuine family love for God's children. Yet this love is not entirely a foregone conclusion, because it can be and is commanded.

This love is to be "from a pure heart" (see NIV note). So Peter exhorts Christians—because they are purified—to love fellow Christians purely and fervently. Love for non-Christians is not in view here, but of course it is also part of Christians' obligations (cf. Mt 5:44; Lk 6:27, 35). The NT teaches that there are different kinds of love and different emotions of love. Yet Christians are enabled to love all people with true Christian love—a self-sacrificing desire to meet the needs of others that finds expression in concrete acts (cf. 1Jn 3:14–18).

23 Peter now expresses the second reason for Christians to love others: "you have been born again." This phrase stresses the state into which Christians come at conversion. What is the "seed" that gives the new birth? Though some connect it with baptism and others with the seed of divine life, it is best explained as the life-giving message about Jesus' death and resurrection. That is, the new birth comes through the living and abiding word of God. By the "word" (GK 3364), Peter probably means "God's self-revelation," which would include both his spoken and written message. God's word is living because it imparts life (cf. Ps 33:9; Isa 55:10–11; Heb 4:12). It endures because the God who speaks it is the eternal, faithful, powerful One who keeps his promises.

24 The quotation from Isa 40:6–8 supports the assertion of the character of God, with its stress on the abiding faithfulness of the Lord's statements. The quotation comes from Isaiah's so-called "Book of Comfort," his inspired messages to an exiled and oppressed people. How fitting the application is to pilgrim Christians (cf. 1Pe 1:1) in the light of their oppression by the pagan world! The theme of Isaiah's prophecy is the perishable nature of all flesh and the imperishable nature of the Word of God. To the exiles in Babylon, the message was that while human help is weak, God's promise of restoration will not fail.

25 Peter now applies Isaiah's words. Since Jesus is equivalent to the Lord in the OT, his utterances endure. So he stresses the specifically Christian application of the Isaiah prophecy. The reliable message about Jesus as proclaimed to Peter's readers gives life and transforms life so that Christians are able to love.

C. Growth in Salvation (2:1–10)

This section flows logically out of the previous section (cf. "therefore"). Peter uses a variety of images to describe the Christian life. He begins by speaking of "stripping off" habits like garments and then compares Christians to babies. Next he likens them to stones in the temple and finally to a chosen, priestly people.

1. Growth through the pure milk (2:1–3)

1 Peter's Christian readers have obeyed the truth of the Gospel and were purified (1:21). Therefore they must "rid" themselves (GK 700) of various pagan vices. He is probably reminding them of what was symbolized in their baptism, the focal point of their commitment to Christ, when they stripped off the old life and made a new beginning in repentance and faith. Vice lists such as this were common in the ancient world and in the NT (cf. Mk 7:21–22; Ro 1:29–31; 13:13; 1Co 5:10; Gal 5:19–20, 2Pe 2:10–14).

2 Peter's addressees were, in the main, new converts, i.e., "newborn." A major characteristic of a healthy new baby is its instinctive yearning for its mother's milk. Christians are to crave what is "pure" milk in contrast to the "deceit" (v.1) of the old life. The "spiritual milk" is probably a reference to the Word of God. Therefore the translation might be expanded to "crave the unadulterated spiritual milk of the word." Continuous nourishment from this "milk" causes the newborn to "grow up in [their] salvation." Salvation is the present possession of Christians as well as their future goal (cf. 1Pe 1:5, 9). After conversion, their lives should be marked by continuous growth (cf. 1Co 3:1–4; Heb 5:11–14). This growth comes from the teaching about Christ and God the Father that is at the core of God's Word.

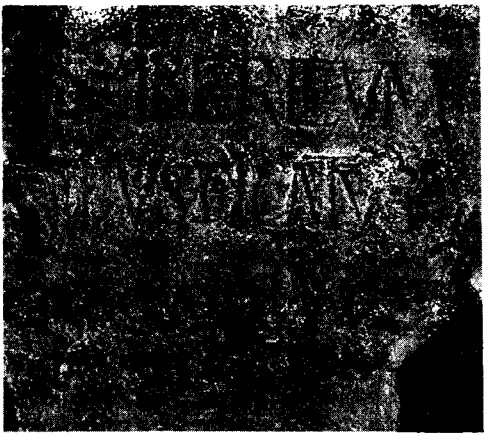
3 The image of "tasting" the Lord goes back to Ps 34:8: "Taste and see that the LORD is good." Those who have come to taste the graciousness or goodness of the Lord should have a continuing appetite for spiritual food. In Ps 34 the reference is to Yahweh ("LORD"; GK 3378), Israel's God. In his writings, Peter applies the Greek word used to translate this title—i.e.,"Lord" (GK 3261)—to Jesus. He thus implies the full deity of Christ.

2. Participation in the temple and priesthood (2:4–10)

a. Christ the Rock and the Christian living stones (2:4–8)

4 This section is connected to the previous one by the relative clause "As you come to him," by the continued use of Ps 34, and by the concept of Christians' finding in Christ great value. But the figure changes, for Peter now presents Christ as a rock or a stone. The "rock-stone" imagery is common in Scripture: see the stumbling stone of Isa 8:14, the foundation-stone of Isa 28:16, the parental rock of Isa 51:1–2, the rejected stone of Ps 118:22, the supernatural stone of Da 2:34, and the burdensome stone of Zec 12:3. "Rock/Stone" was an accepted messianic title among the Jews as well as among Christians.

"As you come to him" probably reflects "come to him" in v.5 of the Greek translation of Ps 34 (LXX). Christians have "come" to Christ in salvation, but their continual "coming" is also required. Jesus Christ is identified as the "living Stone," a word that refers to his stability as the risen Lord. God's raising of Jesus from the dead shows his value and God's choice of him. The "rejected" Christ is the rejection of Jesus by the Jewish nation (Mt 26:14–15; Ac 2:22–24; 3:13–15; 4:10–11), as well as the current rejection of him by the disobedient in every land.



5 Jesus' great prophecy to Peter (Mt 16:18–19) concerned Jesus' building of his church. Peter sees, in the coming of individuals to Jesus the Rock, the building of a new spiritual edifice. Solomon was amazed at the thought of God's gracious condescension in dwelling among his people and in a house (the temple) that Solomon built (1Ki 8:27). Now the localized manifestation of God's presence on earth is replaced by his indwelling of all believers (1Co 3:17; 6:19).

"Are being built" (GK 3868) is descriptive of believers of all ages in history. When anyone comes to Christ, a new stone is added to the "spiritual" (GK 4461) house. The use of the word "spiritual" does not mean that what Peter is speaking of is less "real" than a material house or material sacrifices. Rather, the material sacrifices and temples that were shadows of the reality to come are now superseded. The OT spoke of the offerings of prayer, thanksgiving, praise, and repentance (Pss 50:14; 51:19; 107:22; 141:2) in addition to material sacrifices and offerings. The NT speaks of the offering of "faith" (Php 2:17), material gifts as "a fragrant offering" (Php 4:18), "your bodies as living sacrifices" (Ro 12:1), "a sacrifice of praise" (Heb 13:15), the conversion of the Gentiles as "an offering acceptable to God" (Ro 15:16), and Paul's coming death as "a drink offering" (2Ti 4:6).

The great new truth Peter states here is the revelation that "through Jesus Christ," i.e., through his work on the Cross, every Christian is part of a new priestly order. This truth of the "priesthood of all believers" was rediscovered and restressed during the Reformation. It means that all Christians have immediate access to God, that they serve God personally, that they minister to others, and that they have something to give. This does not mean, however, that each Christian has public gifts of preaching or teaching. In this verse Peter is stressing the reassuring fact that through Christ believers are able to worship and serve God in a manner pleasing to him.

6 Next Peter cites Scripture to support his teaching. The quotation of Isa 28:16 refers to God's foundation stone, carefully chosen and very costly, placed in position in Zion. The picture is from the building of a temple. At great cost and care the corner foundation stone was obtained, moved, and laid. Once in place, the rest of the building was determined. Isaiah uses this figure to encourage his people to build on the Lord himself, the one who is immovable and unchangeable. As Peter applies this, God has set Jesus forth in Jerusalem as the foundation of the new temple. Whoever builds on this foundation will be established and will never be ashamed (cf. 1Co 3:10; Eph 2:20).

7 "Now to you who believe, this stone is precious" literally reads, "For you, therefore, who believe [is] the honor [GK 5507]." The honor for Christians is linked to their union with Christ. Since Christ is honored by God, so will all who participate in Christ. But for unbelievers, two other "stone" citations from the OT are strong warnings. The first is from Ps 118:22, where the builders rejected a building block that later turned out to be the final stone (the capstone) in the building (cf. Mk 12:10–12). In the same way, Jesus, who was rejected by human beings, has been exalted by God.

This cornerstone of Pilate, found at Caesarea, was reused elsewhere after he was rejected as governor.

8 The second warning is from Isa 8:14, where the disobedient are portrayed as stumbling over the stone. So Peter warns that those who refuse to believe in Jesus as Messiah stumble—"which is also what they were destined for." What is it that is "destined" (GK 5502)? The unbelief of these people or the stumbling that is the result of the unbelief? More likely the latter. Peter probably means to say that the appointment of God embraces both the setting forth of Christ and his work and the rejection by others. Peter's preaching in Ac 2:14–40 made the same emphasis (cf. esp. v.23). Scripture in other places teaches that human disobedience is within the plan of God (cf. Ro 11:8, 11, 30–32). Yet it must be recognized that though this is true, one does not become less blameworthy (cf. Ac 2:23). It is important to recognize also that human disobedience is not necessarily final or irretrievable. Paul says, "God has bound all men over to disobedience so that he may have mercy on them all" (Ro 11:32).

b. The nation of priests (2:9–10)

9 "But you" marks the contrast with the disobedient who were mentioned in vv.7–8. Peter applies to the church various terms originally spoken concerning Israel (cf. Ex 19:5–6; Dt 4:20; 7:6; Isa 43:20–21). But this does not mean that the church is Israel or even that the church replaces Israel in the plan of God. Romans 11 should help us to guard against that misinterpretation. Why then does Peter apply OT terminology to the church? He does so chiefly because of the conviction of the church that the OT writings are for it (2Ti 3:16) and that these writings speak of Jesus and his times. The functions that Israel was called into existence to perform in its day of grace the church now performs in a similar way. In the future, according to Paul, God will once again use Israel to bless the world (cf. Ro 11:13–16, 23–24).

The title "chosen people" (GK 1723 & 1169) stresses God's loving initiative in bringing the church to himself. "Royal priesthood" (GK 994 & 2633) may be understood as "a royal house" and "a body of priests." Both titles stress the dignity of the church because of its union with Christ. Jesus is King, and all in his "house" belong to a royal house. Calling the church "a body of priests" emphasizes its corporate role in worship, intercession, and ministry. "Holy nation" (GK 41 & 1620) shows that God has "set apart" the church for his use. The title "a people [GK 3295] belonging to God" stresses ownership (cf. Tit 2:14). "That you may declare the praises" gives the purpose of God's grace to people. "The praises" (GK 746) often means his "self-declarations" or his manifestations to humankind. So then the church is to advertise the noble acts of God in history and thus make him known. Specifically, the Father ("him who called you"; cf. 1:15) is revealed by Jesus in his death and resurrection. Peter again reminds them of God's action in bringing them out of darkness into his marvelous light (cf. Ps 34:5: "Those who look to him are radiant"). Light-darkness is a common dualism in the Bible to contrast God-evil, good-bad, revelation-ignorance, new age-old age (e.g., Isa 8:21–9:2; Jn 1:4, 8–9; Eph 5:8; 1Jn 1:5–2:2).

10 Peter closes this section with another free use of the OT—this time the words of Hosea (Hos 1:6, 9–10; 2:23). In their original context they describe God's rejection of disobedient Israel, followed by future restoration to grace. Here Peter applies them to the salvation that has come to the Asian Christians. Once they were "not a people [GK 3295]"—the special word used for Israel); now they are "the people of God."

III. Christian's Submission and God's Honor (2:11–3:12)

A. The Noble Life and God's Glory (2:11–12)

11 This next division of the letter deals with some practical implications of what it means to be God's people in a hostile world. Peter begins by reminding them of their position. He calls them "Dear friends" (lit., "beloved"; GK 28) because they are bound together by Christ's love. Then he exhorts them as "foreigners and strangers." These titles are rich in content, going back to Abraham (cf. Ge 23:4; cf. also Ps 39:12; Heb 13:14, 1Pe 1:1, 17). Christians are only in the world, not of it, for their true destiny is the renewed earth in which righteousness will dwell. Therefore, they are not to derive their values from what is transitory. So Peter warns of "sinful desires."

The body's desires are not wrong or sinful in themselves, but sin perverts them; and the Christian is tempted to satisfy the bodily desires in ways contrary to God's will. "Which war against your soul" speaks of the warfare that is a mortal threat against the entire person (cf. comment on 1:9). Peter's exhortation means that Christians are not to participate in pagan immorality.

12 Instead, Christians are to have a "noble lifestyle" among the pagans. The purposes of the godly life of Christians are twofold. (1) As the pagans take careful notice of our good works, they will not slander us. (2) In the future they will glorify God. What kind of charges did non-Christians make in Peter's time? Some of the more common were disloyalty to the state or Caesar (Jn 19:12), upsetting trade or divination (Ac 16:16ff.; 19:23ff.), teaching that slaves are "free" (cf. 1Co 13:13; Gal 3:20), not participating in festivals because of "hatred of mankind" (cf. Col 2:16), holding "antisocial" values, and being "atheists" because they had no idols (cf. Ac 15:29).

The meaning of "on the day he visits us" is problematic. Does Peter mean "on the return of the Lord" or "on God's gracious visitation of salvation that may come to the non-Christian?" In favor of the latter is the word "see" (GK 2227), which suggests that the pagans will continuously observe the good works and perhaps God will grant them repentance unto life.

B. The Duty of Christian Submission (2:13–3:7)

1. The submission to civil authority (2:13–17)

13–14 "Submit yourselves" (GK 5718; cf. 2:13, 18; 3:1) is the key theme of this section of the letter. The word in general means to "subject oneself." Here it means acquiescence in the divinely willed order of society. The phrase "every authority instituted among men" is perhaps better translated as "every human creature." Peter's thought is that of Christians who do not seek their own interests but rather assume a voluntary submission of themselves to others. The reason for this submission is expressed in the phrase "because of the Lord." "The Lord" here means Christ in his divine lordship order as manifest in his creative activity (cf. Jn 1:1–4; Col 1:16; Heb 1:2).

Peter then mentions the rulers of the time. The "king" (GK 995) is the title used in the East for the emperor who had the "supreme authority" among people. The "governors" (GK 2450) are the legates, procurators, or proconsuls charged with carrying out the imperial will of punishing the disobedient and rewarding the good.

15 Peter is speaking of ordinary situations and not of persecutions (cf. Ac 4:18ff.; 5:18ff.) when he speaks of governors as commending the good. Later in this letter, he deals with the more difficult situation of governmental persecution of those who do good (3:14, 17; 4:1, 12–19). No government that consistently rewards evil and punishes good can long survive, because evil is ultimately self-destructive. It is God's will for Christians by their submission to the state authorities to "silence the ignorant talk of foolish men." The word "foolish" (GK 933) is a common biblical adjective for an obstinate sinner.

16 Christians are free because the service of God is freedom (cf. Jn 8:32; Ro 6:15; Gal 5:13)—freedom from bondage to sin, Satan, and selfish desires. Christians are not to misuse their freedom in Christ and invoke "freedom" as a covering for wickedness. Christ himself said, "I tell you the truth, everyone who sins is a slave to sin" (Jn 8:34). In the service of God, who is the source of joy, Christians experience perfect freedom, because Christ frees us from the bondage of sin.

17 Peter next sums up the social obligation of Christian in four succinct commands. (1) "Show proper respect to [lit., honor; GK 5506] everyone." Peter instructs us to recognize the value of each person in his or her place as a creature of God. (2) "Love the brotherhood." Special love is due to others within the family of believers because they are brothers and sisters. (3) "Fear God." (4) "Honor the king." God is to be feared, but the emperor was only to be honored. Christ taught, "Do not be afraid of those who kill the body but cannot kill the soul. Rather, be afraid of the one [i.e., God] who can destroy both soul and body in hell" (Mt 10:28). Normally duties to God and Caesar do not conflict, and Christians can obey both (Mt 22:15–21); but in special cases their higher loyalty is clear: "We must obey God rather than men!" (Ac 5:29).

2. The submission of slave to master (2:18–25)

a. The submission of household slaves (2:18–20)

18 It is difficult for twentieth-century Christians to understand the slavery of the ancient world. During the time of the NT writings, slavery was not as bad as that practiced in America before the Civil War. Ancient slaves had fairly normal marital lives. Often people sold themselves into slavery (for a period of time) as a way to get ahead in the world. Nevertheless the lot of a slave could be very hard if the master was unkind. Here "slaves" (GK 3860) means "house-servants"—i.e., domestic slaves. Their Christian duty was submission and loyalty to their master, even if he was harsh.

19 Peter motivates this latter clause. "For it," he writes, "is commendable"—i.e., a "grace" (GK 5921). It is an attractive quality in the sight of God when because of conscience (or perhaps "consciousness" of God) a Christian slave puts up with pain as he suffers unjustly.

20 To endure a well-deserved "beating" (lit., "strike with the fist"; cf. Mk 14:65) is nothing extraordinary. However, it is "commendable" in the sight of God to do good and to endure suffering. The commendable thing is not the suffering as such but being so committed to God's will that devotion to him overrides personal comfort.

b. The example of Christ's submission (2:21–25)

21 Peter's exhortation for Christians to be submissive now receives a christological foundation. Christians are "called" (GK 2813) to suffer. The "calling" is God's grace that brings them to salvation (cf. comment on 1:15) and includes the divine ordination in all aspects of their life (Ro 8:28–30), "because Christ also suffered for you." The sufferings of Christ referred to here are exemplary as well as expiatory on behalf of Christians. "Leaving you an example [GK 5681]" shows that Christ is the pattern for believers to copy in their lives. Just as in his life Christ suffered unjustly for doing God's will, so Christian slaves may have this calling. Servants are to follow their Master's tracks (cf. Mt 10:38; Mk 8:34; Jn 13:15).

22–23 The preeminent OT passage on the suffering of the Messiah is Isaiah's fourth Servant Song (Isa 52:13–53:12). Peter quotes Isa 53:9 to stress the submission of the innocent Sufferer. Other echoes of Isa 53 sound in the next verses: 53:12 in v.24a; 53:5 in v.24b; 53:6 in v.25. Throughout his earthly ministry, Jesus was reviled (cf. Mt 11:19; 26:67; 27:30, 39–44; Mk 3:22). In all these situations, he was ever the patient sufferer who was able to control his tongue. He committed his case to the heavenly Judge whom he trusted to give a just judgment.

24–25 Peter explores the sufferings of the Messiah more deeply. He has stated that Christ was patient and innocent. Moreover, his sufferings for us are indeed expiatory and substitutionary. He did no sin (v.22) and he "bore our sins" (v.24; cf. Jn 1:29). The exact figure of bearing sins is not clear. It may be a reference to the scapegoat (Lev 16), to other Levitical sacrifices (cf. Lev 14:20; Isa 53:12), or to the basic ideas involved in the sacrificial system. The location of the expiatory offering was "in his body on the tree" (cf. Dt 21:23; Gal 3:13; Col 1:22). The purpose of Christ's death on the cross is to produce new life in the believer. By means of it all those who come to him end their old life and begin a new one devoted to righteousness (cf. Ro 6:1–14, 18–19; 2Co 5:14–15; Gal 2:20; 6:14).

"By his wounds you have been healed" is Peter's application of this precious truth from Isaiah to Christian slaves who had received lashes unjustly. Formerly they were straying sheep (Isa 53:6; Lk 15:3–7) but now they "have returned" to Jesus, the "Shepherd and Overseer of your souls" (cf. Jn 10).

3. The submission of Christian wives (3:1–6)

1 "In the same way" in both v.1 and v.7 points back to 2:13. Christian wives are not to be submissive like slaves; rather, the principle of Christian subjection to God's will relates to every class and every situation. Rules for wives occur in other locations in the NT (Eph 5:22; Col 3:18; 1Ti 2:9–15; Tit 2:4–5).

The phrase translated "so that" introduces the purpose of the command. Here an evangelistic motivation is added to the general necessity of the divine order. As the Gospel was proclaimed, it was always possible for a wife to be converted before her husband. In such a situation where the man is disobedient to the Gospel message, he may be "won over" (GK 3045) for the faith without a word by the way his wife lives.

2 The husband will then observe purity of life lived in the "fear" (NIV, "reverence"; GK 5832) of God. Note might be taken here of the mother of Augustine, who eventually led her husband to accept Christ.

3–4 The divinely intended manner of life for wives is inward, not outward. Human beings constantly make superficial value judgments (see 1Sa 16:7). Many have taken Peter's words to be an absolute prohibition of any outward adornment. But Peter's emphasis is not on prohibition but on a proper sense of values.

The "inner self" is the "hidden person of the heart," or the character of a person. In biblical psychology the "heart" (GK 2840) is the central psychological term and refers to the faculty where a human being relates to God and makes basic decisions (cf. Pr 3:5; 4:23; 21:1). The Christian woman is to cultivate an inner disposition ("spirit"; GK 4460) of a "gentle" (lit., meek"; GK 4558; applied to Christ in Mt 11:29) and quiet sort that is imperishable or "unfading." Today, when the world's values governed by materialism, self-assertion, and sex obsession are seeping into the church, Peter's words need to be taken seriously (cf. Isa 3:16–24).

5–6 Next Peter turns to the OT in support of his exhortation—first broadly and then from the example of Sarah. The major characterization of these women who were "holy" because they were set apart to God was their hope in God. They trusted the promises of God and longed for the messianic salvation (cf. 1:3, 13, 3:15; Heb 11:13). In so doing, they were habitually adorning themselves with an inner beauty.

The great model of womanly submission is Sarah, whose respect and obedience to Abraham extended to her speech—she "called him her master." Such terminology was not uncommon in the ancient world (cf. Ge 18:12). Peter does not hesitate to apply Sarah's example to his readers: "You are her daughters if you do what is right." The norm for wifely conduct should be submission to God and devotion to the development of Christian character. Moreover, wives are "not [to] give way to fear"; their submissive trust in the living God will keep them from undue apprehension.

4. The obligation of Christian husbands (3:7)

7 Peter's instructions for the Christian husband are brief, probably because the family normally followed the husband's religious choice. Yet the husband too needed instruction concerning the care of his wife. "In the same way" does not refer back to subjection to the wife (v.1) but rather to the husband doing in the relationship of marriage everything possible to foster the spiritual life of the home. A harsh or unthinking Christian husband can be a hindrance to the family's spiritual growth. The woman is called the "weaker partner" (lit., "vessel"; GK 5007); but this is not to be taken morally, spiritually, or intellectually. It simply means that the woman has less physical strength. The husband must recognize this difference and take it into account. "As you live with" probably refers to sexual intercourse in addition to the broader aspects of living together. The husband is to show his wife "respect" (lit., "honor"; GK 5507) and not despise her physical weakness.

Men are also to remember that women are coheirs of "the gracious gift of life." The sexual function and sexual distinctions are only for this age. Women will have an equal share in the new age; and even now in the life of the new age, they experience the grace of God equally with men (cf. Gal 3:28). Men must also remember that selfishness and egotism in the marriage relationship will mar their relationship with God.

C. The Call to Righteous Living (3:8–12)

8 Peter brings his treatment of the duties of Christians, considered in various groupings, to a close with general practical advice for the whole community. Here he gives several imperatives for Christians' getting along together. The five virtues in v.8 have many illustrations in the life of Jesus and parallels in the other letters. They are normative qualities every person united to Christ should manifest. On "harmony," see Ro 12:16; Php 1:27; 2:2; on "be sympathetic," see Ro 12:15; 1Co 12:26; on "love as brothers," see 1Th 4:9–10; for "be compassionate," see Christ's example in Mt 11:29; and concerning "humble," see Christ's example as set forth in Php 2:5–11.

9 Peter goes on to give his readers a basic imperative for dealing with those who are hostile to them, turning to Christ as the pattern to follow. The natural response to hostility is retaliation. But Jesus in his teaching (Mt 5:44) and in his practice responded to hostility with grace (Lk 23:34; 1Pe 2:21–22). What does it mean to "bless" (GK 2328) our enemies? It means "to speak well [of someone]." The word includes friendly disposition toward one's enemies, but it goes beyond this to active prayer and intercession (cf. Ac 7:60; 1Co 4:12). The great desire of Christians must not be revenge but for God to grant the gift of repentance to those who do not know him. The phrase "because to this" probably means that the calling of Christians to grace should make them gracious to others.

10–12 Peter now reinforces his teaching of non-retaliation by going to Ps 34:12–16, which he has already alluded to in 2:3. In the psalm, the "life" and the "good days" refer to earthly life and joys. Peter's use of these terms is not limited to this life but goes beyond it to our final salvation. Yet it is still true in this age that being gracious to others may lead to longer life and better days. On the contrary, a life of evil and strife may be shortened and marred (cf. Pr 13:15).

Christians should desire life in its goodness. Therefore, they must guard their ways and their tongues. Most important, they are to overcome evil with good (cf. Ro 12:21). Since peace between people is elusive and hard to achieve, Christians must actively seek and pursue it. The fear of the Lord provides a rationale for godly living and a warning to the wicked. Our facial organs (vv.10–11) speak of our personal relationship with God. The "eye" of the Lord over the righteous reminds us of his providential care for his people (cf. Ex 2:25), and his "ear" is open to our cries for help in prayer (cf. Ex 3:7). The "face" of the Lord is an expression for "God's countenance"; here it relates to his anger against evildoers.

IV. The Suffering and Persecution of Christians (3:13–5:11)

Peter's major emphasis in this letter is on Christian conduct under persecution. Especially in this section, this is his chief concern.

A. The Blessing of Suffering for Righteousness (3:13–17)

13 While suffering and unjust treatment have been in the background (1:6–7; 2:12, 15, 19ff.; 3:9), now they come to the fore. If Christians have the zeal for good that Ps 34 speaks of, who will do them harm? The "harm" Peter alludes to must be understood in the light of Paul's rhetorical question "If God is for us, who can be against us?" (Ro 8:31) and his reference to Christians as being like "sheep to be slaughtered" and yet being "more than conquerors" (Ro 8:36–37).

14–16 The expression "But even if you should suffer" points to the fact that suffering is not the expected outcome of zeal for doing good, though it can and does happen. The suffering in view results from righteousness—i.e., from the kind of life that conforms to God's standard. If this should happen to his readers, they are "blessed" (GK 3421). This blessedness or happiness is the certainty that comes from belonging to God and his kingdom with the promises of future vindication (cf. Mt 5:3–10).

Verses 14b–15 are built on Isa 8:12b–13, where the prophet admonishes the godly in Israel not to fear the impending invasion as do the unbelievers. Instead, godly reverence is to be their concern (cf. Mt 10:28). Thus Peter admonishes his readers not to be afraid of other people but acknowledge "Christ as Lord." This passage is important for Peter's Christology, for here again he ascribes to Christ the OT name for the Lord (see comment on 2:3). Peter's readers are to acknowledge in their "hearts" (see comment on 3:3–4) Christ as the Holy One. When the center of a person's life is rightly related to God, he or she is able to respond properly to the vicissitudes of life.

One of the distinguishing marks of Christians is their possession of "hope" (GK 1828; cf. 1:3, 21; Ro 4:18; Eph 2:12; Tit 2:13). Christian hope is so real and distinctive that non-Christians are puzzled about it and ask for a "reason" (GK 3364). The type of questioning could be either official interrogations by the governmental authorities (cf. Ac 25:16; 26:2; 2Ti 4:16) or informal questioning.

Christians should respond with care. "Gentleness" (GK 4559) is the quality that trusts God to do the work of changing attitudes (cf. 2Ti 2:24–25; cf. also Pr 15:1); "respect" (GK 5832) is reverential awe of God (cf. 1:17; 2:17; 3:2). The "clear conscience" relates to the liberty and boldness that come from living before God in purity (cf. Ac 24:16; 1Ti 1:19). So in the case in which non-Christians slander believers the statement of the truth may shame them into silence (cf. Lk 13:17).

17 It is better to suffer for doing good than for doing evil. Suffering is a just recompense for doing evil. But if one does good and still suffers, there is no disgrace—if one's conscience is clear before God—for that person can have confidence that such suffering was not caused by sin. There must be a providential reason for it—perhaps to prick the conscience of some and bring them to salvation. Or suffering may be a necessary prelude to glorification (cf. Php 2:6–11).

B. The Pattern of Christ's Suffering and Exaltation (3:18–22)

This section contains some of the most difficult exegetical problems in the NT. We should give a brief overview of the three major types of interpretations before giving our exposition of the passage, These may be easily differentiated if the following questions are kept in one's mind: (1) Who are the "spirits" to whom Christ made a proclamation? (2) When did Christ make this proclamation? (3) What was its content?

(1) The first group sees Christ going down to the realm of the dead and preaching to Noah's contemporaries during the interval between his crucifixion and resurrection. His message is interpreted as an offer of salvation to the spirits, as the announcement of condemnation, or as the announcement of good tidings to those already saved.

(2) The second group views the preexistent Christ as preaching in the time of Noah to Noah's sinful generation.

(3) The third group sees Christ as proclaiming to the fallen angels his victory on the cross. This victorious proclamation took place perhaps during the three days in a literal descent into hell, but more likely it occurred during his exaltation. Our exposition develops and defends this third position.

18 The main purpose of vv.18–22 is fairly clear. "For Christ died" suggests that the example of Christ's experience through suffering into victory gives assurance that those joined to him will share the same destiny. "For Christ died for sins once for all" stresses the definitive and final work of Jesus in salvation (cf. Ro 6:10). "For sins" is a phrase describing the reason for his death (cf. Ro 4:25; 1Co 15:3; Gal 1:4; Heb 10:12). "The righteous for the unrighteous" points to Jesus as the Righteous Servant of Isa 53 (cf. Ac 3:13f.), who suffered in the place of the sinners (cf. Isa 53:5–6, 11–12) and thus died a substitutionary death. The purpose of his death is "to bring you to God" (cf. Ro 5:2, where a similar concept is taught).

He was "put to death in the body but made alive by the Spirit" can also be translated, "put to death in flesh, but made alive in spirit." Behind the NIV translation stand a number of problems. Paul's antithesis is between the Greek words for "flesh" (here "body"; GK 4922) and "spirit" (GK 4460). These two words do not refer to two "parts" of Christ (i.e., his body and his soul), nor does the "spirit" refer to the Holy Spirit or Christ's human spirit. Rather, "flesh" refers to Christ in his human sphere of life and "spirit" refers to Christ in his resurrected sphere of life (cf. Ro 1:3–4; 1Ti 3:16). If this view is adopted, the exegesis makes good sense.

19 "Through whom" can also mean "in which." If the reference in v.18 is to two different states of Christ, then v.19 says in which state he went and preached: the state of resurrection. To whom did Christ preach? The "spirits" are best understood as fallen angels. Jesus, then, in his resurrection "goes" to the place of angelic confinement. Since this is in another realm, we cannot locate it spatially. However, there does not seem to be good evidence for seeing here a literal "descent into hell."

What did he preach? The content of the proclamation is not stated, but Peter uses "preached" (GK 3062) rather than "proclaim good news" (GK 2294; cf. 4:6), because Christ did not announce the Gospel to the fallen angels. The thought of salvation for angels is foreign to the NT (Heb 2:16), including Peter (cf. comment on 1:12). The announcement is of Christ's victory and of their doom that has come through his death on the cross and his resurrection.

To sum up, the thought of vv.18–19 may be paraphrased as follows: "He was put to death in the human sphere of existence but was made alive in the resurrection sphere of existence, in which state of existence he made a proclamation of his victory to the fallen angels." As for the pastoral significance of these verses, it is one of comfort because through suffering Christians go on to victory. Those who oppose Christians will be defeated (Col 2:15; 2Th 1:6–8).

20 These fallen angels are now identified as those who were disobedient at the time of Noah. This connects with the rebellion of Ge 6:1–4 (see also 2Pe 2:4; Jude 6). Peter makes a connection between the disobedience of the spirits and the Flood-judgment. The Flood-judgment is a warning to humanity of God's coming final judgment on the disobedient world (cf. Mt 24:37–41; 2Pe 3:3–7). The ark that saved a few through water portrays the salvation now available in Christ.

21 Although the parallel between the OT deliverance of Noah's family and NT salvation through Christ is not precise in every detail, Peter says that the water of the Flood-judgment portrays the water of baptism.

Baptism is the counterpart of what is represented in the Flood, even the "fulfillment" of the OT deliverance from judgment. How does baptism "save" (GK 5392)? Peter says it does not concern an external washing from filth but relates to the "conscience" (GK 5287). In the proclamation of the Gospel, salvation from sin and its punishment is announced through Jesus' death and resurrection. The announcement of the penalty for sin stirs the conscience and the Spirit brings conviction (Jn 16:8–11; Acts 2:37–38; 13:37–41).

"The pledge of a good conscience toward God" renders a difficult expression in Greek. The thought appears to be as follows: The conviction of sin by the Spirit in the human mind calls for a response of faith or commitment to Christ and his work. This is concretely and "contractually" done in the act of baptism. Saving faith is expressed in baptism (cf. Ac 2:38–39). Salvation comes to people because Christ has risen from the dead.

22 Not only has Christ been raised from the dead, but in his victory he "has gone" into heaven to the place of power and authority (cf. Ps 110:1; Ro 8:34). "With angels, authorities and powers" now under him, he is the supreme Lord. Therefore, the oppressed Christians in Asia Minor to whom Peter is writing need not fear anyone. Psalm 110:1 speaks of Messiah sitting at God's right hand "until I [God] make your enemies a footstool for your feet." So now even the fallen angels are subject to Jesus the Messiah (cf. Ro 8:38–39; 1 Cor 15:24ff.).

C. Death to the Old Life (4:1–6)

1 "Suffered in his body" may be more literally translated "suffered in the flesh" (see comment on 3:18); this is a reference to Jesus' death. The thought appears to be this: Since Christ suffered to the extent of death in the realm of fleshly existence, Christians are to arm themselves with the same attitude that guided Christ.

"He who has suffered in his body is done with sin" is best taken as a proverbial expression and is linked in thought to Ro 6:7 (though it is also possible to refer this statement to Christ and the finality of his work against sin). By their union with Christ, Christians must understand that their conversion is a death to sin. Thus they are "done with sin."

2 Peter gives a twofold purpose for Christians' arming themselves with Christ's attitude as expressed in v.1. First, one "does not live the rest of his earthly [lit., in the flesh] life for evil human desires." One's life after conversion is not to be lived according to human passions, but the ruling principle is the will of God. Christ himself did God's will (Jn 8:29; cf. 4:34; 5:30; 6:38–40; 7:16–17), and he taught his disciples to pray, "Your will be done" (Mt 6:10).

3 The counsel of pagans is now contrasted with God's will. This verse clearly supports the position that the recipients of the letter had, before their conversion, been pagans. The "detestable idolatry" (or "illicit idolatries") distinguished the Jews from their pagan neighbors. The other items listed (cf. comment on 2:1) are the common excesses of drink, sex, and wild parties found among the non-Christians then (and now).

4–5 The Christian lifestyle of sober, godly living condemns the values of pagan society. Pagans will respond with astonishment when Christians refuse to plunge into the "flood of dissipation" (cf. the prodigal son's "wild living" in Lk 15:13), for they expect Christians to "plunge with them" into the pleasures of the satisfaction of the flesh. Peter's denial is at once a warning and a judgment on the life lived in such a fashion. The pagan amazement will often turn to hatred and evil speaking (cf. Jn 3:19–21).

Christians are supported in their stand against the ungodly life by the truth of the coming judgment. In both OT and NT, God is the Judge. Yet the NT also shows that the Father has given judgment into Jesus' hands (Jn 5:22–23). This judgment is near (4:7); it will be universal, for it will embrace all the living and the dead. In it unbelievers will have to give an account of their lives and will not be able to withstand the divine scrutiny (cf. Ps 1:5–6).

6 The interpretation of this verse is often linked to 3:19, but the vocabulary of the text and its context differ. There are four main interpretations of the "dead" in this passage (cf. comment on 3:18–22). (1) Christ, while in his three-day death, went and preached salvation to all the dead, offering salvation to those who lived in pre-Christian times. (2) Christ, while in his three-day death, went and preached salvation to the just of OT times.

(3) The apostles and others on this earth preached the Gospel to those who were spiritually dead. (4) The dead are Christians, who had the Gospel preached to them and who then died (or were put to death). Our interpretation falls in line with this fourth option.

"For this is the reason" points ahead to the rest of the sentence rather than looks back to vv.1–5. The coming judgment will not only bring sinners into account (v.5) but will also reverse the judgments of human beings (v.6). The Good News had been proclaimed to those (Christians) who are now dead. Even though pagans might condemn Christians and put them to death in the realm of the flesh, yet in God's judgment there will be a reversal. Christians will live in a new realm, the spiritual realm.

D. The Life for God's Glory (4:7–11)

7 As is common in the NT, the final salvation of Christians is set before them to stimulate their faith and to encourage them in difficulty. "The end of all things" has now drawn near. All is in readiness. "Therefore" introduces the ethical implications of this realization. Jesus taught responsible living in the light of his return (cf. Lk 12:35–43; 17:26–27). Christians must not give way to "eschatological frenzy" but practice self-control and be active in prayer. (Peter himself had set a negative example in his failure to watch and pray in the Garden [Mt 26:40–41].)

8 "Above all" reminds us of the primacy of agape, "love" (GK 26 & 27) among fellow Christians. This love is to be "eager" or "earnest" (NIV "deeply"; GK 1756). Such love can be commanded because it is not primarily an emotion but a decision of the will leading to action. The reason for us to show love is that "love covers over a multitude of sins." This quotation from Pr 10:12 does not mean that our love covers or atones for our sins. In the proverb the meaning is that love does not "stir up" or broadcast sins. So the major idea is that love suffers in silence and bears all things (1Co 13:5–7). Christians forgive faults in others because they know the forgiving grace of God in their own lives.

9 "Hospitality" (GK 5811) between Christians was an important, concrete expression of love in a world without our modern inns and hotels. This virtue was required of the overseers and widows (1Ti 3:2; 5:10; Tit 1:8) and is commanded for us all (Mt 25:35ff.; Ro 12:13; 3Jn 5–8). Hospitality is to be "without grumbling"—a phrase that connotes the difficulty of carrying out this command. In certain cultures that are strongly family-orientated, the bringing of strangers into a house may be somewhat shocking. Yet Christians overcome these conventions because God's love has made them into a single great family.

10–11 Hospitality is not a one-way virtue; all believers are in some way capable of ministering to others. Every Christian has a gift (Ro 12:6–8; 1Co 12:12–31) that he or she has received from God, presumably from the indwelling of the Holy Spirit at the time of regeneration. That the Holy Spirit can take "natural" talents and abilities and redirect them for Christ was most dramatically shown in Paul's ministry. Believers should not only view themselves as gifted but also as "serving" (GK 1354) others and as "administering" (GK 3313) the grace of God. One of the long-standing misconceptions in church practice is the idea that only one person is to "minister" in the local church. The biblical principle is that all can and should minister in various ways.

Peter puts these manifestations of grace in two broad categories: "speaking" (GK 3281) and "serving" (GK 1354). The former covers all forms of oral service—teaching, preaching, prophecy, perhaps even tongues. "The very words [GK 3359] of God" are utterances from God's mouth. So what one says must be as God says it (cf. 2Co 5:20; 1Th 2:13). As for service, it is to be empowered "with the strength God provides," which means by dependence on God's help by the Spirit (cf. Eph 3:16). The purpose of mutual Christian service is that through Jesus Christ God will be glorified. Serving fellow Christians does glorify God because people will praise him for his grace that comes to them through Jesus and through his followers.

Peter adds a doxology—something that is not uncommon in Christian letters at various places besides the end (cf. Ro 11:33–36; Eph 3:20–21). God possesses all glory (cf. Isa 6:1ff.) and all power (cf. Isa 46:9–10). The "Amen" signifies assent—"So it is!"

E. Consolations in Suffering (4:12–19)

12 "Dear friends" (see comment on 2:11) marks the beginning of a new section, which

(with 5:1–14) makes a fitting climax to the letter's argument. Suffering is not to be regarded as something foreign to Christian experience but rather as a refining test. Peter has already mentioned the necessity of faith being refined through suffering and testing (1:6–7). Here the idea of refining is found in the word "painful" (lit., "burning"; GK 4796), a word used in the refining of metals. Jesus himself said, "If the world hates you, keep in mind that it hated me first" (Jn 15:18; cf. 1Jn 3:13). In the light of Jesus' experience and teaching, his followers should expect troubles, but troubles should encourage them (cf. Jn 16:33).

13 In contrast to the usual response of sorrow and shock to suffering and persecution, Christians should rejoice because they are participating in Christ's sufferings (see also Ro 8:17; 2Co 1:5–7; Php 3:10). The apostles themselves rejoiced because they had been counted worthy of suffering disgrace for the name of Christ (Ac 5:41; 16:22–25). Christian rejoicing rests on the fact that just as we share in Christ's suffering, so we will share in his glory with great joy. The prospect of Christ's full manifestation in all his glory fills believers with joy and comfort.

14 Here we have a fulfillment of the Lord's own promises to his disciples when he said, "Blessed are you when people insult you, persecute you and falsely say all kinds of evil against you because of me. Rejoice and be glad" (Mt 5:11–12). In Matthew the cause for happiness is the reward in heaven; here it is the possession of the messianic Spirit. This verse is based on Isa 11:2 (perhaps also Ps 89:50–51). One of God's great characteristics is his glory (Ac 7:2; Eph 1:17), and in Jesus his glory is revealed (Jn 1:14, 18).

The Spirit of the Father and of the Son now rests on and in every believer. The martyrdom of Stephen illustrates this. He is described as "a man full of faith and of the Holy Spirit" (Ac 6:5; cf. v.8). In his defense his face was like that of an angel (Ac 6:15), and he saw the "glory of God" (7:55).

15 The blessing of the Spirit promised to those who suffer is not universal, for not all who suffer are sharing in Christ's sufferings. Much suffering is the punishment or consequence of sin. If they suffer, it should be because of their union with Jesus, not with evil. Christians must make a clear break with sin (4:1–3; cf. Ro 6:1ff.; 1Co 6:9–11). The sins mentioned here characterize a pagan, not a Christian, lifestyle. Yet it is possible for Christians to fall in times of weakness.

16 But to suffer as a "Christian" (GK 5985) is no shame. The title "Christian," which is now so common, was just coming into use when Peter wrote. At first Christians were known as "Jews," "disciples," "believers," "the Lord's disciples," and those "who belonged to the Way" (cf. Ac 1:15; 2:44; 6:1; 9:1–2). It was not until the church took root in Antioch that the word "Christians" for believers began to be used (see comment on Ac 11:26). Peter's injunction not to feel shame to suffer as a Christian recalls his own shame at his betrayal of Jesus (Mk 14:66–72). "That you bear that name" probably refers to the name "Christian."

17–18 Paul said, "We must go through many hardships to enter the kingdom of God" (Ac 14:22). Before the full unfolding of the messianic kingdom, there are to be judgments. In the Prophets, mention is made of judgment coming first upon the people of God (Eze 9:6; Zec 13:7–9; Mal 3:1–5) before coming upon the nations. Here in 1 Peter the idea seems to be that the coming of the Lord in his eschatological judgment has, as a harbinger, a beginning of "birth pains" that will purify believers (cf. 1:7). (This judgment is not, of course, a punishment for the believers' sins, which were laid on Jesus.) Now if the preliminary judgment (Christian suffering) is already taking place, the final doom on the disobedient is certain to follow shortly. Peter cites Pr 11:31 (in LXX) to reinforce this thought. The righteous are barely saved. The rest come far short, and only a great disaster awaits them.

19 The conclusion to this section is that the Christians who are suffering according to the divine will (1:6; 3:17) are to "commit [GK 4192] themselves" to God. In his seventh word from the Cross, Jesus used this verb in committing his Spirit to God (Lk 23:46). Peter describes God as the "faithful Creator." The combination of these two words reminds believers of God's love and power in the midst of trials so that they will not doubt his interest or ability. The continuation in good works is a concrete sign of the faith that is the essence of being a Christian (cf. 2:15, 20; 3:6, 17).

F. The Shepherd's Suffering Flock (5:1–4)

1 The "elders" (GK 4565) are the leaders of the local congregations. The institution of a group of older and wiser men providing direction and rule goes back to the early days of Israel as a people. This was done both nationally and locally. Thus there were "elders" of the Sanhedrin in Jerusalem as well as "elders" of local synagogues. The institution of eldership was adopted by the Jerusalem church (Ac 11:30; 21:18), and Paul and Barnabas applied it to the local congregations they founded on their missionary journeys (Ac 14:23; 1Ti 3:1–7; Tit 1:5ff.). Peter, therefore, addresses the elders because of their vital role in the life of the congregation.

In the Greek, this verse begins with "therefore." Because of suffering and persecution, the need of pastoral leadership was important for the local churches. The early church utilized more people than the church today does (see comment on 4:10; cf. Eph 4:12) and so put spiritual leadership in the hands of a plurality.

The basis of Peter's exhortation to the elders is threefold: (1) He is their fellow elder. In Jn 21:15–19, Jesus charged Peter with the care of his sheep. (2) He is a witness (GK 3459) of Christ's sufferings. It is possible Peter is referring here to the sufferings of Jesus that he had seen, though the stress is on the testimony (or witness) he gives to those sufferings (cf. Lk 24:45–48; Ac 1:8). (3) He is a sharer of the coming glory. It is notable that Peter does not issue commands as an apostle (much less as a "pope") but speaks as a fellow elder (cf. also John in 2Jn 1; 3Jn 1).

2–3 Peter's instruction is to "be shepherds of God's flock [GK 4480]." The comparison of God's people to a flock of sheep and the Lord to a shepherd is prominent in Scripture (see, for example, Ge 48:15; Pss 23; 100:3; Isa 53:6–7; Lk 15:3–7; Jn 10:1–16). The verb "to shepherd" (GK 4477) occurs in Christ's command to Peter (Jn 21:16) and in Paul's charge to the Ephesian elders (Ac 20:28). Its meaning embraces protecting, leading, guiding, feeding, etc. Peter reminds the elders that the flock is God's and that they are responsible for its loving care. "Serving as overseers" (GK 2174) reveals the interchangeability of the terms "bishop" ("overseer") and "elder" (see comment on Tit 1:7). The latter denotes the dignity of the office; the former denotes its function—"to oversee."

Peter's exhortation to the elders to be shepherds is followed by three contrasting statements that tell how this responsibility should be carried out and how not carried out. The positive statements are "serving as overseers ... because you are willing ... eager to serve." These words remind us of what Paul wrote to Timothy in 1Ti 3:1. Regarding the negative statements, (1) since the responsibilities of the office of elder are great and since elders will be required to give account of their work (Heb 13:17), no one should be forced into this position ("not because you must"). God will work in their lives and make them willing to do his will. The motivation of elders should be divine, not human. (2) Nor should the motivation be financial, though elders were evidently paid in the early church and handled the finances of congregations (cf. 1Co 9:7–11; 1Ti 5:17). Not money but enthusiasm and zeal for God and his work must motivate elders. (3) They are not to be "lords" over "those entrusted to" them. Probably in each congregation, individual elders had portions of the congregation for which they were particularly responsible. Elders should endeavor to be patterns for Christ's sheep.

4 Those elders who are faithful will receive a "crown of glory that does not fade away." The "crown" (GK 5109) could be a garland or wreath made of leaves or of gold. In Christ's suffering it was ironically made of thorns (Mt 27:29). The unfading "crown of glory" makes a striking contrast to the use of withered parsley used for the crown at the Isthmian games. The glorification will take place at the manifestation of the True Shepherd or Chief Shepherd (cf. Ro 8:17ff.; 1Jn 3:2).

G. Humility and Watchfulness in Suffering (5:5–9)

5 "Young men" most likely refers to young men in general. The women are not mentioned because their activity in the churches was limited in Peter's time. "In the same way" indicates a new unit of instruction (cf. 3:1, 7). The exhortation to submission is not limited to a few, but all Christians are to manifest this quality.

"Clothe yourselves" (GK 1599) is a rare word that refers to a slave putting on an apron before serving. So Christians are to imitate their Lord, who girded himself and served (Jn 13:4–17). The reason for humility is based on Pr 3:34 (cf. Jas 4:6) that states God's provision of grace to the submissive and God's continuing opposition to the proud.

6 Christians should, therefore, "humble" (GK 5427) themselves under God's "mighty hand." In the OT, God's hand symbolized discipline (Ex 3:19; 6:1; Job 30:21; Ps 32:4) and deliverance (Dt 9:26; Eze 20:34). Both meanings are appropriate in view of the sufferings of the Asian Christians. Once more Peter ties his exhortation to humility to the end times. The "due time" is the time God has set for Christ's appearing. Thus the whole destiny of Christians—whether it is suffering or glory—is God-ordained.

7 Peter then exhorts believers to "cast all your anxiety" on the Lord. He does not say what the anxiety is; perhaps he had persecution in mind. The application of his exhortation embraces all the difficulties believers who want to live godly in a fallen world must face. The "casting" entails an act of the will and should be done prayerfully and in obedience to Jesus' teaching about anxiety (Mt 6:25–34). "He cares for you" means that God is not indifferent to our sufferings. This conception of God's concern for human affliction is one of the peculiar treasures of the Judeo-Christian faith; though Greek philosophy at its highest could formulate a doctrine of God's perfect goodness, it could not even imagine his active concern for humankind. The Incarnation reveals a caring God, and Christ's teaching about his heavenly Father stresses his intimate concern for his children (Mt 10:29–31).

8–9 Belief in the sovereignty of God and in his fatherly concern for us (vv.6–7) does not permit us to sit back and do nothing. We are to "work out [our] salvation" because "it is God who works in [us]" (Php 2:12–13). So here Peter warns his flock of the danger of making the fact of God's sovereign care an excuse for inactivity. "Be sober, be watchful" perhaps reflects Peter's own experience in which Satan had "sifted" him (Lk 22:31) and he had failed to "watch" (Mt 26:38; Mk 14:34). God's sovereignty does not preclude peril to the Christian life.

Peter calls Satan "your enemy the devil" and likens him to a lion in search of prey. The word "enemy" (GK 508) meant an opponent in a lawsuit (cf. Job 1:6ff.; Zec 3:1; Rev 12:10). "Devil" (GK 1333) is the Greek translation of the Hebrew "Satan" (1Ch 21:1; Job 2:1; GK 8477), which means "slanderer." According to Scripture, he has great power on earth, "being the prince of this world" (Jn 14:30) and "the ruler of the kingdom of the air" (Eph 2:2). But God has limited his activity. Through his captive subjects (Eph 2:2; 2Ti 2:25–26), the devil attempted to destroy the infant church by persecution.

The Christian response to satanic opposition is not panic or flight but firm resistance in faith (v.9). "Resist" (GK 468) is the same word as that found in Eph 6:11–13 and Jas 4:7 in contexts of struggle against hostile spiritual forces. This implies a common "resist-the-devil" formula in the early church. "In the faith" is not so much "the Christian faith" or "your faithfulness" but rather "your positive faith and trust in God."

Support in the struggle also comes from realizing that the sufferings of the Asian Christians were not unique (cf. 1Co 10:13). The same kinds of sufferings are afflicting "your brothers," whereby Peter stresses the solidarity of the Christian body. All who are in union with Christ may expect suffering (Jn 15:18–20; 16:33), and the whole body is joined together in suffering (1Co 12:26). The "world" (GK 3180) is that orderly system under Satan that is opposed to God and his Messiah (cf. Ps 2).

H. The Sustaining Grace of God (5:10–11)

10–11 Peter now contrasts satanic opposition to God's purpose and enablement. For Christians, God has as his gracious purpose bringing his children himself to share in his glory (cf. Ps 73:23–24; Jn 17:22, 24; Ro 8:30). "Called" (GK 2813) in the Pauline and Petrine writings stresses God's sovereign working. The eternal glory contrasts with the temporal trials Christians suffer. "Restore you and make you strong, firm and steadfast" translates four verbs that emphatically promise divine aid.

With a brief doxology, Peter closes the main part of his letter by ascribing power to Christ. This ascription of a doxology to Jesus reveals his dignity and deity.

V. Final Words (5:12–14)

A. Silas's Role in Writing the Letter (5:12)

12 Silas is undoubtedly the same person as the one mentioned in Ac 15:22–33; 15:40–18:5; 1Th 1:1; 2Th 1:1. He was one of the leading men in the early church. What help he gave Peter in writing this letter is uncertain. If he was the writing secretary (amanuensis), it would have been normal for him to have a significant part in writing, perhaps even using his own words to convey Peter's message.

Peter says this letter is brief, and he characterizes it as exhortation and testimony. The reference to "encouraging" (GK 4151) reminds us of the commands for ethical living he has given his readers, while the reference to "testifying" (GK 2148) stresses the reliability of what he has borne witness to. His final exhortation, "Stand fast in it," relates to the "grace of God," which no Christian earns or merits but which all Christians are obligated to abide in.

B. The Greeting From Rome (5:13)

13 Who is "she" whom Peter calls "chosen together with you"? Who is the Mark referred to? What and where is Babylon? "She" could be Peter's wife (Mk 1:30; 1Co 9:5), and "Mark" his own son. Most, however, think "she" refers to the church (GK 1711, a Greek word that is feminine; cf. 2Jn 1, 13) and "Mark" to John Mark (cf. Ac 12:12, 25; 15:36–39). Strong early tradition links John Mark with Peter and his gospel (see introduction to Mark). "Babylon" could be (1) in Mesopotamia, (2) a town in Egypt, or (3) a cryptic reference to Rome. The last view is best because (1) according to early church tradition Peter was in Rome; (2) there is no evidence for Peter's having been in Egypt or Mesopotamia; and (3) the reference may be cryptic because of persecution, or it may be an allusion to the "exile" of God's people (cf. 1:1) on the pattern of the exile of ancient Israel in Babylon.

C. A Final Exhortation and a Prayerful Wish (5:14)

14 The formal kiss was common among early Christians as an expression of love in the church. From the third century A.D., the sexes were separated in the practice of the "kiss of love." But we do not know how old the practice of the formal kiss was. Peter ends his letter with a wish that all his readers who are believers—i.e., who are "in Christ"—may have God's peace. Such a wish is also a prayer. "Peace" (GK 1645) reflects the common Hebrew blessing "Shalom" (GK 8934). Peter begins (1:2) and ends this letter with peace.

The Old Testament in the New

NT Text	OT Text	Subject
Pe 1:16	Lev 11:44–45	Holiness commanded
Pe 1:24–25	Isa 40:6–8	Eternity of the word
Pe 2:6	Isa 28:16	Trust in the cornerstone
Pe 2:7	Ps 118:22–23	Rejected cornerstone
Pe 2:8	Isa 8:14	A stone on which people stumble
Pe 2:9	Isa 43:21	Declaring God's praise
Pe 2:10	Hos 1:6, 9	Not God's people
Pe 2:10	Hos 2:23	Now God's people
Pe 2:22	Isa 53:9	Sinless servant
Pe 2:24	Isa 53:4	Taking out infirmities
Pe 2:25	Isa 53:6	Like sheep gone astray
Pe 3:10–12	Ps 34:12–16	Turn from evil
Pe 3:14–15	Isa 8:12–13	Do not fear
Pe 4:8	Pr 10:12	Love covers sin
Pe 4:18	Pr 11:31	Receiving due reward
Pe 5:5	Pr 3:34	Grace for the humble

2 Peter

INTRODUCTION

1. Authorship and Canonicity

Among the books of the NT, none has been more disputed as to canonicity and authorship than 2 Peter. There is no assured reference to it in early Christian writings till Origen (c.185–c.254), who accepted Peter as the author. Doubt about it persisted into the fourth century. But already in the early third century, a papyrus manuscript of a portion of the NT contains this letter along with 1 Peter and Jude and enjoins a blessing on its readers; in fact, 2 Peter receives more elaborate support than the other two. This letter was eventually admitted to the canon and, despite widespread questioning of its Petrine authorship, it still speaks with the authority of Scripture.

Canonicity and authorship, though not synonymous, are often related. In the early church, one of the main reasons for accepting a book as authoritative was its apostolic authorship or authorization. The canonicity of 2 Peter was questioned primarily because of doubts about its Petrine authorship. These doubts reappeared at the time of the Reformation. Today they are widespread among contemporary scholars.

Various arguments have been used against Peter as the author. Eusebius and Jerome give us the first two: (1) No long line of tradition for accepting 2 Peter could be traced to their day. (2) Its style is different from that of 1 Peter, which was strongly accepted by the church as Petrine. The next two arguments also stem from the ancient church: (3) Peter's name was used in connection with some Gnostic literature. (4) Knowledge of 2 Peter was geographically limited.

In addition, modern scholars have added these arguments: (5) Petrine authorship is unlikely because this letter seems so dependent on the letter of Jude. (6) Its conceptual and rhetorical language is too Hellenistic for a Galilean fisherman. (7) The problem of the delay of the Second Coming is a second-century one. (8) The collection of Paul's letters referred to in 3:15–16 was made in the second century.

In analyzing these claims, we should note that no single argument is conclusive enough to rule out its apostolic authorship. (1) Because of the letter's brevity, governmental persecutions of the early church, and communication problems in the ancient world, the lack of a long tradition for 2 Peter is hardly surprising. If the letter had been sent to an area not in the main travel routes or one that suffered sudden persecutions, normal circulation patterns may have been hindered.

(2) The style does differ from that of 1 Peter, but this may be explained by the use of a different amanuensis (see comment on 1Pe 5:12). If 1 Peter was written by Peter with the assistance of Silas, 2 Peter could either be in Peter's own style or in his style with the assistance of a different amanuensis. Moreover, stylistic arguments are hard to evaluate because the criteria for the identity and distinctiveness of writers are not settled.

The work of the Spirit in inspiration may well extend to the amanuensis who in certain cases may even be termed a coauthor. The stylistic differences in the Pastoral Letters have long been recognized. In 2Ti 4:11, Paul says, "Only Luke is with me." Perhaps Luke served as Paul's amanuensis. So the Pastorals would have a different style from other letters of Paul. Yet their authority would not be inferior because the superintendence of the Spirit would be over Luke as well as over Paul. The same factors may apply to Peter's letters. Furthermore, some scholars have concluded that the linguistic differences between 1 and 2 Peter have been exaggerated.

(3) It is true that the appearance of Peter's name on certain Gnostic writings led to some hesitation in the acceptance of 2 Peter by the early church. But that the early church accepted 2 Peter in spite of the circulation of such spurious works shows that it recognized a difference in character between the two letters and the other works bearing his name.

(4) The literary dependence of 2 Peter on Jude is not conclusively settled (see below, Special Problem). But even if Peter quoted or used a substantial part of Jude's letter, this precludes neither Peter's authorship of the second letter nor its inspiration. For scholars to accept Mark's priority and Matthew's use of Mark is compatible with a high view of biblical inspiration and authority.

(5) In answer to the claim that the language of the letter is too Hellenistic for a man of Peter's background, we may reply that the extent of Hellenistic influence Peter had in his life is not known. He lived about five miles from the region of the Greek league of ten cities known as Decapolis. We do not know whether he was bilingual or how much he learned between the Resurrection and his martyrdom.

(6) The problem of the delay of the Second Coming was most certainly a first-century problem as well as a second-century one (see Jn 21:20–23; Mt 25:1–13; Ac 1:6–11; 2Th 2:1–4; Heb 9:28; these are all NT books universally acknowledged as first century).

(7) The reference in 3:15–16 to Paul's letters need not mean a complete corpus of his letters but only those known to the writer of these verses. The collecting of Paul's letters would have begun as soon as a church or some influential person recognized their value. Paul's instruction about exchanging letters (cf. Col 4:16) and their public reading (1Th 5:27) would have facilitated the collection of his letters. That Luke or Timothy were traveling companions of Paul makes them likely collectors of his writings.

(8) The common assumption that writing under a prominent person's name was an established convention is by no means well-established. Many clearly pseudonymous writings are from the Gnostics, an early Christian heresy that was trying to claim apostolic sanction for its teachings, and none of them was ever considered a candidate for the NT canon. Furthermore, Tertullian states that the presbyter who wrote The Acts of Paul and Thecla was deposed for doing so.

(9) On a more positive note, the book clearly claims to have been written by the apostle Peter (1:1). It recalls how the Lord spoke to Peter about his imminent death (1:14) and refers to Peter's presence as an eyewitness at Jesus' transfiguration (1:16–18). It claims to be his second letter (3:1), a claim most commentators interpret as referring back to 1 Peter, and says that Paul is his "beloved brother" (3:15). Such indications of apostolic authorship are not easily set aside. Either 2 Peter is a genuine work of Simon Peter the apostle or it is an unreliable forgery.

(10) Finally, the quality of its teaching should not be underestimated. In contrast to the Petrine apocrypha, one does not detect false notes in reading 2 Peter. The book rings true. The author's zeal for truth (1: 12), his rejection of clever fables (1:16), and his concern for righteousness (2:7–9) are impressive.

As mentioned above, authorship and canonicity were closely related in the ancient church's decisions about canonicity. Seven NT books—Hebrews, James, Jude, 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, and Revelation—were recognized as canonical only after a certain amount of discussion. The other twenty books had almost universal early acknowledgment. But many other books were known and widely circulated in the early church. Some were highly regarded (e.g., The Shepherd of Hermas) but were never recognized by the church as Scripture. By the time of Cyril of Jerusalem (c. 315–86), 2 Peter was considered canonical; and Cyril's acceptance of it as well as its acceptance by Athanasius, Augustine, and Jerome settled the issue for the early church. These leaders acknowledged 2 Peter to be Scripture because the evidence, both internal and external, showed its solid worth.

2. Date

From 3:15–16 it is clear that the letter could not have been written until a good number of the Pauline letters had been written and gathered together. This means that the earliest possible date would be A.D. 60. If the reference in 3:1 ("Dear friends, this is now my second letter to you") refers to 1 Peter (though this is not entirely certain; cf. comments at 3:1), then the earliest possible date for 2 Peter would be about 63–64, i.e., shortly after the time of the writing of 1 Peter. The latest possible date (if its apostolic authorship is accepted) is shortly before his death (cf. 1:12–15) or about A.D. 64–68. Some evangelical writers favor a posthumous publication of this letter by one of Peter's followers (i.e., about A.D. 80–90).

3. Place of Origin

Rome is a favorite choice for where the letter was written from because Peter is known to have been there. But since he traveled widely (Palestine, Asia Minor, Corinth [?], and Rome), it is impossible to determine for sure where 2 Peter was written.

4. Destination

The only clues to the destination are in the letter itself. It is addressed "to those who through the righteousness of our God and Savior Jesus Christ have received a faith as precious as ours" (1:1). This contrasts with the provinces in Asia Minor mentioned in 1Pe 1:1 and may imply that 2 Peter was written to Christians in various places. In 3:1 the writer says, "Dear friends, this is now my second letter to you." If this refers to 1 Peter, then the letter is addressed to Christians in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia. But if 3:1 refers to a lost letter of Peter's (cf. 1Co 5:9; Col 4:16b for probable lost letters of Paul), then we have no firm information about the destination of 2 Peter. From the warnings in the letter concerning the false teachers (2:1–20), it seems that their vices were more typical of Gentiles than Jews.

5. Occasion and Content

The occasion for writing 2 Peter may be inferred from its contents. The immediate occasion was the author's knowledge that his time was short and that God's people were facing many dangers (1:13–14; 2:1–3). Just as sheep are prone to wander, so Christians are prone to forget the basic truths of the faith. The gift of exhortation in the church was a means of correcting this tendency (cf. Ro 12:8). Peter himself mentions this need in his first letter (5:1, 12). 2 Peter reminds us of the basis for Christian faith (cf. 1:12–13). Faith in Jesus as Messiah is not grounded on myths or clever stories (1:16); it is based on sure revelation from God (1:16–21). The Christian's personal faith should not be static but ever growing. Continual growth in the Christian graces gives a certainty of election to the believer (1:8–10).

Christians must beware of false teachers (2:1–22) who deny the imminent return of the Lord (3:3–4) and live immoral and greedy lives. These teachers are clever and claim scriptural support from Paul's letters for their views of liberty, but they pervert the letters and are headed for damnation (3:15–16). The church is to be alert to error and growing in the grace and knowledge of Christ (3:17–18).

6. Special Problem

There are so many similarities between 2 Peter and Jude that some kind of dependence seems necessary. The common material almost entirely relates to the description and denunciation of false teachers. The majority view is that 2 Peter is dependent on Jude. Some scholars use this apparent dependence on Jude to deny Peter was the author. But the use of Jude by the author of 2 Peter would pose a problem for Petrine authorship of the letter only if (1) the dependence of 2 Peter on Jude were conclusively proved, (2) the composition of Jude were definitely dated later than A.D. 64, or (3) it could be shown that an apostle such as Peter would not have used so much material from another writer.

In answer to these concerns, (1) the dependence of 2 Peter on Jude is not a certainty. Some scholars have argued the contrary—that Jude is dependent on 2 Peter. It is also possible that both letters used a common source. (2) The date of Jude is not fixed by any firm internal or external data, and it may have been written by A.D. 60. In that case Peter could have used Jude. (3) Peter seems to have used a certain amount of catechetical material in 1 Peter (see introduction to 1 Peter), and there is no reason not to think that he may have done so here. In any case, whatever position is adopted does not necessarily affect the authenticity, authorship, or inspiration of these letters.

EXPOSITION

I. Salutation and Blessing (1:1–4)

1 The author identifies himself as "Simon Peter." The best Greek manuscripts spell it in the Hebraic form Symeon (a name that goes back to the second son of Jacob and Leah; also used in Ac 15:14). This detail supports the Petrine authorship of the letter, for a pseudonymous author would probably have used the more common spelling. This disciple also had the nickname, "Cephas" (i.e., "Rock" or "Peter"; see the introduction to 1 Peter).

Peter gives a twofold identification of himself: "a servant and apostle of Jesus Christ." As a "servant" (lit., "slave"; GK 1528), he belongs to Jesus by right of purchase (see 1Pe 1:18–19; cf. 1Co 6:19–20) and must obey his commands and do his will. The "servant" has status by virtue of the Lord he serves. As an "apostle" (GK 693), Peter has an authoritative commission and speaks God's words.

Those whom Peter is addressing are described only in general terms that can apply to any Christian. The letter itself, however, contains specific clues concerning the people Peter is writing to. A relationship of some duration between author and recipients is implied by 1:12–15. From 3:15 we learn that Paul also wrote to them. In 3:1 Peter says, "This is now my second letter to you." Many scholars believe that this reference is to 1 Peter. If so, the recipients of 2 Peter are clearly identified in 1Pe 1:1 (but see comment on 3:1). If "second letter" does not refer to 1 Peter, we know practically nothing about those to whom 2 Peter was addressed.

The recipients are described as possessing "a faith as precious as ours." Is this "faith" the objective faith or body of truth committed to an individual? Or should we take it in a subjective sense of one's ability to trust God? The latter is the better choice, for (1) the article is omitted in the Greek (when faith is clearly objective, e.g., Jude 3, 20, the article is often present), and (2) the only other use of "faith" in this letter (1:5) is most likely subjective in sense. It is also possible that Peter combines both objective and subjective senses of faith. The faith of those to whom he is writing is "as precious [lit., equally privileged; GK 2700] as ours"—i.e., every Christian has the same heavenly Father, the same prospect of glory, and thus equal access to God (Ro 5:2).

The statement that those the letter is addressed to "have received" their faith clearly implies that faith (whether objective, subjective, or both) is a gift of God. God's bestowal of faith is through his "righteousness" (GK 1466) or, better, "justice." This word is often used and developed by Paul (e.g., "justification by faith" as the theme of Romans; cf. Ro 1:1–16). But here it means "justice," either in the sense of the impartiality of God's justice in giving all believers an equally privileged faith or in the sense of God's granting of salvation being compatible with his justice.

The grammar of the phrase "of our God and Savior Jesus Christ" leaves little doubt that in these words Peter is calling Jesus Christ both God and Savior.

2 The first seven words of this verse are identical with 1 Peter 1:2b (see comment there), but here the words "through the knowledge of God and of Jesus our Lord" are added. As in other NT letters, the basic theme of the letter is quickly sounded. For 2 Peter it is the "knowledge" (epignosis; GK 2106) of God (cf. vv.3, 8; 2:20); a related verb (GK 2105) occurs twice in 2:21. Another related word meaning "knowledge" (gnosis; GK 1194) occurs at 1:5, 6; 3:18; and its companion verb "to know" (GK 1182) occurs at 1:20 and 3:3. This makes a total of eleven occurrences of these related words in this short letter. The knowledge of God is a central biblical theme (cf. Jer 9:23–24; Jn 17:3), but it was also claimed by the false teachers of the apostolic and postapostolic times. As Paul warned in Tit 1:16, "They claim to know God, but by their actions they deny him." Later a developed "Gnosticism" became a great challenge to the Christian church.

3 The grammar of this verse connects it more closely with v.2 than the NIV indicates; it shows the way in which the multiplication of the knowledge of God takes place—through the divine power given to us. God has called believers "by his own glory [GK 1518] and goodness [GK 746]"—i.e., God in salvation reveals his splendor and his moral excellence, and these are means he uses to effect conversions. In bringing people to the knowledge of himself, God's divine power supplies them with everything they need for life and godliness. Probably what is in view is the work of the Spirit of God in believers, providing them with gifts and enabling them to use these gifts.

4 "Through these" refers to God's "glory and goodness" or more generally to his salvation mediated through the Incarnation. So when Jesus Christ came in his first advent, God made certain promises ("very great and precious") of the new Messianic Age (cf. 3:9, 13) to be brought in when Christ returned. These promises enable Christians to "participate in the divine nature."

How does this participation come about? In at least two ways. (1) The promises themselves have a purifying effect on the believer's life (cf. 1Jn 3:3). (2) Conversion entails a definite break with "the corruption . . . caused by evil desires." In coming to know God through Christ, believers escape the corruption of sin; and Christ renews and restores the image of God in them.

II. The Essential Christian Virtues (1:5–15)

A. The Efforts for Christian Fruitfulness (1:5–9)

5 Because of the new birth and the promises associated with it, Christians participate in the divine nature (v.4). But the new birth does not rule out human activity. Sanctification is a work of God in which believers cooperate. This is why the Bible gives ethical imperatives based on dogmatic indicatives (cf. Ro 6:11–14; 12:1–2; Php 2:12–13; 1Pe 1:13–21); this principle is in accord with biblical statements of how God works (cf. Ro 8:13b; Php 2:13). So Peter urgently calls for a progressive, active Christianity. It is by faith alone that we are saved through grace, but this saving faith does not continue by itself (Eph 2:8–10). Peter's chain of eight virtues (vv.5–7) starts with "faith" and ends in "love" (cf. 1Ti 1:5).

Christians are told to "make every effort to add to [their] faith." In NT times the word "add" (GK 2220) was used of making a rich or lavish provision. To make every "effort" (GK 5082) requires both zeal and seriousness in the pursuit of holiness. "Goodness" (GK 746) is an attribute of Christ himself (1:3) and therefore is to be sought by his people. It is excellence of achievement or mastery in a specific field—in this case virtue or moral excellence (cf. Php 4:8; 1Pe 2:9). The "knowledge" (GK 1194) that is to be added to faith is the advance into the will of God. The false teachers (eventually known as the Gnostics) claimed a superior knowledge. The apostles stressed that it was necessary for those who know God to live a godly life (cf. 1Jn 2:3–4; 5:18) and that Christ taught them the will of the Father (Jn 15:15).

6 The next virtue in Peter's chain is "self-control" (GK 1602). The concept of self-control played a great role in the philosophical ethics of classical Greece and Hellenism. But in NT ethical discussions it is not generally used, perhaps because the normal biblical emphasis is on God at work in us by the Spirit rather than on human self-mastery. Self-control is the exact opposite of the excesses (2:3, 14) of the false teachers and the sexual abuses in the pagan world. The NT concept of self-control is instructive. Paul uses the verb "to control oneself" of the unmarried (1Co 7:9; cf. Ac 24:25) and of his own self-discipline for the Gospel (1Co 9:25). In the only other use of the noun besides 2Pe 1:6, Paul lists it as one facet of the fruit of the Spirit (Gal 5:23). So while the biblical ethic does include "self-control," it sees it as the manifestation of the Spirit's work in believers, resulting in the human activity Paul speaks of in Ro 8:13.

Following self-control is "perseverance" or "patience" (GK 5705). This virtue views time with God's eyes (3:8) while waiting for Christ's return and for the punishment of sin. Perseverance is the ability to continue in the faith and resist the pressures of the world system (cf. Lk 8:15; Ro 5:3; Heb 12:2). "Godliness" (GK 2354) is piety or devotion to the person of God.

7 "Brotherly kindness" (GK 5789) and "love" (agape; GK 27) complete the list. The knowledge of God issues into love for other believers (1Jn 4:7–20). Brotherly kindness denotes the warmth of affection that should characterize the fellowship of believers, and love is the queen of the virtues (cf. 1Co 13), denoting self-sacrificing action in behalf of another. This love flows from God who is himself love (1Jn 4:8) and who reaches out to the world (Jn 3:16; 1Jn 3:16). Godly people who participate in the divine nature must abound in love.

8 The "knowledge" of God is the beginning, the continuance, and the goal of the Christian life (cf. Php 3:10). If Christians possess in ever-increasing measure the eight virtues just listed, they will not be "ineffective and unproductive" (like the false teachers described in ch. 2). Progressive growth in the Christian graces is a sign of spiritual vitality and prevents sloth and unfruitfulness (Mt 13:22; Jn 15:1–7).

9 Not to have these virtues is to be "nearsighted and blind." In the NT "blind" (GK 5603) is commonly used in a metaphorical as well as a literal sense (cf. Jn 9:39–41). Spiritual blindness can come from being spiritually "nearsighted" (GK 3697). Such a defect of vision leads one to forgetfulness of cleansing from old sins. Perhaps Peter had in mind those who turn away from their commitment at baptism.

B. The Confirmation of Election (1:10–11)

10 In view of the dangers spoken of in v.9 and the possibility of a fruitful knowledge of God (v.8), Peter exhorts Christians "to make [their] calling and election sure." "Sure" (GK 1010) is a word used of confirming something, as in the legal terminology of validating a will. So a Christian by growing in grace becomes assured of having been called and elected by God. Some prefer a corporate sense of election here (cf. 1Pe 1:1). In favor of this view is the fact that "calling" (GK 3104) and "election" (GK 1724) are bound together by a single Greek article and that the word "calling" can have a general application (cf. Mt 22:14). Nevertheless, in the Pauline letters calling and election are normally used in a particular sense (cf. Ro 8:28–30). People respond in faith to God's gracious working. Likewise Peter's emphasis here is on human response. Many see Paul's influence on Peter (cf. comment on 3:15).

If Christians are continually advancing in the virtues mentioned in vv.5–7, they will never "stumble" or "fall." Some have argued that "the loss of salvation" is in view here, but the meaning of "suffer a reverse or misfortune" fits the context well. Strong warnings about unfaithfulness to Christ and emphasis on the necessity of perseverance are common in the letters of Paul (e.g., Col 1:22–23; 2Ti 2:12–13).

11 Eschatology provides a motivation for ethics. Present difficulties are easier to go through because of bright prospects for the future, when "the kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ" will be inaugurated. In one sense, Christians are already in the kingdom (Col 1:13). Yet, as Paul and Barnabas said, "We must go through many hardships to enter the kingdom of God" (Ac 14:22). The kingdom is seen as temporally limited in 1Co 15:24 and Rev 20:1–6, but in this verse, Peter speaks of it as "the eternal kingdom." The diversity of statements about the kingdom in the Bible reflects the many facets of the rule of the triune God over humanity (both saved and lost) and also over angels (both fallen and unfallen) (cf. Pss 22:28; 145:11–13; Da 4:35; Ac 17:24).

Jesus Christ is now the Lord (Ac 2:36), and as such he rules. In his coming to earth, his rule or kingdom will be visibly manifested and imposed (Mt 13:40–43; see comment on Mk 1:15). This will mark the end of this age and inaugurate the earthly messianic phase of the kingdom (Rev 20:1–6), which will last for a thousand years. Yet the kingdom does not end, for God's reign is eternal (Rev 11:15), and the mediatorial kingdom becomes the eternal kingdom of the triune God. Here, then, Peter looks to the future aspects of the kingdom of Jesus Christ that believers enter at death or at the imposition of that kingdom.

The future for Christians who diligently pursue holiness is very bright. They will "receive a rich welcome." They will not barely make it into the kingdom or "be saved . . . only as one escaping through the flames" (1Co 3:15); but each one will receive the Lord's "Well done, good and faithful servant!" (Mt 25:21). Peter's words in this verse may allude to the honors paid to winners of the Olympic games. When a winner came back to his hometown, he would be welcomed by a special entrance built in the town or city wall in his honor.

C. The Need for Reminders (1:12–15)

12 Truth needs to be repeated. The future hope is indeed well known to Christians. Yet to "remind" them of it and to exhort them regarding its application to life and service are essential. "So" links what Peter now says about reminding his readers with his statements about the need for possessing Christian virtues in increasing measure (v.8), participating in the divine nature (v.4), and the eschatological hope (v.11). He knows that they have a settled conviction of "the truth [they] now have." This statement implies a relatively fixed body of truth (cf. Jude 3), which goes all the way back to the body of recognizable apostolic truth (Ac 2:42).

"Firmly established" (GK 5114) picks up the exhortation of Jesus to Simon Peter to "strengthen" (GK 5114) his brothers (Lk 22:32). Knowing apostolic truth leads to spiritual strength; those who have received this teaching are established. But this does not obviate the need for warnings of spiritual pitfalls, exhortations to pursue truth, and prayer for divine strengthening (1Pe 5:10).

13–14 That Peter knows that he will not always live in "the tent of this body" underlines what he has been saying. The word "tent" (GK 5013; cf. 5008) was used of a body either living or dead (see 2Co 5:1, 4). Although it is possible that Peter was influenced by Paul's usage, it is also possible that they shared a common linguistic and conceptual heritage. Peter knows that he will soon die and refers to a special revelation Jesus gave him (possibly Jn 21:18–19, where Jesus spoke of a violent death for Peter).

For Christians death should hold no terrors; it is like putting off old clothes or like exiting from old age. According to Paul, to die is to "be with Christ" (Php 1:23) in a new way. So in view of his approaching death, Peter wants "to refresh [his readers'] memory"—"refresh" (GK 1444) means "to wake up" or "arouse."

15 "And I will make every effort" (GK 5079) recalls words used in vv.5, 10. Peter then uses an educational term, wanting to do something so that his readers "remember" the basic truths after his death. Much discussion has centered around this sentence and the nature of what Peter is promising. He may be referring to the written form of his teaching or perhaps even to the gospel of Mark. In any case, he intends to continue his ministry with all diligence until his death so as to strengthen the church.

III. Christ's Divine Majesty (1:16–21)

A. Attested by Apostolic Eyewitnesses (1:16–18)

16 Here Peter links himself with the other apostles ("we"—cf. comment on v.18) in certifying that their message is based on their own eyewitness experience of Jesus and on the hearing of God's attestation of him. Peter denies that they have followed "cleverly invented stories" (lit., "myths"; GK 3680)—the words refer to fables about the gods. The NT always uses this word in a negative sense and in contrast to the truth of the Gospel (see 1Ti 1:4; 4:7; 2Ti 4:4; Tit 1:14). It is likely that the false teachers claimed that the Incarnation, Resurrection, and coming kingdom that the apostles spoke about were only fabricated stories. These teachers may have been men like Hymenaeus and Philetus, who said that "the resurrection has already taken place" (2Ti 2:17–18). Apparently they denied a future aspect of eschatology or else reinterpreted it so that it lost its intended meaning.

Peter's specific point was the second coming of Jesus. He sees his preaching of the Second Coming as based on his eyewitness observation of the transfiguration of Jesus (cf. vv.17–18 with Mt 16:28–17:5). When Jesus returns, the kingdom will be visibly inaugurated in power. The dead will be raised, and judgment will occur. The "power" (GK 1539) he will then manifest embraces destruction of the lawless one (2Th 2:8) and his hosts (Rev 19:11–16), calling out the dead by his voice (Jn 5:28), the final judgment (Jn 5:27), and the consummation of the kingdom (Rev 11:15–18).

"Eyewitness" (GK 2228) seems to be a favorite term used by the false teachers, and Peter uses their own vocabulary against them (a verb form related to this word is used in 1Pe 2:12; 3:2).

17–18 These verses explain how and when Peter was an eyewitness of the majesty of Jesus Christ. God the Father gave honor and glory to Jesus. The "honor" is the public acknowledgment of his sonship (cf. Ps 2:6–7; Mt 3:17; Lk 3:22), and the "glory" is the transfiguration of the humiliated Son into his glorious splendor. On the Mount of Transfiguration, Jesus' face "shone like the sun," his clothes "became as white as the light" (Mt 17:1–9; Mk 9:2-10; Lk 9:28-36), and a unique voice sounded from a bright cloud that covered them and said, "This is my Son, whom I love; with him I am well pleased." The scene showed Jesus as Messiah and was a preview of his glory as King.

Peter emphatically says, "We [i.e., Peter, James, and John] heard this voice that came from heaven," while they were with Jesus "on the sacred mountain." It was the Transfiguration that transformed the mountain from a common one into a "sacred" (GK 41) one. As for the place of the Transfiguration, Mount Hermon (over nine thousand feet high and near Caesarea Philippi, where the event that preceded the Transfiguration took place) is the most likely choice (see comment on Mk 9:2).

B. Attested by Divinely Originated Prophecy (1:19–21)

19 By saying "And we have the word of the prophets made more certain [GK 1010]," Peter indicates that the OT prophets spoke of the same things he did and that their words are made more certain because the Transfiguration was a foreview of their fulfillment. The Scriptures, in other words, confirm the apostolic witness. Peter is making an obvious comparison between the OT prophecies (which were accepted as God's reliable word) and the apostles' testimony or that of the Voice at the Transfiguration.

After affirming the reliability of the OT Scriptures, Peter exhorts his readers to continue to pay careful attention to the prophetic message. He compares it to "light shining in a dark place" (cf. Ps 119:105). The "dark place" is the whole world, which has turned from God the Light to darkness (cf. Isa 9:2; Eph 6:12; Jn 3:19). Christians are to ponder and keep the word of God "until the day dawns." The "day" is the day of the Second Coming (cf. Ro 13:12). The "morning star" is a reference to the Messiah (see Nu 24:17; cf. also Lk 1:78; Rev 22:16).

The phrase "rises in your hearts" is difficult. The best interpretation sees "in your hearts" as the subjective result of Christ's actual coming. When he comes, an illuminating transformation will take place in the hearts of believers.

20 Peter continues his exhortation with the expression "above all." The primary thing to be known is that the prophetic Scriptures did not come into being through the prophet's "own interpretation [GK 2146]" (lit., "of one's own unloosing"). What exactly does Peter mean by this expression? There are three major views. (1) No prophecy is to be interpreted by any individual in an arbitrary way—so either the church must interpret prophecy, the interpretation must be that intended by the Holy Spirit, or the individual's interpretation is not to be "private" but according to the analogy of faith. (2) "No prophecy of Scripture came about by the prophet's own interpretation"—i.e., no prophecy originated through the interpretation of the prophet himself. (3) The word translated "interpretation" does not mean interpretation but refers to the origination of Scripture. The sense of the verse is probably that of the first view. This fits well with the problem of the false teachers' distorting Paul's writings and other Scripture mentioned at 3:16, and the next verse clarifies that the prophecy originated with the Holy Spirit.

21 Each prophecy originated in God, not in the will of a human being. No prophet wrote his own private ideas. This verse is notable for the light it sheds on how Scripture was produced. Peter's statement "men spoke from God" implies the dual authorship of Scripture—a teaching also implied in the OT (see 2Sa 23:2; Jer 1:7, 9). The human prophets spoke, but God so worked in them that what they said was his word. It was not through a process of dictation or through a state of ecstasy that the writers of Scripture spoke but through the control of the Spirit of God—"as they were carried along by the Holy Spirit."

IV. False Prophets and Teachers (2:1–22)

A. Warning Against False Teachers (2:1–3)

1 Although Israel ("the people" [GK 3295], a common designation for Israel) had a notable succession of true prophets, she was often plagued by false or lying prophets (cf. Dt 13:1–5; 18:20; 1Ki 18:19; 22:6ff.; Jer 5:31; 23:9–18). Likewise, the church must expect false teachers to come in (cf. Ac 20:29), who "secretly introduce" or smuggle in their doctrines. Similar warnings occur in Gal 2:4 concerning the entrance of false brothers into a Christian gathering, and in 2Co 11:13–15 concerning Satan's masqueraders. The "destructive heresies" are teachings that lead to darkness and damnation. The focal point of their error was Christological; they denied "the sovereign Lord who bought them." The "sovereign Lord" (GK 1305) is Christ (cf. Jude 4).

"Who bought them" is a difficult phrase. It seems to some to raise questions about the doctrine of the perseverance of the saints (i.e., eternal security), for here it appears that persons bought by Christ are lost. Various solutions have been advanced. (1) Some suggest that "the sovereign Lord who bought them" refers to the God of the Exodus rather than to Jesus Christ. This requires understanding the antecedent of "them" to be "the people"

Passages Indicating the Inspiration of Scripture

Many passages in both the OT and NT demonstrate that the Bible is the inspired Word of God. This chart compiles the major passages that support this important Christian doctrine.

The Bible Writers Write About Themselves
Moses spoke and wrote what God told him	Ex 19:3; 34:33–36; Dt 18:18
David spoke and wrote as led by the Spirit of God	2Sa 23:2; cf. Mt 22:43
The prophets spoke and wrote what the Lord told them	Isa 7:7; Jer 1:9; 2:1; Eze 7:1; Hos 4:1; Am 1:3; 3:1; Ob 1; etc.
Jesus promised to speak to the disciples by his Spirit	Jn 14:25–26; 16:13–15
Paul wrote and spoke as the Spirit directed him	1Co 2:11–13; 14:37; Gal 1:8–9; 1Th 2:13
John wrote and spoke what God showed him and said to him	Rev 1:1–2, 10–11; 2:7, 11, 19, 29; etc.

The Bible Writers About Other Bible Writers
"All Scripture is God-breathed"	2Ti 3:16
Prophets spoke and wrote "as they were carried along by the Holy Spirit"	2Pe 1:20–21
To Jesus, the authority of Scripture extends to the smallest letters	Mt 5:20–21; Lk 16:17
To Jesus, the Scriptures cannot be broken	Jn 10:34–35
To Jesus, what the Scriptures said, "God said"	Mt 15:4
To Jesus, David spoke "by the Holy Spirit"	Mk 12:36
To the early Christians, "the Holy Spirit" spoke in the Scriptures	Ac 4:25–26
To Paul, "the Holy Spirit" or "God" spoke through the prophets	Ac 28:25; Ro 9:25; 2Co 6:1–2; Eph 4:8
To the writer to the Hebrews, "God spoke . . . through the prophets"	Heb 1:1
To the writer to the Hebrews, the Scriptures are "God" speaking or "the Holy Spirit" speaking to us	Heb 1:6–13; 3:7; 4:3; 8:8
To Peter, the process of inspiration applies equally to Paul's writings	2Pe 3:15–16

in the first part of the sentence. While this is grammatically possible, it is unlikely because of the distance between the pronoun and its antecedent. The natural sense of the verse is that "they" (the false teachers) deny the Lord who bought them (the false teachers).

(2) Others suggest that the false teachers were redeemed but fell away or lost their salvation. But to many Christians, the idea that a redeemed person can lose his or her salvation contradicts clear passages that state the contrary (e.g., Jn 10:28–29; Ro 8:28–39). Moreover, v.2 says nothing about the application of redemption to the false teachers or their appropriation of it.

(3) Others take the word "bought" (lit., "redeem"; GK 60) in the sense of "temporal deliverance"—i.e., the word is not used here of one's personal salvation.

(4) Still others argue that Peter is speaking not in terms of the reality of the false teachers' faith but in terms of their profession. They profess to be those who have been bought by the blood of Christ, but they are lying.

In my judgment, v.1 asserts that Christ "bought" the false teachers, but this does not necessarily mean that they were saved. Salvation in the NT sense does not occur until the benefits of Christ's work are applied to the individual by the regeneration of the Spirit and belief in the truth. In other words, Christ crucified is the atoning sacrifice for the sins of the whole world (1Jn 2:2). Yet the wrath of God is on all sinners (Jn 3:36; Eph 2:3) until the work of the Cross is applied specifically to those who believe.

"Bringing swift destruction [GK 724] on themselves" refers to the everlasting state of torment and death. It will be "swift" because it will descend on them suddenly, either at their death or at the return of the Lord.

2 The false teachers will be popular with many followers. John speaks of the same phenomenon when, speaking of the false prophets who do not acknowledge that Jesus is from God, he says, "The world listens to them" (1Jn 4:5). Moreover, Peter says that the many adherents of the false teachers will follow "their shameful ways" (i.e., "vices," "sexual debaucheries"; GK 816; cf. 1Pe 4:3; 2Pe 2:7, 18). Their disciples will be like the false teachers and, bringing their sexual immorality into the churches, will cause "the way of truth" to be defamed. "The way" (GK 3847) was a common early name for the Christian faith (cf. Ac 9:2; 19:9, 23; 22:4; 24:14, 22). Such ungodly conduct brings reproach on the name of God or Christ (cf. Ro 2:23–24; 1Ti 6:1; Tit 2:5). It is also important to understand that the Christian faith is "the way of truth"—the "way" of life that responds to and is determined by the "truth." True doctrine must issue in true living (see comment on 1:5).

3 Christian teachers have the right to financial support (cf. 1Co 9:1–14; Gal 6:6; 1Ti 5:17–18), but their motivation in the ministry should not be mercenary. For false teachers, however, religion will be commercialized; they will "exploit" people. With fabricated stories they will fleece the sheep. In the light of the commercialism of religious cults today, Peter's warning is clear enough. But the popularity and prosperity of the errorists will certainly come to an end. Their judgment and doom have been announced long ago (cf. Ps 1:5–6). "Destruction" (GK 724; cf. v.1) is now personified as "not sleeping."

B. Three Examples of Previous Judgments (2:4–10a)

In the Greek, vv.4–9 form a single sentence. The "if" clause is extended by the use of three examples of divine judgment; the conclusion of this conditional sentence is delayed until v.9. The cumulative examples of the first part of the sentence make the main point (v.9) stand out with force and emphasis.

4 The first example of divine judgment is that which came upon the fallen "angels." If angels are judged, then certainly human beings will also be judged. Of which judgment of angels does Peter speak? The most common and best interpretation relates the judgment Peter speaks of with the mention of angels in Ge 6:1–4, where "sons of God" apparently means "fallen angels" (cf. Job 1:6; 2:1; 38:7). (1) This interpretation was common in Jewish literature. (2) The three examples (angels, Flood, and cities of the plain) all come one after another in the early chapters of Genesis. (3) The angels referred to here in 2 Peter are confined to "gloomy dungeons." Apparently some fallen angels are free to plague human beings as demons while others are imprisoned. The connection with Ge 6:1–4 provides a reason for this phenomenon.

Peter uses the verb tartaroo (lit., "to hold captive in Tartarus"; GK 5434) to tell where the sinning angels were sent. "Tartarus," considered by the Greeks as a place under the earth that was lower than Hades where divine punishment was meted out, was also regarded this way in nonbiblical Jewish literature. The usual translation of this verb as "sent them to hell" (so NIV) only approximates the idea of a special place of confinement until the final judgment. Though "gloomy dungeons" may be correct, "chains of darkness" is an equally possible translation (cf. Jude 6).

5 Peter's second example is the Flood. He has referred to this in his first letter (1Pe 3:18–22) and will do so again in the next chapter of this one (3:6). With Noah seven others were saved (his wife, his three sons, and his three daughters-in-law). They were guarded or protected by God during the Flood that wiped out the ungodly pre-Flood civilization. Noah was a "preacher [GK 3061] of righteousness." This could refer to his preaching activity not recorded in the OT or to the fact that his lifestyle condemned sin and proclaimed righteousness to his contemporaries (Ge 6:9).

6 The third example of judgment is the destruction of the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah. According to Ge 19:24–28, "the LORD rained down burning sulfur on Sodom and Gomorrah—from the LORD out of heaven." Peter says God "condemned" them "by burning them to ashes" (GK 5491). This rare word means either "reduce to ashes" or "cover with ashes"; it was used at the time of Vesuvius's volcanic eruption and Lycophron's "being overwhelmed with ashes." Thus God may have used a volcano to destroy the wicked cities. This total destruction is an "example" (GK 5682) to the ungodly of the things that are going to happen to them.

7–8 In the midst of God's judgment of the cities of the plain, he delivered Lot, whom Peter calls "righteous." This is puzzling because in Genesis Lot is hardly notable for his righteousness. He seems worldly and weak and had to be dragged out of Sodom (Ge 19:16). Yet Abraham's intercession in Ge 18:16–33 may imply that Lot was righteous. Furthermore, Peter may have inferred Lot's righteousness from his deliverance from the destruction of Sodom and from his being "tormented" and "distressed by the filthy lives" of his fellow citizens. The contemporary application is plain. To what extent are Christians who are living today in a godless society "tormented" by what they see?

9 Peter now states the main point. It is one of abiding comfort: "The Lord knows how to rescue godly men from trials." Suffering Christians anywhere and at any time can find consolation in the fact that their Lord knows all about their plight. Moreover, "the Lord knows how . . . to hold the unrighteous for the day of judgment, while continuing their punishment" (italics mine). Immediate judgment of sinners is only the beginning. Temporal judgments, death, and "being in torment" in Hades (Lk 16:23) do not exhaust the divine wrath. A great Judgment is yet future (Rev 20:11–15), followed by the "second death" of fire (Rev 20:14).

10a God's wrath is especially certain to fall on the false teachers of Peter's day. He characterizes them as "those who follow the corrupt desire of the sinful nature"—a reference to sexual profligacy. They also "despise authority." "Authority" (GK 3262) may refer to the rejection of angelic powers (cf. Eph 1:21; Col 1:16), but more likely it refers to their rejection of the rule of the Lord (GK 3261) Jesus Christ over them.

C. The Insolence and Wantonness of the False Teachers (2:10b–16)

10b The false teachers are "bold and arrogant"—i.e., presumptuous and self-willed. They respect no one, and nothing restrains them. "They are not afraid to slander celestial beings"—probably referring to fallen angels. As to when they slandered or what kind of slander was involved, one can only surmise. Perhaps the false teachers were accused of being in league with Satan, and their reply was to disparage and mock him (cf. Jude 8–9).

11 In contrast to these audacious errorists, angels themselves, even though they are stronger and more powerful (cf. Rev 12:7–8), do not indict the celestial beings (perhaps the fallen angels of v.4) in the presence of the Lord.

12 The false teachers act like irrational animals without the restraint that angels and righteous people have. They may claim a special knowledge, but they blaspheme out of their ignorance. Like wild beasts who are slaves to their instincts and are born to be slaughtered, they too are destined for total destruction.

13 "They will be paid back with harm for the harm they have done" preserves a word play in Greek that is quite characteristic of Peter's style in this letter. The errorists suffer harm as a wage of injury. Normally one thinks of carousing as a nighttime activity (1Th 5:7), perhaps because of the shame involved. But these people carouse in broad daylight. Peter sees them as "feasting together" with the recipients of his letter. Perhaps he has in mind the love feasts or communal meals of the church. They also revel in their deceptions.

14 In the Greek text vv.12–16 form one sentence. So the vivid phrase "with eyes full of adultery" (meaning to desire every woman they see) implies that the false teachers desired to turn church gatherings into times of dissipation. Their eyes unceasingly looked for sin. They "seduce" (or "lure"; GK 1284) "unstable" persons, i.e., those with no foundation to their lives. In 1:12 of this letter Peter has spoken of his readers as being "firmly established in the truth," and in 3:16–17 he will warn them of "unstable people" and of the danger of falling "from [their] secure position" (similar Greek words are used here).

Deep within these false teachers are thoughts of "greed" (GK 4432) and avarice. Of them Peter exclaims, "An accursed brood!" (lit., "children of a curse"), meaning that God's curse is on them.

15–16 The false teachers resemble Balaam, the son of Beor, in that Balaam loved money and was willing to pursue it instead of obeying God (Nu 22:5–24:25). Balaam also taught immorality (Nu 31:16; Rev 2:14). So the false teachers have left the biblical way and have gone into Balaam's error—mercenary greed and sexual impurity. As Balaam went to curse the children of Israel for money (if he could), "he was rebuked for his wrongdoing by a donkey—a beast without speech." Actually, according to the account in Nu 22:27–35, the rebuke is twofold: first from the donkey, then from the angel of the Lord. Ironically the mute animal had more spiritual perception than the prophet! The utterance "restrained" the prophet's insanity.

D. The Impotence of Their Teaching (2:17–22)

17 Whatever else may be said about this chapter, it is a powerful piece of writing that gains momentum as it reaches its climax. In vivid words, Peter goes on to describe the false teachers as "springs without water." Christ provides "a spring of water welling up to eternal life" (Jn 4:13–14), and from those who believe in him flow streams of living water (Jn 7:37–38). But the false teachers give nothing because they have nothing to give. They are "mists driven by a storm," a metaphor of their instability. The "blackest darkness . . . reserved for them" may refer to hell.

18 These heretics use sensual propaganda to "ensnare [or entice; GK 1284; cf. v.14] people who are just escaping from those who live in error." In other words, they take for their targets new converts to Christianity from paganism.

19 They promise "freedom," perhaps from any law or restraint of the flesh. Paul ran into similar error—"Everything is permissible for me" (1Co 6:12–13)—among false teachers in Corinth and possibly in Galatia (cf. Gal 5:14). Yet, Peter says, the very ones who speak of freedom are "slaves of depravity—for a man is a slave to whatever has mastered him." To this the best parallel is Jesus' word: "Everyone who sins is a slave to sin" (Jn 8:34; cf. Ro 6:16). So though the false teachers talk of religion and freedom, they do not know the Son; for as Jesus said, "If the Son sets you free, you will be free indeed" (Jn 8:36).

20 Of whom is Peter speaking in vv.20–22—i. e., who does the pronoun "they" refer to? Does it refer (1) to the false teachers of v. 19, (2) to the unstable people of v.18 or (3) more generally to both but particularly to the false teachers? In my opinion, it refers basically to false teachers because (1) proximity makes the false teachers (spoken of in v.19) the normal antecedent of "they," (2) v. 19 and v.20 are connected by the word "for" (untranslated in NIV), (3) "mastered" in v.19 has the same verbal root as "overcome" in v.20, and (4) the teachers are the main subject of the whole chapter.

Verse 20 mentions the possibility of reverting to the old paganism after having "escaped the corruptions of the world" through knowing Jesus Christ as Lord and Savior. Is it possible, then, for Christians to lose their salvation? Many would answer affirmatively on the basis of this and similar texts (e.g., Heb 6:4–6; 10:26). But this verse asserts only that false teachers who have for a time escaped from worldly corruption through knowing Christ and then turn away from the light of the Christian faith are worse off than they were before knowing Christ. It uses no terminology affirming that they were Christians in reality (e.g., "children of God," "born again," "regenerate," "redeemed"). The NT makes a distinction between those who are in the churches and those who are regenerate (cf. 2Co 13:5; 2Ti 2:18–19; 1Jn 3:7–8; 2:19). So when Peter says, "They are worse off at the end than they were at the beginning," the reference is to a lost apostate.

21 Peter now underlines the seriousness of apostasy. The "sacred commandment that was passed on to them" evidently refers to the authoritative, apostolic message of the Christian faith (cf. 1Co 15:3). It is the entire Christian message with an emphasis on the ethical demands of our Lord.

22 Peter concludes his strong denunciation of the false teachers by citing two proverbs. The first is a biblical one (Pr 26:11); the second is extrabiblical. Both dogs and pigs were considered vile by the Jews. Jesus also used the designations "dogs" and "pigs" in speaking of those opposed to God and his Word (cf. Mt 7:6). So the false teachers are unclean and return to the pagan corruption. The "dog [that] returns to its vomit" or the sow that "is washed" portrays the person who has a religious profession or outward change without a regenerating inner change that affects his or her nature. Such persons soon revert to their true nature.

V. The Promise of the Lord's Coming (3:1–18)

A. The Certainty of the Day of the Lord (3:1–10)

1 "Dear friends" (lit., "beloved"; GK 28) is repeated in vv.8, 14, and 17 in this chapter (see also 1Pe 2:11; 4:1). "This is now my second letter to you." Does this refer to 1 Peter? Most commentators say yes. But this is not certain because (1) it has not been established that the recipients of the two letters are the same; (2) 1:12, 16 may imply a personal ministry to the recipients of this second letter that 1 Peter gives no indication of; (3) the description of the two letters ("both of them as reminders") here does not fit 1 Peter very well; and (4) other letters of apostles have not been preserved (cf. 1Co 5:9; Col 4:16). None of these points is in itself very strong; yet taken together and when coupled with the lack of use of 1 Peter in 2 Peter, they raise a doubt that leaves the question open.

"As reminders to stimulate you" is almost identical with "to refresh your memory" in 1:13. "To wholesome thinking" (lit. "to pure minds") reflects the author's goal to maintain in his readers a pure disposition.

2 The "words spoken in the past" are the prophetic oracles with special reference here to the day of the Lord. The "command" is a way of referring to the moral demands of the Christian faith (see comment on 2:21) and primarily to the command of love. These prophecies and commands were given to the early Christians by the NT prophets and apostles (cf. Eph 2:20).

3 Peter next states a primary thing to be remembered from the prophetic and apostolic deposit: the appearance of scoffers in the last days, who deny biblical truths and live in an ungodly way (cf. Da 7:25; 11:36–39; Mt 24:3–5, 11, 23–26; 1Ti 4:1ff.; 2Ti 3:1–7; Jude 17–18). The "last days" are the days that come between the first coming of the Messiah and his second coming. The "scoffers" are the false teachers of ch. 2 who deny a future eschatology.

4 Part of the early church proclamation was the announcement of the return of Jesus to complete the work of salvation and to punish the wicked (e.g., Mt 24:3ff.; Jn 14:1–3; Ac 1:11; 17:31; Ro 13:11; 1Co 15:23; 1Th 4:13–5:11; 2Th 1:7–10; Heb 9:28; Rev 1:7). The false teachers ask, "Where is this 'coming' he promised?" Mocking the faith of Christians, they support their own position by claiming, "Ever since our fathers died, everything goes on as it has since the beginning of creation." "Our fathers" most likely means the OT fathers (see Jn 6:31; Ac 3:13; Ro 9:5; Heb 1:1). "Died" (lit., "fell asleep"; GK 3121) is a lovely metaphor for the death of believers (cf. Ac 7:60; 1Th 4:13–14). The argument of the false teachers is essentially a naturalistic one—a kind of uniformitarianism that rules out any divine intervention in history.

5–6 But they "deliberately [lit., willingly; GK 2527] forget" the great Flood, when God intervened in history by destroying the world. What they forget is not only the Flood but also God's prior activity by his word—the existence of the heavens and the watery formation of the earth (Ge 1:2–10). It seems unlikely that Peter is seeking to affirm that water was the basic material of creation. He does not use the verb "create" but says that the earth "was formed [GK 5319] out of water and with water." In Genesis the sky separates the waters from the waters by the word of God, and the land appears out of the water by the same word.

At the beginning of v.6, the phrase "by these waters" (lit., "through these") probably refers to both water and the word as the agents used by God for destroying the former world (v.6), just as word and fire will be the destructive agents in the future (v.7). "The world of that time" obviously means that the inhabitants of the earth were destroyed (the world itself was not destroyed).

7 Peter's reference to a future conflagration to destroy the present cosmos is highly unusual. The OT speaks of fire in the day of the Lord (Ps 97:3; Isa 66:15–16; Da 7:9–10; Mic 1:4; Mal 4:1). And Mt 3:11–12 speaks of the future baptism of fire by the Messiah in which he will destroy the "chaff" (cf. 2Th 1:7). Peter argues that just as in the past God purged the then-existing world by his word and by waters, so in the future he will purge the world by his word and by fire. Whether this will take place before the Millennium or after, Peter does not say. Matthew 3:11–12 supports the former, while the sequence of Rev 20–21 puts the new heaven and new earth after the thousand years (cf. 2Pe 3:13).

8 Peter's second argument against the false teachers' scoffing at the "delay" of the Lord's coming stems from Ps 90:4: "For a thousand years in your sight are like a day that has just gone by, or like a watch in night." They have overlooked God's time perspective. The admonition "Do not forget" is addressed to believers and uses the same word that is used in v.5 of the false teachers' deliberate forgetfulness. Christians must be careful lest the propaganda of the scoffers distort their thinking.

9 The third argument against the scoffers grows out of the second one. God's delay is gracious; it is not caused by inability or indifference. The scoffers argued that God was slow to keep his promise of the new age, and evidently some Christians were influenced by this thinking. God's time plan is influenced by his being "patient" (GK 3428), an attribute of God prominent in Scripture (cf. Ex 34:6; Nu 14:18; Ps 86:15; Jer 15:15; Ro 2:4; 9:22). In Ro 9:22 Paul says that God "bore with great patience the objects of his wrath." Here in v.9 that patience is directed "to you."

With whom is God patient and whom does he desire to come to repentance? This verse has been a battleground between Arminian and Calvinistic interpreters. Some of the latter argue that it is not God's will that everyone without exception should repent. Thus Peter is simply saying that Christ will not return until all of the elect have repented and been saved. This view, if rigorously applied, is incompatible with premillennialism, whose adherents normally teach that some will be saved during the millennial period following Christ's return.

Calvin himself showed moderation and exegetical wisdom, when he suggested that God's love toward the human race is so wonderful that he wants all of them to be saved, and he is prepared to bestow salvation on the lost. Thus the "you" is addressed to humankind and "not wanting" is used of his will of desire, not of his will of decree (cf. Eze 18:23; 1Ti 2:4).

10 Peter's fourth argument against the false teachers reaffirms the early church's teaching that the day of the Lord will come suddenly. Jesus taught that his coming would be as unexpected as the coming of a thief (Mt 24:42–44), an analogy often repeated in the NT (cf. Lk 12:39; 1Th 5:2; Rev 3:3; 16:15). The "Lord" in these texts is Jesus in his exaltation and should be so understood here. In that catastrophic day "the heavens will disappear" with a loud noise made by something passing swiftly through the air. The sky will recede "like a scroll, rolling up" (Rev 6:14), and the earth and sky will flee from the presence of God (Rev 20:11).

"The elements" (GK 5122) could be the basic materials that make up the world; those commonly thought of in NT times were air, earth, fire, and water. But it is also possible that Peter is looking at three realms (the heavens, that of the heavenly bodies, and the earth), and that the "the elements" refers to "heavenly bodies," those mentioned in other eschatological passages (Joel 2:10; Mk 13:24–26; Rev 6:12–13). The phrase "the earth and everything in it" probably refers to all human products that will be destroyed.

B. The Ethical Implications of the Day of the Lord (3:11–16)

11 Peter now makes the impending disintegration of the universe the ground for a personal challenge to his readers. In view of what is in store for the world, Peter asks his readers, "What kind of people ought you to be?" Since the day of the Lord will soon come to punish the wicked and reward the righteous, believers should live "holy and godly lives." Holiness entails separation from evil and dedication to God; godliness relates to piety and worship.

12 Another element of godly living is expectation of the future day. Peter relates this to the idea of "speed[ing] its coming." But how can Christians hasten what God will do? Peter would probably answer by saying that prayer (Mt 6:10) and preaching (Mt 24:14) are the two principal means to bring people to repentance and thus to hasten the day (cf. Mt 24:14). To the crowd that gathered after the healing of the lame beggar at the Beautiful Gate in Jerusalem Peter proclaimed, "Repent . . . so that your sins may be wiped out, that times of refreshing may come from the Lord, and that he may send the Christ" (Ac 3:19–20). Peter again describes this coming as a fiery disintegration of the very heavens (cf. comment on v.10); the "elements" probably refers again to the "celestial bodies" on fire.

13 Through his prophets God promised righteousness. Jeremiah sees the Righteous One bringing in righteousness, and his name is "The LORD Our Righteousness" (Jer 23:5–7; 33:16; cf. Ps 9:8; Isa 11:4–5; 45:8; Da 9:24). This promise of righteousness will be fulfilled ultimately in the new heavens and the new earth of which Isaiah spoke (Isa 65:17–25) and which Peter refers to here. John also saw "a new heaven and a new earth" in which there was nothing impure (Rev 21:1, 8, 27).

14 Since there will be perfect righteousness in the new heaven and new earth and since all will appear before Christ, Christians must now be righteous in their lives. "Make every effort" (GK 5079) is a favorite word of Peter's (cf. 1:10, 15; also the related noun in 1:5). Christians are to make intense efforts to be morally pure—"spotless" (GK 834) and "blameless" (GK 318) like Christ. These two words occur in reverse order in 1Pe 1:19, where they refer to Jesus. In 2Pe 2:13 Peter has called the false teachers "blots and blemishes" (the opposite of these two words). Believers should also aim to live so as to be found having the "peace" that results from their efforts to please the Lord. In Rev 2:16, the risen Christ warns the church to repent or he will "fight against them with the sword of his mouth." Those who are "found at peace with him" have put out of their lives the things he hates.

15–16 Again Peter stresses the purpose of the Lord's "patience" (GK 3429), that it is designed for salvation. Some confuse the divine patience with slackness. But Christians should esteem it as "salvation."

"Just as our dear brother Paul also wrote you" is significant in the light of Paul's rebuke of Peter (Gal 2:11–14). Peter had recognized the ministry of Paul and Barnabas to the Gentiles. What had Paul written to the recipients of 2 Peter? We cannot answer that question. Nor is it necessary to do so in view of Peter's general statement: "He [Paul] writes the same way in all his letters." In Ro 2:4 Paul says that "God's kindness leads you toward repentance." Peter goes on to affirm that Paul's letters contain "some things that are hard to understand." The difficulty in Paul's letters stems from the profundity of the God-given wisdom they contain. Apparently false teachers were seeking to use Pauline support for their opposition to Peter. Paul's letters contain things—e.g., slogans and arguments—that can be given meanings far beyond what Paul intended.

The unlearned (NIV, "ignorant"; GK 276) are those who have not learned the apostolic teaching (Ac 2:42), nor have they been taught by the Father (Jn 6:45). They are "unstable" because they are without a foundation (cf. comment on 2:14). They "distort" the things in Paul's letters as they do the "other Scriptures." Like Satan, the false teachers and their followers can quote Scripture out of context for their purpose (cf. Mt 4:6). Does Peter's expression "the other Scriptures" imply that Paul's writings were already considered Scripture by this time (c. A.D. 64)? This is the normal understanding of the Greek. That Paul's writings should be considered "Scripture"—i.e., authoritative writing—is not surprising, for from the moment of composition they had the authority of commands of the Lord through his apostle (Ro 1:1; 1Co 14:37; Gal 1:1).

Twisting the Scriptures leads to "destruction" (GK 724; cf. comments on 2:1, 3) because it is the rejection of God's way and the setting up of one's own way in opposition to God (cf. Ro 8:7). In a time when the Christian church is plagued by heretical cults and false teaching, Peter's warning about the irresponsible use of Scripture is important. Correct exegesis must be a continuing concern of the church.

C. The Need to Guard Against Error and to Grow in Grace (3:17–18)

17–18 With the word "therefore" and an affectionate reference to his readers (see comment on 3:1), Peter begins his conclusion. These two verses touch on the main themes of the letter and summarize its contents. First, there is the reminder for his readers to watch out lest the false teachers lead them astray. Second, there is the exhortation to grow in Christ. The dominant motivation for writing this letter was Peter's love and concern for the flock (cf. the repeated use of "dear friends"). Since he has told the believers beforehand about the false teachers, they are able to be on guard.

The "lawless men" (GK 118) will attempt by their error to shift the believers off their spiritual foundation. The word translated "secure position" (GK 5113) occurs only here in the NT, but the related verb and adjective are important in Peter's life (cf. Lk 22:32 of Jesus' command to Peter) and also in this letter (see comments on 2:14; 3:16–17). The Christians' guarding against false teachers includes (1) prior knowledge of their activities, (2) warning against their immoral lives (ch. 2; cf. Mt 7:16), (3) reminders of the historicity of the apostolic message (1:16–18), (4) the prophetic teaching of the past (1:19; 3:1–2), and (5) the warning of judgment (e.g., the Flood).

Now Peter speaks positively: "But grow in the grace and knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ." In 1:3–11 he has already stressed the necessity for progress in Christian living. If Christians do not keep moving forward, they will regress or fall back. As Paul says, Christians never in this life attain all there is in Christ; so their goal is to know Christ in a fuller, more intimate way (Php 3:10–13; cf. Eph 1:17).

The closing doxology is notable for its direct ascription of "glory" (GK 1518) to Christ. For a Jew who has learned the great words in Isa 42:8—"I am the LORD; that is my name! I will not give my glory to another"—this doxology is a clear confession of Christ (cf. Jn 5:23: "that all may honor the Son just as they honor the Father"). This supreme honor belongs to Jesus Christ today ("now") and "forever." So Peter finally points his readers to the new age, "the day of the Lord," when Christ will be manifested in all his glory.

The Old Testament in the New

NT Text	OT Text	Subject
2Pe 2:22	Pr 26:11	Dog returns to vomit
2Pe 3:13	Isa 65:17	New heavens and new earth

1 John

INTRODUCTION

The letters of John are foundational to what is known in the NT as Johannine Christianity. Even as his gospel account is distinct from the others in content, structure, and theological emphasis, so John's letters differ in style and content from the other NT letters. These letters are not concerned with the problem of institutionalizing the Christian Movement, nor do they fit easily into any historical reconstruction of the growth and development of the Christian church in the world.

If John's letters address the problem of heresy, they do so in unconventional terms. They insist that true Christian faith requires knowing that Jesus the Christ came in human flesh, lived a human life, and died in the flesh. But the evidence of that faith is measured more by the genuineness of one's Christian lifestyle, rather than by what one "knows." The knowledge that God is light is tested by whether one walks in that light and obeys God's commands. The knowledge that God is righteous is tested by whether one lives righteously as befits one born of God. The knowledge that God is love is tested by whether one loves fellow believers even as one loves God. The single but radical requirement for love and obedience in these letters recalls the simplicity of Jesus' own teaching and the response he required of those who would follow him. These letters have a special place preserved for them in the life and devotion of the church.

1. Background

Establishing the background for the three letters of John is at best speculative. Whereas for Paul's letters we have the book of Acts with its treatment of the origin of the church, the conversion of the apostle, and a record of his subsequent journeys to provide background for understanding his letters, we have nothing similar for the Johannine material. While Paul's letters fairly bristle with historical allusions that we can readily identify from other sources, those of John contain almost no references to known persons or places. Nonetheless, traditions relating to the origin of these writings did develop in the church. And since there are no alternatives, it is these traditions that have been largely responsible for providing the historical background for interpreting these letters. These traditions have connected them and the fourth gospel with the apostle John (see "Authorship"), recognized Asia as the place of their publication, and identified Cerinthianism as the heresy troubling the churches addressed.

Asia as the place of the letter's publication finds support from two lines of tradition. Irenaeus (c. A.D. 175–200) stated explicitly that John wrote his material while living at Ephesus in Asia. The earliest-known references to 1 John are by church leaders from Asia. Polycarp of Smyrna (mid-second century) appears to have been depending on 1 John when he asserted that whoever does not confess that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh is antichrist. He also urges a return to the message handed down from the beginning (cf. 1Jn 1:1, 3). Moreover, comparison of the problems presented in 1 John with the more complete description of the heresies of the second century provides additional support for Asia as the place where 1 John originated.

The tradition identifying Cerinthus as the opponent of 1 John also depends on Irenaeus. He preserved a description from Polycarp of an encounter between the apostle and Cerinthus in a public bathhouse, which John hurriedly left so that he would not have to bathe in the same place with such an enemy of the truth. Irenaeus also described in some detail the heresy of Cerinthus. Cerinthus, he said, denied the virgin birth of Jesus. After his baptism, Christ descended on Jesus in the form of a dove from God in heaven, and he began his ministry of preaching and miracles. Christ departed from Jesus on the cross, and it was only Jesus who suffered and rose again.

It is not absolutely certain, however, that Cerinthus was the opponent of John or that the heresy in view in the letter resulted from a Gnostic theological movement that had infiltrated the church. First John itself strongly suggests that the heresy arose within the church and was propagated by respected and able teachers in the community who had defected from the true faith and fellowship (2:19). Indeed, the seriousness of the situation probably derived from the fact that past leaders had become "false prophets," teaching untruths and becoming embodiments of Antichrist. That they were able to lead the community astray (2:26; 3:7) gives strong support to the idea they were secessionists, not intruders. Moreover, it is clear that the views expressed in 1 John also differed from Cerinthus in significant ways. There is no reflection, for example, of Cerinthus's distinctions between the supreme God and the series of divine emanations proceeding downward to the aeon who was Christ and who created the material universe. Furthermore, the false teachers in 1 John appear to draw theological conclusions that have no parallels in Cerinthian Gnosticism. The espousal of sinlessness (1:8, 10), their claim to know God through inspiration (2:4; 4:1–3), their loss of "fellowship" with God (1:6), and their life in the light (2:9) seem to be independent of Cerinthus's teaching. The attempt to identify the false teachers with Cerinthus or his followers is therefore dubious.

Alternate suggestions for the identity of the false teachers have lacked scholarly consensus. Perhaps the best suggestion is the one that sees the root of the problem in the confrontation of Christianity with the evangelistic and pietistic religious movements developing especially in Asia. When missionaries of the Christian faith first came into contact with the representatives of these movements, they undoubtedly received, at least initially, a warm welcome. Their willingness to accept any new religious movement made sure that they were prepared to adopt Christianity, just as they had already tried to adopt Judaism. Since the Johannine community was already reflecting some of the language of this religious world, they were presumably unusually successful in their missionary effort among such persons. But these converts inevitably brought philosophical and religious verbiage with them into the community that required an extensive theological response by the teachers. The gospel of John may in itself represent not only a missionary document for these persons but a response to the questions raised by the converts. Inevitably, however, a significant number of the faithful proved vulnerable to a pagan reinterpretation that borrowed from Christian categories.

In his first letter John seems to recognize this pull and seeks to help those trying not to fall back into non-Christian speculation. On the other hand, the community inevitably contained some enthusiastic but ill-informed converts to Christianity, who were eager to reinterpret their new-found faith. The false teachers who previously had been in the community and had then departed, proving that they had not really belonged to the community, may well have been representatives of such a movement. They would be presenting themselves as preserving the best of both traditions.

The false teachers' motive, at least at first, may have been prompted only by the desire to translate the Gospel into the terms of another culture. Their enthusiasm likely blinded them to the fact that their reinterpretation would ultimately lead to the dissolution of what was central to the Christian faith: Jesus as the Son of God through whose death the bonds of sin had finally been destroyed. If this reconstruction is valid, it helps explain why these new "false teachers" had such a strong position in the community. Originally they had belonged to those who were most involved in the missionary activity of the community. That they no longer were true to the faith and were to be classed as antichrists would certainly be hard for some to accept.

2. Occasion and Purpose

It is clear from the internal evidence of 1 John that a developing schism within the Christian community led to its writing. The difficulty had already reached a point where some members, including teachers, had separated themselves from the others and were in the process of setting up their own community (2:19). Although the breach was complete, the dissidents continued to keep in touch with the rest of the membership and were actively trying to entice them to join the new group (2:26). The breach of fellowship also led to a breach in understanding the faith. What earlier may have been hypothetical questions now became tenets of the rival community, identified in John's letters primarily by what the false teachers denied. They denied: Jesus as the Christ, the Son of God (2:22; 5:1, 5); the coming of Christ in the flesh (4:2; 2Jn 7); the authority of Jesus' commands (2:4); their own sinfulness (1:8, 10); salvation through the work of Christ (2:2); the absolute demand that believers love one another (2:9); righteous conduct as a requirement of fellowship with God (1:6; 2:29; 3:6, 10); the responsibility to live as Jesus had lived (2:4, 6: 3:7); the nature of the company of believers as a community of fellowship with the Father, with his Son, and with one another (1:3; 2:11); and the authority of the writer of the letters as the proclaimer of the message that had been from the beginning (1:5; 3Jn 10).

It is harder to reconstruct the points at which the false teachers agreed with the community of faith. Apparently they believed that God is light (1:5); that the truth of the Gospel released them from the power of sin (1:8); that the Christ is a philosophical concept (though they denied his existence in the flesh; 4:2); that they had a mission to the world (2Jn 10); that they have been anointed of the Spirit (2:27); and that the devil is an anti-God (3:8–10; 4:2–3).

The writer responded to the false teachers by recognizing them as a supreme danger threatening the very life and faith of the community. What was called for was a positive reaffirmation of the cardinal doctrines of the faith that had been from the beginning and a clear and explicit exposure of the heresies the dissidents were promoting. He also sensed the need for reassuring the faithful. So he gave his letter a strong pastoral flavor. Its contents are marked by strong affirmations and words of encouragement for theChristian community—namely, that the nature of the fellowship is one of love and righteousness (1:3, 7); that its origin is from the beginning (1:1); that in the community there is genuine forgiveness of sins (1:9) and a walk of obedience not unlike Jesus' own example (2:6); that walking in the light is living in love (2:10); that members of the community will not be ashamed at Jesus' coming (2:28); and that they may have complete confidence in his answering their prayers (3:22). Warnings are addressed to the community against the seduction of the world (2:15), against the present antichrist, (2:18), and against false spirits and false prophets (3:22; 4:1–2). Reminders to the members of their anointing (2:20) as being sufficient to enable them to remain in God (4:13) are provided, as well as promises that belong to them as the children of God (3:1). Jesus Christ as the epitome and example of love to the community becomes a critical theme (3:16–18), just as the proclamations that God himself is love (4:16), that love derives from him, and that the Christian life is lived in him (4:12–13) are also critical themes. Again and again the letter returns to the primary confession that Jesus is the Christ, the one who has come in the flesh and has overcome the world. He is the true God and eternal life (5:20).

3. Structure

John follows a somewhat structured approach in this letter without being bound by it. He is quite willing to depart from the structure in order to allow room for the introduction of divergent themes as well as overlapping ones. As the exposition will show, the writer of the letter deals with the problems raised by the schismatic actions of the "false teachers." He does this within the context of a general exposition that focuses on the nature and life of the community of God. His deepest concern is pastoral. He desires to reassure, protect, alert, and teach the faithful members about their life together as the people of God. To accomplish this he shows that "from the beginning" the basis of the believing community is Jesus Christ. He is the one through whom fellowship with the Father and with the members of the community becomes possible. This fellowship is further defined as life in him and as eternal life.

John goes on to assert that the fellowship of believers draws its character from God, who is light, righteousness, and love. It is these attributes of God, shown by Jesus our example, that in turn become criteria for the standard of conduct expected of the children of God. Obedience to him thus becomes a primary obligation of the community.

The writer also makes clear that the fellowship is exclusive. It consists of those born of God who are committed to obedience to his Son's commands and example; who confess Jesus as the Christ, the incarnate Son of

The Gospel of John and the First Letter of John

There is a remarkable similarity of language and theme between the gospel of John and the first letter of John. The following chart outlines where these parallels are.

Theme	1 John	Gospel of John
Word was from the beginning and became flesh, and we saw it	1:1; 2:14	1:1–2, 14
We could touch the "Word of life"	1:1	20:27, 29
The Word was "the life"	1:2; 5:20	1:4; 11:25; 14:6
The Word was "with the Father"	1:2	1:1, 18
We must testify to the Word	1:2	15:27
Complete joy available through Christ	1:4	3:29; 16:24; 17:13
Light from God dispels darkness	1:5–7	1:4–5; 3:19–21
Life through the blood of God's Son	1:7	6:53–56
The word has no place in unbelievers	1:10	5:38
Jesus as the atoning sacrifice for the sin of the world	2:2; 3:5; 4:10	1:29; 3:16–17; 11:51
Loving God involves obeying his commands	2:3, 5; 3:22; 5:2–3	14:15, 21; 15:10
Jesus as our example	2:6	13:15
Jesus' command to love one another	2:7; 3:11, 23; 4:7, 11	13:34; 15:12, 17
Jesus as the true shining light	2:8	1:9; 8:12; 9:5
Walking in darkness and stumbling	2:11	11:9–10; 12:35
Word of God living in us	2:14	5:38
Those who do not have the love of God in them	2:15	5:42
Knowledge gained through the Holy Spirit	2:20, 27	14:16
Knowing the truth	2:21	8:32
Knowing the Father involves knowing the Son	2:23	8:19; 14:7
Remaining in the Father and the Son	2:24, 27; 3:24	15:4
God's love that makes us his children	3:1–2	1:12; 3:16
Those who do not know God	3:1	15:21; 16:3
The Son of God is sinless	3:5	8:46

God; and who depend on him for forgiveness and for overcoming the evil one. So he provides tests by which the false teachers can be exposed and the faithful members of the community reinforced in their own confidence that they truly are the children of God. Over and over he stresses the fact that the test of true faith and practice for those born of God is to love one's fellow believer. This becomes the final test for walking in the light, living in truth and righteousness, and loving God.

4. Authorship and Date

The author of 1 John never identifies himself in the letter. Apparently his identity was so well known to his "children" that he knew they would recognize him by what he wrote. We do get an ambiguous clue in 2 John and 3 John when he uses the title "elder" to address them. The fourth gospel is likewise unidentified as to authorship except that in the epilogue there is the enigmatic statement about "the disciple whom Jesus loved" (21:20; cf. 13:23): "This is the disciple who testifies to these things and who wrote them down" (21:24). For those who recognize common authorship for the gospel of John and John's letters, it is possible through a process of elimination to identify the "beloved" disciple as John the son of Zebedee (see introduction to John).

External evidence for John's authorship is preserved in the writings of Irenaeus, who

Theme	1 John	Gospel of John
The devil has been sinning from the beginning	3:8	8:44
Being born of God	3:9; 4:7; 5:1, 4, 18	1:13; 3:3, 6
Hatred from the world	3:13	15:18–19; 17:14
Crossing from death to life	3:14	5:24
Jesus laid down his life for us	3:16	10:11
Laying down our lives for others	3:16	15:13
Truth is found in the Son of God	3:19	14:6; 18:37
God knows all things	3:21	21:17
Receiving from God what we ask	3:22; 5:14–15	14:13–14; 15:7, 16; 16:23
The command to believe in God's Son	3:23	6:29
Jesus has come in the flesh	4:2	1:14
Overcoming the world	4:4; 5:4–5	16:33
The world loves those of the world	4:5	15:19
Those who are not from God do not listen to him	4:6	8:47
The Spirit of truth	4:6; 5:6	14:17; 15:26; 16:13
God sent his one and only Son so we can live	4:9, 14; 5:11–12	1:18; 3:16–17, 36; 20:31
No one has seen God	4:12, 20	1:18
Jesus is the Savior of the world	4:14	3:17; 4:42; 12:47
We are in God and God is in us	4:16	15:4–5; 17:21
Jesus and the water and the blood	5:6–8	19:34–35
Human testimony and divine testimony	5:9–10	5:32–37; 8:14–17
How to know we have eternal life	5:13	20:30–31
Believing on the name of God's Son	5:13	1:12
Satan as the prince of this world	5:19	12:31; 14:30
Knowing the true God	5:20	17:3
Jesus as true God	5:20	1:1; 20:28

quotes copiously from 1 John and attributes this letter to John. The Muratorian Canon (c. A.D. 200) assumes that 1 John and John's gospel have a common origin and that they have been received as such by the church.

The date for the letters of John is at best problematic. It depends largely on our ability to reconstruct the history of the Johannine community. This community may have begun about the same time as the church at Antioch. Persecution may have finally driven the leaders from Jerusalem, and John may have gathered with some of the Samaritan converts along with the former followers of the Baptist. They probably located somewhere in southern Palestine and continued their mission to the Jews.

Sometime before A.D. 70, perhaps as a result of increased hostility from the Jews, the Johannine community migrated to Asia Minor and initiated what became a very successful mission to those Gentiles whose religious orientation was in the direction of "higher paganism." The need for a gospel that would double as a missionary document for these converts became evident, and the gospel of John was thus published somewhere around A.D. 70–80. It expresses its own purpose clearly: "These are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that by believing you may have life in his name" (Jn 20:31).

The heretical developments discussed earlier took place during the next ten years and finally resulted in the secession of some members of the community in order to found a rival one. John's first letter was written in response to this crisis around 80–90. That it was written to reassure the faithful is clear from its author's own testimony: "I write these things to you who believe in the name of the Son of God so that you may know that you have eternal life" (5:13). The letter is addressed to a single community but probably was meant to circulate throughout the geographical area where John's churches had been established.

John's second and third letters are brief ones written to member churches in other places. These churches also appear in danger of problems created by the secessionists. So the two letters were apparently written in anticipation of these problems.

The perspective of 1 John is clearly reflected in 2 John. Writing soon after 1 John, "the elder" (v.1) addresses the community that has been faithful to "the truth" (i.e., the Gospel) as he has proclaimed it (v.4). He warns, however, against traveling missionaries whom he expects to visit this locality soon (v.10). Evidently they will present themselves as emissaries of the secessionists and continue to spread their false teaching (v.7). The elder warns the church neither to extend hospitality to such emissaries nor even to welcome them into the community (v.11).

The background of 3 John is more obscure, despite its personal references. It seems best to consider that the situation was the same for 3 John as for 1 and 2 John. If so, still another community is addressed—a community in which there appear to be several groups of Christians in "house" churches as well as one larger group or church led by Diotrephes (v.9). The smaller house churches, one led by Gaius and another apparently led by Demetrius, have remained faithful to the elder. They remain "in the truth" and "in love." They have received missionaries from the elder's faithful community and have shown them the proper hospitality (vv.5–8). But the elder complains against Diotrephes, the description of whom shows that he has been affected by the secessionists. He "gossips" maliciously against the elder and refuses to receive his message. He even goes so far as to throw out of the church anyone who welcomes the faithful "brothers" from the elder's community (v.10).

There would appear to be an interval of time between 2 John and 3 John. The situation has grown decidedly worse in the place where Gaius ministers than in that where the "chosen lady" is. Probably one would do well to think of an interval of a year or more between the two letters (c. A.D. 90).

EXPOSITION

I. Preface (1:1–4)

The first four verses represent a single sentence in Greek. The main verb and subject, "we proclaim" (GK 550), do not actually appear until v.3; instead John opens with the object of the verb, which consists of four relative clauses—"That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked at"—and is followed by a parenthesis in v.2 enlarging on "the Word of life." Only then are the subject and main verb introduced, with a restatement of the object, "what we have seen and heard." Two purpose clauses conclude the preface: "that you also may have fellowship with us" and "to make our joy complete."

What confronts us here is the intensity of the author's feeling as he reflects on the nature of the Christian message in the light of its very beginnings. Although the events that the message is founded on occurred many years earlier, the immensity of their implication and the abiding mystery they represent retain the power to overwhelm his thinking and extend his literary skills as he witnesses to them. This first paragraph could be described as the author's language of ecstasy.

1 The reader is clearly pointed back to Jn 1:1—"In the beginning was the Word"—and from there to Ge 1:1—"In the beginning God"—with this difference: The Gospel deals with the "personal word" of God's eternity and his entrance into time. The letter centers on the life heard and in turn proclaimed (cf. Ac 5:20; Php 2:16). This message is from the beginning because it is of God. It precedes creation, time, and history. But in God the message of life also draws near to humanity and finds its culmination in Jesus. In him the Word of life becomes incarnated, manifested, and hence can be seen, touched, and even handled.

The author's stress is twofold. He states what has always been true about the Gospel. His witness, unlike that of his opponents, represented neither innovation nor afterthought. Moreover, his witness was based on the immediate evidence of the senses. It is not a fabricated tale.

The use of the pronoun "we" assures the reader that the message is being proclaimed by those who had heard the Gospel with their own ears and who had touched him with their own hands (perhaps a reference to the Resurrection appearances—Lk 24:39; Jn 20:24–29). Already the writer is mounting his polemic against the heretics who denied that Christ had a human body.

2 Because this is the nub of John's argument, he takes pains to restate it: The life to which he bears witness, the life that was with the Father, is precisely the life manifested in the historical person of Jesus. That is why John can say he has seen it, can bear personal witness to it, and can make an apostolic declaration concerning it. The three verbs "seen," "testify," and "proclaim" present personal experience, responsible affirmation, and authoritative announcement. The phrase "eternal life" underscores the divine character of the life described, not its length.

3 This verse introduces the purpose of the letter: "that you also may have fellowship with us. And our fellowship is with the Father and with his Son, Jesus Christ." The Greek word rendered "fellowship" (koinonia; GK 3126) occurs here and in v.6. It is not easy to translate. Suggestions are "fellowship," "communion," "participation," "share a common life," and "partnership." Its root word means "common" or "shared" as opposed to "one's own" (koinos; GK 3123). The Greeks used this word group to describe partners in business, joint owners of a piece of property, or shareholders in a common enterprise. In the NT it refers to Christians who share a common faith (Phm 6), who share possessions (Ac 2:44; 4:32), or who are partners in the Gospel (Php 1:5).

Koinonia and other words in that word group occur over sixty times in the NT in reference to the supernatural life that Christians share. This supernatural life is disclosed in the incarnate Christ. It is the eternal life that comes from the Father and becomes the life shared individually and corporately by the company of believers. Oneness with God is what causes the oneness of faith. That the words "fellowship with us" precede in the text the words "fellowship is with the Father and with his Son, Jesus Christ" may be significant. There can be no fellowship with the Father or with the Son that is not based on apostolic witness. So John stresses "fellowship with us" as having priority in time.

4 The author links his concern for his readers to his own standing as an apostolic witness. Their obedience will result in the completion of "joy" (GK 5915) in him, and therefore also in them and in the whole fellowship. This joy is mentioned in his gospel: "I have told you this so that my joy may be in you and that your joy may be complete" (Jn 15:11; cf. also 16:22–24; 17:13).

Clearly this joy is inseparable from the salvation that is present in the Son, but it is directly bound up with the person of the Son, who is himself present in the fellowship. Joy is a gift of the Father, even as the Son is a gift of the Father; it is present wherever the fellowship truly appears. But joy can never be perfectly known or fully complete because the fellowship itself, though real, is imperfectly realized. The present joy in the fellowship is a token of the ultimate expression of joy, which depends on the final revelation of the Son. In John's gospel, this final revelation required Jesus' "going away" so that he may "come again" (cf. Jn 16:16).

II. Requirements for Fellowship With God Who Is Light (1:5–2:28)

A. Walking in the Light (1:5–2:2)

If the readers are to have fellowship with the Father and with the Son (v.3), they must understand what makes this possible. They must know who God is in himself and, consequently, who they are in themselves as creatures of God. So the author first describes the moral character of God in terms of light (v.5) and then goes on to deny three claims made by those who falsely boast of their knowledge and fellowship with God: (1) that moral behavior is a matter of indifference in one's relationship to God (v.6); (2) that immoral conduct does not issue in sin for one who knows God (v.8); and (3) that the knowledge of God removes sin as even a possibility in the life of the believer (v. 10). True evidences for fellowship with God or walking in the light are: (1) fellowship with one another (v.7), followed by cleansing in the blood of Christ; (2) confession of sin, (v. 9) which brings both forgiveness and cleansing; and (3) confidence that if we sin we have Jesus Christ as an advocate and sacrifice for our sins (2:2).

5 John begins his exposition by referring to the message heard from Jesus. His allusion is probably not to a specific word of Jesus but to Jesus himself as the Son in whose life and death the Father manifested himself. As in vv.1–4, in contrast to the false teachers he opposes, the author shows the authority that lies behind his own apostolic witness.

The message that "God is light" needs to be compared with declarations elsewhere by John that "God is spirit" (Jn 4:24) and "God is love" (1Jn 4:8). All three stress the immateriality of God and the "Godness" of God—i.e., God in his essence. Light emphasizes especially the splendor and glory of God, the truthfulness of God, and his purity.

Certain OT ideas dominate the Christian concept of "light" as a description of God. Light stresses the self-communicative nature of God and the action of God for human beings and for their salvation. The psalmist catches this with such utterances as "In your light we see light" (Ps 36:9) or "The LORD is my light and my salvation" (Ps 27:1). John expounds this in vv.5–7 (cf. Jn 1:9). Light also accents God's empowering activity in our lives. God as light not only shines downward for our salvation but enables us to walk in the light. Jesus said, "I am the light of the world. Whoever follows me will never walk in darkness, but will have the light of life" (Jn 8:12; cf. also 12:35). John encourages his readers to walk in the light (v.7; cf. Eph 5:8–14). Light, then, is the presence of God's grace.

God's light also has the character of a demand. That is certainly the meaning here in vv.5-6. If people turn from the light or love darkness rather than light, it is because their deeds are evil (Jn 3:19–21). In the world of first-century religious thought, the word "light" described ultimate realities. But there the weight was on the metaphysical implications. John is far removed from that type of speculation. He is concerned with the goodness of God and also the goodness of the human race.

The latter part of v.5 is a negative corollary emphasizing the statement that God is light. As darkness has no place in God, so all that is of the darkness is excluded from having fellowship with God. This idea stands out as the author now discusses the behavior pattern of his opponents.

6 John introduces the first of three tests of Christian faith by the clause "If we claim." He uses this device to refer to false claims made by the false teachers. The first claim—to have fellowship with God and yet to walk in darkness—probably belongs to early Gnostics who, as John describes them, have no love for one another (v.7), hate their brothers (2:9, 11), claim sinlessness (v.8), and deny that Jesus came in the flesh (2:22). To "walk in the darkness" is the same as "abiding" in darkness or "living in darkness"—i.e., allowing darkness to define one's life. In the final part of the verse, the author indicates that the test of truth is not one's belief—though that is not excluded—but one's action, deeds, and conduct. Speaking the truth is only one part of doing the truth, and not the most important part.

It must not be assumed that the opponents agreed with the author's claim that they walked in darkness. Far from it! They claimed to walk in the light while they practiced the deeds of darkness. This is what made their actions so pernicious. Inevitably they began to call their "darkness" light and to claim righteousness without doing righteousness. In such situations, the author says, we lie and do not live by the truth.

7 The positive test of knowing God is to live (lit., "walk"; GK 4344) in the light as he himself is in the light. John thus reiterates the fact that light is God's sphere. It is his nature, and he wills that it should become ours.

One consequence of obeying the command to walk in the light is having fellowship with one another. The author is combating the heresy that boasts of knowledge of and communion with God but neglects fellowship with other Christians. True fellowship with God comes through other people; fellowship with them is the proof of fellowship with God.

A second consequence of walking in the light is that the blood of Jesus keeps on cleansing us from every defilement due to sin. The language reminds us of the sacrificial system of the OT, as well as of the interpretation of Christ's death given us in the letter to the Hebrews. Without Christ's ongoing cleansing, enduring fellowship would be impossible, for the guilt resulting from sin destroys fellowship. The results of that cleansing are forgiveness, restoration, and the reestablishment of love. John's use of the singular "sin" reminds us that the emphasis is not on specific sinful acts but on the work of God in Christ that meets and deals with the sin principle itself.

8 The second false claim by John's opponents is that a Christian has no sin. The opponents probably did not claim that they had never committed wrongful acts, but they denied that the sin principle had lasting power over them or even had a presence in them, at least in those who had attained superior spiritual enlightenment. They were, after all, already perfect and free from guilt. It is not surprising that Gnostics, whether Christian or otherwise, should have denied sin. No human being, ancient or modern, wishes to understand existence under that rubric.

Others in John's community may have argued, like some in Corinth, that sin was a matter of the flesh and had nothing to do with the spirit, or that since they possessed the spirit, they were beyond the categories of good and evil and therefore moral principles no longer applied to them.

Whatever the shape of the argument, and regardless of whether it is an affirmation from the ancient world or a modern restatement, it remains true that whenever the principle of sin is denied as an ongoing reality, there follows a denial of responsibility for individual actions. Gossip, defiling of persons, hatred of the brethren, jealousy, and boasting become sanctioned as non-sins; walking in the light is denied; and the fellowship to which we are called is never permitted to exist. Furthermore, when the sin principle is denied, truth as an principle of life cannot exist in us. As a result, in God's name, we make his presence and power an impossibility.

9 John now confronts us with our second definite test of obedience. Walking in the light is demonstrated not by the denial of sin but by confessing it and abandoning it. This action links us to God's mercy. Those who confess their sins and condemn them are linked to God. And we can confess our "sins" to God and before other people fearlessly and in confidence because God is both faithful and just.

The plural "sins" makes clear that we affirm our sinfulness by confessing our sins. The forgiveness that comes is related to God's faithfulness and justice. God is faithful in himself, i.e., to his own nature (cf. 2Ti 2:13), and faithful to his promises (cf. Ro 3:25; 1Co 10:13; Heb 10:23; 11:11). Everywhere he promises forgiveness to his children (e.g., Jer 31:34; Mic 7:19–20). And in keeping this promise, God reveals his faithfulness and justice.

The force of God's being "just" (GK 1465) points to the Cross, to the covenant, to God's rule over us, and to the attributes of God from which forgiveness flows. And certainly God's mercy must not be set against his justice. The phrase "he is faithful and just" includes all those things. It is a corollary of the fact that God is light and love.

The verb used for "forgive" (GK 918) has at its roots the idea of the "cancellation of debts" or the "dismissal of charges." The verb used for "purifies" (GK 2751) pictures an act of cleansing from the pollution of sin so that a new life of holiness may begin. Sinners are perceived as cleansed from moral imperfections and from the injustices that separate them from God.

10 This verse gives the third and final false claim: "If we claim we have not sinned." But is this a different assertion from the one in v.8 or just a restatement of the same issue with an even more dramatic conclusion: "We make him [God] out to be a liar and his word has no place in our lives"?

In favor of the former possibility is the change in the verbal construction from "we have no sin" to "we have not sinned." The latter statement is more inclusive. The persons involved could be saying, "Whatever is true about the sin principle in others, we as Gnostic believers have transcended it all. We do not sin! We have not sinned! Sin has gained no foothold in us." Probably both statements had their adherents among the Gnostic believers. Some may have said it one way, some the other. Some may have claimed that through their "knowledge" derived from the Christian proclamation they were removed from the possibility of sin. Others may have boasted that they had entered a sinless state through "knowledge" before the Gospel had even come to them.

This latter statement, in other words, is far more blatant and defiant. It makes a mockery of the Gospel. It states that the reason God acted in grace and mercy toward us for the sake of our sins is false, that God first deceived us about ourselves and then becomes himself the Deceiver. The statement "his word has no place in our lives" means that the word proclaimed, the tradition received, and the witness from the OT Scriptures have no place in the heart and conscience of those who deny their sin. Consequently the possibility of hearing a redemptive word is also denied, and one can neither live by the Word nor receive forgiveness offered by God.

2:1 As John resumes his discourse on sin and forgiveness, we see a striking change of mood. Whereas earlier he was focusing on his opponents and their false teaching, now he speaks about these things as they affect his followers. The note of endearment—"my dear children"—in no way minimizes the seriousness of the discussion. Lest any conclude from his previous statements that sin must be considered inevitable in the life of the believer and not a matter of urgent concern since God forgives sins through Christ, John hastens to add, "I write this to you so that you will not sin." There is no question at all in his mind that sin and obedience to God are irreconcilable. Sin is the enemy. It removes the believer from the light, prevents fellowship with God, and destroys fellowship with the children of light. The principle of sin as the power of darkness must be excluded from the believer's life, and individual acts of sin must be resisted. Where failure occurs, the sin must be confessed before the body and the Lord and then abandoned. And always the intent of the believer remains the same—not to commit sin!

If any of his children should fail and commit sin, the author is anxious that they neither deceive themselves about it nor lie about their action and give up walking in the light. The answer to lapsing into sin is the forgiveness of God made available through Jesus Christ. He has been designated the believer's advocate, the counsel "who speaks . . . in our defense." His worthiness to perform this function rests on the fact that even as God is righteous (1:9), so he too merits the title "The Righteous One."

2 Our advocate does not maintain our innocence but confesses our guilt. Then he enters his plea before the Father on our behalf as the one who has made "the atoning sacrifice [GK 2662] for our sins" (this word also occurs in 4:10; cf. also Lk 18:13; Ro 3:25; Heb 2:17; 9:5). And his sacrifice is not only for our sins, "but also for the sins of the whole world." This statement asserts two things: Christ's sacrifice is sufficient for all, and it is necessary for all.

B. Obeying His Commands (2:3–11)

The first section (1:1–2:2) dealt with fellowship, primarily fellowship with God. Three false claims made by the opponents were denied (vv.6, 8, 10), and each false claim was used as an occasion for the presentation of what are true evidences of living in fellowship with God. The second section (2:3–11) is concerned with knowledge of God. Again the false claims to knowledge by the opponents are stated first, this time introduced by the clause "he who says" (cf. vv.4, 6, 9). Each of these claims is again denied and the evidence of the true knowledge of God is set forth: obeying his commands (v.5), walking in his likeness (v.6), and loving one's brother (v.10).

3 There appears to be a break in subject matter with what precedes as the author now turns to the topic of knowing God. For him to know God is, however, a natural corollary to the idea of walking in the light and of having fellowship with God. It is simply another way of speaking of the reality of God. In this instance the language probably is a response to the opponents for whom knowledge (gnosis; GK 1194) was a key term. To these "Gnostic" opponents, knowledge of God came through "mystical insights" or by a "direct vision of God." At the same time, they were uninterested in moral conduct and unconcerned about human behavior.

For the Hebrew or Christian mind, however, knowledge of God cannot be separated from the experience of righteousness. Consequently there is no greater claim one can make in knowing God than to obey him. "We can be sure we know him," the author says, "if we obey his commands." For John, therefore, the test of knowledge of God is moral conduct (cf. also Tit 1:16). There is no knowledge of God that does not also keep his commandments.

4 Now the author addresses his opponents who claim that they know God but at the same time break his commandments. Since he considers knowledge of God practical and experiential, to claim to know God and at the same time to disobey his commandments is to lie and be devoid of all truth.

5 Next John states the positive side of knowledge. The one who "obeys his word" (a more comprehensive way of speaking of the Gospel, including both promises and commandments) finds God's love "made complete" (GK 5457) in him. True knowledge of God does not end with speculative ideas, as for the Gnostics, but with obedience to the moral law and with the presence of God's love in the believer. "Made complete" carries with it the idea of continuous growth and development; it describes both state and process. As obedience is practiced, so God's love matures in us.

6 "To live in him" (either the Father or the Son, but in the context the Father is more likely) introduces another way the opponents described their relationship to God. What they claimed by this experience we do not know; probably they boasted of mystical experiences, visions of the light, and the like. What they did not claim was any seriousness to live in a godly manner. The author's comment is direct and forceful: "Whoever claims to live in him must walk [i.e., live] as Jesus did." Relationship to God requires moral behavior worthy of God. And as the revelation of God in Christ is accepted as the high point of divine self-disclosure, so the human life of Jesus becomes the measuring stick of true moral and ethical behavior. The author is not claiming that the walk of Jesus can be perfectly imitated but that there is a divine imperative—which must be taken seriously—for believers to live according to the way Jesus lived.

7 The affectionate term "dear friends" (lit., "beloved"; GK 28) reminds us that the author is looking in two directions at once: (1) He is setting forth tests that will expose the false teachings and claims of his opponents. (2) He is providing tests by which his own spiritual children will know they are walking in the light.

In addition, John may be dealing with a serious charge against his own teaching. His opponents may have claimed that he has in fact distorted the Gospel by adding to it. For them the knowledge of God available in the Gospel was itself the end of the religious quest. To John, however, the Gospel is fulfilled in the knowledge of God that is revealed in Jesus, and this in turn requires obedience to his commands and results in a new relationship with God expressed in a life of love. The point of view reflects Jesus' words as recorded in Jn 13:34. The new command that John speaks of here in v.7 sums up what it means to "walk in the light" and to "walk as Jesus did." Thus it stands at the heart of the Gospel. Moreover, what John was proclaiming was not "a new command but an old one" they had had "since the beginning." So he denies that there ever was "a message" that did not have this command at its heart.

8 In view of v. 7, how can the author assert that this command is also at the same time "a new command"? Its newness lies at the point of its realization and fulfillment. Jesus lived a life of divine love, and he extended this life to his disciples as a new command to be fulfilled in their lives (Jn 15:12ff.). After Jesus' death and resurrection, they discovered that as they obeyed his commands, his promise did indeed find fulfillment. What had been true in Jesus' own life now became part of the reality of their lives. They too began to know what it was to "love." Just as Luke (Ac 2) and Paul (2Co 5:17) wrote about the experience of this realized new life in the present, John expresses the realized fulfillment by simply saying that "the darkness is passing and the true light is already shining" (cf. Eph 5:8–14; 1Th 5:4–8).

9 This verse brings us to the third false claim that the author denies. Whereas obedience to the new command leads to love among the Christian community, among the opponents who claim to "be in the light" there is hate. This hate for one's fellow believer shows that the light they follow is nothing but darkness.

How does John understand hate? His answer lies primarily in what one does. Hate is the absence of the deeds of love. To walk in the light is to love one's brother, and God's love will express itself in concrete actions. If these are missing, it is not because love can be neutral or can exist unexpressed. Love unexpressed is not love at all. When it is absent, hate is present.

In this instance, hate is the failure to deny oneself, the unwillingness to lay down one's life for a brother (Jn 15:13). One considers one's own plight first (1Co 13:5); disregards the robbed and afflicted (Lk 10:30–37); despises the little ones (Mt 18:10); withholds the cup of cold water from the thirsty (Mt 25:42); and makes no effort to welcome the stranger, clothe the naked, or help the sick (Mt 25:43). Whenever a brother has need and one does not help him, then one has, in fact, hated his brother.

Does the word "brother" (GK 81) refer here to one's neighbor or to one who belongs to the community of faith? In this instance it probably refers to a member of the community of faith. It is not that John lacks concern for those outside the faith: rather, in this letter he has the community of believers in view. Moreover, if believers cannot love their fellow believers, it is doubtful that they can truly love their neighbors.

10 The author now gives us a positive test of living in the light. Unlike his opponents, his concern is with deeds, not claims. "Whoever loves," he says, is "in the light." Conversely, the one who does not live "in the light" will not manifest God's love.

The uncertain antecedents of the Greek pronouns leads to some ambiguity in the rest of the sentence. In view of the author's aim, he is probably saying that the one who loves and abides in the light will never cause the offense the opponents do.

11 Now the author picks up the concept of "darkness" from v.9 and gives it a final elaboration and conclusion. One who "hates his brother" is not simply "in the darkness" but is condemned to spend his life in darkness. Though he has eyes, he can see nothing. And the darkness so blinds his eyes that he has no idea "where he is going." Life is a search, but for him it is without direction. He never knows whether he is closer to or farther from his destination. The only certainty is that he is without hope of reaching it. So hate destroys any window for light from God. To live without loving one's brother means to deny oneself the presence of God and the reality of fellowship with the community of faith.

C. Knowing the Father and Abiding Forever (2:12–17)

The first part of the letter (1:5–2:11) involved untrue assertions made by the author's Gnostic-type opponents and provided "tests" for exposing the false claims as well as for assuring those who walked in the light. The next section is in two parts. The first (2:12–14) contrasts the position of believers who walk in the light with that of the Gnostics who walk in darkness. The second part (2:15-17) warns believers not to fall into the trap of worldliness, as the false teachers did.

The first section is rhythmical, almost lyrical. Two sets of three statements introduced by the words "I write" and "I have written," or "I wrote" (NIV does not bring out this distinction), are addressed in turn to "children," "fathers," and "young men." We do not know why the author changes tenses, nor do we know the significance of the various forms of address. Possibly John intends to address his entire congregation from two standpoints—that of chronological age ("children," "young men," "fathers") and that of spiritual age (novices in the faith, those whose faith is vigorous and who are responsible for the work of the Gospel, and those whose knowledge and experience in the faith are the foundation on which the community exists).

12 "Dear children" (GK 5448) is the author's favorite term for the congregation of believers as a whole. Under this rubric he offers the most basic and universal words of assurance he can give: "Your sins have been forgiven on account of his name." They have confessed their sins (1:9) and, on account of the name of Jesus (cf. Ac 4:12), or by faith in his name (3:23; 5:13), or by faith in him (5:1, 5)—the meaning is the same—they have received forgiveness through the covenant of his blood (1:7). In this knowledge they may stand firm. Because they are forgiven, they may also have fellowship with God and true knowledge of him (v.13c).

13a "Fathers" is an unusual form of address for senior members of a congregation. According to Jewish custom, it would refer to those who had responsibility for authority. Many times it is used to refer to the leaders of the past, such as the patriarchs, etc. If it refers to members of the congregation who were mature both in years and in faith, it was indeed a solemn designation, one implying they had responsibility in the community of believers. The secondary address to the "fathers" in v.14a is particularly appropriate to older members of the community. It stresses the historic origins of the faith and the growth of the personal knowledge of Christ that comes only with experience.

The pronoun "him" is ambiguous, and while it could refer to God, it is more likely here to refer to Christ. In any case, it looks back to 1:1–3, where both God and Christ are equally represented, and it reminds the readers that they have come to know Jesus as the One who is and who was from the beginning. The idea of knowing God reflects a special interest of the prophets (see Isa 9:1–9; 52:6; Jer 31:34).

13b The description of the community as "young men" who "are strong" (v.14b) and "have overcome" adds a new dimension. Believers are to see themselves as not only in conflict with the enemy but as having perceived the victory in Christ's name and by his power. The victory obviously was gained through Christ's death, and now his followers have the task under his leadership of establishing his reign over the world and "the evil one" (v.14b—a reference to the devil; see 3:12; 5:18; cf. Jn 17:15; Eph 6:16; 2Th 3:3). This victory does not promise that believers will be removed from the heat and peril of the battlefield. But it does assure them that if they are faithful they will overcome the devil. As Christ has been victorious over Satan, so they too may commit themselves to the conflict without fear of defeat (cf. Jn 16:33; Ro 8:31–39; Col 2:15; 1Jn 3:8).

13c This time the "children" are addressed by a different word (GK 4086). While the word in v.12 emphasizes the relationship of the dependence, the word used here stresses the immaturity of the child and the need to be under instruction or direction. As children who are under teachers in the faith, John's readers have come to know God as the Father. Second only to forgiveness in importance for the new community of faith is the relationship to God as Father that comes through the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

14 After referring again to the "fathers" (see comment on v.13a), the author concludes by addressing the young men as those in whom "the word of God lives." They were indeed "strong" (GK 2708) as the children of faith, but the author reminds them that their strength ultimately depends on one fact alone—the Word of God abiding or living in them.

15 Having assured the believers of their position before God—i.e., their sins are forgiven, they know the Father, and they have overcome the evil one—John moves to application. He warns them not to love the world and gives two reasons: Love for the world precludes love for the Father, and the investment of love in the world is without meaning because the world is passing away (v.17). The love of the world versus the love of the Father provides yet another "test" of walking in the light.

"World" (GK 3180) occurs six times in vv.15–17. It obviously means something quite different here than in Jn 3:16. There the Father's love of the world is apparently based on his having willed the world into existence. It is his creation; he created it to be good, beautiful, and worthy of giving glory to him. Likewise those who live in the world are his creatures, whom he loves; even in their desperate state of living in darkness and the shadow of death, he remains constant in desiring to rescue them from eternal death. Here, however, the world is presented as the evil system under the grip of the devil (cf. 1Jn5:19; Jn 12:31; 14:30).

Love also means something different in this passage. Here it is not the selfless love for one's brother (cf. 2:10) but the love that entices by an evil desire or a forbidden appetite (Jn 3:19; 12:43). It is the world's ability to seduce believers, to draw them away from love of the Father, that concerns John.

16 What love for the world or worldliness entails is now spelled out by John in a memorable triad: "the cravings of sinful man, the lust of his eyes and the boasting of what he has and does." The phrase "the cravings of sinful man" (lit., "the desire of the flesh [GK 4922]") describes the principle of worldliness from which love of the world flows. "Flesh" refers to a selfish outlook that pursues its own ends, independent of God and independent of one's fellowman. The "flesh" not only becomes the basis for rebellion against God and for despising his law but also connotes all that is materialistic, egocentric, exploitative, and selfish. It is at the root of racism, sexism, love of injustice, despising the poor, neglecting the weak and helpless, and every unrighteous practice.

The "lust of the eyes" can refer especially to sexual lust, but can also mean everything that entices the eyes. It is a tendency to be captivated by outward show, and especially indicates greed and a desire for things aroused by seeing them (cf. Eve in Ge 3; Achan in Jos 7; David in 2Sa 11).

The key term in the third phrase is "pride" (NIV, "boasting"; GK 224); it occurs only here and in Jas 4:16 (cf. GK 225 in Ro 1:30; 2Ti 3:2). It describes a pretentious hypocrite who glories in himself or in his possessions. If one's public image means more than the glory of God or the well-being of one's fellow human beings, such pretentiousness of life has become a form of idol-worship. "Pride of life" will be reflected in whatever status symbol is important to me or seems to define my identity. When I define myself to others in terms of my honorary degrees, the reputation of the church I serve, my annual income, the size of my library, my expensive car or house, and if in doing this I misrepresent the truth and in my boasting show myself to be only a pompous fool who has deceived no one, then I have succumbed to the pride of life.

17 All the vanity of this evil world with its devices is passing away. It has already begun to putrefy. It is a corpse not yet buried. But the person who really does the will of God has the breath of eternal life.

D. Warnings Against Antichrists (2:18–28)

In the first three sections of his letter, the author has been directly presenting his followers with "tests" by which they could know they were truly in union with the Father. At the same time, he was dealing with his opponents by showing that they failed each of these tests of discipleship. In this section he reverses his method. He is no longer using indirection against his opponents, but now confronts them and their teaching by openly labeling them for what they are: antichrists (vv.18–19). He exposes their method: they lie and deny Jesus as Christ (vv.20, 23). He teaches his followers how to cope with this: they are to remain in what they were taught (vv.24–26). Finally, he assures his followers of their power to overcome: "His anointing teaches you" (vv.27–28).

18 The reference to the transitoriness of the world in v.17 provides the link to what has preceded. One sign of the end of this transitory world is the appearance of false teaching and of the Antichrist. What the apostles warned of is now being fulfilled. The spirit of "antichrist" (GK 532) is present in the world, evidenced by the many "antichrists" who have already appeared. This is no surprise, however, but only further confirmation that the company of believers are living in the last hour.

The term "last hour" occurs only here in the NT. Like the similar terms "the last days" and "the last times," it owes much to OT expectations (cf. Joel 2:28; Mic 4:1) and to later Jewish ideas. Jesus called the present age an evil age and looked forward to the age to come, which would be ushered in by God's own intervention. The NT writers thought of the "last days" in two ways. (1) Theologically, they connected this period to the new age associated with the coming of Jesus. In the gospel of John this new age is designated by the statement "the hour is come" and is marked by Jesus' death and resurrection (Jn 4:23; 5:25). In Acts the new age is referred to as the "days to come" and is signaled by the pouring forth of the Spirit (Ac 2:17) and salvation through calling on the name of the Lord (Ac 2:21). But the NT writers did not believe this new age had completely come. They recognized it as being present provisionally in Christ and in the Holy Spirit. But because of this dawning of the new age, they saw the present age as already doomed and passing away.

(2) Eschatologically, the term "last days" designates the last days before Christ's return (cf. 2Ti 3:1ff.; 2Pe 3:3). In the gospel of John, the last day refers to the last resurrection and judgment (cf. Jn 6:39–40, 44, 54; 11:24; 12:48).

Should the term "last hour" here be understood theologically or eschatologically? More likely the former. Since the Greek literally translates "it is a last hour," the term seems to describe the general character of the period rather than its specific time in history.

In addition, the words used here involve no chronological or temporal assertions. Also, in his gospel, John uses "hour" (GK 6052) theologically to indicate the fulfillment of time—the time of redemption and salvation (Jn 2:4; 4:21; 7:30; 8:20; 12:23).

19 The departure of the opponents may have had a greater effect on the congregation than the reason for it. The early church obviously had severe debates, with significant differences of opinion being expressed. Yet as far as we know, no one thought that "separation from the congregation" was an option for anyone professing faith in Jesus. Departure, like Judas's going out from the community of disciples, pointed to betrayal, denial of faith, and separation from God's grace. That is why John acknowledges that those false teachers, whom he now designates as antichrists, had been regular members of the congregation. "They went out from us," he says, but hastens to add, "they did not really belong to us." Like Judas, they had been nominal members of the community and had never truly shared its fellowship.

John goes on to teach the significance and abiding nature of life in the community. "If they had belonged to us, they would have remained with us." Those who have actually been a part of the divine life will without fail persevere in the community. But in order that the true nature of the false teachers might be exposed, "they went out from us," so that the community might know that "none of them belonged to us" (cf. Mt 24:24).

Expulsion from the Christian community for misdeeds was and is a serious act, and hopefully it lasts only long enough to allow for repentance and restoration (cf. 1Co 5:2–5; 2Co 2:5–11). The case at hand is unique; the departure of the opponents was not expulsion or excommunication but a voluntary departure. It shows that they were never truly members of the community.

20 The author now returns to the heretical claims of his opponents. They probably claimed superior knowledge because they had received an exclusive ritual anointing that gave them knowledge. Their attitude may have been similar to that of the later "Gnostic" sect known as Naassenes, who claimed a special sacrament of anointing. John combats his opponents' claim by reminding his readers: "But you have an anointing from the Holy One, and all of you know [because all of you received it] the truth." This is probably an allusion to the coming of the Holy Spirit as prophesied by Jesus in John's gospel: "But when he, the Spirit of truth, comes, he will guide you into all truth" (Jn 16:13; cf. also 14:17; 15:26). The early Christians connected this with their baptism. Although "anointing" is used only infrequently in the NT, both Luke and Paul do use it with reference to the Holy Spirit (Lk 4:18; Ac 10:38; 2Co 1:21–22).

The messengers of God proclaimed the Gospel, but God himself by his Spirit taught the heart, from which true knowledge was then manifested. When this divine teaching was truly recognized, Christians were genuinely protected against false teaching or unbelief (cf. 1Th 4:9; Ro 15:14).

21 Lest there be any doubt among the faithful as to John's perception of their understanding and orthodoxy, he says that he has not written because they did not know the truth—he himself is not providing any new information or teaching—but because they know it so certainly. They know the character of truth, and therefore they know that "no lie comes from truth." John aims his remarks precisely at the innate knowledge of the Gospel that he knows his followers possess. Lies cannot come from God. The antichrists and their followers, the false teachers, are liars. So they do not come—in fact,they cannot come—from God, who is the truth.

22 "Who is the liar?" v.22 asks and then rhetorically answers by pointing to those antichrists who promulgate the particularly pernicious falsehood that Jesus is not the Christ. This falsehood should not be linked to the Jewish opponents who denied that Jesus was the Messiah but rather to the Gnostic opponents who denied that Christ came in the flesh (see also 4:2–3; 2 Jn 7).

The exact kind of Gnostic denial in view is uncertain. It probably included the ideas that the true Christ, who was preexistent, merely appeared in human form to bring eternal life, that his human existence was without real significance, and that his human presence was not essential to his true being. The revelations he brought came not through any of his actions as Jesus of Nazareth or through any events connected to his life—especially not through his sufferings or his death on the cross. To the opponents, eternal life came in Jesus' divine glory as the preexistent and eternal Christ.

Obviously such a denial of Jesus' humanity struck at the very heart of the Incarnation. By denying Jesus' true sonship, these opponents of John denied the Father as well. Because they denied Jesus' human life, they rejected the community of love he established. Most likely the false teachers mocked the commands of Jesus as taught by the apostles. Little wonder that John designates them "antichrists." They rejected Jesus. They rejected their own sinfulness and need of forgiveness (1:8–10), the life of love (2:4, 6, 8), and their "fellowship" with the Father and the Son (1:1–4, 6–7).

23 The statement "No one who denies the Son has the Father; whoever acknowledges the Son has the Father also" makes clear the singular dependence of the Christian faith on the reality of God available through the Son. Those who claim they have a Father but exclude the Son have neither the Father nor the Son. Consequently, when Jesus is acknowledged as the Son and as the eternal Christ, the Father has also truly been lifted up, known and honored, confessed and possessed. John is not talking here about having a creed but about possessing a person by accepting or acknowledging our relationship to him. So also we deny God by denying him his proper relationship with us.

24 At this point John shifts his attention to his readers. They, in contrast to the antichrists, are exhorted to make certain that what they heard "from the beginning"—i.e., the true apostolic declaration concerning Jesus as Son and Christ—"remains" (GK 3531) in them. If it does, they may be assured that they will also "remain" in the Son and in the Father. The use of "remain" gives weight to the warning. The word of the Gospel must not only be heard but be given a vital place in one's life. The message must continue to be active in the lives of all who have heard it. They must reflect on it and let it affect their lives.

While John's exhortation here is clearly to faithfulness to the Word, it is also an exhortation with an assured promise of fulfillment. Where the Word abides, there also the Son and Father abide in intimate fellowship. The Word is not the goal of the fellowship but rather a means to the goal of fellowship. The listing of the Son before the Father may emphasize the fact that access to the Father becomes possible only through the Son (Jn 10:10; 17:2; 20:31).

25 What is promised in the Gospel is the everlasting knowledge of Father and Son (Jn 17:3). It is a promise the community has already received. Eternal life has begun, but its eschatological fulfillment is also promised. What dimension this fellowship with the Son and the Father will assume in the "life to come" is yet unknown (3:2). But the hope is certain. All that is now known about it is only a foretaste of the glory that will be revealed.

26–27 The author concludes his attack on the false teachers with a warning and a word of encouragement for his followers. He has identified the heretical beliefs of those who have deserted the community of believers (v.22). He has properly labeled his opponents antichrists (v.18) and has described them as "those trying to lead you astray" (cf. 4:6; 2Jn 7). This description is more significant because it reveals the actual intent of those who have deserted the community. Not only have they forsaken the true faith, but they intend to lead many of the faithful astray. Their aim is to assume leadership over the community. They are enemies who are not content to spread new teaching but "invaders" and "deceivers" who seek to win the whole community over to their position.

Against their threat, John once more expresses his supreme confidence in the power of the divine anointing. The Son's gift of the Spirit, who accompanied the apostolic word "from the beginning," abides in them (cf. Jn 14:16). If they abide in the teaching and in the anointing, they need neither new teaching nor new teachers. Since they have received their "teaching" from the Son through those who were his witnesses from the beginning and have his "anointing," they have in fact no need for anyone more to teach them, not even John himself. Does he think of this letter as further "teaching"? Probably not. He is simply reminding them to keep to the teaching they received from the beginning. Any teaching in the church should only be what was received from the beginning (cf. Gal 1:6; 1Ti 6:3; 2Ti 1:13; 4:3–5; Tit 1:9; 2Pe 3:2).

The last part of v.27 summarizes the threefold reason to trust the anointing already received from Jesus (2:20). (1) His anointing teaches all things necessary for them to know concerning the Word of Life. He does not advance the idea, perhaps favored by some of his opponents, that the Spirit will add new revelation to what has already been given. (2) This anointing is "real, not counterfeit" (cf. Jn 15:26; 16:3)—a reference to the gnosticizing opponents who claim as the source of their teaching a special anointing not commonly received by the company of believers. But the test of the anointing is its fidelity to that which is from the beginning. Since the opponents' teaching fails precisely at this point, their anointing is exposed as false. (3) The community has in its history experienced the teaching from the anointing—i.e., they have known the confirming work of the Spirit in their lives. The Gospel has taken root in them and has brought forth its fruit (cf. 2:12–14). Therefore, John concludes with his most important word to them: "Remain [abide] in him [Christ]."

28 This verse makes the transition from concern about false teachers to concern for the children of God. It joins the admonition developed in the previous paragraph to the "confidence" (GK 4244) and unashamedness that should belong to God's children when Christ appears. "Confidence" is one of John's favorite words to describe the freedom and boldness that belong to the Christian before God in prayer (3:21; 5:14; cf. Heb 4:16; 10:19) and at Christ's coming.

"Coming" (parousia; GK 4242; see comment on 1Th 2:19) occurs only here in 1 John and not at all in John's gospel. Combined with "when he appears," this is a technical term referring to Jesus' second coming in visible splendor, a teaching that the author held in common with other early Christians. Historically this word was used to describe the festivities attendant on a monarch's arriving for a state visit. The early Christians anticipated the Lord's return as being no less joyous and majestic.

III. Requirements for Fellowship With God Who Is Righteous (2:29–4:6)

The dominant theme of this second main division of the letter is to provide assurance that even as the believers "continue in Jesus," they can know they are the children of God. The "tests" for knowing this are: (1) doing what is right (2:29–3:10), (2) loving one another (3:11–24), and (3) testing the spirits (4:1–6). Obedience will guarantee confidence before Jesus at his coming (2:28) and before God in prayer (3:21).

A. Doing What Is Right (2:29–3:10)

John begins this section with a promise of future likeness to Jesus (2:29–3:3) and follows it by a warning that a life of sin is not compatible with a life of fellowship with God but evidences the presence of the devil. Christ came to destroy the devil's work, prominent in which is hatred of one's fellow believer.

29 There is a clear break in thought and a new topic—"tests for knowing the children of God"—introduced here. Attention naturally focuses on the Father (3:1) and the significance of being "born of him." Since John never speaks of being "born of Jesus," it makes more sense to conclude that the subject from the beginning of v.29 is the Father and that John depends on his readers to get the meaning from the total context.

Neither God's righteousness nor that of the Son is disputed between John and his opponents (cf. 1:5; 2:1, 20; 3:7) but rather the significance of this righteousness. For John, to be born of God and to become his child means to accept as the standard for Christian conduct the Father's righteousness as revealed through the Son (2:6; 3:7; cf. Mt 5:48). Therefore, one must keep Jesus' commands, especially the command to love, which also becomes the test for distinguishing who are truly born of God. Those who do his righteous will should know that they have been born of him. Righteous conduct is not a condition for rebirth but a consequence of it.

On the other hand, John's opponents, who presumably also claimed rebirth, apparently thought of it not in ethical or moral terms but in terms of nature. They may have said that because they possessed the divine nature they could not sin (1:8) and were consequently removed from any obligation to the commandments (2:3–4). For them the proof that they were born of God lay in their new teaching, which freed them from commandments; in their knowledge, which enabled them to reject Christ's coming in the flesh; and in their exclusivism, which allowed them to hate their brothers (3:17–20), forsake the community (2:19), and deny the commandment to love (3:10).

From the tone of the letter, we conclude that the denial of the necessity to keep the commandments had not yet led to flagrant immoral conduct among the dissidents but that the implications of their theological method were seen by John as allowing—if not encouraging—that possibility.

3:1 The phrase "born of him [God]" (2:29) leads the author to marvel at the wonder of God's redemptive activity. See how great the gift of his love really is! Why, he has identified us as being his very own children! And this is exactly what we have become through his acts. Clearly the author means to encourage his readers by reminding them of the lavishness of God's grace and love—qualities that are missing from his opponents' lives. They fail to recognize God's love and feel no obligation to express it. But apart from love, there would have been no children of God.

Because believers are children of God, John warns them that the world is unable to recognize them or relate to them. That should not surprise them because neither did the world recognize God. The failure of the world to know God is one of the basic themes of the gospel of John (5:37; 7:28; 16:3). Those who belong to the world live in darkness. They cannot come to the light but must inevitably hate it.

The author wants his readers to know that approval by the world is to be feared, not desired. To be hated by the world may be unpleasant, but ultimately it should reassure the members of the community of faith that they are loved by God, which is far more important than the world's hatred.

2 Though they are now God's children, the unveiling of their identity or the complete revelation of their nature still lies in the future (probably only at the last time). John does not encourage speculation in these matters. His concern is to reiterate the "tradition" from which the promise comes. He (Jesus) will appear. We will see him as he truly is; his full glory will be revealed (cf. Jn 17:1, 5, 24). And we will become like him. That the author is once more presenting the teaching shared in the church "from the beginning" seems clear from its similarity to Paul's teaching in Ro 8:29; 1Co 15:49; 2Co 3:18; Col 3:4.

3 All who have their hope in Jesus—i.e., their hope of being like him (3:2) when he appears (2:28)—will also be committed to keeping themselves from sin. They will put away every defilement; they will aim to be like him in purity and righteousness. Once more we have the pattern of the incarnate Jesus being held up as an example to believers (cf. 2:6; 3:7, 16; 4:17). Those who claim likeness to him must be conformed to his earthly life, even as they wait for his coming. To live in sin or disobedience to his commands is to abandon any hope in him. It is the pure in heart who will see God (cf. Mt 5:8).

4 Here John uses two words to describe sin: "sin" (GK 281) and "lawlessness" (GK 490). In both OT and NT, these two words are used frequently as synonyms (cf. Pss 32:1; 51:3; Ro 4:7; Heb 10:17). In John's community, however, they were used apparently with different meanings. The former word was used to describe transgression of the law, the breaking of God's commandments. The latter defined sin as rebellion against God and was connected with Satan's rebellion against God (cf. Mt 7:22; 24:11–13; 2Co 6:14–16; 2Th 2:1–12). Apparently the false teachers and John agreed that "lawlessness" was incompatible with being born of God. What they did not agree on was that sin, defined as transgression of the moral law, was "lawlessness." Indeed, as those "born of God" they claimed themselves "morally" to be without sin or guilt. Either they believed that they were by nature incapable of violating the law or that sinful deeds done in the flesh were of no concern to God.

John decries such thinking. That his opponents hate their brothers (2:11) shows that their claim to sinlessness is a lie, and their failure to love stems from their lawlessness. Lawlessness, in turn, shows that they do not belong to God but to the devil (3:10). They are part of the evil soon to be revealed (2:18).

5 In this verse John turns again to the teaching received "from the beginning" and raises two additional arguments against sin as a principle of life. (1) Not only is sin lawlessness (v.4), but Jesus appeared in history in order to remove it (cf. Jn 1:29; Heb 9:26). (2) Jesus himself lived a sinless life (cf. 2:1;

3:3; 2Co 5:21). In this latter statement the author probably is looking in two directions. Because Jesus was sinless, the devil had no hold on him (cf. John 14:30), so that Jesus was able to destroy the works of the devil (3:8). In addition, Jesus' sinlessness reveals the kind of lifestyle required for those who abide in him. John uses the present tense to emphasize that sinlessness is characteristic of Jesus' eternal nature. He was sinless in his preexistence, in his life in the flesh, and in his eternal position as Son.

6 This verse seems to contradict 1:8, 10. However, as we have reconstructed the situation (see comment on 3:4), the author simultaneously faced two different problems with these precursors of Gnosticism. There were those who apparently claimed to be sinless by nature; i.e., they were unable to sin because they were "born of God." There were others who claimed a standing with God apart from a life of righteousness. They believed that the commandments had no authority over them and taught that it was a matter of indifference to God whether they sinned or not. Therefore they could hate their brothers without guilt or concern.

In opposition to the latter opponents, the author states that those who "live" in the "sinless one" will, like him, live a life of righteousness. They commit themselves not to sin. And if they sin, they will confess it as lawlessness and abandon it.

John acknowledges that the life of righteousness is possible only in Christ. By "living" in him, in his "sinlessness," one can expect conformity to his righteousness. On the other hand, those who continue to sin make it certain that they have never had their eyes opened spiritually to see him, nor have they ever known him (cf. Jn 5:37–38; 8:19; 14:7, 9; 3Jn 11).

7 The warning "do not let anyone lead you astray" appears to have been directed against the false teachers in the community. The author, by using the address "dear children" (see comment on 2:1), places his own position in the community on the line.

8 There is clearly a progression in the author's thought on sin in this section. He begins with the "sinfulness" of sin—i.e., "it is lawlessness," or rebellion against God (v.4). Next he shows its incompatibility with Christ (v.5) and its incompatibility for anyone who lives in Christ (v.6). Now he shows the diabolic nature of sin—its source is the devil, who "has been sinning from the beginning" (v.8). That the Son of God appeared "to destroy the devil's work" is an elaboration of what John said in v.5.

John sees the enmity of God against the devil as absolute. It lies at the heart of God's commitment to rescue the human race from the devil's clutches. God will destroy the devil and all his works, including those children of the devil who accept sinning as a way of life. The statement "the devil has been sinning from the beginning" probably refers to the Genesis account of the Fall and includes an identification of the devil with the serpent. He was, from the beginning, evil (cf. Jn 8:44). Therefore, the very being of those like the false teachers derives from the devil. His desires become their desires. Like him they become liars and seducers. Those who continue in sin become children of the devil (v.10).

9 John summarizes what he has said. In v.6 he stated that no one who "lives in him" can practice a life of sin. Here he adds that "no one who is born of God" or has "God's seed" in him can "continue to sin." Both elements are necessary for understanding John's theology of community. Believers must "live" in him. The Father in turn must live in the believers (3:24; 4:12; cf. Jn 14:20; 17:21–23). If we do live in him, "we are removed" from life under the dominion of Satan. And if he lives in us, then our life will be his life in us and we will live even as he lived.

10 This verse reveals the heart of the entire section and furnishes a transition to the next one. John is not concerned with a theoretical consideration of the nature of sinfulness or the possibility of sinlessness but the issue of the community. How are the children (community) of God to be recognized and how are the children (community) of the devil to be discerned?

"Anyone who does not do what is right is not a child of God." And what is the "right" he does not do? He "does not love his brother." "Love for one's brother" is the true test of righteous behavior. This requirement of love helps explain the absolute requirement that those who are born of God "cannot go on sinning" (vv.6, 9). For if God is love, and if he lives in us and we in him, then love for fellow believers will occur as an expression of righteousness without exception.

The author, then, is not stressing absolute moral conformity or "sinless perfection" but the one requirement by which all other requirements are measured—love for one's fellow Christian. For this there is no substitute, its violation allows for no excuse, its application permits no compromise. Here there are no gray areas, no third possibilities. We either love our fellow believers and prove we are God's children, or we do not love them and prove we belong to the devil.

B. Loving One Another (3:11–24)

As the knowledge of God is tested by conduct (1:5–2:11), so being "born of God" (2:29) is tested by righteous action and love of fellow believers. The command to love fellow believers was first introduced in 2:9–11 as a test of whether one was walking in light, i.e., had true knowledge. Here it is the sum of the new life in God. In the former instance it was leveled as a charge against the heretics. Here it is addressed to the community of faith for encouragement and admonition. Most likely the disregard for love by the heretics had caused a lessening of an emphasis on love within the Christian community. The author presents the case for love first by the negative example of Cain (vv.12–15), contrasted with the positive example of Jesus (v.16).

11 The admonition that "we should love one another" is highlighted by the return to the critical formula, "This is the message you heard from the beginning," an almost identical reminiscence of 1:1, 5 (see comments). The command to "love one another" has its origin in the nature of God. The entire goal and aim of the Gospel is to create and strengthen love.

12 The mention of Cain points back to 3:8 and reminds us that hatred is also from the beginning. The choice between the children of God and the children of the devil, between hatred and love or life and death, stems from the earliest moment of human existence. It also points to Jn 8:37–47, where some Jewish opponents of Jesus had exhibited the same kind of hatred toward Jesus that Cain expressed toward Abel (Jn 8:59). There Jesus labels his enemies as people who "belong to your father, the devil . . . [who was] a murderer from the beginning" (Jn 8:42).

The sequence of thought in this section is significant. It is not that Cain by murdering his brother became the child of the devil; but, being a child of the devil, his actions were evil and culminated in the murder of his brother. The reason why he "murdered" (lit., "butchered"; GK 5377) him was that his brother's acts were righteous. Righteousness draws hatred from the devil and hatred from the children of the devil. Darkness cannot tolerate light; immorality, morality; hatred, love; or greed, sacrifice. This is the only direct reference to the OT in this letter.

13 The hatred of the "world" (GK 3180) for the community of faith must not surprise the believers. The author does not say that the world always hates believers; it did not always hate Jesus. But whenever the community of faith acts so as to expose the greed, avarice, hatred, and wickedness of the world, it must expect rejection; and if it should go so far as to interfere with its evil practices, as Jesus did in the temple, it may expect suffering and brutal death (cf. Jn 15:18–19, 25; 17:14).

"Brothers" (GK 81) occurs only here in 1 John as an address. At this most critical point, the author steps past his relationship to them as "little children" (see comment on 2:1) and openly proclaims them his peers. Perhaps they have already experienced persecution with him. Or perhaps he knows that if they receive his letter and obey it, persecution will soon come because they have identified themselves with him rather than with his opponents.

14 John looks back to v.10 and answers the question: How do we know those who have been "born of God"? or, Who are the children of God? "We know that we have passed from death to life, because we love our brothers" (cf. Jn 5:24). This conviction is not based on self-judgment or self-justification but on the certainty that love is the basis for life in the believing community. This is a self-test by which each person can examine himself or herself. Love will not, of course, cause one's passage to spiritual life but will give evidence of it. Conversely, to be unable to love means that a person is without spiritual life and remains in death.

15 Here John links hatred with murder (cf. Mt 5:21–22). In the heart there is no difference; to hate is to despise, and murder is the fulfillment of that attitude. Cain, by murdering his brother, was cut off from the covenant community. So no murderer is within the community, nor anyone who "hates his brother." Such a person has no life of God and no fellowship with the faithful.

16 The test of true love is identified as willingness to sacrifice one's life for one's brother. The demonstrative "this" that begins the statement points backward to the negative example of Cain and forward to the positive example of Christ. Love is used absolutely and its reference point is Christ's death. The demand for love thus arises from his command, and the meaning of love is found in his example.

"We know" suggests that the knowledge that is involved belongs to events of Jesus Christ, which they heard from the beginning (cf. 1:1; 3:11). "Love" (agape; GK 27) cannot be derived from some intuitive grasp of an idea but is known in the historical event in which Jesus Christ laid down his life for us (cf. Jn 10:11). His sacrificial death thus distinguishes agape love from all other loves by its costliness, its unconditional acceptance of another, and its accomplishment.

The personal commitment of Christ is expressed in the words of Jn 15:12–13 (cf. 13:1): "Love each other as I have loved you. Greater love has no one than this, that one lay down his life for his friends." Its accomplishment as a "for us" kind of love is reflected in Jesus' work. It is clear that Jesus understood his death as an effectual, accomplishing act for giving us eternal life (Jn 10:28); it was the only method open to him to fulfill his Father's will (cf. Jn 10:11–18, 27–30; 15:9–18; 17:19). Since agape love is grounded in Jesus' death for us, knowledge of it can be received only where his "death" is appropriated into our experience.

The dramatic conclusion we are irresistibly led to is this: "And we ought to lay down our lives for our brothers." We are to do this not simply because that is what Jesus did, but because that is what Jesus revealed to be the demand of agape love. Love is denial of self for another's gain.

17 Again John's penchant for providing practical "tests" of the validity of one's faith comes to the fore. How can we know whether we would sacrifice our life for a fellow believer? We can know by being compassionate toward such a one in his or her present need. If we are unable or unwilling to sacrifice material advantage for the sake of our fellow believers, we know that the love of God is not in us. What are the conditions for our involvement? If we are in a position to see with our own eyes someone's need (as, for example, the good Samaritan did) and can offer help, then we cannot do otherwise than act. To withhold help in such a situation is to shut off compassionate action and to deny the presence of God's love in our own heart.

18 Turning back to "little children" (see comment on v.13), John admonishes with the tone of a spiritual father pleading for the heartfelt response of his children. Love requires more than idle talk or exalted theology. It demands simple acts, which anyone can see, in order to meet the needs of brothers and sisters in distress. Any expression of love that fails here is not only empty but blasphemous (cf. Jas 2:15; 1Co 13:1).

19–20 John began this section (2:29–4:6) by addressing the question, How may we be confident and unashamed at Christ's coming? (cf. 2:28). The answer, expressed in the phrases "continue in Jesus" and "doing what is right" (2:29; 3:7, 10), is tested by our love for our fellow believers. Now the author addresses the question of assurance—i.e., confidence before God. How may "we know that we belong to the truth" (3:19) and how do we deal with our own condemning hearts (3:20–21)? The anxious note in the first part of the question should probably be attributed at least in part to the unrelenting attack of opponents on the "teaching" and "beliefs" of the Christian community. The whole section, however, may also simply be explaining the nature of "fellowship" with the Father (1:3).

This passage allows several translations and interpretations. (1) "This" (v.19) may be taken to point backward to the absolute demand of love introduced in 3:14ff. If we know that we love truly, with actions and not mere words, that knowledge will not only assure us "that we belong to the truth" but will also act to "set our hearts at rest in his presence whenever our hearts condemn us." (2) It is also possible to put a period after "presence" and to read v.20 as follows: "If our hearts should condemn us, God is greater than our hearts, and he knows everything." (3) The best option is to see the "this" in v.19 as pointing both backward and forward. In other words, there are two ways we know that we "belong to the truth": (a) because we love in deed (vv.14ff.), and (b) because God himself assures us that we belong to the truth—he "is greater than our hearts, and he knows everything" (v.20b).

What is stressed is agape love, which is always expressed first in deeds and is reassuring evidence that we are of God. Why our hearts should condemn us is not discussed by the author. Apparently it is not important. His readers, like all others, know how easily the conscience can render us ineffective. Doubt, guilt, and failure are never far from any of us. Sometimes our misgivings are the result of our own actions or inactions. Sometimes it is the "accuser" who seizes our weaknesses and shortcomings and so elevates them that we wonder whether we can really be in the truth. What then can we do? We can remember that God understands everything. His word and his truth are greater than our feelings or our conscience. We may rest ourselves in his love for us and live in that love and by that love. We will not excuse ourselves of any sin, but neither will we needlessly accuse ourselves (cf. 1Co 4:3–5).

21 Christians are called to fellowship with God (1:3; 2:24). But if they are guilt-ridden and conscience-stricken, rather than seeking that fellowship or enjoying it, they will flee the presence of God and will not dare seek answers to prayer that he alone can provide. On the other hand, those who have his peace in their hearts will have "confidence" (GK 4244) not only at his appearing but in the ordinary here-and-now relationship to the Father.

22 The fruit of this boldness is God's own openness to his children. He never withholds any good thing from those who ask. The author does not give the basis for his assurance, but his words "because we obey his commands and do what pleases him" point directly to Jesus' own words in Jn 8:28–29. As one who always did his Father's will, Jesus knew that his Father heard him (Jn 11:42). Jesus also gave similar assurances to his disciples (Jn 16:26–27).

23 This verse specifies what command it is that the children must obey in order to receive whatever they ask of him (v.22). It is "to believe [GK 4409] in the name of his Son, Jesus Christ, and to love one another." The idea of believing, which occurs here for the first time in this letter, will be seen more and more as the issue between John and the "false teachers." They do not love—that is clear—but the reason for that is that God's love is not in them, since they have not truly believed in Jesus Christ, the Son of God. To believe in Jesus Christ means in this context to believe the Gospel about Jesus—that he is God's Son, that he came to save men and women from their sins, and that by believing in him they can have eternal life (Jn 3:16–18). Joining belief and love in a single command shows how inextricably connected the two are in John's mind. Belief comes first because it is the basis for love (cf. Jn 3:16), but love is the only expression of true faith.

The end of this command—"to love one another as he commanded us"—recalls Jesus' own command in Jn 13:34; 15:12, 17. John's practice of not distinguishing the subjects of verbs such as "he commanded" is characteristic both of his writing and of his theology. God the Father is revealed in Christ Jesus. To see the Son is to see the Father; to know the Father is to know the Son. The deeds of the one are the deeds of the other. So completely are their wills joined that it is many times a matter of indifference as to which one is in view.

24 In this summary verse the author states for the first time the mutual reciprocity involved in "living" in God. Obedience issues in the perfection of the "fellowship" between God and us. We "live" in him; he "lives" in us. We come to our "fellowship" with the Father through the "fellowship" the Son has with the Father (Jn 14:20; 17:21–23). The Son also enters into fellowship with us (Jn 15:4–5); and through him we have fellowship with the Father and with one another, just as the sign of our fellowship with the Father and with the Son is our love for them (cf. Jn 17:23–26).

The latter part of v.24 characteristically furnishes a transition to the next section. The evidence that we abide in him is our obedience to his commands. The evidence that he abides in us is the presence of his Spirit, whom he gave to us (cf. Ro 5:5; 8:14–16).

This is the first mention of the Spirit in 1 John. The author presupposes knowledge about the Spirit in his readers and applies it to the problem at hand—distinguishing the true Spirit from false spirits (4:1–3) and receiving the Spirit's witness (5:6–7). Referring to the Spirit as the one "he gave us" is not an appeal to their existential experience of the Spirit but to their knowledge of the Gospel as it had come to them from the eyewitnesses. The Father's giving or the Son's sending the Spirit to the disciples (Jn 14–16; 20:22) was a well-known event in the church (cf. Ac 1–2; Ro 8; Gal 4:6).

C. Warning Against the False Spirits (4:1–6)

This passage parallels 2:18–27, where the author warned against the presence of antichrists among those who had "gone out" from them. Now he has a second warning, this time against the "spirit" of antichrist, who even now inspires the false prophets (v.1). The false spirit can be detected because he will deny that Jesus Christ came in the flesh (v.3). The community of faith will overcome the false prophets because believers belong to God, and the Spirit in them is greater than the false spirit (v.4). The world listens to the false prophets (v.5) but the children of God listen to the apostolic declaration. Belief of the Gospel is the true test of the Holy Spirit's presence and work (v.6).

1 The opponents not only lay claim to God but boast of their inspiration by the "spirit" (GK 4460). Likely they gave evidence of their inspiration through "prophetic utterings" and perhaps even other signs, such as ecstasies and glossolalia. Such "signs" were present in the religious milieu of the Greeks and Romans and most persons took them seriously. That they sometimes caused special problems in the early church is attested by Paul (cf. 1Co 12:3; 14; 1Th 5:21). John's warning here is not against those who pretend to have the Spirit's presence but against genuine evil spirits' inspiring of false prophets. Outwardly these people were no less inspired than members of the faithful community. They were zealous in proclamation (cf. 2Jn 7) and may have been even more successful than the faithful community in making converts from the world (4:5). Likely John saw in them the fulfillment of Jesus' warnings (cf. Mk 13:22) against false prophets in the "end times" (cf. 2:18). His readers needed some test to discern the presence of false prophets.

2 The test itself appears to hinge on the words "that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh." The false prophets may well have believed that Christ was the Savior of the world, but they denied the connection between the divine Christ and Jesus of Nazareth. At least they clearly denied that "the Christ" ever had come "in the flesh." The clause "that Jesus Christ has come" reflects the author's clear view of the preexistence of the Son, who came from the Father and from the moment of his historical birth was Jesus Christ in the flesh.

How does this confession give evidence of the Spirit? For John, as for Paul, the truth of the Christian Gospel is hidden from the world (cf. 1Co 2:7–16). Only because there is a divine intervention and the darkness is removed can the light of the Gospel be recognized (cf. 4:6).

3 Here a negative confession gives the counterpart of that in v.2, and the source of this denial is seen as "the spirit of the antichrist." John reminds his followers that Jesus had warned that the Antichrist would come. It is now John's painful duty to announce that in the false teachers (cf. 2:18ff.) the spirit of antichrist is already present. By this the community was warned that the conflict between the false teachers and John was not a "leadership" or "personality" one. The Gospel itself was at stake. The struggle they were facing was not against flesh and blood but against principalities and powers (Eph 6:12). Hence, whatever success the opponents had had within the community resulted from satanic inspiration.

4 Once again the author addresses the community with "dear children" (see comment on 2:1). They have overcome the false prophets, because they resisted their teaching (v.5). Thus they are "from God"—i.e., "born of him" (2:29)—and the one who is in them is "greater than the one who is in the world" (v.4). The false teachers do not have the Spirit of Christ living in them because "living" involves "fellowship," which is possible between God and his children only by the Holy Spirit. The false teachers are without this

Biblical Evidence for the Trinity

According to the Bible, there is only one God (Dt 6:4; Isa 45:21; 1Ti 2:5; Jas 2:19). But this one God has revealed himself in three person: the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. The word used to express this doctrine is "Trinity"—"tri-unity," "three-in-oneness." While this word is not used in the Bible, it adequately expresses biblical teaching. There is little difficulty acknowledging the Father as God. Regarding the deity of Jesus the Son, see the chart on "Passages Indicating the Deity of Christ" on p. 000. As to the Holy Spirit being specifically called God, see Lk 1:32, 35 and Act 5:3–4.

Hints in the OT of the Trinity
God speaks of himself as "us" rather than "me"	Ge 1:26–27; 3:22; 11:7; Isa 6:8
God promises to send someone who is God	Isa 7:14; 9:6
The "angel of the LORD" speaks as if he is the Lord	Ge 16:10; 22:15–17; Ex 3:6; 23:20–23; Jdg 6:14

The Trinity in the NT
Father, Son, and Holy Spirit have one name	Mt 28:19
Father, Son, and Holy Spirit were present at Jesus' baptism	Mt 3:16–17; Lk 3:21–22
The Spirit is sent by the Father through the Son	Jn 15:26
The Spirit testifies that we are God's children and co-heirs with Christ	Ro 8:16–17; Gal 4:4–6
One Spirit, one Lord Jesus, and one God	1Co 12:4–6
A blessing from Father, Son, and Holy Spirit	2Co 13:14
Chosen by the Father, sprinkled with Jesus' blood, and sanctified by the Spirit	1Pe 1:2
The Spirit testifies that Jesus came from the Father	1Jn 4:2
Other places in the NT where Father, Son, and Holy Spirit appear together	Ro 5:5–6; 1Th 1:2–5; 2Th 2:13; Tit 3:4–6; Jude 20–21
Holiness is ascribed to Father, Son, and Holy Spirit	Jn 17:11; Ro 1:4; 1Co 1:30
Eternity is ascribed to Father, Son, and Holy Spirit	1Ti 1:17; Heb 1:2–3, 8; 9:14
Father, Son, and Holy Spirit each know everything	Mt 6:8, 32; Jn 2:24–25; 1Co 2:10–11
Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are each all-powerful	Ps 135:5–7; Mt 28:18; Ro 15:13, 17; 1Co 15:24–27
Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are each everywhere present	Ps 139:7–10; Jer 23:24; Mt 28:20
Father, Son, and Holy Spirit all involved in creation	Ge 1:1–2; Ps 104:30; Jn 1:3
Father, Son, and Holy Spirit all involved in giving spiritual life	Eze 37:14; Jn 10:10; Eph 2:4–5
Father, Son, and Holy Spirit all involved in miracles	1Ki 18:38; Mt 4:23–24; Ro 15:19
Father, Son, and Holy Spirit all involved in teaching	Ps 71:17; Isa 48:17; Jn 13:13; 14:26
Father, Son, and Holy Spirit all experience grief because of sin	Ge 6:6; Lk 19:41–44; Eph 4:30 fellowship. Therefore they do not love because they do not know love. The antichrist can be "in the world" and evil spirits can be "in the false teachers," but "living in God" is possible only for the children of God.

5 In contrast to the "dear children" who "are from God" are the false teachers who "are from the world." The false teachers are successful "in the world" because their thinking is accommodated to the world's beliefs. Naturally the world hears such teachers gladly. The term "world" (GK 3180) is probably to be understood in two ways: as a system of thought antithetical to Christian belief and as a description of those members of the community who were led astray by the false teachers. That some members of the community were easily persuaded to forsake the truth of the Gospel should not bewilder the faithful. Although these members appeared to belong to the community, their willingness to hear and follow the false teachers showed their true colors.

6 The author repeats the description of the true followers as "we [who] are from God." The "we" includes all the faithful but has particular reference to the true teachers. Whoever has knowledge of God through fellowship with him by loving him and abiding in him and his Word "listens to us" (cf. Jn 8:47; 10:4–5; 18:37), for the teachers proclaim the word heard "from the beginning" (cf. 1Jn 1:1). Thus a second test for discerning the presence of the Spirit of God has been added to the one developed in v.2. When people confess that Jesus came in the flesh, then the "Spirit of truth" has been present and active. When people deny the Gospel and will not confess that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh, then "the spirit of falsehood" has been at work.

IV. Requirements for Fellowship With God Who Is Love (4:7–5:12)

The third main division of the letter has as its major thesis an analysis of love. Love of one's brother was first introduced as a test of living in God who is light (2:9–11). The command to love received an even more significant treatment as a test of being born of God (3:10–24). Here love of fellow believers finds its most complete representation in the Father's own being and activity.

A. Brotherly Love (4:7–12)

7 The address "dear friends" (lit., "beloved"; cf. 2:7; 4:1) and the imperative force of the verb make clear that the author is speaking primarily to the community itself. His intention is to provide final assurance that the community's commitment to mutual love is the explicit requirement of the Gospel as revealed in God himself. Love for one's brother "comes from God." It is evidence of our being "born of God" that is as important as righteous behavior is (2:29). It is not a virtue innate in us nor is it learned behavior. It is "from God." He is the originator—the giver of love. Furthermore, whoever truly loves "his brother" not only is born of God (2:28; 3:24) but also "knows God."

8 Conversely, whoever does not love does not "know" God at all, for God in his very nature is love. To the statements, then, that God is light (1:5) and God is righteous (2:29), John adds the supreme statement "God is love [GK 27]" (4:8, 16). Love here is not to be understood as one of God's many activities; rather, every activity of his is loving activity. Since this is true of God, our failure to love can only mean that we have no true knowledge of God, we have not really been born of him, and we do not have his nature.

9 The simple but profound statement "God is love" is explained by what God did. "He sent his one and only Son into the world" (cf. Jn 3:16–17). The author makes clear that the love he speaks of involves concrete actions. God's love required him to send his Son. God's love in us requires deeds by which we show our love for one another. The purpose of God's act is "that we might live through him." Death is our present condition (cf. 3:14); God intended that we might find life in him so that we might live in love as he works in and through us.

10 The author now distinguishes agape love from any love claimed by the false teachers. It is not that "we loved God" (3:17; 4:20), as his opponents claimed, but that "he loved us." Agape love can be given to God only when it has first been received from God. It exists only as response to his initial love for us. Moreover, God's love for us defines what true love requires—the commitment to sacrifice one's most beloved possession for another's gain. So for God, love required that he send "his Son as an atoning sacrifice [see comment on 2:2] for our sins."

The difference in understanding between John and the false teachers is never greater than in their understanding of love. The false teachers claimed to love God but understood love not in Christian terms but in those of Greek philosophy. Love in the Hellenistic world became a mystical craving for union with the eternal. Two things derive from this understanding of love. First, love for God as expressed by the false teachers becomes primarily an exercise in self-gratification. Second, one can never attribute love to God and say, for example, that God loves us. God as the Absolute is always passionless and unmoved, according to them.

11 The author continues to show that the true nature of love is unselfish and sacrificial. In 3:16 he appealed to Jesus, who laid down his life for believers, as the example for them to follow. Now he directs attention to God's own example: "Since God so loved us, we also ought to love one another." The nature of John's argument is not deductive but analogical. Just as God's children must be holy because he is holy (cf. Lev 11:44–45; 1Pe 1;15ff.) and merciful because he is merciful (Lk 6:36), so they must love because he loves. We must be like him.

12 Here most commentators see a reference to the false teachers who may have claimed "visions" of God—visions through which their own knowledge was mediated to them. John's response is the blanket rejection: "No one has ever seen God." But the conclusion he moves toward is different from that expected from the gospel of John. Instead of saying, "God the only Son, who is at the Father's side, has made him known" (Jn 1:18), he turns rather to love: "If we love each other," we know that God is present with us. As God was once present in his Son, so now he is present through the community of faith. And it is in this community that love has its ultimate fulfillment. With this conclusion, we can begin to understand a little better John's urgent concern for the "fellowship" of the community of believers. It was not an optional "blessing" or "fruit" of belief that so deeply concerned him but the basic question of God's presence and manifestation in the world through a community that has a love originating in him.

B. Living in God and Living in Love (4:13–16)

In v.12 the author linked living in God to loving one another. In 3:24 he linked living with God to obeying his commands. There, as here, the primary evidence for this relationship with God is the Holy Spirit. And it is the Spirit who enables us to testify that "the Father has sent his Son to be the Savior of the world" (4:14; cf. 4:2). Whoever confesses this also knows that God is present in them and that they live "in God" (v.15). Those who know they live in God know also that they live in his love (v.16).

13 Reciprocal abiding (2:24; 4:13, 15—God in us, we in God) is the final expression of fellowship with God. It is possible only through the gift of his Spirit, by whom the relationship with the Father and with the Son is sealed eternally (cf. Eph 1:13–14). Reciprocal abiding makes possible God's love for us and our love for him. It is also the reason we can love one another.

14 To whom does the "we" refer in the statement "we have seen and testify"? It certainly refers to all those, especially the apostles, who had direct knowledge of Jesus' earthly life; but it probably ought not to be limited to them. It is the Spirit working in them and in us who permits us to "see" in the historic event of Jesus' death God's act for our salvation. Although "no one has ever seen God" (v.12) at any time, we do "see" (GK 2517) by faith that the cross of Christ was for our sins and for our salvation. We do "see" in Jesus our own Savior and Lord. We do "see" in the fellowship of faith the presence of his love. And because his Spirit in us gives us this "seeing" experience, we are commissioned to bear witness to the event (cf. Jn 15:26). Therefore, since there is such a close connection between seeing and testifying and the gift of the Holy Spirit, it is likely that the author meant his words to include his readers and to be applied to all Christians throughout history.

15 John goes on to state that "anyone" who "acknowledges" (lit., "confesses"; GK 3933) God's act in his Son is included in the divine fellowship in which the Father is in the believers and the believers in the Father. Initially John connected the fellowship with obedience to the command to love one another (3:24). Then he showed its dependence on the gift of the Spirit (4:13). Here he shows that the fellowship is built on Jesus, who must be acknowledged as being one with the Father (2:23), as the one who came in the flesh (4:2), and as the Son of God who was sent "to be the Savior of the world" (4:14–15).

16 The same combination of knowing and believing is found in Peter's confession of Jesus in Jn 6:69, except that there the order of "believe" and "know" is reversed. The fact is that faith may lead to knowledge and knowledge may lead to faith. Here knowledge of God's love necessarily precedes the ability to "rely" on that love. The sequence of thought is this: First, we must know and rely on the fact that God loves us. Second, we come to realize through relying on his love (or having faith in his Son—the meaning is the same) that in his very nature God is love. Third, we discover that to live in God means to live in love. The fellowship we have with the Father and with the Son (1:3) is perceived as nothing other than a fellowship of love.

C. Love Displaces Fear (4:17–18)

17 The perfection or completeness of love brings "confidence" (GK 4244), confidence relating especially to the time of judgment (cf. 2:28), though John probably believed that it was the mark of a believer in every relationship to God (cf. 3:21; 5:14). He may have introduced the judgment theme in the context of the commandment to love because Jesus himself made this command so specific and established love as the basis for judgment. Not to love, therefore, is to disobey Jesus and to spurn the Father's own love in sending Jesus. To live in love, however, is to live in God, and this results in complete confidence for prayer and judgment.

The meaning of "because in this world, we are like him" is uncertain. In view of the context, it is best to understand these words to mean that just as Jesus "abides" in the love of the Father (cf. Jn 15:10), an abiding that already marked his earthly existence and gave him "confidence" before God in the face of temptation, trial, and death, so "in this world" we also may abide in the Father's love and share in that same confidence.

18 The other side of confidence is "fear" (GK 5832). If we truly abide in the Father's love, we will be without fear. That "perfect love drives out fear" should be taken as a Christian truism as well as an allusion to the fear of God in judgment. Love and fear are incompatible. They cannot coexist. For the Christian love is first an experience of the Father's love for us. That "love" is so powerful and life changing that when we know it, we are forever removed from the "fear" of God.

The fear spoken of here is not to be confused with reverence for God. Reverence will only deepen through the experience of God's love. The experience of the holiness of God's love makes us desire to be even more obedient to his commands. But it also removes us from the power of fear. Whatever may take place in this world cannot nullify the power of his love or separate us from it. Similarly, if we experience fear in any portion of our lives, to that extent we deny God's love and fail to trust him.

D. Love Summarized (4:19–21)

19 In summarizing the command to love one's brother, John begins with his most important truth. Love must never be conceived of as a "natural" experience of the natural man. There is a "natural" love, but it must not be confused with divine love (agape; GK 27). The love John speaks of originates with the Father, became manifest in and through the Son, and now characterizes the life of the children of God. He thus begins this summary by saying, "We love." The love with which we love is not our own. It is always God's love or Jesus' love in us. But because we abide in the Father and in the Son, the love becomes also our own love. It is not that God reveals his love apart from us or in spite of us, but that he invites us to love even as he loves. So we return to him his own love and love him with the gift of his love. So also we love our fellow believers with the love God has loved us with.

20 The confidence we have in knowing that God loves us delivers us from fear but not from responsible action. In fact, God's love for us and in us sets us free to love our brother and sister even as God loves them. To fail this test of love proves that one's claim to love God is a lie—just as the previous claims to have fellowship with God while walking in darkness (1:6), to know him while disobeying his commands (2:4), or to possess the Father while denying his Son were lies (2:22–23). John has a double sense in "liar." A liar does not speak the truth in that what he claims is false, and his actions show that he has divorced himself from the reality of God.

The second part of the verse is problematic. It most likely means that if one fails the test of loving a visible brother, such a one makes it certain that he or she does not love the invisible God; this proves that such a person has no true love at all.

21 The final warrant of the life of love is obedience to the teaching of Christ. He gave the command that "whoever loves God must also love his brother" (cf. Mk 12:30–31; also Jn 13:34). John makes clear that obedience expresses itself in a single command. Love for God and love for neighbor are inseparable. The one is not possible apart from the other. Those who love God cannot refuse love to the image of God that meets them in their fellow believers. We are to love our neighbors in God, and God in our neighbors; this is what remaining in his love means.

E. Love for the Father and Faith in the Son (5:1–5)

The author now focuses on the relationship of the three fundamental elements so important to him in the knowledge of God: faith, love, and obedience. "To believe, have faith" (GK 4409), first introduced at 3:23, becomes the primary term in this section. In John, faith requires not only that something is held true, but that someone has entered into one's life. A commitment has been made and a relationship established that one can then only "confess" (cf. 3:23; 4:2, 4, 15).

1 The argument parallels 4:19. Even as we love only because God first loved us, so also our belief is possible only because we have first been "born of God." The author is not addressing the question of incorporation into the family of God but is rather looking only at its result. "Believing" in Jesus is a direct consequence of our "having been born" of God and therefore becomes a test or proof of that birth. From this the author moves to a truism from nature: whoever loves one's progenitor will also love those similarly born, even one's brothers and sisters.

2 This statement troubles commentators because it reverses what is expected. One anticipates a conclusion like this: "And this is how we know that we love God: by loving his children and obeying his commands." Instead the author concludes: "This is how we know that we love the children of God: by loving God and carrying out his commands." Even as one cannot love God without loving his children, so also it is impossible to truly love the children of God without loving God also. Those who claim to love their brothers and not God have not truly recognized their brothers as those born of God and have not offered them the true love that comes from the Father. The author cannot really talk of loving God, however, without also linking his words to obedience to his commands.

3 The connection between love for God and obedience is meant to protect us against thinking of love for God as "emotional feelings" about God. Agape love requires action. In respect to humankind, it means willingness to lay down one's life. In respect to God, it means a life of willing obedience, a filial relationship with God, and service on behalf of God. It requires laying down one's life as being one's own possession and taking up a new life in response to a Lord and Master.

John now qualifies what he has just said by adding, "And his commands are not burdensome." To the natural man the will of God is strange; the requirement for righteousness, foreign and hard. Even the law of love is a burden. But when God enters into us and we trust God's Son, then his yoke becomes gentle and the burden light (cf. Mt 11:30). We who have been born of God have within us a desire and a yearning for the Father. Seeking and hungering after righteousness becomes our joy (Mt 5:6). Living the life of love becomes our delight. The commands of God bring us the freedom and the liberty we so ardently long for.

4 "Everyone [lit., everything] born of God overcomes the world." Our being born of God is God's act on our behalf, through which he moves to overcome the world. What is in view is the supernatural act by which human beings are being translated out of the kingdom of death into the kingdom of life through the Son.

The victory that overcomes the world is now identified with "our faith." It is best to interpret this statement as referring to a past event; John is emphasizing that the victory he refers to has already been won. By faith we now have access to what was once accomplished by and through the appearance of Jesus on earth.

5 Observe the progression of thought in what John says about how victory over the world is gained. It begins with the new birth (v.4a). It moves on to the believer's experience and act of faith (v.4b). It culminates in the confession that "Jesus is the Son of God." Victory requires the whole process. It assures us that we too can love God and the children of God and that we too can obey his commands (v.3). Belief, love, and obedience are all the marks of the new birth. And the life lived in the new birth is not a burden but a life of celebration. This was the experience of the apostles and of the early church. Paul's cry that "in all these things we are more than conquerors" (Ro 8:37) echoed throughout the Roman world. Whereas at first the victories were thought of in terms of alien powers on the outside, Christian consciousness soon perceived that the victory included the internal enemies that confront the conscience, assail Christian beliefs and standards, corrupt the soul, and negate the life of love and obedience to God.

The confession with which the victory is linked is again the confession that "Jesus is the Son of God" (cf. 2:2–4:15). This is where the author began; it is also where he will end. Every single tenet of belief in God and of knowledge about him depends on obedient confession and commitment that Jesus is the eternal life that was with the Father (1:2). He is the Son of God. This confession has in view the false teachers who acknowledge Christ the Redeemer but deny his true humanity. Verse 5 makes the transition to the final exposition regarding the Son and provides the base on which the final section develops: the witness of the Father to the Son.

F. The Spirit, the Water, and the Blood (5:6–12)

6a Jesus, the Son of God (v.5) and the Christ (v.1), came not just by water, but "by water and blood." This enigmatic statement has given rise in the church to many interpretations. Augustine linked the reference to Jn 19:34, where the piercing of Jesus' side produced water and blood. Calvin and Luther connected it to Jn 4 and 6 and saw in it a reference to the sacraments. Most commentators today see the "water" as referring to Jesus' baptism and the "blood" to his death on the cross. Even though John's gospel does not describe the water baptism of Jesus, the Johannine community could not have been ignorant of it.

The purpose of the statement seems clear. The author once more affirms that it is the historical Jesus who is the Christ, the Son of God. Although the false teachers may have acknowledged Christ as the Savior, the divine Son of God, they denied his true human existence. Like Cerinthus, they probably held that the Christ came on the man Jesus at his baptism and remained till the time of the Crucifixion. In this way they could deny that the Christ had ever been truly human and subject to suffering and death. John rightly regards this as a denial of the redemptive activity of God. It was the Son of God who came into the world. It was this same divine Son who was baptized and received the Spirit. It was the Son who, with the Father's approval and in fulfillment of the Father's intention, shed his blood on the cross to redeem humanity. God would not be involved in human redemption apart from the Christ's true humanity, suffering, and dying. Water and blood become, therefore, the key words of the true understanding of the Incarnation.

Once the author had arrived at his primary understanding, he likely saw in the incident of Jn 19:34 a divine confirmation of it. He may also have seen the reference to the water in Jn 4:10, 14 and to drinking his blood in Jn 6:53 as confirmation. But these flow from the facts that are the historic base for them all. Jesus, the Son of God, came through the water of baptism. He came also through the Cross. This coming by water and blood is the basis of our salvation.

6b "And it is the Spirit who testifies" (cf. Jn 14:26; 15:26; 16:8, 12), because the Spirit, as ultimate truth, is the only one capable of so bearing witness (cf. 1Jn 3:24; 4:13). One cannot receive the witness concerning the Son of God by oneself. There are no human categories available through which one can understand it. God's redemptive act in Christ is not a bit of data humankind can deduce for itself by analogical reasoning. Like the Resurrection, it can only be announced. And this time it is not made known by angels (cf. Lk 24:6) but by the Spirit of God.

The Spirit bore witness historically in Jesus' baptism by coming down from heaven as a dove and remaining on him (Jn 1:32). At Jesus' death on the cross, the "blood and water" that flowed from his side bore witness and led to the following statement: "The man who saw it has given testimony, and his testimony is true. He knows that he tells the truth, and he testifies so that you also may believe" (Jn 19:35). But here in v.6 the present tense of the verb indicates that John wants to show that the Spirit continues in his witness to the community of believers.

7–8 "For there are three that testify: the Spirit, the water and the blood." Does the author mean that the Spirit still witnesses through the biblical Word in which Jesus' baptism and death are recounted, or that the Spirit gives witness to the community of the efficacy of the historic baptism and death through the rites of water baptism and communion? Probably the author is pointing to the former as having priority but not so as to exclude the latter. The biblical word confirms the prophetic word that the Spirit prophesied (cf. 2Pe 1:20–21).

But how does the Spirit give witness in the living voice of prophecy? Presumably he does it inwardly and supernaturally. The Spirit opens eyes and ears to perceive what God is declaring through his proclaimed word (cf. 1Co 12:3). He does not declare his own words, but through inward conviction he confirms the proclamation as being indeed the truth (cf. Ac 5:32). The Spirit provides what humanity is unable to acquire for itself. This witness of the Spirit accompanies every presentation of the word.The text contained in the NIV footnote made its way into the KJV through the Latin Vulgate. Most scholars agree that it is a later, though orthodox, addition to the text and is not part of John's reiginal letter.

9 The divine witness is not limited to the Spirit but includes the witness of the Father. His witness is greater than the authenticated witness of a human being because of the nature of the one who gives it and of its greater trustworthiness (cf. Jn 5:36–37; 1Jn 3:20). It was his voice that confirmed that Jesus' "passion" was an act in which God would glorify himself (Jn 12:28–30). So also it is God's own voice that is being heard again in the threefold witness.

10a Here the fact that the incarnate and crucified Jesus is God's own Son is clearly set forth. Those who believe this testimony receive the Father's own witness in their hearts that they are right to trust in Christ. Faith itself is God's own gift to the believer to lay hold of the Father. "Believing" becomes a "receiving," and the work of God in Christ results in forgiveness of sins and inward establishment of the love of God. Faith in the Son immediately becomes faith in the Father (cf. 2:23).

10b The gravity of receiving this witness is now demonstrated by the corollary: "Anyone who does not believe [the witness borne by] God [about the Son] has made him out to be a liar." To receive the Son is to receive the Father. To deny the Son is to deny the Father. John, then, cannot allow that one can profess belief in God, as did his opponents, and yet reject God's own testimony to his Son. Such rejection cannot be excused on the basis of ignorance. Rather, it is deliberate unbelief, the character of which in the end impugns the very being and character of God. If Jesus is not God's own Son in the flesh, then God is no longer the truth. He is the liar.

11–12 That Jesus is God's Son is established by God's own witness from the time of Jesus' baptism up to and including his suffering and death. It is a testimony given through the Spirit and confirmed in the heart of those who believe in the Son. The consequence of accepting this testimony from God is the fulfillment of the promise John made in 1:2 to bear witness and to testify to that "eternal life" that was with the Father and has now appeared to us in the Son. Eternal life (which is nothing less than fellowship with the Father, with the Son, and with his people) is present in his Son. Those who have the Son have this life. Those who are without the Son are without life. It is not an idea or a system of belief or even a fact that is the ultimate object of faith; it is a Person. That Person is Jesus Christ. He is to live in us (3:24). His love is to abide and be made complete in us (4:12). We are to live in him (4:13). And this is life eternal.

V. Concluding Remarks (5:13–21)

13 This verse makes the transition from the main argument to the epilogue. It reminds us of Jn 20:31, where the author said he had written his gospel so that his readers might believe in Jesus and receive eternal life in his name. This first letter of John is addressed to those who have accepted this belief but still need assurance that through this name they have indeed received eternal life. So the author refers six times in vv.15–20 (in addition to v.13) to what we believers know (GK 3857).

The false teachers present a different "knowledge" as well as a different lifestyle. The author counters with a series of tests by which the believers can evaluate the false teachers' claims and practices. Walking in the light, obeying his commands, loving one's brother, being steadfast in the community of faith, doing what is right—these serve as tests of whether the life that is from God has been received. When it has been received, it is only because God's witness to his own Son as the source of that life has been accepted and believed. On this basis, we can expect God to hear us in prayer, free us from the presence and power of sin, and forgive our transgressions. Those who know these things know also that they have received eternal life.

14 The "confidence" (GK 4244) we have in our life with Christ belongs not only in the future time of his coming (2:28) and of judgment (4:17) but also in the present and especially in the fellowship of prayer. We know that we have access to him (3:21) and that "he hears us." "Hearing" does not mean simply to be listened to but to be heard favorably (cf. Jn 11:41–42). The expectation is, of course, linked to the qualifying clause, "if we ask according to his will" (cf. Mt 6:10; Mk 14:36).

It is not any prayer that is answered but the confident prayer of the disciple who is in fellowship with the Father, who asks in Jesus' name (Jn 14:13; 15:16), who "remains" in him (Jn 15:7), and who obeys his commands (1Jn 3:22). This is not meant to dampen the expectation we may have in prayer, but the condition for addressing God is to know he will hear and act. Prayer becomes not only a time for petitioning but of yielding one's life to the will and work of God. Prayer made in these circumstances is always heard because it is God's will that is being done and his intention for humankind that is being met.

15 John now states that the "confidence" (v.14) for approaching God and asking him anything is absolute. A paraphrase of the text is as follows: "Since we know that he hears us whenever we ask in his will, we may also know with equal certainty that we possess the requests we have made the moment we have prayed."

That our petition is answered is not dependent on whether or not we have personally observed the answer. Some answers to prayer are recognized immediately, others later, and some are not recognized in our lifetime. But this is not the author's point. When we pray as Jesus prayed, in full accord with the Father's will, we can know that we have our requests because God has made them his own and his will must be done. What is required of us is simply the faith to believe that this is so and that his will will be done on earth as it is in heaven, and then decide to live accordingly. The author is exalting faith in the will of God and its relation to our privilege to pray. He is echoing Jesus' own words in Mk 11:24.

16a The author turns from confidence in prayer to the ministry of prayer. Although he does not give the basis for his statement, what he says about intercessory prayer follows logically from what he has been teaching. If love requires the willingness to lay down one's life for a member of the community (3:16), then certainly it follows that if one sees a brother commit sin, such a person must intercede for him in prayer. Not to pray for him would be as much a betrayal of God's love as to withhold material aid from him (3:17). Moreover, when we pray for a brother or a sister who commits sin, we can know that such a prayer is "according to his [God's] will" because Christ is the atoning sacrifice for sins (2:2); and if we confess our sins, he is committed to forgive us (1:9).

But why should a brother need such intercession? Why does he not pray for himself and make his own confession? We can only speculate as to John's answer. Perhaps again it is a matter of assurance. The brother may need to be forgiven through intercessory prayer as an expression of the community's forgiveness. Because the sin was presumably committed after entrance into the Christian community, the need to confess the sin to another and to have received assurance of forgiveness may have had special significance. Also, there might be an allusion here to Jesus' words in Jn 20:23.

16b The author comments that intercession is not required if it involves a "sin that leads to death." This is puzzling. We do not know exactly what the author has in mind. Judaism distinguished between deliberate sins—sins of open rebellion against God that were punishable by death—and inadvertent sins that can be atoned for (Lev 4; Nu 15:22, 29). First-century Judaism retained this pattern. In the Johannine community some such distinction was presumably made, hence the limitation "sin that leads to death." Why does he make such an exception? Presumably because he is speaking of spiritually efficacious prayer—prayer that will lead to eternal life. Such prayer can be made only for those who are rooted in God's life and love.

Who specifically is excluded from efficacious prayer? The text offers no clues. The sin mentioned might refer to the blasphemy against the Holy Spirit (Mk 3:29). But the content of the letter may point to the suggestion that John has in mind the sin of false teaching. For life to be given to those who deny Jesus Christ, hate their brothers, and refuse the witness of God would be a contradiction. Since such persons deny the mercy of God, prayer for them would appear to be limited to asking for their repentance and conversion to God's truth.

17 Earlier John defined sin as "lawlessness" (3:4). Now he adds "unrighteousness" (NIV, "wrongdoing"; GK 94). Possibly some in the community, knowing that God's children were not to sin (3:9–10), attempted to deal with the problem of Christians' sinning by limiting sin to deliberate or lawless acts. If so, John will have none of it. All wrongdoing is sin, even when done by the children of God. But not all sin results in death. John aims first at honesty (cf. 1:8) and only then at resolution. Sin is not dealt with by denial but by confession and by community intercession (v.16). Where this intercession occurs, the divine life of God is present and fellowship with God occurs. Within this life and fellowship, the blood of Jesus Christ purifies believers from all sin (1:7).

18 John concludes by stating three certainties that characterize his position over against the false teachers: (1) We know that anyone born of God does not continue in sin (v.18). (2) We know that we are the children of God (v.19). (3) We know that the Son of God has come and has given us certain, definite knowledge about himself (v.20). John has never wavered from the priority of the ethical requirement, nor does he do so now. Christians must not walk in darkness (1:7). They must not hate their fellow believers (2:10). They must not live a life of sin (3:6).

However noble the sentiments expressed by the false teachers, the test of the truth of God is conduct. A sinful life is totally incompatible with the life received from God. John is not unaware of the difficulties involved in living the new life or of the quality of the opposition from the evil one. He knows the wiles of the evil one and expects them. Nonetheless, he has been adamant in his confidence that the evil one need not prevail, because of the presence of the power of God in the believer.

Already John has shown that if those who live in God do not sin (3:6), no one born of God and possessing the divine life of God will fall victim to the life of sin (3:9). To this he now adds that the Son of God himself (i.e., "the one who was born of God") will keep him safe from the evil one (see comment on 2:13b). The phrase "keeps safe" (GK 5498) recalls Jesus' words in Jn 17:12, 15.

19 The second affirmation builds on the first one (v.18), but emphasizes the positive consequence: "We know that we are children of God." The author now openly identifies himself with the community of faith and stresses the personal quality of the relationships involved in fellowship (cf. 1:3) with the Father. We know we "belong to him." And how is this known? It is not by boastful claims, like those made by the false teachers, but on the basis of the "tests of eternal life" that are substantiated by life and action. As we exhibit the marks of God's family, we demonstrate that we belong to the Father. In contrast to the true community that belongs to God (cf. Jn 8:47) is the rest of the world, which lies under the control of the evil one (cf. 2:15–17). Clearly there is no middle ground for the author. To be born of God is to be safe from the power of the evil one. Not to be born of God is to be wholly under the power of the evil one.

20 John's third and final affirmation is in fact the summary of the letter. It affirms the point of dispute with the false teachers. Christian faith has to do with Jesus Christ. He is the "Word of life" (1:1), "the eternal life" (v.2), which was with the Father and through the Incarnation came into human history. By his coming, we can know the true God and have fellowship with him. But the false teachers said that this relationship was apart from the Son. Fellowship with God as they taught it came through divine "knowledge" of the subject. From the beginning John denied this teaching. The reality of God can be known only through apprehending the reality that is in the Son. This comes through revelation that is grounded in the facts of history. It requires that we know Jesus Christ as God's Son and that we live our lives entirely in him. We know by this experiential life in the Son that we are also in the Father and that the Son is indeed the true God, the author of eternal life.

"He" in v.20b is translates "this one"; grammatically it most naturally refers to Jesus Christ (though some refer it to God as "him who is true"). Here at the climax of the letter John ascribes full deity to Jesus. After all, this is the crux of his argument and the basis for his statement that he who is in Jesus is in the Father. For Jesus Christ as the author of eternal life, see v.11; also Jn 11:25; 14:6.

21 John closes on an affectionate note and with a final admonition. "Dear children" (cf. 3:7; 4:4) reminds his readers of his genuine commitment to them. The exhortation "keep yourselves from idols" at first glance seems out of place. Idolatry has not so much as been mentioned in the letter. Although the warning may be understood as a general admonition to avoid any contact with paganism, it is more likely that the warning represents a final characterization of the "heresy" represented by the false teachers. False teaching is ultimately "apostasy from the true faith." To follow after it is to become nothing better than an idol worshiper, especially if it is a matter of the truth of one's conception of God. The author is blunt. The false teachers propose not the worship of the true God, made known in his Son Jesus, but a false god—an idol they have invented.

2 John

INTRODUCTION

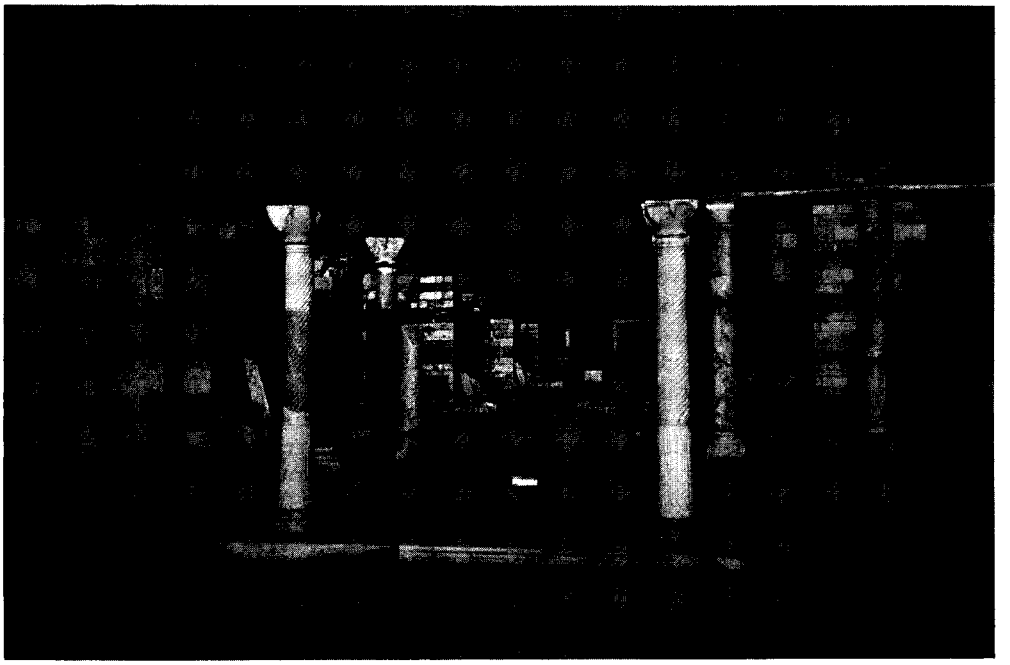
For comments on the background, purpose, authorship, and date of this letter, see the introduction to 1 John.

EXPOSITION

I. Introduction (1–3)

The introduction is a normal epistolary salutation. The author is identified as "the elder" (cf. 3Jn 1); the recipients are identified as "the chosen lady and her children"; and an appropriate Christian greeting is extended (v.3).

1 "Elder" (GK 4565) can mean an old man, a senior person deserving respect, or a senior official of a local church (cf. Ac 11:30; 14:23; 1Ti 5:17). The author of this brief letter must have been so well known and established to those he was writing to that the title "elder" immediately identified him. That he assumes authority over them, though he is obviously not a member of their church, suggests that he was more than a local pastor. He probably held an influential position (like that of a bishop) in the region where his readers lived. That "the elder" was also the writer of the first letter and that he was the apostle John is a valid inference (see the introduction to 1 John).



The designation of the letter's addressee raises questions. "Chosen lady" in Greek is Eclecta Kyria (GK 1723 & 3257). From ancient times opinion has been divided as to whether this letter was addressed to an anonymous noble lady named "Eclecta" or "Kyria," or to a Christian community metaphorically identified as "the chosen lady and her children"; those differences continue yet today.

While a strict interpretation supports an individual person as the addressee, the context supports an enigmatic reference to a Christian community. Such a veiled allusion may have been a device for shielding the identity of the community from adverse action by public officials who opposed the Christian community. If the letter fell into unfriendly hands, it would seem to be nothing more than a private message to a friend. The greetings extended to them from the children of her "chosen sister" (v.13) would be understood as being from the members of the community of "the elder." The statement "whom I love in the truth—and not I only, but also all who know the truth" seems more appropriate as a reference to a church than to an individual.

The linking of "truth" (GK 237) and "love" (GK 26) is of great importance. Because John's readers are in the truth—i.e., they know Jesus as the Christ, the Father's Son—they are also the recipients of God's love as it is known and manifested in the community of faith. And the love received by the community comes from all who know the truth. The author is speaking in clear contrast to the heretics. They do not have the truth, nor do they know what it means to be in the community of love.

2 John goes on to explain why the community of love can be so inclusive. Love relates to the truth, which lives in us and will be with us forever. Truth, for him, is more than what is objectively known. It is that which indwells believers, permeating their whole existence. Because it is the truth of God, it has no temporal limitation. Love and truth are not passing sentiments, nor are they dependent on depths of emotional feeling or the strength of one's personal commitment. Love and truth originate in God. Like him, they endure without changing, and their splendor never fades.

3 At the time John's letters were written, the salutation of a letter ended with a greeting. Most of the NT letters follow this custom but give it a special Christian character, such as "grace and peace to you" (Ro 1:7; cf. 1Pe 1:2) or "grace, mercy and peace from God the Father and Christ Jesus our Lord" (1Ti 1:2).

According to tradition, the apostle John served as the pastor of Ephesus in his latter years. Although during his time there were no specific church buildings, the Christians at Ephesus eventually built a huge basillica, whose remains are still visible.

Here, however, John adds a significant variation to this custom. Rather than wishing or praying that God may grant us peace, he turns it into a promise that God's mercy and grace will be ours if we truly remain in his truth and love. In the next section, "truth" and "love" continue to be the chief topic.

II. A Formal Word of Instruction (4–11)

A. An Exhortation (4–6)

4 The author continues to follow the custom of his time by expressing his pleasure in writing to his readers. Like other Christian writers, John relates this note of "joy" to their spiritual state, for they are faithful to the truth.

The force of "some" in v.4 is disputed. Some think that the elder had met only some members of the community, and it is to them he refers here. It seems more likely, however, that news of the church had been brought to the elder and that part of this news was that the church had suffered division as a consequence of the work of the heretics. But John rejoices that some of the children remained true to the faith that he had delivered to them and that he had just referred to in v.2. The next clause—"just as the Father commanded us"—seems to relate to "the truth" they heard "from the beginning" (v.5). The commandment received from the Father is explained in v.5 as the commandment of love and in v.7 as belief in the Son (cf. 1Jn 3:23).

5 Clearly for John the commandment of love has precedence here, just as it does in 1Jn 4:21. It is not that love precedes truth or belief but that love offers the clearest test of the truthfulness of the confession and the sincerity of the obedience given to God's commands. Belief may be feigned and confession only of the lips, but love is harder to counterfeit. The elder is not requiring something new but that which has been the supreme and final word "from the beginning." Love for one another is what the Father required (1Jn 4:7), the Son manifested (1Jn 3:16), and the Spirit makes available through life in him (1Jn 4:13–15).

6 Four times in vv.4–6 the author uses the noun "command" (GK 1953). This is his way of making clear that what he is saying is a direct expression of God's will. And how does one know that one is fulfilling that will? The test of love is obedience to God's commands, and the test of obedience is whether one "walks in love." The argument is intentionally circular. Love of God must result in obedience to the Word of God or it is not true love, like God's gift in Jesus Christ. Jesus' own love was manifested by his obedience even to death. Love of God can finally be expressed only in action and truth (1Jn 3:18). Do we love our brother and sister? Are we prepared to die for them? Obedience that does not lead to the life of love in which we love one another even to death is not obedience offered to God. Not to love means to remain in darkness (1Jn 2:11) and in death (1Jn 3:14). Hatred of one's brother is obedience to and gratification of one's own evil nature (cf. 1Jn 3:12) and has nothing to do with God.

B. A Warning (7–11)

7 This verse is reminiscent of 1Jn 2:18, 27; 4:1–3. The "deceivers" (GK 4418) are those who have left the believing community for the world. It is unlikely that those who went out were members of the "lady's" community. More likely they were members of the original community of the elder. Nonetheless, they may have been known to the community here addressed and were therefore a risk to that community also. What distinguishes them is their unwillingness to acknowledge that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh. Curiously the tense is changed from the past tense, "has come in the flesh" (1Jn 4:2), to the present participle, "as coming in the flesh." It would be possible, therefore, to interpret this as a reference to Jesus' return in the flesh (cf. 1Jn 2:28; 3:2). But since we know of no controversy in this area, this seems unlikely. John's intention is to say something beyond what he said in 1Jn 4:2. What the present tense emphasizes is the timeless character of the event (cf. Jn 3:31; 6:14; 11:27). It is not simply an event in history but an "abiding truth," defining the union between humanity and deity that is present in Jesus' person. This union is not limited to Jesus' historical manifestation but remains true of him as the one at the right hand of the Father.

8 In this verse, some manuscripts read, "Watch out that you do not lose what you have worked for," while others have, "Watch out that you do not lose what we have worked for." It is difficult to ascertain which one John actually wrote, though "we" seems preferable (cf. Gal 4:11, 19). As messengers of Christ, the apostles could not help but feel completely involved in the lives of their charges (cf. Php 2:16). Whether or not they actually planted all the churches under their wings is beside the point. Though Paul did not establish the Christian communities in Rome and Colosse, he accepted full responsibility for them and wrote to them. Similarly, as one in charge of the message that was "from the beginning," all of John's labors were directed to the maintenance of the truth that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh. If anyone failed to continue in this message, in a real sense John's apostolic mission had failed. That the reader would lose was self-evident, but so would the community of faith and John himself (i.e., "we").

"Rewarded fully" suggests that John envisions two possibilities. In this verse John addresses one situation, in which a reader is partially deceived and so loses some of his reward for faithfulness and perseverance. One receives according to his or her work. (For more on the concept of "rewards," see Mt 5:12; Jn 4:36; 1Co 3:8; Rev 11:18; 22:12.)

9 John's second possibility is a more radical departure from the faith: "Anyone who goes too far" (better than NIV's "Anyone who runs ahead"). The situation here implies not a loss of reward but of God himself, the loss or nonattainment of eternal life as promised in 1Jn 2:25.

The "teaching of Christ" can be construed as teaching about Christ or as the teaching that Christ himself did. The first option would be referring to the teaching that Jesus Christ has indeed come in the flesh. It is of little importance, however, which alternative is accepted, because the author holds equally to both positions. For Jesus Christ to be acknowledged as the one come in the flesh is fundamental to the faith, and for us to love one another (as taught by Jesus) is equally fundamental. To confess the former requires the latter. To have the Father and the Son is to have precisely what the false teachers have lost. To give up the Son is to lose the Father (cf. Jn 5:23; 14:6–7).

10–11 The last warning extended to the reader is both the most objective and the most final. "If anyone comes to you and does not bring this teaching, do not take him into your house or welcome him." The author is not certain what will happen in the lady's community. Probably he expects that the false teachers will soon arrive with their pernicious propaganda. If so, the situation is dangerous. They must not be shown hospitality, as if they were brothers in the faith. They are deceivers, and thus it would be a mockery of the Father and a sin against Christ to give those who deny the Son and hate fellow believers any place of respect within the community of faith. To do so means becoming a partaker in their unbelief and hatred of the truth.

This statement is all the more remarkable since it comes from the "apostle of love." Moreover, the command to extend hospitality is deeply rooted in the tradition (Ro 12:13; 1Ti 3:2; 5:3–10; Tit 1:8; Heb 13:2; 1Pet 4:8–10). It was an absolute demand that brothers in Christ be supported, fed, and housed by the local congregations they visited. Nevertheless, the elder invokes a higher principle here. False prophets, antichrists, and deceivers are not to share in the provision of hospitality. Even the Christian greetings that might be given ever so casually are forbidden in the case of the false teachers. One cannot serve God and mammon simultaneously (Mt 6:24). One cannot be a partner of God and a partner of the devil (1Co 10:20).

Clearly the elder's words are an offense to some today and are not considered worthy of the church. Admittedly great care should be exercised before applying such a radical withholding of hospitality from anyone. For the elder it was applied only to those who were committed to destroying the faith of the community. The issue involved more than disagreements in interpretation or personal misunderstandings among members of the body of Christ. It was clearly defined unbelief, and it involved active and aggressive promotion of perversions of truth and practice that struck at the heart of Christianity.

But ought not persons who had gone so far astray be dealt with all the more in love? Do they not require even more by way of grace, mercy, and forgiveness of Christ? At the personal level, Christians should always be prepared to turn the other cheek and seek tirelessly to be reconciled with others. But only those whose own faith is secure and whose understanding beyond corruption can do this. Unfortunately, the community of the elect lady was not yet in this position. It was not mature enough to deal with such deadly deviations; in fact, it was more likely that it might be destroyed by them. The responsibility of parents may furnish an analogy. Parents must discriminate as to whom even among their relatives they entertain in their home. Some relatives might be of such questionable character as to menace the moral, spiritual, and physical welfare of the children. Such relatives must be excluded. Parents must balance their concern for their relatives with their responsibility for their children. It is important to note that John does not suggest that the elect lady and her children deal with the false teachers in hatred or retaliate against them. Instead, he counsels that the false teachers be kept at a distance lest their heresy destroy the young church.

We today can only be grateful that the infant church took heresy regarding the person of Christ seriously. Christianity stands or falls with its Christology. From the human point of view, if John and other apostolic leaders had tolerated the "antichrists" who denied the basic truth of the Incarnation, the church might never have survived. We today benefit from the spiritual discernment and moral courage of John and others like him.

III. Conclusion (12–13)

12–13 The letter closes with a normal wish. The elder acknowledges that there is much more he might say, but he recognizes that it will be more effective if he were to say it in person (suggested by the phrase "face to face"). When the community of believers enjoys fellowship in Christ, one of the results of their fellowship is the "joy" of the Lord.

The "children" who sent "their greetings" were doubtless members of the elder's community who understood the plight of the community of the chosen lady; they wished to share John's concern to strengthen the bonds of love that unite all saints.

3 John

INTRODUCTION

For comments on the background, purpose, authorship, and date of this letter, see the introduction to 1 John.

EXPOSITION

I. Salutation (1)

Third John is a genuine letter written by "the elder" to a man named Gaius in another community. Although the letter is highly personal, it is also clearly official; the elder expresses thoughts that are meant to be shared with other members of the community. Concern for the situation in the church is the occasion for writing. The letter implies that Gaius was in an especially influential position and commends and supports him.

1 The "elder" (cf. comment on 2Jn 1; also the introduction to 1 John) addresses Gaius as "my dear friend"; his warm affection for Gaius permeates the letter. Although the name "Gaius" occurs elsewhere in the NT (cf. Ac 19:29; 20:4; Ro 16:23; 1Co 1:14) and is common enough in the literature of the time, his identity, aside from what is said of him in this letter, is unknown to us. He may have been a member of the church Diotrephes appears to have headed. But whether he held any official position in it is uncertain. Regarding "in the truth," see comment on 2Jn 1.

II. Personal Words to Gaius (2–4)

2 John's wishing good health to Gaius does not mean that Gaius was ill. This expression was a conventional one, and though it does not rule out the possibility of particular concern for Gaius's health, it does not necessitate it. John commends him by praying that things will be as well for his physical health as they have proved to be for his spiritual health. Implied in this verse is a tribute to the wholesome state of Gaius's spiritual life. Of how many Christians could their physical health be equated with their spiritual health? But the elder knew his man!

3 Behind this verse we see the flow of Christians between the early churches. This flow may have been occasioned in some instances by a change in personal circumstances and in others because of opposition and persecution. However, it may have been more intentional than this and may have represented, particularly among the Johannine churches, a commitment to live as a fellowship of Christians deeply concerned for one another.

Traveling missionaries and evangelists probably swelled the ranks of those who moved back and forth. Yet it is too much to read into the term "brothers" an exclusive reference to them. There was obviously a lively flow of persons between the church where Gaius was a member and the elder's community. Moreover, these men appear to be reporting to the elder as a normal and expected activity. They tell him about Gaius's faithfulness to Christian truth as well as about his sincerity and faithfulness in his daily living. In vv.5–8 the elder specifies the conduct he has in mind. Nowhere in this letter, however, does he refer to the theological issue before the church.

4 John now comments on his reaction to Gaius's stand for the truth. There is no more important news he can receive, no greater joy he can experience, than that his own "children" (i.e., his own converts to the faith) are living in faithfulness "to the truth." The word "children" could, of course, designate any for whom John feels pastoral responsibility (cf. 1Jn 2:13a).

III. Commendation for Gaius's Hospitality (5–8)

5 The writer's warm feeling shines through again as he for the third time addresses Gaius as his "dear friend" (cf. vv. 1–2). Now he commends him for his hospitality to Christian brothers who came from the elder to visit the church, even though they were at the time unknown to Gaius. Likely Gaius's actions were in contrast to what others in his church did, and he may have incurred their displeasure. Although hospitality was required of all Christians (Mt 10:10; Ro 12:13; 1Ti 3:2; 5:10; Heb 13:2), it was sometimes necessary to refuse it (2Jn 10).

6 Part of what the traveling brothers had reported to the elder was the wholehearted way—involving, perhaps, risk to his standing in the community—in which Gaius had entertained them. On returning, they had testified to this before the whole church, and this increased the elder's pride in "his son in the faith." He had not only entertained the traveling brothers but had shown them agape love.

It seems that these brothers had again returned to Gaius, perhaps carrying letters from the elder; and they again needed Christian hospitality. The admonition to send them on their way "in a manner worthy of God" shows the supreme importance assigned to hospitality. The phrase probably means that the traveling brothers were to be recognized as servants of God and supported as such. In such instances, Christians were to provide hospitality as if the Lord himself were being welcomed (cf. Jn 13:20; Gal 4:1–15; Heb 13:2).

7 That they went out "for the sake of the Name" (i.e., Jesus Christ; cf. Ac 5:41) shows that they were missionaries. The sending body is either the elder's community or a company of believers known to the elder and Gaius. That they could receive nothing from pagans shows how strongly the Johannine church depended on Jesus' word in Mk 6:8, 10. Furthermore, common sense would also make them refuse support from pagans. We do know that wandering preachers and missionaries of pagan deities were common in the Roman world.

It was difficult enough accepting gifts from the church, as Paul showed, let alone taking help from unbelievers (cf. 1Co 9:14–18; 2Co 12:16–18; 1Th 2:6–9). Although Paul acknowledged the right of the traveling missionaries to be supported by the church (1Co 9:14), he was well aware of the risks this entailed. Nonetheless, for the mature Christian community such support was encouraged and gladly received (cf. Php 4:10–18). For both the giver and the receiver there was a blessing to be received. In the Johannine community such support was certainly a part of the sacrifice one Christian owed another. Even a Christian's life was not beyond the limit love required (1Jn 3:16–17).

8 Whether this call "to show hospitality" (GK 5696) is based on the principle that by their support church members are fellow laborers with missionaries in proclaiming the Gospel (cf 2Co 8:23; Col 4:11) or whether such support guarantees participation in the truth is not clear. In the Johannine community, koinonia (i.e., "fellowship"; cf. 1Jn 1:3–4) required the former, while obedience to the commands of Christ demanded the latter. The author could be deliberately ambiguous, desiring both alternatives.

IV. Complaints Against Diotrephes (9–10)

9 This paragraph brings us to the nub of the problem that the elder is writing about. He had already addressed a letter to the church through its leader Diotrephes. That letter is lost, perhaps destroyed by Diotrephes himself. Its contents are not, however difficult to imagine. On the basis of 3 John, we can surmise that he had written the church asking them to extend hospitality to the traveling missionaries he had sent out. It may also have included a request for support that would speed them on their way. Diotrephes chose to thwart John's intention by suppressing the letter or else opposing the request before the congregation. He also had threatened the expulsion of any in the church who were considering offering hospitality to the elder's emissaries. In fact, some may already have been forced out of the church.

Why Diotrephes was opposing the elder is not clear. The elder's statement that Diotrephes "loves to be first" could simply reflect personal rivalry. Or it could reflect an inflated and dictatorial ego. John's prominence in the community was obviously long-standing. Diotrephes may have been troubled by John's continued influence over the church he was leading. If Diotrephes was a younger man, the elder's age may have been a problem. That there was a deeper split, perhaps involving theological differences, is not supported by the text.

10 The elder has commended Gaius for his faithfulness to the truth and for living his according to the truth. Does this indicate that John suspected Diotrephes of wavering in opposition to the false teachers in the area? Does the statement that he "will have nothing to do with us" and that he is "gossiping maliciously about us" and "refuses to welcome the brothers" indicate that he is not really committed to the commandment of love? If so, Diotrephes had as yet shown no theological deviation regarding the person of Christ. If he had, we can, in view of John's other actions, be quite certain that he would have exposed Diotrephes and pronounced judgment on him. But quite apart from doctrinal deviation, the opposition of Diotrephes would have the effect of weakening the elder's position in the community and making the work of the false teachers that much easier.

Another cause for the problem may have been that John expanded the activity of the missionary emissaries in order to stem the tide of false teaching flooding the area. The presence of these missionaries would have been an effective deterrent to schism and would have strengthened his hand in dealing with this threat to the Gospel. But those actions may have been resented by Diotrephes as eroding the local autonomy of the churches. The "malicious gossip" referred to may have been that the elder was using the presence of false teachers as a pretext for establishing his own authority more completely over the churches.

Exactly how Gaius fits into all this is unclear. Perhaps he was the leader of another local church in the area, close enough so that he can be considered a member of the same church but far enough away so that he did not know all that was going on. It is difficult to place Gaius in the same location as Diotrephes, for why would John be telling Gaius about what Diotrephes is doing when presumably Gaius would already know about it firsthand?

It is important to note that the elder does not object that Diotrephes has authority, but he does object to its misuse to the detriment of the truth. The real conflict is not, as some contend, between two types of church organization. It is between two levels of commitment to the work of God: Diotrephes is more interested in furthering his own position than in furthering the work of God.

Exactly how John intended to deal with Diotrephes is unclear. His statement that he "will call attention to what he [Diotrephes] is doing" suggests that John planned to confront Diotrephes, perhaps personally, and expose his conduct before the whole church, unless he completely repented. There seems to be an implication that Diotrephes's misdeeds were not yet fully known to the congregation; and perhaps it was the elder's hope that once they were revealed, the church would either censure or expel Diotrephes from his position.

How are we to explain the sharp words and drastic response on the part of the "apostle of love"? Do they not represent a contradiction to his teaching? More probably they represent the response of one who sensed that the very nature of the Gospel was threatened by such hypocritical conduct on the part of one of its ministers. Diotrephes's actions against John were reprehensible by any standard; but they were even more so on the part of one who probably had been of the fellowship of the elders, who knew the message of love that had been received, and who had pledged to live a life according to the commandment given by the Son of God. For such a leader of the church to give way to personal pique and selfish ambition was unthinkable.

Furthermore, Diotrephes's wickedness spread beyond the vicious innuendos and lies directed against John. It extended to those wholly innocent of wrongdoing. The missionary "brothers," who ought to have benefited from Diotrephes as they served in the Gospel's cause, were denied the welcome due them as members of the household of faith. Because they came from the elder, they suffered the consequences of guilt by association. Furthermore, Diotrephes actually cast out of his congregation those whose conscience required them to extend hospitality to the brethren.

Such contradiction to the Gospel by word and deed could not be condoned, and indeed it was not. It was no longer Diotrephes who was on trial for his action but John and all those who believed as he did. Silence on their part in the face of such total rejection of the truth and the life of the Gospel would have been as hypocritical as Diotrephes's earlier action.

It was no pleasant experience that awaited the elder, but "truth" without "love" is no truth at all. Diotrephes was condemned not because he violated sound teaching regarding the person and nature of Jesus Christ but because his "life" was a contradiction to the truth of the Gospel.

V. Exhortation and Endorsement of Demetrius (11–12)

11 That the elder admonishes Gaius not to "imitate what is evil but what is good" need not imply that he fears for Gaius's character. It is rather for his encouragement in continuing to do good. He may have expected Diotrephes and his supporters to exert intense pressure on Gaius to give up his support of the elder and his missionaries. In that event, Gaius would have no option but to take his stand on principle. To give in to pressure against one's convictions is to submit to evil. Whatever its source or whoever its advocates, evil can never be reconciled to God. Even to contemplate giving in to evil means that loyalty to God's revealed will in Scripture is jeopardized.

Why does the elder appeal to those who "imitate"? Because it is the nature of God's revelation that truth (vv.1, 3), love (v.6), and righteousness (v.11) have been modeled first in Jesus Christ and then by those who are faithful to his commandments. We do not have innately a dependable standard by which to judge ourselves. We must always measure our understanding and actions by God himself, for whom love, truth, and righteousness are absolute attributes. In Christ these same attributes have become available to all who love God and desire to obey his commands. To show them forth in our lives proves that we are "from God." All goodness proceeds from him; our perseverance in goodness demonstrates that in Jesus Christ we have seen God.

12 The elder now commends Demetrius, of whom we know no more than what is said of him here. For some reason John felt it important for Gaius to know and trust him. Apparently he was also one of John's supporters. He may have been the bearer of this letter or a traveling missionary. John honors him with a threefold tribute: (1) He "is well spoken of by everyone." (2) He is well spoken of "by the truth itself." (3) The elder also "speaks well of him." This strong backing of Demetrius leads us to think he had been given a special mission that required unusual trust, but one that the elder did not choose to describe here. What does John mean that "the truth" speaks well of Demetrius? It is the truth of the Gospel in Demetrius's life that the elder is referring to. Like Gaius, Demetrius is "walking in the truth." His life matches his confession. In Pauline terms, he manifests the fruit of the Spirit. In John's terms, he lives the life of love. The clause "and you know that our testimony is true" reminds us of Jn 21:24.

VI. Personal Remarks and Farewell Greetings (13–15)

13–14 John's statement that he wished to write more is characteristic of him (cf. Jn 20:30; 2Jn 12). Also characteristic is his expressed desire to see Gaius soon and talk with him "face to face" (cf. comment on 2Jn 12).

15 The closing word again bears the mark of the warm relationship existing between John and Gaius. John extends "peace" (GK 1645) to him, knowing that his situation may become very difficult in the days ahead. He also reminds him that all who are with John are also Gaius's friends. Then he concludes by asking Gaius to greet his friends in the church. This last remark supports the assumption that the elder's real desire is that Gaius will in fact share this letter with the members of the church.

Jude

INTRODUCTION

1. Authorship

The first verse identifies the author of this letter as "Jude, a servant of Jesus Christ and a brother of James." "James" (Gk., "Jacob"; GK 2610) was a popular name among the Jews in NT times because of its patriarchal connection. Likewise popular was "Jude" (Gk., "Judah," the name of Jacob's fourth son and founder of the tribe of Judah; GK 2683). The name gained added luster from Judas Maccabaeus, a national hero of the Jews, who led the revolt against Antiochus Epiphanes in the second century B.C. But the perfidy of Judas Iscariot seems to have led practically all major English versions to use the form "Jude" rather than "Judas" in translating this letter.

Can the author of this letter be identified with any certainty among the number of men in the NT named Judas? The link of Jude with James in v.1 provides the best clue for identifying him. After the martyrdom of James the son of Zebedee under Herod Agrippa I (c. A.D. 44; cf. Ac 12:2), the only James who is well enough known in the early church that the unspecified use of his name would be generally recognizable was James of Jerusalem. Paul called him "James, the Lord's brother" (Gal 1:19). Later he became known as "James the Just."

If the James of v.1 can be so identified, Jude was the brother of the leader of the Jerusalem church (Ac 12:17; 15:13; 21:18; 1Co 15:7; Gal 1:19; 2:9, 12) and the half-brother of Jesus of Nazareth (Mt 13:55; Mk 6:3). If this is who he is, he did not believe in the messiahship of Jesus until after the Resurrection (Jn 7:5; cf. Ac 1:14). This probably explains the humility with which Jude introduces himself in v.1 as a "servant" (or slave) of Jesus.

Modern objections to the authorship of the letter by a half-brother of Jesus include the fact that its language seems very Hellenistic for an author who grew up in Galilee. The vocabulary abounds in ornate and rare words (thirteen not found elsewhere in the NT). Yet it is unreasonable to dogmatize about what facility in the Greek language and literature or what knowledge of Jewish apocalyptic writings (see comments on vv.9, 14) the half-brother of Jesus might have had. Greek was the lingua franca of the Mediterranean world, and the presence of the Decapolis to the east and south of the Sea of Galilee provided ample opportunity for Greek influence on nearby Nazareth. It is certainly possible that Jesus and others in his family spoke Greek fluently.

2. Date

The letter is so short that it contains little to help fix its date of composition other than the points mentioned above and inferences that can be drawn from the heresy the author opposes. It was likely written between A.D. 40 and 80. If this letter was used by Peter in 2 Peter (cf. introduction to 2 Peter), the writing would have to be sometime prior to Peter's death or before A.D. 65. All things considered, the letter is best dated about 60 to 65.

3. Canonicity

If 2 Peter utilized Jude and if Peter wrote 2 Peter (both positions are disputed), then 2 Peter is the oldest witness to Jude, and its "apostolic" character or canonicity is, in principle, settled at a very early date. The Muratorian Canon (c. A.D. 200) states that a letter of Jude was accepted in the church. Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, and Origen (late second- and early third-century Christian writers) all knew the book. On the other hand, there were doubts about the letter. Those who spoke against it objected to its use of noncanonical writings and noted also the limited number of citations of the letter in the literature of the early church. These doubts were overcome, and the worth of the book was recognized by the church. Since about A.D. 400 little objection to its canonicity has been voiced.

4. Destination

Since the address is so general—"To those who have been called, who are loved by God the Father and kept by Jesus Christ" (v.1)—it is quite possible that the author intended the letter to be circulated to a number of churches. Against this are the internal indications that the author knows the conditions within the church or churches to whom he writes (v.4). It is possible, however, that Jude itinerated and thus knew the dangers affecting the churches of a region or a circuit of churches within a region (perhaps Asia Minor, Syrian Antioch, or Palestine).

5. Purpose

Jude had wanted to write on the subject of the church's teaching ("the salvation we share," v.3). But he found it necessary instead to warn his readers concerning innovators who were smuggling false teaching into the churches. Likely, these teachers had an itinerant ministry in imitation of the apostles. Both Paul (cf. Galatians, Colossians) and John (cf. 1 and 2 John) faced the problem of false teachers who promoted a different gospel and erroneous instruction.

Jude's purpose is to give a strong denunciation of the errorists. He evidently hopes that by his concise but vigorous exposure of them, the church will see the danger of their error and be alert to the coming judgment on it. Jude also wants to reassure the church by showing that the coming of such scoffers was part of the content of apostolic prophecy. In his last paragraphs, he calls the Christians to exercise their faith within the received common instruction. He also praises God as the one who is able to keep both the church and individuals from falling. Christians may have confidence that the God who began a good work of salvation within them (Php 1:6) will keep them (v.1) and finally bring them safely into his glorious presence (v.24).

Though this book is often neglected by Christians, the church today needs to listen to Jude's contribution to biblical revelation. The emphasis on a "fixed" core of truth known as "the faith" needs to be pondered. Jesus is God's Word to humankind (cf. Ro 6:17; Heb 1:1–4). God is righteous and true, and he hates sin and error. Contemporary culture is becoming indifferent to the question of truth. Christians have found truth in Jesus (Eph 4:21). Jude warns of the dangers in the mixture of error with this truth. Thus his eloquent tract for maintaining the purity and truth of the Christian faith is needed in view of the relativity and syncretism so common today. While it must be granted that some Christians have been and are still intolerantly dogmatic about relatively minor theological issues, there is also the great danger of accepting uncritically all teaching or positions as valid and thus compromising God's once-and-for-all self-disclosure in Jesus.

6. Special Problems

At least two special problems confront the student of Jude: the identity of the heretics and the relation of Jude to 2 Peter. For a discussion of the second issue, see the introduction to 2 Peter.

Regarding the first problem, it would appear that the heresy has something to do with emerging Gnosticism. In general, the Gnostic worldview was hostile toward the world and all worldly ties. From this perspective, it branched into ascetic and libertine divisions. For the libertine Gnostic the idea of "thou shalt" or "thou shalt not" does not come from God (who is absolutely transmundane) but from the Archons (or the demiurges) who are related to this world. Salvation involves the intentional violation of the rules of the Archons. In some systems, the Gnostics despaired of this world to such an extent that body and soul were meaningless. Only the spirit would transcend this universe to reach the unknown God.

Against this kind of thinking, Jude's strong polemic becomes understandable. The heretics were antinomian; they did not observe Christian moral instruction. Though the false teachers spoke about the pneuma ("spirit") and claimed to be spiritual, they were really psychikoi ("psychic" or "unspiritual") and did not have "the Spirit" (v.19). Their lives gave evidence of bondage to the world, not liberation from it (v.8). Their rejection of Jesus (v.4), their blaspheming of angels (v.8, 10), and their complaining and cynicism (v.16) all fit libertine Gnosticism.

The ultimate threat of this Gnostic faith to Christianity lay in its denial of God's revelation in Christ. To follow the Gnostic path led to a radical rejection of all God's Word to humanity and to a substitution of a different salvation. The means of salvation became an esoteric teaching, not that which freed the whole person (body, soul, spirit) from the bondage of sin. This world was negated and the knowledge of the one, true God hidden. Jude's vehement opposition to this kind of error was justified in the light of the significant issues that were involved.

EXPOSITION

I. The Salutation (1–2)

1 This brief letter begins with the customary self-identification of the author. He is "Jude"—most likely the one who was the half-brother of Jesus (see the introduction). Modestly he calls himself a "servant" (lit., "slave"; GK 1528) of Jesus Christ; as such he belongs to him. Jude's calling himself a servant implies that what he is about to write is what his Master wants him to say. He also calls himself "a brother of James," the half-brother of Jesus who wrote the letter of James and became the head of the church in Jerusalem (see the introduction).

The readers are "the called" (GK 3105), which in Pauline theology stresses the sovereign activity of God's grace in summoning to salvation. This term is almost synonymous with "Christian." They are "loved by God the Father." The Father, who is love (1Jn 4:16), has set his love on his people (cf. Dt 7:6–8). Moreover, they are "kept [GK 5498] by Jesus Christ." Since there is no word for "by" in the Greek text, it can also be translated "kept for Jesus Christ" (see NIV note); i.e., God the Father preserves Christians for his Son (cf. vv.24–25; Jn 17:15).

2 "Mercy, peace and love be yours in abundance" is typical of the greeting, or prayer, that stood at the head of ancient letters. Jude omits the word "grace," which is used in the salutations of practically all other NT letters. Perhaps his reference to these three words is a way of showing facets of God's grace to humankind. All three describe what God does for us. "Mercy" is his compassion, "peace" is his gift of quiet confidence in the work of Jesus, and "love" is his generosity in granting us his favors and meeting our needs.

II. The Reason for the Letter (3–4)

3 Jude tells his "dear friends" (lit., "beloved"; GK 28) how he came to write this letter. He wanted to write a positive statement of the Christian faith. Whether he was actively engaged in writing or only in the process of thinking about it is not clear. "The salvation we share" is that which all Christians now participate in, though elsewhere in the NT salvation is spoken of as future (cf. 1Pe 1:5). Both are true. Christians have been saved (Tit 3:5), they now possess salvation (Jude 3; cf. Heb 6:9), and they long for Christ who "will appear a second time . . . to bring salvation to those who are waiting for him" (Heb 9:28).

By saying "I felt I had to write," Jude explains that a compelling obligation to the people of God prompted him to change his focus for their spiritual good. His letter is now intended to exhort the readers to struggle for "the faith that was once for all entrusted to the saints." "Contend" (GK 2043; related to 74–76) basically refers to the intense effort in a wrestling match (cf. 1Co 9:25). The specific form here shows that the Christian struggle is to be continuous. "The faith" (GK 4411) is the body of truth that very early in the church's history took on a definite form (cf. Ac 2:42; Ro 6:17; Gal 1:23). Without doubt, the form of the faith as a body of recognized truth became clearer as time passed. Jude stresses that this faith has been entrusted "once for all" (GK 562) to the "saints" (GK 41)—the ones set apart by God for himself. Basically the Christian faith cannot be changed; its foundation truths are not negotiable (see also Gal 1:6–9; 2Jn 9).

4 Jude now explains the reasons why he was compelled to write. Ungodly men had "secretly slipped in" among the believers (cf. Gal 2:4), whose condemnation "was written about long ago." This phrase could refer to God's writing down from eternity the destiny (i.e., reprobation) of the wicked, but more likely it refers to previously written predictions about the doom of the apostates.

After stating the destiny of these men, Jude describes them as "ungodly" or "impious" (GK 815), a term often used of notorious sinners. This general word is made more specific by the two charges that follow. (1) They "change the grace of our God into a license for immorality." Evidently their understanding of grace and perhaps of the forgiveness of sins led them to feel free to indulge in all forms of sexual depravity (cf. comment on 2Pe 2:2). (2) They "deny Jesus Christ our only Sovereign and Lord" (cf. 2Pe 2:1). Exactly how they denied Jesus Christ, Jude does not say. Certainly they denied him by immoral living that ran counter to his commands. Perhaps they also denied him in teaching a Christology that denied either his full humanity or his full deity. However, the word translated "Sovereign" (GK 1305) is commonly used of the Father (Lk 2:29; Ac 4:24), and the word "only" makes it difficult to apply this word to Jesus. Thus this phrase can also be translated, "the only Sovereign [the Father] and our Lord Jesus Christ." If this is adopted, then the error of the godless men was moral rather than theological (cf. Tit 1:16).

III. The Warning Against the False Teachers (5–16)

A. Examples of God's Judgment in History (5–7)

5 As Peter did in 2Pe 1:12, Jude states that his readers already know what he is about to say but that he will remind them of it. So he gives them three examples of the Lord's judgments: on the unbelievers at the time of the Exodus, on the fallen angels, and on Sodom and Gomorrah. In each instance the objects of judgment are notable rebels against the Lord.

The first example is that of Israel, who experienced the great display of God's grace in the Exodus, saw and heard his revelation at Sinai, and received his care in the wilderness; yet a number of them disbelieved and rebelled. Obviously this is not an instance of people being saved and then losing their salvation. Jude describes the rebels as "those who did not believe." The Israelites were physically delivered from bondage, not by their faith as a nation, but by God's covenant love and mercy. The warning in this judgment is against unbelief and rebellion.

6 The second example is of the fallen angels. The most likely reference here is to the angels ("sons of God," cf. Ge 6:4; Job 1:6; 2:1) who came to earth and mingled with women. This interpretation is expounded in the pseudepigraphical book of Enoch, from which Jude quotes in v.14 (also commonly quoted in the intertestamental literature and the early church fathers). These angels "did not keep their positions of authority." The implication is that God assigned angels stipulated responsibilities and a set place. But because of their rebellion, God has reserved them in darkness and in eternal chains awaiting final judgment. Apparently some fallen angels are in bondage while others are unbound and active among people as demons.

7 The third example of judgment is Sodom and Gomorrah. In v.7 the NIV is so concise that it slides over a particular nuance that is apparent in a more literal translation: "Just as Sodom and Gomorrah and the surrounding cities, which practiced immorality in the same way as these and lusted after different flesh, stand out as an example, undergoing as they do a punishment of everlasting fire." The key factors are "these" (referring to the "angels" in v. 6) and the words "different flesh." Thus the sin of Sodom and Gomorrah was seeking union with "different flesh" in a way similar to what the "sons of God" did in Ge 6:2 when they mingled with "the daughters of men."

Normally angels do not marry, nor do they have substantial bodies, though at times they have assumed bodies or appeared in a bodily form as divine messengers (Ge 19:1ff.; Zec 1:9ff.; Mt 28:2ff.; Acts 1:10–11; et al.). In Ge 19 angelic messengers in the form of men visited Sodom, and the men of the city, motivated by their homosexuality and supposing the messengers to be men, desired them. Thus they "went after different flesh." God destroyed the cities of the plain by raining fire and burning sulfur from heaven on the cities (Ge 19:24).

B. The Description and Doom of the False Teachers (8–13)

8 Jude now links the examples of God's judgment (vv.5–7) to the false teachers, whom he calls "dreamers" (GK 1965). Though this word might refer to pretensions of prophecy, it more likely refers to their carnal sin that leads them to live in a dream world. "In the very same way" points back to the sins of Sodom and Gomorrah (v.7). The false teachers pollute "their own bodies" (lit., "flesh"; GK 4922) in various forms of sexual excess, doubtless including homosexuality. Their rejection of authority implies that they repudiated Jesus as Lord over their lives. Their third sin is that they "slander celestial beings." How and why, Jude does not say. Perhaps their materialistic and fleshy bent led them to deny all spiritual forces—good or evil.

9 The false teachers should have learned from the example of the powerful archangel Michael (see Rev 12:7; cf. Da 10:13, 21; 12:1; 1Th 4:16). Jewish literature tells of a struggle over Moses' body. One writing in particular, the apocryphal Assumption of Moses, refers to the devil claiming the right to Moses' body because of his sin of murder (Ex 2:12) or because he (the devil) considered himself the lord of the earth. Yet in spite of Michael's power and dignity, he dared not bring a "slanderous accusation" against the devil but referred the dispute to the sovereignty of God. So if he, a mighty archangel, had respect for celestial powers, Jude says, how much more should the mere human false teachers do so!

10 "Yet these men" connotes contempt. They, unlike Michael, presume to speak evil against what they know nothing about (cf. v.19, where Jude explains that they do not have the Spirit). These "dreamers" do have knowledge, but only on the instinctual level of animal passion. So like "unreasoning animals," they are destroyed (by God) through the things they practice.

11 Again Jude turns to the OT—this time for another triad of examples. Because of their coming judgment, he pronounces "woe" on the false teachers, just as Jesus did on the scribes and Pharisees (Mt 23:13, 15–16, 23, 25, 27, 29). (1) The false teachers have "taken the way of Cain." Cain's way was the religion of his own works without faith (Heb 11:4) and led to the hatred and murder of his brother (1Jn 3:12–13). Like Cain, these men belong to the evil one, manufacture religion, and kill the souls of other people by error.

(2) They have abandoned themselves to Balaam's error (cf. comments on 2Pe 2:15–16). Balaam was the prototype of all greedy religionists who lead God's people into false religion and immorality (cf. Nu 31:16–19). The false teachers were wholly consumed by their love of money.

(3) "They have been destroyed in Korah's rebellion." The OT tells of the drastic punishment inflicted on Korah, Dathan, Abiram, and 250 other rebels against Moses' authority (Nu 16:1–35). So, with a bold disregard of anachronism, Jude includes them in the destruction meted out there. It is a striking way of saying that their doom is certain and settled.

12–13 Now, with burning eloquence, Jude piles figure upon figure (six of them in all) to describe the errorists. (1) The false teachers are "blemishes [GK 5069] at your love feasts." The word translated "blemishes" can also be translated "hidden rocks." "Hidden rocks" connotes the danger of shipwreck of the faith (cf. 1Ti 1:19); "spots" or "blemishes" parallels 2Pe 2:13 and connotes defilement. The "love feasts" (GK 27) were meals in which the early church ate together and observed the Lord's Supper. "Eating with you" has the idea of sumptuous eating and is better translated "feasting with you." "Without the slightest qualm" (lit., "without fear"; GK 925) means that the false teachers do not recognize the terror of the Lord against those who mock his Son's death shown in the Supper (cf. 1Co 11:27–32; Heb 10:26–31).

(2) The false teachers are "shepherds who feed only themselves"—a figure that points to all the biblical warnings against the false shepherds who care nothing for the flock (e.g., Eze 34:8; Jn 10:12–13).

(3) They are like clouds that promise rain but are "blown along by the wind" and are "without rain." Consequently, the false teachers are devoid of refreshment, promise, and performance.

(4) They are like fruit trees in late autumn, long past the harvest, bearing no fruit. Furthermore, they are trees not only fruitless but also uprooted—thus "twice dead."

(5) Next is the metaphor of the restless sea (v.13). For modern people, the sea is often a thing of beauty; to ancient people, it was a terror (cf. Isa 57:20; also Rev 21:1, with its promise of no more sea). The errorists are busy, restless, and untamed. Their product is like the foam or scum at the seashore.

(6) The last metaphor ("wandering stars") is from astronomy. The reference here could be to meteors, shooting stars, comets, or planets; planets is the most likely meaning, for the ancients called them "wandering stars" because of their movements. An unpredictable star provides no guidance for navigation; so false teachers are useless and untrustworthy. Their doom is the eternal darkness that is reserved for them (cf. 2Pe 2:4).

C. Enoch's Prophecy of the Coming Judgment (14–16)

14 Enoch, who "walked with God; then he was no more, because God took him away" (Ge 5:21), is not specifically called "the seventh from Adam" in the OT. But in Ge 5 and 1Ch 1:1–3, he is the seventh in order (counting Adam as the first). Jude here quotes the book of Enoch, the longest of the surviving Jewish pseudepigraphical writings and a work highly respected by many Jews and Christians. Those who wonder about the propriety of Jude's quotation of a noncanonical book should note that he does not call it Scripture. Paul also quoted approvingly from noncanonical writers (see Ac 17:28; 1Co 15:33; Tit 1:12). Enoch's prophecy does not give any startling new information but is simply a general description of the return of the Lord in judgment (cf. Dt 33:2; Da 7:10–14; Zec 14:3; Mt 25:31).

15–16 The stress is on two words, each used four times: "all" (GK 4246) and "ungodly" (GK 813–815; cf. v.4). Jude finds Enoch's prophecy a good summary of the universal divine judgment on the impious and all their deeds.

Verse 16 completes Jude's denunciation of the false teachers as "grumblers" (GK 1199). In 1Co 10:10 Paul uses the related verb (GK 1197) of the rebels in the wilderness (cf. Ex 16–17; Nu 14–17). Jude also calls the false teachers "faultfinders" (GK 3523), a term that underlines their critical attitude and habitual complaining. "They follow their own evil desires" might be translated "they live by their passions." "They boast about themselves" is can be rendered "and their mouth speaks haughty [or bombastic] words," which reminds one of Antiochus Epiphanes (cf. Da 7:8–11; 11:36). "Flatter others for their own advantage" reinforces Jude's stress on the venality of the false teachers.

IV. The Exhortations to the Believers (17–23)

17–18 "But, dear friends" makes the transition from the burning denunciation in vv. 8–16 to the preparation of the believers for their necessary struggles. They must remember (cf. v.5; 2Pe 1:12–15) the previously spoken words of the apostles. The apostles (the Twelve plus Paul) must have had a wide ministry of which we have little knowledge, and their preaching was part of the oral deposit of faith for the early churches. One of their prophecies was a prediction of mockers in the last days who would live ungodly lives. So the church must be vigilant and prepare itself for action, for that time is at hand and the ungodly mockers are already on the scene. The "last time" (Greek has singular) is the age of messianic salvation and judgment that culminates in the judgments of the Second Advent.

19 Again Jude returns to his triadic pattern of describing the false teachers. (1) They are "men who divide you" (GK 626). This rare word may mean that "they made distinctions," perhaps as the later Gnostics divided Christians by classifying them into groups of initiates ("spiritual ones") and lesser ones. (2) Furthermore, they are men "who follow mere natural instincts" (lit.,"psychic" or "unspiritual"; GK 6035). This word was likely used by the Gnostics to slander the orthodox when in fact the false teachers themselves were living on the natural level. Jude turns the word against them. The church today is still plagued by false teachers claiming superior knowledge and experience; yet their lives are often worse than those of the average pagan. (3) Finally, Jude says that they "do not have the Spirit" (i.e., the Holy Spirit), in spite of all their vaunted claims and teaching.

20–21 The repetition (cf. v.17) of "dear friends" (lit., "beloved"; GK 28) personalizes the message and redirects attention back from his opponents to the believers. Now he gives them a fourfold exhortation for their spiritual profit.

(1) Christians are to be "build [themselves] up" (GK 2224) in their "most holy faith." In the NT "the faith" is the orthodox body of truth and practice from the apostles (see comment on v.3). It is "most holy" because the Spirit gave it concerning God's "holy servant Jesus" (Ac 4:27, 30). Christians build themselves by having fellowship with the Lord and his people, by continuing in the Gospel and in the Word of God, and by worshiping—especially by remembering the Lord at his table.

(2) Christians are to be praying (GK 4667) "in the Holy Spirit" (cf. Ro 8:26–27; Gal 4:6; Eph 6:18). Because all believers have the Spirit, they are to pray according to the Spirit's will (set forth in the written Word and made known by inner promptings) to accomplish God's work by God's power.

(3) Christians are to "keep [themselves] in God's love" (v.21; cf. vv.1–2). The realm of God's love is in Jesus Christ; those who depart from Christ depart from the love of God. Those who reject the commands of Jesus reject his love (cf. Jn 15:10).

(4) Christians are to keep their attention fixed on the "mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ [that brings them] to eternal life." True eschatology keeps present reality in focus. The mention of mercy reminds Christians that salvation is never a matter of good works and that only in Christ is our hope of salvation (cf. comment on v.3). "Eternal life" in this verse refers to the future aspects of the presently enjoyed salvation.

22–23 Three groups are mentioned here and an instruction is given for each one. (1) The first command is to show mercy to those who are doubting (or hesitating). The teaching and example of the false teachers have caused them to be uncertain about the truth of Christianity. They must be dealt with patiently and mercifully by showing them Christian love. (2) The next group needs to be dealt with directly and vigorously. Salvation is God's work, and here Christians are portrayed as God's instruments for snatching brands out of the fire (cf. Zec 3:3). Jude pictures a person slipping into the eternal fire but being rescued from error by the grace and truth of God. (3) The final group of people appears to be deep in the immorality of the false teachers. Their very clothing is "stained by corrupted flesh." Perhaps the figure is that their depravity has made them infectious. Christians are to show mercy as in the first case, but now they are do so "with fear," lest the infection spread to them. Yet even here God's wondrous grace can exchange the excrement-covered garments (cf. Zec 3:3) for festive garments of righteousness. For no one, not even the most defiled sinner, is beyond salvation through faith in Christ's redeeming work.

V. The Doxology (24–25)

24 Jude's message of warning and doom may have depressed and discouraged his readers. Beset by so much false teaching and immorality, how can Christians ever reach heaven? The answer lies only in the power of God. So this doxology, surely one of the greatest in the NT, reminds us of God's ability to bring every one of his own safely to himself. God "is able to keep [us] from falling" (or "stumbling"; GK 720). Furthermore, he is able "to present [us] before his glorious presence without fault [GK 320, used of Christ as a faultless lamb in 1Pe 1:19; see comment]." "With great joy" is the response of Christians for their completed salvation.

25 "To the only God our Savior" points to the monotheistic nature of the faith by showing that the Father is the Savior as well as the Son. Whatever the false teachers may say, there is only one God and Savior. To "God our Savior ... through Jesus Christ our Lord" belong four attributes: (1) "glory" (GK 1518), a word with many associations and connotations difficult to capture in a few words—perhaps "radiance" or "moral splendor" comes close to its meaning; (2) "majesty" (GK 3488), which refers to God's greatness and transcendence; (3) "power" (GK 3197); and (4) "authority" (GK 2026)—the last two words stress his might and the freedom of action God enjoys as Creator. The solemn time notation "before all ages, now and forevermore" indicates that these attributes of God suffer no change and that therefore his divine plan will surely be carried out. Salvation is completely secure because God's own purpose stands and because he is able to do all that he wills (Isa 46:9–10).

The Old Testament in the New

NT Text	OT Text	Subject
Jude 9	Zec 3:2	Rebuking Satan

Revelation

INTRODUCTION

1. General Nature and Historical Background

The book of Revelation fascinates as well as perplexes the modern reader. For the present generation, it is the most obscure and controversial book in the Bible. Yet those who study it with care agree that it is a unique source of Christian teaching and one of timeless relevance. It may well be that with the exception of the Gospels, this book is the most profound and moving teaching on Christian doctrine and discipleship found anywhere in Scripture. It differs in kind from the other NT writings, not in doctrine but in literary genre and subject matter. It is a book of prophecy (1:3; 22:7, 18–19) that involves both warning and consolation. In communicating its message, the Lord uses symbol and vision.

Why did the Lord use a method that seemingly makes his message so obscure? The answer is twofold. (1) The language and imagery were not so strange to first-century readers as they are to many today. Faced with the apocalyptic style of the book, the modern reader who knows little about biblical literature and its parallels is like a person who, though unfamiliar with stocks and bonds, tries to understand the Dow-Jones reports. In other words, familiarity with the prophetic books of the OT (especially Daniel and Ezekiel), apocalyptic literature current during the first century, the Dead Sea Scrolls, and other such literature will help the reader grasp the message of the Apocalypse.

(2) The subject matter, with its glimpses into the future and even into heaven itself, required the kind of language John used. Only through symbolism and imagery can we gain some understanding of the things the Lord was unveiling through the writer John. In fact, the evocative description of unseen realities carries a poignancy and clarity unattainable by any other method. For example, "evil" is an abstract term, but a woman "drunk with the blood of the saints" graphically sets forth the concrete and more terrible aspect of this reality. Such language can trigger all sorts of ideas, associations, and mystical responses that the straight prose found in much of the NT cannot attain.

The letters to the seven churches in the Roman province of Asia (modern Turkey) specifically locate the recipients of the book and give some broad indication of the historical situation. Some of the churches were experiencing persecution (2:10, 13). From this it has been customary to assume that persecution was quite intense and widespread. Revelation is then viewed as a "tract for the times" document, warning Christians against emperor worship and encouraging them to be faithful to Christ even to death. Recent studies, however, question how intense or widespread the persecution was, even under Domitian. Thus the primary occasion for the writing of the book must be sought elsewhere than about the persecution of that time.

The letters to the churches imply that five of the seven had serious problems, particularly with disloyalty to Christ. This may indicate that the major thrust of Revelation is not sociopolitical but theological. John is more concerned with countering the heresy that was creeping into the churches toward the close of the first century than in addressing the political situation.

Revelation is also commonly viewed as belonging to the body of nonbiblical Jewish writings known as "apocalyptic" literature. The name for this type of literature is derived from the Greek word apokalypsis, meaning "revelation" (GK 637; cf. 1:1). The extrabiblical apocalyptic books were written in the period from 200 B.C. to A. D. 200. Usually scholars stress the similarities of the Apocalypse of John to these noncanonical books—similarities such as the use of symbolism and vision, the mention of angelic mediators of the revelation, the bizarre images, the new heavens and earth, etc.

Although numerous similarities do exist, John's writing also has some clear differences from these writings. (1) Unlike other apocalyptic books, Revelation clearly claims to be a book of prophecy (1:3; 22:7, 10, 18–19), the effect of which is to identify the message, as in the OT prophetic tradition, with the Word of God (1:2; 19:9). The Jewish apocalyptists used the literary form of prophecy to trace the course of history from ancient times down to their own day. John does not follow this method. He clearly places himself in the contemporary world of the first century and speaks of the future consummation in much the same way as Ezekiel and Jeremiah did. (2) While extrabiblical apocalypses are clearly pseudonymous, the last book of the NT is plainly attributed to John. (3) Many of the noncanonical apocalyptic works blame the immediate plight of God's people, not on their unfaithfulness, but on the pervasive presence of evil in the world. While Revelation does not lack encouragement to the faithful, it also strongly urges the churches to repent.

(4) Finally, and importantly, these apocalypses are pessimistic concerning the outcome of God's present activity in the world; and for hope they look wholly to the eschatological end, when God will once again intervene and defeat the evil in the world. Though Revelation is often read in this manner, there are great differences, for it describes the climactic event in history as already completed—in the victory of the slain Lamb (ch. 5). At the present time, the Lamb's victory is being worked out in the obedient suffering of his followers (12:11; 15:2). Their deaths are seen in Revelation as a part of the victory over evil that God is already effecting in the world. This partial victory through the suffering of the saints is combined with the hope of the final unambiguous victory of God at the end of history. By viewing history in this way, the book makes clear that the source of Christian hope is not in history itself but relates to a transcendent future. For John, there is no gradual progress of righteousness in history. Therefore, any identification of revelation with the writings of the other apocalyptists must be severely qualified.

John was no doubt familiar with the Jewish apocalyptists of the intertestamental period, and in some instances there seems to be a direct allusion to them (cf. comment on 2:7). But the relation is in general superficial. Only twice does an interpreting angel explain a vision (chs. 7 and 17), a feature constantly present in the other kind of apocalyptic writing. In no case does John depend on the assumed knowledge of the Jewish apocalyptists for clarity of meaning. On the other hand, he is everywhere dependent on the OT canonical books, especially those where symbol and vision play a dominant role. Although throughout the commentary occasional references to noncanonical apocalyptic literature appear, they are given only as aids in understanding the background of John's writing.

G. E. Ladd's suggestion that we create a category called "Prophetic-Apocalyptic" to distinguish canonical materials from the late Jewish apocalyptic literature has much merit. Thus, in his view, the beast of chs. 13 and 17 is historical Rome, but it is far larger than the ancient city and is also the future Antichrist. The references to the persecution of Christians likewise go far beyond the known historical situation of John's day. Evil at the hands of Rome is realized eschatology.

Much more important than the late Jewish apocalyptic sources is the debt John owes to the eschatological teaching of Jesus, such as the Olivet Discourse (Mt 24–25; Mk 13; Lk 21). The parallelism is striking and certainly not accidental. In the commentary, these connections are dealt with in more detail (see comment on 6:1). These passages form the ultimate source of his understanding of the future and his interpretation of the OT.

2. Unity

The question of the unity of Revelation is a relative one. Almost all scholars recognize a pervading unity of thought in the majority of the material. The evidence that allegedly argues against a single author revolves around a number of internal difficulties, falling into four categories: (1) the presence of doublets (the same scene or vision described twice); (2) sequence problems—i.e., persons or things introduced seemingly for the first time when in fact they had already been mentioned; (3) seeming misplaced verses and larger sections; and (4) distinctive content within certain sections that does not fit the rest of the book. In each case, however, there are satisfying alternative explanations. In fact, the difficulties just named stem more from the reader's presuppositions than from the text itself. We are more likely to discover the author's original intent if we approach Revelation with the assumption of its literary integrity than if we attempt at every turn to judge it by modern Western mentality.

Without belaboring the argument, we may affirm that the book everywhere displays both the literary and conceptual unity to be expected from a single author. This does not eliminate certain difficult hermeneutical problems nor preclude the presence of omissions or interpolations encountered in the extant manuscripts of the book. Nor does the view of single authorship preclude that John, in expressing in written form the revelation given to him by Christ, used various sources, whether oral or written. Yet, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, who is of course the primary author, John has everywhere made these materials his own and involved them with a thoroughly Christian orientation and content.

3. Authorship and Canonicity

The question of the authorship of Revelation is linked with that of the authorship of the Gospel of John and the Johannine letters. Most second- and third-century witnesses ascribe Revelation to John the apostle, the son of Zebedee. Not until Dionysius, the distinguished bishop of Alexandria and student of Origen (d. c. 264), was any voice raised within the church against John as the author. He questioned its apostolic origin because the advocates of an earthly eschatological hope ("Chiliasts"), whom he opposed, appealed to Rev 20. Dionysius based his arguments on comparisons between 1 John and the Gospel of John at points where these differ from Revelation: for example, John and 1 John do not name their author but Revelation does; no reference to Revelation appears in John and 1 John and vice versa; and the Greek of Revelation is faulty and entirely different from that of John and 1 John. Not until Athanasius of Alexandria (d. 373) was the book accepted in the East.

In the West, however, the story was different. From at least the middle of the second century, the book held its own, being widely accepted and listed in all the principal canon enumerations. The Reformation period witnessed a renewal of the earlier questions concerning its apostolic authorship and canonical status. Thus Luther, offended by the contents of Revelation, declared that he regarded it as "neither apostolic nor prophetic." Many modern scholars believe that the John who wrote Revelation is not the same as the author of the Gospel and the three letters. They cite as the chief obstacle the barbarous Greek style of Revelation as compared to that of the other writings of John. However, despite the linguistic problem, a number of other scholars have been convinced of the similarities between Revelation and the other Johannine books. A third group of scholars simply leaves the issue open.

From the internal evidence, the following things can be said about the author with some confidence. (1) He calls himself John (1:4, 9; 22:8). This is not likely a pseudonym but instead the name of a well-known person among the Asian churches. Other than the apostle, John the Baptist, and John Mark, the only John we know about is the disputed "John, the presbyter" that Papias spoke about. (2) This John identifies himself as a prophet (1:3; 22:6–10, 18–19) who was in exile because of his prophetic witness (1:9). As such, he speaks to the churches with great authority. (3) His use of the OT and Targums makes it virtually certain that he was a Palestinian Jew, steeped in the temple and synagogue ritual. He may also have been a priest.

To sum up, the question of authorship is problematic. On the one hand, the language and grammatical style are incompatible with the Gospel and the letters; on the other hand, in imagery, literary forms, liturgical framework, and symbolism, there are notable similarities. Early and widespread testimony attributes the book to the apostle John, and no convincing argument has been advanced against this view. Finally, regardless of the problem of authorship, the church universal has come to acknowledge Revelation as divinely authoritative, inspired Scripture.

4. Date

Only two suggested dates for Revelation have received serious support. An early date, shortly after the reign of Nero (A.D. 54–68), is supported by references in the book to the persecution of Christians, the imperial cult (ch. 13), and the temple (ch. 11), which was destroyed in A.D. 70. The alternate and more generally accepted date rests primarily on the early witness of Irenaeus (c. 185), who stated that the apostle John wrote Revelation at the close of Domitian's reign (A.D. 81–96). Both views appeal to the book's witness to persecution because of refusal to comply with emperor worship. On the other hand, if the persecution referred to in the book is anticipatory, and if the exegesis that sees references to the succession of the emperors (ch. 17) and enforced emperor worship (ch. 13) is questionable, then no substantial argument can be advanced for either date. The question as to when Revelation was written is best left open.

5. Purpose

As a prophet, John is called to separate true belief from false—to expose the failures of the congregations in Asia. He desires to encourage authentic Christian discipleship by explaining Christian suffering and martyrdom in the light of how Jesus' death brought victory over evil. John wants to show that the martyrs would be vindicated (cf. 2:13). He discloses the end both of evil and of those who follow the beast (19:20–21; 20:10, 15), and he describes the ultimate issue of the Lamb's victory and of those who follow him. John is centrally concerned with God's saving purpose and its implementation by Jesus. He writes to the church universal in every age so that they too might join him in confirming this witness of Jesus (1:9; 22:16). Sadly, because of the overemphasis on either the symbolic or the literal and because of theological problems, the church has often been deprived of the valuable practical thrust of this book as through it God seeks to lead us into authentic Christian discipleship.

6. Theological Problems

From earliest times, certain theological emphases in Revelation have been cited as objections to the whole book or to certain parts that are considered unworthy and sub-Christian. Among these are (1) its eschatological view of history, which includes an earthly Millennium (ch. 20); (2) the cry for vengeance in 6:10; and (3) its overuse of visions and symbols. That is, Revelation is alleged to be sub-Christian in its Christology, eschatology, and doctrine of God—all three of which are thought to obscure or to contradict outright the central message of the NT. While none of the above problems should be glossed over, it is becoming apparent that prior commitment to a certain viewpoint on these three areas, rather than some intrinsic incompatibility of John's ideas with the central NT message, often determines the negative judgments passed on Revelation.

7. Interpretative Schemes

Four ways of understanding Rev 4–22 have emerged throughout history. In our day, additional views have developed by combining elements from these four traditions.

a. Futurist

This view is that, with the exception of chs. 1–3, all the visions in Revelation relate to a period immediately preceding and following the second advent of Christ at the end of the age. Therefore, the seals, trumpets, and bowls refer to events still in the future; the beasts of chs. 13 and 17 are identified with the future Antichrist, who will appear at the last moment in world history and will be defeated by Christ in his second coming to judge the world and to establish his earthly millennial kingdom.

Variations of this view were held by some of its earliest expositors, such as Justin Martyr (d. 165), Irenaeus (d. c. 195), and Hippolytus (d. 236). This futurist approach has enjoyed a revival of no small proportion since the nineteenth century and is widely held among evangelicals today. The chief problem with it is that it seems to make all but the first three chapters of Revelation irrelevant to the contemporary church. This objection is pressed more strongly when adherents to the futurist view affirm, as many do today, that the church will be removed from the earth before the events described in 6:1ff. occur.

b. Historicist

As the word implies, this view centers on history and its continuity as seen in Revelation. It started with Joachim of Floris (d. 1202). He assigned a day-year value to the 1,260 days of the Apocalypse. In his scheme, the book was a prophecy of the events of Western history from the times of the apostles (in some varieties, from the Creation) until Joachim's own time. A short time after his death, the Franciscans considered themselves the true Christians of John's vision. They interpreted Babylon not only as pagan Rome

Interpretations of Revelation

	1-3	4-19	20-22
Preterist	Historic churches	Symbolic of contemporary conditions	Symbolic of heaven and victory
Idealist	Historic churches	Symbolic of conflict of good and evil	Victory of good
Historicist	Historic churches	Symbolic of events of history: fall of rome, Mohammedanism, papacy, Reformation	Final judgment, millennium (?), eternal state
Futurist	Historic churches and/or seven stages of church history	Future tribulation; concentrated judgments on apostate church and on antichrist; coming of Christ	Millennial kingdom; judgment of wicked dead; eternal state

Theological Perspectives on Revelation

	1-3	4-19	20-22
Postmillennial	Historic churches	Generally historicist	Victory of Christianity over the world
Amillennial	Historic churches	Generally historicist	Coming of Christ; judgment; eternal state
Premillennial	Historic churches representative of historical stages	Generally futurist	Literal millennial reign; judgment of great white throne; New Jerusalem
Apocalytic	Historic churches	Generally preterist	Symbolic of heaven and victory

Taken from Chronological and Background Charts of the New Testament by Wayne House. Copyright© 1978 by The Zondervan Corporation. Used by permission.

but also as papal Rome. In the various schemes that developed as this method was applied to history, one element became common: the Antichrist and Babylon were connected with Rome and the papacy. Later, Luther, Calvin, and other Reformers came to adopt this view. That this approach does not enjoy much favor today is largely because of the lack of consensus as to the historical identification it entails.

c. Preterist

According to this view, Revelation relates to what happened in the time of the author; it is a contemporary and imminent historical document. Thus the main contents of chs. 4–22 are viewed as describing events wholly limited to John's own time. This approach identifies the book with the Jewish apocalyptic method of producing "tracts for the times" to encourage faithfulness during intense persecution. The beasts of ch. 13 are identified respectively as imperial Rome and the imperial priesthood. This is the view held by a majority of contemporary scholars, not a few of whom are identified with the liberal interpretation of Christianity. As a system, it did not appear till 1614, when a Spanish Jesuit named Alcasar developed its main lines. A variation of this are those who see the events as imminent but not yet realized when John wrote.

d. Idealist

This method of interpreting Revelation sees it as being basically poetic, symbolic, and spiritual in nature. Thus Revelation does not predict any specific historical events at all; on the contrary, it sets forth timeless truths concerning the battle between good and evil that continues throughout the church age. As a system of interpretation, it is more recent than the three other schools and somewhat more difficult to distinguish from the earlier allegorizing approaches of the Alexandrians (e.g., Origen). In general, the idealist view is marked by its refusal to identify any of the images with specific future events, whether in the history of the church or with regard to the end of all things. Undoubtedly, the book does reflect the great timeless realities of the battle between God and Satan and of divine judgment, and it sees history as being ultimately in the hand of the Creator. But certainly it also depicts the consummation of this battle and the triumph of Christ in history through his coming in glory.

Which view is the right one? Since there have been evangelicals who have held to each of the four views, the issue is not that of orthodoxy but of interpretation. In recent years many expositors have combined the stronger elements of the different views. The history of the interpretation of Revelation should teach us to be open to fresh approaches to it, even when this attitude goes contrary to the prevailing interpretations. Nothing short of the careful exegesis of the text uninhibited by prior dogmatic conclusions is required for a full understanding of the Apocalypse.

This commentary will pay close attention to the historical situation of first-century Christianity in its Judeo-Greco-Roman world setting. I do not, however, take the position that this emphasis necessarily leads to the conclusion that John's language and visions describe the political entities of imperial Rome or the imperial priesthood. Thus the preterist and to a lesser extent the preterist-futurist's views are misled. On the other hand, I believe that John is describing the final judgment and the physical, bodily return of Christ to the world. This means that in every age Revelation continues to encourage the church in persecution as well as to warn the church of the beast's satanically energized, multifaceted deception. Its language describes the deeper realities of the conflict of Christ's sovereignty with satanic power rather than the mere temporary historical-political entities, whether past (such as Rome) or future.

8. Use of the Old Testament

While Revelation does not have a single direct quotation from the OT, there are hundreds of places where John alludes in one way or another to the OT Scriptures. The OT he uses is primarily Semitic rather than Greek, agreeing often with Aramaic Targums and occasionally with other Jewish interpretations. From the Prophets, John refers frequently to Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel. John also refers repeatedly to the Psalms, Exodus, and Deuteronomy. Especially important are his christological reinterpretations of OT passages. He does not simply use the OT in its pre-Christian sense but often recasts its images and visions. While there is an unmistakable continuity in Revelation with the older revelation, the new emerges from the old as a distinct entity.

9. Structure

The main contents of Revelation are given in terms of a series of sevens, some explicit, some implied: seven churches (chs. 2–3); seven seals (chs. 6–7); seven trumpets (chs. 8–11); seven signs (chs. 12–15); seven bowls (chs. 16–18); seven last things (chs. 19–22). It is also possible to divide the contents around four key visions: (1) the vision of the Son of man among the seven churches (chs. 1–3); (2) the vision of the seven-sealed scroll, the seven trumpets, the seven signs, and the seven bowls (4:1–19:10); (3) the vision of the return of Christ and the consummation of this age (19:11–20:15); and (4) the vision of the new heaven and new earth (chs. 21–22).

EXPOSITION

I. Introduction (1:1–8)

A. Prologue (1:1–3)

The Prologue contains a description of the nature of the book, a reference to the author, and a statement that the book was meant for congregational reading.

1 The book is called the "revelation of Jesus Christ." "Revelation" (apokalypsis; GK 637) means to expose in full view what was formerly hidden, veiled, or secret. In the NT this word occurs exclusively in the religious sense of a divine disclosure. It may refer either some to present or future aspect of God's will (Lk 2:32; Ro 16:25; Eph 3:5) or to persons (Ro 8:19) or especially to the future unveiling of Jesus Christ at his return in glory (2Th 1:7; 1Pe 1:7, 13). In the only occurrence of this word in John's writings, the meaning is not primarily the appearing or revealing of Christ—though certainly the book does this—but rather the disclosure of "what must soon take place."

The content of the book comes from its author, Jesus Christ. Yet even Christ is not the final author but a mediator, for he receives the revelation from God the Father ("which God gave him to show"). John is the human instrument for communicating what he has seen by the agency of Christ's messenger or angel (cf. 22:6, 8, 16). Through John the revelation is to be made known to the servants of God who comprise the churches (cf. 22:16). Thus there are five links in the chain of authorship: God, Christ, his angel, his servant John, and the servants in the churches.

"What must soon take place" implies that the revelation concerns events that are future (cf. Da 2:28–29, 45; Mk 13:7; Rev 4:1; 22:6). But in what sense can we understand that the events will arise "soon" (GK 5443)? From the preterist point of view (see the introduction), all will take place in John's day. But we do not need to follow this interpretation of the book. In eschatology and apocalyptic literature, the future is always viewed as imminent without the necessity of intervening time (cf. Lk 18:8). "Soon" does not, in other words, preclude delays or intervening events, as Revelation itself suggests. In ch. 6 we hear the cry of the martyred saints: "How long, Sovereign Lord, holy and true, until you . . . avenge our blood?" They are told to "wait a little longer" (vv.10–11). Therefore, "soonness" means imminency in eschatological terms. The church in every age has always lived with the expectancy of the consummation of all things in its day. Imminency describes an event possible any day, impossible no day.

Two more focal points of the book are introduced by the words "by sending his angel to his servant John." (1) They introduce us to the significance of angels in the worship of God, in the revelation of God's Word, and in the execution of his judgments in the earth. John refers to angels sixty-seven times. (2) The word "servant" (GK 1528) is important. All of God's people are known in Revelation as his servants, described as such at least eleven times (e.g., 2:20; 7:3; 22:3). John is one servant selected to receive this revelation and communicate it to other servants of God. "Servant," used throughout the NT to describe those who are designated as the special representatives of the Lord Christ himself, becomes a beautiful title of honor for God's people.

2 Two elements in the book are of chief importance: "The word of God and the testimony of Jesus Christ." In referring to his visions as the "word of God," John emphasizes his continuity with the prophets in the OT as well as the apostles in the NT (see 1:9; 3:8, 10; 6:9; 12:11; 17:17; 19:9; 20:4). In 19:13 Jesus is himself identified with the name "the Word of God." Here, in ch. 1, the reference is not directly to Christ but to the promises and acts of God revealed in this book that are realized through Jesus, the Word of God incarnate (cf. Jn 1:1–2; 1Jn 1:1). The church needs to be reminded that this book is the very Word of God to us. While John's literary activity is evident throughout, he claims that what he presents he actually "saw" in divinely disclosed visions. And in the book God himself bears witness to the readers that these things are not the product of John's own mind (1:1–2; 21:5; 22:6; cf. 2Pe 1:21).

"Testimony" (GK 3456) can mean "witness," "validation," or "verification" (cf. 1:9; 6:9; 12:11, 17; 19:10; 20:4; 22:16–20). While "the testimony of Jesus" can mean John's own testimony about Jesus, here it means the testimony that Jesus himself gives. John testifies both to the Word of God received in the visions and to the validation of his message from Jesus himself.

3 "The one who reads" reflects the early form of worship where a reader read the Scriptures aloud on the Lord's Day. "Those who hear" are the people of the congregation who listen to the reading. "This prophecy" is John's way of describing his writing and refers to the entire book of Revelation (10:11; 19:10; 22:7, 9–10, 18). Prophecy involves not only future events but also the ethical and spiritual exhortations and warnings contained in the writing. Thus John immediately sets off his writing from the late Jewish apocalyptic literature (which did not issue from the prophets) and puts himself on a par with the OT prophets.

The twofold benediction "blessed" (GK 3421), pronounced on the reader and the congregation, emphasizes the importance of the message in that they will be hearing not only the word of John the prophet but the inspired word of Christ (see other beatitudes in 14:13; 16:15; 19:9; 20:6; 22:7, 14). John wrote in anticipation of the full and immediate recognition of his message as worthy to be read in the churches as the Word of God coming from Christ. In the ancient Jewish synagogue tradition in which John was raised, no such blessing was promised on anyone who recited a mere human teaching, even if from a rabbi, while one who read a biblical text was worthy to receive a divine blessing.

All must listen carefully and "take to heart what is written" because "the time [GK 2789] is near," the season for the fulfillment of the return of Christ (v.7; cf. Lk 11:28, 21:8) and for all that is written in this book (cf. 22:10). The season for Christ's return is always imminent—now as it has been from the days of his ascension (Jn 21:22; Ac 1:11).

A comparison of the Prologue (1:1–3) with the Epilogue (22:7–21) shows that John has followed throughout Revelation a deliberate literary pattern. This should alert us to the possibility that the entire book was designed to be heard and interpreted as a single unit, and every part should fit into the message of the book as a whole. This should not in any way detract from the fact that John claims to have seen real visions ("saw," v.2), which we may assume were arranged by John in their particular literary form for purposes of communication.

B. Greetings and Doxology (1:4–8)

John now addresses the recipients of his book: "To the seven churches in the province of Asia" (cf. v. 11; 2:1–3:22). Almost immediately he introduces an expanded form of the Christian trinitarian greeting that merges into a doxology to Christ (vv.5b–6) and is followed by a staccato exclamation calling attention to the return of Christ to the world (v.7). The Father concludes the greeting with assurances of his divine sovereignty.

4 The epistolary form of address immediately distinguishes this book from all other Jewish apocalyptic works. John writes to actual, historical churches, addressing them in the same way the NT letters are addressed. These churches actually existed in the Roman province of Asia (the western part of present-day Turkey). But why did John address these churches and only these seven churches? There were other churches in Asia at the close of the first century. The NT itself refers to congregations at Troas (Ac 20:5–12), Colosse (Col 1:2), and Hierapolis (Col 4:13).

At present it is difficult to say why the Lord selected just these seven churches. Some have suggested that these churches were prophetic of the church ages throughout history. Yet there is no reason from the text itself to hold this view. The churches are simply representative churches found in every age. Seven churches were chosen and were placed in this order because seven was simply the number of completeness, and here it rounds out the literary pattern of the other sevens in the book. These seven churches contained typical or representative qualities of both obedience and disobedience that are a constant reminder throughout every age to all churches (cf. 2:7, 11, 17, 29; 3:6, 13, 22; esp. 2:23). As for the order of their mention (1:11), it is the natural ancient travel circuit beginning at Ephesus and arriving finally at Laodicea (consult a map of the area).

"Grace and peace" are the usual greetings in NT letters: "grace" (GK 5921) represents a traditional Greek greeting, and "peace" (GK 1645; cf. 8934) represents a traditional Hebrew greeting. The source of blessing is described by employing an elaborate triadic formula for the Trinity:

"From him who is, and who was, and who is to come," i.e., the Father;

"From the seven spirits before his throne," i.e., the Holy Spirit;

"From Jesus Christ," i.e., the Son (v.5).

Similarly there follows a threefold reference to the identity and function of Christ: "the faithful witness, the firstborn from the dead, and the ruler of the kings of the earth"; and three indications of his saving work: "who loves us and has freed us from our sins . . . and has made us to be a kingdom and priests."

The descriptive name of the Father occurs nowhere else except in Revelation (4:8; cf. 11:17; 16:5). It is generally understood as a paraphrase for the divine name represented throughout the OT by the Hebrew tetragrammaton YHWH (see comment on Ex 3:14; cf. also Isa 41:4, where the Lord is described as the one "who is to come"). The complete combination of these three tenses occurs in a Palestinian Targum on Dt 32:39. The force of the name has been widely discussed. In 1:8 and 4:8 it is parallel with the divine name "Lord God, the Almighty." The tenses indicate that the same God is eternally present with his covenant people to sustain and encourage them through all the experiences of their lives.

"And from the seven spirits before his throne" seems clearly to focus on the Holy Spirit. But why "seven spirits"? Some understand John to mean the "sevenfold spirit" in his fullness (see NIV note). Borrowing from the imagery of Zec 4, where the ancient prophet sees a lampstand with seven bowls supplied with oil from two nearby olive trees, John seems to connect the church ("lampstands" [v.20]) to the ministry of the Holy Spirit (3:1; 4:5; 5:6). The "seven spirits" represent the activity of the risen Christ through the Holy Spirit in and to the seven churches. This figure brings great encouragement to the churches, for it is "'not by might nor by power, but by my Spirit,' says the LORD Almighty" (Zec 4:6), that the churches serve God. Yet the figure is also a sobering one because the history of each church (chs. 2–3) is an unfolding of that church's response to the Holy Spirit—"He who has an ear, let him hear what the Spirit says to the churches" (2:7, 11, et al.).

5 Finally, greetings come from the Son—"from Jesus Christ." John immediately adds three descriptive epithets about Christ and a burst of doxology to him. (1) He is the "faithful witness." His credibility is proved by his earthly life of obedience in the past; it is proved in the present by his witness to the true condition of the churches; and it will be proved in the future by the consummation of all things in him. In the past he was loyal to the point of death (cf. Jn 7:7; 18:37; Php 2:8; 1Ti 6:13), as was his servant Antipas (2:13). That Christ was a reliable witness to God's kingdom and salvation—even to the point of suffering death at the hands of the religious-political establishment of his day—is an encouragement to his servants who also are expected to be loyal to him, even to their death (2:10).

(2) The fact that he is "the firstborn from the dead" brings further encouragement. As Christ gave his life in faithfulness to the Father's calling, so the Father has raised Christ from the dead, pledging him as the first of a great company who will follow (cf. 7:13–14). John nowhere else refers to Christ as the "firstborn" (GK 4758), though Paul uses it in Ro 8:29; Col 1:15, 18 (cf. also Heb 1:6). In Col 1:18, this same expression is associated with words of supreme authority or origin such as "head," "beginning," and "supremacy." In Col 1:15 Paul refers to Christ as the "firstborn over all creation," meaning that he is the source, ruler, or origin of all creation (see comment on that verse). So for Christ to be the "firstborn" of the dead signifies not merely that he was first in time to be raised from the dead but also that he was first in importance, having supreme authority over the dead (cf. 1:18).

(3) "The ruler of the kings of the earth" virtually connects John's thought with Ps 89. Christ's rulership of the world is a key theme of John (11:15; 17:15; 19:16). Who are the "kings of the earth"? John could mean emperors such as Nero and Domitian, territorial rulers such as Pilate and Herod, and their successors. In that case John was affirming that even though Jesus is not physically present and the earthly monarchs appear to rule, in reality it is he, not they, who rules over all (6:15; 17:2). Another approach holds that Jesus rules over the defeated foes of believers, e.g., Satan, the dragon, sin, and death (1:18). A third possibility sees believers as "the kings of the earth" (2:26–27; 3:21; cf. 11:6); in the immediate context John refers to Christ's redeeming activity, and in v.6 he refers to believers as a "kingdom." All three ideas are true; so it is difficult to decide which was uppermost in John's mind. We should be careful, however, not to read into the term "king" our own power concepts but to allow the biblical images to predominate.

The mention of the person and offices of Christ leads John to a burst of praise to his Savior: "To him who loves us . . . be glory and power." In the present, Christ is loving us. Through all the immediate distresses, persecutions, and even banishment, John is convinced that believers are experiencing Christ's continual care. Moreover, in the past Christ's love was unmistakably revealed in his atoning death, by which he purchased our release from the captivity of sin. Christ's kingly power is chiefly revealed in his ability to transform individual lives through his "blood" (i.e., his death; cf. 5:9; 7:14). Through his death on the cross, he defeated the devil; those who follow Christ in the battle against the devil share his victory (12:11).

6 This transformation simultaneously involves the induction of blood-freed sinners into Christ's "kingdom" and priesthood. Of Israel it was said that they would be a "kingdom of priests and a holy nation" (Ex 19:6; cf. Isa 61:6). As Israel of old was redeemed through the Red Sea and was called to be a kingdom under God and a nation of priests to serve him, so John sees the Christian community as the continuation of the OT people of God, redeemed by Christ's blood and made heirs of his future kingly rule on the earth (5:10; 20:6). Furthermore, all believers are called to be priests in the sense of offering spiritual sacrifices and praise to God (Heb 13:15; 1Pe 2:5). While John sees the church as a kingdom, this does not mean that it is identical with the kingdom of God. Nor do the new people of God replace the ancient Jewish people in the purpose of God (cf. Ro 11:28–29).

7 What Christ will do in the future is summed up in the dramatic cry: "Look, he is coming"—a clear reference to his return (22:7, 12, 20). The preceding affirmation of Christ's rulership over the earth's kings and the Christians' share in the messianic kingdom leads to tension between the believers' actual present condition of oppression and suffering and what seems to be implied in their royal and priestly status. So the divine promise of Christ's return is given by the Father, and the response of the prophet and congregation follows in the words "So shall it be! Amen." Or we might think of Christ as saying, "So shall it be!" and the prophet and the congregation responding, "Amen" (cf. 22:20). The promise combines Da 7:13 with Zec 12:10. Daniel 7 provides a key focus for John throughout the whole book (there are no fewer than thirty-one allusions to it).

Christ's coming will be supernatural ("with the clouds") and in some manner open and known to all ("every eye"), even to those who put him to death. "Those who pierced him" might be those historically responsible for his death (e.g., Pilate, Annas, and Caiaphas) and the Jewish leaders of the Sanhedrin who pronounced him guilty. Yet, when he comes, there will be mourning among "all the peoples of the earth." From the NT point of view, Pilate, Annas, Caiaphas, and the others were acting as representatives for all humankind in crucifying Jesus. Thus the mourning mentioned here is probably that which results from the judgment Christ brings upon "all the peoples of the earth."

8 Such a stupendous promise requires more than the prophet's own signature or even Christ's "Amen." God himself speaks and, with his own signature, vouches for the truthfulness of the coming of Christ. Of the many names of God that reveal his character and memorialize his deeds, there are four strong ones in this verse. (1) "Alpha and Omega" are the first and last letters of the Greek alphabet. Their mention here is similar to the "First" and "Last" in v.17 and is further heightened by the "Beginning" and the "End" in 21:6 and 22:13. Only this book refers to God as the "Alpha and the Omega." (2) He is the absolute source of all creation and history, and nothing lies outside him. Thus he is the "Lord God" of all. (3) He is the one "who is, and who was, and who is to come" (see comment on v.4). (4) He is continually present to his people as the "Almighty" (lit., "the one who has his hand on everything"; GK 4120; cf. 4:8; 11:17; 15:3; 16:7, 14; 19:6, 15; 21:22; 2Co 6:18).

II. Vision of the Son of Man Among the Seven Churches of Asia (1:9–3:22)

A. The Son of Man Among the Lampstands (1:9–20)

1. Introduction and voice (1:9–11)

9 This verse begins a third introduction in which the author again identifies himself as John and adds significant information about where and when the visions took place together with their divinely appointed destination. John stresses his intimate identification with the Asian Christians and the reason for his presence on Patmos.

Patmos lies about thirty-seven miles west-southwest of Miletus, in the Icarian Sea. Consisting mainly of volcanic hills and rocky ground, it is about ten miles long and six miles wide at the north end; it was used for Roman penal purposes. It was "because of the word of God and the testimony of Jesus" that John was on Patmos (cf. 1:2; 6:9; 20:4). He was not there to preach that Word but because of religious-political opposition to his Christian faith.

John sees his plight as part of God's design and says he is a partner with the Asian Christians in three things. (1) Both share with Christ and one another the "suffering" (GK 2568) or agony that comes because of faithfulness to Christ as the only true Lord and God (Jn 16:33; Ac 14:22; Col 1:24; 2Ti 3:12). (2) They also share with Christ in his "kingdom" (i.e., his power and rule; GK 993). In one sense they already reign (1:6), though through suffering. Yet, in another sense, they will reign with Christ in the eschatological manifestation of his kingdom (20:4, 6; 22:5). (3) The present hidden rule of Christ and his followers is manifested through their "patient endurance" (GK 5705). As they look beyond their immediate distresses and put full confidence in Christ, they share now in his royal dignity and power. Whether those distresses were imprisonment, ostracism, slander, economic discrimination, hostility, disruption of the churches by false prophets, and the constant threat of death from mob violence or judicial action, believers are to realize their present kingship with Christ in their faithful endurance. Such endurance produces conflict with the powers of the world, and it calls for long-suffering as the mark of Christ's kingship in their lives (2:2, 19; 3:10; 13:10; 14:12; cf. Lk 8:15; 21:19; Ro 2:7; Col 1:11; et al.). Christ uses suffering to test and purify the loyalty of his servants. His strength is revealed through their weakness (2Co 12:9).

10 "I was in the Spirit" describes John's experience on Patmos. The words imply being transported into the world of prophetic visions by the Spirit of God (4:2; 17:3; 21:10; cf. Eze 3:12, 14; 37:1; Ac 22:17). At least the first vision—if not this whole book—was revealed on "the Lord's [GK 3258] Day." Since this is the only place in the NT where this expression is used, its identification is difficult. Some feel that John was transported into the great future day of the Lord, but John nowhere uses the common expression "the day of the Lord." Most commentators, both ancient and modern, have taken the expression to mean Sunday, the first day of the week. This usage occurs early in the apostolic fathers. Tendencies toward recognizing Sunday as a day designated by Christ to celebrate his redemption occur even earlier in the NT (Ac 20:7; 1Co 16:2). Such a reference would bind the exiled apostle to the worshiping churches in Asia through his longing to be with them on Sunday. More specifically, John may have had an Easter Sunday in mind.

11 The "voice" (GK 5889) John heard could be Christ's or, more likely, that of the angel who appears frequently to John (4:1; 5:2). What John sees (both visions and words), he is to write down in a papyrus scroll and send to the seven Asian churches (v.4). This writing would include the substance of the whole book, not just the first vision.

2. The sight of the vision (1:12–20)

Certain important literary features of John's first vision are noted. (1) Beginning with v.12, the vision extends as a unit through ch. 3. The quotation that begins in v.17 is not closed till the end of ch. 3.

(2) This introductory section (1:12–20) can be divided into two sections—the sevenfold features in the description of the glorified Christ (vv.12–16) and the address to John (vv.17–20).

(3) In this symbolic picture the glorified Lord is seen in his inner reality that transcends his outward appearance. The sword coming out of his mouth (v.16) alerts us to this. In words drawn almost entirely from imagery used in Daniel, Ezekiel, and Isaiah of God's majesty and power, John uses hyperbole to describe the indescribable reality of the glorified Christ. These same poetic phrases reappear in the letters to the churches in chs. 2–3 as well as throughout the rest of the book (see 14:2; 19:6, 12, 15).

(4) The words of Christ substantiate his absolute authority to address the churches, and the vision (vv.12–16) leads to John's transformed understanding of Jesus as the Lord of all through his death and resurrection (vv.17–18).

12 For the OT tabernacle, Moses constructed a seven-branched lampstand (Ex 25:31ff.). Subsequently this lampstand symbolized Israel. Another golden seven-branched lampstand appears in a vision of Zechariah; it was fed by seven pipes and was explained to him as the "eyes of the LORD, which range through the earth" (Zec 4:10). Thus the lampstand relates directly to the Lord himself. Since other allusions to Zechariah's vision of the lampstand appear in the Revelation—e.g., "seven eyes, which are the seven spirits of God" (Rev 5:6) and the "two witnesses" that are "the two olive trees" (11:3-4), it is logical to assume here a connection with that vision as well.

But there are problems in any strict identification. In v.20 Christ tells John that the "seven lampstands are the seven churches," and in 2:5 that it is possible to lose one's place as a lampstand through a failure to repent. Thus, the imagery represents the individual churches scattered among the nations—churches that bear the light of the divine revelation of the gospel of Christ to the world (Mt 5:14). If Zechariah's imagery was in John's mind, it might mean that the churches, which correspond to the people of God today, are light bearers only because of their intimate connection with Christ, the source of the light, through the power of the Holy Spirit (1:4b; 3:1; 4:5; 5:6).

13 Evidently the words "someone 'like a son of man'" are to be understood in connection with Da 7:13 as a reference to the heavenly Messiah who is also human. Jesus preferred the title "Son of Man" for himself throughout his earthly ministry, though he did not deny, on occasion, the appropriate use of "Son of God" as well (Jn 10:36; cf. Mk 14:61). Both titles are nearly identical terms for the Messiah. The early church, however, rarely used the title "Son of Man" for Jesus, except when there was some special connection between the suffering of believers and Christ's suffering and glory (e.g., Ac 7:56; Rev 14:14).

"Dressed in a robe" begins the sevenfold description of the Son of Man. This vision creates an impression of the whole rather than of particular abstract concepts. John saw Christ as the divine Son of God in the fullest sense of that term. He also saw him as fulfilling the OT descriptions of the coming Messiah by using terms drawn from the OT imagery of divine wisdom, power, steadfastness, and penetrating vision. The long robe and golden sash were worn by the priests in the OT (Ex 28:4) and may here signify Christ as the great High Priest to the churches in fulfillment of the OT Aaronic priesthood, or, less specifically, it may indicate his dignity and divine authority (Eze 9:2, 11).

14 In an apparent allusion to Daniel, Christ's head and hair are described as "white like wool, as white as snow" (Da 7:9; cf. 10:5). For John, the same functions of ruler and judge ascribed to the "Ancient of Days" in Daniel's vision relate to Jesus. In Eastern countries, white hair commands respect and indicates the wisdom of years. This part of the vision may have shown John something of the deity and wisdom of Christ (cf. Col. 2:3). Christ's eyes were like a "blazing fire," a detail not found in Da 7 but occurring in Da 10:6. This simile is repeated in the letter to Thyatira (2:18) and in the vision of Christ's triumphant return and defeat of his enemies (19:12). It may portray either his penetrating scrutiny or fierce judgment.

15 The Son of Man's feet appeared like shining bronze (cf. 2:18), as if it were fired to white heat in a kiln (cf. a similar figure of glowing metal in Eze 1:13, 27; 8:2; Da 10:6). In both Ezekiel and Daniel the brightness of shining metal like fire is one of the symbols connected with the appearance of the glory of God. This image may represent Christ's triumphant judgment (i.e., his trampling down) of unbelievers.

"His voice . . . like the sound of rushing [lit., many; GK 4498] waters" (cf. 14:2; 19:6) describes the glory and majesty of God in a way similar to that which Ezekiel heard (Eze 1:24; 43:2). Anyone who has heard the awe-inspiring sound of a Niagara or Victoria Falls cannot but appreciate this image of God's power and sovereignty (Ps 93:4).

16 "In his right hand he held seven stars." The right hand is the place of power and safety, and the "seven stars" Christ held in it are identified with the seven angels of the seven churches in Asia (v.20). This is the only detail in the vision that is identified. The seven angels are those to whom the letters to the seven churches are addressed (chs. 2–3). Stars are associated in the OT and in Revelation with angels (Job 38:7; Rev 9:1) or faithful witnesses to God (Da 12:3). The letter to Ephesus includes in its introduction a reference to the seven stars (2:1), and in 3:1 they are associated closely with the "seven spirits of God."

John sees a "sharp double-edged sword" going forth from the mouth of Christ. The metaphor of a sword coming from the mouth is important for three reasons: (1) John refers to this characteristic of Christ several times (1:16; 2:12, 16; 19:15, 21); (2) he uses a rare word for "sword" (GK 4855), one found only once outside Revelation (Lk 2:35); and (3) there is no scriptural parallel to the expression except in Isa 11:4, where it is said that the Messiah will "strike the earth with the rod of his mouth" and "with the breath of his lips he will slay the wicked."

The sword is both a weapon and a symbol of war, oppression, and political authority. But John intends a startling difference in the function of this sword, since it proceeds from the mouth of Christ rather than being wielded in his hand. Christ will overtake the Nicolaitans at Pergamum and make war with them by the sword of his mouth (2:12, 16). He will strike down the rebellious at his coming with such a sword (19:15, 21). The figure points definitely to divine judgment, but not to the type of power wielded by the nations. Christ conquers the world through his death and resurrection, and the sword is his faithful witness to God's saving purposes. The weapons of his followers are loyalty, truthfulness, and righteousness (19:8, 14).

Finally, the face of Christ is likened to "the sun shining in all its brilliance." This is a simile of Christ's divine glory, preeminence, and victory (Mt 13:43; 17:2; cf. Rev 10:1).

17–18 These verses identify Christ to John and connect the vision of the glorified Christ (vv. 13–16) with his existence in history. The vision is seen in the light of the Eternal One who identifies himself in these verses. "I fell at his feet as though dead" indicates that John saw a supernatural being and was stricken with trembling and fear, as had prophets before him (Eze 1:28; Da 8:17; 10:9). Immediately Christ placed his hand on John and assured him that he would not die: "Do not be afraid" (cf. 2:10; 19:10, 22:8; cf. Mt 17:6–7). The title "the First and the Last," which belongs to God in Isa 44:6 and 48:12 (where it means that he alone is God, the absolute Lord of history and the Creator), shows that in John's Christology, Christ is identified with the Deity.

Christ is also "the Living One" in that he, like God, never changes. Probably this expression is a further elaboration of what it means to be "the First and the Last," i.e., he alone of all the gods can speak and act in the world (Jos 3:10; 1Sa 17:26; Ps 42:2; Rev 7:2). These divine qualities of his person are now linked to his earthly existence in first-century Palestine—"I was dead, and behold I am alive for ever and ever!" John's view of Jesus and his kingdom revolves around the Cross and the Resurrection, i.e., around atonement theology—an interpretation that sets the tone for all the visions that follow.

It was through Jesus' suffering, death, and resurrection that he won the right to have the "keys of death and Hades." Keys grant the holder access to interiors and their contents, and in ancient times the wearing of large keys was a mark of status in the community (cf. 3:7; 9:1; 20:1; 21:25). "Hades" (GK 87) translates the Hebrew term Sheol ("death" or "grave"; GK 8619) almost everywhere in the LXX. In the NT the word has a twofold usage: in some cases it denotes the place of all the departed dead (Ac 2:27, 31); in others, it refers to the place of the departed wicked (Lk 16:23; Rev 20:13–14). Since Christ alone has conquered death and has himself come out of Hades, he alone can determine who will enter death and Hades and who will come out of them. He has the "keys." For the Christian, death can only be seen as the servant of Christ.

19 John is told to "write, therefore, what you have seen." This verse faces us with an important exegetical problem concerning the sense of the words and the relationship of the three clauses: "what you have seen, what is now and what will take place later." Does Christ give John a chronological outline as a key to the visions in the book? Many think he does. If so, are there three divisions: "seen," "now," and "later"? Or are there two: "seen," i.e., "now" and "later"? In the latter case, where does the chronological break take place in the book? For others, v.19 simply gives a general statement of the contents of all the visions throughout the book as containing a mixture of the "now" and the "later."

While no general agreement prevails, the key to the problem may lie in the middle term "what is now" (lit., "which [things] are"). There are two possibilities. (1) The verb can be taken temporally ("now"), as NIV has done. This would refer to things that were present in John's day, e.g., matters discussed in the letters to the churches (chs. 2–3). (2) The verb can be taken in the sense of "what things mean." This explanation agrees with John's usage of the verb "to be" throughout the book (cf. v.20; 4:5; 5:6, 8; 7:14; 17:12, 15). "What they are [mean]" is then immediately given in the next verse, i.e., the explanation of the mystery of the lamps and stars.

Most commentators understand the phrase "what you have seen" as referring to the first vision (1:12–16); but it may refer to the whole book as the expression "what you see" in v.11 does. In this case the translation could be either "what you saw, both the things that are and the things that will occur afterward," or "what you saw, both what it means and what will occur afterward." "What will take place later" clearly refers to the future, but to the future of what? Some have taken the similar but not identical phrase in 4:1 to mean the same as here and have rendered it "what shall take place after these present things," i.e., after the things relating to the seven churches (chs. 2–3). This results in either the historicist view of chs. 4–22 or the futurist view of them. But if the future is simply the future visions given to John after this initial vision, then the statement has little significance in indicating chronological sequence in the book. While v.19 may provide a helpful key to the book's plan, on careful analysis it by no means gives us a clear key to it.

In my understanding, John is being told here to write down a description of the vision of Christ that he has just seen, what it means, and what he will see afterward—i.e., not the end-time things, but the things revealed later to him. Whether these other things are wholly future, wholly present, or both future and present depends on the content of the vision.

20 The first vision is called a "mystery" (GK 3696). In the NT a "mystery" is something formerly secret but now revealed or identified (cf. John's identification of the "mystery" of the harlot in ch. 17 as the "great city" that rules over the kings of the earth).

The seven stars represent the "angels of the seven churches." Who are these angels? There is no totally satisfactory answer to this question. "Angels" (GK 34) occurs sixty-seven times in Revelation, and in every other instance it refers to heavenly messengers, though occasionally in the NT it can mean a human messenger (Lk 7:24; 9:52; Jas 2:25). A strong objection to the human messenger sense here is the fact that the word is not used that way anywhere else in apocalyptic literature. John's reference should thus be understood as the heavenly messengers who have been entrusted by Christ with responsibility over the churches and yet who are so closely identified with them that the letters are addressed at the same time to these "messengers" and to the congregation (cf. the plural form in 2:10, 13, 23–24).

Whatever may be the correct identification of the angels, the emphasis rests on Christ's immediate presence and communication through the Spirit to the churches (cf. the link of "stars" in 3:1 with the seven spirits of God). In some sense, the reference to angels in the churches shows that the churches are more than a gathering of mere individuals or a social institution; they have a corporate and heavenly character (cf. 1Co 11:10; Eph 3:10; Heb 1:14). That the "seven lampstands are the seven churches" not only shows that the churches are the earthly counterpart of the stars but links the vision of Christ with his authority to rule and judge his churches.

B. The Letters to the Seven Churches (2:1–3:22)

The letters are more in the nature of messages than letters. Each message to an individual church was apparently also intended for the other six churches (2:7, 11, 17, etc., esp. 2:23). By reading and comparing the similar components of the letters, one may gain a fuller insight into the messages. Each message generally follows a common literary plan consisting of seven parts:

(1) The addressee is first given in a set pattern: "To the angel of the church in Ephesus write," etc. (for the location of these seven churches, see map at 1Pe 1).

(2) Then the speaker is mentioned; in each case some part of the great vision of Christ in 1:12–20 is repeated; e.g., "him who holds the seven stars in his right hand and walks among the seven golden lampstands" (2:1). This identification is preceded with the significant declaration "These are the words of him"—a declaration strongly reminiscent of the OT formula for introducing the words of God to Israel.

(3) Next, the knowledge of the speaker is given. His is a divine knowledge. He knows intimately the works of the churches and the reality of their loyalty to him, despite outward appearances. Each congregation's total life is measured against the standard of Christ's life and the works they have embraced. The churches have varying degrees of positive and negative things said about them. The enemy of the churches is Satan, who seeks to undermine the churches' loyalty to Christ (2:10, 24).

(4) Following his assessment of the accomplishments of the churches, the speaker pronounces his verdict on their condition in such words as "You have forsaken your first love" (2:4), or "You are dead" (3:1). Two letters contain no unfavorable verdict (Smyrna, Philadelphia) and two no word of commendation (Sardis, Laodicea); yet since all seven letters would be sent to each church together with the entire book of Revelation (cf. 1:11), we may assume that Christ intended all the churches to hear words of both commendation and blame. In the letters all derelictions are viewed as forms of inner betrayals of a prior relationship to Christ. Each congregation is responsible as a congregation for its individual members and for its leaders; each leader and each individual believer is at the same time fully responsible for himself and for the congregation. This responsibility especially involves the problem of self-deception concerning good and evil, the true and the false, in situations where they are easily confused. The evil appears under the cloak of good; the good appears as apparent evil. Christ's verdict sets before each church the true criteria for leading it out of self-deception into the truth.

(5) To correct or alert each congregation, Jesus issues a penetrating command. These commands further expose the exact nature of the self-deception involved. We are mistaken if we believe that the churches readily identified the heretics and heresies involved in Christ's descriptions. Because they were deceptions, they would not easily be identified; thus, there is the use of OT figures such as Balaam, Jezebel, etc., to alert the churches to the deceptiveness of the error. The greater the evil, the more deceptive the cloak. The thrust of the commands is not in the direction of consolation for persecuted churches. It is rather the opposite—namely, that John, like Jesus, was concerned to bring not peace but a sword.

(6) Each letter contains the general exhortation "he who has an ear, let him hear what the Spirit says to the churches" (e.g., 2:7); only its position in the letter is variable. The words of the Spirit are the words of Christ (cf. 19:10). The commands of Christ in the letters, being somewhat ambiguous, require the individual and the congregation to listen also to the Spirit's voice if they are truly to realize the victory he considers appropriate for them. The exhortations provide warnings about apathy as well as words of challenge and encouragement. By the Spirit's continual relevance these words transcend time limitation and speak to all the churches in every generation.

(7) Finally, each letter contains a victor's promise of reward. These promises are often the most metaphorical and symbolic portions of the letters and thus in some cases present interpretative difficulties. Each is eschatological and is correlated with chs. 21–22. For example, "the right to eat from the tree of life" (2:7) is parallel to "the tree of life" in 22:2; protection from "the second death" (2:11) finds its counterpart in "no more death" (21:4), etc. Furthermore, the promises are echoes of Ge 2–3: what was lost originally by Adam in Eden is more than regained in Christ. The expression "I will give" or "I will make" identifies Christ as the absolute source of every gift. We should probably understand the multiple promises as different facets that combine to make up one great promise to believers: wherever Christ is, there will the overcomers be. Who are these "overcomers"? Certainly it is those who are fully loyal to Christ as his true disciples. One should compare those who do not overcome in 21:8 with those referred to in the letters, e.g., the "cowardly" (2:10, 13), the "sexually immoral" (2:14, 20), the "idolaters" (2:14, 20), and the "liars" (2:2, 9, 20; 3:9).

1. To Ephesus (2:1--7)

The church at Ephesus is addressed in the first letter. Ephesus was a crossroads of civilization. Politically, it had become the de facto capital of the province of Asia; it was known as "Supreme Metropolis of Asia." The Roman governor resided there. It was a "free" city, i.e., self-governed. Located on the western coast of Asia Minor at the convergence of three great highways, Ephesus was the trade center of the area.

Religiously, Ephesus was the center for the worship of the fertility "bee" goddess known to the Greeks as "Artemis" or to the Romans as "Diana" (Ac 19:23ff.). The temple with its statue of Artemis was one of the wonders of the ancient world. Thousands of priests and priestesses were involved in her service, many of which were dedicated to cult prostitution. The temple also served as a great bank for kings and merchants, as well as an asylum for fleeing criminals. To what extent the temple phenomena contributed to the general moral deterioration of the population cannot be assessed, but one of Ephesus's own citizens, the philosopher Heraclitus, said that the inhabitants of the city lived lives of terrible uncleanness. The church at Ephesus was probably founded jointly by Aquila, Priscilla, and (later) Paul (Ac 18:18–19; 19:1–10). Because the Ephesians were cosmopolitan and transient and because the city had a history of cultural-political change, these factors may have influenced the apostasy of the congregation at Ephesus from its first love (cf. 2:4).

1 The speaker identifies himself by a reference to the vision of ch. 1: "Him who holds the seven stars in his right hand" (cf. 1:16). These words strike both a note of reassurance, signaling Christ's strong protection, and control of the church. On the other hand, there is a note of warning in the description of Christ as the one who "walks [travels] among the seven golden lampstands," since he may journey to Ephesus to remove their lampstand (2:5).

2–3 The speaker's knowledge includes awareness of their activity, of their discernment of evil, and of their patient suffering. Their "deeds," their "hard work" (GK 3160), and their "perseverance" (GK 5705) are underlined by the phrase "you have . . . endured hardships for my name, and have not grown weary" (v.3). The Ephesian Christians did not lack serious activity, even to the point of suffering for Christ's name. Paul attributes the same threefold activity to the Thessalonians and there adds to each quality its motivating source: "faith," "love," and "hope" (1Th 1:3).

Persecution of the Christians at Ephesus began in Ac 20, when a riot was instigated by Demetrius and the silversmiths, whose business was making images of the goddess Artemis (her temple stands in the foreground). But by the late first century the Ephesians had lost their first love.

Christ also knows that doctrinal discrimination accompanies the toil and patience of the Ephesians: they "cannot tolerate wicked men." These were not the pagans in Ephesus but false brethren who "claim to be apostles but are not." It is not easy, however, to determine precisely who these people were, what they taught, or how the church tested them. An "apostle" (GK 693) is one who is sent as a representative of another and bears the full authority of the sender. The word is applied first in the NT to the original circle of the Twelve (Mk 3:14; Ac 1:2, 26), who had a special place historically in the foundation of the church (Eph 2:20; Rev 21:14). But the NT further broadens this original circle to include others such as Paul (Gal 1:1), Barnabas (Ac 14:14), James the brother of Jesus (Gal 1:19), and still others (cf. Ro 16:7). The name was applied to those who were authentically and specially called by Christ to be his authoritative spokesmen.

Miracles were the signs of apostolic authority (2Co 12:12; Heb 2:4), but miracles may also accompany false prophets (Mk 13:22; 2Th 2:9; 2Ti 3:8; Rev 13:13–14). Thus it was necessary to "test the spirits to see whether they are from God" (1Jn 4:1). Beyond their denial of Jesus as Lord, such apostles also sought selfish advantage through their claims (2Co 11:5, 13; 12:11).

As to whether the authoritative function of apostles continued after the first century, the writings of the Apostolic Fathers are instructive. In no case do their references to apostles relate to any recognized apostles other than those associated with the NT. They apparently understood the special apostolic function to have ceased with the end of the apostolic era.

About fifteen years after John's writing of Revelation, Ignatius wrote to the church of Ephesus and commended them for refusing to give a home to any heresy. Thyatira had failed (2:20ff.), but the Ephesians had won the victory over false teachers. They had heeded Paul's earlier warning (Ac 20:28–30).

4 The speaker's verdict shows, on the other hand, that however much had been gained at Ephesus by resisting the false apostles, not all was well there. They had "forsaken" or "let go" (GK 918) their "first love." This was a serious defect. If uncorrected, it would result in their loss of light-bearing (v.5). The majority of commentators take the first love to refer to the original Christian love the Ephesians had for one another. Paul's exhortation to the Ephesian elders to "help the weak" (Ac 20:35) and the warm commendation he gives them in their early years for their fervent love of one another (Eph 1:15) may lend support to this view. Other commentators, however, see the "first love" as a reference to their inner devotion to Christ that characterized their earlier commitment, like the love of a newly wedded bride for her husband (cf. Eph 5:22ff.). This interpretation is supported by the fact that the letters to the other churches reveal problems of inner betrayal to Christ as subjects of his complaint. Neither view necessarily eliminates the other. Loving devotion to Christ can be lost in the midst of active service, and certainly no amount of orthodoxy can be a substitute for a failure to love one another. "First" (GK 4755) love suggests that they still loved, but with a quality and intensity unlike that of their initial love.

5 The speaker's command further exposes the problem and offers a way to correct the fault. The imperatives are instructive: "Remember . . . repent . . . do." The Ephesians are to reflect on their earlier works of fervent love, to ponder how far they have fallen from their former devotion and enthusiasm, to humbly "repent" (GK 3566) before God, and to do their former works motivated by love. These imperatives are all part of a single action designed to keep the Ephesians from the judgment of Christ, which would effectively remove them as his representatives in the world.

How many churches today stand at this same crossroads? Do we sense the importance to Christ of not only honoring his name by our true confession but also of reflecting his life by our loving relationship to others? This threat of loss of light bearing applies equally to the other four churches to whom a similar exhortation to "repent" is given (Pergamum, Thyatira, Sardis, and Laodicea).

6 Christ adds a further commendation concerning the Ephesians' hatred of the practices of the Nicolaitans (cf. 2:15)—a hatred directed at the practices of these people, not the people themselves (cf. Ps 139:21). It is difficult to determine exactly who the Nicolaitans were and what they taught. Etymologically the name means "to conquer the people." Did they call themselves by this name, or is it a derogatory title Christ applied to them? The close association of the name with the Balaamites in vv.14–15 (see comments) may suggest either identity with this group or similarity to their teachings.

Information about the Nicolaitans is limited, ambiguous, and based on John's references here in Revelation. Irenaeus claims that John wrote his Gospel to thwart the teaching of the Gnostic Cerinthus whose error was similar to the earlier offshoot of the same kind of teaching known as Nicolaitanism. Eusebius mentions that the Nicolaitans lasted only a short time. Seeing the sect as a heresy would agree with the references in vv.14, 20, which warn against mixing Christian faith with idolatry and cult prostitution. The Nicolaitans claimed to have insight into the divine or, more probably, into the demonic. They lived immoral lives, which allowed them to become part of the syncretism of pagan society and to participate in the Roman civil religion. Others understand the Nicolaitans as Christians who still showed devotion to the emperor by burning incense to his image.

7 On the general exhortation and the meaning of "overcomes" (GK 3771), see introductory comments on 2:1–3:22. The overcomer is promised access to the "tree of life, which is in the paradise of God." The "tree of life" is first mentioned in Ge 2:9 as one of the many trees given to Adam and Eve for food and was off-limits after their fall into sin (Ge 3:22, 24). It is last mentioned in Rev 22:2, 19, where it conveys symbolically the truth of eternal life. Those at Ephesus who truly follow Christ in deep devotion and thus experience the real victory of Christ will share the gift of eternal life that he alone gives.

Rabbinic and Jewish apocalyptic works mention that the glorious age of the Messiah would be a restoration to Edenic conditions before the Fall (see also Isa 51:3; Eze 36:35; cf. Eze 28:13; 31:8–9). Jewish thought joined the concepts of the renewed city of God, the tree of life, and the paradise of God. "Paradise" (GK 4137) is a Persian loan word meaning "a park" or "a garden." The LXX uses it to translate the Hebrew expression the "garden" of Eden (Ge 2:8–10). John seems to reinterpret the Jewish idea of Paradise. Jesus Christ is the restorer of the lost Paradise (22:1–4, 14), and he gives access to the tree of life. Paradise means to be in fellowship with him rather than the idea of a hidden paradise with its fantastic sensual delights.

2. To Smyrna (2:8–11)

Smyrna lay forty miles almost due north of Ephesus. The city was exceptionally beautiful and large and ranked with Ephesus and Pergamum as "First of Asia." Known as the birthplace of Homer, it was also an important seaport that commanded the mouth of the Hermus River. Smyrna was a wealthy city where learning, especially in the sciences and medicine, flourished. It repeatedly sided with Rome in different periods of her history, and thus earned special privileges as a free city.

Smyrna was also a center of the emperor worship, having won the privilege from the Roman Senate in A.D. 23 (over eleven other cities) of building the first temple in honor of Tiberius. Under Domitian (A.D. 81–96) emperor worship became compulsory for every Roman citizen on threat of death. Such an act was probably considered more as an expression of political loyalty than religious worship, and all a citizen had to do was burn a pinch of incense and say "Caesar is Lord." Yet most Christians, with their confession "Jesus is Lord" (cf. Ro 10:9), refused to do this. Perhaps nowhere was life for a Christian more perilous than in this city of zealous emperor worship. There was a modern-day parallel to this predicament when the Japanese occupied Korea in 1937–40 and ordered Christians to worship at their Shinto shrines. Many Christians refused and were imprisoned and tortured. Concerning the founding of the Smyrna church, we have no information other than in this letter.

8 The speaker identifies himself as "him who is the First and the Last, who died and came to life again" (cf. comments on 1:17–18). The "First and Last" might remind those suffering persecution and rejection from their countrymen (vv.9–10) that the one they belonged to is the Lord of history and the Creator. He is in control regardless of appearances of evil. This term may allude by contrast to Smyrna's claim to be the "first" of Asia in beauty and emperor loyalty, whereas Christians at Smyrna were concerned with him who was truly first in everything.

He who is "the First and the Last" is also the one "who died and came to life again." To a congregation where imprisonment and death impended, the prisoner who died and came back to life again was offering the crown of life and protection from the second death (vv.8, 10–11).

9 The speaker's knowledge is threefold: (1) He knows their "afflictions" (GK 2568—a word translated "persecution" in v.10). (2) He knows their "poverty" (GK 4775). This can only mean material poverty because the speaker (Christ) immediately adds, "Yet you are rich" (toward God). Why was this church so poor in such a prosperous city? We do not know. Perhaps the high esteem of emperor worship in the city produced economic sanctions against Christians who refused to participate. Sometimes, even today, a Christian's loyalty to the Lord entails economic loss (cf. 3:17). (3) The risen Lord also knows "the slander of those who say they are Jews and are not, but are a synagogue of Satan." Trouble arose from the Jewish community. Certain Jews used malicious untruths to incite persecution of the impoverished saints in Smyrna. Even though these men claimed descent from Abraham, they were not his true descendants because they did not have faith in Christ, the "Seed" of Abraham (Gal 3:16, 29). These hostile Jews probably viewed the Jewish Christians at Smyrna as heretics of the worst sort.

"But are of the synagogue of Satan" reveals for the first time in Revelation the ultimate source of the persecution of Christians—"Satan" (GK 4928). Many further references to this archenemy of the followers of Christ are found throughout the book (2:13; 3:9; 9:11; 12:9–10, 12; 13:4; 20:2, 7, 10). In fact, he is one of the principal actors in the apocalyptic drama. While Satan is the author of persecution and wicked men are his instruments, God remains sovereign in that he gives "the crown of life" to those who are "faithful, even to the point of death" (v.10). "Synagogue of Satan" refers, then, to certain Jews in ancient Smyrna who, motivated by Satan, slandered the church there.

10 The speaker's command immediately follows since no word of verdict or fault is spoken of. The prospect of further and imminent suffering may have made the believers at Smyrna fearful: "Do not be afraid [lit., Stop being afraid] of what you are about to suffer." The risen Christ reveals that some of them will be imprisoned by the devil in order to test them, and they will have ten days of persecution. Who will do this—whether Jew or pagan—is not stated. The testing will show where their true loyalty lies. For a faithful and suffering church, Christ offers further trial and suffering. The "ten days" may be ten actual days, or it may be an expression for an indeterminate but short period of time (cf. Ne 4:12; Da 1:12). In the Roman world, prison was usually not punitive but a prelude to trial and execution; hence the words "Be faithful, even to the point of death."

For those who would face martyrdom out of loyalty to Christ, there was to be a "crown of life" given by Christ himself. People at Smyrna were familiar with the term "the crown of Smyrna," which no doubt alluded to the beautiful skyline formed around the city by the hill Pagos and the public buildings on its sloping sides. The "crown" usually referred to a garland of flowers worn chiefly in the worship of the pagan gods. Faithful servants of the city appeared on coins with laurel wreaths on their heads. As the patriots of Smyrna were faithful to Rome and to their crown city, so Christ's people are to be faithful unto death to him who will give them the imperishable crown of life (Jas 1:12; 1Pe 5:4).

11 For those who overcome, the promise is that they "will not be hurt at all by the second death." Death was a real possibility for these believers. But greater than the fear of physical death should be the fear of God's eternal judgment (Lk 12:4–5). The "second death" is a well-known Targumic expression for the death that the wicked die in the world to come. Even though death was the outcome of Adam's sin, in Christ there is a complete reversal for the human race (Ge 2:16–17; Ro 5:15ff.). Since the messianic believers at Smyrna were under attack by some in the Jewish community, it was reassuring indeed to hear the Lord himself say that his followers would not be harmed by the second death—i.e., the lake of fire (20:14; 21:8).

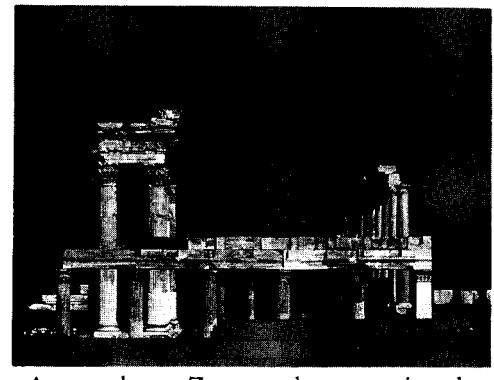
3. To Pergamum (2:12–17)

The inland city of Pergamum lay about sixty-five miles north of Smyrna along the fertile valley of the Caicus River. Pergamum held the official honor of being the provincial capital of Roman Asia, though this honor was in fact also claimed by Ephesus and Smyrna. Among its notable features were its beauty and wealth, its library of nearly two hundred thousand volumes, its famous sculpture, its temples to various gods, the three temples to the emperor cult, its great altar to Zeus, and its many palaces. The two main religions seem to have been the worship of Dionysus, the god of the royal kings (symbolized by the bull), and Asclepius, the savior god of healing (represented by the snake). The city got its name from its invention of vellum (Greek, pergamene, "from Pergamum"), a writing material made from animal skins.



12 The speaker identifies himself as "him who has the sharp, double-edged sword" (cf. comment on 1:16; cf. Isa 49:2). In dealing with the Pergamum congregation, divided by deceptive teaching, the risen Lord will use this sword to fight against the Balaamites and the Nicolaitans (v.16). It is interesting that Pergamum was a city to which Rome had given the rare power of capital punishment, symbolized by the sword. The Christians in Pergamum were thus reminded that though they lived under almost unlimited law, they were citizens of another kingdom—that of him who needs no other sword than that of his mouth.

13 The speaker's knowledge is searching: he knows that they live in a hostile and difficult place—"where Satan has his throne." This certainly refers to Pergamum as a center for the worship of pagan gods, especially the emperor cult. The first temple in the empire established in honor of Augustus was built in A.D. 29 at Pergamum, because it was the administrative capital of Asia. It was also an idolatrous center; and to declare oneself in that place a Christian who worships the one true God and Savior, Jesus Christ, would certainly provoke hostility.

Furthermore, the risen Lord knew their loyalty to him in all that he is revealed to be ("my name"), even when "Antipas, my faithful witness . . . was put to death in [their] city." Nothing further is known about Antipas. The proximity of the name "Satan" before and after Antipas in v.13 makes it virtually certain that his death was instigated by the enmity of pagans in Pergamum. He may have been the first or most notable of martyrs. Christ pays this hero of the faith a noble tribute: "faithful witness"—words that John applies to Christ himself in 1:5. Satan tries to undermine loyalty to Christ by persecution; Christ strengthens that loyalty by commending those who are true to him and by exposing those who are deceitful.

14–15 The speaker's verdict reveals that the church in Pergamum was divided. Some had followed Antipas and did not deny Christ's name or his faith (v.13). Others held to the teachings and practices of the Balaamites and Nicolaitans that Christ hates (2:6). Since "Balaam" can mean to "conquer the people" (i.e., the same meaning as "Nicolaitans") and since they are mentioned together in this letter, both groups may be closely related. The deadly effects of the error are described as "eating food sacrificed to idols and committing sexual immorality" (cf. "Jezebel" in v.20).

The OT names Balaam and Jezebel serve to alert the church community to the insidious nature of the teaching that was not until now recognized as overtly evil. Since Satan's chief method is deception, his devices are not known until they are clearly pointed out. Christ exposes error here by identifying the false teaching in Pergamum with clear-cut evil such as that of Balaam and Jezebel. Balaam, who found he could not curse the Israelites (Nu 22–24), devised a plan whereby the daughters of the Moabites seduced the Israelite men and led them to sacrifice to their god Baal-peor and worship him (Nu 25:1ff.; 31:16; cf. 2Pe 2:15; Jude 11). So through Balaam's deception, God's judgment fell on Israel because of fornication and idolatry. What Satan could not accomplish at Smyrna or Pergamum through intimidation, suffering, and death from outside the church, he achieved from within through unconscious subversion.

A great altar to Zeus stood out prominently in Pergamum. This city also boasted being an official center of emperor worship.

The combination of "food sacrificed to idols" with "sexual immorality" may refer to the common practice of participating in the sacrificial meal of the pagan gods (cf. 1Co 10:19–22) and indulging in sexual intercourse with temple priestesses. It is entirely possible that some Christians at Pergamum were still participating in the holiday festivities and saw no wrong in indulging in the "harmless" table in the temples and the sexual excitement everyone else was enjoying (cf. 1Jn 5:21). This is the more normal way to understand the term "sexual immorality," though some feel that the term refers to spiritual unfaithfulness and apostasy from Christ (cf. Isa 1:21; Eze 23:37).

16 The speaker's command includes both a call to the whole congregation to "repent" and a special threat to the heretical members if they do not repent. Since those who did not indulge in these things tolerated the practices of other church members, they, along with the guilty, needed to repent. If those at Pergamum will not heed the word of Christ's warning, that word from his mouth will become a "sword" to fight against the disloyal. The words "I will soon come to you" is a coming "against" the congregation in judgment (cf. v.5), not a reference to Christ's second coming.

17 The promise to the overcomer includes three symbols: "hidden manna," "a white stone," and "a new name." The "hidden manna" is reminiscent of the manna hidden in the ark of the covenant by Moses (Ex 16:33–34; Heb 9:4). Since Moses' pot of manna was designed to remind the Israelites of God's grace and faithfulness in the desert (Ps 78:24), there may be a similar thought here. Apocalyptic Jewish teaching, however, saw in the messianic era the restoration of the hidden wilderness manna. Those at Pergamum who refused the banquets of the pagan gods will receive the manna of his great banquet of eternal life in the kingdom (Jn 6:47–48).

The "white stone" is a puzzle and has received various interpretations. It seems best to link the stone to the thought of the manna and see it as an allusion to an invitation that entitled its bearer to attend one of the pagan banquets.

The "new name . . . known only to him who receives it" is either the name of Christ himself, now hidden from the world but to be revealed in the future as the most powerful of names (3:12; 14:1), or the believer's new name or changed character through redemption (Isa 62:2; 65:15). In an ancient Egyptian text, the goddess Isis plotted to learn the secret name of the supreme god Re to gain his hidden power for herself. The one who knew the hidden name would receive the power and status of the god who revealed it. Hence the name was jealously guarded by the god. This background fits the context here: to Christians tempted to compromise their loyalty to Christ to gain the favor of the pagan gods, Christ generously offers himself and the power of his name so that those who have faith in him may overcome.

4. To Thyatira (2:18–29)

On the inland route about forty-five miles due east of Pergamum was the city of Thyatira. Although not a great city, it was nevertheless important through commerce in wool, linen, apparel, dyed stuffs, leatherwork, tanning, and excellent bronze-work. Associated with its commerce was an extensive trade guild or labor union network, which must have played a prominent role in the social, political, economic, and religious life of the city. Each guild had its own patron deity, feasts, and seasonal festivities that included sexual revelries. Religiously, the city was unimportant. According to Acts, Lydia came from the Jewish settlement at Thyatira (Ac 16:14). She was a distributor of garments made of the purple dye substance known as "Turkey red" and no doubt a member of the dyers' guild.

18 The speaker of this fourth letter, the longest of the seven, identifies himself as "the Son of God, whose eyes are like blazing fire and whose feet are like burnished bronze" (cf. comments on 1:14–15). The expression "Son of God" appears only here in this book. It is a designation for the Messiah and is almost equivalent to the more frequently used title "Son of Man"; it probably anticipates the quotation from the messianic Ps 2 in v.27, which implies the term. But the name might also have captured the attention of those who were enticed by the emperor cult into calling Caesar "the son of God." That Christ's eyes are here described as blazing fire might be an allusion to the sun god, Apollo, worshiped at Thyatira. More likely, however, it refers to Christ's penetrating discernment of the false prophetess Jezebel (v.23). His feet, which are like burnished bronze, would no doubt have special significance to the bronze-workers at Thyatira.

19 The speaker's knowledge of the Thyatirans' works is essentially twofold: he knows their "love" and their "faith" (i.e., their "faithfulness"; GK 4411). Their love manifests itself in "service" and their faithfulness in "perseverance" during trial. Their present state reflects outstanding progress, but there is a perilous flaw in the church there.

20 The speaker's verdict reveals that the congregation had allowed a woman prophetess (a false one, according to Christ's assessment) to remain in the church and to continue to teach the saints to indulge in "sexual immorality" and to "eat food sacrificed to idols." The genuine gift of prophecy was highly respected in the early church. Along with apostles, teachers, and elders, prophets were often elevated to leadership (1Co 12:28; Eph 4:11). Women also received the gift of prophecy from the Holy Spirit (Lk 2:36; Ac 21:9; 1Co 11:5). Prophets generally brought direct revelation from God in the form of teaching as well as occasional predictions of the future (Ac 11:27). Tests for a true prophet were available but often difficult to apply.

This supposedly Christian woman at Thyatira had claimed to be a "prophetess" and was presumably elevated to prominence in the church because of her unusual gifts. But only a small minority saw through her pious deception (v.24); the rest either followed her or ignored her views without objecting to her presence. In order to expose her true character, she is labeled "Jezebel"—the name of the Canaanite wife of King Ahab. She had not only led Ahab to worship Baal but had managed to promulgate her idolatry throughout all Israel (1Ki 16:31–33; 2Ki 9:22).

We must not, however, press the similarity too far. As this wicked and deceptive woman in the OT led Israel astray and persecuted the true prophets of God, so this woman at Thyatira was enticing the servants of God to abandon their exclusive loyalty to Christ. Her teaching was no doubt similar to that of the Nicolaitans and Balaamites at Ephesus and Pergamum. While most commentators prefer to see the "sexual immorality" as spiritual adultery (i.e., idolatry), the possibility of cultic fornication should not be ruled out (see comments on v.14). The distinction between the woman and those who follow her (v.22) may argue against the view that she is symbolic of a group in the church, unless the "woman" represents the false prophets and her "children" are those who follow the teaching (cf. 2Jn 1).

21–22 Christ's verdict continues with his strongest accusation directed against, not Jezebel's perversion, serious as that is, nor even against her successful deception of fellow Christians, but against her refusal to repent. Although Christ has dealt with her over a period of time, she will not change her ways or her thinking. The Lord, therefore, will judge Jezebel by two swift acts. She will be "cast" (lit., "hurled"; GK 965) into a bed, and her children will be put to death. The "bed" or "couch" (GK 3109) can mean a bed used for resting, for guild-banqueting, or for sickness. On a bed she sinned, and on a bed she will suffer; and those who committed adultery with her will also suffer intensely.

As in the case of Jezebel, Christ's strongest threat to the offenders is not in regard to their sin, but to their reluctance to repent. The Lord is walking among his churches. He judges evil; but he also offers deliverance to those who have fallen, if they repent and stop doing Jezebel's deeds.

23 For those who follow Jezebel ("her children") and refuse to repent, a fatal judgment will be meted out by the Lord Christ: "I will strike her children dead" (perhaps an idiom denoting "pestilence"; cf. 6:8). Whatever the exact nature of the judgment, it is announced beforehand by Christ so that when it occurs, not just Thyatira but "all the churches will know that I am he who searches hearts and minds," since they too will read the same letter and will later hear of the historical outcome. OT references ascribe omniscience to God alone (Ps 7:9; Pr 24:12; Jer 17:10). "Hearts" (GK 2840) represents the moral center of the life, while "minds" (lit., "kidneys"; GK 3752) represents the totality of the feelings, thoughts, and desires traced back to one's deepest inner life. Nothing in our thoughts or desires is hidden from Christ's penetrating gaze (Heb 4:12–13). Our only safety from judgment is in repentance. The risen Lord does not stop with searching hearts and minds but brings recompense according to deeds: for faithfulness, reward; for unfaithfulness, judgment.

24–25 Christ's only command to the church at Thyatira was probably for the minority who had sufficient insight to penetrate Jezebel's deception. They are simply to "hold on to what you have" (i.e., their insight into Jezebel's teaching and evil deeds) till Christ returns (v.25). This small group may have been nearer his standard than any other group mentioned in Revelation because they could discriminate between authentic and spurious worship.

The reference to "Satan's so-called deep secrets" is ambiguous (cf. "the deep things of God" in 1Co 2:10). This is probably an actual phrase that Jezebel used. But how could she lure Christians by using such a term? The reasoning of some in the early church (the Nicolaitans) might have gone something like this: The only effective way to confront Satan is to enter into his strongholds; the real nature of sin can only be learned by experience, and therefore only those who have really experienced sin can truly appreciate grace. So by experiencing the depths of paganism ("the deep secrets of Satan"), one will be better equipped to serve Christ or be an example of freedom to one's fellow believers (cf. 1Co 8:9–11). Thus the sin of Jezebel was deadly serious because of the depths of its deception. Only a few perceived where the teaching was leading.

"Until I come" is the first of several references to the second coming of Christ in these letters (cf. 1:7).

26–27 The promise to the overcomers is twofold: "authority over nations" and the gift of "the morning star." It contains one important modification of the regular overcomer's formula. Added to the words "to him who overcomes" is "and does my will to the end" (lit., "who keeps my works until the end"). It reminds us of Jesus' statement in his great eschatological discourse, that "he who stands firm to the end will be saved" (Mt 24:13; cf. also Col 1:23). Proof of authentic trust in Jesus is steadfastness of faith and continuance in God's will till Christ returns or death comes.

The first promise is a fulfillment of Ps 2, which is messianic and tells how the Father gave the Messiah the rule over the nations of the world. This psalm plays an important part in this book in thinking about Christ (11:18; 12:5; 19:15). The coming reign of the Messiah over the world is to be shared with his disciples (1:6; 3:21; 20:6; 1Co 6:2). The overcomers will participate with Christ in fulfilling the promise of Ps 2:9. There is a paradox in the combination of the mild word "rule" (lit., "to shepherd"; GK 4477) with the harsh words "with an iron scepter; he will dash them to pieces like pottery" (cf. comments on 19:11ff.). The prospect of such a reversal of their experience of oppression and persecution would be a constant encouragement for suffering Christians.

28 Second, the overcomers in Thyatira are promised "the morning star." Some link this expression to Christ himself as in 22:16; believers receive Christ as their very life. Or it may refer to the Resurrection in the sense that the morning star rises over the darkness of this world's persecution and offers victory over it. Perhaps a combination of the two thoughts is intended. The promise of Christ's return is like the "morning star" (2Pe 1:19).

29 In this fourth letter and in the next three, this general exhortation comes at the very end, while in the first three letters it precedes the promise (cf. comments on 2:1–3:22).

5. To Sardis (3:1–6)

Sardis was about thirty miles south of Thyatira. It enjoyed prominence as a commercially prosperous and militarily strategic city throughout its history. The city's topography was notable for the acropolis, the temple of Artemis, and the necropolis. (1) The acropolis rose about eight hundred feet above the north section of Sardis and was virtually impregnable because of its nearly vertical rock walls (except on the south side); it became a refuge for the inhabitants in time of siege. Only twice in the history of Sardis (in the sixth and fourth centuries B.C.) was its fortress ever captured, though attacks on it were frequent. (2) The temple to Artemis equaled in size the famous temple of Artemis in Ephesus, though it was never finished. (3) The impressive necropolis, or cemetery, of "a thousand hills" was so named because of the hundreds of burial mounds visible on the skyline seven miles from Sardis.

Sardis retained its wealth into the first two centuries A.D. But its political brilliance as the capital city of Asia for Persia lay in the past. In A.D. 26, Sardis begged the Roman Senate to grant it the coveted honor of building a temple to Caesar, but that distinction went to Smyrna. The luxurious living of the Sardians led to moral decadence. Sardis was a city of peace—not the peace won through battle, but the peace of lethargy and past dreams. A great woolen industry flourished at Sardis, and this may account for Christ's reference to clothing (v.4).

1 The speaker identifies himself as "him who holds the seven spirits of God and the seven stars" (cf. comments on 1:4, 16, 20; 2:1). Christ is the one who controls the seven spirits of God. If the Sardian church is strong, it is because Christ has sent his Spirit to encourage and quicken the Sardian believers; if they are dead like Sardis, it is because in judgment he has withdrawn his Spirit from them. Yet the faithful minority at Sardis (v.4) can count on the divine power of Christ to sustain them, give life, and mobilize them to do his will even though the majority are dead.

The speaker's knowledge of the church in Sardis reveals their true condition. He knows their "deeds." This may allude to their past accomplishments, which gave them their reputation of being alive, but more likely it refers to their present deeds, which were not those Christ sought from them (cf. v.2). He also knows that though they claim to be a healthy Christian church, in reality they are "dead."

How does a church die? Why does Christ use this expression for Sardis, even though the churches in Thyatira and Laodicea also had serious problems? Sardis had had significant fame as a royal city, but now it was nothing. The citizens were living off past fame. Apparently the same spirit had affected the church. Their loyalty and service to Christ were in the past; now they were nothing. Perhaps they had so made peace with the surrounding society that the offense of the Cross had ceased, and they were no longer in jeopardy of life or vulnerable to suffering. Further facts emerge when we consider the series of commands in vv.2–3. Death was a special preoccupation of the Sardians, as witnessed by the impressive necropolis. What had been a part of the pagan rites had also crept into the church, but through deception. The Sardian church was for the most part a duped church.

2 The command "Wake up!" (lit., "Be watchful"; GK 1213) is a call to reverse their attitudes radically. The congregation must be alerted to the seriousness of the situation. Their complacency led them to give up their identification with Christ and their mission for him. The situation is dire but not totally hopeless. Immediate steps must be taken to "strengthen [GK 5114] what remains." Some persons and things are salvageable if quick and decisive action is taken. Otherwise, death will follow.

The Sardians' deeds are in danger of judgment because Christ has not found them "complete [GK 4444] in the sight of my God." Though this could refer to incompleteness in the number of their deeds, more likely it describes the quality of their deeds—they do not measure up to the standard Christ sets. In the other letters, works acceptable to Christ are love, faithfulness, perseverance, keeping Christ's words, and not denying his name.

3 Like those in Ephesus, the Sardians must remember what they "have received and heard." What they "received" was the apostolic tradition of the gospel; what they "heard" probably were the teachings of the apostles and prophets who brought the gospel to them. Unlike the church at Philadelphia (v.8), the Sardians were not holding to the word of Christ. For them repentance was the only way out of certain and final death. So they were to repent by restoring the gospel and the apostolic doctrine to its authority over their lives. This would mean they would once more start to "obey" (lit., "keep"; GK 5498) the truth of Christ's word. Today's church needs to hear this challenge to take the word of Christ seriously. If the church at Sardis does not repent, Christ will come to them in judgment "as a thief"—i.e., by surprise. This phrase should probably not be taken as referring to the Second Coming but to Christ's opposing them in judgment (cf. his threat to the church in Ephesus in 2:5).

4 While the majority had departed from faithful obedience to Christ, a few at Sardis remained true. Here an allusion to the woolen industry at Sardis intensifies the image of soiled and defiled garments. Those with soiled garments were removed from the public lists of citizens in Sardis. In the pagan religions it was forbidden to approach the gods in garments that were soiled or stained. Soiling seems to be a symbol for mingling with pagan life and thus defiling the purity of one's relation to Christ (14:4; 1Co 8:7; 2Co 7:1; 11:2; Jude 23). To "walk with Christ" symbolizes salvation and fellowship with him—something the others at Sardis had forfeited through their sin (1Jn 1:6-7). "White" garments are symbolic of the righteousness, victory, and glory of God (Rev 3:18; 6:11; 7:9, 13–14; 19:14). This passage shows that not all faithful Christians were martyrs, nor can we make emperor worship the sole source of the problems of the early Christians. Ironically, the Sardians were occupied with their outward appearance, but they were not concerned with inner purity toward Christ and their outward moral life in a pagan society.

5 The overcomer's promise is threefold and grows out of the reference to white clothing. (1) "Like" the faithful Sardian Christians who will receive white clothes from Christ, the others who overcome the stains of pagan society will similarly be dressed in white.

(2) The pure relationship to Christ is permanently guaranteed: "I will never erase his name from the book of life." In ancient cities the names of citizens were recorded in a register till their death; then their names were marked out of that book. This same idea appears in the OT (Ex 32:32–33; Ps 69:28; Isa 4:3). From the idea of being recorded in God's book of the living (or the righteous) comes the sense of belonging to God's eternal kingdom or possessing eternal life (Da 12:1; Lk 10:20; Php 4:3; Heb 12:23; Rev 13:8; 20:15; et al.). For Christ to say that he will never "blot out [the overcomer's] name from the book of life" is the strongest affirmation that death can never separate us from Christ and the life he offers (Ro 8:38–39). A person enrolled in the book of life by faith remains in it by faithfulness and can be erased only by disloyalty. There is some evidence that one's name could be removed from the city register before death if one were convicted of a crime. In the first century, Christians who were loyal to Christ were under constant threat of being branded political and social rebels and then stripped of their citizenship. But Christ offers them an eternal, safe citizenship in his everlasting kingdom if they remain loyal to him.

(3) Finally, to the overcomer Christ promises to "acknowledge his name before [the] Father and his angels." "Acknowledge" (GK 3933) is a strong word for confession before the courts. It is Christ's confession of our name before the Father and his angels (implying our fellowship with him) that assures our heavenly citizenship (Mt 10:32; Lk 12:8).

What ultimately counts, then, is not our acceptance by this world's societies but that our relationship to Christ is genuine and hence will merit his approbation in the coming kingdom.

6 Again, the general exhortation comes last (see comments on 2:1–3:22; 2:29).

6. To Philadelphia (3:7–13)

About twenty-five miles southeast of Sardis, along the Hermus River valley, lay the important high plateau city of Philadelphia. A main highway that ran through the city connected Smyrna (about a hundred miles due west) to northwest Asia, Phrygia, and the east. Furthermore, the imperial post road of the first century A.D., which came from Rome, passed through this valley and Philadelphia on the way to the east. So situated, Philadelphia became a strong fortress city. To the northeast was a great vine-growing district, which, along with textile and leather industries, contributed greatly to the city's prosperity.

Philadelphia was established by King Attalus II (159–138 B.C.), who was given the epithet "Philadelphus" ("brother lover") because of his love for his brother. The city disseminated Greco-Asiatic culture and language in the eastern part of Lydia and in Phrygia. Its success is attested by the fact that the Lydian language ceased to be spoken in Lydia by A.D. 19 and Greek took over, though the same cannot be said for the Phrygians.

The whole region was earthquake prone. In A.D. 17 an earthquake that destroyed Sardis and ten other cities also destroyed Philadelphia. Consequently, many people preferred to live in the rural area surrounding the city. The fear of earthquakes caused those who continued to live in the city to leave it at the slightest sign of a tremor. After the devastating earthquake, Tiberius came to the peoples' aid and had the city rebuilt. In gratitude the citizens renamed it Neocaesarea ("New Caesar"), though it also kept the name Philadelphia. Since wine was one of the city's important industries, some have assumed that the worship of Dionysus was a chief pagan cult.

Although nothing is known about the origin of the Philadelphian church, it has had a long history of faithfulness to the Lord. Long after all the surrounding country had succumbed to Muslim control under Turkey, Philadelphia held out as a Christian populace till 1392.

7 The letter to the church in Philadelphia begins with the speaker's identifying himself as "him who is holy and true, who holds the key of David. What he opens, no one can shut; and what he shuts, no one can open." Each of these identifications calls attention to Jesus as the true Messiah. "Holy and true" relates to God himself and describes aspects of his presence among us (cf. 6:10; cf. Hos 11:9; Jn 14:6). Holiness is the attribute of God whereby we sense the presence of the "Wholly Other," and truth means that he is wholly trustworthy and reliable in his words and actions. For this congregation whom Christ has commends, these titles would bring encouragement, despite their "little strength" (v.8), to go on in their faithfulness.

The reference to the "key of David" alludes to Isa 22:20ff. and the incident of transferring the post of secretary of state in Judah from the unfaithful Shebna to the faithful Eliakim. The "key" (GK 3090) signifies the power of the keys that were normally held by the king himself, unless delegated to another. The use of the name "David" points to Christ as the Messiah, who alone determines who will participate in his kingdom and who will be turned away. This may allude to the false claims of certain Jews at Philadelphia who argued that they, not the heretical Nazarenes, would inherit the kingdom of David (v.9) and thus excluded the followers of Jesus. But the true Messiah, Jesus, will exclude them instead!

8 Here the knowledge of the speaker and his verdict blend together in untarnished praise as in the letter to Smyrna. An awkward part of this verse is the interjection, "See, I have placed before you an open door that no one can shut." Since Christ has absolute authority from the Father, he has opened a door for the Philadelphians that even their enemies cannot close. But an open door to what? It most likely refers to Christ's opening the door to his kingdom for those who love him, thus reinforcing the statement in v.7. What became a serious problem at Sardis (v.3) was not the case with the Philadelphian congregation, for the risen Christ said, "You have kept my word." They had been faithful to the Gospel and the apostles' teaching even during the trial of their faith—they "have not denied my name."

9 Those opposing the witness of the congregation are called "those who are of the synagogue of Satan, who claim to be Jews though they are not, but are liars." These words are like those spoken to the church in Smyrna (cf. comment on 2:9). A "synagogue of Satan" appears to describe a Jewish element that vehemently denied Jesus as the Messiah and that actively persecuted others who made this claim. In the view of Jews like John and Paul, a true Jew is one who has found forgiveness and life in Jesus the Messiah, while a false Jew is one who rejects those who believe in Jesus and openly persecutes them; such a one is an antichrist (1Jn 2:22). But Christ will make those who have persecuted the followers of Jesus as heretics "acknowledge" (lit., "know"; GK 1182) that God is indeed with the church in Philadelphia and that they are not heretics but are God's people.

We catch a glimpse here of the ever-widening gap between Judaism and Christianity toward the end of the first century. The church is the true people of God, loved by Christ, and in a real sense inheritors of the covenant promises in the OT made to the people of God (Isa 43:4; 45:14; 49:23; 60:14).

In these OT passages it is the Gentiles, or heathen nations, who bow before Israel and acknowledge that God is with them. In this letter Christ reverses these roles: his followers are now the people of God and Jewish unbelievers are the pagans who come and acknowledge the love of the Messiah for the church! There is, however, no indication as to when such acknowledgment will come. Underlying this verse is the truth Paul expressed in Php 2:10–11: "At the name of Jesus every knee should bow . . . and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father." Some will do this joyfully and some remorsefully (cf. Rev 6:12–17).

10 This is another promise given the church in Philadelphia. Though not part of the promise to the overcomers in Philadelphia (v.12), like the special promises to Smyrna and Sardis (2:10; 3:4), it may be taken as a promise to all the churches. The words "since you have kept my command to endure patiently" (lit., "kept the word of my patience") refer to the condition under which the promise is valid. Some translate the phrase as in NIV, inferring that the "word of my patience" means the command of Christ to endure suffering until he returns (Lk 21:19; cf. Heb 10:36). Others translate it as "the word enjoining Christ's patient endurance," which would refer to an apostolic teaching (such as Paul's) encouraging Christians to endure the contrariness of a sinful world after the pattern of Christ's own endurance (2Th 3:5; cf. Heb 12:3). Either is possible, though the Greek text slightly favors the latter.

Related to the promise, "I will also keep you from the hour of trial that is going to come upon the whole world to test those who live on the earth" are two problems: the identification of the "hour of trial" and the sense of the phrase "keep you from the hour of trial." Both involve the ongoing debate among evangelicals over the Tribulation-Rapture question.

We can dismiss the view that the "hour of trial" refers to some general or personal distress that will come only upon the Philadelphian community and from which that church will be delivered. Not only does the Lord refer to "the whole world," but the phrase "those who live on the earth" is repeated in Revelation a number of times and refers not to believers but to unbelievers who are the objects of God's wrath (6:10; 8:13; 11:10; 12:12; 13:8, 12, 14; cf. Isa 24; Jer 13:12–14). According to many interpreters, the "hour of trial" is best understood as the time known to the Jews as the "messianic woes," a time of intense trouble to fall on the world before the coming of Christ and known as the eschatological "day of the Lord" or the "Great Tribulation" (Da 12:1, Joel 2:31; Mk 13:14; 2Th 2:1–12; Rev 14:7). This "hour of trial," then, will be the one described in great detail in the following chapters of this book.

If that is the proper meaning of "hour of trial," what does promise mean, "I will also keep you from the hour of trial"? There are two possibilities. (1) Some, comparing the expression "keep from" in Jn 17:15, argue that the sense is preservation while in the trial (to be kept from evil or the evil one does not mean to be removed from his presence but simply to be kept from his harmful power). Thus, the universal church will experience preservation from harm in the trial of persecution and suffering and will not be raptured till the end of the period (cf. 1Th 4:13ff.).

(2) Other writers object to this interpretation: (a) The "hour of trial" is a judgment from God on the unbelieving inhabitants of the world, not a form of persecution. (b) It is not true that the saints of the Tribulation period are exempt from harm during this period; a great group of them will be martyred (6:9–11; 7:9–14, etc.). (c) In the Gospel of John, preservation is from the devil; in Revelation, from a time period—the "hour" of trial.

In our opinion, we must identify "the hour of trial" as the wrath of God, deliverance from which is promised to every one of Christ's overcomers. The key phrase is "to keep from" (GK 5498 & 608; synonymous with "to keep out of," GK 5498 & 1666). This latter phrase is used in the LXX of Pr 7:5, where the wise man talks about delivering a man from contact with or the presence of the harlot. In Jas 1:27 the same expression means to be kept from the pollution of the world. In both instances the sense is that of exemption from something. Can one, then, be exempt from the "hour of trial" that will try the whole world by famines, earthquakes, wars, floods, etc., and still be present on the earth? Yes, but removal is one possible method of protection. The above discussion shows that v.10 does not settle the question of the time of the Rapture in relation to the Tribulation. Rather, it remains ambiguous. One might be on the earth and yet be exempt from the "hour of trial" if the "hour of trial" is directed only at the unbelievers in the world while the believers are divinely immune from the specific type of trial (God's wrath) aimed at the rebellious on the earth. In any event, we have here a marvelous promise of Christ to protect those who have kept his word by their loving obedience.

11 Here the words of Christ "I am coming soon" (cf. 22:7, 12, 20) are not a threat of judgment but a promise of Christ's second coming, such as the promise the faithful Christians in Thyatira received (2:25). The testing that faced the Philadelphians was not the same as that facing the unbelieving earth dwellers (v.10). Loyal disciples must face one type of conflict, the world with its earth dwellers quite another. Some such conflict is envisioned when Christ says, "Hold on to what you have, so that no one will take your crown." They had kept his word and had not denied his name in the face of persecution. Either Satan or other people could rob them of their crown by diverting them from exclusive loyalty to Jesus (on crown, see comment on 2:10).

12 The promise to the overcomer is again twofold and related to the experience and memory of the inhabitants of the city. (1) Christ will make the overcomer a "pillar in the temple of my God." As has already been noted, Philadelphia was constantly threatened with earthquakes. Often the only parts of a city left standing after a severe quake were the huge stone temple columns. Christ promises to set believers in his temple (the future kingdom) in such a secure fashion that no disturbance can ever force them out. (2) A faithful municipal servant or a distinguished priest was sometimes honored by having a special pillar added to one of the temples and inscribed with his name. This may well be the sense of the second promise, "I will write on him the name of my God and the name of the city of my God, the new Jerusalem, . . . and . . . my new name." The inscribed name signifies identification and ownership. To those who have little influence because of being ostracized, Christ promises recognition in his kingdom worthy of the most noble hero of any society.

Remembering in days past the changes of name that their city received (e.g., Neocaesarea; see comment on vv.7–13), the Philadelphians would be impressed that God himself (not the emperor) had chosen to identify himself with them and to ensure their citizenship in the New Jerusalem (cf. 21:2ff.; Eze 48:35). Christ's "new name" could be either the unknown name that he alone knows, or the new name of Christ given to the believer through redemption (cf. Isa 62:2; 65:15).

13 The general exhortation follows the promise (see comments on 2:1–3:22)

7. To Laodicea (3:14–22)

Laodicea was about forty-five miles southeast of Philadelphia and about one hundred miles due east of Ephesus. Along with Colosse and Hierapolis, it was one of the cities in the fertile Lycus valley. The great Roman road stretching to the inland of Asia from the coast at Ephesus ran straight through its center, making Laodicea an important center of trade and communication. In addition, its wealth came from the production of a fine quality of famous glossy black wool. The city also had a huge banking industry. So wealthy was Laodicea that after a great earthquake in A.D. 17, the people refused imperial help in rebuilding the city, choosing rather to do it entirely by themselves.

Laodicea had a famous school of medicine; and a special ointment known as "Phrygian powder," famous for its cure of eye defects, was either manufactured or distributed there, as were ear ointments. Near the temple of the special god associated with healing (Men Karou) was a market for trading all sorts of goods. Zeus, the supreme god, was also worshiped in the city.

Laodicea is difficult to describe because no one thing stands out. It was a city with a people who had learned to compromise and accommodate themselves to the needs and wishes of others; they did not zealously stand for anything. For all its wealth, the city had poor water. A six-mile-long aqueduct brought Laodicea its supply of water from the south. The water came either from hot springs and was cooled to lukewarm or came from a cooler source and warmed up in the aqueduct on the way.

14 The speaker identifies himself by a threefold affirmation: "The Amen, the faithful and true witness, the ruler of God's creation." "Amen" means the acknowledgment of that which is sure and valid. It is a word of human response to the divine verity or action (cf. 2Co 1:20). Jesus is the "Amen" in the sense that he is the perfect human response of obedience and suffering to the divine promises (cf. Isa 65:16); he is the "faithful and true witness" (cf. comments on 1:5, 9; 2:13).

The "ruler" (GK 794; also means "source," "origin") further amplifies the Amen statement. Paul used this word in Col 1:18 to describe Christ as the source or origin of all creation (cf. Pr 8:22; John 1:3), no doubt to correct a heresy. Since Colosse was a neighboring city of Laodicea, it is not improbable that the same heresy was affecting the sister church at Laodicea. When Christ addresses a church that is failing in loyalty and obedience, he is to them the "Amen" of God in faithfulness and in true witness, and he is the only one who has absolute power over the world because he is the source of all creation (1:17; 2:8; 22:13).

15–16 Sadly, the speaker's knowledge reveals an unqualified condemnation of the Laodicean church—a verdict that is the exact opposite of the church's own evaluation (v.17). Their deeds were "neither cold nor hot." This expression may refer to their lack of zeal (v.19) or their uselessness, for Christ says, "I wish you were either one or the other" (lit., "either cold or hot"). There is good reason not to understand this expression as if Christ meant, "I wish you were either spiritually cold (i.e., unsaved or hostile) or spiritually hot (i.e., alive and fervent)." It is inconceivable that Christ would wish that people were spiritually cold in this sense. Furthermore, the application of "hot" and "cold" to spiritual temperature, though familiar to us, would have been foreign to first-century Christians. The two adjectives in "neither hot nor cold" should be understood together as equivalent to "lukewarmness" (v.16). That is to say, they were useless to Christ because they were complacent, self-satisfied, and indifferent to the real issues of faith in him and of discipleship.

"I am about to spit you out of my mouth" alludes to the "lukewarm" water that was a part of the situation in Laodicea (see comment on 3:14–22). "Cold" could refer to the useful cool water located at Colosse, less than ten miles away. "Hot" would remind the Laodiceans of the beneficial "hot springs" to the north of Hierapolis. Christ detests their attitude of compromise, one that seeks easy accommodation and peace at any cost. With such a condition, he must deal harshly. To be a Christian means to be useful to Christ.

17 The deeper problem in the Laodicean church was not simply their indifference. It was their ignorance of their real condition: "You say, 'I am rich; I have acquired wealth and do not need a thing.'" This indictment is related to the general condition of the populace at large—rich in material possessions and self-sufficient. The spirit of the surrounding culture had crept into the congregation and had paralyzed their spiritual life. But did they claim to be materially rich or spiritually rich? Most likely both were involved; the Laodiceans probably interpreted their material wealth as a blessing from God and thus were self-deceived as to their true spiritual state.

Christ's revelation of the Laodiceans' actual situation shatters their illusions and calls them to repentance: "But you do not realize that you are wretched, pitiful, poor, blind and naked." Note the contrast with Jesus' evaluation of the church at Smyrna, "I know . . . your poverty—yet you are rich!" (2:9). Probably the first two characteristics—"wretched" (GK 5417) and "pitiful" (GK 1795)—are to be linked together, while the latter three explain this twofold condition in more detail (cf. v.18). To be "wretched" physically describes life when everything one owns has been destroyed or plundered by war. Here it refers to the Laodiceans' spiritual destitution and pitiableness before God.

The people at Laodicea knew what lukewarm meant. In nearby Pamukale, hot pools and lukewarm pools are still being used.

"Poor, blind and naked" refers to the three sources of their miserable condition (see comment on v.18). "Lukewarmness," then, does not refer to the laxity of Christians but the condition of not really knowing Christ as Savior and Lord and thus being useless to him.

18 The commands of Christ correspond exactly to the self-deceptions of the Laodiceans. Gold, a source of the wealth of the city, was to be bought from Christ and to become the spiritually poverty-stricken's true wealth. Their shameful nakedness was to be clothed, not by purchasing the sleek, black wool of Laodicea, but by buying from Christ the white clothing that alone can cover shameful nakedness (16:15). For those who were blind to their true condition, the "Phrygian powder" was useless (cf. comment on v.14). The three figures together point to the Laodiceans' need of authentic salvation through Christ.

19 Even though the state of a church verges on disaster, all is not lost if there are those in it who will receive Christ's loving rebuke and come back to him. Christ's statement "I rebuke and discipline" speaks of his love (Pr 3:12; 1Co 11:32; Heb 12:6). He spits out those he does not love and "rebukes" (GK 1794) and "disciplines" (GK 4084) those who hear his voice. The difference between the expelled and the disciplined lies in their response: "So be earnest [lit., zealous; GK 2418] and repent." The Laodiceans' repentance would come from a rekindling of their loyalty to Christ.

20 To those who hear the words of rebuke, Christ extends an invitation to dine with him. This figure represents Christ standing at the door to the hearts of the members of the congregation at Laodicea. Christ will come and have fellowship with all those who hear his voice of rebuke and thus prove themselves as Christ's friends by zeal and repentance. The "eating" (GK 1268) refers to the main meal of the day, which in Oriental fashion was a significant occasion for having intimate fellowship with the closest of friends. It is through the Holy Spirit that Christ and the Father come to have fellowship with us (Jn 14:23).

While most commentators have taken this invitation as addressed to lapsed, half-hearted Christians, the terminology and context (v.18) suggest that these Laodiceans were for the most part mere professing Christians who lacked authentic conversion to Christ in the first place, which is the essential prerequisite for true discipleship. Verse 20 is, therefore, more evangelistic than admonitory. Those who find in it an allusion to the Lord's Supper may be right.

21–22 The promise to the overcomers concerns the sharing in Christ's future reign in the eschatological kingdom. Such a reign with Christ has already been referred to earlier in the book (1:6, 9; 2:26–27) and appears later on (5:10; 20:4–6). The kingdom reign is also a theme in other NT writings (Lk 22:28–30; Ro 8:17; 2Ti 2:12). As Christ overcame through his suffering and death (Jn 16:33) and entered into the highest honor God could bestow—that of being seated at his "right hand" of sovereignty (Mk 16:19; Ac 2:22ff.; Rev 22:1)—so believers who suffer with Christ even to the point of death will share in the honor of Christ's exalted position. The distinction between the Father's throne and Christ's throne differentiates aspects of God's program in history (1Co 15:24–28). Christ is reigning now, for there is a sense in which the messianic kingdom of God was inaugurated in Christ's earthly ministry, death, and resurrection. But the promise here foresees a final earthly consummation of the kingdom when Christ returns.

On the closing exhortation, see comment on 2:1–3:22.

III. Vision of the Seven-Sealed Scroll, the Seven Trumpets, the Seven Signs, and the Seven Bowls (4:1–19:10)

In view of the elaborate use of imagery and visions from 4:1 through the end of Revelation and the question of how this material relates to chs. 1–3, it is not surprising that commentators differ widely. One problem is that of interpretation: What do the imagery and visions mean? Another problem involves chronology: When do the things spoken of occur? Furthermore, how does John use his frequent OT images? Does he interpret them in exact accordance with their OT sources, or does he freely reinterpret these images and figures? What is symbolic and what is literal? Answers to such questions will determine the interpreter's approach. Since few of these questions are capable of dogmatic answers, there is a need for tolerance of divergent approaches in the hope that the Spirit may use open-minded discussion to bring us further into the meaning of the Apocalypse.

A. The Seven-Sealed Scroll (4:1–8:1)

Chapters 4–5 form one vision of two parts—the throne (ch. 4) and the Lamb and the scroll (ch. 5). In actuality, the breaking of all seven seals (6:1–8:1) together with the throne vision (chs. 4–5) form a single, continuous vision and should not be separated. The throne pictures should be viewed as dominating the entire seven-seal vision (4:1–8:1).

1. Preparatory: the throne, the scroll, and the Lamb (4:1–5:14)

a. The throne (4:1–11)

1 Seeing a "door standing open in heaven," John is told to "come up here" (cf. Eze 1:1). He receives a new view of God's majesty and power (throne) so that he can understand the events on earth that relate to the seven-seal vision (cf. 1Ki 22:19). For the first time in Revelation, the reader is introduced to the frequent interchange between heaven and earth found in the remainder of the book. What happens on earth has its heavenly counterpart.

Chapter 4 focuses on the throne vision that provides the setting for the dramatic action of the slain Lamb in ch. 5. There is a connection between this throne vision and the vision of the glorified Christ in 1:11–16. We are told that John heard the same voice speaking to him that he "had first heard speaking . . . like a trumpet" (cf. 1:10). The words of the messenger relate to what has just transpired: "I will show you what must take place after this"—after the time of the historical churches in Asia (cf. 1:19).

There is no good reason for seeing the invitation for John to come up into the opened heaven as a symbol of the rapture of the church. Some have so interpreted it and have inferred that the absence of the word "church" (GK 1711) from Revelation till 22:16 and the continued references to the "saints" indicate that at this point the church departs from the earth. But the word "church" or "churches" always stands in Revelation for the historic seven churches in Asia and not for the universal body of Christ. Since 4:1–22:15 concerns the believing community as a whole, it would be inappropriate to find the narrower term "church" in this section (cf. 3Jn 6, 9–10).

Finally, it is significant that the visions that continue to the end of the book refer to the throne, the book, the crowns, the four living creatures, the twenty-four elders, and the victory of the Lamb. In all this, the central focus appears to be the five hymns of praise that begin in 4:8 and continue through ch. 5.

2–3 Chapter 4 is above all a vision of the royal throne of God. The prophet ascends "in the Spirit" to see the source of all that will happen on earth (cf. 1:10). It will all be an expression of the throne's purpose; nothing happens in the past, present, or future apart from God's intention. Whatever authority is given to an angel or to a horseman is given by God. The throne symbolizes God's majesty and power. Yet his majestic transcendence is fully safeguarded—John does not attempt to describe the "someone sitting on" the throne (cf. 1Ki 22:19; 2Ch 18:18; Ps 47:8; Isa 6:1ff.; Eze 1:26–28).

The minerals "jasper" and "carnelian" portray the supernatural splendor of God while the "rainbow, resembling an emerald," conveys the impression of God's encircling brilliance (cf. Eze 1:27–28). But we need not find symbolism in each element of the vision; it is enough to allow the imagery to create the impression of transcendent glory. Whether John intends God's judgment to be part of the symbolism of the throne vision (cf. Ps 9:4, 7) is not clear. What is unmistakably clear is that all—whether elders, angels, lamps, sea of glass, or living creatures—centers on the throne and the one who sits on it, "who lives for ever and ever" (v.9).

4 Next John sees "twenty-four elders." It would be helpful if we could ask an interpreting angel, "Who are the elders?" (see also 4:9–11; 5:5–14; 7:11–17; 11:16–18; 12:10–12; 14:3; 19:4). There are at least thirteen different views of their identity, ranging from the twenty-four ruling stars (or judges) in the heavens to a simple figure of wholeness and fullness. The elders are always associated with the "four living creatures" (4:6ff.) and engage in acts of worship of God and the Lamb. While not entirely ruling out the elders' possible representative or symbolic significance, the arguments of those who interpret the elders as a class of heavenly spirit-beings belonging to the general class of angels and living creatures seem more compelling. From this viewpoint, the "angels," the "twenty-four elders," and "the four living creatures" all designate actual supernatural beings involved with the purpose of God on earth and his worship in heaven. They are always distinguished from the "saints" (5:8; 11:17–18; 19:1–4).

In the Bible "twelve" appears to be the number of divine government—twelve months in a lunar year, twelve tribes of Israel, twelve apostles, twelve gates in the New Jerusalem, twelve angels at each gate, twelve foundations, twelve thousand sealed from each tribe, etc. Multiples of twelve—such as twenty-four, etc.—probably have a similar significance. "Thrones" are related to the heavenly powers in Col 1:16. In Revelation "white" clothing generally belongs to the saints but relates to angelic beings elsewhere in the NT (e.g., Jn 20:12). While the "crowns of gold" (cf. 4:10; 9:7; 14:14) are likewise usually related to the redeemed, here they refer to the royal dignity of those so closely associated with the throne of God (cf. 1Ki 22:19; Ps 89:7).

5 "Flashes of lightning, rumblings and peals of thunder" coming from the throne symbolize God's awesome presence and the vindication of the saints and occur with slight variation three more times in Revelation (8:5; 11:19; 16:18; cf. Ex 19:16; Eze 1:13; Ps 18:13–15). On the expression "seven blazing lamps," see comment on 1:4 (cf. Eze 1:13).

6–8 "A sea of glass, clear as crystal" adds to the magnificence of the scene (15:2). Its mirrorlike reflecting quality could symbolize the fact that before the sight of God all is revealed: "Everything is uncovered and laid bare before the eyes of him to whom we must give account" (Heb 4:13).

The "four living creatures" (cf. 5:6, 8, 14; 6:1ff.; 7:11; 14:3; 15:7; 19:4) should be linked with Isaiah's seraphim and Ezekiel's cherubim (cf. Isa 6:3; Eze 1:5–25; 10:1–22). They, like the elders and angels, are heavenly creatures of the highest order involved with the worship and government of God. "Covered with eyes" may give the impression of their exceeding knowledge of God, while the faces of a "lion," "ox," "man," and a "flying eagle" suggest qualities that belong to God, such as royal power, strength, spirituality, and swiftness of action. Each of the creatures mentioned is the chief of its species. Together they embody the reflection of God's nature as the fullness of life and power. Their six wings (cf. Isa 6:2) give the impression of unlimited mobility in fulfilling God's commands. Their position "in the center, around the throne" suggests that one might be before and one behind the throne with one on either side.

The four living creatures ceaselessly proclaim the holiness of God in a hymn: "Holy, holy, holy" (GK 41; cf. Isa 6:3). In Hebrew, the double repetition of a word adds emphasis, while the rare threefold repetition designates the superlative and calls attention to the infinite holiness of God—the quality of God felt by creatures in his presence as awesomeness or fearfulness (Ps 111:9). The living creatures celebrate God's holiness and power as manifested in his past, present, and future activity. Such holiness cannot tolerate the presence of evil (21:27). For the titles of God in the rest of the hymn, see comments on 1:4, 8.

This hymn is the first not only of the five sung by the heavenly choirs in chs. 4–5 but also of a number of other hymns in Revelation (4:11; 5:9–10, 12, 13; 7:12, 15–17; 11:15, 17–18; 12:10–12; 15:3–4; 16:5–7; 18:2–8; 19:2–6). These hymns relate to the interpretation of the visions and provide a clue to the literary structure of Revelation. In the sequence of chs. 4–5, the first two hymns are addressed to God, the next two to the Lamb, and the last one to both. There is also a gradual enlargement in the size of the choirs. The internal movement builds as the last hymn is sung by "every creature in heaven and on earth and under the earth" to "him who sits on the throne and to the Lamb" (5:13).

9–11 The second hymn is sung by the twenty-four elders. When the living creatures confess the truth of God's holy deeds, the response of the highest order of God's heavenly creatures is to relinquish their crowns of honor before the feet of him who alone is "worthy" of "glory and honor and power" because he alone (no man, not even the emperor) is the source and stay of every created thing (Pss 33:6–9; 102:25; 136:5ff.). The expression "by your will they were created and have their being" (v.11) describes first the fact of their existence and then their origin.

b. The scroll and the Lamb (5:1–14)

This chapter is part of the vision that begins at 4:1 and continues through the opening of the seven seals (6:1–8:1; cf. comment on 4:1–8:1). Its center of gravity lies in the three hymns (vv.9, 12, 13) addressed to the Lamb. They beautifully combine the worship of the Lamb (hymns 1 and 2) with the worship of the one who sits on the throne (hymn 3, addressed to both God and the Lamb). The movement of the whole scene focuses on the slain Lamb as he takes the scroll from the hand of the one on the throne. The actions of all other participants are described in terms of worship directed to the Lamb and the one on the throne. The culminating emphasis is on the worthiness of the Lamb to receive worship because of his death.

1 John sees "in the right hand of him who sat on the throne a scroll [GK 1046] with writing on both sides and sealed with seven seals." A problem arises regarding the phrase "with writing on both sides." In ancient times, papyrus rolls were used for public and private documents. Usually the writing was on one side only—the inside part, arranged in vertical columns. Occasionally a scroll was written on both sides; such double-sided writing was for private, nonsalable use in contrast to the usual scrolls written on only one side, which were sold. In the context of ch. 5, a double-sided scroll would signify a scroll full of words. A scroll could be opened only after all the seals were broken.

Scrolls, or folded sheets, were sealed with wax blobs impressed with a signet ring to protect the contents or to guarantee the integrity of the writing. Only the owner could open the seals and disclose the contents. Original documents were usually sealed; copies were not. Sealed documents were kept hidden while unsealed copies were made public (Rev 22:10).

As to the identity and significance of the scroll, there are a number of different views. (1) Ancient Roman wills were sealed with six seals, each of which bore a different name of the sealer and could only be opened by him. This has led some to identify the scroll as the testament of God concerning the promise of the inheritance of his future kingdom. (2) Others find the scroll containing, like Ezekiel's scroll, "words of lament and mourning and woe" (Eze 2:9–10) and depicting the future judgment of the world. (3) Still others find the significance to be the progressive unfolding of the history of the world. As each successive seal is opened, the further contents of the book are revealed. It is the "title-deed" (cf. Jer 32:10–14) to creation that was forfeited by sin in Genesis. By his redeeming death Christ has won the authority to reclaim the earth. (4) A more recent study finds the scroll to be the OT Torah (Law).

Each of these views has merit and may provide elements of truth for the background of the striking imagery in these chapters. Yet each view is vulnerable to criticism. Only from Revelation itself can the content and nature of the scroll be determined. Since the seals hinder the opening of the scroll until they are all broken, we may assume that the seals are preparatory to the opening of the scroll and the disclosure of its contents. This means that the seals have the effect of hiding the contents of the scroll until all are broken (Isa 29:11).

The following internal evidence relating to the contents of the scroll may be noted: (1) Just prior to the opening of the seventh seal, we read, "For the great day of their [i.e., of the One sitting on the throne and the Lamb] wrath has come, and who can stand?" (6:17). (2) When the seventh seal is opened (8:1–5), no immediate events follow on earth—except for the earthquake—as in the first six seals, unless the opening of the seventh seal includes among its events the blowing of the seven trumpets of judgment (8:6–11:15). This appears to be precisely the case. (3) The seventh trumpet likewise is not immediately followed by any specific events on earth (11:15ff.), except for an earthquake and a hailstorm (11:19). But just before the sounding of that trumpet, we read, "The second woe has passed; the third woe is coming soon" (11:14). When the seven angels prepare to pour out "the seven last plagues," symbolized by the bowls, we read that with these bowls "God's wrath is completed" (15:1, 7). Thus it seems reasonable to identify the content of the seventh trumpet with the seven bowls of judgment (chs. 16–19).

Furthermore, frequent references to the events of the seals, trumpets, and bowls appear throughout the remaining visions in Revelation (cf. 19:19ff.; 20:4; 21:9), indicating that the content of the seven-sealed scroll ultimately includes the unfolding of the consummation of the mystery of all things, the goal or end of all history, for both the conquerors and the worshipers of the beast. In 10:7 we are told that in the days of the sounding of the seventh trumpet, "the mystery of God will be accomplished, just as he announced to his servants the prophets." From this it may be concluded that the scroll contains the unveiling of "the mystery of God" that OT prophets foretold (cf. comment on 10:7). Thus the "seals" conceal the mystery, which only Christ can disclose (Da 12:9; Rev 10:4), of how God's judgment and his kingdom will come. In 11:15, when the final trumpet sounds, heavenly voices say, "The kingdom of the world has become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ," indicating that the scroll also contains the announcement of the inheritance of Christ and the saints who will reign with him (5:10).

In conclusion, then, the scroll is not only about judgment or about the inheritance of the kingdom. Rather, it contains the announcement of the consummation of all history—how things will ultimately end for all people: judgment for the world and the final reward of the saints (11:18). Christ alone, as the Messiah, is the executor of the purposes of God and the heir of the inheritance of the world. He obtained this by his substitutionary and propitiatory death on the cross (5:9).

2–4 A mighty angel shouts out a challenge for anyone to come forth who is "worthy" (GK 545) to open the great scroll and its seals. All creation in heaven and earth and under the earth stood motionless and speechless. No one had the authority and virtue for such a task. If the scroll contains both the revelation and the carrying out of the final drama of history, then John's despair can be appreciated. In this vision, the execution of events on earth is ascribed to the Lamb. As the seals are broken and the roll opened, salvation history unfolds until history culminates in the kingdom reign of the Messiah over the whole earth. History, then, has its center in Jesus Christ and its goal in his triumphant reign over all the powers of the world.

5 John's sorrow is assuaged. One of the elders announces that there is one who has "triumphed" (GK 3771; same word as "overcome" in 2:7; 3:21; et al.) because of his death (v.9). Two figurative titles are linked together of the one who is worthy: "the Lion of the tribe of Judah" and "the Root of David." Both are familiar OT messianic titles (Ge 49:9–10; cf. Isa 11:1, 10; Jer 23:5; 33:5; Rev 22:16). Jewish apocalyptic literature used the figure of a lion to designate the conquering Messiah who would destroy Rome. John's understanding of the role and function of the Messiah is both similar to and different from the Jewish understanding of the Messiah.

6 As John looked to see the mighty Lion (the conquering warrior-Messiah from the Root of David), he saw instead the striking figure of a "Lamb" as if it had been slaughtered, standing in the center of the throne court. This new figure portrays sacrificial death and links the Messiah to the OT passover lamb (Ex 12:5–6; Isa 53:7; Jn 1:29, 36; Ac 8:32; 1Co 5:7; 1Pe 1:19). Here John joins the OT royal Davidic Messiah with the Suffering Servant of Isaiah (Isa 42–53). Both prophetic themes come together in Jesus of Nazareth, the true Messiah. "As if it had been slain" (lit., "with its throat cut"; GK 5377) could refer to the "marks of death" that the living Lamb still bore or to his appearance "as if being led to the slaughter," i.e., "marked out for death." The "lamb" metaphor dominates John's thought in the rest of the book (e.g., 6:1ff.; 7:9ff.; 12:11; 13:8; 21:9).

John notices that the Lamb is also the ruler who bears the signs of the fullness of divine omnipotence, dominion, and omniscience ("seven horns and seven eyes"). The "eyes" are more explicitly identified as the "seven spirits of God sent out into all the earth," probably a symbolic reference to the divine Holy Spirit who is sent forth by Christ into the world (1:4; 4:5; cf. a similar view of the Spirit in Jn 14:26; 15:26; 16:7–15).

7 Next the Lamb acts: "He came and took the scroll." Thus, symbolically, the one on the throne authorizes the slain messianic King to execute his plan for the redemption of the world because in and through him, God is at work in history for the salvation of humanity. This dramatic act of seizing the scroll is not itself the act of victory referred to in v.6 and later in v.9. Rather, Christ's victorious death on the cross is the basis of his authority to redeem the world by taking and opening the seven-sealed scroll.

8 The Lamb's act calls forth three hymns of praise (vv.9, 12, 13) from the living creatures and elders. John sees them fall down in worship before the Lamb as they had earlier done before the one on the throne (4:10), thus acknowledging the deity of the Lamb. They have "harps," which are the "lyres" used for the older psalmody (e.g., Pss 33:2; 98:5) but will now be used for the "new song" of praise to the Lamb (v.9; 15:2–3).

The "bowls full of incense" represent the "prayers of the saints" (8:3-4). Prayer (GK 4666) in this scene is not praise but petition. Why do the saints on earth petition God? In 6:10 the martyrs are seen as calling to God for his judgment on those who killed them, and in 8:3–4 the prayers of the saints are immediately connected with the trumpets of God's judgment. These prayers, then, are evidently for God's vindication of the martyred saints. And since v.10 refers to the coming kingdom, it may be that the prayers are petitions for God to judge the world and to extend his kingdom throughout the earth (Lk 18:7–8). "Saints" (GK 41) is simply the normal term for the rank and file of Christians, i.e., those set apart for God's purposes (2Co 1:1; Php 1:1; Rev 11:18; 13:7, 19; 19:8; 22:21).

9 The three hymns interpret the symbolism of the scroll and the Lamb. The number of singers increases from twenty-eight in v.8 to every creature in all creation in v.13. The first two hymns are songs of praise to the Lamb, whereas the last is praise to both the one on the throne and the Lamb (v.13). The first hymn (vv.9–10) is called a "new" song because there was never any like it before in heaven (cf. comment on 14:3).

"You are worthy" (lit., "equal to," "deserving"; GK 545) refers to the qualifications of this person who alone has won the right to take the scroll and open its seals. His worthiness for this task was won by his loving sacrifice on the cross—a direct reference to the earthly death of the human Jesus of Nazareth. Like other NT writers, John views the death of Jesus as a redeeming death.

The death of Jesus broke the stranglehold of the "powers and authorities" over the creation and produced a great victory of liberation for humankind (Col 2:15). It is this victory, obtained through suffering and death, that entitles Christ to execute the unfolding of the mystery of God's consummation of history. The centrality of the Cross and its meaning as a redemptive act comes repeatedly to the fore and should dominate our understanding throughout Revelation (1:5; 5:12; 7:14; 12:11; 13:8; 14:4; 15:3; 19:7, 21:9, 23; 22:3; et al.). Jesus' death secured a salvation universally applied to all classes and peoples of the earth (cf. 7:9).

10 The Lamb's right to open the scroll rests also on his having made the ransomed into a "kingdom" (GK 993) and his making them "priests" (GK 2636) to serve God in praise (cf. Heb 13:15–16). Christians "will reign on the earth" with Christ because they have been given kingly authority through his death (1:6; 20:4–6). While not excluding the present reign of believers, the reference to "the earth" is best taken to refer to the future eschatological kingdom reign of Christ.

11–12 Now John sees a new feature in the vision: "thousands upon thousands, and ten thousand times ten thousand" angels surrounding the throne (cf. Daniel's vision of the countless multitude before the Ancient of Days; Da 7:10). The imagery suggests the infinite honor and power of the One who is at the center of it all. The angels shout out their song of praise to the Lamb who was slain (cf. Heb 1:6). Their sevenfold shout rings out like the sound from a huge bell—"power . . . wealth . . . wisdom . . . strength . . . honor . . . glory . . . praise." All these are intrinsic qualities of Christ, except the last, which is the expression of the creatures' worship. Elsewhere the same qualities are ascribed to God himself (v.13; 7:12).

13–14 Finally, far beyond the precincts of the throne, there arises an expression of praise and worth from the whole created universe to the One on the throne and to the Lamb. John beautifully blends the worship of the Father (ch. 4) and the worship of the Son (5:8–12) together. In appropriate response, the living beings utter their "Amen" (cf. comment on 3:14), and the elders fall down in worship.

2. Opening of the first six seals (6:1–17)

1 The opening of the seals continues the vision begun in chs. 4–5. Now the scene shifts to events on earth. Before the exposition of each of the seals, it will be helpful to consider their overall meaning. As we have already seen (cf. comment on 5:1), the scroll itself involves the rest of Revelation and has to do with the consummation of the mystery of all things, the goal of history for both the overcomers and the beast worshipers. But what do the seals have to do with this mystery? Are the events of the seals representative and simultaneous world happenings that occur during the church age, or do they occur sequentially? Are they part of the final drama or merely preparatory to it? One thing is certain: the Lamb has the scroll and he himself opens the seals.

With the opening of the fifth seal, the martyrs cry out, "How long . . . until you judge the inhabitants of the earth?" and are told to wait "a little longer" (vv.10–11). And when the sixth seal is opened, judgment appears imminent (v.17); this seems to indicate a time progression in the seals. The writer of this commentary tentatively suggests that the seals represent events preparatory to the final consummation. Whether these events come just before the end or represent conditions that prevail throughout the period preceding the end is a more difficult question.

The seals closely parallel the signs of the approaching end times spoken of in Jesus' Olivet Discourse (Mt 24:1–35; Mk 13:1–37; Lk 21:5–33). In these passages the events of the last days fall into three periods: (1) the period of false Christs, wars, famines, pestilences, earthquakes, and death, called "the beginning of birth pains" (Mt 24:8); (2) the period of the Great Tribulation (Mt 24:21; NIV, "great distress"); and, (3) finally, the period "immediately after the distress of those days," when the sun, moon, and stars will be affected and Christ will return (Mt 24:29–30). This parallel to major parts of Revelation is too striking to be ignored. Thus, the seals correspond to the "beginning of birth pains." The events are similar to those occurring under the trumpets (8:2–11:19) and bowls (15:1–16:21), but they should not be confused with those later and more severe judgments. In the eschatological reckoning of time (cf. comment on 1:1), the events immediately preceding the end can stretch out over the whole age of the church, from John's time until now, and can still be viewed as "next" (4:1) in the sense that the "last days" began in the first century and are still continuing (cf. 1Jn 2:18).

The first four seals are distinct from the next two in that they describe four horses of different colors with four riders who are given different powers over the earth. Background for this imagery reflects Zec 1:8ff. and 6:1–8. In Zechariah's visions the horsemen and chariots are divine instruments of judgment on the enemies of God's people, while the colors represent geographical points of the compass. This may also be the best interpretation of the horses and their riders here, where each is sent by Christ through the instrumentality of the living creatures. The emphatic "Come!" (vv.1, 3, 5, 7) should not be viewed as addressed either to John or to Christ but to the horsemen.

2 The identification of the first rider seated on a white horse has given interpreters great difficulty. The main difficulty is whether the rider on the white horse represents Christ and the victory of the gospel or the Antichrist and the forces of evil. In favor of the first identification is the striking similarity of this rider to the portrayal of Christ in 19:11–16, the symbolism of white throughout Revelation always being associated with righteousness and Christ (e.g., 1:14; 2:17; 3:4–5, 18; 4:4; et al.), and the references in the Olivet Discourse to the preaching of the gospel throughout the world before the end.

Support for the identification of the white horse with the Antichrist and his forces is the parallelism with the other three horses, which are instruments of judgment. The references in 19:11–16 to the rider on the white horse as "Faithful and True" and as one who judges and makes war with justice stands in contrast to the rider in 6:2, who is not faithful or true and who wages war for unjust conquest. Moreover, the Lamb opens the seals and would not be one of the riders, nor would it be proper to have an angelic being call forth Christ. Again, a "bow" would most naturally be connected with the enemy of God's people (Eze 39:3). Finally, Jesus himself shows that the first events mentioned are the rise of "false Christs and false prophets" (Mt 24:24).

It must be admitted that the problem of the identity of the rider on the white horse may be solved either way. The evidence, however, seems to favor slightly the second solution, which identifies the white horse with the Antichrist and his forces that seek to conquer the followers of Christ. John sensed that these persecutions were already present in his day and that they would culminate in a final, more severe form (1Jn 2:18; Rev 13:7).

Each of the first four seals, then, represents conflict directed at Christians to test them and to sift out false disciples (v.10). This interpretation need not necessarily eliminate the fact that the seals may also refer to judgments on humankind in general. Yet since the fifth seal stresses the cry of the martyred Christians, probably the thought of Christian persecution belongs also in the first four seals. Each of them unleashes events that separate false belief from true. The destruction of Jerusalem is a case in point (Lk 21:20ff.). The white horse goes forth to conquer, and as he does so, judgment falls on the unbelief of Israel (Lk 21:22–23), while at the same time there is a testing of believers to separate the chaff from the wheat (cf. Lk 21:12–19).

The "bow" suggests forces opposed to Christians (cf. Gog in Eze 39:3). A "crown" (GK 5109) refers to victorious conquest (cf. Rev 19:12). "He was given" is the formula for the sovereign permission to carry out acts that, from a human viewpoint, seem contrary to God's character but nevertheless accomplish his will (cf. 13:5, 7, 15). Thus the rider on the white horse may also point to the attacks of the false Jews (2:9; 3:9) and to the affront to Christians from pagan religionists and the persecutions from Rome, as well as to all future, limited victories over the church by Satan (cf. 2:13; 12:17).

While v.2 would be sobering for first-century believers, at the same time it would encourage them, provided they understood that the Lamb had permitted their testing and suffering. So they could trust that in the midst of seeming defeat from their enemies, he would ultimately be the victor (17:14).

3–4 The second horseman is war and bloodshed. He rides on a "fiery red steed," whose color symbolizes slaughter (2Ki 3:22–23). Therefore, he is given the "large sword" because the number of those he kills is so great (cf. 13:10, 14). John might have thought of Nero's slaughter of Christians, the martyrdom of Antipas (2:13), or perhaps those slain under Domitian's persecutions (cf. Mt 10:34; 24:9).

5–6 The third horseman is poverty and famine. He rides on a "black horse" and symbolizes the effects of war and bloodshed: sorrow, mourning, and desolation (Isa 50:3; Jer 4:28; La 5:10). In the rider's hand there is a "pair of scales." A voice is heard interpreting its significance in economic terms: "a quart of wheat ... and three quarts of barley for a day's wage." This amount suggests food prices much higher than normal and implies inflation and famine (Mt 24:7). A quart of wheat would supply an average person one day's sustenance. Barley was used by the poor to mix with the wheat. The expression "Do not damage the oil and wine" is less clear. Some view oil and wine as luxuries not necessary for survival, and the rich would have them while the poor were starving (cf. Pr 21:17). Others take them as showing the extent of the famine, since a drought affecting the grain may not be severe enough to hurt the vines and olive trees. Oil and wine are staple foods in the East, both in dearth and in prosperity (e.g., Dt 7:13; Hos 2:8, 22). So in this view the third seal brings poverty and partial, though not severe, famine. There is an increasing intensity in the three cycles of judgment.

7–8 The fourth seal reveals a rider on a "pale horse." "Pale" (GK 5952) denotes a yellowish green or the paleness of a sick person in contrast to a healthy appearance. This cadaverous color blends well with the name of the rider—"Death." It probably refers to the death brought by pestilence, or plague, which often follows famine (cf. Jer 14:12; Eze 5:17, 14:71, Lk 21:11). "Hades [cf. comment on 1:18] was following close behind him [Death]." But how? On foot? On the back of the same horse? On a separate horse? Scripture does not say. The growth of intensity in the judgments goes from the sword (human violence), to famine, to plague, and now to the wild beasts of the earth.

9–11 The fifth seal changes the metaphor of horsemen and discloses a scene of martyred saints under the altar crying out for justice upon those who killed them. They are told to wait a little longer until their fellow servants are also killed. Who are these martyrs (cf. 13:15, "all who refused to worship the image of the beast [were] killed"; 8:24, "all who have been killed on the earth"; 20:4, "those who had been beheaded"? The question arises as to why the martyrs alone receive so much attention rather than all suffering or persecuted Christians. Perhaps John is referring to all those who faithfully follow Christ as forming a group that may be characterized as "the slain of the Lord." They may or may not actually suffer physical death for Christ, but they have (like John) so identified themselves with the slain Lamb that they have in effect already offered up their lives "because of the word of God and the testimony they had maintained" (cf. 1:2, 9).

John says that he saw the "souls" (GK 6034) of those slain (v.9). This is generally understood to mean the disembodied souls of these saints. However, the word "soul" has various meanings and probably stands here for the actual persons who were killed. John sees them as persons who are very much alive, even though they have been killed by the beast. "Under the altar" sets the scene as occurring in the temple of heaven. This is most likely the golden altar of incense (see 8:3, 5; 9:13) that stood in the tabernacle either in or before the Most Holy Place (Ex 30:1ff.; Heb 9:4). The other references in Revelation to "altar" also seem to refer to this altar of incense (11:1; 14:18; 16:7). In accord with this sense, the prayers of the saints would be for God's vindication of the martyrs of Christ (cf. Lk 18:7–8).

The martyred address God as "Sovereign Lord" (GK 1305). This term implies "ownership" and is used elsewhere in the NT to denote slave masters (1Ti 6:1; 1Pe 2:18), God (Lk 2:29; Ac 4:24), or Jesus Christ (2Pe 2:1; Jude 4). (On the phrase "holy and true," see comment on 3:7.) The martyrs cry for God's vengeance on evildoers. The word "avenge" (GK 1688) relates everywhere in Scriptures to the idea of punishment or retribution. These saints follow the teaching of Paul in Ro 12:19 about leaving vengeance to the Lord. Though believers are forbidden to take revenge, God will vindicate his elect by punishing those who killed them (Lk 18:7–8; 2Th 1:8).

The martyrs were each given a "white robe" as an evidence of their righteousness and victory before the Judge of all the earth, who will speedily avenge their deaths. The wait of a "little longer" is in God's estimate but a fleeting moment, though for us it may stretch out for ages (cf. 12:12; 20:3; cf. Ps 90:4). The expression "until the number of their fellow servants . . . was completed" means either that the number of the martyred or their companions on earth who will be killed will be completed, or that their fellow servants on earth will fulfill their Christian calling, which will involve martyrdom. In any event, what constitutes the essence of Christian discipleship in John's eyes should not be overlooked: every believer should be prepared for martyrdom.

12–14 The sixth seal is broken by the Lamb, and John witnesses certain eschatological signs heralding the imminent, final day of the Lord so often described in Scripture (e.g., Isa 2:10, 19, 21; 13:10; Jer 4:29; Joel 2:31; 3:15; Zep 1:14–18; Mt 24:29; et al.). The signs are threefold: (1) the great earthquake and its storm affecting the sun and moon, (2) the stars falling, and (3) the terror on earth (vv.15–17). It is difficult to know how literally the whole description should be taken. Some of the events are described from the standpoint of ancient cosmology—e.g., the falling of the stars to earth like figs from a shaken tree, the sky rolling up like a scroll, and the firmament suspended like a roof over the earth being shaken by the great earthquake.

The scene, whether taken literally or figuratively, is one of catastrophe and distress for the inhabitants of the earth. As later biblical authors seized on the earlier imagery of the theophany on Sinai to describe appearances of God to his people (e.g., Hab 3:3ff.), so John utilizes the imagery of the OT to describe this terrible visitation of God's final judgment on the earth. Just as we might describe a chaotic situation by saying "all hell broke loose" (though not intending to be taken in a strictly literal sense), so the biblical writers use the language of cosmic turmoil to describe the condition of the world when God comes to judge the earth (v.17). "Earthquakes" are mentioned in 8:5; 11:13, 19; 16:18 and sun, moon, and/or stellar disturbances in 8:12; 9:2; 16:8. Of course, physical phenomena may accompany the final judgment.

15–17 These verses record the terror of all classes of people at these events and at the wrath of God and the Lamb. "The kings of the earth, the princes [dignitaries], the generals" describe the powerful; "the rich, the mighty" describe the affluent and the heroes; finally, John refers to political distinctions of the widest kind—"every slave and every free man." Since all kinds of people are included, we cannot say that God's wrath is directed only at the powerful, at the rich, or at false Christians. His judgment will fall on all who refuse to repent and instead worship demons and idols and persecute Christ's followers (9:20–21; 16:6, 9).

The plea of people for the rocks and mountains to fall on them (v.16) occurs in OT contexts of God's judgment (Isa 2:19, 21; Hos 10:8). It expresses the desire to be buried under the falling mountains and hills so as to escape the pains and terrors of the judgment. Jesus said that the inhabitants of Jerusalem would cry out in this way when God's judgment fell on the city, in A.D. 70 (Lk 23:30).

The "wrath" (GK 3973) of the Lamb is not only a new metaphor but a paradoxical one. Lambs are usually gentle. But this Lamb shows "wrath" against those who have refused his grace (cf. Jn 5:27). Henceforth in Revelation the wrath of God and of the Lamb is a continuing theme and is described under the figures of the trumpets and bowls (11:18; 14:7, 10, 19; 15:1, 7; 16:1, 19; 19:15). Moreover, God's wrath is a present historical reality as well as an eschatological judgment (cf. Ro 1:18ff.; 2:5). So great is the day of destruction that they cry out, "Who can stand?" (cf. Joel 2:11; Na 1:6; Mal 3:2).

3. First Interlude (7:1–17)

Indications that ch. 7 is a true interlude are both the change in tone from the subject matter referred to in the sixth seal and the delay until 8:1 in opening the seventh seal. Two main subjects may be distinguished in this chapter. John first sees the angels who will unleash destruction on the earth restrained until the 144,000 servants of God from every tribe of Israel are sealed (vv.1–8). Then he sees an innumerable multitude clothed in white standing before the throne of God, identified as those who have come out of the "great tribulation" (vv.9–17). This chapter, one of the most difficult and yet most important in the book, probably functions both prospectively and retrospectively. Its principal exegetical difficulty centers around the identification of the 144,000 and of the innumerable multitude. Is the reference to the tribes of Israel symbolic, representative, or literal? What is the "great tribulation" (v.14)? Are those described in vv.9–17 martyrs?

a. The 144,000 Israelites (7:1–8)

1–3 The "four angels" at "the four corners of the earth" hold "the four winds of the earth" from blowing on the earth until the servants of God are sealed on their foreheads. The expression "the four corners of the earth" was used in antiquity among the Near-Eastern nations much as we use "the four points of the compass." Since nowhere in Revelation do we read of the four winds actually blowing, they may be taken as representing the earthly catastrophes that occur under the trumpets and bowls.

Another angel comes from the "east" (possibly from Jerusalem, to emphasize its mission of salvation?) and calls to the four others not to release their destruction until the servants of God have a "seal" (GK 5382) on their foreheads. Such a seal indicates ownership by God and the Lamb (14:1). It also offers protection or security for the bearers (cf. 9:4, where the demonic forces are told to harm "only those people who did not have the seal of God on their foreheads").

We can better understand the "seal" if we examine what John sees regarding the "mark" (GK 5916) of the beast (13:16–17). Those who have the mark are not only identified as beast worshipers but they have become the objects of God's irreversible wrath (14:9, 11). This implies, by contrast, that those who have "the seal of God" are God worshipers and are the objects of his abiding grace. In 16:2, the bowl of God's wrath seems directed exclusively toward those who have the mark of the beast, thus excluding those with the seal of God (cf. 16:6). Furthermore, those having the mark of the beast are deluded by the beast (19:20), whereas the sealed of God are apparently not deceived. Finally, a martyred group is seen just prior to their resurrection and thousand-year reign with Christ and are described as not having the mark of the beast or worshiping him (20:4).

In the light of these passages, we may say that the "sealed" are the people of God and that their sealing must be related to their salvation (cf. Paul's use of "sealed" in 2Co 1:22; Eph 1:13; 4:30). Elsewhere, the sealed are described as those "who had been redeemed from the earth" (14:3–4; cf. Ro 8:23; Jas 1:18). In fact, "baptism" was considered a "seal" of salvation in the early church. While the seal may not protect the sealed against harm inflicted by human agency (13:7; 20:4), they are protected from the divine plagues (16:2). As for OT background, Eze 9:4–7 seems primary. In this passage, a divine messenger with stylus in hand was to go through the apostate Jerusalem of Ezekiel's day and put a mark upon the foreheads of those who deplored the faithless idolatry of the Israelites. Those so marked were the faithful and true servants of God; they would be spared the divine slaughtering of the rebellious inhabitants of the city.

The sealing language would have the effect of assuring God's people of his special concern and plan for them. Even when facing persecution and martyrdom at the hand of the beast, they can be certain that no plague from God will touch them but that they will be in his presence forever because they are his very own possession (cf. 3:10). Therefore, the seal on the forehead is a divine mark of ownership, the presence of the Holy Spirit (cf. 2Co 1:22; Eph 1:13; 4:30). Consequently, those thus sealed must be Christians and not unconverted Jews or Gentiles.

4 John next gives the number of those sealed—144,000—and their identification: "From all the tribes of Israel." There are two principal views regarding the identification of this group: (1) The number and the tribal identifications are taken literally and refer to 144,000 Jewish Christians who are sealed (to protect them from destruction) during the time of the Great Tribulation. (2) John uses the language of the new Israel and thus refers the 144,000 to the completed church composed of Jew and Gentile.

In support of the first view is the normal usage of "Israel" in the NT as referring to the physical descendants of Jacob (Gal 6:16 is too uncertain to be conclusive). There is no unambiguous identification of the church with Israel until A.D. 160, and even then the term "Israel of God" is not used for the church. Reference to the twelve tribes (vv.5–8) would most naturally be understood to refer to the ancient historic Israel and not to the church. Thus, John is symbolically describing the beginning of what Paul foretold in Ro 11:25–29 as the salvation of "all Israel."

In support of the second view is the fact that the NT identifies the followers of Christ as "Abraham's seed" (Gal 3:29), as "the true circumcision" (Php 3:3) and as the "Israel of God" (Gal 6:16, though disputed). John himself has already made a distinction between the true Jew and the false (cf. Rev 2:9; 3:9); that could imply that here in ch. 7 he intends also to designate the church as the true Israel. Additional support is found if there is a unity between the first and second groups in ch. 7, groups that otherwise must be treated as different and unconnected.

Without discussing at length this disputed issue, we agree that those who argue that the term "Israel" in other NT books refers exclusively to Jews are in our opinion correct. Strict exegesis, however, must also ask whether the author of Revelation wishes the term to have this same more restricted usage or whether he in fact uses it differently. It is plausible that the usage of the term "Jew" among Christians had undergone a historic development from the earlier days when Paul wrote Romans (A.D. 56) until Revelation was written toward the close of the century. Paul himself made a distinction between the true, spiritual Jew and the physical descendants of Abraham (Ro 2:28–29; 9:8). Only those Jews who recognized Jesus as Messiah could rightly be called "Israel" (Ro 9:6), though the term might be used with qualifications to refer to the historic descendants of Jacob ("Israel after the flesh" [lit. tr. of 1Co 10:18]). Peter likewise described the church (Jew and Gentile) in terms drawn from the OT that historically describe the true people of God among the Jewish descendants ("holy priesthood . . . chosen people . . . royal priesthood . . . holy nation" [1Pe 2:4, 9]). Moreover, Gentiles who received Jesus as the Messiah and Lord were considered "Abraham's seed" (Gal 3:29) and the true "circumcision" (Php 3:3).

Already in Revelation the distinction has been made between Jews who were Jews in name only and not true Jews because they did not acknowledge Jesus as Lord (2:9; 3:9). Also, John uses the OT image of the people of Israel as a "kingdom" and "priests" to God for the followers of Jesus (1:6). Similarly, many promises to the victors in the churches of Asia (chs. 2–3) are fulfillments of OT promises given to the true people of Israel. In Christ's rebuke to the churches, we have the OT imagery of "Balaam" and "Jezebel" describing error that had influenced not the OT Israel but the NT church. In 21:9–12, the church is called the "bride, the wife of the Lamb"; she is identified with the New Jerusalem, and on its twelve gates are inscribed the "names of the twelve tribes of Israel." Even in the Gospel of John, Jesus is the "true vine," which many commentators understand to be an allusion to the vine that decorated the temple entrance and stood as a symbol for Israel (cf. Isa 5:1ff. with Jn 15:1ff.). Jesus is thus claiming to be the true Israel and his followers are the branches, who are related to the true Israel (cf. Ro 11:17–24).

This usage is evident in the NT itself; the only question is whether John takes the final step in Revelation and, in the context of a largely Gentile church, uses the OT terminology to speak of the church. It is entirely possible that when the church actually separated itself from Israel (as seems apparent in Revelation), it could appropriate to itself the name "Israel." Other Jewish sectarian groups (such as at Qumran) also restricted the name "Israel" to their group and denied its use to other Jews. Thus in John's mind the followers of Jesus (14:4) are undoubtedly the true servants of God, the Israel of God (cf. Jn 11:51–52).

The identification of the 144,000 with the whole elect people of God, including both Jews and Gentiles, does not negate Paul's teaching to the effect that the majority of the Jews themselves will one day be brought back into a relationship of salvation before God. John simply is not dealing with Paul's emphasis at this point in Revelation (but cf. 11:2–3).

The number 144,000 is obviously obtained by combining 12,000 for each of the twelve tribes of Israel (vv.5–8). Earlier (cf. 4:4), twenty-four (a multiple of twelve) served as a symbolic number. The "thousand" multiple appears again later, in relation to the size of the Holy City: "He measured the city with the rod and found it to be 12,000 stadia in length, and as wide and high as it is long" (21:16). Thus, 12,000 is symbolic of completeness and perfection. Even the wall is "144 cubits" (i.e., twelve times twelve; v.17). The tree of life bearing "twelve crops of fruit, yielding its fruit every month" (i.e., twelve months; 22:2) further supports the view that John intends the number twelve to be taken symbolically. By 144,000, he signifies the sealing of the total number of God's servants who will face the Great Tribulation.

Those who are sealed come from "all the tribes of Israel," and this emphasizes even more the universality and comprehensiveness of the Christian gospel. Whereas in first-century Judaism there were many sects with exclusive tribal claims to being the "true Israel," for the followers of Jesus all such sectarianism is broken down and all groups, regardless of race, culture, religious background, or geographical location, are accepted before God (7:9; 14:4). There is an exclusivism in Revelation, but it is based on loyalty to Christ.

5–8 John goes even further. He enumerates each of the twelve tribes and their number: "From the tribe of Judah 12,000 were sealed," etc. Why was it necessary to provide this detailed enumeration? And why the particular tribal selection? In answering these difficult questions, some facts about the list should be noted. John places Judah first, evidently to emphasize the priority of the messianic King who came from the tribe of Judah (5:5; cf. Heb 7:13–14). Nowhere in the tribal listings of the OT except in the space arrangement of the wilderness camp (Nu 2:3ff.) does Judah come first. This exception may itself be linked with the messianic expectation through Judah (Ge 49:10; 1Ch 5:2). John's priority of Judah is comparable to the emphasis placed in Judaism on the tribe of Levi (the priestly tribe). It is significant that John includes Levi among the other tribes, and thus gives no special place to the Levitical order; he places Levi in the comparatively unimportant eighth place.

The particular order and names of the tribes as given here by John are unique. The OT has no fewer than twenty variant lists of the tribes, and these lists include anywhere from ten to thirteen tribes, though the number twelve is predominant (cf. Ge 49; Dt 33; Eze 48). The grouping of twelve may be a way of expressing the corporate identity of the elect people of God as a whole and may be maintained—even artificially at times—to preserve this identity (cf. the "twelfth" apostle chosen when Judas fell [Ac 1:25–26]). John omits Dan (which elsewhere is always included) and Ephraim. In order to maintain the ideal number twelve with these omissions, he must list both Joseph and Manasseh as tribes. This is peculiar because the tribe of Joseph is always mentioned in the other lists by either including Joseph and excluding his two sons, Ephraim and Manasseh (Ge 49), or vice versa (Eze 48). Moreoever, only when the Levitical priesthood gained more prominence was the tribe of Levi omitted from the lists and replaced by the two sons of Joseph.

Various efforts have been made to solve the enigma of John's list and especially to explain the absence of the tribe of Dan. While no solution is completely satisfactory, the early church held that the Antichrist would arise from the tribe of Dan (this belief may in fact be a pre-Christian Jewish tradition). Furthermore, Dan was associated in the OT with idolatry (Jdg 18:18–19; 1Ki 12:29–30). This may be the clue. If John sought to expose Christian idolatry and beast worship in his day by excluding Dan from the list of those sealed, it may also be possible to explain, on the same basis, why Manasseh and Joseph were chosen to fill up the sacred number rather than Manasseh and Ephraim, for in the OT Ephraim was also explicitly identified with idolatry (Hos 4:17).

If idolatry is the reason for omitting Dan and Ephraim, the readjustment of the list to include Joseph and Manasseh to complete the twelve can be understood. Since Dan will be reckoned first in the tribal listing of the restored eschatological Jewish community (Eze 48) and John's list puts Judah first, it may be that John's listing describes the church, not ethnic Israel.

It is important to note that John does not equate the 144,000 with everyone in the tribes. Rather, his repeated use of the preposition "from" (lit., "out of"; GK 1666) in vv.4–8 implies that the sealed were an elect group chosen out of the tribes. If John had the actual Jewish Israel in view, this use of "from" would indicate an election from the whole nation. On the other hand, if he intended to imply something about the church, his language might indicate God's selecting the true church out "from" the professing church. This thought has already been mentioned (cf. 2:14ff., 20ff.; 3:16ff.) and is supported by Eze 9:4–7, where the seal distinguished the true servants of God from the false ones among the professing people of God. Paul states the same thought: "Nevertheless, God's solid foundation stands firm, sealed with this inscription: 'The Lord knows those who are his,' and 'Everyone who confesses the name of the Lord must turn away from wickedness'" (2Ti 2:19).

The description of the judgments under the sixth seal (6:12ff.) ends with the question, "The great day of their wrath has come, and who can stand?" (6:17). John answers this question by implying that only the true servants of God, who are divinely sealed, can be protected from the wrath of God and the Lamb.

b. The great white-robed multitude (7:9–17)

John now sees a great multitude from every nation and cultural background, standing before the throne of God and clothed in white robes. They are identified by the angel as those "who have come out of the great tribulation" (v.14). Again, the question is that of identity. Are they the Gentiles who are saved in the Tribulation in contrast to the Jews in vv.1–8? Presumably not, because they are described as coming from every nation and tribe and language, and this would mean both Jews and Gentiles. Are they martyrs who have given their lives in the Great Tribulation and have been slain by the beast? If martyrs, are they the rest of those to be killed referred to when the fifth seal is opened (6:11)? Are they the complete group of martyrs? Or do they represent the whole company of the redeemed in Christ as seen in glory?

Although there is no direct evidence that the great multitude are martyrs, there are some indications of this: (1) they are seen in heaven "before the throne" (v.9) and "in his temple" (v.15); (2) they are described as those "who have come out of the great tribulation" (v.14). Thus it is assumed that, since they have died in the Great Tribulation, they have most likely been martyred because the Tribulation will be a time of great killing of the saints (17:6; 18:24, 19:2; 20:4; et al.). The multitude would then not be the whole company of the martyred throughout history but only those who were victims of the beast persecution during the Great Tribulation. The group is then those future martyrs referred to under the fifth seal as those "who were to be killed as they had been" (6:11). They cannot be seen as the whole redeemed church, unless all Christians are to be identified with the martyrs.

The identification of this second group is related to the identification of the first one (vv.1–8). Some argue that the two groups must be different since the first is numbered, the second innumerable; the first is limited to Jews, the second refers to every nation. These objections are not serious if we recall that in vv.1–8, (1) the number of the sealed was symbolic and not literal, and (2) the delineation of the Twelve Tribes was seen as John's deliberate attempt to universalize the election of God. Thus what some have seen as contrasts may actually be designed to complement each other and show the continuity of the first group with the second. Furthermore, we should bear in mind that John does not see any group at all in vv.1–8 but merely hears the number of the sealed, whereas in vv.9–17 he actually sees a group and describes what he sees and hears. Therefore, the unity of both groups can be maintained and vv.9–17 understood as the interpretative key to the 144,000. John's vision then leaps ahead to a scene in heaven after the Great Tribulation has run its course and views the glorified Tribulation saints as being in God's presence, at rest from their trial and serving him continually.

Two variations of the more literal Jewish identity of those in vv.1–8 and the relationship of this first group to the second (vv.9–17) are popular today. (1) Some see the 144,000 as a select group of Jews who will be converted to Jesus shortly after the rapture of the church to heaven. These Jewish evangelists will preach the gospel to the world during the Tribulation, resulting in a great multitude of Gentiles being converted to Christ. (2) Others, accepting a posttribulational view of the church's rapture, understand the 144,000 as a literal Jewish remnant preserved physically through the Tribulation and converted immediately after the Rapture. They will be the people who will constitute the beginning of the restored Jewish Davidic Kingdom at the inception of the millennial reign of Christ on the earth.

There are three different types of "tribulation" (GK 2568), and it is important to distinguish between them. (1) There is tribulation that is inseparable from Christian life in the world (Jn 16:33; Ac 14:22; Ro 5:3; 2Ti 2:11–12; 1Pe 4:12; Rev 1:9; 2:10; et al.). All Christians during all ages participate in tribulation; they share in the continuing sufferings of Christ (Col 1:24).

(2) The Bible also speaks of an intense tribulation that will come on the final generation of Christians and climax all previous persecutions (see Da 12:1; Mt 24:21; 2Th 2:3ff.). In Revelation this more intense persecution is mentioned in 7:14; 11:7–10; 13:7; 16:6; possibly the events under the fifth seal should be included here (6:9–11). This future tribulation is distinguished from previous persecutions of the church in its intensity, in its immediate connection with Christ's second coming, and in the presence of Antichrist during it.

(3) Scripture also speaks of a future time of God's intense wrath on unbelievers. Revelation refers to this as "the great day of their wrath" (6:17) and "the hour of trial that is going to come upon the whole world to test those who live on the earth" (3:10). Such wrath from God comes especially under the trumpets and bowls (8:2ff.; 16:1ff.). Probably drawing on the teaching of Jesus in the Olivet Discourse (Mt 24), Paul refers to this punitive action of God in 2Th 1:6–10. While for Christians the Great Tribulation may be concurrent with a portion of the period of God's wrath on the rebellious, the final and more intense judgment of God seems to follow the Great Tribulation itself and is directly connected with the coming of Christ (Mt 24:29; Rev 6:12ff.; 19:11ff.).

9 "A great multitude . . . from every nation, tribe, people and language" might well describe the crowds common to the agora or the quay of a seaport in first-century Asia. Similar fourfold descriptions of the members of the Christian community or of the inhabitants of the world occur in 5:9: 11:9; 13:7; 14:6: 17:15. "Standing before the throne and in front of the Lamb" signifies their position of acceptance and honor as God's true servants (cf. v.15) and reminds us of the continuity of this vision with the earlier vision of the throne and the Lamb (chs. 4–5). This group seems to complete the full circle of participants before the throne begun in ch. 4.

Their "white robes" impress John and are an important feature of the vision (vv.9, 13–14). We cannot fail to connect them with the white robes given the martyrs under the fifth seal (6:11). The white robes symbolize salvation and victory (v.10), and their possessors obtained them by "[washing] their robes and [making] them white in the blood of the Lamb" (v.14). This implies that they were true recipients of Christ's redemption in contrast to others who, though professing belief in Christ, were not genuine overcomers (cf. 3:5–6, 18). "The blood of the Lamb" connotes here more than the profound reference to the sacrificial death of Jesus (5:9); it also suggests faithful witness in following Jesus in his death (2:13; 12:11).

"Palm branches" are referred to only one other time in the NT (Jn 12:13), where they are connected with the Passover. Moses provided that palms should be used at the Feast of Tabernacles (Lev 23:40). Later they were used on other Jewish festal occasions (1 Macc 13:51; 2 Macc 10:7). Jewish coins of the period 140 B.C. to A.D. 70 frequently contain palms and some have the inscription "the redemption of Zion." Palms were emblems of victory. In Jn 12 they denote the triumph of Christ, while here in Revelation the reference is to the victory of the servants of Christ.

10 In accord with the literary symmetry of chs. 4–7, this group also expresses their worship of the King and the Lamb. Their praise to God is for his "salvation" (GK 5401), not their own accomplishments. Since this same word is associated with the final manifestation of God's power and kingdom (12:10; 19:1), here it may also denote God's final victory over sin and the principalities of this world that crucified Christ and that kill his true disciples (cf. Isa 49:8; 2Co 6:2).

11–12 Finally, the angelic hosts (cf. 5:12–13) respond to the cry of the redeemed (v.10) with "Amen" and voice their praise and worship of God for the salvation given to humanity (cf. Lk 15:10).

13–14 After the manner of the OT apocalyptic passages, the interpreting angel asks concerning the white-robed throng, "Who are they, and where did they come from?" (cf. Da 7:15–16; Zec 1:9, 19; 4:1–6). Here and in 5:5 are the only references in Revelation to an elder speaking individually, a fact that supports the view that the elders in Revelation are angels and not a symbolic group representing the church. The reference to the washed robes should be viewed in relation to 3:4, where soiled clothes represent defection from Christ through unbelief and worship of false gods (cf. 21:8). On the "great tribulation," see comments on 7:9–17.

15 This and the following verses describe the activity and condition of the true servants of God in their future and eternal relation to the Lamb. This scene is one of the most beautiful in the Bible. In it those who have washed their robes in the blood of the Lamb are described as being before the throne of God without fear or tremor, fully accepted by the divine Majesty. What are they doing? Theirs is no state of passivity but of continual service of God in praise and worship.

The reference to the "temple" (GK 3724) of God raises the question whether the scene describes the final state of the saints or an intermediate state, since 21:22 tells us that the New Jerusalem has no temple. However, the language used in vv.15–17 (esp. v.17) seems to depict the same condition as that of the saints in chs. 21–22 (cf. 21:3–4, 6; 22:1). Since v.15 relates to worship, it would be appropriate to refer to the presence of God and the Lamb as "in" the temple. In 21:22, however, the future existence of the people of God is described as a city; and in that glorious city, unlike the pagan cities of the present world, there will be no special temple in which to worship God because God himself and the Lamb will be present everywhere.

To "spread his tent [GK 5012] over them" calls to mind the Shekinah presence in the OT tabernacle or temple (Ex 40:34–38; 1Ki 8:10–11; cf. Eze 10:4, 18–19) and later in Jesus (Jn 1:14) and also the idea of a permanent heavenly dwelling (Rev 21:3). Never again will these people endure torment. They have the supreme protection of the living God himself.

16 The condition described here contrasts to the earthly experience of those who suffered much for their faith (cf. Heb. 11:37–38). For them, starvation, thirst, and the burning desert are forever past. There may be allusion here to Isa 49:10, which places the time of relief from such distresses in the days of Messiah's kingdom. There may also be an allusion to what the four horsemen bring (6:1–8; cf. Mt 24:7).

17 We now have a beautiful pastoral figure—that of the Lamb shepherding his people (cf. Jn 10:1–8; Heb 13:20; 1Pe 2:25). It is not through some perfect environment but through the continual ministry of the Lamb that their sufferings are forever assuaged. Whereas on earth their enemies may have tormented them, now the Lamb guides them: "He will lead them to springs of living water." In contrast to the burning thirst they

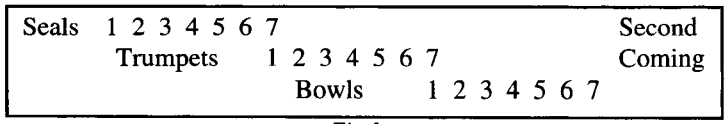

Fig 1

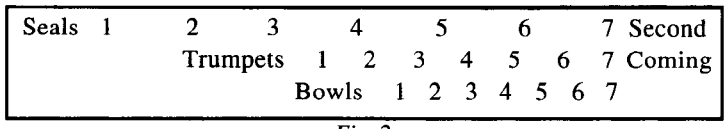

Fig. 2

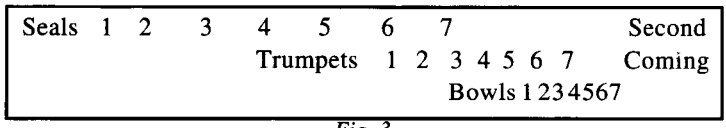

Fig. 3

What is the relationship among the seals, trumpets, and bowls? Many scholars consider them to be sequential, just as they appear in the book (see Fig. 1). Others hold that these three all conclude at precisely the same point in time, so that each group of seven steps back from the end of the preceding sequence (see Fig. 2). Still others read the seven trumpets as describing the missing judgments of the seventh seal, and the seven bowls as describing the missing judgments of the seventh trumpet (see Fig. 3). These charts are taken by permission from The NIV Compact Bible Commentary by John Sailhamer (Zondervan, 1994).

experienced in their tribulation, now they will enjoy the refreshing waters of life. Thus in the future life the saints will not know stagnation, boredom, or satiation (Ps 23:1–2; Jer 2:13; Eze 47:1–12; Zec 14:8).

Finally, even the sorrowful memory of the pain and suffering of the former days will be mercifully removed by the Father: "God will wipe away every tear from their eyes" (cf. 21:4). Tribulation produces tears. Like a tenderhearted, devoted mother, God will wipe each tear from their eyes with the eternal consolations of glory itself. Never again will they cry out because of pain or suffering.

4. Opening of the seventh seal (8:1)

1 After the long interlude of ch. 7, the sequence of the opening of the seals is resumed by the opening of the final or seventh seal. This action provides both a conclusion to the seals and a preparation for the seven trumpets. The praises ordinarily heard uninterruptedly in heaven (4:8) now cease in order to allow the prayers of the suffering, persecuted saints on earth for deliverance and justice to be heard (6:10; 8:4; cf. Lk 18:2–8). Most interpreters, however, understand the silence to refer to the awesome silence before the great storm of God's wrath on the earth. A kind of Sabbath pause might be thought of here.

B. The Seven Trumpets (8:2–11:19)

1. Preparatory: the angel and the golden censer (8:2–5)

2–4 While the seven seals were opened by the Lamb himself, the judgments of the seven trumpets and the seven bowls (15:1) are executed by seven angels. Before the trumpet judgments are executed, another angel enacts a symbolic scene in heaven. He takes a golden censer filled with incense and offers the incense on the altar in behalf of the prayers of all God's people. Earlier, John mentioned the altar that was near God's presence (6:9). A strong assurance is here given to the suffering followers of Christ that their prayers for vindication are not forgotten because God will speedily vindicate them from their enemies' assaults. So close is the altar to God that the incense cloud of the saints' prayers rises into his presence and cannot escape his notice (cf. Ps 141:2).

5 The censer or firepan is now used to take some of the burning coals from the altar and cast them to the earth. Symbolically, this represents the answer to the prayers of the saints through the visitation on earth of God's righteous judgments. God next appears on earth in a theophany. The language, reminiscent of Sinai with its thunder, lightning, and earthquake, indicates that God has come to vindicate His saints (Ex 19:16–19; Rev 4:5; 11:19; 16:18).

2. Sounding of the first six trumpets (8:6–9:21)

6 Two questions confront the interpreter at this point: (1) What is the relationship of the trumpets to the preceding seals and the following bowls? (2) Are the events described symbolic or literal?

In answer to the first question, there are two options: either the series are parallel and simultaneous or they are sequential. It is not possible to decide with certainty for either view, for each contains elements of truth. This commentary has already argued for the chronological priority of the first five seals to the events of the trumpets and bowls (see comment on 6:1). But the sixth seal seems to take us into the period of the outpouring of God's wrath that is enacted in the trumpet and bowl judgments (6:12–17).

The sequential factors are as follows: (1) There is a rise in the intensity of the judgments (only a part of earth and humankind is affected in the trumpets, but all are affected under the bowls). (2) There is a difference in sequence and content of the events described in each series. (3) The reference to those not sealed in 9:4 (fifth trumpet) presupposes the sealing of 7:1–8. (4) The explicit statement in 8:12 implies a sequence between seals and trumpets—"When he opened the seventh seal . . . I saw the seven angels . . . to them were given seven trumpets." (5) The bowl judgments are directly called the "last plagues" because with them God's wrath is "completed" (15:1), implying the prior trumpet judgments. When the seventh bowl is poured out, the words "It is done" are spoken (16:17).

On the other hand, there are parallelisms. The sixth-seventh seal (6:12ff.), the seventh trumpet (11:15ff.), and the seventh bowl (16:17ff.) all seem to depict events associated with the second coming of Christ. This last event parallelism may indicate that all these series (seals, trumpets, bowls) are parallel in their entirety or that there is a partial recapitulation or overlap in the three series. The text seems to demand some type of sequential understanding and hence rules out a complete parallelism.

The main question is whether the parallelism indicates that the events described under the sixth-seventh seal, seventh trumpet, and seventh bowl are identical or merely similar and hence really sequential. Here the following points are relevant: (1) The sixth seal brings us into the period of God's wrath on the beast worshipers but does not actually advance beyond that event to refer to the coming of Christ (6:12–17). (2) The seventh seal introduces the trumpet judgments, which run their course, and the seventh trumpet seems to bring us into the kingdom of Christ (11:15–18). (3) The seventh bowl likewise brings us to the consummation and return of Christ, that is, if we keep in mind that the incident of Babylon's destruction is an elaboration of events under the seventh bowl (16:17ff.; 19:11ff.).

But are all three series parallel in their last events or only parallel in the last trumpet and last bowl? It seems apparent that the "third woe" (9:12; 11:14) is never fulfilled by the seventh trumpet, unless the content of the seventh trumpet is the seven bowls, which is also the "third woe." This is another way of saying that there is some limited recapitulation or overlap with the seventh seal and the first trumpets and in the seventh trumpet with the first bowls. This might be called a telescopic view of the seals, bowls, and trumpets. Further support for this view is also found in observing that interludes come between the sixth and seventh seals and between the sixth and seventh trumpets but not between the sixth and seventh bowls, which would be expected if the trumpets were strictly parallel to the bowls.

The second problem concerns the literalness of the events described under each trumpet. The important but hard question is not literal versus nonliteral but what John intended. Some things may need to be understood more literally and others symbolically. For example, the reference to the army of 200 million (9:16–19) can hardly be literal (cf. comment on 9:16). Either the number is figurative or the army refers to demonic powers rather than human soldiers. It is also difficult to handle literally the reference to the eagle that speaks human words (8:13). While there is no way to settle this problem finally, this exposition will attempt to steer between a literal approach and a totally symbolic one.

As in the seals, there is a discernible literary pattern in the unfolding of the trumpets. The first four trumpets are separated from the last three, which are called "woes" (8:13; 9:12; 11:14), and are generally reminiscent of the plagues in Exodus. While John refers in 15:3 to the Song of Moses (Ex 15:1–18), he does not follow out the plague parallelism precisely, and the connections should not always be pressed.

Shofar "trumpets" (GK 4894; made of a ram's horn) were used in Jewish life as signaling instruments. They sounded alarms for war or danger as well as for peace and announced the new moon, the beginning of the Sabbath, or the death of a notable. Trumpets were also used to throw enemies into panic (Jdg 7:19–20). Their use as eschatological signals of the day of the Lord or the return of Christ is well established in the OT and NT (Isa 27:13; Joel 2:1; Zep 1:16; Mt 24:31; 1Co 15:52; 1Th 4:16).

7 The first trumpet. Hail and fire remind one of the fourth plague of the Exodus (Ex 9:23–26), with added intensity suggested by the reference to hail and fire mixed with blood (cf. Eze 38:22). A "third" refers to a relative fraction of the total and should not be construed as a specific amount (cf. Eze 5:2; Zec 13:8–9).

8–9 The second trumpet. A huge blazing mass like a mountain is thrown into the sea and turns part of iy into blood. This suggests the first plague, when the Nile was turned blood red and the fish were destroyed (Ex 7:20–21; cf. Zep 1:3). Reference to the destruction of ships shows the intense turbulence of the sea.

10–11 The third trumpet. John next sees a huge fiery star fall on the rivers and springs of water and turn a part of these fresh-water supplies into very bitter water. The star's name is "Wormwood," which refers to the bitter herb Artemesia absinthium found in the Near East and mentioned elsewhere in the Bible (Jer 9:15; 23:15; La 3:15, 19; Am 5:7). It is not clear whether John intended the star to be understood as an angel as in 9:1 and in 1:20. Here is the first reference in the plagues to the loss of human life (cf. 9:15, 20). This plague, aimed at the fresh water, is a counterpart of the preceding one, which was aimed at the sea.

12 The fourth trumpet. The heavens are struck with partial darkness, reminiscent of the ninth plague (Ex 10:21–23). The references to "a third of . . ." refer to a partial impairment of the ordinary light from these bodies. In the OT the darkening of the heavens appears in connection with the theophany of God in judgment (cf. Isa 13:10; Eze 32:7–8; Joel 2:10; 3:15; cf. Mt 24:29). An unusual darkness also attended the crucifixion of Christ (Mt 27:45).

13 Before the last three trumpets sound, John hears a flying eagle call out "woe" (GK 4026) three times. His cry announces the especially grievous nature of the last three plagues, which kill a third part of the population of the earth (9:18). Two of the woes are identified with the fifth and sixth trumpets (9:12; 11:14). (See the comments on 8:6, which argue that the third woe should be seen as the seven bowl judgments in 16:1ff.) The "inhabitants of the earth" distinguishes the Christ rejecters of the world from the true, faithful followers of the Lamb (cf. comment on 3:10). A flying "eagle" announces these words. This must be taken symbolically. In Revelation there are two other references to eagles (4:7; 12:14). Since 4:7 relates to the description of one of the four living beings, it may be that John intends the eagle mentioned here to have the same significance.

9:1–11 The fifth trumpet: The first woe. John now focuses attention on the fifth and sixth trumpets (first and second woes) by giving more than twice the space to their description than he does to the previous four trumpets together. The fifth trumpet releases locusts from the Abyss. For five months these locusts torment the inhabitants of the earth who do not have the seal of God. John sees a "star" that has fallen to the earth. Since this star is given a key to open the Abyss, it is reasonable to understand it as being a symbolic reference to an angel. This is supported by v.11, where "the angel of the Abyss" is mentioned and named "Abaddon," as well as 20:1, where reference is also made to "an angel coming down" who has the key to the Abyss, where Satan is thrown.

The "Abyss" (GK 12) is also referred to in 11:7 and 17:8 as the place from which the beast arises. This word refers to the underworld as (1) a prison for certain demons (Lk 8:31; cf. 2Pe 2:4; Jude 6) and (2) the realm of the dead (Ro 10:7). When the Abyss is opened, huge billows of smoke pour out, darken the sky, and release horselike locusts on the earth.

Locust plagues are one of the severest plagues of humankind. The imagery of locusts, appearing like armies, advancing like a cloud, darkening the heavens, and sounding like the rattle of chariots, goes back to Joel's vision of the locust army that came on Israel as a judgment from God (Joel 1:6; 2:4–10). But the locusts of the Apocalypse inflict agony like scorpion stings (vv.3, 5, 10). This, together with the fact that they do not eat grass (v.4), shows that these locusts are something other than ordinary earthly insects. Indeed, they have the special task of inflicting a nonfatal injury only on the beast worshipers, who do not have the seal of God on their foreheads (v.4; cf. comment on 7:3). This may imply that these locust-like creatures are not simply instruments of a physical plague (as in Moses' or Joel's day or under the first four trumpets) but are demonic forces out of the Abyss from whom the true people of God are protected (cf. John's use of frogs to represent demonic powers in 16:13). The five months of agony (vv.5, 10) may refer to the life span of the locust (i.e., spring and summer). So severe is the torment they inflict that their victims will seek death (cf. Job 3:21; Jer 8:3; Hos 10:8).

John describes the locusts as an army of mounted troops ready for the attack (v.7). The heads of the locusts resemble horses' heads. John does not say that the locusts had crowns of gold on their heads but that they wore "something like crowns of gold" on their heads. This may refer to the yellow green of their breasts. This, combined with their resemblance to human faces, suggests something unnatural, hence demonic. The comparison of their "hair" with that of women may refer to the locusts' long antennae, while their lionlike teeth suggest the terrible devastation they can bring (cf. Joel 1:6–7). The "breastplates of iron" refers to their scales, which appeared as a cuirass of metal plates across the chest and long flexible bonds of steel over the shoulders. Their sound was like the rushing of war chariots into battle (v.9; cf. Joel 2:5).

This description creates an image of the fearful onslaught of demonic powers in the last days. Therefore, their leader is called "Abaddon" (GK 11 & 13) in Hebrew and "Apollyon" (GK 661) in Greek. The Hebrew term means "destruction" or "ruin" (cf. Job 26:6; Pr 27:20) and more often "the place of ruin" in Sheol (cf. Job 26:6; Pr 15:11; 27:20), "death" (cf. Job 28:22), or "the grave" (cf. Ps 88:11). The Greek term means "exterminator" or "destroyer" and does not occur elsewhere in the Bible. Some understand Apollyon as a separate angel entrusted with authority over the Abyss. Why John names the king of the Abyss in both Hebrew and Greek is open to question. Perhaps his readers' background in Hebrew, on which John's names and thoughts seem to turn (cf. 16:16), was so slender that an additional help here and there was necessary. This stylistic trait of giving information in bilingual terms is peculiar to Revelation and John's Gospel (see Jn 6:1; 19:13, 17, 20; 20:16).

12 This verse is transitional, indicating that the "first woe" (fifth trumpet) is finished and two woes are yet to come (presumably the sixth and seventh trumpets; cf. 8:13 with 11:14). There may be in this verse a resumption of the eagle's words (cf. 8:13).

13–19 The sixth trumpet: The second woe. Here we find a description of disasters that reach to the death of a third of humankind (vv.15, 18; cf. 8:7). "Four angels," the instruments of God's judgment, are held at the river Euphrates, whence traditionally the enemies of God's ancient people advanced on the land of Israel (Jer 2:18; 13:4–5; 51:63; Rev 16:12) and which was recognized as its northeastern extremity (Ge 15:18). John makes use of the ancient geographical terms to depict the fearful character of the coming judgment of God on a rebellious world. While the language is drawn from historical-political events of the OT, it describes realities that far transcend a local geographical event. God's dealings are not accidental but planned, and they happen at a precise moment in time. By a reference to the "golden altar" of incense, the release of these angels is again connected with the prayers of God's saints for vindication (6:9; 8:3).

At v.16 a mounted army of some 200 million horses and riders is rather abruptly introduced. While some argue for a literal human army here, several factors point to their identity as demonic forces. First, the horsemen are not in themselves important but wear brightly colored breastplates of fiery red, dark blue, and sulfurous yellow, more suggestive of supernatural than natural riders. More important are the horses, which not only have heads resembling lions but are, rather than their riders, the instruments of death by the three plagues of fire, smoke, and sulfur that come from their mouths. Furthermore, these horses have tails like snakes that are able to kill (vv.17–19), unlike the locusts' scorpionlike tails that do not inflict death but only injury (v.5). Finally, an army of 200 million could not be conscripted, supported, and moved to the Middle East without totally disrupting all societal needs and capabilities. Thus it seems better to understand the vast numbers and description of the horses as indicating demonic hordes. Such large numbers do occasionally indicate angelic hosts elsewhere in Scripture (Ps 68:17; Rev 5:11; cf. 2Ki 2:11–12; 6:17). This would not eliminate the possibility of human armies of manageable size also being involved. But the emphasis here (vv.16–19) is on their fully demonic character, utterly cruel and determined, showing no mercy to man, woman, or child. These demons might also be manifest in pestilences, epidemic diseases, or misfortunes as well as in armies. Such would explain the use of "plagues"' to describe these hordes (vv.18, 20; cf. 11:6; 16:9, 21).

20–21 God's first purpose for the plagues is judgment on the human race for their willful choice of idolatry and the corrupt practices that go with it (v.21). John had earlier called the churches to "repent" of their faithless tendencies lest they too share in God's judgment (2:5, 16, 21–22; 3:19). In these verses we see the end result of refusing to turn to God. This stubbornness leads to worship of demons as well as worship of cultic objects made by human hands (gold, silver, bronze, stone, and wood; cf. Pss 115:4–7; 135:17; Jer 10:1–16; Da 5:23). "Demons" may mean either pagan deities (Dt 32:17; Ps 106:37) or malign spirits (1Co 10:20–21; 1Ti 4:1). John no doubt shared Paul's concept of demons as evil spirits (Rev 16:14; 18:2). Hence, there is a twofold evil in idol worship: it robs the true God of his glory (Ro 1:23) and it leads to consorting with evil spirits.

This demonic corruption is manifest in the inhuman acts of those who have given up God for idols—acts of murder, sexual immorality, and thefts (cf. Ro 1:24, 28–31). In general, these are violations of the ten commandments. "Magic arts" (GK 5760) means "a practice of sorceries" or "witchcraft" (cf. Ex 7:11; 9:11; Gal 5:20; Rev 21:8; 22:15); usually drugs were involved.

God's second purpose revealed in the agonizing plagues described in chs. 8–9 is to bring societies to repentance (cf. 16:9, 11). God is not willing that any person should suffer his judgment but that all should repent and turn to him (Lk 13:3, 5; 2Pe 3:9). But when God's works and words are persistently rejected, only judgment remains (Eph 5:6; Heb 10:26–31).

3. Second interlude (10:1–11:14)

a. The little book (10:1–11)

1–4 As in the seals, the sequence of the sixth and seventh trumpets is interrupted to provide additional information bearing on the previous events and to prepare the reader for further developments. The author sees a mighty angel (possibly Michael, "the great prince" of Da 12:1), whom he describes in such dazzling terms that some have wrongly identified him with Christ. The voice that speaks in vv.4, 8 could, however, be that of Jesus.

The angel has in his hand a small scroll (v.2)—not to be confused with the Lamb's scroll of chs. 5–7 but connected with the symbolic scroll of Ezekiel (Eze 2:9–3:3; cf. Jer 15:15–17). This prophet was told to "eat" the scroll, just as John is told to eat the scroll given him (vv.9–10). Such an action symbolized the reception of the Word of God into one's innermost being as a necessary prerequisite to proclaim it with confidence. John could see the words on the scroll because it "lay open" in the angel's hand. The angel standing on both land and sea symbolizes that the prophetic message is for the whole world.

When the angel shouted (v.3), seven thunders spoke, and John proceeded to write down their words. But he is interrupted and is commanded, "Seal up what the seven thunders have said and do not write it down" (v.4). Conceivably, this might have been another series of sevens. Either the seven thunders were intended for John's own illumination and were not essential to the main vision of the seven trumpets, or the reference is designed to strike a note of mystery with reference to God's revelatory activities (cf. 2Co 12:4). As the visible portion of an iceberg is only a small part of the iceberg, so God's disclosures reveal only part of his total being and purposes.

5–7 The angel's action of raising his right hand to heaven doubtless alludes to the Jewish oath-swearing procedure (Dt 32:40; Da 12:7). He swears that "there will be no more delay" (v.6). Clearly there is some type of progression in the seals, trumpets, and bowls that nears its conclusion as the seventh trumpet is about to sound (v.7). When the seventh trumpet is finally sounded, there is an announcement that "the kingdom of the world has become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ" and that the time has come to judge the dead, to reward the saints, and to destroy the earth destroyers (11:15, 18). These events are recorded in the remaining chapters of the book, which include the seven bowl judgments and the new heavens and the new earth. Thus, here in 10:7 it is announced that "the mystery of God" is accomplished. That mystery is his purposes for humanity and the world as revealed to both OT and NT prophets.

The way the NIV translates v.7 suggests that the consummation comes before the blowing of the seventh trumpet: "when the seventh angel is about to sound his trumpet. . . ." While this is grammatically possible, it is also possible to render the expression "about to sound" as "when he shall sound." Thus understood, the meaning is that during the time of the sound of the seventh trumpet, when the angel sounds, the final purposes of God will be completed. This rendering clarifies the statement in 11:14, "The second woe has passed: the third woe is coming soon," a statement made just before the seventh trumpet sounds. Hence, the seventh trumpet will reveal the final judgments of the bowls and the final establishment of God's rule on the earth.

8–11 John, like Ezekiel, is now commanded to take the prophetic scroll and eat it. The scroll tasted "as sweet as honey" but was bitter to the stomach. Receiving the Word of God is a great joy; but since the Word is an oracle of judgment, it results in the unpleasant experience of proclaiming a message of wrath and woe (cf. Jer 15:16, 19). The symbolic act of eating the scroll might also mean that the prophetic message was mixed with joy and comfort as well as gloom. The sweetness should not be taken to refer to the joy of proclaiming a message of wrath, for to all God's prophets this was a sorrowful, bitter task (Jer 9:1).

The chief import of ch. 10 seems to be a confirmation of John's prophetic call, as v.11 indicates: "You must prophesy again about many peoples, nations, languages and kings." This prophesying should not be understood as merely a recapitulation in greater detail of the previous visions but a further progression of the events connected with the end. John uses the word "kings" instead of "tribes" (as in 5:9; 7:9; 13:7; 14:6); this may anticipate the emphasis on the kings of the earth found in 17:9–12 and elsewhere.

b. The two witnesses (11:1–14)

Some have considered this chapter one of the most difficult to interpret in the book of Revelation. In it John refers to the temple, the Holy City, and the two prophets who are killed by the beast and after three and one-half days are resurrected and ascend to heaven. Does John intend all this to be understood literally—namely, the literal temple in Jerusalem; two people prophesying for 1,260 days, who are killed by the Antichrist, raised from the dead, and ascend to heaven; a great earthquake that kills seven thousand people and the survivors of which glorify God? Or does he intend all or part of these as symbols representing something? Most commentators take at least part of these things as symbolic. Furthermore, how does this section (11:1–13) relate to the total context (10:1–11:19)?

While details of interpretation vary, there are but two main approaches to the chapter: (1) the temple, altar, worshipers, and Holy City have something to do with the Jewish people and their place in the plan of God; or (2) John is here referring to the Christian church. As in ch. 7, John's references to particular Jewish entities create the chief source of the problem.

At the outset, it may be helpful to state why the Jewish view is less preferable. This approach has two slightly different aspects.

Dispensational commentators generally understand the "temple" and the "city" to refer to a rebuilt temple in Jerusalem. While some elements may be symbolic, the main import of the passage depicts a future protection of the nation of Israel prior to her spiritual regeneration. The Antichrist (beast) will permit the rebuilding of the temple in Jerusalem and the restoration of Jewish worship for three and a half years; then he will break his covenant and trample down a part of the temple and the Holy City until Christ returns to deliver the Jewish people (cf. Da 9:27).

Others have argued for a modified Jewish view. To them, John is prophetically predicting the preservation and ultimate salvation of the Jewish people, similar to Paul in Ro 11:26. This group believes that the temple and the city of Jerusalem are not the literal Jewish restored temple or the city located in Palestine. Rather, they represent, on the one hand, the believing Jewish remnant (temple, altar, and worshipers) and, on the other hand, the Jewish people or nation as a whole who are now under Gentile oppression (outer court and city). Both Jewish views suffer from their inability to relate this chapter to the context of ch. 10, to the parallelism in the seal interlude (ch. 7), to the ministry and significance of the two witnesses, or to the further chapters in Revelation (esp. chs. 12–13). Therefore, it is better to understand John as referring in ch. 11 to the whole Christian community.

1 John is given a "reed" (GK 2812), long and straight like a "rod" and thus suitable for measuring a large building or area (cf. Eze 40:5). Its purpose is to "measure the temple of God and the altar." Most agree that the principal OT passage in John's mind was Ezekiel's lengthy description of the measuring of the future kingdom temple (Eze 40:3–48:35). Since interpreters are confused about what Ezekiel's vision means, the ambiguity extends also to John's description. Measuring with a reed or line may have various metaphorical meanings. It may refer to the promise of restoration and rebuilding, with emphasis on extension or enlargement (Jer 31:39; Zec 1:16). It may also be done to mark out something for destruction (2Sa 8:2; 2Ki 21:13; Isa 28:17; La 2:8; Am 7:7–9). In Eze 40:2ff., this latter sense would be inappropriate. But what does John's measuring mean?

Since John is told in v.2 not to measure the outer court but to leave it for the nations to overrun, it seems that here in ch. 11 the measuring means that the temple of God, the altar, and the worshipers are to be secured for blessing and preserved from spiritual harm or defilement. In 21:15–17, John similarly depicts the angel's measuring of the heavenly city (with a golden rod), apparently to mark off the city and its inhabitants from harm and defilement (21:24, 27). As a parallel to the sealing of 7:1–8, the measuring does not symbolize preservation from physical harm but the prophetic guarantee that none of the faithful worshipers of Jesus as the Messiah will perish, even though they suffer physical destruction at the hand of the beast (13:7).

In Eze 43:10, the prophet is told to "describe the temple to the people of Israel, that they may be ashamed of their sins." The purpose of the elaborate description and temple measurement there is to indicate the glory and holiness of God in Israel's midst and convict them of their defilement of his sanctuary (43:12). Likewise, John's prophetic ministry calls for a clear separation between those who are holy and those who have defiled themselves with the idolatry of the beast.

John is to measure "the temple of God." There are two Greek words used in the NT for temple. Hieron (GK 2639) is a broad term that refers to the whole structure of Herod's temple, including courts, colonnades, etc. (e.g., Mt 4:5; Jn 2:14). Naos (GK 3724) is narrower and refers to the sanctuary or inner house where only the priests were allowed (Mt 23:35; 27:51; always in Revelation). While the distinction between the two words is not always maintained, in this context (11:1) it may be appropriate since the next verse mentions the outer precinct as a separate entity.

Does John mean here the heavenly temple often mentioned in Revelation (cf. 11:19; 15:5, 8; 16:17), or does he refer to the Christian community, as in 3:12: "Him who overcomes I will make a pillar in the temple of my God"? Naos always refers to the Jerusalem temple in the Gospels with the single exception of John's Gospel, where it refers to Jesus' own body (Jn 2:19–21; cf. Rev 21:22). Outside the Gospels it refers either to pagan shrines (Ac 17:24; 19:24) or, in Paul's letters, metaphorically to the physical bodies of Christians or to the church of God (1Co 3:16; 6:19; 2Co 6:16; Eph 2:21; most likely also 2Th 2:4). Since John refers to the "outer court" in v.2, it is likely that he has in mind not the heavenly temple of God but an earthly one, and likely also, symbolically, the covenant people. To take the temple in this verse as representing the church in the Great Tribulation is not without problems, but this seems the best view.

The "altar" (GK 2603) would then refer to the huge stone altar of sacrifice in the court of the priests, and the expression "the worshipers" would most naturally indicate the priests and others in the three inner courts (the court of the priests, the court of Israel, the court of the women). These represent symbolically the true servants of God and the measuring symbolizes their recognition and acceptance by God in the same manner as the numbering in ch. 7. The writer of Hebrews likewise speaks of an "altar" that Christians eat from, but that Jewish priests who serve in the temple are not qualified to eat from (Heb 13:10). By this language he speaks of the once-for-all sacrifice of Christ on the cross utilizing the background of the temple images, as does John.

2 As the "outer court" in the Jerusalem temple was frequented by a mixed group including Gentiles and unbelievers, so in John's mind the earthly temple or community of God may involve a part where those who are impure or unfaithful will be (21:8; 22:15). The effect of not measuring this part of the temple is to exclude those in it from spiritual security and God's blessing. So in measuring the temple, Ezekiel is instructed to exclude from the sanctuary "the foreigners uncircumcised in heart and flesh" (Eze 44:5–9)—i.e., pagans who do not worship the true God and whose presence would desecrate the sanctuary. Previously, John has shown concern over those who were associated with the local churches but were not true worshipers of Christ (cf. 2:14–16, 20–25; 3:1–5, 16). When the great test comes, they will join the ranks of the beast and reveal their true colors.

On the other hand, it may be better to understand the desecration of the outer court as a symbolic reference to the victory of the beast over the saints (described in v.7). Thus by using two slightly different images, the "temple-altar-worshipers" and the "outer court-holy city," John is viewing the church under different aspects. Though the Gentiles (pagans) are permitted to touch the "outer court" and to trample on the "holy city" for a limited time ("42 months"), they are not able to destroy the church because the "inner sanctuary" is measured or protected in keeping with Christ's earlier word in Mt 16:18.

Since John says the outer court will be "given to the Gentiles," it is important to establish the best translation of "Gentiles" (ethnos; GK 1620). (1) In some NT contexts, this word may have the more general sense of "nations," describing the various ethnic or national groups among humankind (e.g., Mt 24:9, 14; Lk 24:47; Ro 1:5; 15:11). (2) In other contexts, it denotes "Gentiles" in contrast to the Jewish people (e.g., Mt 4:15; 10:5; Lk 2:32; Ac 10:45; Ro 11:11). In many cases the broader sense may shade off into the narrower, producing ambiguity. (3) But there is a third use of ethnos. Just as the Jews referred to all other peoples outside the covenant as "Gentiles," so there gradually developed a similar Christian usage of the term that saw all peoples who were outside of Christ as ethnos, including unbelieving Jews (1Co 5:1; 12:2; 1Th 4:5; 1Pe 2:12; 3Jn 7; cf. our word" "pagan" or "heathen"). When the sixteen cases of ethnos in Revelation are examined, not once is "Gentiles" appropriate. Everywhere they are the peoples of the earth, either in rebellion against God (11:18; 14:8; 19:15; 20:3) or redeemed and under the rule of Christ (2:26; 21:24, 26; 22:2). There is no good reason why John does not intend the same sense in 11:2.

To sum up, "given to the Gentiles" refers to the defiling agencies that will trample down the outer court of the church, leading to defection from Christ or physical destruction, though all the while the inner sanctuary of the true believers will not be defiled by idolatry. This spiritual preservation of true believers will be accomplished by John's prophetic ministry, which distinguishes loyalty to Christ from the deception of the beast.

The nations will "trample on the holy city for 42 months." What is "the holy city"? The more literal viewpoint sees it as the earthly city of Jerusalem. Support for this is found in (1) the OT's use (Ne 11:1; Isa 48:2; 52:1; Da 9:24) and Matthew's use of "holy city" for Jerusalem (Mt 4:5; 27:53), (2) the proximity of the term "the holy city" to the temple reference (v.1), and (3) the mention in v.8 of the "great city . . . where also their Lord was crucified."

Since Jerusalem was destroyed in A.D. 70, and since Revelation was presumably written about 95, these interpreters hold two views about the meaning of this reference to the city. Some believe it to refer to a rebuilt Jerusalem and temple during the future Tribulation period. Others see it as merely a symbolic reference to the Jewish people without any special implication of a literal city or temple. But if John does in fact differentiate here between believing Jews (inner court) and the nation as a whole (outer court), this would be the only place in the book where he does so. Furthermore, such a reference at this point in the context of chs. 10–11 would be abrupt and unconnected with the main themes in these chapters—the nature of the prophetic ministry and the great trial awaiting Christians.

Far more in keeping with the emphasis of the whole book, and of these chapters in particular, is the view that "the holy city," like the temple, refers to the church. The consistent usage of the expression "holy city" means the community of those faithful to Jesus Christ, composed of believing Jews and Gentiles (21:2, 10; 22:19; cf. 3:12; 20:9). It should also be noted that the name Jerusalem nowhere appears in ch. 1, though a circumlocution for it in v.8 ("where also their Lord was crucified") is prefaced with the word "figuratively" (see comment on v.8). While the vision of the future Holy City (chs. 21–22) describes the condition of the city when she has completed her great ordeal and is finally delivered from the great deceiver, the present reference is to God's people as they must first endure the trampling of the pagan nations for "42 months."

Does the trampling (GK 4251) indicate defilement and apostasy, or does it instead mean persecution? This word can metaphorically mean either of these. Two factors favor the latter sense. The time of the trampling is "42 months," which is the exact time John attributes to the reign of the beast (13:5–7). Furthermore, in Daniel's prophecy the trampling of the sanctuary and host of God's people by Antiochus Epiphanes (Da 8:10, 13) is clearly a persecution of the people of God.

But what of the term "42 months"? This exact expression occurs in the Bible only here and in 13:5, where it refers to the time of the authority of the beast. Mention is also made of a period of 1,260 days (i.e., 42 months of 30 days each) in 11:3 and 12:6. In 12:14 a similar length of time is referred to as "a time, times [i.e., two times] and half a time." All these expressions equal a three-and-one-half-year period. In Revelation, "42 months" refers to the period of oppression of the Holy City and the time of the authority of the beast (11:2; 13:5). The "1,260 days" is the period the two witnesses prophesy and the time the woman is protected from the dragon's reach (11:3; 12:6). "Time, times and half a time" seems to be used synonymously for the 1,260 days during which the woman will be protected in the desert (12:14). We cannot assume that because these periods are equal, they are identical. On the other hand, the three different expressions may well be literary variations for the same period.

Daniel is generally taken to be the origin of the terms. In Da 9:27 a week is spoken of ("seven," NIV), and the context makes it clear that this is a week of years, i.e., seven years. Further, the week is divided in half—i.e., three and a half years for each division. These half weeks of years are spoken of in Da 7:25 as "a time, times and half a time." Both early Jewish and Christian interpreters referred this to the period of the reign of the Antichrist. In Da 12:7 the identical expression refers to the period "when the power of the holy people has been finally broken"; in 12:11 the equivalent period expressed in days (1,290) refers to the time of the "abomination" and defilement of the temple. Whether or not these references refer to the second-century B.C. activities of Antiochus Epiphanes must be left to the exegetes of Daniel; but it is known that the Jews and later the Christians believed that these events at least foreshadow, if not predict, the last years of world history under the Antichrist. Thus John would have a ready tool to use in this imagery for setting forth his revelation of the last days.

Some commentators suggest that the first three and a half years is the period of the preaching of the two witnesses, while the second half of the week is the time of bitter trial when Antichrist reigns supreme. Others believe the expressions are synchronous and thus refer to the identical period. With some reservations, the former view is preferable.

The 1,260-day period of protected prophesying by the two witnesses (11:3–6) synchronizes with the period of the woman in the desert (12:6, 14). When the death of the witnesses occurs (11:7), there follows the forty-two-month murderous reign of the beast (13:5, 7, 15), which synchronizes with the trampling down of the Holy City (11:2). This twofold division seems to be also supported by Jesus' Olivet Discourse, where he speaks of the "beginning of birth pains" (Mt 24:8) and then of the period of "great distress" shortly before his second coming (Mt 24:21).

Finally, are the two periods of three and a half years symbolic or do they indicate calendar years? Not all will agree, but a symbolic sense that involves a real period but understands the numbers to describe the kind of period rather than its length is in keeping with John's use of numbers elsewhere (cf. 2:10; 4:4; 7:4). Hence, if we follow the twofold division of Daniel's seventieth week of seven years, the preaching of the two witnesses occupies the first half, while the second half is the time of trial when the beast reigns supreme, and during which time the fearful events of chs. 13–19 take place. This explanation must, however, remain tentative.

3 Perhaps a greater diversity of interpretation surrounds these two personages than even the temple in the previous verses. They are called "two witnesses" (v.3), "two prophets" (v.10), and, more figuratively, "two olive trees and the two lampstands who stand before the Lord of the earth" (v.4). Interpretative suggestions are: two historic figures such as Moses and Elijah (already taught in Jewish tradition) or the apostles Peter and Paul, the church in its witness, Christian martyrs, all the prophets, and the two groups of the Jewish believers and Gentile believers in the church.

Since opinion varies so greatly at this point, it may be wise not to be dogmatic about any one view. Perhaps the best view is the one which sees the two witnesses as representing those in the church who are specially called, like John, to bear a prophetic witness to Christ during the whole age of the church. They also represent those prophets who will be martyred by the beast. Indications that they represent many individuals and not just two are: (1) they are never seen as individuals but do everything together—they prophesy together, suffer together, are killed together, are raised together, and ascend together—and all this is hardly possible for two individuals; (2) the beast makes war on them (v.7), which is strange if they are merely two individuals; (3) people throughout the whole world view their ignominious deaths (v.9)—something unlikely if only two individuals are involved; (4) their description as two "lamps" is applied in chs. 1–2 to local churches comprised of many individuals. They are "clothed in sackcloth" because they are prophets (cf. Isa 20:2; Zec 13:4) who call for repentance and humility (Jer 6:26; 49:3; Mt 11:21); this was the most suitable garb for times of distress, grief, danger, crisis, and self-humbling.

4 The reference to the "two olive trees and the two lampstands" is an allusion to Joshua and Zerubbabel in Zechariah's vision, who were also said "to serve the Lord of all the earth" (Zec 4:1–6a, 10b–14). The import of Zechariah's vision was to strengthen these two leaders by reminding them of God's resources and to vindicate them in the eyes of the community as they pursued their God-given tasks. Thus John's message is that the witnesses to Christ who cause the church to fulfill her mission to burn as bright lights to the world will not be quenched (cf. Rev 1:20; 2:5).

Why there should be two olive trees and two lampstands has been variously answered. Some suggest that "two" is the number of required legal witnesses (Nu 35:30; Dt 19:15; cf. Mt 18:16; Lk 10:1–24); others, that two represents the priestly and kingly aspects of the church or the Jewish and Gentile components. Perhaps the dualism was suggested to John by the two olive trees from Zechariah and the two great prophets of the OT who were connected with the coming of the Messiah in Jewish thought, i.e., Moses and Elijah (v.6; cf. Mt 17:3–4). What Joshua (the high priest) and Zerubbabel (the prince) were to the older community and temple, Jesus Christ is to the new community. He is both anointed Priest and King, and his church reflects this character especially in its Christian prophets (1:6; 5:10; 20:6).

5 Here the prophets' divine protection from their enemies is described in terms reminiscent of the former prophets' protection by God (2Ki 1:10; Jer 5:14). Fire is understood symbolically as judgment from God; and since it proceeds from the witnesses' mouths, we understand that their message of judgment will eventually be fulfilled by God's power (Ge 19:23–24; 2Sa 22:9; Ps 97:3). Their Lord gives them immunity from destruction until they complete their confirmation of God's saving deed in Christ. This assures the people of God that no matter how many chosen saints are oppressed and killed, God's witness to Christ will continue until his purposes are fulfilled.

6 The words "power to shut up the sky . . . and power to turn the waters into blood" clearly allude to the ministries of the prophets Elijah and Moses (1Ki 17:1 and Ex 7:17–21). There is, however, no need for the literal reappearing of these two if it is understood that the two witnesses come in the same spirit and function as their predecessors. Thus Luke interprets the significance of John the Baptist as a ministry in the "spirit and power of Elijah" (Lk 1:17). The author of Revelation is simply describing the vocation of certain Christian prophets, indicating that some follow in the same tradition as the former prophets of Israel. According to Lk 4:25 and Jas 5:17, Elijah's prophecy shut up the heaven for "three and a half years," a curious foreshadowing, perhaps, of the span of time that these prophets witness (i.e., 1,260 days [v.3]).

7 When they finish their witness, the witnesses are killed by the beast from the Abyss. This is the first reference to the "beast" (GK 2563) in the book. The abruptness with which it is introduced seems not only to presuppose some knowledge of the beast but also to anticipate what is said of him in chs. 13 and 17. Only here and in 17:8 is the beast described as coming "up from the Abyss" (cf. 9:1), showing his demonic origin. He attacks the prophets (lit., "makes war with them"; cf. 9:7; 12:7, 17; 13:7; 16:14; 19:19; 20:8). This attack possibly reflects Da 7:21 and is again described in 12:17 and 13:7. This is the second and final phase of the dragon's persecution of the Christian prophets and saints.

8 John mentions the place of the attack on the witnesses and of their death: "The street of the great city, which is figuratively called Sodom and Egypt, where also their Lord was crucified." This verse is both full of meaning and difficult to interpret. At first glance, John seems to be referring to the actual city of Jerusalem, where Christ died. Yet his terminology implies more than this. The city is called the "great city," a designation that refers to Babylon throughout the rest of the book (16:19; 17:18; 18:10, 16, 18–19, 21). Moreover, John's use of the word "city" (cf. 3:12) is symbolic. In fact, there are really only two cities in this book, the city of God and the city of Satan, which is later referred to as Babylon. A city may be a metaphor for the total life of a community of people (cf. Heb 11:10; 12:22; 13:14).

Here the "great city" is clearly more than merely Jerusalem, for John says it is "figuratively called Sodom and Egypt." "Figuratively" (GK 4462) means "spiritually, in a spiritual manner, full of the divine Spirit." Elsewhere in the NT, this word characterizes that which pertains to the Spirit in contrast to the flesh (1Co 2:14–15; Eph 1:3; 5:19; Col 3:16; 1Pe 2:5; et al.). Thus the spiritually discerning will catch the significance of the threefold designation of this city. It is called "Sodom," which connotes rebellion against God, the rejection of God's servants, moral degradation, and the awfulness of divine judgment (cf. Eze 16:49). In Isaiah's day the rebellious rulers of Jerusalem were called the rulers of Sodom (Isa 1:10; cf. Eze 16:46). The second designation is "Egypt." Egypt is a country, not a city. It is virtually certain that by John's day, Egypt had become a symbolic name for anti-theocratic world kingdoms that enslaved Israel. The third designation is "the great city . . . where also their Lord was crucified" (cf. Mt 23:28–31, 37–38; Lk 13:33ff.; 21:20–24).

If, as most commentators believe, John also has Rome in mind in mentioning the "great city," then there are at least five places all seen by John as one—Babylon, Sodom, Egypt, Jerusalem, and Rome. This one city has become, in the eyes of the spiritually discerning, all places opposed to God and the witness of his servants. Wherever God is opposed and his servants harassed and killed, there is the "great city," the transhistorical city of Satan, the great mother of prostitutes (cf. 17:1ff.). What can happen to God's witnesses in any place is what has already happened to their Lord in Jerusalem.

9–10 People from every nation—Jew and Gentile—will "gloat over" their corpses and refuse them the dignity of burial. To have a dead body lie in view of all was the worst humiliation a person could suffer (Ps 79:3). Furthermore, the pagan world will celebrate the destruction of the witnesses and the victory over them by exchanging gifts, a common custom in the Near East (Ne 8:10, 12; Est 9:19, 22). Thus the beast will silence the witness of the church to the glee of the beast-worshiping world. The time of their silence corresponds in days to the time of their witness in years. It denotes only a brief time of triumph for the beast.

11–12 The witnesses now experience a resurrection and an ascension to heaven following their three-and-one-half-day death. It is generally held that John had Ezekiel's vision of the restoration of the dry bones in mind (Eze 37:5, 10–12). Just as interpretations of Ezekiel's vision vary, so interpretations of vv.11–12 vary. Some hold that the dry bones vision refers to the spiritual quickening of the nation of Israel. Others understand the descriptions to refer to the physical resurrection of the dead. If the two witnesses represent the witness of the church, then physical resurrection and ascension could be in mind. The summons "Come up here," followed by "they went up to heaven in a cloud," perhaps points to the Rapture (1Th 4:16–17).

On the other hand, John may be using the figure of physical resurrection to represent the church's victory over the death blow of the beast. In Ro 11:15 Paul uses the figure of resurrection symbolically to depict a great spiritual revival among the Jews in a future day. Here in v.12 the reference to the "cloud" (GK 3749) is significant. Normally, the "cloud" depicts God's power, presence, and glory; this is the only instance in the book where strictly human figures are associated with a cloud. These two witnesses share in Christ's resurrection, and the cloud is a sign of heaven's acceptance of their earthly career. Even their enemies see them, just as they will see Christ when he returns with the clouds (1:7). The events of Christ's return and the ascension of the witnesses seem to be simultaneous. Thus in the two witnesses, John has symbolized the model of all true prophets, taking as a central clue the story of Jesus' appearance in Jerusalem and describing the common vocation of appearing in the holy city (or temple) in such a way that reaction to their work separates the worshipers of God from the unbelievers.

13 The earthquake is God's further sign of the vindication of his servants (cf. 6:12). But unlike the earthquake under the sixth seal, this one produces what appears to be repentance: "The survivors . . . gave glory to the God of heaven." The opposite response in 16:9, "they refused to repent and glorify him," seems to confirm that v.13 here speaks of genuine repentance (cf. 14:7; 15:4). Since the death, resurrection, and ascension of the two witnesses is worldwide in scope (vv.9–10), we may infer that the earthquake is also symbolic of a world-wide event. Even in the midst of judgment, God is active in the world to save those who repent. If there is such hope in the terrible time of final judgment, how much more now! God has not abandoned the human race. Neither should we!

14 All the events from 9:13 to 11:14 fall under the sixth trumpet and are called the second "woe" (see comments on 8:13; 9:12). Since further judgments are mentioned in this chapter, it is natural to see at the sounding of the seventh trumpet (vv.15–19) the third woe taking place. Its nature is described in the bowl judgments (16:11ff.). Apparently the third woe will come without further delay. Indeed, the seventh trumpet (v.15) brings us to the final scenes of God's unfolding mystery (10:7).

4. Sounding of the seventh trumpet (11:15–19)

15 The seventh trumpet sounds, and in heaven loud voices proclaim the final triumph of God and Christ over the world. The theme is the kingdom of God and of Christ—a dual kingdom eternal in its duration. The "kingdom" (GK 993) is a main theme of the entire book of Revelation (1:6, 9; 5:10; 11:17; 12:10; 19:6; 20:4; 22:5). This kingdom involves the millennial kingdom and its blending into the eternal kingdom (chs. 20–22). The image suggests the transference of the world empire, once dominated by a usurping power, that has now at length passed into the hands of its true owner and king. The present rulers are Satan, the beast, and the false prophet. The announcement of the reign of the king occurs here, but the final breaking of the enemies' hold over the world does not occur till the return of Christ (19:11ff.).

Verses 15–18 are reminiscent of Ps 2. The opening portion of this psalm describes the pagan nations and kings set in opposition to God and his Anointed One. Then there follows the establishment of the Son in Zion as the Sovereign of the world and an appeal to the world rulers to put their trust in the Son before his wrath burns. John does not distinguish here between the millennial kingdom of Christ and the eternal kingdom of the Father (but cf. 3:21) as Paul does (1Co 15:24–28). This should be viewed as a difference merely of detail and emphasis, not of basic theology. In John's view this world becomes the arena for the manifestation of God's kingdom. While at this point the emphasis is on the future visible establishment of God's kingdom, that same kingdom is in some real sense now present; and John is participating in it (see 1:9).

16–17 As the other features in these verses are anticipatory, so the expression "have begun to reign" looks forward to the millennial reign depicted in ch. 20. Significantly, the title of God found earlier in the book, "who is, and who was, and who is to come" (1:8; 4:8), now is "who is and who was." He has now come! God has taken over the power of the world from Satan (Lk 4:6).

18 This passage contains a synopsis of the remaining chapters of Revelation. The nations opposed to God and incited by the fury of the dragon (12:12) have brought wrath on God's people (Ps 2:1–3). For this, God has brought his wrath on the nations (14:7; 16:1ff.; 18:20; 19:19b; 20:11–15). The time (GK 2789) has now come for three further events: the judgment of the dead (20:11–15); the final rewarding of the righteous (21:1–4; 22:3–5); and the final destruction of the destroyers of the earth (Babylon, the beast, the false prophet, and the dragon; 19:2, 11; 20:10).

In Revelation three groups of persons receive rewards: (1) God's "servants the prophets" (cf. 18:20; 22:9); (2) the "saints" (perhaps the martyrs; cf. 5:8; 8:3–4; 13:7, 10; 16:6; 18:20, 24; or simply believers in every age, cf. 19:8; 20:9); and (3) "those who reverence [God's] name" (cf. 14:7; 15:4). In whatever way these groups are denoted, it is important to note that in Revelation the prophets are specially singled out (16:6; 18:20, 24; 22:6, 9).

19 In the heavenly temple John sees the ark of God's covenant. In the OT the ark was the chest that God directed Moses to make and place within the holiest room of the tabernacle sanctuary (Ex 25:10–22). He was directed to put in the ark the two tablets of the Decalogue—the documentary basis of God's redemptive covenant with Israel (Ex 34:28–29). Presumably the ark was destroyed when Nebuchadnezzar burned the temple in 586 B.C., for there was no ark in the second temple. Although the way into the Most Holy Place was barred under the old covenant to all except the high priest, now full and immediate access for all, along with a perfect redemption, has been secured by Christ's death (Heb 9:11–12; 10:19–22).

In v.19 the kingdom of God is seen retrospectively as having fully come. Yet its coming will be elaborated in chs. 20–22. Prospectively, this sight of the ark prepares us for the following chapters, which concern the faithfulness of God to his covenant people. As the ark was the sign to Israel of God's loyal love throughout their desert journeys and battles, so this sign of the new covenant will assure the followers of Christ of his loyal love through their severe trial and attacks by the beast. "Flashes of lightning, rumblings, peals of thunder" represent God's presence and vindication of his people (cf. comment on 6:12; 8:5).

C. The Seven Signs (12:1–14:20)

This section is what might be called a Book of Signs. While no signs (cf. comments on 12:1) appear in chs. 1–11, at least seven signs are mentioned in chs. 12–19 (cf. the seven signs in Jn 1–11). Three are in heaven (12:1, 3; 15:1); four on earth (13:13–14; 16:14; 19:20). Only one is a sign of good (12:1); the others are omens of evil or judgment from God. They explain and amplify previous material (e.g., the beast in 11:7 is more fully described in ch. 13) and also advance the drama to its final acts.

This intermediary section (chs. 12–14), preceding the final bowl judgments (15:1ff.), picks up and develops the theme of the persecution of God's people (see 3:10; 6:9–11; 7:14; 11:7–10). Chapter 12 gives us a glimpse into the dynamics of the persecution of God's people under the symbolism of the dragon who wages war on the woman and her children (v.17). Chapter 13 continues the same theme by telling of the persecution of the saints by the dragon-energized beasts. The section closes with the scene of the redeemed 144,000 on Mount Zion who are triumphant over the beast (14:1–5) and of the final hour of judgment on the beast worshipers (14:6–20).

1. The woman and the dragon (12:1–17)

In this chapter are three main figures: the woman, the child, and the dragon. There are also three scenes: the birth of the child (vv.1–6), the expulsion of the dragon (vv.7–12), and the dragon's attack on the woman and her children (vv.13–17).

1 John sees a dazzling sight—a pregnant woman, "clothed with the sun, with the moon under her feet," and wearing a victor's "crown" (GK 5109; cf. 2:10; 3:11; 4:4, 10; 6:2; 9:7; 14:14) of twelve stars. John calls the sight a great "sign" (GK 4956). This shows that the woman is more than a mere woman. She signifies something. Generally John uses "sign" to refer to something miraculous that points to a deeper spiritual significance (Jn 2:11, 18, et al.; Rev 12:1, 3; 13:13–14; 15:1; 16:14; 19:20).

The basic plot of the story was familiar in the myths and legends of the ancient world. A usurper doomed to be killed by a yet unborn prince plots to succeed to the throne by killing the royal seed at birth. The prince is miraculously snatched from his clutches and hidden away until he is old enough to kill the usurper and claim his kingdom. These stories were probably known to both John and his Asian readers.

While it is easy to point to parallels between the earlier myths and Rev 12, the differences are striking enough to eliminate the possibility that John merely borrowed pagan myths. Certainly John, who is so anti-pagan throughout his writings, would not draw on pagan mythology for his messages. Did he draw more directly on OT parallels? Some cite Ge 37:9–11, where the heavenly bodies of sun, moon, and eleven stars are associated together in Joseph's vision, though there are enough differences to maintain that it is unlikely that John intended his readers to see Ge 37 in this chapter.

John saw a dazzling pregnant woman being attacked by a ferocious dragon. Drawing by Rachel Bierling.

Others see a more conscious parallelism between the story and the activities of the emperor Domitian around 83 A.D. After the death of his ten-year-old son, Domitian immediately proclaimed the boy a god and his mother, the mother of god. Some coins of this period show the mother Domitia as the mother of the gods standing with the scepter and diadem of the queen of heaven. Another coin shows the mother with the child before her. In his left hand is the scepter of world dominions, and with his right hand he is blessing the world. Still another coin shows the dead child sitting on the globe of heaven, playing with seven stars, which represent the seven planets, symbolic of his heavenly dominion over the world. On a fourth coin he represents the imperial Zeus child, who has been exalted to be lord of the stars and who will usher in the age of universal salvation. Such parallel imagery is hardly accidental. But whereas the coinage of Domitian glorifies the son of Domitia as the lord of heaven and savior of the world, Rev 12 presents Jesus Christ, the Lord of heaven and earth, as the One who will rule all nations with a rod of iron (v.5). John, as it were, demythologizes the Domitian myth by presenting Christ as the true and ascended Lord of heaven, the coming Ruler and Savior of the world.

The Dead Sea Scrolls have a story about the birth of the Messiah through the suffering messianic community, using imagery taken from the OT (see Isa 9:6–7; 26:17; 66:7; Mic 5:2). Elsewhere in the OT, the image of a woman is often associated with Israel, Zion, or Jerusalem (Isa 54:1–6; Jer 3:20; Eze 16:8–14; Hos 2:19–20). This background seems to provide a much closer link to the intended significance of ch. 12 than any other proposed parallels. In any case, while there does seem to be in ch. 12 a blending of elements from OT concepts, Jewish materials, ancient mythical stories, and possibly the Domitian child myth, John here reinterprets these older stories and presents a distinctively Christian view of history.

Who then is the woman? While it is not impossible that she is an actual woman, such as Mary, the evidence shows that she, like the woman in ch. 17, has symbolic significance. At the center of ch. 12 is the persecution of the woman by the dragon, who is definitely identified as Satan (v.9). This central theme renders it virtually certain that the woman could not refer to a single individual (cf. the persecution of the "rest of her offspring"; v.17).

Some identify the woman exclusively with the Jewish people, the nation of Israel. This view seems supported by the reference to the woman giving birth to the Messiah or "male child" (v.5); the twelve stars would refer to the twelve tribes (Ge 37:9–11). But there are internal problems with this view. The dragon's persecution of the woman after the Messiah's birth could hardly refer to the devil's attack on the nation as a whole but could apply only to the believing part of the people. The whole intent of the passage is to explain the persecution of the believing community, not the persecution of the nation of Israel as a whole.

Since the context indicates that the woman under attack represents a continuous entity from the birth of Christ until at least John's day or longer, her identity in the author's mind must be the believing covenant-messianic community. This group would include the early messianic community, which under John the Baptist's ministry was separated from the larger Jewish community to be the people prepared for the Lord (Mk 1:2–3). Later this group merged into the new community of Christ's disciples called the church, or less appropriately, the new Israel, composed of both Jews and Gentiles. John does not at this point seem to distinguish between the earlier almost totally Jewish community and the one present in his day. Their continuity in identity is so strong that whatever ethnic or other differences they have does not affect his single image representing one entity.

The woman's dazzling appearance like the sun relates her to the glory and brilliance of her Lord (1:16) as well as to her own light-bearing quality (1:20). With the moon under her feet signifying her permanence (Pss 72:5; 89:37; cf. Mt 16:18) and a crown of twelve stars on her head indicating her elect identity (cf. comments on 7:4ff.), she appears in her true heavenly and glorious character despite her seemingly fragile earthly history (vv.13–16). The church viewed as a woman is found elsewhere in the NT (cf. 2Co 11:2; Eph 5:25–27, 32; 2Jn 1, 5, 13).

2 The woman is in the throes of childbirth. The emphasis on her pain and suffering, both physically and spiritually, signifies the suffering of the faithful messianic community as a prelude to the coming of the Messiah himself and the new age (Isa 26:17; 66:7–8; Mic 4:10; 5:3). The "birth" itself does not necessarily refer to the actual physical birth of Christ but denotes the travail of the community from which the Messiah has arisen.

3 The second "sign" now appears. It likewise is a heavenly sign and introduces us to the second character, the ultimate antagonist of the woman. The "dragon" is clearly identified with the "ancient serpent called the devil, or Satan" (v.9; cf. 20:2–3). His description as an "enormous red dragon" symbolically suggests his fierce power and murderous nature. He is further described as having "seven heads and ten horns and seven crowns on his heads." Except for the exchange of the crowns from the heads to the horns, the same description is used for the beast from the sea in ch. 13 and the beast of ch. 17. It is a picture of the fullness of evil in all its hideous strength (cf. the monsters in Ps 74:13–14; Isa 27:1, 51:9–10; Da 7:7, 8:10). The diadem crowns on the heads may indicate fullness of royal power (13:1; 19:12).

4 So great is the dragon's power that his tail can even sweep away a large number of the stars and cast them down to the ground (for "a third," see comment on 8:7). This probably represents the dragon's power, not over some of the angels (sometimes called stars), but over the saints of God (cf. Da 8:10, 24). Satan has placed himself before the woman, thus expecting certain victory over the messianic child. Through this figure the church shows her awareness that Satan is always threatening the purposes of God. Although the attack of Herod against the children of Bethlehem and many incidents during the life of Jesus (cf. Lk 4:28–39) must also be included, the greatest attempt to devour the child must certainly be the Crucifixion.

5 This verse records the first element of the story. The messianic child comes, finishes his mission, is delivered from the dragon, and is enthroned in heaven. John again refers to the destiny of the child by alluding again to Ps 2:9: "Who will rule all the nations with an iron scepter" (Rev 2:27; 19:15). Some exegetes, using passages such as Da 7:13–14, 27 (which seems to fuse the individual son of man with the people of God) and Rev 1:5–6; 2:26–27; 11:15 (which alternates between the rule of Christ and the rule of the saints), see a collective identity in the birth of the male child. It is, however, difficult to see how the child as well as the woman could be a group of believers. Through Christ's resurrection and ascension, the dragon's attempt to destroy God's purposes through the Messiah have been decisively defeated.

6 What is this flight into the desert? Is it a symbolic or an actual historic event? Among those who take it literally, some have understood the reference as the escape of the early Jerusalem Christians to Pella in A.D. 66 to escape the Roman destruction of Jerusalem. Pella continued to be an important Christian center even after many returned to Jerusalem in 135. Others refer the event to the future, when a portion of the Jewish people will be preserved through the Tribulation period to await Christ's return.

Most commentators, however, understand the desert to mean the place of safety, discipline, and testing. This view is preferable because of the highly symbolic nature of the whole chapter, the symbolic use of "desert" in 17:3, and the parallelism to the Exodus where the children of Israel fled from Pharaoh. All are agreed that the reference here to the flight of the woman is anticipatory of vv.13ff. The intervening verses show why the dragon is persecuting the woman (vv.7–12). For a discussion of the 1,260 days, see comments on 11:2.

7 All agree that the section beginning with this verse, which describes the battle in heaven between Michael and the dragon (vv.7–12), provides the explanation as to why the dragon has turned on the woman and caused her to flee into the desert for protection (vv.6, 13ff.). The account is in two parts: (1) the battle in heaven between Michael and his angels and the dragon and his angels, which results in the ejection of Satan from heaven to the earth (vv.7–9), and (2) the heavenly hymn of victory (vv.10–12).

As elsewhere in the book, the narrative material can be interpreted only in the light of the hymns. This principle is especially important in vv.7–9, where the victory takes place in heaven as the result of Michael's defeat of the dragon. Were this the only thing told us about the "war in heaven," it might be concluded that the dragon's defeat was unrelated to Jesus Christ. But the interpretative hymn (vv. 10–12) says that it was in fact the blood of Christ that dealt the actual death blow to the dragon and enabled the saints to triumph (v.8; cf. 5:9). Does this not suggest that the redeeming work of Christ is here depicted by the cosmic battle of Michael and the dragon, as it is elsewhere seen as a loosing from sin (1:5), as a washing of our garments (7:14), and as a purchasing to God (5:9)? The time of the dragon's defeat and ejection from heaven must therefore be connected with the incarnation, ministry, death, and resurrection of Jesus (v.13: Lk 10:18; Jn 12:31). Christ has appeared in order to destroy the works of the devil (Mt 12:28–29; Ac 10:38; 2Ti 1:10; 1Jn 3:8).

Early Jewish belief held the view that Michael would cast Satan from heaven as the first of the last-time struggles to establish the kingdom of God on earth. John, in contrast, sees this event as already having taken place through Jesus Christ's appearance and work. Only the final, permanent blow of Satan's ejection from earth remains (20:10). The fact that the battle first takes place in heaven between Michael, the guardian of God's people (Da 10:13, 21; 12:1; Jude 9), and the dragon shows that evil is cosmic in dimension and that events on earth are first decided in heaven. The single intent of the passage is to assure those who meet satanic evil on earth that it is really a defeated power, however contrary it might seem to human experience.

8–9 The triumph of the archangel results in the ejection of the dragon and his angels from heaven to earth. Apparently, prior to this event Satan had access to the heavens and continually assailed the loyalty of the saints (Job 1:9–11; Zec 3:1); but now, together with his angels, he has been cast out (cf. Lk 10:18).

Whatever appears to be the earthly situation for God's people now, the victory has already been won. When the battle grows fiercer and darker for the church, it is but the sign of the last futile attempt of the dragon to exercise his power before the kingdom of Christ comes (v.12). The "ancient serpent" who tempted Eve with lies about God (Ge 3:1ff.) is in John's mind the "devil" or "Satan." He is also the one who "leads the whole world astray." His power lies in deception, and by his lies the whole world is deceived about God (2:20; 13:14; 18:23; 19:20; 20:3, 8, 10; 2Jn 7; cf. Ro 1:25).

10 This anonymous hymn, which interprets the great battle of the preceding verses, has three stanzas: the first (v.10) focuses on the victorious inauguration of God's kingdom and Christ's kingly authority; the second (v.11) calls attention to the earthly victory of the saints as they confirm the victory of Christ by their own identification with Jesus in his witness and death; the third (v.12) announces the martyrs' victory and the final woe to the earth because of the devil's ejection and impending demise.

In the first stanza (v.10), the triumph of Christ is described as the arrival of three divine realities in history: God's "salvation" or victory (7:10; 19:1), God's "power," and God's "kingdom." This last reality is further identified as Christ's assumption of his "authority." The historic event of Christ's life, death, and resurrection has challenged the dominion of Satan and provoked the crisis of history. At the time of Christ's death on earth, Satan was being defeated in heaven by Michael.

In times past, Satan's chief role as adversary was directed toward accusing God's people of disobedience to God. The justice of these accusations was recognized by God, and therefore Satan's presence in heaven was tolerated. But now the presence of the crucified Savior in God's presence provides the required satisfaction of God's justice regarding our sins (1Jn 2:1–2; 4:10). Thus, Satan's accusations are no longer valid and he is cast out. What strong consolation this provides for God's faltering people!

11 This second stanza is both a statement and an appeal. It announces that the followers of the Lamb also become victors over the dragon because they participate in the "blood of the Lamb," the weapon that defeated Satan, and because they have confirmed their loyalty to the Lamb by their witness even to death. The blood of the martyrs, rather than signaling the triumph of Satan, shows instead that they have gained the victory over the dragon by their acceptance of Jesus' cross and their obedient suffering with him. This is one of John's chief themes (1:9; 6:9; 14:12; 20:4).

Verses 12 and 17 lead to the conclusion that only a portion of the martyrs is in view (cf. 6:11). Thus this hymn of victory also becomes an appeal to the rest of the saints to confirm their testimony to Christ, even if doing so means death. This seems to suggest that in some mysterious sense the sufferings of the people of God are linked to the sufferings of Jesus in his triumph over Satan and evil (Jn 12:31; Ro 16:20; Col 1:24). Since the martyrs have gotten the victory over the dragon because of the cross of Jesus, they are now free even to give up their lives in loyalty to their Redeemer (Jn 12:25; Rev 15:2).

12 Satan has failed. Therefore, the heavens and all who are in them should be glad. But Satan does not accept defeat without a bitter struggle. His final death throes are directed exclusively toward "the earth and the sea." Therefore their inhabitants will mourn, for the devil will now redouble his wrathful effort in one last futile attempt to make the most of an opportunity that he knows will be brief (three and one-half years; cf. vv.6, 14).

13–14 The narrative is resumed after the flight of the woman into the desert (v. 6). Why? Because she is under attack from the defeated but still vicious dragon (vv.7–12). No longer able to attack the male child who is in heaven or to accuse the saints because of the victory of Jesus on the cross, the devil now pursues the woman, who flees into the desert. The word "pursue" (GK 1503) was no doubt carefully chosen by John because it is also the NT word for "persecute" (e.g., Mt 5:10). Since the woman has already given birth to the child, the time of this pursuit by the dragon is subsequent to the earthly career of Jesus.

The reference to eagle's wings again introduces imagery from Exodus on the pursuit of Israel by the dragon in the person of Pharaoh: "You yourselves have seen what I did to Egypt, and how I carried you on eagles' wings and brought you to myself" (Ex 19:4). As God's people were delivered from the enemy by their journey into the desert, so God's present people will be preserved miraculously from destruction (cf. Dt 32:10–12; Isa 40:31).

15–16 The serpent spews a floodlike river of water out of his mouth to engulf and drown the woman. The water imagery symbolizes destruction by an enemy (Pss 32:6; 69:1–2; 124:2–5; Na 1:8) or calamity (Ps 18:4). As the desert earth absorbs the torrent, so the covenant people will be helped by God and preserved from utter destruction (Isa 26:20; 42:15; 43:2; 50:2). Just as the ancient Egyptians of old were swallowed by the earth (see Ex 15:12), so the messianic community will be delivered by God's power.

17 This attack of Satan against "the rest" of the woman's offspring seems to involve the final attempt to destroy the messianic people of God. Having failed in previous attempts to eliminate them as a whole, the dragon now strikes at individuals who "obey God's commandments and hold to the testimony of Jesus." To "make war" is the identical expression used of the beast's attack on the two witnesses in 11:7 and on the saints in 13:7. There is good reason to correlate the three groups and to indicate their common identity under different figures.

Those attacked are called "the rest of her [the woman's] offspring." Some identify this group as Gentile Christians in distinction from the Jewish mother church. Others identify the mother as the nation of Israel and see the "rest" as the believing remnant in the Jewish nation who turn to Christ. Still others have suggested that the woman represents the believing community as the universal church composed of both Jews and Gentiles, whereas the "offspring" of the woman represents individuals of the community (Jews and Gentiles) who suffer persecution and martyrdom from the dragon. The close identification of the seed of the woman as first of all Jesus and then also those who have become his brothers and sisters through faith agrees with other NT teaching (Mt 25:40; Heb 2:11–12). While Satan cannot prevail against the Christian community itself, he can wage war on certain of its members who are called on to witness to their Lord by obedience even unto death (cf. Mt 16:18; Rev 11:7; 13:7, 15). The church, then, is paradoxically both invulnerable (the woman) and vulnerable (her children; cf. Lk 21:16–18).

2. The two beasts (13:1–18)

This chapter forms part of the theme of the persecution of God's people that John began to develop in ch. 12. Turning from the inner dynamics of the struggle, ch. 13 shifts to the earthly instruments of this assault—namely, the two dragon-energized beasts. In the context of ch. 12, we may assume that the beast-related activities constitute the way the dragon carries out his final attempts to wage war on the seed of the woman (12:17). A contest is going on to seduce the whole world—even the followers of Jesus—to worship the beast. John emphasizes three things about the first beast: (1) the conspiracy of the dragon with it (vv.2–4); (2) the universal success of this partnership in deceiving the whole world to worship them (vv.3–4, 8); and (3) the partnership that will succeed in a temporary defeat of the saints of God, thus accomplishing the greatest blasphemy of God (vv6–7a).

Finally, not being able to seduce all the earth alone, the conspirators summon yet a third figure to their aid—the beast from the earth. He must remain loyal to his associates and at the same time be sufficiently similar to the Lamb to entice even the followers of Jesus. He must be able to perform miraculous signs much as the two witnesses did (vv.11ff.; cf. 13:13 with 11:5). As the battle progresses, the dragon's deception becomes more and more subtle. Thus the readers are called to discern the criteria that will enable them to separate the lamblike beast from the Lamb himself (13:11 with 14:1).

Two basic problems confront the reader, which have led students of the book to different understandings of this chapter: (1) The identification of the beast and his associate—are they personal or some other entity? (2) The time of the beast's rule—is it past, continuous, or still future? In seeking some satisfactory answers to these questions, it may be helpful to first set forth the facts about the beast. He (1) rises from the sea (v.1); (2) resembles the dragon (v.1); (3) has composite animal features (v.2); (4) is empowered by the dragon (v.2); (5) has one head wounded to death but healed (vv.3–4, 7b–8); (6) blasphemes God and God's people for forty-two months (vv.5–6); (7) makes war against the saints and kills them (vv.7a, 15); and (8) gives to those who follow him his "mark," which is either his name or his number, 666 (vv.16–18).

There are no fewer than a dozen further references in Revelation to the beast (11:7; 14:9, 11; 15:2; 16:2, 10, 13; 19:19–20; 20:4, 10), excluding the nine references to the scarlet-colored beast in ch. 17, which should probably be included. Among these references, 11:7 indicates that the beast rises from the Abyss, 19:19 refers to a coalition of the beast with the "kings of the earth," and 19:20 describes his final end in the lake of fire.

The history of the interpretation of ch. 13 is extensive. As early as the second century, two different understandings of the Antichrist appeared. Some early interpreters took the position that the Antichrist would be a person, a world deceiver who would reign for the last half of Daniel's seventieth week (Da 7:25). To Irenaeus (d. c. 202), the first one who discusses extensively the Antichrist, he is to be an unrighteous king from the tribe of Dan, the little horn of Da 7:8, who will reign over the earth during the last three and one-half years of Daniel's seventieth "week" (Da 9:27). To him, the Antichrist is the first beast of Rev 13 and the "man of lawlessness" of 2Th 2:3–4, who will exalt himself in the Jerusalem temple. Tertullian saw the docetic teachers of his day as the forerunners of a future Antichrist, who would come with counterfeit signs and wonders to mislead those who have not believed the truth but have delighted in wickedness (2Th 2:9–12). Many contemporary interpreters also follow a similar line of thinking. In its favor is the more literal reading of 2Th 2:1–10 and the natural understanding of the Antichrist as the personal counterpart to the personal Christ.

On the other hand, from the earliest times some interpreters have understood the Antichrist as a present threat of heresy, depending more on the concept found in the letters of John (1Jn 2:18, 22; 4:3; 2Jn 7). Thus Polycarp (d. 155) understood the Antichrist as the docetic heresies of his time. Many of the Reformers identified the beast with the institution of the papacy. Many modern commentators also adopt the theological heresy interpretation of the Antichrist. In its favor are the references to the Antichrist in the letters of John and the advantage of seeing the beast as an ever-present threat to the church rather than a figure of the last days. This view also argues that 2Th 2 need not be understood as referring to a single future individual. This issue is difficult to settle with any finality. However, I will develop ch. 13 more in accord with the theological heresy view, while recognizing that Tertullian's position is consistent with my position and that the personal future Antichrist view has strong support (see also the comments on v.11).

Many modern interpreters agree that the "wounded head" (v.3) refers to the Nero redivivus legend. Toward the end of his reign Nero became extremely unpopular among Roman citizens. He was finally repudiated by the praetorian guard and by the Senate, fled from Rome, and hid in the suburbs. Having been warned that soldiers were closing in on him, he cut his own throat with a sword. After his death, however, a rumor spread that he was not actually dead but was living in Parthia, from where he would return to regain his throne. On the basis of this rumor, several impostors arose who assumed the name of Nero in the effort to exploit the legend. At a later stage in the legend, Nero became invested with supernatural status. His return from the abyss with hordes of demons was an omen of the "last days."

This Neronic interpretation presupposes an identification in John's mind between the sea beast and the Roman Empire, a view espoused in our day by both preterist and preterist-futurist interpreters of Revelation. This in turn usually assumes that Rev 17 identifies the seven heads of the beast as the successive emperors of the Roman Empire. Yet a question concerning the reliability of this whole Neronic approach must be raised, for the Nero redivivus legend does not fit either the facts of history or the text of Rev 13 and 17 (see comments on 17:8–9).

Various considerations call the Nero myth into question. Irenaeus, for example, never refers either to a Domitian persecution as the background for John's thought or to any Nero-myth interpretation, even though he is attempting to refute the identification of the number 666 with any Roman emperor. Likewise, rabbinic exegesis up to the first century A.D. identified the fourth beast of Da 7 as Edom-equals-Rome. Since the beast of Rev 13 is a composite that unites all the features of the four beasts of Da 7, it therefore cannot be identified exclusively with Rome. An attempt will be made in this exposition to demonstrate that the Rome hypothesis is untenable. This leaves the question open as to whether John sees the Antichrist (or beast) as a person or some more encompassing entity.

1a Most modern translations include v.1a as the concluding verse of ch. 12 because they adopt manuscripts that read "he [i.e., the dragon] stood" rather than KJV's "I stood." If "he stood" is the correct reading, the sense would be that the dragon, who has now turned his rage on the children of the woman (12:17), stands on the seashore to summon his next instrument, the beast from the sea. But if the text reads "I stood," the sense is that John receives a new vision (cf. 10:1).

1b–2 The beast (GK 2563) has already been described in 11:7 as rising from the "Abyss" (cf. 17:8). Thus the sea may symbolize the Abyss, the source of demonic powers that are opposed to God (cf. 9:1; 20:1–3). This view agrees with the OT images of the sea as the origin of the satanic sea monsters—the dragon, Leviathan, and Rahab (Job 26:12–13; Pss 74:1:13–14; 87:4; 89:10; Isa 27:1; 51:9; cf. also Eze 32:6–8). The ancient Hebrews demythologized the sea-monster myths to depict the victory of the Lord of Israel over the demonic forces of evil that had sought in several ways to destroy God's people. Similarly, John later foresees the day of Christ's victory when there will "no longer [be] any sea."

John describes the beast in words similar to those he used in 12:3 of the dragon, the only difference being in the matter of the crowns. Any attempt to identify the heads or horns as separate kings, kingdoms, etc., should be resisted. It may be argued that John's beast from the sea should be connected to Leviathan, Rahab, and the dragon in the above-cited OT texts. While these refer to political powers, such as Egypt and Assyria, that were threatening Israel, to the OT writer, these nations were inseparably identified with the archetypal reality of the satanic, idolatrous systems represented by the seven-headed monster. Thus the beast represented, not the political power, but the system of evil that found expression in the political entity. The reason this point is so important is that it helps us see that the beast itself is not to be identified in its description with any one historical expression or with any one institutional aspect of its manifestation. It may appear now as Sodom, Egypt, Rome, or even Jerusalem, and it may manifest itself as a political power, an economic power, a religious power, or a heresy (1Jn 2:18, 22; 4:3)

In John's mind, the chief enemy is diabolical deception; his description therefore has theological overtones, not political ones. This interpretation does not exclude the possibility that there will be a final climactic appearance of the beast in history in a person, in a political or religious economic system, or in a final totalitarian culture combining all these. The point is that the beast cannot be limited to either the past or the future.

John further states that this beast had "on each head a blasphemous name" (cf. vv.5–6; 17:3). Arrogance and blasphemy also characterize the "little horn" of Daniel's fourth beast (Da 7:8, 11, 20, 25) and the willful king of Da 11:36. John alludes to the vision of Daniel but completely transforms it.

In keeping with the Rome hypothesis, many identified the blasphemous names with titles of the emperor (e.g., "Savior" and "Lord"). But was this in John's mind? In 2:9 he refers to the blasphemy "of those who say they are Jews and are not," a reference to the fact that some Jews at Smyrna had spoken against the lawful messianic claims of Jesus. They may also have charged the Christians with disloyalty to the empire and thus sided with the pagan officials in persecuting them. Could these Jews also be part of the blasphemous names? In v.6 the blasphemies are directed against God and are further defined: "to blaspheme God, by blaspheming his name, his temple, those who dwell in heaven" (my translation). Thus the beast challenges the sovereignty and majesty of God by denying the first commandment: "You shall have no other gods before me" (Ex 20:3). In other words, whatever person or system cooperates with Satan by exalting itself against God's sovereignty and by setting itself up to destroy the followers of Jesus, or entices them to become followers of Satan through deception, idolatry, blasphemy, and spiritual adultery, embodies the beast of Rev 13.

The description John gives of the beast from the sea does not describe a mere human political entity such as Rome. Rather, it describes in archetypal language the hideous, satanic system of deception and idolatry that may at any time express itself in human systems of various kinds. Yet at the same time John also seems to be saying that this blasphemous, blaspheming, and blasphemy-producing reality will have a final and, for the saints, utterly devastating manifestation.

3 The beast has a fatal wound, but the wound is healed. This results in great, world-wide influence, acceptance, and worship of both the beast and the dragon. This verse is important and requires careful exegesis because of the widespread Nero redivivus viewpoint that is read into the wounded head (see comment on 13:1–18). There are a number of features of John's description that are inconsistent with both the Nero redivivus and the Roman Empire interpretations.

(1) It should be observed that the wounded "head" of v.3 is elsewhere in the chapter a wound of the whole beast (vv.12, 14). A wound inflicted in a former and rejected emperor is not a wound inflicted on the whole empire. If the reference is to Nero, it is difficult to see how his self-inflicted wound could have hurt the whole empire or how the healing of his throat enhanced the authority of the beast or the dragon's war against the saints.

(2) The fatal wound must be carefully examined. "Wound" (GK 4435) everywhere else in Revelation means "plague," in fact, a divinely inflicted judgment (9:18, 20; 11:6; 15:1ff.; 16:9, 21; et al.). Elsewhere in the NT the word is used of "beatings" or official "floggings" (Lk 10:30; 12:48; Ac 16:23, 33; 2Co 6:5; 11:23). In 13:14 we find that the beast was wounded "by the sword" (GK 3479), which supposedly refers to Nero's dagger. But elsewhere in Revelation, "sword" (a) refers symbolically to the divine judgment of the Messiah (1:16; 2:12, 16; 19:15, 21); (b) is the sword of the rider on the red horse and equals divine judgment (6:4, 8); and (c) is a sword used as a weapon against the saints of God (13:10). We are, then, nearer to John's mind if we see the sword, not as referring to an emperor's death, but as the symbol of God's wrath that had struck a death blow to the authority of the beast (and the dragon), yet which had been deceptively covered up or restored (for a probable antecedent, see Isa 27:1).

(3) The correct identification, therefore, of the beast's enemy will enable us to understand what event John had in mind in the death blow. Everywhere in the book the only sufficient conqueror of the beast and the dragon is the slain Lamb, together with his faithful saints (12:11; 19:19–21). Moreover, what dealt this death blow to the dragon and the beast is Jesus' life, especially the crucifixion, resurrection, and exaltation (1:5; 5:9; 12:11; cf. Lk 10:17–24; 11:14–22; Jn 12:31–33; Col 2:15; also Ge 3:13ff.). That event is the mortal wound of the beast.

The same paradox found in ch. 12 appears here in ch. 13. While the dragon is defeated and cast out of heaven through the blood of Jesus (cf. 12:11), he still has time and ability to wage a relentless war against the people of God (12:13ff.). Similarly, the beast has been dealt a fatal blow by the cross of Christ and still has time and ability to wage war against the saints. He appears to be alive and in full command of the scene; his blasphemies increase. What the sea beast cannot accomplish, he commissions the earth beast to do (vv.11ff.). All three—the dragon, the sea beast, and the earth beast—are in collusion to effect the same end: deception that leads the world to worship the dragon and the sea beast and the destruction of all who oppose them.

(4) It is this description that leads to a final reason why identifying the beast exclusively with any one historical personage or empire is probably incorrect. In John's description of the beast, there are numerous parallels with Jesus that should alert us to the fact that John is seeking to establish, not a historical identification, but a theological characterization: Both wielded swords (2:12, 16; 13:10); both had followers on whose foreheads were inscribed their names (13:16–14:1); both had horns (5:6; 13:1); both were slain (5:12; 13:3, 8); both had arisen to new life and authority (1:18; 11:15–16; 13:3–4); and both were given (by different authorities) power over every nation, tribe, people, and tongue, and over the kings of the earth (1:5; 7:9; 13:7; 17:12). The beast described here is the great theological counterpart to all that Christ represents. Therefore, it is easy to understand why many in the history of the church have identified the beast with a future, personal *Anti*christ.

While the references in the Johannine literature may be taken as supporting the view that the Antichrist is manifested in multiple persons and was a reality present in John's day (1Jn 2:18, 22; 4:3; 2Jn 7), Paul's description in such personal terms of the coming "man of lawlessness" (2Th 2:3–4, 8–9) has led the majority of ancient and modern interpreters to adopt the viewpoint that it is a personal Antichrist. It is not necessary to understand Paul's apocalyptic language as describing a personal Antichrist. Moreover, John says that in the false teachers "the antichrist" was actually present (2Jn 7).

But the question must remain open as to whether John in the Apocalypse points to a single archenemy of the church—whether past or future—or to a transhistorical reality with many human manifestations in history. Thus the imagery would function similarly with regard to the image of the woman of ch. 12 or the harlot of ch. 17. If such is the case, this does not mean that John would have denied the earthly historical manifestations of this satanic reality; but it would prevent us from limiting the imagery merely to the Roman Empire or to any other single future political entity.

4 The goal of the dragon and the beast in their conspiracy is to promote the idolatrous worship of themselves—a perversion further enhanced by the earth beast (vv.12, 15). The means of deception varies because not all humankind is deceived in the same way. People follow and worship the beast because he is apparently invincible. "Who can make war against him?" His only real enemy seems to be the saints of Jesus, whom he effectively destroys (2:10, 13; 12:11; 13:15). But little does he realize that in the death of the saints the triumph of God appears. As they die, they do so in identification with the slain Lamb who through the Cross has decisively conquered the dragon by inflicting on him a truly fatal wound. "Who is like the beast?" echoes in parody similar references to God himself (Ex 15:11; Mic 7:18).

5–6 (See comments on v.1.) The period of the beast's authority is given as "forty-two months," the same period already referred to in 11:2-3; 12:6, 13 (see comments at 11:2).

7 As elsewhere in the Apocalypse, to "make war" does not mean to wage a military campaign but refers to hostility against and destruction of God's people in whatever manner and through whatever means the beast may choose (see 2:16; 11:7; 12:7, 17; 16:14; 17:14; 19:11, 19; 20:8; 2Co 10:4). "To conquer" them refers not to the subversion of their faith but to the destruction of their physical lives (cf. Mt 10:28). Their apparent defeat by the beast and his victory turn out in reality to be the victory of the saints and the defeat of the beast (15:2). Messiahlike universal dominion was given the beast by the dragon (Lk 4:4–7; 1Jn 5:19).

8 John further identifies the worshipers of the beast as "all whose names have not been written in the book of life belonging to the Lamb" (see comment on 3:5; cf. 17:8; 20:12, 15; 21:27). This contrast further emphasizes the theological nature of the description of the beast. The beast from the earth represents the idolatrous system of worship instigated by the dragon to deceive humankind into breaking the first commandment.

A debatable issue is whether the words "from the creation of the world" (also 17:8) belong grammatically with "have not been written" or with "that was slain." In other words, is it the Lamb who was slain from the creation of the world, or is it the names that were not recorded in the book of life from the creation of the world? In Greek, either interpretation is grammatically acceptable. But 17:8 implies that the word order in the Greek favors the latter view and suggests that John is deliberately providing a complementary thought to 17:8. In the former instance, the emphasis rests on the decree in eternity to elect the Son as the redeeming agent for humanity's salvation (13:8; 1Pe 1:20); in the latter, stress lies on God's eternal foreknowledge of a company of people who would participate in the elect Son's redeeming work (17:8). In any event, these words cannot be pressed to prove eternal individual election to salvation or damnation, since 3:5 implies that failure of appropriate human response removes one's name from the book of life. This verse distinguishes clearly between the followers of the beast and those of the slain Lamb. It also calls for faithful commitment and clear discernment of error on the part of the Lamb's people.

9–10 These verses are both important and difficult. This is the only occurrence in Revelation, apart from chs. 2–3, of the words "he who has an ear, let him hear." John calls special attention to the need for obedience to the exhortation in v.10b. Most contend that the language of v.10 alludes to Jer 15:2; 43:11, where the prophet describes the certainty of divine judgment that will come upon the rebels in Israel—they will suffer captivity, famine, disease, and death from the sword. Yet it is difficult to see how Jeremiah's words are appropriate here in this context of an exhortation for believers to be faithful. John's meaning must be different—namely, that as the rebels in Jeremiah's day would certainly encounter the divine judgment, so the faithful to Christ are assured that their captivity and martyrdom are in God's will.

No completely satisfying resolution of the problems in v.10 is available. Since the difficult part (10a) is both preceded by (v.9) and followed by (v.10b) appeals to obedience and loyalty, it seems best to stay with the sense of obedient faithfulness. The day of persecution for Christians is at hand, and they will have to suffer. In calmly undergoing this final tribulation they must manifest endurance and faithfulness (cf. Php 1:28). John, in other words, seems to call believers here to passive resistance against their enemies. Yet this resistance, which may result in captivity and even martyrdom, contributes to the eventual defeat of evil.

11 John sees another beast, rising from the earth. This second beast completes the triumvirate of evil—the dragon, the sea beast, and the land beast. This beast is subservient to the beast from the sea and seems utterly dedicated to promoting not himself but the wounded beast from the sea. Elsewhere the land beast is called the "false prophet" (16:13; 19:20; 20:10). As with the first beast, identification is a problem. That this beast comes from the land rather than the sea may simply indicate his diversity from the first, while other references stress their collusion.

A survey of the history of interpretation reveals in general, as with the first beast, two main lines: either the beast represents a power or a movement, or it describes a human being allied with the Antichrist at the close of the age. Early Christian interpreters, who identify the first beast not with Rome but with a personal Antichrist, find in the second beast the "armor-bearer" of the first, who employs the demonic forces to work magic and deceive the inhabitants of the earth. Many of the Reformers, drawing on earlier traditions, were led to identify this beast with the papacy or specific popes. In other words, they saw the beast as a present threat and not some entity awaiting a yet future manifestation. Most modern commentators, following the Nero redivivus view of the first beast, identify this beast as the priesthood of the imperial cultus. Others would extend the symbolism to all ages and see in the second beast persecuting power, pagan or Christian, and would call special attention to the Roman papacy, though by no means limiting it to this priesthood.

While recognizing that no view is without problems, the following discussion takes the position that the land beast is John's way of describing the false prophets of the Olivet Discourse (Mt 24:24; Mk 13:22). This identification is consistent with the previously stated view of the sea beast as describing not just a specific political reality but the worldwide anti-God system of Satan and its manifestation in periodic, historical human antichrists. The land beast is the antithesis to the true prophets of Christ symbolized by the two witnesses in ch. 11. If the thought of a nonpersonal antichrist and false prophet seems to contradict the verse that describes them as being cast alive into the lake of fire (19:20), consider that "death" and "Hades" (nonpersons) are also thrown into the lake of fire (20:14).

The "two horns like a lamb" seems to highlight the beast's imitative role relative to the true Lamb in the rest of the book (e.g., 5:6ff.; 13:8; 14:1). Could the two horns be in contrast to the two witnesses in ch. 11? Since one of the primary characteristics of this second beast is his deceptive activities (v.14; 19:20), his appearance as a lamb would contribute to the confusion over the beast's true identity. If the land beast represents satanic false teaching and false prophets, their evil is intensified because of its deceptive similarity to the truth. Even though the beast is like the Lamb, in reality he is evil because "he [speaks] like a dragon," i.e., he teaches heresy. Jesus gave such a twofold description of false prophets in the Sermon on the Mount: "Watch out for false prophets. They come to you in sheep's clothing, but inwardly they are ferocious wolves" (Mt 7:15). On the other hand, the lamblikeness may simply be a reference to the beast's gentle outward manner in contrast to his true identity as a fierce dragon.

12 The activity of the land beast is repeatedly described as that of promoting the first beast's worship (v.14). Could this be the kind of activity referred to in the reference to the false prophets in Pergamum and Thyatira, who seduce the servants of God to idolatry (2:14–15, 20, 24)? The phrase "on his behalf" (GK 1967) is perhaps better translated "before him"; the land beast does not merely exercise his authority as the sea beast's representative but stands "before him." One who stands "before" someone else is ready to do that person's bidding. The same preposition is used of the two witnesses in 11:4: "These are the two olive trees and the two lampstands that stand before [GK 1967] the Lord of the earth." As the antitheses of the two witnesses, the false prophets derive their authority and ministry from the first beast.

13 One of the strategies the land beast uses to deceive people into following the first beast is the performance of "miraculous signs" (GK 4956; see comment on 12:1). The ability of the Satan-inspired prophets to perform deceiving miracles is attested elsewhere in Revelation and in other parts of the Bible (16:14; 19:20; Dt 13:1–5; Mt 7:22; 24:24; Mk 13:22; 2Th 2:9). Distinguishing between the true and false prophets has always been difficult but not impossible. The followers of Jesus must be constantly alert to discern the spirits (1Jn 4:1–3).

The "fire . . . from heaven" may allude to the fire that the prophet Elijah called down from heaven (1Ki 18:38) or to the fire coming out of the mouths of the two witnesses (Rev 11:5). John seems to intend a deliberate contrast between the true witnesses' use of fire and its use by the false prophets (11:5; cf. Lk 9:54). Fire also represents the true word of God and the Holy Spirit's witness (such as at Pentecost; Ac 2:3). The false fire would then be a reference to pseudo-charismatic gifts that create a counterfeit church community whose allegiance is to the Antichrist. In any case, the reference to fire from heaven indicates that no mighty deed is too hard for these false prophets, because they derive their power from the Antichrist and the dragon. Christ's true servants must not be deceived by even spectacular miracles that the false prophets may perform. Such miracles in themselves are no evidence of the Holy Spirit.

14a Here more must be involved than the deceptions of the imperial priesthood. The quality of the miracles deceives those who follow the beast—namely, "the inhabitants of the earth." "Deceive" (GK 4414) is John's term for the activity of false teachers who lead people to worship gods other than the true God (2:20; 12:9; 18:23; 19:20; 20:3, 8, 10; cf. 1Jn 2:26; 3:7; 4:6; also Mt 24:11, 24).

14b–15 The second beast orders the setting up of an "image" (GK 1635) of the first beast. Elsewhere, the worship of the first beast, his "image," and his "mark" are inseparable (14:9, 11; 15:2; 16:2; 19:20; 20:4). An "image" of something is not a mere copy but partakes in its reality and in fact constitutes its reality. Those interpreters who follow the Roman-emperor exegesis identify the image with the statue of Caesar and refer the "breath" and speaking of the image to the magic and ventriloquism of the imperial priests. But as has been argued earlier (see comments on vv.1, 11), serious questions can be raised against such an exegesis of John's language, which is much more theologically descriptive than the Roman hypothesis allows. This is not to deny that the imperial worship could be included as one form of the beast worship. But the reality described is much larger and far more transhistorical than the mere worship of a bust of Caesar. John, however, would not deny that these realities have their historical manifestations, for in every age the beast kills those who will not worship his image. In terms reminiscent of the great golden image Nebuchadnezzar made and commanded every person to worship on the threat of death (Da 3:1–11), John describes the world-wide system of idolatry represented by the first beast and the false prophet(s) who promotes it. It is a system that produces a breach of the first two commandments (Ex 20:3–5).

In speaking about giving "breath" (GK 4460) to the image, John implies the activity of the false prophets in reviving idolatrous worship, giving it the appearance of vitality, reality, and power. Curiously, the two witnesses were also said to receive "breath" (GK 4460; 11:11). This idolatrous satanic system has the power of death over those who worship the true God and the Lamb. The same "image" tried to kill Daniel and his friends, killed many of the prophets of God, crucified the Lord Jesus, and put to death Stephen (Ac

7:60), James the apostle (Ac 12:1–2), and Antipas (Rev 2:13). Thus John demonstrates to his followers the apparent healing of his wounded head. To limit the image to the bust of Caesar or to some future statue or ventriloquistic device constricts John's deeper meaning and eliminates the present significance of his language. All throughout history there have been those who have sought worship for themselves instead of for the Lord Jesus Christ. A contemporary example is Sun Myung Moon, who calls himself the "Lord of the Second Advent." Many are being deceived into following him and his teaching.

16 The immediate effect of the worship of the beast involves receiving a "mark" (GK 5916) on the right hand or forehead. By comparing the other passages where the beast, image, mark, and name of the beast are mentioned, it seems clear that the mark is an equivalent expression to the "name of the beast" (v.17; 14:11; also 14:9; 15:2; 16:2; 19:20; 20:4), which is also the "number of his name" (v.17; 15:2). The Greek word "mark" usually refers to a work of art such as a carved image of a god (Ac 17:29), a written inscription, an impress "seal" of the emperor, or a "brand" on camels indicating ownership. But such a mark was never placed on a person, let alone on the "right hand" or on the "forehead." Thus, the "mark" is not a literal impress seal or mark of identification, but it is John's way of symbolically describing authentic ownership and loyalty. Those who worship the beast have his brand of ownership on them, just as the followers of Jesus have the brand of God's possession on them (see also comments on 7:1–3).

17 Those having the "mark" can "buy or sell," those without it cannot. This statement apparently refers to some sort of socio-economic sanctions that would, of course, affect the social and economic condition of Christians in the world. Earlier, John alluded to certain such conditions. Smyrna was a greatly persecuted church and was "poor" (2:9); Philadelphia was of "little strength" (3:8); those faithful to Christ in the Great Tribulation are seen in heaven as never again hungering (7:16), while the great harlot grows rich and wallows in luxury (18:3). Other NT writers also hint at socio-economic sanctions practiced against Christians (Ro 15:26, Heb 10:34).

18 In v.17, John indicates that the "mark" is the name of the beast or the number of his name. He now reveals the number of the beast: "His number is 666." The list of conjectures concerning the meaning of the number is almost as long as the list of commentators on Revelation. Taking their cue from the words "let him calculate the number of the beast," most of these interpreters have tried to play the ancient Hebrew game of gematria. Ancient languages, including Hebrew and Greek, use standard letters from their alphabets as numerical signs. For example, an alpha in Greek (an aleph in Hebrew) can represent the number one, a beta the number two, an iota and beta together, the number twelve, etc. A series of letters could form a word and at the same time indicate a number. Gematria took many forms and consisted in trying to guess the word from the number or trying to connect one word with another that had the same numerical value. Some Jews loved to find mysterious connections between words, based on the same numerical value. For example, the Hebrew word nahash ("serpent") has the same numerical value as the Hebrew word mashiah ("Messiah"). From this it was argued that one of the names of the Messiah was "serpent" (cf. Moses' lifting up the "serpent" in the desert; Nu 21; Jn 3:14).

Thus it is not difficult to understand why most commentators have understood John's words "Let him calculate the number. . . . His number is 666" to be an invitation to the reader to play gematria and discover the identity of the beast. Irenaeus (d. c. 202) mentions that many names of contemporary persons and entities were being offered in his day as solutions to this number mystery, though he himself cautioned against the practice and believed that the name of the Antichrist was deliberately concealed because he did not exist in John's day. The name would be secret till the time of his future appearance in the world. He expressly refutes the attempt of many in his day to identify the name with any of the Roman emperors and warns the church against endless speculations.

Irenaeus's fear was not misplaced, for endless speculation is just what has happened in the history of the interpretation of v.18. One of the most popular interpretations is a Hebrew rendition of "Neron Caesar," which equals 666, thus linking this beast with the Nero redivivus legend (see comments on 13:1–18); more recently this understanding has been seriously challenged. All proposed solutions based on gematria seem unsatisfactory. If John was seeking to show believers how to penetrate the deception of the beast as well as to contrast the beast and his followers with the Lamb and his followers (14:1ff.), he has clearly failed—that is, if he intends for us to play the gematria game.

Several exegetical factors, however, argue strongly for another sense of John's words. In the first place, nowhere does John use gematria as a method. Everywhere, however, he gives symbolic significance to numbers (e.g., seven churches, seals, trumpets, bowls; twenty-four elders; 144,000 sealed; 144,000 cubits for the New Jerusalem, etc.). Furthermore, in 15:2 the victors have triumphed over three enemies: the beast, his image, and the number of his name, which suggests a symbolic significance connected with idolatry and blasphemy rather than victory over a mere puzzle solution of correctly identifying someone's name.

John seeks to give "wisdom" (GK 5053) and "insight" (GK 3808) to believers as to the true identity of their enemy. A similar use of these two words occurs in 17:9, where John calls attention to the identity of the beast ridden by the harlot. What he seems to be asking for in both cases is divine discernment, not mathematical ingenuity! Believers need to penetrate the deception of the beast. John's reference to his number will help them to recognize his true character and identity.

The statement "it is man's number" further identifies the kind of number the beast represents. Does John mean that the beast is a man, that he has a human name? In 21:17 John uses similar words for the angel: "by man's measurement, which the angel was using." The statement is difficult. How can the measure be both "man's" and at the same time of an "angel"? John seems to be calling attention to some inner meaning in the number of the size of the height of the wall in respect to the size of the city. The meaning perhaps is a mild polemic against first-century tendencies to venerate angels unduly by stating that both human beings and angels can understand and enter the future city (see comments on 21:15–21). In any case, the statement "it is man's number" alerts the reader to some hidden meaning in 666. From this it may be concluded that the number of the beast is linked to humanity. Why would it be necessary for John to emphasize this relationship unless he assumed that his readers might have understood the beast to be otherworldly without any connection to humanity? Might it be, then, that the statement signifies that the satanic beast, the great enemy of the church, manifests itself in human form? Thus, as 21:17 links the angelic and the human, so here the satanic is joined with the human.

Finally, how are we to understand 666? The best way is to return to one of the most ancient interpretations, that of Irenaeus. This church father proposed (while still holding to a personal Antichrist) that the number indicates that the beast is the sum of all apostate power, a concentrate of six thousand years of unrighteousness, wickedness, deception, and false prophecy. To him, the digit six indicates the recapitulations of that prophecy that occurred at the beginning, during the intermediate periods, and which will take place at the end. The significance of the name of the beast is abundantly clear elsewhere in Revelation (12:3; 13:1–6; 14:11; 17:3ff.). Wherever there is blasphemy, there the beast's name is found. The number 666 is the heaping up of the number 6, which indicates the apex of incompleteness and demonic parody, in contrast to the perfection that is symbolized by the number 7. This interpretation of 666 as a symbolic number referring to the unholy trinity of evil or to the human imperfect imitation of God rather than a cipher of a name has been held by a long line of conservative commentators.

The number 666 has been found scribbled by worshipers of Satan on walls, doors, windows, etc. Courtesy Bill Reisman.

3. The Lamb and the 144,000 (14:1–5)

The two previous chapters have prepared Christians for the reality that as the end draws near, they will be harassed and sacrificed like sheep. This section shows that their sacrifice is not meaningless. A glance back at ch. 7 reminds us that there the 144,000 were merely sealed; here, however, they are seen as already delivered. When the floods have passed, Mount Zion appears high above the waters; the Lamb is on the throne of glory, surrounded by the triumphant songs of his own; the gracious presence of God fills the universe.

John now answers two pressing questions: What becomes of those who refuse to receive the mark of the beast and are killed (vv.1–5)? What happens to the beast and his servants (vv.6–20)?

1 The Lamb standing on Mount Zion is contrasted to the dragon standing on the shifting sands of the seashore (13:1). Although the rapid movement mood of the previous chapters gives way to one of victorious rest (vv.1–5, 13), activity continues because the battle between the dragon and the woman (cf. 12:11) is still going on. Immediately the question arises whether the 144,000 here are the same as those in ch. 7. The only reason for possibly viewing them differently in ch. 7 is that here they are described as "firstfruits" and "pure," who "did not defile themselves with women" (v.4). The two-group viewpoint has been defended especially by some Roman Catholic exegetes, though this is by no means unanimous among them.

The problem of the location of the 144,000 is more complex. "Mount Zion" may refer to the hilly area in southeast Jerusalem, the temple mount, the whole city of Jerusalem, or the whole land of Judah and the Israelite nation (see ZPEB, 5:1063–65). In the prophetic tradition, Zion came to symbolize the place where the Messiah would gather to himself a great company of the redeemed (Ps 48:1ff.; Isa 24:23; Joel 2:32; Ob 17, 21; Mic 4:1, 7; Zec 14:10). In Jewish apocalyptic literature, Zion can symbolize the strength and security that belong to the people of God.

In the seven NT references to Zion, five occur in OT quotations. The other two (here and Heb 12:22–23) imply a connection between Mount Zion and the church. Some, by connecting the reference in Hebrews to the one here, have argued for the heavenly location of the 144,000. Others view Mount Zion as the earthly seat of the messianic or millennial kingdom. Whether this Mount Zion has any connection (as to locality) with ancient and historical Zion, John does not say. At any rate, that the 144,000 are singing "before the throne" (v.3) is not an objection to seeing them as the earthly Zion; it is not the redeemed who are singing but the angelic harpists.

The 144,000 have on their foreheads the names of the Father and the Lamb, showing that they belong to God, not the beast. In 7:3ff., the elect group has the seal of God on their foreheads, linking them to this group in ch. 14, while the further description that "they follow the Lamb" (v.4) may show their connection with the second group in 7:9ff. (see esp. 7:17). One of the most beautiful and assuring promises in the whole book is that God's servants will have his name on their foreheads (cf. 3:12; 22:4).

This chapter advances the drama a step further than ch. 7. While the members of the multitude are the same, the circumstances in which they are seen have altered. In ch. 7 the whole company of God's people are sealed (7:1–8), readied for the satanic onslaught, and then a company (a martyred portion?) are seen in heaven serving before the throne of God (7:9ff.). In ch. 14, the whole body of the redeemed is seen (resurrected?) with the Lamb in the earthly eschatological kingdom. The repetition of the reference to the 144,000 may also be a liturgical phenomenon, a chief characteristic of the book.

The background of the scene (vv.1–5) may reflect John's reinterpretation of Ps 2, which he had alluded to elsewhere and which describes the battle between the rebellious nations and God, with God suppressing the revolt by enthroning his Son on Mount Zion. John, however, does not see the warrior-king the writer of Ps 2 hoped for, but he sees the Lamb and those who repeated his victory over the enemy by their submission (his name on their forehead). Psalm 76 may also be part of the background, where Zion is the symbol of the defeat of God's enemies and the salvation of his people.

2 The "sound" (GK 5889) John hears is probably a "voice," as in 1:15. It is important to recognize that this voice is not that of the redeemed; it is a loud angelic chorus (cf. 5:11), sounding like "the roar of rushing waters," like "a loud peal of thunder," and like "harpists playing their harps" (1:15; 5:8; 6:1; 19:1, 6; cf. comment on 5:8). Again the scene is liturgical, emphasizing the connection between the earthly victory and the heavenly throne.

3 This "new song" should be related to the "new song" in 5:9, also sung by the angelic choirs. It is the song of redemption and vindication. What was seen in ch. 5 as secured for the redeemed by Christ's death (i.e., that "they will reign on the earth" [v.10]) has now been realized on Mount Zion. In the one further reference to a song in Revelation, the redeemed "victors" sing "the song of Moses . . . and the song of the Lamb" (15:3), which may also relate to the new song of chs. 5 and 14 (see comment on 15:3). This heavenly example of worship may help us understand and appreciate Paul's references to songs inspired by the Spirit and sung in the first-century congregations (Eph 5:19; Col 3:16). Also instructive are the OT references to a "new song" (Pss 33:3; 40:3; 96:1; 144:9; 149:1; Isa 42:10). A new song, resulting from some mighty deed of God, comes from a fresh impulse of gratitude and joy in the heart. The angels sing a new song because now the victors themselves have become victorious. We are reminded again of the Passover motif (Ex 15:1ff.).

While the angels sing, only the 144,000 can "learn" (GK 3443) the new song, for they alone of earth's inhabitants have experienced God's mighty deed of victory over the beast through their ordeal of suffering and death. The word "learn" may also mean "hear deeply" in this context; in the Gospel of John, this word is used in the sense of a deep listening to divine revelation that results in learning (Jn 6:45). The 144,000 who were "redeemed" (GK 60) "from the earth" or "from among men" (v.4) must be the same as those "purchased" (GK 60) from all the earth's peoples in 5:9 and those sealed in 7:4–8, who have washed their garments in the blood of the Lamb (7:14ff).

4 John's most difficult statement about this group is that they did "not defile themselves with women." Does he mean that this group consists only of men who had never married? Or should it be understood as referring to spiritual apostasy or cult prostitution? It is unlikely that "defile" (GK 3662) refers merely to sexual intercourse since nowhere in Scripture does intercourse within marriage constitute sinful defilement (cf. Heb 13:4). On the other hand, the word "defiled" is found elsewhere in Jewish literature in connection with the promiscuous intercourse practiced by the Gentiles that defiled them but from which the Jews have separated themselves. Therefore, the words can refer only to adultery or fornication; and this fact, in turn, establishes "pure" as the meaning of parthenoi (lit., "virgins"; GK 4221). In addition, we can relate the reference to purity to the defilement of idolatry. John seems to use "defile" this way elsewhere of cult prostitution (3:4; cf. 2:14, 20, 22).

The group as a whole has remained faithful to Christ; "they follow the Lamb wherever he goes" in obedient discipleship. They are purchased by Christ's blood and offered to God as a holy and pure sacrifice of firstfruits. Surely this symbolically implies that the bride of Christ must be pure from idolatry. Paul, likewise, uses this figure: "I promised you to one husband, to Christ, so that I might present you as a pure virgin to him" (2Co 11:2–3).

Those spoken of in v.3 are "firstfruits" (GK 569) presented to God. This word can have two meanings. (1) It may designate the initial ingathering of the farmer, after which more follows. So it may mean a pledge or down payment with more to follow. This seems to be its meaning in Ro 8:23; 11:16? (cf. 1Co 15:20; 16:15). (2) In the usual OT sense and alternate NT use, "firstfruits" means simply an offering to God in the sense of being separated to him and sanctified (wholly consecrated), where no later addition is made, because the firstfruits constitutes the whole (see "sacred contributions" in Nu 5:9; see also Dt 18:4; 26:2; Jer 2:3; Jas 1:18). That this is John's intended sense is evident from the expression "offered as firstfruits to God."

5 The "lie" that brings "blame" refers to the blasphemy of the beast worshipers who deny the Father and the Son and ascribe vitality to the beast by believing his heresies and worshiping his image (21:27; 22:15; see also Jn 8:44–45; Ro 1:25; 2Th 2:9–11; 1Jn 2:4, 21–22, 27).

4. The harvest of the earth (14:6–20)

This section forms a transition from the scene of the saints' final triumph (14:1–5) to the seven bowls (16:1ff.), which depict the final judgments on the enemies of the Lamb. As such, it forms a consoling counterpart to the first vision by assuring the 144,000 that God will judge the beast, his followers, and his world-wide system—Babylon.

6–7 The first angel announces that there is still hope, for even at this crucial moment in history God is seeking to reclaim the beast followers by issuing a message appealing to the people of the world at this time of judgment to "fear God . . . and worship him." That this appeal is called a "gospel" (GK 2295) has raised a question. How is it good news? The intent of the gospel message is that people should fear God and worship him. John is perhaps showing the final fulfillment of Mk 13:10. Moreover, we must never forget that the announcement of divine judgment can never be separated from the proclamation of God's mercy. The gospel is "eternal" because it announces eternal life (Jn 3:16).

The reference to the coming of the hour of judgment supports the view that there is chronological progression in Revelation and that not everything described by John is simultaneous (see comment at 15:1). This is the first reference in the book to the "judgment [GK 3213] of God" (16:7; 18:10; 19:2), though the "wrath" of God, which appears to be a synonymous term (v.19), has been mentioned earlier (6:16–17; 11:18; 14:8, 10; 15:1; cf. 16:1, 19; 18:3; 19:15).

8 In anticipation of a more extended description in chs. 17–18, the fall of Babylon, the great anti-God system of idolatry, is announced. The actual fall does not occur until the final bowl judgment (16:19). There may be in 11:8 a previous allusion to Babylon as the "great city" (cf. 17:18).

9–12 The explicit reference to the certain judgment of the beast worshipers links this section to ch. 13. Through an OT figure of eschatological judgment, unmixed wine (not diluted with water) in the cup of God's wrath (Ps 75:8; Jer 25:15) and "burning sulfur" (Isa 30:33; 34:8–10; cf. Ge 19:24; Rev 19:20; 20:10; 21:8), John describes God's judgment inflicted on those who refuse his truth and worship a lie (Ro 1:18, 25). For those who drink Babylon's cup (v.8), the Lord will give his own cup of wrath.

The reference to "torment" (GK 989; cf. 9:5; 11:10; 12:2; 20:10) has troubled some commentators since this torment takes place "in the presence . . . of the Lamb." The view that some recalcitrant individuals will suffer eternal deprivation seems repugnant to Christian sensitivity, but John's imagery conveys a sense of finality and sober reality. It is not clear whether this imagery points only to permanency and irreversibility of God's punitive justice or also includes the consciousness of eternal deprivation (cf. 20:10; Jn 5:28–29). Preaching about hell, of course, should never be used as a terror tactic by the church but should always be presented in such a way as to show that God's mercy is the final goal. Yet when all is said and done, the question is not whether the doctrine of hell is detestable but whether it is true. It does have the full support of Scripture and of our Lord (Mt 25:46; Ro 2:3–9; 2Th 1:6–9).

The worshipers of the beast will be unable to rest day and night, in contrast with the saints who will "rest" from their labor (v.13). While the beast worshipers had their time of rest, and while the saints were persecuted and martyred, in the final time of judgment God will reverse their roles (7:15ff.; cf. 2Th 1:6–7).

The great test for Christians is whether through patient endurance they will remain loyal to Jesus and not fall prey to the deception of the beasts (see comment on 13:10). They do this by paying serious attention to God's Word and their faithfulness to Christ Jesus (1:3; 2:26; 3:8, 10; 22:7, 9; cf. Php 1:28–30).

13 A fourth voice comes from heaven (an angel's or Christ's?), pronounces a beatitude, and evokes the Spirit's response. This is the second beatitude in Revelation (cf. comment on 1:3). Its general import is clear. But how are the words "from now on" to be understood? Do they mean that from the time of the vision's fulfillment onward (i.e., the judgment of idolaters and the 144,000 with the Lord on Mount Zion) the dead will be blessed in a more complete manner? Or do they refer to the time of John's writing onward? While either interpretation is grammatically possible, the preceding verse, which implies an exhortation to Christians in John's day, favors the latter view. John expects the imminent intensification of persecution associated with the beast, and this beatitude indicates that those who remain loyal to Jesus will be blessed indeed.

Apart from 22:17, this is the only place in Revelation where the Spirit speaks directly (cf. Ac 13:2; Heb 3:7; 10:15). The beatitude is no doubt intended to emphasize the reality of the martyrs' future. Their blessedness consists in "rest" (GK 399) from the onslaught of the dragon and his beasts and the assurance that their toils (GK 3160; cf. 2:2) for Christ's name will not be in vain but will be remembered by the Lord himself after their death (Heb 6:10; cf. 1Ti 5:24–25).

14–16 After a brief pause to encourage the faithfulness of the saints, John returns to the theme of divine judgment on the world. He does this by first describing the judgment in terms of a harvest (vv.14–20) and then by the seven bowl plagues (chs. 15–16). John sees a white cloud and seated on it one resembling a human being ("a son of man"). He has a crown of gold and a sharp sickle, the main instrument of harvest. John clearly wishes to highlight this exalted human figure and his role in the final judgment. The question of the identity of the "son of man" is not unlike the problem of the identity of the rider of the white horse (6:1). The same words "like a son of man" are used of Jesus in 1:13. But some have noted the close association of the one "seated on the cloud" with the words "another angel" in v. 15 and with "another angel . . . too" in v.17, the one who has a sharp sickle—implying that the former figure with the sickle was also an angel. Further, if the figure on the cloud is Jesus, how can we account for an angel giving a command to him to reap the earth (v.15)?

Though there are difficulties, there can be little question that the divine figure seated on the cloud must be associated, through Da 7:13–14, with the person of the Messiah under the title "a son of man." Indeed, it is quite appropriate for John to use the term "Son of Man," since in the Gospels that term is most frequently associated with the Messiah's suffering and the glory of the Second Advent as well as with his right to judge the world (Mt 26:64; Jn 5:27; see comment on Mk 8:31). Both themes are present in the context of Revelation. The imagery of Da 7, frequently used in this book, links the suffering people of God ("the saints") to the Son of Man who sits in judgment over the kingdoms of the world. It should, of course, be remembered that this is a highly symbolic description of the final judgment.

The harvest is a typical OT figure used for divine judgment (Hos 6:11; Joel 3:13), especially on Babylon (Jer 51:33). Jesus also likens the final judgment to the harvest of the earth (Mt 13:30, 39). He may use the instrumentality of angels or human beings, but it is his prerogative to put in the sickle. While this reaping may be the gathering of his elect from the earth (cf. Mt 9:37–38; Jn 4:35–38; et al.), the context favors taking the harvest to be a reference not to salvation but to judgment.

17–20 "Another" angel here has no more necessary connection with the Son of Man than "another" angel in v.15; it may simply mean another of the same kind of angel mentioned in the succession of personages in the book (cf. 14:6, where no other angel is involved except the one mentioned). This angel (v.17) will gather the vintage of the earth. He is associated with the angel from the altar who has authority over its fire. Though opinion about the identification of the altar is divided, it seems to be the incense altar, and the fire is symbolic of God's vindication of his martyred people (cf. 8:3–5 and comments on 6:9–11).

The divine final judgment is presented in three images: the unmixed wine in the cup (v.10), the grain harvest (vv.14–16), and the vintage harvest (vv.17–20). These are best understood as three metaphors describing different views of the same reality, i.e., the divine judgment. Again the OT provides the background for this imagery of divine judgment (Isa 63:1–6; La 1:15; Joel 3:13; cf. Rev 19:13, 15). The reference to the "great winepress of God's wrath" in v.19 should clarify the imagery and leave no doubt that it denotes God's judgment on the rebellious world.

The final verse (v.20) is gruesome: blood flows up to the horses' bridles for a distance of about 1,600 stadia (200 miles). Once again the source of the imagery is Isa 63:1–6, heightened by John's hyperbole. A similar apocalyptic image for the final judgment on idolaters occurs in the pre-Christian book of Enoch, where the righteous will slay the wicked. Here in Revelation the judgment is not the task of human vengeance but belongs exclusively to the Son of Man and his angelic reapers (cf. Ro 12:19–21). The symbolism is that of a head-on battle, a great defeat of the enemy, a sea of spilled blood. To go beyond this to find a symbolic meaning of the 1,600 stadia or to link the scene to some geographic location (cf. 16:4–6) is pure speculation.

The term "outside the city" requires explanation. It may refer merely to ancient warfare when a besieging army was slaughtered at the city walls, and the blood flowed outside the city. Some think John may have had an actual city in mind and have suggested Jerusalem because of the OT predictions of a final battle to be fought near the city (Da 11:45; Joel 3:12; Zec 14:4; but cf. Rev 16:16—"Armageddon" is not near Jerusalem). On the other hand, John's symbolic use of "city" in every other reference favors taking the word symbolically here. In Revelation there are in essence only two cities: the city of God, which is the camp of the saints, and the city of Satan, Babylon, which is made up of the followers of the beast. There is no way to be really sure of the identity of the city, nor is its identity important. It is sufficient to take it as the same city that was persecuted by the pagans (11:2) and is seen in 20:9, i.e., the community of the saints.

D. The Seven Bowls (15:1–19:10)

It is difficult to know where the divisions should fall in these further visions. Since the last series of sevens in Revelation includes the fall of Babylon under the seventh bowl (16:19), it has seemed appropriate to include the extensive description of the city's fall under the bowl-series division.

Chapter 15, a sort of celestial interlude before the final judgment, prepares for the execution of the bowl series (ch. 16), while chs. 17–18 elaborate the fall of Babylon. What has already been anticipated under the three figures of the divine final judgment—the cup of wine (14:10), the harvest of the earth (14:14–16), and the vintage (14:17–20) is now further described under the symbolism of the seven bowls. In typical Hebrew fashion, each cycle repeats in new ways the former events and adds fresh details.

It is clear that in these final judgments only the unbelieving world is involved; therefore, they are punitive plagues (16:2). Yet even in these last plagues, God is concerned with effecting repentance, though none abandon their idolatry (16:9, 11). Are the faithful still on earth? Presumably not, for 15:2 locates the whole company of conquerors before the throne.

The inclusive series of bowl judgments constitute the "third woe" announced in 11:14 as "coming soon" (see comment on 11:14). Since the first two woes occur under the fifth and sixth trumpets, it is reasonable to see the third woe, which involved seven plagues, as unfolding during the sounding of the seventh trumpet, when the mystery of God will be finished (10:7). The actual woe events were delayed till John could give important background material concerning not only the inhabitants of the earth but also the church herself, her glory and shame, her faithfulness and apostasy (12:1–14:20). These last plagues take place "immediately after the distress of those days" referred to by Jesus in the Olivet Discourse and may well be the fulfillment of his apocalyptic words in Mt 24:29. Significantly, the next event that follows this judgment, the coming of the Son of Man in the clouds (Mt 24:30–31), is the same event John describes following the bowl judgments (19:11).

1. Preparatory: The seven angels with the seven last plagues (15:1–8)

Chapter 15 is tied closely to ch. 16, for both deal with the seven last plagues of God's wrath. One is preparatory and interpretative, the other descriptive. Chapter 15 is oriented to the OT account of the Exodus. It has two main visions: the first portrays the victors who have emerged triumphant from the great ordeal (vv.2–4); the second relates the appearance from the heavenly temple of seven angels clothed in white and gold and holding the seven bowls of the last plagues (vv.5–8).

1 This verse forms a superscription to chs. 15–16. The final manifestation of the wrath of God takes the form of seven angels of judgment and is called a "sign" (GK 4956), the third identified heavenly "sign" (cf. the woman and dragon at 12:1, 3). The adjective

"marvelous" (GK 2515; cf. v.3) is added because John understood the seven angels to represent that God's wrath is completed (GK 5464)—i.e., the "last" (GK 2274) plagues—and they are awesome as well as final in character. While these plagues may be the finale to the whole historical panorama of God's judgments, it is exegetically preferable to find a connection of them with other events related in Revelation. As has already been argued, the first reference to the final judgment is found in 6:17: "For the great day of their wrath has come, and who can stand?" After the interlude of the sealing of the saints from spiritual harm (ch. 7), the seven trumpets are sounded (8:1ff.). The sixth one involves three plagues that kill a third of the human race (9:18). The third woe (11:14) includes the bowl judgments or the "last" plagues. Thus the trumpets begin the final wrath of God that is finished in the seven bowls.

2 As in 14:1ff., John again focuses his attention on a scene that contrasts sharply with the coming judgment, an indication of his pastoral concern. He sees before the throne the likeness of a sea of glass shot through with fire (cf. 4:6). It is a scene of worship, and its imagery is suitable for depicting the majesty and brilliance of God, which the sea of glass is reflecting in a virtual symphony of color. Firmly planted "beside" (or "on") the sea are those who were "victorious over the beast." They are the same ones who are seen throughout Revelation as having won out over the idolatrous beasts through their faithful testimony to Christ, even to the extent of martyrdom (e.g., 2:7, 11, 26; 12:11; 21:7; cf. 3:21; 5:5). They are the 144,000, the elect of God (7:4; 14:1), the completed company of martyrs (6:11), those who did not have "the number of his name" (see comment on 13:17). Suddenly in this dazzling scene the sound of harps and singing is heard.

3–4 The song sung by the redeemed is the "song of Moses, the servant of God and the song of the Lamb"—a single song as vv.3–4 show. The Song of Moses is in Ex 15:1–18. It celebrated the victory of the Lord in the defeat of the Egyptians at the Red Sea. In the ancient synagogue it was sung in the afternoon service of each Sabbath to celebrate God's sovereign rule over the universe, of which the redemption from Egypt reminded the Jew. As the deliverance from Egypt, with its plagues of judgment on Israel's enemies, became for the Jew a signpost of God's just rule over the world, so God's final judgment and the deliverance of the followers of the Lamb bring forth from the victors over the beast exuberant songs of praise to God for his righteous acts in history.

Each line in vv.3–4 picks up phrases from the Psalms and Prophets. Compare the following OT words with vv.3–4: "Then Moses and the Israelites sang this song" (Ex 15:1); "your works are wonderful" (Ps 139:14); "LORD God Almighty" (Am 4:13); "all his ways are just. A faithful God . . . upright and just is he" (Dt 32:4); "who shall not revere you, O King of the nations" (Jer 10:7); "they will bring glory to your name" (Ps 86:9), etc. John may or may not have heard the victors over the beast singing these actual words. But it was revealed to him that they were praising God for his mighty deliverance and for judgment on their enemies.

5–8 A second and still more impressive scene follows. The door to the temple in heaven is again opened (cf. 11:19), and the seven angels dressed in white and gold come out of the temple. In a dignified manner, one of the living creatures gives a bowl to each of the seven messengers. The bowls (GK 5786) are the vessels used in the temple ministry, especially for offerings and incense (5:8). It was probably a ritual bowl used for collecting the blood of the sacrifices (Ex 27:3). Golden bowls seem to be always associated with the temple (e.g., 1Ki 1:50; 2Ki 12:13; 25:15).

The "smoke" (GK 2837) that filled the temple refers to the Shekinah cloud first associated with the tabernacle and then with the temple (see comment on 7:15). It symbolizes God's special presence and the One who is the source of the judgments (Ex 40:34ff.; 1Ki 8:10–11; Eze 11:23; 44:4). His awesome presence in the temple until the plagues are finished (16:17) prohibits even angels from entering it (cf. Isa 6:4; Hab 2:20).

2. Pouring out of the seven bowls (16:1–21)

1 This chapter describes the "third woe" (see comment on 15:1–19:10) in the form of the outpouring of seven bowl judgments. They occur in rapid succession with only a brief pause for a dialogue between the third angel and the altar, accentuating the justice of God's punishments (vv.5–7). This rapid succession is probably due to John's desire to give a telescopic view of the first six bowls and then hasten on to the seventh, where the far more detailed judgment on Babylon occurs. Again, seven symbolizes fullness, this time fullness of judgment (cf. Lev 26:21). The striking parallelism between the order of these plagues and those of the trumpets (8:2–9:21), though clearly not identical in every detail, has led many to conclude that the two series are the same. The similarity, however, may be merely literary.

Each plague in both series (the trumpets and the bowls) is reminiscent of the plagues on Egypt before the Exodus. The first four of each cover the traditional divisions of nature: earth, sea, rivers, and sky. But in each of the bowls, unlike the trumpets, the plague on nature is related to the suffering of humankind. Furthermore, each bowl plague seems to be total in its effect ("every living thing ... died" [v.3]), whereas under the trumpets only a part is affected ("a third of the living creatures ... died" [8:9]). Therefore, it seems better to understand the trumpets and bowls as separate judgments. The final three plagues are social and spiritual in their effect and shift from nature to humanity. These descriptions should probably not be taken literally; the important point is that they depict God's sure and righteous judgment that will one day be actually done in this world.

2 The first bowl has no strict counterpart in the trumpets but recalls the sixth plague of boils under Moses (Ex 9:10–11). As the antagonists of Moses were affected by the boils, so the enemies of Christ who worship the beast will be struck by this plague.

3 The second bowl turns the sea into polluted blood (see comment on 8:8). Ge 1:21 is reversed; all marine life dies (cf. Ex 7:17–21).

4 The third bowl affects the fresh waters of the earth, which are essential to human life. They too become polluted as blood (cf. Ex 7:17–21).

5–7 Here the reference to blood calls forth the dialogue between the angel and the altar concerning the logic of the plagues. The blood that sinners drink is just requital for their shedding of the blood of the saints (15:1–4) and prophets (11:3–13; cf. 17:6; 18:20). With blood, God vindicates the blood of the martyrs of Jesus. People must choose whether to drink the blood of saints or to wear robes dipped in the blood of the Lamb.

8–9 The fourth bowl increases the intensity of the sun's heat; it is the exact opposite of the fourth trumpet, which produced a plague of darkness (cf. 8:12). The earth dwellers, instead of repenting of their deeds and acknowledging the Creator (the only act that could even now turn away God's wrath), curse (lit., "blaspheme"; GK 1059) God for sending them agonizing pain (vv.11, 21). Yet their problem goes beyond the awful physical pain and is moral and spiritual (cf. Isa 52:5; Ro 1:25; 2:24).

10–11 The fifth bowl plunges the kingdom of the beast into darkness. This is not a reference to the fall of the Roman Empire or Caesar worship, though John's words would include this level of meaning. In 2:13, John used the word "throne" to designate the stronghold of Satan at Pergamum. Thus "the throne of the beast" symbolizes the seat of the world-wide dominion of the great satanic system of idolatry (the Abyss? cf. 20:1). This system is plunged into spiritual darkness or disruption, bringing chaos on all who sought life and meaning in it. This bowl plague, while similar to the fifth trumpet, strikes at the very seat of satanic authority over the world; and the darkness is moral and spiritual rather than physical (cf. 21:25; 22:5; Jn 8:12; 12:35–36, 46; 1Jn 1:5–7; 2:8–10). Again the terrible refrain is repeated: "But they refused to repent of what they had done."

12–16 The sixth bowl is specifically aimed at drying up the Euphrates River and so will allow the demonically inspired kings from the East to gather at Armageddon where God himself will enter into battle with them. The reference to the Euphrates in the sixth trumpet is a striking parallel to the sixth bowl plague (9:14). Thus many identify the two series as different aspects of the same plagues. But while the sixth trumpet releases demonic hordes to inflict death on the earth dwellers, the sixth bowl effects the assembling of the rulers (kings) from the East to meet the Lord God Almighty in battle.

The Euphrates was not only the location of Babylon, the great anti-God throne, but the place from which the evil hordes would invade Israel (see comment on 9:14). Thus, by mentioning the Euphrates by name, John is suggesting that the unseen rulers of this world are being prepared to enter into a final and fatal battle with the Sovereign of the universe. It is a warfare of a primordial and eschatological order, more descriptive of contemporary actualities than political history. Thus John is not describing the invasion of the Parthian hordes advancing on Rome or any future political invasion of Israel. How could such political groups be involved in the battle of the great day of God Almighty? Instead, in terms reminiscent of the ancient battles of Israel, John describes the final defeat of the forces of evil, represented by the kings from the East.

Further confirmation that these Eastern kings represent the combined forces of evil in the world is John's reference to the three froglike evil (lit., "unclean"; GK 176; see NIV note) spirits that proceed out of the mouths of the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet (frogs were considered unclean animals by the Jews; cf. Lev 11:10, 41). To the Egyptian, the frog was the symbol of the goddess Heqt, a goddess of resurrection and fertility. But to a Jewish mind, such gods were "demons" (v.14), Satan's emissaries, and inseparable from idolatry (9:20; 18:2; 1Co 10:20–21). These demons produce miraculous signs like the false prophet (13:13–14), and this connects their activity to the deception of the earth's kings. Since these demons come from the "mouths" of the figures, lying and deceptive words are implied (contrast the sword from Christ's mouth that is equal to his word of truth). These kings are summoned to the battle of the great day of God Almighty. Under the sixth bowl, the kings are only gathered. Not until the seventh bowl do the confrontation and defeat actually occur (19:19–21).

Somewhat abruptly, but not inappropriately, a warning is issued. Those who worship and serve the Lamb must be constantly vigilant lest their loyalty to him be diverted through the satanic deception (cf. Mt 24:43ff.; 1Th 5:2, 4). The Parousia (second coming) of Christ is here connected with the judgment of Armageddon and the fall of Babylon. After John has described the latter in more detail (chs. 17–18), he describes the vision of the return of Jesus (19:11–16). In v.15 the third of the seven beatitudes is pronounced (cf. 1:3; 14:13; 19:9; 20:6; 22:7, 14).

Similar to the exhortation given to those in the churches at Sardis (3:2–4) and Laodicea (3:18), the warning about Jesus' coming "like a thief" implies a need for alertness to the deception of idolatry and disloyalty to Jesus. Like a guard who watches by night, the true Christian will remain steadfast and prepared. One need not relate this warning only to the end time as in the context, since the appeal for the steadfast loyalty of Christians is relevant at any time. Such appeals, however, are associated in the Gospels with the return of Christ (Mk 13:32–37).

Many modern interpreters identify "Armageddon" with the Galilean fortified city of Megiddo and believe that a literal military battle will be fought in the latter days in that vicinity. While this sense is not impossible, it is better to take the name as being symbolic. In Hebrew har means hill or mountain, while megiddon could mean Megiddo, a Canaanite stronghold in the Jezreel Plain later captured by the Israelites (Jos 12:21; Jdg 5:19). Megiddo, however, is only a tell (an artificial mound—only seventy feet high in John's day), not a hill or mountain, though the fact that over two hundred battles have been fought in this vicinity makes this site an appropriate symbol for the final battle against evil. Neither can it mean Mount Carmel near Megiddo, for such a designation is never used and would be totally obscure to the residents of Asia to whom John writes. Therefore it is better to understand the term symbolically in the same manner as "in Hebrew" in 9:11 alerts us to the symbolic significance of the name of the angel of the Abyss.

An argument from language yields the same conclusion. Magedon can be derived from the secondary sense of the Hebrew verb gadad, which means "to gather in troops or bands." A simple way in Hebrew to make a noun from a verb is to prefix a ma to the verbal form. Thus we have maged, "a place of gathering in troops," and the suffix o, meaning "his," yielding "his place of gathering in troops." This is almost equivalent to the expressions in vv.14, 16—"to gather them [the kings] for the battle on the great day of God Almighty"—and would allude to the prophetic expectation of the gathering of the nations for judgment (Joel 3:2, 12). In any case, the name is symbolic and probably does not refer to any geographical location, in Palestine or elsewhere; rather, it describes the final confrontation where God will meet the forces of evil in their final defeat. It does, however, refer to a real point in history and to real persons who will encounter God's just sentence.

In Hebrew har means hill or mountain, while megiddon may mean Megiddo, which was a Canaanite stronghold in the Jezreel Plain . This picture shows the valley in front of the hill of Megiddo, where (according to some) the Battle of Armageddon will take place.

17–21 The seventh bowl is poured out into the air. Nothing further is said about the "air"; rather, John is concerned with the loud voice that cries out, "It is done," or, "It has come to pass." With this bowl, the eschatological wrath of God is completed (cf. 6:17; 21:6; Jn 19:30). Flashes of lightning, peals of thunder, and a severe earthquake occur (cf. 4:5; 8:5; 11:19). These eschatological signs symbolize the destruction of the anti-God forces throughout the world (cf. Heb 12:27). So great is the earthquake of God's judgment that it reaches the strongholds of organized evil represented by the cities of the pagans. Even the great city Babylon, which seduced all the earth's kings and inhabitants (17:2), now comes under final sentence (see comment on 11:8).

The judgment of Babylon will occupy John's attention in chs. 17–18. While the catastrophe is described in geophysical terms (islands and mountains disappearing, huge hailstones accompanying a gigantic storm), there is a question whether John intends the destruction to be merely natural or even politico-historical entities or exclusively of the unseen powers of evil. Like the Egyptian plague of hail that further hardened Pharaoh's heart, this plague of hail falls on the unrepentant to no avail; they curse God for sending his judgment on them (cf. Ex 9:24). By such language John describes the rising pitch of God's wrath on the rebellious powers of the earth. His words should not be politicized as if he spoke merely of Rome or of some impending historical crisis for the church. He is speaking of the great realities of the end, when God puts down all his enemies.

3. The harlot and the beast (17:1–18)

In an important sense, the interpretation of this chapter controls the interpretation of the whole book of Revelation. For many exegetes, Babylon represents the city of Rome, and the beast stands for the Roman Empire. The seven hills (v.9) are the seven selected dynasties of Roman emperors from Augustus to Domitian. The ten kings are heads of lesser and restless states, eager to escape their enslavement to the colonizing power. John's prediction of the fall of Babylon is his announcement of the impending dissolution of the Roman Empire in all its aspects. For such a view there is considerable evidence. Babylon was a term used by both Jews and Christians for Rome (2 Baruch 11:1; 1Pe 5:13). Rome was a great city (v.18), a city set on seven hills (v.9), and by the time of Domitian (A.D. 85), it was notorious for persecuting and killing the saints (v.6).

Yet there is evidence that casts doubt on this exegesis and impels us to look for a more adequate understanding of John's intention. Babylon cannot be confined to Rome or to any other historical city, past or future; it has multiple equivalents (cf. 11:8). The details John describes do not neatly fit any past historical city, such as Babylon, Rome, Tyre, or Jerusalem. Babylon is found wherever there is satanic deception. It can be seen in any of these classic manifestations from the past or in modern times—e.g., Nazi Germany, Soviet Russia, Mao's China, Saddam Hussein's Iraq, British colonialism, or even in aspects of American life. Babylon is defined more by dominant idolatries than geographic boundaries, and is best understood here as the archetypal head of all worldly resistance to God. It is a symbol of satanic deception and power, a divine mystery that can never be wholly reduced to empirical earthly institutions. It represents the total culture of the world apart from God, while the divine system is depicted by the New Jerusalem. Rome itself is only one manifestation.

Chapters 17–18 form one continuous unit dealing with the judgment on Babylon. John first describes the nature of the harlot and the beast she rides (ch. 17); then he describes her momentous fall in terms drawn from the OT descriptions of the fall of great cities (ch. 18). The woman is identified as the great city (17:18). From internal evidence in Revelation, the identity of Babylon the woman (ch. 17) with Babylon the great city (ch. 18) is so unmistakable that it would be inappropriate to make them different entities. These two chapters form an extended appendix to the seventh bowl, where the judgment on Babylon was mentioned (16:19). They also expand the earlier references to this city (11:8; 14:8) and look forward by way of contrast to the eternal Holy City (chs. 21–22).

Chapter 17 may be divided into the vision of the great harlot (vv.1–6) and the interpretation of the vision (vv.7–18).

1 "One of the seven angels" connects this vision with the preceding bowl judgments, showing that it is a further expansion or appendix of the final bowl action.

John sees a great prostitute (GK 4520) established on many waters. This verse forms a superscription for the chapter. The relationship between prostitution (GK 4518) and idolatry has already been discussed (see comments on 2:14, 20). The prevalence of cult prostitution throughout the ancient world makes this figure appropriate for idolatrous worship (cf. comments on "abominable things" in 17:4 and "magic spell" in 18:23). In the OT, the same figure of a harlot city is used of Nineveh (Na 3:4), of Tyre (Isa 23:16–17), and of idolatrous Jerusalem (Eze 16:15ff.). The best background for understanding the language of the chapter is not the history of the Roman Empire or the pagan gods but the descriptions of Jerusalem as the harlot in Eze 16 and 23 and Babylon as the harlot in Jer 51.

Amazingly, the harlot-city societies mentioned in Scripture have certain common characteristics that are also reflected in John's description of the great Babylon. Royal dignity and splendor combined with prosperity, overabundance, and luxury (Jer 51:13; Eze 16:13, 49; Na 2:9; cf. Rev 18:3, 7, 16–17); self-trust or boastfulness (Isa 14:12–14; Jer 50:31; Eze 16:15, 50, 56; 27:3; 28:5; cf. Rev 18:7); power and violence, especially against God's people (Jer 51:35, 49; Eze 23:37; Na 3:1–3; cf. Rev 18:10, 24); oppression and injustice (Isa 14:4; Eze 16:49; 28:18; cf. Rev 18:5, 20); and idolatry (Jer 51:47; Eze 16:17, 36; 23:7, 30, 49; Na 1:14; cf. Rev 17:4–5; 18:3; 19:2) are all here. Wherever and whenever these characteristics have been manifested historically, there is the appearance of Babylon.

The great prostitute "sits on many waters." This goes back to Jeremiah's oracle against historical Babylon, situated along the waterways of the Euphrates, with many canals around the city, greatly multiplying its wealth by trade (Jer 51:13). This description has a deeper significance, as is explained in v.15 with "peoples, multitudes, nations and languages"—figurative for the vast influence of the prostitute on the peoples of the world.

2 Earth's kings and inhabitants "committed adultery" with the prostitute. This language goes back to references to the harlot cities of the past (e.g., Jer 51:7) and means that the peoples of the world have become drunk with abundance, power, pride, violence, and especially false worship. "Kings of the earth" may describe simply the rulers in contrast to the rest of the people.

3 John is carried in the Spirit (see comment on 1:10; cf. 4:2; 21:10) into a "desert," where he again sees ancient Babylon (Isa 14:23; 21:1; cf. Rev 18:2; see comment on 12:6) as a prostitute seated on "a scarlet beast"—scarlet, presumably, because the color symbolizes the beast's blasphemy in contrast to the white-horse rider and those dressed in white, who are faithful and true (19:8, 11, 14). Since this beast is a seven-headed monster, there is no cogent reason against identifying it with the first beast in ch. 13, which is also inseparable from the seven-headed dragon of ch. 12.

4 Dressed in queenly attire (Eze 16:13; cf. Rev 18:7), the woman rides the beast, swinging in her hand a golden cup full of her idolatrous abominations and wickedness. Note the contrast—beauty and gross wickedness. Her costly and attractive attire suggests the prostitute's outward beauty and attraction (Jer 4:30). The golden cup filled with wine alludes to Jeremiah's description of Babylon's world-wide influence in idolatry (Jer 51:7). Her cup is filled with "abominable things" (GK 1007)—things most frequently associated with idolatry, which was abhorrent to Jews and Christians alike (21:27). Jesus used this word to refer to Daniel's "abomination that causes desolation" standing in the temple (Mk 13:14 cf. Da 9:27; 11:31; 12:11). "Filth" (lit., "uncleannesses"; GK 176) is associated in the NT with evil (unclean) spirits (e.g., Mt 10:1; 12:43) and with idolatry (2Co 6:17), perhaps with cult prostitution (Eph 5:5).

5 The woman has a title written on her forehead, showing that in spite of all her royal glamour she is nothing but a prostitute. It was customary for Roman prostitutes to wear their names in the fillet that encircled their brows.

The first word in the woman's title is "MYSTERY" (GK 3696; cf. 1:20; 10:7; 17:7). It seems best to see this word as a prefix to the actual name—i.e., "She has a name written on her forehead, which is a mystery, 'Babylon. . . .'" Elsewhere in Revelation John uses "mystery" as a word denoting a divine mystery or allegory that is now revealed (cf. also comment on 11:8).

No doubt the specific mystery is that this prostitute is the mother of all earth's idolatrous prostitutes. She is the reservoir or the womb that bears all individual cases of historical resistance to God's will on earth; she is the unholy antithesis to the woman who weds the Lamb (19:7–8) and to the New Jerusalem (21:2–3). That is in part why she cannot be any particular historical city (see comment on 17:1–18). While at its beginning Babel was associated with resisting and defying God (Ge 11:1–11), it is probably the epoch of the Babylonian captivity of Israel that indelibly etched the proud, idolatrous, and repressive nature of Babylon on the memories of God's people and thus provided the symbolic image that could be applied to the further manifestations of the mother prostitute.

6 This mother prostitute is also the source of the shed blood of the followers of Jesus (cf. 2:13), the martyrs referred to throughout the book (6:9; 7:9ff.; 13:8; 18:24). Though there is no direct reference here to Rome or Jerusalem, early Christian readers would understand that whenever they were threatened with death by any temporal power—whether political, religious, or both—they were in reality facing the blood-thirsty mother prostitute God was about to judge and destroy once for all. To be drunk with blood was a familiar figure in the ancient world for the lust for violence.

7 Verses 7–18 contain an extended interpretation of the vision that parallels the method used in apocalyptic sections in OT prophecy (cf. Zec 1:8ff., etc.; Rev 7:9ff). First the beast is described and identified (vv.7–8), then the seven heads (vv.9–11), the ten horns (vv.12–14), the waters (v.15), and finally the woman (v.18). John's astonishment over the arresting figure of the woman on the beast is quickly subdued by the interpreting angel's announcement that John will be shown the explanation of the divine mystery of the symbolic imagery of woman and beast.

8 Much difficulty in interpreting this section has resulted from incorrectly applying John's words either to the Roman emperor succession (the seven heads), to the Nero redivivus myth (see comments on 13:1–18), or to a succession of world empires. None of these views is satisfactory. John's description is theological, not political. He describes a reality behind earth's sovereigns, not the successive manifestations in history.

The beast is the monster from the Abyss—i.e., the satanic incarnation of idolatrous power that is mentioned in 11:7 and described in 13:1ff., and whose destruction is seen in 19:19–20. John is told that the beast "once was, now is not, and will come up out of the Abyss." This seems clearly to be a paraphrase of the earlier idea of the sword-wounded beast who was healed (13:3, 14); the language is similar, the astonishment of the world's inhabitants is identical, and the threefold emphasis on this spectacular feature is repeated (13:3, 12, 14; 17:8 bis, 11).

The play here on the tenses "was . . . is not . . . will come" refers to a three-stage history of the beast that requires a mind with wisdom to understand. That John's beast "is not" refers to his defeat by the Lamb on Calvary (cf. Jn 12:31–32). To those who worship only the Father and the Son, all other gods are nothing or nonexistent (1Co 8:4–6). Satan once had unchallenged power over the earth ("was," cf. Lk 4:6; Heb 2:14–15). Yet he is given a "little time" to oppose God and his people (12:12c; 13:5; 20:3b) before his final sentencing to "destruction" (v.11; cf. Mt 7:13; Jn 17:12; Ro 9:22; 2Th 2:3). It is this apparent revival of Satan's power and authority over the world after his mortal wound (Ge 3:15) that causes the deceived of earth to follow him.

There is a subtle change from the way the first reference to the beast is stated (v.8a) to that of the second (v.8b). Whereas the first instance reveals to believers his satanic origin ("out of the Abyss") and his final destruction, the second simply states an unbeliever's view—how that "he once was, now is not, and yet will come." This twofold viewpoint is paralleled in vv.9–11, where one of the kings "is" (v.10) and an eighth king "is" (v.11); yet the beast "is not" (v.11). There seems to be an intentional double-talk whereby the author identifies theologically the nature of the power that supports the profligate woman.

John uses a present tense for the beast's coming up out of the Abyss (cf. 11:7), suggesting a continuing aspect of his character, similar to the use of the present tense to describe the New Jerusalem descending from heaven (cf. 3:12; 21:2, 10). The beast's going into perdition may likewise indicate one of his continuing characteristics. There is also a possible parallelism in the expression "once was, now is not, and yet will come" with the divine attributes described in the phrase "who is, and who was, and who is to come" (1:8). On the meaning of the "book of life," see comment on 3:5 (cf. 13:8).

9 This and the following verses form the key of the Roman emperor view of the Apocalypse. Most scholars consider the seven hills to refer to the seven hills of Rome and the seven kings to seven successive emperors of that nation. Yet there is good reason to doubt that this is the interpretation John intended. In the first place, the seven hills belong to the monster, not the woman. It is the woman (i.e., the city [v.18]) who sits upon (i.e., has mastery over) the seven heads (or seven hills) of the monster. If the woman is the city of Rome, it is obvious that she did not exercise mastery over seven successive Roman emperors that are also seven traditional hills of Rome. Also, how could the seven hills of Rome have any real importance to the diabolical nature of the beast or the woman? Finally, nowhere in the NT is Rome described as the enemy of the church.

This interpretation also explains the meaning of John's call "for a mind with wisdom." The call for divine "wisdom" (GK 5053) requires theological and symbolical discernment, not mere geographical or numerical insight (cf. comment on 13:18).

In the seven other instances in Revelation of the word translated "hills" here (GK 4001), it is always rendered "mountain." Mountains allegorically refer to world powers in the Prophets (Isa 2:2; Jer 51:25; Da 2:35; Zec 4:7). It seems better, then, to interpret the seven mountains as a reference to the seven heads or kings, which describe not the city but the beast. In addition, the expression "they are also seven kings" requires strict identification of the seven mountains with seven kings.

John's use of numbers elsewhere in the book likewise argues against the Roman Empire identification. He has already shown a disposition for their symbolic significance—e.g., seven churches, seals, trumpets, bowls, and thunders; twenty-four elders; 144,000 sealed, etc. By his use of seven, he indicates completeness or wholeness. The seven heads of the beast symbolize fullness of blasphemy and evil.

10 If the seven heads symbolically represent the full source of evil power and blasphemy, why, then, does John talk about five fallen heads or kings, one existing head or king, and one yet to come? Does this not fit the view of dynastic successions to the imperial throne? To be sure, there have been many attempts to fit the date of Revelation (the then contemporary king would be he who "is") into the emperor lists of the first century. But immediately there are admitted problems. Where do we begin—with Julius Caesar or Caesar Augustus? Are we to count all emperors or just those who fostered emperor worship? Are we to exclude Galba, Otho, and Vitellius who had short, rival reigns? If so, how can they be excluded except on an arbitrary basis? A careful examination of the historic materials yields no satisfactory solution. If Revelation were written under Nero, there would be too few emperors; if under Domitian, too many. The original readers would have had no more information on these emperor successions than we do. Furthermore, how could the eighth emperor who is identified as the beast also be one of the seven (v.11)?

Recognizing these problems, others have sought different solutions to John's five-one-one succession of kings. Since the word "king" (GK 995) may also represent kingdoms, some have suggested an interpretation that takes the five-one-one to refer to successive world kingdoms that have oppressed the people of God: Egypt, Assyria, Babylon, Persia, Greece (five fallen), Rome (one is), and a future world kingdom. While this solves some of the emperor succession problems, it too must admit arbitrary omissions, such as the devastating persecution of the people of God under the Seleucids of Syria, especially Antiochus IV Epiphanes. This view also suffers in not respecting the symbolic significance of John's use of seven throughout the book. Also, how can these kings (kingdoms) survive the destruction of the harlot and be pictured as mourning over her demise (18:9)? And what sense can be made of the fact that the seventh king (kingdom), usually identified with Antichrist, is separate from the eighth one, which is clearly identified with the beast (vv.10b-11)?

A convincing interpretation of the seven kings must do justice to three considerations: (1) Since the heads belong to the beast, the interpretation must relate their significance to this beast, not to Babylon. (2) Since the primary imagery of kingship in Revelation is a feature of the power conflict between the Lamb and the beast and between those who share the rule of these two enemies (cf. 17:14; 19:19), the kind of sovereignty expressed in v.10 must be the true antithesis to the kind of sovereignty exercised by Christ and his followers. (3) Since the kings are closely related to the seven mountains and to the prostitute, the nature of the relationship between these must be clarified by the interpretation. If we can see that the seven heads do not represent a quantitative measure but show qualitatively the fullness of evil power residing in the beast, then the falling of five heads conveys the message of a significant victory over the beast. The image of a sovereignty falling is better related to God's judgment on a power than to a succession of kings (kingdoms) (cf. Jer 50:32; 51:8, 49; Rev 14:8; 18:2).

The imagery of the seven heads presented in 12:3 and 13:1 must be restudied. An ancient seal showing a seven-headed chaos monster being slain well illustrates John's imagery here. In that ancient scene, the seven-headed monster is being slain by a progressive killing of its seven heads. Four of the heads are dead, killed apparently by the spear of a divine figure who is attacking the monster. His defeat seems imminent. Yet the chaos monster is still active because three heads still live. Similarly, John's message is that five of the monster's seven heads are already defeated by the power of the Lamb's death and by the identification in that death of the martyrs of Jesus (12:11). One head is now active, thus showing the reality of the beast's contemporary agents who afflict the saints; and one head remains, indicating that the battle will soon be over but not with the defeat of the contemporary evil agents. This last manifestation of the beast's blasphemous power will be short—"he must remain for a little while." This statement seems to go with the function of the ten horns (kings) who for "one hour" (v. 12) will rule with the beast. The seventh king (head) represents the final short display of satanic evil before the divine blow falls on the beast (cf. 12:12c; 20:3c).

11 This verse presents all interpreters with a real difficulty. One interpretation refers the language to the Nero redivivus myth (see comments on 13:1–18)—namely, that a revived Nero will be the reincarnation of the evil genius of the whole Roman Empire. Furthermore, among futurist interpreters there is no agreement as to whether the seventh or the eighth king is the Antichrist. It must be admitted that any king (kingdom) succession hypothesis founders on v.11. On the other hand, if John has in mind qualitative identification and not quantitative, a theological rather than historical or political sense, the passage may yield further insight into the mystery of the beast.

First, we note the strange (to us) manner in which the sequence of seven kings gives way to the eighth, which is really the whole beast. This pattern of seven-to-eight-equals-one was familiar to the early church. The eighth day was the day of the resurrection of Christ, Sunday. It was also the beginning of a new week. The seventh day, the Jewish Sabbath, is held over, to be replaced by the first of a new series, namely Sunday. In fact, the whole theme of the Apocalypse is integrally related to this idea. Sunday is the day of the Resurrection. Revelation deals with one week, extending from Christ's resurrection to the general resurrection, when death is destroyed.

Each of the series of sevens in the book, except for the seven churches, follows a pattern of the seventh in the series becoming the first of a new series; thus seven to eight equals one. The eighth was the day of the Messiah, the day of the new age and the sign of the victory over the forces of evil. But does this provide a key to interpret the symbolism of the chaos monster? Of the three stages of the beast—was, is not, will come—only the last is related to his coming "up out of the Abyss" (v.8). These words appear to be the equivalent of the beast's healed wound (plague) mentioned in 13:3, 14. While, on the one hand, Christ has killed the monster by his death (Ge 3:15; Rev 12:7–9) and for believers he "is not" (has no power), yet, on the other hand, the beast still has life ("one is" [v.10]) and will attempt one final battle against the Lamb and his followers ("the other has not yet come . . . he must remain for a little while"). In order to recruit as many as possible for his side of the war, the beast will imitate the resurrection of Christ (he "is an eighth king" [v.11]) and will give the appearance that he is alive and in control of the world (cf. Lk 4:5–7). But John quickly adds, for the pastoral comfort of God's people, that the beast belongs to the seven, i.e., qualitatively not numerically (as if he were a former king revived); he is in reality not a new beginning of life (such as the resurrected Christ) but a part of the seven-headed monster that has been slain by Christ and, therefore, he goes "to his destruction." While this imagery may seem to us to be unnecessarily obscure, it reveals the true mystery of the beast in a fashion that exposes the dynamics of satanic deception so that every Christian may be forearmed.

12–14 Here John seems to allude to Da 7:7, 24. The ten horns are usually understood as either native rulers of Roman provinces or to governors of Palestine. Others see in them a ten-nation confederacy of the future revived Roman Empire. There are good reasons for abandoning these explanations. In the first place, the number ten should—like most of John's numbers—be understood symbolically. Ten symbolizes a repeated number of times or an indefinite number. It is perhaps another number like seven, indicating fullness (Ne 4:12; Da 1:12; Rev 2:10). Thus the number should not be understood as referring specifically to ten kings (kingdoms) but as indicating the multiplicity of sovereignties in confederacy that enhance the power of the beast.

Second, since these kings enter into a power conflict with the Lamb and his followers (v.14), the kind of sovereignty they exercise must be the true antithesis of the kind of sovereignty the Lamb and his followers exercise. These rulers as well as the beast with which they are allied can be no other than the principalities and powers, the rulers of the darkness of this world, the spiritual forces of evil in the heavenly realms that Paul describes as the true enemies of Jesus' followers (Eph 6:12). To be sure, they use earthly instruments, but their reality is far greater than any specific historical equivalents. These "kings" embody the fullness of Satan's attack against the Lamb in the great final showdown. They are the "kings from the east" (16:12–14, 16), and they are the "kings of the earth" who ally themselves with the beast in the final confrontation with the Lamb (19:19–21).

Finally, there is a link between v.12 and v.11. The ten kings are said to receive authority for "one hour" along with the beast. This corresponds to the "little while" of the seventh king. From the viewpoint of the saints, who will be greatly persecuted, this promise of brevity brings comfort. These kings have "one purpose": they agree to oppose the Lamb. But the Lamb will overcome them because he is Lord of lords and King of kings (cf. Dt 10:17; Da 2:47; Rev 19:16). He conquers by his death, and those who are with him also aid in the defeat of the beast by their loyalty to the Lamb even to death (cf. 5:5, 9; 12:11).

15 On first reading, this verse seems out of place. However, closer examination shows that v.16 also refers to the prostitute and the horns. Verse 15 teaches that the influence of the idolatrous satanic system of Babylon is universal (cf. vv.1–2) and embraces all peoples, from the humblest to the kings of the earth.

16–17 On these verses the Roman hypothesis (empire and city) breaks down, for in that view the emperors (the beast and its heads) turn against the city or empire and destroy her. What is being taught by the attack on the prostitute is that in the final judgment the kingdom of Satan will be divided against itself. The references to the prostitute being hated by her former lovers, stripped naked, and burned with fire are reminiscent of the OT prophets' descriptions of the divine judgment falling on the harlot cities of Jerusalem and Tyre (e.g., Eze 16:39–40; 23:25–27; 28:18). The description of the punishment of convicted prostitutes who are priests' daughters (cf. Lev 21:9) is combined with the picture of judgment against rebellious cities (18:8).

In the declaration "God has put it into their hearts to accomplish his purpose," there is another indication of God's use of the forces of evil as instruments of his own purposes of judgment (Jer 25:9–14; cf. Lk 20:18). Nothing will distract them from their united effort to destroy the prostitute until God's purposes given through the prophets are fulfilled (cf. 10:7; 11:18).

18 The "woman" and "the great city" are one. Yet this city is not just a historical one; it is the great city, the mother city, the archetype of every evil system opposed to God in history (see comments on 17:1–18). Her kingdom holds sway over the powers of the earth. The cities in Revelation are communities, of which there are only two: the city of God, the New Jerusalem (3:12; 21:2, 10; 22:2ff.), and the city of Satan, Babylon the Great (11:8; 14:8; 16:19; 18:4, 20; et al.). The meaning cannot be confined to any earthly cities. Instead, John describes the real trans-historical system of satanic evil that infuses them all.

4. The fall of Babylon the Great (18:1–24)

This chapter contains a full description of the previously announced "punishment" (lit., "judgment"; GK 3210) of the prostitute (17:1). It is important not to separate this chapter from the portrayal of the prostitute in ch. 17, for there is no warrant in making the prostitute different from the city in ch. 18 (cf. 17:18). Under the imagery of the destruction of the great commercial city, John describes the final overthrow of the great prostitute, Babylon. We stress again that he is not writing a literal description of the fall of an earthly city; rather, he describes God's judgment on the great satanic system of evil that has corrupted the earth's history. Drawing especially from the OT accounts of the destruction of the ancient harlot cities of Babylon (Isa 13:21; 47:7–9; Jer 50–51) and Tyre (Eze 26–27), John composes a great threnody that has some of the most beautifully cadenced language in the whole book. He combines the song of triumph and the wailing strains of lamentation into a noble funeral dirge (cf. 2Sa 1:17–27; Isa 14:4–21; Lamentations).

First, there is a kind of prelude in which the whole judgment is proclaimed (vv. 1–3). Then comes a call for the people of God to separate themselves from the city because the divine plagues are about to descend upon her in recompense for her crimes (vv.4–8). The main movement that expresses the laments for the city's fall is divided into three parts: (1) the lament of the kings of the earth (vv.9–10), then (2) the lament of the merchants who traded with her (vv. 11–17), and (3) the lament of the sea captains who became rich from the cargoes they took to the city (vv. 18–20). The finale sounds the death knell of the city because she deceived the nations and killed God's people (vv.21–24).

1–3 So magnificent is the event about to be enacted that a dazzling angel of glory bears the divine news. Perhaps we can associate this glory with the Shekinah glory that, in Ezekiel's vision, departed from the temple because of Israelite harlotry (Eze 11:23) but later returned to the restored temple (Eze 43:2).

In words similar to those of the prophets who encouraged the people of God as they faced ancient Babylon, the angel announces that Babylon the Great, Mother of all the earthly prostitute cities, has fallen (cf. Isa 21:9; 23:17; Jer 51:8 with Rev 14:8; 18:2), using words reminiscent of the judgment announced against ancient Babylon (Isa 13:19–22; 34:11; Jer 50:39). "Demons" (GK 1228) are associated elsewhere with idolatry (see comments on 9:20 and 16:14). The "haunt" (GK 5871) is a watchtower; the evil spirits, watching over fallen Babylon like night birds or harpies waiting for their prey, build their nests in the broken towers that rise from the ashes of the city. She who was a great city has become a desert.

The prostitute city will be judged because of her surfeit of fornication (v.3). The thought of 17:2 is expanded as we hear echoes of the judgments on ancient Tyre and Babylon. One of the great sins of Babylon was her luxury (cf. 18:7, 9). Because wealth may lead to pride, the prophets and John view surfeit as a manifestation of Babylon (Rev 18:7; cf. Eze 28:4–5, 16–18).

4–8 "Come out of her, my people" forms the burden of Jeremiah's refrain concerning Babylon (Jer 50:8; 51:6–9; cf. Isa 48:20; 52:11; 2Co 6:17). Even in its OT setting, this was no mere warning to leave the actual city of Babylon, much less here in Revelation. John is burdened to exhort the churches to shun the charms and ensnarements of the queen prostitute (v.7) as her qualities are manifest in the world they live in. Wherever there are idolatry, prostitution, self-glorification, self-sufficiency, pride, complacency, reliance on luxury and wealth, avoidance of suffering, violence against life (v.24), there is Babylon. Christians are to separate themselves ideologically and physically from all the forms of Babylon (chs. 2–3). If they refuse, they will "share in her sins" and in the divine judgments. This warning is addressed to professing Christians who were being seduced by Satan through the wiles of the prostitute to abandon their loyalty to Jesus. If this occurred, Christ would be forced by their decision to blot out their names from the book of life and to include them in the plagues designed for Babylon when she is judged (cf. 3:5).

God will not forget her crimes, which are multiplied to the height of heaven (v.5; cf. Ge 18:20–21; Jer 51:9). Her punishment will fit her crimes (v.6; cf. Ps 137:8; Jer 50:15, 29; Mt 7:2). This OT principle of lex talionis is never enjoined on God's people in the NT but, as here, is reserved for God alone (Mt 5:38–42; Ro 12:17–21). "Mix her a double portion from her own cup" (cf. Ex 22:4, 7, 9; Isa 40:2) reflects both the ideas of the severity of God's judgment on those who refuse to repent and the truth that God's wrath is related to the outworking of sin (cf. Ro 1:24–32).

Babylon's threefold web of sin is described as satiety ("luxury"), pride ("boasts, I sit as a queen"), and avoidance of suffering ("I will never mourn"). These three may be interrelated. Luxury leads to boastful self-sufficiency (Eze 28:5), while the desire to avoid suffering leads to the dishonest pursuit of luxury (Eze 28:18). "I sit as a queen" echoes Isaiah's description of judgment on Babylon (Isa 47:7ff.) and Ezekiel's description of Tyre (Eze 27:3). As she avoided grief through her satiety, her punishment therefore is "mourning and famine." Like ancient Babylon, this queen of prostitutes will become unloved and barren (Isa 47:9). In spite of her many charms (v.23c), she will be powerless to avert her destruction (v.8). The words "consumed by fire" (cf. 17:16) may refer to the destruction of a city (cf. vv.9, 18) or to the OT punishment for prostitution if the woman is a priest's daughter (Lev 21:9). As strong as "Babylon the Great" is, the Lord God is stronger and will judge her.

9–19 Even quick reading of Eze 27 shows that John has in mind Ezekiel's lamentation over the fall of ancient Tyre. Those who entered into fornication with the great mother prostitute wail over her destruction. John describes the end of the great symbol of evil, Babylon the Great.

First, the kings of the earth cry out their dirge (vv. 9–10). There is a connection between their adultery with Babylon and their sharing of her luxury, as if sharing her luxury was part of their adultery (cf. Eze 26:16; 27:30–35). So great is the heat and smoke of her burning that they must stand "far off" (v.10). Though ultimately the kings are all the heavenly powers that rule in the affairs of earthly kings and kingdoms (see comments on 17:10, 14; cf. 1Co 2:6, 8), here they are the princes who bewail the collapse of the last great city of humankind under Satan's rule. The lament "Woe! Woe, O great city" (cf. 8:13; 9:12; 11:14; 12:12) is repeated three times in this part of the threnody over Babylon and reflects pain at the suddenness of her downfall (cf. vv.8, 17) and the emptiness of their own existence apart from her.

The merchants wail (vv.11–17). They have most to lose because Babylon the Great was built on luxury. The lists that follow are inventories of exotic items reminiscent of the great Oriental marketplaces. In v.13 "bodies and souls of men" requires special mention: "Bodies" (GK 5393) is a Greek idiom for slaves, while "souls" (GK 6034) means essentially persons. Thus the whole expression means "slaves, that is, human beings." The refrain (v.16) also shows the blending of the prostitute image of ch. 17 ("dressed in fine linen," etc.; cf. 17:4) and the city image of ch. 18 ("O great city").

Finally, in vv.17–19 the sea captains and sailors add their lament because they too suffer irreparable loss because of the city's burning (cf. Eze 27:28). This language is more appropriate to Tyre as a great port city than to the inland city Rome (it had Ostia as its port). But again, John did not intend to describe any one city but the great harlot city, the archetype of all evil cities.

20 The threefold lament is balanced by a song of heavenly jubilation. Babylon has also persecuted the church of Jesus (saints, apostles, prophets). Regarding "apostles," John may have had in mind Herod's martyrdom of James (Ac 12:1–2) or Rome's killing of Peter and Paul (cf. v.24). The picture of Babylon cannot, however, be confined to the political activity of Rome. Therefore, John attributes the deaths of the martyrs to Babylon the Great. It is she who has killed Jesus (11:7–8) and Stephen by the hands of unbelieving Jews (Ac 7:57–60) and the martyr Antipas by the hands of pagan cultists (2:13; cf. Mt 23:34–37).

21–24 The final lament over the fall of Babylon, spoken by an angel, is poignant and beautiful. A mighty angel picks up a huge stone like a giant millstone (four to five feet in diameter, one foot thick, and weighing thousands of pounds) and flings it into the sea. One quick gesture becomes a parable of the whole judgment on Babylon the Great! Suddenly she is gone forever (cf. Jer 51:64; Eze 26:21), leaving only melancholy behind.

All nations were "led astray" (GK 4414) by her "magic spell" (GK 5758), a word previously used in conjunction with "murders," "fornicators," and "thefts" (see comment on 9:21). An element of drugging is involved that results in fatal poisoning. With her deceit, Babylon had charmed the nations (cf. Na 3:4).

In the final verse, the great sin of Babylon is cited. She has martyred the prophets and followers of Jesus. John has already mentioned this blood-guiltiness (17:6; cf. 19:2). Elsewhere the death of martyrs is attributed to "the inhabitants of the earth" (6:10), the "beast that comes up from the Abyss" (11:7, 13:7), and the "beast, coming out of the earth" (13:15). In the OT, the city of Jerusalem (Eze 24:6, 9; cf. Mt 23:37) and Babylon (Jer 51:35) are called cities of bloodshed. In v.24 "the blood ... of all who have been killed on the earth" refers to all those who have been martyred because of their loyalty to the true God. Once again, in John's mind, Babylon the Great encompasses all the persecution against the servants of God until his words are fulfilled (cf. 17:17).

5. Thanksgiving for the destruction of Babylon (19:1–5)

In stark contrast to the laments of Babylon's consorts, the heavenly choirs burst forth in a great liturgy of celebration to God.

In vv.1–5, we hear four shouts of praise for the fall of Babylon. First, there is the sound of a great multitude praising God for his condemnation of the prostitute (vv.1–2). Then they shout out in celebration of the city's eternal destruction (v.3). Following this, we hear in antiphonal response the voices of the twenty-four elders and the four living creatures (v.4). Finally, a voice from the throne calls on all the servants of God to praise him (v.5).

1–2 The English word "Hallelujah" (GK 252) transliterates a Greek word, which in turn transliterates the Hebrew hallelu yah, meaning "Praise the LORD!" This transliteration occurs only here in the NT (vv.1, 3, 4, 6), but in the LXX it is a frequent title for certain of the psalms (Pss 111: 1; 112:1; 113:1; et al.). This phenomenon clearly illustrates the connection of the early church's liturgical worship with the synagogue and temple worship of the first century. These praise psalms formed an important part of Jewish festival celebrations.

The Hallel is the name especially applied to Pss 113–118 (also called "The Hallel of Egypt" because of the references in them to the Exodus). They had a special role in the Feast of Passover. Most Jewish sources associate the Hallel with the destruction of the wicked, exactly as this passage in Revelation does. These psalms were what Jesus and the disciples sang after the Passover-Eucharist celebration, before going out to the Mount of Olives the night before his death (Mt 26:30). This close connection between the Hallel, Passover Lamb, and the death of Jesus no doubt explains why all the early church liturgies incorporated the Hallel into the Easter and Easter Week liturgies, which celebrate the gospel of redemption from sin, Satan, and death in the victorious triumph of Christ, our Passover. Two texts in the great Hallel (Pss 113:1; 115:13) are unmistakably cited in 19:5.

The theme of "salvation" (GK 5401) has already been sounded in Revelation in connection with victory or divine justice (7:10; 12:10). God has indeed vindicated the injustice visited on his servants by meting out true justice on the great prostitute, Babylon. She deserves the sentence because she corrupted the earth (cf. 11:18; Jer 51:25) and killed the saints of God (cf. 18:24).

3 The second Hallel supplements the first one. Babylon's permanent end is celebrated in words reminiscent of ancient Babylon's judgment (Isa 34:10).

4 In response to the heavenly Hallels, the twenty-four elders cry out, "Amen, Hallelujah" (cf. comments on 1:7 regarding "Amen" and on 4:4 regarding the elders).

5 This final praise is spoken by a single voice from the throne (cf. 16:17). The voice is probably neither that of God nor of Christ because of the words "our Lord God Almighty reigns" (v.6). "Praise our God, all you his servants" reflects Ps 113:1; "you who fear him, both small and great" reflects Ps 115:13 (cf. Ps 135:1, 20). All socio-economic distinctions are transcended in the united worship of the church (cf. 11:18; 13:16; 19:18; 20:12).

6. Thanksgiving for the marriage of the Lamb (19:6–10)

6–8 Finally, the cycle of praise is completed with the reverberating sounds of another great multitude. If the multitude in v.1 was angelic, then this one would most certainly be the great redeemed throngs (cf. 7:9). They utter the final Hallel in words reminiscent of the great kingship psalms (93:1; 97:1; 99:1). It is also the prelude to Pss 95–99, which are messianic, and has as its theme the eternal sovereignty of God who will conquer all his enemies. "Reigns" (GK 996) may better be rendered "has begun to reign."

There is also rejoicing because the "wedding of the Lamb has come, and his bride has made herself ready" (v.7). This is John's way of giving us a glimmer of the next great vision at the close of the former one (cf. 21:2, 9). Contrast the prostitute and her immoral lovers in the preceding chapters with the Lamb and his chaste bride ("fine linen, bright and clean").

The bride is the heavenly city, the New Jerusalem (21:2, 9), which is the symbol of the church, the bride of Christ, the community of those redeemed by Christ's blood. The wedding imagery was for the Jews a familiar image of the kingdom of God. Jesus used wedding and banquet imagery in his parables of the kingdom (Mt 22:2ff.; 25:1–13; Lk 14:15–24). The OT used this figure for the bride of Israel (Eze 16:1ff.; Hos 2:19), and NT writers applied it to the church (2Co 11:2; Eph 5:25ff.). Heaven's rejoicing has signaled the defeat of all God's enemies. The time of betrothal has ended. Now it is the time for the church to enter into her full experience of salvation and glory with her beloved spouse, Christ. The fuller revelation of the realization of this union is described in chs. 21–22.

The church's garments are white linen—in marked contrast to the purple and scarlet clothing of the great mother of prostitutes (17:4; 18:16). Linen was an expensive cloth used to make the garments worn by priests and royalty. It has two qualities: brightness and cleanness (cf. 16:6). "Bright" (GK 3287) is the color of radiant whiteness that depicts glorification (cf. Mt 13:43). "Clean" (GK 2754) reflects purity, loyalty, and faithfulness, the character of the New Jerusalem (21:18, 21).

An explanatory interjection, probably added by John, states that "fine linen stands for the righteous acts of the saints." These "righteous acts" (GK 1468) do not imply any kind of meritorious works that would bring salvation. Rather, there is a delicate balance between grace and obedient response to it. The bride is "given" the garments, but she "has made herself ready" for the wedding by faithfulness and loyalty to Christ (cf. 3:4–5, 18). In the parable of the man without a wedding garment, the garment he lacked was probably a clean one supplied by the host but either refused or soiled through his carelessness. The clean garment probably symbolizes repentance and obedient response to Christ (see comment on 12:11). Thus John contrasts the faithful disciples of Jesus, who have been true to God, with those who were seduced by the beast and the prostitute.

9–10 This beatitude is the fourth of seven (1:3; 14:13; 16:15; 20:6; 22:7, 14) in Revelation. Each one has a subtle contrast to those who are not loyal followers of the Lamb. The word "invited" (lit., "called"; GK 2813) is used in the NT of the call to salvation (e.g., Mt 9:13; Ro 8:30; 9:24; 1Co 1:9; 2Th 2:14), though it may also mean "invited," with no connotation of election (cf. Mt 22:3, 8; Lk 14:16; Jn 2:2). A wedding supper began toward evening on the wedding day, lasted for many days, and was a time of great jubilation. Here in Revelation, the wedding is the beginning of the earthly kingdom of God, the bride is the church in all her purity, and the invited guests are both the bride and the people who have committed themselves to Jesus.

To assure John and his readers of the certainty of the end of the great prostitute and the announcement of the wedding supper of the Lamb, the angel adds, "These are the true words of God" (cf. 1:2; 17:17; 21:5). A similar sentence later seems to give the same assurance for the whole book (22:6).

John, who was himself a prophet and who had received clear revelation about idolatry, now falls prey to this temptation (cf. also 22:8). Whether John included these references to his own failure because he knew of the tendency toward angel worship in the churches of Asia is not clear. Be that as it may, we need to recognize how easy it is to fall into idolatry. Whenever Christians give anyone or anything other than God control of their lives, they have broken the first commandment. The "testimony of Jesus" is Jesus' own testimony that he bore in his life and teaching and especially in his death (see comments on 1:2, 9; cf. 6:9; 12:11; 14:12; 20:4). Those who hold to or proclaim this testimony are Christian prophets. Thus "the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy." The words spoken by the Christian prophets come from the Spirit of God, who is the Spirit of the risen Jesus.

IV. Vision of the Return of Christ and the Consummation of This Age (19:11–20:15)

A. The Rider on the White Horse and the Defeat of the Beast (19:11–21)

This new vision is introduced by the words "I saw heaven standing open." Earlier John had seen a door standing open in heaven (4:1), the temple in heaven standing open (11:19), and now, in preparation for a revelation of God's sovereignty, he sees heaven itself flung wide open (cf. Eze 1:1). In one sense, this vision, which depicts the return of Christ and the overthrow of the beast, may be viewed as the climax of the previous section (vv.1–10) or as the first of a final series of seven last things: the return of Christ; the destruction of the beast; the binding of Satan; the Millennium; the destruction of Satan; the last judgment; and the new heaven, new earth, and New Jerusalem.

For the most part, all interpreters have seen in vv.11–16 a description of the Second

Coming of Christ—an event to which the NT bears a frequent and unified witness. As for the features of this event, they are variously understood by interpreters.

11 The great vision that begins here reminds us of the first vision of the book (1:12ff.), though its function is entirely different. The whole scene looks alternately to the OT and to the previous references in Revelation to Christ, especially in the seven letters (chs. 2–3). A white horse with a rider has appeared at 6:1 (see comment). Both white horses represent conquest or victory, but with that the similarity ends. The rider here is "faithful and true" (cf. 1:5; 3:7, 14), in contrast to the forces of Antichrist with their empty promises and lies. Christ will keep his word to the churches. In contrast to those who pervert justice and wage unjust war, John says of Christ, "With justice he judges and makes war [GK 4482]," an allusion to the messianic character described in Isa 11:3ff. The questions in 13:4, "Who is like the beast? Who can make war [GK 4482] against him?" anticipate the answer that Christ alone can do this, while in 17:14 the beast and the ten kings "make war" (GK 4482) against the Lamb.

Though John uses OT language descriptive of a warrior-Messiah, he does not depict Christ as a great military warrior battling against earth's sovereigns. The close proximity in v.11 of "justice" and "war" shows us that the kind of warfare Christ engages in is more the execution of "justice" (lit., "righteousness"; GK 1466) than a military conflict. He who is the faithful and true witness will judge the rebellious nations.

12 The reference to the blazing eyes connects this vision with that of 1:14 (cf. 2:18). On his head are not just seven crowns (12:3), or ten (13:1), but "many crowns" of royalty (GK 1343). Perhaps they signify that the royal power to rule the world has now passed to Christ by virtue of the victory of his followers (11:15).

So great is Christ's power that his name is known only by himself. Knowledge of a name is in antiquity associated with the power of the god. When a name becomes known, then the power is shared with those to whom the disclosure is made (cf. comment on 2:17). But since two names of Christ are revealed in this vision—"the Word of God" (v.13) and "KING OF KINGS AND LORD OF LORDS" (v.16)—it may be concluded that the exclusive power of Christ over all creation is now to be shared with his faithful followers (3:21; 5:10; 22:5). On the other hand, the secret name may be one that will not be revealed till Christ's return.

13 The imagery in this verse has traditionally been related to Isa 63:1–6, a passage understood messianically by the Jews and one that John has used in portraying God's wrath in 14:9–11, 17–19. Isaiah pictures a mighty warrior-Messiah who slaughters his enemies. Their life-blood splashes on his clothing as he tramples them down in his anger, just as the juice of grapes splashes on the wine-treader in the winepress. But is Christ's blood-dipped robe red from his enemies' blood or from his own blood? There are good reasons for accepting the latter. If the blood is his enemies', how is it that Christ comes from heaven with his robe already dipped in blood before any battle is mentioned? Moreover, the blood mentioned in connection with Christ in the Apocalypse is always his own life-blood (1:5; 5:6, 9; 7:14; 12:11). The word "dipped" (GK 970) does not fit the imagery of Isa 63:2; but it does fit that used in Revelation of believers' garments being washed thoroughly in Christ's blood (7:14; 22:14). Finally, the sword with which Christ strikes down the nations comes from his mouth and is not in his hand (v.15); this too is incompatible with battle imagery.

Applying the expression "the Word of God" to Jesus in a personal sense is peculiar to the Johannine writings (Jn 1:1, 14; cf. 1Jn 1:1). In Revelation "the Word of God" refers to the revelation of God's purpose (1:2; 17:17; 19:9). It is also the message and lifestyle for which the saints suffer oppression and even death (1:9; 6:9; 20:4). The adjectives "true and faithful," applied to Christ, are likewise identified with the Word of God (19:9; 21:5; 22:6; cf. 1:5; 3:14; 19:11). Thus Jesus in his earthly life bore reliable and consistent witness in all his words and actions to the purposes of God and was completely obedient in doing this. In him the will of God found full expression. The Word of God and the person of Christ are one.

14 This verse seems somewhat parenthetical because it does not refer directly to Christ's person or his actions. The armies of heaven mounted on white horses may be angelic hosts, since both OT and NT speak of the armies of heaven as angels (Pss 103:21; 148:2; Lk 2:13; Ac 7:42). Furthermore, the NT also associates the coming of Christ with angels (e.g., Mt 13:41; 16:27; 24:30–31). On the other hand, this may not be John's meaning. These soldiers, like their leader, are riding white horses of victory—something hardly true of angels. Their clothing of bright and clean linen is identical to the bride's attire (cf. v.8). Thus human victors probably accompany Christ, either all of them (resurrected and raptured [1Th 4:16–17]) or the company of the martyrs. In 17:14, John writes that the Lamb will overcome the beast and the ten kings "because he is Lord of lords and King of kings—and with him will be his called, chosen and faithful followers" (italics added; cf. 15:1–2).

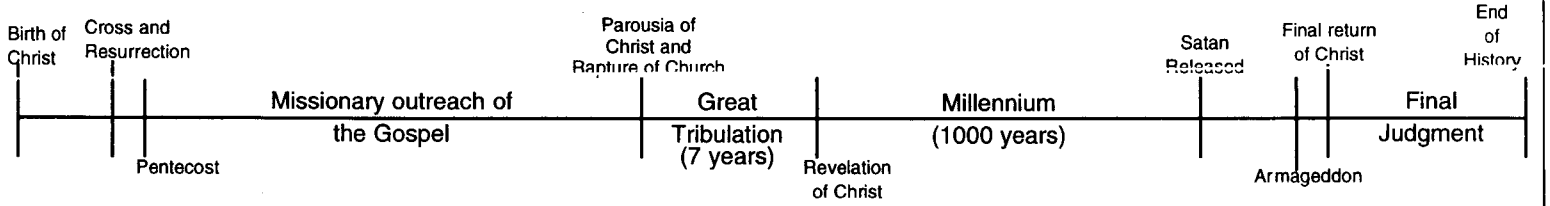
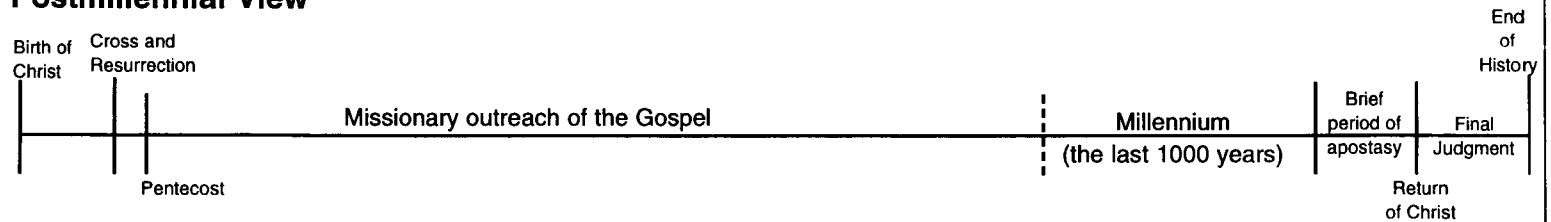
15 There are three OT allusions to the warrior-Messiah in this verse: he strikes down the nations (Isa 11:3ff.); he rules them with an iron rod (Ps 2:9; see comments on 2:27); he tramples out the winepress of God's wrath (Isa 63:1–6; see comment on v.13; also on 14:17ff.). In the first allusion, there are significant changes in imagery. Here the Lamb-Messiah does not wield a sword in his hand, but his sword comes from his mouth (cf. comments on 1:16 and 2:16). This has no OT parallel and cannot be accidental, since John emphasizes it so much (1:16; 2:12, 16; 19:15, 21). Christ conquers by the power of his word, the instrument of both his judgment and his salvation (Mt 12:37; Jn 12:48).

16 This third name of Christ, which all can read, is displayed on that most exposed part of his cloak, the part that covers the thigh, where it cannot escape notice. The name has already appeared attached to the Lamb (17:14). He is the absolute Lord and King, full of the divine power and authority.



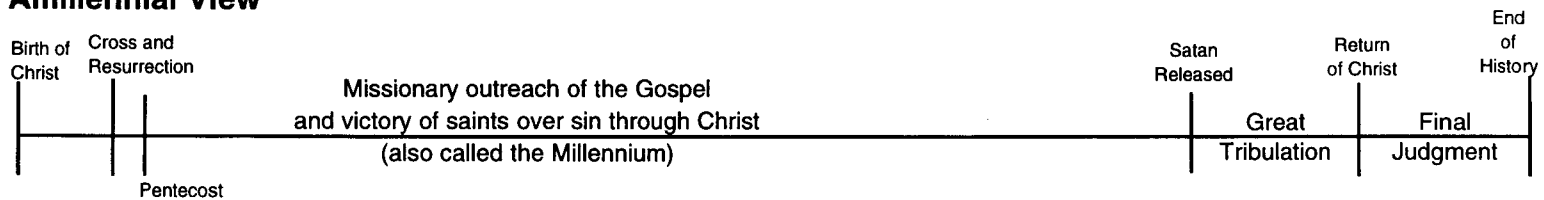
17–18 This section brings us to the anticipated confrontation between the beast and his soldiers and the Lamb (vv.17–21; cf. 16:12–16; 17:14; see comment on 19:11–21). First, there is the summons to the vultures to come to God's great supper and gorge themselves on the slain corpses of the battlefield—a horrible picture of human carnage. The language is borrowed from Eze 39:17ff., which describes the eschatological overthrow of Gog. It may be unnecessary to press the literalness of the description. This battlefield language is designed to indicate that a great victory is about to occur.

19–21 The contrast between the assembling of the beast's might with his kings and their soldiers and the ease by which he is defeated and captured highlight the beast's powerlessness before his mighty conqueror. The "kings of the earth" refer to the ten horns (kings) of the beast, which is another way of describing the beast's power (see comments on 17:12–14). Both the beast and the false prophet (13:1ff.) are seized and thrown into the lake of fire. Their followers fall before the sword (i.e., the word) of Christ. No battle is fought; only the arrangement of the foes and the defeat of the beast is described. John may be indicating that the battle has already been fought and won. In ch. 5 the Lamb had won the victory by his death (5:5, 9). Further, in the battle in heaven, Satan was cast out and defeated by the blood of the Lamb and the word of his followers' testimony (12:7–9, 11).



There thus seems to be only one actual battle described in Revelation (ch. 12), and these further scenes may be understood as more judicial in character than as literal battles. Because of John's christological reinterpretation, no great final military battle will actually be fought, for the decisive battle has already been won at the Cross. These armies and the beast, who destroy the earth (11:18) are the satanic principalities of the world and have been positionally defeated at the Cross (Jn 12:31; 16:11; Col 2:15). But they will be stripped of all power at Christ's return—though John did not deny that Satan and his evil powers promulgate great evil and deception in the world in the present age (cf. Eph 2:2; 1Th 3:5; 1Pe 5:8–9; Rev 2:10), allying themselves with their human puppets to harass Christians. Yet he is a deposed ruler who is now under the sovereign authority of Christ but who for a "little time" is allowed to continue his evil until God's purposes are finished. In the defeat of the beast, his kings, and their armies, John shows us the ultimate and swift downfall of these evil powers by the King of kings and Lord of lords. They have met their Master in this final confrontation. On the "lake of fire," see comment on 20:14.

Schemes of Millennialism from the Coming of Christ to the End of History



Premillennial View

Postmillennial View

Amillennial View

B. Binding of Satan and the Millennium (20:1–6)

This passage on the Millennium is a constant source of insurmountable difficulty for the exegete. The Millennium itself is one of the most controversial questions of eschatology (the doctrine of the last things). While the OT and later Jewish literature point forward to a time when the kingdom of God will be manifest in the world, nowhere is the time of the reign of the Messiah stated to be a thousand years.

My exegesis of the passage leads me to a premillennial interpretation. It should be recognized, however, that there are problems with this view of 20:1–6, just as there are problems with other views of this difficult portion of the book; responsible Christian scholars vary in its interpretation according to their convictions and presuppositions.

For the moment the question of the duration of the reign of Christ (which is equal to the duration of the binding of Satan) may be delayed. The main problem concerns whether the reference to a Millennium indicates an earthly historical reign of peace that will manifest itself at the close of this present age or the whole passage symbolizes some present experience of Christians or some future nonhistorical reality.

The ancient church down to the time of Augustine (354–430) (though not without minor exceptions) unquestionably held to the teaching of an earthly, historical reign of peace that was to follow the defeat of Antichrist and the physical resurrection of the saints but precede both the judgment and the new creation. To be sure, there were various positions as to the material nature of the Millennium (see comments on v.4), but the true conception of the thousand years was a balance between the worldly aspects of the kingdom and its spiritual aspects as a reign with Christ.

The break with this earlier position came with the views of the late fourth-century interpreter Tyconius, who developed a view of the Millennium based on the recapitulation method of interpretation of Origen. He viewed Revelation as containing a number of different visions that repeated basic themes throughout the book. Though his original work is not available, his exegesis of the Apocalypse can be largely reconstructed through Augustine, as well as Tyconius's many Roman Catholic followers. In ch. 20, he interpreted the thousand years in nonliteral terms and understood it as the church age, the time between the first and second advents of Christ. Tyconius interpreted the first resurrection as the resurrection of the soul from spiritual death to the new life, while the second resurrection was the resurrection of the body at the end of history. The binding of Satan had already taken place in that the devil cannot seduce the church during the present age. Moreover, the reign of the saints and their "thrones of judgment" had already begun in the church and its rulers. Augustine adopted this same view against the expectation of a literal millennial kingdom for a thousand years. This interpretation is the first main option in modern nonmillennial (or amillennial) interpretations of Rev 20.

Augustine's approach, however, was not to remain unchallenged. Joachim of Floris (c. 1135–1202) saw in Revelation a prophecy of the events of Western history from the time of Christ till the end. He thought the Millennium was still future in his time but soon to begin. The Franciscans, who followed Joachim, identified Babylon with ecclesiastical Rome and the Antichrist with the papacy. The Reformers followed suit.

During Reformation times, still another type of interpretation developed, expounded by a Jesuit scholar named Ribera (1537–91). He held that almost all the events described in Revelation are future and apply to the end times rather than to the history of the world or contemporary Rome and the papacy. He still, however, held to Augustine's view of the Millennium as the period between the first and second advents of Christ. But at one important point he changed Augustine's view. Instead of the Millennium taking place on earth between the advents, Ribera saw it as taking place in heaven. It is a reward for faithfulness. When the saints at any time in history are martyred, they do not perish but live and reign with Christ in heaven in the intermediate state before the final resurrection. This is the second main option today for amillennialists. John's basic message in ch. 20, according to this viewpoint, is pastoral. If Christians face the prospect of suffering death for Jesus, they should be encouraged because if they are killed, they will go to reign with him in heaven.

The Augustinian view of Rev 20 and its variant espoused by Joachim cannot be harmonized with a serious exegesis of this chapter on two important counts. (1) It founders on the statements concerning the binding of Satan (vv.1–3); (2) it must handle in an absurd fashion the statements about the coming to life of the martyrs, which cannot be exegetically understood as anything other than physical resurrection without seriously tampering with the sense of the words (cf. discussion on vv.1–4). While it is popular among certain amillennialists to view vv.1–6 as a symbolic description of the reward to be granted the martyrs on their entrance into heaven, this variation of the Augustinian exegesis, while removing the criticism that the passage refers to the present rule of Christ in the church age, fails to deal seriously with the binding of Satan and other details of the text.

There is yet another view that, though not free of problems, does more justice to the book of Revelation as a whole and to the exegesis of ch. 20 in particular. This view rejects both the Augustinian interpretation that the Millennium is the rule of Christ during this dispensation and the variant of Joachim that locates the resurrection and the reign of the martyrs in heaven for an interim period before their bodily resurrection and the return of Christ. It likewise rejects the variation of Augustine's view known as postmillennialism, which teaches that the forces of Antichrist will gradually be put down and the gospel will permeate and transform the world into an interim of the reign of peace before the return of Christ.

Any view of the Millennium must account for how the reality of the divine kingdom of God has actually invaded history in Jesus Christ. The view espoused in this commentary argues that the Millennium is in history and on the earth as an eschatological reality. Much in the same manner as the kingdom of God was present in the life and ministry of Jesus—present, yet still future—so the Millennium is at once the final historical event of this age and the beginning of the eschatological kingdom of Christ in eternity. Christ's lordship is the larger concept, which begins now and extends into eternity. The thousand-year reign, on the other hand, belongs temporally as the final act of Christ's lordship, the act that begins with his return.

This view is called the "end-historical" view. It follows the same chronological sequence as the early church's position, i.e., Parousia—defeat of Antichrist—binding of Satan—resurrection—Millennium—the release of Satan—final judgment—new heavens and earth. It differs slightly from earlier millennialism in viewing the Millennium as an end-historical event that at the same time is the beginning of the eternal reign of Christ and the saints.

The problem as to the limits of the description of the Millennium in chs. 20–22 is a more difficult question. Some expositors believe that 21:9–22:5, 14–15 belong with 20:1–10 as a further description of the millennial reign, whereas 21:1–5 refers to the eternal state, which follows the final judgment of the dead. This approach attempts to harmonize a literal understanding of certain statements in 21:9ff. with the assumed conditions during the eternal state. References to "nations" and "kings" seem to describe an earthly kingdom better than the eternal condition (21:24, 26); references to leaves "healing" the nations (22:2) seem more likely to describe an imperfect condition than the perfected eternal state; and the blessing pronounced on those who come and eat the tree of life and a curse resting on those outside the city (22:14–15) suggest the thousand years rather than the eternal state when the wicked are in the lake of fire.

Admittedly, this solution has the advantage of giving more descriptive content to the millennial reign, but it suffers from two serious criticisms. (1) Though it rightly assigns 21:1–5 to the postmillennial New Jerusalem in the context of the new heaven and earth, it arbitrarily assigns 21:9ff. to the millennial New Jerusalem without the slightest hint from the text. Thus, there is an eternal state New Jerusalem followed immediately by a millennial New Jerusalem, both bearing the same title. This is hardly plausible. (2) This view strongly argues for historical progression in 19:11–20:15: Parousia—defeat of Antichrist—binding of Satan—the first resurrection—Millennium—the release of Satan—last judgment—new heavens and earth—and then argues for recapitulation in 21:9ff.

It seems best, therefore, to regard the sequence begun at 19:11 as running chronologically through 22:6, thus placing all the material in 21:1ff. after the Millennium. At this point, a suggestion is offered. If the Millennium is a true eschatological, historical event like the person, ministry, and resurrection of Jesus, may not 21:1ff. be viewed as the full manifestation of the kingdom of God, a partial manifestation of which will be realized in the thousand-year reign of Christ and the saints, during which time Christ will defeat all his enemies, including death (1Co 15:23–28)? Some of the same conditions described in 21:1ff. would then, at least in part, characterize the Millennium.

Finally, why the Millennium? There are at least four answers to this question: (1) During the Millennium, Christ will openly manifest his kingdom in world history; it will provide an actual demonstration of the truthfulness of the divine witness borne by Christ and his followers during his life on earth. It will be a time of the fulfillment of all God's covenant promises to his people.

(2) The Millennium will reveal that humanity's rebellion against God lies deep in one's own heart, not in the devil's deception. Even when Satan is bound and righteousness prevails in the world, some people will still rebel against God. The final release of Satan will openly draw out this hidden evil.

(3) The release of Satan after the Millennium shows the invulnerability of the city of God and the extent of the authority of Christ, since the devil is immediately defeated and cast into the lake of fire forever.

(4) The Millennium will serve as a long period required to do the "house-cleaning" needed after the preceding ages of sin.

1–3 These verses are integrally related to 19:20–21. After the destruction of the beast and his followers and of the false prophet, Satan (the dragon, the ancient serpent) is dealt with. He is thrown into the Abyss to be imprisoned there for a thousand years (the third last thing; see comment on 19:11–21). The Abyss is the demonic abode (see comment on 9:1; cf. 11:7). The angel's mission is to restrain Satan from deceiving the nations—hence the key, the chain, and the violent casting into the Abyss. That this whole action is not a recapitulation of earlier descriptions of Satan is evident from a number of points. In 12:9, Satan is "hurled" out of heaven "to the earth," where he goes forth with great fury to work his deception and persecute God's people (13:14; 18:23c). But in 20:1–3, the situation is different. Here Satan is cast out of the earth into a place where he is kept from "deceiving the nations." The former period of Satan's restriction to earth is described as a "short time" (12:9, 12), while the time here (20:1–3) of his binding is a thousand years. In the earlier references to Satan, he is active on the earth (2:10, 13; 12:17; 16:13, cf. 1Pe 5:8); here he is tightly sealed in "prison" (v.7; GK 5871). The binding of Satan removes his deceptive activity among "the nations," a term never used to describe the redeemed community (until ch. 21, after Satan's permanent end).

From at least the time of Victorinus (d. c. 303), some have interpreted the binding of Satan as the work of Christ in the lives of believers. Thus Satan is "bound" for believers since he no longer deceives them, but he is still "loose" for unbelievers who are deceived. This explanation, however, does not take seriously the language of the Abyss and the prison in which Satan is confined, nor does it account for the releasing of Satan after the thousand years. The binding of spirits or angels is mentioned in Isa 24:21–23; Jude 6, as well as in Jewish literature. In all these references there is no question of the spirits being bound in some respects and not in others; it signifies a complete removal as to a prison, usually in the depths of the underworld.

In only one NT reference is there a question as to the limited binding of Satan. In Mk 3:27 Jesus refers in his parable to the strong man first being bound before his goods can be plundered. The reference is to Satan's being bound by Christ and specifically relates either to the temptation of Jesus or to Jesus' exorcisms. In any case, the binding of Satan by the ministry of Jesus did not totally immobilize the devil but struck him a vital blow. But does the reference in Mark provide a true analogy for the binding of Satan in 20:1–3, as Augustine claimed? A careful examination of this verse and Rev 20:1–3 leads to the conclusion that the two passages are not teaching the same truth. There is a sense in which, according to the Gospel account, Satan is in the process of being bound by the activity of Christ and the kingdom of God; but this is clearly an event different from the total consigning of Satan to the Abyss.

Finally, it may be noted that the thousand-year binding of Satan is concurrent with and inseparable from the thousand-year reign of the resurrected martyrs. For a thousand years on this earth, within history, the activity of Satan leading humankind into false worship and active rebellion against God and his people will be totally curbed under the authority of Christ in his kingdom. If that reign is yet future, the binding is future. If the binding refers to an earthly situation—which it clearly does—the thousand-year reign most naturally refers to an earthly situation.

4–6 The fourth last thing (see comment on 19:11–21) is the thousand-year reign of Christ on the earth. John gives us no picture of life in the Millennium in these verses; they contain only a statement about who will participate in it. He sees thrones, and judges sitting on them. The scene is usually connected with Daniel's vision of the Son of Man (Da 7:9, 22, 27). There, justice was done for the saints by the Ancient of Days, and they began their kingdom reign. If that thought is found here, those who sit on the thrones are the angelic court. On the other hand, those on the thrones may be the resurrected martyrs who exercise judgment and rule during the Millennium. This possible reinterpretation of Daniel seems preferable in the light of other NT teaching as well as of Revelation itself (cf. Lk 22:30; 1Co 6:2; Rev 2:26). They who were once judged by earth's courts to be worthy of death are now the judges of the earth under Christ.

A more difficult question concerns the identity of those who will rule with Christ. They are the "beheaded" (with an axe) martyrs who have previously occupied John's attention (cf. 6:9). The cause of their death is attributed to their faithful witness to Jesus and the word of God (see comment on 1:9; cf. 6:9; 12:11). The reference to "souls" (GK 6034) recalls 6:9, where this word is used of the slain witnesses under the altar. It describes those who have lost their bodily life but are nevertheless still alive in God's sight. This term prepares us for their coming to (bodily) life again at the first resurrection. It is a mistake to take this word to imply a later spiritual resurrection or rebirth of the soul.

These martyrs are also those who did not worship the beast or his image or receive his mark on them (cf. 13:1ff.; 15:2); in a word, they are the followers of the Lamb. At this point, NIV omits a very important term. Between the description of those beheaded and the description concerning the beast worship in v.4 are two Greek words meaning "and who." This construction is capable of bearing two different meanings. It could simply introduce a further qualifying phrase to the identification of the martyrs (so NIV). But it may also be understood to introduce a second group. There are (1) those who were beheaded for their witness and (2) "also those who" did not worship the beast (see NASB). This immediately alleviates a thorny problem, i.e., why only the martyrs should live and reign with Christ. Usually in Revelation the specific relative pronoun "who" used here refers to the preceding group and adds some further detail (2:24; 9:4; 17:12); but in one other reference, the phrase so introduced singles out a special class or group from the more general group in the preceding statement (1:7). Thus the "and who" clause introduces a special class of the beheaded, i.e., those who were beheaded because they did not worship the beast, etc. In any case, it seems that John has only the beheaded in mind (cf. 14:13).

But this presents a problem because John has elsewhere indicated that the kingdom reign will be shared by every believer who overcomes (2:26–28; 3:12, 21) and is purchased by Christ's blood (5:10). Also, in 1Co 6:2–3, Paul clearly speaks of all believers—not just martyrs—exercising judgment in the future. Unless only those beheaded by the beast will reign in the Millennium, another explanation is demanded. There are two possible approaches. (1) The pastoral approach explains John's reference to only the martyrs as a piece of special encouragement to them, while not implying that others would be left out. (2) The other view, with which I am more comfortable (see comment on 6:9), sees the martyrs as representing the whole church that is faithful to Jesus, whether or not they have actually been killed. They constitute a group that can in truth be described as those who "did not love their lives so much as to shrink from death" (12:11). As such, the term "martyrs" is a synonym for overcomers (chs. 2-3). Thus John could count himself in this group, though he may never have suffered death by the axe of the beast. In 2:11 those who during persecution are faithful to Christ even to the point of death are promised escape from the second death, which in 20:6 is promised to those who share in the first resurrection, i.e., the beheaded (v.4). In fact, several other promises to overcomers in the letters to the seven churches find their fulfillment in ch. 20 (cf. 2:11 with 20:6; 2:26–27 with 20:4; 3:5 with 20:12, 15; 3:21 with 20:4).

The martyrs "came to life" (GK 2409). The interpretation of these words is crucial to the whole passage. Since Augustine, the majority of interpreters have taken the words to refer to new birth (a spiritual resurrection) or to the triumph of the church. This construes the historical event of physical resurrection in a symbolic way. Others, rightly, chastened by a more serious exegesis of the text, hold that the language teaches bodily resurrection but that the whole section (20:1–10) is not to be taken as predicting events within history but is apocalyptic language, figurative of the consolation and reward promised the martyrs. The verb "came to life" is used in v.4 of the martyrs and also in v.5 of the "rest of the dead." When the context is that of bodily death, this NT verb connotes physical resurrection (Jn 11:25; Ac 1:3; 9:41), even though the normal word is "raise up" (GK 1586). More importantly, Revelation clearly uses "live" for the resurrection of Christ (1:18; 2:8) and also curiously for the sea beast (13:14). John plainly says in 20:5 that this is the first "resurrection" (GK 414). The word "resurrection," which occurs over forty times in the NT, is used almost exclusively of physical resurrection (Lk 2:34 is the only exception). There is no indication that John has departed from this usage.

Why does John call this the "first" (GK 4755) resurrection? This word clearly implies the first in a series of two or more. John does not directly refer to a second resurrection, though a second resurrection is inferred both from the use of "first" and from the expression "the rest of the dead did not come to life until the thousand years were ended" (v.5). Some early interpreters connect John's first resurrection with the "resurrection of the just" (Lk 14:14). From at least the time of Augustine, the first resurrection was understood as a regeneration of the soul and the second resurrection as the general physical, bodily resurrection of just and unjust. It must, however, be insisted that it is quite weak exegesis to make the first resurrection spiritual and the second one physical, unless the text itself clearly indicates this change, which it does not.

Another response would be to understand "the rest of the dead" who lived not until the close of the thousand years to be all the faithful except the martyrs, plus the entire body of unbelievers. This view, in our opinion, runs aground on the fact that John clearly seems to tie exclusion from the second death with those who are part of the first resurrection, thus strongly implying that those who participate in the second resurrection are destined for the second death. Therefore, we may understand the first resurrection as being the raising to physical life of all the dead in Christ (cf. Jn 5:29; 1Co 15:12ff.; 1Th 4:13ff.). For those who participate in this resurrection, "the second death [the lake of fire (20:14)] has no power over them" (v.6). Therefore, they are "blessed and holy" (the fifth beatitude; see comment on 1:3) and shall be priests of God and Christ for the thousand years. On the other hand, those over whom the second death will have power must be "the rest of the dead" (v.5), who will be participants in the second resurrection, who will "rise to be condemned" (Jn 5:29; cf. Ac 24:15).

The only NT place other than 2:11 and 20:6 that mentions the second death refers to exclusion from physical resurrection (v.14). Likewise, the Palestinian Targum on Dt 33:6 reads: "Let Reuben live in this world and not die in the second death in which death the wicked die in the world to come." Here the second death means exclusion from the resurrection. Not to die the second death, then, means to rise again to eternal life.

What now may be said as to the length of the kingdom reign? Nowhere in other literature is the kingdom reign of the Messiah specified as a thousand years. Thus parallels to John's use of a thousand years must be sought elsewhere. It seems that the earliest traditions in Asia relate the thousand years to Adam's paradisiacal time span. The Book of Jubilees, for example, attempts to justify the correctness of Ge 2:17, that Adam died "on the day" that he ate of the forbidden fruit. According to Ge 5:5, his sin caused him to die at 930 years of age, "seventy years before attaining a thousand years, for one thousand years are as one day [Ps 90:4] in heaven." Thus Adam died before completing one day

(a thousand years). Some believe that this is the origin of John's use of the thousand years.

Later, the thousand years began to be associated with the Jewish cosmic-week framework in which the history of the world is viewed as lasting a week of millennia, or seven thousand years. The last day millennium is the Sabbath-rest millennium, followed by the eighth day of the age to come. This idea was then linked interpretatively but inappropriately to 2Pe 3:8.

Is the thousand years symbolic of a perfect human life-span or some ideal kingdom environment on the earth? In the first place, the number symbolisms of John in Revelation should not be used to argue against an earthly kingdom. It might be said that the number is symbolic of a perfect period of time of whatever length. The essence of premillennialism is in its insistence that the reign will be on earth, not in heaven, for a period of time before the final judgment and the new heavens and earth. For example, we may rightly understand the 1,260 days (42 months) of earlier chapters as a symbolic number, but it still refers to an actual historical period of whatever length during which the beast will destroy the saints. In any case, it is not of primary importance whether the years are 365-day years or symbolic of a shorter or longer period of bliss enjoyed by believers as they reign with Christ on earth (cf. 5:10 with 11:15; 22:5).

C. The Release and End of Satan (20:7–10)

7–10 The fifth last thing (see comment on 19:11–21) is the defeat of Satan. In v.3 the release of Satan after the Millennium was anticipated: "He must [GK 1256] be set free for a short time." Why "must" he once again be released? The answer is so that he can "deceive the nations" throughout the world and lead them into conflict against "God's people." But why should God allow this? Certainly if a human being alone were prophetically writing the history of the world, he or she would not bring the archdeceiver back after the glorious reign of Christ in vv.1–6. But God's thoughts and ways are not ours (Isa 55:8). Ezekiel's vision of Gog brought out of the land of Magog seems to be clearly in John's mind (Eze 38–39). Gog refers to the prince of a host of pagan invaders from the North, especially the Scythian hordes from the distant land of Magog. Here in Rev 20, however, the names are symbolic of the final enemies of Christ duped by Satan into attacking the community of the saints. The change in meaning has occurred historically through the frequent use in rabbinic circles of the expression "Gog and Magog" to refer to the rebellious nations spoken of in Ps 2.

If the beast and his armies are already destroyed (19:19ff.), who are these rebellious nations? It may be that the beast and his armies in the earlier context refer to the demonic powers and those in 20:7ff. to human nations in rebellion—not an unlikely solution (see comments on 19:19ff.)—or it may be that not all the people in the world will participate in the beast's armies and thus those mentioned here in v.8 refer to other people who during the millennial reign defected in their hearts from the Messiah. In any case, this section shows something of the deep, complex nature of evil. The fundamental source of rebellion against God does not lie in our environment or with the devil but springs up from deep within a person's own heart. The return of Satan will demonstrate this in the most dramatic manner once for all. The temporal reign of Christ will not be fulfilled till this final challenge to his kingdom occurs and he demonstrates the power of his victory at the Cross and puts down all his enemies (1Co 15:25).

The gathered army, which is extensive and world-wide, advances and in siege fashion encircles the "camp of God's people, the city he loves." Most commentators take the expressions "camp" and "city" as different metaphors for God's people. "Camp" (GK 4213) in the NT refers to either a military camp or the camp of Israel (Ac 21:34, 37; 22:24; Heb 11:34; 13:11, 13). It reminds us of the pilgrim character of the people of God even at the end of the Millennium, as long as evil is active in God's creation. The "city he loves" presents more difficulty. Following standard Jewish eschatology, many understand this as a reference to the physically restored and spiritually renewed city of Jerusalem. On the other hand, John may have intended to refer merely to the community of the redeemed without any specific geographical location in mind. This would be in harmony with his previous references to the city elsewhere in the book (cf. comments on 3:12; 11:2, 8). There are only two cities or kingdoms in the Apocalypse: the city of Satan, where the beast and harlot are central, and the city of God, where God and the Lamb are central. This city, then, is the kingdom of God in its millennial manifestation; it is the same city that appears in its final, most glorious form in the last chapters (21–22). Wherever God dwells among his people, there the city of God is (21:2–3).

The swiftness and finality of the divine judgment (v.9) emphasize the reality of the victory of Christ at the Cross. The fire imagery may reflect Ezekiel's vision of the destruction of Gog (Eze 38:22; 39:6). It is God, not the saints, who destroys the enemy (cf. comment on 19:19). The devil is now dealt the long-awaited final and fatal blow (Ge 3:15; Jn 12:31). The "lake of fire" imagery is probably related to the teaching of Jesus about hell (see Mt 5:22; 7:19; 10:28; 13:49–50; see comment on Mk 9:48). This figure intensifies the idea of the permanency of judgment (cf. comment on 14:11; also 19:20; 20:11–15; 21:8). That the beast and false prophet are already there does not argue for their individuality, since later "death" and "Hades," nonpersonal entities, are personified and cast into the same lake of fire (v.14).

D. Great White Throne Judgment (20:11–15)

11–15 John describes in vivid pictures the sixth last thing (see comment on 19:11–21), the final judgment of humankind. Unlike many of the vivid, imaginative paintings based on this vision, here John describes a strange, unearthly scene. Heaven and earth flee from the unidentified figure who sits on the majestic white throne. The language of poetic imagery captures the fading character of everything of the world (1Jn 2:17). Now the only reality is God seated on the throne of judgment, before whom all must appear (Heb 9:27). His verdict alone is holy and righteous (the symbolism of "white"). Since vv.11–12 make use of the theophany of Da 7:9–10, the one seated on the throne is presumably God himself; but since 22:1, 3 mention the throne of God and of the Lamb, it may well be that here Jesus shares in the judgment (Jn 5:27). God has kept the last judgment in his own hands. This vision declares that even though it may have seemed that earth's course of history ran contrary to his holy will, no single day or hour in the world's drama has ever detracted from the absolute sovereignty of God.

But who are "the dead" (vv.12–13)? Earlier in the chapter, John has mentioned the "rest of the dead" who are not resurrected till the thousand years are completed (v.5). While no resurrection is mentioned in vv.11–15, the dead are probably those who did not participate in the first resurrection. Since the second death has no power over those who were raised in the first resurrection (v.6), only the enemies of God now stand before this throne (Jn 5:24).

A moment of tension arrives. The books are opened. It is sobering to ponder that in God's sight nothing is forgotten; all will give an account of their actions (v.13). Divine judgment always proceeds on the basis of human deeds (Mt 25:41ff.; Ro 2:6; 2Co 5:10; Heb 4:12–13), recorded in the "books" (v.12). John is probably alluding to Da 7:10. We are not told whether these books contain both good and evil works or only the latter. John is more concerned about another book, the book of life, which alone seems to be decisive (vv.12, 15; cf. 3:5; 13:8; 17:8; 21:27). How can judgment by works and eternal life given by grace be harmonized? There is no conflict. Works are the unmistakable evidence of the loyalty of the heart; they express either belief or unbelief, faithfulness or unfaithfulness. The judgment will reveal whether or not one's loyalties were with God and the Lamb or with God's enemies. John's theology of faith and its inseparable relation to works is the same as Jesus' and Paul's (Jn 5:29; Ro 2:6ff.). This judgment is not a balancing of good works over bad works. Those who have their names in the Lamb's book of life will also have records of righteous deeds. The opposite will also be true. The imagery reflects the delicate balance between grace and obedience (cf. comments on 19:6–8).

Three broad places are mentioned as containing the dead: the sea, death, and Hades (v.13). The sea represents the place of unburied bodies while death and Hades represent the reality of dying and the condition entered on at death (cf. 1:18; 6:8).

The imagery suggests release of the bodies and persons from their places of confinement following death; i.e., it portrays resurrection. They rise to receive sentence (Jn 5:29b). Death and Hades are personified (cf. 6:8) and are cast into the lake of fire, to be permanently destroyed (cf. 19:20; 20:10). This not only fulfills Paul's cry concerning the last enemy, death, which will be defeated by the victorious kingdom of Christ (1Co 15:26), but also signals the earth's new condition in 21:4.

In the final scene in this dark and fearful passage (v.15), it is clear from the specific Greek form of "if" that John uses that some people will be thrown into the lake of fire. We might paraphrase the verse: "If anyone's name was not found written in the book of life, and I assume there were such, he was thrown into the lake of fire." When taken seriously, this final note evaporates all theories of universalism.

V. Vision of the New Heaven and the New Earth and the New Jerusalem (21:1–22:5)

The seventh last thing (see comment on 19:11–21) is the vision of the new heavens, the new earth, and the New Jerusalem. Countless productions of art and music have through the ages been inspired by this vision. Cathedral architecture has been influenced by its imagery. John discloses a theology in stone and gold as pure as glass and color. Archetypal images abound. The church is called the bride (21:2). Completeness is implied in the number twelve and its multiples (21:12–14, 16–17, 21) and fullness in the cubical dimension of the city (21:16). Colorful jewels abound, as do references to light and the glory of God (21:11, 18–21, 23, 25; 22:5). There is the "river of the water of life" (22:1) and the "tree of life" (22:2). The "sea" is gone (21:1).

Most of John's imagery in this chapter reflects the New Jerusalem vision of Isa 60 and 66 and the new temple vision of Eze 40–48. The multiple OT promises converging in his mind suggest that he viewed the New Jerusalem as the fulfillment of all these strands of prophecy. There are also allusions to Ge 1—the absence of death and suffering, the dwelling of God with people as in Eden, the tree of life, the removal of the curse, etc. Creation is restored to its pristine character.

The connection of this vision with the promises to the overcomers in the letters to the seven churches (chs. 2–3) is significant. For example, to the overcomers at Ephesus was granted the right to the tree of life (2:7; cf. 22:2); to Thyatira, the right to rule the nations (2:26; cf. 22:5); to Philadelphia, the name of the city of my God, the New Jerusalem (3:12; cf. 21:2, 9ff.). In a sense, a strand from every major section of this book appears in chs. 21–22. Unique in John's theology is the Lamb's centrality in the city and the absence of a temple in the New Jerusalem.

In other NT passages, the kingdom reality of the age to come has already appeared in history in the life of Jesus and also in the presence of the Holy Spirit in the church. But the reality is now present only in a promissory way, not in actual fulfillment. Therefore, while the Jerusalem that is from above has present implications for believers (Gal 4:25–31), they are nevertheless, like Abraham, "looking forward to the city with foundations" (Heb 11:10; 13:14). In this sense, the medieval synthesis that made the church on earth and the kingdom synonymous and built its cathedrals to depict that notion was misdirected. John's vision in chs. 21–22 is one of eschatological promise, future in its realization, totally dependent on God's power to create it, yet having present implications for the life of the church in this age.

A. The New Jerusalem Introduced (21:1–8)

1 The new heavens and earth were foreseen by Isaiah (Isa 65:17) as a part of his vision of the renewed Jerusalem. John's picture of the final age to come focuses not on a platonic ideal heaven or distant paradise but on the reality of a new earth and heaven. God originally created the earth and heaven to be our permanent home. But sin and death entered the world and transformed the earth into a place of rebellion and alienation; it became enemy-occupied territory. But God has been working in salvation history to effect a total reversal of this evil consequence and to liberate earth and heaven from bondage to sin, corruption, and death (cf. v.4; Ro 8:21). John's emphasis on heaven and earth is not primarily cosmological but moral and spiritual (cf. also 2Pe 3:13).

The Greek word for "new" (GK 2785) means new in quality rather than new in time. That it is a "new" heaven and earth and not a second heaven and earth suggests something of an endless succession of new heavens and earth. It is the newness of the endless eschatological ages (2:17; 3: 12; 5:9; cf. Eph 2:7).

What makes the new heaven and earth "new" is above all the reality that now "the dwelling of God is with men. . . . They will be his people, and God himself will be with them and be their God" (v.3). The heaven and earth are new because of the presence of a new community of people who are loyal to God and the Lamb in contrast to the former community of idolaters.

The sea—the source of the satanic beast (13:1) and the place of the dead (20:13)—will be gone. Again, John's emphasis is not geographic but moral and spiritual. The sea serves as an archetype with connotations of evil (cf. comment on 13:1). Thus, no trace of evil in any form will be present in the new creation.

2–4 The Holy City, the New Jerusalem, occupies John's vision for the remainder of the book. First, he sees the city "coming down out of heaven from God"—a phrase used three times (3:12; 21:2, 10) in an apparent spatial reference. But the city never seems to come down; it is always in the process of descending from heaven. Therefore, the expression stresses the idea that the city is a gift of God, forever bearing the marks of his creation.

Second, John calls the city a "bride" (GK 3813; cf. 21:9, 22:17; cf. also 19:7–8, where a different word was used). The purity and devotedness of the bride are reflected in her attire. The multiple imagery is needed to portray the tremendous reality of the city. A bride-city captures something of God's personal relationship to his people (the bride) as well as something of their life in communion with him and one another (a city, with its social connotations).

The subtitle of the Holy City, "the new Jerusalem," raises a question. The "old" Jerusalem was also called the "holy city" and a "bride" (Isa 52:1; 61:10). Since the Jerusalem from above is the "new" Jerusalem, we may suppose that it is connected in some manner with the old one so that the new is the old one renewed. The old Jerusalem was marred by sin and disobedience. In it was the blood of prophets and apostles. Still worse, it became a manifestation of Babylon the Great when it crucified the Lord of glory (11:8). But the old city always involved more than the mere inhabitants and their daily lives. It represented the covenant community of God's people, the hope for the kingdom of God on earth. Thus the OT looked forward to a renewed Jerusalem, rebuilt and transformed into a glorious habitation of God and his people. But the prophets also saw something else. They saw a new heaven and new earth and a Jerusalem connected with this reality. Thus it is not altogether clear precisely what the relationship is between the old and the new, the earthly, restored Jerusalem of the prophets and the Jerusalem associated with the new heaven and earth (cf. Gal 4:25-31; Heb 11:10; 12:22; 13:14).

The key to the puzzle must be understood with due respect for the old city. Any exegesis, therefore, that completely rejects any connection with the old city cannot take seriously the name "new" Jerusalem, which presupposes the old. To speak of the heavenly Jerusalem does not deny an earthly city, as some suggest, but stresses its superiority and affirms the eschatological nature of Jewish hope—a hope that could not be fulfilled by the earthly Jerusalem but which John sees realized in the Holy City of the future. This city is the church in its future glorified existence. It is the final realization of the kingdom of God.

God's "dwelling" (GK 5008) among his people (v.3) is a fulfillment of Lev 26:11–13, a promise given to the old Jerusalem but forfeited because of apostasy. As a backdrop for the scene, consider Ge 3, when humanity lost their fellowship with God (cf. Ex 25:8; Eze 37:26–27). Thus the holy Jerusalem is not only humanity's eternal home but the city where God will place his own name forever. God's presence will blot out the things of the former creation. In a touching metaphor of motherly love, John says that God "will wipe away every tear from their eyes" (cf. 7:17; Isa 25:8). These tears have come from sin's distortion of God's purposes for the human race. God now has defeated the enemy of humankind and liberated his people and his creation.

5 For the second time in the book, God himself speaks (cf. 1:8). From his throne comes the assurance that the One who created the first heaven and earth will indeed make "everything new." This confirms that God's power will be revealed and his redemptive purposes fulfilled. Since these words are God's words (cf. 19:9; 22:6), it is important that this vision of the new heaven and the New Jerusalem be proclaimed to the churches.

6–8 Using the same word that declared the judgment of the world finished, God proclaims that he has completed his new creation: "It is done" (cf. 16:17). The names of God, "the Alpha and the Omega, the Beginning and the End," emphasize his absolute control over the world as well as his creatorship of everything (cf. comment on 1:8; see 22:13).

To those who thirst for him, God offers the "water of life" without cost (cf. 7:17; 22:1, 17; Jn 7:37–39; Ro 3:24). Here salvation is beautifully depicted by the image of drinking at the spring of life. Twice in chs. 21–22, God invites those who sense their need and are drawn toward him to come. John knows that the visions of God's glory among his people, proclaimed as the Word of God, will create a thirst to participate in the reality of this glory. Nothing is required except to come and drink.

Those who respond to this invitation and remain loyal to Christ as overcomers (see comments on 2:7, 11, et al.) will inherit all the new things of the city of God. They will be God's children, and he will be their Father. This is the essence of salvation—unending, intimate relationship with God himself (cf. Jn 17:3). For John this is really what the heavenly city is all about.

Before John shows us the city, however, he must first confront us with a choice. This choice must be made because there are two cities: the city of God and the city of Babylon, each with its inhabitants and its destiny. Those who drink from salvation's springs supplied by God himself are true followers of Christ. The "cowardly" are those who fear persecution arising from faith in Christ. Not having steadfast endurance, they are devoid of faith (Mt 8:26; Mk 4:40; cf. Mt 13:20–21). Thus they are linked by John to the "unbelieving" and "vile." They are called "murderers" because they are guilty of the death of the saints (17:6; 18:24). The "sexually immoral, those who practice magic arts, the idolaters and all liars" are those associated with idolatrous practices (cf. 9:21; 18:23; 21:27; 22:15; contrast 14:5). By their own choice, Babylon is their eternal home.

B. The New Jerusalem Described (21:9–22:5)

For reasons why this section does not describe the millennial kingdom of ch. 20, see comments on 20:1–6. John first describes the gates and the walls of the city (vv.9–14). Then the angel measures the city, and John cites the precious stones in the twelve foundations (vv. 15–21). Finally, he describes various aspects of the life of the city (21:22–22:5).

9–10 Here the parallelism with 17:1 is clearly deliberate. The bride, the wife of the Lamb, contrasts with the great prostitute, the archetypal image for the great system of satanic evil. The bride is pure and faithful to God and the Lamb, whereas the prostitute is a mockery. To see the prostitute, John was taken to the desert; now he is elevated by the Spirit to the highest pinnacle of the earth to witness the exalted New Jerusalem (cf. 1:10; 4:2; 17:3). As his vision will be a reinterpretation of Ezekiel's temple prophecy (Eze 40–48), like the former prophet, he is taken to a high mountain (Eze 40:2). For the moment, the author drops the bridal metaphor and in magnificent imagery describes the church in glory as a city with a lofty wall, splendid gates, and jeweled foundations.

11–14 In John's description of the city, precious stones, brilliant colors, and the effulgence of light abound. The problem of the literalness of the city has received much attention. If the city is the bride and the bride the glorified community of God's people in their eternal life, there is little question that John's descriptions are primarily symbolic of that glorified life. This in no way diminishes the reality behind the imagery. In the most suitable language available to John, much of it drawn from the OT, he shows us something of the reality of the eschatological kingdom of God in its glorified existence.

Its appearance is all glorious, "with the glory of God" (v.11; cf. Eze 43:4). The city has a "brilliance" (GK 5891) given it by God's presence that appears as crystal-clear jasper (Isa 60:1–2, 19; Rev 21:23). "Jasper" is mentioned three times in ch. 21 (vv.11, 18–19; cf. 4:3). This is an opaque quartz mineral and occurs in various colors, commonly red, brown, green, and yellow, rarely blue and black, and seldom white.

The wall is high, its height symbolizing the greatness of this city as well as its impregnability against those described in 21:8, 27. The twelve gates are distributed three on each of the four walls. These may be like the triple gates that can now be seen in the excavated wall of the old Jerusalem (see also v.21). What impresses John about the gates are their angel guards and the inscribed names of the twelve tribes of Israel. The presence of angels proclaims that this is God's city, while the twelve tribes emphasize the complete election of God (cf. comment on 7:4). Here is a deliberate allusion to Ezekiel's eschatological Jerusalem on whose gates the names of the twelve tribes appear (Eze 48:30–34). Ezekiel 48:35 says, "The name of the city from that time on will be: THE LORD IS THERE" (cf. Rev 21:3; 22:3–4).

Like the gates, the twelve foundations of the wall have twelve names written on them—in this case, the names of the twelve apostles of the Lamb. Foundations of ancient cities usually consisted of extensions of the rows of huge stones that made up the wall, down to the bedrock. Jerusalem's first-century walls and foundation stones have recently been excavated. Huge stones, some of which are about five feet wide, four feet high, and thirty feet long, weighing eighty to one hundred tons each going deep into the ground, have been found.

Here John stresses the names of the twelve apostles on the foundations (see also vv.19–21). Theologically, it is significant that he brings together the twelve tribes and the twelve apostles of the Lamb and yet differentiates them. This is not unlike what Matthew and Luke tell us that Jesus said (Mt 19:28; Lk 22:30). The earlier symbolic use of twelve (see comment on 7:4), representing completeness, implies that it is unnecessary for us to know precisely which twelve apostles are there. Judas fell and was replaced by Matthias (Ac 1:21–26), but Paul also was a prominent apostle. Furthermore, the number "twelve" is sometimes used to refer to the elect group when all twelve are not in view (Jn 20:24 has ten; 1Co 15:5 has eleven; cf. Lk 9:12). The apostles represent the church, the elect community built on the foundation of the gospel of Jesus Christ, the slain Lamb. The dual election here depicted admittedly entails some difficulty in identifying the twelve tribes in 7:4ff. with the church (see comments at 7:1ff.).

15–21 The angel measures the city with a golden measuring rod (see comment on 11:1). The act of measuring signifies securing something for blessing. Ezekiel's elaborate description of the future temple and its measuring was to show the glory and holiness of God in Israel's midst (Eze 43:12). The measuring reveals the perfection, fulfillment, or completion of all God's purposes for his elect bride. Thus the city is revealed as a perfect cube of twelve thousand stadia (12x1000 [about 1,400 miles]). The wall is 144 cubits (about 200 ft.) thick (12x12). These dimensions should not be interpreted as providing architectural information about the city. Rather, we should think of them as theologically symbolic of the fulfillment of all God's promises. The New Jerusalem symbolizes the paradox of the completeness of infinity in God. The cube reminds us of the dimensions of the Most Holy Place in the tabernacle (10x10 cubits [15x15 ft.]) and in the temple (20x20 cubits [30x30 ft.]). John adds that the measurement was both human and divine (v.17). In some sense both the human and the divine will intersect in the Holy City.

In vv.18–21, John describes in more detail the priceless materials of the city with its foundations and gates (cf. Isa 54:11–15). The symbolism is not meant to give the impression of wealth and luxury but to point to the glory and holiness of God. The wall of jasper points to the glory of God (4:2–3; see comment on 21:11), while the fabric of the city is pure gold—as clear as glass (v.21). Such imagery portrays the purity of the bride and her splendor in mirroring the glory of God (cf. Eph 5:27).

The foundation stones are made of twelve precious stones. Here the imagery may reflect three possible sources: (1) the high priest's breastplate (Ex 28:17–20), (2) the jewels on the dress of the king of Tyre (Eze 28:13), or (3) the signs of the zodiac. The second one, though referring to only nine stones, suggests the splendor of ancient royalty and might be appropriate as a symbol for the glorious kingdom reign in the Holy City. Yet there is something inappropriate about taking this pagan king as symbolic of the future kingdom. Others prefer the first option—that of the high priest's breastplate.

But while the twelve stones are perhaps the same, the order of their mention is different. This leaves the third option. According to Philo and Josephus, Israel associated these same stones with the signs of the zodiac, and their tribal standards each bore a sign of the zodiac. If we begin with Judah, the tribe of Christ (7:5), the sign is Aries, the Ram, which has the amethyst as its stone. The last sign is Pisces, the fishes, which has jasper as its stone. So the first zodiacal sign agrees with the twelfth foundation and the last zodiacal sign with the first foundation. In fact, the whole list agrees with John's, though in reverse order. This may be a significant device to show John's disapproval of pagan cults.

The gates are twelve great pearls. Though pearls are not mentioned in the OT, some rabbinic texts refer to gates for Jerusalem hewn out of jewels about forty-five feet square. As for the one main street of the Holy City, it is like the fabric of the city itself, of pure gold, clear as glass.

22–27 John turns from this beautiful description of the city to the life within it. In antiquity every notable city had at least one central temple. The New Jerusalem not only differs in this respect from ancient cities but also from all Jewish speculation about a rebuilt temple and the restoration of the ark of the covenant. Illuminated by the overflowing radiance of the presence of the glory of God, the Holy City no longer needs a temple (GK 3724). Yet paradoxically it has a temple, for the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are its temple (v.22). And in another sense, the entire city is a temple, since it is patterned after the Most Holy Place (v.16). In his glorious vision, John sees the fulfillment of these hopes in the total presence of God with his purified people, while the Lamb, the sign of the new covenant, is the fulfillment of the restoration of the ark of the covenant (see comment on 11:19; cf. Jn 4:21, 23). In the new city, where there is no longer any uncleanness, no actual temple is needed. In fulfillment of Isa 60:19–20, there will be no further need for any natural or artificial lighting because the glory of God will dim the most powerful earthly light into paleness (cf. Zec 14:7). In the earthly tabernacle and temple, there was, to be sure, artificial lighting (the seven-branched lampstand); yet the Most Holy Place had no such lighting because of the light of God's own presence.

Verses 24–26 present a remarkable picture of "the nations" and "the kings of the earth" entering the city and bringing their "splendor" (GK 1518) into it. John receives a vision of social life, bustling with activity. Elsewhere in Revelation, the "nations" (GK 1620) are the pagan, rebellious peoples of the world who trample the Holy City (cf. comments on 11:2; 11:18) and have become drunk with the wine of Babylon, the mother of prostitutes (18:3, 23); they will be destroyed by the second coming of Christ (19:15). But here they stand for the peoples of earth who are the servants of Christ, the redeemed nations who follow the Lamb and have resisted the beast and Babylon (1:5; 15:3; 19:16; 2:26; 5:9; 7:9: 12:5). This latter group, described figuratively here, have part in the activity in the Holy City, the kingdom of God.

Life in the age to come will certainly involve continuing activities and relationships that contribute to the glory of the Holy City throughout eternity. Instead of the nations bringing their precious possessions to the harlot city, the redeemed nations will bring these offerings to the throne of God (cf. Isa 60:3ff.). So certain is its perpetual light and security that the gates will never be shut for fear of evil (v.25; cf. Isa 60:11).

One thing is absolutely certain. Nothing impure (lit., "common"; GK 3123) will ever enter the city's gates (v.27); by this word John means no ceremonial impurity (cf. 21:8; 22:15). Only those can enter whose names are in "the Lamb's book of life" and who thus belong to him through redemption (cf. 3:5; 20:12, 15). This should not be taken as implying that in the New Jerusalem there will still be unsaved roaming around outside the city who may now and then enter it by repenting. Instead, John warns present readers that the only way to participate in the future city is to turn one's total loyalties to the Lamb now (cf. 21:7).

C. The River of Life and the Tree of Life (22:1–5)

1–5 This section continues the description of the Holy City begun in 21:9, but now with the emphasis on its inner life. John returns to his archetypal images from Ge 1–3 and Eze 40ff. Here Paradise is regained. As in the OT imagery of the age to come, metaphors of water and light abound (cf. Isa 12:3; Zec 14:7–8). "The river of the water of life" recalls Eze 47:1ff. (cf. Joel 3:18) and the pastoral scene of Rev 7:17. In both Testaments water is frequently associated with the salvation of God and the life-imparting and cleansing ministry of the Holy Spirit (Isa 44:3; cf. Jn 3:5; 4:13–14; 7:37–39; 13:10; 19:34; Tit 3:5). In the new city of God the pure water does not issue from the temple as in Eze 47 but comes from "the throne of God," since this whole city is a Most Holy Place with God at its center. Life from God streams unceasingly through the new world.

"The tree of life" spreads all along the great street of the city (v.2). What was once forfeited by our first parents in Eden and denied to their succeeding posterity is now fully restored (cf. Ge 3:22–24). In Ezekiel's vision there are multiple trees on each side of the river that bear fruit monthly (Eze 47:12). Thus, the tree John speaks of may be a collective word for Ezekiel's trees. So abundant is its vitality that it bears a crop of fruit each month! Its leaves produce healing for the nations. The imagery of abundant fruit and medicinal leaves should be understood as symbolic of the far-reaching effects of the death of Christ in the redeemed community, the Holy City. So powerful is the salvation of God that the effects of sin are completely overcome. The eternal life God gives the redeemed community will be perpetually available, will sustain them, and will cure eternally the effects of every former sin.

Thus the curse pronounced in Eden is removed (v.3; cf. Ge 3:17). This may mean that no one who is cursed because of idolatry will be in the city (v.15). Instead of Babylon and its servants occupying the earth, the throne of God will be central and his servants will serve him (cf. 2:13). Wherever the throne is in sight, the priestly service of the saints will be perpetual (cf. 1:6). Here our true liturgy is fulfilled (cf. Ro 12:1). John emphasizes God and the Lamb (21:22–23; 22:1, 3). They share the same glory, the same throne, the same temple significance. The high Christology of John's vision is everywhere evident even though stated in functional terms.

With no restrictions such as those that pertain to Moses (Ex 33:20, 23) or the high priests (Heb 9:7), the redeemed will be in Christ's presence, beholding perpetually his glory (cf. Ps 17:15; Mt 5:8; 1Co 13:12; 2Co 3:18; 1Jn 3:2). Eternal life is perfect communion, worship, the vision of God, light, and victory. Concerning the name on their foreheads, see comment on 14:1.

A final burst of light engulfs the whole scene, and an announcement that the saints "will reign for ever and ever" fulfills the first promise of the book (1:6; cf. 5:10; 20:4 6; see esp. 11:15). The logical sequence as well as the inner relationship of the words "his servants will serve" (v.3) and "they will reign" (v.5) have deep implications for the whole nature of God's kingdom in contrast to that of the satanic Babylon. Surely it is fitting for such a book of prophecy as Revelation to close around the throne, with God's servants both worshiping and ruling.

VI. Conclusion (22:6–21)

With consummate art, the notes of the introit (1:1–8) are sounded again in the conclusion. So the book ends with the voices of the angel, Jesus, the Spirit, the bride, and, finally, John (v.20). The book is a seamless garment. There are three major emphases in the conclusion: confirmation of the genuineness of the prophecy (vv.6–7, 16, 18–19); the imminence of Jesus' coming (vv.7, 12, 20); the warning against idolatry and the invitation to enter the city (vv.11–12, 15, 17–19).

6 A word of assurance similar to that in 19:9 and 21:5 provides the transition from the glorious vision of the Holy City to the final words of the book. An angel declares that it is "the Lord, the God of the spirits of the prophets," the one from whom prophets like John receive their message, that assures the readers of the speedy fulfillment of all that has been revealed (cf. 1:1; 10:6–7).

7 This first declaration of the imminent coming of Jesus is Jesus' own response to the yearnings of the church (cf. comments on 1:7; 2:25; 3:11). This is the sixth beatitude in Revelation; and, like the first one (1:3), it is directed toward those who "keep" (i.e., "obey"; GK 5498) the words of the prophecy (cf. vv.18–19).

8–9 The "I, John" is reminiscent of 1:4, 9. His confession that he "heard and saw these things" and the repetition of the prohibition (19:10) against John's worshiping the angel serve a purpose. No believer, not even one of great spiritual stature as John, is beyond the subtle temptation to worship what is good itself in place of God, who alone is to be worshiped.

10–11 These verses stand in contrast to the command given Daniel to seal up his book (8:26; 12:4, 9–10). John's message cannot be concealed because the contents of the vision are needed immediately by the churches. On the sealing metaphor, see comment on 7:3.

Verse 11 appears to be fatalistic. Yet on further reflection, the exhortation stresses the imminency of Jesus' return and the need for immediate choices. It echoes the aphorism: As now, so always. Far from being an encouragement to remain apathetic, it is evangelistic in spirit. It may also allude to the great ordeal John viewed as imminent. For the unfaithful and wicked, this appeal would be a deep confirmation of their choice, whereas for the faithful, it would alert them to the necessity of guarding themselves against apostasy (cf. Jude 20–21). There is no reason to take this passage as teaching the irreversibility of human choices. Repentance is always a live option while a person is alive. After death, however, there remains only judgment (Heb 9:27).

12–13 This second of three announcements of the imminent return of Jesus in this chapter (cf. vv.7, 20) is associated with the truth of rewards and judgment based on deeds (cf. comment on 20:12; also 11:18). On the terms Alpha and Omega, etc., see comments on 1:8, 17.

14 The seventh and last beatitude in Revelation is evangelistic in emphasis (cf. 21:6; 22:11, 17). Strands of the earlier imagery are blended in it. In 7:14 the washing of the robes indicates willing identification with Jesus in his death. It also carries the thought of martyrdom during the great ordeal for the saints (cf. 6:11). Thus it symbolizes a salvation that involves obedience and discipleship, since it is integrally related to the tree of life (cf. comment on 22:2) and the gates of the city (cf. 21:25).

15 John has already made it clear that no idolaters can ever enter the city but only those whose names are in the Lamb's book of life (cf. comments on 21:8, 27). Such are "the dogs"—those who "practice magic arts. . . ," i.e., those who rebel against the rule of God (on "dog," cf. Dt 23:18; Mt 15:26; Php 3:2–3). No doubt such people will not be admitted through the gates of the Holy City but will be in the lake of fire (20:15). But the problem involves what appears to be their present exclusion from the city at the time of John's writing. Are they "outside" now? As has been previously argued, the city is future and is not to be identified with the present historical church (see comments on 21:1–22:21; 21:2). Only in an eschatological sense can it be maintained that the new city exists in the present. Since the fulfillment of v.14 lies in the future, the time of v.15 is also most naturally future. The word "outside" is simply a figure that agrees with the whole imagery of the Holy City. It means exclusion. To be outside the city means to be in the lake of fire.

16 As in 1:8, 17–20, Christ addresses John and the churches directly (the "you" is plural). Here Christ's words authenticate the whole book of Revelation ("this testimony") as being a message to the churches. Therefore, any method of interpreting Revelation that blunts the application of this message in its entirety to the present church disregards these words of Christ. He is the Messiah of Israel, "the Root and the Offspring of David" (cf. Isa 11:1; see comment on Rev 5:5), and the fulfillment of the "Star" promise to the overcomers at Thyatira (see comment on 2:28).

17 The first two sentences are not an evangelistic appeal but express the yearning of the Holy Spirit and the "bride" (the whole church, cf. 21:9) for the return of Christ. In v.20 John gives us the Lord Jesus' answer: "Yes, I am coming soon." The members of the local congregations in John's time join in the invitation for Christ to return. Then, any in the congregations who are not yet followers of Jesus are invited to come and take the water of life as a free gift (cf. Ro 3:24; Rev 21:6). On "the water of life," cf. 21:6; 22:1; see also comment on v.20).

18–19 These verses should not be taken as a warning against adding anything to the Bible. They are primarily a strong warning to false prophets not to alter the sense of John's prophecy in this book, either textually or in its moral and theological teaching (cf. 1Co 16:22). So severe is the danger he is warning against that John says that those who teach contrary to the message of Revelation will not only forfeit any right to salvation in the Holy City but will have visited on them the divine judgments ("plagues") inflicted on the beast worshipers.

20 This is the third affirmation in ch. 22 of Jesus' imminent return and perhaps the response to the longing cry in v.17. John responds to the Lord Jesus' declaration by saying, "Amen. Come, Lord Jesus." These fervent words were part of the liturgy of the early church. They were a prayer used at the close of the meal in the eucharistic liturgy (Didache 10.6). As Jesus appeared to his disciples alive on the first day of the week, so he was expected to be present in the Spirit at every first-day Eucharist celebration and to appear again at the end, which is often represented by the picture of a messianic meal. The expression "Come, Lord Jesus" is equivalent to the Aramaic marana' 'atah (i.e., Maranatha; cf. 1Co 16:22, "Come, O Lord"). So in closing the book of Revelation, John alludes to ch. 1, with its reference to the Lord's Day (1:10).

21 A conclusion such as this is wholly appropriate for this prophetic message addressed to the ancient church and, indeed, to the whole body of Christ. The benediction is reminiscent of Paul's usual practice (cf. the final verses in his letters). Nothing less than God's grace is required for us to be overcomers and triumphantly enter the Holy City of God, where we shall reign with him forever and ever.

The Old Testament in the New

NT Text	OT Text	Subject
Rev 1:7	Zec 12:10	Looking on one pierced
Rev 1:13	Da 7:13	Coming Son of Man
Rev 1:13–15	Da 10:5–6	Vision of a man
Rev 1:15	Eze 43:2	Voice of rushing waters
Rev 2:27	Ps 2:9	Ruling the nations
Rev 4:6–8	Eze 1:4–10	Four living creatures
Rev 4:8	Isa 6:3	Holy, holy, holy
Rev 5:6	Zec 4:10	Seven eyes of God
Rev 6:2–8	Zech 6:1–6	Four different-colored horses
Rev 6:8	Eze 14:21	Four dreadful judgments
Rev 7:3	Eze 9:4	A mark on the forehead
Rev 7:16	Isa 49:10	Eternal blessings
Rev 7:17	Isa 25:8	God wipes away tears
Rev 10:4	Da 12:4	Sealed words
Rev 10:9–10	Eze 3:1–3	Eating a scroll
Rev 11:1	Eze 40:3	Measuring the temple
Rev 11:4	Zec 4:1–2	Lampstand and olive trees
Rev 11:15	Da 7:27	An everlasting kingdom
Rev 12:14	Da 7:25; 12:7	Three times and a half
Rev 13:1–2	Da 7:3–7	Beasts from the sea
Rev 13:6	Da 11:36	Blaspheming God
Rev 13:7	Da 7:21	War against the saints
Rev 14:14	Da 7:13	Coming Son of Man
Rev 17:12	Da 7:24	Ten horns as ten kings
Rev 18:13–19	Eze 27:27–32	Destruction of a sinful city
Rev 19:15	Ps 2:9	Ruling the nations
Rev 19:17–21	Eze 39:17–20	Food for the birds

The Old Testament in the New

NT Text	OT Text	Subject
Rev 20:8–9	Eze 38:1–39; 16	Gog and Magog
Rev 20:12	Da 7:10	Court books being opened
Rev 21:4	Isa 25:8	God wipes away tears
Rev 21:7	1Ch 17:13	Father and son
Rev 21:10	Eze 40:1–2	Vision of new Jerusalem
Rev 21:12–13	Eze 48:30–35	Twelve gates of the city
Rev 22:1–2	Eze 47:1, 12	Flowing waters and fruit trees

Index of Goodrick/Kohlenberger Numbers

Greek Words

GK No.	Page(s)
11	1172
12	1171
13	1172
14	907
19	89, 545, 565, 927
20	596, 741, 879
24	174
26	29, 373, 741, 778, 838, 1046, 1056, 1110
27	29, 233, 586, 638, 643, 702, 736, 767, 791, 816, 836, 847, 893, 910, 915, 989, 1056, 1065, 1097, 1101, 1122
28	223, 274, 905, 909, 965, 1049, 1073, 1087, 1120, 1123
34	85, 410, 944, 1138
39	31, 251, 358, 493, 609, 623, 627, 778, 871, 901, 913, 949, 980, 986, 987, 990, 1010
40	1005, 1043
41	130, 318, 524, 582, 617, 623, 627, 752, 752, 789, 815, 974, 1014, 1045, 1049, 1067, 1120, 1156, 1159
42	1004
49	1046
54	809, 927, 1032
60	1070, 1196
70	1011
73	915
74	404, 795, 826, 851, 906
76	825, 842, 902, 906, 916
80	1096
81	27, 369, 383, 663, 1020, 1088
86	802
87	57, 267, 1137
88	1032
90	869
94	527, 1108
96	623
99	529, 914
105	984, 994
113	864
118	1076
124	991
126	839
133	897
135	120, 654
145	794
146	740
148	933
149	773
153	900, 923
155	835
170	914
172	582, 635, 757, 943
173	116, 297, 305, 961, 980
174	774, 834, 851
176	163, 227, 627, 740, 1202, 1205
179	972
189	1031
199	243
201	67, 170, 245, 1022
203	914
214	762
219	517
224	1035, 1090
225	1090
230	1038
237	326, 714, 772, 783, 989, 1110
239	809
240	974
247	189
248	654
252	1212
276	1075
278	938
279	544
281	556, 679, 753, 756, 1094
283	44, 148, 544
285	899, 931
288	902
297	26, 666
299	972
303	300
318	1075
320	752, 822, 980, 1124
337	73
340	628, 858
353	656
357	252
359	884, 986
363	835
368	753
373	618

GK No.	Page(s)
377	783
382	1003
390	984
391	772
397	639
399	58, 1198
405	855
414	220, 476, 1221
416	964
422	971
424	217
429	1011
435	894
437	656
441	923
455	898, 903
462	836, 876
468	28, 1059
476	615
482	776
485	720, 931
490	930, 945, 1094
492	804
494	1005
495	914
496	530, 538, 915
497	1003
505	1003
508	1059
512	904
519	896
531	982
532	1090
537	893, 910, 1032
538	924
540	304
545	49, 1158, 1159
547	766
550	1082
561	864
562	983, 1120
563	972
565	121
569	564, 600, 651, 1196
575	943
577	957
578	955, 1000
579	926
587	984
588	830
589	828
600	194, 871
601	912
605	781
608	1151
610	992
621	903
625	589, 903
626	1123
635	401, 1123
636	527, 614
637	696, 711, 755, 845, 877, 1125, 1131
639	761, 821
640	401
648	614
652	1091
657	922
660	52, 272, 305
661	1172
665	790, 917
666	623
667	753, 773, 819, 980
668	1013
686	845, 882
690	159, 160, 358, 576
691	625
693	47, 160, 385, 459, 523, 601, 609, 632, 663, 708, 751, 802, 815, 852, 891, 921, 952, 1043, 1064, 1141
695	916
700	835, 1023, 1047
710	388
720	1124
724	807, 906, 992, 1070, 1076
734	1028
740	476
742	817
746	809, 1049, 1064, 1065
766	243, 280
768	300
771	991
772	797
773	864
774	622
775	676, 754
780	894
788	32, 316
794	755, 783, 820, 1153
795	949
801	157
807	757
813	527, 929, 1123
814	1123
815	544, 1120, 1123
816	740, 1070
819	564, 697, 700, 960, 973
820	591
822	544, 591, 633
825	488
832	656
834	1075
836	914
842	998
845	914
846	912
861	776
864	868
865	886
876	886
881	923

GK No.	Page(s)
889	818
894	906
895	810
898	210
904	984
912	457, 753, 819
917	927
918	753, 1085, 1141
920	914
921	899
923	238, 901
925	1122
929	738
933	694, 776, 1050
940	914
947	937
950	921
965	1146
967	767
970	1214
975	525
983	744, 852
987	105
989	1197
993	16, 141, 362, 381, 620, 623, 740, 819, 845, 1135, 1159, 1180
994	1049
995	362, 1050, 1207
996	1212
997	1026
1002	594
1007	109, 188, 835, 1205
1008	926
1010	947, 1066, 1068
1011	666, 827, 947
1012	790
1013	1006
1037	677
1046	985, 1157
1059	124, 255, 457, 480, 1025, 1201
1060	62, 124, 417, 835, 906
1061	914
1063	187, 631
1083	964
1089	1033
1093	836
1111	630
1119	1123
1121	912
1147	173, 1030
1155	56, 82, 111, 276
1161	9
1164	7
1169	478, 1049
1174	610, 949
1181	297
1182	112, 326, 331, 373, 730, 1064, 1150
1184	1030
1185	387, 442, 641
1188	892, 922
1192	710, 794
1194	643, 814, 1064, 1065, 1086
1197	1123
1198	799
1201	404
1207	670
1208	71, 611
1213	257, 840, 867, 1148
1214	902, 1005
1218	959
1220	914
1222	647, 900
1228	227, 1210
1255	895
1256	79, 187, 209, 228, 260, 284, 384, 1222
1259	907
1261	910
1268	1154
1283	226
1284	1072
1305	406, 928, 1068, 1121, 1162
1312	84
1313	79
1321	995
1322	474
1328	979
1331	933
1333	19, 224, 900, 914, 1059
1343	1214
1347	120, 193, 568, 724, 972, 975, 980, 981
1354	92, 414, 1044, 1056
1355	414, 585, 640, 769, 894, 946
1356	414, 589, 595, 599, 763, 789, 817, 824, 841, 899, 901
1359	1020, 1025
1363	476, 480
1369	799
1371	948
1379	101
1427	944
1433	666
1434	899
1436	585, 902, 915, 915
1437	99, 103, 769
1438	711, 825, 885
1439	397, 916
1443	388
1444	1067
1465	148, 545, 809, 876, 1037, 1085
1466	18, 23, 27, 354, 457, 526, 536, 537, 538, 554, 593, 679, 721, 772, 784, 962, 944, 1064, 1214
1467	457, 531, 537, 623, 717, 718, 932, 1028
1468	548, 717, 1213
1469	717, 929
1470	717
1472	513
1474	900
1491	133
1496	740

GK No.	Page(s)
1500	1020
1501	876, 1043
1503	586, 645, 1185
1505	832
1506	278, 956
1507	640, 775, 851, 870, 900
1509	544
1512	1168
1514	1148
1518	208, 313, 353, 423, 537, 636, 637, 671, 687, 852, 943, 948, 952, 1044, 1064, 1076, 1124, 1228
1519	236, 321, 344, 354, 356
1526	738, 850
1528	114, 523, 710, 789, 921, 938, 1019, 1064, 1120, 1131
1530	627
1538	972
1539	241, 525, 621, 645, 699, 755, 848, 910, 944, 947, 964, 1067
1540	818
1541	907
1543	591
1559	1036
1562	394, 537
1581	16
1583	972
1586	776, 1221
1590	988
1591	674, 888
1593	917
1595	876
1599	1058
1602	742, 1065
1604	924
1609	327
1613	900
1620	61, 1049, 1176, 1228
1630	740
1635	637, 673, 819, 984, 1192
1645	24, 218, 287, 355, 543, 594, 663, 708, 741, 752, 790, 815, 846, 892, 922, 968, 1005, 1012, 1060, 1117, 1132
1646	1032
1648	248
1651	332, 358
1653	961
1666	340, 1151, 1166
1676	1009
1683	986
1688	1162
1689	878
1711	5, 78, 388, 409, 493, 609, 766, 820, 846, 950, 1007, 1060, 1155
1721	60, 244, 752
1723	99, 110, 188, 269, 912, 921, 1043, 1049, 1110
1724	848, 1066
1725	1003
1750	933
1756	1056
1762	893, 916, 1005
1763	781
1772	544, 932
1791	915
1793	993
1794	353, 775, 916, 925, 930, 1154
1795	1153
1796	569, 585, 894
1798	951
1799	215, 569, 757, 892, 932, 959
1800	1024
1823	938
1827	736
1828	542, 544, 596, 736, 767, 816, 847, 921, 953, 1053
1839	335
1869	859
1877	660
1904	894
1907	783
1918	755, 884
1920	640
1931	880
1950	895
1953	1111
1961	972
1965	1121
1967	1192
1973	723, 776, 840
1975	709
1981	829
1987	557
2002	810
2007	298
2016	244
2026	241, 280, 633, 637, 755, 783, 1124
2039	396, 980
2040	908
2043	1120
2047	809
2061	915
2091	800
2098	1025
2103	305, 675
2105	1064
2106	817, 896, 914, 1064
2114	922
2117	808, 899, 931, 1032
2121	966, 1032, 1044
2138	951
2146	1068
2148	1060
2152	903
2157	252
2160	802, 909, 1033
2170	216, 948, 1024
2173	214
2174	1005, 1058
2175	898

GK No.	Page(s)
2176	461, 789, 889, 898, 923
2184	1031
2187	925
2188	850
2191	879
2203	916
2210	929
2211	884, 907, 910
2213	776
2220	1065
2224	761, 827, 1123
2227	1050
2228	1067
2230	997
2240	741, 759, 847
2241	839
2245	19
2247	109, 188
2249	740, 796, 1031
2251	740, 906
2263	355, 860, 868
2274	1200
2288	784
2294	222, 226, 764, 857, 956, 1054
2295	21, 139, 848, 912, 1197
2296	769
2298	928, 1013
2305	60, 223
2306	753
2317	141
2326	994
2328	115, 288, 966, 1052
2329	216, 752
2330	688
2331	907
2336	428
2340	1032
2343	1011
2351	52
2354	896, 1065
2356	438
2357	929
2368	809
2373	193, 278, 609
2374	895
2375	836
2378	937
2380	669
2384	973, 979, 986
2389	211
2397	740
2398	545, 822
2409	834, 987, 1004, 1221
2418	1154
2419	692, 740, 1031
2420	645, 732
2421	150, 930
2428	906, 913
2433	58
2437	297, 339, 410, 560, 673
2450	1050
2451	1009
2454	1032
2465	617, 865
2473	913
2484	897
2488	579
2505	673
2509	1009
2515	1200
2517	1102
2525	32, 708, 753, 985
2527	985, 1012, 1074
2529	616
2535	915
2536	915
2540	828
2544	953
2563	1188
2565	673
2567	877
2568	109, 824, 845, 849, 857, 858, 876, 876, 991, 1043, 1135, 1143, 1167
2579	654
2580	1024
2581	669
2583	880
2593	978
2596	740, 773, 835
2602	774, 982
2603	1176
2610	1118
2627	132
2633	1049
2636	960, 1159
2639	1175
2652	10
2661	951
2662	1086
2663	538
2671	153
2683	1118
2700	1064
2707	712
2708	1089
2709	755
2751	778, 930, 1085
2752	944
2754	24, 351, 1213
2761	867
2767	623
2779	132
2785	670, 976, 1224
2786	556
2789	43, 382, 626, 745, 753, 840, 864, 907, 1132, 1181
2798	773, 835
2802	916, 1038
2812	1175
2813	21, 541, 853, 980, 1045, 1051, 1059, 1213

GK No.	Page(s)
2819	896, 933, 1025
2820	671
2827	1003
2837	1200
2840	33, 62, 101, 238, 755, 790, 954, 988, 1051, 1147
2843	37, 741
2844	817
2857	831
2859	825
2872	1025
2890	548
2895	1034
2903	679
2906	218
2907	25, 594
2917	988, 1023
2923	954
2934	761, 884
2936	1013
2938	769
2941	976
2969	905
2981	676
2988	871, 883, 988
2990	905
2994	211
2997	821, 828, 995
2999	762
3016	617, 691
3017	794, 800, 953
3029	796
3031	851, 1028
3033	797
3043	654
3045	85, 1051
3046	804
3049	973
3051	820
3060	377
3061	896, 1071
3062	916, 1054
3081	1034, 1036
3082	398
3090	79, 1150
3099	23, 945, 946, 966
3100	493, 774, 980, 995, 1043
3101	943, 994
3103	754
3104	755, 806, 879, 1066
3105	565, 612, 1120
3109	1146
3121	424, 650, 862, 1073
3123	922, 990, 1083, 1228
3126	397, 635, 684, 702, 907, 938, 1011, 1083
3127	907
3128	938
3135	852
3159	902
3160	847, 852, 1140, 1198
3176	976
3177	898
3179	783
3180	84, 297, 352, 541, 757, 1024, 1033, 1059, 1089, 1096, 1101
3186	165
3195	988
3196	501
3197	755, 1124
3202	475, 944
3203	101
3210	904, 1209
3212	35, 233, 533, 593, 990
3213	27, 61, 339, 354, 1197
3215	622
3216	1025
3221	53, 69
3227	48, 860
3231	759
3232	563, 679
3257	1110
3258	1135
3261	4, 131, 178, 185, 229, 248, 264, 385, 393, 431, 439, 472, 480, 508, 524, 575, 640, 798, 971, 1047, 1071
3262	755, 1071
3269	740
3281	777, 943, 947, 1056
3287	1213
3295	10, 212, 222, 273, 277, 282, 399, 464, 1049, 1049, 1068
3301	582
3302	1008
3306	956
3310	986
3313	802, 974, 1056
3320	143
3334	95
3356	654, 710
3357	540, 553, 997
3359	534, 962, 1056
3362	912
3364	210, 210, 296, 380, 481, 773, 849, 880, 894, 947, 1022, 1046, 1053
3367	904
3373	778, 932
3383	660
3389	92, 177, 896
3390	1045
3391	216, 979
3395	79
3407	11
3411	133
3412	232, 317, 435
3421	22, 215, 232, 1021, 1053, 1132
3422	540, 731
3425	636
3426	396, 790
3428	869, 1037, 1074
3429	530, 741, 767, 818, 836, 915, 916, 966,

GK No.	Page(s)
1075
3440	266
3443	1196
3448	944
3455	312, 987, 994, 1002
3456	297, 312, 1131
3457	50, 613
3458	853
3459	288, 381, 1002, 1058
3468	924
3469	1045
3479	1189
3488	1124
3489	109, 1013
3494	740
3496	818
3508	628
3523	1123
3531	1092
3532	627
3533	696
3534	809
3541	967
3542	896, 974
3546	760
3556	773
3557	1007
3565	81, 170, 583
3566	16, 394, 1141
3567	17, 221, 683, 914, 963
3571	807
3572	709, 994
3584	960
3620	1005
3625	84
3629	636, 849, 966
3630	948
3631	262
3632	999
3635	24
3655	1033
3657	88
3659	1009
3662	1196
3666	298, 997
3671	797
3677	853
3680	1067
3696	65, 152, 238, 580, 603, 613, 618, 643, 645, 654, 753, 825, 883, 900, 1138, 1205
3697	1066
3702	612
3704	113
3724	617, 624, 681, 762, 882, 1168, 1175, 1228
3739	834
3740	673
3745	899
3749	81, 1180
3752	1147
3767	898, 926
3768	866, 916, 1045
3771	1142, 1158
3777	654
3783	527, 763
3785	1004
3791	229
3795	481, 535, 539, 555, 558, 718, 738, 969, 1023
3804	781, 933
3805	596, 825, 868
3808	615, 1194
3813	225
3821	962
3827	904
3828	761, 1010
3839	1002
3842	354
3847	431, 1070
3857	326, 868, 1107
3860	1050
3864	656
3867	51
3868	493, 868, 1048
3869	594, 616
3873	753, 762, 824, 893
3874	618, 923
3875	106, 900
3876	948
3880	582, 664, 836
3885	905
3897	865, 878, 906
3899	73
3904	635
3908	871, 1019
3909	1036
3930	797
3933	243, 575, 1102, 1149
3943	57
3949	938
3950	349, 355, 357, 400, 621, 944
3965	696
3973	307, 588, 773, 835, 845, 850, 855, 954, 1163
3975	923
3977	898
3982	912
3988	278
4001	1206
4008	923, 972
4009	772
4011	669
4017	673
4022	153
4026	57, 104, 1171
4051	589
4052	32
4053	562, 589, 875, 951
4063	221, 280, 282
4075	906

GK No.	Page(s)
4077	1044
4079	834
4080	619, 726
4082	915, 1004
4084	929, 1154
4086	84, 950, 1089
4090	61, 406
4093	942
4094	552
4098	932
4108	1006
4114	886
4120	1134
4126	725
4130	111, 152, 979
4132	860, 895
4137	283, 1142
4138	905
4140	50, 83, 116, 119, 172, 198, 249, 566, 639
4142	162, 827
4151	664, 679, 766, 826, 853, 860, 864, 868, 895, 903, 916, 927, 930, 1012, 1013, 1060
4155	585, 686, 796, 851, 886, 902, 1013
4156	346
4157	548
4158	902, 915
4160	1023
4161	639, 711
4165	826
4170	853, 868
4176	955
4183	548, 753, 756
4184	946
4192	1057
4213	1222
4215	996
4221	10, 213, 628, 1196
4225	779, 825
4230	761
4232	899, 923
4237	989
4242	108, 651, 845, 856, 859, 879, 884, 1037, 1093
4244	764, 785, 793, 900, 937, 953, 1093, 1098, 1103, 1107
4246	133, 1123
4247	621
4248	983
4251	1177
4252	103, 251, 839, 1028
4272	930
4279	19, 224, 951
4280	32, 122, 252, 635, 1019, 1043
4287	343
4291	1034
4319	904
4325	912, 933
4344	561, 757, 817, 827, 834, 853, 860, 1084
4346	1019
4348	867
4355	753, 827, 858
4359	1012
4376	78
4377	78
4395	1030, 1031
4409	293, 298, 427, 457, 534, 616, 956, 1098, 1104
4411	457, 526, 536, 540, 583, 592, 613, 641, 643, 718, 736, 742, 758, 784, 816, 822, 847, 876, 904, 913, 915, 956, 992, 1120, 1146
4412	610, 815, 894, 924, 935, 951
4414	276, 1192, 1211
4415	851
4418	1112
4428	858
4431	622
4432	772, 774, 834, 852, 1072
4435	1189
4436	459
4438	899, 923
4443	848, 966
4444	5, 14, 25, 106, 226, 235, 247, 487, 738, 776, 817, 1148
4445	579, 756, 821, 828
4446	101, 184, 590
4458	825
4460	305, 387, 561, 614, 621, 682, 739, 795, 871, 880, 883, 1052, 1054, 1099, 1192
4461	557, 615, 634, 743, 752, 1031, 1048
4462	1179
4463	915
4472	216, 999
4477	1058, 1147
4478	769
4480	1058
4482	1214
4486	498, 760
4487	807
4488	795
4489	975
4498	93, 177, 667, 1136
4505	871, 886
4514	711
4518	88, 620, 740, 774, 834, 860, 1204
4520	1204
4521	1005, 1009
4539	122, 194, 639
4558	23, 58, 1052
4559	742, 767, 836, 1023, 1031, 1053
4565	461, 889, 923, 993, 1058, 1110
4566	926, 937
4589	565, 1046
4590	1043
4598	754
4606	764, 915
4613	585, 868
4618	967

GK No.	Page(s)
4629	903
4633	565
4639	296, 676
4643	543, 761
4657	929
4666	398, 809, 895, 1159
4667	1012, 1123
4668	946
4670	104
4674	397, 840
4682	593, 631
4683	680
4686	12, 38, 46, 132, 133, 440
4689	938
4705	1019
4710	987
4713	809
4714	774
4721	782
4735	585
4736	645
4737	321
4755	1141, 1221
4758	819, 820, 945, 1133
4760	1026, 1029
4775	1143
4777	23, 1024
4796	1057
4800	578
4801	771
4839	944
4845	827
4855	1137
4861	32, 818, 918
4865	1024
4871	498
4877	1036
4878	958
4881	183, 402
4888	880
4894	1171
4920	615
4922	555, 560, 621, 654, 682, 738, 739, 757, 988, 1054, 1089, 1121
4928	1143
4935	508
4936	445
4948	809, 900, 926
4949	896, 927
4956	62, 77, 110, 313, 597, 611, 699, 947, 1182, 1192, 1199
4957	418, 418
4958	218, 226, 327, 371
4966	774
4997	193
4998	80, 593, 612, 737
5007	673, 860, 1052
5008	81, 974, 1067, 1225
5011	675
5012	298
5013	1067
5014	984
5020	954, 955
5023	602
5030	865
5053	611, 611, 753, 764, 1031, 1194, 1206
5055	604, 617, 1031
5064	916
5066	476
5069	1122
5072	250
5073	836
5079	767, 912, 918, 1067, 1075
5082	1065
5083	165
5090	106
5095	856
5100	675, 1011, 1037
5106	826
5109	916, 1021, 1058, 1161, 1182
5112	807, 885
5113	1076
5114	1066
5116	747
5122	728, 827, 1075
5123	806
5146	900
5150	600
5154	757
5155	910, 911
5169	763
5187	808
5188	757
5194	827
5204	826
5210	532
5212	763, 775
5230	247
5252	1016, 1024
5254	795
5264	622, 888
5271	912
5274	762
5281	841
5283	757
5284	187, 403
5287	532, 589, 672, 895, 979, 1055
5304	763
5306	424
5309	794
5319	820, 1074
5334	975
5343	452
5362	763
5364	670
5377	1096, 1158
5381	666, 754
5382	754, 1163
5386	797
5388	642

GK No.	Page(s)
5392	10, 90, 129, 157, 209, 268, 272, 404, 898, 972, 1055
5393	552, 582, 642, 653, 871, 1030, 1211
5400	209
5401	209, 216, 217, 404, 410, 526, 793, 946, 994, 1043, 1168, 1212
5403	929
5404	927
5405	927
5406	910
5407	929
5408	897
5409	898, 923, 926, 927
5415	1034
5417	1153
5419	114
5424	58, 683, 796, 1020, 1033
5425	767, 832, 836
5427	84, 1034, 1059
5434	1071
5435	335, 457
5443	1131
5448	344, 1088
5452	904
5455	30, 613, 644, 646, 806, 825, 962, 1019, 1022, 1024
5457	949, 987, 1002, 1087
5459	970
5464	235, 365, 644, 1200
5465	574, 635, 644, 652, 893, 1044
5469	597, 699, 947
5491	1071
5493	995
5498	357, 871, 1043, 1108, 1120, 1149, 1151, 1151, 1229
5502	896, 943, 1048
5506	780, 903, 1050
5507	586, 904, 948, 1048, 1052
5528	622
5548	959
5553	1020
5587	1036
5596	547, 554, 849, 902
5603	1066
5605	899, 906
5616	894
5617	894, 906, 925, 926, 928
5625	563
5626	24, 333
5633	548, 939, 1043
5634	838
5638	992
5641	989
5642	545
5647	834
5650	755
5655	766
5662	914
5671	798
5677	210, 618
5678	334
5681	1051
5682	1071
5694	255
5695	30, 74, 162
5696	1115
5702	644, 912, 1003
5705	544, 818, 847, 876, 915, 926, 1037, 1065, 1135, 1140
5712	943, 955, 993
5717	897
5718	588, 647, 756, 777, 838, 927, 930, 1033, 1050
5721	910
5735	644
5738	305, 524, 340
5746	372, 910
5757	5, 229, 411
5758	740, 1211
5760	1173
5767	666
5770	944
5771	635
5784	740, 906
5785	654
5786	1200
5787	923
5789	586, 861, 1008, 1065
5792	931
5794	906
5797	373
5798	914
5799	656
5806	914
5810	586, 1008
5811	898, 923, 1056
5827	904
5828	44, 215
5829	989
5832	677, 1051, 1103
5845	744
5850	760
5855	924
5857	1027
5858	833
5860	753
5861	49, 113
5864	1043
5871	1210, 1219
5875	886
5881	630
5882	757
5889	431, 1135, 1196
5890	323
5891	1226
5894	764, 963, 990
5915	741, 1083
5916	1163, 1193
5917	943
5919	725, 836

GK No.	Page(s)
5921	493, 539, 547, 578, 663, 665, 684, 702, 708, 752, 753, 757, 768, 790, 815, 840, 846, 879, 892, 910, 922, 929, 939, 949, 1008, 1050, 1132
5922	394, 547, 585, 626, 640, 902, 910
5952	1161
5970	992
5976	994
5982	774
5983	741, 758, 836, 931
5985	446, 1057
5986	163, 299, 392, 937, 953
5987	666
5989	382, 864
5992	525
6022	884
6034	169, 331, 339, 795, 852, 871, 967, 1011, 1044, 1162, 1211, 1220
6035	1031
6047	108
6052	280, 302
6057	94, 180
6068	933

Hebrew Words

GK No.	Page(s)
253	10
1382	972
2876	45
3051	710
3359	565
3378	341, 672, 798, 1047
5431	167
6625	10
6872	174
7372	1036
8082	781
8120	387
8477	1059
8619	267, 1137
8642	418
8934	157, 287, 663, 708, 852, 892, 968, 1012, 1060
9005	798